THE fabulous histories of wandering knights, distressed damsels, giants, enchanted castles, and the whole train of legendary adventures, that, for a long time, were the delight of our ancestors, are now universally exploded: the inimitable satire of Cervantes has contributed not a little to bring them into disrepute; but however justly he may have ridiculed their many absurdities, yet, perhaps, we have too rashly adopted the contempt, which almost every one now professes for writings, from which it is certain that the greatest poets have derived many fine images; to which we are, probably, in a great measure, indebted for the Fairy Queen of our admired Spenser, and which have been the foundation of the Orlando Furioso, that has procured to its author the appellation of Divine.

The Italians have among them many works of a similar nature with this poem, being accustomed to translate, or compose romances in the octave stanza. Among others, Bernardo Tasso, the father of the great Torquato, published a free translation of the Amadis de Gaul, divided into one hundred cantos; but the much greater part of these performances are not to be considered as rising to any degree of competition with Ariosto, being little else than wild stories of chivalry, with scarce any tincture of poetical imagery and expression; or heavy dull narratives of fiction without imagination, and of events without interest.

Most of these poems, or rather rhyming romances, are drawn from the current romances of the times; such as the history of king Arthur; and his round table, and the account of Merlin, and his prophecies: but the chief of them are built on the romantic history of Charlemain, and the twelve peers of France, called Paladins; which was a title of honour given by Charlemain, to that number of valiant men belonging to his court, who employed their arms in defence of the faith. The principal of these was Orlando, the great hero of chivalry, whose fabulous achievements filled all the books and provincial songs of that age. It is recorded, that when William the Conqueror marched with his Normans to engage Harold, at the memorable battle of Hastings, his soldiers animated each other other by singing the popular ballad of the exploits of Roland, or Orlando.

Dr. Burney, in his elegant History of Music, a book not merely professional, as the title might seem to indicate, but full of general information, has presented us with a great literary curiosity in this old military song, which he thus introduces: "Charlemain had a great passion for these heroic songs, and, like our Alfred, not only had them collected, but knew them by heart. One of these, in praise of Roland, the Orlando Innamorato, and the Furioso, of Boyardo, Berni, and Ariosto, was longer preserved than any of the rest. This, the French historians tell us, was begun at the battle of Hastings, by a knight called Taillefer, on whom this honour was conferred for his strong and powerful voice. Here he performed the office of herald minstrel at the head of the Norman army, and was among the first that fell in the onset." The song, to which I beg to refer the reader, so far as it is preserved, affords an admirable picture of the rough martial spirit of the times. I have here inserted one stanza, with the translation, that gives, though in a ludicrous vein, the exact character of Orlando, as drawn by the romance writers.
PREFACE.

"Pour l'ennemi qui refusfoit
Reservant toute son audace,
A celui qui se soumetloit
Il accordoit toujours sa grace.
L'humanité dans son grand cœur
Renaïssoit après la victoire;
Et le soir même le vainqueur
Au vaincu propofoit à boire."

On stubborn foes he vengeance wreak'd,
And laid about him like a Tartar;
But if for mercy once they squeak'd,
He was the first to grant them quarter.
The battle won, of Roland's soul
Each milder virtue took possession:
To vanquish'd foes he, o'er a bowl,
His heart surrender'd at discretion.

"The song (says Dr. Burney) upon Roland, continued in favour among the French soldiers, so late as the battle of Poictiers, in the time of their king John; who, upon reproaching one of them with singing it at a time when there were no Rolands left, was answered, 'That Rolands would be found if they had a Charlemain at their head.'"

The romance of Charlemain is said to have been the production of a monk, about two hundred years after the time of that prince: to this story the author has prefixed the name of Turpin archbishop of Rheims, a prelate of reputation, who accompanied Charlemain in most of his expeditions, and is reported to have written his life; which work is supposed to be lost.

The most celebrated of the Italian poems of the romance kind, before Ariosto, are the MORGANTE MAGGIORE of Pulci, and the ORLANDO INNAMORATO of Boyardo. The first of these was published in the year 1488, and has its name from Morgante a giant, the principal personage of the poem, whom the poet converts to Christianity, and makes the companion of Orlando in his adventures. This poem, which is of a very singular nature, concludes with the death of Orlando, and the defeat of the Christians in the valley of Roncèvalles; and is thought by some to be entirely a burlesque on the fables of the Paladins: but though many parts of it may appear to be ludicrous, yet others are undoubtedly serious, as the relation of Orlando's death, where that hero, before he departs from life, utters a very devout prayer, which surely no imagination can construe into ridicule. The Italians have indeed many burlesque poems, and among others, one entitled Ricciardetto, written about the year 1700, wherein the characters of Orlando, Rinaldo, and other heroes of romance, are introduced evidently to ridicule the actions related of them, which ridicule consists in carrying the fictions to the highest pitch of incredibility: Among other passages, the author describes a tree, the branches of which extended twenty miles round; at the foot of which was a damsel ready to be devoured by two toads, that are represented so large as to be capable of encountering with a whale. In another place, Orlandino and Rinalduccio, the sons of Orlando and Rinaldo, attack the dwelling of Death, have a personal engagement with him, and by force take from him his scythe and darts. In fictions of this kind the intention of the poet is apparent; accordingly Ricciardetto is placed by Mr. Baretti among the mock Epics, while the poems of Pulci, Boyardo, and Ariosto are all ranked by him in the number of serious pieces.

Baillet, in his review of modern poets*, seems to have little knowledge of Pulci, and only quotes the opinion of Father Rapin, who affirms that Pulci, in his poem of Morgante, observes no propriety, and appears to have debauched his fancy by the perusal of books of chivalry. But Monnoye, in his notes on Baillet, delivers himself thus: "Luigi Pulci was a Florentine, and undertook his Morgante at the instigation of Lucrece Tomobuoni, the mother of Laurence de Medicis. This extraordinary poem, which is in the octave stanza, is divided into twenty-eight cantos: the author has observed no rules in the composition of his work, and this not from a designed neglect, as Vincentio Gravina professes to believe, but because he was entirely ignorant of them. He has, without any regard to the judgment of the critics, confounded time and place, united the serious with the comic, and made the giant, his hero, die in a burlesque manner, by the bite of a sea-crab in his heel; which event happens in the xxth canto, so that he is spoken of no more in the eight following. The beauty of his narrative, however, compensates for all his faults, and the lovers of the Florentine dialect are to this day delighted with the Morgante. Some writers attribute this poem to Politian, and affirm that Pulci had it from him; but this appears very improbable, as all the Italian poems we have of Politian, are in a very different style."

Baretti, in his account of the manners and customs of Italy, speaks thus of Pulci: "It is reported by the biographer of Luigi Pulci, that this poet, who flourished about the year 1450, used often to sing long cantos extempore at the table of Laurence de Medicis. It is even pretended he afterwards put into writing many of those cantos, by the advice and assistance of Laurence himself, Argyropolo, Politian, Giambullari, Marsilius Ficinus, and other learned men, familiarly admitted to the table of that famous patron of learning; and that the Morgante Maggiore was thus formed, a long poem of the Epic kind, incoherent indeed and full of extravagancies, yet no less delightful than the Furioso itself."

But whatever merit Pulci may have with an Italian, he would be little relished by a mere English reader, to whom his fictions must appear highly extravagant, and his humour puerile and absurd: nor indeed could we bear, what must appear to us an unaccountable mixture of religion, heroism, chivalry, and buffoonery. The exordium of his poem is almost word for word from the beginning of St. John's Gospel *, and

Ed era l'Iddio il Verbo, e il Verbo lui, &c.

Morgante Magg. C.i. St. 1.

every every canto opens with a religious address, or allusion to some point of scripture, which unaccountable practice seems to have been pursued by most of these kind of romance writers of that age.

It is to be observed, that though many of the names in Pulci are the same in Boyardo and Ariosto, yet the actions of the first have no sort of connection with those of the last mentioned poets.

In the year 1496, Matteo Maria Boyardo, count of Scandiano, published his Orlando Innamorato, the subject of which is the falling in love of Orlando, and the great actions performed by him for Angelica, in various parts of the world, interspersed with the adventures of many other personages, most of whom afterwards make their appearance in the Furioso.

It is said by Castelvetro, that the names of Agramant, Sacripant, Gradosso, &c. given to the heroes of Boyardo's romance, were the real names of the vassals of that count, living in Scandiano, a principality of the Modenese *.

This may perhaps be the case with respect to many of the names made use of by him; but it cannot cannot be so with Agramant, Orlando, Rinaldo, Olivero, and others, that are known to have been popular in the current romances of the times.

This work abounds with a great variety of entertaining incidents, Boyardo being reckoned, by some, one of the greatest inventors that Italy ever produced, but as he was esteemed very inferior to Pulci, in point of language and versification, though far beyond him in other respects, Dominichi attempted to reduce his poem to better Italian; and about fifty years after Boyardo's death, Francesco Berni, the modern Catullus of Italy, undertook to verify it again, and published his Riferimento of the Orlando Innamorato, which met with such general approbation, that the original poem was soon neglected, and at this time the genuine work of Boyardo is little attended to. Berni was not satisfied with making the verification of this poem better, he inserted many stanzas of his own, and changed almost all the beginnings of the cantos, introducing each, after the manner of Ariosto, with some moral reflection arising from the subject.

† A new-making or new-modelling a work.
Of the Orlando Innamorato no translation has appeared in English; and indeed, though it is a work highly entertaining in Berni's dress, it would scarce admit of a translation into English verse, the narrative descending to such familiar images and expressions, as would, by no means, suit the genius of our language and poetry. In the year 1716, the celebrated Le Sage, author of Gil Blas, published in French a prose translation, or rather paraphrase, under the title of Roland l'Amoureux, in which he has taken considerable liberties with his author, not only changing the order of the incidents, but very often altering the fables, retrenching from the Italian, and adding circumstances of his own, not observing, in this conduct, the example of Berni, who has religiously adhered to the stories, as related by Boyardo, and which have not received any improvement from the imagination of the French translator.

The poem of Orlando Innamorato, though very long, consisting of lxix cantos, divided into three books, was left unfinished by the death of its author: several continuations were written by different persons, particularly one by Nicolo Agostini, in three books; but all these, being greatly inferior to Boyardo, were disregarded, till in in the year 1515, Ariosto, having taking up the same subject, gave the world his Orlando Furioso, which not only eclipsed all the other continuators of Orlando, but greatly surpassed the performance of Boyardo himself.

The poems of Boyardo and Ariosto, taken together, form a complete series of events, and require little or no reference to other romance writers, to give the reader a perfect knowledge of their story. Ariosto, indeed, is intimately connected with the narrative of Boyardo in the general plan of his poem, and in the continuation of several under parts; but Boyardo does not appear, in one instance, to have taken up and continued any single story from another. It is however certain that these poets have derived their general fable from various books and poems on the wars of Charlemain, and the actions of his Paladins, and other subjects of chivalry; and that both have frequent allusions to incidents recorded in these books, and particularly in one apparently prior to Boyardo, entitled, Aspramonte, in cui si contiene le guerre di Re Guarnieri et Agolante contra Roma e Carlo Magno, e di altre guerre e battaglie, massime dello avvenimento d'Orlando e di
This book is in xxiii cantos, in ottava rima: the date and author are altogether uncertain; but from many peculiarities of style and idiom, which strongly resemble the very early writers, it was probably written, if not before, about the time of Pulci; and the beginning of all the cantos have the same strange allusions to scripture doctrine and story as the Morgante. As to the performance itself, it may be classed with the greater part of the numerous publications of the same nature, but will always retain a value from the consideration that it might have been the principal source of the Orlando Innamorato and Furioso.

With respect to the separate merits of Boyardo and Ariosto, Le Sage, in the preface to his translation, gives the following character of the two poets.

"These authors have given a free scope to their imagination, which in both was equally noble and lively: if Boyardo has the merit of invention, Ariosto, in return, has every advantage of style and manner, and the copy is doubtless greatly superior to the original. Ariosto is far more polished, his diction is character, and he possesses all the elegance of language: his verses verses are strong and sonorous: his descriptions are admirable, and often sublime. On the contrary, Boyardo is always groveling and feeble: Ariosto, whether serious or pleasant, is everywhere entertaining, and preserves a degree of majesty even in his pleasantry: he is the only author, who has found out the art of blending the serious with the comic, and the heroic with the familiar; by which means he is truly original, and such an original, as no one has yet successfully imitated."

I shall not enter upon the comparative merits of Tasso and Ariosto: the Italians, in general, give the preference to the Orlando, and other nations allot the first place to the Jerusalem, which undoubtedly has the advantage with respect to unity of design, regularity of disposition; and dignity of subject: these poems are of so different a nature, that they will not admit of a comparison. Mirabaud, the French translator of the Jerusalem, observes, that this matter cannot be more judiciously discussed, than in the words of Horatio Ariosto, nephew to Ludovico, who, however biased to give the palm to his uncle, has delivered himself in the following manner.

"We
"We cannot easily enter upon a comparison of these two poets, who have not the least resemblance to each other: the style of the one is throughout serious and elevated, that of the other is often simple and full of pleasantry. Tasso has observed the precepts of Aristotle; Ariosto has taken no guide but Nature. Tasso, by submitting himself to the unity of action, has deprived his poem of a considerable advantage derived from the multiplicity of events; whereas Ariosto, being free from such restraint, has filled his with a number of incidents that are very delightful to the reader. These great poets have nevertheless both attained the same end, that of pleasing; but they have attained it by different means."

Girafoli tells us, that from the first publication of his poem in 1515, to the year 1532, when he gave an edition, with his last corrections and improvements, enlarged to the number of xlv cantos, Ariosto was continually revising and altering it, occasionally applying to the first wits of Italy for their opinion and advice, such as Bembo, Melzo, Novagero, and others mentioned in his concluding book; and that, like Apelles, he submitted his work to the criticisms of all that would examine it.
Ariosto has been called by some a comic poet; but it should seem that such an opinion must be formed, for want of a due attention to the several parts of his work, which is undoubtedly serious upon the whole, though occasionally diversified with many fallies of humour. But should we, on this account, deny Ariosto the essentials of Epic poetry, we must, with equal justice, refuse the tragic laurel to our own Shakespeare, because his plays are not pure tragedies. Our bard, in his dramatic representation, has drawn his whole picture from the natural world, where events are blended, and where not only the moral characters are varied, but where the same character is seen with a very different aspect at different times.*

But whatever liberties we may allow an author like Ariosto, with respect to mixture of character or style, yet proverbial and ludicrous expressions, or vulgar images, immediately mixed with subjects of pathos, or elevation, must be ever disgusting. On this occasion the author of the Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope, makes some excellent remarks, which he is led to from some passages of this kind introduced by Mr. Pope in his Temple of Fame.

"Strokes

* See Dr. Johnson's Preface to Shakespeare.
"Strokes of pleasantry and humour, and satirical reflections on the foibles of common life, are surely too familiar, and unsuited to a grave and majestic poem *. Such incongruities offend propriety, though I know ingenious persons have endeavoured to excuse them, by saying that they add a variety of imagery to the piece. This precept is even defended by a passage from Horace:

Et sermone opus est modo tristi, sæpè joco,
Defendente vicem modo rhetoris atque poëæ,
Interdum urbani, parcentis viribus, atque
Extenuantis eas consulto †———

"On the revival of literature, the first writers seemed not to have observed any selection in their thoughts and images. Dante, Petrarch, Boccacio, Ariosto, make very sudden transitions from the sublime to the ridiculous. Chaucer, in his Temple of Mars, among many pictures, has brought in a strange line:

and Agramant, is not defective in point of unity, as it sets forth one great action, the Invasion of France by the Saracens, and concludes with the victory of the Christians, by the death or defeat of all the Pagan leaders, although this great action is broken and interrupted, from time to time, by an infinity of episodes and romantic adventures, artfully connected with each other, and interwoven with the general fable. But Boyardo has no pretence to unity in any part of his vast and heterogeneous composition, which, beside the lesser incidents, consists of three distinct great actions: the invasion of France by Gradasso, for the conquest of Durindana and Boyardo; the siege of Albracca by Agrican king of Tartary, and the other enemies of Galaphron, and his daughter Angelica; and the Invasion of France by Agramant to revenge the death of Troyano.

But, notwithstanding Ariosto has undoubtedly a better claim to unity of action, and regularity of design, than his predecessor; yet it is very plain that he never intended to write a regular Epic poem, but that he adopted the fashionable mode of that time. As an instance of the taste then prevalent for the wild and desultory narratives of romance, it is said, that when Bernardo

Tasso conceived the design of composing a poem from the Amadis de Gaul, he had at first reduced it to the plan of a regular Epic, and in that state read part of it to his friends, who gave it so cool a reception, that he thought it advisable to change his purpose, and treat his subject in the same manner as the other popular writers, or Romanzatori.

Thus Ariosto, having undertaken to continue a well-known story, begun and left unfinished by Boyardo, was necessarily led to vary his narrative and diction, as the different subjects required: and therefore in him is to be found a greater variety of style and manner, than perhaps in any other author.

From the romantic turn of his fable, and the motley character of his writing, many of the French critics, and some others, have been induced; in the cool phlegm of criticism, to pass the severest censures on Ariosto; but it will be seen that such censures are in general futile, being founded on the mistaken opinion, that the Orlando is to be tried by the rules of Aristotle, and the examples of Homer and Virgil: but as no writers of real taste, however strongly prejudiced with the idea of classic excellence, could peruse the Italian poem without sensibly feeling its beauties, it follows that their observations often appear a contradictory mixture of praise and censure, of which the reader will have some idea from the following passages of Baillet, in his Jugemens des savans.

"It is a general received opinion in Italy, that the Orlando Furioso has entirely surpassed every performance that appeared before it, particularly the Orlando of Boyardo, and the Morgante of Pulci: the last by dignity of incidents and majesty of versification, and the former by completing and bringing to perfection the inventions of the count. M. Rosseau gives it as his opinion, that the Orlando Furioso had no superior, or rival, till the Godfrey of Tasso, which appeared afterwards in the world.

"Never was any other piece filled with so many and various events as the poem of Ariosto: the whole is a mixture of combats, enchantments, and grotesque adventures; and it is said, that the wits of Italy are still divided concerning the merits of this work, and the Jerusalem Delivered.

* Poëtes modernes.  † Paul Jovius.

"The
The Orlando seems to be a trophy raised from the spoils of every other Italian production, in which the author has neglected nothing that his genius or industry could supply him with, in order to enrich his poem, and give it the utmost perfection.

Father Rapin has discovered many blemishes in the Orlando Furioso*. In one part he finds that the poet has too much fire; in another, that he is crowded with supernatural events, which are like the crude imaginations of a distempered brain, and which can never be admired by men of sense, as bearing no resemblance of truth.

He says, besides, that his design is too vast, without proportion or justness; that his episodes are affected, improbable, injudiciously introduced, and often out of nature; that his heroes are only Paladins, and that his poem breathes more an air of romantic chivalry, than a spirit of heroism.

In other places, he confesses that Ariosto is pure, elevated, sublime, and admirable in expression; that his descriptions are master-pieces, but that he is altogether deficient in judgment; that the beauty of his expression, joined to the other

* Reflect. critiq. sur la poesie, charms
charms of his verification, has imposed upon the world, and so far dazzled our poets, as to prevent their discovering his many absurdities. "His genius," continues Rapin, "resembles those fertile lands that produce, at the same time, weeds and flowers; and though the several parts of his poem are very beautiful, yet the whole, when taken together, does not deserve the title of an Epic poem."

Gravina, an Italian critic, of great taste and judgment, gives the following opinion of Ariosto: "After Boyardo, Ariosto took up the same story, but in a far more exalted strain of poetry, and gave a complete ending to the unfinished invention of his predecessor, interspersing every part of his narrative with strong and masterly pictures of the passions and habits of mankind, in so much, that the Furioso may be considered as an assemblage of all that actuates the human mind, love, hatred, jealousy, avarice, anger, and ambition, in their natural colours, with an infinity of examples of the punishments attendant upon vice. In Boyardo and Ariosto is to be seen the true system of honour known by the name of CHIVALRY. I shall not dwell upon the philosophical and theological doctrines in various parts of Ariosto's poem, particularly in the cantos where St. John and Astolpho are introduced together. But this poet would not have attained his purpose, nor would posterity have found in him that lesson of instruction which is ever the province of poetry, if his work had only described the exalted scenes of life, and not descended sometimes to the familiar and common manners, that every rank and station might meet with correction or reproof. For as in Homer, likewise in Ariosto, the general sublimity of character does not exclude the introduction, though rare, yet sometimes necessary, of personages of a lower order. To such a diversity of matter must be joined a diversity of style, which Ariosto has properly observed. In descriptions of dignity, the dignified style must be used; but where the passage approaches to common life, a humbler phrase is required. In this respect Ariosto is superior to many, always rising and sinking with his subject. He is indeed reprehensible for the disagreeable breaks in his narrative, and for mingling sometimes, injudiciously, ludicrous reflections or licentious allusions with the most serious matter, for a strain of extravagant hyperbole, sometimes for the use of low and vulgar expressions, for his long and tedious digressions on the families of Ferrara, and on his mistress. But such is the power of Ariosto, that while his work work is perusing, almost all his faults and blemishes are lost in the multitude of his excellencies.*"

Among the modern writers, Voltaire has been very severe upon Ariosto, particularly in his essay on Epic poetry, where he speaks of him in the following invidious manner:

"Some readers (says he) will be surprized, that Ariosto is not placed among the Epic poets; but it will be proper to observe to them, that no one, speaking of Tragedy, would mention l'Avare or le Grondeur †; and whatever may be the opinion of some Italians, the rest of Europe will never place Ariosto on a level with Tasso, till Don Quixote is ranked with the Aeneid, or Callot with Corregio."

The same Voltaire, who has so far degraded Ariosto in the above passage, has since delivered his sentiments very differently, in a work lately published‡; from which, for the uncommonness of the subject, and the manner in which he has treated it, I shall translate such passages as immediately relate to the present enquiry,

"The Odyssey of Homer," says he, "seems to have been the model of the Morgante, the Orlando Innamorato, and the Orlando Furioso; and, what rarely happens, the last of these poems is indisputably the best.

"The companions of Ulysses transformed to swine; the winds enclosed in a goat's-skin; musicians with tails of fishes, who devour those that approach them; Ulysses, who follows naked the chariot of a beautiful princess on her return from washing her garments; the same Ulysses, disguised like a beggar, requesting alms, and afterwards killing all the suitors of his old wife, assisted only by his son and two servants; these are imaginations that have given rise to all the romances in verse, that have since been written on similar subjects.

"But the romance of Ariosto is so extensive, so full of variety, so fruitful in every kind of beauty, that after having perused it, I have more than once found my appetite excited to begin it again; and yet I could never read a single canto of this poem in our prose translations; such are the charms of natural poetry!

"What excited particularly my admiration in this wonderful performance, was the uncommon genius genius that seems to raise the author above his subject, which he treats with a kind of sportive negligence: he says the sublimest things with the utmost ease, and often concludes them with a stroke of refined and well-timed pleasantry. The Orlando Furioso is at once the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Don Quixote; for the principal knight-errant runs mad, like the Spanish hero, but is infinitely more entertaining. We are interested for Orlando, but we take no part in the fortune of Don Quixote, who is represented by Cervantes, as a madman, exposed to universal derision.

"The Orlando Furioso has a merit altogether unknown to the writers of antiquity; which merit is exhibited in the openings of the several cantos. Each canto is an enchanted palace, the vestibule of which is always in a different style, sometimes majestic, sometimes simple, and sometimes grotesque. The poet is, by turns, moral, pleasant, and gallant, but never departs from truth and nature."

Voltaire, having then asserted that Ariosto equals Homer in his battles, and given some examples to support his assertion, proceeds thus:

"Ariosto
Ariosto has the peculiar talent of making a transition, from these descriptions of terror, to the most voluptuous pictures; and from these last he can, with equal ease, change his subject to the refined doctrines of morality: but the greatest art of the poet appears in his interesting us so strongly for his heroes and heroines, though they are so many and various: the pathetic incidents in his poem are almost equal in number to the grotesque adventures; and his reader is so pleasingly accustomed to this mixture, that the change steals upon him with the least seeming violence.

I know not who it was that first propagated the pretended question of Cardinal Hippolito to the author; "Messer Ludovico, dove havete pigliate tante coglionerie?" Signor Ludovico, where did you find so many absurdities? The cardinal ought rather to have said, "Dove havete pigliate tante cose divine?" Where did you find so many divine things?

I formerly durst not rank in the number of Epic poets one, whom at that time I considered as only the first of grotesque writers; but, upon a more diligent perusal, I have found him to be as full of sublimity as pleasantry, and now make him this public reparation. It is indeed true, that that Leo X. published a bull in favour of the Orlando Furioso, excommunicating all those who should presume to attack that poem; and I shall be very cautious how I incur the censure of such excommunication *:

Thus has this lively writer signed, as it were,
a recantation of some of the errors of his poetical faith, in which perhaps it will appear, that he has no less exaggerated than he had before depreciated, the merits of Ariosto: however, this example may serve to shew how little stability appears in the opinion of this very extraordinary genius, whose spirit so warmly animated his pen at such an advanced age, but whose writings more frequently appeal to the imagination, than judgment of his reader. I have formerly had occasion to combat some of his strictures on Tasso †; and we have a pregnant instance of his criticisms in his several attacks on Shakespeare, which have been exposed in a moft:

of that immortal poet ‡.

‡ Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakespeare.
A remarkable letter remains of Bernardo Tasso, the father of Torquato, in which there is this passage: "Ne so io s'Aristotele nacessè a questo età e vedesse il vaghissimo poema del' Ariofto, conoscendo la forza del ufo, e vedendo che tahto diletta, come l'esperienza fi dimostra; mutasse opinione, e consentiffè che fi potessè far poema eroico di piu azzone. Giuseppe Malatesta published a Dialogue on the New Poetry, or a Defence of the Furioso, and undertook to show, that this poem was composed agreeably to the several rules of poetry, and that it excelled the beauties of Homer and Virgil.

Having spoken of the opinion which several writers have entertained of the Orlando Furioso, and having touched on the comparative merits of this poem and the Jerusalem Delivered; it will doubtless be highly acceptable to the

* I question, if Aristote had been born in our times, to have seen the poem of Ariofto, and had experienced the wonderful delight afforded by the perusal, whether he would not have altered his sentiments; and agreed that an heroic poem might consist of more than one action, and whether his admirable judgment would not have extended the poetic licence, and given new laws for epic poetry.
English reader, to hear the claims of two such poets as Tasso and Ariosto, referred to the decision of the chaste and elegant Metafemto; who, in compliance with the request of a friend, has delivered himself in the following manner, on this most interesting subject, with that modesty, taste, and candour, so conspicuous in this amiable writer:

"The request which you have been pleased to make, that I would give my sentiments on the superior merit of Ariosto or Tasso, is an invidious task, which you must certainly have imposed upon me without duly considering my abilities. You are not ignorant of the tumults that were raised among the learned in Italy, when first the Jerusalem appeared to dispute with the Furioso that prize, of which the latter had till then remained in such just possession. You know what vain dissentions were kindled by the Pellegrini, the Rossi, the Salviati, and a hundred other champions of either poet; and that the peaceful Horatio Ariosto, a descendant of Lodovico, did all in his power to put an amicable end to the dispute*. I scarcely need recall to your remembrance that celebrated distinction, more brilliant than solid, that the Jer-

AULAMEL was the best poem, but ARIOSTO the greater Poet. Having well weighed the nature of this subject, how can you think that I would arrogate to myself the authority of determining a question, that, after so much literary contest, still remains undecided? But although I dare not think of sitting as judge in such a cause, I may at least be permitted to describe the sensations which I experienced in myself on the perusal of these two celebrated poems. When I first entered upon the study of letters, I found the world divided into parties, and that school, of which I was early initiated a member, attached, with all the fervour of opposition, to the Homer * of Ferrara. In order to improve my poetical talents, my tutors proposed Aristo for my perusal and imitation, judging that my genius would be far more warmed by the happy liberty of the one, than by (what they called) the servile regularity of his rival. I gave way to authority; and the infinite merit of the writer took such entire possession of me, that, not satisfied with repeated perusals, I committed great part of his work to memory; and woe to that person who should then have dared to tell me, that any one could presume to rival Aristo with impunity. It was not long, however, before a friend, in order to flagger my opinion, repeated some of the finest passages in the Jerusalem Delivered, which I could not hear without emotions of pleasure; but still faithful to my party, I almost detested myself for yielding to what I considered the weakness of a corrupt taste, which it was my duty to suppress; and with such sentiments, I passed those years in which our judgment is nothing but mere imitation. At last, being arrived at an age of combining ideas for myself, and weighing their merit in my own scales, I was led, more from a desire of variety, than from motives of pleasure or improvement, to peruse at last the Jerusalem. It is impossible for me to describe the strange alteration which I perceived in my mind on the perusal of this poem. The spectacle which I beheld, as it were in a lively picture, of one great and entire action, clearly set forth, artfully conducted, and perfectly completed; the variety of events that enrich, without perplexing it; the magic of a uniform style, clear, sublime, sonorous, and giving dignity to the most natural and familiar subjects; the vigorous colouring of description; the narrative and rhetorical powers; the true and consistent characters; the connection of ideas; the learning and judgment; but, above the rest, that wonderful genius, which, instead of flag-ging.

With to know which of these two poems deserves the preeminence? I have already declared my unwillingness to enter upon so arduous a decision; but to obey you, I have endeavoured modestly to discover to you the sensations which have been excited in me by these two divine poets. If all this is not sufficient, I here, upon the most impartial examination of myself, declare this to be my present disposition upon the subject. If, in order to shew his power, our poetical father, Apollo, should strangely determine to make me a great poet; and, for that purpose, should bid me freely declare which of these two celebrated poems I would wish mine to resemble—I should certainly hesitate some time in making the choice, but my perhaps great propensity to method, to exactness, and whiles to rule, would, I think, at last incline me to Enchanted the Jerusalem*. a popular creed sufficiently believed for i purposes of Poetry, it were but

The only poem we have in English of the Gothic romance kind, is the FAIRY QUEEN of Spenser; a poet, whose story and style bear the nearest resemblance to Ariosto: the greatest dif ference of these two poets is, that the adventures of the English poet are supported by shadowy characters, that set forth one continued allegory; whereas the Italian author gives a narrative of incidents, in which an allegory is only occasionally introduced. Hughes, in the preface to his edition of Spenser's works, prefers the Fairy Queen on this account, alleging, that "though his fable is often wild, yet it is always emblematical." But, perhaps, upon appealing to the sensations of the reader, Ariosto may even, for this very reason, be found to have the preference; as it will admit of some doubt, whether the constant allegory does not considerably weaken the pathetic effect of the narrative: for what sympathy can we experience, as men, for the misfortunes of an imaginary being, whom we are perpetually reminded to be only the type of some moral or religious virtue?

With regard to the fables contained in the Italian poets and the old romance writers, a critic before cited has the following observations, containing an opinion which had been formerly started by Gravina.

"The writers of the old romances, from whom Ariosto and Spenser have borrowed so largely, are supposed to have had copious imaginations;
ginations; but may they not be indebted for their invulnerable heroes, their monsters, their enchantments, their gardens of pleasure, their winged steeds, and the like, to the Echidna, to the Circe, to the Medea, to the Achilles, to the Syrens, to the Harpies, to the Phryxus, to the Bellerophon of the ancients? The cave of Polypheme might furnish out the ideas of their giants, and Andromeda might give occasion for stories of distressed damsels on the point of being devoured by dragons, and delivered at such a critical season by their favourite knights. Some faint traditions of the ancients might have been kept glimmering and alive through the whole barbarous ages, as they are called; and it is not impossible but these have been the parents of the Genii in the eastern, and the Fairies in the western world. To say that Amadis and Sir Tristam have a classical foundation, may at first sight appear paradoxical; but if the subject were examined to the bottom, I am inclined to think that the wildest chimeras in these books of chivalry, with which Don Quixote's library was furnished, would be found to have a close connexion with ancient mythology *.

But although Ariosto's poem is acknowledged to be defective in plan and regularity, yet every particular beauty of the highest species of poetry is to be found in the several parts of it; in which respect Boyardo is greatly deficient, who seldom attains more than to amuse the imagination by the pleasing variety of his fictions. But I must not here omit to take notice of one noble passage in the Innamorato, where the encounter of Orlando and Agrican is compared to the meeting of two thunder clouds. Our great Milton has the same simile in the second book of Paradise Lost, when Satan and death prepare to engage. The Orlando Furioso may be considered as an Epic, formed on the manners of chivalry. Where the subject of Ariosto rises, Tasso does not appear with greater dignity.

All the battles and single combats in Ariosto are excellent: in the last he is greatly superior to Tasso, and indeed to most other poets; for in this respect there appears some defect even in the poems of Homer and Virgil, in which there are few good descriptions of this kind. Our own countryman, Spenser, has succeeded best in these passages, for which perhaps he is not a little indebted to the Italian.
Though the general battles of the Iliad and Æneid are supported with wonderful fire, and every circumstance of terror inimitably introduced to keep the mind suspended and anxious for the event, yet those great poets do not seem to have attended, in the same manner, to the single encounters of their heroes, the issue of which, being generally soon determined, or at least foreseen, seldom raises much anxiety for the fate of the combatants. Virgil, it is true, has improved upon Homer, and the last important action, between Æneas and Turnus, in the xiith book, is conducted with more judgment than any single combat in the Iliad.

Homer, indeed, introduces the duel between Hector and Ajax with unexampled sublimity: but when the combatants meet, how soon is the conflict over, and how little are the readers kept in suspense!

Tasso has imitated this combat, with its attendant circumstances; and however he may fall short of his great original in some parts, he certainly has the advantage with respect to such particulars as tend to aggrandize the valour of his heroes.
I shall produce one more instance from Homer to support the foregoing assertion. When the mind has been long prepared for an engagement between the two great heroes of the poem, how must the expectation be excited from the idea of such a combat! But here, I believe, every unprejudiced reader will confess his disappointment, where Hector is represented flying at the mere sight of Achilles; and when, after having been thrice chaced round the walls of Troy, he turns, at the instigation of Pallas, to engage his enemy, how little appears the prowess of the gallant Hector, who had so often stood the bulwark of his country! of that Hector, who, notwithstanding the united efforts of an army, had set fire to the Grecian fleet, and whom the poet had opposed to Neptune himself!

The last combat of Tancred and Argantes, in the xixth book of the Jerusalem, excels every similar passage in the Iliad or Aeneid: in the Italian poet the mind is kept in suspense for the event; and the several turns of fortune, between the two combatants, are well imagined: at the same time it must be confessed, that Tasso has not always shewn equal judgment: he has sometimes, through a partial reverence for the examples of antiquity, followed his Greek master to to a fault; amongst other instances, the death of Solyman by the hand of Rinaldo, in the xxth book, must in some sort offend the reader, like that of Hector by Achilles.

If we peruse Ariosto attentively, we shall find him free from every objection of this kind: his great art, in these encounters, is to keep up the attention between hope and fear, and when he has involved the reader in distress for the danger of some favourite warrior, he, by an unexpected turn, relieves the anxiety he has raised, and gives victory to the seemingly conquered party.

Nor will our poet be found deficient in the tender and pathetic, which every reader of taste must acknowledge, when he peruses the stories of Zerbino and Brandimart, the episode of Cloridan and Medoro, and more especially the detail of Orlando's madness in the xxiiid Book, wherein the author has displayed the most intimate acquaintance with the human heart.

From the general plan of Ariosto's fable, which admits the agency of necromancers, witches, spirits and other preternatural powers, it will be easily expected, that the marvellous should be carried to an excessive length; and yet many of his fictions
Fictions are not more incredible than those of the Greek and Latin poets. The metamorphosis of the ships to nymphs, in the Æneid, is as violent a machine as the leaves to ships in the Orlando. The stories of the Italian poet are not more extravagant, than the legendary tales of the saints, which were currently believed in his time, and are still objects of faith with the vulgar. Yet let it not be supposed, that this apology for Ariosto, which respects the times in which he wrote, is meant as a general defence for such kind of fictions, critically, or even poetically considered, for some of these the warmest of Ariosto's admirers must give up as not to be defended.

Yet, while we candidly allow the force of objection to such passages of Ariosto, as are justly reprehensible, let us not adopt the fastidious pedantry of those French critics, who having little taste for the works of imagination of other nations, and no examples of such in their own, were continually declaiming against the false style, extravagant conceits, and absurd fictions, of the Italian poets, principally Ariosto and Tasso. Father Sohours, in many respects an excellent and judicious critic, has undoubtedly produced produced several exceptionable passages in their writings; but has too hastily given the following most extraordinary censure of Ariosto: " * De l'humeur dont vous êtes (repliqua Phalante) vous n'approuveriez pas ce que dit l'Arioste d'un de ses heros, qui dans la chaleur du combat, ne s'étant pas apperçu qu'on l'avait tué, il combat-tit toujours vaillamment tout mort qu'il étoit."

Il pover' uomo, ed non s'en era accorto,
Andava combattendo ed era morto †.

This criticism, with the quotation undoubtedly made from memory, has been implicitly taken up by many, and produced as an example of the absurdity of the Italian poets in general, and of Ariosto in particular: but the truth is, no such lines are to be found in the whole poem of Orlando Furioso, nor was Ariosto capable of a fiction so truly ridiculous, as only to deserve a place in a burlesque composition. The passage that gave rise to this remark of Father Bohours is in Berni's Rifacimento of Boyardo, and is entirely his own, there being not the least foundation for it in the original work of Boyardo. The whole stanza runs thus:

Che l’un pezzo in fu l’altro suggellato

E come avvien’ quand uno è rescaldata,

The champion who gave this wonderful stroke was Orlando, with his sword Durindana.

Lord Lansdown, in his Essay upon unnatural flights in poetry, ridicules the same passage, erroneously ascribed by him to Ariosto:

Who thus describes his hero slain and dead?

But if we consider that part of Ariosto's fable, which, independent of supernatural agents, and visionary beings, exhibits merely a view of general manners so totally repugnant to the present system of political and social life, we shall find the picture much nearer than we imagined to the early times of feudal violence and oppression; and, with respect to many descriptions in those writers, who are generally supposed to give us a world of their own creation, I beg to quote the following passage:

"The fictions of the Gothic romances were not so remote from credibility as they are now thought. In the full prevalence of the feudal institution, when violence desolated the world, and every baron lived in a fortress, forests and castles were regularly succeeded by each other, and the adventurer might very suddenly pass from the gloom of woods, or the ruggedness of moors, to seats of plenty, gaiety, and magnificence. Whatever is imagined in the wildest tale, if giants, dragons, and enchantments be excepted, would be felt by him, who, wandering in the mountains without a guide, or upon the sea without without a pilot, should be carried, amidst his terror and uncertainty, to the hospitality and elegance of Raasay and Dunvegan.

The same writer, having described the nature of the castles or fortified places, formerly in use in the islands of Scotland, proceeds thus: "These castles afford another evidence, that the fictions of romantic chivalry had, for their basis, the real manners of the feudal times, when every lord of a seigniory lived in his hold lawless and unaccountable, with all the licentiousness and insolence of contested superiority and unprincipled power. The traveller, whoever he might be, coming to the fortified habitation of a chief-tain, would probably have been interrogated from the battlements, admitted with caution at the gate, introduced to a petty monarch, fierce with habitual hostility, and vigilant with ignorant suspicion; who, according to his general temper, or accidental humour, would have seated a stranger as his guest at the table, or as a spy confined him to the dungeon.

Before I quit this subject, the reader will permit me to observe, that the elegant translator of the Lusiad has, in the introduction to his work, not only pointed out the historical foundation for the fictitious adventures of the old romance, but has undertaken to shew that the high romantic spirit of chivalry, connected with religious enthusiasm, and directed to great political purposes, was the means of saving Europe from the yoke and barbarity of the Saracens.

"A romantic military spirit revived in Europe under the auspices of Charlemain. Several religious military orders were established. Cerified, the study of religion, and the exercise of arms, were the conditions of their vow; and the defence of their country, and of the faith, their ambition and sole purpose. He who fell in battle was honoured and envied as a martyr; and most wonderful victories crowned the ardour of these religious warriors. The Mahometans, during the reign of Charlemain, made a most formidable irruption into Europe, and France in particular felt the weight of their fury: but the honour which was paid to the knights who wore the badge of the Cross, drew the adventurous youth of every Christian power to the standards of that political monarch, and in fact (a circumstance, however, neglected by historians) gave birth to the Crusades, the beginning of which, which, in propriety, ought to be dated from his reign. Few indeed are the historians of this age, but enough remain to prove that though the writers of the old romance have greatly disguised it, though they have given full room to the wildest flights of imagination, and have added the inexhaustible machinery of magic to the adventures of their heroes, yet the origin of their fictions was founded on historical facts. Ariosto, who adopted the legends of the old romance, chose this period for the subject of his Orlando Furioso. Paris besieged by the Saracens, Orlando and the other Christian knights assemble in aid of Charlemain; who are opposed in their amours and in battle by Rodomont, Ferrau, and other infidel knights. And, however this period may thus resemble the fabulous ages of Greece, certain it is that an Orlando, a Rinaldo, a Rogero, and other celebrated names in romance, acquired great honour in the wars which were waged against the Saracens, the invaders of Europe. In these romantic wars, by which the power of the Mahometans was checked, several centuries elapsed, when Alonzo, king of Castile, apprehensive that the whole force of the Mahometans of Spain and Morocco was ready to fall upon him, prudently imitated the conduct of Charlemain. He availed himself of the spirit of chivalry, and demanded leave of Philip I. of France, and and of other princes, that volunteers from their dominions might be allowed to distinguish themselves under his banners against the infidels. His desire was no sooner known, than a brave romantic army thronged to his standards, and Alonzo was victorious *.”

The characters of Ariosto are powerfully delineated, and admirably sustained; and however he may offend in the probability of his action, his pictures of the affections of the mind have the clearest historical truth. Let the reader of imagination, and only such readers are qualified to taste the beauties of Ariosto, when he opens his book, allow him in full force the ideas of chivalry and magic, and he will find infinite touches of nature in the manners of his heroes and heroines, with a discrimination and variety rarely to be excelled.

“Ariosto (says a late writer) pleases; but not by his monstrous and improbable fictions, by his bizarre mixture of the serious and comic styles, by the want of coherence in his stories, or by the continual interruptions in his narrtion. He charms by the force and clearness of his expression, by the readiness and variety of his inventions, and by his natural pictures of the passions, especially of the gay and amorous kind *.

No one seems to have been more powerfully impressed with the merits of Ariosto than an elegant poet of our own time, who, in taking a review of the several epic writers, where, in a most spirited manner, he asserts the superiority of genius and fancy over rule and system, has characterized the author of Orlando Furioso in the following animated lines.

Indignant Fancy, who with scorn survey'd
The sleepy honours to proud System paid,
Smiling to see that on her rival's brow
The poppy lurk'd beneath the laurel bough,
Resolv'd in sportive triumph to display
The rich extent of her superior sway:
From Necromancy's hand, in happiest hour,
She caught the rod of visionary power;
And, as aloft the magic wand she rais'd,
A peerless Bard with new effulgence blaz'd,
Born every law of System to disown,
And rule by Fancy's boundless power alone.

The Bard of pathos now, and now of mirth,
Pois'd with his lyre between a griffin's wings,
Her sportive darling Ariosto sings.
As the light cloud, whose varying vapours fly,
Driven by the zephyr of the evening sky,
Fixes and charms the never-wearied view,
By taking every shape and every hue;
So, by Variety's supreme control,
His changeful numbers charm the willing soul:
Enchanted by his song, Attention sits,
With features catching every cast by fits,
Like the fond infant, in whose tender brain
Young Sensibility delights to reign;
While rapid Joy and Pain each other chace
Through the soft muscles of its April face.
In vain the slaves of System would discard
From Glory's classic train this airy bard;
Delighted Nature her gay favourite crown'd,
And Envy's clamour in her plaudit drown'd.
Severe Morality, to censure mov'd,
His wanton lyre with juster blame reprov'd;
But his sweet song her anger so beguil'd,
That ere she finish'd her reproof, she smil'd.

But whatever may be the power of Ariosto in the original, a translator will find great difficulties; and considerable liberties are to be allowed him, if he is expected to make his author graceful.
ful to an English reader. The great praise of Ariosto, amongst the intelligent of his countrymen, is simplicity of expression, and purity of diction; and it is universally allowed, that no author had ever a more absolute command of his own language. There is a certain easy negligence in his muse, that often assumes a playful mode of expression, incompatible with the nature of our present poetry; though some few examples of the kind may be met with in our old poets, particularly Spenser, who has adopted much of Ariosto's manner. To this it may be added, that the Italian appears to run into rhyme with a facility altogether unknown to us, which may be seen from what has been related of Pulci, on which subject I shall give a remarkable passage from Mr. Baretti, in the book before quoted.

Among the general characteristics of the Tuscans, I have already touched upon their love of poetry; and what is altogether singular in them, their common custom of improvisare; that is, of singing verses extempore to the guitar, and other stringed instruments. I can aver that it is a very great entertainment, and what cannot fail of exciting very great surprise, to hear two of their best improvisatori et cantare pares et respondere parati, and eager to excel, expatiate in ot-
tava rima upon any subject moderately susceptible of poetical amplification. Several times have I been astonished at the rapidity of their expressions, the easiness of their rhymes, the justness of their numbers, the copiousness of their images, and the general warmth and impetuosity of their thoughts; and I have seen crowds of listeners hurried, as well as myself, into a vortex of delight, if I may so express it, whose motion acquired more and more violence, as the bards grew more and more inflamed by the repeated shoutings of the by-standers, and by the force of the opposition which each encountered from his antagonist."

It is this ease, blended with occasional strength, that gives unspeakable grace and variety to the narratives of Ariosto; and an English translator will have frequent reason to regret the more rigid genius of his language, that rarely permits him, in this respect, to attempt even an imitation of his author. It will therefore be found, upon comparing this version with the original, that some parts are shortened, and that the style of others has been varied, retaining at the same time what was thought requisite to preserve the character of the writer; for which reason I have not omitted the puerile conceits at the end of his books, as they do not in the least affect the general merit of the work.
PRE FACE.

Concerning the compliments to the house of Este, which occur in different parts of the poem, I have endeavoured to take off from the dryness of the subject, by giving in the notes a concise account of the Italian history and families alluded to. But there is a heavy charge against Ariosto, to which no defence can be made; which is, that he sometimes gives himself up to an unwarrantable licentiousness of idea and language: however, it is hoped that every passage of this nature, is so far softened in the translation, as to give no just cause of offence.

As the far greater part of my readers must be supposed unacquainted with the work on which this poem is immediately founded, I have thought it expedient to prefix to the Furioso a general view of Boyardo’s principal story, as connected with Ariosto, and to insert in the notes an account of every adventure referred to in the former poem.

The reader will observe that Ariosto generally breaks off his stories abruptly, after the manner of Boyardo, and other romance writers; in which practice he has been followed by Spenser. Some Italian writers have applauded this method, as tending to excite and keep up the attention, and prevent satiety, by a continual variation of the subject; as the poet himself says:

“Come
"Come raccende il gusto il mutare esca;
Cofi mi par, che la mia istoria, quanto,
Or qua, or là piu variata sia,
Meno, a chi l'udirà noisà sia."

"As at the board, with plenteous viands grac'd,
Cate after cate excites the sickening taste;
So while my muse repeats her vary'd strains,
Tale following tale the ravish'd ear detains."

Book xiii.

But perhaps the generality of readers will, with Gravina*, be rather disgusted to have their curiosity so frequently raised, and almost as constantly disappointed, and that sometimes in the most critical and interesting part; it is likewise to be feared, that these repeated breaks, by blending the adventures with each other, must rather tend to perplex and embarass the story; though we cannot but admire the art of the poet, in connecting such an immense variety of incidents, and bringing them at last to one point. I have, therefore set down the several continuations, after the example of some of the Italian editors; which method has likewise been pursued by Sir John Harrington in his translation.

