

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

HOMER'S ILIAD.

TRANSLATED BY POPE.

PREFACE TO THE ILIAD.

Homer is universally allowed to have had the greatest invention of any writer whatever. The praise of judgment Virgil has justly contested with him, and others may have their pretensions as to particular excellencies; but his invention remains yet unrivalled. Nor is it a wonder if he has ever been acknowledged the greatest of poets, who most excelled in that which is the very foundation of poetry. It is the invention that in different degrees distinguishes all great geniuses: the utmost stretch of human study, learning, and industry, which masters every thing besides, can never attain to this. It furnishes art with all her materials, and without it, judgment itself can at best but steal wisely; for art is only like a prudent steward that lives on managing the riches of nature. Whatever praises may be given to works of judgment, there is not even a single beauty in them to which the invention must not contribute: as in the most regular gardens, art can only reduce the beauties of nature to more regularity, and such a figure, which the common eye may better take in, and is therefore more entertained with. And perhaps the reason why common critics are inclined to prefer a judicious and methodical genius to a great and fruitful one, is, because they find it easier for themselves to pursue their observations through an uniform and bounded walk of art, than to comprehend the vast and various extent of nature.

Our author's work is a wild paradise, where if we cannot see all the beauties so distinctly as in an ordered garden, it is only because the number of them is infinitely greater. It is like a copious nursery, which contains the seeds and first productions of every kind, out of which those who followed him have but selected some particular plants, each according to his fancy, to cultivate and beautify. If some things are too luxuriant, it is owing to the richness of the soil; and if others are not arrived to perfection or maturity, it is only because they are over-run and oppressed by those of a stronger nature.

It is to the strength of this amazing invention we are to attribute that unequalled fire and rapture, which is so forcible in Homer, that no man of a true poetical spirit is master of himself while he reads him. What he writes, is of the most animating nature imaginable; every thing moves, every thing lives, and is put in action. If a council be called, or a battle fought, you are not coldly informed of what was said or done as from a third person; the reader is hurried out of himself by the force of the poet's imagination, and turns in one place to a hearer, in another to a spectator. The course of his verses resembles that of the army he describes.

They pour along like a fire that sweeps the whole earth before it.

It is however remarkable that his fancy, which is every where vigorous, is not discovered immediately at the beginning of his poem in its fullest splendour: it grows in the progress both upon himself and others, and becomes on fire, like a chariot-wheel, by its own rapidity. Exact disposition, just thought, correct elocution, polished numbers, may have been found in a thousand; but this poetical fire, this vivida vis animi, in a very few. Even in works where all those are imperfect or neglected, this can overcome criticism, and make us admire even while we disapprove. Nay, where this appears, though attended with absurdities, it brightens all the rubbish about it, till we see nothing but its own splendour. This fire is discerned in Virgil, but discerned as through a glass, reflected from Homer, more shining than fierce, but every where equal and constant: in Lucan and Statius, it bursts out in sudden, short, and interrupted flashes: in Milton it glows like a furnace kept up to an uncommon ardour by the force of art: in Shakespeare it strikes before we are aware, like an accidental fire from heaven: but in Homer, and in him only, it burns every where clearly, and every where irresistibly.

I shall here endeavour to show, how this vast invention exerts itself in a manner superior to that of any poet, through all the main constituent parts of his work, as it is the great and peculiar characteristic which distinguishes him from all other authors.

PREFACE TO THE ILIAD.

This strong and ruling faculty was like a powerful star, which, in the violence of its course, drew all things within its vortex. It seemed not enough to have taken in the whole circle of arts, and the whole compass of nature, to supply his maxims and reflections; all the inward passions and affections of mankind, to furnish his characters; and all the outward forms and images of things, for his descriptions; but, wanting yet an ampler sphere to expatiate in, he opened a new and boundless walk for his imagination, and created a world for himself in the invention of fable. That which Aristotle calls the "soul of poetry," was first breathed into it by Homer. I shall begin with considering him in this part, as it is naturally the first; and I speak of it both as it means the design of a poem, and as it is taken for fiction.

Fable may be divided into the probable, the allegorical, and the marvellous. The probable Fable is the recital of such actions as though they did not happen, yet might, in the common course of nature: or of such as, though they did, become fables by the additional episodes and manner of telling them. Of this sort is the main story of an epic poem, the return of Ulysses, the settlement of the Trojans in Italy, or the like. That of the Iliad is the anger of Achilles, the most short and single subject that ever was chosen by any poet. Yet this he has supplied with a vaster variety of incidents and events, and crowded with a greater number of councils, speeches, battles, and episodes of all kinds, than are to be found even in those poems whose schemes are of the utmost latitude and irregularity. The action is hurried on with the most vehement spirit, and its whole duration employs not so much as fifty days. Virgil, for want of so warm a genius, aided himself by taking in a more extensive subject, as well as a greater length of time, and contracting the design of both Homer's poems into one, which is yet but a fourth part as large as his. The other epic poets have used the same practice, but generally carried it so far as to superinduce a multiplicity of fables, destroy the unity of action, and lose their readers in an unreasonable length of time. Nor is it only in the main design that they have been unable to add to his invention, but they have followed him in every episode and part of story. If he has given a regular catalogue of an army, they all draw up their forces in the same order. If he has funeral games for Patroclus, Virgil has the same for Anchises; and Statius (rather than omit them) destroys the unity of his action for those of Archemoras. If Ulysses visits the shades, the Æneas of Virgil, and Scipio of Silius, are sent after him. If he be detained from his return by the allurements of Calypso, so is Æneas by Dido, and Rinaldo by Armida. If Achilles be absent from the army on the score of a quarrel through half the poem, Rinaldo must absent himself just as long on the like account. If he gives his hero a suit of celestial armour, Virgil and Tasso make the same present to theirs. Virgil has not only observed this close imitation of Homer, but, where he had not led the way, supplied the want from other Greek authors. Thus the story of Sinou, and the taking of Troy was copied (says Macrobius) almost word for word from Pindar, as the loves of Dido and Æneas are taken from those of Medea and Jason in Apollonius, and several others in the same manner.

To proceed to the allegorical fable: if we reflect upon those innumerable knowledges, those secrets of nature and physical philosophy, which Homer is generally supposed to have wrapped up in his Allegories, what a new and ample scene of wonder may this consideration afford us! how fertile will that imagination appear, which was able to clothe all the properties of elements, the qualifications of the mind, the virtues and vices, in forms and persons; and to introduce them into actions agreeable to the nature of the things they shadowed! This is a field in which no succeeding poets could dispute with Homer; and whatever commendations have been allowed them on this head, are by no means for their invention in having enlarged his circle, but for their judgment in having contracted it. For when the mode of learning changed in following ages, and science was delivered in a plainer manner; it then became as reasonable in the more modern poets to lay it aside, as it was in Homer to make use of it. And perhaps it was no unhappy circumstance for Virgil, that there was not in his time that demand upon him of so great an invention, as might be capable of furnishing all those allegorical parts of a poem.

The marvellous fable includes whatever is supernatural, and especially the machines of the gods. He seems the first who brought them into a system of machinery for poetry, and such a one as makes its greatest importance and dignity. For we find those authors who have been offended at the literal notion of the gods, constantly laying their accusation against Homer as the chief support of it. But whatever cause there might be to blame his machines in a philosophical or religious view, they are so perfect in the poetic, that mankind have been ever since contented to follow them: none have been able to enlarge the sphere of poetry beyond the limits he has set; every attempt of this nature has proved unsuccessful; and after all the various changes of times and religions, his gods continue to this day the gods of poetry.

We come now to the characters of his persons; and here we shall find no author has ever drawn so many, with so visible and surprising a variety, or given us such lively and affecting impressions of them. Every one has something so singularly his own, that no painter could have distinguished them more by their features, than the poet has by their manners. Nothing can be more exact than the distinctions he has observed in the different degrees of virtues and vices. The single quality of courage is wonderfully diversified in the several characters of the Iliad. That of Achilles is furious and intractable; that of Diomedes forward, yet listening to advice, and subject to command; that of Ajax is heavy, and self-confiding: of Hector, active and vigilant; the courage of Agamemnon is inspirited by love of empire and ambition; that of Menelaus mixed with softness and tenderness for his people: we find in Idomeneus a plain direct soldier, in Sarpedon a gallant and generous one. Nor is this judicious and astonishing diversity to be found only in the principal quality which constitutes the main of each character, but even in the under parts of it, to which he takes care to give a tincture of that principal one. For example, the main characters of Ulysses and Nestor consist in wisdom: and they are distinct in this, that the wisdom of one is artificial and various, of the other natural, open and regular. But they have, besides, characters of courage; and this quality also takes a different turn in each from the difference of his prudence; for one in the war depends still upon caution, the other upon experience. It would be endless to produce instances of these kinds. The characters of Virgil are far from striking us in this open manner; they lie in a great degree hidden and undistinguished, and where they are marked most evidently, affect us not in proportion to those of Homer. His characters of valour are much alike; even that of Turnus seems no way peculiar but as it is in a superior degree; and we see nothing that differences the courage of Menestheus from that of Sergesthus, Cloanthus, or the rest. In like manner it may be remarked of Statius's heroes, that an air of impetuosity runs through them all: the same horrid and savage courage appears in his Capaneus, Tydeus, Hippomedon, &c. They have a parity of character, which makes them seem brothers of one family. I believe when the reader is led into this track of reflection, if he will pursue it through the epic and tragic writers, he will be convinced how infinitely superior in this point the invention of Homer was to that of all others.

The speeches are to be considered as they flow from the characters, being perfect or defective as they agree or disagree with the manners of those who utter them. As there is more variety of characters in the Iliad, so there is of speeches, than in any other poem. Every thing in it has manners (as Aristotle expresses it) that is, every thing is acted or spoken. It is hardly credible in a work of such length, how small a number of lines are employed in narration. In Virgil the dramatic part is less in proportion to the narrative; and the speeches often consist of general reflections or thoughts, which might be equally just in any person's mouth upon the same occasion. As many of his persons have no apparent characters, so many of his speeches escape being applied and judged by the rule of propriety. We often think of the author himself when we read Virgil, than when we are engaged in Homer: all which are the effects of a colder invention, that interests us less in the action described: Homer makes us hearers, and Virgil leaves us readers.

If in the next place we take a view of the sentiments, the same presiding faculty is eminent in the sublimity and spirit of his thoughts. Longinus has given his opinion, that it was in this part Homer principally excelled. What were alone sufficient to prove the grandeur and excellence of his sentiments in general, is, that they have so remarkable a parity with those of the scripture; Dupont, in his Gnomologia Homerica, has collected innumerable instances of this sort. And it is with justice an excellent modern writer allows, that if Virgil has not so many thoughts that are low and vulgar, he has not so many that are sublime and noble; and that the Roman author seldom rises into very astonishing sentiments, where he is not fired by the Iliad.

If we observe his descriptions, images, and similes, we shall find the invention still predominant. To what else can we ascribe that vast comprehension of images of every sort, where we see each circumstance of art, and individual of nature summoned together by the extent and fecundity of his imagination; to which all things in their various views presented themselves in an instant, and had their impressions taken off to perfection at a heat? Nay, he not only gives us the full prospects of things, but several unexpected peculiarities and side views, unobserved by any painter but Homer. Nothing is so surprising as the descriptions of his battles, which take up no less than half the Iliad, and are supplied with so vast a variety of incidents, that no one bears a likeness to another; such different kinds of deaths, that no two heroes are wounded in the same manner; and such a profusion of noble ideas, that every battle rises above the last in greatness, horror, and confusion. It is certain there is not near that number of images and descriptions in any epic poet; though every one has assisted himself with a great quantity out of him: and it is evident of Virgil especially, that he has scarce any comparisons which are not drawn from his master.

If we descend from hence to the expression, we see the bright imagination of Homer, shining out in the most enlivened forms of it. We acknowledge him the father of poetical diction, the first who taught that language of the gods to men. His expression is like the colouring of some great master, which discovers itself to be laid on boldly, and executed with rapidity. It is indeed the strongest and most glowing imaginable, and touched with the greatest spirit. Aristotle had reason to say, He was the only poet who had found out living words: there are in him more daring figures and metaphors than in any good author whatever. An arrow is impatient to be on the wing, and a weapon thinks to drink the blood of an enemy, and the like; yet his expression is never too big for the sense, but justly great in proportion to it. It is the sentiment that swells and fills out the diction, which rises with it, and forms itself about it: for in the same degree that a thought is warmer, an expression will be brighter; as that is more strong, this will become more perspicuous: like glass in the furnace, which grows to a greater magnitude, and refines to a greater clearness, only as the breath within is more powerful, and the heat more intense.

To throw his language more out of prose, Homer seems to have affected the compound epithets. This was a sort of composition peculiarly proper to poetry, not only as it heightened the diction, but as it assisted and filled the numbers with greater sound and pomp, and likewise conducted in some measure to thicken the images. On this last consideration I cannot but attribute these also to the fruitfulness of his invention, since, (as he has managed them) they are a sort of supernumerary pictures of the persons or things to which they are joined. We see the motion of Hector's plumes in the epithet ασπιδόεις, the landscape of Mount Neritus in that of ίνερίπυλλος, and so of others; which particular images could not have been insisted upon so long as to express them in a description (though but of a single line) without diverting the reader too much from the principal action or figure. As a metaphor is a short simile, one of these epithets is a short description.

Lastly, if we consider his versification, we shall be sensible what a share of praise is due to his invention in that. He was not satisfied with his language as he found it settled in any one part of Greece, but searched through its differing dialects with this particular view, to beautify and perfect his numbers: he considered these as they had a greater mixture of vowels and consonants, and accordingly employed them as the verse required either a greater smoothness or strength. What he most affected was the Ionic, which has a peculiar sweetness from its never using contractions, and from its custom of resolving the diphthongs into two syllables: so as to make the words open themselves with a more spreading and sonorous fluency. With this he mingled the Attic contractions, the broader Doric, and the feebler Eolic, which often rejects its aspirate, or takes off its accent; and completed this variety by altering some letters with the licence of poetry. Thus his measures, instead of being fetters to his sense, were always in readiness to run along with the warmth of his rapture, and even to give a farther representation of his notions, in the correspondence of their sounds to what they signified. Out of all these he has derived that harmony, which makes us confess he had not only the richest head, but the finest ear in the world. This is so great a truth, that whoever will but consult the tune of his verses, even without understanding them (with the same sort of diligence as we daily see practised in the case of Italian operas) will find more sweetness, variety, and majesty of sound, than in any other language or poetry. The beauty of his numbers is allowed by the critics to be copied but faintly by Virgil himself, though they are so just to ascribe it to the nature of the Latin tongue; indeed the Greek has some advantages both from the natural sound of its words, and the turn and cadence of its verse, which agree with the genius of no other language: Virgil was very sensible of this, and used the utmost diligence in working up a more intractable language to whatsoever grace it was capable of: and in particular never failed to bring the sound of his line to a beautiful agreement with its sense. If the Grecian poet has not been so frequently celebrated on this account as the Roman, the only reason is that fewer critics have understood one language than the other. Dionysius of Halicarnassus has pointed out many of our author's beauties in this kind, in his treatise of the Composition of Words. It suffices at present to observe of his numbers, that they flow with so much ease, as to make one imagine Homer had no other care than to transcribe as fast as the Muses dictated: and at the same time with so much force and inspired vigour, that they awaken and raise us like the sound of a trumpet. They roll along as a plentiful river, always in motion, and always full: while we are borne away by a tide of verse, the most rapid, and yet the most smooth imaginable.

Thus, on whatever side we contemplate Homer, what principally strikes us is his invention. It is that which forms the character of each part of his work; and accordingly we find it to have made his fable more extensive and copious than any other, his manners more lively and strongly marked, his speeches more affecting and transported, his sentiments more warm and sublime, his images and Descriptions are full and animated, his expression more raised and daring, and his numbers more rapid and various. I hope in what has been said of Virgil with regard to any of these heads, I have not says derogated from his character. Nothing is more absurd or endless, than the common method of tempering eminent writers by an opposition of particular passages in them, and forming a judgment from thence of their merit upon the whole. We ought to have a certain knowledge of the principal character and distinguished excellence of each: it is in that we are to consider him, and in proportion to his degree in that we are to admire him. No author or man ever excelled all the world in more than one faculty; and as Homer has done this in invention, Virgil has in judgment. Not that we are to think Homer wanted judgment, because Virgil had it in a more eminent degree; or that Virgil wanted invention, because Homer possessed a larger share of it: each of these great authors had more of both than perhaps any man besides, and are only said to have less in comparison with one another. Homer was the greater genius, Virgil the better artist. In one we most admire the man, in the other the work: Homer hurries and transports us with a commanding impetuosity, Virgil leads us with attractive majesty: Homer scatters with a generous profusion, Virgil bestows with a careful magnificence: Homer, like the Nile, pours out his riches with a boundless overflow; Virgil like a river in its bank, with a gentle and constant stream. When we behold their battles, methinks the two poets resemble the heroes they celebrate: Homer, boundless and irresistible as Achilles, bears all before him, and shines more and more as the tumult increases; Virgil, calmly daring like Aeneas, appears undisturbed in the midst of the action; disposes all about him, and conquers with tranquillity. And when we look upon their machines, Homer seems like his own Jupiter in his torments, shaking Olympus, scattering the lightnings, and firing the heavens; Virgil, like the same power in his benevolence, counselling with the gods, laying plans for empires, and regularly ordering his whole creation.

But, after all, it is with great parts, as with great virtues: they naturally border on some imperfection; and it is often hard to distinguish exactly where the virtue ends, or the fault begins. As profusion may sometimes sink to suspicion, so may a great judgment decline to coldness; and as magnanimity may run up to profusion or extravagance, so may a great invention to redundancy or wildness. If we look upon Homer in this view, we shall perceive the chief objections against him to proceed from so noble a cause as the excess of this faculty.

Among these we may reckon some of his marvellous fictions, upon which so much criticism has been spent, as surpassing all the bounds of probability. Perhaps it may be with great and superior souls, as with gigantic bodies, which exerting themselves with unusual strength, exceed what is commonly thought the due proportion of parts, to become miracles in the whole; and like the old heroes of that make, commit something near extravagance, amidst a series of glories and inimitable performances. Thus Homer has his speaking horses, and Virgil his myrtles distilling blood, where the latter has not so much as contrived the easy intervention of a deity to save the probability.

It is owing to the same vast invention, that his similies have been thought too exuberant and full of circumstances. The force of this faculty is seen in nothing more, than in its inability to confine itself to that single circumstance upon which the comparison is grounded: it runs out into embellishments of additional images, which however are so managed as not to overpower the main one. His similies are like pictures, where the principal figure has not only its proportion given agreeably to the original, but is also set off with occasional ornaments and prospects. The same will account for his manner of heaping a number of comparisons together in one breath, when his fancy suggested to him at once so many various and correspondent images. The reader will easily extend this observation to more objections of the same kind.

If there are others which seem rather to charge him with a defect or narrowness of genius, than an excess of it, those seeming defects will be found upon examination to proceed wholly from the nature of the times he lived in. Such are his grosser representations of the gods, and the vicious and imperfect manners of his heroes; but I must here speak a word of the latter, as it is a point generally carried into extremes, both by the censurers and defenders of Homer. It must be a strange partiality to antiquity, to think with Madam Dacier, "that those times and manners are so much the more excellent, as they are more contrary to ours." Who can be so prejudiced in their favour as to magnify the felicity of those ages, when a spirit of revenge and cruelty, joined with the practice of rapine and robbery, reigned through the world; when no mercy was shown but for the sake of lucre, when the greatest princes were put to the sword, and their wives and daughters made slaves and concubines? On the other side, I would not be so delicate as those modern critics, who are shocked at the servile offices and mean employments in which we sometimes see the heroes of Homer engaged.

There is a pleasure in taking a view of that simplicity, in opposition to the luxury of succeeding ages; in beholding monarchs without their guards, princes tending their flocks, and princesses drawing water from the springs. When we read Homer, we ought to reflect that we are reading the most ancient author in the heathen world; and those who consider him in this light, will doubt their pleasure in the perusal of him. Let them think they are growing acquainted with nations and people that are now no more; that they are stepping almost three thousand years back into the remotest antiquity, and entertaining themselves with a clear and surprising vision of things no where else to be found, the only true mirror of that ancient world. By this means alone their greatest obstacles will vanish; and what usually creates their dislike, will become a satisfaction.

This consideration may farther serve to answer for the constant use of the same epithets to his gods and heroes, such as the far-darting Phœbus, the blue-eyed Pallas, the swift-footed Achilles, &c. which some have censured as impertinent and tediously repeated. Those of the gods depended upon the powers and offices then believed to belong to them, and had contracted a weight and veneration from the rites and solemn devotions in which they were used: they were a sort of attributes, with which it was a matter of religion to salute them on all occasions, and which it was an irreverence to omit. As for the epithets of great men, Mons. Boileau is of opinion, that they were in the nature of surnames, and repeated as such; for the Greeks having no names derived from their fathers, were obliged to add some other distinction of each person; either naming his parents expressly, or his place of birth, profession, or the like: as Alexander the son of Philip, Herodotus of Halicarnassus, Diogenes the Cynic, &c. Homer therefore, complying with the custom of his country, used such distinctive additions as better agreed with poetry. And indeed we have something parallel to these in modern times; such as the names of Harold Harefoot, Edmond Ironside, Edward Long-shanks, Edward the Black Prince, &c. If yet this be thought to account better for the propriety than for the repetition, I shall add a farther conjecture. Hesiod, dividing the world into its different ages, has placed a fourth age between the brazen and the iron one, of "heroes distinct from other men: a divine race, who fought at Thebes and Troy, are called demi-gods, and live by the care of Jupiter in the islands of the blessed." Now among the divine honours which were paid them, they might have this also in common with the gods, not to be mentioned without the solemnity of an epithet, and such as might be acceptable to them by its celebrating their families, actions, or qualities.

Whatever cavils have been raised against Homer, are such as hardly deserve a reply, but will yet be taken notice of as they occur in the course of the work. Many have been occasioned by an injudicious endeavour to exalt Virgil; which is much the same, as if one should think to raise the superstructure by undermining the foundation: one would imagine, by the whole course of their parallels, that these critics never so much as heard of Homer's having written first: a consideration which, whoever compares these two poets, ought to have always in his eye. Some accuse him for the same things which they overlook or praise in the other; as when they prefer the fable and moral of the Æneis to those of the Iliad, for the same reasons which might set the Odyssey above the Æneis: as that the hero is a wiser man: and the action of the one more beneficial to his country than that of the other; or else they blame him for not doing what he never designed; as because Achilles is not as good and perfect a prince as Æneas, when the very moral of his poem required a contrary character: it is thus that Rapin judges in his comparison of Homer and Virgil. Others select those particular passages of Homer, which are not so laboured as some that Virgil drew out of them; this is the whole management of Scaliger in his Poetics. Others quarrel with what they take for low and mean expressions, sometimes through a false delicacy and refinement, often an ignorance of the graces of the original; and then triumph in the awkwardness of their own translations; this is the conduct of Perault in his Parallels. Lastly, there are others, who, pretending to a fairer proceeding, distinguish between the personal merit of Homer, and that of his work; but when they come to assign the causes of the great reputation of the Iliad, they found it upon the ignorance of his times and the prejudice of those that followed: and in pursuance of this principle, they make those accidents (such as the contention of the cities, &c.) to be the causes of his fame, which were in reality the consequences of his merit. The same might as well be said of Virgil, or any great author, whose general character will infallibly raise many casual additions to their reputation. This is the method of Mons. de la Motte; who yet confesses upon the whole, that in whatever age Homer had lived, he must have been the greatest poet of his nation, and that he may be said in this sense to be the master even of those who surpassed him.

In all these objections we see nothing that contradicts his title to the honour of the chief invention; and as long as this (which is indeed the characteristic of poetry itself) remains unequalled by his followers, he still continues superior to them. A cooler judgment may commit fewer faults, and be more approved in the eyes of one sort of critics; but that warmth of fancy will carry the loud and most universal applauses, which holds the heart of a reader under the strongest enchantment.—Homer not only appears the inventor of poetry, but excels all the inventors of other arts in this, that he has swallowed up the honour of those who succeeded him. What he has done admitted no increase, it only left room for contraction or regulation. He showed all the stretch of fancy at once; and if he has failed in some of his flights, it was but because he attempted every thing. A work of this kind seems like a mighty tree which rises from the most vigorous seed, is improved with industry, flourishes, and produces the finest fruit; nature and art conspire to raise it; pleasure and profit join to make it valuable: and they who find the justest faults, have only said, that a few branches (which run luxuriant through a richness of nature) might be lopped into form to give it a more regular appearance.

Having now spoken of the beauties and defects of the original, it remains to treat of the translation, with the same view to the chief characteristic. As far as that is seen in the main parts of the poem, such as the fable, manners, and sentiments, no translator can prejudice it but by wilful omissions or contractions. As it also breaks out in every particular image, description, and simile; whoever lessens or too much softens those, takes off from this chief character. It is the first grand duty of an interpreter to give his author entire and unaimed; and for the rest, the diction and versification only are his proper province; since these must be his own; but the others he is to take as he finds them.

It should then be considered what methods may afford some equivalent in our language for the graces of these in the Greek. It is certain no literal translation can be just to an excellent original in a superior language: but it is a great mistake to imagine (as many have done) that a rash paraphrase can make amends for this general defect; which is no less in danger to lose the spirit of an ancient, by deviating into the modern manners of expression. If there be sometimes a darkness, there is often a light in antiquity, which nothing better preserves than a version almost literal. I know no liberties one ought to take, but those which are necessary for transfusing the spirit of the original, and supporting the poetical style of the translation: and I will venture to say, there have not been more men misled in former times by a servile dull adherence to the latter, than have been deluded in ours by a chimerical insolent hope of raising and improving their author. It is not to be doubted that the fire of the poem is what a translator should principally regard, as it is most likely to expire in his managing: however it is the safest way to be content with preserving this to the utmost in the whole, without endeavouring to be more than he finds his author is in any particular place. It is a great secret in writing, to know when to be plain, and when poetical and figurative; and it is what Homer will teach us, if we will but follow modestly in his footsteps. Where his diction is bold and lofty, let us raise ours as high as we can; but where his is plain and humble, we ought not to be deterred from imitating him by the fear of incurring the censure of a mere English critic. Nothing that belongs to Homer seems to have been more commonly mistaken than the just pitch of his style; some of his translators having swelled into Tastian, in a proud confidence of the sublime; others sunk into flatness, in a cold and timorous notion of simplicity. Methinks I see these different followers of Homer, some sweating and straining after him by violent leaps and bounds (the certain signs of false mettle); others slowly and servilely creeping in his train, while the poet himself is all the time proceeding with an unaffected and equal majesty before them. However, of the two extremes, one would sooner pardon frenzy than frigidty: no author is to be envied for such commendations as he may gain by that character of style, which his friends must agree together to call simplicity, and the rest of the world will call dulness. There is a graceful and dignified simplicity, as well as a bold and sordid one, which differ as much from each other as the air of a plain man from that of a sloven: it is one thing to be tricked up, and another not to be dressed at all. Simplicity is the mean between ostentation and rusticity.

This pure and noble simplicity is no where in such perfection as in the scripture and our author: One may affirm, with all respect to the inspired writings, that the Divine Spirit made use of no other words but what were intelligible and common to men at that time, and in that part of the world; and as Homer is the author nearest to those, his style must of course bear a greater resemblance to the sacred books than that of any other writer. This consideration (together with what has been observed of the purity of some of his thoughts) may methinks induce a translator on the one hand to give into several of those general phrases and manners of expression, which have attained a veneration even in our language from being used in the Old Testament; as on the other, to avoid those which have been appropriated to the Divinity, and in a manner consigned to mystery and religion.

For a farther preservation of this air of simplicity, a particular care should be taken to express with all plainness those moral sentences and proverbial speeches which are so numerous in this poet

the names of Mr. Rowe and Dr. Parnell, though I shall take a farther opportunity of doing justice to the last, whose good-nature (to give it a great panegyric) is no less extensive than his learning. The favour of these gentlemen is not entirely undeserved by one who bears them so true an affection. But what can I say of the honour so many of the great have done me, while the first names of the age appear as my subscribers, and the most distinguished patrons and ornaments of learning as my chief encouragers? Among these it is a particular pleasure to me to find, that my highest obligations are to such who have done most honour to the name of poet; that his grace the duke of Buckingham was not displeas'd I should undertake the author to whom he has given (in his excellent essay) so complete a praise:

Read Homer once and you can read no more;
 For all books else appear so mean, and poor.
 Verse will seem prose: but still persist to read,
 And Homer will be all the books you need.

That the earl of Halifax was one of the first to favour me, of whom it is hard to say whether the advancement of the polite arts is more owing to his generosity or his example. That such a genius as my lord Bolingbroke, not more distinguished in the great scenes of business, than in all the useful and entertaining parts of learning, has not refused to be the critic of these sheets, and the patron of their writer. And that so excellent an imitator of Homer as the noble author of the tragedy of Heroic Love, has continued his partiality to me, from my writing pastorals, to my attempting the Iliad. I cannot deny myself the pride of confessing, that I have had the advantage not only of their advice for the conduct in general, but their correction of several particulars of this translation.

I could say a great deal of the pleasure of being distinguished by the earl of Carnarvon: but it is almost absurd to particularize any one generous action in a person whose whole life is a continued series of them. Mr. Stanhope, the present secretary of state, will pardon my desire of having it known that he was pleas'd to promote this affair. The particular zeal of Mr. Harcourt (the son of the late lord chancellor) gave me a proof how much I am honour'd in a share of his friendship. I must attribute to the same motive that of several others of my friends, to whom all acknowledgments are rendered unnecessary by the privileges of a familiar correspondence: and I am satisfied I can no way better oblige men of their turn, than by my silence.

In short, I have found more patrons than ever Homer wanted. He would have thought himself happy to have met the same favour at Athens, that has been shown me by its learned rival, the university of Oxford. If my author had the wits of after-ages for his defenders, his translator has had the beauties of the present for his advocates; a pleasure too great to be changed for any fame in reversion. And I can hardly envy him those pompous honours he received after death, when I reflect on the enjoyment of so many agreeable obligations, and easy friendships, which make the satisfaction of life. This distinction is the more to be acknowledged, as it is shown to one whose pen has never gratified the prejudices of particular parties, or the vanities of particular men. Whatever the success may prove, I shall never repent of an undertaking in which I have experienced the candour and friendship of so many persons of merit; and in which I hope to pass some of those years of youth, that are generally lost in a circle of follies, after a manner neither wholly unuseful to others, nor disagreeable to myself.

HOMER'S ILLIAD.

TRANSLATED BY POPE.

HOMER'S ILLIAD,
IN TWENTY-FOUR BOOKS.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE CONTENTION OF ACHILLES AND AGAMEMNON.

IN the war of Troy, the Greeks, having sacked some of the neighbouring towns, and taken from thence two beautiful captives, Chryseis and Briseis, allotted the first to Agamemnon, and the last to Achilles. Chryses, the father of Chryseis, and priest of Apollo, comes to the Grecian camp to ransom her; with which the action of the poem opens, in the tenth year of the siege. The priest being refused, and insolently dismissed by Agamemnon, entreats for vengeance from his god, who inflicts a pestilence on the Greeks. Achilles calls a council, and encourages Chalcas to declare the cause of it, who attributes it to the refusal of Chryseis. The king being obliged to send back his captive, enters into a furious contest with Achilles, which Nestor pacifies; however, as he had the absolute command of the army, he seizes on Briseis in revenge. Achilles, in discontent, withdraws himself and his forces from the rest of the Greeks; and complaining to Thetis, she supplicates Jupiter to render them sensible of the wrong done to her son, by giving victory to the Trojans. Jupiter granting her suit incenses Juno, between whom the debate runs high, till they are reconciled by the address of Vulcan.

The time of two and twenty days is taken up in this book: nine during the plague, one in the council and quarrel of the princes, and twelve for Jupiter's stay with the Ethiopians, at whose return Thetis prefers her petition. The scene lies in the Grecian camp, then changes to Chrysa, and lastly to Olympus.

ACHILLES' wrath, to Greece the direful spring
Of woes unnumber'd, heavenly goddess sing!
That wrath which hurl'd to Pluto's gloomy reign
The souls of mighty chiefs untimely slain;

Whose limbs, unbury'd on the naked shore,
Devouring dogs and hungry vultures tore;
Since great Achilles and Atreides strove, [of Jove.
Such was the sovereign doom, and such the will Declare, O Muse! in what ill-fated hour,
Sprung the fierce strife, from what offended power?
Latona's son a dire contagion spread,
And heap'd the camp with mountains of the dead;
The king of men his reverend priest defy'd,
And for the king's offence the people dy'd.

For Chryses sought with costly gifts to gain
His captive daughter from the victor's chain.
Suppliant the venerable father stands,
Apollo's awful ensigns grace his hands:
By these he begs; and, lowly bending down,
Extends the sceptre and the laurel crown.
He sued to all, but chief implor'd for grace
The brother kings of Atreus' royal race.

"Ye kings and warriors! may your vows be crown'd,

And Troy's proud walls lie level with the ground:
May Jove restore you, when your toils are o'er,
Safe to the pleasures of your native shore.
But, oh! relieve a wretched parent's pain,
And give Chryseis to these arms again;
If mercy fail, yet let my presents move,
And dread avenging Phœbus, son of Jove."

The Greeks in shouts their joint assent declare,
The priest to reverence, and release the fair.
Not so Atreides: he with kingly pride,
Repuls'd the sacred sire, and thus reply'd:

"Hence, on thy life, and fly these hostile plains,
Nor ask, presumptuous, what the king detains!
Hence, with thy laurel crown, and golden rod,
Nor trust too far those ensigns of thy god.
Mine is thy daughter, priest, and shall remain;
And prayers, and tears, and bribes, shall plead in vain;

Till time shall rife every youthful grace,
And age dismiss her from my cold embrace,
In daily labours of the loom employ'd,
Or doom'd to deck the bed she once enjoy'd.
Hence then, to Argos shall the maid retire,
Far from her native soil, and weeping sire."

The trembling priest along the shore return'd,
And in the anguish of a father mourn'd.
Discourset, not daring to complain,
Silent he wander'd by the sounding main:
Till safe at distance, to his god he prays,
The god who darts around the world his rays.

" O Smintheus ! sprung from fair Latona's line,
Thou guardian power of Cilla the divine,
Thou source of light ! whom Tenedos adores,
And whose bright presence gilds thy Chrysa's shores :

If e'er with wreaths I hung thy sacred fane,
Or fed the flames with fat of oxen slain ;
God of the silver bow ! thy shafts employ,
Avenge thy servant, and the Greeks destroy."

Thus Chryses pray'd : the favouring power at-
And from Olympus' lofty tops descends. [tends,
Bent was his bow, the Grecian hearts to wound ;
Fierce as he mov'd, his silver shafts resound ;
Breathing revenge, a sudden night he spread,
And gloomy darkness roll'd about his head.
The fleet in view, he twang'd his deadly bow,
And hissing fly the feather'd fates below.
On mules and dogs th' infection first began ;
And last, the vengeful arrows fix'd in man.
For nine long nights through all the dusky air
The pyres thick-flaming shot a dismal glare.
But ere the tenth revolving day was run,
Inspir'd by Juno, Thetis' god-like son
Conven'd to council all the Grecian train ;
For much the goddess mourn'd her heroes slain.

Th' assembly seated, rising o'er the rest,
Achilles thus the king of men address :

" Why leave we not the fatal Trojan shore,
And measure back the seas we cross before ?
The plague destroying whom the sword would
'Tis time to save the few remains of war. [spare,
But let some prophet, or some sacred sage,
Explore the cause of great Apollo's rage ;
Or learn the wasteful vengeance to remove,
By mystic dreams, for dreams descend from Jove.
If broken vows this heavy curse have laid,
Let altars smoke, and hecatombs be paid,
So Heaven aton'd shall dying Greece restore,
And Phoebus dart his burning shafts no more."

He said, and sat : when Chalcas thus reply'd :
Chalcas the wise, the Grecian priest and guide,
That sacred seer, whose comprehensive view
The past, the present, and the future, knew :
Uprising slow, the venerable sage
Thus spoke the prudence and the fears of age :

" Belov'd of Jove, Achilles ! would'st thou know
Why angry Phoebus bends his fatal bow ?
First give thy faith, and plight a prince's word
Of sure protection, by thy power and sword.
For I must speak what wisdom would conceal,
And truths, invidious to the great, reveal.
Bold is the task, when subjects, grown too wise,
Instruct a monarch where his error lies ;
For though we deem the short-liv'd fury past,
'Tis sure, the mighty will revenge at last."

To whom Pelides. " From thy inmost soul
Speak what thou know'st, and speak without control.

Ev'n by that god I swear, who rules the day,
To whom thy hands the vows of Greece convey,
And whose blest oracles thy lips declare ;
Long as Achilles breathes this vital air,
No daring Greek of all the numerous band
Against his priest shall lift an impious hand :
Not ev'n the chief by whom our hosts are led,
The king of kings, shall touch that sacred head.

Encourag'd thus, the blameless man replies ;
" Nor vows unpaid, nor slighted sacrifice,
But he, our chief, provok'd the raging pest,
Apollo's vengeance for his injur'd priest ;

Nor will the god's awaken'd fury cease,
But plagues shall spread, and funeral fires increase,
Till the great king, without a ransom paid,
To her own Chrysa send the black-ey'd maid.
Perhaps, with added sacrifice and prayer,
The priest may pardon, and the god may spare."

The prophet spoke ; when, with a gloomy frown,
The monarch started from his shining throne ;
Black cholera fill'd his breast that boil'd with ire,
And from his eye-balls flash'd the living fire.
" Augur accurst ! denouncing mischief still,
Prophet of plagues, for ever boding ill !
Still must that tongue some wounding message
bring,

And still thy priestly pride provoke thy king ?
For this are Phoebus' oracles explor'd,
To teach the Greeks to murmur at their lord ?
For this with falsehoods is my honour stain'd,
Is Heaven offended, and a priest profan'd ;
Because my prize, my beauteous maid, I hold,
And heavenly charms prefer to proffer'd gold ?
A maid, unmatched in manners as in face,
Skill'd in each art, and crown'd with every grace.
Not half so dear were Clytemnestra's charms,
When first her blooming beauties blest my arms.
Yet, if the gods demand her, let her sail ;
Our cares are only for the public weal :
Let me be deem'd the hateful cause of all,
And suffer, rather than my people fall.

The prize, the beauteous prize, I will resign,
So dearly valued, and so justly mine.
But since, for common good, I yield the fair,
My private loss let grateful Greece repair ;
Nor unrewarded let your prince complain,
That he alone has fought and bled in vain."

" Insatiate king," Achilles thus replies,
" Fond of the power, but fonder of the prize !
Would'st thou the Greeks their lawful prey should yield,

The due reward of many a well-fought field ?
The spoils of cities raz'd, and warriors slain,
We share with justice, as with toil we gain :
But to resume whate'er thy avarice craves
(That trick of tyrants) may be borne by slaves.
Yet if our chief for plunder only fight,
The spoils of Ilium shall thy loss requite,
Whene'er by Jove's decree our conquering powers
Shall humble to the dust her lofty towers."

Then thus the king. " Shall I my prize resign
With tame content, and thou possesst of thine ?
Great as thou art, and like a god in fight,
Think not to rob me of a soldier's right.
At thy demand shall I restore the maid ?
First let the just equivalent be paid ;
Such as a king might ask ; and let it be
A treasure worthy her, and worthy me.
Or grant me this, or with a monarch's claim,
This hand shall seize some other captive dame ;
The mighty Ajax shall his prize resign,
Ulysses' spoils, or ev'n thy own, be mine.
The man who suffers, loudly may complain ;
And rage he may, but he shall rage in vain.
But this when time requires—It now remains
We launch a bark to plough the watery plains,
And waft the sacrifice to Chrysa's shores,
With chosen pilots, and with labouring oars.
Soon shall the fair the sable ship ascend,
And some deputed prince the charge attend :
This Creta's king, or Ajax shall fulfil,
Or wise Ulysses see perform'd dur will ;

Or, if our royal pleasure shall ordain,
 Achilles' self conduct her o'er the main;
 Let fierce Achilles, dreadful in his rage,
 The god propitiate, and the pest assuage."
 At this Pelides, frowning stern, reply'd:
 "O tyrant, arm'd with insolence and pride!
 In glorious slave to interest, ever join'd
 With fraud, unworthy of a royal mind!
 What generous Greek, obedient to thy word,
 Shall form an ambush, or shall lift the sword?
 What cause have I to war at thy decree?
 The distant Trojans never injur'd me:
 To Pthia's realms no hostile troops they led,
 And in her vales my warlike coursers fed;
 For hence remov'd, the hoarse-echoing main,
 And walls of rocks, secure my native reign,
 Whose fruitful soil luxuriant harvests grace,
 Rich in her fruits, and in her martial race.
 Either we sail'd, a voluntary throng,
 'T' avenge a private, not a public' wrong:
 What else to Troy th' assembled nations draws,
 But thine, ungrateful, and thy brother's cause?
 Is this the pay our blood and toils deserve:
 Disgrac'd and injur'd by the man we serve?
 And dar'st thou threat to snatch my prize away,
 Due to the deeds of many a dreadful day?
 A prize as small, O tyrant! match'd with thine,
 As thy own actions, if compar'd to mine.
 Thine in each conquest is the wealthy prey,
 Though mine the sweat and danger of the day.
 Some trivial presents to my ships I bear;
 Or barren praises pay the wounds of war.
 But know, proud monarch, I'm thy slave no more;
 My feet shall waft me to Thessalia's shore.
 Left by Achilles on the Trojan plain,
 What spoils, what conquests, shaft Atrides gain?"
 To this the king: "Fly, mighty warrior! fly,
 Thy aid we need not, and thy threats defy.
 There want not chiefs in such a cause to fight,
 And Jove himself shall guard a monarch's right.
 Of all the kings (the gods' distinguish'd care)
 To power superior none such hatred bear:
 Strife and debate thy restless soul employ,
 And wars and horrors are thy savage joy;
 If thou hast strength, 'twas Heaven that strength
 bestow'd,
 For know, vain man! thy valour is from God.
 Haste, launch thy vessels, fly with speed away,
 Rule thy own realms with arbitrary sway:
 I heed thee not, but prize at equal rate
 Thy short-liv'd friendship, and thy groundless hate.
 Go, threat thy earth-born myrmidons; but here
 'Tis mine to threaten, prince, and thine to fear.
 Know, if the god the beautiful dame demand,
 My bark shall waft her to her native land;
 But then prepare, imperious prince! prepare,
 Fierce as thou art, to yield thy captive fair:
 Ere in thy tent I'll seize the blooming prize,
 Thy lov'd Briseis with the radiant eyes.
 Hence shalt thou prove my might, and curse the Thou stood'st a rival of imperial power; [hour,
 And hence to all our host it shall be known,
 That kings are subject to the gods alone."
 Achilles heard, with grief and rage oppress,
 His heart swell'd high, and labour'd in his breast.
 Distracting thoughts by turns his bosom rul'd,
 Now fir'd by wrath, and now by reason cool'd:
 That prompts his hand to draw the deadly sword,
 Force through the Greeks, and pierce their haughty herd;

This whispers soft, his vengeance to control,
 And calm the rising tempest of his soul.
 Just as in anguish of suspense he stay'd,
 While half unsheath'd appear'd the glittering blade,
 Minerva swift descended from above,
 Sent by the sister and the wife of Jove
 (For both the princes claim'd her equal care);
 Behind she stood, and by the golden hair
 Achilles seiz'd: to him alone confess;
 A sable cloud conceal'd her from the rest.
 He sees, and sudden to the goddess cries,
 Known by the flames that sparkle from her eyes:
 "Descends Minerva in her guardian care,
 A heavenly witness of the wrongs I bear
 From Atreus' son: then let those eyes that view
 The daring crime, behold the vengeance too."
 "Forbear!" the progeny of Jove replies;
 "To calm thy fury I forsake the skies:
 Let great Achilles, to the gods resign'd,
 To reason yield the empire o'er his mind.
 By awful Jove this command is given;
 The king and you are both the care of Heaven.
 The force of keen reproaches let him feel,
 But sheath, obedient, thy revenging steel.
 For I pronounce (and trust a heavenly power)
 Thy injur'd honour has its fated hour,
 When the proud monarch shall thy arms implore,
 And bribe thy friendship with a boundless store.
 Then let revenge no longer bear the sway,
 Command thy passions, and the gods obey."
 To her Pelides. "With regardful ear
 'Tis just, O goddess! I thy dictates hear.
 Hard as it is, my vengeance I suppress:
 Those who revere the gods, the gods will bless."
 He said, observant of the blue-ey'd maid;
 Then in the sheath return'd the shining blade.
 The goddess swift to high Olympus flies,
 And joins the sacred senate of the skies.
 Nor yet the rage his boiling breast forsook,
 Which thus redoubling on Atrides broke.
 "O monster! mix'd of insolence and fear,
 Thou dog in forehead, but in heart a deer!
 When wert thou known in ambush'd fights to dare,
 Or nobly face the horrid front of war?
 'Tis ours, the chance of fighting fields to try,
 Thine to look on, and bid the valiant die.
 So much 'tis safer through the camp to go,
 And rob a subject, than despoil a foe.
 Scourge of thy people, violent and base!
 Sent in Jove's anger on a slavish race,
 Who, lost to sense of generous freedom past,
 Are tam'd to wrongs, or this had been thy law.
 Now by this sacred sceptre hear me swear,
 Which never more shall leaves or blossoms bear,
 Which sever'd from the trunk (as I from thee)
 On the bare mountains left its parent tree;
 This sceptre, form'd by temper'd steel to prove
 An ensign of the delegates of Jove,
 From whom the power of laws and justice springs
 (Tremendous oath! inviolate to kings):
 By this I swear, when bleeding Greece again
 Shall call Achilles, she shall call in vain.
 When, dash'd with slaughter, Hector comes to spread
 The purpled shore with mountains of the dead,
 Then shalt thou mourn th' affront thy madness gave,
 Fore'd to deplore, when impotent to save:
 Then rage in bitterness of soul, to know
 This act has made the bravest Greek thy foe."

He spoke: and furious hurl'd against the ground
His sceptre starr'd with golden studs around.
Then sternly silent sat. With like disdain,
The raging king return'd his frowns again.

To calm their passions with the words of age,
Slow from his seat arose the Pylian sage
Experienc'd Nestor, in persuasion skill'd,
Words sweet as honey from his lips distill'd;
Two generations now had pass'd away,
Wise by his rules, and happy by his sway;
Two ages o'er his native realm he reign'd,
And now th' example of the third remain'd.
All view'd with awe the venerable man;
Who thus with mild benevolence began:

“ What shame, what woe is this to Greece! what joy

To Troy's proud monarch, and the friends of Troy!
That adverse gods commit to stern debate
The best, the bravest of the Grecian state.
Young as ye are, this youthful head restrain,
Nor think your Nestor's years and wisdom vain.
A godlike race of heroes once I knew,
Such as no more these aged eyes shall view!
Lives there a chief to match Pirihtous' fame,
Dryas the bold, or Ceneus' deathless name;
Theseus, endued with more than mortal might,
Or Polyphemus, like the gods in fight?
With these of old-to toils of battle bred,
In early youth my hardy days I led:
Fir'd with the thirst which virtuous envy breeds,
And smit with love of honourable deeds,
Strongest of men, they pierc'd the mountain boar,
Rang'd the wild deserts red with monsters' gore,
And from their hills, the shaggy Centaurs tore.
Yet these with soft, persuasive arts I sway'd;
When Nestor spoke, they listen'd and obey'd.
If in my youth, ev'n these esteem'd me wise;
Do you, young warriors, hear my age advise.
Atrides, seize not on the beautiful slave;
That prize the Greeks by common suffrage gave:
Nor thou, Achilles, treat our prince with pride;
Let kings be just, and sovereign power preside.
Thee, the first honours of the war adorn,
Like gods in strength, and of a goddess born;
Him, awful majesty exalts above
The powers of Earth, and scepter'd son of Jove.
Let both unite, with well-consenting mind,
So shall authority with strength be join'd.
Leave me, O king! to calm Achilles' rage;
Rule thou thyself, as more advanc'd in age.
Forbid it, gods! Achilles should be lost,
The pride of Greece, and bulwark of our host.”

This said, he ceas'd: the king of men replies:

“ Thy years are awful, and thy words are wise.
But that imperious, that unconquer'd soul,
No laws can limit, no respect control.
Before his pride must his superiors fall,
His word the law, and he the lord of all?
Him must our hosts, our chiefs, ourselves obey?
What king can bear a rival in his sway?
Grant that the gods his matchless force have given;
Has foul reproach a privilege from Heaven?”

Here on the monarch's speech Achilles broke,
And furious, thus, and interrupting spoke:

“ Tyrant, I well deserv'd thy galling chain,
To live thy slave, and still to serve in vain,
Should I submit to each unjust decree:
Command thy vassals, but command not me.
Seize on Briseis, whom the Grecians doom'd
My prize of war, yet tamely see resum'd;

And seiz'd secure; no more Achilles draws
His conquering sword in any woman's cause.
The gods command me to forgive the past;
But let this first invasion be the last:
For know, thy blood, when next thou dar'st invade
Shall stream in vengeance on our reeking blade.”

At this they ceas'd; the stern debate expir'd;
The chiefs in sullen majesty retir'd.

Achilles with Patroclus took his way,
Where near his tents his hollow vessels lay.
Mean time Atrides lanch'd with numerous oars
A well-rigg'd ship for Chrysa's sacred shores:
High on the deck was fair Chryseis plac'd,
And sage Ulysses with the conduct grac'd;
Safe in her sides the hecatomb they stow'd,
Then, swiftly sailing, cut the liquid road.

The host to expiate, next the king prepares,
With pure lustrations, and with solemn prayers.
Wash'd by the briny wave, the pious train
Are cleans'd, and cast th' ablutions in the main.
Along the shore whole hecatombs were laid,
And bulls and goats to Phœbus' altars paid,
The sable fumes in curling spires arise,
And waft their grateful odours to the skies.

The army thus in sacred rites engag'd,
Atrides still with deep resentment rag'd.
To wait his will, two sacred heralds stood,
Talthybius and Eurybates the good.
“ Haste to the fierce Achilles' tent,” he cries,
“ Hence bear Briseis as our royal prize:
Submit he must: or, if they will not part,
Ourself in arms shall tear her from his heart.”

Th' unwilling heralds act their lord's commands;
Pensive they walk along the barren sands:
Arriv'd, the hero in his tent they find,
With gloomy aspect, on his arm reclin'd,
At awful distance long they silent stand,
Loth to advance, or speak their hard command;
Decent confusion! This the godlike man
Perceiv'd, and thus with accent mild began:

“ With leave and honour enter our abodes,
Ye sacred ministers of men and gods!
I know your message; by constraint you came;
Not you, but your imperious lord, I blame.
Patroclus, haste, the fair Briseis bring;
Conduct my captive to the haughty king,
But witness, heralds, and proclaim my vow,
Witness to gods above, and men below!
But first, and loudest to your prince declare,
That lawless tyrant whose commands you bear;
Unmov'd as death Achilles shall remain,
Though prostrate Greece should bleed at ev'ry vein;
The raging chief in frantic passion lost,
Blind to himself, and useless to his host,
Unskill'd to judge the future by the past,
In blood and slaughter shall repent at last.”

Patroclus now th' unwilling beauty brought;
She, in soft sorrow, and in pensive thought,
Past silent, as the heralds held her hand,
And oft look'd back, slow moving o'er the strand.
Not so his loss the fierce Achilles bore;
But sad retiring to the sounding shore,
O'er the wild margin of the deep he hung,
That kindred deep from whence his mother sprung:
There, bath'd in tears of anger and disdain,
Thus loud lamented to the stormy main:

“ O parent goddess! since in early bloom
Thy son must fall, by too severe a doom;
Sure, to so short a race of glory born,
Great Jove in justice should this span adorn:

Honour and fame at least the thunderer ow'd,
 As ill he pays the promise of a god;
 You proud monarch thus thy son defest,
 Scars my glories, and resumes my prize."
 Far from the deep recesses of the main,
 Where aged Ocean holds his watery reign,
 The goddess-mother heard. The waves divide;
 As like a mist she rose above the tide;
 She held him mourning on the naked shores,
 As thus the sorrows of his soul explores.
 Why grieves my son? Thy anguish let me share,
 I weal the cause, and trust a parent's care."
 He deeply sighing said: "To tell my woe,
 But to mention what too well you know.
 From Thebè sacred to Apollo's name,
 My (Ionia's realm) our conquering army came,
 With treasure loaded and triumphant spoils,
 Whose just division crown'd the soldier's toils;
 My bright Chryseis, heavenly prize! was led,
 My vote selected, to the general's bed.
 As priest of Phœbus sought by gifts to gain
 My beautiful daughter from the victor's chain;
 He fleet he reach'd, and, lowly bending down,
 Held forth the sceptre and the laurel crown,
 Treating all: but chief implor'd for grace
 The brother-kings of Atreus' royal race:
 The generous Greeks their joint consent declare
 The priest to reverence, and release the fair;
 Not so Atreides: he, with wonted pride,
 The sire insulted, and his gifts deny'd:
 He insulted sire (his god's peculiar care)
 To Phœbus pray'd, and Phœbus heard the prayer:
 A dreadful plague ensues; th' avenging darts
 incessant fly, and pierce the Grecian hearts.
 A prophet then, inspir'd by Heaven, arose,
 And points the crime, and thence derives the woe.
 Myself the first th' assembled chiefs incline
 To avert the vengeance of the power divine;
 Then rising in his wrath, the monarch storm'd;
 Accus'd he threaten'd, and his threats perform'd:
 The fair Chryseis to her sire was sent,
 With offer'd gifts to make the god relent;
 But now he seiz'd Briseis heav'nly charms,
 And of my valour's prize defrauds my arms,
 Defrauds the votes of all the Grecian train;
 And service, faith, and justice, plead in vain.
 But, goddess! thou thy suppliant son attend,
 To high Olympus' shining court ascend,
 Urge all the ties to former service ow'd,
 And sue for vengeance to the thundering god.
 Didst hast thou triumph'd in the glorious boast,
 That thou stood'st forth of all th' ethereal host,
 When bold rebellion shook the realms above,
 Th' undaunted guard of cloud-compelling Jove.
 When the bright partner of his awful reign,
 Th' warlike maid, and monarch of the main,
 The traitor-gods, by mad ambition driven,
 Durst threat with chains th' omnipotence of Heaven.
 Then call'd by thee, the monster Titan came,
 (Whom gods Briareus, men Ægeon name)
 Through wondering skies enormous stalk'd along;
 Not he¹ that shakes the solid Earth so strong:
 With giant-pride at Jove's high throne he stands,
 And brandish'd round him all his hundred hands;
 Th' affrighted gods confess'd their awful lord,
 They dropt the fetters, trembled, and ador'd.
 This, goddess, this to his remembrance call,
 Embrace his knees, at his tribunal fall;

¹ Neptune.

Conjure him far to drive the Grecian train,
 To hurl them headlong to their fleet and main,
 To heap the shores with copious death, and bring
 The Greeks to know the curse of such a king:
 Let Agamemnon lift his haughty head
 O'er all his wide dominion of the dead,
 And mourn in blood, that e'er he durst disgrace
 The boldest warrior of the Grecian race."

"Unhappy son!" fair Thetis thus replies,
 While tears celestial trickle from her eyes,
 "Why have I borne thee with a mother's throes,
 To fates averse, and nurs'd for future woe?
 So short a space the light of Heaven to view!
 So short a space and fill'd with sorrow too!
 O might a parent's careful wish prevail,
 Far, far from Iliion should thy vessels sail,
 And thou, from camps remote, the danger shun,
 Which now, alas! too nearly threatens my son.
 Yet (what I can) to move thy suit I'll go
 To great Olympus crown'd with fleecy snow.
 Meantime, secure within thy ships, from far
 Behold the field, nor mingle in the war.
 The sire of gods and all th' ethereal train,
 On the warm limits of the farthest main,
 Now mix with mortals, nor disdain to grace
 The feast of Ethiopia's blameless race;
 Twelve days the powers indulge the genial rite,
 Returning with the twelfth revolving light.
 Then will I mount the brazen dome, and move
 The high tribunal of immortal Jove."

The goddess spoke: the rolling waves unclosed;
 Then down the deep she plung'd from whence she
 And left him sorrowing on the lonely coast. [rose,
 In wild resentment for the fair he lost.

In Chrysa's port now sage Ulysses rode;
 Beneath the deck the destin'd victims stow'd;
 The sails they fur'd, they lash'd the mast aside,
 And dropp'd their anchors, and the pinnace ty'd.
 Next on the shore their hecatomb they land,
 Chryseis last descending on the strand.
 Her, thus returning from the furrow'd main,
 Ulysses led to Phœbus' sacred fane;
 Where at his solemn altar as the maid
 He gave to Chryseis, thus the hero said:
 "Hail! reverend priest! to Phœbus' awful dome
 A suppliant I from great Atreides come:
 Unransom'd here receive the spotless fair;
 Accept the hecatombs the Greeks prepare;
 And may thy god, who scatters darts around,
 Aton'd by sacrifice, desist to wound."

At this the sire embrac'd the maid again,
 So sadly lost, so lately sought in vain.
 Then near the altar of the darting king,
 Dispos'd in rank their hecatomb they bring:
 With water purify their hands, and take
 The sacred offering of the salted cake;
 While thus with arms devoutly rais'd in air,
 And solemn voice, the priest directs his prayer:

"God of the silver bow, thy ear incline,
 Whose power encircles Cilla the divine;
 Whose sacred eye thy Tenedos surveys,
 And gilds fair Chrysa with distinguish'd rays!
 If, fir'd to vengeance at thy priest's request,
 Thy direful darts inflict the raging pest;
 Once more attend! avert the wasteful woe,
 And smile propitious, and unbend thy bow."

So Chryseis pray'd, Apollo heard his prayer:
 And now the Greeks their hecatomb prepare;
 Between their horns the salted barley threw,
 And with their heads to Heaven the victims slew:

The limbs they sever from th' enclosing hide;
 The thighs, selected to the gods, divide:
 On these, in double cawls involv'd with art,
 The choicest morsels lay from every part.
 The priest himself before his altar stands,
 And burns the offering with his holy hands;
 Pours the black wine, and sees the flames aspire;
 The youth with instruments surround the fire:
 The thighs thus sacrific'd, and entrails drest,
 Th' assistants part, transfix, and roast the rest:
 Then spread the tables, the repast prepare,
 Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.
 When now the rage of hunger was repress,
 With pure libations they conclude the feast;
 The youths with wine the copious goblets crown'd,
 And, pleas'd, dispense the flowing bowls around.
 With hymns divine the joyous banquet ends,
 The Paans lengthen'd till the Sun descends:
 The Greeks, restor'd, the grateful notes prolong;
 Apollo listens, and approves the song.

'Twas night; the chiefs beside their vessel lie,
 Till rosy Morn had purpled o'er the sky:
 Then lanch, and hoist the mast; indulgent gales,
 Supply'd by Phoebus, fill the swelling sails;
 The milk-white canvas belying as they blow,
 The parted ocean foams and roars below;
 Above the bounding billows swift they flew,
 Till now the Grecian camp appear'd in view.
 Far on the beach they haul their bark to land
 (The crooked keel divides the yellow sand);
 Then part, where stretch'd along the winding bay
 The ships and tents in mingled prospect lay.

But raging still, amidst his navy sate
 The stern Achilles, stedfast in his hate;
 Nor mix'd in combat, nor in council join'd;
 But wasting cares lay heavy on his mind:
 In his black thoughts revenge and slaughter roll,
 And scenes of blood rise dreadful in his soul.

Twelve days were past, and now the dawning light
 The gods had summon'd to th' Olympian height:
 Jove first ascending from the watery bowers,
 Leads the long order of ethereal powers.
 When, like the morning mist in early day,
 Rose from the flood the daughter of the sea;
 And to the seats divine her flight address'd.
 There, far apart, and high above the rest,
 The thunderer sat; where old Olympus shrouds
 His hundred heads in Heaven, and props the clouds.
 Suppliant the goddess stood: one hand she plac'd
 Beneath his beard, and one his knee embrac'd:
 "If e'er, O father of the gods!" she said,
 "My words could please thee, or my actions aid;
 Some marks of honour on my son bestow,
 And pay in glory what in life you owe.
 Fame is at least by heavenly promise due.
 To life so short, and now dishonour'd too.
 Avenge this wrong, oh, ever just and wise!
 Let Greece be humbled, and the Trojans rise;
 'Till the proud king, and the Achaian race,
 Shall heap with honours him they now disgrace."

Thus Thetis spoke, but Jove in silence held
 The sacred councils of his breast conceal'd.
 Not so repuls'd, the goddess closer prest,
 Still grasp'd his knees, and urg'd the dear request:
 "O sire of gods and men! thy suppliant hear;
 Refuse, or grant; for what has Jove to fear?
 Or, oh! declare, of all the powers above,
 Is wretched Thetis least the care of Jove?"

She said, and sighing thus the god replies,
 Who rolls the thunder o'er the vaulted skies:

"What hast thou ask'd? Ah, why should Jove
 In foreign contests, and domestic rage, [engage
 The gods' complaints, and Juno's fierce alarms,
 While I, too partial, aid the Trojan arms?
 Go, lest the haughty partner of my sway,
 With jealous eyes, thy close access survey;
 But part in peace, secure thy prayer is sped:
 Witness the sacred honours of our head,
 The nod that ratifies the will divine,
 The faithful, fix'd, irrevocable sign,
 'This seals thy suit, and this fulfils thy vows—"
 He spoke, and awful bends his sable brows;
 Shakes his ambrosial curls, and gives the nod;
 The stamp of fate, and sanction of the god:
 High Heaven with trembling the dread signal took,
 And all Olympus to the centre shook.

Swift to the seas profound the goddess flies,
 Jove to his starry mansion in the skies.
 The shining synod of th' immortals wait
 The coming god, and from their thrones of state
 Arising silent, wrapt in holy fear,
 Before the majesty of Heaven appear,
 Trembling they stand, while Jove assumes the throne,
 All, but the god's imperious queen alone:
 Late had she view'd the silver-footed dame,
 And all her passions kindled into flame.
 "Say, artful manager of Heaven," she cries,
 "Who now partakes the secrets of the skies?
 Thy Juno knows not the decrees of fate,
 In vain the partner of imperial state.

What favourite goddess then those cares divides,
 Which Jove in prudence from his consort hides?"
 To this the thunderer: "Seek not thou to find
 The sacred counsels of almighty mind:
 Involv'd in darkness lies the great decree,
 Nor can the depths of fate be pierc'd by thee.
 What fits thy knowledge, thou the first shalt know
 The first of gods above and men below;
 But thou, nor they, shall search the thoughts that roll
 Deep in the close recesses of my soul."

Full on the sire the goddess of the skies
 Roll'd the large orbs of her majestic eyes,
 And thus return'd: "Austere Saturnus, say
 From whence this wrath, or who controls thy sway?
 Thy boundless will for me remains, in force,
 And all thy councils take the destin'd course.
 But 'tis for Greece I fear: for late was seen
 In close consult the silver-footed queen.
 Jove to his Thetis nothing could deny,
 Nor was the signal vain that shook the sky.
 What fatal favour has the goddess won,
 To grace her fierce, inexorable son?
 Perhaps in Grecian blood to drench the plain,
 And glut his vengeance with my people slain."

Then thus the god: "Oh restless fate of pride,
 That strives to learn what Heaven resolves to hide;
 Vain is the search, presumptuous and abhorr'd,
 Anxious to thee, and odious to thy lord.
 Let this suffice; th' immutable decree
 No force can shake: what is, that ought to be.
 Goddess submit, nor dare our will withstand,
 But dread the power of this avenging hand;
 Th' united strength of all the gods above
 In vain resists th' omnipotence of Jove."

The thunderer spoke, nor durst the queen reply:
 A reverend honour silence'd all the sky.
 The feast disturb'd, with sorrow Vulcan saw
 His mother menac'd, and the gods in awe;
 Peace at his heart, and pleasure his design,
 Thus interpos'd the architect divine:

the wretched quarrels of the mortal state for unworthy, gods! of your debate:
 when their days in senseless strife employ,
 in eternal peace and constant joy.
 O goddess-mother, with our sire comply,
 break the sacred union of the sky;
 rous'd to rage, he shake the blest abodes,
 with the red lightning, and dethrone the gods.
 You submit, the thunderer stands appeas'd;
 gracious power is willing to be pleas'd."
 Thus Vulcan spoke; and rising with a bound,
 double bowl with sparkling nectar crown'd,
 rich held to Juno in a cheerful way,
 "be patient and obey.
 As you are, if Jove his arm extend,
 but grieve, unable to defend.
 Let god so daring in your aid to move,
 lift his hand against the force of Jove?
 In your cause I felt his matchless might,
 and deadlong downward from th' ethereal height;
 all the day in rapid circles round;
 till the Sun descended, touch'd the ground:
 listless I fell, in giddy motions lost;
 the Siothians rais'd me on the Lemnian coast."
 He said, and to her hands the goblet heav'd, rich, with a smile, the white-arm'd queen re-ceiv'd to the rest he fill'd; and in his turn, [ceiv'd.
 rich to his lips apply'd the nectar'd urn.
 Then with awkward grace his office plies,
 and unextinguish'd laughter shakes the skies.
 Thus the blest gods the genial day prolong,
 feasts ambrosial, and celestial song.
 Apollo tun'd the lyre; the Muses round with voice alternate aid the silver sound.
 Then time the radiant Sun, to mortal sight preceding swift, roll'd down the rapid light.
 Then to their starry domes the gods depart,
 the shining monuments of Vulcan's art:
 and on his couch reclin'd his awful head,
 and Juno slumber'd on the golden bed.

 THE ILIAD.

 BOOK II.

 ARGUMENT.

 THE TRIAL OF THE ARMY, AND CATALOGUE OF THE FORCES.

ACHILLES, in pursuance of the request of Thetis, sends a deceitful vision to Agamemnon, persuading him to lead the army to battle; in order to make the Greeks sensible of their want of Achilles. The general, who is deluded with the hopes of taking Troy without his assistance, but fears the army was discouraged by his absence and the late plague, as well as by the length of time, contrives to make trial of their disposition by a stratagem. He first communicates his design to the princes in council, that he would propose a return to the soldiers, and that they should put a stop to them if the proposal was embraced. Then he assembles the whole host, and upon moving for a return to Greece, they unanimously agree to it, and run to prepare the ships. They are detained by the management of Ulysses, who chastises the insolence of Thersites. The assembly is recalled, several speeches made on the occasion, and at length the advice of Nestor followed, which was, to make a general muster of the troops, and to divide them into their several nations, before they proceeded to battle. This gives occasion to the poet to enumerate all the forces of the Greeks and Trojans, and in a large catalogue.

The time employed in this book consists not entirely of one day. The scene lies in the Grecian camp and upon the sea-shore; toward the end it removes to Troy.

Now pleasing sleep had seal'd each mortal eye,
 Stretch'd in the tents the Grecian leaders lie,
 Th' immortals slumber'd on their thrones above;
 All, but the ever wakeful eyes of Jove.
 To honour Thetis' son he bends his care,
 And plunge the Greeks in all the woes of war:
 Then bids an empty phantom rise to sight,
 And thus commands the vision of the night:
 "Fly hence, deluding dream! and, light as air,
 To Agamemnon's ample tent repair.
 Bid him in arms draw forth th' embattled train,
 Lead all his Grecians to the dusty plain.
 Declare, ev'n now 'tis given him to destroy
 The lofty towers of wide-extended Troy.
 For now no more the gods with fate contend,
 At Juno's suit the heavenly factions end.
 Destruction hangs o'er yon devoted wall,
 And nodding Ilium waits th' impending fall."

Swift as the word the vain illusion fled,
 Descends, and hovers o'er Atreides' head;
 Cloth'd in the figure of the Pylian sage,
 Renown'd for wisdom, and rever'd for age;
 Around his temples spreads his golden wing,
 And thus the flattering dream deceives the king:
 "Can'st thou, with all a monarch's cares oppress,
 Oh, Atreus' son! canst thou indulge thy rest?
 Ill fits a chief who mighty nations guides,
 Directs in council, and in war presides,
 To whom its safety a whole people owes,
 To waste long nights in indolent repose.
 Monarch, awake! 'tis Jove's command I bear;
 Thou, and thy glory, claim his heavenly care.
 In just array draw forth th' embattled train,
 Lead all thy Grecians to the dusty plain;
 Ev'n now, O king, tis given thee to destroy
 The lofty towers of wide-extended Troy.
 For now no more the gods with fate contend,
 At Juno's suit the heavenly factions end.
 Destruction hangs o'er yon devoted wall,
 And nodding Ilium waits th' impending fall.
 Awake, but waking this advice approve,
 And trust the vision that descends from Jove."

The phantom said; then vanish'd from his sight,
 Resolves to air, and mixes with the night.
 A thousand schemes the monarch's mind employ;
 Elate in thought, he sarks untaken Troy:
 Vain as he was, and to the future blind;
 Nor saw what Jove and secret fate design'd,
 What mighty toils to either host remain,
 What scenes of grief, and numbers of the slain
 Eager he rises, and in fancy hears
 The voice celestial murmuring in his ears.
 First on his limbs a slender vest he drew,
 Around him next the regal mantle threw;

Th' embroider'd sandals on his feet were tied ;
 The starry falchion glitter'd at his side ;
 And last his arm the massy sceptre loads,
 Unstain'd, immortal, and the gift of gods.
 Now rosy Morn ascends the court of Jove,
 Lifts up her light, and opens day above.
 The king dispatch'd his heralds with commands
 To range the camp, and summon all the bands :
 The gathering hosts the monarch's word obey ;
 While to the fleet Atrides bends his way.
 In his black ship the Pylian prince he found ;
 There calls a senate of the peers around ;
 Th' assembly plac'd, the king of men express
 The counsels labouring in his artful breast ;
 " Friends and confederates ! with attentive ear
 Receive my words, and credit what you hear.
 Late as I slumber'd in the shades of night,
 A dream divine appear'd before my sight ;
 Whose visionary form like Nestor came,
 The same in habit and in mien the same.
 The heavenly phantom hover'd o'er my head,
 ' And, dost thou sleep, Oh, Atreus' son ? ' (he said)
 ' Ill fits a chief who mighty nations guides,
 Directs in council, and in war presides,
 To whom its safety a whole people owes ;
 To waste long night in indolent repose.
 Monarch, awake ! 'tis Jove's command I bear,
 Thou and thy glory claim his heavenly care.
 In just array draw forth th' embattled train,
 And lead the Grecians to the dusty plain ;
 Ev'n now, O king ! 'tis given thee to destroy
 The lofty towers of wide-extended Troy.
 For now no more the gods with fate contend ;
 At Juno's suit the heavenly factions end.
 Destruction hangs o'er yon devoted wall,
 And nodding Ilium waits th' impending fall.
 This hear observant, and the gods obey !'
 The vision spoke, and past in air away.
 Now, valiant chiefs ! since Heaven itself alarms !
 Unite, and rouse the sons of Greece to arms.
 But first, with caution try what yet they dare,
 Worn with nine years of unsuccessful war !
 To move the troops to measure back the main,
 Be mine ; and your's the province to detain."
 He spoke, and sat ; when Nestor rising said,
 (Nestor, whom Pylos' sandy realms obey'd)
 " Princes of Greece, your faithful ears incline,
 Nor doubt the vision of the powers divine ;
 Sent by great Jove to him who rules the host,
 Forbid it, Heaven ! this warning should be lost !
 Then let us haste, obey the god's alarms,
 And join to rouse the sons of Greece to arms."
 Thus spoke the sage : the kings without delay
 Dissolve the council, and their chief obey :
 The sceptred rulers lead ; the following host
 Pour'd forth by thousands, darkens all the coast.
 As from some rocky cleft the shepherd sees
 Clustering in heaps on heaps the driving bees,
 Rolling, and blackening, swarms succeeding swarms,
 With deeper murmurs and more hoarse alarms ;
 Dusky they spread, a close embody'd crowd,
 And o'er the vale descends the living cloud.
 So, from the tents and ships, a lengthening train
 Spreads all the beach, and wide o'ershades the plain :
 Along the region runs a deafening sound ;
 Beneath their footsteps groans the trembling ground.
 Fame flies before, the messenger of Jove,
 And shining soars, and claps her wings above.
 Nine sacred heralds now, proclaiming loud
 The monarch's will, suspend the listening crowd.

Soon as the throngs in order rang'd appear,
 And fainter murmurs dy'd upon the ear,
 The king of kings his awful figure rais'd ;
 High in his hand the golden sceptre blaz'd :
 The golden sceptre, of celestial frame,
 By Vulcan form'd, from Jove to Hermes came :
 To Pelops he th' immortal gift resign'd ;
 Th' immortal gift great Pelops left behind,
 In Atreus' hand, which not with Atreus ends,
 To rich Thyestes next the prize descends :
 And now the mark of Agamemnon's reign,
 Subjects all Argos, and controls the main.

On this bright sceptre now the king reclin'd,
 And artful thus pronounc'd the speech design'd ;
 " Ye sons of Mars ! partake your leader's care,
 Heroes of Greece, and brothers of the war !
 Of partial Jove with justice I complain,
 And heavenly oracles believ'd in vain.
 A safe return was promis'd to our toils,
 Renown, triumphant, and enrich'd with spoils.
 Now shameful flight alone can save the host,
 Our blood, our treasure, and our glory lost.
 So Jove decrees, resistless lord of all !
 At whose command whole empires rise or fall :
 He shakes the feeble props of human trust,
 And towns and armies humbles to the dust.
 What shame to Greece a fruitless war to wage,
 Oh, lasting shame in every future age !
 Once great in arms, the common scorn we grow,
 Repuls'd and baffled by a feeble foe :
 So small their number, that if wars were ceas'd,
 And Greece triumphant held a general feast,
 All rank'd by tens, whole decads when they dine
 Must want a Trojan slave to pour the wine.
 But other forces have our hopes o'erthrown,
 And Troy prevails by armies not her own.
 Now nine long years of mighty Jove are run,
 Since first the labours of this war begun :
 Our cordage torn, decay'd our vessels lie,
 And scarce ensure the wretched power to fly.
 Haste then, for ever leave the Trojan wall !
 Our weeping wives, our tender children call :
 Love, duty, safety, summon us away,
 'Tis nature's voice, and nature we obey.
 Our smitt'd barks may yet transport us o'er,
 Safe and inglorious, to our native shore.
 Fly, Grecians, fly, your sails and oars employ,
 And dream no more of heaven-defended Troy."
 His deep design unknown, the hosts approve
 Atrides' speech. The mighty numbers move.
 So roll the billows to th' Icarian shore,
 From east and south when winds begin to roar,
 Burst their dark mansions in the clouds, and sweep
 The whitening surface of the ruffled deep,
 And as on corn when western gusts descend,
 Before the blast the lofty harvest bends :
 Thus o'er the field the moving host appears,
 With nodding plumes, and groves of waving spears
 The gathering murmur spreads, their trampling feet
 Beat the loose sands, and thicken to the fleet.
 With long-resounding cries they urge the train
 To fit the ships, and lanch into the main.
 They toil, they sweat, thick clouds of dust arise,
 The doubling clamours echo to the skies.
 Ev'n then the Greeks had left the hostile plain,
 And fate decreed the fall of Troy in vain ;
 But Jove's imperial queen their flight survey'd,
 And sighing, thus bespoke the blue-ey'd maid :
 " Shall then the Grecians fly ! O dire disgrace !
 And leave unpunish'd this perfidious race ?

Shall Troy, shall Priam, and th' adulterous spouse,
In peace enjoy the fruits of broken vows?
And bravest chiefs, in Helen's quarrel slain,
Lie unreveng'd on yon detested plain?
No: let my Greeks, unmov'd by vain alarms,
Once more resplendent shine in brazen arms.
Haste, goddess, haste! the flying host detain,
Nor let one sail be hoisted on the main."

Pallas obeys, and from Olympus' height
Swift to the ships precipitates her flight;
Ulysses, first in public cares, she found,
For prudent counsel like the gods renown'd;
Oppress'd with gen'rous grief the hero stood,
Nor drew his sable vessels to the flood.

"And is it thus, divine Laërtes' son!
Thus fly the Greeks" (the martial maid begun)
"Thus to their country bear their own disgrace,
And fame eternal leave to Priam's race?
Shall beauteous Helen still remain unfreed,
Still unreveng'd a thousand heroes bleed?
Haste, generous Ithacus! prevent the shame,
Recall your armies, and your chiefs reclaim.
Your own resistless eloquence employ,
And to the immortals trust the fall of Troy."

The voice divine confess'd the warlike maid,
Ulysses heard, nor uninspir'd obey'd:
Then meeting first Atrides, from his hand
Receiv'd th' imperial sceptre of command.
Thus grac'd, attention and respect to gain,
He runs, he flies, through all the Grecian train,
Each prince of name, or chief in arms approv'd,
He fir'd with praise, or with persuasion mov'd.
"Warriors, like you, with strength and wisdom
blest,

By brave examples should confirm the rest.
The monarch's will not yet reveal'd appears,
He tries our courage, but resents our fears:
Th' unwary Greeks his fury may provoke;
Not thus the king in secret council spoke.
Jove loves our chief, from Jove his honour springs,
Beware! for dreadful is the wrath of kings."

But if a clamorous vile plebeian rose,
Him with reproof he check'd, or tam'd with blows.
Be still, thou slave, and to thy betters yield;
"Unknown alike in council and in field!
Ye gods, what dastards would our host command,
Swept to the war, the lumber of a land!
Be silent, wretch, and think not here allow'd
That worst of tyrants, an usurping crowd:
To one sole monarch Jove commits the sway;
His are the laws, and him let all obey."

With words like these the troops Ulysses rul'd,
The loudest silence'd, and the fiercest cool'd.
Back to th' assembly roll'd the thronging train,
Desert the ships, and pour upon the plain.
Murmuring they move, as when old Ocean roars,
And heaves huge surges to the trembling shores:
The groaning banks are burst with bellowing
sound,

The rocks remurmur, and the deeps rebound.
At length the tumult sinks, the noises cease,
And a still silence lulls the camp to peace;
Thersites only clamour'd in the throng,
Loquacious, loud, and turbulent of tongue;
Aw'd by no shame, by no respects control'd,
In scandal busy, in reproaches bold;
With witty malice studious to defame:
Scorn all his joy, and laughter all his aim;
But chief he glory'd, with licentious style,
To lash the great, and monarchs to revile.

His figure such as might his soul proclaim;
One eye was blinking, and one leg was lame;
His mountain shoulders half his breast o'erspread,
Th' hairs brew'd his long misshapen head.
Spleen to mankind his envious heart possess'd,
And much he hated all, but most the best.
Ulysses or Achilles still his theme;
But royal scandal his delight supreme.
Long had he liv'd the scorn of every Greek,
Vext when he spoke, yet still they heard him speak.

Sharp was his voice, which, in the shrillest tone,
Thus with injurious taunts attack'd the throne:
"Amidst the glories of so bright a reign,
What moves the great Atrides to complain?
'Tis thine whate'er the warrior's breast inflames,
The golden spoil, and thine the lovely dames.
With all the wealth our wars and blood bestow,
Thy tents are crowded, and thy chests o'erflow,
Thus at full ease in heaps of riches roll'd,
What grieves the monarch? Is it thirst of gold?
Say, shall we march with our unconquer'd powers,
(The Greeks and I) to Ilion's hostile towers,
And bring the race of royal bastards here,
For Troy to ransom at a price too dear?
But safer plunder thy own host supplies;
Say would'st thou seize some valiant leader's prize?
Or, if thy heart to generous love be led,
Some captive fair, to bless thy kingly bed?
Whate'er our master craves, submit we must,
Plagued with his pride, or punish'd for his lust.
Oh women of Achaia! men no more!

Hence let us fly, and let him waste his store
In loves and pleasures on the Phrygian shore;
We may be wanted on some busy day,
When Hector comes: so great Achilles may:
From him he forc'd the prize we jointly gave,
From him, the fierce, the fearless, and the brave:
And durst he, as he ought, resent that wrong,
This mighty tyrant were no tyrant long."
Fierce from his seat at this Ulysses springs,
In generous vengeance of the king of kings:
With indignation sparkling in his eyes,
He views the wretch, and sternly thus replies:

"Peace, factious monster, born to vex the state,
With wrangling talents form'd for foul debate:
Curb that impetuous tongue, nor, rashly vain
And singly mad, asperse the sovereign reign.
Have we not known thee, slave of all our host,
The man who acts the least, unbraids the most?
Think not the Greeks to shameful flight to bring,
Nor let those lips profane the name of king.
For our return we trust the heavenly powers;
Be that their care; to fight like men be ours.
But grant the host with wealth the general load,
Except detraction, what hast thou bestow'd?
Suppose some hero should his spoils resign,
Art thou that hero, could those spoils be thine?
Gods! let me perish on this hateful shore,
And let these eyes behold my son no more,
If, on thy next offence, this hand forbear
To strip those arms thou ill deserv'st to wear,
Expel the council where our princes meet,
And send thee scourg'd and howling thro' the fleet."

He said, and cowering as the dastard bends,
The weighty sceptre on his back descends:
On the round bunch the bloody tumours rise;
The tears spring starting from his haggard eyes:
Trembling he sat, and, shrunk in abject fears,
From his wild visage wip'd the scalding tears.

While to his neighbours each express'd his thought !
 " Ye gods ! what wonders has Ulysses wrought !
 What fruits his conduct and his courage yield ;
 Great in the council, glorious in the field !
 Generous he rises in the crown's defence,
 To curb the factious tongue of insolence.
 Such just examples on offenders shown,
 Sedition silence, and assert the throne."

'Twas thus the general voice the hero prais'd,
 Who, rising high, th' imperial sceptre rais'd :
 The blue-ey'd Pallas, his celestial friend,
 (In form a herald) bade the crowds attend.
 Th' expecting crowds in still attention hung,
 To hear the wisdom of his heavenly tongue.
 Then deeply thoughtful, pausing ere he spoke,
 His silence thus the prudent hero broke :

" Unhappy monarch ! whom the Grecian race,
 With shame deserting, heap with vile disgrace.
 Not such at Argos was their generous vow,
 Once all their voice, but, ah ! forgotten now :
 Ne'er to return, was then the common cry,
 Till Troy's proud structures should in ashes lie.
 Behold them weeping for their native shore !
 What could their wives or helpless children more ?
 What heart but melts to leave the tender train,
 And, one short month, endure the wintery main ?
 Few leagues remov'd, we wish our peaceful seat,
 When the ship tosses, and the tempests beat :
 Then well may this long stay provoke their tears,
 The tedious length of nine revolving years.
 Not for their grief the Grecian host I blame ;
 But vanquish'd ! baffled ! oh, eternal shame !
 Expect the time to Troy's destruction given,
 And try the faith of Chalcas and of Heaven.
 What pass'd at Aulis, Greece can witness bear,
 And all who live to breathe this Phrygian air.
 Beside a fountain's sacred brink we rais'd
 Our verdant altars, and the victims blaz'd ; ('Twas there the plane-tree spreads its shades around)

The altars heav'd ; and from the crumbling ground
 A mighty dragon shot, of dire portent ;
 From Jove himself the dreadful sign was sent.
 Straight to the tree his sanguine spire he roll'd,
 And curl'd around in many a winding fold.
 The topmost branch a mother-bird possess ;
 Eight callow infants fill'd the mossy nest ;
 Herself the ninth ; the serpent, as he hung,
 Stretch'd his black jaws, and crash'd the crying
 young ;

While hovering near, with miserable moan,
 The drooping mother wail'd her children gone.
 The mother last, as round the nest she flew,
 Seiz'd by the beating wing, the monster slew :
 Nor long surviv'd ; to marble turn'd, he stands
 A lasting prodigy on Aulis' sands.
 Such was the will of Jove ; and hence we dare
 Trust in his omen, and support the war.
 For while around we gaze with wondering eyes,
 And trembling sought the powers with sacrifice,
 Full of his god, the reverend Chalcas cried,
 " Ye Grecian warriors ! lay your fears aside.
 This wonderous signal Jove himself displays
 Of long, long labours, but eternal praise.
 As many birds as by the snakes were slain,
 So many years the toils of Greece remain ;
 But wait the tenth, for Ilium's fall decreed :
 Thus spoke the prophet, thus the fates succeed.
 Obey, ye Grecians ! with submission wait,
 Nor let your flight avert the Trojan fate."

He said : the shores with loud applauses sound,
 The hollow ships each deafening about rebound.
 Then Nestor thus—" These vain debates forbear,
 Ye talk like children, not like heroes dare.
 Where now are all your high resolves at last ?
 Your leagues concluded, your engagements past
 Vow'd with libations and with victims then,
 Now vanish'd like their smoke : the faith of men !
 While useless words consume th' unactive hours,
 No wonder Troy so long resists our powers.
 Rise, great Atrides ! and with courage sway ;
 We march to war, if thou direct the way.
 But leave the few that dare resist thy laws,
 The mean deserters of the Grecian cause,
 To grudge the conquests mighty Jove prepares,
 And view with envy our successful wars.
 On that great day when first the martial train,
 Big with the fate of Ilium, plough'd the main,
 Jove on the right, a prosperous signal sent,
 And thunder rolling shook the firmament.
 Encourag'd hence, maintain the glorious strife,
 Till every soldier grasp a Phrygian wife,
 Till Helen's woes at full reveng'd appear,
 And Troy's proud matrons render tear for tear.
 Before that day if any Greek invite
 His country's troops to base inglorious flight ;
 Stand forth that Greek ! and hoist his sail to fly,
 And die the dastard first, who dreads to die.
 But now, O monarch ! all thy chiefs advise :
 Nor what they offer, thou thyself despise.
 Among those councils, let not mine be vain,
 In tribes and nations to divide thy train ;
 His separate troops let every leader call,
 Each strengthen each, and all encourage all.
 What chief, or soldier, of the numerous band,
 Or bravely fights, or ill obeys command,
 When thus distinct they war, shall soon be known
 And what the cause of Ilium not o'erthrown ;
 If fate resists, or if our arms are slow,
 If gods above prevent, or men below."

To him the king : " How much thy years exact
 In arts of council, and in speaking well ?
 O would the gods, in love to Greece, decree
 But ten such sages as they grant in thee ;
 Such wisdom soon should Priam's force destroy,
 And soon shall fall the haughty towers of Troy !
 But Jove forbids, who plunges those he hates
 In fierce contention and in vain debates.
 Now great Achilles from our aid withdraws,
 By me provok'd ; a captive maid the cause :
 If e'er as friends we join, the Trojan wall
 Must shake, and heavy will the vengeance fall :
 But now, ye warriors, take a short repast :
 And, well-refresh'd, to bloody conflict haste.
 His sharpen'd spear let every Grecian wield,
 And every Grecian fix his brazen shield ;
 Let all excite the fiery steeds of war,
 And all for combat fit the rattling car.
 This day, this dreadful day, let each contend ;
 No rest, no respite, till the shades descend ;
 Till darkness, or till death, shall cover all :
 Let the war bleed, and let the mighty fall !
 Till bath'd in sweat be every manly breast,
 With the huge shield each brawny arm deprest,
 Each aching nerve refuse the lance to throw,
 And each spent courser at the chariot blow.
 Who dares inglorious, in his ships to stay,
 Who dares to tremble on this signal day ;
 That wretch, too mean to fall by martial power,
 The birds shall mangle, and the dogs devour."

The monarch spoke; and straight a murmur rose,
 Loud as the surges when the tempest blows,
 That dash'd on broken rocks tumultuous roar,
 And foam and thunder on the stony shore.
 Straight to the tents the troops dispersing bend,
 The fires are kindled, and the smokes ascend;
 With hasty feast they sacrifice, and pray
 To avert the dangers of the doubtful day.
 A steer of five years' age, large limb'd, and fed,
 To Jove's high altars Agamemnon led:
 There bade the noblest of the Grecian peers;
 And Nestor first, as most advanc'd in years.
 Next came Idomeneus, and Tydeus' son,
 Ajax the less, and Ajax Telamon;
 Then wise Ulysses in his rank was plac'd;
 And Menelaus came unbid, the last.
 The chiefs surround the destin'd beast, and take
 The sacred offering of the salted cake.

When thus the king prefers his solemn prayer:
 "On thou! whose thunder rends the clouded air,
 Who in the Heaven has fix'd thy throne,
 Supreme of gods! unbounded and alone!
 Hear! and before the burning Sun descends,
 Before the Night her gloomy veil extends,
 Low in the dust be laid yon hostile spires,
 Be Priam's palace sunk in Grecian fires,
 In Hector's breast be plung'd this shining sword,
 And slaughter'd heroes groan around their lord!"

Thus pray'd the chief; his unavailing prayer
 Great Jove refus'd, and tost in empty air:
 The god averse, while yet the fumes arose,
 Prepar'd new toils, and doubled woes on woes.
 Their prayers perform'd, the chiefs the rite pursue,
 The barley sprinkled, and the victim slew,
 The limbs they sever from th' enclosing hide,
 The thighs, selected to the gods, divide.
 On these, in double cauls involv'd with art,
 The choicest morsels lie from every part.
 From the cleft wood the crackling flames aspire,
 While the fat victim feeds the sacred fire.
 The thighs thus sacrific'd, and entrails drest,
 Th' assistants part, transfix, and roast the rest;
 Then spread the tables, the repast prepare,
 Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.
 Soon as the rage of hunger was suppress'd,
 The generous Nestor thus the prince address'd:

"Now bid thy heralds sound the loud alarms,
 And call the squadrons sheath'd in brazen arms:
 Now seize th' occasion, now the troops survey,
 And lead to war when Heaven directs the way."

He said; the monarch issued his commands;
 Straight the loud heralds call the gathering bands.
 The chiefs enclose their king: the host divide,
 In tribes and nations rank'd on either side.
 High in the midst the blue-ey'd virgin flies;
 From rank to rank she darts her ardent eyes:
 The dreadful ægis, Jove's immortal shield,
 Blaz'd on her arm, and lighten'd all the field:
 Round the vast orb an hundred serpents roll'd,
 Form'd the bright fringe, and seem'd to burn in gold.
 With this each Grecian's manly breast she warms,
 Swells their bo'd hearts, and strings their nervous
 No more they sigh, inglorious, to return, [arms;
 But breathe revenge, and for the combat burn.

As on some mountain, through the lofty grove,
 The crackling flames ascend, and blaze above;
 The fires expanding as the winds arise,
 Shoot their long beams, and kindle half the skies:
 So from the polish'd arms, and brazen shields,
 A gleamy splendour flash'd along the fields.

Not less their number than th' embody'd cranes,
 Or milk-white swans in Asia's watery plains,
 That o'er the windings of Cæster's springs,
 Stretch their long necks, and clap their rustling
 Now tower aloft, and course in airy rounds; [wings;
 Now light with noise; with noise the field resounds.
 Thus numerous and confus'd, extending wide,
 The legions crowd Scamander's flowery side;
 With rushing troops the plains are cover'd o'er,
 And thundering footsteps shake the sounding shore.
 Along the river's level meads they stand,
 Thick as in spring the flowers adorn the land,
 Or leaves the trees; or thick as insects play,
 The wandering nation of a summer's day,
 That, drawn by milky steams, at evening hours,
 In gather'd swarms surround the rural bowers;
 From pail to pail with busy murmur run
 The gilded legions, glittering in the Sun.
 So throng'd, so close, the Grecian squadrons stood
 In radiant arms, and thirst for Trojan blood.
 Each leader now his scattered force conjoins
 In close array, and forms the deepening lines.
 Not with more ease, the skilful shepherd swain
 Collects his flocks from thousands on the plain.
 The king of kings, majestically tall,
 Towers o'er his armies, and outshines them all;
 Like some proud bull that round the pastures leads
 His subject-herds, the monarch of the meads.
 Great as the gods, th' exalted chief was seen,
 His strength like Neptune, and like Mars his mien,
 Jove o'er his eyes celestial glories spread,
 And dawning conquest play'd around his head.

Say, virgins, seated round the throne divine,
 All-knowing goddesses! immortal nine! [height,
 Since Earth's wide regions, Heaven's unmeasur'd
 And Hell's abyss, hide nothing from your sight,
 (We, wretched mortals! lost in doubts below,
 But guess by rumour, and but boast we know)
 Oh, say what heroes, fir'd by thirst of fame,
 Or urg'd by wrongs, to Troy's destruction came?
 To count them all, demands a thousand tongues,
 A throat of brass, and adamantine lungs.
 Daughters of Jove, assist! inspir'd by you
 The mighty labour dauntless I pursue:
 What crowded armies, from what climes they bring,
 Their names, their numbers, and their chiefs, I sing.

THE CATALOGUE OF THE SHIPS.

The hardy warriors whom Bœotia bred,
 Penelios, Leitus, Prothoënor led:
 With these Arcesilaus and Clonius stand,
 Equal in arms, and equal in command.
 These head the troops that rocky Aulis yields,
 And Etœon's hills, and Hyrie's watery fields,
 And Schœnos, Scholus, Græa near the main,
 And Mycalessia's ample piny plain.
 Those who on Peteon or Ilesion dwell,
 Or Harma where Apollo's prophet fell;
 Heleon and Hylê, which the springs o'erflow;
 And Medeon lofty, and Ocalea low;
 Or in the meads of Haliartus stray,
 Or Thepsis sacred to the god of day.
 Onchestus, Neptune's celebrated groves;
 Copæ, and Thisbè, fam'd for silver doves,
 For flocks Erythre, Glissa for the vine;
 Platea green, and Nysa the divine.
 And they whom Thebè's well-built walls enclose,
 Where Mydè, Eutresus, Coronè rose;
 And Arnè rich, with purple harvests crown'd;
 And Anthedon, Bœotia's utmost bound.

Full fifty ships they send, and each conveys
Twice sixty warriors through the foaming seas.

To these succeed Aspledon's martial train,
Who plough the spacious Orchomenian plain.
Two valiant brothers rule th' undaunted throng,
Iñlmen and Ascalaphus the strong :
Sons of Astyoche, the heavenly fair,
Whose virgin charms subdued the god of war
(In Actor's court as she retir'd to rest,
The strength of Mars the blushing maid compress).
Their troops in thirty sable vessels sweep,
With equal oars, the hoarse-resounding deep.

The Phocians next in forty barks repair,
Epistrophus and Schedius head the war.
From those rich regions where Cephius leads
His silver current through the flowery meads ;
From Panopœa, Chrysa the divine,
Where Anemoria's stately turrets shine,
Where Pytho, Daulia, Cyparissus stood,
And fair Lissa views the rising flood.
These, rang'd in order on the floating tide,
Close on the left, the bold Bœotians' side.

Fierce Ajax led the Locrian squadrons on,
Ajax the less, Oilæus' valiant son ;
Skill'd to direct the flying dart aright ;
Swift in pursuit, and active in the fight ;
Him, as their chief, the chosen troops attend,
Which Bessa, Thronus, and rich Cynos send :
Opus, Calliarus, and Scarphe's bands
And those who dwell where pleasing Augia stands,
And where Boagrius floats the lowly lands,
Or in fair Taphe's sylvan seats reside :
In forty vessels cut the liquid tide.
Eubœa next her martial sons prepares,
And sends the brave Abantes to the wars :
Breathing revenge, in arms they take their way
From Chalcis' walls, and strong Eretria ;
Th' Isteian fields for generous vines renown'd,
The fair Carystos, and the Styrian ground ;
Where Dioe from her towers o'erlooks the plain,
And high Cerinthus views the neighbouring main.
Down their broad shoulders falls a length of hair ;
Their hands dismiss not the long lance in air ;
But with protended spears in fighting fields,
Pierce the tough corselets and the brazen shields :
Twice twenty ships transport the warlike bands,
Which bold Elphenor, fierce in arms, commands.

Full fifty more from Athens stem the main,
Led by Mnestheus through the liquid plain (Athens the fair, where great Erectheus sway'd,
That ow'd his nature to the blue-ey'd maid,
But from the teeming furrow took his birth,
The mighty offspring of the foodful Earth.
Him Pallas plac'd amidst her wealthy fane,
Ador'd with sacrifice and oxen slain ;
Where, as the years revolve, her altars blaze,
And all the tribes resound the goddess' praise)
No chief like thee, Mnestheus ! Greece could yield,
To marshal armies in the dusty field,
Th' extended wings of battle to display,
Or close th' embody'd host in firm array.
Nestor alone, improv'd by length of days,
For martial conduct bore an equal praise.

With these appear the Salaminian bands,
Whom the gigantic Telamon commands ;
In twelve black ships to Troy they steer their course,
And with the great Athenians join their force.

Next move to war the generous Argive train,
From high Trozène, and Maseta's plain,
And fair Egina circled by the main :

Whom strong Tyriathès' lofty walls surround,
And Epidaur with viny harvests crown'd ;
And where fair Asinen and Hermion show
Their cliffs above, and ample bay below.
These by the brave Euryalus were led,
Great Sthenelus, and greater Diomed,
But chief Tydides bore the sovereign sway ;
In four-score barks they plough the watery way.

The proud Mycensè arms her martial powers,
Cleonè, Corinth, with imperial towers,
Fair Arathyrea, Ornia's fruitful plain,
And Egson, and Adrastus' ancient reign ;
And those who dwell along the sandy shore,
And where Pellenè yields her fleecy store,
Where Helicè and Hyperesia lie,
And Gonoëssa's spires salute the sky.
Great Agamœnon rules the numerous band,
A hundred vessels in long order stand,
And crowded nations wait his dread command.
High on the deck the king of men appears,
And his refulgent arms in triumph wears ;
Proud of his host, unrivall'd in his reign,
In silent pomp he moves along the main.

His brother follows, and to vengeance warms
The hardy Spartans exercis'd in arms ;
Phares and Brysia's valiant troops, and those Whom Lacedæmon's lofty hills enclose :
Or Messè's towers for silver doves renown'd,
Amyclæ, Laïa, Augia's happy ground,
And those whom Oetylos' low walls contain,
And Helos, on the margin of the main :
These, o'er the bending ocean, Helen's cause,
In sixty ships with Menelaus draws :
Eager and loud from man to man he flies,
Revenge and fury flaming in his eyes ;
While vainly fond, in fancy oft he hears
The fair one's grief, and sees her falling tears.

In ninety sail, from Pylos' sandy coast,
Nestor the sage conducts his chosen host ;
From Amphigenia's ever fruitful land ;
Where Epy high, and little Pteleon stand ;
Where bauteous Arenè her structures shows,
And Thyron's walls Alpheus' streams enclose :
And Dorion, fam'd for Thamyris' disgrace,
Superior once of all the tuneful race,
Till, vain of mortals empty praise, he strove
To match the seed of cloud-compelling Jove !
Too daring bard ! whose unsuccessful pride
Th' immortal Muses in their art defy'd.
Th' avenging Muses of the light of day
Depriv'd his eyes, and snatch'd his voice away ;
No more his heavenly voice was heard to sing,
His hand no more awak'd the silver string.

Where under high Cyllenè, crown'd with wood,
The shaded tomb of old Ægyptus stood ;
From Ripè, Stratie, Tegœa's bordering towns,
The Phenean fields, and Orchomenian downs,
Where the fat herds in plenteous pasture rove ;
And Stymphalus with her surrounding grove,
Parrhasia, on her snowy cliffs reclin'd,
And high Enispè shook by wintery wind,
And fair Mantinea's ever-pleasing site ;
In sixty sail th' Arcadian bands unite.
Bold Agapenor, glorious at their head,
(Ancaeus' son) the mighty squadron led.
Their ships supply'd by Agamœnon's care,
Through roaring seas the wondering warriors
bear ;

The first to battle on th' appointed plain,
But new to all the dangers of the main.

There, where fair Elis and Duprasium join;
Whom Hyrmin, here, and Myrsinus confine,
And bounded there where o'er the vallies rose
The Olenian rock; and where Alisium flows;
Beneath four chiefs (a numerous army) came:
The strength and glory of th' Epean name.
In separate squadrons these their train divide,
Each leads ten vessels through the yielding tide,
One was Amphimachus, and Thalphius one
(Eurytus' this, and that Teátus' son);
Diores sprung from Amarynceus' line;
And great Polyxenus, of force divine.

But those who view fair Elis o'er the seas
From the blest islands of th' Echinades,
In forty vessels under Meges move,
Begot by Phylens the belov'd of Jove.
To strong Dulichium from his sire he fled,
And thence to Troy his hardy warriors led.

Ulysses followed through the watery road,
A chief, in wisdom equal to a god.
With those who Cephalenia's isle enclos'd,
Or till their fields along the coast oppos'd;
Or where fair Ithaca o'erlooks the floods,
Where high Neritos shakes his waving woods,
Where Ægilipa's ragged sides are seen,
Groeyia rocky, and Zacynthus green.
These in twelve galleys with vermilion prores,
Beneath his conduct sought the Phrygian shores.

Thos came next, Andræmon's valiant son,
From Pleuron's walls, and chalky Calydon,
And rough Pylenè, and th' Olenian steep,
And Chalcis beaten by the rolling deep.
He led the warriors from th' Ætolian shore,
For now the sons of Oeneus were no more!
The glories of the mighty race were fled!
Oeneus himself, and Meleager dead!
To Thos' care now trust the martial train,
His forty vessels follow through the main.

Next eighty barks the Cretan king commands,
Of Gnosos, Lyctus, and Gortyna's bands,
And those who dwell where Rhytion's domes arise,
Or white Lycastus glitters to the skies,
Or where by Phosius silver Jordan runs;
Crete's hundred cities pour forth all her sons.
These march'd, Idomeneus, beneath thy care,
And Merion, dreadful as the god of war.

Tepolemus, the son of Hercules,
Led nine swift vessels through the foamy seas;
From Rhodes with everlasting sunshine bright,
Jalyasus, Lindus, and Camirus white.
His captive mother fierce Alcides bore,
From Ephyr's walls, and Selle's winding shore,
Where mighty towns in ruins spread the plain,
And saw their blooming warriors early slain.
The hero, when to many years he grew,
Alcides' uncle, old Licymnius, slew;
For this, constrain'd to quit his native place,
And shun the vengeance of the Herculean race,
A feet he built, and with a numerous train
Of willing exiles, wander'd o'er the main;
Where, many seas and many sufferings past,
On happy Rhodes the chief arriv'd at last:
There in three tribes divides his native band,
And rules them peaceful in a foreign land;
Increas'd and prosper'd in their new abodes,
By mighty Jove, the sire of men and gods;
With joy they saw the growing empire rise,
And showers of wealth descending from the skies.

Three ships with Nireus sought the Trojan shore,
Nireus, whom Aglaè to Charopus bore,

Nireus, in faultless shape and blooming grace,
The loveliest youth of all the Grecian race,
Pelides only match'd his early charms;
But few his troops, and small his strength in arms.

Next thirty galleys cleave the liquid plain,
Of those Calydnæ's sea-girt isles contain;
With them the youth of Nysyrus repair,
Causus the strong, and Carpathus the fair;
Cos, where Euryppylus possess the sway,
Till great Alcides made the realms obey:
These Antiphus and bold Phidippus bring,
Sprung from the god by Thessalus the king.

Now, Muse, recount Pelasgic Argos' powers,
From Aljos, Alopè, and Trechin's towers;
From Phthia's spacious vales; and Hella, blest
With female beauty far beyond the rest.
Full fifty ships beneath Achilles' care,
Th' Achæians, Myrmidons, Hellenians bear;
Thessalians all, though various in their name;
The same their nation, and their chief the same.
But now, inglorious, stretch'd along the shore,
They hear the brazen voice of war no more;
No more the foe they face in dire array;
Close in his fleet the angry leader lay;
Since fair Briseis from his arms was torn,
The noblest spoil from sack'd Lyrnessus borne,
Then, when the chief the Theban walls o'erthrew,
And the bold sons of great Eneas slew.
There mourn'd Achilles, plung'd in depth of care,
But soon to rise in slaughter, blood, and war.

To these the youth of Phylacè succeed,
Itona, famous for her fleecy breed,
And grassy Pteleon deck'd with cheerful greens,
The bowers of Ceres, and the sylvan scenes,
Sweet Pyrrhasus, with blooming flowrets crown'd,
And Antron's watery dens, and cavern'd ground.
These own'd as chief Protesilæus the brave,
Who now lay silent in the gloomy grave:
The first who boldly touch'd the Trojan shore,
And dy'd a Phrygian lance with Grecian gore;
There lies, far distant from his native plain;
Unfinish'd, his proud palaces remain,
And his sad consort beats her breast in vain.
His troops in forty ships Podarces led,
Iphiclus' son, and brother to the dead;
Nor he unworthy to command the host;
Yet still they mourn'd their ancient leader lost.

The men who Glaphrya's fair toil partake,
Where hills encircle Bœbe's lowly lake,
Where Phære hears the neighbouring waters fall,
Or proud Iölcus lifts her airy wall,
In ten black ships embark'd for Iliou's shore,
With bold Eumylus, whom Alcestè bore:
All Pelias' race Alcestè far outshin'd,
The grace and glory of the beauteous kind.

The troops Methonè or Thaumachia yields,
Olizon's rocks, or Melibœa's fields,
With Philoctetes sail'd, whose matchless art,
From the tough bow directs the feather'd dart.
Seven were his ships; each vessel fifty row,
Skill'd in his science of the dart and bow.
But he lay raging on the Lemnian ground,
A poisonous Hydra gave the burning wound;
There groan'd the chief in agonizing pain,
Whom Greece at length shall wish, nor wish in vain.

His forces Medeon led from Lemnos' shore,
Oileus' son, whom beauteous Rhena bore.

Th' Æchalian race, in those high towers contain'd,
Where once Eurytus in proud triumph reign'd,

Or where her humbler turrets Tricca rears,
Or where Ithomè, rough with rocks, appears;
In thirty sail the sparkling waves divide,
Which Podalirius and Machaon guide.
To these his skill their parent-god¹ imparts,
Divine professors of the healin' arts.

The bold Ormenian and Asterian bands
In forty barks Eurypylus commands,
Where Titan hides his hoary head in snow,
And where Hyperia's silver fountains flow.
Thy troops, Argissa, Polypetes leads,
And Eleon, shelter'd by Olympus' shades,
Gyronè's warriors; and where Orthè lies,
And Oleosson's chalky cliffs arise.
Sprung from Pirithous of immortal race,
The fruit of fair Hippodamè's embrace,
(That day when, hurl'd from Pelion's cloudy head,
To distant dens the shaggy Centaurus fled)
With Polypetes join'd in equal sway
Leontes leads, and forty ships obey.

In twenty sail the bold Perrhæbians came
From Cyphus, Guneus was their leader's name.
With these the Enians join'd, and those who freeze
Where cold Dodona lifts her holy trees;
Or where the pleasing Titarsius glides,
And into Peneus rolls his easy tides;
Yet o'er the silver surface pure they flow,
The sacred stream unmix'd with streams below,
Sacred and awful! From the dark abodes
Styx pours them forth, the dreadful oath of gods!

Last under Prothous the Magnesian stood,
Prothous the swift, of old Tenthredon's blood;
Who dwell where Pelion, crown'd with piny boughs,
Obscures the glade, and nods his shaggy brows;
Or where through flowery Tempè Peneus stray'd,
(The region stretch'd beneath his mighty shade)
In forty sable barks they stemm'd the main;
Such were the chiefs, and such the Grecian train.

Say next, O Muse! of all Achaia breeds,
Who bravest fought, or rein'd the noblest steeds?
Eumeleus' mares were foremost in the chase,
As eagles fleet, and of Phuretian race:
Bred where Pieria's fruitful fountains flow,
And train'd by him who bears the silver bow.
Fierce in the fight their nostrils breathe a flame,
Their height, their colour, and their age the same;
O'er fields of death they whirl the rapid car,
And break the ranks, and thunder through the war.
Ajax in arms the first renown acquir'd,
While stern Achilles in his wrath retir'd
(His was the strength that mortal might exceeds,
And his, th' unrival'd race of heavenly steeds).
But Thetis' son now shine in arms no more;
His troops, neglected on the sandy shore,
In empty air their sportive javelins throw,
Or whirl the disk, or bend an idle bow:
Unstain'd with blood his cover'd chariots stand;
Th' immortal coursers graze along the strand;
But the brave chiefs th' inglorious life deplor'd,
And wandering o'er the camp, requir'd their lord.

Now, like a deluge, coming all around,
The shining armies swept along the ground:
Swift as a flood of fire, when storms arise,
Floats the wide field, and blazes to the skies.
Earth groan'd beneath them; as when angry Jove
Hurts down the forky lightning from above,
On Arimè when he the thunder throws,
And fires Typhæus with redoubled blows,

¹ Esculapius.

Where Typhon, prest beneath the burning load,
Still feels the fury of th' avenging God.

But various Iris, Jove's commands to bear,
Speeds on the wings of winds through liquid air;
In Priam's porch the Trojan chiefs she found,
The old consulting, and the youths around.
Polites' shape, the monarch's son, she chose,
Who from Æetes' tomb observ'd the foes,
High on the mound; from whence in prospect lay
The fields, the tents, the navy, and the bay.
In this dissembled form, she hastes to bring
Th' unwelcome message to the Phrygian king:

"Cease to consult, the time for action calls,
War, horrid war, approaches to your walls!
Assembled armies oft have I beheld;
But ne'er till now such numbers charg'd the field,
Thick as autumnal leaves or driving sand,
The moving squadrons blacken all the strand.
Thou, godlike Hector! all thy force employ,
Assemble all th' united bands of Troy;
In just array let every leader call

The foreign troops: this day demands them all.
The voice divine the mighty chief alarms;
The council breaks, the warriors rush to arms.
The gates unfolding pour forth all their train,
Nations on nations fill the dusky plain. [ground;
Men, steeds, and chariots, shake the trembling
The tumult thickens, and the skies resound.

Amidst the plain in sight of Ilion stands
A rising mount, the work of human hands;
(This for Myrinnè's tomb th' immortals know,
Though call'd Batièa in the world below)
Beneath their chiefs in martial order here,
Th' auxiliary troops and Trojan hosts appear.

The godlike Hector, high above the rest,
Shakes his huge spear, and nods his plummy crest:
In throngs around his native bands repair,
And groves of lances glitter in the air.

Divine Æneas brings the Dardan race,
Anchises' son by Venus' stol'n embrace,
Born in the shades of Ida's secret grove,
(A mortal mixing with the queen of love):
Archilochus and Acama divide
The warrior's toils and combat by his side.

Who fair Zeleia's wealthy valleys till,
Fast by the foot of Ida's sacred hill,
Or drink, Ægeus, of thy sable flood,
Were led by Pandarus, of royal blood;
To whom his art Apollo deign'd to show,
Grac'd with the presents of his shafts and bow.

From rich Apæsus' and Adrestia's towers,
High Tereë's summits, and Pityea's bowers;
From these the congregated troops obey
Young Amphius' and Adrastus' equal sway:
Old Mecrops' sons; whom, skill'd in fates to come,
The sire forewarn'd, and prophesy'd their doom:
Fate urg'd them on! the sire forewarn'd in vain,
They rush'd to war, and perish'd on the plain.

From Practius' stream, Percote's pasture lands,
And Sestos and Abydos' neighbouring strands,
From great Arisba's walls and Selle's coast,
Asius Hyrtacides conducts his host:
High on his car he shakes the flowing reins,
His fiery coursers thunder o'er the plains.

The fierce Pelasgi next, in war renown'd,
March from Larissa's ever-fertile ground:
In equal arms their brother leaders shine
Hippothous bold, and Pyleus the divine.

Next Acumus and Pyrus lead their hosts,
In dread array, from Thracia's wintery coasts;

Round the bleak realms where Hellespontus roars,
And Boreas beats the boarse-resounding shores.

With great Euphemus the Ciconians move,
Sprung from Tronzonian Ceus, lov'd by Jove.

Pyrrachus the Pæonian troops attend,
Skill'd in the fight, their crooked bows to bend:
From Axius' ample bed he leads them on,
Axius, that laves the distant Amydon;
Axius, that swells with all his neighbouring rills,
And wide around the floating region fills.

The Paphlagonians Pylæmenes rules,
Where rich Henetia breeds her savage mules,
Where Erythinus' rising cliffs are seen,
Tny groves of box, Cyturus! ever green;
And where Ægyalus and Cromna lie,
And lofty Sesamus invades the sky:
And where Parthenius, roll'd through banks of
Reflects her bordering palaces and bowers. [flowers,
Here march'd in arms the Halizonian band,
Whom Odius and Epistrophus command,
From those far regions where the Sun retires
The ripening silver in Alybean mines.

There mighty Chromis led the Mysian train,
And augur Eunomus, inspir'd in vain;
For stern Achilles lopt his sacred head,
Roll'd down Scamander with the vulgar dead.

Phorcis and brave Ascanius here unite
The Ascanian Phrygians, eager for the fight.

Of those who round Mæonia's realms reside,
Or whom the vales in shades of Timolus hide,
Mestles and Antiphus the charge partake;
Born on the banks of Gyges' silent lake.
There, from the fields where wild Mæander flows,
High Mycalè, and Latmos' shady brows,
And proud Miletos, came the Carian throngs,
With mingled clannours, and with barbarous tongues.

Amphimachus and Naustes guide the train,
Naustes the bold, Amphimachus the vain,
Who, trick'd with gold, and glittering on his car,
Rode like a woman to the field of war,
Fool that he was; by fierce Achilles slain,
The river swept him to the briny main:
There whelm'd with waves the gaudy warrior lies;
The valiant victor seiz'd the golden prize.

The forces last in fair array succeed,
Which blameless Glaucus and Sarpedon lead;
The warlike bands that distant Lycia yields,
Where gulphy Xanthus foams along the fields.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK III.

ARGUMENT.

THE DUEL OF MENELAUS AND PARIS.

THE Armies being ready to engage, a single combat is agreed upon between Menelaus and Paris (by the intervention of Hector) for the determination of the war. Iris is sent to call Helena to behold the fight. She leads her to the walls of Troy, where Priam sat with his counsellors, observing the Grecian leaders on the plain below, to whom Helen gives an account of the chief of them. The kings on either part take the solemn oath for the conditions of the combat. The dual ensues: wherein Paris being overcome, he is snatched away in a cloud by Venus, and transported to his apartment. She then calls Helena from the walls, and brings the lovers together. Agamemnon, on the part of the Grecians, demands the restoration of Helen, and the performance of the articles.

The three and twentieth day still continues throughout this book. The scene is sometimes in the fields before Troy, and sometimes in Troy, itself.

Thus by their leader's care each martial band
Moves into ranks, and stretches o'er the land.
With shouts the Trojans rushing from afar,
Proclaim'd their motions, and provok'd the war;
So when inclement winter vex the plain
With piercing frosts, or thick-descending rain,
To warmer seas, the cranes embody'd fly,
With noise, and order, through the mid-way
sky;

To pigmy nations wounds and death they bring,
And all the war descends upon the wing.
But silent, breathing rage, resolv'd and skill'd
By mutual aids to fix a doubtful field,
Swift march the Greeks: the rapid dust around
Dark'ning arises from the labour'd ground.
Thus from his flaggy wings when Notus sheds
A night of vapours round the mountain-heads,
Swift gliding mists the dusky fields invade,
To thieves more grateful than the midnight shade;
While scarce the swains their feeding flocks survey,
Lost and confus'd amidst the thicken'd day:
So, wrapt in gathering dust, the Grecian train,
A moving cloud, swept on, and hid the plain.

Now front to front the hostile armies stand,
Eager of fight, and only wait command:
When, to the van, before the sons of fame
Whom Troy sent forth, the beauteous Paris came,
In form a god! the panther's speckled hide
Flow'd o'er his armour with an easy pride,
His bended bow across his shoulders hung,
His sword beside him negligently hung,
Two pointed spears he shook with gallant grace,
And dar'd the bravest of the Grecian race.

As thus, with glorious air and proud disdain,
He boldly stalk'd, the foremost on the plain,
Him Menelaus, lov'd of Mars, espies,
With heart elated, and with joyful eyes:
So joys a lion, if the branching deer,
Or mountain goat, his bulky prize, appear;
Eager he seizes and devours the slain,
Prest by bold youths and baying dogs in vain.
Thus fond of vengeance, with a furious bound,
In clanging arms he leaps upon the ground
From his high chariot: him, approaching near,
The beauteous champion views with marks of fear;
Smit with a conscious sense, retires behind,
And shuns the fate he well deserv'd to find.
As when some shepherd, from the rustling trees
Shot forth to view, a scaly serpent sees;
Trembling and pale, he starts with wild affright,
And all confus'd precipitates his flight:
So from the king the shining warrior flies,
And plung'd amid the thickest Trojans lies.
As god-like Hector sees the prince retreat,
He thus upbraids him with a generous heat:

" Unhappy Paris! but to women brave!
 So fairly form'd, and only to deceive!
 Oh, hadst thou died when first thou saw'st the light,
 Or died at least before thy nuptial rite!
 A better fate than vainly thus to boast,
 And fly, and the scandal of the Trojan host,
 Gods! how the scornful Greeks exult to see
 Their fears of danger undeciv'd in thee!
 Thy figure promis'd with a martial air,
 But ill thy soul supplies a form so fair.
 In former days, in all thy gallant pride
 When thy tall ships triumphant stemm'd the tide,
 When Greece beheld thy painted canvass flow,
 And crowds stood wondering at the passing show;
 Say, was it thus, with such a baffled mien,
 You met th' approaches of the Spartan queen,
 Thus from her realm convey'd the beauteous prize,
 And both her warlike lords' outshin'd in Helen's eyes?
 This deed, thy foes' delight, thy own disgrace,
 Thy father's grief, and ruin of thy race;
 This deed recalls thee to the proffer'd fight;
 Or hast thou injur'd whom thou dar'st not right?
 Soon to thy cost the field would make thee know
 Thou keep'st the consort of a braver foe.
 Thy graceful form instilling soft desire,
 Thy curling tresses, and thy silver lyre,
 Beauty and youth; in vain to these you trust,
 When youth and beauty shall be laid in dust:
 Troy yet may wake, and one avenging blow
 Crush the dire author of his country's woe."

His silence here, with blushes, Paris breaks:
 " 'Tis just, my brother, what your anger speaks;
 But who like thee can boast a soul sedate,
 So firmly proof to all the shocks of fate?
 Thy force, like steel, a temper'd hardness shows,
 Still edg'd to wound, and still untrif'd with blows.
 Like steel, uplifted by some strenuous swain,
 With falling woods to strow the wasted plain:
 Thy gifts I praise; nor thou despise the charms
 With which a lover golden Venus arms;
 Soft moving speech, and pleasing outward show,
 No wish can gain them, but the gods bestow.
 Yet, would'st thou have the proffer'd combat stand,
 The Greeks and Trojans seat on either hand;
 Then let a mid-way space our hosts divide,
 And on that stage of war the cause be try'd:
 By Paris there the Spartan king be fought,
 For beauteous Helen and the wealth she brought:
 And who his rival can in arms subdue,
 His be the fair, and his the treasure too.
 Thus with a lasting league your toils may cease,
 And Troy possess her fertile fields in peace;
 Thus may the Greeks review their native shore,
 Much fam'd for generous steeds, for beauty more."
 He said. The challenge Hector heard with joy,
 Then with his spear restrain'd the youth of Troy,
 Held by the midst, athwart; and near the foe
 Advanc'd with steps majestically slow:
 While round his dauntless head the Grecians pour
 Their stones and arrows in a mingled shower.
 Then thus the monarch great Atreides cry'd;
 " Forbear, ye warriors! lay the darts aside:
 A parley Hector asks, a message bears,
 We know him by the various plume he wears."
 Aw'd by his high command the Greeks attend,
 The tumult silence, and the fight suspend.

While from the centre Hector rolls his eyes
 On either host, and thus to both applies:

" Hear, all ye Trojans, all ye Grecian bands!
 What Paris, author of the war, demands,
 Your shining swords within the sheath restrains,
 And pitch your lances in the yielding plain.
 Here in the midst, in either army's sight,
 He dares the Spartan king to single fight;
 And wills, that Helen and the ravish'd spoil
 That caus'd the contest, shall reward the toil.
 Let these the brave triumphant victor grace,
 And differing nations part in leagues of peace."
 He spoke: in still suspense on either side

Each army stood: the Spartan chief reply'd:
 " Me too, ye warriors, hear, whose fatal right
 A world engages in the toils of fight.
 To me the labour of the field resign;
 Me Paris injur'd; all the war be mine.
 Fall that he must, beneath his rival's arms;
 And live the rest, secure of future harm.
 Two lambs, devoted by your country's rite,
 To Earth a sable, to the Sun a white,
 Prepare, ye Trojans! while a third we bring
 Select to Jove, th' inviolable king.
 Let reverend Priam in the truce engage,
 And add the sanction of considerate age;
 His sons are faithless, headlong in debate,
 And youth itself an empty wavering state:
 Cool age advances venerably wise,
 Turns on all hands its deep-discerning eyes;
 Sees what befall, and what may yet befall,
 Concludes from both, and best provides for all."
 The nations hear, with rising hopes possess,
 And peaceful prospects dawn in every breast.

Within the lines they drew their steeds around,
 And from their chariots issued on the ground;
 Next all, unbuckling the rich mail they wore,
 Lay'd their bright arms along the sable shore.
 On either side the meeting hosts are seen,
 With lances fix'd, and close the space between.
 Two heralds now, dispatch'd to Troy, invite
 The Phrygian monarch to the peaceful rite:
 Talthybius hastens to the fleet, to bring
 The lamb for Jove, th' inviolable king.

Meantime, to beauteous Helen, from the skies
 The various goddess of the rain-bow flies
 (Like fair Laodice in form and face
 The loveliest nymph of Priam's royal race).
 Her in the palace, at her loom she found;
 The golden web her own sad story crown'd.
 The Trojan wars she weav'd (herself the prize)
 And the dire triumph of her fatal eyes.

To whom the goddess of the painted bow;
 " Approach and view the wondrous scenes below!
 Each hardy Greek, and valiant Trojan knight,
 So dreadful late, and furious for the fight,
 Now rest their spears, or lean upon their shields;
 Ceas'd is the war, and silent all the fields.
 Paris alone and Sparta's king advance,
 In single fight to toss the beamy lance;
 Each met in arms, the fate of combat tries,
 Thy love the motive, and thy charms the prize."
 This said, the many-colour'd maid inspires

Her husband's love, and wakes her former fires;
 Her country, parents, all that once were dear,
 Rush to her thoughts, and force a tender tear.
 O'er her fair face a snowy veil she threw,
 And, softly sighing, from the loom withdrew;
 Her handmaids Clymenè and Æthra wait
 Her silent footsteps to the Scæan gate.

There sat the seniors of the Trojan race.
 (Old Priam's chiefs, and most in Priam's grace)

The king the first ; Thymotes at his side ;
Lampos and Clytius, long in council try'd ;
Panthus, and Hicetaon, once the strong ;
And next, the wisest of the reverend throng,
Antenor grave, and sage Ucalegon,
Lean'd on the walls, and bask'd before the Sun-
Chiefs, who no more in bloody fights engage,
But wise through time, and narrative with age,
In summer-days like grasshoppers rejoice,
A bloodless race, that send a feeble voice.
These, when the Spartan queen approach'd the
In secret own'd resistless beauty's power : [tower,
They cried, " No wonder such celestial charms
For nine long years have set the world in arms ;
What winking graces ! what majestic mien !
She moves a goddess, and she looks a queen !
Yet hence, oh Heaven ! convey that fatal fate,
And from destruction save the Trojan race."

The good old Priam welcom'd her, and cried,
" Approach, my child, and grace thy father's side.
See on the plain thy Grecian spouse appears,
The friends and kindred of thy former years.
No crime of thine our present sufferings draws,
Not thou, but Heaven's disposing will, the cause ;
The gods these armies and this force employ,
The hostile gods conspire the fate of Troy.
But lift thy eyes, and say, what Greek is he (Far as from hence these aged orbs can see)
Around whose brow such martial graces shine,
So tall, so awful, and almost divine !
Though some of larger stature tread the green,
None match his grandeur and exalted mien :
He seems a monarch, and his country's pride."
Thus ceas'd the king ; and thus the fair replied :

" Before thy presence, father, I appear
With conscious shame and reverential fear.
Ah ! had I died, ere to these walls I fled,
False to my country and my nuptial bed ;
My brothers, friends, and daughter left behind,
False to them all, to Paris only kind ?
For this I mourn, till grief or dire disease Shall waste the form, whose crime it was to please.

The king of kings, Atrides, you survey,
Great in the war, and great in arts of sway :
My brother once, before my days of shame ;
And oh ! that still he bore a brother's name !"

With wonder Priam view'd the god-like man,
Extoll'd the happy prince, and thus began :
" O blest Atrides ! born to prosperous fate,
Successful monarch of a mighty state !
How vast thy empire ! Of yon matchless train
What numbers lost, what numbers yet remain ?
In Phrygia once were gallant armies known,
In ancient time, when Otrivus fill'd the throne,
When godlike Mygdon led their troops of horse,
And I, to join them, rais'd the Trojan force :
Against the manlike Amazons we stood,
And Sangar's stream ran purple with their blood.
But far inferior those, in martial grace
And strength of numbers, to this Grecian race."

This said, once more he view'd the warrior-
train :

" What's he whose arms lie scatter'd on the plain ?
Broad is his breast, his shoulders larger spread,
Though great Atrides overtops his head.
Nor yet appear his care and conduct small ;
From rank to rank he moves, and orders all.
The stately ram thus measures o'er the ground,
And, master of the flock, surveys them round."

Then Helen thus : " Whom your discerning eyes
Have singled out, is Ithacus the wise :
A barren island boasts his glorious birth :
His fame for wisdom fills the spacious Earth."

Antenor took the word, and thus began :
" Myself, O king ! have seen that wond'rous man :
When, trusting Jove and hospitable laws,
To Troy he came, to plead the Grecian cause ;
(Great Menelaus urg'd the same request)
My house was honour'd with each royal guest :
I knew their persons, and admir'd their parts,
Both brave in arms, and both approv'd in arts.
Erect, the Spartan most engag'd our view ;
Ulysses seated greater reverence drew.
When Atreus' son harangu'd the listening train,
Just was his sense, and his expression plain,
His words succinct, yet full, without a fault ;
He spoke no more than just the thing he ought.
But when Ulysses rose, in thought profound,
His modest eyes he fixt upon the ground,
As one unskill'd or dumb, he seem'd to stand,
Nor rais'd his head, nor stretch his scepter'd hand ;
But when he speaks, what elocution flows !
Soft as the fleeces of descending snows,
The copious accents fall with easy art ;
Melting they fall, and sink into the heart !
Wondering we hear, and fix'd in deep surprize ;
Our ears refute the censure of our eyes."

The king then ask'd (as yet the camp he view'd)
" What chief is that, with giant strength endued ;
Whose brawny shoulders, and whose swelling chest,
And lofty stature, far exceed the rest ?"
" Ajax the great," the beauteous queen replied ;
" Himself a host : the Grecian strength and pride.
See ! bold Idomeneus superior towers
Amidst you circle of his Cretan powers,
Great as a god ! I saw him once before,
With Menelaus, on the Spartan shore.
The rest I know, and could in order name ;
All valiant chiefs, and men of mighty fame.
Yet two are wanting of the numerous train,
Whom long my eyes have sought, but sought in vain,

Castor and Pollux, first in martial force,
One bold on foot, and one renown'd for horse.
My brothers these ; the same our native shore,
One house contain'd us, as one mother bore.
Perhaps the chiefs, from warlike toils at ease,
For distant Troy refus'd to sail the seas :
Perhaps their swords some nobler quarrel draws,
Asham'd to combat in their sister's cause."

So spoke the fair, nor knew her brothers' doom,
Wrapt in the cold embraces of the tomb ;
Adorn'd with honours in their native shore.
Silent they slept, and heard of wars no more.

Meantime the heralds, through the crowded town,
Bring the rich wine and destin'd victims down,
Idæus' arms the golden goblets prest,
Who thus the venerable king address :
" Arise, O father of the Trojan state !
The nations call, thy joyful people wait,
To seal the truce, and end the dire debate.
Paris thy son, and Sparta's king, advance ;
In measur'd lists to toss the weighty lance ;
And who his rival shall its arms subdue
His be the dame, and his the treasure too.
Thus with the lasting league our toils may cease,
And Troy possess her fertile fields in peace ;
So shall the Greeks review their native shore,
Much fam'd for generous steeds, for beauty more."

With grief he heard, and bade the chiefs prepare
To join his milk-white coursers to the car:
He mounts the seat, Antenor at his side;
The gentle steeds through Scæa's gates they guide:
Next from the car descending on the plain,
Amid the Grecian host and Trojan train
Slow they proceed: the sage Ulysses then
Arose, and with him rose the king of men.
On either side a sacred herald stands,
The wine they mix, and on each monarch's hands
Pour the full urn; then draws the Grecian lord
His cutlase, sheath'd beside his ponderous sword;
From the sign'd victims crops the curling hair,
The heralds part it, and the princes share;
Then loudly thus before th' attentive bands
He calls the gods, and spreads his lifted hands:

"O first and greatest power! whom all obey,
Who high on Ida's holy mountain sway,
Æternal Jove! and you bright orb that roll
From east to west, and view from pole to pole!
Thou mother Earth! and all ye living floods!
Infernal furies and Tartarian gods,
Who rule the dead, and horrid woes prepare
For perjurd kings, and all who falsely swear!
Hear, and be witness. If, by Paris slain,
Great Menelaus press the fatal plain;
The dame and treasures let the Trojan keep,
And Greece returning plough the watery deep.
If by my brother's lance the Trojan bleed;
Be his the wealth and beauteous dame decreed:
Th' appointed fine let Iliou justly pay,
And every age record the signal day.
Thus if the Phrygians shall refuse to yield,
Arms must revenge, and Mars decide the field."

With that the chief the tender victims slew,
And in the dust their bleeding bodies threw.
The vital spirit issued at the wound,
And left the members quivering on the ground.
From the same urn they drink the mingled wine,
And add libations to the powers divine.
While thus their prayers united mount the sky;
"Hear, mighty Jove! and hear, ye gods on high!
And may their blood, who first the league con-

found,
Shed like this wine, distain the thirsty ground;
May all their consorts serve promiscuous lust,
And all their race be scatter'd as the dust!"
Thus either host their imprecations join'd,
Which Jove refus'd, and mingled with the wind.

The rites now finish'd, reverend Priam rose,
And thus express'd a heart o'ercharg'd with woes:
"Ye Greeks and Trojans, let the chiefs engage,
But spare the weakness of my feeble age:
In yonder walls that object let me shun,
Nor view the danger of so dear a son.
Whose arms shall conquer, and what prince shall fall,

Heaven only knows, for Heaven disposes all."

This said, the hoary king no longer stay'd,
But on his car the slaughter'd victims laid;
Then seiz'd the reins his gentle steeds to guide,
And drove to Troy, Antenor at his side.

Bold Hector and Ulysses now dispose
The lists of combat, and the ground enclose:
Next to decide by sacred lots prepare,
Who first shall lanch his pointed spear in air.
The people pray with elevated hands, [hands:
And words like these are heard through all the "Immortal Jove, high Heaven's superiour lord,
On lofty Ida's holy mount ador'd!

Whoe'er involv'd us in this dire debate,
Oh give that author of the war to fate
And shades eternal! let division cease,
And joyful nations join in leagues of peace."

With eyes averted, Hector hastes to turn
The lots of fight, and shakes the brazen urn.
Then, Paris, thine leap'd forth; by fatal chance
Ordain'd the first to whirl the weighty lance.
Both armies sat the combat to survey,
Beside each chief his azure armour lay,
And round the lists the generous coursers neigh.
The beauteous warrior now arrays for fight,
In gilded arms magnificently bright:
The purple cushions clasp his thighs around,
With flowers adorn'd, with silver buckles bound:
Lycaon's corslet his fair body drest,
Brac'd in, and fitted to his softer breast:
A radiant baldric, o'er his shoulder ty'd,
Sustain'd the sword that glitter'd at his side:
His youthful face a polish'd helm o'erspread;
The waving horse-hair nodded on his head;
His figur'd shield, a shining orb, he takes,
And in his hand a pointed javelin shakes.
With equal speed, and fir'd by equal charms,
The Spartan hero sheaths his limbs in arms.

Now round the lists the admiring armies stand,
With javelins fix'd, the Greek and Trojan band.
Amidst the dreadful vale, the chiefs advance
All pale with rage, and shake the threatening lance.
The Trojan first his shining javelin threw;
Full on Atrides' ringing shield it flew;
Nor pierc'd the brazen orb, but with a bound
Leap'd from the buckler, blunted on the ground.
Atrides then his massy lance prepares,
In act to throw, but first prefers his prayers:

"Give me, great Jove! to punish lawless lust,
And lay the Trojan gasping in the dust:
Destroy th' aggressor, aid my righteous cause,
Avenge the breach of hospitable laws,
Let this example future times reclaim,
And guard from wrong fair friendship's holy name."
He said, and pois'd in air the javelin sent,
Through Paris' shield the forceful weapon went,
His corslet pierces, and his garment rends,
And, glancing downward, near his flank descends.
The wary Trojan, bending from the blow,
Eludes the death, and disappoints his foe:
But fierce Atrides wav'd his sword, and strook
Full on his casque; the crested helmet shook;
The brittle steel, unfaithful to his hand,
Broke short: the fragments glitter'd on the sand.
The raging warrior to the spacious skies
Rais'd his upbraiding voice, and angry eyes:
"Then is it vain in Jove himself to trust?
And is it thus the gods assist the just?
When crimes provoke us, Heaven success denies;
The dart falls harmless, and the falchion flies."
Furious he said, and tow'rd the Grecian crew
(Seiz'd by the crest) th' unhappy warrior drew;
Struggling he follow'd, while th' embroider'd

thong,
That ty'd his helmet, dragg'd the chief along.
Then had his ruin crown'd Atrides' joy,
But Venus trembled for the prince of Troy:
Unseen she came, and burst the golden band;
And left an empty helmet in his hand.
The casque, emrag'd, amidst the Greeks he threw;
The Greeks with smiles the polish'd trophy view.
Then, as once more he lifts the deadly dart,
In thirst of vengeance, at his rival's heart,

The queen of love her favour'd champion shrouds
 (For gods can all things) in a veil of clouds.
 Rais'd from the field the panting youth she led,
 And gently laid him on the bridal bed,
 With pleasing sweets his fainting sense renews,
 And all the dome perfumes with heavenly dews.
 Meantime the brightest of the femal: kind,
 The matchless Helen, o'er the walls reclin'd;
 To her, beset with Trojan beauties, came
 In borrow'd form the laughter-loving dame¹,
 (She seem'd an ancient maid, well-skill'd to cull
 The snowy fleece, and wind the twisted wool.)
 The goddess softly shook her silken vest,
 That shed perfumes, and whispering thus address:
 "Haste, happy nymph! for thee thy Paris calls,
 Safe from the fight, in yonder lofty walls.
 Fair as a god! with odours round him spread
 He lies, and waits thee on the well-known bed:
 Not like a warrior parted from the foe,
 But some gay dancer in the public show."
 She spoke, and Helen's secret soul was mov'd:
 She scorn'd the champion, but the man she lov'd.
 Fair Venus' neck, her eyes that sparkled fire,
 And breast, reveal'd the queen of soft desire.
 Struck with her presence, straight the lively red
 Forsook her cheek; and, trembling, thus said:
 "Then is it still thy pleasure to deceive?
 And woman's frailty always to believe?
 Say, to new nations must I cross the main,
 Or carry wars to some soft Asian plain?
 For whom must Helen break her second vow?
 What other Paris is thy darling now?
 Left to Atrides (victor in the strife)
 An odious conquest, and a captive wife,
 Hence let me sail: and if thy Paris bear
 My absence ill, let Venus ease his care.
 A hand-maid goddess at his side to wait,
 Renounce the glories of thy heavenly state,
 Be fix'd for ever to the Trojan shore,
 His spouse, or slave; and mount the skies no more.
 For me, to lawless love no longer led,
 I scorn the coward, and detest his bed;
 Else should I merit everlasting shame,
 And keen reproach, from every Phrygian dame:
 Ill suits it now the joys of love to know,
 Too deep my anguish, and too wild my woe."
 Then, thus incens'd, the Paphian queen replies;
 "Obey the power from whom thy glories rise:
 Should Venus leave thee, every charm must fly,
 Fade from thy cheek, and languish in thy eye.
 Cease to provoke me, lest I make thee more
 The world's aversion, than their love before;
 Now the bright prize for which mankind engage,
 Then the sad victim of the public rage."
 At this, the fairest of her sex obey'd,
 And veil'd her blushes in a silken shade,
 Unseen, and silent, from the train she moves,
 Led by the goddess of the Smiles and Loves.
 Arriv'd, and enter'd at the palace-gate,
 The maids officious round their mistress wait;
 Then all, dispersing, various tasks attend;
 The queen and goddess to the prince ascend.
 Full in her Paris' sight, the queen of love
 Had plac'd the beauteous progeny of Jove;
 Where, as he view'd her charms, she turn'd away
 Her glowing eyes, and thus began to say:
 "Is this the chief, who, lost to sense of shame,
 Late fled the field, and yet survives his fame?"

¹ Venus.

Oh hadst thou dy'd beneath the righteous sword
 Of that brave man whom once I call'd my lord!
 The boaster Paris oft desir'd the day
 With Sparta's king to meet in single fray:
 Go now, once more thy rival's rage excite,
 Provoke Atrides, and renew the fight:
 Yet Helen bids thee stay, lest thou unskill'd
 Should'st fall an easy conquest on the field."

The prince replies: "Ah cease, divinely fair,
 Nor add reproaches to the wounds I bear;
 This day the foe prevail'd by Pallas' power;
 We yet may vanquish in a happier hour:
 There want not gods to favour us above;
 But let the business of our life be love:
 These softer moments let delight employ,
 And kind embraces snatch the hasty joy.
 Not thus I lov'd thee, when from Sparta's shore,
 My forc'd, my willing, heavenly prize I bore,
 When first entranc'd in Cranaë's isle I lay,
 Mix'd with thy soul, and all dissolv'd away!"
 Thus having spoke, th' enamour'd Phrygian boy
 Rush'd to the bed, impatient for the joy.
 Him Helen follow'd slow with bashful charms,
 And clasp'd the blooming hero in her arms.

While these to love's delicious rapture yield,
 The stern Atrides rages round the field:
 So some fell lion, whom the woods obey,
 Roars through the desert, and demands his prey.
 Paris he seeks, impatient to destroy,
 But seeks in vain along the troops of Troy;
 Ev'n those had yielded to a foe so brave,
 The recreant warrior, hateful as the grave.
 Then speaking thus, the king of kings arose!
 "Ye Trojans, Dardans, all our generous foes!
 Hear, and attest! from Heaven with conquest
 crown'd,

Our brother's arms the just success have found:
 Be therefore now the Spartan wealth restor'd,
 Let Argive Helen own her awful lord;
 Th' appointed fine let Ilion justly pay,
 And age to age record this signal day."

He ceas'd: his army's loud applauses rise,
 And the long shout runs echoing through the skies.

 THE ILIAD.

 BOOK IV.

 ARGUMENT.

THE BREACH OF THE TRUCE, AND THE FIRST BATTLE.

The gods deliberate in council concerning the Trojan war: they agree upon the continuation of it, and Jupiter sends down Minerva to break the truce. She persuades Pandarus to aim an arrow at Menelaus, who is wounded, but cured by Machaon. In the mean time some of the Trojan troops attack the Greeks. Agamemnon is distinguished in all the parts of a good general; he reviews the troops, and exhorts the leaders, some by praises, and others by reproofs. Nestor is particularly celebrated for his military discipline. The battle joins, and great numbers are slain on both sides.

The same day continues through this, as through the last book (as it does also through the two following, and almost to the end of the seventh book.) The scene is wholly in the field before Troy.

AND now Olympus' shining gates unfold ;
The gods, with Jove, assume their thrones of gold :
Immortal Hebe, fresh with bloom divine,
The golden goblet crowns with purple wine :
While the full bowls flow round, the powers employ
Their careful eyes on long-contended Troy.

When Jove, dispos'd to tempt Saturnia's spleen,
Thus wak'd the fury of his partial queen :
" Two powers divine the son of Atreus aid,
Imperial Juno, and the martial maid ;
But high in Heaven they sit, and gaze from far,
The tame spectators of his deeds of war.
Not thus fair Venus helps her favour'd knight,
The queen of pleasures shares the toils of fight,
Each danger wards, and, constant in her care,
Saves in the moment of the last despair.
Her act has rescu'd Paris' forfeit life,
Though great Atrides gain'd the glorious strife.
Then say, ye powers ! what signal issue waits
To crown this deed, and finish all the fates ?
Shall Heaven by peace the bleeding kingdoms
spare,

Or rouse the Furies, and awake the war ?
Yet, would the gods for human good provide,
Atrides soon might gain his beauteous bride,
Still Priam's walls in peaceful honours grow,
And through his gates the crowding nations flow."

Thus while he spoke, the queen of Heaven enrag'd

And queen of war in close consult engag'd :
Apart they sit, their deep designs employ,
And meditate the future woes of Troy.

Though secret anger swell'd Minerva's breast,
The prudent goddess yet her wrath suppress ;
But Juno, impotent of passion, broke
Her silent silence, and with fury spoke :

" Shall then, O tyrant of th' ethereal reign !
My schemes, my labours, and my hopes, be vain ?
Have I, for this, shook Ilium with alarms,
Assembled nations, set two worlds in arms ?
To spread the war, I flew from shore to shore ;
Th' immortal coursers scarce the labour bore.
At length ripe vengeance o'er their heads impends,
But Jove himself the faithless race defends :
Loth as thou art to punish lawless lust,
Not all the gods are partial and unjust."

The sire whose thunder shakes the cloudy skies
Sighs from his inmost soul, and thus replies :
" Oh lasting rancour ! oh insatiate hate
To Phrygia's monarch, and the Phrygian state !
What high offence has fir'd the wife of Jove,
Can wretched mortals harm the powers above ?
That Troy and Troy's whole race thou would'st confound.

And yon fair structures level with the ground ?
Haste, leave the skies, fulfill thy stern desire,
Burst all her gates, and wrap her walls in fire !
Let Priam bleed ! If yet thou thirst for more,
Bleed all his sons, and Ilium float with gore,
To boundless vengeance the wide realm be given,
Till vast destruction glut the queen of Heaven !
So let it be, and Jove his peace enjoy,
When Heaven no longer hears the name of Troy :

But should this arm prepare to wreak our hate
On thy lov'd realms, whose guilt demands their fate,

Presume not thou the lifted bolt to stay ;
Remember Troy, and give the vengeance way.
For know, of all the numerous towns that rise
Beneath the rolling Sun and starry skies,
Which gods have rais'd, or earth-born men
enjoy,

None stands so dear to Jove as sacred Troy.
No mortals merit more distinguish'd grace
Than godlike Priam, or than Priam's race,
Still to our name their hetacombs expire,
And altars blaze with unextinguish'd fire."

At this the goddess roll'd her radiant eyes,
Then on the thunderer fix'd them, and replies :
" Three towns are Juno's on the Grecian plains,
More dear than all th' extended Earth contains,
Mycene, Argos, and the Spartan wall ;
These thou may'st raze, nor I forbid their fall :
'Tis not in me the vengeance to remove ;
The crime's sufficient, that they share my love.
Of power superior why should I complain ?
Resent I may, but must resent in vain.
Yet some distinction Juno might require,
Sprung with thyself from one celestial sire,
A goddess born to share the realms above,
And styl'd the consort of the thundering Jove ;
Nor thou a wife and sister's right deny ;
Let both consent, and both by turns comply ;
So shall the gods our joint decrees obey,
And Heaven shall act as we direct the way.
See ready Pallas waits thy high commands,
To raise in arms the Greek and Phrygian bands ;
Their sudden friendship by her arts may cease,
And the proud Trojans first infringe the peace."

The sire of men and monarch of the sky,
Th' advice approv'd, and bade Minerva fly,
Dissolve the league, and all her arts employ
To make the breach the faithless act of Troy.

Fir'd with the charge, she headlong urg'd her sight,

And shot like lightning from Olympus' height.

As the red comet, from Saturnius sent
To fright the nations with a dire portent
(A fatal sign to armies on the plain,
Or trembling sailors on the wintery main)
With sweeping glories glides along in air,
And shakes the sparkles from its blazing hair :

Between both armies thus, in open sight,
Shot the bright goddess in a trail of light.
With eyes erect the gazing hosts admire
The power descending, and the Heavens on fire !
" The gods" (they cried) " the gods this signal sent,
And fate now labours with some vast event :
Jove seals the league, or bloodier scenes prepares ;
Jove, the great arbiter of peace and wars !"

They said, while Pallas through the Trojan
(In shape a mortal) pass'd disguis'd along. [through
Like bold Laodocus, her course she bent,
Who from Antenor trac'd his high descent.
Amidst the ranks Lycaon's son she found,
The warlike Pandarus, for strength renown'd ;
Whose squadrons, led from black Æopos' flood,
With flaming shields in martial circle stood.

To him the goddess : " Phrygian ! can'st thou
A well-tim'd counsel with a willing ear ? [hear What praise were thine, could'st thou direct thy dart,

Amidst his triumph, to the Spartan's heart !

What gifts from Troy, from Paris would'st thou gain,
Thy country's foe, the Grecian glory slain!
Then seize th' occasion, dare the mighty deed,
Aim at his breast, and may that aim succeed!
But first, to speed the shaft, address thy vow
To Lycian Phoebus with the silver bow,
And swear the firstlings of thy flock to pay
On Zelia's altars, to the god of day."

He heard, and madly, at the motion pleas'd,
His polish'd bow with hasty rashness seiz'd.
'Twas form'd of horn, and smooth'd with artful
A mountain goat resign'd the shining spoil, [toil,
Who pierc'd long since beneath his arrows bled:
The stately quarry on the cliffs lay dead,
And sixteen palms his brow's large honours spread:
The workman join'd, and shap'd the bended horns,
And beaten gold each taper point adorns.
This, by the Greeks unseem, the warrior bends,
Screen'd by the shields of his surrounding friends.
There meditates the mark; and, couching low,
Fits the sharp arrow to the well-strung bow.
Once from a hundred feather'd deaths he chose,
Fated to wound, and cause of future woes,
Then offers vows with hecatombs to crown
Apollo's altars in his native town.

Now with full force the yielding horn he bends,
Drawn to an arch, and joins the doubling ends;
Close to his breast he strains the nerve below,
Till the barb'd point approach the circling bow;
Th' impatient weapon whizzes on the wing:
Sounds the tough horn, and twangs the quivering
But thee, Atrides! in that dangerous hour string.

The gods forget not, nor thy guardian power.
Pallas assists, and (weaken'd in its force)
Diverts the weapon from its destin'd course:
So from her babe, when slumber seals his eye,
The watchful mother wafts th' env'nom'd fly.
Just where his belt with golden buckles join'd,
Where linen folds the double corslet lin'd,
She turn'd the shaft, which, hissing from above,
Pass'd the broad belt, and through the corslet drove:

The folds it pierc'd, the plaited linen tore,
And raz'd the skin, and drew the purple gore.
As when some stately trappings are decreed
To grace a monarch on his bounding steed,
A nymph, in Caria or Mæonia bred,
Stains the pure ivory with a lively red:
With equal lustre various colours vie,
The shining whiteness, and the Tyrian dye:
So, great Atrides! show'd thy sacred blood,
As down thy snowy thigh distill'd the streaming flood.
With horror seiz'd, the king of men descried
The shaft infix'd, and saw the gushing tide:
Nor less the Spartan fear'd before he found
The shining barb appear'd above the wound.
Teas, with a sigh, that heav'd his manly breast,
The royal brother thus his grief express'd,
And grasp'd his hands; while all the Greeks around
With answering sighs return'd the plaintive sound:

"Oh, dear as life! did I for this agree
The solemn truce, a fatal truce to thee!
Wert thou expos'd to all the hostile train,
To fight for Greece, and conquer to be slain?
The race of Trojans in thy ruin join,
And faith is scorn'd by all the perjurd line,
Nor thus our vows, confirm'd with wine and gore,
Those hands we plighted, and those oaths we swore,
Shall all be vain: when Heaven's revenge is slow,
Jove but prepares to strike the fiercer blow.

The day shall come, that great averging day,
Which Troy's proud glories in the dust shall lay.
When Priam's powers and Priam's self shall fall,
And one prodigious ruin swallow all.
I see the god, already, from the pole
Bare his red arm, and bid the thun'd'roll;
I see th' eternal all his fury shed,
And shake his ægis o'er their guilty head,
Such mighty woes on perjurd princes wait;
But thou, alas! deserv'st a happier fate.
Still must I mourn the period of thy days,
And only mourn, without my share of praise?
Depriv'd of thee, the heartless Greeks no more
Shall dream of conquests on the hostile shore;
Troy seiz'd of Helen, and our glory lost,
Thy bones shall moulder on a foreign coast:
While some proud Trojan thus insulting cries,
(And spurns the dust where Menelaüs lies)
"Such are the trophies Greece from Ilion brings,
And such the conquests of her king of kings!
Lo his proud vessels scatter'd o'er the main,
And unreveng'd his mighty brother slain."
Oh! ere that dire disgrace shall blast my fame,
O'erwhelm me, Earth! and hide a monarch's
shame."

He said: a leader's and a brother's fears
Possess his soul, which thus the Spartan cheers:
"Let not thy words the warmth of Greece abate;
The feeble dart is guiltless of my fate:
Stiff with the rich embroider'd work around,
My varied belt repell'd the flying wound." [friend,
To whom the king: "my brother and my
Thus, always thus, may Heaven thy life defend!
Now seek some skilful hand, whose powerful art
May stanch th' effusion, and extract the dart.
Herald, be swift, and bid Mæhæon bring
His speedy succour to the Spartan king
Pierc'd with a winged shaft, (the deed of Troy)
The Grecian's sorrow, and the Dardan's joy."

With hasty zeal the swift Talthybius flies; [eyes,
Through the thick files he darts his searching
And finds Machæon, where sublime he stands
In arms encircled with his native bands.
Then thus: "Machæon, to the king repair,
His wounded brother claims thy timely care;
Pierc'd by some Lycian or Dardanian bow,
A grief to us, a triumph to the foe."

The heavy tidings griev'd the god-like man:
Swift to his succour through the ranks he ran;
The dauntless king yet standing firm he found,
And all the chiefs in deep concern around,
Where to the steely point the reed was join'd,
The shaft he drew, but left the head behind.
Straight the broad belt with gay embroidery grac'd,
He loos'd; the corslet from his breast unbrac'd;
Then suck'd the blood, and sovereign balm infus'd,
Which Chiron gave, and Æsculapius used.

While round the prince the Greeks employ their care,
The Trojans rush tumultuous to the war;
Once more they glitter in refulgent arms,
Once more the fields are fill'd with dire alarms.
Nor had you seen the king of men appear
Confus'd, unactive, or surpris'd with fear;
But fond of glory with severe delight,
His beating bosom claim'd the rising fight,
No longer with his warlike steeds he stay'd,
Or press'd the car with polish'd brass inlaid:
But left Eurymedon the reins to guide;
The fiery coursers snorted at his side.

On foot through all the martial ranks he moves,
And these encourages, and those reproves.

" Brave men ! " he cries (to such who boldly dare Urge their swift steeds to face the coming war)
" Your ancient valour on the foes approve ;
Jove is with Greece, and let us trust in Jove.
'Tis not for us, but guilty Troy to dread,
Whose crimes sit heavy on her perjur'd head ;
Her sons and matrons Greece shall lead in chains,
And her dead warriors strew the mournful plains."

Thus with new ardour he the brave inspires ;
Or thus the fearful with reproaches fires :
" Shame to your country, scandal of your kind !
Born to the fate ye well deserve to find !
Why stand ye gazing round the dreadful plain,
Prepar'd for flight, but doom'd to fly in vain ?
Confus'd and panting thus, the hunted deer
Falls as he flies, a victim to his fear.
Still must ye wait the foes, and still retire,
Till yon tall vessels blaze with Trojan fire ?
Or trust ye, Jove a valiant foe shall chase,
To save a trembling, heartless, dastard race?"

This said, he stalk'd with ample strides along,
To Crete's brave monarch and his martial throng ;
High at their head he saw the chief appear,
And bold Meriones excite the rear.
At this the king his generous joy express'd,
And clasp'd the warrior to his armed breast :
" Divine Idomeneus ! what thanks we owe
To thee like thine ! what praise shall we bestow ?
To thee the foremost honours are decreed,
First in the fight, and every graceful deed.
For this, in banquets, when the generous bowls
Restore our blood, and raise the warriors' souls,
Though all the rest with stated rules we bound,
Unmix'd, unmeasur'd, are thy goblets crown'd.
Be still thyself ; in arms a mighty name ;
Maintain thy honours, and enlarge thy fame."

To whom the Cretan thus his speech address'd :
" Secure of me, O king ! exhort the rest :
Fix'd to thy side, in every toil I share,
Thy firm associate in the day of war.
But let the signal be this moment given ;
To mix in fight is all I ask of Heaven.
The field shall prove how perjuries succeed,
And chains or death avenge their impious deed."

Charm'd with this heat, the king his course
And next the troops of either Ajax views : [pursues,
In one firm orb the bands were rang'd around
A cloud of heroes blacken'd all the ground.
Thus from the lofty promontory's brow
A swain surveys the gathering storm below ;
Slow from the main the heavy vapours rise,
Spread in dim streams, and sail along the skies,
Till black at night the swelling tempest shows,
The cloud condensing as the west-wind blows :
He dreads th' impending storm, and drives his
To the close covert of an arching rock. [flock
Such, and so thick th' embattled squadrons
With spears erect, a moving iron wood ; [stood,
A shady light was shot from glimmering shields,
And their brown arms obscur'd the dusky fields.

" O heroes ! worthy such a dauntless train,
Whose god-like virtue we but urge in vain," [bands (Exclaim'd the king) " who raise your eager
With great examples, more than loud commands:
Ah, would the gods but breathe in all the rest
Such souls as burn in your exalted breast :
Soon should our arms with just success be crown'd,
And Troy's proud walls lie smoking on the ground."

Then to the next the general bends his course
(His heart exults, and glories in his force ;)
There reverend Nestor ranks his Pylian bands,
And with inspiring eloquence commands ;
With strictest order set his train in arms,
The chiefs advises, and the soldiers warms,
Alastor, Chromius, Hæmon round him wait,
Bias the good, and Pelagon the great.
The horse and chariots to the front assign'd,
The foot (the strength of war) he rang'd behind ;
The middle space suspected troops supply,
Enclos'd by both, nor left the power to fly ;
He gives command to curb the fiery steed,
Nor cause confusion, nor the ranks exceed ;
Before the rest let none too rashly ride ;
No strength nor skill, but just in time, be try'd ;
The charge once made, no warrior turn the
But fight, or fall ; a firm embody'd train. [re
He whom the fortune of the field shall cast
From forth his chariot, mount the next in haste ;
Nor seek unpractis'd to direct the car,
Content with javelins to provoke the war.
Our great forefathers held this prudent course,
Thus rul'd their ardour, thus preserv'd their force
By laws like these immortal conquest made,
And Earth's proud tyrants low in ashes laid."

So spoke the master of the martial art,
And touch'd with transport great Atrides' heart :
" Oh ! had'st thou strength to match thy brave desires,

And nerves to second what thy soul inspires !
But wasting years, that wither human race,
Exhaust thy spirits, and thy arms unbrace.
What once thou wert, oh ever might'st thou be !
And age the lot of any chief but thee."

Thus to th' experienc'd prince Atrides cry'd ;
He shook his hoary locks, and thus reply'd :
" Well might I wish, could mortal wish renew
That strength which once in boiling youth I knew
Such as I was, when Ereuthalion slain
Beneath this arm fell prostrate on the plain.
But Heaven its gifts not all at once bestows,
These years with wisdom, crowns, with action
those ;

The field of combat fits the young and bold,
The solemn council best becomes the old :
To you the glorious conflict I resign,
Let sage advice, the palm of age, be mine."
He said. With joy the monarch march'd before,
And found Menestheus on the dusty shore,
With whom the firm Athenian phalanx stands,
And next Ulysses with his subject hands.
Renote their forces lay, nor knew so far
The peace infrin'g'd, nor heard the sound of war.
The tumult late begun, they stood intent
To watch the motion, dubious of th' event.
The king, who saw their squadrons yet unmur'd,
With hasty ardour thus the chiefs reprov'd :

" Can Peleus' son forget a warrior's part,
And fears Ulysses, skill'd in every art ?
Why stand you distant, and the rest expect
To mix in combat which yourselves neglect ?
From you 'twas hop'd among the first to dare
The shocks of armies, and commence the war.
For this your names are call'd before the rest,
To share the pleasures of the genial feast :
And can you, chiefs ! without a blush survey
Whole troops before you labouring in the fray ?
Say, is it thus those honours you requite ?
The first in banquets, but the last in fight?"

Ulysses heard: the hero's warmth o'erspread
 His cheek with blushes: and severe, he said:
 "Take back th' unjust reproach! Behold, we stand
 Death'd in bright arms, and but expect command.
 If glorious deeds afford thy soul delight,
 Behold me plunging in the thickest fight.
 Then give thy warrior-chief a warrior's due,
 Who dares to act whate'er thou dar'st to view."
 He struck with his generous wrath the king replies;
 "O! great in action, and in council wise!
 With ours thy care and ardour are the same,
 Nor need I to command, nor ought to blame.
 As thou art, and learn'd in human kind,
 Forgive the transport of a martial mind.
 Haste to the fight, secure of just amends; friends."
 The gods that make, shall keep the worthy,
 He said, and pass'd where great Tydides lay,
 His steeds and chariots wedg'd in firm array:
 (The warlike Stenelus attends his side)
 To whom with stern reproach the monarch cry'd;
 "Oh son of Tydeus! (he, whose strength could tame
 the bounding steed, in arms a mighty name)
 art thou, remote, the mingling hosts descry,
 With hands unactive, and a careless eye?
 art thou thy sire the fierce encounter fear'd;
 art thou first in front the matchless prince appear'd;
 what glorious toils, what wonders they recite,
 Who view'd him labouring through the ranks of
 fight!
 I saw him once, when, gathering martial power,
 A peaceful guest, he sought Mycenæ's tower;
 armies he ask'd, and armies had been given,
 Not we deny'd, but Jove forbade from Heaven;
 While dreadful comets glaring from afar
 Forewarn'd the horrors of the Theban war.
 Sent, sent by Greece from where Asopus flows,
 A fearless envoy, he approach'd the foes;
 Heat's hostile walls, unguarded and alone,
 He enters, and demands the throne.
 The tyrant feasting with his chiefs he found,
 And dar'd to combat all those chiefs around;
 Hear'd and subdued, before their haughty lord;
 For Pallas strung his arm, and edg'd his sword.
 Strung with the shame, within the winding way,
 To bar his passage fifty warriors lay;
 Two heroes led the secret squadron on,
 One fierce, and hardy Lycopion;
 Those fifty slaughter'd in the gloomy vale,
 He spar'd but one to bear the dreadful tale.
 He spar'd Tydeus was, and such his martial fire,
 Gods! how the son degenerates from the sire!"
 No words the god-like Diomed return'd,
 But heard respectful, and in secret burn'd:
 Not so fierce Capaneus' undaunted son,
 When at his sire, the boaster thus begun: [praise,
 "What needs, O monarch, this invidious ourselves to lessen, while our sires you raise?
 Dare to be just, Atreides! and confess
 Our valour equal, though our fury less:
 With fewer troops we storm'd the Theban wall,
 And happier saw the sevenfold city fall.
 In impious acts the guilty fathers dy'd;
 The sons subdued, for Heaven was on their side.
 Far more than heirs of all our parents' fame,
 Our glories darken their diminish'd name."
 To him Tydides thus: "My friend, forbear,
 Suppress thy passion, and the king revere:
 His high concern may well excuse this rage,
 Whose cause we follow, and whose war we wage;"

His the first praise, were Ilion's towers o'erthrown,
 And, if we fail, the chief disgrace his own.
 Let him the Greeks to hardy toils excite,
 'Tis ours to labour in the glorious fight."

He spoke, and ardent on the trembling ground
 Sprung from his car; his ringing arms resound.
 Dire was the clang, and dreadful from afar,
 Of arm'd Tydides rushing to the war.
 As when the winds, ascending by degrees,
 First move the whitening surface of the seas,
 The billows float in order to the shore,
 The wave behind rolls on the wave before;
 Till with the growing storm, the deeps arise,
 Foam o'er the rocks and thunder to the skies.
 So to the fight the thick battalions throng,
 Shields urg'd on shields, and men drove men along.
 Sedate and silent move the numerous bands;
 No sound, no whisper, but the chief's commands,
 Those only heard; with awe the rest obey,
 As if some god had snatch'd their voice away,
 Not so the Trojans; from their host ascends
 A general shout that all the region rends.

As when the fleecy flocks unnumber'd stand
 In wealthy folds, and wait the milker's hand,
 The hollow vales incessant bleating fill,
 The lambs reply from all the neighbouring hills:
 Such clamours rose from various nations round,
 Mix'd was the murmur, and confus'd the sound.
 Each host now joins, and each a god inspires,
 These Mars incites, and those Minerva fires.
 Pale fight around, and dreadful terror reign;
 And discord raging bathes the purple plain;
 Discord! dire sister of the slaughtering power,
 Small at her birth, but rising every hour,
 While scarce the skies her horrid head can bound,
 She stalks on Earth, and shakes the world around;
 The nations bleed, where'er her steps she turns,
 The groan still deepens, and the combat burns.

Now shield with shield, with helmet helmet
 To armour armour, lance to lance oppos'd, [clos'd,
 Host against host with shadowy squadrons drew,
 The sounding darts in iron tempests flew,
 Victors and vanquish'd join promiscuous cries,
 And shrilling shouts and dying groans arise;
 With streaming blood the slippery fields are dy'd,
 And slaughter'd heroes swell the dreadful tide.

As torrents roll, increas'd by numerous rills,
 With rage impetuous down their echoing hills;
 Rush to the vales, and, pour'd along the plain,
 Roar through a thousand channels to the main;
 The distant shepherd trembling hears the sound:
 So mix both hosts, and so their cries rebound.

The bold Antilochus the slaughter led,
 The first who struck a valiant Trojan dead:
 At great Echeopolus the lance arrives;
 Raz'd his high crest, and through his helmet drives;
 Warm'd in the brain the brazen weapon lies,
 And shades eternal settle o'er his eyes.
 So sinks a tower, that long assaults had stood
 Of force and fire; its walls besmear'd with blood:
 Him, the bold leader¹ of th' Abantian throng
 Seiz'd to despoil, and dragg'd the corpse along:
 But while he strove to tug th' inserted dart,
 Agenor's javelin reach'd the hero's heart.
 His flank, unguarded by his ample shield,
 Admits the lance: he falls, and spurns the field;
 The nerves, unbrac'd, support his limbs no
 The soul comes floating in a tide of gore. [more;

Trojans and Greeks now gather round the slain ;
The war renews, the warriors bleed again ;
As o'er their prey rapacious wolves engage,
Man dies on man, and all is blood and rage.

In blooming youth fair Simoisius fell,
Sent by great Ajax to the shades of Hell :
Fair Simoisius, whom his mother bore,
Amid the flocks on silver Simois' shore :
The nymph descending from the hills of Ide,
To seek her parents on his flowery side, [Joy,
Brought forth the babe, their common care and
And thence from Simois nam'd the lovely boy.
Short was his date ! by dreadful Ajax slain
He falls, and renders all their cares in vain !
So falls a poplar, that in watery ground
Rais'd high the head, with stately branches
crown'd,

(Fell'd by some artist with his shining steel,
To shape the circle of the bending wheel)
Cut down it lies, tall, smooth, and largely spread,
With all its beauteous honours on its head ;
There, left a subject to the wind and rain,
And scorch'd by suns, it withers on the plain.
Thus pierc'd by Ajax, Simoisius lies
Stretch'd on the shore, and thus neglected dies.

At Ajax Antiphus his javelin threw ;
The pointed lance with erring fury flew,
And Læncus, lov'd by wise Ulysses, slew.
He drops the corpse of Simoisius slain,
And sinks a breathless carcase on the plain.
This saw Ulysses, and with grief enrag'd
Strode where the foremost of the foes engag'd ;
Arm'd with his spear, he meditates the wound,
In act to throw ; but, cautious, look'd around,
Struck at his sight, the Trojans backward drew,
And trembling heard the javelin as it flew.
A chief stood nigh, who from Abydos came,
Old Priam's son, Democoön was his name ;
The weapon enter'd close above his ear,
Cold through his temples glides the whizzing spear ;
With piercing shrieks the youth resigns his breath,
His eye-balls darken with the shades of death ;
Ponderous he falls ; his clanging arms resound ;
And his broad buckler rings against the ground.

Seiz'd with affright the boldest foes appear ;
Ev'n god-like Hector seems himself to fear ;
Slow he gave way, the rest tumultuous fled ;
The Greeks with shouts press on, and spoil the dead :

But Phœbus now from Iliion's towering height
Shines forth reveal'd, and animates the fight.
" Trojans, be bold, and force with force oppose ;
Your foaming steeds urge headlong on the foes !
Nor are their bodies rocks, nor ribb'd with steel ;
Your weapons enter, and your strokes they feel.
Have ye forgot what seem'd your dread before ?
The great, the fierce Achilles fights no more."

Thus from Iliion's lofty towers errors, rous'd the Trojan powers :
fierce goddess fires the Grecian foe,
ers in the fields below.

And spreads for aid his unavailing hands.
The foe rush'd furious as he pants for breath,
And through his navel drove the pointed death :
His gushing entrails smok'd upon the ground,
And the warm life came issuing from the wound.

His lance bold Thoas at the conqueror sent,
Deep in his breast above the pap it went.
Amid the lungs was fix'd the winged wood,
And quivering in his heaving bosom stood :
Till from the dying chief, approaching near,
Th' Ætolian warrior tugg'd his weighty spear :
Then sudden wav'd his flaming falchion round,
And gash'd his belly with a ghastly wound.
The corpse now breathless on the bloody plain,
To spoil his arms the victor strove in vain ;
The Thracian bands against the victor prest ;
A grove of lances glitter'd at his breast.
Stern Thoas, glaring with revengeful eyes,
In sullen fury slowly quits the prize.
Thus fell two heroes ; one the pride of Thrace,
And one the leader of the Epian race :
Death's sable shade at once o'ercast their eyes,
In dust the vanquish'd, and the victor lies.
With copious slaughter all the fields are red,
And heap'd with growing mountains of the dead.
Had some brave chief this martial scene beheld,
By Pallas guarded through the dreadful field ;
Might darts be bid to turn their points away,
And swords around him innocently play ;
The war's whole art with wonder had he seen,
And counted heroes where he counted men.
So fought each host with thirst of glory fir'd,
And crowds on crowds triumphantly expir'd.

ARGUMENT.

THE ACTS OF DIOMED.

DIOMED, assisted by Pallas, performs wonders in this day's battle. Pandarus wounds him with an arrow, but the goddess cures him, enables him to discern gods from mortals, and prohibits him from contending with any of the former, excepting Venus. Æneas joins Pandarus to oppose him : Pandarus is killed, and Æneas in great danger, but for the assistance of Venus ; who, as she is removing her son from the fight, is wounded in the hand by Diomed. Apollo seconds her in his rescue, and at length carries off Æneas to Troy, where he is healed in the temple of Pergamus. Mars rallies the Trojans, and assists Hector to make a stand. In the mean time Æneas is restored to the field, and they overthrow several of the Greeks ; among the rest Tlepolemus is slain by Sarpedon. Juno and Minerva descend to resist Mars ; the latter incites Diomed to go against that god ; he wounds him, and sends him groaning to Heaven.

The first battle continues through this book. The scene is the same as in the former.

But Pallas now Tydides' soul inspires,
Fills with her force, and warms with all her fires,
Above the Greeks his deathless fame to raise,
And crown her hero with distinguish'd praise.
High on his helm celestial lightnings play,
His beamy shield emits a living ray;
Th' unwearied blaze incessant streams supplies,
Like the red star that fires th' autumnal skies,
When fresh he rears his radiant orb to sight,
And, bath'd in Ocean, shoots a keener light.
Such glories Pallas on the chief bestow'd,
Such, from his arms, the fierce effulgence flow'd:
Onward she drives him, furious to engage,
Where the fight burns, and where the fiercest rage.
The sons of Dares first the combat sought,
A wealthy priest, but rich without a fault;
In Vulcan's fane the father's days were led,
The sons to toils of glorious battle bred;
These singled from their troops the fight maintain,
These from their steeds, Tydides on the plain.
Fierce for renown the brother chiefs draw near,
And first bold Phegus cast his sounding spear,
Which o'er the warrior's shoulder took its course,
And spent in empty air its erring force.
Not so, Tydides, flew thy lance in vain,
But pierc'd his breast, and stretch'd him on the plain.
Seiz'd with unusual fear, Idæus fled,
Left the rich chariot, and his brother dead.
And, had not Vulcan lent his celestial aid,
He too had sunk to death's eternal shade;
But in a smoky cloud the god of fire
Preserv'd the son, in pity to the sire.
The steeds and chariot, to the navy led,
Increase the spoils of gallant Diomed.

Struck with amaze and shame, the Trojan crew
Or slain or fled, the sons of Dares view;
When by the blood-stain'd hand Minerva prest
The god of battles, and this speech address:
" Stern power of war! by whom the mighty fall,
Who bathe in blood, and shake the lofty wall!
Let the brave chiefs their glorious toils divide;
And whose the conquest mighty Jove decide:
While we from interdicted fields retire,
Nor tempt the wrath of Heaven's avenging sire."

Her words allay'd the impetuous warrior's heat,
The god of arms and martial maid retreat;
Remov'd from fight, on Xanthus' flowery bounds
They sat, and listen'd to the dying sounds.

Meantime the Greeks the Trojan race pursue,
And some bold chieftain every leader slew:
First Odius falls, and bites the bloody sand,
His death ennobled by Atreides' hand;
As he to flight his wheeling car address,
The speedy javelin drove from back to breast.
In dust the mighty Halizonian lay,
His arms resound, the spirit wings its way.

Thy fate was next, O Phæstus! doom'd to feel
The great Idomeneus' portended steel;
Whom Borus sent (his son and only joy)
From fruitful Tarnè to the fields of Troy.
The Cretan javelin reach'd him from afar,
And pierc'd his shoulder as he mounts his car;
Back from the car he tumbles to the ground,
And everlasting shades his eyes surround.

Then dy'd Scamandrius, expert in the chase,
In woods and wilds to wound the savage race:
Diana taught him all her sylvan arts,
To bend the bow, and aim unerring darts:
But vainly here Diana's arts he tries,
The fatal lance arrests him as he flies;
From Menelaüs' arm the weapon sent,
Through his broad back and heaving bosom went:
Down sinks the warrior with a thundering sound,
His brazen armour rings against the ground.

Next artful Phereclus untimely fell;
Bold Merion sent him to the realms of Hell.
Thy father's skill, O Phereclus, was thine,
The graceful fabric and the fair design;
For, lov'd by Pallas, Pallas did impart
To him the shipwright's and the builder's art.
Beneath his hand the fleet of Paris rose,
The fatal cause of all his country's woes;
But he, the mystic will of Heaven unknown,
Nor saw his country's peril, nor his own.
The hapless artist, while confus'd he fled,
The spear of Merion mingled with the dead,
Through his right hip with forceful fury cast,
Between the bladder and the bone it past:
Prone on his knees he falls with fruitless cries,
And death in lasting slumber seals his eyes.

From Mege's force the swift Pedæus fled,
Antenor's offspring from a foreign bed,
Whose generous spouse, Theano, heavenly fair,
Nurs'd the young stranger with a mother's care.
How vain those cares! when Mege's in the rear
Full in his nape infix'd the fatal spear!
Swift through his crackling jaws the weapon glides,
And the cold tongue the grinning teeth divides.

Then dy'd Hypsenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopian's mighty line,
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Priest of the stream, and honour'd as a god.
On him, amidst the flying numbers found,
Eurypylus inflicts a deadly wound;
On his broad shoulders fell the forceful brand,
Then glancing downward lopp'd his holy hand,
Which stain'd with sacred blood the blushing sand.
Down sunk the priest; the purple hand of death
Clos'd his dim eye, and fate suppress'd his breath.
Thus toil'd the chiefs, in different parts engag'd,
In every quarter fierce Tydides rag'd,
Amid the Greek, amid the Trojan train,
Rapt through the ranks, he thunders o'er the plain;
Now here; now there, he darts from place to place,

Pours on the rear, or lightens in their face.
Thus from high hills the torrents swift and strong
Deluge whole fields, and sweep the trees along,
Through ruin'd moles the rushing sounds,
O'erwhelms the bridge, and
The yellow harvests of the
And flatted vineyards, on While Jove descends in sl
And all the labours of man.

So rag'd Tydides, he Drove armies back,
With grief the lead
Saw the wide waste
His bended bow ag
Swift to the mark t
Whose forked point
Deep in his shoulder

Trojans and Greeks now gather round the slain ;
The war renews, the warriors-bleed again ;
As o'er their prey rapacious wolves engage,
Man dies on man, and all is blood and rage.

In blooming youth fair Simoisius fell,

Apollo thus from Ilion's lofty towers
Array'd in terrors, rous'd the Trojan powers :
While war's fierce goddess fires the Grecian foe,
And shouts and thunders in the fields below.
Then great Dioces fell, by doom divine,
In vain his valour, and illustrious line.
A broken rock the force of Pirus threw
(Who from cold Ænus led the Thracian crew ;)
Full on his ankle dropt the ponderous stone,
Burst the strong nerves, and crash'd the solid
bone.

