But let us consider the secret reasons which Virgil had, for thus framing this noble episode, wherein the whole passion of love is more exactly described than in any other poet: love was the theme of his fourth book; and though it is the shortest of the whole Æneis, yet there he has given its beginning, its progress, its traverses, and its conclusion: and has exhausted so entirely this subject, that he could resume it but very slightly in the eight ensuing books.

She was warmed with the graceful appearance of the hero, she smothered those sparkles out of decency, but conversation blew them up into a flame. Then she was forced to make a confidant of her whom she best might trust, her own sister, who approves the passion, and thereby augments it; then succeeds her public owning it; and, after that, the consummation. Of Venus and Juno, Jupiter and Mercury, I say nothing, for they were all machining work: but possession having cooled his love, as it increased her's, she soon perceived the change, or at least grew suspicious of a change: this suspicion soon turned to jealousy, and jealousy to rage; then she disdains and threatens, and again is humble and entreats: and, nothing availing, despairs, curses, and at last becomes her own executioner. See here the whole process of that passion, to which nothing can be added. I dare go no farther, lest I should lose the connection of my discourse.

To love our native country, and to study its benefit and its glory, to be interested in its concerns, is natural to all men, and is indeed our common duty. A poet makes a farther step; for, endeavouring to do honour to it, it is allowable in him even to be partial in its cause: for he is not tied to truth, or fettered by the laws of history. Homer and Tasso are justly praised, for choosing their heroes out of Greece and Italy. Virgil indeed made his a Trojan, but it was to derive the Romans and his own Augustus from him; but all the three poets are manifestly partial to their heroes, in favour of their country: for Dares Phrygius reports of Hector, that he was slain cowardly; Æneas, according to the best account, slew not Mezentius, but was slain by him; and the Chronicles of Italy tell us little of that Rinaldo d'Estè, who conquers Jerusalem in Tasso. He might be a champion of the church; but we know not that he was so much as present at the siege. To apply this to Virgil, he thought himself engaged in honour to espouse the cause and quarrel of his country against Carthage. He knew he could not please the Romans better, or oblige them more to patronize his poem, than by disgracing the foundress of that city. He shows her ungrateful to the memory of her first husband; doting on a stranger; enjoyed, and afterwards forsaken by him. This was the original, says he, of the immortal hatred betwixt the two rival nations. It is true he colours the falsehood of Æneas by an express command from Jupiter, to forsake the queen, who had obliged him; but he knew the Romans were to be his readers, and then he bribed, perhaps at the expense of the hero's honesty, but he gained his cause however, as pleading before corrupt judges. They were content to see their founder false to love, for still he had the advantage of the amour: it was their enemy whom he forsook, and she might have forsaken him if he had not got the start of her; she had already forgotten her vows to her Sichæus: and varium & mutabile semper femina, is the sharpest satire in the fewest words that ever was made on womankind; for both the adjectives are neuter, and animal must be understood to make them grammar. Virgil does well to put those words into the mouth of Mercury: 'If a god had not spoken them, neither durst he have written them, nor I translated them. Yet the deity was forced to come twice on the same errand: and the second time, as much a hero as Æneas was, he frightened him. It seems he feared not Jupiter so much as Dido. For your lordship may observe, that as much intent as he was upon his voyage, yet he still delayed it, until the messenger was obliged to tell him plainly, that if he weighed not anchor in the night, the queen would be with him in the morning. Notumque furas, quid femina possit; she was injured, she was revengeful, she was powerful. The poet had likewise before hinted, that the people were naturally perfidious: for he gives their character in the queen, and makes a proverb of Punica fides, many ages before it was invented.

Thus I hope, my lord, that I have made good my promise, and justified the poet, whatever becomes of the false knight. And sure a poet is as much privileged to lie, as an ambassador, for the honour and interest of his country; at least as sir Henry Wotton has defined.

This naturally leads me to the defence of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido contemporaries. For it is certain that the hero lived almost two hundred years before the building of Carthage. One who imitates Boccaccio says, that Virgil was accused before Apollo for this error. The god soon found that he was not able to defend his favourite by reason, for the case was clear: he therefore gave this middle sentence; that any thing might be allowed to his son Virgil, on the account of his other merits; that, being a monarch, he had a dispensing power, and pardoned him. But, that this special act of grace might never be drawn into example, or pleaded by his puny successors in justification of their ignorance, he decreed for the future, no poet should presume to make a lady die for love two hundred years before her birth. To moralize this story, Virgil is the Apollo, who has this dispensing power. His great judgment made the laws of poetry, but he never made himself a slave to them: chronology, at best, is but a cobweb-law, and he broke through it with his weight. They who will imitate him wisely, must choose, as he did, an obscure and a remote era, where they may invent at pleasure, and not be easily contradicted. Neither he, nor the Romans, had ever read the Bible, by which only his false computation of times can be made out against him. This Segrais says in his defence, and proves it from his learned friend Bochartus, whose letter on this subject he has printed at the end of the fourth Æneid, to which I refer your Lordship and the reader. Yet the credit of Virgil was so great, that he made this fable of his own invention pass for an authentic history, or, at least, as credible as any thing in Homer. Ovid takes it up after him, even in the same age, and makes an ancient heroine of Virgil's new-created Dido; dictates a letter for her, just before her death, to the ingrateful fugitive; and, very unluckily for himself, is for measuring a sword with a man so much superior in force to him on the same subject. I think I may be judge of this, because I have translated both. The famous author of the Art of Love has nothing of his own, he borrows all from a greater master in his own profession; and, which is worse, improves nothing which he finds. Nature fails him, and being forced to his old shift, he has recourse to witticism. This passes indeed with his soft admirers, and gives him the preference to Virgil in their esteem. But let them like for themselves, and not prescribe to others: for our author needs not their admiration.

The motives that induced Virgil to coin this fable, I have shown already; and have also begun to show that he might make this anachronism, by superseding the mechanic rules of poetry, for the same reason that a monarch may dispense with, or suspend, his own laws, when he finds it necessary to do; especially if those laws are not altogether fundamental. Nothing is to be called a fault in poetry, says Aristotle, but what is against the art: therefore a man may be an admirable poet, without being an exact chronologer. Shall we dare, continues Segrais, to condemn Virgil, for having made a fiction against the order of time, when we commend Ovid and other poets who have made many of their fictions against the order of nature? For what are the splendid miracles of the Metamorphoses? Yet these are beautiful as they are related; and have also deep learning and instructive mythologies couched under them; but to give, as Virgil does in this episode, the original cause of the long wars betwixt Rome and Carthage, to draw truth out of fiction, after so probable a manner, with so much beauty, and so much for the honour of his country, was proper only to the divine wit of Maro; and Tasso, in one of his discourses, admires him for this particularly. It is not lawful, indeed, to contradict a point of history which is known to all the world; as, for example, to make Hannibal and Scipio contemporaries with Alexander; but, in the dark recesses of antiquity, a great poet may and ought to feign such things as he finds not there, if they can be brought to embellish that subject which he treats. On the other side, the pains and diligence of ill poets is but thrown away, when they want the genius to invent and feign agreeably. But if the fictions be delightful (which they always are, if they be natural); if they be of a piece, if the beginning, the middle, and the end, be in their due places, and artfully united to each other, such works can never fail of their deserved success. And such is Virgil's episode of Dido and Æneas: where the sourest critic must acknowledge, that if he had deprived his Æneis of so great an ornament, because he found no traces of it in antiquity, he had avoided their unjust censure, but had wanted one of the greatest beauties of his poem. I shall say more of this in the next article of their charge against him; which is, want of invention. In the mean time, I may affirm in honour of this episode, that it is not only now esteemed the most pleasing entertainment of the Æneis, but was so accounted in his own age: and before it was mellowed into that reputation which time has given it: for which I need produce no other testimony than that of Ovid, his contemporary.

Nec pars ulla magis legitur de corpore toto
Quam non legitimo fœdere junctus amor.

Where by the way, you may observe, my lord, that Ovid in those words, non legitimo fœdere

junctus amor, will by no means allow it to be a lawful marriage betwixt Dido and Æneas: he was in banishment when he wrote those verses, which I cite from his letter to Augustus: "You, sir," saith he, "have sent me into exile for writing my Art of Love, and my wanton elegies; yet your own poet was happy in your good graces, though he brought Dido and Æneas into a cave, and left them there not over honestly together: may I be so bold to ask your majesty, is it a greater fault to teach the art of unlawful love, than to show it in the action?" But was Ovid, the court-poet, so bad a courtier as to find no other plea to excuse himself than by a plain accusation of his master? Virgil confessed it was a lawful marriage betwixt the lovers; that Juno, the goddess of matrimony, had ratified it by her presence: for it was her business to bring matters to that issue; that the ceremonies were short, we may believe, for Dido was not only amorous, but a widow. Mercury himself, though employed on a quite contrary errand, yet owns it a marriage by an inuendo. — Pulchramque uxorius urbem extruis. — He calls Æneas not only a husband, but upbraids him for being a fond husband, as the word, "uxorius" implies. Now mark a little, if your lordship pleases, why Virgil is so much concerned to make this marriage (for he seems to be the father of the bride himself, and to give her to the bridegroom), it was to make way for the divorce which he intended afterwards: for he was a finer flatterer than Ovid: and I more than conjecture, that he had in his eye the divorce, which not long before had passed betwixt the emperor and Scribonia. He drew this dimple in the cheek of Æneas, to prove Augustus of the same family, by so remarkable a feature in the same place. Thus, as we say in our homespun English proverb, "He killed two birds with one stone;" pleased the emperor, by giving him the resemblance of his ancestor, and gave him such a resemblance as was not scandalous in that age. For to leave one wife and take another, was but a matter of gallantry at that time of day among the Romans. Neque hæc in fœdera veni, is the very excuse which Æneas makes when he leaves his lady. I made no such bargain with you at our marriage, to live always drudging on at Carthage; my business was Italy, and I never made a secret of it. If I took my pleasure, had not you your share of it? I leave you free at my departure, to comfort yourself with the next stranger who happens to be shipwrecked on your coast: be as kind an hostess as you have been to me, and you can never fail of another husband. In the mean time, I call the gods to witness, that I leave your shore unwillingly: for though Juno made the marriage, yet Jupiter commands me to forsake you. This is the effect of what he saith, when it is dishonoured out of Latin verse into English prose. If the poet argued not aright, we must pardon him for a poor blind beathen, who knew no better morals.

I have detained your lordship longer than I intended on this objection, which would indeed weigh something in a spiritual court; but I am not to defend our poet there. The next, I think, is but a cavil, though the cry is great against him, and hath continued from the time of Macrobius to this present age: I hinted it before. They lay no less than want of invention to his charge: a capital crime, I must acknowledge: for a poet is a maker, as the word signifies: and he who cannot make, that is, invent, hath his name for nothing. That which makes this accusation look so strange at the first sight, is, that he has borrowed so many things from Homer, Apollonius Rhodius, and others who preceded him. But, in the first place, if invention is to be taken in so strict a sense, that the matter of a poem must be wholly new, and that in all its parts, then Scaliger hath made out, with Segræis, that the history of Troy was no more the invention of Homer, than of Virgil. There was not an old woman, or almost a child, but had it in their mouths, before the Greek poet or his friends digested it into this admirable order in which we read it. At this rate, as Solomon hath told us, There is nothing new beneath the Sun. Who then can pass for an inventor, if Homer, as well as Virgil, must be deprived of that glory? Is Versailles the less a new building, because the architect of that palace hath imitated others which were built before it? Walls, doors, and windows, apartments, offices, rooms of convenience and magnificence, are in all great houses. So descriptions, figures, fables, and the rest, must be in all heroic poems, they are the common materials of poetry, furnished from the magazine of nature: every poet hath as much right to them, as every man hath to air or water. Quid prohibetis aquas? usus communis aquarum est. But the argument of the work, that is to say, its principal action, the economy and disposition of it; these are the things which distinguish copies from originals. The poet who borrows nothing from others is yet to be born; he and the Jews' Messias will come together. There are parts of the Æneis which resemble some parts both of the Iliad and of the Odyssey: as, for example, Æneas descend- ed into Hell, and Ulysses had been there before him: Æneas loved Dido, and Ulysses loved Calypso: in few words, Virgil hath imitated Homer's Odysseus in his first six books, and in his six last the Iliad. But from hence can we infer, that the two poets write the same history? Is there no invention in some other parts of Virgil's Æneas? The disposition of so many various matters, is not that his own? From what book of Homer had Virgil his episode of Nisus and Euryalus, of Mezentius and Lausus? From whence did he borrow his design of bringing Æneas into Italy? of establishing the Roman empire on the foundations of a Trojan colony: to say nothing of the honour he did his patron, not only in his descent from Venus, but in making him so like her in his best features, that the goddess might have mistaken Augustus for her son. He had indeed the story from common fame, as Homer had his from the Egyptian priestess. Æneadum genitrix was no more unknown to Lucretius, than to him. But Lucretius taught him not to form his hero; to give him piety or valour for his manners: and both in so eminent a degree, that, having done what was possible for man to save his king and country, his mother was forced to appear to him and restrain his fury, which hurried him to death in their revenge. But the poet made his piety more successful; he brought off his father and his son; and his gods witnessed to his devotion, by putting themselves under his protection, to be replaced by him in their promised Italy. Neither the invention nor the conduct of this great action were owing to Homer, or any other poet. It is one thing to copy, and another thing, to imitate from nature. The copier is that servile imitator, to whom Horace gives no better name than that of animal: he will not so much as allow him to be a man. Raphael imitated nature; they who copy one of Raphael's pieces, imitate but him, for his work is their original. They translate him, as I do Virgil; and fall as short of him, as I of Virgil. There is a kind of invention in the imitation of Raphael: for though the thing was in nature, yet the idea of it was his own. Ulysses travelled, so did Æneas; but neither of them were the first travellers: for Cain went into the land of Nod, before they were born: and neither of the poets ever heard of such a man. If Ulysses had been killed at Troy, yet Æneas must have gone to sea, or he could never have arrived in Italy. But the designs of the two poets were as different as the courses of their heroes, one went home, and the other sought a home. To return to my first similitude. Suppose Apelles and Raphael had each of them

Painted a burning Troy; might not the modern painter have succeeded as well as the ancient, though neither of them had seen the town on fire? For the draughts of both were taken from the ideas which they had of nature. Cities have been burnt, before either of them were in being. But, to close the simile as I began it, they would not have designed it after the same manner: Apelles would have distinguished Pyrrhus from the rest of all the Grecians, and showed him forcing his entrance into Priam's palace; there he had set him in the fairest light, and given him the chief place of all his figures: because he was a Grecian, and he would do honour to his country. Raphael, who was an Italian, and descended from the Trojans, would have made Æneas the hero of his piece; and, perhaps, not with his father on his back; his son in one hand, his bundle of gods in the other; and his wife following (for an act of piety is not half so graceful in a picture as an act of courage;) he would have rather drawn him killing Androgeus, or some other, hand to hand; and the blaze of the fires should have darted full upon his face, to make him conspicuous amongst his Trojans. This, I think, is a just comparison betwixt the two poets, in the conduct of their several designs. Virgil cannot be said to copy Homer; the Grecian had only the advantage of writing first. If it be urged, that I have granted a resemblance in some parts, yet therein Virgil has excelled him. For what are the tears of Calypso, for being left to the fury and death of Dido? Where is there the whole process of her passion, and all its violent effects to be found, in the languishing episode of the Odysseus? If this be a copy, let the critics show us the same disposition, features, or colouring, in their original. The like may be said of the descent to Hell, which was not of Homer's invention neither; he had it from the story of Orpheus and Eurydice. But to what end did Ulysses make that journey? Æneas undertook it by the express commandment of his father's ghost: there he was to show him all the succeeding heroes of his race: and next to Romulus (mark, if you please, the address of Virgil) his own patron Augustus Cæsar. Anchises was likewise to instruct him how to manage the Italian war, and how to conclude it with his honour; that is, in other words, to lay the foundations of that empire which Augustus was to govern. This is the noble invention of our author: but it hath been copied by so many sign-post daubers, that now it is grown fulsome; rather by their want of skill, than by the commonness.

In the last place I may safely grant, that padding Homer, Virgil was taught to imitate his invention: that is, to imitate like him: which is no more than if a painter studied Raphael, that he might learn to design after his manner. And thus I might imitate Virgil, if I were capable of writing an heroic poem, and yet the invention be my own; but I should endeavour to avoid a servile copying. I would not give the same story under other names, with the same characters, in the same order, and with the same sequel; for every common reader to find me out at the first sight for a plagiarist, and cry, "This I read before in Virgil, in a better language, and in better verse." This is like Merry-Andrew on the low rope, copying lubberly the same tricks which his master is so dextrously performing on the high.

I will trouble your lordship but with one objection more, which I know not whether found in Le Fevre, or Valais; but I am sure I have read it in another French critic, whom I will not name, because I think it is not much for his reputation. Virgil, in the heat of action, suppose, for example, in describing the fury of his hero in a battle, when he is endeavouring to raise our concearnments to the highest pitch, turns short on the sudden into some similitude, which diverts, say they, your attention from the main subject, and mis-appeals it on some trivial image. He pours cold water into the caldron, when his business is to make it boil.

This accusation is general against all who would be thought heroic poets; but I think it touches Virgil less than any. He is too great a master of his art to make a blot which may so easily be hit. Similitudes, as I have said, are not for tragedy, which is all violent, and where the passions are in a perpetual ferment: for there they deaden where they should animate; they are not of the nature of dialogue, unless in comedy: a metaphor is almost all the stage can suffer, which is a kind of similitude comprehended in a word. But this figure has a contrary effect in heroic poetry; there it is employed to raise the admiration, which is its proper business. And admiration is not of so violent a nature as fear or hope, compassion or horror, or any concernment we can have for such or such a person on the stage. Not but I confess, that similitudes and descriptions, when drawn into an unreasonable length, must needs nauseate the reader. Once I remember, and but once, Virgil makes a similitude of Spartan laces; and his description of Farge is about the same number. He is blamed for both; and I doubt not but he would have contracted them, had he lived to have reviewed his war: but faults are no precedents. This I have observed of his similitudes in general, that they are not placed, as our unobserving critics tell us, in the heat of any action; but commonly in its declining: when he has warmed us in his description as much as possibly he can, then, lest that warmth should languish, he renoves it by some apt similitude, which illustrates his subject, and yet calls not his audience. I need give your lordship but one example of this kind, and leave the rest to your observation, when next you review the whole Æneis in the original, unblemished by my rude translation. It is in the first book, where the poet describes Neptune composing the ocean, on which Ægulus had raised a tempest, without his permission. He had already chidden the rebellious winds for obeying the commands of their usurping master: he had warned them from the seas: he had beat down the billows with his mace; dispelled the clouds, restored the sunshine, while Triton and Cymothoe were heaving the ships from off the quick-sands, before the poet would offer at a similitude for illustration.

Ac, veluti magno in populo cum sæpe coorta est
Seditio, sævitique animis ignobile vulgus,
Jamque faces, & saxa volant, furor arma ministrat;
Tum pietate gravem, ac meritis si forte virum quem
Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus adstant:
Ille regit dictis animos, & pectora mulcet:
Sic cunctus pelagi accidit fragor, æquora postquam
Prosperius genitor, cœloque inventus aperto
Flectit equos, curruque volans dat lora secundo.

This is the first similitude which Virgil makes in this poem, and one of the longest in the whole, for which reason I the rather cite it. While the storm was in its fury, any allusion had been improper: for the poet could have compared it to nothing more impetuous than itself: consequently he could have made no illustration. If he could have illustrated, it had been an ambitious ornament out of season, and would have diverted our concernment: Nunc non erat his locus: and therefore he deferred it to its proper place.

These are the criticisms of most moment which have been made against the Æneis, by the ancients or moderns. As for the particular exceptions against this or that passage, Macrobius and Peetanus have answered them already. If I desired to appear more learned than I am, it had been as easy for me to have taken their objections and solutions, as it is for a country parson to take the expositions of the fathers out of Junius and Tyemellius. Or not to have named the authors from whence I had them: for so Rufus, otherwise a most judicious commentator on Virgil's works, has aged Pontanus, his greatest benefactor: of whom he is very silent, and I do not remember that he ever cites him.

What follows next, is no objection; for that implies a fault: and it had been none in Virgil, if he had extended the time of his action beyond a year. At least, Aristotle has set no precise limits to it. Homer's, we know, was within two months; Tasso, I am sure, exceeds not a summer: and, if I examined him, perhaps he might be reduced into a much less compass. Bossu leaves it doubtful whether Virgil's actions were within the year, or took up some months beyond it. Indeed, the whole dispute is of no more concernment to the common reader, than it is to a ploughman, whether February this year had twenty-eight or twenty-nine days in it. But, for the satisfaction of the more curious, of which number I am sure your lordship is one, I will translate what I think convenient out of Segrais, whom perhaps you have not read: for he has made it highly probable, that the action of the Æneis began in the spring, and was not extended beyond the autumn. And we have known campaigns that have began sooner, and have ended later.

Ronsard, and the rest whom Segrais names, who are of opinion that the action of this poem takes up almost a year and a half, ground their calculation thus: Anchises died in Sicily at the end of winter, or beginning of the spring. Æneas, immediately after the interment of his father, puts to sea for Italy: he is surprised by the tempest described in the beginning of the first book; and there it is that the scene of the poem opens, and where the action must commence. He is driven by this storm on the coasts of Afric: he stays at Carthage all that summer, and almost all the winter following: sets sail again for Italy just before the beginning of the spring; meets with contrary winds, and makes Sicily the second time: this part of the action completes the year. Then he celebrates the anniversary of his father's funeral, and shortly after arrives at Cumæ, and from thence his time is taken up in his first treaty with Latinus; the overture of the war; the siege of his camp by Turnus; his going for succours to relieve it; his return; the raising of the siege by the first battle; the twelve days' truce; the second battle; the assault of Laurentum, and the single fight with Turnus: all which, they say, cannot take up less than four or five months more: by which account we cannot suppose the entire action to be contained in a much less compass than a year and a half.

Segrais reckons another way; and his computation is not condemned by the learned Ræmus, who compiled and published the comment of which our poet, which we call the Dauphin's Virgil, is more than

He allows the time of the year when Anchises died, to be in the latter end of winter, or in the beginning of the spring; he acknowledges that when Æneas is first seen at sea afterwards, and is driven by the tempest on the coast of Afric, is the time when the action is naturally to begin: he confesses farther, that Æneas left Carthage in the latter end of winter: for Dido tells him in express terms, as an argument for his longer stay,

Quinetiam hiberno moliris sidere classam.

But whereas Ronsard's followers suppose that when Æneas had buried his father, he set sail immediately for Italy, (though the tempest drove him on the coast of Carthage) Segrais will by no means allow that supposition, but thinks it much more probable that he remained in Sicily till the midst of July, or the beginning of August, at which time he places the first appearance of his hero on the sea, and there opens the action of the poem. From which beginning, to the death of Turnus, which concludes the action, there need not be supposed above ten months of intermediate time: for, arriving at Carthage in the latter end of summer, staying there the winter following, departing thence in the very beginning of the spring, making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judged the business but of ten months. To this the Ronsardians reply, that having been for seven years before in quest of Italy, and having no more to do in Sicily than to inter his father, after that office was performed, what remained for him, but, without delay, to pursue his first adventure? To which Segrais answers, that the obsequies of his father, according to the rites of the Greeks and Romans, would detain him for many days: that a longer time must be taken up in the refitting of his ships, after so tedious a voyage, and in refreshing his weather-beaten soldiers on a friendly coast. These, indeed, are but suppositions on both sides, yet those of Segrais seem better grounded. For the feast of Dido, when she entertained Æneas first, has the appearance of a summer's night, which seems already almost ended when he begins his story: therefore the love was made in autumn; the hunting followed properly, when the heats of that scorching country were declining: the winter was passed in jollity, as the season and their love required: and he left her in the latter end of winter, as is already proved. This opinion is fortified by the arrival of Æneas at the mouth of the Tyber, which marks the season

The remainder of the action required but three months more ; for when Æneas went for succour to the Tuscans, he found their army in a readiness to march, and wanting only a commander : so that, according to this calculation, the Æneis takes not up above a year complete, and may be comprehended in less compass.

This, amongst other circumstances, treated more at large by Segrais, agrees with the rising of Orion, which caused the tempest described in the beginning of the first book. By some passages in the Pastorals, but more particularly in the Georgics, our poet is found to be an exact astronomer according to the knowledge of that age. Now Ilioneus (whom Virgil twice employs in embassies, as the best speaker of the Trojans) attributes that tempest to Orion, in his speech to Dido :

Cum subito assurgens fluctu nimbosus Orion.

He must mean, either the heliacal or achronical rising of that sign. The heliacal rising of a constellation is when it comes from under the rays of the Sun, and begins to appear before day-light. The achronical rising, on the contrary, is when it appears at the close of the day, and in opposition of the Sun's diurnal course.

The heliacal rising of Orion is at present computed to be about the sixth of July ; and about that time it is, that he either causes or presages tempests on the seas.

Segrais has observed farther, that when Anna counsels Dido to stay Æneas during winter, she speaks also of Orion :

Dum pelago deservit hyems, & aquosus Orion.

If therefore Ilioneus, according to our supposition, understand the heliacal rising of Orion ; Anna must mean the achronical, which the different epithets given to that constellation seem to manifest. Ilioneus calls him nimbosus ; Anna aquosus. He is tempestuous in the summer when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter when he rises achronically. Your lordship will pardon me for the frequent repetition of these cant words, which I could not avoid in this abbreviation of Segrais, who, I think, deserves no little commendation in this new criticism. I have yet a word or two to say of Virgil's machines, from my own observation of them. He has imitated those of Homer, but not copied them. It was established long before this time, in the Roman religion as well as in the Greek, that there were gods ; and both nations, for the most part, worshipped the same deities, as did also the Trojans ; from whom the Romans, I suppose, would rather be thought to derive the rites of their religion, than from the Grecians, because they thought themselves descended from them. Each of those gods had his proper office, and the chief of them their particular attendants. Thus Jupiter had, in propriety, Ganymede and Mercury, and Juno had Iris. It was not for Virgil then to create new ministers ; he must take what he found in his religion. It cannot therefore be said that he borrowed them from Homer, any more than Apollo, Diana, and the rest, whom he uses as he finds occasion for them, as the Grecian poet did ; but he invents the occasions for which he uses them. Venus, after the destruction of Troy, had gained Neptune entirely to her party ; therefore we find him busy, in the beginning of the Æneis, to calm the tempest raised by Æolus, and afterwards conducting the Trojan fleet to Cumæ in safety, with the loss only of their pilot, for whom he bargains. I name those two examples amongst a hundred which I omit : to prove that Virgil, generally speaking, employed his machines in performing those things which might possibly have been done without them. What more frequent than a storm at sea, upon the rising of Orion ? what wonder, if amongst so many ships, there should one be overset, which was commanded by Orontes, though half the winds had not been there which Æolus employed ? Might not Palinurus, without a miracle, fall asleep, and drop into the sea, having been over-wearied with watching, and secure of a quiet passage, by his observation of the skies ? at least Æneas, who knew nothing of the machine of Somnus, takes it plainly in this sense :

*O nitium celo & pelago confise sereno,
Nudus in ignota Paliure jacebis arenâ.*

But machines sometimes are specious things to amuse the reader, and give a colour of probability to things otherwise incredible. And besides, it soothed the vanity of the Romans, to find the gods so visibly concerned in all the actions of their predecessors. We who are better taught by our religion, yet own every wonderful accident which befalls us for the best, to be brought to pass by some special providence of Almighty God, and by the care of guardian angels: and from hence I might infer, that no heroic poem can be writ on the Epicurean principles: which I could easily demonstrate, if there were need to prove it, or I had leisure.

When Venus opens the eyes of her son Æneas, to behold the gods who combated against Troy in that fatal night when it was surpris'd, we share the pleasure of that glorious vision (which Tasso has not ill copied in the sacking of Jerusalem.) But the Greeks had done their business: though neither Neptune, Juno, or Pallas, had given them their divine assistance. The most crude machine which Virgil uses is in the episode of Camilla, where Opis, by the command of her mistress, kills Aruns. The next is in the twelfth Æneid, where Venus cures her son Æneas. But in the last of these, the poet was driven to a necessity: for Turnus was to be slain that very day; and Æneas, wounded as he was, could not have engaged him in single combat, unless his hurt had been miraculously healed. And the poet had considered, that the dittany, which she brought from Crete, could not have wrought so speedy an effect, without the juice of ambrosia, which she mingled with it. After all, that his machine might not seem too violent, we see the hero limping after Turnus. The wound was skinned; but the strength of his thigh was not restored. But what reason had our author to wound Æneas at so critical a time? And how came the cuisses to be worse tempered than the rest of his armour, which was all wrought by Vulcan and his journeymen? These difficulties are not easily to be solved, without confessing that Virgil had not life enough to correct his work; though he had reviewed it, and found those errors which he resolv'd to mend; but being prevented by death, and not willing to leave an imperfect work behind him, he ordain'd, by his last testament, that his Æneis should be burned. As for the death of Aruns, who was shot by a goddess, the machine was not altogether so outrageous as the wounding Mars and Venus by the sword of Diomedes. Two divinities, one would have thought, might have pleaded their prerogative of impassibility, or at least not have been wounded by any mortal hand. Beside that the cyces which they shed, were so very like our common blood, that it was not to be distinguished from it, but only by the name and colour. As for what Horace says in his Art of Poetry, that no machines are to be used, unless on some extraordinary occasion, that rule is to be applied to the theatre, of which he is then speaking; and means no more than this, that when the knot of the play is to be untied, and no other way is left for making the discovery, then, and not otherwise, let a god descend upon a rope, and clear the business to the audience; but this has no relation to the machines which are used in an epic poem.

Nec deus interit, nisi dignus vindice nodus;

In the last place, for the Diræ, or flying pest, which flapping on the shield of Turnus, and fluttering about his head, disheartened him in the duel, and presaged to him his approaching death, I might have plac'd it more properly amongst the objections. For the critics, who lay want of courage to the charge of Virgil's hero, quote this passage as a main proof of their assertion. They say our author had not only secur'd him before the duel, but also, in the beginning of it, had given him the advantage in impenetrable arms, and in his sword: that of Turnus was not his own (which was forged by Vulcan for his father) but a weapon which he had snatch'd in haste, and, by mistake, belonging to his charioteer Metiscus. That, after all this, Jupiter, who was partial to the Trojan, and distrustful of the event, though he had hung the balance, and given it a jog of his hand to weigh down Turnus, thought convenient to give the fates a collateral security by sending the screech-owl to discourage him. For which they quote these words of Virgil:

—Non me tua turbida virtus

Terret, ait; Dii me terrent, & Jupiter hostis.

In answer to which, I say, that this machine is one of those which the poet uses only for ornament, and not out of necessity. Nothing can be more beautiful, or more poetical, than this description of the three Diræ, or the setting of the balance, which our Milton has borrow'd from him, but employ'd to a different end: for the first he makes God Almighty set the scales for St. Gabriel and Satan, when he knew no combat was to follow: then he makes the good angel's scale descend, and the devil's mount: quite contrary to Virgil, if I have translated the three verses according to my author's sense:

Jupiter ipse duas æquato examine lances

Sustinet; & fata imponis diversa duorum:

Quem damnet labor, & quo vergat pondere lethum.

For I have taken these words, Quem damnet labor, in the sense which Virgil gives them in another place; Damnabis tu quoque votis; to signify a prosperous event. Yet I dare not condemn so great a genius as Milton: for I am much mistaken if he alludes not to the text in Daniel, where Belshazzar was put into the balance, and found too light. This is digression, and I return to my subject. I said above, that these two machines of the balance and the Dira were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without them: for, when Æneas and Turnus stood fronting each other before the altar, Turnus looked dejected, and his colour faded in his face, as if he desponded of the victory before the fight; and not only he, but all his party, when the strength of the two champions was judged by the proportion of their limbs, concluded it was impar pugna, and that their chief was over-matched. Whereupon Juturna (who was of the same opinion) took this opportunity to break the treaty and renew the war. Juno herself had plainly told the nymph beforehand, that her brother was to fight;

Imparibus fatis; nec Diis, nec viribus æquis;

so that there was no need of an apparition to fright Farrus: he had the presage within himself of his impending destiny. The Dira only served to confirm him in his first opinion, that it was his destiny to die in the ensuing combat. And in this sense are those words of Virgil to be taken;

—Non mea tua turbida virtus
Terret, ait; Dii me terreat, & Jupiter hostia.

I doubt not but the adverb (solum) is to be understood, "it is not your valour only that gives me this concernment; but I find also, by this portent, that Jupiter is my enemy." For Turnus fled before when his first sword was broken, till his sister supplied him with a better: which indeed he could not use: because Æneas kept him at a distance with his spear. I wonder Rueus saw not this, where he charges his author so unjustly, for giving Turnus a second sword, to no purpose. How could he fasten a blow, or make a thrust, when he was not suffered to approach? Besides, the chief errand of the Dira was, to warn Juturna from the field, for she could have brought the chariot again, when she saw her brother worsted in the duel. I might further add, that Æneas was so eager in the fight, that he left the city, now almost in his possession, to decide his quarrel with Turnus by the sword: whereas Turnus had manifestly declined the combat, and suffered his sister to convey him as far from the reach of his enemy as she could. I say, not only suffered her, but consented to it: for it is plain he knew her by these words:

*O seror & dulum agnovi, cæca prima per artem
Fondera turbasti, teque hæc in bella dedisti;
Et unac nequicquam fallis Bæa.*

I have dwelt so long on this subject, that I must contract what I have to say, in reference to my translation; unless I would swell my preface into a volume, and make it formidable to your lordship, when you see so many pages yet behind. And indeed what I have already written, either in justification or praise of Virgil, is against myself: for presuming to copy, in my coarse English, the thoughts and beautiful expressions of this imitable poet, who flourished in an age when his language was brought to its last perfection, for which it was particularly owing to him and Horace, I will give your lordship my opinion, that those two friends had consulted each other's judgment, wherein they should endeavour to excel; and they seem to have pitched on propriety of thought, elegance of words, and harmony of numbers. According to this model, Horace writ his Odes and Epodes: for his Satires and Epistles, being intended wholly for instruction, required another style:

Ornari res ipsa negat, contenta doceri.

And therefore, as he himself professes, are sermoni propiora, nearer prose than verse. But Virgil, who never attempted the lyric verse, is every where elegant, sweet, and flowing, in his hexameters. His words are not only chosen, but the places in which he ranks them for the sound; he who removes them from the station wherein their master set them; spoils the harmony. What he says of the Sibyl's prophecies, may be as properly applied to every word of his: they must be read, in order as they lie; the least breath discomposes them, and somewhat of their divinity is lost. I cannot boast that I have been thus exact in my verses, but I have endeavoured to follow the example of my master: and am the first Englishman, perhaps, who made it his design to copy him in his numbers, his choice of words, and his placing them for the sweetness of the sound. On this last consideration, I have shunned the cæsura as much as possibly I could. For wherever that is used, it gives a roughness to the verse; of which we can have little need, in a language which is over-stocked with consonants. Such is not the Latin, where the vowels and consonants are mixed in proportion to each other: yet Virgil judged the vowels to have somewhat of an over-balance, and therefore tempers their sweetness with cæsuras. Such difference there is in tongues, that the same figure which roughens one, gives majesty to another : and that was it which Virgil studied in his verses. Ovid uses it but rarely : and hence it is that this versification cannot so properly be called sweet, as luscious. The Italians are forced upon it, once or twice in every line, because they have a redundancy of vowels in their language. Their metal is so soft, that it will not coin without alloy to harden it. On the other side, for the reason already named, it is all we can do to give sufficient sweetness to our language : we must not only choose our words for elegance, but for sound ; to perform which, a mastery in the language is required, the poet must have a magazine of words, and have the art to manage his few vowels to the best advantage, that they may go the farther. He must also know the nature of the vowels, which are more sonorous, and which more soft and sweet ; and so dispose them as his present occasions require ; all which, and a thousand secrets of versification beside, he may learn from Virgil, if he will take him for his guide. If he be above Virgil, and is resolved to follow his own verve (as the French call it,) the proverb will fall heavily upon him : Who teaches himself, has a fool for his master.

Virgil employed eleven years upon his Æneis ; yet he left it, as he thought himself, imperfect. Which when I seriously consider, I wish, that instead of three years which I have spent in the translation of his works, I had four years more allowed me to correct my errors, that I might make my version somewhat more tolerable than it is : for a poet cannot have too great a reverence for his readers, if he expects his labours should survive him. Yet I will neither plead my age nor sickness, in excuse of the faults I have made : that I wanted time, is all that I have to say : for some of my subscribers grew so clamorous, that I could no longer defer the publication. I hope, from the candour of your lordship, and your often experienced goodness to me, that, if the faults are not too many, you will make allowances with Horace :

Si plura nitent in carmine, non ego paucis
Offendar maculis, quas aut incuria fudit
Aut humana parum cavit natura.

You may please also to observe, that there is not, to the best of my remembrance, one vowel gaping on another for want of a cæsura, in this whole poem : but where a vowel ends a word, the next begins either with a consonant, or what is its equivalent ; for our W and H aspirate, and our diphthongs are plainly such ; the greatest latitude I take is in the letter Y, when it concludes a word, and the first syllable of the next begins with a vowel. Neither need I have called this a latitude, which is only an explanation of this general rule : that no vowel can be cut off before another, when we cannot sink the pronunciation of it ; as he, she, me, I, &c. Virgil thinks it sometimes a beauty to imitate the licence of the Greeks, and leave two vowels opening on each other, as in that verse of the third pastoral :

Et succus pecori, & lac subducitur agnia.

But, nobis non licet esse tam disertis : at least, if we study to refine our numbers. I have long had by me the materials of an English prosodia, containing all the mechanical rules of versification, wherein I have treated with some exactness of the feet, the quantities, and the pauses. The French and the Italians know nothing of the two first ; at least their best poets have not practised them. As for the pauses, Malherbe first brought them into France, within this last century ; and we see how they adorn their Alexandrians. But, as Virgil propounds a riddle which he leaves unsolved,

Dic quibus in terris, inscripti nomina regum
Nascantur flores, & Phyllida solus habeto, so will I give your lordship another, and leave the exposition of it to your acute judgment. I am sure there are few who make verses, have observed the sweetness of these two lines in Cooper's-Hill ;

Though deep yet clear ; though gentle, yet not dull ;

Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

And there are yet fewer who can find the reason of that sweetness. I have given it to some of my friends in conversation, and they have allowed the criticism to be just. But, since the evil of false quantities is difficult to be cured in any modern language ; since the French and the Italians, as well as we, are yet ignorant what feet are to be used in heroic poetry ; since I have not strictly observed those rules myself, which I can teach others ; since I pretend to no dictatorship among my fellow-poets ; since if I should instruct some of them to make well-running verses, they want genius to give them strength as well as sweetness ; and above all, since your lordship has advised me not to publish that little which I know, I look on your counsel as your command, which I shall observe inviolably, till you shall please to revoke it, and leave me at liberty to make my thoughts public. In the mean time, that I may arrogate nothing to myself, I must acknowledge that Virgil in Latin, and Spenser in English, have been my masters. Spenser has also given me the boldness to make use sometimes of his Alexandrian line : which we call, though improperly, the Pladario, because Mr. Cowley has often employed it in his odes. It adds a certain majesty to the verse, when it is used with judgment, and stops the sense from overflowing into another line. Formerly the French, like us, and the Italians, had but five feet, or ten syllables, in their heroic verse ; but since Ronsard's time, as I suppose, they found their tongue too weak to support their epic poetry, without the addition of another foot. That indeed has given it somewhat of the run and measure of a trimeter ; but it runs with more activity than strength : their language is not strung with sinews like our English : it has the nimbleness of a greyhound, but not the bulk and body of a mastiff. Our men and our verses overbear them by their weight ; and pondere non numero, is the British motto. The French have set up purity for the standard of their language ; and a masculine vigour is that of ours. Like their tongue is the genius of their poets, light and trifling in comparison of the English ; more proper for sonnets, madrigals, and elegies, than heroic poetry. The turn on thoughts and words is their chief talent ; but the epic poem is too stately to receive those little ornaments. The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits, but the weight of gold and of embroideries is reserved for queens and goddesses. Virgil is never frequent in those turns, like Ovid ; but much more sparing of them in his Æneis, than in his Pastorals and Georgics :

Ignoscenda quidem, scirent si ignoscere manca.

That turn is beautiful indeed ; but he employs it in the story of Orpheus and Eurydice, not in his great poem. I have used that licence in his Æneis sometimes ; but I own it as my fault. It was given to those who understand no better. It is like Ovid's

Semivirumque bovem, semibovemque virum.

The poet found it before his critics, but it was a darling sin which he would not be persuaded to reform. The want of genius, of which I have accused the French, is laid to their charge by one of their own great authors, though I have forgotten his name, and where I read it. If rewards could make good poets, their great master has not been wanting on his part in his bountiful encouragements : for he is wise enough to imitate

Augustus, if he had a Mars. The triumvir and proscriber had descended to us in a more hideous form than they now appear, if the emperor had not taken care to make friends of him and Horace. I confess the banishment of Ovid was a blot in his escutcheon ; yet he was only banished ; and who knows but his crime was capital, and then his exile was a favour. Ariosto, who, with all his faults, must be acknowledged a great poet, has put these words into the mouth of an evangelist ; but whether they will pass for gospel now, I cannot tell :

*Non fu si santo ni benigno Augusto,
Come la tuba di Virgilio suona ;
L'haver havuto in poesia buon gusto,
La proscrittione iniqua gli pardona.*

But heroic poetry is not of the growth of France, as it might be of England, if it were cultivated. Spenser wanted only to have read the rules of Bossu : for no man was ever born with a greater genius, or had more knowledge to support it. But the performance of the French is not equal to their skill : and hitherto we have wanted skill to perform better. Segrais, whose preface is so wonderfully good, yet is wholly destitute of elevation ; though his version is much better than that of the two brothers, or any of the rest who have attempted Virgil. Hannibal Caro is a great name amongst the Italians ; yet his translation of the Æneis is most scandalously mean, though he has taken the advantage of writing in blank verse, and freed himself from the shackles of modern rhyme (if it be modern, for Le Clerc has told us lately, and I believe has made it out, that David's Psalms were written in as arrant rhyme as they are translated). Now if a Muse cannot run when she is unfettered, it is a sign she has but little speed. I will not make a digression here, though I am strangely tempted to it ; but will only say, that he who can write well in rhyme, may write better in blank verse. Rhyme is certainly a constraint even to the best poets, and those who make it with most ease : though perhaps I have as little reason to complain of that hardship as any man, excepting Quarles and Withers. What it adds to sweetness, it takes away from sense ; and he who loses the least by it, may be called a gainer : it often makes us swerve from an author's meaning : as if a mark be set up for an archer at a great distance, let him aim as exactly as he can, the least wind will take his arrow, and divert it from the white. I return to our Italian translator of the Æneis : he is a foot-poet, he loquies by the side of Virgil at the best, but never mounts behind him. Doctor Morelli, who is no mean critic in our poetry, and therefore may be presumed to be a better in his own language, has confirmed me in this opinion by his judgment, and thinks withal, that he has often mistaken his master's sense. I would say so, if I durst, but am afraid I have committed the same fault more often, and more grossly: for I have forsaken Ræus (whom generally I follow) in many places, and made expositions of my own in some, quite contrary to him: of which I will give but two examples, because they are so near each other, in the tenth Æneid.

— Sorti pater æquus utrique.

Pallas says it to Turnus, just before they fight. Ræus thinks that the word pater is to be referred to Evander, the father of Pallas. But how could he imagine that it was the same thing to Evander, if his son were slain, or if he overcame? The poet certainly intended Jupiter, the common father of mankind: who, as Pallas hoped, would stand an impartial spectator of the combat, and not be more favourable to Turnus, than to him. The second is not long after it, and both before the duel is begun. They are the words of Jupiter, who comforts Hercules for the death of Pallas, which was immediately to ensue, and which Hercules could not hinder (though the young hero had addressed his prayers to him for his assistance): because the gods cannot control destiny.— The verse follows:

Sic ait; atque oculos Rutulorum rejicit arvis.

Which the same Ræus thus construes: " Jupiter, after he had said this, immediately turns his eyes to the Ratilian fields, and beholds the duel." I have given this place another exposition, that he turned his eyes from the field of combat, that he might not behold a sight so displeasing to him. The word rejicit, I know, will admit of both senses; but Jupiter, having confessed that he could not alter fate, and being grieved he could not, in consideration of Hercules, it seems to me that he should avert his eyes, rather than take pleasure in the spectacle. But of this I am not so confident as the other, though I think I have followed Virgil's sense.

What I have said, though it has the face of arrogance, yet it is intended for the honour of my country; and therefore I will boldly own, that this English translation has more of Virgil's spirit in it, than either the French, or the Italian. Some of our countrymen have translated episodes, and other parts of Virgil, with great success. As particularly your lordship, whose version of Orpheus and Eurydice is eminently good. Amongst the dead authors, the Silenus of my lord Roscommon cannot be too much commended. I say nothing of sir John Denham, Mr. Waller, and Mr. Cowley; it is the utmost of my ambition to be thought their equal, or not to be much inferior to them, and some others of the living. But it is one thing to take pains on a fragment, and translate it perfectly, and another thing to have the weight of a whole author on my shoulders. They who believe the burden light, let them attempt the fourth, sixth, or eighth Pastoral; the first or fourth Georgic; and amongst the Æneids, the fourth, the fifth, the seventh, the ninth, the tenth, the eleventh, or the twelfth; for in these I think I have succeeded best.

Long before I undertook this work, I was no stranger to the original. I had also studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves somewhat to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but, above all, the elegance of his expression, and the harmony of his numbers. For, as I have said in a former dissertation, the words are in poetry, what the colours are in painting. If the design be good, and the draught be true, the colouring is the first beauty that strikes the eye. Spenser and Milton are the nearest in English to Virgil and Horace in the Latin; and I have endeavoured to form my style in imitating their masters. I will further own to you, my lord, that my chief ambition is to please those readers who have discernment enough to prefer Virgil before any other poet in the Latin tongue. Such spirits as he desired to please, such would I choose for my judges, and would stand or fall by them alone. Segrais has distinguished the readers of poetry, according to their capacity of judging, into three classes (he might have said the same of writers too, if he had pleased). In the lowest form he places those whom he calls les petits esprits: such things as are our upper-gallery audience in a play-house: who like nothing but the husk and rind of wit; prefer a quibble, a conceit, an epigram, before solid sense, and elegant expression: these are mob-readers: if Virgil and Martial stood for parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on it is, they are but a sort of French Hugonots, or Dutch boors, brought over in herds, but not naturalized: who have not land of two pounds per annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll. Their authors are of the same level: fit to represent them on a mountebank's stage, or to be masters of the ceremonies in a bear-garden. Yet these are they who have the most admirers. But it often happens, to their mortification, that as their readers improve their stock of sense (as they may by reading better books, and by conversation with men of judgment) they soon forsake them: and when the torrent from the mountains falls no more, the swelling writer is reduced into his shallow bed, like the Mancanars at Madrid, with scarce water to moisten his own pebbles. There are a middle sort of readers (as we hold there is a middle state of souls) such as have a farther insight than the former, yet have not the capacity of judging right (for I speak not of those who are bribed by a party, and know better if they were not corrupted); but I mean a company of warm young men, who are not yet arrived so far as to discern the difference betwixt fustian, or ostentatious sentences, and the true sublime. These are above liking Martial or Owen's epigrams; but they would certainly set Virgil below Statius or Lucretius. I need not say their poets are of the same taste with their admirers. They affect greatness in all they write, but it is a blattered greatness, like that of the vain man whom Seneca describes—an ill habit of body, full of humours, and swelled with dropsy. Even these too desert their authors, as their judgment ripens. The young gentlemen themselves are commonly misled by their pedagogue at school, their tutor at the university, or their governor in their travels: and many of those three sorts are the most positive blockheads in the world. How many of those fatulent writers have I known, who have sunk in their reputation, after seven or eight editions of their works! for indeed they are poets only for young men. They had great success at their first appearance; but not being of God, as a wit said formerly, they could not stand.

I have already named two sorts of judges, but Virgil wrote for neither of them; and, by his example, I am not ambitious of pleasing the lowest or the middle form of readers.

He chose to please the most judicious; souls of the highest rank, and truest understanding: these are few in number; but whoever is so happy as to gain their approbation, can never lose it, because they never give it blindly. Then they have a certain magnetism in their judgment, which attracts others to their sense. Every day they said, some new proselyte, and in time become the church. For this reason, a well-weighed, judicious poem, which at its first appearance gains no more upon the world than to be just received, and rather not blamed, than much applauded, insinuates itself by insensible degrees into the liking of the reader: the more he studies it, the more it grows upon him; every time he takes it up, he discovers some new graces in it. And whereas poems, which are produced by the vigour of imagination only, have a gloss upon them at first, which time wears off; the works of judgment are like the diamond, the more they are polished, the more lustre they receive. Such is the difference betwixt Virgil's Aeneis, and Marini's Adone: and, if I may be allowed to change the metaphor, I would say, that Virgil is like the fame which he describes:

Such a sort of reputation is my aim, though in a far inferior degree, according to my motto in the title-page; Sequiturque patrem non passibus æquis: and therefore I appeal to the highest court of judicature, like that of the peers, of which your lordship is so great an ornament.

Without this ambition which I own, of desiring to please the judices natos, I could never have been able to have done any thing at this age, when the fire of poetry is commonly extinguished in other men. Yet Virgil has given me the example of Entellus for my encouragement: when he was well beaten, the younger champion could not stand before him: and we find the elder contended not for the gift, but for the honour; Nec dona moror. For Dampier has informed us, in his voyage, that the air of the country which produces gold is never wholesome.

I had, long since, considered, that the way to please the best judges, is not to translate a poet literally; and Virgil least of any other; for his peculiar beauty lying in his choice of words, I am excluded from it by the narrow compass of our heroic verse, unless I would make use of monosyllables only, and those clogged with consonants, which are the dead weight of our mother tongue. It is possible, I confess, though it rarely happens, that a verse of monosyllables may sound harmoniously; and some examples of it I have seen. My first line of the Aeneis is not harsh:

Arms, and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate, &c.

But a much better instance may be given from the last line of Manilius, made English by our learned and judicious Mr. Creech:

Nor could the world have borne so fierce a flame.

Where the many liquid consonants are placed so artfully, that they give a pleasing sound to the words, though they are all of one syllable.

It is true, I have been sometimes forced upon it in other places of this work, but I never did it out of choice: I was either in haste, or Virgil gave me no occasion for the ornament of words: for it seldom happens but a monosyllable line turns verse to prose, and even that prose is rugged and unharmonious. Philarchus, I remember, taxes Balzac for placing twenty monosyllables in file, without one dissyllable betwixt them. The way I have taken is not so strait as metaphrase, nor so loose as paraphrase: some things too I have omitted, and sometimes have added of my own; yet the omissions, I hope, are but of circumstances, and such as would have no grace in English; and the additions, I also hope, are easily deduced from Virgil's sense. They will seem (at least I have the vanity to think so) not stuck into him, but growing out of him. He studies brevity more than any other poet; but he had the advantage of a language wherein much may be comprehended in a little space. We, and all the modern tongues, have more articles and pronouns, besides signs of tenses and cases, and other barbarities on which our speech is built by the faults of our forefathers. The Romans founded theirs upon the Greek: and the Greeks, we know, were labouring many hundred years upon their language, before they brought it to perfection. They rejected all those signs, and cut off as many articles as they could spare; comprehending in one word, what we are constrained to express in two: which is one reason why we cannot write so concisely as they have done. The word pater, for example, signifies not only a father, but your father, my father, his or her father, all included in a word.

This inconvenience is common to all modern tongues; and this alone constrains us to employ more words than the ancients needed. But having before observed, that Virgil endeavours to be short and at the same time elegant, I pursue the excellence, and forsake the brevity: for there is he like ambergris, a rich perfume, but of so close and glutinous a body, that it must be opened with inferior scents of musk or civet, or the sweetness will not be drawn out into another language.

On the whole matter, I thought fit to steer betwixt the two extremes of paraphrase and literal translation, to keep as near my author as I could, without losing all his graces, the most eminent of which are in the beauty of his words, and those words, I must add, are always figurative. Such of these as would retain their elegance in our tongue, I have endeavoured to graft on it; but most of them are of necessity to be lost, because they will not shine in any but their own. Virgil has, sometimes, two of them in a line; but the scantiness of our heroic verse is not capable of receiving more than one: and that too must expiate for many others which have none. Such is the difference of the languages, or such my want of skill in choosing words. Yet I may presume to say, and I hope with as much reason as the French translator, that, taking all the materials of this divine author, I have endeavoured to make Virgil speak such English, as he would himself have spoken, if he had been born in England, and in this present age. I acknowledge with Segrais, that I have not succeeded in this attempt according to my desire; yet I shall not be wholly without praise, if in some sort I may be allowed to have copied the clearness, the purity, the easiness, and the magnificence of his style. But I shall have occasion to speak farther on this subject, before I end the preface.

When I mentioned the Pindaric line, I should have added, that I take another licence in my verses; for I frequently make use of triplet rhymes, and for the same reason, because they bound the sense: and therefore I generally join these two licences together, and make the last verse of the triplet a Pindaric: for, besides the majesty which gives, it confines the sense within the barriers of three lines, which would languish if it were lengthened into four. Spenser is my example for both these privileges of English verses: and Chapman hath followed him in his translation of Homer. Mr. Cowley has given into them after both, and all succeeding writers after him. I regard them now as the Magna Charta of heroic poetry; and am too much an Englishman to lose what my ancestors have gained for me. Let the French and Italians value themselves on their regularity: strength and elevation are our standard. I said before, and I repeat it, that the affected purity of the French has unsinewed their heroic verse. The language of an epic poem is almost wholly figurative; yet they are so fearful of a metaphor, that no example of Virgil can encourage them to be bold with safety. Sure they might warm themselves by that sprightly blaze, without approaching it so close as to singe their wings: they may come as near it as their master: not that I would discourage that purity of diction in which he excels all other poets. But he knows how far to extend his franchises; and advances to the verge, without venturing a foot beyond it. On the other side, without being injurious to the memory of our English Pindar, I will presume to say, that his metaphors are sometimes too violent, and his language is not always pure: but, at the same time, I must excuse him; for, through the iniquity of the times, he was forced to travel, at an age when, instead of learning foreign languages, he should have studied the beauties of his mother tongue, which, like all other speeches, is to be cultivated early, or we shall never write it with any kind of elegance. Thus by gaining abroad, he lost at home: like the painter in the Arcadia, who, going to see a skirmish, had his arms lopped off: and returned, says sir Philip Sidney, well instructed how to draw a battle, but without a hand to perform his work.

There is another thing in which I have presumed to deviate from him and Spenser. They both make hemistichs, (or half verses) breaking off in the middle of a line. I confess, there are not many such in the Fairy Queen: and even those few might be occasioned by his unhappy choice of so long a stanza. Mr. Cowley had found out, that no kind of staff is proper for an heroic poem, as being all too lyrical; yet though he wrote in couplets, where rhyme is freer from constraint, he frequently affects half verses: of which we find not one in Homer, and I think not in any of the Greek poets, or the Latin, excepting only Virgil; and there is no question but he thought he had Virgil's authority for that licence. But, I am confident, our poet never meant to leave him, or any other, such a precedent; and I ground my opinion on these two reasons: first, we find no example of a hemistich in any of his Pastorals or Georgics: for he had given the last finishing strokes to both these poems. But his Æneis he left so uncorrect, at least so short of that perfection at which he aimed, that we know how hard a sentence he passed upon it; and, in the second place, I reasonably presume, that he intended to have filled up all those hemistichs, because, in one of them, we find the sense imperfect; which some foolish grammarian has ended for him with half a line of nonsense:

Quem tibi jam Trojâ—

peperit fumante Creûsa.

For Ascanius must have been born some years before the burning of that city, which I need not prove. On the other side, we find also, that he himself filled up one line of the sixth Æneid, the enthusiasm seizing him while he was reading to Augustus:

Misenum Æolidem, quo non præstantior alter
Ære ciere viros.

To which he added, in that transport, Martemque accendere cantu: and never was a line more nobly finished, for the reasons which I have given in the book of Painting. On these considerations I have shunned hemistichs; not being willing to imitate Virgil to a fault: like Alexander's courtiers, who affected to hold their necks awry, because he could not help it. I am confident your lordship is, by this time, of my opinion; and that you will look on those half lines hereafter, as the imperfect products of a hasty Muse: like the frogs and the serpents in the Nile; part of them kiedled into life, and part a lump of unformed, unanimated mud.

I am sensible that many of my whole verses are as imperfect as those halves, for want of time to digest him better; but give me leave to make the excuse of Boccace, who, when he was upbraided that some of his novels had not the spirit of the rest, returned this answer: that Charlemain, who made the Palladins, was never able to raise an army of them. The leaders may be heroes, but the multitude must consist of common men.

I am also bound to tell your lordship, in my own defence, that, from the beginning of the first Georgic to the end of the last Æneid, I found the difficulty of translation growing on me in every succeeding book: for Virgil, above all poets, had a stock, which I may call almost inexhaustible, of figurative, elegant, and sounding words. I, who inherit but a small portion of his genius, and write in a language so much inferior to the Latin, have found it very painful to vary phrases, when the same sense returns upon me. Even he himself, whether out of necessity or choice, has often expressed the same thing in the same words; and often repeated two or three whole verses, which he had used before. Words are not so easily coined as money; and yet we see that the credit not only of banks, but of exchequers, cracks, when little comes in, and much goes out. Virgil called upon me in every line for some new word; and I paid so long, that I was almost bankrupt: so that the latter end must needs be more burthensome than the beginning or the middle; and consequently the twelfth Æneid cost me double the time of the first and second. What had become of me, if Virgil had taxed me with another book? I had certainly been reduced to pay the public in hammered money for want of milled: that is, in the same old words which I had used before. And the receivers must have been forced to have taken any thing, where there was so little to be had.

Besides this difficulty, (with which I have struggled, and made a shift to pass it over) there is one remaining, which is insuperable to all translators. We are bound to our author's sense, though with the latitudes already mentioned (for I think it not so sacred, as that one iota must not be added or diminished, on pain of an anathema). But slaves we are, and labour on another man's plantation: we dress the vineyard, but the wine is the owner's: if the soil be sometimes barren, then we are sure of being scourged: if it be fruitful, and our case succeeds, we are not thanked: for the proud reader will only say, "The poor drudge has done his duty." But this is nothing to what follows; for, being obliged to make his sense intelligible, we are forced to untune our own verses, that we may give his meaning to the reader. He who invents, is master of his thoughts and words: he can turn and vary them as he pleases, till he renders them harmonious. But the wretched translator has no such privilege: for being tied to thoughts, he must make what music he can in the expression; and for this reason it cannot always be so sweet as that of the original. There is a beauty of sound, as Segrais has observed, in some Latin words, which is wholly lost in any modern language. He instances in that molle amaracus, on which Venus lays Cupid in the first Æneid. If I should translate it sweet-marjoram, as the word signifies, the reader would think I had mistaken Virgil: for those village-words, as I may call them, give us a mean idea of the thing; but the sound of the Latin is so much more pleasing, by the just mixture of the vowels with the consonants, that it raises our fancies, to conceive somewhat more noble than a common herb; and to spread roses under him, and strew lilies over him—a bed not unworthy the grandson of the goddess.

If I cannot copy his harmonious numbers, how shall I imitate his noble flights, where his thoughts and words are equally sublime?

Quem quisquis studet æmulari,
—gratis ope Dedalæ
Nititur pennis, vitreo daturus
Nemina ponto.

What modern language, or what poet can express the majestic beauty of this one verse amongst a thousand others!

Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum
Finge Deo.

For my part, I am lost in the admiration of it: I contemn the world when I think on it, and myself when I translate it.

Lay by Virgil, I beseech your lordship, and all my better sort of judges, when you take up my version, and it will appear a passable beauty when the original Muse is absent; but, like Spenser's false Florisel, made of snow, it melts and vapishes when the true one comes in sight. I will not excuse, but justify myself for one pretended crime, with which I am liable to be charged by false critics, not only in this translation, but in many of my original poems, that I latinize too much. It is true, that when I find an English word significant and sounding, I neither borrow from the Latin, or any other language; but when I want at home, I must seek abroad.

If sounding words are not of our growth and manufacture, who shall hinder me to import them from a foreign country? I carry not out the treasure of the nation, which is never to return; but what I bring from Italy I spend in England: here it remains, and here it circulates: for, if the coin be good, it will pass from one hand to another. I trade both with the living and the dead, for the enrichment of our native language. We have enough in England to supply our necessity; but if we will have things of magnificence and splendour, we must get them by commerce. Poetry requires ornament, and that is not to be had from our old Teuton monosyllables; therefore if I find any elegant word in a classic author, I propose it to be naturalized, by using it myself; and, if the public approves of it, the bill passes. But every man cannot distinguish betwixt pedantry and poetry: every man, therefore, is not fit to innovate. Upon the whole matter, a poet must first be certain that the word he would introduce is beautiful in the Latin; and is to consider, in the next place, whether it will agree with the English idiom: after this, he ought to take the opinion of judicious friends, such as are learned in both languages; and lastly, since no man is infallible, let him use this licence very sparingly: for if too many foreign words are poured in upon us, it looks as if they were designed, not to assist the natives, but to conquer them.

I am now drawing towards a conclusion, and suspect your lordship is very glad of it. But permit me first to own what helps I have had in this undertaking. The late earl of Lauderdale sent me over his new translation of the Æneis, which he had ended before I engaged in the same design; neither did I then intend it; but some proposals being afterwards made me by my bookseller, I desired his lordship's leave, that I might accept them, which he freely granted; and I have his letter yet to show for that permission. He resolved to have printed his work, which he might have done two years before I could publish mine; and had performed it, if death had not prevented him. But having his manuscript in my hands, I consulted it as often as I doubted of my author's sense: for no man understood Virgil better than that learned nobleman. His friends, I hear, have yet another and more correct copy of that translation by them: which had they pleased to have given the public, the judges must have been convinced that I have not flattered him. Besides this help, which was not inconsiderable, Mr. Congreve has done me the favour to review the Æneis, and compare my version with the original. I shall never be ashamed to own that this excellent young man has showed me many faults, which I have endeavoured to correct. It is true, he might have easily found more, and then my translation had been more perfect.

Two other worthy friends of mine, who desire to have their names concealed, seeing me straitened in my time, took pity on me, and gave me the life of Virgil; the two prefaces to the Pastorals and the Georgics, and all the arguments in prose to the whole translation: which, perhaps, has caused a report that the two first poems are not mine. If it had been true that I had taken their verses for my own, I might have gloried in their aid; and, like Terence, have fathered the opinion that Scipio and Lælius joined with me. But the same style being continued through the whole, and the same laws of versification observed, are proofs sufficient that this is one man's work: and your lordship is too well acquainted with my manner to doubt that any part of it is another's.

That your lordship may see I was in earnest when I promised to hasten to an end, I will not give the reasons why I writ not always in the proper terms of navigation, land-service, or in the cant of any profession. I will only say, that Virgil has avoided those proprieties, because he writ not to mariners, soldiers, astronomers, gardeners, peasants, &c. but to all in general, and in particular to men and ladies of the first quality, who have been better bred than to be too nicely knowing in the terms. In such cases, it is enough for a poet to write so plainly that he may be understood by his readers; to avoid impropriety, and not affect to be thought learned in all things.

I have omitted the four preliminary lines of the first Æneid, because I think them inferior to any four others in the whole poem, and consequently believe they are not Virgil's. There is too great a gap betwixt the adjective vicina in the second line, and the substantive arva in the latter end of the third, which keeps his meaning in obscurity too long; and is contrary to the clearness of his style.

Ut quamvis arido,

is too ambitious an ornament to be his; and,

Gratum opus agricolis,

are all words unnecessary, and independent of what he said before.

Horrentia Martis arma.

is worse than any of the rest. Horrentia is such a flat epithet as Tully would have given us in his verses. It is a mere filler, to stop a vacancy in the hexameter, and connect the preface to the work of Virgil. Our author seems to sound a charge, and begins like the clangor of a trumpet:

Arma, virumque cano; Trojæ qui primus ab oris.

Scarce a word without an r, and the vowels, for the greater part, sonorous. The prefacer began with Ille ego, which he was constrained to patch up in the fourth line with At nunc, to make the sense cohere. And if both those words are not notorious botches, I am much deceived, though the French translator thinks otherwise. For my own part, I am rather of the opinion, that they were added by Tucca and Varius, than retrenched.

I know it may be answered by such as think Virgil the author of the four lines, that he asserts his title to the Æneis, in the beginning of this work, as he did to the two former, in the last lines of the fourth Georgic. I will not reply otherwise to this, than by desiring them to compare these four lines with the four others, which we know are his, because no poet but he alone could write them. If they cannot distinguish creeping from flying, let them lay down Virgil, and take up Ovid de Ponto in his stead. My master needed not the assistance of that preliminary poet to prove his claim. His own majestic mien discovers him to be the king, amidst a thousand courtiers. It was a superfluous office, and therefore I would not set those verses in the front of Virgil, but have rejected them to my own preface:

I, who before, with shepherds in the groves,
Sung to my oaten pipe their rural loves,
And issuing thence, compell'd the neighbouring field

A plenteous crop of rising corn to yield,
Manur'd the glebe, and stock'd the fruitful plain,
(A poem grateful to the greedy swain), &c.

If there be not a tolerable line in all these six, the prefacer gave me no occasion to write better. This is a just apology in this place. But I have done great wrong to Virgil in the whole translation: want of time, the inferiority of our language, the inconvenience of rhyme and all the other excuses I have made, may alleviate my fault, but cannot justify the boldness of my undertaking. What avails it me to acknowledge freely, that I have not been able to do him right in any line! For even my own confession makes against me; and it will always be returned upon me, Why then did you attempt it? to which no other answer can be made, than that I have done him less injury than any of his former libellers.

What they called his picture, had been drawn at length so many times by the daubers of almost all nations, and still so unlike him, that I snatched up the pencil with disdain; being satisfied beforehand that I could make some small resemblance of him, though I must be content with a worse likeness. A sixth Pastoral, a Pharmaceutria, a single Orpheus, and some other features, have been exactly taken; but those holiday-authors write for pleasure, and only showed us what they could have done, if they would have taken pains to perform the whole.

Be pleased, my lord, to accept, with your wonted goodness, this unworthy present which I make you. I have taken off one trouble from you, of defending it, by acknowledging its imperfections: and, though some part of them are covered in the verse (as Erichonius rode always in a chariot to hide his lameness), such of them as cannot be concealed you will please to connive at, though, in the strictness of your judgment, you cannot pardon. If Homer was allowed to nod sometimes, in so long a work, it will be no wonder if I often fall asleep. You took my Aurengzeb into your protection, with all his faults; and I hope here cannot be so many, because I translate an author who gives me such examples of correctness. What my jury may be, I know not; but it is good for a criminal to plead before a favourable judge; if I had said partial, would your lordship have forgiven me? Or will you give me leave to acquaint the world, that I have many times been obliged to your bounty since the Revolution? Though I never was reduced to beg a charity, nor ever had the impudence to ask one, either of your lordship or your noble kinsman the earl of Dorset, much less of any other; yet, when I least expected it, you have both remembered me: so inherent it is in your family not to forget an old servant. It looks rather like ingratitude on my part, that where I have been so often obliged, I have appeared so seldom to return my thanks, and where I was also so sure of being well received. Somewhat of laziness was in the case, and somewhat too of modesty, but nothing of disrespect or unthankfulness. I will not say that your lordship has encouraged me to this presumption; lest, if my labours meet with no success in public, I may expose your judgment to be censured. As for my own enemies, I shall never think them worth an answer; and if your lordship has any, they will not dare to arraign you for want of knowledge in this art, till they can produce somewhat better of their own, than your Essay on Poetry. It was on this consideration that I have drawn out my preface to so great a length. Had I not addressed to a poet and a critic of the first magnitude, I had myself been taxed for want of judgment, and shamed my patron for want of understanding. But neither will you, my lord, so soon be tired as any other, because the discourse is on your art: neither will the learned reader think it tedious, because it is ad clerum. At least, when he begins to be weary, the church-doors are open. That I may pursue the allegory with a short prayer, after a long sermon,

May you live happily and long, for the service of your country, the encouragement of good letters, and the ornament of poetry! which cannot be wished more earnestly by any man, than by your lordship's most humble, most obliged,

and most obedient servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST BOOK OF

THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Trojans, after a seven years' voyage, set sail for Italy; but are overtaken by the dreadful storm, which Æolus raises at Juno's request. The tempest sinks one, and scatters the rest. Neptune drives off the winds, and calms the sea. Æneas, with his own ship, and six more, arrives safe at an African port. Venus complains to Jupiter of her son's misfortunes. Jupiter comforts her, and sends Mercury to procure him a kind reception among the Carthaginians. Æneas, going out to discover the country, meets his mother in the shape of an huntress, who conveys him in a cloud to Carthage: where he sees his friends whom he thought lost, and receives a kind entertainment from the queen. Dido, by a device of Venus, begins to have a passion for him, and, after some discourse with him, desires the history of his adventures since the siege of Troy, which is the subject of the two following books.

Arms and the man I sing, who, forc'd by fate, And haughty Juno's unrelenting hate, Expell'd and exil'd, left the Trojan shore; Long labours, both by sea and land, he bore; And in the doubtful war, before he won The Latian realm, and built the destin'd town: His banish'd gods restor'd to rites divine, And settled sure succession in his line: From whence the race of Alban fathers come, And the long glories of majestic Rome.

O, Muse! the causes and the crimes relate, What godless was provok'd, and whence her hate; For what offence the queen of Heaven began To persecute so brave, so just a man! Involv'd his anxious life in endless cares, Expos'd to wants, and hurry'd into wars! Can heavenly minds such high resentment show; Or exercise their spite in human woe?

'Against the Tyber's mouth, but far away, An ancient town was seated on the sea: A Tyrian colony; the people made Stout for the war, and studious of their trade. Carthage the name, belov'd by Juno more Than her own Argos, or the Samian shore. Here stood her chariot, here, if Heaven were kind, The seat of awful empire she design'd. Yet she had heard an ancient rumour fly (Long cited by the people of the sky) That times to come should see the Trojan race Her Carthage ruin, and her towers deface; Nor, thus confin'd, the yoke of sovereign sway Should on the necks of all the nations lay. She ponder'd this, and fear'd it was in fate; Nor could forget the war she wagg'd of late, For conquering Greece against the Trojan state. Besides, long causes working in her mind, And secret seeds of envy, lay behind. Deep graven in her heart, the doom remain'd Of partial Paris, and her form disdain'd:

The grace bestow'd on ravish'd Ganymed, Electra's glories, and her injur'd bed. Each was a cause alone, and all combin'd To kindle vengeance in her haughty mind. For this, far distant from the Latian coast, She drove the remnants of the Trojan host: And seven long years th' unhappy wandering train Were toss'd by storms and scatter'd through the main.

Such time, such toil, requir'd the Roman name, Such length of labour for so vast a frame.

Now scarce the Trojan fleet with sails and oars Had left behind the fair Sicilian shores; Entering with cheerful shouts the watery reign, And ploughing frothy furrows in the main; When, labouring stiff with endless discontent, The queen of Heaven did thus her fury vent.

"Then am I vanquish'd, must I yield," said she, "And must the Trojans reign in Italy?" So fate will have it, and Jove adds his force; Nor can my power divert their happy course. Could angry Pallas, with revengeful spleen, The Grecian navy burn, and drown the men? She, for the fault of one offending foe, The bolts of Jove himself presum'd to throw: With whirlwinds from beneath she toss'd the ship, And bare expos'd the bosom of the deep: Then, as an eagle gripea the trembling game, The wretch yet hissing with her father's flame, She strongly seiz'd, and, with a burning wound, Transfix'd and naked, on a rock she bound.

But I, who walk in awful state above, The majesty of Heaven, the sister-wife of Jove, For length of years my fruitless force employ Against the thin remains of ruin'd Troy, What nations now to Juno's power will pray, Or offerings on my slighted altars lay?"

Thus rag'd the goddess, and, with fury fraught, The restless regions of the storms she sought; Where, in a spacious cave of living stone, The tyrant Æolus from his airy throne, With power imperial curbs the struggling winds, And sounding tempests in dark prisons binds, This way, and that, th' impatient captives lead, And, pressing for release, the mountains rend: High in his hall, th' undaunted monarch stands, And shakes his sceptre, and their rage commands: Which did he not, their unresisted way Would sweep the world before them in their way: Earth, air, and seas, through empty space would roll,

And Heaven would fly before the driving soul! In fear of this, the father of the gods Confin'd their fury to those dark abodes, And lock'd them safe within, oppress'd with mountain loads:

Impos'd a king, with arbitrary sway, To loose their fetters, or their force ally. To whom the suppliant queen her prayers address, And thus the tenour of her suit express'd.

"O Æolus! for to thee the king of Heaven The power of tempests and of winds has given: Thy force alone their fury can restrain, And smooth the waves, or swell the troubled main: A race of wandering slaves abhor'd by me, With prosperous passage cut the Thæticum sea: To fruitful Italy their courts they steer, (where) And for their vanquish'd gods design new temples: Raise all thy winds, with night involve the skies; Sink or disperse my fatal enemies.

Twice seven, the charming daughters of the main,
 Around my person wait, and bear thy train:
 Succeed my wish, and second my design;
 The fairest, Deiopeia, shall be thine;
 And make thee father of a happy line."

To this the god—" 'Tis yours, O queen! to will
 The work, which duty binds me to fulfil.
 These airy kingdoms, and this wide command,
 Are all the presents of your bounteous hand;
 Yours is my sovereign's grace, and as your guest,
 I sit with gods at their celestial feast;
 Raise tempests at your pleasure, or subdue;
 Dispose of empire, which I hold from you!"
 He said, and hur'l'd against the mountain side
 His quivering spear, and all the god apply'd!
 The raging winds rush through the hollow wound,
 And dance aloft in air, and skim along the ground:
 Then, settling on the sea, the surges sweep;
 Raise liquid mountains, and disclose the deep!
 South, east, and west, with mixt confusion roar,
 And roll the foaming billows to the shore.
 The cables crack, the sailors' fearful cries
 Ascend; and sable night involves the skies;
 And Heaven itself is ravish'd from their eyes!
 Loud peals of thunder from the poles ensue,
 Then flashing fires the transient light renew;
 The face of things a frightful image bears,
 And present death in various forms appears!
 Struck with unusual fright, the Trojan chief,
 With lifted hands and eyes, invokes relief!
 "And thrice, and four times happy those," he cry'd,
 "That under Ilian walls before their parents dy'd!
 Tydides, bravest of the Grecian train,
 Why could not I by that strong arm be slain,
 And lie by noble Hector on the plain:
 O great Sarpedon, in those bloody fields,
 Where Simois rolls the bodies and the shields
 Of heroes, whose dismember'd hands yet bear
 The dart aloft, and clench the pointed spear!"
 Thus while the pious prince his fate bewails,
 Fierce Boreas drove against his flying sails,
 And rent the sheets: the raging billows rise,
 And mount the tossing vessel to the skies:
 Nor can the shivering oars sustain the blow;
 The galley gives her side, and turns her prow:
 While those astern descending down the steep,
 Through gaping waves behold the boiling deep!
 Three ships were hurry'd by the southern blast,
 And on the secret shelves with fury cast!
 Those hidden rocks, th' Ausonian sailors knew,
 They call'd them altars, when they rose in view,
 And show'd their spacious backs above the flood!
 Three more fierce Eurus in his angry mood
 Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand,
 And in mid ocean left them moor'd a-land!
 Orontes' bark that bore the Lycian crew,
 (A horrid sight) ev'n in the hero's view,
 From stem to stern, by waves was overborn:
 The trembling pilot, from his rudder torn,
 Was headlong hur'l'd: thrice round, the ship was tost,
 Then bulg'd at once, and in the deep was lost!
 And here and there above the waves were seen
 Arms, pictures, precious goods, and floating men!
 The stoutest vessel to the storm gave way,
 And suck'd through loosen'd planks the rushing sea!
 Ilioneus was her chief: Akethes old,
 Achates faithful, Abas young and bold,
 Endur'd not less: their ships, with gaping seams,
 Admit the deluge of the briny streams!

Meantime imperial Neptune heard the sound
 Of raging billows breaking on the ground:
 Displeas'd, and fearing for his watery reign,
 He rear'd his awful head above the main:
 Serene in majesty, then roll'd his eyes
 Around this space of earth, and seas, and skies.
 He saw the Trojan fleet dispers'd, distress'd,
 By stormy winds and wintery heaven oppress'd.
 Full well the god his sister's envy knew,
 And what her aims and what her arts pursue:
 He summon'd Eurus and the western blast,
 And first an angry glance on both he cast:
 Then thus rebuk'd: "Audacious winds! from
 This bold attempt, this rebel insolence? [whence
 Is it for you to ravage seas and land,
 Unauthorized by my supreme command?
 To raise such mountains on the troubled main?
 Whom I—But first 'tis fit the billows to restrain,
 And then you shall be taught obedience to my
 Hence, to your lord my royal mandate bear, [reign.
 The realms of ocean and the fields of air
 Are mine, not his: by fatal lot to me
 The liquid empire fell, and trident of the sea.
 His power to hollow caverns is confin'd,
 There let him reign, the jailor of the wind:
 With hoarse commands his breathing subjects call,
 And boast and bluster in his empty hall!"
 He spoke; and while he spoke, he smooth'd the seas,
 Dispell'd the darkness, and restor'd the day:
 Cymothœ, Triton, and the seagreen train
 Of beauteous nymphs, and daughters of the main,
 Clear from the rocks the vessels with their hands;
 The god himself with ready trident stands,
 And opens the deep, and spreads the moving sands;
 Then heaves them off the shoals: where'er he guides
 His funny coursers, and in triumph rides,
 The waves unruffle, and the sea subsides.
 As when in tumults rise th' ignoble crowd,
 Mad are their motions, and their tongues are loud;
 And stones and brands in rattling volleys fly,
 And all the rustic arms that fury can supply;
 If then some grave and pious man appear,
 They hush their noise, and lend a listening ear;
 He soothes with sober words their angry mood,
 And quenches their innate desire of blood:
 So when the father of the flood appears,
 And o'er the seas his sovereign trident rears,
 Their fury fails: he skims the liquid plains,
 High on his chariot, and with loosen'd reins
 Majestic moves along, and awful peace maintain.
 The weary Trojans ply their shatter'd oars
 To nearest land, and make the Libyan shores.

Within a long recess there lies a bay,
 An island shades it from the rolling sea,
 And forms a port secure for ships to ride,
 Broke by the jutting land on either side:
 In double streams the briny waters glide.
 Betwixt two rows of rocks, a sylvan scene
 Appears above, and groves for ever green:
 A grot is form'd beneath, with mossy seats,
 To rest the Nereids, and exclude the beats.
 Down through the crannies of the living walls
 The crystal streams descend in murmuring falls.
 No hawsers need to bind the vessels here,
 Nor bearded anchors, for no storms they fear.
 Seven ships within this happy harbour meet,
 The thin remainders of the scatter'd fleet.
 The Trojans, worn with toils, and spent with war
 Leap on the welcome land, and seek their wis' repose.

First, good Achates, with repeated strokes
 Of clashing flints, their hidden fire provokes;
 Short flame succeeds; a bed of wither'd leaves
 The dying sparkles in their fall receives:
 Caught into life, in fiery fumes they rise,
 And, fed with stronger food, invade the skies.
 The Trojans, dropping wet, or stand around
 The cheerful blaze, or lie along the ground;
 Some dry their corn infected with the brine,
 Then grind with marbles, and prepare to dine.
 Æneas climbs the mountain's airy brow,
 And takes a prospect of the seas below:
 If Capys thence, or Athens, he could spy;
 Or see the streamers of Caicus fly.
 No vessels there in view: but, on the plain,
 Three beamy stags command a lordly train
 Of branching heads; the more ignoble throng
 Attend their stately steps, and slowly graze along.
 He stood; and while secure they fed below,
 He took the quiver, and the trusty bow
 Achates used to bear; the leaders first
 He laid along, and then the vulgar pierc'd;
 Nor ceas'd his arrows, till the shady plain
 Seven mighty bodies with their blood distain.
 For the seven ships he made an equal share,
 And to the port return'd, triumphant from the war.

The jars of generous wine (Acestes' gift,
 When his Trinacrian shores the navy left)
 He set abroad, and for the feast prepar'd,
 In equal portions with the ven'son shar'd.
 Thus while he dealt it round, the pious chief,
 With cheerful words, allay'd the common grief:
 "Endure, and conquer; Jove will soon dispose,
 To future good, our past and present woes.
 With me, the rocks of Scylla you have try'd;
 Th' inhuman Cyclops, and his den defy'd.
 What greater ills hereafter can you bear?
 Resume your courage, and dismiss your care.
 An hour will come, with pleasure to relate
 Your sorrows past, as benefits of fate.
 Through various hazards and events we move
 To Latium, and the realms foredoom'd by Jove.
 Call'd to the seat (the promise of the skies)
 Where Trojan kingdoms once again may rise.
 Endure the hardships of your present state,
 Live, and reserve yourselves for better fate."

These words he spoke; but spoke not from his heart:

His outward smiles conceal'd his inward smart.
 The jolly crew, unmindful of the past,
 The quarry share, their plenteous dinner haste:
 Some strip the skin, some portion out the spoil;
 The limbs, yet trembling, in the caldrons boil:
 Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.
 Stretch'd on the grassy turf, at ease they dine;
 Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.

Their hunger thus appeas'd, their care attends
 The doubtful fortune of their absent friends,
 Alternate hopes and fears their minds possess,
 Whether to deem them dead, or in distress.
 Above the rest, Æneas mourns the fate
 Of brave Orontes, and th' uncertain state
 Of Gyas, Lycus, and of Amycus:
 The day, but not their sorrows, ended thus.
 When, from aloft, almighty Jove surveys
 Earth, air, and shores, and navigable seas,
 At length on Libyan realms he fixt his eyes:
 Whom, pondering thus on human miseries,

When Venus saw, she with a lively look,
 Not free from tears, her heavenly sire bespoke:
 "O king of gods and men, whose awful hand
 Disperses thunder on the seas and land;
 Disposes all with absolute command:
 How could my pious son thy power increase?
 Or what, alas! is vanish'd Troy's offence?
 Our hope of Italy not only lost
 On various seas, by various tempests tost, [coast.
 But shut from every shore, and barr'd from every
 You promis'd once, a progeny divine,
 Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
 In aftertimes should hold the world in awe,
 And to the land and ocean give the law.
 How is your doom revers'd, which eas'd my care
 When Troy was ruin'd in that cruel war!
 Then fates to fates I could oppose; but now,
 When Fortune still pursues her former blow,
 What can I hope? What worse can still succeed?
 What end of labours has your will decreed?
 Antenor, from the midst of Grecian hosts,
 Could pass secure, and pierce th' Illyrian coasts;
 Where, rolling down the steep, Timavus raves,
 And through nine channels disembogues his waves.
 At length he founded Padua's happy seat,
 And gave his Trojans a secure retreat:
 There fix'd their arms, and there renew'd their name,
 And there in quiet rules, and crown'd with fame:
 But we, descended from your sacred line,
 Entitled to your Heaven and rites divine,
 Are banish'd Earth, and for the wrath of one,
 Remov'd from Latium, and the promis'd throne.
 Are these our sceptres? these our due rewards?
 And is it thus that Jove his plighted faith regards?"
 To whom, the father of immortal race,
 Smiling with that serene indulgent face,
 With which he drives the clouds and clears the skies,

First gave a holy kiss; then thus replies:

"Daughter, dismiss thy fears: to thy desire
 The fates of thine are fix'd, and stand entire.
 Thou shalt behold thy wish'd Lavinian walls,
 And, ripe for Heaven, when fate Æneas calls,
 Then shalt thou bear him up, sublime, to me;
 No councils have revers'd my firm decree.
 And, lest new fears disturb thy happy state,
 Know, I have search'd the mystic rolls of fate:
 Thy son (nor is th' appointed season far)
 In Italy shall wage successful war;
 Shall tame fierce nations in the bloody field,
 And sovereign laws impose, and cities build.
 Till, after every foe subdued, the Sun
 Thrice through the signs his annual race shall run:
 This is his time prefix'd. Ascanius then,
 Now call'd Iulus, shall begin his reign.
 He thirty rolling years the crown shall wear:
 Then from Lavinium shall the seat transfer:
 And, with hard labour, Alba Longa build;
 The throne with his succession shall be fill'd,
 Three hundred circuits more: then shall be seen,
 Ilja the fair, a priestess and a queen.
 Who, full of Mars, in time, with kindly throws
 Shall, at a birth, two goodly boys disclose.
 The royal babes a tawny wolf shall drain,
 Then Romulus his grandsire's throne shall gain,
 Of martial towers the founder shall become,
 The people Romans call, the city Rome.
 To them, no bounds of empire I assign;
 Nor term of years to their immortal line,

Ev'n haughty Juno, who, with endless broils,
Earth, seas, and Heaven, and Jove himself turmoils;

At length aton'd, her friendly power shall join,
To cherish and advance the Trojan line.
The subject world shall Rome's dominion own,
And, prostrate, shall adore the nation of the gown.
An age is ripening in revolving fate,
When Troy shall overturn the Grecian state:
And sweet revenge her conquering sons shall call,
To crush the people that conspir'd her fall.
Then Cæsar from the Julian stock shall rise,
Whose empire ocean, and whose fame the skies,
Alone shall bound; whom, fraught with eastern spoils,

Our Heaven, the just reward of human toils,
Securely shall repay with rites divine;
And incense shall ascend before his sacred shrine.
Then dire debate, and impious war, shall cease,
And the stern age be softened into peace:
Then banish'd faith shall once again return,
And vestal fires in hallow'd temples burn,
And Remus with Quirinus shall sustain
The righteous laws, and fraud and force restrain.
Janus himself before his fane shall wait,
And keep the dreadful issues of his gate,
With bolts and iron bars: within remains
Imprison'd Fury, bound in brazen chains;
High on a trophy rais'd, of useless arms,
He sits, and threatens the world with vain alarms."

He said, and sent Cyllenius with command
To free the ports, and ope the Punic land
To Trojan guests: lest, ignorant of fate,
The queen might force them from her town and state:

Down from the steep of Heaven Cyllenius flies,
And cleaves, with all his wings, the yielding skies.
Soon on the Libyan shore descends the god,
Performs his message, and displays his rod;
The surly murmurs of the people cease,
And, as the fates requir'd, they give the peace.
The queen herself suspends the rigid laws,
The Trojans pities, and protects their cause.

Meantime, in shades of night Æneas lies;
Care seiz'd his soul, and sleep forsook his eyes:
But when the Sun restor'd the cheerful day,
He rose, the coast and country to survey,
Anxious and eager to discover more:
It look'd a wild uncultivated shore:
But whether human kind, or beasts alone,
Possess'd the new-found region, was unknown.
Beneath a ledge of rocks his fleet he hides;
Tall trees surround the mountains' shady sides:
The bending brow above a safe retreat provides.
Arm'd with two pointed darts, he leaves his friends,
And true Achates on his steps attends.
Lo, in the deep recesses of the wood,
Before his eyes his goddess mother stood:
A huntress in her habit and her mien;
Her dress a maid, her air confess'd a queen.
Bare were her knees, and knots her garments bind;
Loose was her hair, and wanton'd in the wind;
Her hand sustain'd a bow, her quiver hung behind.
She seem'd a virgin of the Spartan blood:
With such array Harpalice bestrode
Her Thracian courser, and outstripp'd the rapid flood.

"Ho! strangers! have you lately seen," she said,
"One of my sisters, like myself array'd;
Who cross'd the lawn, or in the forest stray'd?"

A painted quiver at her back she bore,
Vary'd with spots, a lynx's hide she wore:
And at full cry pursu'd the tusky boar."
Thus Venus: thus her son reply'd again,
"None of your sisters have we heard or seen,
O virgin! or what other name you bear
Above that style; O more than mortal fair!
Your voice and mien celestial birth betray!
If, as you seem, the sister of the day;
Or one, at least, of chaste Diana's train,
Let not an humble suppliant sue in vain:
But tell a stranger, long in tempests tost, [coast]
What earth we tread, and who commands the
Then on your name shall wretched mortals call,
And offer'd victims at your altars fall."

"I dare not," she reply'd, "assume the name
Of goddess, or celestial honours claim:
For Tyrian virgins bows and quivers bear,
And purple buskins o'er their ankles wear.
Know, gentle youth, in Libyan lands you are:
A people rude in peace, and rough in war.
The rising city, which from far you see,
Is Carthage, and a Tyrian colony.
Phœnician Dido rules the growing state,
Who fled from Tyre, to shun her brother's hate:
Great were her wrongs, her story full of fate,
Which I will sum in short. Sichæus, known
For wealth, and brother to the Punic throne,
Possess'd fair Dido's bed: and either heart
At once was wounded with an equal dart.
Her father gave her, yet a spotless maid;
Pygmalion then the Tyrian sceptre sway'd:
One who contemn'd divine and human laws.
Then strife ensu'd, and cursed gold the cause.
The monarch, blinded with desire of wealth,
With steel invades his brother's life by stealth;
Before the sacred altar made him bleed,
And long from her conceal'd the cruel deed:
Some tale, some new pretence, he daily coin'd,
To soothe his sister, and delude her mind.
At length, in dead of night, the ghost appears
Of her unhappy lord: the spectre stares,
And with erected eyes his bloody bosom bares.
The cruel altars and his fate he tells,
And the dire secret of his house reveals:
Then warns the widow and her household gods
To seek a refuge in remote abodes.

Last, to support her in so long a way,
He shows her where his hidden treasure lay.
Admonish'd thus, and seiz'd with mortal fright,
The queen provides companions of her flight:
They meet, and all combine to leave the state,
Who hate the tyrant, or who fear his hate.
They seize a fleet, which ready rigg'd they find;
Nor is Pygmalion's treasure left behind.
The vessels, heavy laden, put to sea
With prosperous winds, a woman leads the way.
I know not, if by stress of weather driven,
Or was their fatal course dispos'd by Heaven;
At last they landed, where from far your eyes
May view the turrets of new Carthage rise:
There bought a space of ground, which, Byrsa call'd
From the bull's hide, they first enclos'd, and wall'd.
But whence are you? what country claims your birth?

What seek you, strangers, on our Libyan earth?"
To whom, with sorrow streaming from his eyes,
And deeply sighing, thus her son replies:
"Could you with patience hear, or I relate,
O nymph! the tedious annals of our fate!"

Through such a train of woes if I should run,
The day would sooner than the tale be done!
From ancient Troy, by force expell'd, we came,
If you by chance have heard the Trojan name:
On various seas, by various tempests tost'd,
At length we landed on your Libyan coast:
The good Æneas am I call'd, a name,
While fortune favour'd, not unknown to fame:
My household gods, companions of my woes,
With pious care I rescued from our foes;
To fruitful Italy my course was bent,
And from the king of Heaven is my descent.
With twice ten sail I cross'd the Phrygian sea;
Fate and my mother goddess led my way.
Scarce seven, the thin remainder of my fleet,
From storms preserv'd, within your harbour meet:
Myself distress'd, an exile, and unknown,
Debarr'd from Europe, and from Asia thrown,
In Libyan deserts wander thus alone."

His tender parent could no longer bear;
But, interposing, sought to soothe his care.
"Who'er you are, not unbelov'd by Heaven,
Since on our friendly shore your ships are driven,
Have courage: to the gods permit the rest,
And to the queen expose your just request.
Now take this earnest of success, for more:
Your scatter'd fleet is join'd upon the shore;
The winds are chang'd, your friends from danger
Or I renounce my skill in angury. [free,
Twelve swans behold, in beauteous order move,
And stoop, with closing pinions, from above:
Whom late the bird of Jove had driven along,
And, through the clouds, pursu'd the scattering
Now all united in a goodly team, [through:
They skim the ground, and seek the quiet stream.
As they, with joy returning, clap their wings,
And ride the circuits of the skies in rings:
Not otherwise your ships, and every friend,
Already hold the port, or with swift sails descend,
No more advice is needful, but pursue
The path before you, and the town in view."
Thus having said, she turn'd, and made appear
Her neck resplendent, and dishevell'd hair; [ground,
Which, flowing from her shoulders, reach'd the
And widely spread ambrosial scents around:
In length of train descends her sweeping gown,
And, by her graceful walk, the queen of love is
The prince pursu'd the parting deity, [known.
With words like these: "Ah! whither dost thou
Unkind and cruel, to deceive your son [thy?
In borrow'd shapes, and his embrace to shun;
Never to bless my sight, but thus unknown;
And still to speak in accents not your own!"
Against the goddess these complaints he made;
But took the path, and her commands obey'd.
They march obscure, for Venus kindly shrouds,
With mists, their persons, and involves in clouds:
That, thus unseen, their passage none might stay,
Or force to tell the causes of their way.
This part perform'd, the goddess flies sublime,
To visit Paphos, and her native clime:
Where garlands ever green, and ever fair,
With vows are offer'd, and with solemn prayer,
A hundred altars in her temple smoke,
A thousand bleeding hearts her power invoke.
They climb the next ascent, and, looking down,
Now, at a nearer distance, view the town.
The prince, with wonder, sees the stately towers,
Which late were huts and shepherds' homely bowers;

The gates and streets; and hears from every part
The noise and busy concourse of the mart.
The toiling Tyrians on each other call,
To ply their labour: some extend the wall;
Some build the citadel; the brawny throng
Or dig, or push unwieldy stones along.
Some for their dwellings choose a spot of ground,
Which, first design'd, with ditches they surround.
Some laws ordain, and some attend the choice
Of holy senates, and elect by voice.
Here some design a mole, while others there
Lay deep foundations for a theatre:
From marble quarries mighty columns hew,
For ornaments of scenes, and future view.
Such is their toil, and such their busy pains,
As exercise the bees in flowery plains;
When winter past, and summer scarce begun,
Invites them forth to labour in the Sun:
Some lead their youth abroad, while some condense
Their liquid store, and some in cells dispense.
Some at the gate stand ready to receive
The golden burden, and their friends relieve.
All, with united force, combine to drive
The lazy drones from the laborious hive;
With envy stung, they view each other's deeds;
The fragrant work with diligence proceeds:
"Thrice happy you, whose walls already rise;"
Æneas said; and view'd, with lifted eyes,
Their lofty towers; then entering at the gate,
Conceal'd in clouds (prodigious to relate),
He mix'd, unmark'd, among the busy throng,
Borne by the tide, and pass'd unseen along.
Full in the centre of the town there stood,
Thick set with trees, a venerable wood:
The Tyrians landed near this holy ground,
And, digging here, a prosperous omen found:
From under earth a courser's head they drew,
Their growth and future fortune to foreshew:
This fated sign their foundress Juno gave,
Of a soil fruitful, and a people brave.
Sidonian Dido here with solemn state
Did Juno's temple build and consecrate:
Enrich'd with gifts, and with a golden shrine;
But more the goddess made the place divine.
On brazen steps the marble threshold rose,
And brazen plates the cedar beams enclose:
The rafters are with brazen coverings crown'd,
The lofty doors on brazen hinges sound.
What first Æneas in this place beheld,
Reviv'd his courage, and his fear expell'd.
For while, expecting there the queen, he rais'd
His wandering eyes, and round the temple gaz'd;
Admir'd the fortune of the rising town,
The striving artists and their arts' renown:
He saw, in order painted on the wall,
Whatever did unhappy Troy befall:
The wars that fame around the world had blown,
All to the life, and every leader known.
There Agamemnon, Priam here he spies,
And fierce Achilles, who both kings defies.
He stopp'd, and weeping said, "O friend! ev'n here
The monuments of Trojan woes appear!
Our known disasters fill ev'n foreign lands:
See there, where old unhappy Priam stands!
Ev'n the mute walls relate the warrior's fame,
And Trojan griefs the Tyrians' pity claim."
He said: his tears a ready passage find,
Devouring what he saw so well design'd;
And with an empty picture fed his mind.

For there he saw the fainting Grecians yield,
 And here the trembling Trojans quit the field,
 Purs'd by fierce Achilles through the plain,
 On his high chariot driving o'er the slain.
 The tents of Rhesus next his grief renew,
 By their white sails betray'd to nightly view.
 And wakeful Diomed, whose cruel sword
 The centries slew, nor spar'd their slumbering lord.
 Then took the fiery steeds, ere yet the food
 Of Troy they taste, or drink the Xanthian flood.
 Elsewhere he saw where Troilus defy'd
 Achilles, and unequal combat try'd.
 Then where the boy disarm'd, with loosen'd reins,
 Was by his horses hurry'd o'er the plains:
 Hung by the neck and hair, and dragg'd around,
 The hostile spear yet sticking in his wound;
 With traces of blood inscrib'd the dusty ground.

Meantime the Trojan dames, oppress'd with woe,
 To Pallas' fame in long procession go,
 In hopes to reconcile their heavenly foe:
 They weep, they beat their breasts, they rend their hair,

And rich embroider'd vests for presents bear:
 But the stern goddess stands unmov'd with prayer.
 Thrice round the Trojan walls Achilles drew
 The corpse of Hector, whom in fight he slew.
 Here Priam sees; and there, for beams of gold,
 The lifeless body of his son is sold.
 So and an object, and so well express'd,
 Drew sighs and groans from the griev'd hero's
 To see the figure of his lifeless friend,
 And his old sire his helpless hand extend.
 Himself he saw amidst the Grecian train,
 Mix'd in the bloody battle on the plain:
 And swarthy Meton in his arms he knew,
 His pompous ensigns, and his Indian crew.
 Penthesilea, there, with haughty grace,
 Leads to the wars an Amazonian race;
 In their right hands a pointed dart they wield;
 The left, for ward, sustains the lunar shield.
 Athwart her breast a golden belt she throws,
 Amidst the press alohe provokes a thousand foes:
 And darts her maiden arms to manly force oppose.
 Thus while the Trojan prince employs his eyes,
 Fix'd on the walls with wonder and surprise,
 The beautiful Dido with a trustful train,
 And pomp of guards, ascends the sacred fane.
 Such on Eurotas' banks, or Cynthus' height,
 Diana seems; and so she charms the sight,
 When in the dance the graceful goddess leads
 The choir of nymphs, and overtops their heads.
 Known by her quiver and her lofty mien,
 She walks majestic, and she looks their queen:
 Latona sees her shine above the rest,
 And feeds with secret joy her silent breast.
 Such Dido was; with such becoming state,
 Amidst the crowd, she walks serenely great.
 Their labour to her future sway she speeds,
 And, passing with a gracious glance, proceeds:
 Then mounts the throne, high plac'd before the shrine;

In crowds around the swarming people join.
 She takes petitions, and dispenses laws,
 Hears and determines every private cause.
 Their tasks, in equal portions, she divides,
 And, where unequal, there by lots decides.
 Another way, by chance, Æneas bends
 His eyes, and unperceiv'd sees his friends:
 Anteus, Sergestus grave, Cleonthus strong,
 And, at their looks, a mighty Trojan throng;

Whom late the tempest on the billows toss'd,
 And widely scatter'd on another coast.
 The prince, unseen, surpris'd with wonder stands,
 And longs, with joyful haste, to join their hands:
 But, doubtful of the wish'd event, he stays,
 And, from the hollow cloud, his friends surveys:
 Impatient till they told their present state,
 And where they left their ships, and what their fate;

And why they came, and what was their request:
 For these were sent, commission'd by the rest,
 To sue for leave to land their sickly men,
 And gain admission to the gracious queen.
 Entering, with cries they fill'd the holy fane;
 Then thus, with lowly voice, Ilioneus began:
 " O queen! indulg'd by favour of the gods,
 To found an empire in these new abodes;
 To build a town, with statutes to restrain
 The wild inhabitants beneath thy reign:
 We worshiped Trojans, toss'd on every shore,
 From sea to sea, thy clemency implore:
 Forbid the fires our shipping to deface,
 Receive th' unhappy fugitives to grace,
 And spare the remnant of a pious race.
 We would not with design of wasteful prey,
 To drive the country, force the swains away:
 Not such our strength, nor such is our desire,
 The vanquish'd dare not to such thoughts aspire.
 A land there is, Hesperia nam'd of old,
 The soil is fruitful, and the men are bold:
 Th' Ætians held it once, by common fame,
 Now call'd Italia, from the leader's name.
 To that sweet region was our voyage bent,
 When winds, and every warlike element
 Disturb'd our course, and, far from sight of land,
 Cast our torn vessels on the moving sand:
 The sea came on; the south with frightful roar,
 Dispers'd and dash'd the rest upon the rocky shore.
 Thus few you see escap'd the storm, and fear,
 Unless you interpose, a shipwreck here;
 What men, what monsters, what infernal face,
 What laws, what barbarous customs of the place,
 Shut up a desert shore to throwing men,
 And drive us to the cruel seas again!
 If our hard fortune no compassion draws,
 Nor hospitable rites, nor human laws,
 The gods are just, and will revenge our cause.
 Æneas was our prince; a juster lord,
 Or nobler warrior, never drew a sword:
 Observant of the right, religious of his word,
 If yet he lives, and draws this vital air,
 Nor we his friends of safety shall despair;
 Nor you, great queen, these offences repent,
 Which he will equal, and perhaps augment.
 We want not cities, nor Sicilian coasts,
 Where king Aœtes Trojan lineage boasts.
 Permit our ships a shelter on your shores,
 Refitted from your woods with planks and oars:
 That, if our prince be safe, we may renew
 Our destin'd course, and Italy pursue.
 But if, O best of men! the fates ordain
 That thou art swallow'd in the Libyan main;
 And if our young fetus be no more,
 Dismiss our navy from your friendly shore;
 That we to good Aœtes may return,
 And with our friends our common losses mourn."
 Thus spoke Ilioneus; the Trojan crew,
 With cries and clamours, his request renew.
 The modest queen awhile, with down-cast eyes,
 Ponder'd the speech; then briefly thus replies:

" Trojans, dismiss your fears: my cruel fate,
 And doubts attending an unsettled state,
 Force me to guard my coast from foreign foes:
 Who has not heard the story of your woes?
 The name and fortune of your native place,
 The fame and valour of the Phrygian race?
 We Tyrians are not so devoid of sense,
 Nor so remote from Phoebus' justfluence.
 Whether to Latian shores your course is bent,
 Or, driven by tempests from your first intent,
 You seek the good Acestea's government;
 Your men shall be receiv'd, your fleet repair'd,
 And sail, with ships of convoy for your guard:
 Or, would you stay, and join your friendly powers,
 To raise and to defend the Tyrian towers,
 My wealth, my city, and myself are yours.
 And would to Heaven the storm, you felt, would bring

On Carthaginian coasts your wandering king.
 My people shall, by my command, explore
 The ports and creeks of every winding shore,
 And towns, and wilds, and shady woods, in quest
 Of so renown'd and so desir'd a guest."
 Rais'd in his mind the Trojan hero stood,
 And long'd to break from out his ambient cloud;
 Achates found it; and thus urg'd his way:
 " From whence, O goddess-born, this long delay?
 What more can you desire, your welcome sure,
 Your fleet in safety, and your friends secure?
 One only wants: and him we saw in vain
 Oppose the storm, and swallow'd in the main!
 Orontes in his fate our forfeit paid,
 The rest agrees with what your mother said."
 Scarce had he spoken, when the cloud gave way,
 The mists flew upward, and dissolv'd in day.
 The Trojan chief appear'd in open sight,
 August in visage, and serenely bright.
 His mother goddess, with her hands divine,
 Had form'd his curling locks, and made his temples
 shine;

And given his rolling eyes a sparkling grace;
 And breath'd a youthful vigour on his face:
 Like polish'd ivory, beauteous to behold,
 Or Parian marble, when enchas'd in gold,
 Thus radiant from the circling cloud he broke,
 And thus with manly modesty he spoke:
 " He whom you seek am I: by tempests tost,
 And sav'd from shipwreck on your Libyan coast:
 Presenting, gracious queen, before your throne,
 A prince that owes his life to you alone.
 Fair majesty, the refuge and redress
 Of those whom fate pursues, and wants oppress,
 You, who your pious offices employ
 To save the relics of abandon'd Troy,
 Receiv'd the shipwreck'd on your friendly shore;
 With hospitable rites relieve the poor;
 Associate in your town a wandering train,
 And strangers in your palace entertain.
 What thanks can wretched fugitives return,
 Who, scatter'd through the world, in exile mourn?
 The gods, if gods to goodness are inclin'd,
 If acts of mercy touch their heavenly mind;
 And more than all the gods, your generous heart,
 Conscious of worth, requite its own desert!
 In you this age is happy, and this earth:
 And parents more than mortal gave you birth.
 While rolling rivers into seas shall run,
 And round the space of Heaven the radiant Sun:
 While trees the mountain-tops with shades supply,
 Your honour, name, and praise, shall never die.

Whate'er abode my fortune has assign'd,
 Your image shall be present in my mind."
 Thus having said: he turn'd with pious haste,
 And joyful his expecting friends embrac'd:
 With his right hand Ilioneus was grac'd.
 Serestus with his left; then to his breast
 Cloanthus and the noble Gyas press'd;
 And so by turns descended to the rest.

The Tyrian queen stood fix'd upon his face,
 Pleas'd with his motions, ravish'd with his grace:
 Admir'd his fortunes, more admir'd the man;
 Then recollected stood; and thus began:
 " What fate, O goddess-born, what angry power
 Have cast you shipwreck'd on our barren shores?
 Are you the great Æneas, known to fame,
 Who from celestial seed your lineage claim?
 The same Æneas, whom fair Venus bore
 To fam'd Anchises on th' Idean shore?
 It calls into my mind, though then a child,
 When Teucer came from Salamis exil'd;
 And sought my father's aid, to be restor'd:
 My father Belus then with fire and sword
 Invaded Cyprus, made the region bare,
 And conquering, finish'd the successful war.
 From him the Trojan siege I understood,
 The Grecian chiefs, and your illustrious blood.
 Your foe himself the Dardan valour prais'd,
 And his own ancestry from Trojans rais'd.
 Enter, my noble guest; and you shall find,
 If not a costly welcome, yet a kind.
 For I myself, like you, have been distress'd;
 Till Heaven afforded me this place of rest.
 Like you, an alien in a land unknown,
 I learn to pity wyes, so like my own."
 She said, and to the palace led her guest,
 Then offer'd incense, and proclaim'd a feast.
 Nor yet less careful for her absent friends,
 Twice ten fat oxen to the ships she sends:
 Besides a hundred boars, a hundred lambs,
 With bleating cries, attend their milky dams.
 And jars of generous wine, and spacious bowls,
 She gives to cheer the sailors' drooping souls.
 Now purple hangings clothe the palace walls,
 And sumptuous feasts are made in splendid halls:

On Tyrian carpets, richly wrought, they dine;
 With loads of massy plate the sideboards shine.
 And antic vases all of gold emboss'd
 (The gold itself inferior to the cost):
 Of curious work, where on the sides were seen
 The fights and figures of illustrious men:
 From their first founder to the present queen.
 The good Æneas, whose paternal care
 Iulus' absence could no longer bear,
 Dispatch'd Achates to the ships in haste,
 To give a glad relation of the past;
 And, fraught with precious gifts, to bring the boy
 Snatch'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy:
 A robe of tissue, stiff with golden wire;
 An upper vest, once Helen's rich attire;
 From Argos by the fam'd adulteress brought:
 With golden flowers and winding foliage wrought;
 Her mother Leda's present, when she came
 To ruin Troy, and set the world on flame.
 The sceptre Priam's eldest daughter bore,
 Her orient necklace, and the crown she wore;
 Of double texture, glorious to behold;
 One order set with gems, and one with gold.
 Instructed thus, the wise Achates goes:
 And in his diligence his duty shows.

But Vénus, anxious for her son's affairs,
New counsels tries; and new designs prepares:
That Cupid should assume the shape and face
Of sweet Ascanius, and the sprightly grace:
Should bring her presents, in her nephew's stead,
And in Eliza's veins the gentle poison shed.
For much she fear'd the Tyrians, double-tongued,
And knew the town to Juno's care belong'd.
These thoughts by night her golden slumbers broke;

And thus alarm'd to winged Love she spoke:
"My son, my strength, whose mighty power alone
Controls the thunderer on his awful throne;
To thee thy much-afflicted mother flies,
And on thy succour, and thy faith relies.
Thou know'st, my son, how Jove's revengeful wife,
By force and fraud, attempts thy brother's life.
And often hast thou mourn'd with me his pains;
Him Dido now with blandishment detains;
But I suspect the town where Juno reigns.
For this, 'tis needful to prevent her art,
And fire with love the proud Phœnician's heart.
A love so violent, so strong, so sure,
As neither age can change, nor art can cure.
How this may be perform'd, now take my mind:
Ascanius, by his father, is design'd
To come, with presents, laden from the port,
To gratify the queen, and gain the court.
I mean to plunge the boy in pleasing sleep,
And, ravish'd, in Idalian bowers to keep,
Or high Cythera: that the sweet deceit
May pass unseen, and none prevent the cheat,
Take thou his form and shape. I beg the grace
But only for a night's revolving space;
Thyself a boy, assume a boy's dissembled face.
That when, amidst the fervour of the feast,
The Tyrian hugs, and fondly on her breast,
And with sweet kisses in her arms constrains,
Thou may'st infuse thy venom in her veins."
The god of love obeys, and sets aside
His bow and quiver, and his plummy pride:
He walks Iulus in his mother's sight;
And in the sweet resemblance takes delight.
The goddess then to young Ascanius flies,
And, in a pleasing slumber, seals his eyes;
Lull'd in her lap, amidst a train of loves,
She gently bears him to her blissful groves:
Then with a wreath of myrtle crowns his head,
And softly lays him on a flowery bed.
Cupid, meantime, assum'd his form and face,
Following Achates with a shorter pace,
And brought the gifts. The queen already sat,
Amidst the Trojan lords, in shining state,
High on a golden bed: her princely guest
Was next her side, in order sat the rest.
Then censors with bread are heap'd on high;
Th' attendants water for their hands supply;
And, having wash'd, with silken towels dry.
Next, fifty handmaids in long order bore
The censurs, and with fumes the gods adore.
Then youths, and virgins, twice as many, join
To place the dishes, and to serve the wine.
The Tyrian train, admitted to the feast,
Approach, and on the painted couches rest.
All on the Trojan gifts with wonder gaze;
But view the beautiful boy with more amaze!
His rosy-colour'd cheeks, his radiant eyes, [guise.
His motions, voice, and shape, and all the god's dis-
Nor pass unprais'd the vest and veil divine,
Which wandering foliage and rich flowers entwine.

But, far above the rest, the royal dame,
(Already doom'd to love's disastrous flame)
With eyes insatiate, and tumultuous joy,
Beholds the presents, and admires the boy.
The guileful god, about the hero long,
With children's play, and false embraces, hung;
Then sought the queen; she took him to her arms
With greedy pleasure, and devour'd his charms.
Unhappy Dido little thought what guest,
How dire a god she drew so near her breast.
But he, not mindless of his mother's prayer,
Works in the pliant bosom of the fair; [care.
And moulds her heart anew, and blots her former
The dead is to the living love resign'd,
And all Æneas enters in her mind.

Now, when the rage of hunger was appear'd,
The meat remov'd, and every guest was pleas'd,
The golden bowls with sparkling wine are crown'd,
And through the palace cheerful cries resound.
From gilded roofs depending lamps display
Nocturnal beams that emulate the day.
A golden bowl, that shone with gems divine,
The queen commanded to be crown'd with wine,
The bowl that Belus us'd, and all the Tyrian line.
Then, silence through the hall proclaim'd, she
"O hospitable Jove! we thus invoke, [spoke:
With solemn rites, thy sacred name and power!
Bless to both nations this auspicious hour!
So may the Trojan and the Tyrian line,
In lasting concord, from this day combine.
Thou, Bacchus, god of joys and friendly cheer,
And gracious Juno, both be present here:
And you, my lords of Tyre, your vows address
To Heaven with mine, to ratify the peace."
The goblet then she took, with nectar crown'd
(Sprinkling the first libations on the ground),
And rais'd it to her mouth with sober grace,
Then, sipping, offer'd to the next in place.
'Twas Bitias, whom she call'd, a thirsty soul,
He took the challenge, and embrac'd the bowl:
With pleasure swill'd the gold, nor ceas'd to draw,
Till he the bottom of the brimmer saw.
The goblet goes around; Iopas brought
His golden lyre, and sung what ancient Atlas taught.
The various labours of the wandering Moon,
And whence proceed th' eclipses of Sun.
Th' original of men and beasts; and whence
The rains arise, and fires their warmth dispense;
And fix'd and erring stars dispose their influence.
What shakes the solid Earth, what cause delays
The summer-nights, and shortens winter-days.
With peals of shouts the Tyrians praise the song;
Those peals are echo'd by the Trojan throng.
Th' unhappy queen with talk prolong'd the night,
And drank large draughts of love with vast delight;
Of Priam much inquir'd, of Hector more;
Then ask'd what arms the swarthy Memnon wore;
What troops he landed on the Trojan shore.
The steeds of Diomede vary'd the discourse,
And fierce Achilles, with his matchless force.
At length, as fate and her ill stars requir'd,
To hear the series of the war desir'd:
"Relate at large, my godlike guest," she said,
"The Grecian stratagems, the town betray'd";
The fatal issue of so long a war, [clare.
Your fight, your wanderings, and your woes, de-
For, since on every sea, on every coast,
Your men have been distress'd, your navy tom'd,
Seven times the Sun has either tropic view'd,
The winter banish'd, and the spring renew'd."

THE SECOND BOOK 99

THE AENEID.

THE ARGUMENT.

AENEAS relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the fixed resolution he had taken, not to survive the ruin of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defence of it: at last, having been before advised by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevailed upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to this, he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was designed for him.

All were attentive to the godlike man,
When, from his lofty couch, he thus began:
"Great queen! what you command me to relate,
Renews the sad remembrance of our fate,
An empire from its old foundations rent,
And every wo the Trojans underwent:
A peopled city made a desert place;
All that I saw, and part of which I was,
Not ev'n the hardest of our foes could bear,
Nor stern Ulysses tell without a tear.
And now the latter watch of wasting night,
And setting stars, to kindly rest invite.
But, since you take such interest in our woe,
And Troy's disastrous end desire to know,
I will restrain my tears, and briefly tell
What in our last and fatal night befel.

"By destiny compell'd, and in despair,
The Greeks grew weary of the tedious war:
And, by Minerva's aid, a fabric rear'd,
Which, like a steed of monstrous height, appear'd;
The sides were plank'd with pine, they feign'd it
For their return, and this the vow they paid. [made
Thus they pretend; but in the hollow side
Selected numbers of their soldiers hide:
With inward arms the dire machine they load,
And iron bowels stuff the dark abode.
In sight of Troy lies Tenedos, an isle,
(While fortune did on Priam's empire smile)
Renown'd for wealth; but since a faithless bay,
Where ships expos'd to winds and weather lay.
There was their fleet conceal'd: we thought for Greece

The sails were hoisted, and our fears release.
The Trojans, coop'd within their walls so long,
Unbar their gates, and issue in a throng,
Like swarming bees, and, with delight survey
The camp deserted where the Grecians lay:
'The quarters of the several chiefs they show'd,
'Here Phoenix, here Achilles made abode,
Here join'd the battles, there the navy rode.'
Part on the pile their wondering eyes employ
(The pile by Pallas rais'd to ruin Troy.)

Thymætes first ('tis doubtful whether his'd,
Or so the Trojan destiny requir'd)
Mov'd that the ramparts might be broken down,
'To lodge the monster-fabric in the town.
But Capys, and the rest of sounder mind,
The fatal present to the flames design'd;
Or to the watery deep: at least to bore.
The hollow sides, and hidden frauds explore:
The giddy vulgar, as their fancies guide,
With noise say nothing, and in parts divide,
Laocoon, followed by a numerous crowd,
Ran from the fort; and cry'd, from far, aloud;
'O wretched countrymen! what fury reigns?
What more than madness has possess'd your brains?
Think you the Grecians from your coasts are gone,

And are Ulysses' arts no better known?
This hollow fabric either must enclose,
Within its blind recess, our secret foes;
Or 'tis an engine rais'd above the town,
T' overlook the walls, and then to batter down.
Somewhat is sure design'd; by fraud or force;
Trust not their presents, nor admit the horse.'
Thus having said, against the steed he threw
His forceful spear, which, hissing as it flew,
Pierc'd through the yielding planks of jointed wood,
And trembling in the hollow belly stood.
The sides transpierc'd return a rattling sound,
And groans of Greeks enclos'd come issuing through the wood.

And had not Heaven the fall of Troy design'd,
Or had not men been fated to be blind,
Enough was said and done, t' inspire a better mind:
Then had our lances pierc'd the treacherous wood,
And Ilian towers and Priam's empire stood.
Mean time, with shouts, the Trojan shepherds bring
A captive Greek in bands, before the king:
Taken, to take; who made himself their prey,
T' impose on their belief, and Troy betray.
Fix'd on his aim, and obstinately bent
To die undaunted, or to circumvent.
About the captive, tides of Trojans flow;
All press to see, and some insult the foe.
Now hear how well the Greeks their wiles dis-
guis'd,

Behold a nation in a man compris'd.
Trembling the miscreant stood, unarm'd and bound:
He star'd, and roll'd his haggard eyes around;
Thou said, 'Alas! what earth remains, what sea
Is open to receive unhappy me!
What fate a wretched fugitive attends,
Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends!
He said, and sigh'd, and cast a rueful eye:
Our pity kindles, and our passions die.
We cheer the youth to make his own defence,
And freely tell us what he was, and whence:
What news he could impart, we long to know,
And what to credit from a captive foe.'

"His fear at length dismiss'd, he said, 'What's My fate ordains, my words shall be sincere:
I neither can, nor dare, my birth disclaim;
Greece is my country, Sinon is my name:
Though plung'd by fortune's power in misery,
'Tis not in fortune's power to make me lie.
If any chance has hitherto brought the name
Of Palamedes, not unknown to fame,
Who suffer'd from the malice of the times;
Accus'd and sentenc'd for pretended crimes:
Because the fatal wars he would prevent;
Whose death the wretched Greeks too late lament;

Me, then a boy, my father, poor and bare
Of other means, committed to his care :
His kinsman and companion in the war.
While fortune favour'd, while his arms support
The cause, and rul'd the counsels of the court,
I made some figure there ; nor was my name
Obscure, nor I without my share of fame.
But when Ulysses, with fallacious arts,
Had made impression in the people's hearts ;
And forg'd a treason in my patron's name
(I speak of things too far divulg'd by fame),
My kinsman fell ; then I, without support,
In private mourn'd his loss, and left the court.
Mad as I was, I could not bear his fate
With silent grief, but loudly blam'd the state :
And curs'd the direful author of my woes.
'Twas told again, and hence my ruin rose.
I threaten'd, if indulgent Heaven once more
Would land me safely on my native shore,
His death with double vengeance to restore.
This mov'd the murderer's hate, and soon ensu'd
Th' effects of malice from a man so proud.
Ambiguous rumours through the camp he spread,
And sought, by treason, my devoted head :
New crimes invented, left unturn'd no stone,
To make my guilt appear, and hide his own.
Till Calchas was by force and threatening wrought :
But why—why dwell I on that anxious thought ?
If on my nation just revenge you seek,
And 'tis t' appear a foe, t' appear a Greek ;
Already you my name and country know,
Assuage your thirst of blood, and strike the blow :
My death will both the kingly brothers please,
And set insatiate Ithacus at ease.'

This fair unfinish'd tale, these broken starts,
Rais'd expectations in our longing hearts ;
Unknowing as we were in Grecian arts,
His former trembling once again renew'd,
With acted fear, the villain thus pursu'd :

“ Long had the Grecians (tir'd with fruitless
care,

And weary'd with an unsuccessful war)
Resolv'd to raise the siege, and leave the town ;
And, had the gods permitted, they had gone.
But off the wintery seas and southern winds
Withstood their passage home, and chang'd their Portents and prodigies their souls amaz'd ; [minds.
But most, when this stupendous pile was rais'd :
Then flaming meteors, hung in air, were seen,
And thunders rattled through a sky serene :
Dismay'd, and fearful of some dire event,
Eurypylus, t' inquire their fate, was sent ;
He from the gods this dreadful answer brought :
“ O Grecians ! when the Trojan shores you sought,
Your passage with a virgin's blood was bought !
So must your safe return be bought again,
And Grecian blood once more atone the main !'
The spreading rumour round the people ran ;
All fear'd, and each believ'd himself the man.
Ulysses took th' advantage of their fright ;
Call'd Calchas, and produc'd in open sight :
Then bade him name the wretch, ordain'd by fate
The public victim, to redeem the state.
Already some presag'd the dire event,
And saw what sacrifice Ulysses meant.
For twice five days the good old seer withstood
Th' intended treason, and was dumb to blood.
Till, tir'd with endless clamours, and pursuit
Of Ithacus, he stood no longer mute :

But, as it was agreed, pronounc'd that I
Was destin'd by the wrathful gods to die !
All prais'd the sentence, pleas'd the storm should
On one alone, whose fury threaten'd all. (fall
The dismal day was come, the priests prepare
Their leaven'd cakes, and fillets for my hair.
I follow'd nature's laws, and must avow
I broke my bonds, and fled the fatal blow.
Hid in a weedy lake all night I lay,
Secure of safety when they sail'd away.
But now what further hopes for me remain,
To see my friends or native soil again ?
My tender infants, or my careful sire,
Whom they returning will to death require ?
Will perpetrate on them their first design,
And take the forfeit of their heads for mine !
Which, O, if pity mortal minds can move,
If there be faith below, or gods above,
If innocence and truth can claim desert,
Ye Trojans, from an injur'd wretch avert.'
False tears true pity move : the king commands
To loose his fetters, and unbind his hands : [fears,
Then adds these friendly words ; ' Dismiss thy Forget the Greeks, be mine as thou wert theirs :
But truly tell, was it for force or guile,
Or some religious end, you rais'd this pile.'
Thus said the king. He, full of fraudulent arts,
This well invented tale for truth imparts :
' Ye lamps of Heaven !' he said, and lifted high
His hands now free, 'thou venerable sky,
Inviolable powers, ador'd with dread,
Ye fatal fillets, that once bound this head,
Ye sacred altars, from whose flames I fled,
Be all of you abjur'd ; and grant I may,
Without a crime, th' ungrateful Greeks betray !
Reveal the secrets of the guilty state,
And justly punish whom I justly hate !
But you, O king ! preserve the faith you gave,
If I, to save myself, your empire save.
The Grecian hopes, and all th' attempts they made,
Were only founded on Minerva's aid.
But from the time when impious Diomedes,
And false Ulysses, that inventive head,
Her fatal image from the temple drew,
The sleeping guardians of the castle slew,
Her virgin statue with their bloody hands
Polluted, and profan'd her holy bands :
From thence the tide of fortune left their shore,
And ebb'd much faster than it flow'd before :
Their courage languish'd, as their hopes decay'd,
And Pallas, now averse, refus'd her aid,
Nor did the goddess doubtfully declare
Her alter'd mind, and alienated care :
When first her fatal image touch'd the ground,
She sternly cast her glaring eyes around,
That sparkled as they roll'd, and seem'd to threat ;
Her heavenly limbs distill'd a briny sweat. [wield
Thrice from the ground she leap'd, was seen to
Her brandish'd lance, and shake her horrid shield !
Then Calchas bad our host for flight prepare,
And hope no conquest from the tedious war : [snought
Till first they sail'd for Greece ; with prayers be-
Her injur'd power, and better omen brought.
And now their navy ploughs the watery main,
Yet, soon expect it on your shores again,
With Pallas pleas'd : as Calchas did ordain.
But first, to reconcile the blue-ey'd maid,
For her stol'n statue, to her tower betray'd ;
Warm'd by the seer, to her offended name
We rais'd, and dedicate this wondrous frame :

So lofty, lest through your forbidden gates
It pass, and intercept our better fates.
For, once admitted there, our hopes are lost ;
And Troy may then a new Palladium boast.
For so religion and the gods ordain ;
That if you violate with hands profane
Minerva's gift, your town in flames shall burn,
(Which omen, O ye gods, on Græcia turn) !
But if it climb, with your assisting hands,
The Trojan walls, and in the city stands,
Then Troy shall Argos and Mycenæ burn,
And the reverse of fate on us return.

“ With such deceits he gain'd their easy hearts,
Too prone to credit his perfidious arts,
What Diomedè, nor Thetis' greater son,
A thousand ships, nor ten years' siege had done :
False tears and fawning words the city won.
A greater omen, and of worse portent,
Did our unwary minds with fear torment :
Concurring to produce the dire event.
Laocoon, Neptune's priest by lot that year,
With solemn pomp then sacrific'd a steer.
When, dreadful to behold, from sea we spy'd
Two serpents rank'd abreast, the seas divide,
And smoothly sweep along the swelling tide.
Their flaming crests above the waves they show,
Their bellies seem to burn the seas below :
Their speckled tails advance to steer their course,
And, on the sounding shore, the flying billows force.

And now the strand, and now the plain they held,
Their ardent eyes with bloody streaks were fill'd :
Their nimble tongues they brandish'd as they came,
And lick'd their hissing jaws that sputter'd flame.
We fled amaz'd ; their destin'd way they take,
And to Laocoon and his children make :
And first around the tender boys they wind,
Then with their sharpen'd fangs their limbs and bodies grind.

The wretched father, running to their aid
With pious haste, but vain, they next invade :
Twice round his waist their winding volumes roll'd,
And twice about his gasping throat they fold.
The priest, thus doubly chok'd, their crests divide,
And, towering o'er his head, in triumph ride.
With both his hands he labours at the knots,
His holy fillets the blue venom blots :
His roaring fills the sitting air around.
Thus, when an ox receives a glancing wound,
He breaks his bands, the fatal altar flies,
And, with loud bellowings, breaks the yielding
skies.

Their tasks perform'd, the serpents quit their prey,
And to the tower of Pallas make their way :
Couch'd at her feet, they lie protected there,
By her large buckler, and protended spear.
Amazement seizes all ; the general cry
Proclaims Laocoon justly doom'd to die,
Whose hand the will of Pallas had withstood,
And dar'd to violate the sacred wood.
All vote t' admit the steed, that vows be paid,
And incense offer'd, to th' offended maid.
A spacious breach is made, the town lies bare,
Some hoisting levers, some the wheels prepare,
And fasten to the horse's feet : the rest
With cables haul along th' unwieldy beast.
Each on his fellow for assistance calls :
At length the fatal fabric mounts the walls,
Big with destruction. Boys with chaplets crown'd,
And choirs of virgins, sing and dance around.

Thus rais'd aloft, and then descending down,
It enters o'er our heads, and thrcats the town.
O sacred city ! built by hands divine !
O valiant heroes of the Trojan line !
Four times he stuck ; as oft the clashing sound
Of arms was heard, and inward groans rebound.
Yet, mad with zeal, and blinded with our fate,
We haul along the horse in solemn state ;
Then place the dire portent within the tower.
Cassandra cry'd, and curs'd the unhappy hour ;
Foretold our fate ; but, by the gods' decree,
All heard, and none believ'd, the prophecy.
With branches we the fanes adorn, and waste
In jollity the day ordain'd to be the last.
Meantime the rapid heavens roll'd down the light,
And on the shaded ocean rush'd the night :
Our men secure, nor guards nor centries held,
But easy sleep their weary limbs compell'd.
The Grecians had embark'd their naval powers
From Tenedos, and sought our well-known shores
Safe under covert of the silent night,
And guided by th' imperial galley's light.
When Sinon, favour'd by the partial gods,
Unlock'd the horse, and op'd his dark abodes ;
Restor'd to vital air our hidden foes,
Who joyful from their long confinement rose.
Tysander bold, and Sthenelus their guide,
And dire Ulysses, down the cable slide :
Then Thoas, Athamas, and Pyrrhus haste ;
Nor was the Podalirian hero last :
Nor injur'd Menelaus, nor the fam'd
Epeus, who the fatal engine fram'd.
A nameless crowd succeed ; their forces join
T' invade the town, oppress'd with sleep and wine.
Those few they find awake first meet their fate,
Then to their fellows they unbar the gate.
'Twas in the dead of night, when sleep repairs
Our bodies worn with toils, our minds with cares,
When Hector's ghost before my sight appears :
A bloody shroud he seem'd, and bath'd in tears.
Such as he was, when, by Pelides slain,
Thessalian coursers dragg'd him o'er the plain.
Sworn were his feet, as when the thongs were thrust
Through the bor'd holes, his body black with dust.
Unlike that Hector, who return'd from toils
Of war triumphant, in Æacian spoils :
Or him, who made the fainting Greeks retire,
And lanch'd against their navy Phrygian fire.
His hair and beard stood stiff n'd with his gore ;
And all the wounds, he for his country bore,
Now stream'd afresh, and with new purple ran :
I wept to see the visionary man :
And, while my trance continu'd, thus began :
' O light of Trojans, and sup'ort of Troy,
Thy father's champion, and thy country's joy !
O, long expected by thy friends ! from whence
Art thou so late return'd for our defence ?
Do we behold thee, weary'd as we are,
With length of labours, and with toils of war ?
After so many funerals of thy own,
Art thou restor'd to thy declining town ?
But say, what wounds are these ? What new disgrace
Deforms the manly features of thy face ?
To this the spectre no reply did frame ;
But answer'd to the cause for which he came :
And, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
This warning, in these mournful words, express'd :
' O goddess-born ! escape, by timely flight,
The flames and horrors of this fatal night.

The foes, already, have possess'd the wall,
Troy nods from high, and totters to her fall.
Enough is paid to Priam's royal name,
More than enough to duty and to fame.
If by a mortal hand my father's throne
Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone:
Now Troy to thee commends her future state,
And gives her gods companions of thy fate:
From their assistance happier walls expect,
Which, wandering long, at last thou shalt erect.
He said, and brought me, from their blest abodes,
The venerable statues of the gods.
With ancient Vesta from the sacred choir
The wreaths and relics of th' immortal fire.

"Now peals of shouts come thundering from afar:
Cries, threats, and loud laments, and mingled war!
The noise approaches, though our palace stood
Aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood.
Louder, and yet more loud, I hear th' alarms
Of human cries distinct, and clashing arms!
Fear broke my slumbers: I no longer stay,
But mount the terrace, thence the town survey:
And hearken what the fruitful sounds convey!
Thus, when a flood of fire by wind is borne,
Crackling it rolls, and mows the standing corn:
Or deluges, descending on the plains,
Sweep o'er the yellow year, destroy the pains
Of labouring oxen, and the peasant's gains:
Uproot the forest oaks, and bear away
Flocks, folds, and trees, an undistinguish'd prey!
The shepherd climbs the cliff, and sees, from far,
The wasteful ravage of the watery war.
Then Hector's faith was manifestly clear'd;
And Grecian firms in open light appear'd!
The palace of Deiphobus ascends
In smoky flames, and catches on his friends,
Dealegon burns next; the seas are bright [light.
With splendour not their own; and shine with Trojan
New clamours and new clangours now arise,
The sound of trumpets mix'd with fighting cries!
With frenzy seiz'd, I run to meet th' alarms,
Resolv'd on death, resolv'd to die in arms!
But first to gather friends, with them to oppose,
If fortune favour'd, and repel the foes.
Spurr'd by my courage, by my country fir'd;
With sense of honour, and revenge inspir'd!
"Pantheus, Apollo's priest, a sacred name,
Had 'scap'd the Grecian swords, and pass'd the
With relics laden, to my doors he fled, [flame;
And, by the hand, his tender grandson led.

"What hope, O Pantheus! whither can we run?
Where make a stand? and what may yet be done?"
Scarce had I said, when Pantheus, with a groan,
"Troy is no more, and Ilium was a town!
The fatal day, th' appointed hour, is come,
When wrathful Jove's irrevocable doom
Transfers the Trojan state to Grecian hands.
The fire consumes the town, the foe commands!
And armed hosts, an unexpected force,
Break from the bowels of the fatal horse!
Within the gates proud Sinon throws about
The flames, and foes for entrance press without.
With thousand others, whom I fear to name,
More than from Argos or Mycenæ came.
To several posts their parties they divide;
Some block the narrow streets, some scour the wide.
The bold they kill, th' unwary they surprise; [flies.
Who fights finds death, and death finds him who
The warders of the gate but scarce maintain
Th' unequal combat, and resist in vain."

I heard; and Heaven, that well-born souls inspires,
Prompts me, through lifted swords and rising fires,
To run, where clashing arms and clamour calls,
And rush undaunted to defend the walls!
Ripheus and Iphitus by my side engage,
For valour one renown'd, and one for age.
Dymas and Hypanis by moonlight knew
My motions and my men, and to my party drew;
With young Choroebus, who by love was led
To win renown, and fair Cassandra's bed;
And lately brought his troops to Priam's aid:
Forewarn'd in vain by the prophetic maid.
Whom, when I saw, resolv'd in arms to fall,
And that one spirit animatèd all;
'Brave souls,' said I, 'but brave, alas! in vain!
Come, finish what our cruel fates ordain,
You see the desperate state of our affairs;
And Heaven's protecting powers are deaf to prayers.
The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes: we, feeble few, conspire
To save a sinking town involv'd in fire.
Then let us fall, but fall amidst our foes:
Despair of life, the means of living shows.'
So bold a speech encouraged their desire
Of death, and added fuel to their fire!

"As hungry wolves, with raging appetite,
Scour through the fields, not fear the stormy night,
Their whelps at home expect the promis'd food,
And long to temper their dry chaps in blood,
So rush'd we forth at once, resolv'd to die,
Resolv'd in death the last extremes to try!
We leave the narrow lanes behind, and dare
Th' unequal combat in the public square:
Night was our friend, our leader was Despair.
What tongue can tell the slaughter of that night!
What eyes can weep the sorrows and affright!
An ancient and imperial city falls,
The streets are fill'd with frequent funerals:
Houses and holy temples float in blood,
And hostile nations make a common flood.
Not only Trojans fall, but, in their turn,
The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors mourn.
Ours take new courage from despair and night;
Confus'd the fortune is, confus'd the fight.
All parts resound with tumults, plaints, and fear,
And grisly death in sundry shapes appears!
Androgeos fell among us, with his band,
Who thought us Grecians newly come to land:
'From whence,' said he, 'my friends, this long delay?

You loiter, while the spoils are borne away.
Our ships are laden with the Trojan store,
And you, like truants, come too late ashore.'
He said, but soon corrected his mistake,
Found by the doubtful answers which we make:
Amaz'd he would have shunn'd th' unequal fight,
But we, more numerous, intercept his flight.
As when some peasant, in a bushy brake,
Has, with unwary footing, press'd a snake,
He starts aside, astonish'd, when he spies
His rising crest, blue neck, and rolling eyes;
So from our arms surpris'd Androgeos flies!
In vain; for him and his we compass round,
Possess'd with fear, unknowing of the ground;
And of their lives an easy conquest found.
Thus Fortune on our first end-avours smil'd;
Choroebus then, with youthful hopes bequill'd,
Sworn with success, and of a daring mind,
This new invention fatally design'd.

' My friends,' said he, ' since Fortune shows the way,
 'Tis fit we should th' auspicious guide obey.
 For what has she these Grecian arms bestow'd,
 But their destruction, and the Trojans' good?
 Then change we shields, and their devices bear,
 Let fraud supply the want of force in war.
 They find us arms.' This said, himself he dress'd
 In dead Androgeus' spoils, his upper vest,
 His painted buckler, and his plummy crest.
 Thus Rypheus, Dymas, all the Trojan train,
 Lay down their own attire, and strip the slain.
 Mix'd with the Greeks, we go with ill presage,
 Flatter'd with hopes to glut our greedy rage:
 Unknown, assailing whom we blindly meet,
 And strew, with Grecian carcases, the street.
 Thus while their straggling parties we defeat,
 Some to the shore and safer ships retreat:
 And some, oppress'd with more ignoble fear,
 Remount the hollow horse, and pant in secret there.

" But ah! what use of valour can be made,
 When Heaven's propitious powers refuse their aid!
 Behold the royal prophētess, the fair
 Cassandra, dragg'd by her dishevell'd hair;
 Whom not Minerva's shrine, nor sacred bands,
 In safety could protect from sacrilegious hands:
 On Heaven she cast her eyes, she sigh'd, she cry'd,
 ('Twas all she could), her tender arms were ty'd.
 So sad a sight Choroebus could not bear;
 But, fir'd with rage, distracted with despair,
 Amid the barbarous ravishers he flew;
 Our leader's rash example we pursue;
 But storms of stones, from the proud temple's height,

Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight:
 We from our friends receiv'd this fatal blow,
 Who thought us Grecians, as we seem'd in show.
 They aim at the mistaken crests, from high,
 And ours beneath the ponderous ruin lie.
 Then, mov'd with anger and disdain, to see
 Their troops dispers'd, the royal virgin free:
 The Grecians rally, and their pow'rs unite,
 With fary charge us, and renew the fight.
 The brother-kings with Ajax join their force,
 And the whole squadron of Thessalian horse.

" Thus, when the rival winds their quarrel try,
 Contending for the kingdom of the sky,
 South, east, and west, on airy coursers borne,
 The whirlwind gathers, and the woods are torn:
 Then Nereus strikes the deep, the billows rise,
 And, mix'd with ooze and sand, pollute the skies.
 The troops we squander'd first, again appear
 From several quarters, and enclose the rear.
 They first observe, and to the rest betray,
 Our different speech; our borrow'd arms survey.
 Oppress'd with odds, we fall; Choroebus first,
 At Pallas' altar, by Peneleus pierc'd.
 Then Rypheus follow'd, in th' unequal fight;
 Just of his word, observant of the right:
 Heaven thought not so: Dymas their fate attends,
 With Hypanis, mistaken by their friends.
 Nor Pantheus, thee, thy mitre, nor the bands
 Of awful Phœbus, sav'd from impious hands.
 Ye Trojan flames, your testimony bear
 What I perform'd, and what I suffer'd there:
 No sword avoiding in the fatal strife,
 Expos'd to death, and prodigal of life.
 Witness, ye Heavens! I live not by my fault:
 I strive to have deserv'd the death I sought.
 But when I could not fight, and would have dy'd,
 Borne off to distance by the growing tide,

Old Iphitus and I were hurry'd thence,
 With Pelias wounded, and without defence.
 New clamours from th' invested palace ring;
 We run to die, or disengage the king.
 So hot th' assault, so high the tumult rose,
 While ours defend, and while the Greeks oppose,
 As all the Dardan and Argolic race
 Had been contracted in that narrow space:
 Or as all Ilium else were void of fear,
 And tumult, war, and slaughter only there.
 Their targets in a tortoise cast, the foes
 Secure advancing, to the turrets rose:
 Some mount the scaling-ladders; some, more bold,
 Swerve upwards, and by posts and pillars hold:
 Their left hand gripes their bucklers in th' ascent,
 While with the right they seize the battlement.
 From the demolish'd towers the Trojans throw
 Huge heaps of stones, that, falling, crush the foe:
 And heavy beams and rafters from the sides
 (Such arms their last necessity provides):
 And gilded roofs come tumbling from on high,
 The marks of state and ancient royalty.
 The guards below, fix'd in the pass, attend
 The charge undaunted, and the gate defend.
 Renew'd in courage, with recover'd breath,
 A second time we ran to tempt our death:
 To clear the palace from the foe, succeed
 The weary living, and revenge the dead.
 A postern-door, yet unobserv'd and free,
 Join'd by the length of a blind gallery,
 To the king's closet led, a way well known
 To Hector's wife, while Priam held the throne:
 Through which she brought Astyanax, unseen,
 To cheer his grandsire and his grandsire's queen.
 Through this we pass, and mount the tower from whence,

With unavailing arms, the Trojans make defence.
 From this the trembling king had oft descry'd
 The Grecian camp, and saw their navy ride.
 Beams from his lofty height with swords we saw;
 Then, wrenching with our hands, th' assault renew.
 And, where the rafters on the columns meet,
 We push them headlong with our arms and feet:
 The lightning flies not swifter than the fall,
 Nor thunder louder than the ruin'd wall:
 Down goes the top at once; the Greeks beneath
 Are piece-meal torn, or pounded into death.
 Yet more succeed, and more to death are sent;
 We cease not from above, nor they below relent.
 Before the gate stood Pyrrhus, threatening loud,
 With glittering arms conspicuous in the crowd:
 So shines, renew'd in youth, the crested snake,
 Who slept the winter in a thorny brake:
 And, casting off his slough, when spring returns,
 Now looks aloft, and with new glory burns:
 Restor'd with poisonous herbs, his ardent sides
 Reflect the Sun, and, rais'd on spires, he rides;
 High o'er the grass, hissing he rolls along,
 And brandishes, by fits, his fork'd tongue.
 Proud Periphas, and fierce Automedon,
 His father's charioteer, together run
 To force the gate: the Scyrian infantry
 Rush on in crowds, and the barr'd passage free.
 Entering the court, with shouts the skies they read,
 And flaming firebrands to the roofs ascend.
 Himself, among the foremost, deals his blows,
 And, with his ax, repeated strokes bestows
 On the strong doors: then all their shoulders ply,
 Till from the posts the brazen hinges fly.

He hews apace, the double bars at length
Yield to his ax, and unresisted strength.
A mighty breach is made; the rooms conceal'd
Appear, and all the palace is reveal'd:
The halls of audience, and of public state,
And where the lonely queen in secret sat.
Arm'd soldiers now by trembling maids are seen,
With not a door, and scarce a space between.
The house is fill'd with loud laments and cries,
And shrieks of women rend the vaulted skies.
The fearful matrons run from place to place,
And kiss the thresholds, and the posts embrace.
The fatal work inhuman Pyrrhus plies,
And all his father sparkles in his eyes.
Nor bars, nor fighting guards, his force sustain;
The bars are broken, and the guards are slain.
In rush the Greeks, and all th' apartments fill;
Those few defendants whom they find they kill.
Not with so fierce a rage, the foaming flood
Roars, when he finds his rapid course withstood:
Bears down the dams with unresisted sway,
And sweeps the cattle and the cots away.
These eyes beheld him, when he march'd between
The brother-kings: I saw th' unhappy queen,
The hundred wives, and where old Priam stood,
To stain his hallow'd altar with his blood.
The fifty nuptial beds (such hopes had he,
So large a promise of a progeny).
The posts of plated gold and hung with spoils,
Fell the reward of the proud victor's toils.
Where'er the raging fire had left a space,
The Grecians enter, and possess the place.
Perhaps you may of Priam's fate inquire:
He, when he saw his regal town on fire,
His ruin'd palace, and his entering foes,
On every side inevitable woes;
In arms disus'd, invests his limbs decay'd
Like them, with age: a late and useless aid.
His feeble shoulders scarce the weight sustain:
Loaded, not arm'd, he creeps along with pain;
Despairing of success: ambitious to be slain!
Uncover'd but by Heaven, there stood in view
An altar; near the hearth a laurel grew,
Dodger'd with age, whose boughs encompass
round
The household gods, and shade the holy ground.
Here Hecuba, with all her hapless train
Of dames, for shelter sought, but sought in vain.
Driven like a flock of doves along the sky,
Their images they hug, and to their altars fly.
The queen, when she beheld her trembling lord,
And hanging by his side a heavy sword,
'What rage,' she cry'd, 'has seiz'd my husband's mind;
What arms are these, and to what use design'd?
These times want other aids: were Hector here,
Ev'n Hector now in vain, like Priam, would appear.
With us, one common shelter thou shalt find,
Or in one common fate with us be join'd.'
She said, and with a last salute embrac'd
The poor old man, and by the laurel plac'd.
Behold Polites, one of Priam's sons,
Pursued by Pyrrhus, there for safety runs.
Through swords and foes, amaz'd and hurt he flies
Through empty courts, and open galleries:
Him Pyrrhus, urging with his lance, pursues,
And often reaches, and his thrusts renews.
The youth transfix'd, with lamentable cries,
Expires, before his wretched parents' eyes.

Whom, gasping at his feet, when Priam saw,
The fear of death gave place to nature's law.
And, shaking more with anger than with age,
'The gods,' said he, 'requite thy brutal rage:
As sure they will, barbarian; sure they must,
If there be gods in Heaven, and gods be just:
Who tak'st in wrongs an insolent delight,
With a son's death t' infect a father's sight.
Not he, whom thou and lying fame conspire
To call thee his: not he, thy vaunted sire,
Thus us'd my wretched age: the gods he fear'd,
The laws of nature and of nations heard.
He cheer'd my sorrows, and, for sums of gold,
The bloodless carcase of my Hector sold,
Pity'd the woes a parent underwent,
And sent me back in safety from his tent.'
'This said, his feeble hand a javelin threw,
Which, fluttering, seem'd to loiter as it flew:
Just, and but barely, to the mark it held,
And faintly tinkled on the brazen shield.
'Then Pyrrhus thus: 'Go thou from me to fate;
And to my father my foul deeds relate.
Now die:' with that he dragg'd the trembling sire,
Sliddering through clott'd blood and holy mire
(The mingled paste his murder'd son had made),
Haul'd from beneath the violated shade,
And on the sacred pile the royal victim laid.
His right hand held his bloody falchion bare;
His left he twisted in his boary hair:
Then, with a speeding thrust, his heart he found:
The lukewarm blood came rushing through the
wound,
And sanguine streams stain'd the sacred ground.
Thus Priam fell, and shar'd one common fate
With Troy in ashes, and his ruin'd state:
He, who the sceptre of all Asia sway'd,
Whom monarchs, like domestic slaves, obey'd,
On the bleak shore now lies th' abandon'd king,
A headless carcase, and a nameless thing'.
'Then, not before, I felt my curdl'd blood
Congeal with fear, my hair with horror stood:
My father's image fill'd my pious mind,
Lest equal years might equal fortune find.
Again I thought on my forsaken wife,
And trembled for my son's abandon'd life.
I look'd about, but found myself alone,
Deserted at my need, my friends were gone.
Some spent with toil, some with despair oppress'd,
Leap'd headlong from the heights; the flames con-
sum'd the rest.
Thus, wandering in my way, without a guide,
The graceless Helen in the porch I spy'd
Of Vesta's temple; there she lurk'd alone;
Muffled she sat, and, what she could, unknown:
But, by the flames, that cast their blaze around,
That common bane of Greece and Troy, I found,
For Ilium burnt, she dreads the Trojan's sword;
More dreads the vengeance of her injur'd lord;
Ev'n by those gods, who refug'd her, abhorr'd.
Trembling with rage the strumpet I regard;
Resolv'd to give her guilt the due reward.
'Shall she triumphant soil before the wind,
And leave in flames unhappy Troy behind?
Shall she her kingdom and her friends review,
In state attend'd with a captive crew;
While unreveng'd the good old Priam falls,
And Grecian fires consume the Trojan walls?

For this the Phrygian fields and Xanthian flood Were swell'd with bodies, and were drunk with blood!

'Tis true, a soldier can small honour gain,
And boast no conquest from a woman slain;
Yet shall the fact not pass without applause,
Of vengeance taken in so just a cause.
The punish'd crime shall set my soul at ease:
And murmuring manes of my friends appease.
Thus while I rave, a gleam of pleasant light
Spread o'er the place, and, shining heavenly bright,
My mother stood reveal'd before my sight.
Never so radiant did her eyes appear;
Nor her own star confess'd a light so clear.
Great in her charms, as when the gods above
She looks, and breathes herself into their love.
She held my hand, the destin'd blow to break:
Then, from her rosy lips, began to speak:
' My son, from whence this madness, this neglect
Of my commands, and those whom I protect?
Why this unmanly rage? recal to mind
Whom you forsake, what pledges leave behind.
Look if your hapless father yet survive;
Or if Ascanius, or Creïssa, live.
Around your house the greedy Grecians err;
And these had perish'd in the nightly war,
But for my presence and protecting care.
Not Helen's face, nor Paris, was in fault:
But by the gods was this destruction brought.
Now cast your eyes around; while I dissolve
The mists and films that mortal eyes involve:
Purge from your sight the dross, and make you see
The shape of each avenging deity.
Enlighten'd thus, my just commands fulfill:
Nor fear obedience to your mother's will.
Where you disorder'd heap of ruin lies,
Stones rent from stones, where clouds of dust
arise,

Amid that smother, Neptune holds his place:
Below the wall's foundation drives his mace:
And heaves the building from the solid base.
Look where, in arms, imperial Juno stands,
Full in the Scæan gate, with loud commands,
Urging on shore the tardy Grecian bands.
See Pallas, of her snaky buckler proud,
Bestride the tower, refulgent through the cloud:
See Jove new courage to the foe supplies,
And arms against the town the partial deities.
Haste hence, my son; this fruitless labour end:
Haste where your trembling spouse and sire attend:
Haste, and a mother's care your passage shall befriend.'

She said: and swiftly vanish'd from my sight,
Obscure in clouds, and gloomy shades of night.
I look'd, I listen'd; dreadful sounds I hear;
And the dire forms of hostile gods appear.
Troy sunk in flames I saw, nor could prevent;
And Ilium from its old foundations rent.
Rent like a mountain ash, which dar'd the winds;
Add stood the sturdy strokes of labouring hinds:
About the roots the cruel ax resounds,
The stumps are pierc'd with oft-repeated wounds.
The war is felt on high, the nodding crown
Now threatens a fall, and throws the leafy honours
down.

To their united force it yields, though late; [fate:
And mourns, with mortal groans, th' approaching.
The roots no more their upper load sustain;
But down she falls, and spreads a ruin through the plain.

" Descending thence, I 'scape through fast, and Before the goddess, foes and flames retire. [fire:
Arriv'd at home, he for whose only sake,
Or most for his, such toils I undertake,
The good Anchises, whom, by timely flight,
I purpos'd to secure on Ida's height,
Refus'd the journey; resolute to die,
And add his funerals to the fate of Troy:
Rather than exile and old age sustain.
' Go you, whose blood runs warm in every vein:
Had Heaven decreed that I should life enjoy,
Heaven had decreed to save unhappy Troy.
'Tis sure enough, if not too much for one,
Twice to have seen our Ilium overthrown.
Make haste to save the poor remaining crew;
And give this useless corpse a long adieu.
These weak old hands suffice to stop my breath:
At least the pitying foes will aid my death,
To take my spoils: and leave my body bare:
As for my sepulchre let Heaven take care.
'Tis long since I, for my celestial wife,
Loath'd by the gods, have dragg'd a lingering life:
Since every hour and moment I expire,
Blasted from Heaven by Jove's avenging fire.'
This oft repeated, he stood fix'd to die:
Myself, my wife, my son, my family,
Entreat, pray, beg, and raise a doleful cry.
What, will he still persist, on death resolve,
And in his ruin all his house involve?
He still persists his reasons to maintain;
Our prayers, our tears, our loud laments, are
" Urg'd by despair, again I go to try [vain.
The fate of arms, resolv'd in fight to die.
What hope remains, but what my death must give?
Can I without so dear a father live?
You term it prudence, what I baseness call:
Could such a word from such a parent fall?
If fortune please, and so the gods ordain,
That nothing should of ruin'd Troy remain;
And you conspire with fortune, to be slain;
The way to death is wide, th' approaches near:
For soon relentless Pyrrhus will appear,
Reeking with Priam's blood: the wretch who slew
The son (inhuman) in the father's view,
And then the sire himself to the dire altar drew.
" O goddess-mother, give me back to fate;
Your gift was undesir'd, and came too late.
Did you for this, unhappy me convey
Through foes and fires to see my house a prey?
Shall I, my father, wife, and son, behold
Weltering in blood, each other's arms infold?
Haste! gird my sword, though spent and overcome:

'Tis the last summons to receive your doom.
I hear thee, fate, and I obey thy call:
Not unreveng'd the foe shall see my fall.
Restore me yet to the unfinished fight:
My death is wanting to conclude the night.
Arm'd once again, my glittering sword I wield!
While th' other hand sustains my weighty shield:
And forth I rush to seek th' abandon'd field.
I went; but sad Creïssa stopp'd my way,
And, cross the threshold, in my passage lay;
Embrac'd my knees; and when I would have gone,
Shew'd me my feeble sire, and tender son.
' If death be your design, at least,' said she,
' Take us along to share your destiny.
If any further hopes in arms remain,
This place, these pledges of your love maintain

To whom do you expose your father's life,
Your son's, and mine, your now-forgotten wife !
While thus she fills the house with clamorous cries,
Our hearing is diverted by our eyes ;
For while I held my son, in the short space,
Betwixt our kisses and our last embrace,
Strange to relate, and our young lilius' head
A lambent flame arose, which gently spread
Around his brows, and on his temples fed.
Amaz'd, with running water we prepare
To quench the sacred fire, and stake his hair ;
But old Anchises, vers'd in omens, rear'd
His hand to Heaven, and this request preferr'd :
' If any vows, almighty Jove, can bend
Thy will, if piety can prayers commend,
Confirm the glad presage which thou art pleas'd to send.'

Scarce had he said, when, on our left, we hear
A peal of rattling thunder roll in air :
There shot a streaming lamp along the sky,
Which on the winged lightning seem'd to fly ;
From o'er the roof the blaze began to move ;
And trailing vanish'd in th' Idean grove.
It swept a path in Heaven, and shone a guide ;
Then in a steaming stench of sulphur dy'd.

"The good old man with suppliant hands im-plor'd

The gods' protection, and their star ador'd.
' Now, now,' said he, ' my son, no more delay,
I yield, I follow where Heaven shows the way.
Keep (O my country-gods!) our dwelling place,
And guard this relic of the Trojan race :
This tender child ; these omens are your own ;
And you can yet restore the ruin'd town.
At least accomplish what your signs foreshow :
I stand resign'd, and am prepar'd to go.'

"He said ; the crackling flames appear on-high,
And driving sparkles dance along the sky.
With Vulcan's rage the rising winds conspire ;
And near our palace rolls the flood of fire.
' Haste, my dear father, ('tis no time to wait)
And load my shoulders with a willing freight.
Whate'er befalls, your life shall be my care,
One death, or one deliverance, we will share,
My hand shall lead our little son ; and you,
My faithful consort, shall our steps pursue.
Next, you, my servants, heed my strict commands :
Without the walls a ruin'd temple stands,
To Ceres hallow'd once, a cypress high
Shoots up her venerable head on high ;
By long religion kept : there bend your feet ;
And, in divided parties, let us meet.
Our country gods, the relics, and the bands,
Hold you, my father, in your guiltless hands :
In me 'tis impious holy things to bear.
Red as I am with slaughter, new from war :
Till, in some living stream, I cleanse the guilt
Of dire debate, and blood in battle spilt.'
Thus, ordering all that prudence could provide,
I clothe my shoulders with a lion's hide,
And yellow spoils : then, on my bending back,
The welcome load of my dear father take.
While, on my better hand, Ascanius hung,
And, with unequal paces, tript along.
Creusa kept behind : by choice we stray
Through every dark and every devious way,
I, who so bold and dauntless, just before,
The Grecian darts and shocks of lances bore,
At every shadow now am seiz'd with fear :
Not for myself, but for the charge I bear.

Till near the ruin'd gate arriv'd at last,
Secure, and deeming all the danger past,
A frightful noise of trampling feet we hear ;
My father, looking through the shades with fear,
Cry'd out, ' Haste, haste, my son, the foes are nigh !
Their swords and shining armour I descry.'
Some hostile god, for some unknown offence,
Had sure bereft my mind of better sense :
For while, through winding ways, I took my flight,
And sought the shelter of the gloomy night,
Alas ! I lost Creusa : hard to tell
If by her fatal destiny she fell,
Or weary sat, or wander'd with affright ;
But she was lost for ever to my sight.
I knew not, or reflected, till I meet
My friends, at Ceres' now-deserted seat :
We met : not one was wanting, only she
Deceiv'd her friends, her son, and wretched me.
What mad expressions did my tongue refuse !
Whom did I not of gods or men accuse !
' This was the fatal blow, that pain'd me more
Than all I felt from ruin'd Troy before.
Stung with my loss, and raving with despair,
Abandoning my now-forgotten care,
Of counsel, comfort, and of hope bereft,
My sire, my son, my country-gods, I left.
In shining armour once again I sheath
My limbs, not feeling wounds, nor fearing death.
Then headlong to the burning walls I run,
And seek the danger I was forc'd to shun.
I tread my former tracks : through night explore
Each passage, every street I cross'd before.
All things were full of horror and affright,
And dreadful ev'n the silence of the night.
Then to my father's house I make repair,
With some small glimpse of hope to find her there :
Instead of her, the cruel Greeks I met :
The house was fill'd with foes, with flames beset.
Driven on the wings of winds, whole sheets of fire,
Through air transported, to the roofs aspire.
From thence to Priam's palace I resort,
And search the citadel, and desert court.
Then, unobserv'd, I pass'd by Juno's church ;
A guard of Grecians had possess'd the porch ;
There Phoenix and Ulysses watch the prey,
And thither all the wealth of Troy convey.
The spoils which they from ransack'd houses brought,
And golden bowls from burning altars caught.
The tables of the gods, the purple vests,
The peoples' treasure, and the pomp of priests.
A rank of wretched youths, with pinion'd hands,
And captive matrons, in long order stands.
Then, with ungovern'd madness, I proclaim,
Through all the silent streets, Creusa's name.
Creusa still I call : at length she hears ;
-And, sudden, thro' the shades of night appears.
Appears no more Creusa, nor my wife,
But a pale spectre, larger than the life.
Aghast, astonish'd, and struck dumb with fear,
I stood ; like bristles rose my stiffen'd hair,
Then thus the ghost began to soothe my grief :
' Nor tears, nor cries, can give the dead relief ;
Desist, my much-lov'd lord, t' indulge your pain ;
You bear no more than what the gods ordain.
My fates permit me not from hence to fly ;
Nor he, the great comptroller of the sky.
Long wandering ways for you the powers decree :
On land hard labours, and a length of sea.
Then, after many painful years are past,
On Latium's happy shore you shall be cast :

Where gentle Tyber from his bed beholds
 The flowery meadows, and the fœding folds.
 There end your toils: and there your fates provide
 A quiet kingdom, and a royal bride:
 There fortune shall the Trojan line restore;
 And you for lost Crœusa weep no more.
 Fear not that I shall watch, with servile shame,
 Th' imperious looks of some proud Grecian dame:
 Or, stooping to the victor's lust, disgrace
 My goddess-mother, or my royal race.
 And now farewell: the parent of the gods
 Restrains my fleeting soul in her abodes:
 I trust our common issue to your care.
 She said: and gliding pass'd unseen in air,
 I strove to speak, but horror ty'd my tongue;
 And thrice about her neck my arms I flung:
 And, thrice deceiv'd, on vain embraces hung.
 Light as an empty dream at break of day,
 Or as a blast of wind, she rush'd away.

" Thus, having pass'd the night in fruitless pain,
 I to my longing friends return again.
 Amaz'd th' augmented number to behold,
 Of men and matrons mix'd, of young and old:
 A wretched exil'd crew together brought,
 With arms appointed, and with treasure fraught.
 Resolv'd, and willing under my command,
 To run all hazards both of sea and land.
 The Morn began, from Ida, to display
 Her rosy cheeks, and Phosphor led the day:
 Before the gates the Grecians took their post:
 And all pretence of late relief were lost.
 I yield to fate, unwillingly retire,
 And, loaded, up the hill convey my sire."

THE THIRD BOOK OF
 THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

ÆNEAS proceeds in his relation: he gives an account of the fleet with which he sail'd, and the success of his first voyage to Thrace; from thence he directs his course to Delos, and asks the oracle what place the gods had appointed for his habitation? By a mistake of the oracle's answer, he settles in Crete: his household gods give him the true sense of the oracle in a dream: he follows their advice, and makes the best of his way for Italy: he is cast on several shores, and meets with very surprising adventures, till at length he lands on Sicily: where his father Anchises dies. This is the place he was sailing from, when the tempest rose, and threw him upon the Carthaginian coast.

" WHEN Heaven had overturn'd the Trojan state,
 And Priam's throne, by too severe a fate:
 When ruin'd Troy became the Grecians' prey,
 And Ilium's lofty towers in ashes lay:
 Warn'd by celestial omens, we retreat,
 To seek in foreign lands a happier seat.
 Near old Antandros, and at Ida's foot,
 The timber of the sacred groves we cut;
 And build our fleet: uncertain yet to find
 What place the gods for our repose assign'd.

Friends daily flock, and scarce the kindly spring
 Began to clothe the ground, and birds to sing:
 When old Anchises summon'd all to sea:
 The crew, my father, and the fates obey.
 With sighs and tears I leave my native shore,
 And empty fields, where Ilium stood before.
 My sire, my son, our less and greater gods,
 Shall sail at once; and cleave the briny floods.

" Against our coast appears a spacious land,
 Which once the fierce Lycurgus did command:
 Thracia the name; the people bold in war;
 Vast are their fields, and tillage is their care.
 A hospitable realm, while fate was kind;
 With Troy in friendship and religion join'd.
 I land, with luckless omens; then adore
 Their gods, and draw a line along the shore:
 I lay the deep foundations of a wall:
 And Enos, nam'd from me, the city call
 To Dionæan Venus vows are paid,
 And all the powers that rising labours aid;
 A bull on Jove's imperial altar laid.
 Not far, a rising hillock stood in view;
 Sharp myrtles, on the sides, and cornels, grew.
 There, while I went to crop the sylvan scene,
 And shade our altar with their leafy greens,
 I pull'd a plant (with horrour I relate
 A prodigy so strange, and full of fate),
 The rooted fibres rose; and from the wound,
 Black bloody drops distill'd upon the ground.
 Mute, and amaz'd, my hair with terror stood:
 Fear shrunk my sinews, and congeal'd my blood:
 Mann'd once again, another plant I try,
 That other gush'd with the same sanguine dye.
 Then, fearing guilt for some offence unknown,
 With prayers and vows the Dryads I atone;
 With all the sisters of the woods, and mosf
 The god of arms, who rules the Thracian coast:
 That they, or he, these omens would avert;
 Release our fears, and better signs impart.
 Clear'd, as I thought, and fully fix'd at length
 To learn the cause, I tugg'd with all my strength:
 I bent my knees against the ground; once more
 The violated myrtle ran with gore.
 Scarce dare I tell the sequel: from the womb
 Of wounded earth, and caverns of the tomb,
 A groan, as of a troubled ghost, renew'd
 My fright, and then these dreadful words ensued:
 ' Why dost thou thus my bury'd body rend?
 O spare the corpse of thy unhappy friend!
 Spare to pollute thy pious hands with blood:
 The tears distil not from the wounded wood;
 But every drop this living tree contains
 Is kindred blood, and ran in Trojan veins:
 O fly from this inhospitable shore,
 Warn'd by my fate; for I am Polydore!
 Here loads of lances, in my blood embru'd,
 Again shoot upward, by my blood renew'd.'

" My faltering tongue and shivering limbs declare
 My horrour, and in bristles rose my hair.
 When Troy with Grecian arms was closely pent,
 Old Priam, fearful of the war's event,
 This hapless Polydore to Thracia sent.
 Loaded with gold, he sent his darling far
 From noise and tumults, and destructive war:
 Committed to the faithless tyrant's care:
 Who, when he saw the power of Troy decline,
 Forsook the weaker, with the strong to join:
 Broke every bond of nature, and of truth:
 And murder'd, for his wealth, the royal youth.

O sacred hunger of pernicious gold,
 What bands of faith can impious lucre hold !
 Now, when my soul had shaken off her fears,
 I call my father, and the Trojan peers :
 Relate the prodigies of Heaven, require
 What he commands, and their advice desire.
 All vote to leave that execrable shore,
 Polluted with the blood of Polydore.
 But ere we sail, his funeral rites prepare ;
 Then, to his ghost, a tomb and altars rear.
 In mournful pomp the matrons walk the round :
 With baleful cypress and blue fillets crown'd ;
 With eyes dejected, and with hair unbound.
 Then bowls of tepid milk and blood we pour,
 And thrice invoke the soul of Polydore.

" Now when the raging storms no longer reign ;
 But southern gales invite us to the main ;
 We lanch our vessels, with a prosperous wind ;
 And leave the cities and the shores behind.

" An island in th' Ægean main appears ;
 Neptune and watery Doris claim it theirs.
 It floated once, till Phœbus fix'd the sides
 To rooted earth, and now it braves the tides.
 Here, borne by friendly winds, we come ashore,
 With needful ease our weary limbs restore :
 And the Sun's temple and his town adore.

" Anius the priest, and king, with laurel crown'd,
 His hoary locks with purple fillets bound,
 Who saw my sire the Delian shore ascend,
 Came forth with eager haste to meet his friend :
 Invites him to his palace : and, in sign
 Of ancient love, their plighted hands they join.
 Then to the temple of the god I went ;
 And thus before the shrine my vows present :

' Give, O Thymbræus ! give a resting-place
 To the sad relics of the Trojan race :
 A seat secure, a region of thy own,
 A lasting empire, and a happier town.
 Where shall we fix, where shall our labours end,
 Whom shall we follow, and what fate attend ?
 Let not my prayers a doubtful answer find,
 But in clear auguries unveil thy mind.'
 Scarce had I said ; he shook the holy ground,
 The laurels, and the lofty hills around :
 And from the tripod rush'd a bellowing sound.
 Prostrata we fell, confess'd the present god ;
 Who gives this answer from his dark abode :

' Undaunted youths, go seek that mother Earth
 From which your ancestors derive their birth,
 The soil that sent you forth, her ancient race,
 In her old bosom, shall again embrace.
 Through the wide world th' Æneian house shall reign,

And children's children shall the crown sustain.'
 Thus Phœbus did our future fates disclose :
 A mighty tumult, mix'd with joy, arose.

" All are concern'd to know what place the god
 Assign'd, and where determin'd our abode.
 My father, long revolving in his mind
 The race and lineage of the Trojan kind,
 Thus answer'd their demands : ' Ye princes, hear
 Your pleasing fortune ; and dispel your fear.
 The fruitful isle of Crete, well known to fame,
 Sacred of old to Jove's imperial name,
 In the mid ocean lies with large command ;
 And on its plains a hundred cities stand.
 Another Ida rises there ; and we
 From thence derive our Trojan ancestry.
 From thence, as 'tis divulg'd by certain fame,
 To the Rhætean shores old Tæucer came :

There fix'd, and there the seat of empire chose,
 Ere Ilium and the Trojan towers arose.

In humble vales they built their soft abodes :
 Till Cybele, the mother of the gods,
 With tinkling cymbals, charm'd th' Idean woods.
 She secret rites and ceremonies taught,
 And to the yoke the savage lions brought.
 Let us the land, which Heaven appoints, explore ;
 Appease the winds, and seek the Gnosian shore.
 If Jove assist the passage of our fleet,
 The third propitious dawn discovers Crete.'

Thus having said, the sacrifices, laid
 On smoking altars, to the gods he paid,
 A bull to Neptune, an oblation due,
 Another bull to bright Apollo slew :
 A milk-white ewe the western winds to please :
 And one coal-black to calm the stormy seas.
 Ere this, a flying rumour had been spread,
 That fierce Idomeneus from Crete was fled ;
 Expell'd and exil'd ; that the coast was free
 From foreign or domestic enemy :
 We leave the Delian ports, and put to sea.
 By Naxos, fam'd for vintage, make our way :
 Then green Donyssa pass ; and sail in sight
 Of Paros isle, with marble quarries white.
 We pass the scatter'd isles of Cyclades,
 That, scarce distinguish'd, seem to stud the seas,
 The shouts of sailors double near the shores ;
 They stretch their canvass, and they ply their oars.
 ' All hands aloft, for Crete, for Crete !' they cry,
 And swiftly through the foaming billows fly.
 Full on the promis'd land at length we bore,
 With joy descending on the Cretan shore.

With eager haste a rising town I frame,
 Which from the Trojan Pergamus I name :
 The name itself was grateful ; I exhort
 To found their houses, and erect a fort.
 Our ships are haul'd upon the yellow strand :
 The youth begin to till the labour'd land.
 And I myself new marriages promote,
 Give laws, and dwellings I divide by lot.
 When rising vapours choke the wholesome air,
 And blasts of noisome winds corrupt the year :
 The trees, devouring caterpillars burn :
 Parch'd was the grass, and blighted was the corn.
 Nor scape the beasts : for Sirius from on high
 With pestilential heat infects the sky :
 My men, some fall, the rest in fevers fry.
 Again my father bids me seek the shore
 Of sacred Delos, and the god implore :
 To learn what end of woes we might expect,
 And to what clime our weary course direct.

" 'Twas night, when every creature, void of cares,
 The common gift of balmy slumber shares .
 The statues of my gods (for such they seem'd)
 Those gods whom I from flaming Troy redeem'd,
 Before me stood ; majestic bright,
 Full in the beams of Phœbe's entering light.
 Then thus they spoke, and eas'd my troubled mind :
 ' What from the Delian god thou go'st to find,
 He tells thee here ; and sends us to relate :
 Those powers are we, companions of thy fate,
 Who from the burning town by thee were brought ;
 Thy fortune follow'd, and thy safety wrought.
 Through seas and lands as we thy steps attend,
 So shall our care thy glorious race befriend.
 An ample realm for thee thy fates ordain :
 A town, that o'er the conquer'd world shall reign.
 Thou mighty walls for mighty nations build ;
 Nor let thy weary mind to labours yield :

But, change thy seat : for not the Delian god,
 Nor we, have giv'n thee Crete for our abode.
 A land there is, Hesperia call'd of old,
 The soil is fruitful, and the natives bold.
 Th' Ænœtrians held it once ; by later fame,
 Now call'd Italia from the leader's name.
 Jasius there, and Dardanus were born :
 From thence we came, and thither must return.
 Rise, and the sire with these glad tidings greet ;
 Search Italy, for Jove denies thee Crete.
 " Astonish'd at their voices, and their sight, (Nor were they dreams, but visions of the night ;
 I saw, I knew their faces, and deserv'd
 In perfect view their hair with fillets ty'd) ;
 I started from my couch, and clammy sweat
 On all my limbs and shivering body sat.
 To Heaven I lift my hands with pious haste,
 And sacred incense in the flames I cast.
 Thus to the gods their perfect honours done,
 More cheerful to my good old sire I run,
 And tell the pleasing news : in little space
 He found his error of the double race.
 Not, as before he deem'd, deriv'd from Crete ;
 No more deluded by the doubtful seat.
 Then said, ' O son ! turnoil'd in Trojan fate,
 Such things as these Cassandra did relate ;
 This day revives within my mind, what she Foretold of Troy renew'd in Italy,
 And Latian lands : but who could then have thought
 That Phrygian gods to Latium should be brought ?
 Or who believ'd what mad Cassandra taught ?
 Now let us go, where Phoebus leads the way,'
 He said, and we with glad consent obey :
 Forsake the seat ; and, leaving few behind,
 We spread our sails before the willing wind.
 Now from the sight of land our gallees move,
 With only seas around, and skies above.
 When o'er our heads descends a burst of rain,
 And night, with sable clouds, involves the main ;
 The ruffling winds the foamy billows raise ;
 The scatter'd fleet is forc'd to several ways ;
 The face of Heaven is ravish'd from our eyes,
 And, in redoubled peals, the roaring thunder flies.
 Cast from our course, we wander in the dark ;
 No stars to guide, no point of land to mark.
 Ev'n Palinurus no distinction found [around.
 Betwixt the night and day, such darkness reign'd
 Three starless nights the doubtful navy strays
 Without distinction, and three sunless days.
 The fourth renews the light, and, from our shrouds,
 We view a rising land like distant clouds ;
 The mountain-tops confirm the pleasing sight,
 And curling smoke ascending from their height.
 The canvass falls, their oars the sailors ply,
 From the rude strokes the whirling waters fly.
 At length I land upon the Strophades,
 Safe from the danger of the stormy seas :
 Those isles are compass'd by th' Æonian main,
 The dire abode where the foul harpies reign :
 Forc'd by the winged warriors to repair
 To their old homes, and leave their costly fare.
 Monsters more fierce, offended Heaven ne'er sent
 From Hell's abyss, for human punishment,
 With virgin-faces, but with wombs obscene,
 Foul paunches, and with ordure still unclean :
 With claws for hands, and looks for ever lean.
 " We landed at the port, and soon beheld
 Fat herds of oxen graze the flowery field ;
 And wanton goats without a keeper stray'd ;
 With weapons we the welcome prey invade.

Then call the gods for partners of our feast :
 And Jove himself the chief invited guest.
 We spread the tables on the greensward ground :
 We feed with hunger, and the bowls go round :
 When from the mountain tops, with hideous cry,
 And clattering wings, the hungry harpies fly :
 They snatch the meat, defiling all they find ;
 And, parting, leave a loathsome stench behind,
 Close by a hollow rook again we sit,
 New-dress the dinner, and the beds refit ;
 Secure from sight, beneath a pleasing shade,
 Where tufted trees a native arbour made.
 Again th' holy fires on altars burn,
 And once again the ravenous birds return :
 Or from the dark recesses where they lie,
 Or from another quarter of the sky ;
 With filthy claws their odious meal repeat,
 And mix their loathsome ordures with their meat.
 I bid my friends for vengeance then prepare,
 And with the bellish nation wage the war.
 They, as commanded, for the fight provide,
 And in the grass their glittering weapons hide :
 Then, when along the crooked shore we hear
 Their clattering wings, and saw the foes appear,
 Misenus sounds a charge : we take th' alarm,
 And our strong hands with swords and bucklers
 In this new kind of combat all employ [arm.
 Their utmost force the monsters to destroy.
 In vain ; the fated skin is proof to wounds :
 And, from their plumes, the shining sword rebound'd.
 At length, rebuff'd, they leave their mangled prey,
 And their stretch'd pinions to the skies display.
 Yet one remain'd the messenger of fate,
 High on the craggy cliffs Celeno sat,
 And thus her dismal errand did relate :
 ' What, not contented with our oxen slain,
 Dare you with Heaven an impious war maintain,
 And drive the harpies from their native reign ?
 Heed, therefore, what I say, and keep in mind
 What Jove decrees, what Phoebus has design'd :
 And I, the fury's queen, from both relate :
 You seek th' Italian shores, foredoom'd by fate :
 Th' Italian shores are granted you to find,
 And a safe passage to the port assign'd.
 But know, that ere your promis'd walls you build,
 My curses shall severely be fulfill'd.
 Fierce famine is your lot, for this misdeed,
 Reduc'd to grind the plates on which you feed.'
 She said, and to the neighbouring forest flew :
 Our courage fails us, and our fears renew.
 Hopeless to win by war, to prayers we fall,
 And on th' offended harpies humbly call.
 And whether gods or birds obscene they were,
 Our vows for pardon and for peace prefer.
 But old Anchises, offering sacrifice,
 And lifting up to Heaven his hands and eyes,
 Ador'd the greater gods : ' Avert,' said he,
 ' These omens ; render vain this prophecy ;
 And, from th' impending curse, a pious people free.'
 Thus having said, he bids us put to sea ;
 We loose from shore our hausers, and obey.
 And soon, with swelling sails, pursue our watery way.
 Amidst our course Zacynthian woods appear ;
 And next by rocky Neritos we steer :
 We fly from Ithaca's detested shore,
 And curse the land which dire Ulysses bore.
 At length Leucate's cloudy top appear,
 And the Sun's temple, which the sailor fears

Resolv'd to breathe a while from labour past,
 Our crooked anchors from the prow we cast,
 And joyful to the little city haste.
 Here safe, beyond our hopes, our vows we pay
 To Jove, the guide and patron of our way,
 The customs of our country we pursue,
 And Trojan games on Actian shores renew.
 Our youth their naked limbs besmear with oil,
 And exercise the wrestlers' noble toil.
 Pleas'd to have sail'd so long before the wind,
 And left so many Grecian towns behind.
 The Sun had now fulfill'd his annual course,
 And Boreas on the seas display'd his force :
 I fix'd upon the temple's lofty door
 The brazen shield which vanquish'd Abas bore :
 The verse beneath my name and action speaks,
 ' These arms Æneas took from conquering Greece :'
 Then I command to weigh ; the seamen ply
 Their sweeping oars, the smoking billows fly.
 The sight of high Phœacia soon we lost,
 And skimm'd along Epirus' rocky coast.
 Then to Chaonia's port our course we bend,
 And, landed, to Buthrotus' heights ascend.
 Here wondrous things were loudly blaz'd by fame,
 How Helenus reviv'd the Trojan name,
 And reign'd in Greece : that Priam's captive son
 Succeeded Pyrrhus in his bed and throne.
 And fair Andromache, restor'd by fate,
 Once more was happy in a Trojan mate.
 I leave my gallees riding in the port,
 And long to see the new Dardanian court.
 By chance, the mournful queen, before the gate,
 Then solemniz'd her former husband's fate.
 Green altars, rais'd of turf, with gifts she crown'd
 And sacred priests in order stand around,
 And thrice the name of hapless Hector sound.
 The grove itself resembles Ida's wood,
 And Simois seem'd the well-dissembled flood.
 But when, at nearer distance, she beheld
 My shining armour, and my Trojan shield,
 Astonish'd at the sight, the vital heat
 Forsakes her limbs, her veins no longer beat :
 She faints, she falls ; and, scarce recovering strength, [length :
 Thus, with a faltering tongue, she speaks at
 " Are you alive, O goddess-born !' she said,
 ' Or if a ghost, then where is Hector's shade ?'
 At this she cast a loud and frightful cry :
 With broken words I made this brief reply :
 ' All of me that remains appears in sight.
 I live ; if living be to loath the light.
 No phantom ; but I drag a wretched life ;
 My fate resembling that of Hector's wife.
 What have you suffer'd since you lost your lord ?
 By what strange blessings are you now restor'd ?
 Still are you Hector's, or is Hector fled,
 And his remembrance lost in Pyrrhus' bed ?
 With eyes dejected, in a lowly tone,
 After a modest pause, she thus begun :
 ' Oh only happy maid of Priam's race,
 Whom death deliver'd from the foe's embrace !
 Commanded on Achilles' tomb to die,
 Not forc'd, like us, to hard captivity ;
 Or in a haughty master's arms to lie.
 In Grecian ships unhappy we were borne :
 Endur'd the victor's lust ; sustain'd the scorn :
 Thus I submitted to the lawless pride
 Of Pyrrhus, more a handmaid than a bride.
 Cloy'd with possession, he forsook my bed,
 And Helen's lovely daughter sought to wed.

Then me to Trojan Helenus resign'd :
 And his two slaves in equal marriage join'd.
 Till young Orestes, pierc'd with deep despair,
 And longing to redeem the promis'd fair,
 Before Apollo's altar slew the ravisher.
 By Pyrrhus' death the kingdom we regain'd :
 At least one half with Helenus remain'd ;
 Our part, from Chaon, he Chaonia calls :
 And names, from Pergamus, his rising walls.
 But you, what fates have landed on our coast,
 What gods have sent you, or what storms have toss'd ?
 Does young Ascanius life and health enjoy,
 Sav'd from the ruins of unhappy Troy ?
 O tell me how his mother's loss he bears,
 What hopes are promis'd from his blooming years,
 How much of Hector in his face appears ?'
 She spoke : and mix'd her speech with mournful
 cries :
 And fruitless tears came trickling from her eyes.
 At length her lord descends upon the plain,
 In pomp attended with a numerous train :
 Receives his friends, and to the city leads,
 And tears of joy amidst his welcome sheds.
 Proceeding on, another Troy I see ;
 Or, in less compass, Troy's epitome.
 A rivulet by the name of Xanthus ran :
 And I embrace the Scæan gate again.
 My friends in porticos were entertain'd,
 And feasts and pleasures through the city reign'd.
 The tables fill'd the spacious hall around,
 And golden bowls with sparkling wine were crown'd.
 Two days we pass'd in mirth, till friendly gales,
 Blown from the south, supply'd our swelling sails.
 Then to the royal acer I thus began :
 ' O thou, who know'st, beyond the reach of man,
 The laws of Heaven, and what the stars decree,
 Whom Phœbus taught th' unerring prophecy,
 From his own tripod, and his holy tree :
 Skill'd in the wing'd inhabitants of air,
 What auspices their notes and flights declare :
 O say ; for all religious rites portend
 A happy voyage, and a prosperous end ;
 And every power and omen of the sky
 Direct my course for destin'd Italy.
 But only dire Celæno, from the gods,
 A dismal famine fatally forebodes :
 O say what dangers I am first to shun,
 What toils to vanquish, and what course to run.'
 " The prophet first with sacrifice adores
 The greater gods ; their pardon then implores :
 Unbinds the fillet from his holy head ;
 To Phœbus next my trembling steps he led,
 Full of religious doubts and awful dread.
 Then, with his god possess'd, before the shrine,
 These words proceeded from his mouth divine :
 ' O goddess-born (for Heaven's appointed will,
 With greater auspices of god than ill,
 Foreshows thy voyage, and thy course directs ;
 Thy fates conspire, and Jove himself protects) :
 Of many things, some few I shall explain,
 Teach thee to shun the dangers of the main,
 And how at length the promis'd shore to gain.
 The rest the Fates from Helenus conceal ;
 And Juno's angry power forbids to tell.
 First then, that happy shore, that seems so nigh,
 Will far from you deluded wishes fly :
 Long tracts of seas divide your hopes from Italy.
 For you must cruise along Sicilian shores,
 And stem the currents with your struggling oar :

Then round th' Italian coast your navy steer,
And, after this, to Circe's island veer.
And last, before your new foundations rise,
Must pass the Stygian lake, and view the nether
skies.

Now mark the signs of future ease and rest,
And bear them safely treasur'd in thy breast.
When in the shady shelter of a wood,
And near the margin of a gentle flood,
Thou shalt behold a sow upon the ground,
With thirty sucking young encompass'd round ;
The dam and offspring white as falling snow :
These on thy city shall their name bestow,
And there shall end thy labour and thy woe.
Nor let the threaten'd famine fright thy mind,
For Phœbus will assist, and fate the way will find.
Let not thy course to that ill coast be bent,
Which fronts from far th' Epirian continent ;
Those parts are all by Grecian foes possess'd :
The savage Locrians here the shores infest.
There fierce Idomeneus his city builds,
And guards, with arms, the Salentinian fields.
And on the mountain's brow Petilia stands,
Which Philoctetes with his troops commands.
Evn when thy fleet is landed on the shore,
And priests with holy vows the gods adore ;
Then with a purple veil involve your eyes ;
Lest hostile faces blast the sacrifice.
These rites and customs to the rest commend,
That to your pious race they may descend.

“ ‘ When parted hence, the wind that ready
For Sicily, shall bear you to the straits: [waits
Where proud Pelorus opens a wider way,
Tack to the larboard, and stand off to sea :
Veer starboard sea and land. Th' Italian shore,
And fair Sicilia's coast were one, before
An earthquake caus'd the flaw, the roaring tides
The passage broke, and land from land divides :
And where the lands retir'd, the rushing ocean rides.

Distinguish'd by the straits, on either hand,
Now rising cities in long order stand,
And fruitful fields (so much can time invade
The mouldering work that beauteous Nature made).
Far on the right, her dogs foul Scylla hides :
Charybdis roaring on the left presides ;
And in her greedy whirlpool sucks the tides :
Then spouts them from below ; with fury driven,
The waves mount up, and wash the face of Heaven.

But Scylla from her den, with open jaws,
The sinking vessel in her eddy draws ;
Then clashes on the rocks : a human face,
And virgin-bosom, hides her tail's disgrace.
Her parts obscene below the waves descend,
With dogs enclos'd, and in a dolphin end.
'Tis safer, then, to bear aloof to sea,
And coast Pachynus, though with more delay ;
Than once to view mishapen Scylla near,
And the loud yell of watery wolves to hear.

“ ‘ Besides, if faith to Helenus be due,
And if prophetic Phœbus tell me true,
Do not this precept of your friend forget :
Which therefore more than once I must repeat.
Above the rest great Juno's name adore :
Pay vows to Juno ; Juno's aid implore.
Let gifts be to the mighty queen design'd ;
And mollify with prayers her haughty mind,
Thus, at the length, your passage shall be free,
And you shall safe descend on Italy.

Arriv'd at Cumæ, when you view the flood
Of black Avernus, and the sounding wood,
The mad prophetic Sibyl you shall find,
Dark in a cave, and on a rock reclin'd.
She sings the fates, and in her frantic fits,
The notes and names inscrib'd, to leaves commits.
What she commits to leaves, in order laid,
Before the cavern's entrance are display'd :
Unmov'd they lie : but if a blast of wind
Without, or vapours issue from behind,
The leaves are borne aloft in liquid air,
And she resumes no more her museful care :
Nor gathers from the rocks her scatter'd verse :
Nor sets in order what the winds disperse.
Thus, many not succeeding, most upraid
The madness of the visionary maid ;
A wail, with loud curses, leave the mystic shade :
“ ‘ Think it not loss of time awhile to stay :
Though thy companions chide thy long delay,
Though summon'd to the seas, though pleasing
gales

Invite thy course, and stretch thy swelling sails,
But beg the sacred priestess to relate
With swelling words, and not to write thy fate.
The fierce Italian people she will show ;
And all thy wars and all thy future woe ; [dega.
And what thou may'st avoid, and what must un-
She shall direct thy course ; instruct thy mind ;
And teach thee how the happy shores to find.
This is what Heaven allows me to relate :
Now part in peace ; pursue thy better fate,
And raise, by strength of arms, the Trojan state.'
“ This when the priest with friendly voice declar'd,
He gave me licence, and rich gifts prepar'd :
Bounteous of treasure, he supply'd my want
With heavy gold, and polish'd elephant.
Then Dodonæan caldrons put on board,
And every ship with sums of silver stor'd.
A trusty coat of mail to me he sent,
Thrice chain'd with gold, for use and ornament :
The helm of Pyrrhus added to the rest,
Then flourish'd with a plume and waving crest.
Nor was my sire forgotten, nor my friends :
And large recruits he to my navy sends ;
Men, horses, captains, arms, and warlike stores :
Supplies new pilots, and new sweeping oars.
Meantime my sire commands to hoist our sails :
Lest we should lose the first auspicious gales.
The prophet blest the parting crew : and last,
With words like these, his ancient friend embrac'd :
‘ Old happy man, the care of gods above,
Whom heavenly Venus honour'd with her love,
And twice preserv'd thy life when Troy was lost,
Behold from far the wish'd Ausonian coast :
There land ; but take a larger compass round ;
For that before is all forbidden ground.
The shore that Phœbus has design'd for you,
At farther distance lies, conceal'd from view.
Go happy hence, and seek your new abodes ;
Bless'd in a son, and favour'd by the gods :
For I with useless words prolong your stay,
When southern gales have summon'd you away.'
“ Nor less the queen our parting thence deplo'r'd,
Nor was less bounteous than her Trojan lord.
A noble present to my son she brought,
A robe with flowers on golden tissue wrought ;
A Phrygian vest ; and loads, with gifts beside
Of precious texture, and of Asian pride.
‘ Accept,' she said, ‘ these monuments of love ;
Which in my youth with happier hands I wove :

Regard these trifles for the giver's sake ;
'Tis the last present Hector's wife can make.
Thou call'st my lost Astyanax to mind :
In thee his features and his form I find.
His eyes so sparkled with a lively flame ;
Such were his motions, such was all his frame ;
And, ah ! had Heaven so pleas'd it, his years had been the same.'

" With tears I took my last adieu, and said,
' Your fortune, happy fair, already made,
Leaves you no farther wish : my different state,
Avoiding one, incurs another fate.
To you a quiet seat the gods allow,
You have no shores to search, no seas to plough,
Nor fields of flying Italy to chase :
(Deluding visions, and a vain embrace !)
You see another Simois, and enjoy
The labour of your hands, another Troy ;
With better auspice than her ancient towers,
And less obnoxious to the Grecian powers.
If e'er the gods, whom I with vows adore,
Conduct my steps to Tiber's happy shore :
If ever I ascend the Latian throne :
And build a city I may call my own,
As both of us our birth from Troy derive,
So let our kindred lives in concord live ;
And both in acts of equal friendship strive.
Our fortunes, good or bad, shall be the same,
The double Troy shall differ but in name :
That what we now begin, may never end ;
But long, to late posterity descend.'

" Near the Ceraunian rocks our course we bore
(The shortest passage to th' Italian shore).
Now had the Sun withdrawn his radiant light,
And hills were hid in dusky shades of night,
We land : and, on the bosom of the ground,
A safe retreat and a bare lodging found ;
Close by the shore we lay ; the sailors keep
Their watches, and the rest securely sleep.
The night, proceeding on with silent pace,
Stood in her noon, and view'd with equal face
Her steepy rise, and her declining race.
Then wakeful Palinurus rose, to spy
The face of Heaven, and the nocturnal sky ;
And listen'd every breath of air to try ;
Observes the stars, and notes their sliding
course,

The Pleiads, Hyads, and their watery force ;
And both the Bears is careful to behold ;
And bright Orion arm'd with burnish'd gold.
Then, when he saw no threatening tempest nigh,
But a sure promise of a settled sky ;
He gave the sign to weigh : we break our sleep ;
Forsake the pleasing shore, and plough the deep.
And now the rising morn, with rosy light,
Adorns the skies, and puts the stars to flight :
When we from far, like bluish mists, descry
The hills, and then the plains of Italy.
Achates first pronounc'd the joyful sound ;
Then Italy the cheerful crew rebound ;
My sire Anchises crown'd a cup with wine,
And offering, thus implor'd the powers divine :
' Ye gods, presiding over lands and seas,
And you who raging winds and waves appease,
Breathe on our swelling sails a prosperous wind,
And smooth our passage to the port assign'd.
The gentle gales their flagging force renew ;
And now the happy harbour is in view.
Minerva's temple thence salutes our sight ;
Plac'd as a landmark, on the mountain's height ;

We furl our sails, and turn the prows to shore ;
The curling waters round the galleys rear ;
The land lies open to the raging east,
Then, bending like a bow, with rocks compress,
Shuts out the storms ; the winds and waves com-
And vent their malice on the cliffs in vain. [plain,
The port lies hid within ; on either side
Two towering rocks the narrow mouth divide.
The temple, which aloft we view'd before,
To distance flies, and seems to shun the shore.
Scarce landed, the first omens I beheld [field.
Were four white steeds that croup'd the flowery
' War, war is threaten'd from this foreign ground,'
(My father cry'd) ' where warlike steeds are found.
Yet, since reclaim'd to chariots they submit,
And bend to stubborn yokes, and champ the bit,
Peace may succeed to war.' Our way we bend
To Pallas, and the sacred hills ascend.
There prostrate to the fierce virago pray ;
Whose temple was the land-mark of our way.
Each with a Phrygian mantle veil'd his head ;
And all commands of Helenus obey'd ;
And pious rites to Grecian Juno paid. [stand
These dues perform'd, we stretch our sails, and
To sea, forsaking that suspected land.
From hence Tarentum's bay appears in view ;
For Hercules renown'd, if fame be true.
Just opposite, Lacinian Juno stands :
Caulonian towers, and Scyllacæan strands
For shipwrecks fear'd : Mount Ætna thence we spy,
Known by the smoky flames which cloud the sky.
Far off we hear the waves with surly sound
Invade the rocks, the rocks their groans rebound.
The billows break upon the sounding strand ;
And roll the rising tide, impure with sand.
Then thus Anchises, in experience old,
' 'Tis that Charybdis which the seer foretold :
And those the promis'd rocks ; bear off to sea :'
With haste the frighted mariners obey.
First Palinurus to the harbour veer'd ;
Then all the fleet by his example steer'd.
To Heaven aloft on rigid waves we ride ;
Then down to Hell descend, when they divide.
And thrice our galleys knock'd the stony ground,
And thrice the hollow rocks return'd the sound,
And thrice we saw the stars, that stood with dew's
around.

The flagging winds forsook us with the Sun ;
And, weary'd, on Cyclopean shores we run.
The port capacious, and secure from wind,
Is to the foot of thundering Ætna join'd.
By turns a pitchy cloud she rolls on high ;
By turns hot embers from her entrails fly ;
And flakes of mountain flames, that lick the sky.
Oft from her bowels massy rocks are thrown,
And shiver'd by the force come piece-meal down.
Oft liquid lakes of burning sulphur flow,
Fed from the fiery springs that burn below.
Enceladus, they say, transfix'd by Jove,
With blasted limbs came trembling from above :
And when he fell, th' avenging father drew
This flaming bill, and on his body threw :
As often as he turns his weary sides, [hides.
He shakes the solid isle, and smoke the Heavens
In shady woods we pass the tedious night,
Where bellowing sounds and groans our souls
affright ;

Of which no cause is offered to the sight.
For not one star was kindled in the sky ;
Nor could the Moon her borrow'd light supply :

For misty clouds invol'd the firmament ;
The stars were muffled, and the Moon was pent.
Scarce had the rising Sun the day reveal'd ;
Scarce had his heat the pearly-dews dispell'd ;
When from the woods there bolts, before our sight,
Somewhat betwixt a mortal and a sprite.
So thin, so ghastly meagre, and so wan,
So bare of flesh, he scarce resembled man.
This thing, all tatter'd, seem'd from far t' explore
Our pious aid, and pointed to the shore.
We look behind ; then view his shaggy beard ;
His clothes were tagg'd with thorns, and filth his limbs besmear'd ;

The rest, in mien, in habit, and in face,
Appear'd a Greek, and such indeed he was.
He cast on us, from far, a frightful view,
Whom soon for Trojans and for foes he knew :
Stood still, and paus'd ; thence all at once began
To stretch his limbs, and trembled as he ran,
Soon as approach'd, upon his knees he falls,
And thus, with tears and sighs, for pity calls :
" Now by the powers above and what we share
From Nature's common gift, this vital air,
O Trojans, take me hence ; I beg no more,
But bear me far from this unhappy shore !
'Tis true, I am a Greek, and farther own,
Among your foes besieg'd th' imperial town ;
For such demerits if my death be due,
No more for this abandon'd life I sue :
This only favour let my tears obtain,
To throw me headlong in the rapid main :
Since nothing more than death my crime demands :
I die content, to die by human hands."
He said, and on his knees my knees embrac'd :
I bade him boldly tell his fortune past ;
His present state, his lineage, and his name ;
Th' occasion of his fears, and whence he came.
The good Anchises rais'd him with his hand ;
Who, thus encourag'd, answer'd our demand :
" From Ithaca my native soil I came
To Troy, and Achaemenides my name.
Me, my poor father with Ulysses sent ;
(Oh had I stay'd with poverty content !)
But, fearful for themselves, my countrymen
Left me forsaken in the Cyclops' den.
The cave, though large, was dark ; the dismal floor

Was pav'd with mangled limbs and putrid gore.
Our monstrous host, of more than human size,
Erects his head, and stares within the skies,
Bellowing his voice, and horrid is his hue.
Ye gods, remove this plague from mortal view !
The joints of slaughter'd wretches are his food :
And for his wine he quaffs the streaming blood.
These eyes beheld, when with his spacious hand
He seiz'd two captives of our Grecian band ;
Stretch'd on his back, he dash'd against the stones
Their broken bodies, and their crackling bones :
With spouting blood the purple pavement swims,
While the dire glutton grinds the trembling limbs.
Not unreveng'd, Ulysses bore their fate
Nor thoughtless of his own unhappy state ;
Fer, gorg'd with flesh, and drunk with human wine,
While fast asleep the giant lay supine :
Snoring aloud, and belching from his maw
His indigested foam, and morsels raw :
We pray, we cast the lots, and then surround
The monstrous body, stretch'd along the ground :
Each, as he could approach him, lends a hand
To bore his eyeball with a flaming brand :

Beneath his frowning forehead lay his eye
(For only one did the vast frame supply) ;
But that a globe so large, his front it fill'd,
Like the Sun's disk, or like a Grecian shield.
The stroke succeeds ; and down the pupil bends ;
This vengeance follow'd for our slaughter'd friends.
But haste, unhappy wretches, haste to fly ;
Your cables cut, and on your oars rely.
Such and so vast as Polypheme appears,
A hundred more this hated island bears :
Like him, in caves they shut their woolly sheep ;
Like him, their herds on tops of mountains keep ;
Like him, with mighty strides, they stalk from steep to steep.

And now three moons their sharpen'd horns renew,
Since thus in woods and wilds, obscure from view,
I drag my loathsome days with mortal fright ;
And, in deserted caverns, lodge by night.
Off from the rocks a dreadful prospect see
Of the huge Cyclops, like a walking tree :
From far I hear his thundering voice resound ;
And trampling feet that shake the solid ground.
Cornels, and savage berries of the wood,
And roots, and herbs, have been my meagre food.
" While all around my longing eyes are cast,
I saw your happy ships appear at last :
On those I fix'd my hopes, to these I run,
'Tis all I ask, this cruel race to shun :
What other death you please yourselves, bestow,
Scarce had he said, when, on the mountain's brow,
We saw the giant-shepherd stalk before
His following flock, and leading to the shore,
A monstrous bulk, deforms'd, depriv'd of sight,
His staff a trunk of pine to guide his steps aright,
His ponderous whistle from his neck descends ;
His woolly care their pensive lord attends :
This only solace his hard fortune sends.
Soon as he reach'd the shore, and touch'd the waves,
From his bor'd eye the guttering blood he laves :
He gnash'd his teeth and groan'd ; through seas he strides,

And scarce the topmast billows touch his side.
" Seiz'd with a sudden fear, we run to sea,
The cables cut, and silent haste away :
The well-deserving stranger entertain ; [main.
Then, buckling to the work, our oars divide the
The giant hearken'd to the dashing sound :
But when our vessels out of reach he found,
He strided onward ; and in vain essay'd
Th' Ætlian deep, and durst no farther wade.
With that he roar'd aloud : the dreadful cry
Shakes earth, and air, and seas ; the billows fly,
Before the bellowing noise, to distant Italy.
The neighbouring Ætna trembling all around :
The winding caverns echo to the sound.
His brother Cyclops hear the yelling roar :
And, rushing down the mountains, crowd the shore,
We saw their stern distorted looks from far,
And one-eye'd glance, that vainly threaten'd war.
A dreadful council with their heads on high ;
The misty clouds about their foreheads fly :
Not yielding to the towering tree of Jove,
Or tallest cypress of Diana's grove.
New pangs of mortal fear our minds assail,
We tug at every oar, and hoist up every sail ;
And take th' advantage of the friendly gale.
Forewarn'd by Helenus we strive to shun
Charybdis' gulph, nor dare to Soylla run.
An equal fate on either side appears ;
We, tacking to the left, are free from fears :

For from Pelorus' point, the north arose,
 And drove us back where swift Pantagias flows.
 His rocky mouth we pass, and make our way
 By Thapsus, and Megara's winding bay;
 This passage Achæmenides had shown,
 Tracing the course which he before had run.
 Right o'er against Plemmyrium's watery strand
 There lies an isle, once call'd th' Ortygian land:
 Alpheus, as old fame reports, has found
 From Greece a secret passage under ground:
 By love to beauteous Arethusa led, [bed.
 And mingling here, they roll in the same sacred
 As Helenus enjoin'd, we next adore
 Diana's name, protectress of the shore.
 With prosperous gales we pass the quiet sounds
 Of still Ælorus, and his fruitful bounds.
 Then doubling Cape Pachynus, we survey
 The rocky shore extended to the sea.
 The town of Camarine from far we see:
 And fenny lake undrain'd, by fate's decree.
 In sight of the Geloan fields we pass,
 And the large walls, where mighty Gela was:
 Then Agragæ with lofty summits crown'd:
 Long for the race of warlike steeds renown'd;
 We pass Selinus, and the palmy land,
 And widely shun the Lilybean strand,
 Unsafe, for secret rocks, and moving sand.
 At length on shore the weary fleet arriv'd:
 Which Drepanum's unhappy port receiv'd.
 Here, after endless labours, often tost
 By raging storms, and driven on every coast,
 My dear, dear father, spent with age, I lost:
 Ease of my cares and solace of my pain,
 Sav'd through a thousand toils, but sav'd in vain.
 The prophet, who my future woes reveal'd,
 Yet this, the greatest and the worst, conceal'd,
 And dire Cæleus, whose foreboding skill
 Denounc'd all else, was silent of this ill:
 This my last labour was. Some friendly god
 From thence convey'd us to your blest abode."

Thus, to the listening queen, the royal guest
 His wandering course, and all his toils express'd,
 And here concluding, he retir'd to rest.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF
 THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Dido discovers to her sister her passion for Æneas, and her thoughts of marrying him: she prepares a hunting-match for his entertainment. Juno, by Venus's consent, raises a storm, which separates the hunters, and drives Æneas and Dido into the same cave, where their marriage is supposed to be completed. Jupiter dispatches Mercury to Æneas, to warn him from Carthage: Æneas secretly prepares for his voyage: Dido finds out his design; and, to put a stop to it, makes use of her own and her sister's entreaties, and discovers all the variety of passions that are incident to a neglected lover: when nothing would prevail upon him, she contrives her own death, with which this book concludes.

But anxious cares already seiz'd the queen:
 She fed within her veins a flame unseen:

The hero's valour, acts, and birth; inspir'd
 Her soul with love, and fan the secret fire.
 His words, his looks imprinted in her heart,
 Improve the passion, and increase the smart.
 Now when the purple morn had chas'd away
 The dewy shadows, and restor'd the day,
 Her sister first with early care she sought,
 And thus, in mournful accents, eas'd her thoughts
 " My dearest Anna, what new dreams affright
 My labouring soul; what visions of the night
 Disturb my quiet, and distract my breast
 With strange ideas of our Trojan guest?
 His worth, his actions, and majestic air,
 A man descended from the gods declare.
 Fear ever argues a degenerate kind,
 His birth is well asserted by his mind.
 Then what he suffer'd, when by fate betray'd,
 What brave attempts for falling Troy he made!
 Such were his looks, so gracefully he spoke,
 That, were I not resolv'd against the yoke
 Of hapless marriage, never to be curs'd
 With second love, so fatal was my first,
 To this one error I might yield again:
 For since Siohæus was untimely slaid,
 This only man is able to subvert
 The fix'd foundations of my stubborn heart.
 And, to confess my frailty, to my shame,
 Somewhat I find within, if not the same,
 Too like the sparkles of my former flame.
 But first, let yawning Earth a passage read,
 And let me through the dark abyss descend:
 First let avenging Jove, with flames from high,
 Drive down this body to the nether sky,
 Condemn'd with ghosts in endless night to lie,
 Before I break the plighted faith I gave:
 No; he who had my vows, shall ever have:
 For whom I lov'd on Earth, I worship in the grave."

She said: the tears ran gushing from her eyes,
 And stopp'd her speech. Her sister thus replies:
 " O dearer than the vital air I breathe,
 Will you to grief your blooming years bequeath?
 Condemn'd to waste in woes your lonely life,
 Without the joys of mother or of wife?
 Think you these tears, this pompous train of woe,
 Are known or valued by the ghost below?
 I grant, that while your sorrows yet were green,
 It well became a woman and a queen
 The vows of Tyrian princes to neglect,
 To scorn Iarbas, and his love reject;
 With all the Libyan lords of mighty name;
 But will you fight against a pleasing flame?
 This little spot of land, which Heaven bestows,
 On every side is hemm'd with warlike foes:
 Getulian cities here are spread around;
 And fierce Numidians there your frontiers bound.
 Here lies a barren waste of thirsty land,
 And there the Syrtes raise the moving sand:
 Barcean troops besiege the narrow shore,
 And from the sea Pygmalion threatens more.
 Propitious Heaven, and gracious Juno led
 This wandering navy to your needful aid;
 How will your empire spread, your city rise
 From such an union, and with such allies!
 Implore the favour of the powers above,
 And leave the conduct of the rest to love.
 Continue still your hospitable way,
 And still invent occasions of their stay;
 Till storms and winter winds shall cease to threat,
 And planks and oars repair their shatter'd fleet."

These words, which from a friend and sister came,
 With ease resolv'd the scruples of her fame,
 And added fury to the kindled flame.
 Inspir'd with hope, the project they pursue;
 On every altar sacrifice renew:
 A chosen ewe of two-years old they pay
 To Ceres, Bacchus, and the god of day:
 Preferring Juno's power: for Juno ties
 The nuptial knot, and makes the marriage-joys.
 The beauteous queen before her altar stands,
 And holds the golden goblet in her hands.
 A milk-white heifer she with flowers adorns,
 And pours the ruddy wine betwixt her horns;
 And while the priests with prayer the gods invoke,
 She feeds their altars with Sabæan smoke.
 With hourly care the sacrifice renews,
 And anxiously the panting entrails views.
 What priestly rites, alas! what pious art,
 What vows avail to cure a bleeding heart!
 A gentle fire she feeds within her veins,
 Where the soft god secure in silence reigns.
 Sick with desire, and seeking him she loves,
 From street to street the raving Dido roves.
 So when the watchful shepherd from the blind,
 Wounds with a random shaft the careless hind,
 Distracted with her pain she flies the woods,
 Bounds o'er the lawn, and seeks the silent floods;
 With fruitless care: for still the fatal dart
 Sticks in her side, and rankles in her heart.
 And now she leads the Trojan chief along
 The lofty walls, amidst the busy throng;
 Displays her Tyrian wealth and rising town,
 Which love, without his labour, makes his own.
 This pomp she shows to tempt her wandering
 guest;

Her faltering tongue forbids to speak the rest.
 When day declines, and feasts renew the night,
 Still on his face she feeds her famish'd sight:
 She longs again to hear the prince relate
 His own adventures, and the Trojan fate:
 He tells it o'er and o'er: but still in vain;
 For still she begs to hear it once again.
 The hearer on the speaker's mouth depends;
 And thus the tragic story never ends.

Thus, when they part, when Phœbe's paler
 light

Withdraws, and falling stars to sleep invite,
 She last remains, when every guest is gone,
 Sits on the bed he press'd, and sighs alone;
 Absent, her absent hero sees and hears,
 Or in her bosom young Ascanius bears:
 And seeks the father's image in the child,
 If love by likeness might be so beguil'd.

Meantime the rising towers are at a stand:
 No labours exercise the youthful band:
 Nor use of arts nor toils of arms they know;
 The mole is left unfinished to the foe.
 The mounds, the works, the walls, neglected lie,
 Short of their promis'd height that seem'd to threat
 the sky.

But when imperial Juno, from above,
 Saw Dido fetter'd in the chains of love,
 Hot with the venom which her veins inflam'd,
 And by no sense of shame to be reclaim'd,
 With soothing words to Venus she begun:
 "High praises, endless honours you have won,
 And mighty trophies with your worthy son:
 Two gods a silly woman have undone.
 Nor am I ignorant, you both suspect
 This rising city, which my hands erect:

But shall celestial discord never cease?

'Tis better ended in a lasting peace.

You stand possess'd of all your soul desir'd;

Poor Dido, with consuming love, is fir'd:

Your Trojan with my Tyrian let us join,

So Dido shall be yours, Æneas mine:
 One common kingdom, one united line.

Eliza shall a Dardan lord obey,

And lofty Carthage for a dower convey."

Then Venus, who her hidden fraud describ'd,
 (Which would the sceptre of the world misguide
 To Libyan shores), thus artfully reply'd:

"Who but a fool would wars with Juno choose,

And such alliance and such gifts refuse?

If Fortune with our joint desires comply:

The doubt is all from Jove, and Destiny:

Least he forbid with absolute command,

To mix the people in one common land.

Or will the Trojan and the Tyrian line,

In lasting leagues and sure succession join?

But you, the partner of his bed and throne,

May move his mind; my wishes are your own."

"Mine," said imperial Juno, "be the care;

Time urges now to perfect this affair:

Attend my counsel, and the secret share.

When next the Sun his rising light displays,

And glids the world below with purple rays;

The queen, Æneas, and the Tyrian court,

Shall to the shady woods, for sylvan game, resort.

There, while the huntsmen pitch their toils
 around,

And cheerful horns, from side to side, resound,

A pitchy cloud shall cover all the plain

With hail and thunder, and tempestuous rain:

The fearful train shall take their speedy flight,

Dispers'd, and all involv'd in gloomy night:

One cave a grateful shelter shall afford

To the fair princess and the Trojan lord.

I will myself the bridal bed prepare,

If you, to bless the nuptials, will be there:

So shall their loves be crown'd with due delights,

And Hymen shall be present at the rites."

The queen of love consents, and closely smiles

At her vain project, and discover'd wiles.

The rosy morn was risen from the main,

And horns and hounds awake the princely train:

They issue early through the city-gate,

Where the more wakeful huntsmen ready wait,

With nets, and toils, and darts, beside the force

Of Spartan dogs, and swift Massylian horse.

The Tyrian peers and officers of state

For the slow queen in anti-chambers wait:

Her lofty courser in the court below

(Who his majestic rider seems to know),

Proud of his purple trappings, paws the ground,

And champs the golden bit, and spreads the foam
 around.

The queen at length appears: on either hand

The brawny guards in martial order stand.

A flower'd cymarr, with golden fringe she wore;

And at her back a golden quiver bore:

Her flowing hair a golden caul restrains;

A golden clasp the Tyrian robe sustains.

Then young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,

Leads on the Trojan youth to view the chase.

But far above the rest in beauty shines

The great Æneas, when the troop he joins:

Like fair Apollo, when he leaves the frost

Of wintery Xanthus, and the Lycian coast:

When to his native Delos he resorts,
 Ordains the dances, and renews the sports:
 Where painted Scythians, mix'd with Cretan bands,
 Before the joyful altars join their hands.
 Himself, on Cynthus walking, sees below
 The merry madness of the sacred show.
 Green wreaths of bays his length of hair enclose;
 A golden fillet binds his awful brows;
 His quiver sounds: not less the prince is seen
 In manly presence, or in lofty mien. [seat

Now had they reach'd the hills, and storm'd the
 Of savage beasts, in dens, their last retreat:
 The cry pursues the mountain-goats; they bound
 From rock to rock, and keep the craggy ground:
 Quite otherwise the stags, a trembling train,
 In herds unsingled, scour the dusty plain;
 And a long chase, in open view, maintain.
 The glad Ascanius, as his comiser guides,
 Spurs through the vale, and these and those outrides.

His horse's flanks and sides are forc'd to feel
 The clanking lash, and goring of the steel.
 Impatiently he views the feeble prey,
 Wishing some nobler beast to cross his way;
 And rather would the tusked boar attend,
 Or see the tawny lion downward bend. [skies:

Meantime the gathering clouds obscure the
 From pole to pole the fork lightning flies;
 The rattling thunder rolls: and Juno pours
 A wintry deluge down, and sounding showers.
 The company dispers'd, to coverts ride, [side.
 And seek the homely cots, or mountain's hollow
 The rapid rains, descending from the hills,
 To rolling torrents raise the creeping rills.
 The queen and prince, as love or fortune guides,
 One common cavern in her bosom hides.
 Then first the trembling Earth the signal gave;
 And flashing fires enlighten all the cave:
 Hell from below, and Juno from above,
 And howling nymphs were conscious to their love.
 From this ill-omen'd hour, in time arose
 Debate and death and all succeeding woes.

The queen whom sense of honour could not move,
 No longer made a secret of her love;
 But call'd it marriage, by that specious name
 To veil the crime, and sanctify the shame.
 The loud report through Libyan cities goes;
 Fame, the great ill, from small beginnings grows,
 Swift from the first; and every moment brings
 New vigour to her flights, new pinions to her wings.
 Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size;
 Her feet on Earth, her forehead in the skies:
 Earag'd against the gods revengeful Earth
 Produc'd her, last of the Titanian birth.
 Swift in her walk, more swift her winged haste:
 A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast:
 As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
 So many piercing eyes enlarge her sight:
 Millions of opening mouths to Fame belong:
 And every mouth is furnish'd with a tongue:
 And round with listening ears the flying plague is hung.

She fills the peaceful universe with cries;
 No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes.
 By day from lofty towers her head she shews:
 And spreads, through trembling crowds, disastrous news.

With court-informers haunts, and royal spies,
 This done relates, not done she feigns; and mingles truth with lies.

Talk is her business; and her chief delight
 To tell of prodigies, and cause affright.
 She fills the people's ears with Dido's name;
 Who, lost to honour, and the sense of shame,
 Admits into her throne and nuptial bed
 A wandering guest, who from his country fled:
 Whole days with him she passes in delights;
 And wastes in luxury long winter-nights;
 Forgetful of her fame, and royal trust;
 Dissolv'd in ease, abandon'd to her lust.
 The goddess widely spreads the loud report;
 And flies at length to king Hiarba's court.
 When first possess'd with this unwelcome news,
 Whom did he not of men and gods accuse?
 This prince, from ravish'd Garamantis born,
 A hundred temples did with spoils adorn,
 In Ammon's honour, his celestial sire;
 A hundred altars fed with wakeful fire;
 And through his vast dominions priests ordain'd,
 Whose watchful care these holy rites maintain'd.
 The gates and columns were with garlands crown'd,
 And blood of victim-beasts enrich the ground.

He, when he heard a fugitive could move
 The Tyrian princess, who disdain'd his love,
 His breast with fury burn'd, his eyes with fire;
 Mad with despair, impatient with desire.
 Then on the sacred altars pouring wine,
 He thus with prayers implor'd his sire divine:
 "Great Jove, propitious to the Moorish race,
 Who feast on painted beds, with offerings grace
 Thy temples, and adore thy power divine
 With blood of victims, and with sparkling wine;
 Seest thou not this? or do we fear in vain
 Thy thoston thunder, and thy thoughtless reign?
 Do thy broad hands the fork lightning's lance,
 Thine are the bolts, or the blind work of chance;
 A wandering woman builds, within our state,
 A little tower, bought at an easy rate;
 She pays me homage, and my grants allow
 A narrow space of Libyan lands to plough.
 Yet, scorning me, by passion blindly led,
 Admits a banish'd Trojan to her bed:
 And now this other Paris, with his train
 Of conquer'd cowards, must in Afric reign!
 (Whom, what they are, their looks and garb confess;

Their locks with oil perfum'd, their Libyan dress:)
 He takes the spoil, enjoys the princely dame;
 And I, rejected I, adore an empty name."

His vows, in haughty terms, he thus preferr'd,
 And held his altar's horns: the mighty thunderer
 heard,

Then cast his eyes on Carthage, where he found
 The lustful pair, in lawless pleasure drown'd.
 Lost in their loves, insensible of shame,
 And both forgetful of their better fame.
 He calls Cyllenius; and the god attends;
 By whom his menacing command he sends:
 "Go, mount the western winds, and cleave the sky;
 Then, with a swift descent, to Carthage fly:
 There find the Trojan chief, who wastes his days
 In slothful riot and inglorious ease,
 Nor winds the future city, giv'n by fate;
 To him this message from my mouth relate:
 Not so, fair Venus hop'd, when twice she won
 Thy life with prayers; nor promis'd such a son.
 Her's was a hero, destin'd to command
 A martial race; and rule the Latian land:
 Who should his ancient line from Teucer draw;
 And, on the conquer'd world, impose the law.

If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise from fading pleasure wean,
Yet why should he defraud his son of fame;
And grudge the Romans their immortal name!
What are his vain designs? what hopes he more,
From his long lingering on a hostile shore?
Regardless to redeem his honour lost,
And for his race to gain th' Ausonian coast!
Bid him with speed the Tyrian court forsake;
With this command the slumbering warrior wake."

Hermes obeys; with golden pinions binds
His flying feet, and mounts the western winds:
And whether o'er the seas or earth he flies,
With rapid force they bear him down the skies.
But first he grasps, within his awful hand,
The mark of sovereign power, his magic wand:
With this he draws the ghosts from hollow graves,
With this he drives them down the Stygian waves;
With this he seals in sleep the wakeful sight;
And eyes, though clos'd in death, restores to light.

Thus arm'd, the god begins his airy race,
And drives the racking clouds along the liquid
Now sees the tops of Atlas, as he flies, [space;
Whose brawny back supports the starry skies;
Atlas, whose head, with piny forests crown'd,
Is beaten by the winds, with foggy vapours bound.

Snows bide his shoulders; from beneath his chin
The founts of rolling streams their race begin:
A beard of ice on his large breast depends:
Here, pois'd upon his wings, the god descends;
Then, rested thus, he from the towering height
Plung'd downward, with precipitated flight:
Lights on the seas, and skims along the flood:
As water-fowl, who seek their fishy food,
Less, and yet less, to distant prospect show,
By turns they dance aloft, and dive below:
Like these, the steerage of his wings he plies,
And near the surface of the water flies:
Till, having pass'd the seas, and cross'd the sands,
He clos'd his wings, and stoop'd on Libyan lands:
Here shepherds once were hous'd in homely sheds,
Now towers within the clouds advance their heads.
Arriving there, he found the Trojan prince
New ramparts raising for the town's defence:
A purple scarf, with gold embroider'd o'er,
(Queen Dido's gift), about his waste he wore;
A sword with glittering gems diversify'd,
For ornament, not use, hung idly by his side.
Then thus, with winged words, the god began (Resuming his own shape): "Degenerate man,
Thou woman's property, what mak'st thou here,
These foreign walls and Tyrian towers to rear?
Forgetful of thy own? All-powerful Jove,
Who sways the world below, and Heaven above,
Has sent me down, with this severe command:
What means thy lingering in the Libyan land?
If glory cannot move a mind so mean,
Nor future praise, from sitting pleasure wean,
Regard the fortunes of thy rising heir;
The promis'd crown let young Ascanius wear;
To whom th' Ausonian sceptre and the state
Of Rome's imperial name is ow'd by fate."
So spoke the god; and speaking took his flight,
Involv'd in clouds; and vanish'd out of sight.

The pious prince was seiz'd with sudden fear;
Mute was his tongue, and upright stood his hair;
Revolving in his mind the stern command,
He longs to fly, and loaths the charming land.

What should he say, or how should he begin,
What course, alas! remains, to steer between
Th' offended lover, and the powerful queen!
This way, and that, he turns his anxious mind,
And all expedients tries and none can find:
Fixt on the deed, but doubtful of the means;
After long thought to this advice he leans:
Three chiefs he calls, commands them to repair
The fleet, and ship their men with silent care:
Some plausible pretence he bids them find,
To colour what in secret he design'd.
Himself, meantime, the softest hours would choose,
Before the love-sick lady heard the news;
And move her tender mind, by slow degrees,
To suffer what the sovereign power decrees:
Jove will inspire him, when, and what to say.
They hear with pleasure, and with haste obey.
But soon the queen perceives the thin disguise:

(What arts can blind a jealous woman's eyes?)
She was the first to find the secret fraud,
Before the fatal news was blaz'd abroad.
Love the first motions of the lover hears,
Quick to presage, and ev'n in safety fears.
Nor impious fame was wanting, to report
The ships repair'd; the Trojans thick resort,
And purpose to forsake the Tyrian coast.
Frantic with fear, impatient of the wound,
And impotent of mind, she roves the city round:
Less wild the Baccanalian dames appear,
When, from afar, their nightly god they hear,
And how! about the hills, and shake the wreathy
spear.

At length she finds the dear perfidious man;
Prevents his form'd excuse, and thus began:
"Base and ungrateful, could you hope to fly,
And undiscover'd 'scape a lover's eye?
Nor could my kindness your compassion move,
Nor plighted vows, nor dearer bands of love?
Or is the death of a despairing queen
Not worth preventing, though too well foreseen?
Ev'n when the wintry winds command your stay,
You dare the tempest, and defy the sea.
False as you are, suppose you were not bound
To lands unknown, and foreign coasts to sound;
Were Troy restor'd, and Priam's happy reign,
Now durst you tempt, for Troy, the raging main?
See whom you fly; am I the foe you shun?
Now, by those holy vows so late begun,
By this right hand, (since I have nothing more
To challenge, but the faith you gave before)
I beg you by these tears too truly shed,
By the new pleasures of our nuptial bed;
If ever Dido, when you most were kind,
Were pleasing in your eyes, or touch'd your mind;
By these my prayers, if prayers may yet have place;
Pity the fortunes of a falling race.
For you I have provok'd a tyrant's hate;
Incens'd the Libyan and the Tyrian state;
For you alone I suffer in my fame:
Bereft of honour, and expos'd to shame:
Whom have I now to trust? (ungrateful guest!
That only name remains of all the rest!)
What have I left, or whither can I fly;
Must I attend Pygmalion's cruelty?
Or till Hiarbas shall in triumph lead
A queen, that proudly scorn'd his proffer'd bed?
Had you deferr'd at least your hasty flight,
And left behind some pledge of our delight;
Some babe to bless the mother's mournful sight;

Some young Æneas to supply your place :
Whose features might express his father's face ;
I should not then complain, to live bereft
Of all my husband, or be wholly left!" [eyes,

Here pau'd the queen; unmov'd he holds his
By Jove's command; nor suffer'd love to rise,
Though heaving in his heart; and thus at length
replies :

" Fair queen, you never can enough repeat
Your boundless favours, or I own my debt ;
Nor can my mind forget Eliza's name,
While vital breath inspires this mortal frame.
This only let me speak in my defence ;
I never hop'd a secret flight from hence :
Much less pretended to the lawful-claim
Of sacred nuptials, or a husband's name.
For if indulgent Heaven would leave me free,
And not submit my life to fate's decree,
My choice would lead me to the Trojan shore,
Those relics to review, their dust adore ;
And Priam's ruin'd palace to restore.

But now the Delphian oracle commands,
And fate invites me to the Latian lands.
That is the promis'd place to which I steer,
And all my vows are terminated there.
If you, a Tyrian, and a stranger born,
With walls and towers a Libyan town adorn ;
Why may not we, like you a foreign race,
Like you seek shelter in a foreign place ?
As often as the night obscures the skies
With humid shades, or twinkling stars arise,
Anchises' angry ghost in dreams appears,
Chides my delay, and fills my soul with fears ;
And young Ascanius justly may complain,
Of his defrauded fate, and destin'd reign.
Ev'n now the herald of the gods appear'd,
Waking I saw him, and his message heard.
From Jove he came commission'd, heavenly bright

With radiant beams, and manifest to sight.
The sender and the sent, I both attest,
These walls he enter'd, and those words express'd :
Fair queen, oppose not what the gods command ;
For'd by my fate, I leave your happy land."

Thus while he spoke, already she began,
With sparkling eyes, to view the guilty man :
From head to foot survey'd his person o'er,
Nor longer these outrageous threats forbore :
" False as thou art, and more than false, forsworn ;
Not sprung from noble blood, nor goddess-born,
But hewn from harden'd entrails of a rock ;
And rough Hyrcanian tigers gave thee suck.
Why should I fawn ? what have I worse to fear ?
Did he once look, or lend a listening ear ;
Sigh'd when I sobb'd, or shed one kindly tear ?
All symptoms of a base ungrateful mind,
So foul, that which is worse, 'tis hard to find,
Of man's injustice, why should I complain ?
The gods, and Jove himself, behold in vain
Triumphant treason, yet no thunder flies :
Nor Juno views my wrongs with equal eyes ;
Faithless is Earth, and faithless are the skies !
Justice is fled, and truth is now no more ;
I sav'd the shipwreck'd exile on my shore :
With needful food his hungry Trojans fed :
I took the traitor to my throne and bed :
Fool that I was !—'tis little to repeat
The rest, I stor'd and rigg'd his ruin'd fleet.
I rave, I rave ! A god's command he pleads !
And makes Heaven accessory to his deeds.

VOL. XIX.

Now Lycian lots, and now the Delian god,
Now Hermes is employ'd from Jove's abode,
To warn him hence ; as if the peaceful state
Of heavenly powers were touch'd with human fate !
But go ; thy flight no longer I detain ;
Go seek thy promis'd kingdom through the main :
Yet, if the Heavens will hear my pious vow¹
The faithless waves, not half so false as thou,
Or secret sands, shall sepulchres afford
To thy proud vessels and their perjurd lord.
Then shalt thou call on injurd Dido's name :
Dido shall come, in a black sulphury flame ;
When death has once dissolv'd her mortal frame :
Shall smile to see the traitor vainly weep ;
Her angry ghost, arising from the deep,
Shall haunt thee waking, and disturb thy sleep.
At least my shade thy punishment shall know ;
And fame shall spread the pleasing news below.¹

Abruptly here she stops: then turns away
Her loathing eyes, and shuns the sight of day.
Amaz'd he stood, revolving in his mind
What speech to frame, and what excuse to find.
Her fearful maids their fainting mistress led ;
And softly laid her on her ivory bed.

But good Æneas, though he much desir'd
To give that pity, which her grief requir'd,
Though much he mourn'd and labour'd with his
Resolv'd at length, obeys the will of Jove : [love,
Reviews his forces ; they with early care
Unmoor their vessels, and for sea prepare.
The fleet is soon afloat, in all its pride :

And well-caulk'd gallees in the harbour ride.
Then oaks for oars they fell'd ; or, as they stood,
Of its green arms despoil'd the growing wood,
Studios of sight: the beach is cover'd o'er
With Trojan bands that blacken all the shore :
On every side are seen, descending down,
Thick swarms of soldiers laden from the town.
Thus, in battalia, march embodied ants,
Fearful of winter, and of future wants,
T' invade the corn, and to their cells convey
The plunder'd forage of their yellow prey.
The sable troops, along the narrow tracks,
Scarce bear the weighty burden on their backs :
Some set their shoulders on the ponderous grain ;
Some guard the spoil ; some lash the lagging train ;
All ply their several tasks, and equal toil sustain.
What pangs the tender breast of Dido tore,
When, from the tower, she saw the cover'd shore ;
And heard the shouts of sailors from afar,
Mix'd with the murmurs of the watery war !
All-powerful love, what changes canst thou cause
In human hearts, subjected to thy laws !
Once more her haughty soul the tyrant bends ;
To prayers and mean submissions she descends.
No female art or aids she left untry'd,
Nor counsels unexplor'd, before she dy'd.
" Look, Anna, look ; the Trojans crowd to see :
They spread their canvass, and their anchors weigh :
The shouting crew, their ships with garlands bind,
Invoke the sea-gods, and invite the wind.
Could I have thought this threatening blow so near,
My tender soul had been forewarn'd to bear.
But do not you my last request deny,
With you perfidious man your interest try ;
And bring me news, if I must live or die.
You are his favourite, you alone can find
The dark recesses of his inmost mind :
In all his trusty secrets you have part,
And know the soft approaches to his heart.

C c

Haste thee; and humbly seek my haughty foe;
 Tell him, I d' not with the Grecians go;
 Nor did my fleet against his friends employ,
 Nor swore the ruin of unhappy Troy;
 Nor mov'd with hands prophane his father's dust;
 Why should he then reject a suit so just!
 Whom does he shun, and whither would he fly?
 Can he this last, this only prayer deny!
 Let him at least his dangerous flight delay,
 Wait better winds, and hope a calmer sea:
 The nuptials he disclaims, I urge no more;
 Let him pursue the promis'd Latian shore.
 A short delay is all I ask him now,
 A pause of grief, an interval from woe:
 Till my soft soul be temper'd to sustain
 Accustom'd sorrows; and usur'd to pain.
 If you in pity grant this one request,
 My death shall glut the hatred of his breast."
 This mournful message pious Anna bears,
 And seconds, with her own, her sister's tears:
 But all her arts are still employ'd in vain;
 Again she comes, and is refus'd again. [move;
 His harden'd heart nor prayers nor threatenings
 Fate, and the god, had stopp'd his ears to love.

As when the winds their airy quarrel try,
 Justling from every quarter of the sky,
 This way and that the mountain oak they bend,
 His boughs they shatter, and his branches rend;
 With leaves and falling mast they spread the
 The hollow valleys echo to the sound; [ground,
 Unmov'd, the royal plant their fury mocks,
 Or, shaken, clings more closely to the rocks:
 Far as he shoots his towering head on high,
 So deep in earth his fix'd foundations lie:
 No less a storm the Trojan hero bears;
 Thick messages and loud complaints he hears,
 And bandy'd words still beating on his ears.
 Sighs, groans, and tears, proclaim his inward
 pains,

But the firm purpose of his heart remains.
 The wretched queen, pursu'd by cruel fate,
 Begins at length the light of Heaven to hate,
 And loaths to live: then dire portents she sees,
 To hasten on the death her soul decrees;
 Strange to relate: for when, before the shrine,
 She pours, in sacrifice, the purple wine,
 The purple wine is turn'd to putrid blood,
 And the white offer'd milk converts to mud.
 This dire presage, to her alone reveal'd,
 From all, and ev'n her sister, she conceal'd.
 A marble temple stood within the grove,
 Sacred to death, and to her murder'd love;
 That honour'd chapel she had hung around
 With snowy fleeces, and with garlands crown'd:
 Oft, when she visited this lonely dome,
 Strange voices issued from her husband's tomb:
 She thought she heard him summon her away,
 Invite her to his grave, and hide her stay.
 Hourly 'tis heard, when, with a boding note,
 The solitary screech-owl strains her throat:
 And on a chimney's top, or turret's height,
 With songs obscene disturbs the silence of the night.
 Besides, old prophecies augment her fears,
 And stern Ææas in her dreams appears
 Disdainful as by day: she seems alone
 To wander in her sleep, through ways unknown,
 Guideless and dark: or, in a desert plain,
 To seek her subjects, and to seek in vain.
 Like Pentheus, when, distracted with his fear,
 He saw the ruins, and double Thebes appear:

Or mad Orestes, when his mother's ghost
 Full in his face infernal torches toss'd;
 And shook her smoky locks: he shuns the sight,
 Flies o'er the stage, surpris'd with mortal fright,
 The furies guard the door, and intercept his flight.

Now, sinking underneath a load of grief,
 From death alone she seeks her last relief:
 The time and dreams resolv'd within her breast,
 She to her mournful sister thus address'd
 (Dissembling hope, her cloudy front she clears,
 And a false vigour in her eyes appears):
 "Rejoice," she said, "instructed from above,
 My lover I shall gain, or lose my love.
 Nigh rising Atlas, next the falling Sun,
 Long tracts of Ethiopian climates run:
 There a Massylian princess I have found,
 Honour'd for age, for magic arts renown'd;
 Th' Æthiopian temple was her trusted care;
 'Twas she supply'd the wakeful dragon's fare.
 She poppy-seeds in honey taught to steep,
 Reclaim'd his rage, and sooth'd him into sleep.
 She watch'd the golden fruit; her charms unbind
 The chains of love, or fix them on the mind.
 She stops the torrents, leaves the channel dry,
 Repels the stars, and backward bears the sky.
 The yawning earth rebellows to her call,
 Pale ghosts ascend, and mountain ashes fall.
 Witness, ye gods, and thou my better part,
 How loth I am to try this impious art!
 Within the secret court with silent care,
 Erect a lofty pile, expos'd in air;
 Hang on the topmost part the Trojan vest,
 Spoils, arms and presents of my faithless guest
 Next, under these, the bridal bed be plac'd,
 Where I my ruin in his arms embrac'd:
 All relics of the wretch are doom'd to fire,
 For so the priestess and her charms require."
 Thus far she said, and farther speech for-bears:

A mortal paleness in her face appears:
 Yet the mistrustless Anna could not find
 The secret funeral in these rites design'd,
 Nor thought so dire a rage possess'd her mind.
 Unknowing of a train conceal'd so well,
 She fear'd no worse than when Sicheus fell:
 Therefore obeys. The fatal pile they rear
 Within the secret court, expos'd in air.
 The cloven helms and pines are heap'd on high;
 And garlands on the hollow spaces lie.
 Sad cypress, vervain, yew, compose the wreath,
 And every baleful green denoting death.
 The queen, determin'd to the fatal deed,
 The spoils and sword he left, in order spread:
 And the man's image on the nuptial bed.
 And now (the sacred altars plac'd around)
 The priestess enters, with her hair unbound,
 And thrice invokes the powers below the ground.
 Night, Erebus, and Chaos, she proclaims,
 And threefold Hecate, with her hundred names,
 And three Dianas: next she sprinkles round,
 With feign'd Avernian drops, the hollow'd ground
 Culls hoary simples, found by Phoebe's light,
 With brazen sickles reap'd at noon of night.
 Then mixes baleful juices in the bowl,
 And cuts the forehead of a new-born fowl;
 Robbing the mother's love. The destin'd queen
 Observes, assisting at the rites obscene:
 A leaven'd cake in her devoted hands
 She holds, and next the highest altar stands:

One tender foot was shod, her other bare,
Girt was her gather'd gown, and loose her hair.
Thus dress'd, she summon'd, with her dying
breath,

The Heavens and planets, conscious of her death;
And every power, if any rules above,
Who minds, or who revenges, injur'd love.

'Twas dead of night, when weary bodies close
Their eyes in balmy sleep and soft repose:
The winds no longer whisper through the woods,
Nor murmuring tides disturb the gentle floods,
The stars in silent order mov'd around,
And peace, with downy wings, was brooding on the ground.

The flocks and herds, and party-colour'd fowl,
Which haunt the woods, or swim the weedy pool,
Stretch'd on the quiet earth securely lay,
Forgetting the past labours of the day.

All else of Nature's common gift partake;
Unhappy Dido was alone awake.
Nor sleep nor ease the furious queen can find;
Sleep fled her eyes, as quiet fled her mind.
Despair, and rage, and love, divide her heart:
Despair and rage had some, but love the greater part.

Then thus she said within her secret mind:
"What shall I do; what succour can I find?
Become a suppliant to Hiarba's pride,
And take my turn, to court and be deny'd!
Shall I with this ungrateful Trojan go,
Forake an empire, and attend a foe?
Himself I refug'd, and his train reliev'd?
'Tis true: but am I sure to be receiv'd?
Can gratitude in Trojan souls have place?
Laomedon still lives in all his race!
Then, shall I seek alone the charlish crew,
And with my fleet their flying sails pursue?
What force have I but those, whom scarce before
I drew reluctant from their native shore?
Will they again embark at my desire Once more sustain the seas, and quit their second Tyre?"

Rather with steel thy guilty breast invade,
And take the fortune thou thyself hast made.
Your pity, sister, first seduc'd my mind;
Or seconded too well what I design'd.
These dear-bought pleasures had I never known,
Had I continued free, and still my own;
Avoiding love, I had not found despair:
But shar'd, with savage beasts, the common air;
Like them a lonely life I might have led,
Not mourn'd the living, nor disturb'd the dead."
These thoughts she brooded in her anxious breast;
On board, the Trojan found more easy rest.
Resolv'd to sail, in sleep he pass'd the night;
And order'd all things for his early flight,
To whom once more the winged god appears:
His former youthful mien and shape he wears,
And, with this new alarm, invades his ears:
"Sleep'st thou, O goddess-born! and canst thou drown

Thy needful cares, so near a hostile town,
Beet with foes? nor hear'st the western gales
Invite thy passage, and inspire thy sails?
She harbours in her heart a furious hate;
And thou shalt find the dire effects too late;
Fixt on revenge, and obstinate to die;
Haste swiftly hence, while thou hast power to fly.
The sea with ships will soon be cover'd o'er,
And blazing firebrands kindle all the shores.

Prevent her rage, while night obscures the skies;
And sail before the purple morn arise.
Who knows what hazards thy delay may bring?
Woman's a various and a changeful thing."
Thus Hermes in the dream; and then took his flight,
Aloft in air unseem; and mix'd with night.

Twice warn'd by the celestial messenger,
The pious prince arose with hasty fear:
Then ron'd his drowsy train without delay.
"Haste to your banks; your crooked anchors weigh;
And spread your flying sails, and stand to sea.
A god commands; be stood before my sight;
And urg'd us once again to speedy flight.
O sacred power, what power soe'er thou art,
To thy bless'd orders I resign my heart:
Lead thou the way; protect thy Trojan bands;
And prosper the design thy will commands."
He said, and, drawing forth his flaming sword,
His thundering arm divides the many-twisted cord;
An emulating zeal inspires his train;
They run, they snatch; they rush into the main.
With headlong haste they leave the desert shores,
And brush the liquid seas with labouring oars.

Aurora now had left her saffron bed,
And beams of early light the Heavens o'erspread,
When from a tower the queen, with waking eyes,
Saw day point upward from the rosy skies:
She look'd to seaward, but the sea was void,
And scarce in ken the sailing ships descri'd;
Stung with despite, and furious with despair,
She struck her trembling breast, and tore her hair.
"And shall th' ungrateful traitor go," she said,
"My land forsaken, and my love betray'd?
Shall we not arm, not rush from every street,
To follow, sink, and burn his perjurd fleet?
Haste; haul my gallees out; pursue the foe:
Bring flaming brands; set sail, and swiftly row.
What have I said? Where am I? Fury turns
My brain, and my distemper'd bosom burns.
Then, when I gave my person and my throne,
This hate, this rage, had been more timely shown.
See now the promis'd faith, the vaunted name,
The pious man, who, rushing through the flame,
Preserv'd his gods and to the Phrygian shore
The burden of his feeble father bore! [floods
I should have torn him piece-meal; strow'd in
His scatter'd limbs, or left exposed in woods;
Destroy'd his friends and son; and, from the fire,
Have set the reeking boy before the sire.
Events are doubtful which on battle wait;
Yet where's the doubt to souls secure of fate!
My Tyrians, at their injur'd queen's command,
Had toss'd their fires amid the Trojan band:
At once extinguish'd all the faithless name;
And I myself in vengeance of my shame,
Had fall'n upon the pile to mend the funeral flame.
Thou Sun, who view'st at once the world below,
Thou Jno, guardian of the nuptial row,
Thou Hecate, hearken from thy dark abodes;
Ye powers, fiends, and violated gods,
All powers invok'd with Dido's dying breath;
Attend her curses, and avenge her death.
If so the fates ordain, and Jove commands,
Th' ungrateful wretch should find the Latian lands,
Yet let a race untam'd, and haughty foes,
His peaceful entrance with dire arms oppose;
Opprest with numbers in th' unequal field,
His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd;
Let him for succour sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embraces:

First let him see his friends in battle slain,
 And their untimely fate lament in vain :
 And when, at length, the cruel war shall cease,
 On hard conditions may he buy his peace.
 Nor let him then enjoy supreme command,
 But fall untimely by some hostile hand,
 And lie unburied on the barren sand.
 These are my prayers, and this my dying will :
 And you, my Tyrians, every curse fulfil ;
 Perpetual hate, and mortal wars proclaim
 Against the prince, the people, and the name.
 These grateful offerings on my grave bestow ;
 Nor league, nor love, the hostile nations know :
 Now, and from hence in every future age,
 When rage excites your arms, and strength supplies the rage,

Rise some avenger of our Libyan blood ;
 With fire and sword pursue the perjurd brood :
 Our arms, our seas, our shores oppos'd to theirs,
 And the same hate descend on all our heirs."

This said, within her anxious mind she weighs
 The means of cutting short her odious days.
 Then to Sicheus' nurse she briefly said
 (For when she left her country her's was dead),
 "Go, Barce, call my sister ; let her care
 The solemn rites of sacrifice prepare :
 The sheep, and all the atoning offerings bring,
 Sprinkling her body from the crystal spring
 With living drops : then let her come, and thou
 With sacred fillets bind thy hoary brow.
 Thus will I pay my vows to Stygian Jove,
 And end the cares of my disastrous love.
 Then cast the Trojan image on the fire,
 And, as that burns, my passion shall expire."

The nurse moves onward, with officious care,
 And all the speed her aged limbs can bear.
 But furious Dido, with dark thoughts involv'd,
 Shook at the mighty mischief she resolv'd.
 With livid spots distinguish'd was her face,
 Red were her rolling eyes, and discompos'd her pace :

Ghastly she gaz'd, with pain she drew her breath,
 And nature shiver'd at approaching death.

Then swiftly to the fatal place she pass'd,
 And mounts the funeral pile, with furious haste :
 Unheaths the sword the Trojan left behind
 (Not for so dire an enterprise design'd).
 But when she view'd the garments loosely spread,
 Which once he wore, and saw the conscious bed,
 She paus'd, and, with a sigh, the robes embrac'd ;
 Then on the couch her trembling body cast,
 Repress'd the ready tears, and spoke her last :
 "Dear pledges of my love, while Heaven so pleas'd,
 Receive a soul of mortal anguish eas'd :
 My fatal course is finish'd, and I go,
 A glorious name, among the ghosts below.
 A lofty city by my hands is rais'd ;
 Pygmalion punish'd, and my lord appears'd.
 What could my fortune have afforded more,
 Had the false Trojan never touch'd my shore ?"
 Then kiss'd the couch ; "and must I die," she said,
 And unreveng'd ? 'tis doubly to be dead !
 Yet ev'n this death with pleasure I receive ;
 On any terms, 'tis better than to live.

These flames from far may the false Trojan view ;
 These boding omens his base flight pursue."
 She said, and struck. Deep enter'd in her side
 The piercing steel, with reeking purple dy'd :
 Clogg'd in the wound the cruel weapon stands ;
 The spouting blood came streaming on her hands.

Her sad attendants saw the deadly stroke,
 And, with loud cries, the sounding palace shook.
 Distracted from the fatal sight they fled,
 And through the town the dismal rumour spread.
 First from the frighted court the yell began,
 Redoubled thence from house to house it ran :
 The groans of men, with shrieks, laments, and cries
 Of mixing women, mount the vaulted skies.
 Not less the clamour, than if ancient Tyre,
 Or the new Carthage, set by foes on fire,
 The rolling ruin, with their lov'd abodes,
 Involv'd the blazing temples of their gods.
 Her sister hears, and, furious with despair,
 She beats her breast, and rends her yellow hair :
 And, calling on Eliza's name aloud,
 Runs breathless to the place, and breaks the crowd.
 "Was all that pomp of woe for this prepar'd,
 These fires, this funeral pile, these altars rear'd ?
 Was all this train of plots contriv'd," said she,
 "All only to deceive unhappy me ?
 Which is the worst ? Didst thou in death pretend
 To scorn thy sister, or delude thy friend ?
 Thy summon'd sister, and thy friend, had come ;
 One sword had serv'd us both, one common tomb.
 Was I to raise the pile, the powers invoke,
 Not to be present at the fatal stroke ?
 At once thou hast destroy'd thyself and me ;
 Thy town, thy senate, and thy colony !
 Bring water, bathe the wound ; while I in death
 Lay close my lips to her's, and catch the flying breath."

This said, she mounts the pile with eager haste,
 And in her arms the gasping queen embrac'd :
 Her temples chaf'd, and her own garments tore,
 To staunch the streaming blood, and cleanse the gore.

Thrice Dido try'd to raise her drooping head,
 And fainting thrice, fell grov'ling on the bed.
 Thrice op'd her heavy eyes, and saw the light,
 But, having found it, sicken'd at the sight,
 And clos'd her lids at last in endless night.

Then Juno, grieving that she should sustain
 A death so lingering, and so full of pain,
 Sent Iris down, to free her from the strife
 Of labouring nature, and dissolve her life.
 For, since she dy'd, not doom'd by Heaven's
 Or her own crime, but human casualty, [decre,
 And rage of love, that plung'd her in despair,
 The Sisters had not cut the topmost hair,
 Which Proserpine and they can only know,
 Nor made her sacred to the shades below.
 Downward the various goddess took her flight,
 And drew a thousand colours from the light :
 Then stood above the dying lover's head,
 And said, "I thus devote thee to the dead.
 This offering to th' infernal gods I bear :"
 Thus while she spoke she cut the fatal hair :
 The struggling soul was loos'd, and life dissolv'd in air.

THE FIFTH BOOK OF

THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

ÆNEAS, setting sail from Afric, is driven, by a storm, on the coast of Sicily: where he is hospitably received by his friend Acastes, king of part of the island, and born of Trojan parentage. He applies himself to celebrate the memory of his father with divine honours: and accordingly institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. While the ceremonies were performing, Juno sends Iris to persuade the Trojan women to burn the ships; who, upon her instigation, set fire to them, which burnt four, and would have consumed the rest, had not Jupiter, by a miraculous shower, extinguish'd it. Upon this Æneas, by the advice of one of his generals, and a vision of his father, builds a city for the women, old men, and others who were either unfit for war, or weary of the voyage, and sails for Italy: Venus procures of Neptune a safe voyage for him and all his men, excepting only his pilot Palinurus, who was unfortunately lost.

MEANTIME the Trojan cuts his watery way,
Fix'd on his voyage through the curling sea:
Then, casting back his eyes, with dire amaze,
Sees, on the Punic shore, the mounting blaze.
The cause unknown; yet his presaging mind
The fate of Dido from the fire divin'd:
He knew the stormy souls of woman-kind,
What secret springs their eager passions move,
How capable of death for injur'd love.
Dire anguries from hence the Trojans draw,
All neither fires nor shining shores they saw.
Now seas and skies their prospect only bound,
An empty space above, a floating field around.
But soon the Heavens with shadows were o'er-spread;
A swelling cloud hung hovering o'er their head:
Livid it look'd, the threatening of a storm;
Then night and horror ocean's face deform.
The pilot, Palinurus, cry'd aloud,
"What gusts of weather from that gathering cloud
My thoughts presage! Ere yet the tempest roars
Stand to your tackle, mates, and stretch your oars;
Contract your swelling sails, and luff to wind:"
The frighted crew perform the task assign'd.
Then, to his fearless chief, "Not Heaven," said he,
"Though Jove himself should promise Italy,
Can stem the torrent of this raging sea!
Mark how the shifting winds from west arise,
And what collected night involves the skies!
Nor can our shaken vessels live at sea;
Much less against the tempest force their way;
'Tis fate diverts our course, and fate we must obey.
Not far from hence, if I observ'd aright
The southing of the stars, and polar light,
Scyllia lies; whose hospitable shores
In safety we may reach with struggling oars."
Æneas then reply'd, "Too sure I find,
We strive in vain against the seas and wind:
Now shift your sails: what place can please me more
Than that you promise, the Sicilian shore;
Whose hollow'd earth Anchises' bones contains,
And where a prince of Trojan lineage reigns!"
The course resolv'd, before the westerly wind
They scud amain, and make the port assign'd.
Meantime Acastes, from a lofty stand,
Beheld the fleet descending on the land;

And, not unmindful of his ancient race,
Down from the cliff he ran with eager pace,
And held the hero in a strict embrace.
Of a rough Libyan bear the spoils he wore;
And either hand a pointed javelin bore.
His mother was a dame of Dardan blood;
His sire Criniseus, a Sicilian flood;
He welcomes his returning friends ashore
With plenteous country cates, and homely store.

Now, when the following morn had chas'd away
The flying stars, and light restor'd the day,
Æneas call'd the Trojan troops around,
And thus bespoke them from a rising ground:
"Offspring of Heaven, divine Dardanian race,
The Sun revolving through th' æthereal space,
The shining circle of the year has fill'd,
Since first this isle my father's ashes held:
And now the rising day renews the year
(A day for ever sad, for ever dear).
This would I celebrate with annual games,
With gifts on altars pil'd, and holy flames,
Though banish'd to Getulia's barren sands,
Caught on the Grecian seas, or hostile lands:
But since this happy storm our fleet has driven
(Not, as I deem, without the will of Heaven)
Upon these friendly shores and flowery plains,
Which hide Anchises, and his blest remains,
Let us with joy perform his honours due, [renew.
And pray for prosperous winds, our voyage to Pray that in towns and temples of our own,
The name of great Anchises may be known,
And yearly games may spread the god's renown.
Our sports, Acastes, of the Trojan race,
With royal gifts ordain'd, is pleas'd to grace:
Two steers on every ship the king bestows;
His gods and ours shall share your equal vows.
Besides, if nine days hence, the rosy morn
Shall, with unclouded light, the skies adorn,
That day with solemn sports I mean to grace:
Light gallees on the seas shall run a watery race.
Some shall in swiftness for the goal contend,
And others try the twanging bow to bend:
The strong with iron gauntlets arm'd shall stand,
Oppos'd in combat on the yellow sand.
Let all be present at the games prepar'd,
And joyful victors wait the just reward.
But now assist the rites, with garlands crown'd;"
He said, and first his brows with myrtle bound.
Then Helymus, by his example led,
And old Acastes, each adorn'd his head;
Thus young Ascanius, with a sprightly grace,
His temples ty'd, and all the Trojan race.
Æneas then advanc'd amidst the train,
By thousands follow'd through the flowery plain,
To great Anchises' tomb: which, when he found,
He pour'd to Bacchus, on the hollow'd ground,
Two bowls of sparkling wine, of milk two more,
And two from offer'd bulls of purple gore.
With roses then the sepulchre he strow'd;
And thus his father's ghost bespoke aloud:
"Hail, O ye holy manes! hail again,
Paternal ashes, now review'd in vain!
The gods permitted not that you, with me,
Should reach the promis'd shores of Italy;
Or Tyber's flood, what flood soe'er it be."
Scarce had he finish'd, when, with speckled pride,
A serpent from the tomb began to glide;
His bulky bulk on seven high volumes roll'd;
Blue was his breadth of back, but streak'd with scaly gold.

Thus, riding on his curls, he seem'd to pass
A rolling fire along, and singe the grass.
More various colours through his body run,
Than Iris, when her bow imbibes the Sun:
Betwixt the rising altars, and around,
The sacred monster shot along the ground;
With harmless play amidst the bowls he pass'd,
And, with his lolling tongue, assay'd the taste:
Thus fed with holy food, the wondrous guest
Within the hollow tomb retir'd to rest.
The pious prince, surpris'd at what he view'd,
The funeral honours with more zeal renew'd:
Doubtful if this the place's genius were,
Or guardian of his father's sepulchre.
Five sheep, according to the rites, he slew,
As many swine, and steers of sable hue;
Now generous wine he from the goblets pour'd,
And call'd his father's ghost, from Hell restor'd.
The glad attendants in long order come,
Offering their gifts at great Anchises' tomb;
Some add more oxen; some divide the spoil;
Some place the chargers on the grassy soil;
Some blow the fires, and offer'd entrails broil.

Now came the day desir'd: the skies were bright

With rosy lustre of the rising light;
The bordering people, rous'd by sounding fame
Of Trojan feasts, and great Aecetes' name,
The crowded shore with acclamations fill,
Part to behold, and part to prove their skill.
And first the gifts in public view they place,
Green laurel wreaths, and palm (the victor's)
Within the circle; arms and tripods lie, [grace]:
Ingots of gold and silver heap'd on high,
And vests embroider'd of the Tyrian dye.
The trumpet's clangour then the feast proclaims,
And all prepare for their appointed games.
Four gallees first, with equal rowers bear,
Advancing, in the watery lists appear.
The speedy Dolphin, that outstrips the wind,
Bore Mnestheus, author of the Memmian kind:
Gyas the vast Chimæra's bulk commands,
Which rising like a towering city stands:
Three Trojans tug at every labouring oar;
Three banks in three degrees the sailors bore;
Beneath their sturdy strokes the billows roar.
Sergesthus, who began the Sergian race,
In the great Centaur took the leading place:
Cloanthus on the sea-green Scylla stood,
From whom Clientius draws his Trojan blood.

Far in the sea, against the foaming shore,
There stands a rock; the raging billows roar
Above his head in storms; but, when 'tis clear,
Uncurl their ridgy backs, and at his foot appear.
In peace below the gentle waters run;
The cormorants above lie basking in the Sun.
On this the hero fix'd an oak in sight,
The mark to guide the mariners aright.
To bear with this, the scamen stretch their oars;
Then round the rock they steer, and seek the former shores.

The lots decide their place: above the rest,
Each leader shining in his Tyrian vest:
The common crew, with wreaths of poplar boughs,
Their temples crown, and shade their sweaty brows.
Besmear'd with oil, their naked shoulders shine:
All take their seats, and wait the sounding sign.
They gripe their oars, and every panting breast
Is rais'd by turns with hope, by turns with fear de-press'd.

The clangour of the trumpet gives the sign;
At once they start advancing in a line.
With shouts the sailors read the starry skies;
Lash'd with their oars, the smoky billows rise;
Sparkles the briny main, and the vex'd ocean fries
Exact in time, with equal strokes they row:
At once the brushing oars and brazen prow
Dash up the sandy waves, and ope the depths
Not fiery coursers, in a chariot race, [below.
Invade the field with half so swift a pace.
Not the fierce driver with more fury leads
The sounding lash; and, ere the stroke descends,
Low to the wheels his pliant body bends.
The partial crowd their hopes and fears divide,
And aid, with eager shouts, the favour'd side.
Cries, murmurs, clamours, with a mixing sound,
From woods to woods, from hills to hills rebound.
Amidst the loud applauses of the shore,
Gyas outstripp'd the rest, and sprung before;
Cloanthus, better mann'd, pursu'd him fast;
But his o'er-masted galley check'd his haste.
The Centaur, and the Dolphin brush the brine
With equal oars, advancing in a line:
And now the mighty Centaur seems to lead,
And now the speedy Dolphin gets a-head:
Now board to board the rival vessels row;
The billows lave the skies, and ocean groans below,
They reach'd the mark: proud Gyas and his train
In triumph rode the victors of the main:
But steering round, he charg'd his pilot stand
More close to shore, and skim along the sand.
Let others bear to sea. Menetes heard,
But secret shelves too cautiously he fear'd:
And, fearing, sought the deep; and still aloof he steer'd.

With louder cries the captain call'd again;
"Bear to the rocky shore, and shun the main."
He spoke, and, speaking at his stern, he saw
The bold Cloanthus near the shelvings draw:
Betwixt the mark and him the Scylla stood,
And, in a closer compass, plough'd the flood:
He pass'd the mark, and wheeling got before:
Gyas blasphem'd the gods, devoutly swore,
Cry'd out for anger, and his hair he tore.
Mindless of others' lives (so high was grown
His rising rage) and careless of his own,
The trembling dotard to the deck he drew,
And hoisted up, and over-board he threw.
This done he seiz'd the helm, his fellows cheer'd,
Turn'd short upon the shelves, and madly steer'd.

Hardly his head the plunging pilot rears, Clogg'd with his clothes, and cumber'd with his years:

Now dropping wet, he climbs the cliff with pain;
The crowd, that saw him fall, and float again,
Shout from the distant shore, and loudly laugh'd,
To see his heaving breast discharge the briny draught.

The following Centaur, and the Dolphin's crew,
Their vanish'd hopes of victory renew:
While Gyas lags, they kindly in the race,
To reach the mark: Sergesthus takes the place:
Mnestheus pursues; and, while around they wind,
Comes up, not half his galley's length behind.
Then on the deck amidst his mates appear'd,
And thus their drooping courages he cheer'd:
"My friends, and Hector's followers heretofore,
Exert your vigour; tug the labouring oar; [crew,
Stretch'd to your strokes, my still-unconquer'd
Whom from the flaming walls of Troy I drew.