It will be proper, in this place, to say something of the five cantos printed after Ariosto's

death, in addition to the forty-six cantos of the Orlando Furioso, and concerning which there have been different opinions; amongst his own countrymen, of the intention of the poet. Some have supposed that they were meant to have been incorporated with his great work; but such opinion must surely be erroneous, since the first of these additional cantos opens after Rogero had been converted to Christianity, and was made one of the Paladins of Charlemain; circumstances that certainly point out the conclusion of the Furioso. Others have, with much more reason, judged these five cantos to be the beginning of an entire new work, continued from the subject of the former: and by some writers, among whom is Porcacchi, it has been doubted, whether these cantos were the genuine production of Ariosto, to whom, however, the generality of his biographers, without scruple, give them: but it seems to be agreed by all, that they are very inferior in composition, and elegance of style, to his celebrated poem; nor are they ever quoted or referred to by any writer, as so frequently happens with respect to the Furioso. Some have thought that they were the work of his earlier years. It is certain that the fable appears very uninteresting after a perusal of the Furioso, and the fiction most absurdly extravagant, travagant, where he brings Rogero into the belly of a whale, when he meets with a hermit who had been there forty years, and who relates to him, that all those who had escaped from Alcina, were sooner or later imprisoned in this monster. Here he meets with Aftolpho, and sees a church and dwelling for the inhabitants, all in the belly of the whale. On considering these five posthumous cantos, in which the story is brought to no conclusion, I am almost tempted to subscribe to the following judicious sentiments of Sir John Harrington: “For the five cantos that follow Furiofo, I am partly of opinion they were not his, both because methinke they differ in sweetness of style from the other, and beside it is not likely that a man of his judgment, having made so absolute a piece of worke as his Furiofo is, and having brought every matter to a great and well pleasong conclusion, would, as it were, marre all again, and set them all by the ears, and bring Rogero in the whale's belly, and Aftolpho with him for company, that a little before were conquerors of the world *.”

If novelty be any recommendation of the work now offered to the Public, an English Ariosto may have that to plead, notwithstanding any translation that has yet appeared. We have indeed two versions of the Orlando Furioso; the first of which by Sir John Harrington, before mentioned, published in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and dedicated to that princess, is little known; the copies are become very scarce, and the genius of the performance, whatever merit it might claim at the time of the publication, affords now little encouragement to multiply them by a new impression. The last translation sent into the world, was professedly given by its author as a literal version, the very idea of which will necessarily exclude the thought of its being generally read as an English book; of which every one will judge, who is acquainted with the different idioms of the two languages.

Although this poem, like all the Italian writings of the kind, is written in the octave stanza, the present translation will be found, in that respect, to differ from the two first, which are rendered in the same form of verseification as the Italian. I am aware that it has been, and is still, the opinion of some, whose judgment claims no little deference, that the English couplet is improper for a work of this nature, and that the stanza is the only manner suitable to romance; to which it may be answered, that the Italians, who who made use of this first, applied it, and still continue to apply it, to the highest kind of poetry; it is therefore to be considered as their heroic style: It was not only used by Pulci, Boyardo, and Ariosto, in their compositions of the Gothic fiction, but is employed by Tasso in his truly Epic poem of the Jerusalem; and by many of the Italian writers in their translations of the Greek and Roman poets, which, I believe, few other modern translators would think of rendering in the stanza. The genius of our heroic verse admits of a great variety; and we have examples of very different species of writing, in the works of Dryden and Pope, from the sublime style of Homer and Virgil, to the familiar narratives of Boccace and Chaucer.

But of all the various styles used by our best poets, none seems so well adapted to the mixed and familiar narrative, as that of Dryden in his last productions, known by the name of his Fables, which, by their harmony, spirit, ease, and variety of versification, exhibit an admirable model for a translator of Ariosto.

In referring to the several commentators, I have been cautious how far I adopted their allegorical interpretations, as the temper of that class of writers...
ters frequently leads them to trace out a meaning, which the poet himself was a stranger to. That allegory, which requires explanation, is certainly defective; and it is notorious, that an inventive genius can convert the plainest narrative into mystery, as Tasso has done by his Jerusalem, to which he has prefixed an allegory that renders the whole poem as completely visionary as the Fairy Queen of Spenser,

Should the English reader become more acquainted with this celebrated Italian, he will find the Orlando no bad elucidation of the Don Quixote of Cervantes, as a great part of the customs, at least the general genius, of chivalry, may be learnt from it, without the drudgery of travelling through the old romances.

Though it is not here recommended that any one should imitate the extravagances of the Italian writers, yet while the enthusiastic spirit, that hurries away the reader, continues to be regarded as the glorious criterion of true poetry, every follower of the Muses will find ample subject for admiration in the perusal of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto; an author whom, with all his faults, Dryden acknowledges to have been a Great Poet; an author lately included in the
the highest praise of creative genius by one of our first critics, who thus describes that general effect from which the power of every poet ought to be estimated. "Works of imagination excel by their allurement and delight; by their power of attracting and detaining the attention. That book is good in vain which the reader throws away. He only is the master who keeps the mind in pleasing captivity; whose pages are perused with eagerness, and in hope of new pleasure are perused again; and whose conclusion is perceived with an eye of sorrow, such as the traveller casts upon departing day."
SOME authors, though with little authority, maintain, that the Ariosti derive their original from the Aristi, or Ariovisti: it is, however, certain, that this family was very ancient in Bologna, where it had flourished in great estimation, when Obizzo III. marquis of Este, married Lippa Ariostta, a lady of excellent beauty and rare accomplishments; who, accompanying her husband to Ferrara, took with her several of

of her relations, and first established the house of the Ariosti in that place.

Among other branches of the name, lived Nicolo and his brothers, men of great consideration in Ferrara: Nicolo not only filled, under Hercules and Borso, dukes of Ferrara, the most important posts in the city, but was chosen to the government of Rheggio and Modena, and several times sent ambassador to the pope, the emperor, and the king of France: but nothing contributed more to deliver his name down to posterity, than being the father of Ludovico.

While he was in the government of Rheggio, in Lombardy, he espoused Daria de Malaguzzi, a lady of wealth and family, descended from one of the first houses in Rheggio. By this marriage he had five sons, Ludovico, Gabriele, Carlo, Galasso, and Alessandro; and the same number of daughters. Ludovico was born on the eighth of September, in the year 1474, in the fortress of Rheggio, where his father was governor; as Galasso and Alessandro were born while he was in the government of Modena. These sons were all well accomplished, and, for their many excellent qualities, patronized by several princes. Gabriele gave himself up to literary pursuits, and is is said to have arrived at great excellence in Latin poetry, but to have been too close an imitator of Statius: he died at Ferrara. Carlo, who was of a disposition more inclined to dissipation and gaiety, led the life of a courtier, and died at the court of Naples. Galasso embraced the profession of the Church, was employed in several important offices, and at last ended his days, ambassador from the duke of Ferrara, at the court of Charles V. Alessandro, who was of an inquisitive and enterprising genius, having spent great part of his time in visiting foreign countries, at last finished his life in Ferrara.

To return to Ludovico, the subject of our present enquiry; as he was the first-born of his father's children, so he is reported to have surpassed the rest in the endowments of the mind; giving, from his tender years, uncommon preface of a future genius. Being yet in his rudiments, he composed a kind of tragedy from the story of Pyramus and Thisbe, which he caused to be represented by his brothers and sisters.

He applied himself very early to the study of the Latin, in which he made greater progress than almost any one of his age; and, in the very beginning of his studies, he composed and recited recited an elegant oration in that language, which gave the highest expectations of him. Tito Strozza, a man of great learning and consummate knowledge, took a particular delight to hear him, and to propose difficult questions for his solution; often encouraging a dispute, on literary subjects, between him and Hercules his son, a youth whose age and studies agreed with Ariosto.

But it happened to our Poet, as to Ovid, Petrarch, Tasso, and others, that his father Nicolo, having little taste for literature, and therefore disinclined to encourage his son in pursuing the bent of his genius, was rather desirous, that, as his eldest-born, he should endeavour to establish his fortune in the world, by taking up some lucrative profession; and sent him to Padua, to apply himself to the study of the Civil Law, under Angelo Castrinse and Il Maino; in which employment he spent five years, highly disagreeable to one of his disposition: which circumstance he laments in one of his satires addressed to Bembo.

Ah! lasso! quando ebbi al Pegaseo melo
L'età disposta, e che le fresche guancie
Non si vedeano ancor fiorir du'n pelo;
Mio padre mi caccio con spiedi e lancie,
Vol. I. (Non
Ere yet my cheeks were fledg'd with rising down,
When, smit with love of verse, I sought renown
On sweet Parnassus' hill; my sire's command
Compell'd me to forsake that happy land,
And chain'd me five long years to hear disputes
Of brawling lawyers and litigious suits.

Satire vi.

So Ovid complains that his father compelled him to study the law: De Tristibus, Lib. iv, Eleg. x.

While yet a boy, sweet verse my genius fir'd;
The secret Mufe her pleasing task inspir'd.
My sire oft cry'd, This useles trade give o'er;
For Homer left behind no golden store.
Mov’d at his words, I Pindus’ hill resign’d,
And strove to write, by metre unconfin’d:
In vain—the Muse spontaneous verse bestow’d,
And all I wrote in tuneful numbers flow’d.

Milton, in like manner, desires his father to let him pursue the Muses:

Tu, tamen, ut simulés teneras odiose camœnas,
Non odiose reor, neque enim, pater, ire jubebas
Qua via lata patet, qua pronior area luceri,
Certaque condendi fulges spes aurea nummi:
Nec rapis ad leges, male custoditaque gentis
Jura, nec insulsis damnas clamoribus aures.

Ad Patrem.

Thou canst not sure the gentle Muses hate,
Or bid me change, O Sire! my peaceful state,
To tread the sordid path, that open lies
To fields of wealth, where golden harvests rise.
Thou wilt not force me to th’ ungrateful bar,
Where ill-kept laws supply the constant jar;
Or fix me there, long tedious days, to hear
Those sounds of discord to a poet’s ear.

But although Ariosto durst not openly disobey his father, he could not so far conquer his inclinations, nations, but that, during the course of this time, he found leisure to peruse many authors, particularly French and Spanish romances, with which languages he was well acquainted, having translated two or three of these authors himself into his native tongue; of which kind of performances he availed himself in his future works, making use of every beauty that occurred in these wild productions of imagination. Nicolo, at last, perceiving the aversion his son had to the profession of the law, and the little progress he made therein, resolved no longer to combat his desires, but permit him to obey the strong propensity of genius, which evidently pointed out to what Nature had designed him. This indulgence of Nicolo is said to have been, in a great degree, owing to the good offices of Pandolfo Ariosto, a youth of excellent endowments, and a near kinsman to Ludovico.

Ludovico, being now left at liberty, applied himself with unwearied assiduity to recover the advantages he had necessarily lost. He had now put himself, at the age of twenty, under the tuition of Gregorio de Spoleti, a person of admirable taste; and well versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, who then resided in the family of Rinaldo of Este, at Ferrara. Gregorio, observing the the avidity with which Ariosto applied himself to study, took every possible care to cultivate his genius; and, by his instructions, his pupil soon made himself master of the most excellent Latin authors, particularly the poets, among whom Horace appears to have been his favourite. He explained many difficult and obscure parts in that author, which were never before understood. His intention was, in like manner, to have gone through a course of Greek literature; but, as he was first desirous of perfecting himself in the Latin, he suddenly lost the assistance of his preceptor Gregorio, who was constrained to take a journey into France, at the desire of Isabella, daughter to Alphonso of Naples, as tutor to her son; where he soon after died, to the inexpressible grief of Ariosto.

About the same time died Nicolo Ariosto, the father of Ludovico, leaving behind him a numerous offspring. Ariosto, then only twenty-four years of age, found himself at once involved in the cares of a family, and obliged to take upon himself the management of domestic concerns, to introduce his brothers into the world, provide fortunes for his sisters, and, in every respect, supply to them the place of a father, who had left them but a very slender patrimony.
THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.

Mi more il padre e da Maria il pensiero
Drieto a Marta bifogna ch'io rivolga,
Chi'o muti in squarci e in vacchette Omero;
Trovi marito e modo che fi tolga
Di casa una sorella e un' altra appresso,
E che' l'eredita non fe ne dolga:
Co' piccioli fratelli a' quai succetto
Ero in luoco di padre far l'uffizio
Che debito e pieta m' avea commesso.

My father dead, I took the father's part,
And chang'd for household cares the Muse's art;
For tuneful verse, each thoughtful hour I spent,
To husband well the little heaven had sent:
Each sister claim'd, by turns, my guardian hand,
To watch their youth, and form their nuptial band;
While piety and love my heart engage
To rear my helpless brethren's tender age.

Satire vi.

He was now so wholly engrossed by a multiplicity of cares, as not only to give over his intended prosecution of the Greek language, but almost to abandon the Latin, which he had but lately recovered, had not Pandolfo Ariosto so far stimulated him, that he still continued, in some degree, his studies; till death deprived him of so pleasing pleasing a companion. Yet all these disappointments did not so much damp the vigour of his genius, but that he gave signal proofs of an excellent vein of poetry. He had now attained the age of twenty-nine years, and had acquired an uncommon reputation for his Latin verses, and numerous poems and sonnets full of spirit and imagination. His conversation was coveted by men of the greatest learning and abilities; insomuch that Cardinal Hippolito of Este, whose court was a receptacle for the most admired personages of the age, received him into his service, where he continued fifteen years; during which time, his mind being always intent on the muses, he formed the design of writing a poem of the romance kind; in which no one had yet written with the dignity of which the subject was capable. The happy versatility of his genius was such, that he could equally adapt himself to every species of poetry; and an Italian writer of his life observes, that whatever he wrote, seemed, at the time, to be his particular study.

At about thirty years of age, he began his Orlando; and Cardinal Bembo, to whom he communicated his design, would have dissuaded him from writing in Italian, advising him to cultivate the Latin; to which Ariosto answered, that that he would rather be the first among the Tuscan writers, than scarcely the second among the Latin. At the same time, it fortunately happened, that he had already written some stanzas of his Orlando; which communicating to several of his friends, he met with such encouragement, that he determined vigorously to prosecute his design. It may be here observed, that Dante, at first, intended to have written his Poem in Latin; and actually composed some initial lines in that language.

He chose the subject of Boyardo, which was well known to all; and, being left unfinished, had strongly excited the reader's curiosity, to see the end of a story so artfully begun. In the same manner, Virgil, of whom Ariosto appears a great imitator, formed his Æneid as a kind of sequel to the Iliad and Odyssey. And it may be remarked, that, by adopting the fictions of Boyardo, Ariosto had not only an opportunity of bringing the romance of the Count to a conclusion, but of celebrating, under the person of Rogero, the family of his patron.

Ariosto had proposed to write a poem in terza rima* (like Dante), in praise of the House of Este.

* Of this terza rima of the Italians, the English reader will have a full idea, from the three cantos of the Inferno of Esfe, different from the Furioso; but not being satisfied with the work, he laid it aside, and pursued the design of his Furioso, in ottava rima. The intended poem began thus:

Cantero l'armi, cantero 'gli affanni
D'amor, che un cavalier sottene gravi
Peregrinando in terra e in mar molt' anni, &c.

I sing of arms, and sing the pains of love,
And all the toils a suffering hero bore,
Long desitn'd far o'er land and see to rove, &c.

In order to pursue his studies with less interruption, he chose the situation of Rheggio, retiring to a pleasant villa, belonging to Sigismondo Malaguzzi, his kinsman, where he spent his leisure in the prosecution of his principal design. In one of his satires he gives the following agreeable sketch of his retreat.

Gia mi fur' dolci inviti a empir le carte
I luoghi ameni, di che il nostro Rheggio
Il natio nido mio n'ha la sua parte:
Il tuo Mauritian sempre vagheggio

La bella stanza, e'l Rodano vicino,
Da le Naiade amato ombrofo feggio:
Il lucido vivaio, onde il giardino
Si cinge intorno, il fresco rio che corre
Rigando l'erbe, ove poi fa il molino.
Non mi si po de la memoria torre
Le vigni, e i folchi del secondo Iacco,
Le valle e'l colle, e la ben posta torre.

Blest be the time, when, from the world retir'd,
Fair Rheggio's peaceful scenes my muse inspir'd:
Nurse of my infant years! Remembrance views
Thy pleasing feats, and every charm renews:
I see where Rhodan's tide delightful flows,
While sportive Naiads on the banks repose;
The silty pool, with silvery luftre crown'd,
Whose dimpled water moats the garden round;
The living shearn, that pours a crystal rill
Thro' sprinkled herbage to the neighbouring mill;
The clustering vines, that yield their purple store;
The hills, the vales, and ivy-circled tower.

While he was busied in these literary pursuits, Alphonso, duke of Ferrara, having occasion to send ambassadors to Rome, in order to appease the anger of Pope Julius II. who prepared to make war against him, was, by his brother the cardinal, recommended to Ariofto, as a proper

person to be entrusted with such a negociation. The duke, therefore, made choice of him; and he acquitted himself so well in his commission, that he returned with an answer much more favourable than was expected. However, the Pope, still continuing at enmity with the duke, made a league with the Venetians, and collected a powerful army against Ferrara; but he gained little honour in this enterprise, being defeated at the battle of Ravenna. Part of a fleet was sent up the Po, against Ferrara; but met with a repulse from the duke's party. In this engagement, Ariofto, who was present, behaved with great courage, and took one of the largest of the enemy's vessels, filled with stores and ammunition.

The papal army being dispersed, Alphonfo thought it adviseable to send an ambassador again to Rome. But every one being afraid to engage in this service, knowing the Pope's disposition, he dispatched Ludovico a second time, who found his Holiness so incensed against the duke, that his indignation was very near shewing itself to the ambassador; and it was not without difficulty that Ariofto escaped with life to Ferrara.

The duke's affairs being established, Ariofto returned to his studies; though, continuing still in the service of the cardinal, he was employed, at at times, in various public occupations, that often broke in upon his retirement, and obliged him to defer the completion of his Orlando. However, he found means to steal so much leisure from his more serious employments, that he at last brought it to a conclusion: and though the work was far from having that perfection which he himself desired, yet, in order to avail himself of the general opinion of the public, he was determined to give it to the world; and accordingly caused it to be first printed in the year 1515.

Some time after, the cardinal having a design to go into Hungary, was desirous of being accompanied by the ingenious men who lived under his patronage: but Ariosto openly declared his inclination to be left behind; for, being now afflicted with a catarrh, he was fearful of the consequences from the fatigues and inconveniences of so long a journey. Besides, the service of the cardinal began to grow very irksome to him; those, who were about him, being frequently obliged to watch the greatest part of the night. It appears, likewise, that Ariosto was in his nature averse to travelling, and had visited few countries.
THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.  lxxvii

Degli uomini son varji gli appetiti,
A chi piace la chiesa, a chi la spada,
A chi la patria, a chi gli strani liti.
Chi vuol andare a torno, a torno vada,
    Vegga Inghilterra, Ungheria, Francia, e Spagna,
A me piace habitar la mia contrada.
Vist' ho' Toscana, Lombardia, Romania,
    Quel monte che divide, e quel che serra
Italia, e un mare e l'altro che la bagna:
Questo mi basta, il resto della terra,
    Senza mai pagar l'ostè, andrò cercando
Con Tolomeo, sia 'l mondo in pace o in guerra.
E tutto il mar senza far voti quando
    Lampeggi il ciel, sicuro in fulle carte
Verro' più che fu i legni volteggiando.

Various are men's pursuits: these seek renown
In fields of death; those choose the sacred gown:
Some quit their native for a foreign shore:
Let those, that wish, unnumber'd realms explore,
To France, Hungary, Spain, and England roam:
While I prefer a peaceful seat at home.
I've view'd whate'er the Tuscan country yields,
Fair Lombardy, and wide Romania's fields:
The hills, where these defend, and these divide
Italia's realms, and either surging tide
That laves our coast—the rest I can survey
In peace or war—nor host nor captain pay:

With Ptolemy can safely trace the seas,
Nor heed with vows and prayers the storms appease:
Better on pictur'd charts secure to sail,
Than in frail vessels dare the treacherous gale!

The refusal of Ariosto to accompany the cardinal, so exasperated the prelate, that he, in a manner, withdrew his protection from him; which circumstance gave our Poet great uneasiness; though it is thought that Hippolito might have taken him again into favour, but for the ill offices of some malicious persons, who had the address to keep them at a distance from each other. On this difference between the cardinal and him, Ariosto strongly dwells in his satires.

A me per effer stato contumace
Di non veder Agria ne Buda,
Che si ritoglia il sua gia non mi spiac.

I murmur not, to think my patron's hand
Refus'd the grace my service once obtain'd;
Since I refus'd to quit Italia's shores,
To visit Agria's * walls, and Buda's * towers.

and afterwards:

E che dimostrì con parole e cenni
Ch' in odio, ch' in dispetto habbia il mio nome.

* Two towns in Hungary.
Still let him, at his will, my faith reprove,
And tax me still with breach of loyal love;
With every word and deed to all proclaim
His settled hatred of my hapless name!

The only consolation Ludovico had, was the leading a retired life, which suited his disposition far more than the continual bustle of a court. He now applied himself, without interruption, to give every improvement to his Orlando; and, in the year 1521, published another edition of it, with further corrections.

In the mean time, cardinal Hippolito died; and Ariosto, who for fifteen years had lived in a state of uneasy dependence, and had now reached the forty-fourth year of his age, was determined never more to be connected with a court: but, being closely persuaded by his intimate friend Buonoventura PistofoIo, secretary to Alphonso, he engaged in the service of that prince, from whom he met with a most gracious and affectionate reception.

Not long after, when Adrian II. succeeded to the papal chair, Grafagna, a province on the Apennine, being torn to pieces by factions, augmented by the licentiousness into which the people had degenerated, from a total remissness of government, government, it was judged necessary to appoint a person, whose prudence and authority might reduce them to a due subjection. For this important trust Ariosto was chosen, who, though very averse to the journey, would not again hazard incurring the displeasure of his patron.

Ludovico continued three years in his new government, in which he acquitted himself so well, that he not only brought the people to a proper sense of their duty to their sovereign, but entirely gained their affections to himself; and was highly applauded by the duke for his good services. An extraordinary instance is here given of the veneration paid to his character by all ranks and degrees of men:—At his first coming to the government, having occasion one day to cross a wood, with about six horsemen in his company, he was obliged to pass through a number of armed men, who, from their appearance, gave him great cause of suspicion; the country being, at that time, all round greatly infested with robbers, the most formidable of whom were headed by Dominico Maroco and Filippo Pacchione. Ariosto had scarcely got clear of this troop, before-mentioned, when the captain demanded of one of the servants, that happened to be behind the rest, who the stranger was;
was; and being told it was Ludovico Ariosto, he immediately ran to overtake him, armed as he was. Ariosto, seeing him follow, stopped short, waiting with some anxiety for the end of this affair. His pursuer, coming up, saluted him with great respect; and, declaring that his name was Filippo Pacchione, begged pardon, that, not knowing him, he had suffered him to pass, without paying the respect due to his singular merit.

Mr. Baretti, in the preface to his Italian Library, relates this story, with different circumstances, in the following words; concluding with a reflection on the power of eloquence over savage minds, very apposite to the subject.

"Among other striking instances of the people's veneration for him, Ariosto had one of a very particular nature. The duke, his master, had sent him governor of Gragnana, a province on the Apennine, whose inhabitants, seizing the opportunity of the general turbulences that were in Italy at that time, paid but little obedience to their sovereign. Ariosto took his residence in a fortified castle, from which it was imprudent to step out without guards; as the whole neighbourhood was swarming with outlaws, smugglers, and banditti, who, after committing the most enormous excesses all around, retired, for shelter against justice, amidst the rocks and cliffs. Ariosto, one morning, happened to take a walk without the castle, in his night-gown; and, in a fit of thought, forgot himself so much, that, step after step, he found himself very far from his habitation, and surrounded; on a sudden, by a troop of these desperadoes, who certainly would have ill-used, and perhaps murdered him, had not his face been known by one of the gang; who informing his comrades that this was Signor Ariosto, the chief of the banditti addressed him with intrepid gallantry, and told him, that since he was the author of the Orlando Furioso, he might be sure none of the company would injure him; but would see him, on the contrary, safe back to the castle: and so they did, entertaining him all along the way with the various excellencies they had discovered in his poem, and bestowing upon it the most rapturous praises. A very rare proof of the irresistible powers of poetry: and a noble comment on the fables of Orpheus and Amphion, who drew wild beasts, and raised walls, with the enchanting sound of their lyres.

While Ariosto continued in the government of Grafagnana, Buonoventura Pistofolo often proposed.
proposed to him, by letter, to go as ambassador from the duke to Clement VII, who had been a great patron of our poet; setting before him the honours and advantages that would accrue from such an employ. But Ludovico gave little heed to these solicitations; his mind being altogether detached from views of interest or ambition. His general answer was, "that he esteemed it better to enjoy a little in peace and tranquillity, than to seek after a great deal, with fatigue and anxiety." Some relate, that he had a repugnance to live at a distance from his country, on account of a lady residing at Ferrara, for whom he had conceived a violent passion; and, indeed, he plainly acknowledges this himself, in his fourth Satire, to Annibale Malaguzzi.

Parmi vederti qui ridere e dire,
Che non amor di patri nè di studi,
Ma de donna cè cagion che non vogli'ire.
Libero t'el confess'o, or chiudi
La bocca——

Methinks you smile, and cry—nor love of home,
Nor study makes your friend averse to roam:
But some fair dame.—I own the guilt at large;
Upbraid not him who triumphs in the charge.
The term of his government being expired, he returned to court, where, finding that the duke took great delight in theatrical representations, he applied himself to the drama; and, besides the Cassaria and Suppositi, he composed La Lena, and Il Negromante, in prose and verse, and the Scolastica in verse; though the last was left imperfect by his death, and the fifth Act added by his brother Gabriele. Of these comedies, four were first printed in prose, and afterwards turned into verse. They were performed with universal applause, before many families of rank; the actors being generally persons of condition: insomuch, that when the Lena was first acted, in 1528, Signor Don Francisco of Este, afterwards marquis of Massa, spoke the prologue himself.

A remarkable anecdote is handed down, which shews how entirely his mind was, in the early part of his life, absorbed by his favourite studies. His father having taken some offence at the conduct of Ludovico, expostulated with him, one day, with uncommon warmth; to which his son listened without the least seeming notice, or returning any answer. Nicolo being gone, his brother Gabriele, who was with him, entered upon the same subject; to whom he gave such satisfactory
satisfactory reasons, as entirely removed every objection that had been brought against him. His brother then asking why he had not made use of the same arguments to his father, he replied, that, at that time, he was considering whether the scene, which passed between them, might not be of use to him in a comedy he was then writing, called the Caffaria; that he thought his father would serve as an excellent model for an old man, whom he had introduced, on a like occasion, reproaching his son: concluding, that his thoughts were so engrossed by the fiction, that he had forgot the reality.

Another anecdote is told, relative to these comedies, which shews how totally the attention of the people in Italy was taken up with the merits and reputation of the Orlando Furioso. Ricoboni conceived a design of exhibiting the Scolaftica of Ariosto on the stage at Venice; and public notice being given of the representation, the name of Ariosto drew together a prodigious concourse of spectators. But it unfortunately happened, few of them knew that this Author had written comedies; and, before the Piece began, Ricoboni was informed, that they had a notion the Play was taken from the Orlando Furioso; and, when the performance came on, not seeing Angelica, Orlando, Bradamant, and the other personages of their favourite poem; they began to express their dissatisfaction; which increased to such a degree, that Ricoboni was obliged to drop the curtain at the end of the fourth act.

Ariosto now appeared to lead a life of tranquillity; which was the more agreeable to him, as he was not so deeply engaged by the duke, but that he had sufficient leisure to pursue his studies; the service of Alphonso being far more easy than that of Hippolito. About this time he published his Satires, besides those he had formerly written; in the whole, to the number of seven; till, being again involved in family difficulties, and harassed with law-suits, he was obliged, for some time, to lay aside his compositions. At last, having brought his affairs to a happy crisis, he purchased a piece of ground opposite the church of St. Benedict, where he built a pretty commodious dwelling; which, some say, he was enabled to do by the liberality of the duke. He had a garden adjoining to this house, the usual scene of his poetical meditations. Here he passed the remainder of his life, as much as possible secluded from all public employments.

Having
THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.

Having attained the sixth year of his age, he was seized, on the last day but one of the year 1532, with a lingering illness, though some say his illness first came upon him in October or November, about which time the ducal palace took fire, which accident consumed the superb theatre that had been built for the exhibition of his comedies; in the same year he had sent his Furioso to the press with his last improvements, corrected and enlarged as we now have it.

Some physicians attributed the cause of his malady to the custom he had of eating fast, and chewing his victuals little, that occasioned an indigestion; the means they made use of to remove this complaint, brought on a consumption, which, in spite of all the assistance of medicine, at last put a period to his life, at Ferrara, on the 6th of June, or, as others say, on the 8th of July, 1533.

Thus died Ludovico Ariosto, a man of uncommon eminence, whether we consider him as a member of the republic of society, or of the more extensive world of literature: as the first, he acquired the affection and esteem of persons of the highest consideration; he contracted the closest intimacy with the family of Medicis, and was was beloved by Leo X. the Augustus of that age: as the second, he was one of the few great poets who see that reputation attend their works, during their life-time, which continues to be transmitted down to posterity; and perhaps few books have been so often printed as the Orlando, which has passed through upwards of eighty editions, and not only been rendered into all the European languages, but is said to have found its way into every part of the world*. The uncommon popularity of this author may be further gathered from the numbers that have drawn their subjects from his original†.

Il Doni, an Italian writer, in a register of the manuscript works of several poets, has attributed two pieces to Ariosto, one called, RINALDO ARDITO; and the other, IL TERMINE DEL DESIDERIO; neither of which appears to have been printed‡. Besides the XLVI books of his ORLANDO FURIOSO, he left behind him five books on the same story, which were first printed in addition to the original poem in the year 1545, twelve years after Ariosto’s death.

An elegant sonnet was written by Nicolo Eugenico in his praise, which we shall here give the reader.

* Among other productions that took their rise from the poem of Ariosto, Mazzuchelli tells us, that, in 1530, the whole poem was turned into a spiritual sense, and that Giulio Cesare Croce, in 1607, formed from it another work, on the Passion, Death, and Resurrection of Christ.
Not less elate, with equal honours crown'd,
His treasure now triumphant Po can tell;
While, as our Swan his music pours around,
Along the banks the notes sonorous swell,
Mincius to Mantua's wall his current leads,
Whence rose the bard, who blaz'd th' immortal deeds
Of great Aeneas, in his deathless lays:
Po bathes Ferrara, whence the poet sprung,
Whose equal muse Rogero's glories sung,
And o'er the world diffus'd his lineal praise!

Several writers have affirmed, that he was solemnly crowned with laurel by the victorious Charles V. in the city of Mantua, in the year 1532, for his Orlando Furioso; and this circumstance has been as positively denied by others. Mazzuchelli, in his Life of Ariosto, has considered the arguments on both sides; and observes, that the silence of those authors on the subject, who certainly would not have passed over such an event, may justly render the whole suspected; that, among others, surety little attention can be paid to the authority of one writer †, who relates that Ariosto had scarcely received the laurel crown, when, transported with joy, and inspired, as it were, with a poetical frenzy, † Minchenlo.

he ran through the city apparently as mad as his own Orlando. Fornari speaks of the coronation; but Pigna and Garafolo make no mention of it. Il Signore Dottor Barotti thus examines the supposed fact. "Many have doubted of the coronation by Charles, and writers, who speak of it, do not agree upon the time or place: some say that the ceremony was performed at Mantua, and others at Bologna: some, that it happened in 1530, and others, in 1532; but, surely, it could not be in 1530, as the complete edition of the poem, with the praises of the emperor, was not published till 1532. In a manuscript book, delivered down for the hand-writing of his son Virginio, are these words: E una baia che fosse coronato. But, in a public instrument between his son Virginio and his brother, in October 1542, we read as follows: Cum annis decursis animam egerit magnificus et Laureatus D. Ludovicus Areostus, &c. both which, the manuscript book and instrument, are in my possession. In a letter of Galasso Ariosto it is said, that Ariosto had scarce published the last edition of his work when he fell ill, and died after eight months. The publication was in October 1532, and it is difficult to suppose that he could be crowned in November, the time mentioned. Yet the epitaph, caused to be engraved by his nephew’s son Ludovico, Ludovico, sets forth the coronation. If Pigna and Garafolo affirm that he fell ill in December, it may be understood that he then took to his bed; and as to the medal of Ariosto crown'd, nothing can be proved from that."

To this Mazzuchelli adds, that we may refer to the declaration of Franco, who asserts that he was not crowned; and concludes the argument, by opposing to all these, the authority of the exact Apostolo Zeno, who observes, that Franco petulantly denies that Ariosto was crowned poet, though, besides other testimonies, we have the exclusive privilege granted him by Charles V.

I have thus laid before the reader the chief arguments on the subject, that he may form his own opinion of a fact, which, upon the whole, appears to me at least extremely doubtful; and, indeed, the difficulty attending the proof of a matter, that must have been of such notoriety, and surely upon public record, is to me a forcible presumption against the fact itself, since we see that the account of this kind of honour, which was two hundred years before conferred on the poet Petrarch, has been brought down to us without any equivocal circumstances.
"The custom," says Dr. Burney *, "of crowning persons who had distinguished themselves in poetry and music, which was almost as ancient as the Arts themselves, subsisted till the reign of the emperor Theodosius, when the Capitoline games, being regarded as remnants of superstition, were utterly abolished. It was not till near the time of Petrarch that poetry recovered its ancient lustre or importance, or was invested with its former prerogatives.”

It may not here be altogether foreign to my subject, or unentertaining to the English reader, whose curiosity may probably be excited by the mention of so extraordinary a ceremony, to give an account of this honour, which, as we have before mentioned, was bestowed on Petrarch; the particulars of which I shall transcribe from the elegant Life of that poet, published in the year 1775.

"Orfo, count of Anguillara, was senator of Rome, when Petrarch arrived there in the spring of 1341, and was to continue in office but a few weeks longer. The day of the ceremony being fixed, the assembly was convoked early in the morning on Easter-day, which happened to be very serene and favourable to the solemnity. The trumpets sounded, and the people, eager to view a ceremony that had been discontinued for so many years, ran in crowds to behold it. The streets were strewn with flowers, and the windows filled with ladies dressed in the most sumptuous manner, who sprinkled as much perfumed waters on the poet, as would serve for a year in the kingdom of Spain.

“Petrarch appeared at last at the capitol, preceded by twelve young men in scarlet habits. These were chosen out of the first families in Rome, and recited his verses; while he, adorned with the robe of state which the king of Naples had given him, followed in the midst of six of the principal citizens clothed in green, with crowns of flowers on their heads; after whom came the senator, accompanied by the first men of the council. When he was seated in his place, Petrarch made a short harangue upon a verse drawn from Virgil: after which, having cried three times, “Long live the people of Rome! Long live the senator! God preserve them in liberty!” he kneeled down before the senator, who, after a short discourse, took from his head a crown of laurel, and put it upon Petrarch's, saying, "This crown is the reward of merit." Then Petrarch recited a fine sonnet on the heroes of Rome. This sonnet is not in his works:

"The people shewed their joy and approbation by loud and repeated shouts; by clapping their hands, and crying out several times, "Long flourish the capitol! Long live the poet!" Stephen Colonna then spoke; and, as he truly loved Petrarch, he gave him that praise which comes from the heart.

"When the ceremony in the capitol was ended, Petrarch was conducted in pomp, with the same retinue, to the church of St. Peter, where, after a solemn mass, and returning thanks to God for the honour he had received, he took off his crown to place it among the offerings, and hung it up on the arch of the temple.

"The same day the count of Anguillara had letters patent drawn up, by which the senators, after a very flattering preface, declare Petrarch to have merited the title of a great poet and historian; and that at Rome, and in every other place, by the authority of king Robert, the Roman senate and the people of Rome, he should have full liberty to read and comment on poetry and history, or on any of the works of the ancients, cient, and to publish any of his own productions, and to wear, on all solemn occasions, the crown of laurel, beech or myrtle, and the poetic dress. In fine, they declare him a citizen of Rome, with all the privileges thereof, as a reward for the affection he has always expressed for the city and republic.

"Petrarch was then brought to the palace of the Colonnas, where a magnificent feast was prepared for him, at which were assembled all the nobility and men of letters in Rome.*"

To return to Ariosto. The name of this poet is still held in that kind of veneration by his countrymen with which the English consider their Shakespeare. Antonio Zatta, in his edition of Ariosto's works of 1772, relates that a chair and ink-standish, which, according to tradition, belonged to Ariosto, were then in the possession of Il Signor Dottore Giovanni Andrea Barotti at Ferrara, and that a specimen of his hand-writing was preserved in the public library of that city. The republic of Venice did him the honour to cause his picture to be painted, and hung up with the senators and other illustrious men in the great Council Hall, which was afterwards destroyed by fire.

* Life of Petrarch, vol. i. page 237.
It appears, however, that Ariosto did not finally receive from his professed patrons those rewards, or obtain that establishment, to which he thought his merits had entitled him. Probably his government of Grafagnana added more to his reputation than his fortune; and, from what he says in several parts of his Satires, he was by no means satisfied with his patrons of Ferrara. Nothing particular is recorded of the benefactions of the cardinal to him, before he incurred the displeasure of that prelate. The duke, indeed, gave him two assignations on certain gabels or taxes, the first of which ceased with the abolition of the tax; and the second, which produced him only twenty-five crowns every fourth month, collected, as he says himself, with great trouble, was contested and withheld from him during the wars of Lombardy, and some say, that the cardinal, upon withdrawing his patronage, deprived him of this slender advantage, Ariosto himself seems to impute his loss to the duke, and speaks thus on the subject, in his satire addressed to A. M. Sigismundo Malaguzzi.

Tu dei saper, che la mia voglia avara
Unqua non fu; ch'io soleva stare contento
De lo stipendio, che traeva in Ferrara.

The Life of Ariosto.

Ma non sì forse: come usci poi lento
Succedendo la guerra, e come volle
Il duca che restasse in tutto spento.

Satire iv.

Thou know'st I ne'er was tutor'd wealth to crave,
Content with what Ferrara's patrons gave,
Th' allotted stipend—but thou'rt yet to know,
Succeeding wars had made the stipend low.
At length (so will'd the duke) the gain decreas'd
To less from little, till the whole had ceas'd.

Such were the great advantages which he derived from those in whose service he had engaged, and whose names he had immortalized
by his muse.

Two medals are said to have been struck,
both bearing his effigies, but the devices different:
on the first was figured a serpent, over which was suspended a hand, with a pair of shears ready to cut off the head or sting; and the other representing a bee-hive, where the bees are driven from their habitation with fire and smoke, that the countryman may possess himself of their honey. The motto of both these medals was PRO BONO MALUM. Some affirm, that these devices were of Ariosto's invention:
the first to express the nature of his detractors; and the second, to shew that, instead of honours and rewards for his labours, he met only with scoff and derision; alluding to the reception given his Orlando by the cardinal, who, having perused it, asked him, with the most tasteless indifference, where he had collected so many fooleries. Every reader of fine taste, with which fine feeling is inseparable, will form some idea of the poet's thoughts at that time; and may recollect the like illiberal reflection of the statesman Burleigh, on Queen Elizabeth's bounty to our own Spenser, All this for a song!

Dolce relates, that he caused the device of the serpent to be prefixed to the second edition of his poem; but that in the third he changed it to the bee-hive. In an edition of the Orlando, printed at Bologna in 1540, is a device in the title-page of two serpents, with a hand and shears; the tongue of one of these serpents is cut out, with this motto round them: DILEXISTI MALITIAM SUPER BENIGNITATEM.

With respect to Pope Leo X. the acknowledged patron of literature and arts, whom Forneri calls particularly liberal to poets, and by whom he relates that Ariosto was highly esteemed, he is said to have made him a present... of some hundred crowns for the prosecution of his work, though Ariosto himself is silent upon that head; and yet in the verses published by Gabriele Simeoni, in his Satire upon Avarice, are these lines:

Succeffe a lui Leon poi lume e specchio
De cortesia, che fu la cagion prime,
Che al' Ariosto ancor porgiamo orecchio.

Leo to him succeeds, in whom we find
The light and mirror of a courteous mind:
To him we owe, that now, in tuneful strains,
Great Ariosto's page our ear detains.

And in the margin is this note: "Leo X. gave Ariosto several hundred crowns to complete his work."

Upon the exaltation of Leo X. to the papal chair, he paid a visit to that pontiff, with great expectations of advantage, as appears from his viith satire. The Pope gave him a very gracious reception, and gave him a grant of half the profits of a certain bull, the amount of which is altogether unknown; and possibly the sum arising from this may be the donation meant by Simeone. It is however certain, that he he left Rome dissatisfied in his expectation: he declares that Fortune, when she raises men to dignities, dips them in Lethe: at the same time he bears testimony to the Pope's honourable reception of him.

Testimonio son io di quel ch'io scrivo,
Ch'io nol 'ho ritrovato, quando il piede,
Gli baccia prima, di memoria privo.
Piegasti a me de la beata fede,
La mano e poi le gote ambi mi prese,
E'l santo baccio in amendue mi diede.

De meza quella bolla anco cortese
Mi fù, de la qual ora il mio Bibiena
Espedito m' ha il resto a le mie spefe.

Sat. iii.

This well I know, this truth can well attest,
When with my lips his reverend foot I press'd,
He seem'd not mindless of his grace design'd,
But lowly from his blessed seat declin'd:
My hand he gracious took on either side;
He to my cheek a holy kiss apply'd;
And more—he gave me half the bull to share,
Consign'd me, at my cost, by Bibiena's care.

But it seems that Ariosto had raised his thoughts to some great ecclesiastical preferment; on which occasion occasion Signor Rolli observes, that one reason why he was not preferred was, that he was devoted to Alphonso of Ferrara, whom the Pope hated, and therefore could not give our author a cardinal's hat. Leo died in 1521, six years after the first publication, and the year in which Ariosto published the third edition of his poem. Perhaps had he lived longer, the poet might have experienced further marks of his generosity.

A very extraordinary circumstance is related, and has been received as truth by some, that pope Leo X. exerted the authority and influence of his apostolic character in promoting the success of Ariosto's poem; and that he went so far as to publish a bull in favour of the Orlando Furioso, denouncing the censure of excommunication on all those who should presume to find fault with that performance. Bayle, in his article of Leo X. gravely propagates the story in these words: "Etoit ce garder le decorum de la papauté que d'expédier une bulle si favorable aux poësies de l'Arioste, Hippolite en jugea très bien, quand il dit, D'où avez-vous pris tant de fadaises. Leo fut plus débonnaire en menaçant d'excommunication ceux qui les blameroint ou empecheroient le profit de l'imprimeur." This matter was very likely to be caught up by Voltaire,

Upon a close enquiry it will perhaps appear, that there was no other foundation for this story than a diploma or licence granted by Leo for the sale of the work; and this merely from his authority as a temporal prince, in the same manner as patents or privileges are granted in other nations by their respective sovereigns.

We learn from Fontanini, that to the third edition of Ariosto's poem in 1521, published at Ferrara, was a diploma of Leo X. for printing the work (privativa della stampa), written by cardinal Jacobo Sadoletto, Secretary of the Briefs, and that other diplomas of the same nature were granted to Ariosto by the king of France, by the Venetians, by the Florentines, by the Genoese; and other powers. Apostolo Zeno relates that he had seen a fourth edition, which had once been in the possession of Peter Aretine, in the blank leaf of which were several poetical pieces by that poet; and that in the beginning was a diploma of Clement VII. written by Palladio Blossio, Secretary of the Briefs, dated January 1532, which grants to Ariosto the privilege of printing, publishing, and vending his Orlando Furioso, with any additions or corrections; imprimere, corrigere, et suppler, et in melius reformare.

In the college library at Winchester is an old edition of a Greek Pindar, printed at Rome in 1515, the year in which Ariosto's work was first published, with a diploma or privilege of Leo X. in the title-page*; and in 1513 a patent for printing masses, set to music, was granted by the same pope to Ottavio Petruccio.

After what has been said, I believe there can be little reason to doubt but that this pretended bull of Leo was nothing more than a common licence to a book, granted in the customary forms; which circumstance appears to have been violently exaggerated, from the religious fury of the times, to cast an odium on the papal au-authority in general, and on Leo in particular; and has since been received without examination.

The general character and qualities of Ariosto may be, in some sort, gathered from the foregoing narrative, to which his Italian biographers have added the following particulars.

In his conversation he was modest and affable to every body, demeaning himself in such a manner, as if altogether unconscious of that great superiority which nature had given him: he was close in argument, and ready in repartees; but was seldom observed to laugh more than became the dignity of a philosopher: yet, though his temper was rather inclined to melancholy, which is, perhaps the nature of every great genius, he was very remote from a rigid disposition; being particularly open and sprightly in his conversation with women, by whom his company was much coveted. He was an avowed enemy to ceremony, though always ready to pay due respect to place and rank. He abhorred all those dignities that could only be acquired by servility: he was a sincere lover of his country, loyal to his prince, and steady in his friendships. In his diet he was abstemious, making only one meal a day, a day, and that generally towards the evening; and was neither curious for variety or delicacies, being indeed a contemner of luxury in general,

Io non ho molto gusto di vivande,
Che scalco sia, fui degno esser' al mondo,
Quando vivevan gli huomini di ghiande.

I little heed what plenteous wealth affords,
Where costly dainties pile luxurious boards:
Well had I liv'd, when man, to hardship bred,
In early times on simple acorns fed!

While he was composing his Orlando, he would frequently rise in the middle of the night, and cause his servant Gianni to bring him pen, ink, and paper, when he wrote down what had immediately occurred to his imagination, which in the day he communicated to his friends.

His integrity was incorruptible; as appears by what he says to his brother Galasso of the old man, who being possessed of great wealth, was fearful of being poisoned by his relations, and therefore would trust himself in no hands but Ariosto.
THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.  cvii

His affection, as a son and brother, is seen from the care he took of his family, after the death of his father: concerning his mother, he thus tenderly expresseth himself:

L'eta di nostra madre mi percote
Di pieta il core, che da tutti a un tratto
Senz' infamia lasciata esser non puote.

I view my mother's age with pitying eye,
That draws my soul by every tender tie:
Shall she be left by all! forbid it shame,
And every duty to a parent's name!

Sat. ii.

He took great delight in building, but was an economist in his expences that way. A friend once expressing an astonishment, that he, who had described such magnificent edifices in his poem, should be contented with so poor a dwelling; Ariosto answered very aptly, that "words were much easier put together than bricks;" and leading him to the door of his house, pointed to this dictich which he had caused to be engraved on the portico:

Parva, sed apta mihi, sed nulli obnoxia, sed non sordida, puits tenui sed tamen aere domus.

Small
Small is my humble roof, but well design'd
To suit the temper of the master's mind;
Hurtful to none, it boasts a decent pride,
That my poor purse the modest cost supply'd.

Notwithstanding what has been mentioned of his personal bravery in the engagement between the pope's vessels and the duke's, he is reported to have been naturally of a timid disposition: when on horseback, he would alight on the least appearance of danger: he was particularly timorous on the water; and when he went out of a vessel, would always stay till the last, frequently using this expression, de pumpe novissimus exi: in every other respect his temper was firm and unruffled.

His son Virginio has left behind him the following particulars relative to his father, which we will insert in his own words; as the least matter of information must gratify curiosity in the life of so extraordinary a man.

"He was never satisfied with his verses, but continually altering them. He was very fond of gardening, but so frequently varying his design, that he never suffered any plant to remain above three months; at the same time he knew little of botany. I remember, that once imagining he had had planted capers, he was highly pleased to see them thrive so well; till at last, instead of capers, he found that he had planted elder. Of authors he highly approved Virgil and Tibullus; he greatly extolled Horace, but thought little of Propertius.

"He made no distinction in his food, but always eat of that which was next him, and often eat a small loaf or roll after he had dined. He was in general so lost in meditation, that he attended little to what passed. It so happened that a stranger once came to visit him at his dinner-time, and while his guest was talking, Ariosto eat the meat that was set before him; for which being afterwards reproved by his brother, he only coolly replied, "That the loss was the stranger's, and that he ought to have taken care of himself."

Sir John Harrington has given the following anecdote of Ariosto, for which he has not mentioned his authority, and which does not appear in any of the biographers or commentators consulted in writing this life. Take the relation in Sir John's own words.

"As he himself could pronounce very well, so it was a great penance to him to hear others pronounce pronounce ill that which himself had written excellent well. Insomuch as they tell of him, how coming one day by a potter's shop that had many earthen vessels ready made to sell on his stall, the potter fortuned, at that time, to sing some stave or other out of Orlando Furioso, I think where Rinaldo requesteth his horse to tarry for him, in the first book, the 32d stanza—

Ferma, Baiardo, mio, deh, ferma il piede
Che l'esser senza de troppo mi nuoce.