Supine he tumbles on the crimson sands,
Before his helpless friends and native bands

And spreads for aid his unavailing hands.
The foe rush'd furious as he pants for breath,
And through his navel drove the pointed death :
His gushing entrails smok'd upon the ground,

Swift through his crackling jaws the weapon glides,
And the cold tongue the grinning teeth divides.
Then dy'd Hypsenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopian's mighty line,
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Priest of the stream, and honour'd as a god.
On him, amidst the flying numbers found,
Eurpylus inflicts a deadly wound ;
On his broad shoulders fell the forceful brand,
Then glancing downward lopp'd his holy hand,
Which stain'd with sacred blood the blushing sand.
Down sunk the priest ; the purple hand of death
Close'd his dim eye, and fate suppress'd his breath.
Thus toil'd the chiefs, in different parts engag'd,
In every quarter fierce Tydides rag'd,
Amid the Greek, amid the Trojan train,
Rapt through the ranks, he thunders o'er the plain ;
Now here ; now there, he darts from place to
place,
Pours on the rear, or lightens in their face.
Thus from high hills the torrents swift and strong
Deluge whole fields, and sweep the trees along,
Through ruin'd moles the rushing wave resounds,
O'erwhelms the bridge, and bursts the lofty bounds.
The yellow harvests of the ripen'd year,
And flatted vineyards, one sad waste appear !
While Jove descends in sluicy sheets of rain,
And all the labours of mankind are vain.
So rag'd Tydides, boundless in his ire,
Drove armies back, and made all Troy retire.
With grief the leader¹ of the Lycian band
Saw the wide waste of his destructive hand ;
His bended bow against the chief he drew ;
Swift to the mark the thirsty arrow flew,
Whose forky point the hollow breast-plate tore,
Deep in his shoulder pierc'd, and drank the gore :

¹ Pandarus.

Trojans and Greeks now gather round the slain ;
The war renews, the warriors-bleed again ;
As o'er their prey rapacious wolves engage,
Man dies on man, and all is blood and rage.

In blooming youth fair Simoisius fell,
Sent by great Ajax to the shades of Hell :
Fair Simoisius, whom his mother bore,
Amid the flocks on silver Simois' shore :
The nymph descending from the hills of Ide,
To seek her parents on his flowery side, [Joy,
Brought forth the babe, their common care and
And thence from Simois nam'd the lovely boy.
Short was his date ! by dreadful Ajax slain
He falls, and renders all their cares in vain !
So falls a poplar, that in watery ground
Rais'd high the head, with stately branches
crown'd,

(Fell'd by some artist with his shining steel,
To shape the circle of the bending wheel)
Cut down it lies, tall, smooth, and largely spread,
With all its beauteous honours on its head ;
There, left a subject to the wind and rain,
And scorch'd by suns, it withers on the plain.
Thus pierc'd by Ajax, Simoisius lies
Stretch'd on the shore, and thus neglected dies.

At Ajax Antiphus his javelin threw ;
The pointed lance with erring fury flew,
And Leucus, lov'd by wise Ulysses, slew.
He drops the corpse of Simoisius slain,
And sinks a breathless carcase on the plain.
This saw Ulysses, and with grief enrag'd
Strode where the foremost of the foes engag'd ;
Arm'd with his spear, he meditates the wound,
In act to throw ; but, cautious, look'd around.
Struck at his sight, the Trojans backward drew,
And trembling heard the javelin as it flew.
A chief stood nigh, who from Abydos came,
Old Priam's son, Democoon was his name ;
The weapon enter'd close above his ear,
Cold through his temples glides the whizzing spear ;
With piercing shrieks the youth resigns his breath,
His eye-balls darken with the shades of death ;
Ponderous he falls ; his clanging arms resound ;
And his broad buckler rings against the ground.

Seiz'd with affright the boldest foes appear ;
Ev'n god-like Hector seems himself to fear ;
Slow he gaye way, the rest tumultuous fled ;
The Greeks with shouts press on, and spoil the
dead :

But Phœbus now from Ilion's towering height
Shines forth reveal'd, and animates the fight.
" Trojans, be bold, and force with force oppose ;
Your foaming steeds urge headlong on the foes !
Nor are their bodies rocks, nor ribb'd with steel ;
Your weapons enter, and your strokes they feel.
Have ye forgot what seem'd your dread before ?
The great, the fierce Achilles fights no more."

Apollo thus from Ilion's lofty towers
Array'd in terrors, rous'd the Trojan powers :
While war's fierce goddess fires the Grecian foe,
And shouts and thunders in the fields below.
Then great Diore fell, by doom divine,
In vain his valour, and illustrious line.
A broken rock the force of Pirus threw
(Who from cold Ænus led the Thracian crew ;)
Full on his ankle dropt the ponderous stone,
Burst the strong nerves, and crash'd the solid
bone.

Supine he tumbles on the crimson sands,
Before his helpless friends and native bands

And spreads for aid his unavailing hands.
The foe rush'd furious as he pants for breath,
And through his navel drove the pointed death :
His gushing entrails smok'd upon the ground,
And the warm life came issuing from the wound.

His lance bold Thoas at the conqueror sent,
Deep in his breast above the pap it went.
Amid the lungs was fix'd the winged wood,
And quivering in his heaving bosom stood :
Till from the dying chief, approaching near,
Th' Ætolian warrior tugg'd his weighty spear :
Then sudden war'd his flaming falchion round,
And gash'd his belly with a ghastly wound.
The corpse now breathless on the bloody plain,
To spoil his arms the victor strove in vain ;
The Thracian bands against the victor prest ;
A grove of lances glitter'd at his breast.
Stern Thoas, glaring with revengeful eyes,
In sullen fury slowly quits the prize.
Thus fell two heroes ; one the pride of Thrace,
And one the leader of the Epian race :

Death's sable shade at once o'ercast their eyes,
In dust the vanquish'd, and the victor lies.
With copious slaughter all the fields are red,
And heap'd with growing mountains of the dead.

Had some brave chief this martial scene beheld,
By Pallas guarded through the dreadful field ;
Might darts be bid to turn their points away,
And swords around him innocently play ;
The war's heroic art with wonder had he seen,
And counted heroes where he counted men.

So fought each host with thirst of glory fir'd,
And crowds on crowds triumphantly expir'd.

BOOK V.

ARGUMENT.

THE ACTS OF DIOMED.

DIOMED, assisted by Pallas, performs wonders in this day's battle. Pandarus wounds him with an arrow, but the goddess cures him, enables him to discern gods from mortals, and prohibits him from contending with any of the former, excepting Venus. Æneas joins Pandarus to oppose him : Pandarus is killed, and Æneas in great danger, but for the assistance of Venus ; who, as she is removing her son from the fight, is wounded in the hand by Diomed. Apollo seconds her in his rescue, and at length carries off Æneas to Troy, where he is healed in the temple of Pergamus. Mars rallies the Trojans, and assists Hector to make a stand. In the mean time Æneas is restored to the field, and they overthrow several of the Greeks ; among the rest Tlepolemus is slain by Sarpedon. Juno and Minerva descend to resist Mars ; the latter incites Diomed to go against that god ; he wounds him, and sends him groaning to Heaven.

The first battle continues through this book. The scene is the same as in the former.

But Pallas now Tydides' soul inspires,
Fills with her force, and warms with all her fires,
Above the Greeks his deathless fame to raise,
And crown her hero with distinguish'd praise.
High on his helm celestial lightnings play,
His beamy shield emits a living ray;
Th' unwear'd blaze incessant streams supplies,
Like the red star that fires th' autumnal skies,
When fresh he rears his radiant orb to sight,
And, bath'd in Ocean, shoots a keener light.
Such glories Pallas on the chief bestow'd,
Such, from his arms, the fierce effluence flow'd:
Onward she drives him, furious to engage,
Where the fight burns, and where the fiercest rage.
The sons of Dares first the combat sought,
A wealthy priest, but rich without a fault;
In Vulcan's fame the father's days were led,
The sons to toils of glorious battle bred;
These singled from their troops the fight maintain,
These from their steeds, Tydides on the plain.
Fierce far renown the brother chiefs draw near,
And first bold Phegus cast his sounding spear,
Which o'er the warrior's shoulder took its course,
And spent in empty air its erring force.
Not so, Tydides, flew thy lance in vain,
But pierc'd his breast, and stretch'd him on the plain.
Seiz'd with unusual fear, Idæus fled,
Left the rich chariot, and his brother dead.
And, had not Vulcan lent his celestial aid,
He too had sunk to death's eternal shade;
But in a smoky cloud the god of fire
Preserv'd the son, in pity to the sire.
The steeds and chariot, to the navy led,
Acres'd the spoils of gallant Diomed.
Struck with amaze and shame, the Trojan crew
Or slain or fled, the sons of Dares view;
When by the blood-stain'd hand Minerva prest
The god of battles, and this speech addrest:
" Stern power of war! by whom the mighty fall,
Who bathe in blood, and shake the lofty wall!
Let the brave chiefs their glorious toils divide;
And whose the conquest mighty Jove decide:
While we from interdicted fields retire,
Nor tempt the wrath of Heaven's avenging sire."
Her words allay'd the impetuous warrior's heat,
The god of arms and martial maid retreat;
Remov'd from fight, on Xanthus' flowery bounds
They sat, and listen'd to the dying sounds.
Meantime the Greeks the Trojan race pursue,
And some bold chieftain every leader slew:
First Odias falls, and bites the bloody sand,
His death ennobled by Atrides' hand;
As he to flight his wheeling car addrest,
The speedy javelin drove from back to breast.
In dust the mighty Halizonian lay,
His arms resound, the spirit wings its way.
Thy fate was next, O Phæstus! doom'd to feel
The great Idomeneus' portended steel;
Whom Borus sent (his son and only joy)
From fruitful Tarnæ to the fields of Troy.
The Cretan javelin reach'd him from afar,
And pierc'd his shoulder as he mounts his car;
Back from the car he tumbles to the ground,
And everlasting shades his eyes surround.

Then dy'd Scamandrius, expert in the chase,
In woods and wilds to wound the savage race:
Diana taught him all her sylvan arts,
To bend the bow, and aim unerring darts:
But vainly here Diana's arts he tries,
The fatal lance arrests him as he flies;
From Menelaüs' arm the weapon sent,
Through his broad back and heaving bosom went:
Down sinks the warrior with a thundering sound,
His brazen armour rings against the ground.
Next artful Phereclus untimely fell;
Bold Merion sent him to the realms of Hell.
Thy father's skill, O Phereclus, was thine,
The graceful fabric and the fair design;
For, lov'd by Pallas, Pallas did impart
To him the shipwright's and the builder's art.
Beneath his hand the fleet of Paris rose,
The fatal cause of all his country's woes;
But he, the mystic will of Heaven unknown,
Nor saw his country's peril, nor his own.
The hapless artist, while confus'd he fled,
The spear of Merion mingled with the dead,
Through his right hip with forceful fury cast,
Between the bladder and the bone it past:
Prone on his knees he falls with fruitless cries,
And death in lasting slumber seals his eyes.
From Mege's force the swift Pedæus fled,
Antenor's offspring from a foreign bed,
Whose generous spouse, Theano, heavenly fair,
Nurs'd the young stranger with a mother's care.
How vain those cares! when Mege's in the rear
Full in his nape infix'd the fatal spear!
Swift through his crackling jaws the weapon glides,
And the cold tongue the grinning teeth divides.
Then dy'd Hypsenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopian's mighty line,
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Priest of the stream, and honour'd as a god.
On him, amidst the flying numbers found,
Eurypylus inflicts a deadly wound;

By Pallas guarded through the dreadful field ;
Might darts be bid to turn their points away,
And swords around him innocently play ;
The war's whole art with wonder had he seen,
And counted heroes where he counted men.

So fought each host with thirst of glory fir'd,
And crowds on crowds triumphantly expir'd.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK V.

ARGUMENT.

THE ACTS OF DIOMED.

DIOMED, assisted by Pallas, performs wonder in this day's battle. Pandarus wounds him with an arrow, but the goddess cures him, enable him to discern gods from mortals, and prohibits him from contending with any of the former, excepting Venus. Æneas joins Pandarus to oppose him : Pandarus is killed, and Æneas in great danger, but for the assistance of Venus who, as she is removing her son from the fight is wounded in the hand by Diomed. Apollo conducts her in his rescue, and at length carries Æneas to Troy, where he is healed in the temple of Pergamus. Mars rallies the Trojans, and assists Hector to make a stand. In the meantime Æneas is restored to the field, and they overthrow several of the Greeks ; among the rest Teipolemus is slain by Sarpedon. Juno and Minerva descend to resist Mars ; the latter incites Diomed to go against that god ; he wounds him, and sends him groaning to Heaven.

The first battle continues through this book. The scene is the same as in the former.

But Pallas now Tydides' soul inspires,
Fills with her force, and warms with all her fires,
Above the Greeks his deathless fame to raise,
And crown her hero with distinguish'd praise.
High on his helm celestial lightnings play,
His beamy shield emits a living ray;
Th' unwear'd blaze incessant streams supplies,
Like the red star that fires th' autumnal skies,
When fresh he rears his radiant orb to sight,
And, bath'd in Ocean, shoots a keener light.
Such glories Pallas on the chief bestow'd,
Such, from his arms, the fierce effulgence flow'd:
Onward she drives him, furious to engage,
Where the fight burns, and where the thickest rage.
The sons of Dares first the combat sought,
A wealthy priest, but rich without a fault;
In Vulcan's fame the father's days were led,
The sons to toils of glorious battle bred;
These singled from their troops the fight maintain,
These from their steeds, Tydides on the plain.
Fierce for renown the brother chiefs draw near,
And first bold Phegus cast his sounding spear,
Which o'er the warrior's shoulder took its course,
And spent in empty air its erring force.
Not so, Tydides, flew thy lance in vain,
But pierc'd his breast, and stretch'd him on the plain.
Seiz'd with unusual fear, Idæus fled,
Left the rich chariot, and his brother dead.
And, had not Vulcan lent his celestial aid,
He too had sunk to death's eternal shade;
But in a smoky cloud the god of fire
Preserv'd the son, in pity to the sire.
The steeds and chariot, to the navy led,
acreas'd the spoils of gallant Diomed.
Struck with amaze and shame, the Trojan crew
Or slain or fled, the sons of Dares view;
When by the blood-stain'd hand Mimerva prest
The god of battles, and this speech address:
" Stern power of war! by whom the mighty fall,
Who bathe in blood, and shake the lofty wall!
Let the brave chiefs their glorious toils divide;
And whose the conquest mighty Jove decide:
While we from interdicted fields retire,
Now tempt the wrath of Heaven's avenging sire."
Her words allay'd the impetuous warrior's heat,
The god of arms and martial maid retreat;
Remov'd from fight, on Xanthus' flowery bounds
They sat, and listen'd to the dying sounds.
Meantime the Greeks the Trojan race pursue,
And some bold chieftain every leader slew:
First Odios falls, and bites the bloody sand,
His death ennobled by Atrides' hand;
As he to flight his wheeling car address,
The speedy javelin drove from back to breast.
In dust the mighty Halizonian lay,
His arms resound, the spirit wings its way.
Thy fate was next, O Phæstus! doom'd to feel
The great Idomeneus' portended steel;
Whom Borus sent (his son and only joy)
From fruitful Tarnæ to the fields of Troy.
The Cretan javelin reach'd him from afar,
And pierc'd his shoulder as he mounts his car;
Back from the car he tumbles to the ground,
And everlasting shades his eyes surround.

Then dy'd Scamandrius, expert in the chase,
In woods and wilds to wound the savage race:
Diana taught him all her sylvan arts,
To bend the bow, and aim unerring darts:
But vainly here Diana's arts he tries,
The fatal lance arrests him as he flies;
From Menelaüs' arm the weapon sent,
Through his broad back and heaving bosom went:
Down sinks the warrior with a thundering sound,
His brazen armour rings against the ground.
Next artful Phereclus untimely fell;
Bold Merion sent him to the realms of Hell.
Thy father's skill, O Phereclus, was thine,
The graceful fabric and the fair design;
For, lov'd by Pallas, Pallas did impart
To him the shipwright's and the builder's art.
Beneath his hand the fleet of Paris rose,
The fatal cause of all his country's woes;
But he, the mystic will of Heaven unknown,
Nor saw his country's peril, nor his own.
The hapless artist, while confus'd he fled,
The spear of Merion mingled with the dead,
Through his right hip with forceful fury cast,
Between the bladder and the bone it past:
Prone on his knees he falls with fruitless cries,
And death in lasting slumber seals his eyes.
From Mege's force the swift Pedæus fled,
Antenor's offspring from a foreign bed,
Whose generous spouse, Theano, heavenly fair,
Nurs'd the young stranger with a mother's care.
How vain those cares! when Mege's in the rear
Full in his nape infix'd the fatal spear!
Swift through his crackling jaws the weapon glides,
And the cold tongue the grinning teeth divides.
Then dy'd Hypsenor, generous and divine,
Sprung from the brave Dolopian's mighty line,
Who near ador'd Scamander made abode,
Priest of the stream, and honour'd as a god.
On him, amidst the flying numbers found,
Eurypylius inflicts a deadly wound;
On his broad shoulders fell the forceful brand,
Then glancing downward lopp'd his holy hand,
Which stain'd with sacred blood the blushing sand.
Down sunk the priest; the purple hand of death
Clos'd his dim eye, and fate suppress'd his breath.
Thus toil'd the chiefs, in different parts engag'd,
In every quarter fierce Tydides rag'd,
Amid the Greek, amid the Trojan train,
Rapt through the ranks, he thunders o'er the plain;
Now here; now there, he darts from place to
place,
Pours on the rear, or lightens in their face.
Thus from high hills the torrents swift and strong
Deluge whole fields, and sweep the trees along,
Through ruin'd moles the rushing wave resounds,
O'erwhelms the bridge, and bursts the lofty bounds.
The yellow harvests of the ripen'd year,
And fatted vineyards, one sad waste appear!
While Jove descends in sluicy sheets of rain,
And all the labours of mankind are vain.
So rag'd Tydides, boundless in his ire,
Drove armies back, and made all Troy retire.
With grief the leader¹ of the Lycian band
Saw the wide waste of his destructive hand:
His bended bow against the chief he drew;
Swift to the mark the thirsty arrow flew,
Whose forky point the hollow breast-plate tore,
Deep in his shoulder pierc'd, and drank the gore:

¹ Pandarus.

The rushing stream his brazen armour dy'd,
While the proud archer thus exulting cry'd :

" Hither, ye Trojans, hither drive your steeds !
Lo ! by our hand the bravest Grecian bleeds.
Not long the dreadful dart he can sustain ;
Or Phœbus urg'd me to these fields in vain.

So spoke he, boastful ; but the winged dart
Stopt short of life, and mock'd the shooter's art.
The wounded chief, behind his car retir'd,
The helping hand of Sthenelus requir'd ;
Swift from his seat he leap'd upon the ground,
And tugg'd the weapon from the gushing wound ;
When thus the king his guardian power addrest,
The purple current wandering o'er his vest :

" O progeny of Jove ! unconquer'd maid !
If e'er my god-like sire deserv'd thy aid,
If e'er I felt thee in the fighting field,
Now, goddess, now thy sacred succour yield.
O give my lance to reach the Trojan knight,
Whose arrow wounds the chief thou guard'st in
fight ;

And lay the boaster groveling on the shore,
That vaunts these eyes shall view the light no more."

Thus pray'd Tydides, and Minerva heard ;
His nerves confirm'd, his languid spirits cheer'd,
He feels each limb with wonted vigour light ;
His beating bosom claims the promis'd fight.
" Be bold," (she cry'd) " in every combat shine,
War be thy province, thy protection mine ;
Rush to the fight, and every foe control ;
Wake each paternal virtue in thy soul :
Strength swells thy boiling breast, infus'd by me,
And all thy god-like father breathes in thee !
Yet more, from mortal mist I purge thy eyes,
And set to view the warring deities. ^{[plain,}
These see thou shun, through all th' embattled
Nor rashly strive where human force is vain.
If Venus mingle in the martial band,
Her shalt thou wound : so Pallas gives command.

With that, the blue-ey'd virgin wing'd her flight ;
The hero rush'd impetuous to the fight ;
With tenfold ardour now invades the plain,
Wild with delay, and more enrag'd by pain.
As on the fleecy flocks, when hunger calls,
Amidst the field a bridled lion falls ;
If chance some shepherd with a distant dart
The savage wound, he rouses at the smart,
He foams, he roars ; the shepherd dares not stay,
But trembling leaves the scattering flocks a prey ;
Heaps fall on heaps ; he bathes with blood the
ground,

Then leaps victorious o'er the lofty mound.
Not with less fury stern Tydides flew ;
And two brave leaders at an instant slew :
Astynous breathless fell, and by his side
His people's pastor, good Hypenor, dy'd ;
Astynous' breast the deadly lance receives,
Hypenor's shoulder his broad falchion cleaves.
Those slain he left ; and sprung with noble rage
Abas and Polydus to engage ;
Sons of Eurydamus, who, wise and old,
Could fates foresee, and mystic dreams unfold ;
The youths return'd not from the doubtful plain,
And the sad father try'd his arts in vain ;
No mystic dream could make their fates appear,
Though now determin'd by Tydides spear.

Young Xanthus next, and Thoön felt his rage ;
The joy and hope of Phœnops' feeble age ;
Vast was his wealth, and these the only heirs
Of all his labours, and a life of cares.

Cold death o'ertakes them in their blooming year
And leaves the father unavailing tears :
To strangers now descend his heavy store,
The race forgotten, and the name no more.

Two sons of Priam in one chariot ride
Glittering in arms, and combat side by side.
As when the lordly lion seeks his food
Where grazing heifers range the lonely wood,
He leaps amidst them with a furious bound,
Bends their strong necks, and tears them to
ground :

So from their seats the brother chiefs are torn,
Their steeds and chariot to the navy borne.
With deep concern divine Æneas view'd
The foe prevailing, and his friends pursued,
Through the thick storm of singing spears he
Exploring Pandarus with careful eyes,
At length he found Lycaon's mighty son ;
To whom the chief of Venus' race begun :

" Where, Pandarus, are all thy honours now
Thy winged arrows and unerring bow,
Thy matchless skill, thy yet unrivall'd fame,
And boasted glory of the Lycian name ?
Oh pierce that mortal : if we mortal call
That wondrous force by which whole armies fall
Or god incens'd, who quits the distant skies
To punish Troy for slighted sacrifice ;
(Which, oh, avert from our unhappy state !
For what so dreadful as celestial hate ?)
Whoe'er he be, propitiate Jove with prayer ;
If man destroy ; if god, entreat to spare."

To him the Lycian : " Whom your eyes beh
If right I judge, is Diomed the bold !
Such coursers whirl him o'er the dusty field,
So towers his helmet, and so flames his shield.
If 'tis a god, he wears that chief's disguise ;
Or if that chief, some guardian of the skies
Involv'd in clouds, protects him in the fray,
And turns unseen the frustrate dart away.
I wing'd an arrow, which not idly fell,
The stroke had fix'd him to the gates of Hell ;
And, but some god, some angry god withstand,
His fate was due to these unerring hands.
Skill'd in the bow, on foot I sought the war,
Nor join'd swift horses to the rapid car.
Ten polish'd chariots I possess'd at home,
And still they grace Lycaon's princely dome :
There veil'd in spacious coverlets they stand ;
And twice ten coursers wait their lord's command
The good old warrior bade me trust to these,
When first for Troy I sail'd the sacred seas ;
In fields aloft the whirling car to guide,
And through the ranks of death triumphant rid
But vain with youth, and yet to thrift inclin'd,
I heard his councils with unheedful mind,
And thought the steeds (your large supplies known)

Might fail of forage in the straiten'd town :
So took my bow and pointed darts in hand,
And left the chariots in my native land.

" Too late, O friend ! my rashness I deplo
These shafts, once fatal, carry death no more
Tydeus' and Atreus' sons their points have fo
And undissembled gore pursued the wound.
In vain they bled : this unavailing bow
Serves, not to slaughter, but provoke the fo
In evil hour these bended horns I strung,
And seiz'd the quiver where it idly hung.
Curs'd be the fate that sent me to the field
Without a warrior's arms, the spear and shield

He'er with life I quit the Trojan plain,
If e'er I see my spouse and sire again,
This bow, unfaithful to my glorious aims,
Broke by my hand, shall feed the blazing flames."

To whom the leader of the Dardan race:
"Be calm, nor Phœbus' honour'd gift disgrace.
The distant dart be prais'd, though here we need
The rushing chariot, and the bounding steed.
Against yon hero let us bend our course,
And hand to hand, encounter force with force.
Now mount my seat, and from the chariot's height
Observe my father's steeds, renown'd in fight,
Practis'd alike to turn, to stop, to chase,
To dare the shock, or urge the rapid race:
Secure with these, through fighting fields we go;
Or safe to Troy, if Jove's assist the foe.

Haste, seize the whip, and snatch the guiding rein;
The warrior's fury let this arm sustain;
Or, if to combat thy bold heart incline,
Take thou the spear, the chariot's care be mine."

"O prince!" (Lycaon's valiant son reply'd)
"As thine the steeds, be thine the task to guide.
The horses, practis'd to their lord's command,
Shall bear the rein, and answer to thy hand,
But if, unhappy, we desert the fight,
Thy voice alone can animate their flight:
Else shall our fates be number'd with the dead,
And these, the victor's prize, in triumph led.
Thine be the guidance then: with spear and shield
Myself will charge this terror of the field."

And now both heroes mount the glittering car;
The bounding coursers rush amidst the war.
Their fierce approach bold Sthenelus espy'd,
Who thus, alarm'd, to great Tydides cry'd:
"O friend! two chiefs of force immense I see,
Dreadful they come, and bend their rage on thee:
Lo the brave heir of bold Lycaon's line,
And great Æneas, sprung from race divine!
Enough is given to fame. Ascend thy car;
And save a life, the bulwark of our war."

At this the hero cast a gloomy look,
Fix'd on the chief with scorn; and thus he spoke:

"Me dost thou bid to shun the coming fight?
Me would'st thou move to base, inglorious flight?"

Know, 'tis not honest in my soul to fear,
Nor was Tydides born to tremble here.

I hate the cumbrous chariot's slow advance,
And the long distance of the flying lance;

But while my nerves are strong, my force entire,
Thus front the foe, and emulate my sire.

Nor shall yon steeds that fierce to fight convey
Those threatening heroes, bear them both away;

One chief at least beneath this arm shall die:
So Pallas tells me, and forbids to fly.

But if she dooms, and if no god withstand,
That both shall fall by one victorious hand;

Then heed my words: my heroes here detain,
Fix'd to the chariot by the straighten'd rein;

Swift to Æneas' empty seat proceed,
And seize the coursers of ethereal breed:

The race of those, which once the thundering god
For ravish'd Ganymede on Tros bestow'd,

The best that e'er on Earth's broad surface run,
Beneath the rising or the setting Sun.

Hence great Anchises stole a breed, unknown
By mortal mares, from fierce Laomedon;

Four of this race his ample stalls contain,
And two transport Æneas o'er the plain. [known.]

These, were the rich immortal prize our own,
Through the wide world should make our glory.

Thus while they spoke the foe came furious on,
And stern Lycaon's warlike race begun:

"Prince thou art met. Though late in vain as-
The spear may enter where the arrow fail'd." [sail'd,

He said, then shook the ponderous lance, and flung:
On his broad shield the sounding weapon rung,

Pierc'd the tough orb, and in his cuirass hung.
"He bleeds! the pride of Greece!" (the boaster cries)

"Our triumph now the mighty warrior lies!"
"Mistaken vaunter!" Diomed reply'd;

"Thy dart has err'd, and now my spear be try'd!
Ye 'scape not both; one, headlong from his car,
With hostile blood shall glut the god of war."

He spoke, and rising hurl'd his forceful dart,
Which, driven by Pallas, pierc'd a vital part;

Full in his face it enter'd, and betwixt
The nose and eye-ball the proud Lycian fixt;

Crash'd all his jaws, and cleft the tongue within,
Till the bright point look'd out beneath the chin.

Headlong he falls, his helmet knocks the ground;
Earth groans beneath him, and his arms resound;

The starting coursers tremble with affright;
The soul indignant seeks the realms of night.

To guard his slaughter'd friend, Æneas flies,
His spear extending where the carcase lies;

Watchful he wheels, protects it every way,
As the grim lion stalks around his prey.

O'er the fall'n trunk his ample shield display'd,
He hides the hero with his mighty shade,

And threats aloud: the Greeks with longing eyes
Behold at distance, but forbear the prize.

Then fierce Tydides stoops; and from the fields,
Heav'd with vast force, a rocky fragment wields,

Not two strong men th' enormous weight could raise,
Such men as live in these degenerate days.

He swung it round; and, gathering strength to Discharg'd the ponderous ruin at the foe. [throw,

Where to the hip th' inserted thigh unites,
Full on the bone the pointed marble lights;

Through both the tendons broke the rugged stone
And stripp'd the skin, and crack'd the solid bone.

Sunk on his knees, and staggering with his pains,
His falling bulk his berded arms sustains;

Lost in a dizzy mist the warrior lies;
A sudden cloud comes swimming o'er his eyes.

There the brave chief who mighty numbers sway'd,
Oppress'd had sunk to death's eternal shade;

But heavenly Venus, mindful of the love
She bore Anchises in th' Idæan grove,

His danger views with anguish and despair,
And guards her offspring with a mother's care.

About her much-lov'd son her arms she throws,
Her arms whose whiteness match the falling snows,

Screen'd from the foe behind her shining veil,
The swords wave harmless, and the javelins fail:

Safe through the rushing horse, and feather'd flight
Of sounding shafts, she bears him from the fight.

Nor Sthenelus, with unassisting hands,
Remain'd unheedful of his lord's commands:

His panting steeds, remov'd from out the war,
He fix'd with straighten'd traces to the car.

Next rushing to the Dardan spoil, detains
The heavenly coursers with the flowing manes:

These, in proud triumph to the fleet convey'd,
No longer now a Trojan lord obey'd,

That charge to bold Deipylus he gave,
(Whom most he lov'd, as brave men love the brave)

Then mounting on his car, resum'd the rein,
And follow'd where Tydides swept the plain.

Meanwhile (his conquest ravish'd from his eyes)
 The raging chief in chase of Venus flies :
 No goddess she commission'd to the field,
 Like Pallas dreadful with her sable shield,
 Or fierce Bellona thundering at the wall,
 While flames ascend, and mighty ruins fall ;
 Hæw soft combats suit the tender dame,
 New to the field, and still a foe to fame.
 Through breaking ranks his furious course he bends,
 And at the goddess his broad lance extends ;
 Through her bright veil the daring weapon drove,
 Th' ambrosial veil, which all the graces wove ;
 Her snowy hand the razing steel profan'd,
 An' the transparent skin with crimson stain'd.
 From the clear vein a stream immortal flow'd,
 Such stream as issues from a wounded God :
 Pure emanation ! uncorrupted flood ;
 Unlike our gross, diseas'd, terrestrial blood :
 (For not the bread of man their life sustains,
 Nor wine's inflaming juice supplies their veins.)
 With tender shrieks the goddess fill'd the place,
 And dropp'd her offspring from her weak embrace.
 Him Phœbus took : he casts a cloud around
 The fainting chief, and wards the mortal wound.

Then, with a voice that shook the vaulted skies,
 The king insults the goddess as she flies.
 " Ill with Jov's daughter bloody fights agree,
 The field of combat is no scene for thee :
 Go, let thy own soft sex employ thy care,
 Go, lull the coward, or delude the fair.
 Taught by this stroke, renounce the war's alarms,
 And learn to tremble at the name of arms."

Tydidēs thus. The goddess seiz'd with dread,
 Confus'd, distracted, from the conflict fled,
 To aid her, swift the winged Iris flew,
 Wrapt in a mist above the warring crew.
 The queen of love with faded charms she found,
 Pale was her cheek, and livid look'd the wound.
 To Mars, who sat remote, they bent their way,
 Far on the left, with clouds involv'd he lay ;
 Beside him stood his lance, distain'd with gore,
 And, rein'd with gold, his foaming steeds before.
 Low at his knee, she begg'd, with streaming eyes,
 Her brother's car, to mount the distant skies,
 And shew'd the wound by fierce Tydidēs given,
 A mortal man who dares encounter Heaven.
 Stern Mars attentive hears the queen complain,
 And to her hand commits the golden rein ;
 She mounts the seat, oppress'd with silent woe,
 Driven by the goddess of the painted bow.
 The lash resounds, the rapid chariot flies,
 And in a moment scales the lofty skies :
 There stopp'd the car, and there the coursers stood,
 Fed by fair Iris with ambrosial food.
 Before her mother, love's bright queen appears,
 O'erwhelm'd with anguish, and dissolv'd in tears ;
 She rais'd her in her arms, beheld her bleed,
 And ask'd, what god had wrought this guilty deed ?

Then she : " This insult from no god I found,
 An impious mortal gave the daring wound !
 Behold the deed of haughty Diomed !
 'Twas in the son's defence the mother bled.
 The war with Troy no more the Grecians wage,
 But with the gods (th' immortal gods) engage."

Dione then : " Thy wrongs with patience bear,
 And share those griefs inferior powers must share :
 Unnumber'd woes mankind from us sustain,
 And men with woes afflict the gods again.
 The mighty Mars in mortal fetters bound,
 And lodg'd in brazen dungeons under ground,

Full thirteen moons imprison'd roar'd in vain ;
 Otus and Ephialtes held the chain :
 Perhaps had perish'd ; had not Hermes' care
 Restor'd the groaning god to upper air.
 Great Juno's self has bore her weight of pain,
 Th' imperial partner of the heavenly reign ;
 Amphitryon's son infix'd the deadly dart,
 And fill'd with anguish her immortal heart.
 Ev'n Hell's grim king Alcides' power confess'd,
 The shaft found entrance in his iron breast ;
 To Jove's high palace for a cure he fled,
 Pierc'd in his own dominions of the dead ;
 Where Pæon, sprinkling heavenly balm around,
 Assuag'd the glowing pangs, and clos'd the wound.
 Rash, impious man ! to stain the blest abodes,
 And drench his arrows in the blood of gods !

" But thou (though Pallas urg'd thy frantic deed)
 Whose spear ill-fated makes a goddess bleed,
 Know thou, whoe'er with heavenly power contend
 Short is his date, and soon his glory end ;
 From fields of death when late he shall retire,
 No infant on his knees shall call him sire.
 Strong as thou art, some god may yet be found,
 To stretch thee pale and gasping on the ground ;
 Thy distant wife, Ægiale the fair,
 Starting from sleep with a distracted air,
 Shall rouse thy slaves, and her lost lord deplore,
 The brave, the great, the glorious, now no more."

This said, she wip'd from Venus' wounded palm
 The sacred ichor, and infus'd the balm.
 Juno and Pallas with a smile survey'd,
 And thus to Jove began the blue-ey'd maid ;

" Permit thy daughter, gracious Jove ! to tell
 How this mischance the Cyprian queen befell.
 As late she try'd with passion to inflame
 The tender bosom of a Grecian dame,
 Allur'd the fair with moving thoughts of joy,
 To quit her country for some youth of Troy ;
 The clasping zone, with golden buckles bound,
 Raz'd her soft hand with this lamented wound."

The sire of gods and men superior smil'd,
 And, calling Venus, thus address his child :
 " Not these, O daughter, are thy proper cares !
 Thee milder arts befit, and softer wars :
 Sweet smiles are thine, and kind endearing charms,
 To Mars and Pallas leave the deeds of arms."

Thus they in Heaven : while on the plain below
 The fierce Tydidēs charg'd his Dardan foe,
 Flush'd with celestial blood pursu'd his way,
 And fearless dar'd the threatening god of day ;
 Already in his hopes he saw him kill'd,
 Though screen'd behind Apollo's mighty shield.
 Thrice rushing furious, at the chief he strook ;
 His blazing buckler thrice Apollo shook :
 He try'd the fourth : when, breaking from the cloud,
 A more than mortal voice was heard aloud :

" O son of Tydeus, cease ! be wise and see
 How vast the difference of the gods and thee ;
 Distance immense ! between the powers that shine
 Above, eternal, deathless, and divine,
 And mortal man ! a wretch of humble birth,
 A short-liv'd reptile in the dust of Earth."

So spoke the god who darts celestial fires ;
 He dreads his fury, and some steps retires.
 Then Phœbus bore the chief of Venus' race
 To Troy's high fane, and to his holy place ;
 Latona there and Phœbe heal'd the wound,
 With vigour arm'd him, and with glory crown'd.
 This done, the patron of the silver bow
 A phantom rais'd, the same in shape and show

With great Æneas ; such the form he bore,
 And such in fight the radiant arms he wore.
 Around the spectre bloody wars are wag'd,
 And Greece and Troy with clashing shields engag'd.
 Meantime on Iliou's tower Apollo stood.
 And, calling Mars, thus urg'd the raging God.
 " Stern power of arms, by whom the mighty fall ;
 Who bath'st in blood, and shak'st th' embattled
 Æne in thy wrath ! to Hell's abhor'd abodes [wall,
 Despatch you Greek, and vindicate the gods.
 First rosy Venus felt his brutal rage ;
 We next he charg'd, and dares all Heaven engage :
 The wretch would brave high Heaven's immortal
 His triple thunder, and his bolts of fire." [sire,
 The god of battle issues on the plain,
 Turns all the ranks, and fires the Trojan train ;
 In form like Acamas, the Thracian guide,
 Urag'd, to Troy's retiring chiefs he cry'd :
 " How long, ye sons of Priam ! will ye fly,
 And unreav'd see Priam's people die ?
 Still unresisted shall the foe destroy,
 And stretch the slaughter to the gates of Troy ?
 Lo brave Æneas sinks beneath his wound,
 Not god-like Hector more in arms renown'd :
 Haste all, and take the generous warrior's part,"
 He said ; new courage swell'd each hero's heart.
 Sarpedon first his ardent soul express'd.
 And, turn'd to Hector, these bold words express'd :
 " Say, chief, is all thy ancient valour lost ?
 Where are thy threats, and where thy glorious boast,
 That propt alone by Priam's race should stand
 Troy's sacred walls, nor need a foreign hand ?
 Now, now thy country calls her wanted friends,
 And the proud vaunt in just derision ends,
 Remote they stand, while alien troops engage,
 Like trembling hounds before the lion's rage.
 Far distant hence I held my wide command,
 Where foaming Xanthus laves the Lycian land,
 With ample wealth (the wish of mortals) blest,
 A beauteous wife, and infant at her breast ;
 With those I left whatever dear could be ;
 Greece, if she conquers, nothing wins from me :
 Yet first in fight my Lycian bands I cheer,
 And long to meet this mighty man ye fear ;
 While Hector idle stands, nor bids the brave
 Their wives, their infants, and their altars save.
 Haste, warrior, haste ! preserve thy threaten'd
 Or one vast burst of all-involving fate [state ;
 Fall o'er your towers shall fall, and sweep away
 Sons, sires, and wives, an undistinguish'd prey.
 Boose all thy Trojans, urge thy aids to fight ;
 These claim thy thoughts by day, thy watch by night :
 With force incessant the brave Greeks oppose ;
 Such cares thy friends deserve, and such thy foes."
 Sung to the heart the generous Hector hears,
 But just reproof with decent silence bears,
 From his proud car the prince impetuous springs,
 On earth he leaps ; his brazen armour rings.
 Two shining spears are brandish'd in his hands ;
 Thus arm'd, he animates his drooping bands,
 Revives their ardour, turns their steps from flight,
 And wakes anew the dying flames of fight.
 They turn, the stand, the Greeks their fury dare,
 Condense their powers, and wait the growing war.
 As when, on Ceres' sacred floor, the swain
 Spreads the wide fan to clear the golden grain,
 And the light chaff, before the breezes borne,
 Ascends in clouds from off the heavy corn ;

The gray dust, rising with collected winds,
 Drives o'er the barn, and whitens all the hinds :
 So white with dust the Grecian host appears,
 From trampling steeds, and thundering charioteers ;
 The dusky clouds from labour'd earth arise,
 And roll in smoking volumes to the skies.
 Mars hovers o'er them with his sable shield,
 And adds new honours to the darken'd field.
 Pleas'd with his charge, and ardent to fulfil,
 In Troy's defence, Apollo's heavenly will :
 Soon as from fight the blue-ey'd maid retires,
 Each Trojan bosom with new warmth he fires.
 And now the god, from forth his sacred fane,
 Produc'd Æneas to the shouting train ;
 Alive, unharmin'd, with all his peers around,
 Erect he stood, and vigorous from his wound :
 Inquiries none they made ; the dreadful day
 No pause of words admits, no dull delay ;
 Fierce discord storms, Apollo loud exclaims,
 Fame calls, Mars thunders, and the field's in Stern Diomed with either Ajax stood, [games.
 And great Ulysses, bath'd in hostile blood.
 Embodied close, the labouring Grecian train
 The fiercest shock of charging hosts sustain.
 Unmov'd and silent, the whole war they wait,
 Serenely dreadful, and as fix'd as fate.
 So when th' embattled clouds in dark array,
 Along the skies their gloomy lines display ;
 When now the north his boisterous rage has spent,
 And peaceful sleeps the liquid element :
 The low-hung vapours motionless and still
 Rest on the summits of the shaded hill ;
 Till the mass scatters as the winds arise,
 Dispers'd and broken through the ruffled skies.
 Nor was the general wanting to his train,
 From troop to troop he toils through all the plain.
 " Ye Greeks, be men ! the charge of battle bear ;
 Your brave associates and yourselves reverse !
 Let glorious acts more glorious acts inspire,
 And catch from breast to breast the noble fire !
 On valour's side the odds of combat lie,
 The brave live glorious, or lamented die ;
 The wretch who trembles in the field of fame,
 Meets death, and worse than death, eternal shame."
 These words he seconds with his flying lance,
 To meet whose point was strong Deïcoön's chance,
 Æneas' friend, and in his native place
 Honour'd and lov'd like Priam's royal race :
 Long had he fought the foremost in the field,
 But now the monarch's lance transpierc'd his shield :
 His shield too weak the furious dart to stay,
 Through his broad belt the weapon forc'd its way :
 The grizzly wound dismiss'd his soul to Hell,
 His arms around him rattled as he fell.
 The fierce Æneas, brandishing his blade,
 In dust Orsilochus and Chrethon laid,
 Whose sire Diöcleus, wealthy, brave, and great,
 In well-built Pheræ held his lofty seat :
 Sprung from Alpheüs, plenteous stream ! that yields
 Increase of harvests to the Pylion fields.
 He got Orsilochus, Diöcleus he,
 And these descended in the third degree,
 Too early expert in the martial toil,
 In sable ships they left their native soil,
 To avenge Atreides : now untimely slain,
 They fell with glory on the Phrygian plain.
 So two young mountain lions, nurs'd with blood,
 In deep recesses of the gloomy wood,
 Rush fearless to the plains, and uncontrol'd
 Depopulate the stalls, and waste the fold ;

Till pierc'd at distance from their native den,
O'erpower'd they fall beneath the force of men.
Prostrate on earth their beauteous bodies lay,
Like mountain firs as tall and straight as they.
Great Menelaus views with pitying eyes,
Lifts his bright lance, and at the victor flies;
Mars urg'd him on; yet, ruthless in his hate,
The gods but urg'd him to provoke his fate.
He thus advancing, Nestor's valiant son
Shakes for his danger, and neglects his own;
Struck with the thought, should Helen's lord be slain,

And all his country's glorious labours vain.
Already met the threatening heroes stand;
The spears already tremble in their hand:
In rush'd Antilochus, his aid to bring,
And fall or conquer by the Spartan king.
These seen, the Dardan backward turn'd his course,
Brave as he was, and shunn'd unequal force,
The breathless bodies to the Greeks they drew,
Then mix'd in combat, and their toils renew.
First Pylæmenes, great in battle bled,
Who sheath'd in brass the Paphlagonians led.
Atrides mark'd him where sublime he stood;
Fix'd in his throat, the javelin drank his blood.
The faithful Mydon, as he turn'd from fight
His flying courser, sunk to endless night:
A broken rock by Nestor's son was thrown;
His bended arm receiv'd the falling stone.
From his numb'd hands the ivory-studded reins,
Dropt in the dust, are trail'd along the plains:
Meanwhile his temples feel a deadly wound:
He groans in death, and ponderous sinks to ground;
Deep drove his helmet in the sands, and there
The head stood fix'd, the quivering legs in air,
Till trampled flat beneath the courser's feet:
The youthful victor mounts his empty seat,
And bears the prize in triumph to the fleet.

Great Hector saw, and raging at the view,
Pours on the Greeks; the Trojan troops pursue:
He fires his host with animating cries,
And brings along the furies of the skies.
Mars, stern destroyer! and Bellona dread,
Flame in the front, and thunder at their head:
This swells the tumult and the rage of fight;
That shakes a spear that casts a dreadful light,
Where Hector march'd, the god of battles shin'd,
Now storm'd before him, and now rag'd behind.

Tydidès paus'd amidst his full career;
Then tides the hero's manly breast knew fear.
As when some simple swain his cot forsakes,
And wide through fens an unknown journey takes;
If chance a swelling brook his passage stay,
And foam impervious cross the wanderer's way,
Confus'd he stops, a length of country past,
Eyes the rough waves, and, tir'd, returns at last.
Amaz'd no less the great Tydidès stands:
He stay'd, and, turning, thus address'd his bands:

"No wonder, Greeks! that all to Hector yield,
Secure of favouring gods, he takes the field:
His strokes they second, and avert our spears:
Behold where Mars in mortal arms appears!
Retire then, warriors, but sedate and slow!
Retire, but with your faces to the foe.
Trust not too much your unavailing might;
'Tis not with Troy, but with the gods ye fight."

Now near the Greeks the black battalions drew;
And first two leaders valiant Hector slew:
His force Anchialus and Mnestæes found,
In every art of glorious war renown'd;

In the same car the chiefs to combat ride,
And fought united, and united died.
Struck at the sight, the mighty Ajax glows
With thirst of vengeance, and assaults the foe.
His massy spear with matchless fury sent,
Through Amphius' belt and heavy belly went:
Amphius Apærus' happy soil possess'd,
With herds abounding, and with treasure bless'd;
But fate resistless from his country led
The chief, to perish at his people's head.
Shook with his fall, his brazen armour rung,
And fierce, to seize it, conquering Ajax sprung;
Around his head an iron tempest rain'd;
A wood of spears his ample shield sustain'd;
Beneath one foot the yet-warm corpse he prest,
And drew his javelin from the bleeding breast:
He could no more; the showering darts deny'd
To spoil his glittering arms and plummy pride.
Now foes on foes came pouring on the field,
With bristling lances, and compacted shields;
Till, in the steely circle straiten'd round,
Forc'd he gives way, and sternly quits the ground.
While thus they strive, Tlepolemus the great,
Urg'd by the force of unresisted fate,
Burns with desire Sarpedon's strength to prove;
Alcides' offspring meets the son of Jove.
Sheath'd in bright arms each adverse chief came on,
Jove's great descendant, and his greater son.
Prepar'd for combat ere the lance he toss'd,
The daring Rhodian vents his haughty boast:
"What brings this Lycian counsellor so far,
To tremble at our arms, not mix in war?
Know thy vain self; nor let thy flattery move,
Who style thee son of cloud-compelling Jove.
How far unlike those chiefs of race divine,
How vast the difference of their deeds and thine!
Jove got such heroes as my sire, whose soul
No fear could daunt, nor Earth nor Hell control.
Troy felt his arm, and yon proud ramparts stand
Rais'd on the ruins of his vengeful hand:
With six small ships, and but a slender train,
He left the town a wide-deserted plain.
But what art thou? who deedless look'st around,
While unreveng'd thy Lycians bite the ground:
Small aid to Troy thy feeble force can be;
But, wert thou greater, thou must yield to me.
Pierc'd by my spear, to endless darkness go!
I make this present to the shades below."

The son of Hercules, the Rhodian guide,
Thus haughty spoke. The Lycian king reply'd:
"Thy sire, O prince! o'erturn'd the Trojan state,
Whose perjur'd monarch well deserv'd his fate;
Those heavenly steeds the hero sought so far,
False he detain'd, the just reward of war.
Nor so content, the generous chief defy'd,
With base reproaches and unmanly pride.
But you, unworthy the high race you boast,
Shall raise my glory when thy own is lost:
Now meet thy fate, and, by Sarpedon slain,
Add one more ghost to Pluto's gloomy reign."

He said: both javelins at an instant flew;
Both struck; both wounded; but Sarpedon's slew:
Full in the boaster's neck the weapon stood.
Transfix'd his throat, and drank the vital blood;
The soul disdainful seeks the caves of night,
And his seal'd eyes for ever lose the light.

Yet not in vain, Tlepolemus, was thrown
Thy angry lance; which, piercing to the bone
Sarpedon's thigh, had robb'd the chief of breath;
But Jove was present, and forbade the death.

Came from the conflict by the Lycian throng,
The wounded hero dragg'd the lance along.
(His friends, each busied in his several part,
Through haste, or danger, had not drawn the dart.)
The Greeks with slain Tlepolemus retir'd ;
Whose fall Ulysses view'd, with fury fir'd ;
Doubtful if Jove's great son he should pursue,
Or pour his vengeance on the Lycian crew.
But Heaven and Fate the first design withstand,
Nor this great death must grace Ulysses' hand.
Minerva drives him on the Lycian train ;
Alastor, Cromius, Halius, strow'd the plain,
Alcander, Prytanis, Noëmon fell :
And numbers more his sword had sent to Hell,
But Hector saw ; and, furious at the sight,
Rush'd terrible amidst the ranks of fight.
With joy Sarpedon view'd the wish'd relief,
And, faint, lamenting, thus implor'd the chief :

" Oh suffer not the foe to bear away
My helpless corpse, an unassisted prey ;
If I, unblest, must see my son no more,
My much-lov'd consort, and my native shore,
Yet let me die in Ilion's sacred wall ;
Troy, in whose cause I fell, shall mourn my fall."

He said, nor Hector to the chief replies,
But shakes his plume, and fierce to combat flies ;
Swift as a whirlwind, drives the scattering foes ;
And dyes the ground with purple as he goes.

Beneath a beech, Jove's consecrated shade,
His mournful friends divine Sarpedon laid :
Brave Pelagon, his favourite chief, was nigh,
Who wrench'd the javelin from his sinewy thigh.
The fainting soul stood ready wing'd for flight,
And o'er his eye-balls swam the shades of night ;
But Boreas rising fresh, with gentler breath,
Recall'd his spirit from the gates of death.

The generous Greeks recede with tardy pace,
Though Mars and Hector thunder in their face ;
None turn their backs to mean ignoble flight,
Slow they retreat, and ev'n retreating fight.
Who first, who last, by Mars and Hector's hand
Stretch'd in their blood, lay gasping on the sand ?
Teuthras the great, Orestes the renown'd
For manag'd steeds, and Trechus press'd the ground :
Next Enomaus, and Enops' offspring dy'd ;
Orebius last fell groaning at their side ;
Orebius, in his painted mitre gay,
In fat Bœotia held his wealthy sway,
Where lakes surround low Hyle's watery plain :
A prince and people studious of their gain.

The carnage Juno from the skies survey'd,
And, touch'd with grief, bespoke the blue ey'd maid.
" Oh sight accur'd ! shall faithless Troy prevail,
And shall our promise to our people fail ?
How vain the word to Menelaus given
By Jove's great daughter and the queen of Heaven,
Beneath his arms that Priam's towers should fall ;
If warning gods for ever guard the wall !

Mars, red with slaughter, aids our hated foes :
Haste, let us arm, and force with force oppose !"

She spoke ; Minerva burns to meet the war :
And now Heaven's empress calls her blazing car.
At her command rush forth the steeds divine ;
Rich with immortal gold their trappings shine.
Rich with immortal gold their trappings shine.
Bright Hebe waits ; by Hebe, ever young,
The whirling wheels are to the chariot hung.
On the bright axle turns the bidden wheel
Of sounding brass ; the polish'd axle steel.
Eight brazen spokes in radiant order flame ;
The circles gold, of uncorrupted frame,

Such as the Heavens produce : and round the gold
Two brazen rings of work divine were roll'd.
The bossy naves of solid silver shone ;
Braces of gold suspend the moving throne :
The car, behind, an arching figure bore ;
The bending concave form'd an arch before.
Silver the beam, th' extended yoke was gold,
And golden reins th' immortal coursers hold.
Herself, impatient, to the ready car
The coursers joins, and breathes revenge and war.

Pallas disrobes ; her radiant veil unty'd,
With flowers adorn'd, with art diversity'd,
(The labour'd veil her heavenly fingers wove)
Flows on the pavement of the court of Jove.
Now Heaven's dread arms her mighty limbs invest,
Jove's cuirass blazes on her ample breast ;
Deck'd in sad triumph for the mournful field,
O'er her broad shoulders hangs his horrid shield,
Dire, black, tremendous ! Round the margin roll'd,
A fringe of serpents hissing guards the gold :
Here all the terrors of grim war appear,
Here rages force, here tremble flight and fear,
Here storm'd contention, and here fury frown'd,
And the dire orb portentous Gorgon crown'd.

The massy golden helm she next assumes,
That dreadful nod, with four o'ershading plumes ;
So vast, the broad circumference contains
A hundred armies on a hundred plains.

The goddess thus the imperial car ascends ;
Shook by her arm the mighty javelin bends,
Ponderous and huge ; that, when her fury burns,
Proud tyrants humbles, and whole hosts o'erturns.
Swift at the scourge th' ethereal coursers fly,
While the smooth chariot cuts the liquid sky.

Heaven's gates spontaneous open to the powers ;
Heaven's golden gates, kept by the winged Hours ;
Commission'd in alternate watch they stand,
The Sun's bright portals and the skies command,
Involve in clouds th' eternal gates of day,
Or the dark barrier roll with ease away.

The sounding hinges ring ; on either side
The gloomy volumes, pierc'd with light, divide.
The chariot mounts, where, deep in ambient skies
Confus'd, Olympus' hundred heads arise :
Where far apart the thunderer fills his throne ;
O'er all the gods superior and alone.

There with her snowy hand the queen restrains
The fiery steeds, and thus to Jove complains :

" O sire ! can no resentment touch thy soul ?
Can Mars rebel, and does no thunder roll ?
What lawless rage on you forbidden plain,
What rash destruction ! and what heroes slain !
Venus, and Phœbus with the dreadful bow,
Smile on the slaughter, and enjoy my woe.
Mnd, furious power ! whose unrelenting mind,
No god can govern, and no justice bind.
Say, mighty father ! shall we scourge his pride,
And drive from fight th' impetuous homicide ?"

To whom assenting, thus the thunderer said :
" Go ! and the great Minerva be thy aid.
To tame the monster-god Minerva knows,
And oft afflicts his brutal breast with woes."

He said ; Saturnia, ardent to obey,
Tast'd her white steeds along th' aerial way.
Swift down the steep of Heaven the chariot rolls,
Between th' expanded Earth and starry poles.
Far as a shepherd, from some point on high,
O'er the wide main extends his boundless eye ;
Through such a space of air, with thundering sound,
At every leap th' immortal coursers bound :

Troy now they reach'd, and touch'd those banks
Where silver Simois and Scamander join. [divine
There Juno stopp'd, (and her fair steeds unloos'd)
Of air condens'd a vapour circumfus'd:
For these, impregnate with celestial dew
On Simois' brink ambrosia' herbage grew.
Thence to relieve the fainting Argive throng,
Smooth as the sailing doves, they glide along.

The best and bravest of the Grecian band
(A warlike circle) round Tydides stand:
Such was their look as lions bath'd in blood,
Or foaming boars, the terrour of the wood.
Heaven's empress mingles with the mortal crowd,
And shouts, in Stentor's sounding voice, aloud:
Stentor the strong, endued with brazen lungs,
Whose throat surpass'd the force of fifty tongues.

"Inglorious Argives! to your race a shame,
And only men in figure and in name!
Once from the walls your timorous foes engag'd,
While fierce in war divine Achilles rag'd;
Now issuing fearless they possess the plain,
Now win the shores, and scarce the seas remain."

Her speech new fury to their hearts convey'd;
While near Tydides stood th' Athenian maid;
The king beside his panting steeds she found,
O'erspent with toil, reposing on the ground:
To cool his glowing wound he sat apart
(The wound inflicted by the Lycian dart);
Large drops of sweat from all his limbs descend;
Beneath his ponderous shield his sinews bend,
Whose ample belt, that o'er his shoulders lay,
He eas'd, and wash'd the clotted gore away.
The goddess leaning o'er the bending yoke,
Beside his coursers, thus her silence broke:

"Degenerate prince! and not of Tydeus' kind,
Whose little body lodg'd a mighty mind;
Foremost he press'd in glorious toils to share,
And scarce refrain'd when I forbade the war.
Alone, unguarded, once he dar'd to go
And feast, encircled by the Theban foe;
There brav'd, and vanquish'd, many a hardy knight;
Such nerves I gave him, and such force in fight.
Thou too no less hast been my constant care;
Thy hands I arm'd, and sent thee forth to war:
But thee or fear deters, or sloth detains;
No drop of all thy father warms thy veins."

The chief thus answer'd mild: "Immortal maid!
I own thy presence, and confess thy aid. [plains,
Not fear, thou know'st, withholds me from the
Nor sloth hath seiz'd me, but thy word restrains:
From warring gods thou bad'st me turn my spear,
And Venus only found resistance here.
Hence, goddess! heedful of thy high commands,
Loth I gave way, and warn'd our Argive bands:
For Mars, the homicide, these eyes beheld,
With slaughter red, and raging round the field."
Then thus Minerva. "Brave Tydides, hear!
Not Mars himself, nor aught immortal, fear.
Full on the god impel thy foaming horse:
Pallas commands, and Pallas lends thee force.
Rash, furious, blind, from these to those he flies,
And every side of wavering combat tries; [made;
Large promise makes, and breaks the promise
Now gives the Grecians, now the Trojans aid."

She said, and to the steeds approaching near,
Drew from his seat the martial chariotceer,
The vigorous power the trembling car ascends,
Fierce for revenge, and Diomed attends.
The groaning axle bent beneath the load;
So great a hero, and so great a God.

She snatch'd the reins, she lash'd with all her force;
And full on Mars impell'd the foaming horse:
But first, to hide her heavenly visage spread,
Black Orcus' helmet o'er her radiant head.

Just then gigantic Periphas lay slain,
The strongest warrior of th' Aetolian train;
The god, who slew him, leaves his prostrate prize
Stretch'd where he fell, and at Tydides flies.
Now, rushing fierce, in equal arms appear,
The daring Greek; the dreadful god of war!
Full at the chief, above his coursers' head,
From Mars's arm th' enormous weapon fled:
Pallas oppos'd her hand, and caus'd to glance,
Far from the car, the strong immortal lance.
Then threw the force of Tydeus' warlike son;
The javelin hiss'd; the goddess urg'd it on:
Where the broad cincture girt his armour round,
It pierc'd the god's groin receiv'd the wound.
From the rent skin the warrior tugs again
The smoking steel. Mars bellows with the pain:
Loud as the roar encountering armies yield,
When shouting millions shake the thundering field.
Both arms start, and trembling gaze around;
And Earth and Heaven rebel to the sound.
As vapours blown by Auster's sultry breath,
Pregnant with plagues, and shelding seeds of death,
Beneath the rage of burning Sirius rise,
Choke the parch'd Earth, and blacken all the skies;
In such a cloud the god from combat driven,
High o'er the dusty whirlwind scales the Heaven.
Wild with his pain, he sought the bright abodes,
There sullen sate beneath the sire of gods,
Show'd the celestial blood, and with a groan
Thus pour'd his plaints before th' immortal throne:

"Can Jove, supine, flagitious facts survey,
And brook the furies of this daring day?
For mortal men celestial powers engage,
And gods on gods exert eternal rage.
From thee, O father! all these ills we bear,
And thy fell daughter with the shield and spear:
Thou gav'st that fury to the realms of light,
Pernicious, wild, regardless of the right.
All Heaven beside reveres thy sovereign sway,
Thy voice we hear, and thy behests obey:
'Tis hers t' offend, and ev'n offending share
Thy breast, thy counsels, thy distinguish'd care:
So boundless she, and thou so partial grown,
Well may we deem the wonderful birth thy own.
Now frantic Diomed, at her command,
Against th' immortals lifts his raging hand:
The heavenly Venus first his fury found,
Me next encountering, me he dar'd to wound;
Vanquish'd I fled: ev'n I the god of fight,
From mortal madness scarce was sav'd by flight.
Else had'st thou seen me sink on yonder plain,
Heap'd round, and heaving under loads of slain!
Or, pierc'd with Grecian darts, for ages lie,
Condemn'd to pain, though fated not to die.

Him thus upbraiding, with a wrathful look
The lord of thunders view'd, and stern bespoke:
"To me, perfidious! this lamenting strain?
Of lawless force shall lawless Mars complain?
Of all the gods who tread the spangled skies,
Thou most unjust, most odious in our eyes!
Inhuman discord is thy dire delight,
The waste of slaughter, and the rage of fight.
No bound, no law, thy fiery temper quells,
And all thy mother in thy soul rebels.
In vain our threats, in vain our power we use;
She gives th' example, and her son pursues.

Yet long th' inflicted pangs thou shalt not mourn,
Sprung since thou art from Jove, and heavenly born.
Else, sing'd with lightning hadst thou hence been thrown,

Where chain'd on burning rocks the Titans groan."

Thus he who shakes Olympus with his nod ;
Then gave to Pæon's care the bleeding god.
With gentle hand the balm he pour'd around,
And heal'd th' immortal flesh, and clos'd the wound.
As when the fig's press'd juice, infus'd in cream,
To curds coagulates the liquid stream,
Sadden the fluids fix, the parts combin'd ;
Such, and so soon, the ethereal texture join'd.
Cleans'd from the dust and gore, fair Hèbè drest
His mighty limbs in an immortal vest.
Glorious he sate, in majesty restor'd,
Fast by the throne of Heaven's superior lord.
Juno and Pallas mount the blest abodes,
Their task perform'd, and mix among the gods,

THE ILIAD,

BOOK VI.

ARGUMENT.

THE EPISODES OF GLAUCUS AND DIOMED, AND OF HECTOR AND ANDROMACHE.

THE gods having left the field, the Grecians prevail. Helenus, the chief augur of Troy, commands Hector to return to the city, in order to appoint a solemn procession of the queen and the Trojan matrons to the temple of Minerva, to entreat her to remove Diomed from the fight. The battle relaxing during the absence of Hector, Glaucus and Diomed have an interview between the two armies; where coming to the knowledge of the friendship and hospitality past between their ancestors, they make exchange of their arms. Hector, having performed the orders of Helenus, prevails upon Paris to return to the battle; and, taking a tender leave of his wife Andromache, hastens again to the field.

The scene is first in the field of battle, between the river Simois and Scamander, and then changes to Troy.

Now Heaven forsakes the fight: th' immortals
To human force and human skill, the field: [yield,
Dark showers of javelins fly from foes to foes;
Now here, now there, the tide of combat flows;
While Troy's fam'd streams¹, that bound the death-
On either side run purple to the main. [ful plain,
Great Ajax first to conquest led the way,
Broke the thick ranks, and turn'd the doubtful day.
The Thracian Acamas his falchion found,
And hew'd th' enormous giant to the ground;
His thundering arm a deadly stroke imprest
Where the black horse-hair nodded o'er his crest:

Scamander and Simois,

Fix'd in his front the brazen weapon lies,
And seals in endless shades his swimming eyes.
Next Teuthras' son disdain'd the sands with blood,
Axylus, hospitable, rich and good:
In fair Arisbe's walls (his native place)
He held his seat: a friend to human race.
Fast by the road, his ever open door
Oblig'd the wealthy, and reliev'd the poor.
To stern Tydides now he falls a prey,
No friend to guard him in the dreadful day!
Breathless the good man fell, and by his side
His faithful servant, old Calesius, dy'd.

By great Euryalus was Dresus slain,
And next he laid Opheltius on the plain.
Two twins were near, bold, beautiful, and young,
From a fair Naiad and Bucolion sprung:
(Laomedon's white flocks Bucolion fed,
That monarch's first-born by a foreign bed;
In secret woods he won the Naiad's grace,
And two fair infants crown'd his strong embrace.)
Here dead they lay in all their youthful charms;
The ruthless victor stripp'd their shining arms.

Astyalus by Polyestes fell
Ulysses' spear Pydytes sent to Hell;
By Teucer's shaft brave Aretaon bled,
And Nestor's son laid stern Alerus dead;
Great Agamemnon, leader of the brave,
The mortal wound of rich Elatus gave,
Who held in Pedasus his woud abode,
And till'd the banks where silver Satio flow'd.
Melanthius by Eurypylus was slain;
And Phylacus from Leitus flies in vain.

Unblest Astratus next at mercy lies
Beneath the Spartan spear, a living prize.
Scar'd with the din and tumult of the fight,
His headlong steeds, precipitate in flight,
Rush'd on a tamarisk's strong trunk, and broke
The shatter'd chariot from the crooked yoke;
Wide o'er the field, resistless as the wind,
For Troy they fly, and leave their lord behind.
Pronc on his face he sinks beside the wheel:
Atrides o'er him shakes his vengeful steel;
The fallen chief in suppliant posture press'd
The victor's knees, and thus his prayer address'd:
"Oh, spare my youth! and for the life I owe
Large gifts of price my father shall bestow.
When fame shall tell, that, not in battle slain,
Thy hollow ships his captive son detain;
Rich heaps of brass shall in thy tent be told,
And steel well temper'd, and persuasive gold."

He said: compassion touch'd the hero's heart;
He stood, suspended, with the lifted dart;
As pity pleaded for his vanquish'd prize,
Stern Agamemnon swift to vengeance flies,
And furious thus: "Oh impotent of mind!
Shall these, shall these Atrides' mercy find?
Well hast thou known proud Troy's perfidious land,
And well her natives merit at thy hand!
Not one of all the race, nor sex, nor age,
Shall save a Trojan from our boundless rage:
Iliou shall perish whole, and bury all;
Her babes, her infants at the breast, shall fall.
A dreadful lesson of exampled fate,
To warn the nations, and to curb the great!"

The monarch spoke; the words with warmth ad-
To rigid justice steel'd his brother's breast. [drest,
Fierce from his knees the hapless chief he thrust;
The monarch's javelin stretch'd him in the dust,
Then pressing with his foot his panting heart,
Forth from the slain he tugg'd the recking dart.

Old Nestor saw, and rous'd the warriors' rage!
 "Thus, heroes! thus the vigorous combat wage!
 No son of Mars descend, for servile gains,
 To touch the booty, while a foe remains.
 Behold you glittering host, your future spoil!
 First gain the conquest, then reward the toil."

And now had Greece eternal fame acquir'd,
 And frighten'd Troy within her walls retir'd;
 Had not sage Helenus her state redrest,
 Taught by the gods that mov'd his sacred breast.
 Where Hector stood, with great Æneas join'd,
 The seer reveal'd the counsels of his mind:

"Ye generous chiefs! on whom th' immortals
 The cares and glories of this doubtful day; [lay
 On whom your aids, your country's hopes depend;
 Wise to consult, and active to defend!
 Here, at our gates, your brave efforts unite,
 Turn back the routed, and forbid the flight;
 Ere yet their wives' soft arms the cowards gain,
 The sport and insult of the hostile train.
 When your commands have harden'd every band,
 Ourselves, here fix'd, will make the dangerous stand;
 Prest as we are, and sore of former fight,
 These straits demand our last remains of might.
 Meanwhile, thou Hector to the town retire,
 And teach our mother what the gods require:
 Direct the queen to lead th' assembled train
 Of Troy's chief matrons to Minerva's fane;
 Unbar the sacred gates, and seek the power
 With offer'd vows, in Iliion's topmost tower.
 The largest mantle her rich wardrobes hold,
 Most priz'd for art, and labour'd o'er with gold,
 Before the goddess' honour'd knees be spread;
 And twelve young heifers to her altar led:
 If so the power, aton'd by fervent prayer,
 Our wives, our infants, and our city spare,
 And far avert Tydides' wasteful ire,
 That mows whole troops, and makes all Troy retire.
 Not thus Achilles taught our host to dread,
 Sprung though he was from more than mortal bed;
 Not thus resistless rul'd the stream of fight,
 In rage unbounded, and unmatch'd in might."

Hector obey'd heard; and with a bound,
 Leap'd from his trembling chariot to the ground;
 Through all his host, inspiring force, he flies,
 And bids the thunder of the battle rise.
 With rage recruited the bold Trojans glow,
 And turn the tide of conflict on the foe:
 Fierce in the front he shakes two dazzling spears:
 All Greece recedes, and 'midst her triumphs fears;
 Some god, they thought, who rul'd the fate of wars,
 Shot down avenging, from the vault of stars.

Then thus, aloud: "Ye dauntless Dardans, hear!
 And you whom distant nations send to war!
 Be mindful of the strength your fathers bore;
 Be still yourselves, and Hector asks no more.
 One hour demands me in the Trojan wall,
 To bid our altars flame, and victims fall:
 Nor shall, I trust, the matrons' holy train
 And reverend elders seek the gods in vain."

This said, with ample strides the hero past;
 The shield's large orb behind his shoulder cast,
 His neck o'er shading, to his ancle hung;
 And as he march'd, the brazen buckler rung.

Now paus'd the battle (god-like Hector gone)
 When daring Glaucus and great Tydeus' son
 Between both armies met: the chiefs from far
 Observ'd each other, and had mark'd for war.
 Near as they drew, Tydides thus began:

"What art thou, boldest of the race of man?"

Our eyes, till now, that aspect ne'er beheld,
 Where fame is reap'd amid th' embattled field;
 Yet far before the troops thou dar'st appear,
 And meet a lance the fiercest heroes fear.
 Unhappy they, and born of luckless sires,
 Who tempt our fury when Minerva fires!
 But if from Heaven, celestial, thou descend;
 Know, with immortals we no more contend.
 Not long Lycurgus view'd the golden light,
 That daring man who mix'd with gods in fight.
 Bacchus, and Bacchus' votaries, he drove,
 With brandish'd steel, from Nyssa's sacred grove:
 Their consecrated spears lay scatter'd round,
 With curling vines and twisted ivy bound;
 While Bacchus headlong sought the briny flood,
 And Thetis' arm receiv'd the trembling god.
 Nor fail'd the crime th' immortals' wrath to move,
 (Th' immortals blest with endless ease above)
 Depriv'd of sight by their avenging doom,
 Cheerless he breath'd, and wander'd in the gloom:
 Then sunk unpy'd to the dire abodes,
 A wretch accurat, and hated by the gods!
 I brave not Heaven: but if the fruits of Earth
 Sustain thy life, and human be thy birth;
 Bold as thou art, too prodigal of breath,
 Approach, and enter the dark gates of Death."

"What, or from whence I am, or who my sire," (Reply'd the chief) "can Tydeus' son inquire?
 Like leaves on trees the race of man is found,
 Now green in youth, now withering on the ground;
 Another race the following spring supplies;
 They fall successive, and successive rise:
 So generations in their course decay;
 So flourish these, when those are past away.
 But if thou still persist to search my birth,
 Then hear a tale that fills the spacious Earth."

"A city stands on Argos' utmost bound,
 (Argos the fair, for warlike steeds renown'd)
 Æolian Sisyphus, with wisdom blest,
 In ancient time the happy walls possess,
 Then call'd Ephyre: Glaucus was his son;
 Great Glaucus, father of Bellerophon,
 Who o'er the sons of men in beauty shin'd,
 Lov'd for that valour which preserves mankind.
 Then mighty Prætus Argos' sceptres sway'd,
 Whose hard command Bellerophon obey'd.
 With direful jealousy the monarch rag'd,
 And the brave prince in numerous toils engag'd.
 For him Antæa burn'd with lawless flame,
 And strove to tempt him from the paths of fame:
 In vain she tempted the relentless youth,
 Endued with wisdom, sacred fear, and truth.
 Fir'd at his scorn the queen to Prætus fled,
 And begg'd revenge for her insulted bed.
 Incens'd he heard, resolving on his fate;
 But hospitable laws restrain'd his hate:
 To Lycia the devoted youth he sent,
 With tablets seal'd, that told his dire intent.
 Now, blest by every power who guards the good,
 The chief arriv'd at Xanthus' silver flood:
 There Lycia's monarch paid him honours due,
 Nine days he feasted, and nine bulls he slew.
 But when the tenth bright morning orient glow'd,
 The faithful youth his monarch's mandate show'd:
 The fatal tablets, till that instant seal'd,
 The deathful secret to the king reveal'd:
 First, dire Chimæra's conquest was enjoin'd,
 A mingled monster, of no mortal kind;
 Behind a dragon's fiery tail was spread;
 A goat's rough body bore a lion's head;

Her pitchy nostrils flaky flames expire ;

Her gaping throat emits infernal fire.

" This jest he slaughter'd (for he read the skies,
And trusted Heaven's informing prodigies)

Then met in arms the Solymæan crew,
(Fiercest of men) and those the warrior slew,
Next the bold Amazon's whole force defy'd ;
And conquer'd still, for Heaven was on his side.

" Nor ended here his toils : his Lycian foes,
At his return, a treacherous ambush rose,
With levell'd spears along the winding shore ;
There fell they breathless, and return'd no more.

" At length the monarch with repentant grief
Confess'd the gods, and god-descended chief ;
His daughter gave, the stranger to detain,
With half the honours of his ample reign :
The Lycians grant a chosen space ground,
With woods, with vineyards, and with harvests
crown'd,

There long the chief his happy lot possess'd,
With two brave sons and one fair daughter bless'd ;
(Fair even in heavenly eyes ; her fruitful love
Crown'd with Sarpedon's birth th' embrace of Jove)

But when at last, distracted in his mind,
Forsok by Heaven, forsaking human kind,
Wife o'er th' Aleian field he chose to stray,
A long, forlorn, uncomfortable way !

Woes heap'd on woes consum'd his wasted heart ;
His beauteous daughter fell by Phœbe's dart ;
His eldest-born by raging Mars was slain,
In combat on the Solymæan plain.

Hippolochus surviv'd ; from him I came,
The honour'd author of my birth and name ;
By his decree I sought the Trojan town,
By his instructions learn to win renown,
To stand the first in worth as in command,
To add new honours to my native land,
Before my eyes my mighty sires to place,
And emulate the glories of our race "

He spoke, and transport fill'd Tydides' heart ;
In earth the generous warrior fix'd his dart,
Then friendly, thus, the Lycian prince address :

" Welcome, my brave hereditary guest !
Thus ever let us meet, with kind embrace,
Nor stain the sacred friendship of our race.
Know, chief, our grandsires have been guests of old ;
Æneus the strong, Bellerophon the bold :

Our ancient seat his honour'd presence grac'd,
Where twenty days in genial rites he pass'd.

The parting heroes mutual presents left ;
A golden goblet was thy grandsire's gift ;

Æneus a belt of matchless work bestow'd,
That rich with Tyrian dye refulgent glow'd.

" This from his pledge I learn'd, which, safely
stor'd

Among my treasures, still adorns my board :
(For Tydeus left me young, when Thebæ's wall Beheld the sons of Greece untimely fall.)

Mindful of this, in friendship let us join ;
If Heaven our steps to foreign lands incline,
My guest in Argos thou, and I in Lycia thine.

Enough of Trojans to this lance shall yield,
In the full harvest of yon ample field,
Enough of Greeks shall die thy spear with gore ;
But thou and Diomed be foes no more.

Now change we arms, and prove to either host,
We guard the friendship of the line we boast."

Thus having said, the gallant chiefs alight,
Their hands they join, their mutual faith they plight ;

Brave Glaucus then each narrow thought resign'd^d
(Jove warm'd his bosom and enlarg'd his mind :)

For Diomed's brass arms, of mean device,
For which nine oxen paid, (a vulgar price)
He gave his own, of gold divinely wrought,
A hundred beaves the shining purchase bought.

Meantime the guardian of the Trojan state,
Great Hector, entered at the Scæan gate,
Beneath the beech-tree's consecrated shades,
The Trojan matrons and the Trojan maids

Around him flock'd, all press'd with pious care
For husbands, brothers, sons, engag'd in war.
He bids the train in long succession go,
And seek the gods t' avert th' impending woe.

And now to Priam's stately courts he came,
Rais'd on arch'd columns of stupendous frame ;
O'er these a range of marble structure runs,
The rich pavilions of his fifty sons,

In fifty chambers lodg'd : and rooms of state
Oppos'd to those, where Priam's daughters sate
Twelve domes for them and their lov'd spouses
Of equal beauty, and of polish'd stone. [shone,

Hither great Hector pass'd, nor pass'd unseem
Of royal Hecuba, his mother queen
(With her Laodice, whose beauteous face
Surpass'd the nymphs of Troy's illustrious race) :

Long in a strict embrace she held her son,
And press'd his hand, and tender thus begun :

" O Hector ! say, what great occasion calls
My son from fight, when Greece surrounds our walls ?

Com'st thou to supplicate th' almighty power,
With lifted hands from Ilion's lofty tower ?
Stay, till I bring the cup with Bacchus crown'd,
In Jove's high name, to sprinkle on the ground,
And pay due vows to all the gods around.

Then with a plenteous draught refresh thy soul,
And draw new spirits from the generous bowl ;
Spent as thou art with long laborious fight,
The brave defender of thy country's right."

" Far hence be Bacchus' gifts," the chief rejoind'd :

" Inflaming wine, pernicious to mankind,
Unnerves the limbs, and dulls the noble mind.
Let chiefs abstain, and spare the sacred juice
To sprinkle to the gods, its better use.

" By me that holy office were profan'd ;
Ill fits it me, with human gore distain'd,

To the pure skies these horrid hands to raise,
Or offer Heaven's great sire polluted praise.

You with your matrons, go ! a spotless train,
And burn rich odours in Minerva's fane.

The largest mantle your full wardrobes hold,
Most priz'd for art, and labour'd o'er with gold,

Before the goddess' honour'd knees be spread,
And twelve young heifers to her altar led.

So may the power, aton'd by fervent prayer,
Our wives, our infants, and our city, spare,
And far avert Tydides' wasteful ire,

Who mows whole troops, and makes all Troy retire.
Be this, O mother ! your religious care ;

I go to rouse soft Paris to the war ;
If yet, not lost to all the sense of shame,

The recreant warrior hear the voice of fame.
Oh would kind Earth the hateful wretch embrace,

That pest of Troy, that ruin of our race !
Deep to the dark abyss might he descend,

Troy yet should flourish, and my sorrows end."

This heard, she gave command ; and summon'd came

Each noble matron and illustrious dame.

The Phrygian queen to her rich wardrobe went,
 Where treasur'd odours breath'd a costly scent.
 There lay the vestures of no vulgar art,
 Sidonian maids embroider'd every part,
 Whom from soft Sidon youthful Paris bore,
 With Helen touching on the Tyrian shore.
 Here as the queen revolv'd, with careful eyes,
 The various textures and the various dyes,
 She chose a veil that shone superior far,
 And glow'd refulgent as the morning star.
 Herself with this the long procession leads;
 The train majestically slow proceeds.
 Soon as to Ilion's topmost tower they come,
 And awful reach the high Palladian dome,
 Antenor's consort, fair Theano, waits
 As Pallas' priestess, and unbars the gates,
 With hands uplifted and imploring eyes,
 They fill the dome with supplicating cries.
 The priestess then the shining veil displays,
 Plac'd on Minerva's knees, and thus she prays:
 "Oh, awful goddess! ever-dreadful maid,
 Troy's strong defence, unconquer'd Pallas, aid!
 Break thou Tydides' spear, and let him fall
 Prone on the dust before the Trojan wall,
 So twelve young helpers, guiltless of the yoke,
 Shall fill thy temple with a grateful smoke.
 But thou aton'd by penitence and prayer,
 Ourselves, our infants, and our city, spare!"
 So pray'd the priestess in her holy fane;
 So vow'd the matrons, but they vow'd in vain.

While these appear before the power with prayers,
 Hector to Paris' lofty dome repairs.
 Himself the mansion rais'd, from every part
 Assembling architects of matchless art.
 Near Priam's court and Hector's palace stands
 The pompous structure, and the town commands.
 A spear the hero bore of wondrous strength,
 Of full ten cubits was the lance's length,
 The steely point with golden ringlets join'd,
 Before him brandish'd, at each motion shin'd.
 Thus entering, in the glittering rooms he found
 His brother-chief, whose useless arms lay round,
 His eyes delighting with the splendid show,
 Brightening the shield, and polishing the bow.
 Beside him Helen with her virgins stands,
 Guides their rich labours, and instructs their hands.

Nim thus unactive, with an ardent look
 The prince beheld, and high resenting spoke:
 "Thy hate to Troy, is this the time to show?
 (O wretch ill-fated, and thy country's foe!)
 Paris and Greece against us, both conspire;
 Thy close resentment, and their vengeful ire.
 For thee great Ilion's guardian heroes fall,
 Till heaps of dead alone defend her wall;
 For thee the soldier bleeds, the matron mourns,
 And wasteful war in all its fury burns.
 Ungrateful man! deserves not this thy care,
 Our troops to hearten, and our toils to share?"
 "Rise, or behold the conquering flames ascend,
 And all the Phrygian glories at an end."
 "Brother, 'tis just," reply'd the beauteous youth,
 "Thy free remonstrance proves thy worth and
 truth:
 Yet charge my absence less, oh generous chief!
 On hate to Troy, than conscious shame and grief:
 Here, hid from human eyes, thy brother sate,
 And mourn'd, in secret, his and Ilion's fate.
 'Tis now enough: now glory spreads her charms,
 And beauteous Helen calls her chief to arms.

Conquest to day my happier sword may bless,
 'Tis man's to fight, but Heaven's to give success.
 But while I arm, contain thy ardent mind;
 Or go, and Paris shall not lag behind."
 He said, nor answer'd Priam's warlike son;
 When Helen thus with lowly grace begun:
 "O generous brother! if the guilty dame,
 That caus'd these woes, deserves a sister's name!
 Would Heaven, ere all these dreadful deeds were
 The day, that show'd me to the golden Sun, (done,
 Had seen my death! Why did not whirlwinds bear
 The fatal infant to the fowls of air?
 Why sunk I not beneath the whelming tide,
 And 'midst the roarings of the waters died?
 Heaven fill'd up all my ills, and I accurst
 Bore all, and Paris of those ills the worst.
 Helen at least a braver spouse might claim,
 Warm'd with some virtue, some regard of fame?
 Now, tir'd with toils, thy fainting limbs recline,
 With toils, sustain'd for Paris' sake and mine:
 The gods have link'd our miserable doom,
 Our present woe, and infamy to come:
 Wide shall it spread, and last through ages long!
 Example sad! and theme of future song."
 The chief reply'd: "This time forbids to rest:
 The Trojan bands, by hostile fury prest,
 Demand their Hector, and his arm require;
 The combat urges, and my soul's on fire.
 Urge thou thy knight to march where glory calls,
 And timely join me, ere I leave the walls.
 Ere yet I mingle in the direful fray,
 My wife, my infant, claim a moment's stay;
 This day (perhaps the last that sees me here)
 Demands a parting word, a tender tear:
 This day, some god, who hates our Trojan land,
 May vanquish Hector by a Grecian hand."
 He said, and pass'd, with sad presaging heart,
 To seek his spouse, his soul's far dearer part;
 At home he sought her, but he sought in vain:
 She, with one maid of all her menial train,
 Had thence retir'd; and with her second joy,
 The young Astyanax, the hope of Troy,
 Pensive she stood on Ilion's towery height,
 Beheld the war, and sicken'd at the sight;
 There her sad eyes in vain her lord explore,
 Or weep the wounds her bleeding country bore.

But he who found not whom his soul desir'd,
 Whose virtue charm'd him as her beauty fir'd,
 Stood in the gates, and ask'd what way she bent
 Her parting step? If to the fane she went,
 Where late the mourning matrons made resort;
 Or sought her sisters in the Trojan court?
 "Not to the court," reply'd the attendant train,
 "Nor mix'd with matrons to Minerva's fane:
 To Ilion's steepy tower she bent her way,
 To mark the fortunes of the doubtful day.
 Troy fled, she heard, before the Grecian sword;
 She heard, and trembled for her absent lord:
 Distracted with surprise, she seem'd to fly,
 Fear on her cheek, and sorrow in her eye.
 The nurse attended with her infant boy,
 The young Astyanax, the hope of Troy."
 Hector, this heard, return'd without delay;
 Swift through the town he trod his former way,
 Through streets of palaces, and walks of state;
 And met the mourner at the Scean gate.
 With haste to meet him sprung the joyful pair,
 His blameless wife, Aëtion's wealthy heir;
 (Cilician Thebè great Aëtion sway'd,
 And Hippoplacus' wide-extended shade)

The nurse stood near, in whose embraces prest
 His paly hope hung smiling at his breast,
 When each soft charm and early grace adorn,
 Fair as the new-born star that gilds the morn.
 To this lov'd infant Hector gave the name
 Scamandrius, from Scamander's honour'd stream;
 Aryanax the Trojans call'd the boy,
 From his great father, the defence of Troy.
 Silent the warrior smil'd, and pleas'd resign'd
 To tender passions all his mighty mind:
 His beauteous princess cast a mournful look,
 Hung on his hand, and then dejected spoke;
 Her bosom labour'd with a boding sigh,
 And the big tear stood trembling in her eye.
 "Too daring prince! ah, whither dost thou run?
 Ah, too forgetful of thy wife and son!
 And think'st thou not how wretched we shall be,
 A widow I, an helpless orphan he!
 For sure such courage length of life denies;
 And thou must fall, thy virtue's sacrifice
 Greece in her single heroes strove in vain;
 Now hosts oppose thee, and thou must be slain!
 Oh, grant me, gods! ere Hector meets his doom,
 All I can ask of Heaven, an early tomb!
 So shall my days in one sad tenour run,
 And end with sorrows, as they first begun.
 No parent now remains my griefs to share,
 No father's aid, no mother's tender care.
 The fierce Achilles wrapt our walls in fire!
 Laid Thebè waste, and slew my warlike sire!
 His fate compassion in the victor bred;
 Born as he was, he yet rever'd the dead;
 His radiant arms preserv'd from hostile spoil,
 And laid him decent on the funeral pile;
 Then rais'd a mountain where his bones were burn'd:
 The mountain nymphs the rural tomb adorn'd,
 Jove's sylvan daughters bade their elms bestow
 A barren shade, and in his honour grow.
 "By the same arm may seven brave brothers fell;
 In one sad day beheld the gates of Hell:
 While the fat herds and snowy flocks they fed;
 Amid their fields the hapless heroes bled!
 My mother liv'd to bear the victor's bands,
 The queen of Hyppopaciæ's sylvan lands:
 Redeem'd too late, she scarce beheld again
 Her pleasing empire and her native plain,
 When ah! oppress'd by life-consuming woe,
 She fell a victim to Diana's bow!"
 "Yet, while my Hector still survives, I see
 My father, mother, brethren, all, in thee:
 Alas! my parents, brothers, kindred, all
 Once more will perish, if my Hector fall,
 Thy wife, thy infant, in thy danger share:
 Oh prove a husband's and a father's care!
 That quarter most the skilful Greeks annoy,
 Where you wild fig-trees join the wall of Troy:
 Thou from this tower defend th' important post;
 There Agamemnon points his dreadful host,
 That pam Tydides, Ajax, strive to gain,
 And there the vengeful Spartan fires his train,
 Thrice our bold foes the fierce attack have given,
 Or led by hopes, or dictat'd from Heaven.
 Let others in the field their arms employ,
 But stay my Hector here, and guard his Troy."
 The chief reply'd: "that post shall be my care,
 Not that alone, but all the works of war.
 How would the sons of Troy, in arms renown'd,
 And Troy's proud dames, whose garments sweep
 the ground,

Attain the lustre of my former name,
 Should Hector basely quit the field of fame?
 My early youth was bred to martial pains;
 My soul impels me to th' embattled plains:
 Let me be foremost to defend the throne,
 And guard my father's glories, and my own.
 "Yet come it will, the day decreed by fates:
 (How my heart trembles while my tongue relates!)
 The day when thou, imperial Troy! must bend,
 And see thy warriors fall, thy glories end.
 And yet no dire presage so wounds my mind,
 My mother's death, the ruin of my kind,
 Not Priam's hoary hairs defil'd with gore,
 Not all my brothers gasping on the shore;
 As thine, Andromache! thy griefs I dread;
 I see thee trembling, weeping, captive led!
 In Argive looms our battles to design,
 And woes, of which so large a part was thine!
 To bear the victor's hard commands, or bring
 The weight of waters from Hyperia's spring.
 There, while you groan beneath the load of life,
 They cry, 'Behold the mighty Hector's wife!
 Some haughty Greek, who lives thy tears to see,
 Embitters all thy woes, by naming me.
 The thoughts of glory past, and present shame,
 A thousand griefs shall waken at the name!
 May I lie cold before that dreadful day,
 Press'd with a load of monumental clay!
 Thy Hector, wrapt in everlasting sleep,
 Shall neither hear thee sigh, nor see thee weep."
 Thus having spoke, th' illustrious chief of Troy
 Stretch'd his fond arms to clasp the lovely boy.
 The babe clung crying to his nurse's breast,
 Scar'd at the dazzling helm, and nodding crest.
 With secret pleasure each fond parent smil'd,
 And Hector hasten'd to relieve his child,
 The glittering terrors from his brows unbound,
 And plac'd the beaming helmet on the ground.
 Then kiss'd the child, and, lifting high in air,
 Thus to the gods preferr'd a father's prayer:
 "O thou! whose glory fills th' ethereal throne,
 And all ye deathless powers! protect my son!
 Grant him, like me, to purchase just renown,
 To guard the Trojans, to defend the crown,
 Against his country's foes the war to wage,
 And rise the Hector of the future age!
 So when, triumphant from successful toils
 Of heroes slain, he hears the reeking spoils,
 Whole hosts may hail him with deserv'd acclaim,
 And say, 'This chief transcends his father's fame.'
 While, pleas'd, amidst the general shouts of Troy,
 His mother's conscious heart o'erflows with joy."
 He spoke, and, fondly gazing on her charms,
 Restor'd the pleasing burthen to her arms;
 Soft on her fragrant breast the babe she laid,
 Hush'd to repose, and with a smile survey'd.
 The troubled pleasure soon chasit'd by fear,
 She mingled with a smile a tender tear.
 The soften'd chief with kind compassion view'd,
 And dry'd the falling drops, and thus pursu'd:
 "Andromache! my soul's far better part,
 Why with untimely sorrows heaves thy heart?
 No hostile hand can antedate my doom,
 Till fate condemns me to the silent tomb.
 Fix'd is the term to all the race of Earth;
 And such the hard condition of our birth,
 No force can then resist, no fight can save;
 All sink alike, the fearful and the brave.
 No more—but hasten to thy tasks at home,
 There guide the spindle, and direct the loom;

Me glory summons to the martial scene,
The field of combat is the sphere for men.
Where heroes war, the foremost place I claim,
The first in danger, as the first in fame."

Thus having said, the glorious chief resumes
His towery helmet, black with shading plumes.
His princess parts with a prophetic sigh,
Unwilling parts, and oft reverts her eye,
That stream'd at every look: then, moving slow,
Sought her own palace, and indulg'd her woe.
There, while her tears deplor'd the god-like man,
Through all her train the soft infection ran,
The pious maids their mingled sorrows shed,
And mourn the living Hector, as the dead.

But now, no longer deaf to honour's call,
Forth issues Paris from the palace wall.
In brazen arms that cast a gleamy ray,
Swift thro' the tow the warrior bends his way.
The wanton courser thus, with reins unbound,
Breaks from his stall, and beats the trembling
ground;

Pamper'd and proud, he seeks the wonted tides,
And laves, in height of blood, his shining sides;
His head, now freed, he tosses to the skies;
His mane dishevell'd o'er his shoulders flies,
He snuffs the females in the distant plain,
And springs, exulting, to his fields again.
With equal triumph, sprightly, bold, and gay,
In arms refulgent as the god of day,
The son of Priam, glorying in his might,
Rush'd forth with Hector to the fields of fight.

And now, the warriors passing on the way,
The graceful Paris first excus'd his stay.
To whom the noble Hector thus reply'd:
"O chief! in blood, and now in arms, ally'd!
Thy power in war with justice none contest;
Known is thy courage, and thy strength confess.
What pity sloth should seize a soul so brave,
Or godlike Paris live a woman's slave!
My heart weeps blood at what the Trojans say,
And hopes, thy deeds shall wipe the stain away.
Haste then, in all their glorious labours share;
For much they suffer, for thy sake, in war.
These ills shall cease, whene'er by Jove's decree
We crown the bowl to Heaven and Liberty:
While the proud foe his frustrate triumphs mourns,
And Greece indignant through her seas returns."

THE ILIAD.

BOOK VII.

ARGUMENT.

THE SINGLE COMBAT OF HECTOR AND AJAX.

THE battle renewing with double ardour upon the return of Hector, Minerva is under apprehensions for the Greeks. Apollo, seeing her descend from Olympus, joins her near the Scæan gate, they agree to put off the general engagement for that day, and incite Hector to challenge the Greeks to a single combat. Nine of the princes accepting the challenge, the lot is cast, and falls upon Ajax. These heroes, after several attacks, are parted by the night. The Trojans calling a council, Antenor proposes the delivery of Helen to the Greeks, to which Paris will not consent, but offers to restore them her riches. Priam sends a herald to make this offer, and to demand a truce for burning the dead; and the last of which only is agreed to by Agamemnon. When the funerals are performed, the Greeks, pursuant to the advice of Nestor, erect a fortification to protect their fleet and camp, flanked with towers, and defended by a ditch and palisades. Neptune testifies his jealousy at this work, but is pacified by a promise from Jupiter. Both armies pass the night in feasting, but Jupiter disheartens the Trojans with thunder and other signs of his wrath.

The three and twentieth day ends with the duel of Hector and Ajax: the next day the truce is agreed: another is taken up in the funeral rites of the slain; and one more in building the fortification before the ships. So that somewhat above three days is employed in this book. The scene lies wholly in the field.

So spoke the guardian of the Trojan state,
Then rush'd impetuous through the Scæan gate.
Him Paris follow'd to the dire alarms;
Both breathing slaughter, both resolv'd in arms.
As when to sailors labouring through the main,
That long had heav'd the weary oar in vain,
Jove bids at length th' expected gales arise,
The gales blow grateful, and the vessel flies:
So welcome these to Troy's desiring train;
The bands are cheer'd, the war awakes again.
Bold Paris first the work of death begun
On great Menestheus, Areithous' son:
Sprung from the fair Philomeda's embrace,
The pleasing Arnè was his native place.
Then sunk Eioneus to the shades below,
Beneath his stely casque he felt the blow,
Full on his neck, from Hector's weighty hand;
And roll'd, with limbs relax'd, along the land.
By Glaucus' spear the bold Iphinus bleeds,
Fix'd in the shoulder as he mounts his steeds;
Headlong he tumbles: his slack nerves unbound,
Drop the cold useless members on the ground.

When now Minerva saw her Argives slain,
From vast Olympus to the gleaming plain
Pierce she descends: Apollo mark'd her flight,
Nor shot less swift from Iliou's towery height;
Radiant they met, beneath the breechen shade;
When thus Apollo to the blue-ey'd maid:
"What cause, O daughter of almighty Jove!
Thus wings thy progress from the realms above?
Once more impetuous dost thou bend thy way,
To give to Greece the long-divided day?
Too much has Troy already felt thy hate,
Now breathe thy rage, and hush the stern debate:
This day, the business of the field suspend;
War soon shall kindle, and great Iliou beud:
Since vengeful goddesses confederate join
To rase her walls, though built by hands divine."
To whom the progeny of Jove replies:
"I left, for this, the council of the skies:
But who shall bid conflicting hosts forbear,
What art shall calm the furious sons of war?"
To her the god: "Great Hector's soul incite
To dare the boldest Greek to single fight,

Till Greece, provok'd, from all her numbers show
A warrior worthy to be Hector's foe."

At this agreed, the heavenly powers withdrew ;
Sage Helenus their secret counsels knew :
Hector, inspir'd, he sought : so him address,
Thus told the dictates of his sacred breast :
" O son of Priam ! let thy faithful ear
Receive my words ; thy friend and brother hear !
Go forth persuasive, and a while engage
The warring nations to suspend their rage ;
Then dare the boldest of the hostile train
To mortal combat on the listed plain,
For not this day shall end thy glorious date,
The gods have spoke it, and their voice is fate."
He said : the warrior heard the word with joy ;
Then with his spear restrain'd the youth of Troy,
Held by the mid'st athwart. On either hand
The squadrons part ; th' expecting Trojans stand :
Great Agamemnon bids the Greeks forbear ;
They breathe, and hush the tumult of the war.
Th' Athenian maid and glorious god of day
With silent joy the settling hosts survey :
In form of vultures, on the beech's height
They sit conceal'd, and wait the future fight.

The thronging troops obscure the dusky fields,
Horrid with bristling spears, and gleaming shields.
As when a general darkness veils the main,
(Soft Zephyr curling the wide watery plain)
The waves scarce heave, the face of ocean sleeps,
And a still horror saddens all the deeps :
Thus in thick orders settling wide around,
At length compos'd they sit, and shake the ground.
Great Hector first amidst both armies broke
The solemn silence, and their powers bespoke :

" Hear, all ye Trojans, all ye Grecian bands,
What my soul prompts, and what some god com-
Great Jove, averse our warfare to compose, [mands :
O'erwhelms the nations with new toils and woes ;
War with a fiercer tide once more returns,
Till Ilioa falls, or till yon navy burns.
You then, O princes of the Greeks ! appear ;
Th' Hector speaks, and calls the gods to hear :
From all your troops select the boldest knight,
And him, the boldest, Hector dares to fight.
Here if I fall, by chance of battle slain,
Be his my spoil, and his these arms remain ;
But let my body, to my friends return'd,
By Trojan hands and Trojan flames be burn'd.
And if Apollo, in whose aid I trust,
Shall stretch your daring champion in the dust :
If mine the glory to despoil the foe ;
On Phœbus' temple I'll his arms bestow ;
The breathless carcase to your navy sent,
Greece on the shore shall raise a monument ;
Which when some future mariner surveys,
Wash'd by broad Hellespont's resounding seas,
Thus shall he say, ' A valiant Greek lies there,
' By Hector slain, the mighty man of war.'
The stone shall tell your vanquish'd hero's name,
And distant ages learn the victor's fame."

This fierce defiance Greece astonish'd heard,
Dash'd to refuse, and to accept it fear'd.
Stern Menelaus first the silence broke,
And, inly groaning, thus opprobrious spoke :
" Women of Greece ! Oh scandal of your race,
Whose coward souls your manly form disgrace !
How great the shame, when every age shall know
That not a Grecian met this noble foe !
Go then, resolve to earth, from whence ye grew,
A heartless, spiritless, inglorious crew !

Be what ye seem, unanimated clay !
Myself will dare the danger of the day.
'Tis man's bold task the generous strife to try,
But in the hands of God is victory."

These words scarce spoke, with generous ardour
prest,

His manly limbs in azure arms he drest :
That day, Atrides ! a superior hand
Had stretch'd thee breathless on the hostile strand,
But all at once, thy fury to compose,
The kings of Greece, an awful band, arose :
Ev'n he their chief, great Agamemnon, press'd
Thy daring hand, and this advice address'd :
" Whither, O Menelaüs ! wouldst thou run,
And tempt a fate, which prudence bids thee shun ?
Griev'd though thou art, forbear the rash design ;
Great Hector's arm is mightier far than thine.
Ev'n fierce Achilles learn'd its force to fear,
And trembling met this dreadful son of war.
Sit thou secure amidst thy social band ;
Greece in our cause shall arm some powerful hand,
The mightiest warrior of th' Achaian name,
Though bold, and burning with desire of fame,
Content, the doubtful honour might forego,
So great the danger, and so brave the foe."

He said, and turn'd his brother's vengeful mind ;
He stoop'd to reason, and his rage resign'd,
No longer bent to rush on certain harms ;
His joyful friends unbrace his azure arms

He, from whose lips divine persuasion flows,
Grave Nestor, then, in graceful act arose.
Thus to the kings he spoke : " What grief, what
shame,

Attend on Greece, and all the Grecian name !
How shall, alas ! her hoary heroes mourn
Their sons degenerate, and their race a scorn ?
What tears shall down thy silver beard be roll'd,
Oh Peleus, old in arms, in wisdom old !
Once with what joy the generous prince would hear
Of every chief who fought this glorious war ;
Participate their fame, and pleas'd inquire
Each name, each action, and each hero's sire !
Gods ! should he see our warriors trembling stand,
And trembling all before one hostile hand ;
How would he lift his aged arms on high,
Lament inglorious Greece, and beg to die !
Oh ! would to all th' immortal powers above,
Minerva, Phœbus, and almighty Jove !
Years might again roll back, my youth renew,
And give this arm the spring which once it knew :
When, fierce in war, where Jordan's waters fall
I led my troops to Phea's trembling wall,
And with th' Arcadian spears my prowess try'd,
Where Celadon rolls down his rapid tide.
There Ereuthalion brav'd us in the field,
Proud, Areithous' dreadful arms to wield ;
Great Areithous, known from shore to shore
By the huge, knotted, iron mace he bore ;
No lance he shook, nor bent the twanging bow,
But broke, with this, the battle of the foe.
Him not by manly force Lycurgus slew,
Whose guileful javelin from the thicket flew,
Deep in a winding way his breast assail'd,
Nor aught the warrior's thundering mace avail'd.
Supine he fell : those arms which Mars before
Had given the vanquish'd, now the victor bore :
But when old age had dimm'd Lycurgus' eyes,
To Ereuthalion he consign'd the prize.
Furious with this, he crush'd our level'd bands,
And dar'd the trial of the strongest hands ;

Nor could the strongest hands his fury stay ;
 All saw, and fear'd, his huge tempestuous sway.
 Till I, the youngest of the host appear'd,
 And, youngest, met whom all our army fear'd.
 I fought the chief: my arms Minerva crown'd :
 Prone fell the giant o'er a length of ground.
 What then he was, oh were you, Nestor, now !
 Not Hector's self should want an equal foe.
 But, warriors, you, that youthful vigour boast,
 The flower of Greece, th' examples of our host,
 Sprung from such fathers, who such numbers

sway,
 Can you stand trembling, and desert the day ?"

His warm reproofs the listening kings inflame ;
 And nine, the noblest of the Grecian name,
 Up-started fierce ; but far before the rest
 The king of men advanc'd his dauntless breast :
 Then bold Tydides, great in arms appear'd ;
 And next his bulk gigantic Ajax rear'd ;
 Oileus follow'd ; Idomen was there,
 And Merion dreadful as the god of war :
 With these Eurypylos and Thous stand,
 And wise Ulysses clos'd the daring band.
 All these, alike inspir'd with noble rage,
 Demand the fight. To whom the Pylion sage :

" Least thirst of glory your brave souls divide ;
 What chief shall combat, let the lots decide.
 Whom Heaven shall chuse, be his the chance to raise

His country's fame, his own immortal praise."

The lots produc'd, each hero signs his own ;
 Then in the general's helm the fates are thrown ;
 The people pray, with lifted eyes and hands,
 And vows like these ascend from all the bands :
 " Grant, thou almighty ! in whose hand is fate,
 A worthy champion for the Grecian state,
 This task let Ajax or Tydides prove,
 Or he, the king of kings, below'd by Jove !"

Old Nestor shook the casque. By Heaven inspir'd,
 Leap'd forth the lot, of every Greek desir'd.
 This from the right to left the herald bears,
 Held out in order to the Grecian peers ;
 Each to his rival yields the mark unknown,
 Till godlike Ajax finds the lot his own ;
 Surveys th' inscription with rejoicing eyes,
 Then casts before him, and with transport cries :

" Warriors ! I claim the lot, and arm with joy ;
 Be mine the conquest of this chief of Troy.
 Now, while my brightest arms my limbs invest,
 To Saturn's son be all your vows address :
 But pray in secret, lest the foes should hear,
 And deem your prayers the mean effect of fear.
 Said I in secret ? No, your vows declare,
 In such a voice as fills the Earth and air.
 Lives there a chief whom Ajax ought to dread,
 Ajax in all the toils of battle bred ?
 From warlike Salamis I drew my birth,
 And, born to combats, fear no force on Earth."

He said. The troops, with elevated eyes,
 Implore the god, whose thunder rends the skies :
 " O father of mankind, superior lord !
 On lofty Ida's holy hill ador'd ;
 Who in the highest Heaven has fix'd thy throne,
 Supreme of gods ! unbounded and alone :
 Grant thou, that Telamon may bear away
 The praise and conquest of this doubtful day :
 Or if illustrious Hector be thy care,
 That both may claim it, and that both may share."

Now Ajax brac'd his dazzling armour on ;
 Sheath'd in bright steel the giant-warrior shone :

He moves to combat with majestic pace ;
 So stalks in arms the grizzly god of Thrace,
 When Jove to punish faithless men prepares
 And gives whole nations to the waste of wars.
 Thus march'd the chief, tremendous as a god :
 Grimly he smil'd ; Earth trembled as he strode :
 His massy javelin, quivering in his hand,
 He stood, the bulwark of the Grecian band.
 Through every Argive heart new transport ran ;
 All Troy stood trembling at the mighty man :
 Ev'n Hector paus'd ; and, with new doubt oppress'd,
 Felt his great heart suspended in his breast :
 'Twas vain to seek retreat, and vain to fear ;
 Himself had challeng'd, and the foe drew near.

Stern Telamon behind his ample shield,
 As from a brazen tower, o'erlook'd the field.
 Huge was its orb, with seven thick folds o'ercast,
 Of tough bull-hides ; of solid brass the last,
 (The work of Tychius, who in Hyle dwell'd,
 And all in arts of armoury excell'd :)
 This Ajax bore before his manly breast,
 And, threatening, thus his adverse chief address :

" Hector ! approach my arm ! and singly know
 What strength thou hast, and what the Grecian foe.
 Achilles shuns the fight ; yet some there are,
 Not void of soul, and not unskill'd in war :
 Let him, unactive on the sea-beat shore,
 Indulge his wrath, and aid our arms no more ;
 Whole troops of heroes Greece has yet to boast,
 And sends thee one, a sample of her host.
 Such as I am, I come to prove thy might ;
 No more—be sudden, and begin the fight."

" O son of Telamon, thy country's pride !"
 (To Ajax thus the Trojan prince reply'd)

" Me as a boy or woman would'st thou fright,
 New to the field, and trembling at the fight ?
 Thou meet'st a chief deserving of thy arms,
 To combat born, and bred amidst alarms :
 I know to shift my ground, remount the car,
 Turn, charge, and answer every call of war ;
 To right, to left, the dextrous lance I wield,
 And bear thick battle on my sounding shield.
 But open be our fight, and hold each blow ;
 I steal no conquest from a noble foe."

He said ; and, rising high above the field,
 Whirl'd the long lance against the sevenfold shield.
 Full on the brass descending from above
 Through six bull-hides the furious weapon drove,
 Till in the seventh it fix'd. Then Ajax threw ;
 Through Hector's shield the forceful javelin flew,
 His corslet enters, and his garment rends,
 And glancing downwards near his flank descends.
 The wary Trojan shrinks, and, bending low
 Beneath his buckler, disappoints the blow.
 From their bor'd shields the chiefs their javelins
 Then close impetuous, and the charge renew : [draw
 Fierce as the mountain-lions bath'd in blood,
 Or foaming boars, the terror of the wood.
 At Ajax, Hector his long lance extends ;
 The blunted point against the buckler bends :
 But Ajax, watchful as his foe drew near,
 Drove through the Trojan targe the knotty spear ;
 It reach'd his neck, with matchless strength impell'd,
 Spouts the black gore, and dims his shining shield.
 Yet ceas'd not Hector thus ; but, stooping down,
 In his strong hand up-beav'd a flinty stone,
 Black, craggy, vast : to this his force he bends ;
 Full on the brazen boss the stone descends ;
 The hollow brass resounded with the shock.
 Then Ajax seiz'd the fragment of a rock,

Appl'd each nerve, and swinging round on high,
 With force tempestuous let the ruin fly: [broke :
 The bag- stone thundering through his buckler
 His slacken'd knees receiv'd the numbing stroke;
 Great Hector falls extended on the field,
 His bulk supporting on the shatter'd shield:
 Nor wanted heavenly aid: Apollo's might
 Confirm'd his sinews, and restor'd to fight.
 And now both heroes their broad falchions drew:
 In flaming circles round their heads they flew;
 But then by heralds' voice the word was given,
 The sacred ministers of Earth and Heaven:
 Drive Talthibius whom the Greeks employ,
 And sage Idæus on the part of Troy,
 Between the swords their peaceful sceptres rear'd;
 And first Idæus' awful voice was heard:

"Forbear, my sons! your farther force to prove,
 Both dear to men, and both belov'd of Jove.
 To either host your matchless worth is known,
 Each sounds your praise, and war is all your own.
 But now the Night extends her awful shade;
 The goddess parts you: be the Night obey'd."

To whom great Ajax his high soul express'd:
 "O sage! to Hector be these words address'd;
 Let him who first provok'd our chiefs to fight,
 Let him demand the sanction of the Night;
 If first he ask it, I content obey,
 And cease the strife when Hector shows the way."

"Oh first of Greeks;" (his noble foe rejoind)
 "Whom Heaven adorns, superior to thy kind,
 With strength of body, and with worth of mind!
 Now martial law commands us to forbear;
 Hereafter we shall meet in glorious war,
 Some future day shall lengthen out the strife,
 And let the gods decide of death or life!

Since then the Night extends her gloomy shade,
 And Heaven enjoins it, be the Night obey'd.
 Behave, brave Ajax, to thy Grecian friends,
 And joy the nations whom thy arm defends;
 As I shall glad each chief, and Trojan wife,
 Who wears Heaven with vows for Hector's life.
 But let us, on this memorable day,
 Exchange some gift; that Greece and Troy may say,

'Not hate, but glory, made these chiefs contend;
 And each brave foe was in his soul a friend."

With that, a sword with stars of silver grac'd,
 The baldric studded, and the sheath encas'd,
 He gave the Greek. The generous Greek bestow'd
 A radiant belt that rich with purple glow'd.
 Then with majestic grace they quit the plain;
 This seeks the Grecian, that the Phrygian train.

The Trojan bands returning Hector wait,
 And hail with joy the champion of their state:
 Recov'd great Ajax, they survey'd him round,
 Alive, unharmed, and vigorous from his wound.
 To Troy's high gates the godlike man they bear,
 Their present triumph, as their late despair.

But Ajax, glorying in his hardy deed,
 The well-arm'd Greeks to Agamemnon lead.
 A steer for sacrifice the king design'd,
 Of full five years, and of the nobler kind.
 The victim falls; they strip the smoking hide,
 The beast they quarter, and the joints divide;
 Then spread the tables, the repast prepare,
 Each takes his seat, and each receives his share.

The king himself (an honorary sign)
 Before great Ajax plac'd the mighty chine.
 When now the rage of hunger was remov'd,
 Hector, in each persuasive art approv'd,

The sage whose counsels long had away'd the rest,
 In words like these his prudent thought express:

"How dear, O kings! this fatal day has cost!
 What Greeks are perish'd! what a people lost!
 What tides of blood have drench'd Scamandra's
 shore!

What crowds of heroes sunk, to rise no more!
 Then hear me, chief! nor let the morrow's light
 Awake thy squadrons to new toils of fight:
 Some space at least permit the war to breathe,
 While we to flames our slaughter'd friends bequeath.
 From the red field their scatter'd bodies bear;
 And nigh the fleet a funeral structure rear:
 So decent urns their snowy bones may keep,
 And pious children o'er their ashes weep.

Here, where on one promiscuous pile they blas'd,
 High o'er them all a general tomb be rais'd;
 Next, to secure our camp, and naval powers,
 Raise an embattled wall, with lofty towers;
 From space to space be ample gates around,
 For passing chariots; and a trench profound.
 So Greece to combat shall in safety go,
 Nor fear the fierce incursions of the foe."

'Twas thus the sage his wholesome counsel mov'd;
 The sceptred kings of Greece his words approv'd.
 Meanwhile, conven'd at Priam's palace-gate,
 The Trojan peers in nightly council sat;
 A senate void of order, as of choice;
 Their hearts were fearful, and confus'd their voice.
 Antenor rising, thus demands their ear:

"Ye Trojans, Dardans, and auxiliars, hear!
 'Tis Heaven the counsel of my breast inspires,
 And I but move what every god requires;
 Let Sparta's treasure be this hour restor'd,
 And Argive Helen own her ancient lord.
 The ties of faith, the sworn alliance broke,
 Our impious battles the just gods provoke.
 As this advice ye practise, or reject,
 So hope success, or dread the dire effect."

The senior spoke, and sate. To whom reply'd
 The graceful husband of the Spartan bride;
 "Cold counsels, Trojan, may become thy years,
 But sound ungrateful in a warrior's ears:
 Old man, if, void of fallacy or art,
 Thy words express the purpose of thy heart,
 Thou, in thy time, more sound advice hast given,
 But wisdom has its date, assign'd by Heaven.
 Then hear me, princes of the Trojan name!
 Their treasures I'll restore, but not the dame;
 My treasures too, for peace, I will resign;
 But be this bright possession ever mine."

'Twas then, the growing discord to compose,
 Slow from his seat the reverend Priam rose:
 His godlike aspect deep attention drew:
 He paus'd, and these pacific words ensue:

"Ye Trojans, Dardans, and auxiliar bands!
 Now take refreshment as the hour demands;
 Guard well the walls, relieve the watch of night,
 Till the new Sun restore the cheerful light:
 Then shall our herald to th' Atreides sent,
 Before their ships proclaim my son's intent.
 Next let a truce be ask'd, that Troy may burn
 Her slaughter'd heroes, and their bones inurn;
 That done, once more the fate of war be try'd,
 And whose the conquest, mighty Jove decide!"

The monarch spoke: the warriors snatch'd with haste,

(Each at his post in arms) a short repast.
 Soon as the rosy morn had wak'd the day,
 To the black ships Idæus bent his way;

There, to the sons of Mars, in council found,
He rais'd his voice; the host stood listening round:

"Ye sons of Atræus, and ye Greeks, give ear!
The words of Troy and Troy's great monarch hear,
Pleas'd may ye hear (so Heaven succeed my prayers)
What Paris, author of the war, declares.
The spoils and treasures he to Ilium bore,
(Oh, had he perish'd ere they touch'd our shore!)
He proffers injur'd Greece, with large increase
Of added Trojan wealth, to buy the peace.
But to restore the beauteous bride again,
This Greece demands, and Troy requests in vain.
Next, O ye chiefs! we ask a truce, to burn
Our slaughter'd heroes, and their bones inurn.
That done, once more the fate of war be try'd,
And whose the conquest, mighty Jove decide!"

The Greeks gave ear, but none the silence broke:
At length Tydides rose, and rising spoke:
"Oh, take not, friends! defrauded of your fame,
Their proffer'd wealth, nor ev'n the Spartan dame.
Let conquest make them ours: fate shakes their
And Troy already totters to her fall." [wall,

Th' admiring chiefs, and all the Grecian name,
With general shouts return'd him loud acclaim.
Then thus the king of kings rejects the pace:
"Herald; in him thou hear'st the voice of Greece.
For what remains; let funeral flames be fed
With heroes' corpse; I war not with the dead:
Go search your slaughter'd chiefs on yonder plain,
And gratify the manes of the slain:
Be witness, Jove, whose thunder rolls on high!"
He said, and rear'd his sceptre to the sky.

To sacred Troy, where all her princes lay
To wait th' event, the herald bent his way.
He came, and standing in the midst, explain'd
The peace rejected, but the truce obtain'd.
Straight to their several cares the Trojans move;
Some search the plains, some fell the sounding grove:

Nor less the Greeks, descending on the shore,
Hew'd the green forests, and the bodies bore.
And now from forth the chambers of the main,
To shed his sacred light on Earth again,
Arose the golden chariot of the day,
And tipped the mountains with a purple ray.
In mingled throngs the Greek and Trojan train
Though heaps of carnage search the mournful plain.
Scarce could the friend his slaughter'd friend ex-

plure,
With dust dishonour'd, and deform'd with gore.
The wounds they wash'd, their pious tears they shed,
And, laid along their cars, deplor'd the dead;
Sage Priam check'd their grief: with silent haste
The bodies decent on their piles were plac'd:
With melting hearts the cold remains they burn'd;
And sadly flow to sacred Troy return'd.

Nor less the Greeks their pious sorrows shed,
And decent on the pile dispose the dead;
The cold remains consume with equal care;
And, slowly, sadly, to their fleet repair.
Now, ere the morn had streak'd with reddening light
The doubtful confines of the day and night;
About the dying flames the Greeks appear'd,
And round the pile a general tomb they rear'd.
Then, to secure the camp and naval powers,
They rais'd embattled walls with lofty towers:
From space to space were ample gates around,
For passing chariots; and a trench profound,
Of large extent; and deep in earth, below,
Strong piles infix'd stood adverse to the foe.

So toil'd the Greeks; meanwhile the gods above
In shining circle round their father Jove,
Amaz'd beheld the wondrous works of man:

Then he, whose trident shakes the Earth, began:
"What mortals henceforth shall our power adore,
Our fates frequent, our oracles implore,
If the proud Grecians thus successful boast
Their rising bulwarks on the sea-beat coast?
See the long walls extending to the main,
No god consulted, and no victim slain!
Th' æt' fame shall fill the world's remotest ends;
Wide, as the morn her golden beam extends,
While old Laomedon's divine abodes,
Those radiant structures rais'd by labouring gods,
Shall, raz'd and lost, in long oblivion sleep."

Thus spoke the hoary monarch of the deep.
Th' almighty thunderer with a frown replies,
That clouds the world, and blackens half the skies:
"Strong god of Ocean! thou, whose rage can make
The solid Earth's eternal basis shake;
What cause of fear from mortal works could move
The meanest subject of our realms above?
Where'er the Sun's refulgent rays are cast,
Thy power is honour'd, and thy fame shall last.
But yon proud work no future age shall view,
No trace remain where once the glory grew,
The sapp'd foundations by thy force shall fall,
And, whelm'd beneath thy waves, drop the huge wall:

Vast drifts of sand shall change the former shore;
The ruin vanish'd, and the name no more."

Thus they in Heaven; while o'er the Grecian
The rolling Sun descending to the main [train,
Beheld the finish'd work. Their bulls they slew:
Black from the tents the savoury vapours w.
And now the fleet, arriv'd from Lemnos' stands,
With Bacchus' blessings cheer'd the generous bands.
Of fragrant wine the rich Euneus sent
A thousand measures to the royal tent.
(Euneus, whom Hypsipyle of yore
To Jason, shepherd of his people, bore)
The rest they purchas'd at their proper cost,
And well the plenteous freight supply'd the host:
Each, in exchange, proportion'd treasures gave:
Some brass, or iron; some an ox, or slave.
All night they feast, the Greek and Trojan powers;
Those on the fields, and these within their towers.
But Jove averse the signs of wrath display'd,
And shot red lightnings through the gloomy shade:
Humbled they stood: pale horror seiz'd on all,
While the deep thunder shook th' aerial ball.
Each pour'd to Jove, before the bowl was crown'd:
And large libations drench'd the thirsty ground:
Then late, refresh'd with sleep from toils of fight,
Enjoy'd the balmy blessings of the night.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK VIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE SECOND BATTLE, AND THE DISTRESS OF THE GREEKS.

JUPITER assembles a council of the deities, and threatens them with the pains of Tartarus if they assist either side: Minerva only obtains of him that she may direct the Greeks by her counsels. The armies join battle: Jupiter on Mount Ida weighs in his balances the fates of both, and affrights the Greeks with his thunders and lightnings. Nestor alone continues in the field, in great danger; Diomed relieves him; whose exploits, and those of Hector, are excellently described. Juno endeavours to animate Neptune to the assistance of the Greeks, but in vain. The acts of Teucer, who is at length wounded by Hector, and carried off. Juno and Minerva prepare to aid the Grecians; but are restrained by Iris, sent from Jupiter. The night puts an end to the battle. Hector continues in the field (the Greeks being driven to their fortifications before the ships) and gives orders to keep the watch all night in the camp, to prevent the enemy from reembarking and escaping by flight. They kindle fires through all the field, and pass the night under arms.

The time of seven and twenty days is employed from the opening of the poem to the end of this book. The scene here (except of the celestial machines) lies in the field toward the sea-shore.

ARSONA now, fair daughter of the dawn,
Sprinkled with rosy light the dewy lawn;
When Jove conven'd the senate of the skies,
Where high Olympus' cloudy tops arise.
The sire of gods his awful silence broke,
The heavens attentive trembled as he spoke:
"Celestial states, immortal gods! give ear,
Hear our decree, and reverence what ye hear;
The fix'd decree, which not all Heaven can move;
Thou fate! fulfil it; and, ye powers, approve!
What god but enters your forbidden field,
Who yields assistance, or but wills to yield;
Back to the skies with shame he shall be driven,
Gash'd with dishonest wounds, the scorn of Heaven:
Or far, oh far from steep Olympus thrown,
Low in the dark Tartarean gulf shall groan,
With burning chains fix'd to the brazen floors,
And lock'd by Hell's inexorable doors;
As deep beneath th' infernal centre hurl'd,
As from that centre to th' ethereal world.
Let him who tempts me, dread those dire abodes;
And know, th' almighty is the god of gods.
League all your forces then, ye powers above,
Join all, and try th' omnipotence of Jove;
Let down our golden everlasting chain, [main:
Whose strong embrace holds Heaven, and earth, and Strive all, of mortal and immortal birth,
To drag, by this, the thunder down to Earth:
Ye strive in vain! If I but stretch this hand,
I leave the gods, the ocean, and the land;
I fix the chain to great Olympus' height,
And the vast world hangs trembling in my sight!
For such I reign, unbounded and above;
And such are men and gods, compar'd to Jove."
Th' almighty spoke, nor durst the powers reply,
A reverend horror silence'd all the sky;
Trembling they stood before their sovereign's look;
At length his best belov'd, the power of wisdom,
spoke:

"O first and greatest! god, by gods ador'd?
We own thy might, our father and our lord!

But ah! permit to pity human state;
If not to help, at least lament their fate.
From fields forbidden we submit refrain,
With arms unaiding mourn our Argives slain;
Yet grant my counsels still their breasts may move,
Or all must perish in the wrath of Jove."

The cloud-compelling god her suit approv'd,
And smil'd superior on his best belov'd.
Then call'd his coursers, and his chariot took;
The stedfast firmament beneath him shook:
Rapt by th' ethereal steeds the chariot roll'd;
Brass were their hoofs, their curling manes of gold.
Of Heaven's undrossy gold the god's array
Refulgent, flash'd intolerable day.
High on the throne he shines: his coursers fly
Between th' extended Earth and starry sky.
But when to Ida's topmost height he came,
(Fair nurse of fountains, and of savage game)
Where, o'er her pointed summits proudly rais'd,
His fame breath'd odours, and his altars blaz'd:
There, from his radiant car the sacred sire
Of gods and men releas'd the steeds of fire:
Blue ambient mists th' immortal steeds embrac'd;
High on the cloudly point his seat he plac'd;
Thence his broad eye the subject world surveys,
The town, and tents, and navigable seas.

Now had the Grecians snatch'd a short repast,
And buckled on their shining arms with haste.
Troy rous'd as soon; for on this dreadful day
The fate of fathers, wives, and infants, lay.
The gates unfolding pour forth all their train;
Squadrons on squadrons cloud the dusky plain:
Men, steeds, and chariots, shake the trembling
ground;

The tumult thickens, and the skies resound.
And now with shouts the shocking armies clos'd,
To lances lances, shields to shields oppos'd,
Host against host with shadowy legions drew,
The sounding darts in iron tempests flew,
Victors and vanquish'd join promiscuous cries,
Triumphant shouts and dying groans arise;
With streaming blood the slippery fields are dy'd,
And slaughter'd heroes swell the dreadful tide.
Long as the morning beams increasing bright,
O'er Heaven's clear azure spread the sacred light;
Commuted death the fate of war confounds,
Each adverse battle gor'd with equal wounds.
But when the Sun the height of Heaven ascends;
The sire of gods his golden scales suspends,
With equal hand: in these explor'd the fate
Of Greece and Troy, and pois'd the mighty weight.
Press'd with its load, the Grecian balance lies
Low sunk on Earth, the Trojan strikes the skies,
Then Jove from Ida's top his horror spreads;
The clouds burst dreadful o'er the Grecian heads:
Thick lightnings flash; the muttering thunder rolls;

Their strength he withers, and unmans their souls.
Before his wrath the trembling hosts retire;
The god in terrors, and the skies on fire,
Nor great Idomeneus that sight could bear,
Nor each stern Ajax, thunderbolts of war:
Nor he, the king of men, th' alarm sustain'd;
Nestor alone amidst the storm remain'd.
Unwilling he remain'd, for Paris' dart
Had pierc'd his courser in a mortal part:
Fix'd in the forehead where the springing mane
Curl'd o'er the brow, it stung him to the brain;
Mad with his anguish, he begins to rear,
Paw with his hoofs aloft, and lash the air.

Scarce had his falchion cut the reins, and freed
Th' encumber'd chariot from the dying steed,
When dreadful Hector, thundering through the war,
Pour'd to the tumult on his whirling car.
That day had stretch'd beneath his matchless hand
The boary monarch of the Pylian band :
But Diomed beheld : from forth the croud
Hè rush'd, and on Ulysses call'd aloud.

“ Whither, oh whither does Ulysses run ?

Oh flight unworthy great Laërtes' son !
Mixt with the vulgar shall thy fate be found,
Pierc'd in the back, a vile, dishonest wound ?
Oh turn and save from Hector's direful rage
The glory of the Greeks, the Pylian sage.”

His fruitless words are lost unheard in air,
Ulysses seeks the ships, and shelters there.
But bold Tydides to the rescue goes,
A single warrior 'midst a host of foes ;
Before the coursers with a sudden spring
He leap'd, and anxious thus bespoke the king :

“ Great perils, father ! wait th' unequal fight ;
These younger champions will oppress thy might.
Thy veins no more with ancient vigour glow ;
Weak is thy servant, and thy coursers slow.
Then haste, ascend my seat, and from the car
Observe the steeds of Tros, renown'd in war,
Practis'd alike to turn, to stop, to chase,
To dare the fight, or urge the rapid race :
These late obey'd Æneas' guiding rein ;
Leave thou thy chariot to our faithful train ;
With these against yon Trojans will we go,
Nor shall great Hector want an equal foe ;
Fierce as he is, ev'n he may learn to fear
The thirsty fury of my flying spear.”

Thus said the chief ; and Nestor, skill'd in war,
Approves his counsel, and ascends the car :
The steeds he left, their trusty servants hold ;
Furymedon, and Sthenelus the bold :
The reverend charioteer directs the course,
And strains his aged arm to lash the horse.
Hector they face ; unknowing how to fear,
Fierce he drove on ; Tydides whirl'd his spear.
The spear with erring haste mistook its way,
But plang'd in Æniopous' bosom lay.
His opening hand in death forsakes the rein ;
The steeds fly back : he falls, and spurns the plain.
Great Hector sorrows for his servant kill'd,
Yet unreveng'd permits to press the field ;
Till, to supply his place and rule the car,
Rose Archeptolemus, the fierce in war.
And now had death and horror cover'd all ;
Like timorous flocks the Trojans in their wall
Baclos'd had bled : but Jove with awful sound
Roll'd the big thunder o'er the vast profound :
Full in Tydides face the lightning flew ;
The ground before him flam'd with sulphur blue ;
The quivering steeds fell prostrate at the sight ;
And Nestor's trembling hand confess'd his fright ;
He dropp'd the reins ; and, shook with sacred dread,
Thus, turning, warn'd th' intrepid Diomed :

“ O chief ! too daring in thy friend's defence,
Retire advis'd, and urge the chariot hence.
This day, averse, the sovereign of the skies
Assists great Hector, and our palm denies.
Some other sun may see the happier hour,
When Greece shall conquer by his heavenly power.
'Tis not in man his fix'd decree to move :
The great will glory to submit to Jove.”

“ O reverend prince !” (Tydides thus replies)
“ Thy years are awful, and thy words are wise.

But ah, what grief, should haughty Hector boast,
I fled inglorious to the guarded coast !
Before that dire disgrace shall blast my fame,
O'erwhelm me, Earth ; and hide a warrior's
shame.”

To whom Gerenian Nestor thus reply'd ;
“ Gods ! can thy courage fear the Phrygian's pride ?
Hector may vaunt, but who shall heed the boast ?
Not those who felt thy arm, the Dardan host,
Nor Troy, yet bleeding in her heroes' lost ;
Not ev'n a Phrygian dame, who dreads the sword
That laid in dust her lov'd, lamented lord.”
He said, and hasty o'er the gasping throng
Drives the swift steeds ; the chariot smokes along.
The shouts of Trojans thicken in the wind ;
The storm of hissing javelins pours behind.
Then, with a voice that shakes the solid skies,
Pleas'd Hector braves the warrior as he flies.
“ Go, mighty hero, grac'd above the rest
In seats of council and the sumptuous feast ;
Now hope no more those honours from thy train ;
Go, less than woman, in the form of man !
To scale our walls, to wrap our towers in flames,
To lead in exile the fair Phrygian dames. {sed:
Thy once proud hopes, presumptuous prince ! are
This arm shall reach thy heart, and stretch thee
dead.”

Now fears dissuade him, and now hopes invite,
To stop his coursers, and to stand the fight ;
Thrice turn'd the chief, and thrice imperial Jove
On Ida's summits thunder'd from above :
Great Hector heard ; he saw the flashing light,
(The sign of conquest) and thus urg'd the fight :
“ Hear, every Trojan, Lycian, Dardan band,
All fam'd in war, and dreadful hand to hand.
Be mindful of the wreaths your arms have won,
Your great forefathers' glories, and your own.
Heard ye the voice of Jove ? Success and fame
Await on Troy, on Greece eternal shame.
In vain they skulk behind their boasted wall,
Weak bulwarks ! destin'd by this arm to fall.
High o'er their slighted trench our steeds shall
And pass victorious o'er the level'd mound. [bound;
Soon as before yon hollow ships we stand,
Fight each with flames, and toss the blazing brand ;
Till, their proud navy wrapt in smoke and fires,
All Greece, encompass'd, in one blaze expires.”

Furious he said ; then, bending o'er the yoke,
Encourag'd his proud steeds, while thus he spoke :
“ Now, Xanthus, Æthon, Lampus ! urge the chase,
And, thou, Podargus ! prove thy generous race :
Be fleet, be fearless, this important day,
And all your master's well-spent care repay.
For this, high-fed in plenteous stalls ye stand,
Serv'd with pure wheat, and by a princess' hand ;
For this my spouse, of great Aëtion's line,
So oft has steep'd the strengthening grain in wine.
Now swift pursue, now thunder uncontrol'd ;
Give me to seize rich Nestor's shield of gold ;
From Tydeus' shoulders strip the costly load,
Vulcanian arms, the labour of a god :
These if we gain, then victory, ye powers !
This night, this glorious night, the fleet is ours.”

That heard, deep anguish stung Saturnia's soul ;
She shook her throne that shook the starry pole :
And thus to Neptune : “ Thou, whose force can make
The steadfast Earth from her foundation shake,
See'st thou the Greeks by fates unjust oppress,
Nor swells that heart in thy immortal breast ?

Yet Ege, Helice, thy power obey,
 And gifts increasing on thine altars lay.
 Would all the deities of Greece combine,
 In vain the gloomy thunder might repine:
 Sole should he sit, with scarce a god to friend,
 And see his Trojans to the shades descend:
 Such be the scene from his Idean bower;
 Ungrateful prospect to the sulkea power!"

Neptune with wrath rejects the rash design:
 "What rage, what madness, furious queen, is
 I war not with the highest. All above [thine!
 Submit and tremble at the hand of Jove."

Now godlike Hector, to whose matchless might
 Jove gave the glory of the destin'd fight,
 Squadrons on squadrons drives, and fills the fields
 With close-rang'd chariots, and with thicken'd shields.

Where the deep trench in length extended lay,
 Compacted troops stand wedg'd in firm array,
 A dreadful front! they shake the brands, and threat
 With long-destroying flames the hostile fleet.
 The king of men, by Juno's self inspir'd,
 Told through the tents, and all his army fir'd.
 Swift as he mov'd he lifted in his hand
 His purple robe, bright ensign of command.
 High on the midmost bark the king appear'd;
 There, from Ulysses' deck his voice was heard;
 To Ajax and Achilles reach'd the sound,
 Whose distant ships the guarded navy bound.
 "Oh Argives! shame of human race;" he cry'd,
 (The hollow vessels to his voice reply'd)
 "Where now are all your glorious boasts of yore,
 Your hasty triumphs on the Lemnian shore?
 Each fearless hero dares an hundred foes;
 While the feast lasts, and while the goblet flows;
 But who to meet one martial man is found,
 When the fight rages, and the flames surround?
 O mighty Jove! oh sire of the distress'd?
 Was ever king like me, like me oppress'd?
 With power immense, with justice arm'd in vain;
 My glory ravish'd, and my people slain!
 To thee my vows were breath'd from every shore;
 What altar smok'd not with our victims' gore?
 With fat of bulls I fed the constant flame,
 And ask'd destruction to the Trojan name.
 Now, gracious god! far humbler our demand!
 Give these at least t' escape from Hector's hand,
 And save the relics of the Grecian land!"

Thus pray'd the king; and Heaven's great father
 His vow, in bitterness of soul prefer'd; [heard
 The wrath appear'd, by happy signs declares,
 And gives the people to their monarch's prayers.
 His eagle, sacred bird of Heaven! he sent,
 A fan his talons truss'd (divine portent!)
 High o'er the wondering hosts he soar'd above,
 Who paid their vows to Panomphrean Jove;
 Then let the prey before his altar fall,
 The Greeks beheld, and transport seiz'd on all;
 Encourag'd by the sign, the troops revive,
 And surge on Troy with double fury drive.
 Tydides first of all the Grecian force,
 O'er the broad ditch impell'd his foaming horse,
 Pierc'd the deep ranks, their strongest battle tore,
 And dy'd his javelin red with Trojan gore.
 Young Agelaüs (Phradmon was his sire)
 With flying couriers shunn'd his dreadful ire:
 Struck through the back, the Phrygian fell oppress'd;
 The dart drove on, and issued at his breast:
 Headlong he quits the car; his arms resound:
 His ponderous buckler thunders on the ground.

Forth rush a tide of Greeks, the passage freed;
 Th' Atrides first, th' Ajaces next succeed:
 Meriones, like Mars in arms renown'd,
 And godlike Idomen, now pass'd the mound:
 Evæmon's son next issues to the foe,
 And last, young Teucer with his bended bow.
 Secure behind the Telamonian shield
 The skillful archer wide survey'd the field,
 With every shaft some hostile victim slew,
 Then close beneath the seven-fold orb withdrew:
 The conscious infant so, when fear alarms,
 Retires for safety to the mother's arms.
 Thus Ajax guards his brother in the field,
 Moves as he moves, and turns the shining shield.
 Who first by Teucer's mortal arrows bled?
 Orsiloehus; then fell Ormenus dead:
 The god-like Lycophon next press'd the plain,
 With Chromius, Dætor, Ophelætes slain:
 Bold Hamopaön breathless sunk to ground;
 The bloody pile great Menalippus crown'd.
 Heaps fell on heaps, sad trophies of his art,
 A Trojan ghost attended every dart.
 Great Agamemnon views with joyful eye
 The ranks grow thinner as his arrows fly:
 "Oh youth for ever dear!" the monarch cry'd,
 "Thus, always thus, thy early worth be try'd;
 Thy brave example shall retrieve our host,
 Thy country's saviour, and thy father's boast!
 Sprung from an alien's bed thy sire to grace,
 The vigorous offspring of a stol'n embrace,
 Proud of his boy, he own'd the generous flame,
 And the brave son repays his cares with fame.
 Now hear a monarch's vow: If Heaven's high powers
 Give me to raze Troy's long defended towers;
 Whatever treasures Greece for me design,
 The next rich honorary gift be thine:
 Some golden tripod, or distinguish'd car,
 With coursers dreadful in the ranks of war;
 Or some fair captive, whom thy eyes approve,
 Shall recompense the warrior's toils with love."

To this the chief: "With praise the rest inspire,
 Nor urge a soul already fill'd with fire.
 What strength I have, be now in battle try'd,
 Till every shaft in Phrygian blood be dy'd.
 Since rallying from our wall we forc'd the foe,
 Still aim'd at Hector have I bent my bow:
 Eight forky arrows from this hand have fled,
 And eight bold heroes by their points lie dead:
 But sure some god denies me to destroy
 This fury of the field, this dog of Troy." [flies
 He said, and twang'd the string. The weapon
 At Hector's breast, and sings along the skies:
 He miss'd the mark; but pierc'd Gorgythio's
 heart,
 And drench'd in royal blood the thirsty dart.
 (Fair Castianira, nymph of form divine,
 This offspring added to king Priam's line.)
 As full-blown poppies, overcharg'd with rain,
 Decline the head, and drooping kiss the plain.
 So sinks the youth: his beauteous head, deprest
 Beneath his helmet, drops upon his breast.
 Another shaft the raging archer drew:
 That other shaft with erring fury flew,
 (From Hector Phœbus turn'd the flying wound)
 Yet fell not dry or guiltless to the ground:
 Thy breast, brave Archeptolemus! it tore,
 And dipt its feathers in no vulgar gore.
 Headlong he falls: his sudden fall alarms
 The steeds, that startle at his sounding arms.

Hector with grief his chariotcer beheld,
 All pale and breathless on the sanguine field.
 Then bids Cebriones direct the rein,
 Quits his bright car, and issues on the plain.
 Dreadful he shouts: from earth a stone he took,
 And rush'd on Teucer with the lifted rock.
 The youth already strain'd the forceful yew:
 The shaft already to his shoulder drew:
 The feather in his hand, just wing'd for flight,
 Touch'd where the neck and hollow chest unite;
 There, where the juncture knits the channel bone,
 The furious chief discharg'd the craggy stone;
 The bow-string burst beneath the ponderous blow,
 And his numb'd hand dismiss'd the useless bow.
 He fell: but Ajax his broad shield display'd,
 And screen'd his brother with a mighty shade;
 Till great Alastor, and Mecistheus, bore
 The batter'd archer groaning to the shore.

Troy yet found grace before th' Olympian sire,
 He arm'd their hands, and fill'd their breast with fire.

The Greeks, repuls'd, retreat behind their wall,
 Or in the trench on heaps confus'dly fall.
 First of the foe, great Hector march'd along,
 With terror cloth'd, and more than mortal strong.
 As the bold hound, that gives the lion chase,
 With beating bosom, and with eager pace,
 Hangs on his haunch, or fastens on his heels,
 Guards as he turns, and circles as he wheels:
 Thus oft the Grecians turn'd, but still they flew;
 Thus following Hector still the hindmost slew.
 When flying they had pass'd the trench profound,
 And many a chief lay gasping on the ground;
 Before the ships a desperate stand they made,
 And fir'd the troops, and call'd the gods to aid.
 Pierce on his rattling chariot Hector came;
 His eyes like Gorgon shot a sanguine flame
 That wither'd all their host: like Mars he stood;
 Dire as the monster, dreadful as the god!
 Their strong distress the wife of Jove survey'd;
 Then pensive thus, to war's triumphant maid:

" Oh daughter of that god, whose arm can wield
 Th' avenging bolt, and shake the sable shield!
 Now, in this moment of her last despair,
 Shall wretched Greece no more confess our care,
 Condemn'd to suffer the full force of fate,
 And drain the dregs of Heaven's relentless hate?
 Gods! shall one raging hand thus level all?
 What numbers fell! what numbers yet shall fall!
 What power divine shall Hector's wrath assuage?
 Still swells the slaughter, and still grows the rage!"

So spake th' imperial regent of the skies.
 To whom the goddess with the azure eyes:
 " Long since had Hector stain'd these fields with gore,
 Stretch'd by some Argive on his native shore;
 But he above, the sire of Heaven, withstands,
 Mocks our attempts, and slights our just demands.
 The stubborn god, inflexible and hard,
 Forgets my service and deserv'd reward:
 Sav'd I, for this, his favourite son's distress'd,
 By stern Eurystheus with long labours press'd?
 He's begg'd, with tears he begg'd, in deep dismay;
 I shot from Heaven, and gave his arm the day.
 Oh had my wisdom known this dire event,
 When to grim Pluto's gloomy gates he went;
 The triple dog had never felt his chain,
 Nor Styx been cross'd, nor Hell explor'd in vain.

¹ Hercules.

Averse to me of all his Heaven of gods,
 At Thetis' suit the partial thunderer nods.
 To grace her gloomy, fierce, resenting son,
 My hopes are frustrate, and my Greeks undone.
 Some future day, perhaps, he may be mov'd
 To call his blue-ey'd maid his best belov'd.
 Haste, launch thy chariot, thro' yon ranks to ride!
 Myself will arm, and thunder at thy side.
 Then, goddess! say, shall Hector glory then,
 (That terrour of the Greeks, that man of men)
 When Juno's self, and Pallas shall appear,
 All dreadful in the crimson walks of war!
 What mighty Trojan then, on yonder shore,
 Expiring, pale, and terrible no more,
 Shall feast the fowls, and glut the dogs with gore?"

She ceas'd, and Juno rein'd the steeds with care;
 (Heaven's awful empress, Saturn's other heir)
 Pallas, meanwhile, her various veil unbound,
 With flowers adorn'd, with art immortal crown'd;
 The radiant robe her sacred fingers wove
 Floats in rich waves, and spreads the court of Jove.
 Her father's arms her mighty limbs invest,
 His cuirass blazes on her ample breast.
 The vigorous power the trembling car ascends;
 Shook by her arm, the massy javelin bends;
 Huge, ponderous, strong! that, when her fury
 burns,

Proud tyrants humbles, and whole hosts o'erturns.

Saturnia lends the lash; the coursers fly;
 Smooth glides the chariot through the liquid sky.
 Heaven's gates spontaneous open to the powers,
 Heaven's golden gates, kept by the winged Hours.
 Commission'd in alternate watch they stand,
 The Sun's bright portals and the skies command;
 Close, or unfold, th' eternal gates of day,
 Bar Heaven with clouds, or roll those clouds away.
 The sounding hinges ring, the clouds divide;
 Prone down the steep of Heaven their course they
 But Jove incens'd, from Ida's top survey'd, [guide.
 And thus enjoin'd the many-colour'd maid:

" Thaumantia! mount the winds, and stop their
 Against the highest who shall wage the war? [car;
 If furious yet they dare the vain debate,
 Thus have I spoke, and what I speak is fate.
 Their coursers crush'd beneath the wheel shall lie,
 Their car in fragments scatter'd o'er the sky;
 My lightning these rebellious shall confound,
 And hurl them flaming, headlong, to the ground.
 Condemn'd for ten revolving years to weep
 The wounds impress'd by burning thunder deep.
 So shall Minerva learn to fear our ire,
 Nor dare to combat her's and Nature's sire.
 For Juno, headstrong and imperious still,
 She claims some title to transgress our will."

Swift as the wind, the various colour'd maid
 From Ida's top her golden wings display'd;
 To great Olympus' shining gates she flies,
 There meets the chariot rushing down the skies,
 Restraints their progress from the bright abodes,
 And speaks the mandate of the sire of gods.

" What frenzy, goddesses: what rage can move
 Celestial minds to tempt the wrath of Jove?
 Desist, obedient to his high command:
 This is his word: and know, his word shall stand.
 His lightning your rebellion shall confound,
 And hurl you headlong, flaming, to the ground:
 Your horses crush'd beneath the wheels shall lie,
 Your car in fragments scatter'd o'er the sky:
 Yourself condemn'd ten rolling years to weep
 The wounds impress'd by burning thunder deep.

So shall Minerva learn to fear his ire,
Nor dare to combat her's and Nature's sire.
For Juno, headstrong and imperious still,
She claims some title to transgress his will.
But thee what desperate insolence has driven,
To lift thy lance against the king of Heaven?"
Then, mounting on the pinions of the wind,
She flew; and Juno thus her rage resign'd:
"O daughter of that god, whose arm can wield
Th' avenging bolt, and shake the dreadful shield!
No more let beings of superior birth
Contend with Jove for this low race of Earth:
Triumphant now, now miserably slain,
They breathe or perish as the fates ordain,
But Jove's high counsels full effect shall find;
And, ever constant, ever rule mankind."

She spoke, and backward turn'd her steeds of light,
Adorn'd with manes of gold, and heavenly bright.
The Hours unloos'd them, panting as they stood,
And heap'd their maners with ambrosial food.
There ty'd, they rest in high celestial stalls;
The chariot propt against the chrystal walls.
The pensive goddesses, abash'd, control'd
Mix with the gods, and fill their seats of gold.

And now the thunderer meditates his flight
From Ida's summits to th' Olympian height,
Swifter than thought the wheels instinctive fly,
Flame through the vast of air, and reach the sky.
'Twas Neptune's charge his coursers to unbrace,
And fix the car on its immortal base;
There stood the chariot, beaming forth its rays,
Till with a snowy veil he screen'd the blaze.
He, whose all-conscious eyes the world behold,
Th' eternal thunderer sat thron'd in gold;
High Heaven the footstool of his feet he makes,
And wide beneath him all Olympus shakes.

Trembling afar th' offending powers appear'd,
Confus'd and silent, for his frown they fear'd.
He saw their soul, and thus his word imparts:
"Pallas and Juno! say, why heave your hearts?
Soon was your battle o'er: proud Troy retir'd
Before your face, and in your wrath expir'd.
But know, whoc'er almighty power withstand!
Unmatch'd our force, unconquer'd is our hand:
Who shall the sovereign of the skies control?
Not all the gods that crown the starry pole.
Your hearts shall tremble, if our arms we take,
And each immortal nerve with horror shake.
For thus I speak, and what I speak shall stand;
What power soe'er provokes our lifted hand,
On this our hill no more shall hold his place;
Cut off, and exil'd, from th' ethereal race."

Juno and Pallas, grieving, hear the doom,
But feast their souls on Iliou's woes to come.
Though secret anger swell'd Minerva's breast,
The prudent goddess yet her wrath repress:
But Juno, impotent of rage, replies:
"What hast thou said, oh tyrant of the skies!
Strength and omnipotence invest thy throne;
'Tis thine to punish; ours to grieve alone.
For Greece we grieve abandon'd by her fate,
To drink the dregs of thy unmeasur'd hate:
From fields forbidden we submit resign'd,
With arms unaiding see our Argives slain;
Yet grant our counsels still their breasts may move,
Lest all should perish in the rage of Jove."

The goddess thus. And thus the god replies,
Who swells the clouds, and blackens all the skies:
"The morning Sun, awak'd by loud alarms,
Shall see th' almighty thunderer in arms.

What heaps of Argives then shall load the plain,
Those radiant eyes shall view, and view in vain.
Nor shall great Hector cease the rage of fight,
The navy flaming, and thy Greeks in flight,
Ev'n till the day, when certain fates ordain
That stern Achilles (his Patroclus slain)
Shall rise in vengeance, and lay waste the plain.
For such is fate, nor canst thou turn its course
With all thy rage, with all thy rebel force.
Fly, if thou wilt, to Earth's remotest bound,
Where on her utmost verge the seas resound;
Where curs'd Iäpetus and Saturn dwell,
Fast by the brink, withiu the steams of Hell;
No sun e'er gilds the gloomy horrors there;
No chearful gales refresh the lazy air;
There arm once more the bold Titanian band;
And arm in vain; for what I will shall stand."

Now deep in ocean sunk the lamp of light,
And drew behind the cloudy veil of night:
The conquering Trojans mourn his beams decay'd;
The Greeks, rejoicing, bless the friendly shade.

The victors keep the field; and Hector calls
A martial council near the navy walls:
These to Scamander's banks apart he led,
Where, thinly scatter'd, lay the heaps of dead.
Th' assembled chiefs, descending on the ground,
Attend his order, and their prince surround.
A massy spear he bore of mighty strength,
Of full ten cubits was the lance's length,
The point was brass, refulgent to behold,
Fix'd to the wood with circling rings of gold:
The noble Hector on this lance reclin'd,
And bending forward, thus reveal'd his mind:
"Ye valiant Trojans, with attention hear!
Ye Dardan bands, and generous aids, give ear!
This day, we hop'd, would wrap in conquering flame
Greece with her ships, and crown our toils with fame.
But darkness now, to save the cowards, falls,
And guards them trembling in their wooden walls.
Obey the night, and use her peaceful hours
Our steeds to forage, and refresh our powers.
Straight from the town be sheep and oxen sought,
And strengthening bread, and generous wine be brought.

Wide o'er the field, high blazing to the sky,
Let numerous fires the absent Sun supply,
The flaming piles with plenteous fuel raise,
Till the bright morn her purple beam displays;
Lest, in the silence and the shades of night,
Greece on her sable ships attempt her flight.
Not unmolested let the wretches gain
Their lofty decks, or safely cleave the main;
Some hostile wound let every dart bestow,
Some lasting token of the Phrygian foe;
Wounds, that long hence may ask their spouses'
And warn their children from a Trojan war. [care,
Now through the circuit of our Iliou wall,
Let sacred heralds sound the solemn call;
To bid the sires with hoary honours crown'd,
And beardless youths, our battlements surround.
Firm be the guard, while distant lie our powers,
And let the matrons hang with lights the towers:
Lest, under cover of the midnight shade,
Th' insidious foe the naked town invade.
Sullice, to night, these orders to obey;
A nobler charge shall rouse the dawning day.
The gods, I trust, shall give to Hector's hand,
From these detested foes to free the land,
Who plough'd, with fates averse, the watery way:
For Trojan vultures a predestin'd prey.

Our common safety must be now the care ;
 But soon as morning paints the fields of air,
 Sheath'd in bright arms let every troop engage,
 And the fir'd fleet behold the battle-rage,
 Then, then shall Hector and Tydides prove,
 Whose fates are heaviest in the scales of Jove :
 Tomorrow's light (oh haste the glorious morn!)
 Shall see his bloody spoils in triumph borne;
 With this keen javelin shall his breast be gor'd,
 And prostrate heroes bleed around their lord.
 Certain as this, oh ! might my days endure,
 From age inglorious, and black death secure ;
 So might my life and glory know no bound,
 Like Pallas worshipp'd, like the Sun renown'd !
 As the next dawn, the last they shall enjoy,
 Shall crush the Greeks, and end the woes of Troy."

The leader spake. From all his host around
 Shouts of applause along the shores resound.
 Each from the yoke the smoking steeds unty'd,
 And fix'd their headstalls to his chariot side.
 Fat sheep and oxen from the town are led,
 With generous wine, and all-sustaining bread.
 Full hecatombs lay burning on the shore ;
 The winds to Heaven the curling vapours bore.
 Ungrateful offering to th' immortal powers !
 Whose wrath hung heavy o'er the Trojan towers ;
 Nor Priam nor his sons obtain'd their grace :
 Proud Troy they hated, and her guilty race.

The troops exulting sat in order round,
 And beaming fires illumin'd all the ground ;
 As when the Moon, refulgent lanip of night !
 O'er Heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light,
 When not a breath disturbs the deep serene,
 And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene ;
 Around her throne the vivid planets roll,
 And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole ;
 O'er the dark trees a yellower verdure shed,
 And tip with silver every mountain's head ;
 Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise,
 A flood of glory bursts from all the skies :
 The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight,
 Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light :
 So many flames before proud Ilion blaze,
 And lighten glimmering Xanthus with their rays :
 The long reflections of the distant fires
 Gleam on the walls, and tremble on the spires.
 A thousand piles the dusky horrors gild,
 And shoot a shady lustre o'er the field.
 Full fifty guards each flaming pile attend,
 Whose umber'd arms, by fits, thick flashes send ;
 Loud neigh the coursers o'er their heaps of corn ;
 And ardent warriors wait the rising morn.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK IX.

ARGUMENT.

THE EMBASSY TO ACHILLES.

AGAMEMNON, after the last day's defeat, proposes to the Greeks to quit the siege, and return to their country. Diomed opposes this; and Nestor seconds him, praising his wisdom and resolution:

he orders the guard to be strengthened, and a council summoned to deliberate what measures are to be followed in this emergency. Agamemnon pursues this advice: and Nestor farther prevails upon him to send ambassadors to Achilles, in order to move him to a reconciliation. Ulysses and Ajax are made choice of, who are accompanied by old Phœnix. They make, each of them, very moving and pressing speeches; but are rejected, with roughness, by Achilles, who, notwithstanding, retains Phœnix in his tent. The ambassadors return unsuccessfully to the camp; and the troops betake themselves to sleep.

This book, and the next following, take up the space of one night, which is the twenty-seventh from the beginning of the poem. The scene lies on the sea-shore, the station of the Grecian ships.

Thus joyful Troy maintain'd the watch of night;
 While fear, pale comrade of inglorious fight,
 And heaven-bred horror, on the Grecian part,
 Sat on each face, and sadden'd every heart.
 As, from its cloudy dungeon issuing forth,
 A double tempest of the west and north
 Swells o'er the sea, from Thracia's frozen shore,
 Heaps waves on waves, and bids the Ægean roar;
 This way and that, the boiling deeps are tost;
 Such various passions urge the troubled host.
 Great Agamemnon griev'd above the rest;
 Superior sorrows swell'd his royal breast;
 Himself his orders to the heralds bears,
 To bid to council all the Grecian peers;
 But bid in whispers: these surround the chief,
 In solemn sadness, and majestic grief.
 The king amidst the mournful circle rose;
 Down his wan cheek a briny torrent flows:
 So silent fountains, from a rock's tall head,
 In sable streams soft-trickling waters shed.
 With more than vulgar grief he stood oppress,
 Words, mix'd with sighs, thus bursting from his breast:

"Ye sons of Greece! partake your leader's care;
 Fellows in arms, and princes of the war!
 Of partial Jove too justly we complain,
 And heavenly oracles believ'd in vain.
 A safe return was promis'd to our toils,
 With conquest honour'd, and enrich'd with spoils:
 Now shameful flight alone can save the host;
 Our wealth, our people, and our glory lost.
 So Jove decrees. Almighty lord of all!
 Jove, at whose nod whole empires rise or fall,
 Who shakes the feeble props of human trust,
 And towers and armies humbles to the dust.
 Haste then, for ever quit these fatal fields,
 Haste to the joys our native country yields;
 Spread all your canvases, all your oars employ;
 Nor hope the fall of heaven-defended Troy."

He said; deep silence held the Grecian band,
 Silent, unmov'd, in dire dismay they stand,
 A pensive scene! till Tydeus' warlike son
 Roll'd on the king his eyes, and thus begun:
 "When kings advise us to renounce our fame,
 First let him speak, who first has suffer'd shame.
 If I oppose thee, prince, thy wrath withhold,
 The laws of council bid my tongue be bold.
 Thou first, and thou alone, in fields of fight,
 Durst brand my courage, and defame my might:

Now from a friend th' unkind reproach appear'd,
 The Greeks stood witness, all our army heard.
 The gods, O chief! from whom our honours spring,
 The gods have made thee but by halves a king.
 They gave thee sceptres, and a wide command,
 They gave dominion o'er the seas and land;
 The noblest power that might the world control
 They gave thee not—a brave and virtuous soul.
 In this a general's voice, that would suggest
 Yours like his own to every Grecian breast?
 Sinking in our want of worth, he stands;
 And if we fly, 'tis what our king commands.
 Be thou, inglorious! from th' embattled plain;
 Hips thou hast store, and nearest to the main;
 A nobler care the Grecians shall employ,
 To combat, conquer, and extirpate Troy.
 Here Greece shall stay; or, if all Greece retire,
 Myself will stay, till Troy or I expire;
 Myself and Stenelus will fight for fame;
 God led us fight, and 'twas with God we came."

Beceas'd; the Greeks loud acclamations raise,
 And voice to voice resounds Tydides' praise.
 Was Nestor then his reverend figure rear'd;
 He spoke; the host in still attention heard:
 "O truly great! in whom the gods have join'd
 Such strength of body with such force of mind;
 In conduct, as in courage, you excel,
 Still first to act what you advise so well.
 Those wholesome counsels which thy wisdom moves,
 Applauding Greece, with common voice, approves.
 King thou canst blame: a bold, but prudent youth;
 And blame ev'n kings with praise, because with truth.

And yet those years that since thy birth have run,
 Would hardly style thee Nestor's youngest son.
 Then let me add what yet remains behind,
 A thought unfinished in that generous mind;
 Age bids me speak; nor shall th' advice I bring Detest the people, or offend the king:

"Cur'd is the man, and void of law and right,
 Unworthy property, unworthy light,
 Unfit for public rule, or private care;
 That wretch, that monster, who delights in war:
 Whose lust is murder, and whose horrid joy,
 To tear his country, and his kind destroy!
 This night, refresh and fortify thy train;
 Between the trench and wall let guards remain:
 Be that the duty of the young and bold;
 But thou, O king! to council call the old:
 Great is thy sway, and weighty are thy cares;
 Thy high commands must spirit all our wars.
 With Thracian wines recruit thy honour'd guests,
 For happy counsels flow from sober feasts.
 Wise, weighty counsels, aid a state distress,
 And such a monarch as can choose the best.
 See! what a blaze from hostile tents aspires,
 How near our fleet approach the Trojan fires!
 Who can, unmov'd, behold the dreadful light?
 What eye beholds them, and can close to night?
 This dreadful interval determines all;
 Tomorrow, Troy must flame, or Greece must fall."

Thus spoke the hoary sage: the rest obey;
 Swift through the gates the guards direct their way.
 His son was first to pass the lofty mound,
 The generous Thrasymed, in arms renown'd:
 Next him, Acalaphus, Iälmen, stood,
 The double offspring of the warrior god.
 Dapryrus, Acharius, Merion, join,
 And Lycomed, of Cræon's noble line.

Seven were the leaders of the nightly bands;
 And each bold chief a hundred spears commands.
 The fires they light, to short repasts they fall;
 Some line the trench, and others man the wall.

The king of men, on public counsels bent,
 Conven'd the princes in his ample tent;
 Each seiz'd a portion of the kingly feast,
 But staid his hand when thirst and hunger ceas'd.
 Then Nestor spoke, for wisdom long approv'd,
 And, slowly rising, thus the council mov'd:

"Monarch of nations! whose superior sway
 Assembled states and lords of Earth obey,
 The laws and sceptres to thy hand are given,
 And millions own the care of thee and Heaven.
 O king! the counsels of my age attend;
 With thee my cares begin, in thee must end;
 Thee, prince! it fits alike to speak and hear,
 Pronounce with judgment, with regard give ear,
 To see no wholesome motion be withstood,
 And ratify the best for public good.

Nor, though a meaner give advice, repine,
 But follow it, and make the wisdom thine.
 Hear then a thought, not now conceiv'd in haste,
 At once my present judgment, and my past:
 When from Pelides' tent you forc'd the maid,
 I first oppos'd, and faithful durst dissuade;
 But bold of soul, when headlong fury fir'd,
 You wrong'd the man, by men and gods admir'd:
 Now seek some means his fatal wrath to end,
 With prayers to move him, or with gifts to bend."

To whom the king: "With justice hast thou
 A prince's faults, and I with reason own. [shown
 That happy man, whom Jove still honours most,
 Is more than armies, and himself an host.
 Blest in his love, this wond'rous hero stands;
 Heaven fights his war, and humbles all our bands,
 Fain would my heart, which err'd thro' frantic rage,
 The wrathful chief and angry gods assuage.
 If gifts immense his mighty soul can bow,
 Hear, all ye Greeks, and witness what I vow:

Ten weighty talents of the purest gold,
 And twice ten vases of refulgent mould;
 Seven sacred tripods, whose unus'd frame
 Yet knows no office, nor has felt the flame;
 Twelve steeds unmatch'd in fleetness and in force,
 And still victorious in the dusty course;
 (Rich were the man whose ample stores exceed
 The prizes purchas'd by their winged speed).
 Seven lovely captives of the Lesbian line,
 Skill'd in each art, unmatch'd, in form divine;
 The same I chose for more than vulgar charms,
 When Lesbos sunk beneath the hero's arms:
 All these, to buy his friendship, shall be paid,
 And, join'd with these, the long-contested maid;
 With all her charms, Briseis I resign,
 And solemn swear those charms were never mine:
 Untouch'd she stay'd, uninjur'd she removes,
 Pure from my arms, and guiltless of my loves.
 These, instant, shall be his; and if the powers
 Give to our arms proud Ilion's hostile towers,
 Then shall he store (when Greece the spoil divides)
 With gold and brass his loaded navy's sides.
 Besides, full twenty nymphs, of Trojan race,
 With copious love shall crown his warm embrace;
 Such as himself will choose: who yield to none,
 Or yield to Helen's heavenly charms alone.
 Yet hear me farther: when our wars are o'er,
 If safe we land on Argos' fruitful shore,
 There shall he live my son, our honours share,
 And with Orestes' self divide my care.

Yet more—three daughters in my court are bred,
 And each well worthy of a royal bed;
 Laodice and Iphigenia fair,
 And bright Chrysothemis with golden hair;
 Her let him choose, whom most his eyes approve;
 I ask no presents, no reward, for love:
 Myself will give the dowry; so vast a store
 As never father gave a child before.
 Seven ample cities shall confess his sway,
 Him Enopè, and Phœæ him obey,
 Cardamylè with ample turrets crown'd,
 And sacred Pedasus for vines renown'd;
 Æpea fair, the pastures Hira yields,
 And rich Antheia with her flowery fields:
 The whole extent to Pylôs sandy plain,
 Along the verdant margin of the main.
 There heifers graze, and labouring oxen toil;
 Bold are the men, and generous is the soil;
 There shall he reign with power and justice crown'd,
 And rule the tributary realms around.
 All this I give, his vengeance to control,
 And sure all this may move his mighty soul.
 Pluto, the grisly god, who never spares,
 Who feels no mercy, and who hears no prayers,
 Lives dark and dreadful in deep Hell's abodes,
 And mortals hate him, as the worst of gods.
 Great though he be, it fits him to obey;
 Since more than his my years, and more my sway.”
 The monarch thus. The reverend Nestor then:
 “Great Agamemnon! glorious king of men!
 Such are thy offers as a prince may take,
 And such as fits a generous king to make.
 Let chosen delegates this hour be sent (Myself will name them) to Pelides' tent:
 Let Phoenix lead, rever'd for hoary age,
 Great Ajax next, and Ithacus the sage.
 Yet more to sanctify the word you send,
 Let Hodius and Eurybates attend.
 Now pray to Jove to grant what Greece demands;
 Pray, in deep silence, and with purest hands.”
 He said, and all approv'd. The heralds bring
 The cleansing water from the living spring.
 The youth with wine the sacred goblets crown'd,
 And large libations drench'd the sands around.
 The rite perform'd, the chiefs their thirst allay,
 Then from the royal tent they take their way;
 Wise Nestor turns on each his careful eye,
 Forbids t' offend, instructs them to apply:
 Much he advis'd them all, Ulysses most,
 To deprecate the chief, and save the host.
 Thro' the still night they march, and hear the roar
 Of murmuring billows on the sounding shore.
 To Neptune, ruler of the seas profound,
 Whose liquid arms the mighty globe surround,
 They pour forth vows, their embassy to bless,
 And calm the rage of stern Æacides.
 And now, arriv'd where on the sandy bay
 The Myrmidonian tents and vessels lay,
 Amus'd at ease, the godlike man they found
 Pleas'd with the solemn harp's harmonious sound:
 (The well-wrought harp from conquer'd Thebæ
 Of polish'd silver was its costly frame): [came,
 With this he soothes his angry soul, and sings
 Th' immortal deeds of heroes and of kings.
 Patroclus only of the royal train,
 Plac'd in his tent, attends the lofty strain:
 Full opposite he sat, and listen'd long,
 In silence waiting till he ceas'd the song.
 Unseen the Grecian embassy proceeds
 To his high tent; the great Ulysses leads.

Achilles, starting, as the chiefs he spy'd,
 Leap'd from his seat, and laid the harp aside.
 With like surprise arose Menœtius' son:
 Pelides grasp'd their hands, and thus begun:
 “Princes, all hail! whatever brought you here,
 Or strong necessity, or urgent fear;
 Welcome, though Greeks! for not as foes ye came
 To me more dear than all that bear the name.”
 With that, the chiefs beneath his roof he led,
 And plac'd in seats with purple carpets spread.
 Then thus—“Patroclus, crown a larger bowl,
 Mix purer wine, and open every soul.
 Of all the warriors yonder host can send,
 Thy friend most honours these, and these thy friend.”

He said; Patroclus o'er the blazing fire,
 Heaps in a brazen vase three chimes entire:
 The brazen vase Automedon sustains,
 Which flesh of porket, sheep, and goat, contains:
 Achilles at the genial feast presides,
 The parts transfixes, and with skill divides.
 Meanwhile Patroclus sweats the fire to raise;
 The tent is brighten'd with the rising blaze:
 Then, when the languid flames at length subside,
 He strows a bed of glowing embers wide,
 Above the coals the smoking fragments turns,
 And sprinkles sacred salt from lifted urns;
 With bread the glittering cannisters they load,
 Which round the board Menœtius' son bestow'd;
 Himself, oppos'd t' Ulysses full in sight,
 Each portion parts, and orders every rite.
 The first fat offerings, to th' immortals due,
 Amidst the greedy flames Patroclus threw;
 Then each, indulging in the social feast,
 His thirst and hunger soberly repeat.
 That done, to Phoenix Ajax gave the sign,
 Not unperceiv'd; Ulysses crown'd with wine
 The foaming bowl, and instant thus began,
 His speech addressing to the godlike man:

“Health to Achilles! happy are thy guests!
 Not those more honour'd whom Atreides feasts:
 Though generous plenty crown thy loaded boards,
 That Agamemnon's regal tent affords;
 But greater cares sit heavy on our souls,
 Not eas'd by banquets, or by flowing bowls.
 What scenes of slaughter in yon fields appear!
 The dead we mourn, and for the living fear;
 Greece on the brink of fate all doubtful stands,
 And owns no help but from thy saving hands:
 Troy, and her aids, for ready vengeance call;
 Their threatening tents already shade our wall:
 Hear how with shouts their conquest they proclaim,
 And point at every ship their vengeful flame!
 For them the father of the gods declares,
 Theirs are his omens, and his thunder theirs.
 See, full of Jove, avenging Hector rise!
 See, Heaven and Earth the raging chief defies;
 What fury in his breast, what lightning in his eyes!
 He waits but for the morn, to sink in flame
 The ships, the Greeks, and all the Grecian name.
 Heavens! how my country's woes distract my mind,
 Lest fate accomplish all his rage design'd.
 And must we, gods! our heads inglorious lay
 In Trojan dust, and this the fatal day?
 Return, Achilles! oh return, though late,
 To save thy Greeks, and stop the course of fate;
 If in that heart or grief or courage lies,
 Rise to redeem; ah yet, to conquer, rise!
 The day may come, when, all our warriors slain,
 That heart shall melt, that courage rise in vain.

Regard in time, O prince divinely brave!
 These wholesome counsels which thy father gave.
 When Peleus in his aged arms embrac'd
 His parting son, these accents were his last:
 'My child! with strength, with glory and success,
 Thy arms may Juno and Minerva bless!
 Trust that to Heaven: but thou, thy cares engage
 To calm thy passions, and subdue thy rage:
 From gentler manners let thy glory grow,
 And shun contention, the sure source of woe;
 That young and old may in thy praise combine,
 The virtues of humanity be thine—'
 This now despis'd advice, thy father gave;
 Ah, check thy anger, and be truly brave.
 If thou wilt yield to great Atrides' prayers,
 Gifts worthy thee his royal hand prepares;
 If not—but hear me, while I number o'er
 The proffer'd presents, an exhaustless store:
 Ten weighty talents of the purest gold,
 And twice ten vases of refulgent mould;
 Seven sacred tripods, whose unsully'd frame
 Yet knows no office, nor has felt the flame:
 Twelve steeds unmatch'd in fleetness and in force,
 And still victorious in the dusty course;
 (Rich were the man whose ample stores exceed
 The prizes purchas'd by their winged speed).
 Seven lovely captives of the Lesbian line,
 Skill'd in each art, unmatch'd, in form divine;
 The same be chose for more than vulgar charms,
 When Lesbos sunk beneath thy conquering arms.
 All these, to buy thy friendship, shall be paid,
 And, join'd with these, the long-contested maid;
 With all her charms, Briseis he'll resign,
 And solemn swear those charms were only thine;
 Untouch'd she stay'd, uninjur'd she removes,
 Pure from his arms, and guiltless of his loves.
 These, instant, shall be thine; and if the powers
 Give to our arms proud Iliou's hostile towers,
 Then shalt thou store (when Greece the spoil divides)
 With gold and brass thy loaded navy's sides.
 Besides, full twenty nymphs of Trojan race,
 With copious love, shall crown thy warm embrace;
 Such as thyself shall choose; who yield to none,
 Or yield to Helen's heavenly charms alone.
 Yet hear me farther: when our wars are o'er,
 If safe we land on Argos' fruitful shore,
 There shalt thou live his son, his honours share,
 And with Orestes' self divide his care.
 Yet more—three daughters in his court are bred,
 And each well worthy of a royal bed;
 Lædice and Iphigenia fair,
 And bright Chrysothemis with golden hair;
 Her shalt thou wed whom most thy eyes approve:
 He asks no presents, no reward for love:
 Himself will give the dower: so vast a store
 As never father gave a child before.
 Seven ample cities shall confess thy sway,
 The Boeæ, and Phœæ these obey,
 Cardamyle with ample turrets crown'd,
 And sacred Pedæuss, for vines renown'd:
 Epea fair, the pastures Hira yields,
 And rich Antheia with her flowery fields:
 The whole extent to Pylos' sandy plain,
 Along the verdant margin of the main.
 There heifers graze, and labouring oxen toil;
 Bold are the men, and generous is the soil.
 There shalt thou reign with power and justice
 And rule the tributary realms around. [crown'd,
 Such are the proffers which this day we bring,
 Seek the repentance of a suppliant king;

But if all this, relentless, thou disdain,
 If honour, and if interest, plead in vain;
 Yet some redress to suppliant Greece afford,
 And be, amongst her guardian gods, ador'd.
 If no regard thy suffering country claim,
 Hear thy own glory, and the voice of fame:
 For know that chief, whose unresisted ire
 Made nations tremble, and whose hosts retire,
 Proud Hector, now, th' unequal fight demands,
 And only triumphs to deserve thy hands."
 Then thus the goddess-born: "Ulysses, hear
 A faithful speech, that knows nor art, nor fear;
 What in my secret soul is understood,
 My tongue shall utter, and my deeds maké good.
 Let Greece then know, my purpose I retain:
 Nor with new treaties vex my peace in vain.
 Who dares think one thing, and another tell,
 My heart detests him as the gates of Hell.
 "Then thus, in short, my fixt resolves attend,
 Which nor Atrides, nor his Greeks, can bend;
 Long toils, long perils, in their cause I bore,
 But now th' unfruitful glories charm no more.
 Fight or fight not, a like reward we claim,
 The wretch and hero find their prize the same;
 Alike regretted in the dust he lies,
 Who yields ignobly, or who bravely dies.
 Of all my dangers, all my glorious pains,
 A life of labours, lo! what fruit remains?
 As the bold bird her helpless young attends,
 From danger guards them, and from want defends:
 In search of prey she wings the spacious air,
 And with th' untasted food supplies her care:
 For thankless Greece such hardships have I brav'd,
 Her wives, her infants, by my labours sav'd,
 Long sleepless nights in heavy arms I stood,
 And sweat laborious days in dust and blood.
 I sack'd twelve ample cities on the main,
 And twelve lay smoking on the Trojan plain:
 Then at Atrides' haughty feet were laid
 The wealth I gather'd, and the spoils I made.
 Your mighty monarch these in peace possess;
 Some few my soldiers had, himself the rest.
 Some present too to every prince was paid;
 And every prince enjoys the gift he made;
 I only must refund, of all his train;
 See what pre-eminence our merits gain!
 My spoil alone his greedy soul delights:
 My spouse alone must bless his lustful nights:
 The woman, let him (as he may) enjoy;
 But what's the quarrel then of Greece to Troy?
 What to these shores th' assembled nations draw,
 What calls for vengeance but a woman's cause?
 Are fair endowments, and a beauteous face,
 Belov'd by none but those of Atreus' race?
 The wife whom choice and passion both approve,
 Sure every wise and worthy man will love.
 Nor did my fair-one less distinction claim;
 Stave as she was, my soul ador'd the dame.
 Wrong'd in my love, all proffers I disdain;
 Deceiv'd for once, I trust not kings again.
 Ye have my answer—what remains to do,
 Your king, Ulysses, may consult with you.
 What needs be the defence this arm can make?
 Has he not walls no human force can shake?
 Has he not fenc'd his guarded navy round,
 With piles, with ramparts, and a trench profound?
 And will not these (the wonders he has done)
 Repel the rage of Priam's single son?
 There was a time ('twas when for Greece I fought)
 When Hector's prowess no such wonders wrought:

He kept the verge of Troy, nor dar'd to wait
 Achilles' fury at the Scæan gate;
 He try'd it once, and scarce was sav'd by fate.
 But now those ancient enmities are o'er;
 Tomorrow we the favouring gods implore;
 Then shall you see our parting vessels crown'd,
 And hear with oars the Hellespont resound.
 The third day hence, shall Pthia greet our sails,
 If mighty Neptune send propitious gales;
 Pthia to her Achilles shall restore
 The wealth he left for this detested shore:
 Thither the spoils of this long war shall pass,
 The ruddy gold, the steel, and shining brass;
 My beauteous captives thither I'll convey,
 And all that rests of my unravish'd prey.
 One only valued gift your tyrant gave,
 And that resum'd, the fair Lyrnessian slave.
 Then tell him, loud, that all the Greeks may hear,
 And learn to scorn the wretch they basely fear;
 (For, arm'd in impudence, mankind he braves,
 And meditates new cheats on all his slaves;
 Though shameless as he is, to face these eyes
 Is what he dares not; if he dares, he dies)
 Tell him, all terms, all commerce, I decline,
 Nor share his council, nor his battle join:
 For once deceiv'd, was his; but twice, were mine.
 No—let the stupid prince, whom Jove deprives
 Of sense and justice, run where frenzy drives;
 His gifts are hateful: kings of such a kind
 Stand but as slaves before a noble mind.
 Not though he proffer'd all himself possess,
 And all his rapine could from others wrest;
 Not all the golden tides of wealth that crown
 The many-peopled Orchomenian town;
 Not all proud Thebes' unrivall'd walls contain,
 The world's great empress on th' Egyptian plain,
 (That spreads her conquests o'er a thousand states,
 And pours her heroes through a hundred gates,
 Two hundred horsemen, and two hundred cars,
 From each wide portal issuing to the wars)
 Tho' bribes were heap'd on bribes, in number more
 Than dust in fields, or sands along the shore;
 Should all these offers for my friendship call;
 'Tis he that offers, and I scorn them all.
 Atrides' daughter never shall be led (An ill-match'd consort) to Achilles' bed;
 Like golden Venus though she charm'd the heart,
 And vy'd with Pallas in the works of art.
 Some greater Greek let those high nuptials grace,
 I hate alliance with a tyrant's race.
 If Heaven restore me to my realms with life,
 The reverend Peleus shall elect my wife.
 Thessalian nymphs there are, of form divine,
 And kings that sue to mix their blood with mine.
 Blest in kind love my years shall glide away,
 Content with just hereditary sway;
 There, deaf for ever to the martial strife,
 Enjoy the dear prerogative of life.
 Life is not to be bought with heaps of gold;
 Not all Apollo's Pythian treasures hold,
 Or Troy once held, in peace and pride of sway,
 Can bribe the poor possession of a day!
 Lost herds and treasures we by arms regain,
 And steeds unrivall'd on the dusty plain:
 But from our lips the vital spirit fled,
 Returns no more to wake the silent dead.
 My fates long since by Thetis were disclos'd,
 And each alternate, life or fame, propos'd;
 Here, if I stay, before the Trojan town,
 Short is my date, but deathless my renown;

If I return, I quit immortal praise
 For years on years, and long-extended days.
 Convinc'd, though late, I find my fond mistake,
 And warn the Greeks the wiser choice to make:
 To quit these shores, their native seats enjoy,
 Nor hope the fall of heaven-defended Troy.
 Jove's arm display'd asserts her from the skies;
 Her hearts are strengthen'd, and her glories rise.
 Go then, to Greece report our fix'd design;
 Bid all your counsels, all your armies join,
 Let all your forces, all your arts conspire,
 To save the ships, the troops, the chiefs, from fire.
 One stratagem has fail'd, and others will:
 Ye find, Achilles is unconquer'd still.
 Go then—digest my message as ye may—
 But here this night let reverend Phoenix stay:
 His tedious toils and hoary hairs demand
 A peaceful death in Pthia's friendly land.
 But whether he remain, or sail with me,
 His age be sacred, and his will be free."
 The son of Peleus ceas'd: the chiefs around
 In silence wrapt, in consternation drown'd,
 Attend the stern reply. Then Phoenix rose;
 (Down his white beard a stream of sorrow flows)
 And while the fate of suffering Greece he mourn'd,
 With accent weak these tender words return'd:
 "Divine Achilles! wilt thou then retire,
 And leave our hosts in blood, our fleets on fire?
 If wrath so dreadful fill thy ruthless mind,
 How shall thy friend, thy Phoenix, stay behind?
 The royal Peleus, when from Pthia's coast
 He sent thee early to th' Achaian host;
 Thy youth, as then in sage debates unskill'd,
 And new to perils of the direful field:
 He bade me teach thee all the ways of war;
 To shine in councils, and in camps to dare.
 Never, ah! never let me leave thy side!
 No time shall part us, and no fate divide.
 Not tho' the god, that breath'd my life, restore
 The bloom I boasted, and the port I bore,
 When Greece of old beheld my youthful flames,
 (Delightful Greece, the land of lovely dames!)
 My father, faithless to my mother's arms,
 Old as he was, ador'd a stranger's charms.
 I try'd what youth could do (at her desire)
 To win the damsel, and prevent my sire.
 My sire with curses loads my hated head,
 And cries, 'Ye furies! barren be his bed.'
 Infernal Jove, the vengeful fiends below,
 And ruthless Proserpine, confirm'd his vow.
 Despair and grief distract my labouring mind!
 Gods! what a crime my impious heart design'd!
 I thought (but some kind god that thought suppress'd)
 To plunge the poniard in my father's breast,
 Then meditate my flight; my friends in vain
 With prayers entreat me, and with force detain.
 On fat of rams, black bulls, and brawny swine,
 They daily feast, with draughts of fragrant wine:
 Strong guards they plac'd, and watch'd nine nights entire;
 The roofs and porches flam'd with constant fire.
 The tenth, I forc'd the gates unseen of all;
 And, favour'd by the night, o'erleap'd the wall.
 My travels thence through spacious Greece extend;
 In Pthia's court at last my labours end.
 Your sire receiv'd me, as his son caress'd,
 With gifts enrich'd, and with possessions bless'd.
 The strong Dolopians thenceforth own'd my reign,
 And all the coast that runs along the main.