In this, ~~your~~ ~~own~~ interest, let me find
 That strength of hand, that courage of the mind,
 As when you stemm'd the strong Malaga flood,
 And o'er the Syrian's broken billows row'd.
 I seek not now the foremost palm to gain;
 Though yet—But ah, that bounty wish is vain!
 Let these enjoy it whom the gods ordain.
 But to be best, the lags of all the race,
 Redress yourselves and me from that disgrace."
 Now one and all, they tug amain; they row
 At the full stretch, and shake the frozen snow.
 The sea beneath them sinks: their labouring sides
 Are swell'd, and sweat runs gathering down in tides.
 Chance aids their daring with unhop'd success;
 Sergesthus, eager with his boat, to press
 Betwix the rival galley and the rock,
 Shuts th' unwieldy Centaur in the lock.
 The vessel struck; and, with the dreadful shock,
 Her oars she shiver'd, and her head she broke.
 The trembling rowers from their banks arise,
 And, anxious for themselves, renounce the prize.
 With iron poles they heave her off the shores;
 And gather from the sea their floating oars.
 The crew of Mnestheus, with elated minds,
 Urge their success, and call the willing winds:
 They ply their oars, and cut their liquid way
 In larger compass on the roomy sea.
 As when the dove her rocky hold forsakes,
 Row'd in a fright, her sounding wings she shakes,
 The cavern rings with clattering; out she flies,
 And leaves her callow care, and cleaves the skies;
 At first she flutters; but at length she springs
 To smother flight, and shoots upon her wings;
 So Mnestheus in the Dolphin cuts the sea,
 And flying with a force, that force assists his way.
 Sergesthus in the Centaur soon he pass'd,
 Wedg'd in the rocky shoals, and sticking fast.
 In vain the victor he with cries implores,
 And practices to row with shatter'd oars.
 Then Mnestheus bears with Gyas, and outflies:
 The ship without a pilot yields the prize.
 Unvanquish'd Scylla now alone remains;
 Her he pursues, and all his vigour strains.
 Shouts from the favouring multitude arise,
 Applauding echo to the shouts replies; (the skies
 Shouts, wishes, and applause, run rattling through
 These clamours with disdain the Scylla heard,
 Much grudg'd the praise, but more the robb'd reward:
 Resolv'd to hold their own, they mend their pace;
 All obstinate to die, or gain the race.
 Rais'd with success, the Dolphin swiftly ran
 (For they can conquer who believe they can):
 Both urge their oars, and fortune both supplies,
 And both perhaps had shar'd an equal prize:
 When to the seas Cloanthus holds his hands,
 And succour from the watery powers demands:
 "Gods of the liquid realms, on which I row,
 If, giv'n by you, the laurel bind my brow,
 Assist to make me guilty of my row.
 A snow-white bull shall on your shore be slain,
 His offer'd entrails cast into the main:
 And ruddy wine, from golden goblets thrown,
 Your graceful gift and my return shall own."
 The choir of nymphs, and Phorcus from below,
 With virgin Panopæa, heard his vow;
 And old Postume, with his breadth of hand,
 Push'd on, and sped the galley to the land.
 Swift as a shaft, on winged wind, she flies;
 And, dashing to the port, obtains the prize.

The herald summons all, and then proclaims
 Cloanthus conqueror of the naval games.
 The prince with laurel crowns the victor's head,
 And three fat steers are to his vessel led;
 The ship's reward: with generous wine beside,
 And sums of silver, which the crew divide.
 The leaders are distinguished from the rest,
 The victor honour'd with a nobler vest:
 Where gold and purple strive in equal power,
 And needle-work its happy cost bestows.
 There, Ganymede is wrought with living art,
 Chasing through Ida's groves the trembling hare;
 Breathless he seems, yet eager to pursue:
 When from aloft descends, in open view,
 The bird of Jove; and, coming on his prey,
 With crooked talons bears the boy away.
 In vain, with lifted hands and gazing eyes,
 His guards behold him soaring through the skies,
 And dogs pursue his flight, with imitated cries.
 Mnestheus the second victor was declar'd;
 And summon'd there, the second prize he shar'd;
 A coat of mail, which brave Demoleus bore,
 More brave Æneas from his shoulders tore,
 In single combat on the Trojan shore.
 This was ordain'd for Mnestheus to possess,
 In war for his defence; for ornament in peace:
 Rich was the gift, and glorious to behold;
 But yet, so ponderous with its plates of gold,
 That scarce two servants could the weight sustain.
 Yet, loaded thus, Demoleus o'er the plain
 Pursued, and lightly seiz'd the Trojan train.
 The third succeeding to the last reward,
 Two goodly bowls of mazy silver shar'd;
 With figures prominent, and richly wrought,
 And two brass cauldrons from Dodona brought.
 Thus, all rewarded by the hero's hands,
 Their conquering temples bound with purple bands,
 And now Sergesthus, clearing from the rock,
 Brought back his galley shatter'd with the shock,
 Forlorn she look'd without an aiding oar,
 And hooted by the vulgar, made to show.
 As when a snake, surpris'd upon the road,
 Is crush'd athwart her body by the load
 Of heavy wheels; or with a mortal wound
 Her belly bruise'd, and trodden to the ground,
 In vain, with jossen'd curls, she crawls along,
 Yet fierce above, she brandishes her tongue;
 Glares with her eyes, and bristles with her scales,
 But, grovelling in the dust, her parts unound she trails!
 So slowly to the port the Centaur tends,
 But what she wants in oars with sails amends:
 Yet, for his galley sav'd, the grateful prince
 Is pleas'd th' unhappy chief to recompense.
 Pholoe, the Cretan slave, rewards his care,
 Beauteous herself, with lovely twins, as fair.
 From thence his way the Trojan hero bent,
 Into the neighbouring plain, with mountains pent,
 Whose sides were shaded with surrounding wood:
 Full in the midst of this fair valley stop'd
 A native theatre, which rising slow,
 By just degrees, o'erlook'd the ground below.
 High on a sylvan throne the leader sat,
 A numerous train attend in solemn state;
 Here those, that in the rapid course delight,
 Desire of honour and the prize invite:
 The rival runners without order stand,
 The Trojans, mix'd with the Sicilian band.
 First Nisus with Euryalus appears,
 Euryalus a boy of blooming years;

With sprightly grace, and equal beauty crown'd:
Nisus for friendship to the youth renown'd.
Diores, next, of Priam's royal race,
Then Salius; join'd with Patron, took their place:
But Patron in Arcadia had his birth,
And Salius his from Acarnanian earth.
Then two Sicilian youths, the names of these,
Swift Helymus, and lovely Panopes,
Both jolly huntsmen, both in forest bred,
And owning old Acestes for their head.
With several others of ignobler name,
Whom time has not deliver'd o'er to fame.

To these the hero thus his thoughts explain'd:
In words, which general approbation gain'd:
" One common largess is for all design'd;
The vanquish'd and the victor shall be join'd.
Two darts of polish'd steel and Gnosian wood,
A silver-studded ax alike bestow'd.
The foremost three have olive wreaths decreed;
The first of these obtains a stately steed
Adorn'd with trappings; and the next in fame,
The quiver of an Amazonian dame,
With feather'd Thracian arrows well supply'd;
A golden belt shall gird his manly side,
Which with a sparkling diamond shall be ty'd:
The third this Grecian helmet shall content."
He said: to their appointed base they went:
With beating hearts th' expected sign receive,
And, starting all at once, the barrier leave.
Spread out, as on the winged winds, they flew,
And seiz'd the distant goal with greedy view.
Shot from the crowd, swift Nisus all o'er-pass'd;
Nor storms, nor thunder, equal half his haste.
The next, but though the next, yet far disjoint'd,
Came Salius, and Euryalus behind;
Then Helymus, whom young Diores ply'd,
Step after step, and almost side by side:
His shoulders pressing, and in longer space
Had won, or left at least a dubious race.

Now spent, the goal they almost reach at last;
When eager Nisus, hapless in his haste,
Slipp'd first, and, slipping, fell upon the plain,
Sok'd with the blood of oxen newly slain:
The careless victor had not mark'd his way;
But, treading where the treacherous puddle lay,
His heels flew up; and on the grassy floor
He fell, besmear'd with filth and holy gore.
Not mindless then, Euryalus, of thee,
Nor of the sacred bonds of amity,
He strove th' immediate rival's hope to cross,
And caught the foot of Salius as he rose:
So Salius lay extended on the plain;
Euryalus springs out, the prize to gain,
And leaves the crowd: applauding peals attend
The victor to the goal, who vanquish'd by his friend.

Next Helymus, and then Diores came,
By two misfortunes made the third in fame.

But Salius enters; and, exclaiming loud
For justice, deafens and disturbs the crowd:
Urges his cause may in the court be heard;
And pleads, the prize is wrongfully preferr'd.
But favour for Euryalus appears;
His blooming beauty, with his tender years,
Had brib'd the judges for the promis'd prize;
Besides, Diores fills the court with cries:
Who vainly reaches at the last reward,
If the first palm on Salius be conferr'd.
Then thus the prince: " Let no disputes arise:
Where fortune plac'd it, I award the prize:

But fortune's errors give me leave to mend,
At least to pity my deserving friend."
He said: and, from among the spoils, he draws
(Ponderous with shaggy mane and golden paws)
A lion's hide, to Salius this he gives;
Nisus with envy sees the gift, and grieves.
" If such rewards to vanquish'd men are due,"
He said, " and falling is to rise by you,
What prize may Nisus from your bounty claim,
Who merited the first rewards and fame?
In falling, both an equal fortune try'd;
Would fortune for my fall so well provide!"
With this he pointed to his face, and show'd
His hands, and all his habit smear'd with blood.
Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
And wond'rous to be produc'd an ample shield
Of wondrous art, by Didymæon wrought,
Long since from Neptune's bars in triumph brought,
This giv'n to Nisus, he divides the rest;
And equal justice in his gifts express'd.
The race thus ended, and rewards bestow'd,
Once more the prince bespeaks the attentive crowd:
" If there be here, whose dauntless courage dares
In gauntlet fight, with limbs and body bare,
His opposite sustain in open view,
Stand forth the champion, and the games renew.
Two prizes I propose, and thus divide:
A bull with gilded horns, and fillets ty'd,
Shall be the portion of the conquering chief;
A sword and helm shall cheer the loser's grief."
Then haughty Dares in the lists appears:
Stalking he strides, his head erected bears,
His nervous arms the weighty gauntlet wield,
And loud applauses echo through the field.
Dares alone in combat us'd to stand,
The match of mighty Paris hand to hand;
The same at Hector's funerals undertook
Gigantic Butes, of th' Amician stock;
And, by the stroke of his resistless hand,
Stretch'd the vast bulk upon the yellow sand.
Such Dares was; and such he strode along,
And drew the wonder of the gazing throng.
His brawny back, an ample breast he shows;
His lifted arms around his head he throws;
And deals in whistling air his empty blows.
His match is sought; but thro' the trembling band,
Not one dares answer to the proud demand.
Presuming of his force, with sparkling eyes,
Already he devours the promis'd prize.
He claims the bull with awless insolence;
And, having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince:
" If none my matchless valour dares oppose,
How long shall Dares wait his dastard foe?
Permit me, chief, permit without delay,
To lead this uncontended gift away."
The crowd assents; and, with redoubled cries,
For the proud challenger demands the prize.
Acestes, fir'd with just disdain, to see
The palm usurp'd without a victory,
Reproach'd Entellus thus, who sat beside,
And heard, and saw unmov'd, the Trojan's pride:
" Once, but in vain, a champion of renown,
So tamely can you bear the ravish'd crown?
A prize in triumph, borne before your sight,
And shun for fear the danger of the fight;
Where is our Eryx now, the boasted name,
The god who taught your thundering arm the game?

Where now your baffled honour, where the spoil
That fill'd your house, and fame that fill'd our isle!"

Entellus, thus: " My soul is still the same ;
 Unmov'd with fear, and mov'd with martial fame :
 But my chill blood is curdled in my veins,
 And scarce the shadow of a man remains.
 Oh, could I turn to that fair prime again,
 That prime, of which this boaster is so vain !
 The brave who this decrepit age defies,
 Should feel my force, without the promis'd prize,"
 He said ; and, rising at the word, he threw
 Two ponderous gauntlets down, in open view ;
 Gauntlets, which Eryx wont in fight to wield,
 And sheath his hands with in the list'd field.
 With fear and wonder seiz'd, the crowd beholds
 The gloves of death, with seven distinguish'd folds
 Of tough bull hides ; the space within is spread
 With iron, or with loads of heavy lead.
 Dares himself was daunted at the sight,
 Renounc'd his challenge, and refus'd to fight.
 Astonish'd at their weight the hero stands,
 And pois'd the ponderous engines in his hands.
 " What had your wonder," said Entellus, " been,
 Had you the gauntlets of Alcides seen,
 Or view'd the stern debate on this unhappy green !
 These which I bear, your brother Eryx bore,
 Still mark'd with batter'd brains and mingled gore.
 With these he long sustain'd th' Herculean arm ;
 And these I wielded while my blood was warm :
 This languish'd frame while better spirits fed,
 Ere age unstrung my nerves, or time o'er-snow'd my head.
 But, if the challenger these arms refuse,
 And cannot wield their weight, or dare not use ;
 If great Æneas and Acastes join
 In his request, these gauntlets I resign :
 Let us with equal arms perform the fight,
 And let him leave to fear, since I resign my right."
 This said, Entellus for the strife prepares ;
 Strip of his quilted coat, his body bares :
 Compos'd of mighty bones and beawn he stands,
 A godly towering object, on the sands.
 Then just Æneas equal arms supply'd,
 Which round their shoulders to their wrists they Both on the tiptoe stand, at full extent ; [ty'd ;
 Their arms aloft, their bodies inly bent ;
 Their heads from aiming blows they bear afar ;
 With clashing gauntlets then provoke the war.
 One on his youth and pliant limbs relies ;
 One on his sinews and his giant size.
 The last is stiff with age, his motion slow,
 He heaves for breath : he staggers to and fro ;
 And clouds of issuing smoke his nostrils loudly blow.
 Yet, equal in success, they ward, they strike ;
 Their ways are different, but their art alike.
 Before, behind, the blows are dealt ; around
 Their hollow sides the rattling thumps resound :
 A storm of strokes well-meant with fury flies,
 And errs about their temples, ears, and eyes :
 Nor always errs : for oft the gauntlet draws
 A sweeping stroke, along the crackling jaws.
 Heavy with age, Entellus stands his ground,
 But, with his warping body, wards the wound :
 His hand and watchful eye keep even pace ;
 While Dares traverses, and shifts his place ;
 And, like a captain, who belegates round
 Some strong-built castle, on a rising ground,
 Views all th' approaches with observing eyes,
 This, and that other part, in vain he tries ;
 And more on industry than force relies,
 With hands on high, Entellus threatens the foe ;
 But Dares watch'd the motion from below, [blow.
 And slipt aside, and shunn'd the long-descending

Entellus wastes his forces on the wind ;
 And thus deluded of the stroke design'd,
 Headlong and heavy fell : his ample breast,
 And weighty limbs, his ancient mother press'd,
 So falls a hollow pine, that long had stood
 On Ida's height, or Erymanthus' wood,
 Torn from the roots : the differing nations rise,
 And shouts, and mingled murmurs, rend the skies,
 Acastes runs, with eager haste, to raise
 The fall'n companion of his youthful days :
 Dauntless he rose, and to the fight return'd,
 With shame his glowing cheeks, his eyes with fury
 burn'd :

Didain and conscious virtue fir'd his breast,
 And, with redoubled force, his foe he press'd.
 He lays on load with either hand, amain,
 And headlong drives the Trojan o'er the plain,
 Nor stops, nor stays ; nor rest nor breath allows,
 But storms of strokes descend about his brow ;
 A rattling tempest, and a hail of blows.
 But now the prince, who saw the wild increase
 Of wounds, commands the combatants to cease :
 And bounds Entellus' wrath, and bids the peace.
 First on the Trojan, spent with toil, he came,
 And sooth'd his sorrow for the suffer'd shame.
 " What fury seiz'd my friend? the gods," said
 he,

" To him propitious, and averse to thee,
 Have giv'n his arm superior force to thine ;
 'Tis madness to contend with strength divine."
 The gauntlet fight thus ended, from the shore
 His faithful friends unhappy Dares bore :
 His mouth and nostrils pour'd a purple flood ;
 And pounded teeth came rushing with his blood.
 Faintly he stagger'd through the hissing throng ;
 And hung his head, and trail'd his legs along.
 The sword and casque are carry'd by his train ;
 But with his foe the palm and ox remain.

The champion, then, before Æneas came ;
 Proud of his prize, but prouder of his fame :
 " O goddess-born ! and you, Dardanion host,
 Mark with attention, and forgive my boast :
 Learn what I was, by what remains ; and know
 From what impending fate, you sav'd my foe."
 Sternly he spoke ; and then confronts the bull ;
 And, on his ample forehead, aiming full,
 The deadly stroke descending, pierc'd the skull.
 Down drops the beast : nor needs the second wound ;
 But sprawls in pangs of death, and spurns the
 ground.

Then thus. " In Dares' stead I offer this ;
 Eryx, accept a nobler sacrifice :
 Take the last gift my wither'd arms can yield ;
 Thy gauntlets I resign, and here renounce the field."

This done, Æneas orders, for the close,
 The strife of archers with contending bows.
 The mast, Sergesthus' shatter'd galley bore,
 With his own hands he raises on the shore :
 A fluttering dove upon the top they tie,
 The living mark at which their arrows fly.
 The rival archers in a line advance ;
 Their turn of shooting to receive from chance.
 A helmet holds their names. The lots are drawn ;
 On the first scroll was read Hippocoon :
 The people shout ; upon the next was found
 Young Mnestheus, late with naval honours crown'd :
 The third contain'd Eurytion's noble name,
 Thy brother, Pandarus, and next in fame :
 Whom Pallas urg'd the treaty to confound,
 And send among the Greeks a feather'd wound.

Acestes in the bottom last remain'd;
Whom not his age from youthful sports restrain'd.
Soon all with vigour bend their trusty bows,
And, from the quiver, each his arrow chose:
Hippocoon's was the first: with forceful sway
It flew, and, whizzing, cut the liquid way.
Fix'd in the meat the feather'd weapon stands;
The fearful pigeon darts in her bands;
And the tree trembled; and the shouting cries
Of the pleas'd people round the vaulted skies.
Then Menestheus to the head his arrow drove,
With fix'd eyes, and took his aim above;
But miss'd a glancing shot, and miss'd the dove.
Yet mis'd so narrow, that he cut the cord
Which fasten'd, by the foot, the sitting bird.
The captive thus releas'd, away she flies,
And beats, with clapping wings, the yielding skies.
His bow already bent, Eurytion stood,
And, having first invoc'd his brother god,
His winged shaft with eager haste he sped;
The fatal message reach'd her as she fled:
She leaves her life aloft: she strikes the ground,
And sends back the weapon in the wound,
Acestes, grudging at his lot, remains
Without a prize to gratify his pains.
Yet shooting upward, sends his shaft, to show
An archer's art, and boast his twanging bow.
The feather'd arrow gave a dire portent;
And latter augurs judge from this event.
Chaf'd by the speed, it fir'd; and, as it flew,
A trail of following flames ascending drew:
Kindling they mouat, and mark the shiny way
Across the skies, as falling meteors play,
And vanish into wind, or in a blaze decay.
The Trojans and Sicilians wildly stare;
And, trembling, turn their wonder into prayer.
The Dardas prince put on a smiling face,
And strain'd Acestes with a close embrace:
Then, honouring him with gifts above the rest,
Turn'd the bad omen, nor his fears confess'd.
"The gods," said he, "this miracle have wrought;
And order'd you the prize without the lot.
Accept this goblet rough with figur'd gold,
Which Thracian Cisseus gave my sire of old:
This pledge of ancient amity receive,
Which to my second sire I justly give."
He said; and, with the trumpet's cheerful sound,
Proclaim'd him victor, and with laurel crown'd.
Nor good Eurytion envy'd him the prize;
Though he transfix'd the pigeon in the skies.
Who cut the line, with second gifts was grac'd;
The third was his, whose arrow pierc'd the mast.
The chief, before the games were wholly done,
Call'd Periphantes, tutor to his son;
And whisper'd thus: "With speed Ascanius find,
And if his childish troop be ready join'd,
On horseback let him grace his grandire's day;
And lead his equals arm'd in just array."
He said; and, calling out, the cirque he clears:
The crowd withdrawn, an open plain appears.
And now the noble youths, of form divine,
Advance before their fathers in a line:
The riders grace the steeds; the steeds with glory
shine.

Thus marching on, in military pride,
Shouts of applause resound from side to side.
Their casques, adorn'd with laurel wreaths, they
Each brandishing aloft a cornel spear. [wear,
Some at their backs their gilded quivers bore;
Their chains of burnish'd gold hung down before:

Three graceful troops they dispos'd upon the plain;
Three graceful leaders at their head were seen;
Twelve follow'd every chief, and left a space between.

The first young Priam led; a lovely boy,
Whose grandire was th' unhappy king of Troy:
His race, in after-time, was known to fame,
New honours adding to the Latin name;
And well the royal boy his Thracian stand possess'd,
White were the fetlocks of his fast before,
And on his front a snowy star he bore:
Then beauteous Atis, with Iulus head,
Of equal age, the second squadron led.
The last in order, but the first in place,
First in the lovely features of his face,
Rode fair Ascanius on a fiery steed,
Queen Dido's gift, and of the Tyrian breed,
Sure couriers for the rest the king ordains,
With golden bits adorn'd, and purple reins.

The pleas'd spectators-peals of shouts renew,
And all the parents in the children view:
Their make, their motions, and their sprightly
grace:

And hopes and fears alternate in the face.
Th' unobd'g commanders, and their martial
First make the circuit of the sandy plain, (train
Around their sires: and, at th' appointed sign,
Drawn up in beauteous order, form a line.
The second signal sounds: the troop divides
In three distinguish'd parts, with three distinguish'd guides.

Again they close, and once again disjoin,
And troop to troop oppos'd, and line to line.
They meet, they wheel, they throw their darts afar
With harmless rage, and well-dissembled war.
Then in a round the mingled bodies run;
Flying they follow, and pursuing shun.
Broken they break, and rallying, they renew,
In other forms, the military shew.

At last, in order, undiscern'd they join;
And march together, in a friendly line.
And, as the Cretan labyrinth of old,
With wandering ways, and many a winding fold,
Involv'd the weary feet, without redress,
In a round error, which deny'd recess;
So fought the Trojan boys in warlike play,
Turn'd, and return'd, and still a different way.
Thus dolphins, in the deep, each other chase,
In circles, when they swim around the watery race
This game, these carousals, Ascanius taught;
And, building Alba, to the Latins brought;
Show'd what he learn'd: the Latin sires impart,
To their succeeding sons, the graceful art:
From these imperial Rome receiv'd the game;
Which Troy, the youths the Trojan troop, they name.

Thus far the sacred sports they celebrate:
But Fortune soon resum'd her ancient hate:
For while they pay the dead his annual dues,
Those envy'd rites Saturnian Juno views;
And sends the goddess of the various bow,
To try new methods of revenge below:
Supplies the winds to wing her airy way;
Where in the port secure the navy lay.
Swiftly fair Iris down her arch descends;
And, undiscern'd, her fatal-voyage ends.
She saw the gathering crowd; and gliding thence,
The desert shore, and fleet without defence.
The Trojan matrons on the sands alone,
With sighs and tears, Anchises' death bemoan

Then, turning to the sea their weeping eyes,
Their pity to themselves renounces their cries.
"Alas!" said one, "what oceans yet remain
For us to sail! what labours to sustain!"
All take the word; and, with a general groan,
Implore the gods for peace; and places of their own.

The goddess, great in mischief, views their pains;
And, in a woman's form, her heavenly limbs restrains.

In face and shape, old Beroë she became,
Doriclus' wife, a venerable dame;
Once blest with riches, and a mother's name.
Thus chang'd, amidst the crying crowd she ran,
Mix'd with the matrons, and these words began:
"O wretched we, whom not the Grecian power,
Nor flames destroy'd, in Troy's unhappy hour!
O wretched we, reserv'd by cruel fate,
Beyond the ruins of the sinking state!

Now seven revolving years are wholly run,
Since this impetuous voyage we began:
Since torn'd from shores to shores, from lands to Inhospitable rocks and barren sands; [lands,
Wandering in exile, through the stormy sea,
We search in vain for flying Italy.

Now cast by fortune on this kindred land,
What should our rest, and rising walls, withstand?
Or hinder here to fix our banish'd band?
O, country lost! and gods redress'd in vain,
If still in endless exile we remain!

Shall we no more the Trojan walls renew,
Or streams of some dissembled Simois view?
Haste, join with me, th' unhappy fleet consume:
Cassandra bids, and I declare her doom.
In sleep I saw her; she supply'd my hands
(For this I more than dream) with flaming brands:
With these," said she, "these wandering ships destroy;

These are your fatal seats, and this your Troy.
Time calls you now, the precious hour employ.
Slack not the good passage, while Heaven inspires
Our minds to dare, and gives the ready fires.
See Neptune's stars minister their brands;
The god is pleas'd; the god supplies our hands."
Then, from the pile, a flaming fire she drew,
And, toss'd in air, amidst the gallees threw.
Whipp'd in amaze, the matrons wildly stare:
Then Pyrgo, reverenc'd for her hoary hair,
Pyrgo, the nurse of Priam's numerous race,
"No Beroë this, though she belies her face:
What terrors from her frowning front arise!
Behold a goddess in her ardent eyes!
What rays around her heavenly face are seen,
Mark her majestic voice, and more than mortal mien!

Beroë but now I left; whom, pin'd with pain,
Her age and anguish from these rites detain."
She said; the matrons, seiz'd with new amaze,
Roll their malignant eyes, and on the navy gaze:
They fear, and hope, and neither part obey:
They hope the fated land, but fear the fatal way.
The goddess, having done her task below,
Mounts up on equal wings, and bends her painted bow.

Struck with the sight, and seiz'd with rage divine,
The matrons prosecute their mad design:
They shriek aloud, they snatch, with impious hands,
The food of altars, fits, and flaming brands.
Green boughs, and saplings, mingled in their haste;
And smoking together on the ships they cast.

The flame, stopp'd at first, more fasty gains;
And Vulcan rides at large with loose'd reins:
Triumphant to the painted steers he scurs,
And seizes in his way the banks and crackling oars.
Eumelpe was the first the noise to hear,
While yet they crowd the rural theatre.

Then what they hear, is witness'd by their eyes:

A storm of sparkles and of flames arise.
Ascensius took th' alarm, while yet he led
His early warriors on his prancing steed.
And spurring on, his equals soon o'erpass'd,
Nor could his frighted friends reclaim his hater:
Soon as the royal youth appear'd in view,
He sent his voice before him as he flew:

"What madness moves you, matrons, to destroy
The last remainder of unhappy Troy?
Not hostile fleets, but your own hopes you burn,
And on your friends your fatal fury turn,
Behold your own Anaxidus!" while he said,
He drew his glittering helmet from his head;
In which the youths to sportful arms he led.

By this, Æneas and his train appear;
And now the women, seiz'd with shame and fear,
Dispers'd, to woods and caverns take their flight;
Abhor their actions, and avoid the light:
Their friends acknowledge, and their error find;
And shake the goddess from their alter'd mind.

Not so the raging fires their fury cease;
But lurking in the seams, with seeming peace,
Work on their way, amid the unceasing roar,
Sure in destruction, but in motion slow.

The silent plague through the green timber cuts,
And vomits out a tardy flame by fits.
Down to the keels, and upward to the sails,
The fire descends, or mounts; but still prevails:
Nor buckets pour'd, nor strength of human hand,
Can the victorious element withstand.

The pious hero rends his robe, and throws
To Heaven his hands, and with his hands his vows:
"O Jove!" he cry'd, "if prayers can yet have place;

If thou abhor'st not all the Dardan race;
If any spark of pity still remain;
If gods are gods, and not invok'd in vain;
Yet spare the relics of the Trojan train.
Yet from the flames our burning vessels free:
Or let thy fury fall alone on me.

At this devoted head thy thunder throw,
And send the willing sacrifice below."

Scarce had he said, when southern storms arise;
From pole to pole the fork lightning flies;
Loud rattling shakes the mountains and the plain;
Heaven bellies downward, and descends in rain;
Whole sheets of water from the clouds are sent,
Which, hissing through the planks, the flames prevent:

And stop the fiery pest: four ships alone
Burn to the waste, and for the fleet atone.

But doubtful thoughts the hero's heart divide;
If he should still in Sicily reside,
Forgetful of his fates; or tempt the main,
In hope the promis'd Italy to gain.

Then Nantos, odd and wise, to whom alone
The will of Heaven by Pallas was fore-shown;
Vers'd in portents, experienc'd and inspir'd
To tell events, and what the fates requir'd:
Thus while he stood, to neither part inclin'd,
With cheerful words reliev'd his labouring mind:
"O goddess-born, resign'd in every state,
With patience bear, with prudence push your fate.

By suffering well, our fortune we subdue ;
 Fly when she frowns, and when she calls pursue.
 Your friend Acestes is of Trojan kind ;
 To him disclose the secrets of your mind :
 Trust in his hands your old and useless train,
 Too numerous for the ships which yet remain :
 The feeble, old, indulgent of their ease,
 The dames who dread the dangers of the seas,
 With all their dastard crew, who dare not stand
 The shock of battle with your foes by land ;
 Here you may build a common town for all ;
 And, from Acestes' name, Acesta call."

The reasons, with his friend's experience join'd,
 Encourag'd much, but more disturb'd his mind.
 'Twas dead of night ; when to his slumbering eyes,
 His father's shade descended from the skies ;
 And thus he spoke : " O more than vital breath,
 Lov'd while I liv'd, and dear ev'n after death ;
 O son ! in various toils and troubles tost,
 The king of Heaven employs my careful ghost
 On his commands ; the god who sav'd from fire
 Your flaming fleet, and heard your just desire :
 The wholesome counsel of your friend receive ;
 And here the coward train, and women, leave :
 The chosen youth, and those who nobly dare
 Transport, to tempt the dangers of the war.
 The stern Italians with their courage try ;
 Rough are their manners, and their minds are high.
 But first to Pluto's palace you should go,
 And seek my shade among the blest below.
 For not with impious ghosts my soul remains,
 Nor suffers, with the damn'd, perpetual pains,
 But breathes the living air of soft Elysian plains.
 The chaste Sibylla shall your steps convey ;
 And blood of offer'd victims free the way ;
 There shall you know what realms the gods assign ;
 And learn the fates and fortunes of your line.
 But now, farewell : I vanish with the night ;
 And feel the blast of Heaven's approaching light."

He said, and mix'd with shades, and took his airy flight.

" Whither so fast ?" the filial duty cry'd,
 " And why, ah why ! the wish'd embrace deny'd !"
 He said, and rose : as holy zeal inspires,
 He rakes hot embers, and renews the fires.
 His country gods and Vesta then adores
 With cakes and incense ; and their aid implores.
 Next for his friends and royal host he sent,
 Revea'd his vision and the gods' intent,
 With his own purpose. All, without delay,
 The will of Jove and his desires obey.
 They list with women each degenerate name,
 Who dares not hazard life, for future fame.
 These they cashier : the brave remaining few,
 Oars, banks, and cables, half consum'd, renew.
 The prince designs a city with the plough ;
 The lots their several tenements allow.
 This part is nam'd from Ilium, that from Troy ;
 And the new king ascends the throne with joy.
 A chosen senate from the people draws ;
 Appoints the judges, and ordains the laws.
 Then on the top of Eryx, they begin
 A rising temple to the Paphian queen :
 Anchises, last, is honour'd as a god ;
 A priest is added, annual gifts bestow'd ;
 And groves are planted round his blest abode.
 Nine days they pass in feasts, their temples crown'd ;
 And fumes of incense in the fanes abound.
 Then, from the south arose a gentle breeze,
 That curl'd the smoothness of the glassy seas :

The rising winds a ruffling gale afford,
 And call the merry mariners on board.
 Now loud laments along the shores resound,
 Of parting friends, in close embraces bound.
 The trembling women, the degenerate train,
 Who shunn'd the frightful dangers of the main,
 Ev'n those desire to sail, and take their share
 Of the rough passage, and the promis'd war ;
 Whom good Æneas cheers ; and recommends
 To their new master's care his fearful friends.
 On Eryx' altars three fat calves he lays ;
 A lamb new fallen to the stormy seas ;
 Then slips his hausers, and his anchors weighs.
 High on the deck the god-like hero stands ;
 With olive crown'd ; a charger in his hands ;
 Then cast the reeking entrails in the brine,
 And pour'd the sacrifice of purple wine.
 Fresh gales arise, with equal strokes they vie,
 And brush the buxom seas, and o'er the billows fly.

Meantime the mother goddess, full of fears,
 To Neptune thus address'd, with tender tears :
 " The pride of Jove's imperious queen, the rage,
 The malice, which no sufferings can assuage,
 Compel me to these prayers : since neither fate,
 Nor time, nor pity, can remove her hate.
 Ev'n Jove is thwarted by his haughty wife ;
 Still vanquish'd, yet she still renews the strife.
 As if 'twere little to consume the town
 Which sav'd the world, and wore th' imperial crown ;
 She prosecutes the ghost of Troy with pains ;
 And gnaws, ev'n to the bones, the last remains.
 Let her the causes of her hatred tell ;
 But you can witness its effects too well.
 You saw the storms she rais'd on Lybian floods,
 That mix'd the mountain billows with the clouds ;
 When, bribing Æolus, she shook the main,
 And mov'd rebellion in your watery reign.
 With fury she possess'd the Dardan dames
 To burn their feet with execrable flames :
 And forc'd Æneas, when his ships were lost,
 To leave his followers on a foreign coast :
 For what remains, your godhead I implore ;
 And trust my son to your protecting power.
 If neither Jove's nor fate's decree withstand,
 Secure his passage to the Latian land."

Then thus the mighty ruler of the main :
 " What may not Venus hope, from Neptune's reign ?
 My kingdom claims your birth : my late defence
 Of your endanger'd fleet may claim your confidence.

Nor less by land than sea my deeds declare
 How much your lov'd Æneas is my care.
 Thee, Xanthus, and thee, Simois, I attest :
 Your Trojan troops when proud Achilles press'd,
 And drove before him headlong on the plain,
 And dash'd against their walls the trembling train,
 When floods were fill'd with bodies of the slain :
 When crimson Xanthus, doubtful of his way,
 Stood up on ridges to behold the sea ;
 New heaps came tumbling in, and chok'd his way :
 When your Æneas fought, but fought with odds,
 Of force unequal, and unequal gods ;
 I spread a cloud before the victor's sight,
 Sustain'd the vanquish'd, and secur'd his flight.
 Ev'n then secur'd him, when I sought with joy
 The vow'd destruction of ungrateful Troy.
 My will's the same : fair goddess, fear no more,
 Your fleet shall safely gain the Latian shore :
 Their lives are given ; one destin'd head alone
 Shall perish, and for multitudes atone."

Thus having arm'd with hopes her anxious mind,
 His sinny team Saturnian Neptune join'd.
 Then adds a foamy bridle to their jaws,
 And to the loosen'd reins permits the laws.
 Fligh on the waves his azure car he guides;
 Its axles thunder, and the sea subsides;
 And the smooth ocean rolls her silent tides.
 The tempests fly before their father's face;
 Trains of inferior gods his triumph grace;
 And monster whales before their master play,
 And choirs of Tritons crowd the watery way.
 The martial powers in equal troops divide
 To right and left: the gods his better side
 Eaclose, and on the worse the nymphs and nereids
 Now smiling hope, with sweet vicissitude, [ride.
 Within the hero's mind, his joys renew'd.
 He calls to raise the masts, the sheets display;
 The cheerful crew with diligence obey;
 They scud before the wind, and sail in open sea.
 A-head of all the master pilot steers,
 And, as he leads, the following navy veers.
 The steeds of night had travel'd half the sky,
 The drowsy rowers on their benches lie;
 When the soft god of sleep, with easy flight,
 Descends, and draws behind a trail of light.
 Thou, Palinurus, art his destin'd prey;
 To thee alone he takes his fatal way.
 Diva dreams to thee, and iron sleep, he bears;
 And, lighting on thy prow, the form of Phobus
 Then thus the traitor god began his tale: [wears.
 "The winds, my friend, inspire a pleasing gale;
 The ships, without thy care, securely sail.
 Now steal an hour of sweet repose; and I
 Will take the rudder, and thy room supply."
 To whom the yawning pilot, half asleep:
 "Me dost thou bid to trust the treacherous deep!
 The harlot smiles of her dissembling face,
 And to her faith commit the Trojan race?
 Shall I believe the syren south again,
 And, oft betray'd, not know the monster main?"
 He said, his fasten'd hands the rudder keep,
 And, fix'd on Heaven, his eyes repel invading sleep.
 The god was wroth, and at his temples threw
 A branch in Lethe dipp'd, and drunk with Stygian
 The pilot, vanquish'd by the power divine, [dew:
 Soon clos'd his swimming eyes, and lay supine.
 Source were his limbs extended at their length,
 The god, insulting with superior strength,
 Fell heavy on him, plung'd him in the sea,
 And, with the stern, the rudder tore away.
 Headlong he fell, and, struggling in the main,
 Cry'd out for helping hands, but cry'd in vain:
 The victor demon mounts obscure in air;
 While the ship sails without the pilot's care.
 On Neptune's faith the floating fleet relies:
 But what the man forsook, the god supplies;
 And o'er the dangerous deep secure the navy flies:
 Glides by the syren's cliffs, a shelvy coast,
 Long infamous for ships and sailors lost;
 And white with bones: th' impetuous ocean roars;
 And rocks rebellow from resounding shores.
 The watchful hero felt the knocks; and found
 The tossing vessel sail'd on shoaly ground.
 Sure of his pilot's loss, he takes himself
 The helm, and steers aloof, and shuns the shelf.
 Inly he griev'd, and, groaning from the breast,
 Deplor'd his death; and thus his pain express'd:
 "For faith repos'd on seas, and on the flattering sky,
 Thy naked corpse is doom'd on shores unknown to lie."

THE SIXTH BOOK OF
 THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Sibyl foretels Æneas the adventures he should meet with in Italy: she attends him to Hell: describing to him the various scenes of that place, and conducting him to his father Anchises: who instructs him in those sublime mysteries of the soul of the world, and the transmigration: and shows him that glorious race of heroes which was to descend from him and his posterity.

He said, and wept: then spread his sails before
 The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman shore:
 Their anchors dropt, his crew the vessels moor.
 They turn their heads to sea, their sterns to land;
 And greet, with greedy joy, th' Italian strand.
 Some strike from clashing flints their fiery seed;
 Some gather sticks the kindled flames to feed;
 Or search for hollow trees, and fell the woods,
 Or trace through vallies the discover'd floods.
 Thus, while their several charges they fulfil,
 The pious prince ascends the sacred hill
 Where Phobus is ador'd, and seeks the shade
 Which hides from sight his venerable maid.
 Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode;
 Thence full of fate returns, and of the god.
 Thro' Trivia's grove they walk; and now behold,
 And enter now the temple roof'd with gold.
 When Dædalus, to fly the Cretan shore,
 His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore,
 (The first who sail'd in air) 'tis sung by fame,
 To the Cumesan coast at length he came;
 And here alighting, built this costly frame.
 Inscrib'd to Phœbus, here he hung on high
 The steerage of his wings, that cuts the sky;
 Then o'er the lofty gate his art emboss'd
 Androgeos' death, and offerings to his ghost:
 Seven youths from Athens yearly sent, to meet
 The fate appointed by revengeful Crete.
 And next to those the dreadful urn was plac'd,
 In which the destin'd names by lots were cast:
 The mournful parents stand around in tears;
 And rising Crete against their shore appears.
 There too, in living sculpture, might be seen
 The mad affection of the Cretan queen:
 Then how she cheats her bellowing lover's eye:
 The rushing leap, the doubtful progeny,
 The lower part a beast, a man above,
 The monument of their polluted love.
 Nor far from thence he grav'd the wondrous maze;
 A thousand doors, a thousand winding ways:
 Here dwells the monster, hid from human view,
 Not to be found but by the faithful clue:
 Till the kind artist, mov'd with pious grief,
 Lent to the loving maid this last relief;
 And all those erring paths describ'd so well,
 That Theseus conquer'd, and the monster fell.
 Here hapless Icarus had found his part;
 Had not the father's grief restrain'd his art.
 He twice essay'd to cast his son in gold;
 Twice from his hands he dropp'd the forming mould.

All this with wondering eyes Aeneas view'd:
 Each varying object his delight renew'd.
 Eager to read the rest, Achates came,
 And by his side the mad divining dame;
 The priestess of the god, Deiphobe her name.
 "Time suffers not," she said, "to feed your eyes
 With empty pleasures: haste the sacrifice.
 Seven bullocks yet unyok'd, for Phœbus choose,
 And for Diana seven unspotted ewes."
 This said, the servants urge the sacred rites;
 While to the temple she the prince invites.
 A spacious cave, within its furthest part,
 Was hew'd and fashion'd by laborious art
 Through the hill's hollow sides: before the place,
 A hundred doors, a hundred entries grace:
 As many voices issue; and the sound
 Of Sibyl's words as many times rebound.
 Now to the mouth they come: aloud she cries,
 "This is the time; inquire your destinies.
 He comes, behold the god!" Thus while she said
 (And shivering at the metal entry stand),
 Her colour chang'd, her face was not the same,
 And hollow groans from her deep spirit came.
 Her hair stood up; convulsive rage possess'd
 Her trembling limbs, and heav'd her labouring breast.

Greater than human-kind she seem'd to look:
 And, with an accent more than mortal, spoke.
 Her staring eyes with sparkling fury roll;
 When all the god came rushing on her soul.
 Swiftly she turn'd, and foaming as she spoke.
 "Why this delay?" she cried; "the powers in-
 Thy prayers alone can open this abode, [vok'd
 Else void are my demands, and dumb the god."
 She said no more: the trembling Trojans hear;
 O'erspread with a damp sweat, and holy fear.
 The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd,
 His vows to great Apollo thus address'd:
 "Indulgent god, propitious power to Troy,
 Swift to relieve, unwilling to destroy;
 Directed by whose hand, the Dardan dart
 Pierc'd the proud Grecian's only mortal part:
 Thus far, by fate's decrees, and thy commands,
 Through ambient seas, and through devouring
 sands,

Our exil'd crew has sought thy Aesonian ground;
 And now, at length, the flying court is found;
 Thus for the fate of Troy, from place to place,
 With fury has pursued her wandering race:
 Here cease, ye powers, and let your vengeance end;

Troy is no more, and can no more offend.
 And thou, O sacred maid! inspir'd to see
 Th' event of things in dark fatality,
 Give me, what Heaven has promis'd to my fate,
 To conquer and command the Latian state:
 To fix my wandering gods, and find a place
 For the long exiles of the Trojan race.
 Then shall my grateful hands a temple rear
 To the twin gods, with vows and solemn prayer;
 And annual rites, and festivals, and games,
 Shall be perform'd to their auspicious names;
 Nor shalt thou want thy honours in my land,
 For there thy faithful oracles shall stand,
 Present'd in shrines: and every sacred bay,
 Which, by thy mouth, Apollo shall convey:
 All shall be treasure'd, by a chosen train
 Of holy priests, and ever shall remain.
 But, oh! commit not thy prophetic mind
 To fitting leaves, the sport of every wind,

Lest they dispense in air our empty fate!
 Write not, but, what the powers ordain, relate."
 Struggling in vain, impatient of her load,
 And labouring underneath the ponderous god,
 The more she strove to shake him from her breast,
 With more, and far superior force, he press'd:
 Commands his entrance, and, without control,
 Usurps her organs, and inspires her soul.
 Now, with a furious blast, the hundred doors
 Ope of themselves; a rushing whirlwind roars
 Within the cave; and Sibyl's voice restores:
 "Escap'd the dangers of the watery reign,
 Yet more and greater ills, by land remain;
 The coast so long desir'd (nor doubt th' event)
 Thy troops shall reach, but having reach'd, repent.

Wars, horrid wars, I view; a field of blood;
 And Tyber rolling with a purple flood.
Simois nor Xanthus shall be wanting there;
 A new Achilles shall in arms appear:
 And he, too, goddess-born: fierce Juno's hate,
 Added to hostile force, shall urge thy fate.
 To what strange nations shalt thou resort!
 Driven to solicit aid at every court!
 The cause the same which Ilion once oppress'd,
 A foreign mistress and a foreign guest:
 But thou, secure of soul, unbent with woes,
 The more thy fortune frowns, the more oppress:
 The dawns of thy safety shall be shown,
 From whence thou least shalt hope, a Grecian town."

Thus, from the dark recess, the Sibyl spoke,
 And the resisting air the thunder broke;
 The overbellow'd, and the temple shook.
 Th' ambiguous god, who rul'd her labouring breast,
 In these mysterious words his mind express:
 "Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest."
 At length her fury fell, her foaming ceas'd,
 And, ebbing in her soul, the god decreas'd.
 Then thus the chief: "No terror to my view,
 No frightful face of danger can be new:
 I dur'd to suffer, and resolv'd to dare,
 The fates, without my power, shall be without my care.

This let me crave, since near your grove the road
 To Hell lies open, and the dark abode
 Which Acheton surrounds, th' innavigable flood:
 Conduct me through the regions void of light,
 And lead me longing to my father's sight:
 For him, a thousand dangers I have sought;
 And, rushing where the thickest Grecians fought,
 Safe on my back the sacred burden brought.
 He, for my sake, the raging ocean try'd
 And wrath of Heaven, my still auspicious guide,
 And bore beyond the strength decrepit age sup-
 ply'd.

Oh! since he breath'd his last, in dead of night,
 His reverend image stood before my sight;
 Enjoin'd to seek below his holy shade;
 Condescended there by your assisting aid:
 But you, if pious minds by prayers are won,
 Oblige the father, and protect the son.
 Yours is the power; nor Proserpine in vain
 Has made you priestess of her sightly reign.
 If Orpheus, arm'd with his enchanting lyre,
 The ruthless king with pity could inspire,
 And from the shades below redeem his wife;
 If Pollux, offering his alternate life,
 Could free his brother, and can daily go
 By turns aloft, by turns descend below.

Why name I Theon, or his greater friend,
Who tread the downward path, and upward could ascend!

Not less than theirs, from Jove my lineage came:
My mother greater, my descent the same."
So pray'd the Trojan prince; and, while he pray'd,
His hand upon the holy altar laid.

Then thus reply'd the prophetic divine:
"O goddess-born! of great Anchises' line,
The gates of Hell are open night and day:
Smooth the descent, and easy is the way:
But to return, and view the cheerful skies,
In this the task and mighty labour lies.
To few great Jupiter imparts this grace,
And those of shining worth, and heavenly race.
Betwixt those regions, and our upper light,
Deep forests and impenetrable night
Possess the middle space. Th' infernal bounds
Coeytus, with his sable waves, surrounds:
But, if so dire a love your soul invades,
As twice below to view the trembling shades;
If you so hard a toil will undertake,
As twice to pass th' innavigable lake,
Receive my counsel. In the neighbouring grove
There stands a tree: the queen of Stygian Jove
Claims it her own; thick woods and gloomy night
Conceal the happy plant from human sight.
One bough it bears; but, wondrous to behold,
The ductile rind, and leaves, of radiant gold:
This from the vulgar branches must be torn,
And to fair Proserpine the present borne,
Ere leave be given to tempt the nether skies:
The first thus rent, a second will arise,
And the same metal the same room supplies.
Look round the wood, with lifted eyes to see
The lurking gold upon the fatal tree:
Then rend it off, as holy rites command;
The willing metal will obey thy hand,
Following with ease, if, favour'd by thy fate,
Thou art foredoom'd to view the Stygian state:
If not, no labour can the tree constrain,
And strength of stubborn arms, and steel are vain.
Besides, you know not, while you here attend,
Th' unworthy fate of your unhappy friend:
Breathless he lies, and his unbury'd ghost,
Depriv'd of funeral rites, pollutes your host.
Pay first his pious dues: and, for the dead,
Two sable sheep around his hearse be led:
Then, living turfs upon his body lay;
This done, securely take the destin'd way,
To find the regions destitute of day."

She said: and held her peace. Æneas went
Sad from the cave, and full of discontent;
Unknowing whom the sacred Sibyl meant,
Achates, the companion of his breast,
Goes grieving by his side with equal cares oppress'd.
Walking they talk'd, and fruitlessly divin'd
What friend the priestess, by those words, design'd:
But soon they found an object to deplore;
Misenus lay extended on the shore;
Son of the god of winds; none so renown'd,
The warrior trumpet in the field to sound:
With breathing brass to kindle fierce alarms,
And rouse to dare their fate in honourable arms.
He serv'd great Hector; and was ever near,
Not with his trumpet only, but his spear,
But, by Pelides' arm when Hector fell,
He chose Æneas, and he chose as well.
Swain with applause, and aiming still at more,
He now provokes the sea-gods from the shore;

With envy Triton heard the martial sound,
And the bold champion, for his challenge, drown'd.
Then cast his mangled corpse on the strand;
The gazing crowd around the body stand.
All weep, but most Æneas mourns his fate,
And hastens to perform the funeral state.
In altar-wise a stately pile they rear;
The basis broad below, and top advanc'd in air
As snatched wood, fit for the work design'd
(The shady covert of the savage kind)
The Trojans found: the sounding ox is ply'd:
Firs, pines, and pitch-trees, and the towering pile
Of forest ashes, feel the fatal stroke,
And pitreous wedges cleave the stubborn oak.
Huge trunks of trees, fell'd from the steepy crown
Of the bare mountains, toll with rain down.
Arm'd like the rest the Trojan prince appears,
And, by his pious labour, urges theirs.
Thus while he wrought, revolving in his mind
The ways to compass what his wish design'd,
He cast his eyes upon the gloomy grove,
And then, with vows, impior'd the queen of love:
"O may thy power, propitious still to me,
Conduct my steps to find the fatal tree,
In this deep forest; since the Sibyl's breath
Foretold, alas! too true, Misenus' death."
Scarce had he said, when, full before his sight,
Two doves, descending from their airy flight,
Secure upon the grassy plain alight.
He knew his mother's birds; and thus he pray'd:
"Be you my guides, with your auspicious aid;
And lead my footsteps, till the branch be found,
Whose glittering shadow gilds the sacred ground:
And thou, great parent! with celestial care,
In this distress, be present to my prayer."
Thus having said, he stopp'd: with watchful sight
Observing still the motions of their flight,
What course they took, what happy signs they shew:

They fed, and, fluttering, by degrees withdrew
Still further from the place, but still in view:
Hopping, and flying, thus they led him on
To the slow lake: whose baleful stretch to shun,
They wing'd their flight slow; then stooping low,
Perch'd on the double tree, that bears the golden bough.

Through the green leaves the glittering shadows
As on the sacred oak, the wintry mistletoe: [glow;
Where the proud mother views her precious brood;
And happier branches, which she never sow'd.
Such was the glittering, such the ruddy rind,
And dancing leaves, that wanton'd in the wind.
He seiz'd the shining bough with gripping hold
And rent away, with ease, the lingering gold:
Then to the Sibyl's palace bore the prize.
Meantime, the Trojan troops, with weeping eyes,
To dead Misenus pay his obsequies.

First from the ground a lofty pile they rear,
Of pitch-trees, oaks, and pines, and unctuous fir:
The fabric's front, with cypress twigs they strew,
And stick the sides with boughs of baleful yew,
The topmost part, his glittering arms adora;
Warm waters, then, in brazen cauldrons borne,
Are pour'd to wash his body, joint by joint:
And fragrant oils the stiffen'd limbs anoint.
With groans and cries Misenus they deplore:
Then on a bier, with purple cover'd o'er,
The breathless body, thus bewail'd, they lay,
And fire the pile, their faces turn'd away
(Such reverend rites their fathers us'd to pay).

Pure oil and incense on the fire they throw,
 And fat of victims, which his friends bestow;
 These gifts, the greedy flames to dust devour;
 Then, on the living coals, red wine they pour:
 And last, the relics by themselves dispose,
 Which in a brazen urn the priests enclose.
 Old Choroineus compass'd thrice the crew,
 And dipp'd an olive branch in holy dew;
 Which thrice he sprinkled round, and thrice aloud
 Invok'd the dead, and then dismiss'd the crowd.

But good Æneas order'd on the shore
 A stately tomb; whose top a trumpet bore;
 A soldier's falchion, and a seaman's oar.
 Thus was his friend interr'd: and deathless fame
 Still to the lofty cape consigns his name.

These rites perform'd, the prince, without delay,
 Hastes to the nether world his destin'd way.
 Deep was the cape; and downward as it went
 From the wide mouth, a rocky rough descent;
 And here th' access a gloomy grove descends;
 And here th' unnavigable lake extends.
 O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
 No bird presumes to steer his airy flight;
 Such deadly stench from the depth arise,
 And steaming sulphur, that infects the skies.
 From hence the Grecian bards their legends make,
 And give the name Averous to the lake.
 Four sable bullocks, in the yoke untaught,
 For sacrifice the pious hero brought;
 The priestess pours the wine betwixt their horns;
 Then cuts the curling hair; that first oblation
 Invoking Hecate hither to repair [burns,

(A powerful name in Hell, and upper air).
 The sacred priests with ready knives bereave
 The beasts of life, and in full bowls receive
 The streaming blood: a lamb to Hell and Night
 (The sable wool without a streak of white)

Æneas offers: and, by fate's decree,
 A barren heifer, Proserpine, to thee.
 With holocausts he Pluto's altar fills:
 Seven brawny bulls with his own hand he kills:
 Then, on the broiling entrails, oil he pours;
 Which, ointed thus, the raging flame devours:
 Late, the nocturnal sacrifice begun;
 Nor ended, till the next returning Sun.

Then earth began to bellow, trees to dance,
 And howling dogs in glimmering light advance,
 Ere Hecate came: "Far hence be souls profane,"
 The Sibyl cry'd, "and from the grove abstain."
 Now, Trojan, take the way thy fates afford,
 Assume thy courage, and unsheath thy sword."
 She said, and pass'd along the gloomy space,
 The prince pursu'd her steps with equal pace.

Ye realms, yet unreveal'd to human sight,
 Ye gods, who rule the regions of the night,
 Ye gliding ghosts, permit me to relate
 The mystic wonders of your silent state.

Obscure they went through dreary shades, that Along the waste dominions of the dead: [led
 Thus wander travellers in woods by night,
 By the Moon's doubtful and malignant light:
 When Jove in dusky clouds involves the skies,
 And the faint crescent shoots by fits before their

Just in the gate, and in the jaws of Hell, [eyes.
 Revengeful Cares and sullen Sorrows dwell;
 And pale Diseases, and repining Age;
 Wan Fear, and Famine's unresisted rage:
 Here Foils, and Death, and Death's half-brother,
 Sleep,

Forms terrible to view, their centry keep:

With anxious Pleasures of a giddy mind,
 Deep Frauds before, and open Force behind:
 The Furies' iron beds, and Strife that shakes
 Her hissing tresses, and unfolds her snakes.
 Full in the midst of this infernal road,
 An elm displays her dusky arms abroad:
 The god of Sleep there hides his heavy head,
 And empty dreams on every leaf are spread.
 Of various forms unnumber'd spectres more;
 Centaurs, and double shapes, besiege the door:
 Before the passage horrid Hydra stands,
 And Briareus with all his hundred hands:
 Gorgons, Geryon with his triple frame,
 And vain Chimæra vomits empty flame.
 The chief unsheath'd his shining steel, prepar'd,
 Though seiz'd with sudden fear, to force the guard,
 Offering his brandish'd weapon at their face,
 Had not the Sibyl stopp'd his eager pace,
 And told him what those empty phantoms were:
 Forms without bodies, and impassive air.
 Hence to deep Acheron they take their way,
 Whose troubled eddies, thick with ooze and clay,
 Are whirl'd aloft, and in Cocytus lost:
 There Charon stands, who rules the dreary coast:
 A sordid god; down from his hoary chin
 A length of beard descends: uncomb'd, unclean;
 His eyes, like hollow furnaces on fire;
 A girdle, foul with grease, binds his obscene attire.
 He spreads his canvass, with his pole he steers;
 The freights of fitting ghosts in his thin bottom
 bears.

He look'd in years; yet in his years were seen
 A youthful vigour, and autumnal green.
 An airy crowd came rushing where he stood,
 Which fill'd the margin of the fatal flood,
 Husbands and wives, boys and unmarried'd maids,
 And mighty heroes' more majestic shades,
 And youths, intomb'd before their fathers' eyes,
 With hollow groans, and shrieks, and feeble cries:
 Thick as the leaves in autumn strow the woods,
 Or fowls, by winter forc'd, forsake the flocks,
 And wing their hasty flights to happier lands:
 Such, and so thick, the shivering army stands,
 And press for passage with extended hands.

Now these, now those, the surly boatman bore;
 The rest he drove to distance from the shore.
 The hero, who beheld, with wondering eyes,
 The tumult mix'd with shrieks, laments, and cries,
 Ask'd of his guide, what the rude concourse meant?

Why to the shore the thronging people bent?
 What forms of law among the ghosts were us'd?
 Why some were ferry'd o'er, and some refus'd?
 "Son of Anchises, offspring of the gods,"
 The Sibyl said, "you see the Stygian floods,
 The sacred streams, which Heaven's imperial state
 Attest in oaths, and fears to violate.

The ghosts rejected, are th' unhappy crew
 Depriv'd of sepulchres, and funeral due.
 The boatman Charon; those, the bury'd host,
 He ferries over to the farther coast.
 Nor dares his transport vessel cross the waves,
 With such whose bones are not compos'd in graves.
 A hundred years they wander on the shore,
 At length, their penance done, are wafted o'er."
 The Trojan chief his forward pace repress'd;
 Revolving anxious thoughts within his breast.
 He saw his friends, who, whelm'd beneath the waves, [graves

Their funeral honours claim'd, and ask'd their quest

The lost Lencaspis in the crowd he knew;
 And the brave leader of the Lycian crew:
 Whom, on the Tyrrhene seas the tempests met;
 The sailors master'd, and the ship o'er-set.
 Amidst the spirits Palinurus press'd;
 Yet fresh from life; a new admitted guest.
 Who while he, steering, view'd the stars; and bore
 His course from Afric, to the Latian shore,
 Fell headlong down. The Trojan fix'd his view,
 And scarcely through the gloom the sullen shadow knew. [friend,

Then thus the prince: "What envious power, O
 Brought your lov'd life to this disastrous end?
 For Phœbus, ever true in all he said,
 Has, in your fate alone, my faith betray'd.
 The god foretold, you should not die, before
 You reach, secure from seas, the Italian shore.
 Is this th' unerring power?" The ghost reply'd,
 "Nor Phœbus flatter'd, nor his answers ly'd;
 Nor envious gods have sent me to the deep:
 But while the stars, and course of Heaven I keep,
 My weary'd eyes were seiz'd with fatal sleep.
 I fell; and, with my weight, the helm constrain'd
 Was drawn along, which yet my gripe retain'd.
 Now by the winds, and raging waves, I swear,
 Your safety, more than mine, was then my care:
 Lost, of the guide hereft, the rudder lost,
 Your ship should run against the rocky coast.
 There blustering nights, borne by the southern
 I floated, and discover'd land at last: [blast,
 High on a mountain wave my head I bore;
 Forcing my strength, and gathering to the shore:
 Panting, but past the danger, now I seiz'd
 The craggy cliffs, and my tir'd members eas'd.
 While, cumber'd with my dropping clothes, I lay,
 The cruel nation, covetous of prey,
 Stain'd with my blood th' unhospitable coast:
 And now, by winds and waves, my lifeless limbs are
 tost:

Which O avert, by you ethereal light
 Which I have lost, for this eternal night:
 Or, if by dearer ties you may be won,
 By your dead sire, and by your living son,
 Redeem from this reproach my wandering ghost,
 Or with your navy seek the Velin coast;
 Or in a peaceful grave my corpse compose:
 And, if a nearer way your mother shows,
 Without whose aid, you durst not undertake
 This frightful passage o'er the Stygian lake;
 Lead to this wretch your hand, and waft him o'er
 To the sweet banks of yon forbidden shore."
 Scarcely had he said, the prophetess began,
 "What hopes delude thee, miserable man?
 Think'st thou, thus unintomb'd, to cross the floods,
 To view the furies, and infernal gods;
 And visit, without leave, the dark abodes?
 Attend the term of long, revolving years:
 Fate, and the dooming gods, are deaf to tears.
 This comfort of thy dire misfortune take;
 The wrath of Heaven, inflicted for thy sake,
 With vengeance shall pursue th' inhuman coast,
 Till they propitiate thy offended ghost,
 And raise a tomb, with vows, and solemn prayer;
 And Palinurus' name the place shall bear."
 This calm'd his cares, sooth'd with his future fate,
 And pleas'd to hear his propagated name.

Now nearer to the Stygian lake they draw,
 Whom, from the shore, the surly boatman saw;
 Observ'd their passage through the shady wood,
 And mark'd their near approach to the flood:

Then thus he call'd aloud, inflam'd with wrath;
 "Mortal, whate'er, who this forbidden path
 In arms presum'st to tread, I charge thee stand,
 And tell thy name, and business in the land.
 Know this, the realm of night; the Stygian shore:
 My boat conveys no living bodies o'er:
 Nor was I pleas'd great Theseus once to bear,
 Who forc'd a passage with his pointed spear;
 Nor strong Alcides, men of mighty fame;
 And from th' immortal gods their lineage came."
 In fetters one the barking porter ty'd
 And took him trembling from his sovereign's side:
 Two sought by force to seize his beauteous bride.
 To whom the Sibyl thus: "Compose thy mind:
 Nor frauds are here contriv'd, nor force design'd.
 Still may the dog the wandering troops constrain
 Of airy ghosts; and vex the guilty train:
 And with her grisly lord his lovely queen remain.
 The Trojan chief, whose lineage is from Jove,
 Much fam'd for arms, and more for filial love,
 Is sent to seek his sire, in your Elysian grove.
 If neither piety, nor Heaven's command,
 Can gain his passage to the Stygian strand,
 This fatal present shall prevail at least;"
 Then show'd the shining bough, conceal'd within her vest.

No more was needful, for the gloomy god
 Stood mute with awe, to see the golden rod;
 Admir'd the destin'd offering to the queen
 (A venerable gift so rarely seen).
 His fury thus appears'd, he puts to land;
 The ghosts forsake their seats at his command:
 He clears the deck, receives the mighty freight,
 The leaky vessel groans beneath the weight.
 Slowly she sails, and scarcely stems the tides:
 The pressing water pours within her sides.
 His passengers at length, are wafted o'er;
 Expos'd in muddy weeds upon the miry shore.
 No sooner landed, in his den they found
 The triple porter of the Stygian sound,
 Grim Cerberus; who soon began to rear
 His crested snakes, and arm'd his bristling hair.
 The prudent Sibyl had before prepar'd
 A sop in honey steep'd to charm the guard.
 Which, mix'd with powerful drugs, she cast before
 His greedy, grinding jaws, just op'd to rear:
 With three enormous mouths he gapes, and straight,

With hunger prest, devours the pleasing bait.
 Long draughts of sleep his monstrous limbs ensnare;
 He reels, and, falling, fills the spacious cave.
 The keeper charm'd, the chief without delay
 Pass'd on, and took th' irremovable way.
 Before the gates, the cries of babes new born,
 Whom fate had from their tender mothers torn,
 Assault his ears: then those whose form of laws
 Condemn'd to die, when traitors judg'd their cause.

Nor want they lots, nor judges to review
 The wrongful sentence, and award a new.
 Minos, the strict inquisitor, appears,
 And lives and crimes, with his assessors, hears.
 Round, in his urn, the blended balls he rolls,
 Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls.
 The next in place, and punishment, are they;
 Who prodigally throw their souls away;
 Fools, who repining at their wretched state,
 And loathing anxious life, suborn'd their fate.
 With late repentance now they would retrieve
 The bodies they forsok, and wish to live.

Their pains and poverty desire to bear, [air.
To view the light of Heaven, and breathe the vital
But fate forbids; the Stygian floods oppose,
And with nine circling streams, the captive soul
enclose.

Not far from thence, the mournful fields appear;
So call'd, from lovers that inhabit there.

The souls, whom that unhappy flame invades,
In secret solitude, and myrtle shades,
Make endless moans, and, pining with desire,
Lament too late their unextinguish'd fire.

Here Procris, Eriphyle here, he found
Baring her breast, yet bleeding with the wound
Made by her son. He saw Pasiphaë there,
With Phædra's ghost, a foul incestuous pair.
There Lædamia, with Evadne moves:
Unhappy both, but loyal in their loves.

Cæneus, a woman once, and once a man;
But ending in the sex she first began.

Not far from these Phœnician Dido stood,
Fresh from her wound, her bosom bath'd in blood.
Whom, when the Trojan hero hardly knew,
Obscure in shades, and with a doubtful view
(Doubtful as he who runs through dusky night,
Or thinks he sees the Moon's uncertain light);
With tears he first approach'd the sullen shade,
And, as his love inspir'd him, thus he said:

"Unhappy queen! then is the common breath
Of rumour true, in your reported death,
And I, alas, the cause! By Heaven, I vow,
And all the powers that rule the realms below,
Unwilling I forsook your friendly state:
Commanded by the gods, and forc'd by fate.
Those gods, that fate, whose unresisted might
Have sent me to these regions, void of light:
Through the vast empire of eternal night.
Nor dar'd I to presume, that, press'd with grief,

My flight should urge you to this dire relief.
Stay, stay your steps, and listen to my vows,
'Tis the last interview that fate allows!"

In vain he thus attempts her mind to move,
With tears and prayers, and late repenting love:
Disdainfully she look'd; then turning round,
But fix'd her eyes unmov'd upon the ground:
And what he says, and swears, regards no more,
Than the deaf rocks, when the loud billows roar;
But whirl'd away, to shun his hateful sight,
Hid in the forest, and the shades of night.

Then sought Sicheus, through the shady grove,
Who answer'd all her cares, and equal'd all her
Some pious tears the pitying hero paid, [love.
And follow'd with his eyes the sitting shade.
Then took the forward way, by fate ordain'd,
And, with his guide, the farther fields attain'd,
Where, sever'd from the rest, the warrior souls remain'd.

Tideus he met, with Meleager's race,
The pride of armies, and the soldiers' grace;
And pale Adrastus with his ghastly face.
Of Trojan chiefs he view'd a numerous train:
All much lamented, all in battle slain.
Glæucus and Medon, high above the rest,
Antenor's sons, and Ceres' sacred priest:
And proud Idæus, Priam's charioteer, [spear.
Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy
The gladsome ghosts, in circling troops, attend,
And, with unwearied eyes, behold their friend,
Delight to hover near, and long to know
What business brought him to the realms below.

But Argive chiefs, and Agamemnon's train,
When his refulgent arms flash'd through the shady plain,
Fled from his well-known face, with wouled fear,
As when his thundering sword and pointed spear Drove headlong to their ships, and gleam'd the routed rear.

They rais'd a feeble cry, with trembling notes;
But the weak voice deceiv'd their gasping throats.
Here Priam's son, Deiphobus he found,
Whose face and limbs were once continued wound.
Dishonest, with lopp'd arms, the youth appears,
Spoil'd of his nose, and shorten'd of his ears.
He scarcely knew him, striving to disown
His blotted form, and blushing to be known.
And therefore first began: "O Teucer's race,
Who durst thy faultless figure thus de-face?
What heart could wish, what hand inflict, this dire disgrace?"

'Twas fam'd, that in our last and fatal night,
Your single prowess long sustain'd the fight:
Till, tir'd, not forc'd, a glorious fate you chose,
And fell upon a heap of slaughter'd foes.
But, in remembrance of so brave a deed,
A tomb and funeral honours I decreed:
Thrice call'd your manes on the Trojan plains:
The place your armour and your name retains.
Your body too I sought; and, had I found,
Design'd for burial in your native ground."

The ghost reply'd; "Your piety has paid
All needful rites to rest my wandering shade:
But cruel fate, and my more cruel wife,
To Grecian swords betray'd my sleeping life.
These are the monuments of Helen's love:
The shame I bear below, the marks I bore above.
You know in what deluding joys we past
The night, that was by Heaven decreed our last.
For, when the fatal horse descending down,
Pregnant with arms, o'erwhelm'd th' unhappy
town,

She feign'd nocturnal orgies; left my bed,
And, mix'd with Trojan dames, the dances led;
Then, waving high her torch, the signal made,
Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambuscade.
With watching overworn, with cares oppress,
Unhappy I had laid me down to rest;
And heavy sleep my weary limbs possess'd.
Meantime my worthy wife our arms mislay'd;
And, from beneath my head, my sword convey'd;

The door unlatch'd; and with repeated calls,
Invites her former lord within my walls.
Thus in her crime her confidence she plac'd,
And with new treasons would redeem the past.
What need I more? Into the room they ran,
And meanly murder'd a defenceless man.
Ulysses, basely born, first led the way:
Avenge power! with justice if I pray,
That fortune be their own another day!

"But answer you; and in your turn relate,
What brought you, living, to the Stygian state?
Driven by the winds and errors of the sea,
Or did you Heaven's superior doom obey?
Or tell what other chance conducts your way?
To view with mortal eyes our dark retreats,
'Tumults and torments of th' infernal seats?"
While thus, in talk, the flying hours they past,
The Sun had finish'd more than half his race:
And they; perhaps, in words and tears had spent
The little time of stay, which Heaven had lent.

But thus the Sibyl chides their long delay :
" Night rushes down, and headlong drives the day :

Tis here, in different paths, the way divides ;
The right, to Pluto's golden palace guides ;
The left to that unhappy region tends,
Which to the depth of Tartarus descends ;
The seat of night profound, and punish'd fiends."
Then thus Deiphobus : " O sacred maid !
Forbear to chide ; and be your will obey'd :
Lo to the secret shadows I retire,
To pay my penance till my years expire.
Proceed, auspicious prince, with glory crown'd,
And born to better fates than I have found." -
He said ; and while he said, his steps he turn'd
To secret shadows, and in silence mourn'd.
The hero, looking on the left, espied
A lofty tower, and strong on every side
With treble walls, which Phlegethon surrounds,
Whose fiery flood the burning empire bounds :
And, press'd betwixt the rocks, the bellowing noise resounds.

Wide is the fronting gate, and rais'd on high
With adamantine columns, threats the sky.
Vain is the force of man, and Heaven's as vain,
To crush the pillars which the pile sustain.
Sublime on these a tower of steel is rear'd,
And dire Tisiphone there keeps the ward.
Girt in her sanguine gown, by night and day,
Observant of the souls that pass the downward way :
From hence are heard the groans of ghosts, the pains

Of sounding lashes, and of dragging chains.
The Trojan stood astonish'd at their cries,
And ask'd his guide, from whence those yells arise ?
And what the crimes and what the tortures were,
And loud laments that rent the liquid air ?
She thus reply'd : " The chaste and holy race
Are all forbidden this polluted place.
But Hecate, when she gave to rule the woods,
Then led me trembling through those dire abodes,
And taught the tortures of th' avenging gods.
These are the realms of unrelenting fate :
And awful Rhadamanthus rules the state ;
He hears and judges each committed crime ;
Inquires into the manner, place, and time.
The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal :
Loth to confess, unable to conceal :
From the first moment of his vital breath,
To this last hour of unrepenting death.
Straight, o'er the guilty ghost, the fury shakes
The sounding whip, and brandishes her snakes :
And the pale sinner, with her sisters, taken
Then, of itself, unfolds th' eternal door :
With dreadful sounds the brazen hinges roar.
You see, before the gate, what stalking ghost
Commands the guard, what sentries keep the post.
More formidable Hydra stands within ;
Whose jaws with iron teeth severely grin.
The gaping gulph, low to the centre lies ;
And twice as deep as Earth is distant from the
The rivals of the gods, the Titan race, [skies.
Here sing'd with lightning, roll within th' un-fathom'd space.
Here lie th' Aëtan twins (I saw them both),
Enormous bodies, of gigantic growth ;
Who dar'd in fight the thunderer to defy ;
Affect his Heaven, and force him from the sky.
Saipeones suffering cruel pains, I found,
For emulating Jove ; the rattling sound

Of mimic thunder, and the glittering blaze
Of pointed lightnings, and their forky rays.
Through Elis and the Grecian towns he flew :
Th' audacious wretch four fiery coursers drew ;
He wav'd a torch aloft, and, madly vain,
Sought godlike worship from a servile train.
Ambitious fool, with horny hoofs to pass
O'er hollow arches, of resounding brass ;
To rival thunder, in its rapid course,
And imitate inimitable force.
But he, the king of Heaven, obscure on high,
Bar'd his red arm, and lancing from the sky
His writhen bolt, not shaking empty smoke,
Down to the deep abyss the flaming felon strook.
There Tityus was to see, who took his birth
From Heaven ; his nursing from the foodful Earth.
Here his gigantic limbs, with large embrace,
Enfold nine acres of infernal space.
A ravenous vulture in his open'd side,
Her crooked beak and cruel talons try'd :
Still for the growing liver digg'd his breast ;
The growing liver still supply'd the feast.
Still are his entrails fruitful to their pains :
Th' immortal hunger lasts, th' immortal food re-
ixion and Pirithous I could name ; [inains.
And more Thessalian chiefs of mighty fame.
High o'er their heads a mouldering rock is plac'd,
That promises a fall, and shakes at every blast.
They lie below, on golden beds display'd,
And genial feasts, with regal pomp, are made.
The queen of furies by their sides is set,
And snatches from their mouths th' untasted meat.
Which if they touch, her hissing snakes she rears :
Tossing her torch, and thundering in their ears.
Then they, who brothers' better claim disown,
Expel their parents, and usurp the throne ;
Defraud their clients, and to lucre sold,
Sit brooding on unprofitable gold :
Who dare not give, and ev'n refuse to lend
To their poor kindred, or a wanting friend ;
Vast is the throng of these ; nor less the train
Of lustful youths, for foul adultery slain.
Hosts of deserters, who their honour sold,
And basely broke their faith for bribes of gold :
All these within the dungeon's depth remain,
Despairing pardon, and expecting pain.
Ask not what pains ; nor farther seek to know
Their process, or the forms of law below.
Some roll a mighty stone ; some laid along,
And, bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung.

Unhappy Theseus, doom'd for ever there,
Is fixt by fate on his eternal chair :
And wretched Phlegias warns the world with cries
(Could warning make the world more just or wise)
Learn righteousness, and dread th' avenging deities.
To tyrants others have their country sold,
Imposing foreign lords, for foreign gold :
Some have old laws repeal'd, new statutes made ;
Not as the people pleas'd, but as they paid.
With incest some their daughters' bed profan'd.
All dar'd the worst of ills, and what they dar'd, at-
Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues, [tain'd.
And throats of brass, inspir'd with iron lungs,
I could not half those horrid crimes repeat,
Nor half the punishments those crimes have met.
But let us haste our voyage to pursue ;
The walls of Pluto's palace are in view :
The gate, and iron arch above it, stands
On anvils, labour'd by the Cyclops' hands.

Before our farther way the fates allow,
Here must we fix on high the golden bough."
She said; and through the gloomy shades they past,

And chose the middle path: arriv'd at last,
The prince, with living water, sprinkled o'er
His limbs and body, then approach'd the door,
Possess'd the porch, and on the front above
He fix'd the fatal bough, requir'd by Pluto's love.
These holy rites perform'd, they took their way,
Where long-extended plains of pleasure lay.
The verdant fields with those of Heaven may vie;
With ether vested, and a purple sky:
The blissful seats of happy souls below:
Stars of their own, and their own sons they know.
Their airy limbs in sports they exercise,
And, on the green, contend the wrestler's prize.
Some, in heroic verse, divinely sing,
Others in artful measures lead the ring.
The Thracian bard, surrounded by the rest,
There stands conspicuous in his flowing vest.
His flying fingers, and harmonious quill,
Strike seven distinguish'd notes, and seven at once they fill.

Here found they Teucer's old heroic race;
Born better times, and happier years to grace.
Assaracus and Ilius here enjoy
Perpetual fame, with him who founded Troy.
The chief beheld their chariots from afar,
Their shining arms, and coursers train'd to war:
Their lances fixt in earth, their steeds around,
Free from their harness, graze the flowery ground.
The love of horses which they had, alive,
And care of chariots, after death survive.
Some cheerful souls, were feasting on the plain;
Some did the song and some the choir maintain:
Beneath a laurel shade, where mighty Po
Mounts up to woods above, and hides his head below.

Here patriots live, who for their country's good,
In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
Priests of nblemish'd lives here made abode,
And poets worthy their aspiring god:
And searching wits, of more mechanic parts,
Who grac'd their age with new invented arts.
Those who, to worth, their bounty did extend;
And those who knew that bounty to commend.
The heads of these with holy fillets bound,
And all their temples were with garlands crown'd.

To these, the Sibyl thus her speech address'd;
And first to him surrounded by the rest;
Toweing his height, and ample was his breast:
"Say, happy souls, divine Musæus say,
Where lives Anchises, and where lies our way
To find the hero, for whose only sake
We sought the dark abodes, and cross'd the bitter lake?"

To this the sacred poet thus reply'd:
"In no fixt place the happy souls reside;
In groves we live, and lie on mossy beds,
By crystal streams, that murmur through the meads:

But pass you easy hill, and thence descend,
The path conducts you to your journey's end."
This said, he led them up the mountain's brow,
And shows them all the shining fields below;
They wind the hill, and through the blissful meadows go.

But old Anchises, in a flowery vale,
Review'd his muster'd race, and took the tale.

Those happy spirits, which, ordain'd by fate,
For future being, and new bodies wait,
With studious thought observ'd th' illustrious
In nature's order as they pass'd along. (through,
Their names, their fates, their conduct, and their
In peaceful states, and successful war. (care,
He, when Æneas on the plain appears,
Meets him with open arms, and falling tears.
"Welcome," he said, "the gods' undoubted rest,
O long expected to my dear embrace;
Once more tis' given me to behold your face!
The love and piety duty which you pay,
Havé pass'd the perils of so hard a way.
'Tis true, computing times, I now believ'd
This happy day approach'd, nor are my hopes deceiv'd.

What length of lands, what oceans have you pass'd,
What storms sustain'd, and on what shores been cast?

How have I fear'd your fate! But fear'd it not
When love assail'd you on the Libyan coast."
To this, the filial duty thus replies:
"Your sacred ghost before my sleeping eyes
Appear'd; and often urg'd this painful enterprise
After long toiling on the Tyrrhene sea,
My navy rides at anchor in the bay.
But reach your head, oh parent shade, nor shun
The dear embraces of your longing son!"
He said, and falling tears his face bedew:
Then thrice around his neck his arms he threw:
And thrice the sitting shadow shipp'd away,
Like winds, or empty dreams that fly the day.
Now, in a secret vale, the Trojan sees
A separate grove, through which a gentle breeze
Plays with a passing breath, and whispers through the trees,

And just before the confines of the wood,
The gliding Lethe leads her silent flood.
About the boughs an airy nation flows,
Thick as the humming bees, that hunt the golden
In summer's heat, on tops of lilies feed, (dew,
And creep within their cells, to suck the honey
The winged army roves the field around; (and
The rivers and the rocks resound to the sound.
Æneas wondering stood: then ask'd the cause,
Which to the stream the crowding people dash.
Then thus the sire: "The souls that through the flood (for'd

Are those, to whom, by fate, are other fates
In Lethe's lake they long oblivion taste;
Of future life scarce, forgetful of the past.
Long has my soul desir'd this time and place,
To set before your sight your glorious race.
That this presaging joy may fire your mind,
To seek the shores by destiny design'd."

"O father, can it be, that souls subdued,
Return to visit our terrestrial chime?
And that the generous mind, released by death,
Can covet lazy times, and mortal breath?"
Anchises, then, in order thus began
To clear those wonders to his godlike son:
"Know first, that Heaven and Earth's compact framed,

And flowing waters, and the starry flame,
And both the radiant lights, one common soul
Inspires and feeds, and animates the whole.
This active mind infus'd through all the space,
Unites and mingles with the mighty swim.
Hence men and beasts the breath of life obtain;
And birds of air, and numbers of the main.

Th' eternal vigour is in all the mass,
 And every soul is fill'd with equal flame:
 As much as earthy limbs, and gross alloy
 Of mortal members, subject to decay,
 Blast not the beams of Heaven and edge of day.
 From this coarse mixture of terrestrial parts,
 Desire and fear by turns possess their hearts;
 And grief and joy; nor can the groveling mind,
 In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd,
 Assert the native skies, or own its heavenly kind.
 Nor death itself can wholly wash their stains:
 But long-contracted filth, e'en in the soul, remains.
 The relics of inveterate vice they wear:
 And spots of sin-obscene in every face appear.
 For this are various penances enjoin'd;
 And some are hung to bleach upon the wind;
 Some plung'd in waters, others purg'd in fires,
 Till all the dregs are drain'd, and all the rest expires!

All have their manes, and those manes bear:
 The few, so cleans'd, to these abodes repair,
 And breathe, in ample fields, the soft Elysian air.
 Then are they happy, when, by length of time,
 The scurf is worn away of each committed crime.
 No speck is left of their habitual stains;
 But the pure ether of the soul remains.
 But when a thousand rolling years are past
 (So long their punishments and penance last;)
 Whole droves of minds are, by the driving god,
 Compell'd to drink the deep Lethæan flood:
 In large forgetful draughts to steep the cares
 Of their past labours, and their irksome years.
 That, unremembering of its former pain,
 The soul may suffer mortal flesh again."
 Thus having said, the father spirit leads
 The priestess and his son thro' swarms of shades,
 And takes a rising ground, from thence to see
 The long procession of his progeny.
 "Survey," pursu'd the sire, "this airy throng;
 As, offer'd to the view, they pass along.
 These are th' Italian names, which fate will join
 With ours, and graft upon the Trojan line.
 Observe the youth who first appears in sight,
 And holds the nearest station to the light,
 Already seems to snuff the vital air,
 And leans just forward on a shining spear;
 Silvius is he: thy last-begotten race,
 But first in order sent, to fill thy place.
 An Alba name, but mix'd with Dardan blood:
 Born in the covert of a shady wood;
 Him fair Lavinia, thy surviving wife,
 Shall breed in groves, to lead a solitary life.
 In Alba he shall fix his royal seat:
 And, born a king, a race of kings beget.
 Then Procas, honour of the Trojan name,
 Capys, and Numitor, of endless fame.
 And second Silvius after these appears;
 Silvius Æneas, for thy name he bears,
 For arms and justice equally renown'd:
 Who, late restor'd, in Alba shall be crown'd.
 How great they look, how vigorously they wield
 Their weighty lances, and sustain the shield!
 But they, who crown'd with oaken wreaths appear,
 Shall Gabian walls and strong Fidenæ rear:
 Nomentum, Bola, with Pometia found;
 And raise Colatian towers on rocky ground.
 All these shall then be towns of mighty fame,
 Though now they lie obscure, and lands without a
 See Remains the great, born to restore [name].
 The crown that once his injur'd grandaere wore.

This prince, a priestess of your blood shall bear;
 And, like his sire, in arms he shall appear.
 Two rising crests his royal head adorn;
 Born from a god, himself to godhead born.
 His sire, already, signs him for the skies,
 And marks the seat amidst the deities.
 Auspicious chief! thy race in times to come
 Shall spread the conquest of imperial Rome.
 Rome, whose ascending towers shall Heaven invade;
 Involving earth and ocean in her shade.
 High as the mother of the gods in place;
 And proud, like her, of an immortal race.
 Then when in pomp she makes the Phrygian round,
 With golden turrets on her temples crown'd,
 A hundred gods her sweeping train supply;
 Her offspring all, and all command the sky.
 Now fix your sight, and stand intent, to see
 Your Roman race, and Julian progeny.
 "The mighty Cæsar waits his vital hour,
 Impatient for the world, and grasps his promis'd power.

But next behold the youth of form divine,
 Cæsar himself, exalted in his line;
 Augustus, promis'd oft, and long foretold,
 Sent to the realm that Saturn rul'd of old;
 Born to restore a better age of gold.
 Afric and India shall his power obey,
 He shall extend his propagated sway
 Beyond the solar year, without the starry way.
 Where Atlas turns the rolling Heavens around:
 And his broad shoulders with their lights are
 At his foreseen approach, already quake [crown'd].
 The Caspian kingdoms, and Mæotian lake.
 Their seers behold the tempests from afar,
 And threatening oracles denounce the war.
 Nile bears him knocking at his seven-fold gates,
 And seeks his hidden spring, and fears his nephew
 Nor Hercules more lands or labours knew, [fates].
 Not though the brazen-footed hind he slew;
 Freed Erymanthus from the foaming bear,
 And dipp'd his arrows in Lernæan gore.
 Nor Bacchus, turning from his Indian war,
 By tigers drawn triumphant in his car,
 From Nisus' top descending on the plains,
 With curling vines around his purple reins.
 And doubt we yet through dangers to pursue
 The paths of honour, and a crown in view?
 But what's the man, who from afar appears,
 His head with olive crown'd, his hand a censor
 His hoary head and holy vestments bring [beats]?
 His lost idea back: I know the Roman king.
 He shall to peaceful Rome new laws ordain:
 Call'd from his mean abode, a sceptre to sustain.
 Him Tullus next in dignity succeeds;
 An active prince, and prone to martial deeds.
 He shall his troops for fighting fields prepare,
 Disus'd to toils, and triumphs of the war.
 By dint of sword, his crown he shall increase,
 And scour his armour from the rust of peace.
 Whom Ancus follows, with a fawning air,
 But vain within, and proudly popular.
 Next view the Tarquin kings: th' avenging sword
 Of Brutus justly drawn, and Rome restor'd.
 He first renews the rods, and ax severe;
 And gives the consuls royal robes to wear.
 His sons, who seek the tyrant to sustain,
 And long for arbitrary lords again,
 With ignominy scourg'd, in open sight,
 He deems to death deserv'd: asserting public right.

Unhappy man, to break the pious laws
Of Nature, pleading in his children's cause!
Howe'er the doubtful fact is understood,
'Tis love of honour, and his country's good:
The consul, not the father, sheds the blood.
Behold Torquatus the same track pursue;
And next, the two devoted Decii view.
The Drusian line, Camillus loaded home
With standards well redeem'd, and foreign foes o'ercome.

The pair you see in equal armour shine;
(Now, friends below, in close embraces join;
But when they leave the shady realms of night,
And, cloth'd in bodies, breathe your upper light)
With mortal heat each other shall pursue: [ensue!
What wars, what wounds, what slaughter, shall
From Alpine heights the father first descend;
His daughter's husband in the plain attends:
His daughter's husband arms his eastern friends.
Embrace again, my sons; be foes no more:
Nor stain your country with her children's gore.
And thou, the first, lay down thy lawless claim;
Thou, of my blood, who bear'st the Julian name.
Another comes, who shall in triumph ride,
And to the capitol his chariot guide;
From conquer'd Corinth, rich with Grecian spoils.
And yet another, fam'd for warlike toils,
On Argos shall impose the Roman laws:
And, on the Greeks, revenge the Trojan cause:
Shall drag in chains their Achillean race;
Shall vindicate his ancestors' disgrace:
And Pallas, for her violated place.
Great Cato there, for gravity renown'd,
And conquering Cossus goes with laurels crown'd.
Who can omit the Graochi, who declare
The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war,
The double bane of Carthage? Who can see,
Without esteem for virtuous poverty,
Severe Fabricius, or can cease to admire
The ploughman consul in his coarse attire!
Tir'd as I am, my praise the Fabii claim;
And thou, great hero, greatest of thy name,
Ordain'd in war to save the sinking state,
And, by delays, to put a stop to fate!
Let others better mould the running mass
Of medals, and inform the breathing brass;
And soften into flesh a marble face:
Plead better at the bar; describe the skies,
And when the stars descend, and when they rise.
But, Rome, 'tis thine alone, with awful sway,
To rule mankind, and make the world obey,
Disposing peace, and war, thy own majestic way.
To tame the proud, the fetter'd slave to free;
These are imperial arts, and worthy thee."
He paus'd: and while with wondering eyes they view'd

The passing spirits, thus his speech renew'd:
"See great Marcellus! how, untir'd in toils,
He moves with manly grace, how rich with regal
spoils!

He, when his country (threaten'd with alarms)
Requires his courage, and his conquering arms,
Shall more than once the Punic bands affright:
Shall kill the Gaulish king in single fight:
Then to the capitol in triumph move,
And the third spoils shall grace Feretrian Jove."
Æneas, here, beheld of form divine
A godlike youth, in glittering armour shine;
With great Marcellus keeping equal pace;
But gloomy were his eyes, dejected was his face:

He saw, and, wondering, ask'd his airy guide,
What, and of whence was he, who press'd the hero's
His son, or one of his illustrious name, (side)
How like the former, and almost the same!
Observe the crowds that compass him around:
All gaze, and all admire, and raise a shouting
sound:

But hovering mists around his brows are spread,
And night, with sable shades, involves his head.
"Seek not to know," the ghost reply'd with tears,
"The sorrows of thy sons in future years.
This youth (the blissful vision of a day)
Shall just be shown on Earth, and snatch'd away.
The gods too high had rais'd the Roman state;
Were but their gifts as permanent as great.
What groans of men shall fill the Martian field!
How fierce a blaze his flaming pile shall yield!
What funeral pomp shall floating Tiber see,
When, rising from his bed, he views the sad se-lemnity!

No youth shall equal hopes of glory give:
No youth afford so great a cause to grieve.
The Trojan honour, and the Roman boast;
Admir'd when living, and ador'd when lost!
Mirror of ancient faith in early youth!
Undaunted worth, inviolable truth!
No foe unpunish'd in the fighting field,
Shall dare thee foot to foot, with sword and shield:
Much less, in arms oppose thy matchless force,
When the sharp spurs shall urge thy foaming horse.
Ah, couldst thou break through fate's severe decree,
A new Marcellus shall arise in thee!
Full canisters of fragrant lilies bring,
Mix'd with the purple roses of the spring:
Let me with funeral flowers his body strow,
This gift which parents to their children owe,
This unavailing gift, at least I may bestow!"
This having said, he led the hero round
The confines of the blest Elysian ground,
Which, when Anchises to his son had shown,
And fir'd his mind to mount the promis'd throne,
He tells the future wars ordain'd by fate;
The strength and customs of the Latian state:
The prince, and people: and fore-arms his care
With rules, to push his fortune, or to bear.
Two gates the silent house of sleep adorn;
Of polish'd ivory this, that of transparent horn;
True visions through transparent horn arise;
Through polish'd ivory pass deluding lies.
Of various things discoursing as he pass'd,
Anchises hither bends his steps at last.
Then, through the gate of ivory, he dismiss'd
His valiant offspring, and divining guest.
Straight to the ships Æneas took his way;
Embark'd his men, and skimm'd along the sea:
Still coasting, till he gain'd Cajeta's bay.
At length on oozy ground his gallees moor:
Their heads are turn'd to sea, their sterns to shore.

THE SEVENTH BOOK OF
THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

KING Latinus entertains Æneas, and promises him
his only daughter, Lavinia, the heiress of his crowns. Turnus, being in love with her, favoured by her mother, and stirred up by Juno and Alecto, breaks the treaty which was made, and engages in his quarrel Mezentius, Camilla, Messapus, and many other of the neighbouring princes; whose forces, and the names of their commanders, are particularly related.

And thou, O matron of immortal fame!

Here dying, to the shore hast left thy name;
Cajeta still the place is called from thee,
The nurse of great Æneas' infancy.

Here rest thy bones in rich Hesperia's plains,
Thy name ('tis all a ghost can have) remains.

Now, when the prince her funeral rites had paid,
He plough'd the Tyrrhene seas with sails display'd.

From land a gentle breeze arose by night,
Serenely shone the stars, the Moon was bright,
And the sea trembled with her silver light.

Now near the shelves of Circe's shores they run,
(Circe the rich, the daughter of the Sun)

A dangerous coast: the goddess wastes her days
In joyous songs, the rocks resound her lays:

In spinning, or the loom, she spends the night,
And cedar brands supply her father's light.

From hence were heard (rebellowing to the main)
The roars of lions that refuse the chain,

The grunts of bristled boars; and groans of bears,
And herds of howling wolves, that stun the sailors' ears.

These from their caverns, at the close of night,
Fill the sad isle with horror and affright.

Darkling they mourn their fate, whom Circe's power
(That watch'd the Moon, and planetary hour)

With words and wicked herbs, from human kind
Had alter'd, and in wicked shapes confin'd.

Which monsters, lest the Trojan pious host
Should bear or touch upon th' enchanted coast:

Propitious Neptune steer'd their course by night,
With rising gales, that sped their happy flight.

Supply'd with these, they skim the sounding shore,
And hear the swelling surges vainly roar.

Now when the rosy Morn began to rise,
And weav'd her saffron streamer through the skies;

When Thetis blush'd in purple, not her own,
And from her face the breathing winds are blown,

A sudden silence sat upon the sea,
And sweeping oars, with struggling, urge their way.

The Trojan, from the main, beheld a wood,
Which thick with shades and a brown horror stood:

Betwixt the trees the Tiber took his course,
With whirlpools dimpled; and with downward force

That drove the sand along, he took his way,
And roll'd his yellow billows to the sea.

About him, and above, and round the wood,
The birds that haunt the borders of his flood;

That bath'd within, or bask'd upon his side,
To tuneful songs their narrow throats apply'd,

The captain gives command; the joyful train
Glide thro' the gloomy shade, and leave the main.

Now, Erato, thy poet's mind inspire,
And fill his soul with thy celestial fire.

Relate what Latium was: her ancient kings:
Declare the past, and present state of things:

When first the Trojan fleet Ausonia sought;
And how the rivals lov'd, and how they fought,

These are my theme, and how the war began,
And how concluded by the godlike man.

For I shall sing of battles, blood, and rage,
Which princes and their people did engage.
And haughty souls, that, mov'd with mutual hate,

In fighting fields pursu'd and found their fate:
That rous'd the Tyrrhene realm with loud alarms,
And peaceful Italy involv'd in arms.

A larger scene of action is display'd,
And, rising hence, a greater work is weigh'd.

Latinus, old and mild, had long possess'd
The Latian sceptre, and his people bless'd:

His father Faunus; a Laurentian dame
His mother, fair Marica was her name.

But Faunus came from Picus, Picus drew
His birth from Saturn, if records be true.

Thus king Latinus, in the third degree,
Had Saturn author of his family.

But this old peaceful prince, as Heaven decreed,
Was bless'd with no male issue to succeed:

His sons in blooming youth were snatch'd by fate:
One only daughter heir'd the royal state.

Fir'd with her love, and with ambition led,
The neighbouring princes court her nuptial bed.

Among the crowd, but far above the rest,
Young Turnus to the beauteous maid address'd.

Turnus, for high descent and graceful mien,
Was first, and favour'd by the Latian queen:

With him she strove to join Lavinia's hand;
But dire portents the purpos'd match withstand.

Deep in the palace, of long growth, there stood
A laurel's trunk, a venerable wood;

Where rites divine were paid; whose holy hair
Was kept, and cut with superstitious care.

This plant Latinus, when his town he wall'd,
Then found, and from the tree Laurentum call'd.

And last, in honour of his new abode,
He vow'd the laurel to the laurel's god.

It happen'd once (a boding prodigy)
A swarm of bees that cut the liquid sky,

Unknown from whence they took their airy flight,
Upon the topmast branch in clouds alight:

There, with their clasping feet together clung,
And a long cluster from the laurel hung.

An ancient augur prophesy'd from hence:
"Behold on Latian shores a foreign prince!

From the same parts of Heaven his navy stands,
To the same parts on Earth: his army lands;

The town he conquers, and the tower commands,
Yet more, when fair Lavinia fed the fire

Before the gods, and stood beside her sire;
Strange to relate, the flames involv'd the smoke

Of incense, from the sacred altar broke:
Caught her dishevell'd hair and rich attire;

Her crowns and jewels crackled in the fire;
From thence the fuming trail began to spread,

And lambent glories danc'd about her head.
This new portent the seer with wonder views;

Then pausing, thus his prophecy renews:
"The nymph who scatters flaming fires around

Shall shine with honour, shall herself be crown'd;
But, caus'd by her irrevocable fate,

War shall the country waste, and change the state."
Latinus, frighted with this dire oment,

For counsel to his father Faunus went:
And sought the shades renown'd for prophecy,

Which near Albunea's sulphurous fountain lie.
To those the Latian and the Sabine land

Fly, when distress'd, and thence relief demand.
The priest on skins of offerings takes his ease;

And nightly visions in his slumber sees:

A swarm of thin ærial shapes appears,
 And, fluttering round his temples, deafs his ears:
 These he consults, the future fates to know,
 From powers above, and from the fiends below.
 Here, for the god's advice, Latinus flies,
 Offering a hundred sheep for sacrifice:
 Their woolly fleeces, as the rites requir'd,
 He laid beneath him, and to rest retir'd.
 No sooner were his eyes in slumber bound,
 When, from above, a more than mortal sound
 Invades his ears: and thus the vision spoke:
 "Seek not, my seed, in Latian bands to yoke
 Our fair Lavinia, nor the gods provoke.
 A foreign son upon the shore descends,
 Whose martial fame from pole to pole extends.
 His race in arms, and arts of peace renown'd,
 Not Latium shall contain, nor Europe bound:
 'Tis theirs whate'er the Sun surveys around."
 These answers, in the silent night receiv'd,
 The king himself divulg'd, the land believ'd:
 The fame thro' all the neighbouring nations flew,
 When now the Trojan navy was in view.

Beneath a shady tree the hero spread
 His table on the turf, with cakes of bread;
 And, with his chiefs, on forest fruits he fed.
 They sat, and (not without the god's command)
 Their homely fare dispatch'd: the hungry band
 Invade their trenchers next, and soon devour,
 To mend the scanty meal, their cakes of flour.
 Ascanius this observ'd, and, smiling, said,
 "See, we devour the plates on which we fed!"
 This speech had omen, that the Trojan race
 Should find repose, and this the time and place.
 Æneas took the word, and thus replies:
 (Confessing fate with wonder in his eyes)
 "All hail, O Earth! all hail, my household gods!
 Behold the destin'd place of your abodes!
 For thus Anchises prophesied of old,
 And this our fatal place of rest foretold.
 "When on a foreign shore, instead of meat,
 By famine forc'd, your trenchers you shall eat,
 Then ease your weary Trojans will attend:
 And the long labours of your voyage end.
 Remember on that happy coast to build:
 And with a trench enclose the fruitful field."
 This was that famine, this the fatal place,
 Which ends the wandering of our exile's race.
 Then, on to morrow's dawn, your care employ
 To search the land, and where the cities lie,
 And what the men: but give this day to joy.
 Now pour to Jove, and after Jove is blest,
 Call great Anchises to the genial feast:
 Crown high the goblets with a cheerful draught;
 Enjoy the present hour; adjourn the future thought."

Thus having said, the hero bound his brows
 With leafy branches, then perform'd his vows:
 Adoring first the genius of the place,
 Then Earth, the mother of the heavenly race;
 The nymphs, and native godheads yet unknown,
 And Night, and all the stars that gild her sable
 And ancient Cybel, and Idæan Jove; [throne:
 And last his sire below, and mother queen above.

Then Heaven's high monarch thunder'd thrice aloud;

And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud.
 Soon through the joyful camp a rumour flew:
 The time was come their city to renew:
 Then every brow with cheerful green is crown'd,
 The feasts are doubled, and the bows go round.

When next the rosy Morn disclos'd the day,
 The scouts to several parts divide their way,
 To learn the natives' names, their towns, explore
 The coast, and treadings of the crooked shore:
 Here Tiber flows, and here Nomicus stands,
 Here warlike Latins hold the happy lands.

The pious chief, who sought by peaceful ways
 To found his empire, and his town to raise,
 A hundred youths from off his train selects,
 And to the Latian court their course directs
 (The spacious palace where the prince resides:)
 And all their heads with wreaths of olives hides.
 They go commission'd to require a peace;
 And carry presents to procure success.
 Thus while they speed their pace, the prince designs
 The new-elected seat, and draws the lines:
 The Trojans round the place a rampart cast,
 And palisades about the trenches plac'd.

Meantime the train, proceeding on their way,
 From far the town, and lofty towers, survey:
 At length approach the walls: without the gate
 They see the boys and Latian youth debate
 The martial prizes on the dusty plain:
 Some drive the cars, and some the cōstrainers teth;
 Some bend the stubborn bough for victory:
 And some with darts their active sinews try.
 A posting messenger dispatch'd from hence,
 Of this fair troop, advis'd their aged prince;
 That foreign men, of mighty stature, came;
 Uncouth their habit, and unknown their name.
 The king ordains their entrance, and ascends
 His regal seat, surrounded by his friends.
 The palace built by Picus, vast and prod,
 Supported by a hundred pillars stood!
 And round encompass'd with a rising wood.
 The pile o'erlook'd the town, and drew the sight,
 Surpris'd at once with reverence and delight.
 There kings receiv'd the marks of sovereign power;
 In state the monarch march'd, the victors bore
 Their awful axes, and the rods before.
 Here the tribunal stood, the house of prayer;
 And here the sacred senators repair;
 All at large tables, in long order set,
 A ram their offering, and a ram their meat.
 Above the portal, carv'd in cedar wood,
 Plac'd in their ranks, their godlike grandires stood:
 Old Saturn, with his crooked bythe, on high;
 And Italus, that led the colony:
 And ancient Janus, with his double face,
 And bunch of keys, the porter of the place.
 There stood Sabinus, planter of the vines;
 On a short pruning-hook his head reclines:
 And studiously surveys his generous wine.
 Then warlike kings, who for their country fought,
 And honourable wounds from battle brought,
 Around the posts hung helmets, darts, and spears,
 And captivè chariots, axes, shields, and bars,
 And broken beaks of ships, the trophies of their Above the rest, as chief of all the band, [was
 Was Picus plac'd, a buckler in his hand;
 His other wav'd a long-divining wand.
 Girt in his gabin gown the hero sat:
 Yet could not with his art avoid his fate.
 For Circe long had lov'd the youth in vain,
 Till love, refus'd, converted to disdain:
 Then mixing powerful herbs, with magic art,
 She chang'd his form, who could not change his heart.
 Constrain'd him in a bird, and made him fly,
 With party-colour'd plumes, a chattering pye.

In this high temple, on a chair of state,
The seat of audience, old Lathus sat;
Then gave admission to the Trojan train,
And thus, with pleasing accents, he began:
"Tell me, ye Trojans, for that name you own;
Nor is your course upon our coasts unknown;
Say what you seek, and whither were you bound?
Were you by stress of weather cast a-ground?
Such dangers of the sea are often seen,
And oft befall to miserable men.
Or come, your shipping in our ports to lay,
Spent and disabled in so long a way?
Say what you want; the Latians you shall find
Not forc'd to goodness, but by will inclin'd;
For since the time of Saturn's holy reign,
His hospitable customs we retain.
I call to mind (but time the tale has worn)
Th' Arunci told, that Dardanus, though born
On Latian plains, yet sought the Phrygian shore,
And Samothracia, Samos call'd before:
From Tuscan Corinth he claim'd his birth.
But after, when exempt from mortal earth,
From thence ascended to his kindred skies,
A god, and as a god augments their sacrifice."
He said. Ilioneus made this reply:
"O king, of Faunus' royal family!
Nor wintery winds to Latium forc'd our way,
Nor did the stars our wandering course betray.
Willing we sought your shores, and hither bound,
The port so long desir'd, at length we found.
From our sweet homes and ancient realms ex-
pell'd;
Great as the greatest that the Sun beheld.
The god began our line, who rules above,
And as our race, our king descends from Jove:
And hither are we come, by his command,
To crave admission in your happy land.
How dire a tempest, from Mycenæ pour'd;
Our plains, our temples, and our town, devour'd;
What was the waste of war, what dire alarms,
Shook Asia's crown with European arms!
Ev'n such have heard, if any such there be,
Whose earth is bounded by the frozen sea:
And such as, born beneath the burning sky
And sultry Sun, betwixt the tropics lie.
From that dire deluge, through the watery waste,
Such length of years, such various perils past:
At last escap'd, to Latium we repair,
To beg what you, without your want, may spare;
The common water, and the common air.
Sheds which ourselves will build, and mean abodes,
Fit to receive and serve our banish'd gods.
Nor our admission shall your realm disgrace,
Nor length of time our gratitude efface.
Besides what endless honour you shall gain,
To save and shelter Troy's unhappy train!
Now, by my sovereign, and his fate, I swear,
Renown'd for faith in peace, for force in war;
Oft our alliance other lands desir'd,
And what we seek of you, of us requir'd.
Despise not then, that in our hands we bear
These holy boughs, and sue with words of prayer.
Fate and the gods, by their supreme command,
Have doom'd our ships to seek the Latian land.
To these abodes our fleet Apollo sends;
Here Dardanus was born, and hither leads,
Where Tuscan Tiber rolls with rapid force,
And where Nuticus opens his holy source.
Besides, our prince presents, with his request,
Some small remains of what his sire possess'd.

This golden charger, snatch'd from burning Troy,
Anchises did in sacrifice employ;
This royal robe, and this tiara, wore
Old Priam, and this golden sceptre bore
In full assemblies, and in solemn games;
These purple vests were wear'd by Dardan dames."
Thus while he spoke, Latinus roll'd around
His eyes, and fix'd awhile upon the ground.
Intent he seem'd, and anxious in his breast;
Not by the sceptre mov'd, or kingly vest:
But pondering future things of wondrous weight:
Succession, empire, and his daughter's fate:
On these he mus'd within his thoughtful mind
And then resolv'd what Faunus had divin'd.
This was the foreign prince, by fate decreed
To share his sceptre, and Lavinia's bed.
This was the race that sure portents foreshew
To sway the world, and land and sea subdue.
At length he rais'd his cheerful head, and spoke:
"The powers," said he, "the powers we both in-
To you, and yours, and mine, propitious be, [voke,
And firm our purpose with their augury.
Have what you ask: your presents I receive;
Land where, and when you please, with ample
Partake and use my kingdom as your own; [leave;
It shall be yours, while I command the crown.
And if my wish'd alliance please your king,
Tell him he should not send the peace, but bring:
Then let him not a friend's embraces fear;
The peace is made when I behold him here.
Besides this answer, tell my royal guest,
I add to his commands my own request:
One only daughter heirs my crown and state,
Whom, not our oracles, nor Heaven, nor fate,
Nor frequent prodigies, permit to join
With any native of th' Ausonian line.
A foreign son-in-law shall come from far,
(Such is our doom) a chief renown'd in war:
Whose race shall bear aloft the Latian name;
And thro' the conquer'd world diffuse our fame.
Himself to be the man the fates require,
I firmly judge, and what I judge, desire."
He said, and then on each bestow'd a steed;
Three hundred horses, in high stables fed,
Stood ready, shining all, and smoothly dress'd:
Of these he chose the fairest and the best,
To mount the Trojan troop; at his command,
The steeds caparison'd with purple stand:
With golden trappings, glorious to behold,
And champ, betwixt their teeth, the foaming gold,
Then to his absent guest the king decreed
A pair of coursers, born of heavenly breed:
Who from their nostrils breath'd ethereal fire;
Whom Circe stole from her celestial sire;
By substituting mares, produc'd on Earth,
Whose wombs conceiv'd a more than mortal birth.
These draw the chariot which Latinus sends;
And the rich present to the prince commands.
Sublime on stately steeds the Trojans borne,
To their expecting lord with peace return.
But jealous Juno, from Pachymus' height,
As she from Argos took her airy flight,
Beheld, with envious eyes, this hateful sight.
She saw the Trojan and his joyful train
Descend upon the shore, desert the main!
Design a town, and, with unhop'd success,
Th' ambassadors return with promis'd peace.
Then, pierc'd with pain, she shook her haughty
head,
Sigh'd from her inward soul, and thus she said:

"O hated offspring of my Phrygian foes!
 O fate of Troy, which Juno's fates oppose!
 Could they not fall, unpy'd, on the plain,
 But stain revive, and taken, 'scape again?
 When execrable Troy in ashes lay, [their way.
 Through fires, and swords, and seas, they forc'd
 Then vanquish'd Juno must in vain contend,
 Her rage disarm'd, her empire at an end.
 Breathless and tir'd, is all my fury spent,
 Or does my glutted spleen at length relent?
 As if 'twere little from their town to chase,
 I through the seas pursued their exil'd race:
 Engag'd the Heavens, oppos'd the stormy main;
 But billows roar'd, and tempests rag'd in vain.
 What have my Scyllas and my Syrtes done,
 When these they overpass, and those they shun?
 On Tiber's shores they land, secure of fate,
 Triumphant o'er the storm's and Juno's hate.
 Mars could in mutual blood the centaurs bathe,
 And Jove himself gave way to Cynthia's wrath:
 Who sent the tusky boar to Calydon:
 What great offence had either people done?
 But I, the consort of the thunderer,
 Have wag'd a long and unsuccessful war:
 With various arts and arms in vain have toil'd,
 And by a mortal man at length am foil'd.
 If native power prevail not, shall I doubt
 To seek for needful succour from without?
 If Jove and Heaven my just desires deny,
 Hell shall the power of Heaven and Jove supply.
 Grant that the fates have firm'd, by their decree,
 The Trojan race to reign in Italy:
 At least, I can defer the nuptial day,
 And, with protracted wars, the peace delay:
 With blood the dear alliance shall be bought;
 And both the people near destruction brought.
 So shall the son-in-law and father join,
 With ruin, war, and waste of either line.
 O fatal maid! thy marriage is endow'd
 With Phrygian, Latian, and Rutilian blood!
 Bellona leads thee to thy lover's hand,
 Another queen brings forth another brand,
 To burn with foreign fires her native land!
 A second Paris, differing but in name,
 Shall fire his country with a second flame."
 Thus having said, she sinks beneath the ground
 With furious haste, and shoots the Stygian sound;
 To rouse Alecto from th' infernal seat
 Of her dire sisters, and their dark retreat.
 This fury, fit for her intent, she chose,
 One who delights in wars, and human woes.
 Ev'n Pluto hates his own mis-shapen race;
 Her sister furies fly her hideous face:
 So frightful are the forms the monster takes,
 So fierce the hissings of her speckled snakes.
 Her Juno finds, and thus inflames her spite:
 "O virgin daughter of eternal night,
 Give me this once thy labour, to sustain
 My right, and execute my just disdain.
 Let not the Trojans, with a feign'd pretence
 Of proffer'd peace, delude the Latian prince:
 Expel from Italy that odious name,
 And let not Juno suffer in her fame.
 'Tis thine to ruin realms, o'erturn a state,
 Betwixt the dearest friends to raise debate,
 And kindle kindred blood to mutual hate.
 Thy hand o'er towns the funeral torch displays,
 And forms a thousand hills ten thousand ways.
 Now shake from out thy fruitful breast the seeds
 Of envy, discord, and of cruel deeds:

Confound the peace establish'd, and prepare
 Their souls to hatred, and their hands to war."
 Smear'd as she was with black Gorgonian blood,
 The fury sprang above the Stygian flood:
 And on her wicker wings, sublime through night,
 She to the Latian palace took her flight.
 There sought the queen's apartments, stood before
 The peaceful threshold, and besieg'd the door.
 Restless Amata lay, her swelling breast
 Fir'd with disdain for Turnus dispossesst,
 And the new nuptials of the Trojan guest.
 From her black, bloody locks, the fury shakes
 Her darling plague, the favourite of her snakes:
 With her full force she threw the poisonous dart,
 And fix'd it deep within Amata's heart:
 That, thus envenom'd, she might kindle rage,
 And sacrifice to strife her house and husband's age.
 Unseen, unfelt, the fiery serpent skims
 Betwixt her lines, and her naked limbs.
 His baleful breath inspiring as he glides,
 Now like a chain around her neck he rides;
 Now like a fillet to her head repairs,
 And, with her circling volumes, folds her hairs.
 At first the silent venom slid with ease,
 And seiz'd her cooler senses by degrees,
 Then, ere th' infected mass was fir'd too far,
 In plaintive accents she began the war;
 And thus bespoke her husband: "Shall," she said,
 "A wandering prince enjoy Lavinia's bed?
 If nature plead not in a parent's heart,
 Pity my tears, and pity her desert:
 I know, my dearest lord, the time will come,
 You would, in vain, reverse your cruel doom:
 The faithless pirate soon will set to sea,
 And bear the loyal virgin far away!
 A guest like him, a Trojan guest before,
 In show of friendship, sought the Spartan shore;
 And ravish'd Helen from her husband bore.
 Think on a king's inviolable word;
 And think on Turnus, her once-plighted lord:
 To this false foreigner you give your throne,
 And wrong a friend, a kinsman, and a son.
 Resume your ancient care; and if the god,
 Your sire, and you, resolve on foreign blood,
 Know all are foreign, in a larger sense,
 Not born your subjects, or deriv'd from hence.
 Then if the line of Turnus you retrace,
 He springs from Inachus, of Argive race."
 But when she saw her reason illy spent,
 And could not move him from his fix'd intent,
 She flew to rage; for now the snake possess'd
 Her vital parts, and poison'd all her breast;
 She raves, she runs with a distracted pace,
 And fills with horrid howls the public place.
 And, as young striplings whip the top for sport,
 On the smooth pavement of an empty court,
 The wooden engine flies and whirls about,
 Admir'd, with clamours, of the beardless rout;
 They lash aloud, each other they provoke,
 And lend their little souls at every stroke:
 Thus fares the queen, and thus her fury blows
 Amidst the crowds, and kindles as she goes.
 Not yet content, she strains her malice more,
 And adds new ills to those contriv'd before:
 She flies the town, and, mixing with the throng
 Of madding matrons, bears the bride along:
 Wandering thro' woods and wilds, and devious ways,
 And with these arts the Trojan match delays.
 She feign'd the rites of Bacchus! cry'd aloud,
 And to the buxom god the virgin vow'd.

"Evoe, O Bacchus!" thus began the song,
 And "Evoe!" answer'd all the female throng:
 "O virgin! worthy thee alone," she cry'd;
 "O worthy thee alone!" the crew reply'd;
 "For thee she feeds her hair, she leads the dance,
 And with the winding ivy wreathes her lance."
 Like fury seiz'd the rest; the progress known,
 All seek the mountains, and forsake the town:
 All clad in skins of beasts the javelin bear,
 Give to the wanton winds their flowing hair:
 And shrieks and shoutings rend the suffering air.
 The queen, herself, inspir'd with rage divine,
 Shook high above her head a flaming pine:
 Then roll'd her baggard eyes around the throng,
 And sung, in Turnus' name, the nuptial song!
 "Lâ, ye Latian dames, if any here
 Hold your unhappy queen, Amata, dear;
 If there be here," she said, "who dare maintain
 My right, nor think the name of mother vain,
 Unbind your fillets, loose your flowing hair,
 And orgies and nocturnal rites prepare."
 Amata's breast the fury thus invades,
 And fires with rage, amid the sylvan shades.
 Then, when she found her venom spread so far,
 The royal house embroil'd in civil war,
 Rah'd on her dusky wings, she cleaves the skies,
 And seeks the palace where young Turnus lies.
 His town, as fame reports, was built of old
 By Danaë, pregnant with almighty gold:
 Who fed her father's rage, and with a train
 Of following Argives, through the stormy main,
 Driv'n by the southern blasts, was fated here to reign.

'Twas Ardea once, now Ardea's name it bears,
 Once a fair city, now consum'd with years.
 Here in his lofty palace Turnus lay,
 Retwixt the confines of the night and day,
 Secure in sleep: the fury laid aside
 Her looks and limbs, and with new methods try'd
 The foulness of th' infernal form to hide.
 Propp'd on a staff, she takes the trembling mien,
 Her face is furrow'd, and her front obscene:
 Deep-dinted wrinkles on her cheek she draws,
 Sunk are her eyes, and toothless are her jaws:
 Her hoary hair with holy fillets bound,
 Her temples with an olive wreath are crown'd.
 Old Calibe, who kept the sacred fane
 Of Juno, now she seem'd, and thus began:
 "Appearing in a dream, to rouse the careless man.
 "Shall Turnus then such endless toil sustain,
 In fighting fields, and conquer towns in vain?
 Win, for a Trojan head to wear the prize?
 Usurp thy crown, enjoy thy victories?
 The bride and sceptre which thy blood has bought,
 The king transfers, and foreign heirs are sought:
 Go now, deluded man, and seek again
 New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.
 Repel the Tuscan foes, their city seize;
 Protect the Latians in luxurious ease.
 This dream all-powerful Juno sends: I bear
 Her mighty mandates, and her words you hear.
 Haste, arm your Ardeans, issue to the plain,
 With faith to friend, assault the Trojan train:
 Their thoughtless chiefs, their painted ships that lie
 In Tiber's mouth, with fire and sword destroy.
 The Latian king, unless he shall submit,
 Own his old promise, and his new forget;
 Let him, in arms, the power of Turnus prove,
 And learn to fear whom he disdains to love,

For such is Heaven's command." The youthful prince

With scorn reply'd; and made this bold defence:
 "You tell me, mother, what I knew before;
 The Phrygian fleet is landed on the shore:
 I neither fear, nor will provoke, the war:
 My fate is Juno's most peculiar care,
 But time has made you dote, and vainly tell
 Of arms imagin'd, in your lonely cell:
 Go, be the temple and the gods your care;
 Permit the men the thought of peace and war."
 These haughty words Æleto's rage provoke,
 And frighted Turnus trembled as she spoke.
 Her eyes grew stiffen'd, and with sulphur burn,
 Her hideous looks, and hellish form, return:
 Her curling snakes with hissings fill the place,
 And open all the furies of her face!
 Then, darting fire from her malignant eyes,
 She cast him backward as he strove to rise,
 And, lingering, sought to frame some new replies:
 High on her head she rears two twisted snakes;
 Her chain she rattles, and her whip she shakes;
 And, churning bloody foam, thus loudly speaks:
 "Behold whom time has made to dote, and tell
 Of arms, imagin'd in her lowly cell:
 Behold the fate's infernal minister;
 War, death, destruction, in my hand I bear!"
 Thus having said, her smouldering torch im-
 press'd

With her full force, she plung'd into his breast.
 Aghast he wak'd, and, starting from his bed,
 Cold sweat, in clammy drops, his limbs o'erspread:
 "Arms, arms!" he cries; "my sword and shield prepare!"

He breathes defiance, blood, and mortal war.
 So when with crackling flames a caldron fries,
 The bubbling waters from the bottom rise:
 Above their brims they force their fiery way;
 Black vapours climb aloft, and cloud the day.
 The peace polluted thus, a chosen band
 He first commissions to the Latian land,
 In threatening embassy: then rais'd the rest,
 To meet in arms th' intruding Trojan guest-
 To force the foes from the Lavinian shore,
 And Italy's endanger'd peace restore;
 Himself alone, an equal match he boasts,
 To fight the Phrygian and Ausonian hosts.
 The gods invok'd, the Rutili prepare
 Their arms, and warm each other to the war,
 His beauty these, and those his blooming age,
 The rest his house, and his own fame, engage.

While Turnus urges thus his enterprise,
 The Stygian fury to the Trojans flies:
 New frauds invents, and takes a steepy stand,
 Which overlooks the vale with wide command;
 Where fair Ascanius and his youthful train,
 With horns and hounds, a hunting match ordain,
 And pitch their toils around the shady plain.
 The fury fires the pack; they snuff, they vent,
 And feed their hungry nostrils with the scent.
 'Twas of a well-grown stag, whose antlers rise
 High o'er his front, his beams invade the skies:
 From this light cause, th' infernal maid prepares
 The country churls to mischief, hate, and wars.

The stately beast, the two Tyrrhæus bred,
 Snatch'd from his dam, and the tame youngling fed.
 Their father Tyrrhæus did their fodder bring;
 Tyrrhæus, chief ranger to the Latian king:
 Their sister Sylvia cherish'd with her care
 The little wanton, and did wreaths prepare

To hang his budding horns: with ribbons ty'd
His tender neck, and comb'd his silken hide;
And bath'd his body. Patient of command,
In time he grew, and, growing, us'd to hand.
He waited at his master's board for food;
Then sought his savage kindred in the wood:
Where, gazing all the day, at night he came
To his known lodgings, and his country dame.

This household beast, that us'd the woodland grounds,

Was view'd at first by the young hero's hounds;
As down the stream he swam, to seek retreat
In the cool waters, and to quench his heat.
Ascanius, young, and eager of his game,
Soon bent his bow, uncertain in his aim:
But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,
Which pierc'd his bowels through his panting sides.
The bleeding creature issues from the floods,
Possess'd with fear, and seeks his known abodes;
His old familiar hearth, and household gods.
He falls, he fills the house with heavy groans;
Implores their pity, and his pain bemoans.
Young Sylvia beats her breast, and cries aloud
For succour from the clownish neighbourhood:
The churls assemble; for the fiend who lay
In the close woody covert urg'd their way.
One with a brand, yet burning from the flame;
Arm'd with a knotty club, another came:
Whate'er they catch or find, without their care,
Their fury makes an instrument of war.
Tyrrheus, the foster-father of the beast,
Then clench'd a hatchet in his horny fist:
But held his hand from the descending stroke,
And left his wedge within the cleft oak,
To whet their courage, and their rage provoke.
And now the goddess, exercis'd in ill,
Who watch'd an hour to work her impious will,
Ascends the roof, and to her crooked horn,
Such as was then by Latian shepherds borne,
Adds all her breath; the rocks and woods around,
And mountains, tremble at th' infernal sound.
The sacred lake of Trivia from afar,
The Valine fountains, and sulphureous Nar,
Shake at the baleful blast, the signal of the war.
Young mothers wildly stare, with fear possess'd,
And strain their helpless infants to their breast.

The clowps, a bolsterous, rude, un govern'd
crew,

With furious haste to the loud summons flew.
The powers of Troy, then issuing on the plain,
With fresh recruits their youthful chief sustain:
Nor theirs a raw and unexperienc'd train,
But a firm body of embattled men.
At first, while fortune favour'd neither side,
The fight with clubs and burning brands was try'd:
But now, both parties reinforc'd, the fields
Are bright with flaming swords and brazen shields.
A shining harvest either host displays,
And shoots against the Sun with equal rays.

Thus when a black-brow'd gust begins to rise,
White foam at first on the curl'd ocean fries;
Then roars the main, the billows mount the skies:
Thw, by the fury of the storm full blown,
The muddy bottom o'er the clouds is thrown.

First Almon falls, old Tyrrheus' eldest care,
Pierc'd with an arrow from the distant war:
Fixt in his throat the flying weapon stood,
And stopp'd his breath, and drank his vital blood.
Huge heaps of slain around the body rise;
Among the rest, the rich Galeus lies:

A good old man, while peace he press'd in vain,
Amidst the madness of th' unruly train:
Five herds, five bleating flocks, his pastures fill'd;
His lands a hundred yoke of oxen till'd.
Thus, while in equal scales their fortune stood,
The fury bath'd them in each other's blood.
Then, having fix'd the fight, exulting flies,
And bears fulfill'd her promise to the skies;
To Juno thus she speaks: " Behold 'tis done;
The blood already drawn, the war begun;
The discord is complete, nor can they cease
The dire debate, nor you command the peace.
Now since the Latian and the Trojan brood
Have tasted vengeance, and the sweets of blood,
Speak, and my power shall add this office more;
The neighbouring nations of th' Ausonian shore
Shall hear the dreadful rumour from afar,
Of arm'd invasion, and embrace the war.
Then Juno thus: " The grateful work is done;
The seed of discord sow'd, the war begun;
Frauds, fears, and fury, have possess'd the state,
And fix'd the causes of a lasting hate:
A bloody Hymen shall th' alliance join
Betwixt the Trojan and Ausonian line:
But thou with speed to Night and Hell repair,
For not the gods nor angry Jove will bear
Thy lawless wandering walks in upper air.
Leave what remains to me." Saturnia said:
The sullen fiend her sounding wings display'd,
Unwilling left the light, and sought the nether
In midst of Italy, well known to fame, [shades
There lies a lake, Amasactus is the name,
Below the lofty mounts on either side;
Thick forests the forbidden entrance hide:
Full in the centre of the sacred wood
An arm arises of the Stygian flood; [sound
Which, breaking from beneath with bellowing
Whirls the black waves and rattling stones around.
Here Pluto pants for breath from out his cell,
And opens wide the grinning jaws of Hell.
To this infernal lake the fury flies; [stia
Here hides her hated head, and frees the labouring
Saturnian Juno, now, with double care,
Attends the fatal process of the war.
The clown return'd from battle bear the slain,
Implores the gods, and to their king complain.
The corpse of Almon and the rest are shown,
Shrieks, clamours, murmurs, fill the frighted town.
Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,
And, aggravating crimes, augments their fears:
Proclaims his private injuries aloud,
A solemn promise made, and disavow'd;
A foreign son is sought, and a mixt mongrel brood.
Then they, whose mothers, frantic with their fear,
In woods and wilds the flag of Bacchus bear,
And lead his dances with dishevell'd hair;
Increase the clamour, and the war demand
(Such was Amata's interest in the land)
Against the public sanctions of the peace;
Against all omens of their ill success;
With fates averse, the rout in arms resort,
To force their monarch, and insult the court.
But, like a rock unmov'd, a rock that braves
The raging tempest and the rising waves,
Propp'd on himself he stands; his solid sides
Wash off the sea-weeds, and the rounding tides:
So stood the pious prince unmov'd, and long
Sustain'd the madness of the noise throng.
But when he found that Juno's power prevail'd,
And all the methods of cool counsel fail'd,

He calls the gods to witness their offences,
 Disclaims the war, asserts his innocence.
 "Hurry'd by fate," he cries, "and borne before
 A furious wind, we leave the faithful shore:
 O more than madmen! you yourselves shall bear
 The guilt of blood and sacrilegious war:
 Thou, Turnus, shalt atone it by thy fate,
 And pray to Heaven for peace; but pray too late.
 For me, my stormy voyage at an end,
 I to the port of death securely tend.
 The funeral pomp which to your kings you pay,
 Is all I want, and all you take away."
 He said no more, but, in his walls confin'd,
 Shut out the woes which he too well divin'd:
 Nor with the rising storm would vainly strive,
 But left the helm, and let the vessel drive.
 A solemn custom was observ'd of old,
 Which Latium held, and now the Romans hold:
 Their standards when in fighting fields they rear
 Against the fierce Hyrcanians, or declare
 The Scythian, Indian, or Arabian war:
 Or from the boasting Parthians would regain
 Their eagles lost in Carrhar's bloody plain:
 Two gates of steel (the name of Mars they bear,
 And still are worship'd with religious fear,)
 Before his temple stand: the dire abode,
 And the fear'd issues of the furious god,
 Are seal'd with brazen bolts; without the gates,
 The wary guardian Janus doubly waits.
 Then, when the sacred senate votes the war,
 The Roman consul their decrees declares,
 And in his robes the sounding gates unbars.
 The youth in military shouts arise,
 And the loud trumpets break the yielding skies.
 These rites, of old by sovereign princes us'd,
 Were the king's office, but the king refus'd:
 Deaf to their cries, nor would the gates unbar
 Of sacred peace, or loose th' imprison'd war:
 But hid his head, and, safe from loud alarms,
 Abhorrd the wicked ministry of arms.
 Then Heaven's imperious queen shot down from
 As her approach the brazen hinges fly; [high;
 The gates are forc'd, and every falling bar,
 And, like a tempest, issues out the war.
 The peaceful cities of th' Ausonian shore,
 Lull'd in their ease, and undisturb'd before,
 Are all on fire; and some, with studious care,
 Their native steeds in sandy plains prepare:
 Some their soft limbs in painful marches try,
 And war is all their wish, and arms the general cry.
 Dart occur the rusty shields with scars, and part
 New grind the blunted ax, and point the dart:
 With joy they view the waving ensigns fly,
 And hear the trumpet's clangour pierce the sky.
 Five cities forge their arms: th' Atinian powers,
 Antennæ, Tibur with her lofty towers,
 Ardea the proud, the Crustumærian town:
 All these of old were places of renown.
 Some hammer helmets for the fighting field;
 Some twine young fallows to support the shield;
 The corselet some, and some the cuirass mould,
 With silver plated, and with ductile gold.
 The rustic honours of the scythe and share
 Give place to swords and pikes, the pride of war.
 Old falchions are now temper'd in the fires:
 The sounding trumpet every soul inspires.
 The word is given, with eager speed they lace
 The shining head-piece, and the shield embrace.
 The neighing steeds are to the chariots ty'd;
 The trusty weapon hits on every side.

And now the mighty labour is begun,
 Ye Muses, open all your Helicon.
 Sing you the chiefs that sway th' Ausonian land,
 Their arms, and armies under their command:
 What warriors in our ancient clime were bred;
 What soldiers follow'd, and what heroes led.
 For well you know, and can record alone,
 What fame to future times conveys but darkly
 down.

Mezentius first appear'd upon the plain;
 Scorn sat upon his brows, and sour disdain:
 Defying Earth and Heaven: Etruria lost,
 He brings to Turnus' aid his baffled host.
 The charming Lausus, full of youthful fire,
 Rode in the rank, and next his sullen sire:
 To Turnus only second in the grace
 Of manly mien, and features of the face;
 A skilful horseman, and a huntsman bred,
 With fates averse a thousand men he led:
 His sire unworthy of so brave a son;
 Himself well worthy of a happier throne.

Next Aventine drives his chariot round
 The Latian plains, with palms and laurels crown'd.
 Proud of his steeds, he smokes along the field,
 His father's hydra fills the ample shield.
 A hundred serpents hiss about the brims;
 The son of Hercules he justly seems,
 By his broad shoulders and gigantic limbs.
 Of heavenly part, and part of earthly blood,
 A mortal woman mixing with a god.
 For strong Alcides, after he had slain
 The triple Geryon, drove from conquer'd Spain
 His captive herds, and thence in triumph led;
 On Tuscany's flowery banks they fed.
 Then on Mount Aventine, the son of Jove
 The priestess Rhea found, and forc'd to love.

For arms his men long piles and javelins bore,
 And poles with pointed steel their fees in battle
 Like Hercules himself, his son appears, [gore.
 In savage pomp: a lion's hide he wears;
 About his shoulders hangs the shaggy skin,
 The teeth and gaping jaws severely grin.
 Thus like the god his father, homely dress,
 He strides into the hall, a horrid guest.

Then two twin-brothers from fair Tibur came (Which from their brother Tiburs took the name);
 Fierce Cossus, and Castilus, void of fear,
 Arm'd Argive horse they led, and in the front
 appear.

Like cloud-born centaurs, from the mountain's
 With rapid course descending to the fight, [height,
 They rush along; the rattling woods give way;
 The branches bend before their sweepy way.

Nor was Præneste's founder wanting there,
 Whom fame reports the son of Meliciber:
 Found in the fire, and fester'd in the plains,
 A shepherd and a king at once he reigns,
 And leads to Turnus' aid his country swains.
 His own Præneste sends a chosen band,
 With those who plough Saturnia's Sabine land:
 Besides the succour which old Anien yields,
 The rocks of Hernicus, and dewy fields,
 Anagnia fat, and father Amasene,
 A numerous rout, but all of naked men:
 Nor arms they wear, nor swords and bucklers wield,
 Nor drive the chariot through the dusty field;
 But whirl from leathern strings huge balls of lead:
 And spoils of yellow wolves adorn their head:
 The left foot naked, when they march to fight;
 But in a bull's raw hide they sheath the right.

Messapus next, (great Neptune was his sire)
 Secure from steel, and fated from the fire,
 In pomp appears; and with his ardour warms
 A heartless train, unexercis'd in arms:
 The just Faliscians he to battle brings;
 And those who live where lake Ciminia springs;
 And where Feronia's grove and temple stands,
 Who till Pescennian or Flavianian lands:
 All these in order march, and marching sing
 The warlike actions of their sea-born king.
 Like a long team of snowy swans on high,
 Which clap their wings, and cleave the liquid sky,
 Which homeward from their watery pastures borne,
 They sing, and Asia's lakes their notes return.
 Not one who heard their music from afar,
 Would think these troops an army train'd to war:
 But flocks of fowl, that when the tempests roar,
 With their hoarse gabbling seek the silent shore.
 Then Clausus came, who led a numerous band
 Of troops embody'd, from the Sabine land:
 And in himself alone an army brought.
 'Twas he the noble Claudian race begot:
 The Claudian race, ordain'd, in times to come,
 To share the greatness of imperial Rome.
 He led the Cures forth of high renown,
 Mutuscans from their olive-bearing town;
 And all th' Eretian powers: besides a band
 That follow'd from Velinum's dewy land:
 And Amiternian troops, of mighty fame,
 And mountaineers, that from Severus came.
 And from the craggy cliffs of Tetrica,
 And those where yellow Tiber takes his way,
 And where Himella's wanton waters play.
 Casperia sends her arms, with those that lie
 By Fabaris, and fruitful Foruli:
 The warlike aids of Horta next appear,
 And the cold Nursians come to close the rear:
 Mix'd with the natives born of Latine blood,
 Whom Allia washes with her fatal flood.
 Not thicker billows beat the Libyan main,
 When pale Orion sets in wintery rain;
 Nor thicker harvest on rich Hornes rise,
 Or Lycian fields, when Phœbus burns the skies;
 Than stand these troops: their bucklers ring around; [ground.
 Their trampling turns the turf, and shakes the solid
 High in his chariot then Halesus came,
 A foe by birth to Troy's unhappy name:
 From Agamemnon born: to Turnus' aid,
 A thousand men the youthful hero led;
 Who till the Massic soil, for wine renown'd,
 And fierce Aruncans from their hilly ground:
 And those who live by Sidicinan shores,
 And where, with shoaly fords, Vulturinus roars;
 Cales and Osea's old inhabitants,
 And rough Satulnians inur'd to wants:
 Light demi-lances from afar they throw,
 Fasten'd with leather thongs, to gall the foe.
 Short crooked swords in closer fight they wear,
 And, on their warding arms, like bucklers bear.
 Nor, Cebalus, shalt thou be left unang,
 From nymph Semethis and old Telon sprung:
 Who then in Teleboan Capri reign'd,
 But that short isle th' ambitious youth disdain'd;
 And o'er Campania stretch'd his ample sway;
 Where swelling Sarnus seeks the Tyrrhene sea:
 O'er Batulum, and where Abella sees,
 From her high towers, the harvest of her trees.
 And these (as was the Teuton use of old)
 Wield brazen swords, and brazen bucklers hold;

Sling weighty stones when from afar they fight:
 Their casques are cork, a covering thick and light.
 Next these in rank, the warlike Ufens went,
 And led the unmountain-troops that Nursia sent.
 The rude Equicols his rule obey'd; [trade
 Hunting their sport, and plundering was their
 In arms they plough'd, to battle still prepar'd:
 Their soil was barren, and their hearts were hard.
 Umbro the priest, the proud Marrubians led,
 By king Archippus sent to Turnus' aid;
 And peaceful olives crown'd his hoary head.
 His wand and holy words, the viper's rage,
 And venom'd wound of serpents, could assuage.
 He, when he pleas'd with powerful juice to steep
 Their temples, shut their eyes in pleasing sleep.
 But vain were Marsian herbs, and magic art,
 To cure the wound giv'n by the Dardan dart.
 Yet his untimely fate th' Angitian woods
 In sighs renumur'd to the Fucine floods.
 The son of fam'd Hippolytus was there;
 Fam'd as his sire, and as his mother fair.
 Whom in Egerian groves Aricia bore,
 And nurs'd his youth along the marshy shore;
 Where great Diana's peaceful altars flame
 In fruitful fields, and Virbius was his name.
 Hippolytus, as old records have said,
 Was by his stepdame sought to share her bed:
 But when no female arts his mind could move,
 She turn'd to furious hate her impious love.
 Torn by wild horses on the sandy shore,
 Another's crimes th' unhappy hunter bore,
 Glutting his father's eyes with guiltless gore.
 But chaste Diana, who his death deplor'd,
 With Æsculapian herbs his life restor'd.
 When Jove, who saw from high, with just disdain,
 The dead inspir'd with vital breath again,
 Struck to the centre with his flaming dart,
 Th' unhappy founder of the godlike art.
 But Trivia kept in secret shades alone
 Her care, Hippolytus, to fate unknown;
 And call'd him Virbius in th' Egerian grove:
 Where then he liv'd obscure, but safe from Jove.
 For this, from Trivia's temple and her wood
 Are coursers driven, who shed their master's blood;
 Affrighted by the monsters of the flood.
 His son, the second Virbius, yet retain'd
 His father's art; and warrior steeds he rein'd.
 Amid the troops, and like the leading god,
 High o'er the rest in arms the graceful Turnus rode:
 A triple pile of plumes his crest adorn'd,
 On which, with belching flames, Chimera burn'd:
 The more the kindled combat rises higher,
 The more with fury burns the blazing fire.
 Fair Iögrac'd his shield, but Iö now
 With horns exalted stands, and seems to love:
 (A noble charge) her keeper by her side,
 To watch her walks, his hundred eyes apply'd;
 And on the brims her sire, the watery god,
 Roll'd from a silver urn his crystal flood:
 A cloud of soot succeeds, and fills the fields
 With swords and pointed spears, and clattering
 Of Argives, and of old Sicilian bands, [shields:
 And those who plough the rich Satulian lands;
 Aruncan youth, and those Sacrans yields,
 And the proud Labicans, with painted shields.
 And those who near Numician streams reside,
 And those whom Tiber's holy forests hide;
 Or Circe's hills from the main land divide:
 Where Ufens glide along the lowly lands,
 Or the black water of Pomptina stands,

Last, from the Volcians fair, Camilla came;
 And led her warlike troops, a warrior dame:
 Unbred to spinning, in the loom unstill'd,
 She chose the nobler Pallas of the field.
 Mix'd with the first, the fierce virago fought,
 Sustain'd the toils of arms, the danger sought:
 Outstripp'd the winds in speed upon the plain,
 Flew o'er the fields, nor hurt the bearded grain:
 She swept the seas, and as she skimm'd along,
 Her flying feet unbat'h'd on billows hung.
 Men, boys, and women, stupid with surprise,
 Where'er she passes, fix their wandering eyes:
 Longing they look, and gaping at her sight,
 Devour her o'er and o'er with vast delight.
 Her purple habit sits with such a grace
 On her smooth shoulders, and so suits her face:
 Her head with ringlets of her hair is crown'd;
 And in a golden caul the curls are bound.
 She shakes her myrtle javelin; and, behind,
 Her Lycian quiver dances in the wind.

THE EIGHTH BOOK OF

THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE war being now begun, both the generals make all possible preparations. Turnus sends to Diomedes. Æneas goes in person to beg succour from Evander, and the Tuscans. Evander receives him kindly, furnishes him with men, and sends his own son Pallas with him. Vulcan, at the request of Venus, makes arms for her son Æneas, and draws on his shield the most memorable actions of his posterity.

WHEN Turnus had assembled all his powers;
 His standard planted on Laurentum's towers;
 When now the sprightly trumpet, from afar,
 Had given the signal of approaching war,
 Had rous'd the neighing steeds to scour the fields,
 While the fierce riders clatter'd on their shields,
 Trembling with rage, the Latian youth prepare
 To join th' allies, and headlong rush to war.
 Fierce Ufess, and Messapus, led the crowd;
 With bold Mezentius, who blasphem'd aloud.
 These, through the country took their wasteful
 course;
 The fields to forage, and to gather force.
 Then Venulus to Diomedes they send,
 To beg his aid Ausonia to defend:
 Declare the common danger, and inform
 The Grecian leader of the growing storm:
 Æneas landed on the Latian coast,
 With banish'd gods, and with a baffled host:
 Yet now inspir'd to conquest of the state;
 And claim'd a title from the gods and fate.
 What numerous nations in his quarrel came,
 And how they spread his formidable name:
 What he design'd, what mischiefs might arise,
 If fortune favour'd his first enterprize,
 Was left for him to weigh, whose equal fears,
 And common interest was involv'd in theirs.

While Turnus and th' allies thus urge the war,
 The Trojan, floating in a flood of care,
 Beholds the tempest which his foes prepare,
 This way and that he turns his anxious mind;
 Thinks, and rejects the counsels he design'd;
 Explores himself, in vain, in every part,
 And gives no rest to his distracted heart.

"So when the Sun by day, or Moon by night,
 Strike on the polish'd brass their trembling light,
 The glittering species here and there divide,
 And cast their dubious beams from side to side:
 Now on the walls, now on the pavement play,
 And to the cieling flash the gliring day.
 'Twas night: and weary nature lull'd asleep
 The birds of air, and fishes of the deep;
 And beasts, and mortal men: the Trojan chief
 Was laid on Tiber's banks, oppress with grief,
 And found in silent slumber late relief.
 Then through the shadows of the poplar wood
 Arose the father of the Roman flood:
 An azure robe was o'er his body spread,
 A wreath of shady reeds adorn'd his head:
 Thus, manifest to sight, the god appear'd,
 And with these pleasing words his sorrow cheer'd:
 "Undoubted offspring of ethereal race,
 O long expected in this promis'd place, [gods,
 Who, through the foes, hast borne thy banish'd
 Restor'd them to their hearths, and old abodes;
 This is thy happy home! The clime where fate
 Ordains thee to restore the Trojan state.
 Fear not, the war shall end in lasting peace;
 And all the rage of haughty Juno cease.

"And that this nightly vision may not seem
 Th' effect of fancy, or an idle dream,
 A sow beneath an oak shall lie along,
 All white herself, and white her thirty young.
 When thirty rolling years have run their race,
 Thy son, Ascanius, on this empty space
 Shall build a royal town, of lasting frame;
 Which from this omen shall receive the name.
 Time shall approve the truth. For what remains,
 And how with sure success to crown thy pains,
 With patience next attend. A banish'd band,
 Driven with Evander from th' Arcadian land,
 Have planted here, and plac'd on high their walls;
 Their town the founder Pallanteum calls:
 Deriv'd from Pallas, his great grandsire's name:
 But the fierce Latians old possession claim,
 With war infesting the new colony;
 These make thy friends, and on their aid rely.
 To thy free passage I submit my streams:
 Wake, son of Venus, from thy pleasing dreams:
 And, when the setting stars are lost in day,
 To Juno's power thy just devotion pay.
 With sacrifice the wrathful queen appease:
 Her pride at length shall fall, her fury cease:
 When thou return'st victorious from the war,
 Perform thy vows to me with grateful care.
 The god am I, whose yellow water flows
 Around these fields, and fattens as it goes:
 Tiber my name: among the rolling floods
 Renown'd on Earth, esteem'd among the gods.
 'This is my certain seat: in times to come,
 My waves shall wash the walls of mighty Rome."
 He said, and plung'd below, while yet he spoke;
 His dream Æneas and his sleep forsook.
 He rose, and looking up, beheld the skies
 With purple blushing and the day arise.
 Then, water in his hollow palm he took
 From Tiber's flood; and thus the powers bespoke:

"Laureatian nymphs, by whom the streams are
 And father Tiber, in thy sacred bed [fed,
 Receive Æneas; and from danger keep
 Whatever fount, whatever holy deep,
 Conceals thy watery stores; where'er they rise,
 And, bubbling from below, salute the skies,
 Thou king of horned floods, whose plentiful urn
 Diffuses fatness to the fruitful corn,
 For this thy kind compassion of our woes,
 Shall share my morning sung, and evening vows.
 But, oh! be present to thy people's aid;
 And firm the gracious promise thou hast made."
 Thus having said, two gallees, from his stores,
 With care he chooses; mans, and fits with oars.
 Now on the shore the fatal swine is found:
 Wondrous to tell; she lay along the ground:
 Her well-fed offspring at her udders hung;
 She white herself, and white her thirty young;
 Æneas takes the mother; and her brood,
 And all on Juno's altar are bestow'd.
 The following night, and the succeeding day,
 Propitious Tiber smooth'd his watery way:
 He roll'd his river back, and pois'd he stood:
 A gentle swelling, and a peaceful flood.
 The Trojans mount their ships; they put from shore:

Borne on the waves, and scarcely dip an oar.
 Shouts from the land give omen to their course,
 And the pitch'd vessels glide with easy force.
 The woods and waters wonder at the gleam
 Of shields, and painted ships, that stem the stream.

One summer's night, and one whole day they pass
 Betwixt the green-wood shades, and cut the liquid glass.

The fiery Sun had finish'd half his race,
 Look'd back, and doubted in the middle space,
 When they from far beheld the rising towers,
 The tops of sheds, and shepherds' lowly bowers:
 Thin as they stood, which, then of heavenly clay,
 Now rise in marble, from the Roman away.
 These cots (Evander's kingdom, mean and poor)
 The Trojan saw, and turn'd his ships to shore.
 'Twas on a solemn day: th' Arcadian states,
 The king and prince without the city gates,
 Then paid their offerings in a sacred grove
 To Hercules, the warrior son of Jove.
 Thick clouds of rolling smoke involve the skies;
 And fat of entrails on his altar fries. [flood,

But when they saw the ships that stemm'd the
 And glitter'd through the covert of the wood,
 They rose with fear, and left th' unfinished feast;
 Till dauntless Pallas re-assur'd the rest
 To pay the rites. Himself, without delay,
 A javelin seiz'd, and singly took his way.
 Then gain'd a rising ground; and call'd from far;
 "Resolve me, strangers, whence, and what you are;
 Your business here, and bring you peace or war?"
 High on the stern, Æneas took his stand,
 And held a branch of olive in his hand,
 While thus he spoke: "The Phrygians' arms you
 Expell'd from Troy, provok'd in Italy [see,
 By Latian foes, with war unjustly made:
 At first affianc'd, and at last betray'd,
 This message bear: the Trojans and their chief,
 Bring holy peace, and beg the king's relief."
 Struck with so great a name, and all on fire,
 The youth replies, "Whatever you require
 Your fame exacts: upon our shores descend,
 A welcome guest, and, what you wish, a friend."

He said; and downward hasting to the strand,
 Embrac'd the stranger prince, and join'd his hand.

Conducted to the grove, Æneas broke
 The silence first, and thus the king bespoke:
 "Best of the Greeks, to whom, by fate's command,
 I bear these peaceful branches in my hand,
 Undaunted I approach you; though I know
 Your birth is Grecian, and your land my foe:
 From Atreus though your ancient lineage came,
 And both the brother-kings your kindred claim,
 Yet, my self-conscious worth, your high renown,
 Your virtue, through the neighbouring nations blown,

Our fathers' mingled blood, Apollo's voice,
 Have led me hither, less by need than choice.
 Our founder Dardanns, as fame has sung,
 And Greeks acknowledge, from Electra sprung:
 Electra from the loins of Atlas came;
 Atlas whose head sustains the starry frame.
 Your sire is Mercury; whom long before
 On cold Cyllene's top fair Maja bore.
 Maja the fair, on fame if we rely,
 Was Atlas' daughter, who sustains the sky:
 Thus from one common source our streams
 divide:

Ours is the Trojan, yours th' Arcadian side.
 Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before,
 Nor ask'd your leave, nor did your faith implore;
 But come, without a pledge, my own ambassador.
 The same Rutilians, who with arms pursue
 The Trojan race, are equal foes to you.

"Our host expell'd, what farther force can stay
 The victor troops from universal sway?
 Then will they stretch their power a-stwart the land;

And either sea from side to side command.
 Receive our offer'd faith; and give us this:
 Ours is a generous and experience'd line:
 We want not hearts nor bodies for the war;
 In council cautious, and in fields we dare."
 He said; and while he spoke, with piercing eyes
 Evander view'd the man with vast surprise,
 Pleas'd with his action, ravish'd with his face,
 Then answer'd briefly, with a royal grace:
 "O valiant leader of the Trojan line,
 In whom the features of thy father shine,
 How I recal Anchises, how I see
 His motions, mien, and all my friend in thee!
 Long though it be, 'tis fresh within my mind,
 When Priam to his sister's court design'd
 A welcome visit, with a friendly stay,
 And through th' Arcadian kingdom took his way.
 Then, past a boy, the callow down began
 To shade my chin, and call me first a man.
 I saw the shining train with vast delight,
 And Priam's goodly person pleas'd my sight:
 But great Anchises, far above the rest,
 With awful wonder fir'd my youthful breast.
 I long'd to join, in friendship's holy bands,
 Our mutual hearts, and plight our mutual hands.
 I first accosted him: I sued, I sought,
 And with a loving force to Pheneus brought,
 He gave me, when at length constrain'd to go,
 A Lycian quiver, and a Gnosian bow:
 A vest embroider'd glorious to behold,
 And two rich bridles, with their bits of gold,
 Which my son's coursers in obedience hold.
 The league you ask I offer, as your right:
 And when tomorrow's Sun reveals the light,

With swift supplies you shall be sent away :
 Now celebrate, with us, this solemn day ;
 Whose holy rites admit no long delay.
 Honour our annual feast ; and take your seat
 With friendly welcome, at a homely treat."
 Thus having said, the bowls (remov'd for fear)
 The youths replac'd ; and soon restor'd the cheer.
 On sods of turf he set the soldiers round ;
 A maple throne, rais'd higher from the ground,
 Receiv'd the Trojan chief : and o'er the bed,
 A lion's shaggy hide for ornament they spread.
 The loaves were serv'd in canisters, the wine
 In bowls, the priest renew'd the rites divine :
 Broil'd entrails are their food, and beef's continued chine.

But, when the rage of hunger was repress'd,
 Thus spoke Evander to his royal guest :
 "These rites, these altars, and this feast, O king,
 From no vain fears, or superstition, spring ;
 Or blind devotion, or from blinder chance ;
 Or heady zeal, or brutal ignorance :
 But sav'd from danger, with a grateful sense,
 The labours of a god we recompense.
 See, from afar, yon rock that mates the sky,
 About whose feet such heaps of rubbish lie :
 Such indigested ruin ; bleak and bare,
 How desert now it stands, expos'd in air !
 'Twas once a robber's den ; enclos'd around
 With living stone, and deep beneath the ground.
 The monster Cacus, more than half a beast,
 This hold, impervious to the Sun, possess'd.
 The pavement ever foul with human gore ;
 Heads, and their mangled members, hung the door.
 Vulcan this plague begot ; and, like his sire,
 Black clouds he belch'd ; and flakes of livid fire.
 Time, long expected, eas'd us of our load :
 And brought the needful presence of a god.
 Th' avenging force of Hercules, from Spain,
 Arriv'd in triumph from Geryon slain ;
 Thrice liv'd the giant, and thrice liv'd in vain.
 His prize, the lowing herds, Alcides drove
 Near Tiber's bank, to graze the shady grove.
 Allur'd with hope of plunder, and intent
 By force to rob, by fraud to circumvent.
 The brutal Cacus, as by chance they stray'd,
 Four oxen thence, and four fair kine convey'd :
 And, lest the print'd footsteps might be seen,
 He dragg'd them backwards to his rocky den :
 The tracts averse, a lying notice gave,
 And led the searcher backward from the cave :
 Meantime the herdsman hero shifts his place :
 To find fresh pasture, and untrodden grass :
 The beasts, who miss'd their mates, fill'd all around
 With bellowings, and the rocks restor'd the sound.
 One heifer, who had heard her love complain,
 Roar'd from the cave, and made the project vain.
 Alcides found the fraud : with rage he brook,
 And toss'd about his head his knotted oak.
 Swift as the winds, or Scythian arrows flight,
 He clomb, with eager haste, th' aerial height.
 Then first we saw the monster mend his pace :
 Fear in his eyes, and paleness in his face,
 Confess'd the god's approach : trembling he springs,
 As terror had increas'd his feet with wings :
 Nor stay'd for stairs ; but down the depth he threw
 His body ; on his back the door he drew.
 The door, a rib of living rock ; with pains
 His father bew'd it out, and bound with iron chains.
 He broke the heavy links : the mountain clos'd,
 And bars and levers to his foe oppos'd.

VOL. XIX.

The wretch had hardly made his dungeon fast ;
 The fierce avenger came with bounding haste :
 Survey'd the mouth of the forbidden hold ;
 And here and there his raging eyes he roll'd.
 He gnash'd his teeth ; and thrice he compass'd
 round

With winged speed, the circuit of the ground.
 Thrice at the cavern's mouth he pull'd in vain,
 And, panting, thrice desisted from his pain.
 A pointed flinty rock, all bare, and black,
 Grew gibbous from behind the mountain's back :
 Owls, ravens, all ill omens of the night,
 Here built their nests, and hither wing'd their flight.
 The leaning head hung threatening o'er the flood,
 And nodded to the left : the hero stood
 Averse, with planted feet, and, from the right,
 Tugg'd at the solid stone with all his might.
 Thus heav'd, the fix'd foundations of the rock
 Gave way : Heav'n echo'd at the rattling shock.
 Tumbling it chok'd the flood : on either side
 The banks leap backward, and the streams divide :
 The sky shrunk upward with unusual dread ;
 And trembling Tiber divid'd beneath his bed.
 The court of Cacus stands reveal'd to sight ;
 The cavern glares with new-admitted light.
 So pent the vapours with a rumbling sound
 Heave from below, and rend the hollow ground :
 A sounding flaw succeeds : and, from on high,
 The gods with hate beheld the nether sky :
 The ghosts repine at violated night,
 And curse th' invading Sun, and sicken at the sight.
 The graceless monster, caught in open day,
 Enclos'd, and in despair to fly away,
 Howls horrible from underneath, and fills
 His hollow palace with unmanly yells.
 The hero stands above ; and from afar
 Plies him with darts, and stones, and distant war.
 He, from his nostrils and huge mouth, expires
 Black clouds of smoke, amidst his father's fires.
 Gathering, with each repeated blast, the night :
 To make uncertain aim, and erring flight.
 The wrathful god then plunges from above,
 And where in thickest waves the sparkles drove,
 There lights, and wades through fumes, and gropes
 his way :

Half sing'd, half stifled, till he grasp'd his prey.
 The monster, spewing fruitless flames, he found ;
 He squeez'd his throat, he writh'd his neck around ;
 And in a knot his crippled members bound.
 Then, from their sockets, tore his burning eyes ;
 Roll'd on a heap the breathless robber lies.
 The doors, unbar'd, receive the rushing day,
 And thorough lights disclose the ravish'd prey.
 The bulls redeem'd, breathe open air again :
 Next, by the feet, they drag him from his den.
 The wondering neighbourhood, with glad surprise,
 Beheld his shagged breast, his giant size, [eyes.
 His mouth that flames no more, and his extinguish'd
 From that auspicious day, with rites divine,
 We worship at the hero's holy shrine.
 Potitius first ordain'd these annual vows,
 As priests, were added the Pinarian house :
 Who rais'd this altar in the sacred shade,
 Where honours, ever due, for ever shall be paid.
 For these deserts, and this high virtue shown,
 Ye warlike youths, your heads with garlands crown ;
 Fill high the goblets with a sparkling flood :
 And, with deep draughts, invoke our common god."
 This said, a double wreath Evander twin'd :
 And poplars, black and white, his temples bind.

E e

Then brims his ample bowl: with like design
 The rest invoke the god, with sprinkled wine.
 Meantime the Sun descended from the skies;
 And the bright evening-star began to rise.
 And now the priests, Potitius at their head,
 In skins of beasts involv'd, the long procession led:
 Held high the flaming tapers in their hands,
 As custom had prescrib'd their holy bands:
 Then with a second course the tables load;
 And with full chargers offer to the god.
 The Sallii sing, and cense his altars round
 With Saban smoke; their heads with poplar bound.
 One choir of old, another of the young;
 To dance, and bear the burden of the song.
 The lay records the labour, and the praise,
 And all th' immortal acts of Hercules.
 First, how the mighty babe, when swath'd in bands,
 The serpents strangled with his infant hands.
 Then, as in years and matchless force he grew,
 Th' Æchaïan walls, and Trojan overthrew.
 Besides a thousand hazards they relate,
 Procur'd by Juno's, and Euristheus' hate.
 Thy hands, unconquer'd hero, could subdue
 The cloud-born Centaurs, and the monster crew.
 Nor thy resistless arm the bull withstood:
 Nor he the roaring terror of the wood.
 The triple porter of the Stygian seat,
 With lolling tongue, lay fawning at thy feet,
 And, seiz'd with fear, forgot thy mangled meat.
 Th' infernal waters trembled at the sight;
 Thee, god, no face of danger could affright;
 Not huge Typhæus, nor th' unnumber'd snake,
 Increas'd with hissing heads, in Lerna's lake.
 "Hail, Jove's undoubted son! an added grace
 To Heaven, and the great author of thy race,
 Receive the grateful offerings, which we pay,
 And smile propitious on thy solemn day."
 In numbers, thus they sung: above the rest,
 The den, and death of Cacus crown the feast.
 The woods to hollow vales convey the sound;
 The vales to hills, and hills the notes rebound.
 The rites perform'd, the cheerful train retire.
 Betwixt young Pallas, and his aged sire
 The Trojan pass'd, the city to survey;
 And pleasing talk beguil'd the tedious way.
 The stranger cast around his curious eyes:
 New objects viewing still, with new surprise.
 With greedy joy inquires of various things:
 And acts and monuments of ancient kings.
 Then thus the founder of the Roman towers:
 "These woods were first the seat of sylvan powers,
 Of nymphs and fawns, and savage men, who took
 Their birth from trunks of trees and stubborn oak.
 Nor law they knew, nor manners, nor the care
 Of labouring oxen, nor the shining share:
 Nor arts of gain, nor what they gain'd to spare.
 They exercise the chase: the running flood
 Supply'd their thirst; the trees supply'd their food.
 Then Saturn came, who fled the power of Jove,
 Robb'd of his realms, and banish'd from above.
 The men, dispers'd on hills, to towns be brought;
 And laws ordain'd, and civil customs taught:
 And Latium call'd the land where safe he lay
 From his unduteous son, and his usurping sway.
 With his mild empire peace and plenty came:
 And hence the golden times deriv'd their name.
 A more degenerate and discolour'd age
 Succeeded this, with avarice and rage.
 Th' Ausonians, then, and bold Sicilians came;
 And Saturn's empire often chang'd the name.

Then kings, gigantic Tiber, and the rest,
 With arbitrary sway, the land oppress'd.
 For Tiber's flood was Albula before;
 Till, from the tyrant's fate, his name it bore.
 I last arriv'd, driv'n from my native home,
 By fortune's power, and fate's resistless doom.
 Long toss'd on seas, I sought this happy land:
 Warn'd by my mother nymph, and call'd by Heaven's command."^{[guts,}

Thus, walking on, he spoke: and show'd the
 Since call'd Carmentia by the Roman state;
 Where stood an altar, sacred to the name
 Of old Carmenta, the prophetic dame:
 Who to her son foretold th' Æthenean race,
 Sublime in fame, and Rome's imperial place.
 Then shows the forest, which, in after times,
 Fierce Romulus, for perpetrated crimes,
 A sacred refuge made: with this, the shrine
 Where Pan below the rocks had rites divine.
 Then tells of Argus' death, his murder'd guest,
 Whose grave and tomb his innocence attest.
 Thence, to the steep Tarpeian rock he leads;
 Now roof'd with gold; then thatch'd with homely reeds.

A reverend fear (such superstition reigns
 Among the rude) ev'n then possess'd the swains.
 Some god they knew, what god they could not tell,
 Did there amidst the sacred horror dwell.
 Th' Arcadians thought him Jove; and said they saw
 The mighty thunderer with majestic awe;
 Who shook his shield, and dealt his bolts around;
 And scatter'd tempests on the teeming ground.
 Then saw two heaps of ruins; once they stood
 Two stately towns, on either side the flood.
 Saturnia's and Janicula's remains:
 And either place the founder's name retains.
 Discoursing thus together, they resort
 Where poor Evander kept his country court.
 They view'd the ground of Rome's litigious hall,
 Once oxen low'd, where now the lawyers bawl.
 Then, stooping, through the narrow gates they
 press'd,

When thus the king address'd his Trojan guest:
 "Mean as it is, this palace, and this door,
 Receiv'd Alcides, then a conqueror.
 Dare to be poor, accept our homely food
 Which feasted him; and emulate a god."
 Then underneath a lowly roof he led
 The weary prince; and laid him on a bed:
 The stuffing leaves, with hides of bears o'erspread

Now night had shed her silver dews around,
 And with her sable wings embrac'd the ground,
 When love's fair goddess, anxious for her son,
 (New tumults rising, and new wars begun)
 Couch'd with her husband, in his golden bed,
 With these alluring words invokes his aid;
 And, that her pleasing speech his mind may move,
 Inspires each accent with the charms of love:
 "While cruel fate conspir'd with Grecian power,
 To level with the ground the Trojan towers,
 I ask'd not aid th' unhappy to restore;
 Nor did the succour of thy skill implore;
 Nor urg'd the labours of my lord in vain,
 A sinking empire longer to sustain.
 Though I much ow'd to Priam's house; and more
 The danger of Æneas did deplore.
 But now, by Jove's command, and fate's decree,
 His race is doom'd to reign in Italy;
 With humble suit I beg thy useful art,
 O still propitious power that rules my heart!

A mother kneels a suppliant for her son :
 By Thetis and Aurora thou wert won
 To forge impenetrable shields; and grace,
 With fated arms, a less illustrious race.
 Behold, what haughty nations are combin'd
 Against the relics of the Phrygian kind :
 With fire and sword my people to destroy ;
 And conquer Venus twice, in conquering Troy."'
 She said ; and straight her arms of snowy hue,
 About her unresolving husband threw.
 Her soft embraces soon infuse desire :
 His bones and marrow sudden warmth inspire ;
 And all the godhead feels the wanted fire.
 Not half so swift the rattling thunder flies,
 Or forky lightnings flash along the skies.
 The goddess, proud of her successful wiles,
 And conscious of her form, in secret smiles.
 Then thus, the power obnoxious to her charms,
 Panting, and half dissolving in her arms :
 " Why seek you reasons for a cause so just :
 Or your own beauties, or my love distrust ?
 Long since, had you requir'd my helpful hand,
 Th' artificer and art you might command,
 To labour arms for Troy ; nor Jove, nor fate,
 Confin'd their empire to so short a date :
 Add, if you now desire new wars to wage,
 My skill I promise, and my pains engage.
 Whatever melting metals can conspire,
 Or breathing bellows, or the forming fire,
 Is freely yours ; your anxious fears remove :
 And think no task is difficult to love."'
 Trembling he spoke : and, eager of her charms,
 He snatch'd the willing goddess to his arms ;
 Till in her lap infus'd, he lay possess'd
 Of full desire, and sunk to pleasing rest.
 Now when the night her middle race had rode,
 And his first slumber had refresh'd the god ;
 The time when early housewives leave the bed ;
 When living embers on the hearth they spread ;
 Supply the lamp, and call the maids to rise,
 With yawning mouths, and with half-open'd
 eyes ;
 They ply the distaff by the twinkling light ;
 And to their daily labour add the night.
 Thus frugally they earn their children's bread :
 And uncorrupted keep their nuptial bed.
 Not less concern'd, nor at a later hour,
 Rose from his downy couch the forging power.
 Sacred to Vulcan's name an isle there lay,
 Betwixt Sicilia's coasts and Lipara,
 Rais'd high on smoking rocks ; and deep below,
 In hollow caves, the fires of Ætna glow.
 The Cyclops here their heavy hammers deal ;
 Loud strokes and hissings of tormented steel
 Are heard around : the boiling waters roar ;
 And smoky flames through fuming tunnels soar.
 Hither, the father of the fire, by night,
 Through the brown air precipitates his flight.
 On their eternal anvils here he found
 The brethren beating, and the blows go round :
 A load of pointless thunder now there lies
 Before their hands, to ripen for the skies ;
 These darts for angry Jove they daily cast ;
 Consum'd on mortals with prodigious waste.
 Three rays of withren rain, of fire three more,
 Of winged southern winds, and cloudy store
 As many parts the dreadful mixture frame :
 And fears are added, and avenging flame.
 Inferior ministers for Mars prepare
 His broken axle-trees and blunted war :

And send him forth again with furbish'd arms,
 To wake the lazy war, with trumpets' loud alarms.
 The rest refresh the scaly snanks that fold
 The shield of Pallas, and renew their gold.
 Full on the crest the Gorgon's head they place,
 With eyes that roll in death, and with distorted face.
 " My sons," said Vulcan ; " set your tasks aside ;
 Your strength, and master-skill, must now be try'd.
 Arms for a hero forge : arms that require
 Your force, your speed, and all your forming fire."
 He said : they set their former work aside,
 And their new toils with eager haste divide.
 A flood of molten silver, brass, and gold,
 And deadly steel in the large furnace roll'd ;
 Of this their artful hands a shield prepare ;
 Alone sufficient to sustain the war.
 Seven orbs within a spacious round they close !
 One stirs the fire, and one the bellows blows.
 The hissing steel is in the smithy drown'd ;
 The grot with beaten anvils groans around.
 By turns their arms advance, in equal time :
 By turns their hands descend, and hammers chime.
 They turn the glowing mass with crooked-tongs :
 The fiery work proceeds with rustic song.
 While, at the Lemnian god's command, they urge
 Their labours thus, and ply th' Æolian forge,
 The cheerful morn salutes Evander's eyes ;
 And songs of chirping birds invite to rise.
 He leaves his lowly bed ; his buskins meet
 Above his ancles ; sandals sheath his feet :
 He sets his trusty sword upon his side ;
 And o'er his shoulder throws a panther's hide,
 Two menial dogs before their master press'd :
 Thus clad, and guarded thus, he seeks his kingly
 guest.
 Mindful of promis'd aid he mends his pace ;
 But meets Æneas in the middle space.
 Young Pallas did his father's steps attend ;
 And true Achates waited on his friend.
 They join their hands : a secret seat they choose ;
 Th' Arcadian first their former talk renews.
 " Undaunted prince, I never can believe
 The Trojan empire lost, while you survive.
 Command th' assistance of a faithful friend :
 But feeble are the succours I can send.
 Our narrow kingdom, here the Tiber bounds ;
 That other side the Latian state surrounds ;
 Insults our walls, and wastes our fruitful grounds.
 But mighty nations I prepare to join
 Their arms with yours, and aid your just design.
 You come, as by your better genius sent ;
 And fortune seems to favour your intent.
 Not far from hence there stands a hilly town,
 Of ancient building and of high renown ;
 Torn from the Tuscans by the Lydian race ;
 Who gave the name of Cære to the place,
 Once Agyllina call'd : it flourish'd long
 In pride of wealth, and warlike people strong :
 Till curst Mezentius, in a fatal hour,
 Assum'd the crown, with arbitrary power.
 What words can paint those execrable times ;
 The subjects' sufferings, and the tyrant's crimes !
 That blood, those murders, O ye gods ! replace
 On his own head, and on his impious race :
 The living, and the dead, at his command
 Were coupled, face to face, and hand to hand :
 Till, chok'd with stench, in loath'd embraces ty'd,
 The lingering wretches pin'd away, and dy'd.
 Thus plung'd in ill, and meditating more,
 The people's patience try'd, no longer bore

The raging monster : but with arms beset
 His house, and vengeance and destruction threat.
 They fire his palace : while the flame ascends,
 They force his guards, and execute his friends.
 He cleaves the crowd ; and, favour'd by the night,
 To Turnus' friendly court directs his flight.
 By just revenge the Tuscans set on fire,
 With arms their king to punishment require :
 Their numerous troops, now muster'd on the strand,
 My counsel shall submit to your command.
 Their navy swarms upon their coast : they cry
 To hoist their anchors ; but the gods deny.
 An ancient augur, skill'd in future fate,
 With those foreboding words restrains their hate :
 ' Ye brave in arms, ye Lydian blood, the flower
 Of Tuscan youth, and choice of all their power,
 Whom just revenge against Mezentius arms,
 To seek your tyrant's death by lawful arms ;
 Know this ; no native of our land may lead
 This powerful people : seek a foreign head.'

" Aw'd with these words, in camps they still abide ;
 And wait, with longing looks, their promis'd guide.
 Torchan, the Tuscan chief, to me has sent
 Their crown, and every regal ornament :
 The people join their own with his desire ;
 And all, my conduct, as their king, require.
 But the chill blood that creeps within my veins,
 And age, and listless limbs unfit for pains,
 And a soul conscious of its own decay,
 Have forc'd me to refuse imperial sway.
 My Pallas were more fit to mount the throne ;
 And should, but he's a Sabine mother's son ;
 And half a native : but in you combine
 A manly vigour, and a foreign line.
 Where fate and smiling fortune show the way,
 Pursue the ready path to sovereign sway.
 The staff of my declining days, my son,
 Shall make your good or ill success his own.
 In fighting fields from you shall learn to dare :
 And serve the hard apprenticeship of war.
 Your matchless courage and your conduct view ;
 And early shall begin t' admire and copy you.
 Besides, two hundred horse he shall command :
 Though few, a warlike and well-chosen band.
 These in my name are listed : and my son
 As many more has added in his own."
 Scarce had he said : Achates and his guest,
 With down-cast eyes, their silent grief express :
 Who, short of succours, and in deep despair,
 Shook at the dismal prospect of the war.
 But his bright mother, from a breaking cloud,
 To cheer her issue, thunder'd thrice aloud.
 Thrice forky lightning flash'd along the sky,
 And Tyrrhene trumpets thrice were heard on high.
 Then, gazing up, repeated peals they hear :
 And, in a Heaven serene, refulgent arms appear ;
 Reddening the skies, and glittering all around,
 The temper'd metals clash, and yield a silver sound.
 The rest stood trembling, struck with awe divine :
 Æneas only conscious to the sign,
 Presag'd th' event ; and joyful view'd, above,
 Th' accomplish'd promise of the queen of love.
 Then, to th' Arcadian king : " This prodigy
 (Dismiss your fear) belongs alone to me.
 Heaven calls me to the war : th' expected sign
 Is given of promis'd aids, and arms divine.
 My goddess-mother, whose indulgent care
 Foresaw the dangers of the growing war,
 This omen gave ; when bright Vulcanian arms,
 Fated from force of steel by Stygian charms,

Suspended, shone on high : she then foresaw'd
 Approaching fights, and fields to float in blood.
 Turnus shall dearly pay for faith forsworn :
 And corpse and swords, and shields, on Tiber borne,

Shall choke his flood : now sound the loud alarms,
 And, Latian troops, prepare your perjurd arms."
 He said, and rising from his homely throne,
 The solemn rites of Hercules begun :
 And on his altars wak'd the sleeping fire :
 Then cheerful to his household gods retires.
 There offers chosen sheep : th' Arcadian king
 And Trojan youth the same oblations bring.
 Next of his men, and ships, he makes review,
 Draws out the best and ablest of the crew.
 Down with the falling stream the refuse run,
 To raise with joyful news his drooping son.
 Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan band,
 Who wait their leader to the Tyrrhene land.
 A sprightly courser, fairer than the rest,
 The king himself presents his royal guest.
 A lion's hide his back and limbs infold,
 Precious with studded works, and paws of gold.
 Fame through the little city spreads aloud
 Th' intended march, amid the fearful crowd :
 The matrons beat their breasts ; dissolve in tears ;
 And double their devotion in their fears.
 The war at hand appears with more affright :
 And rises every moment to the sight.
 Then, old Evander, with a close embrace, [face,
 Strain'd his departing friend ; and tears o'erflow his
 " Would Heaven," said he, " my strength and youth recal,

Such as I was beneath Preneste's wall,
 Then when I made the foremost foes retire,
 And set whole heaps of conquer'd shields on fire ;
 When Herilus in single fight I slew,
 Whom with three lives Feronia did endure :
 And thrice I sent him to the Stygian shore ;
 Till the last ebbing soul return'd no more :
 Such if I stood renew'd, not these alarms,
 Nor death, should rend me from my Pallas' arms,
 Nor proud Mezentius thus unpanish'd boast
 His rapes and murders on the Tuscan coast.
 Ye gods ! and mighty Jove, in pity bring
 Relief, and hear a father, and a king.
 If fate and you reserve those eyes to see
 My son return with peace and victory ;
 If the lov'd boy should bless his father's sight ;
 If we shall meet again with more delight ;
 Then draw my life in length, let me sustain,
 In hopes of his embrace, the worst of pain.
 But if your hard decrees, which, O ! I dread,
 Have doom'd to death his undeserving head,
 This, O this very moment, let me die ;
 While hopes and fears in equal balance lie.
 While yet possess of all his youthful charms,
 I strain him close within these aged arms :
 Before that fatal news my soul shall wound !"
 He said, and swooning, sunk upon the ground :
 His servants bore him off ; and softly laid
 His languish'd limbs upon his homely bed.
 The horsemen march ; the gates are open'd wide ;
 Æneas at their head, Achates by his side.
 Next these the Trojan leaders rode along.
 Last, follows in the rear, th' Arcadian throng,
 Young Pallas shone conspicuous o'er the rest ;
 Gilded his arms, embroider'd was his vest.
 So from the seas, exerts his radiant head
 The star, by whom the lights of Heaven are led.

Shakes from his rosy locks the pearly dew ;
 Dispers the darkness, and the day renews.
 The trembling wives, the walls and turrets crowd.
 And follow, with their eyes, the dusty cloud,
 Which winds disperse by fits, and show from far
 The blaze of arms, and shields, and shining war.
 The troops, drawn up in beautiful array,
 O'er healthy plains pursue the ready way.
 Repeated peals of shouts are heard around :
 The neighing coursers answer to the sound ;
 And shake with horny hoofs the solid ground.
 A greenwood shade, for long religion known,
 Stands by the streams that wash the Tuscan town ;
 Encompass'd round with gloomy hills above,
 Which add a holy horror to the grove.
 The first inhabitants, of Grecian blood,
 That sacred forest to Sylvanus vow'd :
 The guardian of their flocks and fields ; they pay
 Their due devotions on his annual day.
 Not far from hence, along the river's side,
 In tents secure, the Tuscan troops abide !
 By Tarchon led. Now, from a rising ground,
 Æneas cast his wondering eyes around,
 And all the Tyrrhene army had in sight,
 Stretch'd on the spacious plains from left to right.
 Thither his warlike train the Trojan led :
 Refresh'd his men, and weary horses fed.

Mean-time the mother-goddess, crown'd with charms,
 Breaks through the clouds, and brings the fated
 Within a winding vale she finds her son, [arms.
 On the cool river's banks, retir'd alone.
 She shows her heavenly form without disguise,
 And gives herself to his desiring eyes.
 " Behold," she said, " perform'd in every part,
 My promise made ; and Vulcan's labour'd art.
 Now seek, secure, the Lætan enemy ;
 And haughty Turnus to the field defy."
 She said : and having first her son embrac'd,
 The radiant arms beneath an oak she plac'd.
 Proud of the gift, he roll'd his greedy sight
 Around the work, and gaz'd with vast delight.
 He lifts, he turns, he poises, and admires
 The created helm, that vomits radiant fires :
 His hands the fatal sword and corslet hold :
 One keen with temper'd steel, one stiff with gold ;
 Both ample, flaming both, and beamy bright :
 So shines a cloud, when edg'd with adverse light.
 He shakes the pointed spear, and longs to try
 The plaited cuirass on his manly thigh :
 But most admires the shield's mysterious mould,
 And Roman triumphs rising on the gold.
 For these, emboast, the heavenly smith had wrought
 (Not in the rolls of future time untaught)
 The wars in order, and the race divine
 Of warriors, issuing from the Julian line.
 The cave of Mars was dress'd with mossy greens :
 There, by the wolf, was laid the martial twins :
 Intrepid on her swelling dugs they hung ;
 The foster-dam loll'd out her fawning tongue :
 They suck'd secure, while bending back her head,
 She lick'd their tender limbs ; and form'd them
 as they fed.
 Not far from hence new Rome appears, with games
 Projected for the rape of Sabine dames.
 The pit resounds with shrieks : a war succeeds,
 For breach of public faith, and unexampl'd deeds.
 Here for revenge the Sabine troops contend :
 The Romans there with arms the prey defend.

Weary'd with tedious war, at length they cease ;
 And both the kings and kingdoms plight the peace-
 The friendly chiefs, before Jove's altar stand ;
 Both arm'd, with each a charger in his hand :
 A fatted sow for sacrifice is led ;
 With imprecations on the perjurd head.
 Near this the traitor Metius, stretch'd between Four fiery steeds, is dragg'd along the green ;
 By Tullus' doom : the brambles drink his blood ;
 And his torn limbs are left, the vultures' food.
 There Porsenna to Rome proud Tarquin brings ;
 And would by force restore the banish'd kings.
 One tyrant for his fellow-tyrant fights :
 The Roman youth assert their native rights.
 Before the town the Tuscan army lies :
 To win by famine, or by fraud surprisè.
 Their king, half threatening, half disdaining, stood :
 While Cocles broke the bridge ; and stemm'd the flood.

The captive maids there tempt the raging tide :
 Scap'd from their chains, with Clelia for their guide.

High on a rock heroic Manlius stood ;
 To guard the temple, and the temple's god.
 Then Rome was poor, and there you might behold
 The palace thatch'd with straw, now roof'd with gold.

The silver goose before the shining gate
 There flew ; and, by her cackle, sav'd the state.
 She told the Gauls' approach : th' approaching
 Gauls,

Obscure in night, ascend, and seize the walls.
 The gold dissembled well their golden hair :
 And golden chains on their white necks they wear. [wield :

Gold are their vests : long Alpine spears they
 And their left arm sustains a length of shield.
 Hard by, the leaping Salian priests advance :
 And naked through the streets the mad Luperci dance

In caps of wool. The targets dropt from Heaven :
 Here modest matrons in soft litters driven,
 To pay their vows in solemn pomp appear :
 And odorous gums in their chaste hands they bear.
 Far hence remov'd, the Stygian seats are seen :
 Pains of the damn'd, and punish'd Cataline :
 Hung on a rock the traitor ; and around
 The furies hissing from the nether ground.
 Apart from these, the happy souls he draws,
 And Cato's holy ghost dispensing laws.
 Betwixt the quarters flows a golden sea :
 But foaming surges, there, in silver play.
 The dancing dolphins, with their tails, divide
 The glittering waves, and cut the precious tide.
 Amid the main, two mighty fleets engage
 Their brazen beaks oppos'd with equal rage.
 Actium surveys the well-disputed prize :
 Leucate's watery plain with foamy billows frica.
 Young Cæsar, on the stern, in armour bright,
 Here leads the Romans and their gods to fight :
 His beamy temples shoot their flames afar ;
 And o'er his head is hung the Julian star.
 Agrippa seconds him, with prosperous gales ;
 And, with propitious gods, his foes assails.
 A naval crown, that binds his manly brows,
 The happy fortune of the fight foreshows.

Rang'd on the line oppos'd, Antonius brings Barbarian aids, and troops of eastern kings.
 Th' Arabians near, and Bactrians from afar,
 Of tongues discordant, and a mingled war.

And, rich in gaudy robes, amidst the strife,
 His ill fate follows him; th' Egyptian wife.
 Moving they fight: with oars, and forky prows,
 The froth is gather'd, and the water glows.
 It seems as if the Cyclades again
 Were rooted up, and justled in the main;
 Or floating mountains, floating mountains meet:
 Such is the fierce encounter of the fleet.
 Fire-balls are thrown; and pointed javelins fly:
 The fields of Neptune take a purple dye.
 The queen herself, amidst the loud alarms,
 With cymbals toss'd her fainting soldiers warms,
 Fool as she was; who had not yet divin'd
 Her cruel fate; nor saw the snakes behind.
 Her country gods, the monsters of the sky,
 Great Neptune, Pallas, and love's queen, defy.
 The dog Anubis barks, but barks in vain;
 Nor longer dares oppose th' ethereal train.
 Mars, in the middle of the shining shield,
 Is grav'd, and strides along the liquid field.
 The Diræ souse from heaven, with swift descent:
 And Discord, dy'd in blood, with garments rent,
 Divides the peace: her steps Bellona treads,
 And shakes her iron rod above their heads.
 This seen, Apollo, from his Actian height,
 Pours down his arrows: at whose winged flight
 The trembling Indians and Egyptians yield:
 And soft Sabæans quit the watery field.
 The fatal mistress hoists her silken sails:
 And, shrinking from the sight, invokes the galea.
 Aghast she looks; and heaves her breast for breath:
 Panting, and pale with fear of future death.
 The god had figur'd her, as driven along
 By winds and waves, and scudding through the throng.
 Just opposite, sad Nilus opens wide
 His arms, and ample bosom, to the tide,
 And spreads his mantle o'er the winding coast;
 In which he wraps his queen, and hides the flying host.
 The victor, to the god his thanks express'd:
 And Rome triumphant, with his presence bless'd.
 Three hundred temples in the town he plac'd;
 With spoils and altars every temple grac'd.
 Three shining nights, and three succeeding days,
 The fields resound with shouts, the streets with praise,
 The domes with songs, the theatres with plays.
 All altars flame: before each altar lies,
 Drench'd in his gore, the destin'd sacrifice,
 Great Cæsar sits sublime upon his throne;
 Before Apollo's porch, of Parian stone:
 Accepts the presents vow'd for victory;
 And hangs the monumental crown on high.
 Vast crowds of vanquish'd nations march along,
 Various in arms, in habit, and in tongue.
 Here Mulciber assigns the proper place
 For Carians, and th' ungirl Numidian race;
 Then ranks the Thracians in the second row;
 And Scythians, expert in dart and bow.
 And here the tan'd Euphrates humbly glides:
 And there the Rhine submits her swelling tides.
 And proud Araxes, whom no bridge could bind,
 The Dænes' unconquer'd offspring march behind;
 And Mörini, the last of human kind.
 These figures, on the shield divinely wrought,
 By Vulcan labour'd, and by Venus brought,
 With joy and wonder fill the hero's thought.
 Unknown the names, he yet admires the grace;
 And bears aloft the faune and fortune of his race.

THE NINTH BOOK OF

THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

TURNUS takes advantage of Æneas's absence, fires some of his ships (which are transformed into sea-nymphs) and assaults his camp. The Trojans, reduced to the last extremities, send Nisus and Euryalus to recal Æneas; which furnishes the poet with that admirable episode of their friendship, generosity, and the conclusion of their adventures.

WHILE these affairs in distant places pass'd,
 The various Iris Juno sends with haste,
 To find bold Turnus, who, with anxious thought,
 The secret shade of his great grandsire sought.
 Retir'd alone she found the daring man:
 And op'd her rosy lips, and thus began:
 "What none of all the gods could grant thy vows;
 That, Turnus, this auspicious day bestows!
 Æneas, gone to seek th' Arcadian prince,
 Has left the Trojan camp without defence;
 And, short of succour there, employs his pains
 In parts remote to raise the Tuscan swains:
 Now snatch an hour that favours thy designs,
 Unite thy forces, and attack their lines."
 This said, on equal wings she pois'd her weight,
 And form'd a radiant rainbow in her sight.
 The Daunian hero lifts his hands and eyes,
 And thus invokes the goddess as she flies:
 "Iris, the grace of Heaven, what power divine
 Has sent thee down, through dusky clouds to shine?
 See, they divide! immortal day appears;
 And glittering planets dancing in their spheres!
 With joy, these happy omens I obey;
 And follow to the war the god that leads the way."
 Thus having said, as by the brook he stood,
 He scoop'd the water from the crystal flood;
 Then, with his hands, the drops to Heaven he throws,
 And leads the powers above with offer'd vows.
 Now march the bold confederates through the plain;
 Well hors'd, well clad, a rich and shining train:
 Messapus leads the van; and in the rear,
 The sons of Tyrrhus in bright arms appear.
 In the main battle, with his flaming crest,
 The mighty Turnus towers above the rest:
 Silent they move; majestically slow,
 Like ebbing Nile, or Ganges in his flow,
 The Trojans view the dusty cloud from far;
 And the dark menace of the distant war.
 Cæcus from the rampire saw it rise,
 Blackening the fields, and thickening through the Then, to his fellows, thus aloud he calls: {skies
 "What rolling clouds, my friends, approach the walls?
 Arm, arm, and man the works: prepare your spears
 And pointed darts; the Latian host appears;"
 Thus warn'd, they shut their gates; with shouts
 ascend
 The bulwarks, and, secure, their foes attend.

For their wise general, with foreseeing care,
Had charg'd them, not to tempt the doubtful war:
Nor, though provok'd, in open fields advance;
But close within their lines attend their chance:
Unwilling, yet they keep the strict command;
And sourly wait in arms the hostile band.
The fiery Turnus flew before the rest,
A pye-ball'd steed of Thracian strain he press'd;
His helm of massy gold; and crimson was his crest.
With twenty horse to second his designs,
An unexpected foe, he fac'd the lines.

"Is there," he said, "in arms who bravely dare

His leader's honour, and his danger, share?"
Then, spurring on, his brandish'd dart he threw,
In sign of war; applauding shouts ensue.
Amaz'd to find a dastard race that run
Behind the rampires, and the battle shun,
He rides around the camp, with rolling eyes,
And stops at every post; and every passage tries.
So roams the nightly wolf about the fold,
Wet with descending showers, and stiff with cold;
He howls for hunger, and he grins for pain;
His gnashing teeth are exercis'd in vain:
And, impotent of anger, finds no way
In his distended paws to grasp the prey.
The mothers listen; but the bleating lambs
Securely swig the dug beneath the dams:
Thus ranges eager Turnus o'er the plain,
Sharp with desire, and furious with disdain:
Surveys each passage with a piercing sight,
To force his foes in equal field to fight.
Thus, while he gazes round, at length he spies
Where, fenc'd with strong redoubts, their navy lies;

Close underneath the walls; the washing tide
Secures from all approach this weaker side.
He takes the wish'd occasion; fills his hand
With ready fires, and shakes a flaming brand:
Urg'd by his presence, every soul is warm'd,
And every hand with kindled fire is arm'd.
From the fir'd pines the scattering sparkles fly;
Fat vapours mix'd with flames involve the sky.
What power, O Muses, could avert the flame
Which threaten'd, in the fleet, the Trojan name!
Tell: for the fact, through length of time obscure,
Is hard to faith; yet shall the fame endure.

'Tis said that, when the chief prepar'd his flight,
And fell'd his timber from Mount Ida's height,
The grandam goddess then approach'd her son,
And with a mother's majesty begun:
"Grant me," she said, "the sole request I bring,
Since conquer'd Heaven has own'd you for its king:
On Ida's brows, for ages past, there stood,
With firs and maples fill'd, a shady wood;
And on the summit rose a sacred grove,
Where I was worship'd with religious love;
These woods, that holy grove, my long delight,
I gave the Trojan prince to speed his flight.
Now fill'd with fear, on their behalf I come;
Let neither winds o'erset, nor waves entomb,
The floating forests of the sacred pine;
But let it be their safety to be mine."
Then thus reply'd her awful son; who rolls
The radiant stars, and Heaven and Earth controls:
"How dare you, mother, endless date demand,
For vessels moulded by a mortal hand?
What then is fate? Shall bold Æneas ride,
Of safety certain, on th' uncertain tide?

Yet what I can, I grant: when, wafted o'er,
The chief is landed on the Latian shore,
Whatever ships escape the raging storms,
At my command shall change their fading forms
To nymphs divine; and plough the watery way,
Like Doris and the daughters of the sea."
To seal his sacred vow, by Styx he swore,
The lake with liquid pitch, the dreary shore;
And Phlegethon's innavigable flood,
And the black regions of his brother god:"
He said; and shook the skies with his imperial nod.

And now, at length, the number'd hours were
Prefix'd by fate's irrevocable doom, [come,
When the great mother of the gods was free
To save her ships, and finish Jove's decree.
First, from the quarter of the morn, there sprung,
A light that sing'd the Heavens, and shot along;
Then from a cloud, fring'd round with golden fires,
Were timbrels heard, and Bercynthian choirs:
And last a voice, with more than mortal sounds,
Both hosts, in arms oppos'd, with equal horour wounds.

"O Trojan race, your needless aid forbear;
And know, my ships are my peculiar care.
With greater ease the bold Rutulian may,
With hissing brands, attempt to burn the sea,
Than singe my sacred pines. But you, my charge, Loos'd from your crooked anchors, launch at large,

Exalted each a nymph: forsake the sand,
And swim the seas, at Cybele's command."
No sooner had the goddess ceas'd to speak,
When lo, th' obedient ships their hausers break;
And, strange to tell, like dolphins in the main,
They plunge their prows, and dive, and spring
again:

As many beauteous maids the billows sweep,
As rode before tall vessels on the deep.
The foes, surpris'd with wonder, stood aghast,
Messapus curb'd his fiery courser's haste;
Old Tiber roar'd, and, raising up his head,
Call'd back his waters to their oozy bed.
Turnus alone, undaunted, bore the shock;
And with these words his trembling troops bespoke:

"These monsters for the Trojan's fate are meant,
And are by Jove for black presages sent.
He takes the cowards' last relief away:
For fly they cannot; and constrain'd to stay,
Must, yield, unfought, a base inglorious prey.
The liquid half of all the globe is lost;
Heaven shuts the seas, and we secure the coast.
Theirs is no more than that small spot of ground,
Which myriads of our martial men surround.
Their fates I fear not; or vain oracles;
'Tis given to Venus, they should cross the seas;
And land secure upon the Latian plains:
Their promis'd hour is pass'd, and mine remains.
'Tis in the fate of Turnus to destroy,
With sword and fire, the faithless race of Troy.
Shall such affronts as these alone inflame
The Grecian brothers, and the Grecian name?
My cause and theirs is one; a fatal strife,
And final ruin, for a ravish'd wife.
Was't not enough, that, punish'd for the crime,
They fell; but will they fall a second time?
One would have thought they paid enough before,
To curse the costly sex; and durst offend no more.
Can they secretly trust their feeble wall,
A slight partition, a thin interval,

Between their fate and them; when Troy, though built

By hands divine, yet perish'd by their guilt?
Lend me, for once, my friends, your valiant hands,
To force from out their lines these dastard bands.
Less than a thousand ships will end this war;
Nor Vulcan needs his fated arms prepare.
Let all the Tuscans all th' Arcadians join,
Nor these, nor those, shall frustrate my design.
Let them not fear the treasons of the night;
The robb'd palladium, the pretended flight:
Our onset shall be made in open light.
No wooden engine shall their town betray,
Fires they shall have around, but fires by day.
No Grecian babes before their camp appear,
Whom Hector's arms detain'd to the tenth tardy year.

Now, since the Sun is rolling to the west,
Give me the silent night to needful rest:
Refresh your bodies, and your arms prepare:
The morn shall end the small remains of war."

The post of honour to Messapus falls,
To keep the nightly guard; to watch the walls;
To pitch the fires at distances around,
And close the Trojans in their scanty ground.
Twice seven Rutulian captains ready stand:
And twice seven hundred horse their chiefs command:

All clad in shining arms the works invest;
Each with a radiant helm, and waving crest.
Stretch'd at their length, they press the grassy ground;

They laugh, they sing, the jolly bowls go round:
With lights and cheerful fires renew the day;
And pass the wakeful night in feasts and play.

The Trojans, from above, their foes beheld;
And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd:
Seiz'd with affright, their gates they first explore

Join works to works with bridges; tower to tower:
Thus all things needful for defence abound;
Mnestheus and brave Sercathus walk the round:
Commission'd by their absent prince to share
The common danger, and divide the care,
The soldiers draw their lots; and, as they fall,
By turns relieve each other on the wall.

Nigh where the foes their utmost guards advance
To watch the gate, was warlike Nisus' chance.
His father Hyrticus of noble blood;
His mother was a huntress of the wood;
And sent him to the wars; well could he bear
His lance in fight, and dart the flying spear:
But, better skill'd unerring shafts to send,
Beside him stood Euryalus his friend.
Euryalus, than whom the Trojan host
No fairer face, or sweeter air could boast.
Scarce had the down to shade his cheeks begun;
One was their care, and their delight was one.
One common hazard in the war they shar'd;
And now were both, by choice, upon the guard.

Then Nisus, thus: "Or do the gods inspire
This warmth, or make we gods of our desire?
A generous ardour boils within my breast,
Eager of action, enemy to rest;
This urges me to fight, and fires my mind,
To leave a memorable name behind.
Thou seest the foe secure, how faintly shine
Their scatter'd fires! the most in sleep supine
Along the ground, an easy conquest lie;
The wakeful few the flaming flaggon ply:

All hush around. Now hear what I resolve;
A thought unripe, and scarcely yet resolve.
Our absent prince both camp and council mourn;
By message both would hasten his return:
If they confer what I demand on thee
(For fame is recompense enough for me),
Methinks beneath yon hill, I have espied
A way that safely will my passage guide."
Euryalus stood listening while he spoke;
With love of praise, and noble envy struck;
Then to his ardent friend expos'd his mind:
"All this alone, and leaving me behind,
Am I unworthy, Nisus, to be join'd?
Think'st thou I can my share of glory yield,
Or send thee unassisted to the field?
Not so my father taught my childhood arms;
Born in a siege, and bred among alarms;
Nor is my youth unworthy of my friend,
Nor of the heaven-born hero I attend.
The thing call'd life, with ease I can disclaim;
And think it over-sold to purchase fame."

Then Nisus, thus: "Alas! thy tender years
Would minister new matter to my fears:
So may the gods, who view this friendly strife,
Restore me to thy lov'd embrace with life,
Condemn'd to pay my vows (as sure I trust)
This thy request is cruel and unjust.
But if some chance, as many chances are,
And doubtful hazards in the deeds of war;
If one should reach my head, there let it fall,
And spare thy life; I would not perish all.
Thy bloomy youth deserves a longer date;
Live thou to mourn thy love's unhappy fate;
To bear my mangled body from the foe;
Or buy it back, and funeral rites bestow.
Or, if hard fortune shall those dues deny,
Thou canst at least an empty tomb supply.
O let me not the widow's tears renew;
Nor let a mother's curse my name pursue;
Thy pious parent, who, for love of thee,
Forsook the coasts of friendly Sicily,
Her age committing to the seas and wind,
When every weary matron stay'd behind."
To this Euryalus: "You plead in vain,
And but protract the cause you cannot gain:
No more delays, but haste. "With that he wak'd
The nodding watch; each to his office takes.
The guard reliev'd, the generous couple went
To find the council at the royal tent.
All creatures else forgot their daily care;
And sleep, the common gift of nature, share;
Except the Trojan peers, who wakeful sat
In nightly council for th' endanger'd state.
They vote a message to their absent chief;
Show their distress, and beg a swift relief.
Amid the camp a silent seat they chose,
Remote their clamour, and secure from foes,
On their left arms their ample shields they bear,
Their right reclin'd upon the bending spear.
Now Nisus and his friend approach the guard,
And beg admission, eager to be heard,
Th' affair important, not to be deferr'd.
Ascanius bids them be conducted in;
Ordering the more experienc'd to begin.
Then Nisus thus: "Ye fathers, lend your ears,
Nor judge our bold attempt beyond our years.
The foe, securely drench'd in sleep and wine,
Neglect their watch; the fires but thinly shine;
And where the smoke in cloudy vapours lies,
Covering the plain, and curling to the skies,

Betwixt two paths, which at the gate divide,
 Close by the sea, a passage we have spy'd,
 Which will our way to great Æneas guide.
 Expect each hour to see him safe again,
 Loaded with spoils of foes in battle slain.
 Snatch we the lucky minute while we may :
 Nor can we be mistaken in the way ;
 For, hunting in the vales, we both have seen
 The rising turrets, and the stream between :
 And know the winding course, with every ford."
 He ceas'd : and old Ælethes took the word.
 " Our country gods, in whom our trust we place,
 Will yet from ruin save the Trojan race :
 While we behold such dauntless worth appear
 In dawning youth, and souls so void of fear.
 Then into tears of joy the father broke ;
 Each in his longing arms by turns he took :
 Pant'd, and paus'd ; and thus again he spoke :
 " Ye brave young men, what equal gifts can we,
 In recompense of such desert, decree ?
 The greatest, sure and best, you can receive,
 The gods, and your own conscious worth, will give.
 The rest our grateful general will bestow ;
 And young Ascanius till his manhood owe."
 " And I, whose welfare in my father lies," Ascanius adds, " by the great deities,
 By my dear country, by my household gods,
 By hoary Vesta's rites, and dark abodes,
 Adjure you both (on you my fortune stands,
 That and my faith I plight into your hands :)
 Make me but happy in his safe return,
 Whose wonted presence I can only mourn,
 Your common gift shall two large goblets be,
 Of silver, wrought with curious imagery ;
 And high embost, which, when old Priam reign'd,
 My conquering sire at sack'd Arisba gain'd.
 And more, two tripods cast in antique mould,
 With two great talents of the finest gold :
 Beside a costly bowl, engrav'd with art,
 Which Dido gave when first she gave her heart.
 But if in conquer'd Italy we reign,
 When spoils by lot the victor shall obtain,
 Thou saw'st the courser by proud Turnus press'd,
 That, Nisus, and his arms, and nodding crest,
 And shield, from chance exempt, shall be thy share ; [and fair,
 Twelve labouring slaves, twelve handmaids young and clad in rich attire, and train'd with care.
 And last, a Latian field with fruitful plains,
 And a large portion of the king's domains.
 But thou, whose years are more to mine ally'd,
 No fate my vow'd affection shall divide
 From thee, heroic youth ; be wholly mine :
 Take full possession ; all my soul is thine.
 One faith, one fame, one fate, shall both attend ;
 My life's companion, and my bosom friend ;
 My peace shall be committed to thy care,
 And to thy conduct my concerns in war."
 Then thus the young Euryalus reply'd :
 " Whatever fortune, good or bad, betide,
 The same shall be my age, as now my youth ;
 No time shall find me wanting to my trust."
 " This only from your goodness let me gain
 (And this ungranted, all rewards are vain :)
 Of Priam's royal race my mother came,
 And sure the best that ever bore the name :
 Whom neither Troy, nor Sicily, could hold
 From me departing, but, o'er serpent and old,
 My fate she follow'd ; ignorant of this,
 Whatever danger, neither parting kiss,

Nor pious blessing taken, her I leave ;
 And, in this only act of all my life, deceive.
 By this right hand, and consc'ous night, I swear,
 My soul so sad a farewell could not bear.
 Be you her comfort ; fill my vacant place,
 (Permit me to presume so great a grace)
 Support her age, forsaken and distress'd ;
 That hope alone will fortify my breast
 Against the worst of fortunes, and of fear."
 He said : the mov'd assistants melt in tears.
 Then thus Ascanius (wonder-struck to see That image of his filial piety) :
 " So great beginnings, in so green an age,
 Exact the faith, which I again engage.
 Thy mother all the dues shall justly claim
 Creusa had ; and only want the name.
 Whate'er event thy bold attempt shall have,
 'Tis merit to have borne a son so brave.
 Now by my head, a sacred oath, I swear,
 (My father us'd it) what returning here,
 Crown'd with success, I for myself prepare,
 That, if thou fail, shall thy lov'd mother share."
 He said ; and, weeping while he spoke the word,
 From his broad belt he drew a shining sword,
 Magnificent with gold. Lycaon made,
 And in an ivory scabbard sheath'd the blade :
 This was his gift : great Minceus gave his friend
 A lion's hide, his body to defend :
 And good Ælethes furnish'd him beside,
 With his own trusty helm, of temper try'd.
 Thus arm'd they went. The noble Trojans wait
 Their issuing forth, and follow to the gate.
 With prayers and vows, above the rest appears
 Ascanius, manly far beyond his years.
 And messages committed to their care,
 Which all in winds were lost, and fitting air. [way
 The trenches first they pass'd ; then took their
 Where their proud foes in pitch'd pavilions lay ;
 To many fatal, ere themselves were slain : [plain,
 They found the careless host dispers'd upon the
 Who, gorg'd, and drunk with wine, supinely snore :
 Unharness'd chariots stand along the shore :
 Amidst the wheels and reins, the goblet by,
 A medley of debauch and war they lie.
 Observing Nisus show'd his friend the sight ;
 " Behold a conquest gain'd without a fight !
 Occasion offers, and I stand prepar'd :
 There lies our way ; be thou upon the guard,
 And look around, while I securely go,
 And hew a passage through the sleeping foe."
 Softly he spoke ; then, striding, took his way,
 With his drawn sword, where haughty Rhamnes
 His head rais'd high, on tapestry beneath, [lay :
 And heading from his breast, he drew his breath :
 A king and prophet by king Turnus lov'd ;
 But fate by prescience cannot be remov'd ;
 Him, and his sleeping slaves, he slew. Then spies
 Where Rhemus, with his rich retinue, lies :
 His armour-bearer first, and next he kills
 His charioteer, entrench'd betwixt the wheels,
 And his lov'd horses : last invades their lord ;
 Full on his neck he drives the fatal sword :
 The gasping head flies off ; a purple flood
 Flows from the trunk, that welters in the blood :
 Which, by the spurming heels, dispers'd around,
 The bed besprinkles, and bedews the ground.
 Lamus the bold, and Lamyus the strong,
 He slew ; and then Serranus, fair and young,
 From dice and wine the youth retir'd to rest,
 And puff'd the fummy god from out his breast ;

Ev'n then he dreamt of drink and lucky play;
More lucky had it lasted till the day.

The famish'd lion thus, with hunger bold,
O'erleaps the fences of the nightly fold,
And tears the peaceful flocks; with silent awe
Trembling they lie, and pant beneath his paw.

Nor with less rage Furyalus employs
The wrathful sword, or fewer foes destroys:
But on th' ignoble crowd his fury flew:
He Fadius, Hebesus, and Rhetus slew.
Oppress'd with heavy sleep the former fall,
But Rhetus, wakeful, and observing all,
Behind a spacious jar he slink'd for fear:
The fatal iron found, and reach'd him there.
For, as he rose, it pierc'd his naked side,
And, reeking, thence return'd in crimson dy'd.
The wound pours out a stream of wine and blood:
The purple soul comes floating in the flood.

Now where Messapus quarter'd they arrive;
The fires were fainting there, and just alive.
The warrior-horses tied in order fed;
Nisus observ'd the discipline, and said:
"Our eager thirst of blood may both betray;
And see the scatter'd streaks of dawning day,
Foe to nocturnal thefts: no more, my friend,
Here let our glutted execution end:
A lane through slaughter'd bodies we have made:"
The bold Furyalus, though loth, obey'd.
Of arms, and arras, and of plate, they find
A precious load; but these they leave behind.
Yet, fond of gaudy spoils, the boy would stay
To make the rich caparison his prey,
Which on the steed of conquer'd Rhamnes lay.
Nor did his eyes less longingly behold
The girdle belt, with nails of burnish'd gold.
This present Cedicus the rich bestow'd
On Remulus, when friendship first they vow'd:
And absent, join'd in hospitable ties;
He dying, to his heir bequeath'd the prize:
Till by the conquering Ardean troops oppress'd,
He fell; and they the glorious gift possess'd.
These glittering spoils (now made the victor's gain)
He to his body suits; but suits in vain.
Messapus' helm he finds among the rest,
And laces on, and wears the waving crest.
Proud of their conquest, prouder of their prey,
They leave the camp, and take the ready way.
But far they had not pass'd, before they spy'd
Three hundred horse, with Volscens for their guide.
The queen a legion to king Turnus sent,
But the swift horse the slower foot prevent:
And now, advancing, sought the leader's tent.
They saw the pair; for, thro' the doubtful shade,
His shining helm Euryalus full reflection play'd.
On which the Moon with bright reflection play'd.
"Tis not for nought," cry'd Volscens, from the crowd,

"These men go there;" then rais'd his voice aloud:
"Stand, stand! why thus in arms, and whither bent?"

From whence, to whom, and on what errand sent?
Silent they scud away, and haste their flight
To neighbouring woods, and trust themselves to
The speedy horse all passages belay, [night.
And spur their smoking steeds to cross their way,
And watch each entrance of the winding wood;
Black was the forest, thick with beech it stood;
Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn,
Few paths of human feet or tracks of beasts were worn.

The darkness of the shades, his heavy prey,
And fear, misled the younger from his way.
But Nisus hit the turns with happier haste,
And, thoughtless of his friend, the forest pass'd:
And Alban plains, from Alba's name so call'd,
Where king Latinus then his oxen stall'd.
Till, turning at the length, he stood his ground,
And mis'd his friend, and cast his eyes around:
"Ah, wretch!" he cry'd, "where have I left behind

Th' unhappy youth? where shall I hope to find?
Or what way take!" Again he ventures back:
And treads the mazes of his former track.
He winds the wood, and listening hears the noise
Of trampling coursers, and the rider's voice.
The sound approach'd, and suddenly he view'd
The foes enclosing, and his friend pursu'd:
Forelay'd and taken, while he strove, in vain,
The shelter of the friendly shades to gain.
What should he next attempt? What arms employ?
What fruitless force to free the captive boy!
Or desperate should he rush, and lose his life,
With odds oppress, in such unequal strife?
Resolv'd at length, his pointed spear he took;
And, casting on the Moon a mournful look,
"Guardian of groves, and goddess of the night,
Fair queen," he said, "direct my dart aright:
If e'er my pious father, for my sake,
Did grateful offerings on thy altars make;
Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
And hung the holy roofs with savage spoils,
Give me to scatter these." Then from his ear
He pois'd, and aim'd, and lanch'd the trembling spear.

The deadly weapon, hissing from the grove,
Impetuous on the back of Sulmo drove;
Pierc'd his thin armour, drank his vital blood,
And in his body left the broken wood.
He staggers round; his eye-balls roll in death,
And with short sobs he gasps away his breath.
All stand amaz'd; a second javelin flies
With equal strength, and quivers through the skies:
This through thy temples, Tagus, forc'd the way,
And in the brain-pan warmly buried lay.
Fierce Volscens foams with rage, and gazing round,
Descry'd not him who gave the fatal wound:
Nor knew to fix revenge: "But thou," he cries,
"Shalt pay for both!" and at the prisoner flies:
With his drawn sword. Then, struck with deep despair,

That cruel sight the lover could not bear:
But from his covert rush'd in open view,
And sent his voice before him as he flew:
"Me, me," he cry'd, "turn all your swords alone
On me! the fact confess, the fault my own.
He neither could, nor durst, the guiltless youth;
Ye Moon and Stars, bear witness to the truth!
His only crime (if friendship can offend)
Is too much love to his unhappy friend."
Too late he speaks; the sword, which fury guides,
Driven with full force had pierc'd his tender sides.
Down fell the beauteous youth; the yawning wound

Gush'd out a purple stream, and stain'd the ground.
His snowy neck reclines upon his breast,
Like a fair flower by the keen share oppress'd:
Like a white poppy sinking on the plain,
Whose heavy head is overcharg'd with rain.
Despair, and rage, and vengeance justly vow'd,
Drove Nisus headlong on the hostile crowd:

Volscens he seeks : on him alone he bends ;
 Borne back, and bor'd, by his surrounding friends,
 Onward he press'd, and kept him still in sight ;
 Then whirl'd aloft his sword with all his might :
 Th' unerring steel descended while he spoke,
 Pierc'd his wide mouth, and through his weazen
 broke :

Dying he flew ; and, staggering on the plain,
 With swimming eyes he sought his lover slain :
 Then quiet on his bleeding bosom fell ;
 Content in death to be reveng'd so well.

O happy friends ! for, if my verse can give Immortal life, your fame shall ever live :
 Fixt as the capitol's foundation lies ;
 And spread where'er the Roman eagle flies !

The conquering party first divide the prey,
 Then their slain leader to the camp convey.
 With wonder, as they went, the troops were fill'd,
 To see such numbers whom so few had kill'd.
 Serranus, Rhamnes, and the rest, they found :
 Vast crowds the dying and the dead surround ;
 And the yet reeking blood o'erflows the ground.
 All knew the helmet which Messapus lost ;
 But mourn'd a purchase that so dear had cost.
 Now rose the ruddy Morn from Tithon's bed ;
 And, with the dawn of day, the skies o'erspread.
 Nor long the Sun his daily course withheld,
 But added colours to the world reveal'd.

When early Turnus, wakening with the light,
 All clad in armour, calls his troops to fight.
 His martial men with fierce harangues he fir'd ;
 And his own ardour in their souls inspir'd.
 This done, to give new terrour to his foes,
 The heads of Nisus and his friend he shows,
 Rais'd high on pointed spears : a ghastly sight ;
 Loud peals of shouts ensue, and barbarous delight.

Meantime the Trojans run, where danger calls :
 They line their trenches, and they man their walls :
 In front extended to the left they stood :
 Safe was the right, surrounded by the flood.
 But casting from their towers a frightful view,
 They saw the faces which too well they knew ;
 Tho' then disguis'd in death, and smear'd all o'er
 With filth obscene, and dropping putrid gore.
 Soon hasty fame through the sad city bears
 The mournful message to the mother's ears :
 An icy cold benumbs her limbs : she shakes :
 Her cheeks the blood, her hand the web forsakes.
 She runs the rampires round amidst the war,
 Nor fears the flying darts : she rends her hair,
 And fills with loud laments the liquid air.

" Thus, then, my lov'd Euryalus appears !
 Thus looks the prop of my declining years !
 Was't on this face my famish'd eyes I fed !
 Ah, how unlike the living is the dead !
 And could'st thou leave me, cruel, thus alone,
 Not one kind kiss from a departing son !
 No look, no last adieu, before he went,
 In an ill-boding hour to slaughter sent !
 Cold on the ground, and pressing foreign clay,
 To Latian dogs and fowls he lies a prey !
 Nor was I near to close his dying eyes,
 To wash his wounds, to weep his obsequies :
 To call about his corpse his crying friends,
 Or spread the mantle (made for other ends)
 On his dear body, which I wove with care,
 Nor did my daily pains, or nightly labour, spare.
 Where shall I find his corpse ? What earth sustains

His trunk dismember'd, and his cold remains ?

For this, alas ! I left my needful ease,
 Expos'd my life to winds, and winter seas !
 If any pity touch Rutulian hearts,
 Here empty all your quivers, all your darts :
 Or if they fail, thou, Jove, conclude my woe,
 And send me thunder-struck to shades below !"

Her shrieks and clamours pierce the Trojans' ears,
 Unman their courage, and augment their fears :
 Nor young Ascanius could the sight sustain,
 Nor old Ilioneus his tears restrain :
 But Actor and Idæus, jointly sent,
 To bear the madding mother to her tent.
 And now the trumpets, terribly from far,
 With rattling clangour, rouse the sleepy war.
 The soldiers' shouts succeed the brazen sounds,
 And Heaven, from pole to pole, their noise rebounds.

The Volscians bear their shields upon their head,
 And, rushing forward, form a moving shed ;
 These fill the ditch ; those pull the bulwarks
 down :

Some raise the ladders ; others scale the town.
 But where void spaces on the walls appear,
 Or thin defence, they pour their forces there.
 With poles and missive weapons, from afar,
 The Trojans keep aloof the rising war.
 Taught by their ten years' siege defensive fight,
 They roll down ribs of rocks, and unresisted weight :
 To break the penthouse with the ponderous blow ;
 Which yet the patient Volscians undergo.
 But could not bear th' unequal combat long ;
 For where the Trojans find the thickest throng,
 The ruin falls : their shatter'd shields give way,
 And their crush'd heads became an easy prey.
 They shrink for fear, abated of their rage,
 Nor longer dare in a blind fight engage ;
 Contented now to gall them from below
 With darts and slings, and with the distant bow.

Elsewhere Mezentius, terrible to view,
 A blazing pine within the trenches threw.
 But brave Messapus, Neptune's warlike son,
 Broke down the palisades, the trenches won,
 And loud for ladders calls to scale the town.

Calliope begin : ye sacred Nines,
 Inspire your poet in his high design ;
 To sing what slaughter manly Turnus made :
 What souls he sent below the Stygian shade :
 What fame the soldiers with their captain share,
 And the vast circuit of the fatal war.
 For you in singing martial facts excel ;
 You best remember ; and alone can tell.

There stood a tower, amazing to the sight,
 Built up of beams, and of stupendous height ;
 Art, and the nature of the place, conspir'd
 To furnish all the strength that war requir'd.
 To level this, the bold Italians join !
 The wary Trojans obviate their design :
 With weighty stones o'erwhelm'd their troops below,
 Shoot thro' the loop-holes, and sharp javelins throw.
 Turnus, the chief, toss'd from his thundering hand,
 Against the wooden walls, a flaming brand :
 It stuck, the fiery plague : the winds were high ;
 The planks were season'd, and the timber dry.
 Contagion caught the posts : it spread along,
 Scorcb'd, and to distance drove the scatter'd throng.

The Trojans fled ; the fire pursu'd amain,
 Still gathering fast upon the trembling train ;
 Till, crowding to the corners of the wall,
 Down the defence, and the defenders, fall.

The mighty law makes Heaven itself resound,
The dead and dying Trojans strew the ground.
The tower that follow'd on the fallen crew,
Whelm'd o'er their heads, and bury'd whom it slew:
Some stuck upon the darts themselves had sent;
All the same equal ruin underwent.

Young Lycus and Helenor only 'scape;
Eav'd, how they know not, from the steepy leap.
Helenor, elder of the two; by birth,
On one side royal, one a son of earth,
Whom, to the Lydian king, Lycimnia bare,
And sent her boasted bastard to the war
(A privilege which none but freeman share).
Slight were his arms, a sword and silver shield,
No marks of honour charg'd its empty field.
Light as he fell, so light the youth arose,
And, rising, found himself amidst his foes.
Nor fight was left, nor hopes to force his way;
Embolden'd by despair, he stood at bay:
And like a stag, whom all the troop surrounds
Of eager huntsmen, and invading hounds,
Resolv'd on death, he dissipates his fears,
And hounds aloft against the pointed spears:
So dares the youth, secure of death, and throws
His dying body on his thickest foes.

But Lycus, swifter of his feet by far,
Runs, doubles, winds, and turns, amidst the war:
Spring to the walls, and leaves his foes behind,
And snatches at the beam he first can find.
Looks up, and leaps aloft at all the stretch,
In hopes the helping hand of some kind friend to reach.

But Turnus follow'd hard his hunted prey,
(His spear had almost reach'd him in the way,
Short of his reins, and scarce a span behind):
"Fool," said the chief, "tho' fleetest than the wind, Could'st thou presume to 'scape when I pursue?"
He said, and downward by the feet he drew
The trembling dastard: at the tug he falls,
Vast ruins come along, rent from the smoking walls.
Thus on some silver swan, or timorous hare,
Jove's bird comes sousing down from upper air;
Her crooked talons truss the fearful fray:
Then out of sight she soars, and wings her way.
So seizes the grim wolf the tender lamb,
In vain lamented by the bleating dam.

Then rushing onward, with a barbarous cry,
The troops of Turnus to the combat fly.
The ditch with faggots fill'd, the daring foe
Tost firebrands to the steepy turrets throw.

Hilioneus, as bold Luceius came
To force the gate, and feed the kindling flame,
Roll'd down the fragment of a rock so right,
It crush'd him double underneath the weight.
Two more young Liger and Asylas slew;
To bend the bow young Liger better knew:
Asylas best the pointed javelin threw.
Brave Cæneas laid Ortygius on the plain;
The victor Cæneas was by Turnus slain.
By the same hand, Clonius and Itys fall,
Sagar and Ida, standing on the wall.
From Cypys' arms his fate Privernus found;
Hurt by Themilla first, but slight the wound;
His shield thrown by, to mitigate the smart,
He clapp'd his hand upon the wounded part:
The second shaft came swift and unespy'd,
And pierc'd his hand, and nail'd it to his side:
Transfix'd his breathing lungs, and beating heart;
The soul came issuing out, and hiss'd against the dart.

The son of Arcens shone amid the rest,
In glittering armour and a purple vest.
Fair was his face, his eyes inspiring love,
Bred by his father in the Martian grove:
Where the fat altars of Palicus flame,
And sent in arms to purchase early fame.
Him when he spy'd from far, the Tuscan king
Laid by the lance, and took him to the sling:
Thrice whirl'd the thong around his head, and
The heated lead, half melted as it flew: [threw
It pierc'd his hollow temples and his brain;
The youth came tumbling down, and spur'd the plain.

Then young Ascanius, who before this day
Was wont in woods to shoot the savage prey,
First bent in martial strife the twanging bow;
And exercis'd against a human foe.
With this bereft Numanus of his life,
Who Turnus' younger sister took to wife.
Proud of his realm, and of his royal bride, [stride,
Vaunting before his troops, and lengthen'd with a
In these insulting terms the Trojans he defy'd:
"Twice conquer'd cowards, now your shame is shown,

Coop'd up a second time within your town!
Who dare not issue forth in open field,
But hold your walls before you for a shield.
Thus threaten you war, thus our alliance force!
What gods, what madness hither steer'd your
You shall not find the sons of Atreus here, [course!
Nor need the frauds of sly Ulyses fear.
Strong from the cradle, of a sturdy brood,
We bear our new-born infants to the flood;
There, bath'd amid the stream, our boys we hold,
With winter harden'd, and inur'd to cold.
They wake before the day to range the wood,
Kill ere they eat, nor taste unconquer'd food.
No sports but what belong to war they know,
To break the stubborn colt, to bend the bow.
Our youth, of labour patient, earn their bread;
Hardly they work, with frugal diet fed.
From ploughs and barrows sent to seek renown,
They fight in fields, and storm the shaken town.
No part of life from toils of war is free;
No change in age, or difference in degree.
We plough, and till in arms; our oxen feel,
Instead of goads, the spur, and pointed steel:
Th' inverted lance makes furrows in the plain;
Ev'n time, that changes all, yet changes us in vain:
The body, not the mind: nor can control
Th' immortal vigour, or abate the soul.
Our helms defend the young, disguise the grey:
We live by plunder, and delight in prey.
Your vests embroider'd with rich purple shine;
In sloth you glory, and in dances join. [pride
Your vests have sweeping sleeves: with female
Your turbans underneath your chains are ty'd.
Go, Phrygians, to your Dindymus agen;
Go, less than women, in the shapes of men;
Go, mixt with eunuchs, in the mother's rites,
Where with unequal sound the flute invites.
Sing, dance, and howl, by turns, in Ida's shade;
Resign the war to men, who know the martial trade."

This foul reproach Ascanius could not bear
With patience, or a vow'd revenge forbear.
At the full stretch of both his hands, he drew,
And almost join'd the horns of the tough yew,
But first, before the throne of Jove he stood;
And thus with lifted hands invoc'd the god:

" My first attempt, great Jupiter, succeed;
 An annual offering in thy grove shall bleed:
 A snow-white steer before thy altar led,
 Who, like his mother, bears aloft his head,
 But with his threatening brows, and bellowing
 stands,
 And dares the fight, and spurns the yellow sands."
 Jove bow'd the Heavens, and lent a gracious ear,
 And thunder'd on the left, amidst the clear.
 Sounded at once the bow: and swiftly flies
 The feather'd death, and hisses through the skies.
 The steel through both his temples forc'd the way:
 Extended on the ground Numanus lay.
 " Go now, vain boaster, and true valour scorn;
 The Phrygians, twice subdued, yet make this third
 Ascanius said no more: the Trojans shake [return."
 The Heavens with shouting, and new vigour take.
 Apollo then bestrode a golden cloud,
 To view the feats of arms, and fighting crowd;
 And thus the beardless victor, he bespoke aloud:
 " Advance, illustrious youth: increase in fame,
 And wide from east to west extend thy name.
 Offspring of gods thyself; and Rome shall owe
 To thee, a race of demigods below.
 This is the way to Heaven: the powers divine,
 From this beginning date the Julian line.
 To thee, to them, and their victorious heirs,
 The conquer'd war is due: and the vast world is theirs.
 Troy is too narrow for thy name." He said,
 And, plunging downward, shot his radiant head;
 Disspell'd the breathing air that broke his sight,
 Shorn of his beams, a man to mortal sight.
 Old Butes' form he took, Anchises' squire,
 Now left to rule Ascanius, by his sire;
 His wrinkled visage, and his hoary hairs,
 His mien, his habit, and his arms he wears;
 And thus salutes the boy, too forward for his years:
 " Suffice it thee, thy father's worthy son,
 The warlike prize thou hast already won:
 The god of archers gives thy youth a part
 Of his own praise; nor envies equal art.
 Now tempt the war no more." He said, and flew Obscure in air, and vanish'd from their view.
 The Trojans, by his arms, their patron know;
 And hear the twanging of his heavenly bow.
 Then duteous force they use, and Phoebus' name,
 To keep from fight the youth too fond of fame.
 Undaunted they themselves no danger shun:
 From wall to wall the shouts and clamours run:
 They bend their bows; they whirl their slings
 around:
 Heaps of spent arrows fall, and strew the ground;
 And helms, and shields, and rattling arms resound.
 The combat thickens, like the storm that flies
 From westward, when the showery kids arise:
 Or pattering hail comes pouring on the main,
 When Jupiter descends in harden'd rain:
 Or bellowing clouds burst with a stormy sound,
 And with an armed winter strew the ground.
 Pandrus and Bitias, thunder-bolts of war,
 Whom Hiern to bold Alcanor bore
 On Ida's top, two youths of height and size,
 Like fir that on their mother-mountain rise;
 Presuming on their force, the gates unbar,
 And of their own accord invite the war.
 With fates averse, against their king's command,
 Arm'd on the right and on the left they stand,
 And flank the passage: shining steel they wear,
 And waving crests above their heads appear.

Thus two tall oaks, that Padus' banks adorn,
 Lift up to Heaven their leafy heads unshorn;
 And overpress'd with nature's heavy load,
 Dance to the whistling winds, and at each other
 In flows a tide of Latians, when they see. [nod.
 The gate set open, and the passage free.
 Bold Quercens, with rash Tmarus rushing on,
 Equicolas, who in bright armour shone,
 And Hæmon first; but soon repuls'd they fly,
 Or in the well-defended pass they die.
 These with success are fir'd, and those with rage;
 And each, on equal terms at length, engage.
 Drawn from their lines, and issuing on the plain,
 The Trojans hand to hand the fight maintain.
 Fierce Turnus in another quarter fought,
 When suddenly th' unhop'd-for news was brought;
 The foes had left the fastness of their place,
 Prevail'd in fight, and had his men in chase.
 He quits th' attack; and, to prevent their fate,
 Runs, where the giant brothers guard the gate.
 The first he met, Antiphates the brave,
 But base-begotten on a Thelan slave;
 Sarpedon's son he slew: the deadly dart [heart.
 Found passage through his breast, and pierc'd his Fix'd in the wound th' Italian cornel stood;
 Warm'd in his lungs, and in his vital blood.
 Aphidans next, and Erymanthus dies,
 And Mæropes, and the gigantic size
 Of Bitias, threatening with his ardent eyes.
 Not by the feeble dart he fell oppress,
 A dart were lost within that roomy breast,
 But from a knotted lance, large, heavy, strong;
 Which roar'd like thunder as it whirl'd along:
 Not two bull-hides th' impetuous force withhold;
 Nor coat of double mail, with scales of gold.
 Down sunk the monster-bulk, and press'd the ground: [sound.
 His arms and clattering shield on the vast body
 Not with less ruin, than the Bajan mole,
 (Rais'd on the seas the surges to control)
 At once comes tumbling down the rocky wall,
 Promote to the deep the stones disjointed fall
 Off the vast pile; the scatter'd ocean flies; [arise.
 Black sands, discolour'd froth, and mingled mud,
 The frighted billows roll, and seek the shores:
 Then trembles Prochyta, then Ischia roars:
 Typhæus thrown beneath, by Jove's command,
 Astonish'd at the flaw that shakes the land,
 Soon shifts his weary side, and, scarce awake,
 With wonder feels the weight press lighter on his back.
 The warrior-god the Latian troops inspir'd;
 New strung their sinews, and their courage fir'd,
 But chills the Trojan hearts with cold affright:
 Then black despair precipitates their fight.
 When Pandarus beheld his brother kill'd,
 The town with fear, and wild confusion fill'd.
 He turns the hinges of the heavy gate
 With both his hands; and adds his shoulders to the weight.
 Some happier friends within the walls enclos'd;
 The rest shut out, to certain death expos'd.
 Fool as he was, and frantic in his care,
 T' admit young Turnus, and include the war.
 He thrust amid the crowd, securely bold;
 Like a fierce tiger pent amid the fold.
 Too late his blazing backler they descry;
 And sparkling fires that shot from either eye:
 His mighty members, and his ample breast,
 His rattling armour, and his crimson crest.

Far from that hated face the Trojans fly;
 All but the fool who sought his destiny.
 Mad Pandarus steps forth, with vengeance vow'd
 For Bitias' death, and threatens thus aloud:
 "These are not Ardea's walls, nor this the town
 Amata proffers with Lavinia's crown:
 'Tis hostile earth you tread; of hope bereft,
 No means of safe return by flight are left."
 To whom, with count'nance calm, and soul sedate,
 Thus Turnus: "Then begin; and try thy fate:
 My message to the ghost of Priam bear,
 Tell him a new Achilles sent thee there."

A lance of tough ground-ash the Trojan threw,
 Rough in the rind, and knotted as it grew;
 With his full force he whirl'd it first around;
 But the soft yielding air receiv'd the wound:
 Imperial Juno turn'd the course before,
 And fix'd the wandering weapon in the door.

"But hope not thou," said Turnus, "when I strike,

To shun thy fate; our force is not alike:
 Nor thy steel temper'd by the Lemnian god;"
 Then, rising, on his utmost stretch he stood;
 And aim'd from high: the full descending blow
 Cleaves the broad front, and beardless cheeks, in two:

Down sinks the giant, with a thundering sound,
 His ponderous limbs oppress the trembling ground;
 Blood, brains, and foam, gush from the gaping
 wound.

Scalp, face, and shoulders, the keen steel divides;
 And the shar'd visage hangs on equal sides.
 The Trojans fly from their approaching fate:
 And had the victor then secur'd the gate,
 And to his troops without unclous'd the bars,
 One lucky day had ended all his wars.
 But boiling youth, and blind desire of blood,
 Push on his fury to pursue the crowd;
 Hamstring'd behind, unhappy Gyges dy'd;
 Then Phalaris is added to his side:
 The pointed javelins from the dead he drew,
 And their friends' arms against their fellows threw.
 Strong Halys stands in vain; weak Phlegys flies;
 Saturnia, still at hand, now force and fire supplies.
 Then Halius, Prytanis, Alcaender fall
 (Engag'd against the foes, who scal'd the wall):
 But whom they fear'd without, they found within:
 At last, though late, by Linceus he was seen:
 He calls new succours, and assaults the prince;
 But weak his force, and vain is their defence.
 Turn'd to the right, his sword the hero drew,
 And at one blow the bold aggressor slew.
 He joins the neck; and with a stroke so strong,
 The helm flies off; and bears the head along.
 Next him, the huntsman Amycus he kill'd,
 In darts envenom'd, and in poison skill'd.
 Then Clytius fell beneath his fatal spear,
 And Cretus, whom the Muses held so dear:
 He fought with courage, and he sung the fight:
 Arms were his business, verses his delight.

The Trojan chiefs behold, with rage and grief,
 Their slaughter'd friends, and hasten their relief.
 Bold Mnestheus rallies first the broken train,
 Whom brave Seresthus and his troop sustain.
 To save the living, and revenge the dead,
 Against one warrior's arm all Troy they led.

"O, void of sense and courage," Mnestheus cry'd,
 "Where can you hope your coward heads to hide?
 Ah, where beyond these rampires can you run!
 One man, and in your camp enclos'd, you shun!

Shall then a single sword such slaughter boast,
 And pass unpunish'd from a numerous host?
 Forsaking honour, and renouncing fame, [shame."
 Your gods, your country, and your king, you

This just reproach their virtue does excite,
 They stand, they join, they thicken to the fight.
 Now Turnus doubts, and yet disdains to yield;
 But with slow paces measures back the field;
 And inches to the walls, where Tiber's tide,
 Washing the camp, defends the weaker side.

The more he loses, they advance the more;
 And tread in every step he trod before: [might
 They shout, they bear him back, and whom by
 They cannot conquer, they oppress with weight.

As, compass'd with a wood of spears around,
 The lordly lion still maintains his ground;
 Grins horrible, retires, and turns again,
 Threats his distended paws, and shakes his mane;
 He loses while in vain he presses on,

Nor will his courage let him dare to run;
 So Turnus fares, and, unresolv'd of flight,
 Moves tardy back, and just recedes from fight.

Yet twice, enrag'd, the combat he renews,
 Twice breaks, and twice his broken foes pursues:
 But now they swarm; and, with fresh troops sup-
 come rolling on, and rush from every side. [ply'd,
 Nor Juno, who sustain'd his arms before,
 Dares with new strength suffice th' exhausted store.
 For Jove, with sour commands, sent Iris down,
 To force th' invader from th' affrighted town.

With labour spent, no longer can he wield
 The heavy falchion, or sustain the shield:
 O'erwhelm'd with darts, which from afar they fling,
 The weapons round his hollow temples ring:
 His golden helm gives way: with stony blows
 Batter'd, and flat, and beaten to his brows,
 His crest is rash'd away; his ample shield
 Is falsify'd, and round with javelins fill'd.

The foe now faint; the Trojans overwhelm:
 And Mneathus lays hard load upon his helm.
 Sick sweat succeeds, he drops at every pore,
 With driving dust his cheeks are pasted o'er.
 Shorter and shorter every gasp he takes,
 And vain efforts, and hurtless blows he makes.
 Arm'd as he was, at length, he leap'd from high;
 Plung'd in the flood, and made the waters fly.
 The yellow god the welcome burden bore,
 And wip'd the sweat, and wash'd away the gore:
 Then gently wafts him to the farther coast;
 And sends him safe to cheer his anxious host.

THE TENTH BOOK OF

THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

JUPITER, calling a council of the gods, forbids them to engage in either party. At Æneas's return, there is a bloody battle: Turnus killing Pallas; Æneas, Lausus, and Mezentius. Mezentius is described as an atheist; Lausus as a pious and virtuous youth: the different actions and death of these two are the subject of a noble episode.

THE gates of Heaven unfold; Jove summons all
 The gods to council in the common hall.

Sablimly seated, he surveys from far
The fields, the camp, the fortune of the war;
And all th' inferior world: from first to last
The sovereign senate in degrees are plac'd.

Then thus th' almighty sire began: "Ye gods,
Nades, or dedizena, of blest abodes;
From whence these murmurs, and this change of midd,

This backward fate from what was first design'd?
Why this protracted war? When my commands
Pronounc'd a peace, and gave the Latian lands.
What fear or hopes on either part divides
Our Heavens, and arms out powers on different sides?

A lawful time of war at length will come
(Nor need your haste anticipate the doom)
When Carthage shall contend the world with Rome:
Shall force the rigid rocks and Alpine chains;
And like a flood come pouring on the plains:
Then is your time for faction and debate,
For partial favour, and permitted hate.
Let now your immature dimension cease:
Sit quiet, and compose your souls to peace."

Thus Jupiter in few unfolds the charge:
But lovely Venus thus replies at large:
"O power immense, eternal energy!
(For to what else protection can we fly?)
Seest thou the proud Rutulians, how they dare
In fields, unpunish'd, and insult my care?
How lofty Turnus vaults amidst his train,
In shining arms triumphant on the plain?
Ev'n in their lines and trenches they contend;
And scarce their walls the Trojan troops defend:
The town is fill'd with slaughter, and o'erflows,
With a red deluge, their increasing moats.

Æneas, ignorant, and far from thence,
Has left a camp expos'd, without defence.
This endless outrage shall they still sustain?
Shall Troy renew'd be forc'd, and fired again?
A second siege my banish'd issue fears,
And a new Diomedes in arms appears:
One more audacious mortal will be found;
And I thy daughter wait another wound.
Yet if, with fates averse, without thy leave,
The Latian lands my progeny receive,
Bear they the pains of violated law,
And thy protection from their aid withdraw.

But if the gods their sure success foretel,
If those of Heaven consent with those of Hell,
To promise Italy; who dare debate
The power of Jove, or fix another fate?
What should I tell of tempests on the main,
Of Æolus usurping Neptune's reign?
Of Iris sent, with Bacchanalian heat,
T' inspire the matrons, and destroy the fleet.
Now Juno to the Stygian sky descends,
Solicits Hell for aid, and arms the fiends.

That new example wanted yet above:
An act that well became the wife of Jove.
Alecto, rais'd by her, with rage inflames
The peaceful bosoms of the Latian dames.
Imperial sway no more exalts my mind
(Such hopes I had indeed, while Heaven was kind);
Now let my happier foes possess my place,
Whom Jove prefers before the Trojan race;
And conquer they, whom you with conquest grace.
Since you can spare, from all your wide command,
No spot of earth, no hospitable land,
Which may my wandering fugitives receive
(Since haughty Juno will not give you leave);

Then, father, (if I still may use that name)
By ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the flame,
I beg you, let Ascanius, by my care,
Be freed from danger, and dismiss'd the war:
Inglorious let him live, without a crown;
The father may be cast on coasts unknown,
Struggling with fate; but let me save the son.
Mine is Cythera, mine the Cyprian towers;
In those recesses, and those sacred bowers,
Obscurely let him rest; his right resign
To promis'd empire, and his Julian line.
Then Carthage may th' Ausonian towns destroy,
Nor fear the race of a rejected boy.
What profits it my son, t' escape the fire,
Arm'd with his gods, and loaded with his sire;
To pass the perils of the seas and wind;
Evade the Greeks, and leave the war behind;
To reach th' Italian shores: if, after all,
Our second Pergamus is doom'd to fall?
Much better had he curb'd his high desires,
And hover'd o'er his ill-extinguish'd fires.

To Simois' banks the fugitives restore, [fore."
And give them back to war, and all the woes be-

Deep indignation swell'd Saturnia's heart:
"And must I own," she said, "my secret smart?
What with more decency were in silence kept,
And but for this unjust reproach had slept.
Did god, or man, your favourite son advise,
With war untop'd the Latians to surprise?
By fate you boast, and by the gods' decree,
He left his native land for Italy:

Confess the truth; by mad Cassandra, more
Than Heaven, inspir'd, he sought a foreign shore!
Did I persuade to trust his second Troy
To the raw conduct of a beardless boy?
With walls unfinished, which himself forsakes,
And through the waves a wandering voyage takes?
When have I urg'd him meanly to demand
The Tuscan aid, and arm a quiet land?
Did I or Iris give this mad advice?
Or made the fool himself the fatal choice?

You think it hard the Latians should destroy
With swords your Trojans, and with fires your Troy:
Hard and unjust indeed, for men to draw
Their native air, nor take a foreign law:

That Turnus is permitted still to live,
To whom his birth a god and goddess give:
But yet 'tis just and lawful for your line,
To drive their fields, and force with fraud to join.
Realms not your own, among your clans divide,
And from the bridegroom tear the promis'd bride:
Petition, while you public arms prepare;
Pretend a peace, and yet provoke a war.

'Twas given to you, your darling son to shroud,
To draw the dastard from the fighting crowd;
And for a man obtend an empty cloud.
From flaming fleets you turn'd the fiery way,
And chang'd the ships to daughters of the sea.
But 'tis my crime, the queen of Heaven offends,
If she presume to save her suffering friends.
Your son, not knowing what his fates decree,
You say is absent: absent let him be.

Yours is Cythera, yours the Cyprian towers,
The soft recesses, and the sacred bowers.
Why do you then these needless arms prepare,
And thus provoke a people prone to war?
Did I with fire the Trojan town deface,
Or hinder from return your exil'd race?
Was I the cause of mischief, or the man,
Whose lawless lust the fatal war began?

Think on whose faith th' adulterous youth rely'd :
 Who promis'd, who procur'd, the Spartan bride ?
 When all th' united states of Greece combin'd,
 To purge the world of the perfidious kind ;
 Then was your time to fear the Trojan fate :
 Your quarrels and complaints are now too late."

Thus Juno. Murmurs rise, with mixt applause ;

Just as they favour, or dislike the cause :
 So winds, when yet unshedg'd in woods they lie,
 In whispers first their tender voices try :
 Then issue on the main with hellowing rage,
 And storms to trembling mariners presage.

Then thus to both reply'd the imperial god,
 Who shakes Heaven's axes with his awful nod.
 (When he begins, the silent senate stand
 With reverence, listening to the dread command :
 The clouds dispel ; the winds their breath restrain ;
 And the hush'd waves lie flatted on the main.)

"Celestials ! your attentive ears incline ;
 Since," said the god, "the Trojans must not join
 In wish'd alliance with the Latian line ;
 Since endless jarrings, and immortal hate,
 Tend but to discompose our happy state ;
 The war henceforward be resign'd to fate.
 Each to his proper fortune stand or fall,
 Equal and unconcern'd I look on all.
 Rutulians, Trojans, are the same to me ;
 And both shall draw the lots their fates decree.
 Let these assault, if fortune be their friend ;
 And if she favours those, let those defend :
 The fates will find their way." The thunderer said ;
 And shook the sacred honours of his head ;
 Attesting Styx, th' inviolable flood,
 And the black regions of his brother god :
 Trembled the poles of Heav'n ; and Earth confess'd
 the nod :

This end the sessions had : the senate rise, [skies.
 And to his palace wait their sovereign through the Meantime, intent upon their siege, the foes
 Within their walls the Trojan host enclose :
 They wound, they kill, they watch at every gate :
 Renew the fires, and urge their happy fate.
 Th' Æneans wish in vain their wanted chief,
 Hopeless of flight, more hopeless of relief ;
 Thin on the towers they stand ; and ev'n those few,
 A feeble, fainting, and dejected crew :
 Yet in the face of danger some there stood :
 The two bold brothers of Sarpedon's blood,
 Asius and Acmon : both th' Assaraci ;
 Young Hamon, and, though young, resolv'd to die.
 With these were Clarus and Thymetes join'd ;
 Tibris and Castor, both of Lycian kind.

From Acmon's hands a rolling stone there came,
 So large, it half deserv'd a mountain's name !
 Strong-sinew'd was the youth, and big of bone,
 His brother Mnestheus could not more have done,
 Or the great father of th' intrepid son.
 Some firebrands throw, some flights of arrows send ;
 And some with darts, and some with stones defend.
 Amid the press appears the beauteous boy,
 The care of Venus, and the hope of Troy.
 His lovely face unarm'd, his head was bare,
 In ringlets o'er his shoulders hung his hair ;
 His forehead circled with a diadem ;
 Distinguish'd from the crowd he shines a gem,
 Enchas'd in gold, or polish'd ivory set,
 Amidst the meaner foil of sable jet.

Not Ismarus was wanting to the war,
 Directing pointed arrows from afar,

And death with poison arm'd : in Lydia born,
 Where plenteous harvests the fat fields adorn :
 Where proud Pactolus floats the fruitful lands,
 And leaves a rich manure of golden sands.
 There Cypys, author of the Capuan name :
 And there was Mnestheus too increas'd in fame ;
 Since Turnus from the camp he cast with shame.

Thus mortal war was wag'd on either side.
 Meantime the hero cuts the nightly tide :
 For, anxious, from Evander when he went,
 He sought the Tyrrhene camp, and Tarchon's tent ;
 Expos'd the cause of coming to the chief ;
 His name and country told, and ask'd relief :
 Propos'd the terms ; his own small strength de-clar'd,

What vengeance proud Mæxentius had prepar'd :
 What Turnus, bold and violent, design'd ;
 Then show'd the slippery state of human kind,
 And fickle fortune ; warn'd him to beware :
 And to his wholesome counsel added prayer.
 Tarchon, without delay, the treaty signs :
 And to the Trojan troops the Tuscan joins.

They soon set sail ; nor now the fates withstand
 Their forces trusted with a foreign hand.
 Æneas leads ; upon his stern appear
 Two lions carv'd, which rising Ida bear ;
 Ida, to wandering Trojans ever dear.
 Under their grateful shade Æneas sat,
 Revolving war's events, and various fate.
 His left young Pallas kept, fix'd to his side,
 And oft of winds inquir'd, and of the tide :
 Oft of the stars, and of their watery way ;
 And what he suffer'd both by land and sea.

Now, sacred sisters, open all your spring :
 The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing ;
 Which follow'd great Æneas to the war :
 Their arms, their numbers, and their names, declare.

A thousand youths brave Massicus obey,
 Born in the Tiger, through the foaming sea ;
 From Asium brought, and Cofa, by his care ;
 For arms, light quivers, bows, and shafts they bear.
 Fierce Abas next, his men bright armour wore ;
 His stern, Apollo's golden statue bore.
 Six hundred Populonea sent along,
 All skill'd in martial exercise, and strong.
 Three hundred more for battle Iuva joins,
 An isle renown'd for steel, and unexhausted mines.
 Asylas on his prow the third appears,
 Who Heaven interprets, and the wandering stars ;
 From offer'd entrails prodigies expounds,
 And peals of thunder, with presaging sounds.
 A thousand spears in warlike order stand,
 Sent by the Pisans under his command.

Fair Astur follows in the watery field,
 Proud of his manag'd horse, and painted shield.
 Gravisca, noisome from the neighbouring fen,
 And his own Cere, sent three hundred men :
 With those which Minio's fields, and Pyrgi gave ;
 All bred in arms, unanimous and brave.

Thou, Muse, the name of Cinyras renew ;
 And brave Cupavo follow'd but by few :
 Whose helm confess'd the lineage of the man,
 And bore, with wings display'd a silver swan.
 Love was the fault of his fam'd ancestry.
 Whose forms and fortunes in his ensign fly.
 For Cynus lov'd unhappy Phæton,
 And sung his loss in poplar groves alone ;
 Beneath the sister shades to sooth his grief :
 Heaven heard his song, and hasten'd his relief.

And chang'd to snowy plumes his hoary hair,
 And wing'd his flight, to chant aloft in air:
 His son Capavo brush'd the briny flood:
 Upon his stern a brawny Centaur stood,
 Who heav'd a rock, and threatening still to throw,
 With lifted hands, alarm'd the seas below:
 They seem to fear the formidable sight,
 And roll'd their billows on, to speed his flight.
 : Ocean was next, who led his native train
 Of hardy warriors through the watery plain,
 The son of Manto, by the Tuscan stream,
 From whence the Mantuan town derives the name,
 An ancient city, but of mixt descent,
 Three several tribes compose the government:
 Four towns are under each; but all obey
 The Mantuan laws, and own the Tuscan sway.
 Hate to Mezentius arm'd five hundred more,
 Whom Mincius from his sire Benacus bore; (Mincius with wreaths of reeds his forehead cover'd o'er.)

These grave Anletes leads. A hundred sweep,
 With stretching oars, at once the glassy deep:
 Him, and his martial train, the Triton bears;
 High on his poop the sea-green god appears:
 Frowning he seems his crooked shell to sound,
 And at the blast the billows dance around.
 A hairy man above the waste he shows,
 A porpoise tail beneath his belly grows;
 And ends a fish: his breast the waves divides,
 And froth and foam augment the murmuring tides.

Pull thirty ships transport the chosen train,
 For Troy's relief, and scour the briny main.
 Now was the world forsaken by the Sun,
 And Phœbe half her nightly race had run.
 The careful chief, who never clos'd his eyes,
 Himself the rudder holds, the sails supplies.
 A choir of Nereids meet him on the flood,
 Once his own gallees, hewn from Ida's wood:
 But now as many nymphs the sea they sweep,
 As rode before tall vessels on the deep.
 They know him from afar; and in a ring
 Enclose the ship that bore the Trojan king.
 Cymodoce, whose voice excell'd the rest,
 Above the waves advanc'd her snowy breast.
 Her right hand stops the stern, her left divides
 The curling ocean, and corrects the tides:
 She spoke for all the choir; and thus began
 With pleasing words to warn th' unknowing man:
 "Sleeps our lov'd lord? O goddess-born! awake,
 Spread every sail, pursue your watery track;
 And haste your course. Your navy once were we,
 From Ida's height descending to the sea:
 Till Turnus, as at anchor fix'd we stood,
 Presum'd to violate our holy wood.
 Then loos'd from shore we fed his fires profane
 (Unwillingly we broke our master's chain);
 And since have sought you through the Tuscan main.

The mighty mother chang'd our forms to these,
 And gave us life immortal in the seas.
 But young Ascanius, in his camp distress,
 By your insulting foes is hardly prest;
 Th' Arcadian horsemen, and Etrurian host,
 Advance in order on the Latian coast:
 To cut their way the Daunian chief designs,
 Before their troops can reach the Trojan lines.
 Thou, when the rosy morn restores the light,
 First arm thy soldiers for th' ensuing fight;
 Thyself the fatid sword of Vulcan wield,
 And bear aloft th' impenetrable shield.

VOL. XIX.

To-morrow's Sun, unless my skill be vain,
 Shall see huge heaps of foes in battle slain."
 Parting, she spoke; and, with immortal force,
 Push'd on the vessel in her watery course,
 (For well she knew the way). Impell'd behind,
 The ship flew forward, and outstript the wind.
 The rest make up; unknowing of the cause,
 The chief admires their speed, and happy omen draws." [eyes:]

Then thus he pray'd, and fix'd on Heaven his
 "Hear thou, great mother of the deities,
 With turrets crown'd, (on Ida's holy hill; Fierce tigers, rein'd and curb'd, obey thy will),
 Firm thy own omens, lead us on to fight,
 And let thy Phrygians conquer in thy right."

He said no more. And now renewing day
 Had chas'd the shadows of the night away.
 He charg'd the soldiers with preventing care,
 Their flags to follow, and their arms prepare;
 Warn'd of th' ensuing fight, and bade them hope
 the war.

Now, from his lofty poop, he view'd below,
 His camp encompass'd, and th' enclosing foe.
 His blazing shield embrac'd, he held on high;
 The camp receive the sign, and with loud shouts reply. [throw]

Hope arms their courage: from their towers they
 Their darts with double force, and drive the foe.
 Thus, at the signal given, the cranes arise
 Before the stormy south, and blacken all the skies.

King Turnus wonder'd at the fight renew'd;
 Till, looking back, the Trojan fleet he view'd;
 The seas with swelling canvass cover'd o'er;
 And the swift ships descending on the shore.
 The Latians saw from far, with dazzled eyes,
 The radiant crest that seem'd in flames to rise,
 And dart diffusive fires around the field;
 And the keen glittering of the golden shield.
 Thus threatening comets, when by night they rise,
 Shoot sanguine streams, and sadden all the skies:
 So Sirius, flashing forth sinister lights,
 Pale human-kind with plagues and with dry famine frights.

Yet Turnus, with undaunted mind, is bent
 To man the shores, and hinder their descent:
 And thus awakes the courage of his friends:
 "What you so long have wish'd, kind fortunes ends!
 In ardent arms to meet th' invading foe:
 You find, and find him at advantage now.
 Yours is the day, you need but only dare:
 Your swords will make you masters of the war.
 Your sires, your sons your houses, and your lands,
 And dearest wives, are all within your hands.
 Be mindful of the race from whence you came;
 And emulate in arms your fathers' fame."
 Now take the time, while staggering yet they stand
 With feet unfirm; and prepossess the strand:
 Fortune befriends the bold." No more he said,
 But balanc'd whom to leave, and whom to lead:
 Then these elect, the landing to prevent;
 And those he leaves, to keep the city pent.

Meantime the Trojan sends his troops on shore:
 Some are by boats expos'd, by bridges more.
 With labouring oars they bear along the strand,
 Where the tide languishes, and leap a land.
 Tarchon observes the coast with careful eyes,
 And where no ford he finds, no water fries,
 Nor billows with unequal murmur roar,
 But smoothly slide along and swell the shore:

J f

That course he steer'd, and thus he gave command,
 "Here ply your oars, and at all hazard land:
 Force on the vessel, that her keel may wound
 This hated soil, and furrow hostile ground.
 Let me securely land, I ask no more,
 Then sink my ships, or shatter on the shore."
 This fiery speech inflames his fearful friends,
 They tug at every oar; and every stretcher bends:
 They run their ships aground, the vessels knock,
 (Thus forc'd ashore) and tremble with the shock.
 Tarhon's alone was lost, and stranded stood,
 Stuck on a bank, and beaten by the flood.
 She breaks her back, the loosen'd sides give way,
 And plunge the Tuscan soldiers in the sea.
 Their broken oars and floating planks withstand
 Their passage, while they labour to the land;
 And ebbing tides bear back upon th' uncertain sand.

New. Turnus leads his troops, without delay,
 Advancing to the margin of the sea.
 The trumpets sound: Æneas first assail'd
 The clowns new-rais'd and raw; and soon pre-
 Great Theron fell, an omen of the fight: [vail'd.
 Great Theron large of limbs, of giant height.
 He first in open fields defy'd the prince,
 But armour scal'd with gold was no defence
 Against the fat-d sword, which open'd wide
 His plated shield, and pierc'd his naked side.

Next, Lycas fell; who, not like others born,
 Was from his wretched mother ripp'd and torn:
 sacred, O Phœbus! from his birth to thee,
 For his beginning life from biting steel was free.
 Nor far from him was Gyas laid along,
 Of monstrous bulk; with Cisseus fierce and strong;
 Vain bulk and strength; for when the chief assail'd,
 Nor valour, nor Herculean arms, avail'd;
 Nor their fam'd father, wont in war to go
 With great Alcides, while he toil'd below.
 The noisy Pharos next receiv'd his death,
 Æneas with'd his dart, and stopp'd his lawling
 breath.

Then wretched Cydon had receiv'd his doom,
 Who courted Clytius in his beardless bloom,
 And sought with lust obscene polluted joys:
 The Trojan sword had cur'd his love of boys,
 Had not his seven bold brethren stopp'd the course
 Of the fierce champion, with united force.
 Seven darts are thrown at once, and some rebound
 From his bright shield, some on his helmet sound:
 The rest had reach'd him, but his mother's care
 Prevented those, and turn'd aside in air.

The prince then call'd Achates, to supply
 The spears that knew the way to victory.
 Those fatal weapons, which, mur'd to blood,
 In Grecian bodies under Ilium stood:
 "Not one of those my hand shall toss in vain Against our foes, on this contended plain."
 He said: then seiz'd a mighty spear, and threw:
 Which, wing'd with fate, through Mæon's buckler flew.

Pierc'd all the brazen plates, and reach'd his
 He stagger'd with intolerable smart. [heart:
 Alcanor saw; and reach'd, but reach'd in vain,
 His helping hand, his brother to sustain.
 A second spear, which kept the former course,
 From the same hand, and sent with equal force,
 His right arm pierc'd, and, holding on, bereft
 His use of both, and pinion'd down his left.
 Then Numitor, from his dead brother, drew
 Th' ill-omen'd spear, and at the Trojan threw:

Preventing fate directs the lance awry,
 Which, glancing, only mark'd Achater's thigh.
 In pride of youth the Sabine Clausus came,
 And from afar at Dryops took his aim.
 The spear flew hissing through the middle space,
 And pierc'd his throat, directed at his face:
 It stopp'd at once the passage of his wind,
 And the free soul to flitting air resign'd:
 His forehead was the first that struck the ground;
 Life-blood and life rush'd mingled through the wound.

He slew three brothers of the Borean race,
 And three, whom Iamarus, their native place,
 Had sent to war, but all the sons of Thrace.
 Halæus next, the bold Aurunci leads;
 The son of Neptune to his aid succeeds,
 Conspicuous on his horse: on either hand
 These fight to keep, and those to win the land.
 With mutual blood th' Ausonian soil is dy'd,
 While on its borders each their claim decide.

As wintery winds, contending in the sky,
 With equal force of lungs their titles try:
 They rage, they roar; the doubtful rack of Heaven
 Stands without motion, and the tide undriven:
 Each bent to conquer, neither side to yield;
 They long suspend the fortune of the field.
 Both armies thus perform what courage can:
 Foot set to foot, and mingled man to man.

But in another part, th' Arcadian horse,
 With ill-success engage the Latin force,
 For where th' impetuous torrent, rushing down,
 Huge craggy stones, and rooted trees had thrown,
 They left their coursers, and, unus'd to fight
 On foot, were scatter'd in a shameful flight.
 Pallas, who with disdain and grief had view'd
 His foes pursuing, and his friends pursu'd, (sources
 Us'd threatnings mix'd with prayers, his last re-
 With these to move their minds, with those to fix their force.

"Which way, companions! whither would you run!
 By you yourselves, and mighty battles won,
 By my great sire, by his establish'd name,
 And early promise of my future fame;
 By my youth, emulous of equal right
 To share his honours, shun ignoble flight.
 Trust not your feet; your hands must hew your way

Through yon black body, and that thick array:
 'Tis through that forward path that we must come:

There lies our way, and that our passage home
 Nor powers above, nor destinies below,
 Oppress our arms; with equal strength we go;
 With mortal hands to meet a mortal foe.
 See on what foot we stand: a scanty shore;
 The sea behind, our enemies before:
 No passage left, unless we swim the main;
 Or, forcing these, the Trojan trenches gain."
 This said, he strode with eager haste along,
 And bore amidat the thickest of the throng.
 Lagus, the first he met, with fate to foe,
 Had heav'd a stone of mighty weight to throw;
 Stooping, the spear descended on his chine,
 Just where the bone distinguish'd either loin:
 It stuck so fast, so deeply bury'd lay,
 That scarce the victor forc'd the steel away.

Hisbon came on, but while he mov'd too slow
 To wish'd revenge, the prince prevents his blow;
 For, warding his at once, at once he press'd;
 And plang'd the fatal weapon in his breast,

Then lewd Anchermolus he laid in dust,
 Who stain'd his stepdam's bed with impious lust.
 And after him the Daunian twins were slain,
 Aris and Thimbrus, on the Latian plain:
 Woodrous like in feature, shape, and size,
 As caus'd an error in their parents' eyes.
 Careful mistake! but soon the sword decides
 The nice distinction, and their fate divides.
 For Thimbrus' head was lopp'd: and Laris' hand,
 Remember'd, sought its owner on the strand:
 The trembling fingers yet the falchion strain,
 Had threaten still th' intended stroke in vain.
 Now, to renew the charge, th' Arcadians came:
 Sight of such acts, and sense of honest shame,
 And grief, with anger mix'd, their minds inflame.
 Then with a casual blow was Rhexteus slain,
 Who chanc'd, as Pallas threw, to cross the plain!
 The flying spear was after Ilius sent,
 But Rhexteus happen'd on a death unmeant:
 From Teuthras and from Tyrus while he fled,
 The lance, athwart his body, laid him dead.
 Led'd from his chariot with a mortal wound,
 Had intercepted fate, he spurr'd the ground.
 As when in summer welcome winds arise,
 The watchful shepherd to the forest flies,
 Had fires the midmost plants; contagion spreads,
 And catching flames infect the neighbouring heads;
 Around the forest flies the furious blast,
 And all the leafy nation sinks at last;
 Had Vulcan rides in triumph o'er the waste;
 The pastor, pleas'd with his dire victory,
 Beholds the satiate flames in sheets ascend the sky;
 b Pallas' troops their scatter'd strength unite;
 And, pouring on their foes, their prince delight.
 Halesus came, fierce with desire of blood
 (But first collected in his arms he stood);
 Advancing then he ply'd the spear so well,
 Iolon, Demodochus, and Pheres, fell:
 Around his head he toss'd his glittering brand,
 Had from Strymonius hew'd his better hand,
 Held up to guard his throat: then hurl'd a stone
 At Thous' ample front, and pierc'd the bone:
 It struck beneath the space of either eye,
 Had blood, and mingled brains, together fly.
 Deep skill'd in future fates, Halesus' sire
 Had with the youth to lonely groves retire:
 But, when the father's mortal race was run,
 His Destiny laid hold upon the son,
 Had haul'd him to the war: to find beneath
 Th' Evandrian spear a memorable death.
 Pallas th' encounter seeks; but, ere he throws,
 To Tuscan Tiber thus address'd his vows:
 "O sacred stream, direct my flying dart,
 And give to pass the proud Halesus' heart:
 His arms and spoils thy holy oak shall bear."
 Pleas'd with the bribe, the god receiv'd his prayer;
 For, while his shield protects a friend distress'd,
 The dart came driving on, and pierc'd his breast.
 But Lausus, no small portion of the war,
 Permits not panic fear to reign too far,
 Danc'd by the death of so renown'd a knight;
 But by his own example cheers the fight.
 Fierce Abas first he slew; Abas, the stay
 Of Trojan hopes, and hindrance of the day.
 The Phrygian troops escap'd the Greeks in vain,
 They, and their mix'd allies, now load the plain.
 To the rude shock of war both armies came,
 The leaders equal, and their strength the same.