Stay, my Bayardo, stay!—thy flight restrain;
Much has thy want to-day perplex'd thy lord.

or some such grave matter fit for a potter; but he plotted the verses out so ill-favouredly (as might well besem his dirty occupation), that Ariosto being, or at least making semblance to be, in a great rage withal, with a little walking stick he had in his hand, brake divers of the pots: the poor potter, put quite beside his song, and almost beside himself, to see his market half marred before it was a quarter done, in a pitiful tone or manner, between railing and whining, asked, What he meant to wrong a poor man that had never done him injury in all his life? Yes, varlet! quoth Ariosto, I am yet scarce even with thee.
A story of the same kind has been likewise told of Camoëns; and Mr. Mickle observes, that "both these silly tales are borrowed from Plutarch's Life of Arcefilas, where the same dull humour is told of Philoxenus. He heard some brickmakers mistune one of his songs, and, in return, destroyed a number of their bricks."

He was of an amorous constitution, and very apt to receive impressions from every beautiful object; violent in his attachments, impatient of a rival; but in his amours he was discreet, cautious, and secret. It has been said that he might possibly allude to this by the sculpture of his inkstandish, on the top of which was a Cupid, with his fore-finger placed on his lip, as an emblem of silence. This disposition to gallantry, which he retained to the last year of his life, is confirmed by many parts of his writings.

Penfi, chi vuol, ch’el tempo i lacci scioglia
Che amore anoda, e che ci dorrer’ anco,
Nomando questa leve e basa voglia;
Ch’io per me voglio al capel nero e bianco,
Amare ed esortar che sempre s’ami,
E se in me tal voler dee venir manco;
Spezzi or la parca all mia vita i fi ami.

There are who think, that time, with stealing hand,
Dissolves the knot of Cupid’s tender band;
That frozen age ill suits with amorous fire,
When wisdom bids us scorn each frail desire:
For me, let graceful ringlets deck my head,
Or hoary snows my wrinkled temples spread;
Still must I love—still woo the melting dame,
Exhorting all to love—but when the flame
Is quite extinct, the sifters fatal shears
May cut my thread, and end my useless years.

The names of the women, whom he loved, do not appear to be mentioned, except one whom he is said to be strongly attached to, of the name of Geneura, to whom he is supposed to allude in this Sonnet.

And o'er my senses boundless sway maintain;
From whom no change can force me to depart,
While fortune shifts her vary'd face in vain!

And kindly lead him to the goal design'd,
Tho' haply Phæbus chide, or Bacchus frown,
Their slighted leaves shall ne'er my temples crown,
But this lov'd tree my happy brows shall bind.

Sonnet vii.

In his early life he contracted an intimacy with a noble Florentine, called Nicolo Vespucci, whom he accompanied into Florence in 1513, being then thirty-nine years old, to perfect himself in the Tuscan dialect, and to be present at the magnificent ceremony used at the feast of St. Baptift: here he fell violently in love with a kinswoman of Vespucci, whom he found preparing a dress of silver embroidered with purple, for her sons to appear in at the jousts. Ariosto, who was then deeply engaged in writing his poem, is supposed, from this circumstance, to have taken the idea of that beautiful simile in the twenty-fourth book, when he describes the wound received by Zerbino from the hand of Mandricardo.

Le lucide arme il caldo sangue irriga,
Pen fiì al piè di rubiconda riga.
Cosi tal hora, un bel purpureo nastrò
Ho veduto partir tela d'argento,

And, trickling down, his shining armour dy'd:
So have I seen a purple floweret spread,
And stain the silver vest with blushing red;
Wrought by her snowy hand with matchless art,
That hand, whose whiteness oft has pierc'd my heart.

It has been the opinion of some, that he was privately married, but that he was obliged to keep it secret for fear of forfeiting some church benefices which he enjoyed: some go so far as to say, that his wife's name was Alexandra, and that he alludes to her in these lines. Orl. Fur. B. xx.

Aleßandra gentil ch'umida avea,
Per la pietà del giovanetto i rai.

Fair Alexandra, in whose gentle eyes,
Tears, for the youth, in sweet compassion rise.

Concerning the person of Ariosto, he was rather above the common size; of a countenance generally grave and contemplative, as appears from the admirable picture painted by Titian: his head was partly bald; his hair black and curling; his forehead high; his eye-brows raised; raised; his eyes black and sparkling; his nose large and aquiline; his lips well formed; his teeth even and white; his cheeks rather thin, and his complexion inclining to the olive: he was well made, except that his shoulders were somewhat large, which made him appear to stoop a little; his walk was slow and deliberate, as indeed were his actions in general.

Ariosto left behind him two sons by Alexander, who were always considered illegitimate; Virginio before named, and J. Baptista; the first of whom being brought up under his father, who took great pains to instruct him, was made a canon of the house of Ferrara, and Ariosto resigned a great part of his benefices to him: the latter went very young into the army, and having acquired considerable reputation as a soldier, returned to Ferrara a little while before Ariosto's death, and died himself an officer in the duke's service.

Ariosto is reported to have met his dissolution with the utmost composure, and to have told some of his friends, who were present at his last moments, that he left the world without the least reluctance; and the more so, because, as he believed that in another state men would know each other, he was impatient to meet again so many friends that had gone before him.
He was interred in the church of Saint Benedict, under a plain monument, which was afterwards enriched with a number of inscriptions in the Greek, Latin, and Tuscan languages; the greatest wits contending to celebrate his memory.

Ariosto, among his other Latin pieces, left the following epitaph written for himself; but which an Italian writer of his life supposes to have been considered as too ludicrous to be made use of upon the occasion:

"LUDOVICI ARIOSTI humantur ofa
Sub hoc marmore, vel sub hoc humo, seu
Sub quicquid voluit benignus hæres,
Sive hærede benignior comes, seu
Oppotunius incidens viator;
Nam scire hau potuit futura, sed nec
Tanti erat vacuum fibi cadaver,
Ut urnam cuperet parare vivens;
Vivens ista tamen fibi paravit,
Quæ inscribi voluit suo sepulchro,
Olim si quod haberet is sepulchrum."

The bones of Ludovico Ariosto are buried under this marble, under this turf, or under whatever pleases his bountiful heir, or perhaps more bountiful friend; or stranger, who shall take this charge upon him: he could not look into the future, but was not solicitous, while living, to prepare an
The false thought on which the whole point of this epitaph turns, has been lately justly exposed in an observation on a similar one written by Pope for himself:

Under this stone, or under this hill,
Or under this turf, &c.

"When a man is once buried, the question under what he is buried, is easily decided. He forgot that though he wrote the epitaph in a state of uncertainty, yet it could not be laid over him till his grave was made."

The death of Ariofto was lamented by every good man; and the monks of St. Benedict, contrary to their usual custom, attended his body to the grave: and so great was their veneration of his name, that they would, by no means, consent that his bones should be afterwards removed to a chapel or sepulchre erected for him by his son Virginio, in the garden belonging to his house; which was afterwards destroyed by an ignorant builder, without the concurrence, and to the great mortification, of the owners of the

However, many years after, Signor Agostino Mosti, who had a sincere regard for the memory of Ariosto, having been early initiated by him in the knowledge of polite letters, and who was concerned that so great a man should want a monument worthy of him, resolved to build one that should be answerable to the veneration he had for his many virtues. He therefore caused a marble sepulchre to be erected at his own expense in the same church of St. Benedict, adorned with proper emblems, and a fine statue of Ariosto; and to show the zeal with which he paid this last duty to his master, he deposited, with his own hands, the bones of this illustrious poet in their new sepulchre, with the following inscription, and the annexed verses composed by Lorenzo Frizoli.

GENERAL VIEW
OF BOYARDO'S STORY,
AS CONNECTED WITH
ARIOSTO.

CHARLEMAIN, having proclaimed a solemn feast and tournament in Paris, at which were present many foreign princes and knights from various parts of the world, as well Pagan as Christian, on a certain day, when all the nobles and strangers were assembled, an unknown knight and lady entered the hall, attended by four giants of a dreadful stature. The lady, whose personal charms dazzled all the spectators, addressed herself to the emperor; and begging an audience, told him, that her name was Angelica; that she was come with her brother Uberto, from a distant kingdom, attracted by the fame of the magnificence of his court; that her brother, who earnestly desired to prove his valour with the warriors then present, was ready ready to meet any of them in the field, whether Saracen or Christian, upon condition, that whoever was unhorred by him, should immediately become his prisoner; but that if he himself should be overthrown, he promised to depart with his giants, and leave his sister as the prize of the conqueror: she concluded with saying, that her brother would expect them at his pavilion without the city.

The lady, having received a gracious answer, retired with her company, while every knight, captivated with her charms, felt the utmost impatience to enter the list with the stranger: but above the rest, Orlando, whose eyes had been riveted on so beautiful an object, confessed the poison of love, though he studiously endeavoured to conceal his inward emotions: even Namus could not resist the power of such perfections; nor was Charlemain himself wholly exempted from the general contagion.

In the mean time Malagigi, a cousin to Rinaldo, who was deeply skilled in magic, suspecting that the uncommon visit of these strangers foreboded no good to the Christians, had recourse to his art; and upon consulting his spirits, received intelligence, that the lady was daughter to Galaphron, king of Cathay; that the knight her her brother was not called Uberto, but Argalia; that the king their father, to effect a great design which he meditated, had procured for his son a suit of enchanted armour, a golden lance of such hidden virtue, that the least touch of it would dismount the stoutest warrior, and a horse of incomparable swiftness: to these gifts he added a ring of such wonderful efficacy, that being conveyed into the mouth, it made the person invisible, and, being worn upon the finger, had the power to frustrate all enchantments: but that the king confided chiefly in the beauty of his daughter, not doubting but her charms would fascinate the champions of Charlemain, and that she would bring them prisoners to the throne of Cathay.

Malagigi having heard this, conceived the design of delivering his country from the impending danger: he caused himself to be transported, by his spirits, to the pavilion of Argalia, whom he found asleep, with Angelica near him, guarded by the four giants: these he soon cast into a deep slumber by the force of his spells, and drew his sword, with a determination to put an end to the life of this dangerous beauty: but, as he approached her, he began to feel sensations of a very different nature, till every resolution giving way to the softer passions that inspired inspired him, from a nearer view of her charms, he could no longer resist the powerful impulse, but advanced to embrace her.

Angelica, who had the ring upon her finger, which preserved her from the force of his incantations, suddenly awaked, and finding herself in the arms of a man, uttered a loud cry: Argalia ran to her assistance, and seized Malagigi, while the princess made herself mistress of his magical book, and calling upon his spirits, commanded them to convey the prisoner to her father's kingdom; which was performed in an instant.

In order to put an end to the diffention that had arisen in the Christian court, each champion claiming the preference to enter first the list with Argalia, the emperor commanded that lots should be drawn; when the names that appeared were Astitolpho, Ferrau, Rinaldo, and next Charlemain, who would not be excluded notwithstanding his age; after these came a number more before the name of Orlando appeared.

Astitolpho being armed, as the first on the list of combatants, presented himself to encounter Argalia, was unhorsed by the golden lance, and sent prisoner into the pavilion. Next morning, at day-break, Ferrau, a Spanish knight, came from the city to try his fortune, and was overthrown in the same manner: but refusing to yield to the conditions of the combat, the giants endeavoured to seize his person; these he flew, and compelled Argalia to engage him on foot. Angelica, fearing the issue of their combat, fled; when Argalia, perceiving her flight, followed her, and was as suddenly pursued by Ferrau.

Ferrau, after some time entering the forest of Arden, found Argalia asleep, who had not been able to overtake his sister. The Spaniard, determined that he should not escape him, turned Argalia's horse loose, and waited, with the utmost impatience, till his enemy awaked. An obstinate battle then ensued, till victory at last declared for Ferrau, when Argalia, finding himself mortally wounded, entreated that when he was dead, his body, with all his arms, might be thrown into the river, that no one might wear them after him, and reproach his memory for suffering himself to be vanquished, when he was defended with impenetrable armour. Ferrau promised to grant his request, having first desired the use of his helmet for a few days, his own being demolished in the battle.
After the departure of Argalia, Angelica, and Ferrau, Aftolpho having recovered his liberty, mounted his horse, took the golden lance which Argalia had left behind him, and returned to the city: in his way he met Rinaldo, who was impatient to learn the issue of the combat; and having heard what had passed, determined to go in search of Angelica.

Orlando, who had felt no ease since the appearance of the lovely stranger, after Aftolpho's return, left the court of Charlemain, and set out likewise to follow Angelica, and in his way met with various adventures.

When Rinaldo first left the court of Charlemain to follow Angelica, he entered the forest of Arden, where he came to the enchanted fountain made by Merlin the magician, to cure Sir Tristram of his passion for Ifotta; but though it so happened that the knight never tasted of the water, yet the virtue of it remained ever after. Rinaldo arriving here, drank of the fountain, and immediately found his love for Angelica converted to hatred: he then came to the other fountain, likewise the work of Merlin, called the Fountain of Love, which had the faculty of inspiring the breast with that passion: here, tempted by the beauty of the place, he alighted from his his horse, yet, as he had before quenched his thirst, he drank not of the stream, but stretching himself on the turf, soon fell into a profound sleep.

Angelica, who had fled while her brother was engaged with Ferrau, was led by chance to the same place where Rinaldo lay; the princess, fatigued with her flight, and invited by the clearness of the water, drank a large draught, and conceived a violent passion for the sleeping knight, whom she stood contemplating with inexpressible pleasure, till he awakened. As soon as Rinaldo opened his eyes, and beheld Angelica, who was now become the object of his most bitter aversion, he remounted his horse, and left the place with the utmost precipitation, in spite of the most moving entreaties which the love-sick virgin made use of to detain him.

About this time Gradasso, king of Sericana, having been long desirous to get possession of Durindana, Orlando’s sword, and of Bayardo, Rinaldo’s horse, passed with a great army into France, and, Orlando being absent, he defeated Charlemain in a general battle, and made him and many of his leaders prisoners. Charlemain promised, at the return of Orlando, to give up to him Durindana and Bayardo; but Astolpho, who who was at Paris, and in possession of Bayardo, refused to resign him, and challenged Gradasso to the joust, whom he overthrew with the golden lance; when, according to the conditions of their encounter, Charlemain and all the prisoners were set at liberty: Gradasso then joined himself to Marsilius.

After the return of Angelica to India, Agrican king of Tartary, and father of Mandricardo, demanded her in marriage; but being refused by her, he raised a great army, and besieged her in Albracca, the capital of Cathay, inviting other nations to join him. Many gallant actions were performed at the siege. Orlando, Brandimart, Sacripant, Marphisa, Astolpho, and many others, took the part of Angelica; but Rinaldo, who at that time hated Angelica, from his having drank of the enchanted fountain, joined himself to her enemies; in consequence of which he had several encounters with Orlando. After various successes on either side, and an infinity of adventures engaged in by the several knights during the siege, Agrican was slain by Orlando in single combat; and Angelica, hearing that Rinaldo, whom she then loved, was gone to France, persuaded Orlando to accompany her thither; and, after her departure, the enemies of Albracca, taking advantage of the absence absence of Orlando, and her other brave defenders, entered the city by storm, and reduced it to ashes.

When Angelica, after the taking of Albracca, returned to France with Orlando, she passed again through the forest of Arden, and, in her way, happened to drink of the fountain of hatred, which entirely obliterated her former passion. About the same time Rinaldo, meeting with the contrary fountain, drank of the waters of love.

While the siege of Albracca was carrying on, Agramant, the young king of Africa, only twenty-two years of age, and the bravest knight in the dominions of Africa, except Rodomont king of Sarza, burning with desire to revenge the death of his father Troyano, slain by the Christians, ordered a council to be called in the city of Biserta, the capital of his empire, where two and thirty kings, his tributaries, being assembled, he proposed to them his design of invading the kingdom of Charlemain. After many debates, it was at last resolved to transport a powerful force into France, notwithstanding the prophecy of the king of Garamanta, who declared that the expedition would prove fatal to Agramant and his army.
When the king of Garamanta had in vain endeavored to dissuade Agramant from his designed invasion of France, he told the monarch, that there remained but one expedient by which he might hope to meet with any success against the Christians; this was, to take with him a young hero, named Rogero, who then resided with Atlantes, the magician, on mount Carena. Agramant having, in consequence of this advice, made many fruitless researches to find the fatal warrior, was directed, by the king of Garamanta, to procure the enchanted ring, then in possession of Angelica, daughter of Galaphron, king of Cathay, without which the retreat of Atlantes could never be discovered. Thereupon Agramant, offering great rewards to any one that would undertake this adventure, Brunello, a person of mean extraction, but well versed in the arts of fraud, engaged to perform it. Accordingly he went to Albracca, stole the ring from the princess, and brought it to Agramant; who, in recompense for his good service, made him king of Tingitana. In this excursion, Brunello likewise stole Sacripant's horse Frontino, Marphita's sword, Orlando's sword Balifarda, which he had won from the enchantress Falerina, and the famous horn which he had taken from Almontes.

Agramant,
Agramant, having got possession of this precious ring, went, with all his court, to the mountain, where Atlantes was said to reside; and the ring having dispelled every mist that enchantment had cast before their eyes, they soon discovered the rock on which was the wonderful dwelling; but the height forbidding all approaches to it, Agramant, by the advice of Brunello, ordered a tournament to be held on the plain, at the foot of the rock. Rogero, roused with the sound of the warlike instruments, and fired with the sight of horses and armour, which he stood for some time contemplating from the summit of the rock, at last made Atlantes, tho' with great reluctance, descend with him to the plain. Brunello, who carefully watched the success of his project, soon espied Rogero with Atlantes, and drawing near them, entered into conversation: Brunello was then completely armed and mounted on Frontino, when observing that Rogero was struck with the beauty of his horse and armour, he presented them to him; and the young warrior impatiently arming himself, and girding Balifarda to his side, leaped on Frontino, and entered the lists, where he overthrew every opponent, and obtained the whole honour of the day. All the combatants were astonished at the valour of this unknown champion, till Agramant, having at last discovered him him to be Rogero, whom he had so eagerly sought for, received him with open arms, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and engaged him to accompany him to France, notwithstanding all the arguments used by Atlantes, to dissuade the king from taking Rogero with him in that expedition.

After encountering a variety of dangers and adventures, Orlando and Angelica arrived at the Christian camp, where Orlando and Rinaldo meeting, a dreadful combat ensued between them for the lady; but Charlemain interposing with his authority, put an end to the battle, and delivered Angelica to the care of Namus duke of Bavaria *.

Marshallus, king of Spain, being encamped near mount Albano, to which he prepared to lay siege, was joined by Rodomont, king of Sarza, who had passed from Africa before Agramant, and after having lost great part of his fleet in a storm, landed with the remainder of his forces near Monaco, where he met with a very warm reception from the Christians.

Charlemain, having collected the strength of the empire, marched with Orlando and Rinaldo to attack Marsilius; whose army being now reinforced by some of the bravest warriors, among whom were Rodomont and Ferrau, was able to make head against him. The battle was fought with great obstinacy on both sides. Orlando and Rinaldo, elevated with the hopes of possessing Angelica, performed prodigies of valour: Rodomont made great slaughter of the Christians, and Bradamant, sister to Rinaldo, signalized herself in a particular manner. In the mean time, Agramant, having embarked his forces at Biferta, was landed, and advanced with speedy marches towards mount Albano, bringing with him the flower of the African chivalry, among which was the young Rogero, who had been with difficulty drawn from the enchanted fortress, in which he had been shut by Atlantes, to avoid the destiny which threatened him, but whose presence, like that of Achilles, had been declared of the highest importance to the expedition. This young warrior was accompanied by Atlantes, who, since he could not divert his charge from the pursuit of glory, was prompted, by his anxiety, to be near him in time of danger.

The whole force of the Saracens being now united, the battle raged with redoubled fury. Rogero, having overthrown numbers of the Christians, at last singled out Orlando, when Atlantes, Atlantes, fearing the event of such an encounter, by his magic art fascinated the eyes of Orlando, who, believing that he saw Charlemain in danger, abruptly left the field, and was made prisoner in an enchanted garden. At this time Mandricardo joined the army of Agramant, when Rogero and Rinaldo being engaged in single combat, the Christians began to give ground, till being entirely discouraged by the absence of Orlando, the rout became general, and the tide of fugitives and pursuers parted Rinaldo and Rogero.

During this general battle between the Pagans and Christians, Bradamant being engaged in single combat with Rodomont, received intelligence from Rogero, who chanced to be a spectator of their battle, that Charlemain was in imminent danger; upon which she desired to go to his assistance, but Rodomont opposing this, Rogero took her quarrel upon himself, encountered Rodomont, and disarmed him, who then retired vanquished by the courtesy of his enemy. After the departure of the prince of Sarza, Bradamant, struck with the manly deportment of Rogero, was desirous to learn who he was, and received from him the account of his origin.

Bradamant,
BOYARDO's STORY

B Bradamant, in return, discovered, her birth and name, and taking off her helmet, surprised the young warrior with her beauty. At this instant, a band of Pagans fell in with them, one of whom wounded Bradamant in the head, which was then unarmed. Rogero, who had by this time conceived a violent passion for the fair warrior, and enraged at the brutality of the action, advanced furiously to revenge it on the author; the Pagans then attacked him all at once, and Bradamant, who now began to feel the tenderest sentiments for Rogero, immediately joined him: their united force soon got the better of their adversaries, who were either slain, or put to flight: but it so happened, that in the pursuit the two lovers were separated, this being their first meeting; after this, Bradamant continued to go in search of Rogero, and arrived at the dwelling of a hermit, or friar, who healed the wound that she had received in her head. Afterwards falling asleep on the banks of a river, she was seen, by Flordefpina, daughter to king Marfilius, who was hunting in the forest, and being deceived by the arms and dress of Bradamant, supposing her to be a man, fell deeply in love with her *

* This story is completed by Ariosto, ORL. FUR. book xxv.

Orlando,
Orlando, having been delivered by Brandimart, Rogero, and Gradasso, from the enchanted garden, where he had been confined by Atlantes, arrived at Paris when the city was closely besieged by Agramant, Marsilius, Rodomont, Mandricardo, Ferrau, and the whole power of the Pagans. Orlando and Brandimart attacked the enemy with great slaughter, and Rodomont attempting to scale the walls, was thrown down by Orlando. The city was however at last in imminent danger of being taken, having been fired in several places; but a great storm arising, with a sudden violent shower of rain, extinguished the flames, and put an end to the battle for that time.

Here the great action of Boyardo breaks off unfinished, and the subject is again taken up by Ariosto, in the eighth book of the Orlando Furioso.

THE ARGUMENT.

ORLANDO arrives at the Christian camp with Angelica, where to put an end to the dissention that had arisen between him and Rinaldo, she is taken from him by Charlemain, and given to the care of Namus. The Christian army is defeated, in a general battle, by the forces of Agramant and Marfilius. Angelica flies from the camp, and is met by Rinaldo, who fights for her with Ferrau, till the combat being broke off by the departure of the lady, they both go in search of her. Ferrau, endeavouring to recover his helmet from the river, sees the ghost of Argalia, who reproaches him with perjury. Angelica, having taken shelter in a bower, sees unexpectedly one of her former lovers, to whom she discovers herself: their conversation is interrupted by the arrival of a strange knight: a battle ensues: the stranger departing, they find Bayardo, Rinaldo's horse, and soon after meet Rinaldo himself.

Ver. 1. Dames, knights, and arms, — ] It is said Cardinal Hippolito had been heard to declare that Ariosto was particularly difficult in composing the two first lines of his poem, and that he wrote them many times before he could satisfy himself. Marc Antonio Mureto, a most respectable writer of the xvith century, delivers himself thus on the subject: "Audivi a maximis viris qui facillime id nosse poterant, Ludovicum Arioftum nobilissimum nobilissimae domus
By Agramant, their youthful monarch, led,
In deep resentment for Troyano dead,
With threats on Charlemain t' avenge his fate,
Th' imperial guardian of the Roman state.

Nor will I les Orlando's acts rehearse,
A tale nor told in prose, nor sung in verse;
Who once the flower of arms, and wisdom's boast,
By fatal love his manly senses lost.
If she, for whom like anguish wounds my heart,
To my weak skill her gracious aid impart,
The timorous bard shall needful succour find,
To end the task long ponder'd in his mind.

Vouchsafe, great offspring of th' Herculean line,
In whom our age's grace and glory shine,
Hippolito, these humble lines to take,
The sole return your poet e'er can make;
Who boldly now his gratitude conveys
In sheets like these, and verse for duty pays:
Nor deem the labour poor, or tribute small;
'Tis all he has, and thus he offers all!

Here 'midst the bravest chiefs prepare to view, (Those honour'd chiefs to whom the lays are due)
Renown'd Rogero, from whose loins I trace
The ancient fountain of your glorious race:
My muse the hero's actions shall proclaim,
His dauntless courage, and his deathless fame;
So you awhile each weightier care suspend,
And to my tale a pleas'd attention lend.

Orlando, long with amorous passion fir'd,
The love of fair Angelica desir'd:
For her his arms immortal trophies won,
In Media, Tartary, and India known.
Now with her to the west he held his course,
Where Charlemain encamp'd his martial force,
And near Pyrene's hills his standard rear'd,
Where France and Germany combin'd appear'd,
That Spain and Afric's monarchs, to their cost,
Might rue their vain designs, and empty boast:
This, summon'd all his subjects to the field,
Whose hand could lift the spear, or falchion wield;

That,
That, once again impell'd the Spanish race
To conquer Gallia, and her realm deface.
And hither to the camp Orlando drew,
But soon, alas! his fatal error knew:
How oft the wisest err! how short the span
Of judgment here bestow'd on mortal man!
She, whom from distant regions safe he brought,
She, for whose sake such bloody fields he fought,
No sword unsheath'd, no hostile force apply'd,
Amidst his friends was ravish'd from his side.
This Charles had doom'd the discord to compose,
That 'twixt Orlando and Rinaldo rose:
Each kindred chief the beauteous virgin claim'd;
Deep hatred hence each rival heart inflam'd;
The king, who griev'd to see the knights engage
With fatal enmity and jealous rage,
Remov'd th' unhappy cause, and to the care
Of great Bavaria's duke confign'd the fair;

Yet
B. I. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Yet promis'd he should bear the maid away,
His valour's prize, on that important day,
Whose arm could best the Pagan might oppose, 65
And strow the sanguine plain with lifeless foes.
But Heaven dispers'd these hopes in empty wind:
The Christian bands th' inglorious field resign'd;
The duke, with numbers more, was prisoner made,
The tents, abandon'd, to the foes betray'd. 70

The damsel, doom'd to yield her blooming charms,
A recompense to grace the victor's arms,
With terror seiz'd, her ready palfrey took,
And, by a speedy flight, the camp forsook:
Her heart presag'd that fortune's fickle turn
That day would give the Christian bands to mourn.
As through a narrow woodland path she stray'd,
On foot a warrior chanc'd to meet the maid;
The shining cuirass, and the helm he wore,
His side the sword, his arm the buckler bore; 80
While through the woods he ran with swifter pace
Than village swains half naked in the race.

Ver. 68. — th' inglorious field resign'd; ] At this part Ariosto takes up the story from Boyardo, but passes over the particulars of the battle, which had been fully described by his predecessor.
See General View of Boyardo's Story.
Not with such haste the timorous maiden flies,
Who, unawares, a latent snake espies;
As, when Angelica beheld the knight,
She turn'd the reins, and headlong urg'd her flight.
This was the Paladin for valour known,
Lord of mount Alban, and duke Amon's son,
Rinaldo nam'd, who late when fortune crost
The Christian arms, his steed Bayardo loft.
Soon as his eyes beheld th' approaching fair,
Full well he knew that soft enchanting air;
Full well he knew that face which caus'd his smart,
And held in love's strong net his manly heart.

Meantime th' affrighted damsel threw the reins
Loose on her courser's neck, and scour'd the plains;
Through open paths she fled, or tangled shade;
Nor rough, nor bushy paths her course delay'd;
But pale and trembling, struck with deep dismay,
She lets her flying palfrey choose the way.

Now here, now there, amidst the savage wood
She wander'd, till she saw a running flood;
Where on the lonely banks Ferrau the view'd,
With duff and sweat his weary limbs bedew'd:

Ver. 90. — his steed Bayardo loft.] When Rinaldo, in the last general battle, dismounted to engage Rogerio, who was on foot, his horse escaped from him.
Late from the fight he came with toil opprest,
To quench his thirst, and taste the sweets of rest;
When soon returning to the bloody fray,
An unexpected chance compell'd his stay;
For where the flood its circling eddies tost,
His helmet, sunk amidst the sands, was lost.

Now to the stream the panting virgin flies,
And rends the air with supplicating cries;
The Pagan warrior, startled at the sound,
Leap'd from the shore, and cast his eyes around;
Till, earnest gazing, as she nearer drew,
Though pale with dread, the trembling fair he knew;
Then, as a knight who courteous deeds profess'd,
And love, long since, enkindled in his breast;
Dauntless her person to defend he swore,
Though on his head no fencing helm he wore.
He grasp'd his sword, and mov'd with haughty stride
To meet Rinaldo, who his force defy'd,
And oft had each the other's valour try'd.

And now, on foot, oppos'd, and man to man,
With swords unsheath'd, a dreadful fight began;

Ver. 110. His helmet, sunk — ] This circumstance of Ferrau leaving the battle, and losing his helmet in the river, is related by Boyardo.

Ver. 120. Though on his head — ] See note to Book xii. ver. 312.
In vain did plate and mail their limbs enclose,
Not massy anvils could resist their blows.
While thus his utmost force each warrior try'd,
His feet again the virgin's palfrey ply'd;
At his full stretch she drives him o'er the plain,
And seeks the shelter of the woods again.

Long had the knights contended in the field,
Nor this nor that could make his rival yield;
With equal skill could each his weapon bear,
Practis'd alike in all the turns of war;
When Alban's lord, with amorous fears possess'd,
First to the Spanish foe these words address'd.

While thus on me your thoughtless rage you turn,
Yourself (he cry'd) have equal cause to mourn;
If yonder dame, the sun of female charms,
Has fill'd your glowing breast with soft alarms,
What gain is yours?—Suppose me prisoner made,
Or breathless, by the chance of battle, laid;
Yet could you not possess the beauteous prize,
For while we linger here, behold she flies!

But if the passion you profess is true,
Then let us first Angelica pursue:
This wisdom bids—be first secure'd the fair,
And let the sword our title then declare;
Else what can all our fond contention gain, 150
But fruitless toil and unavailing pain?

Ferrau with pleasure heard the Christian knight,
Then both agreed t' adjourn the bloody fight;
And now so firmly were they bound to peace,
So far did rage and rival hatred cease,
That, in no wise, the Pagan prince would view
Brave Amon's son on foot his way pursue,
But courteous bade him mount the steed behind,
Then took the track Angelica to find.

O noble minds, by knights of old possess'd! 160
Two faiths they knew, one love their hearts profess'd;
And still their limbs the smarting anguish feel,
Of strokes inflicted by the hostile steel.
Through winding paths, and lonely woods they go,
Yet no suspicion their brave bosoms know. 165
At length the horse, with double spurring, drew
To where two several ways appear'd in view;
When doubtful which to take, one gentle knight
For fortune took the left, and one the right.

Long through the devious wilds the Spaniard pass'd,
And to the river's banks return'd at last:

Ver. 162. — the smarting anguish feel, 1 See note to Book xii. ver. 312.
The place again the wandering warrior view'd,
Where late he drop'd his casque amidst the flood;
Since all his hopes to find his love were vain,
Once more he fought his helmet to regain. 175

A tall young poplar on the banks arose;
From this a branch he hew'd and lopt the boughs:
A stake thus fashion'd with industrious art,
He rak'd the river round in every part:
When, rising from the troubled brook, was seen 180
A youth with features pale and ghastly mien:
Above the circling stream he rais'd his breast;
His head alone was bare, all arm'd the rest;
His better hand the fatal helmet bore,
The helmet that in vain was fought before: 185
Full on Ferrau he turn'd with threatening look,
And thus the ghost th' astonish'd knight bespoke.

Wretch! does this helm perplex thy faithless mind,
A helm thou should'st have long ere this resign'd?
Remember fair Angelica, and view 190
In me her brother, whom thy weapon slew.
Didst thou not vow, with all my arms, to hide
My casque ere long beneath the whelming tide?
Though basely thou hast fail'd thy plighted word,
See jufter fortune has my own restor'd: 195

Then

Then murmur not—or if thou still must grieve,
Lament that e'er thy falsehood could deceive.
But if thou seek'st another helm to gain,
Seek one that may no more thy honour stain:
Seek one perchance of stronger temper'd charms; 206
Such has Orlando, such Rinaldo arms:
Mambrino, this; Almontes, that posses's'd;
By one of these thy brows be nobler press'd:

But

Ver. 202. Mambrino, this; Almontes, that posseS's'd; I do not find these actions recorded in Boyardo, but like many others mentioned in the work, Ariosto alludes to them as well-known incidents in the romance writers. In an old romance, in ottava rima, intituled INAMORAMENTO DI RINALDO, apparently much prior to Ariosto, is a long account of a Pagan king, named Mambrino, who comes against Charlemain and the Christians with a vast army. He is at last killed by Rinaldo, but no particular mention is made of his helmet. This helmet of Mambrino, said by Ariosto to be won by Rinaldo, is the same which the reader must recollect to have seen so frequently mentioned in Don Quixote, and for which the knight of la Mancha took possession of a barber's bason. See Jarvis's

With respect to the death of Almontes, the following account is given in the romance poem of ASGRAMONTE.

Almontes, son of Agolant, and brother to Troyano, having embarked from Africa to revenge the death of Garnieri king of Carthage, his grandfather, killed by Milo, father of Orlando, had performed many great actions and slain Milo.

He
But what I claim by sacred faith for mine,
Forbear to seek, and willingly resign.

The Saracen beheld, with wild affright,
The strange appearance of the phantom-knight;
Up rose his hair like bristles on his head,
His utterance fail'd him, and his colour fled.
But when he heard Argalia, whom he slew,
(Argalia was the name the warrior knew)

He one day came to a fountain called Sylvestera, which was said to be made by St. Silvester, and that by tasting these waters Constantine was converted. Almontes fell asleep, and was soon after surprized by Charlemain. These two warriors then engaged in a dreadful combat, and Charlemain was very near being defeated, when Orlando, seeking Almontes, in order to revenge the death of his father, was met by a hermit, who incited him to go to the assistance of Charlemain. Orlando, having lost his sword, took an enormous mace or club from a dead Turk, and soon reached the fountain, where he attacked Almontes, who had just overpower'd the emperor. Orlando, after an obstinate battle, killed Almontes, who before his death, recollected the prophecy of his sister Galicella, that he should die by a fountain. Orlando then took possession of the armour of Almontes, which was enchanted, and of his horn; together with his horse Brigliadoro, and his sword Durindana, both so celebrated in Ariosto. See ASPRAMONTE, Cant. xix.

Argalia, see General View of BOYARDO'S Story.

Reproach
Reproach his tainted faith and breach of fame,
His haughty bosom glow'd with rage and shame.
Then by Lanfu/a's life a sacred vow
He made, to wear no head-piece o'er his brow, 215
But that which in fam'd Afiramont of yore,
From fierce Almontes' head Orlando tore.
And to this oath a due regard he paid,
And kept it better than the first he made.
Thence with sad steps in pensive mood he went,
And long remain'd in fullen discontent.
Now here, now there he seeks the Christian knight,
And in his panting bosom hopes the fight.

Rinaldo, who a different path had try'd,
As fortune led, full soon before him spy'd 225
His gallant courser bounding o'er the plain—
Stay, my Bayardo, stay — thy flight restrain:

Ver. 214. — Lanfu/a's life a sacred vow — ] Lanfu/a was the mother of Ferrau. Such kind of vows were common with the knights in romance: thus Don Quixote, in imitation of these, swears he will not rest till he has won a helmet by conquest.

Ver. 223. — hopes the fight.] We hear no more of Ferrau till the xiith book, ver. 169, where he is introduced as one of the knights confined in the enchanted palace of At-lantes.
Much has thy want to day perplex'd thy lord—
The steed, regardless of his master's word,
Through the thick forest fled with speed renew'd,
While, fir'd with added rage, the knight purfu'd,

Now turn we to Angelica, who speeds
O'er savage wilds, and unfrequented meads;
Nor thinks herself secure, but swiftly scuds,
Thro' the deep mazes of surrounding woods;

Ver. 232. —Angelica, who speeds] Tasso seems to have had a reference to this, and the former passage ver. 95. in describing the flight of Erminia.

Mean while Erminia's rapid courser stray'd
Through the thick covert of the woodland shade;
Her trembling hand the rein no longer guides,
And through her veins a chilling terror glides:

Still flies the damsel to her fears resign'd,
Nor dares to cast a transient look behind:
All night she fled, and all th' ensuing day, &c:

But our countryman Spenser more immediately follows
Ariosto, in his account of Florimel, on a like occasion, in his

Ver. 13.

Fairy Queen:

Like as an hind forth singled from the herd,
That hath escaped from a ravenous beast,
Yet flies away, of her own feet affeed,
And every leaf, that shaketh with the least

Murmur
Starts at the leaves that ruffle with the wind,
And thinks the knight pursues her close behind:
Each shadow that in hill or vale appears,
Again recalls Rinaldo to her fears!
So when a fawn or kid by chance has found,
Amidst the covert of his native ground,
His hapless dam some furious leopard’s prize,
Who tears her throat and haunches as she lies;
Far from the dreadful fight, with terror chac’d,
From grove to grove he flies with trembling haste;
While every bush he touches in his way,
He thinks the cruel savage grips his prey.

Murmur of wind, her terror hath encreaft:
So fled fair Florimel from her vain fear,
Long after she from peril was releaft:
Each shade she saw, and each noise she did hear,
Did seem to be the same, which she escap’d whileear.

All that same evening she in flying spent,
And all that night her course continued;
Ne did she let dull sleep once to relent,
Nor wearines to slack her haste, but fled
Ever alike, as if her former dread
Were hard behind, her ready to arrest:
And her white palfrey having conquered
The maif’ring reins out of her weary wrist,
Perforce her carried wherever he thought best.

C. Unconscious
Unconscious where she pass'd, that day and night,
With half the next, the damsel urg'd her flight.
At length she came, where rose a bowery shade,
Whose nodding branches to the breezes play'd:
Two purling streams adorn the sylvan scene,
And clothe the turf with never-fading green:
Along the meads they roll their easy tide,
The stones, with murmuring noise, their passage chide.

Here hop'd the fair a safe retreat to find,
And fondly deem'd Rinaldo far behind:
O'ercome with toil, with burning heat oppress'd,
She fought to ease her limbs with needful rest.
Then lighting on the ground, she loos'd the reins,
And gave her steed to graze th' enamell'd plains.

Not distant far, an arbour struck her view,
Where flowery herbs and blushing roses grew:
Close by the bower the glassy mirror flow'd:
The bower was shelter'd with a waving wood
Of lofty oaks; the inner part display'd
A cool retreat amidst surrounding shade.
So thick the twining branches nature wove,
No sight, no fun could pierce the dusky grove.
B. I. ORLANDO FURIOUSO.

A rising bank, with tender herbage spread,
Had form'd for soft repose a rural bed.
The lovely virgin here her limbs compos'd,
Till downy sleep her weary eyelids clos'd.
Not long she lay, for soon her slumber fled,
A trampling steed her sudden terror bred:
When, rising silent, near the river's side,
A graceful warrior, sheath'd in arms, she spy'd.
Uncertain if she view'd a foe or friend,
Alternate hopes and fears her bosom rend;
Th' approaching stranger now his steed forlook,
And stretch'd his careless limbs beside the brook,
His arm sustain'd his head, and, lost in thought,
He seem'd a statue by the sculptor wrought.
An hour and more (my lord) the pensive knight
With head reclin'd remain'd in mournful plight,
At length began with such a doleful strain,
To tell the listening woods his secret pain,
That parting rocks might tender pity show,
And savage tigers soften at his woe:
He sigh'd; his breast like flaming Ætna glow'd,
While down his cheeks the tears like rivers flow'd.

C 2 Ah
Ah me! (he cry'd) whence comes this inward smart,
These thoughts that burn at once and freeze my heart?
What to a tardy wretch, like me, remains?
With happier speed the fruit another gains. 295
To me were scarcely words and looks address'd,
The last dear bliss another has possess'd.
Since then I neither fruit nor flowers enjoy,
Why should her love in vain my peace destroy?
The spotless maid is like the blooming rose 300
Which on its native stem unfully'd grows;
Where fencing walls the garden-space surround,
Nor swains, nor browsing cattle tread the ground:
The earth and streams their mutual tribute lend,
Soft breathe the gales, the pearly dews descend: 305
Fair youths and amorous maidens with delight
Enjoy the grateful scent, and bless the sight.

Ver. 300. The spotles's maid — ] Imitated from Catullus.
Ut flos in septis secretis nascitur hortis,
Ignotus pecori, nullo contusus aratro,
Quem mulcent aureae, firmat fol, educat imber:
Multi illum pueri, multae optavere puellae.
Idem quum tenui carptus desfloruit ungui,
Nulli illum pueri, nulæ optavere puellæ:
Sic virgo dum intacta manet, tum cara suis, sed,
Quum castrum amisset polluto corpore florem,
Nec pueris jucunda manet, nec cara puellis.

CARMEN NUPTIALE.

But
But if some hand the tender stalk invades,
Lost is its beauty and its colour fades:
No more the care of heaven, or garden's boast,
And all its praise with youths and maidens lost.
So when a virgin grants the precious prize
More choice than beauty, dearer than her eyes,
To some lov'd swain; the power she once possess'd,
She forfeits soon in every other breast;
Since he alone can justly love the maid,
To whom so bounteous she her love display'd.
While others triumph in each fond desire,
Relentless fortune! I with want expire.
Then shake this fatal beauty from thy mind,
And give thy fruitless passion to the wind—
Ah! no — this instant let my life depart,
Ere her dear form' is banish'd from my heart.

If any seek to learn the warrior's name
Whose mournful tears increas'd the running stream,
'Twas Sacripant, to hapless love a prey,
Whose rule Circassia's ample realms obey:

Ver. 326. 'Twas Sacripant —] Sacripant, king of Circassia, one of the bravest and most faithful of Angelica's lovers. When this princess was besieged in Albracca by Agric-
For fair Angelica his course he bends
From eastern climes to where the sun descends:
For, pierc'd with grief, he heard in India's land
With Brava's knight she fought the Gallic strand;
And after heard in France, the blooming fair
Was giv'n by royal Charles to Namus' care;
The wish'd-for prize the champion to reward,
Whose arms should best the golden lily guard.
Himself that fatal conflict had beheld,
When Pagan arms the Christian forces quell'd:
Since then through many a winding track he stray'd,
And fought, with fruitless care, the wandering maid.
While, grieving thus, in doleful state he lies,
The tears like fountains gushing from his eyes.

can, he marched to her assistance with a numerous army,
and performed many gallant actions before the walls.
Agri-can, having one night by surprise gained admittance into the city, with three hundred of his followers, Sacripant, who then lay dangerously wounded, fellied out, armed only with his sword and shield, and bravely repulsed them, till the whole army of Tartars entering the walls, he was compelled to retire into the fort, whence, at the request of Galaphron, he soon after set out to ask assistance from Gradasö, king of Seri-cane.

Ver. 331. — Brava's knight —] Orlando, so called from having the Marquisate of Brava.
Beyond his wish, propitious fortune bears
His soft complainings to his mistress' ears.
Angelica attentive hears his moan,
Whose constant passion long the fair had known:
Yet, cold as marble, her obdurate breast
No kindly pity for his woes confess'd:
As one who treats mankind with like disdain,
Whose wayward love no worth could e'er obtain:
But thus with perils clos'd on every side,
She thinks in him that Fortune might provide
A sure defence; her champion and her guide:
For who, when circling waters round him spread
And menace present death, implores not aid?
This hour neglected, never might she view
A knight again so valiant and so true:
Yet meant she ne'er to assuage his amorous smart,
Who kept her deeply treasur'd in his heart;
And with that happiness his pains reward,
That happiness, which lovers most regard:
Some other new-fram'd wile the fair design'd
To lure with hope his unsuspecting mind;
And, when her fears were past, return again
To all her cruelty and coy disdain.
Then, sudden issuing from the tufted wood,
Confess'd in open sight the virgin stood:

C 4

As,
As, on the scene, from cave or painted grove,
Appears Diana, or the Queen of Love.

Hail! mighty warrior! (thus the damsel said)
May favouring heaven afford me timely aid,
That you may still unfail'd keep my name,
Nor with suspicion wrong my spotless fame!

Struck with the vision, Sacripant amaz'd
On fair Angelica in rapture gaz'd:
Not with such joy a mother views again
Her darling offspring, deem'd in battle slain,
Who saw the troops without him home return'd,
And long his loss with tears maternal mourn'd.

The lover now advanc'd with eager pace,
To clasp his fair one with a warm embrace:
While she, far distant from her native seat,
Refus'd not thus her faithful knight to meet,
With whom she hop'd ere long her ancient realms to greet.

Then all her story she at full express'd,
Ev'n from the day, when urg'd by her request,
He parted, succours in the east to gain
From fam'd Gradaffo king of Sericane:

Ver. 385. — when urg'd by her request, ] Alluding to a passage in Boyardo.
B. I. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

How great Orlando did her steps attend,
And safe from danger and mischance defend;
While, as she from her birth had kept unstain'd
Her virgin fame, he still that fame maintain'd.

This might be true, but one discreet and wise,
Would scarcely credit such a fond surmise:
Yet Sacripant with ease the maid believ'd,
For mighty Love had long his sense deceiv'd:
Love, what we see, can from our sight remove,
And things invisible are seen by Love.

What though Anglante's lord so long forbore
To seize the blest occasion in his power;
(Thus to himself in secret spoke the knight)
Shall I so coldly fortune's gifts requite?
Or e'er repent I flighted beauty's charms
When the glad hour had giv'n them to my arms!
No — let me crop the fresh, the morning rose,
Whose budding leaves untainted sweets disclose.
'Midst all disguise, full well the fair approve
The soft, the pleasing violence of love.
Then let no forg'd complaints my soul affright,
Nor threatenings rob me of the wish'd delight.

He said; and for the soft attack prepar'd:
But soon a loud and sudden noise was heard:
The noise, resounding from the neighbouring grove,
Compell'd the knight to quit his task of love:
His ready helmet on his head he plac'd;
His other parts in shining steel were cas'd:
Again with curbing bit his steed he rein'd,
Remounted swiftly and his lance regain'd.
Now, issuing from the wood, a knight is seen
Of warlike semblance and commanding mien:
Of dazzling white the furniture he wears;
And in his casque a snowy plume he bears,
But Sacripant, whom amorous thoughts employ,
Defrauded of his love and promis'd joy,
Beholds th' intruding champion from afar
With haughty looks, and eyes that menace war.
Approaching nearer he defies his force,
And hopes to hurl him headlong from his horse:
With threatening words the stranger makes return,
With equal confidence and equal scorn:
At once he spoke, and to the combat press'd,
His courser spurt'd and plac'd his lance in rest:
King Sacripant return'd with equal speed;
And each on each impell'd his rapid steed.
Not bulls or lions thus the battle wage
With teeth and horns, in mutual blood and rage, 435
As fought these eager warriors in the field:
Each forceful javelin pierc’d the other’s shield
With hideous crash; the dreadful clangors rise,
Swell from the vales, and echo to the skies!
Through either’s breast had pierc’d the pointed wood,
But the well-temper’d plates the force withstandd.
The fiery coursers, long to battle bred,
Like butting rams encounter’d head to head.
The stranger’s with the shock began to reel,
But soon recover’d with the goring steel;
While on the ground the Pagan’s breathless fell,
A beast that, living, serv’d his master well.

The knight unknown, beholding on the mead
His foe lie crush’d beneath the slaughter’d steed,
And deeming here no further glory due,
Resolv’d no more the contest to renew;
But turning swift, again pursu’d his way,
And left the fierce Circassian where he lay.
As when, the thunder o’er, the ether clears,
Slow rising from the stroke the hind appears,
Where stretch’d he lay all senseless on the plain,
Where fast beside him lay his oxen slain;
And
And sees the pine, that once had rais’d in air
Its stately branches, now of honours bare:
So rose the Pagan from the fatal place,
His mistres present at the dire disgrace.
He sigh’d full deeply from his inmost heart;
Not for a wounded limb, or outward smart;
But shame alone his tortur’d bosom tore,
A shame like this he ne’er confess’d before;
And more he sorrow’d, when the damsel freed
His limbs encumber’d from the murder’d steed;
Long time he silent stood with downcast look,
Till first Angelica the silence broke.

She thus began: Let not my lord bemoan
His courser’s fatal error, not his own;
For him had grassy meads been fitter far,
Or stalls with grain surcharg’d, than seats of war!
Yet little praise awaits yon haughty knight,
Nor can he justly glory in his might;
For he, methinks, may well be said to yield,
Who first forfakes the fight and flies the field.