By love to thee his bounties I repaid,
 And early wisdom to thy soul convey'd :
 Great as thou art, my lessons made thee brave,
 A child I took thee, but a hero gave.
 Thy infant breast a like affection show'd ;
 Still in my arms, (an ever-pleasing load)
 Or at my knees, by Phoenix would'st thou stand ;
 No food was grateful but from Phoenix' hand.
 I pass my watchings o'er thy helpless years,
 The tender labours, the compliant cares ;
 The gods (I thought) revers'd their hard decree,
 And Phoenix felt a father's joys in thee :
 Thy growing virtues justify'd my cares,
 And promis'd comfort to my silver hairs.
 Now be thy rage, thy fatal rage, resign'd ;
 A cruel heart ill suits a manly mind :
 The gods (the only great, and only wise)
 Are mov'd by offerings, vows, and sacrifice ;
 Offending man their high compassion wins,
 And daily prayers atone for daily sins.
 Prayers are Jove's daughters, of celestial race,
 Lame are their feet, and wrinkled is their face ;
 With humble mien and with dejected eyes,
 Constant they follow, where injustice flies :
 Justice, swift, erect, and unconfin'd,
 Sweeps the wide Earth, and tramples o'er mankind,
 While Prayers, to heal her wrongs, move slow behind.

Who hears these daughters of almighty Jove,
 For him they mediate to the throne above :
 When man rejects the humble suit they make,
 The sire revenges for the daughters' sake ;
 From Jove commission'd, fierce Injustice then
 Descends, to punish unrelenting men.
 Oh, let not headlong passion bear the sway ;
 These reconciling goddesses obey :
 Due honours to the seed of Jove belong ;
 Due honours calm the fierce, and bend the strong.
 Were these not paid thee by the terms we bring,
 Were rage still harbour'd in the haughty king :
 Nor Greece, nor all her fortunes, should engage
 Thy friend to plead against so just a rage.
 But since what honour asks, the general sends,
 Ascends by those whom most thy heart commends,
 The best and noblest of the Grecian train ;
 Permit not these to sue, and sue in vain !
 Let me (my son) an ancient fact unfold,
 A great example drawn from times of old ;
 Hear what our fathers were, and what their praise,
 Who conquer'd their revenge in former days.

“ Where Calydon on rocky mountains stands,
 Once fought th' Ætolian and Curetian bands ;
 To guard it those, to conquer these advance ;
 And mutual deaths were dealt with mutual chance.
 The silver Cynthia bade Contention rise,
 In vengeance of neglected sacrifice ;
 On Oeneus' field she sent a monstrous boar,
 That level'd harvests, and whole forests tore :
 This beast (when many a chief his tusks had slain)
 Great Meleager stretch'd along the plain.
 Then, for his spoils, a new debate arose,
 The neighbour nations thence commencing foes.
 Strong as they were, the bold Curetes fall'd,
 While Meleager's thundering arm prevail'd :
 Till rage at length inflam'd his lofty breast
 For rage invades the wisest and the best).
 “ Curs'd by Althæa, to his wrath he yields,
 And in his wife's embrace forgets the fields.
 —(She from Marpessa sprung, divinely fair,
 And matchless Idas, more than man in war ;

The god of day ador'd the mother's charms :
 Against the god the father bent his arms :
 Th' afflicted pair, their sorrows to proclaim,
 From Cleopatra chang'd this daughter's name,
 And call'd Aleyone ; a name to show
 The father's grief, the mourning mother's woe.)—
 To her the chief retir'd from stern debate,
 But found no peace from fierce Althæa's hate :
 Althæa's hate th' unhappy warrior drew,
 Whose luckless hand his royal uncle slew ;
 She beat the ground, and call'd the powers beneath
 On her own son to wreak her brother's death :
 Hell heard her curses from the realms profound,
 And the red fiends that walk the nightly round,
 In vain Ætolia her deliverer waits,
 War shakes her walls, and thunders at her gates.
 She sent ambassadors, a chosen band,
 Priests of the gods, and elders of the land ;
 Besought the chief to save the sinking state :
 Their prayers were urgent, and their proffers great :
 (Full fifty acres of the richest ground,
 Half pasture green, and half with vineyards crown'd.)
 His suppliant father, aged Oeneus, came ;
 His sisters follow'd ; ev'n the vengeful dame
 Althæa sues ; his friends before him fall :
 He stands relentless, and rejects them all.
 Meanwhile the victor's shouts ascend the skies ;
 The walls are scal'd ; the rolling flames arise ;
 At length his wife (a form divine) appears,
 With piercing cries, and supplicating tears ;
 She paints the horrors of a conquer'd town,
 The heroes slain, the palaces o'erthrown,
 The matrons ravish'd, the whole race enslav'd :
 The warrior heed, he vanquish'd, and he sav'd.
 Th' Ætolians, long disdain'd, now took their turn,
 And left the chief their broken faith to mourn.
 Learn hence, betimes to curb pernicious ire,
 Nor stay, till yonder fleets ascend in fire :
 Accept the presents ; draw thy conquering sword ;
 And be amongst our guardian gods ador'd.”

Thus he. The stern Achilles thus reply'd :
 “ My second father, and my reverend guide :
 Thy friend, believe me, no such gifts demands,
 And asks no honours from a mortal's hands :
 Jove honours me, and favours my designs ;
 His pleasure guides me, and his will confines.
 And here I stay (if such his high behest)
 While life's warm spirit beats within my breast.
 Yet hear one word, and lodge it in thy heart ;
 No more molest me on Atreides' part :
 Is it for him these tears are taught to flow,
 For him these sorrows ? for my mortal foe ?
 A generous friendship no cold medium knows,
 Burns with one love, with one resentment glows ;
 One should our interests and our passions be ;
 My friend must hate the man that injures me.
 Do this, my Phoenix, 'tis a generous part ;
 And share my realms, my honours, and my heart.
 Let these return : our voyage, or our stay,
 Rest undetermin'd till the dawning day.”

He ceas'd : then order'd for the sage's bed
 A warmer couch with numerous carpets spread,
 With that, stern Ajax his long silence broke,
 And thus, impatient, to Ulysses spoke :

“ Hence let us go—why waste we time in vain ?
 See what effect our low submissions gain !
 Lik'd or not lik'd, his words we must relate,
 The Greeks expect them, and our heroes wait,
 Proud as he is, that iron heart retains
 Its stubborn purpose, and his friends disdain.

Stern and un pitying! if a brother bleed,
On just atonement, we remit the deed;
A sire the slaughter of his son forgives;
The price of blood discharg'd, the murderer lives:
The haughtiest hearts at length their rage resign,
And gifts can conquer every soul but thine.
The gods that unrelenting breast have steel'd,
And curs'd thee with a mind that cannot yield.
One woman-slave was ravish'd from thy arms:
Lo, seven are offer'd, and of equal charms.
Then hear, Achilles! be of better mind;
Reverse thy roof, and to thy guests be kind;
And know the men, of all the Grecian host,
Who honour worth, and prize thy valour most."

"Oh soul of battles, and thy people's guide!"
(To Ajax thus the first of Greeks reply'd)

"Well hast thou spoke; but at the tyrant's name
My rage rekindles, and my soul's on flame:
'Tis just resentment, and becomes the brave;
Disgrac'd, dishonour'd, like the vilest slave!
Return then, heroes! and our answer bear,
The glorious combat is no more my care;
Not till, amidst you sinking navy slain,
The blood of Greeks shall dye the sable main;
Not till the flames, by Hector's fury thrown,
Consume your vessels, and approach my own;
Just there, th' impetuous homicide shall stand,
There cease his battle, and there feel our hand."

This said, each prince a double goblet crown'd,
And cast a large libation on the ground;
Then to their vessels, through the gloomy shades,
The chiefs return; divine Ulysses leads.
Meantime Achilles' slaves prepar'd a bed,
With fieces, carpets, and soft linen spread:
There, till the sacred morn restor'd the day,
In slumber sweet the reverend Phoenix lay.
But in his inner tent, on ampler space,
Achilles slept; and in his warm embrace
Fair Diomedæ of the Lesbian race.

Last, for Patroclus was the couch prepar'd,
Whose nightly joys the beautiful Iphis shar'd;
Achilles to his friend consign'd her charms,
When Scyros fell before his conquering arms.
And now th' elected chiefs, whom Greece had sent,
Pass'd through the hosts, and reach'd the royal tent.
Then rising all, with goblets in their hands,
The peers and leaders of the Achaian bands,
Hail'd their return. Atrides first begun:

"Say what success? divine Laertes' son;
Achilles' high resolves declare to all;
Returns the chief, or must our navy fall?"

"Great king of nations!" (Ithacus reply'd)
"Fix'd is his wrath, unconquer'd is his pride;
He slights thy friendship, thy proposals scorns,
And, thus implor'd, with fiercer fury burns:
To save our army, and our fleets, to free,
Is not his care; but left to Greece and thee.
Your eyes shall view, when morning paints the
sky,

Beneath his oars the whitening billows fly,
Us too he bids our oars and sails employ,
Nor hope the fall of heaven-protected Troy;
For Jove o'ershades her with his arm divine,
Inspires her war, and bids her glory shine.
Such was his word: what farther he declar'd,
These sacred heralds and great Ajax heard.
But Phoenix in his tent the chief retains,
Safe to transport him to his native plains,
When morning dawns: if other he decree,
His age is sacred, and his choice is free."

Ulysses ceas'd: the great Achaian host,
With sorrow seiz'd, in consternation lost,
Attend the stern reply. Tydides broke
The general silence, and undaunted spoke:
"Why should we gifts to proud Achilles send?
Or strive with prayers his haughty soul to bend?
His country's woes he glories to deride,
And prayers will burst that swelling heart with pride.
Be the fierce impulse of his rage obey'd;
Our battles let him, or desert, or aid;
Then let him arm when Jove or he think fit;
That, to his madness, or to Heaven commit:
What for ourselves we can, is always ours;
'This night, let due repent refresh our powers
(For strength consists in spirits and in blood,
And those are ow'd to generous wine and food);
But when the rosy messenger of day
Strikes the blue mountains with her golden ray,
Rang'd at the ships, let all our squadrons shine,
In flaming arms, a long extended line:
In the dread front let great Atrides stand,
The first in danger, as in high command."
Shouts of acclaim the listening heroes raise,
Then each to Heaven the due libations pays;
Till sleep, descending o'er the tents, bestows
The grateful blessings of desir'd repose.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK X.

ARGUMENT.

THE NIGHT ADVENTURE OF DIOMED AND ULYSSES.

UPON the refusal of Achilles to return to the army, the distress of Agamemnon is described in the most lively manner. He takes no rest that night, but passes through the camp, awaking the leaders, and contriving all possible methods for the public safety. Menelaus, Nestor, Ulysses, and Diomed, are employed in raising the rest of the captains. They call a council of war, and determine to send scouts into the enemy's camp, to learn their posture, and discover their intentions, Diomed undertakes this hazardous enterprise, and makes choice of Ulysses for his companion. In their passage they surprize Dolon, whom Hector had sent on a like design to the camp of the Grecians. From him they are informed of the situation of the Trojan and auxiliary forces, and particularly of Rhesus, and the Thracians, who were lately arrived. They pass on with success; kill Rhesus, with several of his officers, and seize the famous horses of that prince, with which they return in triumph to the camp.

The same night continues; the scene lies in the two camps.

ALL night the chiefs before their vessels lay,
And lost in sleep the labours of the day:
All but the king; with various thoughts oppress,
His country's cares lay rolling in his breast.

As when, by lightnings, Jove's ethereal power
 Forceth the rattling hail, or weighty shower,
 Or sends soft snows to whiten all the shore,
 Or bids the brazen throat of war to roar;
 By fits one flash succeeds as one expires,
 And heaven flames thick with momentary fires.
 So bursting frequent from Atrides' breast,
 Sighs following sighs his inward fears confess.
 Now o'er the field, dejected, he surveys
 From thousand Trojan fires the mounting blaze;
 Hears in the passing wind their music blow,
 And marks distinct the voices of the foe.
 Now looking backwards to the fleet and coast,
 Anxious he sorrows for th' endanger'd host.
 He reads his hairs in sacrifice to Jove,
 And sees to him that ever lives above:
 Laly he groans; while glory and despair
 Divide his heart, and wage a doubtful war.

A thousand cares his labouring breast revolves;
 To seek sage Nestor now the chief resolves,
 With him, in wholesome counsels, to debate
 What yet remains to save th' afflicted state.
 He rises, and first he cast his mantle round,
 Next on his foot the shining sandals bound;
 A lion's yellow spoils his back conceal'd;
 His warlike hand a pointed javelin held.
 Meanwhile his brother, prest with equal woes,
 Alike deny'd the gifts of soft repose,
 Laments for Greece; that in his cause before
 So much had suffer'd and must suffer more.
 A leopard's spotted hide his shoulders spread;
 A brazen helmet glitter'd on his head:

Thus (with a javelin in his hand) he went
 To wake Atrides in the royal tent.
 Already wak'd, Atrides he decry'd,
 His armour buckling at his vessel's side.
 Joyful they met; the Spartan thus begun:
 "Why puts my brother his bright armour on?
 Seeks he some spy, amidst these silent hours,
 To try you camp, and watch the Trojan powers?
 But my, what hero shall sustain that task?
 Such bold exploits uncommon courage ask;
 Guideless, alone, through night's dark shade to go,

 And 'midst a hostile camp explore the foe!"

To whom the king: "In such distress we stand,
 No vulgar counsels our affairs demand;
 Greece to preserve, is now no easy part,
 But asks high wisdom, deep design, and art:
 For Jove avers our humble prayer denies,
 And bows his head to Hector's sacrifice.
 What eye has witness'd, or what ear believ'd,
 In one great day, by one great arm achiev'd,
 Such wondrous deeds as Hector's hand has done,
 And we beheld, the last revolving Sun?
 What honours the belov'd of Jove adorn!
 Sprung from no god, and of no goddess born,
 Yet such his acts, as Greeks unborn shall tell,
 And curse the battle where their fathers fell."

"Now speed thy hasty course along the fleet,
 There call great Ajax, and the prince of Cete;
 Ourselves to hoary Nestor will repair;
 To keep the guards on duty, be his care;
 (For Nestor's influence best the quarter guides,
 Whose son with Merion o'er the watch presides.)"
 To whom the Spartan: "These thy orders borne,
 Say, shall I stay, or with dispatch return?"
 "There shalt thou stay," (the king of men reply'd)
 "Else may we miss to meet, without a guide,
 The paths so many, and the camp so wide.

Still, with your voice, the slothful soldiers raise,
 Urge, by their father's fame, their future praise.
 Forget we now our state and lofty birth;
 Not titles here, but works, must prove our worth.
 To labour is the lot of man below;
 And when Jove gave us life, he gave us woe."

This said, each parted to his several cares;
 The king to Nestor's sable ship repairs;
 The sage protector of the Greeks he found
 Stretch'd in his bed with all his arms around;
 The various-colour'd scarf, the shield, his rears,
 The shining helmet, and the pointed spears:
 The dreadful weapons of the warrior's rage,
 That, old in arms, disdain'd the peace of age.
 Then, leaning on his hand his watchful head,
 The hoary monarch rais'd his eyes, and said:

"What art thou, speak, that on designs unknown,
 While others sleep thus range the camp alone?
 Seek'st thou some friend, or nightly sentinel?
 Stand off, approach not, but thy purpose tell."

"O son of Neleus" (thus the king rejoind)
 "Pride of the Greeks, and glory of thy kind!
 Lo here the wretched Agamemnon stands,
 Th' unhappy general of the Grecian bands;
 Whom Jove decrees with daily cares to bend,
 And woes, that only with his life shall end!
 Scarce can my knees these trembling limbs sustain,
 And scarce my heart support its load of pain.
 No taste of sleep these heavy eyes have known;
 Confus'd, and sad, I wander thus alone,
 With fears distracted, with no fix'd design;
 And all my people's miseries are mine.

If aught of use thy waking thoughts suggest,
 (Since cares, like mine, deprive thy soul of rest)
 Impart thy counsel, and assist thy friend;
 Now let us jointly to the trench descend,
 At every gate the fainting guard excite,
 Tir'd with the toils of day and watch of night:
 Else may the sudden foe our works invade,
 So near, and favour'd by the gloomy shade."

To him thus Nestor: "Trust the powers above,
 Nor think proud Hector's hopes confirm'd by Jove's;
 How ill agree the views of vain mankind,
 And the wise counsels of th' Eternal Mind!
 Audacious Hector! if the gods ordain
 That great Achilles rise and rage again,
 What toils attend thee, and what woes remain!
 Lo faithful Nestor thy command obeys;
 The care is next our other chiefs to raise:
 Ulysses, Diomed, we chiefly need;
 Meges for strength, Oilcus fam'd for speed.
 Some other be dispatch'd of nimble feet,
 To those tall ships, remotest of the fleet,
 Where lie great Ajax, and the king of Crete.
 To rouse the Spartan I myself decree;
 Dear as he is to us, and dear to thee,
 Yet must I tax his sloth, that claims no share
 With his great brother in his martial care:
 Him it behov'd to every chief to sue,
 Preventing every part perform'd by you;
 For strong necessity our toils demands,
 Claims all our hearts, and urges all our hands."

To whom the king: "With reverence we allow
 Thy just rebukes, yet learn to spare them now.
 My generous brother is of gentle kind;
 He seems remiss, but bears a valiant mind;
 Through too much deference to our sovereign sway,
 Content to follow when we lead the way.
 But now, our ills industrious to prevent,
 Long ere the rest, he rose, and sought my tent.

The chiefs you nam'd, already at his call,
Prepare to meet us near the navy wall;
Assembling there, between the trench and gates,
Near the night-guards, our chosen council waits."
"Then none" (said Nestor) "shall his rule with-
For great examples justify command." [stand,

With that the venerable warrior rose;
The shining greaves his manly legs enclose;
His purple mantle golden buckles join'd,
Warm with the softest wool, and doubly lin'd.
Then rushing from his tent, he snatch'd in haste
His steely lance, that lighten'd as he past.
The camp he travers'd through the sleeping crowd,
Stopp'd at Ulysses' tent, and call'd aloud.
Ulysses, sudden as the voice was sent,
Awakes, starts up, and issues from his tent.
"What new distress, what sudden cause of fright,
Thus leads you wandering in the silent night?"
"O prudent chief!" (the Pyliau sage reply'd)
"Wise as thou art, be now thy wisdom try'd;
Whatever means of safety can be sought,
Whatever counsels can inspire our thought,
Whatever methods, or to fly or fight;
All, all depend on this important night!"

He heard, return'd, and took his painted shield!
Then join'd the chiefs, and follow'd through the
Without his tent, bold Diomed they found, [field.
All sheath'd in arms, his brave companions round:
Each sunk in sleep, extended on the field,
His head reclining on his bossy shield.

A wood of spears stood by, that, fix'd upright,
Shot from their flashing points a quivering light.
A bull's black hide compos'd the hero's bed;
A splendid carpet roll'd beneath his head.
Then, with his foot, old Nestor gently shakes
The slumbering chief, and in these words awakes:

"Rise, son of Tydeus! to the brave and strong
Rest seems inglorious, and the night too long.
But sleep'st thou now? when from you hill the foe
Hangs o'er the fleet, and shades our walls below!"
At this, soft slumber from his eye-lids fled;
The warrior saw the hoary chief, and said,
"Wondrous old man! whose soul no respite knows,
Though years and honours bid thee seek repose,
Let younger Greeks our sleeping warriors wake;
Ill fits thy age these toils to undertake."

"My friend" (he answer'd) "generous is thy care,
These toils, my subjects and my sons might bear,
Their loyal thoughts and pious loves conspire
To ease a sovereign, and relieve a sire.
But now the last despair surrounds our host;
No hour must pass, no moment must be lost;
Each single Greek, in this conclusivest strife,
Stands on the sharpest edge of death or life:
Yet, if my years thy kind regard engage,
Employ thy youth as I employ my age:
Succeed to these my cares, and souse the rest;
He serves me most, who serves his country best."

This said, the hero o'er his shoulders flung
A lion's spoils, that to his ancles hung;
Then seiz'd his ponderous lance, and strode along.
Meges the bold, with Ajax fam'd for speed,
The warrior rous'd, and to th' entrenchments led.

And now the chiefs approach the nightly guard;
A wakeful squadron, each in arms prepar'd;
Th' unweary'd watch their listening leaders keep,
And, couching close, repel invading sleep.
So faithful dogs their fleecy charge maintain,
With tail protected from the prowling train,

When the gaunt lioness, with hunger bold,
Springs from the mountains tow'rd the guarded fold:
Through breaking woods her rustling course they hear;

Loud, and more loud, the clamours strike their ear
Of bounds and men; they start, they gaze around,
Watch every side, and turn to every sound.
Thus watch'd the Grecians, cautious of surprize,
Each voice, each motion, drew their ears and eyes;
Each step of passing feet increas'd th' affright;
And hostile Troy was ever full in sight.

Nestor with joy the wakeful band survey'd,
And thus accosted through the gloomy shade:
"Tis well, my sons! your nightly cares employ;
Else must our host become the scorn of Troy.
Watch thus, and Greece shall live!"—The hero said,
Then o'er the trench the following chiefsains led.
His son, and godlike Merion march'd behind
(For these the princes to their council join'd);
The trenches past, th' assembled kings around
In silent state the consistory crown'd.

A place there was yet undell'd with gore,
The spot where Hector stopp'd his rage before;
When night descending, from his vengeful hand
Repriev'd the relics of the Grecian band:
(The plain beside with mangled corpses was spread,
And all his progress mark'd by heaps of dead.)
There sat the mournful kings: when Nestor's son
The council opening, in these words began:

"Is there" (said he) "a chief so greatly brave,
His life to hazard, and his country save?
Lives there a man, who singly dares to go
To yonder camp, or seize some straggling foe?
Or, favour'd by the night, approach so near,
Their speech, their councils, and designs, to hear?
If to besiege our navies they prepare,
Or Troy once more must be the seat of war?
This could he learn, and to our peers recite,
And pass unarm'd the dangers of the night;
What fame were his through all succeeding days,
While Phœbus shines, or men have tongues to praise?"

What gifts his grateful country would bestow?
What must not Greece to her deliverer owe?
A sable ewe each leader should provide,
With each a sable lambkin by her side;
At every rite his share should be increas'd,
And his the foremost honours of the feast."
Fear held them mute: alone, untaught to fear,
Tydides spoke—"The man you seek, is here,
Through yon black camps to bend my dangerous
Some god within commands, and I obey." [way,
But let some other chosen warrior join,
To raise my hopes, and second my design.
By mutual confidence, and mutual aid,
Great deeds are done, and great discoveries made;
The wise new prudence from the wise acquire,
And one brave hero fans another's fire."

Contending leaders at the word arose:
Each generous breast with emulation glows:
So brave a task each Ajax strove to share,
Bold Merion strove, and Nestor's valiant heir;
The Spartan wish'd the second place to gain,
And great Ulysses wish'd, nor wish'd in vain.
Then thus the king of men the contest ends:
"Thou first of warriors, and thou best of friends,
Undaunted Diomed! what chief to join
In this great enterprise, is only thine.
Just be thy choice, without affection made;
To birth, or office, no respect be paid;

Let worth determine here. "The monarch spake,
And inly trembled for his brother's sake.

Then thus (the godlike Diomed rejoind') :
"My choice declares the impulse of my mind,
How can I doubt, while great Ulysses stands
To lend his counsels, and assist our hands ?
A chief, whose safety is Minerva's care ;
So fam'd, so dreadful, in the works of war :
Blest in his conduct, I no aid require ;
Wisdom like his might pass through flames of fire."

"It fits thee not, before these chiefs of fame," (Reply'd the sage) "to praise me, or to blame :
Praise from a friend, or censure from a foe,
Are lost on hearers that our merits know.

But let us haste—Night rolls the hours away,
The reddening orient shows the coming day,
The stars shine fainter on the ethereal plains,
And of night's empire but a third remains."

Thus having spoke, with generous ardour prest,
In arms terrific their huge limbs they drast.

A two-edg'd falchion Thrasymed the brave,
And ample buckler, to Tydides gave :

Then in a leathern helm he cas'd his head,
Short of its crest, and with no plume o'erspread :

(Such as by youths unus'd to arms are worn ;
No spoils enrich it, and no studs adorn.)

Next him Ulysses took a shining sword,
A bow and quiver, with bright arrows stor'd :

A well-pow'd casque, with leather braces bound,
(Thy gift, Meriones) his temples crown'd ;

Soft wool within, without, in order spread,
A boar's white teeth grin'd horrid o'er his head.

This from Amyntor, rich Ormenus' son,
Autolochus by fraudulent rapine won,

And gave Amphidamas ; from him the prize
Molus receiv'd, the pledge of social ties ;

The helmet next by Merion was possess'd,
And now Ulysses' thoughtful temples press'd.

Thus stealth'd in arms, the council they forsake,
And dark through paths oblique their progress

take.
Just then, in sign she favour'd their intent,
A long-wing'd heron great Minerva sent :

This, though surrounding shades obscur'd their view, [knew,

By the shrill clang, and whistling wings, they
As from the right she soar'd, Ulysses pray'd,

Hail'd the glad omen, and address'd the maid :
"O daughter of that god, whose arm can wield
Th' avenging bolt, and shake the dreadful shield !
O thou ! for ever present in my way,
Who all my motions, all my toils survey !
Safe may we pass beneath the gloomy shade,
Safe by thy succour to our ships convey'd ;
And let some deed this signal night adorn,
To claim the tears of Trojans yet unborn."

Then godlike Diomed preferr'd his prayer :
"Daughter of Jove, unconquer'd Pallas ! hear.
Great queen of arms, whose favour Tydeus won ;
As thou defend'st the sire, defend the son.

When on Æopos' banks the banded powers
Of Greece he left, and sought the Theban towers,
Peace was his charge ; receiv'd with peaceful show,
He went a legate, but return'd a foe :

Then help'd by thee, and cover'd by thy shield,
He fought with numbers, and made numbers yield.
So now be present, oh celestial maid !
So still continue to the race thine aid !

A youthful steer shall fall beneath the stroke,
Eptam'd, unconscious of the galling yoke,

With ample forehead, and with spreading horns,
Whose taper tops refulgent gold adorns."

The heroes pray'd ; and Pallas from the skies
Accords their vow, succeeds their enterprise.
Now, like two lions panting for the prey,
With dreadful thoughts they trace the dreary way,
Through the black horrors of th' ensanguin'd
plain, [of slain.

Through dust, through blood, o'er arms and hills
Nor less bold Hector, and the sons of Troy,
On high designs the wakeful hours employ ;
Th' assembled peers their lofty chief enclos'd ;
Who thus the counsels of his breast propos'd :

"What glorious man for high attempts prepar'd,
Dares greatly venture, for a rich reward,
Of yonder fleet a bold discovery make, [take ?
What watch they keep, and what resolves they if now subdued they meditate their flight,
And spent with toil neglect the watch of night ?
His be the chariot that shall please him most,
Of all the plunder of the vanquish'd host ;
His the fair steeds that all the rest excel,
And his the glory to have serv'd so well."

A youth there was among the tribes of Troy,
Dolon his name, Eumedes' only boy :

(Five girls beside the reverend herald told)
Rich was the son in brass, and rich in gold ;
Not blest by Nature with the charms of face,
But swift of foot, and matchless in the race,

"Hector !" (he said) "my courage bids me meet
This high achievement, and explore the fleet :

But first exalt thy sceptre to the skies,
And swear to grant me the demanded prize ;
Th' immortal coursers, and the glittering car,
That bear Pelides through the ranks of war.

Encourag'd thus, no idle scout I go,
Fulfil thy wish, their whole intention know,
Ev'n to the royal tent pursue my way,
And all their counsels, all their aims betray."

The chief then heav'd the golden sceptre high,
Attesting thus the monarch of the sky :

"Be witness thou ! immortal Lord of all !
Whose thunder shakes the dark aerial hall :

By none but Dolon shall this prize be borne,
And him alone th' immortal steeds adorn."

Thus Hector swore : the gods were call'd in vain,

But the rash youth prepares to scour the plain ;
Across his back the banded bow he flung,
A wolf's grey hide around his shoulders hung,

A ferret's downy fur his helmet lin'd,
And in his hand a pointed javelin shin'd,
Therewith (never to return) he sought the shore,
And trod the path his feet must tread no more.

Scarce had he pass'd the steeds and Trojan throng
(Still bending forward as he cours'd along),
When, on the hollow way, th' approaching tread
Ulysses mark'd, and thus to Diomed :

"O friend ! I hear some step of hostile feet,
Moving this way, or hastening to the fleet ;
Some spy perhaps to lurk beside the main ;
Or nightly pillager that strips the slain.

Yet let him pass, and win a little space ;
Then rush behind him, and prevent his pace.
But if too swift of foot he flies before,
Confine his course along the fleet and shore,

Betwixt the camp and him our spears employ,
And intercept his hop'd return to Troy."

With that they stepp'd aside, and stoop'd their
(As Dolon pass'd) behind a heap of dead : [head

Along the path the spy unwary flew;
Soft, at just distance, both the chiefs pursue.
So distant they, and such the space between,
As when two teams of mules divide the green
(To whom the hind like shares of land allows),
When now new furrows part th' approaching ploughs.

Now Dolon listening heard them as they past;
Hector (he thought) had sent, and check'd his
haste,

Till scarce at distance of a javelin's throw,
No voice succeeding, he perceiv'd the foe.
As when two skillful hounds the leveret wind;
Or chase through woods obscure the trembling
Now lost, now seen, they intercept his way, [hind;
And from the herd still turn the flying prey:
So fast, and with such fears, the Trojan flew;
So close, so constant, the bold Greeks pursue.
Now almost on the fleet the dastard falls,
And mingles with the guards that watch the walls;
When brave Tydides stopp'd; a generous thought
(Inspir'd by Pallas) in his bosom wrought,
Lest on the foe some forward Greek advance,
And snatch the glory from his lifted lance.
Then thus aloud: "Whoe'er thou art remain;
This javelin else shall fix thee to the plain."
He said, and high in air the weapon cast,
Which wifal err'd, and o'er his shoulder past;
Then fix'd in earth. Against the trembling wood
The wretch stood propp'd, and quiver'd as he
A sudden palsy seiz'd his turning head; [stood;
His loose teeth chatter'd, and his colour fled:
The panting warriors seize him as he stands,
And with unmanly tears his life demands.

"O spare my youth, and for the breath I owe,
Large gifts of price my father shall bestow.
Vast heaps of brass shall in your ships be told,
And steel well-temper'd, and refulgent gold."

To whom Ulysses made this wise reply;
"Whoe'er thou art, be bold, nor fear to die.
What moves thee, say, when sleep has clos'd
the sight,

To roam the silent fields in dead of night?
Can'st thou the secrets of our camp to find,
By Hector prompted, or thy daring mind?
Or art some wretch by hopes of plunder led Through heaps of carnage to despoil the dead?"
Then thus pale Dolon with a fearful look,
(Still as he spoke, his limbs with horror shook),
"Hither I came, by Hector's words deceiv'd;
Much did he promise, rashly I believ'd:
No less a bribe than great Achilles' car,
And those swift steeds that sweep the ranks of war,
Err'd me, unwilling, this attempt to make;
To learn what counsels, what resolves you take:
If, now subdued, you fix your hopes on flight,
And tir'd with toils, neglect the watch of night?"

"Bold was thy aim, and glorious was the prize!"
(Ulysses, with a scornful smile, replies)
"Far other rulers those proud steeds demand,
And scorn the guidance of a vulgar hand;
Ev'n great Achilles scarce their rage can tame,
Achilles, sprung from an immortal dame.
But say, be faithful, and the truth recite!
Where lies encamp'd the Trojan chief to night?
Where stand his coursers? in what quarter sleep
Their other princes? tell what watch they keep:
Say, since their conquest, what their counsels are;
Or here to combat, from their city far,
Or back to Ilium's wall transfer the war."

Ulysses thus, and thus Eumedes' son:

"What Dolon knows, his faithful tongue shall own.

Hector, the peers assembling in his tent,
A council holds at Ilius' monument.
No certain guards the nightly watch partake;
Where'er yon fires ascend, the Trojans wake:
Anxious for Troy, the guard the natives keep;
Safe in their cares, th' auxiliary forces sleep,
Whose wives and infants, from the danger far,
Discharge their souls of half the fears of war."

"Then sleep those aids among the Trojan
train,"

(Inquir'd the chief) "or scatter'd o'er the plain?"

To whom the spy: "Their powers they thus dispose:

The Pæons, dreadful with their bended bows,
The Carians, Caucons, the Pelægian host,
And Leleges, encamp along the coast.
Not distant far, lie higher on the land
The Lycian, Mysian, and Mæonian band,
And Phrygia's horse, by Thybras' ancient wall;
The Thracians utmost, and apart from all.

These Troy but lately to her succour won,
Led on by Rhesus, great Eioneus' son:
I saw his coursers in proud triumph go,
Swift as the wind, and white as winter snow:
Rich silver plates his shining car infold;
His solid arms, refulgent, flame with gold;
No mortal shoulders suit the glorious load,
Celestial panoply, to grace a god!

Let me, unhappy, to your feet be borne,
Or leave me here, a captive's fate to mourn,
In cruel chains; till your return reveal,
The truth or falsehood of the news I tell."

To this Tydides, with a gloomy frown:
"Think not to live, though all the truth be shown:

Shall we dismiss thee, in some future strife
To risk more bravely thy now forfeit life?
Or that again our camps thou may'st explore;
No—once a traitor thou betray'st no more."

Sternly he spoke, and as the wretch prepar'd
With humble blandishment to stroke his beard,
Like lightning swift the wrathful falchion flew,
Divides the neck, and cuts the nerves in two;
One instant snatch'd his trembling soul to Hell,
The head, yet speaking, mutter'd as it fell.
The furry helmet from his brow they tear,
The wolf's grey hide, th' unbended bow and spear;

These great Ulysses lifting to the skies,
To favouring Pallas dedicates the prize:

"Great queen of arms! receive this hostile spoil,

And let the Thracian steeds reward our toil:
Thee first of all the heavenly host we praise;
O speed our labours, and direct our ways!"
This said, the spoils with dropping gore defac'd,
High on a spreading tamarisk he plac'd;
Then heap'd with reeds and gather'd boughs the
plain,

To guide their footsteps to the place again.

Through the still night they cross the devious fields

Slippery with blood, o'er arms and heaps of shields,
Arriving where the Thracian squadrons lay,
And eas'd in sleep the labour of the day.
Rang'd in three lines they view the prostrate band:
The horses yok'd beside each warrior stand;

Their arms in order on the ground reclin'd,
Through the brown shade the fulgid weapons
shin'd:

Amid lay Rhesus, stretch'd in sleep profound,
And the white steeds behind his chariot bound.
The welcome sight Ulysses first decries,
And points to Doomed the tempting prize.

"The man, the coursers, and the car behold!
Describ'd by Dolon, with the arms of gold.
Now, brave Tydides! now thy courage try,
Approach the chariot, and the steeds untie,"
Or if thy soul aspire to fiercer deeds,
Urge thou the slaughter, while I seize the steeds.

Pallas (this said) her hero's bosom warms,
Breath'd in his heart, and strung his nervous arms,
Where'er he pass'd, a purple stream pursued
His thirsty falchion, fat with hostile blood;
Bath'd all his footsteps, dy'd the fields with gore,
And a low groan remurmur'd through the shore.
So the grim lion, from his nightly den,
O'erleaps the fences, and invades the pen;
On sheep or goats, resistless in his way,
He falls, and foaming rears the guardless prey.
Nor stopp'd the fury of his vengeful hand,
Till twelve lay breathless of the Thracian band.
Ulysses following, as his partner slew,
Back by the foot each slaughter'd warrior drew;
The milk-white coursers studious to convey
Safe to the ships, he wisely clear'd the way;
Lest the fierce steeds, not yet to battles bred,
Should start, and tremble at the heaps of dead.
Now twelve dispatch'd, the monarch last they found;

Tydid's falchion fix'd him to the ground.
Just then a deathful dream Minerva sent;
A wadlike form appear'd before his tent,
Whose visionary steel his bosom tore:
So dream'd the monarch, and awak'd no more.

Ulysses now the snowy steeds detains,
And leads them, fasten'd by the silver reins;
These, with his bow unbent, he lash'd along;
(The courage forgot, on Rhesus' chariot hung.)
Then gave his friend the signal to retire;
But hark, new dangers, new achievements fire:
Deathful he stood, or with his reeking blade
To send more heroes to th' infernal shade,
Drag off the car where Rhesus' armour lay,
Or heave with manly force, and lift away.
While unresolv'd the son of Tydeus stands,
Pallas appears, and thus her chief commands:
"Enough, my son; from farther slaughter cease,

Regard thy safety, and depart in peace;
Haste to the ships, the gotten spoils enjoy,
Nor tempt too far the hostile gods of Troy."

The voice divine confess'd the martial maid;
In haste he mounted, and her word obey'd;
The coursers fly before Ulysses' bow,
Swift as the wind, and white as winter-snow.

Not unobserv'd they pass'd: the god of light
Had watch'd his Troy, and mark'd Minerva's sight,

Saw Tydeus' son with heavenly succour blest,
And vengeful anger fill'd his sacred breast.
Swift to the Trojan camp descends the power,
And wakes Hippocoon in the morning hour
(On Rhesus' side accustom'd to attend,
A faithful kinsman, and instructive friend.)
He rose, and saw the field deform'd with blood,
An empty space where late the coursers stood,

The yet-warm Thracians panting on the coast;
For each he wept, but for his Rhesus most:
Now while on Rhesus' name he calls in vain,
The gathering tumult spreads o'er all the plain;
On heaps the Trojans rush, with wild affright,
And wondering view the slaughters of the night.

Meanwhile the chiefs arriving at the shade
Where late the spoils of Hector's spy were laid,
Ulysses stopp'd; to him Tydides bore
The trophy, dropping yet with Dolon's gore:
Then mounts again; again their nimble feet
The coursers ply, and thunder tow'rd the fleet.

Old Nestor first perceiv'd th' approaching sound,
Bespeaking thus the Grecian peers around:
"Methinks the noise of trampling steeds I hear,
Thickening this way, and gathering on my ear;
Perhaps some horses of the Trojan breed
(So may, ye gods! my pious hopes succeed).
The great Tydides and Ulysses bear,
Return'd triumphant with this prize of war.
Yet much I fear (ah may that fear be vain!)
The chiefs out-number'd by the Trojan train;
Perhaps ev'n now pursued, they seek the shore;
Or, oh! perhaps those heroes are no more."

Scarcely had he spoke, when lo! the chiefs appear,
And spring to earth; the Greeks dismiss their fear:
With words of friendship and extended hands
They greet the kings: and Nestor first demands:

"Say thou, whose praises all our host proclaim,
Thou living glory of the Grecian name!
Say, whence these coursers? by what chance
bestow'd?

The spoil of foes, or present of a god?
Not those fair steeds so radiant and so gay,
That draw the burning chariot of the day.
Old as I am, to age I scorn to yield,
And daily mingle in the martial field;
But sure till now no coursers struck my sight
Like these conspicuous through the ranks of fight.
Some god, I deem, conferr'd the glorious prize,
Blest as ye are, and favourites of the skies;
The care of him who bids the thunder roar,
And he, whose fury bathes the world with gore."

"Father! not so" (sage Ithacus rejoind)
"The gifts of Heaven are of a nobler kind.
Of Thracian lineage are the steeds ye view,
Whose hostile king the brave Tydides slew;
Sleeping he died, with all his guards around,
And twelve beside lay gasping on the ground.
These other spoils from conquer'd Dolon came,
A wretch, whose swiftness was his only fame,
By Hector sent our forces to explore,
He now lies headless on the sandy shore."

Then o'er the trench the bounding coursers flew;
The joyful Greeks with loud acclaim pursue.
Straight to Tydides' high pavillion borne,
The matchless steeds his ample stall adorn:
The neighing coursers their new fellows greet,
And the full racks are heap'd with generous wheat.
But Dolon's armour, to his ships convey'd,
High on the painted stern Ulysses laid,
A trophy destin'd to the blue-ey'd maid.

Now from nocturnal sweat, and sanguine stain,
They cleanse their bodies in the neighbouring
main:

Then in the polish'd bath, refresh'd from toil,
Their joints they supple with dissolving oil,

In due repast indulge the genial hour,
And first to Pallas the libations pour:
They sit, rejoicing in her aid divine,
And the crown'd goblet foams with floods of wine.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XI.

ARGUMENT.

THE THIRD BATTLE, AND THE ACTS OF AGAMEMNON.

AGAMEMNON, having armed himself, leads the Grecians to battle: Hector prepares the Trojans to receive them; while Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva, give the signals of war. Agamemnon bears all before him; and Hector is commanded by Jupiter (who sends Iris for that purpose) to decline the engagement, till the king shall be wounded and retire from the field. He then makes a great slaughter of the enemy; Ulysses and Diomed put a stop to him for a time; but the latter being wounded by Paris, is obliged to desert his companion, who is encompassed by the Trojans, wounded, and in the utmost danger, till Menelaüs and Ajax rescue him. Hector comes against Ajax; but that hero alone opposes multitudes, and rallies the Greeks. In the mean time Machaon, in the other wing of the army, is pierced with an arrow by Paris, and carried from the fight in Nestor's chariot. Achilles (who overlooked the action from his ship) sent Patroclus to inquire which of the Greeks was wounded in that manner? Nestor entertains him in his tent with an account of the accidents of the day, and a long recital of some former wars which he remembered, tending to put Patroclus upon persuading Achilles to fight for his countrymen, or at least permit him to do it, clad in Achilles' armour. Patroclus in his return meets Eurypylos also wounded, and assists him in that distress.

This book opens with the eight and twentieth day of the poem; and the same day, with its various actions and adventures, is extended through the twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, and part of the eighteenth books. The scene lies in the field, near the monument of Ilus.

The saffron Morn, with early blushes spread,
Now rose refulgent from Tithonius' bed;
With new-born day to gladden mortal sight,
And gild the courts of Heaven with sacred light:
When baleful Eris, sent by Jove's command,
The torch of discord blazing in her hand,
Through the red skies her bloody sign extends,
And, wrapt in tempests, o'er the fleet descends.
High on Ulysses' bark, her horrid stand
She took, and thunder'd through the seas and land.

Ev'n Ajax and Achilles heard the sound,
Whose ships, remote, the guarded navy bound,
Thence the black Fury through the Grecian throng
With horror sounds the loud Orthian song:
The navy shakes, and at the dire alarms
Each bosom boils, each warrior starts to arms.
No more they sigh, inglorious to return,
But breathe revenge, and for the combat burn.

The king of men his hardy host inspires
With loud command, with great example fires;
Himself first rose, himself before the rest
His mighty limbs in radiant armour drest.
And first he cas'd his manly legs around
In shining greaves, with silver buckles bound;
The beaming cuirass next adorn'd his breast,
The same which once King Cinyras possess'd:
(The fame of Greece and her assembled host
Had reach'd that monarch on the Cyprian coast;
'Twas then, the friendship of the chief to gain,
This glorious gift he sent, nor sent in vain.)
Ten rows of azure steel the work infold,
Twice ten of tin, and twelve of ductile gold;
Three glittering dragons to the gorget rise,
Whose imitated scales, against the skies
Reflected various light, and arching bow'd,
Like colour'd rainbows o'er a showery cloud,
(Jove's wondrous bow, of three celestial dyes, Plac'd as a sign to man amid the skies.)
A radiant baldrick, o'er his shoulder ty'd,
Sustain'd the sword that glitter'd at his side:
Gold was the hilt, a silver sheath encas'd
The shining blade, and golden hangers grac'd.
His buckler's mighty orb was next display'd,
That round the warrior cast a dreadful shade;
Ten zones of brass its ample brim surround,
And twice ten bosses the bright convex crown'd:
Tremendous Gorgon frown'd upon its field,
And circling terrors fill'd th' expressive shield;
Within its concave hung a silver thong,
On which a mimic serpent creeps along;
His azure length in easy waves extends,
Till in three heads th' embroider'd monster ends.
Last o'er his brows his fourfold helm he plac'd,
With nodding horse-hair formidably grac'd!
And in his hands two steely javelins wield,
That blaze to Heaven, and lighten all the fields.

That instant Juno and the martial maid
In happy thunders promis'd Greece their aid;
High o'er the chief they clash'd their arms in air;
And, leaning from the clouds, expect the war.

Close to the limits of the trench and mound,
The fiery coursers to their chariots bound
The squires restrain'd: the foot with those who
The lighter arms, rush forward to the field. [wield]
To second these, in close array combin'd,
The squadrons spread their sable wings behind.
Now shouts and tumults wake the tardy Sun,
As with the light the warrior's toils begun.
Ev'n Jove, whose thunder spoke his wrath, distill'd
Red drops of blood o'er all the fatal field;

The woes of men unwilling to survey,
And all the slaughters that must stain the day.

Near Ilus' tomb, in order rang'd around,
The Trojan lines possess'd the rising ground:
There wise Polydamas and Hector stood,
Æneas, honour'd as a guardian god;
Bold Polybus, Agenor the divine,
The brother warriors of Antenor's line;
With youthful Acamas, whose beauteous face
And fair proportion match'd th' æthereal race;

Great Hector cover'd with his spacious shield,
Plies all the troops, and orders all the field.
As the red star now shows his sanguine fires
Through the dark clouds, and now in night retires;
Thus through the ranks appear'd the god-like man,
Plung'd in the rear, or blazing in the van;
While streamy sparkles, restless as he flies,
Flash from his arms as lightning from the skies.
As sweating reapers in some wealthy field,
Rang'd in two bands, their crooked weapons wield,
Bear down the furrows, till their labours meet;
Thick falls the heapy harvest at their feet:
So Greece and Troy the field of war divide,
And falling ranks are strow'd on every side,
None stoop'd a thought to base inglorious flight;
But horse to horse, and man to man, they fight.
Not rabid wolves more fierce contest their prey;
Each wounds, each bleeds, but none resign the day.

Discord with joy the scene of death describes,
And drinks large slaughter at her sanguine eyes:
Discord alone, of all th' immortal train,
Swells the red horrors of this direful plain:
The gods in peace their golden mansions fill,
Rang'd in bright order on th' Olympian hill;
But general murmurs told their griefs above,
And each accus'd the partial will of Jove.
Meanwhile apart, superior, and alone,
Th' eternal monarch on his awful throne,
Wrapt in the blaze of boundless glory sat;
And, fr'd, fulfill'd the just decrees of fate.
On Earth he turn'd his all-considering eyes,
And mark'd the spot where Ilium's towers arise;
The sea with ships, the fields with armies spread,
The victor's rage, the dying and the dead.
Thus while the morning-beams increasing bright
O'er Heaven's pure azure spread the glowing light,

Communal death the fate of war confounds,
Each adverse battle gor'd with equal wounds.
But now (what time in some sequester'd vale,
The weary woodman spreads his sparing meal,
When his tir'd arms refuse the axe to rear,
And claim a respite from the sylvan war;
But not till half the prostrate forest lay
Stretch'd in long ruin, and expos'd to day)
Then, nor till then, the Greeks' impulsive might Pierc'd the black phalanx, and let in the light.
Great Agamemnon then the slaughter led,
And slew Bienor at his people's head:
Whose squire Oileus, with a sudden spring,
Leap'd from the chariot to revenge his king;
But in his front he felt the fatal wound,
Which pierc'd his brain, and stretch'd him on the ground.

Atrides spoil'd, and left him on the plain:
Vain was their youth, their glittering armour vain:

Now soild with dust, and naked to the sky,
Their snowy limbs and beauteous bodies lie.

Two sons of Priam next to battle move,
The product one of marriage, one of love!
In the same car the brother warriors ride,
This took the charge to combat, that to guide:
Far other task, than when they went to keep,
On Ida's tops their father's fleecy sheep!
These on the mountains once Achilles found,
And captive led, with pliant osiers bound;
Then to their sire for ample sums restor'd;
But now to perish by Atrides' sword;

Pierc'd in the breast the base-born Ius bleeds:
Cleft through the head, his brother's fate succeeds.
Swift to the spoil the hasty victor falls,
And stript, their features to his mind recalls.
The Trojans see the youths untimely die,
But helpless tremble for themselves, and fly.
So when a lion ranging o'er the lawns,
Finds, on some grassy lair, the couching fawns,
Their bones he cracks, their reeking vitals draws,
And grinds the quivering flesh with bloody jaws;
The frightened hind beholds, and dares not stay,
But swift through rustling thickets bursts her way;
All drown'd in sweat the panting mother flies,
And the big tears roll trickling from her eyes.

Amidst the tumult of the routed train,
The sons of false Antimachus were slain;
He, who for bribes his faithless counsels sold,
And voted Helen's stay for Paris' gold.
Atrides mark'd, as these their safety sought,
And slew the children for the father's fault;
Their headstrong horse unable to restrain,
They shook with fear, and dropp'd the siken reins;
Then in their chariot on their knees they fall,
And thus with lifted hands for mercy call:

"Oh spare our youth, and for the life we owe,
Antimachus shall copious gifts bestow;
Soon as he hears, that not in battleslain,
The Grecian ships his captive sons detain,
Large heaps of brass in ransom shall be told,
And steel well-temper'd, and persuasive gold."

These words, attended with a flood of tears,
The youths address'd to unrelenting ears:
The vengeful monarch gave this stern reply—
"If from Antimachus ye spring, ye die:
The daring wretch who once in council stood
To shed Ulysses' and my brother's blood,
For proffer'd peace! and sues his seed for grace?
No, die, and pay the forfeit of your race."

This said, Pisander from the car he cast,
And pierc'd his breast: supine he breath'd his last.
His brother leap'd to earth; but as he lay,
The trenchant falchion lopp'd his hands away;
His sever'd head was toss'd among the throng,
And, rolling, drew a bloody train along.
Then, where the thickest fought the victor flew;
The king's example all his Greeks pursue.
Now by the foot the flying foot were slain.
Horse trod by horse, lay foaming on the plain.
From the dry fields thick clouds of dust arise,
Shade the black host, and intercept the skies.
The brass-hoof'd steeds tumultuous plunge and bound,

And the thick thunder beats the labouring ground.
Still slaughtering on, the king of men proceeds;
The distanc'd army wonders at his deeds.
As when the winds with raging flames conspire,
And o'er the forests roll the flood of fire,
In blazing heaps the grove's old honours fall,
And one refulgent ruin levels all;
Before Atrides' rage so sinks the foe,
Whole squadrons vanish, and proud heads lie low.
The steeds fly trembling from his waving sword;
And many a car, now lighted of its lord,
Wide o'er the field with guideless fury rolls,
Breaking their ranks, and crushing out their souls;
While his keen falchion drinks the warriors' lives;

More grateful, now, to vultures than their wives!
Perhaps great Hector then had found his fate,
But Joye and Destiny prolong'd his date.

Safe from the darts, the care of Heaven he stood,
Amidst alarms, and death, and dust, and blood.

Now past the tomb where ancient Ilius lay,
Through the mid field the routed urge their way ;
Where the wild figs th' adjoining summit crown,
That path they take, and speed to reach the town.
As swift Atrides with loud shouts pursued,
Hot with his toil, and bath'd in hostile blood,
Now near the beech-tree, and the Scæan gates,
The hero halts, and his associates waits.
Meanwhile on every side, around the plain,
Dispers'd, disorder'd, fly the Trojan train ;
So flies a herd of bees, that here dismay'd
The lion's roaring through the midnight shade ;
On heaps they tumble with successless haste :
The savage seizes, draws, and rends the last :
Not with less fury stern Atrides flew,
Still press'd the rout, and still the hindmost slew ;
Hur'd from their cars, the bravest chiefs are kill'd,
And rage, and death, and carnage, load the field.

Now storms the victor at the Trojan wall ;
Surveys the towers, and meditates their fall.
But Jove descending, shook th' Idæan hills,
And down their summits pour'd a hundred rills :
Th' unkindled lightnings in his hand he took,
And thus the many-colour'd maid bespoke :

" Iris, with haste thy golden wings display,
To godlike Hector this our word convey—
While Agamemnon wastes the ranks around,
Fights in the front, and bathes with blood the
ground,

Bid him give way ; but issue forth commands,
And trust the war to less important hands,
But when, or wounded by the spear or dart,
That chief shall mount his chariot, and depart :
Then Jove shall string his arm, and fire his breast,
Then to her ships shall flying Greece be press'd,
Till to the main the burning Sun descend,
And sacred Night her awful shade extend."

He spoke, and Iris at his word obey'd ;
On wings of winds descends the various maid.
The chief she found amidst the ranks of war,
Close to the bulwarks, on his glittering car.
The goddess then : " O son of Priam, hear !
From Jove I come, and his high mandate bear—
While Agamemnon wastes the ranks around,
Fights in the front, and bathes with blood the
ground,

Abstain from fight ; yet issue forth commands,
And trust the war to less important hands.
But when, or wounded by the spear or dart,
The chief shall mount his chariot, and depart :
Then Jove shall string thy arm, and fire thy breast,
Then to her ships shall flying Greece be prest,
Till to the main the burning Sun descend,
And sacred Night her awful shade extend."

She said, and vanish'd : Hector with a bound,
Springs from his chariot on the trembling ground,
In clanging arms : he grasps in either hand
A pointed lance, and speeds from band to band ;
Revives their ardour, turns their steps from flight,
And wakes anew the dying flames of fight.
They stand to arms : the Greeks their onset dare,
Condense their powers, and wait the coming war.
New force, new spirits, to each breast returns :
The fight renew'd with fiercer fury burns :
The king leads on ; all fix on him their eye,
And learn from him to conquer, or to die.

Ye sacred Nine, celestial Muses ! tell,
Who fac'd him first, and by his prowess fell !

The great Iphidamas, the bold and young,
From sage Antenor and Thean sprung ;
Whom from his youth his grandsire Cisseus bred,
And nurs'd in Thrace, where snowy flocks are fed.
Scarce did the down his rosy cheeks invest,
And early honour warm his generous breast,
When the kind sire consign'd his daughter's
(Theano's sister) to his youthful arms. [charms
But call'd by glory to the wars of Troy,
He leaves untasted the first fruits of joy ;
From his lov'd bride departs with melting eyes,
And swift to aid his dearer country flies.
With twelve black ships he reach'd P'eroope's
strand,

Thence took the long laborious march by land.
Now fierce for fame before the ranks he springs,
Towering in arms, and brav's the king of kings.
Atrides first discharg'd the missive spear ;
The Trojan stoop'd, the javelin pass'd in air.
Then near the corselet, at the monarch's heart,
With all his strength, the youth directs his dart :
But the broad belt, with plates of silver bound,
The point rebated, and repell'd the wound.
Encumber'd with the dart, Atrides stands,
Till, grasp'd with force, he wrench'd it from his hands,

At once his weighty sword discharg'd a wound
Full on his neck, that fell'd him to the ground.
Stretch'd in the dust th' unhappy warrior lies,
And sleep eternal seals his swimming eyes.
Oh worthy better fate ! oh early slain !
Thy country's friend ; and virtuous, though in vain !
No more the youth shall join his consort's side ;
At once a virgin, and at once a bride !
No more with presents her embraces meet,
Or lay the spoils of conquest at her feet,
On whom his passion, lavish of his store,
Bestow'd so much, and vainly promis'd more !
Unwept, uncover'd, on the plain he lay,
While the proud victor bore his arms away.
Coön, Antenor's eldest hope, was nigh :
Tears, at the sight, came starting from his eye,
While pierc'd with grief the much-lov'd youth he
view'd,

And the pale features, now deform'd with blood :
Then with his spear, unseen, his time he took,
Aim'd at the king, and near his elbow strook.
The thrilling steel transpierc'd the brawny part,
And through his arm stood forth the barbed dart.
Surpris'd the monarch feels, yet void of fear
On Coön rushes with his lifted spear :
His brother's corpse the pious Trojan draws,
And calls his country to assert his cause,
Defends him breathless on the sanguine field,
And o'er the body spreads his ample shield.
Atrides, marking an unguarded part,
Transfix'd the warrior with the brazen dart ;
Prono on his brother's bleeding breast he lay,
The monarch's falchion lopp'd his head away :
The social shades the same dark journey go,
And join each other in the realms below.

The vengeful victor rages round the fields,
With every weapon art or fury yields :
By the long lance, the sword, or ponderous stone,
Whole ranks are broken, and whole troops o'er-
thrown.

This, while yet warm, distill'd the purple flood ;
But when the wound grew stiff with clotted blood,
Then grinding tortures his strong bosom rend,
Less keen those darts the fierce Ilythian send

(The power that cause the teeming matron's throes,
And mothers of unsutterable woes!)

Stung with the smart, all-panting with the pain,
He mounts the car, and gives his squire the rein:
Then with a voice which fury made more strong,
And pain augmented, thus exhorts the throng:
"O friends! O Greeks! assist your honours
Proceed, and finish what this arm began: [wom,
Lo! angry Jove forbids your chief to stay,
And cries half the glories of the day."

He said; the driver whirrs his lengthful thong;
The horses fly! the chariot smokes along.
Clouds from their nostrils the fierce coursers blow,
And from their sides the foam descends in snow;
Shot through the battle in a moment's space,
The wounded monarch at his tent they place.

No sooner Hector saw the king retir'd,
But thus his Trojans and his aids he fir'd:
"Hear, all ye Dardans, all ye Lycian race!
Fam'd in close fight, and dreadful face to face,
Now call to mind your ancient trophies won,
Your great forefathers' virtues, and your own.
Behold the general flies! deserts his powers!
Lo, Jove himself declares the conquest ours!
Now on you racks impel your foaming steeds;
And, sure of glory, dare immortal deeds."

With words like these the fiery chief alarms
His fainting host, and every bosom warms.
As the bold hunter cheers his bounds, to tear
The brinded lion, or the tasky bear;
With voice and hand provoke their doubting heart,
And springs the foremost with his lifted dart:
So pulls Hector prompts his troops to dare;
So pulls Hector prompts his troops to dare;
Now prompts alone, but leads himself the war.
On the black body of the foe he pours; [showers,
As from the cloud's deep bosom, swell'd with
A sudden storm the purple ocean sweeps,
Drives the wild waves, and tosses all the deeps.
Say, Muse! when Jove the Trojans' glory crown'd,
Beneath his arm what heroes bit the ground?
Anteus, Dolops, and Antoonos dy'd,
Optes next was added to their side;
Then brave Hipponous fam'd in many a fight,
Oxybates, Orus, sunk to endless night:
Ezyranus, Agelans; all chiefs of name;
The rest were vulgar deaths, unknown to fame.
As when a western whirlwind, charg'd with storms,
Depels the gather'd clouds that Notus forms;
The gust continued, violent, and strong,
Boils sable clouds in heaps on heaps along;
Now to the skies the foaming billows rears,
Now breaks the surge, and wide the bottom bares:
Thus raging Hector, with resistless hands,
Overtums, confounds, and scatters all their bands.
Now the last ruin the whole host appals;
Now Greece had trembled in her wooden walls;
But wise Ulysses call'd Tydides forth,
His soul rekindled, and awak'd his worth.
"And stand we deedless, O eternal shame!
Till Hector's arm involve the ships in flame?
Haste, let us join, and combat side by side."
The warrior thus: and thus the friend reply'd:
"No martial toil I shun, no danger fear;
Let Hector come; I wait his fury here.
But Jove with conquest crowns the Trojan train;
And, Jove our foe, all human force is vain."
He sigh'd; but, sighing, rais'd his vengeful steel,
And from his car the proud Thymbraeus fell:
Molus, the charioteer, pursued his lord,
His death ensomb'd by Ulysses' sword.

There slain, they left them in eternal night,
Then plung'd amidst the thickest ranks of fight:
So two wild boars outstrip the following hounds,
Then swift revert, and wounds return for wounds.
Stern Hector's conquests in the middle plain
Stood check'd awhile, and Greece respir'd again.

The sons of Merops shone amidst the war;
Towering they rode in one refulgent car:
In deep prophetic arts their father skill'd,
Had warn'd his children from the Trojan field;
Fate urg'd them on; the father warn'd in vain,
They rush'd to fight, and perish'd on the plain!
Their breasts no more the vital spirit warms;
The stern Tydides strips their shining arms.
Hypirochus by great Ulysses dies,
And rich Hippodamus becomes his prize;
Great Jove from Ide with slaughter fills his sight,
And level hangs the doubtful scale of fight.

By Tydides' lance Agastrophus was slain,
The far-fam'd hero of Paconian strain;
Wing'd with his fears, on foot he strove to fly,
His steeds too distant, and the foe too nigh;
Through broken orders, swifter than the wind
He fled, but flying left his life behind.

This Hector sees, as his experienc'd eyes
Traverse the files, and to the rescue flies;
Shouts, as he past, the crystal regions rend,
And moving armies on his march attend.
Great Diomed himself was seiz'd with fear,
And thus bespoke his brother of the war: [yield!

"Mark how this way you bending squadrons
The storm rolls on, and Hector rules the field:
Here stand his utmost force."—The warrior said;
Swift at the word his ponderous javelin fled;
Nor miss'd his aim, but where the plumage danc'd,
Ras'd the smooth cone, and thence obliquely
glanc'd.

Safe in his helm (the gift of Phœbus' hands)
Without a wound the Trojan hero stands:
But yet so stunn'd, that, staggering on the plain,
His arm and knee his sinking bulk sustain;
O'er his dim sight the misty vapours rise,
And a short darkness shades his swimming eyes.
Tydides follow'd to regain his lance;
While Hector rose, recover'd from the trance:
Remounts his car, and herds amidst the crowd:
The Greek pursues him, and exults aloud:

"Once more thank Phœbus for thy forfeit breath,
Or thank that swiftness which outstrips the death.
Well by Apollo are thy prayers repaid,
And oft that partial power has lent his aid.
Thou shalt not long the death deserv'd withstand,
If any god assist Tydides' hand.

Fly then, inglorious! but thy flight, this day,
Whole hecatombs of Trojan ghosts shall pay."

Him, while he triumph'd, Paris ey'd from far
(The spouse of Helen, the fair cause of war)
Around the fields his feather'd shafts he sent,
From ancient Ilus' ruin'd monument;
Behind the column plac'd, he bent his bow,
And wing'd an arrow at th' unwary foe;
Just as he stoop'd, Agastrophus's crest
To seize, and drew the corsicet from his breast.
The bow-string twang'd; nor flew the shaft in vain,
But pierc'd his foot, and nail'd it to the plain.
The laughing Trojan, with a joyful spring,
Leaps from his ambush, and insults the king.

"He bleeds!" he cries, "some god has sped
my dart;
Would the same god had fixt it in his heart!"

The draught prescrib'd fair Heosmede prepares,
 Arinot's daughter, grac'd with golden hairs;
 (Whom to his aged arms, a royal slave, Greece, as the prize of Nestor's widow, gave)
 A table first with azure feet she plac'd;
 Whose ample orb a brazen charger grac'd:
 Honey new press'd, the sacred flower of wheat,
 And wholesome garlic, crown'd the savoury treat.
 Next her white hand a spacious goblet brings,
 A goblet sacred to the Pylian kings
 From eldest times: the massy sculptur'd vase,
 Glittering with golden studs, four handles grace;
 And curling vines around each handle roll'd
 Support two turtledoves emboss'd in gold.
 A massy weight, yet heav'd with ease by him,
 When the brisk nectar overlook'd the brim.
 Temper'd in this, the nymph of form divine
 Pours a large portion of the Prcmian vine;
 With goat's-milk cheese a flavoured taste bestows,
 And last with flour the smiling surface strows.
 This for the wounded prince the dame prepares;
 The cordial beverage revered Nestor shares:
 Salubrious draughts the warrior's thirst allay,
 And pleasing conference beguiles the day.

Meantime Patroclus, by Achilles sent,
 Unheard approach'd, and stood before the tent.
 Old Nestor rising then, the hero led
 To his high seat; the chief refus'd, and said:

" 'Tis now no season for these kind delays;
 The great Achilles with impatience stays.
 To great Achilles this respect I owe;
 Who asks what hero, wounded by the foe,
 Was borne from combat by thy foaming steeds.
 With grief I see the great Machaon bleeds:
 This to report, my hasty course I bend;
 Thou know'st the fiery temper of my friend."

" Can then the sons of Greece," the sage rejoin'd,
 " Excite compassion in Achilles' mind?
 Seeks he the sorrows of our host to know?
 This is not half the story of our woe.

Tell him, not great Machaon bleeds alone:
 Our bravest heroes in the navy groan,
 Ulysses, Agamemnon, Diomed,
 And stern Eurypylus, already bleed.
 But ah! what flattering hopes I entertain!
 Achilles heeds not, but derides our pain:
 Ev'n till the flames consume our fleet he stays,
 And waits the rising of the fatal blaze.

Chief after chief the raging foe destroys:
 Calm he looks on, and every death enjoys.
 Now the slow course of all-impairing Time
 Unstrings my nerves, and ends my manly prime;
 Oh! had I still that strength my youth possess'd,
 When this bold arm th' Epeian powers oppress'd,
 The bulls of Elis in glad triumph led,
 And stretch'd the great Itymonus dead!
 Then, from my fury fled the trembling swains,
 And ours was all the plunder of the plains:
 Fifty white flocks, full fifty herds of swine,
 As many goats, as many lowing kine:

And thrice the number of unrivall'd steeds,
 All teeming females, and of generous breeds.
 These, as my first essay of arms, I won;
 Old Neleus glory'd in his conquering son.
 Thus Elis forc'd, her long arrears restor'd,
 And shares were parted to each Pylian lord.
 The state of Pyle was sunk to last despair,
 When the proud Elians first commenc'd the war;
 For Neleus' sons Alcides' rage had slain;
 Of twelve bold brothers, I alone remain!

Oppress'd, we arm'd; and now this conquest gain'd
 My sire three hundred chosen sheep obtain'd.
 (That large reprisal he might justly claim,
 For prize defrauded, and insulted fame,
 When Elis' monarch at the public course
 Detain'd his chariot and victorious horse.)
 The rest the people shar'd; myself survey'd
 The just partition, and due victims pay'd.
 Three days were past, when Elis rose to war,
 With many a courier, and with many a car;
 The sons of Actor at their army's head
 (Young as they were) the vengeful squadrons led.
 High on a rock fair Thyroisma stands,
 Our utmost frontier on the Pylian lands;
 Not far the streams of fam'd Alpheus flow;
 The stream they pass'd, and pitch'd their tents below.
 Pallas, descending in the shades of night,
 Alarms the Pylians, and commands the fight.
 Each burns for fame, and swells with martial pride
 Myself the foremost; but my sire deny'd;
 Fear'd for my youth, expos'd to stern alarms;
 And stopp'd my chariot, and detain'd my arms.
 My sire deny'd in vain: on foot I fled
 Amidst our chariots: for the goddess led.

" Along fair Arene's delightful plain,
 Soft Minyas rolls his waters to the main.
 There, horse and foot, the Pylian troops unite,
 And, sheath'd in arms, expect the dawning light.
 Thence, ere the Sun advanc'd his noon-day flame,
 To great Alpheus' sacred source we came.
 There first to Jove our solemn rites were paid;
 An untam'd heifer pleas'd the blue-eyed maid;
 A bull Alpheus; and a bull was slain
 To the blue monarch of the watery main.
 In arms we slept, beside the winding food,
 While round the town the fierce Epeians stood.
 Soon as the Sun, with all-revealing ray,
 Flam'd in the front of Heaven, and gave the day;
 Bright scenes of arms, and works of war, appear;
 The nations meet; there Pylus, Elis here.
 The first who fell, beneath my javelin bled;
 King Augias' son, and spouse of Agamede:
 (She that all similes' healing virtues know,
 And every herb that drinks the morning dew.)
 I seiz'd his car, the van of battle led;
 Th' Epeians saw, they trembled, and they fled.
 The foe dispers'd, their bravest warrior kill'd,
 Fierce as a whirlwind now I swept the field:
 Full fifty captive chariots grac'd my train;
 Two chiefs from each fell breathless to the plain.
 Then Actor's sons had dy'd, but Neptune shrouds
 The youthful heroes in a veil of clouds.
 O'er heapy shields, and o'er the prostrate throng,
 Collecting spoils, and slaughtering all along,
 Through wide Euphrasian fields we forc'd the foe,
 Where o'er the vales th' Olesian rocks arose;
 Till Pallas stopp'd us where Alistum flows.
 Ev'n there the hindmost of their rear I slay,
 And the same arm that led, concludes the day,
 Then back to Pyle triumphant take my way.
 There to high Jove were public thanks assign'd,
 As first of gods; to Nestor, of mankind.
 Such then I was, impell'd by youthful blood;
 So prov'd my valour for my country's good.

" Achilles with unactive fury glows,
 And gives to passion what to Greece he owes.
 How shall he grieve, when to th' eternal shade
 Her hosts shall sink, nor his the power to aid?
 O friend! my memory recalls the day,
 When, gathering aids along the Grecian sea,

I, and Ulysses, touch'd at Pthia's port,
 And enter'd Peleus' hospitable court.
 A bull to Jove he slew in sacrifice,
 And pour'd libations on the flaming thighs.
 Thyself, Achilles, and thy reverend sire
 Menestius, tar'd the fragments on the fire.
 Achilles sees us, to the feast invites;
 Social we sit, and share the genial rites.
 We then explain'd the cause on which we came,
 Try'd you to arms, and found you fierce for fame.
 Your ancient fathers generous precepts gave,
 Peleus said only this—' My son! be brave:
 Menestius thus: ' Though great Achilles shine
 In strength superior, and of race divine,
 Yet cooler thoughts thy elder years attend;
 Let thy just counsels aid, and rule thy friend.'
 Thus spoke your father at Thessalia's court;
 Words now forgot, though now of vast import.
 Ah! try the utmost that a friend can say,
 Such gentle force the fiercest minds obey.
 Some favouring god Achilles' heart may move;
 Though deaf to glory, he may yield to love.
 If some give oracle his breast alarm,
 If aught from Heaven withhold his saving arm;
 Some beam of comfort yet on Greece may shine,
 It thou but lead the Myrmidonian line;
 (Iad in Achilles' arms, if thou appear,
 Proud Troy may tremble, and desist from war;
 Press'd by fresh forces, her o'erlabour'd train
 Shall seek their walls, and Greece respire again."
 This touch'd his generous heart, and from the tent
 Along the shore with hasty strides he went;
 Soon as he came, where, on the crowded strand,
 The public mart and courts of justice stand,
 Where the tall fleet of great Ulysses lies,
 And akin to the guardian gods arise;
 There sad he met the brave Evmemon's son,
 Large painful drops from all his members run;
 An arrow's head yet rooted in his wound,
 The noble blood in circles mark'd the ground.
 As faintly reeling he confess'd the smart;
 Weak was his pace, but dauntless was his heart;
 Divine compassion touch'd Patroclus' breast,
 Who, sighing, thus his bleeding friend address'd:
 " Ah, hapless leaders of the Grecian host!
 Thus must ye perish on a barbarous coast!
 Is this your fate, to glut the dogs with gore,
 Far from your friends, and from your native shore?
 Say, great Euryppylus! shall Greece yet stand?
 Remains she yet the raging Hector's hand?
 Or are her heroes doom'd to die with shame,
 And this the period of our wars and fame?"
 Euryppylus replies: " No more, my friend,
 Greece is no more! this day her glories end.
 Fret to the ships victorious Troy pursues,
 Her force increasing as her toil renews.
 These chiefs, that us'd her utmost rage to meet,
 Lie pierc'd with wounds, and bleeding in the fleet.
 But thou, Patroclus! act a friendly part,
 Lead to my ships, and draw this deadly dart;
 With lukewarm water wash the gore away,
 With healing balms the raging smart allay,
 Such as sage Chiron, sire of pharmacy,
 Once taught Achilles, and Achilles thee.
 Of two fam'd surgeons, Podalirius stands
 This hour surrounded by the Trojan bands;
 And great Machaon, wounded in his tent,
 Now waits that succour which so oft he lent."
 To him the chief: " What then remains to do?
 The event of things the gods alone can view.

Charg'd by Achilles' great command I fly,
 And bear with haste the Pylian king's reply;
 But thy distress this instant claims relief."
 He said, and in his arms upheld the chief.
 The slaves their master's slow approach survey'd,
 And hides of oxen on the floor display'd:
 There stretch'd at length the wounded hero lay,
 Patroclus cut the forky steel away.
 Then in his hands a bitter root he bruise'd;
 The wound he wash'd, the styptic juice infus'd.
 The closing flesh that instant ceas'd to glow,
 The wound to torture, and the blood to flow.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XII.

ARGUMENT.

THE BATTLE AT THE GRECIAN WALL.

THE Greeks being retired into their entrenchments, Hector attempts to force them; but it proving impossible to pass the ditch, Polydamas advises to quit their chariots, and manage the attack on foot. The Trojans follow his counsel, and, having divided their army into five bodies of foot, begin the assault. But upon the signal of an eagle with a serpent in his talons, which appeared on the left-hand of the Trojans, Polydamas endeavours to withdraw them again. This Hector opposes, and continues the attack; in which, after many actions, Sarpedon makes the first breach in the wall: Hector also casting a stone of a vast size, forces open one of the gates, and enters at the head of his troops, who victoriously pursue the Grecians even to their ships.

WALL thus the hero's pious cares attend
 The cure and safety of his wounded friend,
 Trojans and Greeks with clashing shields engage,
 And mutual deaths are dealt with mutual rage.
 Nor long the trench or lofty walls oppose;
 With gods averse th' ill-fated works arose;
 Their powers neglected, and no victim slain,
 The walls were rais'd, the trenches sunk in vain.
 Without the gods, how short a period stands
 The proudest monument of mortal hands!
 This stood, while Hector and Achilles rag'd,
 While sacred Troy the warring hosts engag'd;
 But when her sons were slain, her city burn'd,
 And what surviv'd of Greece to Greece return'd;
 Then Neptune and Apollo shook the shore,
 Then Ida's summits pour'd their watery store;
 Rhesus and Rhodius then unite their rills,
 Caurus roaring down the stony hills,
 Escopus, Granicus, with mingled force,
 And Xanthus foaming in his fruitful source;
 And gulphy Simois, rolling to the main
 Helmets, and shields, and god-like heroes slain:
 These turn'd by Phobus from their wonted ways,
 Deluged the rampire nine continual days,
 The weight of waters aops the yielding wall,
 And to the sea the floating bulwarks fall.

Incessant cataracts the thunderer pours,
And half the skies descend in sluicy showers.
The god of ocean, marching stern before,
With his huge trident wounds the trembling
shore,

Vast stones and piles from their foundation heaves,
Andwhelms the smoky ruin in the waves.
Now smooth'd with sand, and levell'd by the flood,
No fragment tells where once the wonder stood ;
In their old bounds the rivers roll again,
Shine 'twixt the hills, or wander o'er the plain.

But this the gods in later times perform ;
As yet the bulwark stood, and brav'd the storm ;
The strokes yet echo'd of contending powers ;
War thunder'd at the gates, and blood distain'd
the towers.

Smote by the arm of Jove, and dire dismay,
Close by their hollow ships the Grecians lay :
Hector's approach in every wind they hear,
And Hector's fury every moment fear.
He, like a whirlwind, toss'd the scattering throng,
Mingled the troops, and drove the field along.
So 'midst the dogs and hunters' daring bands,
Fierce of his might, a boar or lion stands ;
Arm'd foes around a dreadful circle form,
And hissing javelins rain an iron storm :
His powers untam'd their bold assault defy,
And where he turns, the rout disperse, or die :
He foams, he glares, he bounds against them all,
And if he falls, his courage makes him fall.
With equal rage encompass'd Hector glows ;
Exhorts his armies, and the trenches shows.
The panting steeds impatient fury breathe,
But snort and tremble at the gulph beneath ;
Just on the brink they neigh, and paw the ground,
And the turf trembles, and the skies resound.
Eager they view'd the prospect dark and deep,
Vast was the leap, and headlong hung the steep ;
The bottom bare (a formidable show !)

And bristled thick with sharpened stakes below.
The foot alone this strong defence could force,
And try the pass impervious to the horse.
This saw Polydamas ; who, wisely brave,
Restrain'd great Hector, and his counsel gave :

" Oh thou ! bold leader of the Trojan bands,
And you, confederate chiefs from foreign lands !
What entrance here can cumbrous chariots find,
The stakes beneath, the Grecian walls behind ?
No pass thro' those, without a thousand wounds,
No space for combat in yon narrow bounds.
Proud of the favours mighty Jove has shown,
On certain dangers we too rashly run :
If 'tis his will our haughty foes to tame,
Oh may this instant end the Grecian name !
Here, far from Argos, let their heroes fall,
And one great day destroy and bury all !
But should they turn, and here oppress our train,
What hopes, what methods of retreat remain ?
Wedg'd in the trench, by our own troops confus'd,
In one promiscuous carnage crush'd and bruis'd ;
All Troy must perish, if their arms prevail,
Nor shall a Trojan live to tell the tale.
Hear then, ye warriors ! and obey with speed ;
Back from the trenches let your steeds be led,
Then all alighting, wedg'd in firm array,
Proceed on foot, and Hector lead the way :
So Greece shall stoop before our conquering power,
And this (if Jove consent) her fatal hour."

This counsel pleas'd : the godlike Hector sprung
Swift from his seat ; his clanging armour rang.

The chiefs example follow'd by his train,
Each quits his car, and issues on the plain.
By orders strict the charioteers enjoin'd,
Compel the coursers to their ranks behind.
The forces part in five distinguish'd bands,
And all obey their several chiefs' commands.
The best and bravest in the first conspire,
Pant for the fight, and threat the fleet with fire :
Great Hector glorious in the van of these,
Polydamas, and brave Cebriones.

Before the next the graceful Paris shines,
And hold Alcahous, and Agenor joins.
The sons of Priam with the third appear,
Deiphobus, and Helenus the seer ;
In arms with these the mighty Asius stood,
Who drew from Hyrtacus his noble blood,
And whom Ariaba's yellow coursers bore,
The coursers fed on Selle's winding shore.
Antenor's sons the fourth battalion guide,
And great Æneas, born on fountful Ide.
Divine Sarpedon the last band obey'd,
Whom Glaucus and Asteropæus aid ;
Next him, the bravest at their army's head,
But be more brave than all the hosts he led.

Now with compacted shields, in close array,
The moving legions speed their headlong way :
Already in their hopes they fire the fleet,
And see the Grecians gasping at their feet.

While every Trojan thus, and every aid,
Th' advice of wise Polydamas obey'd ;
Asius alone, confiding in his car,
His vaunted coursers urg'd to meet the war.
Unhappy hero ! and advis'd in vain !
Those wheels returning ne'er shall mark the plain ;
No more those coursers, with triumphant joy,
Restore their master to the gates of Troy !
Black Death attends behind the Grecian wall,
And great Idomeneus shall boast thy fall.
Fierce to the left he drives, where from the plain
The flying Grecians strove their ships to gain ;
Swift through the wall their horse and chariots past.
The gates half-open'd to receive the last.
Thither, exulting in his force, he flies :
His following host with clamours rend the skies ;
To plunge the Grecians headlong in the main,
Such their proud hopes, but all their hopes were vain.

To guard the gates, two mighty chiefs attend,
Who from the Lapiths' warlike race descend ;
This Polypætes, great Perithous' heir,
And that Leonteus, like the god of war.
As two tall oaks, before the wall they rise ;
Their roots in earth, their heads amidst the skies :
Whose spreading arms, with leafy honours crown'd,
Forbid the tempest, and protect the ground ;
High on the hill appears their stately form,
And their deep roots for ever brave the storm.
So graceful these, and so the shock they stand
Of raging Asius, and his furious band.
Orestes, in front appear,
And Cénomaus and Thoön close the rear ;
In vain their clamours shake the ambient fields,
In vain around them beat their hollow shields ;
The fearless brothers on the Grecians call,
To guard their navies, and defend the wall.
Ev'n when they saw Troy's sable troops impend,
And Greece tumultuous from her towers descend,
Forth from the portals rush'd th' intrepid pair, Oppos'd their breasts, and stood themselves the war.

So two wild bears spring furious from their den,
Rous'd with the cries of dogs and voice of men;
On every side the crackling trees they tear,
And root the shrubs, and lay the forest bare;
They gnash their tusks, with fire their eye-balls roll,
Till some wide wound lets out their mighty soul.
Around their heads the whistling javelins sung,
With sounding strokes their brazen targets rung;
Fierce was the fight, while yet the Grecian powers
Maintain'd the walls, and mann'd the lofty towers:
To save their feet, the last efforts they try,
And stones and darts in mingled tempests fly.

As when sharp Boreas blows abroad, and brings
The dreary winter on his frozen wings;
Beneath the low-hung clouds the sheets of snow
Descend, and whiten all the fields below:
So fast the darts on either army pour,
So down the rampires rolls the rocky shower;
Heavy and thick resound the batter'd shields,
And the deaf echo rattles round the fields.

With shame repuls'd, with grief and fury driven,
The frantic Asius thus accuses Heaven:
"In powers immortal who shall now believe?
Can those too flatter, and can Jove deceive?
What man could doubt but Troy's victorious power
Should humble Greece, and this her fatal hour?
But like when wasps from hollow crannies drive,
To guard the entrance of their common hive,
Disturbing the rock, while with unwearied wings
They strike th' assailants, and infix their stings;
A race determin'd, that to death contend:
So fierce these Greeks their last retreats defend.
Gods! shall two warriors only guard their gates,
Repel an army, and defraud the Fates?"

These empty accents mingled with the wind;
Nor nor'd great Jove's unalterable mind;
To goddess Hector, and his matchless might,
Was giv'd the glory of the destin'd fight,
Like deeds of arms through all the forts were try'd,
And all the gates sustain'd an equal tide;
Thro' the long walls the stony showers were heard,
The blaze of flames, the flash of arms, appear'd.
The spirit of a god my breast inspire,
To mix each act to life, and sing with fire!
While Greece unconquer'd kept alive the war,
Secure of death, confiding in despair;
And all her guardian gods, in deep dismay,
With vanishing arms deploir'd the day.

Er's yet the dauntless Laphis maintain
The dreadful pass, and round them heap the slain.
First Damastes, by Polydames' steel
Pierc'd through his helmet's brazen visor, fell;
The weapon drank the mingled brains and gore;
The warrior sinks, tremendous now no more!
Next Ormenus and Pyton yield their breath,
For less Leonteus strows the field with death:
First through the belt Hippomachus he gor'd,
Then sudden war'd his unresisted sword;
Antiphates, as through the ranks he broke,
The Iphion struck, and fate pursued the stroke;
Lamachus, Orestes, Metron, bled;
And round him rose a monument of dead.

Meantime, the bravest of the Trojan crew,
Bold Hector and Polydamas pursue;
Ferce with impetuosity on the works to fall,
And wrap in-volting flames the fleet and wall.
There on the farther bank now stood and gaz'd,
By Heaven alarm'd, by prodigies amaz'd:
A signal ceas'd stopp'd the passing host,
Their martial fury in their wonder lost.

Jove's bird on sounding pinions beat the skies;
A bleeding serpent of enormous size,
His talons truss'd; alive, and curling round,
He stung the bird, whose throat receiv'd the wound:
Mad with the smart, he drops the fatal prey,
In airy circle wings his painful way,
Floats on the winds, and rends the Heavens with
cries:

Amidst the host the falling serpent lies.
They, pale with terror, mark its spires unroll'd,
And Jove's portent with beating hearts behold.
Then first Polydamas the silence broke,
Long weight'd the signal, and to Hector spoke:

"How oft, my brother, thy reproach I bear,
For words well-meant, and sentiments sincere!
True to those counsels which I judge the best,
I tell the faithful dictates of my breast.
To speak his thoughts, is every freeman's right,
In peace and war, in council and in fight;
And all I move, deferring to thy way,
But tends to raise that power which I obey.

Then hear my words, nor may my words be vain;
Seek not, this day, the Grecian ships to gain;
For sure, to warn us Jove his omen sent,
And thus my mind explains its clear event.
The victor eagle, whose sinister flight
Retards our host, and fills our hearts with fright,
Dismiss'd his conquest in the middle skies,
Allow'd to seize, but not possess the prize;
Thus though we gird with fires the Grecian fleet,
Though these proud bulwarks tumble at our feet,
Toils unforeseen, and fiercer, are decreed;
More woes shall follow, and more heroes bleed,
So bodes my soul, and bids me thus advise;
For thus a skilful seer would read the skies."

To him then Hector with disdain return'd:
(Fierce as he spoke, his eyes with fury burn'd)
"Are these the faithful counsels of thy tongue?
Thy will is partial, not thy reason wrong;
Or, if the purpose of thy heart thou vent,
Sure Heaven resumes the little sense it lent.
What coward counsels would thy madness move,
Against the word, the will reveal'd of Jove?
The leading sign, th' irrevocable nod,
And happy thunders of the favouring god,
These shall I slight? and guide my wavering mind
By wandering birds, that fit with every wind?
Ye vagrants of the sky! your wings extend,
Or where the suns arise, or where descend;
To right, to left, unheeded take your way,
While I the dictates of high Heaven obey.
Without a sign his sword the brave man draws,
And asks no omen but his country's cause.
But why shouldst thou suspect the war's success?
None fears it more, as none promotes it less:
Though all our chiefs amid yon ships expire,
Trust thy own cowardice 'scape their fire.
Troy and her sons may find a general grave,
But thou canst live, for thou canst be a slave.
Yet should the fears that wary mind suggests Spread their cold poison through our soldiers' breasts,

My javelin can revenge so base a part,
And free the soul that quivers in thy heart."

Furious he spoke, and, rushing to the wall,
Calls on his host; his host obey the call;
With ardour follow where their leader flies:
Redoubling clamours thunder in the skies.
Jove breathes a whirlwind from the hills of Ide,
And drifts of dust the clouded navy hide:

He fills the Greeks with terror and dismay,
 And gives great Hector the predestin'd day,
 Strong in themselves, but stronger in their aid,
 Close to the works their rigid siege they laid.
 In vain the mounds and massy beams defend,
 While these they undermine, and those they rend;
 Upheave the piles that prop the solid wall;
 And heaps on heaps the smoky ruins fall.
 Greece on her rampart stands the fierce alarms;
 The crowded bulwarks blaze with waving arms,
 Shield touching shield, a long refulgent row;
 Whence hissing darts, incessant, rain below.
 The bold Ajaces fly from tower to tower,
 And rouse, with flame divine, the Grecian power.
 The generous impulse every Greek obeys;
 Threats urge the fearful; and the valiant, praise.
 " Fellows in arms! whose deeds are known to fame,

And you whose ardour hopes an equal name!
 Since not alike endued with force or art;
 Behold a day when each may act his part!
 A day to fire the brave, and warm the cold,
 To gain new glories, or augment the old.
 Urge those who stand; and those who faint, excite;
 Drown Hector's vaults in loud exhortations of fight;
 Conquest, not safety, fill the thoughts of all;
 Seek not your fleet, but sally from the wall;
 So Jove once more may drive their routed train,
 And Troy lie trembling in her walls again."

Their ardour kindles all the Grecian powers;
 And now the stones descend in heavier showers.
 As when high Jove his sharp artillery forms,
 And opens his cloudy magazine of storms;
 In winter's bleak, uncomfortable reign,
 A snowy inundation hides the plain;
 He stills the winds, and bids the skies to sleep;
 Then pours the silent tempest, thick and deep:
 And first the mountain-tops are cover'd o'er,
 Then the green fields, and then the sandy shore;
 Bent with the weight the nodding woods are seen,
 And one bright waste hides all the works of men:
 The circling seas alone, absorbing all,
 Drink the dissolving fœces as they fall.
 So from each side increas'd the stony rain,
 And the white ruin rises o'er the plain.

Thus godlike Hector and his troops contend
 To force the ramparts, and the gates to rend;
 Nor Troy could conquer, nor the Greeks would yield

Till great Sarpedon tower'd amid the field;
 For mighty Jove inspir'd with martial flame
 His matchless son, and urg'd him on to fame.
 In arms he shines, conspicuous from afar,
 And bears aloft his ample shield in air;
 Within whose orb the thick bull-hides were roll'd,
 Ponderous with brass, and bound with ductile gold:
 And, while two pointed javelins arm his hands,
 Majestic moves along, and leads his Lycian bands.

So, press'd with hunger, from the mountain's
 Descends a lion on the flocks below; [brow
 So stalks the lordly savage o'er the plain,
 In sullen majesty, and stern disdain:
 In vain loud mastiffs bay him from afar,
 And shepherds gall him with an iron war;
 Regardless, furious, he pursues his way;
 He foams, he roars, he rends the panting prey.

Resolv'd alike, divine Sarpedon glows
 With generous rage that drives him on the foes.
 He views the towers, and meditates their fall,
 To sure destruction dooms th' aspiring wall;

Then; casting on his friend an ardent look,
 Fir'd with the thirst of glory, thus he spoke:
 " Why boast we, Glaucus! our extended reign,
 Where Xanthus' streams enrich the Lycian plain,
 Our numerous herds that range the fruitful field,
 And hills where vines their purple harvest yield,
 Our foaming bowls with purer nectar crown'd,
 Our feasts enhanc'd with music's sprightly sound,
 Why on those shores are we with joy survey'd,
 Admir'd as heroes, and as gods obey'd;
 Unless great acts superior merit prove,
 And vindicate the bounteous powers above?
 'Tis ours, the dignity they give to grace:
 The first in valour, as the first in place:
 That when with wondering eyes our martial band
 Behold our deeds transcending our commands,
 ' Such,' they may cry, ' deserve the sovereign
 state,
 Whom those that envy, dare not imitate!"
 Could all our care elude the gloomy grave,
 Which claims no less the fearful than the brave,
 For lust of fame I should not vainly dare
 In fighting fields, nor urge thy soul to war.
 But since, alas! ignoble age must come,
 Disease, and death's inexorable doom;
 The life which others pay, let us bestow,
 And give to fame what we to nature owe;
 Brave though we fall, and honour'd if we live,
 Or let us glory gain, or glory give!"

He said; his words the listening chief inspire
 With equal warmth, and rouse the warrior's fire.
 The troops pursue their leaders with delight,
 Rush to the foe, and claim the promis'd fight.
 Menestheus from on high the storm beheld
 Threatening the fort, and blackening in the field:
 Around the walls he gaz'd, to view from far
 What aid appear'd t' avert the approaching war,
 And saw where Teucer with th' Ajaces stood,
 Of fight insatiate, prodigal of blood.
 In vain he calls; the dim of helms and shields
 Rings to the skies, and echoes through the fields:
 The brazen hinges fly, the walls resound,
 Heaven trembles, roar the mountains, thunder'd
 the ground. [all

Then thus to Thoïs—" Hence with speed," he
 " And urge the bold Ajaces to our aid;
 Their strength, united, best may help to bear
 The bloody labours of the doubtful war:
 Either the Lycian princes bend their course,
 The best and bravest of the hostile force.
 But, if too fiercely there the foes contend,
 Let Telamon, at least, our towers defend,
 And Teucer haste with his unerring bow,
 To share the danger, and repel the foe."

Swift as the word, the herald speeds along
 The lofty ramparts, through the martial throng;
 And finds the heroes bath'd in sweat and gore,
 Oppos'd in combat on the dusty shore.

" Ye valiant leaders of our warlike bands!
 Your aid," said Thoïs, " Peleus' son demands
 Your strength, united, best may help to bear
 The bloody labours of the doubtful war:
 Either the Lycian princes bend their course,
 The best and bravest of the hostile force.
 But if too fiercely here the foes contend,
 At least, let Telamon those towers defend,
 And Teucer haste with his unerring bow,
 To share the danger, and repel the foe."

Straight to the fort great Ajax turn'd his care,
 And thus bespoke his brothers of the war:

"Now, valiant Lycomedes! exert your might,
 And, brave Oileus, prove your force in fight!
 To you I trust the fortune of the field,
 Till by this arm the foe shall be repell'd;
 That done, expect me to complete the day"—
 Then, with his seven-fold shield, he strode away.
 With equal steps bold Teucer press'd the shore,
 Whose fatal bow the strong Pandion bore.
 High on the walls appear'd the Lycian powers,
 Like some black tempest gathering round the towers;

The Greeks, oppress'd, their utmost force unite,
 Prepar'd to labour in th' unequal fight;
 The war renews, mix'd shouts and groans arise;
 Tumultuous clamour mounts, and thickens in the skies.

Force Ajax first th' advancing host invades,
 And sends the brave Epicles to the shades,
 Sarpedon's friend; across the warrior's way,
 Rest from the walls, a rocky fragment lay;
 In modern ages not the strongest swain
 Could heave th' unwieldy burthen from the plain.
 He pos'd, and swung it round; then, toss'd on high,
 It flew with force, and labour'd up the sky;
 Fell on the Lycian's helmet thundering down,
 The ponderous ruin crush'd his batter'd crown.
 As skilful divers from some airy steep,
 Headlong descend, and shoot into the deep,
 So falls Epicles; then in groans expires,
 And numbing to the shades the soul retires.

While to the ramparts daring Glaucus drew,
 From Teucer's hand a winged arrow flew;
 The barbed shaft the destin'd passage found,
 And on his naked arm inflicts a wound.
 The chief, who fear'd some foe's insulting boast
 Might stop the progress of his warlike host,
 Consult'd the wound, and, leaping from his height,
 Retir'd reluctant from th' unfinished fight.
 Divine Sarpedon with regret beheld
 Disabled Glaucus slowly quit the field;
 His beating breast with generous ardour glows,
 He springs to fight, and dies upon the foe.
 Alcmion first was doom'd his force to feel;
 Deep in his breast he plung'd the pointed steel;
 Then, from the yawning wound with fury tore
 The spear, pursued by gushing streams of gore;
 Down sinks the warrior with a thundering sound,
 His brazen armour rings against the ground.

Swift to the battlement the victor flies,
 Tugs with full force, and every nerve applies;
 It shakes; the ponderous stones disjointed yield;
 The rolling ruins smoke along the field.
 A mighty breach appears, the walls lie bare;
 And, like a deluge, rushes in the war.
 At once bold Teucer draws the twanging bow,
 And Ajax sends his javelin at the foe:
 Fir'd in his belt the feather'd weapon stood,
 And thro' his buckler drove the trembling wood;
 But Jove was present in the dire debate,
 To shield his offspring, and avert his fate.
 The prince gave back, not meditating flight,
 But trying vengeance, and severer fight;
 Then, rais'd with hope, and fir'd with glory's charms,
 His fainting squadrons to new fury warms:
 "O where, ye Lycians! is the strength you boast?
 Your former fame and ancient virtues lost!"

The breach lies open, but your chief in vain
 Attempts alone the guarded pass to gain;
 Unite, and soon that hostile fleet shall fall;
 The force of powerful union conquers all."

This just rebuke inflam'd the Lycian crew,
 They join, they thicken, and th' assault renew:
 Unmov'd th' embodied Greeks their fury dare,
 And, fir'd, support the weight of all the war;
 Nor could the Greeks repel the Lycian powers,
 Nor the bold Lycians force the Grecian towers.
 As, on the confines of adjoining grounds,
 Two stubborn swains with blows dispute their bounds;

They tug, they sweat; but neither gain or yield,
 One foot, one inch, of the contended field:
 Thus obstinate to death they fight, they fall;
 Nor these can keep, nor those can win, the wall.
 Their many breasts are pierc'd with many a wound,
 Loud strokes are heard, and rattling arms resound,
 The copious slaughter covers all the shore,
 And the high ramparts drop with human gore.

As when two scales are charg'd with doubtful loads,

From side to side the trembling balance nods,
 (While some laborious matron, just and poor,
 With nice exactness weighs her woolly store)
 Till, pois'd aloft, the resting beam suspends
 Each equal weight, nor this, nor that, descends:
 So stood the war, till Hector's matchless might,
 With fates prevailing, turn'd the scale of fight.

Fierce as a whirlwind up the walls he flies,
 And fires his host with loud repeated cries:
 "Advance, ye Trojans! lend your valiant hands,
 Haste to the fleet, and toss the blazing brands!"
 They hear, they run; and, gathering at his call,
 Raise scaling-engines, and ascend the wall:
 Around the works a wood of glittering spears
 Shoots up, and all the rising host appears.
 A ponderous stone bold Hector heav'd to throw,
 Pointed above, and rough and gross below:
 Not two strong men th' enormous weight could raise,
 Such men as live in these degenerate days;
 Yet this, as easy as a swain could bear
 The snowy fleece, he toss'd, and shook in air:
 For Jove upheld, and lighten'd of its load
 Th' unwieldy rock, the labour of a god.
 Thus arm'd, before the folded gates he came,
 Of massy substance, and stupendous frame;
 With iron bars and brazen hinges strong,
 On lofty beams of solid timber hung.
 Then, thundering through the planks with forceful
 sway,

Drives the sharp rock; the solid beams give way,
 The folds are shatter'd; from the crackling door
 Leap the resounding bars, the flying hinges roar.
 Now rushing in, the furious chief appears,
 Gloomy as night! and shakes two shining spears:
 A dreadful gleam from his bright armour came,
 And from his eye-balls flash'd the living flame.
 He moves a god, resistless in his course,
 And seems a match for more than mortal force.
 Then pouring after, through the gaping space,
 A tide of Trojans flows, and fills the place;
 The Greeks behold, they tremble, and they fly;
 The shore is heap'd with death, and tumult rends the sky.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE FOURTH BATTLE CONTINUED, IN WHICH NEPTUNE
ASSISTS THE GREEKS; THE ACTS OF IDOMENEUS.

NEPTUNE, concerned for the loss of the Grecians, upon seeing the fortification forced by Hector (who had entered the gate near the station of the Ajaxes) assumes the shape of Calchas, and inspires those heroes to oppose him: then, in the form of one of the generals, encourages the other Greeks, who had retired to their vessels. The Ajaxes form their troops in a close phalanx, and put a stop to Hector and the Trojans. Several deeds of valour are performed; Meriones, losing his spear in the encounter, repairs to seek another at the tent of Idomeneus; this occasions a conversation between those two warriors, who return together to the battle. Idomeneus signals his courage above the rest; he kills Othryoneus, Asius, and Alcaothus; Deiphobus and Æneas march against him, and at length Idomeneus retires. Menelaus wounds Helenus, and kills Pisander. The Trojans are repulsed in the left wing; Hector still keeps his ground against the Ajaxes, till, being galled by the Locrian slingers and archers, Polydamas advises to call a council of war: Hector approves his advice, but goes first to rally the Trojans; upbraids Paris, rejoins Polydamas, meets Ajax again, and renews the attack.

The eighth and twentieth day still continues. The scene is between the Grecian wall and the sea-shore.

WHEN now the thunderer on the sea-beat coast
Had fix'd great Hector and his conquering host;
He left them to the fates, in bloody fray,
To toil and struggle through the well-fought day;
Then turn'd to Thracia from the field of fight
Those eyes that shed insufferable light:
To where the Mysians prove their martial force,
And hardy Thracians tame the savage horse;
And where the far-fam'd Hippemolgian strays,
Renown'd for justice and for length of days;
Thrice happy race! that, innocent of blood,
From milk, innoxious, seek their simple food:
Jove sees delighted; and avoids the scene
Of guilty Troy, of arms, and dying men:
No aid, he deems, to either host is given,
While his high law suspends the powers of Heaven.
Mean-time the monarch¹ of the watery main
Observ'd the thunderer, nor observ'd in vain.
In Samothracia, on a mountain's brow,
Whose waving woods o'erhanging the deeps below,
He sat; and round him cast his azure eyes,
Where Ida's misty tops confus'dly rise;
Below, fair Ilion's glittering spires were seen,
The crowded ships, and sable seas between.

¹ Neptune.

There, from the crystal chambers of the main
Emerg'd, he sat; and mourn'd his Argives slain
At Jove incens'd, with grief and fury stung,
Prone down the rocky steep he rush'd along;
Fierce as he past, the lofty mountains nod,
The forest shakes! Earth trembled as he trod,
And felt the footsteps of th' immortal god.
From realm to realm three ample strides he took,
And, at the fourth, the distant Ægæ shook.
Far in the bay his shining palace stands,
Eternal frame! not rais'd by mortal hands:
This having reach'd, his brass-hoof'd steeds he reins,

Fleet as the winds, and deck'd with golden manes,
Refulgent arms his mighty limbs enfold,
Immortal arms of adamant and gold.
He mounts the car, the golden scourge applies,
He sits superior, and the chariot flies:
His whirling wheels the glassy surface sweep;
Th' enormous monsters, rolling o'er the deep,
Gambol around him on the watery way;
And heavy whales in awkward measures play:
The sea subsiding spreads a level plain,
Exults, and owns the monarch of the main;
The parting waves before his coursers fly:
The wondering waters leave his axle dry.

Deep in the liquid regions lies a cave;
Between where Tenedos the surges lave,
And rocky Imbrus breaks the rolling wave:
There the great ruler of the azure round
Stopp'd his swift chariot, and his steeds unbound,
Fed with ambrosial herbage from his hand,
And link'd their fetlocks with a golden band,
Infrangible, immortal: there they stay,
The father of the floods pursues his way;
Where, like a tempest darkening Heaven around
Or fiery deluge that devours the ground,
Th' impatient Trojans, in a gloomy throng,
Embattled roll'd as Hector rush'd along:
To the loud tumult and the barbarous cry,
The Heavens re-echo, and the shores reply;
They vow destruction to the Grecian name,
And in their hopes, the fleets already flame.

But Neptune, rising from the seas profound,
The god whose earthquakes rock the solid ground
Now wears a mortal form; like Calchas seen,
Such his loud voice, and such his manly mien;
His shouts incessant every Greek inspire,
But most th' Ajaxes, adding fire to fire.

"Tis yours, O warriors, all our hopes to raise
Oh, recollect your ancient worth and praise:
'Tis yours to save us, if you cease to fear;
Flight, more than shameful, is destructive here
On other works though Troy with fury fall,
And pour her armies o'er our batter'd wall;
There, Greece has strength: but this, this part o'erthrown,

Her strength were vain; I dread for you alone
Here Hector rages like the force of fire,
Vaunts of his gods, and calls high Jove his sin
If yet some heavenly power your breast excite.
Breathe in your hearts, and string your arms
in fight,

Greece yet may live, her threaten'd fleet rear
And Hector's force, and Jove's own aid, be val
Then with his sceptre, that the deep control
He touch'd the chiefs, and steel'd their manly soul
Strength, not their own, the touch divine impart
Prompts their light limbs, and swells their daring hearts.

Then, as a falcon from the rocky height,
 Her quarry seen, impetuous at the sight
 Darts springing instant, darts herself from high,
 Shoots on the wing, and skims along the sky:
 Such, and so swift, the power of ocean flow;
 The wide horizon shut him from their view.
 Th' inspiring god, Odiseus' active son
 Perceiv'd the first, and thus to Telamon:
 "Some god, my friend, some god in human form
 Favours descends, and wills to stand the storm.
 No Calchas this, the venerable seer;
 But as he turn'd, I saw the power appear:
 I mark'd his parting, and the steps he trod;
 His own bright evidence reveals a god;
 He's now some energy divine I share,
 And seem to walk on wings, and tread in air!"
 "With equal ardour" (Telamon returns)
 "My soul is kindled, and my bosom burns:
 New rising spirits all my force alarms,
 Lift each impatient limb, and break my arm.
 This ready arm, unthinking, shakes the dart;
 The blood pours back, and fortifies my heart.
 Hoop, methinks, yon towering chief I meet,
 And stretch the dreadful Hector at my feet."
 Fall of the god that urg'd their burning breast,
 The hero thus their mutual warmth express'd.
 Neptune mean-while the routed Greeks inspir'd,
 Who, breathless, pale, with length of labours tir'd,
 Pant in the ships; while Troy to conquest calls,
 And swms victorious o'er their yielding walls:
 Trembling before th' impending storm they lie,
 While lens of rage stand burning in their eye.
 Greece sunk they thought, and this their fatal hour;
 But breathe new courage as they feel the power.
 Ajax and Leitus first his words excite;
 Then stern Penelous rises to the fight;
 Ajax, Diopryes, in arms renown'd,
 And Merion next, th' impulsive fury found;
 Next Nestor's son the same bold ardour takes,
 While thus the god the martial fire awakes:
 "Oh, lasting infamy! oh, dire disgrace,
 To chiefs of vigorous youth and manly race!
 I trusted in the gods, and you, to see
 Greece victorious, and her navy free:
 No!—the glorious combat you disclaim,
 And see black day clouds all her former fame.
 Depress! what a prodigy these eyes survey,
 Unseen, unthought, till this amazing-day!
 Ye ve at length from Troy's oft-conquer'd bands?
 And fill our fleet by such inglorious hands?
 And see undisciplin'd, a straggling train,
 And torn to glories of the dusty plain;
 And frighted fawns, from hill to hill pursued,
 Prey to every savage of the wood:
 Well these, so late who trembled at your name,
 Made your camps, involve your ships in flame?
 Change so shameful, say, what cause has wrought?
 The soldier's baseness, or the general's fault?
 Will ye perish for your leader's vice;
 Or purchase infamy, and life the price?
 Not your cause, Achilles' injur'd fame:
 His is the crime, but yours the shame.
 That our chief offend through rage or lust,
 But you be cowards if your king's unjust?
 Prevent this evil, and your country save:
 Well thought retrieves the spirits of the brave.
 Kill, and subdue! on dastards dead to fame
 Make no anger, for they feel no shame:
 You, the pride, the flower of all our host,
 Your heart weeps blood to see your glory lost!

Nor deem this day, this battle, all you lose;
 A day more black, a fate more vile, ensues.
 Let each reflect, who prizes fame or breath,
 On endless infamy, on instant death,
 For lo! the fated time, th' appointed shore;
 Hark! the gates burst, the brazen barriers roar!
 Impetuous Hector thunders at the wall;
 The hour, the spot, to conquer, or to fall."
 These words the Grecians fainting hearts inspire,
 And listening armies catch the godlike fire.
 Fix'd at his post was each bold Ajax found,
 With well-rang'd squadrons strongly circled round:
 So close their order, so dispos'd their fight,
 As Pallas' self might view with fix'd delight;
 Or had the god of war inclin'd his eyes,
 The god of war had own'd a just surprise.
 A chosen phalanx, firm, resolv'd as fate,
 Descending Hector and his battle wait.
 An iron scene gleams dreadful o'er the fields,
 Armour in armour lock'd, and shields in shields,
 Spears lean on spears, on targets targets throng,
 Helms stuck to helms, and man drove man along.
 The floating plumes unnumber'd wave above,
 As when an earthquake stirs the nodding grove;
 And, level'd at the skies with pointing rays,
 Their brandish'd lances at each motion blaze.
 Thus breathing death, in terrible array,
 The close-compact legions urg'd their way:
 Fierce they drove on, impatient to destroy;
 Troy charg'd the first, and Hector first of Troy.
 As from some mountain's craggy forehead torn,
 A rock's round fragment flies, with fury borne
 (Which from the stubborn stone a torrent rends)
 Precipitate the ponderous mass descends:
 From steep to steep the rolling ruin bounds;
 At every shock the crackling wood rebounds;
 Still gathering force, it smokes; and, urg'd amain, Whirls, leaps, and thunders down, impetuous to the plain: [prov'd,
 There stops—So Hector. Their whole force he Resistless when he rag'd, and when he stopt, unmov'd.
 On him the war is bent, the darts are shed,
 And all their falchions wave around his head:
 Repuls'd, he stands, nor from his stand retires;
 But with repeated shouts his army fires.
 "Trojans! be firm; this arm shall make your way
 Through yon square body, and that black array.
 Stand, and my spear shall rout their scattering
 power,
 Strong as they seem, embattled like a tower.
 For he that Juno's heavenly bosom warms,
 The first of gods, this day inspires our arms."
 He said, and rous'd the soul in every breast;
 Urg'd with desire of fame, beyond the rest,
 Forth march'd Deiphobus; but, marching, held
 Before his wary steps his ample shield.
 Bold Merion aim'd a stroke (nor aim'd it wide)
 The glittering javelin pierc'd the tough bull-hide;
 But pierc'd not through: unfaithful to his hand,
 The point broke short, and sparkled in the sand.
 The Trojan warrior, touch'd with timely fear,
 On the rais'd orb to distance bore the spear:
 The Greek, retreating, mourn'd his frustrate blow,
 And curs'd the treacherous lance that spar'd a foe:
 Then to the ships with surly speed he went,
 To seek a surer javelin in his tent.
 Meanwhile with rising rage the battle glows,
 The tumult thickens, and the clamour grows.

By Teucer's arm the warlike Imbrus bleeds,
The son of Mentor, rich in generous steeds.
Ere yet to Troy the sons of Greece were led,
In fair Pedanus' verdant pastures bred,
The youth had dwelt; remote from war's alarms,
And bless'd in bright Medecaste's arms:
(This nymph, the fruit of Priam's ravish'd joy, Ally'd the warrior to the house of Troy.)
To Troy, when glory call'd his arms, he came,
And match'd the bravest of her chiefs in fame:
With Priam's sons, a guardian of the throne,
He liv'd, below'd and honour'd as his own.
Him Teucer pierc'd between the throat and ear:
He groans beneath the Telamonian spear.
As from some far-seen mountain's airy crown,
Subdued by steel, a tall ash tumbles down,
And soils its verdant tresses on the ground:
So falls the youth; his arms the fall resound.
Then Teucer rushing to despoil the dead,
From Hector's hand a shining javelin fled:
He saw, and shuns'd the death; the forceful dart
Sung on, and pierc'd Amphimachus's heart,
Cteatus' son, of Neptune's forceful line;
Vain was his courage, and his rage divine!
Prostrate he falls; his clanging arms resound,
And his broad buckler thunders on the ground.
To seize his beamy helm the victor flies,
And just had fasten'd on the dazzling prise,
When Ajax' manly arm a javelin flung;
Full on the shield's round boss the weapon rung;
He felt the shock, nor more was doom'd to feel,
Secure in mail, and sheath'd in shining steel.
Repuls'd, he yields; the victor Greeks obtain
The spoils contested, and bear off the slain.
Between the leaders of th' Athenian line
(Stichius the brave, Menestheus the divine)
Deplor'd Amphimachus, sad object! lies;
Imbrus remains the fierce Ajaxes' prize.
As two grim lions bear across the lawn,
Scatch'd from devouring bounds, a slaughter'd fawn,
In their fell jaws high-lifting through the wood,
And sprinkling all the shrubs with drops of blood;
So these the chief: great Ajax from the dead
Strips his bright arms, Oileus lops his head;
Toss'd like a ball, and whirl'd in air away,
At Hector's feet the gory visage lay.

The god of ocean, fir'd with stern disdain,
And pierc'd with sorrow for his grandson slain²,
Inspires the Grecian hearts, confirms their hands,
And breathes destruction on the Trojan bands.
Swift as a whirlwind rushing to the fleet,
He finds the lance-fur'd Idomen of Crete;
His pensive brow the generous cares express
With which a wounded soldier touch'd his breast,
Whom in the chance of war a javelin tore,
And his sad comrades from the battle bore;
Him to the surgeons of the camp he sent;
That office paid, he issued from his tent,
Fierce for the fight; to whom the god begun,
In These' voice, Andromon's valiant son,
Who rul'd where Calydon's white rocks arise,
And Pleuron's chalky cliffs emblaze the skies:

"Where's now th' imperious vaunt, the daring
boast,
Of Greece victorious, and proud Ilium lost?" To whom the king: "O! Greece no blame be thrown,
Arms are her trade, and war is all her own.

² Amphimachus.

Her hardy heroes from the well-fought plains
Nor fear withhold, nor shameful sloth detains.
'Tis Heaven, alas! and Jove's all-powerful doom,
That far, far distant from our native home,
Wills us to fall, inglorious! Oh, my friend!
Once foremost in the fight, still prone to lend
Or arms or counsels, now perform thy best,
And what thou canst not singly, urge the rest."

Thus he; and thus the god, whose force can make

The solid globe's eternal basis shake:

"Ah! never may he see his native land,
But feed the vultures on this hateful strand,
Who sarks ignobly in his ships to stay,
Nor dares to combat on this signal day!
For this, behold! in horrid arms I shine,
And urge thy soul to rival acts with mine.
Together let us battle on the plain;
Two, not the worst; nor ev'n this succour vain:
Not vain the weakest, if their force unite;
But ours, the bravest have confess'd in fight."

This said, he rushes where the combat burns;
Swift to his tent the Cretan king returns.
From thence, two javelins glittering in his hand,
And clad in arms that lighten'd all the strand,
Fierce on the foe th' impetuous hero drove;
Like lightning bursting from the arm of Jove,
Which to pale man the wrath of Heaven declares,
Or terrifies th' offending world with wars;
In streamy sparkles, kindling all the skies,
From pole to pole the trail of glory flies.

Thus his bright armour o'er the dazzled throng
Gleam'd dreadful, as the monarch flash'd along.

Him, near his tent, Meriones attends;

Whom thus he questions: "Ever best of friends!
O say, in every art of battle skill'd,
What holds thy courage from so brave a field?
On some important message art thou bound,
Or bleeds my friend by some unhappy wound?
Inglorious here, my soul abhors to stay,
And glows with prospects of th' approaching day."

"O prince!" (Meriones replies) "whose care
Leads forth th' embattled sons of Crete to war;
This speaks my grief; this headless lance I wield;
The rest lies rooted in a Trojan shield."

To whom the Cretan: "Enter, and receive
The wanted weapons; those my tent can give;
Spears I have stow'd (and Trojan lances all)
That shed a lustre round th' illumin'd wall.
Though I, disdainful of the distant war,
Nor trust the dart, nor aim th' uncertain spear,
Yet hand to hand I fight, and spoil the slain;
And thence these trophies and these arms I gain.
Enter, and see on heaps the helmets roll'd,
And high-hung spears, and shields that flame with gold."

"Nor vain," said Merion, "are our martial toils;
We too can boast of no ignoble spoils.
But these my ship contains; whence, distant far,
I fight conspicuous in the van of war.
What need I more? If any Greek there be
Who knows not Merion, I appeal to thee."

To this, Idomenus: "The fields of fight
Have prov'd thy valour, and unconquer'd might;
And were some ambush for the foes design'd
Ev'n there, thy courage would not lag behind.
In that sharp service, singled from the rest,
The fear of each, or valour, stands confest,
No force, no firmness, the pale coward shows;
He shifts his place; his colour comes and goes

A dropping sweat creeps cold on every part,
 Against his bosom beats his quivering heart;
 Terror and death in his wild eye-balls stare;
 With chattering teeth he stands, and stiffening hair,
 And looks a bloodless image of despair!
 Not so the brave—still dauntless, still the same,
 Gush'd his colour, and unmov'd his frame;
 Compos'd his thought, determin'd is his eye,
 And fir'd his soul, to conquer or to die:
 Nought disturb the tenour of his breast,
 'Tis but the wish to strike before the rest.

"In such assays thy blameless worth is known,
 And every art of dangerous war thy own.
 By chance of fight whatever wounds you bore,
 Those wounds were glorious all, and all before;
 Such as may teach, 'twas still thy brave delight
 To oppose thy bosom where the foremost fight.
 But why, like infants, cold to honour's charms,
 Stand we to talk, when glory calls to arms?
 Go—from my conquer'd spears the choicest take,
 And to their owners send them nobly back."

Swift as the word bold Merion snatch'd a spear,
 And, breathing slaughter, follow'd to the war.
 So Mars omnipotent invades the plain
 (The wide destroyer of the race of man.)
 Terror, his best-lov'd son, attends his course,
 Arm'd with stern boldness, and enormous forces;
 The pride of haughty warriors to confound,
 And lay the strength of tyrants on the ground:
 From Thesæ they fly, call'd to the dire alarms
 Of warring Phlegyians, and Ephyrion arms;
 Invok'd by both, relentless, they dispose
 To these glad conquest, murderous rout to those,
 So march'd the leaders of the Cretan train,
 And their bright arms shot horror o'er the plain.
 Then first spake Merion: "Shall we join the
 fight,

Or combat in the centre of the fight?
 Or to the left our wanted succour lend?
 Blazon and fame all parts alike attend."
 "Not in the centre," Idomeneu reply'd:
 "Our ablest chieftains the main battle guide;
 Such godlike Ajax makes that post his care,
 And gallant Teucer deals destruction there,
 Arm'd, or with shafts to gall the distant field,
 Or bear close battle on the sounding shield.
 These can the rage of haughty Hector tame:
 Made in their arms, the navy fears no flame;
 Till Jove himself descends, his bolts to shed,
 And hurl the blazing rain at our head.
 Best must he be, of more than human birth,
 Who feel like mortals on the fruits of earth;
 Whom neither rocks can crush, nor steel can wound,
 Whom Ajax feels not on th' ensanguin'd ground:
 In stranding fight he mates Achilles' force,
 Swift alone in swiftness in the course.
 Then to the left our ready arms apply,
 And live with glory, or with glory die."
 He said; and Merion to th' appointed place,
 As the god of battles, urg'd his pace.
 As the foe the shining chiefs beheld
 Rush like a fiery torrent o'er the field,
 Their force embodied in a tide they pour;
 The rising combat sounds along the shore.
 The warring winds, in Sirius' sultry reign,
 From different quarters sweep the sandy plain;
 On every side the dusty whirlwinds rise,
 And the dry fields are lifted to the skies:
 Down, by despair, hope, rage, together driven,
 Met the black hosts, and, meeting, darken'd Heaven.

All dreadful glar'd the iron face of war,
 Bristled with upright spears, that flash'd afar;
 Dire was the gleam of breast-plates, helms, and
 shields,

And polish'd arms emblaz'd the flaming fields;
 Tremendous scene! that general horror gave,
 But touch'd with joy the bosoms of the brave.

Saturn's great sons in fierce contention vy'd,
 And crowds of heroes in their anger dy'd.
 The sire of Earth and Heaven, by Thetis won
 To crown with glory Peleus' god-like son,
 Will'd not destruction to the Grecian powers,
 But spar'd a while the destin'd Trojan towers:
 While Neptune, rising from his azure main,
 Warr'd on the king of Heaven with stern disdain,
 And breath'd revenge, and fir'd the Grecian train.
 Gods of one source, of one ethereal race,
 Alike divine, and Heaven their native place;
 But Jove the greater; first-born of the skies,
 And more than men, or gods, supremely wise.
 For this, of Jove's superior might afraid,
 Neptune in human form conceal'd his aid.
 These powers infold the Greek and Trojan train
 In war and discord's adamant chain,
 Indissolubly strong; the fatal tie
 Is stretch'd on both, and, close-compell'd, they die,
 Dreadful in arms, and grown in combats gray,
 The bold Idomeneu controls the day.

First by his hand Othryoneus was slain,
 Swell'd with false hopes, with mad ambition vain!
 Call'd by the voice of war to martial fame,
 From high Cabeus' distant walls he came;
 Cassandra's love he sought, with boasts of power,
 And promis'd conquest was the proffer'd dower.
 The king consented, by his vaunts abus'd;
 The king consented, but the fates refus'd.
 Proud of himself, and of th' imagin'd bride,
 The field he measur'd with a larger stride.
 Him, as he stalk'd, the Cretan javelin found;
 Vain was his breast-plate to repel the wound:
 His dream of glory lost, he plung'd to Hell:
 His arms resounded as the boaster fell.

The great Idomeneu betrides the dead;
 "And thus," he cries, "behold thy promise sped!
 Such is the help thy arms to Ilium bring,
 And such the contract of the Phrygian king!
 Our offers now, illustrious prince! receive;
 For such an aid what will not Argos give?
 To conquer Troy, with ours thy forces join,
 And count Atrides' fairest daughter thine.
 Meantime, on farther methods to advise,
 Come, follow to the fleet thy new allies:
 There hear what Greece has on her part to say."
 He spoke, and dragg'd the gory corse away.

This Asius view'd, unable to contain,
 Before his chariot warring on the plain;
 (His crowded coursers, to his squire consign'd, Impatient panted on his neck behind)
 To vengeance rising with a sudden spring,
 He hop'd the conquest of the Cretan king.
 The wary Cretan, as his foe drew near,
 Full on his throat discharg'd the forceful spear:
 Beneath the chin the point was seen to glide,
 And glitter'd, extant at the farther side.
 As when the mountain-oak, or poplar tall,
 Or pine, fit mast for some great admiral,
 Groans to the oft-beav'd ax, with many a wound
 Then spreads a length of ruin o'er the ground:
 So sunk proud Asius in that dreadful day,
 And stretch'd before his much-lov'd coursers lay

He grinds the dust disdain'd with streaming gore,
 And, fierce in death, lies foaming on the shore.
 Depriv'd of motion, stiff with stupid fear,
 Stands all aghast his trembling charioteer,
 Nor shuns the foe, nor turns the steeds away,
 But falls transfix'd, an unresisting prey:
 Pierc'd by Antilochus, he pants beneath
 The stately car, and labours out his breath.
 Thus Asius' steeds (their mighty master gone)
 Remain the prize of Nestor's youthful son.

Stabb'd at the sight, Deiphobus drew nigh,
 And made, with force, the veneful weapon fly.
 The Cretan saw; and, stooping, caus'd to glance
 From his slope shield, the disappointed lance.
 Beneath the spacious targe (a blazing round,
 Thick with bull-hides and brazen orbits bound,
 On his rais'd arm by two strong braces stay'd)
 He lay collected in defensive shade;
 O'er his safe head the javelin idly sung,
 And on the tinkling verge more faintly rung.
 Ev'n then, the spear the vigorous arm contest,
 And pierc'd, obliquely, king Hycsenor's breast:
 Warm'd in his liver, to the ground it bore
 The chief, his people's guardian now no more!

"Not unattended," (the proud Trojan cries)
 "Nor unreveng'd, lamented Asius lies:
 For thee though Hell's black portals stand display'd,
 This mate shall joy thy melancholy shade."

Heart-piercing anguish, at the haughty boast,
 Touch'd every Greek, but Nestor's son the most,
 Grief'd as he was, his pious arms attend,
 And his broad buckler shields his slaughter'd friend:
 Till sad Mecistheus and Alastor bore
 His honour'd body to the tented shore.

Nor yet from fight Idomeneus withdraws;
 Resolv'd to perish in his country's cause,
 Or find some foe, whom Heaven and he shall doom
 To wail his fate in death's eternal gloom.
 He sees Alcahoüs in the front aspire:
 Great Æsyetes was the hero's sire:
 His spouse Hippodamè, divinely fair,
 Anchises' eldest hope, and darling care;
 Who charm'd her parent's and her husband's heart,
 With beauty, sense, and every work of art:
 He once, of Ilion's youth, the loveliest boy,
 The fairest she, of all the fair of Troy.
 By Neptune now the hapless hero dies,
 Who covers with a cloud those beauteous eyes,
 And fetters every limb; yet, bent to meet
 His fate, he stands; nor shuns the lance of Crete,
 Fixt as some column, or deep-rooted oak,
 (While the winds sleep) his breast receiv'd the stroke.
 Before the ponderous stroke his corselet yields,
 Long us'd to ward the death in fighting fields.
 The riven armour sends a jarring sound:
 His labouring heart heaves with so strong a bound,
 The long lance shakes, and vibrates in the wound;

Fast-flowing from its source, as prone he lay,
 Life's purple tide impetuous gush'd away.

Then Idomen, insulting o'er the slain;
 "Behold, Deiphobus! nor vaunt in vain:
 See! on one Greek three Trojan ghosts attend,
 This, my third victim, to the shades I send.
 Approaching now, thy boasted might approve,
 And try the prowess of the seed of Jove.
 From Jove, enamour'd on a mortal dame,
 Great Minos, guardian of his country, came:
 Deucalion, blameless prince! was Minos' heir;
 His first-born I, the third from Jupiter;

O'er spacious Crete and her bold sons I reign,
 And thence my ships transport me through the main:

Lord of a host, o'er all my best I shine,
 A scourge to thee, thy father, and thy line."
 The Trojan heard; uncertain, or to meet
 Alone, with venturous arms, the king of Crete;
 Or seek auxiliar force; at length decreed
 To call some hero to partake the deed,
 Forthwith Æneas rises to his thought:
 For him, in Troy's remotest lines, he sought;
 Where he, incens'd at partial Priam, stands,
 And sees superior posts in meaner hands.
 To him, ambitious of so great an aid,
 The bold Deiphobus approach'd, and said:

"Now, Trojan prince, employ thy pious arms,
 If e'er thy bosom felt fair honour's charms.
 Alcahoüs dies, thy brother and thy friend!
 Come, and the warrior's lov'd remains defend.
 Beneath his cares thy early youth was train'd,
 One table fed you, and one roof contain'd.
 This deed to fierce Idomeneus we owe;
 Haste, and revenge it on th' insulting foe."

Æneas heard, and for a space resign'd
 To tender pity all his manly mind;
 Then, rising in his rage, he burns to fight:
 The Greek awaits him, with collected might.
 As the fell boar on some rough mountain's head,
 Arm'd with wild terrors, and to slaughter bred,
 When the loud rustics rise, and shout from far,
 Attends the tumult, and expects the war;
 O'er his bent back the bristly honours rise,
 Fires stream in lightning from his sanguine eyes;
 His foaming tusks both dogs and men engage,
 But meet his hunters rouse his mighty rage:
 So stood Idomeneus, his javelin shook,
 And met the Trojan with a lowering look.
 Antilochus, Deipyrus, were near,
 The youthful offspring of the god of war,
 Merion, and Aphareus, in field renown'd:
 To these the warrior sent his voice around:
 "Fellows in arms! your timely aid unite;
 Lo, great Æneas rushes to the fight:
 Sprung from a god, and more than mortal bold;
 He fresh in youth, and I in arms grown old.
 Else should this hand, this hour, decide the strife,

The great dispute, of glory, or of life."

He spoke; and all as with one soul obey'd;
 Their lifted bucklers cast a dreadful shade
 Around the chief. Æneas too demands
 Th' assisting forces of his native lands:
 Paris, Deiphobus, Agenor join;
 (Co-aids and captains of the Trojan line)
 In order follow all th' embodied train;
 Like Ida's flocks proceeding o'er the plains;
 Before his fleecy care, erect and bold,
 Stalks the proud ram, the father of the fold:
 With joy the swain surveys them, as he leads
 To the cool fountains, through the well-known meads,

So joys Æneas, as his native band
 Moves on in rank, and stretches o'er the land.
 Round dead Alcahoüs now the battle rose;
 On every side the stately circle grows;
 Now batter'd breast-plates and hack'd helmets
 ring,
 And o'er their heads unheeded javelins ring.
 Above the rest two towering chiefs appear,
 There great Idomeneus, Æneas here,

Like gods of war, dispensing fate, they stood,
And barr'd to drench the ground with mutual blood.

The Trojan weapon whizz'd along in air,
The Cretan saw, and shunn'd the brazen spear :
Sut from an arm so strong, the missive wood
Stuck deep in earth, and quiver'd where it stood.
But (Æneas receiv'd the Cretan's stroke,
The forceful spear his hollow corselet broke,
It ripp'd his belly with a ghastly wound,
And roll'd the smoking entrails to the ground.
Stretch'd on the plain, he sobs away his breath,
And furious grasps the bloody dust in death.
The victor from his breast the weapon tears ;
(His spoils he could not, for the shower of spears.)
Though now unfit an active war to wage,
Heavy with cumbersome arms, stiff with cold age,
His listless limbs unable for the course ;
In standing fight he yet maintains his force :
Till, faint with labour, and by foes repell'd,
His tir'd slow steps he drags from off the field.

Deiphobus beheld him as he past,
And, fir'd with hate, a parting javelin cast :
The javelin err'd, but held its course along,
And pierc'd Ascalaphus, the brave and young :
The son of Mars fell gasping on the ground,
And gam'd the dust all bloody with his wound.

Nor knew the furious father of his fall ;
High-thrū'd amidst the great Olympian hall,
On golden clouds th' immortal synod sat ;
Detain'd from bloody war by Jove and fate.

Now, where in dust the breathless hero lay,
For slain Ascalaphus commenc'd the fray.
Deiphobus to seize his helmet flies,
And from his temples rends the glittering prize ;
Valiant as Mars, Meriones drew near,
And on his loaded arm discharg'd his spear :
He drops the weight, disabled with the pain ;
The hollow helmet rings against the plain.
Swift as a vulture leaping on his prey,
From his torn arm the Grecian rent away
The reeking javelin, and rejoind' his friends ;
His wounded brother good Polites teads ;
Around his waist the pious arms he threw,
And from the rage of combat gently drew :
Him his swift courser, on his splendid car,
Rapt from the lessening thunder of the war ;
To Troy they drove him, groaning from the shore,
And sprinkling, as he pass'd, the sands with gore.

Meanwhile fresh slaughter bathes the sanguine ground,
Heaps fall on heaps, and Heaven and Earth re-
Beld Aphareus by great Æneas bled ; [sound,
As tow'rd the chief he turn'd his daring head,
He pierc'd his throat ; the bending head, deprest
Beneath his helmet, nods upon his breast ;
His shield revers'd o'er the fall'n warrior lies ;
And everlasting stumber seals his eyes.
Antiochus, as Thoön turn'd him round,
Transpiere'd his back with a dishonest wound :
The hollow vein that to the neck extends Along the chine, his eager javelin rends : -
Supine he falls, and to his social train
Spreads his imploring arms, but spreads in vain.
Th' exulting victor, leaping where he lay,
From his broad shoulders tore the spoils away ;
His time observ'd ; for, clos'd by foes around,
On all sides thick, the peals of arms resound.
His shield, emboss'd, the ringing storm sustains,
But he impervious and untouch'd remains.

(Great Neptune's care preserv'd from hostile rage
This youth, the joy of Nestor's glorious age)
In arms intrepid, with the first he fought,
Fac'd every foe, and every danger sought ;
His winged lance, resistless as the wind,
Obeys each motion of the master's mind,
Restless it flies, impatient to be free,
And meditates the distant enemy.

The son of Astus, Adamas, drew near,
And struck his target with the brazen spear,
Fierce in his front : but Neptune wards the blow,
And blunts the javelin of th' eluded foe.
In the broad buckler half the weapon stood ;
Splinter'd on earth flew half the broken wood.
Disarm'd, he mingled in the Trojan crew ;
But Merion's spear o'ertook him as he flew,
Deep in the belly's rim an entrance found,
Where sharp the pang, and mortal is the wound.
Bending, he fell, and doubled to the ground,
Lay panting. Thus an ox, in fetters ty'd,
While death's strong pangs distend his labouring
His bulk enormous on the field displays ; [side,
His heaving heart beats thick, as ebbing life decays.
The spear, the conqueror from his body drew,
And death's dim shadows swam before his view.
Next brave Deipyrus in dust was laid :
King Helenus wav'd high the Thracian blade,
And smote his temples, with an arm so strong,
The helm fell off, and roll'd amid the throng ;
There, for some luckier Greek it rests a prize ;
For dark in death the godlike owner lies !
Raging with grief, great Menelaüs burns,
And, fraught with vengeance, to the victor turns :
That shook the ponderous lance, in act to throw ;
And this stood adverse with the bended bow :
Full on his breast the Trojan arrow fell,
But harmless bounded from the plated steel.
As on some ample barn's well-harden'd floor,
(The winds collected at each open door)
While the broad fan with force is whirl'd around,
Light leaps the golden grain, resulting from the
ground :

So from the steel that guards Atrides' heart,
Repell'd to distance flies the bounding dart.
Atrides, watchful of th' unwary foe,
Pierc'd with his lance the hand that grasp'd the bow,
And nail'd it to the yew : the wounded hand
Trail'd the long lance that mark'd with blood the
But good Agenor gently from the wound [sand,
The spear solicits, and the bandage bound ;
A sling's soft wool, snatch'd from a soldier's side,
At once the tent and ligature supply'd.

Behold ! Pisander, urg'd by fate's decree,
Springs through the ranks to fall, and fall by thee,
Great Menelaüs ! to enhance thy fame ;
High-towering in the front, the warrior came.
First the sharp lance was by Atrides thrown ;
The lance far distant by the winds was blown,
Nor pierc'd Pisander through Atrides' shield ;
Pisander's spear fell shiver'd on the field.
Not so discourag'd, to the future blind,
Vain dreams of conquest swell his haughty mind ;
Dauntless he rushes where the Spartan lord
Like lightning brandish'd his far-beaming sword.

His left arm high oppos'd the shining shield ;
His right, beneath, the cover'd pole-ax held
An olive's cloudy grain the handle made,
Distinct with studs ; and brazen was the blade ;
This on the helm discharg'd a noble blow ;
The plume dropt nodding to the plain below.

Shorn from the crest. Atrides wav'd his steel:
 Deep through his front the weighty falchion fell;
 The crashing bones before its force gave way;
 In dust and blood the groaning hero lay;
 Forc'd from their ghastly orbs, and spouting gore,
 The clotted eye-balls tumble on the shore.
 The fierce Atrides spurn'd him as he bled,
 Tore off his arms, and, loud-exulting, said:
 "Thus, Trojans, thus, at length be taught to
 O race perfidious, who delight in war! [fear;
 Already noble deeds ye have perform'd,
 A princess rapt transcends a navy storm'd:
 In such bold feats your impious might approve,
 Without th' assistance, or the fear, of Jove.
 The violated rites, the ravish'd dame,
 Our heroes slaughter'd, and our ships on flame,
 Crimes heap'd on crimes shall bend your glory down,
 And whelm in ruins you flagitious town.
 O thou, great Father! Lord of earth and skies,
 Above the thought of man! supremely wise!
 If from thy hand the fates of mortals flow,
 From whence this favour to an impious foe,
 A godless crew, abandon'd and unjust,
 Still breathing rapine, violence, and lust?
 The best of things, beyond their measure, cloy;
 Sleep's balmy blessing, love's endearing joy;
 The feast, the dance; whate'er mankind desire,
 Ev'n the sweet charms of sacred numbers tire.
 But Troy for ever reaps a dire delight
 In thirst of slaughter, and in lust of fight."
 This said, he seiz'd (while yet the carcass heav'd)
 The bloody armour, which his train receiv'd:
 Then sudden mix'd among the warring crew,
 And the bold son of Pyrrhus flew:
 Harpalion had through Asia travel'd far,
 Following his martial father to the war;
 Through filial love he left his native shore,
 Never, ah never, to behold it more!
 His unsuccessful spear he chang'd to sling
 Against the target of the Spartan king;
 Thus of his lance disarm'd, from death he flies,
 And turns around his apprehensive eyes.
 Him, through the hip transpiercing as he fled,
 The shaft of Merion mingled with the dead.
 Beneath the bone the glancing point descends,
 And, driving down, the swelling bladder rends:
 Sunk in his sad companion's arms he lay,
 And in short pantings sobb'd his soul away;
 (Like some vile worm extended on the ground)
 While life's red torrent gush'd from out the wound.
 Him on his car the Paphlagonian train
 In slow procession bore from off the plain.
 The pensive father, father now no more!
 Attends the mournful pomp along the shore;
 And unavailing tears profusely shed;
 And, unreveng'd, deplor'd his offspring dead.
 Paris from far the moving sight beheld,
 With pity soften'd, and with fury swell'd;
 His honour'd host, a youth of matchless grace,
 And lov'd of all the Paphlagonian race;
 With his full strength he bent his angry bow,
 And wing'd the feather'd vengeance at the foe.
 A chief there was, the brave Euchenor nam'd,
 For riches much, and more for virtue fam'd,
 Who held his seat in Corinth's stately town;
 Polydus' son, a serf of old renown.
 Oft had the father told his early doom,
 By arms abroad, or slow disease at home:
 He climb'd his vessel, prodigal of breath,
 And chose the certain, glorious path to death.

Beneath his ear the pointed arrow went;
 The soul came issuing at the narrow vent;
 His limbs, unmov'd, drop useless on the ground,
 And everlasting darkness shades him round.
 Now knew great Hector how his legions yield
 (Wrapt in the cloud and tumult of the field);
 Wide on the left the force of Greece commands,
 And conquest hovers o'er th' Achaean bands:
 With such a tide superior virtue sway'd,
 And heav'n that shakes the solid Earth, gave aid.
 But in the center Hector fix'd remain'd;
 Where first the gates were forc'd and bulwarks
 There, on the margin of the hoary deep, [gain'd;
 (Their naval station where th' Ajaos keep,
 And where low walls confine the beating tides,
 Whose humble barrier scarce the foe divides;
 Where late in fight, both foot and horse engag'd,
 And all the thunder of the battle rag'd)
 There join'd the whole Boeotian strength remains,
 The proud Ionians with their sweeping trains,
 Locrians and Phthians, and th' Epeian force;
 But, join'd, repel not Hector's fiery course.
 The flower of Athens, Stichius, Phidas led,
 Bias and great Menoethus at their head.
 Meets the strong th' Epeian bands control'd,
 And Dracius prudent, and Amphion bold;
 The Phthiaps Medon, fam'd for martial might,
 And brave Podarces, active in the fight.
 This drew from Phylacus his noble line:
 Iphiclus' son; and that (Oileus) thine:
 (Young Ajax' brother, by a stol'n embrace;
 He dwelt far distant from his native place,
 By his fierce stepdame from his father's reign
 Expell'd and exil'd for her brother slain.)
 These rule the Phthians, and their arms employ
 Mixt with Boeotians, on the shores of Troy.
 Now side by side, with like unweary'd care,
 Each Ajax labour'd through the field of war:
 So when two lordly bulls, with equal toil, [soil,
 Force the bright ploughshare through the fallow
 Join'd to one yoke, the stubborn earth they tear,
 And trace large furrows with the shining share;
 O'er their huge limbs the foam descends in snow,
 And streams of sweat down their sour foreheads.
 A train of heroes follow'd through the field, [flow.
 Who bore by turns great Ajax' seven-fold shield;
 Whene'er he breath'd, remissive of his might,
 Tir'd with incessant slaughters of the fight.
 No following troops his brave associate grace:
 In close engagement an unpractic'd race,
 The Locrian squadrons nor the javelin wield,
 Nor bear the helm, nor lift the moony shield;
 But skill'd from far the flying shaft to wing,
 Or whirl the sounding pebble from the sling;
 Dextrous with these they aim a certain wound,
 Or fell the distant warrior to the ground.
 Thus in the van, the Telamonian train
 Throng'd in bright arms, a pressing fight main-
 Far in the rear the Locrian archers lie, [tain;
 Whose stones and arrows intercept the sky,
 The mingled tempest on the foes they pour;
 Troy's scattering orders open to the shower.
 Now had the Greeks eternal fame acquir'd,
 And the gall'd Ilians to their walls retir'd;
 But sage Polydames, discreetly brave,
 Address'd great Hector, and this counsel gave:
 "Though great in all, thou seem'st averse to Impartial audience to a faithful friend; [leap

¹ Neptune.

To gods and men thy matchless worth is known,
 And every act of glorious war thy own;
 But in cool thought and counsel to excel,
 How widely differs this from warring well?
 Content with what the bounteous gods have given,
 Seek not alone t' engross the gifts of Heaven.
 To some the powers of bloody war belong,
 To some, sweet music, and the charm of song;
 To few, and wondrous few, has Jove assign'd
 A wise, extensive, all-considering mind;
 Their guardians these the nations round confess,
 And towns and empires for their safety bless.
 If Heaven have lodg'd this virtue in my breast,
 Attend, O Hector, what I judge the best:
 See, as thou mov'st, on dangers dangers spread,
 And war's whole fury burns around thy head.
 Behold! distress'd within yon hostile wall,
 How many Trojans yield, disperse, or fall!
 What troops, out-number'd, scarce the war maintain!
 And what brave heroes at the ships lie slain!
 Here cease thy fury; and the chiefs and kings
 Consult to council, weigh the sum of things,
 Whether (the gods succeeding our desires)
 To yon tall ships to bear the Trojan fires;
 Or quit the fleet and pass unhurt away,
 Contented with the conquest of the day.
 I fear, I fear, lest Greece, not yet undone,
 Pay the large debt of last revolving sun;
 Achilles, great Achilles, yet remains
 On yonder decks and yet o'erlooks the plains!"

The counsel pleas'd; and Hector, with a bound,
 Leap'd from his chariot on the trembling ground;
 Swift as he leap'd his clanging arms resound,
 "To guard this post," (he cried) "thy art employ,
 And here detain the scatter'd youth of Troy;
 Where yonder heroes faint, I bend my way,
 And hasten back to end the doubtful day."

This said; the towering chief prepares to go,
 Shakes his white plumes that to the breezes flow,
 And seems a moving mountain top with snow,
 Through all his host, inspiring force, he flies,
 And bids anew the martial thunder rise.
 To Pandus' son, at Hector's high command,
 Haste the bold leaders of the Trojan band:
 Bet round the battlements, and round the plain,
 For many a chief he look'd, but look'd in vain;
 Deiphobus, nor Helenus the seer,
 Nor Asius' son, nor Asius' self appear.
 For these were pierc'd with many a ghastly wound,
 Some cold in death, some groaning on the ground;
 Some low in dust (a mournful object) lay;
 High on the wall some breath'd their souls away,
 Far on the left, amid the throng he found
 (Charging the troops, and dealing deaths around)
 The graceful Paris; whom, with fury mov'd,
 Opprobrious, thus, th' impatient chief reprov'd;
 "Ill-fated Paris! slave to woman-kind,
 As smooth of face as fraudulent of mind!
 Where is Deiphobus, where Asius gone?
 The godlike father, and th' intrepid son?
 The force of Heleus, dispensing fate;
 And great Othryoneus, so fear'd of late?
 Black fate hangs o'er thee from th' avenging
 Imperial Troy from her foundations nods; [gods,
 Whelm'd in thy country's ruins shalt thou fall,
 And see devouring vengeance swallow all."
 When Paris thus: "My brother and my friend,
 Thy warm impatience makes thy tongue offend.
 In other battles I deserv'd thy blame,
 Though thou not deedless, nor unknown to fame:

But since yon rampart by thy arms lay low,
 I scatter'd slaughter from my fatal bow.
 The chiefs you seek on yonder shore lie slain;
 Of all those heroes, two alone remain;
 Deiphobus, and Helenus the seer:
 Each now disabled by a hostile spear.
 Go then, successful, where thy soul inspires:
 This heart and hand shall second all thy fires;
 What with this arm I can, prepare to know,
 Till death for death be paid, and blow for blow.
 But, 'tis not ours, with forces not our own
 To combat; strength is of the gods alone."

These words the hero's angry mind assuage;
 Then fierce they mingle where the thickest rage.
 Around Polydamas, disdain'd with blood,
 Cebrius, Phalocus, stern Orthasus stood,
 Palms, with Polypeetes the divine,
 And two bold brothers of Hippotion's line:
 (Who reach'd fair Ilium, from Ascania far,
 The former day; the next engag'd in war.)
 As when from gloomy clouds a whirlwind springs,
 That bears Jove's thunder on its dreadful wings,
 Wide o'er the blasted fields the tempest sweeps;
 Then, gather'd, settles on the hoary deeps;
 Th' afflicted deeps tumultuous mix and roar;
 The waves behind impel the waves before, [shore
 Wide rolling, foaming high, and tumbling to the
 Thus rank on rank the thick battalions throng,
 Chief urg'd on chief, and man drove man along.
 Far o'er the plains in dreadful order bright,
 The brazen arms reflect a beamy light;
 Fall in the blazing van great Hector shin'd,
 Like Mars commission'd to confound mankind.
 Before him flaming, his enormous shield
 Like the broad Sun, illumin'd all the field:
 His nodding helm emits a streamy ray;
 His piercing eyes through all the battle stray,
 And, while beneath his targe he flash'd along,
 Shot terrors round, that wither'd ev'n the strong.

Thus stalk'd he, dreadful; death was in his look;
 Whole nations fear'd; but not an Argive shook.
 The towering Ajax, with an ample stride,
 Advanc'd the first, and thus the chief defy'd:
 "Hector! come on, thy empty threats forbear:
 'Tis not thy arm, 'tis thundering Jove we fear:
 The skill of war to us not idly given,
 Lo! Greece is humbled, not by Troy, but Heaven.
 Vain are the hopes that haughty mind imparts,
 To force our fleet: the Greeks have hands and Long ere in flames our lofty navy fall, [hearts.
 Your boasted city and your god-built wall
 Shall sink beneath us, smoking on the ground;
 And spread a long unmeasur'd ruin round:
 The time shall come, when, chas'd along the plain,
 Ev'n thou shalt call on Jove, and call in vain;
 Ev'n thou shalt wish, to aid thy desperate course,
 The wings of falcons for thy flying horse;
 Shalt run forgetful of a warrior's fame,
 While clouds of friendly dust conceal thy shame."

As thus he spoke, behold, in open view,
 On sounding wings a dexter eagle flew.
 To Jove's glad omen all the Grecians rise, [skies
 And hail, with shouts, his progress through the Far echoing clamours bound from side to side:
 They ceas'd; and thus the chief of Troy reply'd:
 "From whence this menace, this insulting
 strain?
 Enormous boaster; doo'n'd to vaunt in vain.
 So may the gods on Hector life bestow,
 (Not that short life which mortals lead below,

But such as those of Jove's high lineage born,
The blue-ey'd maid, or he that gilds the morn)
As this decisive day shall end the fame
Of Greece, and Argos be no more a name.
And thou, imperious; if thy madness wait
The lance of Hector, thou shalt meet thy fate :
That giant corpse extended on the shore,
Shall largely feed the fowls with fat and gore."

He said, and like a lion stalk'd along :
With shouts incessant earth and ocean rang,
Sent from his following host : the Grecian train
With answering thunders fill'd the echoing plain ;
A shout that tore Heaven's concave, and above
Shook the fix'd splendours of the throne of Jove.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XIV.

ARGUMENT.

JUNO DECEIVES JUPITER BY THE GIRDLE OF VENUS.

Nestor, sitting at the table with Machaon, is alarmed with the increasing clamour of the war, and hastens to Agamemnon : on his way he meets that prince with Diomed and Ulysses, whom he informs of the extremity of the danger. Agamemnon proposes to make their escape by night, which Ulysses withstands ; to which Diomed adds his advice, that, wounded as they were, they should go forth and encourage the army with their presence : which advice is pursued. Juno, seeing the partiality of Jupiter to the Trojans, forms a design to over-reach him ; she sets off her charms with the utmost care, and (the more surely to enchant him) obtains the magic circle of Venus. She then applies herself to the god of sleep, and, with some difficulty, persuades him to seal the eyes of Jupiter ; this done, she goes to Mount Ida, where the god, at first sight, is ravished with her beauty, sinks in her embraces, and is laid asleep. Neptune takes advantage of his slumber, and succours the Greeks : Hector is struck to the ground with a prodigious stone by Ajax, and carried off from the battle. Several actions succeed ; till the Trojans, much distressed, are obliged to give way : the lesser Ajax signalizes himself in a particular manner.

But nor the genial feast, nor flowing bowl,
Could charm the cares of Nestor's watchful soul ;
His startled ears th' increasing cries attend :
Then thus, impatient, to his wounded friend :

" What new alarm, divine Machaon, say,
What mixt events attend this mighty day ?
Hark ! how the shouts divide, and how they meet,
And now come full, and thicken to the fleet ;
Here with the cordial draught, dispel thy care,
Let Hecamede the strengthening bath prepare,
Refresh thy wound, and cleanse the clotted gore ;
While I th' adventures of the day explore."

He said, and seizing Thrasymedes' shield,
(His valient offspring) hasten'd to the field ;
(That day, the son his father's buckler bore)
Then snatch'd a lance, and issued from the door.

Soon as the prospect open'd to his view,
His wounded eyes the scene of sorrow knew ;
Dire disarray ! the tumult of the fight,
The wall in ruins, and the Greeks in flight.
As when old Ocean's silent surface sleeps,
The waves just heaving on the purple deeps ;
While yet th' expected tempest hangs on high,
Weights down the cloud, and blackens in the sky,
The mass of waters will no wind obey ;
Jove sends one gust, and bids them roll away.
While wavering counsels thus his mind engage,
Fluctuates in doubtful thought the Pylian sage,
To join the host, or to the general haste ;
Debating long, he fixes on the last :
Yet, as he moves, the fight his bosom warms ;
The field rings dreadful with the clang of arms ;
The gleaming falchions flash, the javelins fly ;
Blows echo blows, and all or kill or die.

Him, in his march, the wounded princes meet,
By tardy steps ascending from the fleet :
The king of men, Ulysses the divine,
And who to Tydeus owes his noble line.
(Their ships at distance from the battle stand,
In lines advan'd along the shelving strand :
Whose bay, the fleet unable to contain
At length ; beside the margin of the main,
Rank above rank, the crouded ships they moor :
Who landed first lay highest on the shore.)
Supported on their spears, they took their way,
Unfit to fight, but anxious for the day.

Nestor's approach alarm'd each Grecian breast,
Whom thus the general of the host address :
" O grace and glory of th' Achaian name !
What drives thee, Nestor, from the field of fame ?
Shall then proud Hector see his boast fulfill'd,
Our fleets in ashes, and our heroes kill'd ?
Such was his threat, ah now too soon made good,
On many a Grecian bosom writ in blood.
Is every heart inflam'd with equal rage
Against your king, nor will one chief engage ?
And have I liv'd to see with mournful eyes
In every Greek a new Achilles rise ?"

Gerenean Nestor then : " So fate has will'd ;
And all-confirming time has fate fulfill'd.
Not he that thunders from th' aerial bower,
Not Jove himself, upon the past has power.
The wall, our late inviolable bound,
And best defence, lies smoking on the ground :
E'vn to the ships their conquering arms extend,
And groans of slaughter'd Greeks to Heaven ascend.

On speedy measures then employ your thought,
In such distress. If counsel profit aught ;
Arms cannot much : though Mars our souls excite ;
These gaping wounds withhold us from the fight."

To him the monarch : " That our army bends,
That Troy triumphant our high fleet ascends,
And that the rampart, late our surest trust,
And best defence, lies smoking in the dust :
All this from Jove's afflictive hand we bear,
Who, far from Argos, wills our ruin here.
Past are the days when happier Greece was blest
And all his favour, all his aid contest ;
Now Heaven, averse, our hands from battle ties,
And lifts the Trojan glory to the skies.
Cease we at length to waste our blood in vain,
And lanch what ships lie nearest to the main ;
Leave these at anchor till the coming night :
Then if impetuous Troy forbear the fight,
Bring all to sea, and hoist each sail for flight.

Better from evils, well foreseen to run,
Than perish in the danger we may shun."
Thus he. The sage Ulysses thus replies,
While anger flash'd from his disdainful eyes :
"What shameful words (unkingly as thou art)
Fall from that trembling tongue, and timorous
heart.

Oh, were thy sway the curse of meaner powers,
And thou the shame of any host but ours !
A host, by Jove endued with martial might,
And taught to conquer, or to fall in fight :
Adventurous combats and bold wars to wage,
Employ'd our youth, and yet employs our age.
And wilt thou thus desert the Trojan plain ?
And have whole streams of blood been spilt in vain ?

In such base sentence if thou couch thy fear,
Speak it in whispers, lest a Greek should hear.
Lives there a man so dead to fame, who dares
To think such meanness, or the thought declares ?
And comes it ev'n from him whose sovereign sway
The bandied legions of all Greece obey ?
Is this a general's voice that calls to fight,
While war hangs doubtful, while his soldiers fight ?
What more could Troy ? What yet their fate denies,

Thou giv'st the foe : all Greece becomes their prize.

No more the troops (our hoisted sails in view,
Themselves abandon'd) shall the fight pursue ;
But thy ships flying, with despair shall see ;
And see destruction to a prince like thee.

"Thy just reproofs" (Atrides calm replies)
"Like arrows pierce me, for thy words are wise.
I willing as I am to lose the host,
I force not Greece to leave this hateful coast.
God I submit, whoe'er, or young or old,
Aught more conducive to our weal, unfold."
Tydides cut him short, and thus began :

"Such counsel if you seek, behold the man
Who boldly gives it ; and what he shall say,
Young though he be, disdain not to obey :
A youth, who from the mighty Tydens springs,
May speak to councils and assembled kings.
Hear then in me the great CEnides' son,
Whose honour'd dust (his race of glory run)
Lies whelm'd in ruins of the Theban wall ;
Brave in his life, and glorious in his fall ;
With three bold sons was generous Prothoüs blest,
Who Pleuron's walls and Calydon possess ;
Nestes and Agrius, but (who far surpast
The rest in courage) CEneus was the last.
From him, my sire. From Calydon expell'd,
He pass'd to Argos, and in exile dwell'd ;
The monarch's daughter there (so Jove ordain'd)
He won and flourish'd where Adrastus reign'd ;
There, rich in fortune's gifts, his acres till'd,
Beheld his vines their liquid harvest yield,
And numerous flocks that whiten'd all the field.
Such Tydens was, the foremost ounce in fame !
Nur lives in Greece a stranger to his name.
Then, what for common good my thoughts inspire,
Attend ; and in the son, respect the sire :
Though sore of battle, though with wounds op-
prest

Let each go forth, and animate the rest,
Advance the glory which he cannot share,
Though not partaker, witness of the war.
But lest new wounds on wounds o'effpower us quite,
Beyond the missile javelin's sounding flight,

Safe let us stand ; and from the tumult far,
Inspire the ranks, and rule the distant war."

He added not : the listening kings obey,
Slow moving on ; Atrides leads the way.
The god of ocean (to inflame their rage)
Appears a warrior furrow'd o'er with age ;
Prest in his own, the general's hand he took,
And thus the venerable hero spoke :
"Atrides, lo ! with what disdainful eye
Achilles sees his country's forces fly ;
Blind impious man ! whose anger is his guide,
Who glories in unattractive pride.
So may he perish, so may Jove disclaim
The wretch relentless, and o'erwhelm with shame !
But Heaven forsakes not thee : o'er yonder sands
Soon shalt thou view the scatter'd Trojan bands
Fly diverse ; while proud kings, and chiefs re-nown'd,

Driven heaps on heaps, with clouds involv'd around
Of rolling dust, their winged wheels employ
To hide their ignominious heads in Troy."

He spoke, then rush'd amid the warrior crew ;
And sent his voice before him as he flew,
Loud, as the shout encountering armies yield,
When twice ten thousand shake the labouring field ;
Such was the voice, and such the thundering
sound

Of him, whose trident rends the solid ground.
Each Argive bosom beats to meet the fight,
And grizzily war appears a pleasing sight.

Meantime Saturnia from Olympus' brow
High thron'd in gold, beheld the fields below ;
With joy the glorious conflict she survey'd,
Where her great brother gave the Grecians aid ;
But plac'd aloft, on Ida's shady height
She sees her Jove, and trembles at the sight.
Jove to deceive, what methods shall she try,
What arts, to blind his all-berholding eye ?
At length she trusts her power ; resolv'd to prove
The old, yet still successful, cheat of love ;
Against his wisdom to oppose her charms,
And lull the lord of thunders in her arms.

Swift to her bright apartment she repairs,
Sacred to dress and beauty's pleasing cares :
With skill divine had Vulcan form'd the bower,
Safe from access of each intruding power.
Touch'd with her secret key, the doors unfold :
Self-clos'd, behind her shut the valves of gold.
Here first she bathes ; and round her body pours
Soft oils of fragrance, and ambrosial showers :
The winds, perfum'd, the balmy gale convey Through Heaven, through Earth, and all
th' aerial way ;
Spirit divine ! whose exhalation greets
The sense of gods with more than mortal sweets.
Thus while she breath'd of Heaven, with decent pride

Her artful hands the radiant tresses ty'd ;
Part on her head in shining ringlets roll'd,
Part o'er her shoulders wav'd like melted gold,
Around her next a heavenly mantle flow'd,
That rich with Pallas' labour'd colours glow'd :
Large clasps of gold the foldings gather'd round,
A golden zone her swelling bosom bound.
Far-beaming pendants tremble in her ear,
Each gem illumin'd with a triple star.
Then o'er her head she cast a veil more white
Than new-fall'n snow, and dazzling as the light.
Last her fair feet celestial sandals grace.
Thus issuing radiant with majestic pace,

Forth from the dome th' imperial goddess moves,
And calls the mother of the Smiles and Loves.

"How long" (to Venus thus apart she cried)

"Shall human strife celestial minds divide?"

"Ah yet, will Venus aid Saturnia's joy,
And set aside the cause of Greece and Troy?"

"Let Heaven's dread empress" (Cytherea said)

Speak her request, and deem her will obey'd."

"Then grant me" (said the queen) "those conquering charms,

That power, which mortals and immortals warms,
That love, which melts mankind in fierce desires,
And burns the sons of Heaven with sacred fires!

"For lo, I haste to those remote abodes,
Where the great parents (sacred source of gods!)
Ocean and Tethys their old empire keep,
On the last limits of the land and deep.
In their kind arms my tender years were past;
What time old Saturn, from Olympus cast,
Of upper Heaven to Jove resign'd the reign,
Whelm'd under the huge mass of earth and main:

For strife, I hear, has made the union cease,
Which held so long that ancient pair in peace.
What honour, and what love, shall I obtain,
If I compose those fatal feuds again;
Once more their minds in mutual ties engage,
And what my youth has owed, repay their rage?"

She said. With awe divine the queen of love
Obey'd the sister and the wife of Jove:
And from her fragrant breast the zone unbrac'd,
With various skill, and high embroidery grac'd.
In this was every art, and every charm,
To win the wisest, and the coldest warm:
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
The kind deceit, the still reviving fire,
Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.
This, on her hand the Cyprian goddess laid;
Take this, and with it all thy wish, she said.
With smile she took the charm; and smiling prest
The powerful cestus to her snowy breast.

Then Venus to the courts of Jove withdrew;
Whilst from Olympus pleas'd Saturnia flew.
O'er high Pieria thence her course she bore,
O'er fair Emathia's ever pleasing shore,
O'er Hemus' hills with snows eternal crown'd;
Nor once her flying foot approach'd the ground.
Then taking wing from Athos' lofty steep,
She speeds to Lemnos o'er the rolling deep,
And seeks the cave of Death's half-brother, Sleep.
"Sweet pleasing Sleep!" (Saturnia thus began)
"Who spread'st thy empire o'er each god and
If e'er obsequious to thy Juno's will, [man;
O power of slumbers! hear, and favour still:
Shed thy soft dews on Jove's immortal eyes,
While sunk in love's entrancing joys he lies.
A splendid footstool, and a throne, that shine
With gold unfading, Somnus, shall be thine:
The work of Vulcan; to indulge thy ease,
When wine and feasts thy golden humours
please."

"Imperial dame," (the balmy power replies)
"Great Saturn's heir, and empress of the skies!
O'er other gods I spread my easy chain;
The sire of all, old Ocean, owns my reign,
And his hush'd waves lie silent on the main.
But how, unbidden, shall I dare to steep
Jove's awful temples in the dew of sleep?"

Long since, too venturesous, at thy bold command,
On those eternal lids I laid my hand:

What time, deserting Iliou's wasted plain,
His conquering son, Alcides, plough'd the main,
When lo! the deeps arise, the tempests roar,
And drive the hero to the Coan shore;
Great Jove awaking, shook the blest abodes
With rising wrath, and tumbled gods on gods;
Me chief he sought, and from the realms on high
Had hurl'd indignaat to the nether sky,
But gentle Night, to whom I fled for aid,
(The friend of Earth and Heaven) her wings
display'd;

Impower'd the wrath of gods and men to tame,
Ev'n Jove rever'd the venerable dame. [plies,

"Vain are thy fears," (the queen of Heaven re-
And, speaking, rolls her large majestic eyes)
"Think'st thou that Troy has Jove's high favour won,
Like great Alcides, his all-conquering son?
Hear, and obey the mistress of the skies,
Nor for the deed expect a vulgar prize;
For know, thy lov'd one shall be ever thine,
The youngest grace, Pasithea the divine."

"Swear then," (he said) "by those tremendous foods

That roar through Hell, and bind th' invoking gods:
Let the great parent Earth one hand sustain,
And stretch the other o'er the sacred main.
Call the black Titans, that with Chronos dwell,
To hear and witness from the depths of Hell;
That she, my lov'd one, shall be ever mine,
The youngest grace, Pasithea the divine."

The queen assents; and from th' infernal
Invokes the sable subterranean powers, [bowers
And those who rule th' inviolable floods,
Whom mortals name the dread Titanian gods.

Then swift as wind, o'er Lemnos' smoky isle,
They wing their way, and Imbrus' sea-beat soil,
Through air, unseen, involv'd in darkness glide,
And light on Lectos, on the point of Ide,
(Mother of savages, whose echoing hills
Are heard resounding with a hundred rills;)
Fair Ida trembles underneath the god;
Hush'd are her mountains, and her forests nod;
There on a fir, whose spiry branches rise
To join its summit to the neighbouring skies;
Dark in embowering shade, conceal'd from sight,
Sat Sleep, in likeness of the bird of night,
(Chalcis his name by those of heavenly birth,
But call'd Cymidis by the race of Earth.)

To Ida's top successful Juno flies;
Great Jove surveys her with desiring eyes:
The god, whose lightning sets the Heavens on fire,
Through all his bosom feels the fierce desire;
Fierce as when first by stealth he seiz'd her
charms,

Mix'd with her soul, and melted in her arms,
Fix'd on her eyes he fed his eager look,
Then press'd her hand, and thus with transport
spoke:

"Why comes my goddess from th' ethereal sky,
And not her steeds and flaming chariot nigh?"

Then she—"I haste to those remote abodes,
Where the great parents of the deathless gods,
The reverend Ocean and gray Tethys reign,
On the last limits of the land and main.
I visit these, to whose indulgent cares
I owe the nursing of my tender years:
For strife, I hear, has made that union cease,
Which held so long this ancient pair in peace."

The steeds, prepar'd my chariots to convey
O'er earth and seas, and through th' aerial way,
Wait under Ide: of thy superior power
To sit content, I leave th' Olympian bower;
Nor seek, unknown to thee, the sacred cells
Deep under seas, where hoary Ocean dwells."

"For that" (said Jove) "suffice another day;
But eager love denies the least delay.
Let softer cares the present hour employ,
And be these moments sacred all to joy.
N'er did my soul so strong a passion prove.
Or for an earthly, or a heavenly love:
Not when I press'd Ixion's matchless dame
Whence rose Perithoës like the gods in fame.
Not when fair Danaë felt the shower of gold
Stream into life, whence Perseus brave and bold.
Not thus I burn'd for either Theban dame,
(Hæcuba from this, from that Alcides came)
Not Phoenix' daughter, beautiful and young,
Whence godlike Rhodamant and Minos sprung.
Not thus I burn'd for fair Latonia's face,
Nor consider Ceres' more majestic grace.
Not thus ev'n for thyself I felt desire,
As now my veins receive the pleasing fire."

He spoke: the goddess with the charming eyes
Glees with celestial red, and thus replies:
"Is this a scene for love? On Ida's height
Expos'd to mortal and immortal sight;
Our joy profan'd by each familiar eye,
The sport of Heaven, and fable of the sky.
How shall I e'er review the blest abodes,
Or mix among the senate of the gods?
Shall I not think, that, with disorder'd charms,
All Heaven beholds me recent from thy arms?
With skill divine has Vulcan form'd thy bower,
Sacred to love and to the genial hour;
If such thy will, to that recess retire,
And secret there indulge thy soft desire."

She ceas'd; and, smiling with superior love,
Thus answer'd mild the cloud-compelling Jove:
"Nor god nor mortal shall our joys behold,
Shaded with clouds, and circumfus'd in gold;
Not ev'n the Sun, who darts through heaven
his rays,
And whose broad eye th' extended Earth surveys."

Saying he spoke, and kindling at the view,
His eager arms around the goddess threw.
Glad Earth perceives, and from her bosom pours
Umbellid herbs and voluntary flowers:
Thick new-born violets a soft carpet spread
And clustering lotos swell'd the rising bed,
And sudden hyacinths the turf bestrow,
And flamy crocus us'd the mountain glow.
There golden clouds conceal'd the heavenly pair,
Sleep'd in soft joys, and circumfus'd with air;
Celestial dews, descending o'er the ground,
Perfume the mount, and breathe ambrosia round.
At length, with love and sleep's soft power op-
prest,

The panting thunderer nods, and sinks to rest.
Now to the navy borne on silent wings,
To Neptune's ear soft Sleep his message brings;
Beside him sudden, unperceiv'd he stood,
And thus with gentle words address'd the god:
"Now, Neptune! now th' important hour employ,
To check a while the haughty hopes of Troy:
While Jove yet rests, while yet my vapours shed
The golden vision round his sacred head;
For Juno's love, and Somnus' pleasing ties,
Have clos'd those awful and eternal eyes."

Thus having said, the power of slumber drew,
On human lids to drop the balmy dew.

Neptune, with zeal increas'd, renews his care,
And towering in the foremost ranks of war,
Indignant thus—"Oh once of martial fame!
O Greeks! if yet ye can deserve the name!
This half-recover'd day, shall Troy obtain?
Shall Hector thunder at your ships again?
Lo, still he vaunts, and threats the fleet with fire,
While stern Achilles in his wrath retires.
One hero's loss too tamely you deplore,
Be still yourselves, and we shall need no more.
Oh yet, if glory any bosom warms.

Brace on your firmest helms, and stand to arms!
His strongest spear each valiant Grecian wield;
Each valiant Grecian seize his broadest shield;
Let, to the weak, the lighter arms belong,
The ponderous target be wielded by the strong.
(Thus arm'd) not Hector shall our presence stay:
Myself, ye Greeks! myself will lead the way."

The troops assent; their martial arms they change,
The busy chiefs their banded legions range.
The kings, though wounded, and oppress with pain,
With helpful hands themselves assist the train.
The strong and cumbrous arms the valiant wield,
The weaker warrior takes a lighter shield.
Thus sheath'd in shining brass, in bright array
The legions march, and Neptune leads the way:
His brandish'd falchion flames before their eyes,
Like lightning flashing through the frighted skies.
Clad in his might, th' earth-shaking power appears;

Pale mortals tremble, and confess their fears.

Troy's great defender stands alone unaw'd,
Arms his proud host, and dares oppose a god:
And lo! the god and wondrous man appear:
The sea's stern ruler there, and Hector here.
The roaring Main, at her great master's call,
Rose in huge ranks: and form'd a watery wall
Around the ships; seas hanging o'er the shores,
Both armies join: Earth thunders, Ocean roars.
Not half so loud the belowing deeps resound,
When stormy winds disclose the dark profound;
Less loud the winds, that from th' Æolian hall
Roar through the woods, and make whole forests
fall;

Less loud the woods, when flames in torrents pour,
Catch the dry mountain, and its shades devour:
With such a rage the meeting hosts are driven,
And such a clamour shakes the sounding Heaven:
The first bold javelin urg'd by Hector's force,
Direct at Ajax' bosom wing'd its course;
But there no pass the crossing belts afford,
(One brac'd his shield, and one sustain'd his sword.)
Then back the disappointed Trojan drew,
And curs'd the lance that unavailing flew:
But scap'd not Ajax; his tempestuous hand
A ponderous stone upheaving from the sand,
(Where heaps, laid loose beneath the warrior's feet,
Or serv'd to ballast, or to prop the fleet)
Tost round and round, the massive marble flings;
On the raz'd shield the falling ruin rings,
Full on his breast and throat with force descends;
Nor deaden'd there its giddy fury spends,
But whirling on, with many a fiery round,
Smokes in the dust, and ploughs into the ground.
As when the bolt, red-hissing from above,
Darts on the consecrated plant of Jove,
The mountain-peak in flaming ruin lies,
Black from the blow, and smokes of sulphur rise;

Stiff with amaze the pale beholders stand,
 And own the terrors of th' Almighty hand !
 No lies great Hector prostrate on the shore ;
 His slacken'd hand deserts the lance it bore ;
 His following shield the fallen chief overspread ;
 Beneath his helmet dropp'd his fainting head ;
 His load of armour sinking to the ground,
 Clanks on the field : a dead, and hollow sound.
 Loud shouts of triumph fill the crowded plain ;
 Greece sees, in hope, Troy's great defender slain :
 All spring to seize him ; storms of arrows fly ;
 And thicker javelins intercept the sky.
 In vain an iron tempest hisses round ;
 He lies protected, and without a wound.
 Polydamas, Agenor the divine,
 The pious warrior of Anchises' line,
 And each bold leader of the Lycian band ;
 With covering shields (a friendly circle) stand.
 His mournful followers, with assistant care,
 The groaning hero to his chariot bear !
 His foaming coursers, swifter than the wind,
 Speed to the town, and leave the war behind.

When now they touch'd the mead's enamel'd side,
 Where gentle Xanthus rolls his easy tide,
 With watery drops the chief they sprinkle round,
 Plac'd on the margin of the flowery ground,
 Rais'd on his knees, he now ejects the gore ;
 Now faints anew, low-sinking on the shore ;
 By fits he breathes, half views the fleeting skies,
 And seals again, by fits, his swimming eyes.

Soon as the Greeks the chief's retreat beheld,
 With double fury each invades the field.
 Oïlean Ajax first his javelin sped,
 Pierc'd by whose point the son of Enops bled ;
 (Satnius the brave, whom beauteous Neis bore
 Amidst her flocks, on Satnio's silver shore)
 Struck through the belly's rim, the warrior lies
 Supine, and shades eternal veil his eyes.
 An arduous battle rose around the dead ;
 By turns the Greeks, by turns the Trojans bled.