The rear so press'd the front, they could not wield
 Their angry weapons, to dispute the field.
 Here Pallas urges on, and Lausus there,
 Of equal youth and beauty both appear,
 But both by fate forbid to breathe their native air.
 Their congress in the field great Jove withstands,
 Both doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.
 Mean time Juturna warns the Daunian chief
 Of Lausus' danger, urging swift relief.
 With his driv'n chariot he divides the crowd,
 And, making to his friends, thus calls aloud:
 "Let none presume his needless aid to join;
 Retire, and clear the field, the fight is mine:
 To this right hand is Pallas only due;
 Oh were his father here my just revenge to view!"
 From the forbidden space his men retir'd,
 Pallas their awe and the stern words admir'd,
 Survey'd him o'er and o'er with wondering sight,
 Struck with his haughty mien, and towering height.
 Then to the king: "Your empty vaunts forbear;
 Success I hope, and fate I cannot fear.
 Alive or dead, I shall deserve a name:
 Jove is impartial, and to both the same."
 He said, and to the void advanc'd his pace;
 Pale horror sat on each Arcadian face.
 Then Turnus, from his chariot leaping light,
 Address'd himself on foot to single fight.
 And, as a lion, when he spies from far
 A bull that seems to meditate the war,
 Bending his neck, and spurning back the sand,
 Runs roaring downward from his hilly strand:
 Imagine eager Turnus not more slow,
 To rush from high on his unequal foe.
 Young Pallas, when he saw the chief advance
 Within due distance of his flying lance,
 Prepares to charge him first, resolv'd to try
 If fortune would his want of force supply;
 And thus to Heaven and Hercules address'd:
 "Alcides, once on Earth Evander's guest,
 His son adjures you by those holy rites,
 That hospitable board, those genial nights;
 Assist my great attempt to gain this prize,
 And let proud Turnus view, with dying eyes,
 His ravish'd spoils." 'Twas heard, the vain request;
 Alcides mourn'd; and stifled sighs within his breast.
 Then Jove, to sooth his sorrow, thus began:
 "Short bounds of life are set to mortal man;
 'Tis virtue's work alone to stretch the narrow span.
 So many sons of gods in bloody fight,
 Around the walls of Troy, have lost the light:
 My own Sarpedon fell beneath his foe,
 Nor I, his mighty sire, could ward the blow.
 Ev'n Turnus shortly shall resign his breath;
 And stands already on the verge of death."
 This said, the god permits the fatal fight,
 But from the Latian fields averts his sight.
 Now with full force his spear young Pallas
 threw;
 And, having thrown, his shining falchion drew:
 The steel just graz'd along the shoulder-joint,
 And mark'd it slightly with the glancing point.
 Fierce Turnus first to nearer distance drew,
 And pois'd his pointed spear before he threw:
 Then, as the winged weapon whizz'd along,
 "See now," said he, "whose arm is better strung."
 The spear kept on the fatal course, unstay'd
 By plates of iron, which o'er the shield were laid:
 Through folded brass and tough bull-hides it pass'd,
 His corslet pierc'd, and reach'd his heart at last.

In vain the youth tugs at the broken wood,
The soul comes issuing with the vital blood:
He falls; his arms upon his body sound;
And with his bloody teeth he bites the ground.

Turnus bestrode the corpse: "Arcadians hear,"
Said he; "my message to your master bear:
Such as the sire deserv'd, the son I send:
It costs him dear to be the Phrygians' friend.
The lifeless body, tell him, I bestow,
Unask'd, to rest his wandering ghost below."
He said, and trampled down with all the force
Of his left foot, and spurn'd the wretched corpse:
Then snatch'd the shining belt, with gold inlaid;
The belt Eurytion's artful hands had made:
Where fifty fatal brides, exprest to sight,
All, in the compass of one mournful night,
Depriv'd their bridegrooms of returning light.

In an ill hour insulting Turnus tore
Those golden spoils, and in a worse he wore.
O mortals! blind in fate, who never know
To bear high fortune, or endure the low!
The time shall come, when Turnus, but in vain,
Shall wish untouch'd the trophies of the slain:
Shall wish the fatal belt were far away;
And curse the dire remembrance of the day.

The sad Arcadians from th' unhappy field,
Bear back the breathless body on a shield.
O grace and grief of war! at once restor'd
With praises to thy sire, at once deplor'd.
One day first sent thee to the fighting field,
Beheld whole heaps of foes in battle kill'd;
One day beheld thee dead, and borne upon thy shield.

This dismal news, not from uncertain fame,
But sad spectators, to the hero came:
His friends upon the brink of ruin stand,
Unless reliev'd by his victorious hand.
He whirls his sword around, without delay,
And hews through adverse foes an ample way;
To find fierce Turnus, of his conquest proud:
Evander, Pallas, all that friendship ow'd
To large deserts, are present to his eyes;
His plighted hand, and hospitable ties.

Four sons of Sulmo, four whom Ufens bred,
He took in fight, and living victims led,
To please the ghost of Pallas; and expire
In sacrifice, before his funeral fire.
At Magus next he threw: he stoop'd below
The flying spear, and shunn'd the promis'd blow:
Then, creeping, clasp'd the hero's knees, and
"By young Iulus, by thy father's shade, [pray'd:
O spare my life, and send me back to see
My longing sire, and tender progeny.
A lofty house I have, and wealth untold,
In silver ingots, and in bars of gold:
All these, and sums besides, which see no day,
The ransom of this one poor life shall pay.
If I survive, shall Troy the less prevail?
A single son's too light to turn the scale."
He said. The hero sternly thus reply'd:
"Thy bars, and ingots, and the sums beside,
Leave for thy children's lot. Thy Turnus broke
All rules of war, by one relentless stroke,
When Pallas fell: so deems, nor deems alone,
My father's shadow, but my living son."
Thus having said, of kind remorse bereft,
He seiz'd his helm, and dragg'd him with his left:
Then with his right-hand, whilst his-neck he wreath'd,

Up to the hilts his shining falchion sheath'd,

Apollo's priest, Harmonides, was near,
His holy fillets on his front appear;
Glittering in arms he shone amidst the crowd;
Much of his god, more of his purple proud:
Him the fierce Trojan follow'd through the field,
The holy coward fell: and, forc'd to yield,
The prince stood o'er the priest; and at one blow
Sent him an offering to the shades below.
His arms Seresthus on his shoulders bears,
Design'd a trophy to the god of wars.

Vulcanian Cæculus renews the fight;
And Umbro born upon the mountain's height.
The champion cheers his troops t' encounter those;
And seeks revenge himself on other foes.
At Anxur's shield he drove, and at the blow
Both shield and arm to ground together go.
Anxur had boasted much of magic charms,
And thought he wore impenetrable arms;
So made by mutter'd spells: and from the sphere
Had life secur'd in vain, for length of years.
Then Tarquitus the field in triumph trod;
A nymph his mother, and his sire a god.
Exulting in bright arms, he braves the prince;
With his portendel lance he makes defence:
Bears back his feeble foe; then, pressing on,
Arrests his better hand, and drags him down.
Stands o'er the prostrate wretch, and as he lay,
Vain tales inventing, and prepar'd to pray,
Mows off his head; the trunk a moment stood,
Then sunk, and roll'd along the sand in blood.

The vengeful victor thus upbraids the slain;
"Lie there, proud man, un pity'd on the plain!
Lie there, inglorious, and without a tomb,
Far from thy mother, and thy native home:
Expos'd to savage beasts, and birds of prey;
Or thrown for food to monsters of the sea."

On Lycas and Antæus next he ran,
Two chiefs of Turnus, and who led his van.
They fled for fear; with these he chas'd along
Camers the yellow-lock'd, and Numa strong.
Both great in arms, and both were fair and young;
Camers was son to Volscens lately slain,
In wealth surpassing all the Latian train,
And in Amycla fix'd his silent easy reign.

And as Ægeon, when with Heaven he strove,
Stood opposite in arms to mighty Jove;
Mov'd all his hundred hands, provok'd the war,
Defy'd the forked lightning from afar:
At fifty mouths his flaming breath expires,
And flash for flash returns, and fires for fires:
In his right-hand as many swords he wields,
And takes the thunder on as many shields:
With strength like his the Trojan hero stood,
And soon the fields with falling crops were strow'd,
When once his falchion found the taste of blood.
With fury scarce to be conceiv'd, he flew
Against Niphasus, whom four coursers drew.
They, when they see the fiery chief advance,
And pushing at their chests his pointed lance,
Wheel'd with so swift a motion, mad with fear,
They drew their master headlong from the chair:
They stare, they start, nor stop their course,
before

They bear the bounding chariot to the shore.
Now Lucagus and Liger scour the plains,
With two white steeds, but Liger holds the reins,
And Lucagus the lofty seat maintains.
Bold brethren both, the former war'd in air
His flaming sword: Æneas couch'd his spear,
Ugus'd to threats, and more unans'd to fear.

Then Liger thus : " Thy confidence is vain
To scape from hence, as from the Trojan plain :
Nor these the steeds which Diomedestrode,
Nor this the chariot where Achilles rode :
Nor Venus' veil is here, nor Neptune's shield :
Thy fatal hour is come : and this the field."
Thus Liger vainly vaunts : the Trojan peer
Return'd his answer with his flying spear.
As Lucagus to lash his horses bends,
Proned to the wheels, and his left foot pretends,
Prepar'd for flight, the fatal dart arrives,
And through the border of his buckler drives ;
Pass'd through, and pierc'd his groin ; the deadly
wound,

Cast from his chariot, roll'd him on the ground.
Whom thus the chief upbraids with scornful spite :
" Blame not the slowness of your steeds in flight ;
Vain shadows did not force their swift retreat :
But you yourself forsake your empty seat."
He said, and seiz'd at once the loosened rein
(For Liger lay already on the plain
By the same shock) ; then, stretching out his hands,
The recreant thus his wretched life demands :
" Now by thyself, O more than mortal man !
By her and him from whom thy breath began,
Who form'd thee thus divine, I beg thee spare
This forfeit life, and hear thy suppliant's prayer."
Thus much he spoke ; and more he would have said,

But the stern hero turn'd aside his head,
And cut him short : " I hear another man,
You talk'd not thus before the fight began :
Now take your turn : and, as a brother should,
Attend your brother to the Stygian flood :"
Then through his breast his fatal sword he sent,
And the soul issued at the gaping vent.
As storms the skies, and torrents tear the ground,
Thus rag'd the prince, and scatter'd deaths around :
At length Ascanius, and the Trojan train,
Broke from the camp, so long besieg'd in vain.
Meantime the king of gods and mortal man
Held conference with his queen, and thus began :
" My sister-goddess, and well pleasing wife,
Still think you Venus' aid supports the strife ;
Sustains her Trojans, or themselves alone,
With inborn valour, force their fortune on ?
How fierce in fight, with courage undecay'd I
Judge if such warriors want immortal aid."
To whom the goddess with the charming eyes,
Soft in her tone, submissively replies :
" Why, O my sovereign lord, whose from I fear,
And cannot, unconcern'd, your anger bear ;
Why urge you thus my grief? when, if I still (As once I was) were mistress of your will,
From your almighty power, your pleasing wife
Might gain the grace of lengthening Turnus' life ;
Securely snatch him from the fatal fight ;
And give him to his aged father's sight.
Now let him perish, since you hold it good ;
And glut the Trojans with his pious blood.
Yet from our lineage he derives his name,
And in the fourth degree from god Pilius came !
Yet he devoutly pays you rites divine,
And offers daily incense at your shrine."

Then shortly thus the sovereign god reply'd :
" Since in my power and goodness you confide ;
If for a little space, a lengthen'd span,
You beg reprieve for this expiring man :
I grant you leave to take your Turnus hence,
From instant fate, and can so far dispense.

But if some secret meaning lies beneath,
To save the short-liv'd youth from destin'd death :
Or if a farther thought you entertain,
To change the fates, you feed your hopes in vain."

To whom the goddess thus, with weeping eyes :
" And what if that request your tongue denies,
Your heart should grant ; and not a short reprieve,
But length of certain life to Turnus give ?
Now speedy death attends the guiltless youth,
If my presaging soul divines with truth :
Which, O ! I wish might err thro' causeless fears,
And you (for you have power) prolong his years."

Thus having said, involv'd in clouds, she flies,
And drives a storm before her through the skies.
Swift she descends, alighting on the plain,
Where the fierce foes a dubious fight maintain.
Of air condens'd, a spectre soon she made,
And what Æneas was, such seem'd the shade.
Adorn'd with Dardan arms, the phantom bore
His head aloft, a plummy crest he wore :
This hand appear'd a shining sword to wield,
And that sustain'd an imitated shield :
With manly mien he stalk'd along the ground ;
Nor wanted voice bely'd, nor vaunting sound.
(Thus haunting ghosts appear to waking sight,
Or dreadful visions in our dreams by night.)
The spectre seems the Daunian chief to dare,
And flourishes his empty sword in air :
At this advancing, Turnus hurl'd his spear ;
The phantom wheel'd, and seem'd to fly for fear.
Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled,
And with vain hopes his haughty fancy fed.
" Whither, O coward !" (thus he calls aloud, Nor found he spoke to wind, and chas'd a cloud ;)
" Why thus forsake your bride ! Receive from me
The fated land you sought so long by sea."
He said ; and, brandishing at once his blade,
With eager pace pursu'd the flying shade.
By chance a ship was fasten'd to the shore,
Which from old Clusium king Osinius bore :
The plank was ready laid for safe ascent ;
For shelter there the trembling shadow bent,
And skipp'd, and sculk'd, and under hatches went.
Exulting Turnus, with regardless haste,
Ascends the plank, and to the galley pass'd.
Scarce had he reach'd the prow, Saturnia's hand
The hausers cuts, and shoots the ship from land.
With wind in poop, the vessel ploughs the sea,
And measures back with speed her former way.
Meantime Æneas seeks his absent foe,
And sends his slaughter'd troops to shades below.

The guileful phantom now forsook the shroud,
And flew sublime, and vanish'd in a cloud.
Too late young Turnus the delusion found,
Far on the sea, still malking from the ground.
Then, thankless for a life redeem'd by shame,
With sense of honour stung, and forfeit fame,
Fearful besides of what in fight had pass'd,
His hands and haggard eyes to Heaven he cast.
" O Jove !" he cry'd, " for what offence have I
Deserv'd to bear this endless infamy ?
Whence am I forc'd, and whither am I borne,
How, and with what reproach, shall I return !
Shall ever I behold the Latian plain,
Or see Laurentum's lofty towers again ?
What will they say of their deserting chief ?
The war was mine, I fly from their relief :
I led to slaughter, and in slaughter leave ;
And ev'n from hence their dying groans receive,

Here, over-match'd in fight, in heaps they lie,
 There, scatter'd o'er the fields, ignobly fly.
 Gape wide, O Earth! and draw me down alive,
 Or, oh, ye pitying winds! a wretch relieve;
 On sands or shelves the splitting vessel drive:
 Or set me shipwreck'd on some desert shore,
 Where no Rutulian eyes may see me more;
 Unknown to friends, or foes, or conscious fame,
 Lest she should follow, and my flight proclaim!"

Thus Turnus rav'd, and various fates resolv'd,
 The choice was doubtful, but the death resolv'd.
 And now the sword, and now the sea took place:
 That to revenge, and this to purge disgrace.
 Sometimes he thought to swim the stormy main,
 By stretch of arms the distant shore to gain:
 Thrice he the sword assay'd, and thrice the flood;
 But Juno, mov'd with pity, both withstood;
 And thrice repress'd his rage: strong gales supply'd,
 And push'd the vessel o'er the swelling tide.
 At length she lands him on his native shores,
 And to his father's longing arms restores.

Meantime, by Jove's impulse, Mezentius arm'd,
 Succeeding Turnus, with his arduous warm'd
 His fainting friends, reproach'd their shameful
 flight,

Repell'd the victors, and renew'd the fight.
 Against their king the Tuscan troops conspire,
 Such is their hate, and such their fierce desire
 Of wish'd revenge: on him, and him alone,
 All hands employ'd, and all their darts are thrown.
 He, like a solid rock by seas enclos'd,
 To raging winds and roaring waves oppos'd;
 From his proud summit looking down, disdains
 Their empty menace, and unmov'd remains.

Beneath his feet fell haughty Hebrus dead,
 Then Latagus; and Palmus, as he fled:
 At Latagus a weighty stone he flung,
 His face was flatted, and his helmet rung.
 But Palmus from behind receives his wound,
 Hamstring'd he falls, and grovels on the ground:
 His crest and armour, from his body torn,
 Thy shoulders, Lausus, and thy head adorn.
 Evas and Mymas, both of Troy, he slew;
 Mymas his birth from fair Theano drew:
 Born on that fatal night, when, big with fire,
 The queen produc'd young Paris to his sire.
 But Paris in the Phrygian fields was slain;
 Unthinking Mymas, on the Lation plain.

And as a savage boar on mountains bred,
 With forest mast and fattening marshes fed;
 When once he sees himself in toils enclos'd,
 By huntsmen and their eager hounds oppos'd,
 He whets his tusks, and turns, and dares the war;
 Th' invaders dart their javelins from afar;
 All keep aloof, and safely shout around,
 But none presumes to give a nearer wound.
 He frets and froths, erects his bristled hide,
 And shakes a grove of lances from his side:
 Not otherwise the troops, with hate inspir'd
 And just revenge, against the tyrant fir'd;
 Their darts with clamour at a distance drive,
 And only keep the languish'd war alive.

From Coritus came Acron to the fight, [night.
 Who left his spouse betroth'd and unconsummated
 Mezentius sees him through the squadrons ride,
 Proud of the purple favours of his bride.
 Then, as a hungry lion, who beholds
 A gamesome goat, who frisks about the folds,
 Or beamy stag, that grazes on the plain;
 He rums, he roars, he shakes his rising mane;

He grins, and opens wide his greedy jaws,
 The prey lies panting underneath his paws;
 He fills his famish'd maw, his mouth runs o'er
 With unchew'd morsels, while he churns the gore:
 So proud Mezentius rushes on his foes,
 And first unhappy Acron overthrows:
 Stretch'd at his length, he spurts the swarthy ground, [wound

The lance, besmear'd with blood, lies broken in the Then with disdain the haughty victor view'd
 Orodes flying, nor the wretch pursu'd:
 Nor thought the dastard's back deserv'd a wound,
 But running gain'd th' advantage of the ground.
 Then, turning short, he met him face to face,
 To give his victory the better grace.
 Orodes falls, in equal fight oppress:
 Mezentius fix'd his foot upon his breast,
 And rested lance: and thus aloud he cries,
 "Lo, here the champion of my rebels lies!"
 The fields around with Iö Pæan ring,
 And peals of shouts applaud the conqu'ring king.
 At this the vanquish'd, with his dying breath,
 Thus faintly spoke, and prophesy'd in death:
 "Nor thou, proud man, unpunish'd shalt remain;
 Like death attends thee on this fatal plain."
 Then, sourly smiling, thus the king reply'd:
 "For what belongs to me, let Jove provide;
 But die thou first, whatever chance ensue."
 He said, and from the wound the weapon drew:
 A hovering mist came swimming o'er his sight,
 And seal'd his eyes in everlasting night.

By Cadicus, Alcaethous was slain;
 Sacrator laid Hydaspes on the plain:
 Orses the strong to greater strength must yield:
 He, with Parthenius, were by Rapo kill'd.
 Then brave Messapus Ericetes slew,
 Who from Lycaon's blood his lineage drew.
 But from his headstrong horse his fate he found,
 Who threw his master as he made a bound;
 The chief, alighting, stuck him to the ground.
 Then Clonius hand in hand, on foot assails,
 The Trojan sinks, and Neptune's son prevails.
 Agis the Lycian, stepping forth with pride,
 To single fight the boldest foe defy'd;
 Whom Tuscan Valerus by force o'ercame,
 And not bely'd his mighty father's fame.
 Salius to death the great Antronius sent,
 But the same fate the victor underwent;
 Slain by Nealces' hand, well skill'd to throw
 The flying dart, and draw the far-deceiving bow.

Thus equal deaths are dealt with equal chance;
 By turns they quit their ground, by turns advance
 Victors, and vanquish'd, in the various field,
 Nor wholly overcome, nor wholly yield.
 The gods from Heaven survey the fatal strife,
 And mourn the miseries of human life.
 Above the rest two goddesses appear
 Concern'd for each: here Venus, Juno there:
 Amidst the crowd infernal Atë shakes
 Her scourge aloft, and crest of hissing snakes.

Once more the proud Mezentius, with disdain,
 Brandish'd his spear, and rush'd into the plain:
 Where towering in the midmost ranks he stood,
 Like tall Orion stalking o'er the flood:
 When with his brawny breast he cuts the waves,
 His shoulders scarce the topmost billow laves.
 Or like a mountain-ash, whose roots are spread,
 Deep fixt in earth, in clouds he hides his head.
 The Trojan prince beheld him from afar,
 And dauntless undertook the doubtful war

Collected in his strength, and like a rock,
 Poind on his base, Mezentius stood the shock.
 He stood, and, measuring first with careful eyes
 The space his spear could reach, aloud he cries:
 " My strong right-hand, and sword, assist my (Those only gods Mezentius will invoke.) [stroke];
 His armour, from the Trojan pirate torn,
 By my triumphant Lausus shall be worn."
 He said, and with his utmost force he threw
 The massy spear, which, hissing as it flew,
 Reach'd the celestial shield that stopp'd the course;
 But glancing thence, the yet-unbroken force
 Took a new bent obliquely, and betwixt
 The sides and bowels fam'd Anthores fix'd.
 Anthores had from Argos travell'd far,
 Alcides' friend, and brother of the war:
 Till, tir'd with toils, fair Italy he chose,
 And in Evander's palace sought repose:
 Now falling by another wound, his eyes
 He cast to Heaven, on Argos thinks, and dies.

The pious Trojan then his javelin sent;
 The shield gave way: through treble plates it went
 Of solid brass, of linen trebly roll'd,
 And three bull-hides, which round the buckler roll'd.
 All these it pass'd, resistless in the course,
 Transpierc'd his thigh, and spent its dying force.
 The gaping wound gush'd out a crimson flood;
 The Trojan, glad with sight of hostile blood,
 His falchion drew, to closer fight address'd,
 And with new force his fainting foe oppress'd.
 His father's peril Lausus view'd with grief,
 He sigh'd, he wept, he ran to his relief:
 And here, heroic youth, 'tis here I must
 To thy immortal memory be just;
 And sing an act so noble and so new,
 Posterity will scarce believe 'tis true.
 Pain'd with his wound, and useless for the fight,
 The father sought to save himself by flight:
 Encumber'd, slow he dragg'd the spear along,
 Which pierc'd his thigh, and in his buckler hung.
 The pious youth, resolv'd on death, below
 The lifted sword springs forth, to face the foe;
 Protects his parent, and prevents the blow.
 Shoots of applause ran ringing through the field,
 To see the son the vanquish'd father shield:
 All fir'd with generous indignation strive;
 And, with a storm of darts, at distance drive
 The Trojan chief: who, held at bay from far,
 On his Vulcanian orb sustain'd the war.

As when thick hail comes rattling in the wind,
 The ploughman, passenger, and labouring hind,
 For shelter to the neighbouring covert fly;
 Or hous'd, or safe in hollow caverns lie;
 But, that o'erblown, when Heaven above them
 Return to travel, and renew their toils; [smiles,
 Æneas, thus, o'erwhelm'd on every side,
 The storm of darts, undaunted, did abide; [cry'd:
 And thus to Lausus loud, with friendly threatening,
 " Why wilt thou rush to certain death, and rage
 In rash attempts, beyond thy tender age,
 Betray'd by pious love?" Nor, thus foreborn,
 The youth desists, but with insulting scorn
 Provokes the lingering prince, whose patience,
 tir'd,

Gave place, and all his breast with fury fir'd.
 For now the Fates prepar'd their sharpen'd sheers;
 And, lifted high, the flaming sword appears,
 Which full descending, with a frightful sway,
 Thro' shield and corslet forc'd th' impetuous way,
 And buried deep in his fair bosom lay.

The purple streams through the thin armour strov'
 And drench'd th' embroider'd coat his mother wove;

And life at length forsook his heaving heart,
 Loth from so sweet a mansion to depart.

But when, with blood and paleness all o'erspread,
 The pious prince beheld young Lausus dead;
 He griev'd, he wept, the sight an image brought
 Of his own filial love; a sadly pleasing thought!
 Then stretch'd his hand to hold him up, and said,
 " Poor hapless youth! what praises can be paid
 To love so great, to such transcendent store
 Of early worth, and sure presage of more!
 Accept what'er Æneas can afford:
 Untouch'd thy arms, untaken be thy sword!
 And all that pleas'd thee then living, still remain
 Inviolatè, and sacred to the slain!

Thy body on thy parents I bestow
 To rest thy soul, at least if shadows know,
 Or have a sense of human things below.
 There to thy fellow-ghosts with glory tell,
 "'Twas by the great Æneas' hand I fell.'"
 With this his distant friends he beckons near,
 Provokes their duty, and prevents their fear:
 Himself assists to lift him from the ground,
 With clotted locks, and blood that well'd from out
 the wound.

Meantime his father, now no father, stood,
 And wash'd his wounds by Tiber's yellow flood:
 Opprest with anguish, panting, and o'erspent,
 His fainting limbs against an oak he leant.
 A bough his brazen helmet did sustain,
 His heavier arms lay scatter'd on the plain:
 A chosen train of youth around him stand,
 His drooping head was rested on his hand:
 His grisly beard his pensive bosom sought,
 And all on Lausus ran his restless thought.
 Careful, concern'd his danger to prevent,
 He much inquir'd, and many a message sent
 To warn him from the field: alas! in vain;
 Behold his mournful followers bear him slain:
 O'er his broad shield still gush'd the yawning
 wound,

And drew a bloody trail along the ground.
 Far off he heard their cries, far off divin'd
 The dire event with a foreboding mind.
 With dust he sprinkled first his hoary head,
 Then both his lifted hands to Heaven he spread;
 Last the dear corpse embracing, thus he said:
 " What joys, alas! could this frail being give,
 That I have been so covetous to live?
 To see my son, and such a son, resign
 His life, a ransom for preserving mine?
 And am I then preserv'd, and art thou lost?
 How much too dear has that redemption cost!
 'Tis now my bitter banishment I feel;
 This is a wound too deep for time to heal.
 My guilt thy growing virtues did defame,
 My blackness blotted thy unblemish'd name.
 Chas'd from a throne, abandon'd, and exil'd,
 For foul misdeeds, were punishments too mild:
 I ow'd my people these, and from their hate
 With less resentment could have borne my fate.
 And yet I live, and yet sustain the sight
 Of hated men, and of more hated light:
 But will not long." With that he rais'd from
 ground

His fainting limbs, that stagger'd with his wound.
 Yet with a mind resolv'd, and unappall'd
 With pains or perils, for his courser call'd a

Well-mouth'd, well-manag'd, whom himself did
With daily care, and mounted with success: [dress
His aid in arms, his ornament in peace.

Soothing his courage with a gentle stroke,
The steed seem'd sensible while thus he spoke:
"O Rhabus, we have liv'd too long for me
(If life and long were terms that could agree);
This day thou either shalt bring back the head
And bloody trophies of the Trojan dead;
This day thou either shalt revenge my woe
For murder'd Lausus, on his cruel foe;
Or, if inexorable fate deny
Our conquest, with thy conquer'd master die:
For, after such a lord, I rest secure,
Thou wilt no foreign reins, or Trojan load, endure."
He said: and straight th' officious courser kneels
To take his wonted weight. His hands he fills
With point'd javelins: on his head he lac'd
His glittering helm, which terribly was grac'd
With waving horse-hair, nodding from afar;
Then spur'd his thundering steed amidst the war.
Love, anguish, wrath, and grief, to madness
wrought,

Despair, and secret shame, and conscious thought
Of inborn worth, his labouring soul oppress'd,
Roll'd in his eyes, and rag'd within his breast.
Then loud he call'd Æneas thrice by name,
The loud repeated voice to glad Æneas came.
"Great Jove," he said, "and the far-shooting god, Inspire thy mind to make thy challenge good."
He spoke no more, but hasten'd, void of fear,
And threaten'd with his long protended spear.

To whom Mezentius thus: "Thy vaunts are
My Lausus lies extended on the plain: [vain,
He's lost! thy conquest is already won,
The wretched sire is murder'd in the son.
Nor fate I fear, but all the gods defy,
Forbear thy threats, my business is to die;
But first receive this parting legacy."
He said: and straight a whirling dart he sent:
Another after, and another went.
Round in a spacious ring he rides the field,
And vainly plies th' impenetrable shield:
Thrice rode he round, and thrice Æneas wheel'd,
Turn'd as he turn'd; the golden orb withstood
The strokes; and bore about an iron wood.
Impatient of delay, and weary grown,
Still to defend, and to defend alone;
To wrench the darts which in his buckler light,
Urg'd and o'erlabour'd in unequal fight:
At length resolv'd, he throws with all his force
Full at the temples of the warrior-horse.
Just where the stroke was aim'd, th' unerring spear
Made way, and stood transfixt through either ear.
Seiz'd with unwonted pain, surpris'd with fright,
The wounded steed curvets; and, rais'd upright,
Lights on his feet before; his hoofs behind
Spring up in air aloft, and lash the wind.
Down comes the rider headlong from his height,
His horse came after with unwieldy weight;
And, floundering forward, pitching on his head,
His lord's encumber'd shoulder overlaid:
From either host the mingled shouts and cries
Of Trojans and Rutulians rend the skies.
Æneas, hastening, wav'd his fatal sword
High o'er his head, with this reproachful word:
"Now, where are now thy vaunts, the fierce disdain
Of proud Mezentius, and the lofty strain?"
Struggling, and wildly staring on the skies,
With scarce recover'd sight, he thus replies:

"Why these insulting words, this waste of breath?
To souls undaunted, and secure of death?
'Tis no dishonour to the brave to die,
Nor came I here with hope of victory.
Nor ask I life, nor fought with that design:
As I had us'd my fortune, use thou thine.
My dying son contracted no such band;
The gift is hateful from his murderer's hand.
For this, this only favour let me sue:
If pity can to conquer'd foes be due,
Refuse it not: but let my body have
The last retreat of human kind, a grave.
Too well I know th' insulting people's hate;
Protect me from their vengeance after fate!
This refuge for my poor remains provide,
And lay my much-lov'd Lausus by my side."
He said, and to the throat his sword apply'd.
The crimson stream distain'd his arms around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing through the
wound.

THE ELEVENTH BOOK OF

THE ÆNEID.

THE ARGUMENT,

ÆNEAS erects a trophy of the spoils of Mezentius; grants a truce for burying the dead; and sends home the body of Pallas with great solemnity.
Latius calls a council to propose offers of peace to Æneas, which occasions great animosity betwixt Turnus and Drances: in the mean time there is a sharp engagement of the horse; wherein Camilla signalizes herself; is killed; and the Latius troops are entirely defeated.

SCARUS had the rosy Morning rais'd her head
Above the waves, and left her watery bed;
The pious chief, whom double cares attend
For his unbury'd soldiers, and his friend:
Yet first to Heaven perform'd a victor's vows:
He bar'd an ancient oak of all her boughs:
Then on a rising ground the trunk he plac'd;
Which with the spoils of his dead foe he grac'd.
The coat of arms by proud Mezentius worn,
Now on a naked shag in triumph borne,
Was hung on high, and glitter'd from afar:
A trophy sacred to the god of war.
Above his arms, fixt on the leafless wood,
Appear'd his plumed crest, besmear'd with blood;
His brazen buckler on the left was seen;
Truncheons of shiver'd lances hung between:
And on the right was plac'd his corselet, bor'd;
And to the neck was ty'd his unavailing sword.
A crowd of chiefs enclose the godlike man;
Who thus, conspicuous in the midst, began:
"Our toils, my friends, are crown'd with sur-
success:

The greater part perform'd, achieve the less.
Now follow cheerful to the trembling town;
Press but an entrance, and presume it won.
Fear is no more for fierce Mezentius lies,
As the first fruits of war, a sacrifice.
Turnus shall stand extended on the plain;
And in this oven is already slain.
Prepar'd in arms, pursue your happy chance;
That none, unwar'n'd, may plead his ignorance."

And I, at Heaven's appointed hour, may find
Your warlike ensigns waving in the wind.
Meantime the rites and funeral pomp prepare,
Due to your dead companions of the war :
The last respect the living can bestow,
To shield their shadows from contempt below.
That conquer'd earth be theirs for which they fought ;

And which for us with their own blood they bought.
But first the corpse of our unhappy friend,
To the sad city of Evander send :
Who, not inlorious in his age's bloom,
Was hurry'd hence by too severe a doom."

Thus, weeping while he spoke, he took his way,
Where, now in death, lamented Pallas lay :
Acetes watch'd the corpse ; whose youth de-serv'd

The father's trust, and now the son he serv'd
With equal faith, but less auspicious care :
Th' attendants of the slain his sorrow share.
A troop of Trojans mix'd with these appear,
And mourning matrons with dishevell'd hair.
Soon as the prince appears, they raise a cry ;
All beat their breasts, and echoes rend the sky.
They rear his drooping forehead from the ground ;
But when Æneas view'd the grisly wound
Which Pallas in his manly bosom bore,
And the fair flesh stain'd with purple gore :
First, melting into tears, the pious man
Deplor'd so sad a sight, then thus began :

" Unhappy youth ! when Fortune gave the rest
Of my fall wishes, she refus'd the best !
She came ; but brought not thee along, to bless
My longing eyes, and share in my success :
She gradg'd thy safe return, the triumphs due
To prosperous valour, in the public view.
Not thus I promis'd, when thy father lent
Thy needless succour with a sad consent ;
Embrac'd me parting for th' Etrurian land,
And sent me to possess a large command.
He warn'd, and from his own experience told,
Our foes were warlike, disciplin'd, and bold :
And now, perhaps, in hopes of thy return,
Rich odours on his loaded altars burn ;
While we, with vain officious pomp, prepare
To send him back his portion of the war :
A bloody breathless body : which can owe
No farther debt, but to the powers below.
The wretched father, ere his race is run,
Shall view the funeral honours of his son.
These are my triumphs of the Latian war ;
Fruits of my plighted faith, and boasted care.
And yet, unhappy sire, thou shalt not see
A son, whose death disgrac'd his ancestry ;
Thou shalt not blush, old man, however griev'd :
Thy Pallas no dishonest wound receiv'd.
He dy'd no death to make thee wish, too late,
Thou had'st not liv'd to see his shameful fate.
But what a champion has th' Ausonian coast,
And what a friend hast thou, Ascanius, lost !"

Thus having mourn'd, he gave the word around,
To raise the breathless body from the ground ;
And chose a thousand horse, the flower of all
His warlike troops, to wait the funeral :
To bear him back, and share Evander's grief
(A well-becoming, but a weak relief).
Of oaken twigs they twist an easy bier ;
Then on their shoulders the sad burthen rear.
The body on this rural hearse is borne,
Strew'd leaves and funeral greens the bier adorn.

All pale he lies, and looks a lovely flower,
New crott by virgin hands, to dress the bower :
Unfaded yet, but yet unfed below, [owe
No more to mother earth or the green stem shall Then two fair vests, of wondrous work and cost,
Of purple wove, and with gold embost,
For ornament the Trojan hero brought,
Which with her hands Sidonian Dido wrought.
One vest array'd the corpse, and one they spread
O'er his clos'd eyes, and wrapp'd around his head :
That when the yellow hair in flame should fall,
The catching fire might burn the golden caul.
Besides the spoils of foes in battle slain,
When he descended on the Latian plain :
Arms, trappings, horses, by the hearse he led
In long array (th' achievements of the dead).
Then, pinion'd with their hands behind, appear
Th' unhappy captives, marching in the rear :
Appointed offerings in the victor's name,
To sprinkle with their blood the funeral flame.
Inferior trophies by the chiefs are borne ;
Gauntlets and helms, their loaded hands adorn ;
And fair inscriptions fixt, and titles read,
Of Latian leaders conquer'd by the dead.
Acetes on his pupil's corpse attends,
With feeble steps : supported by his friends :
Pausing at every pace, in sorrow drown'd,
Betwixt their arms he sinks upon the ground.
Where groveling, while he lies in deep despair,
He beats his breast, and rends his hoary hair.

The champion's chariot next is seen to roll,
Besmear'd with hostile blood, and honourably foul.
To close the pomp, Æthon, the steed of state,
Is led, the funerals of his lord to wait.
Stripp'd of his trappings, with a sullen pace
He walks, and the big tears run rolling down his face.
The lance of Pallas, and the crimson crest,
Are borne behind ; the victor seiz'd the rest.
The march begins : the trumpets hoarsely sound,
The pikes and lances trail along the ground.
Thus, while the Trojan and Arcadian horse
To Pallantean towers direct their course,
In long procession rank'd ; the pious chief
Stopp'd in the rear, and gave a vent to grief.
" The public care," he said, " which war attends,
Diverts our present woes, at least suspends ;
Peace with the manes of great Pallas dwell ;
Hail, holy relics, and a last farewell !"
He said no more, but imly though he mourn'd,
Restrain'd his tears, and to the camp return'd.

Now suppliants, from Laurentum sent, demand
A truce, with olive branches in their hand.
Obtest his clemency, and from the plain
Beg leave to draw the bodies of their slain.
They plead, that none those common rites deny
To conquer'd foes, that in fair battle die.
All cause of hate was ended in their death ;
Nor could he war with bodies void of breath.
A king, they hop'd, would hear a king's request :
Whose son he once was call'd, and once his guest.
Their suit, which was too just to be deny'd,
The hero grants, and farther thus reply'd :
" O Latian princes, how severe a fate,
In causeless quarrels, has involv'd your state !
And arm'd against an unoffending man,
Who sought your friendship ere the war began !
You beg a truce, which I would gladly give,
Not only for the slain, but those who live.
I came not hither but by Heaven's command,
And sent by fate to share the Latian land.

Nor wage I wars unjust; your king deny'd
My proffer'd friendship, and my promis'd bride.
Left me for Turnus; Turnus then should try
His cause in arms, to conquer or to die.
My right and his are in dispute: the slain
Fell without fault, our quarrel to maintain.
In equal arms let us alone contend;
And let him vanquish, whom his fates befriend.
This is the way, so tell him, to possess
The royal virgin, and restore the peace.
Bear this my message back; with ample leave
That your slain friends may funeral-rites receive."

Thus having said, th' ambassadors, amaz'd,
Stood mute a while, and on each other gaz'd:
Drances, their chief, who harbour'd in his breast
Long hate to Turnus, as his foe profess,
Broke silence first, and to the godlike man,
With graceful action bowing, thus began:

"Auspicious prince, in arms a mighty name,
But yet whose actions far transcend your fame:
Would I your justice or your force express,
Thought can but equal; and all words are less:
Your answer we shall thankfully relate,
And favours granted to the Latian state:
If wish'd success your labour shall attend,
Think peace concluded, and the king your friend:
Let Turnus leave the realm to your command:
And seek alliance in some other land:
Build you the city which your fates assign:
We should be proud in the great work to join."
Thus Drances; and his words so well persuade
The rest impower'd, that soon a truce is made.
Twelve days the term allow'd: and during those,
Lations and Trojans, now no longer foes,
Mix'd in the woods, for funeral piles prepare,
To fell the timber, and forget the war.
Loud axes through the groaning groves resound:
Oak, mountain-ash, and poplar, spread the ground:
Fire fall from high: and some the trunks receive,
In loaden wains, with wedges some they cleave.

And now the fatal news by Fame is blown
Through the short circuit of th' Arcadian town,
Of Pallas slain: by Fame, which just before
His triumphs on distended pinions bore.
Rushing from out the gate, the people stand,
Each with a funeral flambeau in his hand:
Wildly they stare, distracted with amaze:
The fields are lighten'd with a fiery blaze,
That cast a sullen splendour on their friends
(The marching troop which their dread prince attends).

Both parties meet: they raise a doleful cry:
The matrons from the walls with shrieks reply:
And their mixt mourning rends the vaulted sky.
The town is fill'd with tumult and with tears,
Till the loud clamours reach Evander's ears;
Forgetful of his state, he runs along
With a disorder'd pace, and cleaves the throng:
Falls on the corpse, and groaning there he lies,
With silent grief, that speaks but at his eyes:
Short sighs and sobs succeed: till sorrow breaks
A passage, and at once he weeps and speaks.

"O Pallas! thou hast fail'd thy plighted word!
To fight with caution, not to tempt the sword,
I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew
What perils youthful ardour would pursue:
That boiling blood would carry thee to far:
Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
O curst essay of arms, disastrous doom,
Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come!

Hard elements of inauspicious war,
Vain vows to Heaven, and unavailing care!
Thrice happy thou, dear partner of my bed,
Whose holy soul the stroke of fortune sed:
Precursors of ill, and leaving me behind,
To drink the drags of life by fate assign'd.
Beyond the goal of nature I have gone;
My Pallas late set out, but reach'd too soon.
If, from my league against th' Ausonian state,
Amid their weapons I had found my fate,
(Deserv'd from them) then I had been return'd
A breathless victor, and my son had mourn'd.
Yet will not I my Trojan friend upbraid,
Nor grudge th' alliance I so gladly made.
'Twas not his fault my Pallas fell so young,
But my own crime for having liv'd too long.
Yet, since the gods had destin'd him to die,
At least he led the way to victory:
First for his friends he won the fatal shore,
And sent whole herds of slaughter'd foes before:
A death too great, too glorious to deplore.
Nor will I add new honours to thy grave;
Content with those the Trojan hero gave.
That funeral pomp thy Phrygian friends design'd:
In which the Tuscan chiefs and army join'd:
Great spoils, and trophies, gain'd by thee, they bear:

Then let thy own achievements be thy share.
Ev'n thou, O Turnus! hadst a trophy stood,
Whose mighty trunk had better grac'd the wood,
If Pallas had arriv'd, with equal length
Of years, to match thy bulk with equal strength.
But why, unhappy man, dost thou detain
These troops to view the tears thou shedd'st in vain!
Go, friends, this message to your lord relate;
Tell him, that if I bear my bitter fate,
And after Pallas' death, live lingering on,
'Tis to behold his vengeance for my son.
I stay for Turnus; whose devoted head
Is owing to the living and the dead:
My son and I expect it from his hand:
'Tis all that he can give, or we demand.
Joy is no more; but I would gladly go,
To greet my Pallas with such news below."

The morn had now dispell'd the shades of night:
Restoring toils, when she restor'd the light:
The Trojan king, and Tuscan chief, command
To raise the piles along the winding strand:
Their friends convey the dead to funeral fires;
Black smouldring smoke from the green wood er-
pires; [retires.

The light of Heaven is chok'd, and the new day
Then thrice around the kindled piles they go
(For ancient custom had ordain'd it so).
Thrice horse and foot about the fires are led,
And thrice with loud laments they hail the dead.
Tears trickling down their breasts bedew the
ground;
And drums and trumpets mix their mournful sound
Amid the blaze, their pious brethren thro'
The spoils, in battle taken from the foe;
Helms, bits embost, and swords of shining steel,
One casts a target, one a chariot-wheel:
Some to their fellows their own arms restore:
The falcions which in luckless fight they bore:
Their bucklers pierc'd, their darts bestow'd in
vain,
And shiver'd lances gather'd from the plain:
Whole herds of offer'd bulls about the fire,
And bristled boars, and woolly sheep, expir'd

Around the piles a careful troop attends,
To watch the wasting flames, and weep their burning friends.

Lingering along the shore, till dewy night
New decks the face of Heaven with starry light.

The conquer'd Latians, with like pious care,
Piles without number for their dead prepare;
Part, in the places where they fell are laid;
And part are to the neighbouring fields convey'd.
The corpse of kings, and captains of renown,
Borne off in state, are bury'd in the town:
The rest unhonour'd, and without a name,
Are cast a common heap, to feed the flame.
Trojans and Latians vie with like desires
To make the field of battle shine with fires;
And the promiscuous blaze to Heaven aspires.

Now had the morning thrice renew'd the light,
And thrice dispell'd the shadows of the night;
When those who round the wasted fires remain,
Perform the last sad office to the slain:
They rake the yet warm ashes from below;
These, and the bones unburn'd, in earth bestow:
These relics with their country-rites they grace;
And raise a mound of turf to mark the place.

But, in the palace of the king, appears
A scene more solemn, and a pomp of tears.
Maids, matrons, widows, mix their common moans:
Orphans their sires, and sires lament their sons.
All in that universal sorrow share,
And curse the cause of this unhappy war.

A broken league, a bride unjustly sought,
A crown usurp'd, which with their blood is brought!
These are the crimes, with which they load the
Of Turnus, and on him alone exclaim. [name

"Let him, who lords it o'er th' Ausonian land,
Engage the Trojan hero hand to hand:
His is the gain, our lot is but to serve:
Tis just, the sway he seeks, he should deserve."
This Drancoes aggravates; and adds, with spite,
His foe expects, and dares him to the fight.
Nor Turnus wants a party, to support
His cause and credit, in the Latian court.
His former acts secure his present fame;
And the queen shades him with her mighty name.

While thus their factious minds with fury burn;
The legates from th' Ætolian prince return:
Sad news they bring, that, after all the cost,
And care employ'd, their embassy is lost:
That Diomedes refus'd his aid in war;
Unmov'd with presents, and as deaf to prayer.
Some new alliance must elsewhere be sought;
Or peace with Troy on hard conditions bought.

Latius, sunk in sorrow, finds too late
A foreign son is pointed out by fate:
And still Æneas shall Lavinia wed,
The wrath of Heaven is hovering o'er his head.
The gods, he saw, espous'd the juster side,
When late their titles in the field were try'd:
Witness the fresh laments, and funeral tears un-dry'd.

Thus, full of anxious thought, he summons all
The Latian senate to the council-hall:
The princes come, commanded by their head,
And crowd the paths that to the palace lead.
Supreme in power, and reverence'd for his years,
He takes the throne, and in the midst appears:
Majestically sad, he sits in state,
And bids his envoys their success relate.

When Venulus began, the murmuring sound
Was hush'd, and sacred silence reign'd around.

"We have," said he, "perform'd your high com-
And pass'd with peril a long tract of land: [mand:
We reach'd the place desir'd, with wonder fill'd,
The Grecian tents and rising towers beheld.
Great Diomedes has compass'd round with walls
The city which Argypria he calls;

From his own Argos nam'd: we touch'd, with joy,
The royal hand that ras'd unhappy Troy.
When introduc'd, our presents first we bring,
Then crave an instant audience from the king:

His leave obtain'd, our native soil we name;
And tell th' important cause for which we came:
Attentively he heard us, while we spoke;
Then, with soft accents, and a pleasing look,
Made this return: 'Ausonian race, of old
Renown'd for peace, and for an age of gold,
What madness has your alter'd minds possess'd,
To change for war hereditary rest?

Solicit arms unknown, and tempt the sword
(A needless ill your ancestors abhorr'd).

We (for myself I speak, and all the name
Of Grecians, who to Troy's destruction came)
Omitting those who were in battle slain,
Or borne by rolling Simois to the main:
Not one but suffer'd, and too dearly bought
The prize of honour which in arms he sought,
Some doom'd to death, and some in exile driven,
Out-cast, abandon'd by the care of Heaven:
So worn, so wretched, so despis'd a crew,
As ev'n old Priam might with pity view.

Witness the vessels by Minerva tost
In storms, the vengeful Capharcean coast;
Th' Eubæan rocks; the prince, whose brother led
Our armies to revenge his injur'd bed,

In Egypt lost; Ulysses, with his men,
Have seen Charybdis, and the Cyclops' den:
Why should I name Idomeneus, in vain,
Restor'd to sceptres, and expell'd again?
Or young Achilles, by his rival slain?
Ev'n he, the king of men, the foremost name
Of all the Greeks, and most renown'd by fame,
The proud revenger of another's wife,
Yet by his own adulteress lost his life:

Fell at his threshold, and the spoils of Troy
The foul polluters of his bed enjoy.
The gods have envy'd me the sweets of life,
My much-lov'd country, and my more lov'd wife-
Banish'd from both, I mourn; while in the sky,
Transform'd to birds, my lost companions fly:
Hovering about the coasts they make their moan;
And cuff the cliffs with pinions not their own.

What squalid spectres, in the dead of night,
Break my short sleep, and skim before my sight?
I might have promis'd to myself those harms,
Mad as I was, when I with mortal arms
Presum'd against immortal powers to move,
And violate with wounds the queen of love.
Such arms this hand shall never more employ:
No hate remains with me to ruin'd Troy.

I war not with its dust; nor am I glad
To think of past events, or good or bad.
Your presents I return: whate'er you bring
To buy my friendship, send the Trojan king.
We met in fight, I know him to my cost;
With what a whirling force his lance he toss'd:
Heaven! what a spring was in his arm, to throw!
How high he held his shield, and rose at every blow!

Had Troy produc'd two more, his match in might,
They would have chang'd the fortune of the fight:

Th' invasion of the Greeks had been return'd:
 Our empire wasted, and our cities burn'd.
 The long defence the Trojan people made,
 The war protracted, and the siege delay'd,
 Were due to Hector's, and this hero's hand;
 Both brave alike, and equal in command:
 Æneas not inferior in the field,
 In pious reverence to the gods excell'd.
 Make peace, ye Latians, and avoid with care
 Th' impending dangers of a fatal war.
 He said no more; but, with this cold excuse,
 Refus'd th' alliance, and advis'd a truce."

Thus Venulus concluded his report.
 A jarring murmur fill'd the factious court:
 As when a torrent rolls with rapid force,
 And dashes o'er the stones that stop the course;
 The flood, constrain'd within a scanty space,
 Roars horrible along th' uneasy race:
 White foam in gathering eddies floats around:
 The rocky shores rebellow to the sound.

The murmur ceas'd: then from his lofty throne
 The king invok'd the gods, and thus begun:
 "I wish, ye Latins, what we now debate
 Had been resolv'd before it was too late:
 Much better had it been for you and me,
 Unforc'd by this our last necessity,
 To have been earlier wise: than now to call
 A council, when the foe surrounds the wall.
 O citizens, we wage unequal war,
 With men, not only Heaven's peculiar care,
 But Heaven's own race: unconquer'd in the field,
 Or, conquer'd, yet unknowing how to yield.
 What hopes you had in Diomede, lay down:
 Our hopes must centre on ourselves alone.
 Yet those how feeble, and, indeed, how vain,
 You see too well; nor need my words explain.
 Vanquish'd without resource; laid flat by fate,
 Factions within, a foe without the gate;
 Not but I grant, that all perform'd their parts,
 With manly force, and with undaunted hearts:
 With our united strength the war we wag'd;
 With equal numbers, equal arms, engag'd:
 You see th' event—Now hear what I propose,
 To save our friends, and satisfy our foes:
 A tract of land the Latins have possess'd
 Along the Tiber, stretching to the west,
 Which now Rutulians and Auruncans till;
 And their mixt cattle graze the fruitful hill;
 Those mountains sh'ld with firs, that lower land,
 If you consent, the Trojan shall command;
 Call'd into part of what is ours; and there,
 On terms agreed, the common country share.
 There let them build, and settle, if they please;
 Unless they choosee once more to cross the seas,
 In search of seats remote of Italy;
 And from unwelcome inmates set us free.
 Then twice ten gallees let us build with speed,
 Or twice as many more, if more they need;
 Materials are at hand: a well-grown wood
 Runs equal with the margin of the flood:
 Let them the number, and the form assign;
 The care and cost of all the stores be mine.
 To treat the peace, a hundred senators
 Shall be commission'd hence with ample powers:
 With olive crown'd: the presents they shall bear,
 A purple robe, a royal ivory chair;
 And all the marks of sway that Latian monarchs wear;
 And sums of gold. Among yourselves debate
 This great affair, and save the sinking state."

Then Drances took the word; who grudg'd long
 The rising glories of the Daunian prince. [since,
 Factious and rich, bold at the council-board,
 But cautious in the field, he shunn'd the sword;
 A close caballer, and tongue-valiant lord,
 Noble his mother was, and near the throne,
 But what his father's parentage, unknown.
 He rose, and took th' advantage of the times,
 To load young Turnus with invidious crimes.
 "Such truths, O king!" said he, "your words contain,
 As strike the sense, and all replies are vain:
 Nor are your loyal subjects now to seek
 What common needs require; but fear to speak,
 Let him give leave of speech, that haughty man,
 Whose pride this inauspicious war began:
 For whose ambition (let me dare to say,
 Fear set apart, though death is in my way)
 The plains of Latium run with blood around;
 So many valiant heroes bite the ground:
 Dejected grief in every face appears;
 A town in mourning, and a land in tears.
 While he, th' undoubted author of our harms,
 The man who menaces the gods with arms,
 Yet, after all his boasts, forsook the fight,
 And sought his safety in ignoble flight.
 "Now, best of kings, since you propose to send
 Such bounteous presents to your Trojan friend;
 Add yet a greater, at our joint request,
 One which he values more than all the rest:
 Give him the fair Lavinia for his bride:
 With that alliance let the league be ty'd;
 And for the bleeding land a lasting peace provide.
 Let insolence no longer awe the throne,
 But with a father's right bestow your own.
 For this maligner of the general good,
 If still we fear his force, he must be woo'd:
 His haughty godhead we with prayers implore,
 Your sceptre to release, and our just rights restore,
 O cursed cause of all our ills, must we
 Wage wars unjust, and fall in fight for thee!
 What right hast thou to rule the Latian state,
 And send us out to meet our certain fate?
 'Tis a destructive war: from Turnus' hand
 Our peace and public safety we demand.
 Let the fair bride to the brave chief remain;
 If not, the peace without the pledge is vain.
 Turnus, I know, you think me not your friend,
 Nor will I much with your belief contend:
 I beg your greatness not to give the law
 In other realms, but, beaten, to withdraw.
 Pity your own, or pity our estate;
 Nor twist our fortunes with your sinking fate.
 Your interest is, the war should never cease;
 But we have felt enough, to wish the peace:
 A land exhausted to the last remains,
 Depopulated towns, and driven plains.
 Yes, if desire of fame, and thirst of power,
 A beauteous princess, with a crown in dower,
 So fire your mind, in arms assert your right;
 And meet your foe, who dares you to the fight.
 Mankind, it seems, is made for you alone;
 We, but the slaves who mount you to the throne:
 A base ignoble crowd, without a name:
 Unwept, unworthy of the funeral flame:
 By duty bound to forfeit each his life,
 That Turnus may possess a royal wife.
 Permit not, mighty man, so mean a crew
 Should share such triumphs; and detain from you
 The post of honour, your undoubted due:

Rather alone your matchless force employ ;
To merit, what alone you must enjoy."

These words, so full of malice, mixt with art,
Inflam'd with rage the youthful hero's heart.
Then, groaning from the bottom of his breast,
He heav'd for wind, and thus his wrath express'd.
" You, Drances, never want a stream of words,
Then, when the public need requires our swords :
First in the council-hall to steer the state ;
And ever foremost in a tongue-debate.
While our strong walls secure us from our foe,
Ere yet with blood our ditches overflow :
But let the potent orator declaim,
And with the brand of coward blot my name ;
Free leave is given him, when his fatal hand
Has cover'd with more corpse the sanguine strand ;
And high as mine his towering trophies stand.
If any doubt remains who dares the most,
Let us decide it at the Trojan cost :
And issue both a-breast, where honour calls ;
Foes are not far to seek without the walls.
Unless his noisy tongue can only fight :
And set were given him but to speed his fight.
I beaten from the field ! I forc'd away !
Who, but so known a dastard, dares to say ?
Had he but ev'n beheld the fight, his eyes
Had witness'd for me what his tongue denies :
What heaps of Trojans by this hand were slain,
And how the bloody Tiber swell'd the main.
All saw, but he, th' Arcadian troops retire,
In scatter'd squadrons, and their prince expire.
The giant brothers, in their camp have found,
I was not forc'd with ease to quit my ground.
Not such the Trojans try'd me, when, enclos'd,
I singly their united arms oppos'd :
First forc'd an entrance through their thick array ;

Then, glutted with their slaughter, freed my way.
'Tis a destructive war ! So let it be,
But to the Phrygian pirate and to thee.
Meantime proceed to fill the people's ears
With false reports, their minds with panic fears :
Extol the strength of a twice-conquer'd race,
Our foes encourage, and our friends debase.
Believe thy fables, and the Trojan town
Triumphant stands, the Grecians are o'erthrown :
Suppliant at Hector's feet Achilles lies ;
And Diomed from fierce Æneas flies.
Say rapid Ausfidus, with awful dread,
Runs backward from the sea, and hides his head,
When the great Trojan on his bank appears :
For that's as true as thy dissembled fears
Of my revenge : dismiss that vanity ;
Thou, Drances, art below a death for me.
Let that vile soul in that vile body rest :
The lodging is well worthy of the guest.

" Now, royal father, to the present state
Of our affairs, and of this high debate ;
If in your arms thus early you decide,
And think your fortune is already try'd ;
If one defeat has brought us down so low,
As never more in fields to meet the foe ;
Then I conclude for peace : 'tis time to treat,
And lie like vassals at the victor's feet.
But oh, if any ancient blood remains,
One drop of all our fathers' in our veins :
That man will I prefer before the rest,
Who dar'd his death with an undaunted breast :
Who comely fell by no dishonest wound,
To shun that sight ; and dying gnaw'd the ground.

But, if we still have fresh recruits in store,
If our confederates can afford us more ;
If the contended field we bravely fought :
And not a bloodless victory was bought :
Their losses equal ours ; and for their slain,
With equal fires they fill'd the shining plain :
Why thus unforc'd should we so tamely yield ;
And, ere the trumpet sounds, resign the field ?
Good unexpected, evils unforeseen,
Appear by turns, as Fortune shifts the scene :
Some rais'd aloft, come tumbling down again ;
Then fall so hard, they bound and rise again.
If Diomed refuse his aid to lend,
The great Messapus yet remains our friend :
Tolumnius, who foretels events, is ours :
Th' Italian chiefs, and princes, join their powers :
Nor least in number, nor in name the last,
Your own brave subjects have our cause embrac'd,
Above the rest, the Volscian Amazon
Contains an army in herself alone :
And heads a squadron, terrible to sight,
With glittering shields, in brazen armour bright.
Yet if the foe a single fight demand,
And I alone the public peace withstand ;
If you consent, he shall not be refus'd,
Nor find a hand to victory unus'd.
This new Achilles let him take the field,
With fated armour, and Vulcanian shield ;
For you, my royal father, and my fame,
I, Turus, not the least of all my name,
Devote my soul. He calls me hand to hand,
And I alone will answer his demand.
Drances shall rest secure, and neither share
The danger, nor divide the prize of war."

While they debate ; nor these nor those will
Æneas draws his forces to the field ; [yield :
And moves his camp. The scouts with flying speed
Return, and through the frighted city spread.
Th' unpleasing news, the Trojans are descry'd
In battle marching by the river's side ;
And bending to the town. They take th' alarm,
Some tremble, some are bold, all in confusion arm.

Th' impetuous youth press forward to the field ;
They clash the sword, and clatter on the shield ;
The fearful matrons raise a screaming cry ;
Old feeble men with fainter groans reply ;
A jarring sound results, and mingles in the sky,
Like that of swans remurmuring to the floods,
Or birds of differing kinds in hollow woods.
Turnus th' occasion takes, and cries aloud,
" Talk on, ye quaint haranguers of the crowd ;
Declaim in praise of peace, when danger calls ;
And the fierce foes in arms approach the walls."
He said, and, turning short, with speedy pace,
Casts back a scornful glance, and quits the place.

" Thou, Volusus, the Volscian troops command
To mount ; and lead thyself our Ardean band.
Messapus, and Catillus, post your force
Along the fields, and charge the Trojan horse.
Some guard the passes, others man the wall ;
Drawn up in arms, the rest attend my call."

They swarm from every quarter of the town ;
And with disorder'd haste the rampires crown.
Good old Latinus, when he saw, too late,
The gathering storm, just breaking on the state,
Dismiss'd the council, till a fitter time,
And own'd his easy temper as his crime :
Who, forc'd against his reason, had comply'd
To break the treaty for the promis'd bride.

Some help to sink new trenches, others aid
To ram the stones, or raise the palisade,
Hoarse trumpets sound th' alarm: around the walls
Runs a distracted thrw, whom their last labour
A sad procession in the streets is seen, [calls.
Of matrons that attend the mother-queen:
High in the chair she sits, and at her side,
With down-cast eyes, appears the fatal bride.
They mount the cliff, where Pallas' temple stands:
Prayers in their mouths, and presents in their hands;

With censers, first they fume the sacred shrine;
Then in this common supplication join:
"O patroness of arms, unspotted maid,
Propitious hear, and lend thy Latins aid:
Break short the pirate's lance; pronounce his fate,
And lay the Phrygian low before the gate."
Now Turnus arms for fight: his back and breast,
Well-temper'd steel and scaly brass invest:
The cushions, which his brawny thighs enfold,
Are mingled metal damask'd o'er with gold.
His faithful falchion sits upon his side;
Nor casque, nor crest, his manly features hide;
But bare to view amid surrounding friends,
With godlike grace, he from the tower descends.
Exulting in his strength, he seems to dare
His absent rival, and to promise war.

Freed from his keepers, thus, with broken
reins,
The wanton courser prances o'er the plains:
Or in the pride of youth o'erleaps the mounds;
And snuffs the females in the forbidden grounds.
Or seeks his watering in the well-known flood,
To quench his thirst, and cool his fiery blood:
He swims luxuriant in the liquid plain,
And o'er his shoulder flows his waving mane:
He neighs, he snorts, he bears his head on high;
Before his ample chest the frothy waters fly.

Soon as the prince appears without the gate,
The Volscians, and their virgin-leader, wait
His last commands. Then, with a graceful mein,
Lights from her lofty steed the warrior queen:
Her squadron imitates, and each descends;
Whose common suit Camilla thus commends:
"If sense of honour, if a soul secure
Of inborn worth, that can all tests endure,
Can promise aught; or on itself rely,
Greatly to dare, to conquer, or to die:
Then I alone, sustain'd by these, will meet
The Tyrrhene troops, and promise their defeat.
Ours be the danger, ours the sole renown;
You, general, stay behind, and guard the town."
Turnus a while stood mute, with glad surprise;
And on the fierce virago fix'd his eyes:
Then thus return'd: "O grace of Italy,
With what becoming thanks can I reply!
Not only words lie labouring in my breast;
But thought itself is by thy praise oppress;
Yet rob me not of all, but let me join
My toils, my hazard, and my fame, with thine.
The Trojan (not in stratagem unskill'd)
Sends his light horse before, to scour the field:
Himself, through steep ascents and thorny brakes,
A larger compass to the city takes.
This news my scouts confirm: and I prepare
To foil his cunning, and his force to dare:
With chosen foot his passage to forelay:
And place an ambush in the winding way.
Thou, with thy Volscians, face the Tuscan horse:
The brave Messapus shall thy troops enforce;

With those of Tibur; and the Latian band
Subjected all to thy supreme command."

This said, he warns Messapus to the war:
Then every chief exhorts, with equal care.
All thus encourag'd, his own troops he joins,
And hastes to prosecute his deep designs.

Enclos'd with hills, the winding valley lies,
By nature form'd for fraud, and fitted for surprise:
A narrow track, by human steps untrude,
Leads, through perplexing thorns, to this obscure abode.

High o'er the vale a steepy mountain stands:
Whence the surveying sight the nether ground com-
The top is level: an offensive seat [mands,
Of war; and from the war a safe retreat.
For, on the right and left, is room to press
The foes at hand, or from afar distress:
To drive them headlong downward; and to pour,
On their descending backs, a stony shower.
Thither young Turnus took the well-known way;
Possess'd the pass, and in blind ambush lay.

Meantime, Latonian Phoebe, from the skies,
Beheld th' approaching war with hateful eyes,
And call'd the light-foot Opis to her aid,
Her most belov'd, and ever-trusty maid.
Then with a sigh began: "Camilla goes
To meet her death, amidst her fatal foes:
The nymph I lov'd of all my mortal train;
Invested with Diana's arms, in vain.
Nor is my kindness for the virgin, new,
'Twas born with her, and with her years it grew:
Her father Metabus, when forc'd away
From old Privernum, for tyrannic sway,
Snatch'd up, and sav'd from his prevailing foe,
This tender babe, companion of his woes;
Casmilla was her mother; but he drown'd
One hissing letter in a softer sound,
And call'd Camilla. Through the woods he flies;
Wrapt in his robe the royal infant lies.

His foes in sight, he mends his weary pace;
With shouts and clamours they pursue the chase:
The banks of Amasone at length he gains;
The raging flood his farther flight restrains:
Rais'd o'er the borders with unusual rains.
Prepar'd to plunge into the stream, he fears:
Not for himself, but for the charge he bears.
Anxious he stops a while; and thinks in haste;
Then, desperate in distress, resolves at last.
A knotty lance of well-boil'd oak he bore;
The middle part with cork he cover'd o'er:
He clos'd the child within the hollow space:
With twigs of bending osier bound the case.
Then pois'd the spear, heavy with human weights
And thus invoc'd my favour for the freight:
"Accept, great goddess of the woods," he said,
"Sent by her sire, this dedicated maid:
Through air she flies a suppliant to thy shrine;
And the first weapons that she knows, are thine."
He said; and with full force the spear he threw;
Above the sounding waves Camilla flew.
Then, prest with foes, he stemm'd the stormy tide;
And gain'd by stress of arms, the farther side.
His fasten'd spear he pull'd from out the ground;
And, victor of his vows, his infant nyctoph unbound,
Nor after that, in towns which walls enclose,
Would trust his hunted life amidst his foes.
But rough, in open air he chose to lie:
Earth was his couch, his covering was the sky.
On hills unshorn, or in a desert den,
He shunn'd the dire society of men,

A shepherd's solitary life he led ;
 His daughter with the milk of mares he fed ;
 The dugs of bears, and every savage beast,
 He drew, and through her lip the liquor press'd.
 The little Amazon could scarcely go,
 He loads her with a quiver and a bow :
 And, that she might her staggering steps command,
 He with a slender javelin fills her hand :
 Her flowing hair no golden fillet bound ;
 Nor swept her trailing robe the dusty ground.
 Instead of these, a tiger's hide o'erspread
 Her back and shoulders, fasten'd to her head.
 The flying dart she first attempts to fling ;
 And round her tender temples toss'd the sling :
 Then, as her strength with years increas'd, began
 To pierce aloft in air the soaring swan ;
 And from the clouds to fetch the heron and the crane.

The Tuscan matrons with each other vy'd
 To bless their rival sons with such a bride :
 But she disdains their love, to share with me
 The sylvan shades, and vow'd virginity.
 And oh ! I wish, contented with my cares
 Of savage spoils, she had not sought the wars :
 Then had she been of my celestial train ;
 And shunn'd the fate that dooms her to be slain.
 But since, opposing Heaven's decree, she goes
 To find her death among forbidden foes ;
 Haste with these arms, and take thy steepy flight,
 Where, with the gods adverse, the Latins fight :
 This bow to thee, this quiver, I bequeath,
 This chosen arrow to revenge her death :
 By whate'er hand Camilla shall be slain,
 Or of the Trojan, or Italian train,
 Let him not pass unpunish'd from the plain.
 Then, in a hollow cloud, myself will aid,
 To bear the breathless body of my maid :
 Unspoil'd shall be her arms, and unprophan'd
 Her holy limbs with any human hand :
 And in a marble tomb laid in her native land."
 She said : the faithful nymph descends from high
 With rapid flight, and cuts the sounding sky :
 Black clouds and stormy winds around her body fly.

By this the Trojan and the Tuscan horse,
 Drawn up in squadrons, with united force,
 Approach the walls ; the sprightly coursers bound ;
 Press forward on their bits, and shift their ground :
 Shields, arms, and spears, flash horrible from far ;
 And the fields glitter with a waving war.
 Oppos'd to these, come on with furious force
 Messapus, Coras, and the Latian horse :
 These in a body plac'd : on either hand
 Sustain'd, and clos'd by fair Camilla's blast.
 Advancing in a line, they couch their spears ;
 And less and less the middle space appears,
 Thick smoke obscures the field : and scarce are seen
 The neighing coursers, and the shouting men.
 In distance of their darts they stop their course ;
 Then man to man they rush, and horse to horse.
 The face of Heaven their flying javelins hide :
 And deaths unseen are dealt on either side.
 Tyrrhenus, and Aconteus, void of fear,
 By mettled coursers borne in full career,
 Meet first oppos'd : and, with a mighty shock,
 Their horses' heads against each other knock.
 Far from his steed is fierce Aconteus cast :
 As with an engine's force, or lightning's blast ;
 He rolls along in blood, and breathes his last.
 The Latin squadrons take a sudden fright ; [fight.
 And sling their shields behind, to save their backs in

Spurring at speed to their own walls they drew ;
 Close in the rear the Tuscan troops pursue,
 And urge their flight ; Asylas leads the chase ;
 Till seiz'd with shame they wheel about, and face
 Receive their foes, and raise a threatening cry.
 The Tuscans take their turn to fear, and fly.

So swelling surges, with a thundering roar,
 Driven on each other's backs, insult the shore ;
 Bound o'er the rocks, incroach upon the land ;
 And far upon the beach eject the sand.
 Then, backward, with a swing, they take their way ;
 Repuls'd from upper ground, and seek their mother-
 With equal hurry quit th' invaded shore ; [sea :
 And swallow back the sand and stones they spew'd
 before.

Twice were the Tuscans masters of the field,
 Twice by the Latins, in their turn repell'd.
 Asham'd at length, to the third charge they ran,
 Both hosts resolv'd, and mingled man to man :
 Now dying groans are heard, the fields are strow'd
 With fallen bodies, and are drunk with blood :
 Arms, horses, men, on heaps together lie :
 Confus'd the fight, and more confus'd the cry.
 Orsilochus, who durst not press too near
 Strong Remulus, at distance drove his spear ;
 And struck the steel beneath his horse's ear.
 The fiery steed, impatient of the wound,
 Curvets, and, springing upward with a bound,
 His hopeless lord cast backward on the ground.
 Catillus pierc'd Iolas first ; then drew
 His reeking lance, and at Herminius threw :
 The mighty champion of the Tuscan crew.
 His neck and throat unarm'd, his head was bare,
 But shaded with a length of yellow hair :
 Secure, he fought, expos'd on every part,
 A spacious mark for swords, and for the flying
 dart :

Across the shoulders came the feather'd wound ;
 Transfixt, he fell, and doubled to the ground.
 The sands with streaming blood are sanguine dy'd ;
 And death with honour sought on either side.

Resistless, through the war, Camilla rode :
 In danger unappall'd, and pleas'd with blood.
 One side was bare for her exerted breast ;
 One shoulder with her painted quiver prest.
 Now from afar her fatal javelins play ;
 Now with her axe's edge she hews her way ;
 Diana's arms upon her shoulder sound ;
 And when, too closely prest, she quits the ground,
 From her bent bow she sends a backward wound.
 Her maids, in martial pomp, on either side,
 Larina, Tulla, fierce Tarpeia ride :
 Italians all : in peace, their queen's delight ;
 In war, the bold companions of the fight.

So march'd the Thracian Amazons of old,
 When Thermodon with bloody billows roll'd ;
 Such troops as these in shining arms were seen,
 When Theseus met in fight their maiden queen,
 Such to the field Penthesilea led,
 From the fierce virgin when the Grecians fled ;
 With such, return'd triumphant from the war,
 Her maids with cries attend the lofty car :
 They clash with manly force their moony shields
 With female shouts resound the Phrygian fields.
 Who foremost, and who last, heroic maid,
 On the cold earth were by thy courage laid ?
 Thy spear, of mountain ash, Eumenius first,
 With fury driven, from side to side transpierc'd ;
 A purple stream came spouting from the wound ;
 Bath'd in his blood he lies, and bites the ground.

Confus'd in flight, they bear each other down,
 And spur their horses headlong to the town.
 Driven by their foes, and to their fears resign'd,
 Not once they turn; but take their wounds behind.
 These drop the shield, and those the lance forego;
 Or on their shoulders bear the slacken'd bow.
 The hoofs of horses, with a rattling sound,
 Beat short and thick, and shake the rotten ground.
 Black clouds of dust come rolling in the sky,
 And o'er the darken'd walls and rampires fly.
 The trembling matrons, from their lofty stands,
 Read Heaven with female shrieks, and wring their hands.

All pressing on, pursuers and pursued,
 Are crush'd in crowds, a mingled multitude.
 Some happy few escape: the throng too late
 Rush on for entrance, till they choke the gate.
 Ev'n in the sight of home, the wretched sire
 Looks on, and sees his helpless son expire.
 Then, in a fright, the folding gates they close:
 But leave their friends excluded with their foes.
 The vanquish'd cry; the victors loudly shout;
 'Tis terror all within; and slaughter all without.
 Blind in their fear, they bounce against the wall,
 Or, to the moats pursu'd, precipitate their fall.

The Latian virgins, valiant with despair,
 Arm'd on the towers, the common danger share:
 So much of zeal their country's cause inspir'd;
 So much Camilla's great example fir'd.
 Poles, sharpen'd in the flames, from high they
 With imitated darts, to gall the foe; [throw,
 Their lives, for godlike freedom they bequeath,
 And crowd each other to be first in death.
 Meantime to Turnus, ambush'd in the shade,
 With heavy tidings, came th' unhappy maid.
 The Volscians overthrow'n, Camilla kill'd,
 The foes entirely masters of the field,
 Like a resistless flood, come rolling on:
 The cry goes off the plain, and thickens to the Inflam'd with rage, (for so the furies fire [town.
 The Daunian's breast, and so the fates require,)
 He leaves the billy pass, the woods in vain
 Possess'd, and downward issues on the plain:
 Scarce was he gone, when to the straits, now freed

From secret foes, the Trojan troops succeed.
 Through the black forest, and the ferny brake,
 Unknowingly secure, their way they take.
 From the rough mountains to the plain descend,
 And there, in order drawn, their line extend.
 Both armies, now, in open fields are seen:
 Nor far the distance of the space between.
 Both to the city bend: Æneas sees,
 Through smoking fields, his hastening enemies.
 And Turnus, views the Trojans in array,
 And hears th' approaching horses proudly neigh.
 Soon had their hosts in bloody battle join'd;
 But westward to the sea the Sun declin'd.
 Intrench'd before the town, both armies lie:
 While night, with sable wings, involves the sky.

THE TWELFTH BOOK OF
 THE ÆNEIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

TURNUS challenges ÆNEAS to a single combat articles are agreed on, but broken by the Rutuli:

who wound Æneas: he is miraculously cured by Venus, forces Turnus to a duel, and concludes the poem with his death.

WHEN Turnus saw the Latins leave the field,
 Their armies broken, and their courage quell'd;
 Himself become the mark of public spite,
 His honour question'd for the promis'd fight:
 The more he was with vulgar hate oppress'd,
 The more his fury boil'd within his breast:
 He rous'd his vigour for the late debate;
 And rais'd his haughty soul, to meet his fate.
 As when the swains the Libyan lion chase,
 He makes a sour retreat, nor wounds his pace:
 But if the pointed javelin pierce his side,
 The lordly beast returns with double pride:
 He wrenches out the steel, he roars for pain;
 His sides he lashes, and erects his mane:
 So Turnus fares; his eyeballs flash with fire,
 Through his wide nostrils clouds of smoke expire.

Trembling with rage, around the court he rang
 At length approach'd the king, and thus began:
 "No more excuses or delays: I stand
 In arms prepar'd to combat, hand to hand,
 This base deserter of his native land.
 The Trojan by his word, is bound to take
 The same conditions which himself did make,
 Renew the truce, the solemn rites prepare,
 And to my single virtue trust the war.
 The Latians, unconcern'd, shall see the fight;
 This arm, unaided, shall assert your right:
 Then, if my prostrate body press the plain,
 To him the crown and beautiful bride remain."

To whom the king sedately thus reply'd:
 "Brave youth, the more your valour has been try'd,
 The more becomes it us, with due respect,
 To weigh the chance of war, which you neglect.
 You want not wealth, or a successive throne,
 Or cities, which your arms have made your own;
 My town and treasures are at your command;
 And stor'd with blooming beauties is my land:
 Laurentum more than one Lavinia sees,
 Unmarry'd, fair, of noble families.
 Now let me speak, and you with patience hear,
 Things which perhaps may grate a lover's ear:
 But sound advice, proceeding from a heart
 Sincerely yours, and free from fraudulent art.

"The gods, by signs, have manifestly shown,
 No prince, Italian born, should heir my throne:
 Oft have our augurs, in prediction skill'd,
 And oft our priests, a foreign son reveal'd.
 Yet, won by worth, that cannot be withstood,
 Bribe'd by my kindness to my kindred blood,
 Urg'd by my wife, who would not be deny'd,
 I promis'd my Lavinia for your bride;
 Her from her plighted lord by force I took;
 All ties of treaties and of honour broke:
 On your account I wag'd an impious war,
 With what success 'tis needless to declare;
 I and my subjects feel; and you have had your share.

Twice vanquish'd, while in bloody fields we strive,
 Scarce in our walls we keep our hopes alive:
 The rolling flood runs warm with human gore;
 The bones of Latians glance the neighbouring shore;
 Why put I not an end to this debate,
 Still unresolv'd, and still a slave to fate?

If Turnus' death a lasting peace can give,
Why should not I procure it whilst you live?
Should I to doubtful arms your youth betray;
What would my kinsmen, the Rutulians, say?
And should you fall in fight, (which Heaven defend)

How curse the cause, which hasten'd to his end,
The daughter's lover, and the father's friend!
Weigh in your mind the various chance of war,
Pity your parent's age and ease his care."

Such balmy words he pour'd, but all in vain;
The proffer'd medicine but provok'd the pain.
The wrathful youth, disdainin' the relief,
With intermitting sobs, thus vents his grief:
"Thy care, O best of fathers, which you take
For my concerns, at my desire forsake.

Permit me not to languish out my days;
But make the best exchange of life for praise.
This arm, this lance, can well dispute the prize;
And the blood follows, where the weapon flies:
His goddess mother is not near, to shrowd
The flying coward with an empty cloud."

But now the queen, who fear'd for Turnus' life,
And loath'd the hard conditions of the strife,
Held him by force; and, dying in his death,
In these sad accents gave her sorrow breath:
"O Turnus, I adjure thee by these tears;

And whate'er price Amata's honour bears
Within thy breast, since thou art all my hope,
My sickly mind's repose, my sinking age's prop;
Since on the safety of thy life alone

Depends Latinus, and the Latian throne:
Refuse me not this one, this only prayer,
To wave the combat, and pursue the war.

Whatever chance attends this fatal strife,
Think it concludes in thine Amata's life:
I cannot live a slave; or see my throne
Usurp'd by strangers, or a Trojan son."

At this a flood of tears Lavinia shed;
A crimson blush her beauteous face o'erspread,
Varying her cheeks by turns with white and red.
The driving colours, never at a stay,
Run here and there, and flush, and fade away.
Delightful change! thus Indian ivory shows,
Which with the bordering paint of purple glows;
Or lilies damask'd by the neighbouring rose.

The lover gaz'd, and, burning with desire,
The more he look'd, the more he fed the fire:
Revenge, and jealous rage, and secret spite,
Roll in his breast, and rouse him to the fight.

Then fixing on the queen his ardent eyes,
Firm to his first intent, he thus replies:
"O, mother, do not, by your tears, prepare
Such boding omens, and prejudice the war.
Resolv'd on fight, I am no longer free
To shun my death, if Heaven my death decree."

Then, turning to the herald, thus pursues;
"Go, greet the Trojan with ungrateful news;
Denounce from me, that when to morrow's light
Shall gild the heavens, he need not urge the fight:
The Trojan and Rutulian troops no more
Shall dye, with mutual blood, the Latian shore:
Our single swords the quarrel shall decide,
And to the victor be the beauteous bride."

He said, and striding on, with speedy pace
He sought his coursers of the Thracian race.
At his approach, they toss their heads on high;
And, proudly neighing, promise victory.
The sires of these Orithia sent from far,
To grace Pylumnus, when he went to war.

The drifts of Thracian snows were scarce so white,
Nor northern winds in fleetness match'd their sight.

Officious groups stand ready by his side;
And some with combs their flowing manes divide;
And others stroke their chests, and gently soothe their pride.

He sheath'd his limbs in arms; a temper'd mass
Of golden metal those, and mountain brass.
Then to his head his glittering helm he try'd;
And girt his faithful falchion by his side.
In his Ætnean forge, the god of fire
That falchion labour'd for the hero's sire:
Immortal keenness on the blade bestow'd,
And plung'd it hissing in the Stygian flood.
Propp'd on a pillar, which the cieling bore,
Was plac'd the lance, Auruncan Actor wore:
Which with such force he bran lish'd in his hand,
The tough ash trembled like an osier wand.
Then cry'd, "O ponderous spoil of Actor slain,
And never yet by Turnus tost in vain,
Fail not, this day, thy wouled force: but go;
Sent by this hand, to pierce the Trojan foe:
Give me to tear his corslet from his breast,
And from that eunuch head, to rend the crest:
Dragg'd in the dust, his frizzled hair to soil,
Hot from the vexing irn, and smear'd with fragrant oil."

Thus while he raves, from his wide nostrils flies
A fiery steam, and sparkles from his eyes.
So fares the ball in his lov'd female's sight;
Proudly he bellows, and preludes the fight:
He tries his going horns against a tree;
And meditates his absent enemy:

He pushes at the winds, he digs the strand
With his black hoofs, and spurs the yellow sand.

Nor less the Trojan, in his Lemnian arms,

To future fight his manly courage warms:
He whets his fury, and with joy prepares
To terminate at once the lingering wars.
To cheer his chiefs, and tender son, relates
What Heaven had promis'd, and expounds the
Then to the Latian king he sends, to cease [fates.
The rage of arms, and satisfy the peace.

The morn, ensuing from the mountain's height,
Had scarcely spread the skies with rosy light;
Th' ethereal coursers, bounding from the sea,
From out their flaming nostrils breath'd the day:
When now the Trojan and Rutulian guard,
In friendly labour join'd, the list prepar'd.
Beneath the walls, they measure out the space;
Then sacred altars rear, on sods of grass;
Where, with religious rites, their common gods
they place.

In purest white the priests their heads attire,
And living waters bear, and holy fire:
And o'er their linen hoods, and shaded hair,
Long twisted wreaths of sacred vervain wear.

In on'er issuing from the town appears
The La'in legion, arm'd with pointed spears;
And from the fields, advancing on a line,
The Trojan and the Tuscan forces join;
Their various arms afford a pleasing sight: [fight.
A peaceful train they seem, in peace prepar'd for

Betwixt the ranks the proud commanders ride,
Glittering with gold, and vests in purple dy'd.
Here Mneætheus, author of the Memnian line,
And there Messapus born of seed divine.
The sign is given, and round the listed space.
Each man in order fills his proper place.

Reclining on their ample shields, they stand ;
And fix their pointed lances in the sand.
Now, studious of the sight, a numerous throng
Of either sex promiscuous, old and young,
Swarm from the town : by those who rest behind,
The gates and walls, and houses' tops are lin'd.

Meantime the queen of Heaven beheld the sight,

With eyes unpleas'd, from Mount Albano's height :
(Since call'd Albano, by succeeding fame,
But then an empty hill, without a name)
She thence survey'd the field, the Trojan powers,
The Latian squadrons, and Laurentine towers.
Then thus the goddess of the skies bespake,
With sighs and tears, the goddess of the lake ;
King Turnus' sister, once a lovely maid,
Ere to the lust of lawless Jove betray'd,
Comprest by force, but by thy grateful god,
Now made the Nais of the neighbouring flood.

" O nymph, the pride of living lakes," said she,
" O most renown'd, and most belov'd by me,
Long hast thou known, nor need I to record
The wanton sallies of my wandering lord :
Of every Latian fair, whom Jove misled,
To mount by stealth my violated bed,
To thee alone I grudg'd not his embrace ;
But gave a part of Heaven, and an unenvy'd place.
Now learn from me thy near approaching grief,
Nor think my wishes want to thy relief.
While fortune favour'd, nor Heaven's king deny'd,
To lend my succour to the Latian side,
I sav'd thy brother, and the sinking state ;
But now he struggles with unequal fate ;
And goes with gods averse, o'ermatch'd in might,
To meet inevitable death in fight :
Nor must I break the truce, nor can sustain the sight.

Thou, if thou dar'st, thy present aid supply ;
It well becomes a sister's care to try."

At this the lovely nymph, with grief oppress,
Thrice tore her hair, and beat her comely breast.
To whom Saturnia thus ; " Thy tears are late :
Haste, snatch him, if he can be snatch'd, from fate.
New tumults kindle, violate the truce ;
Who knows what changeful fortune may produce ?
'Tis not a crime t' attempt what I decree,
Or, if it were, discharge the crime on me."
She said, and, sailing on the winged wind,
Left the sad nymph suspended in her mind.

And now in pomp the peaceful kings appear :
Four steeds the chariot of Latinus bear :
Twelve golden beams around his temples play,
To mark his lineage from the god of day.
Two snowy coursers Turnus' chariot yoke,
And in his hand two massy spears he shook :
Then issued from the car, in arms divine,
Æneas, author of the Roman line :
And by his side Ascanius took his place,
The second hope of Rome's immortal race.
Adorn'd in white, a reverend priest appears ;
And offerings to the flaming altars bears ;
A porket, and a lamb, that never suffer'd shears.
Then to the rising Sun he turns his eyes,
And shows the beasts design'd for sacrifice,
With salt and meal : with like officious care
He marks their foreheads, and he clips their hair,
Betwix their horns the purple wine he sheds,
With the same generous juice the flame he feeds.
Æneas then unsheath'd his shining sword,
And thus with pious prayers the gods ador'd :

" Allseeing Sun, and thou Ausonian soil,
For which I have sustain'd so long a toil,
Thou king of Heaven, and thou the queen of air,
(Propitious now, and reconcil'd by prayer)
Thou god of war, whose unresisted sway
The labours and events of arms obey ;
Ye living fountains, and ye running floods,
All powers of ocean, all ethereal gods,
Hear, and bear record : if I fall in field,
Or recreant in the fight, to Turnus yield,
My Trojans shall increase Evander's town ;
Ascanius shall renounce th' Ausonian crown :
All claims, all questions of debate shall cease ;
Nor he, nor they, with force infringe the peace.
But if my juster arms prevail in fight
As sure they shall, if I divine aright,
My Trojans shall not o'er th' Italians reign :
Both equal, both unconquer'd, shall remain :
Join'd in their laws, their lands, and their abodes ;
I ask but altars for my weary gods.
The care of those religious rites be mine :
The crown to king Latinus I resign ;
His be the sovereign sway. Nor will I share
His power in peace, or his command in war.
For me, my friends another town shall frame,
And bless the rising towers, with fair Lavinia's
name."

Thus he. Then, with erected eyes and hands,
The Latian king before his altar stands. [main,
" By the same Heaven," said he, " and earth, and
And all the powers, that all the three contain ;
By Hell below, and by that upper god,
Whose thunder signs the peace, who seals it with
So let Latona's double offspring bear, [his nod ;
And double-fronted Janus what I swear :
I touch the sacred altars, touch the flames,
And all those powers attest, and all their names :
Whatever chance befall on either side,
No term of time this union shall divide :
No force, no fortune, shall my vows unbind,
Or shake the stedfast tenour of my mind :
Not though the circling seas should break their bound,

O'erflow the shores, or sap the solid ground :
Not though the lamps of Heaven their spheres
Hurl'd down, and hissing in the nether lake : [sake,
Ev'n as this royal sceptre (for he bore
A sceptre in his hand) shall never more
Shoot out in branches, or renew the birth ;
(An orphan now, cut from the mother earth
By the keen axe, dishonour'd of its hair,
And cas'd in brass, for Latian kings to bear)."

When thus in public view the peace was ty'd
With solemn vows, and sworn on either side,
All dues perform'd which holy rites require ;
The victim beasts are slain before the fire :
The trembling entrails from their bodies torn,
And to the fatten'd flames in chargers borne.
Already the Rutulians deem their man
O'ermatch'd in arms, before the fight began.
First risinz fears are whisper'd through the crowd ;
Then, gathering sound, they murmur more aloud.
Now side to side, they measure with their eyes
The champions' bulk, their sinews, and their size ;
The nearer they approach, the more is known
Th' apparent disadvantage of their own.
Turnus himself appears in public sight
Conscious of fate, desponding of the fight.
Slowly he moves ; and at his altar stands
With eyes dejected, and with trembling hands :

And, while he mutters undistinguish'd prayers,
A livid deadness in his cheeks appears.

With anxious pleasure when Juturna view'd
Th' increasing fright of the mad multitude;
When their short sighs and thickening sobs she heard,

And found their ready minds for change prepar'd;
Dissembling her immortal form, she took
Camertus' mien, his habit, and his look,
A chief of ancient blood: in arms well known
Was his great sire, and he, his greater son.
His shape assum'd, amid the ranks she ran,
And, humouring their first motions, thus began:

“ For shame, Rutulians, can you bear the sight
Of one expos'd for all, in single fight?
Can we, before the face of Heaven, confess
Our courage colder, or our numbers less?
View all the Trojan host, th' Arcadian band,
And Tuscan army; count them as they stand:
Undaunted to the battle if we go,
Scarce every second man will share a foe.
Turnus, 'tis true, in this unequal strife
Shall lose, with honour, his devoted life:
Or change it rather for immortal fame,
Succeeding to the gods, from whence he came:
But you, a servile, and inglorious band,
For foreign lords shall sow your native land:
Those fruitful fields, your fighting fathers gain'd,
Which have so long their lazy sons sustain'd.”

With words like these, she carry'd her design;
A rising murmur runs along the line.
Then ev'n the city troops, and Latins, tir'd
With tedious war, seem with new souls inspir'd:
Their champion's fate with pity they lament;
And of the league, so lately sworn, repent.

Nor fails the goddess to foment the rage
With lying wonders, and a false presage:
But adds a sign, which, present to their eyes,
Inspires new courage, and a glad surprise.
For, sudden, in the fiery tracts above,
Appears in pomp th' imperial bird of Jove:
A plump of fowl he spies, that swim the lakes;
And o'er their heads his sounding pinions shakes.
Then stooping on the fairest of the train,
In his strong talons truss'd a silver swan.
Th' Italians wonder at th' unusual sight;
But while he lags, and labours in his flight,
Behold the dastard fowl return anew;
And with united force the foe pursue:
Clamorous around the royal hawk they fly;
And thickening in a cloud, o'er shade the sky.
They cuff, they scratch, they cross their airy
course;

Nor can th' encumber'd bird sustain their force:
But vex'd, not vanquish'd, drops the ponderous
And, lighten'd of his burden, wings his way. [prey;
Th' Ausonian bands with shouts salute the sight:
Eager of action, and demand the fight.
Then king Tolumnius, vers'd in augurs' arts,
Cries out, and thus his boasted skill imparts:
“ At length 'tis granted, what I long desir'd;
This, this is what my frequent vows requir'd.
Ye gods, I take your omen, and obey:
Advance, my friends, and charge; I lead the way.
These are the foreign foes, whose impious band,
Like that rapacious bird, infest our land:
But soon, like him, they shall be forc'd to sea
By strength united, and forego the prey;
Yours timely succour to your country bring;
Haste to the rescue, and redeem your king.”

He said: and pressing onward, through the crew,
Pois'd in his lifted arm, his lance he threw.
The winged weapon, whistling in the wind,
Came driving on, nor miss'd the mark design'd.
At once the cornel rattled in the skies;
At once tumultuous shouts and clamours rise.
Nine brothers in a goodly band there stood,
Born of Arcadian mix'd with Tuscan blood:
Gylippus' sons: the fatal javelin flew,
Aim'd at the midmost of the friendly crew.
A passage through the jointed arms is found,
Just where the belt was to the body bound,
And struck the gentle youth extended on the
ground.

Then, fir'd with pious rage, the generous train
Run madly forward to revenge the slain.
And some with eager haste their javelins throw;
And some with sword in hand assault the foe.

The wish'd insult the Latin troops embrace;
And meet their ardour in the middle space.
The Trojans, Tuscans, and Arcadian line,
With equal courage obviate their design.
Peace leaves the violated fields; and hate
Both armies urges to their mutual fate.
With impious haste their altars are o'erturn'd,
The sacrifice half broil'd, and half-unburn'd.
Thick storms of steel from either army fly,
And clouds of clashing darts obscure the sky:
Brands from the fire are missive weapons made:
With chargers, bows, and all the priestly trade.
Latinus, frighted, hastens from the fray,
And bears his unregarded gods away.

'These on their horses vault, those yoke the car;
The rest, with swords on high, run headlong to the Messapus, eager to confound the peace, [war.

Spurr'd his hot courser through the fighting press,
At king Aulestes: by his purple known
A Tuscan prince, and by his regal crown;
And with a shock encountering, bore him down.
Backward he fell; and, as his fate design'd,
The ruins of an altar were behind:
There pitching on his shoulders, and his head,
Amid the scattering fires he lay supinely spread.
The beamy spear descending from above,
His cuirass pierc'd, and through his body drove.
Then, with a scornful smile, the victor cries;
“ The gods have found a fitter sacrifice.”
Greedy of spoils, th' Italians strip the dead
Of his rich armour, and uncrown his head.

Priest Choroineus arm'd his better hand,
From his own altar, with a blazing brand:
And, as Ebusus with a thundering pace,
Advanc'd to battle, dash'd it on his face:
His bristly beard shines out with sudden fires,
The crackling crop a noisome scent expires.
Following the blow, he seiz'd his curling crown
With his left hand; his other cast him down.
The prostrate body with his knees he press'd,
And plung'd his holy poinard in his breast.

While Podalirius, with his sword, pursued
The shepherd Alpas through the flying crowd,
Swiftly he turns, and aims a deadly blow,
Full on the front of his unwary foe.
The broad axe enters with a crashing sound,
And cleaves the chin with one continued wound:
Warm blood, and mingled brains, besmear his arms
As iron sleep his stupid eyes oppress'd, [around.
And seal'd their heavy lids in endless rest.
But good Æneas rush'd amid the bands,
Bare was his head, and naked were his hands,

In sign of truce: then thus he cries aloud,
 "What sudden rage, what new desire of blood
 Inflames your alter'd minds? O Trojans, cease
 From impious arms, nor violate the peace.
 By human sanctions, and by laws divine,
 The terms are all agreed, the war is mine.
 Dismiss your fears, and let the fight ensue;
 This hand alone shall right the gods and you:
 Our injur'd altars, and their broken vow,
 To this avenging sword the faithless Turnus owe."

Thus while he spoke, unmindful of defence,
 A winged arrow struck the pious prince,
 But whether from some human hand it came,
 Or hostile god, is left unknown by fame:
 No human hand, or hostile god was found,
 To boast the triumph of so base a wound.

When Turnus saw the Trojan quit the plain,
 His chiefs dismay'd, his troops a fainting train:
 Th' unhop'd event his heighten'd soul inspires,
 At once his arms and coursers he requires.
 Then, with a leap, his lofty chariot gains,
 And with a ready hand assumes the reins
 He drives impetuous, and where'er he goes.
 He leaves behind a lane of slaughter'd foes.
 These his lance reaches, over those he rolls
 His rapid car, and crushes out their souls:
 In vain the vanquish'd fly; the victor sends
 The dead mens' weapons at their living friends.

Thus on the banks of Hebrus' freezing flood
 The god of battles, in his angry mood,
 Clashing his sword against his brazen shield,
 Let loose the reins, and scours along the field:
 Before the wind his fiery coursers fly,
 Groans the sad earth, resounds the rattling sky.
 Wrath, terror, treason, tumult, and despair,
 Dire faces, and deform'd, surround the car:
 Friends of the god, and followers of the war.

With fury not unlike, nor less disdain,
 Exulting Turnus flies along the plain:
 His smoking horses, at their utmost speed,
 He lashes on; and urges o'er the dead. [bound,
 And when they, and their fetlocks run with blood;
 The gore, and gathering dust, are dash'd around.
 Thamyris and Pholus, masters of the war,
 He kill'd at hand, but Stelenus afar:
 From far the sons of Imbracus he slew,
 Glaucus, and Iades, of the Lycian crew:
 Both taught to fight on foot, in battle join'd;
 Or mount the courser that out-strips the wind.

Meantime Eumedes, vaunting in the field,
 New fir'd the Trojans, and their foes repell'd.
 This son of Dolon bore his grandsire's name;
 But emulated more his father's fame.
 His guileful father, sent a nightly spy,
 The Grecian camp and order to descry:
 Hard enterprise, and well he might require
 Achilles' car, and horses for his hire;
 But, met upon the scout, th' Etolian prince
 In death bestow'd a just recompense.

Fierce Turnus view'd the Trojan from afar;
 And launch'd his javelin from his lofty car:
 Then lightly leaping down, pursu'd the blow,
 And, pressing with his foot his prostrate foe,
 Wrench'd from his feeble hold the shining sword;
 And plung'd it in the bosom of his lord.
 "Possess, said he, the fruit of all thy pains,
 And measure, at thy length, our Latian plains.
 Thus are my foes rewarded by my hand,
 Thus may they build their town, and thus enjoy the laud.

Then Daris, Butis, Sybaris, he slew,
 Whom o'er his neck the floundering courser threw.
 As when loud Boreas, with his blustering train,
 Stoops from above, incumbent on the main;
 Where'er he flies, he drives the rack before,
 And rolls the billows on the Ægran shore:
 So where resistless Turnus takes his course,
 The scatter'd squadrons bend before his force:
 His crest of horses' hair is blown behind,
 By adverse air, and rustles in the wind.

This haughty Phegeus saw with high disdain,
 And as the chariot roll'd along the plain,
 Light from the ground he leapt, and seiz'd the reins.
 Thus hung in air, he still retain'd his hold;
 The coursers frighted, and their course control'd,
 The lance of Turnus reach'd him as he hung,
 And pierc'd his plated arms; but pass'd along,
 And only raz'd the skin: he turn'd, and held
 Against his threatening foe his ample shield;
 Then call'd for aid: but, while he cry'd in vain,
 The chariot bore him backward on the plain.
 He lies revers'd; the victor-king descends,
 And strikes so justly where his helmet ends,
 He lops the head. The Latian fields are drunk,
 With streams that issue from the bleeding trunk.

While he triumphs, and while the Trojans
 yield,

The wounded prince is forc'd to leave the field:
 Strong Mnestheus and Achates often try'd,
 And young Ascanius weeping by his side,
 Conduct him to his tent: scarce can he rear
 His limbs from earth, supported on his spear.
 Resolv'd in mind, regardless of the smart,
 He tugs with both his hands, and breaks the dart.
 The steel remains. No readier way he found
 To draw the weapon, than t' enlarge the wound.
 Eager of fight, impatient of delay,
 He begs; and his unwilling friends obey.

Iäpis was at hand to prove his art,
 Whose blooming youth so fir'd Apollo's heart,
 That for his love he proffer'd to bestow:
 His tuneful harp, and his unerring bow:
 The pious youth, more studious how to save
 His aged sire, now sinking to the grave,
 Preferr'd the power of plants, and silent praise
 Of healing arts, before Phœbeian bays.

Propp'd on his lance the pensive hero stood,
 And heard, and saw unmov'd, the mourning crowd.
 The fam'd physician tucks his robes around
 With ready hands, and hastens to the wound.
 With gentle touches he performs his part,
 This way and that, soliciting the dart,
 And exercises all his heavenly art.
 All soft'ning simples, known of sovereign use,
 He presses out, and pours their noble juice;
 These first infus'd, to lenify the pain,
 He tugs with pincers, but he tugs in vain.
 Then to the patron of his art he pray'd;
 The patron of his art refus'd his aid.

Meantime the war approaches to the tents:
 Th' alarm grows hotter, and the noise augments:
 The driving dust proclaims the danger near,
 And first their friends, and then their foes appear:
 Their friends retreat, their foes pursue the rear.
 The camp is fill'd with terror and affright;
 The hissing shafts within the trench alight;
 An undistinguish'd noise ascends the sky; [die.
 The shouts of those who kill, and groans of those who
 But now the goddess-mother mov'd with grief,
 And pierc'd with pity, postens her relief.

A branch of healing dittany she brought,
Which in the Cretan fields with care she sought ;
Rough is the stem, which woolly leaves surround ;
The leaves with flowers, the flowers with purple
crown'd :

Well known to wounded goats ; a sure relief
To draw the pointed steel, and ease the grief.
This Venus brings, in clouds involv'd ; and brews
Kib' extracted liquor with ambrosial dews,
And odorous panacee : unseen she stands,
Tempering the mixture with her heavenly hands :
And pours it in a bowl, already crown'd
With juice of med'c'nal herbs prepar'd to bathe
the wound.

The leech, unknowing of superior art,
Which aids the cure, with this fomenta the part,
And in a moment ceas'd the raging smart.
Stanch'd is the blood, and in the bottom stands :
The steel, but scarcely touch'd with tender hands,
Moves up, and follows of its own accord ;
And health and vigour are at once restor'd.
Iäpis first perceiv'd the closing wound ;
And first the footsteps of a god he found.
" Arms, arms," he cries, " the sword and shield
prepare,

And I send the willing chief, renew'd to war.
This is no mortal work, no cure of mine,
Nor art's effect, but done by hands divine :
Some god our general to the battle sends ;
Some god preserves his life for greater ends."

The hero arms in haste : his hands unfold
His thighs with cushions of refulgent gold :
Inflam'd to fight, and rushing to the field,
That hand sustaining the celestial shield,
This gripes the lance ; and with such vigour shakes,

That to the rest the beamy weapon quakes.
Then, with a close embrace, he strain'd his son ;
And, kissing through his helmet, thus begun :
" My son, from my example learn the war,
In camps to suffer, and in fields to dare :
But happier chance than mine attend thy care !
This day my hand thy tender age shall shield,
And crown with honours of the conquer'd field :
Thou, when thy riper years shall send thee forth,
To toils of war, be mindful of my worth,
Assert thy birthright ; and in arms be known,
For Hector's nephew, and Æneas' son."

He said ; and, striding, issued on the plain ;
Anteus, and Mnætheus, and a numerous train,
Attend his steps : the rest their weapons take,
And, crowding to the field, the camp forsake.
A cloud of blinding dust is rais'd around ;
Labouring beneath their feet the trembling ground.

Now Turnus, posted on a hill, from far
Beheld the progress of the moving war :
With him the Latins view'd the cover'd plains ;
And the chill blood ran backward in their veins.
Juturna saw th' advancing troops appear ;
And heard the hostile sound, and fled for fear.
Æneas leads ; and draws a sweeping train,
Clor'd in their ranks, and pouring on the plain.
As when a whirlwind, rushing to the shore,
From the mid ocean drives the waves before :
The painful hind, with heavy heart, foresees
The flatted fields, and slaughter of the trees ;
With such impetuous rage the prince appears,
Before his double front ; nor less destruction bears.
And now both armies shock, in open field ;
Osyris is by strong Thymbræus kill'd.

Archætius, Ufens, Epulon, are slain
(All fam'd in arms, and of the Latian train) ;
By Gyas, Mnætheus, and Achates' hand :
The fatal augur falls, by whose command
The truce was broken, and whose lance embrown'd
With Trojan blood, th' unhappy fight renew'd.
Loud shouts and clamours rend the liquid sky ;
And o'er the field the frighted Latins fly.
The prince disdains the dastards to pursue,
Nor moves to meet in arms the fighting few ;
Turnus alone, amid the dusky plain,
He seeks, and to the combat calls in vain.
Juturna heard, and, seiz'd with mortal fear,
Forc'd from the beam her brother's charioteer ;
Assumes his shape, his armour, and his mien ;
And like Metiscus in his seat is seen.

As the black swallow near the palace plies ;
O'er empty courts and under arches flies ;
Now hawks aloft, now skims along the flood,
To furnish her loquacious nest with food :
So drives the rapid goddess o'er the plains ;
The smoking horses run with loosen'd reins.
She steers a various course among the foes ;
Now here, now there, her conquering brother shows :

Now with a straight, now with a wheeling flight,
She turns, and bends, but shuns the single fight.
Æneas, fir'd with fury, breaks the crowd,
And seeks his foe, and calls by name aloud ;
He runs within a narrower ring, and tries
To stop the chariot ; but the chariot flies.
If he but gain a glimpse, Juturna fears,
And far away the Daunian hero bears.

What should he do ? Nor arts nor arms avail ;
And various cares in vain his mind assail ;
The great Messapus thundering through the field,
In his left hand two pointed javelins held :
Encountering on the prince, one dart he drew,
And with unerring aim and utmost vigour threw.
Æneas saw it come, and stooping low
Beneath his buckler, shunn'd the threatening blow.
The weapon hiss'd above his head, and tore
The waving plume, which on his helm he wore.
Forc'd by this hostile act, and seiz'd with spite,
That flying Turnus still declin'd the fight :
The prince, whose piety had long repell'd
His inborn ardour, now invades the field :
Invokes the powers of violated peace,
Their rites and injur'd altars to redress :
Then, to his rage abandoning the rein,
With blood and slaughter'd bodies fills the plain.

What god can tell, what numbers can display,
The various labours of that fatal day ?
What chiefs and champions fell on either side,
In combat slain, or by what deaths they dy'd ?
Whom Turnus, whom the Trojan hero kill'd :
Who shar'd the fame and fortune of the field ?
Jove, could'st thou view, and not avert thy sight,
Two jarring nations join'd in cruel fight,
Whom leagues of lasting love so shortly shall unite ?
Æneas first Rutulian Sucro found,
Whose valour made the Trojans quit their ground.
Betwixt his ribs the javelin drove so just,
It reach'd his heart, nor needs a second thrust.
Now Turnus, at two blows, two brethren slew ;
First from his horse fierce Amicus he threw ;
Then leaping on the ground, on foot assail'd
Diores, and in equal fight prevail'd.
Their lifeless trunks he leaves upon the place ;
Their heads, distilling gore, his chariot grace.

Three cold on earth the Trojan hero threw ;
Whom without respite at one charge he slew :
Cethegus, Tanais, Tagus, fell oppress
And sad Onythes, added to the rest :
Of Theban blood, whom Perida bore.
Turnus two brothers from the Lycian shore,
And from Apollo's fane to battle sent,
O'erthrew, nor Phœbus could their fate prevent.
Peaceful Moments after these he kill'd,
Who long had shunn'd the dangers of the field :
On Lerna's lake a silent life he led,
And with his nets and angle earn'd his bread.
Nor pompous cares, nor palaces he knew,
But wisely from th' infectious world withdrew.
Poor was his house ; his father's painful hand
Discharg'd his rent, and plough'd another's land.

As flames among the lofty woods are thrown,
On different sides, and both by winds are blown,
The laurels crackle in the sputtering fire ;
The frighted sylvans from their shades retire :
Or as two neighbouring torrents fall from high,
Rapid they run ; the foamy waters fry :
They roll to sea, with unresisted force,
And down the rocks precipitate their course :
Not with less rage the rival heroes take
Their different ways ; nor less destruction make.
With spears afar, with swords at hand they strike,
And zeal of slaughter fires their souls alike.
Like them, their dauntless men maintain the field,
And hearts are pierc'd unknowing how to yield :
They blow for blow return, and wound for wound ;
And heaps of bodies raise the level ground.

Murranus, boasting of his blood, that springs
From a long royal race of Latin kings,
Is by the Trojan from his chariot thrown,
Crush'd with the weight of an unwieldy stone :
Betwixt the wheels he fell ; the wheels that bore
His living load, his dying body tore.
His starting steeds, to shun the glittering sword,
Paw down his trampled limbs, forgetful of their lord.

Fierce Hillus threaten'd high ; and face to face
Affronted Turnus in the middle space :
The prince encounter'd him in full career,
And at his temples aim'd the deadly spear :
So fatally the flying weapon sped,
That through his brazen helm it pierc'd his head.
Nor, Cisseus, could'st thou 'scape from Turnus'
In vain the strongest of the Arcadian band : [hand,
Nor to Cupentus could his gods afford
Availing aid against th' Ænean sword :
Which to his naked heart pursued the course :
Nor could his plated shield sustain the force.

Iolus fell, whom not the Grecian powers,
Nor great subverter of the Trojan towers, [date:
Were doom'd to kill, while Heaven prolong'd his
But who can pass the bounds prefix by fate ?
In high Lyrnessus, and in Troy, he held
Two palaces, and was from each expell'd :
Of all the mighty man, the last remains
A little spot of foreign earth contains.

And now both hosts their broken troops unite,
In equal ranks, and mix in mortal fight.
Sceresthus and undaunted Mnestheus join
The Trojan, Tuscan, and Arcadian line :
Sea-born Messapus, with Atinas, heads
The Latin squadrons, and to battle leads.
They strike, they push, they throng the scanty space ;

Resolv'd on death, impatient of disgrace ;
And where one falls, another fills his place.

The Cyprian goddess now inspires her son
To leave th' unfinish'd fight, and storm the town ;
For, while he rolls his eyes around the plain,
In quest of Turnus, whom he seeks in vain,
He views th' unguarded city from afar,
In careless quiet, and secure of war :
Occasion offers, and excites his mind,
To dare beyond the task he first design'd.
Resolv'd, he calls his chiefs ; they leave the fight ;
Attended thus, he takes a neighbouring height :
The crowding troops about their general stand,
All under arms, and wait his high command.
Then thus the lofty prince : " Hear and obey,
Ye Trojan bands, without the least delay.
Jove is with us, and what I have decreed
Requires our utmost vigour, and our speed.
Your instant arms against the town prepare :
The source of mischief, and the seat of war.
This day the Latian towers, that mate the sky,
Shall level with the plain in ashes lie :
The people shall be slaves, unless in time
They kneel for pardon, and repeat their crime.
Twice have our foes been vanquish'd on the plain ;
Then shall I wait till Turnus will be slain ?
Your force against the perjurd city bend :
There it began, and there the war shall end.
The peace profan'd our rightful arms requires.
Cleanse the polluted place with purging fires."

He finish'd ; and, one soul inspiring all,
Form'd in a wedge, the foot approach the wall.
Without the town, an unprovided train
Of gaping, gazing citizens are slain.
Some firebrands, others scaling ladders, bear ;
And those they toss aloft, and these they rear :
The flames now launch'd, the feather'd arrows fly,
The clouds of missive arms obscure the sky.
Advancing to the front, the hero stands,
And, stretching out to Heaven his pious hands,
Attests the gods, asserts his innocence,
Upbraids with breach of faith th' Ausonian prince :
Declares the royal honour doubly stain'd,
And twice the rites of holy peace profan'd.
Dissenting clamours in the town arise ;
Each will be heard, and all at once advise.
One part for peace, and one for war contends :
Some would exclude their foes, and some admit their friends.

The helpless king is hurry'd in the throng,
And, whate'er tide prevails, is borne along.

Thus, when the swain, within a hollow rock,
Invades the bees with suffocating smoke,
They run around, or labour on their wings,
Disus'd to flight ; and shoot their sleepy stings ;
To shun the bitter fumes, in vain they try ;
Black vapours, issuing from the vent, involve the sky.

But fate, and envious fortune, now prepare
To plunge the Latins in the last despair.
The queen, who saw the foes invade the town,
And brands on tops of burning houses thrown ;
Cast round her eyes, distracted with her fear ;
No troops of Turnus in the field appear.
Once more she stares abroad, but still in vain ;
And then concludes the royal youth is slain.
Mad with her anguish, impotent to bear
The mighty grief, she loaths the vital air.
She calls herself the cause of all this ill,
And owns the dire effects of her ungovern'd will :
She raves against the gods, she beats her breast,
She tears with both her hands her purple vest ;

Then round a beam a running noose she ty'd,
And, fasten'd by the neck, obscenely dy'd.
Soon as the fatal news by Fame was blown,
And to her dames and to her daughter known;
The sad Lavinia reads her yellow hair,
And rosy cheeks; the rest her sorrow share:
With shrieks the palace rings, and madness and despair.

The spreading rumour fills the public place;
Confusion, fear, distraction, and disgrace,
And silent shame, are seen in every face.
Latinus tears his garments as he goes,
Both for his public and his private woes:
With filth his venerable beard besmears,
And sordid dust deforms his silver hairs.
And much he blames the softness of his mind,
Obnoxious to the charms of womankind, [sign'd:
And soon reduc'd to change, what he so well de-
'To break the solemn league so long desir'd,
Nor finish what his fates, and those of Troy, requir'd.

Now Turnus rolls aloof o'er empty plains,
And here and there some straggling foes he gleans.
His flying coursers please him less and less,
Asham'd of easy fight, and cheap success.
Thus half contented, anxious in his mind,
The distant cries come driving in the wind;
Shouts from the walls, but shouts in murmurs
A jarring mixture, and a boding sound. [drown'd:
"Alas!" said he, "what mean these dismal cries?
What doleful clamours from the town arise?"
Confus'd he stops, and backward pulls the reins:
She, who the driver's office now sustains,
Replies: "Neglect, my lord, these new alarms;
Here fight, and urge the fortune of your arms:
There want not others to defend the wall,
If by your rival's hand th' Italians fall.
So shall your fatal sword his friends oppress,
In honour equal, equal in success."

To this, the prince: "O sister! (for I knew
The peace infrin'g'd, proceeded first from you)
I knew you when you mingled first in fight,
And now in vain you would deceive my sight:
Why, goddess, this unprofitable care?
Who sent you down from Heaven, involv'd in air?
Your share of mortal sorrows to sustain,
And see your brother bleeding on the plain?
For to what power can Turnus have recourse,
Or how resist his fate's prevailing force?
These eyes beheld Murranus bite the ground.
Mighty the man, and mighty was the wound.
I heard my dearest friend, with dying breath,
My name invoking to revenge his death:
Brave Ufens fell with honour on the place:
To shun the shameful sight of my disgrace.
On earth supine, a manly corpse he lies:
His vest and armour are the victor's prize.
Then shall I see Laurentum in a flame,
Which only wanted to complete my shame?
How will the Latins hoot their champion's flight!
How Drances will insult, and point them to the sight!

Is death so hard to bear? Ye gods below,
(Since those above so small compassion show)
Receive a soul unsully'd yet with shame,
Which not belies my great forfather's name."

He said: and while he spoke, with flying speed,
Came Sages, urging on his foamy steed;
Fixt on his wounded face a shaft he bore,
And, seeking Turnus, sent his voice before:

"Turnus, on you, on you alone depends
Our last relief; compassionate your friends.
Like lightning, fierce Æneas, rolling on,
With arms invests, with flames invades the town:
The brands are toss'd on high: the winds conspire
To drive along the deluge of the fire:
All eyes are fixt on you; your foes rejoice;
Ev'n the king staggers, and suspends his choice.
Doubts to deliver, or defend the town;
Whom to reject, or whom to call his son.
The queen, on whom your utmost hopes were plac'd,
Herself suborning death, has breath'd her last.
'Tis true, Messapus, fearless of his fate,
With fierce Atinas' aid, defends the gate:
On every side surrounded by the foe;
The more they kill, the greater numbers grow;
An iron harvest mounts, and still remains to mow.
You, far aloof from your unshaken bands,
Your rolling chariot drive o'er empty sands."
Stupid he sat, his eyes on earth declin'd,
And various cares revolving in his mind:
Rage, boiling from the bottom of his breast,
And sorrow, mixt with shame, his soul oppress'd;
And conscious worth lay labouring in his thought:
And love, by jealousy, to madness wrought.
By slow degrees his reason drove away
The mists of passion, and resum'd her sway.
Then, rising on his car, he turn'd his look,
And saw the town involv'd in fire and smoke.
A wooden tower with flames already blaz'd,
Which his own hands on beams and rafters rais'd;
And bridges laid above to join the space;
And wheels below to roll from place to place.
"Sister, the fates have vanquish'd: let us go
The way which Heaven and my hard fortune show.
The fight is fixt: nor shall the branded name
Of a base coward blot your brother's fame.
Death is my choice: but suffer me to try
My force, and vent my rage before I die."
He said, and, leaping down, without delay,
Thro' crowds of scatter'd foes he freed his way.
Striding, he pass'd, impetuous as the wind,
And left the grieving goddess far behind.
As when a fragment from a mountain torn
By raging tempests, or by torrents borne,
Or sapp'd by time, or loosen'd from the roots,
Prone through the void the rocky ruin shoots,
Rolling from crag to crag, from steep to steep;
Down sink at once, the shepherds and their sheep;
Involv'd alike, they rush to nether ground,
Stunn'd with the shock, they fall, and stunn'd from earth rebound:

So Turnus, hasting headlong to the town,
Shouldering and shoving, bore the squadrons down.
Still pressing onward, to the walls he drew,
Where shafts, and spears, and darts, promiscuous
flew;

And sanguine streams the slippery ground embrus.
First stretching out his arm, in sign of peace,
He cries aloud, to make the combat cease:
"Rutulians, hold, and Latin troops, retire;
The fight is mine, and me the gods require.
'Tis just that I should vindicate alone
The broken truce, or for the breach atone.
This day shall free from wars th' Ausonian state;
Or finish my misfortunes in my fate."

Both armies from their bloody work desist:
And, bearing backward, form a spacious list.
The Trojan hero, who receiv'd from fame
The welcome sound, and heard the champion's name

Now stern Eneas waves his weighty spear
Against his foe, and thus upbraids his fear:
"What farther subterfuge can Turnus find?
What empty hopes are harbour'd in his mind?
'Tis not thy swiftness can secure thy flight:
Not with thy feet, but hands, the valiant fight.
Vary thy shape in thousand forms, and dare
What skill and courage can attempt in war:
Wish for the wings of wind to mount the sky;
Or bid within the hollow Earth to lie."
The champion shook his head, and made this short reply:

"No threats of thine my manly mind can move:
'Tis hostile Heaven I dread; and partial Jove."
He said no more; but, with a sigh, repress'd
The mighty sorrow in his swelling breast.
Then, as he roll'd his troubled eyes around,
An antique stone he saw; the common bound
Of neighbouring fields, and barrier of the ground:
So vast, that twelve strong men of modern days
Th' enormous weight from earth could hardly raise.
He heav'd it at a lift: and, pois'd on high,
Ran, staggering on, against his enemy.
But so disorder'd, that he scarcely knew
His way; or what unwieldy weight he threw.
His knocking knees are bent beneath the load;
And shivering cold congeals his vital blood.
The stone drops from his arms; and falling short,
For want of vigour, unocks his vain effort.
And as, when heavy sleep has clos'd the sight,
The sickly fancy labours in the night:
We seem to run; and destitute of force,
Our sinking limbs forsake us in the course:
In vain we heave for breath; in vain we cry:
The nerves unbrac'd their usual strength deny,
And on the tongue the faltering accents die:
So Turnus far'd, whatever means he try'd,
All force of arms, and points of art employ'd,
The fury flew athwart, and made th' endeavour void.

A thousand various thoughts his soul confound:
He star'd about; nor aid nor issue found:
His own men stop the pass, and his own walls surround.

Once more he pauses, and looks out again;
And seeks the goddess charioteer in vain.
Trembling, he views the thundering chief advance,
And brandishing aloft the deadly lance:
Amaz'd he cowers beneath his conquering foe,
Forgets to ward, and waits the coming blow.
Astonish'd while he stands, and fixt with fear,
Aim'd at his shield he sees th' impending spear.
The hero measur'd first, with narrow view,
Th' destin'd mark: and, rising as he threw,
With its full swing the fatal weapon flew.
Not with less rage the rattling thunder falls,
Or stones from battering engines break the walls:
Swift as a whirlwind, from an arm so stroug,
The lance drove on; and bore the death along.
Nought could his seven-fold shield the prince avail,
Nor aught beneath his arms the coat of mail;
It pierc'd through all; and, with a grisly wound,
Transfix'd his thigh, and doubled him to ground.
With groans the Latins rend the vaulted sky:
Woods, hills, and valleys, to the voice reply.

Now low on earth the lofty chief is laid,
With eyes cast upwards, and with arms display'd;
And recreate thus to the proud victor pray'd:
"I know my death deserv'd, nor hope to live:
Cae what the gods and thy good fortune give.

Yet think; oh think, if mercy may be shown,
(Thou hadst a father once, and hadst a son):
Pity my sire, now sinking to the grave;
And, for Anchises' sake, old Daunus save!
Or, if they vow'd revenge, pursue my death;
Give to my friends my body void of breath!
The Latian chiefs have seen me beg my life;
Thine is the conquest, thine the royal wife;
Against a yielded man, 'tis mean ignoble strife."

In deep suspense the Trojan seem'd to stand;
And, just appear'd to strike, repress'd his hand.
He roll'd his eyes, and every moment felt
His manly soul with more compassion melt.
When, casting down a casual glance, he spy'd
The golden belt that glitter'd on his side:
The fatal spoils which haughty Turans tore
From dying Pallas, and in triumph wore.
Then, rous'd anew to wrath, he loudly cries (Flames, while he spoke, came flashing from his eyes);

"Traitor; dost thou, dost thou to grace pretend,
Clad, as thou art, in trophies of my friend?
To his sad soul a grateful offering go;
'Tis Pallas, Pallas gives this deadly blow."
He rais'd his arm aloft; and at the word,
Deep in his bosom drove the shining sword.
The streaming blood stain'd his arms around,
And the disdainful soul came rushing through the
wound.

POSTSCRIPT.

WHAT Virgil wrote in the vigour of his age, in plenty and at ease, I have undertaken to translate in my declining years: struggling with wants, oppressed with sickness, curbed in my genius, liable to be misconstrued in all I write; and my judges, if they are not very equitable, already prejudiced against me, by the lying character which has been given them of my morals. Yet, steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties; and, in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the public, when I undertook this work. In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty Power, the assistance he has given me in the beginning, the prosecution, and conclusion of my present studies, which are more happily performed, than I could have promised to myself, when I laboured under such discouragements. For what I have done, imperfect as it is, for want of health and leisure to correct it, will be judged in after-ages, and possibly in the present, to be no dishonour to my native country; whose language and poetry would be more esteemed abroad, if they were better understood. Somewhat (give me leave to say) I have added to both of them, in the choice of words, and harmony of numbers, which were wanting, especially the last, in all our poets, even in those who, being endued with genius, yet have not cultivated their mother-tongue with sufficient care; or, relying on the beauty of their thoughts, have judged the ornament of words, and sweetness of sound, unnecessary. One is for raking in Chancer (our English Eonius) for antiquated words, which are never to be revived, but when sound or significance is wanting in the present language. But many of his deserve not this redemption, say more than the crowds of men who daily die, or are slain for sixpence in a battle, merit to be restored to life, if a wish could revive them. Others have no ear for verse, nor choice of words, nor distinction of thoughts; but mingle farthings with their gold to make up the sum. Here is a field of satire opened to me: but, since the Revolution, I have wholly renounced that talent. For who would give physic to the great, when he is uncalled, to do his patient no good, and endanger himself for his prescription? Neither am I ignorant, but I may justly be condemned for many of those faults, of which I have too liberally arraigned others.

Cynthia aurem vellit, & admonuit.

It is enough for me, if the government will let me pass unquestioned. In the mean time, I am obliged, in gratitude, to return my thanks to many of them, who have not only distinguished me from others of the same party, by a particular exception of grace; but, without considering the man, have been bountiful to the poet: have encouraged Virgil to speak such English as I could teach him, and reward his interpreter, for the pains he has taken, in bringing him over into Britain, by defraying the charges of his voyage. Even Cerberus, when he had received the sop, permitted Æneas to pass freely to Elysium. Had it been offered me, and I had refus'd it, yet still some gratitude is due to such who were willing to oblige me. But how much more to those from whom I have received the favours which they have offered to one of a different persuasion? amongst whom I cannot omit naming the earls of Derby and of Peterborough. To the first of these, I have not the honour to be known; and therefore his liberality was as much unexpected, as it was undeserved. The present earl of Peterborough has been pleased long since to accept the tenders of my service: his favours are so frequent to me, that I receive them almost by prescription. No difference of interests or opinion have been able to withdraw his protection from me: and I might justly be condemned for the most unthankful of mankind, if I did not always preserve for him a most profound respect and inviolable gratitude. I must also add, that if the last Æneid shine among its fellows, it is owing to the commands of sir William Trumball, one of the principal secretaries of state, who recommended it, as his favourite, to my care; and, for his sake particularly, I have made it mine. For who would confess weariness, when he enjoyed a fresh labour? I could not but invoke the assistance of a Muse, for this last office.

*Extremum hunc Arethusa:—
Negat quis carmina Gallo?*

Neither am I to forget the noble present which was made me by Gilbert Dolben, esq. the worthy son of the late archbishop of York; who, when I began this work, enriched me with all the several editions of Virgil, and all the commentaries of those editions in Latin; amongst which, I could not but prefer the Dauphine's, as the last, the shortest, and the most judicious. Fabrini I had also sent me from Italy; but either he understands Virgil but very imperfectly, or I have no knowledge of my author.

Being invited, by that worthy gentleman sir William Bowyer, to Denham-court, I translated the first Georgic at his house, and the greatest part of the last Æneid. A more friendly entertainment no man ever found. Nor wonder, therefore, if both those versions surpass the rest, and own the satisfaction I received in his converse, with whom I had the honour to be bred in Cambridge, and in the same college. The seventh Æneid was made English at Burleigh, the magnificent abode of the earl of Exeter: in a village belonging to his family I was born, and under his roof I endeavoured to make that Æneid appear in English with as much lustre as I could: though my author has not given the finishing strokes either to it, or to the eleventh, as I perhaps could prove in both, if I durst presume to criticise my master.

By a letter from William Walsh, of Abberly, esq. (who has so long honoured me with his friendship, and who, without flattery, is the best critic of our nation) I have been informed, that his grace the duke of Shrewsbury has procured a printed copy of the Pastorals, Georgics, and six first Æneids, from my bookseller, and has read them in the country, together with my friend. This noble person having been pleased to give them a commendation, which I presume not to insert; has made me vain enough to boast of so great a favour, and to think I have succeeded beyond my hopes; and the character of his excellent judgment, the acuteness of his wit, and his general knowledge of good letters, being known as well to all the world, as the sweetness of his disposition, his humanity, his easiness of access, and desire of obliging those who stand in need of his protection, are known to all who have approached him; and to me in particular, who have formerly had the honour of his conversation. Whoever has given the world the translation of part of the third Georgic, which he calls The Power of Love, has put me to sufficient pains to make my own not inferior to his: as my lord Roscommon's Silenus had formerly given me the same trouble. The most ingenious Mr. Addison, of Oxford, has also been as troublesome to me as the other two, and on the same account. After his bees, my latter swarm is scarcely worth the hiving. Mr. Cowley's Praise of a Country Life is excellent; but is rather an imitation of Virgil, than a version. That I have recovered in some measure the health which I had lost by too much application to this work, is owing, next to God's mercy, to the skill and care of Dr. Guibbons and Dr. Hobbs, the two ornaments of their profession; whom I can only pay by this acknowledgment. The whole faculty has always been ready to oblige me: and the only one of them, who endeavoured to defame me, had it not in his power¹.

TRANSLATIONS FROM JUVENAL.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

CHARLES,

EARL OF DORSET AND MIDDLESEX,

LORD CHAMBERLAIN OF HIS MAJESTY'S HOUSEHOLD,
KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER, &c.

MY LORD,

THE wishes and desires of all good men, which have attended your lordship from your first appearance in the world, are at length accomplished, in your obtaining those honours and dignities, which you have so long deserved. There are no factions, though irreconcilable to one another, that are not united in their affection to you, and the respect they pay you. They are equally pleased in your prosperity, and would be equally concerned in your affliction. Titus Vespasian was not more the delight of human-kind. The universal empire made him only more known, and more powerful, but could not make him more beloved. He had greater ability of doing good, but your inclination to it is not less: and though you could not extend your beneficence to so many persons, yet you have lost as few days as that excellent emperor, and never had his complaint to make when you went to bed, that the Sun had shone upon you in vain, when you had the opportunity of relieving some unhappy man. This, my lord, has justly acquired you as many friends as there are persons who have the honour to be known to you: mere acquaintance you have none; you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have conversed with you are for ever after inviolably yours. This is a truth so generally acknowledged, that it needs no proof: it is of the nature of a first principle, which is received as soon as it is proposed; and needs not the reformation which Descartes used to his: for we doubt not, neither can we properly say, we think we admire and love you, above all other men: there is a certainty in the proposition, and we know it. With the same assurance can I say, you neither have enemies, nor can scarce have any; for they who have never heard of you, can neither love or hate you; and they who have, can have no other notion of you, than that which they receive from the public, that you are the best of men. After this, my testimony can be of no farther use, than to declare it to be day-light at high noon: and all who have the benefit of sight, can look up as well and see the Sun.

It is true, I have one privilege which is almost particular to myself, that I saw you in the east at your first arising above the hemisphere: I was as soon sensible as any man of that light, when it was but just shooting out, and beginning to travel upward to the meridian. I made my early addresses to your lordship, in my Essay of Dramatic Poetry; and therein bespoke you to the world, wherein I have the right of a first discoverer. When I was myself in the rudiments of my Poetry, without name or reputation in the world, having rather the ambition of a writer, than the skill; when I was drawing the out-lines of an art, without any living master to instruct me in it; an art which had been better praised than studied here in England, wherein Shakspeare, who created the stage among us, had rather written happily, than knowingly and justly: and Jonson, who, by studying Horace, had been acquainted with the rules, yet seemed to envy posterity that knowledge, and like an inventor of some useful art, to make a monopoly of his learning: when thus, as I may say, before the use of the loadstone, or knowledge of the compass, I was sailing in a vast ocean, without other help than the pole-star of the ancients, and the rules of the French stage amongst the moderns, which are extremely different from ours, by reason of their opposite taste; yet, even then, I had the presumption to dedicate to your lordship: a very unfinished piece, I must confess, and which only can be excused by the little experience of the author, and the modesty of the title, An Essay. Yet I was stronger in prophecy than I was in criticism; I was inspired to foretel you to mankind, as the restorer of poetry, the greatest genius, the truest judge, and the best patron.

Good sense and good nature are never separated, though the ignorant world has thought otherwise. Good nature, by which I mean beneficence and candour, is the product of right reason; which of necessity will give allowance to the failings of others, by considering that there is nothing perfect in mankind; and, by distinguishing that which comes nearest to excellency, though not absolutely free from faults, will certainly produce a candour in the judge. It is incident to an elevated understanding, like your lordship's, to find out the errors of other men: but it is your prerogative to pardon them; to look with pleasure on those things, which are somewhat congenial, and of a remote kindred to your own conceptions; and to forgive the many failings of those, who, with their wretched art, cannot arrive to those heights that you possess from a happy, abundant, and native genius; which are as inborn to you, as they were to Shakspeare; and, for aught I know, to Homer; in either of whom we find all arts and sciences, all moral and natural philosophy, without knowing that they ever studied them.

There is not an English writer this day living, who is not perfectly convinced, that your lordship excels all others, in all the several parts of poetry which you have undertaken to adorn. The most vain, and the most ambitious of our age, have not dared to assume so much, as the competitors of Themistocles: they have yielded the first place without dispute; and have been arrogantly content to be esteemed as second to your lordship; and even that also with a longe sed proximi intervallo. If there have been, or are any, who go farther in their self-conceit, they must be very singular in their opinion: they must be like the officer in a play, who was called Captain, Lieutenant, and Company. The world will easily conclude, whether such unattended generals can ever be capable of making a revolution in Parnassus.

I will not attempt, in this place, to say any thing particular of your Lyric Poems, though they are the delight and wonder of this age, and will be the envy of the next. The subject of this book confines me to satire; and in that, an author of your own quality, (whose ashes I shall not disturb) has given you all the commendation, which his self-sufficiency could afford to any man: "The best good man, with the worst-natured Muse." In that character, methinks, I am reading Jonson's verses to the memory of Shakspeare: an insolent, sparing, and invidious panegyric: where good-nature, the most godlike commendation of a man, is only attributed to your person, and denied to your writings: for they are every where so full of candour, that, like Horace, you only expose the follies of men, without arraigning their vices; and in this excel him, that you add that pointedness of thought, which is visibly wanting in our great Roman. There is more of salt in all your verses, than I have seen in any of the moderns, or even of the ancients: but you have been sparing of the gall; by which means you have pleased all readers, and offended none. Donne alone, of all our countrymen, had your talent; but was not happy enough to arrive at your versification. And were he translated into numbers and English, he would yet be wanting in the dignity of expression. That which is the prime virtue and chief ornament of Virgil, which distinguishes him from the rest of writers, is so conspicuous in your verses, that it casts a shadow on all your contemporaries; we cannot be seen, or but obscurely, while you are present. You equal Donne in the variety, multiplicity, and choice of thoughts; you excel him in the manner, and the words. I read you both with the same admiration, but not with the same delight. He affects the metaphysics, not only in his satires, but in his amorous verses, where nature only should reign; and perplexes the minds of the fair sex with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should engage their hearts, and entertain them with the softness of love. In this (if I may be pardoned for so bold a truth) Mr. Cowley has copied him to a fault; so great a one, in my opinion, that it throws his Mistress infinitely below his Pindariques, and his latter compositions, which are undoubtedly the best of his poems, and the most correct. For my own part, I must avow it freely to the world, that I never attempted any thing in satire, wherein I have not studied your writings as the most perfect model. I have continually laid them before me; and the greatest commendation, which my own partiality can give to my productions, is, that they are copies, and no farther to be allowed, than as they have something more or less of the original. Some few touches of your lordship, some secret graces which I have endeavoured to express after your manner, have made whole poems of mine to pass with approbation: but take your verses altogether, and they are inimitable. If therefore I have not written better, it is because you have not written more. You have not set me sufficient copy to transcribe; and I cannot add one letter of my own invention, of which I have not the example there.

It is a general complaint against your lordship, and I must have leave to upbraid you with it, that, because you need not write, you will not. Mankind that wish you so well, in all things that relate to your prosperity, have their intervals of wishing for themselves, and are within a little of grudging you the fullness of your fortune: they would be more malicious if you used it not so well, and with so much generosity.

Fame is in itself a real good, if we may believe Cicero, who was perhaps too fond of it. But even fame, as Virgil tells us, acquires strength by going forward. Let Epicurus give indolence as an attribute to his gods, and place in it the happiness of the blest: the divinity which we worship has given us not only a precept against it, but his own example to the contrary. The world, my lord, would be content to allow you a seventh day for rest; or, if you thought that hard upon you, we would not refuse you half your time: if you come out, like some great monarch, to take a town but once a year, as it were for your diversion, though you had no need to extend your territories: in short, if you were a bad, or which is worse, an indifferent poet, we would thank you for your own quiet, and not expose you to the want of yours. But when you are so great and so successful, and when we have that necessity of your writing, that we cannot subsist entirely without it; any more (I may almost say) than the world without the daily course of ordinary providence, methinks this argument might prevail with you, my lord, to forego a little of your repose for the public benefit. It is not that you are under any force of working daily miracles, to prove your being; but now and then somewhat of extraordinary, that is any thing of your production, is requisite to refresh your character.

This, I think, my lord, is a sufficient reproach to you; and, should I carry it as far as mankind would authorise me, would be little less than satire. And, indeed, a provocation is almost necessary, in behalf of the world, that you might be induced sometimes to write; and in relation to a multitude of scribblers, who daily pester the world with their insufferable stuff, that they might be discouraged from writing any more. I complain not of their lampoons, and libels, though I have been the public mark for many years. I am vindictive enough to have repelled force by force, if I could imagine that any of them had ever reached me; but they either shot at rovers, and therefore missed, or their power was so weak, that I might safely stand them, at the nearest distance. I answered not the Rehearsal, because I knew the author sat to himself when he drew the picture, and was the very Bayes of his own farce. Because also I knew, that my betters were more concerned than I was in that satire: and, lastly, because Mr. Smith and Mr. Jonson, the main pillars of it, were two such languishing gentlemen in their conversation, that I could liken them to nothing but to their own relations, those noble characters of men of wit and pleasure about the town. The like considerations have hindered me from dealing with the lamentable companions of their prose and doggerel; I am so far from defending my poetry against them, that I will not so much as expose theirs. And for my morals, if they are not proof against their attacks, let me be thought by posterity, what those authors would be thought, if any memory of them, or of their writings, could endure so long, as to another age. But these dull makers of lampoons, as harmless as they have been to me, are yet of dangerous example to the public: some witty men may perhaps succeed to their designs, and, mixing sense with malice, blast the reputation of the most innocent amongst men, and the most virtuous amongst women.

Heaven be praised, our common libellers are as free from the imputation of wit, as of morality; and therefore whatever mischief they have designed, they have performed but little of it. Yet these ill writers, in all justice, ought themselves to be exposed: as Persius has given us a fair example in his first satire: which is levelled particularly at them: and none is so fit to correct their faults, as he who is not only clear from any in his own writings, but also so just, that he will never defame the good; and is armed with the power of verse, to punish and make examples of the bad. But of this I shall have occasion to speak further, when I come to give the definition and character of true satire.

In the mean time, as a counsellor, bred up in the knowledge of the municipal and statute law, may honestly inform a just prince how far his prerogative extends; so I may be allowed to tell your lordship, who, by an undisputed title, are the king of poets, what an extent of power you have, and how lawfully you may exercise it, over the petulant scribblers of this age. As lord chamberlain, I know, you are absolute by your office, in all that belongs to the decency and good manners of the stage. You can banish from thence scurrility and prophaneness, and restrain the licentious insolence of poets and their actors in all things that shock the public quiet, or the reputation of private persons, under the notion of humour. But I mean not the authority which is annexed to your office: I speak of that only which is inborn, and inherent to your person. What is produced in you by an excellent wit, a masterly and commanding genius over all writers: whereby you are empowered, when you please, to give the final decision of wit; to put your stamp on all that ought to pass for current; and set a brand of reprobation on clipt poetry and false coin. A shilling, dipt in the bath, may go for gold amongst the ignorant; but the sceptres on the guineas show the difference. That your lordship is formed by nature for this supremacy, I could easily prove, (were it not already granted by the world,) from the distinguishing character of your writings; which is so visible to me, that I never could be imposed on to receive for yours what is written by any others; or to mistake your genuine poetry for their spurious productions. I can farther add with truth (though not without some vanity in saying it) that in the same paper, written by divers hands, whereof your lordship was only part, I could separate your gold from their copper: and though I could not give back to every author his own brass (for there is not the same rule for distinguishing betwixt bad and bad, as betwixt ill and excellently good) yet I never failed of knowing what was yours, and what was not; and was absolutely certain, that this, or the other part, was positively yours, and could not positively be written by any other.

True it is, that some bad poems, though not all, carry their owner's mark about them. There is some peculiar awkwardness, false grammar, imperfect sense, or, at the least, obscurity; some braid or other on this buttock, or that ear, that it is notorious who are the owners of the cattle, though they should not sign it with their names. But your lordship, on the contrary, is distinguished, not only by the excellency of your thoughts, but by your style and manner of expressing them. A painter, judging of some admirable piece, may affirm with certainty, that it was of Holben, or Van Dyck; but vulgar designs, and common draughts, are easily mistaken and misapplied. Thus, by my long study of your lordship, I am arrived at the knowledge of your particular manner. In the good poems of other men, like those artists, I can only say, this is like the draught of such a one, or like the colouring of another. In short, I can only be sure, that it is the hand of a good master; but in your performances, it is scarcely possible for me to be deceived. If you write in your strength, you stand revealed at the first view; and should you write under it, you cannot avoid some peculiar graces, which only cost me a second consideration to discover you: for I must say it, with all the severity of truth, that every line of yours is precious. Your lordship's only fault is, that you have not written more; unless I could add another, and that yet a greater, but I fear for the public the accusation would not be true, that you have written, and, out of vicious modesty, will not publish.

Virgil has confined his works within the compass of eighteen thousand lines, and has not treated many subjects; yet he ever had, and ever will have, the reputation of the best poet. Martial says of him, that he could have excelled Varius in tragedy, and Horace in lyric poetry; but, out of deference to his friends, he attempted neither.

The same prevalence of genius is in your lordship; but the world cannot pardon your concealing it, on the same consideration: because we have neither a living Varius, nor a Horace, in whose excellencies both of poems, odes, and satires, you have equalled them, if our language had not yielded to the Roman majesty, and length of time had not added a reverence to the works of Horace. For good sense is the same in all or most ages; and course of time rather improves Nature, than impairs her. What has been, may be again: another Homer, and another Virgil, may possibly arise from those very causes which produced the first: though it would be imprudence to affirm, that any such have appeared.

It is manifest, that some particular ages have been more happy than others in the production of great men, in all sorts of arts and sciences; as that of Euripides, Sophocles, Aristophanes, and the rest, for stage poetry, amongst the Greeks: that of Augustus for heroic, lyric, dramatic, elegiac, and indeed all sorts of poetry, in the persons of Virgil, Horace, Varius, Ovid, and many others; especially if we take into that century the latter end of the commonwealth; wherein we find Varro, Lucretius, and Catullus: and at the same time lived Cicero, Sallust, and Cæsar. A famous age in modern times, for learning in every kind, was that of Lorenzo de Medici, and his son Leo X. wherein painting was revived, and poetry flourished, and the Greek language was restored.

Examples in all these are obvious: but what I would infer is this; that, in such an age, it is possible some great genius may arise, equal to any of the ancients; abating only for the language. For great contemporaries whet and cultivate each other: and mutual borrowing and commerce makes the common riches of learning, as it does of the civil government.

But suppose that Homer and Virgil were the only of their species, and that Nature was so much worn out in producing them, that she is never able to bear the like again; yet, the example only holds in heroic poetry: in tragedy and satire, I offer myself to maintain against some of our modern critics, that this age and the last, particularly in England, have excelled the ancients in both those kinds; and I would instance in Shakespeare of the former, of your lordship in the latter sort.

Thus I might safely confine myself to my native country: but, if I would only cross the seas, I might find in France a living Horace and a Juvenal, in the person of the admirable Boileau; whose numbers are excellent, whose expressions are noble, whose thoughts are just, whose language is pure, whose satire is pointed, and whose sense is close: what he borrows from the ancients, he repays with usury of his own, in coin as good, and almost as universally valuable: for, setting prejudice and partiality apart, though he is our enemy, the stamp of Louis, the patron of all arts, is not much inferior to the medal of an Augustus Cæsar. Let this be said without entering into the interest of factions and parties, and relating only to the bounty of that king to men of learning and merit: a praise so just, that even we, who are his enemies, cannot refuse it to him.

Now, if it be permitted me to go back again to the consideration of epic poetry, I have confessed, that no man hitherto has reached, or so much as approached to, the excellencies of Homer, or of Virgil; I must further add, that Statius, the best versificator next Virgil, knew not how to design after him, though he had the model in his eye; that Lucan is wanting both in design and subject, and is, besides, too full of heat and affectation; that, among the moderns, Ariosto neither designed justly, nor observed any unity of action, or compass of time, or moderation in the vastness of his draught: his style is luxurious, without majesty or decency; and his adventures, without the compass of nature and possibility: Tasso, whose design was regular, and who observed the rules of unity in time and place more closely than Virgil, yet was not so happy in his action; he confesses himself to have been too lyrical; that is, to have written beneath the dignity of heroic verse, in his Episodes of Sophronia, Erminia, and Armida; his story is not so pleasing as Ariosto's; he is too statulent sometimes, and sometimes too dry; many times unequal, and almost always forced; and, besides, is full of conception, points of epigram and witticism; all which are not only below the dignity of heroic verse, but contrary to its nature: Virgil and Homer have not one of them. And those who are guilty of so boyish an ambition in so grave a subject, are so far from being considered as heroic poets, that they ought to be turned down from Homer to the Anthologia, from Virgil to Martial and Owen's epigrams, and from Spenser to Fleecoe; that is, from the top to the bottom of all poetry. But to return to Tasso: he borrows from the invention of Boyardo; and in his alteration of his poem, which is infinitely the worse, imitates Homer so very servilely, that (for example) he gives the king of Jerusalem fifty sons, only, because Homer had bestowed the like number on king Priam; he kills the youngest in the same manner, and has provided his hero with a Patroclus, under another name, only to bring him back to the wars, when his friend was killed. The French have performed nothing in this kind, which is not as below those two Italians, and subject to a thousand more reflections, without examining their St. Lewis, their Pucelle, or their Alarique: the English have only to boast of Spenser and Milton, who neither of them wanted either genius or learning, to have been perfect poets; and yet, both of them are liable to many censures. For there is no uniformity in the design of Spenser: he aims at the accomplishment of no one action: he raises up a hero for every one of his adventures; and endows each of them with some particular moral virtue, which renders them all equal, without subordination or performance. Every one is most valiant in his own legend; only we must do them that justice to observe, that magnanimity, which is the character of prince Arthur, shines throughout the whole poem; and succours the rest, when they are in distress. The original of every knight was then living in the court of queen Elizabeth; and he attributed to each of them, that virtue which he thought most conspicuous in them: an ingenious piece of flattery, though it turned not much to his account. Had he lived to finish his poem, in the six remaining legends, it had certainly been more of a piece; but could not have been perfect, because the model was not true. But prince Arthur, or his chief patron, sir Philip Sidney, whom he intended to make happy by the marriage of his Gloriana, dying before him, deprived the poet both of means and spirit, to accomplish his design: for the rest, his obsolete language, and the ill choice of his stanza, are faults but of the second magnitude: for, notwithstanding the first, he is still intelligible, at least after a little practice; and for the last, he is the most to be admired, that, labouring under such a difficulty, his verses are so numerous, so various, and harmonious, that only Virgil, whom he professedly imitated, has surpassed him, among the Romans; and only Mr. Waller among the English.

As for Mr. Milton, whom we all admire with as much justice, his subject is not that of an heroic poem, properly so called. His design is the losing of our happiness: his event is not prosperous, like that of all other epic works: his heavenly machines are many, and human persons are but two. But I will not take Mr. Rymmer's work out of his hands: he has promised the world a critique on that author; wherein, though he will not allow his poem for heroic, I hope he will grant us, that his thoughts are elevated, his words sounding, and that no man has so happily copied the manner of Homer, or so copiously translated his Græcisms, and the Latin elegancies of Virgil. It is true, he runs into a flat thought, sometimes for a hundred lines together, but it is when he is got into a track of scripture: his antiquated words were his choice, not his necessity; for therein he imitated Spenser, as Spenser imitated Chaucer. And though, perhaps, the love of their masters may have transported both too far, in the frequent use of them; yet, in my opinion, obsolete words may then be laudably revived, when either they are more sounding, or more significant, than those in practice; and, when their obscurity is taken away, by joining other words to them, which clear the sense; according to the rule of Horace, for the admission of new words. But in both cases a moderation is to be observed in the use of them. For unnecessary coinage, as well as unnecessary revival, runs into affectation; a fault to be avoided on either hand. Neither will I justify Milton for his blank verse, though I may excuse him, by the example of Hannibal Caro, and other Italians, who have used it: for whatever causes he alleges for the abolishing of rhyme, (which I have not now the leisure to examine) his own particular reason is plainly this, that rhyme was not his talent; he had neither the ease of doing it, nor the graces of it; which is manifest in his Juvenilia, or verses written in his youth; where his rhyme is always constrained and forced, and comes hardly from him, at an age when the soul is most pliant, and the passion of love makes almost every man a rhymers, though not a poet.

By this time, my lord, I doubt not but that you wonder, why I have run off from my bias so long together, and made so tedious a digression from satire to heroic poetry. But, if you will not excuse it, by the tattling quality of age, which, as sir William Davenant says, is always narrative; yet I hope the usefulness of what I have to say on this subject, will qualify the remoteness of it; and this is the last time I will commit the crime of prefaces, or trouble the world with my notions of any thing that relates to verse. I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem: besides these, or the like animadversions of them or other men, there is yet a farther reason given, why they cannot possibly succeed so well as the ancients, even though we could allow them not to be inferior, either in genius or learning, or the tongue in which they write, or all those other wonderful qualifications which are necessary to the forming of a true accomplished heroic poet. The fault is laid on our religion: they say, that Christianity is not capable of those embellishments which are afforded in the belief of those ancient heathens.

And it is true, that in the severe notions of our faith, the fortitude of a Christian consists in patience, and suffering, for the love of God, whatever hardships can befall in the world; not in any great attempts, or in performance of those enterprises which the poets call heroic; which are commonly the effects of interest, ostentation, pride, and worldly honours. That humility and resignation are our prime virtues; and that these include no action, but that of the soul: whereas, on the contrary, an heroic poem requires to its necessary design, and as its last perfection, some great action of war, the accomplishment of some extraordinary undertaking, which requires the strength and vigour of the body, the duty of a soldier, the capacity and prudence of a general; and, in short, as much, or more, of the active virtue, than the suffering. But to this, the answer is very obvious. God has placed us in our several stations; the virtues of a private Christian are patience, obedience, submission, and the like; but those of a magistrate, or general, or a king, are prudence, counsel, active fortitude, coercive power, awful commands, and the exercise of magnanimity, as well justice. So that this objection hinders not, but that an epic poem, or the heroic action of some great commander, enterprised for the common good and honour of the Christian cause, and executed happily, may be as well written now, as it was of old by the heathens; provided the poet be endued with the same talents; and the language, though not of equal dignity, yet, as near approaching to it as our modern barbarism will allow, which is all that can be expected from our own or any other now extant, though more refined; and therefore we are to rest contented with that only inferiority, which is not possibly to be remedied.

I wish I could as easily remove that other difficulty which yet remains. It is objected by a great French critic, as well as an admirable poet, yet living, and whom I have mentioned with that honour which his merit exacts from me, I mean Boileau, that the machines of our Christian religion, in heroic poetry, are much more feeble to support the weight than those of heathenism. Their doctrine, grounded as it was on ridiculous fables, was yet the belief of the two victorious monarchies, the Grecian and Roman. Their gods did not only interest themselves in the event of wars (which is the effect of a superior Providence); but also espoused the several parties, in a visible corporal descent, managed their intrigues, and fought their battles sometimes in opposition to each other: though Virgil (more discreet than Homer in that last particular) has contented himself with the partiality of his deities, their favours, their counsels, or commands, to those whose cause they had espoused, without bringing them to the outrageousness of blows. Now our religion, says he, is deprived of the greatest part of those machines; at least the most shining in epic poetry. Though St. Michael, in Ariosto, seeks out Discord, to send her among the pagans, and finds her in a convent of friars, where Peace should reign, which indeed is fine satire; and Satan, in Tasso, excites Solymán to an attempt by night on the Christian camp, and brings a host of devils to his assistance; yet the archangel, in the former example, when Discord was restive, and would not be drawn from her beloved monastery with fair words, has the whip hand of her, drags her out with many stripes, sets her, on God's name, about her business; and makes her know the difference of strength betwixt a nuncio of Heaven, and a minister of Hell: the same angel, in the latter instance from Tasso (as if God had never another messenger belonging to the court, but was confined, like Jupiter to Mercury, and Juno to Iris) when he sees his time, that is, when half of the Christians are already killed, and all the rest are in a fair way of being routed, stickles betwixt the remainders of God's host, and the race of fiends; pulls the devils backwards by the tails, and drives them from their quarry; or otherwise the whole business had miscarried, and Jerusalem remained untaken. This, says Boileau, is a very unequal match for the poor devils, who are sure to come by the worst of it in the combat; for nothing is more easy, than for an Almighty Power to bring his old rebels to reason, when he pleases. Consequently, what pleasure, what entertainment, can be raised from so pitiful a machine, where we see the success of the battle, from the very beginning of it; unless that, as we are Christians, we are glad that we have gotten God on our side, to maul our enemies; when we cannot do the work ourselves? For if the port had given the faithful more courage, which had cost him nothing, or at least had made them exceed the Turks in number, then he might have gained the victory for us Christians, without interesting Heaven in the quarrel; and that with as much ease, and as little credit to the conqueror, as when a party of one hundred soldiers defeats another, which consists only of fifty.

This, my lord, I confess, is such an argument against our modern poetry, as cannot be answered by those mediums which have been used. We cannot hitherto boast, that our religion has furnished us with any such machines, as have made the strength and beauty of the ancient buildings.

But what if I venture to advance an invention of my own, to supply the manifest defects of our new writers? I am sufficiently sensible of my weakness; and it is not very probable that I should succeed in such a project, whereof I have not had the least hint from any of my predecessors, the poets, or any of their seconds, and coadjutors, the critics. Yet we see the art of war is improved in sieges, and new instruments of death are invented daily: something new in philosophy and the mechanics is discovered almost every year: and the science of former ages is improved by the succeeding. I will not detain you with a long preamble to that, which better judges will, perhaps, conclude to be little worth.

It is this, in short, that Christian poets have not hitherto been acquainted with their own strength. If they had searched the Old Testament as they ought, they might there have found the machines which are proper for their work; and those more certain in their effects, than it may be the New Testament is, in the rules sufficient for salvation. The perusing of one chapter in the Prophecy of Daniel, and accommodating what there they find, with the principles of Platonic philosophy, as it is now christianized, would have the ministry of angels as strong an engine, for the working up heroic poetry, in our religion, as that of the ancients has been to raise theirs by all the fables of their gods, which were only received for truths by the most ignorant and weakest of the people.

It is a doctrine almost universally received by Christians, as well protestants as catholics, that there are guardian angels appointed by God Almighty as his vicegerents, for the protection and government of cities, provinces, kingdoms, and monarchies; and those as well of heathens, as of true believers. All this is so plainly proved from those texts of Daniel, that it admits of no farther controversy. The prince of the Persians, and that other of the Grecians, are granted to be the guardians and protecting ministers of those empires. It cannot be denied, that they were opposite, and resisted one another. St. Michael is mentioned by his name, as the patron of the Jews, and is now taken by the Christians, as the protector-general of our religion. These tutelar genii, who presided over the several people and regions committed to their charge, were watchful over them for good, as far as their commissions could possibly extend. The general purpose and design of all, was certainly the service of their great Creator. But it is an undoubted truth, that, for ends best known to the Almighty Majesty of Heaven, his providential designs for the benefit of his creatures, for the debasing and punishing of some nations, and the exaltation and temporal reward of others, were not wholly known to these his ministers; else why those factious quarrels, controversies, and battles, amongst themselves, when they were all united in the same design, the service and honour of their common master? But being instructed only in the general, and zealous of the main design; and, as finite beings, not admitted into the secrets of government, the last resorts of Providence, or capable of discovering the final purposes of God, who can work good out of evil, as he pleases; and irresistibly sways all manner of events on Earth, directing them finally for the best, to his creation in general, and to the ultimate end of his own glory in particular: they must of necessity be sometimes ignorant of the means conducing to those ends, in which alone they can jar and oppose each other. One angel, as we may suppose the prince of Persia, as he is called, judging that it would be more for God's honour, and the benefit of his people, that the Median and Persian monarchy, when delivered from the Babylonish captivity, should still be uppermost: and the patron of the Grecians, to whom the will of God might be more particularly revealed, contending on the other side, for the rise of Alexander and his successors, who were appointed to punish the backsliding Jews, and thereby to put them in mind of their offences, that they might repent, and become more virtuous, and more observant of the law revealed. But how far these controversies and appearing enmities of those glorious creatures may be carried; how these oppositions may best be managed, and by what means conducted, is not my business to show or determine: these things must be left to the invention and judgment of the poet: if any of so happy a genius be now living, or any future age can produce a man, who, being conversant in the philosophy of Plato, as it is now accommodated to Christian use; for (as Virgil gives us to understand by his example) he is the only proper person, of all others, for an epic poem, who, to his natural endowments, of a large invention, a ripe judgment, and a strong memory, has joined the knowledge of the liberal arts and sciences, and particularly moral philosophy, the mathematics, geography, and history, and with all these qualifications is born a poet; knows, and can practise, the variety of numbers, and is master of the language in which he writes; if such a man, I say, be now arisen, or shall arise, I am vain enough to think, that I have proposed a model to him, by which he may build a nobler, a more beautiful, and more perfect poem, than any yet extant, since the ancients.

There is another part of these machines yet wanting; but, by what I have said, it would have been easily supplied by a judicious writer. He could not have failed to add the opposition of ill spirits to the good; they have also their design, ever opposite to that of Heaven; and this alone has hitherto been the practice of the moderns: but this imperfect system, if I may call it such, which I have given, will infinitely advance and carry farther that hypothesis of the evil spirits contending with the good. For, being so much weaker since their fall than those blessed beings, they are yet supposed to have a permitted power of God, of acting ill, as, from their own depraved nature, they have always the will of designing it. A great testimony of which we find in holy writ, when God Almighty suffered Satan to appear in the holy synod of the angels (a thing not hitherto drawn into example by any of the poets), and also gave him power over all things belonging to his servant Job, excepting only life.

Now what these wicked spirits cannot compass by the vast disproportion of their forces to those of the superior beings, they may by their fraud and cunning carry farther, in a seeming league, confederacy, or subserviency to the designs of some good angel, as far as consists with his purity, to suffer such an aid, the end of which may possibly be disguised, and concealed from his finite knowledge. This is indeed to suppose a great error in such a being: yet since a devil can appear like an angel of light; since craft and malice may sometimes blind for a while a more perfect understanding; and lastly, since Milton has given us an example of the like nature, when Satan appearing like a cherub to Uriel, the intelligence of the Sun, circumvented him even in his own province, and passed only for a curious traveller through those new-created regions, that he might observe therein the workmanship of God, and praise him in his works.

I know not why, upon the same supposition, or some other, a fiend may not deceive a creature of more excellency than himself, but yet a creature; at least by the connivance, or tacit permission, of the omniscient Being.

Thus, my lord, I have, as briefly as I could, given your lordship, and by you the world, a rude draught of what I have been long labouring in my imagination, and what I had intended to have put in practice (though far unable for the attempt of such a poem); and to have left the stage, to which my genius never much inclined me, for a work which would have taken up my life in the performance of it. This too, I had intended chiefly for the honour of my native country, to which a poet is particularly obliged: of two subjects, both relating to it, I was doubtful whether I should choose that of king Arthur conquering the Saxons; which, being farther distant in time, gives the greater scope to my invention: or that of Edward the Black Prince, in subduing Spain, and restoring it to the lawful prince, though a great tyrant, Don Pedro the Cruel: which, for the compass of time, including only the expedition of one year; for the greatness of the action, and its answerable event; for the magnanimity of the English hero, opposed to the ingratitude of the person whom he restored, and for the many beautiful episodes which I had interwoven with the principal design, together with the characters of the chiefest English persons; wherein, after Virgil and Spenser, I would have taken occasion to represent my living friends and patrons of the noblest families, and also shadowed the events of future ages, in the succession of our imperial lines: with these helps, and those of the machines, which I have mentioned, I might perhaps have done as well as some of my predecessors; or at least chalked out a way for others to amend my errors in a like design. But, being encouraged only by fair words by king Charles II. my little salary ill paid, and no prospect of a future subsistence, I was then discouraged in the beginning of my attempt; and now age has overtaken me, and want, a more insufferable evil, through the change of times, has wholly disabled me. Though I must ever acknowledge, to the honour of your lordship, and the eternal memory of your charity, that since this revolution, wherein I have patiently suffered the ruin of my small fortune, and the loss of that poor subsistence which I have had from two kings, whom I had served more faithfully than profitably to myself, then your lordship was pleased, out of no other motive but your own nobleness, without any desert of mine, or the least solicitation from me, to make me a most bountiful present, which, at that time, when I was most in want of it, came most seasonably and unexpectedly to my relief. That favour, my lord, is of itself sufficient to bind any grateful man to a perpetual acknowledgment, and to all the future service, which one of my mean condition can ever be able to perform. May the Almighty God return it for me, both in blessing you here, and rewarding you hereafter. I must not presume to defend the cause for which I now suffer, because your lordship is engaged against it: but the more you are so, the greater is my obligation to you: for your laying aside all the considerations of factions and parties, to do an action of pure disinterested charity. This is one among many of your shining qualities, which distinguish you from others of your rank: but let me add a farther truth, that without these ties of gratitude, and abstracting from them all, I have a most particular inclination to honour you; and, if it were not too bold an expression, to say, I love you. It is no shame to be a poet, though it is to be a bad one. Augustus Caesar of old, and cardinal Richelieu of late, would willingly have been such; and David and Solomon were such. You, who without flattery, are the best of the present age in England, and would have been so had you been born in any other country, will receive more honour in future ages, by that one excellency, than by all those honours to which your birth has entitled you, or your merits have acquired you.

Ne, forte, pudori

Sit tibi musa lyræ solis, & cæq̄to Apollo.

I have formerly said in this epistle, that I could distinguish your writings from those of any others: it is now time to clear myself from any imputation of self-conceit on that subject. I assume not to myself any particular lights in this discovery; they are such only as are obvious to every man of sense and judgment, who loves poetry, and understands it. Your thoughts are always so remote from the common way of thinking, that they are, as I may say, of another species than the conceptions of other poets; yet, you go not out of nature for any of them: gold is never bred upon the surface of the ground; but lies so hidden and so deep, that the mines of it are seldom found; but the force of waters casts it out from the bowels of mountains, and exposes it amongst the sands of rivers: giving us of her bounty, what we could not hope for by our search. This success attends your lordship's thoughts, which would look like chance, if it were not perpetual, and always of the same tenour. If I grant that there is care in it, it is such a care as would be ineffectual and fruitless in other men. It is the curious felicitas which Petronius ascribes to Horace in his odes. We have not wherewithal to imagine so strongly, so justly, and so pleasantly: in short, if we have the same knowledge, we cannot draw out of it the same quintessence: we cannot give it such a turn, such a propriety, and such a beauty: something is deficient in the manner, or the words, but more in the nobleness of our conception. Yet when you have finished all, and it appears in its full lustre, when the diamond is not only found, but the roughness smoothed, when it is cut into a form, and set in gold, then we cannot but acknowledge, that it is the perfect work of art and nature: and every one will be so vain, to think he himself could have performed the like, till he attempts it. It is just the description that Horace makes of such a finished piece: it appears so easy, Ut sibi quivis speret idem; sudet multum, frustra que labore, ausus idem. And besides all this, it is your lordship's particular talent to lay your thoughts so close together, that were they closer they would be crowded, and even a due connection would be wanting. We are not kept in expectation of two good lines, which are to come after a long parenthesis of twenty bad; which is the April-poetry of other writers; a mixture of rain and sunshine by fits; you are always bright, even almost to a fault, by reason of the excess. There is continual abundance, a magazine of thought, and yet a perpetual variety of entertainment; which creates such an appetite in your reader, that he is not cloyed with any thing, but satisfied with all. It is that which the Romans call cœna dubia; where there is such plenty, yet withal, so much diversity and so good order, that the choice is difficult betwixt one excellency and another; and yet the conclusion, by a due climax, is evermore the best; that is, as a conclusion ought to be, ever the most proper for its place. See, my lord, whether I have not studied your lordship with some application: and since you are so modest, that you will not be judge and party, I appeal to the whole world, if I have not drawn your picture to a great degree of likeness, though it is but in miniature: and, that some of the best features are yet wanting. Yet, what I have done is enough to distinguish you from any others, which is the proposition I took upon me to demonstrate.

And now, my lord, to apply what I have said to my present business. The satires of Juvenal and Persius appearing in this new English dress, cannot so properly be inscribed to any man as to your lordship, who are the first of the age in that way of writing. Your lordship, amongst many other favours, has given me your permission for this address; and you have particularly encouraged me by your perusal and approbation of the sixth and tenth satires of Juvenal, as I have translated them. My fellow-labourers have likewise commissioned me to perform in their behalf this office of a dedication to you; and will acknowledge, with all possible respect and gratitude, your acceptance of their work. Some of them have the honour to be known to your lordship already; and they who have not yet that happiness, desire it now. Be pleased to receive our common endeavours with your wonted candour, without entitling you to the protection of our common failings, in so difficult an undertaking. And allow me your patience, if it be not already tired with this long epistle, to give you, from the best authors, the origin, the antiquity, the growth, the change, and the compleatment of satire among the Romans. To describe, if not define, the nature of that poem, with its several qualifications and virtues, together with the several sorts of it. To compare the excellencies of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal, and show the particular manners of their satires. And lastly, to give an account of this new way of version which is attempted in our performance. All which, according to the weakness of my ability, and the best lights which I can get from others, shall be the subject of my following discourse.

The most perfect work of poetry, says our master Aristotle, is tragedy. His reason is, because it is the most united; being more severely confined within the rules of action, time, and place. The action is entire, of a piece, and one, without episodes: the time limited to a natural day; and the place circumscribed at least within the compass of one town or city. Being exactly proportioned thus, and uniform in all its parts, the mind is more capable of comprehending the whole beauty of it without distraction.

But after all these advantages, an heroic poem is certainly the greatest work of human nature. The beauties and perfections of the other are but mechanical; those of the epic are more noble. Though Homer has limited his place to Troy and the fields about it; his action to forty-eight natural days, whereof twelve are holidays, or cessation from business, during the funerals of Patroclus. To proceed, the action of the epic is greater: the extension of time enlarges the pleasure of the reader, and the episodes give it more ornament, and more variety. The instruction is equal; but in the first is only instructive, the latter forms a hero and a prince.

If it signifies any thing which of them is of the more ancient family, the best and most absolute heroic poem was written by Homer long before tragedy was invented: but if we consider the natural endowments, and acquired parts, which are necessary to make an accomplished writer in either kind, tragedy requires a less and more confined knowledge: moderate learning, and observation the rules is sufficient, if a genius be not wanting. But in an epic poet, one who is worthy of that name, besides an universal genius, is required universal learning, together with all those qualities and acquisitions which I have named above, and as many more as I have, through haste or negligence, omitted. And after all, he must have exactly studied Homer and Virgil as his patterns, Aristotle and Horace as his guides, and Vida and Bossu as their commentators, with many others, both Italian and French critics, which I want leisure here to recommend.

In a word, what I have to say in relation to this subject, which does not particularly concern satire, is, that the greatness of an heroic poem, beyond that of a tragedy, may easily be discovered, by observing how few have attempted that work, in comparison of those who have written dramas; and of those few, how small a number have succeeded. But, leaving the critics on either side to contend about the preference due to this or that sort of poetry; I will hasten to my present business, which is the antiquity and origin of satire, according to those informations which I have received from the learned Casaubon, Heinsius, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the Dauphin's Juvenal; to which I shall add some observations of my own.

There has been a long dispute among the modern critics, whether the Romans derived their satire from the Grecians, or first invented it themselves. Julius Scaliger and Heinsius, are of the first opinion; Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and the publisher of the Dauphin's Juvenal, maintain the latter. If we take satire in the general signification of the word, as it is used in all modern languages for an ipejective, it is certain that it is almost as old as verse; and, though hymns, which are praises of God, may be allowed to have been before it, yet the defamation of others was not long after it. After God had cursed Adam and Eve in Paradise, the husband and wife excused themselves, by laying the blame on one another; and gave a beginning to those conjugal dialogues in prose, which the poets have perfected in verse. The third chapter of Job is one of the first instances of this poem in Holy Scripture: unless we will take it higher, from the latter end of the second; where his wife advises him to curse his Maker.

The original, I confess, is not much to the honour of satire; but here it was nature, and that depraved! When it became an art, it bore better fruit. Only we have learnt thus much already, that scoffs and revilings are of the growth of all nations; and consequently that neither the Greek poets borrowed from other people their art of railing, neither needed the Romans to take it from them. But considering satire as a species of poetry, here the war begins amongst the critics. Scaliger the father will have it descend from Greece to Rome; and derives the word satire from Satyrus, that mixt kind of animal, or, as the ancients thought him, rural god, made up betwixt a man and a goat; with a human head, hooked nose, porting lips, a bunch or streama under the chin, pricked ears, and upright horns; the body shagged with hair, especially from the waist, and ending in a goat, with the legs and feet of that creature. But Casaubon, and his followers, with reason, condemn this derivation; and prove that, from Satyrus, the word satira, as it signifies a poem, cannot possibly descend. For satira is not properly a substantive, but an adjective; to which the word lex, in English a charger, or large platter, is understood: so that the Greek poem, made according to the manner of a satyr, and expressing his qualities, must properly be called satyrical, and not satire. And thus far it is allowed that the Grecians had such poems; but that they were wholly different in species from that to which the Romans gave the name of satire.

Aristotle divides all poetry, in relation to the progress of it, into nature without art, art begun, and art completed. Mankind, even the most barbarous, have the seeds of poetry implanted in them. The first specimen of it was certainly shown in the praises of the Deity, and prayers to him: and as they are of natural obligation, so they are likewise of divine institution. Which Milton observing, introduces Adam and Eve every morning adoring God in hymns and prayers. The first poetry was thus begun, in the wild notes of natural poetry, before the invention of feet and measures. The Grecians and Romans had no other original of their poetry. Festivals and holidays soon succeeded to private worship, and we need not doubt but they were enjoined by the true God to his own people; as they were afterwards imitated by the heathens; who by the light of reason knew they were to invoke some superior being in their necessities, and to thank him for his benefits. Thus the Grecian holidays were celebrated with offerings to Bacchus and Ceres, and other deities, to whose bounty they supposed they were owing for their corn and wine, and other helps of life. And the ancient Romans, Horace tells us, paid their thanks to mother Earth, or Vesta, to Silvanus, and their genius, in the same manner. But as all festivals have a double reason for their institution; the first of religion, the other of recreation, for the unbending of our minds: so both the Grecians and Romans agreed, after their sacrifices were performed, to spend the remainder of the day in sports and merriments; amongst which, songs and dances, and that which they called wit (for want of knowing better), were the chiefest entertainments. The Grecians had a notion of satyrs, whom I have already described; and taking them, and the Sileai, that is, the young satyrs and the old, for the tutors, attendants, and humble companions of their Bacchus, habited themselves like those rural deities, and imitated them in their rustic dances, to which they joined songs, with some sort of rude harmony, but without certain numbers; and to these they added a kind of chorus.

The Romans also (as nature is the same in all places:) though they knew nothing of those Grecian demi-gods, nor had any communication with Greece, yet had certainly young men, who, at their festivals, danced and sung after their unsmooth manner, to a certain kind of verse, which they called Saturnian: what it was, we have no certain light from antiquity to discover; but we may conclude, that, like the Grecian, it was void of art, or at least with very feeble beginnings of it. Those ancient Romans, at these holidays, which were a mixture of devotion and debauchery, had a custom of reproaching each other with their faults, in a sort of extempore poetry, or rather of tuneable hobbling verse; and they answered in the same kind of gross railery; their wit and their music being of a piece. The Grecians, says Casaubon, had formerly done the same in the persons of their petulant satyrs: but I am afraid he mistakes the matter, and confounds the singing and dancing of the satyrs, with the rustical entertainments of the first Romans. The reason of my opinion is this; that Casaubon finding little light from antiquity, of these beginnings of poetry, amongst the Grecians, but only these representations of satyrs, who carried chisters, and cornucopias full of several fruits in their hands, and danced with them at their public feasts: and afterwards reading Horace, who makes mention of his homely Romans jesting at one another in the same kind of solemnities, might suppose those wanton satyrs did the same. And especially because Horace possibly might seem to him to have shown the original of all poetry in general, including the Grecians as well as Romans. Though it is plainly otherwise, that he only described the beginning, and first rudiments of poetry in his own country. The verses are these, which he cites from the first epistle of the second book, which was written to Augustus:

Agricolæ prisci, fortes, parvoque beati,
 Condita post frumenta, levantes tempore festo
 Corpus & ipsum animum spe finis dura ferentum,
 Cum sociis operum pueris, & conjuge fida,
 Tellurem porco, Silvanum lacte piabant,
 Floribus & vino Genium memorem brevis ævi:
 Fescennina per hunc inventa licentia morem
 Versibus alternis opprobria rustica fudit.

Our brawny clowns of old, who turn'd the soil,
 Content with little, and inur'd to toil,
 At harvest-home, with mirth and country cheer
 Restor'd their bodies for another year;
 Refresh'd their spirits, and renew'd their hope
 Of such a future feast, and future crop.
 Then, with their fellow-joggers of the ploughs,
 Their little children, and their faithful spouses
 A sow they slow to Vesta's deity,
 And kindly milk, Silvanus, pour'd to thee.
 With flowers, and wine, their genius they ador'd;
 A short life, and a merry, was the word.
 From flowing cups, defaming rhymes ensue,
 And at each other homely taunts they threw.

Yet since it is a hard conjecture, that so great a man as Casaubon should misapply what Horace writ concerning ancient Rome, to the ceremonies and manners of ancient Greece, I will not insist on this opinion, but rather judge in general, that since all poetry had its original from religion, that of the Grecians and Romans had the same beginning: both were invented at festivals of thanksgiving: and both were prosecuted with mirth and railery, and rudiments of verse: amongst the Greeks, by those who represented satyrs; and amongst the Romans by real clowns.

For indeed, when I am reading Casaubon on these two subjects, methinks I hear the same story told twice over with very little alteration. Of which Dacier taking notice in his interpretation of the Latin verses which I have translated, says plainly, that the beginning of poetry was the same, with a small variety, in both countries: and that the mother of it, in all nations, was devotion. But what is yet more wonderful, that most learned critic takes notice also, in his illustrations on the first epistle of the second book, that as the poetry of the Romans, and that of the Grecians, had the same beginning, at feasts of thanksgiving, as it has been observed: and the old comedy of the Greeks which was invective, and the satire of the Romans which was of the same nature, were begun on the very same occa-

tion, so the fortune of both, in process of time, was just the same; the old comedy of the Grecians was forbidden, for its too much licence in exposing of particular persons, and the rude satire of the Romans was also punished by a law of the Decemviri, as Horace tells us, in these words:

Libertasque recurrentes accepta per annos
Lusit amabiliter, donec jam sævus apertam
In rabiem verti cœpit jocus; & per honestas
Ire domos impune minax: dolere cruento
Dente læcessiti; fuit intactis quoque cura
Conditione super communi, quietiam lex,
Pomæque lata, malo que nolit carminæ quemquam
Describi, vertere modum formidine fustis;
Ad bene dicendum delectandumque redacti.

The law of the Decemviri was this: Si quis occentassit malum carum, sive condidisset, quod infamiam faxit, flagitiumve alteri, capital esto. A strange likeness, and barely possible: but the critics being all of the same opinion, it becomes good to be silent, and to submit to better judgments than my own.

But to return to the Grecians, from whose satiric dramas, the elder Scaliger and Heinsius will have the Roman satire to proceed; I am to take a view of them first, and see if there be any such descent from them as those authors have pretended.

Thespis, or whatsoever he were that invented tragedy, (for authors differ) mingled with them a chorus and dances and satyrs, which had been used in the celebration of their festivals; and there they were ever afterwards retained. The character of them was also kept, which was mirth and wantonness: and this was given, I suppose, to the folly of the common audience, who soon grow weary of good sense; and, as we daily see in our own age and country, are apt to forsake poetry, and still ready to return to buffoonry and farce. From hence it came, that in the Olympic games, where the poets contended for four prizes, the satiric tragedy was the last of them; for, in the rest, the satyrs were excluded from the chorus. Among the plays of Euripides which are yet remaining, there is one of these satirics, which is called the Cyclops; in which we may see the nature of those poems, and from thence conclude what likeness they have to the Roman satire.

The story of this Cyclops, whose name was Polyphemus, so famous in the Grecian fables, was, that Ulysses, who, with his company, was driven on the coast of Sicily, where those Cyclops inhabited, coming to ask relief from Silenus, and the satyrs, who were herdsmen to that one-eyed giant, was kindly received by them, and entertained; till, being perceived by Polyphemus, they were made prisoners against the rites of hospitality, for which Ulysses eloquently pleaded; were afterwards put down in the den, and some of them devoured; after which, Ulysses, having made him drunk, when he was asleep, thrust a great fire-brand into his eye; and so revenging his dead followers, escaped with the remaining party of the living: and Silenus, and the satyrs, were freed from their servitude under Polyphemus, and permitted their first liberty of attending and accompanying their patron Bacchus.

This was the subject of the tragedy; which being one of those that end with a happy event, is therefore by Aristotle judged below the other sort, whose success is unfortunate. Notwithstanding which, the satyrs, who were part of the dramatic persons, as well as the whole chorus, were properly introduced into the nature of the poem, which is mixed of farce and tragedy. The adventure of Ulysses was to entertain the judging part of the audience, and the uncouth persons of Silenus, and the satyrs, to divert the common people with their gross railleries.

Your lordship has perceived by this time, that this satyric tragedy, and the Roman satire, have little resemblances in any other features. The very kinds are different: for what has a pastoral tragedy to do with a paper of verses satirically written? The character and raillery of the satyr is the only thing that could pretend to a likeness; were Scaliger and Heinsius alive to maintain their opinion. And the first farces of the Romans, which were the rudiments of their poetry, were written before they had any communication with the Greeks; or indeed, any knowledge of that people.

And here it will be proper to give the definition of the Greek satiric poem, from Casaubon, before I leave this subject. The satiric, says he, is a dramatic poem, annexed to a tragedy; having a chorus, which consists of satyrs: the persons represented in it, are illustrious men: the action of it is great; the style is partly serious, and partly jocular; and the event of the action most commonly is happy.

The Grecians, besides these satiric tragedies, had another kind of poem, which they called Silli; which were more of kin to the Roman satire: those Silli were indeed invective poems, but of a different species from the Roman poems of Ennius, Pacuvius, Lucilius, Horace, and the rest of their successors. They were so called, says Casaubon in one place, from Silenus, the foster father to Bacchus; but in another place, bethinking himself better, he derives their name ἀπὸ τῶν εἰλαστικῶν, from their scoffing and petulance. From some fragments of the Silli, written by Timon, we may find, that they were satiric poems, full of parodies; that is, of verses patched up from great poets and turned into another sense than their author intended them. Such among the Romans is the famous Centio of Anonius, where the words are Virgil's: but by applying them to another sense, they are made the relation of a wedding-night; and the act of consummation fulsomely described in the very words of the most modest amongst all poets. Of the same manner are our songs, which are turned into burlesque, and the serious words of the author perverted into a ridiculous meaning. Thus in Timon's Silli, the words are generally those of Homer, and the tragic poets; but he applies them satirically to some customs and kinds of philosophy, which he arraigns. But the Romans not using any of these parodies in their satires; sometimes, indeed, repeating verses of other men, as Persius cites some of Nero's; but not turning them into another meaning, the Silli cannot be supposed to be the original of Roman satire. To these Silli, consisting of parodies, we may properly add the satires which were written against particular persons; such as were the fables of Archilochus against Lycambes, which Horace undoubtedly imitated in some of his odes and epodes, whose titles bear a sufficient witness of it: I might also name the invective of Ovid against Ibis, and many others: but these are the underwood of satire, rather than the timber-tree, they are not a general extension, as reaching only to some individual person. And Horace seems to have purged himself from those splenetic reflections in those odes and epodes, before he undertook the noble work of satires, which were properly so called.

Thus, my lord, I have at length disengaged myself from those antiquities of Greece: and have proved, I hope, from the best critics, that the Roman satire was not borrowed from thence, but of their own manufacture: I am now almost gotten into my depth; at least by the help of Dacier I am swimming towards it. Not that I will promise always to follow him, any more than he follows Casaubon; but to keep him in my eye, as my best and truest guide; and where I think he may possibly mislead me, there to have recourse to my own lights, as I expect that others should do by me.

Quintilian says, in plain words, Satira quidem tota nostra est; and Horace has said the same thing before him, speaking of his predecessor in that sort of poetry, Et Græcis intacti carminis auctor. Nothing can be clearer than the opinion of the poet, and the orator, both the best critics of the two best ages of the Roman empire, than that satire was wholly of Latin growth, and not transplanted from Athens to Rome. Yet, as I have said, Scaliger the father, according to his custom, that is, insolently enough, contradicts them both; and gives no better reason, than the derivation of Satyrus from σαῦρος, salacitas; and so, from the lechery of those fawns, thinks he has sufficiently proved, that satire is derived from them. As if wantonness and lubricity were essential to that sort of poem, which ought to be avoided in it. His other allegation, which I have already mentioned, is as pitiful: that the satyrs carried platters and canisters full of fruit, in their hands. If they had entered empty-handed, had they been ever the less satyrs? Or were the fruits and flowers, which they offered, any thing of kin to satire? Or any argument that this poem was originally Grecian? Casaubon judged better, and his opinion is grounded on sure authority, that satire was derived from satura, a Roman word, which signifies full, and abundant, and full also of variety, in which nothing is wanting in its due perfection. It is thus, says Dacier, that we lay a full colour, when the wool has taken the whole tincture, and drunk in as much of the dye as it can receive. According to this derivation from satur, comes satura, or satyra, according to the new spelling; as optimus and maximus are now spelled optimus and maximus. Satura, as I have formerly noted, is an adjective, and relates to the word lanx, which is understood. And this lanx, in English, a charger, or large platter, was yearly filled with all sorts of fruits, which were offered to the gods at their festivals, as the premices, or first-gatherings. These offerings of several sorts thus mingled, it is true, were not known to the Grecians, who called them συνάγειον θυμίας, a sacrifice of all sorts of fruits; and συναγγίον, when they offered all kinds of grain. Virgil has mentioned these sacrifices in his Georgics.

Lancibus & pandis fumantia reddimus exta.

And in another place, Lancæque & libæ serenitas: that is, we offer the smoking entrails in great platters, and we will offer the chargers and the cakes.

This word satura has been afterwards applied to many other sorts of mixtures; as Festus calls it a kind of olla, or hotchpotch, made of several sorts of meats. Laws were also called legis satura, when they were of several heads and titles; like our tacked bills of parliament. And per saturaem legem ferre, in the Roman senate, was to carry a law without telling the separators, or counting voices, when they were in haste. Sallust uses the word per saturam sententias equirere; when the majority was visibly on one side. From hence it might probably be conjectured, that the discourses or satires of Ennius, Lucilius, and Horace, as we now call them, took their name; because they are full of various matters, and are also written on various subjects, as Porphyrius says. But Dacier affirms, that it is not immediately from thence that these satires are so called: for that name had been used formerly for other things, which bore a nearer resemblance to those discourses of Horace. In explaining of which (conjectures Dacier) a method is to be pursued, of which Casaubon himself has never thought, and which will put all things into so clear a light, that no farther room will be left for the least dispute.

During the space of almost four hundred years, since the building of their city, the Romans had never known any entertainments of the state: elegance and jollity first found out those verses which they called Saturnian, and Fescennine: or rather human nature, which is inclined to poetry, first produced them, rude and barbarous, and unpolished, as all other operations of the soul are in their beginnings, before they are cultivated with art and study. However, in occasions of merriment they were first practised; and this rough cast unknown poetry was instead of stage-plays, for the space of one hundred and twenty years together. They were made extempore, and were, as the French call them, impromptus; for which the Tartarians of old were much renowned; and we see the daily examples of them in the Italian farces of Harlequin and Saramucha. Such was the poetry of that savage people, before it was turned into numbers, and the harmony of verse. Little of the Saturnian verses is now remaining; we only know from authors, that they were nearer prose than poetry, without feet or measure. They were ἄμετρον, but not ἄμετρον: perhaps they might be used in the solemn part of their ceremonies; and the Fescennine, which were invented after them, in their afternoon's debauchery, because they were scoffing and obscene.

The Fescennine and Saturnian were the same; for as they were called Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy; they were also called Fescennine, from Fescennina, a town in the same country, where they were first practised. The actors, with a gross and rustic kind of raillery, reproached each other with their failing; and at the same time were nothing sparing of it to their audience. Somewhat of this custom was afterwards retained in their Saturnalia, or feasts of Saturn, celebrated in December; at least all kind of freedom in speech was then allowed to slaves, even against their masters; and we are not without some imitation of it in our Christmas gambols. Soldiers also used those Fescennine verses, after measure and numbers had been added to them, at the triumph of their generals: of which we have an example, in the triumph of Julius Caesar over Gaul, in these expressions: Cæsar Gallias subegit, Nicomedes Cæsarem; ecce Cæsar nunc triumphat; qui subegit Gallias; Nicomedes non triumphat, qui subegit Cæsarem. The vapours of wine made the first satirical poets amongst the Romans; which, says Dacier, we cannot better represent, than by imagining a company of clowns on a holiday, dancing lubberly, and upbraiding one another in extempore doggerel, with their defects and vices, and the stories that were told of them in bakeshouses and barbers' shops.

When they began to be somewhat better bred, and were entering, as I may say, into the first rudiments of civil conversation, they left these hedge-notes, for another sort of poem, somewhat polished, which was also full of pleasant raillery, but without any mixture of obscenity. This sort of poetry appeared under the name of satire, because of its variety: and this satire was adorned with compositions of music, and with dances; but lascivious postures were banished from it. In the Tuscan language, says Livy, the word histra signifies a player: and therefore those actors, which were first brought from Etruria to Rome, on occasion of a pestilence; when the Romans were admonished to avert the anger of the gods by plays, in the year ab Urbe Condita cccæ; those actors, I say, were therefore called histriones; and that name has since remained, not only to actors Roman born, but to all others of every nation. They played not the former extempore stuff of Fescennine verses, or clownish jests; but what they acted was a kind of civil cleanly farce, with music and dances, and motions that were proper to the subject.

In this condition Livius Andronicus found the stage, when he attempted first, instead of farces, to supply it with a nobler entertainment of tragedies and comedies. This man was a Grecian born, and being made a slave by Livius Salinator, and brought to Rome, had the education of his patron's children committed to him. Which trust he discharged so much to the satisfaction of his master, that he gave him his liberty.

Andronicus, thus become a freeman of Rome, added to his own name that of Livius his master; and, as I observed, was the first author of a regular play in that commonwealth. Being already instructed, in his native country, in the manners and decencies of the Athenian theatre, and conversant in the Archæ comedie, or old comedy of Aristophanes, and the rest of the Grecian poets; he took from that model his own designing of plays for the Roman stage. The first of which was represented in the year ccccciv since the building of Rome, as Tully, from the commentaries of Atticus, has assured us: it was after the end of the first Punic war, the year before Ennius was born. Dacier has not carried the matter altogether thus far; he only says, that one Livius Andronicus was the first stage-poet at Rome: but I will adventure on this hint, to advance another proposition, which I hope the learned will approve. And though we have not any thing of Andronicus remaining to justify my conjecture, yet it is exceeding probable, that having read the works of those Grecian wits, his countrymen, he imitated not only the ground-work, but also the manner of their writing. And how grave soever his tragedies might be, yet in his comedies he expressed the way of Aristophanes, Eupolis, and the rest, which was to call some persons by their own names, and to expose their defects to the laughter of the people. The examples of which we have in the forementioned Aristophanes, who turned the wise Socrates into ridicule; and is also very free with the management of Cleon, Alcibiades, and other ministers of the Athenian government. Now if this be granted, we may easily suppose, that the first hint of satirical plays on the Roman stage, was given by the Greeks. Not from the Satyrica, for that has been reasonably explained in the former part of this discourse; but from their old comedy, which was imitated first by Livius Andronicus. And then Quintilian and Horace must be cautiously interpreted, where they affirm, that satire is wholly Roman; and a sort of verse, which was not touched on by the Grecians. The reconciliation of my opinion to the standard of their judgment, is not, however, very difficult, since they spake of satire, not as in its first elements, but as it was formed into a separate work; begun by Ennius, pursued by Lucilius, and completed afterwards by Horace. The proof depends only on this postulatam: that the comedies of Andronicus, which were imitations of the Greek, were also imitations of their raileries, and reflections on particular persons. For if this be granted me, which is a most probable supposition, it is easy to infer, that the first light which was given to the Roman theatrical satire, was from the plays of Livius Andronicus. Which will be more manifestly discovered, when I come to speak of Ennius. In the meantime I will return to Dacier.

The people, says he, ran in crowds to these new entertainments of Andronicus, as to pieces which were more noble in their kind, and more perfect than their former satires, which for some time they neglected and abandoned. But not long after, they took them up again, and then they joined them to their comedies: playing them at the end of every drama; as the French continue at this day to act their farces; in the nature of a separate entertainment from their tragedies. But more particularly they were joined to the Attellane fables, says Casaubon; which were plays invented by the Œcol. Those fables, says Valerius Maximus, out of Livy, were tempered with the Italian severity, and free from any note of infamy or obscenity; and, as an old commentator on Juvenal affirms, the Exordiarii, which were singers and dancers, entered to entertain the people with light songs, and mimical gestures, that they might not go away oppressed with melancholy, from those serious pieces of the theatre. So that the ancient satire of the Romans was in extemporary reproaches: the next was farce, which was brought from Tuscany: to that succeeded the plays of Andronicus, from the old comedy of the Grecians: and out of all these, sprung two several branches of new Roman satire; like different cions from the same root: which I shall prove with as much brevity as the subject will allow.

A year after Andronicus had opened the Roman stage with his new dramas, Ennius was born; who, when he was grown to man's estate, having seriously considered the genius of the people, and how eagerly they followed the first satires, thought it would be worth his pains to refine upon the project, and to write satires, not to be acted on the theatre, but read. He preserved the ground-work of their pleasantry, their venom, and their railery on particular persons, and general vices: and by this means, avoiding the danger of any ill success in a public representation, he hoped to be as well received in the cabinet as Andronicus had been upon the stage. The event was answerable to his expectation. He made discourses in several sorts of verse, varied often in the same paper; retaining still in the title their original name of satire. Both in relation to the subjects and the variety of matters contained in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them; only Ennius, as I said, confines not himself to one sort of verse, as Horace does; but, taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the licence, when one sort of numbers comes not easily, to run into another, as his fancy dictates. For he makes no difficulty to mingle hexameter with iambic trimeters, or with trochaic tetrameters: as appears by those fragments which are yet remaining of him: Horace has thought him worthy to be copied; inserting many things of his into his own satires, as Virgil has done in his Æneid.

Here we have Dacier making out that Ennius was the first satirist in that way of writing, which was of his invention; that is, satire abstracted from the stage, and now modelled into papers of verse, on several subjects. But he will have Ennius take the groundwork of satire from the first farces of the Romans, rather than from the formed plays of Livius Andronicus, which were copied from the Grecian comedies. It may possibly be so; but Dacier knows no more of it than I do. And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he rather imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of all his old countrymen, in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.

But, besides this, it is universally granted, that Ennius, though an Italian, was excellently learned in the Greek language. His verses were stuffed with fragments of it, even to a fault: and he himself believed, according to the Pythagorean opinion, that the soul of Homer was transfused into him: which Persius observes in his sixth satire: postquam destertuit esse Mœnoides. But this being only the private opinion of so inconsiderable a man as I am, I leave it to the farther disquisition of the critics, if they think it worth their notice. Most evident it is, that whether he imitated the Roman farce, or the Greek comedies, he is to be acknowledged for the first author of Roman satire, as it is properly so called, and distinguished from any sort of stage-play.

Of Pacuvius, who succeeded him, there is little to be said, because there is so little remaining of him: only that he is taken to be the nephew of Ennius, his sister's son; that in probability he was instructed by his uncle, in his way of satire, which we are told he has copied; but what advances he made, we know not.

Lucilius came into the world, when Pacuvius flourished most; he also made satires after the manner of Ennius, but he gave them a more graceful turn; and endeavoured to imitate more closely the Vetus Comœdia of the Greeks: of the which the old original Roman satire had no idea, till the time of Livius Andronicus. And though Horace seems to have made Lucilius the first author of satire in verse amongst the Romans, in these words, Quid cum est Lucilius auctus primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem: he is only thus to be understood, that Lucilius had given a more graceful turn to the satire of Ennius and Pacuvius; not that he invented a new satire of his own: and Quintilian seems to explain this passage of Horace, in these words: Satira quidem tota nostra est, in qua primus insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius.

Thus, both Horace and Quintilian give a kind of primacy of honour to Lucilius, among the Latin satirists. For as the Roman language grew more refined, so much more capable it was of receiving the Grecian beauties in his time; Horace and Quintilian could mean no more, than that Lucilius writ better than Ennius and Pacuvius: and on the same account we prefer Horace to Lucilius: both of them imitated the old Greek comedy; and so did Ennius and Pacuvius before them. The polishing of the Latin tongue, in the succession of times, made the only difference. And Horace himself, in two of his satires, written purposely on this subject, thinks the Romans of his age too partial in their commendations of Lucilius; who writ not only loosely, and muddily, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time when the Latin tongue was not yet sufficiently purged from the dregs of barbarism; and many significant and sounding words; which the Romans wanted, were not admitted even in the time of Læretius and Clostrus, of which both complain.

But, to proceed, Dacier justly taxes Casaubon, saying, that the satires of Lucilius were vastly different in specie, from those of Ennius and Pacuvius. Casaubon was led into that mistake by Diomedes the grammarian, who in effect says that satire, among the Romans, but not among the Greeks, was a biting invective poem, made after the model of the ancient comedy for the reprehension of vices: such as were the poems of Lucilius, of Horace, and of Persius. But in former times, the name of satire was given to poems, which were composed of several sorts of verses: such as were made by Ennius and Pacuvius: more fully expressing the etymology of the word satire from satire, which we have observed. Here it is manifest, that Diomedes makes a specific distinction betwixt the satires of Ennius and those of Lucilius. But this, as we say in English, is only a distinction, without a difference; for the reason of it is ridiculous, and absolutely false. This was that which censured honest Casaubon, who, relying on Diomedes, had not sufficiently examined the origin and nature of those two satires: which were entirely the same, both in the matter and the form. For all that Lucilius performed beyond his predecessors, Ennius and Pacuvius, was only the adding of more politeness, and more salt; without any change in the substance of the poem: and though Lucilius put not together in the same satire several sorts of verses, as Ennius did; yet he composed several satires, of several sorts of verses, and mingled them with Greek verses: one poem consisted only of hexameters; and another was entirely of iambs; a third of trochaics; as is visible, by the fragments yet remaining of his works. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much more of beauty and polishing to his own poems, than are to be found in those before him; it will follow from hence, that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpassed Lucilius in the elegance of his writing, than Lucilius surpassed Ennius in the turn and ornament of his. This passage of Diomedes has also drawn Down, the son, into the same error of Casaubon, which I say, not to expose the little failings of those judicious men, but only to make it appear, with how much diffidence and caution we are to read their works, when they treat a subject of so much obscurity, and so very ancient, as is this of satire.

Having thus brought down the history of satire from its original, to the times of Horace, and shown the several changes of it; I should here discover some of those graces which Horace added to it, but that I think it will be more proper to defer that undertaking, till I make the comparison betwixt him and Juvenal. In the meanwhile, following the order of time, it will be necessary to say somewhat of another kind of satire, which also was descended from the ancients: it is that which we call the Varronian satire, but which Varro himself calls the Menippean; because Varro, the most learned of the Romans, was the first author of it, who imitated, in his works, the manner of Menippus, the Gadarenian, who professed the philosophy of the Cynics.

This sort of satire was not only composed of several sorts of verse, like those of Ennius, but was also mixed with prose; and Greek was sprinkled amongst the Latin. Quintilian, after he had spoken of the satire of Lucilius, adds what follows: "There is another and former kind of satire, composed by Terentius Varro, the most learned of the Romans: in which he was not satisfied alone with mingling in it several sorts of verse." The only difficulty of this passage is, that Quintilian tells us, that this satire of Varro was of a former kind. For how can we possibly imagine this to be, since Varro, who was contemporary to Cicero, must consequently be after Lucilius? Quintilian meant not, that the satire of Varro was in order of time before Lucilius; he would only give us to understand, that the Varronian satire, with a mixture of several sorts of verses, was more after the manner of Ennius and Pacuvius, than that of Lucilius, who was more severe, and more correct; and gave himself less liberty in the mixture of his verses, in the same poem.

We have nothing remaining of those Varronian satires, excepting some inconsiderable fragments, and those for the most part much corrupted. The titles of many of them are indeed preserved, and they are generally double: from whence, at least, we may understand, how many various subjects were treated by that author. Tully, in his Academics, introduces Varro himself, giving us some light concerning the scope and design of those works. Wherein, after he had shown his reasons why he did not ex professo write of philosophy, he adds what follows. Notwithstanding, says he, that those pieces of mine, wherein I have imitated Menippus, though I have not translated him, are sprinkled with a kind of mirth and gaiety: yet many things are there inserted which are drawn from the very intrails of philosophy, and many things severely argued: which I have mingled with pleasantries on purpose that they may more easily go down with the common sort of unlearned readers. The rest of the sentence is so lame, that we can only make thus much out of it; that in the composition of his satires, he so tempered philology with philosophy, that his work was a mixture of them both. And Tully himself confirms us in this opinion; when a little after he addresses himself to Varro in these words: "And you yourself have composed a most elegant and complete poem; you have begun philosophy in many places: sufficient to incite us, though too little to instruct us." Thus it appears, that Varro and the variety of matters contained in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them; only Ennius, as I said, confines not himself to one sort of verse, as Horace does; but, taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the licence, when one sort of numbers comes not easily, to run into another, as his fancy dictates. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much more of beauty and polishing to his own poems, than are to be found in those before him; it will follow from hence, that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpassed Lucilius in the elegance of his writing, than Lucilius surpassed Ennius in the turn and ornament of his: This passage of Diomedes has also drawn Douss, the son, into the same error of Casaubon, which I say, not to expose the little failings of those judicious men, but only to make it appear, with how much diffidence and caution we are to read their works, when they treat a subject of so much obscurity, and so very ancient, as is this of satire.

Having thus brought down the history of satire from its original, to the times of Horace, and shown the several changes of it; I should here discover some of those graces which Horace added to it, but that I think it will be more proper to defer that undertaking, till I make the comparison betwixt him and Juvenal. In the meanwhile, following the order of time, it will be necessary to say somewhat of another kind of satire, which also was descended from the ancients: it is that which we call the Varronian satire, but which Varro himself calls the Menippean; because Varro, the most learned of the Romans, was the first author of it, who imitated, in his works, the manner of Menippus, the Galatarnian, who professed the philosophy of the Cynics.

This sort of satire was not only composed of several sorts of verse, like those of Ennius, but was also mixed with prose; and Greek was sprinkled amongst the Latin. Quintilian, after he had spoken of the satire of Lucilius, adds what follows: "There is another and former kind of satire, composed by Terentius Varro, the most learned of the Romans: in which he was not satisfied alone with mingling in it several sorts of verse." The only difficulty of this passage is, that Quintilian tells us, that this satire of Varro was of a former kind. For how can we possibly imagine this to be, since Varro, who was contemporary to Cicero, must consequently be after Lucilius? Quintilian meant not, that the satire of Varro was in order of time before Lucilius; he would only give us to understand, that the Varronian satire, with a mixture of several sorts of verses, was more after the manner of Ennius and Pacuvius, than that of Lucilius, who was more severe, and more correct; and gave himself less liberty in the mixture of his verses, in the same poem.

We have nothing remaining of those Varronian satires, excepting some inconsiderable fragments, and those for the most part much corrupted. The titles of many of them are indeed preserved, and they are generally double: from whence, at least, we may understand, how many various subjects were treated by that author. Tully, in his Academics, introduces Varro himself, giving us some light concerning the scope and design of those works. Wherein, after he had shown his reasons why he did not ex professo write of philosophy, he adds what follows. Notwithstanding, says he, that those pieces of mine, wherein I have imitated Menippus, though I have not translated him, are sprinkled with a kind of mirth and gaiety: yet many things are there inserted which are drawn from the very intrails of philosophy, and many things severely argued: which I have mingled with pleasantries on purpose that they may more easily go down with the common sort of unlearned readers. The rest of the sentence is so lame, that we can only make thus much out of it; that in the composition of his satires, he so tempered philology with philosophy, that his work was a mixture of them both. And Tully himself confirms us in this opinion; when a little after he addresses himself to Varro in these words: "And you yourself have composed a most elegant and complete poem; you have begun philosophy in many places: sufficient to incite us, though too little to instruct us." Thus it appears, that Varro and the variety of matters contained in them, the satires of Horace are entirely like them; only Ennius, as I said, confines not himself to one sort of verse, as Horace does; but, taking example from the Greeks, and even from Homer himself in his Margites, which is a kind of satire, as Scaliger observes, gives himself the licence, when one sort of numbers comes not easily, to run into another, as his fancy dictates. For he makes no difficulty to mingle hexameter with iambic trimeters, or with trochaic tetrameters; as appears by those fragments which are yet remaining of him: Horace has thought him worthy to be copied; inserting many things of his into his own satires, as Virgil has done in his Æneid.

Here we have Dacier making out that Ennius was the first satirist in that way of writing, which was of his invention; that is, satire abstracted from the stage, and now modelled into papers of verse, on several subjects. But he will have Ennius take the groundwork of satire from the first farces of the Romans, rather than from the formed plays of Livius Andronicus, which were copied from the Grecian comedies. It may possibly be so; but Dacier knows no more of it than I do. And it seems to me the more probable opinion, that he rather imitated the fine railleries of the Greeks, which he saw in the pieces of Andronicus, than the coarseness of all his old countrymen, in their clownish extemporary way of jeering.

But, besides this, it is universally granted, that Ennius, though an Italian, was excellently learned in the Greek language. His verses were stuffed with fragments of it, even to a fault: and he himself believed, according to the Pythagorean opinion, that the soul of Homer was transfused into him: which Persius observes in his sixth satire: postquam destertuit esse Mimoides. But this being only the private opinion of so inconsiderable a man as I am, I leave it to the farther disquisition of the critics, if they think it worth their notice. Most evident it is, that whether he imitated the Roman farce, or the Greek comedies, he is to be acknowledged for the first author of Roman satire, as it is properly so called, and distinguished from any sort of stage-play.

Of Pacuvius, who succeeded him, there is little to be said, because there is so little remaining of him: only that he is taken to be the nephew of Ennius, his sister's son; that in probability he was instructed by his uncle, in his way of satire, which we are told he has copied; but what advances he made, we know not.

Lucilius came into the world, when Pacuvius flourished most; he also made satires after the manner of Ennius, but he gave them a more graceful turn; and endeavoured to imitate more closely the Vetus Comœdia of the Greeks: of the which the old original Roman satire had no idea, till the time of Livius Andronicus. And though Horace seems to have made Lucilius the first author of satire in verse amongst the Romans, in these words, Quid cum not Lucilius assus primus in hunc operis componere carmina morem: he is only thus to be understood, that Lucilius had given a more graceful turn to the satire of Ennius and Pacuvius; not that he invented a new satire of his own: and Quintilian seems to explain this passage of Horace, in these words: Satira quidem tota nostra est, in qua primus insignem laudem adeptus est Lucilius.

Thus, both Horace and Quintilian give a kind of primacy of honour to Lucilius, among the Latin satirists. For as the Roman language grew more refined, so much more capable it was of receiving the Grecian beauties in his time: Horace and Quintilian could mean no more, than that Lucilius writ better than Ennius and Pacuvius: and on the same account we prefer Horace to Lucilius; both of them imitated the old Greek comedy; and so did Ennius and Pacuvius before them. The polishing of the Latin tongue, in the succession of times, made the only difference. And Horace himself, in two of his satires, written purposely on this subject, thinks the Romans of his age were too partial in their commendations of Lucilius; who writ not only loosely, and loosely, with little art, and much less care, but also in a time when the Latin tongue was not yet sufficiently purged from the dregs of barbarism; and many significant and sounding words, which the Romans wanted, were not admitted even in the time of Lucretius and Cicero, of which both complain.

But, to proceed, Dacier justly taxes Casaubon, saying, that the satires of Lucilius were wholly different in specie, from those of Ennius and Pacuvius. Casaubon was led into that mistake by Diomedes the grammarian, who in effect says this: satire, among the Romans, but not among the Greeks, was a biting invective poem, made after the model of the ancient comedy for the reprehension of vices: such as were the poems of Lucilius, of Horace, and of Persius. But in former times, the name of satire was given to poems, which were composed of several sorts of verses: such as were made by Ennius and Pacuvius: more fully expressing the etymology of the word satira.

from satire, which we have observed. Here it is manifest, that Diomedes makes a specific distinction betwixt the satires of Ennius and those of Lucilius. But this, as we say in English, is only a distinction, without a difference; for the reason of it is ridiculous, and absolutely false. This was that which censured honest Casaubon, who, relying on Diomedes, had not sufficiently examined the origin and nature of those two satires: which were entirely the same, both in the matter and the form. For all that Lucilius performed beyond his predecessors, Ennius and Pacuvius, was only the adding of more politeness, and more salt; without any change in the substance of the poem: and though Lucilius put not together in the same satire several sorts of verses, as Ennius did; yet he composed several satires, of several sorts of verses, and mingled them with Greek verses: one poem consisted only of hexameters; and another was entirely of iambs; a third of trocheals; as is visible, by the fragments yet remaining of his works. In short, if the satires of Lucilius are therefore said to be wholly different from those of Ennius, because he added much more of beauty and polishing to his own poems, than are to be found in those before him; it will follow from hence, that the satires of Horace are wholly different from those of Lucilius, because Horace has not less surpassed Lucilius in the elegance of his writing, than Lucilius surpassed Ennius in the turn and ornament of his. Thus it appears, that Varro was one of those writers whom they called συνδογασταί, studious of laughter; and that, as learned as he was, his business was more to divert his reader, than to teach him. And he entitled his own satires Menippean: not that Menippus had written any satires (for his were either dialogues or epistles), but that Varro imitated his style, his manner, his facetiousness. All that we know farther of Menippus and his writings, which are wholly lost, is, that by some he is esteemed, as, amongst the rest, by Varro: by others he is noted of cynical impudence, and obscenity: that he was much given to those parodies, which I have already mentioned; that is, he often quoted the verses of Homer and the tragic poets, and turned their serious meaning into something that was ridiculous; whereas Varro's satires are by Tully called absolute, and most elegant, and various poems. Lucian, who was emulous of this Menippus, seems to have imitated both his manners and his style in many of his dialogues; where Menippus himself is often introduced as a speaker in them, and as a perpetual buffoon: particularly his character is expressed in the beginning of that dialogue, which is called Μακρομετρία. But Varro, in imitating him, avoids his impudence and filthiness, and only expresses his witty pleasantry.

This we may believe for certain, that as his subjects were various, so most of them were tales or stories of his own invention. Which is also manifest from antiquity, by those authors who are acknowledged to have written Varronian satires, in imitation of his: of whom the chief is Petronius Arbiter, whose satire, they say, is now printed in Holland, wholly recovered, and made complete: when it is made public, it will easily be seen by any one sentence, whether it be supposititious, or genuine. Many of Lucian's dialogues may also be properly called Varronian satires; particularly his True History: and consequently the Golden Ass of Apuleius, which is taken from him. Of the same stamp is the Mock Deification of Claudius, by Seneca: and the Symposium, or Cæsars of Julian the emperor. Amongst the moderns we may reckon the Encomium Moris of Erasmus, Barclay's Euphormio, and a volume of German authors, which my ingenious friend Mr. Charles Killigrew once lent me. In the English I remember none, which are mixed with prose, as Varro's were: but of the same kind is Mother Hubbard's Tale in Spenser; and (if it be not too vain to mention any thing of my own) the poems of Absalom and Mac Fleckno.

This is what I have to say in general of satire:

only, as Dacier has observed before me, we may take notice, that the word satire is of a more general signification in Latin, than in French, or English. For amongst the Romans it was not only used for those discourses which decried vice, or exposed folly; but for others also, where virtue was recommended. But in our modern languages we apply it only, to the invective poems, where the very name of satire is formidable to those persons, who would appear to the world, what they are not in themselves. For in English, to say satire, is to mean, reflection, as we use that word in the worst sense; or as the French call it, more properly, medisance. In the criticism of spelling, it ought to be with i, and not with y, to distinguish its true derivation, from saturn, not from Satyrus. And if this be so, then it is false spelled throughout this book; for here it is written satyr. Which having not, considered at the first, I thought it not worth correcting afterwards. But the French are more nice, and never spell it any other way than satire.

I am now arrived at the most difficult part of my undertaking, which is, to compare Horace with Juvenal and Persius. It is observed by Rigaltius, in his preface before Juvenal, written to Thuanus, that these three poets have all their particular partisans, and favourers: every commentator, as he has taken pains with any of them, thinks himself obliged to prefer his author to the other two: to find out their failings, and decry them, that he may make room for his own darling. Such is the partiality of mankind, to set up that interest which they have once espoused, though it be to the prejudice of truth, morality, and common justice: and especially in the productions of the brain. As authors generally think themselves the best poets, because they cannot go out of themselves to judge sincerely of their betters; so it is with critics, who, having first taken a liking to one of these poets, proceed to comment on him, and to illustrate him: after which, they fall in love with their own labours, to that degree of blind fondness, that at length they defend and exalt their author, not so much for his sake as for their own. It is a folly of the same nature, with that of the Romans themselves, in their games of the Circus; the spectators were divided in their factions, betwixt the Veneti and the Praeni: some were for the charioteer in blue, and some for him in green. The colours themselves were but a fancy; but when once a man had taken pains to set out those of his party, and had been at the trouble of procuring voices for them, the case was altered: he was concerned for his own labour; and that so earnestly, that disputes and quarrels, animosities, commotions, and bloodshed, often happened: and in the declension of the Grecian empire, the very sovereigns themselves engaged in it, even when the Barbarians were at their doors; and stickled for the preference of colours, when the safety of their people was in question. I am now myself on the brink of the same precipice; I have spent some time on the translation of Juvenal and Persius; and it behoves me to be wary, lest, for that reason, I should be partial to them, or take a prejudice against Horace. Yet, on the other side, I would not be like some of our judges, who would give the cause for a poor man, right or wrong: for though that be an error on the better hand, yet it is still a partiality: and a rich man unheard, cannot be concluded an oppressor. I remember a saying of king Charles II. on sir Matthew Hales, (who was doubtless an uncorrupt and upright man) that his servants were sure to be cast on a trial, which was heard before him: not that he thought the judge was possible to be bribed; but that his integrity might be too scrupulous; and that the causes of the crown were always suspicious, when the privileges of subjects were concerned.

It had been much fairer, if the modern critics, who have embarked in the quarrels of their favourite authors, had rather given to each his proper due, without taking from another's heap, to raise their own. There is praise enough for each of them in particular, without encroaching on his fellows, and detracting from them, or enriching themselves with the spoils of them. But to come to particulars: Heinsius and Dacier are the most principal of those, who raise Horace above Juvenal and Persius. Scaliger the father, Rigaltius, and many others, debase Horace, that they may set up Juvenal: and Casaubon, who is almost single, throws dirt on Juvenal and Horace, that he may exalt Persius, whom he understood particularly well, and better than any of the former commentators; even Stelluti, who succeeded him. I will begin with him, who, in my opinion, defends the weakest cause, which is that of Persius; and labouring, as Tacitus professes of his own writings, "to divest myself of partiality, or prejudice," consider Persius, not as a poet whom I have wholly translated, and who has cost me more labour and time than Juvenal; but according to what I judge to be his own merit; which I think not equal, in the main, to that of Juvenal or

Horace; and yet, in some things, to be preferred to both of them.

First, then, for the verse, neither Casaubon himself, nor any for him, can defend either his numbers, or the purity of his Latin. Casaubon gives this point for lost; and pretends not to justify either the measures, or the words of Persius: he is evidently beneath Horace and Juvenal, in both.

Then, as his verse is scabrous, and hobbling, and his words not every where well chosen, the purity of Latin being more corrupted than in the time of Juvenal, and consequently of Horace, who writ when the language was in the height of its perfection; so his diction is hard; his figures are generally too bold and daring; and his tropes, particularly his metaphors, insufferably strained.

In the third place, notwithstanding all the diligence of Casaubon, Stelluti, and a Scotch gentleman (whom I have heard extremely commended for his illustrations of him), yet he is still obscure: whether he affected not to be understood, but with difficulty, or whether the fear of his safety under Nero compelled him to this darkness in some places; or, that it was occasioned by his close way of thinking, and the brevity of his style, and crowding of his figures; or, lastly, whether, after so long a time, many of his words have been corrupted, and many customs, and stories relating to them, lost to us; whether some of these reasons, or all, concurred to render him so cloudy; we may be bold to affirm, that the best of commentators can but guess at his meaning, in many passages: and none can be certain that he has divined rightly.

After all, he was a young man, like his friend and contemporary Lucan: both of them men of extraordinary parts, and great acquired knowledge, considering their youth. But neither of them had arrived to that maturity of judgment, which is necessary to the accomplishing of a formed poet. And this consideration, as on the one hand it lays some imperfections to their charge: so on the other side, it is a candid excuse for those failings, which are incident to youth and inexperience; and we have more reason to wonder how they, who died before the thirtieth year of their age, could write so well, and think so strongly; than to accuse them of those faults, from which human nature, and more especially in youth, can never possibly be exempted.

To consider Persius yet more closely: he rather insulted over vice and folly, than exposed them, like Juvenal and Horace. And as chaste and modest as he is esteemed, it cannot be denied, but that in some places he is broad and fulsome, as the latter verses of the fourth satire, and of the sixth, sufficiently witnessed. And it is to be believed, that he who commits the same crime often, and without necessity, cannot but do it with some kind of pleasure.

To come to a conclusion: he is manifestly below Horace, because he borrows most of his greatest beauties from him: and Casaubon is so far from denying this, that he has written a treatise purposely concerning it; wherein he shows a multitude of his translations from Horace, and his imitations of him, for the credit of his author, which he calls Imitatio Horatiana.

To these defects, which I casually observed while I was translating this author, Scaliger has added others: he calls him, in plain terms, a silly writer, and a trifler; full of ostentation of learning; and, after all, unworthy to come into competition with Juvenal and Horace.

After such terrible accusations, it is time to hear what his patron Casaubon can allege in his defence. Instead of answering, he excuses for the most part; and when he cannot, accuses others of the same crimes. He deals with Scaliger, as a modest scholar with a master. He compliments him with so much reverence, that one would swear he feared him as much at least as he respected him. Scaliger will not allow Persius to have any wit: Casaubon interprets this in the mildest sense; and confesses his author was not good at turning things into a pleasant ridicule; or, in other words, that he was not a laughable writer. That he was ineptus, indeed, but that was non aptissimus ad jocandum. But that he was ostentatious of his learning, that, by Scaliger's good favour, he denies. Persius showed his learning, but was no boaster of it; he did ostendere, but not ostentare; and so, he says, did Scaliger: where, methinks, Casaubon turns it handsomely upon that supercilious critic, and silently insinuates that he himself was sufficiently vain-glorious, and a boaster of his own knowledge. All the writings of this venerable censor, continues Casaubon, which are χρυσῶν χρυσίωνα, more golden than gold itself, are every where smelling of thyme, which, like a bee, he has gathered from ancient authors: but far be ostentation and vain-glory from a gentleman, so well born, and so nobly educated, as Scaliger. But, says Scaliger, he is so obscure, that he has got himself the name of Sootinus, a dark writer: now, says Casaubon, it is a wonder to me that any thing could be obscure to the divine wit of Scaliger; from which nothing could be hidden. This is indeed a strong compliment, but no defence. And Casaubon, who could not but be sensible of his author's blind side, thinks it time to abandon a post that was untenable. He acknowledges that Persius is obscure in some places: but so is Plato, so is Thucydides, so are Pindar, Theocritus, and Aristophanes, amongst the Greek poets; and even Horace and Juvenal, he might have added, amongst the Romans. The truth is, Persius is not sometimes, but generally obscure; and therefore Casaubon, at last, is forced to excuse him, by alleging, that it was se defendendo, for fear of Nero; and that he was commanded to write so cloudily by Cornutus, in virtue of holy obedience to his master. I cannot help my own opinion; I think Cornutus needed not to have read many lectures to him on that subject. Persius was an apt scholar; and when he was bidden to be obscure in some places, where his life and safety were in question, took the same counsel for all his books; and never afterwards wrote ten lines together clearly. Casaubon, being upon this chapter, has not failed, we may be sure, of making a compliment to his own dear comment. "If Persius," says he, "be in himself obscure, yet my interpretation has made him intelligible." There is no question but he deserves that praise, which he has given to himself; but the nature of the thing, as Lucretius says, will not admit of a perfect explanation. Besides many examples which I could urge, the very last verse of his last satire, upon which he particularly values himself in his preface, is not yet sufficiently explicated. It is true, Holiday has endeavoured to justify his construction; but Stelluti is against it; and for my part, I can have but a very dark notion of it. As for the chastity of his thoughts, Casaubon denies not but that one particular passage, in the fourth satire, At si unctus cesses, &c. is not only the most obscure, but the most obscene, of all his works: I understood it; but, for that reason, turned it over. In defence of his boisterous metaphors, he quotes Longinus, who accounts them as instruments of the sublime; fit to move and stir up the affections, particularly in narration. To which it may be replied, that where the trope is farfetched, and hard, it is fit for nothing but to puzzle the understanding; and may be reckoned amongst these things of Demosthenes which Ἐσχιναί called βαίματα not ῥήματα, that is, prodigies, not words. It must be granted to Casaubon, that the knowledge of many things is lost in our modern ages, which were of familiar notice to the ancients; and that satire is a poem of a difficult nature in itself, and is not written to vulgar readers. And, through the relation which it has to comedy, the frequent change of persons makes the sense perplexed, when we can but divine who it is that speaks; whether Persius himself, or his friend and monitor; or, in some places, a third person. But Casaubon comes back always to himself, and concludes, that if Persius had not been obscure, there had been no need of him for an interpreter. Yet when he had once enjoined himself so hard a task, he then considered the Greek proverb, that he must χιλίστις φάγῶν ἢ μὴ φάγῶν, either eat the whole snail, or let it quite alone; and so he went through with his laborious task, as I have done with my difficult translation.

Thus far, my lord, you see it has gone very hard with Persius: I think he cannot be allowed to stand in competition, either with Juvenal or Horace. Yet, for once, I will venture to be so vain, as to affirm, that none of his hard metaphors, or forced expressions, are in my translation: but more of this in its proper place, where I shall say somewhat in particular of our general performance, in making these two authors English. In the mean time, I think myself obliged to give Persius his undoubted due, and to acquaint the world, with Casaubon, in what he has equalled, and in what excelled, his two competitors.

A man who is resolved to praise an author, with any appearance of justice, must be sure to take him on the strongest side, and where he is least liable to exceptions. He is therefore obliged to choose his mediums accordingly; Casaubon, who saw that Persius could not laugh with a becoming grace, that he was not made for jesting, and that a merry conceit was not his talent, turned his feather, like an Indian, to another light, that he might give it the better gloss. Moral doctrine, says he, and urbanity, or well-mannered wit, are the two things which constitute the Roman satire. But of the two, that which is most essential to this poem, and is, as it were, the very soul which animates it, is the scourging of vice, and exhortation to virtue. Thus wit, for a good reason, is already almost out of doors; and allowed only for an instrument, a kind of tool, or a weapon, as he calls it, of which the satirist makes use, in the compassing of his design. The end and aim of our three rivals, is consequently the same. By what methods they have prosecuted their intention, is farther to be considered. Satire is of the nature of moral philosophy, as being instructive: he, therefore, who instructs most usefully, will carry the palm from his two antagonists. The philosophy in which Persius was educated, and which he professes through his whole book, is the stoic: the most noble, most generous, most beneficial to human kind, amongst all the sects, who have given us the rules of ethics, thereby to form a severe virtue in the soul; to raise in us an undaunted courage, against the assaults of fortune; to esteem as nothing the things that are without us, because they are not in our power; not to value riches, beauty, honours, fame, or health, any farther than as conveniences, and so many helps to living as we ought, and doing good in our generation. In short, to be any ways happy, while we possess our minds with a good conscience, or free from the slavery of vices, and conform our actions and conversations to the rules of right reason. See here, my lord, an epitome of Epictetus; the doctrine of Zeno, and the education of our Persius. And this he expressed, not only in all his satires, but in the manner of his life. I will not lessen this commendation of the stoic philosophy, by giving you an account of some absurdities in their doctrine, and some, perhaps, impieties, if we consider them by the standard of Christian faith: Persius has fallen into none of them; and therefore is free from those imputations. What he teaches might be taught from pulpits, with more profit to the audience, than all the nice speculations of divinity, and controversies concerning faith: which are more for the profit of the shepherd, than for the edification of the flock. Passion, interest, ambition, and all their bloody consequences of discord and of war, are banished from this doctrine. Here is nothing proposed but the quiet and tranquillity of the mind: virtue lodged at home, and afterwards diffused in her general effects, to the improvement and good of human kind. And therefore I wonder not that the present bishop of Salisbury has recommended this our author, and the tenth satire of Juvenal, in his Pastoral Letter, to the serious perusal and practice of the divines in his diocese, as the best common-places for their sermons, as the store-houses and magazines of moral virtues, from whence they may draw out, as they have occasion, all manner of assistance for the accomplishment of a virtuous life, which the stoics have assigned for the great end and perfection of mankind. Herein then it is, that Persius has excelled both Juvenal and Horace. He sticks to his own philosophy: he shifts not sides, like Horace, who is sometimes an Epicurean, sometimes a Stoic, sometimes an Eclectic, as his present humour leads him; nor declaims, like Juvenal, against vices, more like an orator, than a philosopher. Persius is every where the same; true to the dogmas of his master. What he has learnt, he teaches vehemently; and what he teaches, that he practises himself. There is a spirit of sincerity in all he says: you may easily discern that he is in earnest, and is persuaded of that truth which he inculcates. In this I am of opinion, that he excels Horace, who is commonly in jest, and laughs while he instructs: and is equal to Juvenal, who was as honest and serious as Persius, and more he could not be.

Hitherto I have followed Casaubon, and enlarged upon him; because I am satisfied that he says no more than truth; the rest is almost all frivolous. For he says, that Horace, being the son of a tax-gatherer, or a collector, as we call it, smells every where of the meanness of his birth and education: his conceits are vulgar, like the subjects of his satires; that he does plebeium sapere; and writes not with that elevation which becomes a satirist: that Persius being nobly born, and of an opulent family, had likewise the advantage of a better master; Cornutus being the most learned of his time, a man of the most holy life, the chief of the stoic sect at Rome; and not only a great philosopher, but a poet himself; and, in probability, a coadjutor of Persius. That, as for Juvenal, he was long a declaimer, came late to poetry, and has not been much conversant in philosophy.

It is granted, that the father of Horace was Libertinus, that is, one degree removed from his grandfather, who had been once a slave: but Horace, speaking of him, gives him the best character of a father, which I ever read in history; and I wish a witty friend of mine, now living, had such another. He bred him in the best school, and with the best company of young noblemen. And Horace, by his gratitude to his memory, gives a certain testimony that his education was ingenious. After this, he formed himself abroad, by the conversation of great men. Brutus found him at Athens, and was so pleased with him, that he took him thence into the army, and made him tribunus militum, a colonel in a legion, which was the preferment of an old soldier. All this was before his acquaintance with Mæcenas, and his introduction into the court of Augustus, and the familiarity of that great emperor; which, had he not been well-bred before, had been enough to civilize his conversation, and render him accomplished and knowing in all the arts of complacency and good behaviour; and, in short, an agreeable companion for the retired hours and privacies of a favourite, who was first minister. So that, upon the whole matter, Persius may be acknowledged to be equal with him in those respects, though better born, and Juvenal inferior to both. If the advantage be any where, it is on the side of Horace; as much as the court of Augustus Cæsar was superior to that of Nero. As for the subjects which they treated, it will appear hereafter, that Horace writ not vulgarly on vulgar subjects, nor always chose them. His style is constantly accommodated to his subject, either high or low: if his fault be too much lowness, that of Persius is the fault of the hardness of his metaphors and obscurity: and so they are equal in the failings of their style; where Juvenal manifestly triumphs over both of them.

The comparison betwixt Horace and Juvenal is more difficult; because their forces were more equal: a dispute has always been, and ever will continue, betwixt the favourers of the two poets. Non nostrum est tantas componere lites. I shall only venture to give my opinion, and leave it for better judges to determine. If it be only argued in general, which of them was the better poet, the victory is already gained on the side of Horace. Virgil himself must yield to him in the delicacy of his turns, his choice of words, and perhaps the purity of his Latin. He who says that Pindar is inimitable, is himself inimitable in his odes. But the contention betwixt these two great masters, is for the prize of satire: in which controversy, all the odes and epodes of Horace are to stand excluded. I say this, because Horace has written many of them satirically, against his private enemies: yet these, if justly considered, are somewhat of the nature of the Greek Silli, which were invectives against particular sects and persons. But Horace has purged himself of this cholera, before he entered on those discourses, which are more properly called the Roman satire: he has not now to do with a Lyce, a Canidia, a Cassius Severus, or a Menas; but is to correct the vices and the follies of his time, and to give the rules of a happy and virtuous life. In a word, that former sort of satire, which is known in England by the name of lampoon, is a dangerous sort of weapon, and for the most part unlawful. We have no moral right on the reputation of other men. It is taking from them what we cannot restore to them. There are only two reasons, for which we may be permitted to write lampoons; and I will not promise that they can always justify us: the first is revenge, when we have been affronted in the same nature, or have been any way notoriously abused, and can make ourselves no other reparation. And yet we know, that, in Christian charity, all offences are to be forgiven, as we expect the like pardon for those which we daily commit against Almighty God. And this consideration has often made me tremble when I was saying our Saviour's prayer; for the plain condition of the forgiveness which we beg, is the pardoning of others the offences which they have done to us: for which reason I have many times avoided the commission of that fault, even when I have been notoriously provoked. Let not this, thy Lord, pass for vanity in me; for it is truth. More libels have been written against me, than almost any man now living: and I had reason on my side, to have defended my own innocence: I speak not on my poetry, which I have wholly given up to the critics; let them use it as they please; posterity, perhaps, may be more favourable to me: for interest and passion will lie buried in another age; and partiality and prejudice be forgotten. I speak of my morals, which have been sufficiently aspersed; that any sort of reputation ought to be dear to every honest man, and is to me. But let the world witness for me, that I have been often wanting to myself in that particular; I have seldom answered any scurrilous lampoon, when it was in my power to have exposed my enemies: and, being naturally vindictive, have suffered in silence, and possessed my soul in quiet.

Any thing, though never so little, which a man speaks of himself, in my opinion, is still too much; and therefore I will wave this subject, and proceed to give the second reason, which may justify a poet, when he writes against a particular person: and that is, when he is become a public nuisance. And those, whom Horace in his satires, and Persius and Juvenal have mentioned in theirs, with a brand of infamy, are wholly such. It is an action of virtue to make examples of vicious men. They may and ought to be upbraided with their crimes and follies: both for their own amendment, if they are not yet incorrigible, and for the terrour of others, to hinder them from falling into those enormities, which they see are so severely punished in the persons of others. The first reason was only an excuse for revenge; but this second is absolutely of a poet's office to perform: but how few lampooners are there now living, who are capable of this duty! When they come in my way, it is impossible sometimes to avoid reading them. But, good God! how remote they are, in common justice, from the choice of such persons as are the proper subject of satire! and how little wit they bring, for the support of their injustice! The weaker sex is their most ordinary theme; and the best and fairest are sure to be the most severely handled. Amongst men, those who are prosperously unjust, are entitled to panegyric; but afflicted virtue is insolently stabbed with all manner of reproaches; no decency is considered, no fulsome omitted; no venom is wanting, as far as dulness can supply it: for there is a perpetual dearth of wit; a barrenness of good sense and entertainment. The neglect of the readers will soon put an end to this sort of scribbling. There can be no pleasantry where there is no wit: no impression can be made, where there is no truth for the foundation. To conclude, they are like the fruits of the earth in this unnatural season: the corn which held up its head, is spoiled with rankness; but the greater part of the harvest is laid along, and little of good income and wholesome nourishment is received into the barns. This is almost a digression, I confess to your lordship; but a just indignation forced it from me. Now I have removed this rubbish, I will return to the comparison of Juvenal and Horace.

I would willingly divide the palm betwixt them, upon the two heads of profit and delight, which are the two ends of poetry in general. It must be granted by the favourers of Juvenal, that Horace is the more copious and profitable in his instructions of human life: but in my particular opinion, which I set not up for a standard to better judgments, Juvenal is the more delightful author. I am profited by both, I am pleased with both; but I owe more to Horace, for my instruction; and more to Juvenal, for my pleasure. This, as I said, is my particular taste of these two authors: they who will have either of them to excel the other in both qualities, can scarce give better reasons for their opinion, than I for mine; but all unbiassed readers will conclude, that my moderation is not to be condemned; to such impartial men I must appeal: for they who have already formed their judgments, may justly stand suspected of prejudice; and though all who are my readers, will set up to be my judges, I enter my caveat against them, that they ought not so much as to be of my jury: or, if they be admitted, it is but reason that they should first hear what I have to urge in the defence of my opinion.

That Horace is somewhat the better instructor of the two, is proved from hence, that his instructions are more general: Juvenal's more limited.

So that granting, that the counsels which they give are equally good for moral use; Horace, who gives the most various advice, and most applicable to all occasions which can occur to us in the course of our lives; as including in his discourses not only all the rules of morality, but also of civil conversation; is undoubtedly to be preferred to him, who is more circumscribed in his instructions, makes them to fewer people, and on fewer occasions, than the other. I may be pardoned for using an old saying, since it is true, and to the purpose, Bonum quo communis, eo melius. Juvenal, excepting only his first satire, is, in all the rest, confined, to the exposing of some particular vice; that he lashes, and there he sticks. His sentences are truly shining and instructive; but they are sprinkled here and there. Horace is teaching us in every line, and is perpetually moral; he had found out the skill of Virgil, to hide his sentences: to give you the virtue of them, without showing them in their full extent: which is the ostentation of a poet, and not his art: and this Petronius charges on the authors of his time, as a vice of writing, which was then growing on the age. Ne sententiæ extra corpus orationis eminent: he would have them weaved into the body of the work, and not appear embossed upon it, and striking directly on the reader's view. Folly was the proper quarry of Horace, and not vice: and, as there are but few notoriously wicked men, in comparison with a shoal of fools and fops; so it is a harder thing to make a man wise, than to make him honest: for the will is only to be reclaimed in the one; but the understanding is to be informed in the other. There are blind sides and follies, even in the professors of moral philosophy; and there is not any one sect of them that Horace has not exposed. Which, as it was not the design of Juvenal, who was wholly employed in lashing vices, some of them the most enormous that can be imagined; so perhaps, it was not so much his talent. Omne vafer vitium ridenti Flaccus amico, tangit, & admissis circum præcordia ludit. This was the commendation which Persius gave him; where by vitium, he means those little vices, which we call follies, the defects of human understanding, or at most the peccadillos of life, rather than the tragical vices, to which men are hurried by their unruly passions and exorbitant desires. But in the word omne, which is universal, he concludes with me, that the divine wit of Horace left nothing untouched; that he entered into the inmost recesses of nature; found out the imperfections even of the most wise and grave, as well as of the common people; discovering, even in the great Trebatius, to whom he addresses the first satire, his hunting after business, and following the court, as well as in the persecutor Crispinus, his impertinence and importunity. It is true he exposes Crispinus openly, as a common nuisance; but he rallies the other as a friend, more finely. The exhortations of Persius are confined to noblemen; and the stoic philosophy is that alone which he recommends to them; Juvenal exhorts to particular virtues, as they are opposed to those vices against which he declaims; but Horace laughs to shame all follies, and insinuates virtue, rather by familiar examples, than by the severity of precepts.

This last consideration seems to incline the balance on the side of Horace, and to give him the preference to Juvenal, not only in profit, but in pleasure. But, after all, I must confess that the delight which Horace gives me, is but languishing. Be pleased still to understand, that I speak of my own taste only: he may ravish other men; but I am too stupid and insensible to be tickled. Where he barely grins himself, and as Scaliger says, only shows his white teeth, he cannot provoke me to any laughter. His urbanity, that is, his good manners, are to be commended; but his wit is faint; and his salt, if I may dare to say so, almost insipid. Juvenal is of a more vigorous and masculine wit; he gives me as much pleasure as I can bear: he fully satisfies my expectation; he treats his subject home: his spleen is raised, and he raises mine: I have the pleasure of concernment in all he says: he drives his reader along with him; and when he is at the end of his way, I willingly stop with him. If he went another stage, it would be too far, it would make a journey of a progress, and turn delight into fatigue. When he gives over, it is a sign the subject is exhausted, and the wit of man can carry it no farther. If a fault can justly be found in him, it is that he is sometimes too luxuriant, too redundant; says more than he needs, like my friend the Plain-dealer, but never more than pleases. Add to this, that his thoughts are as just as those of Horace, and much more elevated. His expressions are sonorous and more noble; his verse more numerous, and his words are suitable to his thoughts, sublime and lofty. All these contribute to the pleasure of the reader: and the greater the soul of him who reads, his transports are the greater. Horace is always on the amble, Juvenal on the gallop; but his way is perpetually on carpet-ground. He goes with more impetuosity than Horace, but as securely; and the swiftness adds a more lively agitation to the spirits. The low style of Horace is according to his subject, that is generally grave: I question not but he could have raised it: for the first epistle of the second book, which he writes to Augustus, (a most instructive satire concerning poetry,) is of so much dignity in the words, and of so much elegance in the numbers, that the author plainly shows, the sermo pedestris, in his other satires, was rather his choice than his necessity. He was a rival to Lucilius, his predecessor, and was resolved to surpass him in his own manner. Lucilius, as we see by his remaining fragments, minded neither his style nor his numbers, nor his purity of words, nor his run of verse: Horace therefore copes with him in that humble way of satire, writes under his own force, and carries a dead weight, that he may match his competitor in the race. This I imagine was the chief reason, why he minded only the clearness of his satire, and the cleanness of expression, without ascending to those heights, to which his own vigour might have carried him. But limiting his desires only to the conquest of Lucilius, he had the ends of his rival, who lived before him; but made way for a new conquest over himself, by Juvenal his successor. He could not give an equal pleasure to his reader; because he used not equal instruments. The fault was in the tools, and not in the workman. But versifications and numbers are the greatest pleasures of poetry: Virgil knew it, and practised both so happily, that, for aught I know, his greatest excellency is in his diction. In all other parts of poetry, he is faultless; but in this he placed his chief perfection. And, give me leave, my lord, since I have here an apt occasion, to say, that Virgil could have written sharper satires, than either Horace or Juvenal, if he would have employed his talent that way. I will produce a verse and a half of his, in one of his elogues, to justify my opinion; and with commas after every word, to show, that he has given almost as many lashes, as he has written syllables; it is against a bad poet, whose ill verses he describes: Non tu, in triviis, iedocte, solebas, stridenti, miserum, stipula, disperdere, carmen? But to return to my purpose: when there is any thing deficient in numbers and sound, the reader is uneasy and unsatisfied; he wants something of his compliment, desires somewhat which he finds not: and this being the manifest defect of Horace, it is no wonder that, finding it supplied in Juvenal, we are more delighted with him. And besides this, the sauce of Juvenal is more poignant, to create in us an appetite of reading him. The meat of Horace is more nourishing; but the cookery of Juvenal more exquisite; so that granting Horace to be the more general philosopher, we cannot deny that Juvenal was the greater poet, I mean in satire. His thoughts are sharper, his indignation against vice is more vehement; his spirit has more of the commonwealth genius; he treats tyranny, and all the vices attending it, as they deserve, with the utmost rigour: and consequently a noble soul is better pleased with a zealous vindicator of Roman liberty than with a temporizing poet, a well-mannered court slave, and a man who is often afraid of laughing in the right place; who is ever decent, because he is naturally servile. After all, Horace had the disadvantage of the times in which he lived; they were better for the man, but worse for the satirist. It is generally said, that those enormous vices which were practised under the reign of Domitian, were not known in the time of Augustus Cæsar: that therefore Juvenal had a larger field than Horace. Little follies were out of doors, when oppression was to be scourged instead of avarices; it was no longer time to turn into ridicule the false opinions of philosophers, when the Roman liberty was to be asserted. There was more need of a Brutus in Domitian's days, to redeem or mend, than of a Horace, if he had been then living, to laugh at a fly-catcher. This reflection at the same time excuses Horace, but exalts Juvenal. I have ended, before I was aware, the comparison of Horace and Juvenal, upon the topics of pleasure and delight; and, indeed, I may safely here conclude that common-place; for if we make Horace our minister of state in satire, and Juvenal of our private pleasures; I think the latter has no ill bargain of it. Let profit have the pre-eminence of honour, in the end of poetry. Pleasure, though but the second in degree, is the first in favour. And who would not chuse to be loved better, rather than to be more esteemed? But I am entered already upon another topic; which concerns the particular merits of these two satirists. However, I will pursue my business where I left it; and carry it farther than that common observation of the several ages in which these authors flourished. When Horace writ his satires, the monarchy of his Cæsar was in its newness, and the government but just made easy to the conquered people. They could not possibly have forgotten the usurpation of that prince upon their freedom, nor the violent methods which he had used, in the compassing that vast design: they yet remembered his proscriptions, and the slaughter of so many noble Romans, their defenders. Amongst the rest, that horrible action of his, when he forced Livia from the arms of her husband, who was constrained to see her married, as Dio relates the story, and, big with child as she was, conveyed to the bed of his insulting rival. The same Dion Cassius gives us another instance of the crime before mentioned: that Cornelius Sisenna, being reproached in full senate, with the licentious conduct of his wife, returned this answer; that he had married her by the counsel of Augustus: intimating, says my author, that Augustus had obliged him to that marriage that he might, under that covert, have the more free access unto her. His adulteries were still before their eyes, but they must be patient, where they had not power. In other things that emperor was moderate enough: propriety was generally secured, and the people entertained with public shows, and donatives, to make them more easily digest their lost liberty. But Augustus, who was conscious to himself of so many crimes which he had committed, thought in the first place to provide for his own reputation, by making an edict against lampoons and satires, and the authors of those defamatory writings, which my author Tacitus, from the law term, calls famosos libellos.

In the first book of his Annals, he gives the following account of it, in these words: Primus Augustus cognitionem de famosis libellis specie legis ejus, tractavit; commotus Cassii Severi libidini, quâ viros feminasque illustres, procacibus scriptis diffamaverat. Thus, in English: Augustus was the first, who under the colour of that law took cognizance of lampoons; being provoked to it, by the petulance of Cassius Severus, who had defamed many illustrious persons of both sexes, in his writings. The law to which Tacitus refers, was lex læsæ majestatis: commonly called for the sake of brevity, majestas; or, as we say, high treason: he means not that this law had not been enacted formerly: for it had been made by the Decemviri, and was inscribed amongst the rest in the twelve tables: to prevent the aspersion of the Roman majesty, either of the people themselves, or their religion, or their magistrates: and the infringement of it was capital; that is, the offender was whipt to death with the fasces, which were borne before the chief officers of Rome. But Augustus was the first, who restored that intermitted law: by the words, "under colour of that law," he insinuates that Augustus caused it to be executed, on pretence of those libels, which were written by Cassius Severus, against the nobility; but, in truth, to save himself from such defamatory verses. Suetonius likewise makes mention of it thus: Spartos de se in Carid famosos libellos, nec expavit, & magnâ curâ redarguit. Ac ne requisitis quidem auctoribus, id modo coarsuit, cognoscendus post hac, de iis qui libellos aut carmina ad infamiam cujuspiam sub alieno nomine edunt. Augustus was not afraid of libels, says that author: yet he took all care imaginable to have them answered; and then decreed, that for the time to come, the authors of them should be punished. But Aurelius makes it yet more clear, according to my sense, that this emperor, for his own sake, durst not permit them: Fecit id Augustus in speciem, & quasi gratificaretur populo Romano, & primoribus urbis; sed revera ut sibi consideret: nam habuit in animo, comprimere nimiam quorundam procacitatem in loquendo, à quâ nec ipse exemptus fuit. Nam suo nomine comperere erat invidiosum, sub alieno facile & utile. Ergo specie legis tractavit quasi populi Romani majestas infamaretur. This, I think, is a sufficient comment on that passage of Tacitus; I will add only, by the way, that the whole family of the Casars, and all their relations, were included in the law; because the majesty of the Romans, in the time of the empire, was wholly in that house; omnia Casar erat: they were all accounted sacred who belonged to him. As for Cassius Severus, he was contemporary with Horace; and was the same poet against whom he writes in his epodes, under this title, in Cassium Severum maledicum poetam; perhaps intending to kill two crows, according to our proverb, with one stone, and revenge both himself and his emperor together.

From hence I may reasonably conclude, that Augustus, who was not altogether so good as he was wise, had some by-respect in the enacting of this law: for to do any thing for nothing, was not his maxim. Horace, as he was a courtier, complied with the interest of his master; and avoiding the lashing of greater crimes, confined himself to the ridiculing of petty vices, and common follies; excepting only some reserved cases, in his odes and epodes, of his own particular quarrels, which, either with permission of the magistrate, or without it, every man will revenge, though I may not that he should; for prior læsit, is a good excuse in the civil law, if Christianity had not taught us to forgive. However, he was not the proper man to arraign great vices, at least if the stories which we hear of him are true, that he practised some, which I will not here mention, out of honour to him. It was not for a Clodius to accuse adulterers, especially when Augustus was of that number: so that though his age was not exempted from the worst of villainies, there was no freedom left to reprehend them, by reason of the edict. And our poet was not fit to represent them in an odious character, because himself was dipt in the same actions. Upon this account, without farther insisting on the different tempers of Juvenal and Horace, I conclude, that the subjects which Horace chose for satire, are of a lower nature than those of which Juvenal has written.

Thus I have treated, in a new method, the comparison betwixt Horace, Juvenal, and Persius; somewhat of their particular manner belonging to all of them is yet remaining to be considered. Persius was grave, and particularly opposed his gravity to lewdness, which was the predominant vice in Nero's court, at the time when he published his satires, which was before that emperor fell into the excess of cruelty. Horace was a mild admonisher, a court satirist, fit for the gentle times of Augustus, and more fit, for the reasons which I have already given. Juvenal was as proper for his times, as they for theirs: his was an age that deserved a more severe chastisement: vices were more gross and open, more flagitious, more encouraged by the example of a tyrant, and more protected by his authority. Therefore, wheresoever Juvenal mentions Nero, he means Domitian, whom he dares not attack in his own person, but scourges him by proxy. Heinsius urges in praise of Horace, that, according to the ancient art and law of satire, it should be nearer to comedy than tragedy; not declaiming against vice, but only laughing at it. Neither Persius nor Juvenal were ignorant of this, for they had both studied Horace. And the thing itself is plainly true. But as they had read Horace, they had likewise read Lucilius, of whom Persius says, secuit urbem; & genuinum fregit in illis; meaning Mutius and Lupus: and Juvenal also mentions him in these words: Ense velut stricto, quoties Lucilius ardens infremuit, &c. So that they thought the imitation of Lucilius was more proper to their purpose than that of Horace. "They changed satire," says Holiday; "but they changed it for the better: for the business being to reform great vices, chastisement goes farther than admonition; whereas a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, does rather anger than amend a man."

Thus far that learned critic, Barten Holiday, whose interpretation and illustrations of Juvenal are as excellent, as the verse of his translation and his English are lame and pitiful. For it is not enough to give us the meaning of a poet, which I acknowledge him to have performed most faithfully, but he must also imitate his genius and his numbers, as far as the English will come up to the elegance of the original. In few words, it is only for a poet to translate a poet. Holiday and Stepylton had not enough considered this, when the attempted Juvenal; but I forbear reflections; only I beg leave to take notice of this sentence, where Holiday says, "a perpetual grin, like that of Horace, rather angers than amends a man." I cannot give him up the manner of Horace, in low satire, so easily: let the chastisement of Juvenal be never so necessary for his new kind of satire; let him declaim as wittily and sharply as he pleases, yet still the nicest and most delicate touches of satire consist in fine railery. This, my lord, is your particular talent, to which even Juvenal could not arrive. It is not reading, it is not imitation of an author, which can produce his fineness: it must be inborn, it must proceed from a genius, and particular way of thinking, which is not to be taught; and therefore not to be imitated by him who has it not from nature: how easy is it to call rogue and villain, and that wittily! But how hard to make a man appear a fool, a blockhead, or a knave, without using any of those opprobrious terms! To spare the grossness of the names, and to do the thing yet more severely, is to draw a full face, and to make the nose and cheeks stand out, and yet not to employ any depth of shadowing. This is the mystery of that noble trade, which yet no master can teach to his apprentice: he may give the rules, but the scholar is never the nearer in his practice. Neither is it true, that this fineness of railery is offensive. A witty man is tickled while he is hurt in this manner; and a fool feels it not. The occasion of an offence may possibly be given, but he cannot take it. If it be granted, that in effect this way does more mischief; that a man is secretly wounded, and though he be not sensible himself, yet the malicious world will find it out for him: yet there is still a vast difference betwixt the slovenly butchering of a man, and the fineness of a stroke that separates the head from the body, and leaves it standing in its place. "A man may be capable, as Jack Ketch's wife said of his servant, of a plain piece of work, a bare hanging; but to make a malefactor die sweetly, was only belonging to her husband. I wish I could apply it to myself; if the reader would be kind enough to think it belongs to me. The character of Zimri, in my Absalom, is, in my opinion, worth the whole poem: it is not bloody, but it is ridiculous enough: and he for whom it was intended, was too witty to resent it as an injury. If I had railed, I might have suffered for it justly; but I managed mine own works more happily, perhaps more dexterously. I avoided the mention of great crimes, and applied myself to the representing of blind sides, and little extravagancies: to which, the wittier a man is, he is generally the more obnoxious. It succeeded as I wished; the jest went round, and he was laughed at in his turn who began the frolic.

And thus, my lord, you see I have preferred the manner of Horace, and of your lordship, in the kind satire, to that of Juvenal; and I think, reasonably. Holiday ought not to have arraigned so great an author, for that which was his excellency and his merit: or if he did, on such a palpable mistake, he might expect that some one might possibly arise, either in his own time, or after him, to rectify his error, and restore to Horace that commendation, of which he has so unjustly robbed him. And let the names of Juvenal forgive me, if I say, that this way of Horace was the best for amending manners, as it is the most difficult. His was, an ease rescindendum; but that of Horace was a pleasant cure, with all the limbs preserved entirely; and, as our mountebanks tell us in their bills, without keeping the patient within doors for a day. What they promise only, Horace has effectually performed: yet I contradict not the proposition which I formerly advanced: Juvenal's times required a more painful kind of operation: but if he had lived in the age of Horace, I must needs affirm, that he had it not about him. He took the method which was prescribed him by his own genius; which was sharp and eager; he could not rally, but he could declaim; and as his provocations were great, he has revenged them tragically. This notwithstanding, I am to say another word, which, as true as it is, will yet displease the partial admirers of our Horace. I have hinted it before; but it is time for me now to speak more plainly.

This manner of Horace is indeed the best; but Horace has not executed it altogether so happily, at least not often. The manner of Juvenal is confessed to be inferior to the former; but Juvenal has excelled him in his performance. Juvenal has railed more wittily than Horace has rallied.

Horace meant to make his reader laugh; but he is not sure of his experiment. Juvenal always intends to move your indignation; and he always brings about his purpose. Horace, for aught I know, might have tickled the people of his age; but amongst the moderns he is not so successful. They who say he entertains so pleasantly, may perhaps value themselves on the quickness of their own understandings, that they can see a jest farther off than other men: they may find occasion of laughter in the wit-battle of the two buffoons, Sarmatas and Cloerius; and hold their sides for fear of bursting, when Rupilius and Persius are scolding. For my own part, I can only like the characters of all four, which are judiciously given: but for my heart I cannot so much as smile at their insipid railery. I see not why Persius should call upon Brutus to revenge him on his adversary; and that because he had killed Julius Caesar for endeavouring to be a king, therefore he should be desired to murder Rupilius, only because his name was Mr. King. A miserable clench, in my opinion, for Horace to record: I have heard honest Mr. Swan make many a better, and yet have had the grace to hold my countenance. But it may be puns were then in fashion, as they were wit in the sermons of the last age, and in the court of king Charles II. I am sorry to say it, for the sake of Horace; but certain it is, that he has no fine palate who can feed so heartily on garbage.

But I have already wearied myself, and doubt not but I have tired your lordship's patience, with this long, rambling, and I fear trivial discourse. Upon the one half of the merits, that is, pleasure, I cannot but conclude that Juvenal was the better satirist: they who will descend into his particular praises, may find them at large in the dissertation of the learned Rigaltius to Thuanus. As for Persius, I have given the reasons why I think him inferior to both of them: yet I have one thing to add on that subject.

Barten Holiday, who translated both Juvenal and Persius, has made this distinction betwixt them, which is no less true than witty; That, in Persius, the difficulty is to find a meaning; in Juvenal to choose a meaning: so crabbed is Persius, and so copious is Juvenal: so much the understanding is employed in one, and so much the judgment in the other. So difficult it is to find any sense in the former, and the best sense of the latter.

If, on the other side, any one suppose I have commended Horace below his merit, when I have allowed him but the second place, I desire him to consider, if Juvenal, a man of excellent natural endowments, besides the advantages of diligence and study, and coming after him, and building upon his foundations, might not probably, with all these helps, surpass him? And whether it be any dishonour to Horace to be thus surpassed; since no art, or science, is at once begun and perfected, but that it must pass first through many hands, and even through several ages? If Lucilius could add to Ennius, and Horace to Lucilius, why, without any diminution to the fame of Horace, might not Juvenal give the last perfection to that work? Or rather, what disreputation is it to Horace, that Juvenal excels in the tragical satire, as Horace does in the comical? I have read over attentively both Heinsius and Dacier, in their commendations of Horace; but I can find no more in either of them, for the preference of him to Juvenal, than the instructive part; the part of wisdom, and not that of pleasure; which therefore is here allowed him, notwithstanding what Scaliger and Rigaltius have pleaded to the contrary for Juvenal. And, to show that I am impartial, I will here translate what Dacier has said on that subject.

“I cannot give a more just idea of the two books of satires made by Horace, than by comparing them to the statues of the Sileni, to which Alcibiades compares Socrates, in the Symposium. They were figures which had nothing of agreeable, nothing of beauty on their outside: but when any one took the pains to open them, and search into them, he there found the figures of all the deities. So, in the shape that Horace presents himself to us, in his satires, we see nothing at the first view which deserves our attention. It seems that he is rather an amusement for children, than for the serious consideration of men: but when we take away his crust, and that which hides him from our sight, when we discover him to the bottom, then we find all the divinities in a full assembly: that is to say, all the virtues which ought to be the continual exercise of those, who seriously endeavour to correct their vices.”

It is easy to observe, that Dacier, in this noble similitude, has confined the praise of his author wholly to the instructive part: the commendation turns on this, and so does that which follows.

“In these two books of satire, it is the business of Horace to instruct us how to combat our vices, to regulate our passions, to follow nature, to give bounds to our desires, to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and betwixt our conception of things and things themselves: to come back from our prejudicate opinions, to understand exactly the principles and motives of all our actions; and to avoid the ridicule, into which all men necessarily fall, who are intoxicated with those notions which they have received from their masters; and which they obstinately retain, without examining whether or no they be founded on right reason.

“In a word, he labours to render us happy in relation to ourselves, agreeable and faithful to our friends, and discreet, serviceable, and well-bred in relation to those with whom we are obliged to live, and to converse. To make his figures intelligible, to conduct his readers through the labyrinth of some perplexed sentence, or obscure parenthesis, is no great matter: and, as Epictetus says, there is nothing of beauty in all this, or what is worthy of a prudent man. The principal business, and which is of most importance to us, is to show the use, the reason, and the proof of his precepts.

“They who endeavour not to correct themselves, according to so exact a model, are just like the patients, who have open before them a book of admirable receipts for their diseases, and please themselves with reading it, without comprehending the nature of the remedies, or how to apply them to their cure.”

Let Horace go off with these encomiums, which he has so well deserved.

To conclude the contention betwixt our three poets, I will use the words of Virgil, in his fifth Æneid, where Æneas proposes the rewards of the foot-race, to the three first who should reach the goal. Tres præmia primi accipient, flavaque caput nectentur olivâ. Let these three ancients be preferred to all the moderns; as first arriving at the goal: let them all be crowned as victors, with the wreath that properly belongs to satire. But, after that, with this distinction amongst themselves, Primus equum phaleris insignem victor habeto. Let Juvenal ride first in triumph. Alter Amazosiam pharetram, plenamque sagittis Threicis, lato quam circumplectitur auro balteus, & tereti subnectit figura gemma. Let Horace, who is the second, and but just the second, carry off the quivers and the arrows, as the badges of his satire: and the golden-belt, and the diamond-button: Tertius, Argolico hoc Clypeo contentus abito. And let Persius, the last of the first three worthies, be contented with this Grecian shield, and with victory, not only over all the Grecians, who were ignorant of the Roman satire, but over all the moderns in succeeding ages; excepting Boileau and your lordship.

And thus I have given the history of satire, and derived it from Ennius, to your lordship; that is, from its first rudiments of barbarity, to its last polishing and perfection: which is, with Virgil, in his address to Augustus,

— nomen famâ tot ferrè per annos,
Tithoni primâ quot abest ab origine Cæsar.

I said only from Ennius; but I may safely carry it higher, as far as Livius Andronicus; who, as I have said formerly, taught the first play at Rome, in the year ab urbe conditâ cccxciv. I have since desired my learned friend, Mr. Maidwell, to compute the difference of times, betwixt Aristophanes and Livius Andronicus; and he assures me from the best chronologers, that Plutus, the last of Aristophanes's plays, was represented at Athens, in the year of the 97th olympiad; which agrees with the year urbis conditæ cccxiv. So that the difference of years betwixt Aristophanes and Andronicus is 150; from whence I have probably deduced, that Livius Andronicus, who was a Grecian, had read the plays of the old comedy, which were satirical, and also of the new; for Menander was fifty years before him, which must needs be a great light to him, in his own plays, that were of the satirical nature. That the Romans had farces before this, it is true; but then they had no communication with Greece: so that Andronicus was the first who wrote after the manner of the old comedy, in his plays; he was imitated by Ennius, about thirty years afterwards. Though the former writ fables; the latter, speaking properly, began the Roman satire. According to that description, which Juvenal gives of it in his first; quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas, gaudia, discursus, nostri est farrago libelli. This is that in which I have made bold to differ from Casaubon, Rigaltius, Dacier, and indeed from all the modern critics, that not Ennius, but Andronicus was the first, who by the Archa Comædia of the Greeks, added many beauties to the first rude and barbarous Roman satire: which sort of poem, though we had not derived from Rome, yet nature teaches it mankind, in all ages, and in every country.