With words like these the drooping king she chear’d,
When from the woods a messenger appear’d;
Tir’d with a length of way he seem’d to ride,
His crooked horn and wallet at his side:
When now, approaching to the Pagan knight,
He ask'd if he had seen, with buckler white,
And snowy plumage o'er his crest display'd,
A warrior passing through the forest shade. 485
To whom thus Sacripant in brief again:
The knight you seek has stretch'd me on the plain:
But now he parted hence; to him I owe
My sham'd defeat, nor yet my victor know.
I shall not, since you wish me to reveal,
(Reply'd the messenger) your foe conceal:
Know then, the fall you suffer'd in the fight,
A gallant virgin gave, unmatch'd in might,
Of fame for deeds of arms, of greater fame
For beauteous form, and Bradamant her name. 495
He said; and turn'd his courser from the place:
The Saracen, o'erwhelm'd with new disgrace,
All mute with conscious shame, dejected stood,
While o'er his features flush'd the mantling blood;
Till to the damsel's steed the knight address'd 500
His silent steps, and now the saddle press'd;
Then plac'd the fair Angelica behind,
Resolv'd some more secure retreat to find.
Ere far they rode, they heard a trampling sound,
That all the forest seem'd to shake around: 505
They
They look, and soon a stately steed behold,
Whose costly trappings shine with burnish'd gold;
He leaps the steepy mounds, and crossing floods,
And bends before his way the crashing woods.
Unless the mingled boughs, with dusky shade,
Deceive my erring sight (exclaim'd the maid)
I see Bayardo in yon gallant horse,
That through the woodland breaks his sounding course:
One palfrey could but ill two riders bear,
And fortune sends him to relieve our care.

King Sacripent, alighting on the plain,
Drew near, and thought secure to seize the rein;
But swift as lightnings flash along the sky,
With spurning heels Bayardo made reply.
It chanc'd beside him the Circassian stood,
Else had he mourn'd his rash attempt in blood;
Such dreadful force was in the courser's heel,
The stroke had burst a mount of solid steel.

Then

Ver. 512. — Bayardo — J Many wonders are told in the romances of this horse. It is said that he was found by Malagigi in a grotto, together with a suit of armour and the sword Fusberta, all under the guard of a horrible serpent, and that by his magic art he got possession of, and gave them to Rinaldo.

See Inamoramento di Rinaldo, C. iv.
B. I. ORLANDO FURioso.

Then to Angelica with easy pace
He moves, and humbly views her well-known face:
A spaniel thus, domestic at the board,
Fawns after absence, and surveys his lord.

The

Tasso, in his juvenile poem of RINALDO, gives another account of this horse: he tells us that the famous Amadis of Gaul found him in a solitary island, and having tamed him, carried him into France; that, after the death of Amadis, he fell into the hands of Alquif the magician, who framed an enchantment, in consequence of which he could never be again subdued, but by some knight of the blood of Amadis, and equal to him in valour. Tasso relates that many warriors tried the adventure, but that all had perished in the attempt, till Rinaldo entered the forest where the horse lived in a cave, and attacking him, made himself master of this furious animal. Tasso describes the horse in the true manner of Ariosto; and the Italian reader will not, I believe, be displeased to peruse the following spirited passage.

Ecco appare il cavallo, e i calci tira,
E fa saltando in ciel mille ruote,
Da le narici il feco accolto s'reira,
Move l'orecchie, e l'ampie membra scuote;
A' fassi, a' sterpi, a' piante ei non rimira,
Ma fracassando il tutto urta e percote,
Col nitrito i nemici a fera guerra
Sfida, e cò pie fa rimbombar la terra.
Baio e castagno (onde Baiardo è detto)
D'argentea stella in fronte ei và fregiate,
Balzani ha i pié di dietro, e l'ampio petto
Di grasse polpe largamente ornato,
The damsel was remember'd by the steed
Wont at Albracca from her hands to feed,
What time Rinaldo, courted by the maid,
With foul ingratitude her love repay'd.
Now boldly in her hand she took the rein,
Strok'd his broad chest, and smooth'd his ruffled mane:
While conscious he, with wondrous sense indu'd,
Still as a lamb, beside her gently stood,

Ha picciol ventre, ha picciol capo e stretto,
Si poso il folto crin fu'l deitro lato:
Sono le spalle in lui larghe e carnose,
Dritte le gambe, afciutte, e poderose.

RINALDO, Lib. ii.

Ver. 529. Wont at Albracca — J Malagigi, who was made prisoner by Angelica (see General View, &c.), being released upon his parole, endeavoured to persuade Rinaldo to return her love; but all his arguments proving ineffectual, he, in revenge, by a magical illusion, decoyed his cousin from the Christian camp: Bayardo, being left behind, came into the possession of Astolpho, who, going to the siege of Albracca, in aid of Angelica, was overthrown before the walls of that city, when his horse was seized by Agrican; who being afterwards slain, Bay-ardo came into the hands of Orlando, who had lost his horse Brigliadoro. Orlando at last having recovered his own, and departing from Cathay on a new adventure, left Bayardo in Al-bracca with Angelica, who soon after sent him to his master Ri-ナルド。 See ORLANDO INNAM.

The
The watchful Pagan leap’d into the seat,
And curb’d, with straighten’d reins, Bayardo’s heat.
The palfrey to Angelica remain’d,
Who gladly thus her former place regain’d.

Now as by chance she cast her eyes aside,
A knight on foot in sounding arms she spy’d:
What sudden terror on her face was shown,
Soon as the knight for Amon’s son was known.
Long had he woo’d, but she detests his love;
Not swifter from the falcon flies the dove.

He hated once, while she with ardor burn’d;
And now behold their several fortunes turn’d.
This cause at first from two fair fountains came,
Their waters different, but their look the same:

Amidst

Ver. 548. — two fair fountains — ] “As many of these specious and wonderful tales, in romance writers, are borrowed from Greek or Latin poets, so this story of the two fountains of Arden, with their different effects, is borrowed from Claudian, in his description of the gardens of Venus:

Labuntur gemini fontes, hic dulcis, amarus
Alter, et infusis corrumpit melis venenis:
Unde Cupidineas armavit fama sagittas.

Two fountains here, of different nature, rise;
This dulcet draughts, that bitter streams supplies:
And here, where poison flows to taint the heart,
Fame tells that Cupid dips his deadly dart.”

UPTON, Notes on Spenser, B. iv. C. iii.
Amidst the shade of Arden's dreary wood,
Full in each other's view the fountains stood:
Who drinks of one, inflames with love his heart;
Who drinks the other stream contemns his dart:
Rinaldo tafted that, and inly burn'd;
The damfe1 this, and hate for love return'd.

Soon as Angelica beheld the knight,
A sudden mist o'erspread her cheerful sight;
While with a faltering voice and troubled look,
To Sacripant with supplicant tone she spoke;
And begg'd him not th' approaching chief to meet.

But turn his courser, and betimes retreat.

Does then my prowess (Sacripant replies)
Appear so mean and worthless in your eyes,
That you too feeble deem this flighted hand,
The force of yonder champion to withstand?

Spenser mentions one of these fountains in his Fairy Queen:

Much more of price, and of more gracious power,
Is this, than that same water of Arden,
The which Rinaldo drank in happy hour
Described by that famous Tuscan pen:
For that had might to change the hearts of men
From love to hate.

When at Albracca I maintain'd the fight?
In your defence, unarm'd, I durst oppose
King Agrican, and brav'd a host of foes.

Not so (she said) — nor to reply she knew; 570
As thus she spoke Rinaldo nearer drew,
Who now began the Pagan king to threat,
Soon as his eyes the well-known courser met,
And that lov'd face he view'd, whose charms had fir'd
His ravish'd bosom, and his soul inspir'd.

What strife between these haughty warriors fell.

Ver. 566. — that memorable night ] See note on ver. 326.
Concerning the force mentioned in romances to have been set down before Albracca, Milton, to express the idea of a prodigious concourse, alludes to it in the following lines:

"Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican, with all his northern powers,
Besieg'd Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Galaphrop, from thence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
His daughter, fought by many prowefl knights,
Both Paynim and the Peers of Charlemain;
Such and so various was their chivalry."

THE
ORLANDO FURIOSO.
BATTLE betwixt Sacripant and Rinaldo. Angelica, flying, meets with a hermit, who, by a magical illusion, parts the two rivals. Rinaldo, returning to Paris, is sent by Charlemain on an embassy to England. Bradamant, seeking her lover Rogero, meets with Pinabello, from whom she hears a melancholy story of his misfortunes. She promises him assistance; and afterwards, being deceived, falls into a pit.

ORLANDO FURIOSO.

A
H! why so rare does cruel Love inspire
Two tender bosoms with a mutual fire!
Say, whence, perfidious, dost thou pleasure find
To sow dissention in the human mind?
In shallow waters when I fain would keep,
Thou, to my ruin, draw'ft me to the deep:
From those, that love me, dost avert my love,
To place it where no sighs, no sufferings move!
Thou giv'ft Angelica t' enslave the knight,
Yet mak'ft him hateful in the virgin's sight:
But when she lov'd him, and his form admir'd,
He, with aversion, from her love retir'd.

Ver. 11. But when she lov'd him,—] See General View of Boyardo's Story.

D 4 With
With grief he now in flames unpity'd burns;
Thus equal fortune scorn for scorn returns.

Rinaldo furious thus.—Base thief! alight! 15
Forfake my courser, and restore my right.
Think not such theft shall unreven'd succeed,
Impending punishment awaits the deed:
But more—yon damsel to my arms resign;
'Twere far unmeet such beauties should be thine. 20
Wert not a shame, that hence a thief should bear
A steed so stately, and a maid so fair!
Thief! dost thou say?—take back th' opprobrious lye,
(With equal rage the Pagan made reply)
But, if we trust the common voice of fame, 25
'Tis thou far more deserv'lt th' opprobrious name.
This instant shall th' important strife decide,
Who merits best the courser, and the bride:
Yet this, so far our thoughts conform, I own,
No equal to her charms the world has known. 30

As when two hungry mastives from afar,
By hate or envy mov'd, prepare for war;
Slowly they meet, their threatening teeth they show,
With livid fire their glaring eye-balls glow:
At last with snarls the bitter fray they wage, 35
And bite and tear in mutual blood and rage.
B. II. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 41

So after piercing taunts and vengeful words,
The mighty warriors drew their shining swords.

One urg'd the conflict from the courser's height,
One on his feet below maintain'd the fight:
Nor think the horseman could th' advantage boast,
His force was useles, and his prowess lost:
For well, by nature taught, the faithful steed
Against his lord refus'd his strength and speed:
Nor could Circassia's prince, by skill or force,
With spur or bit direct the reftiff horse.
Now prone to earth his head Bayardo thrust;
Now wheel'd around; now furious spurn'd the dust:
When haughty Sacripant in vain had try'd
Each vary'd art to tame his headstrong pride,
His hand he laid upon the saddle-bow,
And swift alighted on the plain below.

The Pagan, thus escap'd Bayardo's might,
Between the chiefs ensu'd a dreadful fight.

Ver. 44. Against his lord refus'd] In the Orlando Innamorato, Orlando, who had lost his horse Brigliadore, having got possession of Bayardo, and engaging in combat with Rinaldo, a contest arising between them, the horse refuses, in the same manner as here, to fight against his master. B. i. C. xxvi.

"These kind of tales told of the great sagacity of horses, and the love which they bear their masters, have more than poetical warrant for their truth; for historians relate the fame of the horses of Alexander and of Julius Cæsar."

UPTON, Notes on Spenser, B. v. C. iii.

Now
Now high, now low, their rapid steel they ply; While from their arms the fiery sparkles fly!
Not swifter the repeated strokes go round,
Which hollow Ætna’s winding caves resound,
When Vulcan bids the ponderous hammers move,
To forge the thunder and the bolts of Jove.
Sometimes they feign a stroke; sometimes they stay;
Then aim the thrust, as skilful in the play.
Sometimes they rise; then stoop upon the field;
Now open lie; then crouch beneath the shield:
Now ward; then with a slip elude the blow;
Now forward step; then backward from the foe:
Now round they move; and where the one gives place,
The other presses on with eager pace.

Brave Amon’s son *, collecting all his might,
His weapon rais’d to strike the Pagan knight;
When Sacripant, to meet the falchion, held,
Compos’d of bone and steel, his ample shield:
The sword Fufberta, rushing from on high,
Pierc’d the tough plates; the sounding woods reply;

* RINALDO.

Ver. 73. The sword Fufberta, — ] This strange affection of giving names to swords was common with the romance writers:
thus, Joyofa, is the name of Charlemain’s sword, in ASPRA-
MONTE; Chryfaor, is the name of Arthegal’s sword, in Spenfer; Caliburn, of King Arthur’s, in the romance of that name; Alca-lon,
B. II. ORLANDO FURIOUS.

The bone and steel, like ice, in shivers broke; 75
His arm benumb'd confess'd the dreadful stroke.

This,

Ion, of St. George's, in the Seven Champions; Tranchera, of Agrican's, in Boyardo; and in Ariosto, besides Fusberta, we have Rogero's Balifarda, and Orlando's Durindana. In Spenser, Arthur's sword is called Mordure; and his shield or banner, Pridwen, and his spear, Roan, by the romance writers.

In addition to this Note, a Friend has favoured me with the following ingenious remarks:

"To the names of swords may be added Grosfiamae, of archbishop Turpin; Curtana, of Ugero (Oger) the Dane; Hautclere, of Oliver; and Flamberge, of his son Galien.—I have been thinking again on that fanciful custom, among some of the romance writers, of giving names to their heroes' swords; I say some, for I do not recollect an instance of it in all Amadis. The impostor Mahomet left nine swords, each of which had its particular name; so had his other arms, his helmets, his spears, his cuirasses, and his shields. This led me to imagine that this custom was of eastern original, till I found in Geoffry of Monmouth that Julius Caesar's sword was called CROCEA MORS: not that I suppose it really was so called; but if there was a tradition to that purpose among the Britons, the custom of giving names to swords could not well be derived from the east. I have either heard or read, but forget my authority, that a sword is now shewn in the king of Spain's armoury at Madrid, as the very Durindana once wielded by Orlando: and we are told that Richard I. in his passage to Palestine, gave Caliburn, Arthur's sword, to Tancred king of Sicily. Flamberge au vent, is now a French phrase for drawing the sword: and I think that Le Sage, in his

* This phrase is used by Le Sage, in his admirable novel of GR. BLAS.
This, when the fair and fearful damsel view'd,
And well perceiv'd the mischief that ensu'd,
A death-like paleness char'd her rosy bloom,
Like one who trembling waits his fatal doom.
She thinks the time admits of no delay,
And fears that hour to be Rinaldo's prey;
Rinaldo, hateful to her virgin breast,
Though love of her his amorous soul distress'd.
She turn'd her palfrey to the woods in haste,
And through a narrow thorny passage pass'd;
While oft she cast behind her timorous view,
And deem'd she heard Rinaldo close pursuè.
Not far she fled, but where a valley lay,
She met an aged hermit on the way:
His beard descending on his breast was seen,
Severe his aspect, and devout his mien.
He seem'd with years and frequent fasting worn,
And gently on a slow-pac'd ass was borne:
While all his form bespoke a pious mind,
From the vain follies of the world refin'd:

translation of Boyardo, calls Rinaldo's sword, by that name; though, in Galien Rethore, it is appropriated to the sword of Galien, the son of Oliver, which he broke at Roncfvalles, and afterwards made use of Hautclere, the sword of his father, who was killed in that action."
Yet, when the fair and blooming maid appear'd,
So much her looks his drooping spirits cheer'd;
Though cold and feeble, as his age requir'd,
An unknown warmth his languid pulse inspir'd.

Of him the damsel sought the nearest way
To where in port some ready vessel lay,
That there embarking, she might quit the shore,
And never hear Rinaldo mention'd more.

The hermit, vers'd in magic, strove to cheer
The virgin's thoughts, and dissipate her fear;
Drew from his side a book his skill to prove,
With promise every danger to remove.

A leaf he scarce perus'd, when to their sight,
In likeness of a page, appear'd a sprite;
Who, by the force of strong enchantment bound,
Went where the knights in cruel strife he found;
And, when his eyes the furious fight esp'y'd,
Between them boldly rush'd, and loudly cry'd:

Tell me, ye warriors! what avails the strife,
Though either should deprive his foe of life?
If without sword unsheath'd, without the fear
Of shatter'd armour, or the lifted spear,

Ver. 114.—and loudly cry'd:] The poet returns to Angelica.
Book viii. ver. 199.
Orlando now to Paris safe conveys
The maid, whose charms your fond contention raise?
Not hence a mile, the couple I descried,
Whose bitter taunts your empty pains deride.
Attend my counsel — cease your fruitless fight,
And, while occasion serves, pursue their flight:
For know, if Paris' walls they safely gain,
Henceforth your hopes to see your love are vain.

He said: the gallant knights on either hand,
Struck with the news, abashed and silent stand;
Condemning each his judgment and his eyes,
That thus their rival should obtain the prize.

At length, a sigh deep-issuing from his breast,
His steps Rinaldo to his steed addressed;
And vow'd, overcome with anger and disdain,
To glut his vengeance on Orlando slain;
Nor bade farewell, nor with a courteous mind,
He proffer'd once to take the knight behind.

Urg'd by the well-known spur, the fiery steed
Bore all before him that oppos'd his speed:
Nor trench, nor steepy mound, nor thorny shade,
Nor crossing flood, Bayardo's passage stay'd.

Ver. 136. — the knight behind. [We hear again of Sanri-pant in the ivth Book, ver. 313, where he is delivered by Bradamant, with the other knights, from the castle of Atlantes. Deem
Deem it not strange Rinaldo seiz'd again
The generous courser fought so long in vain;
Who, fraught with human sense, when first he view'd
The trembling damsel's flight, her track pursu'd.
Not idly from the Christian camp he fled,
But to regain the maid his master led,
Who then, on foot, a dreadful combat wag'd
With a fierce baron, hand to hand engag'd;
The faithful steed, to guide him where she went,
His course sagacious to the forest bent;
Nor suffer'd yet his generous lord to ride,
Left he should turn him from his path aside.
By him Rinaldo twice the fair o'ertook,
And twice the fair his eager sight forsook:
For first Ferrau, as late my tale disclos'd,
Then Sacripant his amorous hopes oppos'd.
Bayardo now, confiding in the sprite,
Whose specious falsehood had amus'd the knight,
Pursu'd his way, and patient of command,
Obey'd the spur, and answer'd to the hand.
Rinaldo, fir'd with love and stern disdain,
To Paris flies, and gives up all the rein:

So deep the tidings rankled in his thought,
Which the vain phantom of the hermit brought.
Nor ceased his eager journey morn or night,
Till the near city rose before his sight:
Where Charlemain, with his defeated crew,
Th' unhappy remnants of his strength withdrew:
A siege expecting now, he bends his care,
Supplies of stores and forces to prepare.
He sinks the trenches, fortifies the walls,
And every aid, in time of danger, calls;
Provides an embassy to England's shore,
With speed auxiliar provosts to implore;
Resolv'd again to tempt the doubtful field,
And try what war another day might yield:
Then sends Rinaldo to the British clime,
Known by fair England's name in future time.
Sore griev'd the Paladin at this command,
Not that he shunn'd to tread the British land,
But that the hafty charge his prince enjoyn'd,
Bade him, reluctant, leave the fair behind;
Yet, as his duty call'd, he takes his way,
And speeds to Calais, restless of delay,
The knight, impatient to return again,
Against the counsels of the sailor-train,
Tempts
B. II. ORLANDO FURioso. 49

Tempts the black sea, that wears a threatening form,
And, murmuring hoarse, forebodes the future storm.
The wind, who sees the knight his power despise,
In dreadful tempests makes the billows rise,
And with such fury whirls them from below,
That o'er the mast th' insulting waters flow.
The skilful mariners, with busy care,
Strike their broad sails to shun the watery war;
And think th' abandon'd harbour to regain,
Whence, in ill hour, they dar'd to brave the main.
Fools! never hope (the wind indignant cry'd)
Unpunish'd thus my empire to deride!
Raging he speaks, and makes the crew obey
On pain of shipwreck, as he points the way.

Before, behind, unwearied howls the blast:
With humble sails the wandering vessel pass'd,
Now here, now there, amidst the watery waste.

But since a web so various I prepare,
Where every thread by turns demands my care,
I leave Rinaldo in the stormy main,
And turn to noble Bradamant the strain:

The warlike virgin, whose resolute might
Had from his courser thrown Circassia's knight.

Nor Charlemain, or joyful France, survey'd
With less delight the valour of the maid,
Than the known prowess of Rinaldo's arms,
Such martial fire her daring bosom warms!
To her a gentle youth affection bore,
Who came with Agramant from Afric's shore;
Whom Agolant's unhappy daughter bred,
The vigorous offspring of Rogero's bed;

And

Ver. 214. To her a gentle youth — ] For the loves of Rogero and Bradamant, see General View of Boyardo's Story.

Ver. 216. Whom Agolant's unhappy daughter — ] For the genealogy of Rogero, take the following fictitious account from Boyardo.

"After the Grecians had taken Troy, and put most of their prisoners to the sword, among whom was Polyxena, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who was sacrificed at the tomb of Achilles; in order entirely to extirpate the race of Hector, they fought for Astyanax; but Andromache, to preserve his life, concealed him in a sepulchre, and took another child in her arms, with whom being found, they were both put to death. In the mean time, the real Astyanax was safely conveyed, by a friend of his father, to the island of Sicily, when, being grown to man's estate, he conquered Corinth and Argos; he established a government at Messina, and married the queen of Syracuse, but was afterwards killed by treachery, and his widow, being driven from the city by the Greeks,
And she, nor nurs'd in wilds, nor savage-born,
Receiv'd not love like his with maiden scorn;
Though fortune yet had giv'n the dame and knight
But once to speak and meet each other's fight.

Now Bradamant explores with fond desire
Her lover, call'd Rogero from his fire;
And unaccompany'd securely far'd,
As if a thousand squadrons were her guard.

Soon as her arm had cast in single fight,
Low on his mother earth Circaffia's knight;
A wood she travers'd, then a mountain pass'd,
And to a limpid river came at last,
That through the meads its gentle current drew;
Where ancient trees with spreading branches grew.
A pleasing noise the murm'ring waters made,
Inviting swains to drink beneath the shade:

Greeks, took shelter in Rifa, where she was delivered of a son named Polydore, from whom descended Clovis and Constantius. Constantius was the head of the line of Pepin, father of Charlemain; and from Clovis came Rogero, who married Galicella, daughter of Agolant: Rogero, being cruelly murdered, and his city destroyed, his wife fled to the coast of Africa, where she was delivered of two children, a boy and a girl, and died soon after: the boy, called Rogero, was brought up by Atlantes, a magician.

See Orlando Innam. B. ii. C. i. &c.
A rising hillock on the left was seen,
That fence'd from noon-tide heat the cheerful green.

Here, as the virgin turn'd her eyes aside,
On the fair bank a comely youth she spy'd:
Fast by the margin of the flood he lay,
The margin with a thousand colours gay.
Alone and silent in a pensive mood,
With steadfast gaze the crystal stream he view'd:
Not distant far a tree his courser held,
Aloft were hung his helmet and his shield:
His eyes were moist with tears, his head declin'd,
Sad indications of a troubled mind.

Urg'd by desire which prompts each generous heart
In others woes to bear a friendly part,
The virgin begs th' afflicted knight to show
His secret state, and whence his sorrows flow:
To whom the stranger all his grief display'd,
Mov'd with the courteous speeches of the maid,
And by her looks misled, that seem'd to tell
Some gallant warrior prov'd in battle well.

Thus he—Know, gentle knight, a valiant crew
Of horse and foot, in aid of Charles, I drew,
When near Pyrene's hills the Christian force
Encamp'd t' oppose Marfilius in his course.
With me a damsel went, for whom my breast
Had long the powerful fire of love confess'd:
When, lo! we saw near Rhodan's rapid tide
A knight all-armed a flying steed bestride.
Soon as the robber (whether hellish sprite
That with a human form deceiv'd the sight,
Or mortal both) beheld my blooming fair,
Swift as a falcon through the yielding air,
He flew, and seiz'd her trembling with dismay,
Then bore her sudden in his arms away;
Unconscious of my loss, till with surprise
I heard in air her lamentable cries.
So from the clouds descends the ravening kite,
And gripes the chicken in his mother's sight.
What could I do, alas! encompass'd round
With steepy mountains and a rocky ground?
His courser flew, when mine, oppress'd with toil,
Could scarcely move amidst the stony soil.
Wild with my fate, I rov'd with frantic mind,
Careless of life, and left my men behind:
Thence turning o'er the craggy deserts stray'd,
While love's blind impulse blindly I obey'd.

Ver. 261. — a flying steed — The fiction of this griffin-horse is Ariosto's own, nothing like it occurring in Boyardo.
Five tedious days, from morn to eve, I pass'd.
O'er many a pendent cliff and horrid waste;
A pathless way, uncultur'd and forlorn,
Where not a track of human feet was worn,
At length a wild and lonely vale I found,
With hills and dreadful caves encompass'd round.
Here, in the midst, a wondrous rock I view'd,
On which a strong and stately castle stood:
It seem'd afar to shine like glowing flame;
Nor harden'd earth, nor stone compos'd the frame,
As nearer to the mountain's base we drew,
The beauteous pile more struck my raptur'd view.
This fort, the demons, from th' infernal plains
By fuming incense drawn and magic strains,
Enclos'd with steel, to which the Stygian wave,
And Stygian fire eternal temper gave:
A dazzling polish brighten'd every tower,
Which spots could ne'er defile nor rust devour.
The robber scours the country day and night,
Then, with his prey, he thither bends his flight:
Thither my fair, my better part he bore,
And never, never must I view her more!
What hope remain'd! In vain with longing eyes,
I see the place where all my treasure lies!
The rock so high and steep, who enters there,
Must learn to wing his passage through the air. 305
So when the mother-fox, with anguish stung,
Hears in the eagle's nest her crying young;
She circles round the tree, with wild affright,
No wings vouchsaf'd her for so vast a flight.

While in suspense I stood, from far I spy'd 310
Two champions and a dwarf that seem'd their guide;
These with the hopes of praise had fir'd their mind,
But soon these hopes dissolv'd in empty wind.
They both were warriors of established fame:
A monarch one, Gradasso was his name;
The other was a youth of courage prov'd,
Rogero, in Biserta's court belov'd.

They come (declar'd the dwarf) to try their power
Against the lord of this enchanted tower,
Who through the air, enclos'd in armour bright, 320
Directs his wondrous courser's rapid flight.
Then I — Vouchsafe, O generous knights! to hear
A wretch's fond complaints with pitying ear.

Ver 311. Two champions and a dwarf — J Boyardo tells us, that after the deliverance of Orlando, Gradasso and Rogero were led by a dwarf to an adventure of a castle, which seems to be the story here continued by our poet.

See Orlando Innam. B. iii. C. vi, vii.
And if in fight your arms victorious prove, 325
(As sure I trust they shall) restore my love.
Then all my griefs I spoke; while tears that roll'd
Down my wan cheek, confirm'd the tale I told.

With courteous words they answer'd my request,
And down the mountain to the castle press'd:
Aloof I stood the battle to survey,
Beseaching Heaven to aid the doubtful day.

Meanwhile the warriors to the rock drew nigh,
Disputing who should first th' adventure try.
At length Gradasso (whether lots design'd,
Or else Rogero to his will inclin'd) 335
Lifts to his mouth the horn: the cliffs around,
The rock and fortress to the noise resound!
When, lo! the magic knight, with instant speed,
Rush'd from the portal on the flying steed.
At first he seems by slow degrees to rise:
Like cranes, prepar'd to fail to foreign skies,
Till, with collected wind, at once they spring
Aloft in air, and shoot upon the wing.
With such a flight the necromancer towers,
That scarce so high th' ethereal eagle soars!
But, when he sees his 'vantage best below,
With closing pinions on th' unwary foe,
He sinks precipitate—as from above
Descends the manag'd falcon on the dove.
And ere Gradasso can perceive his flight,
He feels the spear with dreadful strength alight:
The spear breaks short; Gradasso strikes again;
But furious strikes the yielding air in vain.
The stern magician fearless on the wind
Ascending, leaves the champions far behind.
The good Alfana, with the force oppress'd,
Reclin'd on earth awhile the shock confess'd;
Alfana was the mare Gradasso rein'd,
The fairest beast that ever knight sustain'd.
And now the forc'er mounts the starry skies,
Then wheels around, and down again he flies;
Now on Rogero falls, who seeks to bring
His needful succour to th' astonish'd king.
The swift assault disturbs the youthful knight,
While scarce his horse supports th' unequal fight;
And when he turns to strike, he sees the foe
Ride on the clouds and mock the frustrate blow.

Ver. 356. The good Alfana,—] Alfana, the name of a wild breeding mare. It was very unusual for the knights in romance to make use of mares, esteeming it derogatory from their dignity; but Gradasso is said to have taken an oath, never to mount a horse till he could get possession of Bayardo, Rinaldo's horse.
In ample circles round he steers his course,
And threatening one, on t' other bends his force:
No pause he gives, but rushing by surprize,
Confounds their senses, and distracts their eyes.

Thus did these three the doubtful strife maintain,
That high in air, these lowly on the plain;
Till rising night her dusky veil display'd,
And wrapt each object in surrounding shade.

Think not my words in artful fiction dreft,
Whate'er I speak was to my view confest:
Yet, with reluctance now, my tongue declares
A tale that such a face of falsehood wears.

On his left arm the foe was seen to wield,
Closed in a silken case, a mighty shield;
Whose polish'd orb, whene'er reveal'd to fight,
The gazer strikes with such a powerful light;
In death-like slumber on the ground he lies,
And to the foe becomes an easy prize!
Bright as Pyropus shines the buckler's blaze;
No mortal e'er beheld such dazzling rays:

Ver. 386. Bright as Pyropus — ] Prince Arthur's shield in Spenser is something of this kind, which is always kept covered with a veil.

And prone on earth each knight was senseless laid.

The same to wight he never wont disclose,
But when as monsters huge he would dismay,
Or daunt unequal armies of his foes;
Or when the flying heav'n's he would affray:
For so exceeding thone his glistening ray,
That Phœbus' golden face it did attaint,
As when a cloud his beams doth over-lay, &c.

FAIRY QUEEN, B. i. C. vii.

Prince Arthur, being engaged with the Soldan, discover'd his shield, in order to dazzle the eyes of the Soldan's horses.

At last from his victorious shield he drew
The veil, which did his pow'rful light enmeach,
And coming full before his horses' view,
As they upon him press'd, it plain to them did shew.
Like lightning flash that hath the gazer burn'd,
So did the sight thereof their sense dismay,
That back again upon themselves they turn'd,
And with their rider ran perforce away, &c.

B. v. C. viii.

Perhaps, as Mr. Upton observes, the original may be found in the Ægis of the Greeks.

Phœbus himself the rushing battle led;
A veil of clouds involv'd his radiant head:
High held before him, Jove's enormous shield
Portentous thone, and shaded all the field.
Like theirs, a sudden sleep my senses bound; 390
But when, at length, recovering from the ground
I rose, and fought the knights and dwarf again;
Dark was the mount and desolate the plain!
Th' unpitying foe had seiz'd the hapless pair,
And borne them to his castle through the air. 395
Thus by the light, that o'er their eyes he spread,
Their liberty is gone, my hopes are fled!
Then from the place despairing I withdrew,
But ere I parted took a last adieu:

Now

Vulcan to Jove th' immortal gift confign'd,
To scatter hosts, and terrify mankind.

Again—
As long as Phoebus bore unmov'd the shield,
Sate doubtful conquest hov'ring o'er the field:
But when aloft he shakes it in the skies,
Shouts in their ears, and lightens in their eyes,
Deep horror seizes ev'ry Grecian breast, &c.

POPE'S Iliad, B. iv. ver. 348—360.

Ver. 395. And borne them to his castle—] The idea of this castle seems to be taken from the ORLANDO INFAMORATO, where we meet with a garden, made by Atlantes, on the summit of a rock, on mount Carenz, in Africa, surrounded with a wall of glass, in which he kept Roger, to preserve him from the evil influence of his stars.

Ver. 398. Then from the place—] The allegory of the shield and castle is thus explained by the Italian commentators. The shield shews, how the eyes of the understanding

Who, like his race for wicked actions known,
Increas'd his kindred vices by his own.
The warlike virgin with attention stood,

A sudden gladness in her looks appear'd;
But when she found a base magician's power

Her pitying bosom glow'd with anxious pain,
And oft she begg'd to hear the tale again.

And shall I, then, your luckless feet to guide;
Again those mountains pass? (the youth reply'd)
For me, indeed, but little were the smart
To toil my body, having lost my heart.
Yet why should you steep rocks and barren plains
Thus rashly tread, to purchase lavish chains?
Hence, warn'd in time, if evil chance ensues,
Not me unjustly, but yourself accuse.

Thus having said, he mounts without delay
To lead the noble damsel on the way;
Who for Rogero means the fight to prove,
And hazard life or freedom for her love.

When lo! a messenger that swiftly rode,
Pursu'd them close behind, and call'd aloud:
The same, who told king Sacripant the force
Of Bradamant had hurl'd him from his horse;
Who from Montpelier and Narbona came,
With sudden tidings to the martial dame,
That all the land was kindled with alarms,
And all the coast of Acquamort in arms:

That,
That, losing her, their safety and their guard, Marsilie was for the foes but ill prepar'd;
And, by this message, with their fears dismay'd, Implor'd her counsel and immediate aid.

Struck with the virtues of her dauntless mind, The king to Amon's daughter had assign'd This town, and all for many miles, that lay 'Twixt Vare and Rodon stretching to the sea.

These tidings heard, a doubtful pause ensued, And undetermin'd for awhile she stood: On that side honour and her friends assail'd; On this the stronger fires of love prevail'd.
At length resolv'd to end the task design'd, And free Rogero in the tower confin'd; Or, if her enterprize successless prov'd, Remain a prisoner with the youth she lov'd; The damsel first excuse'd a short delay, Then sent the messenger well-pleas'd away.

Now, turning round, her former path she took; Her Pinabel pursu'd with alter'd look; Conscious her lineage to that house she ow'd, For which he ever nourish'd hate avow'd; And anxious fears perplex'd his troubled mind, Left she should know him of Maganza's kind.
An ancient feud between these houses reign'd,
And both the strife and hatred still maintain'd;
Full oft oppos'd in stern debate they stood,
And dy'd the ground beneath with mutual blood.
For this the caitiff bent his thoughts to frame
Some treason to deceive th' unwary dame.
    Such various passions had disturb'd his breast,
With enmity, with doubts and fears poss'd,
Unheeding where he pass'd, he left his way,
And through a gloomy forest chanc'd to stray;
Where in the midst a steepy mount appear'd,
That in a craggy rock its summit rear'd.
Meanwhile the dame of Clarmont's noble kind,
With heedful steps pursu'd the knight behind.
    When Pinabel beheld the dusky shade,
He ponder'd in his thoughts to leave the maid;
And thus began—While yet we view the light,
'Twere best to seek a shelter from the night:
Beyond that hill, unless my mem'ry fail,
There stands a stately castle in the vale:
Here patient wait, while from yon height I try
T' explore the prospect with a furer eye.
    So saying, to the hill he bent his course,
And up the steepy summit spurr'd his horse;
    Thence,
Thence, looking round, he sought some path to take,
By which he might the damsel's track forfake:
When sudden here a monstrous cave he found,
Hewn out with labour in the stony ground:
Full thirty cubits deep it seem'd in show:
A fair and lofty gate appear'd below,
Which, by its ample structure, seem'd design'd
For entrance to some larger place behind,
And through the shade a glimmering brightness gave,
As of a torch that burnt within the cave.

While here in deep suspense the traitor stood,
The cautious virgin, who his steps pursu'd,
Fearful to lose the track, still kept in view
Her faithless guide, and near the cavern drew.
His first design thus foil'd, a sudden thought
Of treacherous purpose in his bosom wrought:
He makes the damsel from her steed alight,
And, pointing out the cavern to her sight,
Tells her within its confines he had seen,
A dame of beauteous face and graceful mien;
Whose courtly looks and costly garments show'd:
Her birth deriv'd from no ignoble blood:
But from her eyes she pour'd a tender shower,
And seem'd her lost condition to deplore.
And when he thought t' attain a nearer view,
And learn the cause from which her grief she drew,
One from the inner grot with fury came,
And seizing carry'd off the weeping dame.

The dauntless Bradamant, whose generous mind,
Unconscious of the wile the wretch design'd,
With ardor glow'd to give the fair one aid,
Revolves how best she may the cave invade;

When on a lofty elm she cast her eyes,
And midst the boughs a mighty breach espies:
This with her sword she hews, and lops the leaves,
That done, the cavern's mouth the pole receives.
She prays her treacherous guide aloft to stand,
And grasp the end, tenacious, in his hand.
Now first within the cave her feet descend,
While as she sinks, her arms her weight suspend:
When Pinabello, scoffing, ask'd the maid
To leap below—then loo'sd his grasp, and said:

Ver. 523: Revolves how best she may the cave invade.] One of the most favourite achievemens of the knights of old was to search into caverns, where they met with many wonderful adventures. Thus Don Quixote descends into the cave of Montesinos, and, at his return, relates many extravagant incidents, which his distempered imagination had furnished him with, in the true spirit of romance.

DON QUIXOTE, Part ii. C. xxii.
O! wou'd that all thy race with thee were join'd,
That thus I might at once destroy the kind.

But happier fortune than the traitor meant,
All gracious Heaven, to save the guiltless, sent:
The pole first lighted on the ground below,
And instant shiver'd with the forceful blow;
Yet thus the fury of the shock sustaine'd,
That Bradamant preserv'd from death remain'd.

The sudden fall awhile surpris'd the maid,
As in th' ensuing book is full display'd.

THIRD BOOK

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO.
THE ARGUMENT.

BRADAMANT, deceived by Pinabello, finds herself in Merlin's cave, where she meets with Meliffa, who shews to her, in vision, all her descendants that were to make a figure in history. In this passage the poet pays a compliment to the most illustrious Italian families. Meliffa then instructs Bradamant how to deliver Rogero from the castle in which he was confined by Atlantes, and dismisses her.

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO.

What power will teach me lofty words to find
For the great subject that inflames my mind?
What power will lend my venturous muse a wing
In tuneful lays my high conceits to sing?
A vigour mightier far must here be shown
Than e'er my swelling bosom yet has known:

Ver. 1. What power will teach — ] This invocation of Ariosto is apparently translated by Spenser in his Fairy Queen:

Who now shall give unto me words and sound
Equal unto this haughty enterprize?
Or who shall lend me wings, with which from ground
My lowly verse may loftily arise,
And lift itself unto the highest skies?
This verse my patron claims, which dares to trace
The fountain whence he draws his glorious race!

Amidst th' illustrious chiefs by fate design'd
With righteous government to bless mankind, 10
O Phœbus! you, whose eye the world surveys,
Ne'er view'd a line like this, whose deathless praise,
In peace and war, shall fill the lips of fame;
Whose blooming honours shall endure the same,
(Or vain the light prophetic in my soul) 15
While Heaven, unchanging, whirls around the pole.
To blazon all their virtues would require
Not my weak lute, but that immortal lyre,
On which, the giants quell'd, you sung above
The grateful praises of eternal Jove!

More ample spirit than hitherto was wont
Here needs me, whiles the famous ancestries
Of my most dreaded sovereign I recount,
By which all earthly princes she doth far surmount.

Again ——

Argument worthy of Meeonian quill,
Or rather worthy of great Phœbus' rote,
Whereon the ruins of great Offa hill,
And triumphs of Phlegrean Jove he wrote.

B. ii. C. x.

O! should
O! should you here the wish'd-for aid impart,
And to the subject raise the sculptor's art;
Each noble image shall my fancy fill,
To challenge all my genius, all my skill;
Then what at first I may but roughly trace,
By slow degrees shall ripen into grace;
Till crown'd by you, I see with joyful eyes
Each labour'd form to full perfection rise.

But let the muse to him the story bend
Whose breast, nor shield, nor cuirass could defend;
The treacherous Pinabel, who hop'd in vain
With murderous guile the damsel to have slain.
The traitor deem'd her in the cavern dead,
And, with a visage pale through guilty dread,
The place, polluted by his crime, forsook,
Then instant speeding back, his courser took:
That every action might his soul betray,
He with him bears the virgin's steed away.

But leave we him, who while his craft is shown
To seek another's fall, procures his own;
And turn to her, who nearly escap'd the doom,
In one sad hour to find her death and tomb.

Soon as the maid again from earth was rais’d,
With the hard shock and sudden fall amaz’d,
She enter’d boldly through the gate, which gave 45
An entrance to the second, larger cave.
The building, square within, and spacious, made,
A stately temple to the light display’d.
Magnificent the sumptuous pile appear’d,
On pillars fair of alabaster rear’d.
An altar in the midst; and kindled bright,
A lamp before, cast round a trembling light.

Soon as the damsel view’d, with pious mind,
This sacred place for holy rites design’d,
Devoutly on her knees the earth she press’d,
And to the king of Heaven her prayers address’d.
Meantime a sudden jarring sound was heard,
When from a narrow gate a dame appear’d,
Ungirt, with feet unsod, with hair display’d,
Who, by her name address’d the warrior-maid. 60

And thus, O generous Bradamant! (he said)
Not without Heaven’s appointment hither led:

Ver. 58. — a dame appear’d, ] Melissa, an enchantress; a character introduced by Ariosto, who, throughout the poem, interests herself in all the concerns of Rogero and Bradamant.
Merlin foretold, that by a passage new
Thou shouldst, descending here, his relics view;
And hence I stay'd, to set before thy eyes
The glorious fate predestin'd in the skies.
Behold this ancient cave, by Merlin wrought,
Merlin, in every art of magic taught:
Here with bewitching looks, and wiles prepar'd,
The lady of the lake his heart ensnarl'd.

Ver. 67. — by Merlin wrought, ] According to Jeffery of Monmouth, the famous magician Merlin was born at Caermardin, i.e. Caermarthen, named by Ptolemy Maridunun. Merlin's mother, who was a niece and daughter of the king of Demetia, (or South Wales) giving an account of her wonderful conception of her son, a philosopher explains it, that it was some demon, or incubus, "some guileful spright," partaking partly of the nature of man, partly of angels, and assuming a human shape, which begot Merlin; and this explains what Ariosto says, that Merlin was the son of a demon.

Di Merlin dicco, del demonio figlio.

Drayton, in his Polyalbion, song V. thus sings of Merlin, who was born at Caermarden:

Of Merlin and his skill what region doth not hear?
Who of a British nymph was gotten, whilst she play'd
With a seducing spirit ———
His sepulchre is here, whose womb contains
The deathless spirit, and decay'd remains:
To this he by her blandishments was led,
And what receiv'd alive, detains him dead.

Thus Spenser, ——
And sooth men say that he was not the son
Of mortal fire, or other living wight,
But wond'rously begotten and begun,
By false illusion of a guileful sprite
On a fair lady ——

Fairy Queen, B. iii. C. iii.

It is said that Merlin intended to build a wall of brass round Maridunum; and so says Drayton, Polyalbion, song IV.

How Merlin by his skill and magic's wond'rous might
From Ireland hither brought the Stonendge in a night;
And for Caermarden's sake would fain have brought to pass
About it to have built a wall of solid brass;
And set his fiends to work upon the mighty frame;
Some to the anvil; some that still enforce'd the flame;
But whilst it was in hand, by loving of an elf
(For all his wond'rous skill) was cozen'd by himself.
For walking with his say, her to the rock he brought
In which he oft before his necromancies wrought,
And going in thereat his magics to have shewn,
She stopp'd the cavern's mouth with an enchanted stone:
Whose cunning strongly crost, amaz'd whilst he did stand,
She captive him convey'd into the fairy land.
Then how the lab'ring spirits to rocks by fetters bound,
With bellows rumbling groans, and hammers thund'ring sound
A fearful

Till the last trump the fatal angel blows:
Then shall the just award his deeds requite,
With sin polluted, or with virtue white.

A fearful horrid din still in the earth do keep,
Their master to awake, suppos'd by them to sleep;
As at their work how still the grieved spirits repine,
Tormented in the fire, and tired in the mine.

Spenser again,

—— A little while,

Before that Merlin dy'd, he did intend
A brazen wall in compass to compile
About Caermarthen, and did it commend
Unto his spights to bring to perfect end;
During which time the lady of the lake,
Whom long he lov'd, for him in haste did send,
Who therefore forc'd his workmen to forfake,
Them bound till his return, their labour not to flake.

In the mean time by that false lady's train,
He was surpriz'd and bury'd under bier,
Ne ever to his work return'd again, &c.

B. iii. C. iii.

This lady of the lake appears to have been a fairy or nymph, with whom Merlin was enamoured: the story of her deceiving him is thus related in the romance called Morte Arthur, or the life and death of prince Arthur, printed by Caxton in 1485.
His voice survives, and oft is heard to come
In tuneful music from the marble tomb.

To all that question, is his wisdom shown;
He tells the past, and makes the future known:

"The lady of the lake and Merlin departed; and by the way, as they went, Merlin shewed to her many wonders, and came into Cornwall: And alwaies laid about the lady for to have her favour; and she was ever passing weary of him, and fain would have been delivered of him; for she was afraid of him, because he was a divells sonne, and she could not put him away by no meanes. And so, upon a time it hapned that Merlin shewed to her in a rock where was a great wonder, and wrought by enchantment, which went under a stone, so by her craft and working she made Merlin to go under that stone, to let him wit of the marvailes there. But she wrought so there for him, that he came never out, for all the craft that he could doe."

But in the life of Merlin, this adventure is related with circumstances nearer the account given by our author.

"Merlin’s mother having secretly conceived by a demon, was, after her delivery, condemned to be put to death, for breach of chastity; but her son, an infant, defended, and set his mother at liberty. Merlin being grown up, went to the court of Uther Pendragon, where he established the famous round table, wrought many wonderful works, and uttered a number of prophecies; here he fell in love with the lady of the lake, whom he used to call the white serpent; before his death, he erected a tomb, in the forest forest of Nortes, capable to hold him and his mistrefs; and having shewed it her, he taught her a charm that would close the stone, so that it could never be opened. The lady, who secretly hated him, began one day to care for him exceedingly, and at last made him go into the tomb, in order to try whether it was large enough: Merlin being entered, she closed the stone upon him, where he died: his spirit being likewise confined by the force of the spell, continued from time to time to speak, and to give answers to such questions as were put to him."

We shall quote one more passage of Spenser, where he gives a noble description of the cave, which was the scene of Merlin's incantations. Britomart, and her nurse old Glauce, go to consult this magician:

To Maridunum, that is now by change
Of name Cayr Marin call'd, they took their way;
There the wise Merlin whilom went, they say,
To make his wonne, low underneath the ground,
In a deep delve, far from the view of day,
That of no living wight he mote be found,
When so he counsell'd with his sprites encompass'd round.

And if thou ever happen that same way
To travel, go to see that dreadful place:
It is an hideous, hollow cave, they say,
Under a rock that lies a little space

From
She said, and Amon's daughter, while she spoke,
With silence heard, amazement in her look;
When casting on the ground her bashful eyes.
She to the dame with modest grace replies:

> Alas!

> From the swift Barry, tumbling down apace,
> Emongst the woody hills of Dynevoure;
> But dare thou not, I charge, in any case,
> To enter into that same baleful bower,
> For fear the cruel fiends should thee unwares devour.

> But standing high aloft, low lay thine ear,
> And there such ghastly noise of iron chains,
> And brazen cauldrons thou shalt rumbling hear,
> Which thoufand fprights with long enduring pains
> Do toils, that it will stun thy feeble brains;
> And oftentimes great groans, and grievous founds,
> When too huge toil and labour them confrains:
> And oftentimes loud strokes, and ringing sounds
> From under that deep rock most horribly rebounds.

B. iii. C. iii.

This description is not entirely the fiction of the poet, as there are sufficient vouchers to produce for the truth of the story. "In a rock in the island of Barry, in Glamorganshire, there is a narrow chink or cleft, to which if you put your ear, you shall perceive all such sort of noises, as you may fancy smiths at work under ground; strokes of hammers, blowing of bellows, grinding of tools, &c." See Cambden's Britannia. Drayton, in the above lines, alludes to this story of the lady of the lake, and to this marvellous cave.
B. III. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Alas! what praise has my unworthy name,
That prophets my arrival should proclaim?

Then rapt with joy at such a blest event,
Silent she follow'd where the matron went,
Slow leading to the tomb, in which detain'd
The ghost of Merlin with his bones remain'd.

Hard was the polish'd marble, smooth and bright,
And like a ruddy flame dispell'd the night,
Though here the sun refus'd his cheering light.