Fir'd with revenge, Polydamas drew near,
 And at Prothenor shook the trembling spear ;
 The driving javelin through his shoulder thrust,
 He sinks to earth and grasps the bloody dust.
 " Lo thus" (the victor cries) " we rule the field,
 And thus their arms the race of Panthus wield :
 From this unerring hand there flies no dart
 But bathes its point within a Grecian heart.
 Prompt on that spear to which thou ow'st thy fall,
 (O, guide thy darksome steps to Plato's dreary hall !")

He said, and sorrow touch'd each Argive breast :
 The soul of Ajax burn'd above the rest.
 As by his side the groaning warrior fell,
 At the fierce foe he launch'd his piercing steel :
 The foe reclining, shunn'd the flying death ;
 But fate, Archilochus, demands thy breath :
 Thy lofty birth no succour could impart,
 The wings of death o'ertook thee on the dart.
 Swift to perform Heaven's fatal will it flew,
 Full on the juncture of the neck and head,
 And took the joint, and cut the nerves in twain :
 The dropping head first tumbled to the plain.
 So just the stroke, that yet the body stood
 Erect, then roll'd along the sands in blood.

" Here, proud Polydamas, here turn thy eyes !"

(The towering Ajax loud insulting cries)
 " Say, is this chief extended on the plain,
 A worthy vengeance for Prothenor slain ?

Mark well his port ! his figure and his face
 Nor speak him vulgar, nor of vulgar race ;
 Some lines, methinks, may make his lineage known,
 Antenor's brother, or perhaps his son."

He spake, and sunil'd severe, for well he knew
 The bleeding youth : Troy sadden'd at the view.
 But furious Acamas aveng'd his cause ;
 As Promachus his slaughter'd brother draws,
 He pierc'd his heart—" Such fate attends you all,
 Proud Argives ! destin'd by our arms to fall ;
 Not Troy alone, but haughty Greece shall share
 The toils, the sorrows, and the wounds of war.
 Behold your Promachus depriv'd of breath,
 A victim ow'd to my brave brother's death.
 Not unappas'd he enters Pluto's gate.
 Who leaves a brother to revenge his fate."

Heart-piercing anguish struck the Grecian host,
 But touch'd the breast of bold Peneleus most ;
 At the proud boaster he directs his course ;
 The boaster flies, and shuns superior force.
 But young Ilioeus receiv'd the spear ;
 Ilioeus, his father's only care.
 (Phorbos the rich, of all the Trojan train Whom Hermes lov'd, and taught the arts of gain)
 Full in his eye the weapon chanc'd to fall,
 And from the fibres scoop'd the rooted ball,
 Drove through the neck, and hurl'd him to the
 plain :

He lifts his miserable arms in vain !
 Swift his broad falchion fierce Peneleus spread,
 And from the spouting shoulders struck his head ;
 To earth at once the head and helmet fly ;
 The lance, yet striking through the bleeding eye,
 The victor seiz'd ; and as aloft he shook
 The glory visg'd, thus insulting spoke :

" Trojans ! your great Ilioeus behold !
 Haste, to his father let the tale be told :
 Let his high roofs resound with frantic woe,
 Such, as the house of Promachus must know ;
 Let doleful tidings greet his mother's ear,
 Such, as to Promachus' sad spouse we bear ;
 When we victorious shall to Greece return,
 And the pale matron in our triumphs mourn."

Dreadful he spoke, then toss'd the head on high ;

The Trojans hear, they tremble, and they fly :
 Aghast they gaze around the fleet and wall,
 And dread the ruin that impends on all.

Daughters of Jove ! that on Olympus shine,
 Ye all-beholding, all-ascending Nine !
 O say, when Neptune made proud Ilioeus yield,
 What chief, what hero, first embru'd the field ?
 Of all the Grecians what immortal name,
 And whose blest trophies will ye raise to fame ?

Thou first, great Ajax, on th' ensanguin'd
 plain

Laid Hyrtius, leader of the Mysian train.
 Phalces and Mermer, Nestor's son o'erthrew,
 Bold Merion, Morys and Hippotion slew.
 Strong Periphates and Prothoos bled,
 By Teucer's arrows mingled with the dead.
 Pierc'd in the flank by Menelaüs' steel,
 His people's pastor, Hyperenor, fell ;
 Eternal darkness wrapt the warrior round,
 And the fierce soul came rushing through the
 wound :

But stretch'd in heaps before Oïleus' son,
 Fall mighty numbers, mighty numbers run ;
 Ajax the less, of all the Grecian race
 Skill'd in pursuit, and swiftest in the chase.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XV.

ARGUMENT.

THE FIFTH BATTLE, AT THE SHIPS; AND THE ACTS OF AJAX.

JUNO awaking, sees the Trojans repulsed from the trenches, Hector in a swoon, and Neptune at the head of the Greeks. He is highly incensed at the artifice of Juno, who appeases him by her submissions: she is then sent to Iris and Apollo. Juno, repairing to the assembly of the gods, attempts, with extraordinary address, to incense them against Jupiter; in particular touches Mars with a violent resentment: he is ready to take arms, but is prevented by Minerva. Iris and Apollo obey the orders of Jupiter; Iris commands Neptune to leave the battle, to which, after much reluctance and passion, he consents. Apollo re-inspires Hector with vigour, brings him back to the battle, marches before him with his aegis, and turns the fortune of the fight. He breaks down great part of the Grecian wall; the Trojans rush in, and attempt to fire the first line of the fleet, but are, as yet, repelled by the greater Ajax with a prodigious slaughter.

Now in swift flight they pass the trench profound,
And many a chief lay gasping on the ground:
Then stopp'd and panted, where the chariots lie;
Fear on their cheek and horror in their eye.
Meanwhile, awaken'd from his dream of love,
On Ida's summit sat imperial Jove:
Round the wide fields he cast a careful view,
There saw the Trojans fly, the Greeks pursue;
These proud in arms, those scatter'd o'er the plain;
And, midst the war, the monarch of the main.
Not far, great Hector on the dust he spies
(His sad associates round with weeping eyes)
Ejecting blood, and panting yet for breath,
His senses wandering to the verge of death.
The god beheld him with a pitying look,
And thus, incens'd, to fraudulent Juno spoke:
"O thou, still adverse to th' eternal will,
For ever studious in promoting ill!
Thy arts have made the godlike Hector yield,
And driv'n his conquering squadrons from the field.
Canst thou, unhappy in thy wiles! withstand
Our power immense, and brave th' almighty hand?
Hast thou forgot, when, bound and fix'd on high,
From the vast concave of the spangled sky,
I hang thee trembling in a golden chain;
And all the raging gods oppos'd in vain?
Headlong I hurl'd them from th' Olympian hall,
Struck'd in the whirl, and breathless with the fall.
For godlike Hercules these deeds were done,
For none but the vengeance worthy such a son:
When, by thy wiles induc'd, fierce Boreas tost
The shipwreck'd hero on the Cæan coast,

Him through a thousand forms of death I bore,
And sent to Argos, and his native shore,
Hear this, remember, and our fury dread,
Nor pull th' unwilling vengeance on thy head;
Lest arts and blandishments unsuccessful prove,
Thy soft deceits, and well-dissembled love."
The thunderer spoke: imperial Jove mourn'd,
And, trembling, these submissive words return'd:
"By every oath that powers immortal ties,
The foodful Earth, and all-infolding skies;
By thy black waves, tremendous Styx! that flow
Through the drear realms of gliding ghosts below;
By the dread honours of thy sacred head,
And that unbroken vow, our virgin bed!
Not by my arts the ruler of the main
Steeps Troy in blood, and ranges round the plain!
By his own ardour, his own pity, sway'd
To help his Greeks, he fought, and disobey'd:
Else had thy Juno better counsels given,
And taught submission to the sire of Heaven."
"Think'st thou with me? fair empress of the skies!"

(Th' immortal father with a smile replies)
"Then soon the haughty sea-god shall obey,
Nor dare to act but when we point the way.
If truth inspires thy tongue, proclaim our will
To yon bright synod on th' Olympian hill;
Our high decree let various Iris know,
And call the god that bears the silver bow.
Let her descend, and from th' embattled plain
Command the sea-god to his watery reign:
While Phœbus haastes, great Hector to prepare
To rise afresh, and once more wake the war;
His labouring bosom re-inspires with breath,
And calls his senses from the verge of death.
Greece, chas'd by Troy ev'n to Achilles' fleet,
Shall fall by thousands at the hero's feet.
He, not untouch'd with pity, to the plain
Shall send Patroclus, but shall send in vain.
What youths he slaughters under Ilium's walls!
Ev'n my lov'd son, divine Sarpedon, falls!
Vanquish'd at last by Hector's lance he lies,
Then, nor till then, shall great Achilles rise:
And lo! that instant god-like Hector dies. [turns,
From that great hour the war's whole fortune
Pallas assists, and lofty Ilium burns:
Not till that day shall Jove relax his rage,
Nor one of all the heavenly host engage
In aid of Greece. The promise of a god
I gave, and seal'd it with th' almighty nod,
Achilles' glory to the stars to raise;
Such was our word, and fate the word obeys."

The trembling queen (th' almighty order given)
Swift from th' Idaean summit shot to Heaven.
As some way-faring man, who wanders o'er,
In thought, a length of lands he trod before,
Sends forth his active mind from place to place,
Joins hill to dale, and measures space with space:
So swift flew Juno to the blest abodes,
If thought of man can match the speed of gods.
There sat the powers in awful synod plac'd;
They bow'd, and made obeisance as she pass'd,
Through all the brazen dome: with goblets crown'd
They hail her queen; the nectar streams around.
Fair Themis first presents the golden bowl,
And anxious asks what cares disturb her soul?
To whom the white-arm'd goddess thus replies:
"Enough thou know'st the tyrant of the skies,
Severely bent his purpose to fulfil,
Unmov'd his mind, and unrestrain'd his will."

Go thou, the feasts of Heaven attend thy call ;
Bid the crown'd nectar circle round the hall ;
But Jove shall thunder through th' æthereal dome,
Such stern decrees, such thrcaten'd woes to come,
As soon shall freeze mankind with dire surprise,
And damp th' eternal banquets of the skies."

The goddess said, and sullen took her place ;
Black horror sadden'd each celestial face.
To see the gathering grudge in every breast,
Smiles on her lips a spleenful joy exprest ;
While on her wrinkled front, and eye-brow bent,
Sat stedfast care, and lowering discontent.
Thus she proceeds—" Attend, ye powers above !
But know, 'tis madness to contest with Jove :
Supreme he sits : and sees, in pride of sway,
Your vassal godheads grudgingly obey :
Fierce in the majesty of power controls ;
Shakes all the thrones of Heaven, and bends the poles.

Submit, immortals ! all he wills, obey ;
And thou, great Mars, begin and show the way.
Behold Ascalaphus ! behold him die,
But dare not murmur, dare not vent a sigh ;
Thy own lov'd boasted offspring lies o'erthrown,
If that lov'd boasted offspring be thy own."

Stern Mars, with anguish for his slaughter'd son,

Smote his rebelling breast, and fierce begun :
" Thus then, immortals ! thus shall Mars obey ;
Forgive me, gods, and yield my vengeance way :
Descending first to yon forbidden plain,
The god of battles dares avenge the slain ;
Dares, though the thunder, bursting o'er my head,
Should hurl me blazing on those heaps of dead."

With that, he gives command to Fear and Flight
To join his rapid coursers for the fight :
Then, grim in arms, with hasty vengeance flies ;
Arms, that reflect a radiance through the skies.
And now had Jove, by bold rebellion driven,
Discharg'd his wrath on half the host of Heaven ;
But Pallas, springing through the bright abode,
Starts from her azure throne to calm the god.
Struck for th' immortal race with timely fear,
From frantic Mars she snatch'd the shield and spear ;

Then the huge helmet lifting from his head,
Thus to th' impetuous homicide she said :

" By what wild passion, furious ! art thou tost ?
Striv'st thou with Jove ? thou art already lost.
Shall not the thunderer's dread command restrain,
And was imperial Juno heard in vain ?
Back to the skies would'st thou with shame be driven,

And in thy guilt involve the host of Heaven ?
Iliou and Greece no more shall Jove engage ;
The skies would yield an ampler scene of rage,
Guilty and guiltless find an equal fate,
And one vast ruin whelm th' Olympian state,
Cease then thy offspring's death unjust to call ;
Heroes as great have dy'd, and yet shall fall.
Why should Heaven's law with foolish man comply,
Exempted from the race ordain'd to die ?"

This menace fix'd the warrior to his throne ;
Sullen he sat, and curb'd the rising groan.
Then Juno call'd (Jove's orders to obey)
The winged Iris, and the god of day.

" Go wait the thunderer's will," Saturnia cry'd,
" On yon tall summit of the fountful Ide :
There in the father's awful presence stand,
Receive, and execute his dread command."

She said, and sat : the god that gilds the day,
And various Iris, wing their airy way.
Swift as the wind, to Ida's hill they came
(Fair nurse of fountains and of savage game) ;
There sat th' eternal ; he, whose nod controls
The trembling world, and shakes the steady pole.
Veil'd in a mist of fragrance him they found,
With clouds of gold and purple circled round :
Well-pleas'd the thunderer saw their earnest care,

And prompt obedience to the queen of air ;
Then (while a smile serenec his awful brow)
Commands the goddess of the showery bow :

" Iris ! descend, and what we here ordain
Report to yon mad tyrant of the main.
Bid him from fight to his own deeps repair,
Or breathe from slaughter in the fields of air.
If he refuse, then let him timely weigh
Our elder birthright, and superior sway.
How shall his rashness stand the dire alarms,
If Heaven's omnipotence descend in arms ?
Strives he with me, by whom his power is given,
And is there equal to the lord of Heaven ?"

Th' almighty spoke ; the goddess wing'd her
To sacred Iliou from th' Idæan height. (light)
Swift as the rattling hail, or fleecy snows,
Drive thro' the skies, when Boreas fiercely blows ;
So from the clouds descending Iris falls ;
And to blue Neptune thus the goddess calls :

" Attend the mandate of the sire above,
In me behold the messenger of Jove :
He bids thee from forbidden wars repair
To thy own deeps, or to the fields of air.
This, if refus'd, he bids thee timely weigh
His elder birthright, and superior sway.
How shall thy rashness stand the dire alarms,
If Heaven's omnipotence descend in arms ?
Striv'st thou with him, by whom all power is given ?
And art thou equal to the lord of Heaven ?"

" What means the haughty sovereign of the skies ?"

(The king of ocean thus, incens'd, replies)
" Rule as he will his portion'd realms on high ;
No vassal god, nor of his train, am I.
Three brother deities from Saturn came,
And ancient Rhea, Earth's immortal dame :
Assign'd by lot, our triple rule we know ;
Infernal Pluto sways the shades below ;
O'er the wide clouds, and o'er the starry plain,
Æthereal Jove extends his high domain ;
My court beneath the hoary waves I keep,
And hush the roarings of the sacred deep :
Olympus, and this Earth, in common lie,
What claim has here the tyrant of the sky ?
Far in the distant clouds let him control,
And awe the younger brothers of the pole ;
There to his children his commands be given,
The trembling, servile, second race of Heaven."

" And must I then," said she, " O sire of floods !
Bear this fierce answer to the king of gods ?
Correct it yet, and change thy rash intent ;
A noble mind disdains not to repent..

To elder brothers guardian fends are given,
To scourge the wretch insulting them and Heaven."

" Great is the profit," (thus the god rejoind)
" When ministers are blest with prudent mind :
Warn'd by thy words, to powerful Jove I yield,
And quit, though angry, the contended field.
Not but his threats with justice I disclaim,
The same our honours, and our birth the same.

Yet, forgetful of his promise given
 To Hermes, Pallas, and the queen of Heaven;
 To favour Ilion, that perfidious place,
 He breaks his faith with half th' ethereal race;
 Give him to know, unless the Grecian train
 Lay you proud structures level with the plain,
 Else'er th' offence by other gods be past,
 The wrath of Neptune shall for ever last."
 Thus speaking, furious from the field he strode,
 And plung'd into the bosom of the flood.
 The lord of thunders from his lofty height
 Beheld, and thus bespoke the source of light:
 "Behold! the god whose liquid arms are hurl'd Around the globe; whose earthquakes rock the world;
 Demits at length his rebel war to wage,
 Beckis his own seas, and trembles at our rage;
 Hee had my wrath, Heaven's thrones all shaking
 round,
 Dura'd to the bottom of the seas profound;
 And all the gods that round old Saturn dwell
 Had heard the thunders to the deeps of Hell.
 'Twas the crime, and well the vengeance spar'd;
 His power immense had found such battle hard.
 So thou, my son! the trembling Greeks alarm,
 Shake my broad segis on thy active arm;
 Be godlike Hector thy peculiar care,
 Beval his bold heart, and urge his strength to war:
 Let him conquer, till th' Achaian train
 Fly to their ships, and Hellespont again;
 Then Greece shall breathe from toils" — The god-
 head said;
 His will divine the son of Jove obey'd.
 That half so swift the sailing falcon flies,
 That drives a turtle through the liquid skies;
 As Phœbus, shooting from th' Idæan brow,
 Slides down the mountain to the plain below.
 There Hector seated by the stream he sees,
 His sense returning with the coming breeze;
 Again his pulses beat, his spirits rise;
 Again his lov'd companions meet his eyes;
 Again thinking of his pains, they past away.
 To whom the god who gives the golden day:
 "Why sits great Hector from the field so far?
 What grief, what wound, withholds thee from the war?"
 The faltering hero, as the vision bright
 Beed shining o'er him, half unseal'd his sight:
 "What blest immortal, with commanding breath,
 Thus wakens Hector from the sleep of death?
 His name not told, how, while my trusty sword
 Bred'd Greece in slaughter, and her battle gor'd,
 The mighty Ajax with a deadly blow
 Had almost sunk me to the shades below?
 But yet, methinks, the gliding ghosts I spy,
 And Hell's black horrors swim before my eye."
 To him Apollo: "Be no more dismay'd;
 Be, and be strong! the thunderer sends thee aid.
 Behold! thy Phœbus shall his arms employ,
 Phœbus, propitious still to thee, and Troy.
 Prepare thy warriors then with manly force,
 And to the ships impel thy rapid horse:
 But I will make thy fiery coursers way,
 And drive the Grecians headlong to the sea."
 Thus to bold Hector spoke the son of Jove,
 And breath'd immortal ardour from above.
 As when the pamper'd steed, with reins unbound,
 Breaks from his stall, and pours along the ground;
 With ample strokes he rushes to the flood,
 To bathe his sides, and cool his fiery blood;

His head, now freed, he tosses to the skies;
 His main dishevel'd o'er his shoulders flies:
 He snuffs the females in the well-known plain,
 And springs, exulting, to his fields again:
 Urg'd by the voice divine, thus Hector flew,
 Full of the god; and all his hosts pursue:
 As when the force of men and dogs combin'd
 Invade the mountain-goat, or branching hind;
 Far from the hunter's rage secure they lie
 Close in the rock (not fated yet to die);
 When lo! a lion shoots across the way!
 They fly: at once the chasers and the prey.
 So Greece, that late in conquering troops pursued,
 And mark'd their progress thro' the ranks in blood,
 Soon as they see the furious chief appear,
 Forget to vanquish, and consent to fear.
 Thous with grief observ'd his dreadful course,
 Thous, the bravest of th' Ætolian force:
 Skill'd to direct the javelin's distant flight,
 And bold to combat in the standing fight;
 Nor more in councils fam'd for solid sense,
 Than winning words and heavenly eloquence.
 "Gods! what portent," he cry'd, "these eyes
 Invades?"
 Lo! Hector rises from the Stygian shades!
 We saw him, late, by thundering Ajax kill'd:
 What god restores him to the frighted field;
 And, not content that half of Greece lie slain,
 Pours new destruction on her sons again?
 He comes not, Jove! without thy powerful will;
 Lo! still he lives, pursues, and conquers still!
 Yet hear my counsel, and his worst withstand;
 The Greeks' main body to the fleet command;
 But let the few, whom brisker spirits warm,
 Stand the first onset, and provoke the storm:
 Thus point your arms; and when such foes appear,
 Fierce as he is, let Hector learn to fear."
 The warrior spoke, the listening Greeks obey,
 Thickening their ranks, and form a deep array.
 Each Ajax, Teucer, Merion, gave command;
 The valiant leader of the Cretan band,
 And Mars-like Meges: these the chiefs excite;
 Approach the foe, and meet the coming fight.
 Behind, unnumber'd multitudes attend,
 To flank the navy, and the shores defend.
 Full on the front the pressing Trojans bear,
 And Hector first came towering to the war:
 Phœbus himself the rushing battle led;
 A veil of clouds involv'd his radiant head:
 High-held before him, Jove's enormous shield
 Portentous shone, and shaded all the field;
 Vulcan to Jove th' immortal gift consign'd,
 To scatter hosts, and terrify mankind.
 The Greeks expect the shock, the clamours rise
 From different parts, and mingle in the skies.
 Dire was the hiss of darts, by heroes stung,
 And arrows leaping from the bow-string sung;
 These drink the life of generous warriors slain;
 Those guiltless fall, and thirst for blood in vain.
 As long as Phœbus bore unmov'd the shield,
 Sat doubtful Conquest hovering o'er the field;
 But when aloft he shakes it in the skies,
 Shouts in their ears, and lightens in their eyes,
 Deep horror seizes every Grecian breast,
 Their force is humbled, and their fear confess.
 So flies a herd of oxen, scatter'd wide,
 No swain to guard them, and no day to guide,
 When two fell lions from the mountain come,
 And spread the carnage through the shady gloom.

Impending Phœbus pours around them fear,
 And Troy and Hector thunder in the rear.
 Heaps fall on heaps: the slaughter Hector leads;
 First great Arcesias, then Stichius, bleeds;
 One to the bold Boeotians ever dear,
 And one Menestheus' friend, and sam'd compeer.
 Medon and Iásus, Æneas sped;
 This sprung from Phelus, and th' Athenians led;
 But hapless Medon from Oileus came;
 Him Ajax honour'd with a brother's name,
 Though born of lawless love: from home expell'd,
 A banish'd man, in Phylacè he dwell'd,
 Press'd by the vengeance of an angry wife;
 Troy ends, at last, his labours and his life.
 Mecystes next, Polydamas o'erthrew;
 And thee, brave Clonius, great Agenor slew.
 By Paris, Deiochus inglorious dies,
 Pierc'd through the shoulder as he basely flies.
 Polites' arm laid Eolius on the plain;
 Stretch'd on one heap, the victors spoil the slain.
 The Greeks dismay'd, confus'd, disperse or fall,
 Some seek the trench, some skulk behind the wall.
 While these fly trembling, others pauze for breath,
 And o'er the slaughter stalks gigantic Death.
 On rush'd bold Hector, gloomy as the night;
 Forbids to plunder, animates the fight,
 Points to the fleet: "For, by the gods, who flies,
 Who dares but linger, by this hand he dies!
 No weeping sister his cold eye shall close,
 No friendly hand his funeral pyre compose.
 Who stops to plunder at this signal hour,
 The birds shall tear him, and the dogs devour."

Furious he said; the smarting scourge resounds;
 The conersers fly; the smoking chariot bounds:
 The hosts rush on; loud clamours shake the shore;
 The horses thunder, Earth and Ocean roar!
 Apollo, planted at the trench's bound,
 Push'd at the bank: down sunk th' enormous
 Roll'd in the ditch the heavy ruin lay; [mound:
 A sudden road! a fong and ample way.
 O'er the dread fosse (a late-imperious space)
 Now steeds, and men, and cars, tumultuous pass.
 The wondering crowds the downward level trod;
 Before them flam'd the shield, and march'd the god.
 Then with his hand he shook the mighty wall;
 And lo! the turrets nod, the bulwarks fall.
 Easy, as when ashore the infant stands,
 And draws imagin'd houses in the sands;
 The sportive wanton, pleas'd with some new play,
 Sweeps the slight works and fashion'd domes away.
 Thus vanish'd, at thy touch, the towers and walls;
 The toil of thousands in a moment falls.

The Grecians gaze around with wild despair,
 Confus'd, and weary all the powers with prayer;
 Exhort their men with praises, threats, commands;
 And urge the gods, with voices, eyes, and hands.
 Experienc'd Nestor chief obtasts the skies,
 And weeps his country with a father's eyes:

"O Jove! if ever, on his native shore,
 One Greek enrich'd thy shrine with offer'd gore;
 If e'er, in hope our country to behold,
 We paid the fattest firstlings of the fold;
 If e'er thou sign'st our wishes with thy nod;
 Perform the promise of a gracious god!
 This day, preserve our navies from the flame,
 And save the reliques of the Grecian name."

Thus pray'd the sage: th' eternal gave consent,
 And peals of thunder shook the firmament:
 Presumptuous Troy mistook th' accepting sign,
 And catch'd new fury at the voice divine.

As, when black tempests mix the seas and skies,
 The roaring deeps in watery mountains rise,
 Above the sides of some tall ship ascend,
 Its womb they deluge, and its ribs they rend:
 Thus loudly roaring, and o'erpowering all,
 Mount the thick Trojans up the Grecian wall;
 Legions on legions from each side arise:
 Thick sound the keels; the storm of arrows flies,
 Fierce on the ships above, the cars below.
 These wield the mace, and those the javelin throw.

While thus the thunder of the battle rag'd,
 And labouring armies round the works engag'd;
 Still in the tent Patroclus sat, to tend
 The good Eurypylius, his wounded friend.
 He sprinkles healing balms to anguish kind,
 And adds discourse, the medicine of the mind.
 But when he saw, ascending up the fleet,
 Victorious Troy; then, starting from his seat,
 With bitter groans his sorrows he exprest,
 He wrings his hands, he beats his manly breast.
 "Though yet thy state requires redress," (he cries)
 "Depart I must: what horrors strike my eyes!
 Charg'd with Achilles' high commands I go,
 A mournful witness of this scene of woe:
 I haste to urge him, by his country's care,
 To rise in arms, and shine again in war.
 Perhaps some favouring god his soul may bend;
 The voice is powerful of a faithful friend."

He spoke; and speaking, swifter than the wind
 Sprung from the tent, and left the ward behind.
 Th' embod'd Greeks the fierce attack sustain,
 But strive, though numerous, to repulse in vain!
 Nor could the Trojans, through that firm array,
 Force to the fleet and tents th' imperious way.
 As when a shipwright, with Palladian art,
 Smooths the rough wood, and levels every part;
 With equal hand he guides his whole design,
 By the just rule, and the directing line:

The martial leaders, with like skill and care,
 Preserv'd their line, and equal kept the war.
 Brave deeds of arms through all the ranks were
 And every ship sustain'd an equal tide. [tried,
 At one proud bark, high-towering o'er the fleet,
 Ajax the great and godlike Hector meet;
 For one bright prize the matchless chiefs contend;
 Nor this the ships can fire, nor that defend;
 One kept the shore, and one the vessel trod;
 That fix'd as fate, this acted by a god.
 The son of Clytius in his daring hand,
 The deck approaching, shakes a flaming brand;
 But pierc'd by Telamon's huge lance expires;
 Thundering he falls, and drops th' extinguish'd fire.
 Great Hector view'd him with a sad survey,
 As stretch'd in dust before the stern he lay.
 "Oh! all of Trojan, all of Lycian race!
 Stand to your arms, maintain this arduous space:
 Lo! where the son of royal Clytius lies;
 Ah, save his arms, secure his obsequies!"

This said, his eager javelin sought the foe:
 But Ajax shunn'd the meditated blow.
 Not vainly yet the forceful lance was thrown;
 It stretch'd in dust unhappy Lycophron:
 An exile long, sustain'd at Ajax' board,
 A faithful servant to a foreign lord;
 In peace, in war, for ever at his side,
 Near his lov'd master, as he liv'd, he dy'd.
 From the high poop he tumbles on the sand,
 And lies a lifeless load along the land.
 With anguish Ajax views the piercing sight,
 And thus inflames his brother to the fight:

"Teucer, behold!—extended on the shore
Our friend, our lov'd companion! now no more!
Dear as a parent, with a parent's care,
To fight our wars, he left his native air.
This death deplor'd, to Hector's rage we owe;
Revenge, revenge it on the cruel foe.
Where are those darts on which the fates attend?
And where the bow, which Phoebus taught to bend?"

Impatient Teucer, hastening to his aid,
Before the chief his ample bow display'd;
The well-stor'd quiver on his shoulders hung:
Then his'd his arrow, and the bow-string sung.
Cytus, Pisenor's son, renown'd in fame
(To thee, Polydamas! an honour'd name)
Rave through the thickest of th' embattled plains
The starting steeds, and shook his eager reins.

As all on glory ran his ardent mind,
The pointed death arrests him from behind.
Through his fair neck the thrilling arrow flies;
In youth's first bloom reluctantly he dies.
Hurl'd from the lofty seat, at distance far,
The headlong coursers spurn his empty car;
Till sad Polydamas the steeds restrain'd,
And gave, Astynous, to thy careful hand;
Then, fir'd to vengeance, rush'd amidst the foe;
Rage edg'd his sword, and strengthen'd every blow.

Once more bold Teucer, in his country's cause,
At Hector's breast a chosen arrow draws;
And had the weapon found the destin'd way,
Thy fall, great Trojan! had renown'd that day.
But Hector was not doom'd to perish then:
Th' all-wise disposer of the fates of men
(Imperial Jove) his present death withstands;
Nor was such glory due to Teucer's hands.

At its full stretch as the tough string he drew,
Struck by an arm unseen, it burst in two;
Down dropp'd the bow: the shaft with brazen head
Fell innocent, and on the dust lay dead.
Th' astonish'd archer to great Ajax cries,
"Some god prevents our destin'd enterprise;
Some god, propitious to the Trojan foe,
Has, from my arm unfailing, struck the bow,
And broke the nerve my hands had twin'd with art,
Strong to impel the flight of many a dart."

"Since Heaven commands it," (Ajax made reply)
Dismiss the bow, and lay thy arrows by,
(Thy arms no less suffice the lance to wield)
And quit the quiver for the ponderous shield;
In the first ranks indulge thy thirst of fame,
Thy brave example shall the rest inflame.
Fierce as they are, by long successes vain,
To force our fleet, or ev'n a ship to gain,

Shalt toil, and sweat, and blood: thy utmost might Shall find its match—no more: 'tis ours to fight."
Then Teucer laid his faithless bow aside;
The four-fold buckler o'er his shoulders ty'd;
On his brave head a crested helm he plac'd,
With nodding horse-hair formidably grac'd;
A dart, whose point with brass refulgent shines,
The warrior wields: and his great brother joins.

This Hector saw, and thus express'd his joy:
"Ye troops of Lycia, Dardanus, and Troy!
Be mindful of yourselves, your ancient fame,
And spread your glory with the navy's flame.
Jove is with us; I saw his hand, but now,
From the proud archer strike his vaunted bow.
Indulgent Jove! how plain thy favours shine,
When happy nations bear the marks divine!

How easy then, to see the sinking state
Of realms accurst, deserted, reprobate!

Such is the fate of Greece; and such is ours.
Behold, ye warriors, and exert your powers.
Death is the worst; a fate which all must try;
And, for our country, 'tis a bliss to die.
The gallant man, though slain in fight he be,
Yet leaves his nation safe, his children free;
Entails a debt on all the grateful state;
His own brave friends shall glory in his fate;
His wife live honour'd, all his race succeed;
And late posterity enjoy the deed!"

This rous'd the soul in every Trojan breast.
The godlike Ajax next his Greeks address:
"How long, ye warriors of the Argive race,
(To generous Argos what a dire disgrace!)
How long, on these curs'd confines will ye lie,
Yet undetermin'd, or to live, or die!

What hopes remain, what methods to retire,
If once your vessels catch the Trojan fire?
Mark how the flames approach, how near they fall,
How Hector calls, and Troy obeys his call!
Not to the dance that dreadful voice invites,
It calls to death, and all the rage of fights.
'Tis now no time for wisdom or debates;
To your own hands are trusted all your fates;
And better far, in one decisive strife,
One day should end our labour, or our life;
Than keep this hard-got inch of barren sands,
Still press'd, and press'd by such inglorious hands."

The listening Grecians feel their leader's flame,
And every kindling bosom pants for fame.
Then mutual slaughters spread on either side;
By Hector here the Phocian Schedius dy'd;
There, pierc'd by Ajax, sunk Laodamas,
Chief of the foot, of old Aeneas' race.
Polydamas laid Otus on the sand,
The fierce commander of the Epian band,
His lance bold Meges at the victor threw;

The victor, stooping, from the death withdrew,
(That valued life, O Phoebus, was thy care);
But Cressmus' bosom took the flying spear:
His corpse fell bleeding on the slippery shore;
His radiant arms triumphant Meges bore.
Dolops, the son of Lampus, rushes on,
Sprung from the race of old Laomedon,
And fam'd for prowess in a well-fought field;

He pierc'd the centre of his sounding shield;
But Meges Phyleus' ample breast-plate wore
(Well-known in fight on Selle's winding shore;
For king Euphetes gave the golden mail,
Compact, and firm with many a jointed scale);
Which oft, in cities storm'd, and battles won,
Had sav'd the father, and now saves the son.

Full at the Trojan's head he urg'd his lance,
Where the high plumes above the helmet dance,
New ting'd with Tyrian dye: in dust below,
Shorn from the crest, the purple honours glow.
Meantime their fight the Spartan king survey'd,
And stood by Meges' side, a sudden aid,
Through Dolops' shoulder urg'd his forceful dart,
Which held its passage through the panting heart,
And issued at his breast. With thundering sound
The warrior falls, extended on the ground.

In rush the conquering Greeks to spoil the slain:
But Hector's voice excites his kindred train;
The hero most, from Hicetion sprung,
Fierce Melanippus, gallant, brave, and young.
He (ere to Troy the Grecians cross'd the main)
Fed his large oxen on Percote's plain;
But when, oppress'd, his country claim'd his care,
Return'd to Ilium, and excell'd in war;

For this, in Priam's court, he held his place,
 Below'd no less than Priam's royal race.
 Him Hector singled, as his troops he led;
 And thus inflam'd him, pointing to the dead:
 "Lo, Melanippus! lo where Dolops lies;
 And is it thus our royal kinsman dies;
 O'ermatch'd he falls; to two at once a prey,
 And lo! they bear the bloody arms away!
 Come on—a distant war no longer wage,
 But hand to hand thy country's foes engage:
 Till Greece at once, and all her glory end;
 Or Ilium from her towery height descend,
 Heav'd from the lowest stone; and bury all
 In one sad sepulchre, one common fall."

Hector (this said) rush'd forward on the foes:
 With equal ardour Melanippus glows:
 Then Ajax thus—"Oh Greeks! respect your fame,
 Respect yourselves, and learn an honest shame:
 Let mutual reverence mutual warmth inspire,
 And catch from breast to breast the noble fire.
 On valour's side the odds of combat lie,
 The brave live glorious, or lamented die;
 The wretch that trembles in the field of fame,
 Meets death, and worse than death, eternal shame."

His generous sense he not in vain imparts!
 It sunk, and rooted in the Grecian hearts;
 They join, they throng, they thicken at his call,
 And flank the navy with a brazen wall;
 Shields touching shields, in order blaze above,
 And stop the Trojans, though impell'd by Jove.
 The fiery Spartan first, with loud applause,
 Warms the bold son of Nestor in his cause:
 "Is there," (he said) "in arms a youth like you,
 So strong to fight, so active to pursue?
 Why stand you distant, nor attempt a deed?
 Lift the bold lance, and make some Trojan bleed."

He said; and backward to the lines retir'd;
 Forth rush'd the youth, with martial fury fir'd,
 Beyond the foremost ranks; his lance he threw,
 And round the black battalions cast his view.
 The troops of Troy recede with sudden fear,
 While the swift javelin hiss'd along in air.
 Advancing Melanippus met the dart
 With his bold breast, and felt it in his heart:
 Thundering he falls; his falling arms resound,
 And his broad buckler rings against the ground.
 The victor leaps upon his prostrate prize:
 Thus on a roe the well-breath'd beagle flies,
 And rends his side, fresh-bleeding with the dart
 The distant hunter sent into his heart.
 Observing Hector to the rescue flew;
 Bold as he was, Antiochus withdrew.
 So when a savage, ranging o'er the plain,
 Has torn the shepherd's dog, or shepherd swain;
 While, conscious of the deed, he glares around,
 And hears the gathering multitude resound,
 Timely he flies the yet-untasted food,
 And gains the friendly shelter of the wood.
 So fears the youth; all Troy with shouts pursue,
 While stones and darts in mingled tempests flew;
 But, enter'd in the Grecian ranks, he turns
 His manly breast, and with new fury burns.

Now on the fleet the tides of Trojans drove,
 Fierce to fulfil the stern decrees of Jove:
 The sire of gods, confirming Thetis' prayer,
 The Grecian ardour quench'd in deep despair;
 But lifts to glory Troy's prevailing bands,
 Swells all their hearts, and strengthens all their
 On Ida's top he waits with longing eyes, [hands.
 To view the navy blazing to the skies;

Then, nor till then, the scale of war shall turn,
 The Trojans fly, and conquer'd Ilium burn.
 These fates revolv'd in his almighty mind,
 He raises Hector to the work design'd,
 Bids him with more than mortal fury glow,
 And drives him, like a lightning, on the foe.
 So Mars, when human crimes for vengeance call,
 Shakes his huge javelin, and whole armies fall.
 Not with more rage a conflagration rolls,
 Wraps the vast mountains, and involves the poles,
 He foams with wrath; beneath his gloomy brow
 Like fiery meteors his red eye-balls glow:
 The radiant helmet on his temples burns,
 Waves when he nods, and lightens as he turns:
 For Jove his splendour round the chief had thrown,
 And cast the blaze of both the hosts on one.
 Unhappy glories! for his fate was near,
 Due to stern Pallas, and Pelides' spear:
 Yet Jove deferr'd the death he was to pay,
 And gave what fate allow'd, the honours of a day!

Now all on fire for fame his breast, his eyes
 Burn at each foe, and single every prize;
 Still at the closest ranks, the thickest fight,
 He points his ardour, and exerts his might.
 The Grecian phalanx moveless as a tower
 On all sides batter'd, yet resists his power:
 So some tall rock o'erhangs the hoary main,
 By winds assail'd, by billows beat in vain;
 Unmov'd it hears, above, the tempest blow,
 And sees the watery mountains break below.
 Girt in surrounding flames, he seems to fall,
 Like fire from Jove, and bursts upon them all:
 Bursts as a wave that from the clouds impends,
 And swell'd with tempests on the ship descends;
 White are the decks with foam; the winds aloud
 Howl o'er the masts, and sing through every shroud
 Pale, trembling, tir'd, the sailors freeze with fears;
 And instant death on every wave appears.
 So pale the Greeks the eyes of Hector meet,
 The chief so thunders, and so shakes the fleet.

As when a lion rushing from his den,
 Amidst the plain of some wide-water'd fen
 (Where numerous oxen, as at ease they feed,
 At large expatiate o'er the ranker mead;)
 Leaps on the herds before the herdsman's eyes:
 The trembling herdsman far to distance flies:
 Some lordly bull (the rest dispers'd and fled)
 He singles out; arrests, and lays him dead.
 Thus from the rage of Jove-like Hector flew
 All Greece in heaps; but one he seiz'd, and slow
 Mycenaean Periphes, a mighty name,
 In wisdom great, in arms well known to fame;
 The minister of stern Eurystheus' ire,
 Against Alcides, Corpreus was his sire:
 The son redeem'd the honours of the race,
 A son as generous as the sire was base;
 O'er all his country's youth conspicuous far
 In every virtue, or of peace or war:
 But doom'd to Hector's stronger force to yield!
 Against the margin of his ample shield
 He struck his hasty foot: his heels up-sprung;
 Supine he fell; his brazen helmet rung.
 On the fall'n chief th' invading Trojan prest,
 And plung'd the pointed javelin in his breast.
 His circling friends, who strove to guard too late
 Th' unhappy hero, fled, or shar'd his fate.

Chas'd from the foremost line, the Grecian train
 Now man the next, receding tow'rd the main:
 Wedg'd in one body at the tents they stand,
 Wall'd round with sterns, a gloomy desperate band.

Now manly shame forbids th' inglorious flight ;
 Now fear itself confines them to the fight ;
 Man courage breathes in man ; but Nestor most
 (The sage preserver of the Grecian host)
 Exhorts, adjures, to guard these utmost shores ;
 And by their parents, by themselves, implores.
 " O friends ! be men : your generous breasts inflame

With equal honour, and with mutual shame ?
 Think of your hopes, your fortunes ; all the care
 Your wives, your infants, and your parents, share :
 Think of each living father's reverend head :
 Think of each ancestor with glory dead ;
 Absent, by me they speak, by me they sue ;
 They ask their safety, and their fame, from you :
 The gods their fates on this one action lay,
 And all are lost, if you desert the day."

He spoke, and round him breath'd heroic fires ;
 Minerva seconds what the sage inspires.

The mist of darkness Jove around them threw
 She clear'd, restoring all the war to view ;
 A sudden ray shot beaming o'er the plain,
 And show'd the shores, the navy, and the main :
 Hector they saw, and all who fly, or fight,
 The scene wide-opening to the blaze of light.

First of the field great Ajax strikes their eyes,
 His port majestic, and his ample size :

A ponderous mace with studs of iron crown'd,
 Full twenty cubits long, he swings around ;
 Nor fights, like others, fixt to certain stands,
 But hocks a moving tower above the bands ;
 High on the decks, with vast gigantic stride,
 The godlike hero stalks from side to side.

So when a horseman from the watery mead
 (Skill'd in the manage of the bounding steed)

Drives four fair coursers, practis'd to obey,
 To some great city through the public way ;
 Safe in his art, as side by side they run,
 He shifts his seat, and vaults from one to one ;
 And now to this, and now to that he flies ;
 Admiring numbers follow with their eyes.

From ship to ship thus Ajax swiftly flew,
 No less the wonder of the warring crew,
 As furious Hector thunder'd threats aloud,
 And rush'd eurag'd before the Trojan crowd :

Then swift invades the ships, whose beaky prores
 Lay rank'd contiguous on the bending shores :

So the strong eagle from his airy height,
 Who marks the swans' or cranes' embody'd flight,
 stoops down impetuous, while they light for food,
 And, stooping, darkens with his wings the flood.

Jove leads him on with his almighty hand,
 And breathes fierce spirits in his following band.

The warring nations meet, the battle roars,
 Thick beats the combat on the sounding prores,
 Thou wouldest have thought, so furious was their fire,

No force could tame them, and no toil could tire ;
 As if new vigour from new fights they won,

And the long battle was but then begun,
 Greece yet unconquer'd, kept alive the war,

Secure of death, confiding in despair ;
 Troy in proud hopes, already view'd the main

Bright with the blaze, and red with heroes slain !
 Like strength is felt from hope and from despair,

And each contends, as his were all the war.
 'Twas thou, bold Hector ! whose resistless hand

First seiz'd a ship on that contested strand ;
 The same which dead Protesilaüs bore,

The first that touch'd th' unhappy Trojan shore :

For this in arms the warring nations stood,
 And bath'd their generous breasts with mutual blood.

No room to poise the lance or bend the bow ;
 But hand to hand, and man to man, they grow :
 Wounded they wound ; and seek each other's hearts
 With falchions, axes, swords, and shorten'd carts.
 The falchions ring, shields rattle, axes sound,
 Swords flash in air, or glitter on the ground ;
 With streaming blood the slippery shores are dy'd,
 And slaughter'd heroes swell the dreadful tide.

Still raging Hector with his ample hand
 Grasps the high stern, and gives this loud command :

" Haste, bring the flames ! the toil of ten long
 Is finish'd ! and the day desir'd appears ! [years
 This happy day with acclamations greet,
 Bright with destruction of yon hostile fleet.
 The coward counsels of a timorous throng
 Of reverend dotards, check'd our glory long :
 Too long Jove lull'd us with lethargic charms,
 But now in peals of thunder calls to arms :
 In this great day he crowns our full desires,
 Wakes all our force, and seconds all our fires."

He spoke—the warriors, at his fierce command,
 Pour a new deluge on the Grecian band.

Ev'n Ajax paus'd (so thick the javelins fly)
 Stepp'd back, and doubted or to live, or die.

Yet where the oars are plac'd, he stands to wait
 What chief approaching dares attempt his fate :

Ev'n to the last, his naval charge defends,
 Now shakes his spear, now lifts, and in now pretends ;

Ev'n yet, the Greeks with piercing shouts inspires,
 Amidst attacks, and deaths, and darts, and fires.

" O friends ! O heroes ! names for ever dear,
 Once sons of Mars, and thunderbolts of war !

Ah ! yet be mindful of your old renown,
 Your great forefathers' virtues and your own.

What aids expect you in this utmost strait ?
 What bulwarks rising between you and fate ?

No aids, no bulwarks, your retreat attend ;
 No friends to help, no city to defend.

This spot is all you have, to lose or keep ;
 There stand the Trojans, and here rolls the deep.

'Tis hostile ground you tread ; your native lands
 Far, far from hence : your fates are in your hands."

Raging he spoke ; nor farther wastes his breath,
 But turns his javelin to the work of death.

Whate'er bold Trojan arm'd his daring hands,
 Against the sable ships, with flaming brands,

So well the chief his naval weapon sped,
 The luckless warrior at his stern lay dead ;

Full twelve, the boldest, in a moment fell,
 Sent by great Ajax to the shades of Hell.

 THE ILIAD.

 BOOK XVI.

ARGUMENT.

 THE SIXTH BATTLE : THE ACTS AND DEATH OF PATROCLUS.

PATROCLUS (in pursuance of the request of Nestor in the eleventh book) entreats Achilles to suffer him to go to the assistance of the Greeks with

Achilles' troops and armour. He agrees to it; but at the same time charges him to content himself with rescuing the fleet, without farther pursuit of the enemy. The armour, horses, soldiers, and officers of Achilles are described. Achilles offers a libation for the success of his friend, after which Patroclus leads the Myrmidons to battle. The Trojans, at the sight of Patroclus in Achilles's armour, taking him for that hero, are cast into the utmost consternation: he beats them off from the vessels. Hector himself flies. Sarpedon is killed, though Jupiter was averse to his fate. Several other particulars of the battle are described; in the heat of which, Patroclus, neglecting the orders of Achilles, pursues the foe to the walls of Troy; where Apollo repulses and disarms him, Euphorbus wounds him, and Hector kills him: which concludes the book.

SO warr'd both armies on th' ensanguin'd shore,
While the black vessels smok'd with human gore.
Mèantime Patroclus to Achilles flies;
The streaming tears fall copious from his eyes;
Not faster trickling to the plains below,
From the tall rock the sable waters flow.
Divine Pelides, with compassion mov'd,
Thus spoke, indulgent to his best-belov'd:

"Patroclus, say, what grief thy bosom bears,
That flows so fast in these unmanly tears?
No girl, no infant, whom the mother keeps
From her lov'd breast, with fonder passion weeps;
Not more the mother's soul that infant warns,
Clung to her knees, and reaching at her arms,
Than thou hast mine! Oh tell me, to what end
Thy melting sorrows thus pursue thy friend?

"Grieve'st thou for me, or for my martial band?
Or come sad tidings from our native land?
Our fathers live (our first, most tender care)
Thy good Menœtius breathes the vital air,
And hoary Peleus yet extends his days;
Pleas'd in their age to hear their children's praise.

"Or may some meaner cause thy pity claim!
Perhaps yon reliques of the Grecian name,
Doom'd in their ships to sink by fire and sword,
And pay the forfeit of their haughty lord?
Whate'er the cause, reveal thy secret care,
And speak those sorrows which a friend would share."

A sigh, that instant, from his bosom broke,
Another follow'd, and Patroclus spoke:

"Let Greece at length with pity touch thy breast,
Thyself a Greek, and, once, of Greeks the best!
Lo! every chief that might her fate prevent,
Lies pierc'd with wounds, and bleeding in his tent.
Furypylus, Tydides, Atreus' son
And wise Ulysses, at the navy groan,
More for their country's wounds than for their own.
Their pain, soft arts of pharmacy can ease,
Thy breast alone no lénitives appease.

"May never rage like thine my soul enslave,
O great in vain! unprofitably brave!
Thy country slighted in her last distress,
What friend, what man, from thee shall hopes redress?

No—men unborn, and ages yet behind,
Shall curse that fierce, that unforgiving mind.

"O man un pitying! if of man thy race;
But sure thou spring'st not from a soft embrace,

Nor ever amorous hero caus'd thy birth,
Nor ever tender goddess brought thee forth.
Some rugged rock's hard entrails gave thee form,
And raging seas produc'd thee in a storm,
A soul well suiting that tempestuous kind,
So rough thy manners, so untam'd thy mind.
If some dire oracle thy breast alarm,
If aught from Jove, or Thetis, stop thy arm,
Some beam of comfort yet on Greece may shine,
If I but lead the Myrmidonian line:
Clad in thy dreadful arms if I appear,
Proud Troy shall tremble, and desert the war:
Without thy person Greece shall win the day,
And thy mere image chase her foes away.
Press'd by fresh forces, her o'erlabour'd train
Shall quit the ships, and Greece respire again."

Thus, blind to fate! with supplicating breath,
Thou begg'st his arms, and in his arms thy death.
Unfortunately good! a boding sigh

Thy friend return'd; and with it, this reply:

"Patroclus! thy Achilles knows no fears;
Nor words from Jove, nor oracles, he hears;
Nor sought a mother's caution can suggest;
The tyrant's pride lies rooted in my breast.
My wrongs, my wrongs, my constant thought—
Those, my sole oracles, inspire my rage: [page
I made him tyrant: gave him power to wrong
Ev'n me: I felt it, and shall feel it long.

The maid, my black-ey'd maid, he forc'd away,
Due to the toils of many a well-fought day;
Due to my conquest of her father's reign;
Due to the votes of all the Grecian train.

From me he forc'd her; me, the bold and brave;
Disgrac'd, dishonour'd, like the meanest slave.
But bear we this—the wrongs I grieve are past;

'Tis time our fury should relent at last:
I fix'd its date; the day I wish'd appears:
Now Hector to my ships his battle bears,

The flames my eyes, the shouts invade my ears.
Go, then, Patroclus! court fair honour's charms
In Troy's fam'd fields, and in Achilles' arms:
Lead forth my martial Myrmidons to fight,
Go, save the fleets, and conquer in my right.
See the thim reliques of their baffled band,

At the last edge of yon deserted land!
Behold all Ilium on their ships descends;

How the cloud blackens, how the storm impends!
It was not thus, when, at my sight amaz'd,
Troy saw and trembled, as this helmet blaz'd:

Had not th' injurious king, our friendship lost,
Yon ample trench had bury'd half her host.

No camps, no bulwarks, now the Trojans fear;
Those are not dreadful, now Achilles there:

No longer flames the lance of Tydens' son;
No more your general calls his heroes on;

Hector alone I hear; his dreadful breath
Commands your slaughter, or proclaims your death.

Yet now, Patroclus, issue to the plain:
Now save the ships, the rising fires restrain,

And give the Greeks to visit Greece again.
But heed my words, and mark a friend's command,
Who trusts his fame and honours in thy hand,
And from thy deeds expects, th' Achaian host
Shall render back the beautiful maid he lost.

Rage uncontrol'd through all the hostile crew,
But touch not Hector, Hector is my due.

Though Jove in thunder should command the war;
Be just, consult my glory, and forbear:

The fleet once sav'd, desert from farther chase,
Nor lead to Ilium's walls the Grecian race;

Some adverse god thy rashness may destroy ;
Some god, like Phœbus, ever kind to Troy.
Let Greece, redeem'd from this destructive strait,
Do her own work ; and leave the rest to fate.
Oh ! would to all th' immortal powers above,
Apollo, Pallas, and almighty Jove,
That not one Trojan might be left alive,
And not a Greek of all the race survive ;
Might only we the vast destruction shun,
And only we destroy th' accursed town !¹² [strand

Such conference held the chiefs ! while on the Great Jove with conquest crown'd the Trojan band.
Ajax no more the sounding storm sustain'd,
So thick the darts : an iron tempest rain'd :
On his tir'd arm the weighty buckler hung ;
His hollow helm with falling javelins rung ; [goes ;
His breath, in quick, short pantings, comes and
And painful sweat from all his members flows.
Spent and o'erpower'd, he barely breathes at most ;
Yet scarce an army stirs him from his post :
Dangers on dangers all around him grow,
And toil to toil, and woe succeeds to woe.

Say, Muses, thron'd above the starry frame,
How first the navy blas'd with Trojan flame ?

Stern Hector wav'd his sword : and standing near Where furious Ajax ply'd his ashen spear,
Full on the lance a stroke so justly sped,
That the broad falchion lopp'd its brazen head :
His pointless spear the warrior shakes in vain ;
The brazen head falls sounding on the plain.
Great Ajax saw, and own'd the hand divine,
Casting Jove, and trembling at the sign ;
Wav'd, he retreats. Then swift from all sides pour
The hissing brands ; thick streams the fiery shower ;
O'er the high stern the curling volumes rise,
And sheets of rolling smoke involve the skies.

Divine Achilles view'd the rising flames,
And smote his thigh, and thus aloud exclaims :
" Arm, arm, Patroclus ! Lo, the blaze aspires !
The glowing ocean reddens with the fires.
Arm, ere our vessels catch the spreading flame ;
Arm, ere the Grecians be no more a name ;
I haste to bring the troops"—the hero said ;
The friend with ardour and with joy obey'd.

He cas'd his limbs in brass ; and first around
His manly legs with silver buckles bound
The clashing greaves ; and then to his breast applies
The fanny cuirass, of a thousand dyes :
Emblaz'd with studs of gold his falchion shone
In the rich belt, as in a starry zone :
Achilles' shield his ample shoulders spread,
Achilles' helmet nodded o'er his head :
Adorn'd in all his terrible array,
He flash'd around intolerable day.
Alone, untouch'd, Pelides' javelin stands,
Not to be pois'd but by Pelides' hands ;
From Pelion's shady brow the plant entire
Old Chiron rent, and sharp'd it for his sire ;
Whose son's great arm alone the weapon yields,
The death of heroes, and the dread of fields.

Then brave Antomedon (an honour'd name,
The second to his lord in love and fame,
In peace his friend, and partner of the war)
The winged couriers harness'd to the cart ;
Xanthus and Bœtus, of immortal breed,
Sprung from the wind, and like the wind in speed ;
Whom the wing'd harpy, swift Podarge, bore,
By Zephyr pregnant on the breezy shore :
Swift Pedarus was added to their side
(Once great Atreus', now Achilles' pride)

Who, like in strength, in swiftness, and in grace,
A mortal courser, match'd th' immortal race.

Achilles speeds from tent to tent, and warns
His hardy Myrmidons to blood and arms.
All breathing death, around their chief they stand,
A grim terrific formidable band :
Grim as voracious wolves, that seek the springs ;
When scalding thirst their burning bowels wrings ;
When some tall stag, fresh-slaughter'd in the wood, [blood,

Has drench'd their wide insatiate throats with
To the black fount they rush, a hideous throng,
With paunch distended, and with lolling tongue,
Fire fills their eyes, their black jaws belch the gore,
And, gorg'd with slaughter, still they thirst for more.

Like furious rash'd the Myrmidonian crew,
Such their dread strength, and such their deathful
view.

High in the midst the great Achilles stands,
Directs their order, and the war commands.
He, lov'd of Jove, had lanch'd from Iliot's shores
Full fifty vessels, mann'd with fifty oars :
Five chosen leaders the fierce bands obey,
Himself supreme in valour, as in sway.

First march'd Menestheus, of celestial birth,
Deriv'd from thee, whose waters wash the earth,
Divine Spirchius ! Jove-descending flood !
A mortal mother mixing with a god.
Such was Menestheus, but miscall'd by fame
The son of Borus, that espous'd the dame.

Eudorus next ; whom Polymele the gay,
Fam'd in the graceful dance, produc'd to day.
Her, sly Cyllemius lov'd, on her would gaze,
As with swift step she form'd the running maze :
To her high chamber, from Diana's quire,
The god pursu'd her, arg'd, and crown'd his fire.
The son confess'd his father's heavenly race,
And heir'd his mother's swiftness in the chase.
Strong Echeclæus, blest in all those charms
That pleas'd a god, succeeded to her arms ;
Not conscious of those loves, long hid from fame,
With gifts of price he sought and won the dame ;
Her secret offspring to her sire she bare ;
Her sire caress'd him with a parent's care.

Pisander follow'd ; matchless in his art
To wing the spear, or aim the distant dart ;
No hand so sure of all th' Emathian line,
Or if a surer, great Patroclus ! thine.
The fourth by Phœnix' grave command was grac'd ;
Laërtes valiant offspring led the last.

Soon as Achilles with superior care
Had call'd the chiefs, and order'd all the war,
This stern remembrance to his troops he gave :
" Ye far-fam'd Myrmidons, ye fierce and brave !
Think with what threats ye dar'd the Trojan throng,
Think what reproach these ears endur'd so long,
' Stern son of Pelus !' (thus ye us'd to say, While restless, raging, in your ships you lay)
' Oh nurs'd with gall, unknowing how to yield ;
Whose rage defrauds us of so fam'd a field ;
If that dire fury must for ever burn,
What make we here ? Return, ye chiefs, return !'
Such were your words—Now, warriors, grove no
more.

Lo there the Trojans ! bathe your swords in gore !
This day shall give you all your soul demands ;
Glut all your hearts ! and weary all your bands !
Thus while he rous'd the fire in every breast,
Close, and more close, the listening cohorts press

Ranks wedg'd in ranks; of arms a steely ring
Still grows, and spreads, and thickens round the
As when a circling wall the builder forms, [king.
Of strength defensive against wind and storms,
Compacted stones the thickening work compose,
And round him wide the rising structure grows:
So helm to helm, and crest to crest they throng,
Shield urg'd on shield, and man drove man along;
Thick; undistinguish'd plumes, together join'd,
Float in one sea, and wave before the wind.

Far o'er the rest, in glittering pomp appear,
There bold Automædon, Patroclus here;
Brothers in arms, with equal fury fir'd;
Two friends, two bodies with one soul inspir'd.

But, mindful of the gods, Achilles went
To the rich coffer in his shady tent:
There lay on heaps his various garments roll'd,
And costly furs, and carpets stiff with gold
(The presents of the silver-footed dame).
From thence he took a bowl, of antique frame,
Which never man had stain'd with ruddy wine,
Nor rais'd in offerings to the powers divine,
But Peleus' son; and Peleus' son to none
Had rais'd in offerings, but to Jove alone.
This ting'd with sulphur, sacred first to flame,
He purg'd; and wash'd it in the running stream.
Then cleans'd his hands; and, fixing for a space
His eyes on Heaven, his feet upon the place
Of sacrifice, the purple draught he pour'd
Forth in the midst; and thus the god implor'd:

"O thou Supreme! high thrond all height above!
Oh great Pelasgic, Dodonæan Jove!

Who, 'midst surrounding frosts, and vapours chill,
Presid'st on bleak Dodona's vocal hill;
(Whose groves, the Selli, race austere! surround,
Their feet unwash'd, their slumbers on the ground;
Who hear, from rustling oaks, thy dark decrees;
And catch the fates, low-whisper'd in the breeze:)
Hear, as of old! thou gav'st, at Thetis' prayer,
Glory to me, and to the Greeks despair.

Lo, to the dangers of the fighting field
The best, the dearest of my friends, I yield;
Though still determin'd, to my ships confin'd;
Patroclus gone, I stay but half behind.

Oh! be his guard thy providential care,
Confirm his heart, and string his arm to war:
Press'd by his single force, let Hector see
His fame in arms not owing all to me.

But when the fleets are sav'd from foes and fire,
Let him with conquest and renown retire;
Preserve his arms, preserve his social train,
And safe return him to those eyes again."

Great Jove consents to half the chief's request,
But Heaven's eternal doom denies the rest;
To free the fleet, was granted to his prayer;
His safe return, the winds dispers'd in air.
Back to his tent the stern Achilles flies,
And waits the combat with impatient eyes.

Meanwhile the troops beneath Patroclus' care
Invade the Trojans, and commence the war.
As wasps, provok'd by children in their play,
Pour from their mansions by the broad highway,
In swarms the guiltless traveller engage,
Whet all their stings, and call forth all their rage:
All rise in arms, and with a general cry
Assert their waxen domes, and buzzing progeny.
Thus from the tents the fervent legion swarms,
So loud their clamour, and so keen their arms;
Their rising rage Patroclus' breath inspires,
Who thus inflames them with heroic fires:

"Oh warriors, partners of Achilles' praise!
Be mindful of your deeds in ancient days:
Your godlike master let your acts proclaim,
And add new glories to his mighty name.

Think, your Achilles sees you fight: be brave,
And humble the proud monarch whom you save."

Joyful they heard, and kindling as he spoke,
Flew to the fleet, involv'd in fire and smoke.
From shore to shore the doubling shouts resound,
The hollow ships return a deeper sound.
The war stood still, and all around them gaz'd,
When great Achilles' shining armour blaz'd:
Troy saw, and thought the dread Achilles nigh;
At once they see, they tremble, and they fly.

Then first thy spear, divine Patroclus! flew,
Where the war rag'd, and where the tumult grew,
Close to the stern of that fam'd ship which bore
Unblest Proteilaus to Ilium's shore,
The great Pæonian, bold Pyraechmes, stood
(Who led his bands from Axius' winding flood);
His shoulder-blade receives the fatal wound;
The groaning warrior pants upon the ground,
His troops that see their country's glory slain,
Fly diverse, scatter'd o'er the distant plain.

Patroclus' arm forbids the spreading fires,
And from the half-burn'd ship proud Troy retires:
Clear'd from the smoke the joyful navy lies:
In heaps on heaps the foe tumultuous flies;
Triumphphant Greece her reared decks ascends,
And loud acclaim the starry region rends.

So, when thick clouds unwrap the mountain's head,
O'er Heaven's expanselike one black cieling spread,
Sudden the thunderer, with a flashing ray,
Bursts through the darkness, and lets down the day:
The hills shine out, the rocks in prospect rise,
And streams, and vales, and forests, strike the eyes;
The smiling scene wide opens to the sight,
And all th' unmeasur'd ether flames with light.

But Troy repuls'd, and scatter'd o'er the plains,
Forc'd from the navy, yet the fight maintains.
Now every Greek some hostile hero slew,
But still the foremost bold Patroclus flew;
As Ariclycus had turn'd him round,
Sharp in his thigh he felt the piercing wound;
The brazen-pointed spear, with vigour thrown,
The thigh transfix'd, and broke the brittle bone;
Headlong he fell. Next, Thoas, was thy chance,
Thy breast, unarm'd, receiv'd the Spartan lance.
Phylides' dart (as Amphiclus drew nigh)
His blow prevented, and transpierc'd his thigh,
Tore all the brawn, and rent the nerves away;
In darkness and in death the warrior lay.

In equal arms two sons of Nestor stand,
And two bold brothers of the Lycian band:
By great Antiochus, Atymnius dies,
Pierc'd in the flank, lamented youth! he lies.
Kind Maris, bleeding in his brother's wound,
Defends the breathless carcase on the ground:
Furious he flies, his murderer to engage;
But godlike Thrasimed prevents his rage,
Between his arm and shoulder aims a blow;
His arm falls spouting on the dust below:
He sinks, with endless darkness cover'd o'er;
And vents his soul, effus'd with gushing gore.

Slain by two brothers, thus two brothers bleed,
Sarpedon's friends, Amisodar's seed;
Amisodarus, who, by furies led,
The bane of men, abhorr'd Chimeræ bred;
Skill'd in the dart in vain, his sons expire,
And pay the forfeit of their guilty air,

Stopp'd in the tumult, Cleobulus lies
Beneath Oileus' arm, a living prize;
A living prize not long the Trojan stood;
Fæthusty falchion drank his reeking blood:
Plung'd in his throat the smoking weapon lies;
Back death, and fate un pitying, seal his eyes.
Amid the ranks, with mutual thirst of fame,
Lycon the brave, and fierce Penelcus, came;
In vain their javelins at each other flew,
Now met in arms, their eager swords they drew.
On the plum'd crest of his Bœotian foe,
The daring Lycon aim'd a noble blow;
The sword broke short; but his, Penelcus sped
Fell on the juncture of the neck and head:
The head, divided by a stroke so just,
Hang by the skin: the body sunk to dust.
O'ertaken Neamas by Merion bleeds, [steeds;
Pierc'd through the shoulder as he mounts his
Back from the car he tumbles to the ground:
His swimming eyes eternal shades surround.
Next Erymas was doom'd his fate to feel,
His open'd mouth receiv'd the Cretan steel:
Beneath the brain the point a passage tore, [gore:
Crash'd the thin bones, and drown'd the teeth in
His mouth, his eyes, his nostrils, pour a flood;
He sobb his soul out in the gush of blood.
As when the flocks, neglected by the swain,
(Or kids, or lambs) lie scatter'd o'er the plain,
A troop of wolves th' unguarded charge survey,
And read the trembling, unresisting prey:
Thus on the foe the Greeks impetuous came;
Troy had, unmindful of her former fame.
But still at Hector godlike Ajax aim'd:
Still pointed at his breast his javelin flam'd:
The Trojan chief experienc'd in the field,
O'er his broad shoulders spread the massy shield,
Observ'd the storm of darts the Grecians pour,
And on his buckler caught the ringing shower.
He sees for Greece the scale of conquest rise,
Yet stops, and turns, and saves his lov'd allies.
As when the hand of Jove a tempest forms,
And rolls the cloud to blacken Heaven with storms,
Dark o'er the fields th' ascending vapour flies,
And shades the Sun, and blots the golden skies:
So from the ships, along the dusky plain,
Dire flight and terror drove the Trojan train.
Er's Hector fled; through heaps of disarray
The fiery coursers forc'd their lord away:
While far behind his Trojans fall confus'd;
Wedg'd in the trench, in one vast carnage bruise'd:
Chariots on chariots roll; the clashing spokes
Shock; while the madding steeds break short their yokes:
In vain they labour up the steepy mound;
Their charioteers lie foaming on the ground.
Fierce on the rear, with shouts, Patroclus flies;
Tumultuous clamour fills the fields and skies;
Thick drifts of dust involve their rapid flight;
Clouds rise on clouds, and Heaven is snatch'd from sight.
Th' affrighted steeds, their dying lords cast down,
Sour o'er the fields, and stretch to reach the town.
Loud o'er the rout was heard the victor's cry,
Where the war bleeds, and where the thickest die,
Where horse, and arms, and chariots lie o'er-
And bleeding heroes under axles groan. [thrown,
No stop, no check, the steeds of Pelcus knew;
From bank to bank th' immortal coursers flew,
High bounding o'er the fosse: the whirling car [war,
Spokes through the ranks, o'ertakes the flying

And thunders after Hector; Hector flies,
Patroclus shakes his lance; but fate denies.
Not with less noise, with less impetuous force,
The tide of Trojans urge their desperate course,
Than when in Autumn Jove his fury pours,
And Earth is laden with incessant showers
(When guilty mortals break th' eternal laws,
Or judges, brib'd, betray the righteous cause;)
From their deep beds he bids the rivers rise,
And opens all the flood-gates of the skies:
Th' impetuous torrents from their hills obey,
Whole fields are drown'd, and mountains swept away;
Loud roars the deluge till it meets the main;
And trembling man sees all his labours vain.
And now the chief (the foremost troops repell'd)
Back to the ships his destin'd progress held,
Bore down half Troy in his resistless way,
And forc'd the routed ranks to stand the day.
Between the space where silver Simois flows,
Where Jay the fleets, and where the rapiers rose,
All grim in dust and blood, Patroclus stands,
And turns the slaughter on the conquering bands.
First Pronous died beneath his fiery dart,
Which pierc'd below the shield his valiant heart.
Thestor was next; who saw the chief appear,
And fell the victim of his coward fear;
Shrunk up he sat, with wild and haggard eye,
Nor stood to combat, nor had force to fly:
Patroclus mark'd him as he shunn'd the war,
And with unmanly tremblings shook the car,
And dropp'd the flowing reins. Him 'twixt the jaws
The javelin sticks, and from the chariot draws.
As on a rock that overhangs the main,
An angler, studious of the line and cane,
Some mighty fish draws panting to the shore;
Not with less ease the barbed javelin bore
The gaping dastard: as the spear was shook,
He fell, and life his heartless breast forsook.
Next on Eryalus he flies; a stone,
Large as a rock, was by his fury thrown:
Full on his crown the ponderous fragment flew,
And burst the helm, and cleft the head in two:
Prone to the ground the breathless warrior fell,
And death involv'd him with the shades of Hell.
Then low in dust Epaltes, Echius lie;
Ipheas, Evippus, Polymelus, die;
Amphoterus, and Erymas succeed;
And last Tlepolemus and Pyres bleed.
Where'er he moves, the growing slaughters spread
In heaps on heaps: a monument of dead.
When now Sarpedon his brave friends beheld
Groveling in dust, and gasping on the field,
With this reproach his flying host he warns:
"Oh stain to honour! oh disgrace to arms!
Forsake, inglorious, the contended plain;
This hand, unaided, shall the war sustain:
The task be mine, this hero's strength to try,
Who mows whole troops, and makes an army fly."
He spake; and, speaking, leaps from off the car;
Patroclus lights, and sternly waits the war.
As when two vultures on the mountains' height
Stoop with resounding pinions to the fight;
They cuff, they tear, they raise a screaming cry:
The desert echoes, and the rocks reply:
The warriors thus, oppos'd in arms, engage
With equal clamours, and with equal rage.
Jove view'd the combat: whose event foreseen,
He thus bespoke his sister and his queen:

"The hour draws on; the destinies ordain,
My godlike son shall press the Phrygian plain;
Already on the verge of death he stands,
His life is ow'd to fierce Patroclus' hands.
What passions in a parent's breast debate!
Say, shall I snatch him from impending fate,
And send him safe to Lycia, distant far
From all the dangers and the toils of war;
Or to his doom my bravest offspring yield,
And fatten with celestial blood the field?"

Then thus the goddess with the radiant eyes:
"What words are these? O sovereign of the skies!
Short is the date prescrib'd to mortal man;
Shall Jove, for one, extend the narrow span,
Whose bounds were fix'd before his race began?
How many sons of gods, foredoom'd to death,
Before proud Ilium must resign their breath!
Were thine exempt, debate would rise above,
And murmuring powers condemn their partial Jove.
Give the bold chief a glorious fate in fight;
And, when th' ascending soul has wing'd her flight,
Let sleep and death convey, by thy command,
The breathless body to his native land.
His friends and people, to his future praise,
A marble tomb and pyramid shall raise,
And lasting honours to his ashes give;
His fame ('tis all the dead can have) shall live."

She said; the cloud-compeller, overcome,
Assents to fate, and ratifies the doom.
Then, touch'd with grief, the weeping Heavens
A shower of blood o'er all the fatal field: [distill'd
The god, his eyes averting from the plain,
Laments his son, predestin'd to be slain,
Far from the Lycian shores, his happy native reign.

Now met in arms, the combatants appear,
Each heav'd the shield, and pois'd the lifted spear:
From strong Patroclus's hand the javelin fled,
And pass'd the groin of valiant Thrasymed;
The nerves unbrac'd, no more his bulk sustain,
He falls, and falling bites the bloody plain.
Two sounding darts the Lycian leader threw;
'The first aloof with erring fury flew,
The next transpierc'd Achilles' mortal steed,
The generous Pedasus of Theban breed;
Fix'd in the shoulder's joint, he reel'd around,
Roll'd in the bloody dust, and paw'd the slippery
ground.

His sudden fall th' entangled harness broke;
Each axle crackled, and the chariot shook:
When bold Automedon, to disengage
The starting coursers, and restrain their rage,
Divides the traces with the sword, and freed
Th' encumber'd chariot from the dying steed:
The rest move on, obedient to the rein;
The car rolls slowly o'er the dusty plain.

The towering chiefs to fiercer fight advance,
And first Sarpedon whirl'd his weighty lance,
Which o'er the warrior's shoulder took its course,
And spent in empty air its dying force.
Not so Patroclus' never-erring dart:
Aim'd at his breast, it pierc'd the mortal part,
Where the strong fibres bind the solid heart;
Then, as the mountain oak, or poplar tall,
Or pine (fit mast for some great admiral)
Nods to the axe, till with a groaning sound
It sinks, and spreads its honours on the ground:
Thus fell the king; and, laid on earth supine,
Before his chariot stretch'd his form divine:
He grasp'd the dust disdain'd with streaming gore,
And, pale in death, lay groaning on the shore.

So lies a bull beneath the lion's paws,
While the grim savage grinds with foamy jaws
The trembling limbs, and sucks the smoking
blood;

Deep groans, and hollow roars, re-bellow through

Then to the leader of the Lycian band
The dying chief address'd his last command:

"Glaucus, be bold; thy task be first to dare
The glorious dangers of destructive war,
To lead my troops, to combat at their head,
Incite the living, and supply the dead.
Tell them, I charg'd them with my latest breath
Not unreveng'd to bear Sarpedon's death.
What grief, what shame, must Glaucus undergo,
If these spoil'd arms adorn a Grecian foe!
Then as a friend, and as a warrior, fight;
Defend my body, conquer in my right;
That, taught by great examples, all may try
Like thee to vanquish, or like me to die."

He ceas'd; the fates suppress'd his labouring breath,

And his eyes darken'd with the shades of death.
Th' insulting victor with disdain bestrode
The prostrate prince, and on his bosom trod;
Then drew the weapon from his panting heart,
The reeking fibres clinging to the dart;
From the wide wound gush'd out a stream of blood,
And the soul issued in the purple flood.

His flying steeds the Myrmidons detain,
Unguided now, their mighty master slain.
All-impotent of aid, transfix'd with grief,
Unhappy Glaucus heard the dying chief
His painful arm, yet useless with the smart
Inflicted fate by Teucer's deadly dart,
Supported on his better hand he stay'd;
To Phœbus then, ('twas all he could) he pray'd:

"All-seeing monarch! whether Lycia's coast,
Or sacred Ilium, thy bright presence boast,
Powerful alike to ease the wretch's smart;
Oh hear me! god of every healing art!
Lo! stiff with clotted blood, and pierc'd with pain,
That thrills my arm, and shoots through every vein,
I stand, unable to sustain the spear,
And sigh, at distance from the glorious war.
Low in the dust is great Sarpedon laid,
Nor Jove vouchsaf'd his hapless offspring aid.
But thou, O god of health! thy succour lend,
To guard the reliques of his slaughter'd friend.
For thou, though distant, canst restore my might,
To head my Lycians, and support the fight."

Apollo heard; and, suppliant as he stood,
His heavenly hand restrain'd the flux of blood:
He drew the dolours from the wounded part,
And breath'd a spirit in his rising heart:
Renew'd by art divine, the hero stands,
And owns th' assistance of immortal hands.
First to the fight his native troops he warms,
Then loudly calls on Troy's vindictive arms:
With ample strides he stalks from place to place;
Now fires Agenor, now Polydamas;
Æneas next, and Hector, he accosts;
Inflaming thus the rage of all their hosts:

"What thoughts, regardless chief! thy breast employ?"

Oh too forgetful of the friends of Troy!
Those generous friends, who, from their country far,

Breathe their brave souls out in another's war.
See! where in dust the great Sarpedon lies,
In action valiant, and in council wise,

Who guarded right, and kept his people free ;
To all his Lycians lost, and lost to thee !
Stretch'd by Patroclus' arm on yonder plains,
Can save from hostile rage his lov'd remains :
Ah let not Greece his conquer'd trophies boast,
Nor on his corse revenge her heroes lost."

He spoke ; each leader in his grief partook,
Troy, at the loss, through all her legions shook.
Transfix'd with deep regret, they view o'erthrown
At once his country's pillar, and their own ;
A chief, who led to Troy's beleagu'rd wall
A host of heroes, and outshin'd them all.
Fir'd they rush on ; first Hector seeks the foes,
And with superior vengeance greatly glows.

But o'er the dead the fierce Patroclus stands,
And, rousing Ajax, rous'd the listening bands :

" Heroes, be men ! be what you were before ;
Or weigh the great occasion, and be more.
The chief who taught our lofty walls to yield,
Lies pale in death, extended on the field.

To guard his body, Troy in numbers flies ;
'Tis half the glory to maintain our prize.
Haste, strip his arms, the slaughter round him
And send the living Lycians to the dead." [spread,

The heroes kindle at his fierce command ;
The martial squadrons close on either hand :
Here Troy and Lycia charge with loud alarms,
Thessalia there, and Greece, oppose their arms,
With horrid shouts they circle round the slain ;
The clash of armour rings o'er all the plain.
Great Jove, to swell the horrors of the fight,
O'er the fierce armies pours pernicious night ;
And round his son confounds the warring hosts,
His fate ennobling with a crowd of ghosts.

Now Greece gives way, and great Epigeus falls ;
Agaleus' son, from Budium's lofty walls ;
Who, chas'd for murder thence, a suppliant came
To Peleus and the silver-footed dame ;
Now sent to Troy, Achilles' arms to aid,
He pays due vengeance to his kinsman's shade.
Soon as his luckless hand had touch'd the dead,
A rock's large fragment thunder'd on his head ;
Hurl'd by Hectorian force, it cleft in twain
His shatter'd helm, and stretch'd him o'er the slain.

Fierce to the van of fight Patroclus came ;
And, like an eagle darting at his game,
Sprung on the Trojan and the Lycian band ;
What grief thy heart, what fury urg'd thy hand,
Oh generous Greek ! when with full vigour thrown
At Sthenelæus flew the weighty stone,
Which sunk him to the dead : when Troy, too near
That arm, drew back ; and Hector learn'd to fear.
Far as an able hand a lance can throw,
Or at the lists, or at the fighting foe ;
So far the Trojans from their lines retir'd ;
Till Glaucus, turning, all the rest inspir'd.
Then Bathyclæus fell beneath his rage,
The only hope of Chalcon's trembling age ;
Wide o'er the laud was stretch'd his large domain,
With stately seats, and riches, blest in vain :
Him, bold with youth, and eager to pursue
The flying Lycians, Glaucus met, and slew ;
Fierc'd through the bosom with a sudden wound,
He fell, and, falling, made the fields resound.
Th' Achaïans sorrow for their hero slain ; [plain,
With conqu'ring shouts the Trojans shake the
And crowd to spoil the dead : the Greeks oppose ;
An iron circle round the carcass grows.

Then brave Laogonus resign'd his breath,
Dispatch'd by Merion to the shades of death :

On Ida's holy hill he made abode,
The priest of Jove, and honour'd like his god.
Between the jaw and ear the javelin went :
The soul, exhaling, issued at the vent.

His spear Æneas at the victor threw,
Who, stooping forward, from the death withdrew ;
The lance hiss'd harmless o'er his covering shield,
And trembling struck, and rooted in the field ;
There yet scarce spent, it quivers on the plain,
Sent by the great Æneas' arm in vain.

" Swift as thou art" (the raging hero cries)
" And skill'd in dancing to dispute the prize,
My spear, the destin'd passage had it found,
Had fix'd thy active vigour to the ground."

" Oh valiant leader of the Dardan host !"
(Insulted Merion thus retorts the boast)

" Strong as you are, 'tis mortal force you trust,
An arm as strong may stretch thee in the dust.
And if to this my lance thy fate be given,
Vain are thy vaunts ; success is still from Heaven :
This instant sends thee down to Pluto's coast ;
Mine is the glory, his thy parting ghost."

" O friend," (Menætius' son this answer gave)

" With words to combat, ill befits the brave ;
Not empty boasts the sons of Troy repel,
Your swords must plunge them to the shades of Hell.
To speak, bessems the council : but to dare
In glorious action, is the task of war."

This said, Patroclus to the battle flies ;
Great Merion follows, and new shouts arise :
Shields, helmets rattle, as the warriors close ;
And thick and heavy sounds the storm of blows.
As through the shrilling vale, or mountain ground,
The labours of the woodman's axe resound ;
Blows following blows are heard re-echoing wide,
While crackling forests fall on every side :
Thus echo'd all the fields with loud alarms,
So fell the warriors, and so rung their arms.

Now great Sarpedon on the sandy shore,
His heavenly form defac'd with dust and gore,
And stuck with darts by warring heroes shed,
Lies undistinguish'd from the vulgar dead.
His long-disputed corse the chiefs enclose.
On every side the busy combat crows ;
Thick as beneath some shepherd's thatch'd abode
(The pails high-foaming with a milky flood)
The buzzing flies, a persevering train,
Incessant swarm, and chas'd return again,
Jove view'd the combat with a stern survey,
And eyes that flash'd intolerable day.

Fix'd on the field his sight, his breast debates
The vengeance due, and meditates the fates :
Whether to urge their prompt effect, and call
The force of Hector to Patroclus' fall,
This instant see his short-liv'd trophies won,
And stretch'd him breathless on his slaughter'd son ;
Or yet, with many a soul's untimely fight,
Augment the fame and horror of the fight.
To crown Achilles' valiant friend with praise
At length he downs ; and, that his last of days
Shall set in glory, bids him drive the foe ;
Nor unattended see the shades dire.
Then Hector's mind he fills with dire dismay ;
He mounts his car, and calls his hosts away,
Sunk with Troy's heavy fates, he sees decline
The scales of Jove, and pants with awe divine.

Then, nor before, the hardy Lycians fled,
And left their monarch with the common dead :
Around, in heaps on heaps, a dreadful wall
Of carping rise, as the heroes fall,

(So Jove decreed!) At length the Greeks obtain
The prize contested, and despoil the slain.
The radiant arms are by Patroclus borne,
Patroclus' ships the glorious spoils adorn.

Then thus to Phœbus, in the realms above,
Spoke from his throne the cloud-compelling Jove:
"Descend, my Phœbus, on the Phrygian plain,
And from the fight convey Sarpedon slain;
Then bathe his body in the crystal flood;
With dust dishonour'd, and deform'd with blood:
O'er all his limbs celestial odours shed,
And with celestial robes adorn the dead.
Those rites discharg'd, his sacred corse bequeath
To the soft arms of silent Sleep and Death.
They to his friends the mournful charge shall bear,
His friends a tomb and pyramid shall rear;
What honours mortals after death receive,
Those unavailing honours we may give!"

Apollo bows, and from mount Ida's height
Swift to the field precipitates his flight;
Thence from the war the breathless hero bore,
Veil'd in a cloud, to silver Simois' shore;
There bath'd his honourable wounds, and drest
His manly members in th' immortal vest;
And with perfumes of sweet ambrosial dews,
Restores his freshness, and his form renews.
Then Sleep and Death, two twins of winged race,
Of matchless swiftness, but of silent pace,
Receiv'd Sarpedon, at the god's command,
And in a moment reach'd the Lycian land;
The corse amidst his weeping friends they laid,
Where endless honours wait the sacred shade.

Meanwhile Patroclus pours along the plains,
With foaming coursers, and with loosen'd reins.
Fierce on the Trojan and the Lycian crew,
Ah blind to fate! thy headlong fury flew:
Against what fate and powerful Jove ordain,
Vain was thy friend's command, thy courage vain;
For he, the god, whose counsels uncontrol'd
Dismay the mighty, and confound the bold;
The god who gives, resumes, and orders all,
He urg'd thee on, and urg'd thee on to fall.

Who first, brave hero! by that arm was slain,
Who last, beneath thy vengeance, press'd the plain;
When Heaven itself thy fatal fury led,
And call'd to fill the number of the dead?
Adrestus first; Autonox then succeeds;
Echeclus follows; next young Megas bleeds:
Epistor, Melanippus, bite the ground:
The slaughter, Elusus and Mulius crown'd:
Then sunk Pylartes to eternal night;
The rest, dispersing, trust their fates to flight.

Now Troy had stoop'd beneath his matchless
power,

But flaming Phœbus kept the sacred tower.
Thrice at the battlements Patroclus strook,
His blazing ægis thrice Apollo shook:
He try'd the fourth; when, bursting from the cloud,

A more than mortal voice was heard aloud:
"Patroclus! cease; this heaven-defended wall
Defies thy lance; not fated yet to fall;
Thy friend, thy greater far, it shall withstand:
Troy shall not stoop ev'n to Achilles' hand."

So spoke the god who darts celestial fires;
The Greek obeys him, and with awe retires:
While Hector, checking at the Scæan gates
His panting coursers, in his breast debates,
Or in the field his forces to employ,
Or draw the troops within the walls of Troy.

Thus while he thought, beside him Phœbus stood,
In Asius' shape, who reign'd by Sangar's flood;
(Thy brother, Hecuba! from Dymas sprung,
A valiant warrior, haughty, bold and young.)
Thus he accosts him: "What a shameful sight!
Gods! is it Hector that forbears the fight?
Were thine my vigour, thy successful spear
Should soon convince thee of so false a fear.
Turn then, ah turn thee to the field of fame,
And in Patroclus' blood efface thy shame.
Perhaps Apollo shall thy arms succeed,
And Heaven ordains him by thy lance to bleed."

So spoke th' inspiring god; then took his flight,
And plung'd amidst the tumult of the fight.
He bids Cebrión drive the rapid car:
The lash resounds, the coursers rush to war:
The god the Grecians' sinking souls deprest,
And pour'd swift spirits through each Trojan breast.
Patroclus lights, impatient for the fight;
A spear his left, a stone employs his right:
With all his nerves he drives it at the foe;
Pointed above, and rough and gross below!
The falling ruin crush'd Cebrión's head,
The lawless offspring of king Priam's bed;
His front, brows, eyes, one undistinguish'd wotnd!
The bursting balls drop sightless to the ground.
The charioteer, while yet he held the rein,
Struck, from the car, falls headlong on the plain.
To the dark shades the soul unwilling glides;
While the proud victor thus his fall derides:
"Good Heavens! what active feats you artist
What skillful divers are our Phrygian foes! [shows!
Mark with what ease thy sink into the sand!
Pity, that all their practice is by land!"

Then, rushing forward on his prostrate prize,
To spoil the carcass fierce Patroclus flies:
Swift as a lion, terrible and bold,
That sweeps the fields, depopulates the fold;
Pierc'd through the dauntless heart, then tumbles
And from his fatal courage finds his bane. [slain;
At once bold Hector leaping from his car,
Defends the body, and provokes the war.
Thus for some slaughter'd hind, with equal rage,
Two lordly rulers of the wood engage;
Stung with fierce hunger, each the prey invades,
And echoing roars rebel through the shades.
Stern Hector fastens on the warrior's head,
And by the foot Patroclus drags the dead.
While all around, confusion, rage, and fright,
Mix the contending hosts in mortal fight.
So, pent by hills, the wild winds roar aloud
In the deep bosom of some gloomy wood;
Leaves, arms, and trees, aloft in air are blown,
The broad oaks crackle, and the Sylvens groan;
This way and that, the rattling thicket bends,
And the whole forest in one crash descends.
Not with less noise, with less tumultuous rage,
In dreadful shock the mingled hosts engage.
Darts shower'd on darts, now round the carcass
ring;

Now flights of arrows bounding from the string:
Stones follow stones; some clatter on the fields,
Some, hard and heavy, shake the sounding shields.
But where the rising whirlwind clouds the plains,
Sunk in soft dust the mighty chief remains,
And, stretch'd in death, forgets the guiding reins!

Now, flaming from the zenith, Sol had driven
His ferri'd orb through half the vault of Heaven;
While on each host with equal tempest fell
The showering darts, and numbers sunk to Hell.

But when his evening wheels o'erhurling the main,
 And conquest rested on the Grecian train.
 Then, from amidst the tumult and alarms,
 They draw the conquer'd corse, and radiant arms.
 Then rash Patroclus with new fury glows,
 And, breathing slaughter, pours amid the foes.
 Hence on the press, like Mars himself, he flew,
 And thrice three heroes at each onset slew.
 There ends thy glory! there the fates untwine
 The last, black remnant of so bright a line;
 Apollo dreadful stops thy middle way;
 Death calls, and Heaven allows no longer day!
 For lo! the god, in dusky clouds enshrin'd
 Approaching dealt a staggering blow behind.
 The weighty shock his neck and shoulders feel;
 His eyes flash sparkles, his stunn'd senses reel
 In giddy darkness far to distance flung,
 His bounding helmet on the champain rung.
 Achilles' plume is stain'd with dust and gore,
 That plume, which never stoop'd to earth before;
 Long us'd, untouch'd, in fighting fields to shine,
 And shade the temples of the man divine.
 Jove dooms it now on Hector's helm to nod;
 Not long—for fate pursues him, and the god.
 His spear in shivers falls: his ample shield
 Drops from his arm: his baldric strows the field:
 The corselet his astonish'd breast forsakes:
 Loose in each joint: each nerve with horror shakes.
 Stupid he stares, and all-assistless stands:
 Such is the force of more than mortal hands!
 A Dardan youth there was, well known to fame,
 From Panthus sprung, Euphorbus was his name;
 Fam'd for the manage of the foaming horse,
 Skill'd in the dart, and matchless in the course:
 Full twenty knights he tumbled from the car,
 While yet he learn'd his rudiments of war.
 His venturous spear first drew the hero's gore;
 He struck, he wounded, but he durst no more;
 Nor, though disarm'd, Patroclus' fury stood:
 But swift withdrew the long-protended wood,
 And turn'd him short, and herded in the crowd.
 Thus, by an arm divine, and mortal spear,
 Wounded at once, Patroclus yields to fear;
 Retires for succour to his social train,
 And flies the fate, which Heaven decreed, in vain.
 Stern Hector, as the bleeding chief he views,
 Breaks through the ranks, and his retreat pursues:
 The lance arrests him with a mortal wound;
 He falls, Earth thunders, and his arms resound.
 With him all Greece was sunk; that moment all
 Her yet-surviving heroes seem'd to fall.
 So, scorch'd with heat, along the desert shore,
 The roaring lion meets a bristly boar,
 Fast by the spring; they both dispute the flood,
 With flaming eyes, and jaws besmear'd with blood;
 At length the sovereign savage wins the strife,
 And the torn boar resigns his thirst and life.
 Patroclus thus, so many chiefs o'erthrown,
 So many lives effus'd, expires his own.
 As dying now at Hector's feet he lies,
 He sternly views him, and triumphing cries:
 "Lie there, Patroclus! and with thee, the joy
 Thy pride once promis'd, of subverting Troy;
 The fancy'd scenes of Ilium wrapt in flames,
 And thy soft pleasures serv'd with captive dames!
 Unthinking man! I fought, those towers to free,
 And guard thatauteous race from lords like thee:
 But thou a prey to vultures shalt be made:
 Thy own Achilles cannot lend thee aid;

Though much at parting that great chief might say,
 And much enjoin thee, this important day.
 'Return not, my brave friend', (perhaps he said)
 'Without the bloody arms of Hector dead.'
 He spoke, Patroclus march'd, and thus he sped."
 Supine and wildly gazing on the skies,
 With faint, expiring breath, the chief replies:
 "Vain boaster! cease, and know the powers
 divine:
 Jove's and Apollo's is this deed, not thine;
 To Heaven is ow'd whate'er your own you call,
 And Heaven itself disarm'd me ere my fall.
 Had twenty mortals, each thy match in might,
 Oppos'd me fairly, they had sunk in fight:
 By fate and Phoebus was I first o'erthrown,
 Euphorbus next; the third mean part thy own.
 But thou, imperious! hear my latest breath;
 The gods inspire it, and it sounds thy death.
 Insulting man, thou shalt be soon as I; [nigh;
 Black fate hangs o'er thee, and thy hour draws
 Ev'n now on life's last verge I see thee stand,
 I see thee fall, and by Achilles' hand."
 He faints; the soul unwilling wings her way
 (The beauteous body left a load of clay)
 Flits to the lone, uncomfortable coast;
 A naked, wandering, melancholy ghost!
 Then Hector, pausing, as his eyes he fed
 On the pale carcase, thus address'd the dead:
 "From whence this boding speech, the stern decree
 Of death denounc'd, or why denounc'd to me?
 Why not as well Achilles' fate be given
 To Hector's lance? Who knows the will of Heaven?"
 Pensive he said; then pressing, as he lay,
 His breathless bosom, tore the lance away;
 And upwards cast the corpse: the reeking spear
 He shakes, and charges the bold charioteer.
 But swift Automedon with loosen'd reins
 Rapt in the chariot o'er the distant plains,
 Far from his rage th' immortal coursers drove:
 Th' immortal coursers were the gift of Jove.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XVII.

ARGUMENT.

THE SEVENTH BATTLE, FOR THE BODY OF PATROCLUS;
 THE ACTS OF MENELAUS.

MENELAUS, upon the death of Patroclus, defends his body from the enemy: Euphorbus, who attempts it, is slain. Hector advancing, Menelaus retires; but soon returns with Ajax, and drives him off. This Glaucus objects to Hector as a fight; who thereupon puts on the armour
 he had won from Patroclus, and renews the battle. The Greeks give way, till Ajax rallies them:
 Aeneas sustains the Trojans. Aeneas and Hector attempt the chariot of Achilles, which is borne off by Automedon. The horses of Achilles deplore the loss of Patroclus: Jupiter covers his body with a thick darkness: the noble prayer of Ajax on that occasion. Menelaus sends Antilochus to Achilles, with the news of Patroclus' death, then returns to the fight, where, though attacked with the utmost fury, he and Meriones, assisted by the Ajaxes, bear off the body to the ships.

The time is the evening of the eight and twentieth day. The scene lies in the fields before Troy.

On the cold earth divine Patroclus spread,
Lies pierc'd with wounds among the vulgar dead.
Great Menelaus, touch'd with generous woe,
Springs to the front, and guards him from the foe:
Thus round her new-fall'n young the heifer moves,
Fruit of her throes, and first-born of her loves;
And anxious (helpless as he lies, and bare)
Turns, and re-turns her, with a mother's care.
Oppos'd to each that near the carcase came,
His broad shield glimmers, and his lances flame.

The son of Panthus, skill'd the dart to send,
Eyes the dead hero, and insults the friend:
"This hand, Atrides, laid Patroclus low;
Warrior desist, nor tempt an equal blow:
To me the spoils my prowess won, resign;
Depart with life, and leave the glory mine."

The Trojan thus; the Spartan monarch burn'd
With generous anguish, and in scorn return'd:
"Laugh'at thou not, Jove! from thy superior throne,
When mortals boast of prowess not their own?
Not thus the lion glories in his might,
Nor panther braves his spotted foe in fight,
Nor thus the boar; (those terrors of the plain)
Man only vaunts his force, and vaunts in vain.
But far the vainest of the boastful kind
These sons of Panthus vent their haughty mind.
Yet 'twas but late, beneath my conquering steel
This boaster's brother, Hyperenor, fell;
Against our arm, which rashly he defy'd,
Vain was his vigour, and as vain his pride.
These eyes beheld him on the dust expire,
No more to cheer his spouse, or glad his sire.
Presumptuous youth! like his shall be thy doom,
Go, wait thy brother to the Stygian gloom;
Or, while thou may'st, avoid the threaten'd fate;
Fools stay to feel it, and are wise too late."

Unmov'd Euphorbus thus: "That action known,
Come, from my brother's blood repay thy own.
His weeping father claims thy destin'd head,
And spouse, a widow in her bridal bed:
On these thy conquer'd spoils I shall bestow,
To soothe a consort's and a parent's woe;
No longer then defer the glorious strife,
Let Heaven decide our fortune, fame, and life"

Swift as the word the missile lance he flings,
The well-aim'd weapon on the buckler rings,
But blunted by the brass innoxious falls.
On Jove the father, great Atrides calls,
Nor flies the javelin from his arm in vain,
Nor pierc'd his throat, and bent him to the plain;
Wide through the neck appears the grizzly wound,
Prone sinks the warrior, and his arms resound.
The shining circlets of his golden hair,
Which ev'n the Graces might be proud to wear,
Instarr'd with gems and gold, bestrow the shore,
With dust dishonour'd, and deform'd with gore.

As the young olive, in some cyprus copse,
Crown'd by fresh fountains with eternal green,
Lifts the gay head, in snowy flowers fair,
And plays and dances to the gentle air;
When lo! a whirlwind from high Heaven impels
The tender plant, and withers all its shades;
It lies uprooted from its genial bed,
A lovely ruin, now desec'd and dead.

Thus young, thus beautiful, Euphorbus lay,
While the fierce Spartan tore his arms away.
Proud of his deed, and glorious in the prize,
Affrighted Troy the towering victor flies:
Flies, as before some mountain lion's ire
The village cur and trembling swains retire,
When o'er the slaughter'd bull they hear him roar,
And see his jaws distil with smoking gore;
All pale with fear, at distance scatter'd round,
They about incessant, and the vales resound.

Meanwhile Apollo view'd with anxious eyes,
And urg'd great Hector to dispute the prize
(In Menes' shape, beneath whose martial care
The rough Ciconians learn'd the trade of war):
"Forbear," he cry'd, "with fruitless speed to chase
Achilles' coursers, of ethereal race;
They stoop not, these, to mortal man's command,
Or stoop to none but great Achilles' hand.

Too long amus'd with a pursuit so vain,
Turn, and behold the brave Euphorbus slain!
By Sparta slain! for ever now suppress
The fire which burn'd in that undaunted breast!"

Thus having spoke, Apollo wing'd his flight,
And mix'd with mortals in the toils of fight:
His words infix'd unutterable care
Deep in great Hector's soul: through all the war
He darts his anxious eye; and instant view'd
The breathless hero in his blood imbrued,
(Forth welling from the wound, as prone he lay)
And in the victor's hands the shining prey. [flie, Sheath'd in bright arms, through cleaving ranks he
And send his voice in thunder to the skies:
Fierce as a flood of flame by Vulcan sent,
It flew, and fir'd the nations as it went.

Atrides from the voice the storm divin'd,
And thus explor'd his own unconquer'd mind:

"Then shall I quit Patroclus on the plain,
Slain in my cause, and for my honour slain?
Desert the arms, the relics of my friend?
Or, singly, Hector and his troops attend?
Sure where such partial favour Heaven bestow'd,
To brave the hero were to brave the god:
Forgive me, Greece, if once I quit the field;
'Tis not to Hector, but to Heaven, I yield.
Yet, nor the god, nor Heaven, should give me
Did but the voice of Ajax reach my ear: [fear,
Still would we turn, still battle on the plains,
And give Achilles all that yet remains
Of his and our Patroclus."—This, no more,
The time allow'd: Troy thicken'd on the shore,
A sable scene! the terrors Hector led.

Slow he recedes, and, sighing, quits the dead.
So from the fold th' unwilling lion parts,
Forc'd by loud clamours, and a storm of darts;
He flies indeed, but threatens as he flies,
With heart indignant and retorted eyes.
Now enter'd in the Spartan ranks, he turn'd:
His manly breast, and with new fury burn'd;
O'er all the black battalions sent his view,
And through the cloud the godlike Ajax knew;
Where, labouring on the left, the warrior stood,
All grim in arms, and cover'd o'er with blood!

There breathing courage, where the god of day
Had sunk each heart with terror and dismay.

To him the king: "Oh, Ajax! oh, my friend!
Haste, and Patroclus' lov'd remains defend:

The body to Achilles to restore,
Demands our care; alas, we can no more!
For naked now, despoil'd of arms, he lies;
And Hector glories in the dazzling prize."
He said, and touch'd his heart. The raging pair
Pierce the thick battle, and provoke the war.
Already had stern Hector seiz'd his head,
And doom'd to Trojan dogs th' unhappy dead;
But soon (as Ajax rear'd his tower-like shield)
Sprung to his car, and measur'd back the field.
His train to Troy the radiant armour bear,
To stand a trophy of his fame in war.

Meanwhile great Ajax (his broad shield display'd)
Guards the dead hero with the dreadful shade;
And now before, and now behind, he stood:
Thus, in the centre of some gloomy wood,
With many a step the lions surrounds
Her tawny young, beset by men and hounds;
Elate her heart, and rousing all her powers,
Dark o'er the fiery balls each hanging eye-brow lowers.

Fast by his side the generous Spartan glows
With great revenge, and feeds his inward woes.

But Glaucus, leader of the Lycian aids,
On Hector frowning, thus his flight upbraids:
"Where now in Hector shall we Hector find?
A manly form, without a manly mind!
Is this, O chief! a hero's boasted fame?
How vain, without the merit, is the name!
Since battle is renounc'd, thy thoughts employ
What other methods may preserve thy Troy:
'Tis time to try if Iliion's state can stand
By thee alone, nor ask a foreign hand;
Mean, empty boast! but shall the Lycians stake
Their lives for you? those Lycians you forsake?
What from thy thankless arms can we expect?
Thy friend Sarpedon proves thy base neglect:
Say, shall our slaughter'd bodies guard your walls,

While unreveng'd the great Sarpedon falls?
Er'n where he dy'd for Troy, you left him there,
A feast for dogs, and all the fowls of air.
On my command if any Lycian wait,
Hence let him march, and give up Troy to fate.
Did such a spirit as the gods impart
Impel one Trojan hand, or Trojan heart,
(Such, as should burn in every soul, that draws
The sword for glory, and his country's cause;)
Er'n yet our mutual arms we might employ,
And drag you carcass to the walls of Troy.
Oh! were Patroclus ours, we might obtain
Sarpedon's arms and honour'd corse again!
Greece with Achilles' friend should be repaid,
And thus due honours purchas'd to his shade.
But words are vain—Let Ajax once appear,
And Hector trembles, and recedes with fear;
Thou dar'st not meet the terrours of his eye;
And lo! already thou prepar'st to fly."

The Trojan chief with fix'd resentment ey'd
The Lycian leader, and sedate replied:
"Say, is it just (my friend) that Hector's ear
From such a warrior such a speech should hear?
I deem'd thee once the wisest of thy kind,
But ill this insult suits a prudent mind.
I shun great Ajax? I desert my train?
'Tis mine to prove the rash assertion vain;

I joy to mingle where the battle bleeds,
And hear the thunder of the sounding steeds.
But Jove's high will is ever uncontrol'd,
The strong he withers, and confounds the bold;
Now crowns with fame the mighty man, and now
Strikes the fresh garland from the victor's brow!
Come, through yon squadron let us hew the way,
And thou be witness, if I fear today:
If yet a Greek the sight of Hector dread,
Or yet their hero can defend the dead."

Then, turning to the martial hosts, he cries,
"Ye Trojans, Dardans, Lycians, and allies!
Be men (my friends) in action as in name,
And yet be mindful of your ancient fame.
Hector in proud Achilles' arms shall shine,
Torn from his friend, by right of conquest mine."

He strode along the field, as thus he said
(The sable plumage nodded o'er his head):
Swift through the spacious plain he sent a look;
'One instant saw, one instant overtook
The distant band, that on the sandy shore
The radiant spoils to sacred Iliion bore.
There his own mail unbrac'd the field bestrow'd;
His train to Troy convey'd the massy load.
Now blazing in th' immortal arms he stands,
The work and present of celestial hands;
By aged Peleus to Achilles given,
As first to Peleus by the court of Heaven:
His father's arms not long Achilles wears,
Forbid by fate to reach his father's years.

Him, proud in triumph, glittering from afar,
The god, whose thunder rends the troubled air,
Beheld with pity, as apart he sate,
And conscious look'd through all the scene of fate.

He shook the sacred honours of his head;
Olympus trembled, and the godhead said:

"Ah, wretched man! unmindful of thy end!
A moment's glory! and what fates attend?
In heavenly panoply divinely bright
Thou stand'st, and armies tremble at thy sight,
As at Achilles' self! beneath thy dart
Lies slain the great Achilles' dearer part;
Thou from the mighty dead those arms hast torn,
Which once the greatest of mankind had worn.
Yet live! I give thee one illustrious day,
A blaze of glory ere thou fall'st away:
Far ah! no more Andromache shall come,
With joyful tears, to welcome Hector home;
No more officious, with endearing charms,
From thy tir'd limbs unbrace Pelides' arms!"

Then with his sable brow he gave the nod,
That seals his word; the sanction of the god.
The stubborn arms (by Jove's command dispos'd)
Conform'd spontaneous, and around him clos'd;
Fill'd with the god, enlarg'd his members grew,
Through all his veins a sudden vigour flew,
The blood in brisker tides began to roll,
And Mars himself came rushing on his soul.
Exhorting loud, through all the field he strode,
And look'd, and mov'd, Achilles, or a god.
Now Mesthles, Glaucus, Medon, he inspires;
Now Phorcys, Chromius, and Hippothois, fires;
The great Theseilochus like fury found,
Asteropæus kindled at the sound,
And Ennomus, in augury renown'd.

"Hear, all ye hosts, and hear, unnumber'd bands
Of neighbouring nations, or of distant lands!
'Twas not for state we summon'd you so far,
To boast our numbers, and the pomp of war;

Ye came to fight ; a valiant foe to chase,
To save our present, and our future race.
For this, our wealth, our products, you enjoy,
And glean the relics of exhausted Troy.
Now then to conquer or to die prepare,
To die or conquer are the terms of war.
Whatever hand shall win Patroclus slain,
Whoe'er shall drag him to the Trojan train,
With Hector's self shall equal honours claim ;
With Hector part the spoil, and share the fame."

Fir'd by his words, the troops dismiss their fears,
They join, they thicken, they pretend their spears ;
Full on the Greeks they drive in firm array,
And each from Ajax hopes the glorious prey :
Vain hope ! what number shall the field o'erspread,
What victims perish round the mighty dead ?
Great Ajax mark'd the growing storm from far,
And thus bespoke his brother of the war :
" Our fatal day, alas ! is come, (my friend)
And all our wars and glories at an end !
'Tis not this corse alone we guard in vain,
Condemn'd to vultures on the Trojan plain ;
We too must yield : the same sad fate must fall
On thee, on me, perhaps (my friend) on all.
See what a tempest direful Hector spreads,
And lo ! it bursts, it thunders on our heads !
Call on our Greeks, if any hear the call,
The bravest Greeks : this hour demands them all."

The warrior rais'd his voice, and wide around
The field re-echoed the distressful sound :
" Oh chiefs ! oh princes ! to whose hand is given
The rule of men ; whose glory is from Heaven !
Whom with due honours both Atrides grace :
Ye guides and guardians of our Argive race !
All, whom this well-known voice shall reach so far,
All, whom I see not through this cloud of war ;
Come all ! let generous rage your arms employ,
And save Patroclus from the dogs of Troy."

Oilean Ajax first the voice obey'd,
Swift was his pace, and ready was his aid ;
Next him Idonæus, more slow with age,
And Merion, burning with a hero's rage.
The long succeeding numbers who can name ?
Put all were Greeks, and eager all for fame.
Fierce to the charge great Hector led the throng ;
Whole Troy, embodied, rush'd with shouts along.
Thus, when a mountain-billow foams and raves,
Where some swollen river disembogues his waves,
Full in the mouth is stopp'd the rushing tide,
The boiling ocean works from side to side,
The river trembles to his utmost shore,
And distant rocks rebellow to the roar.

Nor less resolv'd, the firm Achaian band,
With brazen shields, in horrid circle stand :
Jove, pouring darkness o'er the mingled fight,
Conceals the warriors' shining helms in night :
To him, the chief for whom the hosts contend,
Had liv'd not hateful, for he liv'd a friend :
Dead he protects him with superior care,
Nor dooms his carcase to the birds of air.

The first attack the Grecians scarce sustain ;
Repuls'd, they yield, the Trojans seize the slain :
Then fierce they rally, to revenge led on
By the swift rage of Ajax Telamon
(Ajax, to Peleus' son the second name,
In graceful stature next, and next in fame ;)
With headlong force the foremost ranks he tore :
So through the thicket bursts the mountain-bear.
And rudely scatters, far to distance round,
The frighted hunter and the baying hound.

The son of Lethus, brave Pelægus' heir,
Hippochoüs, dragg'd the carcase through the war ;
The sinewy ancles bor'd, the feet he bound
With thongs, inserted through the double wound :
Inevitable fate o'ertakes the deed ;
Doom'd by great Ajax' vengeful lance to bleed :
It cleft the helmet's brazen cheeks in twain ;
The shatter'd crest and horse-hair strow the plain :
With nerves relax'd he tumbles to the ground :
The brain comes gushing thro' the ghastly wound :
He drops Patroclus' foot, and o'er him spread
Now lies, a sad companion of the dead :
Far from Larissa lies, his native air,
And ill requites his parent's tender care.
Lamented youth ! in life's first bloom he fell,
Sent by great Ajax to the shades of Hell.
Once more at Ajax, Hector's javelin flies :
The Grecian marking, as it cut the skies,
Shunn'd the descending death ; which blessing on,
Stretch'd in the dust the great Iphytus' son,
Schedius the brave, of all the Phocian kind
The boldest warrior, and the noblest mind :
In little Panope, for strength renown'd,
He held his seat, and rul'd the realms around.
Plung'd in his throat, the weapon drank his blood,
And deep transpiercing thro' the shoulder stood ;
In clanging arms the hero fell, and all
The fields resounded with his weighty fall.
Phorceys, as slain Hippochoüs he defends,
The Telamonian lance his belly rends ;
The hollow armour burst before the stroke,
And through the wound the rushing entrails broke :
In strong convulsions panting on the sands
He lies, and grasps the dust with dying hands.
Struck at the sight, recede the Trojan train :
The shouting Argives strip the heroes slain.
And now had Troy, by Greece compell'd to yield,
Fled to her ramparts, and resign'd the field ;
Greece, in her native fortitude elate,
With Jove averse, had turn'd the scale of fate :
But Phœbus urg'd Æneas to the fight ;
He seem'd like aged Periphas to sight
(A herald in Anchises' love grown old,
Rever'd for prudence ; and, with prudence, bold).
Thus he—" What methods yet, oh chief ! remain,

To save your Troy, tho' Heaven its fall ordain ?
There have been heroes, who, by virtuous care,
By valour, numbers, and by arts of war,
Have forc'd the powers to spare a sinking state,
And gain'd at length the glorious odds of fate.
But you, when fortune smiles, when Jove declares

His partial favour, and assists your wars,
Your shameful efforts 'gainst yourselves employ,
And force th' unwilling god to ruin Troy."

Æneas, through the form assum'd, describes
The power conceal'd, and thus to Hector cries :
" O lasting shame ! to our own fears a prey,
We seek our ramparts, and desert the day !
A god (nor is he less) my bosom warms,
And tells me, Jove asserts the Trojan arms."

He spoke, and foremost to the combat flew :
The bold example all his host pursue.
Then first, Leocritus beneath him bled,
In vain below'd by valiant Lycomede ;
Who view'd his fall, and, grieving at the chance,
Swift to revenge it, sent his angry lance :
The whirling lance, with vigorous force address'd,
Descends, and pants in Apisaon's breast :

From rich Pæonia's vales the warrior came,
 Next thee, Asteropæus! in place and fame.
 Asteropæus with grief beheld the slain,
 And rush'd to combat, but he rush'd in vain:
 Indissolubly firm, around the dead,
 Rank within rank, or buckler buckler spread,
 And hemm'd with bristled spears, the Grecian
 A brazen bulwark, and an iron wood. [stood:
 Great Ajax eyes them with incessant care,
 And in an orb contracts the crowded war,
 Close in their ranks commands the fight to fall,
 And stands the centre and the soul of all:

Fixt on the spot they war, and, wounded, wound;
 A sanguine torrent steep the reeking ground;
 On heaps the Greeks, on heaps the Trojans bled,
 And, thickening round them, rise the hills of dead.

Greece, in close order, and collected might,
 Yet suffers least, and sways the wavering fight;
 Fierce as conflicting fires the combat burns,
 And now it rises, now it sinks, by turns.
 In one thick darkness all the fight was lost;
 The Sun, the Moon, and all th' æthereal host
 Seem'd as extinct: day ravish'd from their eyes,
 And all Heaven's splendours blotted from the skies.
 Such o'er Patroclus' body hung the night,
 The rest in sunshine fought, and open light:
 Unclouded there, th' aerial azure spread,
 No vapour rested on the mountain's head;
 The golden Sun pour'd forth a stronger ray,
 And all the broad expansion flam'd with day.
 Dispers'd around the plain, by fits, they fight,
 And here, and there, their scatter'd arrows light:
 But death and darkness o'er the carcase spread,
 There bur'd the war, and there the mighty bled.

Meanwhile the sons of Nestor in the rear
 (Their fellows routed) toss the distant spear,
 And skirmish wide: so Nestor gave command,
 When from the ships he sent the Pylian band.
 The youthful brothers thus for fame contend,
 Nor knew the fortune of Achilles' friend;
 In thought they view'd him still, with martial joy,
 Glorious in arms, and dealing deaths to Troy.

But round the corpse the heroes pant for breath,
 And thick and heavy grows the work of death:
 O'erlabour'd now, with dust, and sweat, and gore,
 Their knees, their legs, their feet, are cover'd o'er;
 Drops follow drops, the clouds on clouds arise,
 And carnage clogs their hands, and darkness fills their eyes.

As when a slaughter'd bull's yet-reeking hide,
 Strain'd with full force, and tugg'd from side to side,
 The brawny curriers stretch; and labour o'er
 Th' extended surface, drunk with fat and gore:
 So, tugging round the corpse both armies stood;
 The mangled body bath'd in sweat and blood:
 While Greeks and Ilians equal strength employ,
 Now to the ships to force it, now to Troy.

Not Pallas' self, her breast when fury warms,
 Nor he whose anger sets the world in arms,
 Could blame this scene; such rage, such horreur
 reign'd;

Such Jove, to honour the great dead, ordain'd.
 Achilles in his ships at distance lay,
 Nor knew the fatal fortune of the day;
 He, yet unconscious of Patroclus' fall,
 In dust extended under Iliion's wall,
 Expects him glorious from the conquer'd plain,
 And for his wish'd return prepares in vain;
 Though well he knew, to make proud Iliion bend,
 Was more than Heaven had destin'd to his friend;

Perhaps to him: this Thetis had reveal'd;
 The rest, in pity to her son, conceal'd.

Still rag'd the conflict round the hero dead,
 And heaps on heaps by mutual wounds they bled;
 "Curs'd be the man," (ev'n private Greeks would
 "Who dares de-ert this well-disputed day! [say)
 First may the cleaving Earth before our eyes
 Gape wide, and drink our blood for sacrifice!
 First perish all, ere haughty Troy shall boast
 We lost Patroclus, and our glory lost!"

Thus they. While with one voice the Trojans said,

"Grant this day, Jove! or heap us on the dead!"
 Then clash their sounding arms; the clangours
 And shake the brazen concave of the skies. [rise,

Meantime, at distance from the scene of blood,
 The pensive steeds of great Achilles stood;
 Their godlike master slain before their eyes,
 They wept, and shar'd in human miseries.

In vain Automedon now shakes the rein,
 Now plies the lash, and soothes and threats in vain!
 Nor to the fight nor Hellespont they go,
 Restive they stood, and obstinate in woe:

Still as a tomb-stone, never to be mov'd,
 On some good man or woman unprov'd
 Lays its eternal weight; or fix'd as stands
 A marble coursers by the sculptor's hands,
 Plac'd on the hero's grave. Along their face

The big round drops cours'd down with silent pace,
 Conglobing on the dust. Their manes, that late
 Circled their arched necks, and wav'd in state,
 Trail'd on the dust beneath the yoke were spread,
 And prone to earth was hung their languid head:

Nor Jove disdain'd to cast a pitying look,
 While thus relenting to the steeds he spoke:
 "Unhappy coursers of immortal strain!

Exempt from age, and deathless, now in vain;
 Did we your race on mortal man bestow,
 Only, alas! to share in mortal woe?
 For aï! what is there, of inferior birth,

That breathes or creeps upon the dust of earth;
 What wretched creature, of what wretched kind,
 Than man more weak, calamitous, and blind?
 A miserable race! but cease to mourn;

For not by you shall Priam's son be borne
 High on the splendid car: one glorious prize
 He rashly boasts; the rest our will denies.
 Ourselves will swiftness to your nerves impart,
 Ourselves with rising spirits swell your heart.

Automedon your rapid flight shall bear
 Safe to the navy through the storm of war:
 For yet 'tis given to Troy, to ravage o'er
 The field, and spread her slaughters to the shore;

The Sun shall see her conquer, till his fall
 With sacred darkness shades the face of all."
 He said; and, breathing in th' immortal horse
 Excessive spirit, urg'd them to the course;

From their high manes they shake the dust, and
 bear

The kindling chariot through the parted war:
 So flies a vulture through the clamorous train
 Of geese, that scream, and scatter round the plain.
 From danger now with swiftest speed they flew,
 And now to conquest with like speed pursue;

Sole in the seat the charioteer remains,
 Now plies the javelin, now directs the reins:
 Him brave Alcimedon beheld distress,
 Approach'd the chariot, and the chief address:

"What god provokes thee, rashly thus to dare,
 Alone, unaided, in the thickest war?"

Alas! thy friend is slain, and Hector wields
Achilles' arms triumphant in the fields."

" In happy time?" (the charioteer replies)
" The bold Alcimedon now greets my eyes;
No Greck like him the heavenly steeds restrains,
Or holds their fury in suspended reins:
Patroclus, while he liv'd, their rage could tame,
But now Patroclus is an empty name!
To thee I yield the seat, to thee resign
The ruling charge: the task of fight be mine."

He said. Alcimedon, with active heat,
Snatches the reins, and vaults into the seat.
His friend descends. The chief of Troy descri'd,
And call'd Æneas, fighting near his side:
" Lo, to my sight, beyond our hope, restor'd
Achilles' car, deserted of its lord!
The glorious steeds our ready arms invite,
Scarce their weak drivers guide them through the
fight:

Can such opponents stand, when we assail?
Unite thy force, my friend, and we prevail."

The son of Venus to the counsel yields;
Then o'er their backs they spread their solid shields;
With brass refulgent the broad surface shin'd,
And thick bull-hides the spacious concave lin'd.
Then Chromius follows, Aretus succeeds;
Each hopes the conquest of the lofty steeds;
In vain, brave youths, with glorious hopes ye burn,
In vain advance, not fated to return.

Unmov'd, Automedon attends the fight,
Implores th' eternal, and collects his might.
Then turning to his friend, with dauntless mind:
" Oh keep the foaming coursers close behind!
Full on my shoulders let their nostrils blow,
For hard the fight, determin'd is the foe;
'Tis Hector comes! and when he seeks the prize,
War knows no mean: he wins it, or he dies."

Then through the field he sends his voice aloud,
And calls th' Ajaces from the warring crowd,
With great Atrides. " Hither turn," (he said)
" Turn, where distress demands immediate aid;
The dead, encircled by his friends, forego,
And save the living from a fiercer foe.
Unhelp'd we stand, unequal to engage
The force of Hector, and Æneas' rage:
Yet, mighty as they are, my force to prove
Is only mine: th' event belongs to Jove."

He spoke, and high the sounding javelin flung,
Which pass'd the shield of Aretus the young;
It pierc'd his belt, emboss'd with curious art,
Then in the lower belly stuck the dart.
As when a ponderous axe, descending full,
Cleaves the broad forehead of some brawny bull;
Struck 'twixt the horns, he springs with many a bound,

Then tumbling rolls enormous on the ground;
Thus fell the youth, the air his soul receiv'd,
And the spear trembled as his entrails heav'd.

Now at Automedon the Trojan foe
Discharg'd his lance; the meditated blow,
Stooping, he shunn'd; the javelin idly fled,
And his'd innoxious o'er the hero's head:
Deep-rooted in the ground, the forceful spear
In long vibration spent its fury there.
With clashing falchions now the chiefs had clos'd,
But each brave Ajax heard, and interpos'd;
Nor longer Hector with his Trojans stood,
But left their slain companion in his blood:
His arms Automedon divests, and cries,
" Accept, Patroclus, this mean sacrifice!

Thus have I sooth'd my griefs, and thus have paid,
Poor as it is, some offering to thy shade!"

So looks the lion o'er a mangled boar,
All grim with rage, and horrible with gore.
High on the chariot at one bound he sprung,
And o'er his seat the bloody trophies hung.
And now Minerva, from the realms of air,
Descends impetuous, and renews the war;
For, pleas'd at length the Grecian arms to aid,
The lord of thunders sent the blue-ey'd maid,
As when high Jove, denouncing future woe,
O'er the dark clouds extends his purple bow,
(In sign of tempests from the troubled air,
Or from the rage of man, destructive war)
The drooping cattle dread th' impending skies,
And from his half-till'd field the labourer flies;
In such a form the goddess round her drew
A livid cloud, and to the battle flew.

Assuming Phoenix' shape, on Earth she falls,
And in his well-known voice to Sparta calls:
" And lies Achilles' friend, below'd by all,
A prey to dogs, beneath the Trojan wall?
What shame to Greece, for future times to tell,
To thee, the greatest, in whose cause he fell!"
" O chief! oh father!" (Atreus' son replies)
" O full of days! by long experience wise!
What more desires my soul, than here, unmov'd,
To guard the body of the man I lov'd?
Ah! would Minerva send me strength to rear
This weary'd arm, and ward the storm of war!
But Hector, like the rage of fire, we dread,
And Jove's own glories blaze around his head."

Pleas'd to be first of all the powers address,
She breathes new vigour in her hero's breast,
And fills with keen revenge, with fell despatch,
Desire of blood, and rage, and lust of fight.
So burns the vengeful hornet (soul all o'er!)
Repuls'd in vain, and thirsty still of gore,
(Bold son of air and heat!) on angry wings
Untam'd, untir'd, he turns, attacks, and stings.
Fir'd with like ardour fierce Atrides flew,
And sent his soul with every lance he threw.

There stood a Trojan, not unknown to fame,
Eëtion's son, and Podes was his name,
With riches honour'd, and with courage blest,
By Hector lov'd, his comrade, and his guest;
Through his broad belt the spear a passage found,
And, ponderous as he falls, his arms resound.
Sudden at Hector's side Apollo stood,
Like Phenops, Asius' son, appear'd the god,
(Asius the great, who held his wealthy reign
In fair Abydos, by the rolling main:) [in fame!
" Oh prince," (he cried) " oh foremost once
What Grecian now shall tremble at thy name?

Dest thou at length to Menelaus yield,
A chief once thought no terror of the field;
Yet singly, now, the long disputed prize
He bears victorious, while our army flies!
By the same arm illustrious Podes bled;
The friend of Hector, unreveng'd, is dead!"
This heard, o'er Hector spreads a cloud of woe,
Rage lifts his lance, and drives him on the foe.

But now th' eternal shook his sable shield,
That shaded Ith, and all the subject field,
Beneath its ample verge. A rolling cloud
Involv'd the mount; the thunder roar'd aloud;
Th' affrighted hills from their foundations nod,
And blaze beneath the lightnings of the god:
At one regard of his all-seeing eye,
The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors fly.

Then trembled Greece. The flight Penelcus
For, as the brave Boeotian turn'd his head [led :
To face the foe, Polydamas drew near,
And ras'd his shoulder with a shorten'd spear :
By Hector wounded, Leitus quits the plain,
Piere'd through the wrist ; and raging with the Grasps his once formidable lance in vain. [pain,

As Hector follow'd, Idomen address
The flaming javelin to his manly breast ;
The brittle point before his corselet yields ;
Exulting Troy with clamour fills the fields :
High on his chariot as the Cretan stood,
The son of Priam whirl'd the missive wood ;
But, erring from its aim, th' impetuous spear
Struck to the dust the squire and charioteer
Of martial Merion : Coeranus his name,
Who left fair Lyctus for the fields of fame.
On foot bold Merion fought ; and now, laid low,
Had grac'd the triumphs of his Trojan foe ;
But the brave squire the ready coursers brought,
And with his life his master's safety bought.
Between his cheek and ear the weapon went,
The teeth it shatter'd, and the tongue it rent.
Prone from the seat he tumbles to the plain ;
His dying hand forgets the falling rein :
This Merion reaches, bending from the car,
And urges to desert the hopeless war ;
Idomeneus consents, the lash applies,
And the swift chariot to the navy flies.

Nor Ajax less the will of Heaven descry'd,
And conquest shifting to the Trojan side,
Turn'd by the hand of Jove. Then thus begun,
To Atreus' seed, the godlike Telamon :

" Alas ! who sees not Jove's almighty hand
Transfers the glory to the Trojan band ?
Whether the weak or strong discharge the dart,
He guides each arrow to a Grecian heart :
Not so our spears : incessant though they rain,
He suffers every lance to fall in vain.
Deserted of the god, yet let us try
What human strength and prudence can supply ;
If yet this honour'd corpse, in triumph borne,
May glad the fleets that hope not our return,
Who tremble yet, scarce rescu'd from their fates,
And still hear Hector thundering at their gates.
Some hero too must be dispatch'd, to bear
The mournful message to Pelides' ear ;
Be sure he knows not, distant on the shore,
His friend, his lov'd Patroclus, is no more.
But such a chief I spy not through the host :
The men, the steeds, the armies, all are lost
In general darkness—Lord of earth and air !
Oh king ! oh father ! hear my humble prayer :
Dispel this cloud, the light of Heaven restore ;
Give me to see, and Ajax asks no more :
If Greece must perish, we thy will obey,
But let us perish in the face of day !"

With tears the hero spoke, and at his prayer
The god relenting, clear'd the clouded air ;
Forth burst the Sun with all-enlightening ray ;
The blaze of armour flash'd against the day.
Now, now, Atrides ! cast around thy sight ;
If yet Antilochus survives the fight,
Let him to great Achilles' ear convey
The fatal news—Atrides hastes away.

So turns the lion from the nightly fold,
Though high in courage, and with hunger bold,
Long gall'd by herdsmen, and long vex'd by hounds :

Stiff with fatigue, and fretted sore with wounds ;

The darts fly round him from an hundred hands,
And the red terrors of the blazing brands :
Till late, reluctant, at the dawn of day
Sour he departs, and quits th' untasted prey.
So mov'd Atrides from his dangerous place
With weary limbs, but with unwilling pace ;
The foe, he fear'd, might yet Patroclus gain,
And much admonish'd, much adjur'd, his train :
" O guard these relics, to your charge consign'd.
And bear the merits of the dead in mind ;
How skill'd he was in each obliging art ;
The mildest manners, and the gentlest heart :
He was, alas ! but fate decreed his end ;
In death a hero, as in life a friend !"

So parts the chief ; from rank to rank he flew,
And round on all sides sent his piercing view.
As the bold bird, endued with sharpest eye
Of all that wing the mid aerial sky,
The sacred eagle, from his walks above
Looks down, and sees the distant thicket move ;
Then stoops, and, sousing on the quivering hare,
Snatches his life amid the clouds of air.
Not with less quickness, his exerted sight
Pass'd this, and that way, through the ranks of
fight :

Till on the left the chief he sought, he found,
Cheering his men, and spreading deaths around.

To him the king : " Belov'd of Jove ! draw near,
For sadder tidings never touch'd thy ear ;
Thy eyes have witness'd, what a fatal turn !
How Ilium triumphs, and th' Achaians mourn ;
This is not all : Patroclus, on the shore
Now pale and dead, shall succour Greece no more.
Fly to the fleet, this instant fly, and tell
The sad Achilles, how his lov'd one fell :
He too may haste the naked corpse to gain ;
The arms are Hector's, who despoil'd the slain."

The youthful warrior heard with silent woe,
From his fair eyes the tears began to flow ;
Big with the mighty grief, he strove to say
What sorrow dictates, but no word found way.
To brave Laodocus his arms he flung,
Who near him wheeling, drove his steeds along ;
Then ran the mournful message to impart,
With tear-ful eyes, and with dejected heart.

Swift fled the youth : nor Menelaüs stands,
(Though sore distrest) to aid the Pylian hands ;
But bids bold Thrasymede those troops sustain ;
Himself returns to his Patroclus slain.

" Gone is Antilochus" (the hero said)
" But hope not, warriors, for Achilles' aid :
Though fierce his rage, unbounded be his woe,
Unarm'd he fights not with the Trojan foe.
'Tis in our hands alone our hopes remain ;
'Tis our own vigour must the dead regain,
And save ourselves, while with impetuous hate
Troy pours along, and this way rolls our fate."

" 'Tis well," (said Ajax ;) " be it then thy care,
With Merion's aid, the weighty corpse to rear ;
Myself and my bold brother will sustain
The shock of Hector and his charging train :
Nor fear we armies, fighting side by side ;
What Troy can dare, we have already try'd,
Have try'd it and have stood." The hero said ;
High from the ground the warriors raised the dead.

A general clamour rises at the sight :
Loud shout the Trojans, and renew the fight.
Not fiercer rush along the gloomy wood,
With rage insatiate and with thirst of blood,

Voracious hounds, that many a length before
 Their furious hunters drive the wounded boar;
 But, if the savage turns his glaring eye,
 They howl aloof, and round the forest fly.
 Thus on retreating Greece the Trojans pour,
 Wave their thick falcions, and their javelins shower:

But, Ajax turning, to their fears they yield,
 All pale they tremble, and forsake the field.

While thus aloft the hero's corpse they bear,
 Behind them rages all the storm of war;
 Confusion, tumult, horror, o'er the throng
 Of men, steeds, chariots, urg'd the rout along:
 Less fierce the winds with rising flames conspire,
 To whelm some city under waves of fire;
 Now sink in gloomy clouds the proud abodes;
 Now crack the blazing temples of the gods;
 The rumbling torrent through the ruin rolls,
 And sheets of smoke mount heavy to the poles.
 The heroes sweat beneath their honour'd load:
 As when two mules, along the rugged road,
 From the steep mountain with exerted strength
 Drag some vast beam, or mast's unwieldy length;

Inly they groan, big drops of sweat distil,
 Th' enormous timber lumbering down the hill:
 So these—Behind, the bulk of Ajax stands,
 And breaks the torrent of the rushing bands.
 Thus, when a river swell'd with sudden rains
 Spreads his broad waters o'er the level plains,
 Some interposing hill the stream divides,
 And breaks its force, and turns the winding tides.
 Still close they follow, close the rear engage;
 Æneas storms, and Hector foams with rage:
 While Greece a heavy, thick retreat maintains,
 Wedg'd in one body, like a flight of cranes,
 That shriek incessant while the falcon, hung
 High on pois'd pinions, threatens their callow
 young.

So from the Trojan chiefs the Grecians fly,
 Such the wild terror and the mingled cry:
 Within, without the trench, and all the way,
 Stow'd in bright heaps, their arms and armour
 Such horror Jove impress! yet still proceeds [lay;
 The work of death, and still the battle bleeds,

THE ILIAD,

BOOK XVIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE GRIEF OF ACHILLES, AND NEW ARMOUR MADE HIM BY VULCAN.

THE news of the death of Patroclus is brought to Achilles by Antilochus. Thetis, hearing his lamentations, comes with all her sea-nymphs to comfort him. The speeches of the mother and son on this occasion. Iris appears to Achilles by the command of Juno, and orders him to show himself at the head of the detachments.

The sight of him turns the fortune of the day, and the body of Patroclus is carried off by the Greeks. The Trojans call a council, where Hector and Polydamas disagree in their opinions; but the advice of the former prevails, to remain encamped in the field. The grief of Achilles over the body of Patroclus.

Thetis goes to the palace of Vulcan, to obtain new arms for her son. The description of the wonderful works of Vulcan; and lastly, that noble one of the shield of Achilles.

The latter part of the nine and twentieth day, and the night ensuing, take up this book. The scene is at Achilles's tent, on the sea-shore, from whence it changes to the palace of Vulcan.

Thus, like the rage of fire, the combat burns!
 And now it rises, now it sinks, by turns.
 Meanwhile, where Hellespont's broad waters flow,
 Stood Nestor's son, the messenger of woe:
 There sat Achilles, shaded by his sails,
 On hoisted yards extended to the gales;
 Pensive he sat; for all that fate design'd
 Rose in sad prospect to his boding mind.
 Thus to his soul he said: "Ah! what constrains
 The Greeks late victors now to quit the plains?
 Is this the day, which Heaven so long ago
 Ordain'd, to sink me with the weight of woe?
 (So Thetis warn'd) when by a Trojan hand
 The bravest of the Myrmidonian band
 Should lose the light? Fulfill'd is that decree?
 Fall'n is the warrior, and Patroclus he?
 In vain I charg'd him soon to quit the plain,
 And warn'd to shun Hector's force in vain!"

Thus while he thinks, Antilochus appears,
 And tells the melancholy tale with tears:
 "Sad tidings, son of Peleus! thou must hear;
 And wretched I, th' unwilling messenger!
 Dead is Patroclus! for his corpse they fight,
 His naked corpse; his arms are Hector's right."

A sudden horror shot through all the chief,
 And wrapt his senses in the cloud of grief;
 Cast on the ground, with furious hands he spread
 The scorching ashes o'er his graceful head;
 His purple garments, and his golden hairs,
 Those he deforms with dust, and these he tears:
 On the hard soil his groaning breast he threw,
 And roll'd and grovel'd, as to earth he grew.
 The virgin captives, with disorder'd charms
 (Won by his own, or by Patroclus' arms)
 Rush'd from the tents with cries; and, gathering
 round,

Beat their white breasts, and fainted on the
 ground:

While Nestor's son sustains a manlier part,
 And mourns the warrior with a warrior's heart;
 Hangs on his arms, amidst his frantic woe,
 And oft prevents the meditated blow.

Far in the deep abysses of the main,
 With hoary Nereus, and the watery train,
 The mother goddess from her crystal throne
 Heard his loud cries, and answer'd groan for groan.

The circling Nereids with their mistress weep,
 And all the sea-green sisters of the deep.
 Thalia, Glauce (every watery name)
 Nessæ mild, and silver Spio came:

Cymothœ and Cymodocë were nigh,
 And the blue languish of soft Alia's eye.
 Their locks Actæa and Limnoria rear,
 Then Proto, Doris, Panope, appear,
 Thoa, Perusa, Doto, Melita;
 Agave gentle, and Amphithoë gay;
 Next Callianira, Callianassa, show
 Their sister looks; Dexamene the slow,
 And swift Dynamene, now cut the tides:
 Iera now the verdant wave divides.
 Nemertes with Apseudes lifts the head,
 Bright Galatea quits her pearly bed;
 These Orythia, Clymene, attend,
 Mara, Amphinome, the train extend;
 And black Janira, and Janassa fair,
 And Amatheia with her amber hair.
 All these, and all that deep in ocean held
 Their sacred seats, the glimmering grotto fill'd;
 Each beat her ivory breast with silent woe,
 Till Thetis' sorrows thus began to flow:
 "Hear me, and judge, ye sisters of the main!
 How just a cause has Thetis to complain!
 How wretched, were I mortal, were my fate!
 How more than wretched in th' immortal state!
 Sprung from my bed a godlike hero came,
 The bravest far that ever bore the name;
 Like some fair olive, by my careful hand
 He grew, he flourish'd, and adorn'd the land:
 To Troy I sent him: but the Fates ordain
 He never, never must return again.
 So short a space the light of Heaven to view,
 So short, alas! and fill'd with anguish too.
 Hear how his sorrows echo through the shore!
 I cannot ease them, but I must deplore;
 I go at least to bear a tender part,
 And mourn my lov'd one with a mother's heart."
 She said, and left the caverns of the main,
 All bath'd in tears; the melancholy train
 Attend her way. Wide-opening part the tides,
 While the long pomp the silver wave divides.
 Approaching now, they touch'd the Trojan land;
 Then, two by two, ascended up the strand.
 The immortal mother, standing close beside
 Her mournful offspring, to his sighs reply'd;
 Along the coast their mingled clamours ran,
 And thus the silver-footed dame began:
 "Why mourns my son? thy late preferr'd request
 The god has granted, and the Greeks distreat:
 Why mourns my son? thy anguish let me share;
 Reveal the cause, and trust a parent's care."
 He, deeply groaning—"To this cureless grief
 Not ev'n the thunderer's favour brings relief.
 Patroclus—Ah!—say, goddess, can I boast
 A pleasure now? revenge itself is lost;
 Patroclus, lov'd of all my martial train,
 Beyond mankind, beyond myself, is slain!
 Lost are those arms the gods themselves bestow'd
 On Peleus; Hector bears the glorious load.
 Curs'd be that day, when all the powers above
 Thy charms submitted to a mortal love:
 O hadst thou still, a sister of the main,
 Pursued the pleasures of the watery reign!
 And happier Peleus, less ambitious, led
 A mortal beauty to his equal bed!
 Ere the sad fruit of thy unhappy womb
 Had caus'd such sorrows past, and woes to come.
 For soon, alas! that wretched offspring slain,
 New woes, new sorrows, shall create again.
 'Tis not in fate th' alternate now to give;
 Patroclus dead, Achilles hates to live:

Let me revenge it on proud Hector's heart,
 Let his last spirit smoke upon my dart;
 On these conditions will I breathe: till then,
 I blush to walk among the race of men."
 A flood of tears at the goddess shed,
 "Ah then, I see thee dying, see thee dead!
 When Hector falls, thou Jy'st."—"Let Hector die,
 And let me fall!" (Achilles made reply)
 "Far lies Patroclus from his native plain!
 He fell, and falling, wish'd my aid in vain.
 Ah then, since from this miserable day
 I cast all hope of my return away;
 Since, unreveng'd, a hundred ghosts demand
 The fate of Hector from Achilles' hand;
 Since here, for brutal courage far renown'd,
 I live an idle burden to the ground
 (Others in council fam'd for nobler skill,
 More useful to preserve, than I to kill)
 Let me—But oh! ye gracious powers above!
 Wrath and revenge from men and gods remove:
 Far, far too dear to every mortal breast,
 Sweet to the soul as honey to the taste;
 Gathering like vapours of a noxious kind
 From fiery blood, and darkening all the mind.
 Me Agamemnon urg'd to deadly hate;
 'Tis past—I quell it; I resign to fate.
 Yes—I will meet the murderer of my friend;
 Or (if the gods ordain it) meet my end.
 The stroke of fate the bravest cannot shun;
 The great Alcides, Jove's unequal'd son,
 To Juno's hate at length resign'd his breath,
 And sunk the victim of all-conquering death.
 So shall Achilles fall! stretch'd pale and dead,
 No more the Grecian hope, or Trojan dread!
 Let me, this instant, rush into the fields,
 And reap what glory life's short harvest yields.
 Shall I not force some widow'd dame to tear
 With frantic hands her long dishevell'd hair?
 Shall I not force her breast to heave with sighs,
 And the soft tears to trickle from her eyes?
 Yes, I shall give the fair those mournful charms—
 In vain you hold me—Hence!—My arms, my arms!
 Soon shall the sanguine torrent spread so wide,
 That all shall know Achilles swells the tide."
 "My son," (cerulean Thetis made reply,
 To fate submitting with a secret sigh)
 "The host to succour, and thy friends to save,
 Is worthy thee; the duty of the brave.
 But canst thou naked issue to the plains?
 Thy radiant arms the Trojan foe detains;
 Insulting Hector bears the spoils on high,
 But vainly glories, for his fate is nigh.
 Yet, yet awhile, thy generous ardour stay;
 Assur'd I meet thee at the dawn of day,
 Charg'd with refulgent arms, (a glorious load)
 Vulcanian arms, the labour of a god."
 Then turning to the daughters of the main,
 The goddess thus dismiss'd her azure train:
 "Ye sister Nereids! to your deeps descend;
 Haste, and our father's sacred seat attend;
 I go to find the architect divine,
 Where vast Olympus' starry summits shine:
 So tell our hoary sire"—This charge she gave:
 The sea-green sisters plunge beneath the wave:
 Thetis once more ascends the blest abodes,
 And treads the brazen threshold of the gods."
 And now the Greeks, from furious Hector's force,
 Urg'd to broad Hellespont their headlong course:
 Nor yet their chiefs Patroclus' body bore
 Safe through the tempest to the tented shore.

The horse, the foot, with equal fury join'd,
 Pour'd on the rear, and thunder'd close behind;
 And, like a flame through fields of ripen'd corn,
 The rage of Hector o'er the ranks was borne.
 Thrice the slain hero by the foot he drew;
 Thrice to the skies the Trojan clamours flew:
 As oft th' Ajaces his assault sustain;
 But check'd, he turns; repuls'd, attacks again;
 With fiercer shouts his lingering troops he fires,
 Nor yields a step, nor from his post retires:
 So watchful shepherds strive to force, in vain,
 The hungry lion from a carcass slain.
 Ev'n yet Patroclus had he borne away,
 And all the glories of th' extended day:
 Had not high Juno from the realms of air,
 Secret, dispatch'd her trusty messenger.
 The various goddess of the showery bow,
 Shot in a whirlwind to the shore below;
 To great Achilles at his ships she came,
 And thus began the many-colour'd dame:
 "Rise, son of Peleus! rise divinely brave!
 Assist the combat, and Patroclus save:
 For him the slaughter to the fleet they spread,
 And fall by mutual wounds around the dead.
 To drag him back to Troy the foe contends:
 Nor with his death the rage of Hector ends:
 A prey to dogs he dooms the corpse to lie,
 And marks the place to fix his head on high.
 Rise, and prevent (if yet you think of fame!)
 Thy friend's disgrace, thy own eternal shame!
 "Who sends thee, goddess! from th' ethereal Achilles thus. And Iris thus replies: [skies?]"
 "I come, Pelides! from the queen of Jove,
 Th' immortal empress of the realms above;
 Unknown to him who sits remote on high,
 Unknown to all the synod of the sky.
 "Thou com'st in vain," he cries, (with fury warm'd)
 "Arms I have none, and can I fight unarm'd?
 Unwilling as I am, of force I stay,
 Till Thetis bring me, at the dawn of day,
 Vulcanian arms: what other can I wield;
 Except the mighty Telamonian shield?
 That, in my friend's defence, has Ajax spread,
 While his strong lance around him heaps the dead:
 The gallant chief defends Menœtius' son,
 And does, what his Achilles should have done."
 "Thy want of arms" (said Iris) "well we know,
 But though unarm'd, yet clad in terrors, go!
 Iet but Achilles o'er yon trench appear,
 Proud Troy shall tremble, and consent to fear:
 Greece from one glance of that tremendous eye
 Shall take new courage, and disdain to fly."
 She spoke, and pass'd in air. The hero rose;
 Her ægis Pallas o'er his shoulder throws;
 Around his brows a golden cloud she spread;
 A stream of glory flam'd above his head.
 As when from some beleagu'rd town arise
 The smokes, high-curling to the shaded skies (Seen from some island, o'er the main afar,
 When men distress hang out the sign of war);
 Soon as the Sun in ocean hides his rays,
 Thick on the hills the flaming beacons blaze;
 With long-projected beams the seas are bright,
 And Heaven's high arch reflects the ruddy light:
 So from Achilles' head the splendours rise,
 Reflecting blaze on blaze against the skies.
 Forth march'd the chief, and distant from the crowd,
 High on the rampart rais'd his voice aloud;
 With her own shout Minerva swells the sound;
 Troy starts astonish'd, and the shores rebound.

As the loud trumpet's brazen mouth from far
 With shrilling clangour sounds th' alarm of war,
 Struck from the wall, the echoes float on high,
 And the round bulwarks and thick towers reply;
 So high his brazen voice the hero rear'd;
 Hosts drop their arms, and trembled as they heard;
 And back the chariots roll, and coursers bound,
 And steeds and men lie mingled on the ground.
 Aghast they see the living lightnings play,
 And turn their eye-balls from the flashing ray.
 Thrice from the trench his dreadful voice he rear'd;
 And thrice they fled, confounded and amaz'd.
 Twelre, in the tumult wedg'd, untimely rush'd
 On their own spears, by their own chariots crush'd.
 While, shielded from the darts, the Greeks obtain
 The long-contended carcass of the slain.

A lofty bier the breathless warrior bears:
 Around, his sad companions melt in tears.
 But chief Achilles, bending down his head,
 Pours unavailing sorrows o'er the dead,
 Whom late triumphant, with his steeds and car,
 He sent refulgent to the field of war;
 (Unhappy change!) now senseless, pale, he foat
 Stretch'd forth, and gash'd with many a gaping wound.

Meantime, unweary'd with his heavenly way,
 In ocean's waves th' unwilling light of day
 Quench'd his red orb, at Juno's high command,
 And from their labours eas'd th' Achaian band.
 The frighted Trojans (panting from the war,
 Their steeds unharness'd from the weary car)
 A sudden council call'd: each chief appear'd
 In haste, and standing; for to sit they fear'd.
 'Twas now no season for prolong'd debate;
 They saw Achilles, and in him their fate.
 Silent they stood: Polydamas at last,
 Skill'd to discern the future by the past,
 The son of Panthus, thus express'd his fears;
 (The friend of Hector, and of equal years:
 The self-same night to both a being gave,
 One wise in council, one in action brave):

"In free debate, my friends, your sentence speak;
 For me, I move, before the morning break,
 To raise our camp: too dangerous here our post,
 Far from Troy walls, and on a naked coast.
 I deem'd not Greece so dreadful, while, engag'd
 In mutual feuds, her king and hero rag'd;
 Then, while we hop'd our armies might prevail,
 We boldly camp'd beside a thousand sail.
 I dread Pelides now: his rage of mind
 Not long continues to the shores confin'd,
 Nor to the fields, where long in equal fray
 Contending nations won and lost the day;
 For Troy, for Troy, shall henceforth be the strife,
 And the hard contest not for fame, but life.
 Haste then to Ilium, while the favouring night
 Detains those terrors, keeps that arm from
 fight;

If but the morrow's Sun behold us here,
 That arm, those terrors, we shall feel, nor fear;
 And hearts that now disdain, shall leap with joy,
 If Heaven permit them then to enter Troy.
 Let not my fatal prophecy be true,
 Nor what I tremble but to think, ensue.
 Whatever be our fate, yet let us try
 What force of thought and reason can supply:
 Let us on counsel for our guard depend:
 The town, her gates and bulwarks shall defend:
 When morning dawns, our well-appointed powers,
 Array'd in arms, shall line the lofty towers.

at the fierce hero then, when fury calls,
 set his mad vengeance on our rocky walls,
 fetch a thousand circles round the plain,
 if his spent coursers seek the fleet again:
 may his rage be tir'd, and labour'd down:
 ad dogs shall tear him ere he sack the town."
 "Return?" (said Hector, fir'd with stern disdain)
 What! coop whole armies in our walls again?
 'as't not enough, ye valiant warriors say,
 ine years imprison'd in those towers ye lay?
 'ide o'er the world was Ilium fam'd of old or brass exhaustless, and for mines of gold:
 at while inglorious in her walls we stay'd,
 unk were her treasures, and her stores decay'd;
 he Phrygians now her scatter'd spoils enjoy,
 ad proud Mæonia wastes the fruits of Troy.
 great Jove at length my arms to conquest calls, ad shuts the Grecians in their wooden walls:
 h'rt thou dispirit whom the gods incite;
 flies any Trojan? I shall stop his flight.
 fo better counsel then attention lend;
 fake due refreshment, and the watch attend.
 If there be one whose riches cost him care,
 Forth let him bring them for the troops to share;
 'tis better generously bestow'd on those,
 Than left the plunder of our country's foes.
 Soon as the morn the purple orient warms,
 Fierce on you navy we will pour our arms;
 If great Achilles rise in all his might,
 His be the danger. I shall stand the fight.
 Honour, ye gods! or let me gain, or give!
 And live he glorious, whosoe'er shall live!
 Man is our common lord, alike to all:
 And oft the victor triumphs, but to fall."
 The shouting host in loud applauses join'd:
 So Pallas robb'd the many of their mind;
 To their own sense condemn'd, and left to chuse
 The worst advice, the better to refuse.

While the long night extends her sable reign,
 Around Patroclus mourn'd the Grecian train.
 Stern in superior grief Pelides stood;
 Those slaughtering arms, so us'd to bathe in blood,
 Now clasp'd his clay cold limbs: then gushing start
 The tears, and sighs burst from his swelling heart.
 The lion thus, with dreadful anguish stung,
 Roars through the desert, and demands his young:
 When the grim savage, to his rifled den
 Too late returning, snuffs the track of men,
 And o'er the vales and o'er the forest bounds;
 His clamorous grief the bellowing wood resounds.
 So grieves Achilles; and impetuous vents
 To all his Myrmidons his loud laments.
 "In what vain promise, gods! did I engage,
 When, to console Menæteus' feeble age,
 I vow'd his much-lov'd offspring to restore,
 Charg'd with rich spoils, to fair Opontia's shore?
 But mighty Jove cuts short, with just disdain,
 The long, long vicis of poor, designing man!
 One fate the warrior and the friend shall strike,
 And Troy's black sands must drink our blood alike:
 Me too a wretched mother shall deplore,
 An aged father never see me more!
 Yet, my Patroclus! yet a space I stay,
 Then swift pursue thee on the darksome way.
 Ere thy dear relics in the grave are laid,
 Shall Hector's head be offer'd to thy shade;
 That, with his arms, shall hang before thy shrine;
 And twelve the noblest of the Trojan line,
 Sacred to vengeance, by this hand expire,
 Their lives effus'd around thy flaming pyre.

Thus let me lie till then! thus, closely prest,
 Bathe thy cold face, and sob upon thy breast!
 While Trojan captives here thy mourners stay,
 Weep all the night, and murmur all the day:
 Spoils of my arms, and thine; when, wasting wide,
 Our swords kept time, and conquer'd side by side."
 He spoke, and bade the sad attendants round
 Cleanse the pale corpse, and wash each honour'd
 A massy caldron of stupendous frame [wound.
 They brought, and plac'd it o'er the rising flame:
 Then heap the lighted wood; the flame divides
 Beneath the vase, and climbs around the sides:
 In its wide womb they pour the rushing stream:
 The boiling water bubbles to the brim.
 The body then they bathe with pious toil,
 Embalm the wounds, anoint the limbs with oil,
 High on a bed of state extended laid,
 And decent cover'd with a linen shade;
 Last o'er the dead the milk-white veil they threw;
 That done, their sorrows and their sighs renew.
 Meanwhile to Juno, in the realms above,
 (His wife and sister) spoke almighty Jove:
 "At last thy will prevails: great Peleus' son
 Rises in arms: such grace thy Greeks have won.
 "Say," (for I know not) "is their race divine,
 And thou the mother of that martial line?" [plies,
 "What words are these," (th' imperial dame re-While anger flash'd from her majestic eyes)
 "Succour like this a mortal arm might lend,
 And such success mere human wit attend:
 And shall not I, the second power above,
 Heaven's queen, and consort of the thundering Jove,
 Say, shall not I, one nation's fate command,
 Not wreak my vengeance on one guilty land?"
 So they. Meanwhile the silver-footed dame
 Reach'd the Vulcanian dome, eternal frame!
 High eminent amid the works divine,
 Where Heaven's far-beaming brazen mansions shine.

There the lame architect the goddess found,
 Obscure in smoke, his forges flaming round,
 While bath'd in sweat from fire to fire he flew;
 And puffing loud, the roaring bellows blew.
 That day no common task his labour claim'd:
 Full twenty tripods for his hall he fram'd,
 That, plac'd on living wheels of massy gold
 (Wondrous to tell!) instinct with spirit roll'd
 From place to place, around the blest abodes,
 Self-mov'd, obedient to the beck of gods:
 For their fair handles now, o'erwrought with flowers,

In moulds prepar'd, the glowing ore he pours.
 Just as responsive to his thought the frame
 Stood prompt to move, the azure goddess came:
 Charis, his spouse, a grace divin'ay fair
 (With purple fillets round her braided hair)
 Observ'd her entering! her soft hand she press'd,
 And, smiling, thus the watery queen address'd:
 "What, goddess! this unusual favour draws?
 All hail, and welcome! whosoe'er the cause:
 Till now a stranger, in a happy hour
 Approach, and taste the dainty of the bower."
 High on a throne, with stars of silver grac'd,
 And various artifice, the queen she plac'd:
 A footstool at her feet; then, calling, said,
 "Vulcan, draw near: 'tis Thetis asks your aid."
 "Thetis," (reply'd the god) "our powers may
 An ever-dear, an ever-honour'd name! [claim
 When my proud mother hurl'd me from the sky
 (My awkward form, it seems, displeas'd her eye)

She and Eurynome my griefs redrest,
 And soft receiv'd me on their silver breast.
 Ev'n then, these arts employ'd my infant thought;
 Chains, bracelets, pendants, all their toys, I wrought.

Nine years kept secret in the dark abode,
 Secure I lay, conceal'd from man and god:
 Deep in a cavern'd rock my days were led;
 The rushing ocean murmur'd o'er my head.
 Now, since her presence glads our mansion, say,
 For such desert what service can I pay?
 Vouchsafe, O Thetis! at our board to share
 The genial rites, and hospitable fare;
 While I the labours of the forge forego,
 And bid the roaring bellows cease to blow."

Then from his anvil the lame artist rose;
 Wide with distorted legs oblique he goes,
 And stills the bellows, and (in order laid)
 Locks in their chests his instruments of trade.
 Then with a sponge the sooty workman drest
 His brawny arms imbrown'd, and hairy breast.
 With his huge sceptre grac'd, and red attire,
 Came halting forth the sovereign of the fire!
 The monarch's steps two female forms uphold,
 That mov'd, and breath'd, in animated gold;
 To whom was voice, and sense, and science given
 Of works divine, (such wonders are in Heaven!)
 On these supported, with unequal gait,
 He reach'd the throne where pensive Thetis
 sat;

There, plac'd beside her on the shining frame,
 He thus address'd the silver-footed dame:
 "Thee, welcome goddess! what occasion calls
 (So long a stranger) to these honour'd walls?
 'Tis thine, fair Thetis, the command to lay,
 And Vulcan's joy and duty to obey."

To whom the mournful mother thus replies,
 (The crystal drops stood trembling in her eyes)
 "Oh, Vulcan! say, was ever breast divine
 So pierc'd with sorrows, so o'erwhelm'd, as mine?
 Of all the goddesses, did Jove prepare
 For Thetis only such a weight of care?
 I, only I, of all the watery race,
 By force subjected to a man's embrace,
 Who, sinking now with age and sorrow, pays
 The mighty fine impos'd on length of days.
 Sprung from my bed, a godlike hero came,
 The bravest sure that ever bore the name;
 Like some fair plant, beneath my careful hand,
 He grew, he flourish'd, and he grac'd the land:
 To Troy I sent him! but his native shore
 Never, ah never, shall receive him more;
 (Ev'n while he lives, he wastes with secret woe)
 Nor I, a goddess, can retard the blow!
 Robb'd of the prize the Grecian suffrage gave,
 The king of nations forc'd his royal slave:
 For this he griev'd; and, till the Greeks oppress
 Requir'd his arm, he sorrow'd unredrest.
 Large gifts they promise, and their elders send;
 In vain—he arms not, but permits his friend
 His arms, his steeds, his forces to employ;
 He marches, combats, almost conquers Troy.
 Then, slain by Phœbus (Hector had the name)
 At once resigns his armour, life, and fame.
 But thou, in pity, by my prayer be won:
 Grace with immortal arms this short-liv'd son,
 And to the field in martial pomp restore,
 To shine with glory, till he shines no more!"

To her the artist-god: "Thy griefs resign,
 Secure, what Vulcan can, is ever thine.

O could I hide him from the Fates as well,
 Or with those hands the cruel stroke repel,
 As I shall forge most envy'd arms, the gaze
 Of wondering ages, and the world's amaze!"

Thus having said, the father of the fires
 To the black labours of his forge retires.
 Soon as he bade them blow, the bellows turn'd
 Their iron mouths; and where the furnace burn'd,
 Resounding breath'd: at once the blast expires,
 And twenty forges catch at once the fires;
 Just as the god directs, now loud, now low,
 They raise a tempest, or they gently blow.
 In hissing flames huge silver bars are roll'd,
 And stubborn brass, and tin, and solid gold:
 Before, deep fix'd, th' eternal anvils stand;
 The ponderous hammer loads his better hand,
 His left with tongs turns the vex'd metal round,
 And thick, strong strokes, the doubling vaults re-
 bound.

Then first he form'd th' immense and solid shield;
 Rich various artifice emblaz'd the field;
 Its utmost verge a threefold circle bound;
 A silver chain suspends the massy round;
 Five ample plates the broad expanse compose,
 And godlike labours on the surface rose.
 There shone the image of the master-mind:
 There Earth, there Heaven, there Ocean, he design'd;

Th' unweari'd Sun, the Moon completely round;
 The starry lights that Heaven's high convex crown'd;
 The Pleiads, Hyads, with the northern Team;
 And great Orion's more refulgent beam;
 To which, around the axle of the sky,
 The Bear revolving points his golden eye,
 Still shines exalted on th' ethereal plain,
 Nor bathes his blazing forehead in the main.

Two cities radiant on the shield appear,
 The image one of peace, and one of war.
 Here sacred pomp and genial feast delight,
 And solemn dance, and hymeneal rite;
 Along the street the new-made brides are led,
 With torches flaming, to the nuptial bed:
 The youthful dancers in a circle bound
 To the soft flute, and cittern's silver sound:
 Through the fair streets, the matrons in a row
 Stand in their porches, and enjoy the show.

There, in the forum swarm a numerous train,
 The subject of debate, a townsman slain:
 One pleads the fine-discharg'd, which one deny'd,
 And bade the public and the laws decide:
 The witness is produc'd on either hand:
 For this, or that, the partial people stand:
 Th' appointed heralds still the noisy bands,
 And form a ring, with sceptres in their hands,
 On seats of stone, within the sacred place,
 The reverend elders nodded o'er the case;
 Alternate, each th' attesting sceptre took,
 And, rising solemn, each his sentence spoke.
 Two golden talents lay amidst, in sight,
 The prize of him who best adjudg'd the right.

Another part (a prospect differing far)
 Glow'd with refulgent arms, and horrid war.
 Two mighty hosts a leaguer'd town embrace,
 And one would pillage, one would burn the place.
 Meantime the townsmen, arm'd with silent care,
 A secret ambush on the foe prepare:
 Their wives, their children, and the watchful band
 Of trembling parents, on the turrets stand.
 They march; by Pallas and by Mars made bold:
 Gold were the gods, their radiant garments gold,

And gold their armour: these the squadron led,
 August, divine, superior by the head!
 A place for ambush fit, they found, and stood
 Cover'd with shields, beside a silver flood.
 Two spies at distance lurk, and watchful seem
 If sheep or oxen seek the winding stream.
 Soon the white flocks proceeded o'er the plains,
 And steers slow moving, and two shepherd swains;
 Behind them, piping on their reeds, they go,
 Nor fear an ambush, nor suspect a foe.
 In arms the glittering squadron rising round,
 Rush sudden; hills of slaughter heap the ground;
 Whole flocks and herds lie bleeding on the plains,
 And, all amidst them, dead, the shepherd swains!
 The bellowing oxen the besiegers hear;
 They rise, take horse, approach, and meet the war;
 They fight, they fall beside the silver flood;
 The waving silver seem'd to bluish with blood.
 There tumult, there contention, stood confest;
 One rear'd a dagger at a captive's breast,
 One held a living foe, that freshly bled
 With new-made wounds; another dragg'd a dead;
 Now here, now there, the carcasses they tore:
 Fate stalk'd amidst them, grim with human gore.
 And the whole war came out, and met the eye;
 And each bold figure seem'd to live, or die.

A field deep-furrow'd next, the god design'd,
 The third time labour'd by the sweating hind;
 The shining shares full many ploughmen guide,
 And turn their crooked yokes on every side:
 Still as at either end they wheel around,
 The master meets them with his goblet crown'd;
 The hearty draught renews, renews their toil,
 Thru back the turning plough-shares cleave the soil:
 Behind, the rising earth in ridges roll'd:
 And sable look'd, though form'd of molten gold.

Another field rose high with waving grain,
 With bended sickles stand the reaper-train:
 Here, stretch'd in ranks, the levell'd swarths are found, [ground,
 Sheaves heap'd on sheaves here thicken up the
 With sweeping stroke the mowers strow the lands;
 The gatherers follow, and collect in bands;
 And last the children, in whose arms are borne
 (Too short to gripe them) the brown sheaves of corn.

The rustic monarch of the field descries,
 With silent glee, the heaps around him rise.
 A ready banquet on the turf is laid,
 Beneath an ample oak's expanded shade.
 The victim ox the sturdy youth prepare;
 The reaper's due repast, the women's care.

Next, ripe in yellow gold, a vineyard shines,
 Bent with the ponderous harvest of its vines;
 A deeper dye the dangling clusters show,
 And, curl'd on silver props, in order glow;
 A darker metal mixt, intrench'd the place;
 And pales of glittering tin th' enclosure grace,
 To this, one path-way gently-winding leads,
 Where march a train with baskets on their heads (Fair maids, and blooming youths) that smiling
 bear

The purple product of th' autumnal year,
 To these a youth awakes the warbling strings,
 Whose tender lay the fate of Linus sings;
 In measur'd dance behind him move the train,
 Tune soft the voice, and answer to the strain,
 Here, herds of oxen march, erect and bold,
 Rear high their horns, and seem to low in gold,
 And speed to meadows, on whose sounding shores
 A rapid torrent through the rushes roars:

Four golden herdsmen as their guardians stand,
 And nine sour dogs complete the rustic band,
 Two lions rushing from the wood appear'd,
 And seiz'd a bull, the master of the herd:
 He roar'd: in vain the dogs, the men, withstood;
 They tore his flesh, and drank the sable blood.
 The dogs (oft cheer'd in vain) desert the prey,
 Dread the grim terrors, and at distance bay.

Next this, the eye the art of Vulcan leads Deep through fair forests, and a length of meads;
 And stalls, and folds, and scatter'd cots between;
 And fleecy flocks, that whiten all the scene.

A figur'd dance succeeds: such once was seen
 In lofty Gnossus; for the Cretan queen,
 Form'd by Dædalean art: a comely band
 Of youths and maidens, bounding hand in hand.
 The maids in soft cymars of linen drest;
 The youths all graceful in the glossy veat:
 Of those the locks with flowery wreaths enroll'd;
 Of these the sides adorn'd with swords of gold,
 That, glittering gay, from silver belts depend.
 Now all at once they rise, at once descend
 With well-taught feet: now shape, in oblique ways,
 Confus'dly regular, the moving maze:
 Now forth at once, too swift for sight, they spring,
 And undistinguish'd blend the flying ring:
 So whirls a wheel, in giddy circle tost,
 And rapid as it runs, the single spokes are lost.
 The gazing multitudes admire around,
 Two active tumblers in the centre bound;
 Now high, now low, their pliant limbs they bend:
 And general songs the sprightly revel end.

Thus the broad shield complete the artist crown'd
 With his last hand, and pour'd the ocean round:
 In living silver seem'd the waves to roll,
 And beat the buckler's verge, and bound the whole,

This done, whate'er a warrior's use requires,
 He forg'd the cuirass that outshines the fires.
 The greaves of ductile tin, the helm imprest
 With various sculpture, and the golden crest.
 At Thetis feet the finish'd labour lay;
 She, as a falcon, cuts th' aerial way,
 Swift from Olympus' snowy summit flies,
 And bears the blazing present through the skies,

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XIX.

ARGUMENT.

THE RECONCILIATION OF ACHILLES AND AGAMEMNON.

THETIS brings to her son the armour made by Vulcan. She preserves the body of his friend from corruption, and commands him to assemble the army, to declare his resentment at an end. Agamemnon and Achilles are solemnly reconciled: the speeches, presents, and ceremonies, on that occasion. Achilles is with great difficulty persuaded to refrain from the battle till the troops have refreshed themselves, by the advice of Ulysses. The presents are conveyed to the tent of Achilles; where Briseis laments over the body of Patroclus. The hero obstinately refuses all repast, and gives himself up to lamentation for his friend. Minerva descends to strengthen him, by the order of Jupiter. He arms for the fight: his appearance described. He addresses himself to his horses, and reproaches them with the death of Patroclus. One of them is miraculously endued with voice, and inspired to prophesy his fate; but the hero, not astonished by that prodigy, rushes with fury to the combat.

The thirtieth day. The scene is on the sea-shore.

Soon as Aurora heav'd her orient head
Above the waves, that blush'd with early red
(With new-born day to gladden mortal sight,
And gild the courts of Heaven with sacred light)
Th' immortal arms the goddess-mother bears
Swift to her son: her son she finds in tears
Stretch'd o'er Patroclus' corpse; while all the rest
The sovereign's sorrows in their own express.
A ray divine her heavenly presence shed,
And thus, his hand soft-touching, Thetis said:
" Suppress (my son) this rage of grief, and know

It was not man, but Heaven, that gave the blow;
Behold what arms by Vulcan are bestow'd?
Arms worthy thee, or fit to grace a god."
Then drops the radiant burden on the ground;
Clang the strong arms, and ring the shores around:
Back shrink the Myrmidons with dread surprise,
And from the broad effulgence turn'd their eyes.
Unmov'd, the hero kindles at the show,
And feels with rage divine his bosom glow;
From his fierce eye-balls living flames expire,
And flash incessant like a stream of fire;
He turns the radiant gift; and feeds his mind
On all th' immortal artist had design'd.

" Goddess!" (he cry'd) " these glorious arms,
that shine

With matchless art, confess the hand divine.
Now to the bloody battle let me bend:
But ah! the relics of my slaughter'd friend!
In whose wide wounds through which his spirit fled,
Shall flies, and worms obscene pollute the dead?"

" That unavailing care be laid aside,"

(The azure goddess to her son reply'd)
" Whole years untouched, uninjur'd, shall remain,
Fresh as in life, the carcase of the slain.
But go, Achilles (as affairs require)
Before the Grecian peers renounce thine ire:
Then uncontrol'd in boundless war engage,
And Heaven with strength supply the mighty rage!"

Then in the nostrils of the slain she pour'd
Nectareous drops, and rich ambrosia shower'd
O'er all the corpse. The flies forbid their prey,
Untouch'd it rests, and sacred from decay.
Achilles to the strand obedient went:
The shores resounded with the voice he sent.
The heroes heard, and all the naval train
That tend the ships, or guide them o'er the main,
Alarm'd, transported, at the well-known sound,
Frequent and full, the great assembly crown'd;

Studious to see that terrour of the plain,
Long lost to battle, shine in arms again.
Tydides and Ulysses first appear,
Lame with their wounds, and leaning on the spear;
These on the sacred seats of council plac'd,
The king of men, Atides, came the last:
He too sore wounded by Agenor's son.
Achilles (rising in the midst) begun:

" Oh monarch! better far had been the fate
Of thee, of me, of all the Grecian state,
If, (ere the day when by mad passion sway'd,
Rash we contended for the black-ey'd maid)
Preventing Dian had dispatch'd her dart,
And shot the shining mischief to the heart:
Then many a hero had not press'd the shore,
Nor Troy's glad fields been fatten'd with our gore:
Long, long shall Greece the woes we caus'd bewail,
And sad posterity repeat the tale.

But this, no more the subject of debate,
Is past, forgotten, and resign'd to fate:
Why should, alas! a mortal man, as I,
Burn with a fury that can never die?
Here then my anger ends; let war succeed,
And ev'n as Greece has bled, let Ilion bleed.
Now call the hosts, and try, if in our sight
Troy yet shall dare to camp a second night?
I deem their mightiest, when this arm be known,
Shall 'scape with transport, and with joy repose."

He said: his finish'd wrath with loud acclaim
The Greeks accept, and shout Pelides' name.
When thus, not rising from his lofty throne,
In state unmov'd, the king of men begun:

" Hear me, ye sons of Greece! with silence hear!
And grant your monarch an impartial ear;
A while your loud, untimely joy suspend,
And let your rash, injurious clamours end:
Unruly murmurs, or ill-tim'd applause,
Wrong the best speaker, and the justest cause.
Nor charge on me, ye Greeks, the dire debate:
Know, angry Jove, and all-compelling Fate,
With fell Eriyns, urg'd my wrath that day
When from Achilles' arms I forc'd the prey.
What then could I against the will of Heaven?
Not by myself, but vengeful Atë driven;
She, Jove's dread daughter, fated to infest
The race of mortals, enter'd in my breast.
Not on the ground that haughty fury treads,
But prints her lofty footsteps on the heads
Of mighty men; inflicting as she goes
Long festering wounds, inextricable woes!
Of old, she stalk'd amid the bright abodes;
And Jove himself, the sire of men and gods,
The world's great ruler, felt her venom'd dart;
Deceiv'd by Juno's wiles, and female art.
For when Alcmena's nine long months were run,
And Jove expected his immortal son:
To gods and goddesses th' unruly joy
He show'd, and vaunted of his matchless boy:
' From us' (he said) ' this day an infant springs
Fated to rule, and born a king of kings.'
Saturnia ask'd an oath, to vouch the truth,
And fix'd dominion on the favour'd youth.
The thunderer, unsuspecting of the fraud,
Pronounc'd those solemn words that bind a god.
The joyful goddess from Olympus' height,
Swift to Achaian Argos bent her flight;
Scarce seven moons gone, lay Sthenelus's wife;
She push'd her lingering infant into life;
Her charms Alcmena's coming labours stay,
And stop the babe, just issuing to the day.

Then bids Saturnius bear his oath in mind ;
 'A youth,' (said she) 'of Jove's immortal kind,
 Is this day born : from Sthenelus he springs,
 And claims thy promise to be king of kings,
 Grief seiz'd the thunderer, by his oath engag'd ;
 Stang to the soul, he sorrow'd, and he rag'd.
 From his ambrosial head, where perch'd she sate,
 He snatch'd the fury-goddess of debate,
 The dread, th' irrevocable oath he swore,
 Th' immortal seats should ne'er behold her more ;
 And whirl'd her headlong down, for ever driven
 From bright Olympus and the starry Heaven :
 Thence on the nether world the fury fell ;
 Ordain'd with man's contentious race to dwell.
 Full oft the god his son's hard toils bemoan'd,
 Curs'd the dire fury, and in secret groan'd.
 Ev'n thus, like Jove himself, was I misled,
 While raging Hector heap'd our camps with dead.
 What can the errors of my rage atone ?
 My martial troops, my treasures, are thy own :
 This instant from the navy shall be sent
 Whate'er Ulysses promis'd at thy tent :
 But thou ! appeas'd, propitious to our prayer,
 Resume thy arms, and shine again in war."

"O king of nations ! whose superiour sway"
 (Retarus Achilles) "all our hosts obey !

To keep or send the presents, be thy care ;
 To us, 'tis equal : all we ask is war.
 While yet we talk, or but an instant shun
 The fight, our glorious work remains undone.
 Let every Greek, who sees my spear confound
 The Trojan ranks, and deal destruction round,
 With emulation what I act survey,
 And learn from thence the business of the day."

The son of Peleus thus : and thus replies
 The great in councils, Ithacus the wise :
 "Though, godlike, thou art by no toils oppress'd,
 At least our armies claim repast and rest :
 Long and laborious must the combat be,
 When by the gods inspir'd, and led by thee.
 Strength is deriv'd from spirits and from blood,
 And those augment by generous wine and food :
 What boastful son of war, without that stay,
 Can last a hero through a single day ?
 Courage may prompt ; but, ebbing out his strength,
 Mere unsupported man must yield at length ;
 Shrunken with dry famine, and with toils declin'd,
 The drooping body will desert the mind :
 But built anew with strength-conferring fare,
 With limbs and soul untam'd, he tires a war.
 Dismiss the people then, and give command,
 With strong repast to hearten every band ;
 But let the presents to Achilles made
 In full assembly of all Greece be laid.
 The king of men shall rise in public sight,
 And solemn swear (observant of the rite)
 That, spotless as she came, the maid removes,
 Pure from his arms and guiltless of his loves.
 That done, a sumptuous banquet shall be made,
 And the full price of injur'd honour paid.
 Stretch not henceforth, O prince ! thy sovereign might
 Beyond the bounds of reason and of right ;
 'Tis the chief praise that e'er to kings belong'd,
 To right with justice whom with power they wrong'd."

To him the monarch : "Just is thy decree,
 Thy words give joy, and wisdom breathes in thee,
 Each due atonement gladly I prepare ;
 And Heaven regard me as I justly swear !

Here then a while let Greece assembled stay,
 Nor great Achilles grudge this short delay :
 Till from the fleet our presents be convey'd,
 And, Jove attesting, the firm compact made.
 A train of noble youths the charge shall bear ;
 These to select, Ulysses, be thy care :
 In order rank'd let all our gifts appear,
 And the fair train of captives close the rear :
 Talthybius shall the victim boar convey,
 Sacred to Jove, and you bright orb of day."

"For this" (the stern Æacides replies)
 "Some less important season may suffice,
 When the stern fury of the war is o'er,
 And wrath extinguish'd burns my breast no more.
 By Hector slain, their faces to the sky,
 All grim with gaping wounds our heroes lie :
 Those call to war ! and might my voice incite,
 Now, now, this instant, should commence the
 fight :

Then, when the day's complete, let generous bowls
 And copious banquets glad your weary souls.
 Let not my palate know the taste of food,
 Till my insatiate rage be cloy'd with blood :
 Pale lies my friend with wounds disfigur'd o'er,
 And his cold feet are pointed to the door.
 Revenge is all my soul ! no meaner care,
 Interest, or thought, has room to harbour there ;
 Destruction be my feast, and mortal wounds,
 And scenes of blood, and agonizing sounds."

"O first of Greeks," (Ulysses thus rejoind)
 "The best and bravest of the warrior kind !
 Thy praise it is in dreadful camps to shine,
 But old experience and calm wisdom mine,
 Then hear my counsel, and to reason yield,
 The bravest soon are satiate of the field ;
 Though vast the heaps that strow the crimson
 plain,

The bloody harvest brings but little gain :
 The scale of conquest ever wavering lies,
 Great Jove but turns it, and the victor dies !
 The great, the bold, by thousands daily fall,
 And endless were the grief, to weep for all.
 Eternal sorrows what avails to shed ?
 Greece honours not with solemn fasts the dead :
 Enough, when death demands the brave, to pay
 The tribute of a melancholy day.
 One chief with patience to the grave resign'd,
 Our care devolves on others left behind.
 Let generous food supplies of strength produce,
 Let rising spirits flow from sprightly juice,
 Let their warm heads with scenes of battle glow,
 And pour new furies on the feebler foe.
 Yet a short interval, and none shall dare
 Expect a second summons to the war ;
 Who waits for that, the dire effect shall find,
 If trembling in the ships he lags behind.
 Embodied, to the battle let us bend,
 And all at once on haughty Troy descend."