It is but necessary, that, after so much has been said of satire, some definition of it should be given. Heinsius, in his dissertations on Horace, makes it for me, in these words; "Satire is a kind of poetry, without a series of action, invented for the purging of our minds; in which human vices, ignorance, and errors, and all things besides, which are produced from them, in every man, are severely reprehended; partly dramatically, partly simply, and sometimes in both kinds of speaking;

but for the most part figuratively, and occasionally; consisting in a low familiar way, chiefly in a sharp and pungent manner of speech; but partly, also, in a facetious and civil way of jesting; by which either hatred, or laughter, or indignation is moved."—Where I cannot but observe, that this obscure and perplexed definition, or rather description of satire, is wholly accommodated to the Horatian way; and, excluding the works of Juvenal and Persius, as foreign from that kind of poem: the clause in the beginning of it ("without a series of action") distinguishes satire properly from stage-plays, which are all of one action, and one continued series of action. The end or scope of satire is to purge the passions; so far it is common to the satires of Juvenal and Persius: the rest which follows, is also generally belonging to all three; till he comes upon us, with the excluding clause "consisting in a low familiar way of speech," which is the proper character of Horace; and from which, the other two, for their honour be it spoken, are far distant: but how come looseness of style, and the familiarity of words, to be so much the propriety of satire, that without them, a poet can be no more a satirist, than without risibility he can be a man? Is the fault of Horace to be made the virtue and standing rule of this poem? Is the grande sophos of Persius, and the sublimity of Juvenal to be circumscribed, with the meanness of words, and vulgarity of expression? If Horace refused the pains of numbers, and the loftiness of figures, are they bound to follow so ill a precedent? Let him walk a-foot with his pad in his hand, for his own pleasure; but let not them be accounted no poets, who chuse to mount and show their horsemanship. Holiday is not afraid to say, that there never was such a fall, as from his odes to his satires, and that he, injuriously to himself, untuned his harp. The majestic way of Persius and Juvenal was new when they began it, but it is old to us; and what poems have not, with time, received an alteration in their fashion? Which alteration, says Holiday, is to after-times, as good a warrant as the first. Has not Virgil changed the manners of Homer's heroes in his Æneid? Certainly he has, and for the better. For Virgil's age was more civilized, and better bred: and he writ according to the politeness of Rome, under the reign of Augustus Cæsar; not to the rudeness of Agamemnon's age, or the times of Homer. Why should we offer to confine free spirits to one form, when we cannot so much as confine our bodies to one fashion of apparel? Would not Donne's satires, which abound with so much wit, appear more charming, if he had taken care of his words, and of his numbers? But he followed Horace so very close, that of necessity he must fall with him: and I may safely say it of this present age, that if we are not so great wits as Donne, yet certainly, we are better poets.

But I have said enough, and it may be too much, on this subject. Will your lordship be pleased to prolong my audience, only so far, till I tell your my own trivial thoughts how a modern satire should be made. I will not deviate in the least from the precepts and examples of the ancients, who were always our best masters. I will only illustrate them, and discover some of the hidden beauties in their designs, that we thereby may form our own in imitation of them. Will you please but to observe, that Persius, the least in dignity of all the three, has notwithstanding been the first, who has discovered to us this important secret, in the designing of a perfect satire, that it ought only to treat of one subject; to be confined to one particular theme; or, at least, to one principally. If other vices occur in the management of the chief, they should only be transiently lashed, and not be insisted on, so as to make the design double. As in a play of the English fashion, which we call a tragi-comedy, there is to be but one main design: and though there be an underplot, or second walk of comical characters and adventures, yet they are subservient to the chief fable, carried along under it, and helping to it; so that the drama may not seem a monster with two heads. Thus the Copernican system of the planets makes the Moon to be moved by the motion of the Earth, and carried about her orb, as a dependent of hers. Mascardi, in his discourse of the Doppia favola, or double tale in plays, gives an instance of it, in the famous pastoral of Guarini, called Il Pastor Fido; where Corisca and the Satyr are the under-parts: yet we may observe, that Corisca is brought into the body of the plot, and made subservient to it. It is certain that the divine wit of Horace was not ignorant of this rule, that a play, though it consists of many parts, must yet be one in the action, and must drive on the accomplishment of one design; for he gives this very precept, Sit quodvis simplex duntaxat & unum; yet he seems not much to mind it in his satires, many of them consisting of more arguments than one; and the second without dependance on the first. Casaubon has observed this before me, in his preference of Persius to Horace: and will have his own beloved author to be the first, who found out, and introduced this method of confining himself to one subject. I know it may be urged in defence of Horace, that this unity is not necessary; because the very word, satira signifies a dish plentifully stored with all variety of fruit and grains. Yet Juvenal, who calls his poems a farrago, which is a word of the same signification with satira, has chosen to follow the same method of Persius, and not of Horace. And Boileau, whose example alone is a sufficient authority, has wholly confined himself, in all his satires, to this unity of design. That variety which is not to be found in any one satire, is at least, in many, written on several occasions. And if variety be of absolute necessity in every one of them, according to the etymology of the word; yet it may arise naturally from one subject, as it is diversely treated in the several subordinate branches of it; all relating to the chief. It may be illustrated accordingly with variety of examples in the subdivisions of it; and with as many precepts as there are members of it; which altogether may complete that olla, or hotch-potch, which is properly a satire.

Under this unity of theme, or subject, is comprehended another rule for perfecting the design of true satire. The poet is bound, and that ex officio, to give his reader some one precept of moral virtue; and to caution him against some one particular vice or folly. Other virtues, subordinate to the first, may be recommended, under that chief head; and other vices or follies may be scourged, besides that which he principally intends. But he is chiefly to inculcate one virtue, and insist on that. Thus Juvenal, in every satire, excepting the first, ties himself to one principal instructive point, or to the shunning of moral evil. Even in the sixth, which seems only an arraignment of the whole sex of womankind, there is a latent admonition to avoid ill women, by showing how very few, who are virtuous and good, are to be found amongst them. But this, though the wittiest of all his satires, has yet the least of truth or instruction in it. He has run himself into his old declamatory way, and almost forgotten that he was now setting up for a moral poet.

Persius is never wanting to us in some profitable doctrine, and in exposing the opposite vices to it. His kind of philosophy is one, which is the stoic; and every satire is a comment on one particular dogma of that sect; unless we will except the first, which is against bad writers; and yet even there he forgets not the precepts of the punch. In general, all virtues are every where to be praised and recommended to practice; and all vices to be reprehended, and made either odious or ridiculous:

or else there is a fundamental error in the whole design.

I have already declared who are the only persons that are the adequate object of private satire, and who they are that may properly be exposed by name for public examples of vices and follies: and therefore I will trouble your lordship no farther with them. Of the best and finest manner of satire, I have said enough in the comparison betwixt Juvenal and Horace: it is that sharp, well-mannered way of laughing a folly out of countenance, of which your lordship is the best master in this age. I will proceed to the versification, which is most proper for it, and add somewhat to what I have said already on that subject. The sort of verse which is called burlesque, consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. I ought to have mentioned him before, when I spake of Donne; but by a slip of an old man's memory, he was forgotten. The worth of his poem is too well known to need any commendation, and he is above my censure: his satire is of the Varroian kind, though unmix'd with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has managed it: but in any other hand, the shortness of his verse, and the quick returns of rhyme, had debas'd the dignity of style. And besides, the double rhyme (a necessary companion of burlesque writing) is not so proper for manly satire, for it turns earnest too much to jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain, to the best sort of readers; we are pleas'd ungratefully, and, if I may say so, against our liking. We thank him not for giving us that unseasonable delight, when we know he could have given us a better, and more solid. He might have left that task to others, who, not being able to put in thought, can only make us grin with the excrescence of a word of two or three syllables in the close. It is, indeed, below so great a master to make use of such a little instrument. But his good sense is perpetually shining through all he writes; it affords us not the time of finding faults. We pass through the levity of his rhyme, and are immediately carried into some admirable useful thought. After all, he has chosen this kind of verse; and has written the best in it: and had he taken another, he would always have excell'd. As we say of a court favourite, that whatsoever his office be, he still makes it uppermost, and most beneficial to himself.

The quickness of your imagination, my lord, has already prevented me; and you know beforehand, that I would prefer the verse of ten syllables, which we call the English heroic, to that of eight. This is truly my opinion: for this sort of number is more roomy: the thought can turn itself with greater ease in a larger compass. When the rhyme comes too thick upon us, it straitens the expression; we are thinking of the close, when we should be employ'd in adorning the thought. It makes a poet giddy with turning in a space too narrow for his imagination; he loses many beauties, without gaining one advantage. For a burlesque rhyme, I have already concluded to be none; or if it were, it is more easily purchased in ten syllables than in eight: in both occasions it is as in a tennis-court, when the stroker of greater force are given, when we strike out and play at length. Tasso and Boileau have left us the best examples of this way, in the Secchia Rapita, and the Lutrin. And next them Merliu Coccagus in his Baldus. I will speak only of the two former, because the latter is written in Latin verse. The Secchia Rapita is an Italian poem, a satire of the Varroian kind. It is written in the stanza of eight, which is their measure for heroic verse. The words are stately, the numbers smooth, the turn both of thoughts and words is happy. The first six lines of the stanza seem majestic and severe, but the two last turn them all into a pleasant ridicule. Boileau, if I am not much deceiv'd, has modelled from hence his famous Lutrin. He had read the burlesque poetry of Scarron, with some kind of indignation, as witty as it was, and found nothing in France that was worthy of his imitation. But he copied the Italian so well, that his own may pass for an original. He writes it in the French heroic verse, and calls it an heroic poem: his subject is trivial, but his verse is noble. I doubt not but he had Virgil in his eye, for we find many admirable imitations of him, and some parodies; as particularly this passage in the fourth of the Æneids:

*Nectibi Diva parens; generis nec Dardanus auctor,
Perfide; sed duris genuit te cautibus horrens
Caucasus; Hyrcanæque admorunt ubera tigres.*

Which he thus translates, keeping to the words, but altering the sense:

*Non, ton Pere a Paris, ne fut point Boulanger:
Et tu n'es point du sang de Gervais Horologer:
Ta Mere ne fut point la Maitresse d'un Coche;
Caucase dans ses flancs, te forna d'une Foche:
Une Tigresse affreuse, en quelque Antre écarté,
Te fit, avec son lait, succer sa Cruauté.*

And, as Virgil in his fourth Georgic of the Boss

perpetually raises the lowness of his subject, by the loftiness of his words; and ennobles it by comparisons drawn from empires, and from monarchs.

Admiranda tibi levium spectacula rerum,
Magnanimoque Duces, totiusque ordine gentis
Mores & studia, & populos, & praelia dicam.

And again :

Sic Genus immortale manent; multosque per annos
Stat fortuna domus, & avi numerantur avorum.

We see Boileau pursuing him in the same flights; and scarcely yielding to his master. This, I think, my lord, to be the most beautiful, and most noble kind of satire. Here is the majesty of the heroic, finely mixed with the venom of the other; and raising the delight, which otherwise would be flat and vulgar, by the sublimity of the expression. I could say somewhat more of the delicacy of this and some other of his satires; but it might turn to his prejudice, if it were carried back to France.

I have given your lordship but this bare hint, in what manner this sort of satire may best be managed. Had I time, I could enlarge on the beautiful turns of words and thoughts; which are as requisite in this, as in heroic poetry itself; of which the satire is undoubtedly a species. With these beautiful turns I confess myself to have been unacquainted, till about twenty years ago, in a conversation which I had with that noble wit of Scotland, sir George Mackenzie: he asked me why I did not imitate in my verses the turns of Mr. Waller and sir John Denham; of which he repeated many to me. I had often read with pleasure, and with some profit, those two fathers of our English poetry; but had not seriously enough considered those beauties which give the last perfection to their works. Some sprinklings of this kind I had also formerly in my plays; but they were casual, and not designed. But this hint, thus seasonably given me, first made me sensible of my own wants, and brought me afterwards to seek for the supply of them in other English authors. I looked over the darling of my youth, the famous Cowley; there I found, instead of them, the points of wit, and quirks of epigram, even in the Davideis, an heroic poem, which is of an opposite nature to those puerilities; but no elegant turns either on the word or on the thought. Then I consulted a greater genius (without offence to the manes of that noble author) I mean Milton; but as he endeavours every where to express

Homer, whose age had not arrived to that fineness, I found in him a true sublimity, lofty thoughts, which were clothed with admirable Grecisms, and ancient words, which he had been digging from the mines of Chaucer and Spenser, and which, with all their rusticity, had somewhat of venerable in them. But I found not there neither that for which I looked. At last I had recourse to his master, Spenser, the author of that immortal poem called The Fairy Queen; and there I met with that which I had been looking for so long in vain. Spenser had studied Virgil to as much advantage as Milton had done Homer; and among the rest of his excellencies had copied that. Looking farther into the Italian, I found Tasso had done the same; may more, that all the sonnets in that language are on the turn of the first thought; which Mr. Walsh, in his late ingenious preface to his poems, has observed. In short, Virgil and Ovid are the two principal fountains of them in Latin poem. And the French at this day are so fond of them, that they judge them to be the first beauties. Delicate & bien tourné, are the highest commendations which they bestow on somewhat which they think a master-piece.

An example on the turn of words, amongst a thousand others, is that in the last book of Ovid's Metamorphoses:

Heu quantum scelus est, in viscera, viscera condi!

Congestoque avidum pinguescere corpore corpus;
Alteriusque, animantem animantis vivere leto!

An example on the turn both of thoughts and words is to be found in Catullus; in the complaint of Ariadne, when she was left by Theseus:

Tum jam nulla viro juranti fœmina credit;
Nulla viri speret sermones esse fideles:
Qui dum aliquid cupiens animus prægestit
apisci,

Nil metuunt jurare; nihil promittere parcunt.
Sed simul ad cupidæ mentis satiata libido est,
Dicta nihil metuere; nihil perjuriam curant.

An extraordinary turn upon the words, is that in Ovid's Epistolæ Heroidum of Sappho to Phaon:

Si nisi quæ formâ poterit te digna videri,
Nulla futura tua est; nulla futura tua est.

Lastly, a turn which I cannot say is absolutely on words, for the thought turns with them, is in the fourth Georgic of Virgil; where Orpheus is to receive his wife from Hell, on express condition not to look on her till she was come on Earth:

*Cum subita incautum dementia cepit Amantem;
Ignoscenda quidem, acirent si ignoscere manes.*

I will not burden your Lordship with more of these; for I write to a master, who understands them better than myself. But I may safely conclude them to be great beauties: I might descend also to the mechanic beauties of heroic verse; but we have yet no English prosodia, not so much as a tolerable dictionary, or a grammar; so that our language is in a manner barbarous; and what government will encourage any one, or more, who are capable of refining it, I know not: but nothing under a public expense can go through with it. And I rather fear a declination of the language, than hope an advancement of it in the present age.

I am still speaking to you, my lord: though, in all probability, you are already out of hearing. Nothing, which my meaness can produce, is worthy of this long attention. But I am come to the last petition of Abraham: if there be ten righteous lines, in this vast prefecture, spare it for their sake; and also spare the next city, because it is but a little one.

I would excuse the performance of this translation, if it were all my own; but the better, though not the greater part, being the work of some gentlemen, who have succeeded very happily in their undertaking; let their excellencies atone for my imperfections; and those of my sons. I have perused some of the satires, which are done by other hands; and they seem to me as perfect in their kind, as any thing I have seen in English verse. The common way which we have taken, is not a literal translation, but a kind of paraphrase; or somewhat which is yet more loose, betwixt a paraphrase and imitation. It was not possible for us, or any men, to have made it pleasant any other way. If rendering the exact sense of those authors, almost line for line, had been our business, Barten Holiday had done it already to our hands: and, by the help of his learned notes and illustrations, not only Juvenal and Persius, but what is yet more obscure, his own verses, might be understood.

But he wrote for fame, and wrote to scholars: we write only for the pleasure and entertainment of those gentlemen and ladies, who, though they are not scholars, are not ignorant: persons of understanding and good sense; who, not having been conversant in the original, or at least not having made Latin verse so much their business as to berritics in it, would be glad to find, if the wit of our two great authors be answerable to their fame and reputation in the world. We have therefore endeavoured to give the public all the satisfaction we are able in this kind.

And if we are not altogether so faithful to our author, as our predecessors, Holiday and Stapylton; yet we may challenge to ourselves this praise, that we shall be far more pleasing to our readers. We have followed our authors at greater distance, though not step by step, as they have done. For oftentimes they have gone so close, that they have trod on the heels of Juvenal and Persius, and hurt them by their too near approach. A noble author would not be pursued too close by a translator. We lose his spirit, when we think to take his body. The grosser part remains with us, but the soul is flown away, in some noble expression, or some delicate turn of words, or thought. Thus Holiday, who made this way his choice, seized the meaning of Juvenal; but the poetry has always escaped him.

They who will not grant me, that pleasure is one of the ends of poetry, but that it is only a means of compassing the only end, which is instruction; must yet allow, that without the means of pleasure, the instruction is but a bare and dry philosophy; a crude preparation of morals, which we may have from Aristotle and Epictetus, with more profit than from any poet: neither Holiday nor Stapylton have imitated Juvenal, in the poetical part of him, his diction and his elocution. Nor had they been poets, as neither of them were; yet in the way they took, it was impossible for them to have succeeded in the poetic part.

The English verse, which we call heroic, consists of more than ten syllables; the Latin hexameter sometimes rises to seventeen; as for example, this verse in Virgil:

Pulverulenta putrem sonitu quatit ungula campum.

Here is the difference of no less than seven syllables in a line betwixt the English and the Latin. Now the medium of these, is about fourteen syllables; because the dactyle is a more frequent foot in hexameters than the spondee.

But Holiday, without considering that he writ with the disadvantage of four syllables less in every verse, endeavours to make one of his lines to comprehend the sense of one of Juvenal's. According to the falsity of the proposition was the success. He was forced to crowd his verse with ill-sounding monosyllables, of which our barbarous language affords him a wild plenty; and by that means he arrived at his pedantic end, which was to make a literal translation: his verses have nothing of verse in them, but only the worst part of it, the rhyme; and that, into the bargain, is far from good. But, which is more intolerable, by cramming his ill-chosen, and worse-sounding monosyllables so close together, the very sense which he endeavours to explain, is become more obscure than that of his author. So that Holiday himself cannot be understood, without as large a commentary, as that which he makes on his two authors. For my own part, I can make a shift to find the meaning of Juvenal without his notes: but his translation is more difficult than his author. And I find beauties in the Latin to recompense my pains; but in Holiday and Stappylton, my ears, in the first place, are mortally offended; and then their sense is so perplexed, that I return to the original, as the more pleasing task, as well as the more easy.

This must be said for our translation, that if we give not the whole sense of Juvenal, yet we give the most considerable part of it, we give it, in general, so clearly, that few notes are sufficient to make us intelligible. We make our author at least appear in a poetic dress. We have actually made him more sounding, and more elegant, than he was before in English: and have endeavoured to make him speak that kind of English, which he would have spoken had he lived in England, and had writt'n to this age. If sometimes any of us (and it is but seldom) make him express the customs and manners of our native country, rather than of Rome, it is, either when there was some kind of analogy, betwixt their customs and ours; or when, to make him more easy to vulgar understandings, we give him those manners which are familiar to us. But I defend not this innovation, it is enough if I can excuse it. For, to speak sincerely, the manners of nations and ages are not to be confounded: we should either make them English, or leave them Roman. If this can neither be defended, nor excused, let it be pardoned, at least, because it is acknowledged: and so much the more easily, as being a fault which is never committed without some pleasure to the reader.

Thus, my lord, having troubled you with a tedious visit, the best manners will be shown in the least ceremony. I will slip away while your back is turned, and while you are otherwise employed: with great confusion, for having entertained you so long with this discourse; and for having no other recompense to make you, than the worthy labours of my fellow-undertakers in this work, and the thankful acknowledgments, prayers, and perpetual good wishes, of,

my lord,

your lordship's most obliged, most humble,
and most obedient servant,

Aug. 18, 1699.

JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST SATIRE OF
JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT.

The poet gives us first a kind of humorous reason for his writing: that being provoked by hearing so many ill poets rehearse their works, he does himself justice on them, by giving them as bad as they bring. But, since no man will rank himself with ill writers, it is easy to conclude, that if such wretches could draw an audience, he thought it no hard matter to excel them, and gain a greater esteem with the public. Next he informs us more openly, why he rather addicts himself to satire, than any other kind of poetry. And here he discovers that it is not so much his indignation to ill poets, as to ill men, which has prompted him to write. He therefore give us a summary and general view of the vices and follies reigning in his time. So that this first satire is the natural ground-work of all the rest. Herein he confines himself to no one subject, but strikes indifferently at all men in his way: in every following satire he has chosen some particular moral which he would inculcate; and lashes some particular vice or folly (an art with which our lampooners are not much acquainted). But our poet being desirous to reform his own age, but not daring to attempt it by an overt-act of naming living persons, inveighs only against those who were infamous in the times immediately preceding his, whereby he not only gives a fair warning to great men, that their memory lies at the mercy of future poets and historians, but also, with a finer stroke of his pen, brands even the living, and personates them under dead men's names.

I have avoided as much as I could possibly the borrowed learning of marginal notes and illustrations, and for that reason have translated this satire somewhat largely. And freely own (it is a fault) that I have likewise omitted most of the proper names, because I thought they would not much edify the reader. To conclude, if in two or three places I have deserted all the commentators, it is because they first deserted my author, or at least have left him in so much obscurity, that too much room is left for guessing.

Strut shall I hear, and never quit the score,
Stunn'd with hoarse Codrus' Theſeid, o'er and o'er?

Kk

Shall this man's elegies and t' other's play
 Unpunish'd murder a long summer's day?
 Huge Telephus, a formidable page,
 Cries vengeance; and Orestes' bulky rage,
 Unsatish'd with margins closely writ,
 Foams o'er the covers, and not finish'd yet.
 No man can take a more familiar note
 Of his own home, than I of Vulcan's grot,
 Or Mars his grove, or hollow winds that blow
 From Ætna's top, or tortur'd ghosts below.
 I know by rote the fam'd exploits of Greece;
 The Centaurs' fury, and the golden fleece;
 Through the thick shades th' eternal scribbler
 bawls,

And shades the statues on their pedestals.
 The best and worst on the same theme employs
 His Muse, and plagues us with an equal noise.

Provok'd by these incorrigible fools,
 I left declaiming in pedantic schools;
 Where, with men-boys, I strove to get renown,
 Advising Sylla to a private gown.

But, since the world with writing is possess'd,
 I'll versify in spite; and do my best,
 To make as much waste paper as the rest.

But why I lift aloft the Satire's rod,
 And tread the path which fam'd Lucilius trod,
 Attend the causes which my Muse have led:
 When sapless eunuchs mount the marriage-bed,
 When mannish Mevius, that two-handed whore,
 Astride on horse-back bunts the Tuscan boar,
 When all our lords are by his wealth outv'y'd,
 Whose razor on my callow beard was try'd;
 When I behold the spawn of conquer'd Nile,
 Crispinus, both in birth and manners vile,
 Pacing in pomp, with cloke of Tyrian dye,
 Chang'd oft a-day for needless luxury;
 And finding oft occasion to be fann'd,
 Ambitious to produce his lady-hand;
 Charg'd with light summer-rings his fingers
 sweat,

Unable to support a gem of weight:
 Such false objects meeting every where,
 'Tis hard to write, but harder to forbear.
 To view so lewd a town, and to refrain,
 What hoops of iron could my spleen contain!
 When pleading Matho, borne abroad for air,
 With his fat paunch fills his new-fashion'd chair,
 And, after him, the wretch in pomp convey'd,
 Whose evidence his lord and friend betray'd,
 And but the wish'd occasion does attend,
 From the poor nobles the last spoils to read,
 Whom ev'n spies dread as their superior fiend,
 And bribe with presents; or, when presents fail,
 They, send their prostituted wives for bail:
 When night-performance holds the place of merit,
 And brawn and back the next of kin disherit;
 For such good parts are in preferment's way,
 The rich old madam never fails to pay
 Her legacies, by nature's standard given,
 One gains an ounce, another gains eleven:
 A dear-bought bargain, all things duly weigh'd,
 For which their thrice-concocted blood is paid:
 With looks as wan, as he who in the brake
 At unawares has trod upon a snake;
 Or play'd at Lyons a declaiming prize,
 For which the vanquish'd rhetorician dies.

What indignation boils within my veins,
 When perjurd guardians, proud with impious gains,
 Choke up the streets, too narrow for their trains!

Whose wards, by want betray'd, to crimes are led
 Too foul to name, too fulsome to be read!
 When he who pill'd his province scapes the law,
 And keeps his money, though he lost his cause:
 His fine begg'd off, contemns his infancy,
 Can rise at twelve, and get him drunk ere three:
 Enjoys his exile, and, condemn'd in vain,
 Leaves thee, prevailing province, to complain!

Such villainies rous'd Horace into wrath:
 And 'tis more noble to pursue his path,
 Than an old tale of Diomed repeat,
 Or labouring after Hercules to sweat,
 Or wandering in the winding maze of Crete;
 Or with the winged snails aloft to fly,
 Or fluttering perish with his foolish boy.

With what impatience must the Muse behold
 The wife, by her procuring husband sold!
 For though the law makes null th' adulterer's deed
 Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed;
 Who his taught eyes up to the ceiling throws,
 And sleeps all over but his wakeful nose.
 When he dares hope a colonel's command,
 Whose courses kept, ran out his father's land;
 Who yet a stripling, Nero's chariot drove,
 Whirl'd o'er the streets, while his vain master strove

With boasted art to please his eunuch-love.

Would it not make a modest author dare
 To draw his table-book within the square,
 And fill with notes, when, lolling at his ease,
 Mæcenas-like, the happy rogue he sees
 Borne by six weary'd slaves in open view,
 Who cancel'd an old will, and forg'd a new:
 Made wealthy at the small expense of signing
 With a wet seal, and a fresh interlining?
 The lady, next, requires a lashing line,
 Who squeez'd a toad into her husband's wine:
 So well the fashionable medicine thrives,
 That now 'tis practis'd ev'n by country wives:
 Poisoning, without regard of fame or fear:
 And spotted corpse are frequent on the bier,
 Would'it thou to honours and preferments climb!
 Be bold in mischief, dare some mighty crime,
 Which dungeons, death, or banishment deserves:
 For virtue is but drily prais'd, and starves.
 Great men, to great crimes, owe their plate and Fair palaces, and furniture of cost;
 And high commands: a sneaking sin is lost.
 Who can behold that rank old lecher keep
 His son's corrupted wife, and hope to sleep?
 Or that male-harlot, or that unledg'd boy,
 Eager to sin, before he can enjoy?
 If nature could not, anger would indite
 Such woful stuff as I or Shadwell write.

Count from the time, since old Deucalion's boat,
 Rais'd by the flood, did on Parnassus float;
 And, scarcely mooring on the cliff, implor'd
 An oracle how man might be restor'd;
 When soften'd stones and vital breath ensu'd,
 And virgins naked were by lovers view'd;
 Whatever since that golden age was done,
 What human kind desires, and what they shun,
 Rage, passions, pleasures, impotence of will,
 Shall this satirical collection fill.

What age so large a crop of vices bore,
 Or when was avarice extended more?
 When were the dice with more profusion thrown?
 The well-fill'd sob not empty'd now alone,
 But gamblers for whole patrimonies play;
 The steward brings the deeds which must convey

The lost estate: what more than madness reigns,
When one short sitting many hundreds drains,
And not enough is left him to supply
Board-wages, or a footman's livery?

What age so many summer-seats did see?
Or which of our forefathers far'd so well,
As on seven dishes, at a private meal?
Clients of old were feasted; now a poor
Divided dale is dealt at th' outward door;
Which by the hungry rout is soon dispatch'd:
The paltry largess, too, severely watch'd,
Ere given; and every face observ'd with care,
That no intruding guests usurp a share.
Know, you receive: the crier calls aloud
Our old nobility of Trojan-blood, [food.

Who gape among the crowd for their precarious
The pretors, and the tribunes' voice is heard;
The freeman justles, and will be prefer'd;
First come, first serv'd, he cries; and I, in spite
Of your great lordships, will maintain my right.
Though born a slave, though my torn ears are bor'd,
'Tis not the birth, 'tis money makes the lord.
The rent of five fair houses I receive;
What greater honours can the purple give?
The poor patrician is reduc'd to keep,
In melancholy walks, a grazier's sheep:
Not Pallas nor Læmus had my treasure;
Then let the sacred tribunes wait my leisure.
Once a poor rogue, 'tis true, I trod the street,
And trudg'd to Rome upon my naked feet:
Gold is the greatest god; though yet we see
No temples rais'd to money's majesty,
No altars fuming to her power divine,
Such as to valour, peace, and virtue shine,
And faith, and concord: where the stork on high
Seems to salute her infant progeny:
Praying pious love with her suspicious cry.
But since our knights and senators account,
To what their sordid begging vails amount,
Judge what a wretched share the poor attends,
Whose whole subsistence on those alms depends!
Their household fire, their raiment, and their food,
Prevented by those harpies; when a wood
Of litters thick besiege the donor's gate,
And begging lords and teeming ladies wait
The promis'd dote: nay, some have learn'd the trick

To beg for absent persons; feign them sick,
Close mew'd in their sedans, for fear of air:
And for their wives produce an empty chair.
This is my spouse: dispatch her with her share.
'Tis Galla: let her ladyship but peep
No, sir, 'tis pity to disturb her sleep.

Such fine employments our whole days divide:
The salutations of the morning-tide
Call up the Sun; those ended, to the hall
We wait the patron, hear the lawyers bawl;
Then to the stables; where, amidst the race
Of conquering Rome, some Arab shows his face,
Inscrib'd with title, and profanes the place;
Fit to be pist against, and somewhat more.
The great man, home-conducted, shuts his door;
Old clients, weary'd out with fruitless care,
Dismiss their hopes of eating, and despair.
Though much against the grain, forc'd to retire,
Buy roots for supper, and provide a fire.

Meantime his lordship lolls within at ease,
Pampering his paunch with foreign rarities;
Both sea and land are ransack'd for the feast;
And his own gut the sole invited guest.

Such plate, such tables, dishes drest so well,
That whole estates are swallow'd at a meal.
Er'a parasites are banish'd from his board
(At once a sordid and luxurious lord):
Prodigious throat, for which whole boars are drest
(A creature form'd to furnish out a feast).
But present punishment pursues his maw,
When surfeited and swell'd, the peacock raw
He bears into the bath; whence want of breath,
Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.
His fate makes table-talk, divulg'd with scorn,
And he, a jest, into his grave is borne.

No age can go beyond us, future times
Can add no farther to the present crimes.
Our sons but the same things can wish and do;
Vice is at stand, and at the highest flow.
Then, Satire, spread thy sails; take all the winds can blow.

Some may, perhaps, demand what Muse can yield
Sufficient strength for such a spacious field?
From whence can be deriv'd so large a vein,
Bold truth to speak, and spoken to maintain?
When god-like freedom is so far bereft
The noble mind, that scarce the name is left?
Ere scandalum magnatum was begot,
No matter if the great forgave or not:
But if that honest licence now you take,
If into rogues omnipotent you rake,
Death is your doom, impal'd upon a stake;
Snear'd o'er with wax, and set on blaze, to light
The streets, and make a dreadful fire by night.

Shall they who drench three uncles in a draught
Of poisonous juice be then in triumph brought,
Make lanes among the people where they go,
And, mounted high on downy chariots, throw
Disdainful glances on the crowd below?
Be silent, and beware, if such you see;
'Tis defamation but to say, That's he!
Against bold Turnus the great Trojan arm,
Amidst their strokes the poet gets no harm:
Achilles may in epic verse be slain,
And none of all his myrmidons complain:
Hylas may drop his pitecher, none will cry;
Not if he drown himself for company:
But when Lucilius brandishes his pen,
And flashes in the face of guilty men,
A cold sweat stands in drops on every part;
And rage succeeds to tears, revenge to smart:
Muse, be advis'd; 'tis past considering-time,
When enter'd once the dangerous lists of rhyme,
Since some the living villains dare implead,
Arraign them in the persons of the dead.

THE THIRD SATIRE OF

JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT.

The story of this satire speaks itself. Umbritius, the supposed friend of Juvenal, and himself a poet, is leaving Rome, and retiring to Cumæ. Our author accompanies him out of town. Before they take leave of each other, Umbritius tells his friend the reasons which oblige him to lead a private life, in an obscure place. He complains that an honest man cannot get his bread at home: that none but flatterers make their fortunes there: that Grecians and other foreigners raise themselves by those sordid arts which he describes, and against which he bitterly inveighs. He reckons up the several inconveniencies which arise from a city-life; and the many dangers which attend it. Upbraids the noblemen with covetousness, for not rewarding good poets; and arraigns the government for starving them. The great art of this satire is particularly shown, in common-places; and a drawing in as many vices, as could naturally fall into the compass of it.

GRIEV'D though I am an ancient friend to lose,
I like the solitary seat he chose:
In quiet Cumæ fixing his repose:
Where far from noisy Rome secure he lives,
And one more citizen to Sibyl gives:
The road to Bajæ, and that soft recess
Which all the gods with all their bounty bless.
Though I in Prochyta with greater ease
Could live, than in a street of palaces.
What scenes so desert, or so full of fright,
As towering houses tumbling in the night,
And Rome on fire beheld by its own blazing light?
But worse than all the clattering tiles, and worse
Than thousand padders, is the poet's curse.
Rogues that in dog-days cannot rhyme forbear:
But without mercy read, and make you hear.
Now while my friend, just ready to depart,
Was packing all his goods in one poor cart;
He stopp'd a little at the Conduit-gate,
Where Numa molet'd once the Roman state,
In mighty councils with his nymph retir'd,
Though now the sacred shades and fountains are hir'd
By banish'd Jews, who their whole wealth can lay
In a small basket, on a whip of hay;
Yet such our avarice is, that every tree
Pays for his head; nor sleep itself is free:
Nor place, nor persons, now are sacred held,
From their own grove the Muses are expell'd.
Into this lonely vale our steps we bend,
I and my sullen discontented friend:
The marble cave, and aqueducts, we view;
But how adulterate now, and different from the true;

How much more beautiful had the fountain been,
Embellish'd with her first created green,
Where crystal streams through living turf had run,
Contented with an urn of native stone!

Then thus Umbritius (with an angry frown,
And looking back on this degenerate town.)
" Since noble arts in Rome have no support,
And ragged virtue not a friend at court,
No profit rises from th' ungrateful stage,
My poverty increasing with my age,
'Tis time to give my just disdain a vent,
And, cursing, leave so base a government.
Where Dædalus his borrow'd wings laid by,
To that obscure retreat I choose to fly:
While yet few furrows on my face are seen,
While I walk upright, and old age is green,
And Laëthis has somewhat left to spin.
Now, now, 'tis time to quit this cursed place,
And hide from villains my too honest face:
Here let Arturius live, and such as he:
Such manners will with such a town agree.

Knave, who in full assemblies have the knack
Of turning truth to lies, and white to black;
Can hire large houses, and oppress the poor
By farm'd excise; can cleanse the common shore;
And rent the fishery; can bear the dead;
And teach their eyes dissembled tears to shed,
All this for gain; for gain they sell their very head.
These fellows (see what fortune's power can do)
Were once the mistresses of a country show:
Follow'd the prizes through each paltry town,
By trumpet-cheeks and bloated faces known.
But now, grown rich, on drunken holidays,
At their own costs exhibit public plays:
Where, influence'd by the rabble's bloody will,
With thumbs bent back, they popularly kill.
From thence return'd, their sordid avarice rakes
In experiments again, and hires the jakes.
Why hire they not the town; not every thing,
Since such as they have Fortune in a string?
Who, for her pleasure, can her fools advance?
And toss them topmost on the wheel of chance.
What's Rome to me, what business have I there,
I who can neither be, nor falsely swear?
Nor praise my patron's undervalving rhymes,
Nor yet comply with him, nor with his times;
Unskill'd in schemes by planets to foreshow,
Like canting rascals, show the ward will go:
I neither will, nor can prognosticate
To the young gaping heir, his father's fate:
Nor in the entrails of a toad have pry'd,
Nor carry'd bawdy presents to a bride:
For want of these town-virtues thus, alone,
I go conducted on my way by none;
Like a dead member from the body rent;
Misus'd, and unuseful to the government.
Who now is lov'd, but he who loves the times,
Conscious of close intrigues, and dipt in crimes,
Labouring with secrets which his bosom burns,
Yet never meet to public light return?
They get reward alone who can betray:
For keeping honest counsels none will pay.
He who can Verres, when he will, accuse,
The purse of Verres may at pleasure use:
But let not all the gold which Tægus hides,
And pays the sea in tributary tides,
Be bribe sufficient to corrupt the breast;
Or violate with dreams thy peaceful rest.
Great men with jealous eyes the friend behold,
Whose secrecy they purchase with their gold.

I haste to tell thee, nor shall shame oppose
What confidence our wealthy Romans chose:
And whom I most abhor: to speak my mind,
I hate, in Rome, a Grecian town to find:
To see the acum of Greece, transplanted here,
Receiv'd like gods, is what I cannot bear.
Nor Greeks alone, but Syrians here abound,
Obscene Orontes, diving under ground,
Conveys his wealth to Tyber's hungry shores,
And fattens Italy with foreign whores:
Hither their crooked harps and customs come:
All find receipt in hospitable Rome.
The barbarous harlots crowd the public place:
Go, fools, and purchase an unclean embrace:
The painted mitre court, and the more painted face.

Old Romulus, and father Mars, look down,
Your herdsmen primitive, your homely clown,
Is turn'd a bean in a loose tawdry gown.
His once unkem'd and horrid locks behold
Silling sweet oil: his neck enchain'd with gold:

Aping the foreigners in every dress;
 Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less.
 Meantime they wisely leave their native land,
 From Sycion, Samos, and from Alaband,
 And Amydon, to Rome they swarm in shoals:
 So sweet and easy is the gain from fools.
 Poor refugees at first, they purchase here:
 And, soon as denizen'd, they domineer.
 Grow to the great, a flattering servile rout:
 Work themselves inward, and their patrons out.
 Quick-witted, brazen fac'd, with fluent tongues,
 Patient of labours, and dissembling wrongs.
 Riddle me this, and guess him if you can,
 Who bears a nation in a single man?
 A cook, a conjurer, a rhetorician,
 A painter, pedant, a geometrician,
 A dancer on the ropes, and a physician.
 All things the hungry Greek exactly knows:
 And bid him go to Heaven, to Heaven he goes.
 In short, no Scythian, Moor, or Thracian born,
 But in that town which arms and arts adorn,
 Shall he be plac'd above me at the board,
 In purple cloth'd, and lolling like a lord?
 Shall he before me sign, whom t' other day
 A smaller vessel hither did convey;
 Where stow'd with prunes, and rotten figs, he lay?
 How little is the privilege become
 Of being born a citizen of Rome!
 The Greeks get all by fulsome flatteries;
 A most peculiar stroke they have at lies.
 They make a wit of their insipid friend;
 His blobber-lip and beetle-brows commend;
 His long crane-neck and narrow shoulders praise;
 You'd think they were describing Hercules.
 A creaking voice for a clear treble goes;
 Though harsher than a cock that treads and crows.
 We can as grossly praise; but, to our grief,
 No flattery but from Grecians gains belief.
 Besides these qualities, we must agree
 They mimic better on the stage than we:
 The wife, the whore, the shepherdess, they play,
 In such a free, and such a graceful way,
 That we believe a very woman shown,
 And fancy something underneath the gown.
 But not Antiochus, nor Stratocles,
 Our ears and ravish'd eyes can only please:
 The nation is compos'd of such as these.
 All Greece is one comedian: laugh, and they Return it louder than an ass can bray:
 Grieve, and they grieve; if you weep silently,
 There seems a silent echo in their eye:
 They cannot mourn like you, but they can cry.
 Call for a fire, their winter clothes they take:
 Begin but you to shiver, and they shake:
 In frost and snow, if you complain of heat,
 They rub th' unsweating brow, and swear they sweat.
 We live not on the square with such as these,
 Such are our betters, who can better please:
 Who day and night are like a looking glass;
 Still ready to reflect their patron's face.
 The panegyric hand, and lifted eye,
 Prepar'd for some new piece of flattery.
 Ev'n nastiness, occasions will afford;
 They praise a belching, or well-pissing lord.
 Besides, there's nothing sacred, nothing free
 From bold attempts of their rank lechery.
 Through the whole family their labours run;
 The daughter is debauch'd, the wife is won:
 Nor 'scapes the bridegroom, or the blooming son.

If none they find for their lewd purpose fit,
 They with the walls and very floors commit.
 They search the secrets of the house, and so
 Are worship'd there, and fear'd for what they know.
 And, now we talk of Grecians, cast a view
 On what, in schools, their men of morals do;
 A rigid stoic his own pupil slew:
 A friend, against a friend of his own cloth,
 Turn'd evidence, and murder'd on his oath.
 What room is left for Romans in a town
 Where Grecians rule, and clokes control the gown?
 Some Diphilus, or some Protogenes,
 Look sharply out, our senators to seize:
 Engross them wholly, by their native art,
 And fear'd no rivals in their bubbli's heart:
 One drop of poison in my patron's ear,
 One slight suggestion of a senseless fear,
 Infus'd with cunning, serves to ruin me;
 Disgrac'd, and banish'd from the family.
 In vain forgotten services I boast;
 My long dependance in an hour is lost:
 Look round the world, what country will appear,
 Where friends are left with greater ease than here?
 At Rome (nor think me partial to the poor)
 All offices of ours are out of door:
 In vain we rise, and to the levees run;
 My lord himself is up, before, and gone:
 The pretor bids his lictors mend their pace,
 Lest his colleague outstrip him in the race:
 The childish matrons are, long since, awake:
 And, for affronts, the tardy visits take.
 'Tis frequent, here, to see a free-born son
 On the left hand of a rich hireling run;
 Because the wealthy rogue can throw away,
 For half a brace of bouts, a tribune's pay:
 But you, poor sinner, though you love the vice,
 And, like the whore, demur upon the price:
 And, frighted with the wicked sum, forbear
 To lend a hand, and help her from the chair.
 Produce a witness of unblemish'd life,
 Holy as Numa, or as Numa's wife,
 Or him who bid th' unballow'd flames retire,
 And snatch'd the trembling goddess from the fire!
 The question is not put, how far extends
 His piety, but what he yearly spends:
 Quick to the business; how he lives, and eats;
 How largely gives; how splendidly he treats:
 How many thousand acres feed his sheep,
 What are his rents, what servants does he keep?
 Th' account is soon cast up; the judges rate
 Our credit in the court by our estate.
 Swear by our gods, or those the Greeks adore,
 Thou art as sure forsworn, as thou art poor:
 The poor must gain their bread by perjury;
 And ev'n the gods, that other means deny,
 In conscience must absolve them, when they lye.
 Add, that the rich have still a gibe in store;
 And will be monstrous witty on the poor:
 For the torn surtout and the tatter'd vest,
 The wretch and all his wardrobe are a jest:
 The greasy gown, sully'd with often tarning,
 Gives a good hint, to say, "The man's in mourning
 Or if the shoe beript, or patches put, (sing)
 "He's wounded! see the plaster on his foot."
 Want is the scorn of every wealthy fool;
 And wit in rags is tur'd to ridicule.
 "Pa-k hence, and from the cover'd benches rise,"
 (The master of the ceremonies cries)
 "This is no place for you, whose small estate
 Is not the value of the settled rate:

The sons of happy pinks, the pandar's heir,
 Are privileg'd to sit in triumph there,
 To clap the first, and rule the theatre.
 Up to the galleries, for shame, retreat; [sent.]
 For, by the Roscian law, the poor can claim no
 Who ever brought to his rich daughter's bed
 The man, that poll'd but twelve-pence for his head?
 Who ever nam'd a poor man for his heir,
 Or call'd him to assist the judging chair?
 The poor were wise, who, by the rich oppress,
 Withdrew, and sought a sacred place of rest.
 Once they did well, to free themselves from scorn;
 But had done better never to return.
 Rarely they rise by virtue's aid, who lie
 Plung'd in the depth of helpless poverty.
 At Rome 'tis worse; where house-rent by the year,
 And servants' bellies cost so devilish dear;
 And tavern-bills run high for hungry cheer.
 To drink or eat in earthen-ware we scorn,
 Which cheaply country-cupboards does adorn:
 And coarse blue hoods on holidays are worn.
 Some distant parts of Italy are known,
 Where none but only dead men wear a gown:
 On theatres of turf, in homely state,
 Old plays they act, old feasts they celebrate:
 The same rude song returns upon the crowd,
 And, by tradition, is for wit allow'd.
 The mimic yearly gives the same delight;
 And in the mother's arms the clownish infant
 Their habits (undistinguish'd by degree) [frights].
 Are plain alike; the same simplicity,
 Both on the stage, and in the pit, you see.
 In his white cloak the magistrate appears;
 The country-bumkin the same livery wears.
 But here, attir'd, beyond our purse we go,
 For useless ornament and flaunting show:
 We take on trust, in purple robes to shine;
 And, poor, are yet ambitious to be fine.
 This is a common vice, though all things here
 Are sold, and sold unconscionably dear.
 What will you give that Cossus may but view
 Your face, and in the crowd distinguish you;
 May take your incense like a gracious god,
 And answer only with a civil nod?
 To please our patrons, in this vicious age,
 We make our entrance by the favourite page:
 Shave his first down, and when he pulls his hair,
 The consecrated locks to temples bear:
 Pay tributary cracknels, which he sells,
 And, with our offerings, help to raise his vails.
 Who fears in country-towns a house's fall,
 Or to be caught betwixt a riven wall?
 But we inhabit a weak city here;
 Which buttresses and props but scarcely bear:
 And 'tis the village-mason's daily calling,
 To keep the world's metropolis from falling,
 To cleanse the gutters, and the chinks to close;
 And, for one night, secure his lord's repose.
 At Cumæ we can sleep quite round the year,
 Nor falls, nor fires, nor nightly dangers fear;
 While rolling flames from Roman turrets fly,
 And the pale citizens for buckets cry.
 Thy neighbour has remov'd his wretched store
 (Few hands will rid the lumber of the poor).
 Thy own third story smokes, while thou, supine,
 Art drench'd in fumes of undigested wine.
 For if the lowest floors already burn,
 Cock-loft and garrets soon will take the turn;
 Where thy tame pigeons next the tiles were bred,
 Which, in their nests unsafe, are timely fled.

Codrus had but one bed, so short to boot,
 That his short wife's short legs hung dangling out:
 His cupboard's head six earthen pitchers grac'd,
 Beneath them was his trusty tankard plac'd:
 And, to support this noble plate, there lay
 A bending Chiron cast from honest clay:
 His few Greek books a rotten chest contain'd;
 Whose covers much of mouldiness complain'd:
 Where mice and rats devour'd poetic bread;
 And with heroic verse luxuriously were fed.
 'Tis true, poor Codrus nothing had to boast,
 And yet poor Codrus all that nothing lost:
 Begg'd naked through the streets of wealthy Rome;
 And found not one to feed, or take him home.

But if the palace of Arturius burn,
 The nobles change their clothes, the matrons mourn;

The city-pretor will no pleadings bear;
 The very name of fire we hate and fear:
 And look aghast, as if the Gauls were here.
 While yet it burns, th' officious nation flies,
 Some to condole, and some to bring supplies:
 One sends him unable to rebuild, and one
 With naked statues of the Parian stone,
 The work of Polyclete, that seem to live;
 While others images for altars give;
 One books and streamers, and Pallas to the breast;
 Another bags of gold, and he gives best.
 Childless Arturius, vastly rich before,
 Thus by his losses multiplies his store:
 Suspected for accomplice to the fire,
 That burnt his palace but to build it higher,

But, could you be content to bid adieu
 To the dear play-house, and the players too;
 Sweet country-seats are purchas'd every where,
 With lands and gardens, at less price than here:
 You hire a darksome dog-hole by the year.
 A small convenience decently prepar'd,
 A shallow well that rises in your yard,
 That spreads his easy crystal streams around,
 And waters all the pretty spot of ground.
 There, love the fork, thy garden cultivate,
 And give thy frugal friends a Pythagorean treat:
 'Tis somewhat to be lord of some small ground
 In which a lizard may, at least, turn round.
 'Tis frequent, here, for want of sleep to die;
 Which fumes of undigested feasts deny;
 And, with imperfect heat, in languid stomachs fry.

What house secure from noise the poor can keep,
 When ev'n the rich can scarce afford to sleep;
 So dear it costs to purchase rest in Rome;
 And hence the sources of diseases come.
 The drover who his fellow-drover meets
 In narrow passages of winding streets;
 The waggons that curse their standing teams,
 Would wake ev'n drowsy Drusius from his dreams.
 And yet the wealthy will not brook delay,
 But sweep above our heads, and make their way;
 In lofty litter borne, and read and write,
 Or sleep at ease: the shutters make it night.
 Yet still he reaches first the public place:
 The press before him stops the client's pace.
 The crowd that follows crush his panting sides,
 And trip his heels; he walks not, but he rides.
 One elbows him, one jostles in the shoal:
 A rafter breaks his head, or chairman's pole:
 Stocking'd with loads of fat town-dirt he goes;
 And some rogue-soldier, with his hob-nail'd shoes,
 Indepts his legs behind in bloody rows.

See with what smoke our doles we celebrate:
 A hundred guests, invited, walk in state: [wait.
 A hundred hungry slaves, with their Dutch kitchens,
 Huge pans the wretches on their heads must bear,
 Which scarce gigantic Corbulo could rear:
 Yet they must walk upright beneath the load:
 Nay, run, and running blow the sparkling flames abroad:

Their coats, from botching newly bought, are torn.
 Unwieldy timber-trees in waggons borne,
 Stretch'd at their length, beyond their carriage lie;
 That nod, and threaten ruin from on high.
 For, should their axle break, its overthrow
 Would crush, and pound to dust, the crowd below:
 Nor friends their friends, nor sires their sons could know:

Nor limbs, nor bones, nor carcase would remain:
 But a mash'd heap, a hotchpotch of the slain.
 One vast destruction; not the soul alone,
 But bodies, like the soul, visibly are frown.
 Meantime, unknowing of their fellows' fate,
 The servants wash the platter, scour the plate,
 Then blow the fire, with puffing cheeks, and lay
 The rubbers, and the bathing sheets display;
 And oil them first; and each is handy in his way.
 But he, for whom this busy care they take,
 Poor ghost! is wandering by the Stygian lake:
 Afrighted with the ferryman's grim face;
 New to the horrors of that uncouth place;
 His passage begs with unregarded prayer:
 And wants two farthings to discharge his fare.

Return we to the dangers of the night;
 And, first, behold our houses' dreadful height:
 From whence come broken potberds tumbling
 down;

And leaky ware, from garret-windows thrown:
 Well may they break our heads, and mark the flinty stone.

'Tis want of sense to sap abroad too late;
 Unless thou first hast settled thy estate.
 As many fates attend thy steps to meet,
 As there are waking windows in the street.
 Bless the good gods, and think thy chance is rare
 To have a pisspot only for thy share.

The scouring drunkard, if he does not fight
 Before his bed-time, takes no rest that night:
 Passing the tedious hours in greater pain
 Than stern Achilles, when his friend was slain.

'Tis so ridiculous, but so true withal,
 A bully cannot sleep without a brawl:
 Yet, though his youthful blood be fir'd with wine,
 He wants not wit the danger to decline:
 Is cautious to avoid the coach and six,
 And on the lacquies will no quarrel fix.

His train of flambeaux, and embroider'd coat,
 May privilege my lord to walk secure on foot.
 But me, who must by moonlight homeward bend,
 Or lighted only with a candle's end,
 Poor me he fights, if that be fighting, where.
 He only coddles, and I only bear.

He stands, and bids me stand: I must abide;
 For he's the stronger, and is drunk beside. [cries,
 "Where did you whet your knife to night," he
 "And shred the loeks that in your stomach rise?
 Whose windy beans have stuff'd your guts, and where
 Have your black thumbs been dipt in vinegar?
 With what companion cobbler have you fed,
 On old ox-cheeks, or bo-goat's tougher head?
 What, are you dumb? Quick with your answer,
 Before my foot salutes you with a kick. [quick,

Say, in what nasty cellar under ground, [found?"
 Or what church-porch, your rogueship may be
 Answer, or answer not, 'tis all the same:
 He lays me on, and makes me bear the blame:
 Before the bar, for beating him you come;
 This is a poor man's liberty in Rome.
 You beg his pardon; happy to retreat
 With some remaining teeth, to chew your meat.

Nor is this all; for when retir'd, you think
 To sleep securely; when the candles wink,
 When every door with iron-chains is barr'd,
 And roaring taverns are no longer heard;
 The ruffian-robbers by no justice aw'd,
 And unpaid cut-throat soldiers, are abroad,
 Those venal souls, who, harden'd in each ill,
 To save complaints and persecution, kill.
 Chas'd from their woods and bogs, the padders come
 To this vast city, as their native home;
 To live at ease, and safely skulk in Rome.

The forge in fetters only is employ'd;
 Our iron-mines exhausted and destroy'd in shackles; for these villains scarce allow Goads for the teams, and plough-shares for the
 Oh, happy ages of our ancestors, [plough:
 Beneath the kings and tribunitial powers!
 One jail did all their criminals restrain;
 Which now the walls of Rome can scarce contain.

More I could say, more causes I could show
 For my departure; but the Sun is low:
 The waggoner grows weary of my stay;
 And whips his horses forwards on their way.
 Farewell; and when, like me, o'erwhelm'd with
 You to your own Aquinum shall repair, [care;
 To take a mouthful of sweet country-air,
 Be mindful of your friend; and send me word,
 What joys your fountains and cool shades afford:
 Then, to assist your satires, I will come;
 And add new venom when you write of Rome.

THE SIXTH SATIRE OF
 JUVENAL.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS satire, of almost double length to any of the rest, is a bitter invective against the fair sex. It is, indeed, a common-place, from whence all the moderns have notoriously stolen their sharpest raileries. In his other satires, the poet has only glanced on some particular women, and generally scourged the men. But this he reserved wholly for the ladies. How they had offended him, I know not: but upon the whole matter, he is not to be excused for imputing to all, the vices of some few amongst them. Neither was it generously done of him, to attack the weakest as well as the fairest part of the creation: neither do I know what moral he could reasonably draw from it. It could not be to avoid the whole sex, if all had been true which he alleges against them: for that had been to put an end to humane-kind. And to bid us beware of their artifices, is a kind of silent acknowledgment, that they have more wit than men: which turns the satire upon us, and particularly upon the poet; who thereby makes a compliment, where he meant a libel. If he intended only to exercise his wit, he has forfeited his judgment, by making the one half of his readers his mortal enemies: and, amongst the men, all the happy lovers, by their own experience, will disprove his accusations. The whole world must allow this to be the wittiest of his satires; and truly he had need of all his parts, to maintain with so much violence so unjust a charge. I am satisfied he will bring but few over to his opinion: and on that consideration chiefly I ventured to translate him. Though there wanted not another reason, which was, that no one else would undertake it: at least, sir C. S. who could have done more right to the author, after a long delay, at length absolutely refused so ungrateful an employment: and every one will grant, that the work must have been imperfect and lame, if it had appeared without one of the principal members belonging to it. Let the poet therefore bear the blame of his own invention; and let me satisfy the world, that I am not of his opinion. Whatever his Roman ladies were, the English are free from all his imputations. They will read with wonder and abhorrence the vices of an age, which was the most infamous of any on record. They will bless themselves when they behold those examples, related of Domitian's time: they will give back to antiquity those monsters it produced: and believe with reason, that the species of those women is extinguished; or at least, that they were never here propagated. I may safely therefore proceed to the argument of a satire, which is no way relating to them: and first observe, that my author makes their lust the most heroic of their vices: the rest are in a manner but digression. He skims them over; but he dwells on this: when he seems to have taken his last leave of it, on the sudden he returns to it: it is one branch of it in Hippia, another in Messalina, but lust is the main body of the tree. He begins with this text in the first lines, and takes it up with intermissions to the end of the chapter. Every vice is a loader, but that's a ten. The fillers, or intermediate parts, are their revenge; their contrivances of secret crimes; their arts to hide them; their wit to excuse them; and their impudence to own them, when they can no longer be kept secret. Then the persons to whom they are most addicted; and on whom they commonly bestow the last favours: as stage-players, fiddlers, singing-boys, and fencers. These who pass for chaste amongst them, are not really so; but only, for their vast dowries, are rather suffered than loved by their own husbands. That they are imperious, domineering, scolding wives: set up for learning and criticism in poetry; but are false judges. Love to speak Greek (which was then the fashionable tongue, as the French is now with us). That they plead causes at the bar, and play prizes at the bear-garden. That they are gossips and news-mongers: wrangle with their neighbours abroad, and beat their servants at home. That they lie in for new faces once a month, are skittish with their husbands in private; and paint and dress in public for their lovers. That they deal with Jews, diviners, and fortune-tellers: learn the arts of miserring, and barrenness. Buy children, and produce them for their own. Murder their husbands' sons, if they stand in their way to his estate; and make their adulterers his heirs. From hence the poet proceeds to show the occasion of all these vices, their original, and how they were introduced in Rome, by peace, wealth, and luxury. In conclusion, if we will take the word of our malicious author, bad women are the general standing rule: and the good, but some few exceptions to it.

In Saturn's reign, at Nature's early birth,
There was that thing call'd Chastity on Earth;
When in a narrow cave, their common shade,
The sheep, the shepherds, and their gods were laid:
When reeds and leaves, and hides of beasts were spread
By mountain-housewives for their homely bed,
And mossy pillows rais'd, for the rude husband's Unlike the niceness of our modern dames [head
(Affected nymphs with new-affected names):
The Cynthias and the Lesbians of our years,
Who for a sparrow's death dissolve in tears.
Those first unpolish'd matrons, big and bold,
Gave suck to infants of gigantic mould;
Rough as their savage lords who rang'd the wood,
And, fat with acorns, belch'd their windy food.
For when the world was buxom, fresh, and young,
Her sons were undebauch'd, and therefore strong;
And whether born in kindly beds of earth,
Or struggling from the teeming oaks to birth,
Or from what other atoms they begun,
No sires they had, or, if a sire, the Sun.
Some thin remains of chastity appear'd,
Ev'n under Jove, but Jove without a beard;
Before the servile Greeks had learnt to swear
By heads of kings; while yet the bounteous year
Her common fruits in open plains expos'd,
Ere thieves were fear'd, or gardens were enclos'd.
At length, uneasy, Justice upwards flew,
And both the sisters to the stars withdrew;
From that old era whoring did begin,
So venerably ancient is the sin.
Adulterers next invade the nuptial state,
And marriage-beds creak'd with a foreign weight;
All other ills did iron times adorn;
But whores and silver in one age were born.
Yet thou, they say, for marriage dost provide:
Is this an age to buckle with a bride?
They say thy hair the curling art is taught,
The wedding-ring perhaps already bought:
A sober man, like thee, to change his life!
What fury would possess thee with a wife?
Art thou of every other death bereft,
No knife, no ratsbane, no kind halter left?
(For every noose compar'd to her's is cheap):
Is there no city-bridge from whence to leap?
Would'st thou become her drudge, who dost enjoy
A better sort of bedfellow, thy boy?
He keeps thee not awake with nightly brawls,
Nor with insatiate heavings calls for more,
When all thy spirits were drain'd out before.
But still Urstidius courts the marriage-bait,
Longs for a son, to settle his estate,
And takes no gifts, though every gaping heir
Would gladly grease the rich old bachelor.

What revolution can appear so strange,
As such a leacher, such a life to change?
A rank, notorious whoremaster, to choose
To thrust his neck into the marriage-noose?
He who so often in a dreadful fright
Had in a coffer 'scap'd the jealous cuckold's sight,
That he to wedlock dotingly betray'd,
Should hope in this lewd town to find a maid!
The man's grown mad: to ease his frantic pain,
Raz for the surgeon; breathe the middle vein:
But let a heifer with gilt horns be led
To Juno, regent of the marriage-bed,
And let him every deity adore,
If his new bride prove not an arrant whore
In head and tail, and every other pore.
On Ceres' feast restrain'd from their delight,
Few matrons there, but curse the tedious night:
Few whom their fathers dare salute, such lust
Their kisses have, and come with such a gust.
With ivy now adorn thy doors, and wed;
Such is thy bride, and such thy genial bed.
Thiuk'st thou one man is for one woman meant?
She sooner with one eye would be content
And yet 'tis nois'd, a maid did once appear
In some small village, though fame says not where:

'Tis possible; but sure no man she found;
'Twas desert, all, about her father's ground:
And yet some lustful god might there make bold,
Are Jove and Mars grown impotent and old?
Many a fair-nymph has in a cave been spread,
And much good love, without a feather-bed.
Whether would'st thou to choose a wife resort,
The park, the mall, the play-house, or the court?
Which way soever thy adventures fall,
Secure alike of chastity in all.

One sees a dancing-master capering high,
And raves, and pisses, with pure ecstasy:
And one is charm'd with the new opera notes,
Admires the song, but on the singer dotes:
The country lady in the box appears,
Softly she warbles over all she hears;
And sucks in passion both 'as eyes and ears.

The rest (when now the long vacation's come,
The noisy hall and theatres grown dumb)
Their memories to refresh, and cheer their hearts,
In borrow'd breeches act the players' parts.
The poor, that scarce have wherewithal to eat,
Will pinch, to make the singing boy a treat.
The rich, to buy him, will refuse no price;
And stretch his quail-pipe, till they crack his voice.
Tragedians, acting love, for lust are sought:
(Though but the parrots of a poet's thought).
The pleading lawyer, though for counsel us'd,
In chamber practice often is refus'd.
Still thou wilt have a wife, and father hoirs
(The product of concurring theatres).
Perhaps a fencer did thy brows adorn,
And a young sword-man to thy lands is born.

Thus Hippia loath'd her old patrician lord,
And left him for a brother of the sword:
To wandering Pharos with her love she fled,
To show one monster more than Aëtic bred:
Forgetting house and husband, left behind
Ev'n children too; she sails before the wind;
False to them all, but constant to her kind,
But, stranger yet, and bolder to conceive,
She could the play-house and the players leave.
Born of rich parentage, and nicely bred,
She lodg'd on down, and in a damask bed;

Yet fearing not the dangers of the deep,
On a hard mattress is content to sleep.
Ere this, 'tis true, she did her fame expose:
But that, great ladies with great ease can lose.
The tender nymph could the rude ocean bear:
So much her lust was stronger than her fear.
But had some honest cause her passage prest,
The smallest hardship had disturb'd her breast:
Each inconvenience makes their virtue cold;
But womankind, in ill, is ever bold.
Were she to follow her own lord to sea,
What doubts or scruples would she raise to stay?
Her stomach sick, and her head giddy grows;
The tar and pitch are nauseous to her nose.
But in love's voyage nothing can offend;
Women are never sea-sick with a friend.
Amidst the crew, she walks upon the board;
She eats, she drinks, she handles every cord:
And if she spews, 'tis thinking of her lord.
Now ask, for whom her friends and fame she lost?
What youth, what beauty, could th' adulterer boast?
What was the face, for which she could sustain
To be call'd mistress to so base a man?
The gallant, of his days had known the best:
Deep scars were seen indented on his breast;
And all his batter'd limbs requir'd their needful
A promontory wen, with grisly grace, [rest.
Stood high, upon the handle of his face:
His blue eyes ran in gutters to his chin:
His beard was stubble, and his cheeks were thin.
But twas his fencing did her fancy move:
'Tis arms, and blood, and cruelty, they love.
But should he quit his trade, and sheath his sword,
Her lover would begin to be her lord.

This was a private crime; but you shall hear
What fruits the sacred brows of monarchs bear:
The good old sluggard but began to snore,
When from his side uprose th' imperial whore:
She who prefer'd the pleasures of the night
To pomps, that are but impotent delight:
Strode from the palace, with an eager pace,
To cope with a more masculine embrace:
Muffled she march'd, like Juno in a cloud,
Of all her train but one poor wench allow'd,
One whom in secret service she could trust;
The rival and companion of her lust.
To the known brothel-house she takes her way;
And for a nasty room gives double pay;
That room in which the rankest harlot lay.
Prepar'd for fight, expectingly she lies,
With heaving breasts, and with desiring eyes.
Still as one drops, another takes his place,
And baffled still succeeds to like disgrace.
At length, when friendly darkness is expir'd,
And every strumpet from her cell retir'd,
She lags behind, and, lingering at the gate,
With a repining sigh submits to fate:
All sith without, and all a fire within,
Tir'd with the toil, unsated with the sin,
Old Caesar's bed the modest matron seeks;
The steam of lamps still hanging on her cheeks,
In rosy smut: thus foul, and thus bedight,
She brings him back the product of the night.

Now should I sing what poisons they provide;
With all their trumpery of charms beside;
And all their arts of death: it would be known
Last is the smallest sin the sex can own.
Cæsinia still, they say, is guiltless found
Of every vice, by her own lord renown'd:
And well she may, she brought ten thousand pound.

She brought him wherewithal to be call'd chaste;
His tongue is ty'd in golden fetters fast:
He sighs, adores, and courts her every hour;
Who would not do as much for such a dower?
She writes love-letters to the youth in grace;
Nay, tips the wink before the cuckold's face;
And might do more; her portion makes it good;
Wealth has the privilege of widowhood.

These truths with his example you disprove,
Who with his wife is monstrously in love:
But know him better; for I heard him swear,
'Tis not that she's his wife, but that she's fair.
Let her but have three wrinkles in her face,
Let her eyes lessen, and her skin unbrace,
Soon you will hear the saucy steward say,
"Pack up with all your trinkets, and away;
You grow offensive both at bed and board:
Your betters must be had to please my lord."

Meantime she's absolute upon the throne:
And, knowing time is precious, loses none:
She must have flocks of sheep, with wool more fine
Than silk, and vineyards of the noblest wine:
Whole droves of pages for her train she craves:
And sweeps the prisons for attending slaves.
In short, whatever in her eyes can come,
Or others have abroad, she wants at home.
When winter shuts the seas, and fleecy snows
Make houses white, she to the merchant goes;
Rich crystals of the rocks she takes up there,
Huge agate vases, and old china-ware.

But is none worthy to be made a wife
In all this town? Suppose her free from strife,
Rich, fair, and fruitful, of unblemish'd life;
Chaste as the Sabines, whose prevailing charms
Dismiss'd their husbands, and their brothers' arms:
Grant her, besides, of noble blood, that ran
In ancient veins ere heraldry began:

Suppose all these, and take a poet's word,
A black swan is not half so rare a bird.
A wife, so hung with virtues, such a freight,
What mortal shoulders could support the weight!
Some country-girl, scarce to a courtsey bred,
Would I much rather than Cornelia wed:
If, supercilious, haughty, proud, and vain,
She brought her father's triumphs in her train.
Away with all your Carthaginian state,
Let vanquish'd Hannibal without doors wait,
Too burly and too big to pass my narrow gate.

"O Pæan," cries Amphion, "bend thy bow Against my wife, and let my children go:"
But sullen Pæan shoots at sons and mothers too.
His Niobe and all his boys he lost;
Ev'n her, who did her numerous offspring boast,
As fair and fruitful as the sow that carry'd
The thirty pigs, at one large litter farrow'd.

What beauty or what chastity can bear
So great a price? If stately and severe,
She still insults, and you must still adore;
Grant that the honey's much, the gall is more.
Upbraided with the virtues she displays,
Seven hours in twelve, you loath the wife you
praise:

Some faults, though small, intolerable grow;
For what so nauseous and affected too,
As those that think they due perfection want,
Who have not learnt to lisp the Grecian cant?
In Greece their whole accomplishments they seek:
Their fashion, breeding, language, must be Greek:
But, raw in all that does to Rome belong,
They scorn to cultivate their mother-tongue.

In Greek they flatter, all their fears they speak,
Tell all their secrets; nay, they scold in Greek:
Ev'n in the heat of love, they use that tongue.
Such affectations may become the young;
But thou, old bag, of threescore years and three,
Is showing of thy parts in Greek for these?
Ζεῖν καὶ ψυχῆ! All those tender words
The momentary trembling bliss affords,
The kind soft murmurs of the private sheets
Are bawdy, while thou speak'st in public streets.
Those words have fingers; and their force is such,
They raise the dead, and mount him with a touch.
But all provocatives from thee are vain:
No blandishment the slacken'd nerve can strain.

If then thy lawful spouse thou canst not love,
What reason should thy mind, to marriage move?
Why all the charges of thy nuptial feast,
Wine and desserts, and sweet-meats to digest?
Th' endowing gold that buys the dear delight,
Giv'n for their first and only happy night?
If thou art thus unreasonably inclin'd,
To bear thy bondage with a willing mind,
Prepare thy neck, and put it in the yoke:
But for no mercy from thy woman look.
For though, perhaps, she loves with equal fire,
To absolute dominion she aspires;
Joys in the spoils, and triumphs o'er thy purse;
The better husband makes the wife the worse.
Nothing is thine to give, or sell, or buy,
All offices of ancient friendship die;
Nor hast thou leave to make a legacy.
By thy imperious wife thou art bereft;
A privilege, to pimp and panders left;
Thy testament's her will; where she prefers
Her ruffians, drudges, and adulterers,
Adopting all thy rivals for thy heirs.

"Go drag that slave to death:" your ransom, why
Should the poor innocent be doom'd to die?
What proofs? For, when man's life is in debate,
The judge can ne'er too long deliberate.
"Call't thou that slave & man," the wife replies:

"Prov'd, or unprov'd, the crime, the villain dies
I have the sovereign power to save or kill;
And give no other reason but my will." [change,

Thus the she-tyrant reigns, till, pleas'd with
Her wild affections to new empires range:
Another subject husband she desires,
Divorc'd from him, she to the first retires,
While the last wedding-feast is scarcely o'er,
And garlands hang yet green upon the door,
So still the reckoning rises; and appears,
In total sum, eight husbands in five years.
The title for a tomb-stone might be fit;
But that it would too commonly be writ.

Her mother living, hope no quiet day;
She sharpens her, instructs her how to sea
Her husband bare, and then divides the prey.
She takes love-letters, with a crafty smile,
And, in her daughter's answer, mends the style.
In vain the husband sets his watchful spies;
She cheats her cunning, or she bribes their eyes,
The doctor's call'd; the daughter, taught the trick,
Pretends to faint; and in full health is sick.
The panting stallion, at the closet-door,
Hears the consult, and wishes it were o'er.
Canst thou, in reason, hope, a hand so known,
Should teach her other manners than her own?
Her interest is in all th' advice she gives:
'Tis on the daughter's ruins the mother lives.

No cause is try'd at the litigious bar,
But women plaintiffs or defendants are,
They form the process, all the briefs they write;
The topics furnish, and the pleas indite;
And teach the toothless lawyer how to bite.

They turn viragos too; the wrestler's toil
They try, and smear their naked limbs with oil:
Against the post their wicker shields they crush,
Flourish the sword, and at the fastron push.
Of every exercise the mannish crew
Fulfils the parts, and oft excels us too;
Prepar'd not only in feign'd fight t' engage,
But rout the gladiators on the stage.

What sense of shame in such a breast can lie,
Lur'd to arms, and her own sex to fly?
Yet to be wholly man she would disclaim;
To quit her tenfold pleasure at the game,
For frothy praises and an empty name.
Oh what a decent sight 'tis to behold
All thy wife's magazine by auction sold!
The belt, the crested plume, the several suits
Of armour, and the Spanish leather-boots!
Yet these are they, that cannot bear the heat
Of figur'd silks, and under sarsenet sweat.
Behold the strutting Amazonian whore,
She stands in guard with her right-foot before:
Her coats tuck'd up; and all her notions just,
She stamps, and then cries "Hah!" at every thrust.

The ghosts of ancient Romans, should they rise,
Would grin to see their daughters play a prize.
Besides, what endless brawls by wives are bred:
The curtain-lecture makes a mournful bed.
Then, when she has thee sure within the sheets,
Her cry begins, and the whole day repeats.
Conscious of crimes herself, she teases first;
Thy servants are accus'd; thy whore is curst;
She acts the jealous, and at will she cries:
For womens' tears are but the sweat of eyes.
Poor cuckold-fool, thou think'st that love sincere,
And suck'st between her lips the falling tear:
But search her cabinet, and thou shalt find
Each tiller there with love-epistles lin'd.
Suppose her taken in a close embrace,
This you would think so manifest a case,
No rhetoric could defend, no impudence out-face;
And yet, ev'n then, she cries, "The marriage-vow
A mental reservation must allow;
And there's a silent bargain still imply'd,
The parties should be pleas'd on either side:
And both may for their private needs provide.
Though men yourselves, and women us you call,
Yet homo is a common name for all."
There's nothing bolder than a woman caught;
Guilt gives them courage to maintain their fault.

You ask from whence proceed these monstrous crimes?
Once poor, and therefore chaste, in former times,
Our matrons were: no luxury found room
In low-roof'd houses, and bare walls of loam;
Their hands with labour harden'd while 'twas light,
A frugal sleep supply'd the quiet night, [strait;
While pinch'd with want, their hunger held them
When Hannibal was hovering at the gate:
But wanton now and lolling at our ease,
We suffer all th' inveterate ills of peace,
And wasteful riot, whose destructive charms
Revenge the vanquish'd world, of our victorious
No crime, no lustful postures are unknown; [arms.
Since Poverty, our guardian god, is gone:

Pride, laziness, and all lascivious arts,
Poor like a deluge in from foreign parts:
Since gold obscene, and silver, found the way,
Strange fashions with strange bullion to convey,
And our plain simple manners to betray. [spread!

What care our drunken dames to whom they Win no distinction makes of tail or head,
Who, lewdly dancing at a midnight ball,
For bot eringoes and fat oysters call:
Full brimmers to their fuddled noses thrust;
Brimmers, the last provocatives of lust.
When vapours to their swimming brains advance,
And double tapers on the tables dance.

Now think what bawdy dialogues they have,
What Tullia talks to her confiding slave,
At Modesty's old status; when by night
They make a stand, and from their listers light;
The good man early to the leaves goes,
And treads the nasty puddle of his spouse.

The secrets of the goddess nam'd the good,
Are ev'n by boys and barbers understood:
Where the rank matrons, dancing to the pipe,
Gig with their bums, and are for action ripe;
With music rais'd, they spread abroad their hair;
And toss their heads like an enamour'd mare:
Rank'd with the lady the cheap sinner lies;
For here not blood, but virtue, gives the prize.
Nothing is feign'd in this venereal strife;
'Tis downright lust, and acted to the life.

So full, so fierce, so vigorous, and so strong,
That looking on, would make old Nestor young.
Impatient of delay, a general sound,
And universal grouch of lust, goes round;
For then, and only then, the sex sincere is found.
"Now is the time of action! now begin!"
They cry, "and let the lusty lovers in.
The whoresons are asleep; then bring the slaves,
And watermen, a race of strong-back'd knaves."

I wish, at least, our sacred rites were free
From those pollutions of obscenity:
But 'tis well known what singer, how disguis'd,
A lewd audacious action enterpris'd;
Into the fair, with women mixt, he went,
Arm'd with a huge two-handed instrument;
A grateful present to those holy choirs,
Where the mouse, guilty of his sex, retires;
And ev'n male-pictures modestly are veil'd,
Yet no profaneness on that age prevail'd;
No scoffers at religious rites are found;
Though now, at every altar they abound.

"I hear your cautious counsel," you would say,
"Keep close your women under lock and key;"
But, who shall keep those keepers? Women, nurs'd
In craft: begin with those, and bribe them first.
The sex is turn'd all whore; they love the game:
And mistresses and maids are both the same.

The poor Oquinia, on the poet's day,
Will borrow clothes, and chair, to see the play:
She, who before had mortgag'd her estate,
And pawn'd the last remaining piece of plate.
Some are reduc'd their utmost shifts to try:
But women have no shame of poverty.
They live beyond their stint; as if their store,
The more exhausted, would increase the more:
Some men, instructed by the labouring ant,
Provide against th' extremities of want;
But woman-kind, that never knows a mean,
Down to the dregs their sinking fortune drain:
Hourly they give, and spend, and waste, and wear:
And think no pleasure can be bought too dear,

If songs they love, the singer's voice they force
Beyond his compass, till his quail-pipe's hoarse;
His lute and lyre with their embrace is worn;
With knots they trim it, and with gems adorn:
Run over all the strings, and kiss the case;
And make love to it, in the master's place.

A certain lady once, of high degree,
To Janus vow'd, and Vesta's deity,
That Pollio might, in singing, win the prize;
Pollio the dear, the darling of her eyes:
She pray'd, and brib'd; what could she more have
For a sick husband, or an only son? [done
With her face veil'd, and heaving up her hands,
The shameless suppliant at the altar stands;
The forms of prayer she solemnly pursues:
And, pale with fear, the offer'd entrails views.
Answer, ye powers; for, if you heard her vow,
Your godships, sure, had little else to do.

This is not all, for actors they implore:
An impudence not known to Heaven before.
Th' Araspex, tir'd with this religious rout,
Is forc'd to stand so long, he gets the gout.
But suffer not thy wife abroad to roam,
If she loves singing, let her sing at home;
Not strut in streets, with Amazonian pace;
For that's to cuckold thee before thy face.

Their endless itch of news comes next in play;
They vent their own, and hear what others say.
Know what in Thrace, or what in France, is done;
Th' intrigues betwixt the stepdame and the son.
Tell who loves who, what favours some partake:
And who is jilted for another's sake.

What pregnant widow in what month was made,
How oft she did, and doing, what she said.
She, first, beholds the raging comet rise:
Knows whom it threatens, and what lands destroys,
Still for the newest news she lies in wait;
And takes reports just entering at the gate.
Wrecks, floods, and fires: whatever she can meet,
She spreads, and is the fame of every street.

This is a grievance; but the next is worse;
A very judgment, and her neighbours' curse;
For, if their barking dog disturb her ease,
No prayer can bind her, no excuse appease.
Th' unmanner'd malefactor is arraign'd;
But first the master, who the cur maintain'd,
Must feel the scourge: by night she leaves her bed,
By night her bathing equipage is led,
That marching armies a less noise create;
She moves in tumult, and she sweats in state.
Meanwhile, her guests their appetites must keep;
Some gaps for hunger, and some gap for sleep.
At length she comes, all flush'd; but ere she sup,
Swallows a swinging preparation-cup;
And then, to clear her stomach, spews it up.
The deluge-vomit all the floor o'erflows,
And the sour savour nauseates every nose.
She drinks again: again she spews a lake;
Her wretched husband sees, and dares not speak:
But mutters many a curse against his wife;
And damns himself for choosing such a life.

But of all the plagues, the greatest is untold;
The book-learn'd wife in Greek and Latin bold.
The critic dame, who at her table sits:
Homer and Virgil quotes, and weighs their wits;
And pities Dido's agonizing fits.
She has so far th' ascendant of the board,
The prating pedant puts not in one word:
The man of law is non-plust in his suit;
Nay, every other female tongue is mute.

Hammers, and beating anvils, you would swear,
And Vulcan with his whole militia there.
Tabor and trumpets cease; for she alone
Is able to redeem the labouring Moon.
Ev'n wit's a burthen, when it talks too long:
But she, who has no continence of tongue,
Should walk in breeches, and should wear a beard;
And mix among the philosophic herd.
O what a midnight curse has he, whose side
Is pester'd with a mood and figure bride!
Let mine, ye gods! (if such must be my fate)
No logic learn, nor history translate;
But rather be a quiet, humble fool:
I hate a wife to whom I go to school,
Who climbs the grammar-tree, distinctly knows
Where noun, and verb, and participle, grows;
Corrects her country-neighbour; and, a-bed,
For breaking Priscian's, breaks her husband's head.
The gaudy gossip, when she's set agog,
In jewels drest, and at each ear a bob,
Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,
Thinks all she says or does is justify'd.
When poor, she's scarce a tolerable evil;
But rich, and fine, a wife's a very devil.

She duly, once a month, renews her face;
Meantime, it lies in dawk, and hid in grease;
Those are the husband's nights; she craves her due,
He takes fat kisses, and is stuck with glue.
But to the lov'd adulterer when she steers,
Fresh from the bath, in brightness she appears:
For him the rich Arabia sweats her gum;
And precious oils from distant Indies come:
How haggardly soe'er she looks at home.
Th' eclipse then vanishes; and all her face
Is open'd, and restor'd to every grace,
The crust remov'd, her cheeks as smooth as silk,
Are polish'd with a wash of asses' milk;
And should she to the farthest north be sent,
A train of these attend her banishment.
But hadst thou seen her plaister'd up before,
'Twas so unlike a face, it seem'd a sore.

'Tis worth our while, to know what all the day
They do, and how they pass their time away;
For, if o'er-night the husband has been slack,
Or counterfeited sleep, and turn'd his back,
Next day, be sure, the servants go to wrack.
The chamber-maid and dresser are call'd whores;
The page is stript, and beaten out of doors.
The whole house suffers for the master's crime:
And he himself is warn'd, to wake another time.

She hires tormentors by the year, she treats
Her visitors, and talks; but still she beats.
Beats while she paints her face, surveys her gown,
Casts up the day's account, and still beats on:
Tir'd out, at length, with an outrageous tone,
She bids them in the devil's name be gone.
Compar'd with such a proud, insulting dame,
Sicilian tyrants may renounce their name.
For, if she hastes abroad to take the air,
Or goes to Isis' church (the bawdy-house of prayer)
She hurries all her handmaids to the task;
Her head, alone, will twenty dressers ask.
Pæcas, the chief, with breast and shoulders bare,
Trembling, considers every sacred hair;
If any straggler from his rank be found,
A pinch must, for the mortal sin, compound.
Pæcas is not in fault: but, in the glass,
The dame's offended at her own ill face.
The maid is banish'd; and another girl,
More dextrous, manages the comb and curl;

The rest are summon'd on a point so nice ;
 And first, the grave old woman gives advice.
 The next is call'd, and so the turn goes round,
 As each for age, or wisdom, is renown'd :
 Such counsel, such deliberate care, they take,
 As if her life and honour lay at stake :
 With curls on curls, they build her head before,
 And mount it with a formidable tower.
 A giantess she seems ; but look behind,
 And then she dwindles to the pigmy kind.
 Duck-legg'd, short-waisted, such a dwarf she is,
 That she must rise on tip-toes for a kiss.
 Meanwhile, her husband's whole estate is spent !
 He may go bare, while she receives his rent.
 She minds him not ; she lives not as a wife,
 But, like a bawling neighbour, full of strife :
 Near him, in this alone, that she extends
 Her hate to all his servants and his friends.
 Bellona's priests, an enunch at their head,
 About the streets a m^{al} procession lead ;
 The venerable gilding, large and high,
 O'erlooks the herd of his inferior fry.
 His awkward clergymen about him prance ;
 And beat the timbrels to their mystic dance :
 Meanwhile, his cheeks the mired prophet swells,
 And dire presages of the year foretels.
 Unless with eggs (his priestly hire) they haste
 To expiate, and avert th' autumnal blast.
 And add beside a murrey-colour'd vest,
 Which, in their places, may receive the post :
 And, thrown into the flood, their crimes may bear,
 To purge th' unlucky omens of the year.
 Th' astonish'd matrons pay, before the rest ;
 That sex is still obnoxious to the priest.
 Thro' you they beat, and plunge into the stream,
 If so the god has warn'd them in a dream.
 Weak in their limbs, but in devotion strong,
 On their bare hands and feet they crawl along
 A whole field's length, the laughter of the throng.
 Should Io (Io's priest I mean) command
 A pilgrimage to Meru's burning sand,
 Through deserts they would seek the secret spring ;
 A holy water for libration bring.
 How can they pay their priests too much respect,
 Who trade with Heaven, and earthly gains neglect ?
 With him, demystic gods discourse by night :
 By day, attended by his choir in white,
 The bald-pate tribe runs madding thro' the street,
 And smile to see with how much ease they cheat.
 The ghostly sire forgives the wife's delights,
 Who sins, through frailty, on forbidden nights,
 And tempts her husband in the holy time,
 When carnal pleasure is a mortal crime.
 The sweating image shakes his head, but he,
 With mumbled prayers, atones the deity.
 The pious priesthood the fat goose receive,
 And they once brib'd, the godhead must forgive.
 No sooner these remove, but, full of fear,
 A gypsy Jewess whispers in your ear,
 And begs an alms : an high-priest's daughter she,
 Vers'd in their Talnoud, and divinity,
 And prophesies beneath a shady tree.
 Her koo is a basket, and old hay her bed,
 She strolls, and telling fortunes gains her bread :
 Farthings, and some small monies, are her fees ;
 Yet she interprets all your dreams for these.
 Foretels th' estate, when the rich uncle dies,
 And sees a sweet-heart in the sacrifice.
 Such toys, a pigeon's entrails can disclose ;
 Which yet th' Assonian augur far outgoes :

In dogs, a victim more obscene, he rakes ;
 And murder'd infants for inspection takes :
 For gain, his impious practice he pursues ;
 For gain, will his accomplices accuse.
 More credit, yet, is to Chaldeans given ;
 What they foretel, is deem'd the voice of Heaven.
 Their answers, as from Hammon's altar, come ;
 Since now the Delphian oracles are dumb,
 And mankind, ignorant of future fate,
 Believes what fond astrologers relate.
 Of these the most in vogue is he who, sent
 Beyond seas, is return'd from banishment,
 His art who to aspiring Otho sold ;
 And sure succession to the crown foretold.
 For his esteem is in his wife plac'd ;
 The more believ'd, the more he was disgrac'd.
 No astrologic wizard honour gains,
 Who has not oft been banish'd, or in chains.
 He gets renown, who, to the halter near,
 But narrowly escapes, and buys it dear.
 From him your wife inquires the planets' will,
 When the black jaundice shall her mother kill :
 Her sister's and her uncle's end, would know :
 But, first, consults his art, when you shall go.
 And, what's the greatest gift that Heaven can give,
 If, after her, th' adulterer shall live.
 She neither knows, nor dares to know, the rest ;
 If Mars and Saturn shall the world infest ;
 Or Jove and Venus, with their friendly rays,
 Will interpose, and bring us better days.
 Beware the woman too, and shun her sight,
 Who in these studies does herself delight,
 By whom a greasy almanac is borne,
 With often handling, like chaf'd amber worn :
 Not now consulting, but consulted, she
 Of the twelve months, and their lords, is free.
 She, if the scheme a fatal journey show,
 Stays safe at home, but lets her husband go.
 If but a mile she travel out of town,
 The planetary hour must first be known,
 And lucky moment ; if her eye but akes
 Or itches, its decumbiture she takes.
 No nourishment receives in her disease,
 But what the stars and Ptolemy shall please.
 The middle sort, who have not much to spare,
 To chiromancers' cheaper art repair,
 Who clap the pretty palm, to make the lines more fair
 But rich the matron, who has more to give,
 Her answers from the Braehman will receive :
 Skill'd in the globe and sphere, he gravely stands,
 And, with his compass, measures seas and lands.
 The poorest of the sex have still an itch
 To know their fortunes, equal to the rich.
 The dairy-maid inquires, if she shall take
 The trusty taylor, and the cook forsake.
 Yet these, tho' poor, the pain of childbirth bear ;
 And, without nurses, their own infants rear :
 You seldom hear of the rich mantle, spread
 For the babe, born in the great lady's bed.
 Such is the power of herbs ; such arts they use
 To make them barren, or their fruit to lose.
 But thou, whatever stops she will have bought,
 Be thankful, and supply the deadly draught :
 Help her to make man-slaughter ; let her breed,
 And never wait for savin at her need.
 For, if she holds till her nine months be run,
 Thou may'st be father to an Ethiop's son.
 A boy, who, ready gotten to thy hands,
 By law is to inherit all thy lands :

One of that hue, that, should he cross the way,
His omen would discolour all the day.

I pass the foundling by, a race unknown,
At doors expos'd, whom matrons make their own :
And into noble families advance
A nameless issue, the blind work of chance.
Indulgent Fortune does her care employ,
And, smiling, broods upon the naked boy :
Her garment spreads, and laps him in the fold,
And covers, with her wings, from nightly cold :
Gives him her blessing ; puts him in a way ;
Sets up the farce, and laughs at her own play.
Him she promotes ; she favours him alone,
And makes provision for him, as her own.

The craving wife the force of magic tries,
And philtres for th' unable husband buys :
The potion works not on the part design'd ;
But turns his brains, and stupifies his mind.
The sotted moon-calf gapes, and staring on,
Sees his own business by another done :
A long oblivion, a benumbing frost,
Constrains his head ; and yesterday is lost :
Some nimbler juice would make him foam and rave,
Like that Casonia to her Caius gave :
Who, plucking from the forehead of the foal
His mother's love, infus'd it in the bowl :
The boiling blood ran biasing in his veins,
Till the mad vapour mounted to his brains.
The thunderer was not half so rough on him,
When Juno's girdle kindled his desire.
What woman will not use the poisoning trade,
When Cæsar's wife the precedent has made ?
Let Agrippina's mushroom be forgot,
Giv'n to a slaving, old, unuseful sot :
That only clos'd the drivelling dotard's eyes,
And sent his godhead downward to the skies.
But this fierce, potion calls for fire and sword ;
Nor spares the common, when it strikes the lord.
So many mischiefs were in one combin'd ;
So much one single poisoner cost mankind.

If stepdames seek their sons-in-law to kill,
Th'is venial trespass ; let them have their will :
But let the child, entrusted to the care
Of his own mother, of her bread beware :
Beware the food she reaches with her hand ;
The morsel is intended for thy land.
The tutor be thy taster, ere thou eat ;
There's poison in thy drink, and in thy meat.

You think this feign'd ; the Satire in a rage
Struts in the buskins of the tragic stage,
Forgets his business is to laugh and bite :
And will of deaths and dire revenges write.

Would it were all a fable, that you read ;
But Drymon's wife pleads guilty to the deed.
" I," she confesses, " in the fact was caught,
Two sons dispatching at one deadly draught."
" What two ! two sons, then viper, in one day !"
" Yes, seven," she cries, " if seven were in my Medea's legend is no more a lye ; [way !]"
One age adds credit to antiquity.
Great ills, we grant, in former times did reign,
And murders then were done / but not for gain.
Less admiration to great crimes is due,
Which they thro' wrath, or thro' revenge, pursue.
For, weak of reason, impotent of will,
The sex is hurry'd headlong into ill :
And, like a cliff from its foundation torn,
By raging earthquakes, into seas is borne.
But those are fiends, who crimes from thought
And, cool in mischief, meditate the sin. [begin :

They read th' example of a plow-wife,
Redeeming, with her own, her husband's life ;
Yet, if the laws did that exchange afford,
Would save their lapdog sooner than their lord.

Where'er you walk, the Belides you meet ;
And Clytemnestras grow in every street :
But here's the difference : Agamemnon's wife
Was a gross butcher with a bloody knife ;
But murder, now, is to perfection grown,
And subtle poisons are employ'd alone :
Unless some antidote prevents their arts,
And lines with balm all the nobler parts :
In such a case, reserv'd for such a need,
Rather than fail, the dagger does the deed.

THE TENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL.

THE ARGUMENT.

The poet's design, in this divine satire, is to represent the various wishes and desires of mankind ; and to set out the folly of them. He runs through all the several heads of riches, honours, eloquence, fame for martial achievements, long life, and beauty ; and gives instances, in each, how frequently they have proved the ruin of those that owned them. He concludes, therefore, that since we generally choose so ill for ourselves, we should do better to leave it to the gods, to make the choice for us. All we can safely ask of Heaven, lies within a very small compass. It is but health of body and mind. And if we have these, it is not much matter what we want besides ; for we have already enough to make us happy.

Look round the habitable world, how few
Know their own good ; or, knowing it, pursue.
How void of reason are our hopes and fears !
What in the conduct of our life appears
So well design'd, so luckily begun,
But, when we have our wish, we wish undone !

Whole houses, of their whole desires possess'd,
Are often ruin'd, at their own request.
In wars, and peace, things hurtful we require,
When made obnoxious to our own desire.

With laurels some have fatally been crown'd ;
Some, who the depths of eloquence have found,
In that unnavigable stream were drown'd.

The brawny fool, who did his vigour boast ;
In that presuming confidence was lost :
But more have been by avarice oppress'd,
And heaps of money crowded in the chest :
Unwieldy sums of wealth, which higher mount,
Than files of marshall'd figures can account.
To which the stores of Cræsus, in the scale,
Would look like little dolphins, when they sail
In the vast shadow of the British whale.

For this, in Nero's arbitrary time,
When virtue was a guilt, and wealth a crime,
A troop of cut-throat guards were sent to seize
The rich mens' goods, and gut their palaces :
The mob, commission'd by the government,
Are seldom to an empty garret sent.

The fearful passenger, who travels late,
Charg'd with the carriage of a paltry plate,
Shakes at the moonshine shadow of a rush;
And sees a red-coat rise from every bush:
The beggar sings, ev'n when he sees the place
Beset with thieves, and never mends his pace.

Of all the vows, the first and chief request
Of each, is to be richer than the rest:
And yet no doubts the poor man's draught control,
He dreads no poison in his homely bowl,
Then fear the deadly drug, when gems divine
Enchase the cup, and sparkle in the wine.

Will you not now the pair of sages praise,
Who the same end pursu'd, by several ways?
One pity'd, one contemn'd, the woful times:
One laugh'd at folkies, one lamented crimes:
Laughter is easy; but the wonder lies,
What stage of brims supply'd the weeper's eyes.
Democritus could feed his spleen, and shake
His sides and shoulders till he felt them ake;
Though in his country town no lictors were,
Nor rods, nor ax, nor tribune did appear:
Nor all the foppish gravity of show,
Which cunning magistrates on crowds bestow.

What had he done, had he behold, on high,
Our pretor seated, in mock majesty;
His chariot rolling o'er the dusty place,
While, with dumb pride, and a set formal face,
He moves in the dull ceremonial track,
With Jove's embroider'd coat upon his back:
A suit of hangings had not more oppress
His shoulders, than that long, laborious vest:
A heavy gewgaw (call'd a crown) that spread
About his temples, drown'd his narrow head:
And would have crush'd it with the massy freight,
But that a sweating slave sustain'd the weight:
A slave in the same chariot seen to ride,
To mortify the mighty madman's pride.
And now th' imperial eagle, rais'd on high,
With golden beak (the mark of majesty)
Trumpets before, and on the left and right,
A cavalcade of nobles, all in white:
In their own natures false and flattering tribes,
But made his friends, by places and by bribes.

In his own age, Democritus could find
Sufficient cause to laugh at human kind:
Learns from so great a wit; a land of bogs
With ditches fence'd, a heaven made fat with frogs,
May form a spirit fit to sway the state;
And make the neighbouring monarchs fear their fate.

He laughs at all the vulgar cares and fears;
At their vain triumphs, and their vainer tears:
An equal temper in his mind he found,
When fortune flatter'd him, and when she frown'd.
'Tis plain, from hence, that what our vows request,
Are hurtful things, or useless at the best.

Some ask for envy'd power; which public hate
Pursues, and hurries headlong to their fate:
Down go the titles; and the statue crown'd,
Is by base hands in the next river-drown'd.
The guiltless horses, and the chariot wheel,
The same effects of vulgar fury feel:
The smith prepares his hammer for the stroke,
While the lung'd bellows hissing fire provoke;
Sejanus, almost first of Roman names,
The great Sejanus crackles in the flames:
Form'd in the forge, the pliant brass is laid
On anvils; and of head and limbs are made,
Rags, cans, and piss-pots, a whole kitchen trade.

Adorn your doors with laurels; and a bull,
Milkwhite, and large, lead to the Capitol;
Sejanus, with a rope, is dragg'd along;
The sport and laughter of the giddy throng!
"Good Lord," they cry, "what Ethiop hips he has,
How foul a snout, and what a hanging face!
By Heaven, I never could endure his sight;
But say, how came his monstrous crimes to light?
What is the charge, and who the evidence,
(The saviour of the nation and the prince?)"
"Nothing of this; but our old Caesar sent A noisy letter to his parliament:"
"Nay, sir, if Caesar writ, I ask no more,
He's guilty, and the question's out of door."
How goes the mob? (for that's a mighty thing,)
When the king's trump, the mob are for the king:
They follow fortune, and the common cry
Is still against the rogue condemn'd to die.

But the same very mob, that rascal crowd,
Had cry'd Sejanus, with a shout as loud;
Had his designs (by fortune's favour blest)
Succeeded, and the prince's age oppress. [face,
But long, long since, the times have chang'd their
The people grown degenerate and base:
Not suffer'd now the freedom of their choice,
To make their magistrates, and sell their voice.
Our wise forefathers, great by sea and land,
Had once the power and absolute command;
All offices of trust, themselves dispos'd;
Rais'd whom they pleas'd, and whom they pleas'd
depos'd;

But we, who give our native rights away,
And our enslav'd posterity betray,
Are now reduc'd to beg an alms, and go
On holidays to see a puppet-show. [doubt;

"There was a damn'd design," cries one, "us
For warrants are already issued out;
I met Bruttius in a mortal fright;
He's dipt for certain, and plays least in sight:
I fear the rage of our offended prince,
Who thinks the senate slack in his defence!
Come let us haste, our loyal zeal to show,
And spur the wretched corps of Caesar's foe:
But let our slaves be present there, lest they Accuse their masters, and for gain betray."
Such were the whispers of those jealous times,
About Sejanus's punishment and crimes. [fate

Now tell me truly, would'st thou change thy
To be, like him, first minister of state?
To have thy levees crowded with resort,
Of a depending, gaping, servile court;
Dispose all honours of the sword and gown,
Grace with a nod, and ruin with a frown:
To hold thy prince in pupilage, and sway
That monarch, whom the master'd world obey!
While he, intent on secret lust alone,
Lives to himself, abandoning the throne;
Coop'd in a narrow isle, observing dreams
With flattering wizards, and erecting schemes!
I well believe, thou wouldst be great as he;
For every man's a fool to that degree;
All wish the dire prerogative to kill;
Ev'n they would have the power, who want the will:

But wouldst thou have thy wishes understood,
To take the bad together with the good,
Would'st thou not rather choose a small renown,
To be the mayor of some poor paltry town,
Bigly to look, and barbarously to speak;
To pound false weights, and scanty measures break?

Then, grant we that Sejanus went astray
 In every wish, and knew not how to pray :
 For he who grasp'd the world's exhausted store
 Yet never had enough, but wish'd for more,
 Rais'd a top-heavy tower, of monstrous height,
 Which, mouldering, crush'd him underneath the
 'What did the mighty Pompey's fall beget? [weight.
 It ruin'd him, who, greater than the great,
 The stubborn pride of Roman nobles broke ;
 And bent their haughty necks beneath his yoke :
 What else but his immoderate lust of power,
 Prayers made and granted in a luckless hour ?
 For few usurpers to the shades descend
 By a dry death, or with a quiet end.

The boy, who scarce has paid his entrance down
 To his proud pedant, or declin'd a noun,
 (So small an elf, that when the days are foul,
 He and his satchel must be borne to school,)
 Yet prays, and hopes, and aims at nothing less,
 To prove a Tully, or Demosthenes :
 But both these orators, so much renown'd,
 In their own depths of eloquence were drown'd :
 The hand and head were never lost, of those
 Who dealt in doggrel, or who punn'd in prose.

" Fortune foretun'd the dying notes of Rome :
 Till I, thy consul sole, consol'd thy doom."
 His fate had crept below the lifted swords,
 Had all his malice been to murder words.
 I rather would be Mævius, thrash for rhymes
 Like his, the scorn and scandal of the times,
 Than that Philippic fatally divine,
 Which is inscrib'd the second, should be mine.
 Nor he, the wonder of the Grecian throng,
 Who drove them with the torrent of his tongue,
 Who shook the theatres, and sway'd the state
 Of Athens, found a more propitious fate.
 Whom, born beneath a boding horoscope,
 His sire, the blear-ey'd Vulcan of a shop,
 From Mars's forge, sent to Minerva's schools,
 To learn th' unlucky art of wheedling fools.

With itch of honour, and opinion, vain,
 All things beyond their native worth we strain :
 The spoils of war, brought to Feretrian Jove,
 An empty coat of armour hung above
 The conqueror's chariot, and in triumph borne,
 A streamer from a boarded galley torn,
 A chap-fall'n heaver loosely hanging by
 The cloven helm, an arch of victory,
 On whose high convex sits a captive foe,
 And sighing casts a mournful look below ;
 Of every nation, each illustrious name,
 Such toys as these have cheated into fame :
 Exchanging solid quiet, to obtain
 The windy satisfaction of the brain.

So much the thirst of honour fires the blood :
 So many would be great, so few be good.
 For who would virtue for herself regard,
 Or wed, without the portion of reward ?
 Yet this mad chase of fame, by few pursu'd,
 Has drawn destruction on the multitude :
 This avarice of praise in times to come,
 Those long inscriptions, crowded on the tomb,
 Should some wild fig-tree take her native bent,
 And heave below the gaudy monument,
 Would crack the marble tiles, and disperse.
 The characters of all the lying verse.

For sepulchres themselves must crumbling fall
 In time's abyss, the common grave of all.
 Great Hannibal within the balance lay ;
 And tall how many pounds his ashes weigh ;

Whom Afric was not able to contain,
 Whose length runs level with th' Atlantic main,
 And wearies fruitful Nilus, to convey
 His sun-beat waters by so long a way ;
 Which Ethiopia's double climate divides,
 And elephants in other mountains hides.
 Spain first he won, the Pyreneans past,
 And steepy Alps, the mountains that nature cast
 And with corroding juices as he went,
 A passage through the living rocks he rent.
 Then, like a torrent, rolling from on high,
 He pours his head-long rage on Italy :
 In three victorious battles over-run ;
 Yet still uneasy, cries, " There's nothing done,
 Till level with the ground their gates are laid ;
 'And Punic flags on Roman towers display'd."
 Ask what a face belong'd to his high fame ;
 His picture scarcely would deserve a frame :
 A sign-post dauber would disdain to paint
 The one-ey'd hero on his elephant.

Now what's his end, O charming glory ! say
 What rare fifth act to crown his huffing play ?
 In one deciding battle overcome,
 He flies, is banish'd from his native home :
 Begs refuge in a foreign court, and there
 Attends, his mean petition to prefer ;
 Repuls'd by surly grooms, who wait before
 The sleeping tyrant's interdicted door.

What wondrous sorts of death has Heaven de-
 Distinguish'd from the herd of human kind,
 For so untam'd, so turbulent a mind !
 Nor swords at hand, nor hissing darts afar,
 Are doom'd to avenge the tedious bloody war ;
 But poison, drawn through a ring's hollow plate,
 Must finish him : a sucking infant's fate.
 Go, climb the ragged Alps, ambitious fool,
 To please the boys, and be a theme at school.
 One world suffic'd not Alexander's mind ;
 Coop'd up, he seem'd in earth and seas confin'd ;
 And, struggling, stretch'd his restless limbs about
 The narrow globe, to find a passage out.
 Yet, enter'd in the brick-built town, he try'd
 The tomb, and found the steep dimensions wide :
 " Death only this mysterious truth unfolds,
 The mighty soul, how small a body holds."

Old Greece a tale of Athens would make out,
 Cut from the contingent, and sail'd about ;
 Seas hid with navies, chariots passing o'er
 The channel, on a bridge from shore to shore ;
 Rivers, whose depth no sharp beholder sees,
 Drunk, at an army's dinner, to the lees ;
 With a long legend of romantic things,
 Which in his cups the brawny poet sings.
 But how did he return, this haughty brave,
 Who whipt the winds, and made the sea his slave ?
 (Though Neptune took unkindly to be bound ;
 And Eurus never such hard usage found
 In his Æolian prison under ground) ;
 What god so mean, ev'n he who points the way,
 So merciless a tyrant to obey !
 But how return'd he, let us ask again ?
 In a poor skiff he pass'd the bloody main,
 Chok'd with the slaughter'd bodies of his train
 For fame he pray'd, but let th' event declare
 He had no mighty pen's-worth of his prayer.

" Jove grant me length of life, and years good store
 Heap on my bended back, I ask no more."
 Both sick and healthful, old and young conspire
 In this one silly unobtain'd desire.

Mistaken blessing which old age they call,
 'Tis a long, nasty, darksome hospital,
 A ropy chain of rheums; a visage rough,
 Deform'd, unfeatur'd, and a skin of buff.
 A stitch-fall'n cheek, that hangs below the jaw;
 Such wrinkles, as a skilful hand would draw
 For an old grandam ape, when, with a grace,
 She sits at squat, And scrubs her leathern face.

In youth, distinctions infinite abound;
 No shape, or feature, just alike are found;
 The fair, the black, the feeble, and the strong:
 But the same foulness does to age belong,
 The self-same palsy, both in limbs and tongue,
 The skull and forehead one bald barren plain;
 And gums unarm'd to mumble meat in vain.
 Besides th' eternal drivel, that supplies
 The dropping beard, from nostrils, mouth and eyes.
 His wife and children loath him, and what's worse,
 Himself does his offensive carrion curse!
 Flatterers forsake him too; for who would kill
 Himself, to be remember'd in a will!
 His taste not only pall'd to wine and meat,
 But to the relish of a nobler treat.

Those senses lost, behold a new defeat,
 The soul dislodging from another seat.
 What music, or enchanting voice, can cheer
 A stupid, old, impenetrable ear?
 No matter in what place, or what degree
 Of the full theatre he sits to see;
 Cornets and trumpets cannot reach his ear:
 Under an actor's nose, he's never near.

His boy must bawl to make him understand
 The hour o' th' day, or such a lord's at hand:
 The little blood that creeps within his veins,
 Is but just warm'd in a hot fever's pains.
 In fine, he hears no limb about him sound:
 With sores and sicknesses beleagu'rd round:
 Ask me their names, I sooner could relate
 How many drudges on salt Hippia wait;
 What crowds of patients the town-doctor kills,
 Or how, last fall, he rais'd the weekly bills.
 What provinces by Basilus were spoil'd,
 What herds of heirs by guardians are beguill'd:
 What lands and lordships for their owner know
 My quondam barber, but his worship now.

This dotard of his broken back complains,
 One his legs fail, and one his shoulders' pains:
 Another is of both his eyes bereft;
 And envies who has one for aiming left.
 A fifth, with trembling tips expecting stands,
 As in his childhood, cramm'd by others' hands;
 One, who at sight of supper open'd wide
 His jaws before, and whetted grinders try'd;
 Now only yawns, and waits to be supply'd:
 Like a young swallow, when with weary wings
 Expected food her fasting mother brings.

His loss of members is a heavy curse,
 But all his faculties decay'd are worse!
 His servants' names he has forgotten quite;
 Knows not his friend who supp'd with him last night.
 Not ev'n the children he begot and bred;
 Or his will knows them not: for, in their stead,
 In form of law, a common hackney-jade,
 Sole heir, for secret services, is made:
 So lewd and such a batter'd brothel-whore,
 That she defies all corners, at her door.
 Well, yet suppose his senses are his own,
 He lives to be chief mourner for his son:
 Before his face his wife and brother burns;
 He numbers all his kindred in their urns.

These are the fines he pays for living long;
 And dragging tedious age in his own wrong:
 Grievs always green, a household still in tears,
 Sad pomps: a threshold throng'd with daily biers;
 And liveries of black for length of years.

Next to the raven's age, the Pylian king
 Was longest liv'd of any two-legg'd thing;
 Blest, to defraud the grave so long, to mount
 His number'd years, and on his right hand count;
 Three hundred seasons, guzzling must of wine:
 But, hold a while, and hear himself repine
 At fate's unequal laws; and at the clue (drew
 Which, merciless in length, the midmost sister
 When his brave son upon the funeral pyre
 He saw extended, and his beard on fire;
 He turn'd, and weeping, ask'd his friends, what crime

Had curs'd his age to this unhappy time?

Thus mourn'd old Peleus for Achilles slain,
 And thus Ulysses' father did complain,
 How fortunate an end had Priam made,
 Amongst his ancestors a mighty shade,
 While Troy yet stood: when Hector, with the race
 Of loyal bastards, might his funeral grace:
 Amidst the tears of Trojan dames inurn'd,
 And by his loyal daughters truly mourn'd!
 Had Heaven so blest him, he had dy'd before
 The fatal fleet of Sparta Paris bore.
 But mark what age produc'd; he liv'd to see
 His town in flames, his falling monarchy:
 In fine, the feeble sire, reduc'd by fate,
 To change his sceptre for a sword, too late,
 His last effort before Jove's altar tries;
 A soldier half, and half a sacrifice:
 Falls like an ox, that waits the coming blow;
 Old and unprofitable to the plough.

At least he dy'd a man; his queen surviv'd,
 To howl, and in a barking body liv'd.

I hasten to our own; nor will relate
 Great Mithridates, and rich Croesus' fate;
 Whom Solon wisely counsel'd to attend
 The name of happy, till he knew his end.

That Marius was an exile, that he fled,
 Was ta'en, in ruin'd Carthage begg'd his bread,
 All these were owing to a life too long:
 For whom had Rome beheld so happy, young!
 High in his chariot, and with laurel crown'd,
 When he had led the Cimbrian captives round
 The Roman streets; descending from his state,
 In that blest hour he should have begg'd his fate;
 Then, then, he might have dy'd of all admir'd,
 And his triumphant soul with shouts expir'd.

Campania, fortune's malice to prevent,
 To Pompey an indulgent favour sent:
 But public prayers impos'd on Heaven, to give
 Their much-lov'd leader an unkind reprieve.
 The city's fate and his conspir'd to save
 The head, reserv'd for an Egyptian slave.

Cethegus, though a traitor to the state,
 And tortur'd, 'scap'd this ignominious fate:
 And Sergius, who a bad cause bravely try'd,
 All of a piece, and undiminish'd, dy'd.

To Venus the fond mother makes a prayer,
 That all her sons and daughters may be fair:
 True, for the boys a mumbing vow she sends;
 But for the girls, the vaulted temple rends:
 They must be finish'd pieces: 'tis allow'd
 Diana's beauty made Latona proud:
 And pleas'd, to see the wondering people pray
 To the new-rising sister of the day.

And yet Lucretia's fate would bar that vow :
And fair Virginia would her fate bestow
On Rutilla ; and change her faultless make
For the foul rumple of her carnal-back.

But, for his mother's boy the beau, what frights
His parents have by day, what anxious nights !
Form, join'd with virtue, is a sight too rare :
Chaste is no epithet to suit with fair.
Suppose the same traditionary strain
Of rigid manners, in the house remain ;
Inveterate truth, an old plain Sabine's heart ;
Suppose that Nature, too, has done her part :
Infus'd into his soul a sober grace,
And blush'd a modest blood into his face,
(For Nature is a better guardian far,
Than saucy pedants, or dull tutors are :)
Yet still the youth must ne'er arrive at man ;
(So much almighty bribes, and presents, can ;)
Ev'n with a parent, where persuasions fail,
Money is impudent, and will prevail.

We never read of such a tyrant king
Who get a boy deform'd, to hear him sing.
Npr Nero, in his more luxurious rage,
E'er made a mistress of an ugly page :
Sporus, his spouse, nor crooked was, nor lame,
With mountain-back, and belly, from the game
Cross-barr'd : but both his sexes well became.
Go, boast your Springal, by his beauty curst
To ill ; nor think I have declar'd the worst ;
His form procures him journey-work ; a strife
Betwixt town-madams, and the merchant's wife :
Guess, when he undertakes this public war,
What furious beasts offended cuckolds are.

Adulterers are with dangers round beset ;
Born under Mars, they cannot 'scape the net ;
And from revengeful husbands oft have try'd
Worse handling, than severest laws provide :
One stabs ; one slashes ; one, with cruel art,
Makes Colon suffer for the peccant part. [boy,
But your Endymion, your smooth, smock'd-fac'd
Unrival'd, shall a beauteous dame enjoy :
Not so, one more fallacious, rich, and old,
Outbids, and buys her pleasure for her gold ;
Now he must toil and drudge, for one he loaths ;
She keeps him high, in equipage and clothes :
She pawns her jewels, and her rich attire,
And thinks the workman worthy of his hire :
In all things else immoral, stingy, mean ;
But, in her lusts, a conscionable quean.

She may be handsome, yet be chaste, you say ;
Good observer, not so fast away :
Did it not cost the modest youth his life,
Who shunn'd th' embraces of his father's wife ?
And was not th' other stripling forc'd to fly,
Who coldly did his patron's queen deny ;
And pleaded laws of hospitality ?
The ladies charg'd them home, and turn'd the tale,
With shame they redd'n'd, and with spite grew pale.

'Tis dangerous to deny the longing dame ;
She loses pity, who has lost her shame.
Now Silius wants thy counsel, gives advice ;
Wed Cæsar's wife, or die ; the choice is nice.
Her coinet-eyes she darts on every grace ;
And takes a fatal liking to his face.
Adorn'd with bridal pomp she sits in state ;
The public notaries and aruspex wait :
The genial bed is in the garden drest :
The portion paid, and every rite express'd,
Which in a Roman marriage is profest.

'Tis no stol'n wedding, this, rejecting awe,
She scorns to marry, but in form of law :
In this moot case, your judgment : to refuse,
Is present death, besides the night you lose :
If you consent, 'tis hardly worth your pain ;
A day or two of anxious life you gain :
Till loud reports through all the town have past,
And reach the prince : for cuckolds hear the last.
Indulge thy pleasure, youth, and take thy swing ;
For not to take is but the self-same thing :
Inevitable death before thee lies ;
But looks more kindly through a lady's eyes.

What then remains ? Are we depriv'd of will,
Must we not wish, for fear of wishing ill ?
Receive my counsel, and securely move ;
Intrust thy fortune to the powers above.
Leave them to manage for thee, and to grant
What their unerring wisdom sees thee want :
In goodness, as in greatness, they excel ;
Ah, that we lov'd ourselves but half so well !
We, blindly by our headstrong passions led,
Are hot for action, and desire to wed ;
Then wish for heirs : but to the gods alone
Our future offspring, and our wives, are known ;
Th' audacious strumpet, and ungracious son.

Yet not to rob the priests of pious gain,
That altars be not wholly built in vain ;
Forgive the gods the rest, and stand confin'd
To health of body, and content of mind :
A soul, that can securely death defy,
And count it Nature's privilege to die ;
Serene and manly, harden'd to sustain
The load of life, and exercis'd in pain :
Guiltless of hate, and proof against desire ;
That all things weighs, and nothing can advise :
That dares prefer the toils of Hercules
To dalliance, banquet, and ignoble ease.
The path to peace is virtue : what I show,
Thyself may freely on thyself bestow :
Fortune was never worship'd by the wise ;
But, set aloft by fools, usurps the skies.

THE SIXTEENTH SATIRE OF JUVENAL

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet, in this satire, proves, that the condition of a soldier is much better than that of a countryman : first, because a countryman, however affronted, provoked, and struck himself, dares not strike a soldier ; who is only to be judged by a court-martial, and by the law of Camillus, which obliges him not to quarrel without the trenches ; he is also assured to have a speedy hearing, and quick dispatch : whereas, the townsman or peasant is delayed in his suit by frivolous pretences, and not sure of justice when he has heard in the court : the soldier is also privileged to make a will, and to give away his estate, which he got in war, to whom he pleases, without consideration of parentage, or relations ; which is denied to all other Romans. This satire was written by Juvenal, when he was a commander in Egypt : it is certainly his, though I think it not finished. And if it be well observed, you will find he intended an invective against a standing army.

WHAT vast prerogatives, my Gallus, are
Accruing to the mighty man of war!
For, if into a lucky camp I light,
Though raw in arms, and yet afraid to fight,
Befriend me, my good stars, and all goes right:
One happy hour is to a soldier better,
Than mother Juno's recommending letter,
Or Venus, when to Mars she would prefer
My suit, and own the kindness done to her.

See what our common privileges are:
As, first, no saucy citizen should dare
To strike a soldier, nor, when struck, resent
The wrong, for fear of farther punishment:
Not though his teeth are beaten out, his eyes
Hang by a string, in bumps his forehead rise,
Shall he presume to mention his disgrace,
Or beg amends for his demolish'd face.
A bootied judge shall sit to try his cause,
Not by the statute, but by martial laws;
Which old Camillus order'd, to confine
The brawls of soldiers to the trench and line:
A wise provision; and from thence 'tis clear,
That officers a soldier's cause should hear:
And, taking cognizance of wrongs receiv'd,
An honest man may hope to be reliev'd.
So far 'tis well: but with a general cry,
The regiment will rise in mutiny,
The freedom of their fellow-rogue demand,
And, if refus'd, will threaten to disband.
Withdraw thy action, and depart in peace;
The remedy is worse than the disease:
This cause is worthy him, who in the hall
Would for his fee, and for his client, bawl:
But wouldst thou, friend, who hast two legs alone,
(Which Heaven be prais'd, thou yet may'st call thy own)

Would'st thou, to run the gauntlet, these expose
To a whole company of hob-nail'd shoes?
Sure the good-breeding of wise citizens
Should teach them more good-nature to their shins.
Besides, whom can'st thou think so much thy friend,

Who dares appear thy business to defend?
Dry up thy tears, and pocket up th' abuse,
Nor put thy friend to make a bad excuse.
The judge cries out, "Your evidence produce."
Will he, who saw the soldier's mutton-fist,
And saw thee maul'd, appear within the list,
To witness truth? When I see one so brave,
The dead, think I, are risen from the grave;
And with their long spade beards, and matted hair,
Our honest ancestors are come to take the air.
Against a clown, with more security,
A witness may be brought to swear a lie,
Than, though his evidence be full and fair,
To vouch a truth against a man of war.

More benefits remain, and claim'd as rights,
Which are a standing army's perquisites.
If any rogue vexatious suits advance
Against me for my known inheritance,
Enter by violence my fruitful grounds,
Or take the sacred land-mark from my bounds,
Those bounds, which with possession and with prayer,
And offer'd cakes, have been my annual care:

Or if my debtors do not keep their day,
Deny their hands, and then refuse to pay;
I must, with patience, all the terms attend,
Among the common causes that depend,
Till mine is call'd; and that long look'd-for day
Is still encumber'd with some new delay:
Perhaps the cloth of state is only spread,
Some of the quorum may be sick a-bed;
That judge is hot, and doffs his gown, while this
O'er night was bowsey, and goes out to piss:
So many rubs appear, the time is gone
For hearing, and the tedious suit goes on:
But buff and belt-men never know these cares,
No time, nor trick of law their action bars:
Their cause they to an easier issue put:
They will be heard, or they lug out, and cut.

Another branch of their revenue still Remains, beyond their boundless right to kill,
Their father yet alive, empower'd to take a will.
For, what their prowess gain'd, the law declares
Is to themselves alone, and to their heirs:
No share of that goes back to the begetter,
But if the son fights well, and plunders better,
Like stout Coranus, his old shaking sire
Does a remembrance in his will desire:
Inquisitive of fights, and longs in vain
To find him in the number of the slain:
But still he lives, and, rising by the war,
Enjoys his gains, and has enough to spare:
For 'tis a noble general's prudent part
To cherish valour, and reward desert:
Let him be daub'd with lace, live high, and whore;
Sometimes be lousy, but be never poor.

TRANSLATIONS FROM PERSIUS.

THE FIRST SATIRE OF

PERSIUS.

ARGUMENT OF THE PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE.

THE design of the author was to conceal his name and quality: He lived in the dangerous times of the tyrant Nero; and aims particularly at him in most of his satires. For which reason, though he was a Roman knight, and of a plentiful fortune, he would appear in this prologue but a beggerly poet, who writes for bread. After this, he breaks into the business of the first satire; which is chiefly to decry the poetry then in fashion, and the impudence of those who were endeavouring to pass their stuff upon the world.

PROLOGUE TO THE FIRST SATIRE.

I NEVER did on cleft Parnassus dream,
Nor taste the sacred Heliconian stream;
Nor can remember when my brain inspir'd,
Was, by the Muses, into madness fir'd.
My share in pale Pyrene I resign;
And claim no part in all the mighty Nine.
Statues, with winding ivy crown'd, belong
To nobler poets, for a nobler song:

Headless of verse, and hopeless of the crown,
 Scarce half a wit, and more than half a clown,
 Before the shrine I lay my rugged numbers down.
 Who taught the parrot human notes to try
 Or with a voice endued the chattering pye?
 'Twas witty want, fierce hunger to appease:
 Want taught their masters, and their masters these.
 Let gain, that gilded bait, be hung on high,
 The hungry wilinga have it in their eye:
 Pycs, crows, and daws, poetic presents bring:
 You say they squeak; but they will swear they sing.

ARGUMENT OF THE FIRST SATIRE.

I NEED not repeat, that the chief aim of the author is against bad poets in this satire. But I must add, that he includes also bad orators, who began at that time (as Petronius in the beginning of his book tells us) to enervate manly eloquence, by tropes and figures, ill-placed and worse applied. Amongst the poets, Persius covertly strikes at Nero; some of whose verses he recites with scorn and indignation. He also takes notice of the noblemen and their abominable poetry, who, in the luxury of their fortunes, set up for wits and judges. The satire is in dialogue, betwixt the author and his friend or monitor; who dissuades him from this dangerous attempt of exposing great men. But Persius, who is of a free spirit, and has not forgotten that Rome was once a commonwealth, breaks through all those difficulties, and boldly arraigns the false judgment of the age in which he lives. The reader may observe that our poet was a stoic philosopher; and that all his moral sentences, both here and in all the rest of his satires, are drawn from the dogmas of that sect.

THE FIRST SATIRE.

IN DIALOGUE BETWIXT THE POET AND HIS FRIEND OR MONITOR.

PERSIUS.

How anxious are our cares, and yet how vain
 The bent of our desires!

FRIEND. Thy spleen contain:
 For none will read thy satires.

PERSIUS. This to me?

FRIEND. None; or what's next to none, but two or three.

'Tis hard, I grant.

PERSIUS. 'Tis nothing; I can bear.
 That paltry scribblers have the public ear:
 That this vast universal fool, the town,
 Should cry up Labo's stuff, and cry me down.
 They damn themselves; nor will my Muse descend
 To clap with such, who fools and knaves commend:

Their smiles and censures are to me the same:
 I care not what they praise, or what they blame.
 In full assemblies let the crowd prevail:
 I weigh no merit by the common scale.
 The conscience is the test of every mind;
 "Seek not thyself, without thyself, to find."

But where's that Roman?—Somewhat I would say,
 But fear: let fear, for once, to truth give way.
 Truth leads the Stoic courage: when I look
 On human acts, and read in Nature's book,
 From the first pastimes of our infant-age,
 To elder cares, and man's severer page;
 When stern as tutors, and as snakes hard,
 We lash the pupil, and defraud the ward:
 Then, then I say,—or would say, if I durst—
 But thus provok'd, I must speak out, or burst.
 FRIEND. Once more forbear.

PERSIUS. I cannot rule my spleen:
 My scorn rebels, and tickles me within.

First, to begin at home: our authors write
 In lonely rooms, secur'd from public sight;
 Whether in prose, or verse, 'tis all the same:
 The prose is fustian, and the numbers lame.
 All noise, and empty pomp, a storm of words,
 Labouring with sound, that little sense affords.
 They comb, and then they order every hair:
 A gown, or white, or scour'd to whiteness, wear:
 A birth-day jewel bobbing at their ear.
 Next, gargle well their throats, and thus prepar'd,
 They mount, a God's name, to be seen and heard.
 From their high scaffold, with a trumpet cheer,
 And ogling all their audience ere they speak.
 The nameous nobles, ev'n the chief of Rome,
 With gaping mouths to these rehearsals come,
 And pant with pleasure, when some lusty line
 The marrow pierces, and invades the chine.
 At open fulsome bawdry they rejoice,
 And slimy jest applaud with broken voice.
 Base prostitute, thus dost thou gain thy bread?
 Thus dost thou feed their ears, and thus art fed!
 At his own stilly staff he grins and brays:
 And gives the sign where he expects their praise.

Why have I learn'd say't thou, if, thus coust'd,

I choke the noble vigour of my mind?
 Know, say wild fig-tree, which in rocks is bred,
 Will split the quarry, and shoot out the head.
 Fine fruits of learning! old ambitious fool,
 Dar'st thou apply that adage of the school:
 As if 'tis nothing worth that lies conceal'd,
 And "silence is not science till reveal'd?"
 Oh, but 'tis brave to be admir'd, to see
 The crowd, with pointing fingers, cry, That's he!
 That's he whose wondrous poem is become
 A lecture for the noble youth of Rome!
 Who, by their fathers, is at feasts renown'd;
 And often quoted when the bowl goes round.
 Full gorg'd and flush'd, they wantonly rehearse;
 And add to wine the luxury of verse.
 One, clad in purple, not to lose his time,
 Eats, and recites some lamentable rhyme:
 Some senseless Phillis, in a broken note,
 Snuffing at nose, and croaking in his throat:
 Then graciously the mellow audience nod:
 Is not th' immortal author made a god?
 Are not his manes blest, such praise to have?
 Lies not the turf more lightly on his grave?
 And roses (while his loud applause they sing)
 Stand ready from his sepulchre to spring?
 All these, you cry, but light objections are;
 Mere malice, and you drive the jest too far.
 For does there breathe a man, who can reject
 A general fame, and his own lines neglect?
 In cedar tablets worthy to appear,
 That need not fish, of frankincense, to fear?
 Thou, whom I made the adverse part, to bear,

Be answer'd thus: If I by chance succeed
 In what I write, (and that's a chance indeed)
 Know, I am not so stupid, or so hard,
 Not to feel praise, or fame's deserv'd reward:
 But this I cannot grant, that thy applause
 Is my work's ultimate, or only cause.
 Prudence can ne'er propose so mean a prize;
 For mark what vanity within it lies.
 Like Labeo's Iliads, in whose verse is found
 Nothing but trifling care, and empty sound:
 Such little elegies as nobles write,
 Who would be poets, in Apollo's spite.
 Them and their woeful works the Muse defies:
 Products of citron-beds, and golden canopies.
 To give thee all thy due, thou hast the heart
 To make a suppes, with a fine dessert: [i.e. part.
 And to thy thread-bare friend, a cast old suit
 Thus brib'd, thou thus bespeak'st him, "Tell me friend,

(For I love truth, nor can plain speech offend,
 What says the world of me and of my Muse?)

The poor dare nothing tell but flattering news:
 But shall I speak? Thy verse is wretched rhymes;

And all thy labours are but loss of time.
 Thy strutting belly swells, thy paunch is high;
 Thou writ'st not, but thou piss'est poetry,
 All authors to their own defects are blind;
 Hadst thou but, Janus like, a face behind,
 To see the people, what splay-mouths they make;
 To mark their fingers, pointed at thy back:
 Their tongues lol'd out, a foot beyond the pitch,
 When most a-thirst of an Apolian bitch:
 But noble scribblers are with flattery fed;
 For none dare find their faults, who eat their bread.

To pass the poets of patrician blood,
 What is 't the common reader takes for good?
 The verse in fashion is, when numbers flow,
 Soft without sense, and without spirit slow:
 So smooth and equal, that no sight can find
 The rivet, where the polish'd piece was join'd.
 So even all, with such a steady view,
 As if he shut one eye to level true.

Whether the vulgar vice his satire stings,
 The people's riots, or the rage of kings,
 The gentle poet is alike in all;
 His reader hopes to rise, and fears no fall.

RIEND. Hourly we see, some raw pin-feather'd thing

Attempt to mount, and fights and heroes sing;
 Who, for false quantities, was whipt at school
 But t' other day, and breaking grammar-rule,
 Whose trivial art was never try'd above
 The brave description of a native grove:
 Who knows not how to praise the country-store,
 The feasts, the baskets, nor the fatt'd boar:
 Nor paint the flowery fields that painted themselves
 before.

Where Romulus was bred, and Quintius born,
 Whose shining ploughshare was in furrows worn,
 Met by his trembling wife, returning home,
 And rustically joy'd, as chief of Rome:
 She wip'd the sweat from the dictator's brow;
 And o'er his back his robe did rudely throw;
 The victors bore in state their lord's triumphant plough.

Some love to hear the fustian poet roar;
 And some on antiquated authors pore:
 Rammage for sense; and think those only good
 Who labour most, and least are understood.

When thou shalt see the blear-ey'd fathoms teach
 Their sons, this harsh and mouldy sort of speech;
 Or others, new affected ways to try,
 Of wanton smoothness, female poetry;
 One would inquire from whence this motley style
 Did first our Roman purity defile:
 For our old dotards cannot keep their seat;
 But leap and catch at all that's obsolete.

Others, by foolish ostentation led,
 When call'd before the bar, to save their head,
 Bring trifling tropes, instead of solid sense:
 And mind their figures more than their defence.
 Are pleas'd to hear their thick-skull'd judges cry,
 Well mov'd, oh finely said, and decently:
 "Theft!" (says th' accuser) "to thy charge I lay,
 O Pædus;" what does gentle Pædus say?
 Studious to please the genius of the times, [crimes:
 With periods, points, and tropes, he alurs his
 "He robb'd not, but he borrow'd from the poor;
 And took but with intention to restore."

He jards with flourishes his long harangue;
 'Tis fine, say'st thou; what, to be prais'd, and Effeminate Roman, shall such stuff prevail [hang?
 To tickle thee, and make thee wag thy tail?
 Say, should a shipwreck'd sailor sing his woe,
 Wouldst thou be mov'd to pity, or bestow
 An alms? What's more preposterous than to see
 A merry beggar? Mirth in misery?

PERSIUS. He seems a trap, for charity, to lay:
 And cons, by night, his lesson for the day.

RIEND. But to raw numbers, and unfinished
 verse,

Sweet sound is added now, to make it terse:
 "Tis tagg'd with rhyme, like Berecynthian Atye,
 The mid-part chimes with art, which never flat is.
 The dolphin brave, that cuts the liquid wave,
 Or he who in his line can chine the long-ribb'd
 PERSIUS. All this is doggrel stuff. [Apennine."
 FRIEND. What if I bring

A nobler verse? "Arms and the man I sing."
 PERSIUS. Why name you Virgil with such fops as these?

He's truly great, and must for ever please:
 Nor fierce, but awful, in his manly page;
 Bold in his strength, but sober in his rage.

RIEND. What poems think you soft? and to be
 With languishing regards, and bended head? [read PERSIUS. "Their crooked horns the Mimmallonian crew

With blasts inspir'd; and Barmis who slew
 The scornful calf, with sword advanc'd on high,
 Made from his neck his haughty head to fly.
 And Mænas, when, with ivy bridles bound,
 She led the spotted lynx, then Evion rung around,
 Evion from woods and floods repairing echoes
 sound."

Could such rude lines a Roman mouth become,
 Were any manly greatness left in Rome?
 Mænas and Atye in the mouth were bred;
 And never hatch'd within the labouring head:
 No blood from bitten nails those poems drew:
 But churn'd, like spittle, from the lips they flew.

RIEND. 'Tis fustian all; 'tis execrably bad:
 But if they will be fools, must you be mad?
 Your satires, let me tell you, are too fierce;
 The great will never bear so blunt a verse.
 Their doors are barr'd against a bitter stout:
 Snarl, if you please, but you shall snarl without.
 Expect such pay as railing rhymes deserve,
 Y' are in a very hopeful way to starve.

PERSIUS. Rather than so, uncensur'd let them be;
 All, all is admirably well, for me.
 My harmless rhyme shall 'scape the dire disgrace
 Of common-shores, and every pissing-place.
 Two painted serpents shall, on high, appear;
 'Tis holy ground; you must not urinate here.
 This shall be writ to fright the fry away,
 Who draw their little baubles, when they play.
 Yet old Lucilius never fear'd the times,
 But lash'd the city, and dissected crimes.
 Mutius and Lupus both by name he brought;
 He mouth'd them, and betwixt his grinders caught.
 Unlike in method, with conceal'd design,
 Did crafty Horace his low numbers join:
 And, with a sly insinuating grace,
 Laugh'd at his friend, and look'd him in the face.
 Would raise a blush, where secret vice he found;
 And tickle, while he gently prob'd the wound.
 With seeming innocence the crowd beguil'd;
 But taught the desperate passes when he smil'd.

Could he do this, and is my Muse control'd
 By servile awe? Born free, and not be bold?
 At least, I'll dig a hole within the ground;
 And to the trusty earth commit the sound:
 The reeds shall tell you what the poet fears,
 " King Midas has a snout, and asses' ears."
 This mean conceit, this darling mystery,
 Which thou think'st nothing, friend, thou shalt
 Nor will I change for all the flashy wit, [not buy.
 That flattering Labeo, in his Iliads, writ
 Thou, if there be a thou in this base town
 Who dares, with angry Eupolis, to frown;
 He, who, with bold Cratinus, is inspir'd
 With zeal, and equal indignation fir'd:
 Who, at enormous villainy, turns pale,
 And steers against it with a full blown sail,
 Like Aristophanes, let him but smile
 On this my honest work, though writ in homely
 And if two lines or three in all the vein [style:
 Appear less drossy, read those lines again.
 May they perform their author's just intent,
 Glow in thy ears, and in thy breast ferment.
 But from the reading of my book and me,
 Be far, ye foes of virtuous poverty:
 Who fortune's fault upon the poor can throw;
 Point at the tatter'd coat, and ragged shoe:
 Lay Nature's failings to their charge, and jeer
 The dim weak eye-sight, when the mind is clear,
 When thou thyself, thus insolent in state,
 Art but, perhaps, some country magistrate:
 Whose power extends no farther than to speak
 Big on the bench, and scanty weights to break.

Him, also, for my censor I disdain,
 Who thinks all science, as all virtue, vain;
 Who counts geometry, and num-b'rs, toys;
 And, with his foot, the sacred dust destroys:
 Whose pleasure is to see a strumpet tear
 A Cynic's beard, and lug him by the hair.
 Such, all the morning, to the pleadings run;
 But when the business of the day is done,
 On dice, and drink, and drabs, they spend their afternoon.

THE SECOND SATIRE OF
 PERSIUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS satire contains a most grave and philosophical argument, concerning prayers and wishes.

Undoubtedly it gave occasion to Jovian's last satire; and both of them had their origin from one of Plato's dialogues, called the Second Alcibiades. Our author has infused it with great mystery of art, by taking his text from the birth-day of his friend; on which occasions, prayers were made, and sacrifices offer'd by the native. Persius, commencing the parity of his friend's vows, descends to the impious and immoral requests of others. The satire is divided into three parts: the first is an exordium to Macrinus, which the poet contains within the compass of four verses. The second relates to the matter of the prayers and wishes, and enumeration of those things, whereof men commonly sinned against right reason, and offended in their requests. The third part consists in showing the repugnancies of the prayers and wishes, to those of other men, and inconsistencies with themselves. He shows the original of these vows, and sharply inveighs against them: and lastly, not only corrects the false opinion of mankind concerning them, but gives the true doctrine of all addresses made to Heaven, and how they may be made acceptable to the powers above, in excellent precepts, and more worthy of a Christian than a Heathen.

THE SECOND SATIRE.

DEDICATED TO HIS FRIEND PLOTIUS MACRINUS, ON HIS BIRTH-DAY.

LET this auspicious morning be express
 With a white stone, distinguish'd from the rest:
 White as thy fame, and as thy honour clear;
 And let new joys attend on thy new added year.
 Indulge thy genius, and o'erflow thy soul,
 Till thy wit sparkle, like the cheerful bowl.
 Pray; for thy prayers the test of Heaven will bear;
 Nor need'st thou take the gods aside, to hear:
 While others, ev'n the mighty men of Rome,
 Big swell'd with mischief, to the temples come;
 And in low murmurs, and with costly smoke,
 Heaven's help, to prosper their black vows, invoke.
 So boldly to the gods mankind reveal
 What from each other they, for shame, conceal.
 " Give me good fame, ye powers, and make me just:"

Thus much the rogue to public ears will trust:
 In private then:—" When wilt thou, mighty Jove
 My wealthy uncle from this world remove?"
 Or—" O thou thunderer's son, great Hercules,
 That once thy bounteous deity would please
 To guide my rake upon the chinking sound
 Of some vast treasure, hidden under ground!"
 " O were my pupil fairly knock'd o' th' head;
 I should possess th' estate, if he were dead!
 He's so far gone with rickets, and with th' evil,
 That one small dose will send him to the devil."
 " This is my neighbour Nerius's third spouse,
 Of whom in happy time he rids his house.
 But my eternal wife!—Grant, Heaven, I may Survive to see the fellow of this day!"
 Thus, that thou may'st the better bring about
 Thy wishes, thou art wickedly devout:
 In Tyber ducking thrice, by break of day,
 To wash th' obscenities of night away.
 But, pry'thee, tell me, ('tis a small request)
 With what ill thoughts of Jove art thou possess'd?

Would'st thou prefer him to some man? Suppose
 I dipp'd among the worst, and Statius chose?
 Which of the two would thy wise head declare
 The trustier tutor to an orphan heir?
 Or, put it thus:—Unfold to Statius, straight,
 What to Jove's ear thou didst impart of late:
 He'll stare, and, "O good Jupiter!" will cry;
 "Canst thou indulge him in this villainy!"
 And think'st thou, Jove himself, with patience then
 Can hear a prayer condemn'd by wicked men?
 That, void of care, he lolls supine in state,
 And leaves his business to be done by fate?
 Because his thunder splits some burley-tree,
 And is not darted at thy house and thee?
 Or that his vengeance falls not at the time,
 Just at the perpetration of thy crime,
 And makes thee a sad object of our eyes,
 Fit for Ergenna's prayer and sacrifice?
 What well-fed offering to appease the god,
 What powerful present to procure a nod,
 Hast thou in store? What bribe has thou prepar'd,
 To pull him, thus unpunish'd, by the beard?
 Our superstitious with our life begin:
 Th' obscene old grandam, or the next of kin,
 The new-born infant from the cradle takes,
 And first of spittle a lustration makes:
 Then in the spawl her middle-finger dips,
 Anoints the temples, forehead, and the lips,
 Pretending force of magic to prevent,
 By virtue of her nasty excrement.
 Then dandles him, with many a mutter'd prayer
 That Heaven would make him some rich miser's
 Lucky to ladies, and in time a king; [heir,
 Which to ensure, she adds a length of navel-string.
 But no fond nurse is fit to make a prayer:
 And Jove, if Jove be wise, will never hear;
 Not though she prays in white, with lifted hands:
 A body made of brass the crone demands
 For her lov'd nursing, strung with nerves of wire,
 Tough to the last, and with no toil to tire:
 Unconscionable vows, which, when we use,
 We teach the gods, in reason, to refuse.
 Suppose they were indulgent to thy wish:
 Yet the fat entrails, in the spacious dish,
 Would stop the grant: the very over-care,
 And nauseous pomp, would hinder half the prayer.
 Thou hop'st, with sacrifice of oxen slain,
 To compass wealth, and bribe the god of gain,
 To give thee flocks and herds, with large increase;
 Fool! to expect them from a bullock's grease!
 And think'st that, when the fatteu'd flames aspire,
 Thou seat th' accomplishment of thy desire!
 "Now, now, my bearded harvest gilds the plain,
 The scanty folds can scarce my sheep contain,
 And showers of gold come pouring in amain!"
 Thus dreams the wretch, and vainly thus dreams on,
 Till his lank purse declares his money gone.
 Should I present them with rare figur'd plate,
 Or gold as rich in workmanship as weight;
 O how thy rising heart would throb and beat,
 And thy left side, with trembling pleasure, sweat!
 Thou measur'st by thyself the powers divine;
 Thy gods are burnish'd gold, and silver is their shrine.
 Thy puny godlings of inferior race,
 Whose humble statues are content with brass,
 Should some of these, in visions purg'd from phlegm,
 Foretell events, or in a morning dream;
 Ev'n those thou would'st in veneration hold;
 And, if not faces, give them beards of gold.

The priests in temples, now, no longer care
 For Saturn's brass, or Numa's earthen ware;
 Or vestal urns, in each religious rite:
 This wicked gold has put them all to flight.
 O souls, in whom no heavenly fire is found,
 Fat minds, and ever groveling on the ground!
 We bring our manners to the blest abodes,
 And think what pleases us must please the gods.
 Of oil and cassia one th' ingredients takes,
 And, of the mixture, a rich ointment makes:
 Another finds the way to dye in grain;
 And makes Calabrian wool receive the Tyrian stain;
 Or from the shells their orient treasure takes,
 Or, for their golden ore, in rivers rakes;
 Then melts the mass: all these are vanities!
 Yet still some profit from their pains may rise:
 But tell me, priest, if I may be so bold,
 What are the gods the better for this gold?
 The wretch that offers from his wealthy store
 These presents, bribes the powers to give him more:
 As maids to Venus offer baby-toys,
 To bless the marriage-bed with girls and boys.
 But let us for the gods a gift prepare,
 Which the great man's great charges cannot bear:
 A soul, where laws both human and divine,
 In practice more than speculation shine:
 A genuine virtue, of a vigorous kind,
 Pure in the last recesses of the mind:
 When with such offerings to the gods I come,
 A cake, thus given, is worth a hecatomb.

THE THIRD SATIRE OF
PERSIUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

OUR author has made two satires concerning study; the first and the third: the first related to men; this to young students, whom he desired to be educated in the stoic philosophy: he himself sustains the person of the master, or preceptor, in this admirable satire; where he upbraids the youth of sloth, and negligence in learning. Yet he begins with one scholar reproaching his fellow-students with late rising to their books. After which he takes upon him the other part of the teacher. And addressing himself particularly to young noblemen, tells them, that by reason of their high birth, and the great possessions of their fathers, they are careless of adorning their minds with precepts of moral philosophy: and withal, inculcates to them the miseries which will attend them in the whole course of their life, if they do not apply themselves betimes to the knowledge of virtue, and the end of their creation, which he pathetically inuatiates to them. The title of this satire, in some ancient manuscript, was the Reproach of Idleness; though in others of the scholiast it is inscribed, Against the Luxury and Vices of the Rich. In both of which the intention of the poet is pursued; but principally in the former.

[I remember I translated this satire, when I was a king's scholar at Westminster-school, for a Thursday-night's exercise; and believe that it, and many other of my exercises of this nature, in English verse, are still in the hands of my learned master, the reverend doctor Busby.]

"Is this thy daily course? The glaring Sun
Breaks in at every chink: the cattle run
To shades, and noon-tide rays of summer eunt,
Yet plung'd in sloth we lie; and more supine,
As fill'd with fumes of indigested wine."

This grave advice some soter student bears;
And Jauidy rings it in his fellow's ears.
The yawning youth, scarce half awake, surveys
His lazy limbs and drowsy head to raise:
Then rubs his gemmy eyes, and scrubs his pate;
And cries, "I thought it had not been so late:
My clothes, make haste!" Why this, if none be near,

He mutters first, and then begins to swear:
And brays aloud, with a more clamorous note,
Than an Arcadian ass can stretch his throat.

With much ado, his book before him laid,
And parchment with the smoother side display'd;
He takes the papers; lays them down again;
And, with unwilling fingers, tries the pen:
Some peevish quarrel straight he strives to pick;
His quill writes double, or his ink's too thick;
Infuse more water; now 'tis grown to thin
- It sinks, nor can the characters be seen.

O wretch, and still more wretched every day!
Are mortals born to sleep their lives away?
Go back to what thy infancy began,
Thou, who wert never meant to be a man:
Fat pap and sponon-meat; for thy gewgaws cry:
Be sullen, and refuse the lullaby.
No more accuse thy pen: but charge the crime
On native sloth, and negligence of time.
Think'st thou thy master, or thy friends, to cheat?
Fool, 'tis thyself, and that's a worse deceit.
Beware the public laughter of the town;
Thou spring'st a leak already in thy crown.
A flaw is in thy ill-bak'd vessel found;
'Tis hollow, and returns a jarring sound.

Yet, thy moist clay is pliant to command;
Unwrought, and easy to the potter's hand:
Now take the mould; now bend thy mind to feel
The first sharp motions of the forming wheel.

But thou hast land; a country-seat, secure
By a just title; costly-furniture;
A fuming-pan thy Lares to appease:
What need of learning, when a man's at ease?
If this be not enough to swell thy soul,
Then please thy pride, and search the herald's roll,
Where thou shalt find thy famous pedigree,
Drawn from the root of some old Toscan tree;
And thou, a thousand off, a fool of long degree.
Who, clad in purple, canst thy censor greet;
And, loudly, call him cousin, in the street.

Such pageantry be to the people shown:
Their disease thy horse's trappings, and thy own:
I know thee to thy bottom; from within
Thy shallow centre, to the utmost skin:
Dost thou not blush to live so like a beast,
So trim, so dissolute, so loosely drest?

But 'tis in vain: the wretch is drench'd too deep;
His soul is stupid, and his heart asleep;
Fatten'd in vice; so callous, and so gross,
He sins, and sees not; senseless of his loss.
Down goes the wretch at once, unskill'd to swim,
Mopeless to bubble up, and reach the water's brim.

Great father of the gods, what, for our sakes,
Thou send'st some heavy judgment on the man;
Some tyrant-king, the scourge of his age,
The type and true vinegerout of thy rage;
Thus punish him: set Virtue in his sight,
With all her charms adorn'd, with all her grace
bright:

But set her distant, make him pale to see
His gains outweigh'd by lost felicity!

Sicilian tortures, and the brazen bull,
Are emblems, rather than express the full
Of what he feels: yet what he feels is more:
The wretch, who, sitting at his plebeian board,
Look'd up, and view'd on high the pointed sun
Hang o'er his head, and hanging by a twine,
Did with less dread, and more securely dine:
Ev'n in his sleep he starts, and fumes the knif.
And, trembling, in his arms takes his accomplice wife;

Down, down he goes; and from his darting friend
Conceals the woes his guilty dreams portend.

When I was young, I, like a lazy fool,
Would bear my eyes with oil, to stay from school
Averse from pains, and loath to learn the part
Of Cato, dying with a dauntless heart:
Though much my master that stern virtue priz'd
Which o'er the vanquisher the vanquish'd rais'd:
And my pleas'd father came, with pride, to see
His boy defend the Roman liberty.

But then my study was to cog the dice,
And dextrously to throw the lucky dice:
To shun ames-ace, that swept my stakes away;
And watch the box, for fear they should convey False bones, and put upon me in the play.
Careful, besides, the whirling top to whip,
And drive her giddy, till she fell asleep.

Thy years are ripe, nor art thou yet to learn
What's good or ill, and both their ends discern:
Thou in the staid porch, severly bred,
Hast heard the dogmas of great Zeno read:
There on the walls, by Polygnotus' hand,
The conquer'd Medians in trunk-breeches stand.
Where the stern youth to midnight lectures rise,
Rous'd from their slumbers to be early wise:
Where the coarse cake, and homely husks of beans,
From pampering riot the young stomach weans:
And where the Samian Y directs thy steps to run
To Virtue's narrow steep, and broad-way Vice to shun. [breath,

And yet thou snor'st; thou draw'st thy drunken
Sour with debauch; and sleep'st the sleep of death:
Thy chaps are fallen, and thy frame disjoint'd;
Thy body is dissolv'd, as is thy mind.

Hast thou not, yet, propos'd some certain end,
To which thy life, thy every act, may tend?
Hast thou no mark, at which to bend thy bow?
Or, like a boy, pursuest the carrion crow
With pellets, and with stones, from tree to tree:
A fruitless toil; and liv'st extempore?
Watch the disease in time: for, when within
The dropsy rages, and extends the skin,
In vain for hellebore the patient cries,
And flies the doctor; but too late is wise:
Too late, for cure, he proffers half his wealth;
Conquest and Guibbons cannot give him health.
Learn, wretches, learn the motions of the mind;
Why you were made, for what you were design'd;
And the great moral end of human kind,
Study thyself: what rank or what degree
The wise Creator has ordain'd for thee:

And all the offices of that estate
Perform; and with thy prudence guide thy fate.
Pray justly, to be heard: nor more desire
Than what the decrecious of life require.
Learn what thou ow'st thy country, and thy friend;
What's requisite to spare, and what to spend:
Learn this; and after, envy not the store
Of the greas'd advocate, that grinds the poor:
Fat fees from the defaced Umbrian draws;
And only gains the wealthy client's cause.
To whom the Marsians more provision send,
Then he and all his family can spend.
Gammons, that give a relish to the taste,
And potted fowl, and fish, come in so fast,
That, ere the first is out, the second stinks:
And mouldy mother-gathers on the drinks.
But, here, some captain of the land or fleet,
Stout of his hands, but of a soldier's wit;
Cries, "I have sense to serve my turn, in store;
And he's a rascal who pretends to more.
Dumme, whate'er those book-learn'd blockheads
Solon's the veryest fool in all the play. [say,
Top-heavy drones, and always looking down,
(As over-burdened within the crown!)]
Muttering betwixt their lips some mystic thing,
Which, well examin'd, is flat conjuring,
Moor madmen's dreams: for what the schools have
Is only this, that nothing can be brought [taught,
From nothing; and, what it, can ne'er be turn'd to
Is it this they study? to grow pale, [sought,
And miss the pleasures of a glorious meal?
For this, in rage accoster'd, are they seen,
And made the may-games of the public spleen?"

Proceed, my friend, and rail; but bear me tell
A story, which is just thy parallel.
A spark, like thee, of the man-killing trade,
Fell sick, and thus to his physician said:
"Methinks I am not right in every part;
I feel a kind of trembling at my heart:
My pulse unequal, and my breath is strong;
Besides a filthy fur upon my tongue."
The doctor heard him, exercis'd his skill:
And, after, bid him for four days be still.
Three days he took good counsel, and began
To mend, and look like a recovering man:
The fourth, he could not hold from drink; but sends
His boy to one of his old trusty friends:
Adjuring him, by all the powers divine,
To pity his distress, who could not dine
Without a flaggon of his healing wine.
He drinks a swelling draught; and, lie'd within,
Will supple in the bath his outward skin:
Whom should he find but his physician there,
Who, wisely, bade him once again beware.
"Sir, you look wan, you hardly draw your breath; Drinking is dangerous, and the bath is death."
"Tis nothing," says the fool. "But," says the friend,
"This nothing, sir, will bring you to your end.
Do I not see your droopy belly swell?
Your yellow skin?"—"No more of that; I'm well.
I have already bury'd two or three
That stood betwixt a fair estate and me,
And, doctor, I may live to bury thee.
Thou tell'st me, I look ill; and thou look'st worse."
"I've done," says the physician; "take your course."

The laughing sot, like all unthinking men,
Bathes and gets drunk; then bathes, and drinks
again:

His throat half throttled with convulsed phlegm,
And breathing through his jaws a belching steam:
Amidst his eups with fainting shivering sens'd,
His limbs disjointed, and all e'er diseas'd,
His hand refuses to sustain the bowl;
And his teeth chatter, and his eyeballs roll:
Till, with his meat, he vomits out his soul:
Then trumpets, torches, and a tedious crew
Of hireling mourners, for his funeral due.
Our dear departed brother lies in state,
His beads stretch'd out, and pointing to the gate:
And slaves, now manumit'd, on their dead master wait.

They hoist him on the bier, and deal the dole:
And there's an end of a luxurious soul.
But what's thy falcon's parable to me?
My body is from all diseases free:
My temperate pulse does regularly beat;
Fest, and be satisfy'd, my hands and feet:
These are not cold, nor these oppress with heat.
Or lay thy hand upon my naked heart.
And thou shalt find me hale in every part.

I grant this true: but, still, the deadly wound
Is in thy soul; 'tis there thou art not sound.
Say, when thou seest a heap of tempting gold,
Or a more tempting harlot dost behold;
Then, when she casts on thee a side-long glance,
Then try thy heart, and tell me if it dance.

Some coarse cold sallad is before thee set;
Bread with the bran, perhaps, and broken meat;
Fall on, and try thy appetite to eat.

These are not dishes for thy dainty tooth:
What, hast thou got an ulcer in thy mouth?
Why stand'st thou picking? Is thy palate sore?
That beet and radishes will make thee roar?
Such is th' unequal temper of thy mind;
Thy passions in extremes, and unconfin'd:
Thy hair so bristles with unmanly fears,
As fields of corn, that rise in bearded ears.
And, when thy cheeks with flushing fury glow,
The rage of boiling caldrons is more slow;
When fed with fuel and with flames below.
With foam upon thy lips and sparkling eyes,
Thou say'st, and dost, in such outrageous wise;
That mad Orestes, if he saw the show,
Would swear thou wert the madder of the two.

THE FOURTH SATIRE OF PERSIUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Our author, living in the time of Nero, was contemporary and friend to the noble poet Lucan: both of them were sufficiently sensible, with all good men, how unskilfully he managed the commonwealth: and perhaps might guess at his future tyranny, by some passages, during the latter part of his first five years; though he broke not out into his great excesses, while he was restrained by the counsels and authority of Seneca. Lucan has not spared him in the poem of his Pharsalia; for his very compliment looked asquint as well as Nero. Persius has been bolder, but with caution likewise. For here, in the person of young Alcibiades, he arraigns his ambition of meddling with state-affairs, without judgment or experience. It is probable that he makes Seneca, in this satire, sustain the part of Socrates, under a borrowed name; and, withal, discovers some secret vices of Nero, concerning his lust, his drunkenness, and his effeminacy, which had not yet arrived to public notice. He also reprehends the flattery of his courtiers, who endeavoured to make all his vices pass for virtues. Covetousness was undoubtedly none of his faults; but it is here described as a veil cast over the true meaning of the poet, which was to satirize his prodigality and voluptuousness; to which he makes a transition. I find no instance in history of that emperor's being a pathic, though Persius seems to brand him with it. From the two dialogues of Plato, both called Alcibiades, the poet took the arguments of the second and third satires, but he inverted the order of them: for the third satire is taken from the first of those dialogues.

The commentators, before Casanbon, were ignorant of our author's secret meaning; and thought he had only written against young noblemen in general, who were too forward in aspiring to public magistracy: but this excellent scholiast has unraveled the whole mystery; and made it apparent, that the sting of this satire was particularly aimed at Nero.

W^hor'rt thou art, whose forward years are bent
On state affairs, the guide to government;
Hear, first, what Socrates of old has said
To the lov'd youth, whom he at Athens heard.

Tell me, thou pupil to great Pericles,
Our second hope, my Alcibiades,
What are the grounds, from whence thou dost pre-
To undertake, so young, so vast a care? [pare
Perhaps thy wit (a chance not often heard,
That parts and prudence should prevent the beard):
'Tis seldom seen, that senators so young
Know when to speak, and when to hold their
Sure thou art born to some peculiar fate; [tongue.
When the mad people rise against the state,
To look them into duty: and command
An awful silence with thy lifted hand.
Then to bespeak them thus: "Athenians, know
Against right reason all your counsels go;
This is not fair; nor profitable that;
Nor t'other question proper for debate."
But thou, no doubt, can'st set the business right,
And give each argument its proper weight:
Know'st, with an equal hand, to hold the scale:
Seest where the reasons pinch, and where they fail,
And where exceptions o'er the general rule prevail,
And, taught by inspiration, in a trice,
Canst punish crimes, and brand offending vice.

Leave, leave to fathom such high points as these,
Nor be ambitious, ere the time to please.
Unseasonably wise, till age and cares
Have form'd thy soul, to manage great affairs.
Thy face, thy shape, thy outside, are but vain;
Thou hast not strength such labours to sustain;
Drink hellebore, my boy, drink deep, and purge thy brain.

What aim'st thou at, and whither tends thy care,
In what thy utmost good? Delicious fare;
And, then, to sun thyself in open air.

Hold, hold! are all thy empty wishes such?
A good old woman would have said as much.

But thou art nobly born, 'tis true; go boast
Thy pedigree, the thing thou valu'st most:
Besides, thou art a beau: what's that, my child?
A top well drest, extravagant, and wild:
She, that cries herbs, has less impertinence;
And, in her calling, more of common sense.

None, none descends into himself, to find
The secret imperfections of his mind:
But every one is eagle-ey'd, to see
Another's faults, and his deformity.
Say, dost thou know Vectidius? Who, the wretch
Whose lands beyond the Sabians largely stretch;
Cover the country, that a sailing kite
Can scarce o'erfly them, in a day and night;
Him dost thou mean, who, spite of all his store,
Is ever craving, and will still be poor?
Who cheats for halfpence, and who doffs his coat,
To save a farthing in a ferry-boat?
Ever a glutton at another's cost,
But in whose kitchen dwells perpetual frost?
Who eats and drinks with his domestic slaves;
A verier hind than any of his knives?
Born with the curse and anger of the gods,
And that indulgent genius he defrands?
At harvest-home, and on the shearing day,
When he should thanks to Pan and Pales pay,
And better Ceres; trembling to approach
The little barrel, which he fears to breach:
He, says the wimble, often draws it back,
And deals to thirsty servants but a smack.
To a short meal he makes a tedious grace,
Before the barley-pudding comes in place:
Then, bids fall on; himself, for saving charges,
A peel'd slic'd onion eats, and tipples verjuice.

Thus fares the drudge: but thou, whose life's a
Of lazy pleasures, tak'st a worse extreme. [dream
'Tis all thy business, business how to shun;
To bask thy naked body in the sun;
Suppling thy stiffen'd joints with fragrant oil;
Then, in the spacious garden, walk awhile,
To suck the moisture up, and soak it in:
And this, thou think'st, but vainly think'st, unseen.
But, know, thou art observ'd: and there are those
Who, if they durst, would all thy secret sins expose:
The depilation of thy modest part:
Thy catamite, the darling of thy heart,
His engine-hand, and every lewder art.
When, prone to bear, and patient to receive,
Thou tak'st the pleasure which thou canst not give.
With odorous oil thy head and hair are sleek;
And then thou kemb'st the tuzzes on thy cheek:
Of these thy barbers take a costly care,
While thy salt tail is overgrown with hair.
Not all thy pinners, nor unmanly arts,
Can smooth the roughness of thy shameful parts.
Not five, the strongest that the Circus breeds,
From the rank soil can root those wicked weeds:
Though suppl'd first with soap, to ease thy pain,
The stubborn fern springs up, and sprouts again.

Thus others we with defamations wound,
While they stab us; and so the jest goes round.
Vain are thy hopes, to 'scape censorious eyes;
Truth will appear through all the thin disguise:
Thou hast an ulcer which no leech can heal,
Though thy broad shoulder-belt the wound conceal.
Say thou art sound and hale in every part,
We know, we know thee rotten at thy heart,
We know thee sullen, impotent, and proud:
Nor canst thou cheat thy nerve, who cheat'st the crowd.

"But when they praise me, in the neighbourhood,
When the pleas'd people take me for a god,
Shall I refuse their incense? Not receive
The loud applauses which the vulgar give?"

If thou dost wealth, with longing eyes, behold;
And, greedily, art gaping after gold;
If some alluring girl, in gliding by,
Shall tip the wink, with a lascivious eye,
And thou, with a consenting glance, reply;
If thou thy own solicitor become,
And bidd'st arise the lumpish pendulum:
If thy lewd lust provokes an empty storm,
And prompts to more than nature can perform;
If, with thy guards, thou scour'st the streets by night,

And dost in murders, rapes, and spoils, delight;
Please not thyself, the flattering crowd to hear;
The fulsome stuff to feed thy itching ear.
Reject the nauseous praises of the times;
Give thy base poets back thy cobbled rhymes:
Survey thy soul, not what thou dost appear,
But what thou art; and find the beggar there.

THE FIFTH SATIRE OF PERSIUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE judicious Casaubon, in his poem to this satire, tells us, that Aristophanes the grammarian being asked, what poem of Archilochus's Jambics he preferred before the rest, answered, the longest. His answer may justly be applied to this fifth satire; which, being of a greater length than any of the rest, is also, by far, the most instructive: for this reason I have selected it from all the others, and inscribed it to my learned master, doctor Busby; to whom I am not only obliged myself for the best part of my own education, and that of my two sons; but have also received from him the first and truest taste of Persius. May be pleased to find in this translation, the gratitude, or at least some small acknowledgment of his unworthy scholar, at the distance of twenty-four years, from the time when I departed from under his tuition.

This satire consists of two distinct parts: the first contains the praises of the stoic philosopher Cornutus, master and tutor to our Persius. It also declares the love and piety of Persius, to his well-deserving master; and the mutual friendship which continued betwixt them, after Persius was now grown a man. As also his exhortation to young noblemen, that they would enter themselves into his institution. From whence he makes an artful transition into the second part of his subject: wherein he first complains of the sloth of scholars, and afterwards persuades them to the pursuit of their true liberty: Here our author excellently treats that paradox of the Stoics, which affirms, that only the wise or virtuous man is free; and that all vicious men are naturally slaves. And, in the illustration of this dogma, he takes up the remaining part of this inimitable satire.

THE FIFTH SATIRE.

INSCRIBED TO THE REVEREND DR. BUSBY.

THE SPEAKERS PERSIUS AND CORNUTUS.

PERSIUS.

Of ancient use to poets it belongs, [tongues
To wish themselves an hundred mouths and
Whether to the well-lung'd tragedian's rage
They recommend the labours of the stage,
Or sing the Parthian, when transfix'd he lies,
Wrenching the Roman javelin from his thighs.

CORNUTUS.

And why would'st thou these mighty morsels
choose,
Of words unchew'd, and fit to choke the Muse?
Let fustian poets, with their stuff, be gone,
And suck the mists that hang o'er Helicon;
When Frogne or Thyestes' feast they write;
And, for the mouthing actor, verse indite.
Thou neither, like a bellows, swell'st thy face,
As if thou wert to blow the burning mass
Of melting ore; nor canst thou strain thy throat,
Or murmur in an undistinguish'd note,
Like rolling thunder till it breaks the cloud,
And rattling nonsense is discharg'd aloud.
Soft elocution does thy style renown,
And the sweet accents of the peaceful gown:
Gentle or sharp, according to thy choice,
To laugh at follies, or to lash at vice.
Hence draw thy theme, and to the stage permit
Raw-head and bloody-bones, and hands and feet,
Ragouts for Tereus or Thyestes dress;
'Tis task enough for thee t' expose a Roman feast.

PERSIUS.

'Tis not, indeed, my talent to engage
In lofty trifles, or to swell my page
With wind and noise; but freely to impart,
As to a friend, the secrets of my heart,
And, in familiar speech, to let thee know
How much I love thee, and how much I owe.
Knock on my heart: for thou hast skill to find
If it sound solid, or be fill'd with wind;
And, through the veil of words, thou view'st the
For this a hundred voices I desire, [naked mind.
To tell thee what a hundred tongues would tire;
Yet never could be worthily express,
How deeply thou art seated in my breast.
When first my childish robe resign'd the charge,
And left me, unconfin'd, to live at large;
When now my golden bulla (hung on high
To household gods) declar'd me past a boy;
And my white shield proclaim'd my liberty:
When, with my wild companions, I could roll
From street to street, and sin without control;
Just at that age, when manhood set me free,
I then depos'd myself, and left the reins to thee,
On thy wise bosom I repos'd my head,
And by my better Socrates was bred.
Then thy straight rule set virtue in my sight,
The crooked line reforming by the right.
My reason took the beat of thy command,
Was form'd and polish'd by thy skillful hand:
Long summer-days thy precepts I rehearse;
And winter-nights were short in our converse:
One was our labour, one was our repose,
One frugal supper did our studies close.

Sure on our birth some friendly planet shone;
 And, as our souls, our horoscope was one:
 Whether the mounting Twins did Heaven adorn,
 Or with the rising Scales we were born;
 Both have the same impressions from above;
 And both have Saturn's rage, repell'd by Jove.
 What star I know not, but some star I find,
 Has given thee an ascendant o'er my mind.

CORNUTUS.

Nature is ever various in her frame:
 Each has a different will; and few the same:
 The greedy merchants, led by lucre, run
 To the paroh'd Indies, and the rising Sun;
 From thence hot pepper and rich drugs they bear,
 Bartering, for spices, their Italian ware;
 The lazy glutton safe at home will keep,
 Indulge his sloth, and batten with his sleep:
 One bribes for high preferments in the state;
 A second shakes the box, and sits up late:
 Another shakes the bed, dissolving there,
 Till knots upon his gouty joint appear,
 And chalk is in his crippled fingers found;
 Roots like a dodder'd oak, and piecemeal falls to
 ground;
 Then his lewd follies he would hate repent;
 And his past years, that in a mist were spent.

PERSIUS.

But thou art pale, in nightly studies, grown,
 To make the stoic institutes thy own:
 Thou long with studious care hast till'd our youth,
 And sown our well purg'd ears with wholesome truth.
 From thee both old and young, with profit, learn
 The bounds of good and evil to discern.

CORNUTUS.

Unhappy he who does this work adjourn,
 And to to-morrow would the search delay:
 His lazy morrow will be like to day.

PERSIUS.

But is one day of ease too much to borrow?

CORNUTUS.

Yes, sure: for yesterday was once to-morrow.
 That yesterday is gone, and nothing gain'd:
 And all thy fruitless days will thus be drain'd;
 For thou hast more to-morrows yet to ask,
 And wilt be ever to begin thy task;
 Who, like the hindmost chariot-wheels, art curst,
 Still to be near, but ne'er to reach the first.
 O freedom! first delight of human kind!
 Not that which bondmen from their masters find,
 The privilege of doles: not yet t' inscribe
 Their names in this or t' other Roman tribe:
 That false enfranchisement with ease is found:
 Slaves are made citizens, by turning round.
 "How," replies one, "can any be more free?
 Here's Dama, once a groom of low degree,
 Not worth a farthing, and a sot beside;
 So true a rogue, for lying's sake he ly'd;
 But, with a turn, a freeman he became;
 Now Marcus Dama is his worship's name.
 Good gods! who would refuse to lend a sum,
 If wealthy Marcus surety will become!
 Marcus is made a judge, and for a proof
 Of certain truth, he said, it is enough.
 A will is to be prov'd; put in your claim;
 'Tis clear, if Marcus has subscrib'd his name.

This is true liberty, as I believe:
 What can we farther from our caps receive,
 Than as we please without control to live?
 Not more to noble Brutus could belong."
 "Hold," says the Stoic, "your assumption's wrong:

I grant, true freedom you have well defin'd:
 But, living as you list, and to your mind,
 And loosely tack'd, all must be left behind.
 What, since the pretor did my fetters loose,
 And left me freely at my own dispose,
 May I not live without control and awe,
 Excepting still the letter of the law?"

Hear me with patience, while thy mind I free
 From those fond notions of false liberty:
 'Tis not the pretor's province to bestow
 True freedom; nor to teach mankind to know
 What to ourselves, or to our friends, we owe.
 He could not set thee free from cares and strife,
 Nor give the reins to a lewd vicious life:
 As well he for an ass a harp might string,
 Which is against the reason of the thing;
 For reason still is whispering in your ear,
 Where you are sure to fail, th' attempt forbear.
 No need of public sanctions this to bind,
 Which Nature has implanted in the mind:
 Not to pursue the work, to which we're not design'd.

Unskill'd in hellebore, if thou should'st try
 To mix it, and mistake the quantity,
 The rules of physic would against thee cry.
 The high-shoe'd ploughman, should he quit the
 To take the pilot's rudder in his hand, [land,
 Artless of stars, and of the moving sand,
 The gods would leave him to the waves and wind,
 And think all shame was lost in human kind.

Tell me, my friend, from whence hadst thou the
 So nicely to distinguish good from ill? [skill,
 Or by the sound to judge of gold and brass,
 What piece is tinker's metal, what will pass?
 And what thou art to follow, what to fly,
 This to condemn, and that to ratify?
 When to be beautiful, and when to spare,
 But never craving, or oppress with care?
 The baits of gifts, and money to despise,
 And look on wealth with undesiring eyes?
 When thou can'st truly call these virtues thine,
 Be wise and free, by Heaven's consent, and mine.

But thee, who lately, of the common strain,
 Wert one of us, if still thou dost retain
 The same ill habits, the same follies too,
 Gloss'd over only with a saint-like show,
 Then I resume the freedom which I gave,
 Still thou art bound to vice, and still a slave.
 Thou canst not wag my finger, or begin
 The least light motion, but it tends to sin.
 "How's this? Not wag thy finger?" he replies
 No, friend; nor fuming gums, nor sacrifice,
 Can ever make a madman free, or wise.
 Virtue and vice are never in one soul:
 A man is wholly wise, or wholly is a fool.
 A heavy burthen, taught with daily care,
 Can never dance three steps with a becoming air.

PERSIUS.

In spite of this, my freedom still remains.

CORNUTUS.

Free! what, and fetter'd with so many chains!
 Canst thou no other master understand
 Than him that freed thee by the pretor's wand!

Should he, who was thy lord, command thee now,
With a harsh voice, and supercilious brow,
To servile duties, thou would'st fear no more;
The gallows and the whip are out of door.
But if thy passions lord it in thy breast,
Art thou not still a slave, and still oppress?
Whether alone, or in thy harlot's lap,
When thou would'st take a lazy morning's nap;
"Up, up," says Avarice. Thou snor'st again,
Stretchest thy limbs, and yawn'st, but all in vain;
The tyrant Lucre no denial takes;
At his command th' unwilling sluggard wakes:
"What must I do?" he cries: "What?" says his lord:

"Why, rise, make ready, and go straight abroad:
With fish, from Euxine seas, thy vessel freight;
Flax, castor, Cœan wines, the precious weight
Of pepper, and Sabeian incense, take
With thy own hands, from the tir'd catmel's back:
And with post-haste thy running markets make.
Be sure to turn the penny; lye and swear;
'Tis wholesome sin: but Jove, thou say'st, will hear:

Swear, fool, or starve; for the dilemma 's even:
A tradesman thou! and hope to go to Heaven?
Resolv'd for sea, the slaves thy baggage pack,
Each saddled with his burden on his back:
Nothing retards thy voyage, now, unless
Thy other lord forbids, Voluptuousness:
And he may ask this civil question: 'Friend,
What dost thou make a ship-board? to what end?
Art thou of Bethlem's noble college free? [sea;
Stark, staring mad, that thou would'st tempt the Cubb'd in a cabin, on a mattress laid,
On a brown gerge, with lousy swobbers fed,
Dead wine, that stinks of the borrachio, sup
From a foul jack, or greasy maple-cup?
Say, would'st thou bear all this, to raise thy store
From six i' th' hundred, to six hundred more?
Indulge, and to thy genius freely give;
Pot, not to live at ease, is not to live;
Death stalks behind thee, and each flying hour
Does some loose remnant of thy life devour.
Live, while thou liv'st; for death will make us all
A name, a nothing but an old wife's tale."

Speak; wilt thou Avarice, or Pleasure, choose
To be thy lord? take one, and one refuse.

But both, by turns, the rule of thee will have;
And thou, betwixt them both, wilt be a slave.

Nor think, when once thou hast resisted one,
That all thy marks of servitude are gone:
The struggling greyhound gnaws his leash in vain;
If, when 'tis broken, still he drags the chain.

Says Phœdra to his man, "Believe me, friend,
To this uneasy love I'll put an end:

Shall I run out of all? my friends disgrace,
And be the first lewd unthrift of my race?
Shall I the neighbour's nightly rest invade
At her deaf doors, with some vile serenade?"
"Well hast thou freed thyself," his man replies,
"Go, thank the gods, and offer sacrifice."

"Ah," says the youth, "if we unkindly part,
Will not the poor fond creature break her heart?
Weak soul! and blindly to destruction led!"
"She break her heart! she'll sooner break your head.

She knows her man, and, when you rant and swear,
Can draw you to her, with a single hair."

"But shall I not return? Now, when she sue!
Shall I say Own, and her desires refuse?"

"Sir, take your course: but my advice is plain:
Once freed, 'tis madness to resume your chain."

Ay; there's the man, who, loo'd from lust and Less to the pretor owes, than to himself. [self,
But write him down a slave, who, humbly proud,
With presents begs preferments from the crowd;
That early suppliant, who salutes the tribes,
And sets the mob to scramble for his bribes:
That some old dotard, sitting in the sun,
On holidays may tell, that such a feat was done:
In future times this will be counted rare.

Thy superstition too may claim a share:
When flowers are strew'd, and lamps in order
And windows with illuminations grac'd, [plac'd,
On Herod's day; when sparkling bowls go round,
And tunnies' tails, in savoury sauce are drown'd,
Thou mutter'st prayers obscene; nor dost refuse
The fasts and sabbaths of the curtain'd Jews.
Then a crack'd egg-shell thy sick fancy frights,
Besides the childish fear of walking sprites.
Of o'ergrown gelding priests thou art afraid;
The tumbrel, and the squintifego maid
Of Isis, awe thee: lest the gods, for sin,
Should, with a swelling dropsy, stuff thy skin:
Unless three garlic-heads the curse avert,
Eaten each morn, devoutly, next thy heart.
Preach this among the brawny guards, say't thou,
And see if they thy doctrine will allow;
The dull fat captain, with a bound's deep throat,
Would bellow out a laugh, in a base note;
And prize a hundred Zenos just as much
As a clipt sixpence, or a schilling Dutche

THE SIXTH SATIRE OF
PERSIUS

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS sixth satire treats an admirable commonplace of moral philosophy; of the true use of riches. They certainly are intended, by the power who bestows them, as instruments and helps of living commodiously ourselves; and of administering to the wants of others, who are oppressed by fortune. There are two extremes in the opinions of men concerning them. One error, though on the right hand, yet a great one, is, that they are no helps to a virtuous life; the other places all our happiness in the acquisition and possession of them; and this is, undoubtedly, the worse extreme. The mean betwixt these, is the opinion of the Stoics; which is, that riches may be useful to the leading a virtuous life; in case we rightly understand how to give according to right reason;
and how to receive what is given us by others.
The virtue of giving well, is called liberality:
and it is of this virtue that Persius writes in this satire; wherein he not only shows the lawful use of riches, but also sharply inveighs against the vices which are opposed to it; and especially of those, which consist in the defects of giving or spending; or in the abuse of riches.
He writes to Cæsius Bassus his friend, and a poet also, inquires first of his health and studies; and afterwards informs him of his own, and where he is now resident. He gives an eye count of himself, that he is endeavouring, by little and little, to wear off his vices; and particularly, that he is combating ambition, and the desire of wealth. He dwells upon the latter vice; and, being sensible that few men either desire or use riches as they ought, he endeavours to convince them of their folly; which is the main design of the whole satire.

THE SIXTH SATIRE.

TO CÆSIUS BASSUS, A LYRIC POET.

HAS winter caus'd thee, friend, to change thy
And seek in Sabine air a warm retreat? [seat,
Say, dost thou yet the Roman harp command?
Do the strings answer to thy noble hand?
Great master of the Muse, inspir'd to sing
The beauties of the first-created spring;
The pedigree of nature to rehearse,
And sound the Maker's work, in equal verse.
Now sporting on thy lyre the loves of youth,
Now virtuous age, and venerable truth;
Expressing justly Sappho's wanton art
Of odes, and Pindar's more majestic part.

For me, my warmer constitution wants
More cold, than our Ligurian winter grants;
And therefore, to my native shores retir'd,
I view the coast old Ænanius once admir'd;
Where cliffs on either sides their points display;
And, after, opening in an ampler way,
Afford the pleasing prospect of the bay.
"Tis worth your while, O Romans, to regard
The port of Luna," says our learned bard;
Who in a drunken dream beheld his soul
The fifth within the transmigrating roll;
Which first a peacock, then Euphorbus was,
Then Homer next, and next Pythagoras;
And last of all the line did into Ennius pass.

Secure and free from business of the state,
And more secure of what the vulgar prate,
Here I enjoy my private thoughts; nor care
What rots for sheep the southern winds prepare:
Survey the neighbouring fields, and not repine,
When I behold a larger crop than mine:
To see a beggar's brat in riches flow,
Adds not a wrinkle to my even brow;
Nor, envious at the sight, will I forbear
My plenteous bowl, nor bate my bounteous cheer.
Nor yet unseal the dregs of wine that stink
Of cask; nor in a nasty flaggon drink;
Let others stuff their guts with homely fare;
For men of different inclinations are;
Though born perhaps beneath one common star.
In minds and manners twins oppos'd we see
In the same sign, almost the same degree:
One, frugal on his birth-day fears to dine,
Does at a penny's cost in herbs repine,
And hardly dares to dip his fingers in the brine.
Prepar'd as priest of his own rites to stand,
He sprinkles pepper with a sparing hand.
His jolly brother, opposite in sense,
Laughs at his thrift; and, lavish of expense,
Quaffs, crams, and guttles, in his own defence.

For me, I'll use my own; and take my share;
Yet will not turbots for my slaves prepare;
Nor be so nice in taste myself to know
If what I swallow be a thrush, or no

Live on thy annual income; spend thy store;
And freely grind, from thy full threshing-floor;
Next harvest promises as much, or more.
Thus I would live: but friendship's holy band,
And offices of kindness, hold my hand:
My friend is shipwreck'd on the Brutian strand,
His riches in th' Ionian main are lost,
And he himself stands shivering on the coast;
Where, destitute of help, forlorn and bare,
He wears the deaf gods with fruitless prayer.
Their images, the relics of the wreck,
Torn from the naked poop, are tid'd back
By the wild waves, and, rudely thrown ashore,
Lie impotent; nor can themselves restore.
The vessel sticks, and shows her open'd side, [ride.
And on her shatter'd masts the mews in triumph
From thy new hope, and from thy growing store,
Now lend assistance, and relieve the poor.
Come; do a noble act of charity;
A pittance of thy land will set him free.
Let him not bear the badges of a wreck,
Nor beg with a blue table on his back:
Nor tell me that thy frowning heir will say,
"Tis mine that wealth thou squander'st thus
What is 't to thee, if he neglect thy urn, [away;
Or without spices lets thy body burn?
If odours to thy ashes he refuse,
Or buys corrupted cassia from the Jews?"
"All these," the wiser Bestius will reply,
"Are empty pomp, and dead men's luxury:
We never knew this vain expense, before
Th' effeminated Grecians brought it o'er:
Now toys and trifles from their Athens come;
And dates and pepper have unsinew'd Rome.
Our sweating hinds their sallads, now, defile,
Infecting homely herbs with fragrant oil.
But to thy fortune be not thou a slave:
For what hast thou to fear beyond the grave?
And thou who gap'st for my estate, draw near;
For I would whisper somewhat in thy ear. [come,
Hear'st thou the news, my friend? th' express is
With laurel'd letters from the camp to Rome?
Cæsar salutes the queen and senate thus:
'My arms are on the Rhine victorious.
From mourning altars sweep the dust away:
Cease fasting, and proclaim a fat thanksgiving day.'
The goodly empress, jollily inclin'd,
Is to the welcome bearer wondrous kind:
And setting her good housewifery aside,
Prepares for all the pageantry of pride.
The captive Germans, of gigantic size,
Are rank'd in order, and are clad in frize:
The spoils of kings and conquer'd camps we boast,
Their arms in trophies hang on the triumphal post.

"Now, for so many glorious actions done
In foreign parts, and mighty battles won:
For peace at home, and for the public wealth,
I mean to crown a bowl to Cæsar's health:
Besides, in gratitude for such high matters,
Know I have vow'd two hundred gladiators.
Say, would'st thou hinder me from this expense;
I disinher't thee, if thou dar'st take offence.
Yet more, a public largess I design
Of oil and pies, to make the people dine:
Control me not, for fear I change my will.
And yet methinks I hear thee grumbling still,
'You give as if you were the Persian king:
Your land does not so large revenues bring.'
Well; on my terms thou wilt not be my heir?
If thou can'st little, less shall be my care:

Were none of all my father's sisters left :
 Nay, were I of my mother's kin bereft :
 None by an uncle's or a grandame's side,
 Yet I could some adopted heir provide.
 I need but take my journey half a day
 From haughty Rome, and at Aricia stay,
 Where fortune throws poor Manius in my way.
 Him will I choose : " What ! him of humble birth, Obscure, a foundling, and a son of earth ?"
 " Obscure ? Why pry'st thou what am I ? I know
 My father, grandsire, and great grandsire too.
 If farther I derive my pedigree,
 I can but guess beyond the fourth degree.
 The rest of my forgotten ancestors
 Were sons of earth, like him, or sons of whores.

" Yet, why would'st thou, old covetous wretch, aspire
 To be my heir, who might'st have been my sire ?
 In Nature's race, should'st thou demand of me
 My torch, when I in course run after thee ?
 Think I approach thee, like the god of gain,
 With wings on head and heels, as poets feign :
 Thy moderate fortune from my gift receive ;
 Now fairly take it, or as fairly leave.
 But take it as it is, and ask no more.
 " What, when thou hast embezzled all thy store ?
 Where's all thy father left ?" " 'Tis true, I grant,
 Some I have mortgag'd, to supply my want :
 The legacies of Tadius too are flown ;
 All spent, and on the self-same errand gone.
 " How little then to my poor share will fall !"
 Little indeed ; but yet that little's all.

" Nor tell me, in a dying father's tone,
 ' Be careful still of the main chance, my son ;
 Put out thy principal in trusty hands :
 Live on the use ; and never dip thy lands :'
 " But yet what's left for me ?" " What's left, my Ask that again, and all the rest I spend. [friend !
 Is not my fortunes at my own command ?
 Pour oil, and pour it with a plentiful hand,
 Upon my sallads, boy : shall I be fed
 With sodden nettles, and a sing'd sow's head ?
 'Tis holiday ; provide me better cheer ;
 'Tis holiday, and shall be round the year.
 Shall I my household gods and genius cheat,
 To make him rich, who grudges me my meat ?
 That he may loll at ease ; and, pamper'd high,
 When I am laid, may feed on giblet-pie ?
 And, when his throbbing lust extends the veins,
 Have wherewithal his whores to entertain ?
 Shall I in homespun cloth be clad, that he
 His paunch in triumph may before him see ?
 " Go, miser, go ; for lucre sell thy soul ;
 Truck wares for wares, and trudge from pole to pole :
 That men may say, when thou art dead and gone,
 See what a vast estate he left his son !
 How large a family of brawny knaves,
 Well fed, and fat as Cappadocian slaves !
 Increase thy wealth, and double all thy store ;
 'Tis done ; now double that, and swell the score ;
 To every thousand add ten thousand more.
 Then say, Chrysippus, thou who would'st confine Thy heap, where I shall put an end to mine."

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE Trojans, after a seven years' voyage, set sail for Italy, but are overtaken by a dreadful storm, which Æolus raises at Juno's request. The tempest sinks one ship, and scatters the rest: Neptune drives off the winds, and calms the seas. Æneas, with his own, and six more ships, arrives safe at an African port. Venus complains to Jupiter of her son's misfortunes. Jupiter comforts her, and sends Mercury to procure him a kind reception among the Carthaginians. Æneas, going out to discover the country, meets his mother in the shape of a huntress, who conveys him in a cloud to Carthage; where he sees his friends whom he thought lost, and receives a kind entertainment from the queen. Dido, by a device of Venus, begins to have a passion for him, and, after some discourse with him desires the history of his adventures since the siege of Troy; which is the subject of the two following books.

Æneas and the man I sing, the first who bore
His course to Latium from the Trojan shore;
By fate expell'd, on land and ocean tost,
Before he reach'd the fair Lavinian coast:
Doom'd by the gods a length of wars to wage,
And urg'd by Juno's unrelenting rage;
Ere the brave hero rais'd, in these abodes,
His destin'd walls, and fix'd his wandering gods.
Hence the fam'd Latian line, and senates come,
And the proud triumphs, and the towers of Rome,

Say, Muse, what causes could so far incense
Celestial pow'rs, and what the dire offence
That mov'd Heav'n's awful empress to impose
On such a pious prince a weight of woes,
Expos'd to danger, and with toils oppress?
Can rage so fierce inflame an heavenly breast?

Against th' Italian coast, of ancient fame
A city rose, and Carthage was the name;
A Tyrian colony; from Tiber far;
Rich, rough, and brave, and exercis'd in war.
Which Juno far above all realms, above
Her own dear Samos, honoured with her love.
Here stood her chariot, here her armour lay,
Here she design'd, would destiny give way,
Evn then the seat of universal sway.

But of a race she heard, that should destroy
The Tyrian tow'rs, a race deriv'd from Troy,
Who, proud in arms, triumphant by their swords,
Should rise in time, the world's victorious lords;
By fate design'd her Carthage to subdue,
And on her ruin'd empire raise a new.
This fear'd the goddess; and in mind she bore
The late long war her fury rais'd before
For Greece with Troy; nor was her wrath resign'd,
But every cause hung heavy on her mind;
Her form disdain'd, and Paris' judgment, roll
Deep in her breast, and kindle all her soul;
Th' immortal honours of the ravish'd boy,
And last, the whole detested race of Troy.
With all these motives fir'd, from Latium far
She drove the relics of the Grecian war:
Fate urg'd their course: and long they wander'd
The spacious ocean tost from shore to shore.
So vast the work to build the mighty frame,
And raise the glories of the Roman name!

Scarce from Sicilian shores the shouting train
Spread their broad sails, and plough'd the foamy
When haughty Juno thus her rage express'd;
Th' eternal wound still rankling in her breast.

"Then must I stop? are all my labours vain?
And must this Trojan prince in Latium reign?
Belike, the fates may baffle Juno's aims;
And why could Pallas, with avenging flames,
Burn a whole navy of the Grecian ships,
And whelm the scatter'd Argives in the deeps?
She, for the crime of Ajax, from above
Launch'd through the clouds the fiery bolts of Jove;
Dash'd wide his fleet, and, as her tempest flew,
Expos'd the ocean's inmost depths to view.
Then, while transfix'd the blasted wretch expires,
Flames from his breast, and fires succeeding fires,
Snatch'd in a whirlwind, with a sudden shock,
She hurl'd him headlong on a pointed rock.
But I, who move supreme in Heaven's abodes,
Jove's sister-wife, and empress of the gods,
With this one nation must a war maintain
For years on years; and wage that war in vain
And now what supplicants will invoke my name,
Adore my pow'r, or bid my altars flame?"

Thus fir'd with rage and vengeance, now she flies
To dark Æolia, from the distant skies,
Impregnat with storms; whose tyrant binds
The blust'ring tempests, and reluctant winds.
Their rage imperial Æolus restrains
With rocky dungeons, and enormous chains.
The bellowing brethren, in the mount'n pent,
Roar round the cave, and struggle for a vent.
From his high throne, their fury to assuage,
He shakes his sceptre, and controls their rage;
Or down the void their rapid whirls are driv'n
Earth, air, and ocean, and the tow'rs of Heaven.

But Jove, the mighty ruin to prevent,
In gloomy caves the aerial captives pent;
O'er their wild rage the pond'rous rocks he spread,
And hurl'd huge heaps of mountains on their head;
And gave a king, commission'd to restrain
And curb the tempest, or to loose the rein.

Whom thus the queen address'd: "Since mighty
The king of men, and sire of gods above, [Jove,
Gives thee, great Æolus, the pow'r to raise
Storms at thy sovereign will, or smooth the seas:
A race, I long have labour'd to destroy,
Wast to Hesperia the remains of Troy.
Ev'n now their navy cuts the Tuscan floods,
Charg'd with their exiles, and their vanquish'd gods.
Wing all thy furious winds; o'erwhelm the train,
Disperse, or plunge their vessels in the main.
Twice seven bright nymphs, of beauteous shape, are
For thy reward the fairest I'll resign, [mine;
The charming Deiopea shall be thine;
She, on thy bed, long blessings shall confer,
And make thee father of a race like her."

"'Tis your's, great queen," replies the pow'r, "to
The task, and mine to listen and obey. [lay
By you, I sit a guest with gods above,
And share the graces and the smiles of Jove;
By you, these realms, this sceptre I maintain,
And wear these honours of the stormy reign."

So spoke th' obsequious god; and, while he spoke,
Whirl'd his vast spear, and pierc'd the hollow rock.
The winds, embattled, as the mountain rent,
Flew all at once impetuous thro' the vent;
Earth, in their course, with giddy whirls they sweep,
Rush to the seas, and bare the bosom of the deep:
East, West, and South, all black with tempests,
And roll vast billows to the trembling shore. [roar,
The cordage cracks; with unavailing cries
The Trojans mourn; while sudden clouds arise,
And ravish from their sight the splendours of the skies.

Night hovers o'er the floods; the day retires;
The heav'ns flash thick with momentary fires;
Loud thunders shake the poles; from ev'ry place
Grim death appear'd, and glar'd in ev'ry face.

In horror fix'd the Trojan hero stands,
He groans, and spreads to Heav'n his lifted hands.
"Thrice happy those! whose fate it was to fall,"
"Exclaims the chief" "beneath the Trojan wall.
Oh! 'twas a glorious fate to die in fight,
To die, so bravely, in their parents' sight!
Oh! had I there, beneath Tydides' hand,
That bravest hero of the Grecian band,
Peur'd out this soul, with martial glory fir'd,
And in that field triumphantly expir'd,
Where Hector fell by fierce Achilles' spear,
And great Sarpedon, the renown'd in war;
Where Simois' streams, encumber'd with the slain,
Roll'd shields, and helms, and heroes to the main."

Thus while he mourns, the northern blast prevails,

Breaks all his oars, and rends his flying sails;
The prow turns round; the galley leaves her side
Bare to the working waves, and roaring tide;
While in huge heaps the gathering surges spread,
And hang in wat'ry mountains o'er his head,
These ride on waves sublime; those see the ground,
Low in the boiling deeps, and dark profound.
Three shatter'd gallees the strong southern blast
On hidden rocks, with dreadful fury, cast;
Th' Italians call them altars, as they stood
Sublime, and heav'd their backs above the flood.

Three more, fierce Eurus on the Syrtes threw
From the main sea, and (terrible to view)
He dash'd, and left the vessels, on the land,
Intrench'd with mountains of surrounding sand.
Struck by a billow, in the hero's view,
From prow to stern the shatter'd galley flew
Which bore Orontes, and the Lycian crew:
Swept off the deck, the pilot from the ship,
Stunn'd by the stroke, shot headlong down the deep;
The vessel, by the surge tost round and round,
Sunk, in the whirling gulph deyou'r'd and drown'd,
Some from the dark abyss emerge again;
Arms, planks, and treasures, float along the main.
And now thy ship, Ilioueus, gives way,
Nor thine, Achates, can resist the sea;
Nor old Alethes his strong galley saves;
Then Abas yields to the victorious waves:
The storm dissolves their well-compacted sides,
Which drink at many a leak the hostile tides.

Meantime th' imperial monarch of the main
Heard the loud tumults in his wat'ry reign,
And saw the furious tempest wide around
Work up the waters, from the vast profound.
Then for his liquid realms alarm'd, the god
Lifts his high head above the stormy flood,
Majestic and serene: he rolls his eyes,
And scatter'd wide the Trojan navy spies, [skies.
Opprest by waves below, by thunders from the Full well he knew his sister's endless hate,
Her wiles and arts to sink the Trojan state.
To Eurus, and the Western blast, he cry'd,
"Does your high birth inspire this boundless pride,
Audacious winds! without a pow'r from me,
To raise, at will, such mountains on the sea?
Thus to confound Heav'n, earth, the air, and main?
Whom I—but first I'll calm the waves again.
But if you tempt my rage a second time,
Know, that some heavier vengeance waits the crime.
Hence; fly with speed; from me, your tyrant fall,
That to my lot this wat'ry empire fell.
Bid him his rocks, your darksome dungeons keep,
Nor dare usurp the trident of the deep.

There, in that gloomy court, display his pow'r,
And hear his tempests round their caverns roar."

He spoke, and speaking chas'd the clouds away,
Hush'd the loud billows, and restor'd the day.
Cymothoë guards the vessels in the shock,
And Triton heaves them from the pointed rock.
With his huge trident the majestic god
Clear'd the wild Syrtes, and compos'd the flood;
Then mounted on his radiant car he rides,
And wheels along the level of the tides.
As when sedition fires th' ignoble crowd,
And the wild rabble storms and thirsts for blood:
Of stones and brands, a mingled tempest flies,
With all the sudden arms that rage supplies:
If some grave sire appears, amid the strife,
In morals strict, and innocence of life,
All stand attentive; while the sage controuls
Their wrath, and calms the tumult of their souls.
So did the roaring deeps their rage compose,
When the great father of the floods arose.
Rapt by his steeds he flies in open day,
Throws up the reins, and skims the wat'ry way.

The Trojans, weary'd with the storm, explore
The nearest land, and reach the Libyan shore.
Far in a deep recess, her jutting sides
An isle projects, to break the rolling tides,
And forms a port, where, curling from the sea,
The waves steal back, and wind into a bay.

On either side, sublime in air, arise
Two tow'ring rocks, whose summits brave the skies;
Low at their feet the sleeping ocean lies:
Crown'd with a gloomy shade of waving woods,
Their awful brows hang nodding o'er the floods.
Oppos'd to these, a secret grotto stands,
The haunt of Nereids, fram'd by Nature's hands;
Where polish'd seats appear of living stone,
And limpid rills, that tinkle as they run.
No cable here, nor circling anchor binds
The floating vessel harass'd with the winds.
The Dardan hero brings to this retreat
Seven shatter'd ships, the relics of his fleet.
With fierce desire to gain the friendly strand,
The Trojans leap in rapture to the land, [sand.
And, drench'd in brine, lie stretch'd along the Achates strikes the silt, and from the stroke
The lurking seeds of fire in sparkles broke;
The catching flame on leaves and stubble preys,
Then gathers strength, and mounts into a blaze.
Fir'd with their labours, they prepare to dine,
And grind their corn, infected with the brine.
Æneas mounts a rock, and thence surveys
The wide and wat'ry prospect of the seas;
Now hopes the shatter'd Phrygian ships to find,
Antheus, or Capys, driving with the wind;
And now, Caius' glitt'ring arms to spy,
Wide o'er the vast horizon darts his eye.
The chief could view no vessel on the main;
But three tall stags stalk'd proudly o'er the plain;
Before the herd their beamy fronts they rais'd;
Stretch'd out in length, the train along the valley
gras'd.

The prince, who spy'd 'em on the shore below,
Stopp'd short—then snatch'd the feather'd shafts
and bow,

Which good Achates bore: his arrows fled;
And first he laid the lordly leaders dead;
Next all th' ignoble vulgar he pursu'd,
And with his shafts dispers'd 'em thro' the wood;
Nor ceas'd the chief, 'till, stretch'd beneath his feet,

Lay seven huge stags, the number of his fleet.
Back to the port the victor bends his way,
And with his friends divides the copious prey.
The generous wine to crown the genial feast,
Which kind Acestes gave his parting guest,
Next to his sad associates he imparts;
And with these words revives their drooping hearts.

"Friends! we have known more toils, than now we know,

By long experience exercis'd in woe;
And soon to these disasters shall be giv'n
A certain period by relenting Heaven
Think, how you saw the dire Cyclopean shore,
Heard Scylla's rocks, and all her monsters, roar.
Dismiss your fears; on these misfortunes past
Your minds with pleasure may reflect at last.
Through such varieties of woes, we tend
To promis'd Latium, where our toils shall end:
Where the kind fates shall peaceful seats ordain,
And Troy, in all her glories, rise again.
With manly patience bear your present state,
And with firm courage wait a better fate."
So spoke the chief, and hid his inward smart;
Hope smooth'd his looks, but anguish rack'd his heart.
The hungry crowd prepare, without delay, [heart.
To dress the banquet, and to share the prey.
Some from the body strip the smoking hide,
Some cut in morsels, and the parts divide;

These bid, with busy care, the flames aspire;
Those roast the limbs, yet quiv'ring o'er the fire.
Thus, while their strength and spirits they restore,
The brazen cauldrons smoke along the shore.
Stretch'd on the grass, their bodies they recline,
Enjoy the rich repast, and quaff the generous wine.

The rage of hunger quell'd, they pass'd away
In long and melancholy talk the day;
Nor knew, by fears and hopes alternate led,
Whether to deem their friends distress'd, or dead.
Apart the pious chief, who suffer'd most,
Bemoans brave Gyas and Cloanthus lost;
For Lycus' fate, for Amicus he weeps,
And great Orontes, whelm'd beneath the deeps.

Now, from high Heav'n, imperial Jove surveys
The nations, shores, and navigable seas;
There, as he sat, enthron'd above the skies,
Full on the Libyan realms he fix'd his eyes.
When lo! the mournful queen of love appears;
Her starry eyes were dimm'd with streaming tears;
Who to the sire her humble suit address'd,
The schemes of fate revolving in his breast.

"Oh thou! whose sacred, and eternal sway,
Aw'd by thy thunders, men, and gods obey;
What have my poor exhausted Trojans done?
Or what, alas! my dear unhappy son?
Still, for the sake of Italy, deny'd
All other regions, all the world beside?
Sure, once you promis'd, that a race divine
Of Roman chiefs should spring from Teucer's line;
The world in future ages to command,
And in the empire grasp the sea and land.
Oh! sov'reign father, say! what cause could move
The fixt unalterable word of Jove?"

Which sooth'd my grief, when Ilion felt her doom;
And Troy I balanc'd with the fates of Rome.
But see! their fortune still pursues her blow;
When wilt thou fix a period to their woe?
In safety, bold Antenor broke his way
Through hosts of foes, and pierc'd th' Illyrian bay,
Where, through nine ample mouths, Timavus pours,
Wide as a sea, and deluges the shores;
The flood rebellows, and the mountain roars;
Yet with his colonies, secure he came,
Rais'd his Padua's walls, and gave the realms a name,
Then fix'd his Trojan arms; his labours cease;
And now the hoary monarch reigns in peace.
But we, your progeny, ordain'd to rise,
And share th' eternal honours of the skies,
To glut the rage of one, our vessels lost,
Barr'd by her vengeance, from the promis'd coast;
Are these the palms that virtue must obtain,
And is our empire thus restor'd again?"

The sire of men and gods, superior, smil'd
On the sad queen, and gently kiss'd his child.
Then, with those looks that clear the clouded skies,
And calm the raging tempest, he replies.
"Daughter, dismiss your fears; by doom divine
Fixt are the fates of your immortal line.
Your eyes Lavinium's promis'd walls shall see,
And here we ratify our first decree.
Your son, the brave Æneas, soon shall rise,
Himself a god; and mount the starry skies.
To soothe your care, these secrets I relate
From the dark volumes of eternal fate:
The chief fair Italy shall reach, and there
With mighty nations wage a dreadful war,
New cities raise, the savage nations awe,
And to the conquer'd kingdoms give the law;

The fierce Rutulians vanquish'd by his sword,
 Three years shall Latium own him sovereign lord.
 Your dear Ascanius then, the royal boy,
 (Now called Iulus, since the fall of Troy)
 While thirty rolling years their orbs complete,
 Shall wear the crown, and from Lavinium's seat
 Transfer the kingdom; and, of mighty length
 Raise tow'ring Alba, glorying in her strength.
 There, shall the Trojan race enjoy the pow'r,
 And fill the throne three hundred winters more.
 Ilia, the royal priestess, next shall bear
 Two lovely infants to the god of war.
 Nurs'd by a tawny wolf, her eldest son,
 Imperial Romulus, shall mount the throne;
 From his own name, the people Romans call,
 And from his father Mars, his rising wall.
 No limits have I fix'd, of time, or place,
 To the vast empire of the godlike race.
 Ev'n haughty Juno shall the nation love,
 Who now alarms earth, seas, and Heaven above;
 And join her friendly counsels to my own,
 With endless fame the sons of Rome to crown,
 The world's majestic lords, the nation of the gown.
 This word be fate—an hour shall wing its way,
 When Troy in dust shall proud Mycenæ lay.
 In Greece, Assaracus, his sons shall reign,
 And vanquish'd Argos wear the victor's chain.
 Then Cæsar, call'd by great Iulus' name,
 (Whose empire ocean bounds, the stars his fame)
 Sprung from the noble Trojan line, shall rise, Charg'd with his eastern spoils, and mount the skies.

Him, shall you see, advanc'd to these abodes;
 Ador'd by Rome; a god among the gods.
 From that blest hour all violence shall cease,
 The age grow mild, and soften into peace.
 With righteous Rhemus shall Quirinus reign,
 Old faith, and Vesta, shall return again;
 With many a solid hinge, and brazen bar,
 Shall Janus close the horrid gates of war.
 Within the fane dire Fury shall be bound,
 With a huge heap of shatter'd arms around;
 Wrapt in an hundred chains, beneath the load
 The fiend shall roar, and grind his teeth in blood."

The thund'rer said, and down th' ærial way
 Sent with his high commands the son of May;
 That Carthage may throw wide her friendly tow'rs,
 And grant her guests the freedom of her shores;
 Lest Dido, blind to fate, and Jove's decree,
 Should shut her ports, and drive them to the sea.
 Swift on the steerage of his wings he flies,
 And shoots the vast expansion of the skies.
 Arriv'd, th' almighty's orders he performs:
 Charm'd by the god, no more the nation storms
 With jealous rage; in chief the queen inclin'd
 To peace, and mild benevolence of mind.

All night involv'd in cares Æneas lay,
 But rose impatient at the dawn of day,
 To view the coast, the country to explore,
 And learn if men, or beasts, possess'd the shore,
 (For wide around the gloomy waste extends)
 And bear the tidings to his anxious friends.
 Beneath a shelving rock his fleet dispos'd,
 With waving woods and awful shades enclos'd,
 Two glittering spears he shook with martial pride,
 And forth he march'd; Achates at his side.
 As through the wilds the chief his course pursu'd,
 He meets his goddess-mother in the wood;
 In show, an huntress she appear'd, array'd
 In arms and habit like a Spartan maid;

Or swift Harpalyce of Thrace, whose speed
 Out-flew the wings of winds, and tir'd the rapt steed.

Bare was her knee; and with an easy pride
 Her polish'd bow hung graceful at her side.
 Close, in a knot, her flowing robes she drew;
 Loose to the winds her wanton tresses flew.
 "Ho! gentle youths," she cry'd, "have you beheld
 One of my sisters wand'ring o'er the field,
 Girt with a speckled lynx's vary'd hide,
 A painted quiver rattling at her side?
 Or have you seen her, with an eager pace,
 Urge with full cries the foaming boar in chase?"
 "None of your charming sisterhood," he said,
 "Have we beheld, or heard; oh! beauteous maid,
 Your name, oh! nymph, or oh! fair goddess, say!
 A goddess, sure, or sister of the day!
 You draw your birth from some immortal line,
 Your looks are heavenly, and your voice divine,
 Tell me, on what new climate are we thrown?
 Alike the natives and the lands unknown?
 By the wild waves, and swelling surges tost,
 We wander strangers on a foreign coast.
 Then will we still invoke your sacred name,
 And with fat victims shall your altars flame."
 "No goddess' awful name!" she said, "I bear;
 For know, the Tyrian maids, by custom, here,
 The purple buskin and a quiver wear.
 Your eyes behold Agenor's walls aspire;
 The Punic realms; a colony from Tyre.
 See! wide around, waste Libya's bounds appear,
 Whose swarthy sons are terrible in war.

From her fierce brother's vengeance, o'er the main,
 From Tyre, fled Dido, and enjoys the reign:
 The tale is intricate, perplex, and long;
 Hear then, in short, the story of her wrong.
 Sichæus was her lord, beyond the rest
 Of the Phœnician race, with riches blest;
 Much lov'd by Dido, whom her father led
 Pure, and a virgin, to his nuptial bed.
 Her brother, fierce Pygmalion, fill'd the throne
 Of Tyre, in vice unrivall'd and alone.
 Ev'n at the sacred altar, in a strife,
 By stealth the tyrant shed his brother's life;
 Blind with the charms of gold, his falchion drov'
 Stern, and regardless of his sister's love.
 Then, with fond hopes, deceiv'd her for a time,
 And forg'd pretences to conceal the crime.
 But her unbury'd lord, before her sight,
 Rose in a frightful vision of the night:
 Around her bed he stalks: grim! ghastly! pale!
 And, staring wide, unfolds the horrid tale
 Of the dire altars, dash'd with blood around;
 Then bares his breast, and points to every wound;
 Warns her to fly the land without delay;
 And to support her through the tedious way,
 Shows where, in massy piles, his bury'd treasure lay.

Rous'd, and alarm'd, the wife her flight intends,
 Obeys the summons, and conveys her friends:
 They meet, they join, and in her cause engage,
 All, who detest, or dread the tyrant's rage.
 Some ships, already rigg'd, they seiz'd, and stow'd
 Their sides with gold; then launch'd into the flood.
 They sail; the bold exploit a woman guides;
 Pygmalion's wealth is wafted o'er the tides.
 They came, where now you see new Carthage rise,
 And yon proud citadel invade the skies.
 The wand'ring exiles bought a space of ground,
 Which one bull-hide enclos'd and compass'd round;

hence Byrsa nam'd: but now, ye strangers, say,
Who? whence you are? and whither lies your way?"

Deep, from his soul, he draws a length of sighs,
and, with a mournful accent, thus replies:
Should I, O goddess! from their source relate,
if you attend, the annals of our fate,
the golden Sun would sink, and ev'ning close,
before my tongue could tell you half our woes.
By Grecian foes expell'd from Troy we came, from ancient Troy (if e'er you heard the name)
through various seas; when lo! a tempest roars, and raging drives us on the Libyan shores.
He good Æneas am I call'd; my fame,
and brave exploits, have reach'd the starry frame:
From Grecian flames I bear my rescu'd gods,
safe in my vessels, o'er the stormy floods.
In search of ancient Italy I rove, and draw my lineage from almighty Jove.

A goddess-mother and the fates my guides,
With twenty ships I plough'd the Phrygian tides, carcass sev'n of all my fleet are left behind, tomb by the waves, and shatter'd by the wind.
Myself, from Europe and from Asia cast,
A helpless stranger rove the Libyan waste."

No more could Venus hear her son bewail his various woes, but interrupts his tale.
"Whoe'er you are, arriv'd in these abodes,
No wretch I deem abandon'd by the gods;
Hence then, with haste, to yon proud palace bend your course, and on the gracious queen attend.
Your friends are safe, the winds are chang'd again,
Or all my skill in augury is vain!

See those twelve swans, a flock triumphant, fly,
Whom lately shooting from th' ætherial sky,
Th' imperial bird of Jove dispers'd around,
Some hov'ring o'er, some settling on the ground.
As these returning clap their sounding wings,
Ride round the skies, and sport in airy rings;
So have your friends and ships possess'd the strand,
Or with full-bellying sails approach the land.

Haste to the palace then, without delay,
And, as this path directs, pursue your way."
She said, and turning round, her neck she show'd,
That with celestial charms divinely glow'd.
Her waving locks immortal odours shed,
And breath'd ambrosial scents around her head.
Her sweeping robe trail'd pompous as she trod,
And her majestic port confess'd the god.
Soon as he knows her through the coy disguise,
He thus pursues his mother as she flies:

"Must never, never more our hands be join'd?
Are you, like Heaven, grown cruel and unkind?
Why must those borrow'd shapes delude your son?
And why, ah! why those accents not your own?"

He said; then sought the tow'r; but Venus shrouds

And wraps their persons in a veil of clouds;
That none may interpose to cause delay,
Nor, fondly curious, ask them of their way.
Through air sublime the queen of love retreats
To Paphos' stately tow'rs, and blissful seats;
Where to her name an hundred altars rise,
And gums, and flow'ry wreaths, perfume the skies.
Now o'er the lofty hill they bend their way,
Whence all the rising town in prospect lay,
And tow'rs and temples; for the mountain's brow
Hung bending o'er, and shaded all below.

Where late the cottage stood, with glad surprise
The prince behelds the stately palace rise;

On the pav'd streets, and gates, looks wond'ring
down,

And all the crowd and tumult of the town.
The Tyrians ply their work; with many a groan
These roll, or heave, some huge unwieldy stone;
Those bid the lofty citadel ascend;
Some in vast length th' embattled walls extend;
Others for future dwellings choose the ground,
Mark out the spot, and draw the furrow round.
Some useful laws propose, and some the choice
Of sacred senates, and elect by voice.
These sink a spacious mole beneath the sea,
Those a huge theatre's foundation lay;
Hew massy columns from the mountain's side,
Of future scenes an ornamental pride.
Thus to their toils, in early summer, run
The clust'ring bees, and labour in the sun;
Led forth, in colonies, their buzzing race,
Or work the liquid sweets, and thicken to a mass.
The busy nation flies from flow'r to flow'r,
And hoards, in curious cells, the golden store;
A chosen troop before the gate attends,
To take the burdens, and relieve their friends;
Warm at the fragrant work, in bauds, they drive
The drone, a lazy robber, from the hive.
The prince surveys the lofty tow'rs, and cries,
"Blest, blest are you, whose walls already rise!"
Then, strange to tell, he mingled with the crowds,
And pass'd, unseen, involv'd in mantling clouds.

Amid the town, a stately grove display'd
A cooling shelter, and delightful shade.
Here, tost by winds and waves, the Tyrians found
A coursers' head within the sacred ground;
An omen sent by Juno, to declare
A fruitful soil, and race renown'd in war.
A temple here Sidonian Dido rais'd
To Heav'n's dread empress, that with riches blaz'd;
Unnumber'd gifts adorn'd the costly shrine,
By her own presence hallow'd and divine.
Brass were the steps, the beams with brass were strong,

The lofty doors, on brazen hinges, rung.
Here, a strange scene before his eyes appears,
To raise his courage, and dispel his fears;
Here first, he hopes his fortunes to redress:
And finds a glimmering prospect of success.
While for the queen he waited, and amaz'd,
O'er the proud shrine and pompous temple gaz'd;
While he the town admires, and wond'ring stands
At the rich labours of the artists' hands;
Amid the story'd walls, he saw appear,
In speaking paint, the tedious Trojan war;
The war, that fame had blaz'd the world around,
And every battle fought on Phrygian ground.
There Priam stood, and Agamemnon here,
And Pelæus' wrathful son, to both severe.
Struck with the view, "Oh, friend!" the hero cries;

(Tears, as he spoke, came starting from his eyes)
"Lo! the wide world our miseries employ;
What realm abounds not with the woes of Troy?
See! where the venerable Priam stands!
See virtue honour'd in the Libyan sands!
For Troy, the generous tears of Carthage flow;
And Tyrian breasts are touch'd with human woe.
Now banish fear; for, since the Trojan name
Is known, we find our safety in our fame."

Thus while his soul the moving picture fed,
A show'r of tears the groaning hero shed.
For here, the fainting Greeks in fight he view'd;
And there the Trojans to their walls pursu'd.

By plom'd Achilles, with his dreadful spear,
Whirl'd on his kindling chariot through the war.
Not far from thence, proud Rhesus' tents he knows
By their white yeils, that match'd the winter snows,
Betray'd and stretch'd amidst his slaughter'd train,
And, while he slept, by fierce Tydides slain;
Who drove his coursers from the scene of blood,
Ere the fierce steeds had tasted Trojan food,
Or drank divine Scamander's fatal flood.

There Troilus flies disarm'd (unhappy boy!)
From stern Achilles, round the fields of Troy:
Unequal he! to such an arm in war!
Supine, and trailing from his empty car,
Still, though in death, he grasps the flowing reins,
His startled coursers whirl him o'er the plains:
The spear inverted streaks the dust around;
His snowy neck and tresses sweep the ground.
Meantime a pensive supplicating train
Of Trojan matrons, to Minerva's fane
In sad procession with a robe repair,
Beat their white breasts, and rend their golden hair.
Unmov'd with pray'rs, disdainfully she frown'd,
And fix'd her eyes, relentless, on the ground.
Achilles here, his vengeance to enjoy,
Thrice dragg'd brave Hector round the walls of
Then to the mournful sire, the victor sold [Troy:
The breathless body of his son for gold.
His groans now deepen'd, and new tears he shed,
To see the spoils and chariot of the dead,
And Priam both his trembling hands extend,
And, gash'd with wounds, his dear disfigur'd friend.
Mix'd with the Grecian peers, and hostile train,
Himself he view'd, conspicuous in the plain;
And swarthy Memnon, glorious to behold,
His eastern hoets, and arms that flame with gold.
All furious led Penthesilea there,
With moony shields, her Amazons to war;
Around her breast her golden belt she threw;
Then through the thick-embattled squadrons flew:
Amidst the thousands stood the dire alarms,
And the fierce maid engag'd the men in arms.

Thus, while the Trojan hero stood amaz'd,
And, fix'd in wonder, on the picture gaz'd,
With all her guards, fair Dido, from below,
Ascends the dome, majestically slow.
As on Eurota's banks, or Cynthus' heads,
A thousand beauteous nymphs Diana leads,
While round their quiver'd queen the quires advance,

She tow'rs majestic, as she leads the dance;
She moves in pomp superior to the rest,
And secret transports touch Latona's breast.
So pass'd the graceful queen amidst her train,
To speed her labours and her future reign.
Then with her guards surrounded, in the gate,
Beneath the spacious dome, sublime she sat.
She shares their labours, or by lots she draws:
And to the crowd administers the laws.
When lo! Æneas brave Cloanthus spies,
Antheus, and great Sergestus, with surprise,
Approach the throne, attended by a throng
Of Trojan friends, that pour'd in tides along;
Whom the wild whistling winds and tempests bore,
And wildly scatter'd on a distant shore.
Lost in his hopes and fears, amaz'd he stands,
And with Achates longs to join their hands:
But, doubtful of th' event, he first attends,
Wrapt in the cloud, the fortune of his friends;
Anxious, and eager till he knew their state,
And where their vessels lay, and what their fate.

With cries, the royal favour to implore,
They came, a train selected, from the shore:
Then, leave obtain'd, Ilioneus begun,
And, with their common suit, address the throne.
"Oh! queen, indulg'd by Jove, these lofty tow'rs,
And this proud town, to raise on Libyan shores,
With high commands, a savage race to awe,
And to the barb'rous natives give the law,
We wretched Trojans, an abandon'd race,
Tost round the seas, implore your royal grace;
Oh! check your subjects, and their rage reclaim,
Ere their wild fury wrap our fleet in flame.
Oh! save a pious race; regard our cry;
And view our anguish with a melting eye.
We come not, mighty queen, an hostile band,
With sword and fire, and, ravaging the land,
To bear your spoils triumphant to the shore;
No—to such thoughts the vanquish'd durst not soar,
Once by Ænotherians till'd, there lies a place,
'Twas call'd Hesperia by the Grecian race,
(For martial deeds and fruits, renown'd by fame)
But since Italia, from the leader's name;
To that blest shore we steer'd our destin'd way,
When sudden, dire Orion rous'd the sea;
All charg'd with tempests rose the baleful star,
And on our navy pour'd his wat'ry war;
With sweeping whirlwinds cast our vessels wide,
Dash'd on rough rocks, or driving with the tide,
The few sad relics of our navy bore
Their course to this inhospitable shore.
What are the customs of this barbarous place?
What more than savage this inhuman race?
In arms they rise, and drive us from the strand,
From the last verge, and limits of the land.
Know, if divine and human laws you slight,
The gods, the gods will all our wrongs requite;
Vengeance is theirs'; and theirs' to guard his right.
Æneas was our king, of high renown;
Great, good, and brave; and war was all his own.
If still he lives, and breathes this vital air,
Nor we, his friends and subjects, shall despair;
Nor you, great queen, repent, that you employ
Your kind compassion in the cause of Troy.
Besides, on high the Trojan ensigns soar,
And Trojan cities grace Sicilia's shore;
Where great Acestes, of the Dardan strain,
Deriv'd from ancient Teucer, holds his reign.
Permit us, from your woods, new planks and oars
To fell, and bring our vessels on your shores;
That, if our prince and friends return again,
With joy, from Latium, we may plough the main.
But if those hopes are vanish'd quite away,
If lost, and swallow'd in the Libyan sea,
You lie, great guardian of the Trojan state,
And young Iulus shares his father's fate;
Oh! let us sink Sicilia's shores again,
And fly from hence to good Acestes' reign."
He spoke: a loud assent ran murmuring through the train.

Thus then, in short, the gracious queen replies,
While on the ground she fix'd her modest eyes:
"Trojans, be bold; against my will, my fate,
A throne unsettled, and an infant state,
Bid me defend my realms with all my pow'rs,
And guard with these severities my shores.
Lives there a stranger to the Trojan name,
Their valour, arms, and chiefs of mighty fame?
We know the war that set the world on fire;
Nor are so void of sense the sons of Tyre:

For here his beams indulgent Phœbus sheds,
 And rolls his flaming chariot o'er our heads.
 Seek you, my friends, the blest Saturnian plains,
 Or fair Trinacria, where Acestes reigns?
 With aids supply'd, and furnish'd from my stores,
 Safe will I send you from the Libyan shores.
 Or would you stay to raise this growing town?
 Fix here your seat; and Carthage is your own.
 Haste, draw your ships to shore; to me the same,
 Your Troy and Tyre shall differ but in name.
 And oh! that great Æneas had been tost,
 By the same storm, on the same friendly coast!
 But I will send, my borders to explore,
 And trace the windings of the mazy shore.
 Perchance, already thrown on these abodes,
 He roams the towns, or wanders thro' the woods."
 Rais'd in their hopes the friend and hero stood;
 And long'd to break, transported, from the cloud.
 "Oh! goddess-born!" cry'd brave Achates, "say,
 What are your thoughts, and why this long delay?
 All safe you see; your friends and fleet restor'd;
 One (whom we saw) the whirling gulf devour'd.
 Lo! with the rest your mother's words agree,
 All but Orontes 'scap'd the raging sea."

Swift as he spoke, the vapours break away,
 Dissolve in ether, and refine to day.
 Radiant, in open view, Æneas stood,
 In form and looks, majestic as a god.
 Flush'd with the bloom of youth, his features shine,
 His hair in ringlets waves with grace divine.
 The queen of love the glance divine supplies,
 And breathes immortal spirit in his eyes.
 Like Parian marble beautiful to behold,
 Or silver's milder gleam in burnish'd gold,
 Or polish'd iv'ry, shone the godlike man:
 All stood surpris'd; and thus the prince began:
 "Æneas, whom you seek, you here survey;
 Escap'd the tempest of the Libyan sea,
 O Dido, gracious queen, who make alone
 The woes, and cause, of wretched Troy your own;
 And shelter in your walls, with pious care,
 Her sons, the relics of the Grecian war;
 Who all the forms of misery have bore,
 Storms on the sea, and dangers on the shore;
 Nor we, nor all the Dardan nation, hurl'd
 Wide o'er the globe, and scatter'd round the world,
 But the good gods, with blessings, shall repay
 Your bounteous deeds, the gods and only they;
 (If pious acts, if justice they regard)
 And your clear conscience stands its own reward.
 How blest this age, that has such virtue seen!
 How blest the parents of so great a queen!
 While to the sea the rivers roll, and shades
 With awful pomp surround the mountain heads;
 While ether shines, with golden planets grac'd;
 So long your honour, name, and praise, shall last:
 Whatever realm my fortune has assign'd,
 Still will I bear your image in my mind."

This said, the pious chief of Troy extends
 His hands around, and hails his joyful friends:
 His left Sergestus grasp'd with vast delight,
 To great Ilioneus he gave the right.
 Cloanthus, Gyas, and the Dardan train,
 All, in their turns, embrac'd the prince again.
 Charm'd with his presence, Dido gaz'd him o'er,
 Admir'd his fortune much, his person more.
 "What fate, O goddess-born," she said, "has tost
 So brave a hero on this barbarous coast?
 Are you Æneas, who in Ida's grove
 Sprung from Anchises and the queen of love

By Simois' streams? and now I call to mind,
 When Teucer left his native shores behind;
 The banish'd prince to Sidon came, to gain
 Great Belus' aid, to fix him in his reign;
 Then the rich Cyprian isle, my warlike sire
 Subdu'd, and ravag'd wide with sword and fire.
 From him I learnt the Grecian kings of fame,
 The fall of Iliou, and your glorious name:
 He on your valour, though a foe, with joy
 Would dwell, and proudly trace his birth from Troy.

Come to my palace then, my royal guest,
 And, with your friends, indulge the genial feast.
 My wand'rings and my fate resembling yours,
 At length I settled on these Libyan shores;
 And, touch'd with miseries myself have known,
 I view, with pity, woes so like my own."

She spoke, then leads him to her proud abodes,
 Ordains a feast, and offerings to the gods.
 Twice fifty bleating lambs and ewes she sends,
 And twice ten brawny oxen to his friends:
 A hundred bristly boars, and monstrous swine;
 With Bacchus' gifts, a store of generous wine.
 The inner rooms in regal pomp display'd,
 The splendid feasts in ample halls are made;
 Where, labour'd o'er with art, rich carpets lie,
 That glow refulgent with the purple dye.
 The boards are pill'd with plate of curious mould;
 And their forefathers' deeds, in times of old,
 Blaz'd round the bowls, and charg'd the rising gold.

No more the prince his eager love suppress'd,
 All the fond parent struggled in his breast.
 He sends Achates to inform his son,
 And guide the young Ascanius to the town;
 (On his Ascanius turn his fear and joy,
 The father's cares are center'd in the boy);
 To bring rich presents to the queen of Tyre,
 And relics, rescu'd from the Trojan fire.
 A mantle wrought with saffron foliage round;
 And a stiff robe with golden figures crown'd;
 Fair Helen's dress, when, fir'd with lawless joy,
 She left her native walls to ruin Troy,
 (Her mother's present in the bridal hour);
 With gold a shining sceptre studded o'er,
 That wont Ilione's fair hand to grace,
 The eldest nymph of Priam's beauteous race;
 Her necklace, strung with pearls; her crown, that glows

Instarr'd with gems and gold in double rows.
 To bring the splendid gifts without delay,
 Swift to the fleet, Achates bends his way.

But beauteous Venus in her breast design'd
 New wiles, and plann'd new counsels in her mind,
 That winged Cupid to the court should come
 Like sweet Ascanius, in Ascanius' room;
 With the rich gifts the Tyrian queen inspire,
 And kindle in her veins the raging fire.
 Her dread of Juno's arts, who guards the place,
 Her just suspicions of the treach'rous race,
 Break, each revolving night, her golden rest;
 And thus the suppliant queen the god address'd:
 "Oh son! my strength! supreme in Heav'n above!

Whose arrows triumph o'er the bolts of Jove:
 To thee I fly, thy succour to implore,
 Court thy protection, and thy pow'r adore.
 To tell how Juno's restless rage has tost
 Your brother round the seas, and ev'ry coast,
 Is but to mention what too well you know,
 Who sighted my sighs, and wept a mother's woe.

Him, in her own town, the Tyrian queen detains,
 With soft seducements, from the Latian plains,
 But much I fear that hospitable place,
 Where Juno reigns the guardian of the race:
 And lest this fair occasion she improve,
 Know, I design to fire the queen with love;
 A love, beyond the cure of pow'r's divine;
 A love as strong, and violent as mine.
 But how the proud Phœnician to surprise
 With such a passion, hear what I advise.
 The royal youth, Ascanius, from the port,
 Hastes, by his father's summons, to the court;
 With costly presents charg'd he takes his way,
 Sav'd from the Trojan flames, and stormy sea;
 But to prevent suspicion, will I steep
 His temples in the dew's of balmy sleep,
 Then to Cythera's sacred seats remove,
 Or softly lay him in th' Idalian grove.
 This one revolving night, thyself a boy,
 Wear thou the features of the youth of Troy;
 And when the queen, transported with thy charms,
 Amidst the feast, shall strain thee in her arms,
 The gentle poison by degrees inspire
 Through all her breast; then fan the rising fire,
 And kindle all her soul." The mother said,
 With joy the god her soft commands obey'd.
 Aside his quiver, and his wings he flung,
 And, like the boy Iulus, tript along."

Meantime the goddess on Ascanius throwa
 A balmy slumber and a sweet repose;
 Lull'd in her lap to rest, the queen of love
 Convey'd him to the high Idalian grove.
 There on a flow'ry bed her charge she laid,
 And, breathing round him, rose the fragrant shade.

Now Cupid, pleas'd his orders to obey,
 Brought the rich gifts; Achates led the way.
 He came, and found on costly carpets spread
 The queen majestic, midst her golden bed.
 The great Æneas and the Trojans lie
 On pompous couches stain'd with Tyrian dye:
 Soft towels for their hands th' attendants bring,
 And limpid water from the crystal spring.
 They wash; the menial train the tables spread;
 And heap in glitt'ring canisters the bread.
 To dress the feast, full fifty handmaids join,
 And burn rich incense to the pow'r's divine;
 A hundred boys and virgins stood around,
 The banquet_marshall'd, and the goblet crown'd.
 To fill th' embroider'd beds the Tyrians come
 Rank behind rank; and crowd the regal room.
 The guests the gorgeous gifts and boy admire,
 His voice, and looks, that glow with youthful fire;

The veil and foliage wond'ring they behold,
 And the rich robe that flam'd with figur'd gold:
 But chief the queen, the boy and presents move,
 The queen, already doom'd to fatal love.
 Insatiate in her joy, she sat amaz'd,
 Gaz'd on his face, and kindled as she gaz'd.
 First, his dissembled father he caress'd,
 Hung round his neck, and play'd upon his breast;
 Next to the queen's embraces he withdrew;
 She look'd, and sent her soul at ev'ry view:
 Then took him on her lap, devour'd his charms;
 Nor knew poor Dido, blind to future harms,
 How great a god she fondl'd in her arms.
 But he, now mindful of his mother, stole
 By slow degrees Sichæus from her soul;
 Her soul, rekindling, in her husband's stead,
 Admits the prince; the living for the dead.

Soon as the banquet paus'd, to raise their souls
 With sparkling wine they crown the mazy bowls.
 Through the wide hall the rolling echo bounds,
 The palace rings, the vaulted dome resounds.
 The blazing torches, and the lamps display,
 From golden roofs, an artificial day.
 Now Dido crowns the bowl of state with wine,
 J'the bowl of Belus, and the regal line.
 Her hands aloft the shining goblet hold, [gold.
 Pond'rous with gems, and rough with sculptur'd
 When silence was proclaim'd, the royal fair
 Thus to the gods address'd her fervent pray'r:

"Almighty Jove! who plead'st the stranger's
 Great guardian god of hospitable laws! [cause;
 Oh! grant this day to circle still with joy,
 Through late posterity, to Tyre and Troy.
 Be thou, O Bacchus! god of mirth, a guest;
 And thou, O Juno! grace the genial feast.
 And thou, my lords of Tyre, your fears remove,
 And show your guests benevolence and love."
 She said, and on the board, in open view,
 The first libation to the gods she threw:
 Then sipp'd the wine, and gave to Bitias' hand:
 He rose, obedient to the queen's command;
 At once the thirsty Trojan swill'd the whole,
 Sunk the full gold, and drain'd the foaming bowl.
 Then thro' the peers, with sparkling nectar crown'd,
 The goblet circles, and the health goes round.
 With curling tresses grac'd, and rich attire,
 Iopas stands, and sweeps the golden lyre;
 The truths, which ancient Atlas taught, he sings,
 And Nature's secrets, on the sounding strings.
 Why Cynthia changes; why the Sun retires,
 Shorn of his radiant beams, and genial fires;
 From what originals, and causes, came
 Mankind and beasts, the rain, and rising flame;
 Arcturus, dreadful with his stormy star;
 The wat'ry Hyads, and the northern Car;
 Why suns in summer the slow night detain,
 And rush so swift in winter to the main.
 With shouts the Tyrians praise the song divine,
 And in the loud applause the Trojans join.
 The queen, in various talk, prolongs the hours,
 Drinks deep of love, and ev'ry word devours;
 This moment longs of Hector to inquire,
 The next of Priam, his unhappy sire;
 What arms adorn'd Aurora's glorious son;
 How high, above his boats, Achilles shone;
 How brave Tydides thunder'd on his car;
 How his fierce coursers swept the ranks of war.
 "Nay, but at large, my godlike guest, relate
 The Grecian wiles," she said, "and Ilium's fate;
 How far your course around the globe extends,
 And what the woes and fortunes of your friends:
 For, since you wander'd every shore and sea,
 Have sev'n revolving summers roll'd away."

 VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

 BOOK II.

ARGUMENT.

Æneas relates how the city of Troy was taken, after a ten years' siege, by the treachery of Sinon, and the stratagem of a wooden horse. He declares the first resolution he had taken not to survive the ruins of his country, and the various adventures he met with in the defence of it: at last, having been before advised by Hector's ghost, and now by the appearance of his mother Venus, he is prevailed upon to leave the town, and settle his household gods in another country. In order to this he carries off his father on his shoulders, and leads his little son by the hand, his wife following him behind. When he comes to the place appointed for the general rendezvous, he finds a great confluence of people, but misses his wife, whose ghost afterwards appears to him, and tells him the land which was designed for him.

ALL gaz'd in silence, with an eager look,
Then from the golden couch the hero spoke:
" Ah mighty queen! you urge me to disclose,
And feel, once more, unutterable woes;
How vengeful Greece with victory was crown'd,
And Troy's fair empire humbled to the ground;
Those direful scenes I saw on Phrygia's shore,
Those wars in which so large a part I bore,
The fiercest Argive would with tears bewail,
And stern Ulysses tremble at the tale:
And lo! the night precipitates away;
The stars, grown dim before the dawning day,
Call to repose; but since you long to know,
And curious listen to the story'd woe;
Tho' my shock'd soul recoils, my tongue shall tell,
But with a bleeding heart, how Ilium fell.

" The Grecian kings, (for many a rolling year, Repell'd by fate, and harass'd by the war)
By Pallas' aid, of season'd fir compose
A steed, that tow'ring like a mountain rose:
This they pretend their common vow, to gain
A safe return, and measure back the main:
Such the report; but guileful Argos hides
Her bravest heroes in the monster's sides;
Deep, deep within, they throng'd the dreadful gloom,

And half a host lay ambush'd in the womb.

" An isle, in ancient times renown'd by fame,
Lies full in view, and Tenedos the name;
Or ce blest with wealth, while Priam held the sway,
But now a broken, rough, and dang'rous bay:
Thither their unsuspected course they bore,
And hid their hosts within the winding shore.
We deem'd them sail'd for Greece; transported
Forgot her woes, and gave a loose to joy; [Troy
Threw wide her gates, and pour'd forth all her train,

To view th' abandon'd camp, and empty plain.
Here the Dolopian troops their station held;
There proud Achilles' tent o'erlook'd the field;
Here rang'd the thousand vessels stood, and there
In conflicts join'd the furious sons of war.
Some view the gift of Pallas with surprise,
The fatal monster, and its wondrous size,
And first Thymætes mov'd the crowd to lead
And lodge within the tower the lofty steed;
Or, with design, his country to destroy,
Or fate determin'd now the fall of Troy.
But hoary Capys, and the wise, require
To plunge the treach'rous gift of Greece in fire,
Or overwhelm the mighty monster in the tides,
Or bore the ribs, and search the cavern'd sides,

Their own wild will the noisy crowds obey,
And vote, as partial fancy points the way;
Till bold Laocoon, with a mighty train,
From the high tower rush'd furious to the plain;
And sent his voice from far, with rage inspir'd—
' What madness, Trojans, has your bosoms fir'd?

Think you the Greeks are sail'd before the wind?
Think you these presents safe, they leave behind?
And is Ulysses banish'd from your mind?
Or this prodigious fabric must enclose,
Deep in its darksome womb, our ambush'd foes;
Or 'tis some engine, rais'd to batter down
The tow'rs of Ilium, or command the town;
Ah! trust not Greece, nor touch her gifts abhorr'd:
Her gifts are more destructive than her sword.'

" Swift as the word, his pond'rous lance he threw;
Against the sides the furious javelin flew,
Through the wide womb a spacious passage found,
And shook with long vibrations in the wound.
The monster groans, and shakes the distant shore;
And, round his caverns roll'd, the deep'ning thunders roar.

Then, had not partial fate conspir'd to blind,
With more than madness, ev'ry Trojan mind,
The crowd the treach'rous ambush had explor'd,
And not a Greek had scap'd the vengeful sword;
Old Priam still his empire would enjoy,
And still thy tow'rs had stood, majestic Troy!

" Meantime, before the king, the Dardan swains,
With shouts triumphant, brought a youth in chains,
A willing captive to the Trojan hands,
To open Ilium to the Grecian bands;
Bold and determin'd either fate to try;
Resolv'd to circumvent, or fix'd to die.
The troops tumultuous gather round the foe,
To see the captive, and insult his woe.

Now hear the falsehoods of the Grecian train;
All, all in one; a nation in a man,
For while confounded and disarm'd he stands,
And trembling views around the Phrygian bands,
' Alas! what hospitable land,' (he cry'd)
' Or oh! what seas a wand'ring wretch will hide?
Not only banish'd from the Grecian state;
But Troy, avenging Troy, demands my fate.'

" His melting tears, and moving sighs control
Our rising rage, and soften ev'ry soul.
We bid him tell his race, and long to know
The fate and tidings of a captive foe.

At length, encourag'd thus, the youth reply'd,
And laid his well-dissembled fears aside.

" All, all, with truth, great monarch, I confess,
And first I own my birth deriv'd from Greece;
Wretch as he is, yet Sinon can defy
The frowns of fortune, and disdain a lie.
You know, perchance, great Palamedes' name,
Through many a distant realm renown'd by fame;
Condemn'd, tho' guiltless, when he mov'd for peace,

Condemn'd for treason by the voice of Greece.
Though false the charge, the glorious hero bled,
But now the Greeks deplore the warrior dead.
Me, yet a youth, my father sent to share
With him, my kinsman, in the toils of war.
Long as that hero stood secure from fate,
Long as his counsels propp'd the Grecian state,
Ev'n I could boast an honourable name,
And claim some title to a share of fame:
But when the prince, (a well-known truth I tell)
By dire Ulysses' arts and envy fell;

Soon as he ceas'd to breathe this vital air,
I dragg'd my days in darkness and despair.
And, if kind Heav'n should give me back once more
Safe and triumphant to my native shore,
For innocence condemn'd, revenge I vow'd,
Mad as I was, and spoke my rage aloud.
This mov'd Ulysses' hate, and hence arose
My past misfortunes, and my present woes.
Eager he sought the means, and watch'd the time
To charge me too with some pretended crime.
For conscious of this guilt, my death he vow'd,
And with dark hints amus'd the list'ning crowd.
At length with Calchas he concert's the scheme—
But why, why dwell I on this hateful theme?
Or why detain you with a tale of woe?
Since you determine ev'ry Greek, a foe.
Strike, strike; th' Atrides will my death enjoy,
And dire Ulysses thank the sword of Troy?

“ Now blind to Grecian frauds, we burn to know
With fond desire the causes of his woe;
Who thus, still trembling as he stood, and pale,
Pursu'd the moving melancholy tale.
“ ‘ Of' had our hosts determin'd to employ
Their sails for Greece, and leave untaken Troy,
Urg'd to a shameful fight, from deep despair,
And the long labours of a ten years' war.
And oh! that they had sail'd!—as off' the force
Of southern winds, and tempests stopp'd their course. [loud,

But since this steed was rais'd; straight, bellowing
Deep thunders roar'd, and burst from every cloud.
We saw Eurypilus to Phoebus' shrine,
Who brought this sentence from the voice divine;
—When first ye sail'd for Troy, ye calm'd the main
With blood, ye Grecians, and a virgin slain;
And ere you measure back the foamy flood,
Know, you must buy a safe return with blood.—
These awful words to ev'ry Greek impart
Surprise and dread, and chill the bravest heart;
To the dire stroke each thought himself decreed,
Himself the victim that for Greece should bleed.
Ulysses then, importunate and loud,
Produc'd sage Calchas to the trembling crowd,
Bade him the secret will of Heav'n relate—
And now my friends could prophesy my fate;
And base Ulysses' wicked arts, they said,
Were levell'd all at my devoted head.
Ten days the prophet from the crowd retir'd,
Nor mark'd the victim that the gods requir'd.
So long besieg'd by Ithacus he stood,
And seem'd reluctant to the voice of blood;
At length he spoke, and, as the scheme was laid,
Doom'd to the slaughter my predestin'd head,
All prais'd the sentence, and were pleas'd to see
The fate that threaten'd all, confin'd to me.
And now the dire tremendous day was come,
When all prepar'd to solemnize my doom:
The salted barley on my front was spread,
The sacred fillets bound my destin'd head:
I fled th' appointed slaughter, I confess,
And, till our troops should hoist their sails for Greece,

Swift to a slimy lake I took my flight,
Lay wrapt in flags, and cover'd by the night.
And now these eyes shall view my native shore,
My dear, dear children, and my sire no more;
Whom haply Greece to slaughter has decreed,
And for my fatal flight condemn'd to bleed,
But thee, O gracious monarch, I implore
By ev'ry god, by ev'ry sacred pow'r,

Who conscious of the facts my lips relate,
With truth inspire me to declare my fate;
By all the solemn sancti as that can bind
In holy ties the faith of human kind;
Have mercy, mercy, on a guiltless foe,
O'erwhelm'd and sunk with such a weight of woe!

“ His life we gave him, and dispell'd his fears,
Touch'd with his moving eloquence of tears;
And, melting first, the good old king commands
To free the captive, and to loose his hands.
Then with soft accents, and a pleasing look,
Mild and benevolent the monarch spoke.

“ Henceforth let Greece no more thy thoughts employ,

But live a subject and a son of Troy;
With truth and strict sincerity proceed,
Say, to what end they fram'd this monstrous steed;
Who was its author, what his aim, declare;
Some solemn vow? or engine of the war?

“ Skill'd in the frauds of Greece, the captive rears
His hands unshackled to the golden stars;
You, ye eternal splendours! he exclaims,
“ And you, divine inviolable flames,
Ye fatal swords and altars, which I fled,
Ye wreaths, that circled this devoted head;
All, all, attest! that justly I release
My sworn allegiance to the laws of Greece,
Renounce my country, hate her sons, and lay
Their inmost counsels open to the day.

And thou, O Troy, by Sinon snatch'd from fate,
Spare, spare the wretch, who saves the Phrygian
Greece on Minerva's aid rely'd alone, [state

Since first the labours of the war begun.
But from that execrable point of time,
When Ithacus, the first in ev'ry crime,
With Tydeus' impious son, the guards had slain,
And brought her image from the Phrygian fane,
Distain'd her sacred wreaths with murderous hands,
Still red and reeking from the slaughter'd bands;
Then ceas'd the triumphs of the Grecian train,
And their full tide of conquest sunk again;
Their strength decay'd, and many a dreadful sign
To trembling Greece proclaim'd the wrath divine.
Scarce to the camp the sacred image came,
When from her eyes she flash'd a living flame;
A briny sweat bedew'd her limbs around,
And thrice she sprung indignat from the ground;
Thrice was she seen with martial rage to wield
Her pond'rous spear, and shake her blazing shield.
With that, sage Calchas mov'd the trembling train
To fly, and measure back the deeps again;
That 'twas not giv'n our armies to destroy
The Phrygian empire, and the tow'rs of Troy,
Till they should bring from Greece those favouring gods, [bloods;

Who smil'd indulgent, when they plough'd the
With more auspicious signs repass the main,
And with new omens take the field again.
Now to their native country they repair,
With gather'd forces to renew the war;
The scheme of Calchas! but their vanish'd host
Will soon return to waste the Phrygian coast.
All Greece, atoning dire Ulysses' deed,
To Pallas' honour rais'd this wond'rous steed;
But Calchas order'd this enormous size,
This monstrous bulk, that heaves into the skies,
Lest Troy should lead it through her opening gate,
And by this new palladium guard her state.
For oh! ye Phrygians, had your rage profan'd
This gift of Pallas with an impious hand,

Some fate (which all ye Pow'rs immortal shed
 With all your vengeance on its author's head!)
 In one prodigious ruin would destroy
 Thy empire, Priam, and the sons of Troy.
 But would you join within your walls to lead
 This pledge of Heav'n, this tutelary steed;
 Then, with her hosts, all Asia shall repair,
 And pour on Pelops' walls a storm of war;
 Then Greece shall bleed, and perish in her turn;
 Her future sons; her nations yet unborn.
 "Thus did the perjurd Sinon's art prevail;
 Too fondly we believ'd the study'd tale;
 And thus was Troy, who bravely could sustain
 Achilles' fury, when he swept the plain,
 A thousand vessels, and a ten years' war,
 Won by a sigh, and vanquish'd by a tear.
 "Here a more dreadful object rose to sight,
 And shook our souls with horror and affright.
 Unblest Laocoön, whom the lets design
 Priest of the year, at Neptune's holy shrine
 Slew on the sands, beside the rolling flood,
 A stately steer, in honour of the god.
 When, horrid to relate! two serpents glide
 And roll incumbent on the glassy tide,
 Advancing to the shore; their spires they raise
 Fold above fold, in many a tow'ring maze,
 Beneath their burnish'd breasts the waters glow,
 Their crimson crests inflame the deeps below;
 O'er the vast flood extended long and wide,
 Their curling backs lay floating on the tide;
 Lash'd to a foam the boiling billows roar,
 And now the dreadful monsters reach'd the shore;
 Their hissing tongues they darted, as they came,
 And their red eye-balls shot a sanguine flame.
 Pale at the sight, we fled in dire dismay;
 Straight to Laocoön they direct their way;
 And first in curling fiery volumes bound
 His two young sons, and wrapt them round and
 round,
 Devour'd the children in the father's view;
 Then on the miserable father flew,
 While to their aid he runs with fruitless haste;
 And all the man in horrid folds embrac'd:
 Twice round his waist, and round his neck they
 Their winding heads, and hiss aloft in air. [rear
 His sacred wreaths the livid poisons stain,
 And, while he labours at the knots in vain,
 Stung to the soul, he bellows with the pain.
 lo, when the axe has glanc'd upon his skull, cracks from the shrine, and roars the wounded
 but each huge serpent now retires again, [bull.
 And flies for shelter to Minerva's fane;
 Her buckler's orb the goddess wide display'd,
 and screen'd her monsters in the dreadful shade.
 "Then, a new fear the trembling crowd possess'd,
 A holy horror pants in every breast;
 All judge Laocoön justly doom'd to bleed,
 Whose guilty spear profan'd the sacred steed,
 We vote to lead him to Minerva's tow'r,
 and supplicate, with vows, th' offended pow'r;
 All to the fatal labour bend their care,
 and level the walls, and lay the bulwarks bare;
 Some round the lofty neck the cables tie,
 one to the feet the rolling wheels apply;
 The tow'ring monster, big with Ilion's doom, founts o'er the wall; an army in the womb;
 around the moving pile the children join a shouts of transport, and in songs divine;
 hey run, they pull the stretching cords with joy,
 and lend their little hands to ruin Troy!

In one loud peal th' enormous horse rolls down,
 And thund'ring gains the center of the town.
 Oh Troy, renown'd in war! oh bright abodes!
 Oh glorious Troy! the labour of the gods!
 Thrice stopp'd unmov'd the monster in the gate,
 And clashing arms thrice warn'd us of our fate;
 But we, by madness blinded and o'ercome,
 Lodge the dire monster in the sacred dome,
 Cassandra too, inspir'd, our fate declares
 (So Phœbus doom'd) to unregarding ears; [waste
 We, thoughtless wretches! deck the shrines, and In sports the day, which Heav'n decreed our last.
 "Now had the Sun roll'd down the beamy light,
 And from the caves of ocean rush'd the night;
 With one black veil her spreading shades suppress'd
 The face of Nature, and the frauds of Greece.
 The Trojans round their walls in silence lay,
 And lost in sleep the labours of the day.
 When lo! their course the Grecian navy bore,
 New-rigg'd and arm'd, and reach'd the well-known
 shore,
 By silent Cynthia's friendly beams convey'd;
 And the proud admiral a flame display'd.
 Then Sinon, favour'd by the partial gods,
 Unlocks the mighty monster's dark abodes;
 His peopled caves pour forth in open air
 The heroes, and the whole imprison'd war.
 Led by the guiding cord, alight with joy
 Th' impatient princes, in the midst of Troy;
 Machaon first, then great Achilles' heir,
 Ulysses, Thoas, Acamas, appear;
 A crowd of chiefs with Menelaus succeed;
 Epeus last, who fram'd the fraudulent steed.
 Straight they invade the city, bury'd deep
 In fumes of wine, and all dissolv'd in sleep;
 They slay the guards, they burst the gates, and Their fellows, conscious to the bold design. [join
 " 'Twas now the time when first kind Heav'n bestows
 On wretched man the blessings of repose;
 When, in my slumbers, Hector seem'd to rise
 A mournful vision! to my closing eyes.
 Such he appear'd, as when Achilles' car
 And fiery coursers whirl'd him through the war;
 Drawn thro' his swelling feet the thongs I view'd,
 His beauteous body black with dust and blood.
 Ye gods! how chang'd from Hector! who with joy
 Return'd in proud Achilles' spoils to Troy;
 Flung at the ships, like Heav'n's almighty sire,
 Flames after flames, and wrapt a sleet in fire.
 Now gash'd with wounds that for his Troy he bore,
 His beard and locks stood stiffen'd with his gore,
 With tears and mournful accents I began,
 And thus bespoke the visionary man! [joy,
 "Say, glorious prince, thy country's hope and
 What cause so long detains thee from thy Troy?
 Say, from what realms, so long desir'd in vain,
 Her Hector comes, to bless her eyes again?
 After such numbers slain, such labours past,
 Thus is our prince! ah! thus return'd at last?
 Why stream these wounds? or who could thus disgrace
 The manly charms of that majestic face?"
 "Nought to these questions vain the shade
 replies,
 But from his bosom draws a length of sighs;
 'Fly, fly, oh! fly the gathering flames; the walls
 Are won by Greece, and glorious Ilion falls;
 Enough to Priam and to Troy before
 Was paid; then strive with destiny no more;

Could any mortal hand prevent our fate,
This hand, and this alone, had sav'd the state.
Troy to thy care commends her wand'ring gods ;
With these pursue thy fortunes o'er the floods
To that proud city, thou shalt raise at last,
Return'd from wand'ring wide the wat'ry waste.
This said, he brought from Vesta's hallow'd quire
The sacred wreaths, and everlasting fire.

" Meantime tumultuous round the walls arise
Shrieks, clamours, shouts, and mingle in the skies.

And (though remote my father's palace stood,
With shades surrounded, and a gloomy wood)
Near, and more near, approach the dire alarms ;
The voice of woe ; the dreadful din of arms.
Rous'd at the deaf'ning peal that roars around,
I mount the dome, and listen to the sound.
Thus o'er the corn, while furious winds conspire,
Rolls on a wide-devouring blaze of fire ;
Or some big torrent, from a mountain's brow,
Bursts, pours, and thunders down the vale below,
O'erwhelms the fields, lays waste the golden grain,
And head'ng sweeps the forests to the main ;
Stun'd at the din, the swain with list'ning ears
From some steep rock the sounding ruin hears.

" Now Hector's warning prov'd too clear and true,

The wiles of Greece appear'd in open view ;
The roaring flames in volumes huge aspire,
And wrap thy dome, Deiphobus, in fire ;
Thine, sage Ucalegon, next strow'd the ground,
And stretch'd a vast unmeasur'd ruin round,
Wide o'er the waves the bright reflection plays ;
The surges redden with the distant blaze.

Then shouts and trumpets swell the dire alarms ;
And, though 'twas vain, I madly flew to arms :
Eager to raise a band of friends, and pour
In one firm body, to defend the tow'r ;
Rage and revenge my kindling bosom fire,
Warm and in arms, to conquer or expire.

But lo ! poor Pantheus, Phoebus' priest appears,
Just scap'd the foe, distracted with his fears,
The sage his vanquish'd gods and relics bore,
And with his trembling grandson sought the shore.

" Say, Pantheus, how the fate of Ilium stands ?
Say, if a tow'r remains in Trojan hands ?"
He thus with groans ;—" Our last sad hour is come,
Our certain, fixt, inevitable doom.

Troy once was great, but oh ! the scene is o'er,
Her glory vanquish'd ! and her name no more !
For partial Jove transfers her past renown
To Greece, who triumphs in her burning town ;
And the huge monster from his op'ning side
Pours forth her warriors in an endless tide ;
With joy proud Sinon sees the flames aspire,
Heaps blaze on blaze, and mingles fire with fire ;
Here thousands pouring through the gates appear :
Far more than proud Mycenæ sent to war.
Some seize the passes ; groves of spears arise,
That thirst for blood, and flash against the skies.
The guards but just maintain a feeble fight
With their fierce foes, amidst the gloomy night."

" While Pantheus' words, while ev'ry god inspires,
I flew to arms ; and rush'd amidst the fires,
Where the loud furies call, where shouts and cries
Ring round the walls, and i thunder in the skies.
Now faithful Ripheus on my side appears,
With hoary Iphitus, advanc'd in years ;
And valiant Hypæzis and Dymas, known
By the pale splendours of the glimm'ring moon ;

With these Choroebus, Mygdon's generous boy,
Who came, ill-fated, to the wars of Troy ;
Fir'd with the fair Cassandra's blooming charms,
To aid her sire with unavailing arms ;

Ah ! brave unhappy youth !—he would not hear
His bride inspir'd, who warn'd him from the war !
" These when I saw, with fierce collected might,
Breathing revenge, and crowding to the fight ;

With warmth I thus address'd the gen'rous train :
' Ye bold, brave youths, but bold and brave in vain !

If by your dauntless souls impell'd, you dare
With me to try th' extremities of war ;
You see our hopeless state ; how every god,
Who guarded Troy, has left his old abode ;
You aid a town already sunk in fire ;
Fly, fly to arms, and gloriously expire ;
Let all rush on, and, vanquish'd as we are,
Catch one last beam of safety from despair."
Thus while my words inflame the list'ning crew,
With rage redoubled to the flight they flew
As hungry wolves, while clouds involve the day,
Rush from their dens ; and, prowling wide for prey,
Howl to the tempest, while the savage brood,
Stretch'd in the cavern, pant and thirst for blood ;
So through the town, determin'd to expire,
Through the thick storm of darts, and smoke and fire,
Wrapt and surrounded with the shades of night,
We rush'd to certain death, and mingled in the fight.

" What tongue the dreadful slaughter could disclose ?

Or oh ! what tears could answer half our woe ?
The glorious empress of the nations round,
Majestic Troy lay level'd with the ground ;
Her murder'd natives crowded her abodes,
Her streets, her domes, the temples of her gods
Nor Ilium bled alone : her turn succeeds.
And then she conquers, and proud Argos bleeds ;
Death in a thousand forms destructive frown'd,
And woe, despair, and horror rag'd around.

" And first Androgeos, whom a train attends,
With style familiar hail'd us as his friends ;
' Haste, brave associates, haste ; what dull delay
Detains you here, while others seize the prey ?
In flames your friends have laid all Ilium waste,
And you come lagging from your ships the last."
Thus he ; but soon from our reply he knows
His fatal error, compass'd round with foes ;
Restrains his tongue, and, meditating flight,
Stops short ;—and startles at the dreadful sight.
So the pale swain, who treads upon a snake
Unseen, and lurking in the gloomy brake,
Soon as his swelling spires in circles play,
Starts back, and shoots precipitate away.
Fierce we rush in, the heedless foes surround,
And lay the wretches breathless on the ground :
New to the place, with sudden terror wild ;
And thus at first our flatt'ring fortune smil'd.
Then, by his courage and success inspir'd,
His warlike train the brave Choroebus fir'd ;
' Lo ! friends, the road of safety you survey ;
Come, follow fortune, where she points the way ;
Let each in Argive arms his limbs disguise,
And wield the bucklers, that the foe supplies ;
For if success an enemy attends,
Who asks, if fraud or valour gain'd his ends ?"
This said, Androgeos' crested helm he wore ;
Then, on his arm, the ponderous buckler bore
With beauteous figures grac'd, and warlike pride ;
The starry sword hung glitt'ring at his side.

Like him, bold Rhipheus, Dymas, and the rest,
 Their manly limbs in hostile armour drest.
 With gods averse, we follow to the fight,
 And, undistinguish'd in the shades of night,
 Mix with the foes, employ the murdering steel,
 And plunge whole squadrons to the depths of Hell.
 Some, wild with fear, precipitate retreat,
 Fly to the shore, and shelter in the fleet;
 Some climb the monstrous horse, a frighted train,
 And there lie trembling in the sides again.
 But, Heav'n against us, all attempts must fail,
 All hopes are vain, nor courage can prevail;
 For lo! Cassandra, lo! the royal fair
 From Pallas' shrine with loose dishevell'd hair
 Dragg'd by the shouting victors;—to the skies
 She rais'd, but rais'd in vain, her glowing eyes;
 Her eyes—she could no more—the Grecian bands
 Had rudely manacled her tender hands;
 Choroebus could not bear that scene of woes,
 But, fir'd with fury, flew amidst the foes;
 As swift we follow to redeem the fair,
 Rush to his aid, and thicken to the war.
 Here from the temple on our troop descends
 A storm of javelins from our Trojan friends,
 Who from our arms and helmets deem'd us foes;
 And hence a dreadful scene of slaughter rose.
 Then all the Greeks our slender band invade,
 And pour enrag'd to seize the rescu'd maid;
 Ajax with all the bold Dolopians came,
 And both the kings of Atreus' royal name.
 So when the winds in airy conflict rise,
 Here South and West charge dreadful in the skies:
 There louder Eurus, to the battle borne,
 Mounts the swift coursers of the purple morn;
 Beneath the whirlwind roar the bending woods;
 With his huge trident Neptune strikes the floods:
 Foams, storms, and, tempesting the deeps around,
 Bares the broad bosom of the dark profound.
 Those two, we chas'd by night, a scatter'd train,
 Now boldly rally, and appear again.
 To them our Argive helms and arms are known,
 Our voices and language diff'ring from their own.
 We yield to numbers. By Peneleus' steel
 First at Minerva's shrine Choroebus fell.
 Next Rhipheus bled, the justest far of all
 The sons of Troy; yet Heav'n permits his fall.
 The like sad fate brave Hypanis attends,
 And hapless Dymas, slaughter'd by their friends.
 Nor thee, sage Panthous! Phobus' wreaths could
 Nor all thy shining virtues, from the grave. [save,
 Ye dear, dear ruins! and thou, Troy! declare
 If once I trembled or declin'd the war:
 Midst flames and foes a glorious death I sought,
 And well deserv'd the death for which I fought.
 Thence we retreat, our brave associates gone,
 Pelias and Iphitus were left alone;
 This slow with age and bending to the ground,
 And that more tardy from Ulysses' wound.
 Now from the palace-walls tumultuous ring
 The shouts, and call us to defend the king;
 There we beheld the rage of fight, and there
 The throne of death, and centre of the war;
 As Troy, all Troy beside had slept in peace,
 Nor stain'd by slaughter, nor alarm'd by Greece.
 Shield lock'd in shield, advance the Grecian pow'rs,
 To burst the gates, and storm the regal tow'rs;
 Fly up the steep ascent where danger calls,
 And fix their scaling engines in the walls.
 High in the left they grasp'd the feroceful shield,
 Fierce in the right the rocky ramparts held;

Roofs, tow'rs, and battlements the Trojans throw,
 A pile of ruins! on the Greeks below;
 Catch for defence the weapons of despair,
 In these the dire extremes of death and war.
 Now on their heads the pond'rous beams are roll'd,
 By Troy's first monarchs crusted round with gold.
 Here thronging troops with glitt'ring fashions stand,
 To guard the portals, and the door command,
 Straight to the palace, fir'd with hopes, I go
 To aid the vanquish'd, and repel the foe.
 A secret portico contriv'd behind,
 Great Hector's mansion to the palace join'd,
 By which his hapless princess oft would bring
 Her royal infant to the good old king.
 This way the topmost battlements I gain,
 Whence the tir'd Trojans threw their darts in vain,
 Rais'd on a lofty point, a turret rears
 Her stately head unrival'd to the stars;
 From hence we wont all Ilion to survey,
 The fields, the camp, the fleets, and rolling sea.
 With steel the yielding timbers we assail'd,
 Where loose the huge disjointed structure fall'd;
 Then, tugg'd convulsive from the shatter'd walls,
 We push the pile: the pond'rous ruin falls
 Tumbling in many a whirl, with thund'ring sound,
 Down headlong on the foes, and smokes along the
 ground.
 But crowds on crowds the bury'd troops supply;
 And in a storm the beams and rocky fragments fly.
 " Full in the portal rag'd with loud alarms
 Brave Pyrrhus, glitt'ring in his brazen arms.
 So from his den, the winter slept away,
 Shoots forth the burnish'd snake in open day;
 Who, fed with every poison of the plain,
 Sheds his old spoils, and shines in youth again;
 Proud of his golden scales rolls tow'ring on,
 And darts his forked sting, and glitters on the Sun.
 " To him the mighty Periphas succeeds,
 And the bold chief who drove his father's steeds;
 With these the Scyrian bands advance, and aim
 Full at the battlements the missile flame.
 Fierce Pyrrhus in the front with forceful sway
 Ply'd the huge axe, and hew'd the beams away;
 The solid timbers from the portal tore,
 And rent from ev'ry hinge the brazen door.
 At last the chief a mighty op'ning made, [play'd
 And, all th' imperial dome, in all her length dis-
 The sacred rooms of Troy's first monarchs lie,
 With Priam's pomp, profan'd by every eye;
 In arms the entries to the breach repair,
 And stand embolden'd, to repel the war.
 " Now far within, the regal rooms disclose,
 Loud and more loud, a direful scene of woe;
 The roof resounds with female shrieks and cries,
 And the shrill echo strikes the distant skies.
 The trembling matrons fly from place to place,
 And kiss the pillars with a last embrace;
 Bold Pyrrhus storms with all his father's fire;
 The barriers burst; the vanquish'd guards retire;
 The shatter'd doors the thund'ring engines ply;
 The bolts leap back; the sounding hinges fly;
 The war breaks in; loud shouts the hostile train;
 The gates are storm'd; the foremost soldiers slain;
 Through the wide courts the crowding Argives roam,
 And swarm triumphant round the regal dome.
 Not half so fierce the foamy deluge bounds,
 And bursts resistless o'er the level'd mounds;
 ' Automedon.