Whether some marble, by its nature, shows
A beam, that like a torch in darkness glows:
Or else by verse, and fumigating powers,
Or signs impref't in planetary hours,
(As best may seem) this wonder was compos'd;
The luftre many a pleasing sight disclos'd;
Pictures and statues, that with various grace,
In order rang'd, adorn'd the sacred place.

Ariosto, with the liberty of a romance-writer, places Merlin's grot in France, and removes the scene of several of his actions to that place."

See UPTON and WARTON's Observations on Spensier.

Not far from Caermarthen, is a hill called Merlin's hill, near the brow of which, is a rock, known by the name of Merlin's chair, in which it is said, that famous prophet used to sit, when he uttered his prophecies.
ORLANDO FURIOSO. B. III.

Scarce o'er the threshold pass'd the warrior-dame,
And to the cavern's deep recesses came,
When from the breathless clay with pleasing strain,
T' accost the fair the spirit thus began.

May fortune all thy just endeavours aid,
O ever chaste, and ever honour'd maid!
From whose glad womb must spring the fruitful race
That Italy, and all the world shall grace!

That ancient blood, which once in Ilium shin'd,
By the two noblest streams in thee conjoin'd,
The joy, the flower of every race shall yield,
Between the Danube and the Nile reveal'd,
The Tagus and the Ind, or all that lies
Between Calisto and th' Antarctic skies.

Hence chiefs shall rise, and many a valiant knight,
Who with their counsel, and their arms in fight,

Ver. 116. That ancient blood, — ] Rogero and Bradamant, both descended from Astyanax: Rogero, son to Rogero of Rifa, and Bradamant, niece to Charlemain. See note on B. ii.
Ver. 216.

Ver. 119. — the Danube and the Nile — ] The Danube, a river in Germany; the Nile, a river in Egypt; the Tagus, a river in Portugal; the Ind, or Indus, a river in India, whence the country receives its name: By the Antarctic skies, is meant the south pole; and by Calisto, the north, being a constellation in that part of the heavens.

Shall
Shall on their Italy devolve their fame,
And spread in war the glory of her name.
Then righteous monarchs shall the sceptre hold,
Who, as the sage Augustus rul'd of old,
Or godlike Numa, with their gentle reign
Shall bring on earth the golden age again.
Hence to fulfil what Heaven has long decreed,
For which 'tis doom'd thou shalt Rogero wed,
Boldly pursue the ardor of thy soul,
Nor think that aught can thy desires control;
For he who keeps thy knight in captive bands,
Shall sink oppressed beneath thy conquering hands.
Here ceas'd the voice; the matron now prepares
To shew to Bradamant her destin'd heirs.
A crew of spirits, summon'd by the dame,
Appear'd, (but well I know not whence they came)
Together now assembled in the place,
But differing each in habit, and in face.
Then, in the temple, by her side she plac'd
The warlike fair, but first a circle trac'd;
And, to defend her from the spirits, spread
A magic covering o'er the virgin's head:
She bade her silent stand, then op'd a book,
In which she read, and with the demons spoke.
Lo! from the outward cave they rush'd to view,
And, thickening, round the sacred circle drew;
But all attempts to enter fruitless found,
As if a fosse or rampart stretch'd around.
Then in the cavern, where the shining tomb
Contain'd the holy relics in its womb,
The demons enter'd, when, in order due,
They thrice had past around in fair review.

Should I (th' enchantress thus bespoke the dame)
Attempt to tell the deeds, and every name
Of these, who by their shadowy phantoms rise
Before their birth, to pass before your eyes,
The hours were short the story to repeat,
Nor could one night the mighty talk compleat;
And hence, as time may serve, my lips shall tell
Those chiefs alone whose virtues most excel.

Behold the first, thy likeness form'd to bear
In comely countenance and graceful air;
In Italy the leader of thy race,
Sprung from Rogero's, and from thy embrace.

Ver. 164. Behold the first, — ] It is to be observed, that this account of the descent of Rogero is fictitious; since Rizieri of Risa, (or as he is here called Rogero) left no son; and this Rizieri, the first Paladin, lived a considerable time before Charlemain. Dolce.
I deem to see by his victorious hand
Maganza's treacherous blood deftain the land;
To see his justice claim the vengeance due
From those, whose guile his noble father flew.
By him shall Desiderius be repell'd,
Who last in Lombardy the sceptre held.
The emp'ror shall his valiant deeds repay
With Calaon and Este's lordly sway.
Behold thy grandson next, Uberto near,
The glory of Hesperia's land in war!

Ver. 168.—by his victorious hand] The father of this Rogero was said to have been traiterously murdered by the tribe of Maganza, when this son, growing up, was made general in the service of Charlemain, and revenged the death of his father. At this time Desiderius XXII. and last king of Lombardy, rebelled against the church; when pope Adrian calling in the assistance of Charlemain, Desiderius was constrained to shut himself up in Pavia, and was afterwards driven into Lyons in France. In this service Rogero is said to have distinguished himself, and to have been rewarded by the emperor with the government of Este and Calaon, two castles in the jurisdiction of Padua.

Ver. 176.—Uberto near] Uberto was count of Este and Comacchio: he is said to have treated his subjects as his children, and to have preserved their obedience, rather by the affection which his indulgence excited in them, than by any severe exertion of his authority.
He shall his arms against the Moors extend,
And from their rage the holy church defend.
Survey Alberto, fam'd for warlike toils,
Who decks the temples with unnumber'd spoils.
Hugo appears with him, his valiant son,
Who plants his conquering snakes in Milan's town.
The next is Azo, who, his brother dead,
Shall o'er th' Infubrians his dominion spread.

Ver 180. Survey Alberto,—] Berengarius I. having besieged and taken Milan, Alberto headed an army and defeated him:
Hugo, son of Alberto, afterwards acquired the dominion of Milan, and planted his standard there, in which was painted a dragon or serpent. Otho, a valiant leader of that family, in the holy war of Jerusalem, under Godfrey, slew Volucius, a Saracen captain, who wore on his crest a serpent devouring a child; hence his descendants took a serpent for their arms.

Tasso, in his catalogue of warriors, mentions this Otho:

—Otho fierce, whose valour won the shield
That bears a child and serpent on its field.

B. i. ver. 417.

Ver. 184. The next is Azo, who,—] Azo I. who succeeded his brother Uberto in the government of Milan, till, to avoid the snares laid for him by Berengarius, he fled to Otho I. duke of Saxony, Anno 938, taking with him his wife big with child.

See!
See! Albertazo, who with counsel sage
Shall Berengarius and his son engage;
Well worthy to receive from Otho’s hands
His daughter Alda, pledg’d in nuptial bands.
Another Hugo see! O virtue known,
When the fire’s courage dies not with the son!

Ver. 186. See! Albertazo, who — ] Of three Berengarius’s, who deriving their origin from the kings of Lombardy, had the title of emperor, this, who was the third, coming into Italy with his son, at the head of a great army, seiz’d the government, after the death of Lotharius, and reigned eleven years, fliling himself emperor, and his son king of Italy. He made war against Atone, lord of Cannoffa, and besieged him three successive years, till the latter being ready to surrender him­self, was, through the advice of Albertazo, succour’d by Otho, king of the Germans; when Berengarius and his son were vanquish’d and confined, one in Austria, and the other in Constantinople, where they died miserably. Albertazo, for his virtue and good counsel, espous’d Alda, Otho’s daughter: others say, that he obtained her for his gallant behaviour at a tournament, which the emperor gave in Transilvania.

Ver. 190. Another Hugo see! — ] Gregory V. who had been made pope through the interposition of Otho III. being insulted by the Romans at the instigation of Crescentius, fled to the emperor; whereupon Crescentius elected another pope, who hearing that Otho had made Hugo general of his army, retired with Crescentius into the castle of St. Angelo: they were both taken and put to death by Hugo, who having re­
Tis he, who shall, with justice on his side,
Abate the rancour of the Roman pride:
To Otho and the Pope assistance give,
(Otho the third) and from their foes relieve. 195
See Fulco, who forfakes th' Italian fields
And to his brother each possession yields;
While thence he goes, with better fate to gain
A mighty dukedom on the German plain.
He props the honours of the Saxon race,
Which shall at length himself and offspring grace.
Azo the second is the next in right,
More fam'd for gentle peace than rugged fight.

On placed Gregory in the papal chair, that pontiff made a decree, that the emperor should in future be elected from the barons of Germany. Hugo, having lived with great honour, died at Pistoia: to him Otho, as a reward of his merit, gave the government of all Tuscany; though some authors affirm to the contrary.

Ver. 196. See Fulco, who forfakes — ] Of Albertazo and Alda were born Hugo and Fulco: after the death of the emperor Otho, who, before he came to the empire, was duke of Saxony, his daughter Alda succeeded to that dutchy: whereupon Fulco resigned to his brother all his patrimony in Italy, and went into Saxony to succeed to his mother's inheritance, where he made himself duke of Saxony.

By this shall second Henry be subdued,
And Parma's meadows stream with Belgian blood:
By that the glorious countess shall be led,
(The chaste Matilda) to his bridal bed;
From mighty Henry sprung, who brings in dower
With her one half Italia to his power.

enemy to the church, compelled pope Gregory VII. to sell the benefices: at that time the countess Matilda, widow of Godfrey, a powerful lord, and grand-daughter of Henry I. and governess of many places, took the part of the church. Rodolpho, duke of Saxony, was made emperor in opposition to Henry, and a battle fought near Parma with great slaughter of the Belgians, when Henry was driven out of Italy. Rodolpho fell in the battle; with him was Bertoldo of Este, a very valiant captain: Matilda married Albertazo; but a few years after, discovering that he was related to her first husband, the marriage was annulled, by the consent of the pope, and she led a holy life, leaving, at her death, her possessions to the church.

Ver. 213, "Thy own Rinaldo—"] Rinaldo, son of the fourth marquis of Este, Anno 1102, with many other Italian potentates,
Behold another Azo, doom'd to reign
O'er fair Verona and its wide domain;
Who marquis of Ancona shall be known,
When Otho and Honorius fill the throne.
'Twere long to tell the names of all thy race
That in the conclave shall obtain a place;
To tell each enterprise their arms shall gain,
What conquests for the Roman church obtain.
Lo! other Azos other Hugos near:
See Fulco, and Obizo next appear.
Behold two Henrys, both the fire and son:
Two Guelphos: this has conquer'd Umbria's town;

Ver. 227. Two Guelphos: — I In the faction of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, arising from the disputes between the emperor Frederic II. and the pope; the lords of Este sided with the Guelphs against the emperor, for which cause the church bestowed on them the duchy of Spoleti. This faction took its name from Guelpho and Ghibello, the heads of each party.
See now Spoleti’s ducal gown he wears:
And lo! who turns to smiles Italia’s tears:
Of him I speak (Azo the fifth survey)
To whom shall tyrant Ezellino pay
His forfeit life; a wretch abhor’d on earth,
And to the demon said to owe his birth.

Ver. 230. Azo the fifth—J Ezellino de Romano, for his unexampled cruelty called, the son of the devil, by the favour of the emperor Frederic II. entering Lombardy with a vast army, made himself master of many cities, among which was Padua; when desiring to usurp the dominion of Milan, he left it to go to the siege of Mantua. Azo V. having retaken Padua, set at liberty above two thousand prisoners, besides many women of quality. In the dungeons, above four hundred and sixty persons were found so worn with hunger, and covered with filth, as not to be known, though most of them afterwards appeared to be Paduans*. His prison was a labyrinth, in which he caused the person who made him the model, to be first shut up; at his return from the siege of Mantua, he commanded all the Paduans in Verona to be massacred; of eleven thousand, only twenty-eight remained alive. He then marched to Padua, but finding it not to be retaken, returned to Verona, and ordered the twenty-eight he had before spared, to be hanged in the market-place: at last being taken by Azo, who gave him three wounds, he was sent to Sonzino, where refusing nourishment, and, as some say, tearing open his wounds, he ended his detestable life.

* The cruelties of Ezellino are testified by Pietro Gerardo, of Padua, who was his contemporary.
He shall with cruelty his kingdom fill,
And fair Aufonia ravage at his will;
That Marius', Nero's, and Antonius' deeds,
Caius' and Sylla's crimes his guilt exceeds.

Behold the second Frederic's forces yield,
By second Azo conquer'd in the field,
While he shall o'er the happy land preside,
Where Phoebus, on the fatal river's side,

Ver. 235. — fair Aufonia — ] The ancient name for Italy.

Ver. 236. — Marius, Nero, — ] Caius, Caligula, and Nero, emperors of Rome, whose reigns were one continued scene of cruelty: Marius and Sylla, the first consul, and the last dictator, in the time of the republic, massacred many Romans in the civil contest between them: by Antonius, he means Marc Antony, who, after the death of Julius Caesar, in concert with Augustus, was author of the bloody proscription, which cut off so many of the commonwealth party, among whom fell that celebrated orator, Marcus Tullius Cicero.

Ver. 240. — the happy land preside, ] Ferrara, situated on the banks of the Po. Frederic, persecuting the church, was excommunicated by Honorius III. and many cities were taken from him, among which was Ferrara, which was given to Azo of Este, for his gallant behaviour against Frederic.

Invok'd
B. III. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Invok'd his breathless son with tuneful lyre,
His son, who fought to guide his father's fire:
Where the sad sisters tears of amber shed,
And Cygnus, chang'd, his snowy plumage spread. 245
This land he from the holy see obtains,
A recompence for all his glorious pains!
But where's his brother Aldobrandin lost,
Who frees the popedom from a mighty hoft;
When the fierce Ghibellines, by Otho led, 250
Shall round the capitol their numbers spread;

Ver. 242. — his breathless son — ] Phaeton, who, undertaking to guide the chariot of the sun, set the world on fire: he was thunder-struck by Jupiter, and fell into the Po; his sisters, lamenting his death, were changed into trees dropping amber, and his grandfather Cygnus into a swan. See OVID MET. B. ii.

Ver. 248. — his brother Aldobrandin — ] Otho IV. making war against the church, assisted by the Ghibelline faction, obliged pope Innocent IV. to retire into the capitol. Aldobrandin of Este, the first marquis of Ferrara, with other powers, obliged Otho to return to Germany. The marquis, being in want of money to carry on the war, borrowed large sums of the Florentines, leaving his brother Azo with them in pledge; and having defeated the emperor, and killed the earl of Celano, who espoused the cause of Otho, he died in the flower of his age, not without suspicion of poison, leaving his brother Azo his heir.

Whofe
Whose fury has the neighbouring lands o'er-run,
Whose force has Umbria and Piceno won?
He, wanting treasure to pursue the war,
Shall go supplies in Florence to prepare;
And there, no other pledge he has to leave,
His brother as his surety they receive.
Then shall he spread his conquering signs again,
And rout the German army on the plain;
Replace the church upon her ancient seat,
And fam'd Celano's earls with vengeance meet:
Till, while he fights the sacred pastor's cause,
He leaves his brother Azo to command
O'er fair Pisauro and Ancona's land;
Each town, from Trent to where Isaurus glides,
Between the Apennines and briny tides;
But (more than gold or gems) he leaves behind
With him his virtues and heroic mind.
Fortune all other gifts again may take,
But never can the power of virtue shake.
Rinaldo next, whose deeds his soul proclaim
Worthy the glorious race from which he came.
But cruel fortune views with envious eyes;
At Naples, by conspiracy, he dies!
Then young Obizo takes his grandfather's reign,
And Modena and Rheggio adds to his domain.
Such is his courage, that the people's choice
Shall make him lord with one united voice.
His offspring Azo see, the sixth that wears
The name, whose hand the Christian standard bears.
Adria is his; in nuptial union ty'd,
Sicilia's daughter shines his blooming bride.
Lo! in yon amiable and friendly band,
The most illustrious princes of the land,
Obizo, Aldobrand, for virtue nam'd;
For love and clemency, Alberto fam'd;

With

deric II. where being taken off by poison, his natural son Obizo, was by pope Innocent III. with the consent of the emperor, legitimated, and succeeded to the lordship of Ferrara: he afterwards;
by force of arms, reduced Modena and Rheggio.

Ver. 280. — Azo see, the sixth — ] Many Christians being besieged in the city of Ptolemais in Syria, in the time of Charles II.
king of Sicily and Naples, a crusade was proclaimed for their deliverance: in this enterprise Azo was made standard-bearer, and for his merits obtained to wife Beatrice, the daughter of king Charles.

How with Faenza they enlarg’d their reign;
And Adria more securely made their own,

With that fair town, which from the blushing rose,
To Grecian bards its pleasing title owes.

And many a castle of deserv’d renown.

thousand ducats, the city of Faenza, of John Awcutt, an English captain of the pope’s: they afterwards obtained many victories against Bernabo Visconti and other potentates. Nicholas is said, never to have been too much elated with prosperity, or de­pressed by adversity.

Ver. 290. — Adria — ] A city, not far from Ferrara, which gives name to the Adriatic gulph.

Ver. 293. — its pleasing title owes. ] He means Rovigo, called in Latin Rhodigium, from Rhodos, which in Greek signifies a rose.

Ver. 294. — a place whose walls contain — — A crew — ] Comacchio, a town in the Ferrarese, situated between Primaio and Volano, two branches of the Po, which often overflows and does great damage to the country: these people, who were most of them fishermen, are said to be desirous of storms, because at that time great quantities of fish are thrown up in the fens.
See Nicholas! whom, yet in early years,
To honours of command the land prefers.
He shall the vain designs of Tydeus quell,
Who rashly dares against his power rebel.
In rising dawn of youth, his sole delight
In rugged arms, and labours of the fight;
By which he soon obtains a mighty name,
Amid the greatest chiefs the first in fame.

He makes his foes their vain endeavours mourn,
And on themselves their cruel arts shall turn.
Otho the third in vain his power withstands,
(Tyrant of Rheggio and of Parma's lands).
At once resigning, in the fatal strife,
To him his kingdom and his wicked life.
He shall the limits of his sway extend,
But ne'er, unjust, another's rights offend.
For this th' Eternal Ruler of the heaven
No stated bound has to his empire given:

Ver. 298. See Nicholas! whom, yet — ] Azo of Este, who had been driven from his country, seeing Alberto dead, who left only an infant son, named Nicholas, thought of returning, with the assistance of Tydeus, count of Conio; but the child's guardians opposed him, and made Nicholas lord of Ferrara, who, being grown to man's estate, slew Otho III. who had usurped Rheggio and Parma, and obtained the government of these cities by the voluntary consent of their inhabitants.
All his designs shall ever prosperous prove,
Till snatch’d from earth to grace the skies above.
See Lionel; and next (a mighty name!)
Borfo behold, his happy age’s fame!
He shall in calm repose preserve with care
Those realms his ancestors had gain’d in war.
He cruel Mars in gloomy caves restrains,
And binds the hands of Rage in iron chains.
The great designs, that fill his generous breast,
Shall all be turn’d to make his people blest.

Lo! Hercules! of whom ’twere hard to tell
If he in arts of peace or war excel.

Ver. 318. See Lionel; — Borfo behold,— J Lionel and Borfo were natural sons of Nicholas; Hercules and Sigismund, legitimate: Nicholas, dying, left his legitimate children his heirs, and recommended them to the protection of Lionel, who, seizing the government, confined the two brothers in Naples, and reigned nine years. At his death, he left behind him a young son, named Nicholas, to the care of his brother Borfo, who generously recalled the two brothers, and educated them as his own children. This prince was universally beloved for his many virtues; and having magnificently entertained the emperor Frederic, was by him honoured with the title of duke of Ferrara, which title was confirmed by pope Paul II. ; since which time his successors retained the name of dukes of Ferrara.

Ver. 326. Lo! Hercules! — J Hercules I. the second duke of Ferrara, after the death of Borfo, succeeded to the dukedom.
B. III. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

He, by his virtues, shall at length obtain
The lordship, thirty years his right in vain!

Pulians, Calabrians, and Lucanians find
His glorious deeds, and bear them still in mind:

Conquest for him her brightest wreath prepares,
When, for the king of Catalan, he dares

Th' embattled field; nor shall one deed alone
Exalt him midst the princes of renown:

For ne'er before shall ruler of the land

Deserve such honour at his country's hand:

Not that their city (with industrious toil)

He moves from fields, and builds in fertile soil:

And for his citizens extends the bound,

And sinks a fosse, and raises walls around;

Adorns with porticos the spacious streets,

With temples, theatres, and princely feats.

dom which had been his right for thirty years, and beheaded Nicholas, the son of Lionel, who came, with the aid of the marquis of Mantua, to get possession of the government. Being afterwards embroiled with the Venetians, he was despoiled of many lands, and besieged in Ferrara. A peace being made,

Hercules fought in the service of Alphonso, king of the Catalan, and gained many victories for him: by his prudence and good conduct, he escaped the oppression of Charles VIII. king of France, who had subdued great part of Italy, and driven the before-mentioned Alphonso from his kingdom.

Not
Not that, unweary'd in his country's cause,
He frees her from the winged lion's paws: 345
Or when proud Gallia rouses all to arms,
And Italy is kindled with alarms,
His state alone enjoys a peace sincere,
From abject tribute free and servile fear:
Not even for these, and many blessings more, 350
His native soil shall Hercules adore,
So much, as that he leaves, to bless mankind,
Alphonso and Hippolito behind:
Whose friendship may be match'd with that of old
By story'd page of Leda's offspring told; 355
Who each, by turns, could seek the nether reign
To give his brother to the world again.

Ver. 345. — the winged lion's paws: ] The arms of the country, put by a figure for the country itself.

Ver. 353. Alphonso and Hippolito — ] Alphonso I. the third duke of Ferrara, and cardinal Hippolito, his brother, both patrons of Ariosto.

Ver. 355. — of Leda's offspring told; ] Caistor and Pollux: Caistor was the son of Tyndarus and Leda, and Pollux the son of Jupiter, begot by him, under the form of a swan, of Leda: these brothers were celebrated for their friendship; and Pollux, who inherited immortality from Jupiter, desired that he might share it with his brother, which being granted, they are feigned to live and die by turns.
So shall these two for ever stand prepar'd,
Each with his own the other's life to guard;
And more defend their land in raging war,
Than steely bulwarks rais'd by Vulcan's care.

Alphonso see! the prince, whose soul shall shine
With wisdom and with piety divine;
That men shall deem Aftrea left the earth
To visit after ages at his birth!

Nor shall he less in adverse times require
The prudence and the valour of his fire;
For with a scanty force, he sees at hand
On one side Venice with a numerous band;

Ver. 362. Alphonso see! the prince, — ] Alphonso being at variance with the pope and the Venetians, the former made a league with Ferrando, king of Naples, who sent him Fabritius Colonna, with four hundred men at arms, and Pietro Navarro, with two legions of old Spanish soldiers: he likewise took the Switzers into his pay, and equipped a fleet in the Tyrrhenian seas. Navarro entering, by Romania, into the Ferrarese, took Bastia by storm, a fortress belonging to the duke, cutting all to pieces. Alphonso, taking the field, routed the enemy, and recovered Bastia: being wounded with a stone in the head, his men, who believed him slain, to revenge his death, put all the pope's people to the sword. He afterwards signalized himself at Ravenna, in defence of the king of France, where he gained that memorable victory over the forces of Spain and pope Julius II.
She, on the other, who may better claim
A fury's title, than a mother's name;
Against her offspring cruel wars to wage
With more than Progne's or Medea's rage!
Oft as he issues forth by day or night,
He puts his foes by land and sea to flight.
His forces shall Romania's power o'erthrow,
And stain with blushing streams the banks of Po.
The hireling Spaniard shall his anger feel,
Who for the pontiff draws th' avenging steel.
The foe at first shall Baflia's castle gain,
The captain, in the sudden onset, slain.
But soon the victor must his conquest mourn:
See! great Alphonso swift to vengeance turn;
When not a wretch escapes the general doom
To bear the fatal tidings back to Rome.
His couns el with his lance united, gains
The laurel'd glories of Romania's plains,
Against stern Julius, and the Spanish bands;
He gives the conquest into Gallia's hands.
The country round shall pour a crimson flood,
Where floundering steeds shall swim in seas of blood;

Ver. 371. — _than a mother's name_;] The poet here seems to mean the pope, or mother church, that, till then, had always cherished the race of Este as her sons.
The dead unbury'd lie: such heaps shall fall;
The Spaniard, Greek, Italian, Dutch, and Gaul!
He, whom his vest pontifical reveals,
Whose honour'd brows the sacred hat conceals,
Is he—the cardinal in future time,
The church's great support! in prose and rhyme,
The theme of every tongue; whose boundless praise,
Like Cæsar's, shall demand a Virgil's lays.
'Tis his with noblest deeds t'adorn his race:
So Phœbus' beams the frame of nature grace,
Put Luna and the fainting stars to flight,
And shining conquer every other light.
Methinks I see him with a scanty train,
Departing sad, return with joy again;
While fifteen gallies captive to the shore
He brings, besides a thousand vessels more.
Behold two Sigismundos next appear;
See the five sons of great Alphonso near;

Ver. 396. — the cardinal, — ] Hippolito.
Ver. 406. — fifteen gallies — ] The Venetians going up the Po with a fleet against Alphonso, cardinal Hippolito went out of the city with some horse and foot, and coming to Volona, a castle near the Po, planted the artillery there to such advantage, that finding the enemy's gallies unprovided, most of the crews being on shore, he sunk four of them and took fifteen; but Angelo
Tevisiano, the admiral, escaped with one.
Who shall their glories thro' the world display, 410
To fill the distant lands and spacious sea.
View Hercules the second, first advance,
Who weds the daughter of the king of France.
See next Hippolito, whose acts shall shine,
And like his ancestors adorn his line: 415
The third Francisco call'd: one common name,
The latter couple from Alphonso claim.
But should I vainly thus attempt to tell
The names of all that in thy race excel,
Before my tale were done, the rising light 420
Must often chase the fleeting shades of night.
And now (if so you deem) 'tis time to cease,
And give the sprites dismission hence in peace.

Here, when she found the damsel thus dispos'd,
Her magic book the learn'd enchantress clos'd. 425
At once the phantoms vanish'd from the view,
And, where the prophet's corpse was laid, withdrew.

Ver. 412. View Hercules the second, — J Hercules II. the fourth duke of Ferrara.

Ver. 426, — the phantoms vanish'd — ] It is scarcely necessary to observe to the poetical reader, that this book is a close imitation of Virgil, Æn. vi, where Æneas sees, in vision, his successors
When Bradamant at length the silence broke,
And thus the sage prophetic dame bespoke:
What mournful pair was that, who plac’d between Alphonso and Hippolito were seen?

Sighing they came, their eyes to earth declin’d,
And gloomy sadness seem’d to fill their mind;
Far from their brethren’s way their steps they press’d,
As if they shunn’d to mingle with the rest.

At this demand, the prophetess appears
With visage chang’d, her eyes are fill’d with tears.
Unhappy youths! what misery (she cry’d)
For you the wiles of treacherous men provide.
O race renown’d! O great Herculean seed!

Ah! let your goodness for their errors plead:

successors pass before him. Camoëns has imitated both these poets in his prophecy of Thetis, of the heroes that were to follow Gama. See Lusiad, B. x.

Ver. 430. What mournful pair — ] Ferrante of Este, natural brother to Alphonso and Hippolito, either through views of ambition, or because Alphonso refused to procure him satisfaction for an injury which he had received from Hippolito, had conspired with Julio, his natural brother, to assassinate the duke; but the plot being discovered they were condemned to perpetual imprisonment. Porcacchi.

Ver. 439. — the wiles of treacherous men — ] The poet, by this equivocal expression, seems desirous to cast a veil over the guilt of these brothers.
From you their veins the richest currents prove;
Let justice here give way to brother's love!
She then proceeded in a softer tone:
Seek not to ask, what must not now be shown:
Ah! gentle maid! suffice the good you know;
Nor wish for that, which found, may cause your woe.
Soon as to-morrow's dawning light we view,
The readiest path together we'll pursue.

Ver. 445. Seek not to ask, — ] This passage is a close copy of Virgil, where Aeneas, seeing in vision his successors pass before him, in the same manner as is here related of Bradamant, asks the same question, and receives for answer, —Lucutus ne quere tuorum. AEN. vi.

Seek not the sorrows of thy race to know.

Concerning the misfortunes of the youths here alluded to, Sir John Harrington tells the following story:

"It happened that Hippolito and one of these brothers fell in love with a courtefan, who shewing less affection to Hippolito, was one day very earnestly importuned by him to know what moved her to prefer his brother before him; she answered, it was his beautiful eyes; upon which Hippolito ordered them to be thrust out; but the youth found means to preserve his sight, and meeting no redress by making his complaint to the duke, he, and the other brother here mentioned, conspired to kill him; but at the time of the execution their hearts failed them, and the plot being discovered, they were kept in perpetual imprisonment."

Notes to Sir John Harrington's Translation, B. iii.
To where Rogero is in durance laid:
Myself will guide you through the forest-shade;
And, when we reach the margin of the flood,
Will teach you every winding of the road.

All night the virgin in the cave remain'd,
With sage discourse by Merlin entertain'd,
Who often warn'd th' attentive maid to prove Propitious to her dear Rogero's love.

Soon as the skies began to glow with light,
She left the subterranean caves of night;
But first, with sage Melisfa, took her way
Through gloomy paths impervious to the day;
At length, ascending, reach'd a desert place
With savage hills, untrod by human race.

The live-long day, unceasing, they pursu'd
Their course, and many a rock and torrent view'd,
Still, as they went, endeavouring to allay
With sweet discourse the labours of the way.

But chief the prophetess instructs the maid
How she may best th' imprison'd champion aid.
Though you were Mars, or Pallas' self (she cry'd)
And drew as many warriors on your side,
As Afric's prince or mighty Charlemain,
You would oppose th' enchanter's power in vain.
Not only does he rear (amazing sight!) His tower of steel on such a steepy height:
Not only does he rule a winged horse,
That strangely through the air directs his course;
But on his arm he bears a blazing shield,
That casts the gazer senseless on the field;
And should you keep your eye-lids clos'd, to shun
The hidden force of this terrestrial sun,
How then the battle's progress could you know,
When your foe flies, or when he aims a blow?
But to withstand his arts on me rely,
Nor can the world an aid like this supply.

King Agramant a ring of great import
Has given to one Brunello of his court,
Who now before us on the way is seen:
This ring (late taken from an Indian queen)
Is such, that he who wears it on his hand,
May every fraud of magic power withstand.

No less Brunello knows of servile guiles,
Than he, who keeps your knight, of magic wiles.

Ver. 486. King Agramant a ring — ] This seems to be a new attempt of Brunello to free Rogero a second time from the hands of Atlantes. It has been before related, from Boyardo, how he was taken from the enchanted garden on Mount Carena in Africa. See Note on B. ii. Ver. 395.

Ver. 489. — an Indian queen ] Angelica, daughter of(Gaphron.

This
This man, so skill'd and crafty in deceit,
His monarch sends to work a hardy feat,
That, by his cunning and enchanted ring,
He from the castle may Rogero bring,
Whom much the king esteems: but shall he owe
His freedom to a Pagan, and our foe?
Three days your course along the shore pursue;
(The shore will soon appear before our view)
The third your steps will to the dwelling bring,
Where you shall meet the man that wears the ring.
His stature (keep the picture in your mind)
Is not six spans, his head to earth declin'd,
Dark is his tawny skin, and black his hairs;
On his pale face a bushy beard he wears:
His eyes are swoln; his squinting looks aside;
His eye-brows staring, and his nostrils wide:
His dress, which gives you all the man complete,
Is short and strait, and for a courier meet.
With him you doubtless must awhile discourse
On the strange castle, and th' enchanter's force.
Then speak your wish to dare th' adventurous deed,
And make in fight the necromancer bleed;
But let him no suspicion entertain
You know the ring that makes enchantments vain.

Soon
Soon will he proffer on your way to ride,
And to the rocky mountain be your guide.
Then follow him, and mark my words aright,
Soon as the rock appears before your sight,
Your fix'd resolves let no compassion shake,
But seize the wretch, his forfeit life to take:
For should his lips receive the ring, he flies
Involv'd in mist from your astonish'd eyes.

Thus speaking, to the shore at length they drew,
Where Bourdeaux and Garbonna rose to view;
And here, but first some tender tears they shed,
They parted as their different purpose led.
Duke Amon's daughter, whose impatient breast
Rogero fill'd, her eager journey press'd,
Till at an inn at length she ceas'd her way,
And saw Brunello there at close of day.

Full well she knew the man she sought to find,
So well his form was treasur'd in her mind:
She questions where he goes, and whence he came,
While 5yes to all he frames; nor left the dame,
Warn'd of his arts, for falsehood, falsehood deals,
Her country feigns, her name and race conceals;
While watchful on his hands her eye she bends,
And every look, his treachery known, attends.
As thus distrust on either side prevails,
A dreadful noise each startled ear assails.

But cease we here, my lord! to tell the cause;
And here awhile permit the tale to pause.

ORLANDO FURIOUSO.
THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant, following the advice of Melisza, takes the ring from Brunello, defeats Atlantes, the magician, and sets his prisoners at liberty; but soon after loses her lover Rogero, who is carried from her, in a wonderful manner, by the contrivance of Atlantes. Rinaldo, who was sent on an embassy to England, being cast by a tempest on the coast of Scotland, is entertained at an abbey, where he is acquainted with the misfortune of Geneura, daughter to the king of Scotland, and undertakes to fight in her behalf.

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO.

THOUGH we too oft dissimulation find
Th' attendant vice of a degenerate mind;
Yet, since in this bad world we must oppose
A thousand perils and a thousand foes,
A blameless art, in time of need pursu'd,
Has oft' been found the means of future good;
A sure defence from threatening danger prov'd;
Impending shame, and death itself remov'd.
If after proofs long-try'd, and try'd in vain,
You scarce at last a faithful friend attain;
A friend to whom you truly can impart
Each little care that fills the secret heart:
How with Brunello shall the maid proceed,
Brunello, strange to every virtuous deed;

But
But as Meliffa had display'd before,
Of treason fram'd, and vers'd in guileful lore?
She to deceive, no less her mind applies,
As best beseems with him, the fire of lies!
While thus their mutual converse they pursue,
Still on his hands she bends her heedful view;
When sudden cries their startled ears invade,
O! glorious mother! (cry'd th' astonish'd maid)
O! king of heav'n! from what dread wonder grows
This strange alarm? but soon the cause she knows;
She sees the host, and all the household near;
Who in the windows or the streets appear
Gazing aloft, as when the vulgar spy
A dark eclipse, or comet in the sky.
And now a wondrous sight the virgin saw,
(A wondrous sight, surpassing nature's law)
A courser through the air direct his flight,
Who bore upon his back an armed knight.
Large were his wings, with different colours grac'd,
And in the midst the magic knight was plac'd:
His shining arms of polish'd steel appear'd,
And tow'rds the western skies his course he steer'd;
Till sinking, he behind the mountains flew.
Then said the host (and well the truth he knew)

Ver. 22. O! glorious mother!] The virgin Mary.
Behold a strange magician fam'd afar,
Oft seen to journey through the fields of air.
Sometimes he seems amid the stars to rise;
And now, more lowly, near the earth he flies;
While every beauteous damsel in his way,
The necromancer seizes as his prey.
Thus all whose features charms transcendent share,
Or those, who give themselves the name of fair,
With terror struck, avoid his hated sight,
And shun the face of day with pale affright.
On a high rock (the host pursuing said)
He holds a castle, by enchantment made;
A fortress built of stone, whose frame excels
Whate'er of wondrous, old tradition tells.
Full many knights have fought the place in vain,
For none could boast they e'er return'd again;
That much I dread, so dear th' adventure cost,
His life, or liberty, each warrior lost!
This tale with joy th' attentive virgin heard,
In hopes (nor after, vain her hopes appear'd)
Soon by the magic ring's assisting power,
To quell th' enchanter and destroy his tower.
Then to the host she said: let one be found,
Whose steps may guide me to this fatal ground:
For know I burn with rage to prove my might
On this magician in immediate fight.
Thou shalt not want an aid (Brunello cry'd) Behold, myself I proffer for your guide.
The windings of the road I can display,
With many secrets to beguile the way.
With grateful thanks I take you for my guide,
In hopes to gain the ring, the maid reply'd.
The host a courser brought the virgin-knight,
Apt for the road, and strongly limb'd for fight;
On this she mounted, and her way pursu'd,
Soon as the rising morn the day renew'd.
From steep to steep, from wood to wood they pass'd,
Till fam'd Pyrene's hills they reach'd at last.
There may the sight, in skies serene, explore
Gallia and Spain, with either distant shore:
Thence from the summit shew'd a rough descent,
That winding to the lower valley went;
Where, in the midst, a rocky mountain stood
On which aloft the forest grew they view’d;
That rear’d to heaven, with such stupendous height,
Made all beneath seem little in its sight.
Behold th’ enchanters tower (Brunello said)
In which the knights and dames are prisoners made.

Hewn in four equal sides, the mountain rose
Above the plain; nor path nor street it shows
’T affist the feet; but seem’d a place design’d
For some strange animal of winged kind.

The virgins now perceiv’d the hour was come
To seize the ring, and seal Brunello’s doom:
But her great soul th’ inglorious thought disdain’d,
To see, with blood like his, her weapon stain’d;
Since she might safely of his ring deprive,
And yet preserve the helpless wretch alive.

Then, while Brunello unsuspecting pass’d,
She seiz’d him unawares, and bound him fast
To a strong trunk beneath the beech’s shade;
But from his finger first the ring convey’d.

In vain his every art Brunello tries,
And begs his freedom with unmanly cries:
She leaves him; and, with steps secure and slow,
Forfakes the hill, and seeks the plain below:

Then
Then winds her horn, that echoes to the skies,
And having breath'd a blast, with shouting cries
She boldly to the field her foe defies.

Nor long she stays, the fierce enchanter hears,
And, issuing from the castle-gate, appears:
But Bradamant beheld with secret joy,
Her foe no weapons in the field employ.
Nor lance, nor heavy mace, nor sword he wore,
To bruise the armour, and the corslet bore.
On his left arm was brac'd a mystic shield,
Whose wondrous orb a crimson veil conceal'd:
His right hand held a book, and while he read,
Illusive phantoms round his foes he spread.
With spear or sword he seem'd to urge the fight;
And oft had dazzled many a warrior's fight.

Ver. 111.—no weapons in the field—] Pinabello, in the second book, had described the magician as making use of weapons in the battle with Gradaffio and Rogero; but it must be remembered, that his fight was deluded by magic, as Ariosto in this passage, says:

His right hand held a book, and while he read,
Illusive phantoms round his foes he spread,
With spear, or sword, he seem'd to urge the fight, &c.

Ver. 117.

But the poet now, speaking in his own person, represents the matter as it really appeared to Bradamant.

But
But no illusion was his flying steed;
A griffin and a mare the mingled breed
Compos'd; and like his fire his feet before,
His head, his feathers, and his wings he wore;
(In all the rest his mother-mare was shown)
And by the name of griffin-horse was known.
Such, though but rarely, in those hills appear,
Beyond where ocean feels the freezing year.
Thence had the enchanter drawn him by his skill,
And made him soon obedient to his will;
Taught him the saddle and the reins to wear,
And o'er the earth and seas his master bear.
But all the rest that in the fight he shew'd,
From airy visions of enchantment flow'd:
Yet nought against the maid avail'd his art,
Such wisdom could the sacred ring impart.
And now she seems enrag'd to strike the wind;
Now darts before; then swiftly turns behind.
At last (for so Melissa had requir'd,
To win the palm which most the maid desir'd)
In fury from her steed she seems to light,
And eager on her feet pursue the fight.
This seen, the necromancer bends his care,
With one enchantment to conclude the war;
And, thinking now the damsel to confound,
Removes the covering from his buckler's round. 145
Such was his wont—awhile the shining ray
He kept conceal'd to hold the knights in play:
For, with a sportive mind, he took delight
To see them wield the sword and spear in fight.
So when the wily cat a prisoner draws
Some hapless mouse within her cruel claws;
Wanton awhile she joys his fears to see;
Nor yet will kill, nor set the captive free.
To that we might, in every former war,
The foul magician and the knights compare: 155
But not in this, the ring with powerful aid
Here gave th' advantage to the warrior-maid,
Who watchful as she fought t' escape surprize,
Attentive on the forc'er fix'd her eyes;

Ver. 150. — the wily cat — ] Many passages in Ariosto are of the ludicrous kind, of which this simile is an example, which is taken from the most common and familiar image in life: there is an instance of this kind still more ludicrous, where he describes the universal terror spread by Astolfo's horn in the enchanted palace of Atlantes. B. xxii. ver. 161.

In casa non refita gatta ne topo.
Nor cat nor mouse within the dwelling stay'd.

Such passages, blended with others truly epic, prove Ariosto's style and imagery to be of the mixed kind.
Soon as she saw the buckler's blaze reveal'd,
She clos'd her eyes, and tumbled on the field:
Nor think the splendor of the beaming light,
As with the rest, had power to hurt her sight;
But the wise virgin took this artful course,
To lure the vain enchanter from his horse.
Her wide succeeding, swiftly wheeling round,
The flying horseman lighted on the ground:
On foot he leapt, and left behind his shield,
Ty'd to his saddle, in the veil conceal'd,
Then hasten'd where th' expecting damsel lay;
So waits a wolf to make the kid his prey;
While, on the ground neglected, he forsook
(With which he wag'd the war) his magic book.
Now with a chain to bind his foe he thought,
A chain prepar'd, for such a purpose brought;
But here an unexpected difference found;
The noble damsel hurl'd him to the ground;
He far unfit a strife like this to wage;
She strong in youth, and he deprest with age.
Now Bradamant her conquering weapon spread,
And from his shoulders thought to part his head;
But, marking well his face, her hand restrain'd,
As if such mean revenge her soul disdain'd.
She view'd the features of her vanquish'd foe,
With wrinkles furrow'd o'er, and worn with woe; 185
Who, by his silver locks and reverend mien,
At least the course of seventy years had seen.

For Heaven's sake, youth! conclude the fatal strife,
(The loft magician said) and take my life.

But she no less to save his life conspir'd,
Than he to leave the hated light desir'd.

Meantime a new desire possess'd the dame,
To learn th' enchanter's country, and his name;
And what he by that rocky tower design'd,
Built in a wild, to ravage all mankind. 195

Alas! for no ill purpose (thus replies
The old enchanter, mingling tears and sighs)
On yon steep rock I built my settled home,
Nor avarice makes me round the country roam;
But fond affection would my soul incite,
To save from peril great a gentle knight,
Long threaten'd by his stars, in Gallia's land
To die a Christian by a treacherous hand.
A youth like this, for looks and courage bold,
Ne'er did the sun 'twixt either pole behold; 205
Rogero call'd: his infancy with care
I nurs'd: Atlantes is the name I bear.
Desire of fame, but more his cruel chance,
With Agramant allur'd his step to France:
While I, who love him with a parent's love,
Seek him from France and danger to remove:
For this alone I rais'd the stately tower,
To keep Rogero's life from fortune's power;
Where late I kept him prisoner safe, and where
I vainly hop'd, alas! yourself to bear!
With gallant dames and knights I fill'd the place,
With many others of the noblest race;
That, though deny'd to leave this safe retreat,
Society might make his bondage sweet.
Except their freedom, I with care provide
For every want; for every wish beside.
Whate'er the world affords each various coast
To give delight, these castle walls can boast:
The song, the dance, the costly garb, the feast;
Whate'er the heart can think, or tongue request!
Well had I sown, and well the fruits enjoy'd;
But thou are come, and all my work's destroy'd.
Alas! if like your gentle looks, you bear
A gentle heart, in pity hear my prayer.
That buckler take, which I with joy resign,
And take that flying steed which once was mine.

Or,
Orlando Furioso. B. IV.

Or, hast thou friends in yonder tower confin'd?
Free one; or two; remain the rest behind.
Nay, all my prisoners, if thou seek'st, receive,
So thou alone wilt my Rogero leave.

But if, alas! ev'n him thou would'st remove;
Before thou lead'st to France the youth I love,
Ah! let me by thy pitying sword be slain,
And free this spirit from her house of pain.

To this the maid—Thy fruitless plaints give o'er,
For know—I will the captive knight restore;
Nor offer shield, nor courser to resign,
No longer yours, by right of conquest mine:
Or were they yours to give, could gifts like these
For such a warrior's loss my mind appease?

For this Rogero is confin'd with care,
T' avoid the threatening influence of his star!
O blind to fate! or, grant you can foresee,
What human power shall alter Heaven's decree?

But if your own near fate you never knew,
Far less another's fate your art can view.
Request not death from me; such prayers are vain:
Or if sincere you seek to end your pain;
Though all the world denies, the noble mind
Can from itself its own dismission find.
But first set wide the castle gate with speed,
And let your prisoners all from bonds be freed.

So spoke the virgin; and, without delay,
With old Atlantes took her eager way.

Chains of his own the necromancer bind;
The cautious damsel follows close behind;
For, still in doubt, some secret guile she fear'd;
Though deep submission in his face appear'd.

Now near they came, where on the rocky side
Scarce to be seen, a narrow cleft she spy'd,
By which the steps, in windings from the mead,
To the high summit of the mountain lead.

Atlantes from the threshold mov'd a stone,
Where mystic signs and characters were shown:
Beneath were vessels, whence was seen expire
Sulphurous smoke that came from hidden fire.
All these the sorcerer broke; and sudden grew
The country desert, comfortless to view!
As oft from nets the thrushes take their flight,
So swift the necromancer flew from sight:
At once with him, dissolv'd to empty air,
The vanish'd castle left the mountain bare.
Surpriz'd, themselves the knights and ladies found
From stately rooms remov'd to open ground:

While
While many view’d their present state with pain, 280
And wish’d for pleasing slavery again.
Gradasso, Sacripant were there to see:
The knight Prafildo too, from prison free,
Who with Rinaldo came from eastern lands;
Irolido, join’d with him in friendly bands. 285
Here noble Bradamant with joy perceiv’d
Her lov’d Rogero, him for whom she griev’d;
Who, when he saw the beauteous maid, express’d
The grateful transports of an amorous breast;
As one he valu’d, to his soul more dear 290
Than golden beams of light, or vital air.
E’er since the day the fair her helm unbound,
And in her lovely head receiv’d a wound,
Each other night and day they sought in vain,
Nor till this blissful hour could meet again. 295
Now when with longing eyes Rogero view’d
Where she, his lov’d, his fair deliverer stood,

Ver. 283. — Prafildo — 285, Iroldo, — ] Christian knights in Boyardo’s poem, who had been imprisoned with Rinaldo, Dudon, and others, in a castle in the east, and being afterwards delivered, set out with Rinaldo for France, to the assistance of Charlemain, and are here supposed to have been taken prisoners by Atlantes.

Ver. 292. E’er since the day, — ] See General View of Boyardo’s Story.
So vast a pleasure fill'd his ravish'd mind,
He deem'd himself the happiest of mankind.

From shameful bondage freed, the warriors came,

Where in the valley stood the conquering dame;
And where the wondrous courser they beheld,
Who bore the buckler in the veil conceal'd.

The damsel now to seize his reins essay'd;
And, till she nearer drew, the courser stay'd;
But soon he spreads his wings, and spurns the plain;
Then, at a little distance; lights again.

Eager she follows, where she sees the steed
Now here, now there, descending on the mead.
Thus, on the sandy shore, in mazy rounds,
The wily crow the spaniel's search confounds.

Gradaifo, Sacripant, Rogero try'd;
Alike each knight his several art apply'd;
Some on the hills, some planted on the plain,
As best they thought the winged steed to gain;
But he (when first he had the warriors led
Up the rough paths to every mountain head,
And in the marshy vales beneath convey'd)
At length beside Rogero gently stay'd.

This was Atlantes' work, whose aged breast
A thousand anxious boding fears oppress'd,
Who oft had rack'd his thoughts with pious care,
To save Rogero from his fatal star.
For this he bids the griffin-horse alight,
To bear from Europe's climes the youthful knight,
Rogero thought to lead him on the way,
But the steed, stopping short, refus'd t' obey.
From good Frontino then he leaps with speed,
(Frontino was the champion's generous steed)
He dares the strong-plum'd courser to bestride,
And claps his goring rowels in his side;
Who runs awhile, till rising from the plain,
He spurns the ground beneath and soars amain.
So when the master lets the falcon fly,
At once he seers his prey, and shoots along the sky.

The maid, alarm'd, beheld with thuddering sight,
Her dear Rogero in this dangerous plight:
Such various passions in her bosom wrought,
She seem'd awhile depriv'd of sense and thought.
What she of youthful Ganymede had heard,
To heaven by Jove's almighty will preferr'd,

Ver. 328. — Frontino — ] The horse which Brunello stole from Sacripant, and gave to Rogero.