And now the delegates Ulysses sent,
 To bear the presents from the royal tent.
 The sons of Nestor, Phyleus' valiant heir,
 Thias and Merion, thunderbolts of war,
 With Lycomedes of Creontian strain,
 And Melanippus, form'd the chosen train.
 Swift as the word was given, the youths obey'd ;
 Twice ten bright vases in the midst they laid ;
 A row of six fair tripods then succeeds :
 And twice the number of high bounding steeds :
 Seven captives next a lovely line compose ;
 The eighth Briseis, like the blooming rose,

Clos'd the bright band : great Ithacus, before,
 First of the train, the golden talents bore :
 The rest in public view the chiefs dispose,
 A splendid scene ! then Agamemnon rose :
 The boar Talthybius held : the Grecian lord
 Drew the broad cutlass, sheath'd beside his sword :
 The stubborn bristles from the victim's brow
 He crops, and offering meditates his vow.
 His hands uplifted to th' attesting skies,
 On Heaven's broad marble roof were fix'd his eyes ;
 The solemn words a deep attention draw,
 And Greece around sat thrill'd with sacred awe.

"Witness, thou first ! thou greatest power above !
 All-good, all-wise, and all-surviving Jove !
 And mother Earth, and Heaven's revolving light,
 And ye, fell furies of the realms of night,
 Who rule the dead, and horrid woes prepare
 For perjurd kings, and all who falsely swear !
 The black-ey'd maid inviolate removes,
 Pure and unconscious of my manly loves !
 If this be false, Heaven all its vengeance shed,
 And level'd thunder strike my guilty head !"

With that, his weapon deep inflicts the wound ;
 The bleeding savage tumbles to the ground ;
 The sacred herald rolls the victim slain
 (A feast for fish) into the foaming main.

Then thus Achilles : "Hear ye Greeks ! and know
 What'er we feel, 'tis Jove inflicts the woe :
 Not else Atrides could our rage inflame,
 Nor from my arms, unwilling, force the dame.
 'Twas Jove's high will alone, o'er-ruling all,
 That doom'd our strife, and doom'd the Greeks to fall.

Go then, ye chiefs ! indulge the genial rite !
 Achilles waits you, and expects the fight."

The speedy council at his word adjourn'd :
 To their black vessels all the Greeks return'd.
 Achilles sought his tent. His train before [bore.
 March'd onward ; bending with the gifts they
 Those in the tents the 'squires industrious spread :
 The foaming coursers to the stalls they led ;
 To their new seats the female captives move :
 Briseis, radiant as the queen of love,
 Slow as she past, beheld with sad survey,
 Where, gash'd with cruel wounds, Patroclus lay :
 Prone on the body fell the heavenly fair,
 Beat her sad breast, and tore her golden hair ;
 All beautiful in grief, her humid eyes
 Shining with tears she lifts, and thus she cries :

"Ah, youth for ever dear, for ever kind,
 Once tender friend of my distracted mind !
 I left thee fresh in life, in beauty gay !
 Now find thee cold, inanimated clay !
 What woes my wretched race of life attend !
 Sorrows on sorrows, never doom'd to end !
 The first lov'd consort of my virgin-bed
 Before these eyes in fatal battle bled !
 My three brave brothers in one mournful day,
 All trod the dark irremediable way :
 Thy friendly hand uprear'd me from the plain,
 And dry'd my sorrows for a husband slain ;
 Achilles' care you promis'd I should prove,
 The first, the dearest partner of his love ;
 That rites divine should ratify the band,
 And make me empress in his native land,
 Accept these grateful tears ! for thee they flow,
 For thee, that ever felt another's woe !"

Her sister captives echoed groan for groan,
 Nor mourn'd Patroclus' fortunes, but their own :

The leaders press'd the chief on every side ;
 Unmov'd, he heard them, and with sighs deny'd :
 "If yet Achilles have a friend, whose care
 Is bent to please him, this request forbear :
 Till yonder Sun descend, ah let me pay
 To grief and anguish one abstemious day."

He spoke, and from the warriors turn'd his face ;
 Yet still the brother kings of Atreus' race,
 Nestor, Idomeneus, Ulysses sage,
 And Phœnix, strive to calm his grief and rage :
 His rage they calm not, nor his grief control ;
 He groans, he raves, he sorrows from his soul.
 "Thou too, Patroclus !" (thus his heart he vents)

"Once spread th' inviting banquet in our tents :
 Thy sweet society, thy winning care,
 Once staid Achilles, rushing to the war.
 But now, alas ! to death's cold arms resign'd,
 What banquets but revenge can glad my mind ?
 What greater sorrow could afflict my breast,
 What more, if hoary Peleus were deceas'd ?
 Who now, perhaps, in Phthia dreads to hear
 His son's sad fate, and drops a tender tear.
 What more, should Neoptolemus the brave
 (My only offspring) sink into the grave ?
 If yet that offspring lives (I distant far,
 Of all neglectful, wage a hateful war.)
 I could not this, this cruel stroke attend ;
 Fate claim'd Achilles, but might spare his friend.
 I hop'd Patroclus might survive, to rear
 My tender orphan with a parent's care.
 From Schyros isle conduct him o'er the main,
 And glad his eyes with his paternal reign,
 The lofty palace, and the large domain ;
 For Peleus breathes no more the vital air,
 Or drags a wretched life of age and care,
 But till the news of my sad fate invades
 His hastening soul, and sinks him to the shades."

Sighing he said. His grief the heroes join'd ;
 Each stole a tear for what he left behind.
 Their mingled grief the sire of Heaven survey'd ;
 And thus, with pity, to his blue-cy'd maid :
 "Is then Achilles now no more thy care,
 And dost thou thus desert the great in war ?
 Lo, where you sail's their canvass wings extend,
 All comfortless he sits, and wails his friend :
 Ere thirst and want his forces have oppress,
 Haste, and infuse ambrosia in his breast."

He spoke : and sudden, at the word of Jove,
 Shot the descending goddess from above.
 So swift through ether the shrill harpy springs,
 The wide air floating to her ample wings.
 To great Achilles she her flight address,
 And pour'd divine ambrosia in his breast.
 With nectar sweet (refection of the gods !)
 Then, swift ascending, sought the bright abodes.

Now issued from the ships the warrior train,
 And, like a deluge, pour'd upon the plain.
 As when the piercing blasts of Boreas blow,
 And scatter o'er the fields the driving snow ;
 From dusky clouds the fleecy winter flies,
 Whose dazzling lustre whitens all the skies :
 So helms succeeding helms, so shields from shields
 Catch the quick beams, and brighten all the fields ;
 Broad-glittering breast-plates, spears with pointed rays,

Mix in one stream, reflecting blaze on blaze :
 Thick beats the centre as the coursers bound,
 With splendour flame the skies, and laugh the fields around.

Full in the midst, high-towering o'er the rest,
His limbs in arms divine Achilles drest ;
Arms which the father of the fire bestow'd,
For'd on th' eternal anvils of the god.
Grief and revenge his furious heart inspire ;
His glowing eye-balls roll with living fire ;
He grinds his teeth ; and, furious with delay,
O'erlooks the embattled host, and hopes the bloody day.

The silver cuirasses first his thighs infold :
Then o'er his breast was brac'd the hollow gold :
The brazen sword a various baldrick ty'd,
That, starr'd with gems, hung glittering at his side ;
And, like the Moon, the broad refulgent shield
Blaz'd with long rays, and gleam'd athwart the field.

So to night-wandering sailors, pale with fears,
Wide o'er the watery waste, a light appears,
Which, on the far-seen mountain blazing high,
Streams from some lonely watch-tower to the
sky :

With mournful eyes they gaze, and gaze again ;
Loud bows the storm, and drives them o'er the main.

Next, his high head the helmet grac'd ; behind
The sweepy crest hung floating in the wind :
Like the red star, that from his flaming hair
Shakes down diseases, pestilence, and war ;
So stream'd the golden honours from his head,
Trembled the sparkling plumes, and the loose glories shed.

The chief beholds himself with wondering eyes ;
His arms he poises, and his motions tries ;
Buoy'd by some inward force, he seems to swim,
And feels a pinion lifting every limb.

And now he shakes his great paternal spear, Ponderous and huge ! which not a Greek could rear.

From Pelion's cloudy top an ash entire
Old Chiron fell'd, and shap'd it for his sire ;
A spear which stern Achilles only wields,
The death of heroes, and the dread of fields.

Automedon and Alcimus prepare
Th' immortal coursers and the radiant car
(The silver traces sweeping at their side ;)
Their fiery mouths resplendent bridles ty'd,
The ivory-studded reins, return'd behind,
Wav'd o'er their backs, and to the chariot join'd.
The charioteer then whirl'd the lash around,
And swift ascended at one active bound,
All bright in heavenly arms, above his squire
Achilles mounts, and sets the field on fire ;
Not brighter Phœbus, in th' æthereal way,
Flames from his chariot, and restores the day :
High o'er the host all terrible he stands,
And thunders to his steeds these dread commands :

" Xanthus and Balius ! of Podargus' strain
(Unless ye boast that heavenly race in vain)
Be swift, be mindful of the load ye bear,
And learn to make your master more your care :
Through falling squadrons bear my slaughtering sword,

Nor, as ye left Patroclus, leave your lord."

The generous Xanthus, as the words he said,
Semi'd sensible of woe, and droop'd his head :
Trembling he stood before the golden mane,
And bow'd to dust the honours of his mane,
When, strange to tell ! (so Juno will'd) he broke
Eternal silence, and portentous spake.

" Achilles ! yes ! this day at least we bear
Thy raging safety through the files of war :
But come it will, the fatal time must come,
Nor our's the fault, but God decrees thy doom.
Not through our crime, or slowness in the course,
Fell thy Patroclus, but by heavenly force ;
The bright far-shooting god who gilds the day
(Confest we saw him) tore his arms away.
No—could our swiftness o'er the winds prevail,
Or beat the pinions of the western gale,
All were in vain—the Fates thy death demand,
Due to a mortal and immortal hand."

Then ceas'd for ever, by the Furies ty'd,
His fateful voice. Th' intrepid chief reply'd,
With unabated rage—" So let it be !
Portents and prodigies are lost on me.
I know my fate, to die, to see no more
My much-lov'd parents, and my native shore—
Enough—when Heaven ordains, I sink in night ;
Now perish Troy !" he said, and rush'd to fight.

BOOK XX.

ARGUMENT.

THE BATTLE OF THE GODS, AND THE ACTS OF ACHILLES.

JUPITER, upon Achilles's return to the battle, calls a council of the gods, and permits them to assist either party. The terrors of the battle described when the deities are engaged. Apollo encourages Æneas to meet Achilles. After a long conversation these two heroes encounter ; but Æneas is preserved by the assistance of Neptune.
Achilles falls upon the rest of the Trojans, and is upon the point of killing Hector, but Apollo conveys him away in a cloud. Achilles pursues the Trojans with a great slaughter.

The same day continues. The scene is in the field before Troy.

Thus round Pelides breathing war and blood,
Greece, sheath'd in arms, beside her vessels stood ;
While, near impending from a neighbouring
height,

Troy's black battalions wait the shock of fight.
Then Jove to Themis gives command, to call
The gods to council in the starry hall :
Swift o'er Olympus' hundred hills she flies,
And summons all the senate of the skies.
These shining on, in long procession come
To Jove's eternal adamantine dome.
Not one was absent, not a rural power,
That haunts the verdant gloom, or rosy bower ;
Each fair-hair'd Dryad of the shady wood,
Each azure sister of the silver flood ;
All but old Ocean, hoary sire ! who keeps
His ancient seat beneath the sacred deeps.

On marble thrones with lucid columns crown'd
 (The work of Vulcan) sat the powers around.
 Ev'n he! whose trident aways the watery reign,
 Heard the loud summons, and forsook the main,
 Assum'd his throne amid the bright abodes,
 And question'd thus the sire of men and gods:

"What moves the god who Heaven and Earth
 commands,

And grasps the thunder in his awful hands,
 Thus to convene the whole etherial state?
 Is Greece and Troy the subject in debate?
 Already met, the lowering hosts appear,
 And death stands ardent on the edge of war."

"'Tis true," (the cloud-compelling power replies)

"This day, we call the council of the skies
 In care of human race; ev'n Jove's own eye
 Sees with regret unhappy mortals die.
 Far on Olympus' top in secret state
 Ourselves will sit, and see the hand of fate
 Work out our will. Celestial powers! descend,
 And, as your minds direct, your succour lend
 To either host. Troy soon must lie o'erthrown,
 If uncontrol'd Achilles fights alone:
 Their troops but lately durst not meet his eyes;
 What can they now, if in his rage he rise?
 Assist them, gods! or Ilion's sacred wall
 May fall this day, though fate forbids the fall."
 He said, and fir'd their heavenly breasts with rage:

On adverse parts the warring gods engage.
 Heaven's awful queen; and he whose azure round
 Girds the vast globe; the maid in arms renown'd;
 Hermes, of profitable arts the sire;
 And Vulcan, the black sovereign of the fire!
 These to the fleet repair with instant flight;
 The vessels tremble as the gods alight.
 In aid of Troy, Latona, Phoebus, came,
 Mars fiery-helm'd, the laughter-loving dame,
 Xanthus, whose streams in golden currents flow,
 And the chaste huntress of the silver bow.
 Ere yet the gods their various aid employ,
 Each Argive bosom swell'd with manly joy,
 While great Achilles (terror of the plain)
 Long lost to battle, shone in arms again.
 Dreadful he stood in front of all his host;
 Pale Troy beheld, and seem'd already lost;
 Her bravest heroes pant with inward fear,
 And trembling see another god of war.

But when the powers descending swell'd the
 fight,

Then tumult rose; fierce rage and pale affright
 Varied each face; then discord sounds alarms,
 Earth echoes, and the nations rush to arms.
 Now through the trembling shores Minerva calls,
 And now she thunders from the Grecian walls.
 Mars, hovering o'er his Troy, his terrors shrouds
 In gloomy tempests, and a night of clouds:
 Now through each Trojan heart he fury pours
 With voice divine, from Ilion's topmost towers:
 Now shouts to Simois from her beauteous hill;
 The mountain shook, the rapid streams stood still.
 Above, the sire of gods his thunder rolls,
 And peals on peals redoubled rend the poles.
 Beneath, stern Neptune shakes the solid ground;
 The forests wave, the mountains nod around;
 Through all their summits tremble Ida's woods,
 And from their sources boil her hundred floods.

¹ Neptune.

Troy's turrets totter on the rocking plain;
 And the toss'd navies beat the heaving main.
 Deep in the dismal regions of the dead,
 Th' infernal monarch rear'd his horrid head,
 Leap'd from his throne, lest Neptune's arm should lay

His dark dominions open to the day,
 And pour in light on Pluto's drear abodes,
 Abhor'd by men, and dreadful ev'n to gods.

Such war th' immortals wage: such horrors
 rend

The world's vast concave, when the gods contend.
 First silver-shafted Phœbus took the plain
 Against blue Neptune, monarch of the main:
 The god of arms his giant bulk display'd,
 Oppos'd to Pallas, war's triumphant maid.
 Against Latona march'd the son of May;
 The quiver'd Dian, sister of the day,
 (Her golden arrows sounding at her side)
 Saturnia, majesty of Heaven, defy'd.
 With fiery Vulcan last in battle stands
 The sacred flood that rolls on golden sands;
 Xanthus his name with those of heavenly birth,
 But call'd Scamander by the sons of Earth.

While thus the gods in various league engage,
 Achilles glow'd with more than mortal rage:
 Hector he sought; in search of Hector turn'd
 His eyes around, for Hector only burn'd;
 And burst like lightning through the ranks, and
 To glut the god of battles with his blood: [vow'd

Æneas was the first who dar'd to stay;
 Apollo wedg'd him in the warrior's way,
 But swell'd his bosom with undaunted might,
 Half-forc'd, and half-persuaded, to the fight.
 Like young Lycaon, of the royal line,
 In voice and aspect, seem'd the power divine;
 And bade the chief reflect, how late with scorn
 In distant threats he brav'd the goddess born.

Then thus the hero of Anchises strain:
 "To meet Pelides, you persuade in vain:
 Already have I met, nor void of fear
 Observ'd the fury of his flying spear;
 From Ida's woods he chas'd us to the field,
 Our force he scatter'd, and our herds he kill'd;
 Lyrnessus, Pedasus, in ashes lay;
 But (Jove assisting) I surviv'd the day;
 Else had I sunk, oppress in fatal fight
 By fierce Achilles and Minerva's might.

Where'er he mov'd, the goddess shone before,
 And bath'd his brazen lance in hostile gore.
 What mortal man Achilles can sustain? [plain,
 Th' immortals guard him through the dreadful
 And suffer not his dart to fall in vain. [power,
 Were god my aid, this arm should check his Though strong in battle as a brazen tower."

To whom the son of Jove: "That god implore,
 And be what great Achilles was before.
 From heavenly Venus thou deriv'st thy strain,
 And he, but from a sister of the main;
 An aged sea-god father of his line,
 But Jove himself the sacred source of thine.
 Then lift thy weapon for a noble blow,
 Nor fear the vaunting of a mortal foe."

This said, and spirit breath'd into his breast,
 Through the thick troops th' embolden'd hero
 prest:

His venturous act the white-arm'd queen survey'd,
 And thus, assembling all the powers, she said:
 "Behold an action, gods, that claims your
 Lo great Æneas rushing to the war; [care;

Against Pelides he directs his course,
Phœbus impels, and Phœbus gives him force.
Restrain his bold career; at least, attend
Our favour'd hero, let some power descend,
To guard his life, and add to his renown,
We, the great armament of Heaven, came down.
Hereafter let him fall, as Fates design,
That spun so short his life's illustrious line;
But, lest some adverse god new cross his way,
Give him to know what powers assist this day:
For how shall mortal stand the dire alarms,
When Heaven's refulgent host appear in arms?"

Thus she: and thus the god whose force o'er
The solid globe's eternal basis shake: (make
"Against the might of man, so feeble known,
Why should celestial powers exert their own?
Suffice, from yonder mount to view the scene,
And leave to war the fates of mortal men.
But if th' armipotent, or god of light,
Obstruct Achilles, or commence the fight,
Thence on the gods of Troy we swift descend:
Full soon, I doubt not, shall the conflict end;
And these, in ruin and confusion hur'd,
Yield to our conquering arms the lower world."

Thus having said, the tyrant of the sea,
Cerulean Neptune, rose, and led the way.
Advanc'd upon the field there stood a mound
Of earth congested, wall'd, and trench'd around;
In older times to guard Alcides made,
(The work of Trojans, with Minerva's aid)
What time a vengeful monster of the main
Swept the wide shore, and drove him to the plain.

Here Neptune and the gods of Greece repair,
With clouds incompass'd, and a veil of air:
The adverse powers, around Apollo laid,
Crown the fair hills that silver Simois shade.
In circle close each heavenly party sate,
Intent to form the future scheme of fate;
But mix not yet in fight, though Jove on high
Gives the loud signal, and the Heavens reply.

Meanwhile the rushing armies hide the ground;
The trumpet centre yields a hollow sound:
Steads cas'd in mail, and chiefs in armour bright,
The gleamy champaign glows with brazen light.
Amid both hosts (a dreadful space) appear
There, great Achilles, bold Æneas, here.
With towering strides Æneas first advanc'd,
The nodding plumage on his helmet danc'd;
Spread o'er his breast the fencing shield he bore,
And, as he mov'd, his javelin flam'd before.

Not so Pelides: furious to engage,
He rush'd impetuous. Such the lion's rage,
Who, viewing first his foes with scornful eyes,
Though all in arms the peopled city rise,
Stalks careless on, with unregarding pride;
Till at the length, by some brave youth defy'd,
To his bold spear the savage turns alone:
He murmurs fery with an hollow groan;
He grins, he foams, he rolls his eyes around;
Lash'd by his tail, his heaving sides resound;
He calls up all his rage; he grinds his teeth,
Resolv'd on vengeance, or resolv'd on death.
So, fierce Achilles on Æneas flies;
So stands Æneas, and his force defies.

Ever yet the stern encounter join'd, begun
The seed of Thetis thus to Venus' son:
"Why comes Æneas through the ranks so far?
Sucks he to meet Achilles' arm in war,
In hope the realms of Priam to enjoy,
And prove his merits to the throne of Troy?"

Grant that beneath thy lance Achilles dies,
The martial monarch may refuse the prize:
Sons he has many: those thy pride may quell;
And 'tis his fault to love those sons too well.
Or, in reward of thy victorious hand,
Has Troy propos'd some spacious track of land?
An ample forest, or a fair domain,
Of hill for vines, and arable for grain?
Ev'n this, perhaps, will hardly prove thy lot.
But can Achilles be so soon forgot?
Once (as I think) you saw this brandish'd spear,
And then the great Æneas seem'd to fear.
With hearty haste from Ida's mount he fled,
Nor, till he reach'd Lyrnessus, turn'd his head.
Her lofty walls not long our progress staid;
Those, Pallas, Jove, and we, in ruins laid:
In Grecian chains her captive race were cast;
'Tis true, the great Æneas fled too fast.
Defrauded of my conquest once before,
What then I lost, the gods this day restore.
Go; while thou may'st, avoid the threatening fate;
Fools stay to feel it, and are wise too late."

To this Anchises' son: "Such words employ
To one that fears thee, some unwarlike boy;
Such we disdain; the best may be defy'd
With mean reproaches, and unmanly pride;
Unworthy the high race from which we came,
Proclaim'd so loudly by the voice of fame:
Each from illustrious fathers draws his line;
Each goddess-born; half human, half divine.
Thetis, this day, or Venus' offspring, dies,
And tears shall trickle from celestial eyes:
For when two heroes, thus deriv'd, contend,
'Tis not in words the glorious strife can end.
If yet thou farther seek to learn my birth
(A tale resounded through the spacious Earth)
Hear how the glorious origin we prove
From ancient Dardanus, the first from Jove:
Dardania's walls he rais'd; for Ilion then
(The city since of many-languag'd men)
Was not. The natives were content to till
The shady foot of Ida's fountful hill.
From Dardanus, great Erichthonius springs,
The richest once, of Asia's wealthy kings;
Three thousand mares his spacious pastures bred,
Three thousand foals beside their mothers fed.
Boreas, enamour'd of the sprightly train,
Conceal'd his godhead in a flowing mane,
With voice dissembled to his loves he neigh'd,
And cour'd the dappled beauties o'er the mead:
Hence sprung twelve others of arrivall'd kind,
Swift as their mother mares, and father wind.
These, lightly skimming when they swept the plain,
Nor ply'd the grass, nor beat the tender grain;
And when along the level seas they flew,
Scarce on the surface curl'd the briny dew:
Such Erichthonius was: from him there came
The sacred Tros, of whom the Trojan name.
Three sons renown'd adorn'd his nuptial bed,
Ilus, Asaracus, and Ganymed:
The matchless Ganymed, divinely fair,
Whom Heaven, enamour'd, snatch to upper air
To bear the cup of Jove (eternal guest,
The grace and glory of th' ambrosial feast).
The two remaining sons the line divide:
First rose Leomedon from Ilus' side;
From him Tithonius, now in cares grown old,
And Priam (beast with Hector, brave and bold,)
Clytus and Lampos, ever honour'd pair;
And Nicotaoon, thunderbolt of war.

From great Assaracus sprung Cypys, he Begat Anchises, and Anchises me.
 Such is our race: 'tis Fortune gives us birth,
 But Jove alone endues the soul with worth:
 He, source of power and might! with boundless
 All human courage gives, or takes away. [away,
 Long in the field of words we may contend,
 Reproach is infinite, and knows no end,
 Arm'd or with truth or falsehood, right or wrong
 (So voluble a weapon is the tongue)
 Wounded, we wound; and neither side can fail,
 For every man has equal strength to rail:
 Women alone, when in the streets they jar,
 Perhaps excel us in this wordy war;
 Like us they stand, encompass'd with the crowd,
 And vent their anger impotent and loud.
 Cease then—Our business in the field of fight
 Is not to question, but to prove, our might.
 To all those insults thou hast offer'd here,
 Receive this answer: 'tis my flying spear."
 He spoke. With all his force the javelin flung,
 Fix'd deep, and loudly in the buckler rung.
 Far on his out-stretch'd arm, Pelides held
 (To meet the thundering lance) his dreadful shield,
 That trembled as it stuck; nor void of fear
 Saw, ere it fell, th' immeasurable spear.
 His fears were vain; impenetrable charms
 Secur'd the temper of th' ethereal arms.
 Through two strong plates the point its passage held,
 But stopp'd, and rested, by the third repell'd.
 Five plates of various metal, various mould,
 Compos'd the shield; of brass each outward fold,
 Of tin each inward, and the middle gold:
 There stuck the lance. Then rising ere he threw,
 The forceful spear of great Achilles flew,
 And pierc'd the Dardan shield's extremest bound,
 Where the thrill brass return'd a sharper sound:
 Through the thin verge the Pellan weapon glides,
 And the slight covering of expanded hides.
 Æneas his contracted body bends,
 And o'er him high the riven targe extends,
 Sees, through its parting plates, the upper air,
 And at his back perceives the quivering spear:
 A fate so near him chills his soul with fright;
 And swims before his eyes the many-colour'd light.
 Achilles, rushing in with dreadful cries,
 Draws his broad blade, and at Æneas flies:
 Æneas, rousing as the foe came on
 (With force collected) heaves a mighty stone:
 A mass enormous! which in modern days
 No two of Earth's degenerate sons could raise.
 But ocean's god, whose earthquakes rock the
 ground,
 Saw the distress, and mov'd the powers around.
 "Lo! on the brink of fate Æneas stands,
 An instant victim to Achilles' hands;
 By Phœbus urg'd: but Phœbus has bestow'd
 His aid in vain: the man o'erpowers the god.
 And can ye see this righteous chief atone,
 With guiltless blood, for vices not his own?
 To all the gods his constant vows were paid:
 Sure, though he wars for Troy, he claims our aid!
 Fate wills not this; nor thus can Jove resign
 The future father of the Dardan line:
 The first great ancestor obtain'd his grace,
 And still his love descends on all the race;
 For Priam now, and Priam's faithless kind,
 At length are odious to th' all-seeing mind;
 On great Æneas shall devolve the reign,
 And sons succeeding sons the lasting line sustain."

The great Earth-shaker thus: to whom replies
 Th' imperial goddess with the radiant eyes:
 "Good as he is, to immolate or spare
 The Dardan prince, O Neptune, be thy care;
 Pallas and I, by all that gods can bind,
 Have sworn destruction to the Trojan kind;
 Not ev'n an instant to protract their fate,
 Or save one member of the sinking state;
 Till her last flame be quench'd with her last gore,
 And ev'n her crumbling ruins are no more."
 The king of ocean to the fight descends,
 Through all the whistling darts his course he bends,
 Swift interpos'd between the warriors flies,
 And casts thick darkness o'er Achilles' eyes.
 From great Æneas' shield the spear he drew,
 And at his master's feet the weapon threw.
 That done, with force divine he snatch'd on high
 The Dardan prince, and bore him through the sky,
 Smooth-gliding without step, above the heads
 Or warring heroes, and of bounding steeds:
 Till at the battle's utmost verge they light,
 Where the slow Caucas close the rear of fight.
 The godhead there (his heavenly form confess'd)
 With words like these the panting chief address'd:
 "What power, O prince, with force inferior far,
 Urg'd thee to meet Achilles arm in war?
 Henceforth beware, nor antedate thy doom,
 Defrauding fate of all thy fame to come.
 But when the day decreed (for come it must)
 Shall lay this dreadful hero in the dust,
 Let then the furies of that arm be known,
 Secure, no Grecian force transcends thy own."
 With that, he left him, wondering as he lay,
 Then from Achilles chas'd the mist away:
 Sudden, returning with the stream of light,
 The scene of war came rushing on his sight.
 Then thus amaz'd: "What wonders strike my mind!
 My spear, that parted on the wings of wind,
 Laid here before me! and the Dardan lord,
 That fell this instant, vanish'd from my sword!
 I thought alone with mortals to contend,
 But powers celestial sure this foe defend.
 Great as he is, our arm he scarce will try,
 Content, for once, with all his gods, to fly.
 Now then let others bleed."—This said, aloud
 He vents his fury, and inflames the crowd,
 "O Greeks!" (he cries, and every rank alarms)
 "Join battle, man to man, and arms to arms!
 'Tis not in me, though favour'd by the sky,
 To mow whole troops, and make whole armies fly:
 No god can singly such a host engage,
 Not Mars himself, nor great Minerva's rage.
 But whatsoever Achilles can inspire,
 Whate'er of active force, or acting fire:
 Whate'er this heart can prompt, or hand obey;
 All, all, Achilles, Greeks! is yours to-day.
 Through yon wide host this arm shall scatter fear,
 And thin the squadrons with my single spear."
 He said: nor less elate with martial joy,
 The godlike Hector warm'd the troops of Troy:
 "Trojans, to-war! Think Hector leads you on;
 Nor dread the vaunts of Peleus' haughty son.
 Deeds must decide our fate. Ev'n those with words
 Insult the brave, who tremble at their swords:
 The weakest atheist wretch all Heaven defies,
 But shrinks and shudders when the thunder flies.
 Nor from yon boaster shall your chief retire,
 Not though his heart were steel, his hand were fire;

That fire, that steel, your Hector should withstand,
And brave that vengeful heart, that dreadful hand."

Thus (breathing rage through all) the hero said;
A wood of lances rises round his head,
Clamours on clamours tempest all the air,
They join, they throng, they thicken to the war.
But Phœbus warns him from high Heaven to shun
The single fight with Thetis' godlike son;
More safe to combat in the mingled band,
Nor tempt too near the terrors of his hand.
He hears obedient to the god of light,
And, plung'd within the ranks, awaits the fight.

Then fierce Achilles, shouting to the skies,
On Troy's whole force with boundless fury flies,
First falls Iphition, at his army's head;
Brave was the chief, and brave the host he led;
From great Otryntens he deriv'd his blood,
His mother was a Nais of the flood;
Beneath the shades of Tmolus, crown'd with snow,
From Hyde's walls he rul'd the lands below.
Fierce as he springs, the sword his head divides;
The parted visage falls on equal sides:
With loud-echoing arms he strikes the plain;
While thus Achilles glories o'er the slain:
"Lie there, Otryntides! the Trojan earth
Receives thee dead, though Gyges boast thy birth;
These beasteous fields where Hyllus' waves are roll'd,

And pteuous Heranus swells with tides of gold,
Are thine no more?"—th' insulting hero said,
And left him sleeping in eternal shade;
The rolling wheels of Greece the body tore,
And dash'd their axles with no vulgar gore.

Demoleon next, Antenor's offspring, laid
Breathless in dust, the price of rashness paid.
Th' impatient steel, with full-descending way,
Forc'd through his brazen helm its furious way;
Resistless drove the batter'd skull before,
And dash'd and mingled all the brains with gore.
This sees Hippodamas, and, seiz'd with fright,
Deserts his chariot for a swifter flight:
The lance arrests him: an ignoble wound
The passing Trojan rivets to the ground,
He groans away his soul: not louder roars,
At Neptune's shrine on Helice's high shores,
The victim bull: the rocks rebellow round,
And Ocean listens to the grateful sound.

Then fell on Polydore, his vengeful rage,
The youngest hope of Priam's stooping age
(Whose feet for swiftness in the race surpass);
Of all his sons, the dearest, and the last.
To the forbidden field he takes his flight
In the first folly of a youthful knight,
To vaunt his swiftness, wheels around the plain,
But vaunts not long, with all his swiftness slain.
Bruck where the crossing belts unite behind,
And golden rings the double back-plate join'd;
Forth through the navel burst the thrilling steel;
And on his knees with piercing shrieks he fell;
The rushing entrails, pour'd upon the ground,
His hands collect; and darkness wraps him round.
When Hector view'd, all-ghastly in his gore,
Thus sadly slain, th' unhappy Polydore,
A cloud of sorrow overcast his sight;
His soul no longer brook'd the distant sight,
Full in Achilles' dreadful front he came,
And shook his javelin like a waving flame.
The son of Peleus sees, with joy possess'd,
His heart high-bounding in his rising breast:

"And, lo! the man, on whom black fates attend;
The man, that slew Achilles, in his friend!
No more shall Hector's and Pelides' spear
Turn from each other in the walks of war!"
Then with revengeful eyes he scann'd him o'er:
"Come, and receive thy fate!" He spake no more.

Hector, undaunted, thus: "Such words employ
To one that dreads thee, some unwarlike boy:
Such we could give, defying and defy'd,
Mean intercourse of obloquy and pride!
I know thy force to mine superior far;
But Heaven alone confers success in war:
Mean as I am, the gods may guide my dart,
And give it entrance in a braver heart."

Then parts the lance: but Pallas' heavenly breath
Far from Achilles wafts the winged death;
The bidden dart again to Hector flies,
And at the feet of its great master lies.
Achilles closes with his hated foe,
His heart and eyes with flaming fury glow:
But, present to his aid, Apollo shrouds,
The favour'd hero in a veil of clouds.
Thrice struck Pelides with indignant heart,
Thrice in impassive air he plung'd the dart:
The spear a fourth time bury'd in the cloud;
He foams with fury, and exclaims aloud:
"Wretch! thou hast 'cep'd again, euce meto thy flight

Has sav'd thee, and the partial god of light
But long thou shalt not thy just fate withstand,
If any power assist Achilles' hand.
Fly then, inglorious! but thy flight this day
Whole hecatombs of Trojan ghosts shall pay."

With that, he gluts his rage on numbers slain:
Then Dryops tumbled to th' ensanguin'd plain,
Pierc'd through the neck: he left him panting there,
And stopp'd Demochus, great Philotor's heir,
Gigantic chief! deep gasp'd th' enormous blade,
And for the soul an ample passage made.
Laogonus and Dardanus expire,
The valiant sons of an unhappy sire;
Both in one instant from the chariot hur'd,
Sunk in one instant to the nether world;
This difference only their sad fates afford,
That one the spear destroy'd, and one the sword.

Nor less unquy'd young Alastor bleeds,
In vain his youth, in vain his beauty, pleads:
In vain he begs thee with a suppliant's moan,
To spare a form, an age, so like thy own!
Unhappy boy! no prayer, no moving art,
E'er bent that fierce, inexorable heart!
While yet he trembled at his knees, and cry'd,
The ruthless falchion op'd his tender side;
The panting liver pours a flood of gore,
That drowns his bosom till he pants no more.

Through Muller's head then drove th' impetuous
The warrior falls, transfur'd from ear to ear. [spear,
Thy life, Echeclus! next the sword bereaves,
Deep through the front the ponderous falchion
cleaves;

Warm'd in the brain the smoking weapon lies,
The purple death oomes floating o'er his eyes.
Then brave Deucalion dy'd: the dart was stung
Where the knit nerves the pliant elbow strung;
He dropt his arm, an unassisting weight,
And stood all impotent, expecting fate:
Full on his neck the falling falchion sped,
From his broad shoulders hew'd his crested head;
Forth from the bone the spinal marrow flies,
And sunk in dust the corpse extended lies.

Rhigmus, whose race from fruitful Thracia came,
 (The son of Pirtus, an illustrious name)
 Succeeds to fate: the spear his belly rends;
 Prone from his car the thundering chief descends:
 The squire, who saw expiring on the ground
 His prostrate master, rein'd the steeds around:
 His back scarce turn'd, the Pelian javelin gor'd,
 And stretch'd the servant o'er his dying lord.
 As when a flame the winding valley fills,
 And runs on crackling shrubs between the hills;
 Then o'er the stubble up the mountain flies,
 Fires the high woods, and blazes to the skies,
 This way and that the spreading torrent roars;
 So sweeps the hero through the wasted shores:
 Around him wide, immense destruction pours,
 And earth is delug'd with the sanguine showers.
 As, with autumnal harvests cover'd o'er,
 And thick bestrown, lies Ceres' sacred floor;
 When round and round, with never-weary'd pain,
 The trampling steers beat out th' unnumber'd grain:
 So the fierce coursers, as the chariot rolls,
 Tread down whole ranks, and crush out heroes' souls.

[fly,
 Dash'd from their hoofs, while o'er the dead they
 Black, bloody drops the smoking chariot dye:
 The spiky wheels through heaps of carnage tore;
 And thick the groaning axles dropp'd with gore.
 High o'er the scene of death Achilles stood,
 All grim with dust, all horrible in blood:
 Yet still impatient, still with rage on flame;
 Such is the lust of never-dying fame!

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XII.

ARGUMENT.

THE BATTLE IN THE RIVER SCAMANDER.

THE Trojans fly before Achilles, some towards the town, others to the river Scamander: he falls upon the latter with great slaughter; takes twelve captives alive, to sacrifice to the shade of Patroclus; and kills Lycaon and Asteropæus. Scamander attacks him with all his waves; Neptune and Pallas assist the hero; Simois joins Scamander; at length Vulcan, by the instigation of Juno, almost dries up the river. This combat ended, the other gods engage each other. Meanwhile Achilles continues the slaughter, drives the rest into Troy: Agenor only makes a stand, and is conveyed away in a cloud by Apollo; who (to delude Achilles) takes upon him Agenor's shape, and, while he pursues him in that disguise, gives the Trojans an opportunity of retiring into their city.

The same day continues. The scene is on the banks and in the stream of Scamander.

AND now to Xanthus' gliding stream they drove,
 Xanthus, immortal progeny of Jove.

The river here divides the flying train,
 Part to the town fly diverse o'er the plain,
 Where late their troops triumphant bore the fight:
 Now chas'd, and trembling in ignoble flight
 (These with a gather'd mist Saturnia shrouds,
 And rolls behind the rout a heap of clouds).
 Part plunge into the stream: old Xanthus roars,
 The flashing billows beat the whiten'd shores:
 With cries promiscuous all the banks resound:
 And here, and there, in eddies whirling round,
 The founcing steeds and shrieking warriors drow'd,
 As the scorch'd locusts from their fields retire,
 While fast behind them runs the blaze of fire;
 Driv'n from the land before the smoky cloud,
 The clustering legions rush into the flood:
 So, plung'd in Xanthus by Achilles' force,
 Roars the resounding surge with men and horse.
 His bloody lance the hero casts aside
 (Which spreading tamarisks on the margin hide);
 Then, like a god, the rapid billows braves,
 Arm'd with his sword high-brandish'd o'er the waves:

Now down he plunges, now he whirls it round,
 Deep groan'd the waters with the dying sound;
 Repeated wounds the reddening river dy'd,
 And the warm purple circled on the tide.
 Swift through the foamy flood the Trojans fly,
 And close in rocks or winding caverns lie:
 So, the huge dolphin tempesting the main,
 In shoals before him fly the scaly train,
 Confus'dly heap'd they seek their inmost caves,
 Or pant and heave beneath the floating waves.
 Now, tir'd with slaughter, from the Trojan band
 Twelve chosen youths he drags alive to land;
 With their rich belts their captive arms constrain
 (Late their proud ornaments, but now their chains).
 These his attendants to the ships convey'd,
 Sad victims! destin'd to Patroclus' shade.

Then, as once more he plung'd amid the flood,
 The young Lycaon in his passage stood,
 The son of Priam; whom the hero's hand
 But late made captive in his father's land,
 (As from a sycamore, his sounding steel
 Lopp'd the green arms to spoke a chariot wheel);
 To Lemnos' isle he sold the royal slave,
 Where Jason's son the price demanded gave;
 But kind Eëtion touching on the shore,
 The ransom'd prince to fair Arisbe bore.
 Ten days were past, since in his father's reign
 He felt the sweets of liberty again;
 The next, that god whom men in vain withstand,
 Gives the same youth to the same conquering hand;
 Now never to return! and doom'd to go
 A sadder journey to the shades below.
 His well-known face when great Achilles ey'd
 (The helm and visor he had cast aside
 With wild affright, and dropp'd upon the field
 His useless lance and unavailing shield)
 As, trembling, panting, from the stream he fled,
 And knock'd his faultering knees, the hero said:
 "Ye mighty gods! what wonders strike my view!
 Is it in vain our conquering arms subdue?
 Sure I shall see yon heaps of Trojans kill'd,
 Rise from the shades, and brave me on the field:
 As now the captive, whom so late I bound
 And sold to Lemnos, stalks on Trojan ground!
 Not him the sea's unmeasur'd deeps detain,
 That bar such numbers from their native plain:
 Lo! he returns. Try, then, my flying spear!
 Try, if the grave can hold the wanderer;

If Earth at length this active prince can seize,
Earth, whose strong grasp has held down Hercules."

Thus while he speaks, the Trojan pale with fears
Approach'd, and sought his knees with suppliant
Loth as he was to yield his youthful breath, [tears,
And his soul shivering at th' approach of death,
Achilles rais'd the spear, prepar'd to wound;
He kiss'd his feet, extended on the ground:
And while, above, the spear suspended stood,
Languing to dip its thirsty point in blood,
One hand embrac'd them close, one stopt the dart,
While thus these melting words attempt his heart:

"Thy well-known captive, great Achilles, see,
Once more Lycaon trembles at thy knee.
Some pity to a suppliant's name afford,
Who shar'd the gifts of Ceres at thy board;
Whom late thy conquering arm to Lemnos bore,
Far from his father, friends, and native shore;
A hundred oxen were his price that day,
Now sums immense thy mercy shall repay.
Scarce respited from woes I yet appear,
And scarce twelve morning suns have seen me
here;

Lo! Jove again submits me to thy hands,
Again, her victim cruel fate demands!
I sprung from Priam and Laethœe fair
(Old Altes daughter, and Legesia's heir;
Who held in Pedasus his fam'd abode,
And rePd the fields where silver Sateio flow'd):
Two sons (alas! unhappy sons) she bore:
For, ah! one spear shall drink each brother's gore,
And I succeed to slaughter'd Polydore.
How from that arm of terror shall I fly?
Some demon urges! 'tis my doom to die!
If ever yet soft pity touch'd thy mind,
Ah! think not me too much of Hector's kind!
Not the same mother gave thy suppliant breath,
With his, who wrought thy lov'd Patroclus' death."

These words, attended with a shower of tears,
The youth address'd to unrelenting ears;
"Talk not of life, or ransom," (he replies)
"Patroclus dead, whoever meets me dies;
In vain a single Trojan sues for grace;
But least, the sons of Priam's hateful race.
Die then, my friend! what boots it to deplore?
The great, the good Patroclus is no more!
He, far thy better, was foredoom'd to die,
And thou, dost thou bewail mortality?
Scarc'd thou not me, whom Nature's gifts adorn,
Sprung from a hero, from a goddess born;
The day shall come (which nothing can avert)
When by the spear, the arrow, or the dart,
By night or day, by force or by design,
Impending death and certain fate are mine.

Die then"—he said: and, as the word he spoke,
The fainting stripling sunk before the stroke:
His hand forgot its grasp, and left the spear:
While all his trembling frame contest his fear;
Sadden, Achilles his broad sword display'd,
And buried in his neck the reeking blade.
Prone fell the youth; and, panting on the land,
The gushing purple dy'd the thirsty sand;
The victor to the stream the carcass gave,
And thus insults him, floating on the wave:

"Lie there, Lycaon: let the fish surround
Thy blasted corpse, and suck thy gory wound:
There no sad mother shall thy funerals weep,
But swift Scamander roll thee to the deep,
Whose every wave some watery monster brings,
To feast uponish'd on the fat of kings.

So perish Troy, and all the Trojan line!
Such ruin theirs, and such compassion mine.
What boots you now Scamander's worshipp'd stream,

His earthly honours, and immortal name?
In vain your immolated bulls are slain;
Your living coursers glut his gulphs in vain:
Thus he rewards you, with this bitter fate;
Thus, till the Grecian vengeance is complete;
Thus is aton'd Patroclus' honour'd shade,
And the short absence of Achilles paid."

These boastful words provoke the raging god;
With fury swells the violated flood.
What means divine may yet the power employ,
To check Achilles, and to rescue Troy?
Meanwhile the hero springs in arms, to dare
The great Asteropeus to mortal war;
The son of Pelagon, whose lofty line
Flows from the source of Axis, stream divine!
(Fair Peribœa's love the god had crown'd,
With all his reficent waters circled round).
On him Achilles rush'd: he fearless stood,
And shook two spears, advancing from the flood;
The flood impell'd him, on Pelides' head
To avenge his waters chok'd with heaps of dead.
Near as they drew, Achilles thus began:

"What art thou, boldest of the race of man?
Who, or from whence? Unhappy is the sire
Whose son encounters our restless ire."

"O son of Peleus! what avails to trace"
(Reply'd the warrior) "our illustrious race?
From rich Pæonia's valleys I command,
Arm'd with protended spears, my native band;
Now shines the tenth bright morning since I came
In aid of Ilion to the fields of fame:
Axis, who swells with all the neighbouring rills,
And wide around the floated region fills,
Begot my sire, whose spear such glory won:
Now lift thy arm, and try that hero's son!"

Threatening he said: the hostile chiefs advance;
At once Asteropeus discharg'd each lance,
(For both his dexterous hands the lance could wield)

One struck, but pierc'd not the Vulcanian shield;
One ras'd Achilles' hand; the spouting blood
Spun forth, in earth the fasten'd weapon stood.
Like lightning next the Pelian javelin flies:
Its erring fury hiss'd along the skies;
Deep in the swelling bank was driv'n the spear,
Er'n to the middle earth'd; and quiver'd there.
Then from his side the sword Palides drew,
And on his foe with doubled fury flew.
The foe thrice tugg'd, and shook the rooted wood;
Repulsive of his might the weapon stood:
The fourth, he tries to break the spear, in vain;
Bent as he stands, he tumbles to the plain;
His belly open'd with a ghastly wound,
The reeking entrails pour upon the ground.
Beneath the hero's feet he panting lies,
And his eye darkens, and his spirit flies:
While the proud victor thus triumphant said,
His radiant armour tearing from the dead:

"So ends thy glory! Such the fate they prove,
Who strive presumptuous with the sons of Jove.
Sprung from a river, didst thou boast thy line?
But great Saturnius is the source of mine.
How dar'st thou vaunt thy watery progeny?
Of Peleus, Æacus, and Jove, am I,
The race of these superior far to thee,
As he that thunders to the stream that flows.

What rivers can, Scamander might have shown;
But Jove he dreads, nor wars against his son,
Ev'n Achelous might contend in vain,
And all the roaring billows of the main.
Th' eternal Ocean, from whose fountains flow
The seas, the rivers, and the springs below,
The thundering voice of Jove abhors to hear,
And in his deep abysses shakes with fear."

He said; then from the bank his javelin tore,
And left the breathless warrior in his gore.
The floating tides the bloody carcass lave,
And beat against it, wave succeeding wave;
Till, roll'd between the banks, it lies the food
Of curling eels, and fishes of the flood.
All scatter'd round the stream (their mightiest slain)

Th' amaz'd Pæonians soar along the plain:
He vents his fury on the flying crew,
Thrasius, Astypylus, and Mœneius slew;
Mydon, Thersilochus, with Enius fell;
And numbers more his lance had plung'd to Hell;
But from the bottom of his gulphs profound,
Scamander spoke; the shores return'd the sound:

"O first of mortals! (for the gods are thine)
In valour matchless, and in force divine!
If Jove have given thee every Trojan head,
'Tis not on me thy rage should heap the dead.
See! my chok'd streams go more their course can keep,

Nor roll their wonted tribute to the deep.
Turn, then, impetuous! from our injur'd flood;
Content, thy slaughters could amass a god."

In human form confess'd before his eyes,
The river thus; and thus the chief replies:
"O sacred stream! thy word we shall obey;
Not till till Troy the destin'd vengeance pay:
Not till within her towers the perjurd train
Shall pant, and tremble at our arms again:
Not till proud Hector, guardian of her wall,
Or stain this lance, or see Achilles fall."

He said; and drove with fury on the foe.
Then to the godhead of the silver bow
The yellow flood began: "O son of Jove!
Was not the mandate of the sire above
Full and express? that Phœbus should employ
His sacred arrows in defence of Troy,
And make her conquer, till Hyperion's fall
In awful darkness hide the face of all?"

He spoke in vain—the chief without dismay,
Ploughs through the boiling surge his desperate
Then, rising in his rage above the shores, [way.
From all his deep the bellowing river roars,
Muge heaps of slain disgorge on the coast,
And round the banks the ghastly dead are tost.
While all before, the billows rang'd on high
(A watery bulwark) screen the bands who fly.
Now bursting on his head with thundering sound,
The falling deluge whelms the hero round:
His loaded shield bends to the rushing tide;
His feet, upborn, scarce the strong flood divide,
Sliding, and staggering. On the border stood
A spreading elm; that overhung the flood;
He seiz'd a bending bough, his steps to stay;
The plant, uprooted, to his weight gave way,
Heaving the bank, and undermining all;
Load flash the waters to the rushing fall
Of the thick foliage. The large trunk display'd
Bridg'd the rough flood across: the hero stay'd
On this his weight; and, rais'd upon his hand,
Leap'd from the channel, and regain'd the land.

Then blacken'd the wild waves; the murmur rose;
The god pursues, a huger billow throu,
And bursts the bank, ambitious to destroy
The man whose fury is the fate of Troy.
He, like the warlike eagle, speeds his pass
(Swiftest and strongest of th' aerial race)
Far as a spear can fly; Achilles springs
At every bound; his clanging armour rings:
Now here, now there, he turns on every side,
And winds his course before the following tide;
The waves flow after, whencesoe'er he wheels,
And gather fast, and murmur at his heels.
So when a peasant to his garden brings
Soft rills of water from the bubbling springs,
And calls the floods from high, to bless his towers,
And feed with pregnant streams the plants and
flowers;

Soon as he clears whate'er their passage staid,
And marks the future current with his spade,
Swift o'er the rolling pebbles, down the hills,
Loud and louder pour the falling rills;
Before him scattering, they prevent his pains,
And shine in many wanderings o'er the plains.

Still flies Achilles, but before his eyes
Still swift Scamander rolls where'er he flies:
Not all his speed escapes the rapid floods;
The first of men, but not a match for gods.
Oft as he turn'd the torrent to oppose,
And bravely try if all the powers were foes;
So oft the surge, in watery mountains spread,
Beats on his back, or bursts upon his head.

Yet dauntless still the adverse flood he braves,
And still indignant bounds above the waves.
Tir'd by the tides, his knees relax with toil;
Wash'd from beneath him slides the slimy soil:
When thus (his eyes on Heaven's expansion thrown)
Forth bursts the hero with an angry groan:

"Is there no god Achilles to befriend,
No power to avert his miserable end?
Prevent, oh Jove! this ignominious date,
And make my future life the sport of Fate.
Of all Heaven's oracles believ'd in vain,
But most of Thetis, must her son complain;
By Phœbus' darts she prophesied my fall,
In glorious arms before the Trojan wall.
Oh! had I died in fields of battle warm,
Stretch'd like a hero, by a hero's arm!
Might Hector's spear this dauntless bosom rend,
And my swift soul o'ertake my slaughter'd friend!
Ah, no! Achilles meets a shameful fate,
Oh! how unworthy of the brave and great!
Like some vile swain, whom on a rainy day,
Crossing a ford, the torrent sweeps away,
An unregarded carcase, to the sea."

Neptune and Pallas haste to his relief,
And thus in human form address the chief.
The power of Ocean first: "Forbear thy fear,
O son of Peleus! Lo, thy gods appear!
Behold! from Jove descending to thy aid,
Propitious Neptune, and the blue-ey'd maid.
Stay, and the furious flood shall cease to rave:
'Tis not thy fate to glut his angry wave.
But thou, the counsel Heaven suggests, attend!
Nor breathe from combat, nor thy sword suspend,
Till Troy receive her flying coats, till all
Her routed squadrons pant behind their wall:
Hector alone shall stand his fatal chance,
And Hector's blood shall smoke upon thy lance.
This is the glory doom'd." Thus spake the gods:
Then swift attended to the bright abodes.

Sung with new ardour, thus by Heaven impell'd,
He springs impetuous, and invades the field:
O'er all th' expanded plain the waters spread,
Heap'd on the bounding billows dance the dead,
Floating 'midst scatter'd arms; while casques of gold

And turn'd up bucklers glitter'd as they roll'd.
High o'er the surging tide, by leaps and bounds,
He wades and mounts; the parted wave resounds.
Not a whole river stops the hero's course,
While Pallas fills him with immortal force.
With equal rage, indignant Xanthus roars,
And lifts his billows, and o'erwhelms his shores.

Then thus to Simoën: "Haste, my brother flood!
And check this mortal, that controls a god:
Our bravest heroes else shall quit the fight,
And lions tumble from her towery height.

Call then thy subject streams, and bid them roar,
From all thy fountains swell thy watery store,
With broken rocks, and with a load of dead,
Charge the black surge, and pour it on his head,
Mark how resistless through the floods he goes,
And boldly bids the warring gods be foes!

But nor that force, nor form divine to sight,
Shall aught avail him, if our rage unite:
Whelm'd under our dark gulphs those arms shall
That blaze so dreadful in each Trojan eye; [lie,
And deep beneath a sandy mountain huri'd,
Immur'd remain this terror of the world.

Such ponderous ruin shall confound the place.
No Greek shall e'er his perish'd relics grace,
No head his bones shall gather, or inhume;
These his cold rites, and this his watery tomb."
He said; and on the chief descends amain,

Increases with gore, and swelling with the slain.
Then murmuring from his beds, he boils, he raves,
And a foam whitens on the purple waves:
At every step, before Achilles stood

The crimson surge, and delug'd him with blood.
Four touch'd the queen of Heaven: she saw dis-
may'd,

She call'd aloud, and summon'd Vulcan's aid:
"Rise to the war! th' insulting flood requires

Thy wasteful arm: assemble all thy fires!
While to their aid, by our command enjoin'd,
Rush the swift Eastern and the Western wind.

These from old Ocean at my word shall blow,
Pour the red torrent on the watery foe,
Corpses and arms to one bright ruin turn,
And hissing rivers to their bottoms burn.

Go, mighty in thy rage! display thy power,
Drink the whole flood, the crackling trees devour,
Breach all the banks! and (till our voice reclaim)
Exert th' unwearied furies of the flame!"

The power ignipotent her word obeys:
Wide o'er the plain he pours the boundless blaze;

At once consumes the dead, and dries the soil,
And the shrunk waters in their channel boil.

As when autumnal Boreas sweeps the sky,
And instant blows the water'd gardens dry:
So look'd the field, so whiten'd was the ground,
While Vulcan breath'd the fiery blast around.

Swift on the sodgy reeds the ruin preys;
Along the margin winds the running blaze:

The trees in flaming rows to ashes turn,
The flowery lotos and the tamarisk burn,
Broad oaks, and cypress rising in a spire;

The watery willows hiss before the fire,
Now glow the waves, the fishes pant for breath,
The eels lie twisting in the pang of death:

Now sounce aloft, now dive the scaly fry,
Or, gasping, turn their bellies to the sky.
At length the river rear'd his languid head,
And thus, short panting, to the god he said:

"Oh, Vulcan! oh! what power resists thy might?
I faint, I sink, unequal to the fight—
I yield—Let Ilion fall, if Fate decree;

Ah—bend no more thy fiery arms on me!"

He ceas'd; wide conflagration blazing round;
The bubbling waters yield a hissing sound.

As when the flames beneath a caldron rise,
To melt the fat of some rich sacrifice,
Amid the fierce embrace of circling fires
The waters foam, the heavy smoke aspires:

So boils th' imprison'd flood, forbid to flow,
And chok'd with vapours, feels his bottom glow.

To Juno then, imperial queen of air,
The burning river sends his earnest prayer:

"Ah, why Saturnia! must thy son engage
Me, only me, with all his wasteful rage?
On other gods his dreadful arm employ,
For mightier gods assert the cause of Troy,
Submissive I desist, if thou command;

But, ah! withdraw this all-destroying hand.
Hear then my solemn oath, to yield to Fate
Unaided Ilion, and her destin'd state,
Till Greece shall gird her with destructive flame,
And in one ruin sink the Trojan name."

His warm entreaty touch'd Saturnia's ear:
She bade th' Ignipotent his rage forbear,
Recal the flame, nor in a mortal cause
Infest a god: th' obedient flame withdraws;

Again, the branching streams begin to spread,
And soft re-murmur in their wonted bed.

While these by Juno's will the strife resign,
The warring gods in fierce contention join:
Re-kindling rage each heavenly breast alarms;

With horrid clangour shock'd th' etherial arms;
Heaven in loud thunder bids the trumpet sound;
And wide beneath them groans the rending ground.

Jove, as his sport, the dreadful scene describes,
And views contending gods with careless eyes.

The power of battles lifts his brazen spear,
And first assaults the radiant queen of war:

"What mov'd thy madness thus to disunite
Ethereal minds, and mix all Heaven in fight?
What wonder this, when in thy frantic mood
Thou drov'st a mortal to insult a god?
Thy impious hand Tydides' javelin bore,
And madly bath'd it in celestial gore."

He spoke, and smote the loud-resounding shield,
Which bears Jove's thunder on its dreadful field;

The adamantineegis of her sire,
That turns the glancing bolt and forked fire.

Then heav'd the goddess in her mighty hand
A stone, the limit of the neighbouring land,
There fix'd from eldest times; black, craggy, vast:
This at the heavenly homicide she cast.

Thundering he falls, a mass of monstrous size;
And seven broad acres covers as he lies.

The stunning stroke his stubborn nerves rebound;
Loud o'er the fields his ringing arms resound:

The scornful dame her conquest views with smiles,
And, glorying, thus the prostrate god reviles:

"Hast thou not yet, insatiate fury! known
How far Minerva's force transcends thy own?
Juno, whom thou rebellious dar'st withstand,
Corrects thy folly thus by Pallas' hand;
Thus meets thy broken faith with just disgrace,
And partial aid to Troy's perdition race."

The goddess spoke, and turn'd her eyes away,
That, beaming round, diffus'd celestial day,
Jove's Cyprian daughter, stooping on the land,
Lent to the wounded god her tender hand :
Slowly he rises, scarcely breathes with pain,
And prompt on her fair arm, forsakes the plain.
This the bright empress of the Heavens survey'd,
And, scoffing, thus to war's victorious maid :

" Lo ! what an aid on Mars's side is seen !
The Smiles and Loves' unconquerable queen !
Mark with what insolence, in open view,
She moves : let Pallas, if she dares, pursue."

Minerva smiling heard, the pair o'ertook,
And slightly on her breast the wanton strook :
She, unresisting, fell (her spirits fled ;)
On Earth together lay the lovers spread ;
" And like these heroes, be the fate of all"
(Minerva cries) " who guard the Trojan wall !
To Grecian gods such let the Phrygians be,
So dread, so fierce, as Venus is to me ;
Then from the lowest stone shall Troy be mov'd"—
Thus she ; and Juno with a smile approv'd.

Meantime, to mix in more than mortal fight,
The god of Ocean dares the god of light :
" What sloth hath seiz'd us, when the fields around Ring with conflicting powers, and Heaven returns the sound ?

Shall, ignominious, we with shame retire,
No deed perform'd, to our Olympian sire ?
Come prove thy arm ! for first the war to wage,
Suits not my greatness, or superior age :
Rash as thou art to prop the Trojan throne
(Forgetful of my wrongs, and of thy own)
And guard the race of proud Laomedon !
Hast thou forgot how, at the monarch's prayer,
We shar'd the lengthen'd labours of a year ?
Troy's wall I rais'd (for such were Jove's commands,)

And you proud bulwarks grew beneath my hands :
Thy task it was to feed the bellowing droves
Along fair Ida's vales and pendent groves.
But when the circling seasons in their train Brought back the grateful day that crown'd our pain,

With menace stern the fraudulent king defy'd
Our latent godhead, and the prize deny'd :
Mad as he was, he threaten'd servile bands,
And doom'd us exiles far in barbarous lands.
Incens'd, we heavenward fled with swiftest wing,
And destin'd vengeance on the perjurd king.
Dost thou, for this, afford proud Iliion grace,
And not, like us, infest the faithless race ;
Like us, their present, future sons destroy,
And from its deep foundations heave their Troy ?"

Apollo thus : " To combat for mankind,
Ill suits the wisdom of celestial mind :
For what is man ? calamitous by birth,
They owe their life and nourishment to earth ;
Like yearly leaves, that now, with beauty crown'd,
Smile on the Sun ; now wither on the ground.
To their own hands commit the frantic scene,
Nor mix immortals in a cause so mean."

Then turns his face, far-beaming heavenly fires,
And from the senior power submits retires :
Him, thus retreating, Artemis upbraids,
The quiver'd huntress of the sylvan shades :

" And is it thus the youthful Phœbus flies,
And yields to Ocean's hoary sire the prize ?
How vain that martial pomp and dreadful show
Of pointed arrows, and the silver bow !

Now boast no more, in yon celestial bow,
Thy force can match the great earth-shaking
power."

Silent, he heard the queen of woods upbraid :
Not so Saturnia bore the vaunting maid ;
But furious thus : " What insolence has driven
Thy pride to face the majesty of Heaven ?
What though by Jove the female plague design'd,
Fierce to the feeble race of woman-kind,
The wretched matron feels thy piercing dart ;
Thy sex's tyrant, with a tiger's heart ?
What though, tremendous in the wood and chase,
Thy certain arrows pierce the savage race ?
How dares thy rashness on the powers divine
Employ those arms, or match thy force with mine ?

Learn hence, no more unequal war to wage"—
She said, and seiz'd her wrists with eager rage ;
These in her left hand lock'd, her right untied
The bow, the quiver, and its plummy pride.
About her temples flies the busy bow ;
Now here, now there, she winds her from the blow !
The scattering arrows, rattling from the case,
Drop round, and idly mark the dusty place.
Swift from the field the baffled huntress flies,
And scarce retains the torrent in her eyes :
So, when the falcon wings her way above,
To the cleft cavern speeds the gentle dove,
(Not fatig'd yet to die) there safe retreats,
Yet still her heart against the marble beats.

To her Latona hastes with tender care,
Whom Hermes viewing, thus declines the war :
" How shall I face the dame, who gives delight
To him whose thunders blacken Heaven with night ?
Go, matchless goddess ! triumph in the skies,
And boast my conquest, while I yield the prize."

He spoke ; and past : Latona, stooping low,
Collects the scatter'd shafts, and fallen bow,
That, glittering on the dust, lay here and there ;
Dishonour'd relics of Diana's war. -
Then swift pursued her to the blest abode,
Where all confus'd she sought the sovereign god ;
Weeping she grasp'd his knees : th' ambrosial vest
Shook with her sighs, and panted on her breast.

The sire superior smil'd ; and bade her show
What heavenly hand had caus'd his daughter's woe ?

Abash'd, she names his own imperial spouse ;
And the pale crescent fades upon her brow.

Thus they above : while swiftly gliding down,
Apollo enters Iliion's sacred town :
The guardian god now trembled for her wall,
And fear'd the Greeks, though fate forbid her fall.
Back to Olympus, from the war's alarms,
Return the shining bands of gods in arms ;
Some proud in triumph, some with rage on fire ;
And take their thrones around th' æthereal sire.

Through blood, through death, Achilles still proceeds,
O'er slaughter'd heroes, and o'er rolling steeds
As when avenging flames, with fury driven
On guilty towns, exert the wrath of Heaven ;
The pale inhabitants, some fall, some fly ;
And the red vapours purple all the sky :
So rag'd Achilles, death and dire dismay,
And toils, and terrors, fill'd the dreadful day.

High on a turret hoary Priam stands,
And marks the waste of his destructive hands ;
Views from his arm, the Trojans' scatter'd flight,
And the near hero rising on his sight !

No step, no check, no aid! With feeble pace,
 And settled sorrow on his aged face,
 Fast as he could, he sighing quits the walls;
 And thus, descending, on the guards he calls:
 "You, to whose care our city-gates belong,
 Set wide your portals to the flying throng:
 For lo! he comes, with unrestrained sway;
 He comes, and desolation marks his way!
 But when within the walls our troops take breath,
 Lock fast the brazen bars, and shut out death."
 Thus charg'd the reverend monarch; wide were flung
 The opening folds; the sounding hinges rung,
 Phobus rush'd forth, the flying bands to meet;
 Struck slaughter back, and cover'd the retreat.
 On heaps the Trojans crowd to gain the gate,
 And, gladcome, see their last escape from fate.
 Thither, all parch'd with thirst, a heartless train,
 Hoary with dust, they beat the hollow plain:
 And gasping, panting, fainting, labour on
 With heavier strides, that lengthen tow'rd the Hurg'd Achilles follows with his spear; [town
 Wild with revenge, insatiable of war.

Then had the Greeks eternal praise acquir'd,
 And Troy inglorious to her walls retir'd;
 But he, the god who darts ethereal flame,
 Shot down to save her, and redeem her fame.
 To young Agenor force divine he gave (Asteror's offspring, haughty, bold, and brave;)
 In aid of him, beside the beach he sate,
 And wrapt in clouds, restrain'd the hand of fate.
 When now the generous youth Achilles spies,
 Thick beats his heart, the troubled motions rise.
 (So, ere a storm, the waters heave and roll;)
 He stops, and questions thus his mighty soul:
 "What, shall I fly this terror of the plain?
 Like others fly, and be like others slain?
 Vain hope! to shun him by the self-same road
 Yon line of slaughter'd Trojans lately trod.
 No: with the common heap I scorn to fall—
 What if they pass'd me to the Trojan wall,
 While I decline to yonder path, that leads
 To Ida's forests and surrounding shades?
 So may I reach, conceal'd, the cooling blood,
 From my tir'd body wash the dirt and blood,
 As soon as night her dusky veil extends,
 Return in safety to my Trojan friends.
 What if—But wherefore all this vain debate?
 Stand I to doubt, within the reach of fate?
 E'en now perhaps, ere yet I turn the wall,
 The fierce Achilles sees me, and I fall;
 Such is his swiftness, 'tis in vain to fly,
 And such his valour, that who stands must die.
 Howe'er 'tis better, fighting for the state,
 Here, and in public view, to meet my fate.
 Yet sure he too is mortal! he may feel (Like all the sons of Earth) the force of steel;
 One only soul informs that dreadful frame;
 And Jove's sole favour gives him all his fame."
 He said, and stood collected in his might;
 And all his beating bosom claim'd the fight.
 So from some deep-grown wood a panther starts,
 Rous'd from his thicket by a storm of darts:
 Untaught to fear or fly, he hears the sounds
 Of shouting hunters, and of clamorous bounds;
 Though struck, though wounded, scarce perceives
 The pain;
 And the barb'd javelin stings his breast in vain:
 On their whole war, unstart'd, the savage flies;
 And tears his hunter, or beneath him dies.

! Apollo,

Not less resolv'd, Antenor's valiant heir
 Confronts Achilles, and awaits the war,
 Disdainful of retreat: high-held before,
 His shield (a broad circumference) he bore;
 Then, graceful as he stood in act to throw
 The lifted javelin, thus bespoke the foe:
 "How proud Achilles glories in his fame!
 And hopes this day to sink the Trojan name
 Beneath her ruins! Know, that hope is vain;
 A thousand woes, a thousand toils remain.
 Parents and children our just arms employ,
 And strong, and many, are the sons of Troy.
 Great as thou art, ev'n thou may'st stain with
 gore

These Phrygian fields, and press a foreign shore."

He said: with matchless force the javelin flung
 Smote on his knee; the hollow cushions rung
 Beneath the pointed steel; but safe from harms
 He stands impassive in th' ethereal arms.
 Then, fiercely rushing on the daring foe,
 His lifted arm prepares the fatal blow:
 But, jealous of his fame, Apollo shrouds
 The godlike Trojan in a veil of clouds.
 Safe from pursuit, and shut from mortal view,
 Dismiss'd with fame the favour'd youth withdrew.
 Meanwhile the god, to cover their escape,
 Assumes Agenor's habit, voice and shape,
 Flies from the furious chief in this disguise;
 The furious chief still follows where he flies.
 Now o'er the fields they stretch with lengthen'd strides,

Now urge the course where swift Scamander glides:
 The god, now distant scarce a stride before,
 Tempts his pursuit, and wheels about the shore;
 While all the flying troops their speed employ,
 And pour on heaps into the walls of Troy:
 No stop, no stay; no thought to ask or tell,
 Who escap'd by flight, or who by battle fell.
 'Twas tumult all, and violence of flight;
 And sudden joy confus'd, and mix'd affright:
 Pale Troy against Achilles shuts her gate;
 And nations breathe, deliver'd from their fate.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XXII.

ARGUMENT.

THE DEATH OF HECTOR.

THE Trojans being safe within the walls, Hector only stays to oppose Achilles. Priam is struck at his approach, and tries to persuade his son to re-enter the town. Hecuba joins her entreaties, but in vain. Hector consults within himself what measures to take; but, at the advance of Achilles, his resolution fails him, and he flies: Achilles pursues him thrice round the walls of Troy. The gods debate concerning the fate of Hector; at length Minerva descends to the aid of Achilles. She deludes Hector in the shape of Deiphobus; he stands the combat, and is slain.

Achilles drags the dead body at his chariot, in the sight of Priam and Hecuba. Their lamentations, tears, and despair. Their cries reach the ears of Andromache, who, ignorant of this, was retired into the inner part of the palace; she mounts up to the walls, and beholds her dead husband. She swoons at the spectacle—Her excess of grief and lamentation.

The thirtieth day still continues. The scene lies under the walls and on the battlements of Troy.

Thus to their bulwarks, smit with panic fear,
The herded Ilians rush like driven deer;
These safe, they wipe their briny drops away,
And drown in bowls the labours of the day,
Close to the walls, advancing o'er the fields
Beneath one roof of well-compacted shields,
March, bending on, the Greek's embodied powers,
Far-stretching in the shade of Trojan towers.
Great Hector singly staid; chain'd down by fate,
There fixt he stood before the Scæan gate;
Still his bold arms determin'd to employ,
The guardian still of long-defended Troy.

Apollo now to tir'd Achilles turns
(The power contest in all his glory burns.)
"And what" (he cries) "has Peleus' son in view,

With mortal speed a godhead to pursue?
For not to thee to know the gods is given,
Unskill'd to trace the latent marks of Heaven.
What boots thee now, that Troy forsook the plain?
Vain thy past labour, and thy present vain:
Safe in their walls are now her troops bestow'd,
While here thy frantic rage attacks a god."

The chief incens'd—"Too partial god of day!
To check my conquests in the middle way:
How few in Ilium else had refuge found!
What gasping numbers now had bit the ground!
Thou robb'st me of a glory justly mine,
Powerful of godhead, and of fraud divine:
Mean fame, alas! for ours of heavenly strain,
To cheat a mortal who repines in vain."

Then to the city terrible and strong,
With high and haughty steps he tower'd along.
So the proud courser, victor of the prize,
To the near goal with double ardour flies:
Him as he blazing shot across the field,
The careful eyes of Priam first beheld.
Not half so dreadful rises to the sight, [night,
Through the thick gloom of some tempestuous
Orion's dog (the year when autumn weighs)
And o'er the feebler stars exerts his rays:
Terrific glory! for his burning breath
Taints the red air with fevers, plagues, and death.
So flam'd his fiery mail. Then wept the sage;
He strikes his reverend head, now white with age:
He lifts his wither'd arms; obtests the skies;
He calls his much-lov'd son with feeble cries:
The son, resolv'd Achilles' force to dare,
Fall at the Scæan gates expects the war;
While the sad father on the rampart stands,
And thus adjures him with extended hands:

"Ah, stay not, stay not! guardless and alone;
Hector! my lov'd, my dearest, bravest son!
Methinks already I behold thee slain,
And stretch'd beneath that fury of the plain.

Implacable Achilles! might'st thou be
To all the gods no dearer than to me!
Thee, vultures should scatter round the shore,
And bloody dogs grow fiercer from thy gore.
How many valiant sons I late enjoy'd,
Valiant in vain! by thy curst arm destroy'd:
Or, worse than slaughter'd, sold in distant isles
To shameful bondage and unworthy toils.
Two, while I speak, my eyes in vain explore,
Two from one mother sprung, my Polydore,
And lov'd Lycaon; now perhaps no more!
Oh! if yonder hostile camp they live,
What heaps of gold, what treasures, would I give!
(Their grandire's wealth by right of birth their own,

Consign'd his daughter with Lægia's throne;)
But if (which Heaven forbid) already lost,
All pale they wander on the Stygian coast,
What sorrows then must their sad mother know,
What anguish! unutterable woe!
Yet less that anguish, less to her, to me,
Less to all Troy, if not depriv'd of thee.
Yet shun Achilles! enter yet the wall;
And spare thyself, thy father, spare us all!
Save thy dear life; or, if a soul so brave
Neglect that thought, thy dearer glory save.
Pity, while yet I live, these silver hairs;
While yet thy father feels the woes he bears,
Yet curst with sense! a wretch whom in his rage
(All trembling on the verge of helpless age)
Great Jove has plac'd, sad spectacle of pain!

The bitter dregs of fortune's cup to drain:
To fill with scenes of death his closing eyes,
And number all his days by miseries!
My heroes slain, my bridal bed o'erturn'd,
My daughters ravish'd, and my city burn'd;
My bleeding infants dash'd against the floor;
These I have yet to see, perhaps yet more!
Perhaps ev'n I, reserv'd by angry fate
The last sad relic of my ruin'd state,
(Dire pomp of sovereign wretchedness!) must fall,
And stain the pavement of my regal hall;
Where famish'd dogs, late guardians of my door,
Shall lick their mangled master's spatter'd gore.
Yet for my sons I thank you, gods! 'twas well;
Well have they perish'd; for in fight they fell.
Who dies in youth and vigour, dies the best,
Struck through with wounds, all honest, on the breast.

But when the Fates, in fullness of their rage,
Spurn the hoar head of unresisting age,
In dust the reverend lineaments deform,
And pour to dogs the life-blood scarcely warm;
This is misery! the last, the worst,
That man can feel; man, fated to be curst!"

He said: and, acting what no words could say,
Rent from his head the silver locks away.
With him the mournful mother bears a part;
Yet all their sorrows turn not Hector's heart:
The zone unbrac'd, her bosom she display'd;
And then, fast-falling the salt tears, she said:
"Have mercy on me, O my son! revere
The words of age; attend a parent's prayer!
If ever thee in these fond arms I prest,
Or still'd thy infant clemour at this breast;
Ah, do not thus our helpless years forgo,
But, by our walls secur'd, repel the foe.
Against his rage if singly thou proceed,
Shouldst thou. (but Heaven avert it!) shouldst
thou bleed,

Nor trust thy corpse be honour'd on the bier,
 Nor spouse, nor mother, grace thee with a tear;
 Far from our pious rites, those dear remains
 Must feast the vultures on the naked plains."
 "So they; while down their cheeks the torrents roll:
 But fix'd remains the purpose of his soul;
 Resolv'd he stands; and with a fiery glance
 Expects the hero's terrible advance.
 So, roll'd up in his den, the swelling snake
 Beholds the traveller approach the brake;
 When, fed with noxious herbs, his turgid veins
 Have gather'd half the poisons of the plains;
 He burns, he stiffens with collected ire,
 And his red eye-balls glare with living fire.
 Beneath a turret, on his shield reclin'd,
 He stood; and question'd thus his mighty mind;
 "Where lies my way? To enter in the wall?
 Honour and shame th' ungenerous thought recal:
 Shall proud Polydamas before the gate
 Proclaim, his councils are obey'd too late;
 Which timely follow'd but the former night,
 What numbers had been sav'd by Hector's flight!
 That wise advice rejected with disdain,
 I feel my folly in my people slain.
 Methinks my suffering country's voice I hear;
 But most, her worthless sons insult my ear;
 On my rash courage charge the chance of war,
 And blame those virtues which they cannot share.
 No—if I e'er return, return I must
 Glorious, my country's terror laid in dust:
 Or, if I perish, let her see me fall
 In field at least, and fighting for her wall.
 And yet, suppose these measures I forego,
 Approach unarm'd, and parley with the foe,
 The warrior-asheld, the helm, and lance, lay down,
 And treat on terms of peace to save the town:
 The wife withheld, the treasure ill-detain'd,
 (Cause of the war, and grievance of the land)
 With honourable justice to restore;
 And add half Iliion's yet remaining store, [Greece
 Which Troy shall, sworn, produce; that injur'd
 May share our wealth, and leave our walls in peace?
 But why this thought? Unarm'd if I should go,
 What hope of mercy from this vengeful foe,
 But woman-like to fall, and fall without a blow?
 We greet not here as man conversing man,
 Met at an oak, or journeying o'er a plain;
 No season now for calm familiar talk,
 Like youths and maidens in an evening walk:
 War is our business; but to whom is given
 To die, or triumph, that determine Heaven!"
 Thus pondering, like a god the Greek drew nigh;
 His dreadful plumage nodded from on high;
 The Pelian javelin, in his better hand,
 Shot trembling rays, that glitter'd o'er the land;
 And on his breast the beamy splendours shone
 Like Jove's own lightning, or the rising Sun:
 As Hector sees, unusual terrors rise,
 Struck by some god, he fears, recedes, and flies:
 He leaves the gates, he leaves the walls behind:
 Achilles follows like the winged wind.
 Thus at the panting dove a falcon flies
 (The swiftest racer of the liquid skies)
 Just when he holds, or thinks he holds, his prey,
 Obliquely wheeling through th' aerial way,
 With open beak and shrilling cries he springs,
 And aims his claws, and shoots upon his wings.
 No less fore-right the rapid chase they held,
 One urg'd by fury, one by fear impell'd;

Now circling round the walls their course maintain,
 Where the high watch-tower overlooks the plain;
 Now where the fig-trees spread their umbrage broad
 (A wider compass) smoke along the road.
 Next by Scamander's double source they bound,
 Where two fam'd fountains burst the parted ground;
 This hot through scorching clefts is seen to rise,
 With exhalations steaming to the skies;
 That, the green banks in summer's heat o'erflows,
 Like crystal clear, and cold as winter snows.
 Each gushing fount a marble cistern fills,
 Whose polish'd bed receives the falling rills;
 Where Trojan dames (ere yet alarm'd by Greece)
 Wash'd their fair garments in the days of peace.
 By these they pass'd, one chasing, one in flight
 (The mighty fled, pursued by stronger might).
 Swift was the course; no vulgar prize they play,
 No vulgar victim must reward the day
 (Such as in races crown the speedy strife).
 The prize contended was great Hector's life.
 As when some hero's funerals are decreed,
 In grateful honour of the mighty dead;
 Where high rewards the vigorous youth inflame
 (Some golden tripod, or some lovely dame);
 The panting coursers swiftly turn the goal,
 And with them turns the rais'd spectators' soul:
 Thus three times round the Trojan wall they fly;
 The gazing gods lean forward from the sky:
 To whom, while eager on the chase they look,
 The sire of mortals and immortals spoke:
 "Unworthy sight! the man below'd of Heaven,
 Behold, inglorious round your city driven!
 My heart partakes the generous Hector's pain;
 Hector, whose zeal whole hecatombs has slain,
 Whose grateful fumes the gods receiv'd with joy,
 From Ida's summits, and the towers of Troy:
 Now see him flying; to his fears resign'd,
 And fate, and fierce Achilles, close behind.
 Consult, ye powers! ('tis worthy your debate)
 Whether to snatch him from impending fate,
 Or let him bear, by stern Pelides slain
 (Good as he is) the lot impos'd on man." [forms
 Then Pallas thus: "Shall he whose vengeance
 The forky bolt, and blackens Heaven with storms,
 Shall he prolong one Trojan's forfeit breath!
 A man, a mortal, pre-ordin'd to death!
 And will no murmurs fill the courts above?
 No gods indignant blame their partial Jove?"
 "Go then" (return'd the sire) "without delay, Exert thy will: I give the Fates their way."
 Swift, at the mandate pleas'd, Tritonia flies,
 And stoops impetuous from the cleaving skies.
 As through the forest, o'er the vale and lawn,
 The well-breath'd beagle drives the flying fawn;
 In vain he tries the covert of the brakes,
 Or deep beneath the trembling thicket shakes;
 Sure of the vapour in the tainted dews,
 The certain hound his various maze pursues.
 Thus, step by step, where'er the Trojan wheel'd,
 There swift Achilles compass'd round the field.
 Oft as to reach the Dardan gates he bends,
 And hopes th' assistance of his pitying friends,
 (Whose showering arrows, as he cours'd below,
 From the high turrets might oppress the foe)
 So oft Achilles turns him to the plain:
 He eyes the city, but he eyes in vain.
 As men in slumber seem with speedy pace
 One to pursue, and one to lead the chase,
 Their sinking limbs the fancy'd course forsake,
 Nor this can fly, nor that can overtake:

No less the labouring heroes pant and strain ;
While that but flies, and this pursues, in vain.
What god, O Muse ! assisted Hector's force,
With fate itself so long to hold the course ?
Phœbus it was ; who, in his latest hour, [power :
Endued his knees with strength, his nerves with
And great Achilles, lest some Greeks' advance
Should snatch the glory from his lifted lance,
Sign'd to the troops to yield his foe the way,
And leave untouch'd the honours of the day.
Jove lifts the golden balances, that show
The fates of mortal men, and things below :
Here each contending hero's lot he tries,
And weighs, with equal hand, their destinies.
Low sinks the scale surcharg'd with Hector's fate ;
Heavy with death it sinks, and Hell receives the weight.

Then Phœbus left him. Fierce Minerva flies
To stern Pelides, and triumphing cries :
" Oh, lov'd of Jove ! this day our labours cease,
And conquest blazes with full beams on Greece.
Great Hector falls ; that Hector fam'd so far,
Drunk with renown, insatiable of war,
Falls by thy hand, and mine ! nor force nor sight
Shall more avail him, nor his god of light.
See, where in vain he supplicates above,
Roll'd at the feet of unrelenting Jove !
Rest here : myself will lead the Trojan on,
And urge to meet the fate he cannot shun."

Her voice divine the chief with joyful mind
Obey'd ; and rested, on his lance reclin'd.
While like Deiphobus the martial dame
(Her face, her gesture, and her arms, the same)
In show and aid, by hapless Hector's side
Approach'd, and greets him thus with voice bely'd :
" Too long, O Hector, have I borne the sight
Of this distress, and sorrow'd in thy sight :
It fits us now a noble stand to make,
And here, as brothers, equal fates partake."

Then he : " O prince ! all'y'd in blood and fame,
Dearer than all that own a brother's name ;
Of all that Hecuba to Priam bore,
Long try'd, long lov'd ; much lov'd, but honour'd
more ;

Since you, of all your numerous race, alone
Defend my life, regardless of your own."

Again the goddess : " Much my father's prayer,
And much my mother's, prest me to forbear :
My friends embrac'd my knees, adjur'd my stay,
But stronger love impell'd, and I obey.
Come then, the glorious conflict let us try,
Let the steel sparkle, and the javelin fly :
O let us stretch Achilles on the field,
Or to his arm our bloody trophies yield."

Fraudful she said ; then swiftly march'd before ;
The Dardan hero shuns his foe no more.
Sternly they met. The silence Hector broke ;
His dreadful plumage nodded as he spoke :

" Enough, O son of Peleus ! Troy has view'd
Her walls thrice circled, and her chief pursued.
Her now some god within me bids me try
Thine, or my fate : I kill thee, or I die.
Yet on the verge of battle let us stay,
And for a moment's space suspend the day ;
Let Heaven's high powers be call'd to arbitrate
The just conditions of this stern debate
(Eternal witnesses of all below,
And faithful guardians of the treasur'd vow !)
To them I swear ; if, victor in the strife,
Jove by these hands shall shed thy noble life,

No vile dishonour shall thy corpse pursue ;
Strip of its arms alone (the conqueror's due)
The rest to Greece uninjur'd I'll restore :
Now plight thy mutual oath, I ask no more."
" Talk not of oaths", (the dreadful chief replies, While anger flash'd from his diadainful eyes)
" Detested as thou art, and ought to be,
Nor oath nor pact Achilles plights with thee :
Such pacts as lambs and rapid wolves combine,
Such leagues as men and furious lions join,
To such I call the gods ! one constant state
Of lasting rancour and eternal hate ;
No thought but rage and never-ceasing strife,
Till death extinguish rage, and thought, and life.
Rouse then thy forces this important hour,
Collect thy soul, and call forth all thy power.
No farther subterfuge, no farther chance ;
'Tis Pallas, Pallas gives thee to my lance.
Each Grecian ghost by thee depriv'd of breath
Now hovers round, and calls thee to thy death."

He spoke, and lanch'd his javelin at the foe ;
But Hector shunn'd the meditated blow :
He stoop'd, while o'er his head the flying spear
Sung innocent, and spent its force in air.
Minerva watch'd, it falling on the land,
Then drew, and gave to great Achilles' hand,
Unseen of Hector, who, elate with joy,
Now shakes his lance, and braves the dread of Troy.
" The life you boasted to that javelin given,
Prince ! you have mis'd. My fate depends on Heaven.

To thee, presumptuous as thou art, unknown
Or what must prove my fortune, or thy own.
Boasting is but an art, our fears to blind,
And with false terror sink another's mind.
But know, whatever fate I am to try,
By no dishonest wound shall Hector die ;
I shall not fall a fugitive at least,
My soul shall bravely issue from my breast.
But first try thou my arm ; and may this dart
End all my country's woes, deep buried in thy heart !"

The weapon flew, its course unerring held ;
Unerring, but the heavenly shield repell'd
The mortal dart ; resulting with a bound
From off the ringing orb, it struck the ground.
Hector beheld his javelin fall in vain,
Nor other lance nor other hope remain ;
He calls Deiphobus, demands a spear,
In vain, for no Deiphobus was there.
All comfortless he stands : then, with a sigh,
" 'Tis so—Heaven wills it, and my hour is nigh !
I deem'd Deiphobus had heard my call,
But he secure lies guarded in the wall.
A god deceiv'd me ; Pallas, 'twas thy deed,
Death, and black fate, approach ! 'tis I must bleed,
No refuge now, no succour from above,
Great Jove deserts me, and the son of Jove,
Propitious once, and kind ; then welcome, Fate !
'Tis true I perish, yet I perish great :
Yet in a mighty deed I shall expire,
Let future ages hear it, and admire !"

Fierce, at the word, his weighty sword he drew,
And, all collected, on Achilles flew.
So Jove's bold bird, high balanc'd in the air,
Stoops from the clouds to truss the quivering
hara.

Nor less Achilles his fierce soul prepares ;
Before his breast the flaming shield he bears,
Refulgent orb ! above his fourfold cone
The gilded horse-hair sparkled in the sun,

Nodding at every step: (Vulcanian frame!)
 And as he mov'd, his figure seem'd on flame.
 As radiant Hesper shines with keener light,
 Far-beaming o'er the silver host of night,
 When all the starry train emblaze the sphere:
 So shone the point of great Achilles' spear.
 In his right-hand he waves the weapon round,
 Eyes the whole man, and meditates the wound:
 But the rich mail Patroclus lately wore,
 Securely cas'd the warrior's body o'er;
 One place at length he spies, to let in fate,
 Where 'twixt the neck and throat the jointed plate
 Gave entrance: through that penetrable part
 Furious he drove the well-directed dart:
 Nor pierc'd the wind-pipe yet, nor took the power
 Of speech, unhappy! from thy dying hour.
 Prone on the field the bleeding warrior lies,
 While thus, triumphing, stern Achilles cries:
 "At last is Hector stretch'd upon the plain,
 Who fear'd no vengeance for Patroclus slain:
 Then, prince! you should have fear'd, what now
 Achilles absent, was Achilles still. [you feel;
 Yet a short space the great avenger stay'd,
 Then low in dust thy strength and glory laid.
 Peaceful he sleeps, with all our rites adorn'd,
 For ever honour'd, and for ever mourn'd:
 While, cast to all the rage of hostile power,
 They, birds shall mangle, and the dogs devour."
 Then Hector, fainting at th' approach of death:
 "By thy own soul! by those who gave thee breath!
 By all the sacred prevalence of prayer;
 Ah, leave me not for Grecian dogs to tear!
 The common rites of sepulture bestow,
 To soothe a father's and a mother's woe;
 Let their large gifts procure an urn at least,
 And Hector's ashes in his country rest."
 "No, wretch accurst!" relentless he replies,
 (Flames, as he spoke, shot flashing from his eyes)
 "Not those who gave me breath should bid me
 For all the sacred prevalence of prayer. [spare,
 Could I myself the bloody banquet join!
 No—to the dogs that carcase I resign.
 Should Troy, to bribe me, bring forth all her store,
 And, giving thousands, offer thousands more;
 Should Dardan Priam, and his weeping dame,
 Drain their whole realm to buy one funeral flame;
 Their Hector on the pile they should not see,
 Nor rob the vultures of one limb of thee."
 Then thus the chief his dying accents drew:
 "Thy rage, implacable! too well I knew:
 The furies that relentless breast have steel'd,
 And curst thee with a heart that cannot yield.
 Yet think, a day will come when fate's decree
 And angry gods shall wreak this wrong on thee;
 Phoebus and Paris shall avenge my fate,
 And stretch thee here, before this Scæan gate."
 He ceas'd. The Fates suppress his labouring
 And his eyes stiffen'd at the hand of death; [breath,
 To the dark realm the spirit wings its way
 (The manly body left a load of clay)
 And plaintive glides along the dreary coast,
 A naked, wandering, melancholy ghost!
 Achilles, musing as he roll'd his eyes
 O'er the dead hero, thus (unheard) replies:
 "Die thou the first! When Jove and Heaven ordain,
 I follow thee"—He said, and stripp'd the slain.
 Then, forcing backward from the gaping wound
 The reeking javelin, cast it on the ground.
 The thronging Greeks behold with wondering eyes
 His manly beauty and superior size:

While some, ignobler, the great dead deface
 With wound ungenerous, or with taunts disgrace.
 "How chang'd that Hector! who like Jove of late
 Sent lightning on our fleets, and scatter'd fate!"
 High o'er the slain the great Achilles stands,
 Begirt with heroes, and surrounding bands;
 And thus aloud, while all the hosts attend:
 "Princes and leaders! countrymen and friends!
 Since now at length the powerful will of Heaven
 The dire destroyer to our arm has given,
 Is not 'Troy fall'n already? Haste, ye powers!
 See, if already their deserted towers
 Are left unmann'd; or if they yet retain
 The souls of heroes, their great Hector slain?
 But what is Troy, or glory what, to me?
 Or why reflects my mind on aught but thee,
 Divine Patroclus! Death has seal'd his eyes;
 Unwept, unhonour'd, uninterr'd, he lies!
 Can his dear image from my soul depart,
 Long as the vital spirit moves my heart?
 If, in the melancholy shades below,
 The flames of friends and lovers cease to glow,
 Yet mine shall sacred last; y mine undecay'd,
 Burn on through death, and animate my shade.
 Meanwhile, ye sons of Greece, in triumph bring
 The corpse of Hector, and your peans sing.
 Be this the song, slow-moving tow'rd the shore,
 'Hector is dead, and Ilium is no more."
 Then his fell soul a thought of vengeance bred
 (Unworthy of himself and of the dead).
 The nervous ancles bor'd, his feet he bound
 With thongs inserted through the double wound;
 These fix'd up high behind the rolling wain,
 His graceful head was trall'd along the plain.
 Proud on his car th' insulting victor stood,
 And bore aloft his arms, distilling blood.
 He smites the steeds; the rapid chariot flies;
 The sudden clouds of circling dust arise.
 Now lost is all that formidable air;
 The face divine, and long-descending hair,
 Purple the ground, and streak the sable sand;
 Deform'd, dishonour'd, in his native land
 Giv'n to the rage of an insulting throng!
 And in his parents' sight now dragg'd along!
 The mother first beheld with sad survey:
 She rent her tresses, venerably gray,
 And cast, far off, the regal veils away.
 With piercing shrieks his bitter fate she moans,
 While the sad father answers groans with groans;
 Tears after tears his mournful cheeks o'erflow,
 And the whole city wears one face of woe:
 No less than if the rage of hostile fires,
 From her foundations curling to her spires,
 O'er the proud citadel at length should rise,
 And the last blaze send Ilium to the skies.
 The wretched monarch of the falling state,
 Distracted, presses to the Dardan gate.
 Scarce the whole people stop his desperate course,
 While strong affliction gives the feeble force;
 Grief tears his heart, and drives him to and fro,
 In all the raging impotence of woe.
 At length he roll'd in dust, and thus begun:
 Imploring all, and naming one by one:
 "Ah let me, let me go where sorrow calls:
 I, only I, will issue from your walls,
 (Guide or companion, friends! I ask you none)
 And bow before the murderer of my son.
 My grief perhaps his pity may engage;
 Perhaps at least he may respect my age.

He has a father too, a man like me;
 One, not exempt from age and misery
 (Vigorous no more, as when his young embrace Begot this pest of me and all my race);
 How many valiant sons, in early bloom,
 Has that curst hand sent headlong to the tomb!
 Thee, Hector! last: thy loss (divinely brave)
 Sinks my sad soul with sorrow to the grave.
 Oh, had thy gentle spirit past in peace,
 The son expiring in the sire's embrace,
 While both thy parents wept thy fatal hour,
 And, bending o'er thee, mix'd the tender shower!
 Some comfort that had been, some sad relief,
 To melt in full satiety of grief!"

Thus wall'd the father, groveling on the ground,
 And all the eyes of Ilium stream'd around.

Amidst her matrons, Hecuba appears,
 (A mourning princess, and a train in tears)
 "Ah, why has Heaven prolong'd this hated breath,
 Patient of horrors, to behold thy death?
 O Hector! late thy parents' pride and joy,
 The boast of nations! the defence of Troy!
 To whom her safety and her fame she ow'd;
 Her chief, her hero, and almost her god!
 O fatal change! become in one sad day
 A senseless corpse! inanimated clay!"

But not as yet the fatal news had spread
 To fair Andromache, of Hector dead;
 As yet no messenger had told his fate,
 Nor ev'n his stay without the Scæan gate.
 Far in the close recesses of the dome,
 Pensive she ply'd the melancholy loom;
 A glowing work employ'd her secret hours,
 Confus'dly gay with intermingled flowers.
 Her fair-hair'd handmaids beat the brazen urn,
 The bath preparing for her lord's return:
 In vain: alas! her lord returns no more!
 Unbath'd he lies, and bleeds along the shore!
 Now from the walls the clamours reach her ear,
 And all her members shake with sudden fear;
 Forth from her ivory hand the shuttle falls,
 As thus, astonish'd, to her maids she calls:

"Ah, follow me!" (she cry'd) "what plaintive noise

Invas'd my ear? 'Tis sure my mother's voice.
 My faltering knees their trembling frame desert,
 A pulse unusual flutters at my heart;
 Some strange disaster, some reverse of fate,
 (Ye gods avert it!) threats the Trojan state.
 Far be the omen which my thoughts suggest!
 But much I fear my Hector's dauntless breast
 Confronts Achilles; chas'd along the plain,
 Shut from our walls! I fear, I fear him slain!
 Safe in the crowd he ever scorn'd to wait,
 And sought for glory in the jaws of fate:
 Perhaps that noble heat has coot his breath,
 Now quench'd for ever in the arms of death?"

She spoke; and furious, with distracted pace,
 Fears in her heart, and anguish in her face,
 Flies through the dome, (the maids her steps pursue)
 And mounts the walls, and sends around her view.
 Too soon her eyes the killing object found,
 The god-like Hector dragg'd along the ground.
 A sudden darkness shades her swimming eyes:
 She faints, she falls; her breath, her colour, flies.

Her hair's fair ornaments, the braids that bound,
 The net that held them, and the wreath that
 The veil and diadem, flew far away [crown'd,
 (The gift of Venus on her bridal day)
 Around a train of weeping sisters stands,
 To raise her, sinking, with assistant hands.
 Scarce from the verge of death recall'd, again
 She faints, or but recovers to complain.

"O wretched husband of a wretched wife!
 Born with one fate, to one unhappy life!
 For sure one star its baneful beam display'd
 On Priam's roof and Hippoplacia's shade.
 From different parents, different climes, we came,
 At different periods, yet our fates the same!
 Why was my birth to great Aëtion ow'd,
 And why was all that tender care bestow'd?
 Would I had never been!—O thou, the ghost
 Of my dead husband! miserably lost;
 Thou, to the dismal realms for ever gone!
 And I abandon'd, desolate, alone!
 An only child, once comfort of my pains,
 Sad product now of hapless love, remains!
 No more to smile upon his sire, no friend
 To help him now! no father to defend!
 For should he 'scape the sword, the common doom,
 What wrongs attend him, and what griefs to come!

Ev'n from his own paternal roof expell'd,
 Some stranger ploughs his patrimonial field.
 The day, that to the shades the father sends,
 Robs the sad orphan of his father's friends:
 He, wretched outcast of mankind! appears
 For ever sad, for ever bath'd in tears!
 Amongst the happy, unregard'd he
 Hangs on the robe, or trembles at the knee,
 While those his father's former bounty fed,
 Nor reach the goblet, nor divide the bread:
 The kindest but his present wants allay,
 To leave him wretched the succeeding day.
 Frugal compassion! Heedless, they who best
 Both parents still, nor feel what he has lost,
 Shall cry, 'Be gone! thy father feasts not here!'
 The wretch obeys, retiring with a tear.
 Thus wretched, thus retiring all in tears,
 To my sad soul Astyanax appears!
 Forc'd by repeated insults to return,
 And to his widow'd mother vainly mourn.
 He, who, with tender delicacy bred,
 With princes sported, and on dainties fed,
 And when still evening gave him up to rest,
 Sunk in soft down upon the nurse's breast,
 Must—ah what must he not? Whom Ilium calls
 Astyanax, from her well-guarded walls,
 Is now that name no more, unhappy boy!
 Since now no more the father guards his Troy.
 But thou, my Hector, ly'st expos'd in air,
 Far from thy parents' and thy consort's care,
 Whose hand in vain, directed by her love,
 The martial scarf and robe of triumph wove.
 Now to devouring flames be these a prey,
 Useless to thee from this accursed day!
 Yet let the sacrifice at least be paid,
 An honour to the living, not the dead."

So spake the mournful dame: her matrons hast,
 Sigh back her sighs, and answer tear with tear.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XXIII.

ARGUMENT.

ACHILLES and the Myrmidons do honour to the body of Patroclus. After the funeral feast, he retires to the sea shore, where, falling asleep, the ghost of his friend appears to him, and demands the rites of burial; the next morning the soldiers are sent with mules and waggons to fetch wood for the pyre. The funeral procession, and the offering their hair to the dead. Achilles sacrifices several animals, and lastly twelve Trojan captives, at the pile; then sets fire to it. He pays libations to the winds, which (at the instance of Iris) rise, and raise the flames. When the pile has burned all night, they gather the bones, place them in an urn of gold, and raise the tomb. Achilles institutes the funeral games: the chariot-race, the fight of the cestus, the wrestling, the foot-race, the single combat, the discus, the shooting with arrows, the darting the javelin: the various descriptions of which, and the various success of the several antagonists, make the greatest part of the book.

In this book ends the thirtieth day. The night following, the ghost of Patroclus appears to Achilles: the one and thirtieth day is employed in falling the timber for the pile; the two and thirtieth in burning it; and the three and thirtieth in the games. The scene is generally on the sea-shore.

Thus, humbled in the dust, the pensive train
Through the sad city mourn'd her hero slain.
The body soil'd with dust, and black with gore,
Lies on broad Hellespont's resounding shore:
The Grecians seek their ships, and clear the strand,
All, but the martial Myrmidonian band;
These yet assembled great Achilles holds,
And the stern purpose of his mind unfolds:
"Not yet, my brave companions of the war,
Release your smoking coursers from the car;
But, with his chariot each in order led,
Perform due honours to Patroclus dead.
Ere yet from rest or food we seek relief,
Some rites remain, to glut our rage of grief."

The troops obey'd; and thrice in order led (Achilles first) their coursers round the dead;
And thrice their sorrows and laments renew:
Tears bathe their arms, and tears the sands bedew.
For such a warrior Thetis aids their woe, [flow.
Melts their strong hearts, and bids their eyes to
But chief, Pelides: thick succeeding sighs
Burst from his heart, and torrents from his eyes:
His slaughtering hands, yet red with blood, he laid
On his dead friend's cold breast, and thus he said:
"All hail, Patroclus! let thy honour'd ghost
Bear, and rejoice, on Pluto's dreary coast;

Behold! Achilles' promise is complete;
The bloody Hector stretch'd before thy feet.
Lo! to the dogs his carcase I resign;
And twelve sad victims, of the Trojan line,
Sacred to vengeance, instant, shall expire;
Their lives effus'd, around thy funeral pyre."
Gloomy he said, and (horrible to view)
Before the bier the bleeding Hector threw,
Pronc on the dust. The Myrmidons around
Unbraç'd their armour, and the steeds unbound.
All to Achilles' sable ship repair,
Frequent and full, the genial feast to share.
Now from the well-fed swine black smokes aspire,
The bristly victims hissing o'er the fire:
The huge ox bellowing falls; with feebler cries
Expires the goat; the sheep in silence dies.
Around the hero's prostrate body flow'd,
In one promiscuous stream, the reeking blood.
And now a band of Argive monarchs brings
The glorious victor to the king of kings.
From his dead friend the pensive warrior went,
With steps unwilling, to the regal tent.
Th' attending heralds, as by office bound,
With kindled flames the tripod vase surround;
To cleanse his conquering hands from hostile gore,
They urg'd in vain; the chief refus'd, and swore:
"No drop shall touch me, by almighty Jove!
The first and greatest of the gods above!
Till on the pyre I place thee; till I rear
The grassy mound, and clip thy sacred hair:
Some ease at least those pious rites may give,
And soothe my sorrows while I bear to live.
How'er, reluctant as I am, I stay,
And share your feast; but, with the dawn of day,
(O king of men!) it claims thy royal care,
That Greece the warrior's funeral pile prepare.
And bid the forests fall (such rites are paid
To heroes slumbering in eternal shade).
Then, when his earthly part shall mount in fire,
Let the leagued squadrons to their post retire."
He spoke; they bear him, and the word-obey;
The rage of hunger and of thirst allay,
Then ease in sleep the labours of the day.
But great Pelides stretch'd along the shore,
Where dash'd on rocks the broken billows roar,
Lies inly groaning; while on either hand
The martial Myrmidons confus'dly stand.
Along the grass his languid members fall,
Thr'd with his chase around the Trojan wall;
Hush'd by the murmurs of the rolling deep,
At length he sinks in the soft arms of sleep.
When, lo! the shade, before his closing eyes,
Of sad Patroclus rose, or seem'd to rise;
In the same robe he living wore, he came;
In stature, voice, and pleasing look, the same.
The form familiar hover'd o'er his head:
"And sleeps Achilles," (thus the phantom said)
"Sleeps my Achilles, his Patroclus dead?
Living, I seem'd his dearest, tenderest care,
But now forgot, I wander in the air.
Let my pale corpse the rites of burial know,
And give me entrance in the realms below:
Till then the spirit finds no resting place,
But here and there th' unbody'd spectres chase
The vagrant dead around the dark abode,
Forbidden to cross th' irremovable flood.
Now give thy hand: for to the farther shore
When once we pass, the soul returns no more:
When once the last funeral flames ascend,
No more shall meet Achilles and his friend;

No more our thoughts to those we lov'd make
Or quit the dearest, to converse alone. [known ;
Me fate has sever'd from the sons of earth,
The fate foredoom'd that waited from my birth :
Thee too it waits ; before the Trojan wall
Ev'n great and godlike thou art doom'd to fall.
Hear then ; and as in fate and love we join,
Ah, suffer that my bones may rest with thine !
Together have we liv'd ; together bred,
One house receiv'd us, and one table fed ;
That golden urn, thy goddess mother gave,
May mix our ashes in one common grave."
" And is it thou ? " (he answers) " to my sight
Once more return'st thou from the realms of night ?

Oh more than brother ! Think each office paid,
Whate'er can rest a discontented shade ;
But grant one last embrace, unhappy boy !
Afford at least that melancholy joy."

He said, and with his longing arms essay'd
In vain to grasp the visionary shade ;
Like a thin smoke he sees the spirit fly,
And hears a feeble, lamentable cry.
Confus'd he wakes ; amazement breaks the bands
Of golden sleep, and, starting from the sands,
Pensive he muses with uplifted hands :

" 'Tis true, 'tis certain ; man, though dead, retains
Part of himself ; th' immortal mind remains :
The form subsists without the body's aid,
Aerial semblance, and an empty shade !
This night my friend, so late in battle lost,
Stood at my side, a pensive, plaintive ghost ;
Ev'n now familiar, as in life, he came,
Alas ! how different ! yet how like the same ! "

Thus while he spoke, each eye grew big with
And now the rosy-finger'd Morn appears, [tears :
Shows every mournful face with tears o'erspread,
And glares on the pale visage of the dead.

But Agamemnon, as the rites demand,
With mules and waggon sends a chosen band,
To load the timber, and the pile to rear ;
A charge consign'd to Merion's faithful care.
With proper instruments they take the road,
Axes to cut, and ropes to sling the load.
First march the heavy mules, securely slow,
O'er hills, o'er dales, o'er crags, o'er rocks, they go :
Jumping, high o'er the shrubs of the rough ground,
Rattle the clattering cars, and the shockt axes
But when arriv'd at Ida's spreading woods [bound.
(Fair Ida water'd with descending floods)

Loud sounds the axe, redoubling strokes on strokes ;
On all sides round the forest hurts her oaks
Headlong. Deep-echoing groan the thickets brown ;
Then, rustling, crackling, crashing, thunder down.
The wood the Grecians cleave, prepar'd to burn ;
And the slow mules the same rough road return.

The sturdy woodmen equal burdens bore
(Such charge was given them) to the sandy shore ;
There, on the spot which great Achilles show'd,
They eas'd their shoulders, and dispos'd the load ;
Circling around the place, where times to come
Shall view Patroclus' and Achilles' tomb.
The hero bids his martial troops appear
High on their cars, in all the pomp of war ;
Each in refulgent arms his limbs attires,
All mount their chariots, combatants and squires.
The chariots first proceed, a shining train ;
Then clouds of foot that smoke along the plain ;
Next these a melancholy band appear,
Amidst, lay dead Patroclus on the bier :

O'er all the corpse their scatter'd locks they throw ;
Achilles next, oppress'd with mighty woe,
Supporting with his hands the hero's head,
Bends o'er th' extended body of the dead.
Patroclus decent on th' appointed ground
They place, and heap the sylvan pile around.
But great Achilles stands apart in prayer,
And from his head divides the yellow hair ;
Those curling locks which from his youth he vow'd,
And sacred grew, to Sperchius' honour'd flood ;
Then, sighing, to the deep his looks he cast,
And roll'd his eyes around the watery waste :

" Sperchius ! whose waves in mazy errors lot
Delightful roll along my native coast !
To whom we vainly vow'd, at our return,
These locks to fall, and hecatombs to burn :
Full fifty rams to bleed in sacrifice,
Where to the day thy silver fountains rise,
And where in shade of consecrated bowers
Thy altars stand, perfum'd with native flowers !
So vow'd my father, but he vow'd in vain ;
No more Achilles sees his native plain :
In that vain hope these hairs no longer grow,
Patroclus bears them to the shades below."

Thus o'er Patroclus while the hero pray'd,
On his cold hand the sacred lock he laid.
Once more afresh the Grecian sorrows flow :
And now the Sun had set upon their woe,
But to the king of men thus spoke the chief :

" Enough, Atrides ! give the troops relief :
Permit the mourning legions to retire,
And let the chiefs alone attend the pyre ;
The pious care be ours, the dead to burn"—
He said : the people to their ships return ;
While those deputed to inter the slain
Heep with a rising pyramid the plain.

A hundred foot in length, a hundred wide,
The growing structure spreads on every side ;
High on the top the manly corpse they lay,
And well-fed sheep and sable oxen slay :
Achilles cover'd with their fat the dead,
And the pil'd victims round the body spread ;
Then jars of honey, and of fragrant oil,
Suspend around, low-bending o'er the pile.
Four sprightly coursers, with a deadly groan,
Pour forth their lives, and on the pyre are thrown.
Of nine large dogs, domestic at his board,
Fall two, selected to attend their lord,
Then last of all, and horrible to tell,
Sad sacrifice ! twelve Trojan captives fell.
On these the rage of fire victorious preys,
Involves and joins them in one common blaze.
Smear'd with the bloody rites, he stands on high,
And calls the spirit with a dreadful cry :

" All hail, Patroclus ! let thy vengeful ghost
Hear, and exult, on Pluto's dreary coast.
Behold Achilles' promise fully paid,
Twelve Trojan heroes offer'd to thy shade ;
But heavier fates on Hector's corpse attend,
Sav'd from the flames for hungry dogs to rend."

So spake he threatening ; but the gods made vain
His threat, and guard inviolate the slain ;
Celestial Venus hover'd o'er his head,
And roseate unguents, heavenly fragrance ! shed :
She watch'd him all the night, and all the day,
And drove the blood-hounds from their destin'd prey.
Nor sacred Phoebus less employ'd his care ;
He pour'd around a veil of gather'd air,
And kept the nerves undry'd, the flesh entire,
Against the solar beam and Syrian fire.

Nor yet the pile where dead Patroclus lies,
 Smokes, nor as yet the sullen flames arise ;
 But fast beside, Achilles stood in prayer,
 Look'd the gods, whose spirit moves the air,
 And victims promis'd, and libations cast,
 To gentle Zephyr and the Boreal blast :
 He call'd th' ærial powers, along the skies
 To breathe, and whisper to the fires to rise.
 The winged Iris heard the hero's call,
 And instant hasten'd to their airy hall,
 Where, in old Zephyr's open courts on high,
 Sat all the blustering brethren of the sky.
 She shone amidst them, on her painted bow ;
 The rocky pavement glitter'd with the show.
 All from the banquet rise, and each invites
 The various goddess to partake the rites :
 " Not so" (the dame reply'd) " I haste to go
 To sacred Ocean, and the floods below :
 Ev'n now our solemn hecatombs attend,
 And Heaven is feasting on the world's green end,
 With righteous Æthiops (uncorrupted train !)
 Far on th' extremest limits of the main."
 But Peleus' son entreats, with sacrifice,
 The Western spirit, and the North to rise ;
 " Let on Patroclus' pile your blast be driven,
 And bear the blazing honours high to Heaven."
 Swift as the word she vanish'd from their view :
 Swift as the word the winds tumultuous flew ;
 Porth burst the stormy band with thundering roar,
 And heaps on heaps the clouds are tost before.
 To the wide main them stooping from the skies,
 The heaving deeps in watery mountains rise :
 Troy feels the blast along her shaking walls,
 Till on the pile the gather'd tempest falls.
 The structure crackles in the roaring fires,
 And all the night the plenteous flame aspires.
 All night Achilles hails Patroclus' soul,
 With large libations from the golden bowl.
 As a poor father, helpless and undone,
 Mourns o'er the ashes of an only son,
 Takes a sad pleasure the last bones to burn,
 And pours in tears, ere yet they close the urn :
 So stay'd Achilles, circling round the shore,
 So watch'd the flames, 'till now they flame no more.
 'Twas when, emerging through the shades of night,
 The morning planet told th' approach of light ;
 And fast behind, Aurora's warmer ray
 O'er the broad ocean pour'd the golden day :
 Then sunk the blaze, the pile no longer burn'd ;
 And to their caves the whistling winds return'd ;
 Across the Thracian seas their course they bore ;
 The ruffled seas beneath their passage roar.
 Then parting from the pile he ceas'd to weep,
 And sunk to quiet in th' embrace of sleep,
 Exhausted with his grief : meanwhile the crowd
 Of thronging Grecians round Achilles stood ;
 The tumult wak'd him : from his eyes he shook
 Cawling slumber, and the chiefs bespoke :
 " Ye kings and princes of th' Achaian name !
 First let us quench the yet remaining flame
 With sable wine ; then (as the rites direct)
 The hero's bones with careful view select :
 (Apart, and easy to be known, they lie
 Amidst the heap, and obvious to the eye :
 The rest around the margin will be seen
 Promiscuous, steeds and immolated men).
 These, wrapt in double calls of fat, prepare ;
 And in the golden vase dispose with care ;
 There let them rest, with decent honour laid,
 Till I shall follow to th' infernal shade,

Meantime erect the tomb with pious hands,
 A common structure on the humble sands ;
 Hereafter Greece some nobler work may raise,
 And late posterity record our praise."

The Greeks obey ; where yet the embers glow,
 Wide o'er the pile the sable wine they throw,
 And deep subdues the ashy heap below.
 Next, the white bones his sad companions place,
 With tears collected, in the golden vase.
 The sacred relics to the tent they bore ;
 The urn a veil of linen cover'd o'er.
 That done, they hid the sepulchre aspire,
 And cast the deep foundations round the pyre ;
 High in the midst they heap the swelling bed
 Of rising earth, memorial of the dead.

The swarming populace the chief detains,
 And leads amidst a wide extent of plains ;
 There plac'd them round : then from the ships proceeds

A train of oxen, mules, and stately steeds,
 Vases and tripods (for the funeral games)
 Resplendent brass, and more resplendent dames.
 First stood the prizes to reward the force
 Of rapid racers in the dusty course :
 A woman for the first in beauty's bloom,
 Skill'd in the needle, and the labouring loom ;
 And a large vase, where two bright handles rise,
 Of twenty measures its capacious size.
 The second victor claims a mare unbroks,
 Big with a mule unknowing of the yoke :
 The third a charger yet untouched by flame ;
 Four ample measures held the shining frame ;
 Two golden talents for the fourth were plac'd ;
 An ample double bowl contents the last.
 These in fair order rang'd upon the plain,
 The hero, rising, thus address the train :

" Behold the prizes, valiant Greeks ! decreed
 To brave the rulers of the racing steed ;
 Prizes which none beside ourself could gain,
 Should our immortal coursers take the plain
 (A race unrival'd, which from ocean's god
 Peleus receiv'd, and on his son bestow'd).
 But this no time our vigour to display ;
 Nor suit with them the games of this sad day ;
 Lost is Patroclus now, that wont to deck
 Their flowing manes, and sleek their glossy neck.
 Sad, as they shar'd in human grief, they stand,
 And trail those graceful honours on the sand ;
 Let others for the noble task prepare,
 Who trust the courser, and the flying car."

Fir'd at his word, the rival racers rise ;
 But far the first, Eumelus, hopes the prize,
 Fam'd through Pieria for the fleetest breed,
 And skill'd to manage the high-bounding steed.
 With equal ardour bold Tydides swell'd
 The steeds of Tros beneath his yoke compell'd
 (Which late obey'd the Dardan chief's command,
 When scarce a god redeem'd him from his hand).
 Then Menelaüs his Podargus brings,
 And the fam'd courser of the king of kings :
 Whom rich Echeopolus (more rich than brave)
 To 'scape the wars, to Agamemnon gave,
 (Æthe her name) at home to end his days ;
 Base wealth preferring to eternal praise.
 Next him Antilochus demands the course,
 With beating heart, and cheers his Pylian horse.
 Experienc'd Nestor gives his son the reins,
 Directs his judgment, and his heat restrains ;
 Nor idly warns the hoary sire, nor hears
 The prudent son with unattending ears :

" My son ! though youthful ardour fire thy breast,
The gods have lov'd thee, and with arts have blest.
Neptune and Jove on thee conferr'd the skill,
Swift round the goal to turn the flying wheel.
To guide thy conduct, little precept needs ;
But slow, and past their vigour, are my steeds.
Fear not thy rivals, though for swiftness known ;
Compare those rivals' judgment, and thy own :
It is not strength, but art, obtains the prize,
And to be swift is less than to be wise.

'Tis more by art, than force of numerous strokes,
The dextrous woodman shapes the stubborn oaks ;
By art the pilot, through the boiling deep
And howling tempest, steers the fearless ship ;
And 'tis the artist wins the glorious course,
Not those who trusts in chariots and in horse.
In'vain ; unskilful, to the goal they strive,
And short, or wide, the ungovern'd courser drive :
While with sure skill, though with inferior steeds,
The knowing racer to his end proceeds ;
Fix'd on the goal his eye fore-runs the course,
His hand unerring steers the steady horse,
And now contracts or now extends the rein,
Observing still the foremost on the plain.
Mark then the goal, 'tis easy to be found ;
Yon aged trunk, a cubit from the ground,
Of some once stately oak the last remains,
Or hardy fir, unperish'd with the rains :

Enclos'd with stones, conspicuous from afar ;
And round, a circle for the wheeling car
(Some tomb, perhaps, of old, the dead to grace ;
Or then, as now, the limit of a race) ;
Bear close to this, and warily proceed,
A little bending to the left-hand steed :
But urge the right, and give him all the reins ;
While thy strict hand his fellow's head restrains,
And turns him short ; till, doubling as they roll,
The wheel's round naves appear to brush the goal.
Yet (not to break the car, or lame the horse)
Clear of the stony heap direct the course ;
Lest, through incaution failing, thou may'st be
A joy to others, a reproach to me.
So shalt thou pass the goal, secure of mind,
And leave unskilful swiftness far behind ;
Though thy fierce rival drove the matchless steed
Which bore Adrastus, of celestial breed ;
Or the faun'd race, through all the regions known,
That whirl'd the car of proud Laomedon."

Thus (nought unsaid) the much-advising sage
Concludes ; then sate, stiff with unyielding age.
Next bold Meriones was seen to rise,
The last, but not least ardent for the prize.
They mount their seats ; the lots their place dispose

(Roll'd in his helmet, these Achilles throws).
Young Nestor leads the race : Eumelus then ;
And next, the brother of the king of men :
Thy lot, Meriones, the fourth was cast ;
And far the bravest, Diomed, was last.
They stand in order, an impatient train ;
Pelides points the barrier on the plain,
And sends before old Phoenix to the place,
To mark the racers, and to judge the race.
At once the coursers from the barrier bound ;
The lifted scourges all at once resound ;
Their hearts, their eyes, their voice, they send before ;

And up the champaign thunder from the shore :
Thick, where they drive, the dusty clouds arise,
And the lost courser in the whirlwind flies ;

Loose on their shoulders the long manes, reclin'd,
Float in their speed, and dance upon the wind :
The smoking chariots, rapid as they bound,
Now seem to touch the sky, and now the ground.
While, hot for fame, and conquest all their care,
(Each o'er his flying courser hung in air)
Erect with ardour, pois'd upon the rein,
They pant, they stretch, they shout along the plain.
Now (the last compass fetch'd around the goal)
At the near prize each gathers all his soul,
Each burns with double hope, with double pain,
Tears up the shore, and thunders toward the main.
First flew Eumelus on Phœtian steeds ;
With those of Troas bold Diomed succeeds :
Close on Eumelus' back they puff the wind,
And seem just mounting on his car behind ;
Full on his neck he feels the sultry breeze,
And, hovering o'er, their stretching shadow sees.
Then had he lost, or left a doubtful prize :
But angry Phœbus to Tydides flies,
Strikes from his hand the scourge, and renders vain
His matchless horses' labour on the plain.
Rage fills his eye, with anguish to survey,
Snatch'd from his hope, the glories of the day.
The fraud celestial Pallas sees with pain,
Springs to her knight, and gives the scourge again,
And fills his steeds with vigour. At a stroke,
She breaks his rival's chariot from the yoke ;
Nor more their way the startled horses held ;
The car revers'd came rattling on the field ;
Shot headlong from his seat, beside the wheel,
Prone on the dust th' unhappy master fell ;
His batter'd face and elbows strike the ground ;
Nose, mouth, and front, one undistinguish'd wound :
Grief stops his voice, a torrent drowns his eyes ;
Before him far the glad Tydides flies ;
Minerva's spirit drives his matchless pace,
And crowns him victor of the labour'd race.

The next, though distant, Menelaus succeeds ;
While thus young Nestor animates his steeds :
" Now, now, my generous pair, exert your force ;
Not that we hope to match Tydides' horse,
Since great Minerva wings their rapid way,
And gives their lord the honours of the day.
But reach Atrides ! shall his mare out-go
Your swiftness, vanquish'd by a female foe ?
Through your neglect, if lagging on the plain
The last ignoble gift be all we gain ;
No more shall Nestor's hand your food supply,
The old man's fury rises, and ye die.
Haste then ; yon narrow road before our sight
Presents the occasion, could we use it right."

Thus he. The coursers, at their master's threat,
With quicker steps the sounding champaign beat.
And now Antiochus, with nice survey,
Observes the compass of the hollow way.
'Twas where, by force of wintery torrents torn,
Fast by the road a precipice was worn :
Here, where but one could pass to shun the throng,
The Spartan hero's chariot smok'd along.
Close up the venturous youth resolves to keep,
Still edging near, and bears him tow'rd the steep.
Atrides, trembling, casts his eye below,
And wonders at the rashness of his foe. [to ride
" Hold, stay your steeds !—What madness thus
This narrow way ! Take larger field," he cry'd,
" Or both must fall."—Atrides cry'd in vain,
He flies more fast, and throws up all the rein.
Far as an able arm the disk can send,
When youthful rivals their full force extend,

So far, Antilochus! thy chariot flew
 Before the king: he, cautious, backward drew
 His horse compell'd; foreboding in his fears
 The rattling ruin of the clashing cars,
 The floundering coursers rolling on the plain,
 And conquest lost through frantic haste to gain:
 But thus upbraids his rival, as he flies;
 "Go, furious youth! ungenerous and unwise!
 Go, but expect not I'll the prize resign;—
 Add perjury to fraud, and make it thine."
 Then to his steeds with all his force he cries;
 "Be swift, be vigorous, and regain the prize!
 Your rivals, destitute of youthful force,
 With fainting knees shall labour in the course,
 And yield the glo'ry yours."—The steeds obey;
 Already at their heels they wing their way,
 And seem already to retrieve the day.

Meantime the Grecians in a ring beheld
 The coursers bounding o'er the dusty field.
 The first who mark'd them was the Cretan king;
 High on a rising ground, above the ring,
 The monarch sat: from whence, with sure survey,
 He well observ'd the chief who led the way,
 And heard from far his animating cries,
 And saw the foremost steed with sharpen'd eyes;
 On whose broad front, a blaze of shining white,
 Like the full Moon, stood obvious to the sight.
 He saw; and, rising, to the Greeks began:
 "Are yonder horse discern'd by me alone?
 Or can ye, all, another chief survey,
 And other steeds, than lately led the way?
 Those, though the swiftest, by some god withheld,
 Lie sure disabled in the middle field:
 For, since the goal they doubled, round the plain
 I search to find them, but I search in vain.
 Perchance the reins forsook the driver's hand,
 And, tum'd too short, he tumbled on the strand,
 Shot from the chariot; while his coursers stray
 With frantic fury from the destin'd way.
 Rise then some other, and inform my sight
 (For these dim eyes, perhaps, discern not right)
 Yet sure he seems (to judge by shape and air)
 The great Ætolian chief, renown'd in war."
 "Old man!" (Oiléus rashly thus replies)
 "Thy tongue too hastily confers the prize;
 Of those who view the course, not sharpest-ey'd,
 Nor youngest, yet the readiest to decide.
 Eumelus' steeds, high-bounding in the chase,
 Still, as at first, unrival'd lead the race;
 I well discern him as he shakes the rein,
 And hear his shouts victorious o'er the plain."
 Thus he. Idomeneus, incens'd, rejoin'd:
 "Barbarous of words! and arrogant of mind!
 Contentious prince, of all the Greeks beside
 The last in merit, as the first in pride:
 To vile reproach what answer can we make?
 A goblet or a tripod let us stake,
 And be the king the judge. The most unwise
 Will learn their rashness, when they pay the prize."
 He said: and Ajax, by mad passion borne,
 Stern had reply'd; fierce scorn enhancing scorn
 To fell extremes: but Thétis' godlike son
 Arful amidst them rose, and thus began:
 "Forbear, ye chiefs! reproachful to contend;
 Much would you blame, should others thus offend:
 And lo! th' approaching steeds your contest end."
 No sooner had he spoke, but, thundering near,
 Drives through a stream of dust the charioteer.
 High o'er his head the circling lash he wields;
 His bounding horses scarcely touch the fields:

His car amidst the dusty whirlwind roll'd,
 Bright with the mingled blaze of tin and gold,
 Refulgent through the cloud; no eye could find
 The track his flying wheels had left behind:
 And the fierce coursers urg'd their rapid pace
 So swift, it seem'd a flight, and not a race.
 Now victor at the goal Tydides stands,
 Quits his bright car, and springs upon the sands;
 From the hot steeds the sweaty torrents stream;
 The well-ply'd whip is hung athwart the beam:
 With joy brave Stelmelus receives the prize,
 The tripod-vaso, and dame with radiant eyes:
 These to the ships his train triumphant leads,
 The chief himself unyokes the panting steeds.

Young Nestor follows (who by art, not force,
 O'er-past Atrides) second in the course.
 Behind, Atrides urg'd the race, more near
 Than to the courser in his swift career
 The following car, just touching with his heel,
 And brushing with his tail, the whirling wheel:
 Such and so narrow now the space between
 The rivals, late so distant on the green;
 So soon swift Æthe her lost ground regain'd,
 One length, one moment, had the race obtain'd.

Merion pursued, at greater distance still,
 With tardier coursers, and inferior skill.
 Last came, Admetus! thy unhappy son:
 Slow dragg'd the steeds his batter'd chariot on:
 Achilles saw, and pitying thus began:

"Behold! the man whose matchless art surpass
 The sons of Greece! the ablest, yet the last!
 Fortune denies, but justice bids us pay
 (Since great Tydides bears the first away)
 To him the second honours of the day."

The Greeks consent with loud applauding cries;
 And then Eumelus had received the prize:
 But youthful Nestor, jealous of his fame,
 Th' award opposes, and asserts his claim.
 "Think not," he cries, "I tamely will resign,
 O Peleus' son! the mare so justly mine.
 What if the gods, the skilful to confound, [ground?
 Have thrown the horse and horseman to the
 Perhaps he sought not Heaven by sacrifice,
 And vows omitted forfeited the prize.

If yet (distinction to thy friend to show,
 And please a soul desirous to bestow)
 Some gift must grace Eumelus; view thy store
 Of beauteous handmaids, steeds, and shining ore;
 An ample present let him thence receive,
 And Greece shall praise thy generous thirst to give.

But this my prize I never shall forego:
 This, who but touches, warriors! is my foe."

Thus spake the youth; nor did his words offend;
 Pleas'd with the well-turn'd flattery of a friend,
 Achilles smil'd: "The gift propos'd," he cry'd,
 "Antilochus! we shall ourself provide.
 With plates of brass the corselet cover'd o'er,
 (The same renown'd Asteropæus wore)
 Whose glittering margins rais'd with silver shine,
 (No vulgar gift) Eumelus, shall be thine."

He said: Automedon, at his command,
 The corselet brought, and gave it to his hand.
 Distinguish'd by his friend, his bosom glows
 With generous joy: then Menelaus rose;
 The herald plac'd the sceptre in h's hands,
 And still'd the clamour of the shouting bands.
 Not without cause incens'd at Nestor's son,
 And indy grieving, thus the king beg'n:

"The praise of wisdom, in thy youth obtain'd,
 An act so rash, Antilochus, has stain'd."

Robb'd of my glory and my just reward,
To you, O Grecians! be my wrong declar'd :
So not a leader shall our conduct blame,
Or judge me envious of a rival's fame.
But shall not we, ourselves, the truth maintain?
What needs appealing in a fact so plain?
What Greek shall blame me, if I bid thee rise,
And vindicate by oath th' ill-gotten prize?
Rise if thou dar'st, before thy chariot stand,
The driving scourge high-lifted in thy hand;
And touch thy steeds, and swear, thy whole intent

Was but to conquer, not to circumvent.
Swear by that god whose liquid arms surround
The globe, and whose dread earthquakes heave the
ground."

The prudent chief with calm attention heard;
Then mildly thus: "Excuse, if youth have err'd:
Superior as thou art, forgive th' offence,
Nor I thy equal, or in years, or sense.
Thou know'st the errors of unripen'd age,
Weak are its counsels, headlong is its rage.
The prize I quit, if thou the wrath resign;
The mare, or aught thou ask'st, be freely thine:
Ere I become (from thy dear friendship torn)
Hateful to thee, and to the gods forsworn."

So spoke Antilochus: and at the word
The mare contested to the king restor'd.
Joy swells his soul: as when the vernal grain
Lifts the green ear above the springing plain,
The fields their vegetable life renew,
And laugh and glitter with the morning dew;
Such joy the Spartan's shining face o'erspread,
And lifted his gay heart, while thus he said:

"Still may our souls, O generous youth! agree,
'Tis now Atrides' turn to yield to thee.
Rash heat, perhaps, a moment might control,
Not break, the settled temper of thy soul.
Not but (my friend) 'tis still the wiser way
To wave contention with superior sway;
For ah! how few, who should like thee offend,
Like thee have talents to regain the friend!
To plead indulgence, and thy fault atone,
Suffice thy father's merit and thy own:
Generous alike, for me, the sire and son
Have greatly suffer'd, and have greatly done.
I yield; that all may know, my soul can bend,
Nor is my pride prefer'd before my friend."

He said; and, pleas'd his passion to command,
Resign'd the courser to Noëman's hand,
Friend of the youthful chief: himself content,
The shining charger to his vessel sent.
The golden talents Merion next obtain'd;
The fifth reward, the double bowl, remain'd.
Achilles this to reverend Nestor bears,
And thus the purpose of his gift declares:
"Accept thou this, O sacred sire!" he said,
"In dear memorial of Patroclus dead;
Dead, and for ever lost, Patroclus lies,
For 'ever snatch'd from our desiring eyes!
Take thou this token of a grateful heart,
'Though 'tis not thine to hurl the distant dart,
'The quoit to toss, the ponderous mace to wield,
Or urge the race, or wrestle on the field,
Thy pristine vigour age has overthrown,
But left the glory of the past thy own."

He said, and plac'd the goblet at his side;
With joy the venerable king reply'd:
"Wisely and well, my son, thy words have prov'd
A senior honour'd, and a friend belov'd!

'Too true it is, deserted of my strength,
These wither'd arms and limbs have fail'd at length!
Oh! had I now that force I felt of yore, [at length
Known through Buprasium and the Pylian shore!
Victorious then in every solemn game,
Ordain'd to Amarynce's mighty name;
The brave Epeians gave my glory way,
Ætoliens, Pyliaus, all resign the day.
I quell'd Clytomedes in fights of hand,
And backward hurl'd Ancæus on the sand,
Surpass't Iphycus in the swift career,
Phyleus and Polydorus with the spear.
The sons of Actor won the prize of horse,
But won by numbers, not by art or force:
For the fam'd twins, impatient to survey
Prize after prize by Nestor borne away,
Sprung to their car; and with united pains
One lash'd the coursers, while one rul'd the reins.
Such once I was! Now to these tasks succeeds
A younger race, that emulate our deeds:
I yield, alas! (to age who must not yield?)
Though once the foremost hero of the field.
Go thou, my son! by generous friendship led,
With martial honours decorate the dead;
While pleas'd I take the gift thy hands present
(Pledge of benevolence, and kind intent);
Rejoic'd, of all the numerous Greeks, to see
Not one but honours sacred age and me:
Those due distinctions thou so well canst pay,
May the just gods return another day!"

Proud of the gift, thus spake the full of days
Achilles heard him, prouder of the praise.

The prizes next are order'd to the field,
For the bold champions who the costus wield.
A stately mule, as yet by toils unbrokè,
Of six years age, unconscious of the yoke,
Is to the Circus led, and firmly bound;
Next stands a goblet, massy, large, and round.
Achilles, rising, thus: "Let Greece excite
Two heroes equal to this hardy fight;
Who dare the foe with lifted arms provoke,
And rush beneath the long-descending stroke.
On whom Apollo shall the palm bestow,
And whom the Greeks supreme by conquest know,
This mule his dauntless labours shall repay;
The vanquish'd bear the massy bowl away."

This dreadful combat great Epëus chose;
High o'er the crowd, enormous bulk! he rose,
And seiz'd the beast, and thus began to say:
"Stand forth some man, to bear the bowl away!
(Prize of his ruin:) for who dares deny
This mule my right; th' undoubted victor I?
Others, 'tis own'd, in fields of battle shine,
But the first honours of this fight are mine;
For who excels in all? Then let my foe
Draw near, but first his certain fortune know;
Secure, this hand shall his whole frame confound,
Mash all his bones, and all his body pound:
So let his friends be nigh, a needful train,
To heave the batter'd carcass off the plain."

The giant spoke; and in a stupid gaze
The host beheld him, silent with amaze!
'Twas thou, Buryalus! who durst aspire
To meet his might, and emulate thy sire,
The great Mecistheus; who in days of yore
In Theban games the noblest trophy bore,
(The games ordain'd dead Oedipus to grace).
And singly vanquish'd the Cadmean race.
Him great Tydides urges to contend,
Warm'd with the hopes of conquest for his friend!

Officious with the chafure girds him round ;
 And to his wrist the gloves of death are bound.
 And the circle now each champion stands,
 And poises high in air his iron hands ;
 With clashing gauntlets now they fiercely close,
 Their crackling jaws re-echo to the blows,
 And painful sweat from all their members flows.
 At length Epëus dealt a weighty blow,
 Fell on the cheek of his unwary foe ;
 Beneath that ponderous arm's resistless sway
 Down dropt he, nerveless, and extended lay.
 As a large fish, when winds and waters roar,
 By some huge billow dash'd against the shore,
 Lies panting : not less batter'd with his wound,
 The bleeding hero pants upon the ground.
 To rear his fallen foe, the victor lends,
 Scowful, his hand ! and gives him to his friends ;
 Whose arms support him reeling through the throng,

And dragging his disabled legs along ;
 Nothing, his head hangs down his shoulder o'er ;
 His mouth and nostrils pour the clotted gore ;
 Wrapt round in mists he lies, and lost to thought ;
 His friends receive the bowl, too dearly bought.

The third bold game Achilles next demands,
 And calls the wrestlers to the level sands :
 A many tripod for the victor lies,
 Of twice six oxen its reputed price ;
 And next, the looser's spirits to restore,
 A female captive, valued but at four.
 Scarce did the chief the vigorous strife propose,
 When tower-like Ajax and Ulysses rose.
 Amid the ring each nervous rival stands,
 Embracing rigid with implicit hands :
 Close lock'd above, their heads and arms are mixt ;
 Below, their planted feet at distance fixt :
 Like two strong rafters which the builder forms,
 Proof to the wintry wind and howling storms,
 Their tops connected, but at wider space
 Fixt on the centre stands their solid base.
 Now to the grasp each manly body bends ;
 The humid sweat from every pore descends ;
 Their bones resound with blows : sides, shoulders,
 thighs,

Swell to each gripe, and bloody tumours rise.
 Nor could Ulysses, for his art remoun'd,
 Overturn the strength of Ajax on the ground ;
 Nor could the strength of Ajax overthrow
 The watchful caution of his artful foe.
 While the long strife ev'n tir'd the lookers-on,
 Thus to Ulysses spoke great Telamon :
 " O let me lift thee, chief, or lift thou me ;
 Prove we our force, and Jove the rest decree."
 He said ; and, straining, heav'd him off the
 ground

With matchless strength ; that time Ulysses found
 The strength t' evade, and where the nerves com-
 His ankle struck : the giant fell supine ; [bine
 Ulysses, following, on his boam lies ;
 Shouts of applause run rattling through the skies.
 Ajax to lift, Ulysses next essays,
 He barely stirr'd him, but he could not raise :
 His knee lock'd fast, the foe's attempt deny'd ;
 And grappling close, they tumbled side by side.
 Dead'd with honourable dust, they roll,
 Still breathing strife, and unsubdu'd of soul :
 Again they rage, again to combat rise ;
 When great Achilles thus divides the prize :
 " Your noble vigour, oh my friends ! restrain :
 For weary-out your generous strength in vain.

Ye both have won : let others who excel,
 Now prove that prowess you have prov'd so well."

The hero's words the willing chiefs obey,
 From their tir'd bodies wipe the dust away,
 And, cloth'd anew, the following games survey.

And now succeed the gifts ordain'd to grace
 The youths contending in the rapid race.
 A silver urn that full six measures held,
 By none in weight or workmanship excell'd ;
 Sidonian artists taught the frame to shine,
 Elaborate, with artifice divine ;
 Whence Tyrian sailors did the prize transport,
 And gave to Thoas at the Lemnian port :
 From him descended, good Eunæus heir'd
 The glorious gift ; and, for Lycaon spar'd,
 To brave Patroclus gave the rich reward.
 Now, the same hero's funeral rites to grace,
 It stands the prize of swiftness in the race.
 A well-fed ox was for the second plac'd ;
 And half a talent must content the last.
 Achilles rising then bespoke the train—

" Who hope the palm of swiftness to obtain,
 Stand forth, and bear these prizes from the plain."

The hero said, and, starting from his place,
 Oilean Ajax rises to the race ;
 Ulysses next ; and he whose speed surpast
 His youthful equals, Nestor's son the last.
 Rang'd in a line the ready racers stand ;
 Pelides points the barrier with his hand :
 All start at once ; Oileus led the race ;
 The next Ulysses, measuring pace with pace ;
 Behind him, diligently close, he sped,
 As closely following as the running thread
 The spindle follows, and displays the charms
 Of the fair spinster's breast, and moving arms :
 Graceful in motion thus his foe he plies,
 And treads each footstep ere the dust can rise :
 His glowing breath upon his shoulders plays ;
 Th' admiring Greeks loud acclamations raise :
 To him they give their wishes, hearts, and eyes,
 And send their souls before him as he flies.
 Now three times turn'd in prospect of the goal,
 The panting chief to Pallas lifts his soul :

" Assist, O goddess !" (thus in thought he pray'd)
 And present at his thought descends the maid.
 Buoy'd by her heavenly force, he seems to swim,
 And feels a pinion lifting every limb.
 All fierce, and ready now the prize to gain,
 Unhappy Ajax stumbles on the plain
 (O'erturn'd by Pallas) ; where the slippery shore
 Was clogg'd with slimy dung, and mingled gore
 (The self-same place, beside Patroclus' pyre,
 Where late the slaughter'd victims fed the fire) :
 Besmear'd with filth, and blotted o'er with clay,
 Obscene to sight, the rueful racer lay ;
 The well-fed bull (the second prize) he shar'd,
 And left the urn Ulysses' rich reward.

Then, grasping by the horn the mighty beast,
 The baffled hero thus the Greeks address :

" Accursed fate ! the conquest I forego ;
 A mortal I, a goddess was my foe ;
 She urg'd her favourite on the rapid way,
 And Pallas, not Ulysses, won the day."

Thus sourly wail'd he, sputtering dirt and
 gore ;

A burst of laughter echo'd through the shore.
 Antilochus, more humorous than the rest,
 Takes the last prize, and takes it with a jest :

" Why with our wiser elders should we strive ?
 The gods still love them, and they always thrive.

Ye see, to Ajax I must yield the prize:
He to Ulysses, still more ag'd and wise
(A green old-age; unconscious of d days,
That prove the hero born in better days!)
Behold his vigour in this active race!
Achilles only boasts a swifter pace:
For who can match Achilles! He who can,
Must yet be more than hero, more than man."

Th' effect succeeds the speech: Pelides cries,
"Thy artful praise deserves a better prize.
Nor Greece in vain shall hear thy friend extoll'd:
Receive a talent of the purest gold."
The youth departs content. The host admire
The son of Nestor, worthy of his sire. [brings;

Next these; a buckler, spear, and helm, he
Cast on the plain, the brazen burthen rings:
Arms, which of late divine Sarpedon wore,
And great Patroclus in short triumph bore.
"Stand forth the bravest of our host!" (he cries)

"Whoever dares deserve so rich a prize,
Now grace the list before our army's sight,
And, sheath'd in steel, provoke his foe to fight.
Who first the jointed armour shall explore,
And stain his rival's mail with issuing gore;
The sword Asteropous possess of old
(A Thracian blade, distinct with studs of gold)
Shall pay the stroke, and grace the striker's side:
These arms in common let the chiefs divide:
For each brave champion, when the combat ends,
A sumptuous banquet at our tent attends."

Fierce at the word, up-rose great Tydeus' son,
And the huge bulk of Ajax Telamon.
Clad in refulgent steel, on either hand,
The dreadful chiefs amid the circle stand:
Lowering they meet tremendous to the sight;
Each Argive bosom beats with fierce delight.
Oppos'd in arms not long they idly stood, [new'd,
But thrice they clos'd, and thrice the charge re-
A furious pass the spear of Ajax made [stay'd:
Through the broad shield, but at the corselet
Not thus the foe: his javelin aim'd above
The buckler's margin, at the neck he drove.
But Greece now trembling for her hero's life,
Bade share the honours, and surcease the strife:
Yet still the victor's due Tydides gains,
With him the sword and studded belt remains.

Then hurl'd the hero thundering on the ground
A mass of iron, (an enormous round)
Whose weight and size the circling Greeks admire,
Rude from a furnace, and but shap'd by fire.
This mighty quoit Aëtion wont to rear,
And from his whirling arm dismiss in air:
The giant by Achilles slain, he stow'd
Among his spoils this memorable load,
For this, he bids those nervous artists vie,
That teach the disk to sound along the sky.
"Let him whose might can hurl this bowl, arise;
Who farthest hurls it, takes it as his prize:
If he be one, enrich'd with large domain
Of downs for flocks, and arable for grain,
Small stock of iron needs that man provide;
His hinds and swains whole years shall be supply'd
From hence: nor ask the neighbouring city's aid,
For ploughshares, wheels, and all the rural trade."

Stern Polyperetes stept before the throng,
And great Leonteus, more than mortal strong;
Whose force with rival forces to oppose,
Up-rose great Ajax; up Epëus rose.
Each stood in order: first Epëus threw; [flew.
High o'er the wondering crowds the whirling circle

Leontes next a little space surpast,
And third, the strength of godlike Ajax cast.
O'er both their marks it flew; till fiercely flung
From Polyperetes' arm, the discus sung:
Far as a swain his whirling sheephook throws,
That distant falls among the grazing cows,
So past them all the rapid circle flies:
His friends (while loud applauses shake the skies)
With force conjoin'd heave off the weighty prize.

Those who in skilful archery contend,
He next invites the twanging bow to bend:
And twice ten axes cast amidst the round
(Ten double-edg'd, and ten that singly wound).
The mast, which late a first-rate galley bore,
The hero fixes in the sandy shore;
To the tall top a milk-white dove they tie,
Thè trembling mark at which their arrows fly.
"Whose weapon strikes yon fluttering bird, shall
bear

These two-edg'd axes, terrible in war:
The single, he, whose shaft divides the cord."
He said: experienc'd Merion took the word;
And skilful Teucer: in the helm they threw
Their lots inscrib'd, and forth the latter flew.
Swift from the string the sounding arrow flies;
But flies unblest! No grateful sacrifice,
No firstling lambs, unheedful! didst thou vow
To Phœbus, patron of the shaft and bow.
For this, thy well-aim'd arrow, turn'd aside,
Err'd from the dove, yet cut the cord that ty'd:
A-down the main-mast fell the parting string,
And the free bird to Heaven displays her wing:
Seas, shores, and skies, with loud applause resound,
And Merion eager meditates the wound:
He takes the bow, directs the shaft above,
And, following with his eye the soaring dove,
Implores the god to speed it through the skies,
With vows of firstling lambs, and grateful sacrifice.
The dove, in airy circles as she wheels,
Amid the clouds, the piercing arrow feels;
Quite through and through the point its passage
found,

And at his feet fell bloody to the ground.
The wounded bird, ere yet she breath'd her last,
With flagging wings alighted on the mast;
A moment hung, and spread her pinions there,
Then sudden dropt, and left her life in air.
From the pleas'd crowd new peals of thunder rise,
And to the ships brave Merion bears the prize.

To close the funeral games Achilles last
A massy spear amid the circle plac'd,
An ample charger of unsullied frame,
With flowers high-wrought, not blacken'd yet by flame.

For these he bids the heroes prove their art,
Whose dextrous skill directs the flying dart.
Here too great Merion hopes the noble prize;
Nor here disdain'd the king of men to rise.
With joy Pelides saw the honour paid,
Rose to the monarch, and respectful said:
"Thee first in virtue, as in power supreme,
O king of nations! all thy Greeks proclaim;
In every martial game thy worth attest,
And know thee both their greatest, and their best.
Take then the prize, but let brave Merion bear
This beamy javelin in thy brother's war."

Pleas'd from the hero's lips his praise to hear,
The king to Merion gives the brazen spear:
But, set apart to sacred use, commands
The glittering charger to Talthibius' hands.

THE ILIAD.

BOOK XXIV.

ARGUMENT.

THE REDEMPTION OF THE BODY OF HECTOR.

The gods deliberate about the redemption of Hector's body. Jupiter sends Thetis to Achilles, to dispose him for the restoring it; and Iris to Priam, to encourage him to go in person, and treat for it. The old king, notwithstanding the remonstrances of his queen, makes ready for the journey, to which he is encouraged by an omen from Jupiter. He sets forth in his chariot, with a waggon loaded with presents, under the charge of Idæus, the herald. Mercury descends in the shape of a young man, and conducts him to the pavilion of Achilles. Their conversation on the way. Priam finds Achilles at his table, casts himself at his feet, and begs for the body of his son; Achilles, mov'd with compassion, grants his request, detains him one night in his tent, and the next morning sends him home with the body. The Trojans run out to meet him. The lamentations of Andromache, Hecuba, and Helen! with the solemnities of the funeral.

The time of twelve days is employed in this book, while the body of Hector lies in the tent of Achilles: and as many more are spent in the truce allowed for his interment. The scene is partly in Achilles' camp, and partly in Troy.

Now from the finish'd games the Grecian band Seek their black ships, and clear the clouded strand:

All stretch'd at ease the genial banquet share,
And pleasing slumbers quiet all their care.
Not so Achilles: he to grief resign'd,
His friend's dear image present to his mind,
Takes his sad couch, more unobserv'd to weep;
Nor tastes the gifts of all-composing sleep.
Restless he roll'd around his weary bed,
And all his soul on his Patroclus fed:
The form so pleasing, and the heart so kind,
That youthful vigour, and that manly mind,
What toils they shar'd, what martial works
they wrought,

What seas they measur'd, and what fields they
All past before him in remembrance dear, [fought;
Thought follows thought, and tear succeeds to tear.
And now supine, now prone, the hero lay,
Now shifts his side, impatient for the day:
Then starting up, disconsolate he goes
Wide on the lonely beach to vent his woe.
There, as the solitary moorner raves,
The ruddy morning rises o'er the waves:
Soon as it rose, his furious steeds he join'd:
The chariot flies, and Hector trails behind.

And thrice, Patroclus! round thy monument
Was Hector dragg'd, then hurry'd to the tent.
There sleep at last o'ercomes the hero's eyes;
While foul in dust th' unhonour'd carcase lies,
But not deserted by the pitying skies.
For Phœbus watch'd it with superior care,
Preserv'd from gaping wounds, and tainting air;
And ignominious as it swept the field,
Spread o'er the sacred corpse his golden shield.
All Heaven was mov'd, and Hermes will'd to go
By stealth to snatch him from th' insulting foe:
But Neptune this, and Pallas this denies,
And th' unrelenting empress of the skies:
E'er since that day implacable to Troy,
What time young Paris, simple shepherd boy,
Won by destructive lust (reward obscene)
Their charms rejected for the Cyprian queen.
But when the tenth celestial morning broke;
To Heaven assembled, thus Apollo spoke:

"Unpitying powers! how oft each holy fane
Has Hector ting'd with blood of victims slain!
And, can ye still his cold remains pursue?
Still grudge his body to the Trojans' view?
Deny to consort, mother, son, and sire,
The last sad honours of a funeral fire?
Is then the dire Achilles all your care?
That iron heart, inflexibly severe;

A lion, not a man, who slaughters wide
In strength of rage and impotence of pride?
Who hastes to murder with a savage joy,
Invades around, and breathes but to destroy.
Shame is not of his soul; nor understood,
The greatest evil and the greatest good.
Still for one loss he rages unresign'd,
Repugnant to the lot of all mankind;
To lose a friend, a brother, or a son,
Heaven dooms each mortal, and its will is done:
A while they sorrow, then dismiss their care;
Fate gives the wound, and man is born to bear.
But this, insatiate, the commission given
By fate exceeds, and tempts the wrath of Heaven:
Lo! how his rage dishonest drags along
Hector's dead earth, insensible of wrong!
Brave though he be, yet, by no reason aw'd
He violates the laws of man and God."

"If equal honours by the partial skies
Are doom'd both heroes," (Juno thus replies)
"If Thetis' son must no distinction know,
Then hear, ye gods! the patron of the bow.
But Hector only boasts a mortal claim,
His birth deriving from a mortal dame;
Achilles of your own ethereal race
Springs from a goddess by a man's embrace.
(A goddess by ourself to Peleus given,
A man divine, and chosen friend of Heaven.)
To grace those nuptials from the bright abode
Yourselves were present; where this minstrel-god
(Well pleas'd to share the feast) amid the quire Stood proud to hymn, and tune his youthful lyre."

Then thus the thunderer checks th' imperial dame:

"Let not thy wrath the court of Heaven inflame;
Their merits, not their honours, are the same.
But mine, and every god's peculiar grace,
Hector deserves, of all the Trojan race:
Still on our shrines his grateful offerings lay
(The only honours men to gods can pay;)
Nor ever from our smoking altar ceas'd
The pure libation, and the holy feast.

How'er, by stealth to snatch the corpse away,
We will not : 'Tis he guards it night and day.
But haste, and summon to our courts above
The azure queen: let her persuasion move
Her furious son from Priam to receive
The proffer'd ransom, and the corpse to leave."

He added not : and Iris from the skies,
Swift as a whirlwind on the message flies.
Meteorous the face of Ocean sweeps,
Refulgent gliding o'er the sable deeps,
Between where Samos wide his forest spreads
And rocky Imbrus lifts its pointed heads.
Down plung'd, the maid, (the parted waves resound)

She plung'd, and instant shot the dark profound.
As, bearing death in the fallacious bait,
From the bent angle sinks the leaden weight ;
So pass'd the goddess through the closing wave,
Where Thetis sorrow'd in her sacred cave :
There, plac'd amidst her melancholy train
(The blue-hair'd sisters of the sacred main)
Pensive she sat, revolving fates to come,
And wept her godlike son's approaching doom.

Then thus the goddess of the painted bow,
" Arise ! O Thetis, from thy seats below :
'Tis Jove that calls." " And why" (the dame
replies)

" Calls Jove his Thetis to the hated skies,
Sad object as I am for heavenly sight ?
Ah, may my sorrows ever shun the light !
How'er, be Heaven's almighty sire obey'd"—
She spake, and veil'd her head in sable shade,
Which flowing long, her graceful person clad ;
And forth she pass'd, majestically sad.

Then through the world of waters they repair
(The way fair Iris left) to upper air.
The deeps dividing, o'er the coast they rise,
And touch with momentary flight the skies,
There in the lightning's blaze the sire they found,
And all the gods in shining synod round.
Thetis approach'd with anguish in her face
(Minerva, rising, gave the mourner place ;)
E'en Juno sought her sorrows to console,
And offer'd from her hand the nectar bowl :
She tasted, and resign'd it : then began
The sacred sire of gods and mortal man :

" Thou com'st fair Thetis, but with grief o'ercast ;
Maternal sorrows ; long, ah long to last !
Suffice, we know and we partake thy cares :
But yield to fate, and hear what Jove declares.
Nine days are past, since all the court above
In Hector's cause have mov'd the ear of Jove ;
'Twas voted, Hermes from his godlike foe
By stealth should bear him, but we will'd not so :
We will, thy son himself the corpse restore,
And to his conquest add this glory more.
Then hie thee to him, and our mandate bear ;
'Tell him he tempts the wrath of Heaven too far :
Nor let him more (our anger if he dread)
Vent his mad vengeance on the sacred dead :
But yield to ransom and the father's prayer.
The mournful father, Iris shall prepare,
With gifts to sue ; and offer to his hands
Whate'er his honour asks, or heart demands."

His word the silver-footed queen attends,
And from Olympus' snowy tops descends.
Arriv'd, she heard the voice of loud lament,
And echoing groans that shook the lofty tent,
His friends prepare the victim, and dispose
Repast unheeded, while he vents his woes ;

The goddess seats her by her pensive son,
She prest his hand, and tender thus begun :

" How long, unhappy ! shall thy sorrows flow ;
And thy heart waste with life-consuming woe :
Mindless of food, or love, whose pleasing reign
Sooths weary life, and softens human pain ?
O snatch the moments yet within thy power ;
No long to live, indulge the amorous hour !
Lo ! Jove himself (for Jove's commands I bear)
Forbids to tempt the wrath of Heaven too far.
No longer then (his fury if thou dread)
Detain the relics of great Hector dead ;
Nor vent on senseless earth thy vengeance vain ;
But yield to ransom, and restore the slain."

To whom Achilles : " Be the ransom given,
And we submit, since such the will of Heaven."

While thus they commun'd, from th' Olympian
bowers

Jove orders Iris to the Trojan towers :

" Haste winged goddess to the sacred town,
And urge her monarch to redeem his son ;
Alone, the Ilian ramparts fet him leave,
And bear what stern Achilles may receive :
Alone, for so we will : no Trojan near ;
Except to place the dead with decent care,
Some aged herald, who, with gentle hand,
May the slow mules and funeral car command.
Nor let him death, nor let him danger, dread,
Safe through the foe by our protection led :
Him Hermes to Achilles shall convey,
Guard of his life, and partner of his way.
Fierce as he is, Achilles' self shall spare
His age, nor touch one venerable hair ;
Some thought there must be in a soul so brave,
Some sense of duty, some desire to save."

Then down her bow the winged Iris drives,
And swift at Priam's mournful court arrives ;
Where the sad sons beside their father's throne
Sate bath'd in tears, and answer'd groan with
And all amidst them lay the hoary sire, [groan
(Sad scene of woe!) his face, his wrapt attire,
Conceal'd from sight ; with frantic hands he spread
A shower of ashes o'er his neck and head.
From room to room his pensive daughters roam ;
Whose shrieks and clamours fill the vaulted dome ;
Mindful of those, who, late their bride and joy,
Lie pale and breathless round the fields of Troy !
Before the king Jove's messenger appears,
And thus, in whispers, greets his trembling ears :

" Fear not, oh father ! no ill news I bear ;
From Jove I come, Jove makes thee still his care ;
For Hector's sake these walls he bids thee leave,
And bear what stern Achilles may receive :
Alone, for so he wills : no Trojan near,
Except, to place the dead with decent care,
Some aged herald, who, with gentle hand,
May the slow mules and funeral car command.
Nor shalt thou death, nor shalt thou danger,
dread ;

Safe through the foe by his protection led :
Thee Hermes to Pelides shall convey,
Guard of thy life, and partner of thy way.
Fierce as he is, Achilles' self shall spare
Thy age, nor touch one venerable hair ;
Some thought there must be, in a soul so brave,
Some sense of duty, some desire to save."

She spoke, and vanish'd. Priam bids prepare
His gentle mules, and harness to the car ;
There, for the gifts, a polish'd casket lay ;
His pious sons the king's command obey.

Then pass'd the monarch to his bridal-room,
Where cedar-beams the lofty roofs perfume,
And where the treasures of his empire lay;
Then call'd his queen, and thus began to say:

“ Unhappy consort of a king distrust!
Partake the troubles of thy husband's breast:
I saw descend the messenger of Jove,
Who bids me try Achilles' mind to move;
Forsoke these ramparts, and with gifts obtain
The corpse of Hector, at yon navy slain.
Tell me thy thought: my heart impels to go
Through hostile camps, and bears me to the foe.”

The hoary monarch thus. Her piercing cries
Saw Hecuba renew, and then replies:
“ Ah! whither wanders thy distemper'd mind?
And where the prudence now, that aw'd mankind;
Through Phrygia once, and foreign regions known;
Now all confus'd, distracted, overthrown?
Singly to pass through hosts of foes! to face
(Oh heart of steel!) the murderer of thy race!
To view that deathful eye, and wander o'er
Those hands, yet red with Hector's noble gore!
Alas! my lord! he knows not how to spare,
And what his mercy, thy slain sons declare;
So brave! so many fall'n! To calm his rage,
Vain were thy dignity, and vain thy age.
No—peep in this and palace, let us give
To grief, the wretched days we have to live.
Still, still for Hector let our sorrows flow,
Born to his own and to his parents' woe!
Doom'd, from the hour his luckless life began,
To dogs, to vultures, and to Peleus' son!
Oh! in his dearest blood might I allay
My rage, and these barbarities repay!
For ah! could Hector merit thus, whose breath
Expir'd not meanly in unactive death?
He pour'd his latest blood in manly fight,
And fell a hero in his country's right.”

“ Seek not to stay me, nor my soul affright
With words of omen, like a bird of night”
(Reply'd, unmov'd, the venerable man)
“ 'Tis Heaven commands me, and you urge in vain.
Had any mortal voice th' injunction laid,
Nor augur, priest or seer had been obey'd.
A present goddess brought the high command,
I saw, I heard her, and the word shall stand.
I go, ye gods! obedient to your call:
If in yon camp your powers have doom'd my fall,
Content—By the same hand let me expire!
Add to the slaughter'd son the wretched sire!
One cold embrace at last may be allow'd,
And my last tears flow mingled with his blood!”
From forth his open'd stores, this said, he drew
Twelve costly carpets of resplendent hue,
As many vests, as many mantles told,
And twelve fair veils and garments stiff with gold.
Two tripods next, and twice two chargers shone,

With ten pure talents from the richest mine;
And last a large well-labour'd bowl had place
(The pledge of treaties once with friendly Thrace).
Seem'd all too mean the stores he could employ,
For one last look to buy him back to Troy!

Lo! the sad father, frantic with his pain,
Around him furious drives his menial train:
In vain each slave with duteous care attends,
Each office hurts him, and each face offends.
“ What make ye here? officious crowds,” (he cries)

“ Hence! nor obtrude your anguish on my eyes.

Have ye no griefs at home to fix you there;
Am I the only object of despair?
Am I become my people's common show,
Set up by Jove your spectacle of woe?
No, you must feel him too; yourselves must fall;
The same stern god to ruin gives you all:
Nor is great Hector lost by me alone;
Your sole defence, your guardian power, is gone;
I see your blood the fields of Phrygia drown,
I see the ruins of your smoking town!
O send me, gods! ere that sad day shall come,
A willing ghost to Pluto's dreary dome!”

He said, and feebly drives his friends away:
The sorrowing friends his frantic rage obey.
Next on his sons his erring fury falls,
Polites, Paris, Agathon, he calls;
His thrats Deiphobus and Dius hear,
Hippotheus, Pammon, Helenus the seer,
And generous Antiphon: for yet these nine
Surviv'd, sad relics of his numerous line:

“ Inglorious sons, of an unhappy sire!
Why did not all in Hector's cause expire?
Wretch that I am! my bravest offspring slain,
You, the disgrace of Priam's house, remain!
Nestor the brave, renown'd in ranks of war,
With Troilus, dreadful on his rushing car,
And last great Hector, more than man divine,
For sure he seem'd not of terrestrial line!
All those relentless Mars untimely slew,
And left me these, a soft and servile crew,
Whose days the feast and wanton dance employ,
Gluttons and flatterers, the contempt of Troy!
Why teach ye not my rapid wheels to run,
And speed my journey to redeem my son?”

The sons their father's wretched age reverse;
Forgive his anger, and produce the car.
High on the seat the cabinet they bind:
The new made car with solid beauty shin'd;
Box was the yoke, emboss'd with costly pains,
And hung with ringlets to receive the reins;
Nine cubits long, the traces swept the ground;
These to the chariot's polish'd pole they bound;
Then fixt a ring the running reins to guide,
And close beneath the gather'd ends were ty'd.
Next with the gifts (the price of Hector slain)
The sad attendants load the groaning wain:
Last, to the yoke the well-match'd mules they bring

(The gift of Mysia to the Trojan king.)
But the fair horses, long his darling care,
Himself receiv'd and harness'd to his car:
Griev'd as he was, he not this task deny'd:
The hoary herald help'd him, at his side.
While careful these the gentle coursers join'd,
Sad Hecuba approach'd with anxious mind;
A golden bowl that foam'd with fragrant wine,
(Libation destin'd to the power divine)
Held in her right, before the steeds she stands,
And thus consigns it to the monarch's hands:
“ Take this, and pour to Jove; that, safe from harms,

His grace restore thee to our roof and arms!
Since, victor of thy fears, and slighting mine,
Heaven, or thy soul, inspire this bold design:
Pray to that god, who high on Ida's brow
Surveys thy desolated realms below,
His winged messenger to send from high,
And lead thy way with heavenly angury:
Let the strong sovereign of the plummy race
Tower on the right of yon ethereal space.

That sign beheld, and strengthen'd from above,
 Boldly pursue the journey mark'd by Jove;
 But if the god his augury denies,
 Suppress thy impulse, nor reject advice."
 " 'Tis just" (said Priam) "to the sire above
 To raise our hands; for who so good as Jove?"
 He spoke, and bade th' attendant handmaid bring
 The purest water of the living spring.
 (Her ready hands the ewer and basou held;)
 Then took the golden cup his queen had fill'd;
 On the mid pavement pours the rosy wine,
 Uplifts his eyes, and calls the power divine:
 "Oh first, and greatest! Heaven's imperial Lord!

On lofty Ida's holy hill ador'd!
 To stern Achilles now direct my ways,
 And teach him mercy when a father prays.
 If such thy will, dispatch from yonder sky
 Thy sacred bird, celestial augury!
 Let the strong sovereign of the plummy race
 Tower on the right of you ethereal space:
 So shall thy suppliant, strengthen'd from above,
 Fearless pursue the journey mark'd by Jove."

Jove heard his prayer, and from the throne on high

Dispatch'd his bird, celestial augury!
 The swift wing'd chaser of the feather'd game,
 And known to gods by Percnos' lofty name.
 Wide as appears some palace-gate display'd,
 So broad, his pinions stretch'd their ample shade,
 As stooping dexter with resounding wings
 Th' imperial bird descends in airy rings.
 A dawn of joy in every face appears
 The mourning matron dries her timorous tears:
 Swift on his car th' impatient monarch sprung;
 The brazen portal in his passage rung.
 The mules preceding draw the loaded wain,
 Charg'd with the gifts: Idæus holds the rein:
 The king himself his gentle steeds controls,
 And through surrounding friends the chariot rolls.
 On his slow wheels the following people wait,
 Mourn at each step, and give him up to fate;
 With hands uplifted, eye him as he past,
 And gaz'd upon him as they gaz'd their last.
 Now forward fares the father on his way,
 Through the lone fields, and back to Ilium they.
 Great Jove beheld him as he cross'd the plain,
 And felt the woes of miserable man.
 Then thus to Hermes: "Thou whose constant cares
 Still succour mortals, and attend their prayers;
 Behold an object to thy charge consign'd:
 If ever pity touch'd thee for mankind,
 Go, guard the sire; th' observing foe prevent,
 And safe conduct him to Achilles' tent."

The god obeys, his golden pinions binds,
 And mounts incumbent on the wings of winds,
 That high, through fields of air, his flight sustain,
 O'er the wide earth, and o'er the boundless main:
 Then grasps the wand that causes sleep to fly,
 Or in soft slumbers seals the wakeful eye;
 Thus arm'd, swift Hermes steers his airy way,
 And stoops on Hellaspont's resounding sea.
 A beauteous youth, majestic and divine,
 He seem'd; fair offspring of some princely line!
 Now twilight veil'd the glaring face of day,
 And clad the dusky fields in sober gray;
 What time the herald and the hoary king
 (Their chariots stopping at the silver spring,
 That circling Ilus' ancient marble flows)
 Allow'd their mules and steeds a short repose.

Through the dim shade the herald first espies
 A man's approach, and thus to Priam cries:
 "I mark some foe's advance: O king! beware;
 This hard adventure claims thy utmost care:
 For, much I fear, destruction hovers nigh:
 Our state asks counsel. Is it best to fly?
 Or, old and helpless, at his feet to fall,
 (Two wretched suppliants) and for mercy call?"
 Th' afflicted monarch shiver'd with despair;
 Pale grew his face, and upright stood his hair;
 Sunk was his heart; his colour went and came;
 A sudden trembling shook his aged frame:
 When Hermes, greeting, touch'd his royal hand,
 And gently thus accosts with kind demand:
 "Say whither, father! when each mortal sigh
 Is seal'd in sleep, thou wander'st through the night?"

Why roam thy mules and steeds the plains along,
 Through Grecian fens, so numerous and so strong?
 What could'st thou hope, should these thy treasures
 view;

These, who with endless hate thy race pursue?
 For what defence, alas! could'st thou provide?
 Thyself not young, a weak old man thy guide?
 Yet suffer not thy soul to sink with dread:
 From me no harm shall touch thy reverend head;
 From Greece I'll guard thee too; for in those lines
 The living image of my father shines."

"Thy words that speak benevolence of mind,
 Are true, my son!" (the godlike sire rejoind)
 "Great are my hazards; but the gods survey
 My steps, and send thee, guardian of my way.
 Hail, and be blest! for scarce of mortal kind Appear thy form, thy feature, and thy mind."
 "Nor true are all thy words, nor erring wide,"
 (The sacred messenger of Heaven reply'd);
 "But say, convey'st thou thro' the lonely plains
 What yet most precious of thy store remains,
 To lodge in safety with some friendly hand:
 Prepar'd, perchance, to leave thy native land?
 Or fly'st thou now?—What hopes can Troy retain,

Thy matchless son, her guard and glory, slain?"
 The king, alarm'd: "Say what, and whence thou art,

Who search the sorrows of a parent's heart,
 And know so well how godlike Hector dy'd?"
 Thus Priam spoke; and Hermes thus reply'd:
 "You tempt me, father, and with pity touch:
 On this sad subject you inquire too much.
 Oft have these eyes that godlike Hector view'd
 In glorious fight, with Grecian blood embred:
 I saw him when, like Jove, his flames he tost
 On thousand ships, and wither'd half an host:
 I saw, but help'd not: stern Achilles' ire
 Forbade assistance, and enjoy'd the fire.
 For him I serve, of Myrmidonian race;
 One ship convey'd us from our native place;
 Polyctor is my sire, an honour'd name,
 Old like thyself, and not unknown to fame:
 Of seven his sons, by whom the lot was cast
 To serve our prince, it fell on me, the last.
 To watch this quarter my adventure falls:
 For with the morn the Greeks attack your walls;
 Sleepless they sit, impatient to engage,
 And scarce their rulers check their martial rage."
 "If then thou art of stern Pelides' train,"
 (The mournful monarch thus rejoind again)
 "Ah, tell me truly, where, oh! where are laid
 My son's dear relics? what befalls him dead?"

Have dogs dismember'd (on the naked plains)
Or yet unamangled rest his cold remains?"
"O favour'd of the skies!" (thus answer'd then
The power that mediates between gods and men)
"Nor dogs nor vultures have thy Hector rent,
But whole he lies, neglected in the tent:
This the twelfth evening since he rested there,
Untouch'd by worms, untainted by the air.
Still as Aurora's ruddy beam is spread,
Round his friend's tomb Achilles drags the dead:
Yet undisfigur'd, or in limb or face,
All fresh he lies, with every living grace,
Majestical in death! No stains are found
O'er all the corpse, and clos'd is every wound;
Though many a wound they gave. Some heavenly care,
Some hand divine, preserves him ever fair:
Or all the host of Heaven, to whom he led
A life so grateful, still regard him dead."
Thus spoke to Priam the celestial guide!
And joyful thus the royal sire reply'd:
"Blest is the man who pays the gods above
The constant tribute of respect and love;
Those who inhabit the Olympian bowers
My son forgot not, in exalted power;
And Heaven, that every virtue bears in mind,
Ev'n to the ashes of the just, is kind.
But thou, oh generous youth! this goblet take,
A pledge of gratitude, for Hector's sake;
And, while the favouring gods our steps survey,
Safe to Pelides' tent conduct my way."
To whom the latent god: "O king, forbear
To tempt my youth, for apt is youth to err:
But can I, absent from my prince's sight,
Take gifts in secret, that must shun the light?
What from our master's interest thus we draw,
Is but a licens'd theft that 'scapes the law.
Respecting him, my soul adjures th' offence;
And, as the crime, I dread the consequence.
Thee, far as Argos, pleas'd I could convey;
Guard of thy life, and partner of the way:
On thee attend, thy safety to maintain,
O'er pathless forests, or the roaring main."
He said, then took the chariot at the bound,
And snatch'd the reins, and whirl'd the lash around!
Before th' inspiring god, that urg'd them on,
The coursers fly, with spirit not their own.
And now they reach'd the naval walls, and found
The guards repasting, while the bowls go round:
On these the virtue of his wand he tries,
And pours deep slumber on their watchful eyes;
Then heav'd the massy gates, remov'd the bars,
And o'er the trenches led the rolling cars.
Unseen, through all the hostile camp they went,
And now approach'd Pelides' lofty tent.
Of fir the roof was rais'd, and cover'd o'er
With reeds collected from the marshy shore;
And, fence'd with palisades, a hall of state,
(The work of soldiers) where the hero sat.
Large was the door, whose well-compacted strength
A solid pine-tree barr'd, of wondrous length;
Scarce three strong Greeks could lift its mighty
weight,
But great Achilles singly clos'd the gate.
This Hermes (such the power of gods!) set wide;
Then swift alighted the celestial guide,
And thus reveal'd—"Hear, prince! and understand
Thou owest thy guidance to no mortal hand:
Hermes I am, descended from above,
The king of arts, the messenger of Jove,

Farewell: to shun Achilles' sight I fly:
Uncommon are such favours of the sky,
Nor stand confest to frail mortality.
Now fearless enter, and prefer thy prayers;
Adjure him by his father's silver hairs,
His son, his mother! urge him to bestow
Whatever pity that stern heart can know."
Thus having said, he vanish'd from his eyes,
And in a moment shot into the skies:
The king, confirm'd from Heaven, alighted there,
And left his aged herald on the car.
With solemn pace through various rooms he went,
And found Achilles in his inner tent:
There sate the hero; Alcimus the brave,
And great Automedon, attendance gave:
These serv'd his person at the royal feast:
Around, at awful distance, stood the rest.
Unseen by these, the king his entry made:
And, prostrate now before Achilles laid,
Sudden (a venerable sight) appears;
Embrac'd his knees, and bath'd his hands in tears;
Those direful bands his kisses press'd, embrued
Ev'n with the best, the dearest of his blood!
As when a wretch (who, conscious of his crime, Pursued for murder, flies his native clime)
Just gains some frontier, breathless, pale, amaz'd!
All gaze, all wonder: thus Achilles gaz'd:
Thus stood th' attendants stupid with surprise;
All mute, yet seem'd to question with their eyes:
Each look'd on other, none the silence broke,
Till thus at last the kingly suppliant spoke:
"Ah think, thou favour'd of the powers divine!
Think of thy father's age, and pity mine!
In me, that father's reverend image trace,
Those silver hairs, that venerable face;
His trembling limbs, his helpless person, see!
In all my equal, but in misery!
Yet now, perhaps, some turn of human fate
Expels him helpless from his peaceful state;
Think, from some powerful foe thou see'st him fly,
And beg protection with a feeble cry.
Yet still one comfort in his soul may rise;
He hears his son still lives to glad his eyes;
And, hearing, still may hope a better day
May send him thee, to chase that foe away.
No comfort to my griefs, no hopes, remain:
The best, the bravest, of my sons are slain!
Yet what a race! ere Greece to Ilium came,
The pledge of many a lov'd and loving dame!
Nineteen one mother bore—Dead, all are dead!
How oft, alas! has wretched Priam bled!
Still one was left, their loss to recompense;
His father's hope, his country's last defence:
Him too thy rage has slain! beneath thy steel,
Unhappy, in his country's cause he fell!
"For him, through hostile camps I bend my way,
For him, thus prostrate at thy feet I lay;
Large gifts proportion'd to thy wrath I bear;
O hear the wretched, and the gods reverse!
"Think of thy father, and this face behold!
See him in me, as helpless and as old!
Though not so wretched: there he yields to me,
The first of men in sovereign misery!
Thus forc'd to kneel, thus groveling to embrace
The scourge and ruin of my realm and race:
Suppliant my children's murderer to implore,
And kiss those hands yet reeking with their gore!"
These words soft pity in the chief inspire,
Touch'd with the dear remembrance of his sire.

Then with his hand (as prostrate still he lay)
 The old man's cheek he gently turn'd away.
 Now each by turns indulg'd the gush of woe;
 And now the mingled tides together flew;
 This low on earth, that gently bending o'er,
 A father one, and one a son, deplore:
 But great Achilles different passions rend,
 And now his sire he mourns, and now his friend.
 'Th' infectious softness through the heroes ran;
 One universal solemn shower began;
 They bore as heroes, but they felt as men.
 Satiated at length with unavailing woes,
 From the high throne divine Achilles rose;
 The reverend monarch by the hand he rais'd;
 On his white beard and form majestic gaz'd,
 Not unrelenting: then serene began
 With words to soothe the miserable man:
 "Alas! what weight of anguish hast thou known,
 Unhappy prince! thus guardless and alone
 To pass through foes, and thus undaunted face
 The man whose fury has destroy'd thy race!
 Heaven sure has arm'd thee with a heart of steel,
 A strength proportion'd to the woes you feel.
 Rise then: let reason mitigate our care:
 To mourn, avails not: man is born to bear.
 Such is, alas! the gods' severe decree:
 They, only they, are blest, and only free.
 Two urns by Jove's high throne have ever stood,
 The source of evil one, and one of good;
 From thence the cup of mortal man he fills,
 Blessings to these, to those distributes ills;
 To most, he mingles both: the wretch decreed
 To taste the bad, unmix'd, is curst indeed;
 Pursued by wrongs, by meagre famine driven,
 He wanders, outcast both of Earth and Heaven.
 The happiest taste not happiness sincere;
 But find the cordial draught is dash'd with care.
 Who more than Peleus shone in wealth and power!
 What stars concurring blest his natal hour!
 A realm, a goddess, to his wishes given;
 Grac'd by the gods with all the gifts of Heaven.
 One evil, yet, o'ertakes his latest day:
 No race succeeding to imperial sway;
 An only son; and he (alas!) ordain'd
 To fall untimely in a foreign land.
 See him, in Troy, the pious care decline
 Of his weak age, to live the curse of thee!
 Thou too, old man, hast happier days beheld;
 In riches once, in children once, excell'd;
 Extended Phrygia own'd thy ample reign,
 And all fair Lesbos' blissful seats contain,
 And all wide Hellespont's unmeasur'd main.
 But since the god his hand has pleas'd to turn,
 And fill thy measure from his bitter urn,
 What sees the Sun, but hapless heroes' falls?
 War and the blood of men surround thy walls!
 What must be, must be. Bear thy lot, nor shed
 These unavailing sorrows o'er the dead;
 Thou canst not call him from the Stygian shore,
 But thou, alas! may'st live, to suffer more!"