Pours down the vale, and roaring o'er the plain,
Sweeps herds, and hinds, and houses to the main.

"These eyes within the gate th' Atrideæ view'd,
And furious Pyrrhus cover'd o'er with blood;
Sad they beheld, amid the mournful scene,
The hundred daughters with the mother queen,
And Priam's self polluting with his gore
Those flames, he hallow'd at the shrine before.
The fifty bridal rooms, a work divine!
(Such were his hopes of a long regal line)
Rich in barbaric gold, with trophies crown'd,
Sunk with their proud support of pillars round;
And, where the flames retire, the foes possess the
ground.

"And now, great queen, you haply long to know
The fate of Priam in this general woe.
When with sad eyes the venerable sire
Beheld his Ilium sunk in hostile fire;
His palace storm'd, the lofty gates laid low,
His rich pavillions crowded with the foe;
In arms, long since disus'd, the hoary sage
Loads each stiff languid limb, that shook with age;
Girds on an unperforming sword in vain,
And runs on death amidst the hostile train.
Within the courts, beneath the naked sky,
An altar rose; an aged laurel by;
That o'er the hearth and household-gods display'd
A solemn gloom, a deep majestic shade:
Hither, like doves, who close-embodiy'd fly
From some dark tempest black'ning in the sky,
The queen for refuge with her daughters ran,
Clung and embrac'd their images in vain.
But when in cumbersome arms the king she spy'd,
'Alas! my poor unhappy lord!' she cry'd,
'What more than madness, 'midst these dire
alarms,

Mov'd thee to load thy helpless age with arms?
No aid like thine this dreadful hour demands,
But aska far other strength, far other hands.
No! could my own dear Hector arm again,
My own dear Hector now would arm in vain.
Come to these altars, here we all shall have
One common refuge, or one common grave.'
This said, her aged lord the queen embrac'd,
And on the sacred seat the monarch plac'd.

"When lo! Polites, one of Priam's sons, [runs.
Through darts and foes, from slaughter'ring Pyrrhus
Wounded he traverses the cloyster'd dome,
Darts through the courts, and shoots from room to room;

Close, close behind, pursu'd the furious foe,
Just grasp'd the youth, and aim'd the fatal blow;
Soon as within his parents' sight he pass'd,
Pierc'd by the pointed death, he breath'd his last:
He fell; a purple stream the pavement dy'd,
The soul comes gushing in the crimson tide.
The king, that scene impatient to survey,
Though death surrounds him, gives his fury way;
'And oh! may ev'ry violated god,
Barbarian! thank thee for this deed of blood;
(If gods there are, such actions to regard,)
Oh! may they give thy guilt the full reward;
Guilt, that a father's sacred eyes defil'd
With blood, the blood of his dear murder'd child!
Unlike thy sire, Achilles the divine!
(But sure Achilles was no sire of thine!)
Foe as I was, the hero deign'd to hear [pray'r;
The guest's, the suppliant's, king's, and father's
To funeral rites restor'd my Hector slain,
And safe dismiss'd me to my realms again.'

This said, his trembling arm essay'd to throw
The dull dead javelin, that scarce reach'd the foe;
The weapon languishingly legg'd along,
And, guiltless, on the buckler faintly rung.
'Thou then be first,' replies the chief, 'to go
With these sad tidings to his ghost below;
Begone—acquaint him with my crimes in Troy,
And tell my sire of his degenerate boy.
Die then,' he said, and dragg'd the monarch on,
Through the warm blood that issu'd from his son,
Stagg'ring and sliding in the slipp'ry gore,
And to the shrine the royal victim bore;
Lock'd in the left he grasps the silver hairs,
High in the right the flaming blade he rears,
Then to the hilt with all his force apply'd,
He plung'd the ruthless falchion in his side.
Such was the fate unhappy Priam found,
Who saw his Troy lie level'd with the ground;
He, who round Asia sent his high commands,
And stretch'd his empire o'er a hundred lands,
Now lies a headless carcass on the shore,
The man, the monarch, and the name no more!
Then, nor till then, I fear'd the furious foe,
Struck with that scene of unexampled woe;
Soon as I saw the murder'd king expire:
His old compeer, my venerable sire,
My palace, son, and consort left behind,
All, all, at once came rushing on my mind.
I gaz'd around, but not a friend was there;
My hapless friends, abandon'd to despair,
Had leap'd down headlong from the lofty spires,
Tir'd with their toils; or plung'd amidst the fires.

"Thus left alone, and wand'ring, I survey
Where trembling Helen close and silent lay
In Vesta's porch; and by the dismal glare
Of rolling flames discern the fatal fair;
The common plague! by Troy and Greece abhor'd!
She fear'd alike the vengeful Trojan sword,
Her injur'd country, and abandon'd lord.
Fast by the shrine I spy'd the lurking dame,
And all my soul was kindled into flame:
My ruin'd country to revenge, I stood
In wrath resolv'd to shed her impious blood.
'Shall she, this guilty fair, return in peace,
A queen, triumphant, through the realms of Greece,

And see, attended by her Phrygian train,
Her home, her parents, spouse, and sons again?
For her curst cause shall raging flames destroy
The stately structures of imperial Troy?
So many slaughters drench the Dardan shore?
And Priam's self lie well'ring in his gore?
No!—she shall die—for though the victor gain
No fame, no triumph for a woman slain;
Yet if by just revenge the traitress bleed,
The world consenting will applaud the deed:
To my own vengeance I devote her head,
And the great spirits of our heroes dead.'

"Thus while I rav'd, I saw my mother rise,
Confess a goddess, to my wand'ring eyes,
In pomp unusual, and divinely bright;
Her beamy glories pierc'd the shades of night;
Such she appear'd, as when in Heav'n's abodes
She shines in all her glories to the gods.
Just rais'd to strike, my hand she gently took,
Then from her rosy lips the goddess spoke. [on?
"What wrath so fierce to vengeance drives thee
Are we no objects of thy care, my son?
Think of Anchises, and his helpless age,
Thy hoary sire expos'd to hostile rage;

Think if thy dear Creusa yet survive,
 Think if thy child, the young Iulus live;
 Whom, ever how'ring round, the Greeks enclose,
 From ev'ry side endanger'd by the foes;
 And, but my care withstood, the ruthless sword
 Long since had slaughter'd, or the flames devour'd.
 Nor beautiful Helen now, nor Paris blame,
 Her guilty charms, or his unhappy flame;
 The gods, my son, th' immortal gods destroy
 This glorious empire, and the tow'rs of Troy.
 Hence then retire, retire without delay,
 Attend thy mother, and her words obey;
 Look up, for lo! I clear thy clouded eye
 From the thick midst of dim mortality;
 Where yon rude piles of shatter'd ramparts rise,
 Stone rent from stone, in dreadful ruin lies, [flies:
 And black with rolling smoke the dusty-whirlwind
 There, Neptune's trident breaks the bulwarks
 down,

There, from her basis heaves the trembling town;
 Heav'n's awful queen, to urge the Trojan fate,
 Here storms tremendous at the Scæan gate:
 Radiant in arms the furious goddess stands,
 And from the navy calls her Argive bands.
 On yon high tow'r the martial maid behold,
 With her dread Gorgon blaze in clouds of gold.
 Great Jove himself the sons of Greece inspires,
 Each arm he strengthens, and each soul he fires.
 Against the Trojans, from the bright abodes,
 See! where the thund'rer calls th' embattled gods.
 Strive then no more with Heav'n;—but oh! retreat,
 Ourselves will guide thee to thy father's seat;
 Ourselves will cover and befriend thy flight.
 She said, and sunk within the shades of night;
 And lo! the gods with dreadful faces frown'd,
 And lower'd, majestically stern, around.
 Then fell proud Ilion's bulwarks, tow'rs, and spires;
 Then Troy, though rais'd by Neptune, sunk in fires.
 So when an aged ash, whose honours rise
 From some steep mountain tow'ring to the skies,
 With many an axe by shouting swains is ply'd,
 Fierce they repeat the strokes from every side;
 The tall tree trembling, as the blows go round,
 Bows the high head, and nods to every wound:
 At last quite vanquish'd, with a dreadful peal,
 In one loud groan rolls crashing down the vale,
 Headlong with half the shatter'd mountain flies,
 And stretch'd out huge in length th' unmeasured ruin lies.

“ Now, by the goddess led, I bend my way,
 Though javelins hiss, and flames around me play;
 With sloping spires the flames obliquely fly,
 The glancing darts turn innocently by.
 Soon as, these various dangers past, I come
 Within my rev'rend father's ancient dome,
 Whom first I sought, to bear his helpless age
 Safe o'er the mountains, far from hostile rage;
 An exil'd life disdaining to enjoy,
 He stands determin'd to expire with Troy:
 Fly you, who health, and youth, and strength maintain,
 You, whose warm blood beats high in every vein;
 For me had Heav'n decreed a longer date.
 Heav'n had preserv'd for me the Dardan state;
 Too much of life already have I known,
 To see my country's fall prevent my own;
 Think then, this aged corse with Ilion fell,
 And take, oh! take your solemn last farewell:
 For death—these hands that office yet can do:
 If not—I'll beg it from the pitying fœs.

VOL. XIX.

At least the soldier for my spoils will come;
 Nor heed I now the honours of a tomb.
 Grown to my friends an useless heavy load,
 Long have I liv'd, abhor'd by every god,
 Since, in his wrath, high Heaven's almighty sire
 Blasted these limbs with his avenging fire.

“ Thus he; and obstinately bent appears:
 The mournful family stand round in tears.
 Myself, my shrieking wife, my weeping son,
 Friends, servants, all, entreat him to be gone,
 Nor to the general ruin add his own;
 Bid him be reconcil'd to life once more;
 Nor urge a fate, that flew too swift before.
 Unmov'd, he still determines to maintain
 His cruel purpose, and we plead in vain.

“ Once more I hurry to the dire alarms,
 To end a miserable life in arms;
 For oh! what measures could I now pursue,
 When death, and only death, was left in view?
 ' To fly the foe, and leave your age alone,
 Could such a sire propose to such a son?
 If 'tis by your's and Heaven's high will decreed,
 That you, and all, with hapless Troy, must bleed:
 If not her least remains you deign to save;
 Behold! the door lies open to the grave.
 Pyrrhus will soon be here, all cover'd o'er
 And red from venerable Priam's gore;
 Who stab'd the son before the father's view,
 Then at the shrine the royal father slew.
 Why, heavenly mother! did thy guardian care
 Snatch me from fires, and shield me in the war?
 Within these walls to see the Grecians roam,
 And purple slaughter stride around the dome;
 To see my murder'd consort, son, and sire,
 Steep'd in each other's blood, on heaps expire!
 Arms! arms! my friends, with speed my arms supply,

'Tis our last hour, and summons us to die;
 My arms!—in vain you hold me,—let me go—
 Give, give me back this moment to the foe.
 'Tis well—we will not tamely perish all.
 But die reveng'd, and triumph in our fall.'

“ Now rushing forth, in radiant arms, I wield
 The sword once more, and gripe the pond'rous
 shield.

When, at the door, my weeping spouse I meet,
 The fair Creusa, who embrac'd my feet,
 And clinging round them, with distraction wild,
 Reach'd to my arms my dear unhappy child:
 And 'Oh!' she cries, 'if bent on death thou run,
 Take, take with thee, thy wretched wife and son;

Or, if our glimmering hope from arms appear,
 Defend these walls, and try thy valour here;
 Ah! who shall guard thy sire, when thou art slain,
 Thy child, or me, thy consort once in vain?
 Thus while she raves, the vaulted dome replics
 To her loud shrieks, and agonizing cries.

“ When lo! a wondrous prodigy appears,
 For while each parent kiss'd the boy with tears,
 Sudden a circling flame was seen to spread
 With beams refulgent round Iulus' head;
 Then on his locks the lambent glory preys,
 And harmless fires around his temples blaze.
 Trembling and pale we quench with busy care
 The sacred fires, and shake his flaming hair.
 But old Anchises lifts his joyful eyes,
 His hands and voice, in transport, to the skies.
 “ ' Almighty Jove! in glory thron'd on high,
 This once regards us with a gracious eye;

If e'er our vows deserv'd thy aid divine,
Vouchsafe thy succour, and confirm thy sign.
Scarce had he spoke, when sudden from the pole,
Full on the left, the happy thunders roll;
A star shot sweeping through the shades of night,
And drew behind a radiant trail of light,
That o'er the palace, gliding from above,
To point our way, descends in Ida's grove;
Then left a long continu'd stream in view,
The track still glittering where the glory flew.
The flame past gleaming with a bluish glare,
And smokes of sulphur fill the tainted air.

" At this convinc'd, arose my reverend sire,
Address'd the gods, and hail'd the sacred fire.
' Proceed, my friends, no longer I delay,
But instant follow where you lead the way.
Ye gods, by these your omens, you ordain
That from the womb of fate shall rise again,
To light and life, a glorious second Troy;
Then save this house, and this auspicious boy;
Convinc'd by omens so divinely bright,
I go, my son, companion of thy flight.'
Thus he—and nearer now in curling spires
Through the long walls roll'd on the roaring fires.
' Haste then, my sire,' I cry'd, ' my neck ascend,
With joy beneath your sacred load I bend;
Together will we share, where'er I go,
Oae common welfare, or one common woe.
Ourself with care will young Iulus lead;
At safer distance you my spouse succeed;
Heed too these orders, ye attendant train;
Without the wall stands Ceres' vacant fane,
Rais'd on a mount; an aged cypress near,
Preserv'd for ages with religious fear;
Thither, from different roads assembling, come,
And meet embody'd at the sacred dome:
Thou, thou, my sire, our gods and relics bear;
These hands, yet horrid with the stains of war,
Refrain their touch unhallow'd till the day,
When the pure stream shall wash the guilt
away.'

" Now, with a lion's spoils bespread, I take
My sire, a pleasing burthen, on my back;
Close clinging to my hand, and pressing nigh,
With steps unequal tripp'd Iulus by;
Behind, my lov'd Creüsa took her way;
Through every lonely dark recess we stray:
And I, who late th' embattled Greeks could dare,
Their flying darts, and whole embody'd war,
Now take alarm, while horrors reign around,
At every breeze, and start at every sound.
With fancy'd fears my busy thoughts were wild
For my dear father, and endanger'd child.

" Now, to the city gates approaching near,
I seem the sound of trampling feet to hear.
Alarm'd, my sire look'd forward through the shade,
And, ' Fly my son, they come, they come!' he said;

' Lo! from their shields I see the splendours stream;
And ken distinct the helmet's fiery gleam.'
And here, some envious god, in this dismay,
This sudden terror, snatch'd my sense away.
For while o'er devious paths I wildly trod,
Studios to wander from the beaten road;
I lost my dear Creüsa, nor can tell
From that sad moment, if by fate she fell;
Or sunk fatigu'd; or straggled from the train;
But ah! she never blest these eyes again!
Nor, till to Ceres' ancient wall we came,
Did I suspect her lost, nor miss the dame.

There all the train assembled, all but she,
I lost to her friends, her father, son, and me.
What men, what gods did my wild fury spare?
At both I rav'd, and madden'd with despair.
In Troy's last ruins did I ever know
A scene so cruel! such transcendent woe!
Our gods, my son, and father, to the train
I next commend, and hide them in the plain;
Then fly for Troy, and shine in arms again.
Resolv'd the burning town to wander o'er,
And tempt the dangers that I scap'd before.
Now to the gate I run with furious haste,
Whence first from Ilion to the plain I past;
Dart round my eyes in every place in vain,
And tread my former footsteps o'er again.
Surrounding horrors all my soul affright;
And more, the dreadful silence of the night.
Next to my house I flew without delay,
If there, if haply there she bent her way.
In vain—the conquering foes were enter'd there;
High o'er the dome, the flames emblaze the air;
Fierce to devour, the fiery tempest flies,
Swells in the wind, and thunders to the skies.
Back to th' embattled citadel I ran,
And search'd her father's regal walls in vain.
Ulysses now, and Phoenix I survey,
Who guard, in Juno's fane, the gather'd prey:
In one huge heap the Trojan wealth was roll'd,
Refulgent robes, and bowls of massy gold;
A pile of tables on the pavement nodd,
Snatch'd from the blazing temples of the gods.
A mighty train of shrieking mothers bound,
Stood with their captive children trembling round.
Yet more—I boldly raise my voice on high,
And in the shade on dear Creüsa cry;
Call on her name a thousand times in vain,
But still repeat the darling name again.
Thus while I rave and roll my searching eyes,
Solemn and slow I saw her shade arise,
The form enlarg'd majestic mov'd along;
Fear rais'd my hair, and horror chain'd my tongue:

Thus as I stood amaz'd, the heav'nly fair
With these mild accents sooth'd my fierce despair:

" Why with excess of sorrow raves in vain
My dearest lord, at what the gods ordain?
Oh could I share thy toils!—but fate denies;
And Jove, dread Jove, the sovereign of the skies,
In long, long exile, art thou doom'd to sweep
Seas after seas, and plough the wat'ry deep.
Hesperia shall be thine, where Tyber glides
Through fruitful realms, and rolls in easy tides.
There shall thy fates a happier lot provide,
A glorious empire, and a royal bride.
Then let your sorrows for Creüsa cease;
For know, I never shall be led to Greece;
Nor feel the victor's chain, nor captive's shame,
A slave to some impetuous Argive dame,
No!—born a princess, sprung from Heav'n above,
Ally'd to Venus, and deriv'd from Jove,
Sacred from Greece, 'tis mine, in these abodes,
To serve the glorious mother of the gods.
Farewell; and to our son thy care approve,
Our son, the pledge of our commutual love."

" Thus she; and as I wept, and wish'd to say
Ten thousand things, dissolv'd in air away.
Thrice round her neck my eager arms I threw;
Thrice from my empty arms the phantom flew,
Swift as the wind, with momentary flight,
Swift as a fleeting vision of the night.

low, day approaching, to my longing train,
 rom ruin'd Ilium I return again ;
 b whom, with wonder and surprise, I find mighty crowd of new companions join'd ;
 host of willing exiles round me stand,
 latrons, and men, a miserable band ;
 sger the wretches pour from every side,
 o share my fortunes on the foamy tide ;
 o lead and arm'd, my conduct they implore,
 o lead and fix them on some foreign shore :
 nd now, o'er Ida with an early ray
 James the bright star, that leads the golden day.
 o hopes of aid in view, and every gate
 sset by Greece, at length I yield to fate.
 Use o'er the hill my father I convey, nd bear the venerable load away."

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK III.

ARGUMENT.

ÆNEAS proceeds in his relation: he gives an account of the fleet in which he sailed, and the success of his first voyage to Thrace: from thence he directs his course to Delos, and asks the oracle what place the gods had appointed for his habitation? By a mistake of the oracle's answer, he settles in Crete; his household gods give him the true sense of the oracle in a dream. He follows their advice, and makes the best of his way for Italy: he is cast on several shores, and meets with very surprising adventures, till at length he lands on Sicily; where his father Anchises dies. This is the place which he was sailing from, when the tempest rose, and threw him upon the Carthaginian coast.

' WHEN Heav'n destroy'd, by too severe a fate,
 The throne of Priam, and the Phrygian state,
 When Troy, though Neptune rais'd her bulwarks
 round,

The pride of Asia, smok'd upon the ground ;
 We sought in vacant regions new abodes,
 Help'd by the guiding omens of the gods.
 Secret, a sudden navy we provide,
 Beneath Antandros, and the hills of Ide. [train,
 Doubtful, where Heav'n would fix our wand'ring
 Our gather'd powers prepare to plough the main.
 Scarce had the summer shot a genial ray ;
 My sire commands the canvass to display,
 And steer wherever fate should point the way.
 With tears I leave the port, my native shore,
 And those dear fields, where Ilium rose before.
 In exile's wretch, I lead into the floods,
 My son, my friends, and all my vanquish'd gods.
 "The warlike Thracians till a boundless plain,
 Sacred to Mars, Lycargus' ancient reign ;
 Ally'd to Troy, while fortune own'd her cause ;
 The same their gods and hospitable laws ;
 Thither, with fates averse, my course I bore,
 And rais'd a town amid the winding shore.

Then from my name the rising city call,
 And stretch along the strand th' embattled wall.
 Here to my mother, and the favouring gods,
 I offer'd victims by the rolling floods ;
 But slew a stately bull to mighty Jove,
 Who reigns the sovereignty of the powers above.

" Rais'd on a mount, a cornel grove was nigh,
 And with thick branches stood a myrtle by.
 With verdant boughs to shade my altars round,
 I came, and try'd to rend them from the ground.
 When lo ! a horrid prodigy I see ;
 For scarce my hands had wrench'd the rooted tree,
 When, from the fibres, drops of crimson gore
 Ran trickling down, and stain'd the sable shore.
 Amaz'd, I shook with horror and affright,
 My blood all curdled at the dreadful sight ;
 Curious the latent causes to explore,
 With trembling hands a second plant I tore ;
 That second wounded plant distill'd around
 Red drops of blood, and sprinkled all the ground.
 Rack'd with a thousand fears, devout I bow'd
 To every nymph, and Thracia's guardian god,
 These omens to avert by pow'r divine,
 And kindly grant a more auspicious sign.
 But when once more we tugg'd with toiling hands,
 And eager bent my knees against the sands ;
 Live I to speak it ?—from the tomb I hear
 A hollow groan, that shock'd my trembling ear,
 ' How can thy pious hands, Æneas, rend
 The bury'd body of thy hapless friend ;
 This stream that trickles from the wounded tree
 Is Trojan blood, and once ally'd to thee.
 Ah ! fly this barbarous land, this guilty shore,
 Fly, fly the fate of murder'd Polydore.
 This grove of lances, from my body slain,
 Now blooms with vegetable life again."

" Then, as amaz'd, in deep suspense I hung,
 Fear rais'd my hair, and horror chain'd my ill-fated Priam, when the Grecian pow'rs [tongue.
 With a close siege begirt the Dardan tow'rs,
 No more confiding in the strength of Troy,
 Sent to the Thracian prince the hapless boy,
 With mighty treasures, to support him there,
 Remov'd from all the dangers of the war.
 This wretch, when Ilium's better fortunes cease,
 Clos'd with the proud victorious arms of Greece ;
 Broke through all sacred laws, and uncontroll'd
 Destroy'd his royal charge, to seize the gold.
 Curs'd gold !—how high will daring mortals rise
 In ev'ry guilt, to reach the glittering prize ?
 Soon as my soul recover'd from her fears,
 Before my father and the gather'd peers,
 I lay the dreadful omens of the gods ;
 All vote at once to fly the dire abodes ;
 To leave th' unwhopisical realm behind,
 And spread our op'ning canvass to the wind.
 But first we paid the rites to Polydore,
 And rais'd a mighty tomb amid the shore.
 Next, to his ghost, adorn'd with cypress boughs
 And sable wreaths, two solemn altars rose ;
 With lamentable cries and hair unbound,
 The Trojan dames in order mov'd around.
 Warm milk and sacred blood in bowls we brought,
 To lure the spirit with the mingled draught ;
 Compos'd the soul ; and, with a dismal knell,
 Took thrice the melancholy last farewell.

" Soon as our fleet could trust the smiling sea,
 And the soft breeze had smooth'd the wat'ry way ;
 Call'd by the whispering gales, we rig the ships,
 Crowd round the shores, and lanch into the deeps.

Swift from the port our eager course we ply,
And lands and towns roll backward, as we fly.
"By Doris lov'd, and Ocean's azure god,
Lies a fair isle amid th' Ægean flood;
Which Phœbus fix'd; for once she wander'd round
The shores, and floated on the vast profound.
But now unmov'd, the peopled region braves
The roaring whirlwinds, and the furious waves.
Safe in her open ports the sacred isle
Receiv'd us, harrass'd with the naval toil.
Our reverence due to Phœbus' town we pay,
And holy Anius meets us on the way;
Anius, whose brows the wreaths and laurels grace,
Priest of the god, and sovereign of the place.
Well-pleas'd to see our train the shore ascend,
He flew to meet my sire, his ancient friend:
In hospitable guise our hands he prest,
Then to the palace led each honour'd guest,
To Phœbus' aged temple I repair,
And suppliant to the god prefer my pray'r:
'To wand'ring wretches, who in exile roam,
Grant, O Thymbræan god! a settled home:
Oh! grant thy suppliants, their long labours
past,

A race to flourish, and a town to last;
Preserve this little second Troy in peace,
Snatch'd from Achilles and the sword of Greece:
Vouchsafe, great father, some auspicious sign;
And oh! inform us with thy light divine,
Where lies our way? and what auspicious guide,
To foreign realms shall lead us o'er the tide?"
"Sudden, the dire alarm the temple took;
The laurels, gates, and lofty mountains, shook.
Burst with a dreadful roar, the veils display
The hallow'd tripods in the face of day.
Humbled we fell; then, prostrate on the ground,
We hear these accents in an awful sound:
'Ye valiant sons of Troy, the land that bore
Your mighty ancestors to light before,
Once more their great descendants shall embrace;
Go—seek the ancient mother of your race.
There the wide world, Æneas' house shall sway,
And down, from son to son, th' imperial power convey.'

"Thus Phœbus spoke; and joy tumultuous fir'd
The thronging crowds; and eager all enquir'd,
What realm, what town, his oracles ordain,
Where the kind god would fix the wand'ring train?
Then in his mind my sire revolving o'er
The long, long records of the times before:
'Learn, ye assembled peers,' he cries, 'from me,
The happy realm the laws of fate decree;
Fair Crete sublimely tow'rs amid the floods,
Proud nurse of Jove, the sovereign of the gods.
There ancient Ida stands, and thence we trace
The first memorials of the Trojan race;
A hundred cities the blest isle contains,
And boasts a vast extent of fruitful plains.
Hence our fam'd ancestor, old Teucer, bore
His course, and gain'd the fair Rhætean shore,
There the great chief the seat of empire chose,
Before proud Troy's majestic structures rose;
Till then, if rightly I record the tale,
Our old forefathers till'd the lowly vale.
From hence arriv'd the mother of the gods,
Hence her loud cymbals and her sacred woods:
Hence, at her rites religious silence reigns,
And lions whirl her chariot o'er the plains.
Then fly we speedy where the gods command,
Appease the winds, and seek the Cretan land:

Nor distant is the shore; if Jove but smile,
Three days shall waft us to the blissful isle.'
"This said; he slays the victims due, and loads
In haste the smoking altars of the gods.
A bull to Phœbus, and a bull was slain
To thee, great Neptune, monarch of the main;
A milkwhite ewe to ev'ry western breeze,
A black, to ev'ry storm that sweeps the sea.
Now fame reports Idomeneus' retreat,
Expell'd and banish'd from the throne of Crete;
Free from the foe the vacant region lay:
We leave the Delian shore, and plough the wat'ry
way.

By fruitful Naxos, o'er the flood we fly,
Where to the Bacchanals the hills reply;
By green Donyss next and Paros steer,
Where, white in air, her glitt'ring rocks appear.
Thence through the Cyclades the navy glides,
Whose clust'ring islands stud the silver tides.
Loud shout the sailors, and to Crete we fly;
'To Crete, our country,' was the general cry.
Swift shoots the fleet before the driving blast,
And on the Cretan shore descends at last.

"With eager speed I frame a town, and call
From ancient Pergamus the rising wall.
Pleas'd with the name, my Trojans I command
To raise strong tow'rs, and settle in the land.
Soon as our lusty youth the fleet could moor,
And draw the vessels on the sandy shore,
Some join the nuptial bands: with busy toil
Their fellows plough the new-discover'd soil.
To frame impartial laws I bend my cares,
Allot the dwellings, and assign the shares.
When lo! from standing air and poison'd skies,
A sudden plague with dire contagion flies.
On corn and trees the dreadful pest began;
And last the fierce infection seiz'd on man.
They breathe their souls in air; or drag with pain
Their lives, now lengthen'd out for woes, in rain;
Their wanted food the blasted fields deny,
And the red dog-star fires the sultry sky.
My sire advis'd, to measure back the main,
Consult, and beg the Delian god again
To end our woes, his succour to display,
And to our wand'rings point the certain way.

"'Twas night; soft slumbers had the world posset,
When, as I lay compos'd in pleasing rest,
Those gods I bore from flaming Troy, arise
In awful figures to my wond'ring eyes:
Close at my couch they stood, divinely bright,
And shone distinct by Cynthia's gleaming light.
Then, to dispel the cares that rack'd my breast,
These words the visionary pow'rs address:
"Those truths the god in Delos would repeat
By us, his envoys, he unfolds in Crete;
By us, companions of thy arms and thee,
From flaming Ilion o'er the swelling sea.
Led by our care, shall thy descendants rise,
The world's majestic monarchs, to the skies.
Then build thy city for imperial sway,
And boldly take the long laborious way.
Forsake this region; for the Delian pow'r
Assign'd not for thy seat the Gnosian shore.
Once by Cnrotians till'd, there lies a place,
Twas call'd Hesperia by the Grecian race;
For martial deeds and fruits renown'd by fame;
But since, Italia, from the leader's name,
These are the native realms the fates assign'd,
Hence rose the fathers of the Trojan line:

The great Æneas, sprung from Heaven above,
And ancient Dardanus, deriv'd from Jove,
Rise then, in haste these joyful tidings bear,
These truths unquestion'd to thy father's ear.
Begone—the fair Ausonian realms explore,
For Jove himself denies the Cretan shore.

“ Struck with the voice divine, and awful sight,
No common dream, or vision of the night;
I saw the wreaths, their features; and a stream
Of trickling sweat ran down from every limb.
I started from my bed, and rais'd on high
My hands and voice in rapture to the sky.
Then (to our gods the due oblations paid)
The scene divine before my sight I laid.
He owns his error of each ancient place,
Our two great founders, and the double race.

“ My son,” he cry'd, “ whom adverse fates em-
Oh! exercis'd in all the woes of Troy! [ploy,
Now I reflect, Cassandra's word divine
Assign'd these regions to the Dardan line.
But who surmis'd, the sons of Troy should come
To fair Hesperia from their distant home?
Or who gave credit to Cassandra's strain,
Doom'd by the fates to prophesy in vain?
Pursue we now a surer, safer road,
By Phœbus pointed, and obey the god.
Glad we comply, and leave a few behind;
Then spread our sails to catch the driving wind;
Forsake this realm; the sparkling waves divide,
And the swift vessels shoot along the tide.

“ Now vanish from our eyes the lessening
ground;
And all the wide horizon stretching round,
Above was sky, beneath was sea profound:
When, black'ning by degrees, a gathering cloud,
Charg'd with big storms, frown'd dreadful o'er the flood,

And darken'd all the main; the whirlwinds roar,
And roll the waves in mountains to the shore.
Seatch'd by the furious gust, the vessels keep
Their road no more, but scatter o'er the deep:
The thunders roll, the forked lightnings fly;
And in a burst of rain descends the sky.
Far from our course was dash'd the navy wide,
And dark we wander o'er the tossing tide.

Not skilful Palmure in such a sea,
So black with storms, distinguish'd night from day;
Nor knew to turn the helm, or point the way.
Three nights, without one guiding star in view,
Three days, without the Sun, the navy flew;
The fourth, by dawn, the swelling shores we spy,
See the thin smokes, that melt into the sky,
And bluish hills just opening on the eye.
We furl the sails, with bending oars divide
The flashing waves, and sweep the foamy tide.

“ Safe from the storm the Strophades I gain,
Incircled by the vast Ionian main,
Where dwelt Cœlæno with her barpy train;
Ince Boreas' sons had chas'd the direful guests
From Phineus' palace, and their wonted feasts.
But fiends to scourge mankind, so fierce, so fell,
Leav'n never summon'd from the depths of Hell;
Bloated and gorg'd with prey, with wombs obscene,
Oul paunches, and with ordure still unclean;
— virgin face, with wings and hooky claws;
leath in their eyes, and famine in their jaws.

“ The port we enter'd, and with joy beheld
Large herds of oxen graze the verdant field,
And feeding flocks of goats, without a swain,
Hut range at large, and bound along the plain;

We seize, we slay, and to the copious feast
Call every god, and Jove himself a guest.
Then on the winding shore the tables plac'd,
And sat indulging in the rich repast;
When from the mountains, terrible to view,
On sounding wings the monster Harpies flew.
They taint the banquet with their touch abhor'd,
Or snatch the smoking viands from the board.
A stench offensive follows where they fly,
And loud they scream, and raise a dreadful cry.
Thence to a cavern'd rock the train remove,
And the close shelter of a shady grove;
Once more prepare the feast, the tables raise;
Once more with fires the loaded altars blaze.
Again the fiends from their dark covert fly,
But from a different quarter of the sky,
With loathsome claws they snatch the food away,
Scream o'er our heads, and poison all the prey.
Enrag'd, I bid my train their arms prepare,
And with the direful monsters wage the war.
Close in the grass, observant of the word,
They hide the shining shield, and gloaming sword.
Then, as the harpies from the hills once more
Pour'd shrieking down, and crowded round the
On his high stand Misenus sounds from far [shore,
The brazen trump, the signal of the war.
With unaccustom'd fight we flew, to slay
The forms obscene, dread monsters of the sea.
But proof to steel their hides and plumes remain;
We strike th' impenetrable fiends in vain,
Who from the fragments wing'd th' aerial way,
And leave, involv'd in stench, the mangled prey:
All but Cœlæno;—from a pointed rock,
Where perch'd she sat, the boding fury spoke:
“ Then was it not enough, ye sons of Troy,
Our flocks to slaughter, and our herds destroy?
But war, shall impious war, your wrongs maintain;
And drive the harpies from their native reign?
Hear then your dreadful doom with due regard,
Which mighty Jove to Phœbus has declar'd;
Which Phœbus open'd to Cœlæno's view,
And I, the furies' queen, unfold to you.
To promise'd Italy your course you ply,
And safe to Italy at length shall fly;
But never, never raise your city there,
Till, in due vengeance for the wrongs we bear,
Imperious hunger urge you to devour
Those very boards on which you fed before.”

“ She ceas'd, and fled into the gloomy wood.
With hearts dejected my companions stood,
And sudden horrors froze their curdling blood.
Down drop the shield and spear; from fight we cease,

And humbly sue by suppliant vows for peace;
And whether goddesses, or fiends from Hell,
Prostrate before the monstrous forms we fell.
But old Anchises, by the beating floods,
Invok'd with sacrifice th' immortal gods;
And rais'd his hands and voice:—“ Ye powers divine,
Avert these woes, and spare a righteous line.”
Then he commands to cut the cords away;
With southern gales we plough the foamy sea.
And, where the friendly breeze or pilot guides,
With flying sails we stem the murmuring tides.
Now, high in view, amid the circling floods,
We ken Zacynthus crown'd with waving woods,
Dulichian coasts, and Samian hills, we spy,
And proud Neritos tow'ring in the sky.
Rough Ithaca we shun, a rocky shore,
And curse the land that dire Ulysses bore.

Then dim Lencate swell'd to sight, who shrouds
 His tall aerial brow in ambient clouds;
 Last opens, by degrees, Apollo's fane,
 The dread of sailors on the wintry main.
 To this small town, fatigu'd with toil, we haste;
 The circling anchors from the prows are cast.
 Safe to the land beyond our hopes restor'd,
 We paid our vows to Heaven's almighty lord.
 All bright in suppling oil, my friends employ
 Their limbs in wrestling, and revive with joy
 On Action shores the solemn games of Troy.
 Pleas'd we reflect, that we had pass'd in peace,
 Thro' foes unnumber'd, and the towns of Greece.
 " Meantime the Sun his annual race performs,
 And blust'ring Boreas fills the sea with storms;
 I hung the brazen buckler on the door,
 Which once in fight the warlike Abas bore;
 And thus inscrib'd—" These arms, with blood dis-
 tain'd,
 From conquering Greece the great Æneas gain'd:
 Then, rous'd at my command, the sailors sweep
 And dash with bending oars the sparkling deep.
 Soon had we lost Phœacia's sinking tow'rs,
 And skimm'd along Epirus' flying shores.
 On the Chaonian port at length we fall;
 Thence we ascend to high Buthrotos' wall.
 Astonish'd here a strange report we found,
 That Trojan Helenus in Greece was crown'd.
 The captive prince (victorious Pyrrhus dead)
 At once succeeded to his throne and bed;
 And fair Andromache, to Troy restor'd,
 Once more was wedded to a Dardan lord.
 With eager joy I left the fleet, and went [event
 To hail my royal friends, and learn the strange
 " Before the walls, within a gloomy wood,
 Where new Simois roll'd his silver flood;
 By chance, Andromache that moment paid
 The mournful offerings to her Hector's shade.
 A tomb, an empty tomb, her hands compose
 Of living turf; and two fair altars rose.
 Sad scene! that still provok'd the tears she shed;
 And here the queen invok'd the mighty dead.
 When lo! as I advanc'd, and drew more nigh,
 She saw my Trojan arms and ensigns fly;
 So strange a sight astonish'd to survey,
 The princess trembles, falls, and faints away.
 Her beauteous frame the vital warmth forsook,
 And, scarce recover'd, thus at length she spoke:
 " Ha!—is it true!—in person? and alive?
 Still, dost thou still, oh! goddess-born, survive?
 Or, if no more thou breathe the vital air,
 Where is my lord, my Hector, tell me where?"
 Then, the big sorrow streaming from her eyes,
 She fill'd the air with agonizing cries.
 Few words to soothe her raging grief I say,
 And scarce those few, for sobs, could find their way.
 " Ah! trust your eyes, no phantoms here im-
 I live indeed, but drag a life of woes! [pose;
 Say then, oh! say, has fortune yet been just
 To worth like yours, since Hector sunk in dust?
 Or oh! is that great hero's consort led (His dear Andromache) to Pyrrhus' bed?"
 To this, with lowly voice, the fair replies,
 While on the ground she fixt her streaming eyes:
 " Thrice blest Polyxena! condemn'd to fall
 By vengeful Greece beneath the Trojan wall;
 Stab'd at Pelides' tomb the victim bled,
 To death deliver'd from the victor's bed.
 Nor lots disgrac'd her with a chain, like me,
 A wretched captive, dragg'd from sea to sea!

Doom'd to that hero's haughty heir, I gave
 A son to Pyrrhus, more than half a slave.
 From me, to fair Hermione he fled,
 Of Leda's race, and sought a Spartan bed;
 My slighted charms to Helenus resign'd,
 And in the bridal bands his captives join'd.
 But fierce Orestes, by the furies tost,
 And mad with vengeance for the bride he lost,
 Swift on the monarch from his ambush flew,
 And at Apollo's hallow'd altar slew.
 On Helenus devolv'd (the tyrant slain)
 A portion of the realm, a large domain:
 From Chaon's name the fruitful tract he calls,
 And from old Pergamus, his growing walls.
 But oh! what winds, what fates, what gracious
 pow'rs,
 Led you, unknown, to these friendly shores?
 Does yet Ascanius live, the hope of Troy?
 Does his fond mother's death afflict the boy?
 Or glory's charms his little soul inflame,
 To match my Hector's or his father's fame?"
 " So spoke the queen with mingled sobs and cries,
 And tears in vain ran trickling from her eyes.
 When lo! in royal pomp the king descends
 With a long train, and owns his ancient friends.
 Then to the town his welcome guests he led;
 Tear follow'd tear, at ev'ry word he said.
 Here in a foreign region I behold
 A little Troy, an image of the old;
 Here creeps along a poor penurious stream,
 That fondly bears Scamander's mighty name:
 A second Scæan gate I clasp with joy,
 In dear remembrance of the first in Troy.
 With me, the monarch bids my friends, and all,
 Indulge the banquet in the regal hall,
 Crown'd with rich wine the foamy goblets hold;
 And the vast feast was serv'd in massy gold.
 " Two days were past, and now the southern gals
 Call us aboard, and stretch the swelling sails.
 A thousand doubts distract my anxious breast,
 And thus the royal prophet I address'd:
 ' Oh sacred prince of Troy, to whom 'tis giv'n,
 To speak events, and search the will of Heav'n,
 The secret mind of Phœbus to declare
 From laurels, tripods, and from every star:
 To know the voice of every fowl that flies,
 The signs of every wing that beats the skies;
 Instruct me, sacred seer; since every god,
 With each blest omen, bids me plough the flood,
 To reach fair Italy, and measure o'er
 A length of ocean to the destin'd shore:
 The Harpy queen, and she alone, relates
 A scene of sad unutterable fates,
 A dreadful famine sent from Heaven on high,
 With all the gather'd vengeance of the sky:
 Tell me, what dangers I must first oppose,
 And how o'ercome the mighty weight of woes.'
 " Now, the due victims slain, the king implores
 The grace and favour of th' immortal pow'rs;
 Unbinds the fillets from his sacred head,
 Then, by the hand, in solemn state he led
 His trembling guest to Phœbus' fair abode,
 Struck with an awful reverence of the god.
 At length, with all the sacred fury fir'd,
 Thus spoke the prophet, as the god inspir'd:
 " Since, mighty chief, the deities, your guides,
 With prosperous omens waft you o'er the tides,
 Such is the doom of fate, the will of Jove,
 The firm decree of him who reigns above.

Fear me, of many things, explain a few,
 Your future course with safety to pursue;
 And, all these foreign floods and countries past,
 To reach the wish'd Ausonian port at last.
 The rest the fates from Helenus conceal,
 And Heaven's dread queen forbids me to reveal.
 First then, that Italy, that promis'd land,
 Though thy fond hopes already grasp the strand,
 Though now she seems so near) a mighty tide,
 And long, long regions from your reach divide.
 Sicilian seas must bend your plunging oars;
 Your fleet must coast the fair Ausonian shores,
 And reach the dreadful isle, the dire abode
 Where Circe reigns; and stem the Stygian flood,
 Before your fated city shall ascend.
 Hear then, and these auspicious signs attend:
 When, lost in contemplation deep, you find
 A large white mother of the bristly kind,
 With her white brood of thirty young, who drain
 Her swelling dugs, where Tyber bathes the plain:
 Here, there, thy town shall rise, my godlike friend,
 And all thy labours find their destin'd end.
 Fear then Cæleus's direful threats no more,
 And your fierce hunger shall your boards devour.
 Apollo, when invoc'd, will teach the way,
 And fate the mystic riddle shall display,
 At these next borders of th' Italian shores,
 Whose rough rocky sides our ocean roars,
 Beware with caution, for the Grecian train
 Possess those realms that stretch along the main.
 Here, the fierce Locrians hold their dreadful seat;
 Here, brave Idomeneus, expell'd from Crete,
 Has fixt his armies on Salentine ground,
 And awes the wide Calabrian realms around.
 Here Philoctetes, from Thessalian shores,
 Bears strong Pestilia, fenc'd with walls and tow'rs.
 Soon as transported o'er the rolling floods,
 You pay due vows in honour of the gods;
 When on the shore the smoking altars rise,
 A purple veil draw cautious o'er your eyes;
 And hostile faces should appear in sight,
 To blast and discompose the hallow'd rite.
 Beware this form before the sacred shrine,
 You, a and thy friends, and all thy future line.
 "When near Sicilian coasts thy belling sails
 Length convey thee, with the driving gales;
 Helorus' straits just opening by degrees;
 Turn from the right; avoid the shores and seas.
 Turn to the left thy course in safety keep,
 And fetch a mighty circle round the deep.
 That realm of old, a ruin huge! was rent
 Length of ages from the continent;
 With force convulsive burst the isle away;
 And thro' the dread opening broke the thundering sea:
 At once the thund'ring sea Sicilia tore,
 And sunder'd from the fair Hesperian shore;
 And still the neighbouring coasts and towns divide
 With scanty channels, and contracted tides.
 Proceed to the right tremendous Scylla roars,
 Carybdis on the left the flood devours:
 Ariæ swallow'd in her womb, subsides the sea,
 Deep, deep as Hell; and thrice she spouts away
 From her black bellowing gulfs, disgorg'd on high,
 Waves after waves, that dash the distant sky.
 Dig'd in a darksome cavern's dreadful shade,
 Ligh o'er the surges Scylla rears her head:
 Encircled with a virgin's breast, and female locks,
 She draws the vessels on the pointed rocks.
 Slow, she lengthens in a monstrous whale,
 With dogs surrounded, and a dolphin's tail.

But oh! 'tis far, far safer, with delay,
 Still round and round to plough the wat'ry way,
 And coast Pachynus, than with curious eyes
 To see th' enormous den where Scylla lies;
 The dire tremendous fury to explore,
 Where, round her cavern'd rocks, her wat'ry monsters roar.

"Besides, if Helenus the truth inspires,
 If Phœbus warms me with prophetic fires;
 One thing in chief, O prince of Venus' strain,
 Though oft repeated, I must urge again.
 To Juno first with gifts and vows repair,
 And vanquish Heaven's imperial queen with pray'r.
 So shall your fleets in safety wait you o'er,
 From fair Trinacria to th' Hesperian shore;
 There, when arriv'd, you visit Cuma's tow'rs,
 Where dark with shady woods Avernaus roars,
 You see the Sibyl in her rocky cave,
 And I hear the furious maid divinely rave.
 The dark decrees of fate the virgin sings,
 And writes on leaves, names, characters, and things
 The mystic numbers, in the cavern laid,
 Are rang'd in order by the sacred maid;
 There they repose in ranks along the floor;
 At length a casual wind unfolds the door:
 The casual wind disorders the decrees,
 And the loose fates are scatter'd by the breeze.
 She scorns to range them, and again unite
 The flecting scrolls, or stop their airy flight.
 Then back retreat the disappointed train,
 And curse the Sibyl they consult in vain.
 But thou, more wise, thy purpos'd course delay,
 Tho' thy rash friends should summon thee away;
 And wait with patience, though the flattering gales
 Sing in thy shrouds, and fill thy opening sails.
 With suppliant pray'rs entreat her to relate,
 In vocal accents, all thy various fate.
 Her voice th' Italian nations shall declare,
 And the whole progress of thy future war.
 Thy numerous toils the prophetess shall show,
 And how to shun, or surmount, every woe.
 With reverence due, her potent aid implore,
 So shalt thou safely reach the distant shore:
 Thus far I tell thee, but must tell no more.
 Proceed, brave prince, with courage in thy wars,
 And raise the Trojan glory to the stars."

"When thus my fates the royal seer foretold,
 He sent rich gifts of elephant and gold;
 Within my navy's sides large treasures stow'd,
 And brazen caldrons that refulgent glow'd.
 To me the monarch gave a shining mail,
 With many a golden clasp, and golden scale;
 With this, a beauteous radiant helm, that bore
 A waving plume; the helm that Pyrrhus wore.
 My father too with costly gifts he loads,
 And sailors he supplies to stem the floods,
 And generous steeds, and arms to all my train,
 With skilful guides to lead us o'er the main.

"And now my sire gave orders to unbind
 The gather'd sails, and catch the rising wind;
 Whom thus, at parting, the prophetic sage
 Address'd, with all the reverence due to age:
 'O favour'd of the skies! whom Venus led
 To the high honours of her genial bed,
 Her own immortal beauties to enjoy.
 And twice preserv'd thee from the flames of Troy:
 Lo! to your eyes Ausonian coasts appear,
 Go—to that realm your happy voyage steer.
 But far beyond those regions you survey,
 Your coasting fleet must cut the lengthen'd way.

Still, still at distance lies the fated place,
Assign'd by Phœbus to the Trojan race.

'Go then,' he said, 'with full success go on,
Oh blest! thrice blest in such a matchless son.
Why longer should my words your course detain,
When the soft gales invite you to the main?'

'Nor less the queen, her love and grief to tell,
With costly presents takes her sad farewell.
She gave my son a robe; the robe of old
Her own fair hands embroider'd o'er with gold:
With precious vests she loads the darling boy,
And a refulgent mantle wrought in Troy. [wove

'Accept, dear youth,' she said, 'these robes I
In happier days, memorial of my love.
This trifling token of thy friend receive,
The last, last present Hector's wife can give.
Ah! now, methinks, and only now, I see
My dear Astyanax revive in thee!

Such were his motions! such a sprightly grace
Charm'd from his eyes, and open'd in his face!
And had it pleas'd, alas! the powers divine,
His blooming years had been the same as thine.'

'Thus then the mournful last farewell I took,
And, bath'd in tears, the royal pair bespoke:
'Live you long happy in a settled state;
'Tis our's to wander still from fate to fate.
Safe have you gain'd the peaceful port of ease,
Not doom'd to plough th' immeasurable seas;
Nor seek for Latium, that deludes the view,
A coast that flies as fast as we pursue.
Here you a new Scamander can enjoy;
Here your own hands erect a second Troy:
With happier omens may she rise in peace,
And less obnoxious than the first to Greece.

If e'er the long-expected shore I gain,
Where Tyber's streams enrich the flow'ry plain;
Or if I live to raise our fated town;
Our Latian Troy and yours shall join in one;
In one shall centre both the kindred states,
The same their founder, and the same their fates!
And may their son to future times convey
The sacred friendship which we sign to day.'

'We take to Italy the shortest road,
By steep Ceraunian mountains, o'er the flood.
Now the descending Sun roll'd down the light,
The hills lie cover'd in the shades of night;
When some by lot attend, and ply the oars,
Some, worn with toil, lie stretch'd along the shores:
There by the murmurs of the heaving deep
Rock'd to repose, they sunk in pleasing sleep.
Scarce half the hours of silent night were fled,
When careful Palinure forsakes his bed;
And every breath explores that stirs the seas,
And watchful listens to the passing breeze;
Observes the course of every orb on high,
That moves in silent pomp along the sky.
Arcturus dreadful with the stormy star,
The wat'ry Hyads, and the northern ear,
In the blue vault his piercing eyes behold,
And huge Orion flame in arms of gold.
When all serene he saw th' ethereal plain,
He gave the signal to the slumb'ring train.
We rouse; and our opening canvass we display,
And wing with spreading sails the wat'ry way.

'Now every star before Aurora flies,
Whose glowing blushes streak the purple skies:
When the dim hills of Italy we view'd,
That peep'd by turns, and div'd beneath the flood.
'Lo! Italy appears,' Achates cries,
And 'Italy,' with shouts, the crowd replica.

My sire, transported, crown'd a bow, with wise,
Stands on the deck, and calls the pow'rs divine:
'Ye gods! who rule the tempests, earth, and seas,
Befriend our course, and breathe a prosperous breeze.'

Up sprung th' expected breeze; the port we spy,
Near, and more near; and Pallas' fane on high,
With the steep hill, rose dancing to the eye.
Our sails are fur'd; and from the seas profound,
We turn the prow to land, while ocean foams
around.

'Where from the raging east the surges flow,
The land indented bends an ample bow,
The port conceal'd within the winding shore,
Dash'd on the fronting cliffs, the billows roar.
Two lofty tow'ring rocks extended wide, [tide
With outstretch'd arms embrace the murmuring
Within the mighty wall the waters lie,
And from the coast the temple seems to fly.

'Here first, a dubious omen I beheld;
Four milk-white coursers graz'd the verdant field.
'War,' cry'd my sire, 'these hostile realms prepare;

Train'd to the fight, these steeds denounce the war.'
But since sometimes they bear the guiding rein,
Yok'd to the car; the hopes of peace remain.
Then, as her temple rais'd our shouts, we paid
Our first devotions to the martial maid,
Next, as the rules of Helenus enjoin,
We veil'd our heads at Juno's sacred shrine;
And sought Heav'n's awful queen with rites divine.
This done;—once more with shifting sails we fly,
And cautious pass the hostile regions by.
Hence we renown'd Tarentum's bay behold,
Renown'd, 'tis said, from Hercules of old.
Oppos'd, Lacinia's temple rose on high,
And proud Caulonian tow'rs salute the sky.

Then, near the rocky Scylacæan bay
For wrecks defam'd, we plough the watery way.
Now we behold, emerging to our eyes
From distant floods, Sicilian Ætna rise;
And hear a thund'ring din and dreadful roar
Of billows breaking on the rocky shore.
The smoking waves boil high, on every side,
And scoop the sands, and blacken all the tide.
'Charybdis' gulf,' my father cries, 'behold!
The direful rocks the royal Æet foretold!
Ply, ply your oars, and stretch to every stroke:
Swift as the word, their ready oars they took;
First skilful Palinure; then all the train
Steer to the left, and plough the liquid plain.

'Now on a tow'ring arch of waves we rise,
Heav'd on the bounding billows, to the skies.
Then, as the roaring surge retreating fell,
We shoot down headlong to the depths of Hell.
Thrice the rough rocks rebel on our ears;
Thrice mount the foamy tides, and dash the stars.

'The wind now sinking with the lamp of day,
Spent with her toils, and dubious of the way;
We reach the dire Cyclopean shore, that forms
An ample port, impervious to the storms.
But Ætna roars with dreadful ruins nigh,
Now hurls a bursting cloud of cinders high,
Involv'd in smoky whirlwinds to the sky;
With loud disposition, to the starry frame,
Shoots fiery globes, and furious floods of flame;
Now from her bellying caverns burst away
Vast piles of melted rocks, in open day.
Her shatter'd entrails wide the mountain thro'—
And deep as Hell her burning centre glow.

On vast Euceladus this pond'rous load
Was thrown in vengeance by the thundering god ;
Who pants beneath the mountains, and expires,
Through openings huge, the fierce tempestuous
Of as he shifts his side, the caverns roar ; [fires ;
With smoke and flame the skies are cover'd o'er,
And all Trinacria shakes from shore to shore.
That night we heard the loud tremendous sound,
The monstrous mingled peal that thunder'd round ;
While in the shelt'ring wood we sought repose,
Nor knew from whence the dreadful tumult rose.
For not one star displays his golden light ;
The skies lie cover'd in the shades of night ;
The silver Moon her glimmering splendour shrouds
In gathering vapours, and a night of clouds.
" Now fled the dewy shades of night away,
Before the blushes of the dawning day ;
When, from the wood, shot sudden forth in view
A wretch, in rags that flutter'd as he flew.
The human form in meager hunger lost ;
The suppliant stranger, more than half a ghost,
Stretch'd forth his hands, and pointed to the coast.
We turn'd to view the sight ;—his vest was torn,
And all the tatter'd garb was tagg'd with thorn.
His beard hangs long, and dost the wretch disdains,
And scarce the shadow of a man remains.
In all besides, a Grecian he appears,
And late a soldier in the Trojan wars.
Soon as our Dardan dress and arms he view'd,
In fear suspended for a space he stood ; [he flies
Stood, stopp'd, and pau'd ; then, springing forth,
All headlong to the shore with pray'rs and cries :
' Oh ! by this vital air, the stars on high,
By every pitying pow'r who treads the sky !
Ye Trojans, take me hence ; I ask no more ;
But bear, oh bear me from this dreadful shore.
I own myself a Grecian, and confess
I storm'd your Ilium with the sons of Greece.
If that offence must doom me to the grave,
Ye Trojans, plunge me in the whelming wave.
I die contented, if that grace I gain ;
I die with pleasure, if I die by man.' [around
* Then kneel'd the wretch, and suppliant clung
My knees with tears, and grovel'd on the ground.
Mord with his cries, we urge him to relate
His name, his lineage, and his cruel fate :
Then by the hand my good old father took
The trembling youth, who thus encourag'd spoke.
" Ulysses' friend, your empire to destroy,
I left my native Ithaca for Troy,
My sire, poor Adamastus, sent from far
His son, his Achæmenides, to war ;
Oh ! had we both our humble state maintain'd,
And safe in peace and poverty remain'd !
For me my friends forgetful left behind,
In the huge Cyclops' ample cave confin'd.
Floating with human gore, the dreadful dome
Lies wide and waste, a solitary gloom !
With mangled limbs was all the pavement spread ;
High as the stars he heaves his horrid head.
The tow'ring giant stalks with matchless might ;
A savage fiend ! tremendous to the sight.
(Far, far from Earth, ye heav'nly pow'rs, repel
A fiend so direful to the depths of Hell !)
For slaughter'd mortals are the monster's food,
The bodies he devours, and quaffs the blood.
These eyes beheld him, when his ample hand
Seiz'd two poor wretches of our trembling band.
Stretch'd o'er the cavern, with a dreadful stroke.
He snatch'd, he dash'd, he brain'd 'em on the rock.

In one black torrent swam the smoking floor ;
Fierce he devours the limbs that drop with gore ;
The limbs yet sprawling, dreadful to survey !
Still heave and quiver while he grinds the prey.
" But mindful of himself, that fatal hour,
Not unreveng'd their death Ulysses bore.
For while the nodding savage sleeps supine,
Gorg'd with his horrid feast, and drown'd in wine ;
And, stretch'd o'er half the cave, ejects the load
Of human offals mixt with human blood :
Trembling, by lot we took our posts around,
Th' enormous giant slumb'ring on the ground.
Then (ev'ry god invoc'd, who rules the sky)
Plunge the sharp weapon in his monstrous eye ;
His eye, that midst his frowning forehead shone,
Like some broad buckler, or the blazing Sun.
Thus we reveng'd our dear companions lost ;
But fly, ye Trojans, fly this dreadful coast.
For know, a hundred horrid Cyclops more
Range on these hills, and dwell along the shore,
As huge as Polypheme, the giant swain,
Who milk, like him, in caves the woolly train.
Now thrice the Moon, fair empress of the night,
Has fill'd her growing horns with borrow'd light,
Since in these woods I pass'd the hours away,
In dens of beasts, and savages of prey.
Saw on the rocks the Cyclops ranging round,
Heard their loud footsteps thund'ring on the ground,
With each big bellowing voice, and trembled as the sound.
Here every stony fruit I pluck for food,
Herbs, cornels, roots, and berries of the wood.
While round I gaze, your fleet I first espies,
The first that touch'd on this detested shore ;
To 'scape these savages, I flew with joy
To meet your navy, though it sail'd from Troy.
If I but shun the cruel hands of these ;
Do you destroy me by what death you please.
" Scarce had he said ; when lo ! th' enormous
Huge Polyphemus, 'midst his fleecy train, [swain,
A bulk prodigious ! from the mountain's brow
Descends terrific to the shore below :
A monster grim, tremendous, vast, and high ;
His front deform'd, and quench'd his blazing eye ;
His huge hand held a pine, tall, large, and strong,
To guide his footsteps as he tower'd along.
His look attends, the only joy he knows ;
His pipe around his neck, the solace of his woes.
Soon as the giant reach'd the deeper flood,
With many a groan he cleans'd the gather'd blood
From his bor'd eye-ball in the briny main,
And, b'lowing grinds his teeth in agonizing pain.
Then stalks enormous through the midmeet tides ;
And scarce the topmost surges reach his sides.
" Aboard, the well-deserving Greek we took,
And, pale with fear, the dreadful coast forsook ;
Cut every cord with eager speed away,
Bend to the stroke, and sweep the foamy sea.
The giant heard ; and, turning to the sound,
At first pursu'd us through the vast profound ;
Stretch'd his huge hand to reach the fleet in vain ;
Nor could he ford the deep Ionian main.
With that, the furious monster roar'd so loud,
That ocean shook in ev'ry distant flood ;
Trembled all Italy from shore to shore ;
And Ætna's winding caves rebel to the roar.
" Rous'd at the peal, the fierce Cyclopean train
Rush'd from their woods and mountains to the main ;
Around the port the ghastly brethren stand,
A dire assembly ! covering all the strand.

In each grim forehead blas'd the single eye;
 In vain enrag'd the monstrous race we spy,
 A host of giants tow'ring in the sky.
 So on some mountain tow'rs the lofty grove
 Of beauteous Dian, or imperial Jove;
 Th' aerial pines in pointed spires from far,
 Or spreading oaks, majestic nod in air.
 Headlong we fly with horror, where the gales
 And speeding winds direct the flutt'ring sails.
 But Helenus forbids to plough the waves
 Where Scylla roars, and fierce Charybdis raves.
 As death stands dreadful 'midst the dangerous road,

With backward course we plough the foamy flood;
 When, from Pelorus' point a northern breeze
 Swells every sail, and wafts us o'er the seas;
 First, where Pantagia's mouth appear'd in view,
 Flank'd by a range of rocks, the navy flew:
 Then, shooting by the fam'd Megarean bay,
 And lowly Tapsus, cut the wat'ry way.
 These coasts by Achæmenides were shown,
 Who follow'd, late, Læertes' wand'ring son:
 Familiar with the track he past before,
 He names the lands, and points out ev'ry shore.

"An isle, once call'd Ortygia, fronts the sides
 Of rough Plemmyrium, and Sicilian tides.
 Hither, 'tis said, Alpheus, from his source
 In Elis' realms, directs his watry course:

Beneath the main he takes his secret way,
 And mounts with Arethusa's streams to day:
 Now a Sicilian flood his course he keeps,
 And rolls with blended waters to the deeps.
 Admonish'd, I adore the guardian gods,
 Then pass the bounds of rich Helorus' floods.
 Next our fleet galleys by Pachynus glide,
 Whose rocks projecting stretch into the tide.
 The Camarinian marsh I now survey,
 By fate forbidden to be drain'd away,
 Then the Geloan fields with Gela came
 In view, who borrow'd from the flood their name.
 With her huge wall proud Agragas succeeds;
 A realm, of old renown'd for generous steeds.
 From thee, Selinus, swift before the wind
 We flew, and left thy sinking palms behind;
 By Lilybæum's sides our course pursu'd,
 Whose rocks insidious hide beneath the flood:
 And reach (those dangerous shelves and shallows past)

The fatal port of Drepanum at last.
 Wretch as I was, on this detested coast,
 The chief support of all my woes, I lost;
 My dear, dear father—sav'd, but sav'd in vain
 From all the tempests of the raging main.
 Nor did the royal sage this blow foretell;
 Nor did the direful harpy-queen of Hell,
 Among her frightful prodigies, foreshew
 This last sad stroke, this unexpected woe.
 Here all my labours, all my toils were o'er,
 And hence Heav'n led me to your friendly shore."

Thus, while the room was hush'd, the prince relates

The wondrous series of his various fates;
 His long, long wand'rings, and unnumber'd woes:
 Then ceas'd; and sought the blessings of repose.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK IV.

ARGUMENT.

Dido discovers to her sister her passion for Æneas, and her thoughts of marrying him. She prepares a hunting match for his entertainment. Juno, with the consent of Venus, raises a storm, which separates the hunters, and drives Æneas and Dido into the same cave, where their marriage is supposed to be completed. Jupiter dispatches Mercury to Æneas, to warn him from Carthage. Æneas secretly prepares for his voyage. Dido finds out his design, and, to put a stop to it, makes use of her own and her sister's entreaties, and discovers all the variety of passions that are incident to a neglected lover. When nothing could prevail upon him, she contrives her own death, with which this book concludes.

But love inflam'd the queen; the raging pain
 Preys on her heart, and glows in every vein.
 Much she revolves the hero's deeds divine,
 And much the glories of his godlike line;
 Each look, each accent breaks her golden rest,
 Lodg'd in her soul, and imag'd in her breast.

The morn had chas'd the dewy shades away,
 And o'er the world advanc'd the lamp of day;
 When to her sister thus the royal dame
 Disclos'd the secret of her growing flame.

"Anna, what dreams are these that haunt my rest?

Who is this hero, this our godlike guest?
 Mark but his graceful port, his manly charms;
 How great a prince! and how renown'd in arms!
 Sure he descends from some celestial kind;
 For fear attends the low degenerate mind.
 But oh! what wars, what battles he relates!
 How long he struggled with his adverse fates!
 Did not my soul her purpose still retain,
 Fix'd and determin'd ne'er to wed again,
 Since from my widow'd arms the murdering sword

Untimely snatch'd my first unhappy lord;
 Did not my thoughts the name of marriage dread,
 And the bare mention of the bridal bed—
 Forgive my frailty—but I seem inclin'd
 To yield to this one weakness of my mind.
 For oh! my sister, unreserv'd and free
 I trust the secret of my soul to thee;
 Since poor Sicheus, by my brother slain,
 Dash'd with his blood the consecrated fane,
 And stain'd the gods; my firm resolves, I own,
 This graceful prince has shook, and this alone
 I feel a warmth o'er all my trembling frame,
 Too like the tokens of my former flame.

But oh! may Earth her dreadful gulf display,
 And gaping snatch me from the golden day;
 May I be hurl'd, by Heav'n's almighty sire,
 Transfixt with thunder and invol'd in fire,
 Down to the shades of Hell from realms of light,
 The deep, deep shades of everlasting night;

Ere, sacred honour! I betray thy cause
In word, or thought, or violate thy laws.
No!—my first lord, my first ill-fated spouse,
Still, as in life, is lord of all my vows.
My love he had, and ever let him have,
Interr'd with him, and buried in the grave."
Then, by her rising grief o'erwhelm'd, she ceas'd:
The tears ran trickling down her heaving breast.

"Sister," the fair replies, "whom far above
The light of Heav'n, or life itself I love;
Still on your bloom shall endless sorrow prey,
And waste your youth in solitude away?
And shall no pleasing theme your thoughts employ?
The prattling infant, or the bridal joy?
Think you such cares disturb your husband's shade,

Or stir the sacred ashes of the dead?
What though before, no lover won your grace,
Among the Tyrian, or the Libyan race?
With just disdain you pass'd Iarbas o'er,
And many a king whom warlike Afric bore.
But will you fly the hero you approve?
And steel your heart against a prince you love?
Nor will you once reflect what regions bound
Your infant empire, and your walls surround?
Here proud Gætulian cities tow'r in air,
Whose swarthy sons are terrible in war;
There the dread Syrtes stretch along the main,
And there the wild Barcians range the plain;
Here parch'd with thirst a smoking region lies,
There fierce in arms the brave Numidians rise.
Why should I urge our vengeful brother's ire?
The war just bursting from the gates of Tyre?
Sure, every god, with mighty Juno, bore
The fleets of Iliou to the Libyan shore.
From such a marriage, soon your joyful eyes
Shall see a potent town and empire rise.
What scenes of glory Carthage must enjoy,
When our confederate arms unite with Troy?
Go then, propitiate Heav'n; due offerings pay;
Careless, invite your godlike guest to stay,
And study still new causes of delay.
Tell him, that, charg'd with deluges of rain,
Orion rages on the wintry main;
That still unrigg'd his shatter'd vessels lie,
Nor can his fleet endure so rough a sky."

These words soon scatter'd the remains of shame;
Confirm'd her hopes, and fann'd the rising flame.
With speed they seek the temples, and implore
With rich oblations each celestial pow'r:
Selected sheep with holy rites they slay
To Ceres, Bacchus, and the god of day.
But chief, to Juno's name the victims bled,
To Juno, guardian of the bridal bed.
The queen before the snowy heifer stands,
Amid the shrines, a goblet in her hands;
Between the horns she sheds the sacred wine,
And pays due honours to the pow'rs divine;
Moves round the fane in solemn pomp, and loads,
Day after day, the altars of the gods.
Then hovering o'er, the fair consults in vain
The panting entrails of the victims slain:
But ah! no sacred rites her pain remove;
Priests, pray'rs, and temples! what are you to love?
With passion fir'd, her reason quite o'erthrown,
The hapless queen runs raving through the town.
Soft flames consume her vitals, and the dart,
Deep, deep within, lies festering in her heart.

So sends he heedless hunter's twanging bow
The shaft that quivers in the bleeding doe;
Stung with the stroke, and madding with the pain,

She wildly flies from wood to wood in vain;
Shoots o'er the Cretan lawns with many a bound,
The cleaving dart still rankling in the wound!

Now the food princess leads her hero on,
Shows him her Tyrian wealth, and growing
town;

Displays her pompous tow'rs that proudly rise,
And hopes to tempt him with the glorious prize;
Now as she tries to tell her raging flame,
Stops short,—and falters, check'd by conscious
shame:

Now, at the close of evening, calls her guest,
To share the banquet, and renew the feast:
She fondly begs him to repeat once more
The Trojan story that she heard before;
Then to distraction charm'd, in rapture hung
On every word, and dy'd upon his tongue.
But when the setting stars to rest invite,
And fading Cynthia veils her beamy light;
When all the guests retire to soft repose;
Left in the hall, she sighs, and vents her woe,
Lies on his couch, bedews it with her tears,
In fancy sees her absent prince, and hears
His charming voice still sounding in her ear.
Fir'd with the glorious hero's graceful look,
The young Ascanius on her lap she took,
With trifling play her furious pains beguil'd;
In vain!—the father charms her in the child.
No more the tow'rs, unfinish'd, rise in air:
The youth, undisciplin'd, no more prepare
Ports for the fleet, or bulwarks for the war;
The works and battlements neglected lie,
And the proud structures cease to brave the sky.

The fair thus rages with the mighty pain,
That fir'd her soul; and honour pleads in vain.
This Juno saw, and thus the bride of Jove,
In guileful terms address'd the queen of love:
"A high exploit indeed! a glorious name,
Unfading trophies and eternal fame,
You, and your son have worthily pursu'd!
Two gods a single woman have subdu'd!
To me your groundless jealousies are known,
And dark suspicions of this Tyrian town.
But why, why goddess, to what aim or end
In lasting quarrels should we still contend?
Hence then from strife resolve we both to cease,
And by the nuptial band confirm the peace.
To crown your wish, the queen with fond desire
Dies for your son, and melts with amorous fire.
Let us with equal sway protect the place,
The common guardians of the mingled race.
Be Tyre the dow'r to seal the glad accord,
And royal Dido serve this Phrygian lord."

To whom the queen! (who mark'd with piercing
eyes

The goddess labouring, in the dark disguise,
To Libyan shores from Latium to convey
The destin'd seat of universal sway;)

"Who this alliance madly would deny?
Or war with thee, dread empress of the sky?
And oh! that fortune in the work would join,
With full success to favour the design!
But much I doubt, O goddess, if the fates,
Or Jove permit us to unite the states.

You, as his consort, your request may move,
And search the will, or bend the mind of Jove.

Go than—your scheme before the father lay;
Go;—and I follow, where you lead the way.”
“Be mine the care,” th’ imperial dame replies,
“To gain the god, the sovereign of the skies.
Then heed my counsel—when the dawning light
Drives from the opening world the shades of night;
The prince and queen, transfixt with amorous flame.

Lead to the woods to hunt the savage game;
There, while the crowds the forest-walks beset,
Swarm round the woods, and spread the waving net;
The skies shall burst upon the sportive train
In storms of hail, and deluges of rain;
The gather’d tempest, o’er their heads shall roll,
And the long thunders roar from pole to pole.
On ev’ry side shall fly the scattering crowds,
Involv’d and cover’d in a night of clouds.
To the same cave for shelter shall repair
The Trojan hero and the royal fair.
The lovers, if your will concurs with mine,
Ourselves in Hymen’s nuptial bands will join.”
The goddess gave consent, the compact bound,
But smil’d in secret at the fraud she found.

Scarce had Aurora left her orient bed,
And rear’d above the waves her radiant head,
When, pouring through the gates, the train appear,
Massylian hunters with the steely spear,
Sagacious hounds and toils, and all the sylvan war.
The queen engag’d in dress,—with reverence wait
The Tyria queen before the regal gate.
Her steed, with gold and purple cover’d round,
Neighs, champs the bit, and foaming paws the
ground.

At length she comes, magnificently drest
(Her guards attending) in a Tyria vest:
Back in a golden caul her locks are ty’d;
A golden quiver rattles at her side;
A golden clasp her purple garments binds,
And robes, that few redundant in the winds.
Next with the youthful Trojans to the sport
The fair Aecanius issues from the court.
But far the fairest, and supremely tall,
Tow’rs great Aeneas, and outshines them all.
As when from Lycia bound in wintry frost,
Where Xanthus’ streams enrich the smiling coast,
The beauteous Phoebus in high pomp retires,
And hears in Delos the triumphant quires;
The Cretan crowds and Dryopes advance,
And painted Scythians round his altars dance;
Fair wreaths of vivid bays his head infold,
His locks bound backward and adorn’d with gold;
The god majestic moves o’er Cynthus’ brows,
His golden quiver rattling as he goes:
So mov’d Aeneas; such his charming grace,
So glow’d the purple bloom, that flush’d his god-like face.

Soon as the train amid the mountains came,
And storm’d the covert of the savage game;
The goats flew bounding o’er the craggy brow
From rock to rock, and sought the fields below.
Here the fleet stags, chas’d down the tow’ring steep,
In clouds of dust through the long valley sweep:
While there, exulting, to his utmost speed
The young Aecanius spurs his fiery steed,
Outstrips by turns the flying social train,
And scorns the meaner triumphs of the plain:
The hopes of glory all his soul inflame;
Eager he longs to run at nobler game,
And drench his youthful javelin in the gore
Of the fierce lion, or the mountain bear.

Meantime loud thunders rattle round the sky,
And hail and rain, in mingled tempest, fly;
While floods on floods, in swelling turbid tides,
Roll roaring down the mountain’s channel’d sides.
The young Aecanius, and the hunting train,
To close retreats fled diverse o’er the plain.
To the same gloomy cave with speed repair
The Trojan hero and the royal fair.
Earth shakes, and Juno gives the nuptial signs;
With quivering flames the glimmering grotto shines:

With light’nings all the conscious skies are spread;
The nymphs run shrieking round the mountain’s
head.

From that sad day, unhappy Dido! rose
Shame, death, and ruin, and a length of woes.
Nor fame nor censure now the queen can move,
No more she labours to conceal her love.
Her passion stands avow’d; and wedlock’s name
Adorns the crime, and sanctifies the shame.

Now Fame, tremendous fiend! without delay
Through Libyan cities took her rapid way:
Fame, the swift plague, that every moment grows,
And gains new strength and vigour as she goes,
First small with fear, she swells to wondrous size,
And stalks on Earth, and tow’rs above the skies;
Whom, in her wrath to Heaven, the teeming Earth
Produce’d the last of her gigantic birth;
A monster huge, and dreadful to the eye,
With rapid feet to run, or wings to fly.
Beneath her plumes the various fury bears
A thousand piercing eyes and list’ning ears;
And with a thousand mouths and babbling tongues appears. [Sings]

Thund’ring by night, through Heaven and Earth she
No golden slumbers seal her watchful eyes;
On tow’rs of battlement she sits by day,
And shakes whole towns with terrour and dismay;
Alarms the world around, and perch’d on high,
Reports a truth, or publishes a lie.
Now both she mingled with malignant joy,
And told the nations, that a prince from Troy
Inflam’d with love the Tyria queen, who led
The godlike stranger to her bridal bed;
That both, indulging to their soft desires,
And deaf to censure, melt in amorous fires:
From every thought the cares of state remove,
And the long winter pass’d away in love.

This tale the fury glories to display,
Then to the king Iarbas bent her way;
With jealous rage the furious prince inspires,
And all his soul with indignation fires.
This monarch sprung from Ammon’s warm embrace
With a fair nymph of Garamantic race.
The mighty king a hundred temples rais’d;
An hundred altars that with victims blaz’d.
Through all his realms, in honour of his sire;
And watch’d the hallow’d everlasting fire;
With various wreaths adorn’d the holy door,
And drench’d the soil with consecrated gore.
Amid the statues of the gods he stands,
And, spreading forth to Jove his lifted hands,
Fir’d with the tale, and raving with despair,
Prefers in bitterness of soul his pray’r.

“Almighty Jove! to whom our Moorish line
In large libations pour the generous wine,
And feast on painted beds; say, father, say,
If yet thy eyes these flagrant crimes survey.
Or do we vainly tremble and adore,
When through the skies the pealing thunders roar!

Thine are the belts? or idly do they fall,
And rattle through the dark aerial hall?
A wand'ring woman, who on Libya thrown,
Rais'd on a purchas'd spot a slender town;
On terms ourself prescrib'd, was glad to gain
A barren tract that runs along the main;
The proffer'd nuptials of thy son abhor'd;
But to her throne receives a Dardan lord.
And lo! this second Paris come again,
With his unmanly, soft, luxurious train,
In scented tresses and a mitre gay,
To bear my bride, his ravish'd prize, away;
While still in vain we bid thy altars flame,
And pay our vows to nothing but a name."

Him, as he grasp'd his altars, and proffer'd
His wrathful pray'r, th' almighty father heard;
Then to the palace turn'd his awful eye,
Where, careless of their fame, the lovers lie.
The god, that scene offended to survey,
Charg'd with his high command the son of May:

"Fly, fly, my son, our orders to perform;
Mount the fleet wind, and ride the rapid storm;
Fly—to you Dardan chief in Carthage bear
Our awful mandate through the fields of air,
Who idly ling'ring in the Tyrian state,
Neglects the promis'd walls decreed by fate.
Not such a prince, the beauteous queen of love
(When twice she sav'd him) promis'd him to Jove;
A prince she promis'd who by deeds divine
Should prove he sprung from Teucer's martial line;

Whose sword imperial Italy should awe,
A warlike realm! and give the world the law.
If no such glories can his mind inflame,
If he neglects his own immortal fame;
What has his heir the young Ascanius done?
Why should he grieve an empire to his son?
What scheme, what prospect can the chief propose,
So long to loiter with a race of foes?
The promis'd kingdom to regard no more,
And quite neglect the destin'd Latian shore?
Haste—bid him sail—be this our will; and bear
With speed this mandate through the fields of air."

Swift at the word, the dateous son of May Prepares th' almighty's orders to obey;
First round his feet the golden wings he bound,
That sped his progress o'er the seas profound,
Or earth's unmeasur'd regions, as he flies,
Whapp'd in a rapid whirlwind, down the skies.
Then grasp'd the wand; the wand that calls the ghosts

From Hell, or drives 'em to the Stygian coasts,
Invites or chases sleep with wond'rous pow'r,
And opens those eyes that death had seal'd before.
Thus arm'd, on wings of winds sublimely rode Through heaps of opening clouds the flying god.
From far huge Atlas' rocky sides he spies,
Atlas, whose head supports the starry skies:
Beat by the winds and driving rains, he shrouds
His shady forehead in surrounding clouds;
With ice his horrid beard is crusted o'er;
From his bleak brows the gushing torrents pour;
Out-spread, his mighty shoulders heave below
The hoary piles of everlasting snow.
Here on pois'd pinions stoop'd the panting god;
Then, from the steep, shot headlong to the flood.
As the swift sea-mew, for the fishy prey,
In low excursions skims along the sea,
By rocks and shores, and wings th' aerial way;

So, from his kindred mountain, Hermes flies
Between th' extended earth and starry skies;
Thus through the parting air his course he bore,
And, gliding, skimm'd along the Libyan shore.
Soon as the winged god to Carthage came,
He finds the prince forgetful of his fame:
The rising domes employ his idle hours,
Th' unfinished palaces and Tyrian tow'rs.
A sword all starr'd with gems, and spangled o'er
With yellow jaspers, at his side he wore;
A robe refulgent from his shoulders glow'd
That, flaming, deep with Tyrian crimson glow'd;
The work of Dido; whose unrivall'd art
With flow'rs of gold embroider'd every part.

To whom the god:—"These hours canst thou employ

To raise proud Carthage, heedless prince of Troy?
Thus for a foreign bride to build a town
And form a state, forgetful of thy own?
The lord of Heav'n and Earth, almighty Jove,
With this command dispatch'd me from above;
What are thy hopes from this thy long delay?
Why thus in Libya pass thy hours away?
If future empire ceases thy thoughts to raise,
Or the fair prospect of immortal praise;
Regard Ascanius, prince, the royal boy;
The last, the best surviving hope of Troy;
To whom the fates decree, in time to come,
The long, long glories of imperial Rome."
He spoke, and speaking left him gazing there;
And all the fluid form dissolv'd in air.

The prince astonish'd stood, with horror stung;
Fear rais'd his hair, and wonder chain'd his tongue:

Struck and alarm'd with such a dread command,
He longs to leave the dear enchanting land.
But ah! with what address shall he begin,
How speak his purpose to the raving queen?
A thousand thoughts his wavering soul divide,
That turns each way, and strains on every side:
A thousand projects labouring in his breast,
On this at last he fixes as the best:
Mnestheus and brave Cloanthus he commands
To rig the fleet, to summon all the bands
In secret silence to the shore and hide
The sudden cause, that bids them tempt the tide.
Then while fair Dido, sick with fond desire,
Thinks such a boundless love can ne'er expire,
Himself the proper measures will prepare
To move the queen, and seize with watchful care
The softest moments to address the fair.
With speed impatient fly the chiefs a way,
And, fir'd with eager joy, the prince obey.

But soon the fraud unhappy Dido spies;
(For what can 'scape a lover's piercing eyes,
Who e'en in safety fears with wild affright?)
She first discern'd the meditated flight;
And Fame, infernal fiend, the news conveys,
The fleet was rigg'd and lanching on the seas.
Mad with despair, and all her soul on flame,
Around the city raves the royal dame:
So the fierce Bacchanal with frantic cries,
Stung by the god, to proud Cithæron flies,
And shakes her ivy spear and raves around,
While the huge mountain echoes to the sound.
At length, by potent love and grief oppress'd,
The queen, her recreant lover, first address:

"And could'st thou hope, dissembler, from my sight,
Ah! wretch perfidious! to conceal thy flight!

In such base silence from my realms to sail?
 Nor can our vows and plighted hands prevail,
 Nor Dido's cruel death thy flight detain?
 For death, death only can relieve my pain:
 And are thy vessels launch'd, while winter sweeps
 With the rough northern blast the roaring deeps?
 Barbarian! say, if Troy herself had stood,
 Nor foreign realms had call'd thee o'er the flood,
 Would'st thou thy sails in stormy seas employ,
 And brave the surge to gain thy native Troy?
 Me will you fly, to tempt the dangerous wave?
 Ah! by the tears I shed, the hand you gave;
 (For these still mine, and only these remain;
 The tears I shed, the hand you gave in vain!)
 By those late solemn nuptial bands I plead,
 By those first pleasures of the bridal bed,
 If e'er, when folded in your circling arms,
 You sigh'd, and praise'd these now neglected
 charms:

If pray'r can move thee, with this pray'r comply,
 Regard, Æneas, with a pitying eye
 A falling race, and lay thy purpose by.
 For thee Numidian kings in arms conspire;
 For thee have I incens'd the sons of Tyre;
 For thee I lost my honour and my fame,
 That to the stars advanc'd my glorious name.
 Must I in death thy cruel scorn deplore, [more!
 My barbarous guest!—but ah!—my spouse no
 What—shall I wait, till fierce Pygmalion pours
 From Tyre on Carthage, and destroys my tow'rs?
 Shall I in proud Iarbas' chains be led
 A slave, a captive to the tyrant's bed?
 Ah!—had I brought, before thy fatal fight,
 Some little offspring of our loves to light;
 If in my regal hall I could survey
 Some princely boy, some young Æneas play;
 Thy dear resemblance but in looks alone!
 I should not seem quite widow'd and undone.”

She said; the prince stood still in grief profound,
 And fix'd his eyes relentless on the ground;
 By Jove's high will admonish'd from the skies;
 At length the hero thus in brief replies.

“Your bounties, queen, I never can forget;
 And never, never pay the mighty debt;
 But, long as life informs this fleeting frame,
 My soul shall honour fair Eliza's name.
 Then hear my plea:—By stealth I ne'er design'd
 To leave your hospitable realm behind;
 Forbear the thought;—much less in Libyan lands,
 A casual guest, to own the bridal bands.
 Had fate allow'd me to consult my ease,
 To live and settle on what terms I please;
 Still had I stay'd in Asia, to enjoy
 The dear, dear relics of my native Troy:
 Rais'd royal Priam's ruin'd tow'rs again,
 A second Ilium for my vanquish'd train.
 But now, fair queen, Apollo's high command
 Has call'd me to the fam'd Italian land;
 Thither, inspir'd by oracles, I move,
 There lies my country, and there lies my love.
 If you your rising Carthage thus admire
 In these strange realms, a foreigner from Tyre,
 Why should not Teucer's race be free to gain
 The Latian kingdom, as the gods ordain?
 Oft as the stars display their fiery light,
 And Earth lies cover'd in the shades of night,
 My father's angry spirit blames my stay,
 Stalks round my bed, and summons me away.
 Long has Ascanius call'd me hence in vain,
 By me defrauded of his destin'd reign.

And now, ev'n now, the messenger of Jove
 (Both gods can witness) shot from Heav'n above:
 Charg'd with the thunderer's high commands he flew,

The glorious form appear'd in open view:
 I saw him pass these lofty walls, and hear
 His awful voice still murmuring in my ear.
 Then cease, my beauteous princess, to complain;
 Nor let us both be discompos'd in vain:
 From these dear arms to Latium forc'd away;
 'Tis fate that calls, and fate I must obey.”

Thus while he spoke, with high disdain and pride
 She roll'd her wrathful eyes on every side,
 That glance in silence o'er the guilty man,
 And, all inflam'd with fury, she began:

“Perfidious monster! boast thy birth no more,
 No hero get thee, and no goddess bore.
 No!—thou wert brought by Scythian rocks to day,
 By tigers nurs'd, and savages of prey;
 But far more rugged, wild, and fierce than they.
 For why, ah! why the traitor should I spare?
 What baser wrongs can I be doom'd to bear?
 Did he once deign to turn his scornful eyes?
 Did he once groan at all my piercing sighs?
 Dropp'd he one tear in pity to my cries?
 Calm he look'd on, and saw my passion burst.
 Which, which of all his insults was the worst?
 And yet great Jove and Juno from the sky
 Behold his treason with a careless eye;
 Guilt, guilt prevails; and justice is no more.
 The needy wretch just cast upon my shore,
 Fool as I was! with open arms I led
 At once a partner to my throne and bed;
 From instant death I sav'd his famish'd train,
 His shatter'd fleet I stor'd and rigg'd again.
 But ah I rave;—my soul the furies fire;
 Now great Apollo warns him to retire;
 With all his oracles forbids to stay;
 And now through air with haste the son of May Conveys Jove's orders from the blest abodes;
 A care well worthy to disturb the gods!
 Go then, I plead not, nor thy flight delay;
 Go, seek new kingdoms through the wat'ry way:
 But there may every god, thy crime provokes,
 Reward thy guilt, and dash thee on the rocks;
 Then shalt thou call, amid the howling main,
 On injur'd Dido's name, nor call in vain;
 For, wrapt in fires, I'll follow through the sky,
 Flash in thy face, or glare tremendous by.
 When death's cold hand my struggling soul shall
 My ghost in every place shall wait on thee: [free,
 My vengeful spirit shall thy torments know,
 And smile with transport in the realms below.”

With that, abrupt she took her sudden flight;
 Sick of the day, she loaths the golden light;
 And turns, while fault'ring he attempts to say
 Ten thousand things, disdainfully away;
 Sunk in their arms the trembling handmaids led
 The fainting princess to the regal bed.

But though the pious hero tries with care,
 And melting words, to soothe her fierce
 despair,
 Stung with the pains and agonies of love,
 Still he regards the high commands of Jove;
 Repairs the fleet; and soon the busy train
 Roll down the lofty vessels to the main.
 New-rigg'd, the navy glides along the flood;
 Whole trees they bring, unfashion'd from the wood,
 And leafy saplings to supply their oars,
 Pour from the town, and darken all the shore.

So when the plumpies, an industrious train,
Embody'd, rob some golden heap of grain,
Studious, ere stormy winter frowns, to lay
Safe in their darksome cells the treasur'd prey;
In one long track the dusky legions lead
Their prize in triumph through the verdant mead:
Here, bending with the load, a panting throng
With force conjoin'd heave some huge grain along:
Some lash the stragglers to the task assign'd,
Some, to their ranks, the bands that lag behind:
They crowd the peopled path in thick array,
Glow at the work, and darken all the way.

At that sad prospect, that tormenting scene,
What thoughts, what woes were thine, unhappy queen!

How loud thy groans, when from thy lofty tow'r
Thy eyes survey'd the tumult on the shore;
When on the floods thou heard'st the shouting train
Plough with resounding oars the wat'ry plain?
To what submissions, of what low degree,
Are mortals urg'd, imperious love, by thee?
Once more she flies to pray'rs and tears, to move
Th' obdurate prince; and anger melts to love;
Tries all her suppliant female arts again
Before her death;—but tries 'em all in vain:

“ Sister, behold, from every side they pour
With eager speed, and gather to the shore.
Hark—how with shouts they catch the springing
gales,

And crown their ships, and spread their flying sails.

Ah! had I once foreseen the fatal blow,
Sare, I had borne this mighty weight of woe.
Yet, yet, my Anna, this one trial make
For thy despairing, dying sister's sake.
For ah! the dear perfidious wretch, I see,
Lays open all his secret soul to thee.
In all his thoughts you ever bore a part,
You know the nearest passage to his heart.
Go then, dear sister, as a suppliant go,
Tell, in the humblest terms, my haughty foe,
I ne'er conspir'd at Aulis to destroy,
With vengeful Greece, the hapless race of Troy;
Nor sent one vessel to the Phrygian coast,
Nor rak'd abroad his father's sacred dust.
From all the pray'rs a dying queen prefers,
Why will he turn his unrelenting ears?
Whither, ah whither, will the tyrant fly?

I beg but this one grace before I die,
To wait for calmer seas and softer gales
To smooth the floods, and fill his opening sails.
Tell my perfidious lover, I implore
The name of wedlock he disclaims no more:
No more his purpos'd voyage I detain
From beauteous Latium, and his destin'd reign.
For some small interval of time I move,
Some short, short season to subdue my love;
Till reconcil'd to this unhappy state,
I grow at last familiar with my fate:
This favour, if he grant, my death shall please
His cruel soul, and set us both at ease.”

Thus pray'd the queen; the sister bears in vain
The moving message, and returns again.
He stands inflexible to pray'rs and tears,
For Jove and fate had stopp'd the hero's ears.

As o'er th' aerial Alps sublimely spread,
Some aged oak uprears his reverend head;
This way and that the furious tempests blow,
To lay the monarch of the mountains low;
Th' imperial plant, though nodding at the sound,
Though all his scatter'd honours strew the ground,

Safe in his strength, and seated on the rock,

In naked majesty defies the shock:
High as the head shoots tow'ring to the skies,
So deep the root in Hell's foundations lies.
Thus is the prince besieg'd by constant pray'rs:
But though his heart relents at Dido's cares,
Still firm the dictates of his soul remain,
And tears are shed, and vows prefer'd in vain.

Now tir'd with life, abandon'd Dido grows;
Now bent on fate, and harass'd with her woes,
She loaths the day, she sickens at the sky,
And longs, in bitterness of soul, to die.
To urge the scheme of death already laid,
Full many a direful omen she survey'd:
While to the gods she pour'd the wine, she view'd
The pure libation turn'd to sable blood.
This horrid omen to herself reveal'd,
Ev'n from her sister's ears she kept conceal'd;
Yet more—a temple, where she paid her vows,
Rose in the palace to her former spouse;
A marble structure; this she dress'd around
With snowy wool; with sacred chaplets crown'd.
From hence, when gloomy night succeeds the day,
Her husband seems to summon her away.

Perch'd in the roof the bird of night complains,
In one sad length of melancholy strains;
Now dire predictions rack her mind, foretold
By prescient sages, and the seers of old;
Now stern Æneas, her eternal theme,
Haunts her distracted soul in ev'ry dream;
In slumber now she seems to travel on,
Through dreary wilds, abandon'd and alone;
And treads a dark uncomfortable plain,
And seeks her Tyriacs o'er the waste in vain.
So Pentheus rav'd, when, flaming to his eyes,
He saw the furies from the deeps arise;
And view'd a double Thebes with wild amaze,
And two bright Suns with rival glories blaze.
So bounds the mad Orestes o'er the stage,
With looks distracted, from his mother's rage;
Arm'd with her scourge of snakes she drives him on,
And, wrapt in flames, pursues her murdering son;
He flies, but dies in vain;—the furies wait,
And send in forms tremendous guard the gate.

At length, distracted, and by love o'ercome,
Resolv'd on death, she meditates her doom;
Appoints the time to end her mighty woe,
And takes due measures for the purpos'd blow.
Then her sad sister she with smiles address'd,
Hope in her looks, but anguish at her breast:

“ Anna, partake my joy, for lo! I find
The sole expedient that can cure my mind,
Relieve my soul for ever from her pain,
Or bring my lover to my arms again.
Near Ocean's utmost bound, a region lies,
Where mighty Atlas props the starry skies;
There lives a priestess of Massylian strain,
The guardian of the rich Hesperian fane;
Who wont the wakeful dragon once to feed
With honey'd cakes, and poppy's drowsy seed,
That round the tree his shining volumes roll'd
To guard the sacred balls of blooming gold.
By magic charms the matron can remove,
Or fiercely kindle all the fires of love;
Roll back the stars; stop rivers as they flow;
And call grim spectres from the realms of woe.
Trees leave their mountains at her potent call;
Beneath her footsteps groans the trembling ball:
But witness thou, and all ye gods on high,
With what regret, to magic rites I fly.

Go then, erect with speed and secret care,
 Within the court, a pile in open air.
 Bring all the traitor's arms and robes, and spread
 Above the heap our fatal bridal bed.
 The sacred dame commands me to destroy
 All, all memorials of that wretch from Troy."

Thus with dissembling arts the princess spoke;
 A deadly paleness spreads o'er all her look.
 Nor could her wretched sister once divine
 These rites could cover such a dire design,
 Nor deem'd a lover treacherous to his vows
 Should more afflict her than her murderer's spouse;
 But rears a pile of oaks and firs on high,
 Within the court, beneath the naked sky. [round;
 With wreaths the queen adorn'd the structure
 And with funereal greens and garlands crown'd:
 Next, big with death, the sword and robe she spread,

And plac'd the dear, dear image on the bed.
 Amidst her altars, with dishevell'd hairs,
 Her horrid rites the priestess now prepares.
 Thund'ring she calls, in many a dreadful sound,
 On Chaos hoar, and Erebus profound;
 On hideous Hecate, from Hell's abodes,
 (The threefold Dian!) and a hundred gods.
 The place she sprinkled, where her altars stood,
 With streams dissembled from Avernus' flood.
 And black envenom'd herbs she brings, reap'd
 down

With brazen sickles, by the glimmering Moon.
 Then crops the potent knots of love with care,
 That from the young estrange the parent mare.
 Now with a sacred cake and lifted bands,
 All bent on death, before her altar stands
 The royal victim, the devoted fair;
 Her robes were gather'd, and one foot was bare.
 She calls on every star in solemn state,
 Whose guilty beams shine conscious of her fate:
 She calls to witness every god above,

To pay due vengeance for her injur'd love.
 'Twas night; and, weary with the toils of day,
 In soft repose the whole creation lay.
 The marblers of the groves and surges die,
 The stars roll solemn through the glowing sky;
 Wide o'er the fields a brooding silence reigns,
 The flocks lie stretch'd along the flow'ry plains;
 The furious savages that haunt the woods,
 The painted birds, the fishes of the floods;
 All, all, beneath the general darkness, share,
 In sleep, a soft forgetfulness of care;
 All but the hapless queen;—for love denies
 Rest to her thoughts, and slumber to her eyes.
 Her passions grow still fiercer, and by turns
 With love she maddens, and with wrath she burns.
 The struggling tides in different motions roll,
 And thus she vents the tempest of her soul:

"What shall I do?—shall I in vain implore
 The royal lovers I disdain'd before?
 Or, alighted in my turn with haughty pride,
 Court the fierce tyrant whom I once deny'd?
 Shall I the Trojans' base commands obey,
 Their slave, their suppliant, through the wat'ry
 Yes—for my bounties, and my former aid, [way?
 Py Troy already stand so well repaid!
 And yet suppose I were inclin'd to go;
 The haughty sailors would but mock my woe.
 Hast thou not yet, not yet, Fliza, known
 'The perjurd sons of proud Laomedon?
 What!—shall I follow through the roaring main,
 Sole and abandon'd, their triumphant train,

Or drive 'em through the deeps with sword and flail,
 With all my armies, all the sons of Tyre?
 But can I draw to sea those Tyrian bands
 I drew reluctant from their native lands?
 Die then as thou deserv'st; in death repose;
 The sword, the friendly sword, shall end thy woes.
 You first, dear sister, by my sorrows mov'd,
 Expos'd me rashly to the wretch I lov'd;
 Your prompt obedience, and officious care [Spain.
 Fann'd the young flame, and plung'd me in de-
 Oh! had I learn'd like savages to rove,
 And never known the woes of bridal love!
 I prov'd unfaithful to my former spouse,
 And now I reap the fruits of broken vows!"

Thus vents the mournful queen, by love oppress'd,
 The grief that rag'd tumultuous in her breast.
 Meantime, with all things ready for his fight,
 In thoughtless sleep the hero past the night.
 To whom again the feather'd Hermes came,
 His youthful figure, looks, and voice, the same,
 And thus alarms the slumb'ring prince once mort;
 "What—can'st thou sleep in this important hour!
 Nor all thy dangers canst thou yet survey?
 Nor hear the zephyrs call thee to the sea?
 Mad as thou art!—determin'd on her doom,
 She forms designs of mischiefs yet to come.
 'Tis then thy fury while thou yet canst fly,
 Before Aurora gilds the purple sky;
 Fly,—or the floods shall soon be cover'd o'er
 With numerous fleets, and armies crowd the shore,
 And direful brands with long projected rays,
 Shall set the land and ocean in a blaze.
 Ev'n now her dread revenge is on the wing;
 Rise, prince; a woman is a changeful thing."
 This said, at once he took his rapid flight,
 Dissolv'd in air, and mingled with the night.

The hero starts from sleep in wild surprise,
 Struck with the glorious vision from the skies,
 And rouses all the train: "Awake, unbind,
 And stretch, my friends, the canvass to the wind;
 Seize, seize your oars; the god descends again,
 To bid me fly; and launch into the main.
 Whoe'er thou art, thou blest celestial guide,
 Thy course we follow through the foamy tide;
 With joy thy sacred orders we obey;
 And may thy friendly stars direct the way."
 Sudden, he drew his sword as thus he said,
 And cut the haulers with the flaming blade;
 With the same ardour fir'd, the shouting train
 Fly, seize their oars, and rush into the main.
 At once the floods with ships were cover'd o'er,
 And not one Trojan left upon the shore;
 All stretching to the stroke, with vigour sweep
 The whitening surge, and plough the smoking sea.

Now o'er the glittering lawns Aurora spread
 Her orient beam, and left her golden bed.
 Soon as the queen at early dawn beheld
 The navy move along the wat'ry field,
 In pomp and order, from her lofty tow'r;
 And saw th' abandon'd port, and empty shore;
 Thrice her fierce hands in madness of despair
 Beat her white breast, and tore her golden hair.
 "Then shall the traitor fly, ye gods!" she said,
 "And leave my kingdom, and insulted bed?
 And shall not Carthage pour in arms away?
 Run thence, and launch my navies on the sea.
 Fly, fly with all your sails, ye sons of Tyre;
 Hurl flames on flames; involve his fleet in fire.
 What have I said?—ah! impotent and vain!
 I rave, I rave—what madness turns my brain?"

Now can you, Dido, at so late a time,
 Reflect with horror on your former crime?
 Well had this rage been shown, when first you led
 The wretch, a partner to your throne and bed.
 'Tis is the prince, the pious prince, who bore
 His gods and relics from the Phrygian shore!
 And safe convey'd his venerable sire!
 In his own shoulders through the Trojan fire?
 Would I not tear, and throw him for a prey,
 Base wretch!! to every monster of the sea?
 'Tis all his friends, his darling son destroy,
 And to his table serve the murder'd boy?
 Or bent on death, and valiant from despair,
 Say—could I dread the doubtful chance of war?
 No—but my flames had redd'n'd all the seas;
 Wrapt all the flying navy in the blaze;
 Destroy'd the race, the father and the son,
 And crown'd the general ruin with my own.
 Thou glorious Sun! whose piercing eyes survey
 These worlds terrestrial in thy fiery way,
 And thou, O Juno! bend thy awful head,
 Great queen, and guardian of the bridal bed;
 Fear thou, dire Hecate! from Hell profound,
 Whose rites nocturnal through the streets resound,
 Fear, all ye furies, fiends, and gods, who wait
 To pay due vengeance for Eliza's fate!
 Off to the destin'd port the wretch must come,
 If such be Jove's unalterable doom:
 Still let him wander, toss'd from place to place,
 Far from his country, and his son's embrace,
 By barbarous nations harass'd with alarms;
 And take the field with unsuccessful arms;
 Or foreign aid to distant regions fly,
 See all his friends a common carnage lie;
 And when he gains, his ruin to complete,
 A peace more shameful than his past defeat;
 For life nor empire let him long maintain,
 But fall, by murderous hands untimely slain,
 And lie unburied on the naked plain!
 This vow, ye gods, Eliza pakes in death,
 With her last blood, and her last gasping breath!
 Ah!—in the silent grave when Dido lies,
 Rise in thy rage, thou, great avenger, rise!
 Against curs'd Troy, go, mighty son of Tyre,
 So, in the pomp of famine, sword, and fire!
 And you, my Tyrians, with immortal hate,
 In future times, pursue the Dardan state.
 To peace, no commerce with the race be made:
 'Tis this last duty to your princess' shade;
 Fight, when your pow'r supplies so just a rage;
 Fight now, fight still, in every distant age;
 By land, by sea, in arms the nation dare,
 And wage, from son to son, eternal war!"

This said, she bends her various thoughts to close
 Her hated life, and finish all her woes.
 Then to her husband's nurse she gave command,
 Her own lay bury'd in her native land)
 "Go, Barce, go, and bid my sister bring
 The sable victims for the Stygian king,
 But first be sprinkled from the limpid spring.
 Thus let her come; and, while I pay my vows,
 Thou too in fillets bind thy aged brows.
 'Tis vain would I kindle now the sacred pyre,
 And see the Trojan image sink in fire,
 Thus I complete the rites to Stygian Jove,
 And then farewell—a long farewell to love!"
 She said; the matron, studious to obey,
 With duteous speed runs trembling all the way.
 Now to the fatal court fierce Dido flies,
 And rolls around her fiery glaring eyes;

Though pale and shivering at her purpos'd doom,
 And every dreadful thought of death to come:
 Yet many a crimson flush, with various grace,
 Glows on her cheek, and kindles in her face.
 Furious she mounts the pyre, and draws the sword,
 The fatal present of the Dardan lord;
 For no such end bestow'd;—the conscious bed,
 And robes she view'd; and tears in silence shed;
 Stood still, and paus'd a moment—then she cast
 Her body on the couch, and spoke her last:
 "Ye dear, dear relics of the man I lov'd!
 While fate consented, and the gods approv'd,
 Relieve my woes, this rage of love control,
 Take my last breath, and catch my parting soul.
 My fatal course is finish'd, and I go
 A ghost majestic to the realms below.
 Well have I liv'd to see a glorious town
 Rais'd by these hands, and bulwarks of my own;
 Of all its trophies robb'd my brother's sword,
 And on the wretch reveng'd my murder'd lord.
 Happy! thrice happy! if the Dardan band
 Had never touch'd upon the Libyan land."
 Then pressing with her lips the Trojan bed,
 "Shall I then die, and unreveng'd?" she said;
 "Yet die I will,—and thus, and thus, I go—
 Thus—fly with pleasure to the shades below.
 This blaze may you proud Trojan from the sea,
 This death, an omen of his own, survey."

Meantime, the sad attendants, as she spoke,
 Beheld her strike, and sink beneath the stroke.
 At once her snowy hands were purpl'd o'er,
 And the bright falchion smok'd with streaming
 gore.

Her sudden fate is blaz'd the city round;
 The length'ning cries from street to street resound;
 To female shrieks the regal dome replies,
 And the shrill echoes ring amidst the skies;
 As all fair Carthage, or her mother Tyre,
 Storm'd by the foe, had sunk in floods of fire;
 And the fierce flame devour'd the proud abodes,
 With all the glorious temples of the gods.

Her breathless sister runs with eager pace,
 And beats her throbbing breast, and beautiful face,
 Pierce through the parting crowds the virgin flies,
 And on her dying dear Eliza cries.

"Was this, my Dido, ah! was this the way
 You took, your easy sister to betray?
 Was it for this my hands prepar'd the pyre,
 The fatal altar, and the funeral fire?
 Where shall my plaints begin?—ah! wretch un-
 Now left abandon'd to my woes alone! (done,
 Was I unworthy then, to yield my breath,
 And share thy sweet society in death?
 Me, me you should have call'd, your fate to share
 From the same weapon, and the same despair.
 And did these hands the lofty pile compose?
 Did I invoke our gods with solemn vows?
 Only—ah cruel! to be sent away
 From the sad scene of death I now survey?
 You by this fatal stroke, and I, and all,
 Your senate, people, and your Carthage fall.
 Bring, bring me water; let me bathe in death
 Her bleeding wounds, and catch her parting breath.
 Then up the steep ascent she flew, and prest
 Her dying sister to her heaving breast;
 With cries succeeding cries her robes unbound,
 To stanch the blood that issu'd from the wound,
 Her bosom groaning with convulsive pain,
 She strives to raise her heavy lids in vain,
 And in a moment sinks, and swoons again.

Propt on her elbow, thrice she rear'd her head,
And thrice fell back, and fainted on the bed;
Sought with her swimming eyes the golden light,
And saw the Sun, but sicken'd at the sight.

Then mighty Juno, with a melting eye,
Beheld her dreadful anguish from the sky;
And bade fair Iris, from the starry pole,
Fly, and enlarge her agoozing soul:
For as she dy'd by love before the time,
Nor fell by fate, nor perish'd for a crime,
Not yet had Proserpine, with early care,
Clipp'd from her head the fatal golden hair;
The solemn offering to the pow'rs below,
To free the spirit, and relieve her woe.
Swift from the glancing Sun the goddess drew
A thousand mingling colours, as she flew:
Then radiant hover'd o'er the dying fair;
"And lo! this consecrated lock I bear
To Stygian Jove: and now, as Heav'n ordains,
Release thy soul from these corporeal chains."
The goddess stretch'd her hand, as thus she said,
And clipp'd the sacred honours of her head;
The vital spirit flies, no more confin'd,
Dissolves in air, and mingles with the wind.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK V.

ARGUMENT.

Æneas setting sail from Africa, is driven by a storm on the coasts of Sicily, where he is hospitably received by his friend Acestes, king of part of the island, and born of Trojan parentage. He celebrates the memory of his father with divine honours, institutes funeral games, and appoints prizes for those who should conquer in them. While the ceremonies were performing, Juno sends Iris to persuade the Trojan women to burn the ships, who, upon her instigation, set fire to them; which burnt four, and would have consumed the rest, had not Jupiter by a sudden shower extinguished it. Upon this, Æneas, by the advice of one of his generals, and a vision of his father, builds a city, for the women, old men, and others, who were either unfit for war, or weary of the voyage; and sails for Italy. Venus procures of Neptune a safe voyage for him and all his men, excepting only his pilot Palinurus, who was unfortunately lost.

Now, with a prosperous breeze, Æneas held
His destin'd course, and plough'd the wat'ry field;
Unhappy Dido's funeral flames surveys,
That gild the spires, and round the bulwarks blaze:
But soon the hidden cause the prince divin'd
From the known transports of a female mind;
With such a whirl their fiery passions move,
In the mad rage of disappointed love!

Now o'er the deep the rapid galleys fly,
And the vast round was only wave and sky.
A cloud all charg'd with livid darkness spreads,
Black'ning the floods, and gathering o'er their Aloud the careful Palinurus cries: [heads.
"Lo! what a dreadful storm involves the skies!

Oh! Neptune, mighty father of the main!
What tempests threaten from thy wat'ry reign!
Then he commands to furl the sails, and sweep,
With every bending oar, the foamy deep.
Himself, to break the blast, his sails inclin'd,
And fled obliquely with the driving wind.
"Oh! mighty prince," the trembling master cry'd,
"Scarce could I hope, in such a tossing tide,
To reach Hesperia, and surmount the flood,
Though Jove had past the promise of a god.
See! from the west what thwarting winds arise!
How in one cloud are gather'd half the skies!
In vain our course we labour to maintain,
And, struggling, work against the storm in vain.
Let us, since Fortune mocks our toil, obey,
And speed our voyage, where she points the way.
For not far distant lies the realm, that bore
Your brother Eryx, the Sicilian shore,
If right I judge, whose eyes with constant care
Have watch'd the Heav'n's, retracing every star."

"I see," reply'd the prince, "thy fruitless pain,
That long has struggled with the winds in vain.
Then change thy course, the whirling gusts obey,
And steer with open sails a different way.
Oh! to what dearer land can I retreat?
There I may rig again my shatter'd fleet:
That land my father's sacred dust contains,
And there my Trojan friend, Acestes, reigns."
This said, they steer their course; the western gales

With friendly breezes stretch their belying sails;
Smooth o'er the tides the flying navy past,
And reach'd with joy the well-known shore at last.

The king with wonder from a mountain's brow
Beheld the fleet approach the coast below;
Then, with a javelin in his hand, descends,
Clad in a lion's spoils, to meet his friends.
This monarch sprung from great Crimisus' blood;
His Trojan mother mingling with the god.
With due regard he hails the kindred train,
Arriv'd from Carthage at his realms again:
With feasts their fainting spirits he restor'd;
And rural viands crown'd the generous board.

Now the diminish'd stars had fled away
Before the glories of the dawning day.
His friends Æneas summon'd from the coast;
Then from a rising point bespoke the host:
"Ye far-fam'd sons of Troy, a race divine,
Whose fathers sprung from Jove's immortal line,
Now the full circle of the year runs round,
Rais'd verdant altars to the mighty shade,
And paid all funeral honours to the dead:
And now the fatal day is just return'd,
By me (so Heaven ordains) with rites ador'd,
For ever honour'd, and for ever mourn'd;
Though banish'd to the burning Libyan sand,
Though led a captive to the Argive land,
Though lost and shipwreck'd on the Grecian sea,
Still would I solemnize this sacred day.
Sure all the friendly pow'rs our course inspire,
To the dear relics of my reverend sire.
Haste then, the new-adopted god adore,
And from his grace a prosperous gale implore;
Implore a city, where we still may pay,
In his own fane, the honours of the day.
On every ship two oxen are bestow'd
By great Acestes, of our Dardan blood;
Call to the feast your native Phrygian pow'rs,
With those the hospitable king adores.

as the ninth fair morning's opening light
 glid the world, and chase the shades of night, to my Trojans I propose, to grace
 the sacred rites, the rapid naval race;
 all, who glory in their matchless force,
 raunt their fiery swiftness in the course,
 dart the spear, or bend the twanging bow,
 do the dreadful gauntlet dare the foe,
 and each by merit bear away
 noble palms, and glories of the day.
 grace your heads with verdant wreaths," he
 said;
 with his mother's myrtle binds his head.
 e him, Accetes, and the royal boy,
 n their brows, with all the youth of Troy.
 ow to the tomb, surrounded with a throng, ighty train, the hero past along.
 o bowls of milk, and sacred blood, he pours;
 o of pure wine; and scatters purple flow'rs.
 on thus—"Hail, sacred sire! all hail again!
 e more restor'd, but ah! restor'd in vain!
 as more than envious fate would give, to see e destin'd realms of Italy with thee;
 mighty Tyber's rolling streams explore,
 e sacred flood, that bathes th' Ansonian shore."
 ace had he said, when, beauteous to behold!
 n the deep tomb, with many a shining fold, azure serpent rose, in scales that flam'd with gold: [shone,
 to Heaven's bright bow his varying beauties draws a thousand colours from the Sun:
 's'd round the altars and the tomb to wind,
 's glittering length of volumes trails behind.
 e chief, in deep amaze, suspended hung,
 hile through the bowls the serpent glides along;
 eates all the food, then softly slides away,
 eiks the dark tomb, and quits the sacred prey;
 eonish'd at the sight, the hero paid
 w rites, new honours, to his father's shade, eubs if the demon of his sire rever'd,
 y the kind genius of the place appear'd.
 ve sable steers he slew with rites divine,
 e many snowy sheep, and bristly swine;
 ad pouring wine, invoc'd his father's shade,
 ut from the darksome regions of the dead.
 hen all the train, who gather'd round the grave,
 eech for his rank, proportion'd treasures gave.
 e altars blaze; the victims round expire;
 eome hang the massy cauldrons o'er the fire:
 eome o'er the grass the glowing embers spread;
 eome broil the entrails on the burning bed.
 Now bright the ninth expected morning shone;
 Now rose the fiery coursers of the Sun,
 When endless crowds the vast assembly crown'd
 From all the wide dispeopled country round.
 Some rou'd by great Accetes' mighty name,
 Some to behold the Trojan strangers came,
 Some to contend, and try the noble game.
 In view, amid the spacious circle, lay
 The costly gifts, the prizes of the day.
 Arms on the ground, and sacred tripods glow,
 With wreaths and palms to bind the victor's brow.
 Silver and purple vests in heaps are roll'd,
 Rich robes, and talents of the purest gold;
 And from a mount the sprightly trump proclaims
 To all the gather'd crowd the glorious games.
 Four well-match'd gallees first, by oars impell'd
 Drawn from the navy, took the wat'ry field.
 In the swift Dolphin mighty Mnestheus came,
 Mnestheus, the founder of the Memmian name.

Next Gyas in the vast Chimera sweeps
 (Huge as a town) the hoarse resounding deeps:
 Three rows of oars employ the panting train,
 To push th' enormous burthen o'er the main:
 Sergestus in the Centaur took his place,
 The glorious father of the Sergian race.
 In the blue Scylla great Cloanthus rode,
 The noble source of our Cluencian blood.
 Far in the main a rock advances o'er
 The level tides, and fronts the foamy shore,
 That hid beneath the rolling ocean lies,
 When the black storms involve the starry skies,
 But in a calm its lofty head displays
 To rest the birds who wing the spacious seas.
 Here the great hero fixt an oaken bough,
 A mark, that nodded o'er the craggy brow;
 To teach the train to steer the backward way,
 And fetch a shorter circle round the sea:
 Then, rank'd by lot, conspicuous o'er the flood,
 The chiefs, array'd in gold and purple, glow'd.
 The youths green poplars round their temples twine,
 And bright with oil their naked bodies shine,
 Eager they grasp their oars, and list'ning wait the sign.
 Thick in their hearts alternate motions play,
 Now, preat with beating fears, they sink away,
 Now throb with rising hopes to win the glorious day.
 Soon as the tramp the first shrill signal blew,
 All, in a moment, from the barrier flew:
 Turn'd by their labouring oars the surges rise,
 And with their shouts the sailors rend the skies,
 The foamy tides with equal furrows sweep;
 And, opening to the keel, divides the hoary deep.
 Not half so swift the fiery coursers pour,
 And, as they start, the distant plain devour;
 Nor half so fierce the drivers, pois'd in air,
 Urge the fleet steeds to whirl the flying car,
 Throw up the reins, and, bending o'er the yoke,
 Shout, lash, and send their souls at every stroke.
 The crowds in parties join; and, to the cries,
 And eager shouts, the hollow wood replies:
 While hills to hills repeat the mingled roar,
 And the long echo rolls around the winding shore,
 With peals of loud applause from every side
 First Gyas flew, and shot along the tide.
 Cloanthus follows, but his pond'rous ship,
 Though better mann'd, moves heavier on the deep.
 Behind, the Dolphin and the Centaur lay,
 At equal distance, on the wat'ry way:
 Now darts the rapid Dolphin o'er the main,
 Now the vast Centaur wins the day again:
 Then, side by side, and front by front, they join,
 And plough in frothy tracks the ruffled brine.
 And now proud Gyas reach'd th' appointed place,
 Awhile the victor of the wat'ry race;
 Then to Menetes call'd, and gave command,
 To leave the right, and steer against the land:
 "Let others plough the deep;"—in vain he spoke,
 The cautious pilot dreads the lurking rock,
 And turns his prow, and steers a different road,
 And leaves the shallows for the open flood.
 Once more in vain the raging Gyas cry'd,
 And lo! that moment, brave Cloanthus spy'd
 Close at his back, who plough'd the nearer tide,
 The dangerous way the daring hero took
 Between bold Gyas and the sounding rock.
 Sudden beyond the chief he shoots away,
 Clear of the goal, and gains the roomy sea.
 Then Gyas wept; and grief and rage inflam'd
 The youth, forgetful of his friends and fame.

From the high stern, with anger and disdain,
 He hurl'd the hoary master in the main ;
 Then madly took himself the sole command,
 And fir'd his train, and bore upon the land.
 Hoary with age, and struggling long in vain,
 With cumb'rous vests, Menetes mounts again :
 Trembling he climb'd a lofty rock ; and dry'd
 His limbs, all drench'd and reeking with the tide.
 Loud laugh'd the crowds to see him shoot away,
 Drink and disgorge, by turns, the briny sea.
 At distance Mnestheus and Sergestus lie ;
 Both hope to pass the fiery Gyas by,
 The 'vantage first the bold Sergestus took,
 With rapid speed, advancing to the rock ;
 But not a length before : the Dolphin rides
 With rival speed, and bears upon her sides.
 Brave Mnestheus now inflames his naval crew,
 As o'er the deck from man to man he flew :
 " My brave associates, in whose aid I trust,
 You, whom I chose, when Iliou sunk in dust,
 Now show the strength and spirit once you show'd,
 When raging storms, and Syrtis you withstood,
 Plough'd Malea's tide, and stem'd th' Ionian flood.
 Now, now, my friends, your utmost pow'r display,
 Rise to your oars, and sweep the wat'ry way :
 Nor strive we now the victory to gain,
 Though yet !—but ah ! let those the palm obtain,
 Those, whom thy favours crown, great monarch of
 But to return the lags of all the day, [the main !
 Oh ! wipe, my friends, that shameful stain away !"
 Fir'd at the word, each other they provoke ;
 Springs the swift ship at every vigorous stroke.
 With painful sweat their heaving bodies stream ;
 Thick pant their hearts, and trembles every limb.
 All bending to their pars the labour ply ;
 The sea rolls backward, and the surges fly.
 Now, with the wish'd success, they toil to gain,
 Indulgent fortune crowns the lab'ring train ;
 For while the fierce Sergestus nearer drew,
 And in a scanty space too rashly flew,
 (His road still narrower) with a mighty shock
 He rush'd against the sharp projected rock.
 Then flew the shatter'd oars, and flying rung,
 And on the rugged sides the vessel hung.
 To gain their floating oars, with mingled cries,
 All arm'd with iron poles, the sailors rise.
 Fir'd with success, along the open seas
 Proud Mnestheus shoots, invoking every breeze.
 As in her nest, within some cavern hung,
 The dove sits trembling o'er her callow young,
 Till rous'd at last by some impetuous shock,
 She starts surpris'd, and beats around the rock ;
 Then to the open field for refuge flies,
 And the free bird expatiates in the skies ;
 Her pinions pois'd, through liquid air she springs,
 And smoothly glides, nor moves her levell'd wings :
 So joyful Mnestheus darts, without control,
 O'er the wide ocean, and approach'd the goal ;
 So the swift Dolphin flies in open view,
 And gain'd new strength, new swiftness, as she flew.
 First by Sergestus' ship he shoots along,
 That in the shelves and dang'rous shallows hung ;
 With cries the chief his rival's aid implores,
 And strives in vain to row with shatter'd oars.
 Next fiery Gyas he with shouts pursu'd,
 Who, in the huge Chimera, stemm'd the flood ;
 She yields, depriv'd of her experienc'd guide,
 And sees her rival fly triumphant o'er the tide.
 Now, near the port, with all his pow'r he strains
 To pass Cloanthus, who the last remains.

The doubling shouts inspire him as he flies,
 And the long peal runs rattling round the skies :
 These, flush'd with pride, would cast their lives
 Ere they resign the glories of the day : [away,
 Those, by success, in strength and spirit rise,
 And their fierce hopes already win the prize.
 Thus haply both with level beaks had ply'd
 The surge, and rode the victors of the tide ;
 But brave Cloanthus o'er the rolling floods
 Stretch'd wide his hands, and thus invoc'd the gods :

" Ye pow'rs ! on whose wide empire I display
 My flying sails, and plough the wat'ry way ;
 Oh ! bear your suppliant, and my vow succeed ;
 Then on these shores a milk-white bull shall bleed,
 And purple wine your silver waves shall stain,
 And sacred victims glut the greedy main."
 Thus he—and every Nereid heard the vow,
 With mighty Phorcus from the deeps below.
 And great Portunus, with his ample hand,
 Push'd on the rapid galley to the land.
 Swift as the hissing javelin cuts the skies,
 Swift as a whirlwind, to the port she flies.

And now the herald's voice proclaims aloud
 Cloanthus victor, to the shouting crowd.
 The mighty prince himself, with verdant boughs
 Of vivid laurel, binds the hero's brow.
 Three steers, and one large talent, are bestow'd
 On every rival crew, that plough'd the flood.
 But to the glorious leaders, bold and brave,
 The generous chief distinguish'd honours gave.
 A robe the victor shar'd, where purple plays,
 Mixt with rich gold, in every shining maze.
 There royal Ganymede, enwrought with art,
 O'er hills and forests hunts the bounding hart ;
 The beauteous youth, all wondrous to behold !
 Pants in the moving threads, and lives in gold :
 From tow'ring Ida shoots the bird of Jove,
 And bears him struggling thro' the clouds above ;
 With out-stretch'd hands his hoary guardians of
 And the loud bounds spring furious at the sky.
 On Mnestheus next, the chief who bore away
 The second glorious honours of the day,
 A shining mail the generous prince bestow'd,
 That, rich with clasps of gold, refulgent glow'd,
 Who stript Demoleus of the costly load
 In Trojan fields, by Simois' mighty flood :
 Two labouring servants, with united toil
 And strength conjoin'd, scarce heav'd th' enormous spoil :

Yet in these arms, of old, with matchless might,
 The swift Demoleus chas'd his foes in fight.
 This mail, Æneas gave the chief to bear,
 A sure defence and ornament in war.
 The next rich presents mighty Gyas grace,
 Two pond'rous caldrons of refulgent brass ;
 Two silver goblets, wrought with art divine,
 That rough, and bright with sculptur'd figures shine
 Proud of their gifts the lofty leaders tread,
 And purple fillets glitter on their head.
 When, from the rock scarce disengag'd with pain,
 Sergestus brings his shatter'd ship again,
 One side all maim'd, she slowly moves along,
 Spoil'd of her oars, amid the booting throng ;
 As when a ling'ring fate the serpent feels,
 Obliquely crush'd beneath the brazen wheels,
 Or, bruise'd and mangled by the cruel swain
 With some huge stone, writhes with the shooting pain.

Add rolls and twists her scaly folds in train

Above, all fierce her glittering volumes rise,
Flames in her crest, and lightning in her eyes;
But maim'd below, and tardy with the wound,
Her brain unfolded drags along the ground.
So maim'd and slow the shatter'd galley past,
But, aided by her sails, she reach'd the port at last.

Near'd with the vessel and the crew restor'd,
The generous prince rewards their hapless lord.
The promis'd present to the chief he gave;
Pholœs, the beauteous female Cretan slave,
In works of art superior to the rest,
And proud of two fair infants at the breast.

This contest o'er; with thousands in his train,
Mov'd the great hero to a spacious plain.
High hills the verdant theatre surround;
And waving woods the mighty circuit crown'd.
Hither, with all the crowds, the prince withdrew,
And took his sylvan throne in open view.
Here costly gifts the chief propos'd, to grace
The sprightly youths that urge the rapid race.
Now through the Trojan and Sicilian band;
And first Euryalus and Nisus stand:

That, for his youthful charms admir'd by Troy;
This, for chaste friendship to the beauteous boy.
Next to the contest, warm with hopes of fame,
Of Priam's royal race, Dioreas came.
Salius and Patron then in order past;
Epiras one, and one Arcadia grac'd,
Brave Helymus and Panopes succeed,
Two valiant youths, in fair Trinacria bred;
Who with Acestes drove the savage race
From wood to wood, long practis'd to the chase.
And mighty numbers more, unknown to fame,
Advance in crowds, to share the glorious game.
High in the midst Æneas rear'd his head,
'And oh! attend, ye generous youths,' he said:
'Of all who try the fortune of the day,
Not one shall go without a gift away.

With two bright Cretan lances, each shall share
An ax with silver grav'd, to shine in war.
Distinguish'd gifts and olive wreaths shall grace
The three triumphant victors of the race.
On the first youth a courser I bestow,
Whose trappings rich with gold and purple glow?
The next a quiver, charg'd with shafts, shall claim,
Such as adorns an Amazonian dame;
Clasp'd by a gem, refulgent to behold,
Shines the bright trophy with a belt of gold.
On the proud youth this gift shall be conferr'd:
And this fair Argive helm shall grace the third."

This said, they took their place; the trumpet blew;

And all impetuous from the barrier flew:
Fierce as a tempest, o'er the plain they past
From the first space, and gain upon the last.
First Nisus sprung, and left the crowd behind,
Swift as the lightning, or the wings of wind.
Next, but the next with many a length between,
Young Salius skimm'd along the level green.
Euryalus, the third, scarce touch'd the plain;
Behind, bold Helymus his rival ran;
But, hovering o'er him, runs Dioreas nigh;
Now side by side, and foot by foot, they fly.
The youth had conquer'd in a longer way,
Or undecided left the honours of the day.
And now they just approach'd with rapid pace,
Tir'd with the toil, the limit of the race,
When Nisus fell amid the slippery plain,
Drench'd with the copious blood of victims slain.

His feet no more the shouting victor held;
Aloft they fly, and quiver on the field.
Headlong he fell, with mud all cover'd o'er,
And every limb was stain'd with sacred gore.
Yet, as he welter'd on the ground, he strove
To show Euryalus his ardent love.

For now, ev'n now, the youth his body threw
Before his rival Salius, as he flew:
He fell, and on the ground extended lay;
Thus, favour'd by his friend, sprung swift away.
The young Euryalus, and won the day.
At once beyond the goal the victor flies;
Shouts of applause tumultuous rend the skies.
Next Helymus, and next Dioreas came,
With eager ardour, now the third in fame.
Now Salius fills the ring with clam'rous cries,
By turns to every hoary judge applies,
Storms at the fraud, and claims the rightful prize.
But favour, winning tears, and youthful grace,
Plead for the boy, the victor of the race.
Dioreas too, before the partial crowd,
Defends the young Euryalus aloud;
Who now must urge his claim, should Salius gain
The first proud honours, to the third in vain.

Thus then the prince—"In order shall we pay
To each brave youth the prizes of the day:
Since these are shar'd, permit me to extend
One proof of pity to a hapless friend:"
This said, on Salius generous he bestow'd
A lion's yellow spoils, (a costly load!)
With martial pride his shoulders to enfold;
Rough was the dreadful mane, the paws were sheath'd in gold.

When Nisus thus—"If such high presents grace
Salius who fell, first vanquish'd in the race,
What gift shall I receive, who bore away,
And still had held, the honours of the day,
Had not that fortune, which my foe o'erthrew,
Befall'n unhappy Nisus, as he flew?"
Then show'd his robes and face with blood defil'd:
Th' indulgent father of the people smil'd,
And caus'd a mighty bucker to be brought,
With art divine by Didymæon wrought;
Great Neptune's gates the prize adorn'd in Troy,
Now the bright present loads the favour'd boy.

These gifts bestow'd; the hero cries aloud,
"Stand forth, ye valiant champions, from the crowd;

Who vaunt your courage and unrival'd might,
And with the gauntlet dare provoke the fight."
Then he propos'd, in gold and garments gay,
A bull, to grace the victor of the day.
Next, to relieve the loser's shame and pain,
Cast a rich sword and helmet on the plain.
Straight with a shout, supremely tall and strong,
Bold Darus rear'd his bulk above the throng;
The youth, the only youth, who dar'd withstand
The fierce tempestuous sway of Paris' hand,
Who on huge Butes prov'd his matchless might
At Hector's tomb, victorious in the fight;
(Bates, of Amycus' Bebrycian strain,
And stretch'd th' enormous giant on the plain.
Thus, glorying in his strength, in open view
His arms around, the tow'ring Darus threw,
Stalk'd high, and laid his brawny shoulders bare,
And dealt his whistling blows in empty air.
His match was sought; through all a terror ran;
All gaz'd and trembled at the mighty man.
Despair, he thought, had seiz'd the circling bands;
And now before the prince the champion stands;

Fierce by the horns the beauteous bull he took;
And in proud triumph to the hero spoke:
"Since none, oh! chief, accepts the proffer'd fray,

Why for his coward foe must Dares stay?
Permit me, prince, to lead my rightful prize away."
The Trojans clamour with applauding ories,
And for the youth demand the promis'd prize.
Then to Entellus old Aecetes said,
Who sat beside him on the flow'ry bed;
"Entellus!—once the bravest on the plain,
But ah! the bravest, and the best in vain!
With such tame patience can my friend survey
This prize, without a contest, borne away?
Where, where is now great Eryx' vaunted name;
The god, who taught our thund'ring arms the game,
The spoils that grace thy roof, and all thy former fame?"

"I am not dead," replies the chief, "to praise,
Nor yield to fear, but sink by length of days.
My nerves unstrung, my strength no more remains,
And age creeps shiv'ring through my joy veins.
Had I that vigour still, my youth could boast,
Or you vain champion vaunts to all the host,
Soon should this arm that insolence chastise,
For fame alone, without the proffer'd prize.
Ev'n now I scorn the combat to decline;
The prize I heed not; let the fame be mine!"

This said; amid the ring, in open view,
Two mighty gauntlets on the ground he threw:
These grac'd great Eryx in the fight of old,
And brae'd his arms with many a dreadful fold:
Seven thick bull-hides, their volumes huge dispread,
Pond'rous with iron and a weight of lead.
The host stood all astonish'd at the sight,
But Dares most, who now refus'd the fight:
The hero turns the folds, in wonder stands,
And pois'd the enormous gauntlets in his hands.
"How had you wonder'd," the bold champion said,
"Had you the huge Herculean arms survey'd?
Had you those pond'rous gloves of death beheld,
And the stern combat, on this fatal field?
These, prince, of old your brother Eryx wore,
Lo! you behold them still disdain'd with gore.
With these Aloides' force he long sustain'd,
And these I brandish'd, while my strength remain'd,
Ere the cold hand of envious age had shed
These marks of winter on my hoary head.
Yet, if your champion trembles at the sight,
Nor dares to meet these gauntlets in the fight;
If so Aeneas and the king incline;
Lo! to his fears these weapons I resign:
With equal arms the combat we will try;
And thou, lay thou, thy Trojan gauntlets by."

This said, the hero straight his robe unbound,
And cast the double garment on the ground;
Bares his huge brawny limbs, and on the sands,
Dreadful to view, the hoary champion stands.
Then the great prince with equal gauntlets bound
Their vigorous hands, and brae'd their arms around:
Their arms, that moment, each impetuous foe
Rear'd high in air, and rose to every blow;
And, while their raging hands the fight provoke,
Withdraw their heads from each tempestuous stroke.
This on his youth and active speed relies,
That on his bulk and tall gigantic size:
But each vast limb moves stiff and slow with age;
And thick short pantings shake the lab'ring sage.
Each, but in vain, a thousand strokes bestows;
Their sides and breasts re-echo to the blows.

With swift repeated wounds their heads fly round
Their heads and cheeks; their crackling jaws re-
Unmov'd Entellus, with a steadfast look (sound:
And watchful eye, avoids the furious stroke.
The youth invests his foe with all his pow'r,
As some brave leader a beleaguerr'd tow'r,
When on the bulwarks in his rage he falls,
And plants his engines round th' embattled walls;
On every side with fruitless skill and pain,
Eager he tries a pass or post to gain,
And storms the rocky battlements in vain.
And now his aim the bold Entellus took,
With his huge hand, high brandish'd for the stroke;
The youth observ'd the long-descending blow,
And leaps aside, and disappoints the foe:
The stroke was spent in air; with dreadful sound
Prone fell the champion thund'ring to the ground.
A pine thus tumbles to the vales below,
From Ida's top, or Erymanthus' brow.
At once the Trojans and Scythians rise,
And with divided clamours rend the skies.
And first Aecetes, touch'd with pity, ran
To raise his friend and old compeer again.
Swift from the fall, and with redoubled might Sprung the fierce hero, and renew'd the fight;
Improv'd in spirit, to the combat came,
While conscious valour sets his soul on flame,
Stung with disgrace, and more enrag'd with shame.
Now headlong o'er the field he drove the foe,
And rose in strength and wrath at every blow.
Now a thick storm of strokes around him flies,
Thick as the hail comes rattling from the skies;
With both his thund'ring hands the blows he
ply'd,

And turn'd his giddy foe on every side.
Then flew the good Aeneas, to assuage
The hero's wrath, and check the mighty rage:
From death he snatch'd the champion, and bega
To soothe the sorrows of the vanquish'd man:
"What madness, hapless Dares, has possess
Thy thoughtless mind, and fir'd thy daring breast!
Thy rival see, sustain'd by pow'r divine,
By other strength, and mightier force than thine!
Cease then, and give the vain contention o'er;
Cease, and oppose the hand of Heaven no more!"

The youth now drags his trembling legs along;
His loose head tott'ring o'er his shoulders hang,
Giddy with pain; he now ejects the blood,
His loosen'd teeth come mingled in the flood:
While in their arms his sad associates bore
The batter'd champion groaning to the shore,
The dear-bought sword and helmet brought away,
And left the palm and bull the victor's prey.

Now great Entellus, glorying in the prize,
And snub'd with conquest, thus, exalting cries;
"Behold, ye Trojans, and thou, chief divine,
What vigour, in the bloom of youth, was mine;
From what a thund'ring arm and fatal blow,
Your timely mercy has preserv'd my foe."
With that the chief, collected in his might,
Confronts the victim, the reward of fight;
Then rais'd his hand aloft, and from above,
With dreadful sway, the pond'rous gauntlet drop
Through the broad forehead of the stately bull,
And dash'd within the brain the batter'd skull.
The bull, convulsive with the deadly wound,
Groans, tumbles, rolls, and quivers on the ground.
Then, thus the hoary chief performs his vow,
"Eryx, on thee this victim I bestow;
A nobler victim than my Trojan foe!

To younger champions now the game I yield;
Here hang my conquering arms; and here renounce the field."

Next the great prince propos'd the prize to those,
Who wing'd the shafts, and bent the twanging bows.
Amid the spacious plain the hero plac'd
Sublime in air Sergestus' lofty mast;
Around the tapering top a dove they tye,
The trembling mark at which their arrows fly;
Hither to try their skill the warriors haste;
And in a brazen helm the lots are cast.
First, with applause, Hippocoön's lot was thrown,
The mighty Hyrtacus' illustrious son.
Mnestheus the next, whom verdant olives grace,
The second victor in the naval race.
Then the third chance to great Eurytion came,
Thy brother, Pandarus, renown'd by fame,
Whose hand by Pallas prompted, drew the bow,
To break the truce against the Grecian foe.
Last in the helm remain'd Acetes' name;
Old as he was, he try'd the youthful game.
Then every chief, with all his strength and art,
Bent the tough bow, and chose the feather'd dart.
Through yielding air first vanish'd with a spring
Hippocoön's arrow from the sounding string:
Full in the mast, impell'd with vigour stood
The forceful shaft, and quiver'd in the wood.
The dove affrighted, stretch'd her flutt'ring wing;
And with applause the vales and mountains ring.
Then Mnestheus drew the bow, and aim'd on high
The pointed dart, and level'd with his eye;
Nor through the mark the luckless arrow drove,
But cut the string that ty'd the trembling dove.
Swift through the clouds the bird unshackled flies,
And spreads her wings at freedom in the skies.
Already had Eurytion bent his bow,
And to his brother god address'd his vow:
The tow'ring bird amid the clouds he slew,
And the swift shaft transfix'd her as she flew.
High in the skies she feels the deadly wound,
And, with the dart, comes dying to the ground.
And now, all hopes expir'd, the conquest gain'd,
The venerable prince alone remain'd.
Yet he discharg'd the flying shaft, to show
His skill, his vigour, and resounding bow.
When sudden they beheld, with wond'ring eyes,
A dire portentous omen in the skies.
Too late the seers the frightful sign explain,
Too late they clear the dread event in vain!
For, flying through the clouds in open view,
The glowing arrow kindled as it flew;
Then drew a golden trail of flames behind,
That mark'd its course, and vanish'd in the wind:
So shine the falling stars with dreadful hair,
And glance, and shoot along the fields of air.
Amaz'd the Trojans and Sicilians stood;
And breath'd their ardent prayers to every god.
The Dardan prince the doubtful sign mistook,
Embrac'd the mosaroh, and with transport spoke:
"Father! accept the prize; the will divine
Of mighty Jove, by this auspicious sign,
Declares the first distinguish'd honours thine.
Accept this goblet, which my sire of old
Receiv'd from Cissens, rough with sculptur'd gold;
Take it, my royal friend, and let it prove
A long priz'd gift of dear respect and love."
Then he bestow'd the laurel, and aloud
Proclaim'd him victor to the shouting crowd.
Not did the generous chief the prize deny,
Whose arrow pierc'd the bird amid the sky;

Next, he who cut the cord, with gifts was grac'd;
And he, whose arrow struck the tree, the last.

Now call'd the prince, before the games were
The hoary guardian of his royal son, [done,
And gently whispers in his faithful ear,
To bid Ascanius in his arms appear,
And with his youthful band and courser come,
To pay due honours at his grandsire's tomb.
Next he commands the huge assembled train
To quit the ground, and leave an open plain.
Straight on their bridled steeds, with grace divine,
The beauteous youths before their fathers shine.
The blooming Trojans and Sicilians throng,
And gaze with wonder as they march along.
Around their brows a vivid wreath they wore;
Two glitt'ring lances tip with steel they bore:
These a light quiver stor'd with shafts sustain,
And from their neck depends a golden chain.
On bounding steeds advance three graceful bands,
And each a little blooming chief commands.
Beneath each chief twelve sprightly striplings came,
In shining arms, in looks and age the same.
Grac'd with his grandsire's name, Polites' son,
Young Priam, leads the first gay squadron on;
A youth, whose progeny must Latium grace:
He press'd a dappled steed of Thracian race:
Before, white spots on either foot appear,
And on his forehead blaz'd a silver star.
Atys the next advanc'd, with looks divine,
Atys the source of the great Attian line:
Iulus' friendship grac'd the lovely boy:
And last Iulus came, the pride of Troy,
In charms, superior to the blooming train;
And spur'd his Tyrian courser to the plain;
Which Dido gave the princely youth, to prove
A lasting pledge, memorial of her love.
Th' inferior boys on beauteous coursers ride,
From great Acetes' royal stalls supply'd.
Now flush'd with hopes, now pale with anxious fear,
Before the shouting crowds, the youths appear;
The shouting crowds admire their charms, and
Their parents' lines in every lovely face. [truce
Now round the ring, before their fathers, ride
The boys, in all their military pride.
Till Periphantes' sounding lash from far
Gave the loud signal of the mimic war:
Straight, in three bands distinct, they break away,
Divide in order, and their ranks display:
Swift at the summons they return, and throw
At once their hostile lances at the foe:
Then take a new excursion on the plain:
Round within round, an endless course maintain;
And now advance, and now retreat again;
With well-dissembled rage their rivals dare,
And please the crowd with images of war.
Alternate now they turn their backs in fight,
Now dart their lances, and renew the fight:
Then in a moment from the combat cease,
Rejoin their scatter'd bands, and move in peace,
So winds delusive, in a thousand ways
Perplex and intricate, the Cretan maze;
Round within round, the blind meanders run,
Untrac'd and dark, and end where they began.
The skilful youths, in sport, alternate ply
Their shifting course; by turns they fight and fly;
As dolphins gambol on the wat'ry way,
And, bounding o'er the tides, in wanton circles play.

This sport Atanais, when in mighty length
He rais'd proud Alba glorying in her strength,
Taught the first fathers of the Latian name,
As now he solemniz'd the noble game.
As now he solemniz'd the noble game.
From their successive Alban offspring come.
These ancient plays, to grace imperial Rome;
Who owns her Trojan band, and game of Troy.
Deriv'd through ages from the princely bay.

Thus were the solemn funeral honours paid
To great Anchises' venerable shade.
But soon the prince his changing fortunes found,
And in her turn the fickle goddess frown'd:
For, while the gather'd crowds the games repeat,
Heav'n's mighty empress, to the Trojan fleet,
(Her ancient rage still glowing in her soul)
Dispatch'd fair Iris from the starry pole.
Big with revengeful schemes, herself supplies.
The rapid storm that bears her down the skies.
Ubbon, the maid a thousand colours drew,
As down her bow, with winged speed, she flew:
And saw around the tomb th' assembly meet,
The vacant harbour, and neglected fleet.

Meantime, retir'd within the lonely shore,
Anchises' fate the Trojan dames deplore;
Cast a long look o'er all the flood, and weep
To see the wide extended wat'ry deep:
"Yet, must we yet, alas! new labours try,
More seas, more oceans?" was the general cry.
"Oh! grant a town at last, ye gracious gods!
To wretches harass'd with the winds and floods."
'Twas then, their raging sorrow to improve,
Amid the train shot Iris from above.
Aside her heav'nly charms the goddess threw,
And like old Beroë stood in open view;
(Dorydus' hoary spones, a noble dame,
Fam'd for her offspring, and illustrious name;)
And thus the goddess fans the rising flame:
"Ah! wretched race, whom Heav'n forbids to fall
By Grecian swords, beneath our native wall!
To't round the seas, o'er every region coast,
Oh! to what fate are we reserv'd at last!
Now, since imperial Troy in ashes lay,
Have seven successive summers roll'd away.
Still to new lands o'er floods and rocks we fly,
And sail, by every star, in every sky.
So long we chase, o'er all the boundless main,
The flying coast of Italy in vain.
Here o'er our kindred Bryx' fruitful plains,
The hospitable king, Acostas reigns:
What, what forbids our wand'ring Trojan bands,
To raise a city in these friendly lands?
Ye gods, preserv'd from hostile flames in vain!
Shall our dear Ilion never rise again?
A second Simois shall we view no more,
Or a new Xanthus, on a foreign shore?
Rise then, rise all; assist, ye mournful dames,
To set this execrable fleet in flames.
For late, Cassandra seem'd to lose my hands,
In visions of the night, with blazing brands:
'Seek Troy no more,' she said; 'this destined place
Is the fixt mansion of the Dardan race.'
Fly, fly we then, the omen to complete;
The glad occasion calls to fire the fleet;
Lo! where to Neptune four proud sitars rise!
Lo! his own fires the ready god supplies!"
She said;—then seiz'd a blazing brand, and threw;
Th' increasing flames amid the navy flew.
At the bold deed, with deep surprise amaz'd,
The dames all wond'ring, on the goddess gaz'd.

At last, the nurse of Priam's offspring, brins
The general silence; and the train bespoke:
"This was no Beroë, whom we saw appear,
But some bright goddess from th' ethereal sphere.
Mark her majestic port! her voice divine!
O'er all her form what starry splendours shine!
She darts a glance immortal from her eyes,
Breathes, looks and moves, a sister of the skies.
Beroë I left in anguish, who repin'd,
Shut from the rites, apt to her couch confin'd."

The matrons, now by doubts and fears impell'd,
First with malignant eyes the fleet beheld;
In choice suspended for a space they stand,
Between the promis'd and the present land:
When, smooth on level'd wings, the goddess flies,
And cuts a mighty bow along the skies.
Struck at the wond'rous sight, the shrieking dames
From the bright altars snatch the sacred flames;
Bring leaves and wither'd branches in their hands
To feed the fires; and hurl the blazing brands:
Fierce through the ships, the decks, the crackling
In all his rage devouring Vulcan roars. (cont.)
And now Eumelus to the host conveys
The dreadful tidings of the rising blaze:
The crowds grow pale; they look behind and spy
A cloud of cinders dark'ning all the sky.
And first Ascanius, as he led the band,
Pour'd o'er the plain, impetuous, to the strand;
Nor can his panting guardians check the speed
Of the young hero, and his fiery steed:
"Oh! what curst rage is this, ye wretched dames!
To what dire purpose fly these fatal flames?
Behold, your own Ascanius—you destroy
No Argive navy, but the hopes of Troy."

With that he threw his helmet on the shore,
In which he led his youthful hands before,
Next came Aneas; and the Trojan host
Th' affrighted dames dispersing o'er the coast,
To woods, and hollow caverns take their flight,
Repent their crime, and hate the golden light:
With alter'd minds their hindred they confest,
And the fierce goddess fled from every breast.
Not so the furious flames; they spread the
And, high in air, with rage redoubled roar, (more)
Close in the cordage wove the smitten fire,
And through the ribs the heavy smokes appear.
Within the keel the subtle vapours lye;
Thence the contagious flames through all the vessel
The lab'ring heroes toil with fruitless pain, (6)
And gushing floods on floods are pour'd in vain.
The prince then tore his robes in deep despair,
Rais'd high his hands; and thus address his pray'r:

"Great Jove! if one of all the Trojan state
Lives yet exempt from thy immortal hate;
Oh! if thy sacred eyes with wond'ring grace
Behold the miserable mortal race;
Suppress these fires; forbid them to destroy;
And snatch from death the poor remains of Troy!
Or if my crimes, almighty sire! demand
The last, last vengeance of thy dreadful hand,
On me; on me alone that vengeance shed,
And with thy levell'd thunders strike me dead!"
Scarcely had he said; when o'er the navy pour'd
A sudden gloomy cloud in rattling show'rs;
Black with the southern winds the tempest flew,
And in a moment bursts from all the skies
In sluythy sheets and deluges of rain;
And the loud thunders shook the mountain and
the plain.

Fierce o'er the ships the waters took their way ;
And, quench'd in floods, the hissing timbers lay.
Four gallees lost ; at length the flames retire,
And all the remnant fleet escap'd the raging fire.

Meantime the hero by the loss oppress,
With various cares, that rack'd his lab'ring breast,
If still to seek the Latian realm debates,
As here to fix, forgetful of the fates.
Then Nauticus, fam'd for wisdom and for age,
For Pallas taught the venerable sage,
Whom great events the fates and gods ordain ;
Bespoke the chief, and thus reliev'd his pain.
" 'Tis best, illustrious hero, to obey,
And still pursue where fortune leads the way ;
By patience to retrieve our hapless state,
And rise superior to the strokes of fate.
Let great Acestes in your councils join,
Your royal friend, of Troy's immortal line.
Your vessels lost ; those numbers who remain,
A timorous, weak, unnecessary train,
The hoary sires and dames, unfit to bear
The perils of the sea, or toils of war,
Select ; and trust to his paternal care.
The weary wretches here their walls may frame,
And call their city by the monarch's name."
The prince approv'd th' advice his friend address,
But still a thousand cares distract his lab'ring
breast.

Now o'er the solemn skies devoid of light,
High in her sable chariot rode the night ;
When to the godlike hero, from the pole
Descends, and speaks, his mighty father's soul :
" My son ! in all the fates of Troy approv'd,
Whom, while I liv'd, beyond my life I lov'd ;
Lo ! I am sent by Heav'n's almighty sire,
Who from thy navy bade the flames retire.
The prudent counsel of thy friend obey,
Take with the bravest youths, the dangerous way :
With these fair Latium shalt thou reach, and there
Wage with a rugged race a dreadful war.
Yet first, my son, to Pluto's regions go,
And meet thy father in the realms below ;
For know, my spirit was not doom'd to dwell
In the dark horrors, and the depths of Hell,
But, with the pious blest assembly reigns,
In all the pleasures of th' Elysian plains.
But thou the blood of sable victims shed ;
Then shall the Sibyl guide thee to the dead.
There shalt thou know what town the fates assign,
With the long glories of thy future line.
And now, farewell ;—the night slides swift away
I feel from far the morning's painful ray ;
And shrink and sicken at the beams of day."
He said, and lo ! that moment from his eyes,
Like a thin smoke, dissolv'd into the skies.

" Vanish'd so soon ! where, whither art thou
Why, why retirest my father from his son ? [gone !
What ! not one last embrace ?" the prince ex-claims :

Then to new life he wakes the slumbering flames ;
And hoary Vesta, and the Trojan powers,
With sacred gifts and suppliant vows adores.
Straight the whole scene before his friends he lays,
But chief the vision to the king displays ;
Unfolds the message sent from Heav'n above,
His father's counsel, and the will of Jove.
His friends approve the hero's new designs,
And in the task the good Acestes joins.
To the new town the matrons they assign'd,
And leave the willing vulgar crowds behind ;

Souls, that no hopes of future praise inflame,
Cold and insensible to glorious fame.
With speed the half-burn'd vessels they repair,
Provide new cordage, decks, and oars, with care ;
A slender band, but eager all for war.
The prince then drew a city on the plain ;
Next he assign'd the dwellings to the train.
Now a new Ilium in Trinacria rose,
And a new Simois and Scamander flows.
Well pleas'd, Acestes took the sov'reign sway ;
Th' adopted subjects their new prince obey.
The king conven'd the peers around, and sat
To frame new laws, and regulate the state.
To Venus' name they bid a temple rise
From Eryx' top, high tow'ring to the skies :
And next a priest and ample grove were made,
For ever sacred to Anchises' shade.
Now nine whole days in solemn feasts had past ;
When gentle breezes smooth'd the floods at last ;
The southern winds invite their sails and oars ;
Then cries and shrieks resound along the shores.
In long, long tenderness they spend the day,
In close embraces waste the night away.
Now all the wretches, e'en the female train
Who fear'd so late the dangers of the main,
And shrunk, the rolling ocean to survey,
All wish to take the long laborious way.
The melting hero soothes the wild despair,
And weeps, and gives them to the monarch's care.
Three heifers next to Eryx' name he pays,
A lamb to every storm the hero slays,
Unmoors his fleet, and every sail displays.
Crown'd with a graceful olive wreath he stands
High on the prow ; a charger in his hands ;
Huris the fat entrails o'er the foamy brine,
And stains the silver waves with sable wine.
Fresh rise the prosperous gales ; the sailors sweep,
And dash with equal strokes the roaring deep.

Meantime the queen of love, with cares oppress,
The mighty father of the floods address :
" Imperious Juno's unrelenting hate
To the poor relics of the Trojan state,
(Which no decrees of Jove or fate restrain,
Nor length of years, nor vows prefer'd in vain)
Compels a sister goddess to repair
To thee, great Neptune, with a suppliant's prayer.
For rage like her's, 'twas little to destroy,
Fair Asia's pride, th' imperial town of Troy !
'Twas not enough her wand'ring natives know
All forms and all varieties of woe !
But oh ! her groundless vengeance would efface,
Ev'n the last relics of the perish'd race !
Thou, thou canst witness, ocean's mighty god !
With what dire storms she lash'd the Libyan flood ;
When, arm'd with all th' Æolian winds in vain,
Earth, air, and Heav'n, she mingled with the main,
And rais'd such tumults in thy wat'ry reign.
Yet, still more shameful !—now her arts inspire
The Trojan dames to wrap the ships in fire ;
And urge my son, to leave his social band
(His fleet half ruin'd) in a foreign land.
But oh ! I beg for those, who yet remain,
A peaceful voyage to the Latian plain ;
A suppliant goddess begs for nothing more
Than those same realms the fates assign'd before !"
" 'Tis yours ;" reply'd the monarch of the main,
" Yours to command in this our wat'ry reign ;
Since from the sacred ocean first you came,
Since your deserts your confidence may claim ;

Oft for your son I bade the whirlwinds cease ;
 I hush'd the roarings of the floods to peace ;
 And Simois can attest and Xanthus' stream,
 By land my guardian care was still the same.
 When first Achilles, furious to destroy,
 Drove to their walls the trembling sons of Troy ;
 Beneath his vengeful spear when thousands bled,
 When the chok'd rivers groan'd with loads of dead ;
 When Xanthus' flood encumber'd with the slain,
 Scarce roll'd his struggling billows to the main ;
 Your son oppos'd him, with unequal might
 And far inferior gods, in single fight :
 Instant I snatch'd him from the dreadful fray,
 And in a cloud convey'd the chief away.
 Ev'n then I sav'd the warrior when with joy
 I wish'd and wrought the fall of perjurd Troy :
 And still will save him—he shall plough the sea,
 And to Avernus' port direct his way.
 On the wild floods shall only one be lost,
 One single wretch atone for all the host !¹⁹

Thus when the god had sooth'd her anxious mind,
 His sunny coursers to the car he join'd ;
 Next to their fiery mouths the bits apply'd,
 And, while the wheels along the level glide, [tide.
 He throws up all the reins, and skims the floating
 The flood subsides and spreads a glassy plain,
 And the loud chariot thunders o'er the main ;
 The clouds before the mighty monarch fly
 In heaps, and scatter through the boundless sky :
 A thousand forms attend the glorious god,
 Enormous whales, and monsters of the flood :
 Here the long train of hoary Glaucus rides ;
 Here the swift Tritons shoot along the tides ;
 There rode Palaemon o'er the wat'ry plain,
 With aged Phorcus, and his azure train ;
 And beauteous Thetis led the daughters of the main.

Æneas view'd the scene ; and hence arose
 A beam of joy to dissipate his woes.
 Instant he gives command to stretch the sails,
 To rear the mast, and catch the springing gales.
 Straight the glad train the spacious sheet unbind,
 And stretch the canvass to the driving wind.
 Old Palinurus first the navy guides ;
 The rest obedient follow through the tides.
 Now half the night thro' Heav'n had roll'd away,
 The sailors stretch'd along their benches lay,
 When through the parting vapour swiftly flies
 The god of slumbers from th' ethereal skies.
 To thee, poor Palinure, he came, and shed
 A fatal sleep on thy devoted head !
 High on the stern his silent stand he took
 In Phorbas' shape ; and thus the phantom spoke :
 " Behold, the fleet, my friend, securely sails,
 Steer'd by the floods and wafted by the gales !
 Now steal a moment's rest ; myself will guide
 Awhilè the vessel o'er the floating tide."
 To whom the careful Palinure replies,
 While scarce he rais'd his heavy closing eyes :
 " Me would'st thou urge in sleep to sink away,
 And fondly credit such a flatt'ring sea ?
 Too well, my friend, I know the treach'rous main !
 Too well to tempt the monster's smiles again !
 Too oft deceiv'd by such a calm before,
 I trust my master to the winds no more."
 This said, he grasp'd the helm, and fixt his eyes
 On every guiding star that glit's the skies.
 Then o'er his temples shook the wrathful god
 A branch, deep drench'd in Lethe's silent flood.
 The potent charm in dews of slumber steep
 And soon weigh down his swimming eyes to sleep.

Scarce yet his languid limbs had sunk away,
 When o'er the wretch the god incumbent lay,
 And, with a shatter'd fragment of the ship,
 Bore down the helm and pilot to the deep ;
 Headlong he tumbles in the flashing main,
 And calls for succour to his friends in vain.
 Swift from the stern the airy phantom flies,
 And with spread pinions mounts the golden skies ;
 Yet smooth along the flood the navy rode,
 Safe in the promise of the wat'ry god.
 Now they approach the siren's dangerous coast,
 Once rough, and infamous for vessels lost :
 Huge heaps of bones still whiten all the shore ;
 And, dash'd from rock to rock, the billows roar.
 The watchful prince th' endanger'd galleys found,
 Without a pilot strike on shoaly ground ;
 Himself then took the task, by night to guide
 The wand'ring vessel o'er the rolling tide :
 " O dear lamented friend !²⁰ (the hero cries,
 " For faith repos'd on flattering seas and skies,
 Cast on a foreign shore thy naked body lies !²¹

 VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

 BOOK VI.

ARGUMENT.

THE Sibyl foretels Æneas the adventures he should meet with in Italy. She attends him to Hell, describing to him the various scenes of that place, and conducting him to his father Anchises, who instructs him in those sublime mysteries of the soul of the world, and the transmigration ; and shows him that glorious race of heroes, which was to descend from him and his posterity.

Thus while he wept ; with flying sails and oars
 The navy reach'd the fair Cumæan shores.
 The circling anchors here the fleet detain,
 All rang'd beside the margin of the main.
 With eager transport fir'd, the Trojan band
 Leap from the ships to gain th' Hesperian land.
 Some strike from flints the sparkling seeds of flame,
 Some storm the coverts of the savage game ;
 To feed the fires, unroot the standing woods,
 And show with joy the new-discover'd floods.
 To Phœbus' fane the hero past along,
 And those dark caverns where the Sibyl sung.
 There, as the god enlarg'd her soul, she sate,
 And open'd all the deep decrees of fate.
 The train with reverence enter, and behold
 Chaste Trivia's grove, and temple roof'd with gold ;
 A structure rais'd by Dædalus, ('tis said)
 When from the Cretan king's revenge he fled,
 On wings to northern climes he dar'd to soar,
 Through airy ways unknown to man before ;
 Full many a length of sky and ocean past,
 On Cumæ's sacred tow'rs he stoop'd at last.
 Then hung to Phœbus in the strange abode,
 The wings that steer'd him through the liquid road,
 And rais'd the pompons pile in honour of the god.
 The matchless artist, on the lofty gate,
 Engrav'd Androgeus' memorable fate :

and here by lot sad Athens early paid
 even hapless youths, to soothe his angry shade.
 here stood the fatal urn; and there with pride
 air Crete rose tow'ring on the silver tide.
 here too the father of the herds was seen,
 who quench'd the passion of the lustful queen;
 her birth, a man below, a beast above,
 he mingled offspring of prepost'rous love!
 here stood the winding pile, whose mazes run round within round, and end where they begun.
 but when the pitying Dædalus survey'd
 the hopeless passion of the royal maid,
 he led her Theseus through the puzzling ways,
 safe with a clue, and open'd every maze.
 thou too, poor Icarus! hadst borne a part,
 had grief not check'd thy parent in his art!
 he thrice essay'd the mournful task in vain;
 thrice shook his hand, and dropp'd the task again.
 Thus had they gas'd o'er all the costly frame, when lo! Achates from the temple came;
 with him Deiphobe of Phœbus' fane
 the sacred priestess—who at once began:—
 'Hence—gaze no more! seven chosen sheep with speed,

seven steers, unconscious of the yoke, must bleed."
 she spoke; the crowds obey; and to the fane sublime, she calls the wand'ring Trojan train.
 scoop'd through the rock, in mighty depth dis-closes the dark cavern of the Sibyl maid; [play'd, through all the hundred portals rush abroad
 her sacred voice, and answers of the god.
 scarce at the cell arriv'd—"Invoke the skies,
 I feel the god, the rushing god!" she cries.
 while yet she spoke, enlarg'd her features grew,
 her colour chang'd, her locks dishevel'd flew,
 the heav'nly tumult reigns in every part,
 pants in her breast, and swells her rising heart:
 still spreading to the sight, the priestess glow'd,
 and heav'd impatient of th' incumbent god.
 then to her inmost soul by Phœbus fir'd,
 in more than human sounds she spoke inspir'd:
 "Still, dost thou still delay? thy voice employ in ardent vows, illustrious prince of Troy!
 thy pray'rs, thy urgent pray'rs, must wide display
 these awful portals to the light of day."
 she said; the Trojans shook with holy fear,
 and thus the suppliant prince prefer'd his pray'r:
 "Hear, Phœbus, gracious god! whose aid divine
 so oft has sav'd the wretched Trojan line,
 and wing'd the shaft from Paris' Phrygian bow,
 the shaft that laid the great Achilles low,
 led by thy guardian care, secure I past through many a realm, and rang'd the wat'ry waste;

Trod the wild regions where the Syrtis lie,
 and lands that stretch beneath a different sky.
 at length the coast of Italy we gain,
 the flying coast, so long pursu'd in vain.
 till now, to every realm our course we bent,
 and Ilion's fate pursu'd us where we went.
 now, all ye pow'rs, confederate to destroy the glorious empire and the tow'rs of Troy,
 'Tis time to bid your wrathful vengeance cease,
 to bid her poor remains repose in peace.
 and thou, great Sybil! to whose piercing eye
 disclos'd the scenes of future ages lie;
 since all my cares and labours but explore an empire promis'd by the fates before,

! Ariadne,

Give me to fix in Latium's fair abodes
 the sons of Troy, and rest her wand'ring gods!
 then shall my hands a glorious temple frame to mighty Dian, and her brother's name;
 and solemn days to Phœbus I'll decree,
 and in my realms shall temples rise to thee;
 there all thy mystic numbers will I place,
 with all the fortunes of the Trojan race.
 by chosen sages guarded, there shall lie
 the records, sacred from the vulgar eye.
 nor be my fates to fitting leaves consign'd,
 to fly the common sport of every wind!
 but thou, even thou, great prophetess! relate,
 in vocal accents, all my future fate."

Now raves the Sibyl in her cave, oppress'd by Phœbus raging in her heaving breast;
 she struggles to discharge the mighty load,
 maddens and bounds, impatient of the god:
 her foamy mouth attentive to control,
 he forms her organs and commands her soul.
 then (all the hundred doors display'd to view)
 through every vent the sacred accents flew:
 "By sea, O prince! are all thy perils o'er,
 but far, far greater wait thee on the shore.
 dismiss thy doubts; to Latium's destin'd plain
 Troy's sons shall come, but wish to fly again.
 wars, horrid wars, I see on Tyber's shore;
 and all his waves run thick with human gore!
 Scamander shall thou find, and Simois there,
 and Greece shall arm a second host for war.
 a new Achilles rises to the fight;
 him too a pregnant goddess brings to light:
 and Heav'n's great queen, with unrelenting hate,
 still, as of old, pursues the Dardan state.
 once more the woes of Troy derive their cause from a new breach of hospitable laws:
 and she must bleed again as late she bled,
 for a rap'd princess and a foreign bed.
 how shalt thou rove, new succours to implore,
 from every court along the Latian shore!
 but thou, more bold, the more thy fates oppose,
 advance, great prince, superior to thy woes:
 thy first fair hopes of safety and success,
 beyond thy fondest wish, shall rise from Greece."

Thus spoke the Sibyl from her dark abode
 the dread mysterious answers of the god;
 the wood'rous truths, involv'd in riddles, gave,
 and, furious, bellow'd round the gloomy cave.
 Apollo shook his rod; possess her whole,
 pour'd in his fires, and rein'd her raging soul.
 at length the fierce ethereal transport cease,
 and all the heavenly fury sunk in peace.

When thus the chief—"O sacred dame! I know too well already my predestin'd woe, but grant my pray'r!—Since here, as fame relates,
 lies the dread road to Pluto's gloomy gates;
 where baleful Acheron spreads, far and wide,
 his livid, melancholy, murmuring tide;
 unfold these portals, and thy suppliant lead down to the dark dominions of the dead:
 give me to view my father's reverend face,
 and rush with transport to his dear embrace!
 him through embattled armies I convey'd,
 while javelins hiss'd, and flames around me play'd.
 he shar'd my toils, determin'd to defy the storms of every sea and every sky;
 in hardships, cares and dangers to engage;
 nor spar'd his stooping venerable age.
 yet more—he bade me to thy cell repair,
 and seek thy potent aid with suppliant pray'rs.

Oh! bear our joint request, our just desire;
 And guide the son, in pity, to the sire.
 Yours is the pow'r, for Hecate bestow'd
 On you the rule of this infernal wood.
 If Orpheus by his lyre's enchanting strain
 Could call his consort from the shades again;
 If Pollux dy'd alternate, to convey
 His ransom'd brother to the realms of day,
 And trod so oft the same infernal way?
 Why should I Theseus, why Alcides name,
 Each hero sprung but from a mortal dame?
 To Hell those chiefs descended from above:
 I claim a juster right; for I can prove
 My birth from Venus; my descent from Jove."
 Then to the Trojan hero, as he pray'd
 And grasp'd the altars, spoke the sacred maid:
 "O glorioqs prince! of brave Anchises' line,
 Great, godlike hero, sprung from seed divine!
 Smooth lies the road to Pluto's gloomy shade;
 And Hell's black gates for ever stand display'd:
 But 'tis a long unconquerable pain,
 To climb to these ethereal realms again.
 The choice selected few, whom fav'ring Jove,
 Or their own virtue, rais'd to Heaven above,
 From these dark realms emerg'd again to day;
 The mighty sons of gods! and only they!
 The frightful entrance lies perplex'd with woods,
 Enclos'd with sad Cocytus' sullen floods.
 But since you long to pass the realms beneath,
 The dreadful realms of darkness and of death,
 Twice the dire Stygian stream to measure o'er,
 And twice the black Tartarean gulf explore:
 First, take my counsel, then securely go.
 A mighty tree, that bears a golden bough,
 Grows in a vale, surrounded with a grove,
 And sacred to the queen of Stygian Jove.
 Her nether world no mortals can behold,
 Till from the bole they strip the blooming gold.
 The mighty queen requires this gift alone,
 And claims the shining wonder for her own.
 One pluck'd away, a second branch you see
 Shoot forth in gold, and glitter through the tree.
 Go then; with care erect thy searching eyes,
 And in proud triumph seize the glorious prize.
 Thy purpos'd journey if the fates allow,
 Free to thy touch shall bend the costly bough:
 If not, the tree will mortal strength disdain;
 And steel shall hew the glittering branch in vain.
 Besides, while here my counsel you implore,
 Your breathless friend, unburied on the shore,
 (Ah! hapless warrior! in thy absence lost)
 The camp unhallows, and pollutes the host.
 First let his cold remains in earth be laid,
 And decent in the grove dispose the dead.
 The due lustration next perform, and bring
 The sable victims for the Stygian king.
 Then to the realms of Hell shalt thou repair,
 Untrod by those who breathe the vital air."
 She ceas'd; the mournful prince returns with
 On earth the drooping hero fix'd his eyes: [sighs:
 Deep in his melancholy thoughts he weigh'd
 The dire event, and all the Sibyl said;
 While at his side the good Achates shares
 The warrior's anguish, and divides his cares.
 Oft they divin'd in vain, what hapless friend,
 Dead and expos'd, her dubious words intend:
 But when arriv'd, amid the crowded strand
 They saw Misenus stretch'd along the sand;
 The great Misenus, of celestial kind,
 Sprang from the mighty monarch of the wind;

Whose trump, with noble clangor, he'd from
 Th' embattled hosts, and blew the flames of war.
 By Hector's side, with unresisted might,
 His javelin rag'd; his trumpet rous'd the fight.
 But when that hero on the Phrygian plain
 By stern Peides' thund'ring arm was slain,
 He follow'd next Aeneas' conqu'ring sword,
 As brave a warrior as his former lord.
 But while the daring mortal o'er the flood
 Rais'd his high notes, and challeng'd every god,
 With envy Triton heard the noble strain,
 And whelm'd the bold musician in the main.
 Around the body stood the mournful host,
 By his great master wept, and suffer'd most.
 The sorrowing troops the Sibyl's words obey,
 And to the lofty forest bend their way,
 To bid the proud funeral pyre arise,
 And build the solemn structure to the skies.
 Then fed the savage from his dark abode;
 The well-ply'd axes echo through the wood.
 The piercing wedges cleave the cracking oak;
 Loud groan the trees and sink at every stroke:
 The tall ash tumbles from the mountain's crown;
 Th' aerial elms come crashing headlong down.
 First of the train, the prince, with thund'ring
 sound,
 Whirl'd his huge ax, and spread the ruin round.
 Then as the mighty forest he survey'd,
 O'erwhelm'd with care the thoughtful hero pray'd:
 "Oh! in this ample grove could I behold
 The tree that blooms with vegetable gold!
 Since truth inspir'd each word the Sibyl said,
 Too truly she pronounc'd Misenus dead!"
 While yet he spoke, two doves before him flew:
 His mother's birds the chief with transport knew;
 Then, as they settled on the verdant plain,
 The joyful hero pray'd, nor pray'd in vain:
 "Be you my guides through airy tracks above,
 And lead my footsteps to the fatal grove;
 Point out the road, (if any can be found)
 Where the rich bough o'erpreads the sacred
 ground,
 With checquer'd darkness pierc'd by golden rays
 And darts at once a shadow and a blaze:
 Thou too, O goddess-mother! lead me on,
 Unfold these wonders, and relieve thy son."
 This said, he stopp'd; but still his eager sight
 Watch'd every motion, and observ'd their flight
 By turns they feed, by turns they gently fly;
 Th' advancing chief still follows with his eye.
 Arriv'd at length, where, breathing to the skies,
 Blue clouds of poison from Avernus rise,
 Swift from the deathful blast at once they spring,
 Cut the light air, and shoot upon the wing:
 Then on the wond'rous tree the doves alight,
 Where shines the fatal bough divinely bright,
 That, gilding all the leaves with glancing beams,
 Strikes thro' the sullen shade with golden gleams:
 As when bleak winter binds the frozen skies,
 Push'd from the oak her foreign honours rise;
 The lofty trunk th' adopted branches crown,
 Grac'd with a yellow offspring not her own:
 So with bright beams, all beauteous to behold,
 Glow'd on the dusky tree the blooming gold;
 The blooming gold, by every breath inclin'd,
 Flam'd as it wav'd, and twinkled in the wind.
 The chief with transport stripp'd the branching
 And the rich trophy to the Sibyl bore. [over.
 Next on the strand, with tears, the Trojans paid
 The last sad honours to Misenus' shade:

With cloven oaks and unctuous pines, they rear
A stately solemn pile aloft in air.
With sable wreaths they deck the sides around,
The spreading front with baleful cypress bound,
And with his arms the tow'ring structure crown'd.
Some the huge caldron fill; the foaming stream
From the deep womb mounts bubbling o'er the brim.

With groans the train anoint and bathe the dead,
O'er the cold limbs his purple garment spread,
And place him decent on the funeral bed;
While these support the Bier, and in their hands,
With looks averted, hold the flaming brands:
The rite of old!—rich incense loads the pyre,
And oils and slaughter'd victims feed the fire.
Soon as the pile, subsiding, flames no more,
With wine the smoking heap they sprinkled o'er;
Then Chorusus took the charge, to place
The bones selected in a brazen vase:
A verdant branch of olive in his hands,
He mov'd around, and purify'd the bands;
Slow as he past, the lustral waters shed,
Then clos'd the rites, and thrice invok'd the dead.

This done; to solemnize the warrior's doom,
The pious hero rais'd a lofty tomb;
The tow'ring top his well-known ensigns bore,
His arms, his once loud trump, and tapering oar:
Beneath the mountain rose the mighty frame,
That bears from age to age Misenus' name.

These rites discharg'd: the Sibyl to obey,
Swift from the tomb the hero bends his way.
Deep, deep, a cavern lies, devoid of light,
All rough with rocks, and horrible to sight;
Its dreadful mouth is fenc'd with sable floods,
And the brown horrors of surrounding woods.
From its black jaws such baleful vapours rise,
Blot the bright day, and blast the golden skies,
That not a bird can stretch her pinions there
Through the thick poisons and encumber'd air,
But, struck by death, her flagging pinions cease;
And hence Aornus was it call'd by Greece.
Hither the priestess four black heifers led,
Between their horns the hallow'd wine she shed;
From their high front the topmost hairs she drew,
And in the flames the first oblations threw.
Then calls on potent Hecate, renown'd
In Heav'n above, and Erebus profound.
The victims next th' attendants kill'd, and stood
With ample chargers, to receive the blood.
To Earth and Night a lamb of sable hue,
With solemn rites, the pious hero slew.
Next by the knife a barren heifer fell
To great Persephone, the queen of Hell.
Then to her lord, infernal Jove, he paid
A large oblation in the gloomy shade;
And oils amid the burning entrails pour'd,
While slaughter'd bulls the sacred flames devour'd.
When lo! by dawning day, with dreadful sound,
Beneath their footsteps groans the heaving ground;
The groves all wave; the forests tremble round.
Pale Hecate forsook the nether sky,
And howling dogs proclaim'd the goddess nigh.
"Fly, ye prophane! far, far away remove"
(Exclaims the Sibyl) "from the sacred grove;
And thou, Æneas, draw thy shining steel,
And boldly take the dreadful road to Hell.
To the great task thy strength and courage call,
With all thy powers: this instant claim them all."
This said, she plunges down the deep descent:
The prince as boldly follow'd where she went.

Ye subterraneous gods! whose awful sway
The gliding ghosts and silent shades obey;
O Chaos hoar! and Phlegethon profound!
Whose solemn empire stretches wide around;
Give me, ye great tremendous pow'rs, to tell
Of scenes, and wonders, in the depths of Hell:
Give me your mighty secrets to display
From those black realms of darkness to the day.

Now thro' the dismal gloom they pass, and tread
Grim Pluto's courts, the regions of the dead:
As puzzled travellers bewilder'd move, [grove]
(The Moon scarce glimmering through the dusky
When Jove from mortal eyes has snatch'd the light,
And wrapt the world in undistinguish'd night.

At Hell's dread mouth a thousand monsters wait;
Grief sweeps, and Vengeance bellows in the gate:
Base Want, low Fear, and Famine's lawless rage,
And pale Disease, and slow repining Age,
Fierce formidable fiends! the portal keep;
With Pain, Toil, Death, and Death's half-brother
Sleep.

There, Joys, embitter'd with remorse, appear;
Daughters of Guilt! here storms destructive War,
Mad Discord there her snaky tresses tore:
Here, stretch'd on iron beds, the Furies roar.
Full in the midst a spreading elm display'd
His aged arms, and cast a mighty shade,
Each trembling leaf with some light vision teems,
And heaves impregnated with airy dreams.
With double forms each Scylla took her place
In Hell's dark entrance, with the Centaur's race;
And, close by Lerna's hissing monster, stands
Briareus dreadful, with an hundred hands.
There stern Geryon rag'd; and, all around,
Fierce Harpies scream'd, and direful Gorgons
frown'd:

Here from Chimæra's jaws long flames expire;
And the huge fiend was wrapt in smoke and fire.
Scar'd at the sight, his sword the hero drew
At the grim monsters, as they rose to view.
His guide then warn'd him, not to wage the war
With thin light forms, and images of air;
Else had he rush'd amid th' impressive train,
And madly struck at empty shades in vain.

From hence a dark uncomfortable road
Leads to dread Acheron's Tartarean flood,
Whose furious whirlpools boil on every side,
And in Cocytus pour the roaring tide.
All stain'd with ooze, and black with rising sands,
Lord of the flood, imperious Charon stands:
But rough, begrim'd, and dreadful, he appear'd;
Rude and neglected hung his length of beard:
All patch'd and knotted flutters his attire;
His wrathful eyeballs glare with sanguine fire.
Though old, still unimpair'd by years, he stood,
And hoary vigour blest the surly god.
Himself still ply'd the oars, the canvass spread,
And in his sable bark convey'd the dead.
Hither, a mighty crowd, a mingled host,
Confus'd, came pouring round the Stygian coast.
Men, matrons, boys, and virgins, in the throng,
With mighty kings and heroes, march'd along;
And blooming youths before their mournful sires
Stretch'd out untimely on their funeral pyres;
Thick as the leaves come fluttering from above,
When cooler autumn strips the blasted grove:
Thick, as the feather'd flocks, in close array,
O'er the wide fields of ocean wing their way,
When from the rage of winter they repair
To warmer suns, and more indulgent air,

All stretch'd their suppliant hands, and all implore
The first kind passage to the farther shore.
Now these, now those, he singles from the host,
And some he drives all trembling from the coast.
The prince, astonish'd at the tumult, cry'd,
"Why crowd such mighty numbers to the tide?
Why are those favour'd ghosts transported o'er?
And these sad shades chas'd backward from the shore?"

The full of days, the Sibyl, thus replies:
"Great prince, the true descendant of the skies!
You see Cocytus' stream; the Stygian floods,
Whose awful sanction binds th' attesting gods.
Those, who neglected on the strand remain,
Are all a wretchel, poor, unbury'd train,
Charon is he, who o'er the flood presides;
And those interr'd, who cross the Stygian tides.
No mortals pass the hoarse-rousounding wave,
But those who slumber in the peaceful grave.
Thus, till a hundred years have roll'd away,
Around these shores the plaintive spectres stray.
That mighty term expir'd, their wanderings past,
They reach the long expected shore at last."

Struck with their fate, his steps the hero stay'd,
And with soft pity all the crowd survey'd.
When lo! Leucaspis in the throng he spy'd;
And great Orontes, once the Lycian guide:
Sullen and sad; for fate's relentless doom
Deny'd the chiefs the honour of a tomb;
Whose galley, whirl'd by tempests round and
round,

Sunk, by a mighty surge devour'd and drown'd.
Now drew his pilot Palinurus nigh,
Who, watching every star that gilds the sky,
While from the Libyan shores his course he keeps,
From the tall stern plung'd headlong down the deep.

Pensive his slow approach the spectre made,
When, as the prince had scarce his form survey'd
Thro' the thick gloom, he first address'd the shade:
"What godhead whelm'd my friend, our faithful
Beneath the roarings of the dreadful tide? [guide,
Tell me—for oh! I never could complain,
Till now, of Phoebus, nor believ'd in vain.
Once he foretold—(but ah! those hopes are lost)
That Palinure should reach th' Ausonian coast,
Safe from the giddy storm and rolling flood;
Is this, is this the promise of a god?"

"Nor Phoebus," he replies, "foretold in vain,
Nor has a god o'erwhelm'd me in the main.
No—as I steer'd along the foamy sea,
Headlong I fell, and tore the helm away.
But by those fierce tumultuous floods I swear,
For my own life I never felt a fear:
For your's alone I trembled, lest the ship,
Left all at large, and bounding o'er the deep,
Robb'd of her helm and long-experienc'd guide,
Should sink, o'erwhelm'd in such a furious tide.
For three long stormy nights sublime I rode,
Heav'd by the southern tempests o'er the flood:
At early dawn my eyes could just explore,
From a tall tow'ring surge, th' Italian shore.
Thus tir'd, the land I gain by slow degrees,
And 'scap'd, at length, the dangers of the seas;
But hopes of prey the savage natives led,
And, while I grasp'd the shaggy mountain's head,
(My cumb'rous vests yet heavy from the main)
By barbarous hands thy helpless friend was slain.
And now by floating surges am I tost,
With every wind, and dash'd upon the coast.

But by the light of you ethereal air,
By thy dead father, and surviving heir,
O prince! thy pity to a wretch extend;
And from these dismal realms enlarge thy friend.
Or to the Veline port direct thy way,
And in the ground my breathless body lay:
Or, if thy goddess-mother can disclose
Some means to fix a period to my woes,
(For sure uncall'd, unguided by the gods,
You durst not pass these dreadful Stygian floods)
Lend to a pining wretch thy friendly hand,
And waft him with thee to the farther strand!
Thus, in this dismal state of death at least,
My wand'ring soul may lie compos'd in rest."

"And how," reply'd the dame, "could rise in
A wish so impious, or a thought so vain! [man
Uncall'd, unbury'd, wouldst thou venture o'er,
And view th' infernal fiends who guard the shore?
Hope not to turn the course of fate by pray'r,
Or bend the gods inflexibly severe:
But bear thy doom content; while I disclose
A beam of comfort to relieve thy woes;
For know, the nations bord'ring on the floods,
Alarm'd by direful omens of the gods,
In full atonement of thy death shall rear
A mighty tomb, and annual offerings bear.
The place, from age to age renown'd by fame,
Still shall be known by Palinurus' name."
These words reliev'd his sorrows, and display'd
A dawn of joy to please the pensive shade.

Now they proceed; but soon the pilot spy'd
The strangers from the wood approach the tide.
Then to the godlike chief, in wrath, he said,
"Mortal! whoe'er thou art, in arms array'd,
Stand off! approach not; but at distance say,
Why to these waters dar'st thou bend thy way?
These are the realms of Sleep, the dreadful coast
Of sable Night, and airy gliding ghosts.
No living mortals o'er the stream I lead;
Our bark is only sacred to the dead.
Know, I repent I led Pirithous o'er,
With mighty Theseus, to the farther shore;
The great Alcides past the Stygian floods;
Though these were heroes, and the sons of gods.
From Pluto's throne, this dragg'd in chains away
Hell's triple porter, trembling, to the day.
Those from his lofty dome aspir'd to lead
The beauteous partner of his royal bed."
To whom the sacred dame—"How vain thy fear!
These arms intend no violence of war.
May the huge dog, through all the Stygian coast,
Roar from his den, and scare the flying ghosts:
No touch'd and chaste, Persephone may dwell,
And with grim Pluto share the throne of Hell:
The Trojan prince, Aeneas, far around
For valour, arms, and piety renown'd,
Through these infernal realms decrees to go,
And meet his father in the shades below.
To bend thy mind, if such high virtue fail,
At least this glorious present must prevail."
(Then show'd the bough, that lay beneath her vest.)
At once his rising wrath was hush'd to rest;
At once stood reconcil'd the ruthless god,
And bow'd with reverence to the golden rod;
Bow'd, and refus'd his office now no more,
But turns the sable vessel to the shore;
Drives from the deck the fitting airy train;
Then in the bark receiv'd the mighty man.
The feeble vessel groans beneath the load,
And drinks at many a leak th' infernal flood.

The dame and prince at last are wafted o'er
Safe to the slimy strand and oozy shore.

Arriv'd, they first grim Cerberus survey;
Stretch'd in his den th' enormous monster lay,
His three wide mouths, with many a dreadful yell,
And long, loud bellowing, shook the realms of Hell:
Now o'er his neck the starting serpents rose,
When to the fiend the dame a morsel throws.
Honey, and drugs, and poppy juices, steep
The temper'd mass with all the pow'rs of sleep.
With three huge gaping mouths, impatient flies
The growling savage, and devours the prize;
Then, by the charm subdu'd, he sunk away;
And, stretch'd all o'er the cave, the slumb'ring monster lay.

The fiend thus lull'd, the hero took the road,
And left behind th' irremediable flood.
Now, as they enter'd, doleful screams they hear;
And tender cries of infants pierce the ear;
Just new to life, by too severe a doom,
Snatch'd from the cradle to the silent tomb!
Next, mighty numbers crowd the verge of Hell,
Who, by a partial charge and sentence, fell.
Here, by a juster lot, their seats they took;
The fatal urn imperious Minos shook,
Convenges a council, bids the spectres plead,
Rehears the wretches, and absolves the dead.
Then crowds succeed, who, prodigal of breath,
Themselves anticipate the doom of death;
Tho' free from guilt, they cast their lives away,
And sad and sullen hate the golden day.

Oh! with what joy the wretches now would bear
Pain, toil, and woe, to breathe the vital air!
In vain!—by fate for ever are they bound
With dire Avernus, and the lake profound!
And Styx, with nine wide channels, roars around.

Next open wide the melancholy plains,
Where lovers pine in everlasting pains;
Those soft consuming flames they felt alive,
'twas the wretches, and in death survive.
Here, where the myrtle groves their shades display,
A cover'd walks they pass their hours away.
Ivadne, Phædra, Procris, he survey'd,
'siphææ next, and Laodamia's shade.
tabb'd by her son, false Eriphylè there bints to her wound, and lays her bosom bare:
æneus, who try'd both sexes, trod the plain,
low to a woman chang'd by fate again.

With these, fair Dido rang'd the silent wood,
Few from her wound, her bosom bath'd in blood:
he chief, advancing through the shady scene,
carce thro the gloom discern'd the sullen queen:
o the pale Moon scarce glimmers to the eye,
hen first she rises in a clouded sky.

he wept, and thus address her in the grove,
ith all the melting tenderness of love:

“Then was it true, that by revengeful steel,
ung with despair, unhappy Dido fell?
nd I, was I the cause of that despair?
et oh! I vow by every golden star;
y all the pow'rs th' æthereal regions know,
y all the powers that rule the world below,
left your realm reluctant: o'er the floods
ll'd by the fates, and summon'd by the gods;
y immortal gods—by whose commands I come om you bright realms to this eternal gloom:
memor'd the wasteful deep of night to tread,
ad pass these doleful regions of the dead.

Could I think, when urg'd by Heav'n to go,
y slight would plunge you in the depth of woe!

Stay, Dido, stay, and see from whom you fly!
'Tis from your fond repentant lover's eye.
Turn then one moment, and my vows believe,
The last, last moment fate will ever give!”

Nought to these tender words the fair replies,
But fix'd on earth her unrelenting eyes,
The chief still weeping: with a sullen mien,
In steadfast silence, frown'd th' obdurate queen.
Fix'd as a rock amidst the roaring main,
She hears him sigh, implore, and plead, in vain.
Then, where the woods their thickest shades dis-
From his detested sight she shoots away; [play,
There from her dear Sichæus in the grove,
Found all her cares repaid, and love return'd for love. [eyes

Touch'd with her woes, the prince, with streaming
And floods of tears, pursues her as she flies.

Hence he proceeds; and last the fields appear,
Where stalk'd the proud heroic sons of war.
Tydeus and pale Adrastus rose to sight,
With Atalanta's son², renown'd in fight.
Here, a long crowd of chiefs the prince beheld,
Who fell lamented in the glorious field,
His Trojan friends:—with sighs he view'd the train;

Three valiant sons of sage Antenor slain:
Here brave Thersilocus and Glaucus stood,
Medon and Polyætus bath'd in blood.
Idæus there still glories in alarms,
Vaults on his car, and wields his shining arms
Eager to view the chief, on either hand,
Rank behind rank, the eager warriors stand:
All in their turn retard the prince, to know
What urg'd his journey to the shades below.
Not so the kings of Greece—appall'd, dismay'd,
The hostile chiefs the godlike man survey'd
In arms that glitter'd through the dusky shade.
Some turn'd and fled, astonish'd at the view,
As when before him to their fleets they flew,
Some rais'd a cry; the fluttering accents hung,
And dy'd imperfect on the trembling tongue.
Here Priam's son, Deiphobus, he found;
The mangled youth was one continu'd wound.
For now his face, his beauteous face appears
Gash'd, and dishonour'd with a thousand scars.
His hands, ears, nostrils, hideous to survey!
The stern insulting foes had lopp'd away:
Trembling he stood, industrious to conceal
The bloody traces of the ruthless steel.
Soon as the prince discern'd him, he began,
And thus deplor'd the miserable man!

“O brave Deiphobus! O chief divine!
Sprung from majestic Teucer's martial line:
What fierce barbarian hands could thus disgrace
Thy manly figure, and thy beauteous face?
In that last night, when Ilium sunk in flame,
I heard, brave warrior! from the voice of fame,
You fell on heaps of foes, with slaughter tir'd,
And on the glorious purple pile expir'd.
With care I rais'd on our Rhœtæan coast
A vacant tomb, and hail'd thy mighty gh'ost:
Thy name and arms adorn the place around;
And, had thy mangled bleeding corse been found,
Thy relics had repos'd in Trojan ground.”

“My friend,” replies the chief, “has duly paid
All funeral honours to my pensive shade:
But these dire woes from fatal Helen came;
These are the triumphs of the Spartan dame!”

² Parthe nopeus.

For well, too well you know, in what delight
 We fondly spent our last destructive night :
 When the vast monster, big with Iliou's doom,
 Tower'd thro' the town, an army in its womb ;
 In solemn show she bade the dames advance,
 And in dissembled orgies led the dance :
 A flaming torch she brandish'd in her hand ;
 Then from the tow'r invites the Grecian band,
 While, worn with labours, I repos'd my head
 (Ah, wretch ill-fated !) on our bridal bed.
 My heavy lids the dews of slumber steep,
 Lull'd in a soft, profound, and death-like sleep.
 Then from beneath my head, as tir'd I lay,
 My loyal bride conveys my sword away,
 Removes my arms, unfolds the door, and calls
 Her Spartan lord within my palace walls ;
 Betrays her last, to please her former spouse,
 And cancel all the guilt of broken vows !
 Fierce they broke in, by dire Ulysses led,
 And basely slew me in the bridal bed.
 Hear my just pray'rs, ye gods !—to Greece repay
 A fate like mine; give all your vengeance way !
 But thee, O prince! what wond'rous fortune led Alive, to these dominions of the dead ?
 Say, did the will and counsel of the gods,
 Or the rude tempests and tumultuous floods,
 Compel thy course from yon ethereal light,
 To these dark realms of everlasting night ?”

Meantime the swift-wing'd coursers of the Sun
 Thro' Heaven full half their fiery race had run ;
 And all th' appointed hours in talk had past,
 But thus the priestess warn'd the chief at last :
 “ Lo! night advances, prince!—we waste away,
 In idle sorrows, the remains of day.
 See—in two ample roads, the way divides ;
 The right, direct, our destin'd journey guides,
 By Pluto's palace, to th' Elysian plains ;
 The left to Tartarus, where, bound in chains,
 Loud howl the damn'd in everlasting pains !”
 “ Dismiss thy wrath,” replies the pensive shade,
 “ But one word more—I then rejoin the dead :
 Go—mighty prince, the promis'd throne ascend ;
 Go—but with better fortune than thy friend !”
 With these last accents, to the warrior host
 Retires the trembling, melancholy ghost.

Now to the left, Æneas darts his eyes,
 Where lofty walls with triple ramparts rise.
 There rolls swift Phlegethon, with thund'ring sound,
 His broken rocks, and whirls his surges round.
 On mighty columns rais'd sublime are hung
 The massy gates, impenetrably strong.
 In vain would men, in vain would gods essay,
 To hew the beams of adamant away.
 Here rose an iron tow'r : before the gate,
 By night and day, a wakeful fury sat,
 The pale Tisiphone ; a robe she wore,
 With all the pomp of horror, dy'd in gore.
 Here the loud scourge and louder voice of pain,
 The crashing fetter, and the rattling chain,
 Strike the great hero with the frightful sound,
 The hoarse, rough, mingled din, that thunders
 round :

“ Oh ! whence that peal of groans ? what pains are those ?

What crimes could merit such stupendous woes ?”

Thus she—“ Brave guardian of the Trojan state,
 None that are pure must pass that dreadful gate.
 When plac'd by Hecat o'er Avernus' woods,
 I learnt the secrets of those dire abodes,
 With all the tortures of the vengeful gods.

Here Rhadamanthus holds his awful reign,
 Hears and condemns the trembling impious train.
 Those hidden crimes the wretch till death suppress,
 With mingled joy and horror in his breast,
 The stern dread judge commands him to display ;
 And lays the guilty secrets bare to day.
 Her lash Tisiphone that moment shakes ;
 The ghost she scourges with a thousand snakes ;
 Then to her aid, with many a thund'ring yell,
 Calls her dire sisters from the gulfs of Hell.
 Now the loud portals from their hinges flew,
 And all the dreadful scene appears in view.
 Behold without what direful monster waits
 (Tremendous form !) to guard the gloomy gates !
 Within, her bulk more dreadful hydra spreads,
 And hissing rears her fifty tow'ring heads.
 Full twice as deep the dungeon of the fiends,
 The huge, Tartarcan, gloomy gulph descendi
 Below these regions, as these regions lie
 From the bright realms of yon ethereal sky.
 Here roar the Titan race, th' enormous birth ;
 The ancient offspring of the teeming earth.
 Pierc'd by the burning bolts, of old they fell,
 And still roll bellowing in the depths of Hell.
 Here lie th' Aëlian twins, in length display'd ;
 Stretch'd as they lie, the giants I survey'd,
 Who warr'd to drive the thunderer from above ;
 And storm'd the skies, and shook the throne of Jove !
 The proud Salmeoneus, wrapt in chains below,
 Raves in eternal agonies of woe ;
 Who mock'd with empty sounds and mimic ray,
 Heav'n's awful thunder and the lightning's blaze ;
 Th' audacious wretch through Elis tower'd in air,
 Whirl'd by four coursers in his rattling car ;
 A blazing torch he shook ; o'er crowds he rode ;
 And madly claim'd the glories of a god.
 O'er hollow vaults he lash'd the steeds along,
 And, as they flew, the brazen arches rung.
 Vain fool ! to mock the bolts of Heav'n above,
 And those inimitable flames of Jove !
 But from the clouds, th' avenging father aims
 Far other bolts and undissembled flames :
 Dash'd from his car, the mimic thunderer fell,
 And in a fiery whirlwind plung'd to Hell.
 “ There too th' enormous Tityus I beheld
 Earth's mighty giant son, stretch'd o'er th' infernal
 field ;

He cover'd nine large acres as he lay,
 While with fierce screams a vulture tore away
 His liver for her food, and scoop'd the smoking prey ;
 Plung'd deep her bloody beak, nor plung'd in vain,
 For still the fruitful fibres spring again,
 Swell, and renew th' enormous monster's pain,
 She dwells for ever in his roomy breast,
 Nor gives the roaring fiend a moment's rest ;
 But still th' immortal prey supplies th' immortal
 Need I the Lapiths' horrid pains relate, [fast.
 Ixion's torments, or Pirithous fate ?
 On high a tottering rocky fragment spreads,
 Projects in air, and trembles o'er their heads.
 Stretch'd on the couch, they see with longing eyes
 In regal pomp successive banquets rise,
 While lucid columns, glorious to behold,
 Support th' imperial canopies of gold.
 The queen of furies, a tremendous guest,
 Sits by their side, and guards the tempting feast,
 Which if they touch, her dreadful torch she rear,
 Flames in their eyes, and thunders in their ears.
 They that on Earth had base pursuits in view,
 Their brethren hated, or their parents slew ;

And, still more numerous, they who swell'd their
 But ne'er reliev'd their kindred or the poor: [store,
 Or in a cause unrighteous fought and bled;
 Or perish'd in the foul adulterous bed;
 Or broke the ties of faith with dark deceit;
 Imprison'd deep, their destin'd torments wait.
 But what their torments, seek not thou to know,
 Or the dire sentence of their endless woe.
 Some roll a stone, rebounding down the hill,
 Some hang suspended on the whirling wheel;
 Pierc'd Theseus groans in pains that ne'er expire,
 Chain'd down for ever in a chair of fire.
 There Phlegyas feels unutterable woe,
 And rears incessant through the shades below:
 Be just, ye mortals! by these torments aw'd,
 These dreadful torments, not to scorn a god.
 This wretch his country to a tyrant sold,
 And barter'd glorious liberty for gold,
 Laws for a bribe he pass'd, but past in vain,
 For the same laws a bribe repeal'd again.
 This wretch by hot preposterous lust was led,
 To climb and violate his daughter's bed.
 For some enormous crimes they all aspir'd;
 All feel the torments that those crimes requir'd!
 Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
 A voice of brass, and adamantine lungs,
 For half the mighty scene could I disclose,
 Repeat their crimes, or count their dreadful woes?"

Thus spoke the priestess of the god of day;
 "And, haste," she cry'd; "to Hell's great empress
 The destin'd present, and pursue thy way. [pay
 'or lo! the high Cyclopean walls are near,
 And in full view the massy gates appear.
 And these the gods enjoin thee to bestow
 The sacred offering of the golden bough."
 This said, they journey'd through the solemn gloom,
 And reach'd at length the proud imperial dome:
 With eager speed his course the hero bore,
 With living streams his body sprinkled o'er,
 And fixt the glittering present on the door.

These rites complete, they reach the flowery plains,
 The verdant groves where endless pleasure reigns.
 Here growing ether shoots a purple ray,
 And o'er the region pours a double day.
 From sky to sky th' unweary'd splendour runs,
 And nobler planets roll round brighter suns.
 Some wrestle on the sands; and some, in play
 And games heroic, pass the hours away.
 Some raise the song divine, and these advance
 A measur'd steps to form the solemn dance.
 Here Orpheus, graceful in his long attire,
 A seven divisions strikes the sounding lyre;
 Across the chorists the quivering quill she flings,
 Or with his flying fingers sweeps the strings.
 Here Teucer's ancient race the prince surveys,
 The race of heroes born in happier days:
 Ius, Assaracus in arms rever'd,
 And Troy's great founder Dardanus appear'd:
 Before him stalk'd the tall majestic train,
 And pitch'd their idle lances on the plain.
 Their arms and airy chariots he beheld;
 He steeds unharne'ss'd graz'd the flowery field.
 These pleasing cares the heroes felt, alive,
 Or chariots, steeds, and arms, in death survive.
 Some on the verdant plains were stretch'd along;
 Some to the ear their tuneful Pæans rung:
 Others beneath a laurel grove were laid,
 And joyful feasted in the fragrant shade.

VOL. XIX.

Here, glittering through the fœtes, his eyes survey
 The streams of Po descending from the day.
 Here a blest train advance along the meads,
 And snowy wreaths adorn their graceful heads:
 Patriots who perish'd for their country's right,
 Or nobly triumph'd in the field of fight:
 There holy priests, and sacred poets stood,
 Who sung with all the raptures of a god:
 Worthies, who life by useful arts refin'd,
 With those, who leave a deathless name behind,
 Friends of the world, and fathers of mankind,
 This shining band the priestess thus address,
 But chief Mæneus, tow'ring o'er the rest;
 So high the poet's lofty stature spreads
 Above the train, and overtops their heads!
 "Say, happy souls! and thou, blest poet, say,
 Where dwells Anchises, and direct our way?
 For him we took the dire infernal road,
 And stemm'd huge Acheron's tremendous flood."
 To whom the bard—"Unsettled we remove,
 As pleasure calls from verdant grove to grove;
 Stretch'd on the flowery meads, at ease we lie,
 And hear the silver rills run bubbling by.
 Come then, ascend this point, and hence survey
 By yon descent an open easy way."

He spoke, then stalk'd before; and from the brow
 Points out the fair enamell'd fields below.
 They leave the proud ærial height again,
 And pleas'd bend downward to the blissful plain.
 Anchises, there, the hero's sire divine,
 Deep in the vale had rang'd his glorious line;
 Rank behind rank, his joyful eyes survey
 The chiefs in bright succession rise to day.
 He counts th' illustrious race with studious cares,
 Their deeds, their fates, their victories and wars.
 Soon as his lov'd Æneas he beheld,
 His dear, dear son, advancing o'er the field;
 Eager he stretch'd his longing arms, and shed
 A stream of tears, and thus with transport said:
 "Then has thy long try'd pious love surpass
 The dreadful road, to meet thy sire at last?
 Oh! is it given to see, nor see alone,
 But hear, and answer to my godlike son?
 This I presag'd, indeed, as late I ran
 O'er times and seasons; nor presag'd in vain
 From what strange lands, what stormy seas and Returns my son, to bless my longing eyes? [skies
 How did my anxious mind your danger move,
 Then, when in Carthage you indulg'd your love!"

"Your shade," the prince replies, "your angry
 In many a frightful vision I survey'd. [shade,
 By your behest I came to these abodes;
 My fleet lies anchor'd in the Tuscan floods:
 Give me, O father! give thy hand, nor shun
 The dear embraces of a duteous son."
 While yet he spoke, the tender sorrows rise,
 And the big drops run trickling from his eyes.
 Thrice round his neck his eager arm he threw;
 Thrice from his empty arms the phantom flew,
 Swift as the wind with momentary flight,
 Swift as a fleeting vision of the night.
 Meantime the hero saw with wondering eyes,
 Deep in a vale a waving forest rise:
 Through those sequester'd scenes slow Lethe
 glides,

And in low murmurs lulls her slumbering tides;
 Unnumber'd ghosts around the waters throng,
 And o'er the brink the airy nations hung.
 So to the meads in glowing summer pour
 The clustering bees, and ride every flower:

P p

O'er the sweet lilies hang the busy swarms ;
 The fields remurmur to the deep alarms.
 Struck with the sight, the prince astonish'd stood ;
 " Oh ! say, why throng such numbers to the flood ?
 Or what the nature of the wond'rous tide,
 And who the crowds ?"—To whom the sire reply'd :
 " To all those souls who round the river wait,
 New mortal bodies are decreed by fate.
 To yon dark streams the gliding ghosts repair,
 And quaff deep draughts of long oblivion there.
 How have I wish'd before thee to display
 These my descendants, ere they rise to day !
 Thus shalt thou Latium find with double joy,
 Since fate has fixt th' eternal throne of Troy."—
 " O father ! say, can heavenly souls repair
 Once more to Earth, and breathe the vital air ?
 What !—can they covet their corporeal chain ?
 Gods !—can the wretches long for life again !"—
 " Attend," he cry'd, " while I unfold the whole,
 And clear these wonders that amaze thy soul."
 Then the great sire the scheme before him lays,
 And thus each awful secret he displays :

" Know first, a spirit, with an active flame,
 Fills, feeds and animates this mighty frame ;
 Runs through the wat'ry worlds, the fields of air,
 The pond'rous Earth, the depths of Heav'n ; and there

Slows in the Sun and Moon, and burns in every star.
 Thus, mingling with the mass, the general soul
 Lives in the parts, and agitates the whole.
 From that celestial energy began
 The low-brow'd brute ; th' imperial race of man ;
 The painted birds who wing'd th' aerial plain,
 And all the mighty monsters of the main.
 Their souls at first from high Olympus came ;
 And, if not blunted by the mortal frame,
 Th' ethereal fires would ever burn the same !
 But while on Earth ; by Earth-born passions tost,
 The heavenly spirits lie extinct and lost ;
 Nor steal one glance, before their bodies die,
 From those dark dungeons to their native sky.
 Ev'n when those bodies are to death resign'd,
 Some old inherent spots are left behind ;
 A sullyng tincture of corporeal stains
 Deep in the substance of the soul remains.
 Thus are her splendours dimm'd, and crusted o'er
 With those dark vices, that she knew before.
 For this the souls a various penance pay,
 To purge the taint of former crimes away :
 Some in the sweeping breezes are refin'd,
 And hung on high to whiten in the wind ;
 Some cleanse their stains beneath the gushing
 streams,

And some rise glorious from the searching flames.
 Thus all must suffer ; and, those sufferings past,
 The clouded minds are purify'd at last.
 But when the circling seasons, as they roll,
 Have cleans'd the dross long gather'd round the soul ;

When the celestial fire divinely bright,
 Breaks forth victorious in her native light ;
 Then we, the chosen few, Elysium gain,
 And here expatiate on the blissful plain.
 Both those thin airy throngs thy eyes behold,
 When o'er their heads a thousand waves are roll'd,
 In mighty crowds to yon Lethæan flood
 Swarm at the potent summons of the god ;
 There deep the draught of dark oblivion drain ;
 Then they desire new bodies to obtain,
 And visit Heav'n's ethereal realms again."

This said, the sire conducts their steps along
 Through the long tumult of th' aerial throng ;
 Then climb'd a point, and every face decry'd,
 As the huge train prest forward to the tide :

" Now hear, while I display our race divine,
 And the long glories of our Dardian line,
 The noble Roman heroes, who shall rise
 From Trojan blood, successive, to the skies.
 This mighty scene of wonders I relate,
 And open all thy glorious future fate.
 First then behold yon blooming youth appear,
 That hero leaning on his shining spear !
 This thy last son, thy hoary age shall grace,
 Thy first brave offspring of the Latian race ;
 From fair Lavinia in the groves he springs,
 A king, and father of a race of kings ;
 Sylvius his name ; proud Alba shall he sway,
 And to his sons th' imperial pow'r convey.
 See ! where the youth, already wing'd to rise,
 Stands on the verge of life, and claims the skies
 Procas the next behold, a chief divine,
 Procas the glory of the Trojan line ;
 Capys and Numitor there pant for fame ;
 There a new Sylvius¹ bears thy mighty name ;
 Like thee, just, great, and good, for valour known,
 The chief shall mount th' imperial Alban throne.
 What strength each youth displays ?" " But who are those

With civic crowns around their manly brows !"
 " By those shall Gabii and Nomentum rise,
 And proud Collatian tow'rs invade the skies.
 Then Faunus' town with turrets shall be crown'd,
 And fair Fidena stretch her ramparts round.
 Then Bola too shall rise, of mighty fame ;
 Unpeopled now they lie, and lands without a
 name !

Bright Ilia, sprung from Trojan blood, shall bear
 Yon glorious hero to the god of war :
 Behold great Romulus, her victor son ;
 Whose sword restores his grandsire to the throne.
 Lo ! from his helmet what a glory plays !
 And Jove's own splendours round his temples blaze.
 From this brave prince majestic Rome shall rise :
 The boundless Earth, her empire shall comprise ;
 Her fame and valour tower above the skies !
 Seven ample hills th' imperial city grace,
 Who nobly glories in her martial race ;
 Proud of her sons, she lifts her head on high ;
 Proud, as the mighty mother of the sky,
 When through the Phrygian towns, sublime in air,
 She rides triumphant in her golden car,
 Crown'd with a nodding diadem of tow'rs,
 And counts her offspring, the celestial pow'rs,
 A shining train, who fill the blest abode,
 A hundred sons, and ev'ry son a god !
 Turn, turn thine eyes ! see here thy race divine,
 Behold thy own imperial Roman line :
 Cæsar, with all the Julian name survey ;
 See where the glorious ranks ascend to day !—
 This—is this he !—the chief so long foretold
 To bless the land where Saturn rul'd of old,
 And give the Lernean realms a second age of gold !
 The promis'd prince, Augustus the divine,
 Of Cæsar's race, and Jove's immortal line !
 This mighty chief his empire shall extend
 O'er Indian realms, to Earth's remotest end.
 The hero's rapid victories outrun
 The year's whole course, the stars, and journeys of

Where, high in air, huge Atlas' shoulders rise,
Support th' ethereal lights, and prop the rolling
skies!

He comes!—he comes!—proclaim'd by every god!
Nile hears the shout, and shakes in every flood.
Proud Asia flies before his dire alarms,
And distant nations tremble at his arms.
So many realms not great Alcides past,
Not, when the brazen-footed hind he chas'd;
O'er Erymanthus' steeps the boar pursu'd;
Or drew the huge Lænean monster's blood.
Nor Bacchus such a length of regions knew,
When on his car the god in triumph flew,
And shook the reins, and urg'd the fiery wheels,
Whirl'd by swift tigers down the Indian hills.—
And doubt we yet, by virtuous deeds to rise,
When fame, when empire is the certain prize?
Rise, rise, my son; thy Latian foes o'ercome!
Rise, the great founder of majestic Rome!"

"But who that chief, who crown'd with olive stands,

And holds the sacred relics in his hands?"
"I know the pious Roman king from far,
The silver beard, and venerable hair;
Call'd from his little barren field away,
To pomp of empire and the regal sway.
Tullus the next succeeds, whose loud alarms
Shall rouse the slumb'ring sons of Rome to arms.
Inspir'd by him, the soft unwelcome train
Repeat their former triumphs o'er again.
Lo Ancus there! the giddy crowd he draws,
And swells too much with popular applause.
Now wou'dst thou Tarquin's haughty race behold,
Or fierce avenging Brutus, brave and bold?
See the stern chief stalk awful o'er the plain,
The glorious chief, who breaks the tyrant's chain:
He to his axe shall proud rebellion doom,
The first great consul of his rescu'd Rome!
His sons (who arm, the Tarquins to maintain,
And fix oppression in the throne again)
He nobly yields to justice, in the cause
Of sacred freedom and insulted laws.
Though harsh th' unhappy father may appear,
The judge compels the sire to be severe;
And the fair hopes of fame the patriot move,
To sink the private in the public love.

"Like him, Torquatus, for stern justice known,
Dooms to the axe his brave victorious son.
Behold the Drusi prodigal of blood!
The Decii dying for their country's good!
Behold Camillus there; that chief shall come
With four proud triumphs to imperial Rome.
Lo! in bright arms two spirits rise to sight!
How strict their friendship in the realms of night!
How fierce their discord when they spring to
How furious in the field will both appear! [light!
With what dire slaughter! what a waste of war!
Impetuous to the fight the father pours
From the steep Alps, and tall Ligurian tow'rs.
The son, with servile monarchs in his train,
Leads the whole Eastern world, and spreads the plain.

Oh! check your wrath, my sons; the nations spare;
And save your country from the woes of war;
Nor in her sacred breast, with rage abhorr'd,
So fiercely plunge her own victorious sword!
And thou, be thou the first: thy arms resign,
Thou, my great son of Jove's celestial line!—
Yon chief shall vanquish all the Grecian pow'rs,
And lay in dust the proud Corinthian tow'rs,

Drive to the capitol his gilded car,
And grace the triumph with the spoils of war.
That chief shall stretch fair Argos on the plain,
And the proud seat of Agamemnon's reign,
O'ercome th' Æacian king, of race divine,
Sprung from the great Achilles' glorious line;
Avenge Minerva's violated fane,
And the great spirits of thy fathers slain.
What tongue, just Cato, can thy praise forbear!
Or each brave Scipio's noble deeds declare,
Afric's dread foes; two thunderbolts of war!
Who can the bold Fabricius' worth repeat,
In pride of poverty, divinely great;
Call'd by his bleeding country's voice to come
From the rude plough, and rule imperial Rome!
Tir'd as I am the glorious roll to trace,
Where am I snatch'd by the long Fabian race!
See where the patriot shines, whose prudent care
Preserves his country by protracted war!—
The subject nations, with a happier grace,
From the rude stone may call the mimic face,
Or with new life inform the breathing brass:
Shine at the bar, describe the stars on high,
The motions, laws, and regions of the sky:
Be this your nobler praise in times to come,
These your imperial arts, ye sons of Rome!
O'er distant realms to stretch your awful sway,
To bid those nations tremble and obey;
To crush the proud, the suppliant foe to rear,
To give mankind a peace, or shake the world with war."

He said—awhile their ravish'd eyes admire
The wond'rous scenes:—when thus proceeds the sire:

"See! where Marcellus tow'rs above the train,
And bears the regal trophies from the plain.
Endanger'd Rome shall bless his guardian care,
And stand unshaken in a storm of war.
Carthage and Gaul the hero's might shall prove,
The third who hangs th' imperial spoils to Jove."—
With him the Trojan prince a youth beheld
In shining arms advancing o'er the field;
A beauteous form; but clouds his front surround,
And his dim eyes were fixt upon the ground."
"Say, who that youth" (he cries) "o'ercast with grief;

The youth who follows that victorious chief?
His son? or one of his illustrious line?
What numbers shout around the form divine?
His port how noble! how august his fame!
How like the former! and how near the same!
But gloomy shades his pensive brows o'erspread,
And a dark cloud involves his beauteous head."
"Seek not, my son," replies the sire, "to know"
(And, as he spoke, the gushing sorrows flow)
"What woes the gods to thy descendants doom,
What endless grief to every son of Rome!
This youth on Earth the fates but just display,
And soon, too soon, they snatch the gift away!
Had Rome for ever held the glorious prize,
Her bliss had rais'd the envy of the skies!
Oh! from the martial field what cries shall come!
What groans shall echo through the streets of How shall old Tyber, from his oozy bed, [Rome!
In that sad moment rear his reverend head,
The length'ning pomp and funeral to survey,
When by the mighty tomb he takes his mournful way!

A youth of nobler hopes shall never rise,
Nor glad like him the Latian fathers' eyes:

And Rome, proud Rome shall boast, she never
From age to age, so brave a son before ! [bore,
Honour and fame, alas ! and ancient truth,
Revive and die with that illustrious youth !
In vain embattled troops his arms oppose :
In every field he tames his country's foes,
Whether on foot he marches in his might,
Or spurs his fiery courser to the fight.
Poor pitied youth ! the glory of the state !
Oh ! couldst thou shun the dreadful stroke of fate,
Rome should in thee behold, with ravish'd eyes,
Her pride, her darling, her Marcellus rise !
Bring fragrant flow'rs, the whitest lilies bring,
With all the purple beauties of the spring,
These gifts at least, these honours I'll bestow
On the dear youth, to please his shade below"—
Thus, while the wond'rous scenes employ their sight,

They rove with pleasure in the fields of light.
When the great sire had taught his son the whole,
And with the Roman glories fir'd his soul ;
Next to the list'n'ing hero he declares
His toils in Latium, and successive wars ;
Gives him their nations and their towns to know,
And how to shun, or suffer every woe.

Two gates the silent courts of sleep adorn,
That of pale ivory, this of lucid horn.
Through this, true visions take their airy way,
Thro' that, false phantoms mount the realms of
Then to the ivory gate he led them on, [day,
And there dismiss'd the Sibly and his son.

Now the great chief, returning to the main,
Reviews his fleet, and glads his friends again.
Then, steering by the strand, he ploughs the sea,
And to Caieta's port directs his way :
There all the fleet the crooked anchors moor ;
And the tall ships stood rang'd along the shore.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK VII.

ARGUMENT.

KING Latinus entertains Æneas, and promises him
his only daughter Lavinia, the heiress of his crown. Turnus, who is in love with her, being favoured by her mother, and stirred up by Juno and Alecto, breaks the treaty which was made,
and engages in his quarrel, Mezentius, Camilla, Messapus, and many others of the neighbouring princes; whose forces and the names of their commanders are particularly recited.

You too, Cajeta, whose indulgent cares
Nur'd the great chief, and form'd his tender years,
Expiring here (an ever honour'd name !)
Adorn Hesperia with immortal fame :
Thy name survives to please thy pensive ghost ;
Thy sacred relics grace the Latian coast.
Soon as her funeral rites the prince had paid,
And rais'd a tomb in honour of the dead ;
(The sea subsiding, and the tempests o'er)
He spreads the flying sails, and leaves the shore.

When, at the close of night, soft breezes fan,
The Moon in milder glory mounts the skies:
Safe in her friendly light the navy glides ;
The silver splendours trembling o'er the tides.
Now by rich Circe's coast they bend their way,
(Circe, fair daughter of the god of day ;)
A dangerous shore : the echoing forests ring,
While at the loom the besauteous goddess sing:
Bright cedar brands supply her father's rays,
Perfume the dome, and round the palace blaze.
Here wolves with howlings scare the naval train,
And lions roar reluctant to the chain.
Mere growing bears and swine their cars alight,
And break the solemn silence of the night.
These once were men ! but Circe's charms o'er
In brutal shapes, the human forms divine.
But Neptune, to secure the pious host
From these dire monsters, this enchanted coast,
A friendly breeze to every sail supplies ;
And o'er the deeps the rapid navy flies.
Now on her car was gay Aurora borne,
And ocean reddens with the rising morn ;
The winds lie hush'd ; the swelling surge subsides,
And with their bending oars they labour thro' the tides.

From hence the hero view'd a range of woods ;
Through the dark scene roll Tyber's glittering floods ;

With circling whirlpools urge their winding way,
And lead their yellow waters to the sea.
The painted birds, that haunt the golden tide,
And flutter round the banks on every side,
Along the groves in pleasing triumph play,
And with soft music hail the dawning day,
Smooth o'er the shaded floods, at his command,
The painted gallees glide, and reach the land.

Now, goddess ! aid thy poet, while he sings
The state of Latium, and her ancient kings ;
Her dark confusions from their birth explore,
When first the Trojans reach'd th' Hesperian shores.

Thou, thou, great Erato ! my soul inspire,
To sing each furious fight with equal fire.
A mightier work, a nobler scene appears ;
A long, long series of destructive wars !
Kings against kings engag'd in dire alarms !
And all Hesperia rous'd to all the rage of arms !

Latinus o'er the realm the sway maintain'd ;
And long in peace the hoary prince had reign'd ;
From Faunus and a fair Laurentian dame,
A lovely nymph, the mighty monarch came.
From Picus, Faunus drew his birth divine :
From Saturn he, great author of the line.
Fate from this king had snatch'd each blooming son :
And one bright daughter heir'd the imperial throne.

Fir'd by her matchless charms, the youths repair
From all the realms around, to court the fair ;
Bold Turnus too the royal maid address,
Whose birth and beauty far surpass the rest.
The Latian queen, to gain so brave a son :
Had made the blooming hero's cause her own.
Vain was her aim, for every power divine
Withstood the match, with many a dreadful sign.
Amid the court a laurel rose in air,
Preserv'd for ages with religious care ;
This venerable plant Latinus found,
When first his town with rising tow'rs he crown'd ;
(Which thence deriv'd her name, as records say ;)
Then made it sacred to the god of day.

It chanc'd, a cloud of bees in gathering swarms
Swept through the skies, with murmuring hoarse
alarms ;

Pour'd in, and (settling on the topmost bough)
Stretch'd down, dependent deep in air below :
In one black lengthening chain together clung,
Feet clasp'd in feet, the clustering nations hung.
On this exclaims an augur—" I explore
A foreign consort from a distant shore ;
From yon same point a stranger host shall come ;
And here their prince shall reign in this imperial dome."

Yet more ; while chaste Lavinia, at the shrine,
Burns od'rous incense to the powers divine ;
As by her father stood the royal fair,
The fires flew round, and caught her waving hair :
O'er all her rich embroider'd garments roll'd
The wanton flame, and crept through every fold ;
Then, crackling, through her crown victorious plays ;

The gems run melting in the golden blaze :
Around the fair the dancing glories stray'd,
And lambent fires involv'd the lovely maid ;
Then from her beauteous head enlarging grew,
Wide and more wide, and round the palace flew.
From this strange sign, portentous to behold,
Th' astonish'd seer surprising truths foretold,
That bright with fame should shine the glorious
fair,

But through the nations spread the flames of war.

Meantime the king, astonish'd at the sign,
Hastes to consult his prescient sire' divine.
In dark Alburnea's shades, supreme of woods !
Where from her fountains boil sulphureous floods ;
Thick from her streams the clouds of poison rise,
And, charg'd with heavy vapours, load the skies.
Here, in distress, th' Italian nations come,
Anxious, to clear their doubts, and learn their doom.

First, on the fleeces of the slaughter'd sheep,
By night the sacred priest dissolves in sleep :
When, in a train, before his slumbering eye,
Thin, airy forms, and wondrous visions fly.
'E calls the pow'rs, who guard th' infernal floods ;
And talks, inspir'd, familiar with the gods.
To this dread oracle the prince withdrew,
And first a hundred sheep the monarch slew ;
Then on their fleeces lay ; and from the wood
He heard distinct these accents of the god :

" Seek not a native prince, my son, nor wed
Thy royal daughter to a Latian bed.
A foreign chief appears, of mighty fame,
Whose race to Heav'n shall raise our glorious name :
Y'er either ocean shall their empire run,
Beyond the radiant journeys of the Sun.
In every clime their standards are unfurl'd !
And, prostrate at their feet, shall lie the trembling world !"

These answers of the god, reveal'd by night,
The king divulg'd, and fame display'd to light ;
Spread the glad tidings all the nations o'er ;
When now the Trojan navy reach'd the shore.

The hero with his son and chiefs had laid
Their limbs at ease beneath a cooling shade ;
Then, dictated by Jove, the banquet spread
In cakes of flour along the verdant mead ;
The slender cakes the busy Trojans load
With fruits austere, and wildings of the wood :

³ Fpung.

These scanty viands soon consum'd, the crew,
Compell'd by hunger, on their tables flew ;
Full eager they devour'd, by want distrest,
The frail supporters of the failing feast.
When with a laugh, Ascanius—" We devour
The plates and boards on which we fed before."
Th' auspicious words bistire in rapture took,
And weigh'd what once the oracle had spoke :
" Hail, happy realm, which fate so long has ow'd !
All hail," he cry'd, " each guardian Trojan god !"
My sire, when fair Elysium blest my eyes,
Did thus disclose the secrets of the skies ;
When, preat by raging famine, you devour
Your boards, impatient, on a foreign shore ;
There thy long labours shall with peace be crown'd ;
There build thy town, and raise the ramparts
This is the famine that the fates foreshow, [round,
And this the place to terminate our woe.
Then bend we from the port, at dawn of day,
Our eager steps, and strike a different way,
To view the land, the cities to explore,
And know what nations hold the fated shore.
Now place again the goblets on the board ;
Be great Anchises honour'd and ador'd,
And pour the wine to Heav'n's almighty lord."

Then, while the verdant boughs his temples
grace,
The prince ador'd the Genius of the place ;
The Nymphs, and unknown pow'rs that rule the floods,

And sacred Earth, great source of all the gods ;
And awful Night ! with her the stars that rise,
To gild her face, and beautify the skies ;
And Jove, the guardian god of Troy, implores,
And the great mother of th' ethereal pow'rs ;
His mighty parents last, with honours crown'd
In Heav'n above, and Erebus profound.

The hero's vows th' almighty heard from high,
And thrice he thunder'd from an azure sky ;
And shook, majestic, as the thunders roll'd,
A fiery cloud, that blaz'd with beams of gold.
Now through the Trojan host the news had flown,
The day was come to raise their promis'd town ;
All, warm'd with transport at the happy sign,
Indulge the feast, and quaff the generous wine.

Soon as the morning shot a purple ray,
And tipp'd the mountains with the beams of day,
Fly different ways the busy train explore
The bounds, the cities, and the winding shore.
Here dwell the Latian line ; there Tyber flows ;
And here thy sacred stream, Numicus, rose.

Now sent the Trojan prince (a peace to gain)
A hundred youths selected from the train,
With presents for the king. Without delay,
All crown'd with olives took their speedy way.
Meantime the chief design'd th' allotted ground
For the new town, and drew the trench around ;
High tow'rs and ramparts all the place enclose ;
And, like a camp, the sudden city rose.

Now the commission'd youths proceed with haste,
And spy the lofty Latian spires at last.
Before the gate, the blooming active train
Or break the fiery courser to the rein,
Or whirl the chariot o'er the dusty plain ;
Or bend the bow, or toss the whizzing spear,
Or urge the race, or wage the mimic war.
When lo ! a messenger, dispatch'd with speed,
Spurs to the Latian court his panting steed,
And told the monarch what illustrious guests
Arriv'd from foreign lands in foreign vests.

The monarch summon'd all the train, and shone,
In state majestic, on the regal throne.
High o'er the town, surrounded by a wood,
Old Picus venerable palace stood,—

August and awful! proudly rose, around,
A hundred columns, and the structure crown'd.
Here kings receiv'd the types of royal pow'r,
The crown and sceptre, and the robes they wore.
This was their temple; this their court of state,
Here at their sacred feasts the fathers sat;
And in long orders, as their thrones they fill'd,
On offer'd rams their annual banquets held.
Before the gates a venerable band,
In cedar carv'd, the Latian monarchs stand.
Sabinus there, who prest the foaming wine,
Extends the hook that prun'd the generous vine:
The front old Italus and Saturn grace,
And hoary Janus with his double face;
And many an ancient monarch, proud to bear
In their dear country's cause the wounds of war.
Hung on the pillars, all around appears
A row of trophies, helmets, shields, and spears,
And solid bars, and axes keenly bright,
And naval beaks, and chariots seiz'd in fight.
With his divining wand in solemn state,
With robes succinct the royal Picus sat.
Fierce in his car of old he swept the field;
And still the hero grasps the shining shield.
Him beauteous Circe lov'd, but lov'd in vain;
Th' enchantress dame, rejected with disdain,
Transform'd the hapless monarch, in despair,
Chang'd to a painted bird, and sent to sit in air.

Thus sat the sov'reign in the pompous fane,
And gave admission to the Dardan train.
Then to th' illustrious strangers, from the throne,
The prince with mild benevolence begun:

" Say, noble Trojans, for we knew your name,
And ancient race, before your navy came;
What cause your fleet to Latium could convey,
What call, through such a length of wat'ry way?
Or were your gallies wide in ocean lost?
Or driv'n by tempests on th' Hesperian coast?
Such dangers oft befell the train who ride
O'er the wild deeps, and stem the furious tide.
Vouchsafe to be our guests, and Latium grace;
For know our generous hospitable race,
By Saturn form'd, from him their manners draw,
Just without ties, and good without a law.
From old Auruntian sages once our ears
Have heard a tale, though sunk in length of years;
These realms the birth of Dardanus could boast,
Who sail'd from hence, and reach'd your Phrygian
He left the Tuscan realms, and now on high [coast
Dwells in the starry mansions of the sky:
Call'd from this nether world to Heav'n's abodes—
He reigns above, a god among the gods!"

" O prince divine! great Faunus' glorious son;"

(Thus, to the king, Ilioneus begun;)
" Nor stars misled our fleets, nor tempests tost,
Nor wide we wander'd to the Latian coast,
But our determin'd course, spontaneous bore,
With one fixt purpose, to this friendly shore;
Driv'n from the noblest empire o'er the seas,
That the bright Sun in all his race surveys.
We and our prince derive our birth divine
From Jove, the source of our ethereal line;
And at the godlike chief's command we come,
His suppliant envoys to this regal dome.
Those, who beyond the bounds of ocean hurl'd,
Possess that wild unhospitable world;

And those who glow beneath the burning zone,
Beneath the fiery chariot of the Sun,
Have heard, and heard with terror from afar,
What a dire deluge, what a storm of war,
With ruin charg'd, and furious to destroy, [Troy;
From Greece burst thund'ring o'er the realms of
When Europe shook proud Asia with alarms,
And fate set two contending worlds in arms.
Snatch'd from that storm, to roll around the floods,
We beg some place, to fix our wand'ring gods;
Some vacant region, you with ease can spare;
The common use of water, earth, and air.
Nor shall this new alliance bring disgrace,
But add new glories to th' Italian race:
Nor Latium shall repent the kind supply,
Nor shall the dear remembrance ever die.
Now by our potent glorious prince I swear,
As true in peace as dreadful in the war: "
Though now as suppliants at thy throne we stand,
With humble pray'rs and olives in our hand,
Yet many nations, prince, invite our train,
And our alliance court, but court in vain.
For know, the gods, the mighty gods command
The sons of Troy to seek the Latian land.
To Tyber's flood great Phœbus urg'd our way,
Where spring Numicus' sacred streams to day;
Here Dardanus was born, of heav'nly strain;
Hence first he came, and now returns again.
Yet more—these presents from the Trojan king,
These relics of his former state we bring,
Snatch'd from devouring flames—his sire, of old,
Pour'd due libations from this bowl of gold;
In these rich robes the royal Priam shone,
And gave the law, majestic, from the throne:
This crown, this sceptre, did the monarch wear;
These vests were labour'd by the Trojan fair."

He ceas'd—the sov'reign paus'd in thought profound,
And fixt his eyes unmov'd upon the ground.
His daughter's fortunes all his mind employ,
And future empire, not the gifts from Troy.
Deep in his mind the prophecy he roll'd,
And deem'd this chief, the son the gods foretold,
The mighty hero long foredoom'd by fate
To share the glories of the regal state;—
From whom a race, victorious by their swords,
Should rise in time, the world's majestic lords:
Then joyful spoke: " May Heav'n our counsels bless,

And its own omens, with the wish'd success!
Well pleas'd, my friends, your presents I receive,
And free admission in my kingdoms give;
Nor shall you want, while I the throne enjoy,
A land as fruitful as the fields of Troy.
But let your godlike prince, if he request
Our royal friendship, be our honour'd guest;
The peace he asks in person he may bring,
Go then—report this message to your king—
A beauteous daughter in her bloom is mine,
Forbidden to wed in our Ausonian line:
This all our native oracles deny,
And every dreadful omen of the sky.
From foreign shores, a foreign son appears,
Whose race shall lift our glory to the stars.
Your prince, the destin'd chief the fates require,
Our thoughts divine, and we, my friends, desire."

He said, and order'd steeds, to mount the band;
In lofty stalls three hundred coursers stand,
Their shining sides with crimson cover'd o'er;
The sprightly steeds embroider'd trappings wore,

With golden chains, resurgent to behold:
Gold were the bridles, and they champ'd on gold.
But to their prince he sent a glorious car,
With two distinguish'd coursers for the war;
Fierce as they flew, their nostrils breath'd a fire;
These, Circe stole from her celestial aire,
By mortal mares on Earth, who, all unknown,
Mixt with the flaming coursers of the Sun.
Pleas'd with the monarch's gift, their steeds they press,

And to their anxious lord return with peace.

But Jove's imperial queen, from Argos far,
Rides on the whirlwinds through the fields of air.
From proud Pachynus' point, her eyes explore
The Trojan prince, and all his fleet on shore.
The bulwarks rise, the troops possess the strand,
Desert the ships, and pour upon the land;
She stood in anguish fixt, and shook her head,
Then, fir'd with rage, the wrathful goddess said:

"Curst race!—a race I labour to destroy!—
But Juno sinks beneath the fates of Troy!
Did not the captives break the victor's chain?
Did not her slaughter'd sons revive again?
Did they not force, when Troy in ashes lay,
Through fires and armies their victorious way?
What—Heav'n's great empress flags, by toils' oppress!

Or sure, her glutted vengeance lies at rest!
And yet I dar'd pursue the banish'd train
Through the last bounds of Neptune's wat'ry reign,
With rocks, with gulfs, with thunders from on high,
With all the storms of ocean and the sky.
In vain with storms I rous'd the roaring main;
Earth, skies, and oceans wag'd my war in vain;
In vain dire Scylla thunder'd o'er the sea;
Nor could the vast Charybdis bar the way.
For lo! in Tyber's flood thy navies ride,
Mock my revenge, and triumph o'er the tide.
And yet the god of battles could efface,
For one neglect, the Lapithæan race,
For one neglect, did Jove himself resign
To Dian's wrath the Calydonian line.
But I, the queen supreme of gods above,
The mighty consort of imperial Jove,
In vain for years one nation have pursu'd;
Nay by one single mortal am subdu'd!
Yet, though my pow'rs are baffled, will I try
Whatever pow'rs in nature's circle lie.
What! though th' partial Heav'n's my aims repel,
I'll raise new forces from the depths of Hell!
What!—if the Trojan must in Latium reign!
What!—if the fates a regal bride ordain!
Yet, may I still the nuptial rite delay,
And by a length of wars defer the day.
Yet, shall the people bleed! the kings shall reign,
The lonely monarchs of an empty plain!
Yet shall the father and the son make good
Their league of friendship, in their subjects' blood;
In the mixt blood of nations shall be paid,
At large, thy dreadful dow'r, imperial maid!
Wed then—with every fatal omen wed:
Bellona waits thee to the bridal bed.
The queen of love, like Priam's royal dame,
For Ilion has conceiv'd a second fame.
A Paris, sprung from Venus, shall destroy
Once more with fatal fires the tow'rs of Troy."
This said, to Earth th' impetuous goddess flies,
Indam'd with rage and vengeance, from the skies;
Looks down, and bending o'er the baleful cell,
Calls dire Alecto from the realms of Hell.

Crimes, frauds, and murders, are the fiend's delight,

The rage of death, and slaughters of the fight.
So fierce her looks! such terrors from her eyes!
Round her grim front such monstrous serpents
She scares ev'n Pluto, her immortal sire; [rise!
Her sister furies tremble and retire.

Then Heav'n's great queen, against the Trojan
Inflam'd her native rage, and thus began: [train,
"Daughter of night! thy potent aid I claim

To guard my honour, and support my fame.
Oh! let not Troy her pow'rs to Latium bring,
Nor with this match amuse her easy king.
Tis thine, the peace of brethren to confound,
To arm their hands, and spread destruction round;
Through kindling houses, towns, and realms, to
The torch of discord, and the flames of war. [bear
To thee a thousand noxious arts are known,
And every form of mischief is thy own.
Rouse, rouse the fury in thy soul! excite
The chiefs, and kindle all the rage of fight!
Dissolve the peace; and, fir'd by dire alarms,
Bid the mad nations rush to blood and arms!"

Scarce had she spoke, when sudden from her
eyes,

Smear'd with Gorgonian blood, the fury flies
Sublime; and tow'ring o'er the palace soars;
Then stands unseen before Amata's doors;
While grief and wrath the raging queen employ,
For Turnus, injur'd by the match with Troy.
Here stopt the fiend; and, discord all her view,
Snatch'd from her hissing locks, a snake she threw;
And through her inmost soul the fiery serpent flew.
Unfelt, the monster glides through every vest,
And breathes the secret poison in her breast.
Now, like a fillet, round her temples roll'd,
Now round her bosom; like a chain of gold.
Now to her tresses he repairs, and there
Thrills every ringlet of her golden hair.
Thus while her kindling soul the pest inspires
With the first sparkles of her fatal fires,
Before the bosom of the royal dame
Felt the full furies of th' infernal flame,
She speaks her grief, in accents soft and mild,
Implores the sire, and sorrows o'er her child:
"And must Lavinia then, our only joy,
Wed with this wand'ring fugitive of Troy?
And can a father issue the decree,
So fatal to himself, to her, and me?
For sure the pirate soon will bear away,
With the first rising wind, the lovely prey!
Such, such a guest of old, the Phrygian boy
Bore ravish'd Helen to the tow'rs of Troy.
Where, where is friendship, truth, and honour,
now?"

A father's promise, and a monarch's vow!
If thy great sire's commands have fixt thy mind,
To choose some hero of a foreign kind:
Then every kind, my lord, and every land
Are foreign, that are free from our command;
And if we trace brave Turnus' blood, he springs
From a long line of ancient Argive kings."

Thus urg'd the mother, in a mournful strain,
Her loud complaints, yet urg'd them all in vain.
But now the spreading poison fir'd her whole,
Ev'n to the last recesses of her soul.
In her wild thoughts a thousand horrors rise;
And fierce, and madding round the streets, she flies,
So the gay striplings lash, in eager sport,
A top, in giddy circles, round a court.

In rapid rings it whirls, and spins aloud,
Admir'd with rapture by the blooming crowd;
From every stroke, flies humming o'er the ground,
And gains new spirit, as the blows go round.

Thus flew the giddy queen, with fury stung,
Thro' the wide town, amid the wond'ring throng.
Yet more;—the destin'd nuptials to delay,
Fierce to the darksome wood she bounds away;
And, rising still in rage, with rites divine
She feign'd new orgies to the god of wine.
"Thou, Bacchus, only thou, deserv'st the fair!
For thee in ringlets grows her lovely hair!
For thee she leads the dance, and wreaths her ivy
spear."

Now spread around the wild infectious flames;
With the same fury glow the Latian dames;
Let loose their flying tresses in the wind,
Rush to the woods, and leave the town behind;
Toss high their ivy-spears; while clamorous rise,
And trembling shrieks, tumultuous, rend the skies.
The maddening queen, with rage superior stung,
Rear'd high a flaming pine, amid the throng,
And for young Turnus rais'd the nuptial song.
Then rolls her fiery eyes, and loud exclaims:
"Hear, all ye matrons! hear, ye Latian dames!
If yet a mother's woes your souls can move,
If yet your injur'd princess shares your love;
Like me, unbind your tresses; rove abroad;
And hold these sacred orgies to the god."

Thus the fierce fiend Amata's breast invades,
And drives her raving to the sylvan shades.
When all the monarch's palace she survey'd,
With all his counsels in confusion laid;
As wide around the rising fury grew,
On dusky wings to Ardea swift she flew:
Ardea, by Danaë built in days of yore,
When with her Argive train she sought the shore;
But now her perish'd ruins are no more!
Where o'er the rest brave Turnus' mansion rose,
She found the hero sunk in soft repose;
And first, her dread infernal form to hide,
Laid the grim terrors of her front aside:
With silver hairs her temples were o'erspread,
And wreaths and verdant olives crown'd her head.
Her wither'd face with wrinkles was embost,
And in the women all the fiend was lost.
She now appear'd a venerable dame,
And to the couch like Juno's priestess came:

"Then are thy labours vain," (she thus begun)
"And shall a Trojan seize thy rightful throne?
The king denies the crown he long has ow'd,
Denies the fair thy labours bought with blood.
Go—save his kingdom; fight the Tuscan train!
Go, prince, and conquer, to be scorn'd again!
Hear then by me the mandate from on high
Sent by the mighty empress of the sky:
Fly, fly! the valiant youth for arms prepare;
And through the opening gates let loose the war.
Lo! where in Tyber ride the fleets of Troy;
Go then, their chiefs and painted ships destroy;
So Heav'n commands—and, if the Latian lord
Detaim the fair, regardless of his word,
Let him in blood thy vengeful sword deplore,
The sword that conquer'd in his cause before."

Thus the disdainful dame—with scornful pride,
In haughty terms the martial youth reply'd:
"The tidings you convey, I knew before;
The Trojan fleet is landed on the shore.
Hence—nor with idle tales my bosom move;
I live secure in Juno's guardian love.

But, worn with years, you dote with vain alarms,
And, when you nod, you dream of kings in arms.
Go, mother, go—and make your gods your care,
But leave to men the province of the war." [found,

While yet he spoke, her looks the youth con-
And the black fiend in all her terrors frown'd.
Aghast, he shook, and trembled with affright,
While all her native horrors blast his sight.
Such a tremendous front the fury spread,
So dreadful hist the serpents round her head;
So grim a figure now she seem'd to rise;
That Hell, all Hell, was open'd in her eyes!

Then, ere the fault'ring trembling youth reply'd,
She roll'd her fiery orbs from side to side;
Snatch'd two black serpents from her locks, and shook [spoke]

The sounding scourge, and thund'ring thus she
"Behold, behold the wretch, by vain alarms
And age, reduc'd to dream of kings in arms!
A fury from the deeps of Hell, I bear,
In these dread hands, destruction, death, and war!"

With that a flaming torch the goddess threw;
Deep through his breast the fiery weapon flew.
Straight rous'd the startled warrior; and a stream
Of sweat ran copious down from every limb.
Through the wide dome he raves with mad alarms,
He runs, he flies, he calls aloud to arms;
Fell wrath and vengeance in his eyes appear,
The thirst of slaughter, and the rage of war.
So when in parting spires the flame divides,
And crackling climbs around the caldron's side,
In the deep womb glow fierce the hissing streams,
Boil, swell, and foam, and bubble o'er the brims;
Till high in air the fuming liquids rise,
And in a length of vapours mount the skies.

He sends to great Latinus, to declare
The peace polluted, and denounce the war:
"To arms!" he cries,—“this moment will we go
To guard our country, and repel the foe.”
Himself, he boasts, will all the war maintain,
And fight the Trojan and Ausonian train.
His troops take fire, and (Heav'n invoc'd in pray'r)
With eager rage they gather to the war:
Some by his beauty mov'd, his cause embrace,
Some by his valiant deeds, and regal race.

While thus his social train the prince inspires,
Swift to the Trojan host the fiend retires.
Big with new mischiefs to the place she came,
Where young Iſtus hunts the savage game.
A stag he chas'd; the chase the fury sees;
And bids the scent grow warm in every breeze;
His opening hounds, exulting, shoot away,
And bear impatient on the panting prey:
From this light cause she rais'd the first alarm,
And fir'd the brutal swains to blood and arms—
Snatch'd from the dam, by Tyrrheus' children
(Tyrrheus, chief master of the royal herd) [rear'd,
With care domestic had this stag been bred;
Of beauteous shape; and antlers grac'd his head.
The fawn familiar lick'd her stroking care;
His horns were dress'd with garlands by the fair.
Fed from the board, accustom'd to command,
The fawn familiar lick'd her stroking hand.
Full oft she bath'd him in the limpid tide,
And fondly curious comb'd his silken side:
All day amid the forests would he roam,
But came each evening to his wonted home.
Ascanius' hounds had rous'd the trembling prey,
As down the gentle flood he took his way,
And on the cooling bank in length luxuriant lay.

The youthful hero, fir'd with love of fame,
 Directs a feather'd arrow at the game;
 The feather'd arrow flew; the fury guides
 The pointed weapon through the wanton's sides.
 Pierc'd with the dart, the bleeding fawn in vain
 Flies back for refuge to his home again;
 Complains with human tears, and human sighs,
 And begs for aid with unavailing cries.
 The beauteous Sylvia heard his moving strains,
 Beat her white bosom, and alarm'd the swains.
 Inspir'd with sudden rage they wing their way,
 For in the wood the lurking fury lay.
 Some arm'd with knotted clubs, impetuous came,
 And some with staves well-season'd in the flame.
 With stones or brands the peasants throng from far,
 And every sudden weapon, to the war.
 Tyrrheus, who clove a tree with many a stroke,
 Left the huge wedge within the gaping oak;
 Then seiz'd the pond'rous axe with loud alarms,
 And call'd the rustics all around to arms.
 Meantime the fury from her stand descries
 The growing discord every moment rise;
 Ascends the roof, and, from the lofty height,
 Calls in the boist'rous peasants to the fight:
 With her full force her mighty horn she winds;
 Th' infernal strain alarms the gath'ring hinds.
 The dreadful summons the deep forests took;
 The woods all thunder'd, and the mountains shook.
 The lake of Trivia heard the note profound,
 The Veline fountains trembled at the sound.
 The thick sulphureous fogs of hoary Nar
 Shook at the blast that blew the flames of war:
 Pale at the piercing call, the mothers prest,
 With shrieks, their starting infants to the breast.
 Thus the mad rustics caught the dire alarms,
 And at the horrid signal flew to arms.
 Nor less, in succour of the princely boy,
 Pour forth to battle all the troops of Troy:
 Clubs, staves, and brands, at first the fight main-
 But now embody'd armies spread the plain, [tain;
 And deadly swords and shining bucklers wield;
 And groves of spears gleam dreadful o'er the field.
 On brazen arms the Sun refulgent plays,
 And to the skies the fiery helmets blaze.
 So when the wind has stirr'd the gentle seas,
 The waves just swell, and whiten by degrees;
 Till all the heaving wat'ry worlds arise
 In one vast burst of thunder to the skies.
 First, Almon, Tyrrheus' eldest hope, was slain,
 Fierce as he fought, the foremost on the plain.
 Beneath his throat the arrow found its way;
 And, chok'd in blood, the beauteous warrior lay.
 Now heaps on heaps fall thick on every side,
 And in the cloud of fight Galesus dy'd;
 Good old Galesus! while, with earnest care,
 He labour'd to prevent the rising war:
 The sage for justice bore the foremost place,
 Though far the wealthiest of the Latian race:
 Five flocks, five bellowing droves, his pastures held,
 And with a hundred teams he turn'd the spacious field.
 Thus, while on either side, the martial train
 With mutual slaughter bath'd the purple plain:
 When the stern fury, from her promise freed,
 Beheld with joy the growing battle bleed;
 She leaves th' Hesperian shores, she mounts the
 And in proud triumph thms to Juno cries: [skies,
 "Behold my promise, mighty queen! made good;
 The Trojan sword has drawn the Latian blood.

War, boundless war, runs raging round the plain;
 Nor can yourself command the peace again:
 Speak but you will, I'll spread the dire alarm,
 And bid the bord'ring towns and countries arm,
 Both sides to aid, the nations shall repair;
 Wide round, the rising discord will I bear,
 And rouse in every breast the furies of the war."
 "Enough," replies the queen, "enough is done,
 The war stands fixt; the slaughters are begun.
 They fly to war; their arms with blood distain:
 Death, rage, and terrour, range the purple plain.
 Such are the nuptial rites, that we prepare
 For Latium's king, and Venus' worthy heir!
 But go, this moment leave the realms above;
 Go—nor offend the sacred eyes of Jove.
 To thy unhallow'd feet the sire denies
 Th' ethereal walks, and freedom of the skies.
 Retire to Hell! if aught remains undone,
 Ourselves shall finish what thy toils begun."
 Swift as the goddess spoke, the fury springs
 With rapid speed, and spreads her dusky wings;
 Her serpents hissing all around, she flies
 To Hell's dark realms, impetuous, from the skies.
 Amid fair Italy, renown'd by fame,
 Lies a deep vale, Amsanctus is the name.
 Her gloomy sides are shaded with a grove;
 And a huge range of mountains tow'rs above:
 Fierce through the dusky vale the torrents pour,
 And o'er the rattling stones the whirlpools roar.
 There the black jaws of Hell are open'd wide;
 There rolls dire Acheron his fiery tide;
 There lies the dark infernal cave, and there
 Grim Pluto breathes the soft ethereal air.
 Down through this dreadful opening, from on high,
 The fiend plung'd headlong, and roll'd the sky.
 Meantime the queen of Heav'n exerts her care,
 With her last hand to crown the growing war.
 In one vast tide the loud tumultuous swains
 Pour to the city, and desert the plains.
 Young Almon's corse they bear in open sight,
 And old Galesus, slaughter'd in the fight;
 Implore the gods with vows, and beg in vain
 The hoary monarch to revenge the slain;
 While the fierce Daunian lord's complaints con-
 spire
 To spread the gathering fears of sword and fire.
 "Turnus," he cries, "is banish'd with disgrace,
 And wrong'd in favour of a foreign race.
 The king prefers a Trojan for his son;
 A Trojan prince already fills the throne!"
 Those too, whose mothers by the queen were led,
 When, fir'd by Bacchus, to the woods she fled,
 (Such was her interest in the realms) declare
 For open arms, and breathe revenge and war.
 War is the fatal universal cry,
 Against all omens of the angry sky!—
 Furious they crowd their sovereign's regal door,
 And, madding, sound the rich pavilions roar;
 Besiege their king, as waves a rock, in vain,
 Some mighty rock, amidst the rolling main;
 That hears unmov'd the sounding tempests blow,
 That sees the furious surges foam below;
 And o'er the deeps, majestic to the sight,
 Stands fixt, and glories in its matchless height,
 Proud of its bulk; while storms and working tides
 Fly, dash, and break against the tow'ring sides!
 When long the prince had labour'd to retain
 The rising madness of their souls in vain,
 And saw the crowd no-counsel would obey,
 But rush'd to arms, as Juno led the way;

The mournful sire obtains the gods and skies :
 " And lo ! we yield to fate," the monarch cries.
 " The storm impetuous bears us down the flood—
 But Heav'n, Heav'n claims your sacrilegious blood !
 Thou too, rash Turnus, shalt thy part sustain,
 And late, too late, implore the gods in vain !
 Safe to the port am I already come,
 And all your king can lose, is but a tomb !"²
 Then pensive he retir'd, and left to fate
 The reins of empire, and the cares of state.

A solemn custom in Hesperia reign'd,
 Which long the potent Alban lords maintain'd,
 And Rome still holds, when, terrible in might,
 The world's great empress sends her sons to fight.
 Whether the chain for Dacia they prepare,
 Or wage th' Hyrcanian or Arabian war,
 Or their victorious arms on India turn,
 And spread her eagles to the rising morn ;
 Or urge proud Parthia's long expected doom,
 And bring in pomp our ravish'd ensigns home.—
 Two massy solid gates have ever stood,
 For ages sacred to the Thracian god¹.

Old, double Janus guards the dreadful doors ;
 Grim war within, his mighty captive, roars.
 On many a pond'rous hinge the gates are hung ;
 With brazen bars impenetrably strong.
 Soon as the fathers of the state proclaim,
 The fight must vindicate the Roman fame ;
 Straight, at their high decree, the consul, drest
 In the rich sacred robe and Sabine vest,
 While the loud trumpets sound a martial strain,
 (In pomp attended by the valiant train)
 'Throws wide the gates ; and thro' the nations far
 Lets loose the boundless furies of the war.
 So now the madd'ning Latian crowds implore
 Their monarch, to unfold the sacred door.
 But from the fatal office he withdrew,
 Abhorr'd the province, and retir'd from view.
 Then Heav'n's dread empress, while the prince delay'd,

Shot down, and both the bursting gates display'd :
 The bolts fly back, with every brazen bar ;
 And, like a storm, broke forth th' imprison'd war.

Till now unmov'd by discord and alarms,
 Ausonia buns, and calls her sons to arms.
 Some to the furious fight on foot proceed ;
 Some vault impetuous on the bounding steed,
 Some whet the blunted pole-axe for the field,
 Brighten the spear and long neglected shield ;
 With transport hear the trumpet's clangors rise,
 And view the banners streaming in the skies.
 Ardea, proud Tybur, Crustumerium's pow'rs,
 Atina strong, and high Antemne's tow'rs,
 Five potent cities, all their sons employ,
 To forge new arms against the troops of Troy.
 For greaves the ductile silver they extend,
 And for the shield the pliant sallow bend :
 The guiltless arms the rural trade affords,
 Scythes, plough-shares, hooks, are straighten'd
 And in the glowing forges they restore [into swords].
 The blunted falchions which their fathers wore.
 And now the sprightly trumpets sound from far ;
 The word flies round ; the signal of the war.
 Some snatch the polish'd helm with eager speed ;
 Some to the yoke compel the snorting steed,
 Brace on the golden cuirass, seize the shield ;
 And, with the glitt'ring sword, rush furious to the field.

² Mars.

Ye Muses! now unlock your sacred spring;
 Inspire your bard, and teach him how to sing
 What mighty heroes led the martial train,
 And what embattled armies spread the plain :
 The Latian chiefs, ye goddesses ! declare,
 And the dire progress of the wasteful war ;
 You know, and can record the pow'rs who came,
 Which we learn only from the voice of fame.

Mezentius first, who scorn'd th' immortal pow'n,
 Conducts his armies from the Tuscan shores.
 Him follow'd Lausus, flush'd with youthful fire,
 A son, whose shining virtues might require
 A happier throne, and far a better sire !
 He tam'd the steed, and urg'd the generous chase,
 And none but Turnus match'd his blooming face :
 He led from fair Agylla to the plain
 A thousand warriors, but he led in vain !

Great Aventinus, great Alcides' son,
 Wore the proud trophy that his father won :
 A hundred serpents round his buckler roll'd,
 And Hydra hiss'd from all her heads, in gold.
 Fresh wreaths of palm his lofty chariot crown'd,
 And fierce he lash'd his fiery coursers round.
 When great Alcides from Geryon slain
 Return'd triumphant to the Latian plain ;
 And the brave victor, safe in these abodes,
 Cool'd his Hesperian herds in Tyber's floods ;
 He won in shades the beauteous Rhea's grace,
 And this bold hero crown'd his strong embrace ;
 Born in mount Aventine's sequester'd wood,
 The mortal mother mingling with the god.

His valiant troops long Sabine javelins bear,
 And, arm'd with steely piles, provoke the war.
 He stalk'd before his host ; and, wide dispread,
 A lion's teeth grinn'd horrid o'er his head :
 Then sought the palace in this strange attire,
 And look'd as stern and dreadful as his sire.

From Tibur, Coras and Catillus came,
 Tibur, the town that took their brother's name.
 Brave youths ! who led the martial Argive train,
 And rush'd the foremost to th' embattled plain.
 So two fierce centaurs of the cloud-born race,
 Rush furious down the frozen hills of Thæce ;
 The groves give way, the crackling woods resound,
 And trampled forests spread their ruins wide around.

Next mighty Cæculus to battle flies,
 Who bade the tow'rs of proud Prænestæ rise :
 Found on the hearth, amid the glowing fire,
 The nations deem'd great Mulciber his sire.
 A host of warriors to the field he led,
 The hardy swains that fair Prænestæ bred,
 Or Gabii sent where Juno's temple rose ;
 The troops who dwell where chilling Anio flows
 With those who drink old Amaseus' stream,
 Or from the walls of rich Anagnia came.
 Not all with arms are furnish'd for the war,
 Nor grasp the shield, nor whirl the rapid car.
 But most from slings a storm of bullets throw,
 And leaden deaths destroy the distant foe.
 Some in their hands two pointed javelins bore,
 And spoils of wolves for glitt'ring helmets wore ;
 The left foot bare, they boldly rush to fight,
 But a tough hide, unseason'd, sheaths the right.

Next Neptune's son, the brave Messapus, came,
 Exempt from steel, and sacred from the flame.
 To long neglected wars he fir'd his train,
 And urg'd his troops to shine in arms again.
 From the Flavian and Pescennian coast,
 At his command, advance th' embody'd host :
 With the Faliscan band, who purest justice boast.

Those who on high Soracte's tow'rs reside,
Or dwell by Ciminus' expanded tide,
Or o'er the rough aspiring mountain rove,
Or haunt divine Feronia's shady grove:
All march, embattled in array, and sing
The martial glories of their godlike king.
So from the fishy floods, a snowy train
Of swans embody'd wing th' aerial plain;
Stretch their long necks o'er Asia's crystal spring,
And the responsive shores and echoing waters ring.

Not one, who heard the loud confus'd alarms,
Had thought this noisy train a host in arms,
But some huge cloud of clamorous fowls, who soar
Among the cliffs, and scream around the shore.

Lo! next brave Clausus leads his troops along;
From the old Sabine race the warrior sprung:
With a vast host, a shot himself, he came,
The first great father of the Claudian name;
That spread thro' Latium, when, the line to grace,
Rome shar'd her empire with the Sabine race.
The ancient Cures march at his commands,
And a large force from Amiternian lands,
With those who dwell where full Velinus runs,
Or where Nonentum boasts her martial sons,
Or old Eretum stretch'd her utmost bound,
And rich Mutusco smiles, with olives crown'd;
Or where steep Tetrica's rough rocks arise,
Or proud Severus tow'rs amid the skies.
Where, with fair Foruli Casperia stands,
And clear Himella floats the fruitful lands,
Where gentle Fabaris serenely glides,
Whose streams augment imperial Tyber's tides:
Where, near cold Nursia, beauteous Orta stood,
And mournful Allia rolls her fatal flood.
Thick shines with moving troops the blazing plain,
Thick, as the billows on the stormy main;
Thick as the ripen'd harvests are beheld,
That nod and wave along the golden field.
The bucklers ring, the clashing arms resound;
Beneath their footsteps groans the trembling ground.

Then Agamemnon's son, Helesus came,
By birth a foe to all the Trojan name;
He yok'd his fiery coursers to the car,
And with a thousand soldiers rush'd to war,
From where on mountains live th' Aurruntian line,
Where Massic hills produce the generous wine;
Warriors, who dwell along the roaring sea,
Or from the walls of Cales took their way:
With those who drink Vulturmus' shoaly flood,
The rough Saticulan and Oscan stood.
Short, pointed javelins, fasten'd by a string,
With fatal force the dext'rous artists sling:
Light shields of season'd hide aloft they bear,
And, arm'd with bending swords, provoke the war.
Nor thou, unsung, brave Ebalus! shalt pass,
The nymph Sebethis' son, of Telo's race.
While pleasing Caprea own'd his father's sway,
And Teleboan realms his nod obey;
The son, far more ambitious, stretch'd his reign
O'er those rich towns, where Sarno bathes the plain.
Now to the fight he leads his warlike pow'rs
From ancient Batulum, and Rufa's tow'rs,
From where, her blooming fruits Abella crown,
And old Celenna spreads her spacious down.
These, like the rough Teutonic warriors, threw Huge spears with barbs, that wing'd with slaughter flew.