She doubts may prove of her Rogero true,
Whose equal graces charm'd the gazer's view.
His course she follows through the distant skies,
While yet his course she reaches with her eyes; 345
Even when the distance leaves her sight behind,
She follows still, and views him in her mind.
Her tender bosom heaves with labouring sighs,
While ceasless arrows trickle from her eyes.
But when her lover long in vain she mourn'd, 350
Her looks upon his gallant steed she turn'd,
Then, parting, took Frontino by the rein,
In hopes to give him to his lord again.

Meantime the monster flew, nor knew the knight
To rule the reins, or stop his rapid flight. 355
He sees the face of earth decreas'd in show,
And every lofty summit left below;
So far remov'd, no more his eye descries
Where the vales sink, or where the mountains rise.
But when the steed had gain'd so vast a height, 360
He seem'd a little spot to mortal sight,
He steer'd his course, to where in western streams
The sun descends, when Cancer feels his beams.
He cuts his airy way; as vessels fail
On prosperous seas before the driving gale. 365

But
But let him go, and well his voyage speed,
While to Rinaldo must the tale proceed.

Rinaldo that, and all th' ensuing day,
Was driven by tempests o'er the watery way:
From morn till eve the wind unceasing blew:
Now to the west, and now the north they drew;
At last upon the shore of Scotland light,
Where Caledonia's forest rose to fight,
That

Ver. 373. Caledonia's forest —] The forest of Caledonia, famous for its dreary solitudes, was the scene of the exploits of many of the knights errant, of which such fabulous accounts are given in the books of chivalry of those times: of these knights, the principal were the five following mentioned by our author.

Tristram, son of Meliadis, king of Leonis, and one of the first of the errant knights sworn at the round table. Marco, king of Cornwall, having engaged to marry Isotta, daughter of King Languines, sent his nephew Tristram to Ireland, to fetch over the bride. Isotta's mother, having prepared an enchanted potion to make her daughter beloved by her husband, had entrusted it to a confidante, when it happened, that Tristram and Isotta, in the voyage, tasted of the potion, and became violently enamoured of each other. King Marco, having some time afterwards surprised the lovers together, snatched up Tristram's lance, which
That 'midst its ancient oaks was wont to hear
The riven target, and the shiver'd spear:
Here once were seen, beneath these shades rever'd,
Each errant-knight in Britain's combats fear'd:

From

which stood without the chamber, and flew him therewith:
upon which Isotta fell on the body, and expired. Tristram's companion was,

Launcelot, a knight also sworn of the round table, and son of Bando, king of Benoich: he was deeply in love with queen Guenever, wife to king Arthur, and no less beloved by her:
after her death, he became a hermit. Launcelot was deceived by a daughter of king Piscatore, who, seeing his passion for the queen, by a crafty wile lay with him in her stead, and had by him a son called,

Galasso, who being created a knight by his father, was the first that sat in the chair of Merlin: he is said to have obtained the holy vessel, in which our Saviour eat with his disciples; and was reputed a saint.

Arthur, was the son of Uther Pendragon, king of England:
Jeffery of Monmouth informs us, that Uther Pendragon fell in love with Igerne (or Jogerne) the wife of Gorlois, prince of Cornwall. In the absence of Gorlois, Merlin, by his magic, transformed Uther into the likeness of Jordan, a fami-lar friend of Gorlois, himself assuming the figure of one Bri-cel; by means of which artifice Uther enjoyed Igerne, and begot king Arthur, who is said to have been the greatest king that ever lived: he was so renowned a warrior, that he flew with his own hand, four hundred and sixty men in battle, and added other kingdoms to his own: he wore a golden helmet, with a dragon for his crest; thus Spenser in his Fairy Queen:

K 3

His
From regions far and near, well known to fame,
From Norway, Germany, and Gallia came

Where death or conquest crown'd the glorious strife!

Here

His haughty helmet, horrid all with gold,
Both glorious brightness and great terror bred,
For all the crest a dragon did enfold
With greedy paws —— B. i. C. vii.

On his shield was engraven the effigies of the Virgin Mary:
He bore a lance of uncommon size and weight, with which he flew his son Mordites, who had rebelled against him, and lay in ambush to assassinate him; hence Dante says:

Con eis' un colpo per le man d'Artù.
With this a blow from Arthur's hand ——

This prince was the first that established the order of the round table, with so many famous knights: his end is uncertain; some say, that he received his mortal wound in fighting against his traiterous nephew Mordred; but the old Welsh bards had a strange tradition, that he was not dead, but would return after a time, and reign in as great authority as ever.

Galvano (or Gawaine): there were two of this name, one the nephew of Arthur, a man of great valour, and one of the round table: the other was under Amadis de Gaule: they were both great knights, and at achieved many adventures. On the beach of the sea, near Milford-haven, is a natural rock shaped into a chapel, which tradition reports to have been the burying-place of Sir
Gawaine,
Here Tristram mighty deeds perform'd of old,
Galasso, Launcelot, and Arthur bold,
Galvano brave; with more that titles drew
Both from the ancient table, and the new;
Knights, who have left to speak their valiant mind,
More than one trophy of their worth behind.

Rinaldo arms, his steed Bayardo takes,
And landing on the shore, the sea forsakes:
He bids the pilot Berwick speed to gain,
And there till his arrival to remain.

Without a squire the fearless knight pervades
The gloomy horror of those dreary shades;

Gawaine, the nephew of Arthur. See Porcacchi, War-}

ton's, and Upton's notes on Spenser, &c.

Ver. 385. — the ancient table, and the new; ] "The round table was not peculiar to the reign of king Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. Any king was said to "hold a round table," when he proclaimed a tournament attended with some peculiar solemnities." See Reliques of Ancient Poetry, Vol. i. p. 35.

Ver. 392. — the knight pervades ] This passage has more the air of the old romances than most parts of the poem. A prince, sent from his sovereign on an embassy to a foreign power, being landed near a forest, instead of taking the nearest way to execute his commission, wanders up and down in search of adventures: however, the reader may perhaps be tempted to overlook this inconsistency, for the sake of the episode thereby introduced.
Now here, now there, as most he hop'd to find
Adventures of a new and dreadful kind.

The first day brought him to an abbey fair,
Whose wealth was spent with hospitable care,
Beneath its roof reception to provide
For knights and dames that through the forest ride.
The monks and abbot, with a friendly grace,
Welcom'd the brave Rinaldo to the place;
Who now enquir'd (but not till grateful food
Had cheer'd his spirits and his strength renew'd)
How in the compass of that savage ground,
Adventures strange by wandering knights were found.

He might (they answer'd) 'midst the woods essay
A thousand perils in the lonely way;
But, as the place, so were the deeds conceal'd,
And seldom to the wondering world reveal'd.
Far rather go (they cry'd) where done in fight,
Your actions may be view'd in open light:
Where after toil and danger follows fame,
With ready trump your praises to proclaim.
But if indeed your honour you regard,
Then hear the noblest enterprize prepar'd,
'That ever yet, in ancient times or new,
A courteous warrior could in arms pursu'e.

Our
B. IV. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Our monarch's daughter needs a gallant knight,
In her defence to wage a single fight
Against a lord (Lurcanio is his name)
Who seeks to spoil her of her life and fame.
He to her father has accus'd the maid,
(Perhaps by hatred more than reason sway'd)
That she receiv'd, confess'd before his sight,
A lover at her window in the night.
Her crime in flames she expiates by the laws,
Unless a champion rises in her cause
Within a month (now hastening to an end)
Her life against th' accuser to defend.
The cruel laws of Scotland's realm decree
That every maid, of high or low degree,
Accus'd of yielding to th' alluring fire
Of lawless love, in torment shall expire:
Nor aught can save the wretched damsel's life,
Unless some warrior dare the generous strife.
The king, who for Geneura's safety fears,
(Such is the name his hapless daughter bears)
Proclaims through every city, far and near,
That he who dares in her defence appear,
Whose arm shall lay her proud accuser low,
(If he his birth to noble parents owe)
Shall
Shall for his bride the royal maid receive,
With such a dower as fits a prince to give.
A deed like this should more your sword demand,
Than wandering thus amid the forest land.
You will the flower of beauteous dames obtain,
'Twixt distant India and th' Atlantic main;
With power and wealth, and knighthood's envy'd praise,
To crown with blessings all your future days.
Our king shall fix on you his sovereign grace,
Whose arm preserv'd the honour of his race.
Yet more, the law of chivalry demands,
To save from infamous and treacherous hands
A maid, who, by the world's consent, may claim
Among the chasteft minds the foremost name.
Rinaldo mus'd awhile, then made reply:
And must a damsel be condemn'd to die
Because she circled in her yielding arms,
And kindly bless'd her lover with her charms?
Accurst be those that could such laws procure!
Accurst be those that still such laws endure!
Let cruel virgins rather cease to live,
Nor those who life to faithful lovers give:
Nor ask I now if with consenting ear
Geneura deign'd her suitor's vows to hear;
In her defence shall all my force be try'd:
Procure me speedily a skilful guide;
And give me but th' accuser's face to see,
I trust, in heaven, to set Geneura free.
I mean not now (what truth perchance denies)
T' affirm that guiltless of the deed she dies;
But mean to show what madness fill'd his mind,
Who first devis'd this law for woman-kind,
When man to multitudes his love displays,
Nor meets alone impunity, but praise.
And soon I hope, in heaven, to prove the wrong,
To suffer tamely such an act so long.

The rest with good Rinaldo deem'd the same,
While all agreed their ancestors to blame:
Nor could the king escape from censure free,
Whose justice ne'er revers'd the harsh decree.

Soon as the rosy morn, with splendor bright,
Reveal'd the hemisphere of rising light,
Rinaldo arm'd, and mounted on his steed,
He took a trusty squire the way to lead;
Then left the abbey, and his course pursu'd
For many miles along the gloomy wood,
To seek the city destin'd for the fithe,
On which depended fair Geneura's life.
To make the shorter way, they chanc'd to take
A path more lonely, and the road forfake;
When near at hand they hear a screaming sound,
The forest echoes to the noise around;
One spurs Bayardo, t' other spurs his steed,
To reach the valley whence the cries proceed.

Betwixt two men a damsel there was seen,
Who distant seem'd of fair and comely mien;
But ne'er before did dame or damsel show
Looks more deprest with anguish or with woe.

On either side the ruffians ready stood
With naked swords to dye the ground with blood;
While she with prayers, and many a flowing tear,
Did for a while the dreadful stroke defer.

Rinaldo comes, and when the fair he spies,
He hastens to her aid with threatening cries.

Soon as the murderers saw th' approaching knight,
At once they turn'd their backs in sudden flight;
Through the dark vale precipitate they flew;
Nor would the Paladin their steps pursue,
But, drawing nigh the damsel, sought to hear
Her deep distress, and whence her death so near;
Then, for dispatch, commands the squire to bear
Behind him, on their way, the weeping fair;
While, as they rode, he better mark'd her face, her beauteous features, and her pleasing grace. That favour'd of a court; though still appear upon her troubled looks the marks of fear. Again Rinaldo ask'd, what cruel fate had so deprest her to this wretched state?

She then, with lowly voice, began to tell what in th' ensuing book we shall reveal.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF ORLANDO FURIOUS.

The beasts, that haunt the wood or graze the plain,
Or tame or savage, mutual peace maintain;
But if sometimes they chance to mix in war,
The generous males with females never jar:
The she-bear from the other never flies,
The lioness beside the lion lies:
The she-wolf with her mate securely lives,
Nor the bull terror to the heifer gives.

What strife, or what Megæra has possessed
The deep recesses of the human breast,
That oft the husband and the wife engage
In wordy conflict; oft with impious rage,
Against each other aim the vengeful blow,
While gushing tears the genial bed o'erflow;
Nor tears alone, but some, by fury led,
In crimson streams the vital current shed?

Accurst is he, and born in evil hour,
Who dares rebel against the sovereign power
Of nature's laws, to strike the weeping fair,
Or from her tresses rend a single hair:

But he, whose breast such small remorse can feel,
T' attempt her life with poison, or with steel,
I ne'er can deem a man; but, 'scap'd from woe,
Some fiend infernal from the realms below.

The two assassins such we justly name,
Driv'n by the brave Rinaldo from the dame;
Whom to that lonely vale their guile betray'd,
To hide their dreadful crime in dreary shade:

I left the dame preparing to relate,
The secret cause of her unhappy state,
To good Rinaldo, her preserver-knight;
And thus, pursuing, I the tale recite.

The damsel now began: Prepare to hear
Such deeds as never yet have reach'd the ear,

Ver. 33. The damsel now began: There is scarcely any part of the poem more simple and unadorned than this tale, and which admits of so little elevation in an English version.
B. V. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 147

As never stain'd the most inhuman crew:
Not such Mycenæ, Thebes, or Argos knew!
If yonder sun that darts his beams around,
Shines more remotely on our native ground,
'Tis doubtless that he shuns this hated place,
With horror viewing such an impious race.

That men on foes exert their dreadful rage,
Examples have been seen in every age;
But that dire mind what savage fury sways,
Who friendship's warmth with fiend-like ill repays!
That, undisguis'd, you all the truth may know,
I will from first the cause impartial shew,
Why these assassins did with barbarous ire
Against my blooming tender youth conspire.

Know then, my lord, I yet a girl, was sent
To court, and to Geneura's service went;
By her receiv'd, I flourish'd in her grace,
And in the palace held an honour'd place.
But cruel Love my state with envy saw,
And soon, alas! subdue'd me to his law:
He made, of every youth and comely knight,
The duke of Albany my sole delight.

We hear the speech, we see the looks express'd,
But who can view the secrets of the breast?
His love, avow'd, my bosom first inspir'd
With tender thoughts, with gentle wishes fir'd:
So far at length my fond belief was led,
That I receiv'd him to my virgin bed.
Nor that alone; but that recess I chose
In which sometimes the princess would repose;
In which conceal'd her choicest treasure lies,
A close retreat, remote from vulgar eyes!
There by a gall'ry to the window join'd,
A favour'd friend might easy entrance find.
By this I often introduc'd my love,
A silken ladder throwing from above.
'Twas thus I did th' enamour'd duke receive,
Whene'er Geneura's absence gave me leave;
Who us'd to change her bed, sometimes to fly
The burning heat, sometimes the freezing sky.
Securely oft we met, and void of fear
Indulg'd our flame, for 'gainst the palace here
Some lonely ruins stood, where night or day
None ever pass'd his visits to survey.

For many a month to all the court unknown,
In frequent joys our secret hours had flown:
So blind was I, I ne'er discover'd yet
That little truth was his, but much deceit;

Though
Though the base treasons of his faithless breast
Were plainly by a thousand signs express'd.
At length, without disguise, he durst confess
His close design Geneura to possess:
Nor know I, if his love was then begun,
Or ere he yet my giddy thoughts had won.
Judge, in my bosom if he bore a part,
Or rather, if he ruled not all my heart:
He own'd his purpos'd suit, nor blusht with shame
To ask my friendly aid to win the dame;
But vow'd his ardor feign'd, in hopes alone
To form a near alliance to the throne;
As none, among the nobles of the blood,
Except the king, in rank before him stood:
And promis'd, should my counsel e'er ensure
His sovereign's favour, and the bride secure:
The service, ever present to his mind,
In ties of gratitude his soul should bind:
That I alone, his wife, his friends above,
Should reign th' unrival'd partner of his love.
I (that his happiness endeavour'd still,
Nor e'er in thought or deed control'd his will)
Took all occasions that I saw to raise
In fair Geneura's ear my lover's praise.

Heaven
Heaven knows how truly I employ'd my art
To serve him with a just and faithful heart!
But vain th' attempt my much-lov'd duke to place
With many a trial in the fair-one's grace.

Another love was kindled in her breast,
Another lover all her soul possess'd:
A comely courteous knight had rais'd a flame,
A knight, who from a foreign region came:
He, with his youthful brother, left the port
Of distant Italy, for Scotland's court;
Where soon in arms such vast renown he gain'd,
No son of Britain greater praise obtain'd:
The king esteem'd him, and his favour show'd,
By gifts of honour, and of wealth bestow'd:
Castles and towns he gave to his command,
And rank'd him midst the barons of the land.
This knight the name of Ariodantes bore,
The monarch lov'd him much, his daughter more:
The warrior's valiant deeds with warmth inspir'd
Her gentle soul, but more the lover fir'd:
Since well she knew, for her what flame possess'd
The gentle Ariodantes' constant breast.
Her growing passion made the virgin hear
My lover's praises with averted ear:
The more, to gain his suit, with prayers I strove,
The more her hatred rose and spurn'd his love.

I soothe'd his grief, and oft essay'd to make
Th' ambitious duke his vain design forfake.

I show'd him how the damsel's soul possest
With Ariodant, for him alone confess'd
The darts of love: when Polinesso heard
(Such was his name) what little hopes appear'd
T' obtain his wish, each thought of tender kind
Driv'n from his soul, his fierce revengeful mind,
Enrag'd to see another favour'd more,
To hate converted what was love before;
Between Geneura, and her favourite knight,
Resolv'd to kindle rage and jealous spite,

And so the fire of enmity increase,
As ne'er again might be compos'd to peace:
Nor would he trust with me his treacherous thought,
But counsel only from himself he sought.

At last, he thus his speech began to frame:
My dear Dalinda, (thus I'm known by name)
Thou see'st the tree, though often hewn, will shoot
Fresh branches from the new-divided root;
Thus nought can wholly my desires suppress,
Though lopt so often by their ill success;

Yet
Yet think not that I prize the haughty dame, 155
But baffled!—scorn'd—my soul rejects the shame!
This is my will: when'er by love inspir'd
We meet, the princess to her bed retir'd,
Take every garment that aside she throws,
And on yourself her ornaments dispose:
Like her attempt to dress your flowing hair,
Let every gesture feign Geneura's air.
Before the window take your silent stand,
And let the ladder down with ready hand.
Then will I come, in fancy prepossess'd
That you are her you seem by mien and veilt:
For well I trust, while thus myself I cheat,
To cure my fond desire with this deceit.

He said; and I unconscious ne'er perceiv'd
(So far had love my thoughts of sense bereav'd) 170
That what he ask'd, my treacherous lover meant,
With secret guile t' effect some base intent;
But like Geneura cloth'd in vestment white,
Receiv'd his visits many a secret night;
Nor saw the reason working in his mind,
Till all had follow'd, which his guile design'd.

His purpose thus secur'd, the wily duke
Aside th' unwary Ariodantes took;

For
For once they liv'd in friendship's social band
Ere fatal rivals for Geneura's hand.

With deep regret I find (he thus address'd
The gentle knight) when singled from the rest,
Amidst my peers I show'd you most regard,
You should so ill my partial choice reward.

Full well you know what love (long time declar'd)
With mine Geneura's gentle heart has shar'd;
And see me now preparing to demand
The maid in marriage from my sovereign's hand.

Why will you then disturb my rightful claim?
Why thus indulge a rash and hopeless flame?
I swear, had Heaven revers'd our fates, to thee
My juster choice had left the fair-one free.

It moves me more to view your fruitless pain,
(Thus Ariodantes answer'd him again)
Since, ere your thoughts aspire'd to win the dame,
My soul had nourish'd long the growing flame;
And ne'er could sympathy more powerful prove,
To join two amorous minds in mutual love.

Why then respect not you our friendly band,
Or pay my vows the deference you demand?
Were you beheld with more propitious eyes,
Long since had I resign'd the beauteous prize:

But
But well I hope the princely maid to wed,
Though your possessions may be wider spread:
Not less my deeds by Scotland's king approv'd,
And by his daughter am I more belov'd.

O'erweening confidence (the duke rejoind)
Has but deceiv'd thy fond distemper'd mind!
Sincere the progress of thy love impart,
And, in return, will I disclose my heart.

So he, who in success appears to yield,
Shall to his happier rival quit the field.
Whate'er thou speakest, yon' Heaven I here attest,
The tale shall safe within this bosom rest;
So shalt thou vow, thou never wilt disclose
Whate'er my friendship may in thee repose.

This said; each other's secrets to conceal
They swore; then Ariodant began to tell
His love's pursuit, and undisguis'd display'd
His tender contract with the royal maid;
Who, if the king her sire her suit deny'd,
Vow'd, for his sake, to shun the name of bride.
He urg'd his hopes, by many battles won
In former fields, by trophies yet unknown,
Which still he hop'd in future fields to gain,
For the king's fame and welfare of his reign,
To rise so high in rank, the monarch's voice
Should yield his daughter, and confirm her choice.
Behold (he cry'd) the point my love has gain'd,
And none, I deem, has equal grace obtain'd.

I seek no other at Geneura's hand,
Till sanctify'd by Hymen's holy band:
'Twere vain to ask her more, whose virtuous mind
Leaves every maid in chastity behind.

When Ariodantes thus with truth declar'd
How far he deem'd his love might find reward,
Duke Polineffo, who with guile devis'd
To make Geneura by her knight despis'd,
Thus fraudulent pursu'd—Now hear me tell,
How far my happier chance can thine excel.

With thee she feigns, she scorns thy hated name,
While with vain hope she feeds thy boasted flame;
But better proofs of love to me affords,
Than airy promises, and empty words;
Which, under secrecy, I shall reveal;

Though ladies' favours we should still conceal.
No conscious month revolves, but sees
Full many a night to fair Geneura's bed;
Beholds me clasp her yielding in my arms,
And riot, unconfin'd, in all her charms.

Judge,
Judge, if thy favours can with mine compare:
Then yield to me, and seek some kinder fair,
Since love has crown'd my happier fortune there.

'Tis false! (thus Ariodant incens'd replies)
Thou hast defam'd the fair with odious lies;
And hast devis'd what thou hast said, to prove
If shallow tales can fright me from my love.
But since too much Geneura's fame they stain,
It suits, what thou hast spoken, to maintain.
This instant will I brand thee, ere we part,
A liar and a traitor in thy heart.

'Twere weak indeed (the duke again reply'd)
A strife like this by combat to decide;
When here I offer, what these lips have told,
Those eyes shall witness, and the truth behold.

At this to stagger Ariodant began,
While through his bones a chilling tremor ran;
And but some glimmering yet of hope remain'd,
His heart had scarce its vital heat retain'd.
His bosom throb'd, his shifting colour fled,
As thus at length with faltering words he said:
When you disclose this deed before my sight,
(Attend me here my sacred promise plight)
Thenceforth I vow to leave Geneura free,
So liberal found to you, so harsh to me!
But vain your words my constant mind to move,
Unless these eyes her fatal falsehood prove.
This said, they parted: soon was fix'd again
The night my treacherous duke to entertain:
When to complete the snare his craft had wrought,
My guileful lover Ariodantes fought;
And bade him take his stand th' ensuing night
Amidst those ruin'd piles, conceal'd from sight.

But Ariodantes now in thought began
To doubt that this conceal'd some murderous train;
That the false duke, by rival hatred sway'd,
A secret ambush for his life had laid,
Pretending there a cruel proof to give
Of what his thoughts till then could ne'er conceive:
Yet was he firm to go, but on his guard,
Resolved for all assaults to be prepar'd;
That, if the chance requir'd, he bravely might Withstand his ambush'd enemy in fight.
His brother was a knight of prudence found,
Of all the court in arms the most renown'd,
Lurcanio call'd, and lest, with him, he fear'd,
Than if ten others on his side appear'd.
This gallant youth he bade his arms prepare,
And led th' adventure of the night to share.

Not
Not that he told the secrets of his heart,
For these to him, nor none, would he impart.

And now approach'd so near the destin'd place,
As from the hand a stone might fly the space,
He stopp'd Lurcanio there, and thus he said:
When need demands, then haften to my aid;
But till my voice you hear, forbear to move;
Be silent, as you prize your brother's love.
Go, fear me not,—(his brother thus reply'd)
Then Ariodantes, parting from his side,
Went to th' appointed place, his station took,
And on my window fix'd his anxious look.

Now, from a different part the traitor came,
So ready to pollute Geneura's fame;
Without delay the wonted signal made
To me, who little knew what snare was laid.

Then in a dress Geneura us'd, to wear,
Soon as I found my Polineffo there,
I from th' apartment to the gallery drew,
And stood, on every side expos'd to view.

My vest was white, and richly to behold,
Deck'd all around with costly fringe of gold;
A golden net descending from my head
With crimson flowers, was o'er my habit spread.
Lurcanio now, who deem'd with anxious mind
Some ill for Ariodantes' life design'd,
And partly by a natural passion led,
Desire of knowing how his fortune sped,
With wary tread his brother's steps pursu'd,
And silent near him undiscover'd stood.
Meanwhile I thoughtless came: the silver moon
Resplendent on my glittering garments shone:
Nor seem'd I much unlike the royal fair,
In outward person, or in borrow'd air;
And both the brethren, by the duke deceiv'd,
The well-concerted fraud for truth believ'd.
Judge at that time what cruel pangs possest'd
The wretched Ariodantes' tortur'd breast.
Now Polinesso comes, and full in sight
Receives the ladder, and ascends the height.
Then, thinking none beheld what fondly pass'd,
Around his neck my eager arms I cast,
And, as I ever had my Duke carest'd,
With many a tender kiss his lips I press'd,
Which he with warmth return'd: th' unhappy knight,
Who stood spectator of this hated sight,
So deeply sunk beneath the load of grief,
His soul resolv'd from death to seek relief:

He
He drew the sword, despairing, from his side,
And to his breast the fatal point apply'd.
Lurcanio (who surpris'd my lover view'd
Ascend the gallery where disguis'd I stood,
But knew not for the duke) advanc'd with speed,
Soon as he saw his brother's frantic deed,
And seizing haftily his furious hand,
From his rash act the hapless knight restrain'd:
Had he been more remote, or longer stay'd,
In vain, alas! had prov'd his pious aid.

Ah wretched, senseless brother! (thus he cry'd)
What rage has turn'd your better thoughts aside?
Thus for a woman is your death design'd?
All false, as clouds that flit before the wind!
Far rather let her die, her sex's stain!
But for a nobler end your life retain.
Before this crime she juxty claim'd your love;
But now she should alone your hatred move;
Since your own eyes have witness'd to her shame,
And seen how low she prostitutes her fame.
Then let those arms, against yourself employ'd,
Before the king her fire her fate decide.

When Ariodantes sees his brother nigh,
He seeks no longer on his sword to die;
With seeming calm he veils his secret pains,
But still his former purpose fix'd remains.
Departing thence, he with him bears the smart
That gives no ease to his distracted heart.

Next morning early he the court forsook,
(Nor leave of brother, or of friends he took)
None but Lucanio and the duke could know
The cause that made him thus his home forego;
While of his absence, in the royal court,
And o'er the land, was various the report.

Eight days elaps'd, at length a pilgrim came
With mournful tidings to the princely * dame,
That Ariodantes in the sea was lost:
Not by the Eastern wind, or Boreas tost,
But that himself his own destruction found,
And leaping headlong in the waves, was drown'd.
Ere this last fatal act (the stranger said)
He thus bespoke me, there by fortune led:
"Draw near, my friend, and be Geneura told
The hidden cause of what you now behold:
Tell her 'tis this, these eyes too much have seen,
Ah! happy, if these eyes had never been!"
By chance we then upon a mountain stood
That tow'rs Hibernia bellies o'er the flood.

* GENEURA.
Soon as he ceas'd to speak, I saw him leap
From the high rock, and plunge into the deep.
Him in the sea I left; and now I come
To bring the tidings of his hapless doom.

Half dead with grief the news Geneura heard;
A sudden paleness on her face appear'd.
O Heaven! what did she, and what words she said,
When laid in private on her faithful bed!
She strikes her bosom, and her garment tears,
She rends with cruel hands her golden hairs;
Repeating oft what, with his latest breath,
Sad Ariodantes nam'd his cause of death;
That the strange issue of his fate was such,
His eyes in hapless hour had seen too much!

Soon was the fame o'er all the kingdom spread,
Of Ariodantes thus untimely dead.
Not with dry eyes the king his loss survey'd;
While pious tears each knight and lady paid.
At these unhappy tidings, o'er the rest
Heart-piercing anguish fill'd his brother's breast;
By such example oft his soul inclin'd
To die, and be at least in death conjoin'd;
This many a time returning to his thought,
That false Geneura such destruction wrought.
At length revenge so far possess'd his mind,
So far did rage and grief his reason blind;
That he the royal grace no longer prize'd;
But the king's hatred, and the land's despis'd.
The peers assembled now, the time he took
T' address the throne, and thus indignant spoke.
Attend, my lord! while I the cause relate
That urg'd my brother to his hapless fate.
Your daughter's was the crime: 'twas the distress'd
With deep affliction Ariodantes' breast.
He lov'd the princess; (why should I conceal
Or blush so pure a passion to reveal?)
And hop'd at length t' obtain her for his bride,
By numerous virtues, and by service try'd.
But while the bashful lover thus receives
The modest odor of the distant leaves,
He sees another to the tree ascend,
And from the boughs the blooming fruitage rend.
He said, and instant to the king display'd
The seeming crime, so late to sight betray'd,
Attest'ing that himself beheld the dame
Receive the secret partner of her shame;
A wretch unknown, that veil'd in dark disguise
Conceal'd his person from observing eyes:

M 2

Concluding.
Concluding, that he stood in fight prepar'd
To prove the truth of all his tongue declar'd. 445
Judge if the father struck with grief appear'd,
When he this fatal accusation heard;
Both with the tale surpriz'd, and that he knew,
Unles's to her defence some warrior drew
To give Lurcanio in the field the lye, 450
He must his dearest child condemn to die.

Our laws, my lord! have doubtless reach'd your ear,
Where every damsel is by doom severe
Condemn'd to certain death, who yields her charms
To any other but a husband's arms; 455
Unles's some knight th' accuser dares to brave,
And from her threaten'd fate the damsel save.

The king has caus'd his heralds to proclaim,
(As deeming falsehood wrongs Geneura's fame)
That he who clears her honour from the stain, 460
The royal maid, with princely gifts, shall gain.
As yet no champions in her cause appear,
Each views his fellow's face with marks of fear;
In arms so dreadful is Lurcanio's might,
That all, with terror, seem to shun the fight. 465
Her cruel fortune adds this sorrow more,
Her absent brother treads a foreign shore.
The brave Zerbino, who in field displays
Such deeds as merit ever-during praise:
But could he hear in time her dangerous state,
How would he fly t' avert his sister's fate!

The monarch, who would all his thoughts employ
By other means, than arms, the truth to try,
Secur'd some dam'els of Geneura's train
In hopes the fatal secret to explain;
And hence I dreaded, if myself were caught,
The duke and I in danger might be brought.
That night, in fear, the palace I forsook,
And, privately withdrawing, sought the duke;
Declar'd how much to both it might import
That I without delay should quit the court.
He prais'd my prudence; promis'd to provide
A safe asylum where I might reside;
Appointing two, to guide me through the wood,
Where near, he said, his lonely fortress stood.

Reflect, sir knight, if acts like mine should prove
To Polinesio marks of faithful love;
Then say, that maids must ever hope in vain
For tender love to be belov'd again.

This cruel, perjur'd, and ungrateful man,
At length to doubt my constant faith began;
And fearing left I should at length reveal
The treacherous act he labour'd to conceal;
He feign'd I should awhile from court retire,
Apart to shun the king's impending ire;
And sent me thence to this remote retreat,
Here, not my safety, but my death to meet.
For secretly he gave my guides command,
Soon as their steps had reach'd this forest-land,
To take my life — lo! how my faith was paid!
Too well his dire command had been obey'd,
Had not my cries so timely reach'd your ears:
Behold how Love his votaries prefers!

Thus to the Paladin Dalinda told
Her mournful tale, while still their way they hold;
And if before he meant t' assist the dame,
When just suspicion seem'd to tax her fame;

Ver. 504. Thus to the Paladin — See Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, where the circumstances of the plot, so far as relate to Claudio and Hero, are very similar to this story of Ariodantes and Geneura: but one of our last new tragedies, called The Law of Lombardy, is more immediately built on the incidents of Ariosto's fable. This story of Geneura was imitated by Melain de Gelais, a French poet, about 1572. Another tale was written on the same subject, entitled, Conte de l'Infante Geneure fille du roy d'Ecosse, 1556.
More earnest now his bosom's zeal appear'd,
When thus the cruel calumny he heard.
Then tow'rs St. Andrew's town with eager haste
Rinaldo with the squire and damsel pass'd;
The king and court were there; and there the strife
Must soon decide his daughter's death or life.

As nearer to the neighbouring town they drew,
They found a squire who gave them tidings new;
That a strange champion there in armour came,
Who undertook to clear Geneura's fame;
Unknown his cuirass, and unknown his shield,
His name and lineage from his squire conceal'd;
For since he first appear'd, he ne'er expos'd
His face to view, but wore his beaver clos'd.

This heard, Rinaldo swift his way pursu'd,
And soon the city and the gates he view'd.
There seem'd Dalinda for oppress'd with fear,
Till brave Rinaldo's words her spirits cheer:
Observing how the gates were closely barr'd,
He ask'd the cause, and thus reply'd the guard:
That thence the crowds were fled to view the fight
Between Lurcanio and a stranger-knight,
Which, distant, on a spacious plain they wag'd,
And that the combatants were then engag'd.
None here Rinaldo’s eager course oppos’d,
The porter open’d, and the gate re-clos’d:
Through the void city pass’d the gallant knight;
But, by the way, he made the dame alight; 535
And bade her wait the issue of the fight.

Impatient thence he haftens to the field,
Where the two knights their wrathful weapons wield;
Who many blows had giv’n on either part:
There fought Lucanio with revengeful heart
Against Geneura; while on t’other hand
The stranger’s courage well her cause maintain’d.
With these, six warriors in the lifts appear
On foot, the cuirasses on their breast they wear.
The duke of Albany there takes his place,
Upon a gallant steed of generous race:
To him, as to high constable, they yield
To keep the order of the lifted field.
Fierce were his looks, exulting in his thought,
To see Geneura in such danger brought.

Through the thick press Rinaldo forc’d his way;
No multitudes Bayardo’s course could stay:
Those, who the tempest of his coming found,
Appear’d not slow to give the courser ground.
Rinaldo, eminent above the rest,
Appear’d the flower of chivalry confess:

Till,
"Till, near the king arriv'd, his course he stay'd;
All listening round to hear the words he said.

My noble lord, (the champion thus began)
The hands of yonder combatants restrain.

Whoe'er shall perish in the doubtful strife,
Must undeserv'd resign a noble life.

One thinks himself by justice only led,
But treason o'er his sense a mist has spread:

That fatal error which his brother flew,
Himself to brave the dangerous combat drew:

The other knows not yet if wrong or right
Attend his cause, but issues to the fight,

The courteous provess of his arms to try,
Rather than let such matchless beauty die.

Lo! here I come to give the guiltless aid,
Avenging on the traitor, the betray'd:

But first, bid each awhile his rage forbear,
Then audience give to what I shall declare.

The king was mov'd with what Rinaldo said,
Both by his words and noble presence sway'd;
Then, stretching out his hand, commands the peace,

And bids awhile the combatants to cease:

When to the king, and barons of the land,
The knights, and populace on either hand,
Rinaldo all the subtle snare display'd
By Polinefso for Geneura laid.
The tale explain'd, he offer'd with his sword
Ev'n there to prove the truth of every word.
Now Polinefso, summon'd to the place,
Appear'd with deep confusion in his face;
But yet with boldness he the fact deny'd:
Soon shall we (said Rinaldo) this decide.

Thus, ready arm'd, the list prepar'd in view,
They both, without delay, to combat drew.

What transport to the king, and all the land,
To hear Geneura's innocence maintain'd!
Each hop'd, that God would openly proclaim
How falsehood had defac'd her spotless name.
The duke was known for every treacherous art,
Unjust, and cruel, fraudulent of heart,
That none could wonder such a villain's mind,
A snare so horrid and so black design'd!

Now Polinefso stands with fear confess'd,
With bloodless visage, and with panting breast.
Thrice sounds the trump, and at the warning blast,
His lance in rest the trembling traitor plac'd.
On t'other hand Rinaldo came, and try'd
At one fierce course the conflict to decide.

Nor
Nor err'd the weapon from the knight's intent, 605
But through the traitor's panting bosom went:
Pierc'd through and through, he, by the dreadful force,
Was borne to earth six feet beyond his horse.
Rinaldo now dismounts; and, as he lies,
Swift from the helpless wretch his helm unties. 610
But he, unable more to wage the war,
For mercy then prefers his humble prayer;
And to the king, and court on every side,
Confess'd the fraud for which he justly dy'd.
While yet with weak and faltering words he spoke,
His utterance fail'd, and life his limbs forsook. 616
The king rejoic'd his much-lov'd child to see
From threaten'd death, and ignominy free.
Not with such transport (had some hostile power
Driv'n him an exile from his native shore) 620
Had he his crown regain'd; and hence he gave Distinguisht honours to Rinaldo brave.
But when, his helmet rais'd, he knew the knight,
(A face before no stranger to his sight)
With lifted hands his thanks to Heaven he paid, 625
That sent so fam'd a champion to his aid.
The knight, who first t' assist Geneura came,
(Unknown to all his country and his name) Who,
Who, arm'd in her defence, had fought the field,
Remain'd apart; and all that pass'd, beheld. 630
But now the king desir'd his name to know,
And begg'd him from his casque his face to show;
That as his generous purpose claim'd regard,
He might with royal gifts such worth reward.
At length, with much entreaty, from his head 635
He rais'd his helmet, and to fight display'd
What in th' ensuing book we shall reveal,
If grateful to your ear appears my tale.

THE ARGUMENT.

The conclusion of the story of Geneura. Rogero is carried by the flying-horse to Alcina's island, where he finds a knight turned into a myrtle, who gives him an account of his transformation, and warns him to shun the wiles of the sorcerers. Rogero engages in combat with a troop of monsters, who oppose his passage from the city of Alcina; and is afterwards accosted by two ladies belonging to her palace.

M O S T wretched man, who hopes in long disguise
To veil his evil deeds from mortal eyes!
Though all were silent else, the sounding air,
The conscious earth his trespass shall declare:
Th' Almighty oft in wisdom so provides,
The sin to punishment the sinner guides,
Who, whilst he strives t' elude each watchful sight,
Unheeding brings his lurking guilt to light.
False Polinesso deem'd his state secure,
And all his treason from discovery sure;
Dalinda thus remov'd, from whom alone
He deem'd th' important secret could be known:

With
With crimes increasing, to the future blind,
He hasten'd on that fate he shunn'd to find;
At once resigning wealth, the valu'd claim
Of friends, of life, and honour's nobler name!

Now each, impatient, urg'd the stranger-knight
To show his face so long conceal'd from sight;
At length he lifted up the helm he wore,
Disclosing features oft disclos'd before:
Then Ariodantes all with joy perceiv'd
Him, for whose loss the realm of Scotland griev'd;
That Ariodantes, whom, by fame mislaid,
Geneura and his brother wept for dead;
For whom the king, the court, the people mourn'd;
So brave a knight, with every grace adorn'd!

In this the peasant's truth appear'd to fail,
Whose lips had told the fair that fatal tale:
Yet had his eyes beheld the desperate knight
Leap headlong from the rocky mountain's height.
But, as it oft befalls the wretch, whose grief
Calls death, when distant, to his wish'd relief;
To quit his purpose, when he sees him near,
So dark and comfortless his paths appear:
Thus Ariodantes, plunging in the wave,
With late repentance sought his life to save;

And
And strong of limbs, above the waters bore
His head, and ply'd his arms and swam to shore.

Now every former thought of death he blam'd,
And senseless and unjust his fancy nam'd,

Then journey'd on with garments briny-wet,
Till in a hermit's cave he shelter met;

Resolv'd awhile in secret there to stay,
Till time should to his ears the truth convey,
If for his loss suppos'd, Geneura griev'd,
Or if with joy the tidings she receiv'd.

And soon he heard so far her sorrows wrought,
As near to death th' unhappy virgin brought;
That stern Lurcanio, by resentment sway'd,
Had to the king accus'd the guiltless maid.

Now fierce his wrath against his brother turn'd,
Fierce as before for love his bosom burn'd.

With grief he learnt, that yet no gallant knight
Had ventur'd in Geneura's cause to fight:
Lurcanio's wisdom and his valour known,
All seem'd with care the doubtful strife to shun;
And thought the youth, in such a dangerous strife,
'T affert a falsehood ne'er would risk his life.

But Ariodantes, by despair impell'd,
Resolv'd to meet his brother in the field.
Can I behold (the faithful lover said)
To cruel death my fair Geneura led?
Whom still I must my queen and goddes prize,
Dear as the light that shines before my eyes!
Just or unjust the cause, still let me fly
For her lov'd sake to conquer or to die.
Yet, ah! too sure I shall the wrong defend;
But be it wrong; my blood the strife shall end!
One thought alone in death will give me pain,
That, if I fall, Geneura must be slain!
This comfort yet remains—'twill then be prov'd
How well by Polinesso was she lov'd:
Then may she view her lover's faith display'd,
Who ne'er appear'd to combat in her aid;
While me, whose truth she could so ill requite,
She sees, for her defence, thus slain in sight.
Lurcanio too his punishment shall feel,
For having kindled first this flame of ill:
Remorse and grief shall rend his tortur'd breast,
When all the fatal conflict stands confest;
When, thinking to revenge his brother's death,
He finds him by his hand depriv'd of breath!
So mus'd the knight; and, having thus decreed,
Procur'd new armour and a horse with speed;

His
B. VI: ORLANDO FURIOSEO

He next receiv'd a squire from Fortune's hand,
Unknown to all, a stranger in the land:
Thus well disguis'd, with him the knight pursu'd,
His way, and arm'd before his brother stood.
What follow'd then, my tale before has shown,
And how he was for Ariodantes known.

Not less the king rejoic'd his face to see,
Than his lov'd daughter from her danger free;
And justly deem'd he ne'er again could view
A youth in love so valiant and so true;
Who, when such seeming wrongs inflam'd his thought,
With his own brother, in her cause, had fought.
Urg'd by his court, and at Rinaldo's prayer,
He gave to Ariodant Geneura fair:
Albania's dukedom, which the king again
Receiv'd, the traitor Polineffo slain,
Which could not chance in more propitious hour,
He gave his daughter for her marriage dower.

Ver. 86. With yellow-green — ] The colour of fading leaves:
In chivalry, this colour was worn as a mark of desperation. So Bradamant, thinking herself forsaken by Rogerio, wears a scarf of the same colour. Book xxxii. ver. 325.
Rinaldo then Dalinda's cause embrac'd,
And pardon gain'd for all her errors past,
Who, weary'd with the world's unhappy state,
Had vow'd to Heaven her mind to dedicate.
Forfaking Scotland, she to Dacia went,
And there her days in hallow'd cloisters spent.
But now 'tis time to view Rogero's course,
Who cuts the skies upon the winged horse.

Though brave Rogero was to fear unbred,
Nor yet the colour from his cheeks had fled;
Full well I dare affirm, his heart must quake,
Like trembling leaves that to the breezes shak'd.
He now has left Europa's climes afar,
And past a mighty space, that region where Unconquer'd Hercules, in ages past,
His boundary to mariners had plac'd.

Ver. 120. His boundary to mariners — ] The straits of Gibraltar, where Hercules was said to have planted his pillars, as the utmost bounds of navigation, the great ocean lying beyond: Thus Tasso —

Tempo verrà, che fia d'Ercole i segni,
Favola vile ai naviganti indulgri.
The time will come, when sailors yet unborn
Shall name Alcides' narrow bounds in scorn.

The Griffin-horse, a beast most strange to sight,
With such a strength of pinion urg'd his flight,
No winged animal of swiftest breed
Could dare to mate with him in rapid speed:
Nor can we, join'd with him, the bird compare
Whose mighty talons Jove's artillery bear.
Not swifter scarce the glancing lightning flies;
Or vengeful bolt that rends the sullen skies.
At length he seems preparing, tir'd with flight,
In airy rings upon an isle to light:
An isle like that, where, from her lover fled,
Long time conceal'd within her secret bed,
The virgin Arethusa runs in vain
By a strange course beneath the roaring main.
'Midst all his way through ample fields of air,
Rogero had not seen a place so fair;
Nor, had he search'd the vary'd world around,
A more transporting clime could e'er have found.
To this the monfter with his rider bends,
And, after many a spacious wheel, descends.
There cultur'd plains and grassy hills appear,
Green meadows, shady banks, and waters clear;
Delightful groves, where palms and laurels grew,
Cedars, and myrtles, pleasing to the view:
With flowers and fruits the orange stands between;
All intermix'd, a various sylvan scene!
These, with their shade, afford a safe retreat
From all the burning of meridian heat.
Amid the boughs secure, with fluttering wing,
The nightingales with tuneful voices sing;
While 'midst the roses red, and lilies fair,
For ever nurs'd by kindly Zephyr's care,
The nimble hares, in wanton mazes, play'd;
And stately stags with branching antlers stray'd;
Without the fear of hostile hands they stood
To crop, or ruminate, their grassy food,
The wild goats frolic; leap the nimble-deer;
That in this rural place in troops appear.

Soon as the earth so nigh Rogero found,
To reach with safety, on th' enamell'd ground
With gladsome heart he leaps, but still detains
His flying courser by the straiten'd reins;
Till, 'twixt a laurel and a pine-tree plac'd,
He to a verdant myrtle ties him fast.
Near this a cool and chrysfal fountain flows,
Which fruitful palms and cedars round inclose.
His helm and buckler here aside he threw;
And from his hands his warlike gauntlets drew.

Now
Now to the hills he turn'd, and now the seas,
Receiving in his face the kindly breeze,
Which gently in the oaks and beeches play'd,
Whose waving tops a pleasing murmur made.
Now in the limpid stream he bathes his lips;
And now his hands within the water dips,
To cool his throbbing pulse, and veins that glow'd,
Opprest beneath his maffy armour's load.

Nor was it strange he should so fiercely burn,
Who had no little time his cuirasses worn;
But, thus completely arm'd, had made his way
Three thousand miles without a moment's stay.

Meantime his courser, that beside him stood
In the close shadow of the tufted wood,
Drew sudden back, impell'd with staring fear,
As from some object in the covert near;
But while in vain to lose his bands he try'd,
He shook the myrtle where his reins were ty'd;
Shook with such force, as made the leaves around
Fall from the boughs, and strow in heaps the ground:
As, when by chance a hollow cane is plac'd
Amid the flames by slow degrees to waste,
Soon as the heat has rarify'd the wind
That in its narrow womb remains confin'd,
Hissing it raves to be so closely pent,
Till freed at length the fury finds a vent:
So writh'd with pain th' offended tree appear'd,
Till, groaning, from its bark these words were heard,
If pity in your breast can entrance find,
As sure your looks proclaim a courteous mind,

Ver. 196. — these words were heard.] Spenser has a story of this kind, where Fadrybio is described as turned into a tree; on which passage Mr. Upton has the following remark:

"I believe that the reader need not be put in mind, that this wonderful tale (so well adapted to the genius of romance) is taken from Virgil, where Æneas plucking a bough of myrtle, sees from the rife drops of blood trickling down, from whence a piteous voice was heard:

Spare to pollute thy pious hands with blood—
O! fly from this inhospitable shore,
Warn'd by my fate, for I am Polydore.

DRYDEN Æn. B. III. ver. 60.

"'Tis no wonder that Ariosto (who is an allegorical and a moral writer, as well as a romance writer) should copy this tale from Virgil. Rogero, having tied his winged horse to a myrtle-tree, the ghost, which was therein lodged by enchantment, speaks to him and tells him, he was formerly a knight, but by the witchcraft of Alcina he was transformed into a tree; and that others were changed into various beasts and other forms; the true image of the man being lost through sensuality."

UPTON'S Notes to FAIRY QUEEN, B. i. C. §.

From
VI. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

From my torn trunk unbind this monster's rein:
Enough my own afflictions give me pain!
Nor need, alas! external rage be shown
'T increase the woes I have already known.

Rogero startled at the vocal sound,
But when his ears the wondrous speaker found,
Amaz'd he hasten'd and his steed unty'd,
His glowing face with flushing colour dy'd.
Forgive my crime, whate'er thou art (he said)
Or parted ghost, or goddess of the shade!

Unknowing that, beneath thy rugged rind
Conceal'd, an inmate spirit lay confin'd,
I suffer'd thus thy leaves to strow the place,
And to thy greens permitted this disgrace.

But, gracious still, refuse not to declare
Thy name that doft so strange a body wear,
In which inclos'd a human spirit lies;
So Heaven defend thee from inclement skies!

If all the power I from above receive
Can ease thy suffering, or thy woes relieve;
Behold, I promise by that virgin fair,
Whose image in my better part I bear,

I will with word and deed thy cause maintain,
As may deserve thy grateful thanks again.