To whom the king: "Oh, favour'd of the Skies!
 Here let me grow to earth! since Hector lies
 On the bare beach depriv'd of obsequies.
 Oh, give me Hector! to my eyes restore
 His corpse, and take the gifts: I ask no more.
 Thou, as thou may'st, these boundless stores
 Enjoy;
 Safe may'st thou sail, and turn thy wrath from Troy;
 So shall thy pity and forbearance give
 A weak old man to see the light and live!"

"Move me no more!" (Achilles thus replied, While kindling anger spark'd in his eyes);
 "Nor seek by tears my steady soul to bend;
 To yield thy Hector, I myself intend:
 For know, from Jove my goddess-mother came (Old Ocean's daughter, silver-footed dame);
 Nor com'st thou but by Heaven: nor com'st alone,
 Some god impels with courage not thy own:
 No human hand the weighty gates unbar'd,
 Nor could the boldest of our youth have dar'd
 To pass our out-works, or clude the guard.
 Cease; lest, neglectful of high Jove's command,
 I show thee, king! thou tread'st on hostile land;
 Release my knees, thy suppliant arts give o'er,
 And shake the purpose of my soul no more."

The sire obey'd him, trembling and o'er-aw'd.
 Achilles, like a lion, rush'd abroad;
 Automedon and Alcimus attend
 (Whom most he honour'd since he lost his friend);
 These to unyoke the mules and horses went,
 And led the hoary herald to the tent;
 Next heap'd on high the numerous presents bear
 (Great Hector's ransom) from the polish'd car,
 Two splendid mantles, and a carpet spread,
 They leave, to cover and inwrap the dead.
 Then call the handmaids, with assistant toil
 To wash the body and anoint with oil,
 Apart from Priam; left th' unhappy sire,
 Provok'd to passion, once more rous'd to ire
 The stern Pelides; and nor sacred age,
 Nor Jove's command, should check the rising rage.
 This done, the garments o'er the corpse they spread;
 Achilles lifts it to the funeral bed:
 Then, while the body on the car they laid,
 He groans, and calls on lov'd Patroclus' shade:
 "If, in that gloom which never-light must know,
 The deeds of mortals touch the ghosts below:
 O friend! forgive me, that I thus fulfil (Restoring Hector) Heaven's unquestion'd will.
 The gifts the father gave, be ever thine,
 To grace thy manes, and adorn thy shrine."
 He said, and, entering, took his seat of state,
 Where full before him reverend Priam sat:
 To whom, compos'd, the godlike chief begun—
 "Lo! to thy prayer restor'd, thy breathless son;
 Extended on the funeral couch he lies;
 And, soon as morning paints the eastern skies,
 The sight is granted to thy longing eyes.
 But now the peaceful hours of sacred night
 Demand refection, and to rest invite:
 Nor thou, O father! thus consum'd with woe,
 The common cares that nourish life forego.
 Not thus did Niobe, of form divine,
 A parent once, whose sorrows equall'd thine;
 Six youthful sons, as many blooming maids,
 In one sad day beheld the Stygian shades;
 These by Apollo's silver bow were slain,
 Those, Cynthia's arrows stretch'd upon the plain:
 So was her pride chastis'd by wrath divine,
 Who match'd her own with bright Latona's line;
 But two the goddess, twelve the queen enjoy'd:
 Those boasted twelve th' avenging two destroy'd.
 Steep'd in their blood, and in the dust outspread,
 Nine days, neglected, lay expos'd the dead;
 None by to weep them, to inbume them none
 (For Jove had turn'd the nation all to stone):
 The gods themselves at length, relenting, gave
 Th' unhappy race the honours of a grave.
 Herself a rock (for such was Heaven's high will)
 Through deserts wild now pours a weeping rill;

Where round the bed whence Achelœus springs,
The watery fairies dance in mazy rings,
These high on Sipylus's shaggy brow
She stands, her own sad monument of woe ;
The rock for ever lasts, the tears for ever flow.

"Such griefs, O king ! have other parents known ;
Remember theirs, and mitigate thy own.
The care of Heaven thy Hector has appear'd,
Nor shall he lie unwept and uninterr'd ;
Soon may thy aged cheeks in tears be drow'n'd,
And all the eyes of Ilium stream around."

He said ; and, rising, chose the victim ewe
With silver fleece, which his attendants slew.
The limbs they sever from the reeking hide,
With skill prepare them, and in parts divide :
Each on the coals the separate morsels lays,
And, hasty, snatches from the rising blaze.
With bread the glittering canisters they load,
Which round the board Automedon bestow'd :
The chief himself to each his portion plac'd,
And each indulging shar'd in sweet repast.
When now the rage of hunger was repress'd,
The wondering hero eyes his royal guest :
No less the royal guest the hero eyes,
His godlike aspect and majestic size ;
Here youthful grace and noble fire engage ;
And there, the mild benevolence of age.
Thus gazing long, the silence neither broke,
(A mean scene !) at length the father spake :

"Permit me now, below'd of Jove ! to sleep
My careful temples in the dew of sleep :
For, since the day that number'd with the dead
My hapless son, the dust has been my bed ;
Soft sleep, a stranger to my weeping eyes ;
My only food, my sorrows and my sighs !
Till now, encourag'd by the grace you give,
I share thy banquet, and consent to live."

With that, Achilles bade prepare the bed,
With purple soft, and shaggy carpets spread ;
Forth, by the flaming lights, they bend their
way,

And place the couches, and the coverings lay.
Then he : " Now, father, sleep, but sleep not here ;
Consult thy safety, and forgive my fear ;
Lest any Argive (at this hour awake,
To ask our counsel, or our orders take)
Approaching sudden to our open'd tent,
Perchance behold thee, and our grace prevent.
Should such report thy honour'd person here,
The king of men the ransom might defer ;
But say, with speed, if aught of thy desire
Remains unask'd ; what time the rites require
To inter thy Hector ? For, so long we stay
Our slaughtering arm, and bid the hosts obey."
" If then thy will permit," the monarch said,
" To finish all due honours to the dead,
This, of thy grace, accord : to thee are known
The fears of Ilium clos'd within her town ;
And at what distance from our walls aspire
The hills of Ide, and forests for the fire.
Nine days to vent our sorrows I request,
The tenth shall see the funeral and the feast ;
The next, to raise his monument be given ;
The twelfth we war, if war be doom'd by Heaven !"
" This thy request," reply'd the chief, " enjoy ;
Till then, our arms suspend the fall of Troy."
Then gave his hand at parting, to prevent
The old man's fears, and turn'd within the tent ;
Where fair Briseis, bright in blooming charms,
Expects her hero with desiring arms.

But in the porch, the king and herald rest ;
Sad dreams of care yet wandering in their breast.
Now gods and men the gifts of sleep partake ;
Industrious Hermès only was awake,
The king's return revolving in his mind,
To pass the ramparts, and the watch to blind.
The power descending hover'd o'er his head :
" And sleep'st thou, father !" (thus the vision said)
" Now dost thou sleep, when Hector is restor'd ?
Nor fear the Grecian fets, or Grecian lord ?
Thy presence here should stern Atreides see,
Thy still-surviving sons may sue for thee,
May offer all thy treasures yet contain,
To spare thy age ; and offer all in vain."

Wak'd with the word, the trembling sire arose,
And rais'd his friend : the god before him goes ;
He joins the mules, directs them with his hand,
And moves in silence through the hostile land.
When now to Xanthus' yellow stream they drove (Xanthus, immortal progeny of Jove)
The winged deity forsook their view,
And in a moment to Olympus flew.

Now shed Aurora round her saffron ray,
Sprung thro' the gate of light, and gave the day :
Charg'd with their mournful load, to Ilium go
The sage and king, majestically slow.

Cassandra first beholds, from Ilium's spire,
The sad procession of her hoary sire ;
Then, as the pensive pomp advanc'd more near,
(Her breathless brother stretch'd upon the bier)
A shower of tears o'erflows her beauteous eyes,
Alarming thus all Ilium with her cries : [employ,

" Turn here your steps, and here your eyes
Ye wretched daughters, and ye sons, of Troy !
If e'er ye rush'd in crowds, with vast delight,
To hail your hero glorious from the fight ;
Now meet him dead, and let your sorrows flow !
Your common triumph, and your common woe."

In thronging crowds they issue to the plains ;
Nor man, nor woman, in the walls remains :
In every face the self-same grief is shown ;
And Troy sends forth one universal groan.
At Scæan's gates they meet the mourning wain,
Hang on the wheels, and grovel round the slain.
The wife and mother, frantic with despair,
Kiss his pale cheek, and rend their scatter'd hair ;
Thus wildly wailing at the gates they lay ;
And there had sigh'd and sorrow'd out the day :
But godlike Priam from the chariot rose ;
" Forbear," he cry'd, " this violence of woes !
First to the palace let the car proceed,
Then pour your boundless sorrows o'er the dead."

The waves of people at his word divide,
Slow rolls the chariot through the following tide ;
Ev'n to the palace the sad pomp they wait ;
They weep, and place him on the bed of state.
A melancholy choir attend around,
With plaintive sighs, and music's solemn sound :
Alternately they sing, alternate flow
Th' obedient tears, melodious in their woe.
While deeper sorrows groan from each full heart,
And nature speaks at every pause of art.

First to the corpse the weeping consort flew ;
Around his neck her milk-white arms she threw,
And, " Oh, my Hector ! oh, my lord !" she cries,
" Snatch'd in thy bloom from these desiring eyes !
Thou to the dismal realms for ever gone !
And I abandon'd, desolate, alone !
An only son, once comfort of our pains,
Sad product now of hapless love, remains !

Never to manly age that son shall rise,
 Or with increasing graces glad my eyes;
 For Ilium now (her great defender slain)
 Shall sink a smoking ruin on the plain.
 Who now protects her wives with guardian care?
 Who saves her infants from the rage of war?
 Now hostile fleets must wait those infants o'er
 (Those wives must wait them) to a foreign shore!
 Thou too, my son! to barbarous climes shalt go,
 The sad companions of thy mother's woe:
 Driven hence a slave before the victor's sword;
 Condemn'd to toil for some inhuman lord:
 Or else some Greek, whose father prest the plain,
 Or son, or brother, by great Hector slain;
 In Hector's blood his vengeance shall enjoy,
 And hurl thee headlong from the towers of Troy.
 For thy stern father never spar'd a foe:
 Thence all these tears, and all this scene of woe!
 Thence many evils his sad parents bore,
 His parents many, but his consort more.
 Why gav'st thou not to me thy dying hand?
 And why receiv'd not I thy last command?
 Some word thou would'st have spoke, which, sadly
 My soul might keep, or utter with a tear; [dear,
 Which never, never could be lost in air,
 Fix'd in my heart, and oft repeated there!"]

Thus to her weeping maids she makes her moan:
 Her weeping handmaids echo groan for groan.

The mournful mother next sustains her part:
 "Oh thou, the best, the dearest to my heart!
 Of all my race thou most by Heaven approv'd,
 And by th' immortals ev'n in death belov'd!
 While all my other sons in barbarous bands
 Achilles bound, and sold to foreign lands,
 This felt no chains, but went, a glorious ghost,
 Free and a hero, to the Stygian coast.
 Sentenc'd, 'tis true, by his inhuman doom,
 Thy noble corpse was dragg'd around the tomb
 (The tomb of him thy warlike arm had slain);
 Ungenerous insult, impotent and vain!
 Yet glow'st thou fresh with every living grace;
 No mark of pain, or violence of face;
 Rosy and fair, as Phœbus' silver bow
 Dismiss'd thee gently to the shades below!"

Thus spoke the dame, and melted into tears.
 Sad Helen next, in pomp of grief, appears:
 Fast from the shining sluices of her eyes
 Fall the round crystal drops, while thus she cries:

"Ah, dearest friend! in whom the gods had
 join'd

The mildest manners with the bravest mind;
 Now twice ten years (unhappy years!) are o'er
 Since Paris brought me to the Trojan shore;
 (O had I perish'd ere that form divine
 Seduc'd this soft, this easy heart of mine!)
 Yet was it ne'er my fate, from thee to find
 A deed ungentle, or a word unkind:
 When others curst the authoress of their woe,
 Thy pity check'd my sorrows in their flow:
 If some proud brother ey'd me with disdain,
 Or scornful sister with her sweeping train;
 Thy gentle accents soften'd all my pain.
 For thee I mourn; and mourn myself in thee,
 The wretched source of all this misery!
 The fate I caus'd, for ever I bemoan;
 Sad Helen has no friend, now thou art gone!
 In Troy's wide streets abandon'd shall I roam!
 In Troy deserted, as abhorr'd at home!"

So spoke the fair, with sorrow-streaming eye:
 Distressful beauty melts each stander-by;

On, all around th' infectious sorrow grows;
 But Priam check'd the torrent as it rose:—
 "Perform, ye Trojans! what the rites require,
 And fell the forests for a funeral pyre;
 Twelve days, nor foes nor secret ambush dread;
 Achilles grants these honours to the dead."
 He spoke; and, at his word, the Trojan train
 Their mules and oxen harness to the wain,
 Pour thro' the gates, and, fell'd from Ida's crown,
 Roll back the gather'd forests to the town.
 These toils continue nine succeeding days,
 And high in air a sylvan structure raise;
 But when the tenth fair morn began to shine,
 Forth to the pile was borne the man divine,
 And plac'd aloft: while all, with streaming eyes,
 Beheld the flames and rolling smokes arise.
 Soon as Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
 With rosy lustre streak'd the dewy lawn,
 Again the mournful crowds surround the pyre,
 And quench with wine the yet-remaining fire.
 The snowy bones his friends and brothers place
 (With tears collected) in a golden vase;
 The golden vase in purple palls they roll'd,
 Of softest texture, and inwrought with gold.
 Last o'er the urn the sacred earth they spread,
 And rais'd the tomb, memorial of the dead
 (Strong guards and spies, till all the rites were done, Watch'd from the rising to the setting Sun).
 All Troy then moves to Priam's court again,
 A solemn, silent, melancholy train:
 Assembled there, from pious toil they rest,
 And sadly shar'd the last sepulchral feast.
 Such honours Ilium to her hero paid,
 And peaceful slept the mighty Hector's shade.

SECT. I.

OF THE NATURE OF EPIC POETRY.

THE fables of poets were originally employed in representing the divine nature, according to the notion then conceived of it. This sublime subject occasioned the first poets to be called divines, and poetry the language of the gods. They divided the divine attributes into so many persons; because the infirmity of a human mind cannot sufficiently conceive, or explain, so much power and action in a simplicity so great and indivisible as that of God. And, perhaps, they were also jealous of the advantages they reaped from such excellent and exalted learning, and of which they thought the vulgar part of mankind was not worthy.

They could not describe the operations of this almighty cause, without speaking at the same time of its effects: so that to divinity, they added physiology; and treated of both, without quitting the umbrages of their allegorical expressions.

But man being the chief and the most noble of all that God produced, and nothing being so proper, or more useful to poets, than this subject; they added it to the former, and treated of the doctrine of morality after the same manner as they did that of divinity and philosophy; and from morality, thus treated, is formed that kind of poem and fable which we call Epic.

The poets did the same in morality, that the divines had done in divinity. But that infinite variety of the actions and operations of the divine nature (to which our understanding bears so small a proportion) did, as it were, force them upon dividing the single idea of the Only One God into several persons, under the different names of Jupiter, Juno, Neptune, and the rest.

And on the other hand, the nature of moral philosophy being such, as never to treat of things in particular, but in general; the epic poets were obliged to unite in one single idea, in one and the same person, and in an action which appeared singular, all that looked like it in different persons and in various actions; which might, be thus contained as so many species under their genus.

The presence of the Deity, and the care such an august cause is to be supposed to take about any action, obliges the poet to represent this action as great, important, and managed by kings and princes. It obliges him likewise to think and speak in an elevated way above the vulgar, and in a style that may in some sort keep up the character of the divine persons he introduces. To this end serve the poetical and figurative expression, and the majesty of the heroic verse.

But all this, being divine and surprising, may quite ruin all probability; therefore the poet should take a particular care as to that point, since his chief aim is to instruct, and without probability any action is less likely to persuade.

Lastly, since precepts ought to be concise, to be the more easily conceived, and less oppress the memory; and since nothing can be more effectual to this end than proposing one single idea, and collecting all things so well together, as to be present to our minds all at once; therefore the poets have reduced all to one single action, under one and the same design, and in a body whose members and parts should be homogeneous.

What we have observed of the nature of the epic poem, gives us a just idea of it, and we may define it thus:

“The epic poem is a discourse invented by art, to form the manners, by such instructions as are disguised under the allegories of some one important action, which is related in verse, after a probable, diverting, and surprising manner.”

SECT. II.

THE FABLE OF THE ILIAD.

Is every design which a man deliberately undertakes, the end he proposes is the first thing in his mind, and that by which he governs the whole work, and all its parts: thus, since the end of the epic poem is to regulate the manners, it is with this first view the poet ought to begin.

But there is a great difference between the philosophical and the poetical doctrine of manners. The schoolmen content themselves with treating of virtues and vices in general; the instructions they give are proper for all states of people, and for all ages. But the poet has a nearer regard to his own country, and the necessities of his own nation. With this design he makes choice of some piece of morality, the most proper and just he can imagine; and in order to press this home, he makes less use of the force of reasoning, than of the power of insinuation; accommodating himself to the particular customs and inclinations of those who are to be the subject, or the readers, of his work.

Let us now see how Homer has acquitted himself in these respects.

He saw the Grecians, for whom he designed his poem, were divided into as many states as they had capital cities. Each was a body politic apart, and had its form of government independent from all the rest. And yet these distinct states were very often obliged to unite together in one body against their common enemies. These were two very different sorts of government, such as could not be comprehended in one maxim of morality, and in one single poem.

The poet, therefore, has made two distinct fables of them. The one is for Greece in general, united into one body, but composed of parts independent on each other; and the other for each particular state, considered as they were in time of peace, without the former circumstances and the necessity of being united.

As for the first sort of government, in the union, or rather in the confederacy of many independent states; experience has always made it appear, “That nothing so much causes success as a due subordination, and a right understanding among the chief commanders. And on the other hand, the inevitable ruin of such confederacies proceeds from the heats, jealousies, and ambition of the different leaders, and the discontents of submitting to a single general.” All sorts of states, and in particular the Grecians, had dearly experienced this truth. So that the most useful and necessary instruction that could be given them, was, to lay before their eyes the loss which both the people and the princes must of necessity suffer, by the ambition, discord, and obstinacy of the latter.

Homer then has taken for the foundation of his fable this great truth: That a misunderstanding between princes is the ruin of their own states. “I sing,” says he, “the anger of Achilles, so pernicious to the Grecians, and the cause of so many heroes’ deaths, occasioned by the discord and separation of Agamemnon and that prince.”

But that this truth may be completely and fully known, there is need of a second to support it. It is necessary, in such a design, not only to represent the confederate states at first disagreeing among themselves, and from thence unfortunate; but to show the same states afterwards reconciled and united, and of consequence victorious.

Let us now see how he has joined all these in one general action.

“Several princes independent on one another were united against the common enemy. The person whom they had elected their general, offers an affront to the most valiant of all the confederates. This offended prince is so far provoked, as to relinquish the union, and obstinately refuse to fight for the common cause. This misunderstanding gives the enemy such an advantage, that the allies are very near quitting their design with dishonour. He himself who made the separation, is not exempt from sharing the misfortune which he brought upon his party. For having permitted his intimate friend to succour them in a great necessity, this friend is killed by the enemy's general. Thus the contending princes, being both made wiser at their own cost, are reconciled, and unite again: then this valiant prince not only obtains the victory in the public cause, but revenges his private wrongs, by killing with his own hands the author of the death of his friend."

This is the first platform of the poem, and the fiction which reduces into one important and universal action all the particulars upon which it turns.

In the next place it must be rendered probable by the circumstances of times, places, and persons: some persons must be found out, already known by history or otherwise, whom we may with probability make the actors and personages of this fable. Homer has made choice of the siege of Troy, and feigned that this action happened there. To a phantom of his brain, whom he would paint valiant and choleric, he has given the name of Achilles; that of Agamemnon to his general; that of Hector to the enemy's commander, and so to the rest.

Besides, he was obliged to accommodate himself to the manners, customs, and genius of the Greeks; his auditors, the better to make them attend to the instruction of his poem: and to gain their approbation by praising them; so that they might the better forgive him the representation of their own faults in some of his chief personages. He admirably discharges all these duties, by making these brave princes and those victorious people all Grecians, and the fathers of those he had a mind to commend.

But not being content, in a work of such a length, to propose only the principal point of the moral, and to fill up the rest with useless ornaments and foreign incidents, he extends this moral by all its necessary consequences. As for instance, in the subject before us, it is not enough to know that a good understanding ought always to be maintained among confederates: it is likewise of equal importance that, if there happens any division, care must be taken to keep it secret from the enemy, that their ignorance of this advantage may prevent their making use of it. And in the second place, when their concord is but counterfeited and only in appearance, one should never press the enemy too closely; for this would discover the weakness which we ought to conceal from them.

The episode of Patroclus most admirably furnishes us with these two instructions. For when he appeared in the arms of Achilles, the Trojans, who took him for that prince now reconciled and united to the confederates, immediately gave ground, and quitted the advantages they had before over the Greeks. But Patroclus, who should have been contented with this success, presses upon Hector too boldly, and, by obliging him to fight, soon discovers that it was not the true Achilles who was clad in his armour, but a hero of much inferior prowess. So that Hector kills him, and regains those advantages which the Trojans had lost, on the opinion that Achilles was reconciled.

SECT. III.

THE FABLE OF THE ODYSSEY.

THE Odyssey was not designed, like the Iliad, for the instruction of all the states of Greece joined in one body, but for each state in particular. As a state is composed of two parts; the head which commands, and the members which obey; there are instructions requisite to both, to teach the one to govern, and the others to submit to government.

There are two virtues necessary to one in authority; prudence to order, and care to see his orders put in execution. The prudence of a politician is not acquired but by a long experience in all sorts of business, and by an acquaintance with all the different forms of governments and states. The care of the administration suffers not him that has the government to rely upon others, but requires his own presence: and kings, who are absent from their states, are in danger of losing them, and give occasion to great disorders and confusion.

These two points may be easily united in one and the same man. "A king forsakes his kingdom to visit the courts of several princes, where he learns the manners and customs of different nations. From hence there naturally arises a vast number of incidents, of dangers, and of adventures, very useful for a political institution. On the other side, this absence gives way to the disorders which happen in his own kingdom, and which end not till his return, whose presence only can re-establish all things." Thus the absence of a king has the same effects in this fable, as the division of the princes had in the former.

The subjects have scarce any need but of one general maxim, which is, to suffer themselves to be governed, and to obey faithfully; whatever reason they may imagine against the orders they receive. It is easy to join this instruction with the other, by bestowing on this wise and industrious prince such subjects as, in his absence, would rather follow their own judgment than his commands; and by demonstrating the misfortune which this disobedience draws upon them, the evil consequences which almost infallibly attend these particular notions, which are entirely different from the general idea of him who ought to govern.

But as it was necessary that the princes in the Iliad should be choleric and quarrelsome, so it is necessary in the fable of the Odyssey that the chief person should be sage and prudent. This raises a difficulty in the fiction; because this person ought to be absent for the two reasons above mentioned, which are essential to the fable, and which constitute the principal aim of it: but he cannot absent himself, without offending against another maxim of equal importance, viz. That a king should upon no accounts leave his country.

It is true, there are sometimes such necessities as sufficiently excuse the prudence of a politician in this point. But such a necessity is a thing important enough of itself to supply matter for another poem, and this multiplication of the action would be vicious. To prevent which, in the first place, this necessity, and the departure of the hero, must be disjoined from the poem; and in the second place, the hero having been obliged to absent himself, for a reason antecedent to the action, and placed distinct from the fable, he ought not so far to embrace this opportunity of instructing himself, as to absent himself voluntarily from his own government. For, at this rate, his absence would be merely voluntary, and one might with reason lay to his charge all the disorders which might arise.

Thus, in the constitution of the fable, he ought not to take for his action, and for the foundation of his poem, the departure of a prince from his own country, nor his voluntary stay in any other place; but his return, and this return retarded against his will. This is the first idea Homer gives us of it¹. His hero appears at first in a desolate island, sitting upon the side of the sea, which, with tears in his eyes, he looks upon as the obstacle which had so long opposed his return, and detained him from revisiting his own dear country.

And lastly, since this forced delay might more naturally and usually happen to such as make voyages by sea; Homer has judiciously made choice of a prince, whose kingdom was in an island.

Let us see then how he has feigned all this action, making his hero a person in years, because years are requisite to instruct a man in prudence and policy.

"A prince had been obliged to forsake his native country, and to head an army of his subjects in a foreign expedition. Having gloriously performed this enterprise, he was marching home again, and conducting his subjects to his own state. But spite of all the attempts, with which the eagerness to return had inspired him, he was stopt by the way by tempests for several years, and cast upon several countries, differing from each other in manners and government. In these dangers, his companions, not always following his orders, perished through their own fault. The grandees of his country strangely abuse his absence, and raise no small disorders at home. They consume his estate, conspire to destroy his son, would constrain his queen to accept of one of them for her husband; and indulge themselves in all violence, so much the more, because they were persuaded he would never return. But at last he returns, and discovering himself only to his son and some others, who had continued firm to him, he is an eye-witness of the insolence of his enemies, punishes them according to their deserts, and restores to his island that tranquility and repose to which they had been strangers during his absence."

As the truth, which serves for foundation to this fiction, is, that the absence of a person from his own home, or his neglect of his own affairs, is the cause of great disorders: so the principal point of the action, and the most essential one, is the absence of the hero. This fills almost all the poem: for not only this real absence lasted several years, but even when the hero returned, he does not discover himself; and this prudent disguise, from whence he reaped so much advantage, has the same effect upon the authors of the disorders, and all others who knew him not, as his real absence had before, so that he is absent as to them, till the very moment of their punishment.

After the poet had thus composed his fable, and joined the fiction to the truth, he then makes choice of Ulysses, the king of the isle of Ithaca, to maintain the character of his chief personage, and bestowed the rest upon Telemachus, Penelope, Antinous, and others, whom he calls by what names he pleases.

I shall not here insist upon the many excellent advices, which are so many parts and natural consequences of the fundamental truth; and which the poet very dexterously lays down in those fictions which are the episodes and members of the entire action. Such for instance are these advices: not to intrude one's self into the mysteries of government, which the prince keeps secret; this is represented to us by the winds shut up in a bull-hide, which the miserable companions of Ulysses would needs be so foolish as to pry into: not to suffer one's self to be led away by the seeming charms of an idle and inactive life, to which the Syrens' song invited²: not to suffer one's self to be sensualised by pleasures, like those who were changed into brutes, by Circe: and a great many other points of morality necessary for all sorts of people.

This poem is more useful to the people than the Iliad, where the subjects suffer rather by the ill conduct of their princes, than through their own miscarriages. But in the Odyssey, it is not the fault of Ulysses that is the ruin of his subjects. This wise prince leaves untried no method to make them partakers of the benefit of his return. Thus the poet in the Iliad says, "he sings the anger of Achilles, which had caused the death of so many Grecians;" and, on the contrary, in the Odyssey he tells his readers, "that the subjects perished through their own fault."

SECT. IV.

OF THE UNITY OF THE FABLE.

ARISTOTLE bestows great encomiums upon Homer for the simplicity of his design, because he has included in one single part all that happened at the siege of Troy. And to this he opposes the ignorance of some poets, who imagined that the unity of the fable or action was sufficiently preserved by the unity of the hero; and who composed their Theseids, Heraclids, and the like, wherein they only heaped up in one poem every thing that happened to one personage.

He finds fault with those poets who were for reducing the unity of the fable into the unity of the hero, because one man may have performed several adventures, which it is impossible to reduce

Under any one general and simple head. This reducing of all things to unity and simplicity, is what Horace likewise makes his first rule.

Denique sit quodvis simplex duntaxat, & unum.

According to these rules, it will be allowable to make use of several fables; or (to speak more correctly) of several incidents, which may be divided into several fables, provided they are so ordered, that the unity of the fable be not spoiled. This liberty is still greater in the epic poem, because it is of a larger extent, and ought to be entire and complete.

I will explain myself more distinctly by the practice of Homer.

No doubt but one might make four distinct fables out of these four following instructions.

i. Division between those of the same party exposes them entirely to their enemies.

ii. Conceal your weakness; and you will be dreaded as much, as if you had none of those imperfections, of which they are ignorant.

iii. When your strength is only feigned, and founded only in the opinion of others; never venture so far as if your strength was real.

iv. The more you agree together, the less hurt can your enemies do you.

It is plain, I say, that each of these particular maxims might serve for the ground-work of a fiction, and one might make four distinct fables out of them. May not one then put all these into one single epopee? Not unless one single fable can be made out of all. The poet indeed may have so much skill as to unite all into one body, as members and parts, each of which taken asunder would be imperfect: and if he joins them so, as that this conjunction shall be no hindrance at all to the unity and regular simplicity of the fable. This is what Homer has done with such success in the composition of the Iliad.

1. The division between Achilles and his allies tended to the ruin of their design. 2. Patroclus comes to their relief in the armour of this hero, and Hector retreats. 3. But this young man, pushing the advantage which his disguise gave him too far, ventures to engage with Hector himself: but not being master of Achilles' strength (whom he only represented in outward appearance) he is killed, and by this means leaves the Grecian affairs in the same disorder, from which, in that disguise, he came to free them. 4. Achilles, provoked at the death of his friend, is reconciled, and revenges his loss by the death of Hector. These various incidents being thus united, do not make different actions and fables, but are only the uncomplete and unfinished parts of one and the same action and fable, which alone, when taken thus complexly, can be said to be complete and entire: and all these maxims of the moral are easily reduced into these two parts, which, in my opinion, cannot be separated without enervating the force of both. The two parts are these, that a right understanding is the preservation, and discord the destruction of states.

Though then the poet has made use of two parts in his poems, each of which might have served for a fable, as we have observed: yet this multiplication cannot be called a vicious and irregular poly-mythia, contrary to the necessary unity and simplicity of the fable; but it gives the fable another qualification, altogether necessary and regular, namely, its perfection, and finishing stroke.

SECT. V.

OF THE ACTION OF THE EPIC POEM.

The action of a poem is the subject which the poet undertakes, proposes, and builds upon. So that the moral and the instructions which are the end of the epic poem are not the matter of it. Those the poets leave in their allegorical and figurative obscurity. They only give notice at the exordium, that they sing some action: the revenge of Achilles, the return of Ulysses, &c.

Since then the action is the matter of a fable, it is evident, that whatever incidents are essential to the fable, or constitute a part of it, are necessary also to the action, and are parts of the epic matter, none of which ought to be omitted. Such, for instance, are the contention of Agamemnon and Achilles, the slaughter Hector makes in the Grecian army, the re-union of the Greek princes; and, lastly, the re-settlement and victory which was the consequence of that re-union.

There are four qualifications in the epic action: the first is its unity, the second its integrity, the third its importance, the fourth its duration.

The unity of the epic action, as well as the unity of the fable, does not consist either in the unity of the hero, or in the unity of time: three things, I suppose, are necessary to it. The first is, to make use of no episode, but what arises from the very platform and foundation of the action, and is as it were a natural member of the body. The second is, exactly to unite these episodes and these members with one another. And the third is, never to finish any episode so as it may seem to be an entire action; but to let each episode still appear in its own particular nature, as the member of a body, and as a part of itself not complete.

OF THE BEGINNING, MIDDLE, AND END OF THE ACTION.

ARISTOTLE not only says, that the epic action should be one, but adds, that it should be entire, perfect, and complete; and for this purpose, ought to have a beginning, a middle, and an end. These three parts of a whole are too generally and universally denoted by the words, beginning, middle, and end; we may interpret them more precisely, and say, that the causes and designs of an action, are the beginning: that the effects of these causes, and the difficulties that are met with in the execution of these designs, are the middle; and that the unraveling and resolution of these difficulties are the end.

THE ACTION OF THE ILIAD.

HOMER's design in the Iliad, is to relate the anger and revenge of Achilles. The beginning of this action is the change of Achilles from a calm to a passionate temper. The middle is the effects of his passion, and all the illustrious deaths it is the cause of. The end of this same action is the return of Achilles to his calmness of temper again.

All was quiet in the Grecian camp, when Agamemnon, their general, provokes Apollo against them, whom he was willing to appease afterwards at the cost and prejudice of Achilles, who had no part in his fault. This then is an exact beginning: it supposes nothing before, and requires after it the effects of this anger. Achilles revenges himself, and that is an exact middle; it supposes before it the anger of Achilles, this revenge is the effect of it. Then this middle requires after it the effects of this revenge, which is the satisfaction of Achilles: for the revenge had not been complete, unless Achilles had been satisfied. By this means the poet makes his hero, after he was glutted by the mischief he had done to Agamemnon, by the death of Hector, and the honour he did his friend, by insulting over his murderer; he stakes him, I say, to be moved by the tears and misfortunes of king Priam. We see him as calm at the end of the poem, during the funeral of Hector, as he was at the beginning of the poem, whilst the plague raged among the Grecians. This end is just; since the calmness of temper Achilles re-enjoyed is only an effect of the revenge which ought to have preceded: and after this nobody expects any more of his anger. Thus has Homer been very exact in the beginning, middle, and end of the action he made choice of for the subject of his Iliad.

THE ACTION OF THE ODYSSEY.

His design in the Odyssey was to describe the return of Ulysses from the siege of Troy, and his arrival at Ithaca. He opens his poem with the complaints of Minerva against Neptune, who opposed the return of this hero, and against Calypso, who detained him in an island from Ithaca. Is this a beginning? No; doubtless, the reader would know why Neptune is displeas'd with Ulysses, and how this prince came to be with Calypso? He would know how he came from Troy thither? The poet answers his demands out of the mouth of Ulysses himself, who relates these things, and begins the action by the recital of his travels from the city of Troy. It signifies little whether the beginning of the action be the beginning of the poem. The beginning of this action is that which happens to Ulysses, when, upon his leaving Troy, he bends his course for Ithaca. The middle comprehends all the misfortunes he endured, and all the disorders of his own government. The end is the reinstating of this hero in the peaceable possession of his kingdom, where he was acknowledged by his son, his wife, his father, and several others. The poet was sensible he should have ended ill, had he gone no farther than the death of these princes, who were the rivals and enemies of Ulysses, because the reader might have looked for some revenge, which the subjects of these princes might have taken on him who had killed their sovereigns: but this danger over, and the people vanquished and quieted, there was nothing more to be expected. The poem and the action have all their parts, and no more.

But the order of the Odyssey differs from that of the Iliad, in that the poem does not begin with the beginning of the action.

OF THE CAUSES AND BEGINNING OF THE ACTION.

The causes of the action are also what the poem is oblig'd to give an account of. There are three sorts of causes, the humours, the interests, and the designs of men; and these different causes of an action are likewise often the causes of one another, every man taking up those interests in which his humour engages him, and forming those designs to which his humour and interest incline him. Of all these the poet ought to inform his readers, and render them conspicuous in his principal personages.

Homer has ingeniously begun his Odyssey with the transactions at Ithaca, during the absence of Ulysses. If he had begun with the travels of his hero, he would scarce have spoken of any one else, and a man might have read a great deal of the poem, without conceiving the least idea of Telemachus, Penelope, or her suitors, who had so great a share in the action; but in the beginning he has pitched upon, besides these personages whom he discovers, he represents Ulysses in his full length, and from the very first opening one sees the interest which the gods take in the action.

The skill and care of the same poet may be seen likewise in inducing his personages in the first book of his Iliad, where he discovers the humours, the interests, and the designs of Agamemnon, Achilles, Hector, Ulysses, and several others, and even of the deities. And in his second he makes a review of the Grecian and Trojan armies; which is full evidence, that all we have here said is very necessary.

OF THE MIDDLE OR INTRIGUE OF THE ACTION.

As these causes are the beginning of the action, the opposite designs against that of the hero are the middle of it, and form that difficulty or intrigue, which makes up the greatest part of the poem; the solution or unraveling commences when the reader begins to see that difficulty removed, and the doubts cleared up. Homer has divided each of his poems into two parts; and has put a particular intrigue, and the solution of it, into each part.

The first part of the Iliad is the anger of Achilles, who is for revenging himself upon Agamemnon by the means of Hector and the Trojans. The intrigue comprehends the three days' fight which happened in the absence of Achilles: and it consists on one side in the resistance of Agamemnon and the Grecians; and on the other in the revengeful and inexorable humour of Achilles, which would not suffer him to be reconciled. The loss of the Grecians, and the despair of Agamemnon, prepare for a solution by the satisfaction which the incensed hero received from it. The death of Patroclus joined to the offers of Agamemnon, which of itself had proved ineffectual, remove this difficulty, and make the unraveling of the first part.

This death is likewise the beginning of the second part; since it puts Achilles upon the design of revenging himself on Hector. But the design of Hector is opposite to that of Achilles: this Trojan is valiant, and resolved to stand on his own defence. This valour and resolution of Hector are on his part the cause of the intrigue. All the endeavours Achilles used to meet with Hector, and be the death of him; and the contrary endeavours of the Trojan to keep out of his reach and defend himself, are the intrigue; which comprehends the battle of the last day. The unraveling begins at the death of Hector; and besides that, it contains the insulting of Achilles over his body, the honours he paid to Patroclus, and the entreaties of king Priam. The regrets of this king and the other Trojans, in the sorrowful obsequies they paid to Hector's body, are the unraveling; they justify the satisfaction of Achilles, and demonstrate his tranquillity.

The first part of the Odyssey is the return of Ulysses into Ithaca. Neptune opposes it by raising tempests, and this makes the intrigue. The unraveling is the arrival of Ulysses upon his own island, where Neptune could offer him no farther injury. The second part is the re-instating this hero in his own government. The princes, that are his rivals, oppose him, and this is a fresh intrigue: the solution of it begins at their deaths, and is completed as soon as the Ithacans were appeased.

These two parts in the Odyssey have not one common intrigue. The anger of Achilles forms both the intrigues in the Iliad; and it is so far the matter of this epopee, that the very beginning and end of this poem depend on the beginning and end of his anger. But let the desire Achilles had to revenge himself, and the desire Ulysses had to return to his own country, be never so near allied, yet we cannot place them under one and the same notion: for that desire of Ulysses is not a passion that begins and ends in the poem with the action: it is a natural habit: nor does the poet propose it for his subject, as he does the anger of Achilles.

We have already observed what is meant by the intrigue, and the unraveling thereof; let us now say something of the manner of forming both. These two should arise naturally out of the very essence and subject of the poem, and are to be deduced from thence. Their conduct is so exact and natural, that it seems as if their action had presented them with whatever they inserted, without putting themselves to the trouble of a farther enquiry.

What is more usual and natural to warriors, than anger, heat, passion, and impatience of bearing the least affront or disrespect? This is what forms the intrigue of the Iliad: and every thing we read there is nothing else but the effect of this humour and these passions.

What more natural and usual obstacle to those who take voyages, than the sea, the winds, and the storms? Homer makes this the intrigue of the first part of the Odyssey: and for the second, he makes use of almost the infallible effect of the long absence of a master, whose return is quite despaired of, viz. the insolence of his servants and neighbours, the danger of his son and wife, and the sequestration of his estate. Besides, an absence of almost twenty years, and the insupportable fatigues joined to the age of which Ulysses then was, might induce him to believe that he should not be owned by those who thought him dead, and whose interest it was to have him really so. Therefore, if he had presently declared who he was, and had called himself Ulysses, they would easily have destroyed him as an impostor, before he had an opportunity to make himself known.

There could be nothing more natural nor more necessary than this ingenious disguise, to which the advantages his enemies had taken of his absence had reduced him, and to which his long misfortunes had inured him. This allowed him an opportunity, without hazarding any thing, of taking the best measures he could, against those persons who could not so much as mistrust any harm from him. This way was afforded him, by the very nature of his action, to execute his designs, and overcome the obstacles it cast before him. And it is this contest between the prudence and the dissimulation of a single man on one hand and the ungovernable insolence of so many rivals on the other, which constitutes the intrigue of the second part of the Odyssey.

OF THE END OR UNRAVELING OF THE ACTION.

If the plot or intrigue must be natural, and such as springs from the very subject, as has been already urged; then the winding-up of the plot, by a more sure claim, must have this qualification, and be a probable consequence of all that went before. As this is what the readers regard more than the rest, so should the poet be more exact in it. This is the end of the poem, and the last impression that is to be stamped upon them.

We shall find this in the Odyssey. Ulysses by a tempest is cast upon the island of the Phœaciens, to whom he discovers himself, and desires they would favour his return to his own country, which was not very far distant. One cannot see any reason why the king of this island should refuse such a reasonable request, to a hero whom he seemed to have in great esteem. The Phœaciens indeed had heard him tell the story of his adventures; and in this fabulous recital consisted all the advantage that he could derive from his presence; for the art of war which they admired in him, his undauntedness under dangers, his indefatigable patience, and other virtues, were such as these islanders were not used to. All their talent lay in singing and dancing, and whatever was charming in a quiet life. And here we see how dextrously Homer prepares the incidents he makes use of. These people could do no less, for the account with which Ulysses had so much entertained them, than afford him a ship and a safe convoy, which was of little expense or trouble to them.

When he arrived, his long absence, and the travels which had disfigured him, made him altogether unknown; and the danger he would have incurred, had he discovered himself too soon, forced him to a disguise: lastly, this disguise gave him an opportunity of surprising those young suitors, who for several years together had been accustomed to nothing but to sleep well, and fare daintily.

It was from these examples that Aristotle drew this rule, that "Whatever concludes the poem, should so spring from the very constitution of the fable, as if it were a necessary, or at least a probable, consequence."

SECT. VI.

THE TIME OF THE ACTION.

The time of the epic action is not fixed, like that of the dramatic poem; it is much longer:

As an uninterrupted duration is much more necessary in an action which one sees and is present at, than in one which we only read or hear repeated. Besides, tragedy is fuller of passion, and consequently of such a violence as cannot admit of so long a duration.

The Iliad containing an action of anger and violence, the poet allows it but a short time, about forty days. The design of the Odyssey required another conduct; the character of the hero is prudence and long-suffering; therefore the time of its duration is much longer, above eight years.

THE PASSIONS OF THE EPIC POEM.

THE passions of tragedy are different from those of the epic poem. In the former, terror and pity have the chief place; the passion that seems most peculiar to epic poetry, is admiration.

Besides this admiration, which in general distinguishes the epic poem from the dramatic; each epic poem has likewise some peculiar passion, which distinguishes it in particular from other epic poems, and constitutes a kind of singular and individual difference between these poems of the same species. These singular passions correspond to the character of the hero. Anger and terror reign throughout the Iliad, because Achilles is angry, and the most terrible of all men. The Aeneid has all soft and tender passions, because that is the character of Aeneas. The prudence, wisdom, and constancy of Ulysses do not allow him either of these extremes; therefore the poet does not permit one of them to be predominant in the Odyssey. He confines himself to admiration only, which he carries to an higher pitch than in the Iliad: and it is upon this account that he introduces a great many more machines, in the Odyssey, into the body of the action, than are to be seen in the actions of the other two poems.

THE MANNERS.

THE manners of the epic poem ought to be poetically good, but it is not necessary they be always morally so. They are poetically good, when one may discover the virtue or vice, the good or ill inclinations of every one who speaks or acts: they are poetically bad, when persons are made to speak or act out of character, or inconsistently, & unequally. The manners of Aeneas and of Alexander are equally good, considered poetically, because they equally demonstrate the piety of the one, and the impiety of the other.

CHARACTER OF THE HERO.

IT is requisite to make the same distinction between a hero in morality, and a hero in poetry, as between moral and poetical goodness. Achilles had as much right to the latter, as Aeneas. Aristotle says, that the hero of a poem should be neither good nor bad; neither advanced above the rest of mankind by his virtues, or sunk beneath them by his vices; that he may be the proper and fuller example to others, both what to imitate and what to decline.

The other qualifications of the manners are, that they be suitable to the causes which either raise or discover them in the persons; that they have an exact resemblance to what history, or fable, have delivered of those persons, to whom they are ascribed; and that there be an equality in them, so that no man is made to act, or speak, out of his character.

UNITY OF THE CHARACTER.

BUT this equality is not sufficient for the unity of the character: it is further necessary, that the same spirit appear in all sorts of encounters. Thus Aeneas acting with great piety and mildness in the first part of the Aeneid, which requires no other character; and afterwards appearing illustrious in heroic valour, in the wars of the second part; but there, without any appearance either of a hard or a soft disposition, would doubtless, be far from offending against the equality of the manners: but yet there would be no simplicity or unity in the character. So that, besides the qualities that claim their particular place upon different occasions, there must be one appearing throughout, which commands over all the rest; and without this, we may affirm, it is no character.

One may indeed make a hero as valiant as Achilles, as pious as Aeneas, and as prudent as Ulysses. But it is a mere chimera, to imagine a hero that has the valour of Achilles, the piety of Aeneas, and the prudence of Ulysses, at one and the same time. This vision might happen to an author, who would suit the character of a hero to whatever each part of the action might naturally require, without regarding the essence of the fable, or the unity of the character in the same person upon all sorts of occasions: this hero would be the mildest, best-natured prince in the world, and also the most choleric, hard-hearted, and implacable creature imaginable; he would be extremely tender like Aeneas, extremely violent like Achilles, and yet have the indifference of Ulysses, that is incapable of the two extremes. Would it not be in vain for the poet to call this person by the same name throughout?

Let us reflect on the effects it would produce in several poems, whose authors were of opinion, that the chief character of a hero is that of an accomplished man. They would be all alike; all valiant in battle, prudent in council, pious in the acts of religion, courteous, civil, magnificent; and, lastly, endued with all the prodigious virtues any poet could invent. All this would be independent from the action and the subject of the poem; and upon seeing each hero separated from the rest of the work: we should not easily guess, to what action, and to what poem, the hero belonged. So that we should see, that none of those would have a character; since the character is that which makes a person discernable, and which distinguishes him from all others.

This commanding quality in Achilles is his anger; in Ulysses, the art of dissimulation; in Aeneas, meekness. Each of these may be styled, by way of eminence, the character in these heroes.

But these characters cannot be alone. It is absolutely necessary that some other should give them a lustre, and embellish them as far as they are capable; either by hiding the defects that are in each, by some noble and shining qualities; as the poet has done the anger of Achilles, by shading it with extraordinary valour: or by making them entirely of the nature of a true and solid virtue, as is to be observed in the two others. The dissimulation of Ulysses is a part of his prudence; and the meekness of Æneas is wholly employed in submitting his will to the gods. For the making up of this union, our poets have joined together such qualities as are by nature the most compatible; valour with anger, meekness with piety, and prudence with dissimulation. This last union was necessary for the goodness of Ulysses; for, without that, his dissimulation might have degenerated into wickedness and double-dealing,

SECT. VII.

OF THE MACHINERY.

We now come to the machines of the epic poem. The chief passion which it aims to excite being admiration, nothing is so conducive to that as the marvellous; and the importance and dignity of the action is by nothing so greatly elevated as by the care and interposition of Heaven.

These machines are of three sorts. Some are theological, and were invented to explain the nature of the gods. Others are physical, and represent the things of nature. The last are moral, and are images of virtues and vices.

Homer and the ancients have given to their deities the manners, passions, and vices of men. The poems are wholly allegorical; and in this view it is easier to defend Homer than to blame him. We cannot accuse him for making mention of many gods, for his bestowing passions upon them, or even introducing them fighting against men. The Scripture uses the like figures and expressions.

If it be allowable to speak thus of the gods in theology, much more in the fictions of natural philosophy; where, if a poet describes the deities, he must give them such manners, speeches, and actions, as are conformable to the nature of the things they represent under those divinities. The case is the same in the morals of the deities: Minerva is wise, because she represents prudence; Venus is both good or bad, because the passion of love is capable of these contrary qualities.

Since among the gods of a poem some are good, some bad, and some indifferently either; and since of our passions we make so many allegorical deities; we may attribute to the gods all that is done in the poem, whether good or evil. But these deities do not act constantly in one and the same manner.

Sometimes they act invisibly, and by mere inspiration; which has nothing in it extraordinary or miraculous; being no more than what we say every day, "that some god has assisted us, or some demon has instigated us."

At other times they appear visibly, and manifest themselves to men, in a manner altogether miraculous and preternatural.

The third way has something of both the others; it is in truth a miracle, but is not commonly so accounted: this includes dreams, oracles, &c.

All these ways must be probable; for however necessary the marvellous is to the epic action, as nothing is so conducive to admiration; yet we can, on the other hand, admire nothing, that we think impossible. Though the probability of these machines be of a very large extent, (since it is founded upon divine power) it is not without limitations. There are numerous instances of allowable and probable machines in the epic poem, where the gods are no less actors than the men. But the less credible sort, such as metamorphoses, &c. are far more rare.

This suggests a reflection on the method of rendering those machines probable, which in their own nature are hardly so. Those, which require only divine probability, should be so disengaged from the action, that one might abstract them from it, without destroying the action. But those, which are essential and necessary, should be grounded upon human probability, and not on the sole power of God. Thus the episodes of Circe, the Syrens, Polyphemus, &c. are necessary to the action of the Odyssey, and yet not humanly probable: yet Homer has artificially reduced them to human probability, by the simplicity and ignorance of the Phæacians, before whom he causes those recitals to be made,

The next question is, where, and on what occasions, machines may be used? It is certain Homer and Virgil make use of them every where, and scarce suffer any action to be performed without them. Petronius makes this a precept: Per ambages, deorumque ministeria, &c. The gods are mentioned in the very proposition of their works, the invocation is address to them, and the whole narration is full of them. The gods are the causes of the action, they form the intrigue, and bring about the solution. The precept of Aristotle and Horace, that the unravelling of the plot should not proceed from a miracle, or the appearance of a god, has place only in dramatic poetry, not in the epic. For it is plain, that both in the solution of the Iliad and Odyssey, the gods are concerned: in the former, the deities meet to appease the anger of Achilles: Iris and Mercury are sent to that purpose, and Minerva eminently assists Achilles in the decisive combat with Hector. In the Odyssey, the same goddess fights close by Ulysses against the suitors, and concludes that peace between him and the Ithacensians, which completes the poem.

We may therefore determine, that a machine is not an invention to extricate the poet out of any difficulty which embarrasses him: but that the presence of a divinity, and some action surprising and extraordinary, are inserted into almost all the parts of the work, in order to render it more majestic and more admirable. But this mixture ought to be so made, that the machines might be retrenched, without taking any thing from the action: at the same time that it gives the readers a lesson of piety and virtue; and teaches them, that the most brave and the most wise can do nothing, and attain nothing great and glorious, without the assistance of Heaven. Thus the machinery crowns the whole work, and renders it at once marvellous, probable, and moral.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK I.

ARGUMENT.

MINERVA'S DESCENT TO ITHACA.

THE poem opens within forty-eight days of the arrival of Ulysses in his dominions. He had now remained seven years in the island of Calypso, when the gods, assembled in council, proposed the method of his departure from thence, and his return to his native country. For this purpose it is concluded to send Mercury to Calypso, and Pallas immediately descends to Ithaca. She holds a conference with Telemachus, in the shape of Mentis, king of the Taphians; in which she advises him to take a journey in quest of his father Ulysses, to Pylos and Sparta, where Nestor and Menelaus yet reigned; then, after having visibly displayed her divinity, disappears. The suitors of Penelope make great entertainments, and riot in her palace till night. Phemius sings to them the return of the Grecians, till Penelope puts a stop to the song. Some words arise between the suitors and Telemachus, who summons the council to meet the day following.

THE man, for wisdom's various arts renown'd,
 Long exercis'd in woes, oh Muse! reason'd.
 Who, when his arms had wrought the destin'd fall
 Of sacred Troy, and raz'd her heaven-built wall,
 Wandering from clime to clime, observant stray'd,
 Their manners notted, and their states survey'd.
 On stormy seas unnumber'd toils he bore,
 Safe with his friends to gain his natal shore:
 Vain toils! their impious folly dar'd to prey
 On herds devoted to the god of day;
 The gods vindictive doom'd them never more
 (Ah, men unblest'd!) to touch that natal shore,
 Oh, snatch some portion of these acts from fate,
 Celestial Muse! and to our world relate.
 Now at their native realms the Greeks arriv'd;
 All who the war of ten long years surviv'd,
 And reap'd the perils of the gulphy main.
 Ulysses, sole of all the victor train,
 An exile from his dear paternal coast,
 Deplor'd his absent queen, and empire lost,
 Calypso in her caves constrain'd his stay,
 With sweet, reluctant, amorous delay:
 In vain—for now the circling years disclose
 The day predestin'd to reward his woes.
 At length his Ithaca is given by fate,
 Where yet new labours his arrival wait;
 At length their rage the hostile powers restrain,
 All but the ruthless monarch of the main.
 But now the god, remote, a heavenly guest,
 In Æthiopia grac'd the genial feast
 (A race divided, whom with sloping rays
 The rising and descending Sun surveys);
 There on the world's extremest verge, rever'd
 With hecatombs and prayer in pomp prefer'd,
 Distant he lay: while in the bright abodes
 Of high Olympus, Jove conven'd the gods:
 Th' assembly thus the sire supreme address'd,
 Ægythus' fate revolving in his breast,

Whom young Orestes to the dreary coast
 Of Pluto sent, a blood-polluted ghost.
 "Perverse mankind! whose wills, created free,
 Charge all their woes on absolute decree;
 All to the dooming gods their guilt translate,
 And follies are miscall'd the crimes of fate.
 When to his lust Ægythus gave the rein,
 Did fate, or we, th' adulterous act constrain?
 Did fate, or we, when great Atrides dy'd,
 Urge the bold traitor to the regicide?
 Hermes I sent, while yet his soul remain'd
 Sincere from royal blood, and faith profan'd;
 To warn the wretch, that young Orestes, grown
 To many years, should re-assert the throne.
 Yet, impotent of mind, and uncontroll'd,
 He plung'd into the gulf which Heaven foretold."

Here paus'd the god; and pensive thus replies
 Minerva, graceful with her azure eyes:
 "O thou! from whom the whole creation springs,
 The source of power on Earth deriv'd to kings!
 His death was equal to the direful deed;
 So may the man of blood be doom'd to bleed!
 But grief and rage alternate wound my breast,
 For brave Ulysses, still by fate oppress'd,
 Amidst an isle, around whose rocky shore
 The forests murmur, and the surges roar,
 The blameless hero from his wish'd-for home
 A goddess guards in her enchanted dome:
 (Atlas her sire, to whose far-piercing eye
 The wonders of the deep expanded lie;
 Th' eternal columns which on Earth he rears
 End in the starry vault, and prop the spheres.)
 By his fair daughter is the chief confin'd,
 Who soothes to dear delight his anxious mind:
 Successless all her soft caresses prove,
 To banish from his breast his country's love;
 To see the smoke from his lov'd palace rise,
 While the dear isle in distant prospect lies,
 With what contentment would he close his eyes?
 And will Omnipotence neglect to save
 The suffering virtue of the wise and brave?
 Must he, whose altars on the Phrygian shore
 With frequent rites, and pure, avow'd thy power,
 Be doom'd the worst of human ills to prove,
 Unblest'd, abandon'd to the wrath of Jove?"
 "Daughter! what words have pass'd thy lips unweigh'd?"

(Reply'd the thunderer to the martial maid)
 "Deem not unjustly by my doom oppress'd
 Of human race the wisest and the best.
 Neptune, by prayer repentant rarely won,
 Afflicts the obief, t' avenge his giant-son,
 Whose visual orb Ulysses robb'd of light!
 Great Polypheme, of more than mortal might!
 Him young Thooëa bore (the bright increase
 Of Phorcys, dreaded in the sounds and seas):
 Whom Neptune ey'd with bloom of beauty blest,
 And in his cave the yielding nymph compress'd.
 For this, the god constrains the Greek to roam,
 A hopeless exile, from his native home,
 From death alone exempt—but cease to mourn!
 Let all combine t' achieve his wish'd return:
 Neptune aton'd, his wrath shall now refrain,
 Or thwart the synod of the gods in vain."
 "Father and king ador'd!" Minerva cry'd,
 "Since all who in th' Olympian bower reside
 Now make the wandering Greek their public care,
 Let Hermes to th' Atlantic isle repair;

! Ogygia.

Bid him, arriv'd in bright Callypso's court,
The sanction of th' assembled powers report :
That wise Ulysses to his native land
Must speed, obedient to their high command.
Meantime Telemachus, the blooming heir
Of sea-girt Ithaca, demands my care :
'Tis mine to form his green unpractis'd years,
In sage debates ; surrounded with his peers,
To save the state ; and timely to restrain
The bold intrusion of the suitor-train :
Who crowd his palace, and with lawless power
His herds and flocks in feastful rites devour.
To distant Sparta, and the spacious waste
Of sandy Pyle, the royal youth shall haste.
There, warm with filial love, the cause inquire
That from his realm retards his godlike sire :
Delivering early to the voice of fame
The promise of a great, immortal name."

She said : the sandals of celestial mould,
Fledg'd with ambrosial plumes, and rich with gold,
Surround her feet ; with these sublime she sails
Th' aerial space, and mounts the winged gales :
O'er earth and ocean wide prepar'd to soar,
Her dreaded arm a beamy javelin bore,
Ponderous and vast ; which, when her fury burns,
Proud tyrants humbles, and whole hosts o'er-turns.

From high Olympus prone her flight she bends,
And in the realm of Ithaca descends.
Her lineaments divine, the grave disguise
Of Mentes' form conceal'd from human eyes
(Mentes, the monarch of the Taphian land) :
A glittering spear wav'd awful in her hand.
There in the portal plac'd, the heaven-born maid
Enormous riot and misrule survey'd.
On hides of beeves, before the palace gate,
(Sad spoils of luxury !) the suitors sate.
With rival art, and ardour in their mien,
At chess they vie, to captivate the queen ;
Divining of their loves. Attending nigh
A menial train the flowing bowl supply :
Others, apart, the spacious hall prepare,
And form the costly feast with busy care.
There young Telemachus, his bloomy face
Glowing celestial sweet, with godlike grace
Amid the circle shines : but hope and fear
(Painful vicissitude !) his bosom tear.
Now, imag'd in his mind, he sees restor'd,
In peace and joy, the people's rightful lord ;
The proud oppressors fly the vengeful sword.
While his fond soul these fancied triumphs swell'd,
The stranger guest the royal youth beheld :
Griev'd that a visitant so long should wait
Unmark'd, unhonour'd, at a monarch's gate ;
Instant he flew with hospitable haste,
And the new friend with courteous air embrac'd.
" Stranger ! whoe'er thou art, securely rest,
Affianc'd in my faith, a friendly guest :
Approach the dome, the social banquet share,
And then the purpose of thy soul declare."

Thus, affable and mild, the prince precedes,
And to the dome th' unknown celestial leads.
The spear receiving from her hand, he plac'd
Against a column, fair with sculpture grac'd ;
Where seemly rang'd in peaceful order stood
Ulysses' arms, now long diu'd to blood.
He led the goddess to the sovereign seat,
Her feet supported with a stool of state
(A purple carpet spread the pavement wide) ;
Then drew his seat, familiar to her side ;

Far from the suitor-train a brutal crowd,
With insolence, and wine, elate and loud :
Where the free guest, unnoticed, might relate,
If haply conscious, of his father's fate.
The golden ewer a maid-obsequious brings,
Replenish'd from the cool, translucent springs ;
With copious water the bright vase supplies
A silver laver, of capacious size :
They wash. The tables in fair order spread,
They heap the glittering canisters with bread :
Viands of various kinds allure the taste,
Of choicest sort and savour, rich repast !
Delicious wines th' attending herald brought ;
The gold gave lustre to the purple draught.
Lur'd with the vapour of the fragrant feast,
In rush'd the suitors with voracious haste :
Marshall'd in order due, to each a sewer
Presents, to bathe his hands, a radiant ewer.
Luxuriant then they feast. Observant round
Gay stripling youths the brimming goblets crown'd.
The rage of hunger quell'd, they all advance,
And form to measur'd airs the mazy dance :
To Phemius was consign'd the chorded lyre,
Whose hand reluctant touch'd the warbling wire :
Phemius, whose voice divine could sweetest sing
High strains, responsive to the vocal string.

Meanwhile, in whispers to his heavenly guest
His indignation thus the prince express :
" Indulge my rising grief, whilst these (my friend)
With song and dance the pompous revel end.
Light is the dance, and doubly sweet the lays,
When for the dear delight another pays.
His treasure'd stores these cormorants costume,
Whose bones, defrauded of a regal tomb
And common turf, lie naked on the plain,
Or doom'd to welter in the whelming main.
Should he return, that troop so blithe and bold,
With purple robes inwrought, and stiff with gold,
Precipitant in fear would wing their flight,
And curse their cumbrous pride's unweildy weight.
But, ah, I dream !—th' appointed hour is fled !
And hope, too long with vain delusion fed,
Deaf to the rumour of fallacious fame,
Gives to the roll of death his glorious name !
With venial freedom let me now demand
Thy name, thy lineage, and paternal land :
Sincere, from whence began thy course, recite,
And to what ship I owe the friendly freight ?
Now first to me this visit dost thou deign,
Or number'd in my father's social train ?

All who deserv'd his choice he made his own,
And, curious much to know, he far was known."
" My birth I boast" (the blue-ey'd virgin cries)
" From great Anchialus, renown'd and wise :
Mentes my name : I rule the Taphian race,
Whose bounds the deep circumfluent waves embrace
A duteous people, and industrious isle,
To naval arts inur'd, and stormy toil.
Freighted with iron from my native land,
I steer my voyage to the Brutian strand ;
To gain by commerce for the labour'd mass,
A just proportion of refulgent brass.
Far from your capital my ship resides
At Reithrus, and secure at anchor rides ;
Where waving groves on airy Neion grow,
Supremely tall, and shade the deeps below.
Thence to revisit your imperial dome,
And old hereditary guest I come :
Your father's friend. Laertes can relate
Our faith unspotted, and its early date ;

Woe, great with heart-corroding grief and years,
To the gay court a rural shade prefers,
Where, sole of all his train, a matron sage
Supports with homely food his drooping age,
With feeble steps from marshalling his vines
Returning sad, when toilsome day declines.

“ With friendly speed, induc'd by erring fame,
To hail Ulysses' safe return, I came ;
But still the frown of some celestial power
With envious joy retards the blissful hour.
Let not your soul be sunk in sad despair ;
He lives, he breathes this heavenly vital air,
Among a savage race, whose abelty bounds
With ceaseless roar the foaming deep surrounds.
The thoughts which roll within my ravish'd breast,
To me, no seer, th' inspiring gods suggest ;
Nor still'd, nor studious, with prophetic eye
To judge the winged omens of the sky.
Yet hear this certain speech, nor deem it vain ;
Though adamantine bonds the chief restrain,
The dire restraint his wisdom will defeat,
And soon restore him to his regal seat.

But, generous youth ! sincere and free declare,
Art you, of manly growth, his royal heir ?
For sure Ulysses in your look appears,
The same his features, if the same his years.
Such was that face, on which I dwelt with joy
Ere Greece assembled stemm'd the tides to Troy ;
But, parting then for that detested shore,
O'er eyes, unhappy ! never greeted more.”

“ To prove a genuine birth” (the prince replies)
“ On female truth assenting faith relies ;
Thus manifest of right, I build my claim
Sure-founded on a fair maternal fame,
Ulysses' son : but happier he, whom fate
Hath plac'd beneath the storms which toss the great !
Happier the son, whose hoary sire is blest
With humble affluence, and domestic rest !
Happier than I, to future empire born,
But doom'd a father's wretched fate to mourn !”

To whom, with aspect mild, the guest divine :
“ Oh true descendant of a scepter'd line !
The gods a glorious fate from anguish free
To chaste Penelope's increase decree.
But say, you joyful troop so gaily drest,
Is this a bridal or a friendly feast ?
Or from their deed I rightlier may divine,
Unseemly flown with insolence and wine ;
Unwelcome revellers, whose lawless joy
Pains the sage ear, and hurts the sober eye ?”

“ Magnificence of old” (the prince replied)
“ Beneath our roof with virtue could reside ;
Unblam'd abundance crown'd the royal board,
What time this dome rever'd her prudent lord ;
Who now (so Heaven decrees) is doom'd to mourn
Bitter constraint ; erroneous and forlorn.
Better the chief, on Iliön's hostile plain,
Had fall'n-surrounded with his warlike train ;
Or safe return'd, the race of glory past,
New to his friends' embrace, had breath'd his last !
Then grateful Greece with streaming eyes would Historic marbles, to record his praise ; [raise
His praise, eternal on the faithful stone,
And with transmissive honour grac'd his son.
Now snatch'd by harpies to the dreary coast,
Sunk is the hero, and his glory lost :
Vain'd at once ! unheard-of, and unknown !
And f' his heir in misery alone.

Nor for a dear, lost father only flow
The filial tears, but woe succeeds to woe :

To tempt the spouseless queen with amorous
wiles,

Resort the nobles from the neighbouring isles ;
From Samos, circled with th' Iönian main,
Dulichium, and Zacynthus' sylvan reign :
Ev'n with presumptuous hope her bed 't ascend,
The lords of Ithaca their right pretend.
She seems attentive to their pleaded vows,
Her heart detesting what her ear allows.
They, vain expectants of the bridal hour,
My stores in riotous expense devour,
In feast and dance the mirthful months employ,
And meditate my doom, to crown their joy.”

With tender pity touch'd, the goddess cried :
“ Soon may kind Heaven a sure relief provide !
Soon may your sire discharge the vengeance due,
And all your wrongs the proud oppressors rue !
Oh ! in that portal should the chief appear,
Each hand tremendous with a brazen spear,
In radiant panoply his limbs incas'd
(For so of old my father's court he grac'd,
When social mirth unbent his serious soul,
O'er the full banquet, and the sprightly bowl) :
He then from Epyre, the fair domain
Of Ilus, sprang from Jason's royal strain, [vain
Measur'd a length of seas, a toilsome length, in
For voyaging to learn the direful art
To taint with deadly drugs the barbed dart ;
Observant of the gods, and sternly just,
Ilus refus'd 't impart the baneful trust :
With friendlier zeal my father's soul was fir'd,
The drugs he knew, and gave the boon desir'd.
Appear'd he now with such heroic port,
As then conspicuous at the Taphian court ;
Soon should you boasters cease their hangy strife,
Or each atone his guilty love with life.

But of his wish'd return the care resign ;
Be future vengeance to the powers divine.
My sentence bear : with stern distaste avow'd,
To their own districts drive the suitor-crowd :
When next the morning-warms the purple east,
Convoke the peerage, and the gods attest ;
The sorrows of your inmost soul relate ;
And form sure plans to save the sinking state,
Should second love a pleasing flame inspire,
And the chaste queen connubial rites require ;
Dismiss'd with honour, let her hence repair
To great Icarus, whose paternal care
Will guide her passion, and reward the choice
With wealthy dower, and bridal gifts of price.
Then let this dictate of my love prevail :
Instant, to foreign realms prepare to sail,
To learn your father's fortunes : Fame may prove,
Or omen'd voice, (the messenger of Jove)
Propitious to the search. Direct your toil
Through the wide ocean first to sandy Pyle ;
Of Nestor, hoary sage, his doom demand :
Thence speed your voyage to the Spartan strand ;
For young Atrides to th' Achaian coast
Arriv'd the last of all the victor host.
If yet Ulysses views the light ; forbear,
Till the fleet hours restore the circling year.
But if his soul hath wing'd the destin'd flight,
Inhabitant of deep disastrous night :
Homeward with pious speed retrace the main,
To the pale shade funereal rites ordain,
Plant the fair column o'er the vacant grave,
A hero's honours let the hero have.
With decent grief the royal dead deplor'd,
For the chaste queen select an equal lord.

Then let revenge your daring mind employ,
By fraud or force the suitor-train destroy,
And, starting into manhood, scorn the boy.
Hast thou not heard how young Orestes, fir'd
With great revenge, immortal praise acquir'd?
His virgin-sword Ægysthus' veins imbrued;
The murderer fell, and blood aton'd for blood.
O greatly bless'd with every blooming grace!
With equal steps the paths of glory trace;
Join to that royal youth's your rival name,
And shine eternal in the sphere of fame.—
But my associates now my stay deplore,
Impatient on the hoarse-resounding shore.
Thou, heedful of advice, secure proceed;
My praise the precept is, be thine the deed."

"The counsel of my friend" (the youth rejoin'd)
"Imprints conviction on my grateful mind.
So fathers speak (persuasive speech and mild)
Their sage experience to the favourite child,
But, since to part, for sweet refection due
The genial viands let my train renew:
And the rich pledge of plighted faith receives,
Worthy the heir of Ithaca to give."

"Defer the promis'd boon," (the goddess, cries, Celestial azure brightening in her eyes)
"And let me now regain the Reithrian port:
From Temesè return'd, your royal court
I shall revisit; and that pledge receive;
And gifts, memorial of our friendship, leave."

Abrupt, with eagle-speed she cut the sky;
Instant invisible to mortal eye.
Then first he recognis'd th' æthereal guest;
Wonder and joy alternate fire his breast:
Heroic thoughts, infus'd, his heart dilate;
Revolving much his father's doubtful fate,
At length, compos'd, he join'd the suitor-throng;
Hush'd in attention to the warbled song.
His tender theme the charming lyrist chose,
Minerva's anger, and the direful woes
Which voyaging from Troy the victors bore,
While storms vindictive intercept the shore,
The shrilling airs the vaulted roof rebound,
Reflecting to the queen the silver sounds.
With grief renew'd the weeping fair descends;
Their sovereign's step a virgin train attends;
A veil, of richest texture wrought, she wears,
And silent to the joyous hall repairs.
There from the portal, with her Ænid command,
Thus gently checks the minstrel's tuneful hand:
"Phemius! let acts of gods, and heroes old,

What ancient bards in hall and bower have told,
Attemper'd to the lyre, your voice employ;
Such the pleas'd ear will drink with silent joy.
But, oh! forbear that dear disastrous name,
To sorrow sacred, and source of fame:
My bleeding bosom sickens at the sound,
And every piercing note inflicts a wound."

"Why, dearest object of my duteous love," (Reply'd the prince) "will you the bard reprove?
Oft, Jove's æthereal rays (resistless fire)
The chanter's soul and raptur'd song inspire;
Instinct divine! nor blame severe his choice,
Warbling the Grecian woes with harp and voice:
For novel lays attract our ravish'd ears;
But old, the mind with inattention hears;
Patient permit the sadly pleasing strain;
Familiar now with grief, your tears refrain,
And in the public woe forget your own;
You weep not for a perish'd lord, alone,

What Greeks, now wandering in the Stygian gloom,
With your Ulysses shar'd an equal doom!
Your widow'd hours, apart, with female toil
And various labours of the loom, beguile;
There rule, from palace-carea remote and free;
That care to man belongs, and most to me."

Mature beyond his years the queen admires
His sage reply, and with her train retires.
Then swelling sorrows burst their former bounds,
With echoing grief afresh the dome resounds;
Till Pallas, piteous of her plaintive cries,
In slumber clos'd her silver-streaming eyes.

Meantime, rekindled at the royal charms,
Tumultuous love each beating bosom warms;
Intemperate rage a wordy war began;
But bold Telemachus assum'd the man.

"Instant" (he cry'd) "your female discord end,
Ye deedless boasters! and the song attend;
Obey that sweet compulsion, nor profane
With dissonance the smooth melodious strain.
Pacific now prolong the jovial feast;
But when the dawn reveals the rosy east,
I, to the peers assembled, shall propose
The firm resolve, I here in few disclose:
No longer live the cankers of my court;
All to your several states with speed resort;
Waste in wild riot what your land allows,
There ply the early feast, and late carouse.
But if, to honour lost, 'tis still decreed
For you my bowl shall flow, my flocks shall bleed;
Judge and revenge my right, impartial Jove!—
By him, and all th' immortal thrones above,
(A sacred oath) each proud oppressor, slain,
Shall with inglorious gore this marble stain."

Aw'd by the prince, thus haughty, bold, and young,
Rage gnaw'd the lip, and wonder chain'd the tongue,
Silence at length the gay Antinoüs broke,
Constrain'd a smile, and thus ambiguous spoke:
"What god to your uptutor'd youth affords
This headlong torrent of amazing words?
May Jove delay thy reign, and cumber late
So bright a genius with the toils of state!"

"Those toils" (Telemachus serene replies)
"Have charms, with all their weight, 't allure the Fast by the throne obsequious fame resides, [wise,
And wealth incessant rolls her golden tides.
Nor let Antinoüs rage, if strong desire
Of wealth and fame a youthful bosom fire:
Elect by Jove his delegate of sway,
With joyous pride the summons I'd obey.
Whene'er Ulysses roams the realm of night,
Should factious power dispute my lineal right,
Some other Greeks a fairer claim may plead;
To your pretence their title would precede.
At least, the sceptre lost, I still should reign
Sole o'er my vassals, and domestic train."

To this Eurymachus: "To Heaven alone
Refer the choice to fill the vacant throne.
Your patrimonial stores in peace possess;
Undoubted, all your filial claim confess:
Your private right should impious power invade,
The peers of Ithaca would arm in aid.
But say, that stranger guest who late withdrew,
What and from whence? his name and lineage shew,
His grave demeanour and majestic grace
Speak him descended of no vulgar race:
Did he some loan of ancient right require,
Or came fore-runner of your scepter'd sire?"

"Oh, son of Polybus!" the prince replies,
"No more my sire will gild these longing eyes!"

The queen's fond hope inventive rumour cheers,
Or vain diviners' dreams divert her fears.
That stranger-guest the Taphian realm obeys,
A realm defended with incircling seas;
Mentes, an ever-honour'd name; of old
High in Ulysses' social list enroll'd."

Thus he, though conscious of th' ethereal guest,
Answer'd evasive of the sly request.

Meantime the lyre rejoins the sprightly lay;
Love-dittied airs, and dance, conclude the day.
But when the star of eve with golden light
Adorn'd the matron brow of sable night;
The mirthful train dispersing quit the court,
And to their several domes to rest resort.

A towering structure to the palace join'd;
To this his steps the thoughtful prince inclin'd;
In his pavilion there, to sleep repairs;
The lighted torch, the æge Euryclæa bears;
(Daughter of Ops, the just Pisenor's son,
For twenty beegves by great Laertes won;
In rosy prime with charms attractive grac'd,
Honour'd by him, a gentle lord and chaste,
With dear esteem; too wise, with jealous strife
To taint the joys of sweet, connubial life.
Sole with Telemachus her service ends,
A child she nurs'd him, and a man attends.)

Whilst to his couch the prince himself address,
The duteous dame receiv'd the purple vest:
The purple vest with decent care dispos'd,
The silver ring she pull'd, the door relock'd;
The bolt, obedient to the silken cord,
To the strong staple's inmost depth restor'd,
Secur'd the valves. There wreath in silent shade,
Pensive, the rules the goddess gave, he weigh'd;
Stretch'd on the downy fleece, no rest he knows,
And in his raptur'd soul the vision glows,

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK II.

ARGUMENT.

THE COUNCIL OF ITHACA.

TELEMACHUS, in the assembly of the lords of Ithaca, complains of the injustice done him by the suitors, and insists upon their departure from his palace; appealing to the princes, and exciting the people to declare against them. The suitors endeavour to justify their stay, at least till he shall send the queen to the court of Icarus her father; which he refuses. There appears a prodigy of two eagles in the sky, which an augur expounds to the ruin of the suitors. Telemachus then demands a vessel to carry him to Pylos and Sparta, there to inquire of his father's fortunes. Pallas, in the shape of Mentor (an ancient friend of Ulysses), helps him to a ship, assists him in preparing necessaries for the voyage, and embarks with him that night; which concludes the second day from the opening of the poem.

The scene continues in the palace of Ulysses in Ithaca.

Now reddening from the dawn, the morning-ray
Flaw'd in the front of heaven, and gays the day.

The youthful hero, with returning light,
Rose anxious from th' inquietudes of night.
A royal robe he wore with graceful pride,
A two-edg'd falchion threaten'd by his side,
Embroider'd sandals glitter'd as he trod,
And forth he mov'd majestic as a god.
Then by his heralds, restless of delay,
To council calls his peers: the peers obey.
Soon as in solemn form th' assembly sate,
From his high dome himself descends in state.
Bright in his hand a ponderous javelin shin'd;
Two dogs, a faithful guard, attend behind;
Pallas with grace divine his form improves,
And gazing crowds admire him as he moves.

His father's throne he fill'd: while distant stood
The hoary peers, and aged wisdom bow'd.

'Twas silence all. At last Ægyptius spoke;
Ægyptius, by his age and sorrows broke:
A length of days his soul with prudence crown'd,
A length of days had bent him to the ground.
His eldest hope¹ in arms to Ilium came,
By great Ulysses taught the path to fame;
But (hapless youth) the hideous Cyclops tore
His quivering limbs, and quaff'd his spouting
gore.

Three sons remain'd: to climb with haughty fires
The royal bed, Eurynomus aspires;
The rest with duteous love his griefs assuage,
And ease the sire of half the cares of age.
Yet still his Antiphus he loves, he mourns,
And, as he stood, he spoke and wept by turns:

"Since great Ulysses sought the Phrygian plains,
Within these walls inglorious silence reigns.
Say then, ye peers, by whose commands we meet!
Why here once more in solemn council sit?
Ye young, ye old, the weighty cause disclose:
Arrives some message of invading foes?
Or say, does high necessity of state
Inspire some patriot, and demand debate!
The present synod speaks its author wise;
Assist him, Jove, thou regent of the skies!"

He spoke. Telemachus with transport glows,
Embrac'd the omen, and majestic rose
(His royal hand th' imperial sceptre sway'd);
Then thus, addressing to Ægyptius, said:

"Reverend old man! lo here confest he stands
By whom ye meet; my grief your care demands.

No story I unfold of public woes,
Nor bear advices of impending foes:
Peace the blest land, and joys incessant crown;
Of all this happy realm, I grieve alone.
For my lost sire continual sorrows spring,
The great, the good; your father, and your king.
Yet more; our house from its foundation bows,
Our foes are powerful, and your sons the foes:
Hither, unwelcome to the queen, they come;
Why seek they not the rich Icarian dome!

If she must wed, from other hands require
The dowry: is Telemachus her sire?
Yet through my court the noise of revel rings,
And wastes the wise frugality of kings.
Scarce all my herds their luxury suffice;
Scarce all my wine their midnight hours supplies.
Safe in my youth, in riot still they grow,
Nor in the helpless orphan dread a foe.

But come it will, the time when manhood grants
More powerful advocates than vain complaints.
Approach that hour! insufferable wrong
Cries to the gods, and vengeance sleeps too long.

! Antiphus.

Rise then, ye peers! with virtuous anger rise!
Your fame reverse, but most th' avenging skies.
By all the deathless powers that reign above,
By righteous Themis and by thundering Jove, (Themis, who gives to councils, or denies,
Success; and humbles, or confirms the wise)
Rise in my aid! suffice the tears that flow
For my lost sire, nor add new woe to woe.
If e'er he bore the sword to strengthen ill,
Or, having power to wrong, betray'd the will,
On me, on me your kindled wrath assuage,
And bid the voice of lawless riot rage.
If ruin to our royal race ye doom,
Be you the spoilers, and our wealth consume.
Then might we hope redress from juster laws,
And raise all Ithaca to aid our cause:
But while your sons commit th' unpunish'd wrong,
You make the arm of violence too strong."

While thus he spoke, with rage and grief he
frown'd,
And dash'd th' imperial sceptre to the ground.
The big round tear hung trembling in his eye:
The synd griev'd, and gave a pitying sigh,
Then silent sat—at length Antinous burns:
With haughty rage, and sternly thus returns:
"O insolence of youth! whose tongue affords
Such railing eloquence, and war of words.
Studios thy country's worthies to defame,
Thy erring voice displays thy mother's shame.
Evasive of the bridal day, she gives
Fond hope to all, and all with hopes deceives.
Did not the Sun, through Heaven's wide azure roll'd,
For three long years the royal fraud behold?
While she, laborious in delusion, spread,
The spacious loom, and mix'd the various thread:
Where as to life the wondrous figures rise,
Thus spoke th' inventive queen, with artful sighs:
'Though cold in death Ulysses breathes no more,
Cease yet a while to urge the bridal hour;
Cease, till to great Lætes I bequeath
A task of grief, his ornaments of death;
Lest when the Fates his royal ashes claim,
The Grecian matron taint my spotless fame;
When he, whom living mighty realms obey'd,
Shall want in death a shroud to grace his shade.'

"Thus she: at once the generous train complies,
Nor fraud mistrust in virtue's fair disguise.
The work sh' ply'd; but, studios of delay,
By night revers'd the labours of the day.
While thrice the Sun his annual journey made,
The conscious lamp the midnight fraud survey'd;
Unheard, unseen, three years her arts prevail;
The fourth her maid unfolds th' amazing tale.
We saw, as unperceiv'd we took our stand,
The backward labours of her faithless hand.
Then urg'd, she perfects her illustrious toils;
A wondrous monument of female wiles!
But you, oh peers! and thou, oh prince, give ear
(I speak aloud, that every Greek may hear:)
Dismiss the queen: and if her sire approves,
Let him espouse her to the peer she loves:
Bid instant to prepare the bridal train,
Nor let a race of princes wait in vain.
Though with a grace divine her soul is blest,
And all Minerva breathes within her breast,
In wondrous arts than woman more renown'd,
And more than woman with deep wisdom crown'd;
Though Tyro nor Mycene match her name,
Nor great Alcmena (the proud boasts of fame)

Yet, thus by Heaven ador'd, by Heaven's decrees,
She shines with fatal excellence to thee:
With thee, the bowl we drain, indulge th' feast,
Till righteous Heaven reclaim her stubborn breast.
What though from pole to pole resounds her
name,

The son's destruction waits the mother's fame:
For, till she leaves thy court, it is decreed,
Thy bowl to empty, and thy flock to bleed."

While yet he speaks, Telemachus replies:
"Ev'n nature starts, and what ye ask denies.
Thus, shall I thus repay a mother's cares,
Who gave me life, and nurs'd my infant years?
While sad on foreign shores Ulysses treads,
Or glides, a ghost with unapparent shades;
How to Icarus in the bridal hour
Shall I, by waste undone, refund the dower?
How from my father should I vengeance dread?
How would my mother curse my hated head?
And while in wrath to vengeful fiends she cries,
How from their Hell would vengeful fiends arise?
Abhor'd by all, accus'd my name would grow,
The Earth's disgrace, and human-kind my foe.
If this displeas, why urge ye here your stay?
Haste from the court, ye spoilers, haste away:
Waste in wild riot what your land allows,
There ply the early feast, and late carouse.
But if, to honour lost, 'tis still decreed
For you my bows shall flow, my flocks shall bleed;

Judge and assert my right, impartial Jove!
By him, and all th' immortal host above,
(A sacred oath) if Heaven the power supply,
Vengeance I vow, and for your wrongs ye die."

With that, two eagles from a mountain's height
By Jove's command direct their rapid flight;
Swift they descend with wing to wing conjoin'd,
Stretch their broad plumes, and float upon the wind,

Above th' assembled peers they wheel on high,
And clang their wings, and hovering beat the sky;
With ardent eyes the rival train they threat,
And, shrieking loud, denounce approaching fate,
They cuff, they tear; their cheeks and necks
they rend,

And from their plumes huge drops of blood descend:
Then, sailing o'er the domes and towers, they fly
Full tow'rd the east, and mount into the sky.

The wondering rivals gaze with cares oppress,
And chilling horrors freeze in every breast.
Till, big with knowledge of approaching woe,
The prince of augurs, Halitherses, rose:
Prescient he view'd th' aerial tracks, and drew
A sure presage from every wing that flew.

"Ye sons" (he cry'd) "of Ithaca, give ear,
Hear all! but chiefly you, oh rivals! hear.
Destruction sure o'er all your heads impends;
Ulysses comes, and death his steps attends.
Nor to the great alone is death decreed;
We and our guilty Ithaca must bleed.
Why cease we then the wrath of Heaven to stay?
Be humbled all, and lead, ye great! the way.
For, lo! my words no fancy'd woes relate;
I speak from science, and the voice is fate.

"When great Ulysses sought the Phrygian shores
To shake with war proud Ilium's lofty towers,
Deeds then undone my faithful tongue foretold:
Heaven seal'd my words, and you those deeds behold.

'I see (I cry'd) his woes, a countless train,
See his friends o'erwhelm'd beneath the main;
How twice ten years from shore to shore he roams:
Now twice ten years are past, and now he comes!

To whom Eurymachus—"Fly, dotard, fly!
With thy wise dreams, and fables of the sky.
Go, prophesy at home; thy sons advise:
Here thou art sage in vain—I better read the skies.
Unnumber'd birds glide through th' aerial way,
Vagrants of air, and unforecasting stray.
Cold in the tomb, or in the deeps below,
Ulysses lies: oh, wert thou laid as low!
Then would that busy head no broils suggest,
Nor fire to rage Telemachus's breast.

From him some bribe thy venal tongue requires,
And interest, not the god, thy voice inspires.
His guideless youth, if thy experienc'd age
Mistake fallacious into idle rage,

Vengeance reserv'd thy malice shall repress,
And but augment the wrongs thou would'st redress.
Telemachus may bid the queen repair

To great Icarus, whose paternal care
Will guide her passion, and reward her choice,
With wealthy dower, and bridal gifts of price.
Till she retires, determin'd we remain,
And both the prince and augur threat in vain:
His pride of words, and thy wild dream of fate,
Move not the brave, or only move their hate.
Threat on, O prince, elude the bridal day,
Threat on, till all thy stores in waste decay.
True, Greece affords a train of lovely dames,
In wealth and beauty worthy of our flames:
But never from this nobler suit we cease;
For wealth and beauty less than virtue please."

To whom the youth: "Since then in vain I tell
My numerous woes, in silence let them dwell.
But Heaven, and all the Greeks, have heard my wrongs:

To Heaven, and all the Greeks, redress belongs.

Yet this I ask, (nor be it ask'd in vain)
A bark to waft me o'er the rolling main;
The realms of Pyle and Sparta to explore,
And seek my royal sire from shore to shore:
If, or to fame his doubtful fate be known,
Or to be learn'd from oracles alone?
If yet he lives; with patience I forbear,
Till the fleet hours restore the circling year:
But if already wandering in the train
Of empty shades, I measure back the main,
Plant the fair column o'er the mighty dead,
And yield his consort to the nuptial bed."

He ceas'd; and while the peers abash'd attend,
Mentor arose, Ulysses' faithful friend:
[When fierce in arms he sought the scenes of war,
"My friend," (he cry'd) "my palace be thy
Years roll'd on years my godlike sire decay, [care;
Guard thou his age, and his behests obey."]
Stern as he rose, he cast his eyes around,
That flash'd with rage; and as he spoke, he
frown'd:

"O never, never more! let king be just,
Be mild in power, or faithful to his trust!
Let tyrants govern with an iron rod,
Oppress, destroy, and be the scourge of God;
Since he who like a father held his reign,
So soon forgot, was just and mild in vain!
True, while my friend is griev'd, his griefs I
Yet now the rivals are my smallest care: [share;
They for the mighty mischiefs they devise,
Ere long shall pay—their forfeit lives the price.

But against you, ye Greeks! ye coward train,
Gods! how my soul is mov'd with just disdain!
Dumb ye all stand, and not one tongue affords
His injur'd prince the little aid of words."

While yet he spoke, Icoeritus rejoin'd:
"O pride of words, and arrogance of mind!
Would'st thou to rise in arms the Greeks advise?
Join 'all your powers! in arms, the Greeks, arise!

Yet would your powers in vain our strength oppose:
The valiant few o'ermatch an host of foes.
Should great Ulysses stern appear in arms,
While the bowl circles, and the banquet warms;
Though to his breast his spouse with transport
Torn from her breast, that hour, Ulysses dies. [flies,
But hence retreating to your domes repair;
To arm the vessel, Mentor! be thy care,
And Halitherses! thine: be each his friend;
Ye lov'd the father: go, the son attend.
But yet, I trust, the boaster means to stay
Safe in the court, nor tempt the watery way."

Then, with a rushing sound, th' assembly bend;
Diverse their steps: the rival rout ascend
The royal dome; while sad the prince explores
The neighbouring main, and sorrowing treads
the shores.

There, as the waters o'er his hands he shed,
The royal suppliant to Minerva pray'd:

"O goddess! who descending from the skies
Vouchsaf'd thy presence to my wondering eyes,
By whose commands the raging deeps I trace,
And seek my sire through storms and rolling seas!
Hear from thy Heavens above, oh, warrior-maid!
Descend once more propitious to my aid.
Without thy presence, vain is thy command:
Greece and the rival train, thy voice withstand."

Indulgent to his prayer the goddess took
Sage Mentor's form, and thus like Mentor spoke:

"O prince, in early youth divinely wise,
Born, the Ulysses of thy age to rise!
If to the son the father's worth descends,
O'er the wide waves success thy ways attends:
To tread the walks of death he stood prepar'd;
And what he greatly thought, he nobly dar'd.
Were not wise sons descendants of the wise,
And did not heroes from brave heroes rise:
Vain were my hopes: few sons attain the praise
Of their great sires, and most their sires disgrace.
But since thy veins paternal virtue fires,
And all Penelope thy soul inspires:
Go, and succeed! the rivals' aims despise;
For never, never, wicked man was wise.

Blind they rejoice, though now, ev'n now they fall;
Death hastes a main: one hour o'erwhelms them all!
And lo, with speed we plough the watery way,
My power shall guard thee, and my hand convey:
The winged vessel studious I prepare,
Through seas and realms companions of thy care,
Thou to the court ascend: and to the shores
(When night advances) bear the naval stores;
Bread, that decaying man with strength supplies,
And generous wine, which thoughtful sorrow flies.
Mean while the mariners, by my command,
Shall speed aboard, a valiant chosen band.
Wide o'er the bay, by vessel vessel rides;
The best I choose to waft thee o'er the tides."

She spoke: to his high dome the prince returns,
And as he moves with royal anguish mourns.
'Twas riot all, among the lawless train;
Boar bled by boar, and goat by goat lay slain.

Arriv'd, his hand the gay Antinous prest,
 And, thus deriding, with a smile address:
 "Grieve not, oh, daring prince! that noble
 Ill suits gay youth the stern heroic part; [heart:
 Indulge the genial hour, unbend thy soul,
 Leave thought to age, and drain the flowing bowl.
 Studios to ease thy grief, our care provides
 The bark, to waft thee o'er the swelling tides."

"Is this," returns the prince, "for mirth a time?
 When lawless gluttons riot, mirth's a crime;
 The luscious wines, dishonour'd, lose their taste;
 The song is noise, and impious is the feast.
 Sufficè it to have spent with swift decay
 The wealth of kings, and made my youth a prey.
 But now the wise instructions of the sage,
 And manly thoughts inspir'd by manly age,
 Teach me to seek redress for all my woe,
 Here, or in Pyle—in Pyle, or here, your foe.
 Deny your vessels, ye deny in vain;
 A private voyager I pass the main.
 Free breathe the winds, and free the billows flow;
 And where on Earth I live, I live your foe."

He spoke and frown'd, nor longer deign'd to Sternly his hand withdrew, and strode away. [stay,
 Meantime, o'er all the dome, they quaff, they feast,

Derisive taunts were spread from guest to guest,
 And each in jovial mood his mate address:

"Tremble ye not, oh friends! and coward fly,
 Doom'd by the stern Telemachus to die?
 To Pyle or Sparta to demand supplies,
 Big with revenge, the mighty warrior flies:
 Or comes from Ephyre with poisons fraught,
 And kills us all in one tremendous draught?"

"Or, who can say" (his gamesome mate replies)
 "But, while the dangers of the deeps he tries,
 Me, like his sire, may sink depriv'd of breath,
 And punish us unkindly by his death?

What mighty labours would he then create,
 To seize his treasures, and divide his state,
 The royal palace to the queen convey,
 Or him she blesses in the bridal day!"
 Meantime the lofty rooms the prince surveys,
 Where lay the treasures of th' Ithacian race:
 Here ruddy brass and gold refulgent blaz'd;
 Here polish'd chests embroider'd vestures grac'd;
 Here jars of oil breath'd forth a rich perfume;
 There casks of wine in rows adorn'd the dome
 (Pure flavourous wine, by gods in bounty given,
 And worthy to exalt the feasts of Heaven.)

Untouch'd they stood, till, his long labours o'er,
 The great Ulysses reach his native shore.
 A double strength of bars secur'd the gates:
 Fast by the door the wise Euryclea waits;
 Euryclea, who, great Ops! thy lineage shar'd,
 And watch'd all night, all day; a faithful guard.

To whom the prince: "O thou, whose guardian care
 Nurs'd the most wretched king that breathes the air:
 Untouch'd and sacred may these vessels stand,
 Till great Ulysses views his native land.
 But by thy care twelve urns of wine be fill'd;
 Next these, in worth, and firm those urns be seal'd;

And twice ten measures of the choicest flour
 Prepar'd, ere yet descends the evening hour.
 For when the favouring shades of night arise,
 And peaceful slumbers close my mother's eyes,
 Me from our coast shall spreading sails convey,
 To seek Ulysses through the watery way."

While yet he spoke, she fill'd the walls with cries,
 And tears ran trickling from her aged eyes.

"O whither, whither flies my son?" she cry'd,
 "To realms, that rocks and roaring seas divide?
 In foreign lands thy father's days decay'd,
 And foreign lands contain the mighty dead.
 The watery way ill-fated if thou try,
 All, all must perish, and by fraud you die! [maing
 Then stay, my child! storms beat and rolls the Oh, beat those storms, and roll the seas in vain!"
 "Far hence" (reply'd the prince) "thy fears be driven: [Heaven.

Heaven calls me forth? these counsels are of
 But, by the powers that hate the perjur'd, swear,
 To keep my voyage from the royal ear,
 Nor uncompell'd the dangerous truth betray,
 Till twice six times descends the lamp of day:
 Lest the sad tale a mother's life impair,
 And grief destroy what time a while would spare."

Thus he. The matron with uplifted eyes
 Attests th' All-seeing Sovereign of the skies.
 Then studious she prepares the choicest flour,
 The strength of wheat, and wines an ample store.
 While to the rival train the prince returns,
 The martial goddess with impatience burns;
 Like thee, Telemachus, in voice and size,
 With speed divine from street to street she flies,
 She bids the mariners prepar'd to stand,
 When night descends, embody'd on the strand.
 Then to Noëmon swift she runs, she flies,
 And asks a bark: the chief a bark supplies.

And now, declining with his sloping wheel,
 Down sunk the Sun behind the western hills.
 The goddess shov'd the vessel from the shores,
 And stow'd within its womb the naval stores.
 Full in the openings of the spacious main
 It rides; and now descends the sailor-train.

Next, to the court, impatient of delay,
 With rapid step the goddess urg'd her way:
 There every eye with slumberous chains she
 bound,

And dash'd the flowing goblet to the ground,
 Drowsy they rose with heavy fumes oppress,
 Reel'd from the palace, and retir'd to rest.

Then thus, in Mentor's reverend form array'd,
 Spoke to Telemachus the martial maid.

"Lo! on the seas, prepar'd the vessel stands,
 Th' impatient mariner thy speed demands."
 Swift as she spoke, with rapid pace she leads;
 The footsteps of the deity he treads.

Swift to the shore they move: along the strand
 The ready vessel rides, the sailors ready stand.

He bids them bring their stores; th' attending
 train

Load the tall bark, and lanch into the main.
 The prince and goddess to the stern ascend;
 To the strong stroke at once the rowers bend.
 Full from the West she bids fresh breezes blow;
 The sable billows foam and roar below.

The chief his orders gives; th' obedient band
 With due observance wait the chief's command!
 With speed the mast they rear, with speed unbind

The spacious sheet, and stretch it to the wind.
 High o'er the roaring waves the spreading sails
 Bow the tall mast, and swell before the gales;
 The crooked keel the parting surge divides,
 And to the stern retreating roll the tides.
 And now they ship their oars, and crown with wine
 The holy goblet to the powers divine:

Implo'ring all the gods that reign above,
 But chief the blue-ey'd progeny of Jove.
 Thus all the night they stem the liquid way,
 And end their voyage with the morning ray.

 THE ODYSSEY.

 BOOK III.

ARGUMENT.

THE INTERVIEW OF TELEMACHUS AND NESTOR.

TELEMACHUS, guided by Pallas in the shape of Mentor, arrives in the morning at Pylos, where Nestor and his sons are sacrificing on the sea-shore to Neptune. Telemachus declares the occasion of his coming; and Nestor relates what past in their return from Troy, how their fleets were separated, and he never since heard of Ulysses. They discourse concerning the death of Agamemnon, the revenge of Orestes, and the injuries of the suitors. Nestor advises him to go Sparta, and inquire farther of Menelaus. The sacrifice ended with the night, Minerva vanishes from them in the form of an eagle: Telemachus is lodged in the palace. The next morning they sacrifice a bullock to Minerva; and Telemachus proceeds on his journey to Sparta, attended by Pisistratus.

The scene lies on the sea shore of Pylos.

THE sacred Sun, above the waters rais'd,
 Through Heaven's eternal, brazen portals blaz'd;
 And wide o'er Earth diffus'd his cheering ray,
 To gods and men to give the golden day.
 Now on the coast of Pyle the vessel falls,
 Before old Neleus' venerable walls.
 There, suppliant to the monarch of the flood,
 At nine green theatres the Pylians stood,
 Each held five hundred (a deputed train),
 At each nine oxen on the sand lay slain,
 They take the entrails, and the altars load
 With smoking thighs, an offering to the god.
 Full for the port the Ithacensians stand,
 And furl their sails, and issue on the land.
 Telemachus already prest the shore;
 Not first, the power of wisdom march'd before,
 And, ere the sacrificing throng he join'd,
 Admonish'd thus his well-attending mind:
 "Proceed, my son! this youthful shame expel;
 An honest business never blush to tell.
 To learn what fates thy wretched sire detain,
 We pass'd the wide, immeasurable main.
 Meet then the senior far renown'd for sense,
 With reverend awe, but decent confidence:
 Urge him with truth to frame his fair replies;
 And sure he will: for wisdom never lies."
 "O tell me, Mentor! tell me, faithful guide,"
 (The youth with prudent modesty reply'd)
 "How shall I meet, or how accost the sage,
 Unskill'd in speech, nor yet mature of age?
 Awful th' approach, and hard the task appears,
 To question wisely men of riper years."

To whom the martial goddess thus rejoind:
 "Search, for some thoughts, thy own suggesting
 And others, dictated by heavenly power, [mind]
 Shall rise spontaneous in the needful hour.
 For nought unprosperous shall thy ways attend,
 Born with good omens, and with Heaven thy friend."

She spoke, and led the way with swiftest speed:
 As swift, the youth pursued the way she led;
 And join'd the band before the sacred fire,
 Where sate, encompass'd with his sons, the sire.
 The youth of Pylos, some on pointed wood
 Transfix'd the fragments, some prepar'd the food.
 In friendly throngs they gather to embrace
 Their unknown guests, and at the banquet place.
 Pisistratus was first, to grasp their hands,
 And spread soft hides upon the yellow sands;
 Along the shore th' illustrious pair he led,
 Where Nestor sate with youthful Thrasymed.
 To each a portion of the feast he bore,
 And held the golden goblet foaming o'er;
 Then first approaching to the elder guest,
 The latent goddess in these words address:
 "Whoe'er thou art, whom fortune brings to keep
 The rites of Neptune, monarch of the deep,
 The first it fits, oh stranger! to prepare
 The due libation and the solemn prayer:
 Then give thy friend to shed the sacred wine:
 Though much thy younger, and his years like mine,
 He too, I deem, implores the powers divine:
 For all mankind alike require their grace,
 All born to want; a miserable race!"

He spake, and to her hand preferr'd the bowl:
 A secret pleasure touch'd Athena's soul,
 To see the preference due to sacred age
 Regarded ever by the just and sage.
 Of ocean's king she then implores the grace:
 "Oh, thou! whose arms this ample globe embrace,
 Fulfil our wish, and let thy glory shine
 On Nestor first, and Nestor's royal line;
 Next grant the Pylian states their just desires,
 Pleas'd with their hecatomb's ascending fires;
 Last deign Telemachus and me to bless,
 And crown our voyage with desir'd success."

Thus she; and, having paid the rite divine,
 Gave to Ulysses' son the rosy wine.
 Suppliant he pray'd. And, now the victims drest,
 They draw, divide, and celebrate the feast.
 The banquet done, the narrative old man,
 Thus mild, the pleasing conference began:

"Now, gentle guests! the genial banquet o'er,
 It fits to ask you, what your native shore,
 And whence your race? on what adventure, say,
 Thus far ye wander through the watery way?
 Relates if business, or the thirst of gain,
 Engage your journey o'er the pathless main:
 Where savage pirates seek through seas unknown
 The lives of others, venturous of their own."

Urg'd by the precepts by the goddess given,
 And fill'd with confidence infus'd from Heaven,
 The youth, whom Pallas destin'd to be wise
 And fam'd among the sons of men, replies:
 "Inquir'st thou, father! from what coast we came?
 (Oh, grace and glory of the Grecian name!)
 From where high Ithaca o'erlooks the floods,
 Brown with o'er-arching shades and pendent woods,
 Us to these shores our filial duty draws,
 A private sorrow, not a public cause.
 My sire I seek, where-e'er the voice of Fame
 Has told the glories of his noble name,

The great Ulysses; fam'd from shore to shore
 For valour much, for hardy suffering more.
 Long time with thee before proud Iliou's wall
 In arms he fought; with thee beheld her fall.
 Of all the chiefs, this hero's fate alone
 Has Jove reserv'd, unheard of, and unknown;
 Whether in fields by hostile fury slain,
 Or sunk by tempests in the gulph'ry main?
 Of this to learn, oppress with tender fears,
 Lo! at thy knee his suppliant son appears.
 If or thy certain eye, or curious ear,
 Have learnt his fate, the whole dark story clear:
 And, oh! whate'er Heaven destin'd to betide,
 Let neither flattery smooth, nor pity hide.
 Prepar'd I stand: he was but born to try
 The lot of man; to suffer and to die.
 Oh then, if ever through the ten years' war
 The wise, the good Ulysses claim'd thy care;
 If e'er he join'd thy council, or thy sword,
 True in his deed, and constant to his word:
 Far as thy mind through backward time can see,
 Search all thy stores of faithful memory:
 'Tis sacred truth I ask, and ask of thee."

To him experienc'd Nestor thus rejoin'd:
 "O friend! what sorrows dost thou bring to mind?

Shall I the long laborious scene review,
 And open all the wounds of Greece anew?
 What toils by sea! where dark in quest of prey
 Dauntless we rov'd, Achilles led the way:
 What toils by land! where mix'd in fatal fight
 Such numbers fell, such heroes sunk to night:
 There Ajax great, Achilles there the brave,
 There wise Patroclus, fill an early grave:
 There too my son—ah, once my best delight,
 Once swift of foot, and terrible in fight;
 In whom stern courage with soft virtue join'd,
 A faultless body, and a blameless mind:
 Attilochus—what more can I relate?
 How trace the tedious series of our fate?
 Not added years on years my task could close,
 The long historian of my country's woes:
 Back to thy native islands might'st thou sail,
 And leave half-heard the melancholy tale.
 Nine painful years on that detested shore;
 What stratagems we form'd, what toils we bore!
 Still labouring on, till scarce at last we found
 Great Jove propitious, and our conquest crown'd.
 Far o'er the rest thy mighty father shin'd,
 In wit, in prudence, and in force of mind.
 Art thou the son of that illustrious sire?
 With joy I grasp thee, and with love admire.
 So like your voices, and your words so wise,
 Who finds the younger must consult his eyes.
 Thy sire and I were one; nor vary'd ought
 In public sentence, or in private thought;
 Alike to council or th' assembly came,
 With equal souls, and sentiments the same.
 But when (by wisdom won) proud Iliou burn'd,
 And in their ships the conquering Greeks return'd;
 'Twas God's high will the victors to divide,
 And turn the event, confounding human pride:
 Some he destroy'd, some scatter'd as the dust,
 (Not all were prudent, and not all were just.)
 Then Discord, sent by Pallas from above,
 Stern daughter of the great avenger Jove,
 The brother-kings inspir'd with fell debate;
 Who call'd to council all th' Achaian state,
 But call'd untimely (not the sacred rite
 Observ'd, nor heedful of the setting light,

Nor herald sworn the session to proclaim)
 Sour with debauch a reeling tribe they came,
 To thee the cause of meeting they explain,
 And Menelaüs moves to cross the main;
 Not so the king of men: he will'd to stay:
 These sacred rites and hecatombs to pay,
 And calm Minerva's wrath. Oh, blind to fate!
 The gods not lightly change their love, or hate
 With ireful taunts each other they oppose,
 Till in loud tumult all the Greeks arose.
 Now different counsels every breast divide,
 Each burns with rancour to the adverse side:
 Th' unquiet night strange projects entertain'd
 (So Jove, that urg'd us to our fate, ordain'd).
 We with the rising morn our ships unmoor'd,
 And brought our captives and our stores aboard;
 But half the people with respect obey'd
 The king of men, and at his bidding stay'd.
 Now on the wings of winds our course we keep
 (For God had smooth'd the waters of the deep);
 For Tenedos we spread our eager oars,
 There land, and pay due victims to the powers:
 To bless our safe return we join in prayer;
 But angry Jove dispers'd our vows in air,
 And rais'd new discord. Then (so Heaven decreed)
 Ulysses first and Nestor disagreed:
 Wise as he was, by various counsels sway'd,
 He there, though late, to please the monarch, stay'd.

But I, determin'd, stem the foamy floods,
 Warn'd of the coming fury of the gods.
 With us, Tydides fear'd, and urg'd his haste:
 And Menelaüs came, but came the last.
 He join'd our vessels in the Lesbian bay,
 While yet we doubted of our watery way;
 If to the right to urge the pilot's toil,
 (The safer road) beside the Pnyrian isle;
 Or the straight course to rocky Chios plough,
 And anchor under Mima's shaggy brow?
 We sought direction of the power divine:
 The god propitious gave the guiding sign;
 Through the mild seas he bid our navy steer,
 And in Euboea shun the woes we fear.
 The whistling winds already wak'd the sky;
 Before the whistling winds the vessels fly,
 With rapid swiftness cut the liquid way,
 And reach Gerestus at the point of day.
 There hecatombs of bulls, to Neptune slain,
 High-flaming please the monarch of the main.
 The fourth day shone, when all their labours o'er
 Tydides' vessels touch'd the wish'd-for shore.
 But I to Pylos scud before the gales,
 The gods still breathing on my swelling sails;
 Separate from all, I safely landed here;
 Their fates or fortunes never reach'd my ear.
 Yet what I learn'd, attend; as here I sat,
 And ask'd each voyager each hero's fate;
 Curious to know, and willing to relate.
 "Safe reach'd the Myrmidons their native land,
 Beneath Achilles' warlike son's command.
 Those, whom the heir of great Apollo's art,
 Brave Philoctetes, taught to wing the dart;
 And those whom Idomen from Iliou's plain
 Had led, securely cross the dreadful main.
 How Agamemnon touch'd his Argive coast,
 And how his life by fraud and force he lost,
 And how the murderer paid his forfeit breath;
 What lands so distant from that scene of death
 But trembling heard the fame? and, heard, admiring
 How well the son appear'd the slaughter'd sire!

Ev'n with unhappy, that unjustly bleed,
Heaven gives posterity, t' avenge the dead.
So fell Ægyptus; and may'st thou, my friend,
(On whom the virtues of thy sire descend)
Make future times thy equal act adore,
And be what brave Orestes was before!"

The prudent youth reply'd: "O thou the grace
And lasting glory of the Grecian race!
Just was the vengeance, and to latest days
Shall long posterity resound the praise.
Some god this arm with equal prowess bless!
And the proud suitors shall its force confess:
Injurious men! who whil' my soul is sore
Of fresh affronts, are meditating more.
But Heaven denies this honour to my hand,
Nor shall my father repossess the land:
The father's fortune never to return,
And the sad son's to suffer and to mourn."

Thus he; and Nestor took the word: "My son,
Is it then true, as distant rumours run,
That crowds of rivals for thy mother's charms
Thy palace fill with insults and alarms?
Say, is the fault, through tame submission, thine?
Or, leagu'd against thee, do thy people join,
Mov'd by some oracle, or voice divine?
And yet who knows, but ripening lies in fate
An hour of vengeance for th' afflicted state?
When great Ulysses shall suppress these harms,
Ulysses singly, or all Greece in arms.
But if Athena, war's triumphant maid,
The happy son will, as the father, aid,
(Whose fame and safety was her constant care
In every danger and in every war:
Never on man did heavenly favour shine
With rays so strong, distinguish'd, and divine,
As those with which Minerva mark'd thy sire)
So might she love thee, so thy soul inspire!
Soon should their hopes in humble dust be laid,
And long oblivion of the bridal bed." (plies)

"Ah! no such hope?" (the prince with sighs re-
"Can touch my breast! that blessing Heaven denies.
Ev'n by celestial favour were it given,
Fortune or fate would cross the will of Heaven."

"What words are these, and what imprudence
(Thus interpos'd the martial maid divine) [thine?]"

"Forgetful youth! but know, the power above
With ease can save each object of his love;
Wise as his will extends his boundless grace:
Nor lost in time, nor circumscrib'd by place.
Happier his lot, who, many sorrows past,
Long labouring gains his natal shore at last;
Than who, too speedy, hastes to end his life
By some stern ruffian, or adulterous wife.
Death only is the lot which none can miss,
And all is possible to Heaven, but this.

The best, the dearest favourite of the sky
Must taste that cup, for man is born to die."
Thus check'd, reply'd Ulysses' prudent heir:
"Mentor, no more—the mournful thought forbear;
For he no more must draw his country's breath,
Already snatch'd by fate, and the black doom of
Pass we to other subjects; and engage [death!
On themes remote the venerable sage

(Who thrice has seen the perishable kind
Of men decay, and through three ages shin'd
Like gods majestic, and like gods in mind).
For much he knows, and just conclusions draws,
From various precedents, and various laws.

O son of Neleus! awful Nestor, tell
How he, the mighty Agamemnon, fell?

By what strange fraud Ægyptus wrought, relate
(By force he could not) such a hero's fate?
Liv'd Menelaus not in Greece! or where
Was then the martial brother's pious care?
Condemn'd perhaps some for ign shore to tread;
Or sure Ægyptus had not dar'd the deed."
To whom the full of days: "Illustrious youth!
Attend (though partly thou hast guest) the truth.
For had the martial Menelaus found
The ruffian breathing yet on Argive ground;
Nor earth had hid his carcass from the skies,
Nor Grecian virgins shriek'd his obscenities,
But fowls obscure dismember'd his remains,
And dogs had torn him on the naked plains.
While thus the works of bloody Mars employ'd,
The wanton youth inglorious peace enjoy'd;
He, stretch'd at ease in Argos' calm recess,
(Whose stately steeds luxuriant pastures bless)
With flattery's insinuating art
Sooth'd the frail queen, and poison'd all her heart.
At first, with worthy shame and decent pride,
The royal dame his lawless suit deny'd.
For virtue's image yet possess her mind,
Taught by a master of the tuneful kind:
Atrides, parting from the Trojan war,
Consign'd the youthful consort to his care.
True to his charge, the bard preserv'd her long
In honour's limits; such the power of song.
But when the gods these objects of their hate
Dragg'd to destruction, by the links of fate;
The bard they banish'd from his native soil,
And left all helpless in a desert isle:
There he, the sweetest of the sacred train,
Sung dying to the rocks, but sung in vain.
Then virtue was no more; her guard away,
She fell, to lust a voluntary prey.
Ev'n to the temple stalk'd th' adulterous spouse,
With impious thanks, and mockery of vows,
With images, with garments, and with gold;
And odorous fumes from loaded altars roll'd.
"Meantime from flaming Troy we cut the way,
With Menelaus, through the curling sea.
But when to Suisium's sacred point we came,
Crown'd with the temple of th' Athenian dame;
Atrides' pilot, Phrontes, there expir'd
(Phrontes, of all the sons of men admir'd
To steer the bounding bark with steady toil,
When the storm thickens, and the billows boil);
While yet he exercis'd the steerman's art,
Apollo touch'd him with his gentle dart;
Ev'n with the rudder in his hand he fell.
To pay whose honour to the shades of Hell,
We check'd our haste, by pious office bound,
And laid our old companion in the ground.
And now, the rites discharg'd, our course we keep
Far on the gloomy bosom of the deep:
Soon as Malæa's misty tops arise,
Sudden the thunder blackens all the skies,
And the winds whistle, and the surges roll
Mountains on mountains, and obscure the pole.
The tempest scatters and divides our fleet:
Part the storm urges on the coast of Crete,
Where, winding round the rich Cydonian plain,
The streams of Jardan issue to the main,
There it inds a rock, high eminent and steep,
Whose shaggy brow o'erhangs the shady deep,
And views Gostyna on the western side;
On this rough Æuster drove th' impetuous tide:
With broken force the billows roll'd away,
And heav'd the fleet into the neighbouring bay;

Thus sav'd fr m death, they gain'd the Phœstian
 With shatter'd vessels, and disabled oars: shores,
 But five tall barks the winds and waters tost,
 Far from their fellows on th' Egyptian coast.
 There wander'd Menelaus through foreign shores,
 Amassing gold, and gathering naval stores;
 While curst Ægysthus the detested deed
 By fraud fulfill'd, and his great brother bled.
 Seven years the traitor rich Mycenæ sway'd,
 And his stern rule the groaning land obey'd;
 The eighth, from Athens, to his realm restor'd,
 Orestes brandish'd the revenging sword,
 Slew the dire pair, and gave to funeral flame
 The vile assassin, and adulterous dame.
 That day, ere yet the bloody triumphs cease,
 Return'd Atides to the coast of Greece.
 And safe to Argos' port his navy brought,
 With gifts of price and ponderous treasure fraught.
 Hence warn'd, my son, beware! nor idly stand
 Too long a stranger to thy native land;
 Iest beless absence wear thy wealth away,
 While lawless feasters in thy palace sway;
 Perhaps may seize thy realm, and share the spoil;
 And thou return with disappointed toil,
 From thy vain journey, to a rifled isle.
 Howe'er, my friend, indulge one labour more,
 And seek Atrides on the Spartan shore.
 He, wandering long, a wider circle made,
 And many languag'd nations has survey'd;
 And measur'd tracts unknown to other ships
 Amid the monstrous wonders of the deeps;
 (A length of ocean and unbounded sky,
 Which scarce the sea-fowl in a year o'erfly).
 Go then; to Sparta take the watery way,
 Thy ship and sailors but for orders stay,
 Or, if by land thou chuse thy course to bend,
 My steeds, my chariots, and my sons attend:
 Thee to Atrides they shall safe convey,
 Guides of thy road, companions of thy way.
 Urg'd him with truth to frame his free replies,
 And sure he will; for Menelaus is wise."

Thus while he speaks the ruddy Sun descends,
 And twilight gray her evening shade extends.
 Then thus the blue-ey'd maid: "O full of days!
 Wise are thy words, and just are all thy ways.
 Now immolate the tongues, and mix the wine,
 Sacred to Neptune and the powers divine.
 The lamp of day is quench'd beneath the deep,
 And soft approach the balmy hours of sleep:
 Nor fits it to prolong the heavenly feast,
 Timeless, indecent, but retire to rest."

So spake Jove's daughter, the celestial maid.
 The sober train attended and obey'd.
 The sacred heralds on their hands around Pour'd the full urns; the youths the goblets
 crown'd:

From bowl to bowl the holy beverage flows:
 While to the final sacrifice they rose.
 The tongues they cast upon the fragrant flame,
 And pour, above, the consecrated stream.
 And now, their thirst by copious draughts allay'd,
 The youthful hero and th' Athenian maid
 Propose departure from the finish'd rite,
 And in their hollow bark to push the night:
 But this the hospitable sage deny'd.
 "Forbid it Jove! and all the gods!" he cry'd,
 "Thus from my walls the much-lov'd son to send
 Of such a hero, and of such a friend!
 Me, as some needy peasant, would ye leave,
 Whom Heaven denies the blessing to relieve?

Me would you leave, who boast imperial sway,
 When beds of royal state invite your stay?
 No—long as life this mortal shall inspire,
 Or as my children imitate their sire,
 Here shall the wandering stranger find his home,
 And hospitable rites adorn the dome."

"Well hast thou spoke," (the blue-ey'd maid replies)

"Belov'd old man! benovolent as wise.
 Be the kind dictates of thy heart obey'd,
 And let thy words Teleiachus persuade:
 He to thy palace shall thy steps pursue;
 I to the ship to give the orders due,
 Prescribe directions, and confirm the crew.
 For I alone sustain their naval cares,
 Who boast experience from these silver hairs;
 All youths the rest, whom to this journey move
 Like years, like tempers, and their prince's love.
 There in the vessel shall I pass the night;
 And soon as morning paints the fields of light,
 I go to challenge from the Caucasus bold,
 A debt, contracted in the days of old.
 But this thy guest, receiv'd with friendly care,
 Let thy strong coursers swift to Sparta bear;
 Prepare thy chariot at the dawn of day,
 And be thy son companion of his way."

Then turning with the word, Minerva flies,
 And soars an eagle through the liquid skies.
 Vision divine! the throng'd spectators gaze
 In holy wonder fix'd, and still amaze.

But chief the reverend sage admir'd; he took
 The hand of young Teleiachus, and spoke:
 "Oh, happy youth! and favour'd of the skies,
 Distinguish'd care of guardian deities!
 Whose early years for future worth engage,
 No vulgar manhood, no ignoble age.

For, lo! none other of the court above
 Than she, the daughter of almighty Jove,
 Pallas herself, the war-triumphant maid,
 Confest is thine, as once thy father's aid.
 So guide me, goddess! so propitious shine
 On me, my consort, and my royal line!
 A yearling bullock to thy name shall smoke,
 Untam'd, unconscious of the galling yoke,
 With ample forehead, and yet tender horns,
 Whose budding honours ductile gold adorns."

Submissive thus the hoary sire prefer'd
 His holy vow: the favouring goddess heard.
 Then, slowly rising, o'er the sandy space
 Precedes the father, follow'd by his race,
 (A long procession) timely marching home
 In comely order to the regal dome.
 There when arriv'd, on thrones around him plac'd,
 His sons and grandsons the wide circle grac'd.
 To these the hospitable sage, in sign
 Of social welcome, mix'd the racy wine
 (Late from the mellowing cask restor'd to light,
 By ten long years reclin'd, and rosy bright).
 To Pallas high the foaming bowl he crown'd,
 And sprinkled large libations on the ground.
 Each drinks a full oblivion of his cares,
 And to the gifts of balmy sleep repairs.
 Deep in a rich alcove the prince was laid,
 And slept beneath the pompous colonnade;
 Fast by his side Pisistratus lay spread,
 (In age his equal) on a splendid bed:
 But in an inner court, securely clos'd,
 The reverend Nestor and his queen repos'd.

When now Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
 With rosy hustr purpled o'er the lawn;

The old man early rose, walk'd forth, and sate
 On polish'd stone before his palace-gate:
 With unguents sarboth the lucid marble shone,
 Where ancient Neleus sate, a rustic throne;
 But he descending to th' infernal shade,
 Sage Nestor fill'd it, and the sceptre sway'd.
 His sons around him mild obeisance pay,
 And dutious take the orders of the day.
 First Echephron and Stratius quit their bed:
 Then Perseus, Aretus, and Thrasymed;
 The last Pisistratus arose from rest:
 They came, and near him plac'd the stranger-guest.
 To these the senior thus declar'd his will:
 " My sons! the dictates of your sire fulfil.
 To Pallas, first of gods, prepare the feast,
 Who grac'd our rites, a more than mortal guest.
 Let one, dispatchful, bid some swain to lead
 A well-fed bullock from the grassy mead;
 One seek the harbour where the vessels moor,
 And bring thy friends, Telemachus! ashore
 (Leave only two the galley to attend);
 Another to Laertius must we send,
 Artist divine, whose skillful hands infold
 The victim's horn with circumfusile gold.
 The rest may here the pious duty share,
 And bid the handmaids for the feast prepare,
 The seats to range, the fragrant wood to bring,
 And limpid waters from the living spring."
 He said, and busy each his care bestow'd:
 Already at the gates the bullock low'd,
 Already came the Ithacensian crew,
 The dextrous smith the tools already drew:
 His ponderous hammer, and his anvil sound,
 And the strong tongs to turn the metal round.
 Nor was Minerva absent from the rite,
 She view'd her honours, and enjoy'd the sight.
 With reverend hand the king presents the gold,
 Which round th' intorted horns the gilder roll'd,
 So wrought, as Pallas might with pride behold,
 Young Aretus from forth his bridal bower
 Brought the full laver, o'er their hands to pour,
 And canisters of consecrated flour.
 Stratius and Echephron the victim led;
 The ax was held by warlike Thrasymed,
 In act to strike: before him Perseus stood,
 The vase extending to receive the blood.
 The king himself initiates to the power;
 Scatters with quivering hand the sacred flour,
 And the stream sprinkles: from the curling brows
 The hair collected in the fire he throws.
 Soon as due vows on every part were paid,
 And sacred wheat upon the victim laid,
 Strong Thrasymed discharg'd the speeding blow
 Full on his neck, and cut the nerves in two.
 Down sunk the heavy beast: the females round,
 Maids, wives, and matrons, mix a shrilling sound.
 Nor wov'd the queen the holy choir to join
 (The first-born she, of old Clytemnus' line;
 In youth by Nestor lov'd, of spotless fame,
 And lov'd in age, Eurydice her name). [death;
 From earth they rear him, struggling now with
 And Nestor's youngest stops the vents of breath.
 The soul for ever flies: on all sides round
 Streams the black blood, and smokes upon the
 The beast they then divide, and disunite [ground.
 The ribs and limbs, observant of the rite:
 On these, in double cawls involv'd with art,
 The choicest morsels lay from every part.
 The sacred sage before his altar stands,
 Turns the burnt-offering with his holy hands,

And pours the wine, and bids the flames aspire:
 The youth with instruments surround the fire.
 The thighs now sacrific'd, and entrails drest,
 Th' assistants part, transfix, and broil the rest.
 While these officious tend the rites divine,
 The last fair branch of the Nestorean line,
 Sweet Polycaste, took the pleasing toil
 To bathe the prince, and pour the fragrant oil.
 O'er his fair limbs a flowery vest he threw,
 And issued, like a god, to mortal view.
 His former seat besides the king he found
 (His people's father with his peers around);
 All plac'd at ease the holy banquet join,
 And in the dazzling goblet laughs the wine.
 The rage of thirst and hunger now suppress,
 The monarch turns him to his royal guest;
 And for the promis'd journey bids prepare
 The smooth-hair'd horses, and the rapid car.
 Observant of his word; the word scarce spoke,
 The sons obey, and join them to the yoke.
 Then bread and wine a ready handmaid brings,
 And presents, such as suit the state of kings.
 The glittering seat Telemachus ascends;
 His faithful guide Pisistratus attends;
 With hasty hand the ruling reins he drew:
 He lash'd the coursers, and the coursers flew.
 Beneath the bounding yoke alike they held
 Their equal pace, and smok'd along the field.
 The towers of Pylos sink, its views decay,
 Fields after fields fly back, till close of day:
 Then sunk the Sun, and darken'd all the way.
 To Phæra now, Diocleus stately seat
 (Of Alpheus' race), the wary youths retreat.
 His house affords the hospitable rite,
 And pleas'd they sleep (the blessing of the night).
 But when Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
 With rosy lustre purpl'd o'er the lawn;
 Again they mount, their journey to renew,
 And from the sounding portico they flew.
 Along the waving fields their way they hold,
 The fields receding as the chariot roll'd:
 Then slowly sunk the ruddy globe of light,
 And o'er the shaded landscape rush'd the night.

 THE ODYSSEY.

 BOOK IV.

ARGUMENT.

THE CONFERENCE WITH MENELAUS.

TELEMACHUS with Pisistratus arriving at Sparta, is hospitably received by Menelaus, to whom he relates the cause of his coming, and learns from him many particulars of what befel the Greeks since the destruction of Troy. He dwells more at large upon the prophecies of Proteus to him in his return; from which he acquaints Telemachus, that Ulysses is detained in the island of Calypso.

In the mean time the suitors consult to destroy Telemachus in his voyage home. Penelope is apprised of this; but comforted in a dream

by Pallas, in the shape of her sister Iphigenia.

And new proud Sparta with their wheels resounds,
Sparta whose walls a range of hills surrounds :
At the fair dome the rapid labour ends ;
Where sate Atrides 'midst his bridal friends,
With double vows invoking Hymen's power,
To bless his sons' and daughters' nuptial hour.

That day, to great Achilles' son resign'd,
Hermione, the fairest of the kind,
Was sent to crown the long-protracted joy,
Espous'd before the final doom of Troy :
With steeds and gilded cars, a gorgeous train
Attend the nymph to Phthia's distant reign.
Meanwhile at home, to Megapenthes' bed
The virgin-choir Alector's daughter led.
Brave Megapenthes, from a stol'n amour
To great Atrides' age his handmaid bore :
To Helen's bed the gods alone assign
Hermione, to extend the regal line ;
On whom a radiant pomp of graces wait,
Resembling Venus in attractive state.

While this gay friendly troop the king surround,
With festal and mirth the roofs resound :
A bard amid the joyous circle sings
High airs, attempt'd to the vocal strings ;
Whilst, warbling to the varied strain, advance
Two sprightly youths to form the bounding dance.
'Twas then, that, issuing through the palace gate,
The splendid car roll'd slow in regal state :
On the bright eminence young Nestor shone,
And fast beside him great Ulysses' son :
Grave Eteoneus saw the pomp appear,
And, speeding, thus address'd the royal ear :
" Two youths approach, whose semblant features prove

Their blood devolving from the source of Jove.
Is due reception deign'd, or must they bend
Their doubtful course to seek a distant friend ?"

" Insensate," (with a sigh the king replies)
" Too long, misjudging, have I thought thee wise :
But sure relentless folly steels thy breast,
Obdurate to reject the stranger-guest ;
To those dear hospitable rites a foe,
Which in my wanderings oft reliev'd my woe :
Fed by the bounty of another's board,
Till pitying Jove my native realm restor'd—
Straight be the coursers from the car releas'd,
Conduct the youths to grace the genial feast."

The senechal rebuk'd in haste withdrew ;
With equal haste a menial train pursue :
Part led the coursers, from the car enlarg'd ;
Each to a crib with choicest grain surcharg'd ;
Part in a portico, profusely grac'd
With rich magnificence, the chariot plac'd :
Then to the dome the friendly pair invite,
Who eye the dazzling roofs with vast delight ;
Resplendent as the blaze of summer-noon,
Or the pale radiance of the midnight Moon.
From room to room their eager view they bend,
Thence to the bath, a beautiful pile, descend ;
Where a bright daimal-train attend the guests
With liquid odours, and embroider'd vests.
Refresh'd, they wait them to the bower of state,
Where circled with his peers Atrides sate :
Thron'd next the king, a fair attendant brings
The purest product of the crystal springs ;

High on a massy vase of silver mould,
The burnish'd laver flames with solid gold ;
In solid gold the purple vintage flows,
And on the board a second banquet rose.
When thus the king with hospitable port :—
" Accept this welcome to the Spartan coast ;
The waste of nature let the feast repair,
Then your high lineage and your names declare :
Say from what scepter'd ancestry ye claim,
Recorded eminent in deathless fame ?
For vulgar parents cannot stamp their race
With signatures of such majestic grace."

Ceasing, benevolent he straight assigns
The royal portion of the choicest wines
To each accepted friend : with grateful haste
They share the honours of the rich repast.
Suffic'd, soft-whispering thus to Nestor's son,
His head reclin'd, young Ithacus began :

" View'st thou unmov'd, O ever-honour'd most !
These prodigies of art, and wondrous cost !
Above, beneath, around the palace shines
The sunless treasure of exhausted mines :
The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay,
And studded amber darts a golden ray :
Such, and not nobler, in the realms above,
My wonder dictates, is the dome of Jove."
The monarch took the word, and grave reply'd :
" Presumptuous are the vaunts, and vain the pride
Of man, who dares in pomp with Jove contest,
Unchang'd, immortal, and supremely blest !
With all my affluence, when my woes are weigh'd,
Envy will own the purchase dearly paid.
For eight slow-circling years by tempest tost,
From Cyprus to the far Phœnicia coast—
(Sidon the capital) I stretch'd my toil
Through regions fatten'd with the flows of Nile.
Next, Ethiopia's utmost bound explore,
And the parch'd borders of th' Arabian shore :
Then warp my voyage on the southern gales,
O'er the warm Libyan wave to spread my sails :
That happy clime ! where each revolving year
The teeming ewes a triple offspring bear ;
And two fair crescents of translucent horn
The brows of all their young increase adorn ;
The shepherd swains, with sure abundance blest,
On the fat flock and rural dainties feast ;
Nor want of herbage makes the dairy fail,
But every season fills the foaming pail.
Whilst, heaping unwish'd wealth, I distant roam,
The best of brothers, at his natal home,
By the dire fury of a traitress wife,
Ends the sad evening of a stormy life :
Whence with incessant grief my soul annoy'd,
These riches are possess'd, but not enjoy'd !
My wars, the copious theme of every tongue,
To you, your fathers have recorded long :
How favouring Heaven repaid my glorious toils
With a sack'd palace, and barbaric spoils.
Oh ! had the gods so large a boon deny'd,
And life, the just equivalent, supply'd
To those brave warriors, who, with glory fir'd,
Far from their country in my cause expir'd :
Still in short intervals of pleasing woe,
Regardless of the friendly dues I owe,
I to the glorious dead, for ever dear !
Indulge the tribute of a grateful tear.
But oh ! Ulysses—deeper than the rest
That sad idea wounds my anxious breast !
My heart bleeds fresh with agonising pain ;
The bowl and gustful viands tempt in vain,

Nor sleep's soft power can close my streaming eyes,
 When imag'd to my soul his arrows rise.
 No peril in my cause he ceas'd to prove,
 His labours equal'd only by my love:
 And both alike to bitter fortune born,
 For him to suffer, and for me to mourn!
 Whether he wanders on some friendless coast,
 Or glides in Scygian gloom a pensive ghost,
 No flame reveals; but, doubtful of his doom,
 His good old sire with sorrow to the tomb
 Declines his trembling steps; untimely care
 Withers the blooming vigour of his heir;
 And the chaste partner of his bed and throne
 Wastes all her widow'd hours in tender moan."
 While thus pathetic to the prince he spoke.
 From the brave youth the streaming passion broke:
 Studios to veil the grief, in vain repress,
 His face he shrouded with his purple vest:
 The conscious monarch pierc'd the ozy disguise,
 And view'd his filial love with vast surprise:
 Dubious to press the tender theme, or wait
 To hear the youth enquire his father's fate.
 In this suspense bright Helen grac'd the room;
 Before her breath'd a gale of rich perfume.
 So moves, adorn'd with each attractive grace,
 The silver-shafted goddess of the chase!
 The seat of majesty Adraste brings,
 With set illustrious, for the pomp of kings;
 To spread the pall (beneath the regal chair)
 Of softest wool, is bright Alcippe's care.
 A silver canister, divinely wrought,
 In her soft hands the beauteous Phyllo brought;
 To Sparta's queens of old the radiant vase
 Alcandra gave, a pledge of royal grace:
 For Polybus her lord (whose sovereign sway
 The wealthy tribes of Pharian Thebes obey,
 When to that court Atrides came, carest
 With vast munificence th' imperial guest:
 Two lavens from the richest ore refin'd,
 With silver tripods, the kind host assign'd;
 And bouzons from the royal treasure told
 Ten equal talents of refulgent gold.
 Alcandra, consort of his high command,
 A golden distaff gave to Helen's hand;
 And that rich vase, with living sculpture wrought,
 Which, heap'd with wool, the beauteous Phyllo
 brought;
 The nitken fleece impurpled for the loom,
 Rival'd the hyacinth in vernal bloom.
 The sovereign seat then Jove-born Helen press'd,
 And pleasing thus her scepter'd lord address'd:
 "Who grace our palace now, that friendly pair,
 Speak they their lineage, or their names declare?
 Uncertain of the truth, yet uncontrol'd,
 Hear me the boding of my breast unfold:
 With wonder wrapt, on yonder cheek I trace
 The feature of the Ulysean race:
 Diffus'd o'er each resembling line appear,
 In just similitude, the grace and air
 Of young Telemachus! the lovely boy,
 Who bless'd Ulysses with a father's joy,
 What time the Greeks comba'd their social arms,
 T'avenge the stain of my ill-fated charms!"
 "Just is thy thought," the king assenting cries,
 "Methinks Ulysses strikes my wondering eyes;
 Full shines the father in the filial frame,
 His port, his features, and his shape, the same:
 Such quick regards his sparkling eyes bestow;
 Such wavy tinglets o'er his shoulders flow!

And when he heard the long disastrous store
 Of cares, which in my cause Ulysses bore;
 Dismay'd, heart-wounded with paternal woe,
 Above restraint the tide of sorrow rose:
 Cautious to let the gushing grief appear,
 His purple garment veil'd the falling tear."
 "See there confest," Pisistratus replies,
 "The genuine worth of Ithacus the wise!
 Of that heroic sire the youth is sprung,
 But modest awe hath chain'd his timorous tongue:
 Thy voice, O king! with pleas'd attention heard,
 Is like the dictates of a god rever'd.
 With him at Nestor's high command I came;
 Whose age I honour with a parent's name.
 By adverse destiny constrain'd to sue
 For counsel and redress, he sues to you.
 Whatever ill the friendless orphan bears,
 Bereav'd of parents in his infant years,
 Still must the wrong'd Telemachus sustain,
 If, hopeful of your aid, he hopes in vain:
 Affianc'd in your friendly power alone,
 The youth would vindicate the vacant throne."
 "Is Sparta blest, and these desiring eyes View my friend's son?" (the king exulting cries)
 "Son of my friend, by glorious toils approv'd,
 Whose sword was sacred to the man he lov'd:
 Mirror of constant faith, rever'd, and mourn'd—
 When Troy was ruin'd, had the chief return'd,
 No Greek an equal space had e'er possess'd,
 Of dear affection in my grateful breast.
 I, to confirm the mutual joys we shar'd,
 For his abode a capital prepar'd;
 Argos the seat of sovereign rule I chose;
 Fair in the plan the future palace rose,
 Where my Ulysses and his race might reign,
 And portion to his tribes the wide domain.
 To them my vassals had resign'd a soil,
 With teeming plenty to reward their toil.
 There with commutual zeal we both had strove
 In acts of dear benevolence and love:
 Brothers in peace, not rivals in command,
 And death alone dissolv'd the friendly band!
 Some envious power the blissful scene destroys;
 Vanish'd are all the visionary joys:
 The soul of friendship to my hope is lost,
 Fated to wander from his natal coast!"
 He ceas'd; a gust of grief began to rise,
 Fast streams a tide from beauteous Helen's eyes;
 Fast for the sire the filial sorrows flow;
 The weeping monarch swells the mighty woe:
 Thy cheeks, Pisistratus, the tears bedew,
 While pictur'd to thy mind appear'd in view
 Thy martial brother: on the Phrygian plain
 Extended pale, by swarthy Memnon slain!
 But silence soon the son of Nestor broke,
 And, melting with fraternal pity, spoke:
 "Frequent, O king, was Nestor wont to raise
 And charm attention with thy copious praise:
 To crown thy various gifts, the sage assign'd
 The glory of a firm capacious mind:
 With that superior attribute control
 This unavailing impotence of soul,
 Let not your roof with echoing grief resound,
 Now for the feast the friendly bowl is crown'd;
 But when, from dewy shade emerging bright,
 Aurora streaks the sky with orient light,
 Let each deplore his deed: the rites of woe
 Are all, alas! the living can bestow:

O'er the congenial dust injoin'd to shear
The graceful curl, and drop the tender tear.
Then, mingling in the mournful poup with you,
I'll pay my brother's ghost a warrior's due,
And mourn the brave Antiochus, a name
Not unrecorded in the rolls of fame :
With strength and speed superior form'd in fight
To face the foe, or intercept his flight :
Too early snatch'd by fate, ere known to me !
I boast a witness of his worth in thee." [rejoins,]

" Young and mature !" (the monarch thus
" In thee renew'd the soul of Nestor shines :
Form'd by the care of that consummate sage,
In early bloom an oracle of age.
Whene'er his influence Jove vouchsafes to shower
To bless the natal, and the nuptial hour ;
From the great sire transmissive to the race,
The boon devolving gives distinguish'd grace.
Such, happy Nestor ! was thy glorious doom :
Around thee, full of years, thy offspring bloom,
Expert of arms, and prudent in debate ;
The gifts of Heaven to guard thy hoary state.
But now let each becalm his troubled breast,
Wash, and partake serene the friendly feast.
To move thy suit, Telemachus, delay,
Till Heaven's revolving lamp restores the day."

He said, Asphalion swift the layer brings ;
Alternate all partake the grateful springs :
Then from the rites of purity repair,
And with keen gust the savory viands share.
Meantime, with genial joy to warm the soul,
Bright Helen mix'd a mirth-inspiring bowl :
Temper'd with drugs of sovereign use, t' assuage
The boiling bosom of tumultuous rage ;
To clear the cloudy front of wrinkled care,
And dry the tearful sluices of despair :
Charm'd with that virtuous draught th' exalted
All sense of woe delivers to the wind. [mind
Though on the blazing pile his parent lay,
Or a lov'd brother groan'd his life away,
Or darling son, oppress'd by ruffian-force,
Fell breathless at his feet, a mangled corse ;
From morn to eve, impassive and serene,
The man entranc'd would view the deathful scene.
These drugs, so friendly to the joys of life,
Bright Helen learn'd from Thone's imperial wife ;
Who sway'd the sceptre, whose prolific Nile
With various simples clothes the fatten'd soil.
With wholesome herbage mix'd, the direful bane
Of vegetable venom taints the plain ;
From Pæon sprung, their patron-god imparts
To all the Phariæn race his healing arts.
The beverage now prepar'd t' inspire the feast,
The circle thus the beauteous queen address :

" Thron'd in omnipotence, supremest Jove
Temper's the fates of human race above ;
By the firm sanction of his sovereign will,
Alternate are decreed our good and ill.
To feastful mirth be this white hour assign'd,
And sweet discourse, the banquet of the mind.
Myself, assisting in the social joy,
Will tell Ulysses' bold exploit in Troy :
Sole witness of the deed I now declare ;
Speak you (who saw) his wonders in the war.

" Seam'd o'er with wounds, which his own sabre
In the vile habit of a village-slave, [gave,
The foe deceiv'd, he pass'd the tented plain,
In Troy to mingle with the hostile train.
In this attire secure from searching eyes,
Till haply piercing through the dark disguise

The chief I challeng'd ; he, whose practis'd wit
Knew all the serpent mazes of deceit,
Eludes my search : but when his form I view'd
Fresh from the bath with fragrant oils renew'd,
His limbs in military purple dress'd ;
Each brightening grace the genuine Greek cap-sues'd.

A previous pledge of sacred faith obtain'd,
Till he the lines and Argive fleet regain'd,
To keep his stay conceal'd ; the chief declar'd
The plans of war against the town prepar'd.
Exploring then the secrets of the state,
He learn'd what best might urge the Dardan fate ;
And, safe returning to the Grecian host,
Sent many a shade to Pluto's dreary coast.
Load grief resounded through the towers of Troy,
But my pleas'd bosom glow'd with secret joy :
For then, with dire remorse and conscious shame,
I view'd th' effects of that disastrous flame,
Which, kindled by th' imperious queen of love,
Constrain'd me from my native realm to rove ;
And oft in bitterness of soul deplor'd
My absent daughter, and my dearer lord,
Admir'd among the first of human race,
For every gift of mind, and manly grace."

" Right well," reply'd the king, " your speech displays

The matchless merit of the chief you praise :
Heroes in various climes myself have found,
For martial deeds, and depth of thought renown'd :
But Ithacus, unrival'd in his claim,
May boast a title to the loudest fame :
In battle calm, he guides the rapid storm,
Wise to resolve, and patient to perform.
What wondrous conduct in the chief appear'd,
When the vast fabric of the steed we rear'd !
Some demon, anxious for the Trojan doom,
Urg'd you with great Deiphobus to come,
T' explore the fraud ; with guile oppos'd to guile,
Slow-pacing thrice around th' insidious pile ;
Each noted leader's name you thrice invoke,
Your accent varying as their spouses spoke.
The pleasing sounds each latent warrior warm'd,
But most Tydides' and my heart alarm'd :
To quit the steed we both impatient press,
Threatening to answer from the dark recess.
Unmov'd the mind of Ithacus remain'd :
And the vain ardours of our love restrain'd :
But Anticles, unable to control,
Spoke loud the language of his yearning soul :
Ulysses straight, with indignation fir'd,
(For so the common care of Greece requir'd)
Firm to his lips his forceful hands apply'd,
Till on his tongue the fluttering murmurs dy'd.
Meantime Minerva, from the fraudulent horse,
Back to the court of Priam bent your course."

" Inclement Fate !" Telemachus replies,
" Frail is the boasted attribute of wise :
The leader ; mingling with the vulgar host,
Is in the common mass of matter lost !
But now let sleep the painful waste repair
Of sad reflection, and corroding care."
He ceas'd ; the menial fair that round her wait,
At Helen's beck prepare the room of state ;
Beneath an ample portico, they spread
The downy fleece to form the slumberous bed ;
And o'er soft palls of purple grain, unfold
Rich tapestry, stiff with inwoven gold :
Then, through th' illumin'd dome, to balmy rest
Th' obsequious herald guides each princely guest :

Wide to his royal bow'r the king ascends,
 And beauteous Helen on her lord attends.
 Soon as the Morn, in orient purple drest,
 Unbar'd the portal of the roscate east,
 The monarch rose; magnificent to view,
 Th' imperial mantle o'er his vest he threw:
 The glittering zone athwart his shoulder cast,
 A starry falchion low depending grac'd;
 Clasp'd on his feet th' embroider'd sandals shine;
 And forth he moves, majestic and divine:
 Instant to young Telemachus he press'd,
 And thus benevolent his speech address'd:

"Say, royal youth, sincere of soul, report
 What cause hath led you to the Spartan court?
 Do public or domestic cares constrain
 This balsome voyage o'er the surgy main?"

"O highly-favour'd delegate of Jove!"
 (Replies the prince) "inflam'd with filial love,
 And anxious hope, to hear my parent's doom,
 A suppliant to your royal court I come.

Our sovereign seat a lewd usurping race
 With lawless riot and misrule disgrace;
 To pamper'd insolence devoted fall
 Prime of the flock, and choicest of the stall:

For wild ambition wings their bold desire,
 And all to mount th' imperial bed aspire.
 But prostrate I implore, oh king! relate
 The mournful series of my father's fate:

Each known disaster of the man disclose,
 Born by his mother to a world of woes!
 Resist them! nor in erring pity fear
 To wound with storied grief the filial ear:

If e'er Ulysses, to reclaim your right,
 Arou'd his zeal in council or in fight,
 If Phrygian camps the friendly toils attest,
 To the sire's merit give the son's request."

Deep from his inmost soul Atrides sigh'd,
 And thus indignant to the prince reply'd:
 "Heavens! would a soft, inglorious dastard train
 An absent hero's nuptial joys profane!

So with her young, amid the woodland shades,
 A timorous hind the lion's court invades,
 Leaves in that fatal lair the tender fawns,
 Climbs the green cliff, or feeds the flow'ry lawns:

Meantime return'd, with dire remorseless sway
 The monarch savage rends the trembling prey.
 With equal fury, and with equal fame,
 Ulysses soon shall re-assert his claim.

O Jove, supreme, whom gods and men revere!
 And thou, to whom 'tis given to gild the sphere!
 With power congenial join'd, propitious aid
 The chief adopted by the martial maid!

Such to our wish the warrior soon restore,
 As when contending on the Lesbian shore
 His prowess Philomelidus confess'd,
 And loud-acclaiming Greeks the victor bless'd:

Then soon th' invaders of his bed and throne
 Their love presumptuous shall with life atone.
 With patient ear, O royal youth! attend
 The storied labours of thy father's friend:

Fruitful of deeds, the copious tale is long,
 But truth severe shall dictate to my tongue:
 Learn what I heard the sea-born seer relate,
 Whose eye can pierce the dark recess of fate.

"Long on th' Egyptian coast by calms confin'd,
 Heaven to my feet refus'd a prosperous wind:
 No rows had we preferr'd, nor victim slain!
 For this the gods each favouring gale restrain:

Jealous, to see their high behests obey'd;
 Severe, if men th' eternal rights evade.
 High o'er the gulfy sea, the Pharian isle
 Fronts the deep roar of disemboguing Nile:

Her distance from the shore, the course begun
 At dawn, and ending with the setting Sun,
 A galley measures; when the stiffer gales
 Rise on the poop, and fully stretch the sails.
 There, anchor'd vessels safe in harbour lie,
 Whilst litpid springs the failing cask supply.

"And now the twentieth Sun, descending, laves
 His glowing axle in the western waves;
 Still with expanded sails we court in vain
 Propitious winds, to waft us o'er the main:

And the pale mariner at once deplora
 His drooping vigour, and exhausted stores,
 When, lo! a bright cerulean form appears,
 The fair Eidothea! to dispel my fears;

Proteus her sire divine. With pity press'd,
 Me sole the daughter of the deep address'd;
 What time, with hunger pin'd, my absent mates
 Roam the wild isle in search of rural cates,

Bait the barb'd steel, and from the fishy flood
 Appease th' afflictive fierce desires of food.
 "Who'er thou art," the azure goddess cries,
 'Thy conduct ill deserves the praise of wise:

Is death thy choice, or misery thy boast,
 That here inglorious on a barren coast
 Thy brave associates droop, a meagre train
 With famine pale, and ask thy care in vain?"

"Struck with the kind reproach, I straight reply:
 'Whate'er thy title in thy native sky,
 A goddess sure! for more than mortal grace
 Speaks the descendant of ethereal race:

Deem not, that here of choice my fleet remains;
 Some heavenly power averse my stay constrains:
 O, pitious of my fate, vouchsafe to shew
 (For what's sequester'd from celestial view?)

What power becalms th' innavigable seas?
 What guilt provokes him, and what vows appease?"

"I cease'd, when affable the goddess cry'd;
 'Observe, and in the truths I speak confide:
 Th' oraculous seer frequents the Pharian coast,
 From whose high bed my birth divine I boast:

Proteus, a name tremendous o'er the main,
 The delegate of Neptune's watery reign,
 Watch with insidious care his known abode;
 There fast in chains constrain the various god:

Who bound, obedient to superior force,
 Unerring will prescribe your destin'd course.
 If, studious of your realms, you then demand
 Their state, since last you left your natal land;

Instant the god obsequious will disclose
 Bright tracks of glory, or a cloud of woe.'
 "She ceas'd, and suppliant thus I made reply:
 'O goddess! on thy aid my hopes rely;

Dictate propitious to my duteous ear,
 What arts can captivate the changeful seer?
 For perilous th' assay, unheard the toil,
 T' elude the presence of a god by guile.'

"Thus to the goddess mild my suit I end.
 Then she: 'Obedient to my rule, attend:
 When through the zone of Heaven the mounted Sun

Hath journey'd half, and half remains to run;
 The seer, while zephyrs curl the swelling deep,
 Basks on the breezy shore, in grateful sleep,
 His oozy limbs. Emerging from the wave,
 The phocæ swift surround his rocky cave,

² Apollo.

Frequent and full; the consecrated train
Of her, whose azure trident awes the main:
There wallowing warm, th' enormous herd exhales
An oily steam, and taints the noon-tide gales.
To that recess, commodious for surprise,
When purple light shall next suffuse the skies,
With me repair; and from thy warrior band
Three chosen chiefs of dauntless soul command:
Let their auxiliar force befriend the toil:
For strong the god, and perfected in guile.
Stretch'd on the shelly shore, he first surveys
The founcing herd ascending from the seas;
Their numb'r summ'd, repos'd in sleep profound
The scaly charge their guardian god surround:
So with his battering flocks the careful swain
Abides, pavilion'd on the grassy plain.
With powers united, obstinately bold
Invade him, couch'd amid the scaly fold:
Instant he wears, elusive of the rape,
The mimic force of every savage shape:
Or glides with liquid lapse a murmuring stream,
Or, wrapt in flame, he glows at every limb.
Yet still retentive, with redoubled might,
Thro' each vain passive form constrains his fight.
But when, his native shape resum'd, he stands
Patient of conquest, and your cause demands;
The cause that urg'd the bold attempt declare,
And soothe the vanquish'd with a victor's prayer.
The bands relax'd, implore the seer to say
What godhead interdicts the watery way?

Who straight, propitious, in prophetic strain
Will teach you to repass th' unmeasur'd main.
She ceas'd; and, bounding from the shelly shore,
Round the descending nymph the waves resounding
"High wrapt in wonder of the future deed, [roar.
With joy impetuous, to the port I speed:
The wants of nature with repast suffice,
Till night with grateful shade involv'd the skies,
And shed ambrosial dews. Fast by the deep,
Along the tented shore, in balmy sleep,
Our cares were lost. When o'er the eastern lawn,
In saffron robes, the daughter of the dawn
Advanc'd her rosy steps, before the bay,
Due ritual honours to the gods I pay;
Then seek the place the sea-born nymph assign'd,
With three associates of unlaught'nd mind.
Arriv'd, to form along th' appointed strand
For each a bed, she scoops the hilly sand:
Then, from her azure car, the flinty spoils
Of four vast phœæ takes, to veil her wiles:
Beneath the flinty spoils, extended prone,
Hard toil! the prophet's piercing eye to shun;
New from the coise, the scaly frauds diffuse
Unsavory stench of oil, and brackish ooze;
But the bright sea-maid's gentle power implor'd,
With nectar'd drops the sickening source restor'd.

"Thus till the Sun had travell'd half the skies,
Ambush'd we lie, and wait the bold emprise:
When, thronging thick to bask in open air,
The flocks of Ocean to the strand repair:
Couch'd on the sunny sand, the monsters sleep:
Then Proteus, mounting from the hoary deep,
Surveys his charge, unknowing of deceit
(In order told, we make the sum complete).
Pleas'd with the false review, secure he lies,
And leaden slumbers press his drooping eyes.
Rushing impetuous forth, we straight prepare
A furious onset with the sound of war,

Amphitrite

And shouting seize the god: our force t' evade,
His various arts he soon resumes in aid:
A lion now he curls the surgy mane;
Sudden, our bands a spotted pard restrain;
Then, arm'd with tusks, and lightning in his eyes,
A boar's obscener shape the god belies:
On spiry volumes, there, a dragon rides;
Here, from our strict embrace a stream he glides:
And last, sublime his stately growth he rears,
A tree, and well-dissembled foliage wears.
Vain efforts! with superior power compress'd,
Me with reluctance thus the seer address'd:
'Say, son of Atreus, say what god inspir'd
This daring fraud, and what the boon desir'd?'
"I thus: 'O thou, whose certain eye foresees
The fix'd event of fate's remote decrees;
After long woes, and various toil endur'd,
Still on this desert isle my fleet is moor'd;
Unfriended of the gales. All-knowing! say,
What godhead interdicts the watery way?
What vows repentant will the power appease,
To speed a prosperous voyage o'er the seas?'"
"To Jove," with stern regard the god replies,
'And all th' offended synod of the skies,
Just hecatombs with due devotion slain,
Thy guilt absolv'd, a prosperous voyage gain.
To the firm sanction of thy fate attend!
An exile thou, nor cheering face of friend,
Nor sight of natal shore, nor regal dome,
Shall yet enjoy, but still art doom'd to roam.
Once more the Nile, who from the secret source
Of Jove's high seat descends with sweepy force,
Must view his billows white beneath thy oar,
And altars blaze along his sanguine shore.
Then will the gods, with holy pomp ador'd,
To thy long vows a safe return accord.'
"He ceas'd: heart-wounded with afflictive pain, (Doom'd to repeat the perils of the main,
A shelly tract and long!) 'O seer! I cry,
'To the stern sanction of th' offended sky
My prompt obedience bows. But deign to say,
What fate propitious, or what dire dismay,
Sustain those peers, the reliques of our host,
Whom I with Nestor on the Phrygian coast
Embracing left? Must I the warriors weep,
Whelm'd in the bottom of the monstrous deep?
Or did the kind domestic friend deplore
The breathless heroes on their native shore?'"
"Press not too far," reply'd the god; 'but cease
To know, what known will violate thy peace:
Too curious of their doom! with friendly woe
Thy breast will heave, and tears eternal flow.
Part live! the rest, a lamentable train!
Range the dark bounds of Pluto's dreary reign.
Two, foremost in the roll of Mars renown'd,
Whose arms with conquest in thy cause were crown'd,
Fell by disastrous fate; by tempests tost,
A third lives wretched on a distant coast."
"By Neptune rescued from Minerva's hate,
On Gyrae, safe Oilean Ajax sate,
His ship o'erwhelm'd; but, frowning on the floods,
Impious he rear'd defiance to the gods;
To his own prowess all the glory gave,
The power defrauding who vouchsaf'd to save.
This heard the raging ruler of the main;
His spear, indignant for such high disdain,
He launch'd; dividing with his forky mare
Th' aerial summit from the marble base;
The rock rush'd sea-ward with impetuous roar
In gulf'd, and to th' abyss the boaster bore.

" By Juno's guardian aid, the watery vast,
 Secure of storms, your royal brother past:
 Till resting nigh the cape, where Maia shrouds
 Her spiry cliffs amid surrounding clouds;
 A whirling gust tumultuous from the shore
 Across the deep his labouring vessel bore.
 In an ill-fated hour the coast he gain'd;
 Where late in regal pomp Thyestes reign'd;
 But, when his hoary honours bow'd to fate,
 Ægysthus govern'd in paternal state.
 The surges now subside, the tempest ends;
 From his tall ship the king of men descends:
 There fondly thinks the gods conclude his toil!
 Far from his own domain salutes the soil:
 With rapture oft the verge of Greece reviews,
 And the dear turf with tears of joy bedews.
 Him, thus exulting on the distant strand,
 A spy distinguish'd from his airy stand,
 To bribe whose vigilance, Ægysthus told
 A mighty sum of ill-persuading gold:
 There watch'd this guardian of his guilty fear,
 Till the twelfth Moon had wheel'd her pale career;
 And now, adroonish'd by his eye, to court,
 With terror wing'd, conveys the dread report
 Of deathful arts expert, his lord employs
 The ministers of blood in dark surprise:
 And twenty youths, in radiant mail encas'd,
 Close amonsh'd nigh the spacious hall he plac'd.
 Then his prepare the hospitable treat:
 Vain shows of love to veil his felon-hate!
 To grace the victor's welcome from the wars,
 A train of coursers and triumphal oars
 Magnificent he leads! the royal guest,
 Thoughtless of ill, accepts the fraudful feast.
 The troop, forth issuing from the dark recess,
 With homicidal rage the king oppress!
 So, whilst he feeds luxurious in the stall,
 The sovereign of the herd is doom'd to fall.
 The partners of his fame and toils of Troy,
 Around their lord, a mighty ruin! lie:
 Mix'd with the brave, the base invaders bleed;
 Ægysthus sole survives to boast the deed.
 " He said: chill horrors shook my shivering soul,
 Rack'd with convulsive pangs in dust I roll;
 And hate, in madness of extreme despair,
 To view the Sun, or breathe the vital air.
 But when, superior to the rage of woe,
 I stood restor'd, and tears had ceas'd to flow;
 Lenient of grief, the pitying god began—
 ' Forget the brother, and resume the man:
 To fate's supreme dispose the dead resign,
 That care be fate's, a speedy passage thine.
 Still lives the wretch who wrought the death de-
 But lives a victim for thy vengeful sword; [plor'd,
 Unless with filial rage Orestes glow,
 And swift prevent the meditated blow;
 You timely will return a welcome guest,
 With him to share the sad funereal feast.'
 " He said: new thoughts my beating heart em-
 My gloomy soul receives a gleam of joy. [pjoy,
 Fair hope revives; and eager I address
 The precious godhead to reveal the rest.
 ' The doom decreed of those disastrous two
 I've heard with pain, but, oh! the tale pursue;
 What third brave son of Mars the Fates constrain
 To roam the howling desert of the main:
 Or, in eternal shade if cold he lies,
 Prevoke new sorrow from these grateful eyes.'
 " That chief, rejoïn'd the god, 'his race derives
 From Ithaca, and wondrous woes survives;

Laertes' son: girt with circumfious tides,
 He still calamitous constraint abides.
 Him in Calypso's cave of late I view'd,
 When streaming grief his faded cheek bedew'd.
 But vain his prayer, his arts are vain, to move
 Th' enamour'd goddess, or elude her love:
 His vessel sunk, and dear companions lost,
 He lives reluctant on a foreign coast.
 But oh, belov'd by Heaven! reserv'd to thee
 A happier lot the smiling Fates decree:
 Free from that law, beneath whose mortal sway
 Matter is chang'd, and varying forms decay;
 Elysium shall be thine; the blissful plains
 Of utmost Earth, where Rhadamanthus reigns.
 Joys ever young, unmix'd with pain or fear,
 Fill the wide circle of th' eternal year:
 Stern Winter smiles on that auspicious clime;
 The fields are florid with unfolding prime;
 From the bleak pole no winds inclement blow,
 Mould the round hail, or flake the fleecy snow:
 But from the breezy deep the blest inhale
 The fragrant murmurs of the western gale.
 This grace peculiar will the gods afford [lord.
 To thee, the son of Jove, and beauteous Helen's
 " He ceas'd; and, plunging in the vast profound,
 Beneath the god the whirling billows bound.
 Then speeding back, involv'd in various thought,
 My friends attending at the shore I sought.
 Arriv'd, the rage of hunger we control,
 Till night with silent shade invests the pole;
 Then lose the cares of life in pleasing rest.—
 Soon as the morn reveals the roscate east,
 With sails we wing the masts, our anchors weigh,
 Unmoor the fleet, and rush into the sea.
 Rang'd on the banks, beneath our equal oars
 White curl the waves, and the vex'd ocean roars.
 Then, steering backward from the Pharian isle,
 We gain the stream of Jove-descending Nile:
 There quit the ships, and on the destin'd shore
 With ritual hecatombs the gods adore:
 Their wrath ston'd, to Agamemnon's name
 A cenotaph I raise of deathless fame.
 These rites to piety and grief discharg'd,
 The friendly gods a springing gale enlarg'd:
 The fleet swift tilting o'er the surges flew,
 Till Grecian cliffs appear'd, a blissful view!
 " Thy patient ear hath heard me long relate
 A story, fruitful of disastrous fate:
 And now, young prince, indulge my fond request;
 Be Sparta honour'd with his royal guest,
 Till, from his eastern goal, the joyous Sun
 His twelfth diurnal race begins to run.
 Meantime my train the friendly gifts prepare,
 Three sprightly coursers, and a polish'd car:
 With these, a goblet of capacious mould,
 Figur'd with art to dignify the gold,
 (Form'd for libation to the gods) shall prove
 A pledge and monument of sacred love."
 " My quick return," young Ithacus rejoïn'd,
 " Damps the warm wishes of my raptur'd mind:
 Did not my fate my needful haste constrain,
 Charm'd by your speech, so graceful and humane,
 Lost in delight the circling year would roll,
 While deep attention fix'd my listening soul.
 But now to Pyle permit my destin'd way,
 My lov'd associates chide my long delay:
 In dear remembrance of your royal grace,
 I take the present of the promis'd vase;
 The coursers, for the champaign sports, retain;
 That gift our barren rocks will render vain:

Horrid with cliffs, our meagre land allows
Thin herbage for the mountain goat to browse,
But neither mead nor plain supplies, to feed
The sprightly courser, or indulge his speed:
To sea-surrounding realms the gods assign
Small tract of fertile lawn, the least to mine."

His hand the king with tender passion press'd,
And, smiling, thus the royal youth address'd:
"O early worth! a soul so wise, and young,
Proclaims you from the sage Ulysses sprung,
Selected from my stores, of matchless price,
An urn shall recompense your prudent choice:
Not mean the massy mould of silver, grac'd
By Vulcan's art, the verge with gold encas'd;
A pledge the scepter'd power of Sidon gave,
When to his realm I plough'd th' orient wave."

'Tis they alternate; while with artful care
The megal train the regal feast prepare:
The firstlings of the flock are doom'd to die;
Rich fragrant wines the cheering bowl supply;
A female hand the gift of Ceres bring;
And the gilt rouds with genial triumph ring:
Meanwhile, in Ithaca, the suitor-powers
In active games divide their jorial hours:
In arcas vary'd with mosaic art;
Some whirl the disk, and some the javelin dart.
Aside, sequester'd from the vast resort,
Antinous sate spectator of the sport;
With great Eurymachus, of worth confest,
And high descent, superior to the rest;
Whom young Noëmon lowly thus address:

"My ship equipp'd within the neighbouring port,
The prince, departing from the Pylian court,
Requested for his speed; but, courteous, say
When steers he home, or why this long delay?
For Elis I should sail with utmost speed,
T' import twelve mares which there luxurious feed,

And twelve young mules, a strong laborious race,
New to the plough, unpractis'd in the trace."

Unknowing of the course to Pyle design'd,
A sudden horror seiz'd on either mind:
The prince in rural bower they fondly thought,
Numbering his flocks and herds, not far remote.
"Relate," Antinous cries, "devoid of guile,
When spread the prince his sail for distant Pyle?
Did chosen chiefs across the gulfy main
Attend his voyage, or domestic train?
Spontaneous did you speed his secret course,
Or was the vessel seiz'd by fraud or force?"

"With willing duty, not reluctant mind," (Noëmon cry'd) "the vessel was resign'd.
Who, in the balance, with the great affairs
Of courts, presume to weigh their private cares?
With him, the peerage next in power to you:
And Mentor, captain of the lordly crew,
Or some celestial in his reverend form,
Safe from the secret rock and adverse storm,
Pilots the course: for when the glimmering ray
Of yester dawn disclos'd the tender day,
Mentor himself I saw, and much admir'd"—
Then ceas'd the youth, and from the court retir'd.

Confounded and appall'd, th' unfinished game
The suitors quit, and all to council came.
Antinous first th' assembled peers address,
Rage sparkling in his eyes, and burning in his breast:
"O shame to manhood! shall one daring boy
The scheme of all our happiness destroy?
Fly unperceiv'd, seducing half the flower
Of nobles, and invite a foreign power?"

The ponderous engine rais'd to crush us all,
Recoiling, on his head is sure to fall.
Instant prepare me, on the neighbouring strand,
With twenty chosen mates a vessel mann'd;
For ambush'd close beneath the Samian shore
His ship returning shall my spies explore:
He soon his rashness shall with life atone,
Seek for his father's fate, but find his own."

With vast applause the sentence all approve;
Then rise, and to the feastful hall remove;
Swift to the queen the herald Medon ran,
Who heard the consult of the dire divan:
Before her dome the royal matron stands,
And thus the message of his haste demands:

"What will the suitors? must my servant-train
Th' allotted labours of the day refrain,
For them to form some exquisite repast?
Heaven grant this festival may prove their last!
Or, if they still must live, from me remote
The double plague of luxury and love!
Forbear, ye sons of insolence! forbear,
In riot to consume a wretched heir.

In the young soul illustrious thought to raise,
Were ye not tutor'd with Ulysses' praise?
Have not your fathers oft my lord defin'd,
(Gentle of speech, beneficent of mind)
Some kings with arbitrary rage devour,
Or in their tyrant-minions vest the power:
Ulysses let no partial favours fall,
The people's parent, he protected all:
But absent now, perfidious and ingrate!
His stores ye ravage, and usurp his state."

He thus: "O were the woes you speak the worst!
They form a deed more odious and accurst;
More dreadful than your boding sooth divines:
But pitying Jove avert the dire designs!
The darling object of your royal care
Is mark'd to perish in a deathful snare;
Before he anchors in his native port,
From Pyle re sailing and the Spartan court;
Horrid to speak! in ambush is decreed
The hope and heir of Ithaca to bleed!"

Sudden she sunk beneath the weighty woes,
The vital streams a chilling horror froze:
The big round tear stands trembling in her eye,
And on her tongue imperfect accents die.
At length, in tender language, interwove
With sighs, she thus express'd her anxious love:
"Why rashly would my son his fate explore,
Ride the wild waves, and quit the safer shore?
Did he, with all the greatly wretched, crave
A blank oblivion, and untimely grave?"

"'Tis not," reply'd the sage, "to Medon given
To know, if some inhabitant of Heaven
In his young breast the daring thought inspir'd;
Or if, alone with filial duty fir'd,
The winds and waves he tempts in early bloom,
Studious to learn his absent father's doom."

The sage retir'd: unable to control
The mighty griefs that swell her labouring soul,
Rolling convulsive on the floor, is seen
The piteous object of a prostrate queen.
Words to her dumb complaint a pause supplies,
And breath, to waste in unavailing cries.
Around their sovereign wept the menial fair,
To whom she thus address'd her deep despair:

"Behold a wretch whom all the gods consign
To woe! Did ever sorrows equal mine?
Long to my joys my dearest lord is lost,
His country's buckler, and the Grecian boast:

Now from my fond embrace, by tempest torn,
 Our ōthar column of the state is borne :
 Nor took a kind adieu, nor sought consent !—
 'Tis kind confederates in his dire intent !
 'll suits it with your shews of dateous zeal,
 From me the purpos'd voyage to conceal :
 Though at the solemn midnight hour he rose,
 Why did you fear to trouble my repose ?
 He either had obey'd my fond desire,
 Or seen his mother, pierc'd with grief, expire.
 Bid Dolius quick attend, the faithful slave
 Whom to my nuptial train Icarus gave,
 To tend the fruit-groves : with incessant speed
 He shall this violence of death decreed
 To good Laertes tell. Experienc'd age
 May timely intercept the ruffian rage.
 Coverae the tribes, the murderous plot reveal,
 And to their power to save his race appeal."

Then Euryclia thus : " My dearest dread !
 Though to the sword I bow this hoary head,
 Or if a dungeon be the pain decreed,
 I own me conscious of th' displeasing deed.
 Auxiliar to his flight, my aid impior'd,
 With wine and viands I the vessel stor'd :
 A solemn oath, impos'd, the secret seal'd,
 Till the twelfth dawn the light of Heaven reveal'd,
 Dreading th' effect of a fond mother's fear,
 He dar'd not violate your royal ear.
 But bathe, and, in imperial robes array'd,
 Pay due devotions to the martial maid,
 And rest affianc'd in her guardian aid.
 Send not to good Laertes, nor engage
 In toils of state the miseries of age :
 'Tis ignipious to surmise, the powers divine
 To ruin doom the Jove-descended line :
 Long shall the race of just Arocias reign,
 And isles remote enlarge his old domain."

The queen her speech with calm attention hears,
 Her eyes restrain the silver-streaming tears :
 She bathes, and, rob'd, the sacred doom ascends :
 Her pious speed a female train attends :
 The salted cakes in canisters are laid,
 And thus the queen invokes Minerva's aid :

" Daughter divine of Jove, whose arm can wield
 Th' opening bolt, and shake the dreaded shield !
 If'er Ulysses to thy fame prefer'd
 The best and choicest of his flock and herd ;
 Hear, goddess, hear, by those oblations won ;
 And for the pious sire preserve the son :
 His wish'd return with happy power befriend,
 And on the suitors let thy wrath descend."

She ceas'd ; shrill ecstasies of joy declare
 The favouring goddess present to the prayer :
 The suitors heard, and deem'd the mirthful voice
 A signal of her hymeneal choice :
 Whilst one most jovial thus accosts the board ;
 " Too late the queen selects a second lord :
 In evil hour the nuptial rite intends,
 When o'er her son disastrous death impends."
 Thus he, unskill'd of what the Fates provide !
 But with severe rebuke Antinous cry'd :

" These empty vaults will make the voyage
 vain ;

Alarm not with discourse the menial train ;
 The great event with silent hope attend ;
 Our deeds alone our counsel must commend."
 His speech thus end'd short, he frowning rose,
 And twenty chiefs renown'd for valour chose :

Minerva.

Down to the strand he speeds with haughty strides,
 Where anchor'd in the bay the vessel rides,
 Replete with mail and military store,
 In all her tackle trim to quit the shore.
 The desperate crew ascend, unfurl the sails
 (The sea-ward prow invites the tardy gales) ;
 Then take repast, till Hesperus display'd
 His golden circlet in the western shade."

Meantime the queen, without reflection due,
 Heart-wounded, to the bad of state withdrew :
 In her sad breast the prince's fortunes roll,
 And hope and doubt alternate seize her soul.
 So when the woodman's toil her cave surrounds,
 And with the hunter's cry the grove resounds ;
 With grief and rage the mother lion stung,
 Fearless herself, yet trembles for her young.

While pensive in the silent slumberous shade,
 Sleep's gentle powers her drooping eyes invade ;
 Minerva, life-like, on imbodied air
 Impress'd the form of Iphithima the fair
 (Icarus' daughter she, whose blooming charms
 Allur'd Eumelus to her virgin-arms ;
 A scepter'd lord, who o'er the fruitful plain
 Of Thessaly, wide stretch'd his ample reign) :
 As Pallas will'd, along the sable skies,
 To calm the queen, the phantom-sister flies.
 Swift on the regal dome descending right,
 The bolted valves are pervious to her flight.
 Close to her head the pleasing vision stands,
 And thus perheads Minerva's high commands :

" O why, Penelope, this causeless fear,
 To render sleep's soft blessing unsincere ?
 Alike devote to sorrow's dire extreme
 The day reflection, and the midnight dream !
 Thy son the gods propitious will restore,
 And bid thee cease his absence to deplore."

To whom the queen (whilst yet her pensive mind
 Was in the silent gates of sleep confin'd)

" O sister, to my soul for ever dear,
 Who this first visit to reprove my fear ?
 How in a realm so distant should you know
 From what deep source my deathless sorrows flow ?
 To all my hope my royal lord is lost,
 His country's buckler, and the Grecian boast :
 And, with consummate woe to weigh me down,
 The heir of all his honours and his crown,
 My darling son is fled ! an easy prey
 To the fierce storms, or men more fierce than they :
 Who, in a league of blood associates sworn,
 Will intercept th' unwary youth's return."

" Courage resume," the shadowy form reply'd,
 " In the protecting care of Heaven confide :
 On him attends the blue-ey'd martial maid ;
 What earthly can implore a surer aid ?
 Me now the guardian goddess deigns to send,
 To bid thee patient his return attend."

The queen replies : " If in the blest abodes
 A goddess, thou hast commerce with the gods ;
 Say, breathes my lord the blissful realm of light,
 Or lies he wrapt in ever-during night ?"

" Inquire not of his doom," the phantom cries,
 " I speak not all the counsel of the skies :
 Nor must indulge with vain discourse, or long,
 The windy satisfaction of the tongue."

Swift through the valves the visionary fair
 Repass'd, and viewless mix'd with common air.
 The queen awakes, deliver'd of her woes :
 With florid joy her heart dilating glows :
 The vision, manifest of future fate,
 Makes her with hope her son's arrival wait.

Meantime the suitors plough the watery plain,
Telemachus in thought already slain!
When sight of leucening Ithaca was lost,
Their sail directed for the Samian coast,
A small but verdant isle appear'd in view,
And Asteris th' advancing pilot knew:
An ample port the rocks projected form,
To break the rolling waves, and ruffling storm:
That safe recess they gain with happy speed,
And in close ambush wait the murderous deed.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK V.

ARGUMENT.

THE DEPARTURE OF ULYSSES FROM CALYPSO.

PALLAS, in a council of the gods, complains of the detention of Ulysses in the island of Calypso; whereupon Mercury is sent to command his removal. The seat of Calypso described. She consents with much difficulty; and Ulysses builds a vessel with his own hands, on which he embarks. Neptune overtakes him with a terrible tempest, in which he is shipwrecked, and in the last danger of death: till Leucothea, a sea goddess, assists him, and, after innumerable perils, he gets ashore on Phœacia.

THE saffron Morn, with early blushes spread,
Now rose refulgent from Tithonus' bed;
With new-born day to gladden mortal sight,
And gild the courts of Heaven with sacred light.
Then met th' eternal synod of the sky,
Before the god who thunders from on high,
Supreme in might, sublime in majesty.
Pallas, to these, deploras th' unequal fates
Of wise Ulysses, and his toils relates:
Her hero's danger touch'd the pitying power,
The nymph's seducements, and the magic bower.
Thus she began her plaint: "Immortal Jove!
And you who fill the blissful seats above!
Let kings no more with gentle mercy sway,
Or bless a people willing to obey,
But crush the nations with an iron rod,
And every monarch be the scourge of God:
If from your thoughts Ulysses you remove,
Who rul'd his subjects with a father's love.
Sole in an isle, encircled by the main,
Abandon'd, banish'd from his native reign,
Unblest he sighs, detain'd by lawless charms,
And press'd unwilling in Calypso's arms.
Nor friends are there, nor vessels to convey,
Nor oars to cut th' immeasurable way.
And now fierce traitors, studious to destroy
His only son, their ambush'd fraud employ;
Who, pious, following his great father's fame,
'To sacred Pylos and to Sparta came." [who forms
"What words are these," reply'd the power
The clouds of night, and darkens Heaven with storms)

"Is not already in thy soul decreed,
The chief's return shall make the guilty bleed?
What cannot wisdom do? Thou may'st restore
The son in safety to his native shore;
While the fell foes, who late in ambush lay,
With fraud defeated, measure back their way."