Light casques of cork around their heads they wore,
And brazen swords and brazen bucklers bore.

Thee too, bold Ufens, to the dire alarms,
Cold Nursia sent a chief renown'd in arms.
Her fierce rough sons through forests bound away,
And o'er wild mountains chase the panting prey.
In arms the natives turn the frozen soil,
Make war a sport, and fly upon the spoil.

Umbro, the brave Marrubian priest, was there,
Sent by the Marsian monarch to the war.
The smiling olive with her verdant boughs
Shades his bright helmet, and adorns his brow.
His charms in peace the furious serpent keep,
And lull th' envenom'd viper's race to sleep;
His healing hand allay'd the raging pain;
And at his touch the poisons fled again.
But yet he fail'd to cure, with all his art,
The wound inflicted by the Trojan dart!
Nor all his charms, nor potent herbs that grow
On Marsian mountains, could prevent the blow!
For thee, wide echoing, sigh'd th' Angitian woods;
For thee, in murmurs, wept thy native floods!

Next, brave Hippolytus! thy beauteous hair,
The lovely Virbius mingled in the war.
In the dark woods by fair Egeria bred,
His troops the youth from old Aricia led:
Where, on the shore, Diana's altar stood,
(But now unstain'd with offer'd human blood;)
For when Hippolytus, as records tell,
By his fierce stepdame's arts and vengeance fell,
Chas'd by his father's curses to the shore,
The hapless youth the startled coursers tore;
By Æsculapius' skill and Dian's care
The chief reviv'd, and breath'd ethereal air.
But Jove, incens'd, a mortal to survey,
From the Tartarean shades restor'd to day,
Great Phœbus' son, the godlike artist, hurl'd,
Transfixt with thunder, to the nether world:
But Dian hid the youth in groves, and there
Consign'd her darling to Egeria's care.
There, in the forests, with the sacred name
He past his days, and Virbius was his name.
For this, th' unhallow'd steed must still remove
From Dian's fane and consecrated grove:
Since the mad horses startled as they flew,
And on the ground their mangled master threw.
Yet his brave offspring drove the thund'ring car,
And lash'd his fiery coursers to the war.

Bold Turnus in the front, supremely tall,
Sheath'd in refulgent arms, outshines them all;
High on his helm a triple plume was rais'd,
And on his crest the dire Chimæra blaz'd:
From her wide jaws the horrid fiend expires,
A dreadful length of fires succeeding fires.
When the loud voice of slaughter rends the skies,
And the full horrors of the battle rise,
She glows, she lightens, as the warrior turns;
She flames with rage; and the whole monster burns.
Chang'd to an heifer in the flowery field,
The beauteous Ið chang'd the shining shield.
Here stood her guard³; and there her father⁴ roll'd
His swelling surges through the figur'd gold.
A cloud of foot succeeds; a mighty train,
With spears, and shields; and armies hide the plain.
The pow'rs from Argive and Auruntian lands
Mix'd with the ancient bold Sicilian bands.
With painted shields the brave Labici came,
And Sacran forces, to the field of fame;
With those who till Numicus' fair abodes,
Or dwell where Tyber views his rising woods:

³ Argus.

⁴ Inachus, a river of

Or where the rough Rutulians turn the ground,
And the steep hills of Circe stretch around :
Where fair Feronia boasts her stately grove,
And Anxur glories in her guardian Jovs :
Where stands the Pontine lake, and o'er the plain
Cold Ufens' stream steals gently to the main.

Last with her martial troops, all sheath'd in brass,
Camilla came, a queen of Volscian race.
Nor were the web or loom the virgin's care,
But arms and coursers, and the toils of war.
She led the rapid race, and left behind
The flagging floods, and pinions of the wind :
Lightly she flies along the level plain, [grain ;
Nor hurts the tender grass, nor bends the golden
Or o'er the swelling surge suspended sweeps,
And smoothly skims, unbath'd, along the deeps.
From the dispeopled towns and fields repair
Men, matrons, maids, and youths, to view the fair :
The crowds all gaze with transport, to survey,
Loose in the winds, her purple garments play,
Her polish'd bow, her quiver's gaudy pride,
With arrows stor'd, and glittering at her side :
Her shining javelin, wondering, they behold,
And her fair tresses bound with clasps of gold.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK VIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE war being now begun, both the generals make all possible preparations. Turnus sends to Diomedes; Æneas goes in person to beg succours from Evander, and the Tuscans. Evander receives him kindly, furnishes him with men, and sends his son Pallas with him. Vulcan, at the request of Venus, makes arms for her son Æneas, and draws on his shield the most memorable actions of his posterity.

Now Turnus rous'd all Latium with alarms
To mount the fiery steeds and fly to arms ;
Fixt on Laurentum's tow'rs sublime in air,
His standard wav'd ; the signal of the war :
And the loud trumpets, heard from far excite
The generous youth, and call them to the fight.
Confederate pow'rs conspire, the war to wage ;
And the mad nations breathe revenge and rage.
Their armies Ufens and Messapus guide,
With proud Mezentius who the gods defy'd.
From the suspended plough they drag the swains,
And for the war dispeopled all the plains,
To Arpi next sage Venulus they sped
To beg the aid of royal Diomed ;
And charge the hoary envoy to inform
The martial monarch, of the rising storm ;
That Troy's proud navy rides in Tyber's floods ;
Æneas here has fixt his vanquish'd gods ;
And vaunts himself the prince, ordain'd by fate
To sway the sceptre of th' Hesperian state ;
The nations own his cause, his right proclaim,
And Latium echoes with his growing fame ;
That best himself could judge, who knew the foe,
From such a war what dread effects may flow ;

What is his mighty aim, his proud intent ;
And, should he conquer, what the dire event,
Was left for him to weigh ; whose state and throne,

And fortunes, stood endanger'd like their own.

All this the Trojan chief beheld, oppress
With cares that roll'd tumultuous in his breast.
A thousand thoughts his wavering soul divide,
That turns each way, and points to every side.
So from a brazen vase the trembling stream
Reflects the lunar, or the solar beam :
Swift and elusive of the dazzled eyes,
From wall to wall the dancing glory flies :
Thence to the ceiling shoot the glancing rays,
And o'er the roof the quivering splendour plays.

'Twas night—and, weary with the toils of day,
In soft repose the whole creation lay ;
And last the Trojan prince, oppress with care
On the dire prospect of th' approaching war,
Sunk, and in balmy slumbers clos'd his eyes ;
His couch the bank ; his canopy the skies.
When, slow-emerging through the poplar wood,
Rose the majestic father of the flood,
Tyber, the guardian god, in open view :
A sea-green mantle round his shoulders flew ;
A wreath of reeds adorn'd his hoary head,
And, to relieve his sorrows, thus he said :

“ O long-expected on our blest abodes,
Great chief, the true descendant of the gods !
Whose conduct brings thy rescu'd Troy once more
To rise immortal on our Latian shore ;
Proceed, and conquer, prince ! nor yield to fear ;
Here lies thy fated home, thy Ilium here.
Go !—meet the threat'ning war ; thy cares are vain,
The gods relent, and Heav'n grows mild again.
Nor think, an airy vision of the night,
A transient empty dream deludes thy sight.
Soon thou shalt view, beneath an oak reclin'd,
A large white mother of the bristly kind,
With her white numerous brood of thirty young,
Who drain her udders as she lies along.
There, there, thy town, great hero, shall ascend,
There all thy labours, all thy woes shall end.
Heav'n, by this sign, ordains thy royal son,
When thirty years in full succession run,
Shall build a city of distinguish'd fame,
Which from this own shall derive her name,
But to succeed, pursue what I advise ;
Go, make th' Arcadian tribes thy firm allies.
The race, that own'd of old great Pallas' sway,
Hither beneath Evander bent their way ;
Then rais'd their walls on the tall mountain's crown ;

And Pallas' name adorn'd the rising town.
But soon the Latian race in arms appear ;
And with the strangers wage a dreadful war.
Go, join their forces, and their aid implore,
And fear the gath'ring hostile train no more.
Rise, son of Venus, rise, employ thy oars ;
Our self will guide thee to the friendly shore.
Soon as the day shall dawn, thy gifts prepare,
And vanquish Heav'n's revengeful queen with pray'r.

Crown'd with success, and all thy foes o'eraw'd,
Discharge to me the honours of a god,
To me the sire of this immortal flood :
For know, old Tyber stands before thine eyes,
Ador'd on Earth, and reverenc'd in the skies.
I lead, in peaceful pomp, my humid train
Along these banks, and bathe the fruitful plain :

And on our sides a city shall be seen;
 Our glorious seat; the world's majestic queen!"
 The god then plung'd beneath his oozy bed;
 And with the night the hero's slumber fled.
 He rose, and straight his joyful eyes survey
 The purple splendours of the dawning day;
 Then water in his palm devoutly took,
 Rais'd to the skies, and thus with transport spoke:
 "Ye nymphs, Laurentian nymphs! from whose supplies

And watery stores the swelling rivers rise;
 And thou, old Tyber! my propitious guide,
 Receive Æneas on thy sacred tide;
 From every ill defend him, as he goes,
 And look with pity on his endless woes.
 Then from whatever source thy streams survey
 The golden light, and murmuring spring to day;
 O thou, the greatest of the wat'ry gods,
 Majestic prince of all th' Hesperian floods!
 Still to thy name due honours will I pay,
 And gifts unceasing on thy altars lay.
 But oh! be present with thy aid divine,
 Display, and then confirm the promis'd sign."

He said, then arm'd the Trojans, and supply'd
 Two barks with oars, to stem the yellow tide.
 When lo! the promis'd omen was display'd;
 The large white dam lay stretch'd along the shade,
 With all her snowy young, in open view;
 Whom, with her brood, the prince to Juno slew.
 Now while the ships with equal strokes they row'd,
 All night old Tyber calm'd his swelling flood.
 The slumbering streams no mingling murmurs
 Smooth, as the glassy level of the lake. [make,
 With joyful shouts the sable galleys glide,
 Easy and light, along the floating tide.
 Surpris'd, the forests and the floods beheld
 Bright arms and vessels on the wat'ry field.
 All night, all day, they ply their busy oars
 Along the mazes of the winding shores,
 And gently move beneath the waving scene
 Of groves, that paint the checquer'd floods with greens. [high

Now had the Sun's bright coursers whirl'd on
 His fiery chariot to the mid-day sky:
 When lo! the distant towers the train descries;
 And walls and intermingled houses rise;
 Evander's homely state—where now appears
 Immortal Rome, advanc'd above the stars!
 Thither they turn the prow without delay,
 And to the city bend their eager way.

Before the town, within the gloomy woods,
 To great Alcides and the favouring gods,
 It chanc'd, that day, th' Arcadian monarch paid
 A solemn offering in the secret shade.
 Pallas his son, the rural senate round,
 And the chief youths the flaming altars crown'd:
 With fuming incense in their hands they stood,
 And the red pavement blush'd with sacred blood.

Soon as they saw the ships in silence move,
 And shine between the openings of the grove;
 A sudden dread strikes cold through every breast;
 They start, they rise, and leave th' unfinished
 But Pallas bids the guests the rite pursue, [feast.
 Then snatch'd a javelin, and impetuous flew—
 "Resolve me, stranger," (from a point he calls)
 "Who, whence you are, and why approach our walls?"

What urg'd your voyage to these shores, declare?
 Speak, speak your business—bring you peace or war?"

High on the stern the Trojan hero stands,
 And held a branch of olive in his hands.
 "Behold," he cries, "the far-fam'd sons of Troy;
 These swords against the Latians we employ;
 The perjurd Latians; whose unjust alarms
 Force us to fly to great Evander's arms.
 Go, tell your king, the Dardan chiefs appear,
 And beg his potent succour in the war."
 "Whoe'er thou, 'art, approach," he cries with joy,

(All fir'd to hear the glorious name of Troy;) "To my great father be thy suit address,
 And grace our mansions as a friend and guest."
 With that he gave the Dardan prince his hand,
 And led the godlike hero from the strand:
 Then to the sacred grove their way they took;
 And thus the Trojan to the monarch spoke:
 "Best of the Greeks! to whom devoid of fear
 Constrain'd by fate, these types of peace I bear.
 Though from Arcadia's hostile bounds you came,
 Ally'd to both the kings of Atreus' name,
 Yet hither did thy fame my steps incline,
 My own first choice, Heav'n's oracles divine,
 And the mixt glories of our kindred line.
 For know, we both from mighty Atlas trace,
 Who props th' ethereal spheres, our ancient race.
 Our father Dardanus, a glorious name,
 From his fam'd daughter, fair Electra, came.
 His beauteous Maia, on Cyllene's height,
 Disclos'd your sire, great Mercury, to light.
 Thus from that common source divided ran
 Our sacred lines, as first they met in one.
 Rais'd by these hopes all caution I disown,
 And sent no envoys to address thy throne,
 But came unguarded, fearless, and alone.
 Our Daunian foes, with equal rage, destroy
 Your suff'ring subjects and the sons of Troy;
 And hope, if they expel the Dardan train,
 From sea to sea to propagate their reign.
 Then in a league let either nation join,
 For know, our Trojans are a martial line,
 Valiant and bold, and season'd to alarms;
 True to their leagues, and exercis'd in arms!"

Thus he—the monarch roll'd his eager eyes
 O'er his majestic form, and thus replies:
 "On all thy features how I dwell with joy:
 Welcome, thrice welcome, glorious prince of Troy!"

How in thy face, my ancient friend I see!
 Anchises looks, and lives, and speaks in thee;
 Well I recall great Priam's stately port,
 Whence once he sought his royal sister's court
 On Salaminian shores, with all his train;
 And took his way through our Arcadian plain.
 Then, but a youth, I gaz'd the strangers o'er,
 And much admir'd the chiefs, their monarch more;
 But most Anchises; for, supremely tall,
 Thy graceful godlike sire outshin'd them all.
 Eager I long'd in friendship's sacred bands
 To hold the chief, and join our plighted hands,
 Led him to Pheneus' ancient walls, caress'd
 Th' illustrious prince, and claim'd him for my guest.
 On me, at parting, generous he bestow'd
 Two golden bridles, that refulgent glow'd,
 (A glorious present by my son possess'd.)
 With a rich quiver and embroider'd vest.
 The peace you ask, we give; our friendship plight,
 And, soon as morn reveals the purple light,

With our confederate troops, a martial train,
Safe I'll dismiss thee from these walls again.
Now, since as friends you honour our abode,
Assist, and pay due offerings to the god.
With us pursue the solemn annual feasts,
And from this hour commence our constant guests."

He said; the bowls replac'd in open view,
The joyful train the holy rites renew;
The hoary king dispos'd his guests around,
And plac'd the Trojans on the verdant ground.
But for their prince an ample couch was spread;
A lion's spoils adorn'd the rural bed.
Now brought the chosen youths and priests again
The sacred banquet to the stranger train;
Dispens'd from canisters the bread around,
And with the foaming wine the goblets crown'd:
The Dardan prince and every Trojan guest,
Reclin'd at ease, partake the solemn feast.
But when the rage of craving hunger fled,
Thus to the chief the hoary monarch said:

" 'Tis not for nought we pay these rites divine
To great Alcides' ever-honour'd shrine;
Our worship springs from gratitude sincere,
Not heady zeal, nor superstitious fear;
Nor are our tribes by blind devotion aw'd;
But, sav'd by Hercules, adore the god.
For lo! in air yon hanging rock behold!
See heaps on heaps, on ruins ruins roll'd!
See yon huge cavern, yawning wide around!
Where still the shatter'd mountain spreads the
ground.

That spacious hold, grim Cacus once possess,
Tremendous fiend! half human, half a beast!
Deep, deep as Hell, the dismal dungeon lay,
Dark and impervious to the beams of day.
With copious slaughter smok'd the purple floor;
Pale heads hung horrid on the lofty door,
Dreadful to view! and dropp'd with crimson gore.
The fiend from Vulcan sprung; and, like his sire,
The mighty monster breath'd a storm of fire,
So fierce he rag'd; till time at length bestow'd
The presence, aid, and vengeance of a god.
For now Alcides left the realms of Spain,
Proud of the spoils of huge Geryon slain.
To these fair shores the bellowing doves he led;
Along the banks and flow'ry vales they fed.
The fiend resolves to bear the prize away
By fraud or force; and meditates the prey.
Four beauteous heifers, four fair bulls he took,
Enclos'd and lodg'd them in the gloomy rock;
But by their tails the struggling prey he drew,
And thought to puzzle the deluded view.
The turning tracks, inverted, where they tread,
Back from the monster's darksome cavern led.
Meantime the mighty drove the hero leads
To fresher pastures, and untrampled meads.
The parting herds spread wide, and roar around;
Fields, woods and hills, rebellow to the sound.
When lo! a heifer heard her love complain,
And roar'd responsive from the cave again;
From vault to vault the sound in thunder flew,
And the detected fraud appear'd in view.
Alcides seiz'd his arms, inflam'd with ire,
Rage in his looks, and all his soul on fire;
Fierce in his hands the pond'rous club he shook,
And, mad for vengeance, mounts th' aerial rock.
Then, first appall'd, the monster we descri,
Death in his cheek, and horror in his eye.
Swift as the wind, with terror wing'd, he fled,
And in the gloomy cavern plung'd his head.

The pond'rous rock, impenetrably strong,
On solid hinges by his father hung
To guard the dreadful dungeon, down he drew:
The shatter'd chains and bursting barriers flew.
Scarce had the fiend let down th' enormous weight,
When fierce the god came thund'ring to the gate.
He gnash'd his teeth with rage, the passes try'd,
And roll'd his eager eyes on every side;
Now here, now there, a fiery glance he threw,
And thrice, impetuous, round the mountain flew;
Thrice strove to storm the massy gates in vain;
And thrice, o'erspent, sat panting on the plain.
" A pointed rock behind the cavern stood,
That to the left frown'd dreadful o'er the flood,
Black, rough, and vast; a pile of wood'rous height,
A solemn haudt for every bird of night.
This, from the right, the god incumbent shook;
Fierce from the solid base he heav'd the rock.
Then push'd convulsive with a frightful peal,
The smoking steep rolls thund'ring down the vale.

To the loud din, earth, air and heav'n reply;
The banks start wide; and back the surges fly.
Expos'd to sight the monster's dungeon lay,
And the huge cave flew open to the day.
So, if the bolts of Jove should burst the ground,
And opening earth disclose the vast profound,
The solemn secrets of the dark abodes,
Hell's dreadful regions, dreadful ev'n to gods;
Fall on the black abyss the beams would play,
And the pale ghosts start at the flash of day:
As pale (his dungeon storm'd) with wild affright,
Glares the dire fiend, surpris'd in open light.
He roars aloud, while thund'ring from above,
Full on the foe the furious hero drove.
With every vengeful instrument in view,
Whole trunks of trees and broken rocks he threw.
Now round the cavern, in despair of flight,
Th' enormous monster breathes a sudden night;
To blind or blast his mighty foe, expires
Thick clouds of smoke, and all his father's fire.
With that the vengeful god in fury grew,
And headlong through the burning tempest flew.
Fierce on the fiend, through stifling fumes he came,
Through streams of smoke and deluges of flame;
There, while in vain he breath'd the fires around,
His trembling prize the great Alcides found;
Limb lock'd in limb, from earth his feet he reth,
And on the ground his monstrous bulk extends;
Strangled the struggling foe with matchless might,
And from their caverns tore the balls of sight.
Thus the huge fiend, exhausted, breathless, tir'd,
Loud bellowing, in th' Herculean grasp expir'd.
The god then burst the gates; and open lie
The den's vast depths, all naked to the sky.
Th' expanded caves dismiss th' imprison'd prey
From the black darksome dungeon to the day.
Forth by the feet the crowds the monster drew;
On his huge size they feast their eager view;
His shaggy limbs, his dreadful eyes admire,
And gaping throat, that breath'd infernal fire.
" From that blest hour th' Arcadian tribes
bestow'd

These solemn honours on their guardian god
Potitius first, his gratitude to prove,
Ador'd Alcides in the shady grove;
And, with the old Pinarian sacred line,
These altars rais'd, and paid the rites divine,
Rites, which our sons for ever shall maintain,
And ever sacred shall the grove remain;

Come then, with us to great Alcides pray,
And crown your heads, and solemnize the day.
Invoke our common god with hymns divine,
And from the goblet pour the generous wine."
He said, and with the poplar's sacred boughs,
Like great Alcides, binds his hoary brows;
Rais'd the crowa'd goblet high in open view:
With him, the guests the holy rite pursue,
And on the board the rich libation threw.

Now from before the rising shades of night,
Roll'd down the steep of Heav'n, the beamy light
Clad in the fleecy spoils of sheep, proceed
The holy priests; Potitius at their head,
With flaming brands and offerings, march the train,
And bid the hallow'd altars blaze again;
With care the copious viands they dispose;
And for their guests a second banquet rose.
The fires curl high; the Salii dance around
To sacred strains, with shady poplars crown'd.
The quires of old and young, in lofty lays,
Resound great Hercules' immortal praise.
How first, his infant hands the snakes o'erthrew,
That Juno sent; and the dire monsters slew.
What mighty cities next his arms destroy,
Th' Æchalian walls, and stately towers of Troy.
The thousand labours of the hero's hands,
Enjoin'd by proud Eurystheus' stern commands,
And Jove's revengful queen. Thy matchless might

O'ercame the cloud-born Centaurs in the fight;
Hylæus, Pholus sunk beneath thy feet,
And the grim bull, whose rage dispeopled Crete.
Beneath thy arm the Nemean monster fell;
Thy arm with terror fill'd the realms of Hell;
Ev'n Hell's grim porter shook with dire dismay,
Shrunk back, and trembled o'er his mangled prey.
No shapes of danger could thy soul affright;
Nor huge Typhæus, towering to the fight,
Nor Lerna's fiend thy courage could confound,
With all her hundred heads, that hiss'd around.
Hail, mighty chief, advanc'd to Heaven's abodes!
Hail, son of Jove; a god among the gods!
Be present to the vows thy suppliants pay,
And with a smile these grateful rites survey.
Thus they—but Cacus' cavern crowns the strain,
Where the grim monster breath'd his flames in vain.
To the glad song, the vales, the woods rebound,
The lofty hills reply, and echo to the sound.

The sacred rites complete, the numerous train
Back to the city bend their course again.
Trembling with age, slow moves the monarch on,
Between the hero and his blooming son.
They pass with pleasure the remains of day
In various converse, that beguiles the way.
Around th' illustrious stranger darts his sight,
And views each place with wonder and delight:
Curious each ancient monument surveys,
And asks of every work of ancient days,
Half sunk in ruins, and by age o'ercome—
When thus, the founder of majestic Rome:

"Know, mighty prince, these venerable woods,
Of old, were haunted by the silvan gods,
And savage tribes, a rugged race who took
Their birth primal from the stubborn oak.
No laws, no manners form'd the barbarous race:
But wild, the natives rov'd from place to place;
Untaught and rough, improvident of gain,
They heap'd no wealth, nor turn'd the fruitful plain.
Their food, the savage fruits the forests yield,
Or hunted game, the fortune of the field,

Till Saturn fled before victorious Jove,
Driv'n down and banish'd from the realms above.
He by just laws embody'd all the train,
Who roam'd the hills, and drew them to the plain;
There fixt; and Latium call'd the new abode,
Whose friendly shores conceal'd the latent god.
These realms in peace the monarch long controll'd,
And blest the nations with an age of gold.
A second age succeeds, but darker far,
Dimm'd by the lust of gain, and rage of war.
Then the Sicilians and Ausonians came,
And Saturn's realm alternate chang'd her name.
Successive tyrants rul'd the Latian plain;
Then stern, huge Tybris held his cruel reign.
The mighty flood that bathes the fruitful coast,
Receiv'd his name, and Albula was lost.
I came the last, through stormy oceans driv'n
From my own kingdom by the hand of Heav'n.
My mother goddess and Apollo bore
My course at length to this auspicious shore."

This said, the prince the gate and altar shows,
That to his parent, great Carmenta, rose;
Whose voice foretold, the sons of Troy should crown
With everlasting fame the rising town.
Here, Pan, beneath the rocks thy temple stood;
There, the renown'd asylum, in the wood.
Now points the monarch, where by vengeful steel,
His murder'd guest, poor, hapless Argus fell!
Next, to the Capitol their course they hold,
Then roof'd with reeds, but blazing now with gold.
Ev'n then her awful sanctity appear'd;
The swains the local majesty rever'd.
All pale with sacred horror, they survey'd
The solemn mountain and the reverend shade.
"Some god," the monarch said, "some latent god
Dwells in that gloom, and haunts the frowning wood.

Of our Arcadians deem, their wondering eyes
Have seen great Jove, dread sovereign of the skies;
High o'er their heads, the god his ægis held,
And blacken'd Heaven with clouds, and shook
th' immortal shield!

In ruins there, two mighty towns, behold,
Rais'd by our sires! huge monuments of old!
Janus' and Saturn's name they proudly bore,
Their two great founders!—but are now no more!"

Thus they convers'd on works of ancient fame,
Till to the monarch's humble courts they came;
There oxen stalk'd, where palaces are rais'd,
And bellowing herds in the proud Forum graz'd.
"Lo," said the good old king, "this poor abode
Receiv'd great Hercules, the victor god!
Thou too, as nobly, raise thy soul above."
All pomps, and emulate the seed of Jove."
With that the hero's hands the monarch prest,
And to the mansion led his godlike guest.
There on a bear's rough spoils his limbs he laid,
And swelling foliage heap'd the homely bed.

Now awful night her solemn darkness brings,
And stretches o'er the world her dusky wings;
When Venus, (trembling at the dire alarms
Of hostile Latium, and her sons in arms,
In those still moments, thus to Vulcan said,
Reclin'd and leaning on the golden bed;
(Her thrilling words her melting consort move,
And every accent fans the flames of love.)

"When cruel Greece and unrelenting fate
Conspir'd to sink in dust the Trojan state,
As Ilion's doom was seal'd, I ne'er implor'd,
In those long wars, the labours of my lord;

Nor urg'd my dear, dear consort to impart,
 For a lost empire, his immortal art;
 Though Priam's royal offspring claim'd my care,
 Though much I sorrow'd for my godlike heir.
 Now as the chief, by Jove's supreme command,
 Has reach'd at length the destin'd Latian land;
 To thee, my guardian pow'r, for aid I run;
 A goddess begs; a mother for her son.
 Oh! guard the hero from these dire alarms,
 Forge, for the chief, impenetrable arms.
 See, what proud cities every hand employ,
 To arm new hosts against the sons of Troy;
 On me and all my people, from afar
 See what assembled nations pour to war!
 Yet not in vain her sorrows Thetis shed,
 Nor the fair partner of Tithonus' bed,
 When they implor'd my lord of old to grace
 With arms immortal an inferior race.
 Hear then, nor let thy queen in vain implore
 The gift, those goddesses obtain'd before."

This said; her arms, that match the winter snows,
 Around her unresolving lord she throws;
 When lo! more rapid than the lightning flies,
 That gilds with momentary beams the skies,
 The thrilling flames of love, without control,
 Flew through the sooty god, and fir'd his soul.
 With conscious joy her conquest she descri'd;
 When, by her charms subdu'd, her lord reply'd:
 "Why all these reasons urg'd, my mind to move;
 When such your beauties, and so fierce my love!
 Long since, at your request, my ready care,
 In Troy's fam'd fields, had arm'd your son for war.
 Nor did the high decrees of Jove and fate
 Doom to so swift a fall the Dardan state;
 But, ten years more, old Priam might enjoy
 Th' imperial sceptre, and the throne of Troy.
 Yet, if our queen is bent the war to wage,
 Her sacred cause shall all our art engage.
 The noblest arms our potent skill can frame,
 With breathing bellows or the forming flame,
 Or polish'd steel, refulgent to behold,
 Or mingled metals, damask'd o'er with gold,
 Shall grace the chief: thy anxious fears give o'er,
 And doubt thy interest in my love no more."

He spoke; and, fir'd with transport by her
 charms,
 Clasp'd the fair goddess in his eager arms;
 Then pleas'd, and panting on her bosom lay,
 Sunk in repose, and all dissolv'd away!
 But rose refresh'd, impatient from the bed,
 When half the silent hours of night were fled:
 What time the poor laborious frugal dame,
 Who plies the distaff, stirs the dying flame;
 Employs her handmaids by the winking light,
 And lengthens out their task with half the night;
 Thus to her children she divides the bread,
 And guards the honours of her homely bed:
 So to his task, before the dawn, retires
 From soft repose the father of the fires.

Amid th' Hesperian and Sicilian flood
 All black with smoke, a rocky island stood,
 The dark Vulcanian land, the region of the god.
 Here the grim Cyclops ply, in vaults profound,
 The huge Æolian forge, that thunders round.
 Th' eternal anvils ring the dungeon o'er;
 From side to side the fiery caverns roar. [blows;
 Loud groans the mass beneath their ponderous
 Pierce burns the flame, and the full furnace glows.
 To this dark region, from the bright abode,
 With speed impetuous flew the fiery god.

Th' alternate blows the brawny brethren deal;
 Thick burst the sparkles from the tortur'd steel.
 Huge strokes, rough Steropes and Brontes gave,
 And strong Pyracmon shook the gloomy cave.
 Before their sovereign came, the Cyclops strove
 With eager speed, to forge a bolt for Jove,
 Such as by Heaven's almighty lord are hurl'd,
 All charg'd with vengeance on a guilty world.
 Beneath their hands, tremendous to survey!
 Half rough, half form'd, the dreadful engine lay:
 Three points of rain; three forks of hail conspire;
 Three arm'd with wind; and three were barb'd with fire.

The mass they temper'd thick with livid rays,
 Fear, wrath and terror, and the lightning's blaze.
 With equal speed, a second train prepare
 The rapid chariot for the god of war;
 The thund'ring wheels and axles, that excite
 The madding nations to the rage of fight.
 Some, in a fringe, the burnish'd serpents' roll'd
 Round the dread ægis, bright with scales of gold;
 The horrid ægis, great Minerva's shield,
 When, in her wrath, she takes the fatal field,
 All charg'd with curling snakes the boss they rain'd,
 And the grim Gorgon's head tremendous blaz'd.
 In agonizing pains the monster frown'd,
 And roll'd, in death, her fiery eyes around.

"Throw, throw your tasks aside," the sovereign
 "Arms for a godlike hero must be made. [said;
 Fly to the work before the dawn of day; [play!
 Your speed, your strength, and all your skill dis-
 Swift as the word, (his orders to pursue)
 To the black labours of the forge they flew;
 Vast heaps of steel in the deep furnace roll'd,
 And bubbling streams of brass, and floods of melted
 gold.

The brethren first a glorious shield prepare,
 Capacious of the whole Rutulian war,
 Some, orb in orb, the blazing buckler frame;
 Some with huge bellows rouse the roaring flame:
 Some in the stream the hissing metals drown'd;
 From vault to vault the thund'ring strokes rebound,
 And the deep caves rebellion to the sound.
 Exact in time, each ponderous hammer plays;
 In time their arms the giant brethren raise,
 And turn the glowing mass a thousand ways.

These cares employ the father of the fires:
 Meantime Evander from his coach retires,
 Call'd by the purple beams of morn away,
 And tuneful birds, that hail'd the dawning day.
 First the warm tunic round his limbs he threw;
 Next on his feet the shining sandals drew.
 Around his shoulders flow'd the panther's hide,
 And the bright sword hung glittering by his side.
 Two mighty dogs, domestic at his board,
 (A faithful guard) attend their aged lord.
 The promis'd aid revolving in his breast,
 The careful monarch sought his godlike guest,
 Who with Achates rose at dawn of day,
 And join'd the king and Pallas on the way. [took Their friendly hands exchang'd, their seats they Amid the hall; and first Evander spoke;

"Great prince, the guardian of the Trojan state!
 Who, safe in thee, defies the frowns of fate;
 Small is our force, and slender our relief;
 Far, far unworthy such a glorious chief.
 For here, old Tyber bounds our lands; and there
 The stern Rutulians gird our walls with war;
 Yet to our court kind fortune led thy way;
 And mighty aids the willing fates display;

by the whole nations, in thy cause ally'd,
 Whole hosts in arms shall gather to thy side.
 Or near these walls, amid the Tuscan lands,
 seated on rocks, proud Agyllina stands.
 Aid'd by the Lydian train, sublime in air, martial race, and terrible in war,
 or ages flourish'd this distinguish'd town;
 'Twas her wealth, and glorious her renown;
 ill stern Mezentius made her sons obey his lawless arms, and arbitrary sway.
 'That tongue can such barbarities record,
 'r count the slaughters of his ruthless sword?
 'ive him, ye gods! if justice you regard,
 'ive him, and all his race, the due reward!
 'Twas not enough, the good, the guiltless bled;
 till worse; he bound the living to the dead.
 'ese, limb to limb, and face to face he join'd,
 Oh! monstrous crime of unexampled kind!)
 'll chok'd with stench the ling'ring wretches lay,
 and in the loath'd embraces dy'd away.
 't length, their patience tir'd, his subjects rose,
 kesage the tyrant, and his walls enclose,
 'bdue his guards, destroy his friends, and aim
 'ull at the regal towers the vengeful flame;
 'While for defence to Turnus he withdrew,
 'nd safe, through all the cloud of slaughter, flew.
 'ut arm'd by just revenge, the Tuscan band
 'o death the royal fugitive demand.
 't once Etruria fires her martial train,
 'nd all her sons embattled spread the plain,
 'y me dispos'd, shall march these mighty hosts
 'eneath thy conduct, from their native coasts,
 'or now, ev'n now their fleets have reach'd the land,
 'nd the tall ships are rang'd along the strand;
 'hey wait the signal, for the fight prepare;
 'ut thus a sage retards the moving war:
 'Ye chosen martial train, the glorious grace
 'nd flower of all our old Mæonian race,
 'though, by just rage inspir'd, your throats are led
 'o pour full vengeance on your tyrants' head,
 'No Latian chief these armies must command;
 'Choose some brave general from a foreign land."
 "With that their forces stopp'd in these abodes,
 'truck with this awful warning of the gods.
 'o me, their chief bold Tarchon sent, before,
 'he crown, and every type of regal pow'r;
 'If they request to lead their armies on,
 'except the sway, and fill the vacant throne.
 'ut for these silver hairs 'tis far too late
 'o mix in battles, or the cares of state;
 'ain were the thoughts, so great a war to wage;
 'oo rough the task for unperforming age;
 'y son had led them, but his race withstood:
 'om had a native by the mother's blood.
 'ut thou, great prince, whose years and godlike line
 'and well approv'd by every pow'r divine,
 'o thou; the high imperial task sustain;
 'o; to sure conquest lead the vengeful train:
 'nd let my Pallas by thy side engage,
 'allas, the joy of my declining age.
 'eneath so great a master's forming care,
 'et the dear youth learn every work of war;
 'n every field thy matchless toils admire,
 'nd emulate thy deeds, and catch the glorious fire!
 'eneath his standard rang'd, a chosen force
 'end, two hundred brave Arcadian horse;
 'nd, to support the gathering war, my son
 'hall lead an equal squadron of his own."
 He said; the prince and friend, in cares profound,
 long fixt their eyes with anguish on the ground,

Sad, and dejected at the short supply;
 Till Venus gave a signal from the sky;
 Swift from the opening Heavens, with awful sound,
 A sudden splendour broke, and blaz'd around.
 A rolling general din they heard from far;
 And the loud Tyrrhene trumpets rend the air.
 While thus, amaz'd, they gaze with wondering
 Peal after peal runs rattling round the skies. [eyes,
 At last bright clashing arms the train behold,
 That flush the skies, and fringe the clouds with gold.
 But soon Æneas knew the loud alarms,
 The promis'd present of immortal arms.
 "To me alone, my royal friend," he cries,
 "This sign belongs, an omen from the skies.
 My mother promis'd these portents in air,
 On the first opening of the wasteful war;
 To me she brings, through yon ethereal road,
 Those glorious arms, the labour of a god!
 Oh! what a gathering storm of slaughter spreads
 On yonder hosts, and blackens o'er their heads!
 How shalt thou, Turnus, my full rage deplore!
 How shalt thy waves, old Tyber, smoke with gore,
 When all thy streams, encumber'd with the slain,
 Roll shields, and helms, and heroes to the main!
 Now let the perjurd train their arms prepare;
 Since 'tis their wish, I'll give a loose to war!"

He said; and from the sylvan throne retires;
 Then on Alcides' altar wakes the fires.
 Glad he returns, the offering to renew,
 And to the household gods the victims slew.
 To the same rites return, with equal joy,
 The hoary monarch and the youths of Troy.
 Then to the ships he bends his course again,
 There culls the flower of all the warrior train,
 To wait him to the field; the rest he sends
 With the glad tidings to his son and friends.
 Smooth o'er the waves the painted vessels glide,
 And with the stream move gently down the tide.
 Steeds are prepar'd to mount the Trojan train,
 And speed their progress to the Tuscan plain.
 But to their prince a courier was assign'd,
 Of matchless spirit and superior kind.
 The bounding steed a lion's spoils enfold,
 With paws dependent, sheath'd in shining gold.

Straight through the city flies the loud report
 Of troops advancing to the Tuscan court.
 The shrieking matrons weary Heav'n with pray'r;
 Near and more near they view, in wild despair,
 The horrid image of gigantic war.
 The good old monarch then embrac'd his son,
 And with a flood of tender tears begun:

"Oh! would almighty Jove once more renew
 That vigorous strength of youth, which once I knew;

When, by this hand, beneath her rocky wall,
 Præneste saw her vanquish'd armies fall;
 When, victor of the field, and crown'd with fame,
 With piles of hostile shields, I led the flame,
 And sent great Herilus, of matchless might,
 Their martial monarch, to the shades of night;
 On whom, descended from celestial blood,
 Three lives his goddess mother¹ had bestow'd.
 Wond'rous to tell! the warrior thrice was slain,
 As oft reviv'd, and arm'd, and fought again.
 Thrice, though renew'd for fight, the monarch bled,
 And thrice, of all his arms I stripp'd the dead.
 Such were I now—not all these dire alarms,
 Dangers, or deaths, should tear me from thy arms;

¹ Feronia,

Nor had Mezentius thus his slaughters spread,
 Thus heap'd with wrongs thy father's aged head ;
 Nor thus unpunish'd stretch'd his rage abhorr'd
 O'er towns, dispeopled by his wasteful sword.
 But hear, ye gods ! and Heaven's great ruler, hear,
 With due regard, a king's and father's pray'r !
 My dear, dear Pallas, if the fates ordain
 Safe to return, and bless these eyes again :
 With age, pain, sickness, this one blessing give ;
 On this condition I'll endure to live.
 But oh ! if fortune has decreed his doom,
 Now, now, by death, prevent my woes to come ;
 Now, while my hopes and fears uncertain flow ;
 Now, ere she lifts her hand to strike the blow ;
 While in these feeble arms I strain the boy,
 My sole delight, my last surviving joy !
 Ere the sad news of his untimely doom
 Must bow his hoary head with sorrow to the tomb !"
 With these last words he swoon'd, and sunk away ;
 His servants to the couch their breathless lord convey.

Now through the opening gates the warriors ride,
 Æneas first, Achates by his side.
 The Trojan chiefs succeed : amid the train
 Young Pallas towers, conspicuous o'er the plain.
 All bright his military purple flow'd ;
 His polish'd arms with golden splendours glow'd.
 So, bath'd in ocean, with a vivid ray
 Flames the refulgent star that leads the day :
 Wide through the sky, before the sacred light
 Break, and disperse the scattering shades of night.
 High on the battlements the mothers stand,
 And, from the towers, survey the martial band.
 Through the thick woods, embody'd in array,
 The glittering squadrons take the nearest way.
 Loud shouts arise ; the thundering coursers bound
 Through clouds of dust, and paw the trembling
 A mighty grove, rever'd for ages stood [ground.
 Where Cære views with pride her rolling food :
 Hills clad with fir, to guard the hallow'd bound,
 Rose in the majesty of darkness round.
 In times of old, the pious Argive train,
 The first possessors of the Latian plain,
 To the great guardian ³ of the fields, had made
 For ever sacred the devoted shade,
 And, on his solemn day, their annual offerings paid.
 Not far from hence the Tuscan host dispread
 Their mighty camp, with Tarchon at their head.
 From the tall towering point in full survey,
 Stretch'd o'er the vale, th' embattled army lay.
 Hither Æneas, with his band, succeeds ;
 The train, refresh'd, release the panting steeds.
 Meantime his beauteous mother, from on high,
 Had brought the blazing present down the sky.
 By the cool stream the hero she survey'd
 Within the winding vale, and thus she said :
 " Behold the promis'd arms ; in every part
 By Vulcan labour'd with immortal art.
 Now dare thy foes, collected in thy might,
 Now call the haughty Turnus to the fight."
 Then the fair queen her joyful son embrac'd,
 And by an oak the radiant burthen plac'd.
 The wondering chief with sudden rapture glow'd,
 Struck with the glorious labours of the god.
 Astonish'd at the blazing arms he stands,
 And, one by one, he pois'd 'em in his hands.
 The sword, with death all pointed, he admires,
 And the proud helm, that shoots a length of fires.

³ Sylvanus.

The mighty corselet cast a vivid ray ;
 With scales of brass and sanguine colours gay ;
 And, like a flaming cloud, refulgent shone,
 Pierc'd with the glancing glories of the Sun.
 The polish'd greaves his manly thighs enfold,
 With mingled metals wrought and ductile gold.
 With joy the weighty spear the prince beheld ;
 But most admir'd the huge mysterious shield ;
 For there had Vulcan, skill'd in times to come,
 Display'd the triumphs of immortal Rome ;
 There all the Julian line the god had wrought,
 And charg'd the gold with battles yet unfought.
 Here in a verdant cave's embow'ring shade,
 The fostering wolf and martial twins ⁴ were laid ;
 Th' indulgent mother, half reclin'd along,
 While at her dugs the sportive infants hung,
 Look'd fondly back, and form'd 'em with her tongue. [dames,

Next Rome appear'd ; here shriek the Sabine
 Surpris'd, and ravish'd at her solemn games.
 In arms the Cures with their king appear,
 And wage with infant Rome a sudden war.
 At length agreed, from fight the monarchs cease,
 And, at the shrine of Jove, conclude the peace.
 Each king beside the bleeding victim stands,
 With lifted eyes, a goblet in his hands.
 Here the mad couriers sew the forest o'er,
 And, limb from limb, the perjurd Metius tore.
 As vengeful Tullus drags him through the wood,
 The sculptur'd trees are all bedropp'd with blood.
 Here proud Porcenna, with his martial train,
 Bids Rome receive her banish'd king again.
 Her noble sons, surrounded with alarms,
 Fly, in the cause of liberty, to arms.
 While glorious Cocles all his host withstood,
 And Cloelia broke her chains, and swam the flood.
 With furious looks, tremendous to behold,
 The raging monarch frown'd, and storm'd in gold.
 There, for the Capitol, brave Manlius strove,
 Fought like a god, and look'd a second Jove.
 There stood thy palace, Romulus, (decreed
 The seat of empire) roof'd with homely reed.
 Here fled the silver goose through courts of gold,
 And, cackling loud, th' approaching Gauls forebode.
 Through the thick forest move the hostile pow'rs,
 And, favour'd by the night, invade the tow'ns.
 Fair golden tresses grace the comely train,
 And every warrior wears a golden chain.
 Embroider'd vests their snowy limbs enfold ;
 And their rich robes are all adorn'd with gold.
 Two Alpine spears with martial pride they wield,
 And guard their bodies with an ample shield.
 The Salii next in solemn garbs advance ;
 And naked here the mad Luperci dance.
 The pledge of future empire from the sky,
 The sacred targe strikes dazzling on the eye.
 In stately cars the pious matrons rode,
 Who sav'd their country, and appeas'd the god.
 Far hence remov'd, appear the realms below,
 The horrid mansions of eternal woe ;
 Where howl the damn'd ; where Catiline in chains
 Roars from the dark abyss, in endless pains ;
 Sees the grim furies all around him spread,
 And the black rock still trembling o'er his head.
 But in a separate space the just remain ;
 And awful Cato rules the godlike train.
 Full in the midst, majestically toll'd
 The solemn ocean, wrought in figur'd gold :

⁴ Romulus and Remus.

But heavy waves curl high on every side,
And silver dolphins cut the sable tide.
Amid the flood, two navies rose to sight,
With beaks of brass; th' immortal Actian fight!
All charg'd with war the boiling billows roll'd,
And the vast ocean flam'd with arms of gold.
Here leads divine Augustus, through the floods,
The sons of Rome, her fathers and her gods:
From his high stern the martial scene surveys,
While streaming splendours round his temples blaze;

His sparkling eyes a keener glory shed,
Than his great father's star, that glitters o'er his head.

Next, with kind gales, the care of every god,
Agrippa leads his squadron through the flood.
A naval crown adorns the warrior's brows,
And fierce he pours amid th' embattled foes.

There brings proud Antony his various bands,
From distant nations, and from barbarous lands.
Dispeopled Egypt fills the watery plain,
And the whole Eastern world o'erspreads the main.
But O!—the curse of Rome, the shame of war,
His Pharisan consort¹ follows in the rear!

Rush the fierce fleets to fight! beneath their oars
And clashing beaks, the foaming ocean roars!
All big with war the floating castles ride,
In bulk enormous, o'er the yielding tide;
The frothy surge like moving mountains sweep,
Or isles uprooted, rolling round the deep.
Spears, darts, and flames, fly furious o'er the main;
The fields of Neptune take a crimson stain.

The beauteous queen, amidst the dire alarms,
With her loud timbrels calls her host to arms,
Flies to the fight, nor sees the snakes, that wait
And hiss behind, dread ministers of fate!

Against great Neptune, in his strength array'd,
And beauteous Venus, and the blue-ey'd maid,
Engage the dog Anubis, on the floods,
And the lewd herd of Egypt's monster gods.
In polish'd steel, conspicuous from afar,
Amid the tumult storms the god of war.

Her robes all rent, with many an ample stride,
Grim Discord stalk'd, triumphant, o'er the tide.
Next, with her bloody scourge, Bellona flies,
And leads, in fatal pomp, the furies of the skies.

Meantime, enthron'd on Actium's towering height,
The god of day surveys the raging fight,
And bends his twanging bow. With sudden dread,
At the dire signal, all Arabia fled:

At once retire, in wild confusion hurl'd,
Egypt, and all th' assembled Eastern world.
Amid the slaughters of the fight was seen,
Pale with the fears of death, the Pharisan queen;
Aghast, she calls the kind propitious gales
To speed her flight; and spreads her silken sails.

The god display'd her figure, full in view,
As o'er the floods with western winds she flew.
While sunk in grief, the mighty Nile bemoans
The shame and slaughter of his vanquish'd sons.
He saw the rout; his mantle he unroll'd,
Spread forth his robes, and open'd every fold,
Expanded wide his arms, with timely care,
And in his kind embrace receiv'd the flying war.

Now moves great Cæsar, (all his foes o'ercome)
With three proud triumphs, thro' imperial Rome;
And pays immortal honours to the skies:
Behold at once three hundred temples rise!

¹ Cleopatra.

The streets resound with shouts and solemn games;
And to the temples through the Roman dames
With ardent pray'rs: high altars rise around;
And with the blood of victims smokes the ground.
He sits enthron'd in Phœbus' Parian fane;
In ranks before him pass the vanquish'd train,
While he accepts the gifts that crown his toil,
And hangs on high the consecrated spoils.
Before the victor move the mighty throngs,
With different habits and discordant tongues.
Here pass, distinguish'd by the god of fire,
The sons of Afric, in their loose attire;
The Carians march; the bold Numidians ride;
The Gelons shine with quivers at their side.
Here crowd the Dæi; and the nations, there,
From Earth's last ends assembled to the war.
Here, with diminish'd pride, Euphrates mourns;
There the maim'd Rhine bemoans his broken horns:
And fierce Araxes, bridg'd of old in vain,
Now bends, submissive, to the Roman chain.

Such was the glorious gift in every part
By Vulcan finish'd with immortal art:
(The forms unknown, that grac'd its ample field)
The prince with joy surveys the story'd shield;
Aloft he bears the triumph yet to come,
The fortunes of his race, the fates of mighty Rome.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK IX.

ARGUMENT.

TURNUS takes advantage of Æneas's absence, attempts to fire his ships, (which are transformed into sea-nymphs) and assaults his camp. The Trojans, reduced to the last extremities, send Nisus and Euryalus to recall Æneas, which furnishes the poet with that admirable episode of their friendship, generosity, and conclusion of their adventures. In the morning, Turnus pushes the siege with vigour; and, hearing that the Trojans had opened a gate, he runs thither, and breaks into the town with the enemies he pursues. The gates are immediately closed upon him; and he fights his way through the town to the river Tyber. He is forced at last to leap, armed as he is, into the river, and swims to his camp.

TURNUS while the prince collects auxiliar hosts, and leads new armies from the Tuscan coasts; Dispatch'd by Heav'n's great empress from the goddess of the bow to Turnus flies; [skies, Where, cover'd with the shade, he made abode In his old grandaïre's consecrated wood; There, as at ease reclin'd the godlike man, Her rosy lips she open'd, and began:
" Turnus, this kind auspicious hour bestows
What scarce a god could promise to thy vows:
For lo! the Trojan chief has parted hence,
And for new succours courts th' Arcadian prince.
Thence to the Tuscan coasts his course he bends,
And leaves expos'd his walls, his fleets, and friends.

Now, while the Lydians in his cause unite,
And the raw peasants gather to the fight,
Call, call the fiery coursers, and the car;
Fly—storm his camp—and give a loose to war.”
This said, with level'd wings she mounts on high,
And cuts a glorious rainbow in the sky.

He knew the fair; his lifted hands he spread,
And with these words pursu'd her as she fled:
“Bright beauteous goddess of the various bow,
What pow'r dispatch'd thee to the world below?
What splendours open to my dazzled eyes!
What floods of glory burst from all the skies!
And lo! the Heav'n's divine, the planets roll!
Thick shine the stars, and gild the glowing pole!
Call'd by these omens to the field of blood,
I follow to the war the great inspiring god!”

Raptur'd he said, and sought the limpid tide,
Where gurgling streams in silver currents glide;
There cleans'd his hands, then raising high in air,
To ev'ry god address his ardent prayer.

And now, all gay and glorious to behold,
Rich in embroider'd vests, and arms of gold,
On sprightly prancing steeds, the martial train
Spread wide their ranks o'er all th' embattled plain.

The van with great Messapus at their head;
The deep'ning rear the sons of Tyrrheus led.
Brave Turnus flames in arms, supremely tall,
Tow'rs in the centre, and outshines them all.
Silent they march beneath their godlike guide:
So mighty Ganges leads, with awful pride,
In sev'n large streams, his swelling solemn tide:
So Nile, compos'd within his banks again,
Moves in slow pomp, majestic, to the main.

Troy saw from far the black'ning cloud arise:
Then from the rampart's height Caius cries:
“See, see, my friends, yon dusky martial train,
Involv'd in clouds, and sweeping o'er the plain!
To arms—the foes advance—your swords prepare!
Fly!—meant the ramparts, and repel the war!”

With shouts they run; they gather at the call;
They close the gates; they mount; they guard the wall.

For so th' experienc'd prince had charg'd the host,
When late he parted for the Tuscan coast;
Whate'er befel, their ardour to restrain,
Trust to their walls, nor tempt the open plain.
There, though with shame and wrath their bosoms glow,

Shut in their tow'rs, they wait th' embattled foe.
But mighty Turnus rode with rapid speed,
And furious spurr'd his dappled Thracian steed;
Eager before the tardy squadrons flew
To reach the wall; and soon appear'd in view
(With twice ten noble warriors close behind);
His crimson crest stream'd dreadful in the wind,
“Who first,” he cry'd, “with me the foe will dare?”

Then hurl'd a dart, the signal of the war.
Loud shout his train; deep wonder seiz'd them all,
To see the Trojans skulk behind their wall;
Safe in their tow'rs their forces they bestow,
Nor take the field, nor meet th' approaching foe.

Now furious Turnus, thund'ring round the plain,
Tries every post and pass, but tries in vain
As, beat by tempests, and by famine bold,
The prowling wolf attempts the nightly fold;
Lodg'd in the guarded field beneath their dams,
Safe from the savage, bleat the tender lambs;
The monster meditates the fleecy brood;
New howls with hunger, and now thirsts for blood;

Roams round the fences that the prize contain,
And madly rages at the flock in vain:
Thus, as th' embattled tow'rs the chief descry,
Rage fires his soul, and flashes from his eyes:
Nor entrance can he find, nor force the train
From the close trench, to combat on the plain.
But to their fleet he bends his furious way,
That, cover'd by the floods and ramparts, lay
Beside the camp—He calls for burning brands,
And rais'd a pine all-flaming in his hands.
His great example the bold troop inspires;
They rob the hearths; they hurl the missive fires:
The black'ning smokes in curling volumes rise,
With hov'ring clouds of cinders, to the skies.

“O say, ye Muses, what celestial pow'r
Preserv'd the navy in that dreadful hour,
And stopp'd the progress of the furious flame?
The tale is old, yet of immortal fame!

The Trojan chief, prepar'd to stem the tide,
Had built his fleet beneath the hills of Ide;
When thus to Jove, in Heav'n's supreme abodes,
Spoke the majestic mother of the gods:
“Fear, and our first request, my son, accord,
The first, since Heav'n has own'd you for her lord.

To our great name, and honour'd by our love,
On lofty Ida tow'rs a stately grove:
Tall firs and maples there for years have stood,
And waving pines, a venerable wood!
To build his navy, I bestow'd with joy
The hallow'd forest on the chief of Troy.
Now anxious fears disturb my soul with care:
But thou, my son, indulge a mother's pray'r:
Bid seas and tempests spare the ships divine;
Be this their safety, that they once were mine.”

Thus she—and thus replies her son, who rolls
The golden planets round the spangled poles:
“What would our mother's rash request intend?
To turn the fates from their determin'd end?
How! an immortal state would you demand
For vessels labour'd by a mortal hand?
And shall the chief in certain safety ride,
O'er rocks, o'er gulfs, and o'er th' uncertain tide?

A pow'r so high we never yet bestow'd;
No—'tis a pow'r too boundless for a god!
But this we grant—when, all his labours o'er,
The Trojan prince shall reach the Latian shore,
Whatever ships the friendly strand shall gain,
Sav'd from the storms, and the devouring main,
Know, we will take the mortal form from these;
Each ship shall launch, a goddess of the seas;
And with her sister Nereids shall divide
The silver waves, and bound long the tide.”
This said, the lord of thunder seal'd the vow
By his dread brother's awful streams below;
By the black whirlpools of the Stygian flood;
Then gave the sanction of th' imperial nod;
The Heav'n's all shook, and fled before the god.

Now was the hour arriv'd, th' appointed date,
Fixt by the high eternal laws of fate;
When the great mother of the thund'r'er came
To guard her sacred vessels from the flame.

First from the glowing orient they descry
A blazing cloud, that stretch'd from sky to sky;
The golden splendours doubly gild the day,
And high in air the tinkling cymbals play.
At length, with wonder, and religious fear,
A deep majestic voice the list'ning nations hear:
“Forbear, forbear, ye sons of Troy, nor lend
Your needless aid, our vessels to defend.

The proud Rutulian shall, with greater ease,
Bury to their beds profound the wat'ry seas:
Lanch you, my ships; be Nereids of the floods;
So will the mighty mother of the gods!"

Swift at the word, the sacred ships obey,
From their loose anchors break, and bound away;
Like sportive dolphins plunge beneath the main,
Then (wond'rous!) rise in female forms again.
So many nymphs lanch swiftly from the shore,
As rode tall gallees in the port before.
The fierce Rutulians shook with wild affright,
Ev'n brave Messapus trembled at the sight,
Nor could he rule his steeds, nor check their rapid flight.

Old murm'ring Tyber shrunk with sudden dread,
And to his source the hoary father fled.
All, but the valiant Daunian hero, shook,
Who rais'd their drooping souls, while thus he spoke:

"These omens threat our foes: (O glorious day!)
Lo! Jove has snatch'd their last relief away!
Lo! from our dreaded arms their ships retire,
And vanish swift before our vengeful fire:
Lo Troy, imprison'd in yon narrow coast,
The wat'ry half of all the globe is lost,
Their flight, the seas and hostile armies bar;
The land is ours; and Italy from far
Pours forth her sons, by nations, to the war.
Her favouring oracles let Ilium boast:

"In Turnus all those empty vaunts are lost.
To 'scape the seas, and reach the Latian land,
Was all, their fates or Venus could demand.
My fates now take their turn; and 'tis in mine,
For my lost spouse, to crush the perj'rd line.
Like brave Atrides, I'll redeem the dame,
Be same my cause, and my revenge the same.
Will Troy then venture on a rape once more,
Who paid so dearly for the crime before?
Sure they have long ago the thought declin'd,
Or sworn the sex, and curst the costly kind!
Bools! will they trust yon feeble wall and gate,
That slight partition betwixt them and fate,
Who not long since beheld their Troy renown'd,
Their god-built Troy, lie smoking on the ground!
Ly then, my friends, and let us force the foe;
Seize, storm the camp, and lay their ramparts low.
For want we, o'er these dastards to prevail,
Arms forg'd by Vulcan, and a thousand sail;
Hough to support their desp'rate cause should join
Æneas's sons with all the Tuscan line:
Or need the wretches fear, with vain affright,
Be sacred thefts or murders of the night.
Robb'd palladium, and an ambush'd force,
Odg'd in the caverns of a monstrous horse,
Conquest in the dark my soul disclaims;
O—let us gird by day their walls with flames.
Yon shall they find no Argive host appear,
Whom Hector baffled ten revolving years.
Now go, my valiant friends, and pass away
Due repast the small remains of day:
At rise, rise early with the dawning light,
Tear from repose, and vig'rous for the fight."
Meantime it falls to great Messapus' care,
To ramparts to surround with fire and war.
Twice sev'n Rutulian leaders head the bands;
A hundred spears each valiant chief commands:
Roudly they march, in gold and purple gay,
Ad crimson crests on every helmet play. [supine
They watch, they rest, by turns; and, stretch'd
On the green carpet, quaff the gen'rous wine.

The fires gleam round, and shoot a ruddy light;
In plays and pleasures, pass the jovial night.

This scene the Trojans from their trenches view;
All seize their arms, and to their ramparts flew;
In wild affright to guard the gates they pour,
Join bridge to bridge with speed, and tow'r to tow'r.
Thus while th' endanger'd bulwarks they maintain,
Mnestheus and brave Serestus fire the train.
(The prince had left to their experienc'd care,
If aught befel, the conduct of the war.)
Now all the soldiers to their posts were flown,
And in their turns, successive, guard the town.

The valiant Nisus took his lot, to wait
Before the portal, and defend the gate.
From Ida's native woods the warrior came,
Skill'd with the dart to pierce the flying game:
With him Euryalus, who match'd in arms
Troy's bravest youths, and far excell'd in charms;
So young, the springing down but just began
To shade his blooming cheeks, and promise man.
These boys in sacred friendship were ally'd,
And join'd in martial labours, side by side;
In ev'ry danger, ev'ry glory, shar'd;
And both alike were planted on the guard.

"Has Heav'n," cry'd Nisus first, "this warmth
bestow'd?"

Heav'n! or a thought that prompts me like a god?
This glorious warmth, my friend, that breaks my rest?

Some high exploit lies throbbing at my breast:
My glowing mind what gen'rous ardours raise,
And set my mounting spirits on a blaze!
See the loose discipline of yonder train;
The lights, grown thin, scarce glimmer from the plain;

The guards in slumber and debauch are drown'd;
And mark!—a gen'ral silence reigns around:
Then take my thought; the people, fathers, all,
Join in one wish, our leader to recall.
Now, would they give to thee the prize I claim,
(For I could rest contented with the same—)
An easy road, methinks, I can survey
Beneath yon summit to direct my way."

The brave Euryalus, with martial pride,
Fir'd with the charms of glory, thus reply'd:

"And will my Nisus then his friend disclaim?
Deny'd his share of danger and of fame?

And can thy dear Euryalus expose
Thy life, alone, unguarded to the foes?
Not so my father taught his gen'rous boy,
Born, train'd, and season'd, in the wars of Troy.
And, where the great Æneas led the way,
I brav'd all dangers of the land and sea.
Thou too canst witness that my worth is try'd;
We march'd, we fought, we conquer'd side by side.
Like thine, this bosom glows with martial flame;
Burns with a scorn of life, and love of fame;
And thinks, if endless glory can be sought
On such low terms, the prize is cheaply bought.
Let no such jealous fears alarm thy breast:
Thy worth and valour stand to all confess.
But let the danger fall," he cries, "on me:
For this exploit, I durst not think on thee!
No:—as I hope the blest ethereal train
May bring me glorious to thy arms again!
But should the gods deny me to succeed,
Should I—(which Heav'n avert)—but should I bleed;

Live thou;—in death some pleasure that will give!
Live for thy Nisus' sake; I charge thee, live.

Thy blooming youth a longer term demands;—
Live, to redeem my corse from hostile hands;
And decent to the silent grave commend
The poor remains of him who was thy friend:
Or raise at least, by kind remembrance led,
A vacant tomb in honour of the dead.

Why should I cause thy mother's soul to know
Such heart-felt pangs? Unutterable woe!
Thy dear fond mother, who, for love of thee,
Dar'd every danger of the land and sea!
She left Accates' walls, and she alone,
To follow thee, her only, darling son!"

"In vain," he cry'd, "my courage you restrain;
My soul's on fire, and you but plead in vain.
Haste—let us go!" he said, and rais'd the guard;
By turns their vacant posts the centries shar'd.
With eager speed the gen'rous warriors went,
Inflam'd with glory, to the royal tent.

In silence hush'd the whole creation lay,
And lay in sleep the labours of the day,
Not so the chiefs of Ilium, who debate
In solemn council on th' endanger'd state;
Propp'd on their spears, their bucklers in their
Amid the camp the hoary fathers stand, [hand,
And vote an instant message may be sent
To their great chief, their ruin to prevent.
The friends now beg admission of the court,
The business arduous, and of high import—
The prince commands them to inform the train;
And first bade Nisus speak, who thus began:

"Attend, nor judge, ye venerable peers!
Our bold adventure by our tender years.
As yonder bands in sleep and wine are drown'd,
We, by kind chance, a secret path have found,
Close by the gate, that near the ocean lies;
The fires are thinn'd, and clouds of smoke arise.
If you permit, since fair occasion calls,
Safe can we pierce to great Evander's walls.
Soon shall our mighty chief appear again,
Adorn'd with spoils, and striding o'er the slain,
Lord of the field; nor can we miss the road,
But know the various windings of the flood;
For, as we hunt, we see the turrets rise,
Peep o'er the vales, and dance before our eyes."

Then thus Aletes, an illustrious sage,
Repow'd for wisdom, and rever'd for age:
"E'en yet, ye guardian gods, your pow'rs divine
Will spare the relics of the Trojan line,
Since you the bosoms of our youths inspire
With such high courage, such determin'd fire."
Then in his arms the boys by turns he took
With tears of joy; and, panting, thus bespoke:
"Oh! what rewards, brave youths, can be decreed,
What honours, equal to so great a deed?
Th' best and fairest, all th' applauding sky,
And your own conscious virtue, shall supply;
The next, our great Æneas will bestow,
And young Ascanius' ripe years shall owe,
Whatever boon such merit can receive,
The friend, the monarch, and the man, will give."

"And I, brave Nisus!" cries the royal boy,
"Swear by the sacred guardian pow'rs of Troy,
My hopes, my fortunes, are repos'd in you;
Go then, your gen'rous enterprises pursue.
Oh! to these longing eyes my sire restore;
From that blest hour my sorrows are no more.
Two silver bowls, whose ample margins shine,
All rais'd with costly sculpture, shall be thine;
The same my conquering father brought away,
When low in dust the fair Arista lay:

Two glittering tripods, beauteous to behold,
And two large talents of the purest gold:
With these a goblet, which the queen of Tyre
Bestow'd in Carthage on my royal sire,
And, when these vanquish'd kingdoms are our own;
When my great father mounts the Latian throne;
When our victorious hosts by lot shall share
The rich rewards, and glorious spoils, of war;
What late thou saw'st when Turnus took the field,
His prancing coursor, helm, and golden shield;
That coursor, shield, and helm, of skill divine,
Exempt from lot, brave Nisus, shall be thine.
My sire will give twelve captives with their arms;
Yet more—twelve females of distinguish'd charms;
And, to complete the whole, the wide domain
Of the great Latian lord, a boundless plain.
But thee, dear youth, not yet to manhood grown,
Whose years but just advance before my own,
No fortune henceforth from my soul shall part,
Still at my side, and ever at my heart,
My dangers, glories, counsels, thoughts to share!
My friend in peace, my brother in the war!"

"All, all my life," replies the youth, "shall
Like this one hour, at everlasting fame. [am,
Though fortune only our attempt can bless,
Yet still my courage shall deserve success.
But one reward I ask, before I go,
The greatest I can ask, or you bestow.
My mother, tender, pious, fond, and good,
Sprung, like thy own, from Priam's royal blood;
Such was her love, she left her native Troy,
And fair Trinacria, for her darling boy;
And such is mine, that I must keep unknown
From her, the danger of so dear a son:
To spare her anguish, lo! I quit the place
Without one parting kiss, one last embrace!
By night, and that respected hand, I swear,
Her melting tears are more than I can bear!
For her, good prince, your pity I implore;
Support her, childless; and relieve her, poor;
Oh! let her, let her find, (when I am gone),
In you, a friend, a guardian, and a son!
With that dear hope, embolden'd shall I go,
Brave ev'ry danger, and defy the foe."

Charm'd with his virtue, all the Trojan peers
But, more than all, Ascanius melts in tears,
To see the sorrows of a duteous son,
And filial love, a love so like his own.
"I promise all, heroic youth!" he said,
"That to such matchless valour can be paid;
To me, thy mother still shall be the same
Creusa was, and only want the name.
Let fortune good or ill success decree;
'Tis merit, sure, to bear a son like thee!
Now by my head, my father's oath, I vow,
Whatever rewards I purpose to bestow,
When safe return'd, on thee, the same shall greet
Thy mother, and thy whole surviving race."

So spoke the prince; and, weeping at the word,
Gave to the pious youth his costly sword:
The sword with wood'rous art Lycaon made;
An ivory scabbard sheath'd the shining blade.
To Nisus, Mnesteus gave a lion's hide;
And a new helm Aletes' care supply'd.
Thus arm'd, they quit the tent; th' assembly wait,
With high applause, their progress to the gates.
Mature in wisdom, far above his years,
The fair Iulus in the train appears,
And sends his father many an ardent pray'r;
All lost in wind, and scatter'd wide in air!

Now, favour'd by the shade, the warriors go,
 Pass the deep trenches, and invade the foe.
 But, ere their dang'rous enterprise is o'er,
 With what large laughter shall they bathe the shore!

All drench'd in wine and sleep, lie stretch'd around,
 The careless soldiers on the verdant ground,
 Amid a pile of traces, wheels, and reins,
 And empty cars, encumb'ring all the plains.
 Here lie the scatter'd arms; the goblets there;
 A mad confusion of debauch and war. [call;

"Now, now," cries Nisus first, "thy courage
 The place, the hour, my friend, demands it all.
 Here lies our road: while I the passage find,
 Stay thou, and cautious watch the foe behind.
 From side to side, whole squadrons will I slay,
 Thro' death and horrors op'ning wide thy way."

With that, the youth in silence drew his sword,
 And stabb'd proud Rhamnes, a distinguish'd lord;
 In ev'ry deep prophetic art approv'd,
 A king and augur, and by Turnus lov'd.
 On the rich couch in slumbers deep he lay,
 And, labouring, slept the full debauch away.
 The fate of others he had still foreshown,
 But fail'd, unhappy! to prevent his own.

Then on the 'squire of Remus fierce he flew,
 And, as they slept, his three attendants slew.
 The driver next; and cut his neck in twain,
 As, midst the steeds, he slumber'd on the plain;
 Last on their lord employ'd the deadly steel;
 Swift flew the head; and mutter'd as it fell.
 The purple blood distains the couch around;
 The walt'ring trunk lies beating on the ground.
 Next Lamyrus and Lamus meet their doom:
 Serranus last, in all his sprightly bloom:
 By the large draught o'erpow'r'd, outstretch'd he Full half the night already spent in play; [lay,
 Far happier had it been, if lengthen'd to the day.

Thus o'er th' unguarded fence by hunger bold,
 Springs the grim lion, and invades the fold.
 All dreadful, growling in the midnight hours,
 The trembling flock he murders and devours;
 While wrapt in silence lies the fleecy brood,
 The savage rages in a foam of blood.

Nor with less rage Euryalus employ'd
 The deadly sword; but nameless crowds destroy'd.
 Hebesus, Fadius, as they slept, he gor'd;
 But wakeful Rhesus saw the slaught'ring sword:
 Behind a goblet he retir'd in vain;
 For as the foe, detected, rose again,
 The furious youth, with all his force impress,
 Plung'd the whole sword, deep-bury'd in his breast;
 With blended wine and blood the ground was dy'd;
 The purple soul came floating in the tide.

So vents the youth his vengeance on his foes,
 And scatters death and slaughter as he goes.
 Now when to brave Measapus' tents they came,
 The fires just glimmer'd with a quiv'ring flame.
 The train lie scatter'd, while the steeds, unbound,
 Expatriate wide, and graze the verdant ground.
 Then Nisus warn'd him; for he saw the boy
 Too fierce for blood, too eager to destroy;
 "Enough of death—our swords have hew'd the
 We stand detected by the dawning day." [way
 They part; and leave, in piles confus'dly roll'd,
 Bright arms, embroider'd robes, and bowls of gold.
 But yet the fond Euryalus would stay,
 Resolv'd to seize one rich distinguish'd prey;
 The shining trappings Rhamnes' coursers bore,
 And the broad golden belt the monarch wore,

Of old, to Remulus was sent the prize
 By Cædicus, the pledge of social ties;
 Which with his grandson at his death remain'd,
 And last by war the fierce Rutulians gain'd.
 This belt he bore, exulting, from the plain,
 And in gay triumph wore, but wore in vain!
 Next, with Measapus' helm, his brows he spread,
 Adorn'd with plumes, that nodded o'er his head.
 Then, flush'd with slaughter and the glorious prey,
 They quit the camp, and seek a safer way.

Meantime, the Daunian hero to support,
 Advanc'd a legion from the Latian court;
 Three hundred horse, while slow the foot succeed,
 Fly swift before, with Volscens at their head.
 Now to the camp the warriors bend their way,
 And, on the left, the hapless youths survey.
 Euryalus' bright helm the pair betray'd,
 On which the Moon in all her glory play'd.
 " 'Tis not for nought, those youths appear; declare "

[are;
 (Cries the stern gen'ral) "who, and whence you
 And whither bound; and wherefore arm'd for war?"
 Nought they reply, but took their sudden flight
 To the thick forests, and the shades of night.
 But the fierce warriors spur'd their steeds, and stood

All round, to guard the op'nings of the wood.
 O'ergrown and wild, the darksome forest lay,
 And trees and brakes perplex'd the winding way.
 Hither, encumber'd with his gaudy prize,
 Distress'd Euryalus for shelter flies;
 But miss'd the turnings, in his wild surprise.
 Not so, swift Nisus, who the foes declin'd,
 Nor knew th' endanger'd boy was left behind;
 Beyond the once-fam'd Alban fields he fled,
 Where the fleet coursers of Latinus fed. [plain,
 There stood the mournful youth; and from the Cast a long look, to find his friend, in vain!

"Where is Euryalus, my only joy?
 Where shall I find," he cry'd, "the hapless boy?"
 Then he retrac'd his former steps, and trod,
 Once more, the winding mazes of the wood,
 The trampling steeds and warriors pour behind,
 And the loud cries come thick in ev'ry wind.
 Here, while he paus'd, a general shout he heard;
 And lo! his lov'd Euryalus appear'd,
 Surrounded by the foe: the gloomy night,
 And pathless thickets, intercept his flight.
 With joyful clamours crowd the gath'ring train
 Around the captive, who resists in vain.

What can his friend attempt, what means employ,
 What arms, what succours, to redeem the boy?
 Or through th' embattled squadrons shall he fly,
 And, prest by hostile numbers, nobly die?
 Then on the Moon he cast a mournful look,
 And in his hand the pointed jav'lin shook:
 "Great guardian goddess of the woods!" he cries,
 "Pride of the stars, and empress of the skies!
 If e'er with gifts my father hung thy shrine
 For his dear son, and sought thy pow'r divine,
 Or I increas'd them with my sylvan toils,
 And grac'd thy sacred roof with savage spoils;
 Direct my lance, nor let it fly in vain,
 But wing'd with death, disperse the hostile train."
 This said; with all his strength the spear he threw;
 Swift through the parting shade the weapon flew.
 In Sulmo's back the point all-quiv'ring stood,
 And pierc'd his heart, but left the broken wood.
 He pour'd a purple flood, as prone he lay;
 While in thick sobs he gasp'd his soul away.

The crowds gaze round; when lo! a second flies,
Fierce as the first, and sings along the skies.
Through Tagus' temples, o'er the shrinking train,
It flew, and sunk deep-bury'd in the brain.

Now, mad for vengeance, Volscens storm'd, nor
The daring author of the distant wound: [found
"But thy cursed blood shall pay for both," he said;
Then rush'd impetuous with the flaming blade
Against the trembling boy—with wild affright,
All pale, confus'd, distracted at the sight,
From his close covert Nisus rush'd in view,
And sent his voice before him as he flew:

"Me, me, to me alone, your rage confine;
Here sheath your javelins; all the guilt was mine.
By you bright stars, by each immortal god,
His hands, his thoughts, are innocent of blood!
Nor could, nor durst the boy the deed intend;
His only crime (and oh! can that offend?)
Was too much love to his unhappy friend!"

In vain he spoke, for ah! the sword, address
With ruthless rage, had pierc'd his lovely breast.
With blood his snowy limbs are purpl'd o'er,
And, pale in death, he welters in his gore.
As a gay flow'r, with blooming beauties crown'd,
Cut by the share, lies languid on the ground;
Or some tall poppy, that o'er-charg'd with rain,
Bends the faint head, and sinks upon the plain;
So fair, so languishingly sweet he lies,
His head declin'd and drooping, as he dies!

Now midst the foe, distracted Nisus flew;
Volscens, and him alone, he keeps in view.
The gath'ring train the furious youth surround;
Dart follows dart, and wound succeeds to wound;
All, all, unfelt; he seeks their guilty lord;
In fiery circles flies his thund'ring sword;
Nor ceas'd, but found, at length, the destin'd way;
And, bury'd in his mouth, the falchion lay.
Thus cover'd o'er with wounds on ev'ry side,
Brave Nisus slew the murder' as he dy'd;
Then, on the dear Euryalus his breast,
Sunk down, and slumber'd in eternal rest.

Hail, happy pair! if fame our verse can give,
From age to age, your memory shall live;
Long as th' imperial Capitol shall stand, [mand
Or Rome's majestic lord the conquer'd world com-

The victors first divide the gaudy prey;
Then to the camp their breathless chief convey:
There too a scene of gen'ral grief appears; [tears.
There, crowds of slaughter'd princes claim their Stretch'd o'er the plain their hapless friends they found,

Some pale in death, some gasping on the ground.
With copious slaughter all the field was dy'd,
And streams of gore run thick on ev'ry side.
All knew the belt and helm divinely wrought;
But mourn the fatal prize, so dearly bought;

Now dappled streaks of light Aurora shed,
And ruddy rose from Tithon's saffron bed:
Then fiery Phœbus, with his golden ray,
Pour'd o'er the op'ning world a flood of day.
When furious Iunus gave the loud alarms;
First arm'd himself; then call'd the host to arms.
The chiefs their soldiers to the field excite,
Inflame their rage, and lead them to the fight.
On pointed spears, a dreadful sight! they bore
The heads of both the hapless youths, before;
With barb'rous joy survey the bloody prize,
And shout, and follow, with triumphant cries.

The Trojans, on the left, sustain the fight
From their high walls; the river guards the right.

They line the trenches, and the tow'rs maintain;
Thick on the ramparts stand the pensive train,
And know the heads too well, though cover'd o'er
With sanguine stains, and all deform'd with gore.

Now to the mother's ears the news had fled,
Her son, her dear Euryalus, was dead:
The vital warmth her trembling limbs forsook,
She dropp'd the shuttle, and with horror shook;
With hair dishevell'd from the walls she flies,
And rends the air with agonizing cries;
Breaks through the foremost troops in wild despair,
Nor heeds the darts, or dangers of the war.

"And is it thus, the comfort of my years,
Thus, thus, my dear Euryalus appears?
And could'st thou fly, my child, to certain harm?
To death (oh cruel!) from thy mother's arms?
So fond a mother?—nor thy purpose tell?
Nor let me take my last, my sad, farewell?
A prey to dogs, alas! thy body lies,
And ev'ry fowl that wings the Latian skies!
Nor did thy mother close thy eyes in death,
Compose thy limbs, nor catch thy parting breath;
Nor bathe thy gaping wounds, nor cleanse the gore,
Nor throw the rich embroider'd mantle o'er;
The work that charm'd the cares of age away,
My task all night, my labour all the day;
The robe I wove, thy absence to sustain,
For thee, my child;—but wove, alas! in vain.
Where shall I find thee now? what land concerns
Thy mangled members and thy dear remains?
How on thy face these longing eyes I fed?
Ah! how unlike the living is the dead!

For that, o'er lands and oceans have I gone?
Is that, the sole sad relic of my son?
That bloody ball!—No more!—ye foes of Troy,
Come all, a poor abandon'd wretch destroy;
Here, here, direct, in pity, ev'ry dart,
Plant ev'ry jav'lin in this breaking heart:
Or with thy bolts, O Jove! conclude my woe,
And plunge me flaming to the shades below.
Strike—and I'll bless the stroke, that sets me free;
'Tis ease, 'tis mercy, to a wretch like me!"

Her loud complaints the melting Trojans hear,
Sigh back her sighs, and answer tear for tear,
Their courage slackens; and the frantic dame,
With her wild anguish, damps the martial flame.
But young Ascanius, while his sorrows flow,
And his full eyes indulge the gush of woe,
With great Ilioneus, commands the train
To bear the matron to her tent again.

Now the shrill trumpet's dreadful voice from far,
With piercing clangours, animates the war.
The troops rush on; the deaf'ning clamours rise,
And the long shouts run echoing round the skies.
Straight, in a shell, their shields the Volscians
threw;

And the close cohorts march, conceal'd from view,
To fill the trenches which the camp surround,
And tug th' aspiring bulwarks to the ground.
Where thinly rang'd appear the op'ning pow'rs,
They fix their scaling engines in the tow'rs,
From far the Trojans missive weapons throw,
And with tough poles repel the rising foe;
Thus went, of old, th' advancing Greeks to dare,
And guard the ramparts in their ten year's war.
Long with huge pointed stones, they strove in
vain,

To burst the cov'ring of the hostile train.
Yet still the bands maintain the fight, below
The brazen concave, and defy the foe.

At length the Trojans with a mighty shock,
Roll'd down a pond'rous fragment of a rock;
Fall where the thick-embod' d squadron spreads;
Th' enormous mass came thund'ring on their heads,
Broke through the shining arch, and crush'd the train;

And with a length of slaughter smok'd the plain.
In this blind fight no more the foes engage,
But with their darts a distant combat wage.

There with a blazing pine Mezentius came,
And tost within the works the dreadful flame;
Tremendous chief!—while bold Messapus calls
To scale the tow'rs, and thunders at the walls.

Ye sacred Nine, inspire me to record
What numbers fell by Turnus' slaught'ring sword.
What foes each hero plung'd to Hell, declare,
Each death display, and open all the war!
Those mighty deeds which you alone can know,
Repeat, ye Muses! to the world below.

Full o'er the wall a turret rose on high,
Stage above stage, unrivall'd, to the sky.
This fort to gain, the Latians bend their care,
Point their full strength, their whole collected war.
Vast fragments from above the Trojans throw,
And through the walls their jav'lins gall the foe.
A blazing torch the mighty Turnus flung;
Close to the sides the flaming mischief hung:
Then, thund'ring through the planks, in fury grew,
Swell'd in the wind, and round the structure
flew.

With headlong speed th' imprison'd troops retire,
Through'd in huge heaps, before the spreading fire.
While on one side their weight incumbent lay,
The beams all burst, the crackling walls give way,
The pond'rous pile comes tumbling to the ground,
And all Olympns trembled at the sound.

With the proud structure fall the Trojan train,
Wrapp'd in the smoky ruins, to the plain,
Their souls crush'd out, the warriors bury'd lie;
Or on the points of their own lances die.
Sav'd from the general fate, but two remain,
And ah! those hapless two were sav'd in vain!
Unless'd Helenor, most advanc'd in years,
At once encompass'd by the foe appears;
Him to the Lydian king, his beauteous slave
Lycimnia bore; unfortunately brave.

Though born of servile blood, the gen'rous boy
In arms forbidden sought the wars of Troy.
With glory fir'd he took the dang'rous field;
Light was his sword, and unador'd his shield.
At first with wild surprise the youth descri'd
The gath'ring Latian troops on ev'ry side;
Then (bent on death) where thick the jav'lins rise,
Fierce on the close embattled war he flies.
So the stern savage, whom the train surrounds
Of shouting hunters, steeds, and op'ning bounds,
On death determin'd, and devoid of fears,
Springs forth undaunted on a grove of spears.
But swifter Lycus urg'd his rapid way,
Though jav'lins hiss, and swords around him play;
Flies to the walls, and battlements again,
Leaps high, and reaches at his friends in vain.
For close behind the furious Turnus flew:

" Fool! couldst thou hope to scape when I pursue,
Though swifter than the wind?" (aloud he cries)
Then by the foot he seiz'd his trembling prize;
And, as he hung aloft in dire dismay,
Tugg'd him with half the shatter'd wall away.
So Jove's imperial bird, through fields of air,
Snatches the snowy swan of quiv'ring bare:

So the grim prowling wolf, amidst her play,
Leaps on the lamb, and rends the tender prey;
Wild roams the bleating mother round the plain,
Seeks, and laments, her slaughter'd child in vain.
Now with loud shouts they rend the tortur'd air,
Fill the deep trench, and lay the bulwarks bare.
Some load with hostile fires their vengeful hands,
And at the turrets toss the blazing brands.
As to the gates the bold Lucretius came,
Tow'r'd in the front, and shook the waving flame;
The great Ilioneus with vigour threw
A rocky fragment, and the warrior slew.
Young Liger's certain spear, Emation sped;
Asylas' shaft led Choronius dead.

Ortygius bleads by Ceneus' fatal steel,
But by great Turnus' hand the victor fell;
Clonius with him, and Dioxippus falls,
And hapless Idas, while he guards the walls.
Sagar, the next, with Promulus, was slain;
And Capys stretch'd Privernus on the plain:
First slightly wounded by Themilla's dart;
(The shield thrown by) to mitigate the smart,
His hand the warrior to the wound apply'd;
Swift flew the second dart, and nail'd it to his side:
Its fatal course through all his vitals held;
And the pale corse lay panting on the field.

All bright in arms, the son of Arcesus stood,
Bred in the grove of Mars, the warrior god;
From where Palicus' loaded altars flame,
In gold and purple gay, the blooming hero came.
Mezentius mark'd him, as he tow'r'd on high;
Then seiz'd a sling, and laid the jav'lin by:
Thrice whirl'd around, the whistling bullet threw;
The glowing metal melted as it flew;
Through both his temples cut its dreadful way;
And, roll'd in dust, the beauteous warrior lay.

Then first in fight the young Ascanius bore
His bow; employ'd on beasts alone before.
His vengeful shafts a royal victim found,
And stretch'd the bold Numanus on the ground.
Not long before the haughty chief had led Brave Turnus' sister to his bridal bed:
Now, of his high alliance vain and proud,
He stalks before the troops, and vaunts aloud:

" What shame, ye Phrygians, ye twice-ran-
quish'd train,
To lie beleagu'rd in your walls again!
All pale and trembling, in yon tow'rs to wait!
That rise, ye cowards, between you and fate!
Brave chiefs! bold heroes these!—who come so far
To gain their brides by violence and war!
From Troy what god, what madness, call'd you o'er,
To fall and perish on a foreign shore?
Far other foes than Atreus' sons appear;
No crafty talking Ithacus is here.
We plunge our infants in the hard'ning streams,
And season in the frost their tender limbs.
Our boys the forest range, and lead the course,
Bend the tough bow, and break the prancing horse.
Long thirst, long hunger, our bold youths can bear,

Plough, fight, or shake embattled towns with war.
We live in steel; in arms our hindrs appear;
And the turn'd jav'lin goads the lab'ring steer.
Nor flags our gen'rous warmth, by years declin'd;
Still flames the noble ardour of the mind.
Ev'n the grave sire with martial vigour glows,
And crushes with the casque his hoary brows.
All, all, engag'd alike in warlike toils,
Subsist on rapine, and divide the spoils.

While you, the fugitives, the dregs of Troy,
Your hours in pleasures, and the dance employ:
Warm purple robes defend (ye dastard bands!)
Your heartless breasts and unperforming hands.
Your female souls the manly form disgrace—
Hence then, ye women, to your native place—
Hence—to your Phrygian Dindymus away!—
With eunuchs there on pipes and timbrels play!
Go—the great mother's rites attend you there—
But leave to men the bus'ness of the war."

Thus while he spoke in scornful strains, no more
The young Ascanius the proud boaster bore.
He fits an arrow to the well-strung bow;
But first to Jove address'd his solemn vow:
"My bold attempt, almighty sire, succeed;
A milk-white heifer at thy shrine shall bleed;
Majestic shall he stalk, and paw the ground,
Push with his gilded horns, and spurn the sands
around."

He said—and, to the left, the sire on high
Roll'd the big thunder through an azure sky.
At once his twanging bow Ascanius drew,
And, hissing fierce, the feather'd arrow flew;
Nor flew the winged wrathful shaft in vain,
But pierc'd his head, and stung him to the brain.
"Go—and once more a valiant race defy!"
Thus the twice-vanquish'd Phrygians, thus reply.
No more he said;—loud shouts and clamours rise;
And transport lifts the Trojans to the skies.

High on a cloud, enthron'd in open air,
Apollo sat, and thence survey'd the war.
Then to the conqu'ring royal boy he cries:
"Rise, glorious youths! in valour ever rise!
Rise thus in time to Heaven's supreme abodes,
The son, and father, of a race of gods!
Who, great in arms, victorious by their swords,
Shall rule mankind, the world's majestic lords!
Go—mount from fame to fame, auspicious boy;
Proceed, and scorn the narrow bounds of Troy!"

He said; then down th' ethereal road he flies
With rapid speed, and cleaves the liquid skies;
Assumes old Bute's figure and attire,
Anchises' long-try'd friend and faithful squire
In fields of old; and now the chief of Troy
Had trusted to his care the royal boy.
Like this sage guardian to the youth he came;
His voice, his visage, and his arms, the same.

Then to the victor boy aloud he cries:
"Enough, young warrior—let it now suffice
That unreveng'd the great Numanus dies:
Apollo, pleas'd thy first attempts to crown,
Gives to thy bow the glories of his own:
Now tempt no more the dangers of the war,
Too daring youth"—he said; and past in air,
Past in a moment from his wond'ring eye;
And the loose shape dissolv'd into the sky.
The sounding shafts the leaders heard, o'er-aw'd
With the loud quiver, and confess the god;
Then urge the fiery youth, no more to dare,
Since great Apollo's voice forbade the war."

While, prod'gal of life, to fight they fly,
All nobly fixt, to conquer or to die;
Stones, spears, and jav'lins, from the works they flung;

From tow'r to tow'r the shouts and clamours rung;
Helms clash with helms, the rattling shields re-
sound;

Thick fly the darts, and cover all the ground;
While loud the battle roars, and thunders all
around:

Thick, as from western clouds, all charg'd with rain,

Pours the black storm; and smokes along the plain;
Thick as the gather'd hail, tempestuous, flies
O'er the wide main, and rattles down the skies,
When all the frowning Heav'ns are blacken'd o'er;
When Jove discharges all his wrathful store,
And, deep, from ev'ry cloud, the bursting thunder
Pand'rus and Bitias at the portal stood, [roar!
Two giant brethren, born in Ida's wood;
From great Alcanor and Hiera sprung,
The champions rose conspicuous o'er the throng.
The mighty champions, of prodigious frame,
Tow'r'd like the groves and mountains whence they came.

Their prince, when parting from the Tuscan state,
Appointed these, the guardians of the gate.
Proud of their strength, the daring heroes throw
Th' enormous folds wide-open to the foe.
Within, all-bright in arms, on either hand
Before the tow'rs the haughty warriors stand:
On their bright helms sat Horror plum'd; on high
Their nodding crests float dreadful in the sky,
So where the fields fair Athis divides,
Or Po tumultuous rolls his swelling tides,
With heads unshorn, two mighty oaks appear,
Wave to the winds, and nod sublime in air!

Soon as the foes an open entrance spy,
The war breaks in; but soon their leaders fly,
Repell'd by hosts; or in the portal die.
Queoens, Equiculus all-bright in steel,
Hæmon and daring Tmarus, fled, or fell.
To dire extremes the rising rage proceeds;
The slaughter swells, and the fierce battle bleeds.
No more imprison'd in their walls they wait;
All Troy at once came pouring to the gate:
Now, flush'd with blood, in bold excursion far
Rush the stern bands, and mix in closer war.

But in a distant quarter long engag'd,
Amidst the foes the Daunian hero rag'd:
When to the prince a messenger relates,
That Troy had open'd wide her massy gates;
And, heaps on heaps the late imprison'd train Broke forth, and stretch'd the slaughter o'er the plain,

This heard, with fury sparkling in his eyes,
Fierce to engage the giant chiefs he flies.
First, by his lance, Antiphates lay dead,
Sarpedon's offspring by a Theban bed;
The whizzing lance, with all his force address'd,
Transfixt the foe, and panted in his breast:
Warm'd in the lungs the heaving jav'lin stood:
Wide gapes the wound, and pours a purple flood.
Now Erymanthus, now brave Merops fell;
Then sunk Aphydias to the shades of Hell.
Next, while he threats revenge with fiery eyes,
Beneath the chief the mighty Bitias dies:
No vulgar lance the valiant victor tost
(In that huge bulk a vulgar lance was lost);
A strong, vast, weighty spear, the hero threw,
A spear that roar'd like thunder as it flew.
Not two bull-hides, within the buckler roll'd,
Nor double pond'rous plates, and scales of gold,
Th' impetuous weapon, wing'd with death, could stay;

But stretch'd in dust the giant warrior lay:
As the huge champion falls, the fields resound;
And his broad buckler thunders on the ground.
So from the Baian mole, whose structures rise
High o'er the flood, a massy fragment flies;

The rapid rolling pile all-headlong sweeps,
With one vast length of ruin, to the deeps;
Thick boil the billows; and on ev'ry side,
Work the dark sands, and blacken all the tide:
The trembling shores of Prochyta resound,
And burning Arime shakes wide around;
The mass, by Jove, o'er huge Typhœus spread;
The giant hears the peal; and, seiz'd with dread,
Starts, turns, and bellows on his fiery bed.

Now Mars himself inspires the Latian band,
Warmes ev'ry heart, and strengthens ev'ry hand;
And, while he turns their trembling foes to fight,
The kindling legions gather to the sight;
Danger nor death their furious course controls,
And all the god came rushing on their souls!

His brother slain when Pandarus beheld,
And saw the changing fortune of the field,
He sets his ample shoulders to the weight,
And turns th' enormous hinges of the gate;
But left, unmindful, as the folds he clos'd,
A crowd of friends, to certain death expos'd;
And, with himself, includes the trembling train
Of troops, who rush'd tumultuous from the plain.
Fool! not to see the dreadful Turnus there,
Mix'd with the crowds amidst the flying war;
But in the walls the furious chief to hold,
Like some fierce tiger midst the trembling fold!
Loud clash his arms; and as he towers on high,
Flash the keen flames from his tremendous eye;
Nods his proud crest, and formidably plays;
And from his shield the streamy lightnings blaze.

Too soon, with dire surprise, the Trojans know
The dreadful front of their victorious foe.

Straight fir'd with vengeance for his brother slain,
Springs forth fierce Pandarus, and thus began:

"Behold the Trojan camp, a fatal scene!
No bridal palace of the Latian queen,
No native Ardea, prince, you here descry,
But hostile walls; and 'tis in vain to fly."
"In that vast bulk if any soul reside, Come try thy might" (the prince sedate re-
ply'd;)

"Go, and old Priam's trembling spirit tell,
A new Achilles plung'd thy soul to Hell."

Then, first, his knotted spear the Trojan threw;
Rough with the bark the pond'rous weapon flew;
But mighty Juno caus'd it far to glance,
And in the portal fixt the quiv'ring lance.

"But hope not thou to 'scape this sword of mine, Aim'd by a surer, stronger hand than thine,"
The hero cry'd—Then flies against the foe
With the bright blade; and rises to the blow;
Sudden the sword tempestuous cleaves in twain
His cheeks, and sinks deep-bury'd in the brain.
Distaïn'd with blood, his clashing arms resound,
And, as he fell, he shook the purpled ground:
There, as the mighty bulk lay stretch'd along,
In equal shares the parted visage hung.

Pale with new horror at the dreadful sight,
On ev'ry side the Trojans urge their flight.
Then had the victor broke the barriers down,
And call'd his social troops to storm the town,
'That day had seen their warlike labours o'er;
And ruin'd Troy had been a name no more.
But the mad chief with boundless slaughter glows,
And rage insatiate drives him on the foes.
First, valiant Phalaris; next Gyges fell;
Deep through his knee he drove the pointed steel.
Then from the dead the reeking darts he drew,
And in their backs transfir'd the flying crew.

New strength, new courage, Juno still supply'd:
And now brave Halys and great Phœgeus dy'd:
Alexander, Prytanis, Noemon fall,
With warlike Halius, on th' embattled wall,
High on the works engag'd in other fight—
Next flew his flaming falchion to the right,
And struck bold Lynceus as he call'd around
For aid, and brav'd him on the lofty mound.
At one just stroke his head and helmet fly
Before the sword, and far at distance lie.

Then fierce, on Amycus the warrior came,
Whose fatal arrow pierc'd the savage game;
Who dip'd th' unvenom'd steel with matchless art,
And double arm'd with death the pointed dart.
Next Clytius fell, though sprang of race divine;
Soft Cretheus last, the darling of the nine;
Well was he skill'd, in sacred strains to sing,
Tune the sweet lyre, and sweep the trembling string;
Arms, and the toils of heroes, to recite,
The plunging furious steeds, and thunder of the fight.

Now heard the chiefs, who led the Trojan band,
What numbers fell by Turnus' conqu'ring hand;
Fierce they advance; when soon appear in sight,
The slaught'ring hero, and their troops in fight.
"And where?" (great Mnæstheus rais'd his voice on high)

"Where, to what other ramparts would you fly;
Shall one, and he inclos'd within your wall,
One rash, imprison'd warrior vanquish all?
With rage resistless, half an host destroy;
And open ev'ry bleeding vein of Troy?
Calm you look on, and see the furious foe
Plunge crowds of heroes to the shades below;
Still shall your king, ye base abandon'd train,
Your country, and your gods, demand your aid in vain?"

Rous'd by these words, they rally from afar,
Breathing revenge, and gath'ring to the war:
The Daunian chief shrinks backward from the foes,
Where round the works the mighty river flows:
The Trojans shout; and, with new transport fir'd,
Rush on embody'd, as the prince retir'd.
As when with tilted spears the clam'rous train
Invade the bridled monarch of the plain,
The lordly savage from the shouting foe
Retires, majestically stern, and slow.
Though singly impotent the crowd to dare,
Repel, or stand their whole collected war;
Grim he looks back; he rolls his glaring eye;
Despairs to conquer; and disdains to fly.
So Turnus paus'd; and by degrees retir'd;
While shame, disdain, and rage, the hero fir'd.
Yet twice, ev'n then, he flew amid the train,
And twice he chas'd them o'er their walls again.
But now from all the camp their forces ran
Full on the chief; an army on a man!
Nor longer Heav'n's great empress from on high
Dares with new strength th' exhausted prince
For winged Iris from the realms above [supply:
Brought the severe decree of angry Jove,
That bade, with threats, th' imperial queen recall
Her favour'd hero from the Trojan wall.

Now his tir'd arm refus'd the sword to wield;
Now flew the darts, and planted all his shield.
The stones now rattle; now the jav'lin'ssing,
Indent his arms, and on his helmet ring.
A thousand weapons round his temples lay,
And strike the honours of his crest away.
Thick and more thick the foes their lances sped,
With mighty Mnæstheus thund'ring at their head.

Pale, breathless, faint, and black with dust, in streams

The sweat descends from all his trembling limbs.
Arm'd as he was (thus press'd on ev'ry side),
He plung'd at last, undaunted, in the tide.
The sacred river, for the welcome load,
Spreads his wide arms, and wafts him down the
The hero to his host the surges bear, [blood :
Cleans'd from the horrid stains of slaughter, blood, and war.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK I.

ARGUMENT.

JUPITER calls a council of the gods, and forbids them to engage in either party. At the return of Æneas there is a bloody battle. Turnus kills Pallas: Æneas, Lausus and Mezentius. Mezentius is described as an atheist; Lausus as a pious and virtuous youth. The different actions and death of these two are the subject of a noble episode.

Now wide unfold th' eternal gates of Jove :
Th' ethereal king convenes the pow'rs above.
Beneath his eye, both hosts, in full survey,
The spacious world, and vast creation lay ;
There in the starry courts, enthron'd on high,
Sat the majestic senate of the sky,
Rank'd by degrees, along the bright abodes ;
To whom the king of men, and father of the gods ;
" What discord fires your minds, celestial train ?
Why was our sacred mandate urg'd in vain ?
Did not your sov'reign lord his will declare,
That Troy and Lethum should not wage the war ?
Why are we disobey'd ? What vain alarms
Inflame their souls to slaughter, blood, and arms ?
The destin'd time will wing its fatal way
(Nor need your rage anticipate the day)
When Carthage, with her proud victorious pow'rs,
Shall burst, like thunder, o'er the Roman tow'rs,
Break the strong Alpine adamantine chains,
Pour down the hills, and deluge all the plains.
Then, with full licence, your unbounded hate
And stern revenge may crush the Trojan state.
Till then, ye pow'rs, from wrath and discord cease,
And let the nations join in leagues of peace."
Thus, from the throne, in short, almighty Jove ;
And thus, at large, the beauteous queen of love :
" O sire of men below, and gods on high !
(For to what other pow'r can Venus fly ?)
Dost thou not see yon fierce Rutulian train ?
With what success proud Turnus sweeps the plain !
Rapt by his steeds, triumphant on his car,
The dreadful hero rules the storm of war.
Not wails can guard my Trojans now from fate ;
For lo ! grim slaughter rages in the gate !
With hostile bands the walls are cover'd o'er,
And the deep trenches float with tides of gore !
My son is absent, while his subjects bleed ;
But must we never from a siege be freed ?
For, lo, great sire ! a second army falls
On rising Troy, and thunders at her walls.

In Latian fields against the Dardan train,
Behold the stern Tydides rise again !
Sprung though I am from thee, prepar'd I stand
To bleed once more—and by a mortal hand !
Yet, if against thy will the Phrygian host
Have left their Troy, and sought the Latian coast,
Withdraw thy potent aid, O sov'reign god !
And bid the guilty nation mourn in blood !
But since so many signs their course compel,
The voice of Heav'n, and oracles of Hell ;
Why dares another pow'r thy will debate,
Or thwart th' unalterable course of fate ?
Her boundless vengeance why should I repeat ?
How on Sicilian shores she fir'd the fleet ?
How she dispatch'd to yonder world below,
With that dire charge, the goddess of the bow ?
How the grim tyrant of th' Æolian reign
Let loose th' imprison'd whirlwinds o'er the main ?
Hell and th' infernal pow'rs were yet untry'd ;
All Hell now arms ; and rises on her side.
The fiends, the furies range the realms above,
And act well worthy of the queen of Jove !
Through all the Latian towns Ælecto flies,
And her black visage blasts the golden skies !
No hopes of empire now my thoughts employ
(These were my hopes, when fortune smil'd out Troy).

Let Troy and Latium fight on yonder plains,
And fall or conquer as thy will ordains :
Since to the Phrygian race your haughty spouse
No spot, no corner, of the world allows.
Yet I implore thy grace, almighty sire,
By ruin'd Troy, yet smoking from the fire !
Give me, at least, the royal youth to bear
(My dear Ascanius) from the rage of war !
(And let the father, where your vengeful bride
Or fortune points, still wander o'er the tide ?)
Th' Idalian realm and Amathus are mine ;
Cythera fair, and Paphos the divine ;
There he may live defended from the foes,
Lost to the charms of fame, in soft repose.
Then to Ansonia let proud Carthage come,
And hold that empire once decreed to Rome,
O'er the wide world extend her boundless pow'r ;
Our hopes, and Jove's own promises, no more !
What now avails it, that my godlike heir
Broke through the hostile fires, and 'scap'd the war ;

Led my poor exiles to the Latian plain,
And rais'd a city, doom'd to fall again ;
What has it now avail'd him, to withstand
Th' exhausted dangers both of sea and land ;
His lot were happier had he scorn'd a crown,
And slumber'd o'er his ruin'd native town.
O ! give their Xanthus to the wretched train,
Give them their Simois, with their wars again !
Let Greece in arms her vengeful hosts employ
Ten long years more, and storm a second Troy !
To whom, with fury sparkling in her eyes,
Reply'd the haughty empress of the skies :
" And why, say, why, O goddess, am I prest
To wake the wrath, that slumber'd in my breast ?
What god, or mortal, bade your son declare,
Against the Latian lord, so rash a war ?
Suppose, fate call'd him to the Latian plains,
Or (far more likely) mad Cassandra's strains !
Say, did we bid him leave his town behind,
And trust the mercy of the sea and wind ?
Commit the war, and his forsaken Troy,
To such a head, an unexperienc'd boy ?

o court the Tuscans, and with vain alarms
 o rouse whole nations from repose to arms:
 'hat god, or what perverse intent of ours
 lov'd the wise prince to leave his rising tow'rs?
 ay, does the goddess of the bow appear,
 r the keen spite of vengeful Juno, here?
 's hard, you urge, the Latians should conspire
 o wrap th' unfinished walls of Troy in fire;
 hat Turons lives, and holds his native place
 (nd yet he sprung from our immortal race):
 'as it less hard, that Troy embattled came,
 o waste the Latian lands with sword and flame?
 'er foreign realms to propagate her sway,
 in fraud to force, and bear their spoils away?
 rom their own lords the plighted brides to tear?
 o proffer peace, and yet to wage the war?
 ou, from the foe, your darling son could shroud,
 nd for a man present a figur'd cloud.
 ou from your navy could the fires restrain,
 nd change your ships to Nereids of the main.
 et in her friends' defence is Juno seen?
 'is a high crime in Jove's imperial queen!
 'our son, belike, is absent, while the foe svades his tow'rs;—and let him still be so!—
 ythera's isle, and Amathus, are yours;
 he Paphian realms, and soft Idalian shores.
 Why shouldst thou then to fights a race incline,
 ong since inur'd to rougher wars than thine?
 id we conspire your empire to destroy?
 id we urge vengeful Greece to ruin Troy?
 'e?—or your Paris? your adult'rous boy?
 Who did that black destructive crime inspire?
 Who fan'd the flame, that set two worlds on fire?
 id the lewd youth, at Juno's call, convey,
 rom injur'd Sparta's walls, his beauteous prey?
 id we procure? did we retain the fair?
 nd, for his lust, support a ten years' war?'
 hen, partial goddess, then had been your time,
 o fear for Troy, on that perfidious crime;
 but now, too late, unjustly you complain,
 low vent your anger, and your grief, in vain."

Thus spoke the wrathful queen; the gods divide, nd in mixt murmurs vote on either side:
 o, pent in woods, at first with sullen sound
 'e wind, low-murm'ring, rolls, the forest round;
 A dreadful signal to the naval train,
 X the loud storms impending o'er the main.

Then spoke th' almighty father, 'as he sat
 Enthron'd in gold, and clos'd the great debate.
 Th' attentive winds a solemn silence keep;
 The wond'ring waves lie level on the deep;
 Earth to her centre shook; high Heav'n was aw'd;
 And all th' immortal thrones stood trembling at the god.)

"Hear then our sacred will, ye pow'rs above;
 And mark th' unalterable word of Jove.
 Since you refuse to bid your discord cease,
 And join the nations in the bonds of peace;
 Whatever schemes or hopes the parties frame,
 Latium and Troy to Jove are both the same;
 Whether in yon fierce leaguer 'tis decreed
 That hapless Ilion, or Hesperia bleed.
 The stern Rutulians too their toils shall know,
 And ev'ry hand shall work its weal or woe.
 Your king, inclin'd to neither side, shall wait
 The great event, and leave the whole to fate."
 This by his brother's awful floods he swore,
 That through the black infernal regions roar;
 Gave the dreadful signal of the solemn nod,
 With his bent brows; the sanction of the god!

From sky to sky the strong concussion rolls;
 And all Olympus trembled to the poles.
 Thus did the sire the high contention close;
 Then from the thrones majestically rose;
 With him at once the sacred senate rise,
 And to his palace wait the sov'reign of the skies.

Meanwhile, at ev'ry gate, the Latian pow'rs
 Crowd to destroy their foes, and fire the tow'rs.
 By hosts surrounded, in despair to fly,
 Close in their trench, the helpless Trojans lie.
 Yet some undaunted on the ramparts stand,
 And guard the works; a brave, but slender band.
 There, sprung from Imbracus, bold Asius shone:
 Thymetes next, fam'd Hicetaon's son,
 The dread Assaraci their succour bring;
 With them, two brothers of the Lycian king.
 Thybris and Castor next, a martial pair,
 Full in the front repel the rising war.
 These Aemon join'd, from fair Lyrnessus' shore;
 With all his strength a broken rock he bore:
 He match'd his brother Mnestheus' wond'rous
 might,

And his great father Clytius in the fight.
 Some, pond'rous stones, some, pointed jav'lines aim,
 And gall the foe with shafts, or missive flame.
 Amid the train, bright Venus' darling care,
 Ascanius shone; his beauteous head was bare;
 A golden chain constrains his locks, that deck,
 In glossy sable curls, his lovely neck:
 So shines a gem, illustrious to behold,
 On some fair virgin's neck enchas'd in gold:
 So the surrounding ebon's darker hue
 Improves the polish'd ivory to the view.

These too, stern Ismarus, O chief divine;
 A great descendant of the Lydian line,
 (Born where the peasants turn the costly mould, Enrich'd by bright Pactolus' tides of gold)
 The hoets admir'd; while fierce thy twanging bow
 Discharg'd thy poison'd arrows at the foe.
 Brave Capys next succeeds, a chief of fame,
 From whom proud Capua since depriv'd her name,
 Great Mnestheus clos'd the band, of high renown
 Since late he cast bold Turnus from the town.

These all the rigid toils of fight sustain;
 Meantime, by night, their gen'ral ploughs the main.

For when the prince had left th' Arcadian coast,
 And sought the leader of the Lydian host;
 With pray'rs declar'd his bus'ness, race, and name,
 And with what force their vengeful tyrant came;
 How the Rutulian rag'd; what turns of fate
 And chance of war attend the mortal state;
 Straight with the league propos'd, the chief com-
 And joins his forces to his new allies. [plies,

Now, uncontrol'd by fate, the martial train,
 Led by a foreign hero, cleave the main:
 In pomp, before, Æneas' galley past;
 His lofty stern the Phrygian lions grac'd;
 There, banish'd Troy's delight, her sculptur'd Ide,
 Hangs o'er the foamy surge, and shades the tide.
 Here sat the chief with various thoughts oppress,
 The fate of war revolving in his breast;
 Close by his side th' Arcadian prince inquires
 Of the swift motions of the heav'nly fires;
 What seas he measur'd, and what lands he sought;
 What storms he suffer'd, and what fields he fought:

Ye Muses! now unlock your sacred spring,
 Inspire the bard, and teach him how to sing,
 What ships, what heroes, what auxiliary hosts,
 Sail'd with Æneas from the Tuscan coasts,

The Tiger first the foamy flood divides,
And bears a thousand warriors through the tides,
Who came beneath great Masicus' command,
From Cosa's turrets, and the Clusian land.
Close to their sides their polish'd quivers sat;
Strung were their bows; their arrows wing'd with fata.

Six hundred move beneath fierce Abas' care,
From Populonia to the field of war.
Rich in her endless beds of steely ore,
The rugged Iva sends three hundred more;
All, train'd to fight; all, glorious to behold;
And, on the stern, Apollo flam'd in gold.

With groves of waving spears, in thick array,
From Pisa's walls a thousand took their way;
They march embattled from the Tuscan land,
And great Asylas leads the martial band;
Asylas, skilful sage! whose piercing eyes
Discern'd all signs on Earth, or in the skies.
His heart from entrails certain omens drew,
From stars and birds, and lightnings as they flew.

Next beauteous Astur plough'd the wat'ry field,
Proud of his bounding steed and sculptur'd
shield;

From where old Purgus' lofty turrets rise,
And rank Gravicus marshes taint the skies,
Where Cere groan'd beneath Mezentius' reign,
And gurgling Minio glitters o'er the plain;
Three hundred march beneath the leader's care,
Breathing revenge, and eager all for war.

Nor thou unsung, brave Cinyras, shall pass,
The martial chief of the Ligurian race;
Nor thou, Cupavo, under whose command,
Advanc'd to fight a small, but valiant band.
White plumes adorn thy crest, and wave above,
Expressive of thy sire's, transform'd by love,
While for his Phaeton his sorrows flow,
And soft harmonious strains beguile his woe;
While in the dusky poplar grove he made
His melting moans, beneath the sisters' shade,
O'er all the man the snowy feathers rise,
And in a tuneful swan he mounts the skies.
Now his great offspring with his social train,
In the huge Centaur plough'd the roaring main.
High on the prow the figur'd monster stood,
And shook a rocky fragment o'er the flood.
The sounding keel the thronging waves disjoin'd,
That foam, and whiten, in long tracks behind.

Next warlike Ocnus brought his troops along,
From prescient Manto and great Tyber sprung;
By him, fair Mantua rose; immortal town!
And from his mother's name deriv'd her own.
Her mighty walls, illustrious founders grace,
Of diff'rent countries, and a diff'rent race,
Three tribes distinct possess her fertile lands,
And four fair cities every tribe commands.
Proud of her Tuscan line, with glory crown'd,
She reigns the mistress of the nations round.

Next, gen'rous hate to stern Mezentius draws
Five hundred more, in freedom's sacred cause.
Where, crown'd with reeds, the Mincio takes his
From old Benacus' venerable source, [course
In one vast ship he pours the warlike train,
Down through his native channel to the main.
Fierce for revenge, the great Auletes guides
Th' enormous bulk, that labours through the tides.
An hundred pines the boiling ocean sweep, [deep
Plough the white waves, and lash the bellowing

! Cyonus.

A mighty Triton, figur'd on the prow,
With his loud trump alarms the sea below,
Down to his waist the human form descends,
But in a whale th' amphibious monster ends.
Swift as he swims, the waters fly before;
And, dash'd beneath the god, the frothy surges
So many chiefs in thirty vessels ride [row.
To Troy's defence, and cleave the sparkling tide.
Now radiant Cynthia, through th' ethereal
height,

Rode in the sterna chariot of the night.
Fixt at the stern, the helm Æneas plies;
No creeping slumber seals his careful eyes.
Amid the seas, he meets the wood'rous train
Of ships transform'd to Nereids of the main;
As many goddesses, as stood before,
With brazen beaks, tall vessels on the shore.
They know the chief from far, and in a ring
The dancing Nymphs enclose their wood'ring king.
The first whose eloquence excell'd the rest,
Above the waves advanc'd her ivory breast;
Held with one hand the stern, while one divides,
With many an easy stroke, the silent tides:
"And dost thou wake, great offspring of the skies!
Wake still, and open ev'ry sail" (she cries:)
"Thy ships are we that once on Ida stood,
Now chang'd by Heav'n to Nereids of the flood.
When the perfidious proud Rutulian came
With the dread sword, and the devouring flame,
We burst our anchors, by the foe compell'd,
And sought our master o'er the watry field.
These forms the mother of the skies bestow'd,
And made each ship a goddess of the flood:
Low in the sacred seas our court we keep,
And dwell beneath the roarings of the deep.
Shut in the town, remains thy royal heir,
Midst all the terrors of the Latian war.
The brave Arcadian horse, and Tuscan host,
Have reach'd the land, and seiz'd th' appointed post.
The Daunian chief has sent a squadron down
To stop their destin'd progress to the town.
Rise, hero! rise; and, with the dawning light,
Lead all th' impatient warriors to the fight.
With thy Vulcanian orb invade the field,
That golden, bright, impenetrable shield.
The morning Sun (nor think my promise vain!)
Shall see vast heaps of fierce Rutulians slain."
This said; the goddess (for she knew the way)
Push'd the light vessel o'er the glassy sea:
Swift as a jav'lin, or a storm she flew;
And, wing'd with rival speed, her course the rest pursue.

While at the sight the hero stood amaz'd,
The prosp'rous sign his bounding spirits rais'd.
Then, as he fixt on Heav'n his joyful eyes,
To potent Cybele the warrior cries:
"Great guardian queen of Ida's hills and woods,
Supreme, majestic mother of the gods!
Whose strong defence proud tow'ring cities share,
While roaring lions whirl thy mighty car!
Oh! kindly second this auspicious sign,
And grace thy Phrygians with thy aid divine.
Inspir'd by thee, the combat I require,
My bosom kindles, and my soul's on fire!"
He said; and now the bright revolving day
Blaz'd o'er the world, and chas'd the shades away;
When first the hero bade the train prepare,
All rang'd beneath their banners, for the war;
Rouse for the charge their courage, and excite
Their martial ardour, to provoke the fight.

As on his stern the godlike warrior stands,
 And views distinct his camp and social bands ;
 When in his hand the golden shield he rais'd :
 Wide o'er the flood the strong effulgence blaz'd.
 And with new hopes, the joyful Trojans spy
 The shining orb ; their darts and jav'lines fly ;
 And their loud clamours tempest all the sky.
 As loud the thick-embod'd cranes repair,
 In ranks embattled, through the clouds of air ;
 When, at the signal giv'n, they leave behind,
 With rapid flight, the pinions of the wind.
 Amaz'd stood Turnus, and their Latian foes,
 Or knew from whence the sudden transport rose ;
 Till all th' advancing navy they survey,
 Floating scene, that cover'd half the sea.
 From great Æneas' crest the lightning's stream,
 And his bright helmet darts a ruddy gleam ;
 A length of flames the mighty shield displays,
 As boots fires on fires, and pours a boundless blaze.
 As the dire comet, with portentous light
 And baleful beams, glares dreadful in the night :
 So the red dog-star, when he mounts on high,
 And with his fatal splendour fires the sky,
 Scars the pale nations ; for his burning breath
 Darts down disease, blue pestilence, and death.
 But still, undaunted, Turnus urg'd the train,
 To seize the shore, and drive them to the main.

“ Lo ! what you long have wish'd, to prove your might, [fight !—

[the hour !—the place !—the foe !—the promis'd your wives, your sons, your country calls you on,
 Your great forefathers' glories and your own.
 Now while, with slidd'ring steps, to gain the land
 The Trojans toil ; descend we to the strand ;
 Soon as on yonder shore our bands appear,
 One noble stroke, my friends, shall end the war :
 The brave command success.”—The hero said :
 Then with himself for one cool moment weigh'd,
 To the bold task what chosen troops to call,
 And to what bands entrust the leagu'd wall.

Meantime the hero lands his warlike train ;
 Some watch, impatient, the retreating main ;
 Then vault, and seize the half-recover'd shores ;
 Some slide, more vent'rous, down the bending oars.
 A place at length the daring Tarchon spy'd,
 Where in smooth swellings roll'd an easy tide ;
 There, as no waters break, no billows roar,
 He fears no shoals, but hopes a friendly shore.
 Thither his vessels from the deep he drew,
 And eager thus exhorts the naval crew :

“ Now, now, my friends, exert your utmost force,
 Ply, ply your oars, and urge the furious course.
 Push, heave your desp'rate gallees to the strand ;
 Plough with your beaks and keels the hostile land.
 My sole ambition is to gain the coast :
 And then—no matter—let the ship be lost.”

So spoke th' impatient chief ; and, as he spoke,
 They ply their oars, and rise to ev'ry stroke.
 Full on the land the rushing vessels bore,
 Till with their prows they cleave the sandy shore.
 Safe to the shelving beach the gallees run ;
 All 'scap'd the shock, brave Tarchon, but thy own.

Thy own amid the shallows rush'd, and there
 Dash'd on the rock, and sloping hung in air ;
 Preced by a war of waves, her shatter'd sides
 Burst, and the crew plunge headlong in the tides.
 They swim, encumber'd with their broken oars :
 The floods supplant their feet, and bear them from the shores.

Meantime against the Trojans, on the coast,
 Brave Turnus led his close embattled host.
 The sprightly trumpets sound with martial strains,
 When great Æneas charg'd the Latian swains ;
 The valiant Theron slew, with matchless might,
 The first auspicious omen of the fight,
 A giant chief ; his furious course he held
 Against the prince, the foremost of the field.
 Fierce thro' his shield and mail (an op'ning wide !)
 Flew the swift sword, and pierc'd the warrior's side.
 Then Lycas bled, and stain'd the thirsty shore,
 To Phoebus sacred from his natal hour ;
 Ripp'd from the womb, the infant 'scap'd the steel !
 The man, unhappy ! by the falchion fell.
 Gyas and Cisseus next the hero slew,
 As their huge clubs whole armies ovrthrew. [fire,
 Vain was their strength, their bulk, their martial
 Vain their Herculean arms, and boasted sire,
 Alcides' friend ; whose glorious steps he tread,
 While earth supply'd new monsters for the god.
 As loudly-vaunting, haughty Pharos stood,
 Fixt in his throat, the jav'lin drank his blood,
 On Cydon next, who, fir'd with lawless joy,
 Fair Clytius courted and caress'd the boy,
 With all his force the mighty hero drove,
 And soon had finish'd his prepos't'rous love ;
 Soon had the youth, expiring on the shore,
 Sunk, and indulg'd his guilty flames no more ;
 But Phorcus' sons, seven valiant warriors, flew,
 And all at once their vengeful jav'lines threw !
 Some from his buckler and his helm rebound,
 Some, turn'd by Venus, glance upon the ground.
 Thus press'd, thus compass'd round on ev'ry side,
 The wrathful prince to brave Achatas cry'd ;
 “ Bring, bring those darts (not one shall fly in vain)
 That pierc'd the Grecians on the Trojan plain.”
 Then a long lance with all his might he cast,
 Through Mason's shield the furious weapon pass'd ;
 Thro' the strong cuirass pierc'd the hissing dart,
 Transfixt his breast, and quiver'd in his heart.
 The good Alcanor lends his friendly hand,
 To raise his grow'ling brother from the sand ;
 But wing'd with death, a second jav'lin flies,
 Swift as the first, and sings along the skies ;
 Through his extended arm the spear was flung ;
 And by the nerves the dying member hung.
 His brother Numitor the weapon drew
 From the pale corse, and at the victor threw ;
 The whizzing dart glanc'd innocently by,
 But slightly raz'd Achatas' manly thigh. [grace,
 Next Clausus, flush'd with youthful strength and (Clausus, the leader of the Sabine race)
 Beheld the mighty Dryops from afar,
 And lanch'd his pointed spear aloft in air,
 Which pierc'd his throat ; the purple hand of death
 Suppress'd the voice, and stopp'd the vital breath.
 Headlong he falls ; he grovels on the shore,
 And his pale mouth ejects a flood of gore.
 Still rushing on, the chief the slaughter spread
 By various deaths three sons of Boreas bled.
 As many more, poor hapless youths, expire ;
 Their country Thrace, and Idas was their sire.
 Against the prince his bands Halesus leads,
 And fierce Messapus lash'd his fiery steeds.
 In furious conflict mix'd, both armies stand
 On the first verge, and margin of the land ;
 They meet, they fight ; but neither gain, nor
 And level hung the balance of the field. [yield ;
 As when the winds from diff'rent quarters rise,
 Pour to the charge, and combat in the skies,

In due suspense the struggling tempests keep
The balanc'd clouds, and poise the rolling deep;
The winds and waves oppos'd with equal might,
Still undecided hangs th' aëreal fight:
So join both armies in the dubious fray;
These scorn to yield, nor those can win the day;
All, man to man, exert the martial fire;
All foot to foot, to conquer, or expire.

But, in a diff'rent quarter, where the floods
Had spread the ground with shatter'd rocks and woods,

Th' Arcadian squadrons from their steeds alight,
And wage on foot an unaccustom'd fight.
Now to an open route their ranks inclin'd,
And close their foes came thund'ring from behind.
This saw their chief, brave Pallas, with despair;
He saw, and strove to stop the flying war;
And thus the troops, as headlong they retir'd,
With prayers he mov'd, or with reproaches fir'd:
"Whither, ah, whither would you turn your flight?
By your past deeds! by ev'ry former fight!
By all your triumphs! by your sov'reign's name!
By my own hopes to match my father's fame!
Trust not your feet; your hands must hew your way
Through yon black body, and that thick array.
Here, here, your country calls you all, to share
With your young chief the glories of the war.
Rush to the fight; no gods our arms oppose;
Men, like ourselves, and mortal, are our foes.
In us an equal strength and soul appears,
Our hands and spirits are as bold as theirs.
Lo! there the foes our bands imprison'd keep!
And here th' eternal barriers of the deep!
Back on the seas, ye dastards, would ye fall?
Or hide your shameful heads in yon beleaguerr'd wall?"

He said; and, rushing on the hostile bands,
First in his way ill-fated Lagos stands;
Low as he stoop'd, a mighty stone to rear,
Full in the reins descends the pointed spear;
Then, as he disengag'd the dart with pain,
Fir'd at the sight, bold Hisbon rush'd in vain
Against the prince; the prince his bosom gor'd,
And plung'd into the lungs his thund'ring sword:
Next, lewd Anchemolus his falchion sped,
Who dar'd to stain his step-dame's sacred bed.
You too, ye Daunian twins, unhappy pair!
Laris and Thymber! perish'd in the war:
So like your features, that your parents look
On either face, but each for each mistook.
Puzzl'd, yet pleas'd, they gaz'd on either child,
And fondly in the dear delusion smil'd.
Now clears brave Pallas, in the dire debate,
The nice distinction by a diff'rent fate.
Thy head, fair Thymber, lies before the sword;
Thy hand, poor Laris, sought its absent lord;
Thy dying fingers, quiv'ring on the plain,
With starts convulsive grasp the steel in vain.

Th' Arcadian squadrons, by their prince inspir'd,
Rous'd by his words, by his example fir'd,
Disdain to fly, and arms to arms oppose;
Grief, shame, and fury, drive them on the foes.
From Teuthras and from Tyres, on his car
Pale Rhœtus shoots impetuous through the war!
While Pallas his swift dart at Ilus threw,
It pierc'd the hapless warrior as he flew.
The winged death the hapless warrior stay'd,
And for a space, poor Ilus' fate delay'd;
He tumbles from the car, disdain'd with gore,
And, grim in death, lies foaming on the shore.

As, when the summer glows with fervid rays,
The shepherd sets the forest in a blaze,
The groves all kindle, while the winds conspire,
And with their breath enrage the roaring fire:
Wide and more wide the conflagration flies,
Pours o'er the fields, and thunders to the skies:
On some steep mountain sits the joyful swain,
While the victorious flames devour the plain.
So pleas'd, brave Pallas sees th' Arcadian pow'rs,
All fir'd with vengeance, sweep along the shores.

Halesus flew to meet the conqu'ring foe;
Sheath'd in bright arms, he rose to ev'ry blow.
First Ladon sunk beneath his pointed steel;
Then great Demodocus and Pheres fell.
While bold Strymonius flies before the band
To seize his throat, the falchion lope his hand:
Hurl'd from his arm, a stone descended full
On Thoas' head, and crush'd the batter'd skull.
His old prophetic sire, with tender care,
Conceal'd, and warn'd Halesus from the war.
But when in death he clos'd his aged eyes,
The fatal sisters claim'd their destin'd prize.
Now stood the warrior (for his hour drew near)
A victim sacred to th' Evandrian spear.
His jav'lin Pallas at the victor throws,
But first the youth prefers his ardent vows;
"O father Tyber! give my winged dart,
To fly direct through proud Halesus' heart!
His arms and spoils thy sacred oak shall bear;"
So pray'd the youth; the god allows his pray'r.
Halesus shields Imaon from the foe,
But leaves his breast all naked to the blow.
He fell; his fall alarm'd the Latian host;
They wept, and mourn'd the mighty hero lost.
But soon brave Lausus rais'd them from despair;
Lausus, who shone conspicuous in the war.
Stern Abas first he slew, of matchless might,
Who stood unmov'd, the bulwark of the fight.
Now bled the Tuscan, now th' Arcadian train,
And Troy's bold sons, who 'scap'd the Greeks in vain.

Fierce to the fight beneath their chiefs they came;
Their chiefs, their numbers, and their strength, the
The rear close pressing to the dire alarms, [same
Th' encumber'd troops scarce wield their useless arms.

Here Pallas fires his train, and Lausus there;
In all their charms the blooming youths appear.
Poor, hapless youths! alas! your native plain
Must never, never bless your eyes again!
In vain would you engage! for Jove withstands;
Both, both must fall; but fall by greater hands!

Now Turnus to the aid of Lausus came,
Warn'd by his sister², the celestial dame;
Through cleaving ranks he drives his kindling car
With furious speed, and thunders through the war.
"Forbear, forbear; nor touch my due," he cries;
"For Pallas, Pallas is your leader's prize.
To me, to me alone belongs the fight:
Oh! could his sire be witness to the sight!"
He said; and at the word, th' obedient train
At once retir'd, and left an open plain.
The youth with wonder saw the parting band,
Heard the bold challenge, and the proud com-
maund,

With many a fiery glance he roll'd his eyes
Around his manly limbs, an ample size;
And to his haughty foe, in short, replies:

² Juturna.

Now, by thy royal spoils I will acquire immortal fame; or gloriously expire!
Then vaunt no more, for know, almighty Jove beholds the fight, impartial, from above."

his said; amid the field the hero strode;
All chill'd with fear, the pale Arcadians stood.
The Daunian chief sprung dreadful from the car,
and rush'd on foot, impetuous to the war;
rush'd, as a lion, from the mountain's height,
in some stern bull, that meditates the fight.

But soon as Pallas saw the prince appear
Within due distance of the flying spear,
'twas far o'er-match'd, the youth his fortune tries;
and, ere he threw the dart, invoc'd the skies:
"O great Alcides! by my father's feast,
Thyself vouchsaf'd to grace, a glorious guest;
assist his son, and crown his bold design;
Let Turnus fall, and own the conquest mine;
and, while the victor spoils the bloody prize,
View the proud trophy with his closing eyes."
His ardent pray'r with grief Alcides hears,
and pours a flood of unavailing tears:

While in his breast he check'd the rising groan,
Th' all-gracious father sooth'd his sorrowing son:
"To all that breathe, is fixt th' appointed date;
Life is but short, and circumscrib'd by fate:
Th' virtue's work, by fame to stretch the span,
Whose scanty limit bounds the days of man.
How many sons of gods were doom'd to fall,
Great as they were! beneath the Trojan wall?
Great as he was! among the mighty dead,
Ev'n my own son, the brave Sarpedon bled:
Tierce Turnus too the cruel fates attend,
and now, ev'n now, his race is at an end."
This said; th' almighty sov'reign of the skies
Turnus from the scene of blood his sacred eyes.

Now with full force his jav'lin Pallas threw
And from the sheath the shining falchion drew.
The whizzing spear, with erring course impell'd,
Flew through the ringing margin of the shield,
and, glancing, raz'd the shoulder of the foe.—
Then Turnus shook the lance; prepar'd to throw;
He shook the lance; "and see," he cry'd, "if mine Reach not the mark; a surer dart than think!"
He said, and threw. The spear with forceful sway

Broke, through the solid shield, its destin'd way;
Through every steely plate, and brazen fold,
Through strong bull-hides, around the buckler
roll'd;

Through the thick cuirass flew the furious dart,
Transfix'd his breast, and planted in his heart.
From the wide wound in vain the lance he tote,
The purple soul came floating with the gore:
Down sunk the youth; his rattling arms resound;
He spurts, and grinds in blood the hostile ground.
Then, as he strode, exulting, o'er the dead,
Thus to th' Arcadian train the victor said:

"Go!—be this message to your master known;
Such as the sire deserv'd, I send the son;
Unbrib'd, unsought his relics I bestow,
If fun'ral honours can relieve his woe.
Dear for the Trojan's friendship has he paid!"—
Then, with his foot he press'd the prostrate dead;
Seiz'd his embroider'd belt, a glorious prey!
And from his bosom rent the prize away.
In this rich belt, with precious gold inlaid,
His utmost art Eurytion had display'd.
Here, thick emboss'd, the fifty daughters shed
Their consorts' blood, and stain'd the bridal bed;

The rais'd, bold figures, all divinely bright
Came out, and stood projecting to the sight.
This spoil proud Turnus with triumphant eyes
Surveys, and glories in the costly prize.

But man, too haughty in a prosp'rous state,
Grows blind and heedless of his future fate:
The time shall come, when Turnus in dismay,
Shall mourn these spoils, and this victorious day;
Shall wish, too late! the golden belt unsought,
And curse the trophies he so dearly bought!

With groans and tears th' Arcadians on a shield,
Bear back their breathless leader from the field.

Thus to thy father's arms dost thou retire,
Brave youth, the grief and glory of thy sire!
O early lost! with strength and beauty grac'd!
This thy first day of warfare was thy last:
Yet didst thou scatter death through half an host;
And, ere thy own, a thousand lives were lost.

Now by spectators, not the voice of fame,
To Troy's great chief these mournful tidings came;
That round his friends, on danger, danger grows,
Who claim his aid encompass'd by the foes.

With his huge weighty sword, without delay,
Thro' bleeding ranks he cleaves an ample way.
Thee, Turnus, thee he seeks along the plain,
Proud of the spoils of hapless Pallas slain.
The genial feast, the son, the sire combin'd,
Leagues, friendship, all, came rushing on his mind.

Pour youths by Salmo, four by Ufens, bred,
Unhappy victims! destin'd to the dead,
He seiz'd alive, to offer on the pyre,
And sprinkle with their blood the fun'ral fire.
At Magnus next his furious spear he cast,
But o'er his head the quiv'ring weapon past:
The wretch embrac'd his knees, and try'd with art,
To bend his stern, inexorable heart.

"By thy dead father's shade, thy suppliant spare!
By all the hopes of thy surviving heir!
Preserve, victorious prince, this life alone,
To glad a longing father and a son!
High in my dome are silver talents roll'd,
With piles of labour'd and unlabour'd gold,
These, to procure my ransom, I resign;
The war depends not on a life like mine!
One, one poor life, can no such difference yield,
Nor turn the mighty balance of the field!" [stare

"Thy talents" (cry'd the prince), "thy treasure'd
Keep for thy sons; but talk of terms no more.
You: chief, when Pallas he depriv'd of breath,
Left no conditions but revenge and death.
So deems my living son; my sire below;
And, from this sword, demand the life of ev'ry foe."
This said; he seiz'd his helm; and, while he pray'd,

Deep bury'd in his neck the flaming blade.

Apollo's priest, illustrious Æmon's son,
In purple robes and radiant armour shone.
The sacred fillets bind his brows in vain!
Swift flies the gaudy warrior o'er the plain.
Beneath the prince the hapless victim dies,
And fate in endless slumber seals his eyes.
Serestus strips his arms; a costly load;
A trophy destin'd to the Thracian god.²

Umbro, the Marsian chief, exerts his might,
And valiant Cæculus renews the fight,
Against the prince he warms the troops in vain!—
He pours, he storms, he thunders through the plain;
Lops warlike Anxur's arms; the hand and shield.
Drop down, an useless burthen on the field.

² Marq.

Before be vaunted, and he seem'd to rise
 In his proud thought, exalted, to the skies.
 But ah! in vain he rais'd his haughty mind
 With the fond hope of years on years behind!
 In arms great Tarquitus all blazing stood,
 Sprung from a Dryad and a Sylvan god.
 Full in the hero's front he dar'd appear;
 But through his shield and corset flew the spear.
 Then as he pray'd, and begg'd his life in vain,
 He lopp'd his head, that roll'd along the plain.
 The trunk still beating on the ground below,
 Thus in proud triumph spoke his conqu'ring foe:
 "Lie, mighty warrior, there! no mother's hand
 Shall now inter thee in thy native land;
 But hungry beasts thy wretched corse shall tear,
 The fishes of the flood, and fowls of air."

Lycas and brave Anterus next he kill'd,
 Fierce as they fought, the champions of the field.
 Numa, and fair Camertes, then he slew,
 Who from bold Volscens his proud lineage drew.
 By far the wealthiest of the Latian train;
 And soft Amyclæ own'd his easy reign.

And as, of old, the huge Ægeon stood
 Engag'd in battle with the thund'ring god;
 Shook high Olympus with the dire alarms,
 And wag'd the war with all his hundred arms;
 Long flames from fifty mouths the fiend expires
 Back to the skies, and answers fires with fires;
 As many shining swords he shook, and held,
 Oppos'd to ev'ry bolt, a pond'rous shield.
 So, when his reeking sword in blood was dy'd,
 Fought the brave prince, and rag'd on ev'ry side.

Now fierce he rush'd against Nymphæus' car,
 Who shone conspicuous in the ranks of war;
 With wild affright the startled steeds beheld
 The tow'ring hero blazing o'er the field;
 Flew back, and cast their master on the plain;
 Then whirl'd the bounding chariot to the main.

Liger and Lucagus next came in view: [flew;
 Drawn by white coursers, thro' the troops they
 Two haughty brothers; that the coursers sway'd;
 This brandish'd high in air the glittering blade.
 Their threats the Trojan chief disdain'd to bear,
 Rush'd on, and shook aloft the pointed spear.
 "No Phrygian fields are these," (proud Liger said)
 "Nor these the steeds of Argive Diomed;
 You 'scape not this, as once Achilles' car;
 Here ends thy life, and here shall end the war!"
 Thus the mad boaster—but, devoid of fear,
 The prince, in answer, launch'd his whizzing
 spear.

Then, while the brother, bending o'er the horse,
 With his keen jav'lin urg'd the fiery course,
 And, with one foot pretended, rush'd to fight,
 The lance, that instant, wing'd its fatal flight;
 Beneath the shining margin of the shield,
 Swift through the groin the pointed jav'lin held.
 Down sinks the warrior with a dreadful sound,
 And, grim in death, lies grov'ling on the ground.
 The conqu'ring prince beheld him as he bled,
 And thus, in scornful terms, bespoke the dead:
 "Nor were your coursers slow; nor vain affright
 At empty shadows turn'd your steeds to flight;
 Yourself, brave Lucagus, forsook the car,
 And, vaulting on the field, declin'd the war!"
 This said; he seiz'd the coursers by the rein;
 When thus the brother, cast upon the plain,
 With lifted hands implor'd the chief in vain;
 "Now, by thyself, thy mercy I implore;
 By those who such a godlike hero bore;

This forfeit life, divine Æneas, spare,
 And with soft pity listen to my pray'r."—
 "In far, far diff'rent terms you talk'd before;
 Die then," (replies the prince) "and plead no
 Go!—'tis a brother's part—in duty go, [more;
 And wait thy brother to the realms below!"
 He rais'd his sword aloft, as thus he said,
 And in his bosom plung'd the pointed blade.

Thus, like a storm or torrent, o'er the ground
 He rush'd, and spread the slaughter wide around;
 Till from their works, so long besieg'd in vain,
 Break forth Ascanius and the Trojan train.

While thus the battle bled; imperial Jove
 Address'd his consort in the realms above,
 As both from Heav'n survey'd the deathful scene:
 "Say, sister-goddess, and my beauteous queen,
 Still, is it still your thought, that Venus' care
 Supports her favour'd Trojans in the war?
 See! how the martial bands increase in might!
 Strong from their wounds! and vig'rous for the fight!"

Can such brave heroes, who such dangers prove,
 Depend for succour on the queen of love?"

"And why, my lord," submissive, she rejoic'd
 "These words severe, to rack my anxious mind!
 Did still your love (as sure it sh'uld) remain,
 A wife and sister might not plead in vain,
 That from the field poor Turnus may retire,
 Exempt from death, and glad his longing sire—
 But let him die, since Jove has so decreed!—
 To glut the Trojan vengeance, let him bleed!—
 And yet his birth might some distinction claim,
 Since from our own celestial line he came.
 To thy great name due honours has he paid,
 And rich oblations on thy altars laid."

Thus spoke the suppliant queen; and thus replied,
 In brief, th' almighty sov'reign of the skies:

"If 'tis your pray'r to spare his forfeit breath,
 By a short respite of approaching death;
 Snatch him this instant from the fatal hour.
 This grace we grant him;—and we grant no more
 For if you beg his destin'd life to spare;
 Or turn the course and fortune of the war;
 Vain your request, and vain your hope appears."
 To whom once more, the pensive queen, with tears:

"And what, my lord, if you reverse the doom!
 Spare the dear youth, and save him from the tomb!
 Ev'n from your soul this grace if you will give,
 (Which scarce you promise) that he yet may live!
 Ah! now I see, or in my fears portend,
 The guiltless youth approaching to his end!
 But may those fears, my sov'reign lord, be vain,
 And your almighty pow'r recall his doom again!"

This said; with momentary speed she flies,
 Wrapt in a winged whirlwind, down the skies;
 In sable storms she drives the clouds before;
 Then to the fields of fight her course she bore;
 There, in Æneas' shape, a figur'd shade
 Of light impassive air, the goddess made.
 A Trojan spear the spectre seem'd to wield,
 Wore a proud crest and imitated shield!
 And spoke with empty words, in vaunting strain,
 And, like the chief, came tow'ring o'er the plain.
 (Such are the fleeting forms in visions bred,
 And such the gliding spectres of the dead.)
 The threat'ning phantom made his bold advance
 On Turnus call'd, and shook his airy lance.
 The Daunian prince his sounding jav'lin threw;
 While, with dissembled fear, the phantom flew.

Deluded Turnus thought the Trojan fled,
Burn'd with new hopes, and thus, exulting, said:
' Flies then Æneas, to his fears resign'd,
And leaves a prince's royal bed behind?—
The land, for which he cross'd the stormy wave,
This arm shall give—and here he finds a grave!¹²
Then shook his sword, and chas'd him thro' the war,
But his short triumph soon was lost in air!

By chance a ship stood anchor'd by the shore,
Which late, from Clusium, king Osinius bore)
Close shelter'd by a rock, that breaks the tides;
The planks were laid, to climb her lofty sides;
Swift to her darkness hold the shade withdrew;
As swift glad Turnus to the vessel flew.
That instant Juno cut the cords away,
Jumoor'd the bark, and launch'd her on the sea.
Meantime Æneas seeks his absent foe,
And sends whole squadrons to the ghosts below.
No more for shelter now the phantom flies,
But mounts aloft, and mixes with the skies.
While Turnus far in open ocean sails,
The vessel wafted by the rising gales)
Many a long look, back on the battle bends,
And hears the cries of his forsaken friends:
On such hard terms abhors to live, and rears
His hands and voice, in anguish, to the stars:

" What are my crimes, almighty Jove, that claim
This endless infamy to blast my name?
This dreadful doom is too severe by far;
This load of life is more than I can bear!
Whence came I here? and whither am I borne?
How could I fly?—ah! how shall I return?
Oh! with what eyes can I behold again
Yon regal walls, or yon deserted train?
How will my friends pursue my name with hate?
By me, their worthy chief, expos'd to fate!
Those friends (ye gods) I left on yonder plain,
In my curs'd cause and quarrel, to be slain!
Is!—now I see 'em fly, or bite the ground!—
hear, I start at ev'ry dying sound!
What, what can now be done?—on land or sea
What gulf will open for a wretch like me?
Ye winds, ye storms, your pity I implore,
Drive, drive my bark on some rough rocky shore,
Where, nor my friends, nor fame, may ever find me more!"

This said; the prince debates, by shame oppress'd,
Whether to plunge the falchion in his breast;
Or from the vessel leap amid the main,
Wim back and mingle in the fight again.
Thrice on each bold resolve his soul was bent;
And thrice great Juno check'd the rash intent.
The goddess wafts him down, secure from harms,
Lands, and restores him to his father's arms.

Mezentius now, inspir'd by Jove's commands,
Succeeds the chief, invades the Trojan bands.
On him, and him alone, the Tuscans ran,
With all their darts; an army on a man.
But, like a rock, the dire alarms he stood;
A rock, whose sides project into the flood;
That bears, above, the furious whirlwind blow,
And sees the frothy billows break below;
But stands unmov'd, majestically high,
And braves the idle rage of ocean and the sky.

First Dolicaon's son the monarch slew;
Next on the trembling Latagus he flew;
Fierce in his hand a pond'rous stone he took,
And on his visage dash'd the broken rock,
Then drove thro' Palmus' knee the pointed steel:
And left the warrior growling where he fell.

His glitt'ring arms young Lausus' shoulders spread,
And the plum'd helmet nodded o'er his head.
Next Evas bleeds beneath his vengeful spear,
With Mimas, Paris' friend and bold compeer;
Thraeno bore him when the queen of Troy,
Pregnant with flame, produc'd the fatal boy;
Yet in his native land was Paris slain!
But hapless Mimas on a foreign plain!

And as some mighty boar, who long has fed
High on the rough aerial mountain's head,
Chas'd by the hounds, shoots down the hanging
With speed impetuous to the vale below; [brow
When on the toils the furious monster flies,
O'er his bent back the starting bristles rise;
Stopp'd and entangled, now he foams with ire;
Now his red eye-balls glare with living fire.
The clam'rous hunters, cautious to engage,
With shouts and darts a distant combat wage;
He turns, he grinds his teeth; and, void of fear,
Shakes his huge sides, and sheds the scatter'd war.
Thus (though inflam'd with just revenge they stand)

None dare engage the monarch hand to hand;
But from afar their missile darts they fling,
And with loud shouts provoke the raging king.

Acron, of Argive race, for fame had fled
The joys of love, and left the spousal bed.
In purple plumes he tow'r'd, with gaudy pride,
Grac'd with the favours of his beauteous bride.
The Tuscan king beheld him from afar,
Scatt'ring the ranks, and glitt'ring through the war.

As when a lion, that, with hunger bold,
Roams grimly round the fences of the fold,
Spies a tall goat, the chief of all the train,
Or beamy stag, high-stalking o'er the plain;
His horrid mane he rears, he runs, he flies,
Expands his jaws, and darts upon the prize;
The prize he rears, with a tremendous roar,
And, growling, rages in a foam of gore:
Thus, on th' embattled foes, Mezentius flew,
And Acron in the pride of beauty slew.
His gushing blood the broken dart distains,
And, as he falls, he spurns the hostile plains.

Now round the king the growing slaughter
Who scorn'd to kill Orodes as he fled; [spread,
But, with preventive speed, Mezentius ran,
Turn'd short, and bravely fought him, man to man;
Then press'd him with his foot and lance; and cries;

" Behold, behold, my friends, no vulgar prize!
Lo! vanquish'd by your king, the great Orodes
A sudden transport fires the martial train, [dies.¹³
And shouts of triumph echo round the plain.
When thus the dying chief: " Insulting foe!
Soon, like my own, shall thy proud head lie low.
Vengeance is on the wing; black fate is nigh;
And here, e'en here, art thou fore-doom'd to die!"
" However, die thou first!" the king reply'd,
(All grimly smiling with disdainful pride;)

" And let your boasted Jove for me provide."
Then from the corse the bloody dart he drew;
The shades of death came hov'ring o'er his view.
Slow, in dim mists, the heavy vapours rise,
And in eternal slumber seal his eyes.

Now by brave Cædicus, Alcathous fell;
Hydaspes sunk beneath Sacrotor's steel;
His weighty spear the valiant Rapo threw,
And mighty Ornes and Parthenius slew.
Clonius the next by Neptune's son was slain,
And Eriastes press'd the bloody plain:

This, on the ground, the godlike hero kill'd;
That, his mad coursar cast upon the field.

Next, Tuscan Valerus, as Agis strode
Before the ranks, thy jav'lin drank his blood.
Thy falchion, Salius, pierc'd Atrouius' side;
The hapless victor by Nealeces dy'd,
Skill'd or to dart the lance, or bend the bow,
And reach from far the unsuspecting foe.
The god of war, in equal balance, held
The rage, the woes, and slaughters of the field.
Fix'd on the spot, the troops disdain to fly;
By turns, the vanquish'd and the victors die.
From realms of light, th' immortal pow'rs inclin'd
Their eyes, and mourn the havoc of mankind!
Here Heav'n's imperial queen, and Venus, there,
Lean forward from the sky to view the war;
While pale Tisiphone, with dire alarms, [arms.
Inflames the rising rage, and calls the hosts to

Now his vast spear aloft Mezentius held;
Haughty and high he moves, and blazes o'er the
So through mid ocean when Orion strides, [field.
His bulk enormous tow'rs above the tides:
So, when he grasps in his tremendous hand
Some mountain oak, and stalks along the laud,
Above the clouds his ample shoulders rise,
And his huge stature heaves into the skies!

Æneas mark'd the hero from afar,
And through the ranks rush'd furious to the war.
The hero stands collected in his might,
Defies the godlike prince, and waits the fight.
Soon as he saw the mighty chief advance
Within due distance of his flying lance:

"Now, now, my spear, and conqu'ring hand," he
" (Mezentius owns no deity beside!) [cry'd,
Assist my vows; succeed my martial toils,
To strip you pirate of his bloody spoils.
Thou, Lausus! thou, Æneas' arms shalt bear,
A living trophy of my deeds in war!"

He said, and hurl'd the jav'lin o'er the field,
That sung and glanc'd obliquely from the shield;
But held its furious course, and, turning wide,
Drove deep the point in great Antores' side:
The great Antorc's (an illustrious name)
Evander's guest, from ancient Argos came;
Late in th' Arcadian court he made abode;
Alcides' former friend, and partner of the god:
But now, unhappy!—by another's wound
He bleeds, he falls, he welters on the ground;
And, while he cast to Heav'n his swimming eyes,
Turns his last thoughts on Argos, as he dies!

Next, his strong lance the pious Trojan cast;
Swift through the shining orb the jav'lin pass'd,
Through linen plaits, a triple brazen fold,
And three bull-hides, around the buckler roll'd;
Deep pierc'd his groin, and there its fury stay'd—
The streaming blood the chief with joy survey'd;
Then from the sheath the shining falchion drew,
And furious on the wounded monarch flew.

This sees brave Lausus, his illustrious son,
Fears for his danger, and forgets his own;
And, while grief, rage, and love, his bosom fire,
Sighs, weeps, and runs, to disengage his sire.
Here then, if future times will credit give,
Thy praise, heroic youth! shall ever live;
Poor, pity'd youth!—in life's first early bloom,
Snatch'd from the world, and hurry'd to the tomb!
Bucumber'd by the spear that pierc'd the shield,
With tir'd, slow steps, the monarch quita the field:
Forth springs the son against the Trojan lord,
And rush'd beneath the long-descending sword,

Flies to prevent the meditated blow,
And guard his bleeding father from the foe.
His friends, with darts, the prince at distance ply,
And with their loud applauses read the sky.
The hero rages, as the jav'lins play'd,
And lies collected in the buckler's shade.

As when the rattling hail, impetuous, pours,
And the wide field smokes with the rushing show'rs,
To the safe shelving banks the swains repair,
Or to some cavern'd rock; and, shelter'd there,
Wait till the furious tempest break away;
And then renew the labours of the day.
So, ply'd by show'rs of jav'lins from afar,
The chief sustain'd the tempest of the war
On his broad shield; and thus the godlike man
Exhorts, and begs, and threatens, the youth in vain;
"Whither, to death, ah! whither wouldst thou
run,

And tempt a hand far mightier than thy own?
Ah! yet, poor Lausus! from the field remove;
You fly to ruin, urg'd by filial love."

He warn'd in vain! the youth the prince defies;
Till all his dreadful wrath began to rise;
The fates prepare their shears; the Dardan lord
Unsheaths, and whirls aloft the thund'ring sword:
The thund'ring sword, with all his force apply'd,
Furious he drove, and bury'd in his side.
The thrilling point, with boundless rage impress'd,
Pierc'd the light buckler, and the golden vest,
Which his fond mother's hands embroider'd o'er;
And his fair breast was stain'd with crimson gore:
The pensive spirit leaves the corse behind,
Flies to the shades, and mixes with the wind.

But, when the pious godlike prince of Troy
Saw the pale visage of the hapless boy
In death's last agonies; a groan he drew
Deep from his heart, nor cou'd he bear the view.
His soul now melts with stern Mezentius' woe,
And in the wretched sire forgets the foe.
Then to the boy he reach'd his hand, and said,
"To worth like thine, what honours can be paid?
Lamented youth, too early lost! receive
The solc reward a gen'rous foe can give:
Lo! I restore thy arms, unhappy boy!
Thy sword and buckler, late thy only joy:
Yet, Lausus, ev'n in death, be this your pride,
That by the great Æneas' hand you dy'd."
Then round the corse he calls his social train,
And rears himself the warrior from the plain.
But ah! how chang'd!—with blood disfigur'd o'er;
And his fair tresses all deform'd with gore!

Meantime, retir'd to Tyber's flow'ry bounds,
In the cool stream to bathe his glowing wounds,
The wretched father (father now no more!)
In sullen sorrow rested on the shore;
Lean'd on an oak, with pain and anguish stung,
And from a bough his brazen helmet hung.
His heavier arms lie scatter'd o'er the plain;
Round the sad monarch wait the duteous train:
As (o'er his breast his hoary beard declin'd)
The chief enjoy'd the freshness of the wind;
Much of his Lausus, asks the pensive sire;
Sends oft in vain, and warns him to retire.
When lo! his soldiers bear him on a shield,
Pale, stretch'd in death, and breathless, from the field.

Deep in his side appear'd the grisly wound;
His groaning friends attend, and mourn around.

Far off, that peal of groans the father knew,
And dust o'er all his hoary locks he threw;

FO Heav'n, in agonies of anguish, spread
His hands; and, hov'ring o'er, embrac'd the dead:
"And oh! can life" he cry'd, "such pleasure give?"

And bleeds my Lausus, that his sire may live?
Have I then lost thy life, and sav'd my own?
Sav'd by the death of my dear murder'd son!
In my defence could such a son expire?
A son like him, for such a guilty sire!
Now, now, I feel an exile's woe; the smart
Of this deep wound lies raging at my heart!
'Tis keen, 'tis sharp, 'tis terrible at last!
Nor half the bitterness of life is past!
On thy fair fame, my son, I left a stain,
Driv'n by my people from my native reign;
To them, to thee, my murder'd child! I owe
All, all the deaths such guilt shou'd undergo.
And yet I live, and see the golden light!
But soon will leave it, for I loath the sight!"

This said; with rage and valour boiling high,
The monarch rear'd him on his halting thigh;
And tho' his wound retards him in his speed,
He calls impatient for the warrior steed;
The steed, his pride, his solace, and delight,
That bore him still victorious from the fight.
Then, as he droop'd, and hung his pensive head,
He clapp'd the gen'rous horse, and thus he said:
"Rhoebus, we long have liv'd (if length there be
In mortal life)—'tis now too long for me!
Soon shalt thou bear me from the bloody fray,
And bring Æneas' head and spoils away;
With thy lov'd lord on yon detested plain,
Avenge my son, my darling Lausus slain,
And share together in the dire debate,
One common conquest, or one common fate.
For thou wilt scorn, I trust, the rule abhorr'd,
And the base burden, of a Phrygian lord."
This said; the hero mounts the gen'rous horse,
And to the foe directs his furious course.
High on his head the crested helm he wore,
And in his hands the steely jav'lins bore.
His conscious valour, his recoiling shame,
Grief, wrath, and fury, set his soul on flame.
Thrice on Æneas' name he calls from far,
Who hears the challenge, and accepts the war.
"So may great Jove, and he, the god of light, Inspire thy soul, to stand the proffer'd fight!"
The hero cry'd; then made his bold advance,
Fierce o'er the field, and shook the flaming lance.
"And why," reply'd the king, "this vaunting strain?"

The father perish'd, when the son was slain!
Strike then, and use thy present fortune:—
Death, and the fabled gods, I scorn alike. [strike—
No more—I came to die; but first bestow
This parting present on the murder'd foe."
Swift as the word, the vengeful dart he sped;
Lance after lance, in swift succession, fled;
Then, in a spacious ring, he rode the field,
And vainly ply'd th' impenetrable shield;
Thrice round the chief in rapid circles flew,
And at each flight a pointed jav'lin threw.
Collected in himself, the hero bears,
On the broad shield, a rising grove of spears.

But now the prince, impatient of delay,
So long to tug dart after dart away,
Prest and fatigu'd with such unequal fight,
(At length determin'd to display his might)
Springs forth; and aims his jav'lin's furious course
Betwixt the temples of the fiery horse.

Stung to the brain the horse begins to rear,
Paw with his plunging feet, and lash the air.
Headlong at last, and maddening with the steel,
Full on the shoulder of his lord he fell.
The hosts with clamours tempest all the skies.
With his drawn sword the fierce Æneas flies:
"And where is now the lofty strain," he cry'd,
"Of stern Mezentius, and the scornful pride?"
With half-recover'd life, the king replies
(And, as he speaks, stares wildly at the skies;)
"Why, why, insulting foe, this waste of breath
To souls determin'd, and resolv'd on death?
In that fond hope to battle did I fly;
And fought far less to conquer than to die.
My son, when slaughter'd in the martial strife,
Made no such contract for his father's life;
A worthless gift to live at thy command!
Nor wou'd I take it from his murder's hand!
But, if a vanquish'd foe this grace may crave,
Oh! let me find the refuge of a grave!
Too well my subjects' vengeance have I known;
Then guard my corpse; and lay me by my son.
Grant, grant that pleasure, e'er I yield my breath,
To share his dear society in death!"
This said; the willing warrior to the foe
Extends his throat, and courts the fatal blow.
The sanguine stream his radiant armour dy'd;
The soul came rushing in the purple tide.

VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

BOOK XI.

ARGUMENT.

ÆNEAS erects a trophy of the spoils of Mezentius, grants a truce for burying the dead, and sends home the body of Pallas with great solemnity. Lativius calls a council to propose offers of peace to Æneas, which occasions great animosities between Turnus and Drances. In the meantime there is a sharp engagement of the horse; wherein Camilla signalizes herself; is killed; and the Latin troops are entirely defeated.

Now, o'er the waves, Aurora rais'd her head:
The chief (though eager to inter the dead,
And to the wretched father's arms to send
The relics of his dear departed friend)
First to the gods discharg'd a victor's vows,
And bar'd au oak of all her verdant boughs.
High on a lofty point the trunk he plac'd,
Which with Mezentius' radiant arms he grac'd;
The shiver'd lances that the monarch bore,
The plummy crest that dropp'd with recent gore;
The cuirass next; transfixt in ev'ry part
By the keen jav'lin, or the flying dart.
Then on the left, the brazen shield was ty'd;
And the dread sword hung glitt'ring at the side.
Thus the rich spoils he rais'd aloft in air,
A trophy sacred to the god of war.
Then to his arms, a glad triumphant train,
Assembled round their chief, the prince began:
"Dismiss your fears; the high exploit is o'er;
The great, the stern Mezentius is no more!"

Lo! where an omen of success he stands!
 The glorious trophy of your leader's hands!
 When Heav'n permits, our standard to display,
 To yon proud town, intrepid, break your way;
 And let your eager hopes, devoid of care,
 Fore-run the happy fortunes of the war.
 Now let our slaughter'd friends in earth be laid,
 The last, last honours we can pay the dead!
 On those brave souls be fun'ral rites bestow'd,
 Who bought this country with their dearest blood:
 But first the cold remains of Pallas send
 To his sad father, our unhappy friend;
 Since the dire chance of war, in early bloom,
 Condemns the valiant hero to the tomb!"

Then to the tent his hasty course he sped,
 Where old Acetes sits, and guards the dead.
 Evander's squire of old, in fields he shone:
 A far less prosp'rous comrade to the son!
 His friends, his soldiers, and the menial train,
 With tears bemoan the blooming hero slain.
 With lamentable cries, and hair unbound,
 The Trojan dames in order stand around.
 Soon as Æneas past the lofty door,
 With louder groans the warrior they deplore:
 They beat their breasts; tears gush from ev'ry eye;
 The rich pavilions to their shrieks reply.
 His head now rais'd; the pious prince of Troy
 Saw the pale features of the hapless boy;
 Saw the wide wound amidst his ivory breast;
 And, with a flood of tears, the dead address'd:
 "Lamented youth! could fortune then intend
 To bless my arms, but rob me of my friend?
 My friend, I hop'd, (but ah! that hope was vain!)
 Wou'd share the glories of my op'ning reign,
 And, gay with conquest, glad his sire again.
 Far other promise to that sire I pass'd!
 Nor thought thy first, first warfare was thy last:
 Then, when he sent me to my high command,
 The good old king, at parting, grasp'd my hand,
 And told, with all a friend's and father's care,
 With what fierce nations we must wage the war.
 Now for his son, perhaps, he loads the shrine,
 And decks the fane of ev'ry pow'r divine;
 While, with vain pomp and many an empty rite,
 We bring him back his Pallas from the fight,
 Pale, stretch'd in death; and, in his latest hour,
 Disclaim'd by ev'ry ruthless heav'nly pow'r!"

"Now, for these triumphs, must thy mournful
 See the sad fun'ral of thy son go by! [eye
 Such, hapless monarch, are the spoils we send!
 Such, the vain boast and promise of thy friend!
 And yet he fell, by Turnus' arms oppress'd,
 His wounds all fair, and honest, on the breast!
 Better, than to prolong by shame his breath!—
 Then hadst thou curs'd thy age, and wish'd for death:

Ah! what a chief have our confed'rate host,
 And what a friend hast thou, Acænius, lost!"

Thus, while a stream of tears he shed in vain,
 He bids them raise the body of the slain.
 A thousand warriors from the host he chose,
 To wait the pomp, and share the father's woes,
 The due funereal honours to complete;
 A slender solace for a loss so great!
 Soft bending twigs they weave; with care they spread

The swelling foliage o'er the verdant bed,
 And decent on the bier dispose the dead.
 There like a flow'r he lay, with beauty crown'd,
 Pluck'd by some lovely virgin from the ground:

The root no more the mother earth supplies;
 Yet still th' unfaded colour charms the eye.
 Two rich embroider'd robes Æneas brought,
 Robes, which of old the Tyrian princes wrought.
 One, round the body of the youth he spread,
 His last, last gift! and one adorn'd his head,
 Drawn o'er his face, that when the flames aspire,
 With the fair locks may feed the crackling fire.
 Next, in a line, darts, helms, and steeds, appear,
 Won by himself; the prizes of the war.
 Then with their pinion'd hands the captives came,
 Unhappy youths!—devoted to the flame!
 With fair inscriptions of the foes he slew,
 The noblest chiefs, his glorious trophies drew.
 Supported by his friends, with woes oppress'd,
 Acetes rends his locks, and beats his breast;
 This moment, pauses; then, in borrow drow'd,
 Breaks from their arms, and grovels on the ground.
 All cover'd o'er with blood, succeeds a train
 Of hostile cars, in honour of the slain.
 Stripp'd of his trappings, and his head declin'd,
 Æthon, his gen'rous warrior-horse, behind,
 Moves with a solemn, slow, majestic pace;
 And the big tears run rolling down his face.
 These, the young hero's lance and helmet bear;
 The rest, the victor seiz'd, the spoils of war.
 The Trojans, Tuscan, and Arcadian train
 Trail their inverted jav'lins on the plain.
 The pomp all past; thus good Æneas said,
 With a deep groan, low bending o'er the dead;
 "Hail, mighty spirit, hail!—with dire alarms,
 The fates recall us to the rage of arms,
 And to new scenes of woe thy friends compel:—
 Farewel, brave prince, a long and last farewell."
 This said; the mournful chief, without delay,
 Back to the lofty ramparts bent his way.

Now from the Latian court a train were sped,
 With wreaths of verdant olives on their head;
 Who ask a truce, to search th' ensanguin'd plain,
 And decent in their graves dispose the slain:
 Beg, that his wrath in conquest may be laid,
 Nor wage a war, relentless, with the dead;
 But spare their nation, late by social ties,
 By plighted love, and friendship, his allies.

The godlike hero grants their just request;
 And in these words his gen'rous soul express'd:
 "What fate, ye Latians, urg'd your minds so far,
 To shun our friendship, for this wasteful war:
 Glad would I grant the truce, you ask for those Who dy'd in fight, to my surviving foes.—
 Had not the fates assign'd these realms before,
 I had not sail'd to your Hesperian shore;
 I wage the war but in my own defence;
 Not with your people, but your perjurd prince.
 First, from his league, perfidious he withdrew;
 Then to proud Turnus' arms for refuge flew.
 But let proud Turnus stand ('tis just and right)
 The terrors of this arm in single fight.
 Would he repel the Trojans from the land?
 Ev'n let him meet their gen'ral hand to hand!
 Soon would be known, in combat when we strive,
 Which Heav'n ordains to perish, or survive.
 Go then, and burn your slaughter'd friends, that spread

The purple fields; I war not with the dead."
 Struck with the gen'rous speech, they stood amaz'd,

And on each other, fixt in wonder, gaz'd;
 When Drances, senior of the rev'rend train,
 Th' inveterate foe of Turnus, thus began:

"How shall my tongue so great a prince proclaim,
Whom fame renews; whose deeds transcend his fame!

Whose force and wisdom, or in war or peace,
Thought scarce can equal; and no words express!
Thy answer will we soon report, and bring
To thy alliance our deluded king.
And let rash Turnus other courts implore,
His sinking cause and int'rests to restore;
While we will lend our lab'ring hands with joy,
To raise this fated town, this second Troy."

He said; the rest assent with equal praise,
And fix the truce for twelve succeeding days.
Meantime the Latins and the Trojans rove
Safe o'er the hills, and mingle in the grove.
Now the tough ash the sounding axes ply;
Th' unrooted pines turn upward to the sky:
The wedge divides, with many a vig'rous stroke,
The scented cedar, and the pond'rous oak.
And, nodding o'er the cars, (a mighty load!)
The length'ning elms roll lumbering down the road.

Now fame, the messenger of sorrow, bears
The death of Pallas to the father's ears;
That on triumphant wings with pride, before,
The glorious tidings of his conquests bore. [stand
Straight rushing, through the gates, the people
In ranks, a fun'ral torch in every hand.

The mingling blaze a dreadful splendour yields,
Flames to the skies, and lightens all the fields.
The Phrygian train approach, a solemn show!
And join the mourners in the public woe.

Loud shriek the matrons, as the corpse appears,
And the whole city seems one scene of tears.
But nought the wretched father can restrain:
He breaks, all frantic, through the parting train;
Then on the bier his aged body threw,
And kiss'd his son, as to the corpse he grew:
While from his eyes the gushing sorrows flow,
Fixt in a long dumb agony of woe.

A thousand things in vain he strove to say,
But scarce could these for anguish find their way:

"Is this thy promise then, my child, with care
And cool reserve, to mingle in the war?

Too well, alas! I knew how honour's charms
Wou'd fire thy youth to seek the rough alarms!
In these thy first essays, and rudiments of arms!
Oh! dire essays!—too fond was thy delight
To learn the dreadful lessons of the fight!

Where now are all my vows (my Pallas) where?
Ah! the stern gods grew deaf to ev'ry pray'r!
How blest art thou, dear partner of my bed,
Free from this stroke, among the happier dead!

Thee, Heav'n in mercy snatch'd to shades below;
Thee, death deliver'd from this scene of woe!

I, in the dregs of age, O cruel doom!
Usurp on nature, and defraud the tomb;
Still live, and drag a load of sorrows on!

Live—and (more terrible!) survive my son!
Me, in the battle, if the foes had slain,

When, with my force, I join'd the Trojan train,
I (as I should) had perish'd; and this state
On the dead father, not the son, shou'd wait!

Nor yet will I impute my murder'd boy
To you, O warriors! or my leagues with Troy:

'Twas not your crime, my friends, he fell so young;
No!—'tis the father's, who has liv'd so long.

With his slain son to blast his closing eye,
And wish, in bitterness of soul, to die.

Yet, though before his time the fates requir'd
My dear, dear boy; he gloriously expir'd!

Yet to the destin'd shore his friends he led,
And pil'd the ground with mountains of the dead:
Ye gods! I'm satisfy'd—he perish'd well!

His father thanks you; for in fight he fell!
Nor will I add more honours to the boy,

Than those design'd him by the prince of Troy,
Those, the bold Tuscan hosts and heroes gave,

To wait the corpse triumphant to the grave:
With those, his own bright trophies be his share,

Trophies of chiefs, he vanquish'd in the war.
Ah! to thy years, proud Turnus, had he ran,

'Till age confirm'd the hero in the man,
Ev'n thou hadst stood conspicuous to the sight,

The most distinguish'd trophy of the fight.
But why with tears so long have I with-held

(Wretch that I am!) the soldiers from the field?
Go—tell your prince, that yet I breathe below,

And bear the world, a spectacle of woe!
(Robb'd of my age's pride, my only joy!)

'Tis, that I wait his vengeance for my boy,
His vengeance on proud Turnus' guilty head,

Due to the sad survivor and the dead.
'Tis all, himself, or fortune, now can give;

'Tis for that only, I endure to live.
Life has no joys for me; but I should go

Pleas'd with these tidings to my boy below!"

And now, to wretched men, the dawning ray
Restor'd their round of labours, and the day.

The Tuscan chief and Trojan prince command,
To raise the fun'ral structures on the strand.

Then to the piles, as ancient rites ordain,
Their friends convey the relics of the slain.

From the black flames the sullen vapours rise,
And smoke in curling volumes to the skies.

The foot thrice compass the high-blazing pyres;
Thrice move the horse, in circles, round the fire,

Their tears, as loud they howl at ev'ry round,
Dim their bright arms, and trickle to the ground.

A peal of groans succeeds; and Heav'n rebounds
To the mixt cries, and trumpet's martial sounds.

Some, in the flames, the wheels and bridles throw,
The swords and helmets of the vanquish'd foe.

Some, the known shields their brethren bore in vain,
And unsuccessful jav'lines of the slain.

Now round the piles the bellowing oxen bled,
And bristly swine; in honour of the dead,

The fields they drove; the fleecy flocks they slew,
And on the greedy flames the victims threw.

Around their friends the pensive warriors stand,
And watch the dying fires along the strand;

Many a long look they cast with streaming eyes,
And wait till dewy night had spangled o'er the skies.

Nor with less toil the busy Latian train
Erect unnumber'd structures for the slain;

Some, to their graves, with pious care commend;
Some to their native coast, and cities, send.

Some, of distinguish'd rank and high renown,
Are borne with fun'ral trophies to the town;

The rest, unhonour'd, to the fires they yield;
The huge promiscuous carnage of the field!

From the thick piles, the streaming flames arise,
Blaze o'er the fields, and kindle half the skies.

When the third morn disclos'd the dawning day,
They search'd the heaps, and bore the bones

away:
In the warm ashes their remains they found,

Quench'd with their tears and bury'd in the ground;
Then o'er the relics rais'd a lofty mound.

But more tumultuous shrieks and clamours ring
Through the wide town, and palace of the king:

Boys, mothers, wives, and sisters, there complain
 For fathers, children, lords, and brothers slain.
 All with one gen'ral voice the war abhorr'd,
 And the dire nuptials of the Daunian lord.
 "Let him, whose boundless and ambitious pride
 Aspires to gain a crown, and regal bride,
 Let Turnus" (they exclaim) "in arms appear,
 And with his single sword decide the war."
 This Drances still inflames; and adds, with spite,
 His godlike foe has dar'd him to the fight.
 But Turnus to his side a number draws,
 Who warmly plead the blooming hero's cause:
 He stands supported by his former fame;
 And the queen's favour shades his injur'd name.
 'Midst these debates the pensive envoys bring
 The final answer of th' Ætolian king—
 Nor pray'rs, nor gifts, avail; but all the cost,
 With all the fruitless embassy, was lost.
 New succours must be sought; or peace implor'd,
 In terms submissive, of the Trojan lord.
 The Latian king, surrounded by his foes,
 Sinks in despair, and bends beneath his woes.
 The wrath of Heav'n, the recent toils, that spread
 The fields o'ercharg'd and peopled with the dead,
 Point out the Trojan chief, ordain'd by fate
 To sway the sceptre of the Latian state.

He calls a council; at the sov'reign's call
 The peers, assembled, crowd the regal hall:
 There, midst the rev'rend fathers of the state,
 With mournful looks the hoary monarch sat;
 The monarch bids th' ambassadors report,
 Distinct, their answer from th' Ætolian court.
 Then, while attention held the solemn train,
 With rev'rence due, sage Venulus began:

"Ye peers, a length of lands and perils past,
 We saw the royal Diomed at last;
 And touch'd, with wonder and respectful joy,
 The mighty hand that rais'd imperial Troy.
 There, blest with ease, the happy victor builds
 A second Argos in the Gargan fields.
 Straight to the court admitted, we begun,
 And in submissive terms address'd the throne;
 Present our gifts, our names and land disclose;
 What war requir'd his aid; and who his foes.
 When, with soft accents and a pleasing look,
 Thus, in return, the gracious monarch spoke:

"Ye blest Ausonians! blest, from times of old,
 By righteous Saturn, with an age of gold!
 What madness rous'd you now with vain alarms,
 From long hereditary peace, to arms?
 All, all our Argive kings, who dar'd employ
 Their swords to violate the tow'rs of Troy
 (Those chiefs I pass that under Ilium dy'd,
 Or Simois whelm'd beneath his roaring tide)
 Toss'd round the world, in ev'ry distant clime,
 Aton the guilt of that presumptuous crime.
 From that dire war our desp'rate course we bore,
 Each driven by tempests on a diff'rent shore.
 Such scenes of sorrow not a foe could hear,
 Nor Priam's self relate without a tear.
 This truth Minerva's vengeful storm can tell,
 When on Caphareus' rocks Oileus fell.
 The Spartan lord¹, a banish'd wretch was hurl'd
 To Proteus' pillars², in a distant world.
 Ulysses, on the dread Sicilian coast,
 Saw the grim Cyclops; and his comrades lost.
 From Crete, Idomeneus, an exile, fled;
 In his own realm, unhappy Pyrrhus bled.

To Libyan shores, the Locrian squadrons fly;
 To flaming suns, that scorch the mid-day sky.
 The king of kings³, ill-fated! lost his life,
 Stabb'd in his palace, by his trait'rous wife.
 There the great victor of all Asia bled;
 The proud adult'rer mounts his throne and bed.
 Then, what long woes were mine? by Heav'n deny'd

To see my native realm, andauteous bride?
 For that blest sight, sad omens shock my eye;
 Transform'd to birds, my comrades mount the sky,
 Oh dire inflictions!—Now they wander o'er
 The fishy floods, or scream along the shore.
 From that curst moment all these woes were due,
 When, fir'd with rage, against the gods I flew;
 And, in the fight, my daring lance profan'd
 (Mad as I was) immortal Venus' hand.
 When Ilium fell, my vengeance then was o'er;
 And with her ruins will I war no more.
 My soul, now calm, no longer dwells with joy
 On those misfortunes which we brought on Troy.
 Bear back the presents, and the gifts you bring,
 ('Tis far, far safer) to the Trojan king.
 For well, too well, the mighty chief I know,
 And met in rigid fight the godlike foe;
 Dreadful in arms he tow'r'd before the host;
 Heav'n's! with how fierce a spring the lance he toss'd!

How, like a whirlwind, hurl'd it o'er the field!
 How high he shook the sword, and rais'd the pos-s'rous shield!

Had Troy produc'd two more of equal fame,
 Their conduct, courage, strength, and worth, the same;

All Greece had trembled thro' her hundred states;
 Troy, with a tide of war, had turn'd the fates;
 Pour'd o'er her plains, and thunder'd at her gates,
 His conqu'ring sword, and Hector's valiant hand,
 So long of old repell'd the Grecian band:
 Their single valour sav'd their native wall,
 And ten whole years suspended Ilium's fall.
 Æneas shone his equal in the field;
 But in his rev'rence to the gods excell'd.
 Make peace, my Latian friends; but oh! forbear
 To tempt so terrible a foe to war.—
 This is the sum, great king, of what he said,
 And this th' advice of royal Diomed."

Thus, of their charge, the legates made report;
 Straight ran a mingled murmur through the court.
 So when by rocks the torrents are withstood,
 In deep hoarse murmurs rolls th' imprison'd flood;
 Beats on the banks; and, with a solemn sound,
 Works, foams, and runs in circling eddies round.

Soon as the noise was silenc'd from the throne,
 (Heav'n first invok'd) the hoary prince begun;
 "I wish, O rev'rend fathers, we had sat,
 Before these perils, on th' endanger'd state:
 Far better than a council now to call,
 When Troy's embody'd pow'rs surround our wall!
 An host of heroes to the fight we dare,
 And wage with demigods a fatal war.
 No toils their fiery ardour can restrain;
 Though vanquish'd, straight they fly to arms
 again.

Our hopes of great Tydides' aid are flown;
 And now must centre in ourselves alone:
 Nor these how slender, need I here relate,
 Since your own eyes behold our dang'rous state.

³ Agamemnon.

ot but, I grant, all fought with all their pow'r;
rms, strength, and courage, could perform no
more.

the dire war has labour'd ev'ry hand,
With the whole force and numbers of the land,
ut still in vain our efforts have we try'd;
eav'n fights for Troy, and combats on her side.
hen hear attentive what my thoughts suggest—length of lands, far-stretching to the west, gainst Sicania, near the Tyber, lies;
There, high in air, the tow'ring hills arise.
hese tracts, th' Auruncians and Rutulians plough, nd feed their flocks along the bending brow.
hese, with their woods, the Trojans shall possess,
nd both the nations join in leagues of peace.
ince such their wish, ev'n let the warlike hand
aise a new town, and settle in the land.
ut would they leave our Latian shores again,
nd for some other region cross the main,
'twice ten strong vessels let us build, or more
For thick the forests grow along the shore):
he form and number let themselves assign;
he work, the rigging, and the cost, be mine.
et more;—with peaceful olive in their hand,
o hundred peers and princes of the land,
o firm the sacred league, in solemn state,
With ample presents on their prince shall wait;
ich gifts of gold, and polish'd ivory bear,
he robe of purple, and the regal chair.
e peers! with freedom these high points debate;
peak, speak your minds, and save the sinking
state."

Then Drances rose, a proud distinguish'd name,
With envy fir'd at Turnus' spreading fame.
his mother's blood illustrious splendours grace,
ly birth as gen'rous as his sire was base.
otent and rich, in factious counsels skill'd;
told at the board; a coward in the field;
oud he harang'd the court, and, as he rose,
hese vile reproaches on the warrior throws:
"What you propose, great monarch, is so plain
o all the synod, that replies are vain.
ut none dares speak; though all can understand he sole expedient our affairs demand.
et him, by whose unhappy conduct led,
or whose curs'd cause, so many chiefs have bled,
o many princes of our land lie low,
ill our whole city wears one face of woe,
him, who pretends to storm a host, but flies,
While the proud boastful coward braves the skies;
et Turnus (for I must, I will, pursue he public good, though death is in my view)
rant that high favour to this rev'rend train,
At least, of these our suff'rings to complain!
o king! to those rich gifts design'd before or the great Trojan, add one present more:
ne that your dutious senate must request,
nd one he values more than all the rest,
y fear or violence no longer sway'd
ive to so brave a prince th' imperial maid;
y that sure pledge a lasting peace obtain;
Or know, the peace, without the pledge, is vain.
ut should our king so bold a step disclaim,
w'd by the terrors of his rival's name;
o dreadful Turnus we prefer our pray'r
For his permission, to bestow the fair,
And to our prince and country to restore their rights, and bluster on the throne no more.
Why, for thy pride, our lives should we expose,
o fatal chief! the source of all our woes?"

'Tis a destructive war; but, to be free
From these long ills, we humbly sue to thee;
To thee, for peace are all our pray'rs apply'd;
And, the sole pledge of peace, the royal bride.
And first, myself, thy fancy'd foe (a name
I scorn alike to own, or to disclaim)
Ev'n I, a suppliant, beg thy grace, to spare
Our bleeding country, and forsake the war.
In pity, prince, this wond'rous favour yield:
'Tis time, when routed, to renounce the field!
Too long have we bemoan'd our slaughter'd hosts,
Our lands dispeopled, and our wasted coasts.
If love of glory has thy soul possess'd,
If fame inspires, or courage warms thy breast;
If none can please thee, but a princess—go—
Meet in the listed field thy gen'rous foe.
Sure! if our worthy chief a queen can gain,
For us—no matter—we may well be slain!
Unwept, unbury'd; to the fowls resign'd;
The world's last dregs; the refuse of mankind!
We, worthless souls! were born for him alone,
And, from our necks, he mounts into the throne!
But go, proud warrior, if one spark remains
Of courage in thy soul, and warms thy veins;
Go—meet thy rival—answer his demand—
Go—fight the Trojan hero, hand to hand.
Yet the vain boaster soon, I trust, will fly,
Nor stand the terrors of that deathful eye!"

These scornful words the haughty youth engage
In all the fiery violence of rage;
Then, while a groan of indignation broke
Deep from his heart, the wrathful hero spoke:
"Drances, that tongue a stream of words can yield;

Then, when our hands are wanted in the field,
First in debate! but sure 'tis safer far
With words to flourish, than to wage the war;
To deal in long harangues, while walls enclose
Thee and thy fears; and guard thee from the Remov'd from danger, you can talk aloud, [foes.
And mouth and bellow to the listening crowd.
Proceed then, dastard, in thy wonted strain;
Throw forth a storm of eloquence again:
With all thy malice, all thy art, declaim,
And brand with cowardice my injur'd fame!
Since the full triumphs of the day are thine,
And thy own trophies stand as high as mine!
Try, try, this hour, thy courage; see! the foes
Advance, approach us, and our walls enclose:
Lo! in the battle all the troops are join'd!
Why halts the fiery Drances yet behind?
Shall all thy valour, wretch! consist so long
In those swift feet, and in that swifter tongue?
I routed, monster! and compell'd to fly?—
Who but thyself could forge that shameless lye?
Say, was I routed on yon deathful plain,
When Tyber's streams run purple to the main?
Where, wretch, didst thou sit brooding o'er thy fear,

When Pallas bled beneath my vengeful spear?
When, all in heaps, his vanquish'd troops retir'd
Before this arm, or round their lord exquir'd
Or where?—when both the giant brethren fell;
When thousands more my falchion plung'd to Hell
In one victorious day, tho' compass'd round
With foes, and press'd within the hostile mound?
All, all, but thou, stood witness to the sight!
Nor didst thou dare look out upon the fight!
'Tis a destructive war—Go, dastard, go,
And preach that rule you practise to the foe;

At once avow that int'rest you embrace ;
 Go, and alarm our friends, our arms disgrace ;
 But praise and honour a twice-vanquish'd race.
 Tell, tell the crowd, how ev'ry Argive lord
 And monarch trembled at the Phrygian sword ;
 That Tydeus' son, that Peleus' baffled heir,
 Retir'd from Hector, nor could stand his war ;
 That Aus'lus himself, with sudden dread,
 When on his banks Æneas rais'd his head,
 Ran back, astonish'd, to his native bed.
 Such are his base suggestions, which appear
 False as himself ; or his dissembled fear
 Of my revenge : that vanity resign :
 Such blood shall never stain a sword like mine !
 Still may thy soul dismiss that idle care,
 Lurk in that abject breast, and tremble there !—
 But to resume, O king ! our great debate
 (Your dread commands) the solemn cares of state :
 Since on our arms no farther stress you lay,
 But lose at once all courage, with the day ;
 If, on this one defeat, our hopes are o'er ;
 If all our future prospects are no more ;
 God's ! let us raise these coward hands, to gain
 Peace, pardon, life ; and court the victor's chain !
 Yet, O ye princes ! did the least remains
 Of our bold fathers' courage warm our veins ;
 Those I should ever deem the truly great,
 Those, who in fields of battle brave their fate ;
 Those, who, to 'scape that shame, with glory fir'd,
 Bled ; and, at once triumphantly expir'd !
 But since a yet unbroken force we find,
 Confed'rate towns, and nations still behind ;
 Since Troy, so nobly by our troops withstood,
 Has bought her glory with her dearest blood ;
 Since, in their turn, the tempest threatens all ;
 Since, with the vanquish'd, the proud victors fall ;
 Why, on our first attempt, this low despair ?
 This fight, before the trumpet calls to war ?
 Time oft has succour'd an endanger'd state [fate] !
 By some new change, and snatch'd her from her
 Some kingdoms strange vicissitudes sustain ;
 Now crush'd by fortune, and now rais'd again !
 What though th' Ætolian monarch has deny'd
 To arm, and bring his forces to our side,
 Yet, with Messapus, on our part appears
 Tolumnius, still successful in the wars ;
 And many a glorious chief who lead their bands,
 Impatient for renown, from distant lands.
 Besides our Latian youth, of matchless might,
 With glory fir'd, and eager for the fight,
 The Volscian princess leads her valiant train,
 All sheath'd in brazen armour, to the plain.
 But since my foes and friends the fight demand ;
 The public peace no longer I withstand :
 Full well the way to victory I know ;
 In that high hope, I'll dare this dreaded foe,
 This new Achilles to the listed field,
 In all his heav'nly arms, and huge Vulcanian shield !
 Nor shall my deeds my ancestry disgrace,
 Nor once degen'rate from my glorious race.
 For you, O king ! for you, my friends, for all,
 Behold your self-devoted Turnus fall !
 Me does thy rival to the fight demand ?
 Grant, O ye gods ! the challenge still may stand ;
 Nor let you wretch, however you decide
 My fate, the danger or the fame divide.”
 Meantime Æneas, midst the high debate,
 Leads on his eager troops to seize the gate.
 The Trojan squadrons, and the Tuscan train,
 March from the flood, embattled, o'er the plain.

Before the godlike prince, the loud report
 Flew swift, and scar'd the city and the court ;
 The crowds all kindle at the dire alarms,
 And, fir'd with martial fury, fly to arms.
 The youth rush forth to war ; the sires complain,
 And strive to stop the growing rage in vain.
 From either side the different murmurs rise,
 And their tumultuous clamours rend the skies,
 So ring the forests with the feather'd brood,
 A thousand notes re-echoing through the wood :
 So scream the swans on fair Padusa's bounds ;
 And down the waters float the mingling sounds.
 “ Is this an hour, cool methods to devise,
 And talk of peace ? ” the fiery Turnus cries ;
 “ Declaim, ye dastards, talk, ye triflers, on,
 While the proud Trojan arms, and storms the town ! ”

He said ; and rush'd impetuous to the plain ;
 “ Lead, lead, brave Volusus, our Ardean train,
 And summon to the fight the Volscian force ;
 Thou, thou Messapus, range th' embattled host,
 And join great Coras, and his brother's care,
 Wide o'er the field to spread the op'ning war.
 All, all, be ready ; with divided pow'rs
 Guard you the passes ; you defend the tow'rs.
 Bend you to battle ; and, in firm array,
 Attend your gen'ral where he leads the way.”

The troops obey ; and, gath'ring at the call,
 Pour in tumultuous heaps to guard the wall.
 The pensive father of the Latian state
 (Confus'd, amaz'd) suspended the debate ;
 And his own conduct blames, that he resign'd
 To the queen's counsel his compliant mind ;
 On such wrong motives rais'd an impious war,
 And robb'd the Trojan of the promis'd fair.

To sink a trench before the gates, they run,
 Fix the strong pile, and roll the pound'rous stone.
 Alarm'd, and summon'd by the trumpet's sound,
 Boys, maids, and matrons, crowd the ramparts
 All aids these dire extremities demand, [round]
 Fire every heart, and strengthen ev'ry hand.

Now, with the queen, the matrons in a train
 Ride with large presents to Minerva's fane :
 Lavinia grac'd her side ; the royal fair ;
 The guiltless cause of this destructive war.
 To earth her streaming eyes the maid inclin'd ;
 In sad procession move the crowd behind.
 They burn rich odours at the sacred shrine,
 And seek, with suppliant pray'r, the pow'rs divine :
 “ Against the Phrygian pirate, lend thy aid,
 O queen of battles ! great Tritonian maid !
 Break, break his jav'lin ; let him meet his fate,
 And grind the dust beneath our lofty gate ! ”

Meanwhile in arms the furious Turnus shone !
 First, the brave hero drew the corslet on ;
 Thick scales of brass the costly work infold :
 His manly legs he cas'd in greaves of gold.
 Bare was his face ; and, with a martial pride,
 The starry sword hung glitt'ring at the side.
 Bold and exulting, with a dauntless air,
 The mighty chief anticipates the war ;
 In his fond hopes already has he won
 The field, before the battle is begun.
 The golden splendours, dazzling to the view,
 Flash'd from his arms, and lighten'd as he flew.

So the gay pamper'd steed, with loosen'd reins
 Breaks from the stall, and pours along the plains ;
 With large smooth strokes he rushes to the flood,
 Bathes his bright sides, and cools his fiery blood ;

Neighs as he flies; and, tossing high his head,
Bouffts the fair females in the distant mead;
At ev'ry motion, o'er his neck reclin'd,
Plays his redundant mane, and dances in the wind.

Him, at the gate, thus issuing to the plain,
Camilla meets with all her female train;
Leaps in a moment from her gen'rous steed;
The beauteous band alight with equal speed:
"Prince, if the bold and brave" (she cries) "may
Frustr their own valour for success in war; [dare
Myself, with these, will stand the Trojan force;
Myself will vanquish all the Tuscan horde.
Guard thou the city, be that province thine;
But let the dangers of the field be mine."

"O queen! thy country's pride," the chief
replies

[And on the dread virago fix'd his eyes);
"To such uncommon worth, heroic maid!
What thanks are due? what honours can be paid?
Since those, and death, you scorn with equal pride,
With me, the labours of the day divide:
The Trojan, bent his fraudful scheme to frame,
(In this my spies confirm the voice of fame)
Has sent, before, his active troops, who wield
The lighter arms, to scour along the open field.
Meantime himself, along the lofty crown
Of yon steep mountain, hastens to the town.
But, in the wood, an ambush I prepare,
And try to foil him in the wiles of war.
He lies imprison'd in that narrow strait;
And, if he moves, he rushes on his fate.
Go thou, supported by our Latian force,
Go—with spread ensigns meet the Tuscan horde,
Great Iybur's brothers, both renown'd in might,
With brave Messapus, wait thee to the fight.
Beneath thy care, shall march the martial band,
Fir'd by thy high example and command."
This said; each chief he rous'd to arms, and goes
With eager speed to circumvent the foe.

A winding vale there lay, within the shade
Of woods, by nature for an ambush made.
To this, a rough and slender passage led;
Above, a smooth and level plain was spread,
Unknown, and stretching o'er the mountain's head.
There safe, the soldier, to the left or right,
May dare th' ascending-war, and urge the fight;
Roll rocky fragments from the craggy brow,
And dash the pond'rous ruins on the foe.
Hither the prince (for well he knew the way)
Flew, seiz'd the post, and close in ambush lay.

But now Latonia, in th' ethereal sphere,
For her Camilla touch'd with anxious fear,
Beapoke swift Opis, in a mournful strain,
A nymph, and one of her own virgin train:
"Alas! dear Opis, my Camilla goes
To seek the fatal war, and brave the foes;
See! where she rushes to the death's plain,
And proudly wears Diana's arms in vain!
Still from my soul the darling maid I lov'd;
And time the growing fondness has improv'd;
E'er since stern Metabus, her hapless sire,
Forc'd by his rebel subjects to retire,
Fled from Privernum, his imperial town,
And lost his old hereditary crown.
Safe be convey'd, through crowds of raging foes,
His babe, the dear companion of his woes,
And call'd Camilla, from her mother's name;
And in his flight through wilds and deserts came;
The savage hills and woods he wander'd o'er,
And in his arms the lovely burthen bore;

While with their jav'lines, in an endless tide,
The Volcians press'd their prince on ev'ry side:
When lo! old Amasenus' streams delay
His course, and foam across the warrior's way:
For late, the flood, increas'd with sudden rains,
Had burst the banks, and floated half the plains:
First he resolves to swim, and gain the shore;
But love retards him, and the charge he bore.
Thus, while a thousand schemes divide his breast,
Sudden, on this, he fixes as the best:
His mighty pond'rous spear, of knotted oak,
Long harden'd in the flames, the monarch took;
To this strong lance the tender babe he bound,
With cork and pliant osiers wrapt around,
Then pos'd the loaded spear, in act to throw;
But for my favour first address'd his vow:
'To thee, chaste goddess of the forest wild,
Behold; a father dedicates his child;
She flies for refuge to thy pow'r divine,
And the first weapons that she knows are thine.
Thus then I send, to thy protecting care,
Thy little suppliant through the fields of air.'
This said; with all his force the lance he threw;
High o'er the roaring waves Camilla flew;
Then the bold warrior, press'd on ev'ry side
By his fierce foes, plung'd headlong in the tide,
The flood surmounted, and the jav'lin tore,
Charg'd with the sacred infant, from the shore.
Each town with stern unhospital hate,
Against the wand'ring monarch shut her gate:
Nor could he bear (his scorn was grown so high)
To stand distinguish'd by the public eye.
From all society of men he fled;
A shepherd's life among the mountains led;
There with his daughter past the hours away,
In dens of beasts and savages of prey;
Sought ev'ry foster-mother of the wood,
And in her lips distill'd the milky food.
Soon as the little Amazon could go:
He on her shoulders hung a slender bow:
A small light quiv'ring at her side she wore,
And in her hand a pointed jav'lin bore:
No rich embroider'd robes her limbs infold,
Nor were her waving locks adorn'd with gold.
The spoils of some fierce tiger wrapp'd her round,
That, from her head, hung trailing to the ground;
Ev'n then her tender hand the dart could fling,
Or whirl the pebble from the sounding sling,
Strike th' long crane, or snowy swan, on high,
And fetch the tow'ring quarry from the sky.
Her charms surpris'd the Tuscan matron train,
Who court the huntress for their sons in vain.
Not all their courtship, nor their pray'rs, could
The maid, from sworn virginity, to love. [move
With Dian's love content, she keeps her vow:
She shoots my arrows, and she bends my bow.
Ah! from my soul I wish, the hapless fair
Had never mingled in the direful war!
Then still my darling might the maid remain,
The pride and glory of my virgin train!
But since her doom is seal'd, her fate is nigh,
Descend, my nymph, this instant from the sky.
To yonder plain, impetuous, lend thy flight,
Where, see! in arms she rushes on the fight.
Here, take my bow; and, from this dreadful sheath,
Draw forth the winged messenger of death.
And, who the sacred virgin shall destroy,
Or of the Latian bands, or sons of Troy,
With this keen arrow make my vengeance good;
Let him atone the sacrilege with blood.

Then will I bear the breathless maid away,
 Her spoils and body in a cloud convey,
 To the dark grave commend her tear remains,
 And safe dispose 'em in her native plains."
 The goddess said; the nymph obedient flies,
 Wrapt in a sounding whirlwind down the skies.
 Now to the walls (a close-embodiy'd force)
 March the swift Trojan and the Tuscan horse;
 Beneath their valiant chiefs, in thick array;
 The troops embattled urge their fiery way.
 Aloft the foaming coursers prance and bound,
 Press on the rein, and proudly paw the ground.
 Trembling for joy, they hope the dire alarms;
 The fields gleam dreadful with their waving arms.
 Spears, nodding helms, and shields, with mingled
 Flame round, and set the region in a blaze. [rays,
 Nor with less speed, beneath Messapus' care,
 The Látian troops pour furious to the war.
 Full in the front the mighty Coras came,
 With bold Catillus, to the field of fame.
 O'er all distinguish'd in the martial scene,
 Rode with her female train the Volscian queen.
 Pierce to the fight the valiant troops advance,
 Pretend, and poise, and shake the flaming lance.
 Thick clouds of dust their trampling feet excite;
 Th' impatient coursers neigh, and snuff the distant
 At length, within a jav'lin's reach appear [fight.
 Both hosts; and, shouting, join the horrid war;
 Rouse to the fight their gen'rous steeds, and pour
 Their darts incessant, in a rattling show'r.
 In one dark storm the sounding lances fly,
 Shade the bright Sun, and intercept the sky.
 First horse to horse, and man to man oppos'd,
 The bold Aconteus and Tyrrhenus clos'd;
 Each eager warrior hurl'd the pointed spear,
 And arg'd his courser in a full career;
 The steeds, encount'ring with a thund'ring sound,
 Shock; and Aconteus tumbles to the ground.
 Swift, as discharg'd from the loud engine flies
 The glowing stone, or lightning from the skies;
 So swift the warrior, from his courser far,
 Shoots with a spring, and breathes his fiery soul
 Now all the Látian horse disorder'd run, [in air.
 (Their shields slung back) tumultuous, to the town,
 The chase with cries the joyful Trojans led,
 With great Asylas thund'ring at their head.
 Soon as they reach the walls, the rallying train
 Rein round their steeds, and face the foes again.
 Then, in their turn, the vanquish'd Trojans wheel'd,
 And, pale with terror, measur'd back the field.
 Thus, in alternate tides, o'er all the strand
 Swells the vast ocean, and invades the land.
 Wave after wave, the waters mount on high,
 Till o'er the rocks the foamy surges fly.
 Then headlong, in her turn, the roaring main
 Rolls back, impetuous, to her bounds again;
 Rolls back, as rapid as she came before,
 With all the floating trophies of the shore.
 Twice the Rutulians to the city flew;
 Add twice they rally, and the fœc pursue.
 Till in the third assault the hosts engage;
 Then burns the fight with unextinguish'd rage.
 All, man to man, and breast to breast, oppos'd,
 In one dire shock the charging squadrons clos'd.
 Then bled the battle; and a load of slain
 Shields, helms, and jav'lins, cover'd wide the plain.
 In a red deluge all the fields lie drown'd;
 And cries and agonising groans resound
 Of wounded warriors, lab'ring out their breath,
 And coursers plunging in the pangs of death.

With cautious eyes, Orsiloebus from far
 Observ'd strong Remulus, and mark'd for war;
 Nor durst approach the chief; but hurl'd the spear,
 With all his strength, beneath his courser's ear.
 Stung with the stroke, and maddening with the
 wound,
 He rears and paws in air, with many a bound,
 And cast his hapless master on the ground.
 Next bled Iolas by Catillus' steel;
 By the same hand the huge Herminius fell:
 All pale in death the mighty hero lies;
 Vain were his giant arms, and giant size;
 Th' intrepid chief (his head and shoulders bare,
 Tall, and distinguish'd by his golden hair)
 Tow'r'd in the front, the mark of all the war!
 Through his broad shoulders past, the deadly
 wound
 Contracts, and bends him double to the ground.
 Now all the fields with crimson streams are dy'd;
 And the vast carnage smokes on ev'ry side.
 The charms of honour ev'ry bosom fire,
 To win the day; or gloriously expire.
 Her breast half-naked, through the direful
 scene
 Of blood and slaughter flew the Volscian queen.
 The shafts and quiver at her side appear,
 The polish'd bow, and all Diana's war.
 Now the swift dart with matchless might she cast;
 Now with her axe she laid the battle waste:
 Ev'n when she flies, she bends the backward bow,
 And sends the winged vengeance at the foe.
 Around, in pomp, her sister warriors ride,
 All-bright in arms, and combat side by side.
 Her brazen pole-axe, there, Tarpeia wields;
 And, here, Larina glitters o'er the fields;
 Italian virgins; her supreme delight;
 In peace her friends; her comrades in the fight.
 So round their queen, Hippolyte the fair,
 Or bold Penthesile's refulgent car,
 Move the triumphant Amazonian train,
 In bright array, exulting, to the plain.
 Proudly they march, and clash their painted arms,
 And all Thermodoon rings with proud alarms;
 With female shouts they shake the sounding field;
 And fierce they poise the spear, and grasp the moony shield.
 Who first, who last, by thy victorious hand,
 Heroic maid! sunk breathless on the sand?
 First, Clytius' son, the great Eumenius, dies;
 Through his broad breast the quiv'ring jav'lin flies:
 Grimly he grinds the dust, distain'd with blood,
 And rolls and welters in a crimson flood.
 Iris and Pegasus at once are kill'd,
 And both, transfix'd, fall headlong on the field;
 One stoop'd, to reach his wounded courser's rein;
 One flew, to prop his sinking friend, in vain!
 Now Hippocles' brave son Amastrus fell;
 And now she threatens, with the pointed steel,
 Tereus the swift, Harpalycus the strong;
 And drove in heaps the hostile chiefs along.
 Demophoon, Chromis, fed her dreadful spear;
 She pours, and hangs tempestuous in the rear.
 Thus through the ranks of war she rag'd, and slew
 A Phrygian foe with ev'ry dart she threw.
 The mighty hunter, Ornytus, from far,
 On his Apulian courser sought the war:
 A bull's black hide his ample shoulders spread;
 A wolf's rough spoils grinn'd horrid o'er his head:
 A bended spear he brandish'd in his hand,
 And tow'r'd conspicuous o'er the martial band.

With ease, as all the troops confus'dly fled,
 he slew the foe, and thus insults the dead :
 Me, Tuscan, diest thou deem thy destin'd prey,
 like hunted game, the fortune of the day ?
 O ! by a woman's arm, this fatal hour,
 'hat boast is answer'd, and thy vaunts no more !
 So !—let thy sire the glorious tidings know ;
 Amilla sent thee to the shades below !"
 Then on two Trojan chiefs, of giant size,
 Butes, and tall Orsilochus, she flies.
 But Butes, face to face, she brav'd in war ;
 Swift through the neck she drove the pointed spear,
 Where the bright helm and corslet left a part,
 To let in fate, wide open to the dart.
 From fierce Orsilochus the virgin wheel'd
 At first, in flight dissembled, round the field :
 But, in a ring still lessening, to delude
 The furious chief, she fled, till she pursu'd :
 Then while, in vain, her circumvented foe
 Implores his life ; high-rising to the blow,
 Cleaves his broad front with a redoubled wound ;
 The blood and brains rush smoking on the ground.

The son of Aunus cross'd her in her way,
 And for a while stood trembling in dismay ;
 A wretch, that, like his own Ligurian line,
 Could cheat, while fortune favour'd the design.
 Soon as he found it vain to shun by flight
 The female warrior, or maintain the fight ;
 Resolv'd to circumvent the hostile maid,
 Thus to the queen the low dissemler said :
 " Where is the mighty praise, to vaunt the force,
 And trust the swiftness, of your rapid horse ?
 Dismiss your steed, vain maid ! and let us stand
 Engag'd in single combat, hand to hand,
 Soon shall be known, proud princess, what you can,
 When, on these terms, a woman fights a man."
 Thus he :—the queen springs furious on the plain
 From her fleet steed, and gives him to the train.
 On foot she dares the dastard to the field,
 Draws her bright sword, and grasps her maiden
 shield.

Flush'd with gay hopes, to find his fruid succeed,
 He turns, he flies, and, to his utmost speed,
 With goring spurs provokes his smoking steed.—
 " Deluded fool !" (she cries, in lofty strain)
 " On me thy little arts are try'd in vain ;
 Nor hence, ev'n yet, in safety shalt thou run,
 To please thy sire with falsehoods like his own."
 She said ; and, springing with a fiery course,
 The raging maid outstripp'd the flying horse ;
 Turn'd, seiz'd the reins ; oppos'd in battle stood ;
 Then glut her vengeance with his reeking blood.
 Not with more ease the falcon, from above,
 Shoots, seizes, gripes, and rends, the trembling
 dove ;

All stain'd with blood, the beauteous feathers fly,
 And the loose plumes come flutt'ring down the sky.

Meantime th' almighty sire of men and gods,
 Enthron'd in high Olympus' bright abodes,
 Surveys the war ; the Tuscan chief inspires
 With gen'rous rage, and fills with martial fires.

Through all the cleaving ranks, with eager speed,
 Flies the bold Tarchon on his rapid steed ;
 Calls on each chief by name ; adjures the train,
 Leads, rallies, and inflames the troops again.

" Ye scandal of your race, your country's shame !
 Warm'd with no honour, no regard of fame !
 What fear, ye cowards, ev'ry breast controls,
 Unnerves your limbs, and chills your trembling souls ?

Thus then, from one flies all our scatter'd band !
 Gods !—but from one, and from a female hand ;
 Oh ! cast away the sword, the shield and spear ;
 The idle pomp and pageantry of war !—
 Yet were you never recreants to delight,
 Nor to the softer battles of the night ;
 When pipes proclaim the sacred revels nigh,
 How swift, how eager, to the feast you fly !
 In the full bowls you centre all your love ;
 Pleas'd, when the priest invites you to the grove,
 You run, and riot in the rich repast ;
 The first in banquets, but in fights the last !"

He said ; and, bent on death, in deep despair,
 Rush'd on his steed amid the thickest war :
 Then urg'd at Venus his furious course, (horse,
 Seiz'd him at once, and snatch'd him from his
 Thus in his arms, with merciless strength, he bore,
 Fierce as he rode, the hapless chief, before.
 His troops beheld the scene with strange surprise,
 And peals of shouts run rattling round the skies ;
 While with his captive, all in open view,
 O'er the wide field the fiery hero flew.

The point then breaking from the warrior's dart,
 The chief explores a penetrable part,
 And meditates the wound ; the struggling foe
 Defends his throat, and disappoints the blow.
 As when th' imperial eagle soars on high,
 And bears some speckled serpent through the sky :
 While her sharp talons gripe the bleeding prey,
 In many a fold her curling volumes play ;
 Her starting brazen scales with horror riae ;
 The sanguine flames flash dreadful from her eyes :
 She writhes, and hisses at her foe, in vain,
 Who wins at ease the wide aerial plain ;
 With her strong hooky beak the captive plies,
 And bears the struggling prey, triumphant through the skies,

So with the chief the mighty Tarchon flew ;
 And, kindling at the sight, the troops their prince pursue.

Now Aruns on the Volscian princess waits,
 (Aruns the destin'd victim of the fates)
 Wheels round, and seeks with ev'ry wily art
 The favouring moment to discharge the dart.
 Where'er the furious maid her steps inclin'd,
 The wretch in silence follows close behind :
 When from the conquer'd foes she bends her
 course,

Thither th' insidious warrior turns his horse ;
 Oft shifts his place ; runs anxious to and fro ;
 Flies round the circuit ; and, in act to throw,
 Aims his sure jav'lin at the beauteous foe.

Chloëus, the priest of Cybele, from far
 Shone in bright arms amid the crowded war.
 Magnificently gay, he proudly press'd
 A prancing steed, in stately trappings dress'd,
 Rich scales of brass and gold, inwrought with art,
 Grac'd with a mimic plumage ev'ry part.
 Himself, in purple clad, amid the foe
 Sent his swift arrows from a Lycian bow.
 Gold was the bow, that from his shoulder sounds,
 And gold the helmet, that his head surrounds.
 His robes, with many a rustling silken fold,
 With care were gather'd, and confin'd in gold :
 His crimson tunic was embroider'd o'er ;
 And purple buskins on his legs he wore.
 This chief the singles from the warring crew,
 And, blind to danger, through the squadrons flew ;
 With the rich spoils to deck Diana's shrine ;
 Or that herself in Trojan arms may shine.

All, all the woman in her bosom rose!
 For this bright prize, she plung'd amid the foes;
 When, from his covert, Aruns launch'd his spear;
 But first to Heav'n prefer'd his suppliant pray'r;
 "O Phœbus! guardian of Soracte's woods,
 And shady hills; a god above the gods!
 To whom our natives pay the rites divine,
 And burn whole crackling groves of hallow'd pine;
 Walk o'er the fire, in honour of thy name,
 Unhurt, unsing'd, and sacred from the flame;
 Give to my favour'd arms, to clear away
 The deep dark stains of this disgraceful day.
 Nor spoils nor trophies from the maid I claim;
 No—to my future life I trust for fame.
 If by my hand this raging pest be slain,
 I ask no honour; but retire again,
 Pleas'd, tho' inglorious, to my native plain."

The god consents to half his warm request,
 But in the fleeting winds dispers'd the rest.
 Camilla's death was granted to his pray'r;
 His safe return was lost in empty air.

Now as the jav'lin sings along the skies,
 All to the Volscian princess turn their eyes.
 The fair rush'd on, regardless of the sound,
 Till in her pap she felt the fatal wound.
 Deep, deep infix'd, the pointed weapon stood
 Full in her heart, and drank the vital blood.
 Swift to her succour fly her female train,
 And in their arms the sinking queen sustain;
 But far more swift affrighted Aruns fled,
 With fear and joy, nor turn'd his guilty head:
 Back he retires, all trembling and dismay'd;
 Nor cou'd he bear, in death to view the dreadful maid.

As when a prowling wolf, whose rage has slain
 Some stately heifer, or the guardian swain,
 Flies to the mountain with impetuous speed,
 Confus'd, and conscious of the daring deed,
 Claps close his quiv'ring tail between his thighs,
 Ere yet the peopled country round him rise:
 Nor less confus'd, pale Aruns took his flight;
 Shunn'd ev'ry eye, and mingled in the fight.

The dying queen, in agonising pain,
 Tugs at the pointed steel, but tugs in vain.
 Deep riveted within, the rankling dart
 Hear'd in the wound, and panted in her heart.
 She sinks, she swoons, she scarcely draws her
 breath,

And, all around her, swim the shades of death.
 The starry splendours languish in her eyes,
 And from her cheeks the rosy colour flies.
 A maid she calls, the partner of her cares,
 Her friend in peace, her sister in the wars.
 "Acca; no more:—for mortal is my wound;
 A dizzy mist of darkness swims around:
 The victory was mine; but ah! 'tis past!
 This hour, this fatal moment, is my last!
 Go, and my dying words to Turnus bear;
 Bid him, this instant to the field repair;
 This instant, from the town the foe repel:—
 And now, dear friend, a long and last farewell!"

With that the queen, expiring, dropp'd the rein,
 And from her courser sunk upon the plain.
 In thick short sobs the vital spirit flies,
 Her head declin'd, and drooping as she dies!
 Her radiant arms bestrew the field of fight:
 Her soul, indignant, sought the realms of night.

Then, from the hosts the doubling clamours rise,
 And shouts tumultuous echo to the skies.

The Trojan band, a firm determin'd force,
 The Tuscan chiefs, with all th' Arcadian horse,
 Rush furious to the field; the slaughter spread:
 The tumult deepen'd, and the combat bled.

Meantime fair Opis, from a mountain's brow,
 Awhile unmov'd survey'd the fight below.
 But when from far she saw Camilla slain,
 And, round the corse, the shouting hostile train,
 Deep from her heaving ivory bosom broke
 A mournful groan, and thus the goddess spoke:
 "Too, too severely, much lamented maid,
 For warring with the Trojans, thou hast paid!
 In vain made sacred by thy virgin vow
 To Dian's name, and grac'd with Dian's bow!
 Nor yet in death thy goddess will disclaim
 Her favour'd maid, but crown with endless fame!
 Thy praise shall round the nations be display'd,
 And to thy fate due vengeance shall be paid.
 This moment will I make that vengeance good:
 The guilty wretch shall render blood for blood."

Beneath a hill, Dercennus' tomb appears,
 A potent Lætan lord in former years;
 A grove of venerable oaks display'd,
 Wide round the monument, a gloomy shade.
 Hither the goddess took her rapid flight,
 And spy'd gay Aruns from the tow'ring height.
 There as the youth exults, and swells with pride,
 "Whither, poor dastard, wouldst thou fly?" (she cry'd)

"Turn, wretch—this moment for thy guilt atone;
 And for Camilla's death receive thy own.
 Go—to the shades of Hell, her victim, go—
 A prize unworthy of Diana's bow!"

She said; and instant from the golden sheath
 Drew forth the feather'd messenger of death.
 Fierce in her rage, the circling horns she bends
 To the full stretch, and joins the doubling ends.
 One hand approach'd the point; one drew the bow,
 And to her breast strain'd the tough nerve below.
 At once the murderer heard the sounding dart,
 And felt the steely vengeance in his heart.
 He lies deserted by his social train,
 Pale and expiring on a foreign plain!
 While, from the field, triumphant Opis flies,
 And on spread pinions mounts the golden skies.

First fled Camilla's band (their princess kill'd):
 Then the Rutulians, routed, quit the field.
 Atinas' self, the chiefs, and armies, run,
 And spur their smoking coursers to the town.
 Nor can the troops sustain, nor dare oppose
 The slaught'ring swords of their victorious foes;
 Athwart their backs th' unbended bows they slung;
 And with their trampling steeds the sounding champain rung.

The city now th' advancing host appals:
 A cloud of dust, thick gather'd to the walls,
 From the tall tow'rs the trembling matrons spy;
 And female shrieks, tumultuous, rend the sky.
 Mixt with their foes, rush headlong through the gate
 The Lætan squadron, nor can shun their fate;
 In vain for shelter to their houses fly;
 Ev'n there transfixt, in heaps the wretches die.
 Some close the gates, exclude their social train,
 Who beg admission to the town in vain.
 While these defend th' endanger'd posts, and those
 Rush on their swords, a dreadful slaughter rose.
 With piercing shrieks, and lamentable cries,
 The children bleed before their parents' eyes.
 While close behind advanc'd the thund'ring foe
 Some leap down headlong to the trench below;

me with loose reins, abandon'd to their fate,
 ur'd their impetuous steeds against the gate.

 'th harden'd clubs th' advancing foe they dare,

 erce they rush on : they glow with martial fire,

Meanwhile to Turnus, ambush'd in the shade,

 VIRGIL'S ÆNEID.

 BOOK XII.

ARGUMENT.

TURNUS challenges Æneas to a single combat.
 Articles are agreed on, but broken by the Rutu-lians, who wound Æneas. He is miraculously cured by Venus, and forces Turnus to a duel ; with whose death the poem concludes.

WHEN Turnus saw the Latians, in despair, ink with the weight of unsuccessful war, himself the object of the public spite fark'd out, and summon'd to the promis'd fight ;
 he furious prince the single combat claims,
 nd conscious courage sets his soul in flames.
 As, pierc'd at distance by the hunter's dart,
 he Libyan lion rouses at the smart ;
 nd loudly roaring traverses the plain ;
 courses his sides ; and rears his horrid mane ;
 'ugs furious at the spear ; the foe defies ;
 nd grinds his teeth for rage, and to the combat flies :

o storm'd proud Turnus ; and in wrathful strain, bus to the king th' impetuous chief began :
 ' Where is this Trojan foe, so bold and brave ?
 Would he retract the challenge that he gave ?

My soul can brook no more delays ; I yield
 To his own terms, and dare him to the field.
 Renew the truce, perform the sacred rite ;
 This hour, this moment, I demand the fight.
 This hand shall wipe our late disgrace away
 (Our hosts may sit spectators of the day !)
 This trusty sword the dastard shall destroy,
 And plunge to Hell that fugitive of Troy.
 If not—I'll own him victor of the war,
 And to his arms resign the royal fair."

So spoke the furious prince, with scornful pride,
 The king with mild benevolence reply'd :
 " The more, brave youth, thy try'd, distinguish'd
 night

And valour drive thee headlong to the fight,
 The more it should concern our royal care,
 To weigh the perils and events of war ;
 This fond and youthful ardour to assuage
 With the cool caution of consid'rate age.
 How many vanquish'd cities are thy own,
 Besides a fair hereditary throne !
 Me too these wealthy warlike lands obey ;—
 Thus both may reign with independent sway.
 Our realm, brave Turnus, other virgins grace,
 Of blooming features, and illustrious race,
 Then undisguis'd, this truth with patience hear,
 Though harsh and wounding to a lover's ear.
 All pow'rs forbid, the human and divine,
 To match our daughter in the Latian line.
 Won by thy birth, my consort's tears and cries,
 And my own love, I broke all sacred ties ;
 Robb'd the great Trojan of the plighted fair ;
 Then flew to arms, and wag'd an impious war.
 From that dire source to tell what mischiefs flow,
 Would be to mention, what too well you know :
 Fights, deaths, defeats, that speak the wrath
 divine ;

Where all the sad pre-eminence is thine.
 In two fierce battles routed and o'erthrown,
 Scarce our last hopes are shelter'd in the town :
 Huge heaps of bones still whiten all the shore,
 And the full streams of Thyber smoke with gore.
 Where am I borne, irresolute and blind ?
 What changeful phrensy turns my wav'ring mind ?
 If, on thy death, the Trojan is my friend,
 Sure in thy life the stern debate may end !
 How would all Italy my name disgrace !
 How all my kindred of thy royal race !
 Shouldst thou (which Heaven avert !) by me be led
 To death, the victim of my daughter's bed !
 If I should hasten to so sad an end,
 My child's fond lover, and my gen'rous friend !
 Think on the turns of fate, and chance of wars ;
 Pity thy rev'rend father's silver hairs,
 Who mourns thy absence in thy native town,
 Nor knows the danger of so dear a son !"

But no success these warm entreaties found :
 The proffer'd medicine but inflam'd the wound.
 Scarce could he speak for rage, disdain, and pride,
 But thus at length the fiery youth reply'd :
 " O best of fathers ! all this needless care
 For Turnus' life, at his request, forbear.
 Life is a trifle I with scorn disclaim,
 For the bright purchase of immortal fame.
 This hand, these weapons too, are fatal found ;
 And the blood flies, where Turnus deals the wound.
 Nor in this combat shall his mother shroud
 The recreant Trojan in an airy cloud.
 Nor shield the coward with her aid divine :—
 This day, ye gods ! this glorious day, is mine !"

But now the frantic queen, on these alarms,
Half-dead with fear, hung trembling on his arms:
"Oh! grant me, Turnus, grant this one request;
If ever love or rev'rence touch'd thy breast
For lost Amata, to these sorrows yield!
Nor meet thy rival in the fatal field.
Regard, dear youth, regard my streaming tears,
'Thou only prop of my declining years!
Our sinking house relies on thee alone;
On thee, our fame, our empire, and the throne.
In thy misfortune must Amata join;
Her fate and welfare are involv'd in thine.
With thee to death, for refuge, will I run,
Nor live a captive to a Trojan son."

With pity touch'd, the fair Lavinia hears
Her mother's cries, and answers with her tears.
A lovely blush the modest virgin warms,
Glow's in her cheek, and lights up all her charms.
So looks the beautiful iv'ry, stain'd with red:
So roses, mixt with lilies in the bed,
Blend their rich hues—then, gazing on the fair,
The hero rag'd, more eager for the war.
And thus—"O royal mother! cease your fears,
Nor send me to the fight with boding tears.
'Tis not in me, if Heav'n has fix'd my date,
To check th' unalterable course of fate.
Go, faithful herald, go! and instant bear
This dreaded message to the Phrygian's ear:

"Soon as Aurora's rays the mountain gild,
He need not lead his forces to the field:
Our single valour shall dispute the day
(The hosts in peace the combat shall survey).
Thus shall his death or mine the war decide,
And the proud victor gain the royal bride."

He said; and furious to the palace speeds;
There, at his call, rush forth the fiery steeds,
Of matchless spirit, and immortal kind,
White as the snow, and swifter than the wind.
Of old, to great Piliunus, bold and brave,
The sires of these Erectheus' daughter gave.
Before their lord the gen'rous coursers bound,
Neigh, foam, and fly, and paw the trembling ground;
The grooms with combs their flowing manes divide,
And gently stroke their chests, and soothe their noble pride.

Meantime the hero drew his armour on;
With gold and burnish'd brass the cuirass shone.
The glittering helmet next his temple spread;
The crimson crest plays dreadful o'er his head:
He grasps the pond'rous shield, and flaming blade,
The sword that Vulcan for his father made,
Of matchless temper; which the fiery god
Had plung'd red-hissing in the Stygian flood.
Last the bright spear he seiz'd, large, strong, and tall,

Propp'd on a column 'midst the lofty hall;
The mighty Actor's spoil. The hero shook
The beamy jav'lin; and with fury spoke:
"My trusty spear, still faithful to my hand!
Still wing'd with death, to answer my command:
Which once brave Actor's arm was wont to wield!
And mine now throws; the terror of the field!
In this great moment fly, nor fly in vain,
But stretch yon Phrygian eunuch on the plain:
Oh! give me, thro' his heart thy point to thrust,
And soil his scented tresses in the dust,
The costly cuirass from his breast to tear,
And by one noble stroke to terminate the war!"

Thus, fir'd with fury, to the fight he flies;
Keen flash the flames, and lighten from his eyes.

So the fierce bull, collected in his might,
Roars for his rival, and demands the fight;
Impatient for the war, with fury burns,
And tries on every tree his angry horns;
Bends his stern brows, and pushes at the air;
And paws the flying sands, the prelude of the war.

As fierce and eager for the dire alarms,
The Trojan blazes in celestial arms;
To meet his rival in the field prepares,
Pleas'd with the fight to terminate the war.
He sets his sorrowing friends and son at ease;
Expounds the fates' unchangeable decrees;
And instant bids the messengers report
The terms of combat to the Latian court.

Scarce had the morn (all beautiful to behold!)
Tipt the blue mountains with a gleam of gold;
The Sun's fierce steeds, high-bounding o'er the sea,

From their wide nostrils snort the beams of day;
When for the chiefs they drew a line around,
And in just limits close the listed ground:
Then verdant altars raise to all the pow'rs
Of Earth or Heav'n, whom either host adores.
In linen robes, with vervain crown'd, they bring
The sacred fire, and water from the spring.

Here, with bright lances, all th' Ausonian train
Pour through the opening portals to the plain:
The Trojans there, and Tuscans in array,
And ranks embattled bend their eager way.
Amid the thousands, with a grace divine,
In gold and purple gay, the leaders shine.
Here, tw'ring o'er the troops Asylas stood;
Great Mnesteus there, of Troy's imperial blood;
There, brave Messapus, of immortal strain,
Sprung from the mighty monarch of the main.
The sign now giv'n through each impatient host,
Each chief retires to his appointed post.
At ease the soldiers fall their pond'rous shields,
And pitch their idle jav'lins in the fields.
Old sires and matrons, with the vulgar throng,
Lean'd o'er the walls, and from the turrets hung.
With longing eyes the great event they wait,
And crowds on crowds press forward thro' the gate.

But from the fam'd Albano's shady brows,
(Though then without a name the mountain rose)
The queen of Heav'n the Latian town beheld,
The hosts embattled, and the crowded field.
Then to brave Turnus' sister, who presides
O'er lakes and streams, and awes the roaring tides,
(On the fair nymph that province was bestow'd,
For her lost honour, by the thund'ring god)
Her fears the goddess of the skies express'd;
And thus the regent of the floods address'd:

"Queen of the founts and streams, and far above
The race of Latian nymphs in Juno's love,
Those nymphs, who, by my wand'ring lord misled,
Presum'd to mount our own imperial bed;
Yet thee I suffer'd in his grace to rise,
And share th' immortal honours of the skies.
With deep concern sad tidings must I bear,
What I must grieve to speak, and you to hear.
The Latian state and Turnus, in the war,
While fortune favour'd, were my constant care.
Now his inevitable hour draws nigh;
On terms unequal is he doom'd to die.
But from the fatal field, th' appointed fight,
Lo! I retire; nor can I bear the sight.
If thou can'st save him yet from death, descend:
Some better fate thy efforts may attend;
Fly—and exert the sister and the friend."

o said; Juturna wept, by grief oppress, wice tore her hair, and beat her iv'ry breast.
"Fly!" Juno cries, "and stop the dire debate,
y, fly, and snatch him, if you can, from fate!
or waste the hours in tears, and vain despair;
eak, break the truce, and wake the slumbering
war.

ime discharge the crime."—The goddess said;
ad left involv'd in doubts the mournful maid.
Now came the kings: four stately coursers bear, pomp, the Latian lord's imperial car.
elve golden rays around his temple shone,
o mark his glorious lineage from the Sun.
eung Turnus next appear'd; two spears he held,
ad two white coursers drew him to the field.
eeds then advanc'd, with grace divine,
h' illustrious father of the Roman line;
igh in his hand the starry buckler rais'd;
ad in immortal arms the hero blaz'd.
With him his son Ascanius took his place,
be second hope of Rome's majestic race.
low the procession moves: the sacred priest
ood by his altar, in the linen vest;
e tender lamb for sacrifice preferr'd,
ad a young victim from the bristly herd.
hey turn their faces to the dawning day;
he salted cakes with solemn reverence pay;
he victims sign'd; the foremost hairs they drew,
ad on the hearth the first libations threw.
hen the great Trojan prince unsheath'd his sword,
ad thus with lifted hands the gods ador'd:

"Thou land, for which I wage the war, and thou,
reat source of day, be witness to my vow!
lmighty king of Heav'n, and queen of air, Propitious now, and reconcil'd by pray'r)
hon Mars, enthron'd on great Olympus' height, ord of the field, and master of the fight;
e springs, ye floods, ye various pow'rs who lie length the deeps, or tread the gold'n sky;
least, and attest! if, victor in the fray,
he Daunian leader gains the glorious day,
fy son his claim of empire shall release;
fy Trojan subjects shall depart in peace.
ut should the conquest prove my happy lot,
For so I think, and Heav'n confirm the thought!)
he Latians never shall my rule obey;
ready I disclaim th' imperial sway.
rom fight let each unconquer'd nation cease,
ad join in leagues of everlasting peace.
o king Latinus I resign the care,
he pomp of state, with all concerns of war,
ad ev'ry regal claim:—the rites divine,
ad the religious province, shall be mine.
or me my Trojan friends a town shall frame,
ad grace the tow'rs with fair Lavinia's name."

Thus he. Then old Latinus lifts his eyes, ad his right hand, with reverence, to the skies.
By the same oath, by Heav'n, and earth, and main,
ad all the pow'rs, that all the three contain;
atona's twins, that grace the bright abode;
anus, the mighty, double-fronted god!
Th' infernal monarch, and the fiends below,
ad Jove, whose bolts avenge the broken vow!
o sanctify my word, behold! I stand,
ad on these hallow'd altars lay my hand:
Whatever ensues, misfortune or success,
No time shall break this solemn league of peace,
Nor shake my purpose; but entire, and whole,
I'll keep the sacred tenour of my soul;

No art shall win me, and no pow'r compel;
Not, tho' the golden skies should plunge to Hell;
You starry splendours from their spheres should fall,
And Ocean spread his waters o'er the ball.
Firm is the sword, and sure the oath I swore;
Sure, as this sceptre ne'er shall flourish more;
No more its verdant honours shall renew,
Lopt from the mother-tree where once it grew;
Now by the artist's hand adorn'd with brass,
And worn successive by our regal race!"

The princes thus the solemn compact bound
By mutual oaths, with all the peers around.
The priests before the fires the victims slay;
Eager the smoking entrails read away;
And, on the altars rang'd, the loaded chargers lay.

But the Rutulians griev'd, by fears oppress,
And various tumults work'd in ev'ry breast.
Long since they saw their prince o'ermatch'd in might,

And curs'd the terms of such unequal fight.
Their dread increase, as the chiefs draw near,
And Turnus' looks augment the gen'ral fear.
Trembling, aghast, he moves with silent pace:
A deadly paleness spreads o'er all his face.
Close by the altar's side, in care profound,
His pensive eyes he fix'd upon the ground.

Soon as the sister saw the giddy crowd
Had chang'd their minds, and spoke their fears
In great Camerte's form, of high renown [aloud;
For birth, his father's valour and his own,
Her sight amidst the murmur bands she took,
Inflam'd their rage, and thus the host bespoke:

"What shame, Rutulians, valiant as we are,
On oak to lay the whole success of war!
Behold the utmost force the foe can boast,
The few poor relics of their shatter'd host.
Heav'n's!—can we shrink from such a slender
power!

Are not our men the same? our numbers more?
Should our whole army to the fight repair,
Scarce all their troops would half employ our war!
'Tis true, your hero to the gods shall rise,
A self-devoted victim, to the skies.

Yet the brave chief eternal praise shall claim,
And live for ever in a length of fame:
While we, O shame! a base degen'rate host,
Look tamely on, and see our country lost!
Stretch our vile hands to servitude abhor'd,
And court the bondage of a foreign lord!"

This fiery speech inflam'd the list'ning train;
Through all the host the gath'ring murmur ran.
Now chang'd, the Latians wish for peace no more,
But long to break the league they sought before.
They pity Turnus' fortune, and prepare,
With eager ardour to renew the war.

His sister sent (the tumult to improve)
A false delusive omen from above.
In pomp a tow'ring eagle soars on high,
And sudden, shooting from th' ethereal sky,
Drives a vast flock of wat'ry fowls before,
On sounding wings, along the winding shore;
Then, where the floods in soft meanders ran,
In his huge talons truss'd a silver swan.
Th' astonish'd Latian bands in courage rise,
When lo! the flock (more wond'rous to their eyes)
Turn, and pursue the victor through the skies.
Prest by the foe, encumber'd with the prey,
He drops the prize, and wings th' aerial way;
With shouts the Latians hail th' auspicious sight,
Range all their troops, and hasten to the fight.

" 'Tis what I wish'd, the long-expected sign," (Tolumnius cry'd) " I thank the pow'r's divine.
Rise, follow me, my friends, your aid supply,
Forc'd by the foe, like yonder birds to fly;
While through your wasted shores the victor sweeps:

Who now shall soon rush headlong to the deeps.
Haste; save your leader from the fatal fray;
Close, close your ranks; engage; and win the day."

He said; sprung forth; and 'midst the Trojans
His furious dart, that whistled as it flew, [threw Tumultuous shouts pursue the parting spear,
And all now grow more eager for the war.

Nine brave Arcadians, at their squadrons' head,
Gillippus' offspring by a Tuscan bed,
Shone in the front; the spear impetuous flew
Amidst the brothers, and the youngest slew;
A lovely blooming youth; with fury cast,
Beneath the belt the steely jav'lin past,
Transfix'd the stripling with a deadly wound,
And stretch'd him pale and gasping on the ground.
All fir'd with vengeance for their brother slain,
Fierce to the combat fly the martial train.
Some draw the glitt'ring sword, and some advance
With the broad spear, and shake the flaming lance.
With equal speed, their ardour to oppose,
Pour forth in endless tides the Latian foes.
As swift th' Arcadian troops, with sculptur'd shields,
Rush'd on with Troy, and delug'd all the fields.
Straight to their ensigns the bold bands repair,
Impatient to decide the great event by war.

The madding crowd the sacred rites confound;
Strip the bright altars; toss the fires around;
And seize the goblets: while the jav'lins fly
In iron storms, and tempest all the sky.
The good old king, affrighted, from the plain
Bears back his violated gods again.
Some yoke the coursers to the car with speed,
Some vault, impetuous, on the snorting steed.
Some to the field the kindling troops excite,
Draw their bright swords, and headlong rush to fight.

Eager to break the peace, with all his force,
The fierce Messapus spurr'd his thund'ring horse
Full on Aulstes, with a furious spring,
Who wore the royal ensigns of a king:
O'er the high altars as the chief gave way,
Headlong he plung'd in dust, and grov'ling lay.
There at his length, extended on the plain,
He pleads for mercy; but he pleads in vain!
Th' impetuous victor flew with rapid speed,
Shook his huge spear, and, bending from the steed,
Transfix'd the monarch; then, insulting, cries,
" He bleeds!—this victim sure must please the skies!"

The joyful Latians, eager for the prey,
Strip the warm corse, and bear the spoils away.
Then as the mighty Ebusus drew near,
And at bold Choringus shook the spear,
He rush'd against him with a furious pace,
Snatch'd a red brand, and dash'd it on his face.
Through ambient air a noisome scent expires,
As the long beard shrunk crackling in the fires.
Stunn'd as he stood with sudden darkness round,
The raging victor drags him to the ground;
Then seiz'd his locks; his forceful knee apply'd,
And plung'd the vengeful falchion in his side.

From Podalirius, eager to pursue,
Through the first ranks, the shepherd Aلسus flew;

Then turn'd, and, with his axe depending full,
Cleaves at one dreadful stroke his shatter'd skull.
With blood and brains his arms are cover'd o'er;
The thirsty sands are drench'd with streams of gore.
An iron sleep came swimming o'er his sight,
And wrapp'd the warrior in eternal night.

But the just Trojan prince, amidst the band,
Without his helmet rush'd, and stretch'd his hand:
" Whither, my friends, ah! whither would you
run?

The terms stand fixt; the combat is my own.
Dismiss your fears; nor my revenge pursue;
For Turnus, Turnus is your gen'ral's due.
That victim, these religious rites demand,
Already sacred to this conqu'ring hand."

While yet he spoke; loud hissing through the
With thirty rage, a feather'd arrow flies, [slain,
And reach'd the hero with a certain aim;
But from what hand, was never told by fame.
None knew, what fortune, or assisting god,
So proud a triumph on the foe bestow'd,
Nor one in all the mighty host was found,
Who claim'd the merit of so base a wound.

The chiefs astonish'd, Turnus now beheld,
And the brave prince retiring from the field:
High hopes of conquest in his bosom rise;
Straight for his coursers, and his arms, he cries;
Vaults, with a furious bound, into the car,
Shakes the loose reins, and rushes to the war.
Raging he spreads the growing slaughter round:
Some foes expire; some welter on the ground:
Some fly—in vain! for, swifter than the wind,
His wiuged lance arrests 'em from behind.
Fierce o'er the prostrate foes the hero rolls
His whirling wheels, and crushes out their souls.

As when on Hebrus' banks the god of war
Flies to the combat on his rattling car;
Frowns, shouts, and, clashing on his dreadful shield,
Lashes his fiery coursers to the field;
The steeds devour the ground, outstrip the wind,
And leave the pinions of the storm behind:
Thrace feels thro' all her realms their furious
course,

Shook by the prancings of the thund'ring horse;
Fear, Fraud, and Force, and Flight, a ghastly train
Of horrid fiends, attend him to the plain.
So drove stern Turnus with resistless might,
His smoking coursers o'er the field of fight;
Their rapid hoofs through heaps of carnage tore;
Plung'd deep into the sands, distain'd with gore;
O'er piles of dead and dying warriors bound,
And, as they fly, they dash the bloody dust around.

Now hapless Thamyris and Pholus fell,
And now he sent bold Sthenelus to Hell.
These, hand to hand, he slew, approaching near;
The last, at distance, with his pointed spear:
At distance both th' Imbrasidae expire,
Train'd in fair Lycia, by their valiant sire:
In closer fight, the dauntless warriors join'd;
Or distanc'd with their steeds the winged wind.

There with high vaults rush'd proud Eumedes
Foredoom'd to fate, ambitious Dolon's son. [on Base as his father, with his grandsire's name,
The recreant soldier sought the field of fame,
But with the luckless fortune of his sire,
Who claim'd Pelides' coursers for his hire,
When sent the Grecian army to explore;
Vain fool! he ventur'd, but return'd no more;
Slain by Tydides' hand, resign'd his breath,
And shar'd a juster recompense in death!

him when the Daunian hero spy'd from far,
 First a light dart he launch'd in open air,
 Tops the fleet steeds, and, furious, quits the car;
 Tood o'er the Trojan, prostrate as he lay,
 Rod on his neck, and wrench'd the sword away.
 Then through his throat the deadly falchion thrust,
 And thus insults him grov'ling in the dust:

Lie there! possess the land thy valour gains!
 And measure, at thy length, our Latian plains!
 Such, such deserv'd rewards I still bestow,
 When call'd to battle, on the vaunting foe;
 Thus may you build your town, and thus enjoy
 These realms, ye proud presumptuous sons of Troy!"

Next, by his flying spear Asubtes bled:
 A second lance laid mighty Chloerus dead.
 On Dares' breast he plung'd the pointed steel,
 And sent the bold Therilochous to Hell:
 Then pierc'd Thymistes with a fatal wound,
 Whose ground'ring steed had cast him to the
 ground.

As o'er th' Ægean deeps when Boreas roars,
 And rolls the waves tumultuous to the shores,
 The driving clouds before the whirlwind fly,
 And break, and scatter, through the ruffled sky:
 So where bold Turnus rush'd, inflam'd with ire,
 Their orders scatter, and whole hosts retire.
 Whirl'd on his rapid car, the hero gains
 New rage, new vigour, as he sweeps the plains.
 High o'er his helm his crimson crest, inclin'd
 By ev'ry breath, nods dreadful in the wind.

No more, in proud disdain, cou'd Phegeus bear
 To see the hero rule the tide of war;
 But, rashly furious, to the car proceeds,
 Leis'd the loose reins, and turn'd the flying steeds.
 Him, as suspended on the yoke he hung,
 By the swift chariot dragg'd in dust along,
 Through the bor'd corslet, the sharp jav'lin found,
 And rais'd the warrior with a slender wound.
 Yet with his shield oppos'd he dares the blow,
 And with his brandish'd sword assaults the foe.
 The whirling wheels, with fiery speed impell'd,
 Soon shoot him headlong on the sanguine field.
 Swift Turnus follow'd, and his falchion drew;
 Between the cuirass and the head it flew:
 The gushing blood distains the sands around,
 And the pale trunk lay grov'ling on the ground.

Thus while the conqu'ring chief his progress held,
 Lag'd, storm'd, and reign'd the master of the Chates, Mnestheus, and the royal heir, [field;
 Attend the Trujan prince with duteous care,
 As propt, and leaning on the spear, he went)
 And plac'd the bleeding hero in the tent.
 The steel, deep riveted, with eager hands
 He tugs impatient, and their aid demands,
 More wide to lay the wound, a passage bare,
 Unroot the dart, and send him to the war.

Now came Iapis to relieve his pain,
 Of old by Phoebus lov'd, nor lov'd in vain.
 On whom the god had proffer'd to bestow
 His lyre, his bays, his prescience, and his bow.
 But (to prolong his drooping father's days)
 The youth refus'd his arrows, lyre, and bays,
 And prescient skill; but chose the healing part,
 A silent, useful, though inglorious art.

Unmov'd with all the sorrow and the care
 Of friends, attendants, and the royal heir,
 His mighty spear, th' impatient chief sustains,
 Who grinds his teeth for rage, nor heeds the glowing pains.

The sage now hastens to the task assign'd,
 And first dispatchful tucks his robes behind;
 Tries all the vegetable pow'rs around,
 To cool the smart, and mitigate the wound.
 His hands solicit now with tender art;
 Now tog in vain with vigour at the dart. [pray'r;
 At length he pray'd; nor Phoebus heard the
 And nearer every moment pour'd the war,
 Thick and more thick the growing horrors rise;
 A cloud of dust involves the golden skies. [ough,
 The tramping steeds, the thund'ring foes, drew
 And 'midst the camp the show'ring jav'lins fly.
 The mingling cries from ev'ry part resound;
 Some shout, some groan, some gasp upon the
 ground.

Now, touch'd with pity for the hero's pain,
 Descends the goddess mother on the plain.
 A branch of sov'reign dittany she bore,
 From Ida gather'd, on the Cretan shore.
 Luxuriant leaves the taper stalk array;
 The stalk in flow'rs; the flow'rs in purple gay.
 The goats, when pierc'd at distance by the dart,
 Apply the medicine to the wounded part.
 This juice, while clouds conceal her radiant face,
 The queen infuses in the golden vase!
 Tempers with scented panacee the whole,
 And with ambrosial liquors crowns the bowl.
 Nor knew the sage the succour that he found,
 But with the balmy mixture bathes the wound.
 At once the throbbing anguish past away;
 Stanch'd was the blood, and in the bottom lay.
 The dart, though deeply rooted, at command
 Moves up, and answers the physician's hand.
 His former vigour now succeeds to pain,
 And life burns bright in all her pow'rs again.
 Iapis first perceiv'd th' immortal art,
 That cool'd the raging pangs, and clos'd the part.
 Raptur'd he saw the cure; and first impell'd
 The prince, renew'd in courage, to the field.
 "Arms for the chief," he cries, "prepare his arms;
 And instant send him to the dire alarms.
 This cure, great hero, is no work of mine,
 Not mortal art, but done by hands divine.
 Thy life some guardian god has made his care,
 Who sends thee back to fight, and conquer in the war."

The fierce, impatient prince had cover'd o'er
 His manly legs with golden greaves before.
 Now, all on fire, his mighty lance he took,
 And in his hand the pond'rous weapon shook.
 High on his arm the heav'nly shield he rais'd;
 And on his breast the radiant cuirass blaz'd.
 Then, with a close embrace, he strain'd his son;
 And kiss'd him thro' his helm, and thus begun:
 "From me true courage, and in camps to dare,
 From others learn, my son, success in war.
 I go to labour in the bloody fray,
 To fight, and guard thee, in the dreadful day;
 To crown thee with a bright immortal name;
 To teach thy youth the glorious paths to fame.
 Thou, in thy riper years, the virtues trace,
 And copy all the worthies of thy race.
 Thy soul may Hector and Æneas fire,
 Thy godlike uncle, and thy martial sire!"

So spoke the hero, and, by rage impell'd,
 Tow'rd from the tent, majestic, to the field;
 Shook an huge jav'lin in his vig'rous hand;
 And with their chief pour'd forth the martial band.
 Antheus and Mnestheus led th' embattled train,
 And all rush'd furious to the deathful plain.

Beneath the warriors groans the trembling ground,
And clouds of dust involve the region round.

Now Turnus and his host the foe beheld
From a high mound, advancing o'er the field.
Th' astonish'd troops a gen'ral fear confounds;
But first his sister heard the dreadful sounds.
Too well she knew the dire alarms from far,
And trembling fled before the moving war.
Fierce, with their leaders, march the Trojan train;
And the black squadrons darken all the plain.
As when some tempest o'er mid ocean roars,
And, wing'd with whirlwinds, gathers to the shores;
With boding hearts the peasants hear from far
The sullen murmurs of the distant war;
Foresee the harvests levell'd with the ground,
And all the forests spread in ruins round;
Swift to the land the hollow grumbling wind
Flies, and proclaims the furious storm behind.
So swift, so furious, great Æneas flew,
And led against the foe the martial crew.
The thick'ning squadrons, wedg'd in close array,
In one black bolty win their desperate way.
By Mnætheus slain, in dust Archenis lies,
And by Thymbræus' sword Osiris dies.
Next Gyas' lance the mighty Ufens sped,
And Epulo by brave Achates bled.
Ev'n cur'd Tolumnias fell, whose fatal spear,
Launch'd at the Dardan host, renew'd the war.
A peal of shouts, tumultuous, tore the sky,
And o'er the field the pale Rutulians fly.
But with disdain the Trojan hero glows;
Nor wastes his vengeance on inferior foes.
He scorns to fight the few who stand their ground,
Or in their backs the flying crowds to wound:
Turnus, and him alone, he calls aloud
To fight, and hunts him through the dusty cloud.

On this, his anxious sister, seiz'd with fear,
Hurl'd from his lofty seat the charioteer,
Metiscus the renown'd; tost far away,
The wood'ring chief beneath the harness lay,
Herself assumes his armour, voice, and air;
Snatches the reins, and vaults into the car.

As the black swallow, that, in quest of prey,
Round the proud palace wings her wanton way,
When for her children she provides the feast,
To still the clamours of the craving nest;
Now wild excursions round the cloyster takes;
Now, sportive winds, or skims along the lakes;
So flies the goddess on the rapid car,
From side to side, and traverses the war:
Now here, now there, she brings the chief to sight;
But still she turns him from the fatal fight.

Nor less the prince unravels all her ways,
And hunts his foes through ev'ry various maze;
Thrice all the shifting course, and breaks the crowd
With furious speed, and calls the chief aloud.
Oft has he spy'd him, and approach'd the car;
As oft his sister plung'd amid the war.
Where'er the Trojan hero bends his course;
Averse the goddess turns the flying horse.
What should he do? a thousand thoughts divide
His wav'ring soul, that points to ev'ry side!
When lo! Messapus cross'd him in the field,
And in his hand two shining jav'lins held.
One, at the prince, with levell'd aim, he threw:
Beneath his shield the cautious prince withdrew;
Low bending on his knee, secure he lay;
But the swift jav'lin strikes his plume away.
Then, when the meditated fraud he view'd,
That still his rival fled, as he pursu'd;

He first invoc'd the thund'rer to redress
The rites profan'd, and violated peace;
Then rush'd amid the train; nor check nor loud
His fury knew, but stretch'd the slaughter round
The faithless foe he thinks it vain to spare,
And, fir'd with vengeance, gives a loose to war.

What god will now inspire me, to display
The rage of death, and horrors of the day?
What crowds of heroes perish'd on the plain,
By mighty Turnus, and Æneas, slain!
Was it thy will the nations should engage (Great sire of Heav'n) with such unbounded rage
So soon from war and violence to cease,
Leagu'd in a bond of everlasting peace?

Æneas first slew Sacro in the fight,
Whose sword had turn'd the Trojan troops to flight
With a swift stroke, and all his force apply'd,
He plung'd the deadly falchion in his side.
Then, with his brother, Amycus was kill'd,
Cast from their steed by Turnus on the field.
With the long lance, this tow'ring chief he prith
Thro' that, impetuous, drove the pointed sun:
Then, on his chariot-bung, in triumph bore
Their heads aloft, that dropp'd with livid gore:
Next, at one charge, on three bold chiefs he fell
Talos, and Tennes, and Cothegus, slew.
With them, of Theban race, Onytes fell,
Fair Peridia's son; and sunk to Hell.

Then bled two brothers, who from Lycia came;
Nor their own Phæbus could prevent their doom.
Next poor Menestes by his arm was slain,
Who shunn'd so long the dreadful war in vain;
A skilful angler; once he made abode,
Bless'd with content, by Læra's piousness fed.
There dress'd his father, to the great unknown,
A stranger field, and furrows not his own.

As the fierce flames through the tall forest fly,
This way and that, and kindle all the sky;
Or rapid torrents from the mountains sweep,
Roar down the sides, and thunder to the deep;
With weight resistless, and destructive sway,
O'er half a ruin'd country break their way:
So through the field, in different parts engag'd,
As swift and fierce the rival heroes rag'd;
They burst with wrath; they rise to ev'ry blow;
They send their souls with ev'ry lance they throw.

A rock's vast weight the great Æneas threw:
Th' enormous fragment like a whirlwind flew,
And hurl'd Murranus on the ground, who bore
His vaunted lineage from the Latian kings.
Headlong the warrior from the chariot flies
Amidst the harness, and encumber'd lies:
The coursers startle at the flaming sword;
Paw down, and trample on their dying lord.

On Hylus, Turnus rush'd with all his might,
As, fir'd with rage, the chief advanc'd to fight.
Full at his golden helmet, o'er the plain
The jav'lin flew, and stung him to the brain:
Nor thee, the bravest of the Grecian band,
Thy valour, Creteus, sav'd from Turnus' hand!
Next fell the priest Cupencus in the strife,
Nor his own gods could guard his sacred life;
Full in his breast Æneas plung'd the dart,
That pierc'd the shield, and quiver'd in his heart.

Then bled great Æolus, by Turnus kill'd,
And sunk, a bulk enormous on the field!
Whom not the Grecian heroes could destroy,
Nor all their armies, in the wars of Troy,
Nor great Achilles with his vengeful steel,
Though by his arm the Phrygian empire fell.

Here ends his life; his stately palace stood
Beneath fair Ida's consecrated wood:
There liv'd the mighty man; his cold remains
At length lie bury'd in the Latian plains.

Now in all parts the martial squadrons wage
A general war, with undistinguish'd rage.
The Latian, Trojan, and Rutulian force,
The Tuscan cohorts, and Arcadian horse,
Beneath their chiefs, embattled, spread the plain;
Here Mnestheus, there Serestus, fires the train;
Here great Asylus swept the field; and there
Storm'd brave Messapus, the renown'd in war.
Each fights, as in his arm the mighty day,
With all the fate of his great general, lay;
No stop, no check the fiery warriors knew;
With their long toils their kindling ardour grew,
And with fresh vigour to the combat flew.

But Venus now inspires her godlike son
To leave the field, and storm th' imperial town.
As following Turnus through the ranks he flies,
From side to side he darts his eager eyes;
When, lo! before him, in a full survey,
Exempt from war, the fenceless city lay.
He views the promis'd prize with stern delight;
His soul takes fire, and kindles at the sight.
Sadden the hero calls his chiefs around,
With all his bands, and mounts a rising ground.
Then, as they rais'd their ample shields, and shook
Their pointed lances, their bold leader spoke.

"Attend, and instant these commands obey;
Inspir'd by favouring Jove, who points the way:
All speed this noble enterprise demands,
Claims all your care, and urges all your hands.
This day, this hour, unless the Latians yield,
And own your chief the victor of the field,
Ev'n from the lowest stone my rage shall tear
You town, the source of this destructive war.
You perjurd court my vengeance shall confound,
And those proud tow'rs lie smoking on the ground.
Twice have we vanquish'd the Rutulian train;
Still must I wait till Turnus will be slain;
No!—at you waits the sure destruction aim;
Revenge the broken league with sword and flame;
Four arms against the guilty city bend:
There the dire war began, and there shall end."

Rous'd at the word, all wedg'd in firm array,
Straight to the town the squadrons urge their way.

They toss the brands, the scaling engines rear,
And round the ramparts raise the sudden war.
Issue to the portals fly with speed, and slay
The guards or citizens, who cross their way.
Some hurl the vengeful darts; the jav'lins fly
In dusky clouds, and intercept the sky.
Æneas rais'd his hand amid the crowd,
Calls, and upbraids the Latian prince aloud,
Obtesting Heaven, that, wounded, and compell'd
By his perfidious foes, he took the field;
That twice the rites of peace their arms profane,
And from their impious rage a second war began.

But mad confusions in the city rise:
Tis tumult all; for all at once advise.
These arm, and fly to guard the walls; and those,
More loud, demand admission for the foe.
Some, to renew the peace, with clamours bring
Ev'n to the gates the helpless hoary king.

So when the swain invades, with stifling smoke,
The bees close-cluster'd in a cavern'd rock,
They rise; and, trembling for th' endanger'd state,
Sigh'd with wrath, with fell revenge and hate,

This way, and that, in loud tumultuous swarms,
Fly o'er their waxen town with hoarse alarms.
The steams offensive roll the cells around;
Their sullen murmurs through the rock resound;
While thick'ning, thro' the cleft the smokes arise,
And in a length of vapours mount the skies.

But to complete and aggravate their fears,
A new mischance involv'd the town in tears.
For, when the wretched queen beheld on high
O'er the proud domes the fiery tempest fly;
The ramparts storm'd; th' exulting Trojans near;
Nor Turus' troops before the town appear;
Many a long look she cast, but cast in vain;
And in her fears concludes the hero slain;
She raves against the gods in wild despair;
She calls herself the auth'ress of the war:
A thousand plaints she vented o'er and o'er,
And in her rage her purple garments tore.
Then, on a lofty beam, the matron ty'd
The noose dishonest, and obscenely dy'd.

Soon through the court the dreadful rumour ran;
With frantic sorrow rave the female train.
Struck with superior grief, Lavinia tears
Her blooming rosy cheeks, and golden hairs.
To their loud shrieks the palace walls reply;
Thence through the town the fatal tidings fly.
All feel the stroke; and all the loss lament;
His royal robes the rev'rend monarch rent.
In wild despair, with furious hands he spread
A cloud of dust o'er all his hoary head;
And weeps and mourns aloud (a moving scene!)
His ruin'd empire, and self-murder'd queen.
Oft, but in vain, he blam'd himself alone,
That rashly he refus'd the Trojan for his son.

But now more slow his progress Turnus held,
And chas'd a few poor stragglers o'er the field.
With heartless cheer, dejected, he proceeds;
And with their master flag the fiery steeds.
He hears the tumult in the walls behind, [wind.
Shrieks, cries, and shouts, that thicken in the "Alas!" he cries, "what clamours strike my ear!
What sounds distressful from the town I hear!"
Then to the hero, as the steeds he stay'd,
Thus in the driver's form the sister said;
"This way, my lord, your former course pursue,
And urge your conquest o'er the hostile crew.
Your friends defend the town; th' Italians there
Wage with the Dardan chief an equal war.
Against his Trojans let us bend our way,
As num'rous, valiant, and renown'd, as they."

"Sister," the chief replies, "whom well I knew (Though in a mortal form conceal'd from view)
When you dissolv'd the league, by art withheld
The single fight, and mingled in the field,
O say! what pow'r dispatch'd thee from the skies,
With this sad scene to shock thy mournful eyes?
To share the labours of the dire debate,
A weeping witness of thy brother's fate?
That brother soon must perish on the plains!
For ah! what chance, what beam of hope remains?
I saw my dear Murranus yield his breath,
Who call'd on Turnus in the pangs of death;
Ev'n yet I see the warrior bite the ground,
And the soul rushing through the mighty wound!
I saw, where, stretch'd in dust, brave Ufens lay,
Nor liv'd this scene of ruin to survey,
But shut out bondage from his closing eyes;
His corse and arms remain the victor's prize.
And shall I see the city wrapt in flame?
What else was wanting to complete my shame?"

How will the Latians meet their hero's flight !
 Gods !—how will Drances point them to the sight ?
 But oh !—shall Latium see her hero fly ?—
 Is it so terrible but once to die ?—
 Hear me, oh hear me, all ye gods below !
 Since ev'ry power celestial is my foe ;
 Lo ! I descend to your infernal coast,
 From realms of light, a great and glorious ghost,
 White, and unsully'd with that dire disgrace,
 Nor stain the splendours of my regal race !"

While yet he spoke, athwart the war with speed
 Flew bleeding Sages on his foaming steed.
 Full in his face a feather'd arrow stood ;
 And to the Daunian chief he calls aloud.
 " Turnus, on you, our last, last hope depends ;
 Oh ! haste in pity, and relieve your friends :
 For, raging, to the town Æneas pours,
 To level with the dust the Latian tow'rs.
 See ! o'er the roofs the fires tempestuous rise !
 Hark !—how they roar, and thunder in the skies !
 All eyes are fixt on you, and you alone :
 The king himself stands doubtful which to own,
 You, or your Trojan rival, for his son.
 Yet worse—his queen, till now your chief support,
 Self-murder'd, fills with terror all the court.
 Messapus only with Atinas stands,
 To guard the gates and animate the bands ;
 Whom in wedg'd ranks the hostile troops enclose,
 And round them thick an iron harvest grows ;
 While you, for whom they fight, neglect the train,
 And idly wheel your chariot round the plain !"

A thousand various thoughts confound the chief,

He stood ; he gaz'd ; his bosom swell'd with grief :
 Pride, conscious valour, fury, love, and shame,
 At once set all the hero in a flame.
 Soon as his soul recover'd from the stroke ;
 Soon as, dispos'd, the cloud of passion broke ;
 Back from his car, the ruin to behold,
 His eager eyes the mournful warrior roll'd,
 Where the fierce fires in burning torrents rise
 O'er the tall roofs ; and, curling to the skies,
 Had wrapt a tow'r in flames, sublime and strong,
 Rain'd by himself, that roll'd on wheels along ;
 Whence the bold soldier broke the war below,
 And rain'd an iron tempest on the foe.

" Now, sister, fate prevails ; no more delay ;
 I'll go where rigorous fortune points the way,
 Prepar'd the bitterness of death to bear,
 I'll meet this Trojan hand to hand in war,
 No more those eyes shall view thy brother's
 shame,

Purs'd, and flying o'er the field of fame ;
 Give, give me, goddess, in this martial fire,
 This high-wrought blaze of fury, to expire."

He said ; and sudden, with an eager bound,
 Leap'd from the trembling chariot to the ground ;
 Leaves his lamenting sister, in despair ;
 Springs thro' a storm of darts, the prince to dare ;
 And bursts impetuous through the ranks of war.
 As when by age, or rains, or tempests, torn,
 A rock from some high precipice is borne ;
 Trees, herds, and swains, involving in the sweep,
 The mass flies furious from th' aerial steep ;
 Leaps down the mountain's side, with many a
 bound,
 In fiery whirls, and smokes along the ground ;
 So to the city, through the cleaving train,
 Thro' streams of blood, that drench'd the purpl'd
 plain,

While round his head the whistling jav'lin play,
 As swift, the raging hero breaks his way.
 Then from afar, he beckons with his hand,
 And loudly thus bespoke his social band :
 " To me, ye Latians, the whole war resign,
 All, all the fortune of the field is mine.
 'Tis just, ye warriors, that your chief alone
 Assert the compact, or its breach atone.
 I claim, I claim the right, in single fray,
 To meet my rival, and decide the day."

Back at the word the squadrons are compell'd,
 And for the champions form an open field.
 Now the great Trojan chief, at Turnus' name,
 Fierce from the tow'n in all his terrors came ;
 Leaves ev'ry second work of war behind ;
 Joy, pride, and courage, raise his daring mind.
 All flush'd with hopes, and glorying in his might,
 The godlike prince moves forward to the fight :
 He burns impatient for the dire alarms ;
 And thunders in the bright Vulcanian arms.
 With vast gigantic strides, he tow'rs on high,
 And looks a second Athos in the sky ;
 Or Eryx, that in Heav'n his forehead shrouds ;
 Or father Apennine involv'd in clouds,
 When with a depth of snows his brows are crown'd,
 And all his nodding groves, majestic, wave around.

Meantime the warriors, who defend the tow'n,
 Or with huge engines break the bulwarks down,
 And all the nations, studious of the sight,
 Their arms unbuckled, to survey the fight, [plain,
 Ev'n Death stands still ; and, o'er the crowd'd
 Through the long ranks, a solemn silence reigns.
 Nor less amaz'd, the Latian lord beheld
 Two chiefs engag'd in combat on the field,
 By love, fate, honour, and ambition, led
 To try their title to his daughter's bed.

Soon as each army from the field withdrew,
 Fierce, to the fight, the mighty heroes flew.
 They launch their spears ; their clashing shields resound :

Beneath their fury groans the trembling ground.
 Then their bright swords the raging champions
 And with repeated blows the charge renew. [drew,
 Courage, and chance, and strength, in both unite ;
 And the bold chiefs maintain an equal fight.

As, where proud Sila's tow'ring summits rise,
 Or huge Taburnus heaves into the skies,
 With frowning fronts two mighty bulls engage ;
 A dreadful war the bellowing rivals wage ;
 Far from the scene the trembling keepsen fly ;
 Struck dumb with terror, stand the heifers by ;
 Nor know which lord the subject herds shall lead,
 And reign at large the monarch of the mead.
 Fierce strokes they aim, repeated o'er and o'er ;
 Their dewlaps, necks, and sides, are bath'd in gore ;
 The mountains, streams, and woods rebellow to the
 So to the fight the furious heroes fly, [roar.
 So clash their shields, and echo to the sky.