Rogero
Rogero ceas'd; and, as the warrior spoke,
From head to foot the trembling myrtle shook:
Then from the bark exhald a dewy sweat;
Like green wood crackling in the fiery heat.
Thy courtesy (the myrtle thus began)
Persuades me to reveal my secret pain;
Both who I was, and what enchanted power
Transform'd my shape upon this fatal shore.
A Paladin of France was I, by name
Aftolpho call'd, and not unknown to fame,
Orlando and Rinaldo (who shall grace
With mighty deeds the earth) partake my race;
And, at my father Otho's death, the land
Of England would have fall'n to my command.

Ver. 232. Aftolpho call'd,—] Aftolpho makes a considerable figure in the Orlando Innamorato, where, in the course of his adventures, he is imprifoned by Monedant, a Pagan king, in the east, together with Rinaldo, Gryphon, Aquilant, and Dudon: but these knights being afterwards delivered by Orlando, set out to go to the assistance of Charlemain. Aftolpho, Rinaldo, and Dudon, travelling in company, arrive at the castle of Alcina, where Aftolpho is decoyed from the rest, in the manner here related by Ariofto.

Ver. 235. — Otho —] Ariofto has this tradition of a king of England, by the name of Otho, from the romance writers. See the genealogy of the house of Clarmont, Book xxiii. ver. 156.
So fair was I, that many a damsel bought
My love, till I my own destruction wrought,
Returning from those isles, around whose shores,
Remote from hence, the Indian ocean roars;
Where good Rinaldo and myself, detain'd
With others, long in prisons dark remain'd,
Till we again review'd the joyful light,
Freed by the valiant arm of Brava's knight:
Against the west, along those sands we came
That feel the southern heat of Phoebus' flame;
There, as our way and cruel fortune drew,
One morn we chanc'd a stately tower to view,
And if I'd thence Alcina we esp'y'd
Alone, and standing by the ocean's side;
Whatever fish she pleas'd, to land she brought.

Ver. 244. — Brava's knight: Orlando, called the knight of Brava.

Ver. 251. — without hook or net — This passage is entirely taken from Boyardo: Alcina fishing, her deceiving Aftolpho with the whale which appeared an island, &c. may be seen in the Orlando Innam. B. ii. C. xiii.

The various fishes taken by Alcina are said to denote the different ranks and conditions of men, that are captivated by vice; and the whale which carries away Aftolpho, to shew that we often forsake solid happiness for fallacious appearances.
At her command, the dolphins left the stream;
With open mouths the mighty tunnies came;
The sea-calves, rising troubled from their sleep,
For look their beds, and hasten'd from the deep:
Of various forms and size, a thousand more
In numerous shoals came swimming to the shore.
The monsters of the seas, tremendous whales
Above the water show'd their ample scales.
Among the rest a mighty whale we view'd,
The greatest sure that ever swam the flood,
And, as he lay unmov'd, by looks deceiv'd,
We all the monster for an isle believ'd;
So huge he seem'd, so vast a distance spread
From his broad tail extending to his head!
Alcina drew the fishes to the shore,
With nought but simple words and magic power.
Her, with Morgana, both for ill design'd,
One womb produc'd to punish human kind.

Ver. 269. — Morgana, — ] Morgana, a fairy, is a considerable personage in Boyardo, though but lightly touched upon in Ariosto; the former Poet calls her the Fairy of Riches; she imprisons many knights in her enchanted palace, and among the rest Rinaldo, Dudon, Prafildo, and Iroldo, who are released by the valour of Orlando: she tempts Orlando with the prospect of riches, which he despises. Spenser seems to have taken his idea of
Now on my face she cast her eager sight,
And seem’d to view my features with delight,
Then soon resolv’d me from my friends to part;
And ah! too well she prov’d her wily art!

For,

of Mammon’s tempting Guion, from this fiction of Boyardo.
Orlando being urged to prosecute an adventure that was to procure him great treasure, replies:

--- di pericol folo e di fatica,
Il cavalier si pasce e si nutrica:
Speranza d’acquistar oro ed argento,
La spada non m’aria fatto cavare.

The hardy knight, to deeds of glory bred,
Is nurs’d by labour and with danger fed;
Then deem not that I draw the sword in vain,
The silver bright, or gleaming gold to gain.

Berni, Orlando Innam. B. i. C. xxv.

Guion, in Spenfer, makes much the same answer to Mammon:

Regard of worldly luck doth fouly blend,
And low abase the high heroic sprite,
That joys for crowns and kingdoms to contend:
Fair shields, gay steeds, bright arms be my delight;
These be the riches fit for an adventurous knight.

B. ii. C. vii.

Thus Rogero, in Ariosto, in the present book:

--- la cagion ch’io vesto piastra e maglia,
Non è per guadagnar terra ne argento.

--- these shining arms my limbs enfold,
Not lands to conquer or to purchase gold.

Spenfer,
For, near advancing, with a smiling look,
With courteous, soft deportment, thus she spoke:
Sir knight! if you consent awhile to stay,
And kindly here vouchsafe to pass the day,
I'll show you, in the progress of my sport,
Of countless fishes every different sort;
Some soft, some hairy, some with scales all bright,
In number more than are the stars of night.
Or if you would a Syren view, whose voice
With tuneful music makes the waves rejoice,
Hence let us pass, and reach your neighbouring shore
To which she comes at this accustomed hour.

As thus she said, the monstrous whale she show'd,
Which seem'd a little isle in the flood.
While I too rashly (which I now lament)
Believ'd her words, and on the monster went;
Rinaldo, Dudon, beckon'd, but in vain;
Not all their cares my rash attempt restrain.
Alcina, with a smile, my steps pursu'd,
And left the two as on the strand they stood.

Spenser, in his description of the riches of Mammon, visited by Guion, had undoubtedly an eye upon a similar passage in Boyardo, where that poet describes at large the subterraneous palace of the witch Morgana.

See Orlando Innam. B. ii. C. viii.

B. VI. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 191

The whale, instructed well in her design,
Began to move, and cleave the foamy brine:
Then all too late my folly I deplore,
Soon as I see retreat the lessening shore.
Rinaldo leap'd, t' assist me, in the main,
But scarce escap'd with life to land again;
For then a furious wind was seen to rise,
That swell'd the seas, and blacken'd all the skies;
His following fortune ne'er attain'd my ear:
Meantime to dissipate my growing fear
Alcina gently strove, as all the day,
And next ensuing night, we held our way
Amidst the waves; at length this isle we gain,
O'er most of which Alcina holds her reign;
Which from her sister she unjustly won,
Who claims it, by her father's will, her own;
For she alone was born in marriage bed,
The others of incestuous mixture bred.

Ver. 303. His following fortune — Here Boyardo entirely leaves Astolfo, and Ariosto takes up the story.

Ver. 309. — from her sister — Logifilla: there were three sisters, Logifilla, Alcina, and Morgana. The allegory here is obvious. Alcina and Morgana represent luxury and lasciviousness; Logifilla, reason or virtue: these are continually at war with each other.

As
As these are of a fraudful, impious mind,
And prone to every deed of evil kind;
So does the other chastly spend her days,
And all her soul incline to virtue's ways.
Her sisters both conspire against her state;
And many troops have rais'd, with deadly hate,
To drive the virgin wholly from the land,
And have, at times, a hundred castles gain'd.
Nor Logistilla (such her name) had known
By this, the smallest portion here, her own;
But that a gulph her kingdom here defends,
And there a mountain's ridgy height ascends.
Nor yet Alcina and Morgana cease,
Nor let her ev'n possess this part in peace.
As vice and shameful pleasures fill their breast,
The virgin for her virtues they detest.
But to return to what myself besel,
And how I first became a tree, to tell.
Alcina gave me nameless charms to taste,
And all on me her ardent passion plac'd:
While in my arms such matchless sweets I press'd,
I seem'd at once of every joy possess'd;
Of every joy, which fortune's hands bestow
So sparingly on mortals here below.

France
France I forgot, each dearer care beside,
And love alone my amorous thoughts employ'd.
My eyes were fix'd upon her face so fair,
While every wish began and center'd there.
Her former lovers she esteem'd no more,
For many lovers she posses'd before:
I was her joy, was with her night and day,
And all the rest my high commands obey,
Mine was her love and mine the sovereign sway!
But wherefore do I thus inflame the wound?
For which, I fear, no cure can e'er be found?
Why recollect my happy hours, and know
That all my former bliss is turn'd to woe?
Too late, alas! I found her wavering mind
In love inconstant, as the changing wind!
For scarce two months I held the fairy's grace,
When a new youth was taken to my place,
Rejected then, I join'd the banish'd herd
That lost her love, as others were preferr'd:
Left these, o'er various lands and nations spread,
Should e'er divulge the shameful life she led,
Some here, some there, her potent charms restrain
In various forms imprison'd to remain;
In beeches, olives, palms, or cedars clos'd,
Or such as me you here behold expos'd;
In fountains some, and some in beasts confin'd,
As suits the wayward fairy's cruel mind.
And you, sir knight, that in ill hour have found,
By ways uncommon, this enchanted ground; 365
For whom some hapless lover must be spurn'd,
And to a senseless stone or river turn'd;
You shall such pleasures with Alcina find,
To call yourself the happiest of mankind;
But soon the common fate must be your own, 370
Chang'd to a beast, a fountain, tree, or stone.
Thus have I warn'd you of your dangerous state;
Not that I think you can elude your fate;
But yet, it fits you well inform'd to go,
And part, at least, of her deceits to know. 375
As different features in the face we find,
So differs too the genius of the mind;
And you, perhaps, some secret have in store,
T' escape what numbers ne'er escap'd before.
Roger, who Aftolpho knew by fame 380
The valiant cousin to his beauteous dame,
Much for his strange unheard of fortune mourn'd,
Whose form was to a senseless myrtle turn'd;
And for her sake, whose love his bosom fir'd,
T' assist th' unhappy warrior much desir'd: 385
But
B. VI. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 195

But here his power no further aid affords
Than kind consoling tears, and friendly words;
Yet, all he can! and now he seeks to know
If he to Logistilla's lands might go,
By any windings over hill or plain,
To shun the snares of false Alcina's reign.
A different path there lay (the myrtle said)
Which through rough crags and thorny thickets led,
If to the hill he kept the better hand;
But hard the pass, for there a numerous band
Of armed men were plac'd to guard the land.

His thanks Rogero to the myrtle paid,
Then took his leave, and parted from the shade,
Instructed well: his courser by the rein
He leads, but dares not press his back again;
While various schemes he fashions in his mind,
How safely Logistilla's realms to find.
Firm was his purpose every means to try,
Rather than in Alcina's bondage lie.
And first, he thought again to mount his horse,
And spur him through the air a distant course:
But fear soon made him lay that thought aside,
Nor tempt the danger he so lately try'd.
Unlefs I err (thus to himself he said)
By force a passage yonder shall be made.

Now,
Now, as he pass'd along the ocean's side,
Alcina's stately city he descried.
An ample wall the whole encompass'd round,
Which wide inclos'd a mighty space of ground.
The height appear'd to reach the distant skies,
And seem'd of solid gold to wondering eyes!
When now more nearly to the walls he drew,
(Such walls as ne'er before could mortals view)
He left the plain and beaten path, that straight
Led o'er the meadow to the lofty gate;
And to the right, that tow'rs the mountain lay,
The warrior more securely took his way.
But soon an hideous crew oppos'd his course
With savage fury, and with brutal force.

Ver. 423. — an hideous crew — ] This passage is copied by Spenser in his Fairy Queen, where he describes the troop of carnal lufts, besieging the fort or dwelling of temperance.

B. ii. C. xi.

Deformed creatures in strange difference,
Some having heads like harts, some like to snakes,
Some like wild boars late rous'd out of the brakes,
Some like to hounds, some like to apes dismayer'd,
Some like to puttocks all in plumes array'd.

These monsters that attempt to stop Rogero, in his passage to Logistilla, or Virtue, signify the different species of vice in the most brutal and sordid shapes. Their captain is Idleness, the promoter of every evil.
A crew so strange was never seen before,
That such deform'd and monstrous figures wore.
Some from the neck below appear'd like men,
While heads of apes and cats above were seen;
Some, running, stamp'd with goatish feet the road,
And some the shape of nimble centaurs show'd.
Lascivious youths were there, and old men mad;
Some naked, some in hairy vestments clad.
One, without reins, a speedy courser rides;
This, a slow ass; and that, an ox bestrides:
Some press the ostrich, eagle, or the crane:
One held a bowl; a horn another blew:
Female and male, some, mixtures of the two.
A file one bore, and one a ladder took;
A shovel, this; and that, an iron hook.
The captain of the band was there beheld,
His face was bloated, and his paunch was swell'd.
Upon a tortoise heavily he sate,
And mov'd along the field in tardy state;
His limbs supported as he pass'd along;
Drowsy with wine his heavy eye-lids hung.
Some from his face and forehead wip'd the sweat;
And others fann'd him to abate the heat.
One form'd with human feet, with hands and breast,
But like a dog his head and ears confest,
With barking fought Rogero's course to stay,
And make him to the city bend his way.
You threat in vain (reply'd th' undaunted knight)
While I have power to wield this sword in fight.
As thus he spoke, his shining blade he drew,
And brandish'd it before the monster's view:
The monster thought to strike him with his spear,
But this Rogero saw, and drawing near,
Swift through his paunch the deadly weapon sent;
That through his back, a foot behind, it went.
And now, his courage rous'd, he brac'd his shield,
But still his foes more numerous press'd the field,
On every hand at once attack'd the knight,
Who with unyielding force maintain'd the fight;
While, as amid the furious throng he press'd,
Some to the teeth he clove, and some the breast:
Shield, helm, and cuirass no defence afford,
Against the edge of his descending sword.
But now, thick swarming, round the youth they close,
And so on every side his course oppose,
To force the throng a greater strength demands
Than huge Briareus with his hundred hands.
Yet
Yet from the covering had the knight reveal'd
Before their eyes the necromancer's shield,
(That shield, whose lustre laid the gazers low,
Left by Atlantes at his saddle-bow)
At once their headlong fury had been quell'd,
And prostrate all to press the earth compell'd:
But here his generous soul perchance disdain'd
To gain a conquest, not by valour gain'd.
He fought, determin'd rather on the field
To die, than to such foes his freedom yield:
When sudden from the gate appear'd in sight
(Where shone the walls with golden splendor bright)
Two lovely dames, whose air and habit show'd
That not to lineage mean their birth they ow'd;
Nor seem'd brought up in humble cottage state,
But bred in rich apartments of the great;
Each on a beauteous unicorn was plac'd,
Whose snowy hue the ermin's white defac'd.

Ver. 485. — lovely dames, — ] By these two ladies, who easily persuade Roger to turn again and enter the city of Alcina, may be generally understood, that though a good disposition will for a long time withstand the assaults of vice, which comes undisguised in its native deformity, it may notwithstanding yield to that temptation, which appears dressed up in the garb of decency.

Ver. 489. — a beauteous unicorn — ] I see no particular allegorical allusion in the unicorns, on which these ladies are
So lovely both were form'd, so richly drest,
And every look such dignity express'd,
That each enraptur'd gazer seem'd to own
Their charms were worthy heavenly eyes alone.
Beauty and gallantry such forms must wear,
Would they embody'd to the sight appear!

And now the damsels near the meadow drew,
Where brave Rogero closely press'd they view.
At once on every side disperse the bands:
The ladies to the knight present their hands,
Who, while his visage blush'd with rosy-red,
Return'd them thanks for such a courteous deed;
Then, at their suit, agreed to turn once more
And seek the golden gate he shunn'd before.

The ornaments that o'er the portal rise,
And jutting forward seem to meet the eyes,

are seated, which seem merely inserted for the sake of poetical description; and may be very allowable in this author, when Tasso, in the historical part of his poem, has employed the same fictitious animals to draw the chariot of Armida.
On every side are richly cover'd round
With jewels, that in eastern climes abound.
Huge stately columns, by a master-hand
Of di'mond fram'd, the solid weight sustain'd.

So fair a structure ne'er before was seen
To fate the ravish'd eyes of mortal men!
Before the threshold wanton damsels wait,
Or sport between the pillars of the gate:
But beauty more had brighten'd in their face,
Had modesty attemper'd every grace.
In veftures green each damsel swept the ground,
Their temples fair with leafy garlands crown'd.
These, with a courteous welcome, led the knight
To this sweet paradise of soft delight.

And sure we this a paradise may name,
Where gentle love first lights his lambent flame!
Where festive pleasures every day employ,
Where every moment pass'd wing'd with joy!
No thoughts of hoary age depress the mind,
Nor care, nor want, can here an entrance find;
While, with her horn, obsequious Plenty stands,
To pour her riches forth from willing hands;
And with a smiling front, for ever clear,
Inviting April revels through the year.

Enamour'd
Enamour'd youths, and tender damsels, seem
To chant their loves beside a purling stream.
Some, by a branching tree, or mountain's shade,
In sports and dances press the downy glade;
While one discloses to his friend, apart,
The secret transports of his amorous heart.
High o'er the beech and oak, with wing display'd,
High o'er the lofty pine and laurel shade,
The little loves in sportive circles fly,
And view their triumphs with exulting eye:
One at a lover's breast his weapon aims;
With fraudulent art his nets another frames:
Here in the stream they temper shafts, and there
On circling stone their blunted points repair.
A stately courser soon was given the knight,
Of colour bay, and gallant in the fight;
His costly trappings, glorious to behold,
Were all with jewels deck'd, and shone with gold!
The old magician's steed, of winged kind,
A youth receiv'd, and slowly led behind.
The damsels now, whose aid dispers'd the band
That durst Rogero's purpos'd course withstand,
Thus to the knight their gentle speech address'd:
My lord! your valiant deeds, this day confess'd,
Have
B.WI. ORLANDO FURioso. 299.

Have given us courage from your hand to claim:
A task that well befits your matchless fame!

Soon shall we come, where in our way there glittles,
A flood, that in two parts the plain divides.

A cruel wretch, we Eriphila name,
Defends the bridge and passage of the stream:
On all that tempt the path the furious flies;
Dreadful she seems, a giantess in size!

Poisonous her bite, long tushes arm her jaws;
And like a bear's her nails and shaggy paws:
Nor here alone her threatening rage she bends,
And 'gainst each passenger the bridge defends:

Know, that the monstrous crew, whose fury late
Oppos'd your course without the golden gate,
Her offspring are; like her for prey they luft,
And like their dam are cruel and unjust.

Rogero then: Not one alone demand,
But ask a hundred battles at my hand.

Ver. 559. — Eriphila — ] Eriphila is explained to mean avarice: she is said to guard the bridge that leads to Alcina, to paint the avarice of women that will not satisfy the amorous desires of men, without liberal rewards.

Whate'er
Whate’er defence my prowess can afford, 575
Is yours—command my person and my sword:
’Tis hence, these shining arms my limbs enfold,
Not lands to conquer, or to purchase gold,
But to display to all my guardian care,
Much more to dames so courteous and so fair! 580

The dames return’d him thanks with grateful heart,
In words that equall’d well his great desert.
In converse thus they pass’d, till near they drew,
Where both the bridge and stream appear’d in view.
There they the guardian of the pass behold 585
With jewels blazing rich on arms of gold.

But, till another book, I cease to tell
What with the giantess the knight besel.

THE

SEVENTH BOOK

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO:
THE ARGUMENT.

Rogélio encounters Eriphila, and, conducted by the two dam-sels, arrives at the palace of Alcina, who receives him with great joy: he is seduced by her allurements, and leads a life of luxury and effeminacy. Bradamant, hearing no tidings of him since he was carried away by the griffin-horse, is in great affliction for his absence: she is met by Melisfa, who undertakes to deliver him. Melisfa assumes the form of Atlantes, and accosts the young warrior, reproaching him with his degeneracy.
THE SEVENTH BOOK OF ORLANDO FURIOSO.

Who travels into foreign climes, shall find
What ne'er before was imag'd to his mind;
Which, when he tells, the hearers shall despise,
And deem his strange adventures empty lyes,
The herd unletter'd nothing will believe
But what their senses plainly can perceive;

Ver. 5. The herd unletter'd — ] The author here plainly declares, that the wonderful tales related by him have a concealed allegory: so Berni, ORLANDO INNAM. B. i. C. xxv.

Questi draghi fatati, questi incanti,
Questi giardini, e libri, e corini, e cani,
Ed huomini selvatichi, e giganti,
E fiere, e mostri, ch' hanno visi umani,
Hence I shall ne'er with common minds prevail,
But little credit will they yield my tale.
Yet what imports to me the vulgar ear,
When these my words, without conception, hear?
To you I write, whose judgment can descry
The secret truths that veil'd in fable lie.

Son fatti per dar pasto agli ignoranti,
Ma voi, ch' avete gl' intelletti sanii,
Mirate la dottrina, che s' sfonda
Sotte queste coperte alte e profonde.

These fated dragons, every magic change,
These books, and horns, and dogs, and gardens strange;
These savage men, these shapes of giant race,
And beasts and monsters with a human face,
Are feign'd to please the vulgar ear; but you,
Whom favouring pow'rs with better sense induce,
Can see the doctrine sage, that hidden lies
Beneath these mystic fables' deep disguise.

Thus Milton:

And if aught else great bards beside
In sage and solemn tunes have sung
Of turneys and of trophies hung,
Of forests and enchantments drear,
Where more is meant than meets the ear.

IL PENSEROSSO.

Ver. 11. To you I write, — ] Some suppose that Arieòto here particularly addresses himself to Hippolito and Alphonso; but it rather seems a general apostrophe to every reader of taste and discernment.
B. VII. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 209

I left you there, when to the bridge and stream,
By Eriphila kept, the warrior came.
A coat of mail of finest steel she wore,
With gems of various colours cover'd o'er;
The ruby red, the chrysolite was seen,
The yellow topaz, and the emerald green.
Her giant bulk no common steed bestrode;
A mighty wolf sustain'd her ponderous load:
A wolf she rode; and o'er the river crost,
With stately trappings of no vulgar cost.
A beast so large Apulia never bred;
High as an ox he rear'd his towering head:
His frothy mouth no curbing bit restrain'd,
Nor know I how his foaming course she rein'd;
Her scarf a sandy hue display'd to sight,
And o'er her armour cast a fullen light:
Rais'd on her crest, and in her targe she held,
A pictur'd toad with loathsome poison swell'd.
The damfels shew'd her to th' expecting knight,
Where, from the bridge, she stood prepar'd for fight:
And, as her custom was, his course to stay:
Soon as she saw Rogero on the way,

Ver. 20. A mighty wolf — ] By the wolf, which is represented without reins, may be signified the infatiable nature of avarice, which is not to be restrained.

Vol. I. P Fiercely
Fiercely she bade him turn: he nought reply'd, But grasp'd his spear, and her to fight defy'd. Nor less the giantess, with active heat, Spurr'd her huge wolf, and fix'd her in the seat; And, as she ran, her spear in rest she took, While trembling earth beneath her fury shook: But soon o'erthrown, supine her limbs were spread; So strong Rogero struck beneath her head, That, forc'd before the dreadful lance to yield, Six feet beyond she tumbled on the field. Then swift he drew his falchion from his side, Her head from her huge body to divide; As well he might, while in the flowery way, Already senseless, Eriphila lay. But here the ladies cry'd — Enough, sir knight! No further urge the vengeance of the fight: Behold her quell'd — then sheath your conquering sword, Let us our way resume, and pass the ford.

This said; they for a while their course pursu'd Amidst the covert of a mazy wood.

Ver. 48. — already senseless — ] Eriphila being overthrown, but not killed, is said to denote that liberality, used at the instigation of vice, is not perfect virtue, which entirely roots up avarice.
In vain each day of all she met enquir'd;
She heard no news of what her soul desir'd.
Oft to the host of Saracens she went,
And sought her lover there from tent to tent:
Between her lips the wondrous ring she held,
Which kept her safe from every eye conceal'd;
She cannot, dares not, yet believe him dead,
For such a warrior's death had doubtless spread
From where the tide of fam'd Hydaspes flows,
To where the sun descends to his repose.
Uncertain of his fate, she hopes, she fears;
Her sad companions are her sighs and tears!
At length she fix'd once more the cave to seek,
Where Merlin, from his tomb, was wont to speak;
And round the shrine such deep affliction show,
The marble cold should soften at her woe:
There might she learn if yet her knight surviv'd,
Or lay, by doom severe, of life depriv'd;
And thence inform'd her future course pursue,
As from the sage her counsel best she drew.
With this intent she took her lonely way
Tow'rd the thick forest that by Poictiers lay;
Where deep the vocal tomb of Merlin stood,
Hid in drear caves, surrounded by a wood.
But that enchantress, whose benignant mind
Reveal'd to Bradamant her race design'd,
Each day desir'd to learn the virgin's state,
And often try'd her art t' explore her fate.
Rogero freed and lost again she knew,
And how to India's distant climes he flew;
She saw him living in luxurious peace,
In wanton feasting, and inglorious ease;
Unmindful of himself, his promis'd fame,
His sovereign's welfare, and his beauteous dame: 250
And thus she fear'd the flower of youthful bloom
A knight so gentle might in cloth consume;
While that pure portion of th' ethereal ray,
Which still survives when all is breathless clay,
Th' immortal part, in sensual pleasure lost,
Would soon be shipwreck'd and for ever lost!
But that sage matron, whose attentive mind
Watch'd o'er the good himself had cast behind,
Resolv'd, through irksome ways of toil and pain,
To bring him back to virtue's path again.
His medicines thus the wise physician deals,
And oft by fire, and steel, and poison heals;
Repining first, the patient feels the smart,
Then owns the saving aid with grateful heart.

Yet
Yet arduous was the task her thoughts design'd; 265
For old Atlantes, with affection blind,
Who fought but to preserve from dangerous strife
In ease inglorious his Rogero's life;
Who rather wish'd him thus to lead his days,
Than change a year of shame for endless praise, 270
Had sent him to Alcina's isle afar,
There to forget the sound of arms and war;
And, as a sage well vers'd in magic art,
He bound in chains so firm the fairy's heart,
She ne'er again her love should disengage,
Though good Rogero liv'd to Neftor's age. 275

Now to the virgin let us bend our view,
Whose prophesying skill the future knew;
Who, while from realm to realm her thoughtful past,
The wandering Amon's daughter met at last. 280
When Bradamant beheld Melissa near,
A sudden hope dispell'd her former fear;
Till, struck with grief, th' unhappy virgin heard
Her lover prisoner, and his mind enchain'd
With pleasure's poison'd bait: but soon to calm 285
Her dread, th' enchantress pours the healing balm;
And plights her faith, ere many days are o'er,
Rogero to her presence to restore.

Give
Give me (she cry'd) the ring, whose powerful charm
The wearer shields from every magic harm: 296
Soon will I put Alcina's arts to flight,
Who now detains your lover from your sight.
When evening rises will I take my way,
And reach the Indian climes by dawn of day.
Melissa spoke; and to the listening dame 295
Her purpose told, to draw the youth from shame,
And send him back once more to France and fame.

Then from her hand the noble damsel gave
The wondrous ring; nor this alone to save
The knight had given, but with an equal mind 300
Had sent her heart, and life itself resign'd.
She gives the ring, and to her care commends
Herself, her lover more; to him she sends
A thousand greetings that her truth display,
And, parting, to Provence directs her way. 305

A different path the sage Melissa pass'd,
And soon as evening-shade the skies o'ercast,
She raise'd a palfrey by her magic art,
With one foot red, but black each other part:
Some fiend infernal seeming thus in show, 310
Whom by her spells she drew from realms below:
On this she mounted; both her feet were bare,
Ungirt her gown, and loose her flowing hair.

Then
Then with such speed through yielding clouds she flew,
Next morn Alcina's isle appear'd in view.
Arriv'd, a strange illusion to the sight!
She adds a foot of stature to her height;
While every limb enlarg'd like his appears,
Who nurs'd Rogero in his infant years:
A hoary beard she fixes on her chin,
And fills with wrinkles all her wither'd skin:
So well she feigns his speech, his voice, his air,
It seems as if Atlantes' self was there.
This done, awhile she undiscover'd stood,
Till, as it chanc'd, one day the youth she view'd
Apart in solitude; unusual sight!
For scarce Alcina ever left the knight.
Now, to her wish, she found the youth retir'd
To taste the freshness which the morn inspir'd,
Beside a stream that from the hill's descent
To a clear lake with gentle murmur went.
His garments, with effeminacy made,
Luxurious sloth and indolence display'd;

Ver. 332. His garments, with effeminacy made,] This whole passage is a copy of Virgil, Aeneid IV. where Mercury is sent by Jupiter to warn Aeneas to leave Carthage. Tasso has closely followed both these poets, in his Jerusalem Delivered, B. xvi. but particularly Ariosto. Aeneas, Rogero, and Rinaldo, make pretty near the same figure.
Wrought by Alcina's hands of silk and gold,
Mingled with art, and costly to behold.
A string of jewels from his neck he wore,
That, to his breast descending, hung before;
And either warlike arm, that once cold wield
The heaviest weapons in the lifted field,
A bracelet bound; in either ear he hung
A ring of golden wire, to which was strung
A costly pearl, whose price by far excell'd
What India or Arabia e'er beheld.

His curling locks, in nicest order set,
Waved round his head with liquid odours wet.
His gestures and his looks a mind declare
Bred to the wanton pleasures of the fair.

Rogero now his name can only boast,
The rest is all in soul corruption lost:
So far estrang'd from what he was before
By fatal sorcery and beauty's power!

Now in Atlantes' form th' enchantress stood
Before the youth, that form he oft had view'd;
With that stern eye, and countenance severe,
Which, when a child, he us'd so much to fear.

Then thus—Are these the glorious fruits at last
Of all my cares, of all my labours past?

Was
Was it for this thy infancy I bred,
With marrow of the bears and lions fed?
Taught thee in gloomy caves, or forest lands,
To strangle serpents with thy tender hands?
Panthers and tigers of their claws deprive,
And tear their tusies from the boars alive?
That, after all, thou shouldst at length appear
Alcina's Atys or Adonis here?

Is this the fate which in the stars I read?
Is this what dreams and auguries have said?
'Twas promis'd from thy birth, when thou hadst gain'd
The ripening years which now thou haft attain'd,
That not a chief should match thy boundless praise:
And wouldst thou thus thy boasted trophies raise!
Thus wouldst thou rival Alexander's name,
Thus gain a Cæsar's or a Scipio's fame?
Who could have thought (O scandal to the brave!) To see thee here Alcina's wanton slave!
And that thy thraldrom may to all be known, Thy neck and arms her shameful shackles own.
If, for thyself, fame cannot move thy mind, Nor the great deeds that Heaven for thee design'd,

Ver. 365. — Atys — ] A beautiful youth beloved of Cybele, the mother of the gods.

VOL. I.  Q  Yet
Yet wherefore from thy godlike race withhold
The future good my lips have oft foretold?
A race (so fate decrees) to mortal eyes
More dear than Phœbus' light that gilds the skies!
Forbid not souls t' exist, which Heaven shall frame
With purest portions of ethereal flame:
Nor blast the promis'd palms, which virtue yields
In peaceful councils or triumphant fields,
By which thy sons, and each succeeding name,
Shall give to Italy her former fame.
But, o'er the rest, let two thy thoughts engage,
Two brethren, glories of their favour'd age!
Alphonfo and Hippolito, whose praise,
O'er all thy line, shall bless their happy days.
On these I dwell, and joy to find thee hear
Their virtuous honours with a willing ear.
As if exulting in thy mind to trace
Such worthies springing from thy godlike race.
How has this queen thy fond affections won?
But thousands, like herself, the same had done:
Of all the numbers that her arts believ'd,
Thou know'ft what recompence their loves receiv'd.
But that you may Alcina's faith behold,
I will her frauds and each disguise unfold.
This ring receive, and to the dame repair; 405
Then mark if she deserves the name of fair.
She ceas'd; nor aught abash'd Rogero said,
But silent hung to earth his drooping head.
Meantime she on his finger fix'd the ring,
That could once more his wandering senses bring:
Soon as the knight returning truth confess'd,
Such deep remorse his conscious soul depres'd,
He wish'd that yawning earth would open wide,
His visage from the face of man to hide.

Her task perform'd, aside th' enchantress threw
Her borrow'd form, and stood disclos'd to view; 415
Then to the wondering youth her nature reveal'd,
Nor kept the cause, for which she came, conceal'd:
Sent by the fairest of her sex, whose care
No longer could her lover's absence bear;
To free him thence, where magic bands controul,
In shameful servitude, his manly soul:
That old Atlantes' borrow'd form she chose
A deeper reverence on his sense t' impose.
That gentle maid, whose fond affections burn
For thee, and merit well a kind return;
To whom reflect what gratitude demands,
For freedom late recover'd at her hands;

Q. 2

This
This ring, a safe defence from spelful art,
Here sends by me, and would have sent her heart,
If aught her heart avail'd to give thee aid:
The love of Bradamant she then display'd,
And, with her other noble virtues join'd,
Extoll'd the courage of her dauntless mind:
Till clearly banish'd from Rogero's breast,
She made him soon Alcina's name detest,
So late ador'd! — the ring his foe disarms,
Preferves him safe from future magic harms,
And strips Alcina of her borrow'd charms.
As when a child, who ripen'd fruit has storr'd,
In time forgetful of his former hoard,
By fortune to the place again convey'd,
Where many days before his trust was laid,
Beholds th' unthought of change with vast surprize,
Obscene and putrid, hateful to his eyes!
Rogero thus, by sage Melitta sent,
When to Alcina's sight again he went,
For that fair dame, the fairest of the fair,
Whom late he left, now, wondrous to declare,

A shape

B. VII. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 229

A shape so loathsome saw, that search around,
One more deform'd and old could ne'er be found. 450
Her face was wrinkled, sharp, and pale of hue,
Her hair was turn'd to grey, and thinly grew;
Six spans in stature could she scarcely boast,
And every tooth her gums, disarm'd, had lost;
As if her life more length of years had seen 455
Than Cuma's prophetess, or Priam's queen.
Yet such the force of spells, and magic power,
She seem'd in prime of age and beauty's flower:
But soon Rogero banish'd her his thought,
When all her useles's wiles to light were brought. 460

by the ring (reason), vice, which before appeared beautiful to the depraved imagination, then resumes its natural deformity.

"Spenser's Duefla, who had before appeared young and beautiful, divested of her rich apparel, is discovered to be a loathsome old woman. She is a copy of Ariosto's Alcina. The circumstances of Duefla's discovery are literally translated from the Italian poet:

A loathly wrinkled hag, ill-favour'd, old
--- --- --- --- --- --- --- ---
Her crafty head was altogether bald
And ---
Was overgrown with scurf and filthy scald,
Her teeth out of her rotten gums were red."

Warton's Obs. on Spenser.
Yet, by Melisso warn'd, he still suppress'd
The secret purpose of his wary breast:
At length his arms he seiz'd, that long had laid
Neglected, and his manly limbs array'd:
But first, each light suspicion to remove,
He told Alcina he desir'd to prove
If, living thus a recreant from the field,
His hands could yet their wonted weapons wield.

Then Balifarda girding to his side,
So was his falchion nam'd, of temper try'd,
He took the buckler, whose enchanted blaze
Distracts the fainting eyes of all that gaze;
And with the silken covering o'er it hung,
The massy weight across his shoulders flung.
Then to the stall he went, and bade with speed
To fit the reins and saddle on a steed
Of coal-black hue: Melisso chose the horse;
For well he knew his swiftness in the course.
Him, Rabicano nam'd, and once the right

Who late was fix'd a myrtle on the shore,
The watry monster to this island bore.
Rogero might the griffin-horse unbind,
That next to Rabicano stood confin'd;
But here Melissa warn'd him to refrain,
As he but ill obey'd the curbing rein,
And promis'd soon t' instruct him to bestride
The flying courser, and his fury guide;
And lest they would suspect his flight design'd,
If, parting thence, he left his steed behind.

Rogero all the maid's advice pursu'd;
Who, still invisible, beside him stood;
Then from the fatal palace swift he rode,
That ancient harlot's infamous abode,
And with impatience to the portal fled,
That tow'rs the realms of Logiftilla led.
Here, on the guard at unawares he fell,
And forc'd his passage through with pointed steel:

He was at first the property of Argalia, but when Ferrau drove him loose (see General View of Boyardo's Story) he returned to the cave where he was bred, and whence he was taken by Argalia. Rinaldo, having lost his horse Bayardo, arrives at this cave where Rabican was kept; he kills a giant and two griffins that guarded him, and gets possession of the horse: Rinaldo afterwards going to Albracca, recovers his own from Astolpho, and leaves Rabican with him in his stead.

See ORLANDO INNAM.

While
While some he deeply wounded, some he flew,
Then o'er the bridge with speed impetuous flew;
And soon was distant far, ere spreading fame
Could to Alcina's ear his flight proclaim.

Th' ensuing book shall tell what course he past,
Till he to Logistilla came at last.

EIGHTH BOOK

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO.
THE ARGUMENT.

Roger makes his escape from Alcina, and travels towards the country of Logistilla. Rinaldo leaves Scotland, and arrives in England, where he obtains succours from the regent to be transported to the assistance of Charlemain. Angelica is carried by magic art to a desolate island, where she is cast into a deep sleep by a hermit: from this place she is taken away by mariners to be devoured by a sea-monster. Orlando, disturbed with a dream, quits the city of Paris, then besieged by Agramant, and goes out, disguised, in search of his mistress.
WHAT strange enchanters in our times abound!
What strange enchantresses alike are found!
Who changing features with deceitful art,
Of either sex entrap th' unwaried heart:
Nor do they work these wonders on the mind,
By influence of the stars, or sprites confin'd;
But with dissimulation, fraud, and lies,
They bind it with indissoluble ties!
He, who from fortune can such grace obtain,
The ring of fair Angelica to gain,
Or rather that of reason, shall display
Their soul disguises to the face of day.

Ver. 11. Or rather that of reason,] The allegory is here plainly opened by the poet.
How blest Rogero then! whose ring dispell'd
Each error that his soul had prisoner hold.

Rogero, as my tale before declar'd,
With Rabican came arm'd before the guard;
And when all unprovided these he spy'd,
Kept not his weapon idle by his side.
Ere far he rode the distant wood to gain,
He met a servant of Alcina's train:
With ready falcon on his fist he came,
As wont each day to scour the field for game:
Oft to a neighbouring lake he let him fly;
The country round could store of prey supply.
He rode a palfrey, not with trappings gay;
His faithful dog companion of his way.
Soon as he saw Rogero's speed, his mind
Alcina's fugitive in him divin'd:

Ver. 20. He met a servant—] This passage, considered literally, has something odd in it; neither is the allegory of the servant, horse, dog, and falcon, very obvious. An Italian commentator thus explains it.

"The four animals that attack Rogero, are the four passions that govern the soul: the servant denotes fear; the bird, desire; the dog, grief; and the palfrey, joy. The shield signifies that the passions are to be conquered by opposing to them their contraries."

Advancing
Advancing near, he, with a haughty air,
Bade him th' occasion of his flight declare:

The knight, disdaining question, naught replies;
To whom th' impatient swain indignant cries:
What shall you say, if spite of your intent,
I, with this falcon, should your haste prevent.

This said, he let the falcon fly, whose speed
Not Rabican could, in his course, exceed:
The rider next, alighting from his seat,
Releas'd his palfrey from the curbing bit:
Who, snorting, spurn'd the ground, and instant flew
Swift as an arrow from the sounding yew:
No less the falcon'er follow'd close behind;
As sent by fire, or borne on wings of wind:
The dog with Rabican pursu'd the race,
As leopards hold the fearful hare in chase,

Now stop'd the generous youth, who blush'd to view
A man on foot so bold his flight pursue;
Who bore no weapon but a slender wand
With which he might his sporting dog command.
But when no other arms Rogero saw,
He much disdain'd on him his sword to draw.
The falcon'er fiercely now attacks the knight;
The dog attempts his courser's legs to bite.

Near
Near Rabican th' unbridled palfrey wheels,
And oft affails him with his spurning heels:
With sounding wing the falcon terrifies,
And strikes him with her talons as she flies.

The steed, whom such a strange assault dismays,
But ill the bridle and the spur obeys.

At length, constrain'd, his sword Rogero shows
Unsheath'd; now here, now there, his irksome foes
He threats with edge or point, but threats in vain;
For still his irksome foes th' attack maintain.

He fears, if he delays, he soon shall view
Alcina, with her train, his flight pursuè:
He hears loud clamours fill the vales around;
He hears the bells, the drums, the trumpets sound:
Now ill advis'd he seems, with sword in hand,
Against a man unarm'd, and dog, to stand:
'Twere better to disclose to view, he thought,
The shining buckler by Atlantes wrought;
Then from the shield the crimson covering rais'd;
In every eye the flashing splendor blaz'd:
The falc'ner tumbles senseless on the plain;
The dog and palfrey fall; the wings sustain
The bird no longer in his airy way:
Rogero leaves them all to sleep a prey.

The
The fatal tidings soon Alcina heard,
Rogero had escap'd and forc'd the guard;
At this such grief was o'er her senses spread,
That, for a time, her very soul was dead:
She tore her garments, and her face she bruis'd,
And oft of mad neglect herself accus'd.
Then swift to arms she summon'd all her crew,
When soon around her gather'd forces drew:
Of these two bands she fram'd, while one she sent
To explore the path her lov'd Rogero went;
The other to the harbour took their way,
And there, with speed embarking, put to sea:
Their sails, unnumber'd, all the stream o'ercast:
With these the desolate Alcina pass'd;
And so Rogero had possess'd her mind,
Her palace left without a guard behind.
This gave Melissa, plac'd in secret there,
An ample time her mischiefs to repair;
To free the wretches who had long remain'd
In haples's state, in cruel thraldom chain'd.
Around the palace, searching every part,
She saw the spells of her malicious art;
The magic seals from many a place she took;
A thousand mystic forms and figures broke.
Then o'er each field she pass'd, each mead or grove; Where the sad victims of Alcina's love, That hid in fountains, trees, or beasts, deplor'd Their hopeless change, she to their shapes restor'd: These, when they once their forms recover'd view'd, The brave Rogero's steps in haste pursu'd To Logistilla, parting thence in peace To Scythia, Persia, India, and to Greece, With grateful hearts; but foremost of the train The English duke resum'd his form again; The duke, to beauteous Bradamant ally'd; For him the good Rogero first employ'd His influence with the wife enchantress-maid; And gave his wondrous ring the knight to aid. Astolpho thus each manly grace regain'd, And, by Melissa's means, his arms obtain'd, With that fam'd lance of gold, which forc'd to yield The strongest warrior in the lifted field.

Argalia

Ver. 117. — lance of gold. This was the lance which Argalia brought with him into France (see General View of Boyardo's Story) which after his death came into the possession of Astolpho, who, at the tournament made by Charlemain, overthrew with this all opponents. Boyardo, in Orlando Innam. calls it, una lanza dorata. So the wiering spear of Cephalus, cuius fuit aurea cuspis. Ovid Met. B. vii.

Britomartis,
Argalia first, Astolpho next the lance
Possess'd; by this they both acquir'd in France
A mighty name: the lance Melissa found,
Kept in the palace of th' enchanted ground,
With all his other arms, which from the duke,
At his arrival there, Alcina took.
This done, she mounts the horse that cuts the wind,
Then seats Astolpho on the steed behind;
And thence to Logistilla they repair,
Arriv'd an hour before Rogero there.
Meanwhile through rugged ways, with steep ascent,
Rogero to sage Logistilla went;
Till, numerous toils o'erpast, at noon of day,
Beside the seas he held his weary way;
Slow pacing o'er the dry and barren strand,
The flood on one, the hills on t'other hand:
From the steep hills the beams reflected came;
The earth was parch'd, the air was all on flame!

Britomartis, in Spenser, has a lance of the same kind:

—— a mighty spear,
Which Bladud made, by magic art of yore,
And us'd the same in battle ay to bear,
Sith which it had been here preserved in store,
For his great virtues proved long afore:
For never wight, so fast in fell could fit,
But him perforce unto the ground it bore.
The silent birds were hid in groves profound;
The grass-hopper alone, with tedious sound,
While in the leafy shades conceal'd he lies,
Deafens the hills, the vales, the seas and skies! 140

There

Ver. 140. Deafens the hills, the vales,—] In this hyperbole
Ariosto seems to allude to the following line of Virgil:

Sole sub ardenti resonant arbusa cicadis!

To this passage in the edition of Virgil by Dr. Warton, is subjoined the following note, which is well worth transcribing, as it may be thought in some sort to apologize for the strength of Ariosto's expression.

"I don't know how everybody almost in England came to imagine that the cicada in the Roman writers was the same with our grass-hopper, for their characters are different enough to have prevented any such mistake. The cicada is what the Italians now call cicala, and the French cigale. They make one constant uniform noise all day long in summer-time, which is extremely disagreeable and tiresome, particularly in the great heats. Their note is sharp and shrill in the beginning of the summer, but hoarse and harsh towards the latter part of it. They are supposed to feed on the morning dew, and then fix on some funny branch of a tree and sing all day long. It is hence that this insect is opposed to the ant in the old *Æ*fopian fables, which is as industrious and inoffensive as the other is idle and troublesome. Virgil calls the cicada querulae and raucae. Martial argulae and inhumane. Their note is the more troublesome,
The king, his daughter fair, and all the land,
With great regard Rinaldo entertain'd:
At length the knight his embassy display'd
To beg from Scotland and from England aid;
He shew'd, beside his monarch's earnest prayer,
How glory call'd them to support the war.
To this the king reply'd without delay,
That to the furthest limits of his sway,
His soul was ever ready to maintain
The empire's rights, and weal of Charlemain;
With promise to prepare, ere many days,
Whatever force his utmost power could raise, because in the great heats they sing alone. Any one who has passed a summer in Italy, or in the south of France, will not think the epithet inhumane too severe for them. SPENCE.

See Dr. Warton's Note on Eclog. II. ver. 16.

Ver. 145. I leave Rogero — He returns to Rogero, Book x. ver. 231. Rinaldo was last spoken of in the third book.
And had not years depred his strength (he said)
Himself would combat at his army's head:
Yet should not age so damp his martial flame,
To keep him from the dangerous field of fame,
But that his son, his absence well supply'd,
With prudent counsel, and with courage try'd:
Though distant now from his paternal reign,
He hop'd to see him soon return again;
While he th' auxiliar troops assembled drew,
To pass before his sight in just review.
The monarch spoke; and instant gives command
To levy horse and foot throughout the land;
Equips a numerous fleet to stem the tides,
And various stores for every need provides.
Now brave Rinaldo, hastening to depart
For England's realm, the king with grateful heart
To Berwick's town convey'd the valiant peer,
There, parting, shed for grief a tender tear.
Soon in the poop the prosperous breezes blew;
Rinaldo went on board, and bade adieu.
The busy mariners their anchors ship,
And plough securely through the foamy deep
With rapid course: the silver Thames they gain
Where first he mingles with the briny main:

Along
Along the stream with oars and sails they fly,
Till London's stately towers salute their eye.

Rinaldo did from Charles and Otho bring (Otho besieged in Paris with the king)
Commission to the prince, whose honour'd hand
By deputation rul'd the English land,
To raise supplies; and from fair Albion's coast
Embark for Calais' shore the friendly host,
To Charlemain and France a welcome aid:
The prince, who then the regal sceptre sway'd
In Otho's stead, to brave Rinaldo's name
Such honours paid, as Otho's self might claim;
Then, answering his demands, he summon'd all
The neighbouring forces that obey'd his call;
With those that in the subject islands lay,
To meet together on a certain day.

But here, my lord, with various themes my muse
Th' example of the lyrist's art pursues,
Who, shifting oft the strings, with skilful hands,
Now high, now low, the changing note commands.

Ver. 199. But here, my lord, — ] A fresh address to his patron: this frequently occurs in the course of the work.
Rinaldo is mentioned again at the review of the forces,
Book x. ver. 507.
While to Rinaldo was my verse confin'd,
Angelica again employ'd my mind,
Whom late we left, where, flying from his sight, 205
She on an aged hermit chanc'd to light.
Then to pursue her tale — she ask'd the way
That led to where some ready vessel lay:
Such anxious fears possess'd the tender maid,
She deem'd all Europe could not yield her aid. 210
Pleas'd with her wondrous charms, the hoary fire
Through his cold veins confess'd a sudden fire;
Then strove with heavenly converse to detain
The parting fair-one, but he strove in vain.
A hundred times he struck his ass, but still 215
The stubborn beast was resistive to his will:
His walk was heavy, and his trot was worse;
Nor could he make him mend his tardy course.
The virgin gone; when scarce his sight survey'd
The late-worn track her palfrey's feet had made, 220
A cave he sought, remote from human eyes,
There caus'd from earth unhallow'd fiends to rise:
From this infernal band a spight he chose,
On whom he best might his commands impose;
And bade him on the palfrey a'ft his part, 225
That with the damsel bore away his heart.
As the staunch hound that through the mountain dews,
With open mouth the hare or fox pursues,
When wheeling round he sees the flying prey,
Oft seems to bend his speed a different way,
Till, unawares, upon the wretch he flies,
And gripes with cruel jaws the bleeding prize:
The hermit thus, by hidden craft, design’d
Where’er she fled, Angelica to find.—
His secret purpose well methinks I trace,
And shall discover in some future place.