Then thus to Hermes the command was given:
"Hermes, thou chosen messenger of Heaven!
Go, to the nymph be these our orders borne:
'Tis Jove's decree, Ulysses shall return:
The patient man shall view his old abodes,
Nor help'd by mortal hand, nor guiding gods:
In twice ten days shall fertile Sberia find,
Alone, and floating on the wave and wind.
The bold Phœacians there, whose haughty line
Is mix'd with gods, half human, half divine,
The chief shall honour as some heavenly guest,
And swift transport him to his place of rest.
His vessels loaded with a plentiful store
Of brass, of vestures, and resplendent ore,
(A richer prize than if his joyful isle
Reciv'd him charg'd with Iliön's noble spoil).
His friends, his country, he shall see, though late;
Such is our sovereign will, and such is fate."

He spoke. The god, who mounts the winged
Fast to his feet the golden pinions binds, [winds,
That high through fields of air his flight sustain
O'er the wide earth, and o'er the boundless main.
He grasps the wand that causes sleep to fly,
Or in soft slumber seals the wakeful eye:
Then shoots from Heaven to high Pieria's steep,
And stoops incumbent on the rolling deep.
So watery fowl, that seek their fishy food,
With wings expended o'er the foaming flood,
Now sailing smooth the level surface sweep,
Now dip their pinions in the briny deep.
Thus o'er the world of waters Hermes flew,
Till now the distant island rose in view:
Then swift ascending from the azure wave,
He took the path that winded to the cave.
Large was the grot, in which the nymph he found
(The fair-hair'd nymph with every beauty crown'd);
She sat, and sang: the rocks resound her lays;
The cave was brighten'd with a rising blaze:
Cedar and frankincense, an odorous pile,
Flam'd on the hearth, and wide perfum'd the isle;
While she with work and song the time divides,
And through the loom the golden shuttle guides.
Without the grot a various sylvan scene
Appear'd around, and groves of living green;
Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragrant shade;
On whose high branches, waving with the storm,
The birds of broadest wing their mansion form,
The chough, the sea-mew, the loquacious crow,
And scream aloft, and skim the deeps below.
Depending vines the shelving cavern across,
With purple clusters blushing through the green.
Four limpid fountains from the clefts distil;
And every fountain pours a several rill,
In mazy windings wandering down the hill:
Where bloomy meads with vivid greens were
crown'd,
And glowing violets threw odours round.
A scene, where if a god should cast his sight,
A god might gaze, and wander with delight!
Joy touch'd the messenger of Heaven: he stay'd
Entranc'd, and all the blissful haunt survey'd.
Him, entering in the cave, Calypso knew;
For powers celestial to each other's view

Stand still confest, though distant far they lie
 To habitants of earth, or sea, or sky.
 But sad Ulysses, by himself apart,
 Pour'd the big sorrows of his swelling heart;
 All on the lonely shore he sat to weep,
 And roll'd his eyes around the restless deep;
 Tow'rd his lov'd coast he roll'd his eyes in vain,
 Till, dimm'd with rising grief, they stream'd again.
 Now graceful seated on her shining throne,
 To Hermes thus the nymph divine begun:
 "God of the golden wand! on what behest
 Arriv'st thou here, an unexpected guest?
 Lov'd as thou art, thy free injunctions lay;
 'Tis mine, with joy and duty to obey.
 Till now a stranger, in a happy hour
 Approach, and taste the dainties of my bower."

Thus having spoke, the nymph the table spread (Ambrosial oates, with nectar rosy-red);
 Hermes the hospitable rite partook,
 Drive refection! then, recruited, spoke:
 "What mov'd this journey from my native sky,
 A goddess asks, nor can a god deny:
 Hear then the truth. By mighty Jove's command,
 Unwilling, have I trod this pleasing land;
 For who, self-mov'd, with weary wing would sweep
 Such length of ocean and unmeasur'd deep:
 A world of waters! far from all the ways;
 Where men frequent, or sacred altars blaze?
 But to Jove's will submission we must pay;
 What power so great, to dare to disobey?
 A man, he says, a man resides with thee,
 Of all his kind most worn with misery:
 The Greeks (whose arms for nine long years emplo'd

Their force in Iliou, in the tenth destroy'd)
 At length embarking in a luckless hour,
 With conquest proud, incens'd Minerva's power:
 Hence on the guilty race her vengeance hurl'd,
 With storms pursued them through the liquid
 world.

There all his vessels sunk beneath the wave!
 There all his dear companions found their grave!
 Sav'd from the jaws of death by Heaven's decree,
 The tempest drove him to these shores and thee.
 Him, Jove now orders to his native lands
 Straight to dismiss; so destiny commands;
 Impatient fate his near return attends,
 And calls him to his country and his friends."
 Ev'n to her inmost soul the goddess shook;
 Then thus her anguish and her passion broke:
 "Ungracious gods! with spite and envy curs'd!
 Still to your own ethereal race the worst!
 Ye envy mortal and immortal joy,
 And love, the only sweet of life, destroy.
 Did ever goddess by her charms engage
 A favour'd mortal, and not feel your rage?
 So when Aurora sought Orion's love,
 Her joys disturb'd your blissful hours above,
 Till, in Ortygia, Diana's winged dart
 Had pierc'd the hapless hunter to the heart.
 So when the covert of the thrice-ear'd field
 Saw stately Ceres to her passion yield,
 Scarce could Iasion taste her heavenly charms,
 But Jove's swift lightning scorcht him in his arms.
 And is it now my turn, ye mighty powers!
 Am I the envy of your blissful bowers?
 A man, an outcast to the storm and wave,
 It was my crime to pity, and to save;
 When he who thunders rent his bark in twain,
 And sunk his brave companions in the main.

Alone, abandon'd, in mid ocean tost,
 The sport of winds, and driven from every coast,
 Hither this man of miseries I led,
 Receiv'd the friendless, and the hungry fed;
 Nay promis'd (vainly promis'd) to bestow
 Immortal life, exempt from age and woe.
 'Tis past—and Jove decrees he shall remove;
 Gods as we are, we are but slaves to Jove.
 Go then he may (he must, if he ordain,
 Try all those dangers, all those deeps, again):
 But never, never shall Calypso send
 To toils like these, her husband and her friend.
 What ships have I, what sailors to convey,
 What oars to cut the long laborious way?
 Yet, I'll direct the safest means to go:
 That last advice is all I can bestow."

To her, the power who bears the charming rod:
 "Dismiss the man, nor irritate the god:
 Prevent the rage of him who reigns above,
 For what so dreadful as the wrath of Jove?"
 Thus having said, he cut the cleaving sky,
 And in a moment vanish'd from her eye.
 The nymph, obedient to divine command,
 To seek Ulysses, pac'd along the sand.
 Him pensive on the lonely beach she found,
 With streaming eyes in briny torrents drown'd,
 And inly pining for his native shore:
 For now the soft enchantress pleas'd no more:
 For now, reluctant, and constrain'd by charms,
 Absent he lay in her desiring arms,
 In slumber wore the heavy night away,
 On rocks and shores consum'd the tedious day;
 There sat all desolate, and sigh'd alone,
 With echoing sorrows made the mountains groan,
 And roll'd his eyes o'er all the restless main,
 Till, dimm'd with rising grief, they stream'd again.
 Here, on his musing mood the goddess prest,
 Approaching soft, and thus the chief address:
 "Unhappy man! to wasting woes a prey,
 No more in sorrows languish life away:
 Free as the winds I give thee now to rove—
 Go, fell the timber of yon lofty grove,
 And form a raft, and build the rising ship,
 Sublime to bear thee o'er the gloomy deep.
 To store the vessel, let the care be mine,
 With water from the rock, and rosy wine,
 And life-sustaining bread, and fair array,
 And prosperous gales to waft thee on the way.
 These, if the gods with my desires comply,
 (The gods, alas! more mighty far than I,
 And better skill'd in dark events to come)
 In peace shall land thee at thy native home."

With sighs, Ulysses heard the words she spoke,
 Then thus his melancholy silence broke:
 "Some other motive, goddess! sways thy mind,
 (Some close design, or turn of womankind)
 Nor my return the end, nor this the way,
 On a slight raft to pass the swelling sea,
 Huge, horrid, vast! where scarce in safety sails
 The best-built ship, though Jove inspire the gales.
 The bold proposal how shall I fulfil;
 Dark as I am, unconscious of thy will?
 Swear then thou mean'st not what my soul forebodes;
 Swear by the solemn oath that binds the gods."
 Him, while he spoke, with smiles Calypso ey'd,
 And gently grasp'd his hand, and thus reply'd:
 "This shows thee, friend, by old experience taught,
 And learn'd in all the wiles of human thought,
 How prone to doubt, how cautious are the wise?
 But bear, O Earth! and hear ye sacred Skies!

And thou, O Styx! whose formidable floods
Glide through the shades, and bind th' attesting
No form'd design, no meditated end, [gods!
Lurks in the counsel of thy faithful friend;
Kind the persuasion, and sincere my aim;
The same my practice, were my fate the same.
Heaven has not curst me with a heart of steel,
But given the sense, to pity, and to feel."

Thus having said, the goddess march'd before:
He trod her footsteps, in the sandy shore.

At the cool cave arriv'd, they took their state;
He fill'd the throne where Mercury had sate;
For him, the nymph a rich repast ordains,
Such as the mortal life of man sustains;
Before herself were plac'd the cates divine,
Ambrosial banquet, and celestial wine.

Their hunger satiate, and their thirst repress,
Thus spoke Calypso to her godlike guest:

"Ulysses!" (with a sigh she thus began)
"O sprung from gods! in wisdom more than man;
Is then thy home the passion of thy heart?
Thus wilt thou leave me, are we thus to part?
Farewell! and ever joyful may'st thou be,
Nor break the transport with one thought of me.
But ah, Ulysses! wert thou given to know
What fate yet dooms thee, yet, to undergo;
Thy heart might settle in this scene of ease,
And ev'n these slighted charms might learn to please.
A willing goddess and immortal life
Might banish from thy mind an absent wife.
Am I inferior to a mortal dame?"

Less soft my feature, less august my frame?
Or shall the daughters of mankind compare
Their earth-born beauties with the heavenly fair?"

"Alas! for this" (the prudent man replies)
"Against Ulysses shall thy anger rise?
Lov'd and ador'd, oh goddess! as thou art,
Forgive the weakness of a human heart.
Though well I see thy graces far above
The dear, though mortal, object of my love,
Of youth eternal will the difference know,
And the short date of fading charms below;
Yet every day, while absent thus I roam,
I languish to return and die at home.
Whate'er the gods shall destine me to bear
In the black ocean, or the watery war,
'Tis mine to master with a constant mind;
Inur'd to perils, to the worst resign'd.
By seas, by wars, so many dangers run;
Still I can suffer: their high will be done!"

Thus while he spoke, the beamy Sun descends,
And rising night her friendly shade extends.
To the close grot the lonely pair remove,
And slept delighted with the gifts of love.
When rosy morning call'd them from their rest,
Ulysses rob'd him in the cloak and vest.
The nymph's fair head a veil transparent grac'd,
Her swelling loins a radiant zone embrac'd
With flowers of gold: an under robe, unbound,
In snowy waves flow'd glittering on the ground.
Forth issuing thus, she gave him first to wield
A weighty ax with truest temper steel'd,
And double edg'd; the handle smooth and plain,
Wrought of the clouded olive's easy grain;
And next, a wedge to drive with sweepy sway:
Then to the neighbouring forest led the way.
On the lone island's utmost verge they stood
Of poplars, pines, and firs, a lofty wood,
Whose leafless summits to the skies aspire,
Scorch'd by the Sun, or sear'd by heavenly fire

(Already dry'd). These pointing out to view,
The nymph just show'd him, and with tears withdrew.

Now toils the hero; trees on trees o'erthrown
Fall crackling round him, and the forest groan:
Sudden, full twenty on the plain are strow'd,
And lopp'd, and lighten'd of their branchy load:
At equal angles these dispos'd to join,
He smooth'd and squar'd them, by the rule and line.
(The wimbles for the work Calypso found)
With those he pierc'd them, and with clinchers
Long and capacious as a shipwright forms [bound.
Some bark's broad bottom to out-ride the storms,
So large he built the raft: then ribb'd it strong
From space to space, and nail'd the planks along;
These form'd the sides: the deck he fashion'd last;
Then o'er the vessel rais'd the taper mast,
With crossing sail-yards dancing in the wind;
And to the helm the guiding rudder join'd
(With yielding osiers fenc'd, to break the force
Of surging waves, and steer the steady course).
Thy loom, Calypso! for the future sails
Supply'd the cloth, capacious of the gales.
With stays and cordage last he rigg'd the ship,
And, roll'd on levers, launch'd her in the deep.

Four days were past, and now the work complete,
Shone the fifth morn: when from her sacred seat
The nymph dismiss'd him, (odorous garments given)
And bath'd in fragrant oils that breath'd of Heaven:
Then fill'd two gut-skins with her hands divine,
With water one, and one with sable wine:
Of every kind, provisions heav'd aboard;
And the full decks with copious viands stor'd.
The goddess last a gentle breeze supplies,
To curl old ocean, and to warm the skies.

And now, rejoicing in the prosperous gales,
With beating heart, Ulysses spreads his sails;
Plac'd at the helm he sate, and mark'd the skies,
Nor clos'd in sleep his ever-watchful eyes.
There view'd the Pleiads, and the Northern team,
And great Orion's more refulgent beam,
To which, around the axle of the sky
The Bear, revolving, points his golden eye:
Who shines exalted on th' ethereal plain,
Nor bathes his blazing forehead in the main.
Far on the left those radiant fires to keep
The nymph directed, as he sail'd the deep.
Full seventeen nights he cut the foamy way:
The distant land appear'd the following day:
Then swell'd to sight Phœacia's dusky coast,
And woody mountains, half in vapours lost:
That lay before him, indistinct and vast,
Like a broad shield amid the watery waste.

But him, thus voyaging the deeps below,
From far, on Solyme's aerial brow,
The king of ocean saw, and seeing burn'd
(From Æthiopia's happy climes return'd);
The raging monarch shook his azure head,
And thus in secret to his soul he said:
"Heavens! how uncertain are the powers on high?
Is then revers'd the sentence of the sky,
In one man's favour; while a distant guest
I shar'd secure the Æthiopian feast?
Behold how near Phœacia's land he draws!
The land, affix'd by fate's eternal laws
To end his toils. Is then our anger vain?
No; if this sceptre yet commands the main."

He spoke, and, high the forky trident hur'd,
Rolls clouds on clouds, and stirs the watery world,
At once the face of earth and sea deforms,
Swells all the winds, and rouses all the storms.

Down rush'd the Night : East, West, together roar ;
 And South, and North, roll mountains to the shore ;
 Then shook the hero, to despair resign'd,
 And question'd thus his yet unconquer'd mind :
 " Wretch that I am ! what farther fates attend
 This life of toils, and what my destin'd end ?
 Too well, alas ! the island goddess knew,
 On the black sea what perils should ensue.
 New horrors now this destin'd head enclose ;
 Unfill'd is yet the measure of my woes ;
 With what a cloud the brows of Heaven are crown'd !
 What raging winds ! what roaring waters round !
 'Tis Jove himself the swelling tempests rears ;
 Death, present death, on every side appears.
 Happy ! thrice happy ! who, in battle slain,
 Prest, in Attrides' cause, the Trojan plain :
 Oh ! had I dy'd before that well-fought wall ;
 Had some distinguish'd day renown'd my fall
 (Such as was that, when showers of javelins fled
 From conquering Troy around Achilles dead) :
 All Greece had paid me solemn funerals then,
 And spread my glory with the sons of men.
 A shameful fate now hides my hapless head,
 Unwept, unnoted, and for ever dead !"

A mighty wave rush'd o'er him as he spoke,
 The raft it cover'd, and the mast it broke ;
 Swept from the deck, and from the rudder torn,
 Far on the swelling surge the chief was borne :
 While by the howling tempest rent in twain
 Flew sail and sail-yards rattling o'er the main.
 Long press'd, he heav'd beneath the weighty wave,
 Clogg'd by the cumbrous vest Calypso gave :
 At length, emerging from his nostrils wide
 And gushing mouth, effus'd the briny tide,
 Ev'n then not mindless of his last retreat,
 He seiz'd the raft, and leapt into his seat,
 Strong with the fear of death. The rolling flood
 Now here, now there, impell'd the floating wood.
 As when a heap of gather'd thorns is cast
 Now to, now fro, before th' autumnal blast ;
 Together clung, it rolls around the field ;
 So roll'd the float, and so its texture held :
 And now the South, and now the North, bear sway,
 And now the East the foamy floods obey,
 And now the West wind whirls it o'er the sea.
 The wandering chief, with toils on toils oppress'd,
 Leucothea saw, and pity touch'd her breast (Herself a mortal once, of Cadmus' strain,
 But now an azure sister of the main).
 Swift as a sea-mew springing from the flood :
 All radiant on the raft the goddess stood :
 Then thus address'd him : " Thou whom Heaven
 decrees
 To Neptune's wrath, stern tyrant of the seas,
 (Unequal contest !) not his rage and power,
 Great as he is, such virtue shall devour.
 What I suggest, thy wisdom will perform ;
 Forsake thy float, and leave it to the storm ;
 Strip off thy garments ; Neptune's fury brave
 With naked strength, and plunge into the wave.
 To reach Phœacia all thy nerves extend,
 There fate decrees thy miseries shall end.
 This heavenly scarf beneath thy bosom bind,
 And live ; give all thy terrors to the wind.
 Soon as thy arms the happy shore shall gain,
 Return the gift, and cast it in the main ;
 Observe my orders, and with heed obey,
 Cast it far off, and turn thy eyes away."
 With that, her hand the sacred veil bestows,
 Then down the deeps she div'd from whence she rose ;

A moment snatch'd the shining form away,
 And all was cover'd with the curling sea.
 Struck with amaze, yet still to doubt inclin'd,
 He stands suspended, and explores his mind.
 " What shall I do ? Unhappy me ! who knows
 But other gods intend me other woes ?
 Whoe'er thou art, I shall not blindly join
 Thy pleaded reason, but consult with mine :
 For scarce in ken appears that distant isle.
 Thy voice foretels me shall conclude my toil.
 Thus then I judge ; while yet the planks sustain
 The wild waves' fury, here I fix'd remain :
 But when their texture to the tempest yields,
 I launch adventurous on the liquid fields,
 Join to the help of gods the strength of man,
 And take this method, since the best I can."

While thus his thoughts an anxious council hold
 The raging god a watery mountain roll'd ;
 Like a black sheet the whelming billow spread
 Bursts o'er the float, and thunder'd on his head.
 Planks, beams, departed fly : the scatter'd wood
 Rolls diverse, and in fragments strows the flood.
 So the rude Boreas, o'er the fields new-shorn,
 Tosses and drives the scatter'd heaps of corn.
 And now a single beam the chief bestrides ;
 There pois'd a while above the bounding tides,
 His limbs discomburs of the clinging vest,
 And binds the sacred cincture round his breast :
 Then prone on ocean in a moment flung,
 Stretch'd wide his eager arms, and shot the seas
 All naked now, on heaving billows laid, [along.
 Stern Neptune ey'd him, and contemptuous said :
 " Go, learn'd in woes, and other woes essay !
 Go, wander helpless on the watery way :
 Thus, thus find out the destin'd shore, and then
 (If Jove ordains it) mix with happier men.
 Whate'er thy fate, the ill our wrath could raise Shall last remember'd in thy best of days."

This said, his sea-green steeds divide the foam,
 And reach high Ægæ and the towery dome.
 Now, scarce withdrawn the fierce earth-shaking
 power,
 Jove's daughter, Pallas, watch'd the favouring hour,
 Back to their caves she bade the winds to fly,
 And hush'd the blustering brethren of the sky.
 The drier blasts along of Boreas sway,
 And bear him soft on broken waves away ;
 With gentle force impelling to that shore,
 Where fate has destin'd he shall toil no more.
 And now two nights, and now two days were past,
 Since wide he wander'd on the watery waste :
 Heav'd on the surge with intermitting breath,
 And hourly panting in the arms of death.
 The third fair morn now blaz'd upon the main ;
 Then glassy smooth lay all the liquid plain ;
 The winds were hush'd, the billows scarcely curl'd,
 And a dead silence still'd the watery world ;
 When lifted on a ridgy wave he spies
 The land at distance, and with sharpen'd eyes.
 As pious children joy with vast delight
 When a lov'd sire revives before their sight,
 (Who, lingering long has call'd on death in vain,
 Fix'd by some demon to his bed of pain,
 Till Heaven by miracle his life restores) ;
 So joys Ulysses at th' appearing shore,
 And sees (and labours onward as he sees)
 The rising forests and the tufted trees.
 And now, as near approaching as the sound
 Of human voice the listening ear may wound,

Amidst the rocks he hears a hollow roar
Of murmuring surges breaking on the shore:
Nor peaceful port was there, nor winding bay,
To shield the vessel from the rolling sea,
But cliffs, and shaggy shores, a dreadful sight!
All rough with rocks, with foaming billows white.
Fear seiz'd his slacken'd limbs and beating heart;
As thus commu'd he with his soul apart:

" Ah me! when, o'er a length of waters tost,
These eyes at last behold th' unhop'd-for coast,
No port receives me from the angry main,
But the loud deeps demand me back again.
Above, sharp rocks forbid access; around,
Roar the wild waves; beneath is sea profound!
No footing sure affords the faithless sand,
To stem too rapid, and too deep to stand.
If here I eate, my efforts are vain,
Dash'd on the cliffs, or heav'd into the main;
Or round the island if my course I bend,
Where the ports open, or the shores descend,
Back to the seas the rolling surge may sweep,
And bury all my hopes beneath the deep.
Or some enormous whale the god may send,
(For many such on Amphitrite attend)
Too well the turns of mortal chance I know,
And hate relentless of my heavenly foe."

While thus he thought, a monstrous wave upbore
The chief, and dash'd him on the craggy shore:
Torn was his skin, nor had the ribs been whole,
But instant Pallas enter'd in his soul.
Close to the cliff with both his hands he clung,
And stuck adherent, and suspended hung;
Till the huge surge roll'd off: then, backward sweep
The reflux tides, and plunge him in the deep.
As when the polypus, from forth his cave
Torn with full force, reluctant beats the wave:
His ragged claws are stuck with stones and sands:
So the rough rock had shagg'd Ulysses hands.
And now had perish'd, whelm'd beneath the main,
Th' unhappy man: ev'n fate had been in vain:
But all-subduing Pallas lent her power,
And providence sav'd him in the needful hour.
Beyond the beating surge his course he bore,
(A wider circle, but in sight of shore)
With longing eyes, observing, to survey
Some smooth ascent, or safe-sequester'd bay.
Between the parting rocks at length he spy'd
A falling stream with gentler waters glide;
Where to the seas the shelving shore declin'd,
And form'd a bay impervious to the wind.
To this calm port the glad Ulysses went,
And hail'd the river, and its god address:

" Whoe'er thou art, before whose stream unknown

I bend, a suppliant at thy watery throne,
Hear, azure king! not let me fly in vain
To thee from Neptune and the raging main.
Heaven hears and pities hapless men like me,
For sacred ev'n to gods is misery:
Let then thy waters give the weary rest,
And save a suppliant, and a man distress."

He pray'd, and straight the gentle stream
subsides,

Detains the rushing current of his tides,
Before the wanderer smooths the watery way,
And soft receives him from the rolling sea.
That moment, fainting as he touch'd the shore,
He dropt his sinewy arms: his knees no more
Perform'd their office, or his weight upheld:
His swoln heart heav'd; his bloated body swell'd.

From mouth and nose the briny torrent ran;
And lost in lassitude lay all the man,
Depriv'd of voice, of motion, and of breath;
The soul scarce waking in the arms of death.
Soon as warm life its wonted office found,
The mindful chief Leucothea's scarf unbound;
Observant of her word, he turn'd aside
His head, and cast it on the rolling tide.
Behind him far, upon the purple waves
The waters waft it, and the nymph receives.

Now parting from the stream, Ulysses found
A mossy bank, with pleasant rushes crown'd!
The bank he press'd, and gently kiss'd the ground;
Where on the flowery herb as soft he lay,
Thus to his soul the sage began to say:

" What will ye next ordain, ye powers on high?
And yet, ah! yet, what fates are we to try?
Here by the stream, if I the night out-wear,
Thus spent already, how shall nature bear
The dews descending, and nocturnal air;
Or chilly vapours, breathing from the wood
When morning rises?—If I take the food,
And in thick shelter of innumerable boughs
Enjoy the comfort gentle sleep allows; [past,
Though fenc'd from cold, and though my toil be
What savage beasts may wander in the waste!
Perhaps I yet may fall a bloody prey
To prowling bears, or lions in the way."

Thus long debating in himself he stood;
At length he took the passage to the wood,
Whose shady horrors on a rising brow
Wav'd high, and frown'd upon the stream below.
There grew two olives, closest of the grove,
With roots intwiv'd, and branches interwove;
Alike their leaves, but not alike they smil'd
With sister fruits; one fertile, one was wild.
Nor here the Sun's meridian rays had power,
Nor wind sharp-piercing, nor the rushing shower;
The verdant arch so close its texture kept:
Beneath this covert great Ulysses crept.
Of gather'd leaves an ample bed he made (shade)
(Thick strown by tempest through the bowery
Where three at least might winter's cold defy,
Though Boreas rag'd along th' inclement sky.
This store, with joy the patient hero found,
And, sunk amidst them, heap'd the leaves around.
As some poor peasant, fated to reside
Remote from neighbours in a forest wide,
Studious to save what human wants require,
In embers heap'd, preserves the seeds of fire:
Hid in dry foliage thus Ulysses lies,
Till Pallas pour'd soft slumbers on his eyes;
And golden dreams (the gift of sweet repose)
Lull'd all his cares, and banish'd all his woes.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK VI.

ARGUMENT.

PALLAS, appearing in a dream to Nausicaa (the daughter of Alcinoüs king of Phœacia), commands her to descend to the river, and wash the robes of state, in preparation to her nuptials. Nausicaa goes with her handmaids to the river; where while the garments are spread on the bank, they divert themselves in sports. Their voices awake Ulysses, who, addressing himself to the princess, is by her relieved and clothed, and receives directions in what manner to apply to the king and queen of the island.

Wuns thus the weary wanderer sunk to rest,
And peaceful slumbers calm'd his anxious breast;
The martial maid from Heaven's aerial height
Swift to Phœacia wing'd her rapid flight.
In elder times the soft Phœacian train
In ease possess the wide Hyperian plain;
Till the Cyclopean race in arms arose,
A lawless nation of gigantic foes:
Then great Nausithous from Hyperia far,
Through seas retreating from the sound of war,
The recreant nation to fair Scheria led,
Where never science rear'd her laurell'd head:
There, round his tribes, a strength of wall he rais'd;
To Heaven the glittering domes and temples blas'd:
Just to his realms, he parted grounds from grounds,
And shar'd the lands, and gave the lands their bounds.
Now in the silent grave the monarch lay,
And wise Alcinoos held the regal sway.

To his high palace through the fields of air
The goddess shot: Ulysses was her care.
There as the night in silence roll'd away,
A heaven of charms divine Nausicaa lay:
Through the thick gloom the shining portals blaze;
Two nymphs the portals guard, each nymph a Græca.

Light as the viewless air the warrior-maid
Glides through the valves, and hovers round her head;

A favourite virgin's blooming form she took,
From Dymas sprung, and thus the vision spoke:
"Oh indolent! to waste thy hours away!
And sleep'st thou careless of the bridal day?
Thy spousal ornament neglected lies;
Arise, prepare the bridal train, arise!
A just applause the cares of dress impart,
And give soft transport to a parent's heart.
Haste, to the limpid stream direct thy way,
When the gay morn unveils her smiling ray:
Haste to the stream! Companion of thy care,
Lo, I thy steps attend, thy labours share.
Virgin, awake! the marriage-hour is nigh,
See! from their thrones thy kindred monarchs sigh;
The royal car at early dawn obtain,
And order mules obedient to the rein;
For rough the way, and distant rolls the wave,
Where their fair-vests Phœacian virgins lave.
In pomp ride forth; for pomp becomes the great,
And majesty derives a grace from state."

Then to the palaces of Heaven she sails,
Incumbent on the wings of wafting gales:
The seat of gods; the regions mild of peace,
Full joy, and calm eternity of ease.
There no rude winds presume to shake the skies,
No rains descend, no snowy vapours rise;
But on immortal throves the blest repose:
The firmament with living splendours glows.
Hither the goddess wing'd th' aerial way,
Though Heaven's eternal gates that blas'd with day.

Now from her rosy car Aurora shed
The dawn, and all the orient flam'd with red.
Uprose the virgin with the morning light,
Obedient to the vision of the night.
The queen she sought: the queen her hours
bestow'd

In curious works; the whirling spindle glow'd
With crimson threads, while busy damsels cull
The snowy fleece, or twist the purpled wool.
Meanwhile Phœacia's peers in council sat;
From his high dome the king descends in state,
Then with a filial awe the royal maid
Approach'd him passing, and submissive said:
"Will my dread sire his ear regardful deign,
And may his child the royal car obtain?
Say, with thy garments shall I bend my way,
Where through the vales the mazy waters stray?
A dignity of dress adorns the great,
And kings draw lustre from the robe of state.
Five sons thou hast; three wait the bridal day,
And spotless robes become the young and gay:
So when with praise amid the dance they shine,
By these my cares adorn'd, that praise is mine."

Thus she: but blushes ill-restrain'd betray
Her thoughts intentive on the bridal day:
The conscious sire the dawning blush survey'd,
And smiling thus bespoke the blooming maid:
"My child, my darling joy, the car receive;
That, and whate'er our daughter asks, we give."

Swift at the royal nod th' attending train
The car prepare, the mules incessant rein.
The blooming virgin with dispatchful cares
Tunics, and stoles, and robes imperial, bears.
The queen, assiduous, to her train assigns
The sumptuous viands, and the flavoured wines.
The train prepare a cruise of curious mould,
A cruise of fragrance, form'd of burnish'd gold;
Odour divine! whose soft refreshing streams
Sleek the smooth skin, and scent the snowy limb

Now mounting the gay seat, the silken reins
Shine in her hand: along the sounding plains
Swift fly the mules: nor rode the nymph alone;
Around, a bevy of bright damsels shone.
They seek the cisterns where Phœacian dames
Wash their fair garments in the limpid streams;
Where, gathering into depth from falling rills,
The lucid wave a spacious basin fills.
The mules unbarnes'd range beside the maid,
Or crop the verdant herbage of the plain.

Then emulous the royal robes they lave,
And plunge the vestures in the cleansing wave;
(The vestures cleans'd o'erspread the shelly sand,
Their snowy lustre whitens all the strand:)
Then with a short repast relieve their toil,
And o'er their limbs diffuse ambrosial oil;
And, while the robes imbibe the solar ray,
O'er the green mead the sporting virgins play
(Their shining veils unbound). Along the skies
Toot, and retoot, the ball incessant flies.
They sport, they feast; Nausicaa lifts her voice,
And, warbling sweet, makes Earth and Heaven rejoice.

As when o'er Erymanth Diana roves,
Or wide Taygetus' resounding groves:
A sylvan train the huntress queen surrounds,
Her rattling quiver from her shoulder sounds
Fierce in the sport, along the mountain's brow
They bay the boar, or chase the bounding roe:
High o'er the lawn with more majestic pace,
Above the nymphs she treads with stately grace;

Distinguish'd excellence the goddess proves ;
 Exults Latona, as the virgin moves.
 With equal grace Nausicaa trod the plain,
 And shone transcendent o'er the beautiful train.

Meantime (the care and favourite of the skies)
 Wrapt in embowering shade, Ulysses lies,
 His woes forgot ! but Pallas now address
 To break the bands of all-composing rest.
 Forth from her snowy band Nausicaa threw
 The various ball ; the ball erroneous flew,
 And swam the stream : loud shrieks the virgin train,
 And the loud shriek redoubles from the main.
 Wak'd by the shrilling sound, Ulysses rose,
 And, to the deaf woods wailing, breath'd his woes :

" Ah me ! on what inhospitable coast,
 Or what new region, is Ulysses lost :
 Possess'd by wild barbarians fierce in arms ;
 Or men, whose bosom tender pity warms ?
 What sounds are these that gather from the shores :
 The voice of nymphs that haunt the sylvan bowers,
 The fair-hair'd Dryads of the shady wood ;
 Or azure daughters of the silver flood ;
 Or human voice ? but, issuing from the shades,
 Why cease I straight to learn what sound invades ?"

Then, where the grove with leaves unbragous bends
 With forceful strength a branch the hero rends ;
 Around his loins the verdant cincture spreads
 A wrothy foliage and concealing shades.
 As when a lion in the midnight hours,
 Beat by rude blasts, and wet with wintry showers,
 Descends terrific from the mountain's brow :
 With living flames his rolling eye-balls glow ;
 With conscious strength elate, he bends his way,
 Majestically fierce, to seize his prey
 (The steer or stag) : or with keen hunger bold,
 Springs o'er the fence, and dissipates the fold.
 No less a terror, from the neighbouring groves
 (Rough from the tossing surge) Ulysses moves ;
 Urg'd on by want, and recent from the storms ;
 The brackish ooze his manly face deforms.
 Wide o'er the shore with many a piercing cry
 To rocks, to caves, the frightened virgins fly :
 All but the nymph : the nymph stood fix'd alone,
 By Pallas arm'd with boldness not her own.
 Meantime in dubious thought the king awaits,
 And, self-considering, as he stands, debates ;
 Distant his mournful story to declare,
 Or prostrate at her knee address the prayer.
 But fearful to offend, by Wisdom sway'd,
 At awful distance he accosts the maid :

" If from the skies a goddess, or if Earth
 (Imperial virgin) boast thy glorious birth,
 To thee I bend ! if in that bright disguise
 Thou visit Earth, a daughter of the skies,
 Hail, Dian, hail ! the huntress of the groves
 So shines majestic, and so stately moves,
 So breathes an air divine ! But if thy race
 Be mortal, and this Earth thy native place,
 Blest is the father from whose loins you sprung
 Blest is the mother at whose breast you hung,
 Blest are the brethren who thy blood divide,
 To such a miracle of charms ally'd :
 Joyful they see applauding princes gaze,
 When stately in the dance you swim th' harmonious maze.

But blest o'er all, the youth with heavenly charms,
 Who clasps the bright perfection in his arms !
 Never, I never view'd till this blest hour
 Such finish'd grace ! I gaze, and I adore !

Thus seems the palm with stately honours crown'd,
 By Phoebus' altars ; thus o'erlooks the ground,
 The pride of Delos. (By the Delian coast,
 I voyag'd, leader of a warrior-host,
 But ah, how chang'd ! from thence my sorrow
 O fatal voyage, source of all my woes !)

(flows ;
 Raptur'd I stood, and, as this hour amaz'd,
 With reverence at the lofty wonder gaz'd ;
 Raptur'd I stand ; for Earth ne'er knew to bear
 A plant so stately, or a nymph so fair.
 Aw'd from access, I lift my suppliant hands ;
 For misery, O queen, before thee stands !
 Twice ten tempestuous nights I roll'd resign'd
 To roaring billows, and the warring wind ;
 Heaven bade the deep to spare ! but Heaven, my Spares only to inflict some mightier woe ; [see
 Inur'd to care, to death in all its forms ;
 Outcast I rove, familiar with the storms !
 Once more I view the face of human-kind !
 Oh, let soft pity touch thy generous mind !
 Unconscious of what air I breathe, I stand
 Naked, defenceless, on a foreign land.
 Propitious to my wants a vest supply
 To guard the wretched from th' inclement sky :

So may the gods, who Heaven and Earth control,
 Crown the chaste wishes of thy virtuous soul,
 On thy soft hours their choicest blessings shed ;
 Blest with a husband be thy bridal bed ;
 Blest be thy husband with a blooming race,
 And lasting union crown your blissful days.
 The gods, when they supremely bless, bestow
 Firm union on their favourites below :
 Then envy grieves, with inly-pining hate ;
 The good exult, and Heaven is in our state."

To whom the nymph : " O stranger, cease thy care,
 Wise is thy soul, but man is born to bear :
 Jove weighs affairs of Earth, in dubious scales,
 And the good suffers, while the bad prevails :
 Bear, with a soul resign'd, the will of Jove ;
 Who breathes, must mourn : thy woes are from above.

But since thou tread'st our hospitable shore,
 'Tis mine to bid the wretched grieve no more,
 To clothe the naked, and thy way to guide—
 Know, the Phœacian tribes this land divide ;
 From great Alcinous' royal loins I spring,
 A happy nation, and an happy king."

Then to her maids : " Why, why, ye coward
 train,

These fears, this flight ? Ye fear, and fly in vain
 Dread ye a foe ? dismiss that idle dread,
 'Tis death with hostile steps these shores to tread,
 Safe in the love of Heaven, an ocean flows
 Around our realm, a barrier from the foes ;
 'Tis ours this son of sorrow to relieve,
 Cheer the sad heart, nor let affliction grieve.
 By Love the stranger and the poor are sent ;
 And what to those we give, to Jove is lent.
 Then food supply, and bathe his fainting limbs
 Where waving shades obscure the mazy streams."

Obedient to the call, the chief they guide
 To the calm current of the secret tide :
 Close by the stream a royal dress they lay,
 A vest and robe, with rich embroidery gay :
 Then unguents in a vase of gold supply,
 That breath'd a fragrance through the balmy sky

To them the king : " No longer I detain
 Your friendly care : retire, ye virgin train !
 Retire, while from my weary'd limbs I lave
 The foul pollution of the briny wave :

Ye gods! since this worn frame refection knew,
What scenes have I survey'd of dreadful view!
But, nymphs, recede! sage chastity denies
To raise the blush, or pain the modest eyes."

The nymphs withdraw, at once into the tide
Active he bounds; the flashing waves divide:
O'er all his limbs his hands the wave diffuse,
And from his locks compress the wéedy ooze;
The balmy oil, a fragrant shower, he sheds;
Then, drest, in pomp magnificently treads.
The warrior goddess gives his frame to shine
With majesty enlarg'd, and air divine:
Back from his brow a length of hair unfurls,
His hyacinthine locks descend in wavy curls.
As by some artist, to whom Vulcan gives
His skill divine, a breathing statue lives:
By Pallas taught, he frames the wonderous mould,
And o'er the silver pour the fusile gold.
So Pallas his heroic frame improves
With heavenly bloom, and like a god he moves.
A fragrance breathes around: majestic grace
Attends his steps; th' astonish'd virgins gaze.
Soft he reclines along the murmuring seas,
Inhaling freshness from the fanning breeze.

The wondering nymph his glorious port survey'd,
And to her damsels, with amazement, said:
"Not without care divine the stranger treads
This land of joy: his steps some godhead leads:
Would Jove destroy him, sure he had been driven
Far from this realm, the favourite isle of Heaven.
Late a sad spectacle of woe, he trod
The desert sands, and now he looks a god.
Oh, Heaven! in my connubial hour decree
This man my spouse, or such a spouse as he!
But haste, the viands and the bowl provide—"
The maids the viands, and the bowl supply'd:
Eager he fed, for keen his hunger rag'd,
And with the generous vintage thirst asswag'd.

Now on return her care Nausicaa bends,
The robes resumes, the glittering car ascends,
Far blooming o'er the field: and as she press'd
The splendid seat, the listening chief address'd:
"Stranger arise! the Sun rolls down the day,
Lo! to the palace I direct the way:
Where in high state the nobles of the land
Attend my royal sire, a radiant band.
But hear, though wisdom in thy soul presides,
Speaks from thy tongue, and every action guides;
Advance at distance while I pass the plain
Where o'er the furrows waves the golden grain:
Alone I re-ascend—With airy mounds
A strength of wall the guarded city bounds:
The jutting land two ample bays divides:
Full through the narrow mouths descend the tides:
The spacious basons arching rocks enclose,
A sure defence from every storm that blows.
Close to the bay great Neptune's fane adjoins;
And near, a forum flank'd with marble shines.
Where the bold youth, the numerous fleets to store,
Shape the broad sail, or smooth the taper oar:
For not the bow they bend, nor boast the skill
To give the feather'd arrows wings to kill;
But the tall mast above the vessel rear,
Or teach the fluttering sail to float in air,
They rush into the deep with eager joy,
Climb the steep surge, and through the tempest fly;
A proud, unpolish'd race—to me belongs
The care to shun the blast of slanderous tongues;

Lest malice, prone the virtuous to defame,
Thus with vile censure taint my spotless name:
"What stranger this whom thus Nausicaa leads?

Heavens, with what graceful majesty he treads!
Perhaps a native of some distant shore,
The future consort of her bridal hour:
Or rather some descendant of the skies;
Won by her prayers, th' aërial bridegroom flies.
Heaven on that hour his choicest influence shed,
That gave a foreign spouse to crown her bed!
All, all the godlike worthies that adorn
This realm, she flies: Phœacia is her scorn."

"And just the blame; for female innocence
Not only flies the guilt, but shuns th' offence:
Th' unguarded virgin, as unchaste, I blame;
And the least freedom with the sex is shame,
Till our consenting sires a spouse provide,
And public nuptials justify the bride.

"But would'st thou soon review thy native
plain,
Attend, and speedy thou shalt pass the main:
Nigh where a grove with verdant poplars crowd'd,
To Pallas sacred, shades the holy ground,
We bend our way: a bubbling fount distils
A lucid lake, and thence descends in fills;
Around the grove a mead with lively green
Falls by degrees, and forms a beautiful scene;
Here a rich juice the royal vineyard pours;
And there the garden yields a waste of flowers.
Hence lies the town, as far as to the ear
Floats a strong shout along the waves of air.
There wait embower'd, while I ascend alone
To great Alcinoos on his royal throne.

"Arriv'd, advance impatient of delay,
And to the lofty palace bend thy way:
The lofty palace overlooks the town,
From every doom by pomp superior known:
A child may point the way. With earnest gait
Seek thou the queen along the rooms of state;
Her royal hand a wonderous work designs,
Around a circle of bright damsels shines,
Part twist the threads, and part the wood dispose,
While with the purple orb the spindle glows.
High on a throne, amid the Scherian powers,
My royal father shares the genial hours:
But to the queen thy mournful tale disclose,
With the prevailing eloquence of woes:
So shalt thou view with joy thy natal shore,
Though mountains rise between, and oceans roar."
She added not, but waving as she wheel'd
The silver scourge, it glitter'd o'er the field:
With skill the virgin guides th' embroider'd rein,
Slow rolls the car before th' attending train.
Now whirling down the Heavens, the golden day
Shot through the western clouds a dewy ray;
The grove they reach, where from the sacred shade,
To Pallas thus the pensive hero pray'd:

"Daughter of Jove! whose arms in thunder
wield
Th' avenging bolt, and shake the dreadful shield;
Forsook by thee, in vain I sought thy aid:
When booming billows clos'd above my head:
Attend, unconquer'd maid! accord my vows,
Bid the great hear, and pitying heal my woe."
This heard Minerva, but forbore to fly
(By Neptune aw'd) apparent from the sky:
Stern god! who rag'd with vengeance unrestrain'd,
Till great Ulysses hail'd his native land.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK VII.

ARGUMENT.

THE COURT OF ALCINOUS.

THE princess Nausicaa returns to the city, and Ulysses soon after follows thither. He is met by Pallas in the form of a young virgin, who guides him to the palace, and directs him in what manner to address the queen Arete. She then involves him in a mist, which causes him to pass invisible. The palace and gardens of Alcinoüs described. Ulysses falling at the feet of the queen, the mist disperses, the Phæacians admire, and receive him with respect. The queen inquiring by what means he had the carments he then wore, he relates to her and Alcinoüs his departure from Calypso, and his arrival on their dominions.

The same day continues, and the book ends with the night.

THE patient, heavenly man thus suppliant pray'd ;
While the slow mules draw on th' imperial maid ;
Through the proud streets she moves, the public
The turning wheel before the palace stays. [gaze:
With ready love her brothers gathering round
Receiv'd the vestures, and the mules unbound.
She seeks the bridal bower : a matron there
The rising fire supplies with busy care,
Whose charms in youth the father's heart inflam'd,
Now worn with age, Eurymedusa nam'd :
The captive dame Phæacian rovers bore,
Snatch'd from Epirus, her sweet native shore,
(A grateful prize) and in her bloom bestow'd
On good Alcinoüs, honour'd as a god :
Nurse of Nausicaa from her infant years,
And tender second to a mother's care.

Now from the sacred thicket where he lay,
To town Ulysses took the winding way.
Propitious Pallas, to secure her care,
Around him spread a veil of thicken'd air ;
To shun th' encounter of the vulgar crowd,
Insulting still, inquisitive and loud.
When near the fam'd Phæacian walls he drew,
The beauteous city opening to his view,
His step a virgin met, and stood before :
A polish'd urn the seeming virgin bore,
And youthful smil'd ; but in the low disguise
Lay hid the goddess with the azure eyes. [mands)
" Show me, fair daughter," (thus the chief de-
" The house of him who rules these happy lands.
Through many woes and wanderings, lo ! I come
To good Alcinoüs' hospitable dome.

Far from my native coast, I rove alone,
A wretched stranger, and of all unknown !"

The goddess answer'd, " Father, I obey,
And point the wandering traveller his way :
Well known to me the palace you inquire,
For fast beside it dwells my honour'd sire ;
But silent march, nor greet the common train
With questions needless, or inquiry vain,

A race of rugged mariners are these ;
Unpolish'd men, and boisterous as their sets :
The native islanders alone their care,
And hateful he who breathes a foreign air.
These did the ruler of the deep ordain
To build proud navies, and command the main ;
On canvass wings to cut the watery way ;
No bird so light, no thought so swift, as they."

Thus having spoke, th' unknown celestial leader
The footstep of the deity he treads,
And secret moves along the crowded space,
Unseen of all the rude Phæacian race.
(So Pallas order'd, Pallas to their eyes
The mist objected, and condens'd the skies).
The chief with wonder sees th' extended streets,
The spreading harbours, and the rising fleets ;
He next their princes' lofty domes admires,
In separate islands crown'd with rising spires ;
And deep entrenchments, and high walls of stone,
That gird the city like a marble zone,
At length the kingly palace-gates he view'd ;
There stopp'd the goddess, and her speech renew'd :

" My task is done ; the mansion you inquire
Appears before you : enter, and admire.
High thron'd, and feasting, there thou shalt behold
The scepter'd rulers. Fear not, but be bold :
A decent boldness ever meets with friends,
Succeeds, and ev'n a stranger recommends.
First to the queen prefer a suppliant's claim,
Alcinoüs' queen, Arete is her name,
The same her parents, and her power the same.
For know, from ocean's god Nausithous sprung,
And Peribæa, beautiful and young,
(Eurymedon's last hope, who rul'd of old
The race of giants, impious, proud, and bold ;
Perish'd the nation in unrighteous war,
Perish'd the prince, and left this only heir).
Who now, by Neptune's amorous power compris'd,
Produc'd a monarch that his people blest,
Father and prince of the Phæacian name ;
From him Rhexenor and Alcinoüs came.
The first by Phæbus' burning arrows fir'd,
New from his nuptials, hapless youth ! expir'd.
No son surviv'd : Arete heir'd his state,
And her, Alcinoüs chose his royal mate.
With honours yet to womankind unknown,
This queen be graces, and divides the throne :
In equal tenderness her sons conspire,
And all the children emulate their sire.
When thro' the streets she gracious deigns to move,
(The public wonder and the public love)
The tongues of all with transport sound her praise,
The eyes of all, as on a goddess, gaze.
She feels the triumph of a generous breast :
To heal divisions, to relieve th' opprest ;
In virtue rich ; in blessing others, blest.
Go then secure, thy humble suit prefer,
And owe thy country and thy friends to her."

With that the goddess deign'd no longer stay,
But o'er the world of waters wing'd her way :
Forsaking Scheria's ever-pleasing shore,
The winds to Marathon the virgin bore ;
Thence, where proud Athens rears her towery head,
With opening streets and shining structures spread,
She past, delighted with the well-known seats ;
And to Erectheus' sacred dome retreats.

Meanwhile Ulysses at the palace waits,
There stops, and anxious with his soul debates,
Fix'd in amaze before the royal gates.
The front appear'd with radiant splendour gay,

Bright as the lamp of night, or orb of day,
The walls were massy brass; the cornice high
Blue metals crown'd, in colours of the sky:
Rich plates of gold the folding doors incase;
The pillars silver, on a brazen base;
Silver the lintels deep projecting o'er,
And gold the ringlets that command the door.
Two rows of stately dogs on either band,
In sculptur'd gold and labour'd silver stand.
These Vulcan form'd with art divine, to wait
Immortal guardians at Alcinous' gates;
Alive each animated frame appears,
And still to live beyond the power of years.

Fair thrones within from space to space were rais'd,
Where various carpets with embroidery blaz'd,
The work of matrons: these the princess prest,
Day following day, a long continued feast.
Refulgent pedestals the walls surround,
Which boys of gold with flaming torches crown'd;
The polish'd ore, reflecting every ray,
Blaz'd on the banquetts with a double day.
Fell fifty handmaids form the household train;
Some turn the mill, or sift the golden grain;
Some ply the loom: their busy fingers move
Like poplar-leaves when Zephyr fans the grove.
Not more renown'd the men of Scheria's isle,
For sailing arts and all the naval toil,
Than works of female skill their women's pride,
The flying shuttle through the threads to guide:
Pallas to these her double gifts imparts,
Inventive genius, and industrious arts.

Close to the gates a spacious garden lies,
From storms defended and inclement skies,
Four acres was the allotted space of ground,
Fenc'd with a green enclosure all around,
Tall thriving trees confess'd the fruitful mould;
The reddening apple ripens here to gold.
Here the blue fig with luscious juice o'erflows,
With deeper red the full pomegranate glows,
The branch here bends beneath the weighty pear,
And verdant olives flourish round the year.
The balmy spirit of the western gale
Eternal breathes on fruits untaught to fail:
Each dropping pear a following pear supplies,
On apples apples, figs on figs arise:
The same mild season gives the blooms to grow,
The buds to harden, and the fruits to blow.

Here order'd vines in equal ranks appear,
With all th' united labours of the year;
Some to unload the fertile branches run,
Some dry the blackening clusters in the Sun,
Others to tread the liquid harvest join,
The groaning presses foam with floods of wine.
Here are the vines in early flower describ'd,
Here grapes discolour'd on the sunny side,
And there in autumn's richest purple dy'd.
Beds of all various herbs, for ever green,
In beauteous order terminate the scene.

Two pteuous fountains the whole prospect
crown'd;
This through the garden leads its streams around,
Visits each plant, and waters all the ground:
While that in pipes beneath the palace flows,
And thence its current on the town bestows;
To various use their various streams they bring,
The people one, and one supplies the king.
Such were the glories which the gods ordain'd,
To grace Alcinous, and his happy land.
E'en from the chief, who men and nations knew,
Th' unwonted scene surpris'd and rapture drew;

In pleasing thought he ran the prospect o'er,
Then hasty enter'd at the lofty door.
Night now approaching, in the palace stand,
With goblets crown'd, the rulers of the land;
Prepar'd for rest, and offering to the god¹
Who bears the virtue of the sleepy rod.
Unseen he glided through the joyous crowd,
With darkness circled, and an ambient cloud.
Direct to great Alcinous' throne he came,
And prostrate fell before th' imperial dame.
Then from around him dropt the veil of night;
Sudden he shines, and manifest to sight,
The nobles gaze, with awful fear oppress;
Silent they gaze, and eye the godlike guest.

"Daughter of great Rhexenor!" (thus began Low at her knees the much-enduring man)
"To thee, thy consort, and this royal train,
To all that share the blessings of your reign,
A suppliant bends: Oh, pity human woe!
'Tis what the happy to th' unhappy owe.
A wretched exile to his country send,
Long worn with griefs, and long without a friend.
So may the gods your better days increase,
And all your joys descend on all your race,
So reign for ever on your country's breast,
Your people blessing, by your people blest!"

Then to the genial hearth he bow'd his face,
And humbled in the ashes took his place.
Silence ensued. The eldest first began,
Echenus sage, a venerable man!
Whose well-taught mind the present age surpass,
And join'd to that th' experience of the last.
Fit words attend on his weighty sense,
And mild persuasion flow'd in eloquence.

"O sight!" he cry'd, "dishonest and unjust!
A guest, a stranger, seated in the dust!
To raise the lowly suppliant from the ground
Befits a monarch. Lo! the peers around
But wait thy word, the gentle guest to grace,
And seat him fair in some distinguish'd place.
Let first the herald due libation pay
To Jove, who guides the wanderer on his way;
Then get the genial banquet in his view,
And give the stranger-guest a stranger's due."

His sage advice the listening king obeys,
He stretch'd his hand the prudent chief to raise,
And from his seat Laodamas remov'd
(The monarch's offspring, and his best-belov'd);
There next his side the godlike hero sate;
With stars of silver shone the bed of state.
The golden ewer a beauteous handmaid brings,
Replenish'd from the cool translucent springs,
Whose polish'd vase with copious streams supplies
A silver laver of capacious size.
The table next in regal order spread,
The glittering canisters are heap'd with bread:
Viands of various kinds invite the taste,
Of choicest sort and savour, rich repast!
Thus feasting high, Alcinous gave the sign,
And bade the herald pour the rosy wine.

"Let all around the due libation pay
To Jove, who guides the wanderer on his way."
He said. Pontonous heard the king's command;
The circling goblet moves from hand to hand:
Each drinks the juice that glads the heart of man,
Alcinous then, with aspect mild, began:
"Princes and peers, attend; while we impart
To you, the thoughts of no inhuman heart.

¹ Mercury.

Now pleas'd and satiate from the social rite
Repair we to the blessings of the night :
But with the rising day, assembled here,
Let all the elders of the land appear,
Pious observe our hospitable laws,
And Heaven propitiate in the stranger's cause :
Then, join'd in council, proper means explore
Safe to transport him to the wish'd-for shore
(How distant that, imports not us to know,
Nor weigh the labour, but relieve the woe).
Meantime, nor harm nor anguish let him bear :
This interval, Heaven trusts him to our care ;
But to his native land our charge resign'd,
Heaven's his life to come, and all the woes behind.

Then must he suffer what the Fates ordain ;
For Fate has wove the thread of life with pain,
And twins, ev'n from the birth, are misery and man !

" But if, descended from th' Olympian bower,
Gracious approach us some immortal power ;
If in that form thou com'st a guest divine ;
Some high event the conscious gods design,
As yet, unbid they never grac'd our feast,
The solemn sacrifice call'd down the guest ;
Then manifest of Heaven the vision stood,
And to our eyes familiar was the god.
Oft with some favour'd traveller they stray,
And shine before him all the desert way :
With social intercourse, and face to face,
The friends and guardians of our pious race,
So near approach we their celestial kind,
By justice, truth, and probity of mind :
As our dire neighbours of Cyclopean birth
Match in fierce wrong the giant-sons of Earth."

" Let no such thought" (with modest grace re-
join'd

The prudent Greek) " possess the royal mind.
Alas ! a mortal, like thyself, am I ;
No glorious native of my azure sky :
In form, ah ! how unlike their heavenly kind !
How more inferior in the gifts of mind !
Alas, a mortal ! most oppress of those Whom fate has loaded with a weight of woes ;
By a sad train of miseries alone
Distinguish'd long, and second now to none !
By Heaven's high will compell'd from shore to
shore ;

With Heaven's high will prepar'd to suffer more.
What histories of toil could I declare !
But still long-wearied nature wants repair ;
Spent with fatigue, and shrunk with pining fast,
My craving bowels still require repast.
Howe'er the noble, suffering mind, may grieve
Its load of anguish, and disdain to live ;
Necessity demands our daily bread ;
Hunger is insolent, and will be fed.
But finish, O ye peers ! what you propose,
And let the morrow's dawn conclude my woes.
Pleas'd will I suffer all the gods ordain,
To see my soil, my son, my friends, again.
That view vouchsaf'd, let instant death surprise
With ever-during shade these happy eyes !"

Th' assembled peers with general praise approv'd
His pleaded reason, and the suit he mov'd,
Each drinks a full oblivion of his cares,
And to the gift of balmy sleep repairs.
Ulysses in the regal walls alone
Remain'd : beside him, on a splendid throne,
Divine Arete and Alcinoüs shone.
The queen, on nearer view, the guest survey'd,

Rob'd in the garments her own hands had made ;
Not without wonder seen. Then thus began,
Her words addressing to the godlike man : [say,
" Cam'st thou not hither, wondrous stranger !
From lands remote, and o'er a length of sea !
Tell then whence art thou ? whence that princely
air ?

And robes like these, so recent and so fair !"
" Hard is the task, oh princess ! you impose :"
(Thus, sighing, spoke the man of many woes).

" The long, the mournful series to relate
Of all my sorrows sent by Heaven and fate !
Yet what you ask, attend. An island lies
Beyond these tracts, and under other skies,
Ogygia nam'd, in Ocean's watery arms ;
Where dwells Calypso, dreadful in her charms !
Remote from gods or men she holds her reign,
Amid the terrors of the rolling main.
Me, only me, the hand of Fortune bore
Unblest ! to tread that interdicted shore :
When Jove tremendous in the sable deeps
Lanc'd his red lightning at our scatter'd ships :
Then, all my fleet, and all my followers lost,
Sole on a plank, on boiling surges tost,
Heaven drove my wreck th' Ogygian isle to find,
Full nine days floating to the wave and wind.
Met by the goddess there with open arms,
She brib'd my stay with more than human charms !
Nay promis'd, vainly promis'd, to bestow
Immortal life, exempt from age or woe :
But all her blandishments successful prove,
To banish from my breast my country's love.
I stay reluctant seven continued years,
And water her ambrosial couch with tears.
The eighth she voluntary moves to part,
Or urg'd by Jove, or her own changeful heart.
A raft was form'd, to cross the surging sea ;
Herself supply'd the stores and rich array ;
And gave the gales to waft me on the way.
In seventeen days appear'd your pleasing coast,
And woody mountains, half in vapours lost.
Joy touch'd my soul : my soul was joy'd in vain,
For angry Neptune roars'd the raging main ;
The wild winds whistle, and the billows roar ;
The splitting raft the furious tempest tore ;
And storms vindictive intercept the shore.
Soon as their rage subsides, the seas I brave
With naked force, and shoot along the wave,
To reach this isle : but there my hopes were
The surge impell'd me on a craggy coast. [lost,
I chose the safer sea, and chanc'd to find
A river's mouth impervious to the wind,
And clear of rocks. I fainted by the flood ;
Then took the shelter of the neighbouring wood.
'Twas night ; and, cover'd in the foliage deep,
Jove plung'd my senses in the death of sleep.
All night I slept, oblivious of my pain :
Aurora dawn'd and Phoebus shin'd in vain,
Nor, till oblique he slop'd his evening ray,
Had Somnus dry'd the balmy dews away.
'Then female voices from the shore I heard :
A maid amidst them, goddess-like, appear'd ;
To her I sued, she pity'd my distress ;
Like thee in beauty, nor in virtue less.
Who from such youth could hope considerate care !
In youth and beauty wisdom is but rare !
She gave me life, reliev'd with just supplies [eyes
My wants, and lent these robes that strike your
This is the truth : and oh, ye powers on high !
Forbid that want should sink me to a lie."

To this the king: "Our daughter but express
Her cares imperfect to our godlike guest.
Suppliant to her, since first he chose to pray,
Why not herself did she conduct the way,
And with her handmaids to our court convey?"

"Hero and king!" (Ulysses thus reply'd)
"Nor blame her faultless, nor suspect her pride:
She bade me follow in th' attendant train;
Not fear and reverence did my steps detain,
Lest rash suspicion might alarm thy mind:
Man's of a jealous and mistaking kind."

"Far from my soul," he cry'd, "the gods efface
All wrath ill-grounded, and suspicion base!
Whate'er is honest, stranger, I approve;
And would to Phœbus, Pallas, and to Jove,
Such's thou art, thy thought and mine were one,
Nor thou unwilling to be call'd my son.
In such alliance could'st thou wish to join,
A palace stor'd with treasures should be thine.
But, if reluctant, who shall force thy stay?"

Jove bids to set the stranger on his way,
And ships shall wait thee with the morning ray.
Till then, let slumber close thy careful eyes;
The wakeful mariners shall watch the skies,
And seize the moment when the breezes rise:
Then gently waft thee to the pleasing shore,
Where thy soul rests, and labour is no more.
Far as Eubœa though thy country lay,
Our ships with ease transport thee in a day.
Thither of old, Earth's giant-son² to view,
On wings of winds with Rhadamanth they flew:
Saw this land, from whence their morning course
Saw them returning with the setting Sun. [begun,
Your eyes shall witness and confirm my tale,
Our youth how dextrous, and how fleet our sail,
When justly tim'd with equal sweep they row,
And ocean whitens in long tracts below."

Thus he. No word th' experienc'd man replies,
But thus to Heaven (and heavenward lifts his eyes)
"O, Jove! O, father! what the king accords
Do thou make perfect! sacred be his words!
Wide o'er the world Alcinoos' glory shine!
Let fame be his, and ah! my country mine!"

Meantime Arete, for the hour of rest,
Ordnains the fleecy couch, and covering vest:
Bids her fair train the purple quilts prepare,
And the thick carpets spread with busy care.
With torches blazing in their hands they past,
And finish'd all the queen's command with haste:
Then gave the signal to the willing guest:
He rose with pleasure, and retir'd to rest.
There, soft-extended, to the murmuring sound
Of the high porch, Ulysses sleeps profound!
Within, releas'd from cares, Alcinoos lies;
And fast beside were clos'd Arete's eyes.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK VIII.

ARGUMENT.

ALCINOOS calls a council, in which it is resolved to transport Ulysses into his country. After which, splendid entertainments are made, where the celebrated musician and poet Demodocus plays and sings to the guests. They next proceed to the games; the race, the wrestling, discus, &c. where Ulysses casts a prodigious length, to the admiration of all the spectators. They return again to the banquet, and Demodocus sings the loves of Mars and Venus. Ulysses, after a compliment to the poet, desires him to sing the introduction of the wooden horse into Troy; which subject provoking his tears, Alcinoos enquires of his guest, his name, parentage, and fortunes.

? Tityus.

Now fair Aurora lifts her golden ray,
And all the ruddy orient flames with day:
Alcinoos, and the chief, with dawning light,
Rose instant from the slumbers of the night;
Then to the council-seat they bend their way,
And fill the shining thrones along the bay.

Meanwhile Minerva, in her guardian care,
Shoots from the starry vault through fields of air;
In form a herald of the king, she flies
From peer to peer, and thus incessant cries:

"Nobles and chiefs who rule Phœacia's states,
The king in council your attendance waits:
A prince of grace divine your aid implores,
O'er unknown seas arriv'd from unknown shores."

She spoke, and sudden with tumultuous sounds
Of thronging multitudes the shore rebounds:
At once the seats they fill; and every eye
Gaz'd, as before some brother of the sky.
Pallas with grace divine his form improves,
More high he treads, and more enlarg'd he moves:
She sheds celestial bloom, regard to draw;
And gives a dignity of mien, to awe;
With strength, the future prize of Fame to play,
And gather all the honours of the day.

Then from his glittering throne Alcinoos rose:
"Attend," he cry'd, "while we our will disclose.
Your present aid this godlike stranger craves,
Tost by rude tempest through a war of waves;
Perhaps from realms that view the rising day,
Or nations subject to the western ray.
Then grant, what here all sons of woe obtain,
(For here affliction never pleads in vain:)
Be chosen youths prepar'd, expert to try
The vast profound, and bid the vessel fly:
Launch the tall bark, and order every oar;
Then in our court indulge the genial hour.
Instant, you sailors, to this task attend;
Swift to the palace, all ye peers, ascend;
Let none to strangers honour due disclaim;
Be there Demodocus, the bard of Fame,
Taught by the gods to please, when high he sings
The vocal lay, responsive to the strings."

Thus spoke the prince: th' attending peers obey,
In state they move; Alcinoos leads the way:
Swift to Demodocus the herald flies,
At once the sailors to their charge arise:
They launch the vessel, and unfurl the sails,
And stretch the swelling canvass to the gales:
Then to the palace move: a gathering throng,
Youth, and white age, tumultuous pour along:
Now all accesses to the dome are fill'd;
Eight boards, the choicest of the herd, are kill'd:
Two beves, twelve fatlings, from the flock they bring
To crown the feast; so wills the bounteous king.

The herald now arrives, and guides along
 The sacred master of celestial song:
 Dear to the Muse! who gave his days to flow
 With mighty blessings, mix'd with mighty woe:
 With clouds of darkness quench'd his visual ray,
 But gave him skill to raise the lofty lay,
 High on a radiant throne sublime in state,
 Encircled by huge multitudes, he sat:
 With silver shone the throne; his lyre well strung
 To rapturous sounds, at hand Pantonous hung:
 Before his seat a polish'd table shined,
 And a full goblet foams with generous wines:
 His food a herald bore: and now they fed:
 And now the rage of craving hunger fled.

Then, fir'd by all the Muse aloud he sings
 The mighty deeds of demi-gods and kings:
 From that fierce wrath the noble song arose,
 That made Ulysses and Achilles foes:
 How o'er the feast they doom the fall of Troy;
 The stern debate Atreides bears with joy:
 For Heaven fore-told the contest, when he trod
 The marble threshold of the Delphic god,
 Curious to learn the counsels of the sky,
 Ere yet he loos'd the rage of war on Troy.

Touch'd at the song, Ulysses straight resign'd
 To soft affliction all his manly mind:
 Before his eyes the purple vest he drew,
 Industrious to conceal the falling dew:
 But when the music paus'd, his heart to shed
 The flowing tear, and rais'd his drooping head:
 And, lifting to the gods a goblet crown'd,
 He pour'd a pure libation to the ground.

Transported with the song, the listening train
 Again with loud applause demand the strain:
 Again Ulysses veil'd his pensive head,
 Again, unmann'd, a shower of sorrow shed:
 Conceal'd he wept: the king observ'd alone
 The silent tear, and heard the secret groan:
 Then to the bard aloud: "O cease to sing,
 Dumb be thy voice, and mute th' harmonious string;

Enough the feast has pleas'd, enough the power
 Of heavenly song has crown'd the genial hour!
 Incessant in the games your strength display;
 Contest, ye brave, the honours of the day:
 That, pleas'd, th' admiring stranger may proclaim

In distant regions the Phœacian fame:
 None wield the gauntlet with so dire a sway,
 Or swifter in the race devour the way;
 None in the leap spring with so strong a bound,
 Or firmer, in the wrestling, press the ground."

Thus spake the king; th' attending peers obey:
 In state they move, Alcinoos leads the way:
 His golden lyre Demodochus unstrung,
 High on a column in the palace hung:
 And, guided by a herald's guardian cares,
 Majestic to the lists of fame repairs.

Now swarms the populace; a countless throng,
 Youth and hoar age; and man drives man along:
 The games begin; ambitious of the prize,
 Acronous, Thoön, and Eretnous rise;
 The prize Ocyalus and Prynneus claim,
 Anchialus and Ponteus, chiefs of fame:
 There Proreus, Neates, Eratreus appear,
 And fam'd Amphialus, Polyneus' heir;
 Euryalus like Mars terrific rose,
 When clad in wrath he withers hosts of foes:
 Naubolides with grace unequal'd shone,
 Or equal'd by Laodamas alone,

With these came forth Ambascious the strong;
 And three brave sons, from great Alcinous sprung
 Rang'd in a line the ready racers stand,
 Start from the goal, and vanish o'er the strand:
 Swift as on wings of winds upborne they fly,
 And drifts of rising dust involve the sky:
 Before the rest, what space the hind allow
 Between the mule and ox, from plough to plough;
 Clytonous sprung: he wing'd the rapid way,
 And bor' th' unrival'd honours of the day.

With fierce embrace the brawny wrestlers join;
 The conquest, great Euryalus, is thine.
 Amphialus sprung forward with a bound,
 Superior in the leap, a length of ground:
 From Elatreus' strong arm the discus flies,
 And sings with unmatch'd force along the skies,
 And Laodam whirls high, with dreadful sway,
 The gloves of death, victorious in the fray.

While thus the peerage in the games contends,
 In act to speak, Laodamas ascends: [skill'd
 "O friends," he cries, "the stranger seems well
 To try th' illustrious labours of the field:
 I deem him brave: then grant the brave man's
 Invite the hero to his share of fame. [claim,
 What nervous arms he boasts! how firm his tread!
 His limbs how turn'd! how broad his shoulders
 spread:

By age unbroke!—but all-consuming care
 Destroys, perhaps, that strength that time would spare:

Dire is the ocean, dread in all its forms!
 Man must decay, when man contends with storms."

"Well hast thou spoke," (Euryalus replies):
 "Thine is the guest, invite him thou to rise."
 Swift at the word, advancing from the crowd,
 He made obeisance, and thus spake aloud:

"Vouchsafes the reverend stranger to display
 His manly worth, and share the glorious day!
 Father, arise! for thee thy port proclaims
 Expert to conquer in the solemn games.
 To fame arise! for what more fame can yield
 Than the swift race, or conflict of the field?
 Steal from corroding care one transient day,
 To glory give the space thou hast to stay;
 Short is the time, and, lo! ev'n now the gales
 Call thee aboard, and stretch the swelling sails."

To whom with sighs Ulysses gave reply:
 "Ah! why th' ill-suiting pastime must I try?
 To gloomy care my thoughts alone are free;
 Ill the gay sports with troubled hearts agree;
 Sad from my natal hour my days have ran,
 A much-afflicted, much-enduring man!
 Who suppliant to the king and peers implores
 A speedy voyage to his native shores."

"Wide wanders, Laodam, thy erring tongue,
 The sports of glory to the brave belong," (Retorts Euryalus): "he boasts no claim
 Among the great, unlike the sons of fame.
 A wandering merchant he frequents the main;
 Some mean sea-farer in pursuit of gain;
 Studious of freight, in naval trade well skill'd,
 But dreads th' athletic labours of the field."

Incens'd Ulysses with a frown replies.
 "O forward to proclaim thy soul unwise!
 With partial hands the gods their gifts dispense;
 Some greatly think, some speak with manly sense;
 Here Heaven an elegance of form denies,
 But wisdom the defect of form supplies:
 This man with energy of thought contends,
 And steals with modest violence our souls,

He speaks reser'dly, but he speaks with force,
 Nor can one word be chang'd but for a worse;
 In public more than mortal he appears,
 And, as he moves, the gazing crowd reveses.
 While others, beauteous as th' ethereal kind,
 The nobler portion want, a knowing mind.
 In outward show Heaven gives thee to excel,
 But Heaven denies the praise of thinking well.
 Ill bear the brave a rude ussger's d tongue,
 And, youth, my generous soul resents the wrong:
 Skill'd in heroic exercise, I claim
 A post of honour with the sons of fame:
 Such was my boast while vigour crown'd my days,
 Now care surrounds me, and my force decays;
 Iur'd a melancholy part to bear,
 In scenes of death, by tempest and by war,
 Yet, thus by woes impair'd, no more I wawe
 To prove the hero.—Slander stings the brave."
 Then, striding forward with a furious bound,
 He wrench'd a rocky fragment from the ground.
 By far more ponderous, and more huge by far,
 Than what Phœacia's sons dicharg'd in air.
 Fierce from his arms th' enormous load he flings,
 Sonorous through the shaded air it sings;
 Couch'd to the earth, tempestuous as it flies,
 The crowd gaze upward while it cleaves the skies.
 Beyond all marks, with mazy a giddy round
 Down rushing, it up-turns a hill of ground.
 That instant Pallas, bursting from a cloud,
 Fix'd a distinguish'd mark, and cry'd aloud!
 "Ev'n he who sightless wants his visual ray
 May by his touch alone award the day:
 Thy signal throw transcends the utmost bound
 Of every champion by a length of ground.
 Securely bid the strongest of the train
 Arise to throw: the strongest throws in vain."
 She spoke; and momentary mounts the sky:
 The friendly voice Ulysses hears with joy,
 Then thus aloud, (clate with decent pride)
 "Rise, ye Phœaciaps, try your force," he cried;
 "If with this throw the strongest oaster vie,
 Still, further still, I bid the dædus fly,
 Stand forth, ye champions, who the gauntlet wield,
 Or ye, the swiftest racers of the field!
 Stand forth, ye wrestlers, who these pastimes grace,
 I wield the gauntlet, and I run the race!
 In such heroic games I yield to none,
 Or yield to brave Laodamas alone:
 Shall I with brave Laodamas contend?
 A friend is sacred, and I style him friend,
 Ungenerous were the man, and base of heart,
 Who takes the kind, and pays th' ungrateful part;
 Chiefly the man, in foreign realms confin'd,
 Base to his friend, to his own interest blind:
 All, all your heroes I this day defy;
 Give me a man that our might may try,
 Expert in every art, I boast the skill
 To give the feather'd arrows wings to kill;
 Should a whole host at once discharge the bow,
 My well-aim'd shaft with death prevents the foe:
 Alone superior in the field of Troy,
 Great Philoctetes taught the shaft to fly.
 From all the sons of Earth, unrivall'd praise
 I justly claim; but yield to better days,
 To those fam'd days when great Alcides rose,
 And Eurytus, who bade the gods be foes:
 (Vain Eurytus, whose art became his crime,
 Swept from the Earth, he perch'd in his prime;
 Sudden th' irremovable way he trod,
 Who boldly durst defy the bowyer-god),

In fighting fields as far the spear I throw,
 As flies an arrow from the well-drawn bow.
 Sole in the race the contest I decline,
 Stiff are my weary joints, and I resign;
 By storms and hunger worn: age well may fail,
 When storms and hunger both at once assail."
 Abash'd, the numbers hear the godlike man,
 Till great Alcinous mildly thus began: [tongue
 "Well hast thou spoke, and well thy generous
 With decent pride refutes a public wrong:
 Warm are thy words, but warm without offence;
 Fear only fools, secure in men of sense:
 Thy worth is known, 'Then hear our country's
 And bear to heroes our heroic fame; [claim,
 In distant realms our glorious deeds display,
 Repeat them frequent in the genial day;
 When blest with ease thy woes and wanderings end,
 Teach them thy consort, bid thy sons attend!
 How lov'd of Jove he crown'd our sties with praise,
 How we their offspring dignify our race.
 "Let other realms the deathful gauntlet wield,
 Or boast the glories of th' athletic field;
 We in the course unrivall'd speed display,
 Or through cerulean billows plough the way;
 To dress, to dance, to sing, our sole delight,
 The feast or bath by day, and love by night:
 Rise then, ye skill'd in measures; let him bear
 Your fame to men that breathe a distant air:
 And faithful say, to you the powers belong
 To race, to sail, to dance, to chant the song.
 "But, herald, to the palace swift repair,
 And the soft lyre to grace our pastimes bear."
 Swift at the word, obedient to the king,
 The herald flies the tuneful lyre to bring.
 Up rose nine seniors, chosen to survey
 The future games, the judges of the day.
 With instant care they mark a spacious round,
 And level for the dance th' allotted ground;
 The herald bears the lyre: intent to play,
 The bard advancing meditates the lay,
 Skill'd in the dance, tall youths, a blooming band,
 Graceful before the heavenly minstrel stand:
 Light-bounding from the earth, at once they rise,
 Their feet half viewless quiver in the skies:
 Ulysses gaz'd, astonish'd to survey
 The glancing splendours as their sandals play.
 Meantime the bard, alternate to the strings,
 The loves of Mars and Cytherea sings;
 How the stern god, enamour'd with her charms,
 Clasp'd the gay panting goddess in his arms,
 By bribes seduc'd: and how the Sun, whose eye
 Views the broad Heavens, diabol'd the lawless joy,
 Stung to the soul indignant through the skies
 To his black forge vindictive Vulcan flies:
 Arri'd, his sinewy arms incessant place
 Th' eternal anvil on the massy base.
 A wondrous net he labours, to betray
 The wanton lovers, as entwinn'd they lay,
 Indissolubly strong! Then instant bears
 To his immortal dome the finish'd snares.
 Above, below, around, with art dispread,
 The sure enclosure folds the genial bed;
 Whose texture ev'n the search of gods deceives,
 Thin as the filmy threads the spider weaves.
 Then, as withdrawing from the starry bowers,
 He feigns a journey to the Lemnian shores,
 His favourite isle! observant Mars descends
 His wish'd recess, and to the goddess flies:
 He glows, he burns: the fair-hair'd queen of love
 Descends smooth gliding from the courts of Jove,

Gay blooming in full charms : her hand he prest
With eager joy, and with a sigh address :

" Come, my belov'd, and taste the soft delights :
Come, to repose the genial bed invites :
Thy absent spouse, neglectful of thy charms,
Prefers his barbarous Sintians to thy arms !"

Then nothing loth, th' enamour'd fair he led,
And sunk transported on the conscious bed.
Down rush'd the toils, inwrapping as they lay
The careless lovers in their wanton play :
In vain they strive, th' entangling snares deny
(Inextricably firm) the power to fly :
Warn'd by the god who sheds the golden day,
Stern Vulcan homeward treads the starry way :
Arriv'd, he sees, he grieves, with rage he burns :
Full horrible he roars, his voice alth' Heaven
returns :

" O Jove! he cry'd, " oh all ye powers above,
See the lewd dalliance of the queen of love!
Me, awkward me, she scorns ; and yields her
charms

To that fair lecher, the strong god of arms.
If I am lame, that stain my natal hour
By fate impos'd ; such me my parent bore :
Why was I born ? See how the wanton lies !
O sight tormenting to an husband's eyes !
But, yet I trust, this once ev'n Mars would fly
His fair one's arms—he thinks her once, too, nigh.
But there remain, ye guilty, in my power,
Till Jove refunds his shameless daughter's dower.
Too dear I priz'd a fair enchanting face :
Beauty unchaste is beauty in disgrace."

Meanwhile the gods the dome of Vulcan
throng,

Apollo comes, and Neptune comes along ;
With these gay Hermes trod the starry plain ;
But modesty withheld the goddess-train.
All Heaven beholds imprison'd as they lie,
And unextinguish'd laughter shakes the sky.

Then mutual, thus they spoke : " Behold on wrong

Swift vengeance waits ; and art subdues the strong !
Dwells there a god on all th' Olympian brow
More swift than Mars, and more than Vulcan slow ?
Yet Vulcan conquers, and the god of arms
Must pay the penalty for lawless charms."

Thus serious they ; but he who gilds the skies,
The gay Apollo, thus to Hermes cries :
" Would'st thou enchain'd like Mars, O Hermes, lie,
And bear the shame, like Mars, to share the joy ?"

" O env'y'd shame !" (the smiling youth rejoin'd,)
" Add thrice the chains, and thrice more firmly
Gaze all ye gods, and every goddess gaze, [bind ;
Yet eager would I bless the sweet disgrace."

Loud laugh the rest, even Neptune laugh'd
Yet sues importunate to loose the god : [aloud,
" And free," he cries, " O Vulcan! free from shame Thy captives ; I ensure the penal claim."

" Will Neptune" (Vulcan then) " the faithless
He suffers who gives surety for th' unjust : [trust?
But say, if that lewd scandal of the sky,
To liberty restor'd, perfidious fly ;
Say, wilt thou bear the malc't ?" He instant cries,
" The mulec I bear, if Mars perfidious flies."

To whom appeas'd : " No more I urge delay ;
When Neptune sues, my part is to obey,"
Then to the snares his force the god applies ;
They burst ; and Mars to Thrace indignant flies :
To the soft Cyprian shores the goddess moves,
To visit Paphos and her blooming groves ;

Where to the power an hundred altars rise,
And breathing odours scent the balmy skies ;
Conceal'd she bathes in consecrated bowers,
The Graces unguents shed, ambrosial showers,
Unguents that charm the gods ! she last assumes
Her wondrous robes ; and fall the goddess blooms.

Thus sung the bard : Ulysses hears with joy,
And loud applauses rend the vaulted sky.

Then to the sports his sons the king commands,
Each blooming youth before the monarch stands,
In dance unmatch'd ! A wondrous ball is brought
(The work of Polypos, divinely wrought ;)
This youth with strength enormous bids it fly,
And heaving backward whirls it to the sky ;
His brother, springing with an active bound,
At distance intercepts it from the ground :
The ball dismiss'd, in dance they skim the strand,
Turn and return, and scarce imprint the sand.
Th' assembly gazes with astonish'd eyes,
And sends in shouts applauses to the skies. [name

Then thus Ulysses ! " Happy king, whose
The brightest shines in all the rolls of fame :
In subjects happy ! with surprise I gaze !
Thy praise was just ; their skill transcends thy praise."

Pleas'd with his people's fame, the monarch hears,
And thus benevolent accosts the peers :

" Since Wisdom's sacred guidance he pursues,
Give to the stranger guest a stranger's dues :
Twelve princes in our realm dominion share
O'er whom supreme, imperial power I bear :
Bring gold, a pledge of love ; a talent bring,
A vest, a robe, and imitate your king :
Be swift to give ; that he this night may share
The social feast of joy, with joy sincere.

And thou, Euryalus, redeem thy wrong ;
A generous heart repairs a slanderous tongue."

Th' assenting peers, obedient to the king,
In haste their heralds send the gifts to bring.
Then thus Euryalus : " O prince, whose sway
Rules this best realm, repentant I obey !
Be his this sword, whose blade of brass displays
A ruddy gleam ; whose hilt a silver blaze ;
Whose ivory sheath, inwrought with curious pride,
Adds graceful terror to the wearer's side."

He said ; and to his hand the sword consign'd ;
" And if," he cry'd, " my words affect thy mind,
Far from thy mind those words, ye whirlwinds, bear,
And scatter them, ye storms, in empty air :
Crown, O ye Heavens ! with joy his peaceful hours,

And grant him to his spouse and native shores !"
" And blest be thou, my friend," Ulysses cries :
" Crown him with every joy, ye favouring skies :
To thy calm hours continued peace afford,
And never, never mayst thou want this sword !"

He said ; and o'er his shoulder slung the blade.
Now o'er the earth ascends the evening shade :
The precious gifts th' illustrious heralds bear,
And to the court th' embody'd peers repair.
Before the queen Alcinoüs sons unfold
The vests, the robes, and heaps of shining gold ;
Then to the radiant thrones they move in state :
Aloft, the king in pomp imperial sat.

Then to the queen : " O partner of our reign,
O sole belov'd ! command thy menial train
A polish'd chest and stately robes to bear,
And healing waters for the bath prepare :
That, bath'd, our guest may bid his sorrows cease,
Hear the sweet song, and taste the feast in peace."

A bowl that flames with gold, of wondrous frame,
Ourself we give, memorial of our name :
To raise in offerings to almighty Jove,
And every god that treads the courts above."

Instant the queen, observant of the king,
Commands her train a spacious vase to bring,
The spacious vase with ample stream, suffice,
Heap high the wood, and bid the flames arise.
The flames climb round it with a fierce embrace,
The fuming waters bubble o'er the blaze.
Herself the chest prepares : in order roll'd
The robes, the vests are rang'd, and heaps of gold :
And adding a rich dress unwrought with art,
A gift expressive of her bounteous heart,
Thus spake to Ithacus : " To guard with bands
Insoluble these gifts, thy care demands :
Lest, in thy slumbers on the watery main,
The hand of rapine make our bounty vain."

Then bending with full force, around he roll'd
A labyrinth of bands in fold on fold,
Clo'd with Circean art. A train attends
Around the bath : the bath the king ascends
(Untasted joy, since that disastrous hour
He sail'd ill-fated from Calypso's bower :)
Where, happy as the gods that range the sky,
He feasted every sense with every joy.
He bathes ; the damsels, with officious toil,
Shed sweets, shed unguents, in a shower of oil :
Then e'er his limbs a gorgeously robe he spreads,
And to the feast magnificently treads :
Full where the dome its shining valves expands,
Nausicaa blooming as a goddess stands,
With wondering eyes the hero she survey'd,
And graceful thus began the royal maid :

" Hail, godlike stranger ! and when Heaven restores

To thy fond wish thy long-expected shores,
This ever-grateful in remembrance bear,
To me thou ow'st, to me, the vital air."

" O royal maid !" Ulysses straight returns,
" Whose worth the splendours of thy race adorns,
So may dread Jove (whose arm in vengeance forms storms.)

The written bolt, and blackens Heaven with
Restore me safe, through weary wanderings tost,
To my dear country's ever-pleasing coast,
As, while the spirit in this bosom glows,
To thee, my goddess, I address my vows :
My life, thy gift I boast !" He said, and sat
Fast by Alcinous on a throne of state.

Now each partakes the feast, the wine prepares,
Portions the food, and each his portion shares.
The bard an herald guides : the gazing throng
Pay low obeisance as he moves along :
Beneath a sculptur'd arch he sits enthron'd,
The peeps encircling form an awful round.
Then, from the chine, Ulysses carves with art
Delicious food, an honorary part ;
" This, let the master of the lyre receive,
A pledge of love ! 'tis all a wretch can give.
Lives there a man beneath the spacious skies,
Who sacred honours to the bard denies ?
The Muse the bard inspires, exalts his mind ;
The Muse indulgent loves th' harmonious kind."

The herald to his hand the charge conveys,
Not fond of flattery, nor unpleas'd with praise,
When now the rage of hunger was allay'd,

Thus to the lyrist wise Ulysses said :
" Oh more than man ! thy soul the Muse inspires,
Or Phœbus animates with all his fires :

For who, by Phœbus uniform'd could know
The woe of Greece, and sing so well the woe ?
Just to the tale, as present at the fray,
Or taught the labours of the dreadful day !
The song recalls past horrors to my eyes,
And bids proud Ilium from her ashes rise.
Once more harmonious strike the sounding string,
Th' Epean fabric, fram'd by Pallas, sing :
How stern Ulysses, furious to destroy,
With latent heroes sack'd imperial Troy.
If faithful thou record the tale of fame,
The god himself inspires thy breast with flame :
And mine shall be the task, henceforth to raise
In every land, thy monument of praise.
Full of the god, he rais'd his lofty strain,
How the Greeks rush'd tumultuous to the main ;
How blazing tents illum'd half the skies,
While from the shores the winged navy flies :
How ev'n in Ilium's walls, in deathful bands,
Came the stern Greeks by Troy's assisting hands :
All Troy up-heav'd the steed ; of differing mind,
Various the Trojans counsell'd ; part consign'd
The monster to the sword, part sentence gave
To plunge it headlong in the whelming wave ;
Th' unwise prevail, they lodge it in the towens,
An offering sacred to th' immortal powers :
Th' unwise award to lodge it in the walls,
And by the gods' decree proud Ilium falls ;
Destruction enters in the treacherous wood,
And vengeful slaughter, fierce for human blood.

He sung the Greeks stern issuing from the steed,
How Ilium burns, how all her fathers bleed :
How to thy dome, Deiphobus ! attends
The Spartan king : how Ithacus ascends
(Horrid as Mars,) and how with dire alarms
He fights, subdued : for Pallas strings his arms.

Thus while he sung, Ulysses' griefs renew,
Tears bathe his cheeks, and tears the ground
As some fond matron views in mortal fight [bedew :
Her husband falling in his country's right :
Frantic through clashing swords she runs, she flies,
As ghastly pale he groans, and faints, and dies ;
Close to his breast she grovels on the ground,
And bathes with floods of tears the gaping wound ;
She cries, she shrieks ; the fierce insulting foe
Relentless mock her violence of woe :
To chains condemn'd, as wildly she deplores :
A widow, and a slave on foreign shores.

So from the juices of Ulysses' eyes
Fast fell the tears, and sighs succeeded sighs :
Conceal'd he griev'd : the king observ'd alone
The silent tear, and heard the secret groan :
Then to the bard aloud : " O cease to sing,
Dumb be thy voice, and mute the tuneful string :"
To every note his tears responsive flow,
And his great heart heaves with tumultuous woe :
Thy lay too deeply moves : then cease the lay,
And o'er the banquet every heart be gay :
This social right demands : for him the sails,
Floating in air, invite th' impelling gales :
His are the gifts of love : the wise and good
Receive the stranger as a brother's blood.

" But, friend, discover faithful what I crave,
Artful concealment ill becomes the brave :
Say what thy birth, and what the name you bore,
Impos'd by parents in the natal hour ?
(For from the natal hour distinctive names,
One common right, the great and lowly claims :)
Say from what city, from what regions tost,
And what inhabitants those regions boast :

So shalt thou instant reach the realms assign'd,
In wondrous ships self-mov'd, instinct with mind ;
No helm secures their course, no pilot guides,
Like man intelligent, they plough the tides,
Conscious of every coast and every bay,
That lies beneath the Sun's all-seeing ray ;
Though clouds and darknes veil th' encumber'd sky,
Fearless through darkness and through clouds
they fly :

Though tempests rage, though rolls the swelling
maip,

The seas may roll, the tempest rage in vain ;
Ev'n the stern god, that o'er the waves presides,
Safe as they pass, and safe repass the tides,
With fury burns ; while careless they convey
Promiscuous every guest to every bay.

These ears have heard my royal sire disclose
A dreadful story big with future woes,
How Neptune rag'd, and how, by his command,
Firm rooted in a surge a ship should stand
A monument of wrath : how mound on mound
Should bury these proud towers beneath the ground.
But this the gods may frustrate or fulfil,
As suits the purpose of th' eternal will.

But say through what waste regions hast thou
stray'd,

What customs noted, and what coasts survey'd ;
Possess'd by wild barbarians fierce in arms,
Or men, whose bosom tender pity warms ?
Say why the fate of Troy awak'd thy cares,
Why heav'd thy bosom, and why flow'd thy tears ?
Just are the ways of Heaven : from Heaven proceed
The woes of man ; Heaven doom'd the Greeks to bleed ;

A theme of future song ! Say then if slain
Some dear lov'd brother press'd the Phrygian plain ?
Or bled some friend, who bore a brother's part,
And claim'd by merit, not by blood, the heart ?”

THE ODYSSEY,

BOOK IX.

ARGUMENT.

THE ADVENTURES OF THE CICONS, LOTOPHAGI, AND CYCLOPS.

ULYSSES begins the relation of his adventures ; how, after the destruction of Troy, he with his companions made an incursion on the Cicons, by whom they were repulsed ; and meeting with a storm, were driven to the coast of the Lotophagi. From thence they sailed to the land of the Cyclops, whose manners and situation are particularly characterised. The giant Polyphemus and his cave described ; the usage Ulysses and his companions met with there ; and lastly, the method and artifice by which he escaped.

Thus thus Ulysses : “Thou, whom first in sway,
As first in virtue, these thy realms obey ;
How sweet the products of a peaceful reign !
The heaven-taught poet, and enchanting strain ;
The well-fill'd palace, the perpetual feast,
A land rejoicing, and a people blest !

How goodly seems it ever to employ
Man's social days in union and in joy ;
The plenteous board high heap'd with cates divina,
And o'er the foaming bowl the laughing wine !

“ Admit these joys, why seeks thy-mind to know

Th' unhappy series of a wanderer's woe ;
Remembrance sad, whose image to review,
Alas ! must open all my wounds anew !
And, oh ! what first what last shall I relate,
Of woes unnumber'd sent by Heaven and fate !

“ Know first the man (though now a wretch distrest)

Who hopes thee, monarch, for his future guest,
Behold Ulysses ! no ignoble name, [fame,
Earth sounds my wisdom, and high Heaven my

“ My native soil is Ithaca the fair,
Where high Neritus waves his woods in air :
Dulichium, Samè, and Zacynthus crown'd
With shady mountains, spread their isles around (These to the north and night's dark regions run,
Those to Aurora and the rising Sun).

Low lies our isle, yet blest in fruitful stores ;
Strong are her coasts, though rocky are her shores ;
And none, ah ! none so lovely to my sight,
Of all the lands that Heaven o'erspreads with light !

In vain Calypso long constrain'd my stay,
With sweet, reluctant, amorous delay ;
With all her charms as vainly Circe strove,
And added magic, to secure my love,
In pomps or joys, the palace or the grove,
My country's image never was forgot,
My absent parents rose before my sight,
And distant lay contentment and delight,

“ Hear then the woes which mighty Jove
ordain'd

To wait my passage from the Trojan land,
The winds from Ilion to the Ciconas' shore,
Beneath cold Igmars our vessels bore.
We boldly landed on the hostile place,
And sack'd the city, and destroy'd the race,
Their wives made captive, their possessions shar'd,
And every soldier found a like reward.

I then advis'd to fly ; not so the rest,
Who stay'd to revel and prolong the feast :
The fatted sheep and sable bulls they slay,
And bowls flow round, and riot wastes the day,
Meantime the Cicons to their holds retir'd,
Call on the Cicons with new fury fir'd ;
With early morn the gather'd country swarms
And all the continent is bright with arms ;
Thick as the budding leaves or rising flowers
O'erspread the land, when spring descends in showers :

All expert soldiers, skill'd on foot to dare,
Or from the bounding courser urge the war.
Now fortune changes (so the Fates ordain) ;
Our hour was come to taste our share of pain.
Close at the ships the bloody fight began,
Wounded they wound, and man expires on man.
Long as the morning Sun increasing bright
O'er Heaven's pure azure spread the growing
light,

Promiscuous death the form of war confounds,
Each adverse battle gor'd with equal wounds ;
But when his evening wheels o'erhanging the main,
Then conquest crown'd the fierce Ciconian train,
Six brave companions from each ship we lost,
The rest escape in haste, and quit the coast.

With sails outspread we fly th' unequal strife,
Sad for their loss, but joyful of our life,
Yet as we fled our fellows' rites we paid,
And thrice we call'd on each unhappy shade.

"Meanwhile the god whose hand the thunder
forms, [storms!
Drives clouds on clouds, and blackens Heaven with Wide o'er the waste the rage of Boreas sweeps,
And night rush'd headlong on the shaded deeps,
Now here, now there, the giddy ships are borne,
And all the rattling shrouds in fragments torn.
We fur'd the sail, we ply'd the labouring oar,
Took down our masts, and row'd our ships to
shore.

Two tedious days and two long nights we lay,
O'erwatch'd and batter'd in the naked bay.
But the third morning when Aurora brings,
We rear the masts, we spread the canvas wings;
Refresh'd, and careless on the deck reclin'd,
We sit, and trust the pilot and the wind.
Then to my native country had I sail'd:
But the cape doubled, adverse winds prevail'd.
Strong was the tide, which, by the northern blast
Impell'd, our vessels on Cythera cast.
Nine days our fleet th' uncertain tempest bore
Far in wide ocean, and from sight of shore;
The teeth we touch'd, by various errors tost,
The land of Lotos and the flowery coast.
We climb the beach, and springs of water found,
Then spread our hasty banquet on the ground.
Three men were sent deputed from the crew,
(An herald one) the dubious coast to view,
And learn what habitants possess the place.
They went, and found a hospitable race;
Not prone to ill, nor strange to foreign guest,
They eat, they drink, and nature gives the feast;
The trees around them all their fruit produce;
Lotos, the name; divine, nectareous juice!
(Thence call'd Lotophagi) which whose tastes,
Insatiate riots in the sweet repasts,
Nor other home, nor other care intends,
But quits his house, his country, and his friends:
The three we sent, from off th' enchanting ground
We drag'd reluctant, and by force we bound:
The rest in haste forsook the pleasing shore,
Or, the charm tasted, had return'd no more.
Now plac'd in order on their banks, they sweep
The sea's smooth face, and cleave the hoary deep;

With heavy hearts we labour through the tide
To coasts unknown, and oceans yet untry'd.

"The land of Cyclops first; a savage kind,
Nor tam'd by manners, nor by laws confin'd;
Untaught to plant, to turn the glebe and sow;
They all their products to free nature owe.
The soil until'd a ready harvest yields,
With wheat and barley wave the golden fields,
Spontaneous wines from weighty clusters pour,
and Jove descends in each prolific shower.

By these no statutes and no rights are known,
No council held, no monarch fills the throne,
But high on hills, or airy cliffs they dwell,
Or deep in caves whose entrance leads to Hell.
Each rules his race, his neighbour not his care,
Headless of others, to his own severe.

"Oppos'd to the Cyclopean coasts, there lay
An isle, whose hills their subject fields survey;
Its name Lachæa, crown'd with many a grove,
Where savage goats through pathless thickets
rove;

No needy mortals here, with hunger bold,
Or wretched hunters, through the wintery cold
Pursue their flight: but leave them safe to bound
From hill to hill, o'er all the desert ground.
Nor knows the soil to feed the stœcy care,
Or feels the labours of the crooked share;
But unahabited, until'd, unown
It lies, and breeds the bleating goat alone.
For there no vessel with vermilion prote,
Or bark of traffic glides from shore to shore;
The rugged race of savages, unskill'd
The seas to traverse, or the ships to build,
Gaze on the coast, nor cultivate the soil;
Unlearn'd in all th' industrious arts of toil.
Yet here all products and all plants abound,
Sprung from the fruitful genius of the ground;
Fields waving high with heavy crops are seen,
And vines that flourish in eternal green,
Refreshing meads along the murmuring main,
And fountains streaming down the fruitful plain.

"A port there is, enclos'd on either side,
Where ships may rest, unanchor'd and unty'd;
Till the glad mariners incline to sail,
And the sea whitens with the rising gale.
High at its head, from out the cavern'd rock
In living rills a gushing fountain broke:
Around it, and above, for ever green,
The blushing alders form a shady scene.
Hither some favouring god, beyond our thought,
Through all-surrounding shade our navy brought;
For gloomy night descended on the main,
Nor glimmer'd Phœbe in th' ethereal plain:
But all unseen the clouded island lay,
And all unseen the surge and rolling sea,
Till safe we anchor'd in the shelter'd bay:
Our sails we gather'd, cast our cables o'er,
And slept secure along the sandy shore.
Soon as again the rosy morning shone,
Reveal'd the landscape and the scene unknown,
With wonder seiz'd, we view the pleasing ground,
And walk delighted, and expatiate round.
Rous'd by the woodland nymphs, at early dawn,
The mountain goats came bounding o'er the lawn:
In hast our fellows to the ships repair,
For arms and weapons of the sylvan war;
Straight in three squadrons all our crew we part,
And bend the bow, or wing the missile dart;
The bounteous gods afford a copious prey,
And nine fat goats each vessel bears away:
The royal bark had ten. Our ships complete
We thus supply'd (for twelve were all the fleet).

"Here, till the setting Sun roll'd down the light,
We sat indulging in the genial rite:
Nor wines were wanting; those from ample jars
We drain'd, the prize of our Ciconian war.
The land of Cyclops lay in prospect near;
The voice of goats and bleating flocks we hear,
And from their mountains rising smokes appear,
Now sunk the Sun, and darkness cover'd o'er
The face of things: along the sea-beat shore
Satiated we sleep; but when the sacred dawn
Arising glitter'd o'er the dewy lawn,
I call'd my fellows, and these words address:
'My dear associates, here indulge your rest:
While, with my single ship, adventurous I
Go forth, the manners of you men to try;
Whether a race unjust, of barbarous might,
Rude, and unconscious of a stranger's right;
Or such who harbour pity in their breast,
Revere the gods, and succour the distress?'

" This said, I climb'd my vessel's lofty side ;
My train obey'd me, and the ship unt'y'd.
In order seated on their banks, they sweep
Neptune's smooth face, and cleave the yielding
When to the nearest verge of land we drew, [deep
Fast by the sea a lonely cave we view,
High, and with darkening laurels cover'd o'er ;
Where sheep and goats lay slumbering round the shore.

Near this, a fence of marble from the rock,
Brown with o'er-arching pine and spreading oak,
A giant shepherd here his flock maintains
Far from the rest, and solitary reigns,
In shelter thick of horrid shade reclin'd ;
And gloomy mischiefs labour in his mind.
A form enormous ! far unlike the race
Of human birth, in stature, or in face ;
As some lone mountain's monstrous growth he stood,

Crown'd with rough thickets, and a nodding wood.
I left my vessel at the point of land,
And close to guard it, gave our crew command :
With only twelve, the boldest and the best,
I seek th' adventure, and forsake the rest.
Then took a goatskin fill'd with precious wine,
The gift of Maron of Evanthus' line
(The priest of Phoebus at th' Ismarian shrine).
In sacred shade his honour'd mansion stood
Amidst Apollo's consecrated wood ;
Him, and his house, Heaven mov'd my mind to
And costly presents in return he gave ; [save,
Seven golden talents to perfection wrought,
A silver bowl that held a copious draught,
And twelve large vessels of unmingled wine,
Mellifluous, undecaying, and divine !
Which now, some ages from his race conceal'd,
The hoary sire in gratitude reveal'd ;
Such was the wine : to quench whose fervent steam
Scarce twenty measures from the living stream
To cool one cup suffic'd : the goblet crown'd
Breath'd aromatic fragrances around.
Of this an ample vase we heav'd aboard,
And brought another with provisions stor'd.
My soul foreboded I should find the bower
Of some fell monster, fierce with barbarous power,
Some rustic wretch, who liv'd in Heaven's despight,

Containing laws, and trampling on the right.
The cave we found, but vacant all within (His flock the giant tended on the green) :
But round the grot we gaze ; and all the view,
In order rang'd, our admiration drew :
The bending shelves with loads of cheeses prest,
The folded flocks each separate from the rest
(The larger here, and there the lesser lambs,
The new-fall'n young here bleating for their dams ;
The kid distinguish'd from the lambkin lies) :
The cavern echoes with responsive cries.
Capacious chargers all around were laid,
Full pails, and vessels of the milking trade.
With fresh provisions hence our feet to store
My friends advise me, and to quit the shore ;
Or drive a flock of sheep and goats away,
Consult our safety, and put off to sea.
Their wholesome counsel rashly I declin'd,
Curious to view the man of monstrous kind,
And try what social rites a savage lends :
Dire rites, alas ! and fatal to my friends !

" Then first a fire we kindle, and prepare
For his return with sacrifice and prayer.

The loaded shelves afford us full repast ;
We sit expecting. Lo ! he comes at last.
Near half a forest on his back he bore,
And cast the ponderous burden at the door.
It thunder'd as it fell. We trembled then,
And sought the deep recesses of the den.
Now driven before him, through the arching rock,
Came tumbling, heaps on heaps, th' unnumber'd flock :

Big-udder'd ewes, and goats of female kind
(The males were penn'd in outward courts behind) :
Then, heav'd on high, a rock's enormous weight
To the cave's mouth he roll'd and clos'd the gate (Scarce twenty-four wheel'd cars, compact and strong,

The massy load could bear, or roll along).
He next betakes him to his evening cares,
And, sitting down, to milk his flocks prepares ;
Of half their udders eases first the dams,
Then to the mother's teats submits the lambs.
Half the white stream to hardening cheese he
prest,

And high in wicker-baskets heap'd : the rest,
Reserv'd in bowls, supply'd the nightly feast.
His labour done, he fir'd the pile, that gave
A sudden blaze, and lighted all the cave.
We stand discover'd by the rising fires ;
Askance the giant glares, and thus inquires :

" What are ye, guests ; on what a venture, say,
Thus far ye wander through the watery way ?
Pirates perhaps, who seek through seas unknown
The lives of others, and expose your own ?"

" His voice like thunder through the cavern
sounds ;

My bold companions thrilling fear confounds,
Appall'd at sight of more than mortal man !
At length, with heart recover'd, I began :

" From Troy's fam'd fields, and wanderers o'er
the main,

Behold the relics of the Grecian train !
Through various seas by various perils tost,
And forc'd by storms, unwilling, on your coast ;
Far from our destin'd course and native land,
Such was our fate, and such high Jove's command ;

Nor what we are befits us to disclaim,
Atrides' friend's, (in arms a mighty name)
Who taught proud Troy and all her sons to bow ;
Victors of late, but humble suppliants now !
Low at thy knee thy succour we implore ;
Respect us, human, and relieve us, poor.
At least some hospitable gift bestow ;
'Tis what the happy to th' unhappy owe :
'Tis what the gods require : those gods revere,
The poor and stranger are their constant care ;
To Jove their cause, and their revenge belongs,
He wanders with them, and he feels their wrongs.

" Fools that ye are !" (the savage thus replies,
His inward fury blazing at his eyes)
' Or strangers, distant far from our abodes,
To bid me reverence or regard the gods.
Know then, we Cyclops are a race above
Those air-bred people, and their goat-nurs'd Jov's
And learn, our power proceeds with thee and thine,
Not as he wills, but as ourselves incline.
But answer, the good ship that brought ye o'er,
Where lies she anchor'd ? near or off the shore ?"

" Thus he. His meditated fraud I find (Ver'd in the turfs of various human kind) ;

And, cautious, thus: 'Against a dreadful rock,
Past by your shore the gallant vessel broke,
Scarce with these few I scap'd; of all my train,
Whom angry Neptune whelm'd beneath the main;
The scatter'd wreck the winds blew back again.'

"He answer'd with his deed. His bloody hand
snatch'd two, unhappy! of my martial band;
And dash'd like dogs against the stoney floor:
The pavement swims with brains and mingled gore.
Torn limb from limb, he spreads his horrid feast,
And fierce devours it like a mountain-beast:
He sucks the marrow, and the blood he drains,
Nor entrails, flesh, nor solid bone remains.

We see the death from which we cannot move,
And humbled groan beneath the hand of Jove.
His ample maw with human carnage fill'd,
A milky deluge next the giant will'd;
Then stretch'd in length o'er half the cavern'd rock,
Lay senseless, and supine, amidst the flock.

To seize the time, and with a sudden wound
To fix the slumbering monster to the ground,
My soul impels me; and in act I stand
To draw the sword; but wisdom held my hand.

A deed so rash had finish'd all our fate,
No mortal forces from the lofty gate
Could roll the rock. In hopeless grief we lay,
And sigh, expecting the return of day.

Now did the rosy-finger'd morn arise,
And shed her sacred light along the skies.
He wakes, he lights the fire, he milks the dams,
And to the mother's teats submits the lambs.

The task thus finish'd of his morning hours,
Two more he snatches, murders, and devours.
Then pleas'd, and whistling, drives his flock before:
Removes the rocky mountain from the door,
And shuts again: with equal ease dispos'd,
As a light quiver's lid is op'd and clos'd.

His giant voice the echoing region fills:
His flocks, obedient, spread o'er all the hills.

"Thus left behind, ev'n in the last despair
I thought, devis'd, and Pallas heard my prayer.
Revenge, and doubt, and caution work'd my breast;
But this of many counsels seem'd the best:
The monster's club within the cave I spy'd.
A tree of stateliest growth, and yet undry'd,
Green from the wood; of height and bulk so vast,
The largest ship might claim it for a mast.

This shorten'd of its top, I gave my train
A fathom's length, to shape it and to plane;
The narrower end I sharpen'd to a spire;
Whose point we harden'd with the force of fire,
And hid it in the dust that strew'd the cave.
Then to my few companions, bold and brave,
Propos'd, who first the venturous deed should try,
In the broad orbit of his monstrous eye
To plunge the brand, and twirl the pointed wood,
When slumber next should tame the man of blood.

Just as I wish'd, the lots were cast on four:
Myself the fifth. We stand, and wait the hour.
He comes with evening: all his fleecy flock
Before him march, and pour into the rock:
Not one, or male or female stay'd behind
(So fortune chanc'd, or so some god design'd);
Then heaving high the stone's unwieldy weight,
He roll'd it on the cave, and clos'd the gate.

First down he sits, to milk the woolly dams,
And then permits their udder to the lambs.
Next seiz'd two wretches more, and headlong cast,
Brain'd on the rock: his second dire repeat,
Then approach'd him reeking with their gore,

And held the brimming goblet foaming o'er;
'Cyclop! since human flesh has been thy feast,
Now drain this goblet, potent to digest;
Know hence what treasures in our ship we lost,
And what rich liquors other climates boast.
We to thy shore the precious freight shall bear,
If home thou send us, and vouchsafe to spare,
But oh! thus furious, thirsting thus for gore,
The sons of men shall ne'er approach thy shore,
And never shalt thou taste this nectar more.'

"He heard, he took, and, pouring down his throat
Delighted, swill'd the large luxurious draught.
'More! give me more,' he cry'd: 'the boon be thine.

Whoe'er thou art that bear'st celestial wine!
Declare thy name: not mortal is this juice,
Such as th' unblest Cyclopean climes produce
(Though sure our vine the largest cluster yields,
And Jove's scorn'd thunder serves to dranch our
But this descended from the blest abodes, [fields];
A rill of nectar, streaming from the gods.'

"He said, and greedy grasp'd the heady bowl,
Thrice drain'd, and pour'd the deluge on his soul.
His sense lay cover'd with the dozy fume;
While thus my fraudulent speech I re-assume:
'Thy promis'd boon, O Cyclop! now I claim,
And plead my title: Noman is my name.

By that distinguish'd from my tender years,
'Tis what my parents call me, and my peers.'

"The giant then: 'Our promis'd grace receive,
The hospitable boon we mean to give:
When all thy wretched crew have felt my power,
Noman shall be the last I will devour.'

"He said: then nodding with the fumes of wine,
Dropp'd his huge head, and snoring lay supine.
His neck obliquely o'er his shoulders hung,
Press'd with the weight of sleep that tames the strong!

There belch'd the mingled screams of wine and blood,
And human flesh, his indigested food.
Sudden I stir the embers, and inspire
With animating breath the seeds of fire;
Each drooping spirit with bold words repair,
And urge my train the dreadful deed to dare.
The stake now glow'd beneath the burning bed
(Green as it was) and sparkled fiery red.
Then forth the vengeful instrument I bring:
With beating hearts my fellows form a ring.
Urg'd by some present god, they swift let fall
The pointed torment on his visual ball.

Myself above them from a rising ground
Guide the sharp stake, and twirl it round and round.
As when a shipwright stands his workmen o'er,
Who ply the wimble, some huge beam to bore;
Urg'd on all hands, it nimbly spins about,
The grain deep-piercing till it scoops it out:
In his broad eye so whirls the fiery wood;
From the pierc'd pupil spouts the boiling blood;
Sing'd are his brows; the scorching lids grow black;
The jelly bubbles, and the fibres crack.

And as when armourers temper in the ford
The keen-edg'd pole-ax, or the shining sword,
The red-hot metal hives in the lake,
Thus in his eye-ball hiss'd the plunging stake.
He sends a dreadful groan: the rocks around
Through all their inmost winding caves resound.
Scar'd we receded forth, with frantic hand,
He tore, and dash'd on earth the gory brand:
Then calls the Cyclops, all that round him dwell,
With voice like thunder, and a direful yell.

From all their dens the one-ey'd race repair,
From rifted rocks and mountains bleak in air.
All haste assembled, at his well-known roar,
Inquire the cause, and crowd the cavern-door.

“What hurts thee, Polypheme! what strange affright

Thus breaks our slumbers, and disturbs the night?
Does any mortal in th' unguarded hour
Of sleep oppress thee, or by fraud or power?
Or thieves insidious the fair flock surprise?”

Thus they: the Cyclop from his den replies:

“Friends, Noman kills me; Noman in the hour
Of sleep, oppresses me with fraudulent diviner!
If no man hurt thee, but the hand divine
Inflict disease, it fits thee to resign:

To Jove or to thy father Neptune pray,
The brethren cry'd, and instant strode away.

“Joy touch'd my secret soul and conscious
heart,

Pleas'd with th' effect of conduct and of art.
Meantime the Cyclop, raging with his wound,
Spreads his wide arms, and searches round and round:

At last, the stone removing from the gate,
With hands extended in the midst he sate:
And search'd each passing sheep, and felt it o'er,
Secure to seize us ere we reach'd the door
(Such as his shallow wit he deem'd to mine):
But secret I resolv'd the deep design;

'Twas for our lives my labouring bosom wrought;
Each scheme I turn'd, and sharpen'd every thought;
This way and that I cast to save my friends,
Till one resolve my varying counsel ends.

“Strong were the rams, with native purple fair,
Well fed, and largest of the fleecy care.

These three and three, with osier bands we ty'd
(The twining bands the Cyclop's bad supply'd)
The midmost bore a man: the outward two
Secur'd each side: so bound we all the crew.
One ram remain'd, the leader of the flock;
In his deep fleeces my grasping hands I lock,
And fast beneath, in woolly curls involve,
I cling implicit, and confide in Jove.

When rosy morning glimmer'd o'er the dales,
He drove to pasture all the lusty males:
The ewes still folded, with distended thighs
Unmilk'd, lay bleating in distressful cries.
But heedless of those cares, with anguish stung,
He felt their fleeces as they pass'd along,
(Fool that he was) and let them safely go,
All unsuspecting of their freight below.

“The master ram at last approach'd the gate,
Charg'd with his wool, and with Ulysses' fate.
Him while he past the monster blind bespoke:
‘What makes my ram the lag of all the flock?
First thou wert wont to crop the flowery mead,
First to the field and river's bank to lead,
And first with stately step at evening hour
Thy fleecy fellows usher to their bowers.

Now far the last, with pensive pace and slow
Thou mov'st, as conscious of thy master's woe!
Seest thou these lids that now unfold in vain?
(The deed of Noman and his wicked train!)
Oh! didst thou feel for thy afflicted lord,
And wouldst but fate the power of speech afford,
Soon might'st thou tell me, where in secret here
The dastard lurks, all trembling with his fear:
Swung round and round, and dash'd from rock to rock,

His batter'd brains should on the pavement smoke,

No ease, no pleasure, my sad heart received,
While such a monster as vile Noman lives.’
“The giant spoke, and through the hottest rock

Dismiss'd the rath, the father of the flock.
No sooner freed, and through th' enclosure past,
First I release myself, my fellows last:
Fat sheep and goats in throngs we drive before,
And reach our vessel on the winding shore.
With joy the sailors view their friends return'd,
And hail us living whom as dead they mourn'd.
Big tears of transport stand in every eye:
I check their fondness, and command to fly.
Aboard in haste they heave the wealthy sheep,
And snatch their oars, and rush into the deep.

“Now off at sea, and from the shallows clear,
As far as human voice could reach the ear:
With taunts the distant giant I accost:
‘Hear me, O Cyclop! hear, ungracious host!
'Twas on no coward, no ignoble slave,
Thou meditast thy meal in yonder cave;
But one, the vengeance fated from above
Doom'd to inflict: the instrument of Jove.
Thy barbarous breach of hospitable bands,
The god, the god revenges by my hands.’

“The words the Cyclop's burning rage provoke:
From the tall hill he reads a pointed rock,
High o'er the billows flew the massy load,
And near the ship came thundering on the food.
It almost crush'd the helm, and fell before:
The whole sea shook, and reluctant boat the
shore.

The long concussion on the heaving tide
Roll'd back the vessel to the island's side:
Again I shov'd her off, our fate to fly,
Each nerve we stretch, and every oar we ply.
Just 'scap'd impending death, when now again
We twice as far had furrow'd back the main,
Once more I rais'd my voice; my friends afraid
With mild entreaties my design dissuade,
‘What boots the godless giant to provoke,
Whose arms may sink us at a single stroke?
Already, when the dreadful rock he threw,
Old Ocean shook, and back his surges flew,
Thy sounding voice directs his aim again;
The rock o'erwhelms us, and we 'scap'd in vain.’

“But I, of mind elate, and scorning fear,
Thus with new taunts insult the monster's ear.
‘Cyclop! if any, pitying thy disgrace,
Ask who disfigur'd thus that eyeless face?
Say 'twas Ulysses, 'twas his deed, declare,
Laertes' son, of Ithaca the fair;
Ulysses, far in fighting fields renown'd,
Before whose arm Troy tumbled to the ground.’

“Th' astonish'd savage with a roar replies:
‘O Heavens! O faith of ancient prophecies!
This, Telemus Eurymedes foretold,
(The mighty seer who on these hills grew old;
Skill'd the dark fates of mortals to declare,
And learn'd in all wing'd omens of the air)
Long since he menac'd, such was fate's command;
And nam'd Ulysses as the destin'd hand.
I deem'd some godlike giant to behold,
Or lofty hero, haughty, brave, and bold;
Not this weak pigmy-wretch, of mean design,
Who not by strength subdued me, but by wit.
But come, accept our gifts, and join to pray
Great Neptune's blessing on the watery way:
For his I am, and I the lineage own:
Th' immortal father; no less boasts the son.

His power can heal me, and re-light my eye :
And only his, of all the gods on high."

"Oh! could this arm' (I thus aloud rejoind')
'From that vast bulk dislodge thy bloody mind,
And send thee howling to the realms of night!
As sure, as Neptune cannot give thee sight.'

"Thus I: while raging he repeats his cries,
With hands uplifted to the starry skies:
'Hear me, O Neptune! thou whose arms are hurld'
From shore to shore, and gird the solid world.
If thine I am, nor thou my birth disown,
And if th' unhappy Cyclop be thy son;
Let not Ulysses breathe his native air,
Laertes' son, of Ithaca the fair.

"If to review his country be his fate,
Be it through toils and sufferings long and late;
His lost companions let him first deplore;
Some vessel, not his own, transport him o'er;
And when at home from foreign sufferings freed,
More near and deep, domestic woes succeed!"

"With imprecations thus he fill'd the air,
And angry Neptune heard th' unrighteous prayer.
A larger rock then heaving from the plain;
He whist'ld it round: it sung across the main:
It fell, and brush'd the stern: the billows roar,
Shake at the weight, and resolute beat the shore.
With all our force we kept aloof to sea,
And gain'd the island where our vessels lay.
Our sight the whole collected navy cheer'd,
Who, waiting long, by turns had hop'd and fear'd.
There disembarking on the green sea-side,
We land our cattle, and the spoil divide:
Of these due shares to every sailor fall;
The master ram was voted mine by all:
And him (the guardian of Ulysses' fate)
With pious mind to Heaven I consecrate.
But the great god, whose thunder rends the skies,
Averse, beholds the smoking sacrifice;
And sees me wandering still from coast to coast,
And all my vessels, all my people, lost!
While thoughtless we indulge the genial rite,
As plenteous cates and flowing bowls invite;
Till evening Phœbus roll'd away the light:
Stretch'd on the shore in careless ease we rest,
Till ruddy morning purpl'd o'er the east;
Then from their anchors all our ships unbind,
And mount the decks, and call the willing wind.
Now, rang'd in order on our banks, we sweep
With hasty strokes the hoarse resounding deep;
Blind to the future, pensive with our fears,
Glad for the living, for the dead in tears."

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK X.

ARGUMENT.

ADVENTURES WITH ÆOLUS, THE LESTRIGONS, AND CIRCÆ.

Ulysses arrives at the island of Æolus, who gives him prosperous winds, and encloses the adverse ones in a bag, which his companions untying, they are driven back again, and rejected. Then they sail to the Lestrigons, where they lose eleven ships, and, with one only remaining, proceed to the island of Circe. Eurylochus is sent first with some companions, all which except Eurylochus, are transformed into swine. Ulysses then undertakes the adventure, and, by the help of Mercury, who gives him the herb moly, overcomes the enchantress, and procures the restoration of his men. After a year's stay with her, he prepares at her instigation for his voyage to the infernal shades.

"At length we reach'd Æolia's sea-girt shore
Where great Hippotades the sceptre bore,
A floating isle! High rais'd by toil divine,
Strong walls of brass the rocky coast confine.
Six blooming youths, in private grandeur bred,
And six fair daughters grac'd the royal bed:
These sons their sisters wed, and all remain
Their parents' pride, and pleasure of their reign.
All day they feast, all day the bowls flow round,
And joy and music through the isle resound:
At night each pair on splendid carpets lay,
And crown'd with love the pleasures of the day.
This happy port affords our wandering fleet
A month's reception, and a safe retreat.
Full oft the monarch urg'd me to relate
The fall of Ilion, and the Grecian fate;
Full oft I told: at length for parting mov'd;
The king with mighty gifts my suit approv'd.
The adverse winds in leathern bags he brauc'd,
Compress'd their force, and lock'd each struggling blast:

For him the mighty sire of gods assign'd
The tempest's lord, the tyrant of the wind;
His word alone the listening storms obey,
To smooth the deep, or swell the foamy sea.
These in my hollow ship the monarch hung,
Securely fetter'd by a silver thong;
But Zephyrus exempt, with friendly gales
He charg'd to fill, and guide the swelling sails:
Rare gift! but oh, what gift to fools avail!

"Nine prosperous days we ply'd the labouring
oar;

The tenth presents our welcome native shore:
The hills display the beacon's friendly light,
And rising mountains gain upon our sight.
Then first my eyes, by watchful toils oppress,
Comply'd to take the balmy gifts of rest;
Then first my hands did from the rudder part
(So much the love of home possess'd my heart);
When, lo! on board a fond debate arose;
What rare device those vessels might enclose?
What sum, what prize from Æolus I brought?
Whilst to his neighbour each express'd his thought:
"Say, whence, ye gods, contending nations strive,
Who most shall please, who most our hero give?
Long have his coffers groan'd with Trojan spoils;
Whilst we, the wretched partners of his toils,
Reproach'd by want, our fruitless labours mourn
And only rich in barren fame return.

Now Æolus, ye see, augments his store:
But come, my friends, these mystic gifts explore."
They said: and (oh curst fate) the thongs unbound:
The gushing tempest sweeps the ocean round;
Snatch'd in the whirl, the hurry'd navy flew,
The ocean widen'd, and the shores withdrew.
Rous'd from my fatal sleep, I long debate
If still to live, or desperate plunge to fate:
Thus, doubting, prostrate on the deck I lay,
Till all the coward thoughts of death gave way.

" Meanwhile our vessels plough the liquid plain,
And soon his known Æolian coast regain,
Our groans the rocks remurmur'd to the main.
We leap'd on shore, and with a scanty feast
Our thirst and hunger hastily repress'd;
That done, two chosen herakls straight attend
Our second progress to my royal friend:
And him amidst his jovial songs we found;
The banquet steaming, and the goblets crown'd:
There humbly stopp'd with conscious shame and awe,

Nor nearer than the gate presum'd to draw.
But soon his sons their well-known guest descri'd,
And, starting from their couches, loudly cry'd:
' Ulysses here! what demon could'st thou meet
To thwart thy passage, and repel thy fleet?
Wast thou not furnish'd by our choicest care
For Greece, for home, and all thy soul held dear!
Thus they: in silence long my fate I mourn'd,
At length these words with accent low return'd:
' Me, lock'd in sleep, my faithless crew bereft
Of all the blessings of your godlike gift!
But grant, oh grant, our loss we may retrieve!
A favour you, and you alone, can give.'

" Thus I with art to move their pity try'd,
And touch'd the youths; but their stern sirs
reply'd:

' Woe wretch, begone! this instant I command
Thy fleet returns'd to leave our hallow'd land.
His baneful... pollutes these bless'd abodes,
Whose fate proclaims him hateful to the gods.'

" Thus fierce he said: we sighing went our way,
And with desponding hearts put off to sea.
The sailors, spent with toils, their folly mourn,
But mourn in vain; no prospect of return.
Six days and nights a doubtful course we steer,
The next proud Lamos' stately towers appear,
And Læstrigonia's gates arise distinct in air.
The shepherd, quitting here at night the plain,
Calls, to succeed his cares, the watchful swain;
But he that scorns the chains of sleep to wear,
And adds the herdsman's to the shepherd's care,
So near the pastures, and so short the way,
His double toils may claim a double pay,
And join the labours of the night and day.

" Within a long recess a bay there lies,
Edg'd round with cliffs, high pointing to the skies:
The jutting shores that swell on either side
Contract its mouth, and break the rushing tide.
Our eager sailors seize the fair retreat,
And bound within the port their crowded fleet;
For here retir'd the sinking billows sleep,
And smiling calmness silver'd o'er the deep.
I only in the bay refus'd to moor,

And fix'd, without, my halbers to the shore. [bro
" From thence we climb'd a point, whose airy
Commands the prospect of the plains below:
No tracts of beasts, or signs of men, we found,
But smoky volumes rolling from the ground.
Two with our herald thither we command,
With speed to learn what men possess'd the land.
They went, and kept the wheel's smooth beaten road,

Which to the city drew the mountain wood;
When lo! they met, beside a crystal spring,
The daughter of Antiphates the king;
She to Artacia's silver streams come down
(Artacia's streams alone supply the town):
The damsels they approach'd, and ask'd what race
The people were? who monarch of the place?

With joy the maid th' unwary strangers heard,
And show'd them where the royal dome appear'd.
They went; but, as they entering saw the queen
Of size enormous, and terrific mien,
(Not yielding to some bulky mountain's height)
A sudden horror struck their aching sight.
Swift, at her call, her husband accur'd away,
To wreak his hunger on the destin'd prey;
One for his food the raging glutton slew,
But two rush'd out, and to the navy flew.

Balk'd of his prey, the yelling monster flies,
And fills the city with his hideous cries;
A ghastly band of giants hear the roar,
And, pouring down the mountains, crowd the shore.
Fragments they rend from off the craggy brow,
And dash the ruins on the ships below:
The crackling vessels burst; hoarse groans arise,
And mingled horrors echo to the skies;
The men, like fish, they stuck upon the food,
And cram'm'd their filthy throats with human food.
Whilst thus their fury rages at the bay,
My sword our cables cut, I call'd to weigh;
And charg'd my men, as they from fate would fly,
Each nerve to strain, each bending oar to ply.
The sailors catch the word, their oars they seize,
And sweep with equal strokes the smoky seas:
Clear of the rocks th' impatient vessel flies;
Whilst in the port each wretch encumber'd dies.
With earnest haste my frightened sailors press,
While kindling transports glow'd at our success;
But the sad fate that did our friends destroy
Cool'd every breast, and damp'd the rising joy.

" Now dropp'd our anchors in th' Ægean bay,
Where Circe dwelt, the daughter of the day;
Her mother Persè, of old Ocean's strain,
Thus from the Sun descended and the Main
(From the same lineage stern Æetes came,
The far-fam'd brother of th' enchantress dame);
Goddess, and queen, to whom the powers belong
Of dreadful magic, and commanding song.
Some god directing, to this peaceful bay
Silent we came, and melancholy lay,
Spent and o'erwatch'd. Two days and nights roll'd on,

And now the third succeeding morning shone
I climb'd a cliff, with spear and sword in hand,
Whose ridge o'erlook'd a shady length of land:
To learn if aught of mortal works appear,
Or cheerful voice of mortal strike the ear.
From the high point I mark'd, in distant view,
A stream of curling smoke ascending blue,
And spiry tops, the tufted trees above,
Of Circe's palace bosom'd in the grove.

" Thither to haste, the region to explore,
Was first my thought: but, speeding back to shore,
I deem'd it bert to visit first my crew,
And send out spies the dubious coast to view.
As down the hill I solitary go,
Some power divine, who pities human woe,
Sent a tall stag, descending from the wood,
To cool his fervour in the crystal flood;
Luxuriant on the wave-worn bank he lay,
Stretch'd forth, and panting in the sunny ray.
I lanch'd my spear, and with a sudden wound
Transpierc'd his back, and fix'd him to the ground.
He falls, and mourns his fate with human cries:
Through the wide wound the vital spirit flies.
I drew, and casting on the river's side
The bloody spear, his gather'd feet I try'd
With twining osiers, which the bank supplied

An ell in length the pliant whisp I weav'd,
And the huge body on my shoulders heav'd:
Then, leaning on my spear with both my hands,
Up-bore my load, and press'd the sinking sands
With weighty steps, till at the ship I threw
The welcome burthen, and bespoke my crew:

"Cheer up, my friends! it is not yet our fate
To glide with ghosts through Pluto's gloomy gate.
Food in the desert land, behold! is given;
Live, and enjoy the providence of Heaven."

"The joyful crew survey his mighty size,
And on the future banquet feast their eyes,
As huge in length extended lay the beast;
Then wash their hands, and hasten to the feast.
There, till the setting Sun roll'd down the light,
They sat indulging in the genial rite.

When evening rose, and darkness cover'd o'er
The face of things, we slept along the shore.
But when the rosy morning warm'd the east,
My men I summon'd, and these words address:

"Followers and friends! attend what I propose:
Ye sad companions of Ulysses' woes!

We know not here what land before us lies,
Or to what quarter now we turn our eyes,
Or where the Sun shall set, or where shall rise.
Here let us think (if thinking be not vain)
If any counsel, any hope remain.

Alas! from yonder promontory's brow,
I view'd the coast, a region flat and low;
An isle encircled with the boundless flood,
A length of thickets, and entangled wood.
Some smoke I saw amid the forests rise,
And all around it only seas and skies!

"With broken hearts my sad companions stood,
Mindful of Cyclop and his human food,
And horrid Læstrigons, the men of blood.

Pressing tears apace began to rain;
But tears in mortal miseries are vain.
In equal parts I straight divide my band,
And name a chief each party to command;
I led the one, and of the other side
Appointed brave Eurylochus the guide.

Then in the brazen helm the lots we throw,
And Fortune casts Eurylochus to go.
He march'd, with twice eleven in his train:
Pensive they march, and pensive we remain.

"The palace in a woody vale they found,
High rais'd of stone; a shaded space around:
Where mountain wolves and brindled lions roam,
(By magic tam'd) familiar to the dome.

With gentle blandishment our men they meet,
And wag their tails, and fawning lick their feet.
As from some feast a man returning late,
His faithful dogs all meet him at the gate,
Rejoicing round, some morsel to receive (Such as the good man e'er us'd to give).

Domestic thus the grisly beasts drew near;
They gaze with wonder, not unmix'd with fear.
Now on the threshold of the dome they stood,
And heard a voice resounding through the wood:
Hæc'd at her loom within, the goddess sung;
The vaulted roofs and solid pavement rung.
O'er the fair web the rising figures shine,
Immortal labour! worthy hands divine.

Polites to the rest the question mov'd:
(A gallant leader, and a man I lov'd):
"What voice celestial, chanting to the loom
(Or nymph, or goddess) echoes from the room?
Say, shall we seek access? With that they call;
And wide unfold the portals of the hall.

"The goddess, rising, asks her guests to stay,
Who blindly follow where she leads the way.
Eurylochus alone, of all the band,
Suspecting fraud, more prudently remain'd:
On thrones around with downy coverings grac'd,
With semblance fair, th' unhappy men she plac'd.
Milk newly press'd, the sacred flour of wheat,
And honey fresh, and Pramnian wittes the treat:
But venom'd was the bread, and mix'd the bowl,
With drugs of force to darken all the soul:
Soon in the luscious feast themselves they lost,
And drank oblivion of their native coast.
Instant her circling waud the goddess waves,
To hogs transforms them, and the sty receives.
No more was seen the human form divine;
Head, face, and members, bristle into swine:
Still curs'd with sense, th'ir minds remain alone,
And their own voice affrights them when they groan.

Meanwhile the goddess in disdain bestows
The mast and acorn, brutal food! and strows
The fruits of cornel, as their feast, around;
Now prone and groveling on unsavory ground.

"Eurylochus, with pensive steps and slow,
Aghast returns; the messenger of woe,
And bitter fate. To speak he made essay,
In vain essay'd, nor would his tongue obey,
His swelling heart deny'd the words their way:
But speaking tears the want of words supply,
And the full soul bursts copious from his eye.
Affrighted, anxious for our fellows' fates,
We press to hear what sadly he relates:

"We went, Ulysses! (such was thy command)
Through the lone thicket and the desert land.
A palace in a woody vale we found
Brown with dark forests, and with shades around.
A voice celestial echoed from the dome,
Or nymph, or goddess, chanting to the loom.
Access we sought, nor was access denied:
Radiant she came; the portals open'd wide:
The goddess mild invites the guests to stay:
They blindly follow where she leads the way.
I only wait behind, of all the train;
I waited long, and ey'd the doors in vain:
The rest are vanish'd, none repress'd the gate;
And not a man appears to tell their fate."

"I heard, and instant o'er my shoulders flung
The belt, in which my weighty falchion hung
(A beamy blade); then seiz'd the bended bow,
And bade him guide the way, resolv'd to go.
He, prostrate falling, with both hands embrac'd
My knees, and, weeping, thus his suit address'd:

"O king! belov'd of Jove! thy servant spare,
And ah, thyself, the rash attempt forbear!
Never, alas! thou never shalt return,
Or see the wretched, for whose loss we mourn.
With what remains from certain ruin fly,
And save the few not fated yet to die."

"I answer'd stern: 'Inglorious then remain,
Here feast and loiter, and desert thy train.
Alone, unfriended, will I tempt my way;
The laws of fate compel, and I obey.'

"This said, and scornful turning from the shore
My haughty step, I stalk'd the valley o'er:
Till now approaching nigh the magic bower,
Where dwelt th' enchantress skill'd in herbs of
A form divine forth issued from the wood, [power.
(Immortal Hermes with the golden rod)
In human semblance. On his bloomy face
Youth smil'd celestial, with each opening grace.

He seiz'd my hand, and gracious thus began:
 ' Ah! whither roam'st thou, much-enduring man?
 Oh, blind to fate! what led thy steps to rove
 The horrid mazes of this magic grove!
 Each friend you seek in yon enclosure lies,
 All lost their form, and habitants of sties.
 Think'st thou by wit to model their escape?
 Sooner shalt thou, a stranger to thy shape,
 Fall prone their equal: first thy danger know,
 Then take the antidote the gods bestow.
 The plant I give, through all the direful bowser
 Shall guard thee, and avert the evil hour.
 Now hear her wicked arts. Before thy eyes
 The bowl shall sparkle, and the banquet rise;
 Take this, nor from the faithless feast abstain,
 For temper'd drugs and poisons shall be vain.
 Soon as she strikes her wand, and gives the word,
 Draw forth and brandish thy refulgent sword,
 And menace death: those menaces shall move
 Her alter'd mind to blandishment and love,
 Nor shun the blessing proffer'd to thy arms,
 Ascend her bed, and taste celestial charms:
 So shall thy tedious toils a respite find,
 And thy lost friends return to human-kind.
 But swear her first by those dread oaths that tie
 The powers below, the blessed in the sky;
 Lest to thee naked secret fraud be meant,
 Or magic bind thee cold and impotent.' [drew,

" Thus, while he spoke, the sovereign plant he
 Where on th' all-bearing Earth unmark'd it grew,
 And show'd its nature and its wondrous power:
 Black was the root, but milky-white the flower;
 Moly the name, to mortals hard to find,
 But all is easy to th' ethereal kind.
 This Hermes gave; then, gliding off the glade,
 Shot to Olympus from the woodland shade.

" While, full of thought, revolving fates to come,
 I speed my passage to th' enchanted dome:
 Arriv'd, before the lofty gates I stay'd;
 The lofty gates the goddess wide display'd;
 She leads before, and to the feast invites:
 I follow sadly to the magic rites.
 Radiant with starry studs, a silver seat
 Receiv'd my limbs; a footstool eas'd my feet.
 She mix'd the potion, fraudulent of soul;
 The poison mantled in the golden bowl.
 I took, and quaff'd it, confident in Heaven:
 Then wav'd the wand, and then the word was given.
 ' Hence to thy fellows!' (dreadful she began)
 ' Go, be a beast!'—I heard, and yet was man.

" Then sudden whirling, like a waving flame,
 My beamy falchion, I assault the dame.
 Struck with unusual fear, she trembling cries,
 She faints, she falls; she lifts her weeping eyes.

" What art thou? say! from whence, from whom you came?

Oh, more than human! tell thy race, thy name.
 Amazing strength these poisons to sustain!
 Nor mortal thou, nor mortal is thy brain.
 Or art thou he? the man to come (foretold
 By Hermes powerful with the wand of gold)
 The man from Troy, who wander'd ocean round;
 The man for wisdom's various arts renown'd,
 Ulysses? Oh, thy threatening fury cease,
 Sheath thy bright sword, and join our hands in
 peace;

Let mutual joys our mutual trust combine,
 And love, and love-born confidence, be thine.'

" And how, dread Circe! (furious I rejoin)
 ' Cease love, and love-born confidence, be mine!

Beneath thy charms when my companions groan,
 Transform'd to beasts, with accents not their own.
 O thou of fraudulent heart! shall I be led
 To share thy feast-rites, or ascend thy bed:
 That, all unarm'd, thy vengeance may have vent,
 And magic bind me, cold and impotent!
 Celestial as thou art, yet stand denied;
 Or swear that oath by which the gods are tied,
 Swear, in thy soul no latent frauds remain,
 Swear by the vow which never can be vain.'

" The goddess swore: then seiz'd my hand, and
 To the sweet transports of the genial bed. [led Ministrant to their queen, with busy care
 Four faithful handmaids the soft rites prepare;
 Nymphs sprung from fountains, or from shady
 Or the fair offspring of the sacred floods. [woods,
 One o'er the couches painted carpets threw,
 Whose purple lustre glow'd against the view:
 White linen lay beneath. Another plac'd
 The silver stands with golden flasks grac'd:
 With dulcet beverage this the beaker crown'd,
 Fair in the midst, with gilded cups around:
 That in the tripod o'er the kindled pile
 The water pours; the bubbling waters boil:
 An ample vase receives the smoking wave;
 And, in the bath prepar'd, my limbs I lave:
 Reviving sweets repair the mind's decay,
 And take the painful sense of toil away.

A vest and tunic o'er me next she threw,
 Fresh from the bath, and dropping balmy dew;
 Then lod and plac'd me on the sovereign seat,
 With carpets spread; a footstool at my feet.
 The golden ewer a nymph obsequious brings,
 Replenish'd from the cool translucent springs:
 With copious water the bright vase supplies
 A silver laver of capacious size.

I wash'd. The table in fair order spread,
 They heap the glittering canisters with bread:
 Viands of various kinds allure the taste,
 Of choicest sort and savour, rich repast!
 Circe in vain invites the feast to share;
 Absent I ponder, and absorb in care:
 While scenes of woe rose anxious in my breast,
 The queen beheld me, and those words address:

" Why sits Ulysses silent and apart,
 Some hoard of grief close-harbour'd at his heart?
 Untouch'd before these stand the cates divine,
 And unregarded laughs the rosy wine.
 Can yet a doubt or any dread remain,
 When sworn that oath which never can be vain?"

" I answer'd: ' Goddess! human is thy breast,
 By justice sway'd, by tender pity prest:
 Ill fits it me, whose friends are sunk to beasts,
 To quaff thy bowls; or riot in thy feasts.
 Me would'st thou please? for them thy cares end
 And them to me restore, and me to joy.' [pity,

" With that she parted: in her potent hand
 She bore the virtue of the magic wand.
 Then hastening to the sties, set wide the door,
 Urg'd forth, and drove the bristly herd before;
 Unwieldy, out they rush'd with general cry,
 Enormous beasts dishonest to the eye.
 Now touch'd by counter charms, they change again,
 And stand majestic, and recall'd to men.
 Those hairs, of late that bristled every part,
 Fall off, miraculous effect of art!
 Till all the form in full proportion rise,
 More young, more large, more graceful to my eyes.
 They saw, they knew me, and with eager pace
 Clung to their master in a long embrace:

Sad, pleasing sight! with tears each eye ran o'er,
And joys of joy re-echo'd through the bower:
E'en Circe wept, her adamantine heart
Felt pity enter, and sustain'd her part.

" Son of Laertes!" (then the queen began)
' Oh much-enduring, much-experienc'd man!
Haste to thy vessel on the sea-beat shore,
Unload thy treasures, and the galley moor:
Then bring thy friends, secure from future harms,
And in our grottoes stow thy spoils and arms.'

" She said: obedient to her high command,
I quit the place, and hasten to the strand.
My sad companions on the beach I found,
Their wistful eyes in floods of sorrow drown'd.
As from fresh pastures and the dewy field
(When loaded cribs their evening banquet yield)
The lowing herds return; around them throng,
With leaps and bounds, their late-imprison'd
young,

Rush to their mothers with unruly joy,
And echoing hills return the tender cry:
So round me press'd, exulting at my sight,
With cries and agonies of wild delight,
The weeping sailors; nor less fierce their joy
Than if return'd to Ithaca from Troy.

' Ah, master! ever honour'd, ever dear!
(These tender words on every side I hear)
' What other joy can equal thy return?

Not that lov'd country for whose sight we mourn!
The soil that nurs'd us, and that gave us breath:
But, ah! relate our lost companions' death.'

" I answer'd cheerful: 'Haste, your galley moor,
And bring our treasures and our arms ashore:
Those in yon hollow caverns let us lay;
Then rise, and follow where I lead the way.

Your fellows five: believe your eyes, and come
To taste the joys of Circe's sacred dome.'

" With ready speed the joyful crew obey:
None Eurylochus persuades their stay.

' Whither,' he cry'd, 'ah! whither will ye run?
Seek ye to meet those evils ye should shun?
Will you the terrors of the dome explore,
In swine to grovel, or in lions roar,
Or wolf-like howl away the midnight hour
In dreadful watch around the magic bower?
Remember Cyclop, and his bloody deed;
The leader's rashness made the soldiers bleed.'

" I heard incess'd, and first resolv'd to speed
My flying Eubojan at the rebel's head.

Dear as he was, by ties of kindred bound,
This hand had stretch'd him breathless on the
ground.

But all at once my interposing train
For mercy pleaded, nor could plead in vain.
' Leave hence the man who dares his prince desert,
Leave to repentance and his own sad heart,
To guard the ship. Seek we the sacred shades
Of Circe's palace, where Ulysses leads.'

" Thus with one voice declar'd, the rising train
Left the black vessel by the murmuring main.
Shame touch'd Eurylochus's alter'd breast,
He fear'd my threats, and follow'd with the rest.

" Meanwhile the goddess, with indulgent cares
And social joys, the late-transform'd repairs;
The bath, the feast, their fainting soul renews;
Rich in refulgent robes, and dropping balmy dews:
Brightening with joy their eager eyes behold.
Each other's face, and each his story told;
Then gushing tears the narrative confound,
And with their sobs the vaulted roofs resound.

When hush'd their passion, thus the goddess cries:

' Ulysses, taught by labours to be wise,
Let this short memory of grief suffice.
To me are known the various woes ye bore,
In storms by sea, in perils on the shore;
Forget whatever was in Fortune's power,
And share the pleasures of this genial hour.
Such be your minds as ere ye left your coast,
Or learn'd to sorrow for a country lost.
Exiles and wanderers now, where-e'er ye go
Too faithful memory renews your woe;
The cause remov'd, habitual griefs remain,
And the soul saddens by the use of pain.'

" Her kind entreaty mov'd the general breast;
Tir'd with long toil, we willing sunk to rest.
We ply'd the banquet, and the bowl we crown'd,
Till the full circle of the year came round.
But when the seasons, following in their train,
Brought back the months, the days, and hours
again:

As from a lethargy at once they rise,
And urge their chief with animating cries:

" ' Is this, Ulysses, our inglorious lot?
And is the name of Ithaca forgot?

Shall never the dear land in prospect rise,
Or the lov'd palace glitter in our eyes?"

" Melting I heard; yet till the Sun's decline
Prolong'd the feast, and quaff'd the rosy wine;

But when the shades came on at evening hour,
And all lay slumbering in the dusky bower;

I came a suppliant to fair Circe's bed,
The tender moment seiz'd, and thus I said:

" Be mindful, goddess, of thy promise made;
Must sad Ulysses ever be delay'd?

Around their lord my sad companions mourn,
Each breast beats homeward, anxious to return:

If but a moment parted from thy eyes,
Their tears flow round me, and my heart compiles.'

" Go then," (she cry'd) ' ah, go! yet think, not I,
Not Circe, but the Fates, your wish deny.

Ah, hope not yet to breathe thy native air!
Far other journey first demands thy care;

To tread th' uncomfortable paths beneath,
And view the realms of darkness and of death.

' There seek the Theban bard, depriv'd of sight;
Within, irradiate with prophetic light;

To whom Persephone, entire and whole,
Gave to retain th' unseparated soul:

The rest are forms, of empty ether made;
Impassive semblance, and a fitting shade.'

" Struck at the word, my very heart was dead:
Pensive I sat; my tears bedew'd the bed;

To hate the light and life my soul begun,
And saw that all was grief beneath the Sun.

Compos'd at length, the gushing tears suppress,
And my tost limbs now weary'd into rest:

' How shall I tread,' (I cry'd) ' ah, Circe! say
The dark descent, and who shall guide the way?

Can living eyes behold the realms below?
What bark to waft me, and what wind to blow?"

" ' Thy fated road,' (the magic power reply'd)
' Divine Ulysses! asks no mortal guide.

Rear but the mast, the spacious sail display,
The northern winds shall wing thee on thy way.

Soon shalt thou reach old Ocean's utmost ends,
Where to the main the shelving shote descends;

The barren trees of Proserpine's black woods,
Poplars and willows trembling o'er the floods:

There fix thy vessel in the lonely bay,
And enter there the kingdoms void of day:

Where Phlegeton's loud torrents, rushing down,
 His in the flaming gulph of Acheron;
 And where, slow-rolling from the Stygian bed,
 Cocytus' lamentable waters spread:
 Where the dark rocks o'erhang th' infernal lake,
 And mingling streams eternal murmurs make.
 First draw thy falchion, and on every side
 Trench the black earth a cubit long and wide:
 To all the shades around libations pour,
 And o'er th' ingredients strow the hallow'd flour:
 New wine and milk, with honey temper'd, bring;
 And living waters from the crystal spring.
 Then the wan shades and feeble ghosts implore,
 With promis'd offerings on thy native shore;
 A barren cow, the stateliest of the isle,
 And heap'd with various wealth, a blazing pile:
 These to the rest; but to the seer must bleed
 A sable ram, the pride of all thy breed.
 These solemn vows and holy off'ring paid
 To all the phantom-nations of the dead;
 Be next thy care the sable sheep to place
 Full o'er the pit, and Hell-ward turn their face:
 But from th' infernal rite thine eye withdraw,
 And back to Ocean glance with reverend awe,
 Sudden shall skim along the dusky glades
 Thin airy shoals, and visionary shades.
 Then give command the sacrifice to haste,
 Let the slay'd victims in the flame be cast,
 And sacred vows and mystic song apply'd
 To grisly Pluto and his gloomy bride.
 Wide o'er the pool, thy falchion wav'd around
 Shall drive the spectres from forbidden ground:
 The sacred draught shall all the dead forbear,
 Till awful from the shades arise the seer.
 Let him, oracular, the end, the way,
 The turns of all thy future fate, display,
 Thy pilgrimage to come, and remnant of thy
 So speaking, from the ruddy orient shone [day.
 The morn, conspicuous on her golden throne,
 The goddess with a radiant tunic dress'd
 My limbs, and o'er me cast a silken vest.
 Long flowing robes of purest white array
 The nymph that added lustre to the day:
 A tier wreath'd her head with many a fold;
 Her waist was circled with a zone of gold.
 Forth issuing then, from place to place I flew;
 Rouse man by man, and animate my crew.
 ' Rise, rise, my mates! 'tis Circe gives command:
 Our journey calls us; haste, and quit the land,
 All rise and follow, yet depart not all,
 For fate decreed one wretched man to fall.
 " A youth there was, Elpenor was he nam'd,
 Not much for sense, nor much for courage, fam'd:
 The youngest of our band, a vulgar soul,
 Born but to banquet, and to drain the bowl,
 He, hot and careless, on a turret's height
 With sleep repair'd the long debauch of night;
 The sudden tumult stirr'd him where he lay,
 And down he haster'd, but forgot the way;
 Full enrag'd from the roof the sleeper fell,
 And snapp'd the spinal joint, and wak'd in Hell.
 " The rest crowd round me with an eager look;
 I met them with a sigh, and thus bespoke:
 ' Alas, friends! ye think your toils are o'er,
 Your hopes already touch your native shore;
 Alas! far otherwise the nymph declares.
 Far other journey first demands our cares;
 To tread th' uncomfortable paths beneath,
 The dreary realms of darkness and of death:

To seek Tiresias' awful shade below,
 And thence our fortunes and our fates to know.'
 " My sad companions heard in deep despair;
 Frantic they tore their manly growth of hair;
 To earth they fell; the tears began to rain;
 But tears in mortal miseries are vain.
 Sadly they far'd along the sea-beat shore;
 Still heav'd their hearts, and still their eyes ran o'er.
 The ready victims at our bark we found,
 The sable ewe and ram, together bound,
 For swift as thought the goddess had been there,
 And thence had glided viewless as the air:
 The paths of gods what mortal can survey?
 Who eyes their motion? who shall trace their way?"

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XI.

ARGUMENT.

THE DESCENT INTO HELL.

ULYSSES continues his narration, How he arrived at the land of the Cimmerians, and what ceremonies he performed to invoke the dead. The manner of his descent, and the apparition of the shades: his conversation with Elpenor, and with Tiresias, who informs him in a prophetic manner of his fortunes to come. He meets his mother Anticlea, from whom he learns the state of his family. He sees the shades of the ancient heroes, afterwards of the heroes, and converses in particular with Agamemnon and Achilles. Ajax keeps at a sullen distance, and disdains to answer him. He then beholds Tityus, Tantalus, Sisyphus, Hercules; till he is deterred from further curiosity by the apparition of horrid spectres, and the cries of the wicked in torment.

" Now to the shores we bend, a mournful train,
 Climb the tall bark, and lanch into the main:
 At once the mast we rear, at once unbind
 The spacious sheet, and stretch it to the wind:
 Then pale and pensive stand, with cares oppress,
 And solemn horror saddens every breast.
 A freshening breeze the magic power¹ supplied,
 While the wing'd vessel flew along the tide;
 Our oars we shipp'd: all day the swelling sails
 Full from the guiding pilot catch'd the gales.
 " Now sunk the Sun from his aerial height,
 And o'er the shaded billows wash'd the night:
 When, lo! we reach'd old Ocean's utmost bounds,
 Where rocks control his waves with ever-during mounds.
 " There in a lonely land, and gloomy cells,
 The dusky nation of Cimmeria dwells;
 The Sun ne'er views th' uncomfortable seats,
 When radiant he advances, or retreats:
 Unhappy race! whom endless night invades,
 Clouds the dull air, and wraps them round in shades.
 " The ship we moor on these obscure abodes;
 Dishark the sheep, an offering to the gods;

1 Circe.

And, hell-ward bending, o'er the beach descry
The doloseome passage to th' infernal sky.
The victims, vow'd to each Tartarean power,
Eurylochus and Perimedes bore.

"Here open'd Hell, all Hell I here implor'd,
And from the scabbard drew the shining sword;
And, trenching the black earth on every side,
A cavern form'd, a cubit long and wide.
New wine, with honey-temper'd milk, we bring,
Then living waters from the crystal spring;
O'er these was strew'd the consecrated flour,
And on the surface shone the holy store.

"Now the wan shades we hail, th' infernal gods,
To speed our course, and waft us o'er the floods:
So shall a barren heifer from the stall
Beneath the knife upon your altars fall;
So in our palace, at our safe return,
Rich with unnumber'd gifts the pile shall burn;
So shall a ram the largest of the breed,
Black as these regions, to Tiresias bleed.

"Thus solemn rites and holy vows we paid
To all the phantom-nations of the dead,
Then dy'd the sheep; a purple torrent flow'd,
And all the caverns smok'd with streaming blood.
When, lo! appear'd along the dusky coasts,
Thin, airy shoals of visionary ghosts;
Fair, pensive youths, and soft enamour'd maids;
And wither'd elders, pale and wrinkled shades;
Ghastly with wounds the forms of warriors slain
Stalk'd with majestic port, a martial train:
These, and a thousand more swarm'd o'er the
And all the dire assembly shriek'd around. [ground,
Astonish'd at the sight, aghast I stood,
And a cold fear ran shivering through my blood;
Straight I command the sacrifice to haste,
Straight the slay'd victims to the flames are cast,
And mutter'd vows, and mystic song applied
To grizzly Pluto, and his gloomy bride.

"Now swift I wave my falcon o'er the blood;
Back started the pale throngs, and trembling stood.
Round the black trench the gore untasted flows,
Till awful from the shades Tiresias rose.

"There wandering through the gloom I first
survey'd,

New to the realms of Death, Elpenor's shade:
His cold remains all naked to the sky
On distant shores unwept, unburied lie.
Sad at the sight I stand, deep fix'd in woe,
And ere I spoke the tears began to flow:

"O say, what angry power Elpenor led
To glide in shades, and wander with the dead?
How could thy soul, by realms and seas disjoin'd,
Out-fly the nimble sail, and leave the lagging
wind?"

"The ghost replied: 'To Hell my doom I owe,
Demons accurst, dire ministers of woe!
My feet, through wine unfaithful to their weight,
Betray'd me tumbling from a towery height,
Staggering I reel'd, and as I reel'd I fell,
Lax'd the neck-joint—my soul descends to Hell.
But lend me aid, I now conjure thee lend,
By the soft tie and sacred name of friend!
By thy fond consort! by thy father's cares!
By lov'd Telemachus's blooming years!
For well I know that soon the heavenly powers
Will give thee back to day, and Circe's shores:
There pious on my cold remains attend,
There call to mind thy poor departed friend.
The tribute of a tear is all I crave,
And the possession of a peaceful grave.

But if, unheard, in vain compassion plead,
Revere the gods, the gods avenge the dead!
A tomb along the watery margin raise,
The tomb with manly arms and trophies grace,
To show posterity Elpenor was.

There high in air, memorial of my name,
Fix the smooth oar, and bid me live to fame.'

"To whom with tears; 'These rites, O mournful shade,
Due to thy ghost, shall to thy ghost be paid.'

"Still as I spoke, the phantom seem'd to moan,
Tear follow'd tear, and groan succeeded groan.
But, as my waving sword the blood surrounds,
The shade withdrew; and mutter'd empty sounds.

"There as the wondrous visions I survey'd,
All pale ascends my royal mother's shade:
A queen, to Troy she saw our legions pass;
Now a thin form is all Anticles was!
Struck at the sight, I melt with filial woe,
And down my cheek the pious sorrows flow,
Yet as I shook my falcon o'er the blood,
Regardless of her son the parent stood.

"When lo! the mighty Theban I behold;
To guide his steps he bore a staff of gold;
Awful he trod! majestic was his look!

And from his holy lips these accents broke:
"Why, mortal, wandrest thou from cheerful
To tread the downward, melancholy way? [day,
What angry gods to these dark regions led
Thee yet alive, companion of the dead?

But sheath thy poniard, while my tongue relates Heaven's steadfast purpose, and thy future fates.'

"While yet he spoke, the prophet I obey'd,
And in the scabbard plung'd the glittering blade:
Eager he quaff'd the gore, and then express
Dark things to come, the counsels of his breast;

"Weary of light, Ulysses here explores
A prosperous voyage to his native shores;
But know—by me unerring Fates disclose
New trains of dangers, and new scenes of woes;
I see! I see thy bark by Neptune tost,
For injur'd Cyclop, and his eye-ball lost!
Yet to thy woe the gods decree an end,
If Heaven thou please, and how to please attend!

Where on Trinacrian rocks the ocean roars,
Graze numerous herds along the verdant shores;
Though hunger press, yet fly the dangerous prey,
The herds are sacred to the god of day,
Who all surveys with his extensive eye.

Above, below, on Earth, and in the sky!
Rob not the god; and to propitious gales
Attend thy voyage, and impel thy sails:
But, if his herds ye seize, beneath the waves
I see thy friends o'erwhelm'd in liquid graves!
The direful wreck Ulysses scarce survives!

Ulysses at his country scarce arrives!
Strangers thy guides! nor there thy labours end,
New foes arise, domestic ills attend!
There foul adulterers to thy bride resort,
And lordly gluttons riot in thy court!

But vengeance hastes amain! These eyes behold
The deathful scene, princes on princes roll'd!
That done, a people far from sea explore,
Who ne'er knew salt, or heard the billows roar,
Or saw gay vessel stem the watery plain,
A painted wonder flying on the main!

Bear on thy back an oar: with strange amaze
A shepherd meeting thee, the oar surveys,
And names a van: there fix it on the plain,
To calm the god that holds the watery reign;

A three-fold offering to his altar bring,
 A bull, a ram, a boar; and hail the ocean-king.
 But, home return'd, to each ethereal power
 Slay the due victim in the genial hour:
 So peaceful shalt thou end thy blissful days,
 And steal thyself from life by slow decays:
 Unknown to pain, in age resign thy breath,
 When late stern Neptune points the shaft with
 To the dark grave retiring as to rest, [death:]
 Thy people blessing, by thy people blest!
 "Unerring truths, O man! my lips relate;
 This is thy life to come, and this is fate."
 "To whom unmov'd: 'If this the gods prepare;
 What Heaven ordains, the wise with courage bear.
 But say, why yonder on the lonely straits,
 Unmindful of her son, Anticlea stands?
 Why to the ground she bends her downcast eye?
 Why is she silent, while her son is nigh?
 The latent cause, O sacred seer, reveal!"
 "Nor this," replies the seer, "will I conceal.
 Know, to the spectres, that thy beverage taste,
 The scenes of life recur, and actions past:
 They, seal'd with truth, return the sure reply;
 The rest, repell'd, a train oblivious fly."
 "The phantoms-prophet ceas'd, and sunk from
 sight,
 To the black palace of eternal Night.
 "Still in the dark abodes of Death I stood,
 While near Anticlea mov'd, and drank the blood.
 Straight all the mother in her soul awakes,
 And, owning her Ulysses, thus she speaks:
 'Com'st thou, my son, alive, to realms beneath,
 The doleful realms of Darkness and of Death?
 Com'st thou alive from pure, ethereal day?
 Dipe is the region, dismal is the way!
 Here lakes profound, there floods oppose their waves,
 There the wide sea with all his billows raves!
 Or (since to dust proud Troy submits her towers)
 Com'st thou a wanderer from the Phrygian shores?
 Or say, since honour call'd thee to the field,
 Hast thou thy Ithaca, thy bride, beheld?"
 "'Source of my life,' I cry'd, 'from Earth I fly,
 To seek Tiresias in the nether sky,
 To learn my doom; for, tost from woe to woe,
 In every land Ulysses finds a foe:
 Nor have these eyes beheld my native shores,
 Since in the dust proud Troy submits her towers."
 "'But, when thy soul from her sweet mansion fled,
 Say, what distemper gave thee to the dead?
 Has life's fair lamp declin'd by slow decays,
 Or swift expir'd it in a sudden blaze?
 Say if my sire, good old Laertes, lives?
 If yet Telemachus, my son, survives?
 Say, by his rule is my dominion aw'd,
 Or crush'd by traitors with an iron rod?
 Say, if my spouse maintains her royal trust;
 Though tempted, chaste, and obstinately just!
 Or if no more her absent lord she wails,
 But the false woman o'er the wife prevails?"
 "Thus I, and thus the parent-shade returns:
 'Thee, ever thee, thy faithful consort mourns:
 Whether the night descends, or day prevails,
 Thee she by night, and thee by day, bewails,
 Thee in Telemachus thy realm obeys;
 In sacred groves celestial rites he pays,
 And shares the banquet in superior state,
 Glad'd with such honours as become the great.
 Thy sire in solitude foment's his care:
 The court is joyless, for thou art not there!

No costly carpets raise his hoary head,
 No rich embroidery shines to grace his bed:
 Ev'n when keen winter freezes in the skies,
 Rank'd with his slaves, on earth the monarch lies:
 Deep are his sighs, his visage pale, his dress
 The garb of woe and habit of distress.
 And when the autumn takes his annual round,
 The leafy honours scattering on the ground;
 Regardless of his years, abroad he lies,
 His bed the leaves, his canopy the skies.
 Thus cares on cares his painful days consume,
 And bow his age with sorrow to the tomb!
 "For thee, my son, I wept my life away;
 For thee through Hell's eternal dungeons stray:
 Nor came my fate by lingering pains and slow,
 Nor bent the silver-shafted queen her bow;
 No dire disease bereav'd me of my breath:
 Thou, thou, my son, wert my disease and death;
 Unkindly with my love my son conspir'd,
 For thee I liv'd, for absent thee expir'd."
 "Thrice in my arms I strove her shade to bind,
 Thrice through my arms she slipp'd like empty
 wind,
 Or dreams, the vain illusions of the mind.
 Wild with despair, I shed a copious tide
 Of flowing tears, and thus with sighs reply'd:
 "'Fly'st thou, lov'd shade, while I thus fondly
 mourn?
 Turn to my arms, to my embraces turn!
 Is it, ye powers, that smile at human harms!
 Too great a bliss to weep within her arms?
 Or has Hell's queen an empty image sent,
 That wretched I might ev'n my joys lament?"
 "'O son of woe! the pensive shade rejoind'
 'Oh most inur'd to grief of all mankind!
 'Tis not the queen of Hell who thee deceives:
 All, all are such, when life the body leaves;
 No more the substance of the man remains,
 Nor bounds the blood along the purple veins;
 'These the funereal flames in atoms bear,
 To wander with the wind in empty air;
 While the impassive soul reluctant flies,
 Like a vain dream, to these infernal skies,
 But from the dark dominions speed thy way,
 And climb the steep ascent to upper day;
 To thy chaste bride the wondrous story tell,
 The woes, the horrors, and the laws of Hell.'
 "Thus, while she spoke, in swarms Hell's empress brings
 Daughters and wives of heroes and of kings;
 'Thick and more thick they gather round the blood,
 Ghost throng'd on ghost (a dire assembly) stood!
 Dauntless my sword I seize: the airy crew,
 Swift as it flash'd along the gloom, withdrew:
 Then shade to shade in mutual forms succeeds,
 Her race recounts, and their illustrious deeds.
 "Tyro began, whom great Salmonus bred;
 The royal partner of fam'd Cretheus' bed.
 For fair Enipeus, as from fruitful urns
 He pours his watery store, the virgin burns;
 Smooth flows the gentle stream with wanton pride,
 And in soft mazes rolls a silver tide.
 As on his banks the maid enamour'd roves,
 The monarch of the deep beholds and loves!
 In her Enipeus' form and borrow'd charms,
 The amorous god descends into her arms:
 Around a spacious arch of waves he throws,
 And high in air the liquid mountain rose;
 Thus in surrounding floods conceal'd he proves
 The pleasing transport, and completes his loves.

Then softly sighing, he the fair address'd,
 And as he spoke her tender hand he press'd :
 'Hail, happy nymph! no vulgar births are ow'd
 To the prolific raptures of a god ;
 Lo! when nine times the Moon renews her horn,
 Two brother heroes shall from thee be born ;
 Thy early care the future worthies claim,
 To point them to the arduous paths of fame ;
 But in thy breast th' important truth conceal,
 Nor dare the secret of a god reveal :
 For know, thou Neptune view'st! and at my nod
 Earth trembles, and the waves confess their god.'

"He added not, but mounting spurnd the plain,
 Then plung'd i'nto the chambers of the main.

"Now in the time's fall process forth she brings
 Jove's dread vicegerents, in two future kings :
 O'er proud Icolos Pelias stretch'd his reign,
 And godlike Neleus rul'd the Pylian plain :
 Then, fruitful, to her Cretheus' royal bed
 She gallant Pheres and fam'd Æson bred :
 From the same fountain Amythaon rose,
 Pleas'd with the din of war, and noble shout of foes.

"There mov'd Antiope with haughty charms,
 Who blest th' almighty thunderer in her arms :
 Hence sprung Amphios, hence brave Zethus came,
 Founders of Thebes, and men of mighty name ;
 Though bold in open field, they yet surround
 The tow' with walls, and mound inject on mound ;
 Here ramparts stood, there towers rose high in air,
 And here, through seven wide portals rush'd the war.

"There with soft step the fair Alcmena trod,
 Who bore Alcides to the thundering god :
 And Megara, who charm'd the son of Jove,
 And soften'd his stern soul to tender love.

"Sullen and sour with discontented mien
 Jocasta frown'd, th' incestuous Theban queen ;
 With her own son she join'd in nuptial bands,
 Though father's blood imbrued his murderous hands :

The gods and men the dire offence detest,
 The gods with all their furies rend his breast :
 In lofty Thebes he wore th' imperial crown,
 A pompous wretch! accur'd upon a throne.
 The wife self-murder'd from a beam depends ;
 And her foul soul to blackest Hell descends ;
 Thence to her son the choicest plagues she brings,
 And his fends haunt him with a thousand stings.

"And now the beauteous Chloris I descry,
 A lovely shade, Amphion's youngest joy !
 With gifts unnumber'd Neleus sought her arms,
 Nor paid too dearly for unequal'd charms ;
 Great in Orchomenos, in Pylos great,
 He sway'd the sceptre with imperial state,
 Three gallant sons the joyful monarch told,
 Sage Nestor, Periclimenus the bold,
 And Chromius last ; but of the softer race,
 One nymph alone, a miracle of grace.

Kings on their thrones for lovely Pero burn ;
 The sire denies, and kings rejected mourn.
 To him alone the beauteous prize he yields
 Whose arm should ravish from Phylacian fields
 The herds of Iphycius, detain'd in wrong ;
 Wild, furious herds, unconquerably strong !
 This dares a sear, but nought the seer prevails,
 In beauty's cause illastriously he fails ;
 Twelve moons the foe the captive youth detains
 In painful dungeons, and coercive chains ;
 The foe at last, from durance where he lay,
 His art revering, gave him back to day ;

Won by prophetic knowledge, to fulfil
 The steadfast purpose of th' almighty will.

"With grateful port advancing now I spy'd
 Leda the fair, the godlike Tyndar's bride :
 Hence Pollux sprung, who wields with furious sway
 The deathful gauntlet matchless in the fray ;
 And Castor glorious on th' embattled plain
 Curbs the proud steed, reluctant to the rein ;
 By turns they visit this ethereal sky,
 And live alternate, and alternate die :
 In Hell beneath, on Earth, in Heaven above,
 Reign the twin-gods, the favourite sons of Jove.

"There Ephimèdia trod the gloomy plain,
 Who charm'd the monarch of the boundless main ;
 Hence Ephialtes, hence stern Otus sprung,
 More fierce than giants, more than giants strong ;
 The Earth o'erburthen'd groan'd beneath their weight,

None but Orion e'er surpass'd their height :
 The wonderous youths had scarce nine winters told,
 When high in air, tremendous to behold,
 Nine ills aloft they rear'd their towering head,
 And full nine cubits broad their shoulders spread.
 Proud of their strength and more than mortal size,
 The gods they challenge, and affect the skies ;
 Hear'd on Olympus tottering Ossa stood ;
 On Ossa, Pelion nods with all his wood : [grown,
 Such were they youths! had they to manhood
 Almighty Jove had trembled on his throne,
 But e'er the harvest of the beard began
 To bristle on the chin, and promise man,
 His shafts Apollo aim'd ; at once they found,
 And stretch the giant-monsters o'er the ground.

"There mournful Phœdra with sad Procris moves,

Both beauteous shades, both hapless in their loves ;
 And near them walk'd, with solemn pace and slow,
 Sad Ariadne, partner of their woe ;
 The royal Minos Ariadne bred,
 She Theseus lov'd ; from Crete with Theseus fled ;
 Swift to the Dian isle the hero flies,
 And tow'rd his Athens bears the lovely prize ;
 There Bacchus with fierce rage Diana fires,
 The goddess aims her shaft, the nymph expires.

"There Clymenè and Mera I behold ;
 There Eriphylè weeps, who loosely sold
 Her lord, her honour, for the lust of gold.
 But should I all recount, the night would fail,
 Unequal to the melancholy tale :
 And all-composing rest my nature craves,
 Here in the court, or yonder on the waves ;
 In you I trust, and in the heavenly powers,
 To land Ulysses on his native shores."

He ceas'd : but left so charming on their ear
 His voice, that listening still they seem'd to hear,
 Till, rising up, Arètè silence broke,
 Stretch'd out her snowy hand, and thus she spoke :

"What wonderous man Heaven sends us in our guest!

Through all his woes the hero shines confest ;
 His comely port, his ample frame, express
 A manly air, majestic in distress.
 He, as my guest, is my peculiar care,
 You share the pleasure, then in bounty share ;
 To worth in misery a reverence pay,
 And with a generous hand reward his stay ; [blest,
 For since kind Heaven with wealth our realm has Give it to Heaven, by aiding the distress."

Then sage Echeueus, whose grave reverend brow
 The hand of time had silver'd o'er with snow,

Mature in wisdom rose: "Your words," he cries,
 "Demand obedience, for your words are wise.
 But let our king direct the glorious way
 To generous act; our part is to obey." [ply'd]
 "While life informs these limbs," (the king re-
 "Well to deserve, be all my cares employ'd:
 But here this night the royal guest detain,
 Till the Sun flames along th' ethereal plain:
 Be it my task to send with ample stores
 The stranger from our hospitable shores:
 Tread you my steps! 'Tis mine to lead the race,
 The first in glory as the first in place."

To whom the prince: "This night with joy I stay,
 O, monarch great in virtue as in sway!
 If thou the circling year my stay control,
 To raise a bounty noble as thy soul;
 The circling year I wait, with ampler stores
 And fitter pomp to hail my native shores;
 Then by my realms due homage would be paid;
 For wealthy kings are loyally obey'd!

"O king! for such thou art, and sure thy blood
 Through veins" (he cry'd) "of royal fathers
 flow'd;

Unlike those vagrants who on falsehood live,
 Skill'd in smooth tales, and artful to deceive;
 Thy better soul abhors the liar's part,
 Wise is thy voice, and noble is thy heart;
 Thy words like music every breast control,
 Steal through the ear, and win upon the soul;
 Soft, as some song divine, thy story flows,
 Nor better could the Muse record thy woes.

"But say, upon the dark and dismal coast,
 Saw'st thou the worthies of the Grecian host?
 The godlike leaders who, in battle slain,
 Fell before Troy, and nobly prest the plain?
 And, lo! a length of night behind remains,
 The evening stars still mount th' ethereal plains.
 Thy tale with raptures I could hear thee tell,
 Thy woes on Earth, the wondrous scenes in Hell,
 Till in the vault of Heaven the stars decay,
 And the sky reddens with the rising day."

"O worthy of the power the gods assign'd," (Ulysses thus replies) "a king in mind!
 Since yet the early hour of night allows
 Time for discourse, and time for soft repose,
 If scenes of misery can entertain,
 Woes I unfold, of woes a dismal train.
 Prepare to hear of murder and of blood:
 Of godlike heroes who uninjur'd stood
 Amidst a war of spears in foreign lands,
 Yet bled at home, and bled by female hands.

"Now summon'd Proserpine to Hell's black hall
 The heroine shades; they vanish'd at her call.

"When, lo! advanc'd the forms of heroes slain
 By stern Ægysthus, a majestic train;
 And high above the rest, Atrides prest the plain.
 He quaff'd the gore: and straight his soldier knew,
 And from his eyes pour'd down the tender dew;
 His arms he stretch'd; his arms the touch deceive,
 Nor in the fond embrace, embraces give:
 His substance vanish'd, and his strength decay'd,
 Now all Atrides is an empty shade.

"Mov'd at the sight, I for a space resign'd
 To soft affliction all my manly mind;
 At last with tears—O what relentless doom,
 Imperial phantom, bow'd thee to the tomb?
 Say while the sea, and while the tempest raves,
 Has fate oppress'd thee in the roaring waves,
 Or nobly seiz'd thee in the dire alarms
 Of war and slaughter, and the clash of arms?"

"The ghost returns: 'O chief of human kind
 For active courage and a patient mind;
 Nor while the sea, nor while the tempest raves,
 Has fate oppress'd me on the roaring waves!
 Nor nobly seiz'd me in the dire alarms
 Of war and slaughter, and the clash of arms.
 Stabb'd by a murderous hand Atrides dy'd,
 A foul adulterer, and a faithless bride;
 Ev'n in my mirth and at the friendly feast,
 O'er the full bowl, the traitor stab'd his guest;
 Thus by the gory arm of slaughter falls
 The stately ox, and bleeds within the stalls.
 But not with me the direful murder ends,
 These, these expir'd! their crime, they were my friends!"

Thick as the boars, which some luxurious lord
 Kills for the feast, to crown the nuptial board.
 When war has thunder'd with its loudest storms,
 Death thou hast seen in all her ghastly forms;
 In duel met her, on the listed ground,
 When hand to hand they wound return for wound;
 But never have thy eyes astonish'd view'd
 So vile a deed, so dire a scene of blood.
 Ev'n in the flow of joy, when now the bowl
 Glows in our veins, and opens every soul,
 We groan, we faint; with blood the dome is dy'd,

And o'er the pavement floats the dreadful tide—
 Her breast all gore, with lamentable cries,
 The bleeding innocent Cassandra dies!
 Then though pale death froze cold in every vein,
 My sword I strive to wield, but strive in vain;
 Nor did my traitress wife these eye-lids close,
 Or decently in death my limbs compose.
 O woman, woman, when to ill thy mind
 Is bent, all Hell contains no fouler fiend:
 And such was mine! who basely plung'd her sword
 Through the fond bosom where she reign'd ador'd!
 Alas! I hop'd, the toils of war o'ercome,
 To meet soft quiet and repose at home;
 Delusive hope! O wife, thy deeds disgrace
 The perjurd sex, and blacken all the race;
 And should posterity one virtuous find,
 Name Clytemnestra, they will curse the kind."

"O injur'd shade," I cry'd, "what mighty woes
 To thy imperial race from woman rose!
 By woman here thou tread'st this mournful strand,
 And Greece by woman lies a desert land."

"Warn'd by my ills beware," the shade replies,
 "Nor trust the sex that is so rarely wise;
 When earnest to explore thy secret breast,
 Unfold some trifle, but conceal the rest.
 But in thy consort cease to fear a foe,
 For thee she feels sincerity of woe:

When Troy first bled beneath the Grecian arms,
 She shone unrival'd with a blaze of charms;
 Thy infant son her fragrant bosom press'd,
 Hung at her knee, or wanton'd at her breast;
 But now the years a numerous train have ran;
 The blooming boy is ripen'd into man;
 Thy eyes shall see him burn with noble fire,
 The sire shall bless his son, the son his sire:
 But my Orestes never met those eyes,
 Without one look the murder'd father dies;
 Then from a wretched friend this wisdom learn,
 Ev'n to thy queen disguis'd, unknown, return;
 For since of woman kind so few are just,
 Think all are false, nor ev'n the faithful trust.

"But say, resides my son in royal port,
 In rich Orchomenos, or Sparta's court?"

Or say in Pyle ? for yet he views the light,
Nor glides a phantom through the realms of night.'

"Then I: 'Thy suit is vain, nor can I say,
If yet he breathes in realms of cheerful day?
Or pale or wan beholds these nether skies:
Truth I revere: for wisdom never lies.'