Now Jove suspends his scales ; two diff'rent weights
 He cast in both, and try'd the warriors' fates.
 This, light with conquest, to the gods ascends ;
 That, charg'd with death, sinks downwards to the fiends.

With his drawn falchion Turnus strikes the foe
 On his full stretch, and rises to the blow.
 Loud shouts and groans succeed ; each army bent
 Their eager eyes, and wait the great event ;
 When lo ! all shatter'd flies the traitor sword,
 And in the stroke deserts the Daunian lord.

stranger hilt he spies, and shakes in vain :
 ll, all his hopes in flight alone remain ;
 ad, swifter than the wind, he darts along the plain.

 Thus, flying in distress, the Daunian lord [sky.
 calls on his friends ; demands his trusty sword.
 ut the great Trojan, with a lofty cry,
 forbids the bands the weapon to supply ;
 denouncing death, and threat'ning all around,
 Th' imperial town to level with the ground.
 'er ten large circuits, with a rapid pace,
 This hero leads, and that pursues, the chase.
 No light reward must crown their eager strife ;
 The long-contending prize is Turnus' noble life !

To Faunus sacred had an olive stood :
 The shipwreck'd sailors, on the hallow'd wood,
 Hung their devoted vests in honour of the god.
 But late, to leave the field for combat free,
 The Trojans fell'd the venerable tree.
 Full in the root, Æneas drove his spear :
 The dart, deep riveted, stood trembling there :
 The hero, struggling with incessant pain,
 Now bends to disengage the lance again ;
 And with his dart, at least, o'ertake the foe,
 Who, frighted, to the god preferr'd his vow.
 " Thy suppliant's pray'r, in pity, Faunus, hear,
 And thou, kind mother Earth, detain the spear ;
 If still I honour'd with a pious hand
 Your plant, by guilty Troy with steel profan'd."
 Thus he ; the god attends his humble strain ;
 The Trojan labours at the root in vain :
 There as he tugs the lance with all his might,
 Fierce, and impatient to renew the fight,
 Once more Juno to the chief restor'd
 (In brave Metiscus' form) his temper'd sword.
 This heav'nly Venus view'd with high disdain,
 And from the root releas'd the dart again.
 Renew'd in might, the tow'ring chiefs advance ;
 One shook the sword, and one the flaming lance.

Their heaving bosoms swell with stern delight,
 Pant for the combat, and demand the fight.

Then to his consort, who the war survey'd
 Thron'd on a golden cloud, the thund'rer said :
 " What schemes, my queen, are left, with vain debate,

Ev'n yet to check the ripe events of fate ?
 You know, and own, Æneas soon must rise
 From Earth, already sacred to the skies.
 Long since, those glories to the chief are ow'd,
 And Heav'n now opens to receive the god.
 To what fond purpose then this fruitless care ?
 To linger in the clouds, and urge the war ?
 Say, was it just, to wake the dire alarms ?
 To violate a god with mortal arms,
 When the bold sister to the chief restor'd,
 By thy assistance, his paternal sword ?
 (For what without thy succour could she dare ?)
 And sent the vanquish'd Turnus to the war ?
 At length, at length, the needless strife give o'er,
 At my request, indulge your rage no more ;
 Nor let revenge, dire enemy to rest,
 For ever prey on that immortal breast.
 Oh ! let thy lord thy secret sorrow share,
 Or, more than share it, give me all thy care !
 To their last sacred point the fates are come ;
 Here, here they fix'd th' unalterable doom.
 The Latian court in ruins could you lay,
 And drive the Trojans o'er the land and sea ;
 Profane with blood the holy bridal rite,
 Rekindle war, and urge them to the fight ;
 This we indulg'd : now give thy efforts o'er
 At our command ; and thwart the fates no more."

So spoke th' imperial sov'reign of the skies ;
 And, in submissive terms, the queen replies :
 " Great sire ! because thy sacred will I know,

I left my Turnus to his doom below.
 Nor had I sat, but at the will of Jove,
 Disgrac'd and pensive, in the clouds above ;
 But in the front of fight my foes engag'd,
 And, wrapt in flames, thro' all the battle rag'd ;
 I bade Juturna mingle in the strife,
 Nay, venture more, to save a brother's life.
 That charge I own ; but not to bend a bow,
 Or hurl a single jav'lin at the foe.
 This, this, I swear, by the black Stygian floods,
 The sole dread sanction of th' immortal gods :
 Now back to Heav'n, great father, I repair,
 And from this hour renounce the hateful war.
 But yet I beg, O sov'reign of the sky !
 What not the hardest laws of fate deny ;
 For your own Latium I implore this grace,
 This honour for your own majestic race ;
 When by these nuptials both the realms combine,
 And in firm leagues of peace and friendship join ;
 Still may the Latians, still remain the same,
 Nor take from Troy their language, garb, or name !

May the great race of Alban monarchs reign ;
 Kings after kings the regal line sustain ;
 And from th' Italian blood may Rome arise,
 In all her pride and glory, to the skies.
 But may a long oblivion quite destroy,
 The last, last ruins, with the name of Troy !"

The goddess spoke ; and, with a smile, replies
 The sire of men, and monarch of the skies :
 " Can Saturn's other heir, who reigns above,
 Th' imperial sister, and the wife, of Jove,
 With endless schemes of vengeance break her rest ?
 Why burns such wrath in a celestial breast ?

Cease, cease, at length, and lay your anger by.
 Since with your wish, my empress, we comply.
 Th' Ausonians ever shall remain the same
 In customs, garb, religion, and the name; [came:
 And the lost Trojan race forget from whence they
 In manners, laws, and language, shall they join,
 And Iliou shall increase the Latian line.
 From hence a pious godlike race shall rise;
 The first of men; the darlings of the skies.
 Nor all the nations of the world shall pay
 More glorious honours to thy name, than they."

Then, pleas'd and reconcil'd, the queen of Jove
 Flies to her palace, in the realms above.

'Twas then th' eternal sire of Heav'n expell'd
 The wat'ry goddess from the fighting field:
 Two hideous monsters wait obsequious by,
 Tremendous fiends! the furies of the sky;
 Hell-born and horrible, they sprung to fight,
 With dire Megæra, from the womb of Night.
 Huge wreaths of serpents spires their temples
 bound:

Their wings in whirlwinds drove the air around,
 When bent the minds of mortal men to scare
 With the black horrors of the last despair;
 When for the guilty world the god prepares
 Woes, death, disease, blue pestilence, and war;
 In pomp terrific, from the fiends abhorr'd;
 Before the throne of Heav'n's almighty lord,
 To wreak his vengeance, in his courts they stand,
 Watch his imperial nod, and fly at his command.

Of these the swiftest from the skies he sent,
 To fight the goddess with the dire portent.
 Fir'd with her charge, the fiend, with rapid flight,
 Shot in a whirlwind from Olympus' height,
 As when the Parthian dips, with fatal art,
 And doubly arms, with death, th' evenom'd dart;
 He draws the circling bow; the quiv'ring string
 Twangs; and the weapon whizzes on the wing:
 So swift to Earth the baleful fury flew,
 Till Turnus and the hoats appear'd in view.

When lo! contracted, to the bird she turns,
 That hoots o'er desolated piles and urns,
 Whose piercing strains the midnight hours invade,
 And break the solemn silence of the shade.
 Chang'd to this form obscene, the fury flies
 Round Turnus' head, and chills him with surprisè;
 This way and that she flutters o'er the field,
 And screams his death, and beats his sounding

His inmost soul a sudden horror stung; [shield.
 Stiff rose his hair; amazement chain'd his tongue:
 But soon, top-soop the goddess knew the sound
 Of the black fury as she flies around:
 She tore her beauteous face in wild despair,
 Beat her white breast, and rent her golden hair.
 "Ah me!" she cries, "in this unequal strife,
 How can thy sister now defend thy life?
 What can I more to lengthen out thy date,
 (Wretch that I am) and stop the course of fate?
 How can I stand that hideous fiend of night?
 Hence, hence, ye furies!—lo, I quit the fight.
 Your threats, ye baleful birds of night, forbear,
 Nor fright a trembling goddess to despair.
 Too well I know your pinions clatt'ring round.—
 There was a scream!—Hell, Hell is in the sound!
 You came (I know) commission'd from above,
 Sent by the high command of haughty Jove.
 This then, is this the sole reward bestow'd,
 For my lost honour, by the grateful god?
 Ah! why this lengthen'd life must I endure?
 Deny'd the taste of death, its only cure!

Curs'd with the fruitless honours of the sky!
 Condemn'd to bear impos'd eternity!
 Pleas'd, with my brother would I yield my breath,
 And share his fate, unprivileg'd from death.
 Joy is no more; and nothing Jove bestows
 In life immortal, but immortal woes!
 Earth! Earth! thy inmost centre open throw,
 And rest a goddess in the shades below!"

Then in her azure robes she wrapp'd her head,
 Sigh'd, sobb'd, and plung'd into her wat'ry bed;
 Her last low murmur, as the stream divides,
 Work up in air, and bubble on the tides.

Now at the foe, the Trojan hero shook
 His pointed spear, and sternly thus bespoke:
 "What methods, Turnus, yet remain for fight?
 'Tis strength, not swiftness, must decide the fight.
 Try all thy arts and vigour to escape
 Thy instant doom, and vary ev'ry shape;
 Wish for the morning's rapid wings, to fly,
 Shoot down to Hell; or vault into the sky."—
 "Not those insulting empty vaunts I dread," Reply'd the mournful chief, and shook his head;
 "No—but the gods with fear my bosom move,
 And he, my greatest foe, almighty Jove!"

The warrior said; and cast his fiery eyes
 Where an huge stone, a rocky fragment, lies;
 Black, rough, prodigious, vast!—the common
 For ages past, and barrier of the ground. [bound Scarce twelve strong men the pond'rous mass could
 Such as disgrace these dark degen'rate days. [rise,
 This in his trembling hand he heav'd to throw,
 Ran with the load, and hurl'd it at the foe:
 But ran all giddy with affright, nor knew
 Which way he took, nor what a weight he threw.
 His loose knees tremble, nor support their load;
 Round his cold heart congeals the settling blood.
 Short of the mark, and guiltless of a wound,
 Th' unwieldy mass came thund'ring to the ground,
 And, as when slumber seals the closing sight,
 The sick wild fancy labours in the night;
 Some dreadful visionary foe we shun
 With airy strides, but strive in vain to run;
 In vain our baffled limbs their pow'rs essay;
 We faint, we stagger, sink, and fall away;
 Drain'd of our strength, we neither fight nor fly,
 And on the tongue the straggling accents die:
 The chief so labours, but with fruitless pain;
 The fiend still thwarts him, and he toils in vain!

Amidst a thousand doubts, he stands oppress'd,
 A thousand terrors working in his breast.
 Now to the Latian battlements on high,
 Now to his friends, he turns his trembling eye,
 Now to the threat'ning lance, already wing'd to fly.
 No friendly aid, no glimm'ring hopes appear,
 No car, no steeds, nor goddess charioteer!

With level'd eye the Trojan mark'd the part;
 Then whirls with all his force the whizzing dart.
 A stone displod, with less fury far,
 Flies from the brazen engine of war:
 And wrapp'd in flames, far less enrag'd and loud,
 Bursts the big thunder from the breaking cloud.
 Swift as the whirlwind sweeps along the skies,
 The jav'lin, charg'd with sure destruction, flies;
 Its rapid progress through the sev'nfold shield,
 And the thick mail, with matchless fury held;
 Thence, through his thigh, drove deep the griding
 wound,

And bent the hapless warrior to the ground.
 With peals of groans the pale Rutulians rise:
 The groves and mountains ring with mournful cries.

His eyes and hands the vanquish'd hero rear'd,
 And to the chief his moving pray'r prefer'd :
 " Prince, I deserve, nor deprecate, my death :
 Then, use thy fortune ; take my forfeit breath !
 Yet, if a parent's woes thy soul incline,
 Think what thy father was ; then pity mine !
 Think at thy feet the hoary monarch thrown,
 Grov'ling, and pleading for an only son !
 Then save the son ! in him the father save !
 Nor bow his age, with sorrow, to the grave !
 Or, oh ! at least, this mercy I implore,
 My breathless relics to my friends restore.
 Thine is the conquest, lo ! the Latjan hands
 Behold their gen'ral stretch his suppliant hands !
 Restrain thy farther vengeance ; I resign
 My former claim ; the royal fair is thine."
 While, the hero, touch'd with gen'rous woe,
 Express'd his hand, and gaz'd upon the foe.

His melting words to mercy now inclin'd,
 Still more and more, the victor's noble mind ;
 When, lo ! by chance, the golden belt he spy'd,
 The belt of Pallas, glitt'ring at his side ;
 Which from the dying youth the warrior tore,
 And the refulgent prize in triumph wore.
 His eyes, fierce-flaming, o'er the trophy roll,
 That wakes the slum'ring vengeance in his soul.
 Then with loud accents, and a dreadful look,
 Stern and terrific, to the prince he spoke : [tend]
 " Thou ! wretch accurs'd ! canst thou to grace pre-
 Clad in the spoils of my dear murder'd friend ?
 Go then, a victim to his spirit, go ;
 'Tis Pallas, Pallas, gives the fatal blow.
 Thus is his ghost aton'd."—The hero said ;
 And bury'd in his breast the furious blade.
 With a deep groan the dying warrior fell,
 And the majestic soul disdainful plung'd to Hell.

VIDA'S ART OF POETRY.

IN THREE BOOKS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
 PHILIP,

BARL STANHOPE, VISCOUNT MANON, AND BARON
 SELWATER,

this translation is dedicated, by his lordship's humble servant and chaplain,

CHRISTOPHER FITZ.

BOOK I.

Give me, ye sacred Muses, to impart
 The hidden secrets of your tuneful art ;
 Give me your awful mysteries to sing,
 Unlock, and open wide, your sacred spring ;
 While from his infancy the bard I lead,
 And set him on your mountain's lofty head ;
 Direct his course, and point him out the road
 To sing in epic strains an hero or a god.

What youth, whose generous bosom pants for praise,

Will dare with me to beat those arduous ways ?
 O'er high Parnassus' painful steeps to go,
 And leave the traveling multitude below :
 Where the glad Muses sing, and form the choir,
 While bright Apollo strikes the silver lyre,
 Approach thou first, great Francis, nor refuse
 To pay due honours to the sacred Muse ;
 While Gallia waits for thy auspicious reign,
 Till age completes the monarch in the man ;
 Meantime the Muse may bring some small relief,
 To charm thy anguish, and suspend thy grief ;
 While guilty fortune's stern decrees detain
 Thee and thy brother in the realms of Spain ;
 Far, far transported from your native place,
 Your country's, father's, and your friend's embrace !
 Such are the terms the cruel fates impose
 On your great father, struggling with his woes,
 Such are their hard conditions :—they require
 The sons to purchase, and redeem, the sire.
 But yet, brave youth, from grief, from tears, abstain,
 Fate may relent, and Heaven grow mild again ;
 At last, perhaps, the glorious day may come,
 The day that brings our royal exile home ;

When, to thy native realms in peace restor'd,
 The ravish'd crowds shall hail their passing lord ;
 When each transported city shall rejoice,
 And nations bless thee with a public voice ;
 To the throng'd fane the matrons shall repair ;
 Absolve their vows, and breathe their souls in prayer.
 Till then, let every Muse engage thy love,
 With me at large o'er high Parnassus rove,
 Range every bow, and sport in every grove.

First then observe, that verse is ne'er confin'd
 To one fixt measure, or determin'd kind ;
 Though at its birth it sung the gods alone,
 And then religion claim'd it for her own ;
 In sacred strains address'd the deity,
 And spoke a language worthy of the sky ;
 New themes succeeding bards began to choose,
 And in a wider field engag'd the Muse ;
 The common bulk of subjects to rehearse
 In all the rich varieties of verse.

Yet none of all with equal honours shine
 (But those which celebrate the Power Divine)
 To those exalted measures, which declare
 The deeds of heroes, and the sons of war.
 From hence posterity the name bestow'd
 On this rich present of the Delphic god ;
 Fame says, Phœnonce in this measure gave
 Apollo's answers from the Pythian cave. [chooost,

But ere you write, consult your strength, and
 A theme proportion'd justly to your Muse.
 For though in chief these precepts are bestow'd
 On him who sings an hero or a god ;
 To other themes their general use extends,
 And serves in different views to different ends.
 Whether the lofty Muse, with tragic rage,
 Would proudly stalk in buskins on the stage ;
 Or in soft elegies our pity move,
 And show the youth in all the flames of love ;
 Or sing the shepherd's woes in humble strains,
 And the low humours of contending swains :
 These faithful rules shall guide the bard along
 In every measure, argument, and song.

Be sure (whatever you propose to write)
 Let the chief motive be your own delight,
 And well-weigh'd choice :—a task enjoin'd refuse,
 Unless a monarch should command your Muse.

(If we may hope those golden times to see,
 When bards become the care of majesty!)
 Free and spontaneous the smooth numbers glide,
 Where choice determines, and our wills preside;
 But, at command, we toil with fruitless pain,
 And drag th' involuntary load in vain.
 Nor, at its birth, indulge your warm desire,
 On the first glimmering of the sacred fire;
 Defer the mighty task; and weigh your power,
 And every part in every view explore;
 And let the theme in different prospect roll
 Deep in your thoughts, and grow into the soul.
 But ere with sails uncurl'd you fly away,
 And cleave the bosom of the boundless sea;
 A fund of words and images prepare,
 And lay the bright materials up with care,
 Which, at due time, occasion may produce,
 All rang'd in order for the poet's use.
 Some happy objects by mere chance are brought
 From hidden causes to the wandering thought;
 Which, if once lost, you labour long in vain
 To catch th' ideal fugitives again.
 Nor must I fail their conduct to extol,
 Who, when they lay the basis of the whole,
 Explore the ancients with a watchful eye,
 Lay all their charms and elegancies by,
 Then to their use the precious spoils apply.
 At first without the least restraint compose,
 And mould the future poem into prose;
 A full and proper series to maintain,
 And draw the just connection in a chain;
 By stated bounds your progress to control,
 To join the parts, and regulate the whole.
 And now 'tis time to spread the opening sails
 Wide to the wanton winds and flattering gales;
 'Tis time we now prescribe the genuine rules
 To raise the beauteous fabric with applause;
 But first some method requisite appears
 To form the boy, and mould his tender years.
 In vain the bard the sacred wreath pursues,
 Unless train'd up and season'd to the Muse.
 Soon as the prattling innocent shall reach
 To the first use and rudiments of speech,
 Ev'n then, by Helicon he ought to rove,
 Ev'n then the tuneful Nine should win his love
 By just degrees.—But make his guide your choice
 For his chaste phrase and elegance of voice;
 That he at first successfully may teach
 The methods, laws, and discipline of speech;
 Lest the young charge, mistaking right and wrong,
 With vicious habits prejudice his tongue.
 Habits, whose subtle seeds may mock your art,
 And spread their roots and poison thro' his heart.
 Whence none shall move me to approve the wretch,
 Who wildly borne above the vulgar reach,
 And big with vain pretences to impart
 Vast shows of learning, and a depth of art,
 For sense th' impertinence of terms affords;
 An idle cant of formidable words;
 The pride of pedants, the delight of fools;
 The vile disgrace, and lumber of the schools:
 In vain the circling youths, a blooming throng,
 Dwell on th' eternal jargon of his tongue.
 Deluded fools!—The same is their mistake,
 Who at the limpid stream their thirst may slake,
 Yet choose the tainted waters of the lake.
 Let no such pest approach the blooming care,
 Deprave his style, and violate his ear;
 But far, oh far, to some remoter place
 Drive the vile wretch to teach a barbarous race!

Now to the Muse's stream the pupil bring,
 To drink large draughts of the Pierian spring;
 And from his birth the sacred bard adore,
 Nurst by the Nine, on Mincio's flowery shore;
 And ask the gods his numbers to inspire,
 With like invention, majesty, and fire.
 He reads Ascanius' deeds with equal flame,
 And longs with him to run at nobler game.
 For youths of ages past he makes his moan,
 And learns to pity years so like his own;
 Which with too swift, and too severe a doom,
 The fate of war had hurried to the tomb.
 His eyes, for Pallas, and for Lausus, flow,
 Mourn with their sires, and weep another's woe.
 But when Euryalus, in all his charms,
 Is snatch'd by fate from his dear mother's arms,
 And as he rolls in death, the purple flood
 Streams out, and stains his snowy limbs with blood,
 His soul the pangs of generous sorrow pierce,
 And a new tear steals out at every verse.
 Meantime with bolder steps the youth proceeds,
 And the Greek poets in succession reads;
 Seasons to either tongue his tender ears;
 Compares the heroes' glorious characters;
 Sees, how Æneas is himself alone,
 The draught of Peleus' and Laertes' son;
 How, by the poet's art, in one, conspire
 Ulysses' conduct, and Achilles' fire.

But now, young bard, with strict attention hear,
 And drink my precepts in at either ear;
 Since mighty crowds of poets you may find,
 Crowds of the Grecian and Ansonian kind,
 Learn hence what bards to quit or to pursue,
 To shun the false, and to embrace the true;
 Nor is it hard to cull each noble piece,
 And point out every glorious son of Greece;
 Above whose numbers Homer sits on high,
 And shines supreme in distant majesty;
 Whom with a reverent eye the rest regard,
 And owe their raptures to the sovereign bard;
 Through him the god their panting souls inspire,
 Swells every breast, and warms with all his fire,
 Blest were the poets with the hallow'd rage,
 Train'd up in that and the succeeding age:
 As to his time each poet nearer drew,
 His spreading fame in just proportion grew,
 By like degrees the next degenerate race
 Sunk from the height of honour to disgrace.
 And now the fame of Greece extinguish'd lies,
 Her ancient language with her glory dies.
 Her banish'd princes mourn their ravish'd crowns,
 Driven from their old hereditary thrones;
 Her drooping natives rove o'er worlds unknown,
 And weep their woes in regions not their own;
 She feels through all her states the dreadful blow,
 And mourns the fury of a barbarous foe. [mark

But when our bards brought o'er th' Aonia
 From their own Helicon to Tyber's shades;
 When first they settled on Hesperia's plains,
 Their numbers ran in rough unpolish'd strains.
 Void of the Grecian art their measures flow'd;
 Pleas'd the wild satyrs, and the sylvan crowd.
 Low shrubs and lofty forests whilom rung
 With uncouth verse, and antiquated song;
 Nor yet old Ennius sung in artless strains,
 Fights, arms, and hosts embattel'd on the plains,
 Who first aspir'd to pluck the verdant crown
 From Grecian heads, and fix it on his own.
 New wonders the succeeding bards explore,
 Which slept conceal'd in Nature's womb before;

er awful-secrets the bold poet sings,
 nd sets to view the principles of things ;
 ach part was fair, and beautiful the whole,
 nd every line was nectar to the soul.
 y such degrees the verse, as ages roll'd,
 /as stamp to form, and took the beauteous usonia's bards drew off from every part [mould.
 he barbarous dregs, and civilis'd the art .
 ill, like the day, all shining and serene, hat drives the clouds, and clears the gloomy
 scene,

elines the air, and brightens up the skies,
 ee the majestic head of Virgil rise ;
 'hocbus' undoubted son !—who clears the rust
 f the rough ancients, and shakes off their dust.
 fe on each line a nobler grace bestow'd ;
 fe thought, and spoke in every word a god.
 o grace this mighty bard, ye Muses, bring our choicest flowers, and rise all the spring ;
 ee ! how the Grecian bards, at distance thrown,
 With reverence bow to this distinguish'd son ;
 immortal sounds his golden lines impart,
 And nought can match his genius but his art.
 Ev'n Greece turns pale, and trembles at his fame,
 Which shades the lustre of her Homer's name.

Twas then Ausonia saw her language rise
 In all its strength and glory to the skies ;
 Such glory never could she boast before,
 Nor could succeeding poets make it more.
 From that blest period the poetic state
 Ran down the precipice of time and fate ;
 Degenerate souls succeed, a wretched train,
 And her old fame at once drew back again.
 One, to his genius trusts, in every part,
 And scorns the rules and discipline of art.
 While this, an empty tide of sound affords,
 And roars and thunders in a storm of words.
 Some, musically dull, all methods try
 To win the ear with sweet stupidity ;
 Unruffled strains for solid wit dispense,
 And give us numbers, when we call for sense.
 Till from th' Hesperian plains and Tyber chas'd,
 From Rome the banish'd sisters fled at last ;
 Driven by the barbarous nations, who from far
 Burst into Latium with a tide of war.
 Hence a vast change of their old manners sprung,
 The slaves were forc'd to speak their master's tongue ;

No honours now were paid the sacred Muse,
 But all were bent on mercenary views ;
 Till Latium saw with joy th' Aonian train
 By the great Medici restor'd again ;
 Th' illustrious Medici, of Tuscan race,
 Were born to cherish learning in disgrace,
 New life on every science to bestow,
 And lull the cries of Europe in her woe.
 With pity they beheld those turns of fate,
 And propp'd the ruins of the Grecian state ;
 For lest her wit should perish with her fame,
 Their care supported still the Argive name ;
 They call'd th' aspiring youths from distant parts,
 To plant Ausonia with the Grecian arts ;
 To bask in ease, and science to diffuse,
 And to restore the empire of the Muse ;
 They sent to ravag'd provinces with care,
 And cities wasted by the rage of war,
 To buy the ancients' works, of deathless fame,
 And snatch th' immortal labours from the flame ;
 To which the fœs had doom'd each glorious piece,
 Who reign and lord it in the realms of Greece.

(But we, ye gods, would raise a foreign lord,
 As yet untaught to sheath the civil sword !)
 Through many a period this has been the fate,
 And this the list of the poetic state.

Hence sacred Virgil from thy soul adore
 Above the rest, and to thy utmost power
 Pursue the glorious paths he struck before.
 If he supplies not all your wants, peruse
 Th' immortal strains of each Augustan Muse.
 There stop—nor rashly seek to know the rest,
 But drive the dire ambition from thy breast,
 Till riper years and judgment form thy thoughts
 To mark their beauties, and avoid their faults.

Meantime, ye parents, with attention hear,
 And, thus advis'd, exert your utmost care ;
 The blameless tutor from a thousand choose,
 One from his soul devoted to the Muse ;
 Who, pleas'd the tender pupil to improve,
 Regards, and loves him, with a father's love.
 Youth, of itself to numerous ills betray'd,
 Requires a prop, and wants a foreign aid ;
 Unless a master's rules his mind incline
 To love and cultivate the sacred Nine,
 His thoughts a thousand objects will employ,
 And from Parnassus lead the wandering boy.
 So trusts the swain the saplings to the earth ;
 So hopes in time to see the sprouting birth ;
 Against the winds defensive props he forms,
 To shield the future forest from the storms,
 That each embolden'd plant at length may rise
 In verdant pride, and shoot into the skies.

But let the guide, if e'er he would improve
 His charge, avoid his hate, and win his love ;
 Lest in his rage wrong measures he may take,
 And loath the Muses for the teacher's sake.
 His soul then slacken'd from her native force,
 Flags at the barrier, and forgets the course.
 Nor by your anger be the youth e'er-aw'd,
 But scorn th' ungenerous province of the rod ;
 Th' offended Muses never can sustain
 To hear the shriekings of the tender train,
 But, stung with grief and anguish, bang behind ;
 Damp'd is the sprightly vigour of the mind.
 The boy no daring images inspire,
 No bright ideas set his thoughts on fire :
 He drags on heavily th' ungrateful load,
 Grown obstinately dull, and season'd to the rod.

I know a pedant, who to penance brought
 His trembling pupils for the lightest fault ;
 His soul transported with a storm of ire,
 And all the rage that malice could inspire :
 By turns the torturing scourges we might hear,
 By turns the shrieks of wretches stunn'd the ear.
 Still to my mind the dire ideas rise,
 When rage unusual sparkled in his eyes ;
 When with the dreadful scourge insulting loud,
 The tyrant terrify'd the blooming crowd—
 A boy the fairest of the frighted train,
 Who yet scarce gave the promise of a man,
 Ah ! dismal object ! idly pass'd the day
 In all the thoughtless innocence of play ;
 When lo ! th' imperious wretch, inflam'd with rage,
 Fierce, and regardless of his tender age,
 With fury storms ; the fault his clamour urge :
 His hand high-waving brandishes the scourge,
 Tears, vows, and prayers, the tyrant's ears assail ;
 In vain ;—nor tears, nor vows, nor prayers, prevail.
 The trembling innocent from deep despair
 Sicken'd, and breath'd his little soul in air.

For him, beneath his poplar, mourns the Po;
 For him the tears of hoary Serius flow!
 For him their tears the watery sisters shed,
 Who lov'd him living, and deplor'd him dead!
 The furious pedant, to restrain his rage,
 Should mark th' example of a former age,
 How fierce Alcides, warm'd with youthful ire,
 Dash'd on his master's front his vocal lyre.
 But yet, ye youths, confess your masters' sway,
 And their commands implicitly obey.

Whoever then this arduous task pursues,
 To form the bard, and cultivate the Muse,
 Let him by softer means, and milder ways,
 Warm his ambition with the love of praise;
 Soon as his precepts shall engage his heart,
 And fan the rising fire in every part,
 Light is the task;—for then the eager boy
 Pursues the voluntary toil with joy;
 Diadems th' inglorious indolence of rest,
 And feeds th' immortal ardour in his breast.

And here the common practice of the schools,
 By known experience, justifies my rules,
 The youths in social studies to engage;
 For then the rivals burn with generous rage,
 Each soul the stings of emulation raise,
 And every little bosom beats for praise.
 But gifts propos'd will urge them best to rise;
 Fir'd at the glorious prospect of a prize,
 With noble jealousy, the blooming hard
 Reads, labours, glows, and strains for the reward;
 Fears lest his happy rival win the race,
 And raise a triumph on his own disgrace.

But when once season'd to the rage divine,
 He loves and courts the raptures of the Nine;
 The sense of glory, and the love of fame,
 Serve but as second motives to the flame;
 The thrilling pleasure all the bard subdues,
 Lock'd in the strict embraces of the Muse.
 See! when harsh parents force the youth to quit,
 For meaner arts, the dear delights of wit,
 If e'er the wonted warmth his thoughts inspire,
 And with past pleasures set his mind on fire;
 How from his soul he longs, but longs in vain,
 To haunt the groves and purring streams again;
 No stern commands of parents can control,
 No force can check the sallies of his soul.
 So turns the courser season'd to the rein,
 That spies his females on a distant plain,
 And longs to act his pleasures o'er again.
 Fir'd with remembrance of his joys, he bounds,
 He foams and strives to reach the well-known
 grounds;

The going spurs his furious flames improve,
 And rouse within him all the rage of love;
 Ply'd with the scourge he still neglects his haunts,
 And moves reluctant, when he moves at last;
 Reverts his eye, regrets the distant mare;
 And neighs impatient for the dappled fair.

How oft the youth would long to change his fate,

Who, high advanc'd to all the pomp of state,
 With grief his gawdy load of grandeur views.
 Lost at too high a distance from the Muse!
 How oft he sighs by warbling streams to rove,
 And quit the palace for the shady grove;
 How oft in Tybur's cold retreats to lye,
 And gladly stoop to cheerful poverty,
 Beneath the rigour of the wintry sky!
 But yet how many curse their fruitless toil,
 Who turn and cultivate a barren soil?

This, ere too late, the master they should
 By a sure omen, and a certain sign;
 The hopeful youth, determin'd by his choice,
 Works without precept, and prevents advice,
 Consults his teacher, plies his task with joy,
 And a quick sense of glory fires the boy.
 He challenges the crowd;—the conqueror o'er,
 He struts away the victor of an hour.
 Then vanquish'd in his turn; o'erwhelm'd with care,

He weeps, he pines, he sickens with despair;
 Nor looks his little rivals in the face,
 But flies for shelter to some lonely place,
 To mourn his shame, and cover his disgrace.
 His master's frowns impatient to sustain,
 Straight he returns, and wins the day again.
 This is the boy his better fates design
 To rise the future darling of the Nine,
 For him the Muses weave the sacred crown,
 And bright Apollo claims him for his own.
 Not the least hope th' unactive youth can raise,
 Dead to the prospect, and the sense of praise;
 Who your just rules with dull attention hears,
 Nor lends his understanding, but his ears,
 Resolv'd his parts in indolence to keep,
 He lulls his drowsy faculties asleep;
 The wretch your best endeavours will betray,
 And the superfluous care is thrown away.

I fear for him, who ripens ere his prime;
 For all productions there's a proper time.
 Oh! may no apples in the spring appear,
 Out-grow the seasons, and prevent the year,
 Nor mellow yet, till autumn stains the vine,
 And the full presses foam with floods of wine.
 Torn from the parent tree too soon, they lie
 Trod down by every swain who passes by.

Nor should the youth too strictly be confin'd,
 'Tis sometimes proper to unbend his mind;
 When tir'd with study, let him seek the plains
 And mark the homely humours of the swains;
 Or pleas'd the toils to spread, or horns to wind,
 Hunt the fleet mountain-goat, or forest-hind.
 Meantime the youth, impatient that the day
 Should pass in pleasures unimprov'd away,
 Steals from the shouting crowd, and quits the plain,
 To sing the sylvan gods in rural strains;
 Or calls the Muses to Albuca's shades,
 Courts, and enjoys, the visionary maids.
 So labour'd fields, with crops alternate blest,
 By turns lie fallow, and indulge their rest;
 The swain contented bids the hungry soil
 Enjoy a sweet vicissitude from toil;
 Till earth renews her genial powers to bear,
 And pays his prudence with a bounteous year.

On a strict view your solid judgment frame,
 Nor think that genius is in all the same;
 How oft the youth, who wants the sacred fire,
 Fondly mistakes for genius his desire?
 Courts the coy Muses, though rejected still,
 Nor Nature seconds his misguided will:
 He strives, he toils with unavailing care;
 Nor Heaven relents, nor Phoebus bears his prayer.
 He with success, perhaps, may plead a cause,
 Shine at the bar, and flourish by the laws;
 Perhaps discover Nature's secret springs,
 And bring to light th' originals of things.
 But sometimes precept will such force impart,
 That Nature bends beneath the power of art.

Besides, 'tis no light province to remove
 From the rash-boy the fiery pangs of love;

ill, ripe in years, and more confirm'd in age,
 He learns to bear the flames of Cupid's rage;
 His hidden fires on all his vitals prey,
 Devour the youth, and melt his soul away
 By slow degrees;—blot out his golden dreams,
 The tuneful poets, and Castalian streams;
 Struck with a secret wound, he weeps and sighs;
 In every thought the darling phantoms rise;
 The fancy'd charmer swims before his sight,
 His theme all day, his vision all the night;
 The wandering object takes up all his care,
 Nor can he quit th' imaginary fair.
 Meantime his sire, unconscious of his pain,
 Applies the temper'd medicines in vain;
 The plague, so deeply rooted in his heart,
 Mocks every slight attempt of Pagan's art;
 The flames of Cupid all his breast inspire,
 And in the lover's quench the poet's fire.

When in his riper years, without control,
 The Nine have took possession of his soul;
 When, sacred to their god, the crown he wears,
 To other authors let him bend his cares;
 Consult their styles, examine every part,
 And a new tincture take from every art.
 First study Tully's language and his sense,
 And range that boundless field of eloquence.
 Tully, Rome's other glory, still affords
 The best expressions and the richest words;
 As high o'er all in eloquence he stood,
 As Rome o'er all the nations she subdued.
 Let him read men and manners, and explore
 The site and distances from shore to shore;
 Then let him travel, or to maps repair,
 And see imagin'd cities rising there;
 Range with his eyes the Earth's fictitious ball,
 And pass o'er figur'd worlds that grace the wall.
 Some in the bloody shock of arms appear,
 To paint the native horrors of the war;
 Through charging hosts they rush before they write,
 And plunge in all the tumult of the fight.
 But since our lives, contracted in their date
 By scanty bounds and circumscrib'd by fate,
 Can never launch through all the depths of arts,
 Ye youths, touch only the material parts;
 There stop your labour, there your search control,
 And draw from thence a notion of the whole.
 From distant climes when the rich merchants come,
 To bring the wealth of foreign regions home;
 Contend the friendly harbours to explore,
 They only touch upon the winding shore;
 Nor with vain labour wander up and down
 To view the land, and visit every town;
 That would but call them from their former road,
 To spend an age in banishment abroad;
 Too late returning from the dangerous main,
 To see their countries and their friends again.

Still be the sacred poets your delight,
 Read them by day, consult them in the night;
 From those clear fountains all your raptures bring,
 And draw for ever from the Muses' spring.
 But let your subject in your bosom roll,
 Claim every thought, and draw in all the soul.
 That constant object to your mind display,
 Your toil all night, your labour all the day.

I need not all the rules of verse disclose,
 Nor how their various measures to dispose;
 The tutor here with ease his charge may guide
 To join the parts and numbers, or divide.
 Now let him words to stated laws submit,
 Or yoke to measures, or reduce to feet;

Now let him softly to himself rehearse
 His first attempts and rudiments of verse;
 Fix on those rich expressions his regard
 To use made sacred by some ancient bard;
 Tost by a different gust of hopes and fears,
 He begs of Heaven an hundred eyes and ears.
 Now here, now there, coy Nature he pursues,
 And takes one image in a thousand views.
 He waits the happy moment that affords
 The noblest thoughts, and most expressive words,
 He brooks no dull delay; admits no rest;
 A tide of passion struggles in his breast;
 Round his dark soul no clear ideas play,
 The most familiar objects glide away.
 All fix in thought, astonish'd he appears,
 His soul examines, and consults his ears;
 And racks his faithless memory, to find
 Some traces faintly sketch'd upon his mind.
 There he unlocks the glorious magazine,
 And opens every faculty within;
 Brings out with pride their intellectual spoils,
 And with the noble treasure crowns his toils;
 And oft mere chance shall images display,
 That strike his mind engag'd a different way.
 Still he persists; regrets no toil nor pain,
 And still the task, he tried before in vain,
 Piles with unweary'd diligence again.
 For oft unmanageable thoughts appear,
 That mock his labour, and delude his care;
 Th' impatient bard, with all his nerves apply'd,
 Tries all the avenues on every side;
 Resolv'd and bent the precipice to gain;
 Though yet he labours at the rock in vain;
 By his own strength and Heaven, with conquest
 He wins th' important victory at last; [grac'd,
 Stretch'd by his hands the vanquish'd monster lies,
 And the proud triumph lifts him to the skies.
 But when ev'n chance and all his efforts fail,
 Nor toils, nor vigilance, nor cares prevail;
 His past attempts in vain the boy renews,
 And waits the softer seasons of the Muse;
 He quits his work; throws by his fond desires;
 And from his task reluctantly retires.

Thus o'er the fields the swain pursues his road,
 Till stopp'd at length by some impervious flood,
 That from a mountain's brow, o'ercharg'd with rains, [plains;
 Bursts in a thundering tide, and foams along the
 With horror chill'd, he traverses the shore,
 Sees the waves rise, and hears the torrent roar;
 Then griev'd returns, or waits with vain delay
 Till the tumultuous deluge rolls away.

But in no Iliad let the youth engage
 His tender years, and unexperient age;
 Let him by just degrees and steps proceed,
 Sing with the swains, and tune the tender reed;
 He with success an humbler theme may ply,
 And, Virgil-like, immortalise a fly:
 Or sing the mice, their battles and attacks,
 Against the croaking natives of the lakes;
 Or with what art her toils the spider sets,
 And spins her slimy entrails into nets.

And here embrace, ye teachers, this advice;
 Not to be too inquisitively nice,
 But, till the soul enlarg'd in strength appears,
 Indulge the boy, and spare his tender years;
 Till, to ripe judgment and experience brought,
 Himself discerns and blushes at a fault;
 For if the critic's eyes too strictly pierce,
 To point each blemish out in every verse,

Void of all hope the stripling may depart,
 And turn his studies to another art.
 But if resolv'd his darling faults to see,
 A youth of genius should apply to me,
 And court my elder judgment to peruse
 Th' imperfect labours of his infant Muse;
 I should not scruple, with a candid eye,
 To read and praise his poem to the sky;
 With seeming rapture on each line to pause,
 And dwell on each expression with applause.
 But when my praises had inflam'd his mind,
 If some lame verse limp'd slowly up behind;
 One, that himself, unobscured, had not found,
 By numbers charm'd, and led away by sound;
 I should not fear to minister a prop,
 And give him stronger feet to keep it up;
 Teach it to run along more firm and sure;
 Nor would I show the wound before the cure.

For what remains; the poet I enjoin
 To form no glorious scheme, no great design,
 Till free from business he retires alone,
 And flies the giddy tumult of the town;
 Seeks rural pleasures, and enjoys the glades,
 And courts the thoughtful silence of the shades,
 Where the fair Dryads haunt their native woods,
 With all the orders of the sylvan gods.
 Here in their soft retreats the poets lye,
 Serene, and blest with cheerful poverty;
 No guilty schemes of wealth their souls molest,
 No cares, no prospects, discompose their rest;
 No scenes of grandeur glitter in their view;
 Here they the joys of innocence pursue,
 And taste the pleasures of the happy few.
 From a rock's entrails the barbarian sprung,
 Who dares to violate the sacred throng
 By deeds or words—The wretch, by fury driven,
 Assaults the darling colony of Heaven!
 Some have look'd down, we know, with scornful eyes [rise,

On the bright Muse who taught them how to
 And paid, when rais'd to grandeur, no regard
 From that high station to the sacred bard.
 Uninjur'd, mortals, let the poets lye,
 Or dread th' impending vengeance of the sky;
 The gods still listen'd to their constant prayer,
 And made the poets their peculiar care.
 They, with contempt, on fortune's gift look down,
 And laugh at kings who wear an envy'd crown.
 Rais'd and transported by their soaring mind,
 From their proud eminence they view mankind
 Lost in a cloud; they see them toil below,
 All busy to promote their common woe.
 Of guilt unconscious, with a steady soul, [roll.
 They see the lightnings flash, and hear the thunders
 When, girt with terrors, Heaven's almighty sire
 Lanches his triple bolts, and forky fire,
 When o'er high towers the red destroyer plays,
 And strikes the mountains with the pointed blaze;
 Safe in their innocence, like gods, they rise,
 And lift their souls serenely to the skies.
 Fly, ye profane;—the sacred Nine were given
 To bless these lower worlds by bounteous Heaven:
 Of old, Prometheus, from the realms above,
 Brought down these daughters of almighty Jove,
 When to his native earth the robber came,
 Charg'd with the plunder of ethereal flame.
 As due compassion touch'd his generous mind,
 To see the savage state of human kind;
 When, led to range at large the bright abodes,
 And share th' ambrosial banquets of the gods;

In many a whirl he saw Olympos driven,
 And heard th' eternal harmony of Heaven.
 Turn'd round and round the concert charm'd his
 With all the music of the dancing spheres; [ears
 The sacred Nine his wondering eyes behold,
 As each her orb in just divisions roll'd;
 The thief beholds them with ambitious eyes,
 And, bent on fraud, he meditates the prize;
 A prize! the noblest gift he could bestow
 (Next to the fire) on human race below;
 At length th' immortals reconcil'd resign'd
 The fair celestial sisters to mankind;
 Though bound to Caucasus with solid chains,
 Th' aspiring robber groan'd in endless pains;
 By which deter'd, for ages lay supine
 The race of mortals, nor invoc'd the Nine:
 Till Heaven in verse show'd man his future state,
 And open'd every distant scene of fate.
 First, the great father of the gods above
 Sung in Dodona and the Libyan grove;
 Next, to th' inquiring nations Themis gave
 Her sacred answers from the Phocian cave;
 Then Phoebus warn'd them from the Delphic dome,
 Of future time, and ages yet to come;
 And reverend Faunus utter'd truths divine
 To the first founders of the Latian line.
 Next the great race of hallow'd prophets came,
 With them the Sibyls of immortal fame,
 Inspir'd with all the god; who rapt on high
 With more than mortal rage unbounded fly,
 And range the dark recesses of the sky.
 Next, at their feasts, the people sung their lays
 (The same their prophets sung in former days);
 Their theme an hero, and his deathless praise.

What has to man of nobler worth been given,
 Than this the best and greatest boon of Heaven?
 Whatever power the glorious gift bestow'd,
 We trace the certain footsteps of a god;
 By thee inspir'd, the daring poet flies,
 His soul mounts up, and towers above the skies;
 Thou art the source of pleasure, and we see
 No joy, no transport, when debar'd of thee;
 Thy tuneful deity the feather'd throng
 Confess in all the measures of their song.
 Thy great commands the savages obey,
 And every silent native of the sea:
 Led by thy voice the starting rocks advance,
 And listening forests mingle in the dance.
 On thy sweet notes the damn'd rejoice to dwell,
 Thy strains suspended all the din of Hell;
 Lull'd by the sound, the furies rag'd no more,
 And Hell's infernal porter ceas'd to roar.
 Thy powers exalt us to the realms above,
 To feast with gods, and sit the guests of Jove!
 Thy presence softens anguish, woe, and strife,
 And reconciles us to the load of life.
 Hail, thou bright comfort of these low abodes,
 Thou joy of men and darling of the gods.
 As priest and poet, in these humble lays,
 I boldly labour to resound thy praise;
 To hang thy shrines, this gift I bring along,
 And to thy altars guide the tender throng.

VIDA'S ART OF POETRY.

BOOK II.

Proceps, ye Nine, descended from above,
 Ye tuneful daughters of almighty Jove;

teach the future age I hasten on,
 I'd open every source of Helicon,
 My priest and bard with rage divine inspire,
 While to your shrine I lead the blooming choir.
 My road was the way, and dubious, which we trod,
 To show, ye goddesses, a surer road;
 I point out those paths, which you can find alone,
 Beyond all the world but to yourselves unknown;
 O! all th' Hesperian youths with me implore
 Your softer influence, and propitious power,
 To range beneath my banners, boldly tread
 Those arduous tracks to reach your mountain's head.

Now mules 'tis now my province to impart;
 First to invent, and then dispose with art:
 Each a laborious task; but they who share
 Heaven's kinder bounty, and peculiar care,
 A glorious train of images may find,
 Preventing hope, and crowding on the mind.
 The other task, to settle every part,
 Depends on judgment, and the powers of art;
 From whence in chief the poet hopes to raise
 His future glory, and immortal praise.

This as a rule the noblest bards esteem,
 To touch at first in general on the theme;
 To hint at all the subject in a line;
 And draw in miniature the whole design.
 Nor in themselves confide; but next implore
 The timely aid of some celestial power;
 To guide your labours, and point out your road,
 Choose, as you please, your tutelary god;
 But still invoke some guardian deity,
 Some power, to look auspicious from the sky:
 To nothing great should mortals bend their care,
 Till Jove be solemnly address'd in prayer.
 'Tis not enough to call for aid divine,
 And court but once the favor of the Nine;
 When objects rise, that mock your toil and pain,
 Above the labour and the reach of man;
 Then you may supplicate the blest abodes,
 And ask the friendly succour of the gods.
 Shock not your reader, nor begin too fierce,
 Nor swell and pluster in a pomp of verse;
 At first all needless ornament remove,
 To shun his prejudice, and win his love,
 At first, you find most favour and success
 In plain expression, and a modest dress.
 For if too arrogant you vaunt your might,
 You fall with greater scandal in the fight,
 When on the nicest point your fortune stands,
 And all your courage, all your strength demands.
 With gradual flights surprise us as we read;
 And let more glorious images succeed,
 To wake our souls; to kindle our desire
 Still to read on, and fan the rising fire.
 But ne'er the subject of your work proclaim
 In its own colours, and its genuine name;
 Let it by distant tokens be convey'd, [shade.
 And wrapt in other words, and cover'd in their
 At last the subject from the friendly shroud
 Bursts out, and shines the brighter from the cloud;
 Then the dissolving darkness breaks away,
 And every object glares in open day.
 Thus great Ulysses' toils were I to choose,¹
 For the main theme that should employ my Muse;

By his long labours of immortal fame,
 Should stain my hero, but conceal his name;

As one, who lost at sea, had nations seen, [men,
 And mark'd their towns, their manners, and their
 Since Troy was level'd to the dust by Greece;
 Till a few lines epitomis'd the piece.

But study now what order to maintain,
 To link the work in one continued chain,
 That, when the Muse displays her artful scheme,
 And at the proper time unfolds the theme;
 Each part may find its own determin'd place,
 Laid out with method, and dispos'd with grace;
 That to the destin'd scope the piece may tend,
 And keep one constant tenour to the end.

First to surprising novelties inclin'd,
 The bards some unexpected objects find,
 To wake attention, and suspend the mind.
 A cold dull order bravely they forsake;
 Fixt and resolv'd the winding way to take,
 They nobly deviate from the beaten track.
 The poet marks th' occasion, as he sings,
 To launch out boldly from the midst of things,
 Where some distinguish'd incident he views,
 Some shining action that deserves a Muse.
 Thence by degrees the wondering reader brings
 To trace the subject backward to its springs,
 Lest at his entrance he should idly stay,
 Shock'd at his toil, and dubious of his way;
 For when set down so near the promis'd goal,
 The flattering prospect tempts and fires his soul;
 Already past the treacherous bounds appear,
 Then most at distance, when they seem so near;
 Far from his grasp the fleeting harbour flies,
 Courts his pursuit, but mocks his dazzled eyes;
 The promis'd region he with joy had spy'd,
 Vast tracks of oceans from his reach divide;
 Still must he backward steer his lengthen'd way,
 And plough a wide interminable sea.

No skillful poet would his Muse employ,
 From Paris' vote to trace the fall of Troy,
 Nor every deed of Hector to relate,
 While his strong arm suspended Ilium's fate;
 Work! for some annalist! some heavy fool,
 Correctly dry, and regularly dull.
 Best near the end those dreadful scenes appear;²
 Wake then, and rouse the furies of the war.
 But for his ravish'd fair at first engage
 Peleides' soul in unrelenting rage.
 Be this the cause that every Phrygian flood
 Swells with red waves, and rolls a tide of blood;
 That Xanthus' urns a purple deluge pour,
 And the deep trenches float with human gore.
 Nor former deeds in silence must we lose,
 The league at Aulis, and the mutual vows,
 The Spartan raging for his ravish'd spouse;
 The thousand ships; the woes which Ilium bore
 From Greece, for nine revolving years before.
 This rule with judgment should the bard maintain,³
 Who brings Laertes' wandering son again,
 From burning Ilium to his native reign.
 Let him not lanch from Ida's strand his ships,
 With his attendant friends into the deeps;
 Nor stay to vanquish the Ciconian host;
 But let him first appear (his comrades lost)
 With fair Calypso on th' Ogygian coast.
 From thence, a world of toils and dangers past,
 Waft him to rich Phœaciæ's realms at last,
 There at the feast his wanderings to relate,
 His friends' dire change; his own relentless fate.

² See Homer's Iliad.

³ See the Odyssey.

But if the bard of former actions sings,
He wisely draws from those remoter springs
The present order, and the course of things.

As yet unfold th' event on no pretence,
'Tis your chief task to keep us in suspense.
Nor tell what presents⁴ Atrous' son prepares,
To reconcile Achilles to the wars;
Or 'by what god's auspicious conduct led,
From Polyphemus' den Ulysses fled.
Pleas'd with the toil, and on the prospect bent,
Our souls leap forward to the wish'd event.
No call of nature can our search restrain,
And sleep, and thirst, and hunger, plead in vain.
Glad we pursue the labour, we embrac'd,
And leave reluctant, when we leave at last.
See! how the bard triumphant in his art,
Sports with our passions, and commands the heart;
Now here, now there, he turns the varying song;
And draws at will the captive soul along;
Rack'd with uncertain hints, in every sense
We feel the lengthen'd anguish of suspense.
When Homer⁵ once has promis'd to rehearse
Bold Paris' fight, in many a sounding verse,
He soon perceives his reader's warm desire
Wrapt in th' event, and all his soul on fire;
'The poet then contrives some specious stay,
Before he tells the fortune of the day.
Till Helen to the king and elders show,
From some tall tower, the leaders of the foe,
And name the heroes in the fields below.
When chaste Penelope⁶, to gain her end,
Invites her suitors the tough bow to bend;
(Her nuptial bed the victor's promis'd prize)
With what address her various arts she plies!
Skill'd in delays, and politically slow

To search her treasures for her hero's bow.
None lead the reader in the dark along,
To the last goal that terminates the song;
Sometimes th' event must glance upon the sight,
Not glare in day, nor wholly sink in night.
'Tis thus Anchises to his son relates
The various series of his future fates;
For this the prophets see⁷, on Tyber's shore,
Wars, horrid wars, and Latium red with gore,
A new Achilles rising to destroy
With boundless rage the poor remains of Troy;
But raise his mind with prospects of success,
And give the promise of a lasting peace.
This knew the hero when he sought the plains,
Sprung from his ships⁸, and charg'd the embattled
swains,

Hew'd down the Latian troops with matchless
(The first, auspicious omen of the fight) [might,
And at one blow gigantic Theron kill'd,
Bold, but in vain, and foremost of the field;
Thus too Patroclus⁹ with his latest breath
Foretold his unregarding victor's death:
His parting soul anticipates the blow,
That waits brave Hector from a greater foe.
Thou too, poor Turnus, just before thy doom
Could'st read thy end, and antedate a tomb,
When o'er thy head the baleful fury flew,
And in dire omens set thy fate to view:
A bird obscene, she flutter'd o'er the field, [shield.
And scream'd thy death, and beat thy sounding

For lo! the time, the fatal time is com'd,
Charg'd with thy death, and heavy with thy doom.
When Turnus, though in vain, shall rue the day;
Shall curse the golden belt he bore away;
Shall wish too late young Pallas' spoils unsought,
And mourn the conquest he so dearly bought.
Th' event should glimmer through its gloomy shroud,

Though yet confus'd, and struggling in the cloud.
So, to the traveller, as he journeys on
To reach the walls of some far distant town,
If, high in air, the dubious turrets rise,
Peep o'er the hills and dance before his eyes;
Pleas'd the refreshing prospect to survey,
Each stride he lengthens, and beguiles the way.
More pleas'd (the tempting scene in view) to go,
Than pensively to walk the gloomy vales below.
Unless the theme within your bosoms roll,
Work in each thought, and run through all the
Unless you alter with incessant pain, [soul;
Pull down, and build the fabric o'er again;
In vain, when rival-wits your wonder raise,
You'll strive to match those beauties which you
praise.

To one just scope with fixt design go on;
Let sovereign reason dictate from her throne,
By what determin'd methods to advance,
But never trust to arbitrary chance.
Where chance presides, all objects wildly join'd,
Crowd on the reader, and distract his mind;
From theme to theme unwilling it he tost,
And in the dark variety is lost.
You see some bards, who bold excursions make
In long digressions from the beaten track;
And paint a wild unnecessary throng
Of things and objects foreign to the song;
For new descriptions from the road depart,
Devoid of order, discipline, and art.
So, many an anxious toil and danger past,
Some wretch returns from banishment at last;
With food delay to range the shady wood,
Now here, now there, he wanders from the road;
From field to field, from stream to stream he roves,
And courts the cooling shelter of the grove.
For why should Homer¹¹ deck the gorgeous car,
When our rain'd souls are eager for the war?
Or dwell on every wheel, when loud thunders,
And Mars in thunder calls the host to arms?
When with his heroes we some dastard find¹²,
Of a vile aspect, and malignant mind;
His awkward figure is not worth our care;
His monstrous length of head, or want of hair,
Not though he goes with mountain-shoulders by, a
Short of a foot, or blinking in an eye.
Such trivial objects call us off too long
From the main drift and tenour of the song.
Drances¹³ appears a jester character,
In council bold, but cautious in the war;
Faction and loud the listening throng he draws,
And swells with wealth, and popular applause;
But, what in our's would never find a place,
The bold Greek language may admit with grace.
Why should I here the stratagems recite,
And the low tricks of every little wit?
Some out of time their stock of knowledge boast,
Fill in the pedant all the bard is lost.

 should not blame the conduct of the bard,

Who in soft numbers, and a flowing strain,
 Relieves and reconciles our ears again.
 When I the various implements had sung
 That to the fields, and rural trade belong,
 In sweet harmonious measures would I tell
 How Nature mourn'd when the great Cæsar fell¹⁷.
 When Bacchus' curling vines had grac'd my lays,
 The rural pleasures next should share my praise¹⁸.
 The labour ended, and complete the whole,
 Some bards with pleasure wander round the goal,
 The flights and sallies of the Muse prolong,
 And add new beauties to the finish'd song;
 Pleas'd with th' excursion of the charming strain,
 We strive to quit the work, but strive in vain.
 Thus, were the bees the subject of my Muse,
 Their laws, their natures, and celestial dews;
 Poor Aristæus¹⁹ should his fate disclose,
 His mother's counsel should assuage his woes;
 Old Proteus here should struggle in his chain,
 There in soft verse the Thracian bard complain
 (As Philomela on a poplar bough
 Bewails her young, melodious in her woe):
 Pangaean steeps his sorrows should return,
 And vocal Thrace with Rhodope should mourn;
 Hebrus should roll low-murmuring to the deep,
 And barbarous nations wonder why they weep.
 Thus too the poets, who the names declare
 Of kings and nations gathering to the war,
 Sometimes diversify the strain, and sing
 The wondrous change of the Ligurian²⁰ king.
 While for his Phæton his sorrows flow,
 And his harmonious strains beguile his woe,
 O'er all the man the snowy feathers rise,
 And in a tuneful swan he mounts the skies.
 Thus too Hippolytus²¹, by Dian's care
 And Pæan's art, returns to upper air.
 The bards now paint the arms their heroes wield,
 And each bold figure on the glittering shield.
 Great Aventinus²², great Alcides' son,
 Wore the proud trophy which his father won;
 An hundred serpents o'er the buckler roll'd,
 And hydra hiss'd from all her heads in gold.
 Now blooming Tempe's cool retreats they sing,
 And now with flowery beauties paint the spring.
 Now with a sylvan scene the floods they hide;
 Or teach the fam'd Eridanus to glide,
 Or sport on fabled Achelôus' side,
 Or hoary Nereus' numerous race display,
 The hundred azure sisters of the sea.
 With them the nymphs that haunt their native
 woods,

And the long orders of the sylvan gods.

With gay descriptions sprinkle here and there
 Some grave instructive sentences with care,
 That touch on life, some moral good pursue,
 And give us virtue in a transient view;
 Rules, which the future sire may make his own,
 And point the golden precepts to his son.

Sometimes on little images to fall,
 And thus illustrate mighty things by small,
 With due success the licens'd poet dares,
 When to the ants²³ the Phrygians he compares,

Who, leaving Carthage, gather to the seas;
Or the laborious Tyrians to the bees²⁶.
But swarming flies²⁷, offensive animals,
That buzz incessant o'er the smoking pales,
Are images too low, to paint the hosts
That roll and blacken o'er Ausonia's coasts.
The lofty Muse who sung the Latian war,
Would think such trivial things beneath her care.
How from his majesty would Virgil fall,
If Turnus, scarce repell'd from Ilion's wall,
Retiring grimly with a tardy pace,
Had e'er been figur'd by the patient ass²⁸!
Whom unregarded troops of boys surround,
While o'er his sides their rattling strokes re-
sound;

Slow he gives way, and crops the springing grain,
Turns on each side, and stops to graze again.
In every point the thing is just, we know,
But then the image is itself too low:
For Turnus, sprung from such a glorious strain,
The vile resemblance would with scorn disdain,
With better grace the lion²⁹ may appear,
Who, singly impotent the crowd to dare,
Repel, or stand their whole embody'd war,
Looks grimly back, and rolls his glaring eye,
Despairs to conquer, and disdains to fly.

Since fictions are allow'd, be sure, ye youths,
Your fictions wear at least the air of truths.
When Glaucus³⁰ meets Tydides on the plain,
Inflam'd with rage, and reeking from the slain;

Some think they could not pass the time away,
In such long narratives, and cool delay,
Amidst the raging tumult of the day.
But yet we hear fierce Diomed relate
The crime of bold Lyncurgus, and his fate;
And Glaucus talks of brave Bellerophon,
Doom'd for a lawless passion not his own;
Sets forth the hero's great exploits to view,
How the bold chief the dire Chimæra slew.
The Solymæan host, and Amazonian crew.
For those surprising fictions are design'd
With their sweet falsehoods to delight the mind;
The bards expect no credit should be given
To the bare lie, though authoriz'd by Heaven,
Which oft with confidence they vent abroad,
Beneath the needful sanction of a god.
³¹ 'Twas thus the roasted heifers³¹ of the Sun
Spoke o'er the fire with accents not their own;
³² 'Twas thus Achilles' steed³² his silence broke,
And Trojan ships³³ in human voices spoke;
As wrought by Heaven these wonders they relate,
All airy visions of the ivory gate!

Speak things but once, if order be your care,
For more the cloy'd attention will not bear,
And tedious repetitions tire the ear.
In this we differ from the Grecian train,
Who tell Atrides' visions³⁴ o'er again.
³⁵ 'Tis not enough with them we know the cause
Why great Achilles from the war withdraws,

Unless the weeping hero³⁶, on the den,
Tells his blue mother all we heard before.
So much on punctual niceties they stand,
That, when their kings dispatch some high
mand,

All, word for word, th' embassador's
In the same tenour of unvaried verse.
Not so did Venulus³⁷ from Arpi bring
The final answer of th' Ætolian king.

Let others labour on a vast design,
A less, but polish'd with due care, be thine
To change its structure, be your last design
Thus spend the day, and exercise the night
Incessant in your toil. But if you chuse
A larger field and subject for your Muse;
If scanty limits should the theme confine,
Learn with just art to lengthen the design
Beyond its native bounds; the roving Muse
A thousand methods to this end may find;
Unnumber'd fictions may with truth be join'd;
Nature supplies a fund of matter still;
Then cull the rich variety at will.

See! how³⁸ the bard calls down th' embassador
All rang'd in factions, from their bright
Who, fir'd with mutual hate, their arms
And in the field declare for Greece or Troy;
Till Jove convenes a council to assuage
Their rising fury, and suspend their rage;

Though the blest gods, remov'd from human
Live in immortal ease within the distant skies
And now th' infernal realm his theme be
The reign of Pluto, the Tartarean lakes,
The Furies dreadful with their curling snakes
He gathers omens from each bird that flies,
And signs from every wing that beats the sky.

He now describes a banquet, where the guest
Prolongs with narratives the royal feast.
Or at the glorious hero's tomb we read
Of games ordain'd in honour of the dead.

And oft for merces in old times display'd,
To their own gods their annual rites are paid.
For monstrous Python slain, their praises sing,
And lift the fame of Phobus to the skies.

In hymns Alcides' labours they resound:
While Cacus lies extended on the ground,
Alternate sing the labours of his hands,
Enjoin'd by fierce Eurystheus' stern command.

The den of Cacus crowns the grateful strain,
Where the grim monster breathes his flames
vain.

Mark how sometimes the bard without sound,
Exerts his fire, and pours forth all his soul;
His lines so daring, and his words so strong;

We see the subject figur'd in the song;
When with the winds old ocean³⁹ he deforms,
Or paints the rage and horrors of the storm;
Or drives on pointed rocks the bursting ships;
Tost on the Euxine, or Sicilian deeps.

Or sings the plagues⁴⁰ that blast the livid sky,
When beasts by herds, and men by nations die;
Or the fierce flames that Ætna's jaws expire⁴¹,
Her melted rocks, and deluges of fire,

From her mouth the bursting vapour flies,
 And all th' immortal ardour burns again
 In its full light and heat; the Sun's bright ray
 Thus (when the clouds disperse) restores the day;
 Whence shot this sudden flash that gilds the poles;
 The god, the god comes rushing on his soul;
 Fires with ethereal vigour every part,
 Through every trembling limb he seems to dart,
 Works in each vein, and swells his rising heart.
 Deep in his breast the heavenly tumult plays,
 And sets his mounting spirits on a blaze.
 Nor can the raging flames themselves contain,
 For the whole god descends into the man.
 He quits mortality, he knows no bounds,
 But sings inspir'd in more than human sounds.
 Nor from his breast can shake th' immortal load,
 But pants and raves impatient of the god;
 And, rapt beyond himself, admires the force
 That drives him on reluctant to the course.
 He calls on Phoebus, by the god oppress,
 Who breathes excessive spirit in his breast;
 No force of thirst or hunger can control
 The fierce, the ruling transport of his soul.
 Oft in their sleep, inspir'd with rage divine,
 Some bards enjoy the visions of the Nine:
 Visions! themselves with due applause may crown;
 Visions! that Phoebus or that Jove may own.
 To such an height the god exalts the flame,
 And so unbounded is their thirst of fame.
 But here, ye youths, exert your timely care,
 Nor trust th' ungovernable rage too far;
 Use not your fortune, nor unfurl your sails,
 Though softly courted by the flattering gales.
 Refuse them still, and call your judgment in,
 While the fierce god exults and reigns within;
 To reason's standard be your thoughts confin'd,
 Let judgment calm the tempest of the mind.
 Indulge your heat with conduct, and restrain;
 Learn when to draw, and when to give, the rein,
 But always wait till the warm raptures cease,
 And lull the tumults of the soul to peace;
 Then, nor till then, examine strictly o'er
 What your wild sallies might suggest before.
 Be sure, from Nature never to depart;
 To copy Nature is the task of art.
 The noblest poets own her sov'reign sway,
 And ever follow where she leads the way.
 From her the different characters they trace,
 That mark the human or the savage race,
 Each various and distinct; in every stage
 They paint mankind; their humours, sex, and age;
 They show what manners the slow sage becomes,
 What the brisk youth in all his sprightly bloom.
 In every word and sentiment explain,
 How the proud monarch differs from the swain.
 I nauseate all confounded characters,
 Where young Telemachus too grave appears,
 Or reverend Nestor acts beneath his years.
 The poet suits his speeches, when he sings,
 To proper persons, and the state of things;
 On each their just distinctions are bestow'd,
 To mark a male, a female, or a god.
 Thus when in Heaven seditious tumults rise,
 Amongst the radiant senate of the skies,
 The sire of gods, and sovereign of mankind,
 In a few words unfolds his sacred mind.
 Not so fair Venus; who at large replies,
 And pities Troy, and counts her miseries

By just degrees; they feed the glowing vein,
 And all th' immortal ardour burns again
 In its full light and heat; the Sun's bright ray
 Thus (when the clouds disperse) restores the day;
 Whence shot this sudden flash that gilds the poles;
 The god, the god comes rushing on his soul;
 Fires with ethereal vigour every part,
 Through every trembling limb he seems to dart,
 Works in each vein, and swells his rising heart.
 Deep in his breast the heavenly tumult plays,
 And sets his mounting spirits on a blaze.
 Nor can the raging flames themselves contain,
 For the whole god descends into the man.
 He quits mortality, he knows no bounds,
 But sings inspir'd in more than human sounds.
 Nor from his breast can shake th' immortal load,
 But pants and raves impatient of the god;
 And, rapt beyond himself, admires the force
 That drives him on reluctant to the course.
 He calls on Phoebus, by the god oppress,
 Who breathes excessive spirit in his breast;
 No force of thirst or hunger can control
 The fierce, the ruling transport of his soul.
 Oft in their sleep, inspir'd with rage divine,
 Some bards enjoy the visions of the Nine:
 Visions! themselves with due applause may crown;
 Visions! that Phoebus or that Jove may own.
 To such an height the god exalts the flame,
 And so unbounded is their thirst of fame.
 But here, ye youths, exert your timely care,
 Nor trust th' ungovernable rage too far;
 Use not your fortune, nor unfurl your sails,
 Though softly courted by the flattering gales.
 Refuse them still, and call your judgment in,
 While the fierce god exults and reigns within;
 To reason's standard be your thoughts confin'd,
 Let judgment calm the tempest of the mind.
 Indulge your heat with conduct, and restrain;
 Learn when to draw, and when to give, the rein,
 But always wait till the warm raptures cease,
 And lull the tumults of the soul to peace;
 Then, nor till then, examine strictly o'er
 What your wild sallies might suggest before.
 Be sure, from Nature never to depart;
 To copy Nature is the task of art.
 The noblest poets own her sov'reign sway,
 And ever follow where she leads the way.
 From her the different characters they trace,
 That mark the human or the savage race,
 Each various and distinct; in every stage
 They paint mankind; their humours, sex, and age;
 They show what manners the slow sage becomes,
 What the brisk youth in all his sprightly bloom.
 In every word and sentiment explain,
 How the proud monarch differs from the swain.
 I nauseate all confounded characters,
 Where young Telemachus too grave appears,
 Or reverend Nestor acts beneath his years.
 The poet suits his speeches, when he sings,
 To proper persons, and the state of things;
 On each their just distinctions are bestow'd,
 To mark a male, a female, or a god.
 Thus when in Heaven seditious tumults rise,
 Amongst the radiant senate of the skies,
 The sire of gods, and sovereign of mankind,
 In a few words unfolds his sacred mind.
 Not so fair Venus; who at large replies,
 And pities Troy, and counts her miseries

“ A rō rōrō.”

“ Vid. Æneid. Lib. II.

“ Vid. Æneid. Lib. X.”

Woes undeserv'd : but with contention fir'd,
And with the spirit of revenge inspir'd,
Pierce Juno storms amidst the blest abodes,
And stuns with loud complaints the listening gods.
When youthful Turnus⁴³ the stern combat claims,
His rising heart is fill'd with martial flames;
Impell'd by rage, and bent to prove his might;
His soul springs forward; and prevents the fight;
Rous'd to revenge, his kindling spirits glow,
Confirm his challenge, and provoke the foe,
The fugitive of Troy.—But while his rage
And youthful courage prompts him to engage,
On Latium's king incumbent it appears,
Grown old in prudence, pety, and years,
To weigh events, and youthful heat assuage,
With the cold caution and the fears of age.

In Dido's various character is seen
The furious lover and the gracious queen:
When Troy's fam'd chief, commanded from above,
Prepares to quit her kingdom, and her love;
She raves, she storms with unavailing care,
Grown wild with grief, and frantic with despair.
Through every street she flies, with anguish stung,
And broken accents flutter on her tongue;
Her words confus'd and interrupted flow,
Speak and express the hurry of her woe.
How in this Dido is that Dido lost,
Who late receiv'd the Trojans on her coast,
And bade them banish grief, and share her throne,
Dismiss their fears, and think her realms their own!

Next the great orators consult, and thence Draw all the moving turns of eloquence:
That Sinon⁴⁴ may his Phrygian foes betray,
And lead the crowd, as fraud directs the way;
That wise Ulysses⁴⁵ may the Greeks detain,
While Troy yet stood, from measuring back the main.

Need I name Nestor⁴⁶, who could talk to peace,
With melting words, the factious kings of Greeks?
Whose soft address their fury could controul,
Mould every passion, and subdue the soul!
These soothing arts to Venus⁴⁷ sure were known,
To beg immortal arms to grace her son;
Her injur'd spouse each thrilling word inspires,
With every pang of love to second her desires.
With nicest art the fair adulteress draws
Her fond addresses from a distant cause;
And all her guileful accents are design'd
To catch his passions, and ensnare his mind.
'Tis hence the poet learns in every part
To bend the soul, and give with wondrous art
A thousand different motions to the heart.
Hence, as his subject gay or sad appears,
He claims our joy, or triumphs in our tears.
Who, when he sees how Orpheus⁴⁸ sorrows flow,
Weeps not his tears, and answers woe for woe?
When he his dear Eurydice deploras
To the deaf rocks, and solitary shores,
With the soft harp the bard relieves his pain,
For thee, when morning dawns, prolongs the strain,
For thee, when Phoebus seeks the seas again.
Or when the young Euryalus⁴⁹ is kill'd,
And rolls in death along the bloody field;

Like some fair flower beneath the share he lies,
His head declin'd, and drooping as he dies;
The reader's soul is touch'd with generous woe,
He longs to rush with Nisus on the foe;
He burns with friendly pity to the dead,
To raise the youth, and prop his sinking head;
And strives in vain to stop the gushing blood,
That stains his bosom with a purple flood.

But if the bard such images pursues,
That raise the blushes of the virgin-muse;
Let them be slightly touch'd, and ne'er express,
Give but an hint, and let us guess the rest.
If Jove commands the gathering storms to rise,
And with deep thunders rends the vaulted skies,
To the same cave together may repair
The Trojan hero⁵⁰ and the Tyrian fair;
The poet's modesty must add no more;
Enough, that Earth had given the sign before;
The concious ether was with flames o'erspread,
The nymphs ran shrieking round the mountain's head.

Nor let young Troilus, unhappy boy,
Meet fierce Achilles in the plains of Troy;
But show th' unequal youth's untimely fall,
To great Æneas from the Tyrian wall;
Supine and hanging from his empty car,
Dragg'd by his panting coursers through the war.
This, from our bright examples you may trace,
To write with judgment, decency, and grace;
From others learn invention to increase,
And search in chief the glorious sons of Greece;
For her bright treasures Argos' realms explore,
Bring home triumphant all her gather'd store,
And with her spoils enrich the Latian shore.
Nor is the glory of translation less,
To give the Grecian bards a Roman dress,
If Phoebus' gracious smiles the labour crown,
Than if some new invention were your own.
Mincio's and Mantua's glorious son behold,
Th' immortal Virgil, sheath'd in foreign gold,
Shines out unsham'd, and towers above the rest,
In the rich spoils of godlike Homer dress'd.
Let Greece in triumph boast that she imparts
To Latium's conquering realms her glorious arts!
While Latium's sons improve her best designs,
Till by degrees each polish'd labour shines,
While Rome advances now in arts, as far
Above all cities, as of old in war.

Ye gods of Rome, ye guardian deities,
Who lift our nation's glory to the skies;
And thou, Apollo, the great source of Troy,
Let Rome at least this single palm enjoy,
To shine in arts supreme, as once in power,
And teach the nations she subdued before;
Since discord all Ausonia's kings alarms,
And clouds the ancient glories of her arms.
In our own breasts we sheath the civil sword,
Our country naked to a foreign lord;
Which lately, prostrate, started from despair,
Burn'd with new hopes, and arm'd her hands for war;
But arm'd in vain;—th' inexorable hate [war]
Of envious Fortune call'd her to her fate,
Insatiate in her rage; her frowns oppose
The Latian fame, and woes are heap'd on woes.
Our dread alarms each foreign monarch took;
Through all their tribes the distant nations shook;
To Earth's last bounds the fame of Leo runs,
Nile heard, and Indus trembled for his sons.

 while the proud crescent fades before his arms.

 ough the proud foe, of Jury's realm possess,

 the wealth of kingdoms, and the pomp of war:
 but, by your crime, ye gods, our hopes are crost,
 and those imaginary triumphs lost;
 stern'd with Leo, in one fatal hour,
 our prospects perish'd, as they liv'd before.

VIDA'S ART OF POETRY,

BOOK III.

WHAT style, what language, suits the poet's lays,
 to claim Apollo's and the Muses' praise,
 now unfold; to this last bound I tend,
 and see my promis'd labours at an end.

First then, with care a just expression choose,
 and by the kind indulgence of the Muse,
 to dress up every subject when you write,
 and set all objects in a proper light.
 but lest the distant prospect of the goal should damp your vigour, and your strength control,

lose every power, and call forth all the soul.
 see! how the Nine the panting youth invite,
 With one loud voice to reach Parnassus' height;
 see! how they hold aloft th' immortal crown,
 to urge the course, and call the victor on;
 see! from the clouds each lavish goddess pours,
 'till o'er thy head, a sudden spring of flowers,
 and roses fall in odoriferous showers;
 Celestial scents in balmy breezes fly,
 and shed ambrosial spirits from the sky.

In chief avoid obscurity, nor shroud
 four thoughts and dark conceptions in a cloud;

For some¹, we know, affect to shun the light,
 Lost in forc'd figures, and involv'd in night,
 Studious and bent to leave the common way,
 They skulk in darkness, and abhor the day.
 Oh! may the sacred Nine inspire my lays
 To shine with pride in their own native rays;
 For this we need not importune the skies,
 In our own power and will the blessing lies.
 Expression, boundless in extent, displays
 A thousand forms, a thousand several ways;
 In different garbs from different quarters brought,
 It makes unnumber'd dresses for a thought;
 Such vast varieties of hues we find
 To paint conception, and unfold the mind!
 If e'er you toil, but toil without success,
 To give your images a shining dress,
 Quit your pursuit, and choose a different way,
 Till, breaking forth, the voluntary ray
 Cuts the thick darkness, and lets down the day.

Since then a thousand forms you may pursue,
 A thousand figures rising to the view,
 Unless confin'd and straiten'd in your scheme,
 With the short limits of a scanty theme,
 From these to those with boundless freedom pass,
 And to each image give a different face.
 The readers hence a wondrous pleasure find,
 That charms the ear, and captivates the mind;
 In this the laws of Nature we obey,
 And act as her example points the way,
 Which has on every different species thrown
 A shape distinct and figure of its own;
 Man differs from the beast that haunts the woods,
 The bird from every native of the flocks.

See how the poet banishes with grace
 A native term to give a stranger place!²
 From different images with just success
 He clothes his matter in the borrow'd dress:
 The borrow'd dress the things themselves admire,
 And wonder whence they drew the strange attire;
 Proud of their ravish'd spoils, they now disclaim
 Their former colour, and their genuine name,
 And, in another garb more beautiful grown,
 Prefer the foreign habit to their own.
 Oft as he paints a battle on the plain,
 The battle's imagin'd by the roaring main;
 Now he the fight a fiery deluge names,
 That pours along the fields a flood of flames;
 In airy conflict now the winds appear,
 Alarm the deeps, and wage the stormy war;
 To the fierce shock th' embattled tempests pour,
 Waves charge on waves, th' encountering billows roar.

Thus in a vary'd dress the subject shines,
 By turns the objects shift their proper signs;
 From shape to shape alternately they run,
 To borrow others' charms, and lend their own;
 Pleas'd with the borrow'd charms, the readers find
 A crowd of different images combin'd,
 Rise from a single object to the mind.
 So the pleas'd traveller, from a mountain's brow,
 Views the calm surface of the seas below;
 Though wide beneath the floating ocean lies
 The first immediate object of his eyes,
 He sees the forests tremble from within,
 And gliding meadows paint the deeps with green;
 While to his eyes the fair delusions pass
 In gay succession through the watery glass.

'Tis thus the bard diversifies his song,
 Now here, now there, he calls the soul along.
 The rich variety he sets to sight,
 Cloys not the mind, but adds to our delight.
 Now with a frugal choice the bard affords
 The strongest light, and energy of words;
 While humble subjects he contrives to raise
 With borrow'd splendours, and a foreign blaze.
 This, if on old tradition we rely,
 Was once the current language of the sky;
 Which first the Muses brought to these abodes,
 Who taught mankind the secrets of the gods:
 For in the court of Jove their choirs advance,
 And sing alternate, as they lead the dance,
 Mixt with the gods; they hear Apollo's lyre,
 And from high Heaven the panting bard inspire.
 Nor bards alone, but other writers reach
 This bold, this daring privilege of speech;
 In chief the orators, to raise their sense,
 In this strong figure dress their eloquence,
 When with persuasive strokes they plead a cause,
 And bridle vice, and vindicate the laws;
 Or on the dreadful verge of death defend,
 And snatch from fate, a poor devoted friend.
 Ev'n the rough hind delight in such a strain,
 When the glad harvest waves with golden grain,
 And thirsty meadows drink the pearly rain;
 On the proud vine her purple gems appear;
 The smiling fields rejoice, and hail the pregnant year.

First from necessity the figure sprung,
 For things, that would not suit our scanty tongue,
 When no true names were offer'd to the view,
 Those they transferr'd that border'd on the true;
 Thence by degrees the noble licence grew.
 The bards those daring liberties embrac'd,
 Through want at first, through luxury at last:
 They now to alien things, at will, confirm
 The borrow'd honours of a foreign term.
 So man, at first, the rattling storm to fly,
 And the bleak horrors of the wintery sky,
 Rais'd up a roof of oars o'er his head,
 And clos'd with homely clay the slender shed:
 Now, regal palaces, of wondrous size,
 With brazen beams, on Parian columns rise,
 That heave the pompous fabric to the skies.
 But other writers sprinkle here and there
 These bolder beauties with a frugal care;
 So vast a freedom is allow'd to none,
 But suits the labours of the bard alone,
 Who in the laws of verse himself restrains,
 Ty'd up to time in voluntary chains.
 Others, by no restraint or stop withheld,
 May range the compass of a wilder field;
 The sacred poets, who their labours fill
 With pleasing fictions, or with truths at will,
 Their thoughts in bolder liberties express,
 Which look more beautiful in a foreign dress.
 To all, unusual colours they impart,
 Nor blush, if e'er detected in their art.

³ Sometimes beyond the bounds of truth they fly,
 And boldly lift their subject to the sky;
 When with tumultuous shouts the Heavens re-
 bound,
 And all Olympus trembles with the sound;
 Or with repeated accents they relate
 The fall of Troy, and dwell upon her fate;

³ The hyperbole.

⁴ Oh sire! Oh country, once with glory crown'd!
 Oh wretched race of Priam, once renown'd!
 Oh Jove! see Ilion smoking on the ground!

They now name Ceres for the golden grain,
 Bacchus for wine, and Neptune for the main;
 Or from the father's name point out the son;
 Or for her people introduce a town:
 So when alarm'd her natives dread their fates,
 Pale Afric shakes, and trembles through her states;
 And some, by Achelous' streams alone,
 Comprise the floods of all the world in one.

⁵ Lo! now they start aside, and change the strain
 To fancy'd converse with an absent swain;
 To grots and oesvers all their cares disclose,
 Or tell the solitary rocks their woes;
 To scenes inanimate proclaim their love,
 Talk with an hill, or whisper to a grove.
 On you they call, ye unattentive woods,
 And wait an answer from your bordering floods.

⁶ Sometimes they speak one thing, but less behind

Another secret meaning in the mind:
 A fair expression artfully dispense,
 But use a word that clashes with the sense.
 Thus pious Helen⁷ stole the faithful sword,
 While Troy was flaming, from her sleeping lord.
 So glorious Drances⁸ tower'd amid the plain,
 And pil'd the ground with mountains of the slain;
 Immortal trophies rais'd from squadrons kill'd,
 And with vast spoils enobled all the field.

⁹ But now to mention farther I forbear,
 With what strong charms they captivate the ear;
 When the same terms they happily repeat,
 The same repeated seem more soft and sweet.
 This, were Arcadia judge¹⁰, if Pan without,
 Pan's judge, Arcadia, would condemn her god.

But though our fond indulgence grants the Muse
 A thousand liberties in different views,
 Whene'er you chouse an image to express
 In foreign terms, and scorn the native dress;
 Yet be discreet, nor strain the point too far,
 Let the transition still unforc'd appear,
 Nor e'er discover an excess of care:
 For some, we know, with awkward violence
 Distort the subject, and disjoint the sense;
 Quite change the genuine figure, and deface
 The native shape with every living grace;
 And force unwilling objects to put on
 An alien face, and features not their own.
 A low conceit in disproportion'd terms,
 Looks like a boy dress'd up in giant's arms;
 Blind to the truth, all reason they exceed,
¹¹ Who name a stall the palace of the steed,
 Or grass the tresses of great Rhœus's head.
 'Tis best sometimes an image to express
 In its own colours, and its native dress;
 The genuine words with happy care to use,
 If nicely call'd, and worthy of the Muse.

Some things alternately compar'd are shown,
 Both names still true, and mutually their own;
 But here the least resemblance you must shun;
 Tell us, in short, from whence the hint you drew,
 And set the whole comparison to view;

unmindless of your first design, you seem lead the mind away, and rove from theme to theme.

But now pursue the method, that affords fittest terms, and wisest choice of words.
All deserve alike the same regard,
To suit the godlike labours of the bard;
Words as much may differ in degree,
The most various kinds of poetry.
Though many a common term and word we find
Pers'd promiscuously through every kind,
One that will never suit th' heroic rage,
Gibt grace the buskin, and become the stage.
Air large, their vast variety explore
With piercing eyes, and range the mighty store.
From their deep fund the richest words unfold,
With nicest care be rich expression cull'd,
To deck your numbers in the purest gold.
The vile, the dark degenerate crowd refuse,
And scorn a dress that would disgrace the Muse:
Hence, to succeed your search, pursue the road,
And beat the track the glorious ancients trod,
To those eternal monuments repair,
Here read, and meditate for ever there.
For o'er the rest some mighty genius shines,
Dark the sweet charms and vigour of his lines.
As far as Phœbus and the heavenly powers
Smile on your labours, make his diction yours:
For style by his authentic standard frame,
Your voice, your habit, and address, the same.
With him proceed to cull the rest; for there
A full reward will justify your care.
Examine all, and bring from all away
Their various treasures as a lawful prey.
Nor would I scruple, with a due regard,
To read sometimes a rude unpolish'd bard;
Among whose labours I may find a line,
Which from unsightly rust I may refine,
And, with a better grace, adopt it into mine.
How often may we see a troubled flood
Stain'd with unsettled ooze and rising mud!
Which (if a well the bordering natives sink)
Supplies the thirsty multitude with drink.
The trickling stream by just degrees refines,
Till in its copse the limpid current shines;
And taught through secret labyrinths to flow,
Works itself clear among the sands below.
For nothing looks so gloomy, but will shine
From proper care, and timely discipline;
If, with due vigilance and conduct, wrought
Deep in the soul, it labours in the thought.
Hence on the ancients we must rest alone,
And make their golden sentences our own.
To cull their best expressions claims our cares,
To form our notions, and our styles on theirs.
See! how we bear away their precious spoils,
And with the glorious dress enrich our styles;
Their bright inventions for our use convey,
Bring all the spirit of their words away,
And make their words themselves our lawful prey!
Unsham'd in other colours to be shown,
We speak our thoughts in accents not our own.
But your design with modest caution weigh,
Steal with due care, and meditate the prey.
Inspect the order of the words with art,
And change their former scite in every part.
Thus win your readers, thus deceive with grace,
And let th' expression wear a different face;
Yourself at last, the glorious labour done,
Will scape discern his diction from your own.

Some, to appear of diffidence bereft,
Steal in broad day, and glory in the theft;
When with just art, design and confidence,
On the same words they graft a different sense;
Preserve th' unvary'd terms and order too,
But change their former spirit for a new.
Or, with the sense of emulation bold,
With ancient bards a glorious contest hold:
Their richest spoils triumphant they explore,
Which, rang'd with better grace, they varnish o'er,
And give them charms they never knew before.
So trees, that change their soils, more proudly rise,
And lift their spreading honours to the skies;
And, when transplanted, nobler fruits produce,
Exalt their nature, and ferment their juice.
So Troy's fam'd chief the Asian empire bore,
With better omens, to the Latian shore;
Though from thy realm, O Dido, to the sea
Call'd by the gods reluctantly away;
Nor the first nuptial pleasures could control
The fixt, the stubborn purpose of his soul.
Unhappy queen! thy woes suppress'd thy breath;
Thy cares pursued thee, and surviv'd in death.
Had not the Dardan fleet thy kingdom sought,
Thy life had shone unsully'd with a fault.

Come then, ye youths, and urge your generous trials;

Come strike the ancients, and divide the spoils
Your hands have won—but shun the fault of such,
Who with fond rashness trust themselves too much.
For some we know, who, by their pride betray'd,
With vain contempt reject a foreign aid;
Who scorn those great examples to obey,
Nor follow where the ancients point the way.
While from the theft their cautious hands refrain,
Vain are their fears, their superstition vain.
Nor Phœbus smiles th' unhappy poet crown;
The fate of all his works prevents his own.
Himself his mouldering monument survives,
And sees his labours perish while he lives:
His fame is more contracted, than his span,
And the frail author dies before the man.
How would he wish the labour to forbear,
And follow other arts with more successful care?

I like a fair allusion nicely wrought;
When the same words express a different thought.
And such a theft true critics dare not blame,
Which late posterity shall crown with fame.
Void of all fear, of every doubt bereft,
I would not blush, but triumph in the theft.
Nor on the ancients for the whole rely:
The whole is more than all their works supply;
Some things your own invention must explore,
Some virgin images untouched before.

New terms no laws forbid us to induce,
To coin a word, and sanctify to use;
But yet admit no words into the song, [sprung;
Unless they prove the stock from whence they Point out their family, their kindred trace,
And set to view the series of their race.
But where you find your native tongue too poor,
Transport the riches of the Grecian store;
Inform the lump, and work it into grace,
And with new life inspire th' unwieldy mass;
Till, chang'd by discipline, the word puts on
A foreign nature, and forgets its own.
So Latium's language found a rich increase,
And grew and flourish'd from the wealth of Greece;
Till use, in time, had rifled Argos' stores,
And brought all Athens to th' Hesperian shores.

How many words from rich Mycenæ come,
Of Greek extraction, in the dress of Rome,
That live with ours, our rights and freedom claim,
Their nature different, but their looks the same?
Through Latium's realms, in Latium's garb they go,
At once her strangers, and her natives too.
Long has her poverty been fled, and long
With native riches has she grac'd her tongue.
Nor search the poets only but explore
Immortal Tully's inexhausted store;
And other authors, born in happier days,
Shall answer all your wants, and beautify your lays.

Of, in old bards, a verse above the rest
Shines, in barbaric spoils and trophies drest;
Thus Gaul, her victor's triumph to complete,
Supplies those words that paint her own defeat;
And vanquish'd Macedon, to tell her doom,
Gives up her language with her arms to Rome.
Then can we fear with groundless diffidence
A want of words that shall express our sense?

But, if compell'd by want, you may produce
And bring an antiquated word in use;
A word erst well-receiv'd in days of yore,
A word our old forefathers us'd before:
Well-pleas'd the reader's wonder to engage,
He brings our grandsires' babit on the stage,
And garbs that whilom grac'd an uncouth age.
Yet must not such appear in every place;
When rang'd too thick, the poem they disgrace.
Since of new words such numbers you command,
Deal out the old ones with a sparing hand.
When'er your images can lay no claim
To a fix'd term, and want a certain name;
To paint one thing, the licens'd bard affords
A pompous circle, and a crowd of words.

Two plighted words in one with grace appear,
When they with ease glide smoothly o'er the ear.
Two may embrace at once, but seldom more,
Nor verse can bear the mingled shape of four;
No triple monsters dwell on Latium's shore.
When mixt with smooth, these harsher-strains are found,

We start with horreur at the frightful sound;
The Grecian bards, in whom such freedoms please,
May match with more success such words as these;
Heap hills on hills, and bid the structure rise,
Till the vast pile of mountains prop the skies.

What words soever of vast bulk we view,
One of less size may sometimes split in two;
Sometimes we separate from the whole a part,
And prune the more luxuriant limbs with art.
Thus when the names of heroes we declare,
Names whose unpolish'd sounds offend the ear;
We add, or lop some branches which abound,
Till the harsh accents are with smoothness crown'd,
That mellows every word, and softens every sound.
By such an happy change, Sichæus came,
To sink his roughness in Sichæus' name.
Hence would I rather choose those dire alarms
Of vast Enceladus, and Heaven in arms,
And the bold Titan's battler to rehearse,
Harmonious names, that glide into the verse;
Than count the rough, the barbarous nations o'er,
Which Rome subdued of old from shore to shore.

Let things submit to words on no pretence,
But make your words subservient to your sense;
Nor for their sake admit a single line,
But what contributes to the main design.

¹² The periphrasis.

Through every part most diligently pierce,
And weigh the sound and sense of every verse,
Unless your strictest caution you display,
Some words may lead the heedless bard away;
Steal from their duty, and desert their post,
And skulk in darkness, indolently lost;
Or, while their proper parts their fellows ply,
Contribute nought but sound and harmony.
This to prevent, consult your words; and know
How far their strength, extent, and nature go.
To all their charges and their labours fit;
To all, their several provinces of wit.
Without this care, the poem will abound
With empty noise, and impotence of sound;
Unmeaning terms will crowd in every part,
Play round the ear, but never reach the heart.
Yet would I sometimes venture to dispense
Some words, whose splendour should adorn my verse;

(Words, that to wit and thought have no pretence,
And rather vehicles of sound than sense;)
Till in the gorgeous dress the lines appear,
And court with gentle harmony the ear.
Nor with too fond a care such words pursue,
They meet your sight, and rise in every view.
Of, from its chains the shackled verse unloose,
And give it liberty to walk in prose;
Then be the work renew'd with endless pain,
And join with care the shatter'd parts again;
The lurking faults and errors you may see,
When the words run unmanac'd and free.

Attend, young bard, and listen while I sing;
Lo! I unlock the Muse's sacred spring;
Lo! Phoebus calls thee to his inmost shrine;
Hark! in one common voice, the tuneful Nine
Invite and court thee to the rites divine.
When first to man the privilege was given,
To hold by verse an intercourse with Heaven,
Unwilling that th' immortal art should lie
Cheap, and expos'd to every vulgar eye,
Great Jove, to drive away the groveling crowd,
To narrow bounds confin'd the glorious road,
Which more exalted spirits may pursue,
And left it open to the sacred few.

For many a painful task, in every part,
Claims all the poet's vigilance and art.
'Tis not enough his verses to complete,
In measure, numbers, or determin'd feat;
Or render things, by clear expression bright,
And set each object in a proper light:
To all, proportion'd terms he must dispense,
And make the sound a picture of the sense;
The correspondent words exactly frame,
The look, the features, and the mien, the same.
His thoughts the bard must suitably express,
Each in a different face, and different dress;
Lest in unvary'd looks the crowd be shown,
And the whole multitude appear as one.
With rapid feet and wings, without delay,
This swiftly flies, and smoothly skims away:
That, swift of size, his limbs huge, broad, and strong,
Moves pond'rous, and scarce drags his bulk along.
This blooms with youth and beauty in his face:
And Venus breathes on every limb a grace:
That, of rude form, his uncouth numbers show,
Looks horrible, and frowns with his rough brows;
His monstrous tail in many a fold and wind,
Voluminous and vast, curls up behind:
At once the image and the lines appear
Rude to the eye, and frightful to the ear.

Nor are those figures given without a cause,
 But first and settled by determin'd laws;
 All claim and wear, as their deserts are known,
 A voice, a face, and habit of their own.
 Lo! when the sailors steer the ponderous ships¹³,
 And plough, with brazen beaks, the foamy deeps,
 Incumbent on the main that roars around;
 Beneath their labouring oars the waves resound,
 The prows wide-echoing thro' the dark profound:
 To the loud call each distant rock replies,
 Tost by the storm the frothy surges rise;
 While the hoarse ocean beats the sounding shore,
 Dash'd from the strand, the flying waters roar,
 Flash at the shock, and gathering in an heap,
 The liquid mountains rise, and overhang the deep.

See thro' her shores Trinacria's realms rebound,
 Starting and trembling at the bellowing sound;
 High-towering o'er the waves the mountains ride,
 And clash with floating mountains on the tide.
 But when blue Neptune from his car surveys,
 And calms at one regard the raging seas;
 Stretch'd like a peaceful lake the deep subsides,
 And o'er the level light the galley glides.
 The poet's art and conduct we admire,
 When angry Vulcan rolls a flood of fire;
 When on the groves and fields the deluge preys,
 And wraps the crackling stubble in the blaze.
 Nor less our pleasure, when the flame divides,
 And climbs aspiring round the caldron's sides;
 From the dark bottom work the waters up,
 Swell, boil, and hiss, and bubble to the top.
 Thus in smooth lines, smooth subjects we rehearse,
 But the rough rock roars in as rough a verse¹⁴.
 If gay the subject, gay must be the song,
 And the brisk numbers quickly glide along:
 When the fields flourish, or the skies unfold
 Swift from the flying hinge their gates of gold.
 If sad the theme, then each grave line moves slow,
 The mournful numbers languishingly flow,
 And drag, and labour, with a weight of woe:
 If e'er the boding bird of night, who mourns
 O'er ruins, desolation, graves, and urns,
 With piercing screams the darkness should invade,
 And break the silence of the dismal shade.
 When things are small, the terms should still be so:
 For low words please us, when the theme is low.
 But when some giant, horrible and grim,
 Enormous in his gait, and vast in every limb,
 Stalks towering on; the swelling words must rise
 In just proportion to the monster's size.
 If some large weight his huge arms strive to shove,
 The verse too labours; the throng'd words scarce move.

When each stiff clod beneath the ponderous plough
 Crumbles and breaks: th' encumber'd lines march slow.

Nor less; when pilots catch the friendly gales,
 Unfurl their shrouds, and hoist the wide-stretch'd sails.

But if the poem suffers from delay,
 Let the lines fly precipitate away.
 And when the viper issues from the brake;
 Be quick; with stones, and brands, and fire, attack
 His rising crest, and drive the serpent back.

¹³ Most of these examples are drawn word for word from Virgil.

¹⁴ ——— Sonnet hæc de nare caniad
 Litteæ. Vid. Persium.

When night descends; or, stunn'd by numerous strokes,

And groaning, to the earth drops the vast oak;
 The line too sinks with correspondent sound,
 Flat with the steer, and headlong to the ground;
 When the wild waves subside, and tempests cease,
 And hush their roarings and their rage to peace;
 So oft we see the interrupted strain
 Stopp'd in the midst,—and with the silent main,
 Pause for a space—at last it glides again.
 When Priam strains his aged arm, to throw
 His unavailing javelin at the foe;
 (His blood congeal'd, and every nerve unstrung);
 Then with the theme compiles his artful song;
 Like him the solitary numbers flow
 Weak, trembling, melancholy, stiff, and slow,
 Not so young Pyrrhus, who with rapid force
 Beats down embattled armies in his course:
 The raging youth on trembling lion falls,
 Bursts her strong gates, and shakes her lofty walls;
 Provokes his flying courser to his speed,
 In full career to charge the warlike steed;
 He piles the field with mountains of the slain;
 He pours, he storms, he thunders thro' the plain,
 In this the poet's justest conduct lies,
 When with the various subjects he compiles,
 To sink with judgment, and with judgment rise,
 We see him now, remissive of his force,
 Glide with a low, and inoffensive course;
 Stript of the gawdy dress of words he goes,
 And scarcely lifts the poem up from prose:
 And now he brings with loosen'd reins along
 All in a full career the boundless song;
 In wide array luxuriantly he pours
 A crowd of words, and opens all his stores:
 The lavish eloquence redundant flows,
 Thick as the fleeces of the winter-snows,
 When Jove invests the naked Alps, and sheds
 The silent tempest on their hoary heads.
 Sometimes the godlike fury he restrains,
 Checks his impetuous speed, and draws the reins;
 Balanc'd and pois'd, he neither sinks nor soars,
 Ploughs the mid space, and steers between the shores,

And shaves the confines; till, all dangers past,
 He shoots with joy into the port at last.

For what remains unsung; I now declare
 What claims the poet's last and strictest care.
 When, all adventures past, his labours tend
 In one continued order to their end;
 When the proud victor on his conquest smiles,
 And safe enjoys the triumph of his toils;
 Let him by timely diffidence be aw'd,
 Nor trust too soon th' unpolish'd piece abroad.
 Oh! may his rash ambition ne'er inflame
 His breast, with such a dangerous thirst of fame!
 But let the terror of disgrace control
 The warm, the partial fondness of the soul;
 And force the bard to throw his passion by,
 Nor view his offspring with a parent's eye,
 Till his affections are by justice crost,
 And all the father in the judge is lost.
 He seeks his friends, nor trusts himself alone,
 But asks their judgment, and resigns his own;
 Begs them, with urgent prayers, to be sincere,
 Just and exact, and rigidly severe;
 Due verdict to pronounce on every thought,
 Nor spare the slightest shadow of a fault;
 But, bent against himself, and strictly nice;
 He thanks each critic that detects a vice;

The' chang'd with what his judgment can defend,
 He joins the partial sentence of his friend.
 The piece thrown by; the careful bard reviews
 The long-forgotten labours of his Muse:
 Lo! on all sides far different objects rise,
 And a new prospect strikes his wondering eyes,
 Warm from the brain, the lines his love engross'd,
 Now in themselves their former selves are lost.
 Now his own labours he begins to blame,
 And blushing reads them with regret and shame.
 He loathes the piece; sometimes it; nor can find
 The genuine stamp, and image of his mind.
 This thought and that, indignant he rejects;
 When most secure, some danger he suspects;
 Anxious he adds, and trembling he corrects.
 With kind severities, and timely art,
 Lops the luxuriant growth of every part;
 Prunes the superfluous boughs, that wildly stray,
 And cuts the rank redundancies away.
 Thus arm'd with proper discipline he stands,
 By day, by night, applies his healing hands,
 From every line to wipe out every blot,
 Till the whole piece is guiltless of a fault.
 Hard is the task, but needful, if your aim
 Tends to the prospect of immortal fame.
 If some unfinished numbers limp behind,
 When the warm poet rages unconfined,
 Then when his swift invention seems to stay,
 By a full-tide of genius whirl'd away;
 He brings the sovereign cure their failings claim,
 Confirms the sickly, and supports the lame.
 Oft as the seasons roll, renew thy pain,
 And bring the poem to the test again.
 In different lights th' expression must be rang'd,
 The garb and colours of the words be chang'd.
 With endless care thy watchful eyes must pierce,
 And mark the parts distinct of every verse.
 In this point; for oft one day denies
 The kind assistance which the next supplies;
 As oft, without your vigilance and care,
 Some faults detected by themselves appear.
 And now a thousand errors you explore,
 That lay involv'd in smothering clouds before.
 Oft, to improve his Muse, the bard should try,
 By turns, the temper of a different sky.
 For thus his grains takes a different face
 From every different genius of a place.
 The soul too changes, and the bard may find
 A thousand various motions in his mind.
 New gleams of light will every moment rise,
 While from each part the scattering darkness flies.
 And, as the alters what appears arises,
 He adds new flowers to beautify the piece.
 But here, ev'n here, avoid th' extreme of such,
 Who with excess of care correct too much:
 Whose barbarous hands no calls of pity bound,
 While with th' infected parts they cut the sound,
 And make the cure more dangerous than the wound;
 Till, all the blood and spirits drain'd away,
 The body withers, and the parts decay;
 The native beauties die, the limbs appear
 Rough and deform'd with one continued scum.
 No fit determin'd number I enjoy,
 But when some years shall perfect the design,
 Reflect on life; and, mindful of thy span,
 Whose scanty limit bounds the days of men,
 Wide as the spacious world, without delay,
 Permit the finish'd piece to take its way;
 Till all mankind admires the heavenly song,
 The theme of every hand and every tongue.

See! thy pleas'd friends thy spreading glory sung,
 Each with his voice to swell the vast applause;
 The vast applause shall reach the starry frame,
 No years, no ages, shall obscure thy fame,
 And Earth's last ends shall hear thy darling name.
 Shall we then doubt to scorn all worldly views,
 And not prefer the raptures of the Muse?

Thrice happy bards! who, taught by Heaven, obey

These rules, and follow where they lead the way;
 And hear the faithful precepts I bestow'd, Inspir'd with rage divine, and labouring with the god.

But art alone, and human means, must fail,
 Nor these instructive precepts will prevail,
 Unless the gods their present aid supply,
 And look with kind indulgence from the sky.
 I only pointed out the paths that lead
 The passing youth to steep Parnassus' head;
 And show'd the tuneful Muses from afar,
 Mixt in a solemn choir, and dancing there.
 Thither forbidden by the fates to go,
 I sink and grovel in the world below.
 Deter'd by them, in vain I labour up,
 And stretch these hands to grasp the distant top,
 Enough for me, at distance if I view
 Some bard, some happier bard, the path pursue;
 Who, taught by me to reach Parnassus' crown,
 Mousts up, and calls his slow companions on.
 But, yet these rules, perhaps, these humble lays,
 May claim a title to a share of praise;
 When, in a crowd, the gathering youths shall hear

My voice and precepts with a willing ear;
 Close in a ring shall press the listening throng,
 And learn from me to regulate their song.
 Then, if the pitying fates prolong my breath,
 And from my youth avert the dart of Death;
 Where'er I sink in life's declining stage,
 Trembling and fainting on the verge of age,
 To help their wearied master shall they run,
 And lend their friendly hands to guide him on;
 Through blooming groves his tardy progress seek,
 And set him gently down at Phœbus' gate,
 The while he sings, before the hawk'd abrine,
 The sacred poets, and the tuneful Nine.
 Here then in Roman numbers will we rise,
 And lift the fame of Virgil to the skies;
 Ausonia's pride and boast; who brings along
 Strength to my lines, and spirit to my song:
 First how the mighty bard transported o'er
 The sacred Muses from the Aonian shore;
 Led the fair sisters to th' Hesperian plains,
 And sung in Roman towns the Grecian strains;
 How in his youth to woods and groves he fled,
 And sweetly tun'd the soft Sicilian reed;
 Next, how, in pity to th' Ausonian swains,
 He rais'd to Heaven the honours of the plains;
 Rapt in Triptolemus' car on high,
 He scatter'd peace and plenty from the sky;
 Fir'd with his country's fame, with loud acclaim,
 At last he rous'd all Latium up to arms;
 In just array the Phrygian troops bestow'd,
 And spoke the voice and language of a god.
 Father of verse! from whom our banners spring!
 See! from all parts, our bards attend thy king;
 Beneath thy banners rang'd, thy fame increase,
 And rear proud trophies from the spoils of Greece
 Low, in Elysian fields, her tuneful throng
 Bow to thy laurels, and adore thy song.

On thee alone thy country turns her eyes ;
On thee her poets' future fame relies.
See ! how in crowds they court thy aid divine
(For all their honours but depend on thine) ;
Taught from the womb thy numbers to rehearse,
And sip the balmy sweets of every verse.
Unrivall'd bard ! all ages shall decree
The first unenvy'd palm of fame to thee ;
Thrice happy bard ! thy boundless glory flies,
Where neves mortal must attempt to rise ;
Such heavenly numbers in thy song we hear,
And more than human accents charm the ear !
To thee, his darling, Phœbus' hands impart
His soul, his genius, and immortal art.
What help or merit in these rules are shown,
The youth must owe to thy support alone.

The youth, whose wandering feet with care I led Aloft, o'er steep Parnassus' sacred head ;
Taught from thy great example to explore
Those arduous paths which thou hast trod before,
Hail, pride of Italy ! thy country's grace !
Hail, glorious light of all the tuneful race !
For whom, we weave the crown, and altars raise ;
And with rich incense bid the temples blaze ;
Our solemn hymns shall still resound thy praise,
Hail, holy bard, and boundless in renown !
Thy fame, dependent on thyself alone,
Requires no song, no numbers, but thy own.
Look down propitious, and my thoughts inspire ;
Warm my chaste bosom with thy sacred fire !
Let all thy flames with all their raptures roll,
Deep in my breast, and kindle all my soul !

THE
WORKS OF HORACE.

TRANSLATED BY PHILIP FRANCIS, D. D.

THE

LIFE OF THE TRANSLATOR,

THE REV. PHILIP FRANCIS.

Few memoirs have been handed down to us of the able translator of Horace and Demosthenes. He was of Irish extraction, if not born in that kingdom; where his father was a dignified clergyman, and, among other preferments, held the rectory of St. Mary, Dublin, from which he was rejected by the court on account of his Tory principles. His son, our author, was also educated for the church, and obtained a doctor's degree. His edition of Horace made his name known in England about the year 1743, and raised him a reputation, as a classical editor and translator, which no subsequent attempts have been able to diminish. Dr. Johnson, many years after other rivals had started, gave him this praise: "The lyrical part of Horace never can be properly translated; so much of the excellence is in the numbers and the expression. Francis has done it the best: I'll take his, five out of six, against them all."

Some time after the publication of Horace, he appears to have come over to England; where, in 1753, he published a translation of part of the Oration of Demosthenes, intending to comprise the whole in two quarto volumes. It was a matter of some importance at that time to publish a large work of this kind, and the author had the precaution therefore to secure a copious list of subscribers. Unfortunately, however, it had to contend with the acknowledged merit of Leland's Translation; and, allowing their respective merits to have been nearly equal, Leland's had at least the priority in point of time, and, upon comparison, was preferred by the critics, as being more free and eloquent, and less literally exact. This, however, did not arise from any defect in our author's skill, but was merely an error, if an error at all, in judgment: for he conceived that as few liberties as possible ought to be taken with the style of his author, and that there was an essential difference between a liberal translation, which only he considered as faithful, and an imitation, in which we can never be certain that we have the author's words or precise meaning. In the year 1755, he completed his purpose in a second volume, which was applauded as a difficult work well executed, and acceptable to every friend of genius and literature; but its success was by no means correspondent to the wishes of the author or of his friends.

The year before the first volume of his Demosthenes appeared, he determined to attempt the drama, and his first essay was a tragedy, entitled Eugenia. This is professedly an adaptation of the French Cénie to English feelings and habits, but it had not much success on the stage. Lord Chesterfield, in one of his letters to his son, observes, that he did not think it would have succeeded so well, considering how long our British audiences had been accustomed to murder, racks, and poison, in every tragedy: yet it affected the heart so much, that it triumphed over habit and prejudice. In a subsequent letter, he says that the boxes were crowded till the sixth night, when the pit and gallery were totally deserted, and it was dropped. Distress without death, he repeats, was not sufficient to affect a true British audience, so long accustomed to daggers, racks, and bowls of poison; contrary to Horace's rule, they desire to see Medea murder her children on the stage. The sentiments were too delicate to move them: and their hearts were to be taken by storm, not by parley.

In 1754, Mr. Francis brought out another tragedy at Covent-Garden theatre, entitled Constantine; which was equally unsuccessful, but appears to have suffered principally by the improper distribution of the parts among the actors. This he alludes to, in the dedication to lord Chesterfield, with whom he appears to have been acquainted; and intimates, at the same time, that these disappointments had induced him to take leave of the stage.

During the political contests at the beginning of the present reign, he employed his pen in defence of government, and acquired the patronage of lord Holland; who rewarded his services by the rectory of Barrow in Suffolk, and the chaplainship of Chelsea-hospital. What were his publications on political topics, as they were anonymous, and probably dispersed among the periodical journals, cannot now be ascertained. They drew upon him, however, the wrath of Churchill, who in his Author has exhibited a portrait of Mr. Francis probably overcharged by spleen and envy. Churchill indeed was so profuse of his calumny, that, long before he died, his assertions had begun to lose their value. He is said to have intended to write a satirical poem, in which Francis was to make his appearance as the ordinary of Newgate. The severity of this satire was better understood at that time, when the ordinaries of Newgate were held in very little esteem, and some of them were grossly ignorant and dissolute.

Mr. Francis died at Bath, March 5, 1773, leaving a son, who in the same year was appointed one of the Supreme Council of Bengal, and is now sir Philip Francis, K. B., and M. P. for Appleby.

Of all the classical writers, Horace is by general consent allowed to be the most difficult to translate; yet so universal has been the ambition to perform this task, that scarcely an English poet can be named in whose works we do not find some part of Horace. These efforts, however, have not so frequently been directed to give the sense and local meaning of the author, as to transfuse his satire, and adapt it to modern persons and times. But of the few who have exhibited the whole of this interesting poet in an English dress, Mr. Francis has been supposed to have succeeded best in that which is most difficult, the lyric part, and likewise to have conveyed the spirit and sense of the original, in the Epistles and Satires, with least injury to the genius of the author. In his preface, he acknowledges his obligations to Dr. Dunkin, a poet of some celebrity, and an excellent classical scholar.

While Horace is accounted the most difficult, he is perhaps of all Latin authors the most popular; and accordingly we find more frequent quotations from him than from any other. He is in Latin what Pope is in English; and the reason is honourable to his talents, to the refinement and elegance of his sentiments, and to the universal range he took through the extensive provinces of manners, morals, and criticism. He was contemporary with Virgil and Varius, by whose means he obtained the patronage of Mæcenas and Augustus. To Mæcenas, he was so warmly attached, that it has been supposed, but not on sufficient authority, that he put an end to his own life in order to follow his generous patron. It is certain that he died soon after Mæcenas, in the fifty-seventh year of his age, and in the year eighth before the Christian era.

PREFACE

THE works of Horace have been always numbered among the most valuable remains of antiquity. If we may rely upon the judgment of his commentators, he has united in his lyric poetry the enthusiasm of Pindar, the majesty of Alcaeus, the tenderness of Sappho, and the charming levities of Anacreon. Yet he has beauties of his own genius, his own manner, that form his peculiar character. Many of his odes are varied with irony and satire; with delicacy and humour; with ease and pleasantry. Some of them were written in the first heat of imagination, when circumstances of time, place, persons, were strong upon him. In others, he rises in full poetical dignity; sublime in sentiments, bold in allusions, and profuse of figures; frugal of words, curious in his choice, and happily venturous in his use of them; pure in his diction, animated in his expressions, and harmonious in his numbers; artful in the plans of his poems, regular in their conduct, and happy in their execution. Surely the best attempts to translate so various an author, will require great indulgence, and any tolerable success may deserve it. But perhaps we shall better see the variety of our poet's genius by considering, if such an expression may be forgiven, the various genius of lyric poetry.

In the first ages of Greece, the lyric Muse was particularly appointed to celebrate the praises of the gods and heroes in their festivals. The noblest precepts of philosophy were enlivened by music, and animated by the language of poetry, while reason governed the raptures, which a religious enthusiasm inspired. We may therefore believe, that nothing could enter into its compositions, but what was chaste and correct, awful and sublime, while it was employed in singing the praises of gods, and immortalising the actions of men; in supporting the sacred truths of religion, and encouraging the practice of moral virtue. Such was its proper, natural character. But it soon lost this original excellence, and became debased to every light description of love, dances, feasts, gallantry, and wine. In this view it may be compared to one of its first masters, who descended (according to an expression of Quintilian) into sports and loves, although naturally formed for nobler subjects.

Yet this alteration, though it lessened its natural dignity, seems to have added to that pleasing variety, to which no other poetry can pretend. For when the skill and experience of the persons, who first cultivated the different kinds of poems, gave to each kind those numbers, which seemed most proper for it; as lyric poetry had given birth to all sorts of verse, so it preserved to itself all the measures of which they are composed, the pentameter alone excepted. Thus a variety of subjects is agreeably maintained by a variety of numbers, and they have both contributed to that free, unbounded spirit, which forms the peculiar character of lyric poetry.

In this freedom of spirit it disdains to mark the transitions, which preserve a connection in all other writings, and which naturally conduct the mind from one thought to another: From whence it must often happen, that while a translator is grammatically explaining his author, and opening his reasoning, that genius and manner, and boldness of thinking, which are effects of an immediate poetical enthusiasm, shall either be wholly lost, or greatly dissipated and enfeebled.

It is remarkable, that this kind of poetry was the first that appeared in Rome, as it was the first that was known in Greece, and was used in the same subjects by the Romans, while they had not yet any correspondence with Greece and her learning. However, it continued in almost its first rudeness until the Augustan age, when Horace, improved by reading and imitating the Grecian poets, carried

It at once to its perfection, and, in the judgment of Quintilian, is almost the only Latin lyric poet worthy of being read.

If we should inquire into the state of lyric poetry among English writers, we shall be obliged to confess that their taste was early vitiated, and their judgment unhappily misguided, by the too great success of one man of wit, who first gave Pindar's name to a wild, irregular kind of versification, of which there is not one instance in Pindar. All his numbers are exact, and all his strophes regular. But from the authority of Cowley, supported by an inconsiderate imitation of some other eminent writers, every idler in poetry, who has not strength or industry sufficient to confine his rhymes and numbers to some constant form (which can alone give them real harmony), makes an art of wandering, and then calls his work a Pindaric ode, in which, by the same justness of criticism, his imagination is as wild and licentious as his numbers are loose and irregular.

To avoid this fault, all the measures in the following translation are constantly maintained through each ode, except in the Carmen Seculare. But it may be useless to excuse particulars, when possibly the whole poem, in its present form, may be condemned. Yet by foreigners it has been called Mr. Sanadon's master-piece; and since the odes of Horace are certainly not in that order at present, in which they were originally published, it has been esteemed an uncommon proof of his critical sagacity, to have reconciled in one whole so many broken parts, that have so long perplexed the best commentators. Yet the reader will find some alteration of Mr. Sanadon's plan, for which the translator is obliged to the learned and reverend Mr. Jones, who lately published a very valuable edition of Horace.

Although it was impossible to preserve our author's measures, yet the form of his strophes has been often imitated, and, in general, there will be found a greater number of different stanzas in the translation, than in the original. One advantage there is peculiar to English stanzas, that some of them have a natural ease and fluency; others seem formed for humour and pleasantry; while a third kind has a tone of dignity and solemnity proper for sublimer subjects. Thus the measures and form of the stanza will often show the design and cast of the ode.

In the translation it has not only been endeavoured to give the poet's general meaning, but to preserve that force of expression, in which his peculiar happiness consists, and that boldness of epithets, for which one of his commentators calls him wonderful, and almost divine. Many odes, especially in the first book, have little more than choice of words and harmony of numbers to make them not unworthy of their author; and although these were really the most difficult parts of the translation, yet they will be certainly least entertaining to an English reader. In the usual manner of paraphrase or imitation, it had not been impossible to have given them more spirit, according to the taste of many a modern critic, by enlarging the poet's design, and adding to his thoughts; but, however hardy the translator may seem by his present adventurous undertaking, this was a presumption, of which he was very little capable.

It would be a tedious, useless, and ill-natured labour, to point out the faults in other versions of our poet. Let us rather acknowledge, that there are excellent lines in them, of which the present translator has taken as many as he could use upon his plan, and wishes, for the sake of the public, they could be found to exceed a hundred.

Yet still the far more valuable parts of our author remain to be considered. If in his Odes he appears with all the charms and graces and ornaments of poetry, in his Epistles and Satires he gives us the noblest precepts of philosophy, that ever formed the human heart, or improved the understanding. He tells us, that Homer shows in a clearer and more persuasive manner the beauty and advantages of virtue, the deformity and dangers of vice, than even the Stoic and Academician philosophers. Yet the morality of Homer is confined to politics; to the virtues or vices of princes, upon whom, indeed, the happiness or misery of their people depends. But in the morality of Horace, the happiness and misery of all human kind are interested. Here the gratitude and affection due to a good father for his care and tenderness are impressed upon the child. Here we are taught, that real greatness does not arise from the accident of being nobly born, or descended from a race of titled ancestors. We must imitate those virtues, to which they were indebted for their titles. Such are the sentiments of our poet's philosophy.

If his religion were a subject for our curiosity, it will appear to have been founded upon the best reasoning of the human understanding. He asserts a supreme Being, with that noble idea of him; Unde all majus generatur ipso, nec viget quicquam simile aut secundum. From this Being all others, both gods and men, received their existence, and upon him they depend for the continuance of it. But as creeds and practice too frequently differ, it is acknowledged, that our poet, although not professedly the disciple of any particular school, in general lived an Epicurean. Such a religion was happily suited to the natural indolence of his disposition, the carelessness of his temper, and the companionable gaiety of his humour. Yet we find him honest, just, humane, and good-natured; firm in his friendships; grateful, without flattery, to the bounty of Mæcenæus, and wisely contented with the fortune which he had the honour of receiving from his illustrious patron. Among the numerous authors of antiquity, others, perhaps, may be more admired, or esteemed; none more amiable, more worthy to be beloved.

The difficulty of translating this part of his works arises in general from the frequent translations of lines in Grecian writers, and parodies on those of his contemporaries; from his introducing new characters on the scene, and changing the speakers of his dialogues; from his not marking his transitions from thought to thought, but giving them as they lay in his mind. These unconnected transitions are of great life and spirit; nor should a translator be too coldly regular in supplying the connection, since it will be a tame performance, that gives us the sense of Horace, if it be not given in his peculiar manner.

As his editors have often perplexed the text, by altering the measures of our author for the sake of a more musical cadence; so they, who have imitated or translated him with most success in English, seem to have forgotten, that a carelessness of numbers is a peculiar part of his character, which ought to be preserved almost as faithfully as his sentiments.

Style is genius, and justly numbered amongst the fountains of the sublime. Expression in poetry is that colouring in painting, which distinguishes a master's hand. But the misfortune of our translators is, that they have only one style; and consequently all their authors, Homer, Virgil, Horace, Ovid, are compelled to speak in the same numbers, and the same unvaried expression. The free-born spirit of poetry is confined in twenty constant syllables, and the sense regularly ends with every second line, as if the writer had not strength enough to support himself, or courage enough to venture into a third.

This unclassical kind of versification would be particularly most unnatural in a translation of Horace. It would make him argue in couplets, and the persons of his dialogues converse almost in epigrams. The translator has therefore followed the sense in one unbroken period. He has often endeavoured to imitate the prosaic cadence of his author, when he could with much more ease have made him appear like a modern original. He has run the lines into each other, as he believes it the best manner of preserving that loose, prosaic poetry, that negligence of numbers, which has ever been esteemed one of his peculiar beauties.

If we consider the poetical spirit and numerous variety of measures in his Odes, we may believe this careless versification in his Satires was not an effect of necessity, but of judgment. His frequent use of proverbs and common phrases; his different manner of expressing the same sentiments in his Odes and Satires, will convince us, that he really thought a satirist and a poet were extremely different characters; that the language of poetry was as unnatural to the morality of satire, as a low, familiar style to the majesty of an epic poem; or, as he himself expresses it, that the Muse of satire walks on foot, while all her sisters soar into the skies.

If this criticism be just, the dispute between Juvenal and Horace, with regard to style, may with ease be decided. In Juvenal the vices of his age are shown in all their natural horrors. He commands his readers in the language of authority, and terrifies them with images drawn in the boldness of a truly poetical spirit. He stands like a priest at an altar sacrificing to his gods; but even a priest, in his warmest zeal of religion, might be forgiven, if he confessed so much humanity, as not to take pleasure in hearing the groans, and searching into the entrails of the victim.

There is a kind of satire of such malignity, as too surely proceeds from a desire of gratifying a constitutional cruelty of temper. The satirist does not appear like a magistrate to give sentence on the vices of mankind, but like an executioner to slaughter the criminal. It was the saying of a great man, that he who hated vice, hated mankind; but certainly he does not love them as he ought, who indulges his natural sagacity in a discernment of their faults, and feels an ill-natured pleasure in exposing them to public view.

Our author was of another spirit; of a natural cheerfulness of temper; an easiness of manners, fashioned by the politeness of courts; a good understanding, improved by conversing with mankind; a quick discernment of their frailties, but, in general, so happy an art of correcting them, that he reproves without offending, and instructs without an affectation of superiority. He preserves a strength of reasoning necessary to persuade, without that dogmatical seriousness, which is apt to disgust or disoblige. He has this advantage over the rigid satirist, that we receive him into our bosoms, while he reasons with good-humour, and corrects in the language of friendship. Nor will his Satires be less useful to the present age, than to that in which they were written, since he does not draw his characters from particular persons, but from human nature itself, which is invariably the same in all ages and countries.

WORKS OF HORACE.

TRANSLATED BY PHILIP FRANCIS, D. D.

ODES.

BOOK I.

ODE I.

TO MÆCENAS.

MÆCENAS, whose high lineage springs
From fair Etruria's ancient kings,
O thou, my patron and my friend,
On whom my life, my fame depend;
In clouds th' Olympic dust to roll,
To turn with kindling wheels the goal,
And gain the palm, victorious prize!
Exalt a mortal to the skies.

This man, by faction and debate,
Rais'd to the first employs of state;
Another, who from Libya's plain
Sweeps to his barn the various grain;
A third, who with unwearied toil
Ploughs cheerful his paternal soil;
While in their several wishes blest,
Not all the wealth by kings possess,
Shall tempt, with fearful souls, to brave
The terrors of the foamy wave.

When loud the winds and waters wage
Wild war with elemental rage,
The merchant praises the retreat,
The quiet of his rural seat;
Yet, want untutor'd to sustain,
Soon rigs his shatter'd bark again.

No mean delights possess his soul,
With good old wine who crowns his bowl;
Whose early revels are begun
Ere half the course of day be run,
Now, by some sacred fountain laid,
Now, stretch'd beneath some bowing shade.

The tented camps a soldier charm,
Trumpets and fifes his bosom warm;
Their mingled sounds with joy he'll hear,
Those sounds of war, which mothers fear.

The sportsman, chill'd by midnight Jove,
Forgets his tender, wedded love,
Whether his faithful hounds pursue,
And hold the bounding hind in view;
Whether the bear his hunters foils,
And foaming breaks the spreading toils,

An ivy-wreath, fair learning's prize,
Raises Mæcenas to the skies.
The breezy grove, the mazy round,
Where the light nymphs and satyrs bound,
If there the sacred Nine inspire
The breathing flute, and strike the lyre,
There let me fix my last retreat,
Far from the little vulgar, and the great.
But if you rank me with the choir,
Who tun'd with art the Grecian lyre,
Swift to the noblest heights of fame
Shall rise thy poet's deathless name.

ODE II.

TO AUGUSTUS.

Enough of snow and hail in tempests dire
Have pour'd on earth, while Heav'n's eternal sire
With red right arm at his own temples hur'd
His thunders, and alarm'd a guilty world.

Lest Pyrrha should again with plaintive cries
Behold the monsters of the deep arise,
When to the mountain summit Proteus drove
His sea-born herd, and where the woodland dove
Late perch'd, his wonted seat, the scaly brood
Entangled hung upon the topmost wood,
And every timorous native of the plain
High-floating swarm amid the boundless main.

We saw, push'd backward to his native source,
The yellow Tiber roll his rapid course,
With impious ruin threat'ning Vesta's fanè,
And the great monuments of Numa's reign;

With grief and rage while Ilia's bosom glows,
Boastful, for her revenge, his waters rose:
But now, th' uxorious river glides away,
So Jove commands, smooth-winding to the sea.

And yet, less numerous by their parents' crimes,
Our sons shall hear, shall hear to latest times,
Of Roman arms with civil gore embur'd,
Which better had the Persian foe subdu'd.

Among her guardian gods, what pitying power
To raise her sinking state shall Rome implore?
Shall her own hallow'd virgins' earnest prayer
Harmonious charm offend Vesta's ear?

To whom shall Jove assign to purge away
The guilty deed? Come then, bright god of day,
But gracious veil thy shoulders beamy-bright,
Oh! veil in clouds th' unassufferable light.

Or come, sweet queen of smiles, while round thee
rove,

On wanton wing, the powers of mirth and love;
Or hither, Mars, thine aspect gracious bend,
And powerful thy neglected race defend,
Parent of Rome, amidst the rage of fight
Sated with scenes of blood, thy peace delight,
Thou, whom the polish'd helm, the noise of arms,
And the stern soldier's frown with transport wags:

Or thou, fair Maia's winged son, appear,
And human shape, in prime of manhood, wear;
Declar'd the guardian of th' imperial state,
Divine avenger of great Cæsar's fate:

Oh! late return to Heav'n, and may thy reign
With lengthen'd blessings fill thy wide domain;
Nor let thy people's crimes provoke thy sight,
On air swift-rising to the realms of light.

Great prince and father of the state, receive
The noblest triumphs which thy Rome can give;
Nor let the Parthian, with unponish'd pride,
Beyond his bounds, O Cæsar, dare to ride!

ODE III.

TO THE SHIP IN WHICH VIRGIL SAILED TO ATRIUM.

So may the Cyprian queen divine,
And the twin-stars, with saving lustre shine;
So may the father of the wind

All others, but the western breezes, bind,
As you, dear vessel, safe restore
Th' entrusted pledge to th' Athenian shore,
And of my soul the partner save,
My much-lov'd Virgil, from the raging wave.

Or oak, or brass, with triple fold,
Around that daring mortal's bosom roll'd,
Who first to the wild ocean's rage
Launch'd the frail bark, and heard the winds engage Tempestuous, when the South descends
Precipitate, and with the North contends;

Nor fear'd the stars portending rain,
Nor the loud tyrant of the western main,
Of power supreme the storm to raise,
Or calmer smooth the surface of the seas.
What various forms of death could fright
The man, who view'd with fixt, unshaken sight,
The floating monsters, waves inflam'd,

And rocks for shipwreck'd fleets ill-fam'd?
Jove has the realms of earth in vain
Divided by th' inhabitable main,
If ships profane, with fearless pride,
Bound o'er th' inviolable tide.

No laws, or human or divine,
Can the presumptuous race of man confine.

Thus from the Sun's ethereal beam
When bold Prometheus stole th' enlivening flame,
Of severa dire a ghastly brood,

Till then unknown, th' unhappy fraud pursu'd;
On Earth their horrors baleful spread,
And the pale monarch of the dead,
Till then slow-moving to his prey,

Precipitately rapid swept his way.
Thus did the venturous Cretan dare
To tempt, with impious wings, the void of air;
Through Hell Alcides urg'd his course:

No work too high for man's audacious force.
Our folly would attempt the skies,
And with gigantic boldness impious rise;
Nor Jove, provok'd by mortal pride,
Can lay his angry thunderbolts aside.

ODE IV.

TO CESTRUS.

Fraught winter melts in vernal gales,
And grateful zephyrs fill the spreading sails;
No more the ploughman loves his fire,
No more the sowing herds their stalls desire,
While earth her richest verdure yields,
Nor hoary frosts now whiten o'er the fields.

Now joyous through the verdant meads,
Beneath the rising Moon, fair Venus leads
Her various dance; and with her train
Of nymphs and modest graces shakes the plain,
While Vulcan's glowing breath inspires
The toilsome forge, and blows up all its fires.

Now crown'd with myrtle, or the flowers
Which the glad earth from her free bosom pours,
We'll offer, in the shady grove,
Or lamb, or kid, as Pan shall best approve.

With equal pace impartial fate
Knocks at the palace and the cottage gate;
Nor should our sum of life extend
Our growing hopes beyond their destin'd end.

When sunk to Pluto's shadowy coasts,
Opprest with darkness and the fabled ghosts,
No more the dice shall there assign
To thee the jovial monarchy of wine.
No more shall you the fair admire,
The virgin's envy, and the youth's desire,

ODE V.

TO PYRRA.

While liquid odours round him breathe,
What youth, the rosy bower beneath,
Now courts thee to be kind?
Pyrrha, for whose unwary heart
Do you, thus drest with careless art,
Your yellow tresses bind?

How often shall th' unpractic'd youth
Of alter'd gods, and injur'd truth,
With tears, alas! complain?
How soon behold, with wondering eyes,
The black'ning winds tempestuous rise,
And scowl along the main?

While, by his easy faith betray'd,
He now enjoys thee, golden maid,
Thus amiable and kind;
He fondly hopes that you shall prove
Thus ever vacant to his love,
Nor heeds the faithless wind.

Unhappy they, to whom, untried,
You shine, alas! in beauty's pride;
While I, now safe on shore,
Will consecrate the pictur'd storm,
And all my grateful vows perform
To Neptune's saving power.

ODE VI.

TO AGRIPPA.

VARIUS, who soars on Homer's wing,
Agrippa, shall thy conquests sing,
Whate'er, inspir'd by his command,
The soldier dar'd on sea or land.

But we nor damp't with stèble art
Achilles' unrelenting heart,
Nor sage Ulysses in our lays
Pursues his wanderings through the seas;
Nor ours in tragic strains to tell
How Pelops' cruel offspring fell.

The Muse, who rules th' unwarlike lyre,
Forbids me boldly to aspire
To thine or sacred Cæsar's praise,
And hurt with feeble song the theme.

Who can describe the god of fight
In adamantinè armour bright?
Or Merion on the Trojan shore
With dust, how glorious! cover'd o'er?
Or Diomed, by Dallas' aid,
To warring gods an equal made?

But whether loving, whether free,
With all our usual levity,
Untaught to strike the martial string,
Of feasts and virgin fights we sing,
Of maids, who, when bold love assails,
Fierce in their anger spare their nails.

ODE VII.

TO M'KATIES PLANCUS.

Let other poets, in harmonious lays,
Immortal Rhodes or Mitylene praise,
Or Ephebus, or Corinth's towery pride,
Girt by the rolling main on either side;
Or Thebes, or Delphos, for their gods renown'd,
Or Tempe's plains with flowery honours crown'd.

There are, who sing in everlasting strains
The towers where wisdom's virgin-goddess reigns,
And ceaseless toiling court the trite reward
Of olive, pluck'd by every vulgar bard.
For Juno's fame, th' unnumber'd tuneful throng
With rich Mycensè grace their favourite song.
And Argos boast, of pregnant glebe to feed
The warlike horse, and animate the breed:
But me, nor patient Lacedæmon charms,
Nor fair Larissa with such transport warms,
As pure Albanca's far-resounding source,
And rapid Anio, headlong in his course,
Or Tibur, fenc'd by groves from solar beams,
And fruitful orchards bath'd by ductile streams.

* * * * *
The south wind often, when the welkin lowers,
Sweeps off the clouds, nor teems perpetual showers:
So, Plancus, be the happy wisdom thine,
To end the cares of life in mellow'd wine;
Whether the camp with banners bright display'd,
Or Tibur hold thee in its thick-wrought shade.

When Teucer from his sire and country fled,
With poplar wreaths the hero crown'd his head,
Reeking with wine, and thus his friends address'd,
Deep sorrow brooding in each anxious breast:
" Bold let us follow through the foamy tides,
Where Fortune, better than a father, guides;
Avaunt, despair! when Teucer calls to fame,
The same your angur, and your guide the same.
Another Salsamis, in foreign clime,
With rival pride shall raise her head sublime;
So Phœbus-mods: ye sons of valour true,
Full often tried in deeds of deadlier hue,
To day with wine drive every care away,
To-morrow tempt again the boundless sea."

ODE VIII.

TO LYDIA.

By the gods, my Lydia, tell,
Ah! why, by loving him too well,
Why you hasten to destroy
Young Sybaris, too am'rous boy?
Why he hates the sunny plain,
While he can sun or dust sustain?
Why no more, with martial pride,
Does he among his equals ride;
Or the Gallic steed command
With bitted curb and forming hand?
More than viper's baleful blood
Why does he fear the yellow brood?
Why detest the wrestler's oil,
While firm to bear the manly soil?
Where are now the livid scars
Of sportive, nor inglorious, wars,
When for the quoit, with vigour thrown,
Beyond the mark, his fame was known?
Tell us, why this fond disguise,
In which like Thetis' son he lies,
Ere unhappy Troy had shed
Her funeral sorrows for the dead,
Lest a manly dress should fire
His soul to war and carnage dire.

ODE IX.

TO THALLARCHUS.

Behold Soracte's airy height,
See how it stands a heap of snow;
Behold the winter's hoary weight
Oppress the labouring woods below;
And, by the season's icy hand
Congeal'd, the lake rivers stand.
Now melt away the winter's cold,
And larger pile the cheerful fire;
Bring down the vintage four-year-old,
Whose mellow'd heat can mirth inspire;
Then to the guardian powers divine
Careless the rest of life resign:
For, when the warring winds arise,
And o'er the fervid ocean sweep,
They speak—and lo! the tempest diet
On the smooth bosom of the deep;
Unshaken stands the aged grove,
And feels the providence of Jove.
To-morrow with its cars despise,
And make the present hour your own,
Be swift to catch it as it flies,
And score it up as clearly won;
Nor let your youth disdain to prove
The joys of dancing and of love,
Now let the grateful evening shade,
The public walks, the public park,
An assignation sweetly made
With gentle whispers in the dark:
While age morose thy vigour spares,
Be these thy pleasures, these thy cares.
The laugh, that from the corner flies,
The sportive fair-one shall betray;
Then boldly snatch the joyful prize;
A ring or bracelet tear away,
While she, not too severely coy,
Struggling shall yield the willing toy.

ODE X.

HYMN TO MERCURY.

I SEE the god, whose arts refin'd
 The savage race of human kind,
 By eloquence their passions charm'd,
 By exercise their bodies form'd :
 Mail, winged messenger of Jove,
 And all th' immortal powers above ;
 Sweet parent of the bending lyre,
 Thy praise shall all its sounds inspire.
 Artful and cunning to conceal,
 What'er in sportive theft you steal,
 When from the god who gilds the pole,
 Even yet a boy, his herds you stole,
 With angry voice the threat'ning power
 Bade thee the fraudulent prey restore ;
 But of his quiver too beguill'd,
 Pleas'd with the theft Apollo smil'd.
 You were the wealthy Priam's guide,
 When, safe from Agamemnon's pride,
 Through hostile camps, which round him spread
 Their watchful fires, his way he sped.
 Unspotted spirits you consign
 To blissful seats and joys divine,
 And, powerful with your golden wand,
 The light, unbodied crowd command :
 Thus grateful does your office prove
 To gods below, and gods above.

ODE XL

TO LEUCONOR.

STRAVE not, Leuconor, to pry
 Into the secret will of fate,
 Nor impious magic vainly try,
 To know our lives' uncertain date ;
 Whether th' indulgent power divine
 Hath many seasons yet in store,
 Or this the latest winter thine,
 Which breaks its waves against the shore.
 Thy life with wisser arts be crown'd,
 Thy filter'd wines abundant pour,
 The lengthen'd hope with prudence bound
 Proportion'd to the flying hour ;
 Even while we talk in careless ease,
 Our envious minutes wing their flight ;
 Then swift the fleeting pleasure seize,
 Nor trust tomorrow's doubtful light.

ODE XLII

HYMN TO JOVE.

WHAT man, what hero, on the tuneful lyre,
 Or sharp-ton'd flute, will Clio choose to raise Deathless to fame? What god? whose hallow'd
 The sportive image of the voice, [name,
 Shall in the shades of Helicon repeat,
 On Pindus, or on Hæmus, ever cool,
 From whence the forests in confusion rose
 To follow Orpheus and his song :
 He, by his mother's art, with soft delay
 Could stop the river's rapid lapse, or check
 The winged winds ; with strings of concord sweet
 Powerful the listening oaks to lead.

Claims not th' eternal sire his wonted praise!
 Awful who reigns o'er gods and men supreme,
 Who sea and earth—this universal globe

With grateful change of seasons guides ;
 From whom no being of superior power,
 Nothing of equal, second glory, springs,
 Yet first of all his progeny divine
 - Immortal honours Pallas claims :
 God of the vine, in deeds of valour bold,
 Fair virgin-huntress of the savage race,
 And Phœbus, dreadful with unerring dart,
 Nor will I not your praise proclaim.
 Alcides' labours, and fair Leda's twins,
 Fam'd for the rapid race, for wrestling fam'd,
 Shall grace my song : soon as whose star beign
 Through the fierce tempest shines serene,
 Swift from the rocks down foams the broken surge,
 Calm are the winds, the driving clouds disperse,
 And all the threatening waves, so will the gods,
 Smooth sink upon the peaceful deep.
 Here stops the song, doubtful whom next to praise,
 Or Romulus, or Numa's peaceful reign,
 The haughty ensigns of a Tarquin's throne,
 Or Cato, glorious in his fall.
 Grateful in higher tone the Muse shall sing
 The fate of Regulus, the Scantian race,
 And Paulus, 'midst the waste of Cannas' field,
 How greatly prodigal of life !

Form'd by the hand of penury severe,
 In dwellings suited to their small demerit,
 Fabricius, Curius, and Camillus roas ;
 To deeds of martial glory rose.
 Marcellus, like a youthful tree, of growth
 Inseparable, high shoots his spreading fame,
 And like the Moon, the feebler fires among,
 Conspicuous shines the Julian star.
 Saturnian Jove, parent and guardian god
 Of human race, to thee the fates assign
 The care of Cæsar's reign ; to thine alone
 Inferior let his empire rise ;
 Whether the Parthian's formidable powers,
 Or farthest India's oriental sons,
 With suppliant pride beneath his triumph fall,
 Wide o'er a willing world shall he
 Contented reign, and to thy throne shall bend
 Submissive. Thou in thy tremendous car
 Shalt shake Olympus' head, and at our groves
 Polluted, hurl thy dreadful bolts.

ODE XLIII

TO LYDIA.

AN! when on Telephus his charms,
 When on his rosy neck and waxen arms,
 Lydia with ceaseless rapture dwells,
 With jealous spleen my glowing bosom swells,
 My reason in confusion lies,
 And on my cheek th' uncertain colour dies,
 While the down-stealing tear betrays
 The lingering flame, that on my vitals preys.
 I burn, when in excess of wine,
 Brutal, he soils those snowy arms of thine,
 Or on thy lips the fierce-fond boy
 Impresses with his teeth the furious joy.
 If yet my voice can reach your ear,
 Hope not to find him constant and sincere,
 Cruel who hurts the fragrant kiss,
 Which Venus bathes with quintessence of bliss.

Thrice happy they, whom love unites equal feature, and sincere delights,
Unbroken by complaints or strife,
Even to the latest hours of life.

ODE XIV.

TO THE REPUBLIC.

INMATE vessel! shall the waves again tumultuous bear thee to the faithless main?
What would thy madness, thus with storms to sport?
Fast firm your anchor in the friendly port.
Behold thy naked decks; the wounded mast and sail-yards groan beneath the southern blast,
Nor without ropes thy keel can longer brave
The rushing fury of th' imperious wave:
Torn are thy sails, thy guardian gods are lost,
Whom you might call in future tempests tost.
What though majestic in your pride you stood
A noble daughter of the Pæonic wood,
You now may vainly boast an empty name,
Or birth conspicuous in the rolls of fame.
The mariner, when storms around him rise,
No longer on a painted stern relies.
Ah! yet take heed, lest these new tempests sweep
In sportive rage thy glories to the deep.
Thou, late my deep anxiety and fear,
And now my fond desire and tender care,
Ah! yet take heed, avoid those fatal seas
That roll among the shining Cyclades.

ODE XV.

THE PROPERTY OF NEREUUS.

WHEN the perfidious shepherd bore
The Spartan dame to Asia's shore,
Nereus the rapid winds oppress'd,
And calm'd them to unwilling rest,
That he might sing the dreadful fate
Which should their guilty loves away.

"Fatal to Priam's ancient sway
You bear th' all-omen'd fair away;
For soon shall Greece in arms arise,
Deep-sworn to break thy nuptial ties.
What toils do men and horse sustain!
What carnage loads the Dardanian plain!
Pallas prepares the bounding car,
The shield and helm, and rage of war.

"Though proud of Venus' guardian care,
In vain you comb your flowing hair;
In vain you sweep th' unwarlike string,
And tender airs to females sing;
For though the dart may harmless prove
(The dart that frights the bed of love);
Though you escape the noise of fight,
Nor Ajax can o'ertake thy flight;
Yet shalt thou, infamous of lust,
Soil those adulterous hairs in dust.

"Look back and see, with furious pace,
That ruin of the Trojan race,
Ulysses drives, and gage in years
Fam'd Nestor, hoary chief, appears,
Intrepid Teucer sweeps the field,
And Sthenelus, in battle skill'd;
Or skill'd to guide with steady rein,
And pour his chariot o'er the plain.

Undaunted Merion shalt thou feed;
While Diomed, with furious steel,
In arms superior to his sire,
Burns after thee with martial fire.

"As when a stag at distance spies
A prowling wolf, aghast he flies,
Of pasture heedless; so shall you,
High-panting, fly when they pursue,
Not such the promises you made,
Which Helen's easy heart betray'd,
Achilles' fleet; with short delay,
Vengeful protracts the fatal day;
But when ten rolling years expire,
Thy Troy shall blaze in Grecian fire."

ODE XVI.

TO TYNDARIS.

DAUGHTER, whose loveliness the bosom warms
More than thy lovely mother's riper charms,
Give to my bold lampoons what fate you please,
To wasting flames condemn'd, or angry seas.

But yet remember, nor the god of wine,
Nor Pythian Phœbus from his inmost shrine,
Nor Dindymene, nor her priests possess,
Can with their sounding cymbals shake the breast

Like furious anger in its gloomy vein,
Which neither temper'd sword, nor raging main,
Nor fire wide-wasting, nor tremendous Jove,
Rushing in baleful thunders from above,

Can tame to fear. Thus sings the poet's lay—
"Prometheus, to inform his nobler clay,
Their various passions chose from ev'ry beast,
And with the lion's rage inspir'd the human breast."

From anger all the tragic horrors rose,
That crush'd Thyestes with a weight of woes;
From hence proud cities date their utter falls,
When, insolent in ruin, o'er their walls

The wrathful soldier drags the hostile plough,
That haughty mark of total overthrow.
Me too in youth the heat of anger fir'd,
And with the rapid rage of rhyme inspir'd;

But now, repentant, shall the Muse again
To softer numbers tune her melting strain,
So thou recal thy threats, thy wrath control,
Resume thy love, and give me back my soul.

ODE XVII.

TO TYNDARIS.

PAN from Arcadia's hills descends
To visit oft my Sabine seat,
And here my tender goats defends
From rainy winds, and summer's fiery heat.

For when the vales, wide-spreading round,
The sloping hills, and polish'd rocks,
With his harmonious pipe resound,
In fearless safety graze my wandering flocks;

In safety through the woody brake,
The latent shrubs and thyme explore,
Nor longer dread the speckled snake,
And tremble at the martial wolf no more.

Their poet to the gods is dear,
They love his piety and Muse,
And all our rural honours here
Their flow'ry wealth around thee shall diffuse.

Here shall you taste Anacreon's lyre,
 Beneath a shady mountain's brow,
 To sing frail Circe's guilty fire,
 And chaste Penelope's unbroken vow.
 Far from the burning dog-star's rage
 Here shall you quaff our harmless wine;
 Nor here shall Mars intemperate wage
 Rude war with him who rules the jovial vine:
 Nor Cyrus' bold suspicious fear;
 Not on thy softness shall he lay
 His desperate hand, thy clothes to tear,
 Or brutal snatch thy festal crown away.

ODE XVIII.

TO VARUS.

Round Catulus' walls, or in Tibur's rich soil,
 To plant the glad vine be my Varus' first toil;
 For God hath propos'd to the wretch who's athirst,
 To drink, or with heart-gnawing cares to be curst.
 Of war, or of want, who e'er prates o'er his wine?
 For 'tis thine, father Bacchus; bright Venus, 'tis thine,
 To charm all his cares. Yet that no one may pass
 The freedom and mirth of a temperate glass,
 Let us think on the Lapithæ's quarrels so dire,
 And the Thracians, whom wine can to madness inspire:

Insatiate of liquor when glow their full veins,
 No distinction of vice or of virtue remains.
 Great god of the vine, who dost candour approve,
 I ne'er will thy statues profanely remove;
 I ne'er will thy rites, so mysterious, betray
 To the broad-glaring eye of the tale-telling day.
 Oh! stop the loud cymbal, the cornet's alarms,
 Whose sound, when the Bacchanal's bosom it warms,
 Arouses self-love, by blindness misled,
 And vanity, lifting aloft the light head,
 And honour, of prodigal spirit, that shows,
 Transparent as glass, all the secrets it knows.

ODE XIX.

ON GLYCERA.

Varus, who gave the Cupids birth,
 And the resistless god of wine,
 With the gay power of wanton mirth,
 Now bid my heart its peace resign;
 Again for Glycera I burn,
 And all my long-forgotten flames return.
 Like Parian marble pure and bright,
 The shining maid my bosom warms;
 Her face, too dazzling for the sight,
 Her sweet coquetting—how it charms!
 Whole Venus rushing through my veins,
 No longer in her favourite Cyprus reigns;
 No longer suffers me to write
 Of Scythians, fierce in martial deed,
 Or Parthian, urging in his flight
 The battle with reverted steed:
 Such themes she will no more approve,
 Nor ought that sounds impertinent to love.
 Here let the living altar rise,
 Adorn'd with every herb and flower;
 Here flame the incense to the skies,
 And purest wine's libation pour;

Due honours to the goddess paid,
 Soft sinks to willing love the yielding maid!

ODE XX.

TO MÆCENAS.

A rostr's beverage, vile and cheap,
 (Should great Mæcenas be my guest)
 Crude vintage of the Sabine grape,
 But yet in sober cups, shall crown the feast:

'Twas rack'd into a Grecian cask,
 Its rougher juice to melt away:
 I seal'd it too—a pleasing task!
 With annual joy to mark the glorious day,

When in applause shouts thy name
 Spread from the theatre around,
 Floating on thy own Tiber's stream,
 And Echo, playful nymph, return'd the sound,

From the Cæcubian vintage prest
 For you shall flow the racy wine;
 But ah! my meagre cup's unblest
 With the rich Formian or Falernian vine.

[For the Twenty-first Ode—see the Secular Poem.]

ODE XXII.

TO ARIETIUS FUSCUS.

The man who knows not guilty fear,
 Nor wants the bow nor pointed spear;
 Nor needs, while innocent of heart,
 The quiver teeming with the poison'd dart,

Whether through Libya's burning sands
 His journey leads, or Scythia's lands,
 Inhospitable waste of snows,
 Or where the fabulous Hydaspes flows:

For musing on my lovely maid,
 While careless in the woods I stray'd,
 A wolf—how dreadful! cross'd my way,
 Yet fled—he fled from his defenceless prey!

No beast of such portentous size
 In warlike Daunia's forests lies,
 Nor such the tawny lion reigns
 Fierce on his native Africa's thirsty plains,

Place me, where never summer breeze
 Unbinds the glebe, or warms the trees;
 Where ever-lowering clouds appear,
 And angry Jove deforms th' inclement year!

Place me beneath the burning ray,
 Where rolls the rapid car of day;
 Love and the nymph shall charm my toil,
 The nymph who sweetly speaks and sweetly smiles.

ODE XXIII.

TO CHLOE.

Chloe flies me like a fawn,
 Which through some sequester'd lawn
 Panting seeks the mother-deer,
 Not without a panic fear

Of the gently-breathing breeze,
And the motion of the trees.
If the curling leaves but shake,
If a lizard stir the brake,
Frighted it begins to freeze,
Trembling both at heart and knees.
But not like a tiger dire,
Nor a lion fraught with ire,
I pursue my lovely game
To destroy her tender frame.
Haste thee, leave thy mother's arms,
Ripe for love are all thy charms.

ODE XXIV.

TO VIRGIL.

WHY shouldst thou restrain the tender tear?
Why blush to weep for one so dear?
Sweet Muse, of melting voice and lyre,
Do thou the mournful song inspire.
Quintilius—sunk to endless rest,
With death's eternal sleep oppress!
Oh! when shall Faith, of soul sincere,
Of Justice pure the sister fair,
And Modesty, unspotted maid,
And Truth in artless guise array'd,
Among the race of human kind
An equal to Quintilius find?

How did the good, the virtuous mourn,
And pour their sorrows o'er his urn!
But, Virgil, thine the loudest strain,
Yet all thy pious grief is vain:
In vain do you the gods implore
Thy lov'd Quintilius to restore,
Whom on far other terms they gave,
By nature fated to the grave.

What though you can the lyre command,
And sweep its tones with softer hand
Than Orpheus, whose harmonious song
Once drew the listening trees along,
Yet ne'er returns the vital heat
The shadowy form to animate;
For when the ghost-compelling god
Forms his black troops with horrid rod,
He will not, lenient to the breath
Of prayer, unbar the gates of Death.
'Tis hard: but patience must endure,
And soothe the woes it cannot cure.

ODE XXV.

TO LYDIA.

THE wanton herd of rakes profess
Thy windows rarely now molest
With midnight raps, or break thy rest

With riot.

The door, that kindly once could move
The pliant hinge, begins to love
Its threshold, and no more shall prove Unquiet.

Now less and less assail thine ear
These plaints, "Ah, sleepest thou, my dear,
While I whole nights, thy true-love, here
Am dying?"

You in your turn shall weep the taunts
Of young and insolent gallants,
In some dark alley's midnight haunts
Late plying:

While raging tempests chill the skies,
And burning lust (such lust as tries
The madd'ning dams of horses) tries
Thy liver;
Our youth, regardless of thy frown,
Their beads with fresher wreaths shall crown,
And sing thy wither'd garlands down
The river.

ODE XXVI.

TO HIS MUSE.

WHAILE in the Muse's friendship blest,
Nor fear nor grief shall break my rest;
Bear them, ye vagrant winds, away,
And drown them in the Cretan sea.
Careless am I, or who shall reign
The tyrant of the Scythian plain,
Or with what anxious fear oppress
Heavens Tiridates' panting breast.
Sweet Muse, who lov'st the virgin spring,
Hither thy sunny flow'rets bring,
And let thy richest chaplet shed
Its fragrance round my Lamia's head;
For nought avails the poet's praise,
Unless the Muse inspire his lays.
Oh! string the Lesbian lyre again,
Let all thy sisters raise the strain,
And consecrate to deathless fame
My lov'd, my Lamia's honour'd name.

ODE XXVII.

TO HIS COMPANIONS.

WITH glasses made for gay delight,
'Tis Thracian, savage rage, to fight.
With such intemperate, bloody fray,
Fright not the modest god away.
Monstrous! to see the dagger shine
Amidst the midnight joys of wine.
Here bid this impious clamour cease,
And press the social couch in peace.

Say, shall I drink this heady wine,
Press'd from the rough Falernian vine?
Instant, let yonder youth impart
The tender story of his heart,
By what dear wound he blissful dies,
And whence the gentle arrow flies.

What! does the bashful boy deny?
Then, if I drink it let me die.

Whoe'er she be, a generous flame
Can never know the blush of shame.
Thy breast no slave-born Venus fires,
But fair, ingenuous love inspires.
Then safely whisper in my ear,
For all such trusts are sacred here.

Ah! worthy of a better flame!
Unhappy youth! is she the dame?
Unhappy youth! how art thou lost,
In what a sea of troubles tost!
What drugs, what witchcraft, or what charms,
What god, can free thee from her arms?
Scarce Pegasus can disengage
Thy heart from this Chimera's rage.

ODE XXVIII.

A MARINER AND THE GHOST OF ARCHYTAS.

MARINER.

ARCHYTAS, what avails thy nice survey
Of ocean's countless sands, of earth and sea;
In vain thy mighty spirit once could soar
To orbs celestial, and their course explore;
If here, upon the tempest-batten strand,
You lie confus'd, till some more liberal hand
Shall strow the pious dust in funeral rite,
And wing thee to the boundless realms of light.

GHOST.

Even he, who did with gods the banquet share,
Tithonus, rais'd to breathe celestial air,
And Minos, Jove's own counsellor of state,
All these have yielded to the power of fate.

MARINER.

Even your own sage, whose monumental shield,
Borne through the terrors of the Trojan field,
Prov'd that alone the mouldering body dies,
And souls immortal from our ashes rise,
Even he a second time resign'd his breath,
Sent headlong to the gloomy realms of Death:

GHOST.

Not meanly skill'd, even by your own applause,
In moral truth, and nature's secret laws.

One endless night for all mankind remains,
And once we all must tread the shadowy plains.
In horrid pomp of war the soldier dies;
The sailor in the greedy ocean lies;
Thus age and youth promiscuous crowd the tomb:
No mortal head can shun th' impending doom.

When sets Orion's star, the winds, that sweep
The raging waves, o'erwhelm'd me in the deep:
Nor thou, my friend, refuse with impious hand
A little portion of this wandering sand
To these my poor remains; so may the storm
Rage o'er the woods, nor ocean's face deform:
May gracious Jove with wealth thy toils repay,
And Neptune guard thee through the watery way!

Thy guiltless race this bold neglect shall mourn,
And thou shalt feel the just returns of scorn.
My curses shall pursue thy guilty deed,
And all in vain thy richest victims bleed.
Whate'er thy haste, oh! let my prayer prevail,
Thrice strow the sand, then hoist the flying sail.

ODE XXIX.

TO IECIUS.

Iecius, the blest Arabia's gold
Can you with envious eye behold?
Or will you boldly take the field,
And teach Sabea's kings to yield,
Or meditate the dreadful Mede
In chains triumphantly to lead?

Should you her hapless lover slay,
What captive maid shall own thy sway?
What courtly youth, with essenc'd hair,
Shall at thy board the goblet bear,
Skillful with his great father's art
To wing with death the pointed dart?

Who shall deny that streams ascend,
And Tiber's currents backward bend,

When you have all our hopes betray'd;
You, that far other promise made;
When all your volumes, learned store
The treasures of Socratic lore,
Once bought at mighty price, in vain
Are sent to purchase arms in Spain!

ODE XXX.

TO VENUS.

Queen of beauty, queen of smiles,
Leave, oh! leave thy favourite isles;
A temple rises to thy fame,
Where Glycera invokes thy name,
And bids the fragrant incense flame.

With thee bring thy love-warm son,
The graces bring with flowing zone,
The nymphs, and jocund Mercury,
And sprightly youth, who without thee
Is sought but savage liberty.

ODE XXXI.

TO APOLLO.

When at Apollo's hallow'd shrine
The poet hails the power divine,
And here his first libations pours,
What is the blessing he implores?

He nor desires the swelling grain,
That yellows o'er Sardinia's plain;
Nor the fair herds, that lowing feed
On warm Calabria's flowery mead;
Nor ivory, of spotless shine;
Nor gold, forth-flaming from its mine;
Nor the rich fields that Eris laves,
And eats away with silent waves.

Let others quaff the racy wine,
To whom kind Fortune gives the vine;
The golden goblet let him drain,
Who vent'rous ploughs th' Atlantic main,
Blest with three safe returns a-year,
For he to every god is dear.

To me boon Nature frankly yields
Her wholesome salad from the fields;
Nor ask I more, than sense and health
Still to enjoy my present wealth.
From age and all its weakness free,
O son of Jove, preserv'd by thee,
Give me to strike the tuneful lyre,
And thou my latest song inspire.

ODE XXXII.

TO HIS LYRE.

Is with thee beneath the shade
Many an idle air I play'd,
Now the Latian song, my lyre,
With some immortal strain inspire,
Such as once Alcaeus sung,
Who, fierce in war, thy music strung,
When he heard the battle roar,
Or moor'd his sea-tost vessel on the shore:
Wine and the Muses were his theme,
And Venus, laughter-loving dame,

With Cupid ever by her side,
And Lycus, form'd in beauty's pride,
With his hair of jetty-dye,
And the black lustre of his eye.
Charming shell, Apollo's love,
How grateful to the feasts of Jove !
Hear thy poet's solemn prayer,
Thou soft'ner of each anxious care.

ODE XXXIII.

TO ALBIUS TIBULLUS.

No more in elegiac strain
Of cruel Glycera complain,
Though she resign her faithless charms
To a new lover's younger arms.
The maid, for lovely forehead fam'd,
With Cyrus' beauties is inflam'd ;
While Pholœ, of haughty charms,
The panting breast of Cyrus warms :
But wolves and goats shall sooner prove
The pleasures of forbidden love,
Than she her virgin honour stain,
And not the filthy rake disdain.

So Venus wills, whose power controls
The fond affections of our souls ;
With sportive cruelty she binds
Unequal forms, unequal minds.
Thus, when a better Venus strove
To warm my youthful breast to love,
Yet could a slave-born maid detain
My willing heart in pleasing chain,
Though fiercer she than waves that roar,
Winding the rough Calabrian shore.

ODE XXXIV.

A fugitive from Heaven and prayer,
I mock'd at all religious fear,
Deep scienc'd in the mazy lore
Of mad philosophy ; but now
Heist sail, and back my voyage plough
To that blest harbour, which I left before.
For lo ! that awful heavenly sire,
Who frequent cleaves the clouds with fire,
Parent of day, immortal Jove,
Late through the floating fields of air,
The face of Heaven serene and fair,
His thundering steeds and winged chariot drove ;
When, at the bursting of his flames,
The ponderous earth, and vagrant streams,
Infernal Styx, the dire abode
Of hateful Tænarus profound,
And Atlas to his utmost bound,
Trembled beneath the terrors of the god.
The hand of Jove can crush the proud
Down to the meanness of the crowd,
And raise the lowest in his stead ;
But rapid Fortune pulls him down,
And snatches his imperial crown,
To place, not fix it, on another's head.

ODE XXXV.

TO FORTUNA.

Gods, whom Antium, beauteous town, obeys,
Whose various will with instant power can raise
Frail mortals from the depths of low despair,
Or change proud triumphs to the funeral tear :

Thee the poor farmer, who with ceaseless pain
Labour's the glebe ; thee, mistress of the main,
The sailor, who with fearless spirit dares
The rising tempest, courts with anxious prayers :

Thee the rough Dacian, thee the vagrant band
Of field-born Scythians, Latium's warlike land,
Cities and nations, mother-queens revere,
And purple tyranny beholds with fear.

Nor in thy rage with foot destructive spurn
This standing pillar, and its strength o'erturn ;
Nor let the nations rise in bold uproar,
And civil war, to break th' imperial power.

With solemn pace and firm, in awful state
Before thee's stalls inexorable Fate,
And grasps empaling nails, and wedges dread,
The hook tormentous, and the melted lead :

Thee Hope and Honour, now, alas, how rare !
With white enrob'd, attend with dutious care,
When from the palace of the great you fly
In angry mood, and garb of misery.

Not such the crowd of light companions prove,
Nor the false mistress of a wanton love,
Faithless who wait the lowest dregs to drain,
Nor friendship's equal yoke with strength sustain.

Propitious guard our Caesar, who explores
His vent'rous way to furthest Britain's shores ;
Our new-rai'd troops be thy peculiar care,
Who dreadful to the East our banners bear.

Alas ! the shameless scars ! the guilty deeds,
When by a brother's hand a brother bleeds !
What crimes have we, an iron age, not dar'd ?
In terror of the gods what altars spar'd ?

Oh ! that our swords with civil gore distain'd,
And in the sight of gods and men profan'd—
Sharpen again, dread queen, the blunted steel,
And let our foes the pointed vengeance feel.

ODE XXXVI.

Wine's incense heap the sacred fire,
And bolder strike the willing lyre.
Now let the heifer's votive blood
Pour to the gods its purple flood ;
Those guardian gods, from furthest Spain,
Who send our Numida again.

A thousand kisses now he gives,
A thousand kisses he receives.
But Lamia most his friendship proves,
Lamia with tenderness he loves.
At school their youthful love began,
Whence they together rose to man.

With happiest marks the day shall shine,
Nor want th' abundant joy of wine ;
Like Salian priests the dance we'll lead,
And many a mazy measure tread.
Now let the Thracian goblet foam,
Nor, in the breathless draught o'ercome,
Shall Bacchus yield his boasted name
To Damalis of tipping fame.

Here let the rose and lily shed
Their short-liv'd bloom ; let parsley spread
Its living verdure o'er the feast,
And crown with mingled sweets the guest.
On Damalis each amorous boy
Shall gaze with eyes that flow with joy.

While she, as curls the ivy-plant,
Shall twine luxuriant round her now gallant.

ODE XXXVII.

TO HIS COMPANIONS.

Now let the bowl with wine be crown'd,
Now lighter dance the merry round,
And let the sacred couch be stor'd
With the rich dainties of a priestly board.

Sooner to draw the mellow'd wine;
Prest from the rich Cæcuban vine,
Were impious mirth, while yet elate
The queen breath'd ruin to the Roman state.

Surrounded by a tainted train,
Watches enervate and obscene,
She rav'd of empire—nothing less—
Vast in her hopes, and giddy with success.

But, hardly rescu'd from the flames,
One lonely ship her fury tames;
While Cæsar with impelling oar
Pursu'd her flying from the Latian shores.

Her, with Egyptian wine inspir'd,
With the full draught to madness fir'd,
Augustus sober'd into tears,
And turn'd her visions into real fears.

As darting sudden from above
The hawk attacks a tender dove;
Or sweeping huntsman drives the hare
O'er wide Æmonia's icy deserts drear;
So Cæsar through the billows press'd,
To lead in chains the fatal pest:
But she a nobler fate explor'd,
Nor woman-like beheld the deathful sword,

Nor with her navy fled dismay'd,
In distant realms to seek for aid,
But saw unmov'd her state destroy'd,
Her palace desolate, a lonely void;

With fearless hand she dar'd to grasp
The writhings of the wrathful asp,
And suck the poison through her veins,
Resolv'd on death, and fiercer from its pains.

Then scorn'ing to be led the host
Of mighty Cæsar's naval host,
And arm'd with more than mortal spleen,
Defrauds a triumph, and expires a queen.

ODE XXXVIII.

TO HIS SLAVE.

I TELL thee, boy, that I detest
The grandeur of a Persian feast,
Nor for me the kingly's rind
Shall the flowery chaplet bind:
Then search not where the curious see
Beyond his season loitering grow,
But beneath the mantling vine
While I quaff the flowing wine,
The myrtle's wreath shall crown our brows,
While you shall wait, and I carouse.

ODES.

BOOK II.

ODE I.

TO ANTIQVVS ROLLVS.

O ROLLVS, thou the great defence
Of sad, impleaded innocence,
On whom, to weigh the grand debate,
In deep consult the fathers wait;
For whom the triumphs o'er Dalmatia spread
Unfading honours round thy laurel'd head;

Of warm commotions, wrathful jars,
The growing seeds of civil wars;
Of double Fortune's cruel games,
The specious means, the private aims,
And fatal friendships of the guilty great,
Alas! how fatal to the Roman state!

Of mighty legions late subdu'd,
And arms with Latian blood imbrow'd,
Yet unston'd (a labour vast!
Doubtful the die, and dire the cast!)
You treat adventurous, and incautious tread
Our fires with faithless embers overspread:

Retard awhile thy glowing vein,
Nor swell the solemn, tragic scene;
And when thy sage, historic cares
Have form'd the train of Rome's affairs,
With lofty rapture re-inflam'd, infuse
Heroic thoughts, and wake the buskin'd Muse!

Hark! the shrill clarion's voice I hear,
Its threatening murmurs pierce mine ear;
And in thy lines, with brazen breath,
The trumpet sounds the charge of death;
While the strong splendours of the sword alight
The flying steed, and mar the rider's sight!

Panting with terror, I survey
The martial host in dread array,
The chiefs, how valiant and how just!
Defil'd with not inglorious dust,
And all the world in chains, but Cato see
Of spirit unsubdu'd, and dying to be free.

Imperial Juno, fought with ire,
And all the partial gods of Tyre,
Who, feeble to revenge her cries,
Retreated to their native skies,
Have in the victor's bleeding race repair'd
Jugurtha's ruin, and appear'd his shade.

What plain, by mortals travers'd o'er,
Is not enrich'd with Roman gore?
Unnumber'd sepulchres record
The deathful harvest of the sword,
And proud Hesperia, rubbing into thrall,
While distant Parthia bends the cumbrous fall.

What gulph, what rapid river flows
Unconscious of our wasteful woes?
What rolling sea's unfathom'd tide
Have not the Daunian slaughterers dy'd?
What coast, encircled by the briny flood,
Begets not the shameful tribute of our blood?

But thou, my Mass, to whom belong
The sportive jest and jocund song,
Beyond thy province cease to stray,
Nor vain revive the plaintive lay:
Seek humbler measures, indolently laid
With me beneath some love sequester'd shade.

ODE II.

TO CRIPUS SALLUSTIUS.

Gold hath no lustre of its own,
It shines by temperate use alone,
And when in earth it hoarded lies,
My Sallust can the mass despise.
With never-failing wing shall Fame
To latest ages bear the name:
Of Proculus, who could prove
A father, in a brother's love.
By virtue's precepts to control
The furious passions of the soul
Is over wider realms to reign;
Unenvied monarch, than if Spain
You could to distant Lybia join,
And both the Carthages were thine.
The dropsy, by indulgence nurs'd,
Pursues us with increasing thirst,
Till art expels the cause, and drains
The watery languour from our veins.
But Virtue can the crowd unteach
Their false, mistaken forms of speech;
Virtue, to crowds a foe profess,
Disdains to number with the blest,
Pharates, by his slaves ador'd,
And to the Parthian crown restor'd,
And gives the diadem, the throne,
And laurel wreath, to him alone
Who can a treasure'd mass of gold
With firm, undazzled eye behold.

ODE III.

TO DELLIUS.

In adverse hours an equal mind maintain,
Nor let your spirit rise too high,
Though Fortune kindly change the scene—
Remember, Dellius, you were born to die.
Whether your life in sorrows pass,
And sadly joys glide away;
Whether, reclining on the grass,
You bless with choicest wine the festal day,
Where the pale poplar and the pine
Expel the Sun's intemperate beam,
In hospitable shades their branches twine;
And wind with toil, though swift, the trethubles
stream:
Here pour your wines, your odours shed:
Bring forth the rose's short-liv'd flower,
While Fate yet spins thy mortal thread,
While youth and fortune give th' indulgent hour.
Your purchas'd woods, your house of state,
Your villa, wash'd by Tiber's wave,
You must, my Dellius, yield to Fate,
And to your heir these high-pil'd treasures leave.
Whether you boast a monarch's birth,
While wealth unbounded round you flows,
Or poor, and sprung from vulgar earth,
No pity for his victim Pluto knows.

VOL. XIX.

We all must tread the paths of Fate;
And ever shakes the mortal urn,
Whose lot embarks us, soon or late,
On Charon's boat, ah! never to return.

ODE IV.

TO XANTHIAS PHOCÆUS.

Let not my Phocæus think it shame
For a fair slave to own his flame;
A slave could stern Achilles move,
And bend his haughty soul to love:
Ajax, invincible in arms,
Was captiv'd by his captive's charms:
Atrides 'midst his triumphs mourn'd,
And for a ravish'd virgin burn'd,
What time the fierce barbarian bands
Fell by Pelides' conquering hands,
And Troy (her Hector swept away)
Became to Greece an easier prey.
Who knows, when Phyllis is your bride,
To what fine folk you'll be allied?
Her parents dear, of gentle race,
Shall not their son-in-law disgrace.
She sprang from kings, or nothing less,
And weeps the family's distress.
Think not that such a charming she
Can of the wretched vulgar be,
A maid, so faithful and so true
To love, to honour, and to you!
Her dear mamma, right-virtuous dame,
Could ne'er have known the blush of shame.
While thus with innocence I praise,
Let me no jealous transports raise.
Heart-whole and sound I laud her charms,
Her face, her taper legs, her arms;
For, trembling on to forty years,
My age forbids all jealous fears.

ODE V.

See, thy heifer's yet unbroke
To the labours of the yoke,
Nor hath strength enough to prove
Such impetuous weight of love.
Round the fields her fancy strays,
O'er the mead she sportive plays;
Now beneath the sultry beam
Cools her in the passing stream,
Now with frisking steerlings young
Sports the sallow groves among.

Do not then commit a rape
On the crude, un-mellow'd grape:
Autumn soon, of various dyes,
Shall with kinder warmth arise,
Bid the livid clusters glow,
And a riper purple show.

Time to her shall count each day,
Which from you it takes away,
Till with bold and forward charms
She shall rush into your arms.
Phœbe, the flying fair,
Shall not then with her compare;
Nor the maid of bosom bright,
Like the Moon's unspotted light,

REESE LIBRARY
OF THE UNIVERSITY

In hour accurs'd with impious hand
 (Thou bane and scandal of thy land)
 Well may I think the parricide
 In blood his guilty soul had dyed,
 Or plang'd his dagger in the breast,
 At midnight, of his sleeping guest,
 Or temper'd every baleful juice
 Which poisonous Colchian glebes produce;
 Or, if a blacker crime be known,
 That crime the wretch had made his own,
 Who on my harmless grounds and me
 Bestow'd thee, luckless, falling tree.

While dangers hourly round us wait,
 No caution can prevent our fate.
 All other deaths the sailor dreads,
 Who yet the raging ocean fears;
 The Parthian views with deep dismay
 The Roman chains, and firm array;
 The Roman dreads the Parthian's speed,
 His flying war, and backward reed;
 While Death, unheeded, sweeps away
 The world, his everlasting prey.

How near was I those dreary plains,
 Where Pluto's auburn consort reigns;
 Where awful sits the judge of Hell;
 Where pious spirits blissful dwell;
 Where Sappho's sweet complaints reprove
 The rivals of her fame and love,
 Alcæus bolder sweeps the strings,
 And seas, and war, and exile sings!

Thus while they strike the various lyre,
 The ghosts the sacred sounds admire;
 But when Alcæus tunes the strain
 To deeds of war, and tyrants slain,
 In thicker crowds the shadowy throng
 Drink deeper down the martial song.
 What wonder? when with bending ears
 The dog of Hell astonish'd hears,
 And, in the Furies' hair entwin'd,
 The snakes with cheerful horror wind;
 While, charm'd by the melodious strains,
 The tortur'd ghosts forget their pains,
 Orion quits his bold delight,
 To chase the lion's rage, or lynx's flight.

ODE XIV.

TO POSTUMUS.

How swiftly glide our flying years!
 Alas! nor piety nor tears
 Can stop the fleeting day;
 Deep-furrow'd wrinkles, passing age,
 And death's unconquerable rage,
 Are strangers to delay.

Though every day a bull should bleed
 To Pluto, bootless were the deed,
 The monarch tearless reigns,
 Where vultur-tortur'd Tityos lies,
 And triple Geryon's monstrous size
 The gloomy wate detains.

Whoever tastes of earthly food
 Is doom'd to pass the joyless food,
 And hear the Stygian roar;
 The scepter'd king, who rules the earth,
 The labouring hind, of humbler birth,
 Must reach the distant shore.

The broken surge of Adria's main,
 Hoarse-sounding, we avoid in vain,
 And Mars in blood-stain'd arms;
 The southern blast in vain we fear,
 And autumn's life-annoying air
 With idle fears alarms:

For all must see Cocytus flow,
 Whose gloomy water sadly slow
 Strays through the dreary soil.
 The guilty maids, an ill-fam'd train!
 And, Sisyphus, thy labours vain,
 Condemn'd to endless toil.

Your pleasing consort must be left,
 And you, of villas, lands, bereft,
 Must to the shades descend;
 The cypress only, hated tree!
 Of all thy much-lov'd grove, shall thee,
 Its short-liv'd lord, attend.

Then shall your worthier heir discharge
 And set th' imprison'd casks at large,
 And dye the floor with wine,
 So rich and precious, not the feast
 Of holy pontiffs cheer their guests
 With liquor more divine.

ODE XV.

In royal pride our buildings rise,
 The useless plough neglected lies;
 Ponds, broad as lakes, our fields o'tspread;
 Th' unmarried plume high waves the head
 Above the elm; while all around,
 Wafting their fragrance o'er the ground,
 Where once the olive pour'd its shade,
 And its rich master's cares repaid,
 The violet and myrtle greets
 The senses with a waste of sweets;
 While vainly would Apollo's ray
 Through our thick laurels pour the day.

Not such were Cato's sage decrees,
 Nor Romulus by arts like these
 In wisdom form'd th' imperial sway,
 And bid th' unwilling world obey:
 Though small each personal estate,
 The public revenues were great;
 Arcades were then by law confin'd,
 Nor open'd to the northern wind:
 Or turf, or brick, where Fortune pleas'd,
 The private dwelling humbly rais'd,
 While awful to the powers divine
 Rose high to Heaven the sacred shrine,
 And all the public structures shone
 Enrich'd with ornamental stone.

ODE XVI.

TO POSTUMUS CROTONÆ.

Caveart in the wild Ægean seas,
 The sailor bends to Heaven for ease,
 While clouds the Moon's fair lustre hide,
 And not a star's his course to guide.
 Furious in war the Thracian preys,
 The quiver'd Mede, for ease, for ease,
 A blessing never to be sold
 For gems, for purple, or for gold.

Nor can the consul's power control
The sickly tumults of the soul,
Or bid the cares to stand aloof
That hover round the vaulted roof.

Happy the man whose frugal board
His father's plenty can afford:
His gentle sleep, nor anxious fear
Shall drive away, nor sordid care.

Why do we aim with eager strife
At things beyond the mark of life?
To climates warm'd by other suns
In vain the wretched exile runs;
Flies from his country's native skies,
But never from himself he flies;
Corroding cares incessant charge
His flight, and climb his armed barge;
Or though he mount the rapid steed,
Care follows with unerring speed,
Far swifter than the timorous hind,
Far swifter than the driving wind.
The spirit that, serenely gay,
Careless enjoys the present day,
Can with an easy, cheerful smile
The bitterness of life beguile;
Nor fears th' approaching hour of fate,
Nor hopes for human bliss complete.

Achilles perish'd in his prime,
Tithon was worn away by time,
And Fate, with lavish hand, to me
May grant what it denies to thee.
A hundred bleating flocks are thine,
Around thee graze thy lowing kine;
Neighing thy mares invite the reins,
Thy robes the twice-dy'd purple stains;
On me not unadulgent Fate
Bestow'd a rural, calm retreat,
Where I may tune the Roman lyre,
And warm the song with Grecian fire;
Then scorn, in conscious virtue proud,
The worthless malice of the crowd.

ODE XVII.

TO MÆCENAS.

Why will Mæcenas thus complain,
Why kill me with the tender strain?
Nor can the gods nor I consent
That you, my life's great ornament,
Should sink untimely to the tomb,
While I survive the fatal doom.

Should you, alas! be snatch'd away,
Wherefore, ah! wherefore should I stay,
My values lost, no longer whole,
And but possessing half my soul?
One day, believe the sacred oath,
Shall lead the funeral pomp of both;
With thee to Pluto's dark abode,
With thee I'll tread the dreary road.
Nor fell Chimæra's breath of fire,
Nor hundred-headed Gyas dire,
Shall ever tear my friend from me:
So Justice and the Fates decree.

Whether fair Libra's kinder sign,
Or Scorpius with an eye malign
Beheld my birth (whose gloomy power
Rules dreadful o'er the natal hour),
Or Capricorn, with angry rays
Who shames the tyrant of the seat,

With equal beams our stars unite,
And strangely shed their mingled light.
Thee Jove's bright influence snatch'd away
From baleful Saturn's impious ray,
And stopp'd the rapid wings of Fate,
When the full theatre, plate,
With joyous transports hail'd thy name,
And thrice uprais'd the loud acclaim.

A tree, when falling on my head,
Had surely crush'd me to the dead,
But Pan, the poet's guardian, broke,
With saving hand, the destin'd stroke.
For thee, let the rich victim's blood
Pour forth to Jove its purple flood;
For thee, the votive temple rise;
For me, a humble lambkin dies.

ODE XVIII.

No walls, with ivory inlaid,
Adorn my house; no colonnade
Proudly supports my citron beams,
Nor rich with gold my ceiling flames;
Nor have I, like an heir unknown,
Seiz'd upon Attalus his throne;
Nor dames, to happier fortunes bred,
Draw down for me the purple thread;
Yet with a firm and honest heart,
Unknowing or of fraud or art,
A liberal vein of genius blest,
I'm by the rich and great cared.
My patron's gift, my Sabine field,
Shall all its rural plenty yield,
And, happy in that rural store,
Of Heaven and him I ask no more.

Day presses on the heels of day,
And moons increase to their decay:
But you, with thoughtless pride glate,
Unconscious of impending fate,
Command the pillar'd dome to rise,
When lo! thy tomb forgotten lies,
And, though the waves indignantly roar,
Forward you urge the Baian shore,
While earth's too narrow bounds in vain
Your guilty progress would restrain.
The sacred landmark strives in vain
Your impious avarice to restrain;
You break into your neighbour's grounds,
And overleap your client's bounds.
Driven out by thee, to new abodes
They carry their paternal gods;
The wife her husband's sorrow shares,
And on her breast her squallid infants bears.

Yet, destin'd by unerring Fate,
Shall death this wealthy lord await;
Then whither tend thy wide demesnes?
For Earth impartial entertains
Her various sons, and in her breast
Princes and beggars equal rest.

Nor gold could bribe, nor art deceive,
The gloomy life-guard of the grave
Backward to tread the shadowy way,
And waft Prometheus into day.
Yet he who Tantalus detains,
With all his haughty race, in chains,
Invok'd or not, the wretch receives,
And from the toils of life relieves,

ODE XIX.

TO SACCHUS.

I saw (let future times believe)
The god of wine his lectures give;
'Midst rocks far distant was the scene;
With ears erect the satyrs stood,
And every goddess of the wood
Listen'd th' instructive, solemn strain.

The recent terror heaves my breast,
Yet, with th' inspiring power possess,
'Tumultuous joys my soul have warm'd;
Dreadful, who shak'st the ivy spear,
Thy votary thus prostrate bear,
And be thy rage, thy rage disarm'd.

Give me to sing, by thee inspir'd,
Thy priestesses to madness fir'd:
Fountains of wine shall pour along,
And, melting from the hollow tree,
The golden treasures of the bee,
And streams of milk shall fill the song.

Fair Ariadne's crown shall rise,
And add new glories to the skies:
While I to listening nations tell
How impious Pentheus' palace burn'd,
With hideous ruin overturn'd,
And how the mad Lycurgus fell.

Indus and Ganges own thy sway,
Barbaric seas thy power obey,
And o'er the pathless mountain's height
(Her head with horrid snakes enroll'd,
Which harmless writhe their angry fold)
Thy raptur'd priestess speeds her flight.

When rising fierce in impious arms,
The giant-race with dire alarms
Assail'd the sacred realms of light,
With lion-wrath, and dreadful paw,
With blood-besmeur'd and foaming jaw,
You put their horrid chief to flight.

For dancing form'd; for love and wit,
You seem'd for war's rude toils unfit,
And polish'd to each softer grace:
But dreadful when in arms you shone,
You made the fatal art your own,
In war excelling as in peace.

With golden horn supremely bright,
You darted round the bending light
Far-beaming through the gloom of Hell:
When Cerberus, with fear amaz'd,
Forgot his rage, and fawning gaz'd,
And at thy feet adoring fell.

ODE XX.

TO MÆCRNAB.

With strong, unwonted wing I rise,
A two-form'd poet, through the skies:
Far above envy will I soar,
And tread this worthless earth no more,
For know, ye rivals of my fame,
Though lowly born, a vulgar name,
I will not condescend to die,
Nor in the Stygian waters lie.

A rougher skin now clothes my thigh,
Into a swan's fair form I rise,
And feel the feather'd plume shed
Its down; and o'er my shoulders spread.
Swift as with Dædalean wing,
Harmonious bird, I'll soaring sing,
And, in my flight, the foamy shores
Where Bosphorus tremendous roars,
The regions bound by northern cold,
And Lybia's burning sands, behold.
Then to the learned sons of Spain,
To him who ploughs the Scythian main,
To him who, with dissembled fears,
Conscious, the Roman arms reverses,
To him who drinks the rapid Rhone,
Shall Horace, deathless bard! be known.
My friends, the funeral sorrow spare,
The plaintive song, and tender tear;
Nor let the voice of grief profane
With loud lamen's the solemn scene;
Nor o'er your poet's empty urn
With useless, idle sorrows mourn.

O D E S.

BOOK III.

ODE I.

MONARCHS on earth their power extend,
Monarchs to Jove submissive bend,
And own the sovereign god,
With glorious triumph whp subdu'd
The Titan race, gigantic brood!
And shakes whole nature with his nod.

When rival candidates contend,
And to the field of Mars descend
To urge th' ambitious claim,
Some of illustrious birth are proud,
Some of their clients' vassal crowd,
And some of virtue's fame.

Others the rural labour love,
And joy to plant the spreading grove,
The furrow'd glebe to turn;
Yet with impartial hand shall Fate
Both of the lowly and the great
Shake the capacious urn.

Behold the wretch, with conscious dread,
In pointed vengeance o'er his head
Who views th' impending sword;
Nor dainties force his pall'd desire,
Nor chant of birds, nor vocal lyre,
To him can sleep afford;

Heart-soothing sleep, which not disdain
The rural cot, and humble swains,
And shady river fair;
Or Tempe's ever-blooming spring,
Where zephyrs wave the balmy wing,
And fan the breeze air.

Who nature's frugal dictates hears,
He nor the raging ocean fears,
Nor stars of power malign,
Whether in gloomy storms they rise,
Or swift descending through the skies
With angry lustre shine;

Whether his vines be smit with hail,
Whether his promis'd harvests fail,
Perfidious to his toil;
Whether his drooping treps complain
Of angry winter's chilling rain,
Or stars that burn the soil.

Not such the haughty lord, who lays
His deep foundations in the seas,
And scorns earth's narrow bound;
The fish, affrighted, feel their waves
Contracted by his numerous slaves,
Even in the vast profound.

High though his structures rise in air,
Pale menaces, and black despair,
This haughty lord shall find,
O'ertake his armed galley's speed,
And when he mounts the flying steed,
Sits gloomy Care behind.

If purple, which the morn outshines,
Or marble from the Phrygian mines,
Though labour'd high with art,
If essence, breathing sweets divine;
Or flowing bowls of generous wine,
—At sooth an anxious heart,

On columns, rais'd in modern style,
Why should I plan the lofty pile
To rise with envied state;
Why, for a vain, superfluous store,
Which would encumber me the more,
Resign my Sabine seat?

ODE II.

TO HIS FRIENDS.

Ours hardy youth should learn to bear
Sharp want, to rein the warlike steed,
To hurl the well-directed spear
With pointed force, and bid the Parthian bleed.

Thus form'd in war's tumultuous trade
Through summer's heat, and winter's cold,
Some tyrant's queen, or blooming maid,
Shall from her walls the martial youth behold:

"Let not, alas! my royal spouse,
Untaught the deathful sword to wield,
That lion in his anger rouse, [field.]
Whom furious rage drives through th' ensanguin'd

What joys, what glories round him wait,
Who bravely for his country dies!
While with dishonest wounds shall Fate
Relentless stab the coward as he flies.

With stainless lustre Virtue shines,
A base repulse nor knows, nor fears;
Nor claims her honours, nor declines,
As the light air of crowds uncertain veers:

To him who not deserves to die
She shows the paths which heroes trod,
Then bids him boldly tempt the sky,
Spurn off his mortal clay, and rise a god.

To silence due rewards we give;
And they who mysteries reveal
Beneath my roof shall never live,
Shall never hoist with me the doubtful sail.

When Jove in anger strikes the blow,
Of with the bad the righteous bleed:
Yet with sure steps, though lame and slow,
Vengeance o'er takes the trembling villain's speed.

ODE III.

The man, in conscious virtue bold,
Who dares his secret purpose hold,
Unshaken hears the crowd's tumultuous cries,
And the impetuous tyrant's angry brow defies.

Let the wild winds, that rule the seas
Tempestuous, all their horrors raise;
Let Jove's dread arm with thunders rend the spheres,
Beneath the crush of worlds undaunted he appears.

Thus to the stamy towers above,
The vagrant hero, son of Jove,
Upsoar'd with strength his own, where Cæsar lies, [joys,
And quaffs, with glowing lips, the bowl's immortal

Lyæus thus his tigers broke,
Fierce and indocile, to the yoke;
Thus from the gloomy regions of the dead,
On his paternal steeds, Rome's mighty founder fled;

When Heaven's great queen with words benign
Address'd th' assembled powers divine—
"Troy, hated Troy, an umpire lewd, unjust,
And a proud foreign dame, have sunk thee to the dust.

"To me, and wisdom's queen decreed,
With all thy guilty race to bleed,
What time thy haughty monarch's perjurd sire Mock'd the defrauded gods, and robb'd them of their hire.

"The gaudy guest, of impious fame,
No more enjoys th' adulterous dame;
Hector no more his faithless brothers leads
To break the Grecian force; no more the victor bleeds.

"Since the long war now sinks to peace,
And all our heavenly factions cease;
Instant to Mars my vengeance I resign. [line.
And here receive his son, though born of Trojan

"Here, with encircling glories bright,
Free let him tread the paths of light,
And, rank'd among the tranquil powers divine,
Drink deep the nectar'd bowl, and quaff celestial wine.

"From Rome to Troy's detested shores,
While loud a length of ocean roars,
Unenvied let th' illustrious exiles reign,
Where Fate directs their course, and spreads their wide domain.

"On Priam's and th' adulterer's urn
While herds the dust insulting spurn,
Let the proud Capitol in glory stand,
And Rome, to triumph'd Medes, give forth her stern command:

"Let the victorious voice of Fame
Wide spread the terrors of her name,
Where seas the continents of earth divide,
And Nilus bathes the plain with his prolific tide.

"Let her the golden mine despise;
For deep in earth it better lies,
Than when by hands profane, from nature's store, [ora.
To human use compell'd, flames forth the sacred

" Where nature's utmost limits end,
Let her triumphant arms extend;
Or where the Sun pours down his madd'ning beams,
Or where the clouds are dark, and rain perpetual streams.

" Thus let the warlike Romans reign
(So Juno and the Fates ordain),
But on these terms alone, no more to dare,
Through piety or pride, their parent Troy repair;

" For Troy rebuilt, ill-omen'd state!
Shall feel the same avenging fate;
Again my Grecians shall victorious prove,
By me led on to war, the sister-wife of Jove.

" Thrice should Apollo raise her wall,
Thrice shall her brazen bulwarks fall,
Thrice shall her matrons feel the victor's chain,
Deplore their slaughter'd sons, deplore their husbands slain."

But whether would the Muse aspire!
Such themes nor suit the sportive lyre,
Nor should the wanton, thus in feeble strain,
The councils of the gods, immortal themes! profane.

ODE IV.

TO CALLIOPE.

DESCEND from Heaven, and in a lengthen'd
strain,
Queen of melodious sounds, the song sustain,
Or on the voice high-rai'd, the breathing flute,
The lyre of golden tone, or sweet Phœbean lute.

Hark! some celestial voice I raptur'd hear!
Ondoes a pleasing phrenzy charm my ear?
Through hallow'd groves I stray, where streams
beneath [breathe
From lucid fountains flow, and zephyrs balmy

Fatigued with sleep, and youthful toil of play,
When on a mountain's brow reclin'd I lay
Near to my natal soil, around my head
The fabled woodland doves a verdant foliage spread;

Matter, be sure, of wonder most profound
To all the gazing habitants around,
Who dwell in Acherontia's airy glades
Amid the Bantian woods, or low Perentum's meads,

By snakes of poison black, and beasts of prey,
That thus, in dewy sleep unharm'd I lay;
Laurels and myrtle were around me pil'd,
Not without guardian gods an animated child.

Yours, I am ever yours, harmonious Nine,
Whether I joy in Tibur's vale supine;
Whether I climb the Sabine mountain's height,
Or in Franeste's groves or Baian streams delight.

Nor tree devoted, nor tempestuous main,
Nor flying hosts, that swept Philippi's plain
In fearful rout, your filial bard destroy'd,
While in your springs divine and choral sports he joy'd.

If by the Muse's faithful guidance led,
Or Libya's thirsty sands I'll fearless tread,
Or climb the venturous bark, and launch from shore, [roar.
Though Bosphorus in storms with madd'ning horrors

Nor Britons, of inhospitable strain,
Nor quiver'd Scythians, nor the Caspian main,
Nor he who joyous quaffs the thirsty bowl
Streaming with horses' blood, shall shake my dust-less soul.

When Cæsar, by your forming arts inspir'd,
Cheerful disbands his troops, of conquest tir'd,
And yields to willing Peace his laurel'd spoils,
In the Pierian cave you charm the hero's toils;

Gracious from you the lenient counsels flow,
Which bid the hero spare his prostrate foe;
For Cæsar rules like Jove, whose equal sway
The ponderous mass of earth and stony seas obey:

O'er gods and mortals, o'er the dreary plain,
And shadowy ghosts, supremely just he reigns,
But, dreadful in his wrath, to Hell purg'd,
With thunder's headlong rage, the fierce Titan brood,

Whose horrid youth, glaz'd with impious pride,
Unnumber'd, on their sinewy force relied:
Mountain on mountain pil'd they rais'd in air,
And shook the throne of Jove, and bade the Thunderer fear.

But what could Minos, of enormous weight,
Typhoeus, or Porphyrio's threatening height,
Or bold Enceladus fierce-darting far
The trunks of trees uptorn, dire archer of the war,

Though with despair and rage inspir'd they rose,
To sage Minerva's sounding shield oppose?
While Vulcan here in flames devour'd his way,
There matron Juno stood, and there the god of day,

Resolv'd, till he had quell'd th' aspiring foe,
Never to lay aside th' unerring bow.
He the pure dew of fair Castalia loves,
There bathes his flowing hair, and haunts his natal groves.

Ill-counsell'd force, by its own native weight,
Precipitately falls; with happier fate
While the good gods upraise the just design,
And bold, unhallow'd schemes pursue with rash
divine.

This truth shall hundred-handed Gyas prove,
And warm Orion, who with impious love
Tempting the goddess of the syrtan scene,
Was by her virgin darts, gigantic-victim! slain

On her own monsters hurl'd with hideous weight,
Fond mother Earth deplores her offspring's fate,
By thunders digg'd to livid Orcus doom'd,
Nor fire can eat its way through Etna unconsum'd.

Such are the pains to lawless lust decreed;
On Tityus' liver shall the vulture feed
With rage ungorg'd, while Phœbe stern detains
His amorous rival bound in thrice an hundred chains.

ODE V.

THE FRAMES OF AUGUSTUS.

DREAD Jove in thunder speaks his just decrees;
On Earth, a present god, shall Cæsar reign,
Since weld-divided Britain owns his sway,
And Parthia's haughty sons his high behests obey.

ODE VI.

TO THE ROMANS.

O name of country, once how sacred deem'd!
 O sad reverse of manners, once esteem'd!
 While Rome her ancient majesty maintain'd;
 In his own Capitol while Jove imperial reign'd,
 Could they to foreign spouses mealy yield,
 Whom Crassus led with honour to the field!
 Have they, to their barbarian lords allied,
 Grow'n old in hostile arms beneath a tyrant's pride.

Basely forgetful of the Roman name,
 The heav'n-descended shields, the Vestal flame,
 That wakes eternal, and the peaceful gown,
 Those emblems which the Fates with boundless empire crown;

When Regulus refus'd the terms of peace
 Inglorious, he foresaw the deep disgrace,
 Whose soul example should in ruin end,
 And even to latest times our baffled arms attend,

Unless the captive youth in servile chains
 Should fall unpitied. "In the Punic fanes
 Have I not seen," the patriot captain cried,
 "The Roman ensigns fix'd in monumental pride!

"I saw our arms resign'd without a wound;
 Our free-born citizens in fetters bound;
 The gates of Carthage open, and the plain,
 Late by our war laid waste, with culture cloth'd
 again.

"Ransom'd, no doubt, with nobler sense of shame
 The soldier shall return—Ye purchase shame.
 When the fair fleece imbibes the dyer's stain,
 Its native colour lost it never shall regain,

"And valour, failing in the soldier's breast,
 Scorns to resume what cowardice possess'd.
 When from the toils escap'd the hind shall turn Fierce on her hunters, he the prostrate foe may spurn

"In second fight, who felt the fetters bind
 His arms enslav'd; who tamely hath resign'd
 His sword unstain'd with blood; who might have died,

Yet on a faithless foe, with abject soul, relied;

"Who for his safety mix'd poor terms of peace
 Even with the act of war; O foul disgrace!
 O Carthage, now with rival glories great,
 And on the ruins rais'd of Rome's dejected state!"

The hero spoke; and from his wedded dame
 And infant-children turn'd, oppress'd with shame
 Of his fall'n state; their fond embrace repell'd,
 And step'nly on the earth his manly visage held,

Till, by his unexampled counsel away'd,
 Their firm decree the wavering senate made;
 Then, while his friends the tears of sorrow shed,
 Amidst the weeping through the glorious exile sped.

Nor did he not the cruel tortures know,
 Vengeful, prepar'd by a barbarian foe;
 Yet, with a countenance serenely gay, [stay;
 He turn'd aside the crowd, who fondly press'd his

As if, when wearied by some client's cause,
 After the final sentence of the laws,
 Cheerful he hasted to some calm retreat,
 To taste the pure delights that bless the rural seat.

Though guiltless of your fathers' crimes,
 Roman, 'tis thine, to latest times,
 The vengeance of the gods to bear,
 Till you their awful domes repair,
 Profan'd with smoke their statues raise,
 And bid the sacred altars blaze.

That you the powers divine obey,
 Boundless on Earth extends your sway;
 From hence your future glories date,
 From hence expect the hand of Fate.
 Th'offended gods, in horrors dire,
 On sad Hesperia pour'd their ire:
 The Partian squadrons twice repell'd
 Our inauspicious powers, and quell'd
 Our boldest efforts, while they shone
 With spoils from conquer'd Romans won,
 The Dacians, whose unerring art
 Can wing with death the pointed dart;
 Th'Egyptian, for his navies fam'd,
 Had Neptune's boundless empire claim'd,
 And almost in their rage destroy'd
 Imperial Rome, in civil strife employ'd.

Fruitful of crimes, this age first stain'd
 Their hapless offspring, and profan'd
 The nuptial bed, from whence the woes,
 That various and unnumber'd rose
 From this polluted fountain-head,
 O'er Rome and o'er the nations spread.

With pliant limbs the tender maid
 Now joys to learn the shameless trade
 Of wanton dancing, and improves
 The pleasures of licentious loves;
 Then soon amid the bridal feast
 Boldly she courts her husband's guest;
 Her love no nice distinction knows,
 But round the wandering pleasure throws,
 Careless to hide the bold delight
 In darkness and the shades of night.
 Nor does she need the thin disguise;
 The conscious husband bids her rise,
 When some rich factor courts her charms,
 And calls the wanton to his arms,
 Then, prodigal of wealth and fame,
 Profusely buys the costly shame.

Not such the youth, of such a strain,
 Who dy'd with Punic gore the main;
 Who Pyrrhus' flying war pursu'd,
 Antiochus the Great subdu'd,
 And taught that terror of the field,
 The cruel Hannibal, to yield:
 But a rough sward, injur'd to toil,
 With heavy spade to turn the soil,
 And by a mother's will severe
 To fell the wood, and homeward bear
 The ponderous load, even when the Sun
 His downward course of light had run,
 And from the western mountain's head
 His changing shadows lengthening spread,
 Unyok'd the team, with toil oppress,
 And gave the friendly hour of rest.

What feels not Time's consuming rage?
 More vicious than their fathers' age
 Our sires begot the present race,
 Of manners impious, bold and base;
 And yet, with crimes to us unknown,
 Our sons shall mark the coming age their own.

ODE VII.

TO ASTERIE.

Ah! why does Asterie thus weep for the youth
Of constancy faithful, of honour and truth,
Whom the first kindly zephyrs, that breathe o'er
the spring,

Enrich'd with the wares of Bithynia shall bring?
Driven back from his course by the tempests, that
When stars of wad lustre rule over the skies, [rise
At Oricum now poor Gyges must stay.
Where sleepless he weeps the cold winter away;
While his landlady Chloë, in sorrow of heart,
Bids her envoy of love exert all his art,
Who tells him, how Chloë, unhappy the dame!
Deep sighs for your lover, and burns in your flame.
He tells him how Pretus, deceiv'd by his wife,
Attempted, ah dreadful! Bellerophon's life,
And urg'd by false crimes, how he sought to destroy
The youth for refusing, too chastely, the joy:
How Peleus was almost dispatch'd to the dead,
While the lovely Magnesian abstemious he fled.
Then he turns every tale, and applies it with art,
To melt down his virtue, and soften his heart;
But constant and heart-whole young Gyges appears,
And deaser than rocks the tale-teller hears.
Then, fair-ops, take heed, lest Enipeus should prove

A little too pleasing, and tempt thee to love;
And though without rival he shine in the course,
To rein the fierce steed though unequal his force,
Tho' matchless the swiftness with which he divides,
In crossing the Tiber, the rough-swelling tides,
Yet shut the fond door at evening's first shade,
Nor look down to the street at the soft serenade;
Or if cruel he call thee in love-sighing strain,
Yet more and more cruel be sure to remain.

ODE VIII.

TO MÆCENAS.

THE Greek and Roman languages are thine,
Their hallow'd customs, and their rites divine;
And well you might the flowery wreaths admire,
The fragrant incense, and the sacred fire,
Rais'd on the living turf, to hail the day
To which the married world their homage pay.

When on my head a tree devoted fell,
And almost crush'd me to the shades of Hell,
Grateful I vow'd to him, who rules the vine,
A joyous banquet, while beneath his shrine
A snow-white goat should bleed; and when the Revolving bids this festal morn appear, [year
We'll pierce a cask with mellow juice replete,
Mellow'd with smoke since Tullus rul'd the state.

Come then, Mæcenas, and for friendship's sake,
A friend preserv'd, a hundred bumpers take.
Come drink the watchful tapers up to day,
While noise and quarrels shall be far away.
No more let Rome your anxious thoughts engage,
The Dacian falls beneath the victor's rage,
The Modes in civil wars their arms employ,
Inglorious wars! each other to destroy;
Our ancient foes, the haughty sons of Spain,
At length, indignant, feel the Roman chain;
With bows unbent the hardy Scythians yield,
Resolv'd to quit the long-disputed field.

No more the public claims thy pious fears:
Be not too anxious then with private cares,
But seize the gifts the present moment brings,
Those fleeting gifts, and leave severer things.

ODE IX.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN HORACE AND LYDIA.

HORACE.

WHILE I was pleasing to your arms,
Nor any youth, of happier charms,
Thy snowy bosom blissful press'd,
Not Persia's king like me was blest,

LYDIA.

While for no other fair you burn'd,
Nor Lydia was for Chloë scorn'd,
What maid was then so blest as thine?
Not Ilia's fangs could equal mine.

HORACE.

Now Chloë reigns; her voice and lyre
Melt down the soul to soft desire;
Nor will I fear even death, to save
Her dearer beauties from the grave.

LYDIA.

My heart young Calais inspires,
Whose bosom glows with mutual fires,
For whom I twice would die with joy,
If death would spare the charming boy.

HORACE.

Yet what if Love, whose bands we broke,
Again should tame us to the yoke;
Should I shake off bright Chloë's chain,
And take my Lydia home again?

LYDIA.

Though he exceed in beauty far
The rising lustre of a star;
Though light as cork thy fancy strays,
Thy passions wild as angry seas,
When vex'd with storms; yet gladly I
With thee would live, with thee would die.

ODE X.

TO LYCE.

THOUGH you drank the deep stream of Tanaïs icy,
The wife of some barbarous blockhead, O Lyce,
Yet your heart might relent to expose me reclin'd
At your cruel-shut door to the rage of the wind.
Hark, your gate! how it creaks! how the grove, planted round

Your beautiful villa, rebellous the sound!
How Jupiter numbs all the regions below,
And glazes with crystal the fleeces of snow!
Away with these humours of pride and disdain,
To Venus ungrateful, to Cupid a pain,
Lest while by the pulley you raise to the top,
Your rope should run back, and your bucket should drop.

No sprightly Tyrrhenian begot thee a prude,
Another Penelope, harsh to be woo'd.
O, though neither presents, nor vow-sighing strains,
Nor violet painting the cheek of thy swain,
Nor thy husband, who gives up his heart for a ditty
To a song-singing wench, can provoke thee to pity;

Though, like the hard oak, you're to softness in-
And milder than all of the serpentine kind, [clin'd,
Yet think not this side can for ever sustain
Thy threshold hard-hearted, and sky-falling rain.

ODE XI.

TO MERCURY.

O THOU, by whose harmonious aid
Amphion's voice the listening stones could lead;
And sweetest shell of power to raise,
On seven melodious strings, thy various lays;
Not vocal, when you first were found,
But of a simple and ungrateful sound;
Now tun'd so sweetly to the ear,
That gods and men with sacred rapture hear;
Oh! thou inspire the melting strain,
To charm my Lyde's obstinate disdain,
Who like a filly o'er the field
With playful spirit bounds, and fears to yield
To hand of gentlest touch, or prove,
Wild as she is, the joys of wedded love.
Tis yours, with all their beasts of prey,
To bid the forests move, and powerful stay
The rapid stream. The dog of Hell,
Immense of bulk, to thee soft-soothing fell,
And suppliant bow'd, though round his head
His hundred snakes their guardian horrors spread;
Baleful his breath though fiery glow'd,
And from his three-tongued jaws fell poison flow'd,
Ixion, of his pains beguil'd,
And Drytos, with unwilling pleasure, smil'd;
Dityos stood their urn, while with soft strain
You sooth'd the labours of the virgin train,
Let Lyde hear, what pains, decreed,
Though late, in death attend the direful deed.
There doom'd to fill, unceasing task!
With idle toil, an ever-streaming cask;
Impious, who, in the hour of rest,
Could plunge their daggers in a husband's breast.
Yet worthy of the nuptial flame,
And nobly meriting a deathless name,
Of many, one untainted maid,
Gloriously false, her perjurd sire betray'd.
Thus to her youthful lord:—' Arise;
Awake, lest sleep eternal close thine eyes;
Eternal sleep: and ah! from whom
You little dreaded the relentless doom.
Oh! fly, my lord, this wrathful sire;
Far from my sisters fly, those sisters dire,
Who riot on their husbands' blood,
As lionesses rend their panting food;
While I, to such fell deeds a foe,
Nor bind thee here, nor strike the fatal blow.
Me let my father load with chains,
Or banish to Numidia's farthest plains;
My crime, that I, a loyal wife,
In mercy spar'd a wretched husband's life.
While Venus, and the shades of night,
Protect thee, speed, by sea or land, thy flight;
May every happy omen wait
To guide thee through this gloomy hour of fate!
Yet not forgetful of my doom,
Engrave thy grateful sorrows on my tomb."

ODE XII.

TO NEOBULE.

UNHAPPY the maidens forbidden to prove
The bumper's full joy, or the raptures of love;

Unhappy the girls, who are destin'd to hear
The tedious rebukes of old uncles severe.
Cytherea's wing'd son now bids thee resign
The toils of Minerva, the spinster divine;
For now, Neobule, with other desires
The brightness of Hebrus thy bosom inspires;
When he rises with vigour from Tiber's rough waves,
Where the oil of his labour, athletic he laves,
Like Bellerophon skilful to rein the fierce steed,
At cuffs never conquer'd, nor out-stripp'd in speed,
And dextrous, with darts never flying in vain,
To wound the light stag bounding over the plain,
Or active and valiant the boar to surprise,
Transfixt with his spear, as in covert he lies.

ODE XIII.

TO THE FOUNTAIN BANEZIA.

FOUNTAIN, whose waters far surpass'
The shining face of polish'd glass,
To thee, the goblet, crown'd with flowers,
Grateful the rich libation pour;
A goat, whose horns begin to spread,
And bending arm his swelling head,
Whose bosom glows with young desires,
Which war or kindling love inspires,
Now meditates his blow in vain—
His blood shall thy fair fountain stain,
When the fierce dog-star's fervid ray
Flames forth, and sets on fire the day,
To vagrant flocks, that range the field,
You a refreshing coolness yield;
Or to the labour-wearied team
Pour forth the freshness of thy stream.
Soon shalt thou flow a noble spring,
While in immortal verse I sing.
The oak, that spreads thy rocks around,
From whence thy babbling waters bound.

ODE XIV.

ON THE RETURN OF AUGUSTUS FROM SPAIN.

Thy prince, O Rome, who foreign realms
Explor'd like Jove's immortal son,
Fearless to search the laurel wreath
By death and glorious daring won,
Victorious comes from farthest Spain,
To Rome and all his guardian gods again.
Let her, who to her arms receives
With joy her own, her laurel'd spouse,
Her private sacrifice perform'd,
Pay to just Heaven her public vows,
And let the fair Octavia lead
The matron-train in suppliant veils array'd;
The matron-train, to whose glad arms
Their softs, with conquest crown'd, return;
And you, fair youth, whose pious tears
Your slaughter'd sires and husbands mourn,
This day at least your griefs restrain,
And luckless from ill-omen'd words abstain.
This day, with truly festal joy,
Shall drive all gloomy cares away;
For, while imperial Caesar holds
O'er the glad Earth his awful sway,
Nor fear of death from foreign arms,
Or civil rage, my dauntless soul alarms.

Boy, bring us essence, bring us crowns;
Pierce me a cask of ancient date,
Big with the storied Marsian war,
And with its glorious deeds replete,
If yet one jovial cask remain
Since wandering Spartacus o'erswept the plain.

Invite Nessra to the feast,
Who sweetly charms the listening ear,
And bid the fair one haste to bind
In careless wreaths her essenc'd hair;
But should her porter bid you stay,
Leave the rough, surly rogues, and come away.

When hoary age upon our heads
Pours down its chilling weight of snows,
No more the breast with anger burns,
No more with amorous heat it glows:
Such treatment Horace would not bear,
When warm with youth, when Planous fill'd the consul's chair.

ODE XV.

TO CHLORIS.

Thou poor man's incumbrance, thou rake of a wife,
At length put an end to this infamous life;
Now near thy long home, to be rank'd with the shades,

Give over to frisk it with buxom young maids,
And, furrow'd with wrinkles, profanely to shroud
Those bright constellations with age's dark cloud.

What Pholot well, with a decency free,
Might practise, sits awkward, O Chloris, on thee.
Like her, whom the timbrel of Bacchus arouses,
Thy daughter may better lay siege to the houses
Of youthful gallants, while she wantonly gambols,
Of Nothus enamour'd, like a goat in its rambles;
The spindle, the distaff, and wool-spinning thifty,
Not musical instruments, fit thee at fifty;
Nor roses empurpled enriching the breeze,
Nor hogheads of liquor drunk down to the lees.

ODE XVI.

TO MÆCENAS.

Or watchful dogs an odious ward
Might well one hapless virgin guard,
When in a tower of brass immur'd,
And by strong gates of oak secur'd,
Although by mortal gallants lewd
With all their midnight arts pursu'd,
Had not great Jove and Venus fair
Laugh'd at her father's fruitless care;
For well they knew no fort could hold
Against a god transferr'd to gold.

Stronger than thunder's winged force
All-powerful gold can speed its course,
Through watchful guards its passage make,
And loves through solid walls to break:
From gold the overwhelming woes,
That crush'd the Grecian augur, rose;
Philip with gold through cities broke,
And rival monarchs felt his yoke;
Captains of ships to gold are slaves,
Though fierce as their own winds and waves.
Yet anxious care, and thirst of more,
Attend the still increasing store.

While you in humble rank appear,
Gracing the knighthood that you wear,
By your example taught, I dread
To raise the far conspicuous head.
The more we to ourselves deny,
The more the gods our wants supply.
Far from the quarters of the great,
Happy, though naked, I retreat,
And to th' unwishing few with joy
A blest and bold deserter fly,
Possess of what the great despise,
In real, richer pomp, I rise,
Than if, from fair Apulia's plain,
I stor'd in heaps the various grain,
While, of the wealthy mass secure,
Amidst the rich abundance poor.

The streamlet, flowing through my ground;
The wood, which a few acres bound;
The little farm of kindly soil,
Nor faithless to its master's toil,
Shall tell the consul, whose domain
Extends o'er Afric's fertile plain,
Though of his envied lot possess,
He ne'er shall be like Horace blest.

Though poor the fam'd Calabrian bee
Collect its golden sweets for me;
For me no Formian vintage grows,
With mellow'd warmth where Bacchus flows;
Nor on the verdant Gallic mead
My flocks of richer fleeces feed:
Yet am I not with want oppress'd,
Which vainly seeks the port of rest,
Nor would thy bounteous hand deny
My larger wishes to supply:
But while those wishes I restrain,
Further I stretch my small domain
Than could I distant kingdoms join,
And make united empires mine:
For sure the state of man is such,
They greatly want, who covet much:
Then happy he, whom Heaven has fed
With frugal but sufficient bread.

ODE XVII.

TO ÆLIUS LAMIA.

ÆLIUS, whose ancient lineage springs
From Lamus, founder of the name,
(From whom a sacred line of kings
Shines through the long records of fame,

From whom th' illustrious race arose,
Who first possess'd the Formian towers,
And reign'd where Liris smoothly flows
To fair Marica's marshy shores)

If the old shower-foretelling crow
Croak not her boding note in vain,
To morrow's eastern storm shall strow
The woods with leaves, with weeds the main.

Then pile the fuel while you may,
And cheer your spirit high with wine;
Give to your slaves one idle day,
And feast upon the fatted swine.

ODE XVIII.

TO FAUNUS.

FAUNUS, who with eager flame
Chase the nympths, thy flying game,

If a tender kid disdain,
 Each returning year, thy fane,
 If with wine we raise the soul,
 (Social Venus loves the bowl)
 If thy consecrated shrine
 Smoke with odours,—breath divine !
 Gently traverse o'er my bounds,
 Gently through my sunny grounds,
 Gracious to my fleecy breed,
 Sporting o'er the flowery mead.
 See my flocks in sportive vein
 Frisk it o'er the verdant plain,
 When through winter's gloom thy day
 Festal shines, the peasants play,
 On the grassy-matted soil,
 Round their oxen, free from toil
 See the wolf forgets his prey,
 With my daring lambs to play ;
 See the forest's bending head
 At thy feet its honours shed,
 While with joyful foot the swain
 Beats the glebe he plough'd with pain!

ODE XIX.

TO TELEPHUS.

When Inachus reign'd to thee is notorious,
 When slain for his country was Codrus the glorious ;
 When govern'd the monarchs from Pelus descended ;

When Troy was besieg'd, and so bravely defended ;
 But where the best Chian, or what it may cost ye,
 Or how we may warm the long winter and frosty,
 Or temper our water with embers so glowing,
 Ah ! Telephus, here thou art strangely unknowing.

Here's a bumper to midnight ; to Lana's first shining ;

A third to our friend in his post of divining.
 Come, fill up the bowl, then fill up your bumpers,
 Let three, or thrice three, be the jovial of numbers.
 The poet, enraptur'd, sure never refuses
 His brimmers thrice three to his odd-number'd
 Muses :

But the Graces, in naked simplicity cautious,
 Are afraid, more than three might to quarrels debauch us.

Gay frolic, and mirth, to madness shall fire us ;
 Why breathes not the flute, then, with joy to inspire us ?

Why hang on the wall, in silence dolorous,
 The soft-swelling pipe, and the hautboy sonorous ?
 I hate all the slaves, who are sparing of labour :
 Give us roses abundant, and let our old neighbour,
 With his damsel, ill-suited to such an old fellow,
 Even burst with his envy to hear us so mellow.
 Poor Horace in flames, how slowly consuming !
 For Glycera burns, while Chloë the blooming
 Her Telephus courts, whose tresses are beaming,
 As are the bright rays from Vesperus streaming.

ODE XX.

TO SYRACUS.

Syracus, you tempt a danger high,
 When you would steal from angry licence her cubs, and soon shall fly Inglorious.

What wars of horrid form arise,
 Through crowds of lovers when she flies
 To seek her boy, and snatch the prize, Victorious !

You shoot ; she whets her tusks to bite ;
 While he, who sits to judge the fight,
 Treads on the palm with foot so white,
 Diadainful ;

And sweetly floating in the air,
 Wanton he spreads his fragrant hair,
 Like Ganymede, or Nireus fair,
 And vainful.

ODE XXL

TO HIS CAST.

Garra's cask of mellow wine,
 And of equal age with mine ;
 Whether you to broils or mirth,
 Or to madd'ng love give birth ;
 Or the toper's temples steep
 Sweetly in ambrosial sleep ;
 For whatever various use
 You preserve the chosen juice,
 Worthy of some festal hour,
 Now the bousy vintage pour :
 Come—Corvinus, guest divine,
 Bids me draw the smoothest wine.

Though with science deep imbued,
 He, not like a Cynic rude,
 Thee despises ; for of old
 Cato's virtue, we are told,
 Often with a bumper glow'd,
 And with social raptures flew'd.

You by gentle tortures oft
 Melt hard tempers into soft ;
 You strip off the grave disguise
 From the counsels of the wise,
 And with Bacchus, blithe and gay,
 Bring them to the face of day.
 Hope by thee, fair fugitive !
 Bids the wretched strive to live ;
 To the beggar you dispense
 Heart and brow of confidence ;
 Warm'd by thee, he scorns to fear
 Tyrant's frown or soldier's spear.

Bacchus boon, and Venus fair,
 (If she come with cheerful air)
 And the Graces, charming band !
 Ever dancing hand in hand ;
 And the living taper's flame,
 Shall prolong thy purple stream,
 Till returning Phoebus bright
 Puts the lazy stars to flight.

ODE XXII.

TO DIANA.

Of groves and mountains guardian maid,
 Invok'd by three mysterious names ;
 Goddess three-form'd, whose willing aid
 With gracious pow'r appears display'd,
 From death to save our pregnant dames

To thee I consecrate the pine,
 That nodding waves my villa round,
 And here, beneath thy hallow'd shrine,
 Yearly shall bleed a festal swine,
 That meditates the side-long wound,

ODE XXIII.

TO PHIDYLE.

Is on the new-born Moon, with hands supine,
 My Phidyle, laborious rustic, prays,
 If she with incense, and a ravening swine,
 And yearly fruits, her household gods appease,
 Nor pestilential storm shall smite her vines,
 Nor barren mildew shall her harvests fear;
 Nor shall her flocks, when the sad year declines,
 Beneath its fruitage, feel the autumnal air.
 Let the devoted herds, that lowing feed
 In snow-topt Algidon's high-branching wood,
 Or the fair kine of rich Albania, bleed,
 And stain the pontiff's hallow'd axe with blood;
 The little gods, around thy sacred fire,
 No vast profusion of the victim's gore,
 But pliant myrtle wreaths alone require,
 And fragrant herbs, the pious, rural store.
 A grateful cake, when on the hallow'd shrine
 Offer'd by hands that know no guilty stain,
 Shall reconcile th' offended powers divine,
 When bleeds the pompous hecatomb in vain.

ODE XXIV.

AGAINST MISERY.

Though of th' unris'd gold possess
 Of gorgeous Ind, and Araby the blest;
 Though with hewn, massy rocks you raise
 Your haughty structures midst th' indignant seas:
 Yet, soon as Fate shall round your head,
 With adamantine strength, its terrors spread,
 Not the dictator's power shall save
 Your soul from fear, your body from the grave.
 Happy the Scythians, houseless train!
 Who roll their vagrant dwellings o'er the plain;
 Happy the Getes fierce and brave,
 Whom no fix'd laws of property enslave;
 While open stands the golden grain,
 The free-born fruitage of th' unbounded plain,
 Succeeding yearly to the toil,
 They plough with equal tasks the public soil.
 Not there the guiltless step-dame knows
 The baleful draught for orphans to compose;
 No wife high-portion'd rules her spouse,
 Or trusts her essenc'd lover's faithless vows;
 The lovers there for dowry claim
 The father's virtue and the mother's fame,
 That dares not break the nuptial tie,
 Polluted crime! whose portion is to die.
 O that some patriot, wise and good,
 Would stop this impious thirst of civil blood,
 And joy on statues to behold
 His name, the father of the state, enroll'd!
 Oh! let him quell our spreading shame,
 And live to latest times an honour'd name.
 Though living Virtue we despise,
 We follow her, when dead, with envious eyes.
 But wherefore do we thus complain,
 If Justice wear her awful sword in vain?
 And what are laws, unless obey'd
 By the same moral virtues they were made?
 If neither burning heats extreme,
 Where eastern Phoebus darts his fiercest beam,
 Nor where the northern tempest blows,
 And freezes down to earth th' eternal snows,

Nor the wild terrors of the maid
 Can daunt the merchant, and his voyage restrain;
 If want, ah, dire disgrace! we fear,
 From thence with vigour act, with patience bear,
 While Virtue's paths untrodden lie,
 Those paths that lead us upwards to the sky?
 Oh! let us consecrate to Jove
 (Rome shall with shouts the pious deed approve)
 Our gems, our gold, pernicious store!
 Or plunge into the deep the baleful ore.
 If you indeed your crimes detest,
 Tear forth, uprooted from the youthful breast,
 The seeds of each deprav'd desire,
 While manly toils a firmer soul inspire:
 Nor knows our youth, of noblest race,
 To mount the manag'd steed, or urge the chase;
 More skill'd in the mean arts of vice,
 The whirling troque; or law-forbidden dice:
 And yet his worthless hair to raise
 To hasty wealth, the perjurd sire betrays
 His partners, co-heirs, and his friends;
 But, while in heaps his wicked wealth ascends,
 He is not of his wish possess'd,
 There's something wanting still to make him blest.

ODE XXV.

TO BACCHUS.

WHITHER, in a sacred ecstasy,
 Bacchus, when full of thy divinity,
 Dost thou transport me? To what glades?
 What gloomy caverns, unfrequented shades?
 In what recesses shall I raise
 My voice to sacred Caesar's deathless praise,
 Amid the stars to bid him shine,
 Rank'd in the councils of the powers divine?
 Some bolder song shall wake the lyre,
 And sounds unknown its trembling strings inspire.
 Thus o'er the steepy mountain's height,
 Starting from sleep, thy priestess takes her flight;
 Amaz'd beholds the Thracian snows,
 With languid streams where icy Heber flows,
 Or Rhodope's high-towering head,
 Where frantic choirs barbarian measures tread.
 O'er pathless rocks, through lonely groves,
 With what delight my raptur'd spirit roves!
 O thou, who rul'st the Naiad's breast;
 By whom the Bacchanalian maids, possess'd
 With sacred rage inspir'd by thee,
 Tear from the bursting glebe th' uprooted tree,
 Nothing or low, or mean, I sing,
 No mortal sound shall shake the swelling string.
 The venturous theme my soul alarms,
 But warm'd by thee the thought of danger charms.
 When vine-crown'd Bacchus leads the way,
 What can his daring votaries dismay?

ODE XXVI.

TO VENUS.

I LATELY was fit to be call'd upon duty,
 And gallantly fought in the service of beauty:
 But now crown'd with conquest I hang up my arms,
 My harp, that campaign'd it in midnight alarms:
 Here fix on this wall, here my ensigns of war,
 By the statue of Venus, my torches and bars,
 And arrows, which threaten'd, by Cupid their lieg's
 War, war on all doors that dare hold out a sign.

O goddess of Cyprus, and Memphis, that know
Nor the coldness or weight of love-chilling snow,
With a high-lifted stroke, yet gently severe,
Avenge me on Chloë, the proud and the fair.

ODE XXVII.

TO GALATEA.

Fix'd from her cubs the ravening fox,
Or wolf from steep Lanuvian rocks,
Or pregnant bitch, or chattering jay,
Ill-omen'd, guide the wicked on their way;
Serpents, like arrows, sidelong thwart
The road, and make their horses start.
For those I love, with anxious fear
I view the doubtful skies, a prudent seer,
And bid the chanting raven rise
When Phœbus gilds his orient skies,
Ere speeds the shower-boding crow
To lakes, whose languid waters cease to flow.

Happy may Galatea prove,
Nor yet unmindful of our love,
For now no luckless pye prevails,
Nor vagrant crow forbids the swelling sails.

Yet see what storms tumultuous rise,
While prone Orion sweeps the skies.
I know the Adriatic main,
And western winds, perfidiously serene.

But may the rising tempest shake
Our foes, and dreadful o'er them break;
For them the blackening ocean roar,
And angry surges lash the trembling shore.

When on her bull Europa rode,
Nor knew she press'd th' imperial god,
Bold as she was, th' affrighted maid
The rolling monsters of the deep survey'd.

Late for the rural nymphs she chose
Each flower, a garland to compose,
But now, beneath the gloom of night,
Views nought but seas, and stars of feeble light.

Soon as she touch'd the Cretan shore,
"My sire," she cries,—"ah! mine no more,
For every pious, tender name
Is madly lost in this destructive flame.

"Where am I, wretched and undone?
And shall a single death atone
A virgin's crime? Or do my fears
Deplore the guilty deed with waking tears?"

"Or am I yet, ah! pure from shame,
Mock'd by a vain, delusive dream?
Could I my springing flowrets leave,
To tempt through length of seas the faithless wave?"

"While thus with just revenge possess,
How could I tear that monstrous beast!
How could I break, by rage inspir'd,
Those horns, alas! too fondly once admir'd!

"Shameless, my father's gods I fly;
Shameless, and yet I fear to die.
Hear me, some gracious, heavenly power,
Let lions fell this naked corse devour.

"My cheeks ere hollow wrinkles seize,
Ere yet their rosy bloom decays,
While youth yet rolls its vital flood,
Let tigers fiercely riot in my blood.

"But hark! I hear my father cry,
"Make haste, unhappy maid, to die!
And if a pendant fate you choose,
Your faithful girdle gives the kindly noose;

"Or, if you like a headlong death,
Behold the pointed rocks beneath;
Or plunge into the rapid wave,
Nor live on haughty tasks, a spinster slave.

"Some rude barbarian's concubine,
Born as thou art of royal line."
Here the perfidious-smiling dame,
And idle Cupid, to the mourner came;

Awile she rallied with the fair,
Then with a grave and serious air,
"Indulge," she cries, "thy rage no more,
This odious ball shall yield him to thy power.

"Yet sigh no more, but think of love,
For know, thou art the wife of Jove;
Then learn to bear thy future fame,
When Earth's wide continent shall boast thy name."

ODE XXVIII.

TO LYDE.

SAY, what shall I do on the festival day
Of Neptune! Come, Lyde, without more delay.
And broach the good creature, invaulted that lies,
Cast off all reserve, and be merry and wise.
The evening approaches, you see, from yon hill;
And yet, as if Phœbus, though winged, stood still,
You dally to bring us a cup of the best,
Condemn'd, like its consul, ignobly to rest.

With voices alternate, the sea-potent king,
And the Nereids, with ringlets of azure, we'll sing.
From the sweet-sounding shell thy hand shall arise
Latona's, and swift-darting Cynthia's praise.
The gay-smiling goddess of love and delight,
Who rules over Cuidos, and Cyclades bright,
And guiding her swans with a soft silken rein,
Revisits her Paphos, shall crown the glad strain.
Then to the good night, while bumpers elate us,
We'll sing a farewell, and a decent quietus.

ODE XXIX.

TO MÆCENAS.

DESCENDED from an ancient line,
That once the Tuscan sceptre sway'd,
Haste thee to meet the generous wise,
Whose piercing is for thee delay'd;
For thee the fragrant essence flows,
For thee, Mæcenas, breathes the blooming rose.

From the delights, oh! break away,
Which Tibur's marshy prospect yields,
Nor with unceasing joy survey
Fair Æsula's declining fields;
No more the verdant hills admire
Of Telegon, who kill'd his aged sire.

Instant forsake the joyless feast,
Where appetite in surfeit dies,
And from the towered structure haste,
That prosaically threatens to the skies;
From Rome and its tumultuous joys,
Its crowds, and smoke, and opulence, and noise.

Where health-preserving plainness dwells,
Nor sleeps upon the Tyrian dye,
To frugal treats, and humble cells,
With grateful change the wealthy fly.
Such scenes have charm'd the pangs of care,
And smooth'd the clouded forehead of despair.

Andromeda's conspicuous sire
Now darts his hidden beams from far;
The lion shows his maddening fire,
And barks fair Procyon's raging star,
While Phœbus, with revolving ray,
Brings back the burnings of the thirsty day.

Fainting beneath the sweltering heat,
To cooling streams and breezy shades
The shepherd and his flocks retreat,
While rustic sylvans seek the glades,
Silent the brook its borders laves,
Nor curls one vagrant breath of wind the waves.

Htt you for Rome's imperial statè
Attend with ever-watchful care,
Or, for the world's uncertain fate
Alarm'd, with ceaseless terrors fear;
Anxious what eastern wars impend,
Or what the Scythians in their pride intend.

But Jove, in goodness ever wise,
Hath hid, in clouds of depthless night,
All that in future prospect lies,
Beyond the ken of mortal sight,
And laughs to see vain man oppress
With idle fears, and more than man distrust.

Then wisely form the present hour;
Enjoy the bliss that it bestows;
The rest is all beyond our power,
And like the changeful Tiber flows,
Who now beneath his banks subsides,
And peaceful to his native ocean glides:

But when descends a sudden shower,
And wild provokes his silent flood,
The mountains hear the torrent roar,
And echoes shake the neighbouring wood,
Then swollen with rage he sweeps away
Uprooted trees, herds, dwellings, to the sea.

Happy the man, and he alone,
Who, master of himself, can say,
"To day at least hath been my own,
For I have clearly liv'd to day:
Then let to-morrow's clouds arise,
Or purer suns o'erspread the cheerful skies.

"Not Jove himself can now make void
The joy, that wing'd the flying hour;
The certain blessing once enjoy'd,
Is safe beyond the godhead's power;
Nought can recal the acted scene,
What hath been, spite of Jove himself, hath been.

"But Fortune, ever-changing dame,
Indulges her malicious joy,
And constant plays her haughty game,
Proud of her office to destroy;
To day to me her bounty flows,
And now to others she the hills bestows.

"I can applaud her while she stays;
But if she shake her rapid wings,
I can resign, with careless ease,
The richest gifts her favour brings,
Then folded lie in Virtue's arms,
And honest Poverty's undower'd chaste.

"Though the mast howl beneath the wind,
I make no mercenary prayers,
Nor with the gods a bargain bind
With future vows, and streaming tears,
To save my wealth from adding more
To boundless ocean's avaricious store:

"Then in my little barge I'll ride,
Secure amid the foamy wave,
Calm will I stem the threatening tide,
And fearless all its tumults brave;
Even then, perhaps, some kinder gale, [sail]
While the twin stars appear, shall fill my joyful

ODE XXX.

TO MËLPOMENE.

More durable than brass, the frame
Which here I consecrate to fame;
Higher than pyramids that rise,
With royal pride, to brave the skies;
Nor years, though numberless the train,
Nor flight of seasons, wasting rain,
Nor winds, that loud in tempests break,
Shall e'er its firm foundation shake.
Nor shall the funeral pyre consume
My fame; that nobler part shall bloom;
With youth unfading shall improve,
While to th' immortal face of Jove
The Vestal maids, in silent state
Ascending, on the pontiff walk.

With rapid course and deafening wail,
Where Ausidus impetuous raves,
And where a poor, enervate stream
From banish'd Daunus takes its name,
O'er warlike realms who fix'd his throne,
Shall Horace, deathless bard, be known,
Who first attempted to inspire
With Grecian sounds the Roman lyre.
With conscious pride, O Muse divine!
Assume the honours justly thine;
With laurel wreaths my head surround,
Such as the god of verse have crown'd.

ODES.

BOOK IV.

ODE I.

TO VENUS.

AGAIN new tumults fire my breast!
Ah, spare me, Venus! let thy suppliant rest!
I am no more, alas! the swain
I was in Cynara's indulgent reign.
Fierce mother of the Loves, no more
Attempt to bend me to thy charming power,
Harden'd with age; but swift repair
Where youth invokes thee with the soothing prayer.
Would you my inflame, with young desire,
A bosom worthy of thy purest fire,
To Paulus guide, a welcome guest,
Thy purple swans, and revel in his breast:
Of noble birth, and graceful made,
Nor silent when affliction claims his aid,

He, with a hundred conquering arts,
Shall wave thy banners wide o'er female hearts.

When more successful he shall prove,
And laugh at rivals, who with gifts make love;
Thou in a citron dome shalt stand,
Form'd by the sculptor's unerring hand:

There shall th' abundant incense flame,
And thou transported quaff the rising steam;
There shall the powers of music join,
And raise the song with harmony divine;

There shall the youths and virgins pay
To thee their grateful offerings twice a-day,
Like Salian priests the dance shall lead,
And many a mazy measure round thee tread.

For aye, alas! those joys are o'er,
For me the vernal garland blooms no more;
No more the feats of wide I prove;
Nor the defective hopes of mutual love.

Yet why, ah! fair-one, still too dear,
Steals down my cheek th' involuntary tear?
Or why thus falter o'er thy tongue
The words, which once harmonious pour'd along?
Swift through the fields, and flowing streams,
I follow thee in visionary dreams;

Now, now I seize, I clasp thy charms,
And now you burst, ah, cruel! from my arms:

ODE II.

TO ANTONIUS IULUS.

He, who to Pindar's height attempts to rise,
Like Icarus, with waxen pinions tries
His pathless way, and from the venturous theme
Falling, shall leave to azure seas his name.

As when a river, swollen by sudden showers,
O'er its known banks from some steep mountain
So in profound, unmeasurable song, [poets,
The deep-mouth'd Pindar, foaming, pours along:

Well he deserves Apollo's laurel'd crown,
Whether new words he rolls caraptur'd down
Impetuous through the dithyrambic strains;
Free from all laws, but what himself ordains;

Whether in lofty tone sublime he sings
The immortal gods, or god-descended kings,
With death deserv'd who smote the Centaurs dire,
And quench'd the fierce Chimæra's breath of fire;

Or whom th' Olympic palm, celestial prize!
Victorious crowns, and raises to the skies,
Wrestler or steed—with honours, that outlive
The mortal fame which thousand statues give;
Or mourns some hapless youth in plaintive lay,
From his fond, weeping bride, ah! torn away;
His manners pure, his courage, and his name,
Snatch'd from the grave, he vindicates to fame.

Thus, when the Theban swan attempts the skies,
A nobler gale of rapture bids him rise;
But like a bee, which through the breezy groves
With feeble wing and idle murmurs roves,
Sits on the bloom, and with unceasing toil
From thyme sweet-breathing culls his flowery spoil;
So I, weak bard! round Tibur's lucid spring,
Of humbler strain laborious verses sing.

'Tis thine with deeper hand to strike the lyre,
When Caesar shall his raptur'd bard inspire,
And crown'd with laurel, well-earn'd meed of war,
Drag the fierce Gaul at his triumphal oar;

Than whom the gods ne'er gave, or bounteous Fate,
To human kind a gift more good or great,

VOL. XIX.

Nor from the treasures shall again unfold,
Though Time roll backward to his ancient gold.

Be thine the festal days, the city's joys,
The forum silenc'd from litigious noise,
The public games for Cæsar safe restor'd,
A blessing oft with pious vows implor'd.

Then, if my voice can reach the glorious theme;
Then will I sing, would the loud acclaim—
"Hail, brightest Sun! in Rome's fair annual shine;
Cæsar returns—eternal praise be thine!"

As the procession awful moves along,
Let shouts of triumph fill our joyful song;
Repeated shouts of triumph Rome shall raise;
And to the bounteous gods our altars blaze.

Of thy fair herds twice ten shall grateful feed,
While I, with pious care, one steering lead:
Wear'd from the date, o'er pastures large he roves,
And for my vows his rising youth he proves:

His horns, like Lamæ's, bending fares appear,
When the third night she rises to her sphere;
And, yellow all the rest, one spot there glows
Full in his front, and bright as winter snows.

ODE III.

TO MELPOMENE.

He, on whose metal hour the speed
Of verse hath smil'd, shall never gaze
The Isthmian gauntlet, or be seen
First in the fam'd Olympic race:

He shall not after toils of war,
And taming haughty monarchs' pride,
With laurel'd brows conspicuous far,
To Jove's Tarpeian temple ride:
But him, the streams which warbling flow
Rich Tibur's fertile vales along,
And shady groves, his haunts, shall know
The master of th' Eolian song.

The son of Rome, majestic Rome!
Have plac'd me in the poet's quire,
And Envy, now or dead or dumb,
Forbears to blame what they admire.

Goddess of the sweet-sounding lute,
Which thy harmonious touch obeys,
Who cast the fenny race, though mute,
To cygnet's dying accents raise,
Thy gift it is, that all, with ease,
Me prince of Roman lyrics own;
That, while I live, my numbers please,
If pleasing, is thy gift alone.

ODE IV.

THE PRAISES OF DEUSUS.

As the majestic bird of towering kind, [space,
Who bears the thunder through th' ethereal
(To whom the monarch of the gods assign'd
Dominion o'er the vagrant, feather'd race,
His faith approv'd, when to the distant skies
From Ida's top he bore the Phrygian prize)

Spring from his nest, by sprightly youth inspir'd,
Fledg'd, and exulting in his native might,
Novice to toils; but as the clouds retir'd,
And gentler gales provok'd a bolder flight,
On sailing wings through yielding air explor'd
Unwonted paths, and pasted while he soar'd;

Y y

Anon to savage in the fleecy fold,
The glowing ardour of his youthful heart
Pour'd the beak'd foe; now more maturely bold
With talons fierce precipitant to dart
On dragons fell, reluctant in the fray;
Such is his thirst for battle, and for prey:

Or as a lion through the forest stalks,
Wean'd by his tawny dam from milky food;
A goat decries him from her flowery walks,
First doom'd to stain his youthful jaws with blood:

So Drusus look'd tremendous to his foes,
Beneath the frozen height of Alpine snows.

The Rhetian bands beheld him such in war:
Those daring bands, who with triumphant joy
Were wont to spread their baneful terrors far,
Tam'd by the conduct of the martial boy,
Felt what true courage could achieve, when led
By bright example, and by virtue bred;

Felt how Augustus with paternal mind
Fir'd the young Nereos to heroic deeds,
The brave and good are copies of their kind:
In steers laborious, and in generous steeds
We trace their sires: nor can the bird of Jove,
Intrepid, fierce, beget th' unwarlike dove.

Yet sage instructions, to refine the soul
And raise the genius, wondrous aid impart,
Conveying, inward as they purely sell,
Strength to the mind, and vigour to the heart:
When morals fail, the stains of vice disgrace
The fairest honours, and the noblest race.

How much the grandeur of thy rising state
Owes to the Nereos, Rome imperial, say;
Witness Metaurus, and the dismal fate
Of vanquish'd Asdrubal, and that glad day,
Which first auspicious, as the darkness fled,
O'er Latium's face a tide of glory shed;

Restless in his rage, before that day
The Carthaginian with vindictive ire
Through our fair cities urg'd his cruel way,
As through the pitchy pines destructive fire
Devours its course; or as when Eurus raves,
And howling rides the mad Sicilian waves.

The Roman youth, improving by their toils,
With better fate now wield the vengeful sword,
And see those temples, which were once the spoils
Of Tyrian rapine, to their gods restor'd;
When faithless Hannibal at length express
The boding sorrows of his anxious breast:

"Like stags, of coward kind, the destin'd prey
Of ravening wolves, we unprovok'd defy
Those, whom to baffle is our fairest play,
The richest triumph we can boast, to fly.
For mark that race; which to the Latian shore
Their gods, their sons, their sires, intrepid bore.

"That race, long tost upon the Tuscan waves,
Are like an oak upon the woody top
Of shaded Algidus, embrown'd with leaves,
Which, as keen axes its green honours lop,
Thro' wounds, thro' losses, no decay can feel,
Collecting strength and spirit from the steel.

"Not Hydra stronger, when dismember'd, rose
Against Alemena's much-enduring son,
Grieving to find, from his repeated blows,
The foe redoubled, and his toil begun;
The foe redoubled, and his toil begun;
Nor Colchis teem'd, nor Echionian Thebes,
A fell monster from their bursting glebes.

"In ocean plunge them, they emergent bright;
At arms oppose them in the dusty field,
With routed squadrons they renew the fight,
And force your yet unbroken troops to yield,
And battles wage, to be the future boast
Of their proud consorts o'er our vanquish'd host.

"To lofty Carthage I no more shall send
Vicents of my deeds, and heralds of my fame;
My boundless hopes, alas! are at an end,
With all the flowing fortune of our name:
Those boundless hopes, that flowing fortune, all
Are dash'd, and buried in my brother's fall."

The Claudian race, those favourites of the skies,
No toil shall damp, no fortitude withstand;
Superior they to difficulties rise,
Whom Jove protects with an indulgent hand;
Whom cautious cares, preventing wiles afar,
Guide through the perils of tumultuous war.

ODE V.

TO AUGUSTUS.

PROFITIOUS to the sons of Earth
(Best guardian of the Roman state)
The heavenly powers beheld thy birth,
And form'd thee glorious, good, and great;
Rome and her holy fathers cry, "Thy stay
Was promis'd short, ah! wherefore this delay?"

Come then, auspicious prince, and bring,
To thy long gloomy country, light,
For in thy countenance the spring
Shines forth to cheer thy people's sight:
Then hasten thy return; for, thou away,
Nor lustre has the Sun, nor joy the day.

As a fond mother views with fear
The terrors of the rolling main,
While envious winds, beyond his year,
From his lov'd bosom her son detain;
To the good gods with fervent prayer she cries,
And catches every omen as it flies;

Then anxious listens to the roar
Of winds, that loudly sweep the sky;
Nor, fearful, from the winding shore
Can ever turn her longing eye:
Smit with as faithful and as fond desires,
Impatient Rome her absent lord requires.

Safe by thy cares her oxen graze,
And yellow Ceres clothes her fields;
The sailor ploughs the peaceful seas,
And Earth her rich abundance yields;
While, nobly conscious of unsullied fame,
Fair honour dreads th' imputed sense of blame.

By thee our wedded dames are pure
From foul adultery's embrace;
The conscious father views secure
His own resemblance in his race:
Thy chaste example quells the spotted deed,
And to the guilt thy punishments succeed.

Who shall the faithless Parthian dread,
The freezing armies of the north,
Th' enormous youth, to battle bred,
Whom horrid Germany brings forth?
Who shall regard the war of cruel Spain,
If Caesar live secure, if Caesar reign?

Safe in his vineyard toils the hind,
 Weds to the widow'd elm his vine,
 Till the Sun sets his bill behind,
 Then hastens joyful to his wine,
 And in his gayer boasts of mirth implores
 Thy godhead to protect and bless his stores.
 To thee he chants the sacred song,
 To thee the rich libation pours;
 Thee, plac'd his household gods among,
 With solemn, daily prayer adores:
 So Castor and great Hercules of old
 Were with their gods by grateful Greece enroll'd.

Gracious and good, beneath thy reign
 May Rome her happy hours employ,
 And grateful hail thy just domain
 With pious hymns and festal joy:
 Thus, with the rising Sun we sober pray,
 Thus, in our wine beneath his setting ray.

[The Sixth Ode will be found in the Secular Poem, See the first Chorus of Youths and Virgins, and the succeeding Hymn to Apollo.]

ODE VII.

TO TORQUATUS.

The snow dissolves, the field its verdure spreads,
 The trees high wave in air their leafy heads;
 Earth feels the change; the rivers calm subside,
 And smooth along their banks decreasing glide;
 The elder Grace, with her fair sister-train,
 In naked beauty dances o'er the plain.
 The circling hours that swiftly wing their way,
 And in their flight consume the smiling day;
 Those circling hours, and all the various year,
 Convince us, nothing is immortal here.

In vernal gales cold winter melts away;
 Soon wastes the spring in summer's burning ray;
 Yet summer dies in autumn's fruitful reign,
 And slow-pac'd winter soon returns again.
 The Moon renews her orb with growing light;
 But when we sink into the depths of night,
 Where all the good, the rich, the brave are laid,
 Our best remains are ashes and a shade. [power,

Who knows that Heaven, with ever-bounteous
 Shall add to-morrow to the present hour?
 The wealth you give to pleasure and delight,
 Far from thy ravening heir shall speed its flight;
 But soon as Minos, thron'd in awful state,
 Shall o'er thee speak the solemn words of Fate,
 Nor virtue, birth, nor eloquence divine,
 Shall bid the grave its destin'd prey reign;
 Nor chaste Diana from infernal night
 Could bring her modest favourite back to light;
 And hell-descenting Theseus strove in vain
 To break his amorous friend's Lethæan chain.

ODE VIII.

TO CENSORINUS.

With liberal heart to every friend,
 A bowl or caldron would I send;
 Or tripods, which the Grecians gave,
 As rich rewards to heroes brave;
 Nor should the meanest gift be thine,
 If the rich works of art were mine,

By Scopas or Parrhasius wrought,
 With animating skill who taught
 The shapeless stone with life to glow,
 Or bade the breathing colours flow,
 To imitate, in every line,
 The form or human or divine.

But I nor boast the curious store,
 And you nor want, nor wish for more;
 'Tis yours the joys of verse to know,
 Such joys as Horace can bestow,
 While I can vouch my present's worth,
 And call its every virtue forth.

Nor columns, which the public raise,
 Engrav'd with monumental praise,
 By which the breath of life returns
 To heroes sleeping in their urns;
 Nor Hannibal, when swift he fled,
 His threats-retorted on his head;
 Nor impious Carthage wrapt in flame,
 From whence great Scipio gain'd a name,
 Such glories round him could diffuse
 As the Calabrian poet's Muse;
 And should the bard his aid deny,
 Thy worth shall unrewarded die.

Had envious Silence left unsung
 The child from Mars and Ilia sprung,
 How had we known the hero's fame,
 From whom the Roman empire came?
 The poet's favour, voice, and lays,
 Could Æacus from darkness raise,
 Snatch'd from the Stygian gulfs of Hell,
 Among the blissful isles to dwell.

The Muse forbids the brave to die,
 The Muse enthrones him in the sky:
 Alcides, thus, in Heaven is plac'd,
 And shares with Jove th' immortal feast;
 Thus the twin-stars have power to save
 The shatter'd vessel from the wave,
 And vine-crown'd Bacchus with success
 His jovial votaries can bless.

ODE IX.

TO LOLLIVS.

While with the Grecian bards I vie,
 And raptur'd tune the social string,
 Think not the song shall ever die,
 Which with no vulgar art I sing,
 Though born where Æolus rolls his sounding stream,
 In lands far distant from poetic fame.

What though the Muse her Homer thrones
 High above all th' immortal choir,
 Nor Pindar's rapture she disowns,
 Nor bides the plaintive Cæan lyre:
 Alcæus strikes the tyrant's soul with dread,
 Nor yet is grave Stesichorus unread.

Whatever old Anacreon sung,
 However tender was the lay,
 In spite of Time is ever young,
 Nor Sappho's amorous flames decay;
 Her living songs preserve their charming art,
 Her lovè still breathes the passions of her heart.

Helen was not the only fair,
 By an unhappy pass on fir'd,
 Who the lewd ringlets of the hair
 Of an adulterous beau admir'd;
 Court arts, gold lace, and equipage have charm'd
 To tempt weak woman to a stranger's arms.

Nor first from Teucer's vengeful bow
The feather'd death unerring flew,
Nor was the Greek the single foe
Whose rage ill-fated Ilium knew:
Greece had with heroes fill'd th' embattled plain,
Worthy the Muse in her sublimest strain.

Nor Hector first transported heard
With fierce delight the war's alarms,
Nor brave Deiphobus appear'd
Amid the tented field in arms,
With glorious ardour prodigal of life,
To guard a darling son and faithful wife.

Before great Agamemnon reign'd,
Reign'd kings as great as he, and brave,
Whose huge ambition's now contain'd
In the small compass of a grave;
In endless night they sleep, unwept, unknown,
No bard had they to make all time their own.

In captiv' if forgotten lies,
What is the valour of the brave?
What difference, when the coward dies,
And sinks in silence to his grave?
Nor, Lollius, wilt I not thy praise proclaim,
But from oblivion vindicate thy fame.

Nor shall its livid power conceal
Thy trials—how glorious to the state?
How constant to the public weal
Through all the doubtful turns of fate!
Thy steady soul, by long experience found
Erect alike, when Fortune smil'd or frown'd.

Villains, in public rapine bold,
Lollius, the just avenger, dread,
Who never by the charms of gold,
Shining seducer, was misled:
Beyond thy year such virtue shall extend,
And death alone thy consulate shall end.

Perpetual magistrate is he,
Who keeps strict Justice full in sight;
With scorn rejects th' offender's fee,
Nor weighs convenience against right;
Who bids the crowd at awful distance gaze,
And Virtue's arms victoriously displays.

Not he, of wealth immense possesser,
Tasteless who piles his massy gold,
Among the number of the blest
Should have his glorious name enroll'd;
He better claims the glorious name, who knows
With wisdom to enjoy what Heaven bestows:

Who knows the wrongs of want to bear,
Even in its lowest, last extreme;
Yet can with conscious virtue fear,
Far worse than death, a deed of shame;
Undaunted, for his country or his friend,
To sacrifice his life—o glorious end!

ODE X

TO LIGURINUS.

O cease still, and vain of beauty's charms,
When wint'ry age thy insolence disarms;
When fall those locks that on thy shoulders play,
And youth's gay roses on thy cheeks decay;
When that smooth face shall manhood's roughness
And in your glass another form appear; [wear,
Ah why, you'll say, do I now vainly burn,
Or with my wishes not my youth return?

ODE XI.

TO METELLUS.

Purills, I have a cask of wine
Mellow'd by summers more than nine;
With living wreaths to crown our heads
The parsley's vivid verdure spreads;
To bind your hair the ivy twines,
With plate my cheerful sideboard shines:
With vorrain chaste an altar bound,
Now thirsts for blood; the victim's crown'd

All hands employ'd; with busy haste
My boys and girls prepare our feast;
Trembling the pointed flames arise,
The smoke rolls upward to the skies.
But why this busy, festal care?
This invitation to my fair?

This day the smiling month divides,
O'er which the sea-born queen presides;
Sacred to me, and due to mirth;
As the glad hour that gave me birth;
For, when this happy morn appears,
Misoecus counts a length of years
To roll in bright succession round,
With every joy and blessing crown'd.

Gay Telephus exults above
The humble fortunes of thy love;
A rich and buxom maid detains
His captive heart in willing chains.

The youth destroy'd by heavenly fire
Forbids ambition to aspire;
And Pegasus, who soon'd to bear
His earth-born rider through the air,
A dread example hath supplied
To check the growth of human pride,
And caution my presumptuous fair
To grasp at things within her sphere.

Come then, my latest love, (for I Shall never for another die)
Come learn with me to never lose
Thy voice of harmony to raise.
The soothing song and charming air
Shall lessen every gluttony care.

ODE XII.

TO VIRGIL.

Contractors of the Spring, the Thracian wind
With kindly breath now drive the bark from shore;

No frost, with hoary hand, the meadow binds,
Nor swain with winter snow the torrents roars

The swallow, hapless bird! now builds her nest,
And in complaining notes begins to sing,
That, with revenge too cruelly possess'd,
Impious she punish'd an incestuous king.

Stretch'd on the springing grass the shepherd swain
His ready pipe with rural music fills;
The god, who guards his flock, approves the strain,
The god, who loves Arcadia's gloomy hills:

Virgil, 'tis thine with noble youths to feast;
Yet, since the thirsty season calls for wine,
Would you a cup of generous Bacchus taste,
Bring you the odour, and a cask is thine.

Thy little box of spikensand shall produce
A mighty cask, that in the cellar lies;
Big with large hopes shall flow th' inspiring juice,
Powerful to sooth our griefs, and raise our joys.

If pleasures such as these can charm thy soul,
Bring the glad merchandise, with sweets replete;
Nor empty-handed shall you touch the bowl,
Nor do I mean like wealthy folk to treat.

Think on the gloomy pile's funeral flames,
And be no more with sordid lucre blind;
Mix a short folly with thy labour'd schemes;
'Tis joyous folly, that unbends the mind.

ODE XIII.

TO VIBI.

Thou gods, the gods have heard my prayer:
See, Lyce, see that hoary hair,
Yet you a toast would shine:
You impudently drink and joke,
And with a broken voice provoke
Desires no longer thine.

Cupid, who joys in dimple sleep,
Now lies in blooming Chia's cheek,
Who tunes the melting lay;
From blasted oaks the wanton flies,
Scar'd at thy wrinkles, haggard eyes,
And head snow'd o'er with gray.

Nor glowing purple, nor the blaze
Of jewels, can restore the days,
To these those days of glory,
Which, wasted on the wigs of Time,
Even from thy birth to beauty's prime,
Recorded stand in story.

Ah! whither is thy Venus fled?
That bloom by Nature's cunning spread?
That every graceful art?
Of her, of her, what now remains,
Who breath'd the loves, who charm'd the swains,
And snatch'd me from my heart?

Once happy maid! in pleasing guile
Who vied with Cynara in smiles,
Ah! tragical survival!
She glorious died in beauty's bloom,
While cruel Fate defers thy doom
To be the raven's rival:

That youths, in fervent wishes held,
Not without laughter may behold
A torch, whose early fire
Could every breast with love inflame,
Now faintly spread a sickly gleam,
And in a smoky expire.

ODE XIV.

TO AUGUSTUS.

How shall our holy senate's care,
Or Rome with grateful joy prepare
Thy monumental honours, big with fame,
And in her festal annals eternize thy name?

O thou, where Sol with varied rays
The habitable globe surveys,
Greatest of princes, whose vindictive war [car!
First broke th' unconquer'd Gaul to thy triumphal

For when thy legions Drusus led,
How swift the rapid Brenni fled!
The rough Gessani fell, and, rais'd in vain
Tremendous on the Alps, twice overwhelm'd the plain

Their haughty towers. With just success
While the good gods thy battle bless,
Our elder Nero smote with deep dismay [array.
The Rhoetians huge of bulk, and broke their firm
Conspicuous in the martial strife,
And nobly prodigal of life,
With what prodigious ruins he oppress'd
For glorious liberty the death-devoted breast!

As when the Pleiads read the skies
In mystic dance, the winds arise,
And work the seas untam'd; such was the force,
With which through spreading fires he spur'd his foaming horse.

So branching Aufidus, who laves
The Daunian realms, fierce rolls his waves,
When to the golden labours of the swain
He meditates his wrath, and deluges the plain.

As Claudius, with impetuous might,
Broke through the iron ranks of fight;
From front to rear the bloodless victor sped,
Mow'd down th' embattled field, and wide the slaughters spread;

Thine were his troops, his counsels thine,
And all his guardian powers divine:
For, since the day when Alexandria's port
Open'd, in supplicance low, her desolated court;
When thrice five times the circling Sun
His annual course of light had run;
Fortune by this success hath crown'd thy name,
Confirm'd thy glories past, and rais'd thy future
fame.

Dread guardian of th' imperial state,
Whose presence rules thy country's fate,
On whom the Medes with awful wonder gaze,
Whom unhour'd Scythians fear, unconquer'd Spain
obeys;

The Nile, who hides his sevenfold source,
The Tigris, headlong in his course,
The Danube, and the ocean wild that roars
With monster-bearing waves round Britain's rocky shores:

The fearless Gaul thy name réveres,
Thy voice the rough Iberian hears,
With arms compos'd the fierce Sicambrian yield,
Nor view, with dear delight, the carnage of the field;

ODE XV.

TO AUGUSTUS.

I would have sung of battles dire
And mighty cities overthrow,
When Phoebus smote me with his eyes,
And warn'd me with an angry tone,
Not to unfold my little sail, or brave
The boundless terrors of the Tyrrhene wave.

Yet will I sing thy peaceful reign,
Which crowns with fruits our happy fields,
And, rent from Parthia's haughty fane,
To Roman Jove his eagles yields;
Augustus bids the rage of war to cease,
And shuts up Janus in eternal peace.

Restrain'd by arts of ancient fame,
Wild License walks at large no more,
Those arts, by which the Latian name,
The Roman strength, th' imperial pow'r,
With awful majesty unbounded spread
To rising Phoebus from his western bed.

While watchful Caesar guards our age,
Nor civil wrath, nor loud alarms
Of foreign tumults, nor the rage
That joys to forge destructive arms,
And ruin'd cities fills with hostile woes,
Shall e'er disturb, O Rome, thy safe repose.

Nations, who quaff the rapid stream,
Where deep the Danube rolls his wave ;
The Parthians, of perfidious fame,
The Getæ fierce, and Seres brave,
And they on Tanais who wide extend,
Shall to the Julian laws reluctant bend.

Our wives and children share our joy,
With Bacchus' jovial blessings gay ;
Thus we the festal hours employ,
Thus grateful hail the busy day :
But first with solemn rites the gods adore,
And, like our sires, their sacred aid implore ;

Then vocal, with harmonious lays
To Lydian flutes, of cheerful sound,
Attamp'rd sweetly, we shall raise
The valiant deeds of chiefs renown'd,
Old Troy, Anchises, and the godlike race
Of Venus, blooming with immortal grace.

O D E S,

BOOK V.

ODE I.