The subtle demon, with his charge possèst,
Now crept within th’ unwary damsel’s beast.
So lurking sparks at first in secret lie,
Till bursting sheets of flame involve the sky.
Near the salt flood her lonely path she held,
Where on the Gascon shore the billows swell’d:
But soon the fiend, that in her palfrey lay,
To the deep seas impell’d his headlong way.
With terror struck, she strives to turn the rein;
But further still he plunges in the main.

Ver. 244. To the deep seas — J This whole passage copied from Ovid, in the fable of Jupiter and Europa.
What should she do, but firmly fix her seat?
Her robe she gathers round; her timorous feet
She draws aloft; while o'er her shoulders flow
Her locks, and in her face the zephyrs blow:
The rougher winds are hush'd; the surges cease
Their fury, by her charms compos'd to peace.
While flowing tears her cheeks and breast bedew,
Back to the shore she casts a mournful view;
She sees it now, alas! no longer near;
Still less and less the flying hills appear:
Till, wheeling to the right, a desert strand
The courser reach'd, and bore her safe to land,
Midst rocks and caves; what time the sinking light
Of Phoebus' beams resign'd the world to night.

Soon as the damsel found herself convey'd
To these drear wilds, whose sight alone dismay'd
The gazer's heart, immovable she stood;
So fix'd, had any eye her figure view'd,
She seem'd a statue on the lonely sands;
Her hair was hanging loose; her clasping hands
Together join'd; in silent grief she mourn'd
With lips unmov'd: her eyes were upward turn'd,
As if 't accuse the high decrees of Heaven,
That all her days to misery had given!
At length she gave a vent to mighty woe,
Words found their way, and tears began to flow!
Relentless fate! what would'lt thou more, she cries,
Since life itself will not thy rage suffice?
Why hast thou sav'd me from the gaping wave,
Where now my griefs had found a peaceful grave,
But that my life preserv'd might means supply
To persecute me more before I die!

By thee I'm banish'd from my regal seat,
Nor e'er must hope my native land to greet:
And O! far worse! have lost my spotless name;
For though my conscious thoughts are void of blame,
Yet, wandering thus, I give too just pretence,
For flander to defame my innocence!

What has that wretched damsel left to boast,
What good on earth, whose virtuous praife is lost!
Alas! that fame which speaks me young and fair,
(Or true or false) but adds to my despair!
Nor can I thanks to Heaven for charms bestow,
For luckless charms, whence all my sorrows flow.

Through these, my brother, poor Argalia, dy'd;
No succour his enchanted arms supply'd.
For these did Agrician, the Tartar king,
My father Galaphron to ruin bring,

Once
When

ORLANDO FURIOSO. B. VIII.

Once monarch of Cathay: 'tis hence I range

Forlorn, and every day my dwelling change.

My wealth, my friends, my honour, all is flown!

Yet am I still preserv'd for woes unknown.

Glut then thy utmost rage! O! fortune! send

Some savage beast these wretched limbs to rend:

From loathsome light my weary soul relieve,

And for my death my grateful thanks receive.

Thus in deep sorrow mourn'd the hapless dame,

Till in her sight the wily father came:

Her, from the summit of a rock, he view'd,

As on the plain below she weeping stood.

Six days before, arriv'd the hermit there,

Borne by a demon strangely through the air;

And now such looks of deep devotion wore,

Not holy Paul, or blest Hilario more!

Ver. 295. — my father Galaphron — monarch of Cathay: — ]

Albracca having been long besieged, was at last taken by storm, though not by Agrican, who was slain by Orlando, but by the enemies of Angelica, who took advantage of the absence of Orlando, Sacripant, and the other brave defenders of that princes.

See ORLANDO INNAM.

Ver. 310 — holy Paul, or blest Hilario — ] "Paul, the first hermit, retired into the desert, in the time of the emperor

Valerian, where he lived holy for one hundred and two years,

B. VIII. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 251

When nearer fair Angelica he drew,
Nor she the features of the hermit knew,
The welcome sight her drooping spirits cheer'd,
Though still deep anguish on her face appear'd.
O! holy father! with thy pitying aid,
Relieve, she cry'd, a helpless, lonely maid;
Then, with a broken voice, began to tell
That mournful story, which he knew so well.

In pious strains, with hypocritic air,
He now began to soothe the weeping fair;
While, as he spoke, his roving fingers press'd
Her alabaster neck and heaving breast;
Till, bolder grown, he clasp'd her in his arms:
But here, resentment kindling all her charms,
Back with her hand the feeble wretch she threw,
While every feature glowed with rosy hue.
Then from his scrip he took, of sovereign use,
A little vial fill'd with magic juice;

In years, in company with the blessed abbot Antonio. Hilario, bishop of Gallia, was sent into exile with Eufebius, by the emperor, who was an enemy to the Christians: he led an exemplary life, and wrought many miracles." PORCACCII.

Ver. 327. Then from his scrip — Boyardo has a story something similar to this of Ariosto, where Flordelis, wife to Brandi—
In those bright eyes, where love was wont to frame
His sharpest darts, and raise his purest flame,
A drop he sprinkles that had power to steep
Her heavy eye-lids in the dew of sleep.
Now prone on earth she sinks, a lovely prize,
Defenceless at his lawless will she lies;
While, at his pleasure, he can wander o'er
Each nameless beauty, every grace explore.
Oft to her mouth his trembling lips are press;
And oft his kisses print her ivory breast.
None view his actions, on that desert coast:
But the soft hour of love with him is lost.
The hoary dotard, whose impure desire
Forgets what sage and reverend years require,
Shame of his kind! with drowsy age oppressed,
By slow degrees resigns his limbs to rest;
And every sense in dull oblivion laid,
Soon lies in slumber by the slumbering maid.
But now a fresh disaster fortune sent,
Who seldom leaves till all her darts are spent:

mart, meets with such another hermit, who casts her in a deep sleep, and carries her away from her husband, when she is afterwards delivered by a lion, who terrifies the hermit that had conveyed her to a cave. See likewise the old Fisher of Florent and Florimel in Spenser. Fairy Queen, B. iii. C. viii.
And here I must th' occasion first display
That draws me something from the path away: 350
In seas remote, beneath the western skies,
Beyond the Irish coast an island lies,
Ebuda call'd, on whose ill-fated ground
Th' inhabitants are now but thinly found.
A dreadful orc, and numerous monsters more, 355
By Proteus sent, have ravag'd all the shore.
The ancient stories (strange to hear!) relate,
A powerful monarch govern'd once the state:

Ver. 355. A dreadful orc,—] The word orca in the Italian has no particular signification, but is applied to any monster or creature of the imagination: in the xviith book, orca is used for a deformed and dreadful giant: the word orc occurs in Milton:

The haunts of seals and orcs and sea-mew's clang!

PAR. LOST, B. xi: ver, 835.

Ver. 356. By Proteus sent,—] Ariosto makes a strange mixture of the Christian and Pagan theology: Neptune, Proteus, and the other marine gods, are here introduced without scruple. Spenser in like manner employs the fables and symbols of the ancients, and makes the heathen deities agents in his poem; and, like Ariosto, brings Proteus into the above-mentioned tale of Florimel and the Fisherman:

Proteus is shepherd of the seas of yore,
And hath the charge of Neptune's mighty herd;
An aged fire with head all sorthy hore,
And sprinkled frost upon his dewy beard, &c.

This
This prince a daughter fair and young posses'd,
With every grace and every virtue blest; 360
Whose heavenly charms, as on the strand she stood,
Enflam'd the heart of Proteus midst the flood:
The bloomy virgin by his love compell'd,
Her pregnant womb a growing burthen swell'd.
Most hateful to her fire was this to hear, 365
Above all others impious and severe!
Nor would he by remorse, or love, be led
To save his hapless child's devoted head.
His grandson (harmless object of his spite)
Was murder'd ere he yet had seen the light! 370
Proteus, to whom 'tis given in charge to keep
The herds of Neptune, ruler of the deep,
For his love consort's death indignant burn'd,
And to revenge her all his fury turn'd.
With speed he sent ashore his savage train, 375
The phocæ, orcs, and monsters of the main;
That not alone their rage on herds employ'd,
But villages and husbandmen destroy'd.
The soldiers arm'd, by night and day prepar'd,
High on the city's walls maintain'd the guard, 380
While from the fields the trembling people flew:
At length, to learn what course they must pursue
To end their plague, the oracle they sought;
And thence the deputies this answer brought.

"That Heaven requir'd them with unweary'd care
To seek a damsel, like the former, fair;
A victim doom'd beside the roaring tide,
T' appease the God for her that guiltless dy'd.
So might th' offended power the maid receive,
And from their woes th' afflicted land relieve.
But if the scourge remain'd, they must present
Another dame, 'till Proteus' wrath was spent."

I dare nor true, nor false, this story hold,
Which former annals have of Proteus told:
Thus far 'tis known—in this unhappy place,
A law prevails against the female race,
To nourish daily with their guiltless blood
An hideous monster, rising from the flood,
A dreadful orc, that near the isle remain'd,
When every other had the seas regain'd.

Hard is the lot of woman ever found,
But harder still on this unpitying ground.
O wretched virgins! in a luckless hour
By fortune cast on this ill-omen'd shore,
Where, by the waves, in cruel watch they stand
To seize on strangers with an impious hand;
That whose lives may for the nation's guilt atone,
And thus preserve the numbers of their own.
From port to port their vessels scour the main,
New victims for the sacrifice to gain.

Some maids by force they win, and some by stealth,
By flattery these, and those by hopes of wealth;
And thus they drew such numbers in their power,
As every prison fill'd, and every tower.

A pinnace, that had sail'd from land to land,
Passing before the solitary strand,
Where on the grassy turf the lovely maid,
Unblest Angelica, asleep was laid,
Their anchor cast, the seamen stopp'd, to bring
Wood from the grove, and water from the spring,
And there beheld the flower of beauty's charms,
Clasp'd in the holy father's reverend arms!

O! precious prize! adorn'd with every grace!
Too precious far for such a barbarous race!
O! cruel fortune! canst thou then maintain
Thy sway on earth with such relentless reign,
To yield an offering to a monster's rage,
Those graces that could Agrican engage
From Caucasus Albracca's force to brave,
With half of Scythia there to find a grave!

That
That beauty priz'd by Sacripant before
His martial glory and his regal power!
That beauty, which the mighty fame defac'd
Of Anglant's knight, and laid his senses waste!
That beauty, which had rouz'd such chiefs to arms;
And fill'd the eastern empire with alarms!
Now lies forlorn, to woe and death betray'd,
Without a friend to hear, a friend to aid!

The damsel, sleeping, senseless on the ground,
Before she wak'd; with ready chains they bound;
They seiz'd the hermit too; and with their prey
Back to the strand again resum'd their way.
To the high mast the bellying canvas strain'd,
The vessel soon the mournful island gain'd.
Yet pity wrought so far her charms to spare,
For many days they kept the virgin-fair;
'Till now, exhausted all their hapless store,
Weeping they led her to the destin'd shore.
What tongue can tell the sorrows, tears, and sighs;
The lamentations loud that pierc'd the skies!
'Twas strange the pitying rocks did not divide,
When to the stone her lovely limbs were ty'd.
I can no more—such pangs my breast affail,
The muse must leave untold the piteous tale;
And to a theme less gloomy turn the strain,
'Till her torn mind recovers strength again.
Not squallid snakes, nor spotted tigress stung
With dreadful fury for her ravish'd young,
Or aught that in the tract of Afric lands
Envenom'd wanders o'er the burning lands,
Could view without remorse this maiden's cruel bands.

Had fame the tidings to Orlando brought,
Who late in Paris' walls his fair-one fought;

Ver. 462. Had fame the tidings:—] See the before-cited book in Spenser, where Florimel falls into the hands of the old Fisherman.

O! ye brave knights! that boast this lady's love,
Where be ye now——
But if that thou sir Satyrane didst weet,
Or thou sir Peridure her sorry state,
How soon would ye assemble many a fleet,
To fetch from sea that ye at land lost late.
Towers, cities, kingdoms ye would ruinate,
In your avengement and spiteous rage;
Ne ought your burning fury mote abate:
But if sir Calidore could it presage,
No living creature could his cruelty affuage.

"This apostrophe to the knights of Fairy land, and calling on them by name, to assist the distressed Florimel, seems imitated from Ariosto, who twice uses the same kind of apostrophe;

The distance now their timely aid denies!

Meantime was Paris close besieg'd around 470
By king Troyano's son in arms renown'd:
One dreadful day the foes so warmly press'd,
They nearly enter'd and the town posses's'd:
Then had not Heaven fulfill'd the Christian prayer,
And pour'd a deluge through the darken'd air, 475
That day had sunk before the Pagan lance,
The sacred empire, and the fame of France!

tion which had been given by Boyardo, in the latter end of his

My life's best joy! how have I err'd! (he said)
Why have I thus so fair a nymph betray'd?

Camões, as Mr. Mickle observes, has the same simile:
As in the sun's bright beam the gamesome boy
Plays with the shining steel or crystal toy,
Swift and irregular, by sudden starts,
The living ray with viewless motion darts,
Swift o'er the wall, the roof, the floor, by turns,
The sun-beam dances and the radiance burns.

Mickle's Lusiad, B. viii.

Ver. 500. — since Bourdeaux' field — ] The great battle in which the Christian army was defeated, described by Boyardo, and mentioned by Ariosto in the beginning of the poem.

When
When on thy charms each day to feed my sight,
On thy dear converse dwell with fond delight,
Thy goodness gave — ev’n then — O! fatal hour!
I tamely gave thee into Namus’ power!
Well might my soul have such an act excus’d!
Not Charles himself had my desires refus’d.
First had I every chance of battle try’d;
First let them from my breast my heart divide!
But Charles, and all his force, too weak had prov’d
To ravish from my arms the maid I lov’d!
At least I might have plac’d her with a guard
In Paris, or some strong retreat prepar’d:
Who like myself, should every danger brave,
From threatening ills the virgin-fair to save!
Far dearer than the blood that bathes my heart;
How ill have I perform’d a lover’s part!
Ah! whither now, without my aid, alone,
Whither, so young and beauteous, art thou gone!
As when the sun withdraws his evening rays,
A lamb, forsaken, midst the forest strays
With tender bleats, in hopes the shepherd’s ear
At length may chance the plaintive notes to hear;

Ver. 524. As when the sun — ] This is a tender beautiful smile, and altogether original.
B. VIII. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 263

Till from afar the wolf the sound receives, |
And for his loss the hapless shepherd grieves. |
Then art thou fall'n to cruel wolves a prey, 530
Thy faithful knight Orlando far away!
That dear, that virgin treasure, which possesst,
Had made Orlando, with th' immortals blest,
Which at thy chaste desire I kept unstain'd,
Some cruel spoiler now perhaps has gain'd. 535
Forbid it Heaven! all other sufferings shed,
All other plagues, on my devoted head!
But should it be—this hand shall yield relief,
And end at once my being and my grief.

Now lost in sleep the whole creation lay, 540
And cheer'd their spirits from the toils of day.
Some sunk in down; and some the herbage press'd;
While some on rocks, on oaks, or myrtles rest.
Yet thou, Orlando, seek'st in vain to close
Thy wakeful lids, distracted from repose; 545
Or if a moment seals thy weary eyes,
In thy short slumber painful visions rise.

Orlando dreamt, that on a river's side,
With odorous flowers and shrubs diversify'd,
He gaz'd transported on that heavenly face,
Which Love himself had ting'd with rosy grace.

S 4  On
On those bright stars, whose glances food supply
To souls that in his nets entangled lie;
On that dear virgin, whose all-conquering eyes
Could in his breast his amorous heart surprise!

While thus he seem'd possess'd of every joy
That can a happy lover's thoughts employ,
A sudden storm the chearful day o'ercast,
The tender flowerets wither'd in the blast,
The forest shook, as when, in wintry skies,
South, east, and west with mingled fury rise!

Now while he shelter fought, the mournful knight
Seem'd in the gloom to lose the damsel's sight.
Now here, now there, he search'd the woods around,
And made the country with her name resound.

But while a thousand fears his soul dismay'd,
He heard her well-known voice imploring aid:
Swift to the sound he turn'd, but turn'd in vain,
His eyes no more the object lov'd regain:
When to his ears this dreadful warning came,
"Ne'er hope on earth again to see the dame!"

The lover, waking, found the vision fled,
And saw his falling tears bedew the bed.
Unmindful now that dreams are empty shade,
By fancy form'd, he deem'd his dearest maid

With
With danger pres'd, and from his couch he flew,
And o'er his limbs his plated armour drew;
Then Brigliadoro took without delay,
But not a squire attendant on his way.
From prying eyes the more to hide his name,
Nor give each vulgar tongue 't asperse his fame,
He wore not those known arms, and ample shield
With red and white distinguishing'd in the field;
But arms of sable hue, whose darkness shows
A just resemblance to his inward woes.
Not many years elaps'd, his matchless might
From Amostantes won this suit in fight.

Now midst the silence of the midnight hour,
He left his sovereign Charles; the Christian power

Ver. 578. — Brigliadoro — ] Briglia-d'oro, i. e. golden bridle: the name of Orlando's horse in Boyardo, whence Spenser calls Sir Guyon's horse, Brigadore: this horse was formerly the property of Almontes. See Note to Book i. ver. 202.

Ver. 582. — those known arms, — ] The armour which Orlando won from Almontes, brother to Troyano.

Ver. 587. — Amostantes — ] The name of this warrior, who is not mentioned in Boyardo, appears in a muster of the forces brought over by Almontes: after the death of Almontes he was killed by Orlando. See Aspramonte, C. v. xx.
He left; nor bade adieu to Brandimart, 590
Once his lov'd friend and partner of his heart!
But when with golden tresses round her head,
The morn arose from rich Tithonus' bed,
And from earth's face the humid curtains drew,
Orlando's flight, incens'd, the monarch knew: 595
With deep concern his nephew's loss he heard,
When honour call'd him now, where danger rear'd
Her dreadful front, to guard from hostile hands
His king, his country, and his social bands.
Nor could he hide his anger, but express'd 600
The just resentment kindled in his breast;
With threats, if absent long, the recreant knight
Should dearly mourn this ill-concerted flight.

Ver. 590. — Brandimart, ] Brandimart is one of the principal personages in the Orlando Innamorato, where he makes a more conspicuous figure than in the Furiofio. Brandimart and Flor-delis are described by Boyardo as a pattern of conjugal affection, and this character of them is preserved by Ariosto: they were Pagans by birth, but Flordelis was first converted by Rinaldo, and Brandimart afterwards by the joint arguments of Orlando and Flordelis. Brandimart is introduced as the almost inseparable companion of Orlando, whom he accompanies to the siege of Albracca. See Orlando Innam.
But noble Brandimart, whose faith well try'd,
No chance could shake, whom nothing could divide
From his lov'd friend; who inly hop'd once more
Orlando to his fellows to restore;
And scorn'd to hear reproach his fame upbraid,
Swift from the host his eager steps convey'd;
Nor would to Flordelis his thoughts disclose,
Left her fond love should his design oppose.

His wedded dame was she, his soul's delight,
Scarce was he ever absent from her sight:
The charms of beauty in her person shin'd,
And every prudent grace adorn'd her mind!

Yet, parting thus, he hop'd ere close of day
Again to measure back his former way:
But many a chance the wandering warrior prov'd,
That long detain'd him from the fair he lov'd.

A tedious month his comfort stay'd in vain,
In hopes to see her Brandimart again;
Till fear and love her breast so strongly rend,
She quits the walls without a guide or friend;
And seeks him long in many a distant state,
As, in its place, the story shall relate:

Of these no more — the muse with nobler flight
Now turns the strain to great Anglante's knight;
Who,
Who, having chang'd his arms of well-known fame,
Won from Almontes, to the portal came,
And to a chief, who there maintain'd the guard,
In a low voice his mighty name declar'd:
Soon at the word, he let the draw-bridge down,
When swift Orlando issu'd from the town,
And took the way to pass the slumbering foe:
What follow'd then th' ensuing book shall show.

THE

OF

ORLANDO FURIOSO.
THE ARGUMENT.

Orlando seeking Angelica, hears of the cruel custom of the people of Ebuda, who every day sacrificed a female to a sea-monster. He resolves to go against those Islanders, but, in his way, being cast ashore by a tempest, meets with Olympia, who relates to him a melancholy tale of her misfortunes and expulsion from her hereditary dominions. Orlando undertakes to restore her to her possessions, and revenge her on her enemy.
To what will cruel treacherous Love constrain
A heart, once taken captive in his chain,
Since he can thus Orlando's breast divide,
And turn his duty from his lord aside?
He, who was once with deepest wisdom store'd,
The holy church defending with his sword,
E'er since in Love's bewildering path he trod,
Forgets himself, his sovereign, and his God!
Yet would I gladly here acquit his fame,
O'erjoy'd, with mine, to find so great a name:
For still with eyes averse the right I view,
But with a ready will the wrong pursue.

Now,
Now, cloth'd in fable arms, his course he took,
Without remorse his dearest friends forsook,
And saw the troops of Africa and Spain
Encamp'd unnumber'd o'er the spacious plain:
In shelters from the storm dispers'd they lay;
Some distant far, and some a nearer way:
Deep sunk in sleep was every weary band,
These stretch'd on earth, those leaning on the hand.

Then might the earl have slain a numerous crew,
Nor yet his Durindana once he drew.

Ver. 17. In shelters from the storm— See General View of Boyardo's Story.

Ver. 22. — Durindana— Durindana, or Durlindana, the name of Orlando's sword, so called in Pulci and Boyardo; this sword was made by enchantment, and would penetrate every kind of armour. See Note to Book I. ver. 202.

"Durinda is the name of Roland's sword in Turpin's romance, which Ariosto and Boyardo copy so faithfully. As a specimen of that historian's style and manner, I shall present the reader with Roland's soliloquy addressed to this sword, when he was mortally wounded by a Saracen giant. "O! "ensis pulcherrime! sed semper lucidissime, capulo eburneo "candidissime, cruce aurea splendissime, superficie deaurate, "pomo beryllino deaurate, magno nomine Dei inculpate, "acumine legitime, virtute omni praedite, quis amplius virtute "tua utetur? Quis, &c," Turpini Hist. de Gesuis Caroli Mag. cap. xxii. — Warton's Observ. on Spenser.
Too noble was Orlando's soul, to show
Inglorious hatred on a slumbering foe!

Through every part he sought the royal maid,
While those, he waking found, he gently pray'd
(Her form describing and her garb) to tell,
What chance the virgin, whom he lov'd, befel.
The next returning morn the knight again
Explor'd the camp of Agramant in vain:
Where in th' Arabian dress, from all conceal'd,
And in the language of the country skill'd,
Three days he rov'd secure from place to place,
And seem'd a native of the Moorish race.
Through towns, and cities next his course he bends, Where'er proud France her ample realm extends;
Through Brittany, Provence, the Gascon's reign,
From fruitful Picardy to distant Spain.

What time November strips the flowery field,
And bids the earth her verdant covering yield
To hoary frost; when trees disHonour'd stand,
And birds in clusters seek a foreign land;
His friends he left; nor yet his labours ceas'd
With wintry skies; nor spring his cares releas'd.
While thus the knight his eager search pursu'd,
He came one day to where a stream he view'd

Vol. I.
That slowly to the seas was wont to glide,
And Britain from Normandy divide.
But now the waters, swell’d with heavy rains
And melted snows, had delug’d all the plains;
And loudly foaming, with resistless force,
Had borne the bridge before them in their course.

Orlando, pausing here, awhile explor’d
Each neighbouring part to cross th’ opposing ford:
As thus he linger’d, ’midst the flood appear’d
A slender bark, whose helm a damsel steer’d:
The Paladin besought her from the land
To give him passage to the further strand.

This bark (she answer’d) ne’er receives a knight
Unless he first his sacred promise plight,
At my request, the noblest war to wage,
That ever can a champion’s arms engage.
If here, sir knight, you seek the further shore,
First give your faith that, ere this month is o’er,
You to th’ Hibernian monarch will unite
Your force, who now assembles all his might
The fatal isle Ebuda to confound,
The most inhuman which the seas surround.
Know that afar, ’midst many a neighbouring isle,
Ebuda lies beyond the Irish soil;
That,
That, by an ancient law, to foreign lands
Sends many vessels fill'd with warlike bands,
To seize and bear unhappy dames away,
Doom'd for a dreadful monster's living prey:
Merchants and corsairs to the coast repair,
And traffic with them for the wretched fair:
There, on the strand, each day a female dies;
Think then what numbers fall a sacrifice!
But if soft pity can your bosom move,
Or if your soul is not averse to love,
Consent your name with those allies to join,
Who now for such a glorious cause combine.

Scarce had she ended, when th' impatient knight
Vow'd to be foremost in so just a fight;
As one whose soul detested cruel deeds:
And soon a new alarm his fancy breeds;
He fears, left, thither by ill fate betray'd,
That island crew had seiz'd the lovely maid
Whom late he sought; and now his anxious mind
Resolves with speed the cruel realm to find.
Then, ere the sun descended to the deep,
He reach'd Saint Malo, and procur'd a ship.
The bellying canvas catch'd the driving blast,
And in the night Saint Michael's mount they past:
Breo and Landriglier behind they leave,
And now by Britanny the billows cleave;
Then steer directly tow'rd the chalky shore,
Whence England once the name of Albion bore.
But soon the southern breeze begins to fail,
And adverse winds from west and north prevail:
The sails are furl'd to shun the furious force,
That drives the vessel from its destin'd course.
Four days in vain they plough the foamy sea,
In one they measure back their former way;
While from the land the careful pilot steers,
Where secret shelves and dangerous rocks he fears.
At length the wind, that o'er the stormy main
Four days had driv'n them, chang'd its course again;
And let the shattered bark securely ride
Where Antwerp's river seeks the briny tide.

Soon as the crew, reliev'd from care and toil,
Had safely anchor'd on the friendly soil,
Lo! from the right, before them, came in view
An ancient fire, with locks of silver hue;
Who, first to each his courteous greeting paid,
Bespoke Orlando whom he deem'd their head;
And, in his mistress' name, besought the knight
To glad her sorrows with his welcome sight.
Who not alone the prize of beauty held,
But all her kind in virtuous gifts excell'd;
Or, if he rather chose awhile to stay,
Herself would to his vessel take her way:
For never warrior yet, by tempests tost,
Or led by land to that unhappy coast,
Refus'd to hear the dame her tale relate,
And give her counsel in her woeful state.

The gallant chief, whose pitying aid to gain
Misfortune never su'd, and su'd in vain,
Consents to quit the vessel, and pursue
The sage's steps, till near a pile they drew
Of stately frame, but fill'd with mournful gloom,
Where funeral black was hung in every room.

Orlando here beheld a damsel fair,
Whose looks and gesture spoke her deep despair:
With gentle welcome she receiv'd the knight.
Then thus began her sorrows to recite.

Know first, my lord, the hapless wretch you view
From Holland's earl her birth disastrous drew:
Two brothers did with me the blessing prove,
Which children find in fond paternal love.
While thus domestic peace each hour endear'd,
The duke of Zealand at our court appear'd;
Who went a war against the Moors to wage,
In flower of beauty and in blooming age:
His person pleas'd, but more his passion gain'd,
And soon my easy heart in fetters chain'd.
While adverse winds forbade his purpos'd way,
Our mutual love beguil'd his lingering stay:
The time an age to his impatient crew,
With me, alas! how swift the moments flew!
And oft we vows exchang'd to join our hands,
At his return, in solemn nuptial bands.
Scarce from our country was Bireno gone,
(The name by which my faithful love was known)
When Friza's king, who long with artful mind
To wed me to his only son design'd,
Arbantes nam'd, dispatch'd a courtly train
My hand in marriage of my fire to gain:
But I, who ne'er could change my constant love,
Or so ungrateful to Bireno prove,
Soon with my father all my power apply'd
To set this fatal embassy aside:
And said, I rather far would yield my life,
Than e'er in Friza's realms be made a wife.
My loving fire, who all I ask'd approv'd,
Who ne'er would view my breast with sorrow mov'd,
B. IX. ORLANDO FURIOSO.

To make me from my tears and plaints desist,
Without consent th' embassadors dismiss'd.
At this with rage the king of Friza burn'd,
And all his haughty soul to vengeance turn'd.
Our lands he enter'd, and with carnage fill'd,
In which, alas! my kindred all were kill'd.
Besides his mighty strength in arms beheld,
That few his vigour, in our age, excell'd;
He weapons us'd, to former times unknown,
And, in the present, us'd by him alone.
An iron tube he bore, whose womb inclos'd
A ball and nitrous grain, with art compos'd.
Now to a vent, scarce obvious to the sight,
Behind the barrel he directs a light:
A surgeon thus the lancet's point applies:
The fatal bullet from the concave flies,
With lightning flashes and with thunder's sound,
And scatters death and desolation round.
With this device our bands he twice o'erthrew
In open field, and both my brethren flew.
The elder first was doom'd the stroke to feel,
His heart transpierc'd through plates of jointed steel:
In vain the second strove from fate to fly;
He, like his brother, was condemn'd to die.
Sent from afar, the ball its force impressed
Full at his back and issu'd at his breast.
One only castle to my fire remain'd,
Each other part the cruel king had gain'd.
This while he fought to guard with fruitless care,
He fell the last sad victim of the war.
The traitor mark'd him as he walk'd the round,
And pierc'd his forehead with a mortal wound.

My fire and brethren slaughter'd, I remain'd
The hapless heiress of my father's land.
The king of Friza, who desir'd to gain
A lasting footing in his new domain,
On friendly terms propos'd the war to cease,
And grant to me and mine a lasting peace,
Would I consent to what I late deny'd,
And yield to be his son Arbantes' bride.
But this I still refus'd—my steadfast mind
Detested justly him and all his kind.
By him my fire and brethren's death I mourn'd,
My country wasted, and my cities burn'd.
Still was I fix'd to shun the marriage bed,
Till he return'd whom I had sworn to wed.
To shake my stern resolves my people try,
And every art of prayers and threats employ:

When
When all their prayers and threats they found in vain,
But saw me still my purpose firm maintain,
The terms with him agreed, themselves to save,
Me and the fort into his hands they gave.
The king receiv'd me mildly, and assur'd
My life and lands alike should rest secure,
Would I my stubborn purpose yet forfake,
And, for my spouse, his son Arbantes take.
Thus cruelly beset on every side,
I gladly would, t' escape his power, have died:
Yet unrevenge'd to die, had griev'd me more
Than all the sufferings I endur'd before:
But finding, when I every thought had weigh'd,
Dissembling could alone my purpose aid;
To ask forgiveness for the past I feign'd,
And gave consent to take Arbantes' hand.

Two brethren in my father's court were bred
Of loyal heart and of inventive head:
To these my thoughts disclos'd, they vow'd to join
Their mutual aid to second my design.
One, to secure my flight, a ship retain'd;
One, near my person, at the court remain'd.

While strangers now and natives all were led
T' attend the nuptial rites, a rumour spread
That,
That, in Biscaia rais'd, a naval power
Bireno brought t' invade the Holland shore: 240
For when in luckles fight our army fail'd,
In which I first a brother's death bewail'd,
With speed I sent to let my lover know
The fatal inroad of our barbarous foe.
Meanwhile the ruthless king his course pursu'd,
Till all our realm his conquering arms subdu'd.
Bireno now, who heard not all was lost,
Had lost his vessels from Biscaia's coast:
These tidings to the king of Friza known,
He left th' approaching nuptials to his son;
And failing with his fleet, engag'd the duke,
His ships destroy'd, and him a prisoner took.
Now had the youth my hand receiv'd, and led
At night impatient to the nuptial bed.
Soon as my faithful friend, who stood beside Conceal'd, the bridegroom drawing near espied,
Behind him with an axe so fierce he struck,
That life and speech at once the wretch forsook:
As sinks the slaughter'd ox besmear'd with gore,
So fell Arbantes, born in luckless hour!
Spite of Cymosco, doom'd his end to find,
So call the king, the basest of mankind!

By
By whom my fire and brethren found their fate,
Who now, t' ensure possession of my state,
Espous'd me to his son — some future day
To take perhaps my wretched life away.

My choicest treasures then secure'd, I flew
The hated place, and with my guide withdrew,
Whose trusty care my hasty steps convey'd
To where his brother with the vessel stay'd.

We court the winds, our oars divide the main,
Till Heaven decrees us safe this land to gain.
'Twere hard to tell which bore a greater part,
Or grief, or rage, in fell Cymosco's heart;
Grief for his hapless son deprived of breath,
Or rage against the author of his death.
He, with his joyful fleet, the land regain'd,
Elate with conquest, and Bireno chain'd.
He came prepar'd a nuptial feast to share,
And view'd his triumph chang'd to black despair.
Nor day, nor night, he found a moment's rest,
Revenge and sorrow rankling in his breast:
But since the dead regard not all our grief,
And hate from vengeance only finds relief,
He murder'd those that friends to me were held;
Their wealth he seiz'd; or from the realm expell'd

The
When

The hapless train: a thousand schemes engage
His cruel thoughts on me to fate his rage.
The tyrant doubtless had Bireno slain,
The greatest woe he knew I could sustain;
But, while he spar'd his life, he surely thought
He held a net by which I might be caught.
Before the youth he sets these terms severe:
His fate he respite for a single year,
But death denounces then, with lingering pain,
Unles he first, by fraud or force, attain,
By any means, my person to secure,
And, sacrificing mine, his life ensure.
Whate'er I could, except myself, I gave;
Each art I try'd his dearest life to save.
Six castles have I since in Flanders sold,
And part employ'd in secret sums of gold
To bribe his guards; and part employ'd t' excite
German and English powers to do me right.
Whether my envoys us'd their charge but ill,
Or wanted means their purpose to fulfil,
Instead of succour, words I found alone,
Till with my riches all my hopes were flown.
And now the fatal time is nearly clos'd,
The period to Bireno's life propos'd.
When force or gold will come too late to save
My plighted comfort from th' untimely grave.
For him my all is lost! — and nought remains
But now to yield these hands to cruel chains!
Yet, ah! could this redeem the youth I love,
My bosom dares the stern condition prove!
But when th' usurper has my person gain'd,
When I have all his vengeful wrath sustain'd,
I fear he ne'er will set Bireno free,
To owe his freedom and his life to me;
That all I feel of slow-consuming pain
Unblest Bireno must endure again.
For this to you my fortune I unfold,
And thus with many a warrior counsel hold,
In hopes that some their succour may engage,
That when I'm yielded to the tyrant's rage,
He may not still in bonds my love detain,
Or, when I'm dead, command him to be slain.
But to this hour I ne'er have found a knight
Who durst the sacred faith of knighthood plight,
To guard me from the king Cymosco's power,
Should he refuse Bireno to restore.
So much his fatal arms their courage quell'd,
Whose force no temper'd cuirass e'er repell'd.

Now,
Now, if your valour not unlike is seen
To your fierce semblance and Herculean mien;
Vouchsafe with me to seek the Holland strand,
And there resign me to his hated hand:
So shall I firmly on your aid rely,
That, though I fall, my lover will not die.

The damsel here her mournful story clos'd,
While oft her sighs and tears were interpos'd.
Orlando then no time in speech affords,
As one by nature little us'd to words;
But instant vows, by generous pity fir'd,
To grant that aid her hapless state requir'd:
Nor means she shall, to save Bireno, go
A willing prisoner to her cruel foe;
But thinks them both to safety to restore,
If still his sword retain its wonted power.

Ver. 341. — her mournful story clos'd,] A French story on this subject was published in 1584, called Olympie; and another in 1605, called, Les Amours d'Olympie et de Birene.

Ver. 344. — little us'd to words;] Orlando is painted in the same manner in the Innamorato, ever ready to succour the distressed, but sparing of professions.
Now tow'rys the port they bend their eager way,
The prosperous winds their vessel swift convey:
Orlando haften'd, whose impatient mind
To seek Ebuda's island had design'd.
Now here, now there, the pilot shifts the sails,
And cuts the deep before the driving gales.
The isles of Zealand soon appear'd in view,
Some sunk behind, as others nearer drew.
The third auspicious morn the coast they gain'd;
The champion landed, but the dame remain'd:
Orlando will'd her, ere she trod the shore,
To hear her foe Cymosco was no more.
Himself descends the deck with ready speed,
And sheath'd in armour, mounts a dappled steed,
In Flanders nourish'd, and of Danish race,
More strong and bold than active in the chase:
For when to cross the stream the bark he took,
In Britanny his courser he forsook,
The gallant Brigliadoro, who for fame
Alone was equall'd by Bayardo's name.
Orlando soon the guarded fortress view'd,
Where ready arm'd the hostile squadron stood
T' oppose invading force: for fame declar'd,
A kinsman to th' imprison'd lord prepar'd,

From
From Zealand, with a fleet and numerous host, 375
To make a bold incursion on the coast.

Orlando, fearless, one of these requir'd
To tell the king, a wandering knight desir'd
With sword or pointed spear to prove his might,
On these conditions to commence the fight: 380
The king, if he the challenger o'erthrew,
Should have the lady that Arbantes slew:
But on the other part the king should swear,
That if himself were vanquish'd in the war,
He would Bireno from his chains release,
And give the youth to leave the realm in peace.

The soldier swift the bold defiance bore:
But he, who ne'er was train'd to virtuous lore,
Whose churlish soul no courteous deeds could bind,
To fraudulent arts apply'd his treacherous mind, 390
In hopes, if first his arms the knight detain,
The hated damsel in his power to gain.

Now from the gate he sends a chosen force,
That wheeling round the plain with silent course,
Cut off the foe's retreat; while vainly there 395
Orlando waits to wage an equal war.
The king deludes him still with fraudulent lies,
Till he the foot and cavalry espies

Rang'd
B. IX. ORLANDO FURIOSO. 299

Rang’d at the destin’d place; and then in view
Himself with others from the portal drew.
As crafty fishers in Volana’s side
Surround the fish with nets on every side;
Thus all his guile to seize alive the knight,
With care providing to prevent his flight,
Cymosco proves; and thinks the deed to find
So certain, that he leaves his tube behind:
Nor would he now those thundering arms employ,
When here he meant to impel, not destroy.
So cautious fowlers, bent on greater gain,
Preserve the birds that first their arts detain,
Whose sportive play and songs may lure from far
Their thoughtless fellows to the fatal snare.
But little here his treacherous schemes avail’d;
Against Orlando every treason fail’d.

The knight of Anglant now has couch’d his spear,
Where closely press’d the men and arms appear:
First one, and then another, helpless dies;
Through six at once the lance impetuous flies,
And in the seventh inflicts so deep a wound,
That prone he tumbles lifeless to the ground.

Vol. I. U Thus
Thus by some standing pool or marshy place
We see an archer slay the croaking race
With pointed arrow, nor the slaughter leave
Till the full weapon can no more receive.

Orlando now his broken spear forfares,
Grasp'd in his hand his fatal sword he takes.
That sword, which never yet in vain he drew;
When'er it fell, a foot or horseman flew:
At every blow he aims, the streaming blood
Stains their gay armour with a crimson flood.

Cymosco will now his tube and fire,
Where present dangers most their aid require;
He bids them straight be brought, but bids in vain;
Who once a shelter in the walls can gain,
Returns no more: when thus their fears he view'd,
The king, with equal fear, their steps pursu'd:
Swift through the gate he bent his eager flight,
And bade the bridge be rais'd to oppose the knight;
But, close behind, the knight with equal haste
Had gain'd the bridge and thro' the portal pass'd.
First of the troops the king impels his speed,
Blest in th' excelling swiftness of his steed.
Orlando heeded not th' ignoble crowd,
His vengeance only on the traitor vow'd;

But
B. IX. ORLANDO FURIOSO.  291

But now the chace his horse so flowly plies,  445
One scarcely seems to move, while t' other flies.
Cymosco now is banish'd from the view,
Yet soon, with different arms, returns anew;
With dreaded engine to resume the fight,
And lies in secret ambush for the knight.  450
The huntsman thus with dogs and sylvan war
Expect's the boar descending from afar,
Whose rage upturns the soil, the trees destroys,
While all the wood rebellows to the noise!

Soon as the king the warrior near espies,  455
He fires the tube and swift the bullet flies:
At once the lightning flashes, shakes the ground,
The trembling bulwarks echo to the sound.
The pelt, that never spends in vain its force,
But shatters all that dares oppose its course,  460
Whizzing impetuous flies along the wind,
Yet miss'd the fatal mark the wretch design'd:
Whether his eagerness or haste conspir'd
To make him fail where he so much desir'd;
Or whether, inly pres'd with panic fear,  465
His trembling heart had caus'd his hand to err;
Or whether Heaven's high will might so ordain,
That his lov'd champion should not thus be slain;

U 2 Beneath
Beneath the knight the ball resiftless flew,
And, through the belly pierc'd, the courser flew. 470
Both horse and horseman fell with clashing sound;
One press'd, the other scarcely touch'd the ground:
As once Antæus, on the Lybian strand,
More fierce recover'd when he reach'd the sand:
So seem'd to rise again with added might,
Soon as he felt the earth, the Christian knight.
Whoe'er has seen the winged lightning fly,
By Jove in thunder brandish'd from the sky,
And penetrate some secret cavern stor'd
With nitrous powder and a sulphurous hoard; 480
At once inflam'd, with vast explosion driven,
The ruin seems to mingle earth and heaven;
The bursting fires the walls and buildings rend,
And to the stars the shatter'd stones ascend!
Resiftless thus th' indignant chief appear'd,
When from the plain his mighty limbs he rear'd;
And with such rage to instant vengeance flew,
That Mars had trembled at the dreadful view.
The Frizeland monarch, struck with pale affright,
Wheel'd round his horse to urge his eager flight:
With rapid speed his feet Orlando plies; 491
Let's swift an arrow from the bowstring flies!

And
And where before his tardy courser fail'd,
(Wondrous to see!) his lighter feet prevail'd.
Full soon th' impatient knight o'ertook the foe,
Then at his helmet aim'd a deadly blow:

Ver. 494. — his lighter feet prevail'd.] As bold as this hyperbole may appear in Ariosto, instances may be found equally strong in the poets. Aruns, in Virgil, terrified at the slaughter made by Camilla in the Trojan army, in order to escape, craftily urges her to alight from her horse to engage him on foot: Aruns then claps spurs to his horse, and flies with all speed from the battle; but the virgin, though on foot, soon outstrips him, and kills him in the same manner as is here related of Orlando and Cymosco:

He, like a true Ligurian, born to cheat,
(At least while fortune favour'd his deceit)
Cries out aloud—What courage have you shown,
Who trust your courser's strength, and not your own?
Forego the vantage of your horse, alight,
And then on equal terms begin the fight:
It shall be seen, weak woman, what you can,
When foot to foot you combat with a man.
He said: the glows with anger and disdain,
Dismounts with speed to dare him on the plain,
And leaves her horse at large among her train;
With her drawn sword defies him to the field,
And marching lifts aloft her maiden shield:
The youth, who thought his cunning did succeed,
Reins round his horse, and urges all his speed.

U 3 Adds
Deep in his head the sword a passage found,
And sent the body lifeless to the ground.

Within the city now was heard afar
A different clamour and alarm of war:
Bireno's kinsman, who had gain'd the coast;
And found the guards deserted from their post,
The portal enter'd with his eager band,
And scour'd the city round on every hand:
While none attempt his purpose to molest,
Such dread Orlando on their minds impress'd:
Nor less the Holland troops confess their fear,
Unconscious whence or why these foes appear:
But when they noted, by their speech and dress,
These came from Zealand's isle, they su'd for peace;

Adds the remembrance of the spur, and hides
The goring rowels in his bleeding sides.
Vain fool, and coward! (said the lofty maid)
Caught in the train which thou thyself haft laid:
On others practise thy Ligurian arts:
Thin stratagems and tricks of little hearts
Are lost on me; nor shalt thou safe retire
With vaunting lies to thy fallacious fire,
At this, so fast her flying feet she sped,
That soon she strain'd beyond his horse's head;
Then, turning short, at once she seiz'd the rein,
And laid the boaster grov'ling on the plain.

Dryden En., B. xi. ver. 1038,
And proffer'd to the chief their willing aid, 'Gainst those who had their lord in prison laid.

This people ever to the Frizeland power,
And to their king, a settled hatred bore;
Urg'd by his avarice, cruelty, and pride,
By whom their lov'd, their hapless sovereign died.

Orlando, friend to either, interpos'd;
And soon in lasting peace the parties clos'd;
Thus join'd, they then their common foes pursu'd,
And all of Friza prisoners made or new.

The prison gates they from their hinges broke,
And threw to earth: Biréno now forsook
His dreary cell; and gave, for life restor'd,
His grateful praises to Anglante's lord.

Then, with a numerous train, he sought the strand
Where fair Olympia in the ship remain'd:
So was the virgin nam'd, whose rightful sway
The Holland realms should by descent obey.

The people honour her with duteous zeal;
What fond endearments pass'd, were long to tell;
How oft with joy the tender pair carest;
Or to the valiant earl their thanks express'd.

Her subjects then, their vow'd allegiance paid,
To her paternal seat restor'd the maid;

While
While she confign’d to lov’d Bireno’s hand
Herself, her people, and recover’d land:
He, other thoughts revolving in his mind,
The earldom to his cousin’s care resign’d;
To Zealand thence he purpos’d to remove
With her, the dearest object of his love;
To tempt his fortune next in Friza’s land,
For which he held a precious pledge in hand,
A daughter to the king deceas’d, whom there
A captive found, he took beneath his care,
And to his brother meant to wed the blooming fair.

The Roman warrior now the place forsook,
The day Bireno he from prison took:
But nothing would the champion bear away
From all the spoils of that victorious day,
Save that device, whose unresisted force
Resembled thunder in its rapid course:
Yet not for his defence the gallant knight
E’er meant t’ avail him of such arms in fight;
His generous soul th’ ignoble thought disdain’d,
To seek the field, with such an aid sustain’d;
For different purpose thence the prize he bore,
The powder, balls, and all the deathful store;

Ver. 546. The Roman warrior — ] Orlando, called by Pulci and Boyardo il senatore Romano, il cavalier Romano:
the Roman senator, the Roman knight,
Refolv'd the murdering engine to remove; 560
Where man might never more its fury prove.

Soon as he saw the ship forfake the coast;
When to the sight the fragmenting land was lost;
When nought appear'd but waves on every side;
He held it in his hand, and thus he cry'd:

That ne'er again a knight by thee may dare,
Or daftard cowards, by thy help in war,
With vantage base, assault a nobler foe,
Here lie for ever in th' abyss below!
O curst device! base implement of death!
Fram'd in the black Tartarean realms beneath!
By Beelzebub's malicious art design'd
To ruin all the race of human-kind;

Hence,

Ver. 568. O curst device! — Mr. Mickle observes very well on this passage, "Orlando, having taken the first invented cannon from the king of Friza, throws it into the sea with the most heroic execrations. Yet the heroes of chivalry think it no disgrace to take every advantage afforded by invulnerable hides and enchanted armour."

On this subject see further note to Book xi. ver. 170. of this translation.

Ver. 570. By Beelzebub's malicious art — Thus Milton imputes the invention of artillery to the Devil.

See Paradise Lost, B. vi.
Hence, to thy native seat! — He said, and gave
The ponderous engine to the greedy wave.
Now the swift winds the swelling fails extend
And to the cruel isle their course they bend.
So burns the knight impatient to explore
The fatal prisons of Ebuda's shore,
For her, whose charms above the world he priz'd,
For whom he every joy of life despis'd!
He fears to touch Hibernia in his way,
Left some adventure should prolong his stay:
Nor England then, nor Ireland's coast he makes,
Nor any respite in his voyage takes.
But let him go, with Love his blindfold guide,
Whose arrows in his bleeding heart are dy'd.
Of him no further here the muse proceeds;
But now our steps again to Holland leads:
For 'twould displease us to be absent thence,
When festive mirth and sport their joys dispense.
Though the bright pomp that riches can display
Was us'd to celebrate the nuptial day.

It is very extraordinary that Mr. Addison, in his observations on Paradise Lost, should take no notice, that Milton apparently took the hint of his artillery among the devils from Ariosto; but the truth I believe is, that Italian literature was then little attended to.
B. IX. ORLANDO FURIOUS. 299

With more magnificence the Zealand race
Prepar'd the union of their lord to grace.
Yet all in vain such thoughts their mind employ;
A sudden change must damp each promis'd joy! 595
Which in th' ensuing book shall next appear;
If you th' ensuing book vouchsafe to hear.