TO MÆCENAS.

WHILE you, Mæcenas, dearest friend,
Would Caesar's person with your own defend ;
And Antony's high-towered fleet
With light Liburnian galleys fearless meet,
What shall forsaken Horace do,
Whose every joy of life depends on you ?
With thee, 'tis happiness to live,
And life, without thee, can no pleasure give.
Shall I th' unkind command obey,
And idly waste my joyless hours away ?
Or, as becomes the brave, embrace
The glorious toil, and spurn the thoughts of peace ?
I will ; and over Alpine snow,
Or savage Caucasus, intrepid go ;
Or follow, with undaunted breast,
Thy dreadful warfare to the furthest west.
You ask, what aid I can afford,
A puny warrior ; novice to the sword.
Absence, my lord, increases fear ;
The danger lessens when the friend is near :
Thus, if the mother-bird forsake
Her unfedg'd young, she dreads the gliding snake
With deeper agonies afraid,
Not that her presence could afford them aid.
With cheerful heart will I sustain,
To purchase your esteem, this dread campaign :
Not that my ploughs, with heavier toil,
Or with a larger team, may turn my soil ;

Not that my flocks, when Sirius reigns,
May browse the verdure of Lucania's plains ;
Not that my villa shall extend
To where the walls of Tusculum ascend.
Thy bounteous largely hath supplied,
Even with a lavish hand, my utmost pride ;
Nor will I meanly wish for more,
Tasteless in earth to hide the sordid store,
Like an old miser in the play,
Or like a spendthrift squander it away.

ODE II.

THE PRAISES OF A COUNTRY LIFE.

LIKE the first mortals blest is he,
From debts, and usury, and business free,
With his own team who ploughs the soil,
Which grateful once confess'd his father's toil.
The sounds of war nor break his sleep,
Nor the rough storm, that harrows up the deep ;
He shuns the courtier's haughty dooms,
And the loud science of the bar abjures.
Sometimes his marriageable vines
Around the lofty bridegroom elm he twines ;
Or lops the vagrant boughs away,
Ingrafting better as the old decay ;
Or in the vale with joy surveys
His lowing herd safe-wandering as they graze ;
Or careful stores the flowing gold
Prest from the hive, or sheers his tender fold ;
Or when, with various fruits o'erspread,
The mellow Autumn lifts his beauteous head,
His grafted pears or grapes, that vie
With the rich purple of the Tyrian dye,
Grateful he gathers, and repays
His guardian gods upon their festal days ;
Sometimes beneath an ancient shade,
Or on the matted grass supinely laid,
Where pours the mountain stream along,
And feather'd warblers chant the soothing song ;
Or where the lucid fountain flows,
And with its murmurs courts him to repose.
But when the rain and snows appear,
And wintry Jove loud thunders o'er the year,
With bounds he drives into the toils
The foaming boar, and triumphs in his spoils ;
Or for the greedy thrush he lays
His nets, and with delusive baits betrays ;
Artful he sets the springing snare,
To catch the stranger crane, or timorous hare.
Thus happy, who would stoop to prove
The pains, the wrongs, and injuries of love ?
But if a chaste and virtuous wife
Assist him in the tender cares of life ;
Of sun burnt charms, but honest fame,
(Such as the Sabine, or Apulian dame) ;
Fatigu'd when homeward he returns,
The sacred fire with cheerful lustre burns ;
Or if she milk her swelling kipe,
Or in their folds his happy flocks confine ;
While unbought dainties crown the feast,
And luscious wines from this year's vintage prest ;
No more shall curious oysters please ;
Or fish, the luxury of foreign seas
(If eastern tempests, thundering o'er
The wint'ry wave, shall drive them to our shore) ;
Or wild-fowl of delicious taste,
From distant climates brought to crown the feast,

Shall o'er so grateful prove to me,
 As olives gather'd from their unctuous tree,
 And herbs that love the flowery field,
 And cheerful health with pure digestion yield;
 Or fatt'ng, on the feastal day,
 Or kid just rescued from some beast of prey.
 Amid the feast how joys he to behold
 His well-fed flocks home hasting to their fold!
 Or see his labour'd oxen bow
 Their languid necks, and drag th' inverted plough,
 At night his numerous slaves to view
 Round his domestic gods their mirth pursue!
 The usurer spoke: determin'd to begin
 A country-life, he calls his monee in,
 But, ere the Moon was in her wane,
 The wretch had put it out to use again,

ODE III.

TO MÆCENAS.

In parricide ever, in horrors more dire,
 With impious right hand shall strangle his sire,
 On garlic, than hemlock more rank, let him feed;
 O stomach of mowers to digest such a weed!
 What poison is this in my bosom so glowing?
 Have I swallow'd the gore of a viper unknowing?
 Canidia perhaps hath handled the feast,
 And with witchery bellish the banquet hath drest.
 With this did Medea her lover besppear,
 Young Jason, beyond all his Argonauts fair;
 The stench was so strong, that it tam'd to the yoke
 The brass-footed bulls breathing fire and smoke.
 On the gown of Cræusa its juices she shed,
 Then on her wing'd dragon in triumph she fled.
 Not such the strong vapour that burns up the plains,
 When the dog-star in anger triumphantly reigns;
 Not the shirt of Alcides, that well-labour'd soldier,
 With flames more evenom'd burn'd into his shoulder.

May the girl of your heart, if ever you taste,
 Facetious Mæcenas, so baleful a feast,
 Her hand o'er your kisses, oh, may she bespread,
 And lie afar off on the stock of the bed!

ODE IV.

As wolves and lambs by nature disagree,
 So is my hatred firm to thee;
 Thou wretch, whose back with flagrant whips is torn;
 Whose legs with galling fetters worn;
 Though wealth thy native insolence inflame,
 A scoundrel ever is the same.
 While you your thrice three ells of gown display,
 And stalk along the sacred way,
 Observe the free-born indignation rise,
 Mark how they turn away their eyes:
 "This wretch," they cry, "with public lashing
 Till even the beetle loath'd his trade, [flay'd,
 Now ploughs his thousand acres of demesne,
 And wears the pavement with his train;
 Now on the foremost benches sits, in spite
 Of Otho, an illustrious knight."
 From slaves and pirates to assert the main,
 Shall Rome such mighty fleets maintain,
 And shall those fleets, that dreadful rule the sea,
 A pirate and a slave obey?

ODE V.

ON THE WITCH CANIDIA.

"But oh, ye gods, whose awful sway
 Heaven, Earth, and human-kind obey,
 What can this hideous noise intend?
 On me what ghastly looks they bend?
 If ever chaste Lucina heard
 Thy vows in hour of birth preferr'd;
 Oh! by this robe's impur'd train,
 Its purple pride, alas! how vain!
 By the unerring wrath of Jove,
 Unerring shall his vengeance prove;
 Why like a step-dame do you stare,
 Or like a wounded tigress glare?"

'Thus while his sacred robes they tear,
 The trembling boy prefers his prayer;
 Then naked stands, with such a form
 As might an impious Thracian charm.
 Canidia, crown'd with writhing snakes
 Dishavell'd, thus the silence breaks:

"Now the magic fire prepare,
 And from graves uprooted tear
 Trees, whose horrors gloomy spread
 Round the mansions of the dead;
 Bring the eggs and plumage foul
 Of a midnight-shrieking owl;
 Be they well besmeard with blood
 Of the blackest-venom'd toad;
 From their various climates bring
 Every herb that taints the spring;
 Then into the charm be thrown,
 Snatch'd from famish'd bitch, a bone;
 Burn them all with magic flame,
 Kindled first by Colchian dame."

Now Sagana, around the cell,
 Sprinkled her waters black from Hell;
 Fierce as a porcupine, or boar,
 In frightful wreaths her hair she wore.
 Veia, who never knew remorse,
 Uplifts the spade with feeble force,
 And, breathless with the hellish toil,
 Deep-groaning breaks the guilty soil,
 Turns out the earth, and digs a grave,
 In which the boy (as o'er the wave
 A lusty swimmer lifts his head)
 Chiu-deep sinks downward to the dead,
 O'er dainties chang'd twice, thrice a-day.
 Slowly to gaze his life away;
 That the foul bags an amorous dose
 Of his parch'd marrow may compose,
 His marrow, and his liver dried,
 The seat, where wanton thoughts reside,
 When, fix'd upon his food in vain,
 His eye-balls pin'd away by pain.

Naples, for idleness renown'd,
 And all the villages around,
 Believe that Folia shar'd their rites,
 She who in monstrous lusts delights,
 Whose voice the stars from Heaven can tear,
 And charm bright Luna from her sphere.

Here, with black tooth and livid jaws,
 Her unpar'd thumbs Canidia gnaws,
 And into hideous accents broke;
 In sounds, how direful! thus she spoke:
 "Ye powers of darkness and of Hell,
 Propitious to the magic spell,

Who rule in silence o'er the night,
While we perform the mystic rite,
Be present now, your horrors shed,
In hallow'd vengeance, on his head.
Beneath the forest's gloomy shade
While beasts in slumbers sweet are laid,
Give me the lecher, old and lawd,
By barking village-curr pursued,
Expos'd to laughter, let him shine
In essence—ah! that once was mine.
What! shall my strongest potions fail,
And could Medea's charms prevail?
When the fair harlot, proud of heart,
Deep felt the vengeance of her art;
Her gown, with powerful poisons dyed,
In flames enwrapp'd the guilty bride.
Yet every root and herb I know,
And on what steepy depths they grow,
And yet, with essence round him shed,
He sleeps in some bold harlot's bed;
Or walks at large, nor thinks of me,
By some more mighty witch set free.

“But soon the wretch my wrath shall prove,
By spells unwonted taught to love;
Nor shall even Marsian charms have power,
Thy peace, O Varus, to restore.
With stronger drugs, a larger bowl
I'll fill, to bend thy haughty soul;
Sooner the seas to Heaven shall rise,
And earth spring upwards to the skies,
Than you not burn in fierce desire,
As melts this pitch in smoky fire.”

The boy, with lenient words, no more
Now strives their pity to implore;
With rage yet doubtful what to speak,
Forth from his lips these curses break:—
“Your spells may right and wrong remove,
But ne'er shall change the wrath of Jove;
For, while I curse the direful deed,
In vain shall all your victims bleed.
Soon as this tortur'd body dies,
A midnight Fury will I rise:
Then shall my ghost, though form'd of air,
Your cheeks with crooked talons tear,
Unceasing on your entrails prey,
And fright the thoughts of sleep away.
Such horrors shall the guilty know,
Such is the power of gods below.”

“Ye filthy hags, with showers of stones
The vengeful crowd shall crush your bones;
Then beasts of prey, and birds of air,
Shall your unburied members tear,
And, while they weep their favourite boy,
My parents shall the vengeful sight enjoy.”

ODE VI

TO CASSIUS SEVERUS.

You dog, that fearful do provoke
The wolf, attack offence folk!
Turn hither, if you dare, your spite,
And bark at me, prepar'd to bite.
For like a hound, or mastiff keen,
That guards the shepherd's flocky green,
Through the deep snows I boldly chase,
With ears erect, the savage race;
But you, when with your hideous yelling
You fill the grove, at cruts are snelling.

Fierce as Archilochus I glow;
Like Hippocæx a deadly foe.
If any mongrel shall assail
My character with tooth and nail;
What! like a truant boy, shall I
Do nothing in revenge—but cry?

ODE VII

TO THE ROMAN PEOPLE.

Whither, oh! whither, impious, do ye run?
Why is the sword unsheath'd; the war begun?
Has then too little of the Latian blood
Been pour'd on earth, or mixt with Neptunet
blood?

Not that the Romans with avenging flame
Might burn the rival of the Roman name,
Or Britons, yet unbroken to our war,
In chains should follow our triumphal car,
But that the Parthian should his vows enjoy,
And Rome, with impious hand, herself destroy.

The rage of wolves and lions is confin'd;
They never prey but on a different kind.
Answer, “From madness rise those horro'rs dire?
Does angry fate, or guilt, your souls inspire?”
Silent they stand; with stupid wonder gaze,
While the pale cheek their inward guilt betrays.
’Tis so—the Fates have cruelly decreed,
That Rome for ancient fratricide must bleed:
The brother's blood, which stain'd our rising walk,
On his dependants, loud, for vengeance calls.

ODE IX.

TO MÆCENAS.

Why shall we quaff your old Cæcæbian wine,
Reserv'd for pious feasts and joys divine?
Cæsar with conquest comes, and gracious Jove,
Who gave that conquest, shall our joys approve.
Then bid the breath of harmony inspire
The Doric flute, and wake the Phrygian lyre;
As late, when the Neptunian youth, who span'd
A mortal birth, beheld his navy burn'd,
And fled affrighted through his father's waves
With his perfidious host; his host of slaves,
Freed from those chains with which his rage design'd,
Impious! the free-born sons of Rome to bind.

The Roman troops (Oh! be the tale denied
By future times) enslav'd to woman's pride,
And to a wretch'd eunuch's will severe
Basely subdu'd, the toils of war could bear.
Amidst the Roman eagles Sol survey'd,
O shame! th' Egyptian canopy display'd;
When twice a thousand Gauls aloud proclaim'd,
Indignant at the sight, great Cæsar's name,
And a brave fleet, by just resentment led,
Turn'd their broad prows, and to our heavens led.
Come, god of triumphs, bring the golden car,
The untam'd heifers, and the spoils of war;
For he, whose virtue rais'd his awful tomb
O'er ruin'd Carthage, ne'er return'd to Rome
So great and glorious, nor could Libya's field
To thee, O Triumph, such a leader yield.

Pursu'd by land and sea, the vanquish'd foe
Hath chang'd his purple for the garb of woe:
With winds, no more his own; with shafter'd fleet,
He seeks the far-fam'd hundred towns of Coës;

To trumpet-beaten Libya speeds his way,
Or drives a vagrant through th' uncertain sea.

Boy, bring us larger bowls, and fill them pound
With Chian, or the Lesbian vintage crown'd,
Or rich Cœcubian, which may best restrain
All sickening qualms, and fortify the brain.
Th' inspiring juice shall the gay banquet warm,
Nor Cœnar's danger shall our fears alarm.

ODE X.

TO MÆVIUS.

Waxy filthy Mævius hoists the spreading sail,
Each luckless open shall prevail.
Ye southern winds, invert the foamy tides,
And bang his labouring vessel's sides;
Let Eurus rouse the main with blackening roar,
Crack every cable, every oar;
Let the north wind rise dreadful o'er the floods,
As when it breaks the mountain-woods,
Nor let one friendly star shine o'er the night,
When sets Orion's gloomy light.
Mayst thou no kinder winds, O Mævius, meet,
Than the victorious Grecian fleet,
When Pallas turn'd her rage from ruin'd Troy,
The impious Ajax to destroy.
With streams of sweat the toiling sailor glows,
Thy face a muddy paleness shows;
Nor shall thy vile, unmanly wailings move
The pity of avenging Jove.
While watery winds the bellowing ocean shake,
I see thy luckless vessel break:
But if thy carcass reach the winding shore,
And birds the pamper'd prey devour,
A lamb and lustful goat shall thank the storm,
And I the sacrifice perform.

ODE XI.

TO PETTIUS.

Since cruel love, O Pettius, pierc'd my heart,
How have I lost my once-lov'd lyric art!
Thrice have the woods their leafy honour mourn'd,
Since for Inachia's beauties Horace burn'd.
How was I then (for I confess my shame)
Of every idle tale the laughing theme?
Oh! that I ne'er had known the jovial feast,
Where the deep sigh, that rends the labouring
breast,

Where languor, and a gentle silence shows,
To every curious eye, the lover's woes.

Pettius, how often o'er the flowing bowl,
When the gay liquor warm'd my opening soul,
When Bacchus, jovial god, no more restrain'd
The modest secret, how have I complain'd,
That wealthy blockheads, in a female's eyes,
From a poor poet's genius bear the prize!
But if a generous rage my breast should warm,
I swore—no vain amusements e'er shall charm
My aching wounds. Ye vagrant winds, receive
The sighs, that sooth the pains they should relieve;
Here shall my shame of being conquer'd end,
Nor with such rivals will I more contend.

When thus, with solemn air, I vaunting said,
Inspir'd by thy advice I homeward sped:
But ah! my feet in wonted wanderings stray,
And to no friendly doors my steps betray;

There I forget my vows, forget my pride,
And at her threshold lay my tortur'd side.

ODE XIII.

TO A FRIEND.

See what horrid tempests rise,
And contract the clouded skies;
Snows and showers fill the air,
And bring down the atmosphere.
Hark! what tempests sweep the floods!
How they shake the rattling woods!
'Let us, while it's in our power,
Let us seize the fleeting hour;
While our cheeks are fresh and gay,
Let us drive old age away;
Let us smooth its gather'd brows,
Youth its hour of mirth allows.

Bring us down the mellow'd wine,
Rich with years, that equal mine;
Prithes, talk no more of sorrow,
To the gods belongs to-morrow,
And, perhaps, with gracious power
They may change the gloomy hour.
Let the richest essence shed
Eastern odours on your head,
While the soft Cylenian lyre
Shall your labouring breast inspire.

To his pupil, brave and young,
Thus the noble Centaur sung:
"Matchless mortal! though 'tis thine,
Proud to boast! a birth divine,
Yet the banks, with cooling waves
Which the smooth Scamander laves;
And where Simois with pride
Rougher rolls his rapid tide,
Destin'd by unerring Fate,
Shall the sea-born hero wait.
There the Sisters, fated boy,
Shall thy thread of life destroy,
Nor shall azure Thetis more
Waft thee to thy natal shore;
Then let joy and mirth be thine,
Mirthful songs, and joyous wine,
And with converse blithe and gay
Drive all gloomy cares away."

ODE XV.

TO NEÆRA.

CLEAR was the night, the face of Heaven serene,
Bright shone the Moon amidst her starry train,
When round my neck as curls the tendril-vine—
(Loose are its curlings, if compar'd to thine);
'Twas then, insulting every heavenly power,
That, as I dictated, you boldly swore:
While the gaunt wolf pursues the trembling sheep;
While fierce Orion harrows up the deep;
While Phoebus' locks float wanton in the wind,
Thus shall Neæra prove, thy ever kind.

But, if with aught of rage was Horace born,
Severely shalt thou feel his honest scorn;
Nor will he tamely bear the bold delight,
With which his rival riots out the night,
But in his anger seek his kinder dame,
Warm with the raptures of a mutual flame;
Nor shall thy rage, thy grief, or angry charms
Recall the lover to thy faithless arms.

And thou, whoe'er thou art, who joy to shine,
Proud as thou art, in spoils which once were mine,
Though wide thy land extends, and large thy fold,
Though rivers roll for thee their purest gold,
Though Nature's wisdom in her works were thine,
And beauties of the human face divine,
Yet soon thy pride her wandering love shall mourn,
While I shall laugh, exulting in my turn.

ODE XVI

TO THE ROMANS.

In endless civil war th' imperial state
By her own strength precipitates her fate.
What neighbouring nations, fiercely leagu'd in arms,

What Persens, with insolent alarms
Threatening her tyrant monarch to restore;
What Spartacus, and Capua's rival power;
What Gaul, tumultuous and devoid of truth,
And fierce Germania, with her blue-eyed youth;
What Hannibal, on whose accurs'd head
Our sires their deepest imprecations shed,
In vain attempted to her awful state,
Shall we, a blood-devoted race complete?
Again shall savage beasts these hills possess?
And fell barbarians, wanton with success,
Scatter our city's flaming ruins wide,
Or through her streets in vengeful triumph ride,
And her great founder's hallow'd ashes spurn,
That sleep uninjur'd in their sacred urn?

But some, perhaps, to shun the rising shame
(Which Heaven approve) would try some happier scheme.

As the Phocæans oft for freedom bled,
At length, with imprecated curses, fled,
And left to boars and wolves the sacred fane,
With all their household gods, ador'd in vain;
So let us fly, as far as earth extends,
Or where the vagrant wind our voyage bends.

Shall this, or shall some better scheme prevail?
Why do we stop to hoist the willing sail?
But let us swear, when floating rocks shall gain,
Rais'd from the deep, the surface of the main;
When lowly Po the mountain summit lays,
And Apennine shall plunge beneath the waves;
When Nature's monsters meet in strange delight,
And the fell tigress shall with stags unite;
When the fierce kite shall woo the willing dove,
And win the wanton with adulterous love;
When herds on brindled lions fearless gaze,
And the smooth goat exults in briny seas;
Then, and then only, to the tempting gale
To spread repentant the returning sail.

Yet to cut off our hopes, those hopes that charm
Our fondness home, let us with curses arm
These high resolves. Thus let the brave and wise,
Whose souls above th' indocile vulgar rise;
Then let the crowd, who dare not hope success,
Inglorious, these ill-open'd seats possess.

But ye, whom virt^u's warm, indulge no more
These female complaints, but quit this fated shore;
For earth-surrounding sea our flight awaits,
Offering its blissful isles, and happy seats,
Where annual Ceres crowns th' uncultur'd field,
And vines unprun'd their blushing clusters yield;
Where olives, faithful to their season, grow,
And figs with Nature's deepest purple glow;

From hollow oaks where homied streams distil,
And bounds with noisy foot the pebbled rill;
Where goats untaught forsake the flowery vale,
And bring their swelling udders to the pail;
Nor evening-bears the sheep-fold growl around;
Nor mining vipers heave the tainted ground;
Nor watry Eurus deluges the plain,
Nor heats excessive burn the springing grain.

Not Argo thither turn'd her armed head;
Medea there no magic poison spread;
No merchants thither plough the pathless main,
For guilty commerce, and a thirst of gain;
Nor wise Ulysses, and his wandering bands,
Vicious, though brave, e'er knew these happy lands.
O'er the glad flocks no foul contagion spreads,
Nor summer Sun his burning influence sheds.

Pure and unmixt the world's first ages roll'd:
But soon as brass had stain'd the flowing gold,
To iron harden'd by succeeding crimes,
Jove for the just preserv'd these happy climes,
To which the gods this pious race invite,
And bid me, raptur'd bard, direct their flight.

ODE XVII

TO CANIDIA.

CANIDIA, to thy matchless art,
Vanquish'd I yield a suppliant heart;
But oh! by Hell's extended plains,
Where Pluto's gloomy consort reigns;
By bright Diana's vengeful rage,
Which prayers nor hecatombs assuage;
And by the books, of power to call
The charmed stars, and bid them fall,
No more pronounce the sacred scroll,
But back the magic circle roll.

Even stern Achilles could forgive
The Mysian king, and bid him live,
Though proud he rang'd the ranks of fight,
And hurl'd the spear with daring might.
Thus, when the murderous Hector lay
Condemn'd to dogs, and birds of prey,
Yet when his royal father kneel'd,
The fierce Aohilles knew to yield;
And Tryp's unhappy matrons paid
Their sorrows to their Hector's shade.

Ulysses' friends, in labours tried,
So Circe will'd, threw off their hide,
Assum'd the human form divine,
And dropp'd the voice and sense of swine.

O thou, whom tars and merchants love,
Too deep thy vengeful rage I prove,
Reduc'd, alas! to skin and bone,
My vigour fled, my colour gone.
Thy fragrant odours on my head
More than the snows of age have shed.
Days press on nights, and nights on days,
Yet never bring an hour of ease,
While, gasping in the pangs of death,
I stretch my lungs in vain for breath.

Thy charms have power ('tis now confess)
To split the head, and tear the breast.
What would you more, all-charming dame!
O seas, and earth! this scorching flame!
Not such the fire Aethides bore,
When the black-vean'd shirt he wore;
Nor such the flames, that to the skies
From Ætna's burning entrails rise:

And yet, thou shop of poisons dire,
You glow with unrelenting fire,
Thill, by the rapid heat calcin'd,
Vagrant I drive before the wind.

How long—? What ransom shall I pay?
Speak—I the stern command obey.
To expiate the guilty deed,
Say, shall a hundred bullocks bleed?
Or shall I to the lying string
Thy fame and spotless virtue sing?
Teach thee, a golden star, to rise,
And deathless walk the spangled skies?

When Helen's virtue was defam'd,
Her brothers, though with rage inflam'd,
Yet to the bard his eyes restor'd,
When suppliant he their grace implor'd.

Oh! calm this madness of my brain,
For you can heal this raging pain.
You never knew the birth of shame,
Nor by thy hand; all-skillful dame,
The poor man's ashes are upturn'd,
Though they be thrice three days inurn'd.
Thy bosom's bounteous and humane,
Thy hand from blood and murder clean;
And with a blooming race of boys
Lucina crowns thy mother-joys.

CANIDIA'S ANSWER.

I'LL hear no more. Thy prayers are vain.
Not rocks, amid the wint'ry main,
Less heed the shipwreck'd sailor's cries,
When Neptune bids the tempest rise,
Shall you Cotytia's feast deride,
Yet safely triumph in thy pride?
Or, impious, to the glare of day
The sacred joys of love betray?
Or fill the city with my name,
And pontiff-like our rites defame?
Did I with wealth in vain enrich
Of potent spells each charming witch,
Or mix the speedy drugs in vain?
No—through a lingering length of pain
Reluctant shalt thou drag thy days,
While every hour new pangs shall raise.
Gazing on the delusive feast,
Which charms his eye, yet flies his taste,
Perfidious Tantalus implores,
For rest, for rest, the vengeful powers;
Prometheus, while the vulture preys
Upon his liver, longs for ease;
And Sisyphus with many a groan,
Uprolls, with ceaseless toil, his stone,
To fix it on the topmost hill—
In vain—for Jove's all-ruling will Forbids. When thus in black despair
Down from some castle, high in air,
You seek a headlong fate below,
Or try the dagger's pointed blow,
Or if the left-ear'd knot you tie,
Yet death your vain attempts shall fly;
Then on your shoulders will I ride,
And earth shall shake beneath my pride,
Could I with life an image warm,
(Impertinent, you saw the charm)
Or tear down Luna from her skies,
Or bid the dead, though burn'd, arise,
Or mix the draught inspiring love,
And shall my art on thee successless prove?

THE SECULAR POEM.

THE POET TO THE PEOPLE.

STAND off, ye vulgar, nor profane,
With bold, unhallow'd sounds, this festal scenes
In hymns inspir'd by truth divine,
I, priest of the melodious Nine,
To youths and virgins sing the mystic strain.

TO THE CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

Phœbus taught me how to sing,
How to tune the vocal string;
Phœbus made me known to Fame,
Honour'd with a poet's name.
Noble youths, and virgins fair,
Chaste Diana's guardian care,
(Goddess, whose unerring dart
Stops the lynx, or flying hart)
Mark the Lesbian measures well,
Where they fall, and where they swell;
And in varied cadence sing,
As I strike the changing string.
To the god, who gilds the skies,
Let the solemn numbers rise;
Solemn sing the queen of night,
And her crescent's bending light,
Which adown the fruitful year
Rolls the months in prone career.
Soon, upon her bridal day,
Thus the joyful maid shall say:
"When the great revolving year
Bade the festal morn appear,
High the vocal hymn I rais'd,
And the listening gods were pleas'd:
All the vocal hymn divine,
Horace, tuneful bard, was thine."

FIRST CONCERT.

HYMN TO APOLLO.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

TITVOS, with impious lust inspir'd,
By chaste Latona's beauties fir'd,
Thy wrath, O Phœbus, tried;
And Niobe, of tongue profane,
Deplor'd her numerous offspring slain,
Sad victims of their mother's pride.
Achilles too, the son of Fame,
Though sprung from Thetis, sea-born dame,
And first of men in fight,
Though warring with tremendous spear
He shook the Trojan towers with fear,
Yet bow'd to thy superior might;
The cypress, when by storms impell'd,
Or pine, by biting axes fell'd,
Low bends the towering head:
So falling on th' ensanguin'd plain,
By your unerring arrow slain,
His mighty bulk the hero spread.
He had not Priam's heedless court,
Dissolv'd in wine, and festal sport,
With midnight art surpris'd;
But bravely bold, of open force,
Had proudly scorn'd Minerva's horse,
And all its holy cheat despis'd;

Then arm'd, alas! with horrors dire,
Wide-wasting with resistless ire,
Into the flames had thrown
Infants, upon whose faltering tongues
Their words in formless accents hung,
Infants to light and life unknown:

But charm'd by beauty's queen and thee,
The sire of gods, with just decree
Assenting, shook the skies;
That Troy should change th' imperial seat,
And, guided by a better fate,
Glorious in distant realms should rise,

Oh! may the god, who could inspire
With living sounds the Grecian lyre;
In Xanthus' lucid stream
Who joys to bathe his flowing hair,
Now make the Latian Muse his care,
And powerful guard her rising fame!

SECOND CONCERT.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS.

Ye virgins, sing Diana's praise.

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Ye boys, let youthful Phœbus crown your lays.

THE TWO CHORUS.

Together let us raise the voice
To her, belov'd by Jove supreme;
Let fair Latona be the theme,
Our tuneful theme, his beauteous choice.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS.

Ye virgins, sing Diana's fame,
Who bathes delighted in the limpid stream;
Dark Brymanthus' awful groves,
The woods that Algidus o'erspread,
Or wave on Cragne's verdant head,
Joyous th' immortal huntress loves.

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Ye boys, with equal honour sing
Fair Tempe cloth'd with ever-blooming spring;
Then hail the Delian birth divine,
Whose shoulders, beaming heavenly fire,
Gaze'd with his brother's warbling lyre,
And with the golden quiver shine.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

Mov'd by the solemn voice of prayer,
They both shall make imperial Rome their care,
And gracious turn the direful woes
Of famine and of weeping war
From Rome, from sacred Cæsar far,
And pour them on our British foes.

THIRD CONCERT.

TO APOLLO AND DIANA.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

Ye radiant glories of the skies,
Ever-beaming god of light,
Sweetly-shining queen of night,
Beneath whose wrath the wood-born savage dies;

! The Twenty-first Ode of the First Book.

Ye powers, to whom with ceaseless praise
A grateful world its homage pays,
Let our prayer, our prayer be heard,
Now in this solemn hour preferr'd,
When by the Sibyl's dread command,
Of spotless maids a chosen train,
Of spotless youths a chosen band,
To all our guardian gods uplift the hallow'd strain.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS.

Fair Sun, who with unchanging beam
Rising another and the same,
Dost from thy beamy car unfold
The glorious day,
Or hide it in thy setting ray,
Of light and life immortal source,
Mayst thou, in all thy radiant course,
Nothing more great than seven-hill'd Rome behold!

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Goddess of the natal hour,
Or, if other name more dear,
Propitious power,
Can charm your ear,
Our pregnant matrons gracious hear:
With lenient hand their pangs compose,
Heal their agonizing throes;
Give the springing birth to light,
And with every genial grace,
Prolife of an endless race, [rise:
Oh! crown our marriage-laws, and bless the nuptial

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

That when the circling years complete
Again this awful season bring,
Thrice with the day's revolving light,
Thrice beneath the shades of night,
In countless bands our youthful choirs may sing
These festal hymns, these pious games repeat.

Ye Fates, from whom unerring flows
The word of truth; whose firm decree
Its stated bounds and order knows,
Wide spreading through eternity,
With guardian care around us wait,
And with successive glories crown the state.
Let earth her various fruitage yield,
Her living verdure spread,
And form, amid the waving field,
A sheafy crown for Ceres' head;
Fall genial showers, and o'er our steady care
May Jove indulgent breathe his purest air!

CHORUS OF YOUTHS.

Phœbus, whose kindly beams impart
Health and gladness to the heart,
While in its quiver lies the pestilential dart,
Thy youthful supplicants heat:

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Queen of the stars, who rest the sight
In borned majesty of light,
Bend to thy virgins a propitious ear.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

If, ye gods, the Roman state
Was form'd by your immortal power,
Or if, to change th' imperial seat,
And other cities adore,
Beneath your guidance the Dardanian host
Pour'd forth their legions on the Thracian coast;

For whom Aeneas, through the fire,
In which he saw his Troy expire,
A passage open'd to an happier climate,
Where they might nobler triumphs gain,
And to never-ending time

With boundless empire reign,
Ye gods, inform our docile youth
With early principles of truth ;
Ye gods, indulge the waning days
Of silver'd age with placid ease,
And grant to Rome an endless race,
Treasure immense and every sacred grace.

The prince, who owes to beauty's queen his birth,
Who bids the snowy victim's blood
Pour forth to dye its purple flood,
Oh ! may he glorious rule the conquer'd earth ;
But yet a milder glory show
In mercy to the prostrate foe !

Already the fierce Mede his arms reverts,
Which wide extend th' imperial sway,
And bid th' unwilling world obey ;
The haughty Indian owns his fears,
And Scythians, doubtful of their doom,
Await the dread resolves of Rome.

Faith, Honour, Peace, celestial maid,
And Modesty, in ancient guise array'd,
And Virtue (with unhallow'd scorn
Too long neglected) now appear,
While Plenty fills her bounteous horn,
And pours her blessings o'er the various year.

CHORUS OF YOUTHS.

If the prophetic power divine,
Fam'd for the golden bow and quiver'd dart,
Who knows to charm the listening Nine,
And feeble mortals raise with healing art ;
If he with gracious eye survey the towers,
Where Rhine his deity adores,
Oh ! let each era still increase
Increase of happiness from age to age !

CHORUS OF VIRGINS.

Oh ! may Diana, on these favourite hills,
Whose diffusive presence fills
Her hallow'd fane,
Propitious deign
Our holy priests to hear,
And to our youth incline her willing ear !

CHORUS OF YOUTHS AND VIRGINS.

Lo ! we the chosen youthful choir,
Taught with harmonious voice to raise
Apollo's and Diana's praise,
In full and certain hope retire,
Thak' all th' assembled gods, and sovereign Jove,
These pious vows, these choral hymns approve.

SATIRES.

BOOK I.

SATIRE I.

TO MÆCENAS.

MÆCENAS, what's the cause, that no man lives
Contented with the lot which reason gives,

Or chance presents ; yet all with envy view
The schemes that others variously pursue ?

Broken with toils, with ponderous arms oppress,
The soldier thinks the merchant solely blest.
In opposite extreme ; when tempests rise,
War is a better choice, the merchant cries ;
The battle joins, and in a moment's flight,
Death, or a joyful conquest, ends the fight.
When early clients thunder at his gate,
The barrister applauds the rustic's fate :
While, by subpœnas dragg'd from home, the clown
Thinks they alone are blest who live in town.

But every various instance to repeat
Would tire ev'n Fabius, of eternal prate.
Not to be tedious, mark the general sim
Of these examples—Should some god proclaim,
" Your prayers are heard : you, soldier, to your seas ;

You, lawyer, take that envied rustic's ease :
Each to his several part—What ! ha ! not move
Even to the bliss you wish'd ?" And shall not Jove
Swell both his cheeks with anger, and forswear
His weak indulgence to their future prayer ?

But not to treat my subject as in jest,
(Yet may not truth in laughing guise be drest ?
As masters fondly sooth their boys to read
With cakes and sweetmeats) let us now proceed ;
With graver air our serious theme pursue,
And yet preserve our moral full in view.

Who turns the soil, and o'er the ploughshare
He who adulterates the laws, and vend's ; [bends ;
The soldier, and th' adventurers of the main,
Profess their various labours they sustain,
A decent competence for age to raise,
And then retire to indolence and ease.

MISER.

For thus the little ant (to human lore
No mean example) forms her frugal store,
Gather'd, with mighty toil, on every side,
Nor ignorant, nor careless to provide
For future want.

HORACE.

Yet, when the stars appear,
That darkly sadden the declining year,
No more she comes abroad, but wisely lives
On the fair store industrious summer gives.
For thee, nor summer's heat, nor winter's cold,
Fire, sea, nor sword, stop thy pursuit of gold ;
Nothing can break th' adventurous, bold design,
So none possess a larger sum than thine.
But, prithee, whence the pleasure, thus by stealth
Deep in the earth to hide thy weight of wealth ?

MISER.

One farthing lessen'd, you the mass reduce.

HORACE.

Add if not lessen'd, whence can rise its use ?
What though you thresh a thousand sacks of grain,
No more than mine thy stomach can contain.
The slave who bears the load of bread, shall eat
No more than he who never felt the weight.
Or say, what difference, if we live confin'd
Within the bounds by Nature's laws assign'd,
Whether a thousand acres of demesne,
Or one poor hundred, yield sufficient grain ?]

MISER.

Oh ! but 'tis sweet to take from larger hoards

HORACE.

Yet, if my little heap so much affords,

Why shall your granaries be valued more
Than my small hampers, with their frugal store?

You want a cask of water, or would fill
An ample goblet: whence the froward will
To choose a mighty river's rapid course,
Before this little fountain's lenient source?
But mark his fate, insatiate who desires
Deeper to drink, than nature's thirst requires;
With its torn banks the torrent bears away
Th' intemperate wretch; while he, who would allay

With healthy draughts his thirst, shall drink secure,
Fearless of death, and quaff his water pure.

Some, self deceiv'd, who think their lust of gold
Is but a love of fame, this maxim hold,
No fortune's large enough, since others rate
Your worth proportion'd to a large estate.
Say, for their cure what arts would you employ?

"Let them be wretched, and their choice enjoy."
At Athens liv'd a wight, in days of yore,
Though miserably rich, yet fond of more,
But of intrepid spirit to despise
Th' abusive crowd. "Let them hiss on," he cries,
"While, in my own opinion fully blest,
I count my money, and enjoy my chest."

Burning with thirst, when Tantalus would quaff
The flying waters—Wherefore do you laugh?
Change but the name, of thee the tale is told,
With open mouth when dozing o'er your gold.
On every side the numerous bags are pil'd,
Whose hallow'd stores must never be defil'd
To human use; while you transported gaze,
As if, like pictures, they were form'd to please.

Would you the real use of riches know?
Bread, herbs, and wine are all they can bestow:
Or add, what nature's deepest wants supplies;
This, and no more, thy mass of money buys.
But, with continual watching almost dead,
House-breaking thieves, and midnight fires to dread,

Or the suspected slave's untimely flight
With the dear self; if this be thy delight,
Be it my fate, so Heaven in bounty please,
Still to be poor of blessings such as these!

MISER.

If, by a cold some painful illness bred,
Of other chance confine you to your bed, [friend
Your wealth shall purchase some good-natur'd
Your cordials to prepare, your couch attend,
And urge the doctor to preserve your life,
And give you to your children and your wife.

HORACE.

Nor wife, nor son, that hated life would save,
While all, who know thee, wish thee in the grave.
And canst thou wonder that they prove unkind,
When all thy passions are to gold confin'd?
Nature, 'tis true, in each relation gave
A friend sincere; yet what you thus receive,
If you imagine with unfeeling heart
And careless manners to preserve, your art
As well may teach an ass to scour the plough,
And bend obedient to the forming rein.

Yet somewhere should your views of lucre cease,
Nor let your fears of poverty increase,
As does your wealth; for, since you now possess
Your utmost wish, your labour should be less.

Ummidius once (the tale is quickly told),
So wondrous rich, he measur'd out his gold,

Yet never dress'd him better than a slave;
Afraid of starving ere he reach'd his grave:
But a bold wench; of right virago strain,
Cleft with an axe the wretched wight in twain.

MISER.

By your advice, what party shall I take?
Like Menius live a prodigal, and take Like Mementanus?

HORACE.

Why will you pretend,
With such extremes, your conduct to defend?
The sordid miser when I justly blame,
I would not have you prodigal of fame,
Spendthrift or rake; for sure some difference lies
Between the very fool and very wise;
Some certain mean in all things may be found,
To mark our virtues, and our vices bound.

But to return from whence we have digress'd:
And is the miser, then, alone unblest?
Does he alone applaud his neighbour's fate,
Or pine with envy of his happier state?
To crowds beneath him never turn his eye,
Where in distress the sons of virtue lie,
But, to outspeed the wealthy, bend his force,
As if they stopp'd his own impetuous course!

Thus, from the goal when swift the chariot flies,
The charioteer the bending lash applies,
To overtake the foremost on the plain,
But looks on all behind him with disdain.
From hence, how few, like sated guests, depart
From life's full banquet with a cheerful heart!

But let me stop, lest you suspect I stole
From blind Crispinus this eternal scroll.

SATIRE II.

TO MÆCENAS.

The tribes of minstrels, strolling priests and players,
Perfumers, and buffoons, are all in tears;
For ah! Tigellius, sweetest songster, 's dead,
And sure the soul of bounty with him fled.

Behold a wretch, in opposite extreme,
So fearful of a spendthrift's odious name,
He dare not ev'n a sordid pittance give
To raise a worthy friend, and bid him live.
Or ask another, why in thankless feasts
The wealth of all his frugal sires he wastes;
Then the luxurious treat profuse supplies
With borrow'd sums: "Because I scorn," he cries,
"To be a wretch of narrow spirit deem'd."—
By some condemn'd, by others he's esteem'd.

Fufidius, rich in lands, and large increase
Of growing usury, dreads the foul disgrace
To be call'd rake; and, ere the money's lent,
He prudently deducts his cent per cent.
Then, as he finds the borrower distress,
Cruel demands a higher interest,
But lends profusely to the lavish heir,
Whose guardians prove too frugally severe.
"All-powerful Jove," th' indignant reader cries,
"But his expenses, with his income, rise!"

No—'tis amazing, that this man of pelf
Hath yet so little friendship for himself,
That ev'n the Self-tormentor in the play,
Cruel who drove his much-lov'd son away,
Against the willing tortures of despair,
Could not with wretchedness like his compare!

But say, at what this tedious preface aims—hat fools are ever vicious in extremes.

While soft Malthinus trails a length of train,
see that short robe ridiculously obscene.
Villius with perfumes distracts your head:
With his own scents Gorgonius strikes you dead.
Here are, all other passions who disclaim,
except th' empurpled robe, and wedded dame:
Others their safer, cheaper pleasures choose,
and take a willing mistress from the stew.

When awful Cato saw a noted spark from a night-cellar stealing in the dark,
' Well done, my friend: if love thy breast in-
flame,

indulge it here, and spare the married dame."
' Be mine the s'ken veil," Cupiennius cries,
' Such vulgar prajæ and pleasure I despise."

All ye, who wish some dire mishap may wait
This horning tribe, attend while I relate
What dangers and disasters they sustain,
How few their pleasures, and how mixt with pain.

A desperate leap one luckless cajiff tries;
Forn by the fragrant lash another dies:
Some are by robbers plunder'd as they fly;
Others with gold a wretched safety buy.
Such various woes pursue these sons of lust,
and all, but Galba, own the sentence just.

Far safer they, who venture their estate,
And trade with females of the second rate.
' Yet Ballast rages here with wild desires,
As mad as those which lawless love inspires."
But had he been with less profusion kind,
Had common sense his lavish hand confin'd,
He had not now been wholly lost to shame,
In fortune ruin'd, as undone in fame.
But here's the joy and comfort of his life,
To swear, he never touch'd his neighbour's wife.

Thus, to an actress when with lavish hand
Marsæus gave his mansion-house and land,
' My soul, thank Heaven," he cries, " from guilt
is free;

" The wedded dames are vestal maids for me."
Actress or not, the crime is still the same,
Equal the ruin of estate and fame;
Equal the folly, whether in pursuit
Of wife, or slave, or loose-rob'd prostitute;
Unless you mean, content to be undone,
To hate the person, not the vice to shun.

Of Sylla's wanton daughter when possess'd,
Villius believ'd himself supremely blest:
To a dictator thus to be allied,
Dazzled his senses, and indulg'd his pride:
But sure, if vanity were fairly rated,
Methinks poor Villius was full hardly treated,
When buffeted and stab'd the coxcomb dies,
While in the wanton's arms a scoundrel lies.

But Nature, rich in her own proper wealth
Of youth and beauty, cheerfulness and health,
In her pursuit of happiness, disclaims
The pride of titles, and the pomp of names.
Be thine her wise economy to learn,
And real from affected bliss discern.
Then, lest repentance punish such a life,
Never, ah! never kiss your neighbour's wife:
For see, what thousands mischiefs round you rise,
And few the pleasures, though you gain the prize.

What though Cerinthus dotes upon the girl,
Who flames with emerald green, or snowy pearl,
Is she beyond a common mistress blest
With leg more taper, or a softer breast?

Besides, the public nymph bet v'raish looks,
But all her venal beauties frankly shows,
Nor boasts some happier charm with conscious pride,
Nor strives a vile deformity to hide. [pride,
When skilful jockeys would a courser buy,
They strip him naked to the curious eye;
For oft an eager chapman is betray'd
To buy a founder'd or a spawin'd jade.
While he admires a thin, light-shoulder'd chest,
A little head, broad back, and rising crest.
Th' example's good: then keep it in thy mind,
Nor to the fair-one's faults be over-blind,
Nor gaze with idle rapture on her charms;
" Oh! what a taper leg! what snowy arms!"
For she may hide, whate'er she vainly shows,
Low hips, short waist, splay feet, and hideous length-of nose.

But if you still pursue this dangerous game,
(Perhaps the dangers your desires inflame)
What formidable works around her rise!
Maids, chairmen, footmen, flatterers, guard the
The flowing robe, and closely muffled veil. [prize.
With envious folds the precious thing conceal;
But what from Nature's commoners you buy,
Through the thin robe stands naked to your eye:
Or, if you will be cheated, pay the fair,
With foolish fondness, ere she shows her ware.

As when a sportsman through the snowy waste
Pursues a hare, which he designs to taste,
" So" (sings the rake) " my passion can despise
An easy prey, but follow when it flies."

Yet can these idle versicles remove
The griefs and tortures of this guilty love?
Were it not better wisdom to inquire
How Nature bounds each impotent desire;
What she with ease resigns, or wants with pain,
And thus divide the solid from the vain?
Say, should you your jaws with thirst severely burn,
Would you a cleanly earthen pitcher spurn?
Should hunger on your gnawing entrails seize,
Will turbot only or a peacock please?

Let her be straight and fair; nor wish to have
Or height or colour Nature never gave:
Then, while with joy I woo the pleasing fair,
What nymph, what goddess, can with mine com-
No terrours rise to interrupt my joys, [pare?
No jealous husband, nor the fearful noise
Of bursting doors, nor the loud hideous yelling
Of barking dogs, that shakes the matron's dwelling,
When the pale wanton leaps from off her bed,
The conscious chamber-maid screams out her dread
Of horrid tortures; loudly cries the wife,
" My jointure's lost!"—I tremble for my life:
Unbutton'd, without shoes, I speed away,
Lest in my person, purse, or fame, I pay.
To be surpris'd is, sure, a wretched tale,
And for the truth to Fabius I appeal.

SATIRE III.

TO MÆCENAS.

With this one vice all songsters are possess'd;
Sing they can never at a friend's request,
Yet chant it forth, unask'd, from morn to night—
This vice Tigellius carried to its height.
Cæsar, who might command in firmer tone,
If, by his father's friendship and his own,
He ask'd a song, was sure to ask in vain;
Yet, when the whim prevail'd, in endless strain,

Through the whole feast the jovial catch he plies,
From base to treble o'er the gamut flies.

Nothing was firm, or constant, in the man;
He, sometimes, like a frighted oward ran,
Whose foes are at his heels; then solemn stalk'd,
As if at Juno's festival he walk'd.
Now with two hundred slaves he crowd'd his train;
Now walks with ten. In high and haughty strain,
At morn, of tetrarchs and of kings he prates;
At night—"A three-legg'd table, O ye fates!
A little shall the sacred salt to hold,
And clothes, though coarse, to keep me from the cold."

Yet give the man, thus frugal, thus content,
Ten thousand pounds, and every shilling's spent
In five short days. He drank the night away
Till rising dawn, then snor'd out all the day.
Sure such a various creature ne'er was known.—
"Has Horace, then, no vices of his own?"
That I have vices, frankly I confess,
But of a different kind, and somewhat less.

Mænius, behind his back, at Novius rail'd,
"What! don't you know yourself, or think conceal'd

From us, who know you; what a life you live?"
Mænius replies, "Indulgent, I forgive
The follies I commit." This foolish love
And criminal, our censure should reprove.
For wherefore, while you carelessly pass by
Your own worst vices with unheeding eye,
Why so sharp-sighted in another's fame,
Strong as an eagle's ken, or dragon's beam?
But know, that he with equal spleen shall view,
With equal rigour shall your faults pursue.

Your friend is passionate; perhaps unfit
For the brisk petulance of modern wit.
His hair ill-cut, his robe that awkward flows,
Or his large shoes, to raiillery expose
The man you love; yet is not possess
Of virtues, with which very few are blest.
While underneath this rude, uncooth disguise,
A genius of extensive knowledge lies. [care

Search your own breast, and mark with honest
What seeds of folly Nabare planted here,
Or custom rais'd; for an uncultur'd field
Shall for the fire its thorns and thistles yield.

And yet a shorter method we may find,
As lovers, to their fair-one fondly blind,
Even on her foulness can delighted gaze;
For Hæmus's wea can good Balbinus please.
Oh! were our weakness to our friends the same,
And stamp'd by virtue with some honour'd name!

Not should we to their faults be more severe,
Than an indulgent father to his heir:
If with distorted eyes the urchin glares,
"Oh! the dear boy, how prettily he stares!"
Is he of dwarfish and abortive size?
"Sweet little moppet!" the fond father cries:
Or is th' unshapen'd cub deform'd and lame?
He kindly lisp him o'er some tender name.

Thus, if your friend's too frugally severe,
Let him a wise economist appear.
Is he, perhaps, impertinent and vain?
"The pleasant creature means to entertain."
Is he too free to prate, or frankly rude?
"The manly plainness all, and fortitude."
Is he too warm? "No: spirited and bold."
Thus shall we gain new friends, and keep the old.
But we distort their virtue to a crime,
And by th' unshapen'd vessel to begrime.

Have we a modest friend, and void of art?
"He's a fat-headed wretch, and cold of heart."
While we converse with an ill-natur'd age;
Where calumny and envy lawless rage,
Is there a man by long experience wise,
Still on his guard, nor open to surprise?
His cautious wisdom and prudential fear
Shall artifice and false disguise appear.

If any one of simple, thoughtless kind,
(Such as you oft your careless poet find)
Who life's positer manners never knew,
If, while we read, or some fond scheme pursue,
He tease us with his mere impertinence,
We cry, "The creature wants even common sense."
Alas! what laws of how severe a strain,
Against ourselves we thoughtlessly ordain!
For we have all our vices, and the best
Is he, who with the fewest is oppress.

A kinder friend, who balances thy good
And bad together, as in truth he should;
If happy thy good qualities prevail,
Inclines indulgent to the sinking scale.
For like indulgence let his errors plead,
His merits be with equal measure weigh'd;
For he, who hopes his bite shall not offend,
Should overlook the pimples of his friend,
And even in justice to his own defects,
At least should grant the pardon he expects.
But since we never from the breast of fools
Can foot their passions; yet while reason rules,
Let it hold forth its scales with equal hand,
Justly to punish, as the crimes demand.

If a poor slave, who takes away your plate,
Lick the warm sauce, or half-cold fragments eat,
Yet should you crush the wretch, we swear
Not Labeo's madness can with yours compare.
Is the crime less, or less the want of sense,
Thus to resent a trivial, slight offence?
Forgive the man you lov'd, or you'll appear
Of joyless kind, ill-natur'd, and severe;
Yet you detest him, and with horror shun,
As debtors from the ruthless Ruso run,
Who damn the wretches on th' appointed day
His interest or principal to pay,
Or else, like captives, stretch the listening ear
His tedious tales of history to hear.

A friend has foul'd my couch: ah! deep disgrac'd!
Or off the table thrown some high-wrought vase,
Or, hungry, snatch'd a chicken off my plate;
Shall I for this a good companion hate?
What if he robb'd me, or his trust betray'd,
Or broke the sacred promise he had made?

Who hold all crimes alike are deep distress,
When we appeal to Truth's impartial test.
Sense, custom, social good, from whence arise
All forms of right and wrong, the fact denies.

When the first mortath crawling rose to birth,
Speechless and wretched, from their mother Earth,
For caves and scoons, then the food of life,
With nails and fists they held a bloodless strife;
But soon improv'd, with clubs they bolder fought,
And various arms, which aid experience wrought,
Till words, to fix the wandering voice, were found,
And names impress'd a meaning upon sound.
Thenceforth they cease from war; their towns en-
With formidable walls, and laws compose [close
To strike the thief and highwayman with dread,
A vindicate the sacred marriage-bed.
For woman, long ere Helen's fatal charms,
Destructive woman! set the world in arms:

ut the first heroes died unknown to fame,
like beasts who ravish'd the uncertain dame;
Then, as the stoutest bull commands the rest,
he weaker by the stronger was oppress.

Turn o'er the world's great annals, and you find,
that laws were first invented by mankind to stop oppression's rage. For though we learn;
y nature, good from evil to discern;
That we should wise pursue, or cautious fly;
et can bte never, with a constant eye,
f legal justice mark each nice extreme;
or can right reason prove the crime the same,
o rob a garden, or, by fear unaw'd,
o steal, by night, the sacred things of God.

Then let the punishment be fairly weigh'd
gainst the crime; nor let the wretch be say'd,
Who scarce deserv'd the lash.—I cannot fear,
hat you shall prove too tenderly severe,
While you assert all vices are the same;
ad threaten, that were yours the power supreme,
obbers and thieves your equal rage should feel,
prooted by the same avenging steel.

If your wise man's a shoemaker profess,
landsome and rich, of monarchy possess;
Why wish for what you have?

troic.

Yet hold, my friend,
ad better to the Stolic's sense attend.
or though the wise nor shoes nor slippers made;
le's yet a skilful shoemaker by trade:
hus, though Hermogenes may sing no more,
le knows the whole extent of music's power;
Menus thus turn'd lawyer in his pride,
is shop shut up, his razors thrown aside,
Was still a barber: so the wise alone
s of all trades, though exercising none, ad reigns a monarch, though without a throne.

HORACE.

Great king of kings, unless you drive away his pressing crowd, the boys in wanton play
Will pluck you by the beard, while you shall growl,
Fretch as thou art, and burst in spleen of soul.
a short, while in a farthing both you reign,
With only one poor life-guard in your train;
While the few friends, with whom I joy to live,
ool as I am, my follies can forgive,
will to them the same indulgence show,
ad bliss like mine thy kingship ne'er shall know.

SATIRE IV.

THE comic poets, in its earliest age
Who form'd the manners of the Grecian stage,
The there a villain, who might justly claim better right of being damn'd to fame,
ake, cut-throat, thief, whatever was his crime,
hey freely stigmatiz'd the wretch in rhyme.
From their example whole Lucilius rose,
bo different measures, different verse he chose.
le rallied with a gay and easy air,
ut rude his numbers, and his style severe:
le weakly fancied it a glorious feat
nd as his verses like a torrent roll, he stream runs muddy, and the water's foul-
e rattled rhymes; but lazy and mist
r writing well; for such, I owe, he writ.

VOL. XIX.

Crispinus thus my littleness defines:
"Here make the smallest bet," the boaster cries.

CRISPINUS.

Pen, ink, and paper—name your place and time;
Then try, friend Flaccus, who can fastest rhyme.

HORACE.

Thank Heaven, that form'd me of an humble
No wit, nor yet to prattling much inclin'd, [kind;
While thou shalt imitate the winds, that blow
From lungs of leather, till the metal flow.

Thrice happy Flautius, of his own free grace
Who in Apollo's temple hangs his face,
And gilds his works to view; while I wish fear
Repeat my verses to the public ear;
Because by few such works as mine are read,
Conscious of meriting the lash they dread.

Take me a man, at venture, from the crowd,
And he's ambitious, covetous, or proud.
One burns to madness for the wedded dame;
Intemperate lusts another's breast inflame.
The silver vase with pleasure one admires,
While Albius o'er a bronze-antique expires;
The venturesome merchant, from the rising day
To regions warm'd beneath the setting ray,
Like dust collected by a whirlwind, flies
To save his self, or bid the mass arise.

All these the poet dread, his rhymes detest—
"Yonder he drives—avoid that furious beast;
If he may have his just, he never eases
At whose expense, nor his best friend he spares;
And if he once, in his malignant vein,
The cruel paper with livectives stain,
The slaves, who carry water through the street,
To his charm'd ear his verses must repeat."

Now hear this short defence. For my own part,
I claim no portion of the poet's art.
'Tis not enough to close the flowing line,
And in ten syllables your sense confine,
Or write in metre prosaic rhymes like me,
That can deserve the name of poetry.

Is there a man, whom real genius fires,
Whom the divine soul of verse inspires;
Who talks true greatness; let him boldly claim
The sacred honours of a poet's name.

Some therefore ask, "Can comedy be thought
A real poem, since it may be wrought
In style and subject without fire or force,
And, bate the numbers, is but mere discourse?"
But yet in passion'd tone the sire can chide
His spendthrift son, who spurns the portion'd bride,
And keeps a common wench, or deep in drink
Reels in fair day-light (shameful!) with his link.
Yet could Pomponius from his father hear,
Were he alive, a lecture less severe?

'Tis not enough your language to refine,
When, if you break the measures of the line,
In common life an angry father's rage
Is but the same as Demes's on the stage.

Take from Lucilius' verses, or from mine,
The cadences, and measures of the line,
Then change their order, and the words transpose,
No more the scatter'd poet's limbs it shows;
Not so—When hideous Discord bursts the bars,
And iron gates, to pour forth all her wars.

Of this enough; some future work shall show,
Whether 'tis real poetry, or no.
Now tell me, whether satire should appear,
With reason, such an object of your fear?

Sulcius, and Capridæ, seroest of their trade,
Hearse with the virulence, with which they plead;
When thro' the streets they stalk with libels arm'd,
Mark how the thieves and robbers are alarm'd;
But yet the man of honest hands and pure
May scora them both, in innocence securi:
Or though like Cælius you a villain be,
I'm no informer: whence your fears of me?
With printers and their shops I never deal;
No rubric pillar sets my works to sale,
O'er which the hands of vulgar readers sweat,
Or whose soft strains Tigellius can repeat.
Even by my friends compell'd, I read my lays,
Nor every place nor every audience please.

Full many bards the public forum choose
Where to recite the labours of their Muse;
Or vaulted baths, that best preserve the sound,
While sweetly floats the voice in echoes round.
The coxcombs never think at whose expense
They thus indulge the dear impertinence.

"But you in libels, mischievous, delight,
And never, but in spleen of genius, write."
Is there, with whom I live, who knows my heart,
Who taught you how to aim this venom'd dart?

He, who malignant tears an absent friend,
Or, when attack'd by others, don't defend;
Who trivial bursts of laughter strives to raise,
And courts of prating petulance the praise;
Of things he never saw who tells his tale,
And friendship's secrets knows not to conceal—
This man is vile: here, Roman, fix your mark;
His soul is black, as his complexion's dark.

At tables, crowded with a dozen guests,
Some one shall scatter round his frigid jests,
And only spare his host, until the bowl,
Fair friend of truth, unlocks his inmost soul;
Yet, though a cruel joker you detest,
He seems a courteous, well-bred, easy guest.
But if in idle razzlery I said,
Rufflus with perfumes distracts my head,
While foul Gergonias breathes a ranker air,
You think me most envenom'd and severe.

If we, by chance, that thief Petillius name,
You, as your custom is, defend his fame.
"Petillius is my friend; from early youth
Cheerful we liv'd together, and in truth
I have been much indebted to his power,
And I rejoice to find his danger o'er.
But in the name of wonder be it said,
At that same trial how he sav'd his head!"
Such rancour this, of such a poisonous vein,
As never, never, shall my paper stain;
Much less infect my heart, if I may dare
For my own heart, in any thing, to swear.

Yet some indulgence I may justly claim,
If too familiar with another's fame.
The best of fathers, on my youthful breast,
The detestation of a vice impress
By strong examples. Would he have me live
Content with what his industry could give,
In frugal, sparing sort, "Behold, my son,
Young Abias there, how wretchedly undone!
Yet no mean lesson is the spendthrift's fate!"
To caution youth from squandering their estate."
To fight me from the harlot's vagrant bed,
"Behold Soctanias, and his ruin dread!"
That I might ne'er pursue the wedded dame,
"A lawful Venus will indulge your flame.
My son, by poor Trebonius be advis'd;
Sure, 'tis no pleasant tale to be surpris'd.

"Twixt right and wrong the learned may decide,
With wise distinctions may your conduct guide;
Be mine the common wisdom, that inspires
The frugal manners of our ancient sires,
And, while your youth may yet a tator claim,
To guard your virtue, and preserve your fame;
But soon as time confirms, with stronger tone,
Your strength and mind, your conduct be your own."

Thus did he form my youth with lenient hand.
When he for virtue urg'd the soft command,
Pointing some awful senator to view,
"His grave example constantly pursue."
Would he dissuade me? "Can you doubt," he cries,
"That equal ruin and dishonour rise
From such an action, when that scoundrel's name
Is branded with the flagrant marks of shame?"
A neighbour's funeral, with dire affright,
Checks the sick man's intemperate appetite;
So is the shame of others oft impress
With wholesome terrors on the youthful breast.

Thus, pure from more pernicious crimes I live:
Some venial frailties you may well forgive,
For such I own I have; and yet even these,
A length of time, although by slow degrees,
A friend, whose candour freely may forgive,
Or my own reason, shall perhaps remove;
For in my bed, or in the colonnade
Sauntering, I call reflection to my aid.

"This was well done. Here happiness attends.
This conduct makes me pleasing to my friends.
Were that man's actions of a beauteous kind?
Oh! may I never be to such inclin'd!"

Thus, silently I talk my conduct o'er,
Or trifle with the Muse an idle hour;
For which, among my frailties, I demand
Forgiveness, and shall call a powerful hand,
If you refuse, of poets to my aid,
(Well fraught with numbers is the rhyming trade)
To force you, like the proselyting Jews,
To be, like us, a brother of the Muse.

SATIRE V.

LEAVING imperial Rome, my course I steer
To poor Aricia, and its moderate cheer.
From all the Greeks, in rhetorician lore,
The prize of learning my companion bore.
To Forum-Appii thence we steer, a place
Stuff'd with rank boatmen, and with vintners base,
And laggard into two days' journey broke
What were but one to less-encumber'd folk:
The Appian road, however, yields most pleasure,
To those who choose to travel at their leisure.
The water here was of so foul a stream,
Against my stomach I a war proclaim,
And wait, tho' not with much good-humour wait,
While with keen appetites my comrades eat.

The Night o'er Earth now spread her dusky shade,
And thro' the Heavens her starry train display'd;
What time, between the slaves and boatmen rise
Quarrels of clamorous rout. The boatman cries,
"Step in, my masters!" when with open throat,
"Enough, you scoundrel! will you sink the boat?"
Thus, while the mule is harness'd, and we pay
Our freights, an hour in wrangling slips away.

The fenny frogs with croakings hoarse and deep,
And gnats, loud buzzing, drive away our sleep,
Drench'd in the lees of wine, the wat'ry swain
And passenger, in loud alternate strain,

hant forth the absent fair, who wrings his breast,
 fill wearied passenger retires to rest.
 Our clumsy bargeman sends his mule to graze,
 And the tough cable to a rock belays,
 Then smores supine; but when at rising light
 Her boat stood still, up starts a hair-brain'd wight;
 With shallow cudgel breaks the bargeman's pate,
 And brings the mule at a well-favour'd rate.
 Hence onward labouring with a world of pain,
 it ten, Peronia, we thy fountain gain:
 here land and bathe; then after dinner creep three tedious miles, and climb the rocky steep whence Anxur shines. Mæcenus was to meet
 Cocceius here, to settle things of weight;
 'or they had oft in embassy been join'd,
 and reconcil'd the masters of mankind.
 here while I bath'd my eyes with cooling ointment

they both arriv'd, according to appointment;
 Cocceius too, a man of worth approv'd,
 had no man more by Antony, below'd.

Laughing we leave an entertainment rare,
 the paltry pomp of Fundi's foolish mayor,
 the scrivener Luscius; now with pride elate,
 With incense fum'd, and big with robes of state,
 from thence our wearied troop at Formis seats,
 Lucina's lodgers, and Fonteinus' guests.
 Next rising morn with double joy we greet,
 'or Plotius, Varius, Virgil, here we meet:
 'ere spirits these; the world no purer knows;
 'or none my heart with more affection glows:
 how oft did we embrace! our joys how great!
 'or sure no blessing in the power of fate
 can be compar'd, in sanity of mind,
 'or friends of such companionable kind.

Near the Campanian bridge that night we lay,
 there commissaries our expence defray.
 Early next morn to Capua we came;
 Lucæus goes to tennis; hurtful game
 to a weak stomach, and to tender eyes, so down to sleep with Virgil, Horace lies.
 Then by Cocceius we were nobly treated,
 whose house above the Caudian tavern's seated.

And now, O Muse, in faithful numbers tell the memorable squabble that befel, when Messius and Sarmentus join'd in fight,
 and whence descended each illustrious wight.
 Messius, of high descent, from—Osci came;
 his mistress might her slave Sarmentus claim.
 from such fam'd ancestry our champions rise—
 Hear me, thou horse-fac'd rogue!" Sarmentus
 cries;

'ere laugh; when Messius, throwing up his head,
 accepts the challenge. "O!" Sarmentus said,
 If you can threaten now, what would you do,
 had not the horn been rooted out, that grew all in thy front?" A gasp, of deep disgrace, had stain'd the grisly honours of his face:
 then on his country's infamous disease,
 and his own face, his ribaldry displays;
 eyes him the one-eyed Cyclop's part to dance,
 see he nor mask nor tragic buskins wants.

Messius replied, in virulence of strain:
 Did you to Saturn consecrate your chain?
 how you were made a scrivener since your fight,
 that can never hurt your lady's right.
 it, prithee, wherefore did you run away?
 it thinks, a single pound of bread a day might such a sleek, thin-gutted rogue content:"
 and thus the jovial length of night we spent.

At our next inn our host was almost burn'd,
 While some lean thrushes at the fire he turn'd.
 Through his old kitchen rolls the god of fire,
 And to the roof the vagrant flames aspire.
 But hunger all our terrors overcome,
 We fly to save our meat, and quench the flame.
 Apulia now my native mountains shows,
 Where the north wind burns froze, and parching
 blows;

Nor could we well have climb'd the steep height,
 Did we not at a neighbouring village bait,
 Where from green wood the smouldering flames
 arise,

And with a smoky sorrow fill our eyes.

In chariots thence at a large rate we came
 Eight leagues, and baited at a town, whose name
 Cannot in verse and measures be express'd,
 But may by marks and tokens well be guess'd.
 Its water, nature's cheapest element,
 Is bought and sold; its bread most excellent;
 Which wary travellers provide with care,
 And on their shoulders to Caanuis bear,
 Whose bread is gritty, and its wealthiest stream
 Poor as the town's of unpoetic name.

Here Varius leaves us, and with tears he goes:
 With equal tenderness our sorrow flows.

Onward to Rubi wearily we toil'd,
 The journey long, the road with rain was spoil'd.
 To Barium, fam'd for fish, we reach'd next day.
 The weather fairer, but much worse the way.
 Then water-curs'd Egræta gave us joke,
 And laughter great, to hear the moon-struck folk
 Assert, if incense on their altars lay,
 Without the help of fire it melts away.
 The sons of circumcision may receive
 The wondrous tale, which I shall ne'er believe;
 For I have better learn'd, in blissful ease
 That the good gods enjoy immortal days,
 Nor anxiously their native skies forsake,
 When miracles the laws of nature break.

From thence our travels to Brundisium bend,
 Where our long journey and my paper end.

SATIRE VI.

TO MÆCENAS.

Two, since the Lydians fill'd the Tuscan coasts,
 No richer blood than yours Etruria boasts;
 Though your great ancestors have armies led,
 You don't, as many do, with scorn upbraid
 The man of birth unknown, or turn the nose
 On me, who from a race of slaves arose:
 While you regard not, from what low degree
 A man's descended, if his mind be free;
 Convinc'd, that long before th' ignoble reign
 And power of Tullius, from a servile strain
 Full many rose for virtue high renown'd,
 By worth ennobled, and with honours crown'd:
 While he, who boasts that ancient race his own,
 Which drove the haughty Tarquin from the throne,
 Is vile and worthless in the people's eyes:
 The people, who, you know, bestow the prize
 To men most worthless; and, like slaves to fame,
 With foolish reverence hail a titled name,
 And, rapt, with awe-struck admiration gaze
 When the long race its images displays.

But how shall we, who differ far and wide
 From the mere vulgar, this great-point decide?

For grant, the crowd some high-birth'd scoundrel
choose,

And to the low-born man of worth refuse
(Because low-born) the honours of the state,
Shall we from thence their vice or virtue rate?
Were I expell'd the senate-house with scorn,
Justly, perhaps, because thus meanly born,
I fondly wander'd from my native sphere;
Yet shall I with less real worth appear?
Chain'd to her beamy car, Fame drags along
The mean, the great, an undistinguish'd throng.

Poor Tillius, when compell'd, in luckless hour,
To quit your purple robe and tribune's power,
A larger share of envy was thy fate,
Which had been lessen'd in a private state.
For in black sandals when a coccomb's drest,
When floats the robe empurpled down his breast,
Instant, "What man is this?" he round him hears,
"And who his father?" As when one appears
Sick of your fever, Barrus, to desire
That all the world his beauty should admire,
Anxious our girls inquire, "What mien and air,
What leg and foot he has, what teeth and hair!"
So 'he, who promises to guard the state,
The gods, the temples, and th' imperial seat,
Makes every mortal ask his father's name,
And not less curious of his mother's fame.

"And shall a Syrian's son, like you, presume
To hurl the free-born citizens of Rome
From the Tarpeian rock's tremendous height,
Or to the hangman Cadmus give their fate?"

TILLIUS.

My colleague sits below me one degree;
For Novius, like my father, was made free.

NOBACE.

Shall you for this a true Messala seem,
And rise a Paulus in your own esteem?
But when two hundred waggons crowd the street,
And three long funerals in possession meet,
Beyond the sifes and horns his voice he raises,
And sure such strength of lungs a wondrous praise

As for myself, a freed-man's son confess, [is.
A freed-man's son, the public scorn and jest,
That now with you I joy the social hour,
That once a Roman legion own'd my power;
But though they envied my command in war,
Justly perhaps, yet sure 'tis different far
To gain your friendship, where no servile art,
Where only men of merit claim a part.

Nor yet to chance this happiness I owe;
Friendship like yours it had not to bestow.
First, my best Virgil, then my Varius told,
Among my friends what character I hold:
When introduc'd, in few and faltering words
(Such as an infant modesty affords)

I did not tell you my descent was great,
Or that I wander'd round my country-seat
On a proud steed in richer pastures bred:
But what I really was, I frankly said.

Short was your answer, in your usual strain;
I take my leave, nor wait on you again,
Till, nine months past, engag'd and bid to hold
A place among your nearer friends enroll'd.
An honour this, methinks, of nobler kind,
That innocent of heart and pure of mind,
Though with no titled birth, I gain'd his love,
Whose judgment can discern, whose choice approve,
If some few venial faults deform my soul,
(Like a fair face when spotted with a mole),

If none with avarice justly brand my fame,
With sordidness, or deeds too vile to name:
If pure and innocent: if dear (forgive
These little praises) to my friends I live,
My father was the cause, who, though maintain'd
By a lean farm but poorly, yet disdain'd
The country schoolmaster, to whose low care
The mighty captain sent his high-born heir,
With satchel, copy-book, and pelf to pay
Thè wretched teacher on th' appointed day.

To Rome by this bold father was I brought,
To learn those arts which well-born youth as taught,

So dress'd and so attended, you would swear
I was some senator's expensive heir:
Himself my guardian, of unblemish'd truth,
Among my tutors would attend my youth,
And thus preserv'd my chastity of mind
(That prime of virtue in its highest kind)
Not bely pure from guilt, but ev'n the shame
That might with vile suspicion hurt my fame;
Nor fear'd to be reproach'd, although my fate
Should fix my fortune in some meaner state,
From which some trivial perquisites arise,
Or make me, like himself, collector of excise.

For this my heart, far from complaining, pay
A larger debt of gratitude and praise;
Nor, while my senses hold, shall I repent
Of such a father, nor with pride resent,
As many do, th' involunt'ry disgrace,
Not to be born of an illustrious race.
But not with theirs my sentiments agree,
Or language; for, if nature should decree,
That we from any stated point might live
Our former years, and to our choice should give
The sires, to whom we wish'd to be allied,
Let others choose to gratify their pride;
While I, contented with my own, resign
The titled honours of an ancient line.

This may be madness in the people's eyes,
But, in your judgment, not, perhaps, unwise;
That I refuse to bear the pomp of state,
Unus'd and much unequal to the weight.

Instant a larger fortune must be made;
To purchase votes my low addresses paid;
Whether a jaunt or journey I propose,
With me a crowd of new companions goes,
While, anxious to complete a length of train,
Domestics, horses, chariots, I maintain.
But now, as chance or pleasure is my guide,
Upon my bob-tail'd mule alone I ride.
Gall'd is his crupper with my wallet's weight;
His shoulder shows his rider's awkward seat.

Yet no penurious vileness e'er shall stain
My name, as when, great praetor, with your train
Of five poor slaves, you carry where you diss
Your travelling kitchen, and your flask of wine.

This have I greater blessings in my power,
Than you, proud senator, and thousands more.
Alone I wander, as by fancy led,
I cheapen herbs, or ask the price of bread;
I listen, while diviners tell their tale,
Then homeward hasten to my frugal meal,
Herbs, pulse, and pancakes; each a separate plate;

While three domestics at my supper wait.
A bowl on a white marble-table stands,
Two goblets, and a ewer to wash my hands;
An hallow'd cup of true Campanian clay,
My pure libations to the gods to pay.

then retire to rest, nor anxious fear
 before dread Marryas early to appear,
 Whose very statue swears it cannot brook
 the meanness of that slave-born judge's look.
 sleep till ten; then take a walk, or choose a book, perhaps, or trifle with the Muse;
 or cheerful exercise and manly toil point my body with the pliant oil, but not with such as Natta's, when he vamps his filthy limbs, and robs the public lamps.

But when the Sun pours down his fiercer fire,
 and bids me from the toilsome sport retire, haste to bathe, then decently regale thy craving stomach with a frugal meal, enough to nourish nature for a day,
 then trifle my domestic hours away.

Such is the life from had ambition free;
 such comfort has the man low-born like me;
 With which I feel myself more truly blest, than if my sires the conqueror's power possess.

SATIRE VII.

How mongrel Persius, in his wrathful mood,
 that outlaw'd wretch, Rupilius King, pursu'd
 With poisonous filth, and venom all his own,
 to barbers and to bear-eyed folk is known.

Persius had wealth by foreign traffic gain'd,
 and a vexatious suit with King maintain'd.
 resumptuous, vain, and obstinate the wight, conquering even King in virulence of spite;
 a bitterness of speech outstripp'd the wind,
 and left the swift-tongued Barrus far behind.

Now to the King returns our wandering tale,
 When all fair means of reconciliation fail
 For men are obstinate when war's proclaim'd, as they with inward courage are inflam'd;
 When Hector and Achilles fierce engag'd,
 fire was the conflict, and to death they rag'd;
 and why? because the gallant thirst of fame,
 the love of glory, was in both extreme.
 as if a quarrel between cowards rise,
 'tween chiefs of less heroic size,
 saucy to Diomed is forc'd to yield,
 the dastard buys his peace, and quits the field).

What time o'er Asia with prætorial sway great Brutus rul'd, began this dire affray.
 Persius and King, intrepid pair, engage, more equal champions never mounted stage)
 and now they rush impetuous into court, mine was the sight, and delicate the sport.
 Persius begins; loud bursts of laughter rise;
 he praises Brutus, Brutus, to the skies,
 Brutus, like Sol, o'er Asia pours the day;
 his friends are stars, and healthful is their ray,
 except the King; he like the dog-star reigns,
 that dog of Heaven, detested by the swains."
 has rush'd he onward like a winter-flood,
 hat tears its banks, and sweeps away the wood.

To this impetuous bitterness of tide
 the King with equal virulence replied.
 vine-dresser he was, of rustic tone,
 horn off the traveller was forc'd to own vinecible; with clamorous voice oppress,
 then "Cuckow, cuckow," was the standing jest.
 But, with Italian vinegar imbued,
 the sour-tongued mongrel the dispute renew'd;

"Let me conjure thee, by the powers divine,
 Since 'tis the glory, Brutus, of thy line
 To slaughter Kings, be this thy glorious deed,
 That this same King beneath thy vengeance bleed."

SATIRE VIII.

In days of yore our godship stood
 A very worthless log of wood.

The joiner doubting, or to shape us
 Into a stool, or a Priapus,
 At length resolv'd, for reasons wise,
 Into a god to bid me rise;
 And now to birds and thieves I stand
 A terror great. With ponderous hand,
 And something else as red as scarlet,
 I fright away each sliching varlet.
 The birds, that view with awful dread
 The reeds, fast stuck into my head,
 Far from the garden take their flight,
 Nor on the trees presume to light.

In coffins vile the herd of slaves
 Were hither brought to-crowd their graves;
 And once in this detested ground
 A common tomb the vulgar found;
 Buffoons and spendthrifts, vile and base,
 Together rotted here in peace.

A thousand feet the front extends,
 Three hundred deep in rear it bends,
 And yonder column plainly shows
 No more unto its heirs it goes.
 But now we breathe a purer air,
 And walk the sunny terraces fair,
 Where once the ground with bones was white,
 With human bones, a ghastly sight!

But, oh! nor thief, nor savage beast,
 That us'd these gardens to infest,
 E'er gave me half such care and pains
 As they, who turn poor people's brains
 With venom'd drugs and magic lay—
 These I can never fright away;
 For when the beautiful queen of night
 Up-lifts her head adorn'd with light,
 Hither they come, pernicious crones!
 To gather poisonous herbs and bones.

Canidia with dishevell'd hair
 (Black was her robe, her feet were bare)
 With Sagana, infernal dame!
 Her elder sister, hither came,
 With yellings dire they fill'd the place,
 And hideous pale was either's face.
 Soon with their nails they scrap'd the ground,
 And fill'd a magic trench profound
 With a black lamb's thick-streaming gore,
 Whose members with their teeth they tore,
 That they may charm the sprites to tell
 Some curious anecdote from Hell.

The beldams then two figures brought:
 Of wool and wax the forms were wrought;
 The wroffen was erect and tall,
 And scourg'd the waxen image small,
 Which in a suppliant, servile mood
 With dying air just gasping stood.

On Hecate one beldam calls;
 The other to the Furies bawls,
 While serpents crawl along the ground,
 And hell-born bitches howl around.
 The blushing Moon, to shun the sight,
 Behind a tomb withdrew her light.

Oh! if I lie, may revens shed
 Their ordure on my sacred head!
 May thieves and prostitutes and rakes
 Beneath my nose erect a jakes!
 Not to be tedious, or repeat
 How flats and sharps in concert meet,
 With which the ghosts and hags maintain
 A dialogue of passing strain;
 Or how, to hide the tooth of snake
 And beard of wolf, the ground they break;
 Or how the fire of magic seiz'd
 The waxen form, and how it blaz'd;
 Mark! how my vengeance I pursu'd
 For all I heard, for all I view'd.

Loud as a bladder bursts its wind
 Dreadful I thunder'd from behind.
 To town they scamper'd struck with fear,
 This lost her teeth, and that her hair.
 They dropp'd the bracelets from their arms,
 Their incantations, herbs, and charms;
 Whoe'er had seen them in their flight,
 Had burst with laughing at the sight.

SATIRE IX.

MORNO, as wont, on this and that,
 Such trifles, as I know not what,
 When late the street I saunter'd through,
 A wight, whose name I hardly know,
 Approaching pertly makes me stand,
 And thus accosts me, hand in hand:
 "How do you do, my sweetest man?"
 Quoth I, "As well as mortal can,
 And my best wishes yours:"—when he
 Would follow—"What's your will with me?"
 "That one of your profound discerning Should know me: I'm a man of learning."
 "Why, then, be sure upon that score
 You merit my regard the more."
 Impatient to discard the fop,
 One while I run, another stop,
 And whisper, as he presses near,
 Some nothing in my servant's ear.

But while at every pore I sweat'd,
 And thus in muttering silence fretted—
 "Bolanus, happy in a skull
 Of proof, impenetrably dull,
 O for a portion of thy brains!"—
 He on the town and streets and lanes
 His prating, praising talent tried,
 And, when I answer'd not, he cried,
 "Aye, 'tis too plain; you can't deceive me,
 You miserably wish to leave me,
 But I shall never quit you so:
 Command me—whither would you go?"
 "You do me honour—but, in short,
 There's not the least occasion for't.
 I visit one—to cut the strife—
 "You never saw him in your life;
 Nor would I lead you such a round—
 He lives above a mile of ground
 Beyond the Tiber."—"Never talk
 Of distance, for I love a walk.
 I never have the least enjoyment
 In idleness: I want employment.
 Come on; I must and will attend
 Your person to your journey's end."
 Like vicious ass, that fretting bears
 A wicked load, I hang my ears;

While he, renewing his civilities,
 "If well I know my own abilities,
 Not Viscus, though your friend of yore,
 Not Varius could engage you more;
 For who can write melodious lays
 With greater elegance or ease?
 Who moves with smoother grace his limbs
 While through the mazy dance he swims?
 Besides, I sing to that degree,
 Hermogenes might envy me."

"Have you no mother, sister, friends, Whose welfare on your health depends?"—
 "Not one; I saw them all by turns Securely settled in their urns."
 Thrice happy they, secure from pain!
 And I thy victim now remain:
 Dispatch me; for my goodly-nurse
 Early presag'd this heavy curse:
 She cou'd it by the sieve and shears,
 And now it falls upon my ears—
 Nor poison fell, with ruin stor'd,
 Nor horrid point of hostile sword,
 Nor pleurisy, nor asthma cough,
 Nor cripple-gout, shall cut him off:
 A noisy tongue, and babbling breath,
 Shall tease and talk my child to death.
 But if he would avert his fate,
 When he arrives at man's estate,
 Let him avoid, as he would hanging,
 Your folks long-winded in haranguing.

We came to Vesta's about ten,
 And he was bound in person then
 To stand a suit, or by the laws
 He must have forfeit his cause.
 "Sir, if you love me, step aside
 A little into court," he cried.
 "If I can stand it out," quoth I,
 "Or know the practice, let me die:
 Besides, I am oblig'd to go
 Precisely to the place you know."
 "I am divided what to do,
 Whether to leave my cause, or you."
 "Sir, I beseech you, spare your pains.
 Your humble servant—" "By no means."
 I follow, for he leads the way;

'Tis death; but captives must obey.
 Then he renews his plaguy strain, as
 "How stands your friendship with Maccenas?"
 For friendships, he contracts but few,
 And shows in that his judgment true.
 "Commend me to your brother-bard,
 No man has play'd a surer card.
 But you should have a man of art;
 One who might act an under-part,
 If you were pleas'd to recommend
 The man I mention, to your friend,
 Sir, may I never see the light
 But you shall rout your rivals quite!"

"We live got there, as you suppose,
 On such precarious terms as those:
 No family was ever purer;
 From such infections none secur'd.
 It never hurts me in the least,
 That one excels in wealth, or taste;
 Each person there of course inherits
 A place proportion'd to his merits."
 "'Tis wonderful! and, to be brief,
 A thing almost beyond belief."
 "But, whether you believe or no,
 The matter is exactly so."

This adds but fuel to the fire,
he more you kindle my desire to kiss his hand, and pay my court."—

Assail, and you shall take the fort;
such is the vigour of your wit,
and he is one that can submit;
he first attack is therefore nice,
he matter is to break the ice."

I shan't be wanting there," he cried,
I'll bribe his servants to my side;
no day shut out, still onward press,
and watch the seasons of access;
in private haunt, in public meet,
I'll escort him through the street.
There's nothing gotten in this life without a world of toil and strife!"

While thus he racks my tortur'd ears, much-lov'd friend of mine appears,
Fuscus, one who knew my sweet companion through and through,
he stop, exchanging "so and so:"

Whence come, and whither do you go?"

I then began in woful wise to nod my head, distort my eyes,
and pull his renegade sleeve,
that he would grant me a reprieve;
but he was absent all the while,
salacious with a leering smile.

Provok'd at his dissimulation, burst with spleen and indignation.

I know not what you had to tell
in private."—"I remember well:
it shall a day of business choose,
his is the sabbath of the Jews;
you would not thus offend the leathern
curtain'd assemblies of the brethren"—

I have no scruples, by your leave, on that account."—"But, sir, I have am a little superstitious, like many of the crowd capricious:
forgive me, if it be a crime,
and I shall talk another time"—

Oh! that so black a sur should rise!
away the cruel creature flies,
and leaves me panting for my life
ghost beneath the butcher's knife.

At last, by special act of grace,
he plaintiff meets him face to face,
and bawls as loud as he could bellow:

Ha! whither now, thou vilest fellow?"

Sir, will you witness to my capture?"
signified, I would, with rapture;
and then, to magnify the sport,
he drags my prattler into court;
and thus, amidst the noise and rattle,
pollio say'd me in the squabble.

SATIRE X.

As, I did say, Lucilius' verses roll'd in ruder style precipitately roll'd;
who reads Lucilius with so fond an eye,
artificially fond, who can this charge deny?
but, that with wit he lash'd a vicious age,
let's frankly praise'd in the same equal page, behold I grant more, I may as well admit aberrant farces elegantly writ.

'Tis not enough a bursting laugh to raise,
it e'en this talent may deserve its praise:

Concise your diction; let your sense be clear,
Nor with a weight of words fatigue the ear.
Now change from grave to gay with ready art,
Now play the orator's or poet's part;
In raillery assume a gay air,
Discreetly hide your strength, your vigour spare,
For ridicule shall frequently prevail,
And cut the knot, when graver reasons fail.

The ancient writers of the comic stage
Our imitation here may well engage,
Though read not by Tigellius, smooth of face,
Or yonder ape, of horrible grimace,
Calvus, Catullus better suit their vein,
Whose wanton songs they chant in tuneful strain.

But yet a mighty feat it must be thought—
"His motley page with Greek and Latin's wrought!"
Blockheads! who think it wonderful or hard,
So oft perform'd by yonder Rhodian bard.

"But languages each other may refine
(As Chian softens the Falernian wine)
At least in verse." But say, my rhyming friend,
Were you that thief Petillius to defend,
While other lawyers sweated in the cause,
And urg'd in pure Latin the law:
While wondering crowds upon their language hung,

Would you, forgetful of your native tongue,
In foreign words and broken phrases speak,
The half-form'd jargon of a mongrel Greek?

In Lathum born, I once propos'd to write
Some Grecian verses: in deep of night
(When dreams, they say, are true) Rome's founder rose,

And awful spake, "You may as well propose
To carry timber to a wood, as through
The crowded writers of the Grecian song."

Let swelling Furus on th' affrighted stage
Murder poor Memnon, or in muddy rage
Describe the head of Rhine: in idle vein
I write, what never shall presume to gain
The prize, where Metius high in judgment sits
To hear the labours of contending wits;
Or where the people with applauding hands
The well-wrought scene repeatedly demands.

Of all mankind, in light and easy vein
Fundanus best can paint the comic scene,
The wily harlot, and the slave, who join
To wipe the miser of his darling coin.
Pollio in pure Iambic numbers sings
The tragic deeds of heroes and of kings;
While Varius in sublime and ardent vein
Supports the grandeur of the epic strain.
On Virgil all the rural Muses smile,
Smooth flow his lines, and elegant his style.
Satire alone remain'd, no easy strain,
Which Varro, and some others, tried in vain,
While I, perhaps, some slight success may claim,
Though far inferior to th' inventor's fame:
Nor from his head shall I presume to tear
That sacred wreath, he well deserves to wear.

I said, his verse in muddy rapture flows,
And more his errors than his beauties shows;
But, prithee, you that boast a critic's name,
Don't you sometimes the mighty Homer blame?
Does not Lucilius, though of gentle strain,
Correct e'en Accius, and reform his scene?
And in his pleasant old Ennius rate,
When his dull lips want dignity and weight?
Yet, when he speaks of his own right to fame,
Confesses frankly their superior claim.

What then forbids our equal right to know
Why his own verses inharmonious flow?
Or whether in his subject lies the fault,
Or in himself, that they're not higher wrought,
Than if the art of verse were to confine
In ten low feet a cold, dull length of line,
Content his rhyming talents to display
In twice an hundred verses twice a day.
Such, Cassius, thy rapidity of song,
Which like a foaming river pour'd along,
Whose votum'd works (if Fame be not a liar)
Kindled around thy corpse the funeral fire.

Lucilius rallies with politer ease
Than all the rhyming tribe of ancient days,
Nay more correct than him (I frankly own)
Who form'd this kind of verse, to Greece unknown:
Yet, were he fated to the present age,
He sure had blotted the redundant page;
Prun'd all luxuriant excellence away,
And, while he labour'd o'er th' instructive lay,
Would often scratch his head in dull despair,
And to the quick his nails bemusing tear.

Would you a reader's just esteem engage?
Correct with frequent care the blotted page;
Nor strive the wonder of the crowd to raise,
But the few better Judges learn to please.
Be thine, fond madman, some vile school to choose,
Where to repeat the labours of your Muse,
While I, like his'd Arbuscula unaw'd,
Despise the vulgar, since the knights applaud.

Say, shall that bug Pantilius move my spleen?
Shall I be tortur'd, when a wretch obscene,
Or foolish Fannius, for a sordid treat
With sweet Tigellius, shall my verses rate?
Let Plotius, Varius, and Mæcenas deign
With Virgil, Valgius, to approve my strain;
Let good Octavius even endure my lays;
Let Fuscus read, and either Viscus praise;
Let me, with no mean arts to purchase fame,
Pollio, Messala, and his brother name;
Let Bibulus and Servius be my own,
And Furnius, for a critic's candour known;
Among my learned friends are many more,
Whose names I pass in modest silence o'er:
These I can wish to smile; enjoy their praise;
Hope to delight, and grieve if I displease.
Begone, Demetrius, to thy lovesome train
Of minstrel scholars, and in sighing strale,
With soft Hermogenes these rhymes deplore—
Haste, boy, transcribe me this one satire more.

SATIREZ

BOOK II.

SATIRE I.

HORACE. TREBATIUS.

HORACE.

THESE are, to whom too poignant I appear;
Beyond the laws of satire too severe.
My lines are weak, unsinew'd, others say—
"A man might spin a thousand such a day."
What shall I do, Trebatius?

TREBATIUS.

Write no more;

HORACE.

What! give the dear delight of scribbling o'er!

TREBATIUS.

Yes.

HORACE.

Let me die but your advice were best,
But, sir, I cannot sleep; I cannot rest.

TREBATIUS.

Swim o'er the Tiber, if you want to sleep,
Or the dull sense in t'other bottle steep;
If you must write, to Cæsar tune your lays,
Indulge your genius, and your fortune raise.

HORACE.

Oh! were I equal to the glorious theme,
Bristled with spears his iron war should gleam:
A thousand darts should pierce the hardy Gaul,
And from his horse the wounded Parthian fall.

TREBATIUS.

Then give his peaceful virtues forth to fame;
His fortitude and justice be your theme.

HORACE.

Yes, I will hold the daring theme in view,
Perhaps hereafter your advice pursue.
But Cæsar never will your Flaccus hear;
A languid panegyric hurts his ear.
Too strongly guarded from the poet's lays,
He spurns the flatterer; and his saucy praise.

TREBATIUS.

Better even this, than cruelly defame,
And point buffoons and villains out by name,
Sure to be hated even by those you spare,
Who hate in just proportion as they fear.

HORACE.

Tell me, Trebatius, are not all mankind
To different pleasures, different whims inclin'd?
Millionius dances when his head grows light,
And the dim lamp shines double to his sight.
The twin-born brothers in their sports divide;
Pollux loves boxing; Castor joys to ride.
Indulge me then in this my sole delight,
Like great and good Lucilius let me write.

Behold him frankly to his book impart,
As to a friend, the secrets of his heart:
To write was all his aim, too heedless bard!
And well or ill, unworthy his regard.
Hence the old man stands open to your view,
Though with a careless hand the piece he drew.

His steps I follow in pursuit of fame,
Whether Lucania or Appulia claim
The honour of my birth; for on the lands,
By Samnites once possess, Venusium stands,
A forward barrier, as old tales relate,
To stop the course of war, and guard the state.

Let this digression, as it may, succeed—
No honest man shall by my satire bleed;
It guards me like a sword, and safe it lies
Within the sheath, till villains round me rise.

Dread King and Father of the mortal race,
Behold me, harmless bard, how fond of peace!

And may all kinds of mischief-making steel
In rust, eternal rust, thy vengeance feel!
But who provokes me, or attacks my fame,
"Better not touch me, friend," I loud exclaim,
His eyes shall weep the folly of his tongue,
By laughing crowds in rufal ballad sung.

Th' informer Cervius threatens with the laws;
Turius your judge, you surely lose your cause:
Are you the object of Canidia's hate?
Drugs, poisons, incantations, are your fate:
For powerful Nature to her creatures shows
With various arms to terrify their foes.
The wolf with teeth, the bull with horns can fight;
Whence, but from instinct, and an inward light?
His long-liv'd mother trusts to Scæva's care—

TREATATIUS.

No deed of blood his pious hand could dare.

HORACE.

Woodrous indeed! that bulls ne'er strive to bite,
Nor wolves with desperate horns engage in fight.
No mother's blood the gentle Scæva spills,
But with a draught of honey'd poison kills.

Then, whether age my peaceful hours attend,
Or Death his sable pinions round me bend:
Or rich, or poor: at Rome; to exile driven;
Whatever lot by powerful Fate is given:
Yet write I will.

TREATATIUS.

O boy, thy fate is sped,
And short thy days. Some lord shall strike thee
With freezing look— [dead]

HORACE.

What! in his honest page
When good Lucilius lash'd a vicious age,
From conscious villains tore the mask away,
And stripp'd them naked to the glare of day,
Were Lælius or his friend (whose glorious name
From conquer'd Carthage deathless rose to fame)
Were they displeas'd, when villains and their crimes

Were cover'd o'er with infamy and rhymes?
The factious demagogue he made his prize,
And durst the people tribe by tribe chastise;
Yet true to virtue, and to virtue's friends,
To them alone with reverence he bends.

When Scipjo's virtue, and, of milder vein,
When Lælius' wisdom, from the busy scene,
And crowd of life, the vulgar and the great,
Could with their favourite satirist retreat,
Lightly they laugh'd at many an idle jest,
Until their frugal feast of herbs was drest.

What though with great Lucilius I disclaim
All saucy rivalry of birth or fame,
Spite of herself even Envy must confess,
That I the friendship of the great possess,
And, if the dare attempt my honest fame,
She'll break her teeth against my solid name.
This is my plea; on this I rest my cause—
What says my counsel, learned in the laws?

TREATATIUS.

Your case is clearer; yet let me advise;
For sad mishaps from ignorance arise.
Behold the pains and penalties decreed
To libellers—

HORACE.

To libellers indeed.
But if with truth his characters he draws
Even Cæsar shall support the poet's cause;

The formal process shall be turn'd to sport,
And you diamist with honour by the court.

SATIRE II.

WHAT, and how great the virtue, friends, to live
On what the gods with frugal bounty give,
(Nor are they mine, but sage Ofellus' rules,
Of mother-wit, and wise without the schools)
Coops learn with me, but learn before ye dine,
Ere with luxurious pomp the table shine;
Ere yet its madding splendours are display'd,
That dull the sense, and the weak mind mislead.
"Yet why before we dine?" I'll tell ye, friends,
A judge, when brib'd, but ill to truth attends.

Pursue the chase: th' unmanag'd courser
reins:

Or, if the Roman war ill suit thy vein
To Grecian revs form'd, at tennis play,
Or at the manly discus waste the day;
With vigour hurl it through the yielding air
(The sport shall make the labour less severe):
Then, when the loathings, that from surfeits rise,
Are quell'd by toyl, a homely meal despise;
Then the Falernian grape with pride disclaim,
Unless with honey we correct its flame.

Your butler strolls abroad; the winter'd sea
Defends its fish; but you can well allay
The stomach's angry roar with bread and salt—
Whence can this rise? you ask; from whence the
In you consist the pleasure of the treat, [fault;
Not in the price or flavour of the meat.

Let exercise give relish to the dish,
Since nor the various luxuries of fish,
Nor foreign wild-fowl can delight the pale;
Surfeit-swolln guest; yet I shall ne'er prevail
To make our men of taste a pullet choose,
And the gay peacock with its train refuse;
For the rare bird at mighty price is sold,
And lo! what wonders from its tail unfold!
But can these whims a higher gusto raise,
Unless you eat the plumage that you praise?
Or do its glories, when 'tis boil'd, remain?
No; 'tis th' unequal'd beauty of its train
Deludes your eye; and charms you to the feast,
For hens and peacocks are alike in taste.

But say, by what discernment are you taught
To know, that this voracious pike was caught
Where the fall river's lenient waters glite,
Or where the bridges break the rapid tide:
In the mid ocean, or where Tiber pays
With broader course his tribute to the seas?

Madly you praise the mullet's three pound
weight,

And yet you stow it piece-meal ere you eat;
Your eye deceives you; wherefore else dislike
The natural greatness of a full-grown pike,
Yet in a mullet so much joy express?

"Pikes are by nature large, and mullets less."
"Give me," the happy-throated glutton cries,
"In a large dish a mullet's largest size:"

Descend, ye southern winds, propitious haste,
And dress his dainties for this man of taste.
And yet it needs not; for when such excess
Shall his o'er-jaded appetite oppress,
The new-caught turbot's tainted ere he eat,
And bitter herbs are a delicious treat.

But still some ancient poverty remains;
The egg and olive yet a place maintains.

At great men's tables; nor, till late, the fame
Of a whole sturgeon damn'd a prætor's name.

Did ocean then a smaller turbot yield?
The towering stork did once in safety build
Her airy nest, nor was the turbot caught,
Till your great prætor better precepts taught.

Tell them, that roasted cormorants are a feast,
Our docile youth obey the man of taste;
But sage Ofellus marks a decent mean
A sordid and a frugal meal between;
For a profuse expence in vain you shun,
If into sordid avarice you run.

Avidienus, who by public fame
Was called the dog, and merited the name,
Wild cornels, olives five years old, devour'd,
Nor, till his wine was turn'd, his pure libations pour'd.

When rob'd in white he mark'd with festal mirth
His day of marriage, or his hour of birth,
From his one bottle, of some two pound weight,
With oil, of execrable stench, repkte,
With his own hand he dropp'd his cabbage o'er,
But spar'd his oldest vinegar no more.

How shall the wise decide, thus try'd between
The proverb's raving wolf and dog obscene?
Let him avoid the equal wretchedness
Of sordid filth, or prodigal excess;
Nor his poor slaves like old Albusius rate,
When he gives orders for some curious treat:
Not yet, like Nævius, carelessly undean,
His guests with greasy water entertain.

This too is vile. Now mark, what blessings flow
From temperate meals: and first, they can bestow

That prime of blessing, health; for you'll confess
That various meats the stomach must oppress,
If you reflect how light, how well you were,
When plain and simple was your cheerful fare;
But roast, and boil'd, when you promiscuous eat,
When fowl and shell-fish in confusion meet,
Sweets, turn'd to cholera, with cold phlegm engage,
And civil war in the rack'd stomach wage.

Behold how pale the satet' guests arise
From suppers, puzzled with varieties;
The body too, with yesterday's excess
Burthen'd and tir'd, shall the pure soul depress;
Weigh down this portion of celestial birth,
This breath of God, and fix it to the earth.

Who down to sleep from a short supper lies,
Can to the next day's business vigorous rise,
Or jovial swander (when the circling year Brings back some festal day) to better cheer,
Or when his wasted strength he would restore,
When years approach, and age's feeble hour
A softer treatment claim. But if in prime
Of youth and health you take before your time
The luxuries of life, where is their aid
When age or sickness shall your strength invade?

Our fathers lov'd (and yet they had a nose)
A tainted boar; but I believe they chose
The mouldy fragments with a friend to eat,
Rather than eat it whole themselves, and sweet.
Oh! that the earth, when vigorous and young,
Had borne me this heroic race among!

Do you the voice of Fame with pleasure hear?
(Sweeter than verse it charms the human ear)
Behold, what infamy and ruin rise
From a large dish, where the large turbot lies!
Your friends, your neighbours all your folly hate,
You hate yourself, in vain, and curse your fate,

When, though you wish for death, you want the pall
To purchase even a rope to hang yourself.

"These precepts well may wretched Trinius
But why to me? So large is my estate, [rate
And such an ample revenue it brings
To satiate even the avarice of kings."

Then why not better use this proud excess
Of worthless wealth? Why lives in deep distress
A man unworthy to be poor, or why
The temples of the gods in ruins lie?
Why not of such a massy treasure spare
To thy dear country, wretch, a moderate share?
Shalt thou alone no change of fortune know?
Thou future laughter to thy deadliest foe!

But who, with conscious spirit self-secure,
A change of fortune better shall endure?
He, who with such variety of food
Pampers his passions, and inflames his blood,
Or he, contented with his little store,
And wisely cautious of the future hour,
Who in the time of peace with prudent care
Shall for th' extremities of war prepare?

But, deeper to impress this useful truth,
I knew the sage Ofellus in my youth
Living, when wealthy, at no larger rate
Then in his present more contracted state,
I saw the hardy hireling till the ground
(*Twas once his own estate); and while around
His cattle graz'd, and children listening stood,
The cheerful swain his pleasing tale pursued.

"On working days I had no idle treat;
But a smok'd leg of pork and greens I eat;
Yet when arriv'd some long-expected guest,
Or rainy weather gave an hour of rest,
If a kind neighbour then a visit paid,
An entertainment more profuse I made;
Though with a kid, or pullet, well content,
Ne'er for luxurious fish to Rome I sent;
With nuts and figs I crown'd the cheerful board,
The largest that the season could afford.
The social glass went round with cheerfulness,
And our sole rule was to avoid excess,
Our due libations were to Ceres paid,
To bless our corn, and fill the rising blade,
While the gay wine dispell'd each anxious care,
And smooth'd the wrinkled forehead too severe.

"Let Fortune rage, and new disorders make,
From such a life how little can she take!
Or have we liv'd at a more frugal rate
Since this new stranger seiz'd on our estate?
Nature will no perpetual heir assign,
Or make the farm his property or mine.
He turn'd us out: but follies all his own,
Or law-suits, and their knaveries unknown,
Or, all his follies and his law-suits past,
Some long-siv'd heir shall turn him out at last.
The farm, once mine, how bears Umbreas' name
The use alone, not property we claim:
Then be not with your present lot deprest,
And meet the future with undaunted breast."

SATIRE III.

DAMASIPPUS. MOROSE.

DAMASIPPUS.

It hardly once a quarter of a year,
So idle grown, a single sheet appear;

If angry at yourself, that sleep and wine
Enjoy your hours, while anxious to refine
Your labours past, no more your voice you raise
To aught, that may deserve the public praise,
What shall be done? When Saturn's jovial feast
Seem'd too luxuriant to your sober taste,
Hither you fled. Then try the pleasing strain;
Come on: begin.

HORACE.

Alas! 'tis all in vain;

While I with impotence of rage abuse
My harmless pens, the guiltless walls accuse;
Walls, that seem'd rais'd in angry Heaven's despite,
The curse of peevish poets, when they write,

DAMASIPPUS.

And yet you threaten'd something wondrous great,
When you should warn you in your country seat.
Why crowd the volumes of the Grecian sage,
Rang'd with the writers of the comic stage?
Think you the wrath of envy to appease,
Your virtue lost in idleness and ease?
Unhappy bard, to sneer contempt you run;
Then learn the Siren Indolence to shun,
Or poorly be content to lose the fame,
Which your past hours of better life might claim.

HORACE.

Sage Damasippus, may the powers divine,
For this same excellent advice of thine,
Give thee a barber, in their special grace,
To raise your beard, that wisdom of the face!
Yet, prithee, tell me whence I'm so well known.

DAMASIPPUS.

When I had lost all business of my own,
And at th' Exchange my shipwreck'd fortunes
I minded the affairs of other folk. [broke,
In rare antiques full curious was my taste;
Here the rude chisel's rougher strokes I trac'd;
In flowing brass a vicious hardness found,
Or bought a statue for five hundred pound,
A perfect connoisseur. At gainful rate,
I purchas'd gardens, or a mansion-seat,
Thus, through the city I was known to fame,
And Mercury's favourite my public name,

HORACE.

I knew your illness, and amaz'd beheld
Your sudden cure.

DAMASIPPUS.

A new disease expell'd
My old disorder: as when changing pains
Fly to the stomach from the head and reins,
Thus the lethargic, starting from his bed,
In boxing phrensy broke his doctor's head,

HORACE.

Spare but this phrensy, use me as you please

DAMASIPPUS.

Good sir, don't triumph in your own disease.
For all are fools or mad, as well as you,
At least, if what Stertinius says, be true,
Whose wondrous precepts I with transport heard,
What time he bade me nurse this reverend beard,
Cheerful from the Fabrician bridge depart,
And with the words of comfort fill'd my heart.

For when, my fortune lost, resolv'd I stood,
Covering my head, to plunge into the flood,
Propitious he address'd me—

STERTINIUS.

Friend, take heed,
Nor wrong yourself by this unworthy deed.
'Tis but a vicious modesty to fear
Among the mad a madman to appear.
But listen heedful first, while I explain
What madness is, what error of the brain;
And if in you alone appear its power,
Then bravely perish: I shall say no more.

Whom vicious follies, or whom falsehood, blind,
Are by the Stoics held of madding kind.
All but the wise are by this process bound,
The subject nations, and the monarch crown'd,
And they who call you fool, with equal claim
May plead an ample title to the name.

When in a wood we leave the certain way
One error fools us, though we various stray:
Some to the left, some turn to 't'other side:
So he, who dares thy madness to deride,
Though you may frankly own yourself a fool,
Behind him trails his mark of ridicule.
For various follies fill the human breast,
As, with unreal terrors when possess'd,
A wretch in superstitious phrensy cries,
"Lo! in the plain, fires, rocks, and rivers, rise!"
A different madness, though not less, inspires
The fool, who rushes wild through streams and fires;

His mother, sister, father, friends and wife,
Cry out, in vain, "Ah! yet preserve thy life;
That head-long ditch! how dreadful it appears!
That hanging precipice!" No more he hears,
Than drunken Fustus lately at the play,
Who fairly slept Ilione away,
While the full pit, with clamorous thousands, cries,
"Awake, dear mother, to my aid, arise."

Now listen while full clearly I maintain
Such is the vulgar error of the brain.
Some rare antique, suppose, your madness buys;
Is he, who lends the money, less unwise?
Or if the usurer Perillius said,
"Take what I ne'er expect shall be repaid,"
Are you a fool to take it, or not more
T' affront the god, who sends the shining store?

PERILLIUS.

Ay; but I make him on a banker draw—

STERTINIUS.

'Tis not enough: add all the forms of law;
The knotty contracts of Cicuta's brain;
This wicked Proteus shall escape the chain:
Drag him to justice, he's a bird, tree, stone,
And laughs as if his cheeks were not his own.

If bad economists are held unwise,
In good economy some wisdom lies,
And then Perillius is of tainted brain,
Who takes your bond, to sue for it in vain.

Come all, whose breasts with bad ambition rise,
Or the pale passion, that for money dies,
With luxury, or superstition's gloom,
Whate'er disease your health of mind consume,
Compose your robes; in decent ranks draw near,
And, that ye all are mad, with reverence bear,

Misers make whole Anticyra their own;
Its hellebore reserv'd for them alone.
Staberius thus compell'd his heirs t' engrave
On his proud tomb what legacies he gave,
Or stand condemn'd to give the crowd a feast,
By Arrius form'd in elegance of taste,

And gladiators, even an hundred pair,
With all the corn of Afric's fruitful year.
"Such is my will, and whether fool or wise,
I scorn your censures," the testator cries,
Wisely perceiving—

DAMASIPPUS.

What could he perceive,
Thus on his tomb his fortune to engrave?

STERTINIUS.

Long as he liv'd he look'd on poverty,
And shunn'd it as a crime of blackest dye;
And had he died one farthing less in self,
Had seem'd a worthless villain to himself;
For virtue, glory, beauty, all divine
And human powers, immortal gold! are thine;
And he, who piles his shining heap, shall rise
Noble, brave, just—

DAMASIPPUS.

You will not call him wise,

STERTINIUS.

Yes; any thing; a monarch, if he please:
And thus Staberius, nobly fond of praise,
By latest times might hope to be admir'd,
As if his virtue had his wealth acquir'd.

When Aristippus, on the Libyan waste
Commands his slaves, because it stopp'd their haste,
To throw away his gold, does he not seem
To be as mad in his opposite extreme?

DAMASIPPUS.

By such examples, truth can ne'er be tried:
They but perplex the question, not decide.

STERTINIUS.

If a man fill'd his cabinet with lyres,
Whom neither music charms, nor Muse inspires:
Should he buy lasts and knives, who never made
A shoe; or if a wight, who hated trade,
The sails and tackle for a vessel bought,
Madman or fool he might be justly thought.
But, prithee, where's the difference, to behold
A wretch, who heaps and hides his darling gold;
Who knows not how to use the massy store,
Yet dreads to violate the sacred ore?

With a long club, and ever-open eyes,
To guard his corn its wretched master lies,
Nor dars, though hungry, touch the hoarded grain,
While bitter herbs his frugal life sustain:
If in his cellar lie a thousand flasks
(Nay, let them rise to thrice a thousand casks)
Of old Falernian, or the Chian vine,
Yet if he drink mere vinegar for wine;
If, at fourstore, of straw he made his bed,
While moths upon his rotting carpets fed;
By few, forsooth, a madman he is thought,
For half mankind the same disease have caught.

Thou dotard, cursed in the love of self,
For fear of starving, will you starve yourself?
Or do you this ill gotten treasure save
For a luxurious son, or favourite slave?
How little would thy mass of money waste,
Did you on better oil and cabbage feast,
Or on thy clotted hair, and dandruff-head,
A sweeter, more expensive, essence shed!

If nature wish for no immoderate store,
When you forswear, and rob, and steal for more,

Still are you sound? But, when your folly raves,
If you should stone the people, or your slaves;
Those slaves, whom you with self, how precious!
buy,

Our boys and girls, "A madman, madman!" cry
Is your head safe, although you hang your wife,
Or take by poison your old mother's life?
What! nor in Argos you commit the deed,
Nor did your mother by a dagger bleed;
Nor by a mad Orestes was she slain—
But was Orestes of untainted brain,
Or was he not by furies dire possess'd,
Before he plung'd his dagger in her breast?

Yet from the time you hold him hurt in mind,
His actions are of harmless, blameless kind.
He neither stabs his sister, nor his friend;
In a few curses his worst passions end;
He calls her fury, or whatever names
Flow from a breast which cholera high inflames.

Poor was Opimius, though full rich his chest,
In earthen cups, on some more solemn feast,
Quaff'd the crude juices of a meagre vine,
On week-days dead and yapid was his wine,
When with an heavy lethargy oppress'd,
His heir in triumph ran from chest to chest;
Swift to his aid his faithful doctor flies,
And this expedient to awake him tries:
From out his bags he pours the shining store,
And bids a crowd of people count it o'er;
Then plac'd the table near his patient's bed,
And loud, as if he roas'd him from the dead,
"Awake, and guard your wealth; this moment
wake:

Your ravening heir will every shilling take." [five;
"What! while I live?" "Then, wake, that you may Here take the best prescription I can give:
Your bloodless veins, your appetite will fail,
Unless you raise them by a powerful meal.
Take this punction—" What will it cost? Nay, hold."
"A very trifle." "Sir, I will be told."
"Three pence."—"Alas! what does it signify, Whether by doctors or by thieves I die?"

DAMASIPPUS.

Who then is sound?

STERTINIUS.

Whoever's not a fool.

DAMASIPPUS.

What think you of the miser?

STERTINIUS.

By my rule,

Both fool and madman.

DAMASIPPUS.

Is he sound and well,

If not a miser?

STERTINIUS.

No.

DAMASIPPUS.

I prithee tell,

Good Stoic, why?

STERTINIUS.

Let us suppose you heard
An able doctor, who perchance declar'd
His patient's stomach good; yet shall he rise,
Or is he well? Ah! no, the doctor cries,

Because a keen variety of pains

Attack the wretch's side, or vex his reins.
You are not perjurd, nor to gold a slave;
Let Heaven your grateful sacrifice receive.
But if your breast with bold ambition glows,
Set sail where hellebore abundant grows.
For, prithee, say, what difference can you find,
Whether to scoundrels of the vilest kind
You throw away your wealth in lewd excess,
Or know not to enjoy what you possess?

When rich Oppidius, as old tales relate,
To his two sons divided his estate,
Two ancient farms, he call'd them to his bed,
And dying, thus, with faltering accent, said:
"In your loose robe when I have seen you bear
Your play-things, Aulus, with an heedless air,
Or careless give them to your friends away,
Or with a gamester's desperate spirit play;
While you, Tiberius, anxious counted o'er
Your childish wealth, and bid the little store,
A different madness seem'd to be your fate,
Misers or spendthrifts born to imitate.
Then, by our household gods, my sons, I charge,
That you ne'er lessen, that you ne'er-enlarge
What seems sufficient to your tender sire,
And nature's most unbounded wants require.

"Then least ambition tempt ye, hear this oath,
By whose eternal power I bind ye both:
Curs'd be the wretch, an object of my hate,
Whoe'er accepts an office in the state!
Will you in largesses exhaust your store,
That you may proudly stalk the Circus o'er;
Or in the Capitol embronz'd may stand,
Spill'd of your fortune and paternal land;
And thus, forsooth, Agrippa's praise engage,
Or show, with Reynard's tricks, the lion's rage?"
Wherefore does Ajax thus unburied lie?

AGAMEMNON.

We are a king.

STERTINIUS.

A base plebeian I,
And ask no more.

AGAMEMNON.

'Twas just what we decreed:
But, if you thing it an unrighteous deed,
Speak what you think. We here our rights reign.

STERTINIUS.

Greatest of monarchs, may the powers divine
A safe return permit you to enjoy,
With your victorious fleet, from ruin'd Troy—
But may I ask, and answer without fear?

AGAMEMNON.

You may.

STERTINIUS.

Then wherefore rold great Ajax here,
For many a Grecian sav'd who well might claim
To brave Achilles the next place in fame?
Is it that Priam, and the sires of Troy,
May view his carcase with malignant joy,
By whom their sons so oft destroy'd in fight
In their own country want the funeral rite?

AGAMEMNON.

A thousand sheep the frantic kill'd, and cried,
"Here both Atrides; there Ulysses died."

STERTINIUS.

When your own child you to the altar led,
And pour'd the salted meat upon her head;
When you beheld the lovely victim slain,
Unnatural father! were you sound of brain?

AGAMEMNON.

Why not?

STERTINIUS.

Then what did frantic Ajax do,
When in his rage a thousand sheep he slew?
Nor on his wife or son he drew his sword,
On Atreus' sons alone his carcs pour'd;
Nor on his brother turn'd the vengeful steel,
Nor did Ulysses his resentment feel.

AGAMEMNON.

But I, while adverse winds tempestuous roar,
To loose our fated navy from the shore
Wisely with blood the powers divine atone—

STERTINIUS.

What! your own blood, you madman?

AGAMEMNON.

Yes, my own;

But yet not mad.

STERTINIUS.

'Tis a disorder'd head,
Which, by the passions in confusion led,
The images of right and wrong mistakes,
And rage or folly no great difference makes.
Was Ajax mad, when those poor lambs he slew?
And are your senses right, while you pursue,
With such a crime, an empty title's fame?
Is the heart pure, high-swelling for a name?

Should a man take a lambkin in his chair,
With fondling names cares the spotless fair;
Clothes, maids, and gold, as for his child, provide,
And a stout husband for the lovely bride,
His civil rites the judge would take away,
And to trustees in guardianship convey.
Then sure you will not call him sound of brain,
By whom his daughter for a lamb was slain.
Folly and guilt are madness in the extreme;
The impious and the mad eternally the same.
Blood-stain'd Bellona thunders round his head,
Who is by glassy Fame a captive led.

Now try the sons of luxury, you'll find,
Right reason proves them fools of madding kind.
A youth, upon his father's death, receives
A thousand talents, and his orders gives
That all the trades of elegance and taste,
All who with wit and humour joy a feast,
The impious crowd, that fills the Tuscan street,
Early next morning at his house should meet.
What then? they frequent his command obey'd,
And thus his speech the wily pander made:
"Whate'er these people have: whate'er is mine;
To day, to-morrow send, be sure is thine."

Hear the just youth this generous answer make—
"In clumsy boots, dear hunter, for my sake,
You sleep in wild Lucania's snowy waste,
That I at night on a whole boar may feast.
For fish you boldly sweep the wintry seas,
That I, unworthy, may enjoy my ease.
Let each five hundred pounds, with pleasure, take
To thee, dear pander, I a present make
Of twice a thousand, that with all her charms
Your wife at night may run into my arms."

An actor's son dissolv'd a wealthy pearl
(The precious ear-ring of his favourite girl)
In vinegar, and thus luxurious quaff'd
A thousand solid talents at a draught.
Had he not equally his wisdom shown,
Into the sink or fiver were it thrown?

A noble pair of brothers, twins, in truth,
In all th' excesses, trifles, crimes of youth,
On nightingales of monstrous purchase din'd;
What is their process? Are they sound of mind?

Suppose, in childish architecture skill'd,
A bearded sage his castle-cottage build,
Play odd and even, ride his ready came,
And yoke his harness'd mice, 'tis madness plain.
But what if reason, powerful reason, prove
'Tis more than equal childishness to love?
If there's no difference, whether in the dust
You sport your infant works, or, high in lust,
An harlot's cruelty with tears deplete,
Will you, like much-chang'd Pometour of yore,
Throw off the ensigns of the dear disease,
The arts of dress, and earnestness to please?
For the gay youth, though high with liquor warm'd,
Was by the apter sage's doctrine charm'd;
Chastis'd he listen'd to th' instructive lore,
And from his head the breathing garland torn.

A peevish boy shall proffer'd fruit despise:
"Take it, dear puppy." No, and yet he cries,
If you refuse it. Does not this discover
The froward soul of a discarded lover,
Thus reasoning with himself? "What! when thus slighted

Shall I return, returns though uninvited?"
Yes, he shall sure return, and lingering wait
At the proud doors he now presumes to hate.
"Shall I not go if she submissive send,
Or here resolve, my injuries shall end?
Expell'd, recall'd, shall I go back again?
No; let her kneel; for she shall kneel in vain."
When, lo! his wily servant well replied,
"Think not by rule and reason, sir, to guide
What ne'er by reason or by measure move,
For peace and war succeed by turns in love;
And while tempestuous these emotions roll,
And float with blind disorder in the soul,
Who strives to fix them by one certain rule,
May by right rule and reason play the fool."
When from the roof the darted pippins bound,
Does the glad omen prove your senses sound?
Or when with aged tongue you lip your phrases—
Is he more mad, who that child-cottage raises?
Then add the murders of this fond desire,
And with the sword provoke the madding fire.

When jealous Marius late his mistress slew,
And from a precipice himself he threw,
Was he not mad? or can you by your rule
Condemn the murderer, and acquit the fool?
But though in civil phrase you change the name,
Madman and fool for ever are the same.

With hands clean wash'd, a sober, ancient wight
Ran praying through the streets at early light,
"Snatch me from death; grant me alone to live;
No mighty boon; with ease the gods can give."
Sound were his senses: yet, if he were sold,
His master sure this weakness must have told,
And, if not fond a law-suit to maintain,
Must have confess'd the slave unsound of brain.
This crowd is by the doctrine of our schools
Enroll'd in the large family of fools.

Her child beneath a quartan fever lie
For full five months; when the fond mother cries,
"Sickness and health are thine, all-powerful Jove,
Then from my son this dire disease remove;
And when your priests thy solemn fast proclaim,
Naked the boy shall stand in Tiber's stream."
Should chance, or the physician's art, up-raise
Her infant from this desperate disease,
The frantic dame shall plunge her hapless boy,
Bring back the fever, and the child destroy.
Tell me, what horrors thus have turn'd her head?
Of the good gods a superstitious dread.

DAMASIPPUS.

These arms Sertorius gave me, our eighth night,
That none unpunish'd may provoke my rage:
Who calls me mad, shall hear himself a fool,
And know he traits his mark of ridicule.

HORACE.

Great Stoic, w' may better bargains raise
Your ruin'd fortune, tell me, if you please,
Since follies are thus various in their kind,
To what dear madness am I most inclin'd?
For I, methinks, my reason well maintain—

DAMASIPPUS.

What! did Agave then suspect her brain,
When, by a Bacchanalian phrensy led,
In her own hand she carried her son's head?

HORACE.

Since we must yield to truth, 'tis here confess,
I am a fool; with madness too possess.
But since my mind's distemper'd, if you please,
What seems the proper kind of my disease?

DAMASIPPUS.

First that you build, and, scarce of two foot height,
Mimic the mighty stature of the great.
While you, forsooth, a dwarf in arms, deride
His haughty spirit and gigantic stride,
Yet are you less ridiculous, who dare,
Mere mimic, with Mæcenas to compare?

It chanc'd a mother-frog had stroll'd abroad,
When a fell ox upon her young ones trod;
And only one escap'd, who thus express'd
The doleful news—"Ah me! a monstrous beast
My brothers hath destroy'd." "How large?" she cries,

And swelling forth—"was this the monster's size?"
Then larger grows—"What! is he larger still?"
When more and more she strives her bulk to fill;
"Nay, though you burst, you ne'er shall be so
No idle image, Horace, of thy state. [great
Your verses too; that oil, which feeds the flame;
If ever bard was wise, be thine the name.
That horrid rage of temper—

HORACE.

Yet have done!

DAMASIPPUS.

That vast expense—

HORACE.

Good Stoic, mind your own

DAMASIPPUS.

Those thousand furious passions for the fair—

HORACE.

Thou mightier fool, inferior ideots spare.

SATIRE IV.

HORACE. CATIUS.

HORACE.

VENEREM comes my Catius? whither in such haste?

CATIUS.

have no time in idle prate to waste,
must away to treasure in my mind
A set of precepts, novel and refin'd;
such as Pythagoras could never reach,
Nor Socrates nor scienc'd Plato teach.

HORACE.

ask your pardon, and confess my crime,
To interrupt you at so cross a time.
But yet, if aught escap'd through strange neglect,

You shall with ease the wisdom recollect,
Whether you boast, from nature or from art,
This wondrous gift of holding things by heart.

CATIUS.

I meant to store them total in my head,
The matter nice, and wrought of subtle thread.

HORACE.

But prithee, Catius, what's your sage's name?
Is he a Roman, or of foreign fame?

CATIUS.

His precepts I shall willingly reveal,
And sing his doctrines, but his name conceal.

Long be your eggs far sweeter than the round,
Cock-eggs they are, more nourishing and sound.
In thiraty fields a richer colewort grows,
Than where the watery garden overflows.
If by an evening guest perchance surpris'd,
Lest the tough hen (I pray you be advis'd)
Should quarrel with his teeth, let her be drown'd
In lees of wine, and she'll be tender found.
Best flavour'd mushrooms meadow land supplies,
In other kinds a dangerous poison lies.

He shall with vigour bear the summer's heat,
Who after dinner shall be sure to eat
His mulberries, of blackest, ripest dyes,
And gather'd ere the morning Sun arise.
Audius first, most injudicious, quaff'd
Strong wine and honey for his morning draught.
With lenient beverage fill your empty veins,
And smoother mead shall better scour the reins.
Sarral and white-wine, if you costive prove,
And muscels, all obstructions shall remove.
In the new moon all shell-fish fill with juice,
But not all seas the richer sort produce;
The largest in the Lacrina lake we find,
But the Cireman are of sweeter kind.
Crayfish are best on the Misenean coasts,
And soft Tarentum broadest scollops boasts.

If not exact and elegant of taste,
Let none presume to understand a feast.
'Tis not enough to buy the precious fish,
But know what sauce gives flavour to the dish,
If stew'd or roasted it shall relish best,
And to the table rouse the languid guest.

If the half-tainted flesh of boars you hate,
Let the round dishes bend beneath the weight
Of those with acorns fed; though fat, indeed,
The rest are rapid from the marshy reed.

The vine-fed goat's not always luscious fare;
Wise palates choose the wings of pregnant hare.

None before me so sapient to engage
To tell the various nature, or the age
Of fish and fowl; that secret was my own,
Till my judicious palate quite unknown.

In some new pastry that man's genius lies,
Yet in one art 'tis meanness to be wise.
For should we not be careful, lest our oil,
Though excellent our wine, the fish should spoil?

The sky serene, set out your Massic wine;
In the night air its foulness shall refine,
And lose the scent, unfriendly to the nerves:
Through linen strain'd, no flavour it preserves.

He, who with art would pour a stronger wine
On smooth Falernian lees, should well refine
Th' incorporated mass with pigeons' eggs;
The falling yolk will carry down the dregs.

Stew'd shrimps and Afric cockles shall excite
A jaded drinker's languid appetite;
But lettuce after wine is cold and crude,
Yet ham or sausage is provoking food;
Perhaps he may prefer, with higher zest,
Whichever in a filthy tavern's drest.

Two sorts of sauce are worthy to be known;
Simple the first, and of sweet oil alone:
The other mix'd with rich and generous wine,
And the true pickle of Byzantian brine;
Let it with shredded herbs and saffron boil,
And when it cools, pour in Venefran oil.

Picenian fruits with juicy flavour grow,
But Tibur's with superior beauty glow.
Some grapes have with success in pots been tried;
The Alban better in the smoke are dried;
With them and apples and the lees of wine,
White pepper, common salt, and herring-brine,
I first invented a delicious feast,
And gave a separate plate to every guest.
Monstrous, to spend a fortune on a dish,
Or crowd the table with a lead of fish!

It strongly turns the stomach, when a slave
Shall on your cup the greasy tokens leave
Of what rich sauce the luscious catiff stole;
Or when vile mould incrusts your antique bowl.
Brooms, mats, and saw-dust are so cheaply bought,
That not to have them is a shameless fault.
What! sweep with dirty broom a floor inland,
Or on foul couches Tyrian carpets spread?

HORACE.

Catius, by friendship; by the powers divine,
Take me to hear this learned sage of thine;
For though his rules you faithfully express,
This mere repeating makes the pleasure less.
Besides, what joy to view his air and mien!
Trifles to you, because full often seen.
No mean that ardour, which my breast inflamms;
To visit wisdom's even remotest streams,
And by your learned, friendly guidance led,
Quaff the pure precept at the fountain-head.

SATIRE V.

OLYSSUS. TIRRSIAS.

OLYSSUS.

BESIDES the precepts, which you gave before,
Resolve this question, and I ask no more:

Say by what arts and methods I may straight
Repair the ruins of a lost estate.
How now, Tiresias? whence those leering smiles?

TIRESIAS.

Already vers'd in double-dealing wiles,
Are you not satisfied to reach again
Your native land, and view your dear demègne?

ULYSSES.

How poor and naked I return, behold,
Unerring prophet, as you first foretold.
The wooing tribe, in revellings employ'd;
My stores have lavish'd, and my herds destroy'd:
But high descent and meritorious deeds,
Unblest with wealth, are viler than sea-weeds!

TIRESIAS.

Steepe, to be brief, you shudder at the thought
Of want, attend, how riches may be caught.
Suppose a thrush, or any dainty thing,
Be sent to you, dispatch it on the wing
To some rich dotard. What your garden yields,
The choicest honours of your cultur'd fields,
To him be sacrific'd, and let him taste,
Besore your gods, the vegetable feast.
Though he be perjur'd, though a low-born knave,
Stain'd with fraternal blood, a fugitive slave,
Yet wait upon him at his least command,
And always bid him take the upper-hand.

ULYSSES.

What! shall Ulysses then obey the call
Of such a wretch, and give a slave the wall?
Not thus at Troy I prov'd my lofty mind,
Contending ever with the nobler kind.

TIRESIAS.

Then poverty's your fate.

ULYSSES.

And be it so.
Let me with soul undaunted undergo
This loathsome evil, since my valiant heart
In greater perils bore a manly part.
But instant tell me, prophet, how to scrape
Returning wealth, and pile the splendid heap!

TIRESIAS.

I told, and tell you: you may safety catch
The wills of dotards, if you wisely watch;
And though one hunks or two perceive the cheat,
Avoid the hook, or nibble off the bait,
Lay not aside your golden hope of prey,
Or drop your art, though baffled in your play.

Should either great or less important suit
A court become the matter of dispute,
Espouse the man of prosperous affairs,
Pregnant with wealth, if indigent in heirs;
Though he should hamper with a wicked cause
The juster party, and insult the laws.
Despise the citizen of better life,
If clogg'd with children; or a fruitful wife.
Accost him thus (for he with rapture hears
A title tingling in his tender ears):
"Quintus, or Publius, on my faith depend,
Your own deserts have render'd me your friend:
I know the many doubles of the laws,
Untie their knots, and plead with vast applause.
Had you a nut, the villain might as well
Pluck out my eyes, as rob you of the shell.

This is the business of my life profess,
That you lose nothing, or become a jest."
Bid him go home, of his sweet self take care;
Conduct his cause, proceed, and persevere,
Should the red dog-star infant statues split,
Or fat-peanch'd Furios in peatic fit
Bombastic howl, and, while the tempest blows,
Bespawl the wintry Alps with hoary snow.

Some person then, who happens to be nigh,
Shall pull your client by the sleeve, and cry,
"See with what patience he pursues your ends!
Was ever man so active for his friends?"
Thus gudgeons daily shall swim in space,
And stock your fish-ponds with a fresh increase!

This lesson also well deserves your care:

If any man should have a sickly heir,
And large estate, lest you yourself betray
By making none but bachelors your prey,
With weening ease the pleasing bane instil,
In hopes to stand the second in his will;
Then if the boy, by some disaster hurld,
Should take his journey to the nether world,
Your name in full reversion may supply
The void; for seldom fails this lucky die:

If any one desires you to peruse
His will, be still you modestly refuse,
And push it from you: but obliquely read
The second clause, and quick run o'er the deed,
Observing; whether, to reward your toil,
You claim the whole, or must divide the spoil.

A season'd scrivener, bred in office low,
Full often dupes and mocks the gaping crew.
Thus foil'd Násica shall become the sport
Of old Coranus, while he pays his court.

ULYSSES.

What! are you mad, or purpos'd to propose
Obscure predictions, to deride my woes?

TIRESIAS.

O son of great Laertes, every thing
Shall come to pass, or never, as I sing;
For Phœbus, monarch of the tuneful Niobé,
Informs my soul, and gives me to divine.

ULYSSES.

But, good Tiresias, if you please, reveal
What means the sequel of that mystic tale.

TIRESIAS.

What time a youth, who shall sublimely trace
From fam'd Æneas his heroic race,
The Parthian's dread, triumphant shall maintain
His boundless empire over land and main:
Násica, loth to reimburse his coin,
His blooming daughter shall discreetly join
To stout Coranus, who shall silyly smoke
The harpy's aim, and turn it to a joke.
The son-in-law shall gravely give the sire
His witness'd will, and presently desire
That he would read it: coyly he complies,
And silent cons it with attentive eyes,
But finds, alas! to him and his forlorn
No legacy bequeath'd—except to mourn.

Add to these precepts, if a crafty lass,
Or freed-man, manage a delirious ass,
Be their ally; their faith applaud, that you,
When absent, may receive as much in lieu;
'Tis good to take these outworks to his self,
But best to storm the citadel itself.

Writes he vile verses in a frantic vein ?
 Augment his madness, and approve the strain :
 Prevent his asking, if he loves a wench,
 And let your wife his nobler passion quench.

ULYSSES.

Can you suppose, a dame so chaste, so pure,
 Could e'er be tempted to the guilty lure,
 Whom all the suitors amorously strove,
 In vain, to stagger in her plighted love ?

TIRESIAS.

The youth too sparing of their presents came ;
 They lov'd the banquet, rather than the dame ;
 And thus your prudent, honourable spouse,
 It seems, was faithful to her nuptial vows.
 But had she once indulg'd the dotard's glee,
 Smack'd her old cull, and shar'd the spoil with thee,

She never after could be terrified,
 Sagacious beagle, from the reeking hide.

I'll tell a tale, well worthy to be told,
 A fact that happen'd, and I then was old :
 An hag at Thebes, a wicked one no doubt,
 Was thus, according to her will, lugg'd out,
 Stiff to the pile. Upon his naked back
 Her heir sustain'd the well annotated pack.
 She, likely, took this crotchet in her head,
 That she might slip, if possible, when dead,
 From him, who, trudging through a filthy road,
 Had stuck too closely to the living load.

Be cautious therefore, and advance with art,
 Nor sink beneath, nor over act your part.
 A noisy fellow must of course offend
 The surly temper of a sullen friend :
 Yet be not mute—like Davus in the play
 With head inclin'd, his awful nod obey,
 Creep into favour: if a ruder gale
 Assault his face, admonish him to veil
 His precious pate. Oppose your shoulders, proud

To disengage him from the busting crowd.
 If he loves prating, hang an ear: should lust
 Of empty glory be the blockhead's gust,
 Indulge his eager appetite, and puff
 The growing bladder with inspiring stuff,
 Till he, with hands uplifted to the skies,
 Enough! enough! in glutt'd rapture cries.

When he shall free you from your servile fear,
 And tedious toil; when broad awake, you hear:
 "To good Ulysses, my right trusty slave,
 A fourth division of my lands I leave:"
 "Is then?" (as void of consolation, roar)
 "My dearest friend, my Dama now no more ?
 Where shall I find another man so just,
 Firm in his love, and faithful to his trust ?"
 Squeeze out some tears: 'tis fit in such a case
 To cloak your joys beneath a mournful face.
 Though left to your discretionary care,
 Erect a tomb magnificently fair,
 And let your neighbours, to proclaim abroad
 Your fame, the pompous funeral applaud.

If any vassal of the will-compellers,
 With asthma gasping, and advanc'd in years,
 Should be dispos'd to purchase house or land,
 Tell him that he may readily command
 Whatever may to your proportion come,
 And for the value, let him name the sum—
 But I am summon'd by the queen of Hell
 Back to the shades. Live artful, and farewell.

SATIRE VI.

I OFTEN wish'd I had a farm,
 A decent dwelling snug and warm,
 A garden, and a spring as pure
 As crystal running by my door,
 Besides a little ancient grove,
 Where at my leisure I might rove.
 The gracious gods, to crown my bliss,
 Have granted this, and more than this;
 I have enough in my possessing ;
 'Tis well: I ask no greater blessing,
 O Hermes! than remote from strife
 To have and hold them for my life.

If I was never known to raise
 My fortune by dishonest ways,
 Nor, like the spendthrifts of the times,
 Shall ever sink it by my crimes:
 If thus I neither pray nor ponder—
 Oh! might I have that angle yonder,
 Which disproportions now my field,
 What satisfaction it would yield!
 O that some lucky chance but threw
 A pot of silver in my view,
 As lately to the man, who bought
 The very land in which he wrought!
 If I am pleas'd with my condition,
 O hear, and grant this last petition:
 Indulgent, let my cattle batten,
 Let all things, but my fancy, fatten,
 And thou continue still to guard,
 As thou art wont; thy supplicant bard.

Whenever therefore I retreat
 From Rome into my Sabine seat,
 By mountains fenc'd on either side,
 And in my castle fortified,
 What can I write with greater pleasure,
 Than satires in familiar measure?
 Nor mad ambition there destroys,
 Nor sickly wind my health annoys;
 Nor noxious autumn gives me pain,
 The ruthless undertaker's gain.

Whatever title please thine ear,
 Father of morning, Jausus, hear,
 Since mortal men, by Heaven's decree,
 Commence their toils, imploring thee,
 Director of the busy throng,
 Be thou the prelude of my song.

At Rome, you press me: "Without fail
 A friend expects you for his bail;
 Be nimble to perform your part,
 Lest any rival get the start.
 Though rapid Boreas sweep the ground,
 Or winter in a narrower round
 Contract the day, through storm and snow,
 At all adventures you must go."

When bound beyond equivocation,
 Or any mental reservation,
 By all the ties of legal traps,
 And to my ruin, too, perhaps,
 I still must bustle through the crowd,
 And press the tardy; when aloud
 A foul-mouth'd fellow reimburses
 This usage with a peal of curses.
 "What madness hath possess'd thy pate,
 To juggle folk at such a rate,
 When puffing through the streets you sopor
 To meet Mæcenas at an hour?"

This pleases me, to tell the truth,
 And is as honey to my tooth.

Yet when I reach th' Esquilian Hill
 (That deathful scene, and gloomy still)
 A thousand busy cares surround me,
 Distract my senses, and confound me.
 "Roscius entreated you to meet
 At court to-morrow before eight—
 The secretaries have implor'd
 Your presence at their council-board—
 Pray, take this patent, and prevail
 Upon your friend to fix the seal—"
 "Sir, I shall try"—replies the man,
 More urgent: "If you please you can—"
 'Tis more than seven years complete,
 It hardly wants a month of eight,
 Since great Mæcenæ's favour grac'd me,
 Since first among his friends he plac'd me,
 Sometimes to carry in his chair,
 A mile or two, to take the air,
 And might entrust with idle chat,
 Discoursing upon this or that,
 As in a free familiar way,
 "How, tell me, Horace, goes the day?
 Think you the Thracian can engage
 The Syrian Hector of the stage?
 This morning air is very bad
 For folks who are but thinly clad."
 Our conversation chiefly dwells
 On these, and such like bagatelles.
 As might the veriest prattler hear,
 Or be repos'd in leaky ear.
 Yet every day, and every hour,
 I'm more enslav'd to envy's power—
 "Our son of fortune (with a pox)
 Sate with Mæcenæ in the box,
 Just by the stage: you might remark,
 They play'd together in the park."
 Should any rumour, without head
 Or tail, about the streets be spread,
 Whoever meets me gravely nods,
 And says, "As you approach the gods,
 It is no mystery to you,
 What do the Dæmons mean to do?"
 "Indeed I know not"—"How you joke,
 And love to sneer at simple folk!"
 "Then vengeance seize this head of mine,
 If I have heard or can divine—"
 "Yet, prithee, where are Cæsar's bands Allotted their debenture-lands?"
 Although I swear I know no more
 Of that than what they ask'd before,
 They stand amaz'd, and think me grown
 The closest mortal ever known.
 Thus, in this giddy, busy maze
 I lose the sun-shine of my days,
 And oft with fervent wish repeat—
 "When shall I see my sweet retreat?
 Oh! when with books of sages deep,
 Sequester'd ease, and gentle sleep,
 In sweet oblivion, blissful balm!
 The busy cares of life becalm?
 Oh! when shall I enrich my veins,
 Spite of Pythagoras, with beans?
 Or live luxurious in my cottage,
 On bacon ham and savoury pottage?
 O joyous nights! delicious feasts!
 At which the gods might be my guests."
 My friends and I regal'd, my slaves
 Enjoy what their rich master leaves.
 There every guest may drink and fill,
 As much, or little, as he will,

Exempted from the bedlam-rules
 Of roaring prodigals and fools:
 Whether, in merry mood or whim,
 He fills his bumper to the brim,
 Or better pleas'd to let it pass,
 Grows mellow with a moderate glass.
 Nor this man's house, nor that's estate,
 Becomes the subject of debate;
 Nor whether Lepos, the buffoon,
 Can dance, or not, a rigadon;
 But what concerns us more, I trow,
 And were a scandal not to know;
 Whether our bliss consist in store
 Of riches, or in virtue's lore:
 Whether esteem, or private ends,
 Should guide us in the choice of friends
 Or what, if rightly understood,
 Man's real bliss, and sovereign good.
 While thus we spend the social night,
 Still mixing profit with delight,
 My neighbour Cervius never fails
 To club his part in pishy tales:
 Suppose, Arellius, one should praise
 Your anxious opulence: he says—
 A country mouse, as authors tell,
 Of old invited to his cell
 A city mouse, and with his best
 Would entertain the courtly guest.
 Thrifty he was, and full of cares
 To make the most of his affairs,
 Yet in the midst of his frugality
 Would give a loose to hospitality.
 In short, he goes, and freely fetches
 Whole ears of hoarded oats, and vetches;
 Dry grapes and raisins cross his chops,
 And dainty bacon, but in scraps,
 If delicacies could invite
 My squeamish courtier's appetite,
 Who turn'd his nose at every dish,
 And saucy piddled, with a—pish!
 The master of the house, reclin'd
 On downy chaff, more temperate din'd
 On wheat, and darnel from a manger,
 And left the dainties for the stranger.
 The cit, displeas'd at his repeat,
 Address'd our simple host at last:
 "My friend, what pleasure can you find,
 To live this mountain's back behind?
 Would you prefer the town and men,
 To this wild wood, and dreary den,
 No longer, moping, loiter here,
 But go with me to better cheer.
 "Since animals but draw their breath,
 And have no being after death:
 Since nor the little, nor the great,
 Can shun the rigour of their fate;
 At least be merry while you may,
 The life of mice is but a day:
 Come then, my friend, to pleasure give
 The little life you have to live."
 Encourag'd thus, the country mouse,
 Transported, sallies from his house:
 They both set out, in hopes to crawl
 At night beneath the city wall;
 And now the night, elaps'd eleven,
 Possess'd the middle space of Heaven,
 When in a rich and splendid dome
 They stopp'd, and found themselves at home,
 Where ivory couches, overspread
 With Tyrian carpets, glowing, fed

The dazzled eye. To lure the taste,
The fragments of a costly feast,
Remaining, drest but yesterday,
In baskets, pil'd on baskets, lay.

The courtier on a purple seat
Had plac'd his rustic friend in state,
Then bustled, like a busy host,
Supplying dishes boil'd and roast,
Nor yet omits the courtier's duty
Of tasting, ere he brings the booty.

The country-mouse, with rapture strange,
Rejoices in his fair exchange,
And lolling, like an easy guest,
Enjoys the cheer, and cracks his jest—
When, on a sudden, opening gates,
Load-jarring, shook them from their seats.

They ran, affrighted, through the room,
And, apprehensive of their doom,
Now trembled more and more; when, hark!
The mastiff-dogs began to bark;
The dome, to raise the tumult more,
Resounded to the surly roar.

The bumkin then concludes, "Adieu!
This life, perhaps, agrees with you:
My grove, and cave, secure from snares,
Shall comfort me with chaff and tares."

SATIRE VII.

DAVUS. HORACE.

DAVUS.

I'll hear no more, and with impatience burn,
Slave as I am, to answer in my turn;
And yet I fear—

HORACE.

What! Davus, is it you?

DAVUS.

Yes. Davus, sir, the faithful and the true,
With wit enough no sudden death to fear—

HORACE.

Well. Since this jovial season of the year
Permits it, and our ancestors ordain,
No more thy dear impetence restrain.

DAVUS.

Among mankind, while some with steady view
One constant course of darling vice pursue,
Most others float along the changing tide,
And now to virtue, now to vice they glide.
Lo! from three rings how Priscus plays the light;
Now shows his naked hand—the various wight
With every hour a different habit wears:
Now in a palace haughtily appears,
Then hides him in some vile and filthy place,
Where a clean slave would blush to show his face;
Now rakes at Rome, and now to Athens flies;
Intensely studies with the learn'd and wise.
Sure all the gods, who rule this varying Earth,
In deep despite presided at his birth.

Old Volanerius, once that man of joke,
When the just gout his crippled fingers broke,
Maintain'd a slave to gather up the dice,
So constant was he to his darling vice.
Yet less a wretch than he who now maintains
A steady course, now drives with looser reins.

HORACE.

Tell me, thou tedious varlet, whither tends
This putrid stuff?

DAVUS.

At you direct it bends.

HORACE.

At me, you scoundrel?

DAVUS.

When with lavish praise

You vaunt the happiness of ancient days,
Suppose some god should take you at your word,
Would you not scorn the blessing you implor'd?
Whether not yet convinc'd as you pretend,
Or weak the cause of virtue to defend;
While sinking in the mire you strive, in vain,
Too deeply plung'd, to free your foot again.

When you're at Rome, the country has your sighs;

A rustic grown, you vaunt into the skies
The absent town. Perchance, if uninited
To sup abroad, oh! then you're so delighted
With your own homely meal, that one would think
That he, who next engages you to drink,
Must tie you neck and heels; you seem so blest,
When with no bumper-invitation prest.

But should Mæcenas bid his poet wait,
(Great folks, like him, can never sup till late)
Sputtering with idle rage the house you rend,
"Where is my essence? Rogues, what, none attend?"

While the buffoons, you promis'd to have treat'd;
Sneak off with curses—not to be repeated.

Fop'd of my guts, too fond, perhaps, I seem;
I throw my nose up to a savoury steam:
Or folks may call me careless, idle sot,
Or say I pledge too oft the other pot;

But shall the man of deeper vice, like you,
With malice unprovok'd my faults pursue,
Because with specious phrase, and terms of art,
You clothe, forsooth, the vices of your heart?

What if a greater fool your worship's found,
Than the poor slave you bought for twenty pound?
Think not to fright me with that threatening air;
Nay, keep your temper, sir, your fingers spare,
While I the maxims, sage and wise, repeat,
Taught me by Crispin's porter at his gate.

You tempt your neighbour's wife; an humble harlot

Contents poor Davus—who's the greater varlet?
When nature fires my veins, I quench the flame,
And leave the fair-one with uninjur'd fame,
Nor shall one jealous care disturb my breast,
By whom the wanton shall be next possess'd.
When you throw off those ensigns of your pride,
Your ring, your judge's robe, and basely hide,
Beneath a slave's vile cap, your essence'd hair,
Say, are you not the wretch whose clothes you wear?
Then where's the difference, whether you engage Through scourges, wounds and death, to mount the stage,

Or by the conscious chamber-maid are prest
Quite double, neck and heels, into a chest?

The husband's vengeance o'er the wife extends;
But yet his juster wrath on you descends:
For she ne'er strolls abroad in vile disguise,
And, when her lewder wishes highest rise,
She dares but half indulge the sin; afraid,
Even by the man she loves, to be betray'd.

You take the yoke, and to the husband's rage
Your fortune, person, life, and fame engage.
Have you escap'd? Methinks, your future care
Might wisely teach you to avoid the snare.
No; you with ardour to the danger run,
And dare a second time to be undone.
Repeated slave! what beast, that breaks his chain,
In love with bondage would return again?

But you, it seems, ne'er touch the wedded dame—
Then, by the son of Jove, I here disclaim
The name of thief, when, though with backward eye,
I wisely pass the silver goblet by.
But take the danger and the shame away,
And vagrant nature bounds upon her prey,
Spurning the reins. But say, shall you pretend
O'er me to lord it, who can vilely bend
To each proud master; to each changing hour,
A very slave? Not even the prætor's power,
With thrice-repeated rites, thy fears control,
Or vindicate the freedom of thy soul.

But as the slave, who lords it o'er the rest,
Is still a slave, a master-slave at best,
So art thou, insolent, by me obey'd;
Thou thing of wood and wires, by others play'd.

HORACE.

Who then is free?

DAVUS.

The wise, who well maintains
An empire o'er himself; whom neither chains,
Nor want, nor death, with slavish fear inspire;
Who boldly answers to his warm desire;
Who can ambition's vainest gifts despise;
Firm in himself, who on himself relies;
Polish'd and round who runs his proper course,
And breaks misfortune with superior force.

What is there here, that you can justly claim,
Or call your own? When an imperious dame
Demands her price, with insults vile pursues thee;
Driven out of doors with water well bedews thee,
Then calls you back; for shame, shake off her chain,

And boldly tell her you are free—In vain;
A tyrant-lord thy better will restrains,
And spurs thee hard, and breaks thee to his reins.

If some fam'd piece the painter's art displays,
Transfixt you stand, with admiration gaze;
But is your worship's folly less than mine,
When I with wonder view some rude design
In crayons or in charcoal, to invite
The crowd, to see the gladiators fight?
Methinks, in very deed they mount the stage,
And seem in real combat to engage:
Now in strong attitude they dreadful bend;
Wounded they wound; they parry and defend:
Yet Davus is with rogue and rascal grac'd,
Yet you're a critic, and a man of taste.
I am, forsooth, a good-for-nothing knave,
When by a smoking pasty made a slave:
In you it shows a soul erect and great,
If you refuse even one luxurious treat.

Why may not I, like you, my guts obey?—
"My shoulders for the dear indulgence pay."
But should not you with heavier stripes be taught,
Who search for luxuries; how dearly bought!
For soon this endless, this repeated feast,
Its relish lost, shall pall upon the taste;
Then shall your trembling limbs refuse the weight
Of a vile carcass with disease replete.

How seldom from the lash a slave escapes,
Who trucks some trifle, that he stole, for grapes
And shall we not the servile glutton rate,
To please his throat who sells a good estate?
You cannot spend one vacant hour alone;
You cannot make that vacant hour your own.
A self-deserter from yourself you stray,
And now with wine, and now with sleep, allay
Your cares: in vain; companions black as night,
Thy pressing cares, arrest thee in thy flight.

HORACE.

Is there no stone?

DAVUS.

At whom, good sir, to throw it?

HORACE.

Have I no dart?

DAVUS.

What mischief ails our poet?
He's mad, or making verses.

HORACE.

Hence, you knave,
Or to my farm I'll send you, the ninth slave.

SATIRE VIII.

HORACE. FUNDANIUS.

HORACE.

They told me, that you spent the jovial night
With Nasidienus, that same happy wight,
From early day, or you had been my guest;
But, prithee, tell me how you lik'd your feast.

FUNDANIUS.

Sure never better.

HORACE.

Tell me, if you please,
How did you first your appetite appease.

FUNDANIUS.

First a Lucanian boar, of tender kind,
Caught, says our host, in a soft, southern wind.
Around him lay whatever could excite,
With pungent force, the jaded appetite;
Rapes, lettuce, radishes, anchovy-brine,
With skerrets, and the lees of Coan wine.

This dish remov'd, a slave expert and able
With purple napkin wip'd a maple table.
Another sweeps the fragments of the feast,
That nothing useless might offend the guest.

At Ceres' feast as Attic virgin walks
Solcan and slow, so black Hydaspes stalks
With right Cæcubian, and the wines of Greece—
Of foreign growth, that never cross'd the seas.
If Alban and Palerian please you more,
So says our host, you may have both good store;
Poor wealth indeed—

HORACE.

But tell me, who were there,
Thus happy to enjoy such luscious fare?

FUNDANIUS.

On the first bed Thurinus lay between Varius and me, if haply right I ween;

Servilius and Vibidius both were there,
Brought by Mæcenas, and with him they share
The middle bed. Our master of the feast
On the third couch, in seat of honour plac'd,
Porcius betwixt and Nomentanus lies;
Porcius, who archly swallows custard pies.

Whate'er of curious relish lay unknown
Is by Nomentane with his finger shown;
For we, poor folk, unknowing of our feast,
Eat fish and wild fowl—of no common taste.
But he, to prove how luscious was the treat,
With a broil'd flounder's entrails crowds my plate,
Then tells me, apples are more ruddy bright,
If gather'd by fair Luna's waning light.
He best can tell you where the difference lies—
But here Servilius to Vibidius cries,
"Sure to be poison'd, unreveug'd we die,
Unless we drink the wretched miser dry.
Slave, give us larger glasses."—Struck with dread,
A fearful pale our landlord's face o'erspread;
Great were his terrours of such drinking folk,
Whether with too much bitterness they joke,
Or that hot wines, dishonouring his feast,
Deafen the subtle judgment of the taste.

When our two champions had their faces
crown'd,
We did them justice, and the glass went round;
His parasites alone his anger fear'd,
And the full flask unwillingly they spar'd.

In a large dish an outstretch'd lamprey lies,
With shrimps all floating round: the master
cries,

"This fish, Mæcenas, big with spawn was caught,
For after spawning-time its flesh is naught.
The sauce is mix'd with olive-oil; the best,
And purest from the vats Venafraun prest,
And, as it boil'd, we pour'd in Spanish brine,
Nor less than five-year-old Italian wine.
A little Chian's better when 'tis boil'd,
By any other it is often spoil'd.
Then was white pepper o'er it gently pour'd,
And vinegar of Lesbian vintage sour'd.
I first among the men of sapience knew
Roquets and herbs in cockle-brine to stew,
Though in the same rich pickle, 'tis confest,
His unwash'd cray-fish sage Curtillus dreads."

But lo! the canopy, that o'er us spreads,
Tumbled, in hideous ruin, on our heads,
With dust, how black! not such the clouds arise
When o'er the plain a northern tempest flies.
Some horrors, yet more horrible, we dread,
But raise us, when we found the danger fled.

Poor Rufus droop'd his head, and sadly cried,
As if his only son untimely died.
Sure he had wept, till weeping ne'er had end,
But wise Nomentane thus up-rai'd his friend:
"Fortune, thou cruellest of powers divine,
To joke poor mortals is a joke of thine."
While Varius with a napkin scarce suppress'd
His laughter, Balatro, who loves a jest,
Cries, "Such the lot of life; nor must you claim,
For all your toils, a fair return of fame.
While you are tortur'd thus, and torn with pain,
A guest like me, polite, to entertain
With bread well bak'd, with sauces season'd right,
And all your slaves most elegantly dight,
Down falls the canopy, a trick of fate,
Or a groom-footman stumbling breaks a plate,
Good fortune hides, adversity calls forth,
A landlord's genius, and a general's worth."

To this mine host: "Thou ever-gentle guest,
May all thy wishes by the gods be blest,
Thou best good man"—But when we saw him rise,
From bed to bed the spreading whisper flies.

HORACE.

Sure, never play so fine. But, prithee, say,
How afterwards you laugh'd the time away.

FUNDANIUS.

Slaves, cries Vibidius, have you broke the cask?
How often must I call for t'other flask?
With some pretended joke our laugh was drest,
Servilius ever seconding the jest,
When you, great host, return with alter'd face,
As if to mend with art your late disgrace.

The slaves behind in mighty charger bore
A crane in pieces torn, and powder'd o'er
With salt and flour; and a white gander's liver,
Stuff'd fat with figs, bespoke the curious giver;
Besides the wings of hares, for so it seems,
No man of luxury the back esteems.

Then saw we black-birds with o'er-roasted breast,
Laid on the board, and ringdoves rumplous drest!
Delicious fare! did not our host explain
Their various qualities in endless strain,
Their various natures: but we fled the feast,
Resolv'd in vengeance nothing more to taste,
As if Canidia, with empoison'd breath,
Worse than a serpent's, blasted it with death.

EPISTLES.

BOOK I.

EPISTLE I.

TO MÆCENAS.

O thou, to whom the Muse first tun'd her lyre,
Whose friendship shall her latest song inspire,
Wherefore, Mæcenas, would you thus engage
Your bard, dismiss with honour from the stage,
Again to venture in the lists of fame,
His youth, his genius, now no more the same?

Secure in his retreat Vejanus lies,
Hangs up his arms, nor courts the doubtful prize:
Wisely resolv'd to tempt his fate no more,
Or the light crowd for his discharge implore.

The voice of reason cries with piercing force,
Loose from the rapid car your aged horse,
Lest in the race derided, left behind,
Jaded he drag his limbs, and burst his wind.

Then here farewell th' amusements of my youth;
Farewell to verses; for the search of truth
And moral decency hath fill'd my breast,
Hath every thought and faculty possess'd,
And I now form my philosophic lore,
For all my future life a treasure'd store.

You ask, perhaps, what sect, what chief own;
I'm of all sects, but blindly sworn to none;
For as the tempest drives I shape my way,
Now active plunge into the world's wide sea;
Now virtue's precepts rigidly defend,
Nor to the world—the world to me shall bend;
Then make some looser moralist my guide,
And to a school less rigid smoothly glide.

As night seems tedious to th' expecting youth,
Whose fair-one breaks her assignation-truth;
As to a slave appears the lengthen'd day,
Who owes his task—for he receiv'd his pay;
As, when the guardian mother's too severe,
Impatient minors waste their last, long year;
So sadly slow the time ungrateful flows,
Which breaks th' important systems I propose;
Systems, whose useful precepts might engage
Both rich and poor; both infancy and age:
But meaner precepts now my life must rule,
These, the first rudiments of wisdom's school,
You cannot hope for Lynceus' piercing eyes:
But will you then a strengthening slave despise?
You wish for matchless Glycon's limbs, in vain,
Yet why not cure the gout's decrepit pain;
Though of exact perfection you despair,
Yet every step to virtue 's worth your care.

Even while you fear to use your present store,
Yet glows your bosom with a lust of more?
The power of words and soothing sounds can ease
The raging pain, and lessen the disease.
Is fame your passion? Wisdom's powerful charm,
If thrice read over, shall its force disarm.
The slave to envy, anger, wine, or love,
The wretch of sloth, its excellence shall prove:
Fierceness itself shall hear its rage away,
When listening calmly to th' instructive lay.
Even in our flight from vice some virtue lies;
And free from folly, we to wisdom rise.

A little fortune, and the foul disgrace
To urge in vain your interest for a place;
These are the ills you shun with deepest dread;
With how much labour both of heart and head?
That worst of evils, poverty, to shun,
Dauntless through seas, and rocks, and fires you
To furthest Ind, yet heedless to attend [run
To the calm lectures of some wiser friend,
Who bids you scorn what now you most desire,
And with an idiot's ignorance admire.

What strolling gladiator would engage
For vile applause to mount a country-stage,
Who at th' Olympic games could gain renown,
And without danger bear away the crown?

Silver to gold, we own, should yield the prize,
And gold to virtue; louder Folly cries,
"Ye sons of Rome, let money first be sought;
Virtue is only worth a second thought."
This maxim echoes through the bankers' street,
While young and old the pleasing strain repeat:
For though you boast a larger fund of sense,
Untainted morals, honour, eloquence,
Yet want a little of the sum that buys
The titled honour, and you ne'er shall rise;
Yet if you want the qualifying right
Of such a fortune to be made a knight,
You're a plebeian still. Yet children sing,
Amid their sports, "Do right, and be a king."

Be this thy brazen bulwark of defence,
Still to preserve thy conscious innocence,
Nor e'er farn pale with guilt. But, prithee, tell,
Shall Otho's law the children's song excel?
The sons of ancient Rome first sung the strain,
That bids the wise, the brave, the virtuous reign.

My friend, get money; get a large estate,
By honest means; but get, at any rate,
That you with knights and senators may sit,
And view the weeping scenes that Pupius writ.
But is he not a friend of nobler kind,
Who wisely fashions and informs thy mind,

To answer, with a soul erect and brave,
To Fortune's pride, and scorn to be her slave?

But should the people ask me, while I choose
The public converse, wherefore I refuse
To join the public judgment, and approve,
Or fly whatever they dislike, or love;
Mine be the answer prudent Reynard made
To the sick lion—"Truly I'm afraid,
When I behold the steps, that to thy den
Look forward all, but none return again."

But what a many-headed beast is Rome!
For what opinion shall I choose, or whom?
Some joy the public revenues to farm;
By presents some our greedy widows charm;
Others their nets for dying dotards lay,
And make the childless bachelor their prey;
By dark extortion some their fortunes raise:
Thus every man some different passion sways;
For forward is he, who can with steady view
Even for an hour his favourite scheme pursue!

If a rich lord, in wanton rapture, cries,
"What place on Earth with charming Baiae vies!"
Soon the broad lake and spreading sea shall prove
Th' impatient whims of his impetuous love;
But if his fancy point some other way,
(Which like a sign from Heaven he must obey)
Instant, ye builders, to Teanum haste,
An inland country is his lordship's taste.
Knows he the genial bed, and fruitful wife?
"Oh! then the bliss of an unmarried life!"

Is he a bachelor? the only blest,
He swears, are of the bridal joy possess.
Say, while he changes thus, what chains can bind
These various forms; this Proteus of the mind?

But now to lower objects turn your eyes,
And lo! what scenes of ridicule arise!
The poor, in mimicry of heart, presumes
To change his barbers, baths, and beds, and rooms,
And, since the rich in their own barges ride,
He hires a boat, and pukes in mimic pride.

If some unlucky barber notch my hair,
Or if my robes of different length I wear,
If my new vest a tatter'd shirt confess,
You laugh to see such quarrels in my dress:
But if my judgment, with itself at strife,
Should contradict my general course of life;
Should now despise what it with warmth perswade,
And earnest wish for what with scorn it view'd;
Float like the tide; now high the building raise;
Now pull it down; nor round nor square can please;
You call it madness of the usual kind,
Nor laugh, nor think trustees should be assign'd
To manage my estate; nor seem afraid,
That I shall want the kind physician's aid.
While yet, my great protector and my friend,
On whom my fortune and my hopes depend,
An ill-par'd nail you with resentment see
In one, who loves and honours you like me.

In short, the wise is only less than Jove,
Rich; free, and handsome; nay a king above
All earthly kings; with health supremely blest—
Except when driveling phlegm disturbs his rest.

EPISTLE II.

TO LOLLIVS.

WHEN you, my Lollivs, on some chosen theme
With youthful eloquence at Rome declaim,

I read the Grecian poet o'er again,
 Whose works the beautiful and base contain;
 Of vice and virtue more instructive rules,
 Than all the sober sages of the schools.
 Why thus I think, if not engag'd, attend,
 And, Lollius, hear the reasons of your friend,
 The well-wrought fable, that sublimely shows
 The loves of Paris, and the lengthen'd woes
 Of Greece in arms, presents, as on a stage,
 The giddy tumults and the foolish rage
 Of kings and people. Hear Antenor's scheme;
 "Cut off the cause of war; restore the dame:"
 But Paris treats this counsel with disdain,
 Nor will be forc'd in happiness to reign:
 While hoary Nestor, by experience wise,
 To reconcile the angry monarchs tries.
 His injur'd lov- the son of Peleus fires,
 And equal passion, equal rage inspires
 The breasts of both, When doting monarchs urge Unsound resolves, their subjects feel the scourge.
 Trojans and Greeks, seditious, base, unjust,
 Offend alike in violence and lust.
 To show what wisdom and what sense can do,
 The poet sets Ulysses in our view,
 Who conquer'd Troy, and with sagacious ken
 Saw various towns and polities of men:
 While for himself, and for his native train,
 He seeks a passage through the boundless main,
 In perils plung'd, the patient hero braves
 His adverse fate, and buoys above the waves.
 You know the Sirens' songs, and Circe's draught,
 Which had he, senseless and intemperate, quaff'd,
 With his companions, he, like them, had been
 The brutal vassal of a harlot queen;
 Had liv'd a dog, debas'd to vile desire,
 Or loathsome swine, and grov'ell'd in the mire.
 But we, mere numbers in the book of life,
 Like those who boldly woo'd our hero's wife,
 Born to consume the fruits of earth; in truth,
 As vain and idle as Phœacia's youth;
 Mere outside all, to fill the mighty void
 Of life, in dress and equipage employ'd,
 Who sleep till mid-day, and with melting airs
 Of empty music sooth away our cares.
 Rogues nightly rise to murder men for self,
 Will you not rouse you to preserve yourself?
 But though in health you doze away your days,
 You run, when puff'd with dropsical disease,
 Unless you light your early lamp, to find
 A moral book; unless you form your mind
 To nobler studies, you shall forfeit rest,
 And love or envy shall distract your breast.
 For the hurt eye an instant cure you find;
 Then why neglect, for years, the sickening mind?
 Dare to be wise; begin; for, once begun,
 Your task is easy; half the work is done:
 And sure the man, who has it in his power
 To practise virtue, and protracts the hour,
 Waits, like the rustic, till the river dries:
 Still glides the river, and will ever glide.
 For wealth, and wives of fruitfulness we toil;
 We stub the forest, and reclaim the soil.
 Blest with a competence, why wish for more?
 Nor house, nor lands, nor heaps of labour'd ore
 Can give their feverish lord one moment's rest,
 Or drive one sorrow from his anxious breast;
 The fond possessor must be blest with health,
 Who rightly means to use his hoarded wealth.
 Houses and riches gratify the breast
 For lucre lusting, or with fear deprest,

As pictures, glowing with a vivid light,
 With painful pleasure charm a blemish'd sight:
 As chasing sooths the gout, or music cheers
 The tingling organs of impothum'd ears.
 Your wine grows acid when the cask is foul:
 Learn the strong sense of pleasure to control;
 With virtuous pride its blandishments disdain;
 Hurtful is pleasure, when it's bought with pain.
 He wants for ever, who would more acquire;
 Set certain limits to your wild desire.

The man, who envies, must behold with pain
 Another's joys, and sicken at his gain:
 Nor could Sicilia's tyrants ever find
 A greater torment than an envious mind.

The man, unable to control his ire,
 Shall wish undone what hate and wrath inspire:
 To sate his rage precipitate he flies,
 Yet in his breast his rage unsated lies.
 Anger's a shorter madness of the mind;
 Subdue the tyrant, add in fetters bind.

The docile colt is form'd with gentle skill
 To move obedient to his rider's will.
 In the loud hall the hound is taught to bay
 The buck-skin trail'd, then challenges his prey
 Through the wild woods. Thus, in your hour of youth,

From pure instruction quaff the words of truth.
 The odours of the wine, that first shall stain
 The virgin vessel, it shall long retain.
 Whether you prove a lagger in the race,
 Or with a vigorous ardour urge your pace,
 I shall maintain my usual rate; no more;
 Nor wait for those behind, nor press on those before.

EPISTLE III.

TO JULIUS FLORUS.

FLORUS, I long to know where Claudius leads
 The distant rage of war; whether he spreads
 His conquering banners o'er the Thracian plains,
 Or near the Heber, bound in snowy chains.
 Or does the Hellespont's high-tower'd sea,
 Or Asia's fertile soil, his course delay?
 What works of genius do the youth prepare,
 Who guard his sacred person? Who shall dare
 To sing great Caesar's wars, immortal theme!
 And give his peaceful honours down to fame?
 How fares my Titius? Say, when he intends
 To publish? Does he not forget his friends?
 He, who disdain's the springs of common fame,
 And dauntless quaffs the deep Pindaric stream.
 But will the Muse her favourite bard inspire,
 To tune to Theban sounds the Roman lyre?
 Or with the transports of theatric rage,
 And its sonorous language, shake the stage?

Let Celsus be admonish'd, o'er and o'er,
 To search the treasures of his native store,
 Nor touch what Phœbus consecrates to Fame;
 Lest, when the birds their various plumage claim,
 Stript of his stolen pride, the crow forlorn
 Should stand the laughter of the public scorn.

What do you dare, who float with active wing
 Around the thymy fragrance of the spring?
 Not yours the genius of a lowly strain,
 Nor of uncultur'd or unpolish'd vein,
 Whether you plead with eloquence his cause;
 Or to your client clear the doubtful laws;

And sure to gain, for amatorious lays,
The wreaths of ivy, with unenvied praise.

Could you the passions, in their rage, control,
That damp the nobler purpose of the soul:
Could you these soothing discontents allay,
Soon should you rise where wisdom points the way;
Wisdom heaven-born, at which we all should aim,
The little vulgar, and the known to fame,
Who mean to live, within our proper sphere,
Dear to ourselves, and to our country dear.

Now tell me, whether Plancus holds a part
(For sure he well deserves it) in your heart?
Or was the reconciliation made in vain,
And like an ill-our'd wound breaks forth again,
While inexperienced youth, and blood inflam'd,
Drive ye like coursers to the yoke untam'd?
Where'er ye are, too excellent to prove
The broken union of fraternal love,
A votive heifer gratefully I feed,
For your return, in sacrifice to bleed.

EPISTLE IV.

TO ALBIUS TIBULLUS.

ALBIUS, in whom my satires find
A candid critic, and a kind,
Do you, while at your country-seat,
Some rhyming labours meditate,
That shall in volum'd bulk arise,
And even from Cassius bear the prize;
Or saunter through the silent wood,
Musing on what befits the wise and good?
Thou art not form'd of lifeless mould,
With breast inanimate and cold;
To thee the gods a form complete,
To thee the gods a fair estate
In bounty gave, with art to know
How to enjoy what they bestow.

Can a fond nurse one blessing more
Even for her favourite boy implore,
With sense and clear expression blest,
Of friendship, honour, health possess,
A table elegantly plain,
And a poetic, easy vein?

By hope inspir'd, deprest with fear,
By passion warm'd, perplex'd with care,
Believe that every morning's ray
Hath lighted up thy latest day;
Then, if to morrow's Sun be thine,
With double lustre shall it shine.

Such are the maxims I embrace,
And here, in sleek and joyous case,
You'll find, for laughter fitly bred,
A hog by Epicurus fed.

EPISTLE V.

TO TORQUATUS.

If, my Torquatus, you can kindly deign
To lie on beds of simple form and plain,
And sup on herbs alone, but richly drest,
At evening I expect you for my guest.
Nor old, I own, nor-excellent my wine,
Of five years' vintage, and a marshy vine;
If you have better, bring th' enlivening cheer,
Or, from an humble friend, this summons bear.

In hopes my honour'd guest to entertain,
My fires are lighted, my apartments clean;
Then leave the hope, that, wing'd with folly, flies;
Leave the mean quarrels, that from wealth arise;
Leave the litigious bar, for Cæsar's birth
Proclaims the festal hour of ease and mirth,
While social converse, till the rising light,
Shall stretch, beyond its length, the summer's night.

Say, what are Fortune's gifts, if I'm denied
Their cheerful use? for nearly are allied
The madman, and the fool, whose sordid care
Makes himself poor t' enrich a worthless heir.
Give me to drink, and, crown'd with flowers, despise.

The grave disgrace of being thought unwise.

What cannot wine perform? It brings to light
The secret soul; it bids the coward fight;
Gives being to our hopes, and from our hearts
Drives the dull sorrow, and inspires new arts.
Is there a wretch, whom bumpers have not taught
A flow of words, and loftiness of thought?
Even in th' oppressive grasp of poverty
It can enlarge, and bid the soul be free.

Cheerful my usual task I undertake
(And no mean figure in my office make)
That no foul linen wrinkle up the nose;
That every plate with bright reflexion shows
My guest his face; that none, when life grows gay,
The sacred hour of confidence betray.

That all in equal friendship may unite,
Your Butra and Septicius I'll invite,
And, if he's not engag'd to better cheer,
Or a kind girl, Sabinus shall be here.

Still there is room, and yet the summer's heat
May prove offensive, if the crowd be great:
But write me word, how many you desire,
Then instant from the busy world retire;
And while your tedious clients fill the hall,
Slip out at the back-door, and bilk them all.

EPISTLE VI.

TO NUMICIUS.

Nor to admire, is of all means the best,
The only means, to make, and keep us blest.

There are, untainted with the thoughts of fear,
Who see the various changes of the year
Unerring roll; who see the glorious Sun,
And the fixt stars, their annual progress run:
But with what different eye do they behold
The gifts of earth; or diamonds or gold;
Old ocean's treasures, and the pearly stores,
Wafted to furthest India's wealthy shores?
Or with what sense, what language, should we gaze
On shows, employments, or the people's praise?

Whoever dreads the opposite extreme
Of disappointment, poverty, or shame,
Is raptur'd with almost the same desire,
As he who dotes on what the world admires;
Equal their terrors, equal their surprise,
When accidental dangers round them rise.
Nor matters it, what passion fills his breast,
With joy or grief, desire or fear oppress, ^{(scene,}
Who views, with down-fixt eyes, life's varying Whose soul grows stiff, and stupified his brain.
Even virtue, when pursu'd with warmth extreme,
Turns into vice, and fools the sage's fame.

Go now, with taste improv'd, and higher gust
Admire the rich buffet, the marble bust,
The bronze antique, the purple's glowing dye,
The gem, whose radiance trembles on the eye;
Let gazing crowds your eloquence admire,
At early morn to court, at night retire,
Lest Mutus wed a wife of large estate,
While, deeper your disbonour to complete,
The low-born wretch to you no honour pays,
Though you on him with admiration gaze.

But time shall bring the latent birth to light,
And hide the present glorious race in night;
For though Agrippa's awful colonnade,
Or Applan way, thy passing pomp survey'd,
It yet remains to tread the drear descent,
Where good Pompilius and great Ancus went.

Would you not wish to cure th' acuter pains,
That rack your tortur'd side, or vex your reins?
Would you, and who would not, with pleasure live?
If virtue can alone the blessing give,
With ardent spirit her alone pursue,
And with contempt all other pleasures view.
Yet, if you think that virtue's but a name;
That groves are groves, nor from religion claim
A sacred awe; sail to the distant coast,
Nor let the rich Bithynian trade be lost.
A thousand talents be the rounded sum
You first design'd; then raise a second plum;
A third successive be your earnest care,
And add a fourth to make the mass a square;
For gold, the sovereign queen of all below,
Friends, honour, birth, and beauty can bestow;
The goddess of persuasion forms his train,
And Venus decks the well-benighted swain.

The Cappadocian king, though rich in slaves,
Yet wanting money, was but rich by halves.
Be not like him. Lucillus, as they say,
Once being ask'd to furnish for a play
"An hundred martial vests," astonish'd cried,
"Whence can so vast a number be supplied?
But yet, whate'er my wardrobe can afford,
You shall command." Soon after writes them word,
Five thousand vests were ready at a call,
They might have part, or, if they pleas'd, take all.
Poor house! where no superfluous wealth's unknown

To its rich lord, that thieves may make their own.
Well then, if wealth alone our bliss insure,
Our first, our latest toil should wealth secure:
If popularity the blessing claims,
Let's buy a slave to tell our voters' names,
And give the hint, when through the crowded street

To stretch the civil hand to all we meet.
"The Fabian tribe his interest largely sways;
This the Velinian; there a third, with ease,
Can give or take the honours of the state,
The consul's fasces, and the prætor's seat.
According to their age adopt them all,
And brother, father, most facetious call."

If he lives well, who revels out the night,
Be gluttony our guide; away, 'tis light.
Let's fish, or hunt, and then, at early day
Across the crowded Forum take our way,
Or to the Campus Martius change the scene,
And let our slaves display our hunting train,
That gazing crowds by one poor mule be taught,
At what a price the mighty boar was bought.
Then let us bathe, while th' indigested food
Lies in the swelling stomach raw and crude;

Forgetting all of decency and shame,
From the fair book of freedom strike our name;
And, like th' abandon'd Ulyssean crew,
Our Ithaca forgot, forbidden joys pursue.
If life's insipid without mirth and love,
Let love and mirth insipid life improve.
Farewell! and if a better system's thine,
Impart it frankly, or make use of mine.

EPISTLE VII.

[TO MÆCENAS.]

I promis'd at my country farm to stay
But a few days; yet August roll'd away,
And left your loiterer here. But kind forgive
(In cheerful health if you would have me live)
And to my fears the same indulgence show,
As to my real illness you bestow:
While the first fig now paints the sickly year,
And bids the black funeral pomp appear;
The father, and, with softer passions warm'd,
The tender mother for her son's alarm'd;
The crowded levee with a fever kills,
And the long lawyer's plea unseals our wills;
But when the snows on Alba plains shall lie,
To some warm sea-port town your hard shall fly,
There o'er a book, not too severely, bend,
Resolv'd to visit his illustrious friend,
When western winds and the first swallows bring
The welcome tidings of returning spring.

In other taste to me your bounty flow'd,
Than to his guest the rough Calabrian show'd—
"These pears are excellent, then, prithee, feed."
"I've eaten quite enough"—"Well. You indeed
Shall take some home—as many as you please,
For children love such little gifts as these."
"I thank you, sir, as if they all were mine."
"Well, if you leave, you leave them for the swine."
When fools and spendthrifts give what they despise,
Thin crops of gratitude will always rise.

The wise and good with better choice bestow,
And real gold from play-house counters know.
But thus much merit let me boldly claim,
No base ingratitude shall stain my name;
And yet, if I must never leave you more,
Give me my former vigour, and restore
The hair, that on the youthful forehead plays;
Give me to prate with joy, to laugh with ease,
And o'er the flowing bowl, in sighing strain,
To talk of wanton Cynara's disdain.

Into a wicker cask where coru was kept,
Perchance of meagre corps a field-mouse crept;
But when she fill'd her paunch, and sleek'd her hide,
How to get out again, in vain she tried.
A weasel, who beheld her thus distress'd,
In friendly sort the luckless mouse address'd:
"Would you escape, you must be lean and thin;
Then try the cranny where you first got in."

If in this tale th' unlucky picture's mine,
Cheerful the gifts of Fortune I resign;
Nor, with a load of luxury oppress,
Applaud the sleep that purer meals digest:
Nor would exchange, for blest Arabia's gold,
My native ease, and freedom uncontrol'd.

You oft have prais'd me, that no bold request,
A modest poet! on your friendship press'd;
My grateful language ever was the same,
I call'd you every tender, useful name;

However, try me, whether I can part
From all your bounty with a cheerful heart.

The youth, whose sire such various woes had
To Menelaus, not unwise, replied, [tried,

" Our island hath no rich and fertile plain,
No wide-extended course, in which to train
The generous horse; then grant me to refuse
A present; that you better know to use."
For little folks become their little fate,
And, at my age, not Rome's imperial seat,
But soft Tarentum's more delicious ease,
Or Tibur's solitude, my taste can please.

Philip, whose youth was spent in feats of war,
Now grown a famous lawyer at the bar,
Returning from the courts one sultry day,
Complain'd, how tedious was the lengthen'd way
To folks in years; then wistfully survey'd
A new-trimm'd spark, who, joying in the shade,
Loll'd in a barber's shop, with ease reclin'd,
And par'd his nails, right indolent of mind.
" Demetrius" (so was call'd his favourite slave,
For such commissions a right-trusty knave),
" Run and inquire of yon or fellow straight,
His name, friends, country, patron, and estate."

He goes, returns, and—" Menas is his name;
Of moderate fortune, but of honest fame;
A public crier, who a thousand ways
Bustles to get, and then enjoys his ease.
A boon companion 'mongst his equals known,
And the small house he lives in is his own.
His business over, to the public shows,
Or to the field of Mars, he sauntering goes."

" Methinks, I long to see this wondrous wight.
Bid him be sure to sup with me to night."
Menas, with awkward wonder, scarce believes
The courteous invitation he receives:
At last politely begs to be excus'd—
" And am I then with insolence refus'd?"
" Whether from too much fear, or too much pride,
I know not, but he flatly has denied."

Philip next morn our honest pedlar found
Dealing his iron merchandise around
To his small chaps;—the first good-morrow gave;
Menas confus'd—" Behold a very slave,
To business chain'd, or I should surely wait
An early client at your worship's gate;
Or had I first perceiv'd you—as I live!"—
" Well, sup with me to-night, and I forgive
All past neglect. Be punctual to your hour;
Remember, I expect you just at four.
Till then farewell; your growing fortunes mend,
And know me for your servant and your friend."

Behold him now at supper, where he said,
Or right or wrong, what came into his head.
When Philip saw his eager gudgeon bite,
At morn an early client, and at night
A certain guest, his project to complete,
He takes him with him to his country-seat.
On horseback now he ambles at his ease,
The soil, the climate, his incessant praise.

Philip, who well observ'd our simple guest,
Laughs in his sleeve, resolv'd to have his jest
At any rate; then lends him fifty pound,
And promis'd fifty more, to buy a spot of ground.

But, that our tale no longer be delay'd, [made
Bought is the ground, and our spruce merchant
A very rustic, now, at endless rate,
Vineyards and furrows are his constant prate.
He plants his elms for future vines to rise,
Grows old with care, and on the prospect dies.

But when his goats by sickness, and by thieves
His sheep are lost, his crop his hope deceives,
When his one ox is kill'd beneath the yoke,
Such various losses his best spirits broke.
At midnight dragging out his only horse,
He drives to Philip's house his desperate course;
Who, when he saw him rogh, deform'd with hair,
" Your ardent love of pelf, your too much care Hath surely brought you to this dismal plight"—
" Oh! call me wretch, if you would call me right,
But let this wretch your clemency implore,
By your good genius; by each heavenly power;
By that right hand, sure never pledg'd in vain,
Restore to me my former life again."

To his first state let him return with speed,
Who sees how far the joys he left exceed
His present choice: for all should be confin'd
Within the bounds which Nature hath assign'd.

EPISTLE VIII.

TO CELSUS ABRINOVANUS.

To Celsus, Muse, my warmest wishes bear,
And if be kindly ask you how I fare,
Say, though I threaten many a fair design,
Nor happiness, nor wisdom, yet are mine.
Not that the driving hail my vineyards beat;
Not that my olives are destroy'd with heat;
Not that my cattle pine in distant plains—
More in my mind than body lie my pains.
Reading I hate, and with unwilling ear
The voice of comfort or of health I bear:
Friends or physicians I with pain endure,
Who strive this languor of my soul to cure.
Whate'er may hurt me, I with joy pursue;
Whate'er may do me good, with horror view.
Inconstant as the wind, I various rove;
At Tibur, Rome; at Rome, I Tibur love.

Ask how he does; what happy arts support
His prince's favour, nor offend the court;
If all be well, say first, that we rejoice,
And then, remember, with a gentle voice
Instil this precept on his list'ning ear,
" As you your fortune, we shall Celsus bear."

EPISTLE IX.

TO CLAUDIUS NERO.

SEPTIMIUS only knows, at least would seem
To know, the rank I hold in your esteem;
Then asks, nay more, compels me to present him
(Nor will a moderate share of praise content him)
Worthy of Nero's family, and heart,
Where only men of merit claim a part.
When fondly he persuades himself I hold
A place among your nearer friends enroll'd,
Much better than myself he sees and knows
How far my interest with Tiberius goes.

A thousand things I urg'd to be excus'd,
Though fearful, if too warmly I refus'd,
I might, perhaps, a mean dissembler seem,
To make a property of your esteem.

Thus have I with a friend's request complied,
And on the confidence of courts relied:
If you forgive me, to your heart receive
The man I love, and know him good and brave.

EPISTLE X.

TO ARISTIUS FUSCUS.

To Fuscus, who in city-sports delights,
A country-bard with gentle greeting writes;
In this we differ, but in all beside,
Like twin-born brothers, are our souls allied;
And, as a pair of fondly constant doves,
What one dislikes, the other disapproves.
You keep the nest, I love the rural mead,
The brook, the mossy rock, and woody glade;
In short, I live and reign, whene'er I fly
The joys you vaunt with rapture to the sky,
And like a slave, from the priest's service fled,
I nauseate honied cakes, and long for bread.

Would you to Nature's laws obedience yield;
Would you a house for health or pleasure build,
Where is there such a situation found,
As when the country spreads its blessings round?
Where is th' intemperate winter less severe?
Or, when the Sun ascending fires the year,
Where breathes a milder zephyr to assuage
The Dog-star's fury, or the Lion's rage?
Where do less envious cares disturb our rest?
Or are the fields, in Nature's colours drest,
Less grateful to the smell, or to the sight,
Than the rich floor, with inlaid marble bright?
Is water purer from the bursting lead,
Than gently murmuring down its native bed?
Among your columns, rich with various dyes,
Unnatural woods with awkward art arise:
You praise the house, whose situation yields
An open prospect to the distant fields;
For Nature, driven out with proud disdain,
All-powerful goddess, will return again;
Return in silent triumph, to deride
The weak attempts of luxury and pride.

The man, who cannot with judicious eye
Discern the fleece, that drinks the Tyrian dye,
From the pale Latian; yet shall ne'er sustain
A loss so touchings, of such heart-felt pain,
As he, who can't, with sense of happier kind,
Distinguish truth from falsehood in the mind.

They who in Fortune's smiles too much delight,
Shall tremble when the goddess takes her flight;
For, if her gifts our fonder passions gain,
The frail possession we resign with pain.

Then fly from grandeur, and the haughty great;
The cottage offers a secure retreat,
Where you may make that heart-felt bliss your
To kings, and favourites of kings, unknown. [own,

A lordly stag, arm'd with superior force,
Drove from their common field a vanquish'd horse,
Who, for revenge, to man his strength enslav'd,
Took up his rider, and the bitt receiv'd:
But though he conquer'd in the martial strife,
He felt his rider's weight, and champ'd the bitt for life.

So he, who poverty with horror views,
Nor frugal Nature's beauty knows to use;
Who sells his freedom in exchange for gold
(Freedom, for mines of wealth too cheaply sold),
Shall make eternal servitude his fate,
And feel a haughty master's galling weight.

Our fortunes and our shoes are near allied;
Pinch'd in the strait, we stumble in the wide.
Cheerful and wise, your present lot enjoy,
And on my head your just rebukes employ,

If e'er, forgetful of my former self,
I toil to raise unnecessary pelf,
Gold is the slave, or tyrant, of the soul;
Unworthy to command, it better brooks controul.
These lines behind Vacuna's fane I penn'd,
Sincerely blest, but that I want my friend.

EPISTLE XL

TO BULLATIUS.

Do the fam'd islands of th' Ionian seas,
Chios, or Lesbos, my Bullatius please?
Or Sardis, where great Croesus held his court?
Say, are they less, or greater, than report?
Does Samos, Colophon, or Smyrna, yield
To our own Fibur, or to Marr's field?
Would you, fatigu'd with toils of lands and seas,
In Lebedus, or Asia, spend your days?

You tell me, Lebedus is now become
A desert, like our villages at home,
Yet there you gladly fix your future lot,
Your friends forgetting, by your friends forgot;
Enjoy the calm of life, and, safe on shore,
At distance hear the raging tempest roar.

A traveller, though wet with dirt and rain,
Would not for ever at an inn remain,
Or chill'd with cold, and joying in the heat
Of a warm bath, believe his bliss complete.
Though by strong winds your bark were tempest-
Say, would you sell it on a distant coast? [test,

Believe me, at delicious Rhodes to live
To a sound mind no greater bliss can give,
Than a thick coat in summer's burning ray,
Or a light mantle on a snowy day,
Or to a swimmer Tiber's freezing stream,
Or sunny rooms in August's mid-day flame.
While yet 'tis in your power; while Fortune smiles,
At Rome with rapture vaunt those happy isles,
Then with a grateful hand the bliss receive,
If Heaven an hour more fortunate shall give.
Seize on the present joy, and thus possess,
Where'er you live, an inward happiness.

If reason only can our cares allay,
Not the bold site, that wide commands the sea;
If they, who through the venturous ocean range,
Not their own passions, but the climate change;
Anxious through seas and land to search for rest
Is but laborious idleness at best.
In desert Ulubrae the bliss you'll find,
If you preserve a firm and equal mind.

EPISTLE XLII

TO ICCIUS.

While Iccius farms Agrippa's large estate,
If he with wisdom can enjoy his fate,
No greater riches Jove himself can give;
Then cease complaining, friend, and learn to live,
He is not poor to whom kind Fortune grants,
Even with a frugal hand, what Nature wants.

Are you with food, and warmth, and raiment
Not royal treasures are of more possess; [blest?
And if, for herbs and shell-fish at a feast,
You leave the various luxuries of taste,
Should Fate enrich you with a golden stream,
Your life and manners would be still the same;

Whether convinc'd, that gold can't change the soul,

Or that fair virtue should its power control.

That all his neighbours' flocks and herds should
The sage's harvest, while without its weight [eat
His spirit rov'd abroad, shall ne'er be told
As wonderful; since, not debas'd by gold,
And its infection, Iocius, bravely wise,
Spurns this vile earth, and soars into the skies;
Curious to search, what bounds old ocean's tides;
What through the various year the seasons guides:
Whether the stars by their own proper force,
Or foreign power, pursue their wandering course:
Why shadows darken the pale queen of night;
Whence she renews her orb, and spreads her light;
What nature's jarring sympathy can mean, [tain.
And who, among the wise, their systems best main-

But whether slaughter'd on our crown your board,
Or murder'd fish an impious feast afford,
Receive Pompeius Grosphus to your heart,
And, ere he asks, your willing aid impart;
He ne'er shall make a bold, unjust request,
And friends are cheap, when good men are distrust.

Now condescend to hear the public news:
Agrippa's war the sons of Spain subdues.
The fierce Armenian Nero's virtue feels:
Short by the knees the haughty Parthian kneels:
Again the monarch is by Cæsar crown'd,
And Plenty pours her golden harvest round.

EPISTLE XIII.

TO VINIUS AERLLA.

VINUS, I oft desir'd you, ere you went,
Well seal'd my rhyming volumes to present
When Cæsar's high in health, in spirits gay,
Or if he ask to read th' unoffer'd lay,
Lest you offend with too officious zeal,
And my poor works his just resentment feel.
Throw down the burden, if it gall your back,
Nor at the palace fiercely break the pack,
Lest my dear ass become the laughing sport,
The quibbling fable of the wits at court.

Through rivers, steeps, and fens, exert your force,
Nor, when you're victor of the destin'd course,
Under your arm the letter'd bundle bear,
As rustics do their lambs, with awkward air;
Or Pyrrhia, reeling from the drunken bowl,
Conveys away the ball of wool she stole;
Or, in his pride, a tribe-invited guest
Carries his cap and slippers to a feast;
Nor loud proclaim, with how much toil you bear
Such verse, as may detain even Cæsar's ear.
Farewell, make haste; and special caution take,
Lest you should stumble, and my orders break.

EPISTLE XIV.

TO HIS STEWARD IN THE COUNTRY.

THOU steward of the woods and country-seat,
That give me to myself; whose small estate,
Which you despise, five worthy fathers sent,
One from each house, to Varia's parliament:
Let us enquire, if you with happier toil
Root out the thorns and thistles of the soil,
Than Horace tears his follies from his breast;
Whether my farm or I be cultivated best.

Though Lamia's pious tears, that ceaseless mourn
His brother's death, have hinder'd my return,
Thither my warmest wishes bend their force,
Start from the goal, and beat the distant course.
Rome is your rapture, mine the rural seat;
Pleas'd with each other's lot, our own we hate:
But both are fools, and fools in like extreme;
Guiltless the place, that we unjustly blame,
For in the mind alone our follies lie,
The mind, that never from itself can fly.

A slave at Rome, and discontented there,
A country-life was once your silent prayer:
A rustic grown, your first desires return;
For Rome, her public games and baths, you burn,
More constant to myself, I leave with pain,
By hateful business forc'd, the rural scene.
From different objects our desires arise,
And thence the distance that between us lies;
For what you call inhospitably drear,
To me with beauty and delight appear.
Full well I know a tavern's greasy stean,
And a vile stew, with joy your heart inflame,
While my small farm yields rather herbs than vines,
Nor there a neighbouring tavern pours its wine,
Nor harlot-minstrel sings, when the rude sound
Tempts you with heavy heels to thump the ground.

But you complain, that with unceasing toil
You break, alas! the long unbroken soil,
Or loose the wearied oxen from the plough,
And feed with leaves new-gather'd from the bough.
Then feels your laziness an added pain,
If e'er the rivulet be swoln with rain;
What mighty mounds against its force you rear,
To teach its rage the sunny mead to spare!

Now hear, from whence our sentiments divide:
In youth, perhaps with not ungraceful pride,
I wore a silken robe, perfum'd my hair,
And without presents charm'd the venal fair:
From early morning quaff'd the flowing glass;
Now a short supper charms, or on the grass
To lay me down at some fair river's side,
And sweetly slumber as the waters glide;
Nor do I blush to own my follies past,
But own, those follies should no longer last.

None there with eye askance my pleasures view,
With hatred dark, or poison'd spite pursues;
My neighbours laugh to see with how much toil
I carry stones, or break the stubborn soil.
You with my city-slaves would gladly join,
And on their daily pittance hardly dine;
While more refin'd they view with envious eye
The gardens, horses, fires, that you enjoy.

Thus the slow ox would gaudy trappings claim;
The sprightly horse would plough amidst the team:
By my advice, let each with cheerful heart,
As best he understands, employ his art.

EPISTLE XV.

TO VALA.

By my physician's learn'd advice I fly
From Baia's waters, yet with angry eye
The village views me, when I mean to bathe
The middle winter's freezing wave beneath;
Loudly complaining, that their myrtle groves
Are now neglected; their sulphureous stoves,
Of ancient fame our feeble nerves to raise,
And dissipate the lingering cold disease,

While the sick folks in Clusium's fountains dare
Plunge the bold head, or seek a colder air.

The road we now must alter, and engage
Th' unwilling horse to pass his usual stage:
"Ho! whither now?" his angry rider cries,
And to the left the restive bridle plies.
"We go no more to Baiæ, prithee hear—"
But in his bridle lies an horse's ear.

Dear Vala, say, how temperate, how severe,
Are Velia's winters, and Salernum's air:
The genius of the folks, the roads how good:
Which eats the better bread, and when a flood
Of rain descends, which quaffs the gather'd shower,
Or do their fountains purer water pour?
Their country-vintage is not worth my care,
For though at home, whatever wine, I bear,
At sea-port towns I shall expect to find
My wines of generous and of smoother kind,
To drive away my cares, and to the soul,
Through the full veins, with golden hopes to roll;
With flowing language to inspire my tongue,
And make the listening fair—one think me young.

With hares or boars which country's best sup-
Which seas their better fish luxurious hide? [plied?
That I may home return in luscious plight—
'Tis ours to credit, as 'tis yours to write.

When Mænius had consum'd, with gallant heart,
A large estate, he took the jester's art:
A vagrant zany, of no certain mang'r,
Who knew not, ere he din'd, or friend or stranger:
Cruel, and scurrilous to all, his jest;
The ruin'd butcher's gulf, a storm, a pest.
What'er he got his ravening guts receive,
And when or friend or foe no longer gave,
A lamb's fat paunch was a delicious treat,
As much as three voracious bears could eat;
Then, like reformer Bestius, would he tell ye,
That gluttons should be branded on the belly.

But if, perchance, he found some richer fare,
Instant it vanish'd into smoke and air—
"By Jove I wonder not, that folks should eat,
At one delicious meal, a whole estate,
For a fat thrush is most delightful food,
And a swine's paunch superlatively good."

Thus I, when better entertainments fail,
Bravely commend a plain and frugal meal;
On cheaper suppers show myself full wise,
But if some dainties more luxurious rise—

"Right sage and happy they alone, whose fate
Gives them a splendid house, and large estate."

EPISTLE XVI.

TO QUINCTIUS.

Ask not, good Quinctius, if my farm maintain
Its wealthy master with abundant grain,
With fruits or pastures; ask not, if the vine
Around its bridegroom-elm luxuriant twine,
For I'll describe, and in loquacious strain,
The site and figure of the pleasing scene.

A chain of mountains with a vale divide,
That opens to the Sun on either side:
The right wide spreading to the rising day,
The left is warm'd beneath his setting ray.
How mild the climate, where sloes luxurious grow,
And blushing cornels on the hawthorn glow!
My cattle are with plenteous acorns fed,
Whose various oaks around their master spread;

Well might you swear, that here Tarentum waves
Its dusky shade, and pours forth all its leaves:
A fountain to a rivulet gives its name,
Cooler and purer than a Thracian stream;
Useful to ease an aching head it flows,
Or when with burning pains the stomach glows.

This pleasing, this delicious soft retreat
In safety guards me from September's heat.

Would you be happy, be the thing you seem,
And sure you now possess the world's esteem;
Nor yet to others too much credit give,
But in your own opinion learn to live;
For know, the bias in our own judgment lies,
And none are happy but the good and wise.
Nor, tho' the crowd pronounce your health is good,
Disguise the fever lurking in your blood,
Till trembling seize you at th' unfinished meal—
Idcots alone their ulcer'd ills conceal. [ears,

Should some bold flatterer sooth your listoning
"The conquer'd world, dread sir, thy name reveres;
And Jove our guardian god, with power divine,
Who watches o'er Rome's happiness and thine,
Yet holds it doubtful, whether Rome or you,
With greater warmth, each other's good pursue."
This praise, you own, is sacred Cæsar's fame;
But can you answer to your proper name,
When you are call'd th' accomplish'd or the wise,
Names, which we all with equal ardour prize?
Yet he, who gives to day this heedless praise,
Shall take it back to morrow, if he please.

As when the people from some worthless knave
Can tear away the consulship they gave;
"Lay down the name of wisdom, sir, 'tis mine;"
Confus'd I leave him, and his gifts resign.
What if he said, I hang'd my aged sire,
Call'd me a thief, a slave to lewd desire,
Shall I be tortur'd with unjust disgrace,
Or change the guilty colours of my face?
False praise can charm, unreal shame control—
Whom, but a vicious or a sickly soul?
Who then is good?

QUINCTIUS.

Who carefully observes
The senate's wise decrees, nor ever swerves
From the known rules of justice and the laws:
Whose bail secures, whose oath decides a cause.

HORACE.

Yet his own house, his neighbours, through his art
Behold an inward baseness in his heart.
Suppose a slave should say, "I never steal,
I never ran away"—"Nor do you feel
The flagrant lash"—"No human blood I shed"—
"Nor on the crows the ravening crows have fed."—
"But, sir, I am an honest slave, and wise—"
"My Sabine neighbour there the fact denies.
For wily wolves the fatal pitfall fear;
Kites fly the bait, and hawks the latent snare;
But virtuous minds a love of virtue charms:
The fear of chastisement thy guilt alarms.
When from my stores you steal one grain of wheat,
My loss indeed is less, your crime as great."

Your honest man, on whom with awful praise
The forum and the courts of justice gaze,
If e'er he make a public sacrifice,
Dread Janus, Phœbus, clear and loud he cries;
But when his prayer in earnest is preferr'd
Scarce moves his lips, afraid of being heard,
"Beauteous Laverna, my petition bear;
Let me with truth and sanctity appear:

Oh! give me to deceive, and with a veil
Of darkness and of night my crimes conceal."

Behold the miser bending down to earth
For a poor farthing, which the boys in mirth
Fix'd to the ground; and shall the caitiff dare
In honest freedom with a slave compare?

Whoever wishes is with fear possess'd,
And he, who holds that passion in his breast,
Is in my sense a slave; hath left the post
Where virtue plac'd him, and his arms hath lost:
To purchase hasty wealth, his force applies,
And overwhelm'd beneath his burthen lies.

Say, is not this a very worthless knave?
But if you have the most untoward slave,
Yet kill him not, he may some profit yield,
Of strength to guard your flocks, and plough your
Or let him winter in the stormy main, [field,
By imports to reduce the price of grain.

The good, and wise, like Bacchus in the play,
Dare, to the king of Thebes, undaunted say, [dain."
"What can thy power? Thy threatenings I dis-

PENTHEUS.

I'll take away thy goods.

BACCHUS.

Perhaps, you mean.

My cattle, money, moveables, or land.
Well; take them all.

PENTHEUS.

But, slave, if I command,
A cruel jailor shall thy freedom seize.

BACCHUS.

A god shall set me free when'er I please.

BORACE.

Death is that god, the poet here intends,
That utmost bound, where human sorrow ends.

EPISTLE XVII.

TO SCAVA.

ALTHOUGH my Scava knows, with art complete,
How to converse familiar with the great,
Yet to th' instruction of an humble friend,
Who would himself be better taught, attend;
Tho' blind your guide, some precepts yet unknown
He may disclose, which you may make your own.

Are you with tranquil, easy pleasure blest,
Or after sun-rise love an hour of rest,
If dusty streets, the rattling chariot's noise,
Or if the neighbouring tavern's midnight joys,
Delight you not, by my advice retreat
To the calm raptures of a rural seat:
For pleasure's not confin'd to wealth alone,
Nor ill he lives, who lives and dies unknown;
But would you serve your friends, and joyous waste
The bounteous hour, perfume you for the feast.

"His patient herbs could Aristippus eat,
He had disdain'd the tables of the great,"
"And he, who censures me," the sage replies,
"If he could live with kings, would herbs despise."

Tell me, which likes you best, or, younger, hear,
Why Aristippus' maxims best appear;
For with the snarling cynic well he play'd,
"I am my own buffoon, you take the trade
To please the crowd; yet sure 'tis better pride,
Maintain'd by monarchs, on my horse to ride.
But while at court observant I attend,
For things of vileness you submissive bend;

Owp a superior, and yet proudly vaunt,
Imperious cynic, that you nothing want."

Yet Aristippus every dress became:
In every various change of life the same;
And though he aim'd at things of higher kind,
Yet to the present held an equal mind.
But that a man, whom patience taught to wear
A thick, coarse coat, should ever learn to bear
A change of life with decency and ease,
May justly, I confess, our wonder raise.

Yet Aristippus, though but meanly dress'd,
Nor wants, nor wishes for, a purple vest;
He walks, regardless of the public gaze,
And knows in every character to please;
But neither dog's nor snake's evenom'd bite
Can, like a silken robe, the Cynic fright.
"Give him his mantle, or he dies with cold—"
"Nay, give it, let the fool his blessing hold."

In glorious war a triumph to obtain,
Celestial honours, and a seat shall gain
Fast by the throne of Jove; nor mean the praise
These deities of human kind to please.

"But, midst the storms and tempests of a court,
Not every one shall reach the wish'd-for port;
And sure the man, who doubts of his success,
Wisely declines th' attempt."—Then you confess,
That who succeeds, thus difficult his part,
Gives the best proof of courage, as of art.

Then, here, or no where, we the truth shall find;
Conscious how weak in body, or in mind,
When we behold the burthen with despair,
Which others boldly try, with spirit bear,
If virtue's aught beyond an empty name,
Rewards and honours they with justice claim.

In silence who their poverty conceal,
More than th' importunate, with kings prevail:
And whether we with modest action take,
Or snatch the favour, may some difference make.

From this fair fountain our best profits rise:
For, when with plaintive tone a suppliant cries,
"My sister lies unportion'd on my hands;
My mother's poor, nor can I sell my lands,
Or they maintain me;" might he not have said,
"Give me, ah! give me, sir, my daily bread?"
While he, who hears him, chants on t'other side,
"With me your bounty, ah! with me divide:"
But had the crow his food in silence eat,
Less had his quarrels been, and more his meat.

A jaunt of pleasure should my lord intend,
And with him deign to take an humble friend,
To talk of broken roads, of cold and rain,
Or of his plunder'd baggage to complain,
Is but the trick, which wily harlots try;
Who for a bracelet, or a necklace, cry;
So oft they weep, that we believe no more
When they with tears a real loss deplore.

He, whom a lying lameness once deceives,
No more the falling vagabond believes;
And though with streaming tears the caitiff cries,
"Help me, ah! cruel, help a wretch to rise!"
Though loud he swear, "Indeed my leg is broke";
By great Osiris, I no longer joke!"
Yet the hoarse village answers to his cries,
"Go, find a stranger to believe your lies."

EPISTLE XVIII.

TO LOLLIVS.

LOLLIVS, if well I know your heart;
Your liberal spirit scorns an art

That can to sordid flattery bend,
And basely counterfeit the friend;
For such the difference, I ween,
The flatterer and friend between,
As is betwixt a virtuous dame,
And prostitute of common fame.

Behold, in opposite excess,
A different vice, though nothing less;
Rustic, inelegant, uncouth,
With shaggy beard and nasty tooth,
That fondly would be thought to be Fair virtue, and pure liberty:
But virtue in a medium lies,
From whence these different follies rise.

Another, with devotion fervent,
Is more than your obsequious servant;
Admitted as an humble guest,
Where men of money break their jest,
He waits the nod, with awe profound,
And catches, ere it reach the ground,
The falling joke, and echoes back the sound,
A school-boy thus, with humble air,
Repeats to pedagogue severe;
Thus players act an under-part,
And fear to put forth all their art.

Another in dispute engages,
With nonsense arm'd for nothing rages,
"My word of honour not believ'd?
Or my opinion not receiv'd?
And shall I, whether right or wrong,
Be forc'd, forsooth, to hold my tongue?
No—at a price so base and mean,
I would a thousand lives disdain."

But what's the cause of all this rage?
Who's the best actor on the stage,
Or to which road you best may turn ye,
If to Brundisium lies your journey.

Now, Lollius, mark the wretch's fate,
Who lives dependant on the great.

If the precipitating dice,
If Venus be his darling vice;
If vanity his wealth consumes
In dressing, feasting, and perfumes;
If thirst of gold his bosom sways,
A thirst which nothing can assuage;
If poverty with shame he views,
And wealth with every vice pursues;
My lord, more vicious as more great,
Views him with horreur, and with hate:
At least, shall o'er him tyrannize,
And like a fond mamma advise,
Who bids her darling daughter shun
The paths of folly she had run.
"Think not," he cries, "to live like me;
My wealth supports my vanity;
Your folly should be moderate,
Proportion'd to a small estate."

Eutrapelus, in merry mood,
The objects of his wrath pursued,
And where the deepest vengeance meant,
Fine clothes, with cruel bounty, sent,
For, when the happy coxcomb's drest,
Strange hopes and projects fill his breast;
He sleeps till noon, nor will the varlet,
For fame or fortune, leave his harlot.
Lavish he feeds the usurer's store,
And when the miser lends no more,
He learns the gladiator's art,
Or humbly drives a gardener's cart.

Strive not with mean, unhandsome love,
Your patron's bosom to explore,
And let not wine, or anger, wreat
Th' entrusted secret from your breast.

Nor blame the pleasures of your friend,
Nor to your own too earnest bend;
Nor idly court the froward Muse,
While he the vigorous chase pursues.
Humours like these could fatal prove
To Zethus' and Amphion's love,
Until Amphion kind complied,
And laid th' offensive lyre aside.
So to your patron's will give way,
His gentle insolence obey,
And when he pours into the plain
His horses, hounds, and hunting-train,
Break from the pcevisch Muse away,
Divide the toils, and share the prey.

The chase was by our sires esteem'd,
Healthful, and honourable deem'd.
Thy swiftness far the hound's exceeds;
The boar beneath thy javelin bleeds;
And who, like thee, with grace can wield
The weapons of the martial field,
Or with such loud applause as thine
Amidst the youthful battle shine?

In the destructive war of Spain
Early you made your first campaign,
Beneath a leader, who regains
Our eagles from the Parthian fanes,
Who boundless now extends his sway,
And bids a willing world obey.

Lollius, though all your actions rise
From judgment temperate and wise,
Yet oft at home you can unbend,
And even to trifling sports descend.
Your little boats, with mimic fleet,
Like Actium's mighty fleets engage;
Your lake like Adria's ocean spreads,
The adverse war your brother leads,
Till Victory her wings display,
And crown the conqueror of the day.
Cæsar, who finds that you approve
His taste, shall your diversions love.

If my advice regard may claim,
Be tender of another's fame,
And be the man with caution tried,
In whose discretion you confide.
Th' impertinent be sur'd to hate;
Who loves to ask, will love to prate.
Ears, that unfold to every tale,
Entrusted secrets ill conceal,
And you shall wish, but wish in vain,
To call the fleeting words again.

With cautious judgment, o'er and o'er,
The man you recommend explore,
Lest, when the scoundrel's better known,
You blush for errors not your own.
Then frankly give him up to shame,
But boldly guard the injur'd fame
Of a well-known and valued friend,
With vigour and with zeal defend;
For, be assur'd, when he's defam'd,
At you th' evenom'd shaft is aim'd.
When flames your neighbour's dwelling seize,
Your own with instant rage shall blaze;
Then haste to stop the spreading fire,
Which, if neglected, rises higher.

Untried, how sweet a court attendance!
When tried, how dreadful the dependance!

Yet, while your vessel's under sail,
Be sure to catch the flying gale,
Lest adverse winds, with rapid force,
Should bear you from your destin'd course;

The grave a gay companion shun;
Far from the sad the jovial run;
The gay, the witty, and sedate,
Are objects of each other's hate;
And they, who quaff their midnight glass,
Scorn them who dare their bumper pass,
Although they loudly swear, they dread
A sick debauch, and aching head.

Be every look serenely gay,
And drive all cloudy cares away.
The modest oft too dark appear,
The silent, thoughtful and severe.

Consult with care the learned page;
Inquire of every scienc'd sage,
How you may glide with gentle ease
Adown the current of your days,
Nor vex by mean and low desires,
Nor warm'd by wild ambition's fires,
By hope alarm'd, deprest by fear,
For things but little worth your care:
Whether fair virtue's hallow'd rules
Proceed from Nature, or the schools;
What may the force of care suspend,
And make you to yourself a friend;
Whether the tranquil mind and pure,
Honours, or wealth, our bliss insure,
Or down through life unknown to stray,
Where lonely leads the silent way.

When happy in my rural scene,
Whose fountain chills the shuddering swain,
Such is my prayer—Let me possess
My present wealth, or even less,
And if the bounteous gods design
A longer life, that life be mine.
Give me of books the mental cheer,
Of wealth sufficient for a year,
Nor let me float in Fortune's power,
Dependant on the future hour.
To love for life and wealth I pray,
These Jove may give, or take away;
But, for a firm and tranquil mind,
That blessing in myself I find.

EPISTLE XIX.

TO MÆCENAS.

To old Cratinus if you credit give,
No water-drinker's verses long shall live,
Or long shall please. Among his motley fold,
Satyrs and Fauns, when Bacchus had enroll'd
The brain-sick rhymers, soon the tuneful Nine
At morning breath'd, and not too sweet, of wine.

When Homer sings the joys of wine, 'tis plain
Great Homer was not of a sober strain;
And father Ennius, till with drinking fir'd,
Was never to the martial song inspir'd.
Let thirsty spirits make the bar their choice,
Nor dare in cheerful song to raise their voice.
Soon as I spoke, our bards, before they write,
Smell of their wine all day, and tippie all the night.
What! if with naked feet and savage air,
Cato's short coat some mimic coxcomb wear,
Say, shall his habit and affected gloom,
Great Cato's manners, or his worth, assume?

Corvus, the Moor, while studious how to please
With well-bred raillery, and learned ease,
To rival gay Timagenes he tried,
Yet burst with disappointed spleen and pride:
By such examples many a coxcomb's caught,
Whose art can only imitate a fault.

Should I by chance grow pale, our bantings
That bloodless cumin's the true ^{[think,} ^{imitating]} drink
Ye wretched mimics, whose fond heats have been,
How oft! the objects of my mirth and spleen.
Through open worlds of rhyme I dar'd to tread
In paths unknown, by no bold footsteps led:
Who on himself relies with conscious pride,
Most certainly the buzzing hive shall guide.
To keep lambics I first tun'd the lyre,
And, warm'd with great Archilochus's fire,
His rapid numbers chose, but shunn'd with care
The style that drove Lycambes to despair.

I fear'd to change the structure of his line,
But shall a short liv'd wreath be therefore mine?
Sappho, whose verse with manly spirit glows,
Even great Alceus his lambics chose,
In different stanzas though he forms his lines,
And to a theme more merciful inclines;
No perjurd sire with blood-stain'd verse pursues,
Nor ties, in damning rhyme, his fair-one's noose.
I first attempted in the lyric tone
His numbers, to the Roman lyre unknown,
And joy, that works of such unboard'd taste
By men of worth and genius were embrac'd.

But would you know, why some condemn abroad,
Thankless, unjust, what they at home applaud?
I purchase not the venal critic's vote
With costly suppers, or a thread-bare coat;
The works of titled wits I never hear,
Nor, vengeful in my turn, assault their ear.
The tribe of grammar-pedants I despise,
And hence these tears of spleen and anger rise.
I blush in grand assemblies to repeat
My worthless works, and give such trifles weight;
Yet these professions they with wonder hear—
"No. You reserve them for dread Cæsar's ear;
With your own beauties charm'd, you surely know
Your verses with a bonied sweetness flow."
Nor dare I rally with such dangerous folk,
Lest I be torn to pieces for a joke,
Yet beg they would appoint another day,
A place more proper to decide the fray;
For jests a fearful strife and anger breed,
Whence quarrels fierce and funeral wars proceed.

EPISTLE XX.

TO HIS BOOK.

The shops of Rome impatient to behold,
And, elegantly polish'd, to be sold,
You hate the tender seal, and guardian keys,
Which modest volumes love, and fondly praise
The public world, even sighing to be read—
Unhappy book! to other manners bred
Indulge the fond desire, with which you burn,
Pursue your flight, yet think not to return.

But, when insulted by the critic's scorn,
How often shall you cry, "Ah! me forlorn!"
When he shall throw the tedious volume by,
Nor longer view thee with a lover's eye.
If rage mislead not my prophetic truth, [youths]
Rome shall admire, while you can charm with

But soon as vulgar hands thy beauty soil,
The moth shall batten on the silent spoil,
To Afric sent, or packeted to Spain,
Our colonies of wits to entertain.
This shall thy fond adviser laughing see,
As, when his ass was obstinate like thee,
The clown in vengeance push'd him down the hill:
For who would save an ass against his will?

At last thy stammering age in suburb schools
Shall toil in teaching boys their grammar-rules;
But when in evening mild the listening tribe
Around thee throng, thy master thus describe:
A freed-man's son, with moderate fortune blest,
Who boldly spread his wings beyond his nest;
Take from my birth, but to my virtue give
This honest praise, that I with freedom live,
With all that Rome in peace and war calls great;
Of lowly stature; fond of summer's heat,
And gray before my time. At sense of wrong
Quick in resentment, but it lasts not long.
Let them who ask my age be frankly told,
That I was forty-four Decembers old,
When Lollius chose with Lepidus to share
The power and honours of the consul's chair.

EPISTLE I.

TO AUGUSTUS.

WHILE you alone sustain th' important weight
Of Rome's affairs, so various and so great;
While you the public weal with arms defend,
Adorn with morals, and with laws amend;
Shall not the tedious letter prove a crime,
That steals one moment of your Cæsar's time?

Rome's founder, Leda's twins, the god of wine,
By human virtues rais'd to power divine,
While they with pious cares improv'd mankind,
To various states their proper bounds assign'd;
Commanded war's destroying rage to cease,
And bless'd their cities with the arts of peace;
Complain'd their virtues, and their toils, could raise
But slight returns of gratitude and praise.

Who crush'd the Hydra, when to life renew'd,
And monsters dire with fated toil subdu'd,
Found that the monster Envy never dies,
Till low in equal death her conqueror lies;
For he, who soars to an unwonted height,
Oppressive dazzles, with excess of light,
The arts beneath him; yet, when dead, shall prove
An object worthy of esteem and love.
Yet Rome to thee her living honours pays:
By thee we swear, to thee our altars raise,
While we confess no prince so great, so wise,
Hath ever risen, or shall ever rise.

But when your people raise their Cæsar's name
Above the Greek and Roman chiefs in fame,
In this one instance they are just and wise,
Yet other things they view with other eyes;
With cold contempt they treat the living bard;
The dead alone can merit their regard.

To elder bards so lavish of applause,
They love the language of our ancient laws;

On Numa's hymns with holy rapture pore,
And turn our mouldy records o'er and o'er;
Then swear, transported, that the sacred Nine
Pronounc'd on Alba's top each hallow'd line.

But if, because the world with justice pays
To the first bards of Greece its grateful praise,
In the same scale our poets must be weigh'd,
To such disputes what answer can be made?
Since we have gain'd the height of martial fame,
Let us in peaceful arts assert our claim;
The anointed Greeks no longer shall excite,
And neither wrestle, sing, or paint, so well.

But let me ask, since poetry, like wine,
Is taught by time to mellow and refine,
When shall th' immortal bari begin to live?
Say, shall a hundred years completely give
Among your ancients a full right of claim,
Or with the worthless moderns fix his name?
Some certain point should finish the debate.
"Theu let him live a hundred years complete."

What if we take a year, a month, a day,
From this judicious sum of fame away,
Shall he among the ancients rise to fame,
Or sink with moderns to contempt and shame?
"Among the ancients let the bard appear,
Though younger by a month, or e'en a year."
I take the grant, and by degrees prevail,
(For hair by hair I pull the horse's tail)
And while I take them year by year away,
Their subtle heaps of arguments decay,
Who judge by annals, nor approve a line
Till death has made the poetry divine.

"Ennius, the brave, the lofty, and the wise,
Another Homer in the critic's eyes,
Forgets his promise, now secure of fame,
And heeds no more his Pythagoric dream.
No longer Nævius or his plays remain;
Yet we remember every pleasing scene:
So much can time its awful sanction give
In sacred fame to bid a poem live.

"Whate'er disputes of ancient poets rise,
In some one excellence their merit lies:
What depth of learning old Pacuvius shows!
With strong sublime the page of Accius glows;
Menander's comic robe Afranius wears;
Plautus as rapid in his plots appears
As Epicharmus; Terence charms with art,
And grave Cæcilius sinks into the heart.
These are the plays to which our people crowd,
Till the throng'd play-house crack with the dull
These are esteem'd the glories of the stage, [load.
From the first drama to the present age."

Sometimes the crowd a proper judgment makes,
But oft they labour under gross mistakes,
As when their ancients lavishly they raise
Above all modern rivalship of praise.

But that sometimes their style uncouth appears,
Or their harsh numbers rudely hurt our ears
Or that full flatly flows the languid line—
He, who owns this, hath Jove's assent and mine.

Think not I mean, in vengeance, to destroy
The works, for which I smarted when a boy.
But when as perfect models they are prais'd,
Correct and chaste, I own I stand amaz'd.
Then if some better phrase, or happier line,
With sudden lustre unexpected shine,
However harsh the rugged numbers roll,
It stamps a price and merit on the whole.

I feel my honest indignation rise,
When, with affected air, a coxcomb cries,

"The work, I own, has elegance and ease,
But sure no modern should presume to please;"
Then for his favourite ancients dares to claim,
Not pardon only, but rewards and fame. [perfume

When flowers o'erspread the stage, and sweets
The crowded theatre, should I presume
The just success of Atta's plays to blame,
The senate would pronounce me lost to shame.
What! criticise the scenes that charm'd the age
When Æsop and when Roscius trod the stage!
Whether too fond of their peculiar taste,
Or that they think their age may be disgrac'd,
Should they, with awkward modesty, submit
To younger judges in the cause of wit,
Or own, that it were best, provoking truth!
In age t' unlearn the learning of their youth!

He, to whom Numa's hymns appear divine,
Although his ignorance be great as mine,
Not to th' illustrious dead his homage pays,
But, envious, robs the living of their praise.
Did Greece, like Rome, her moderns disregard,
How bad she now possess onc ancient bard?
When she beheld her wars in triumph cease,
She soon grew wan'on in the arms of peace;
Now she with rapture views th' Olympic games,
And now the sculptor's power her breast inflames;
Sometimes, with ravish'd soul and ardent gaze,
The painter's art int'nsely she surveys;
Now hears, transported, music's pleasing charms,
And now the tragic Muse her passions warms.

Thus a fond girl, her nurse's darling joy,
Now seeks impatient, and now spurns her toy.
For what can long our pain or pleasure raise?
Such are the effects of happiness and ease.

For many an age our fathers entertain'd
Their early clients, and the laws explain'd;
Instructed them their cautious wealth to lend,
While youth was taught with reverence to attend,
And hear the old point out the prudent ways
To calm their passions, and their fortunes raise.

Now the light people bend to other aims;
A lust of scribbling every breast inflames;
Our youth, our senators, with bays are crown'd,
And rhymes eternal at our feasts go round.
Even I, who verse and all its works deny,
Can faithless Parthia's lying sons out-lie,
And, ere the rising Sun displays his light,
I call for tablets, papers, pens, and—write.

A pilot only dares a vessel steer;
A doubtful drug unlicens'd doctors fear;
Musicians are to sounds alone confin'd,
And each mechanic hath his trade assign'd:
But every desperate blockhead dares to write;
Verse is the trade of every living wight.

And yet this wandering phrensy of the brain
Hath many a gentle virtue in its train.
No cares of wealth a poet's heart control;
Verse is the only passion of his soul.
He laughs at losses, flight of slaves, or fires;
No wicked scheme his honest breast inspires
To hurt his pupil, or his friend betray;
Brown bread and roots his appetite allay;
And though unfit for war's tumultuous trade,
In peace his gentle talents are display'd,
If you allow, that things of trivial weight
May yet support the grandeur of a state.

He forms the infant's tongue to firmer sound,
Nor suffers vile obscenity to wound
His tender ears; then with the words of truth
Corrects the passions and the pride of youth.

Th' illustrious dead, who fill his sacred page,
Shine forth examples to each rising age;
The languid hour of poverty he cheers,
And the sick wretch his voice of comfort bears.

Did not the Muse inspire the poet's lays,
How could our youthful choir their voices raise
In prayer harmonious, while the gods attend,
And gracious bid the fruitful shower descend;
Avert their plagues, dispel each hostile fear,
And with glad harvests crown the wealthy year?
Thus can the sound of all-melodious lays
Th' offended powers of Heaven and Hell appease.

Our ancient swains, of vigorous, frugal kind,
At harvest-home us'd to unbend the mind [lear,
With festal sports; those sports, that bade them
With cheerful hopes, the labours of the year.
Their wives and children shar'd their hours of mirth,

Who shar'd their toils; when to the goddess Earth
Grateful they sacrific'd a teeming swine,
And pour'd the milky bowl at Sylvan's shrine.
Then to the genius of their fleeting hours,
Mindful of life's short date, they offer'd wine and flowers.

Here, in alternate verse, with rustic jest
The clowns their awkward raillery express'd,
And as the year brought round the jovial day,
Freely they sported, innocently gay,
Till cruel wit was turn'd to open rage,
And dar'd the noblest families engage.
When some, who by its tooth envenom'd bled,
Complain'd aloud, and others, struck with dread,
Though yet untouch'd, as in a public cause,
Implor'd the just protection of the laws,
Which from injurious libels wisely guard
Our neighbour's fame; and now the prudent bard,
Whom the just terrors of the lash restrain,
To pleasure and instruction turns his vein. [arts,

When conquer'd Greece brought in her captive
She triumph'd o'er her savage conquerors' hearts;
Taught our rough verse its numbers to refine,
And our rude style with elegance to shine.
And yet some traces of this rustic vein
For a long age remain'd, and still remain.
For it was late before our bards inquir'd
How the dramatic Muse her Greeks inspir'd;
How Æschylus and Thespis form'd the stage,
And what improv'd the Sophoclean page.
Then to their favourite pieces we applied,
Proud to translate, nor unsuccessful tried;
For, ardent and sublime our native vein,
It breathes the spirit of the tragic scene,
And dares successful; but the Roman Muse
Disdains, or fears, the painful file to use.

Because the comic poet forms his plays
On common life, they seem a work of ease;
But, if he less indulgence must expect,
Sure he should labour to be more correct.
Even Plantus ill sustains a lover's part,
A frugal site's, or wily pander's art.
Dossennus slip-shod shambles o'er the scene,
Buffoons, with hungry jests, his constant train;
For gold was all their aim, and then the play
Might stand or fall—indifferent were they.

He, who on Glory's airy chariot tries
To mount the stage, full often lives and dies.
A cold spectator chills the bard to death,
But one warm look recalls his fleeting breath.
Such light, such trivial things, depress or raise
A soul, that feels this avarice of praise.

Farewel the stage; for humbly I disclaim
Such fond pursuits of pleasure, or of fame,
If I must sink in shame, or swell with pride,
As the gay palm is granted, or denied:
And sure the bard, though resolutely bold,
Must quit the stage, or tremble to behold
The little vulgar of the clamorous pit,
Though void of honour, virtue, sense, or wit,
When his most interesting scenes appear,
Call for a prize-fight, or a baited bear:
And should the knights forbid their dear delight,
They rise tumultuous, and prepare for fight.
But even our knights from wit and genius fly
To pageant shows, that charm the wand'ring eye.

Drawn are the scenes, and lo! for many an hour
Wide o'er the stage the flying squadrons pour.
Then kings in chains confess the fate of war,
And weeping queens attend the victor's car.
Chairs, coaches, carts, in rattling rout are roll'd,
And ships of mighty bulk their sails unfold.
At last the model of some captive towns,
In ivory built the splendid triumph crowns.

Sure, if Democritus were yet on earth,
Whether a beast of mix'd and monstrous birth
Bid them with gaping admiration gaze,
Or a white elephant their wonder raise,
The crowd would more delight the laughing sage,
Than all the farce and follies of the stage;
To think, that asses should in judgment sit,
In solid deafness, on the works of wit.

For where's the voice so strong as to confound
The shouts with which our theatres resound?
Loud, as when surges lash the Tuscan shore,
Or mountain-forests with a tempest roar,
So loud the people's cries, when they behold
The foreign arts of luxury and gold;
And if an actor is but richly drest,
Their joy is in repeated claps express.

But has he spoken? No. Then whence arose
That loud applause? His robe with purple glows.

Though I attempt not the dramatic Muse,
Let me not seem, malignant, to refuse
The praises due to those, who with success
Have tried this way to fame; for I confess,
He gives a desperate trial of his art,
Who with imagin'd woes can wring my heart;
To pity soothe me, or to anger warm,
Or with false fears my panting breast alarm;
Then, like a sorcerer, my rapt spirit bear
To Athens, or to Thebes, and fix it there.

But let the bards some little care engage,
Who dare not trust the rough, tempestuous stage,
Yet to the reader's judgment would submit,
If you would offer to the god of wit
Such volumes as his best protection claim;
Or would you warm them in pursuit of fame,
Bid them the hills of Helicon ascend,
Where ever-green the flowery lawns extend.

Yet into sad mishaps we poets fall,
(I own the folly's common to us all)
When, to present the labours of our Muse,
Your hours of business or repose we choose;
When even the manly freedom of our friends,
Who blame one verse, our tenderness offends;
When we, unask'd, some favourite lines repeat,
Complaining that our toils, how wondrous great!
Are unobserv'd—that subtlety of thought,
That fine-spun thread, with which our poem's
wrought:

Or when we hope, that, soon as Cæsar knows
That we can rhymes abundantly compose,
Our fortune's made; he shall to court invite
Our bashful Muse, compelling us to write.

Yet is it thine, O Cæsar, to inquire
How far thy virtue can her priests inspire,
In peace or war, to sing her hero's fame,
Nor trust to worthless bards the sacred theme.

Dan Chærilus was poet-laureat made
By Philip's conquering son, who bounteous paid
The gold, on which his father's image shines,
For misbegotten and unshapen lines;
And yet as ink the spotless hand defiles,
So our fair fame a wretched scribbler soils.

Yet the same monarch, who thus dearly paid
For worthless rhymes, a solemn ediot made,
That none but fam'd Apelles dare to trace,
In desperate colours, his imperial face;
And that Lysippus should presume alone
To mould great Ammon's son in brass or stone.
Then take this critic in the arts that lie
Beneath the power and judgment of the eye,
Take him to books, and poetry, you'll swear,
This king was born in thick Bœotian air.

But never, sir, shall your judicious taste
By Virgil or by Varius be disgrac'd,
For to your bounty they shall grateful raise
A deathless monument of fame and praise;
Nor form'd in brass, with more expression shines
The hero's face, than in the poet's lines
His life and manners; nor would Horace choose
These low and grovelling numbers, could his Muse
The rapid progress of your arms pursue;
Paint distant lands and rivers to the view,
Up the steep mountain with thy war ascend,
Storm the proud fort, and bid the nations bend;
Or bid fell war's destructive horrors cease,
And shut up Janus in eternal peace,
While Parthia bows beneath the Roman name,
And yield her glories to our prince's fame.

But Cæsar's majesty would sure refuse
The feeble praises of my lowly Muse,
Nor I, with conscious modesty, should dare
Attempt a subject I want strength to bear;
For sure a foolish fondness of the heart,
At least in rhyming and the Muse's art,
Hurts whom it loves; for quickly we discern,
With ease remember, and with pleasure learn,
Whate'er may ridicule and laughter move,
Not what deserves our best esteem and love.

All such provoking fondness I disclaim,
Nor wish to stand expos'd to public shame
In wax-work form'd, with horrible grimace,
Nor in splay-footed rymes to show my face:
Blushing the fulsome present to receive,
And with my author be condemn'd to live;
Perhaps, in the same open basket laid,
Down to the street together be convey'd,
Where pepper, odours, frankincense are sold,
And all small wares in wretched rhymes enroll'd.

EPISTLE II.

TO JULIUS FLORUS.

FLORUS, the friend of Nero, good and brave,
Suppose a merchant, who would sell a slave,
Should thus address you, "Sir, the boy's complete
From head to foot, and elegantly neat:

That mystic genius, which our actions guides,
Attends our stars, and o'er our lives presides;
Whose power appears, propitious, or malign,
Stamp'd on each face, and varied through each line.

Be mine, my little fortune to enjoy;
A moderate pittance on myself employ,
Nor fear the censure of my thankless heir,
That I have left too little to his share;
And yet the wide distinction would I scan
Between an open, hospitable man,
And prodigal; the frugalist secure,
And miser pinch'd with penury; for sure
It differs, whether you profusely spend
Your wealth, or never entertain a friend;
Or, wanting prudence, like a play-day boy
Blindly rush on, to catch the flying joy.
Avert, ye gods, avert the loathsome load
Of want inglorious, and a vile abode.
To me are equal, so they bear their charge
The little pinnace, and the lofty barge.
Nor am I wafted by the swelling gales
Of winds propitious, with expanded sails,
Nor yet expos'd to tempest-bearing strife,
Adrift to struggle through the waves of life,
Last of the first, first of the last in weight,
Parts, vigour, person, virtue, birth, estate.

You are not covetous: be satisfied.
But are you tainted with no vice beside?
From vain ambition, dread of death's decree,
And fell resentment, is thy bosom free?
Say, can you laugh indignant at the schemes
Of magic terrors, visionary dreams,
Portentous wonders, witching imps of Hell,
The nightly goblin, and enchanting spell?
Can you recount with gratitude and mirth
The day revol'd, that gave thy being birth?
Indulge the failings of thy friends, and grow
More mild and virtuous, as thy seasons flow?
Pluck out one thorn to mitigate thy pain,
What boots it, while so many more remain?
Or act with just propriety your part.
Or yield to those of elegance and art.
Already glutted with a farce of age,
'Tis time for thee to quit the wanton stage,
Lest youth, more decent in their follies, scoff
The nauseous scene, and hiss thee reeling off.

THE ART OF POETRY.

Surpass a painter to a human head
Should join a horse's neck, and wildly spread
The various plumage of the feather'd kind
O'er limbs of different beasts, absurdly join'd;
Or if he gave to view a beauteous maid
Above the waist with every charm array'd,
Should a foul fish her lower parts unfold,
Would you not laugh such pictures to behold?
Such is the book, that, like a sick man's dreams,
Varies all shapes, and mixes all extremes.

"Painters and poets our indulgence claim,
Their daring equal, and their art the same."
I own th' indulgence—Such I give and take;
But not through Nature's sacred rules to break,
Monstrous to mix the cruel and the kind,
Serpents with birds, and lambs with tigers join'd.

Your opening promises some great design,
And shreds of purple with broad lustre shine

Sew'd on your poem. Here in labour'd strain
A sacred grove, or fair Diana's fane,
Rises to view; there through delicious meads
A murmuring stream its winding water leads;
Here pours the rapid Rhine; the wat'ry bow
There bends its colours, and with pride they glow.

Beauties they are, but beauties out of place;
For though your talent be to paint with grace
A mournful cypress, would you pour its shade
O'er the tempestuous deep, if you were paid
To paint a sailor, 'midst the winds and waves,
When on a broken plank his life he saves?

Why will you thus a mighty vase intend,
If in a worthless bowl your labours end?
Then learn this wandering humour to control,
And keep one equal tenour through the whole.

But oft, our greatest errors take their rise
From our best views. I strive to be concise;
I prove obscure. My strength, my force decays,
When in pursuit of elegance and ease.
Aiming at greatness, some to fustian soar;
Some in cold safety creep along the shore,
Too much afraid of storms; while he, who tries
With ever-varying wonders to surprise,
In the broad forest bids his dolphins play,
And paints his boars disporting in the sea.
Thus, injudicious, while one fault we shun,
Into its opposite extreme we run.

One happier artist of th' Æmilian square,
Who graves the nails, and forms the flowing
hair,
Though he excels in every separate part,
Yet fails of just perfection in his art,
In one grand whole unknowing to unite
Those different parts; and I no more would write
Like him, than with a nose of hideous size
Be gaz'd at for the finest hair and eyes.
Examine well, ye writers, weigh with care,
What suits your genius; what your strength can bear.

To him, who shall his theme with judgment choose,
Nor words nor method shall their aid refuse.
In this, or I mistake, consists the grace,
And force of method, to assign a place
For what with present judgment we should say,
And for some happier time the rest delay.

Would you to Fame a promis'd work produce,
Be delicate and cautious in the use
And choice of words: nor shall you fail of praise,
When nicely joining two known words you raise
A third unknown. A new-discover'd theme
For those, unheard in ancient times, may claim
A just and ample licence, which, if us'd
With fair discretion, never is refus'd.

New words, and lately made, shall credit claim,
If from a Grecian source they gently stream;
For Virgil, sure, and Varius may receive
That kind indulgence which the Romans gave
To Plautus and Cæcilius: or shall I
Be envious, if my little fund supply
Its frugal wealth of words, since bards, who sang
In ancient days, enrich'd their native tongue
With large increase? An undisputed power
Of coining money from the rugged ore,
Nor less of coining words, is still contest,
If with a legal public stamp impress.

As when the forest, with the bending year,
First sheds the leaves which earliest appear,

So an old age of words maturely dies,
 Others new-born in youth and vigour rise.
 We and our noblest works to Fate must yield;
 Even Cæsar's mole, which royal pride might build,

Where Neptune far into the land extends,
 And from the raging North our fleets defends;
 That barren marsh, whose cultivated plain
 Now gives the neighbouring towns its various grain;

Tiber, who, taught a better current, yields
 To Cæsar's power, nor deluges our fields;
 All these must perish, and shall words presume
 To hold their honours, and immortal bloom?
 Many shall rise, that now forgotten lie;
 Others, in present credit, soon shall die,
 If custom will, whose arbitrary sway,
 Words, and the forms of language, must obey.

By Homer taught the modern poet sings,
 In epic strains, of heroes, wars, and kings.
 Unequal measures first were tun'd to flow
 Sadly expressive of the lover's woe;
 But now, to gayer subjects form'd, they move
 In sounds of pleasure, to the joys of love:
 By whom invented, critics yet contend,
 And of their vain disputings find no end.

Archilochus, with fierce resentment warm'd,
 Was with his own severe iambs arm'd,
 Whose rapid numbers, suited to the stage,
 In comic humour, or in tragic rage,
 With sweet variety were found to please,
 And taught the dialogue to flow with ease;
 Their numerous cadence was for action fit,
 And form'd to quell the clamours of the pit.

The Muse to nobler subjects tunes her lyre;
 Gods, and the sons of gods, her song inspire,
 Wrestler and steed, who gain'd th' Olympic prize;

Love's pleasing cares, and wine's unbounded joys.
 But if, through weakness, or my want of art,
 I can't to every different style impart
 The proper strokes and colours it may claim,
 Why am I honour'd with a poet's name?
 Absurdly modest, why my fault discern,
 Yet rather burst in ignorance than learn?

Nor will the genius of the comic Muse
 Sublimier tones, or tragic numbers, use;
 Nor will the direful Thyestean feast
 In comic phrase and language be debas'd.
 Then let your style be suited to the scene,
 And its peculiar character maintain.

Yet Comedy sometimes her voice may raise,
 And angry Chremes rail in swelling phrase:
 As oft the tragic language humbly flows,—
 For Telephus or Peleus, 'midst the woes
 Of poverty or exile, must complain
 In prose-like style; must quit the swelling strain,
 And words gigantic, if with nature's art
 They hope to touch their melting hearer's heart.

'Tis not enough, ye writers, that ye charm
 With ease and elegance; a play should warm
 With soft concernment; should possess the soul,
 And, as it wills, the listening crowd control.

With them, who laugh, our social joy appears;

With them, who mourn, we sympathise in tears:
 If you would have me weep, begin the strain,
 Then I shall feel your sorrows, feel your pain;
 But if your heroes act not what they say,
 I sleep or laugh the lifeless scene away.

The varying face should every passion show,
 And words of sorrow wear the look of woe;
 Let it in joy assume a vivid air;
 Fierce when in rage; in seriousness severe:
 For Nature to each change of fortune forms
 The secret soul, and all its passions warms;
 Transports to rage, dilates the heart with mirth, Wrings the sad soul, and bends it down to earth.

The tongue these various movements must express:
 But, if ill-suited to the deep distress
 His language prove, the sons of Rome engage
 To laugh th' unhappy actor off the stage.

Your style should an important difference make
 When heroes, gods, or awful sages speak:
 When florid youth, whom gay desires inflame;
 A busy servant, or a wealthy dame;
 A merchant wandering with incessant toil,
 Or he who cultivates the verdant soil:
 But if in foreign realms you fix your scene,
 Their genius, customs, dialects maintain,
 Or follow fame, or in th' invented tale

Let seeming, well-united truth prevail:
 If Homer's great Achilles tread the stage,
 Intrepid, fierce, of unforgiving rage,
 Like Homer's hero, let him spurn all laws,
 And by the sword alone assert his cause.
 With untam'd fury let Medea glow,
 And Ioo's tears in ceaseless anguish flow.
 From realm to realm her griefs let lo bear,
 And sad Orestes rave in deep despair.
 But if you venture on an untried theme,
 And form a person yet unknown to fame,
 From his first entrance to the closing scene
 Let him one equal character maintain.

'Tis hard a new form'd fable to express,
 And make it seem your own. With more success
 You may from Homer take the tale of Troy,
 Than on an untried plot your strength employ.
 Yet would you make a common theme your
 own,

Dwell not on incidents already known;
 Nor word for word translate with painful care,
 Nor be confin'd in such a narrow sphere,
 From whence (while you should only imitate)
 Shame and the rules forbid you to retreat.

Begin your work with modest grace and plain,
 Nor like the bard of everlasting strain,
 "I sing the glorious war, and Priam's fate—"
 How will the boaster hold this yawning rate?
 The mountains labour'd with prodigious throes,
 And lo! a mouse ridiculous arose.

Far better he, who ne'er attempts in vain:
 Opening his poem in this humble strain,
 "Muse, sing the man, who, after Troy subdu'd, Manners and towns of various nations view'd."
 He does not lavish at a blaze his fire,
 Sudden to glare, and in a smoke expire;
 But rises from a cloud of smoke to light,
 And pours his specious miracles to sight;
 Antiphates his hideous feast devours,
 Charybdis barks, and Polyphemus roars.

He would not, like our modern poet, date
 His hero's wanderings from his uncle's fate;
 Nor sing ill-fated Ilium's various woes,
 From Helen's birth, from whom the war arose;
 But to the grand event he speeds his course,
 And bears his readers with resistless force
 Into the midst of things, while every line
 Opens, by just degrees, his whole design.

Artful he knows each circumstance to leave,
Which will not grace and ornament receive;
Then truth and fiction with such skill he blends,
That equal he begins, proceeds, and ends.

Mine and the public judgment are the same;
Then hear what I and what your audience claim:
If you would keep us till the curtain fall,
And the last chorus for a plaudit call,
The manner must your strictest care engage,
The levities of youth and strength of age.
The child, who now with firmer footing walks,
And with unfaltering, well-form'd accents talks,
Loves childish sports; with causeless anger
burns,
And idly pleas'd with every moment turns.

The youth, whose will no froward tutor bounds,
Joys in the sunny field, his horse and hounds;
Yielding like wax, th' impress'd folly bears;
Rough to reproof, and slow to future cares;
Profuse and vain; with every passion warm'd,
And swift to leave what late his fancy charm'd.

With strength improv'd, the manly spirit hends
'To different aims, in search of wealth and friends;
Bold and ambitious in pursuit of fame,
And wisely cautious in the doubtful scheme.

A thousand ills the aged world surround,
Anxious in search of wealth, and, when 'tis
found,

Fearful to use what they with fear possess,
While doubt and dread their faculties depress.
Fond of delay, they trust in hope no more,
Listless, and fearful of th' approaching hour;
Morose, complaining, and with tedious praise
'Talking the manners of their youthful days;
Severe to censure; earnest to advise,
And with old saws the present age chastise.

The blessings flowing in with life's full tide,
Down with our ebb of life decreasing glide;
Then let not youth, or infancy, engage
To play the parts of manhood, or of age;
For, where the proper characters prevail,
We dwell with pleasure on the well-wrought tale.
The business of the drama must appear
In action or description. What we hear,
With weaker passion will affect the heart,
Than when the faithful eye beholds the part.
But yet let nothing on the stage be brought,
Which better should behind the scenes be wrought;

Nor force th' unwilling audience to behold
What may with grace and eloquence be told.
Let not Medea, with unnatural rage,
Slaughter her mangled infants on the stage;
Nor Atræus his nefarious feast prepare,
Nor Cadmos roll a snake, nor Progne wing the air:
For, while upon such monstrous scenes we gaze,
They shock our faith, our indignation raise.

If you would have your play deserve success,
Give it five acts complete; nor more, nor less;
Nor let a god in person stand display'd,
Unless the labouring plot deserve his aid;
Nor a fourth actor on the crowded scene,
A broken, tedious dialogue maintain.

The chorus must support an actor's part;
Defend the virtuous, and advise with art;
Govern the choleric, the proud appease,
And the short feasts of frugal tables praise;
Applaud the justice of well-govern'd states,
And Peace triumphant with her open gates.

Entrusted secrets let them ne'er betray,
But to the righteous gods with ardour pray,
That fortune with returning smiles may bless
Afflicted mirth, and impious pride depress;
Yet let their songs with apt coherence join,
Promote the plot, and aid the main design.

Nor was the flute at first with silver bound,
Nor rival'd emulous the trumpets' sound:
Few were its notes, its form was simply plain,
Yet not unuseful was its feeble strain
To aid the chorus, and their songs to raise,
Filling the little theatre with ease,
To which a thin and pious audience came,
Of frugal manners and unsullied fame.

But when victorious Rome enlarg'd her state,
And broader walls enclos'd th' imperial seat,
Soon as with wine grown dissolutely gay
Without restraint she cheer'd the festal day,
Then Poesy in looser numbers mov'd,
And Music in licentious tunes improv'd:
Such ever is the taste, when clown and wit,
Rustic and critic, fill the crowded pit.

He, who before with modest art had play'd,
Now call'd in wanton movements to his aid,
Fill'd with luxurious tones the pleasing strain,
And drew along the stage a length of train;
And thus the lyre, once awfully severe,
Increas'd its strings, and sweeter charm'd the ear;
Thus Poetry precipitately flow'd,
And with unwonted elocution glow'd;
Pour'd forth prophetic truths in awful strain,
Dark as the language of the Delphic fane.

The tragic bard, who, for a worthless prize,
Bid naked satyrs in his chorus rise,
Though rude his mirth, yet labour'd to maintain
The solemn grandeur of the tragic scene;
For novelty alone, he knew, could charm
A lawless crowd, with wine and feasting warm.

And yet this laughing, prating tribe may raise

Our mirth, nor shall their pleasantry displease;
But let the hero, or the power divine,
Whom late we saw with gold and purple shine,
Stoop not in vulgar phrase, nor yet despise
The words of earth, and soar into the skies.
For as a matron, on our festal days
Oblig'd to dance, with modest grace obeys,
So should the Muse her dignity maintain
Amidst the satyrs and their wanton train.

If e'er I write, no words too grossly vile
Shall shame my satyrs, and pollute my style.
Nor would I yet the tragic style forsake
So far, as not some difference to make
Between a slave, or wench, too pertly bold,
Who wipes the miser of his darling gold,
And grave Silenus, with instructive nod
Giving wise lectures to his pupil god.

From well-known tales such fictions would I raise
As all might hope to imitate with ease;
Yet while they strive the same success to gain,
Should find their labour and their hopes all
vain:

Such grace can order and connexion give;
Such beauties common subjects may receive.

Let not the wood-horn satyr fondly sport
With amorous verses, as if bred at court;
Nor yet with wanton jests, in mirthful vein,
Debase the language, and pollute the scent;
For what the crowd with lavish rapture praise,
In better judges cold contempt shall raise.

Rome to her poets too much licence gives,
Nor the rough cadence of their verse perceives;
But shall I then with careless spirit write?
No—let me think my faults shall rise to light,
And then a kind indulgence will excuse
The less important errors of the Muse.
Thus, though perhaps I may not merit fame,
I stand secure from censure and from shame.

Make the Greek authors your supreme delight;
Read them by day, and study them by night.—
“And yet our sires with joy could Plautus hear;
“Gay were his jests, his numbers charm'd their ear.”

Let me not say too lavishly they praise'd;
But sure their judgment was full cheaply pleas'd,
If you or I, with taste are haply blest,
To know a clownish from a courtly jest;
If skillful to discern, when form'd with ease
The modulated sounds are taught to please.

Thespis, inventor of the tragic art,
Carried his vagrant players in a cart:
High o'er the crowd the mimic tribe appear'd,
And play'd and sung, with lees of wine besmear'd.
Then Æschylus a decent vizard us'd;
Built a low stage; the flowing robe diffus'd.
In language more sublime his actors rage,
And in the graceful buskin tread the stage.
And now the ancient Comedy appear'd,
Nor without pleasure and applause was heard:
But soon, its freedom rising to excess,
The laws were forc'd its boldness to suppress,
And, when no longer licens'd to defame,
It sunk to silence with contempt and shame.

No path to fame our poets left untried;
Nor small their merit, when with conscious pride
They scorn'd to take from Greece the storied theme,
And dar'd to sing their own domestic fame,
With Roman heroes fill the tragic scene,
Or sport with humour in the comic vein.
Nor had the mistress of the world appear'd
More fam'd for conquest, than for wit rever'd,
Did we not hate the necessary toil
Of slow correction, and the painful file.

Illustrious youths, with just contempt receive,
Nor let the hardy poem hope to live
Where time and full correction don't refine
The finish'd work, and polish every line.
Because Democritus in rapture cries,
“Poems of genius always bear the prize
From wretched works of art,” and thinks that none
But brain-sick bards can taste of Helicon;
So far his doctrine o'er the tribe prevails,
They neither shave their heads, nor pare their nails;
To dark retreats and solitude they run,
The baths avoid, and public converse shun;
The poet's fame and fortune sure to gain,
If long their beards, incurable their brain.

Ah! luckless I! who purg'd in spring my spleen—
Else sure the first of bards had Horace been.
But shall I then, in mad pursuit of fame,
Resign my reason for a poet's name?
No; let me sharpen others, as the hone
Gives edge to razors, though itself has done.
Let me the poet's worth and office show,
And whence his true poetic riches flow;
What forms his genius, and improves his vein;
What well or ill becomes each different scene:
How high the knowledge of his art ascends,
And to what faults his ignorance extends.

Good-sense, that fountain of the Muse's art,
Let the strong page of Socrates impart,
And if the mind with clear conceptions glow,
The willing words in just expressions flow.

The poet, who with nice discernment knows
What to his country and his friends he owes;
How various nature warms the human breast,
To love the parent, brother, friend, or guest;
What the great offices of judges are,
Of senators, of generals sent to war;
He surely knows, with nice, well-judging art,
The strokes peculiar to each different part.

Keep nature's great original in view,
And thence the living images pursue;
For when the sentiments and diction please,
And all the characters are wrought with ease,
Your play, though void of beauty, force, and art,

More strongly shall delight, and warm the heart,
Than where a lifeless pomp of verse appears,
And with sonorous trifles charms our ears.

To her lov'd Greeks the Muse indulgent gave,
To her lov'd Greeks, with greatness to conceive,
And in sublimer tone their language raise—
Her Greeks were only covetous of praise.
Our youth, proficient in a nobler art,
Divide a farthing to the hundredth part;
“Well done! my boy,” the joyful father cries,
“Addition and subtraction make us wise.”

But when the rust of wealth pollutes the soul,
And money cares the genius thus control,
How shall we dare to hope, that distant times
With honour should preserve our lifeless rhymes?

Poets would profit or delight mankind,
And with the pleasing have th' instructive join'd.
Short be the precept, which with ease is gain'd
By docile minds, and faithfully retain'd.

If in dull length your moral is express'd,
The tedious wisdom overflows the breast.
Would you divert? the probable maintain,
Nor force us to believe the monstrous scene,
That shows a child, by a fell witch devour'd,
Dragg'd from her entrails, and to life restor'd.

Grave age approves the solid and the wise;
Gay youth from too austere a drama flies:
Profit and pleasure, then, to mix with art,
To inform the judgment, nor offend the heart,
Shall gain all votes; to booksellers shall raise
No trivial fortune, and across the seas
To distant nations spread the writer's fame,
And with immortal honours crown his name.

Yet there are faults that we may well excuse,
For oft the strings th' intended sound refuse;
In vain his tuneful hand the master tries,
He asks a flat, and hears a sharp arise;
Nor always will the bow, though fam'd for art,
With speed unerring wing the threatening dart.

But where the beauties more in number shine,
I am not angry when a casual line
(That with some trivial faults unequal flows)
A careless hand, or human frailty, shows.
But as we'er those scribes with mercy treat,
Who, though advis'd, the same mistakes repeat;

Or, as we laugh at him who constant brings
The same rude discord from the jarring strings;
So, if strange chance a Chærilus inspire
With some good lines, I laugh while I admire;
Yet hold it for a fault I can't excuse,
If honest Homer slumber o'er his Muse;

Although, perhaps, a kind indulgent sleep
O'er works of length allowably may creep.
Poems like pictures are: some charm when nigh,
Others at distance more delight your eye;
That loves the shade, this tempts a stronger light,
And challenges the critic's piercing sight:
That gives us pleasure for a single view; *
And this, ten times repeated, still is new.

Although your father's precepts form your youth,
And add experience to your taste of truth,
Of this one maxim, Piso, be assur'd,
In certain things a medium is endur'd.
Who tries Messala's eloquence in vain,
Nor can a knotty point of law explain
Like learn'd Cascellius, yet may justly claim,
For pleading or advice, some right to fame;
But God, and man, and letter'd post denies
That poets ever are of middling size.
As jarring music at a jovial feast,
Or muddy essence, or th' ungrateful taste
Of bitter honey, shall the guests displease,
Because they want not luxuries like these;
So poems, form'd alone to yield delight,
Give deep disgust, or pleasure, to the height.

The man, who knows not how with art to wield
The sportive weapons of the martial field,
The bounding ball, round quoit, or whirling troque,
Will not the laughter of the crowd provoke:
But every desperate blockhead dares to write—
Why not? His fortune's large to make a knight;
The man's free-born; perhaps, of gentle strain;
His character and manners pure from stain.

But thou, dear Piso, never tempt the Muse,
If wisdom's goddess shall her aid refuse;
And when you write, let candid Metius hear,
Or try your labours on your father's ear—
Or even on mine; but let them not come forth
Till the ninth ripening year mature their worth.
You may correct what in your closet lies:
If publish'd, it irrevocably flies.

The wood-born race of men when Orpheus tam'd,
From acorns and from mutual blood reclaim'd,
This priest divine was fabled to assuage
The tiger's fierceness, and the lion's rage.
Thus rose the Theban wall; Amphion's lyre
And soothing voice the listening stones inspire.
Poetic wisdom mark'd, with happy mean,
Public and private; sacred and profane;
The wandering joys of lawless love suppress'd;
With equal rites the wedded couple bless'd:
Plann'd future towns, and instituted laws:
So verse became divine, and poets gain'd applause.

Homer, Tyrtæus, by the Muse inspir'd,
To deeds of arms the martial spirit fir'd.
In verse the oracles divine were heard,
And nature's secret laws in verse declar'd;
Monarchs were courted in Pierian strain,
And comic sports relief'd the wearied swain;
Apollo sings, the Muses tune the lyre;
Then blush not for an art which they inspire.

'Tis long disputed, whether poets claim
From art or nature their best right to fame;
But art, if not enrich'd by nature's vein,
And a rude genius of uncultur'd strain,
Are useless both; but, when in friendship join'd,
A mutual succour each in other find.

A youth, who hopes th' Olympic prize to gain,
All arts must try, and every toil sustain;
Th' extremes of heat and cold must often prove,
And shun the weakening joys of wine and love.

Who sings the Pythic song, first learn'd to raise
Each note distinct, and a stern master please;
But now—"Since I can write the true sublime,
Curse catch the hindmost!" cries the man of rhyme.
"What? in a science own myself a fool,
Because, forsooth, I learn'd it not by rule?"

As artful criers, at a public fair,
Gather the passing crowd to buy their ware;
So wealthy poets, when they deign to write,
To all clear gains their flatterers invite.
But if the feast of luxury they give,
Bail a poor wretch, or from distress relieve,
When the black fangs of law around him bend,
How shall they know a flatterer from a friend?
If e'er you make a present, or propose
To grant a favour; while his bosom glows
With grateful sentiments of joy and praise,
Never, ah! never let him hear your lays;
Loud shall he cry, "How elegant; how fine!"
Turn pale with wonder at some happier line;
Distil the civil dew from either eye,
And leap, and beat the ground in ecstasy.

As hirelings, paid for their funeral tear,
Outweep the sorrows of a friend sincere,
So the false raptures of a flatterer's art
Exceed the praises of an honest heart.
Monarchs, 'tis said, with many a flowing bowl
Search through the deep recesses of his soul,
Whom for their future friendship they design,
And put him to the torture in his wine;
So try, whene'er you write, the deep disguise,
Beneath whose flattering smiles false Renard lies.

Read to Quintilius, and at every line—
"Correct this passage, friend, and that refine."
Tell him, you tried it twice or thrice in vain—
"Haste to an anvil with your ill-form'd strain,
Or blot it out." But if you still defend
The favourite folly, rather than amend,
He'll say no more, no idle toil employ—
"Yourself unrivall'd, and your works, enjoy."

An honest critic, when dull lines move slow,
Or harshly rude, will his resentment show;
Mark every fault, and with his pen educe
What is not polish'd to its highest grace;
Prune all ambitious ornaments away,
And teach you on th' obscure to pour the day;
Will mark the doubtful phrase with hand severe,
Like Aristarchus candid and sincere;
Nor say, For trifles why should I displease
The man I love? for trifles such as these
To serious mischiefs lead the man I love,
If once the flatterer's ridicule he prove.
From a mad poet, whosoe'er is wise,
As from a leprosy or jaundice, flies;
Religious madness in its zealous strain,
Nor the wild phrensy of a moon-struck brain,
Are half so dreadful: yet the boys pursue him,
And fools, unknowing of their danger, view him.
But, heedless wandering, if our man of rhyme,
Bursting with verses of the true sublime,
Like fowler, earnest at his game, should fall
Into a well or ditch, and loudly call,
"Good fellow-citizens and neighbours dear,
Help a poor bard"—not one of them will hear;
Or if, perchance, a saving rope they throw,
I will be there, and—"Sirs, you do not know
But he fell in on purpose, and, I doubt,
Will hardly thank you, if you pull him out."

Then will I tell Empedocles's story,
Who nobly fond of more than mortal glory,

Fond to be deem'd a god, in madding fit
 Plung'd in cold blood in Ætna's fiery pit.
 Let bards be licens'd, then, themselves to kill;
 'Tis murder to preserve them 'gainst their will.
 But more than once this frolic he hath play'd,
 Nor, taken out, will he be wiser made,
 Content to be a man; nor will his pride
 Lay such a glorious love of death aside.
 Nor is it plain for what more horrid crime
 The gods have plagu'd him with this curse of rhyme;

Whether his father's ashes he disdain'd,
 Or hallow'd ground with sacrilege profan'd:
 Certain he's mad, and like a baited bear,
 If he hath strength enough his den to tear,
 With all the horrors of a desperate Muse
 The learned and unlearned he pursues.
 But if he seize you, then the torture dread;
 He fastens on you, till he read you dead,
 And like a leech, voracious of his food,
 Quits not his cruel hold till gorg'd with blood.