"Thus in a tide of tears our sorrows flow,
And add new horror to the realms of woe;
Till side by side along the dreary coast
Advance Achilles' and Patroclus' ghost,
A friendly pair! near these the Pylian² stray'd,
And towering Ajax, an illustrious shade!
War was his joy, and pleas'd with loud alarms,
None but Pelides brighter shone in arms.

"Through the thick gloom his friend Achilles knew,
And as he speaks the tears descend in dew.

"'Com'st thou alive to view the Stygian bounds,
Where the wan spectres walk eternal rounds;
Nor fear'st the dark and dismal waste to tread,
Throng'd with pale ghosts, familiar with the dead?'

"To whom with sighs: 'I pass these dreadful
To seek the Theban, and consult the Fates: [gates
For still, distressed, I rove from coast to coast,
Lost to my friends, and to my country lust.

But sure the eye of time beholds no name
So blest as thine in all the rolls of fame;
Alive we hail'd thee with our guardian gods,
And dead, thou rul'st a king in these abodes.'

"Talk not of ruling in this dolorous gloom,
Nor think vain words' (he cries) 'can ease my
Rather I chuse laboriously to bear [doom.

A weight of woes, and breathe the vital air,
A slave to some poor hind that toils for bread;
Than reign the sceptred monarch of the dead.

But say, if in my steps my son proceeds,
And emulates his godlike father's deeds?
If at the clash of arms, and shout of foes,
Swells his bold heart, his bosom nobly glows?

Say, if my sire, the reverend Peleus, reigns,
Great in his Phthia, and his throne maintains:
Or, weak and old, my youthful arm demands,
To fix the sceptre steadfast in his hands?

Oh might the lamp of life rekindled burn,
And death release me from the silent urn!
This arm, that thunder'd o'er the Phrygian
plain,

And swell'd the ground with mountains of the slain,
Should vindicate my injur'd father's fame,
Crush the proud rebel, and assert his claim.'

"'Illustrious shade,' (I cried) 'of Peleus' fates
No circumstance the voice of fame relates:
But hear with pleas'd attention the renown,
The wars and wisdom of thy gallant son:

With me from Scyros to the field of fame
Radiant in arms the blooming hero came.
When Greece assembled all her hundred states,
To ripen counsels, and decide debates;

Heavens! how he charm'd us with a flow of sense,
And won the heart with manly eloquence!
He first was seen of all the peers to rise,
The third in wisdom where they all were wise;

But when, to try the fortune of the day,
Host mov'd tow'rd host in terrible array,
Before the van, impatient for the fight,
With martial port he strode, and stern delight;

Heaps strew'd on heaps, beneath his falchion
groar'd,
And monuments of dead deform the ground.

? Antilochus.

The time would fail, should I in order tell
What foes were vanquish'd, and what numbers fell:
How, lost through love, Eurypylos was slain,
And round him bled his bold Cetean train.
To Troy no hero came of nobler line;
Or if of nobler, Memnon, it was thine.

"When Ilion in the horse receiv'd her doom,
And unseen armies ambush'd in its womb;
Greece gave her latent warriors to my care,
'Twas mine on Troy to pour th' imprisonment war:

Then when the boldest bosom beat with fear,
When the stern eyes of heroes dropp'd a tear;
Fierce in his look his ardent valour glow'd,
Flush'd in his cheek, or sallied in his blood;

Indignant in the dark recess he stands,
Pants for the battle, and the war demands;
His voice breath'd death, and with a martial air
He grasp'd his sword, and shook his glittering spear;

And when the gods our arms with conquest crown'd,
When Troy's proud bulwarks smok'd upon the
ground,

Greece to reward her soldier's gallant toils,
Heap'd high his navy with unnumber'd spoils.

"Thus great in glory from the din of war
Safe he return'd without one hostile scar;
Though spears in iron tempests rain'd around,
Yet innocent they play'd, and guiltless of a wound.' [glow'd,

"While yet I spoke, the shade with transport
Rose in his majesty, and nobler trod;
With haughty stalk he sought the distant glades
Of warrior kings, and join th' illustrious shades.

"Now without number ghost by ghost arose,
All wailing with unutterable woes.
Alone, apart, in discontented mood,
A gloomy shade, the sullen Ajax stood;

For ever sad with proud disdain he pin'd,
And the lost arms for ever stung his mind;
Though on the contest Thetis gave the laws,
And Pallas, by the Trojans, judg'd the cause.

O why was I victorious in the strife;
O dear-bought honour with so brave a life!
With him the strength of war, the soldier's pride,
Our second hope to great Achilles died!

Touch'd at the sight, from tears I scarce refrain,
And tender sorrow thrills in every vein;
Pensive and sad I stand, at length accost
With accents mild th' inexorable ghost.

"Still burns thy rage? and can brave souls relent
Ev'n after death? Relent, great shade, relent!
Perish those arms which by the gods' decree
Accurs'd our army with the loss of thee!

With thee we fell; Greece wept thy hapless fates;
And shook astonish'd through her hundred states;
Not more, when great Achilles press'd the ground,
And breath'd his manly spirit through the wound.

Oh, deem thy fall not ow'd to man's decree,
Jove hated Greece, and punish'd Greece in thee!
Turn then, oh! peaceful turn, thy wrath control,
And calm the raging tempest of thy soul.'

"While yet I speak, the shade disdains to stay,
In silence turns, and sullen stalks away. [night,
"Touch'd at his sour retreat, through deepest Through Hell's black bounds I had pursued his
And forc'd the stabborn spectre to reply; [flight,
But wondrous visions drew my curious eye.
High on a throne, tremendous to behold,
Stern Minos waves a mace of burnish'd gold;
Around ten thousand thousand spectres stand
Through the wide dome of Dis, a trembling band.

Still as they plead, the fatal lots he rolls,
Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls.

" There huge Orion, of portentous size,
Swift through the gloom a giant-hunger flies;
A ponderous mace of brass with direful sway
Aloft he whirls, to crush the savage prey;
Stern beasts in trains that by his truncheon fell,
Now grisly forms, shoot o'er the lawns of Hell.

" There Tityus large and long, in fetters bound,
O'erspreads nine acres of infernal ground;
Two ravenous vultures, furious for their food,
Scream o'er the fiend, and riot in his blood,
Incessant gore the liver in his breast,
Th' immortal liver grows, and gives th' immortal
For as o'er Panope's enamell'd plains, [feast.
Latona journey'd to the Pythian fanes,
With haughty love th' audacious monster strove
To forc the goddess, and to rival Jove.

" There Tantalus along the Stygian bounds
Pours out deep groans (with groans all Hell resounds)
Ev'n in the circling floods refreshment craves,
And pines with thirst amidst a sea of waves:
When to the water he his lip applies,
Back from his lip the treacherous water flies.
Above, beneath, around his hapless head,
Trees of all kinds delicious fruitage spread;
There figs sky-died, a purple hue disclose,
Green looks the olive, the pomegranate glows,
There dangling pears exalted scents unfold,
And yellow apples ripen into gold;
The fruit he strives to seize; but blasts arise,
Toss it on high, and whirl it to the skies.

" I turn'd my eye, and as I turn'd survey'd
A mournful vision! the Sisyphian shade;
With many a weary step, and many a groan,
Up the high hill he heaves a huge round stone;
The huge round stone, resulting with a bound,
Thunders impetuous down, and smokes along the
Again the restless orb his toil renews, [ground.
Dust mounts in clouds, and sweat descends in dew.

" Now I the strength of Hercules behold,
A towering spectre of gigantic mould.
A shadowy form! for high in Heaven's abodes
Himself resides, a god among the gods;
There, in the bright assemblies of the skies,
He nectar quaffs, and Hebe crowns his joys.
Here hovering ghosts, like fowl, his shade surround,
And clang their pinions with terrific sound!
Gloomy as night he stands, in act to throw
Th' aerial arrow from the twanging bow.

Around his breast a wondrous zone is roll'd,
Where woodland monsters grin in fretted gold,
There sullen lions sternly seem to roar,
The bear to growl, to foam the tusky boar,
There war and havoc and destruction stood,
And vengeful murder red with human blood.
Thus terribly adorn'd the figures shine,
Inimitably wrought with skill divine.

The mighty ghost advanc'd with awful look,
And, turning his grim visage, sternly spoke:
" O exercis'd in grief! by arts refin'd!

O taught to bear the wrongs of base mankind!
Such, such was I! still tost from care to care,
While in your world I drew the vital air!
Ev'n I, who from the lord of thunders rose,
Bore toils and dangers, and a weight of woes;
To a base monarch still a slave confin'd,
(The hardest bondage to a generous mind!)
Down to those worlds I trod the dismal way, [day;
And dragg'd the three-mouth'd dog to upper

Ev'n Hell I conquer'd, through the friendly aid
Of Maia's offspring and the martial maid.

" Thus he, nor deign'd for our reply to stay,
But, turning, stalk'd with giant strides away.

" Curious to view the kings of ancient days,
The mighty dead that live in endless praise,
Resolv'd I stand; and haply had survey'd
The godlike Theseus, and Pirithous' shade;
But swarms of spectres rose from deepest Hell,
With bloodless visage, and with hideous yell,
They scream, they shriek; sad groans and dismal sounds [bound.

Stun my scar'd ears, and pierce Hell's utmost
No more my heart the dismal din sustains,
And my cold blood bangs shivering in my veins;
Lest Gorgon, rising from th' infernal lakes,
With horrors arm'd, and curls of hissing snakes,
Should fix me, stiffen'd at the monstrous sight,
A stony image, in eternal night!
Straight from the direful coast to purer air
I speed my flight, and to my mates repair.
My mates ascend the ship; they strike their oars;
The mountains lessen, and retreat the shores;
Swift o'er the waves we fly; the freshening gales
Sing through the shrouds, and stretch the swelling sails."

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XII.

ARGUMENT.

THE SIRENS, SCYLLA, AND CHARYBDIS.

HE relates, how after his return from the shades,
he was sent by Circe on his voyage, by the coast of the Sirens, and by the Strait of Scylla and Charybdis: the manner in which he escaped those dangers: how, being cast on the island
Trinacria, his companions destroyed the oxen of the Sun: the vengeance that followed; how all perished by shipwreck except himself, who, swimming on the mast of the ship, arrived on the island of Calypso. With which his relation concludes.

" Thus o'er the rolling surge the vessel flies,
Till from the waves th' Egean hills arise,
Here the gay Morn resides in radiant bowers,
Here keeps her revels with the dancing Hours;
Here Phoebus rising in th' ethereal way, [day.
Through Heaven's bright portals pours the beamy
At once we fix our halsters on the sand,
At once descend, and press the desert land;
There, worn and wasted, lose our cares in sleep,
To the hoarse murmurs of the rolling deep.
" Soon as the morn restor'd the day, we pay'd
Sepulchral honours to Egeus's shade.
Now by the axe the rushing forest bends,
And the huge pile along the shore ascends.
Around we stand a melancholy train,
And a loud groan re-echoes from the main.
Fierce o'er the pyre, by fanning breezes spread,
The hungry flame devours the silent dead.
A rising tomb, the silent dead to grace,
Fast by the roarings of the main we place;

The rising tomb a lofty column bore,
 And high above it rose the tapering oar.
 Meantime the goddess¹ our return survey'd
 From the pale ghosts, and Hell's tremendous shade.
 Swift she descends. A train of nymphs divine
 Bear the rich viands and the generous wine:
 In act to speak the power¹ of magic stands,
 And graceful thus accosts the listening bands:
 "O sons of woe! decreed by adverse fates
 Alive to pass through Hell's eternal gates!
 All, soon or late, are doom'd that path to tread;
 More wretched you! twice numbered with the dead!

This day adjourn your cares; exalt your souls,
 Indulge the taste, and drain the sparkling bowls:
 And when the morn unveils her saffron ray,
 Spread your broad sails, and plough the liquid way;
 Lo! I this night, your faithful guide, explain
 Your woes by land, your dangers on the main."

"The goddess spoke; in feasts we waste the day,
 Till Phoebus downward plung'd his burning ray;
 Then sable night ascends, and balmy rest
 Seals every eye, and calms the troubled breast.
 Then curious she commands me to relate
 The dreadful scenes of Pluto's dreary state:
 She sat in silence while the tale I tell,
 The wondrous visions, and the laws of Hell.

"Thou thus: 'The lot of man the gods dispose;
 These ills are past: now hear thy future woes.
 O prince, attend! some favouring power be kind,
 And print th' important story on thy mind!

"Next, where the Sirens dwell, you plough the seas!

Their song is death, and makes destruction please.
 Unlest, the man, whom music wins to stay
 Nigh the curst shore, and listen to the lay:
 No more that wretch shall view the joys of life,
 His blooming offspring, or his beauteous wife!
 In verdant meads they sport; and wide around
 Lie human bones, that whiten all the ground;
 The ground polluted floats with human gore,
 And human carnage taints the dreadful shore,
 Fly swift the dangerous coast; let every ear
 Be stopp'd against the song! 'tis death to hear!
 Firm to the mast with chains thyself be bound,
 Nor trust thy virtue to th' enchanting sound.
 If, mad with transport, freedom thou demand,
 Be every fetter strain'd, and added band to band.

"These seas o'erpass, be wise! but I refrain
 To mark distinct thy voyage o'er the main.
 New horrors rise! let prudence be thy guide,
 And guard thy various passage through the tide.

"High o'er the main two rocks exalt their brow,
 The boiling billows thundering roll below;
 Through the vast waves the dreadful wonders move,
 Hence nam'd Erratick by the gods above.
 No bird of air, no dove of swiftest wing,
 That bears ambrosia to th' ethereal king,
 Shuns the dire rocks: in vain she cuts the skies,
 The dire rocks meet, and crush her as she flies;
 Not the fleet bark, when prosperous breezes play,
 Ploughs o'er that roaring surge its desperate way;
 O'erwhelm'd it sinks: while round a smoke expires,
 And the waves flashing seem to burn with fires.
 Scarce the fam'd Argo pass'd these raging floods,
 The sacred Argo, fill'd with demigods!
 Ev'n she had sunk, but Jove's imperial bride
 Wing'd her fleet sail, and push'd her o'er the tide.

¹ Circe.

"High in the air the rock its summit shrouds,
 In brooding tempests, and in rolling clouds;
 Loud storms around and mists eternal rise,
 Beat its bleak brow, and intercept the skies.
 When all the broad expansion bright with day
 Glows with th' autumnal or the summer ray.
 The summer and the autumn glow in vain,
 The sky for ever lours, for ever clouds remain.
 Impervious to the step of man it stands,
 Though borne by twenty feet, though arm'd with twenty hands;

Smooth as the polish of the mirror rise
 The slippery sides, and shoot into the skies.
 Full in the centre of this rock display'd,
 A yawning cavern casts a dreadful shade:
 Nor the fleet arrow from the twanging bow,
 Sent with full force, could reach the depth below.
 Wide to the west the horrid gulph extends,
 And the dire passage down to Hell descends.
 O fly the dreadful sight! expand thy sails,
 Ply the strong oar, and catch the nimble gales;
 Here Scylla bellows from her dire abodes,
 Tremendous pest! abhorr'd by men and gods!
 Hideous her voice, and with less terrous roar
 The whelps of lions in the midnight hour.
 Twelve feet deform'd and foul the fiend spreads;
 Six horrid necks she rears, and six terrific heads;
 Her jaws grim dreadful with three rows of teeth;
 Jaggy they stand, the gaping den of death;
 Her parts obscene the raging billows hide;
 Her bosom terribly o'erlooks the tide.
 When stung with hunger she embroils the flood,
 The sea-dog and the dolphin are her food;
 She makes the huge leviathan her prey,
 And all the monsters of the watery way;
 The swiftest racer of the azure plain
 Here fills her sails and spreads her oars in vain;
 Fell Scylla rises, in her fury roars,
 At once six-mouths expands, at once six men devours.

"Close by, a rock of less enormous height
 Brecks the wild waves, and forms a dangerous strait:

Full on its crown a fig's green branches rise,
 And shoot a leafy forest to the skies;
 Beneath Charybdis holds her boistering reign
 'Midst roaring whirlpools, and absorbs the main;
 Thrice in her gulfs the boiling seas subside,
 Thrice in dire thunders she refunds the tide.
 Oh, if thy vessel plough the direful waves
 When seas retreating roar within her caves,
 Ye perish all! though he who rules the main
 Lend his strong aid, his aid he lends in vain.
 Ah, shun the horrid gulf! by Scylla fly,
 'Tis better six to lose, than all to die."

"I then: 'O nymph propitious to my prayer,
 Goddess divine! my guardian power, declare,
 Is the foul fiend from human vengeance freed?
 Or, if I rise in arms, can Scylla bleed?"

"Then she: 'O worn by toils, O broke in
 fight,

Still are new toils and war thy dire delight?
 Will martial flames for ever fire thy mind,
 And never, never be to Heaven resign'd?
 How vain thy efforts to avenge the wrong?
 Deathless the pest! impenetrably strong!
 Furious and fell, tremendous to behold!
 Ev'n with a look she withers all the bold!
 She mocks the weak attempts of human might;
 Oh fly her rage! thy conquest is thy flight.

If but to seize thy arms thou make delay,
 Again the fury vindicates her prey,
 Her six mouths yawn, and six are snatch'd away,
 From her foul womb Crataeis gave to air
 This dreadful pest! To her direct thy prayer,
 To curb the monster in her dire abodes,
 And guard thee through the tumult of the floods.
 Thence to Trinacria's shore you bend your way,
 Where graze thy herds, illustrious source of day!
 Seven herds, seven flocks, enrich the sacred plains;
 Each herd, each flock, full fifty heads contains:
 The wondrous kind a length of age survey,
 By breed increase not, nor by death decay,
 Two sister goddesses possess the plain,
 The constant guardians of the woolly train;
 Lampetie fair, and Phaëthusa young,
 From Phœbus and the bright Neera sprung:
 Here, watchful o'er the flocks, in shady bowers
 And flowery meads they waste the joyous hours.
 Rob not the god! and so propitious gales
 Attend thy voyage, and impel thy sails;
 But if thy impious hands the flocks destroy,
 The gods, the gods avenge it, and ye die!
 'Tis thine alone (thy friends and navy lost)
 Through tedious toils to view thy native coast.'

"She ceas'd: and now arose the morning ray;
 Swift to her dome the goddess held her way.
 Then to my mates I measur'd back the plain,
 Climb'd the tall bark, and rush'd into the main;
 Then bending to the stroke, their oars they drew
 To their broad breasts, and swift the galley flew.
 Up-sprung a brisker breeze; with freshening
 gales,

The friendly goddess stretch'd the swelling sails;
 We drop our oars; at ease the pilot guides;
 The vessel light along the level glides.
 When, rising sad and slow, with pensive look,
 Thus to the melancholy train I spoke:
 "O friends, Oh ever partners of my woes,
 Attend while I what Heaven foredooms disclose,
 Hear all! fate hangs o'er all! on you it lies
 To live, or perish! to be safe, be wise!
 "In flowery meads the sportive Sirens play,
 Touch the soft lyre, and tune the vocal lay;
 Me, me alone, with fetters firmly bound,
 The gods allow to hear the dangerous sound.
 Hear and obey: if freedom I demand,
 Be every fetter strain'd, and added band to band.'

"While yet I speak, the winged galley flies,
 And, lo! the Siren shores like mists arise.
 Sunk were at once the winds; the air above,
 And waves below, at once forgot to move!
 Some demon calm'd the air, and smooth'd the deep,
 Hush'd the loud winds, and charm'd the waves
 Now every sail we furl, each oar we ply; [to sleep.
 Iash'd by the stroke, the frothy waters fly.
 The ductile wax with busy hands I mould,
 And cleft in fragments, and the fragments roll'd:
 Th' aerial region now grew warm with day,
 The wax dissolv'd beneath the burning ray!
 Then every ear I barr'd against the strain,
 And from access of phrenzy lock'd the brain.
 Now round the mast my mates the fetters roll'd,
 And bound me limb by limb, with fold on fold.
 Then, bending to the stroke, the active train
 Plunge all at once their oars, and cleave the main.

"While to the shore the rapid vessel flies,
 Our swift approach the Siren quire descries;
 Celestial music warbles from their tongue,
 And thus the sweet deluders tune the song:

"Oh stay, O pride of Greece! Ulysses, stay!
 Oh cease thy course, and listen to our lay!
 Blest is the man ordain'd our voice to hear,
 The song instructs the soul, and charms the ear.
 Approach! thy soul shall into raptures rise;
 Approach! and learn new wisdom from the wise!
 We know whate'er the kings of mighty name
 Achiev'd at Ilium in the field of fame;
 Whate'er beneath the Sup's bright journey lies,
 Oh stay and learn new wisdom from the wise!"

"Thus the sweet charmers warbled o'er the main;
 My soul takes wing to meet the heavenly strain;
 I give the sign, and struggle to be free;
 Swift row my mates, and shoot along the sea;
 New chains they add, and rapid urge the way,
 Till, dying off, the distant sounds decay:
 Then, scudding swiftly from the dangerous ground,
 The deafen'd ear unlock'd, the chains unbound.

"Now all at once tremendous scenes unfold;
 Thunder'd the deeps, the smoking billows roll'd!
 Tumultuous waves embroil'd the bellowing flood,
 All trembling, deafen'd, and aghast we stood!
 No more the vessel plough'd the dreadful wave,
 Fear seiz'd the mighty, and unnerv'd the brave;
 Each dropp'd his oar: but swift from man to man
 With looks serene I turn'd, and thus began:
 'O friends! Oh often tried in adverse storms!
 With illa familiar in more dreadful forms!
 Deep in the dire Cyclopean den you lay,
 Yet safe return'd—Ulysses led the way.
 Learn courage hence! and in my care confide:
 Lo! still the same Ulysses is your guide!
 Attend my words! your oars incessant ply;
 Strain every nerve, and bid the vessel fly.
 If from you justling rocks and wavy war
 Jove safety grants; he grants it to your care.
 And thou whose guiding hand directs our way,
 Pilot, attentive listen and obey!
 Bear wide thy course, nor plough those angry
 waves

Where rolls yon smoke, yon tumbling ocean raves;
 Steer by the higher rock; lest whirl'd around
 We sink, beneath the circling eddy drown'd."

"While yet I speak, at once their oars they seize,
 Stretch to the stroke, and brush the working seas.
 Cautious the name of Scylla I suppress;
 That dreadful sound had chill'd the boldest breast.
 Meantime, forgetful of the voice divine,
 All dreadful bright my limbs in armour shine;
 High on the deck I take my dangerous stand,
 Two glittering javelins lighten in my hand;
 Prepar'd to whirl the whizzing spear I stay,
 Till the fell fiend arise to seize her prey.
 Around the dungeon, studious to behold
 The hideous pest! my labouring eyes I roll'd;
 In vain! the dismal dungeon dark as night
 Veils the dire monster, and confounds the sight.

"Now through the rocks, appall'd with deep dismay,

We bend our course, and stem the desperate way;
 Dire Scylla there a scene of horror forms,
 And here Charybdis fills the deep with storms.
 When the tide rushes from her rumbling caves
 The rough rock roars; tumultuous boil the waves;
 They toss, they foam, a wild confusion raise,
 Like waters bubbling o'er the fiery blaze;
 Eternal mists obscure th' aerial plain,
 And high above the rock she spouts the main!
 When in her gulphs the rushing sea subsides,
 She drains the ocean with the reluctant tides:

The rock rebellows with a thundering sound ;
Deep, wondrous deep below, appears the ground.
" Struck with despair, with trembling hearts we view'd

The yawning dungeon, and the tumbling flood ;
When, lo ! fierce Scylla stoop'd to seize her prey,
Stretch'd her dire jaws, and swept six men away ;
Chiefs of renown ! loud-echoing shrieks arise :
I tara and view them quivering in the skies ;
They call, and ail with out-stretch'd arms implore :
In vain they call ; those arms are stretch'd no
more.

As, from some rock that over-hangs the flood,
The silent fisher calls th' insidious food,
With fraudulent care he waits the finny prize,
And sudden lifts it quivering to the skies :
So the foul monster lifts her prey on high,
So pant the wretches, struggling in the sky ;
In the wide dungeon she devours her food,
And the flesh trembles while she churns the blood.
Worn as I am with griefs, with care decay'd ;
Never, I never, scene so dire survey'd ;
My shivering blood, congeal'd, forgot to flow ;
Aghast I stood a monument of woe !

" Now from the rocks the rapid vessel flies,
And the hoarse din like distant thunder dies ;
To Sol's bright isle our voyage we pursue,
And now the glittering mountains rise to view.
There sacred to the radiant god of day,
Graze the fair herds, the flocks promiscuous stray ;
Then suddenly was heard along the main
To low the ox, to bleat the woolly train,
Straight to my anxious thoughts the sound convey'd
The words of Circe and the Theban shade ;
Warn'd by their awful voice these shores to shun,
With cautious fears oppress, I thus begun :
" O friends ! Oh ever exercis'd in care !
Hear Heaven's commands, and reverence what ye
hear !

To fly these shores the prescient Theban shade
And Circe warns ! O be their voice obey'd :
Some mighty woe relentless Heaven foretodes :
Fly the dire regions, and revere the gods !

" While yet I spoke, a sudden sorrow ran Through every breast, and spread from man to Till wrathful thus Eurylochus began : [man,
" O cruel thou ! some fury sure has steel'd
That stubborn soul, by toil untaught to yield !
From sleep debarr'd, we sink from woes to woes :
And cruel enviest thou a short repose ?
Still must we restless rove, new seas explore,
The Sun descending, and so near the shore ?
And, lo the night begins her gloomy reign,
And doubles all the terrors of the main.
Oft in the dead of night loud winds arise,
Lash the wild surge, and bluster in the skies ;
Oh ! should the fierce south-west his rage display,
And toss with rising storms the watery way,
Though gods descend from Heaven's aerial plain
To lend us aid, the gods descend in vain :
Then while the night displays her awful shade,
Sweet time of slumber ! be the night obey'd !
Haste ye to land ! and when the morning ray
Sheds her bright beam, pursue the destin'd way.
A sudden joy in every bosom rose :
So will'd some demon, minister of woes !
" To whom with grief—" Oh ! swift to be undone,
Constrain'd I act what wisdom bids me shun.
But yonder herds and yonder flocks forbear ;
Attend the Heavens, and call the gods to hear :

Content an innocent repast display,
By Circe given and fly the dangerous prey."
" Thus I : and while to shore the vessel flies,
With hands uplifted they attest the skies ;
Then, where a fountain's gurgling waters play,
They rush to land, and end in feasts the day :
They feed ; they quaff ; and now (their hunger fed)
Sigh for their friends devour'd, and mourn the dead,
Nor cease the tears, till each in slumber shares
A sweet forgetfulness of human cares.

" Now far the night advanc'd her gloomy reign,
And setting stars roll'd down the azure plain :
When, at the voice of Jove, wild whirlwinds rise,
And clouds and double darkness veil the skies ;
The Moon, the stars, the bright ethereal host
Seem as extinct, and all their splendours lost ;
The furious tempest roars with dreadful sound :
Air thunders, rolls the ocean, groans the ground.
All night it rag'd : when morning rose, to land
We haul'd our bark, and moor'd it on the strand,
Where in a beauteous grotto's cool recess
Dance the green Nereids of the neighbouring seas.

" There while the wild winds whistled o'er the Thus careful I address the listening train : [main,
" O friends, be wise, nor dare the flocks destroy
Of these fair pastures : if ye touch, ye die !
Warn'd by the high command of Heaven, be aw'd,
Holy the flocks, and dreadful is the god !
That god who spreads the radiant beams of light,
And views wide Earth and Heaven's unmeasur'd
height."

" And now the Moon had run her monthly round,
The south-east blustering with a dreadful sound ;
Unhurt the bees, untouched the woolly train
Low through the grove, or range the flowery plain :
Then fail'd our food ; then fish we make our prey,
Or fowl that screaming hunt the watery way.
Till now, from sea or flood no succour found,
Famine and meagre want besieg'd us round.
Pensive and pale from grove to grove I stray'd,
From the loud storms to find a sylvan shade ;
There o'er my hands the living wave I pour ;
And Heaven and Heaven's immortal thrones adore,
To calm the roarings of the stormy main,
And grant me peaceful to my realms again.
Then o'er my eyes the gods soft slumber shed,
While thus Eurylochus arising said :

" O friends ! a thousand ways frail mortals lead
To the cold tomb, and dreadful all to tread ;
But dreadful most, when by a slow decay
Pale hunger wastes the manly strength away.
Why cease ye then to implore the powers above,
And offer hecatombs to thundering Jove ?
Why seize ye not yon bees, and fleecy prey ?
Arise unanimous ; arise and slay !
And, if the gods ordain a safe return,
To Phœbus shrines shall rise, and altars burn.
But, should the powers that o'er mankind preside
Decree to plunge us in the whelming tide,
Better to rush at once to shades below,
Than linger life away, and nourish woe !"
" Thus he : the bees around securely stray,
When swift to ruin they invade the prey ;
They seize, they kill !—but for the rite divine,
The barley fail'd, and for libations wine.
Swift from the oak they strip the shady pride ;
And verdant leaves the flowery cake supply'd.

" With prayer they now address th' ethereal
train,
Slay the selected bees, and slay the slain :

The thighs, with fat involv'd, divide with art,
Strew'd o'er with morsels cut from every part.
Water instead of wine, is brought in urns,
And pour'd profanely as the victim burns.
The thighs thus offer'd, and the entrails drest,
They roast the fragments, and prepare the feast.

"Twas then soft slumber fled my troubled brain;
Back to the bark I speed along the main.
When, lo! an odour from the feast exhales,
Spreads o'er the coast, and scents the tainted gales,
A chilly fear congeal'd my vital blood,
And thus obtesting Heaven I mourn'd aloud:

"O sire of men and gods, immortal Jove!
Oh, all ye blissful powers that reign above!
Why were my cares beguill'd in short repose?
O fatal slumber paid with lasting woe!

A deed so dreadful all the gods alarms,
Vengeance is on the wing, and Heaven in arms!"

"Meantime Lampetie mounts th' aerial way,
And kindles into rage the god of day:

"'Vengeance, ye powers,' (he cries) 'and thou whose hand

Aims the red bolt, and hurls the writen brand!
Slain are those herds which I with pride survey,
When through the ports of Heaven I pour the day,
Or deep in ocean plunge the burning ray.
Vengeance, ye gods! or I the skies forego,
And bear the lamp of Heaven to shades below.'

"To whom the thundering power: 'O source
Whose radiant lamp adorns the azure way, [of day!
Still may thy beams through Heaven's bright portals rise,

The joy of Earth, and glory of the skies;
Lo! my red arm I bare, my thunders guide,
To dash th' offenders in the whelming tide.'

"To fair Calypso, from the bright abodes,
Hermes convey'd these councils of the gods.

"Meantime from man to man my tongue ex-claims,

My wrath is kindled, and my soul in flames.
In vain! I view perform'd the direful deed,
Bees, slain by heaps, along the ocean bleed.

"Now Heaven gave signs of wrath; along the
ground

Crept the raw hides, and with a bellowing sound
Roar'd the dead limbs; the burning entrails groan'd.
Six guilty days my wretched mates employ
In impious feasting, and unhallow'd joy;
The seventh arose, and now the sire of gods
Rein'd the rough storms, and calm'd the tossing floods:

With speed the bark we climb; the spacious sails
Loos'd from the yards invite th' impelling gales.
Past sight of shore, along the surge we bound,
And all above is sky, and ocean all around!
When, lo! a murky cloud the thunderer forms Full o'er our heads, and blackens Heaven with storms.

Night dwells o'er all the deep: and now outflies
The gloomy west, and whistles in the skies.
The mountain-billows roar! the furious blast
Howls o'er the shroud, and rends it from the mast:
The mast gives way, and, crackling as it bends,
Tears up the deck; then all at once descends;
The pilot by the tumbling ruin slain,
Dash'd from the helm, falls headlong in the main.
Then Jove in anger bids his thunders roll,
And forky lightnings flash from pole to pole.
Fierce at our heads his deadly bolt he aims,
Red with uncommon wrath, and wrapt in flames:

Full on the bark it fell; now high, now low!
Toss'd and re-toss'd, it reel'd beneath the blow;
At once into the main the crew it shook:
Sulphureous odours rose, and smouldering smoke.
Like fowl that haunt the floods, they sink, they rise,
Now lost, now seen, with shrieks and dreadful cries;
And strive to gain the bark; but Jove denies.
Firm at the helm I stand, when fierce the main Rush'd with dire noise, and dash'd the sides in
'Again impetuous drove her furious blast, [twain;
Snap't the strong helm, and bore to sea the mast.
Firm to the mast with cords the helm I bind,
And ride aloft, to providence resign'd,
Through tumbling billows, and a war of wind.
"Now sunk the west, and now a southern breeze,

More dreadful than the tempest, lash'd the seas;
For on the rocks it bore where Scylla raves,
And dire Charybdis rolls her thundering waves.
All night I drove; and at the dawn of day,
Fast by the rocks, beheld the desperate way:

Just when the sea within her gulfs subsides,
And in the roaring whirlpools rush the tides,
Swift from the float I vaulted with a bound,
The lofty fig-tree seiz'd, and clung around.
So to the beam the bat tenacious clings,
And pendent round it clasps his leathern wings.
High in the air the tree its boughs display'd,
And o'er the dungeon cast a dreadful shade,
All unsustain'd between the wave and sky,

Beneath my feet the whirling billows fly,
What time the judge forsakes the noisy bar
To take repast, and stills the wordy war;
Charybdis rumbling from her inmost caves,
The mast refunded on her refluxant waves.

Swift from the tree, the floating mast to gain;
Sudden I dropt amidst the flashing main;
Once more undaunted on the ruin rode,
And oar'd with labouring arms along the flood:
Unseen I pass'd by Scylla's dire abodes:
So Jove decreed (dread sire of men and gods)!

Then nine long days I plough the calmer seas,
Heav'd by the surge, and watted by the breeze:
Weary and wet th' Ogygian shores I gain,
When the tenth Sun descended to the main.

There, in Calypso's ever-fragrant bowers,
Refresh'd I lay, and joy beguill'd the hours.
"My following fates to thee, O king, are known,
And the bright partner of thy royal throne:
Enough: in misery can words avail?
And what so tedious as a twice-told tale?"

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE ARRIVAL OF ULYSSES IN ITHACA.

ULYSSES takes his leave of Alcinoüs and Arete, and embarks in the evening. Next morning the ship arrives at Ithaca; where the sailors, as Ulysses is yet sleeping, lay him on the shore with all his treasures. On their return, Neptune changes their ship into a rock. In the mean time Ulysses, awaking, knoweth not his native Ithaca, by reason of a mist which Pallas had cast round him. He breaks into loud lamentations: till the goddess, appearing to him in the form of a shepherd, discovers the country to him, and points out the particular places. He then tells a feigned story of his adventures, upon which she manifests herself, and they consult together of the measures to be taken to destroy the suitors. To conceal his return, and disguise his person the more effectually, she changes him into the figure of an old beggar.

His deaf'd; but lest so pleasing on their ear
His voice, that listening still they seem'd to hear.
A pause of silence hush'd the shady rooms:
The grateful conference then the king resumes:
"Whatever toils the great Ulysses past,
Beneath this happy roof they end at last;
No longer now from shore to shore to roam,
Smooth seas and gentle winds invite him home.
But hear me, princess! whom these walls enclose,
To whom my chanter sings, and goblet flows
With wines unmix'd (an honour due to age,
To cheer the grave, and warm the poet's rage)
Though labour'd gold and many a dazzling vest
Lie heap'd already for our godlike guest;
Without new treasures let him not remove,
Large; and expressive of the public love:
Each peer a tripod, each a vase bestow,
A general tribute, which the state shall owe."

This sentence pleas'd: then all their steps address
To separate mansions, and retir'd to rest.

Now did the rosy-finger'd Morn arise,
And shed her sacred light along the skies.
Down to the haven and the ships in haste
They bore the treasures, and in safety plac'd.
The king himself the vases rang'd with care:
Then bade his followers to the feast repair.
A victim ox beneath the sacred hand
Of great Alcinoüs falls, and stains the sand.
To Jove th' eternal (power above all powers!
Who wings the winds, and darkens Heaven with showers)

The flames ascend: till evening they prolong
The rites, more sacred made by heavenly song:
For in the midst, with public honours grac'd,
Thylyre divine, Demodocus! was plac'd;
All, but Ulysses, heard with fix'd delight:
He sat, and ey'd the Sun, and wish'd the night;
Slow seem'd the Sun to move, the hours to roll,
His native home deep imag'd in his soul.
As the tir'd ploughman, spent with stubborn toil,
Whose oxen long have torn the furrow'd soil,
Sees with delight the Sun's declining ray,
When home with feeble knees he bends his way
To late repast (the day's hard labour done):
So to Ulysses welcome set the Sun.
Then instant to Alcinoüs and the rest
(The Scherian states) he turn'd, and thus ad-dress'd:

"O thou, the first in merit and command!
And you, the peers and princes of the land!
May every joy be yours! nor this the least,
When one libation shall have crown'd the feast,
Safe to my home to send your happy guest.
Complete are now the bounties you have given.
Be all those bounties but confirm'd by Heaven!
So may I find, when all my wanderings cease,
My consort blameless, and my friends in peace.

VOL. XIX.

On you be every blessing and every day,
In home-felt joys delighted, roll away:
Yourself, your wives, your long-descending race,
May every god enrich with every grace!
Sure fix'd on virtue may your nation stand,
And public evil never touch the land!"

His words, well weigh'd, the general voice ap-prou'd, and instant his dismissal mov'd. [prov'd
The winn'ing to Pantoönous gave the sign,
To fill the goblet high with rosy wine: [plow'd
"Great Jove the father first," he cried, "in-
Then send the stranger to his native shore."

The luscious wine th' obedient herald brought;
Around the mansion slow'd the purple draught:
Each from his seat to each immortal pours,
Whom glory circles in th' Olympian bowers.
Ulysses sole with air majestic stands,
The bowl presenting to Arete's hands;
Then thus: "O queen, farewell! be still possess'd
Of dear remembrance, blessing still and blest!
Till age and death shall gently call thee hence,
(Sure fate of every mortal excellence!)
Farewell; and joys successive ever spring.
To thee, to thine, the people, and the king!"

Thus he; then, parting, prints the sandy shore
To the fair port: a herald march'd before,
Sent by Alcinoüs; of Arete's train
Three chosen maids attend him to the main;
This does a tonic and white vest convey,
A various casket that, of rich inlay,
And bread and wine the third. The cheerful mates
Safe in the hollow poop dispose the cates:
Upon the deck soft painted robes they spread,
With linen cover'd for the hero's bed.

He climb'd the lofty stern; and thus gently prest
The swelling couch, and lay compos'd to rest.

Now plac'd in order, the Phœacian train
Their cables loose, and launch into the main:
At once they bend, and strike their equal oars,
And leave the sinking hills and lessening shores.
While on the deck the chief in silence lies,
And pleasing slumbers steal upon his eyes.
As fiery couriers in the rapid race
Urg'd by fierce drivers through the dusty space,
Toss their high heads, and scour along the plain;
So mounts the bounding vessel o'er the main.
Back to the stern the parted billows flow,
And the black ocean foams and roars below.

Thus with spread sails the winged galley flies;
Less swift an eagle cuts the liquid skies;
Divine Ulysses was her sacred load,
A man, in wisdom equal to a god!
Much danger, long and mighty toils, he bore,
In storms by sea, and combats on the shore:
All which soft sleep now banish'd from his breast,
Wrapt in a pleasing, deep, and death-like rest.

But when the morning star with early ray
Flash'd in the front of Heaven, and promis'd day;
Like distant clouds the mariner descries
Fair Ithaca's emerging hills arise.

Far from the town a spacious port appears,
Sacred to Phorcys' power, whose name it bears:
Two craggy rocks projecting to the main,
The roaring wind's tempestuous rage restrain;
Within, the waves in softer murmurs glide,
And ships secure without their halbers ride,
High at the head a branching olive grows,
And crowns the pointed cliffs with shady boughs.
Beneath, a gloomy grotto's cool recess
Delights the Nereids of the neighbouring seas,

Q

Where bowls and urns were form'd of living stone,
 And massy beams in native marble shone;
 On which the labours of the nymph were roll'd,
 Their webb divine of purple mix'd with gold.
 Within the cave the clustering bees attend
 Their waxen works, or from the roof depend,
 Perpetual waters o'er the pavement glide;
 Two marble doors unfold on either side.
 Sacred the south, by which the gods descend;
 But mortals enter at the northern end.

Thither they bent, and haul'd their ship to land;
 (The crooked keel divides the yellow sand);
 Ulysses sleeping on his couch they bore,
 And gently plac'd him on the rocky shore.
 His treasures next, Alcinoos' gifts, they laid
 In the wild olive's unfrequented shade,
 Secure from theft: then launch'd the bark again,
 Resum'd their oars, and measur'd back the main.
 Nor yet forgot old Ocean's dread supreme
 The vengeance vow'd for eyeless Polypheme.
 Before the throne of mighty Jove he stood;
 And sought the secret counsels of the god:

"Shall then no more, O sire of gods, be mine
 The rights and honours of a power divine
 Scorn'd ev'n by man, and (oh! severe disgrace!)
 By soft Phœaciads, my degenerate race!
 Against yon destin'd head in vain I swore,
 And menac'd vengeance, ere he reach'd his shore;
 To reach his natal shore was thy decree;
 Mild I obey'd, for who shall war with thee?
 Behold him landed, careless and asleep,
 From all th' eluded dangers of the deep!
 Lo! where he lies, amidst a shining store
 Of brass, rich garments, and refulgent ore:
 And bears triumphant to his native isle
 A prize more worth than Ilium's noble spoil."

To whom the father of th' immortal powers,
 Who swells the clouds, and gladdens earth with showers:

"Can mighty Neptune thus of man complain!
 Neptune, tremendous o'er the boundless main!
 Rever'd and awful ev'n in Heaven's abodes,
 Ancient and great! a god above the gods!
 If that low race offend thy power divine,
 (Weak, daring creatures?) is not vengeance thine?
 Go then, the guilty at thy will chastise."
 He said: the shaker of the Earth replies:

"This then I doom: to fix the gallant ship
 A mark of vengeance on the sable deep:
 To warn the thoughtless self-confiding train,
 No more unlicens'd thus to brave the main.
 Full in their port a shady hill shall rise,
 If such thy will"—"We will it," Jove replies:
 "Even when, with transport blackening all the
 The swarming people hail their ship to land, [strand,
 Fix her for ever, a memorial stone:
 Still let her seem to sail, and seem alone;
 The trembling crowds shall see the sudden shade
 Of whelming mountains overhang their head!"

With that the god, whose earthquakes rock the
 ground,

Fierce to Phœacia cross'd the vast profound,
 Swift as a swallow sweeps the liquid way,
 The winged pinnace shot along the sea.
 The god arrests her with a sudden stroke,
 And roots her down an everlasting rock.
 Agast the Scherians stand in deep surprise;
 All press to speak, all question with their eyes.
 What hands unseen the rapid bark restrain!
 And yet it swims, or seems to swim, the main!

Thus they, unconscious of the deed divine:
 Till great Alcinoos, rising, own'd the sign.

"Behold the long predestin'd day!" he cries;
 "Oh! certain faith of ancient prophecies!
 These ears have heard my royal sire disclose
 A dreadful story, big with future woes;
 How mov'd with wrath, that careless we convey
 Promiscuous every guest to every bay,
 Stern Neptune rag'd; and how by his command
 Firm-rooted in the surge a ship should stand
 (A monument of wrath): and moun'd on mound
 Should hide our walls, or whelm beneath the
 ground.

"The Fates have follow'd, as declar'd the sea.
 Be humbled, satious! and your monarch hear,
 No more unlicens'd brave the deeps, no more
 With every stranger pass from shore to shore;
 On angry Neptune now for mercy call:
 To his high name let twelve black oxen fall.
 So may the god reverse his purpos'd will,
 Nor o'er our city hang the dreadful hill!"

The monarch spoke: they trembled and obey'd;
 Forth on the sands the victim oxen led:
 The gather'd tribes before the altars stand,
 And chiefs and rulers, a majestic band.
 The king of Ocean all the tribes implore;
 The blazing altars rdden all the shore.

Meanwhile Ulysses in his country lay,
 Released from sleep, and round him might survey
 The solitary shore and rolling sea.

Yet had his mind, through tedious absence, lost
 The dear remembrance of his native coast;
 Besides, Minerva, to secure her care,
 Diffus'd around a veil of thicken'd air:
 For so the gods ordain'd, to keep unseen
 His royal person from his friends and queen;
 Till the proud suitors for their crimes afford
 An ample vengeance to their injur'd lord.

Now all the land another prospect bore,
 Another port appear'd, another shore,
 And long-continued ways, and winding floods,
 And unknown mountains, crown'd with unknown woods.

Pensive and slow, with sudden grief oppress'd,
 The king arose, and beat his careful breast,
 Cast a long look o'er all the coast and main,
 And sought around, his native realm in vain:
 Then with erected eyes stood fix'd in woe;
 And, as he gazed, the tears began to flow:

"Ye gods!" he cry'd, "upon what barren coast,
 In what new region, is Ulysses tost?
 Possess'd by wild barbarians, fierce in arms?
 Or men whose bosom tender pity warms?
 Where shall this treasure now in safety lie?
 And whither, whither, its sad owner fly?
 Ah! why did I Alcinoos' grace implore?
 Ah! why forsake Phœacia's happy shore?
 Some juster prince, perhaps, had entertain'd,
 And safe restor'd me to my native land.

Is this the promis'd, long-expected coast,
 And this the faith Phœacia's rulers boast?
 O righteous gods! of all the great, how few
 Are just to Heaven, and to their promise true!
 But he, the power to whose all-seeing eyes
 The deeds of men appear without disguise;
 'Tis his alone t' avenge the wrongs I bear:
 For still th' oppressor has his peculiar care.
 To count these presents, and from thence to prove

Their faith, is mine: the rest belongs to Jove."

Then on the sands he rang'd his wealthy store,
The gold, the vests, the tripods, number'd o'er:
All these he found, but still in error lost,
Disconsolate he wanders on the coast,
Sighs for his country, and laments again
To the deaf rocks, and hoarse resounding main.
When, lo! the guardian goddess of the wise,
Celestial Pallas, stood before his eyes;
In show a youthful swain, of form divine,
Who seem'd descended from some princely line.
A graceful robe her slender body dress'd,
Around her shoulders flew the waving vest;
Her decent hand a shining javelin bore,
And painted sandals on her feet she wore.
To whom the king: "Whoe'er of human race
Thou art, that wander'st in this desert place!
With joy to thee, as to some god, I bend,
To thee my treasures and myself commend.
Oh! tell a wretch, in exile doom'd to stray,
What air I breathe, what country I survey?
The fruitful continent's extremest bound,
Or some fair isle which Neptune's arms surround!"

"From what fair clime," said she, "remote from
Arriv'st thou here a stranger to our name? [fame,
Thou see'st an island, not to those unknown
Whose hills are brighten'd by the rising Sun,
Nor those that, plac'd beneath his utmost reign,
Behold him sinking in the western main.
The ragged soil allows no level space
For flying chariots, or the rapid race:
Yet, not ungrateful to the peasant's pain,
Suffices fulness to the swelling grain:
The loaded trees theft various fruits produce,
And clustering grapes afford a generous juice:
Woods crown our mountains, and in every grove
The bounding goats and frisking heifers rove:
Soft rains and kindly dews refresh the field,
And rising springs eternal verdure yield.
Er'n to those shores is Ithaca renown'd,
Where Troy's majestic ruins strow the ground."

At this the chief with transport was possess'd,
His panting heart exulting in his breast:
Yet, well dissembling his untimely joys,
And veiling truth in plausible disguise,
Thus, with an air sincere, in fiction bold,
His ready tale th' inventive hero told:

"Oft have I heard in Crete this island's name;
For 'twas from Crete, my native soil, I came,
Self-banish'd thence. I sail'd before the wind,
And left my children and my friends behind.
From fierce Idomeneus' revenge I flew,
Whose son, the swift Orsilochus, I slew,
(With brutal force he seiz'd my Trojan prey,
Due to the toils of many a bloody day).
Unseen I 'scap'd; and, favour'd by the night,
In a Phœnician vessel took my flight,
For Pyle or Elis bound: but tempests tost
And raging billows drove us on your coast.
In dead of night an unknown port we gain'd,
Spent with fatigue, and slept secure on land.
But here the rosy morn renew'd the day,
While in th' embrace of pleasing sleep I lay,
Sadden, invited by auspicious gales,
They land my goods, and hoist their flying sails.
Abandon'd here, my fortune I deplore,
A hapless exile on a foreign shore."

Thus, while he spoke, the blue-ey'd maid began
With pleasing smiles to view the godlike man:
Then chang'd her form: and now, divinely bright,
Jove's heavenly daughter stood confess'd to sight;

Like a fair virgin in her beauty's bloom,
Skill'd in th' illustrious labours of the loom.

"Oh, still the same Ulysses!" she rejoin'd,
"In useful craft successfully re-fin'd!
Artful in speech, in action, and in mind?
Suffic'd it not, that, thy long labours past,
Secure thou see'st thy native shore at last?
But this to me? who, like thyself, excel
In arts of counsel, and dissembling well;
To me, whose wit exceeds the powers divine,
No less than mortals are surpass'd by thine.
Know'st thou not me? who made thy life my care,
Through ten years' wandering, and through ten years' war:

Who taught thee arts, Alcinous to persuade,
To raise his wonder, and engage his aid:
And now appear thy treasures to protect,
Conceal thy person, thy designs direct,
And tell what more thou must from fate expect.
Domestic woes far heavier to be borne!
The pride of fools, and slaves' insulting scorn.
But thou be silent, nor reveal thy state:
Yield to the force of unresist'd fate,
And bear unmov'd the wrongs of base mankind,
The last, and hardest, conquest of the mind."

"Goddess of wisdom!" Ithacus replies,
"He who discerns thee must be truly wise,
So seldom view'd, and ever in disguise!
When the bold Argives led their warring powers,
Against proud Iliou's well-defended towers;
Ulysses was thy care, celestial maid!
Grac'd with thy sight, and favour'd with thy aid.
But when the Trojan piles in ashes lay,
And, bound for Greece, we plough'd the watery
way;

Our fleet dispers'd and driven from coast to coast,
Thy sacred presence from that hour I lost:
Till I beheld thy radiant form once more,
And heard thy counsels on Phœacia's shore.
But, by th' almighty author of thy race,
Tell me, oh tell! is this my native place?
For much I fear, long tracts of land and sea
Divide this coast from distant Ithaca;
The sweet delusion kindly you impose,
To soothe my hopes, and mitigate my woes."

Thus he. The blue-ey'd goddess thus replies:
"How prone to doubt, how cautious, are the wise!
Who, vers'd in fortune, fear the flattering show,
And taste not half the pleasures the gods bestow.
The more shall Pallas aid thy just desires,
And guard the wisdom which herself inspires.
Others, long absent from their native place,
Straight seek their home, and fly with eager pace
To their wives' arms, and children's dear embrace.
Not thus Ulysses: he decrees to prove
His subjects' faith, and queen's suspected love;
Who mourn'd her lord twice ten revolving years,
And wastes the days in grief, the nights in tears.
But Pallas knew (thy friends and navy lost)
Once more 'twas given thee to behold thy coast!
Yet how could I with adverse fate engage,
And mighty Neptune's unrelenting rage?
Now lift thy longing eyes, while I restore
The pleasing prospect of thy native shore:
Behold the port of Phœnyx! fence'd around
With rocky mountains, and with olives crown'd,
Behold the gloomy grot! whose cool recess
Delights the Nereids of the neighbouring seas:
Whose now neglected altars in thy reign
Blush'd with the blood of sheep and oxen slain,

Behold ! where Neritus the clouds divides,
And shakes the waving forests on his sides."

So spake the goddess ; and the prospect clear'd,
The mists dispers'd, and all the coast appear'd.
The king with joy confess'd his place of birth,
And on his knees salutes his mother Earth ;
Then, with his suppliant hands upheld in air,
Thus to the sea-green sisters sends his prayer :
" All hail ! ye virgin-daughters of the main !
Ye streams, beyond my hopes beheld again !
To you once more your own Ulysses bows ;
Attend his transports, and receive his vows !
If Jove prolong my days, and Pallas crown
The growing virtues of my youthful son,
To you shall rites divine be ever paid,
And grateful offerings on your altars laid."

Then thus Minerva : " From that anxious breast
Dismiss those cares, and leave to Heaven the rest.
Our task be now thy treasur'd stores to save,
Deep in the close recesses of the cave :
Then future means consult"—She spoke, and trod
The shady grot, that brighten'd with the god.
The closest caverns of the grot she sought ;
The gold, the brass, the robes, Ulysses brought ;
These in the secret gloom the chief dispos'd ;
The entrance with a rock the goddess clos'd.

Now, seated in the olive's sacred shade,
Confer the hero and the martial maid.
The goddess of the azure eyes began :
" Son of Laertes ! much-experienc'd man !
The suitor-train thy earliest care demand,
Of that luxurious race to rid the land :
Three years thy house their lawless rule has seen,
And proud addresses to the matchless queen.
But she thy absence mourns from day to day,
And inly bleeds, and silent wastes away :
Evasive of the bridal hour, she gives
Fond hopes to all, and all with hopes deceives."

To this Ulysses : " O, celestial maid !
Prais'd be thy counsel, and thy timely aid :
Else had I seen my native walls in vain,
Like great Atrides just restor'd and slain.
Vouchsafe the means of vengeance to debate,
And plan with all thy arts the scene of fate.
Then, then be present, and my soul inspire,
As when we wrapp'd Troy's heaven-built walls in fire.

Though leagu'd against me hundred heroes stand,
Hundreds shall fall, if Pallas aid my hand."

She answer'd : " In the dreadful day of fight
Know, I am with thee, strong in all my might.
If thou but equal to thyself be found,
What gasping numbers then shall press the
ground !

What human victims stain the feastful floor !
How wide the pavements float with guilty gore !
It fits thee now to wear a dark disguise,
And secret walk unknown to mortal eyes.
For this, my hand shall wither every grace,
And every elegance of form and face,
O'er thy smooth skin a bark of wrinkles spread,
Turn hoar the suburn honours of thy head,
Disfigure every limb with coarse attire,
And in thy eyes extinguish all the fire ;
Add all the wants and the decays of life ;
Estrange thee from thy own ; thy son, thy wife ;
From the loath'd object every sight shall turn,
And the blind suitors their destruction scorn.

" Go first the master of thy herds to find,
True to his charge, a loyal swain and kind :

For thee he sighs ; and to the royal heif
And chaste Penelope extends his care.
At the Ceraean rock he now resides,
Where Arethusa's sable water glides ;
The sable water and the copious mast
Swell the fat herd ; luxuriant, large repast !
With him, rest peaceful in the rural cell,
And all you ask his faithful tongue shall tell.
Me into other realms my cares convey,
To Sparta, still with female beauty gay :
For know, to Sparta thy lov'd offspring came,
To learn thy fortunes from the voice of Fame."

At this the father, with a father's care :
" Must he too suffer ? he, O goddess ! bear
Of wanderings and of woes a wretched share ?
Thro' the wild ocean plough the dangerous way,
And leave his fortunes and his house a prey ?
Why would'st not thou, O all-enlighten'd mind !
Inform him certain, and protect him, kind ?"

To whom Minerva : " Be thy soul at rest ;
And know, whatever Heaven ordains, is best.
To Fame I sent him, to acquire renown :
To other regions is his virtue known :
Secure he sits, near great Atrides plac'd ;
With friendships strengthened, and with honours grac'd.

But lo ! an ambush waits his passage o'er ;
Fierce foes insidiously intercept the shore :
In vain ! for sooner all the murderous brood
This injur'd land shall fatten with their blood."
She spake, then touch'd him with her powerful wand :

The skin shrunk up, and wither'd at her hand :
A swift old age o'er all his members spread ;
A sudden frost was sprinkled on his head ;
Nor longer in the heavy eye-ball shin'd
The glance divine, forth-beaming from the mind.
His robe, which spots indelible besmear,
In rags dishonest flutters with the air :
A stag's torn hide is lapp'd around his reins ;
A rugged staff his trembling hand sustains ;
And at his side a wretched scrip was hung,
Wide-patch'd, and knotted to a twisted thong.
So look'd the chief, so mov'd, to mortal eyes
Object uncouth ! a man of miseries !
While Pallas, cleaving the wide field of air,
To Sparta flies, Telemachus her care.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XIV.

ARGUMENT.

THE CONVERSATION WITH EUMÆUS.

ULYSSES arrives in disguise at the house of Eumæus, where he is received, entertained, and lodged, with the utmost hospitality. The several discourses of that faithful old servant, with the feigned story told by Ulysses to conceal himself, and other conversations on various subjects, take up this entire book.

But he, deep musing, o'er the mountains stray'd
Through mazy thickets of the woodland shade,

And cavern'd ways the shaggy coast along,
 With cliffs and nodding forest over-hung.
 Eumæus at his sylvan lodge he sought,
 A faithful servant, and without a fault.
 Ulysses found him busied, as he sate
 Before the threshold of his rustic gate;
 Around the mansion in a circle shone
 A rural portico of rugged stone
 (In absence of his lord, with honest toil
 His own industrious hands had rais'd the pile),
 The wall was stone from neighbouring quarries
 Encircled with a fence of native thorn, [borne,
 And strong with pales, by many a weary stroke
 Of stubborn labour hewn from heart of oak;
 Frequent and thick. Within the space were rear'd
 Twelve ample cells, the lodgment of his herd.
 Full fifty pregnant females each contain'd;
 The males without (a smaller race) remain'd;
 Doom'd to supply the suitor's wasteful feast,
 A flock by daily luxury decreas'd!
 Now scarce four hundred left. These to defend,
 Four savage dogs, a watchful guard; attend.
 Here sate Eumæus, and his cares apply'd
 To form strong buskins of well-season'd hide.
 Of four assistants who his labour share,
 Three now were absent on the rural care;
 The fourth drove victims to the suitor train:
 But he, of ancient faith, a simple swain,
 Sigh'd, while he furnish'd the luxurious board,
 And weary'd Heaven with wishes for his lord.
 Soon as Ulysses near the enclosure drew,
 With open mouths the furious mastiffs flew:
 Down sate the sage, and cautious to withstand,
 Let fall th' offensive truncheon from his hand.
 Sudden, the master runs; aloud he calls;
 And from his hasty hand the leather falls;
 With showers of stones he drives them far away;
 The scattering dogs around at distance bay.
 "Unhappy stranger!" (thus the faithful swain Began with accent gracious and humane)
 "What sorrow had been mine, if at my gate
 Thy reverend age had met a shameful fate!
 Enough of woes already have I known;
 Enough my master's sorrows and my own.
 While here (ungrateful task!) his herds I feed,
 Ordain'd for lawless ripters to bleed;
 Perhaps, supported at another's board,
 Far from his country roams my hapless lord!
 Or sigh'd in exile forth his latest breath,
 Now cover'd with th' eternal shade of death!"
 "But enter this my homely roof, and see
 Our woods not void of hospitality.
 Then tell me whence thou art? and what the share
 Of woes and wanderings thou wert born to bear?"
 He said, and, seconding the kind request,
 With friendly step precedes his unknown guest.
 A shaggy goat's soft hide beneath him spread,
 And with fresh rushes heap'd an ample bed:
 Joy touch'd the hero's tender soul, to find
 So just reception from a heart so kind:
 "And oh, ye gods! with all your blessings grace"
 (He thus broke forth) "this friend of human race!"
 The swain reply'd: "It never was our guise
 To slight the poor, or aught humane despise;
 For Jove unfolds our hospitable door,
 'Tis Jove that sends the stranger and the poor.
 Little, alas! is all the good I can;
 A man oppress'd, dependant, yet a man:
 Accept such treatment as a swain affords,
 Slave to the insolence of youthful lords!

Far hence is by unequal gods remov'd
 That man of bounties, loving and below'd!
 To whom whate'er his slave enjoys is ow'd,
 And more, had fate allow'd, had been bestow'd:
 But fate condemns him to a foreign shore;
 Much have I sorrow'd, but my master more,
 Now cold he lies, to death's embrace resign'd:
 Ah, perish Helen! perish all her kind!
 For whose curs'd cause, in Agamemnon's name,
 He trod so fatally the paths of fame.

"His vest succinct then giiding round his waist,
 Forth rush'd the swain with hospitable haste,
 Straight to the lodgments of his herd he run,
 Where the fat porkers slept beneath the Sun;
 Of two his cutlass lanch'd the spouting blood;
 These quarter'd, sing'd, and fix'd on forks of
 All hasty on the hissing coals he threw; [wood,
 And smoking back the tasteful viands drew,
 Broachers and all; then on the board display'd
 The ready meal, before Ulysses laid
 With flour imbrown'd; next mingled wine yet new,
 And luscious as the bees' nectareous dew:
 Then sate companion of the friendly feast,
 With open look; and thus bespoke his guest:
 "Take, with free welcome, what our hands prepare,
 Such food as falls to simple servants' share;
 The best our lords consume; those thoughtless
 Rich without bounty, guilty without fears! [peers,
 Yet sure the gods their impious acts detest,
 And honour justice and the righteous breast.
 Pirates and conquerors, of harden'd mind,
 The foes of peace, and scourges of mankind,
 To whom offending men are made a prey
 When Jove in vengeance gives a land away;
 Even these, when of their ill-got spoils possess'd,
 Find sure tormentors in the guilty breast:
 Some voice of god close whispering from within,
 'Wretch! this is villainy, and this is sin.'
 But these, no doubt, some oracle explore,
 That tells, the great Ulysses is no more.
 "Hence springs their confidence, and from our sighs
 Their rapine strengthens, and their riots rise:
 Constant as Jove the night and day bestows,
 Bleeds a whole hecatomb, a vintage flows.
 None match'd this hero's wealth, of all who reign
 O'er the fair islands of the neighbouring main.
 Not all the monarchs whose far-dreaded way
 The wide extended continents obey:
 First, on the main land, of Ulysses' breed
 Twelve herds, twelve flocks, on ocean's margin feed;
 As many stalls for shaggy goats are rear'd;
 As many lodgments for the tusked herd;
 Those foreign keepers guard: and here are seen
 Twelve herds of goats that grace our utmost green;
 To native pastors in their charge assign'd;
 And mine the care to feed the bristly kind:
 Each day the fattest bleeds of either herd,
 All to the suitors' wasteful board preferr'd."
 Thus he, benevolent: his unknown guest
 With hunger keen devours the savoury feast;
 While schemes of vengeance ripen in his breast.
 Silent and thoughtful while the board he ey'd,
 Eumæus pours on high the purple tide;
 The king with smiling looks his joy express'd,
 And thus the kind inviting host address'd:
 "Say now, what man is he, the man deplor'd
 So rich, so potent, whom you style your lord;

Late with such affluence and possessions blest,
 And now in honour's glorious bed at rest?
 Whoever was the warrior, he must be
 To fake no stranger, nor perhaps to me;
 Who, so the gods, and so the fates ordain'd)
 Have wander'd many a sea, and many a land."
 "Small is the faith, the prince and queen ascribe" (Reply'd Eumæus) "to the wandering tribe.
 For needy strangers still to flattery fly,
 And want too oft betrays the tongue to lye.
 Each vagrant traveller that touches here,
 Deludes with fallacies the royal ear,
 To dear remembrance makes his image rise,
 And calls the springing sorrows from her eyes.
 Such thou may'st be. But he whose name you
 Moulders in earth, or welters on the wave, [crave
 Or food for fish or dogs his reliques lie,
 Or torn by birds are scatter'd through the sky.
 So perish'd he: and left (for ever lost)
 Much woe to all but sure to me the most.
 So mild a master never shall I find;
 Less dear the parents whom I left behind,
 Less soft my mother, less my father kind.
 Not with such transport would my eyes run o'er,
 Again to hail them in their native shore;
 As lov'd Ulysses once more to embrace,
 Restor'd and breathing in his natal place.
 That name for ever dread, yet ever dear,
 Even in his absence I pronounce with fear:
 In my respect, he bears a prince's part;
 But lives a very brother in my heart."

Thus spoke the faithful swain; and thus rejoind
 The master of his grief, the man of patient mind:
 "Ulysses, friend! shall view his old abodes
 (Distrustful as thou art;) nor doubt the gods.
 Nor speak I rashly, but with faith averr'd,
 And what I speak, attesting Heaven has heard.
 If so, a cloak and vesture be my need;
 Till his return, no title shall I plead,
 Though certain be my news, and great my need.
 Whom want itself can force untruths to tell,
 My soul detests him as the gates of Hell."
 "Thou first be witness, hospitable Jove!
 And every god inspiring social love;
 And witness every household power that waits
 Guards of these fires, and angel of these gates!
 Ere the next Moon increase or this decay,
 His ancient realms Ulysses shall survey,
 In blood and dust each proud oppressor mourn,
 And the lost glories of his house return."

"Nor shall that meed be thine, nor ever more Shall lov'd Ulysses hail this happy shore"
 (Peplied Eumæus). "To the present hour
 Now turn thy thoughts, and joys within our power.
 From sad reflection let my soul repose;
 The name of him awakes a thousand woes.
 But guard him, gods! and to these arms restore!
 Not his true consort can desire him more;
 Not old Laertes, broken with despair;
 Not young Telemachus, his blooming heir.
 Alas, Telemachus! my sorrows flow
 Afresh for thee, my second cause of woe!
 Like some fair plant set by a heavenly hand,
 He grew, he flourish'd, and he blest the land;
 In all the youth his father's image shin'd,
 Bright in his person, brighter in his mind.
 What man, or god, deceiv'd his better sense,
 Far on the swelling seas to wander hence?
 To distant Pylos hapless is he gone,
 To seek his father's fate, and find his own!

For traitors wait his way, with dire design
 To end at once the great Arcean line.
 But let us leave him to their wills above;
 The fates of men are in the hand of Jove.
 And now, my venerable guest! declare
 Your name, your parents, and your native air.
 Sincere from whence begun your course relate,
 And to what ship I owe the friendly freight?"
 Thus he: and thus (with prompt invention bold)
 The cautious chief his ready story told:
 "On dark reserve what better can prevail,
 Or from the fluent tongue produce the tale,
 Than when two friends, alone, in peaceful place
 Confer, and wines and cates the table grace;
 But most, the kind inviter's cheerful face?
 Thus might we sit, with social goblets crown'd,
 Till the whole circle of the year goes round;
 Not the whole circle of the year would close
 My long narration of a life of woes. [I came
 But such was Heaven's high will! Know then,
 From sacred Crete, and from a sire of fame:
 Castor Hylacides (the name he bore)
 Belov'd and honour'd in his native shore;
 Blest in his riches, in his children more.
 Sprung from a handmaid, from a bought embrace,
 I shar'd his kindness with his lawful race:
 But when that fate, which all must undergo,
 From Earth remov'd him to the shades below;
 The large domain his greedy sons divide,
 And each was portion'd as the lots decide.
 Little, alas! was left my wretched share,
 Except a house, a covert from the air:
 But what by niggard fortune was denied,
 A willing widow's copious wealth supplied.
 My valour was my plea, a gallant mind
 That true to honour, never lag'd behind
 (The sex is ever to a soldier king).
 Now wasting years my former strength confound,
 And added woes have bow'd me to the ground;
 Yet by the stubble you may guess the grain,
 And mark the ruins of no vulgar man.
 Me, Pallas gave to lead the martial storm,
 And the fair ranks of battle to deform:
 Me, Mars inspir'd to turn the foe to flight,
 And tempt the secret ambush of the night.
 Let ghastly death in all his forms appear,
 I saw him not, it was not mine to fear.
 Before the rest I rais'd my ready steel;
 The first I met, he yielded, or he fell.
 But works of peace my soul disdain'd to bear,
 The rural labour, or domestic care.
 To raise the mast, the missile dart to wing,
 And send swift arrows from the bounding string,
 Were arts the gods made grateful to my mind;
 Those gods, who turn (to various ends design'd)
 The various thoughts and talents of mankind.
 Before the Grecians touch'd the Trojan plain,
 Nine times commander or by land or main,
 In foreign fields I spread my glory far,
 Great in the praise, rich in the spoils of war:
 Thence charg'd with riches, as increas'd in fame,
 To Crete return'd, an honourable name.
 But when great Jove that direful war decreed,
 Which rous'd all Greece, and made the mighty
 Our states myself and Idomen employ [bleed;
 To lead their fleets, and carry death to Troy.
 Nine years we warr'd; the tenth saw Ilion fall;
 Homeward we sail'd, but Heaven dispers'd us all.
 One only month my wife enjoy'd my stay;
 So will'd the god who gives and takes away.

Nine ships I mann'd, equipp'd with ready stores,
 Intent to voyage to th' Egyptian shores;
 In least and sacrifice my chosen train [main.
 Six days consum'd; the seventh we plough'd the Crete's ample fields diminish to our eye;
 Before the Boreal blasts the vessels fly;
 Safe through the level seas we sweep our way:
 The steer-man governs, and the ships obey.
 The fifth fair morn we stem th' Egyptian tide:
 And tilting o'er the bay the vessels ride:
 To anchor there my fellows I command,
 And spies commission to explore the land.
 But, sway'd by lust of gain, and headlong will,
 The coasts they ravage, and the natives kill.
 The spreading clamour to their city flies,
 And horse and foot in mingled tumults rise.
 The reddening dawn reveals the circling fields,
 Horrid with bristly spears, and glancing shields.
 Jove thunder'd on their side. Our guilty head
 We turn'd to flight; the gathering vengeance
 spread

On all parts round, and heaps on heaps lie dead.
 I then explor'd my thought, what course to prove;
 (And sure the thought was dictated by Jove,)
 Oh! had he left me to that happier doom,
 And sav'd a life of miseries to come!
 The radiant helmet from my brows unalac'd
 And low on earth my shield and javelin cast,
 I met the monarch with a suppliant's face,
 Approach his chariot, and his knees-embrace.
 He hear'd, he sav'd, he plac'd me at his side;
 My state he pity'd, and my tears he dried,
 Retrain'd the rage the vengeful foe express'd,
 And turn'd the deadly weapons from my breast.
 Pious! to guard the hospitable rite,
 And fearing Jove, whom mercy's works delight.

"In Egypt thus with peace and plenty blest,
 I liv'd (and happy still had liv'd) a guest,
 On seven bright years successive blessings wait;
 The next chang'd all the colour of my fate.
 A Phœnician, of insidious mind,
 Vex'd in vile arts, and foe to human kind,
 With semblance fair invites me to his home;
 I seiz'd the proffer (ever fond to roam)
 Domestic in his faithless roof I stay'd,
 Till the swift Sun his annual circle made.
 To Libya then he meditates the way;
 With guileful art a stranger to betray,
 And sell to bondage in a foreign laud:
 Much doubting, yet compell'd, I quit the strand.
 Through the mid seas the nimble pinnace sails,
 Afloat from Crete, before the northern gales:
 But when remote her chalky cliffs we lost,
 And far from ken of any other coast,
 When all was wild expanse of sea and air;
 Then doom'd high Jove due vengeance to prepare,
 He hung a night of horrors o'er their head
 (The shaded ocean black'd as it spread);
 He launch'd the fiery bolt; from pole to pole
 Broad burst the lightnings, deep the thunders roll;
 In giddy rounds the whirling ship is tost,
 And all in clouds of smothering sulphur lost.
 As from a hanging rock's tremendous height,
 The sable crows with intercepted flight [hue:
 Drop headlong: scarr'd and black with sulphurous
 So from the deck are hur'd the ghastly crew.
 Such and the wicked found! but Jove's intent
 Was yet to save th' oppress'd and innocent.
 Plac'd on the mast (the last resource of life)
 With night and storm I held unequal strife;

For nine long days the billows tilting o'er,
 The tenth soft wafts me to Thesprotia's shore.
 The monarch's son a shipwreck'd wretch reliev'd,
 The sire with hospitable rites receiv'd,
 And in his palace like a brother plac'd,
 With gifts of price and gorgeous garments grac'd.
 While here I sojourn'd, oft I heard the fame
 How late Ulysses to the country came,
 How lov'd, how honour'd, in this court he stay'd,
 And here his whole collected treasure lay'd;
 I saw myself the vast unnumber'd store
 Of steel elaborate and refulgent ore,
 And brass high heap'd amidst the regal dome;
 Immense supplies for ages yet to come!
 Meantime he voyag'd to explore the will
 Of Jove, on high Dodona's holy hill,
 What means might best his safe return avail,
 To come in pomp, or bear a secret sail?
 Full oft has Phidon, whilst he pour'd the wine,
 Attesting solemn all the powers divine,
 That soon Ulysses would return, declar'd,
 The sailors waiting and the ships prepar'd,
 But first the king dismiss'd me from his shores,
 For fair Dulichium crown'd with fruitful stores;
 To good Acastus' friendly care consign'd:
 But other counsels pleas'd the sailor's mind:
 New frauds were plotted by the faithless train,
 And misery demands me once again.
 Soon as remote from shore they plough the wave,
 With ready hands they rush to seize their slave;
 Then with these tatter'd rags they wrapp'd me
 round,

(Stripp'd of my own) and to the vessel bound.
 At eve, at Ithaca's delightful land
 The ship arriv'd: forth issuing on the land
 They sought repast; while to th' unhappy kind,
 The pitying gods themselves my chains unbind.
 Soft I descended, to the sea applied
 My naked breast, and shot along the tide.
 Soon past beyond their sight, I left the flood,
 And took the spreading shelter of the wood.
 Their prize escap'd the faithless pirates mourn'd;
 But deem'd enquiry vain, and to their ship return'd.
 Screen'd by protecting gods from hostile eyes,
 They led me to a good man and a wise,
 To live beneath thy hospitable care,
 And wait the woe Heaven dooms me yet to bear."

"Unhappy guest! whose sorrows touch my mind!"
 (Thus good Eumæus with a sigh rejoind)
 "For real sufferings since I grieve sincere,
 Check not with fallacies the springing tear;
 Nor turn the passion into groundless joy
 For him, whom Heaven has destin'd to destroy.
 Oh! had he perish'd on some well-fought day,
 Or in his friend's embraces died away:
 That grateful Græce with streaming eyes might raise

Historic marbles, to record his praise:
 His praise, eternal on the faithful stone,
 Had with transmissive honours grac'd his son.
 Now snatch'd by harpies to the dreary coast,
 Sunk is the hero, and his glory lost!
 While pensive in this solitary den,
 Far from gay cities and the ways of men,
 I linger life; nor to the coast repair,
 But when the constant queen commands my care;
 Or when, to taste her hospitable board,
 Some guest arrives, with rumour of her lord;
 And these indulge their want, and those their woe,
 And here the tears, and there the goblets flow.

By many such I have been warn'd; but chief
By one Ætolian robb'd of all belief,
Whose hap it was to this our roof to roam,
For murder banish'd from his native home.
He swore, Ulysses on the coast of Crete
Staid but a season to rest his fleet;
A few revolving months should wait him o'er,
Fraught with bold warriors, and a boundless store.
O thou! whom age has taught to understand,
And Heaven has guided with a favouring hand!
On god or mortal to obtrude a lie
Forbear, and dread to flatter as to die.
Not for such ends my house and heart are free,
But dear respect to Jove and charity."

"And why, O swain, of unbelieving mind?"
(Thus quick reply'd the wisest of mankind)
"Doubt you my oath? yet more my faith to try,
A solemn compact let us ratify,
And witness every power that rules the sky!
If here Ulysses from his labours rest,
Be then my prize a tunic and a vest;
And, where my hopes invite me, straight transport
In safety to Dulichium's friendly court.
But, if he greets not thy desiring eye,
Hurl me from yon dread precipice on high;
The due reward of fraud and perjury." [mine"]

"Doubtless, O guest! great laud and praise were (Reply'd the swain for spotless faith divine)
"If, after social rites and gifts bestow'd,
I stain'd my hospitable hearth with blood,
How would the gods my righteous toils succeed,
And bless the hand that spade a stranger bleed?
No more—th' approaching fairs of silent night
First claim reflection, then to rest invite;
Beneath our humble cottage let us haste,
And here, unenvy'd, rural dainties taste."

Thus continu'd these; while to their lowly dome

The full-fed swine return'd with evening home;
Compell'd, reluctant, to the several sties,
With dim obstreperous, and ungrateful cries.
Then to the slaves—"Now from the herd the best
Select, in honour of our foreign guest!
With him let us the genial banquet share,
For great and many are the griefs we bear:
While those who from our labours heap their board,
Blaspheme their feeder, and forget their lord."

Thus speaking, with dispatchful hand he took
A weighty ax, and cleft the solid oak;
This on the earth he pil'd; a boar full fed,
Of five years age, before the pile was led:
The swain, whom acts of piety delight,
Observant of the gods, begins the rite;
First shears the forehead of the bristly boar,
And suppliant stands; invoking every power
To speed Ulysses to his native shore.
A knotty stake then aiming at his head,
Down dropt he groaning, and the spirit fled.
The scorching flames climb round on every side:
Then the sing'd members they with skill divide;
On these, in rolls of fat involv'd with art,
The choicest morsels lay from every part [threw:
Some in the flames, bestrow'd with flour, they
Some cut in fragments, from the forks they drew;
These while on several tables they dispose,
As feast himself the blameless rustic rose;
Expert the destin'd victim to dis-part
In seven just portions, pure of hand and heart.
One sacred to the nymphs apart they lay;
Another to the winged son of May:

The rural tribe in common share the rest,
The king the chine, the honour of the feast,
Who sathe delighted at his servant's board;
The faithful servant joy'd his unknown lord.
"Oh! be thou dear (Ulysses cry'd) to Jove,
As well thou claim'st a grateful stranger's love!"
"Be then thy thanks" (the bounteous swain re-
"Enjoyment of the good the gods provide. [ply'd]
From God's own hand descend our joys and woes;
These he decrees, and he but suffers those:
All power is his, and whatso'er he wills,
The will itself, omnipotent, fulfils."

This said, the first-fruits to the gods he gave;
Then pour'd of offer'd wine the sable wave:
In great Ulysses' hand he plac'd the bowl,
He sate, and sweet refection cheer'd his soul.
The bread from cannisters Meaulius gave,
(Eumæus' proper treasure bought this slave,
And led from Taphos, to attend his board,
A servant added to his absent lord)
His task it was the wheaten loaves to lay,
And from the banquet take the bowls away.
And now the rage of hunger was repress'd,
And each betakes him to his couch to rest.
Now came the night, and darkness cover'd o'er
The face of things; the winds began to roar:
The driving storm the watery west-wind pours,
And Jove descends in deluges of showers.
Studios of rest and warmth, Ulysses lies,
Foresetting from the first the storm would rise;
In mere necessity of coat and cloak,
With artful preface to his host he spoke: [grace]

"Hear me, my friends! who this good banquet
'Tis sweet to play the fool in time and place,
And wine can of their wits the wise beguile,
Make the sage frolic, and the serious smile;
The grave in merr'y measures frisk about,
And many a long-repent'd word bring out.
Since to be talkative I now commence,
Let wit cast off the sullen yoke of sense. [days!]
Once I was strong (would Heaven restore those
And with my betters claim'd my share of praise.
Ulysses, Menelaus, led forth a band, [mand];
And join'd me with them (twas their own com-
A deathful ambush for the foe to lay,
Beneath Troy's walls by night we took our way:
There clad in arms, along the marshes spread,
We made the osier-fringed bank our bed,
Full soon th' inclemency of Heaven I feel,
Nor had these shoulders covering but of steel,
Sharp blew the north; snow whitening all the fields
Froze with the blast, and gathering guard our shields."

There all but I, well fenc'd with cloak and vest,
Lay cover'd by their ample shields at rest.
Fool that I was! I left behind my own;
The skill of weather and of winds unknown,
And trusted to my coat and shield alone!
When now was wasted more than half the night,
And the stars faded at approaching light;
Sudden I jogg'd Ulysses, who was laid
Fast by my side, and shivering thus I said:
"Here longer in this field I cannot lie;
The winter pinches, and with cold I die,
And die asham'd (O wisest of mankind)
The only fool who left his cloak behind."

"He thought, and answer'd: hardly waking yet,
Sprung in his mind the momentary wit
(That wit, which or in council, or in fight, Still met th' emergency, and determin'd right.)

'Hush thee,' he cry'd, (soft whispering in my ear)
 'Speak not a word, lest any Greek may hear'—
 And then (supporting on his arm his head)
 'Hear me, companions?' (thus aloud he said)
 'Methinks too distant from the fleet we lie:
 Ev'n now a vision stood before my eye,
 And sure the warning vision was from high:
 Let from among us some swift courier rise,
 Haste to the general, and demand supplies.'
 'Upstart'd Thoon straight, Andramon's son,
 Nimbly he rose, and cast his garments down;
 Instant, the racer vanish'd off the ground;
 That instant, in his cloak I wrapp'd me round:
 And safe I slept, till brightly dawning shone
 The morn conspicuous on her golden throne.
 "Oh, were my strength as then, as then my age!
 Some friend would fence me from the winter's rage.
 Ye, tatter'd as I look, I challeng'd then
 The honours and the offices of men:
 Some master, or some servant, would allow
 A cloak and vest—but I am nothing now!"
 "Well hast thou spoke" (rejoin'd th' attentive
 "Thy lips let fall no idle word or vain! [swain]
 Nor garment shalt thou want, nor sought beside,
 Meet for the wandering suppliant to provide.
 But in the morning take thy clothes again,
 For here one vest suffices every swain;
 No change of garments to our hind is known:
 But, when return'd, the good Ulysses' son
 With better hand shall grace with fit attires
 His guest, and send thee where thy soul desires."
 The honest herdsman rose, as this he said,
 And drew before the hearth the stranger's bed:
 The fleecy spoils of sheep, a goat's rough hide
 He spreads; and adds a mantle thick and wide;
 With store to heap above him, and below,
 And guard each quarter as the tempests blow.
 There lay the king and all the rest supine;
 All, but the careful master of the swine:
 Forth hasted he to tend his bristly care;
 Well arm'd, and fenc'd against nocturnal air;
 His weighty falchion o'er his shoulder tied:
 His shaggy cloak a mountain goat supplied:
 With his broad spear, the dread of dogs and men,
 He seeks his lodging in the rocky den.
 There to the tusk'd herd he bends his way, [lay.
 Where, screen'd from Boreas, high o'er-arch'd they sending the vessel to the town, proceeds by high-self to the lodge of Eumæus:

Now had Minerva reach'd those ample plains,
 Fam'd for the dance, where Menelaüs reigns;
 Anxious she flies to great Ulysses' heir,
 His instant voyage challeng'd all her care.
 Beneath the royal portico display'd,
 With Nestor's son, Telemachus was lay'd;
 In sleep profound the son of Nestor lies;
 Not thine, Ulysses! Care unscap'd his eyes:
 Restless he griev'd, with various fears oppress'd,
 And all thy fortunes roll'd within his breast.
 When, "O Telemachus!" (the goddess said)
 "Too long in vain, too widely hast thou stray'd.
 Thus leaving careless thy paternal right
 The robber's prize, the prey to lawless might.
 On fond pursuits neglectful while you roam,
 Ev'n now the hand of rapine sacks the dome.
 Hence to Atrides; and his leave explore
 To lanch thy vessel for thy natal shore;
 Fly, whilst thy mother virtuous yet withstands
 Her kindred's wishes, and her sire's commands;
 Through both Eurytæchus pursues the dame,
 And with the noblest gifts asserts his claim.
 Hence, therefore, while thy stores thy own remain;
 Thou know'st the practice of the female train:
 Lost in the children of the present spouse
 They slight the pledges of thy former vows;
 Their love is always with the lover past;
 Still the succeeding flame expels the last.
 Let o'er thy house some chosen maid preside,
 Till Heaven decrees to bless thee in a bride.
 But now thy more attentive ears incline,
 Observe the warnin'g of a power divine:
 For thee their smiles the suitor lords shall lay
 In Samos' sands, or straits of Ithaca;
 To seize thy life shall lurk the murderous band,
 Ere yet thy footsteps press thy native land,
 No—sooner far their riot and their lust
 All-covering earth shall bury deep in dust!
 Then distant from the scatter'd islands steer,
 For let the night retard thy full career;
 Thy heavenly guardian shall instruct the gales,
 To smooth thy passage, and supply thy sails:
 And when at Ithaca thy labour ends,
 Send to the town thy vessel with thy friends;
 But seek thou first the master of thy swine
 (For still to thee his loyal thoughts incline);
 There pass the night: while he his course pursues
 To bring Penelope the wish'd-for news,
 That thou, safe sailing from the Pylian strand,
 Art come to bless her in thy native land."
 Thus spoke the goddess, and resum'd her flight,
 To the pure regions of eternal light.
 Meanwhile Pisistratus he gently shakes,
 And with these words the slumbering youth awakes:
 "Rise, son of Nestor! for the road prepare,
 And join the harness'd coursers to the car.
 "What cause," he cried, "can justify our flight,
 To tempt the dangers of forbidden night?
 Here wait we rather, till approaching day
 Shall prompt our speed, and point the ready way.
 Nor think of flight before the Spartan king
 Shall bid farewell, and bounteous presents bring;
 Gifts, which, to distant ages safely stor'd,
 The sacred act of friendship shall record." [cast.
 Thus he. But when the dawn bestreak'd the
 The king from Helen rose, and sought his guest.

ARGUMENT.

THE RETURN OF TELEMACHUS.

The goddess Minerva commands Telemachus in a vision to return to Ithaca. Pisistratus and he take leave of Menelaüs, and arrive at Pylos, where they part; and Telemachus sets sail,
 after having received on board Theoclymæus the soothsayer. The scene then changes to the cottage of Eumæus, who entertains Ulysses with a recital of his adventures. In the mean time Telemachus arrives on the coast, and

As soon as his approach the hero knew,
The splendid mantle round him first he threw,
Then o'er his ample shoulders whir'd the cloak,
Respectful met the monarch, and bespoke:

"Hail great Atrides, favour'd of high Jove!
Let not thy friends in vain for licence move.
Swift let us measure back the watery way,
Nor check our speed, impatient of delay."

"If with desire so strong thy bosom glows,
Ill, said the king, should I thy wish oppose;
For oft in others freely I reprove
The ill-tim'd efforts of officious love;
Who love too much, hate in the like extreme,
And both the golden mean alike condemn.
Alike he thwarts the hospitable end,
Who drives the free, or stays the hasty friend;
True friendship's laws are by this rule express'd,
Welcome the coming, speed the parting guest.
Yet stay, my friends, and in your chariot take
The noblest presents that our love can make:
Meantime commit we to our women's care,
Some choice domestic viands to prepare;
The traveller, rising from the banquet gay,
Eludes the labours of the tedious way.
Then if a wider course shall rather please
Through spacious Argos, and the realms of Greece,
Atrides in his chariot shall attend;
Himself thy convoy to each royal friend.
No prince will let Ulysses' heir remove
Without some pledge, some monument of love:
These will the caldron, these the tripod give,
From those the well-pair'd mules we shall receive,
Or bowl emboss'd whose golden figures live."

To whom the youth, for prudence fam'd, replied:

"O monarch, care of Heaven! thy people's pride!
No friend in Ithaca my place supplies,
No powerful hands are there, no watchful eyes:
My stores expos'd and fenceless house demand
The speediest succour from my guardian hand;
Lest, in a search too anxious and too vain
Of one lost joy, I lose what yet remain."

His purpose when the generous warrior heard,
He charg'd the household cates to be prepar'd.
Now with the dawn from his adjoining home,
Was Boethedes Eteonus come;
Swift as the word he forms the rising blaze,
And o'er the coals the smoking fragments lays.
Meantime the king, his son, and Helen, went
Where the rich wardrobe breath'd a costly scent.
The king selected from the glittering rows
A bowl; the prince a silver beaker chose.
The beautiful queen revolv'd with careful eyes
Her various textures of unnumber'd dyes,
And chose the largest; with no vulgar art
Her own fair hands embroider'd every part:
Beneath the rest it lay divinely bright,
Like radiant Hesper o'er the gems of night.
Then with each gift they hasten'd to their guest,
And thus the king Ulysses' heir address'd:

"Since fix'd are thy resolves, may thundering
With happiest omens thy desires approve! [Jove
This silver bowl, whose costly margins shine
Enchas'd with gold, this valned gift be thine;
To me this present of Vulcanian frame,
From Sidos' hospitable monarch came;
To thee we now consign the precious load,
The pride of kings and labour of a god."

Then gave the cup; while Megapenthe brought
The silver vase with living sculpture wrought.

The beautiful queen, advancing next, display'd
The shining veil, and thus endearing said:
"Accept, dear youth, this monument of love,
Long since, in better days, by Helen vow'd:
Safe in thy mother's care the vesture lay,
To deck thy bride, and grace thy nuptial day.
Meantime may'st thou with happiest speed regain
Thy stately palace, and thy wide domain."

She said, and gave the veil; with grateful look
The prince the variegated present took.
And now, when through the royal dome they pass'd,
High on a throne the king each stranger plac'd.
A golden ewer th' attendant damsel brings,
Replete with water from the crystal springs;
With copious streams the shining vase supplies
A silver laver of capacious size.
They wash. The tables in fair order spread,
The glittering canisters are crown'd with bread,
Viands of various kinds allure the taste,
Of choicest sort and savour; rich repeat!
Whilst Eteonus portions out the ebanes,
Atrides' son the purple draught prepares.
And now (each sat with the genial feast,
And the short rage of thirst and hunger cess'd)
Ulysses' son, with his illustrious friend,
The horses join'd, the polish'd car ascend.
Along the court the fiery steeds rebound,
And the wide portal echoes to the sound.
The king proceeds; a bowl with fragrant wine
(Libation destin'd to the powers divine)
His right-hand held: before the steeds he stands,
Then, mix'd with prayers, he utters these commands:

"Farewell, and prosper, youths! let Nestor know
What grateful thoughts still in this bosom glow,
For all the proofs of his paternal care,
Through the long dangers of the ten years' war."
"Ah! doubt not our report" (the prince rejoic'd)
"Of all the virtues of thy generous mind.
And oh! return'd might we Ulysses meet!
To him thy presents show, thy words repeat:
How will each speech his grateful wonder raise,
How will each gift indulge us in thy praise!"

Scarce ended thus the prince, when on the right
Advanc'd the bird of Jove: suspicious sight!
A milk-white fowl his clenching talons bore,
With rare domestic pumper'd at the floor.
Peasants in vain with threatening cries pursue,
In solemn speed the bird majestic flew
Full dexter to the car: the prosperous sight
Fill'd every breast with wonder and delight.

But Nestor's son the cheerful silence broke,
And in these words the Spartan chief bespoke:
"Say, if to us the gods these omens send,
Or fates peculiar to thyself portend?" [press'd,
Whilst yet the monarch pau'd with doubts op-
The beautiful queen reliev'd his labouring breast.
"Hear me," she cried, "to whom the gods have given

To read this sign, and mystic sense of Heaven.
As thus the plummy sovereign of the air
Left on the mountain's brow his callow care,
And wander'd through the wide ethereal way
To pour his wrath on you luxurious prey;
So shall thy godlike father, toss'd in vain
Through all the dangers of the boundless main,
Arrive (or is, perchance, already come)
From slaughter'd gluttons to release the dome."

"Oh! if this promis'd bliss by thundering Jove"
(The prince replied) "stand fix'd in fate above;

To thee, as to some god, I'll temples raise,
And crown thy altars with the costly blaze."

He said; and, bending o'er his chariot, flung
Athwart the fiery steeds the smarting thong;
The bounding shafts upon the harness play,
Till night descending intercepts the way.
To Diocles, at Phœbus, they repair,
Whose boasted sire was sacred Alpheus' heir;
With him all night the youthful strangers stay'd,
Nor found the hospitable rites unpay'd.
But soon as Morning from her orient bed
Had ting'd the mountains with her earliest red,
They join'd the steeds, and on the chariot sprung;
The brazen portals in their passage rung.

To Polyphides they came; when thus began
To Nestor's heir Ulysses' godlike son:
"Let not Pisistratus in vain be prest,
Nor uncommencing hear his friend's request;
His friend, by long hereditary claim,
In title his equal, and in years the same.
No farther from our vessel, I implore,
The couriers drive; but lash them to the shore.
Too long thy father would his friends detain;
I dread his proffer'd kindness urg'd in vain."

The hero paus'd, and ponder'd this request,
While love and duty warr'd within his breast.
At length resolv'd, he turn'd his ready hand,
And lash'd his panting couriers to the strand.
There, while within the poop with care he stor'd
The regal presents of the Spartan lord;
"With speed begone!" said he; "call every mate,
Ere yet to Nestor I the tale relate;
'Tis true, the fervour of his generous heart
Brooks no repulse, nor could'st thou soon depart;
Himself will seek thee here, nor wilt thou find,
In word alone, the Pylian monarch kind.
But when, arriv'd, he thy return shall know,
How will his breast with honest fury glow!"
This said, the sounding strokes his horses fire,
And soon he reach'd the palace of his sire.
"Now," (cried Telemachus) "with speedy care
Hoist every sail, and every oar prepare,
Swift as the wind his willing mates obey,
And seize their seats, impatient for the sea."

Meantime the prince with sacrifice adores
Minerva, and her guardian aid implores;
When lo! a wretch ran breathless to the shore,
New from his crime, and reeking yet with gore.
A serf he was, from great Melampus sprung,
Melampus, who in Pylos flourish'd long.
Till, urg'd by wrongs, a foreign realm he chose,
Far from the hateful cause of all his woes.
Neleus his treasures one long year detains;
As long, he groan'd in Philacus's chains:
Meantime, what anguish, and what rage, combin'd,
For lovely Pero rack'd his labouring mind!
Yet scap'd he death; and vengeful of his wrong
To Pylos drove the loving herds along:
Then (Neleus vanquish'd, and consign'd the fair
To Bias' arms) he sought a foreign air;
Argos the rich for his retreat he chose,
There form'd his empire; there his palace rose.
From him Antiphates and Mantius came:
The first begot Oiclus great in fame,
And he Amphiarus, immortal name!
The people's saviour, and divinely wise,
Belov'd by Jove, and him who gilds the skies,
Yet ebor't his date of life; by female pride he dies.
From Mantius Clitus, whom Aurora's love
Scatch'd for his beauty to the thrones above:

And Polyphides on whom Phœbus shone
With fullest rays, Amphiarus now gone;
In Hyperesia's groves he made abode,
And taught mankind the counsels of the god.
From him sprung Theoclymenus, who found
(The sacred wine yet foaming on the ground)
Telemachus: whom, as to Heaven he press'd
His ardent vows, the stranger thus address'd:

"O thou! that dost thy happy course prepare
With pure libations, and with solemn prayer;
By that dread power to whom thy vows are paid;
By all the lives of these; thy own dear head,
Declare sincerely to no foe's demand
Thy name, thy lineage, and paternal land."

"Prepare then," said Telemachus, "to know
A tale from falsehood free, not free from woe.
From Ithaca, of royal birth, I came,
And great Ulysses (ever honour'd name!)
Was once my sire: though now for ever lost,
In Stygian gloom he glides a penive ghost!
Whose fate inquiring through the world we rove;
The last, the wretched proof of filial love."

The stranger then: "Not shall I aught conceal,
But the dire secret of my fate reveal.
Of my own tribe an Argive wretch I slew;
Whose powerful friends the luckless deed pursue
With unrelenting rage, and force from home
The blood-stain'd exile, ever doom'd to roam.
But bear, O bear me o'er yon azure flood;
Receive the suppliant! spare my destin'd blood!"
"Stranger," replied the prince, "securely rest
Affianc'd in our faith; henceforth our guest."

Thus affable, Ulysses' godlike heir
Takes from the stranger's hand the glittering spear
He climbs the ship, ascends the stern with haste,
And by his side the guest accepted plac'd.
The chief his orders gives: th' obedient band
With due observance wait the chief's command;
With speed the mast they rear, with speed unbind
The spacious sheet, and stretch it to the wind.
Minerva calls; the ready gales obey
With rapid speed to whirl them o'er the sea.
Cruasus they pass'd, next Chalcis roll'd away,
When thickening darkness clos'd the doubtful day;
The silver Phœnix's glittering rills they lost,
And skimm'd along by Elis' sacred coast.
Then cautious through the rocky reaches wind,
And, tarring sudden, shun the death design'd."

Meantime the king, Eumæus, and the rest,
Sate in the cottage, at their rural feast:
The banquet past, and satiate every man,
To try his host, Ulysses thus began:

"Yet one night more, my friends, indulge your
The last I purpose in your walls to rest: (guest)
To-morrow for myself I must provide,
And only ask your counsel, and a guide:
Patient, to roam the street, by hunger led,
And bless the friendly hand that gives me bread,
There in Ulysses' roof I may relate
Ulysses' wanderings to his royal mate;
Or, mingling with the suitors' haughty trails,
Not undeserving some support obtain.
Hermes to me his various gifts imparts,
Patron of industry and manual arts:
Few can with me in dextrous works contend,
The pyre to build, the stubborn oak to read;
To turn the tasteful viand o'er the flame;
Or foam the goblet with a purple stream.
Such are the tasks of men of mean estate,
Whom fortune deems to serve the rich and great:

" Alas !" (Eumæus with a sigh rejoin'd)
 " How sprung a thought so monstrous in thy mind !
 If on that goddess race thou would'st attend,
 Fate owes thee sure a miserable end !
 Their wrongs and blasphemies ascend the sky,
 And pull descending vengeance from on high.
 Not such, my friend, the servants of their feast ;
 A blooming train in rich embroidery drest,
 With Earth's whole tribute the bright table bends,
 And smiling round celestial youth attends.
 Stay then : no eye askance beholds thee here :
 Sweet is thy converse to each social ear ;
 Well pleas'd, and pleasing, in our cottage rest,
 Till good Telemachus accepts his guest
 With genial gifts, and change of fair attires,
 And safe conveys thee where thy soul desires."

To him the man of woes : " O gracious Jove !
 Reward this stranger's hospitable love !
 Who, knows the son of sorrow to relieve,
 Cheers the sad heart, nor lets affliction grieve.
 Of all the ill unhappy mortals know,
 A life of wanderings is the greatest woe :
 On all their weary paths wait care and pain,
 And pine and penury, a meagre train.
 To such a man since harbour you afford,
 Relate the farther fortunes of your lord ;
 What cares his mother's tender breast engage,
 And sire forsaken on the verge of age ;
 Beneath the Sun prolong they yet their breath,
 Or range the house of darkness and of death ?"
 To whom the swain : " Attend what you inquire ;
 Laertes lives, the miserable sire
 Lives, but implores of every power to lay
 The burden down, and wishes for the day.
 Torn from his offspring in the eve of life,
 Torn from th' embraces of his tender wife,
 Sole, and all comfortless, he wastes away
 Old age, untimely posting ere his day.
 She too, sad mother ! for Ulysses lost
 Pin'd out her bloom, and vanish'd to a ghost.
 (So dire a fate, ye righteous gods ! avert,
 From every friendly, every feeling heart !)
 While yet she was, though clouded o'er with grief,
 Her pleasing converse minister'd relief ;
 With Ctimene, her youngest daughter, bred,
 One roof contain'd us, and one table fed.
 But when the softly-stealing pace of time
 Crept on from childhood into youthful prime,
 To Samos' isle she sent the wedded fair ;
 Me to the fields, to tend the rural care ;
 Array'd in garments her own hands had wove,
 Nor less the darling object of her love.
 Her hapless death my brighter days o'ercast,
 Yet Providence deserts me not at last ;
 My present labours food and drink procure,
 And more, the pleasure to relieve the poor.
 Small is the comfort from the queen to hear
 Unwelcome news, or vex the royal ear ;
 Blank and discountenanc'd the servants stand,
 Nor dare to question where the proud command :
 Nor profit springs beneath usurping powers ;
 Nor feeds not there, where luxury devours,
 Nor harbours charity where riot reigns :
 Proud are the lords, and wretched are the swains."
 The suffering chief at this began to melt ;
 And, " O Eumæus ! thou" (he cries) " hast felt
 The spite of Fortune too ! her cruel hand
 Snatch'd thee an infant from thy native land !
 Snatch'd from thy parents' arms, thy parents' eyes,
 To early wants ! a man of miseries !

Thy whole sad story, from its first, declare :
 Sunk the fair city by the rage of war,
 Where once thy parents dwelt ? or did they keep,
 In humbler life, the lowing herds and sheep ?
 So left perhaps to tend the fleecy train,
 Rude pirates seiz'd, and shipp'd thee o'er the main !
 Doom'd a fair prize to grace some prince's board,
 The worthy purchase of a foreign lord."

" If then my fortunes can delight my friend,
 A story fruitful of events attend :
 Another's sorrows may thy ear enjoy,
 And wine the lengthen'd intervals employ.
 Long nights the now declining year bestows ;
 A part we consecrate to soft repose,
 A part in pleasing talk we entertain ;
 For too much rest itself becomes a pain.
 Let those, whom sleep invites, the call obey,
 Their cases rearing with the dawning day :
 Here let us feast, and to the feast be join'd
 Discourse, the sweeter banquet of the mind ;
 Review the series of our lives, and taste
 The melancholy joy of evils past :
 For he who much has suffer'd, much will know ;
 And pleas'd remembrance builds delight on woe.
 " Above Ortygia lies an isle of fame,
 Far hence remote, and Syria is the name
 (There curious eyes inscrib'd with wonder trace
 The Sun's diurnal, and his annual race) ;
 Not large, but fruitful ; stor'd with grass, to keep
 The bellowing oxen, and the bleating sheep ;
 Her sloping hills the mantling vines adorn,
 And her rich valleys wave with golden corn.
 No want, no famine, the glad natives know,
 Nor sink by sickness to the shades below ;
 But when a length of years unnerves the strong,
 Apollo comes, and Cynthia comes along.
 They bend the silver bow with tender skill,
 And, void of pain, the silent arrows kill.
 Two equal tribes this fertile land divide,
 Where two fair cities rise with equal pride.
 But both in constant peace one prince obey,
 And Ctesius there, my father, holds the sway."
 Freight'd, it seems, with toys of every sort
 A ship of Sidon anchor'd in our port ;
 What time it chanc'd the palace entertain'd,
 Skill'd in rich works, a woman of their land :
 'This nymph, where anchor'd the Phœnician train
 To wash her robes descending to the main,
 A smooth-tongued sailor won her to his mind
 (For love deceives the best of woman-kind).
 A sudden trust from sudden liking grew ;
 She told her name, her race, and all she knew.
 ' I too' (she cried) ' from glorious Sidon came,
 My father Arybas, of wealthy fame ;
 But, snatch'd by pirates from my native place,
 The Taphians sold me to this man's embrace.'
 " Haste then," (the false designing youth re-ply'd)
 ' Haste to thy country ; love shall be thy guide ;
 Haste to thy father's house ; thy father's breast,
 For still he lives, and lives with riches blest.'
 " Swear first," she cried, ' ye sailors ! to restore
 A wretch in safety to her native shore.'
 Swift as she ask'd, the ready sailors swore.
 She then proceeds : " Now let our compact made
 Be nor by signal nor by word betray'd,
 Nor near me any of your crew descried
 By road frequented, nor by fountain side.
 Be silence still our guard. The monarch's spies
 (For watchful age is ready to surmise)

Ate still at hand ; and this, reveal'd, must be Death to yourselves, eternal chains to me.
Your vessel loaded, and your traffic past,
Dispatch a wary messenger with haste :
Then gold and costly treasures will I bring,
And more, the infant offspring of the king.
Him, child-like wandering forth, I'll lead away,
(A noble prize!) and to your ship convey.'

" Thus spoke the dame, and homeward took the
A year they traffic, and their vessel load, [round.
Their stores complete, and ready now to weigh,
A spy was sent their summons to convey :
An artist to my father's palace came,
With gold and amber chains, elaborate frame :
Each female eye the glittering links employ,
They turn, review, and chespen every toy.
He took the occasion, as they stood intent,
Gave her the sign, and to his vessel went.
She straight pursued, and seiz'd my willing arm ;
I followed smiling, innocent of harm.

Three golden goblets in the porch she found
(The guests not enter'd, but the table crown'd) ;
Hid in her fraudulent bosom, these she bore :
Now set the Sun, and darkened all the shore.
Arriving then, where tilting on the tides
Prepar'd to lanch the freighted vessel rides ;
Aboard they heave us, mount their decks, and
With level oar along the glassy deep. [sweep
Six calm days and six smooth nights we sail,
And constant Jove supplied the gentle gale.

The seventh, the fraudulent wretch, (no cause de-Touch'd by Diana's vengeful arrow, died. [sried)
Down dropp'd the caitiff-corse, a worthless load,
Down to the deep ; there roll'd, the future food
Of fierce sea-woives, and monsters of the flood.
An helpless infant, I remain'd behind ;
Thence borne to Ithaca by wave and wind ;
Sold to Laertes, by divine command,
And now adopted to a foreign land."

To him the king : " Reciting thus thy cares,
My secret soul in all thy sorrows shares :
But one choice blessing (such is Jove's high will)
Has sweeten'd all thy bitter draught of ill :
Torn from thy country to no hapless end,
The gods have, in a master, given a friend.
Whatever frugal Nature needs is thine,
(For she needs little) daily bread and wine.
While I, so many wanderings past and woes,
Live but on what thy poverty bestows."

So pass'd in pleasing dialogue away
The night ; then down to short repose they lay ;
Till radiant rose the messenger of day,
While in the port of Ithaca, the band
Of young Telemachus approach'd the land ;
The sails they loos'd, they lash'd the mast aside,
And cast their anchors, and the cables tied :
Then on the breezy shore descending join
In grateful banquet o'er the rosy wine.

When thus the prince : " Now each his course
I to the fields, and to the city you, (pursue ;
Long absent hence, I dedicate this day
My swains to visit, and the works survey.
Expect me with the morn, to pay the skies
Our debt of safe return, in feast and sacrifice."

Then Theoclymenus : " But who shall lend,
Meantime, protection to thy stranger-friend ?
Straight to the queen and palace shall I fly,
Or, yet more distant, to some lord apply ?"

The prince return'd : " Renown'd in days of yore
Has stood our father's hospitable door ;

No other roof a stranger should receive,
No other hands than ours the welcome give.
But in my absence riot fills the place,
Nor bears the modest queen a stranger's face ;
From noiseful revel far remote she flies,
But rarely seen, or seen with weeping eyes.
No—let Eurymachus receive my guest,
Of nature courteous, and by far the best ;
He wooes the queen with more respectful flame,
And emulates her former husband's fame :
With what success, 'tis Jove's alone to know,
And the hop'd nuptials turn to joy or woe."

Thus speaking, on the right up-soar'd in air
The hawk, Apollo's swift-wing'd messenger ;
His deathful pounces tore a trembling dove ;
The clotted feathers, scatter'd from above,
Between the hero and the vessel pour
Thick plumage, mingled with a sanguine shower.

Th' observing augur took the prince aside,
Seiz'd by the hand, and thus prophetic cried :
" You bird that dexter cuts th' aerial road,
Rose ominous, nor flies without a god :
No race but thine shall Ithaca obey,
To thine, for aces, Heaven decrees the sway."
" Succeed the omen, gods !" (the youth rejoind)
Soon shall my bounties speak a grateful mind,
And soon each envied happiness attend
The man, who calls Telemachus his friend."
Then to Peiræus—" Thou whom time has prov'd
A faithful servant, by thy prince belov'd !
Till we returning shall our guest demand,
Accept this charge with honour at our hand."

To this Peiræus : " Joyful I obey,
Well pleas'd the hospitable rites to pay,
The presence of thy guest shall best reward
(If long thy stay) the absence of my lord."

With that their anchors he commands to weigh,
Mount the tall bark, and lanch into the sea.
All with obedient haste forsake the shores,
And, plac'd in order, spread their equal oars.
Then from the deck the prince his sandals takes ;
Pois'd in his hand the pointed javelin shakes.
They part ; while, lessening from the hero's view,
Swift to the town the well-row'd galley flew :
The hero trod the margin of the main,
And reach'd the mansion of his faithful swain.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XVI.

ARGUMENT.

THE DISCOVERY OF ULYSSES TO TELEMACHUS.

TELEMACHUS arriving at the lodge of EUMÆUS sends him to carry Penelope the news of his return. Minerva appearing to Ulysses commands him to discover himself to his son. The princes, who had lain in ambush to intercept Telemachus in his way, their project being defeated, return to Ithaca.

Soon as the morning blush'd along the plains,
Ulysses and the monarch of the swains
Awake the sleeping fires, their meal prepare,
And forth to pasture send the bristly care.

The prince's near approach the dogs desery,
And fawning round his feet confess their joy.
Their gentle blandishment the king survey'd,
Heard his resounding strp, and instant said:
"Some well-known friend, Eumæus, bends this
His steps I hear; the dogs familiar play." [way;

While yet he spoke, the prince advancing drew
Nigh to the lodge, and now appear'd in view.
Transported from his seat Eumæus sprung,
Dropp'd the full bowl, and round his bosom hung;
Kissing his cheek, his hand, while from his eye
The tears rain'd copious in a shower of joy.
As some fond sire, who ten long winters grieves,
From foreign climes an only son receives,
(Child of his age) with strong paternal joy
Forward he springs, and claps the favourite boy:
So round the youth his arms Eumæus spread,
As if the grave had given him from the dead.

"And is it thou! my ever-dear delight!
Oh, art thou come to bless my longing sight!
Never, I never hop'd to view this day, [way.
When o'er the waves you plough'd the desperate
Enter, my child! beyond my hopes restor'd,
Oh give these eyes to feast upon their lord!
Enter, oh seldom seen! for lawless powers
Too much detain thee from thy sylvan bowers."

The prince replied: "Eumæus, I obey;
To seek thee, friend, I hither took my way.
But say, 'if in the court the queen reside,
Severely chaste, or if commenc'd a bride?"

Thus he: and thus the monarch of the swains:
"Severely chaste Penelope remains;
But, lost to every joy, she wastes the day
In tedious cares, and weeps the night away."

He ended; and (receiving as they pass
The javelin, pointed with a star of brass)
They reach'd the dome; the dome with marble
His seat Ulysses to the prince resign'd. [shin'd.

"Not so"—(exclaim'd the prince with decent grace)
"For me, this house shall find an humbler place:
T' usurp the honours due to silver hairs
And reverend strangers, modest youth forbears."
Instant the swain the spoils of beasts supplies,
And bids the rural throne with oziens rise.
There sat the prince: the feast Eumæus spread,
And heap'd the shining canisters with bread.
Thick o'er the board the plenteous viands lay,
The frugal remnants of the former day.
Then in a bowl he tempers generous wines,
Around whose verge a mimic ivy twines.
And now, the rage of thirst and hunger fed,
Thus young Ulysses to Eumæus said:

"Whence father, from what shore this stranger,
What vessel bore him o'er the watery way? [say,
To human step our land impervious lies,
And round the coast circumfluent oceans rise."

The swain returns: "A tale of sorrows hear:
In spacious Crete he drew his natal air,
Long doom'd to wander o'er the land and main,
For Heaven has wove his thread of life with pain.
Half-brave athless 'scaping to the land he flew
From Theprot mariners, a murderous crew.
To thee, my son, the suppliant I resign,
I gave him my protection, grant him thine."

"Hard task," he cries, "thy virtue gives thy
Willing to aid, unable to defend. [friend,
Can strangers safely in the court reside,
Midst the swell'd insolence of lust and pride?
Ev'n I unsafe: the queen in doubt to wed,
Or pay due honours to the nuptial bed:

Perhaps she weds regardless of her fame,
Deaf to the mighty Ulysses name.
However, stranger, from our grace receive
Such honours as befit a prince to give;
Sandals, a sword, and robes, respect to prove,
And safe to sail with ornaments of love.
Till then, thy guest amid the rural train,
Far from the court, from danger far, detain.
'Tis mine with food the hungry to supply,
And clothe the naked from th' inclement sky.
Here dwell in safety from the smiters' wrongs,
And the rude insults of ungovern'd tongues.
For, should'st thou suffer, powerless to relieve,
I must behold it, and can only grieve.
The brave encompass'd by an hostile train,
O'erpower'd by numbers, is but brave in vain."
To whom, while anger in his bosom glows,
With warmth replies the man of mighty woes:
"Since audience mild is deign'd, permit my tongue

At once to pity and resent thy wrong.
My heart weeps blood to see a soul so brave
Live to base insolence of power a slave.
But tell me, dost thou, prince, dost thou behold,
And hear, their midnight revels uncontrol'd?
Say, do thy subjects in bold faction rise,
Or priests in fabled oracles advise?
Or are thy brothers, who should aid thy power,
Turn'd mean deserters in the needful hour?
Oh! that I were from great Ulysses sprung,
Or that these wither'd nerves like thine were strong;
Or, Heavens! might he return! (and soon appear
He shall, I trust: a hero scorn despair!)
Might he return, I yield my life a prey
To my worst foe, if that avenging day
Be not their last: but should I lose my life
Oppress'd by numbers in the glorious strife,
I choose the nobler part, and yield my breath,
Rather than bear dishonour, worse than death;
Than see the hand of violence invade
The reverend stranger, and the spotless maid;
Than see the wealth of kings consum'd in waste,
The drunkard revel, and the gluttons feast."

Thus he, with anger flashing from his eye;
Sincere the youthful hero made reply:
"Nor leagu'd in factious arms my subjects rise,
Nor priests in fabled oracles advise;
Nor are my brothers who should aid my power
Turn'd mean deserters in the needful hour.
Ah m! I boast no brother; Heaven's dread king
Gives from our stock an only branch to spring:
Alone Laertes reign'd Arcesius' heir,
Alone Ulysses drew the vital air,
And I alone the bed consubial grac'd,
An unblest offspring of a sire unblest!
Each neighbouring realm, conducive to our woes,
Sends forth her peers, and every peer a foe:
The court proud Samos and Dulicibus fills,
And lofty Zacynth crown'd with shady hills,
Ev'n Ithaca and all her lords invade
Th' imperial sceptre, and the regal bed:
The queen, averse to love, yet aw'd by power,
Seems half to yield, yet dies the bridal hour!
Meantime their licence uncontrol'd I bear;
Ev'n now they envy me the vital air:
But Heaven will sure revenge, and gods there are
"But go, Eumæus! to the queen impart
Our safe return, and ease a mother's heart.
Yet secret go; for numerous are my foes,
And here at least I may in peace repose."

To whom the swain: "I hear, and I obey:
But old Laertes weeps his life away,
And deems thee lost: shall I my speed employ
To bless his age; a messenger of joy?
The mournful hour that tore his son away
Sent the sad sire in solitude to stray;
Yet, busied with his slaves, to ease his woe,
He dress'd the vine, and bade the garden blow,
Nor food nor wine refus'd: but since the day
That you to Pylos plough'd the watery way,
Nor wine nor food he tastes; but sunk in woe,
Wild springs the vine, no more the garden blows:
Shut from the walks of men to pleasure lost,
Passive and pale he wanders, half a ghost."
"Wretched old man!" (with tears the prince returns)

"Yet cease to go—what man so blest but mourns?
Were every wish indulg'd by favouring skies,
This hour should give Ulysses to my eyes.
But to the queen with speed dispatchful bear
Our safe return, and back with speed repair:
And let some handmaid of her train resort
To good Laertes in his rural court."

While yet he spoke, impatient of delay,
He brac'd his sandals on, and strode away:
Then from the Heavens the martial goddess flies
Through the wide fields of air, and cleaves the skies;
In form a virgin in soft beauty's bloom,
Skill'd in th' illustrious labours of the loom.
Alone to Ithacus she stood display'd,
But, unapparent as a viewless shade
Escap'd Telemachus (the powers above,
Seen or unseen, o'er earth at pleasure move):
The dogs intelligent confess the tread
Of power divine; and, howling, trembling, fled.
The goddess, beckoning, waves her deathless hands;
Dauntless the king before the goddess stands.

"Then why," (she said) "O favour'd of the skies!
Why to thy godlike son this long disguise?
Stand forth reveal'd: with him thy cares employ
Against thy foes; be valiant, and destroy!
Lo! I descend in that avenging hour,
To combat by thy side, thy guardian power."

She said, and o'er him waves her wand of gold;
Imperial robes his manly limbs unfold;
At once with grace divine his fame improves:
At once with majesty enlarg'd he moves:
Youth flush'd his reddening cheek, and from his
A length of hair in sable ringlets flows; [brows
His blackening chin receives a deeper shade;
Then from his eyes upspring the warrior-maid.

The hero re-ascends: the prince o'er aw'd
Scarce lifts his eyes, and bows as to a god.
Then with surprise (surprise chastis'd by fears)
"How art thou chang'd!" (he cry'd) "a god appears!

Far other vests thy limbs majestic grace,
Far other glories lighten from thy face!
If Heaven be thy abode, with pious care
Lo! I the ready sacrifice prepare:
Lo! gifts of labour'd gold adorn thy shrine,
To win thy grace: Oh save us, power divine!"
"Few are my days," Ulysses made reply,
"Nor I alas! descendant of the sky.
I am thy father. Oh my son! my son!
That father, for whose sake thy days have run
One scene of woe; to endless cares consign'd,
And outrag'd by the wrongs of base mankind."

Then rushing to his arms, he kiss'd his boy
With the strong raptures of a parent's joy,

Tears bathes his cheek, and tears the ground be-
dew:

He strain'd him close, as to his breast he grew.
"Ah me!" (exclaims the prince with fond desire)
"Thou art—no, thou can'st not be my sire.
Heaven such illusion only can impose,
By the false joy to aggravate my woe.
Who but a god can change the general doom,
And give to wither'd age a youthful bloom?
Late, worn with years, in weeds obscene you
trod;

Now, cloth'd in majesty, you move a god!"
"Forbear," he cry'd; "for Heaven reserves that Give to thy father, but a father's claim: [name,
Other Ulysses shalt thou never see,
I am Ulysses, I (my son) am he.
Twice ten sad years o'er earth and ocean tost,
'Tis given at length to view my native coast.
Pallas, unconquer'd maid, my frame surrounds
With grace divine; her power admits no bounds:
She o'er my limbs old age and wrinkles shed;
Now, strong as youth, magnificent I tread.
The gods with ease frail man depress or raise,
Exalt the lowly, or the proud debase." [flew,

He spoke, and sate. The prince with transport
Hung round his neck, while tears his cheek bedew:
Nor less the father pour'd a social flood!
They wept abundant, and they wept aloud.
As the bold eagle with fierce sorrow stung,
Or parent vulture, mourns her ravish'd young:
They cry, they scream, their unfledg'd brood a prey:
To some rude churl, and borne by stealth away;
So they aloud: and tears in tides had run,
Their grief unfinish'd with the setting Sun:
But checking the full torrent in its flow,
The prince thus interrupts the solemn woe.

"What ship transported thee, O father, say,
And what bless'd hands have oar'd thee on the way?"
"All, all" (Ulysses instant made reply)

I tell thee all, my child, my only joy!
Phœacians bore me to the port assign'd,
A nation ever to the stranger kind;
Wrapp'd in th' embrace of sleep, the faithful train
O'er seas convey'd me to my native reign;
Embroider'd vestures, gold, and brass, are laid
Conceal'd in caverns in the sylvan shade.

Hither, intent the rival rout to slay,
And plan the scene of death, I bend my way:
So Pallas wills—but thou, my son, explain
The names and numbers of th' audacious train;
'Tis mine to judge if better to employ
Assistant force, or singly to destroy." [name,

"O'er earth" (returns the prince) "resounds thy
Thy well-tried wisdom, and thy martial fame,
Yet at thy words I start, in wonder lost;
Can we engage, not decads, but an host?
Can we alone in furious battle stand,
Against that numerous and determin'd band?
Hear then their numbers: from Dulichium came Twice twenty-six, all peers of mighty name,
Six are their menial train: twice twelve the boast
Of Samos; twenty from Zacynthus coast:
And twelve our country's pride: to these belong
Medon and Phemius skill'd in heavenly song.
Two sewers from day to day the revels wait,
Exact of taste, and serve the feast in state.
With such a foe th' unequal fight to try,
Were by false courage unreveng'd to die.
Then what assistant powers you boast, relate,
Ere yet we mingle in the stern debate."

"Mark well my voice," Ulysses straight replies:
 "What need of aids, if favour'd by the skies?
 If shielded to the dreadful fight we move,

By mighty Pallas, and by thundering Jove."
 "Sufficient they" (Telemachus rejoind)

"Against the banded powers of all mankind:
 They, high enthron'd above the rolling clouds,
 Wither the strength of man, and awe the gods."

"Such aids expect," he cries, "when strong in
 We rise terrific to the task of fight. [might

But thou, when morn salutes th' aerial plain,
 The court revisit and the lawless train:
 Me thither in disguise Eumæus leads,
 An aged mendicant in tatter'd weeds.

There, if base scorn insult my revered age;
 Bear it my son! repress thy rising rage.
 If outrag'd, cease that outrage to repel;
 Bear it my son! howe'er thy heart rebel.

Yet strive by prayer and counsel to restrain
 Their lawless insults, though thou strive in vain:
 For wick'd ears are deaf to wisdom's call, [fall.

And vengeance strikes whom Heaven has doom'd to Once more attend: when she¹ whose power inspires
 The thinking mind, my soul to vengeance fires;
 I give the sign: that instant, from beneath,
 Aloft convey the instruments of death,
 Armour and arms; and if mistrust arise,
 Thus veil the truth in plausible disguise:

"These glittering weapons, ere he sail'd to Troy,

Ulysses view'd with stern heroic joy:
 Then, beaming o'er th' illumin'd wall they shone:
 Now dust dishonours, all their lustre gone.

I bear them hence (so Jove my soul inspires)
 From the pollution of the fuming fires;
 Lest, when the bowl inflames, in vengeful mood

Ye rush to arms, and stain the feast with blood:
 Oft ready swords in luckless hour incite
 The hand of wrath, and arm it for the fight."

"Such be the plea, and by the plea deceive:
 For Jove infatuates all, and all believe.

Yet leave for each of us a sword to wield,
 A pointed javelin, and a fencible shield.
 But by my blood that in thy bosom glows,
 By that regard, a son his father owes;

The secret, that thy father lives, retain
 Lock'd in thy bosom from the household train;
 Hide it from all; even from Eumæus hide,
 From my dear father, and my dearest bride.

One care remains, to note the loyal few
 Whose faith yet lasts among the menial crew;
 And, noting, ere we rise in vengeance, prove
 Who loves his prince; for sure you merit love."

To whom the youth: "To emulate I aim
 The brave and wise, and my great father's fame.
 But re-consider, since the wisest err,
 Vengeance resolv'd, 'tis dangerous to defer.

What length of time must we consume in vain,
 Too curious to explore the menial train?
 While the proud foes, industrious to destroy
 Thy wealth in riot, the delay enjoy.
 Suffice it in this exigence alone
 To mark the damsels that attend the throne;
 Dispers'd the youth resides; their faith to prove Jove grants henceforth, if thou hast spoke from Jove."

While in debate they waste the hours away,
 Th' associates of the prince repass'd the bay;

With speed they guide the vessel to the shores;
 With speed debarking land the naval stores;
 Then, faithful to their charge, to Clyteus bear,
 And trusts the presents to his friendly care.
 Swift to the queen a herald flies t' impart
 Her son's return, and ease a parent's heart;
 Lest, a sad prey to ever-musing cares,
 Pale grief destroy what time awhile forbears.
 Th' uncautious herald with impatience burns,
 And cries aloud: "Thy son, O queen, returns!"
 Eumæus sage approach'd the imperial throne,
 And breath'd his mandate to her ear alone,
 Then measur'd back the way—The suitor band,
 Stung to the soul, abash'd, confounded, stand;
 And issuing from the dome, before the gate,
 With clouded looks, a pale assembly sate.
 At length Eurymachus: "Our hopes are vain;
 Telemachus in triumph sails the main.
 Haste, near the mast the swelling shroud display;
 Haste, to our ambush'd friends the news convey."
 Scarce had he spoke, when, turning to the strand,
 Amphinomus survey'd th' associate band;
 Full to the bay within the winding shores
 With gather'd sails they stood, and lifted oars.
 "O friends!" he cry'd, "elate with rising joy,
 See to the port secure the vessel fly!
 Some god has told them, or themselves survey
 The bark escap'd; and measure back their way."
 Swift at the word descending to the shores,
 They moor the vessel and unlade the stores:
 Then moving from the strand, apart they sate,
 And full and frequent, form'd a dire debate.
 "Lives then the boy?" "Her lives," (Antinous cries)
 "The cars of gods and favourite of the skies.
 All night we watch'd, till with her orient wheels
 Aurora flam'd above the eastern hills,
 And from the lofty brow of rocks by day
 Took in the ocean with a broad survey.
 Yet safe he sails! the powers celestial give
 To shun the hidden snares of death, and live.
 But die he shall, and thus condemn'd to bleed,
 Be now the scene of instant death decreed:
 Hope ye success? undaunted crush the foe.
 Is he not wise? know this, and strike the blow.
 Wait ye till he to arms in council draws:
 The Greeks, averse too justly to our cause?
 Strike ere, the states conven'd, the foe betray
 Our murderous ambush on the watery way.
 Or choose ye vagrant from their rage to fly
 Outcasts of earth, to breathe an unknown sky?
 The brave prevent misfortunes; then be brave,
 And bury future danger in his grave.
 Returns he? ambush'd we'll his walk invade,
 Or where he hides in solitude and shade:
 And give the palace to the queen a dower,
 Or him she blesses in the bridal hour.
 But if submissive you resign the sway,
 Slaves to a boy; go, flatter and obey.
 Retire we instant to our native reign,
 Nor be the wealth of kings consum'd in vain;
 Then wed whom choice approves: the queen be given
 To some blest prince, the prince decreed by Heaven."
 Abash'd, the suitor train his voice attends;
 Till from his throne Amphinomus ascends,
 Who o'er Dulichium stretch'd his spacious reign,
 A land of plenty, blest with every grain:
 Chief of the numbers who the queen address'd,
 And though displeasing, yet displeasing least.

¹ Minerva.

Soft were his words; his actions wisdom sway'd;
Grateful awhile he paus'd, then mildly said:
"O friends, forbear! and be the thought withstood:

'Tis horrible to shed imperial blood!
Consult we first th' allying powers above,
And the sure oracles of righteous Jove.
If they assent, ev'n by his hand he dies;
If they forbid, I war not with the skies."
He said; th' rival train his voice approv'd,
And rising instant to the palace mov'd.
Arriv'd, with wild tumultuous noise they came,
Recumbent on the shining thrones of state.

Then Medon, conscious of their dire debates,
The murderous council to the queen relates.
Touch'd at the dreadful story she descends:
Her hasty steps a damsel-train attends.
Full where the dome its shining valves expands,
Sadden before the rival powers she stands:
And, veiling decorat with a modest shade
Her cheek, indignant to Antinous said:

"O void of faith! of all bad men the worst!
Renown'd for wisdom, by th' abuse accus'd!
Mistaking fame proclaims thy generous mind!
Thy deeds denote thee of the basest kind.
Wretch! to destroy a prince that friendship gives,
While in his guest his murderer he receives:
Nor dread superior Jove, to whom belong
The cause of suppliants, and revenge of wrong.
Hast thou forgot (ingrateful as thou art)
Who sav'd thy father with a friendly part?
Less he be ravag'd with his martial powers
The Taphian pirates on Threspotia's shores;
Being'd, his life, his treasures they demand;
Ulysses sav'd him from th' avengers' hand.
And would'st thou evil for his good repay?
His bed dishonour and his house betray?
Afflict his queen? and with a murderous hand
Destroy his heir?—but cease, 'tis I command."
"Far hence those fears," (Eurymachus re-ply'd)

"O prudent princess! bid thy soul confide.
Breathes there a man who dares that hero slay,
While I behold the golden light of day?
No: by the righteous powers of Heaven I swear,
His blood in vengeance smokes upon my spear.
Ulysses, when my infant days I led,
With wine suffic'd me, and with dainties fed:
My generous soul abhors th' ungrateful part,
And my friend's son lives dearest to my heart.
Then fear no mortal arm; if Heaven destroy,
We must resign: for man is born to die."

Thus smooth he ended, yet his death conspir'd:
Then sorrowing, with sad step the queen retir'd,
With streaming eyes all comfortless deplor'd,
Touch'd with the dear remembrance of her lord:
Nor ceas'd till Pallas bid her sorrows fly,
And in soft slumber seal'd her flowing eye.

And now Eumæus, at the evening hour,
Came late returning to his sylvan bower.
Ulysses and his son had dress'd with art
A yearling boar, and gave the gods their part,
Holy repast! that instant from the skies
The martial goddess to Ulysses flies:
She waves her golden wand, and re-assumes
From every feature every grace that blooms;
At once his vestures change; at once she sheds
Age o'er his limbs, that tremble as he treads;
Lest to the queen the swain with transport fly,
Unable to contain th' unruly joy.

VOL. XIX.

When near he drew the prince breaks forth:
"Proclaim

What tidings, friend? what speaks the voice of Say if the suitors measure back the main, [fame?
Or still in ambush thirst for blood in vain?"

"Whether," he cries, "they measure back the
Or still in ambush thirst in vain for blood, [blood,
Escap'd my care: where lawless suitors sway,
Thy mandate borne, my soul disdain'd to stay,
But from th' Hermæan height I cast a view,
Where to the port a bark high bounding flew;
Her freight a shining band: with martial air
Each poss'd his shield, and each advanc'd his spear.
And, if aright these searching eyes survey,
Th' eluded suitors stem the watery way."

The prince, well pleas'd to disappoint their wiles,
Steals on his sire a glance, and secret smiles.
And now, a short repast prepar'd, they fed,
Till the keen rage of craving hunger fled,
Then to repose withdrawn, apart they lay,
And in soft sleep forgot the cares of day.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XVII.

ARGUMENT.

TELEMACHUS returning to the city relates to Penelope the sum of his travels. Ulysses is conducted by Eumæus to the palace, where his old dog Argus acknowledges his master, after an absence of twenty years, and dies with joy.
Eumæus returns into the country, and Ulysses remains among the suitors whose behaviour is described.

Soon as Aurora, daughter of the dawn,
Sprinkled with roseate light the dewy lawn;
In haste the prince arose, prepar'd to part;
His hand impatient grasps the pointed dart;
Fair on his feet the polish'd sandals shine,
And thus he greets the master of the swine:

"My friend, adieu; let this short stay suffice;
I haste to meet my mother's longing eyes,
And end her tears, her sorrows, and her sighs.
But thou, attentive, what we order heed;
This hapless stranger to the city lead;
By public bounty let him there be fed,
And bless the hand that stretches forth the bread.
To wipe the tears from all afflicted eyes,
My will may covet, but my power denies.
If this raise anger in the stranger's thought,
The pain of anger punishes the fault:
The very truth I undisguis'd declare;
For what so easy as to be sincere?"

To this Ulysses: "What the prince requires
Of swift removal, seconds my desires.
To want like mine the peopled town can yield
More hopes of comfort than the lonely field,
Nor fits my age to till the labour'd lands,
Or stoop to tasks a rural lord demands.
Adieu! but, since this ragged garb can bear
So ill th' inclemencies of morning air,
A few hours' space permit me here to stay;
My steps Eumæus shall to town convey,
With ripen'd beams when Phoebus warms the day."

Thus he: nor aught Telemachus reply'd,
But left the mansion with a lofty stride:
Schemes of revenge his pondering breast elate,
Revolving deep the suitors' sudden fate.
Arriving now before th' imperial hall;
He props his spear against the pillar'd wall;
Then like a lion o'er the threshold bounds;
The marble pavement with his step resounds;
His eye first glanc'd where Euryclea spreads
With furry spoils of beasts the splendid beds:
She saw, she wept, she ran with eager pace,
And reach'd her master with a long embrace.
All crowded round the fami'y appears
With wild entrancement, and ecstatic tears.
Swift from above descends the royal fair
(Her beautiful cheeks the blush of Venus wear,
Chasten'd with coy Diana's pensive air);
Hangs o'er her son; in his embraces dies;
Rains kisses on his neck, his face, his eyes;
Few words she spoke, though much she had to say;
And scarce those few, for tears could force their way.

"Light of my eyes! he comes! unhop'd for joy!
Has Heaven from Pylos brought my lovely boy?
So snatch'd from all our cares!—Tell, hast thou
known

Thy father's fate? and tell me all thy own."

"Oh dearest, most rever'd of womankind!
Cease with those tears to melt a manly mind"
(Replied the prince); "nor be our fates deplor'd,
From death and treason to thy arms restor'd.
Go bathe, and rob'd in white, ascend the towers;
With all thy handmaids thank th' immortal powers;
To every god vow hecatombs to bleed,
And call Jove's vengeance on their guilty deed.
While to th' assembled council I repair;
A stranger sent by Heaven attends me there;
My new-accepted guest I haste to find,
Now to Piræus' honour'd charge consign'd."

The matron heard, nor was his word in vain.
She bath'd; and rob'd in white, with all her train,
To every god vow'd hecatombs to bleed,
And call'd Jove's vengeance on the guilty deed.
Arm'd with his lance, the prince then pass'd the gate;

Two dogs behind, a faithful guard, await;
Pallas his form with grace divine improves:
The gazing crowd admires him as he moves:
Him, gathering round, the suitors greet
With semblance fair, but inward deep deceit.
Their false addresses generous he denied,
Pass'd on, and sat by faithful Mentor's side;
With Antiphus, and Halitherses sage
(His father's counsellors, rever'd for age).
Of his own fortunes, and Ulysses' fame,
Much ask'd the seniors; till Piræus came.
The stranger-guest pursued him close behind!
Whom when Telemachus beheld, he join'd.
He (when Piræus ask'd for slaves to bring
The gifts and treasures of the Spartan king)
Thus thoughtful answer'd: "Those we shall not
Dark and unconscious of the will of Jove: {move,
We know not yet the full event of all:
Stabb'd in his palace if your prince must fall,
Us, and our house, if treason must o'erthrow,
Better a friend possess them, than a foe;
If death to these, and vengeance Heaven decree,
Riches are welcome then, not else, to me.
I'll then retain the gifts."—The hero said,
And in his hand the willing stranger led:

Then disarray'd, the shining bath they sought,
(With unguents smooth) of polish'd marble
wrought;

Obedient handmaids with assistant toil
Supply the limpid wave, and fragrant oil:
Then o'er their limbs refulgent robes they threw,
And fresh from bathing to their seats withdrew,
The golden ewer a nymph attendant brings,
Replenish'd from the pure translucent springs;
With copious streams that golden ewer supplies
A silver laver of capacious size:
Thy wash: the table, in fair order spread,
Is pil'd with viands and the strength of bread.
Full opposite, before the folding gate,
The pensive mother sits in humble state;
Lowly she sat, and with dejected view
The fleecy threads her ivory fingers drew.
The prince and stranger shar'd the genial feast,
Till now the rage of thirst and hunger ceas'd.

When thus the queen: "My son! my only friend!
Say, to my mournful couch shall I ascend?
(The couch deserted now a length of years;
The couch nor ever water'd with my tears!)
Say, wilt thou not (ere yet the suitor-crew Return, and riot shakes our walls anew)
Say, wilt thou not the least account afford?
The least glad tidings of my absent lord?"

To her the youth: "We reach'd the Pylian
plains,

Where Nestor, shepherd of his people, reigns.
All arts of tenderness to him are known,
Kind to Ulysses' race as to his own;
No father with a fonder grasp of joy
Strains to his bosom his long-absent boy.
But all unknown if yet Ulysses breathe,
Or glider a spectre in the realms beneath,
For farther search, his rapid steeds transport
My lengthen'd journey to the Spartan court,
There Argive Helen I beheld, whose charms
(So Heaven decreed) engag'd the great in arms.
My cause of coming told, he thus rejoind;
And still his words live perfect in my mind.

"Heavens! would a soft, inglorious, dastard
An absent hero's nuptial joys profane!"

So with her young, amid the woodland shades,
A timorous hind the lion's court invades,
Leaves in that fatal lair her tender fawns,
And climbs the cliff, or feeds along the lawns;
Meantime returning, with remorseless sway
The monarch savage rends the panting prey:
With equal fury, and with equal fame,
Shall great Ulysses re-assert his claim.
O Jove! Supreme! whom men and gods revere;
And thou whose lustre gilds the rolling sphere!
With power congenial join'd, propitious aid
The chief adopted by the martial maid!
Such to our wish the warrior soon restore,
As when, contending on the Lesbian shore,
His prowess Philomelides confess'd,
And loud-acclaiming Greeks the victor bless'd:
Then soon th' invaders of his bed and throne
Their love presumptuous shall by death atone;
Now what you question of my ancient friend,
With truth I answer; thou the truth attend.
Learn what I heard the sea-born seer relate,
Whose eyes can pierce the dark recess of fate.
Sole in an isle, imprison'd by the main,
The sad survivor of his numerous train,

! Proteus.

Ulysses lies; detain'd by magic charms,
 And press'd unwilling in Calypso's arms,
 No sailors there, no vessel to convey,
 Nor oars to cut th' immeasurable way—
 This told Atrides and he told no more,
 Thence safe I voyag'd to my native shore."
 He ceas'd; nor made the pensive queen reply,
 But droop'd her head, and drew a secret sigh.
 When Theoclymenus the seer began:
 "O suffering consort of the suffering man!
 What human knowledge could, those kings might
 But I the secrets of high Heaven reveal. [tell;
 Before the first of gods be this declar'd,
 Before the board whose blessing we have shar'd;
 Witness the genial rites, and witness all
 This house holds sacred in her ample wall!
 Ev'n now this instant, great Ulysses lay'd
 At rest, or wandering in his country's shade,
 Their guilty deeds, in hearing, and in view,
 Secret revolves; and plans the vengeance due.
 Of this sure auguries the gods bestow'd,
 When first our vessel anchor'd in your road."
 "Succeed those omens, Heaven!" (the queen rejoin'd)

"So shall our bounties speak a grateful mind;
 And every envied happiness attend
 The man, who calls Penelope his friend."
 Thus commun'd they: while in the marble
 (Scene of their insolence) the lords resort; [court
 Athwart the spacious square each tries his art,
 To whirl the disk, or aim the missile dart.

Now did the hour of sweet repast arrive,
 And from the field the victim flocks they drive:
 Medon, the herald, (one who pleas'd them best,
 And honour'd with a portion of their feast)
 To bid the banquet, interrupts their play.
 Swift to the hall they haste; aside they lay
 Their garments, and succinct, the victims slay.
 Then sheep and goats, and bristly porkers bled,
 And the proud steer was o'er the marble spread.

While thus the copious banquet they provide;
 Along the road conversing side by side,
 Proceed Ulysses and the faithful swain:
 When thus Eumæus, generous and humane:
 "To town, observant of our lord's behest,
 Now let us speed; my friend, no more my guest!

Yet like myself I wish'd thee here preferr'd,
 Guard of the flock, or keeper of the herd.
 But much to raise my master's wrath I fear;
 The wrath of princes ever is severe.
 Then heed his will, and be our journey made
 While the broad beams of Phoebus are display'd,
 Or ere brown evening spreads her chilly shade."
 "Just thy advice," (the prudent chief rejoin'd)
 And such as suits the dictate of my mind.

Lead on: but help me to some staff, to stay
 My feeble step, since rugged is the way."
 Across his shoulders then the scrip he flung,
 Wide-patch'd, and fasten'd by a twisted thong.
 A staff Eumæus gave. Along the way
 Cheerily they fare: behind, the keepers stay;
 These with their watchful dogs (a constant guard)
 Supply his absence, and attend the herd.
 And now his city strikes the monarch's eyes,
 Alas! how chang'd! a man of miseries;
 Prop'd on a staff, a beggar old and bare,
 In rags dishonest fluttering with the air!
 Now pass'd the rugged road, they journey down
 The cavern'd way descending to the town,

Where, from the rock, with liquid lapse distils
 A limpid fount; that, spreads in parting rills,
 Its current thence to serve the city brings:
 An useful work adorn'd by ancient kings.
 Neritus, Ithacus, Polyctor, there,
 In sculptur'd stone immortaliz'd their care,
 In marble urns receiv'd it from above,
 And shaded with a green surrounding grove;
 Where silver alders, in high arches twin'd,
 Drink the cold stream, and tremble to the wind.
 Beneath, sequester'd to the nymphs, is seen
 A mossy altar, deep embower'd in green;
 Where constant vows by travellers are paid,
 And holy horrors solemnize the shade.

Here with his goats (not vow'd to sacred flame,
 But pamper'd luxury) Melanthius came:
 Two grooms attend him. With an envious look
 He eyed the stranger, and imperious spoke:

"The good old proverb bow this pair fulfil!
 One rogue is usher to another still.
 Heaven with a secret principle endued
 Mankind, to seek their own similitude. [guest
 Where goes the swine-herd with that ill-look'd
 That giant-glutton, dreadful at a feast!
 Full many a post have those broad shoulders worn,
 From every great man's gate repuls'd with scorn;
 To no brave prize aspir'd the worthless swain,
 'Twas but for scraps he ask'd, and ask'd in vain.
 To beg, than work, he better understands;
 Or we perhaps might take him off thy hands.
 For any office could the slave be good,
 To cleanse the fold, or help the kids to food,
 If any labour those big joints could learn;
 Some whey, to wash his bowels, he might earn.
 To cringe, to whine, his idle hands to spread,
 Is all, by which that graceless maw is fed.
 Yet hear me! if thy impudence but dare
 Approach yon walls, I prophesy thy fare:
 Dearly, full dearly, shalt thou buy thy bread
 With many a footstool thundering at thy head."

He thus: nor insolent of word alone,
 Spurr'd with his rustic heel his king unknown;
 Spurr'd, but not mov'd: he like a pillar stood,
 Nor stir'd an inch, contemptuous, from the road
 Doubtful, or with his staff to strike him dead,
 Or greet the pavement with his worthless head.
 Short was that doubt; to quell his rage intr'd,
 The hero stood self-conquer'd, and endur'd.
 But, hateful of the wretch, Eumæus heav'd
 His hands obtesting, and his prayer conceiv'd:
 "Daughters of Jove! who from th' ethereal bowers
 Descend to swell the springs, and feed the flowers!
 Nymphs of this fountain! to whose sacred names
 Our rural victims mount in blazing flames!
 To whom Ulysses' piety preferr'd
 The yearly firstlings of his flock and herd;
 Succeed my wish; your votary restore:
 Oh, be some god's is convoy to our shore!
 Due pains shall punish then this slave's offence,
 And humble all his airs of insolence,
 Who, proudly stalking, leaves the herds at large,
 Commences courtier, and neglects his charge."

"What matters he?" (Melanthius stark rejoins)
 "This crafty miscreant big with dark designs?
 The day shall come; nay, 'tis already near,
 When, slave! to sell thee at a price too dear,
 Must be my care; and hence transport thee o'er,
 (A load and scandal to this happy shore).
 Oh! that as surely great Apollo's dart, [heart.
 Or some brave suitor's sword, might pierce the

Of the proud son ; as that we stand this hour
In lasting safety from the father's power !”

So spoke the wretch, but, shunning farther fray,
Turn'd his proud step, and left them on their way.
Straight to the feastful palace he repair'd,
Familiar enter'd, and the banquet shar'd ;
Beneath Eurymachus, his patron lord,
He took his place, and plenty heap'd the board.

Meantime they heard, soft-circling in the sky,
Sweet airs ascend, and heavenly minstrelsy
(For Phemius to the lyre attun'd the strain) :
Ulysses hearken'd, then address'd the swain :

“ Well may this palace admiration claim,
Great and respondent to the master's fame !
Stage above stage th' imperial structure stands,
Holds the chief honours, and the town commands :
High walls and battlements the courts enclose,
And the strong gates defy an host of foes.
Far other cares its dwellers now employ :
The throng'd assembly, and the feast of joy :
I see the smokes of sacrifice aspire,
And here (what graces every feast) the lyre.”

Then thus Eumæus : “ Judge we which were
Amidst yon revellers a sudden guest [best ;
Chuse you to mingle, while behind I stay ?
Or I first entering introduce the way ?
Wait for a space without, but wait not long ;
This is the house of violence and wrong :
Some rude insult thy reverend age may bear ;
For like their lawless lords the servants are.

“ Just is, O friend ! thy caution, and address'd”
(Replied the chief) “ to no unheeded breast ;
“ The wrongs and injuries of base mankind
Fresh to my sense, and always in my mind.
The bravely patient to no fortune yields :
On rolling oceans, and in fighting fields,
Storms have I pass'd, and many a stern debate ;
And now in humbler scene submit to fate.
What cannot want ? The blest she will expose,
And I am learn'd in all her train of woes ;
She fills with navies, hosts, and loud alarms,
The sea, the land, and shakes the world with arms !”

“ Thus, near the gates conferring as they drew,
Argus, the dog, his ancient master knew ;
He, not unconscious of the voice and tread,
Lifts to the sound his ear, and rears his head ;
Bred by Ulysses, nourish'd at his board,
But, ah ! not fated long to please his lord !
To him, his swiftness and his strength were vain ;
The voice of glory call'd him o'er the main.
Till then in every sylvan chase renown'd,
With Argus, Argus, rung the woods around ;
With him the youth pursued the goat or fawn,
Or trac'd the mazy leveret o'er the lawn.
Now left to man's ingratitude he lay,
Unhous'd, neglected in the public way ;
And where on heaps the rich manure was spread,
Obscene with reptiles, took his sordid bed.

He knew his lord ; he knew, and strove to meet ;
In vain he strove to crawl, and kiss his feet ;
Yet (all he could) his tail, his ears, his eyes,
Salute his master, and confess his joys.
Soft pity touch'd the mighty master's soul ;
Adown his cheek a tear unbidden stole,
Stole unperceiv'd ; he turn'd his head, and dry'd
The drop humane : then thus impassion'd cry'd ;

“ What noble beast in this abandon'd state
Lies here all helpless at Ulysses' gate ?
His bulk and beauty speak no vulgar praise ;
If as he seems he was in better days,

Some care his age deserves : or was he priz'd
For worthless beauty ! therefore now despis'd ?
Such dogs and men there are, mere things of state,
And always cherish'd by their friends, the great.”

“ Not Argus so” (Eumæus thus rejoind)
“ But serv'd a master of a nobler kind,
Who never, never shall behold him more !
Long, long since perish'd on a distant shore !
Oh ! had you seen him, vigorous, bold, and young,
Swift as a stag, and as a lion strong ;
Him no fell savage on the plain withstood,
None 'scap'd him, bosom'd in the gloomy wood,
His eye how piercing, and his scent how true,
To wind the vapour in the tainted dew !
Such, when Ulysses left his natal coast ;
Now years unnerve him, and his lord is lost !
The women keep the generous creature bare,
A sleek and idle race is all their care :
The master gone, the servants what restrains ?
Or dwells humanity where riot reigns ?
Jove fix'd it certain, that whatever day
Makes man a slave, takes half his worth away.”

This said, the honest berdsman strode before ;
The musing monarch pauses at the door :
The dog, whom fate had granted to behold
His lord, when twenty tedious years had roll'd,
Takes a last look, and having seen him, dies ;
So clos'd for ever faithful Argus' eyes !

And now Telemachus, the first of all,
Observ'd Eumæus entering in the hall ;
Distant he saw, across the shady dome ;
Then gave a sign, and beckon'd him to come :
There stood an empty seat, where late was plac'd,
In order due, the steward of the feast
(Who now was busied carving round the board) ;
Eumæus took, and plac'd it near his lord.
Before him instant was the banquet spread,
And the bright basket pill'd with loaves of bread.

Next came Ulysses lowly at the door,
A figure despicable, old, and poor,
In squalid vests, with many a gaping rent,
Propp'd on a staff, and trembling as he went,
Then, resting on the threshold of the gate,
Against a cypress pillar lean'd his weight
(Smooth'd by the workman to a polish'd plain) ;
The thoughtful son beheld, and call'd his swain :

“ These viands, and this bread, Eumæus ! bear,
And let yon mendicant our plenty share :
Then let him circle round the suitors' board,
And try the bounty of each gracious lord :
Bold let him act, encourag'd thus by me ;
How ill, alas ! do want and shame agree !”

His lord's command the faithful servant bears ;
The seeming beggar answers with his prayers.
“ Blest be Telemachus ! in every deed
Inspire him, Jove ! in every wish succeed !
This said, the portion from his son convey'd
With smiles receiving on his scrip he lay'd.
Long as the minstrel swept the sounding wire,
He fed, and ceas'd when silence held the lyre.
Soon as the suitors from the banquet rose,
Minerva prompts the man of mighty woes
To tempt their bounties with a suppliant's art,
And learn the generous from th' ignoble heart
(Not but his soul, resentful as humane,
Dooms to full vengeance all the offending train) ;
With speaking eyes, and voice of plaintive sound,
Humble he moves, imploring all around.
The proud feel pity, and relief bestow,
With such an image touch'd of human woe ;

Inquiring all, their wonder they confess,
And eye the man, majestic in distress.

While thus they gaze and question with their eyes,
The bold Melanthius to their thought replies:
"My lords! this stranger of gigantic port
The good Eumæus usher'd to your court.
Full well I mark'd the features of his face,
Though all unknown his clime, or noble race."

"And is this present, swineherd! of thy hand?
Bring'st thou these vagrants to infest the land?"
(Returns Antinous with retorted eye)

"Objects uncouth! to check the genial joy,
Enough of these our court already grace,
Of giant stomach, and of famish'd face.
Such guests Eumæus to his country brings,
To share our feast, and lead the life of kings."

To whom the hospitable swain rejoind'd:
"Thy passion, prince, belies thy knowing mind,
Who calls, from distant nations to his own,
The poor, distinguish'd by their want alone?
Round the wide world are sought those men
divine

Who public structures raise, or who design;
Those to whose eyes the gods their ways reveal,
Or bless with salutary arts to heal;
But chief to poets such respect belongs,
By rival nations courted for their songs;
These states invite, and mighty kings admire,
Wide as the Sun displays his vital fire.
It is not so with want! how few that feed
A wretch unhappy, merely for his need!
Unjust to me and all that serve the state,
To love Ulysses is to raise thy hate.

For me, suffice the approbation won
Of my great mistress, and her godlike son."

To him Telemachus: "No more incense
The man by nature prone to insolence:
Injurious minds just answers but provoke—"
Then turning to Antinous, thus he spoke:
"Thanks to thy care! whose absolute command
Thus drives the stranger from our court and land.
Heaven bless its owner with a better mind!
From envy free, to charity inclin'd.

This both Penelope and I afford:
Then, prince! be bounteous of Ulysses' board.
To give another's is thy hand so slow?
So much more sweet, to spoil, than to bestow?"

"Whence, great Telemachus! this lofty strain?"
(Antinous cries with insolent disdain)

"Portions like mine if every suitor gave,
Our walls this twelvemonth should not see the slave."

He spoke, and lifting high above the board
His ponderous footstool, shook it at his lord;
The rest with equal hand conferr'd the bread;
He fill'd his scrip, and to the threshold sped;
But first before Antinous stopp'd and said:

"Bestow, my friend! thou dost not seem the worst
Of all the Greeks, but princelike and the first;
Then, as in dignity, be first in worth,
And I shall praise thee through the boundless earth.
Once I enjoy'd in luxury of state

What'er gives man the envied name of great;
Wealth, servants, friends, were mine in better days;
And hospitality was then my praise;
In every sorrowing soul I pour'd delight,
And poverty stood smiling in my sight.

But Jove, all-governing, whose only will
Determines fate, and mingles good with ill,
Sent πέ (to punish my pursuit of gain)
With roving pirates o'er th' Egyptian main;

By Ægypt's silver flood our ships we moor;
Our spies commission'd straight the coast explore;
But, impotent of mind, with lawless will
The country ravage, and the natives kill.
The spreading clamour to their city flies,
And horse and foot in mingled tumult rise:
The reddening dawn reveals the hostile fields,
Horrid with bristly spears, and gleaming shields:
Jove thunder'd on their side: our guilty head
We turn'd to flight; the gathering vengeance
spread

On all parts round, and heaps on heaps lay dead,
Some few the foes in servitude detain;
Death ill-exchang'd for bondage and for pain!
Unhappy me a Cyprian took aboard,
And gave to Demeter, Cyprus' haughty lord:
Hither, to 'scape his chains, my course I steer,
Still curs'd by fortune, and insulted here!"

To whom Antinous thus his rage express'd:
"What god has plagu'd us with this gormand
guest?"

Unless at distance, wretch! thou keep behind,
Another isle, than Cyprus more unkind;
Another Ægypt, shalt thou quickly find.
From all thou begg'st, a bold audacious slave;
Nor all can give so much as thou can crave.
Nor wonder I, at such profusion shown;
Shameless they give, who give what's not their own."

The chief, retiring: "Souls like that in thee
Ill suit such forms of grace and dignity.
Nor will that hand to utmost need afford
The smallest portion of a wasteful board,
Whose luxury whole patrimonies sweeps;
Yet starving want, amidst the riot, weeps."

The haughty suitor with resentment burns,
And, soorily smiling, this reply returns:
"Take that, ere yet thou quit this princely throng;
And dumb for ever be thy slanderous tongue!"
He said, and high the whirling tripod flung.
His shoulder-blade receiv'd th' ungentle shock;
He stood, and mov'd not, like a marble rock;
But shook his thoughtful head, nor more complain'd,
Sedate of soul, his character sustain'd,
And inly form'd revenge: then back withdrew;
Before his feet the well-fill'd scrip he threw,
And thus with semblance mild address'd the crew:

"May what I speak your princely minds approve,
Ye peers and rivals in this noble love!
Not for the hurt I grieve, but for the cause.

If, when the sword our country's quarrel draws,
Or if, defending what is justly dear,
From Mars impartial some broad wound we bear;
The generous motive dignifies the scar.
But for mere want, how hard to suffer wrong!
Want brings enough of other ills along!

Yet, if injustice never be secure,
If deeds revenge, and gods assert the poor,
Death shall lay low the proud aggressor's head,
And make the dust Antinous' bridal bed."

"Peace, wretch! and eat thy bread without offence."

(The suitor cry'd) "as force shall drag thee hence,
Scourge through the public street, and cast thee
A mangled carcass for the hounds to tear." [there,
His furious deed the general anger mov'd,
All, ev'n the worst, condemn'd: and some reprov'd.]

"Was ever chief for want like thee renown'd?
Ill fits the stranger and the poor to wound.
Unblest thy hand; if in this low disguise
Wander, perhaps, some inmate of the ships;

They (curious oft of mortal actions) deign
In forms like these, to round the earth and main,
Just and unjust recording in their mind,
And with sure eyes inspecting all mankind."

Telemachus, absorb't in thought severe,
Nourish'd deep anguish, though he shed no tear;
But the dark brow of silent sorrow shook:
While thus his mother to her virgins spoke:
"On him and his may the bright god of day
That base, inhospitable blow repay!"

The nurse replies: "If Jove receives my prayer,
Not one survives to breathe to morrow's air."

"All, all are foes, and mischief is their end;
Antinous most to gloomy death a friend," (Replies the queen) "the stranger begg'd their
And melting pity soften'd every face; [grace,
From every other hand redress he found,
But fell Antinous answer'd with a wound."

Amidst her maids thus spoke the prudent queen,
Then bade Eumæus call the pilgrim in.
"Much of th' experienc'd man I long to hear,
If or his certain eye, or listening ear,
Have learn'd the fortunes of my wandering lord?"
Thus she, and good Eumæus took the word.

"A private audience if thy grace impart,
The stranger's words may ease thy royal heart.
His sacred eloquence in balm distils,
And the sooth'd heart with secret pleasure fills.
Three days have spent their beams, three nights have
Their silent journey, since his tale begun, [run
Unfinish'd yet! and yet I thirst to hear!
As when some heaven-taught poet charms the ear,
(Suspending sorrow with celestial strain
Breath'd from the gods to soften human pain)
Time steals away with unregarded wing,
And the soul hears him, though he cease to sing.

"Ulysses late he saw, on Cretan ground,
(His father's guest) for Minos' birth renown'd.
He now but waits the wind, to waft him o'er,
With boundless treasure, from Thesprotia's shore."

To this the queen: "The wanderer let me hear,
While you luxurious rare indulge their cheer,
Devour the grazing ox and browsing goat,
And turn my generous vintage down their throat.
For where's an arm, like thine, Ulysses! strong,
To curb wild riot, and to punish wrong?"

She spoke. Telemachus then sneez'd aloud;
Constrain'd, his nostril echo'd through the crowd.
The smiling queen the happy omen bless'd:
"So may these impious fall, by fate oppress'd!"
Then to Eumæus: "Bring the stranger, fly!
And if my questions meet a true reply,
Grac'd with a decent robe he shall retire,
A gift in season which his wants require."

Thus spoke Penelope. Eumæus flies
In duteous haste, and to Ulysses cries:
"The queen invites thee, venerable guest!
A secret instinct moves her troubled breast,
Of her long absent lord from thee to gain
Some light, and sooth her soul's eternal pain.
If true, if faithful thou; her grateful mind
Of decent robes a present has design'd:
So finding favour in the royal eye,
Thy other wants her subjects shall supply."

"Fair truth alone" (the patient man reply'd)
"My words shall dictate, and my lips shall guide.
To him, to me, one common lot was given,
In equal woes, alas! involv'd by Heaven.
Much of his fates I knew; but check'd by fear
I stand: the hand of violence is here:

Her boundless wrongs the starry skies invade,
And injur'd suppliants seek in vain for aid.
Let for a space the pensive queen attend,
Nor claim my story till the Sun descend;
Then in such robes as suppliants may require,
Compos'd and cheerful by the genial fire,
When loud uproar and lawless riot cease,
Shall her pleas'd ear receive my words in peace."

Swift to the queen returns the gentle swain:
"And say," (she cries) "does fear, or shame, detain
The cautious stranger? With the begging kind
Shame suits but ill." Eumæus thus rejoind:

"He only asks a more propitious hour,
And shuns (who would not?) wicked men in power;
At evening mild (most season to confer)
By turns to question, and by turns to hear."

"Who'er this guest" (the prudent queen replies)
"His every step and every thought is wise:
For men like these on Earth he shall not find
In all the miscerane race of human kind."

Thus she; Eumæus all her words attends,
And, parting, to the suitor powers descends;
There seeks Telemachus, and thus apart
In whispers breathes the fondness of his heart:
"The time, my lord, invites me to repair
Hence to the lodge; my charge demands my care.
These sons of murder thirst thy life to take;
Oh guard it; guard it for thy servant's sake!"

"Thanks to my friend," he cries; "but now the
Of night draws on, go seek the rural bower: [how
But first refresh: and at the dawn of day
Hither a victim to the gods convey.
Our life to Heaven's immortal powers we trust,
Safe in their care, for Heaven protects the just."

Observant of his voice, Eumæus sate
And fed recumbent on a chair of state.
Then instant rose, and as he mov'd along
'Twas riot all amid the suitor throng,
They feast, they dance, and raise the mirthful song.
Till now, declining toward the close of day,
The Sun obliquely shot his dewy ray.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XVIII.

ARGUMENT.

THE FIGHT OF ULYSSES AND IRUS.

THE beggar Irus insults Ulysses; the suitors promote the quarrel, in which Irus is worsted, and miserably handled. Penelope descends, and receives the presents of the suitors. The dialogue of Ulysses with Eurymachus.

WHILE fix'd in thought the pensive hero sat,
A mendicant approach'd the royal gate;
A surly vagrant of the giant kind,
The stain of manhood, of a coward mind:
From feast to feast, insatiate to devour
He flew, attendant on the genial hour.
Him on his mother's knees when babe he lay,
She nam'd Arnaeus on his natal day;

But Irus his associates call'd the boy,
Practis'd the common messenger to fly:
Irus, a name expressive of th' employ.
From his own roof, with meditated blows,
He strove to drive the man of mighty woes.
"Hence, dotard, hence! and timely speed thy way,
Lest dragg'd in vengeance thou repent thy stay;
See how with nods assent you princely train!
But, honouring age, in mercy I refrain!
In peace away! lest, if persuasions fail,
This arm with blows more eloquent prevail."

To whom, with stern regard: "Oh insolence,
Indecently to rail without offence;
What bounty gives, without a rival share;
I ask, what harms not thee, to breathe this air:
Alike on alms we both precarious live:
And canst thou envy when the great relieve?
Know, from the bounteous Heavens all riches flow,
And what man gives, the gods by man bestow;
Proud as thou art, henceforth no more be proud,
Lest I imprint my vengeance in thy blood;
Old as I am, should once my fury burn,
How would'st thou fly, nor ev'n in thought return?"
"Mere woman-glutton!" (thus the churl re-ply'd)

"A tongue so flippant, with a throat so wide!
Why cease I, gods! to dash those teeth away,
Like some wild boar's, that, greedy of his prey,
Uproots the bearded corn? Rise, try the fight,
Gird well thy loins, approach and feel my might:
Sure of defeat, before the peers engage;
Unequal fight, when youth contends with age!"

Thus in a wordy war their tongues display
More fierce intents, preluding to the fray;
Antinous hears, and, in a jovial vein,
Thus with loud laughter to the suitor-train:
"This happy day in mirth, my friends, employ,
See, lo! the gods conspire to crown our joy.
And ready for the fight, and hand to hand,
You surly mendicants contentious stand;
Why urge we not to blows?" Well pleas'd they spring
Swift from their seats, and thickening form a ring.

To whom Antinous: "Lo! enrich'd with blood,
A kid's well-fatted entrails (tasteful food)
On glowing embers lie; on him bestow
The choicest portion who subdues his foe;
Grant him unrivall'd in these walls to stay,
The sole attendant on the genial day."

The lords applaud: Ulysses then with art,
And fears well-feign'd, disguis'd his dauntless heart:
"Worn as I am with age, decay'd with woe,
Say, is it baseness to decline the foe?
Hard conflict! when calamity and age
With vigorous youth, unknown to cares, engage!
Yet, fearful of disgrace, to try the day
Imperious hunger-bids, and I obey;
But swear, impartial arbiters of right,
Swear to stand neuter, while we cope in fight."

The peers assent: when straight his sacred head
Telemachus uprais'd, and sternly said:
"Stranger, if prompted to chastise the wrong
Of this bold insolent; confide, be strong!
Th' injurious Greek, that dares attempt a blow,
That instant makes Telemachus his foe;
And these my friends' shall guard the sacred ties
Of hospitality, for they are wise."

Then, girding his strong loins, the king prepares
To close in combat, and his body bares;

! Antinous and Eurymachus,

Broad spread his shoulders, and his nervous thighs
By just degrees, like well-turn'd columns, rise:
Ample his chest, his arms are round and long,
And each strong joint Minerva knits more strong
(Attendant on her chief): the suitor-crowd
With wonder gaze, and gazing speak aloud;
"Irus! alas! shall Irus be no more?
Black fate impends, and this th' avenging hour!
Gods! how his nerves a matchless strength proclaim,
Swell o'er his well-strung limbs, and brace his frame!"
Then, pale with fears, and sickening at the sight,

They dragg'd th' unwilling Irus to the fight;
From his black visage fled the coward blood,
And his flesh trembled as agast he stood. [light!

"Oh, that such baseness should disgrace the O hide it, death, in everlasting night!"
(Exclaims Antinous) "Can a vigorous foe
Meanly decline to combat age and woe?
But hear me, wretch! if recreant in the fray,
That huge bulk yield this ill-contested day:
Instant thou sail'st, to Echetus resign'd;
A tyrant, fiercest of the tyrant kind,
Who casts thy mangled ears and nose a prey
To hungry dogs, and lops the man away."

While with indignant scorn he sternly spoke
In every joint the trembling Irus shook;
Now front to front each frowning champion stands,
And poises high in air his adverse hands.
The chief yet doubts, or to the shades below
To fell the giant at one vengeful blow,
Or save his life; and soon his life to save
The king resolves, for mercy sways the brave.
That instant Irus his huge arm extends,
Full on the shoulder the rude weight descends;
The sage Ulysses, fearful to disclose
The hero latent in the man of woes,
Check'd half his might; yet rising to the stroke,
His jaw-bone dash'd, the crashing jaw-bone broke;
Down dropp'd he stupid from the stunning wound;
His feet, extended, quivering beat the ground;
His mouth and nostrils spout a purple flood:
His teeth, all shatter'd, rush immix'd with blood.

The peers transported, as outstretch'd he lies,
With bursts of laughter rend the vaulted skies!
Then dragg'd along, all bleeding from the wound,
His length of carcase trailing prints the ground;
Rais'd on his feet, again he reels, he falls,
Till propp'd, reclining on the palace walls:

Then to his hand a staff the victor gave,
And thus with just reproach address'd the slave:
"There, terrible, affright the dogs, and reign
A dreaded tyrant o'er the beastial train!

But mercy to the poor and stranger show,
Lest Heaven in vengeance send some mightier woe."

Scornful he spoke, and o'er his shoulder flung
The broad-patch'd scrip; the scrip in tatters hung
Ill-join'd, and knotted to a twisted throng.
Then, turning short, disdain'd a further stay;
But to the palace measur'd back the way.
There as he rested, gathering in a ring
The peers with smiles address'd their unknown king:

"Stranger, may Jove and all th' aerial powers,
With every blessing crown thy happy hours!
Our freedom to thy prowess'd arm we owe
From bold intrusion of thy coward foe:
Instant the flying sail the slave shall wing
To Echetus, the monster of a king."

While pleas'd he hears, Antinous bears the food,
A kid's well-fatted entrails, rich with blood:

The bread from canisters of shining mould
Amphibious; and wines that laugh in gold;
"And, oh!" (he mildly cries) "may Heaven display
A beam of glory o'er thy future day!
Alas! the brave too oft is doom'd to bear
The gripes of poverty, and stings of care."

To whom with thought mature the king replies;
"The tongue speaks wisely, when the soul is wise;
Such was thy father; in imperial state,
Great without vice, that oft attends the great:
Nor from the sire art thou, the son, declin'd;
Then hear my words, and grave them in thy mind!
Of all that breathes, or grovelling creeps on earth,
Most vain is man! calamitous by birth:
To-day, with power elate, in strength he blooms;
The haughty creature on that power presumes:
Anon from Heaven a sad reverse he feels;
Untaught to bear, 'gainst Heaven the wretch rebels.
For man is changeful, as his bliss or woe;
Too high when prosperous, when distress'd too low.
There was a day, when with the scornful great
I swell'd in pomp and arrogance of state;
Proud of the power that to high birth belongs;
And us'd that power to justify my wrongs.
Then let not man be proud; but, firm of mind,
Bear the best humbly, and the worst resign'd:
Be dumb when Heaven afflicts; unlike yon train
Of haughty spoilers, insolently vain;
Who make their queen and all her wealth a prey;

But vengeance and Ulysses wing their way.
Oh may'st thou, favour'd by some guardian power,
Far, far be distant in that deathful hour!
For sure I am, if stern Ulysses breathe,
These lawless riots end in blood and death."

Then to the gods the rosy juice he pours,
And the drain'd goblet to the chief restores.
Stung to the soul, o'ercast with holy dread,
He shook the graceful honours of his head;
His boding mind the future woe forestalls;
In vain! by great Telemachus he falls,
For Pallas seals his doom: all sad he turns
To join the peers; resumes his throne, and mourns.

Meantime Minerva with instinctive fires
Thy soul, Penelope, from Heaven inspires:
With flattering hopes the suitors to betray,
And seem to meet, yet fly, the bridal day:
Thy husband's wonder, and thy son's, to raise;
And crown the mother and the wife with praise.
Then, while the streaming sorrow diths her eyes,
Thus with a transient smile the matron cries:

"Eurynomé! to go where riot reigns
I feel an impulse, though my soul disdains;
To my lov'd son the snares of death to show,
And in the traitor-friend unmask the foe;
Who, smooth of tongue, in purpose insincere,
Hides fraud in smiles, while death is ambush'd
there."

"Go, warn thy son, nor be the warning vain."
(Reply'd the sagest of the royal train)

"But bath'd, anointed, and adorn'd, descend;
Powerful of charms, bid every grace attend;
The tide of flowing tears a-while suppress;
Tears but indulge the sorrow, not repress.
Some joy remains: to thee a son is given,
Such as, in fondness, parents ask of Heaven."
"Ah me! forbear," returns the queen, "forbear;
Oh! talk not, talk not of vain beauty's care;
No more I bathe, since he no longer sees
Those charms, for whom alone I wish to please.

The day that bore Ulysses from this coast,
Blasted the little bloom these cheeks could boast,
But instant bid Autonoe descend.
Instant Hippodamé our steps attend;
Ill suits it female virtue to be seen
Alone, indecent, in the walks of men."

Then, while Eurynomé the mandate bears,
From Heaven Minerva shoots with guardian cares;
O'er all her senses; as the couch she preps'd,
She pours a pleasing, deep, and deathlike rest,
With every beauty every feature arms,
Bids her cheeks glow, and lights up all her charms,
In her love-darting eyes awakes the fires,
(Immortal gifts! to kindle soft desires)
From limb to limb an air majestic sheds,
And the pure ivory o'er her bosom spreads.
Such Venus shines, when with a measur'd bound
She smoothly gliding swims th' harmonious round;
When with the Graces in the dance she moves,
And fires the gazing gods with ardent loves.

Then to the skies her slight Minerva bends,
And to the queen the damsel-train descends;
Wak'd at their steps, her flowing eyes unclose;
The tear she wipes, and thus renews her woe:
"Howe'er 'tis well; that sleep awhile can free,
With soft forgetfulness, a wretch like me;
Oh! were it giv'n to yield this transient breath,
Send, O Diana, send the sleep of death:
Why must I waste a tedious life in tears,
Nor bury in 'he silent grave my cares?
O my Ulysses! ever-honour'd name;
For thee I mourn, till death dissolves my fame."

Thus wailing, slow and sadly she descends,
On either hand a damsel-train attends:
Full where the dome its shining valves expands,
Radiant before the gazing peers she stands;
A veil translucent o'er her brow display'd,
Her beauty seems, and only seems, to shade:
Sudden she lightens in their dazzled eyes,
And sudden flames in every bosom rise;
They send their eager souls with every look,
Till silence thus th' imperial matron broke:

"Oh why! my son, why now no more appears
That warmth of soul that urg'd thy younger years?
Thy ripen days no growing worth impart,
A man in stature, still a boy in heart!
Thy well-knit frame unprofitably strong,
Speaks thee an hero from an hero sprung;
But the just gods in vain those gifts bestow,
Oh wise alone in form, and brave in show!
Heavens! could a stranger feel oppression's hand
Beneath thy roof, and could'st thou tamely stand!
If thou the stranger's righteous cause decline,
His is the sufferance, but the shame is thine."

To whom, with filial awe, the prince returns:
"That generous soul with just resentment burns;
Yet, taught by time, my heart has learn'd to glow
For others' good, and melt at others' woe:
But, impotent these riots to repel,
I bear their outrage, though my soul rebel:
Helpless amid the snares of death I tread,
And numbers leagu'd in impious union proceed;
But now no crime is theirs: this wrong proceeds
From Irus, and the guilty Irus bleeds.
Oh would to Jove; or he whose arms display
The shield of Jove, or him who rules the day!
That you proud suitors, who licentious tread
These courts, within these courts like Irus led;
Whose loose head tottering, as with wine oppress'd,
Obliquely droop, and nodding knocks his breast;

Powerless to move, his staggering feet deny
The coward wretch the privilege to fly."

Then to the queen Eurymachus replies :
" Oh justly lov'd, and not more fair than wise !
Should Greece through all her hundred states survey [sway ;

Thy finish'd charms, all Greece would own thy
In rival crowds contest the glorious prize,
Dispeopling realms to gaze upon thy eyes :
O woman ! loveliest of the lovely kind,
In body perfect, and complete in mind !" [shore

" Ah me !" returns the queen, " when from this
Ulysses sail'd, then beauty was no more !
The gods decreed these eyes no more should keep
Their wonted grace, but only serve to weep.
Should he return, what'er my beauties prove,
My virtues last ; my brightest charm is love.
Now, grief, thou all art mine ! the gods o'ercast
My soul with woes, that long ! ah long must last !
Too faithfully my heart retains the day
That sadly tore my royal lord away :

He grasp'd my hand, and, ' O my spouse ! I leave
' Thy arms,' (he cried) ' perhaps to find a grave :
Fame speaks the Trojans bold ; they boast the skill
To give the feather'd arrow wings to kill,
To dart the spear, and guide the rushing car
With dreadful inroad through the walks of war.
My sentence is gone forth, and 'tis decreed
Perhaps by righteous Heaven that I must bleed !
My father, mother, all I trust to thee ;
To them, to them transfer the love of me :
But, when my son grows man, the royal sway
Resign, and happy be thy bridal day !'
Such were his words, and Hymen now prepares
To light his torch and give me up to cares ;
Th' afflictive hand of wrathful Jove to bear :
A wretch the most complete that breathes the
air !

Fall'n even below the rights to woman due !
Careless to please, with insolence ye woo !
The generous lovers, studious to succeed,
Bid their whole herds and flocks in banquets bleed ;
By precious gifts the vow sincere display :
You, only you, make her ye love your prey."

Well-pleas'd Ulysses hears his queen deceive
The suitor train, and raise a thirst to give :
False hopes she kindles, but those hopes betray,
And promise, yet elude, the bridal day.

While yet she speaks, the gay Antinous cries :
" Offspring of kings, and more than woman wise !
'Tis right ; 'tis man's prerogative to give,
And custom bids thee without shame receive ;
Yet never, never, from thy dome we move,
Till Hymen lights the torch of spousal love."

The peers dispatch their heralds, to convey
The gifts of love ; with speed they take the way.
A robe Antinous gives of shining dyes,
The varying hues in gay confusion rise
Rich from the artist's hand ! Twelve clasps of gold
Close to the lessening loins the vest infold ;
Down from the swelling waist the vest unbound
Floats in bright waves redundant o'er the ground.
A bracelet rich with gold, with amber gay,
That shot effulgence like the solar ray,
Eurymachus presents : and ear-rings bright,
With triple stars, that cast a trembling light.
Pisander bears a necklace wrought with art :
And every peer, expressive of his heart,
A gift bestows : this done, the queen ascends,
And slow behind her damsel-train attends,

Then to the dance they form the vocal strain,
Till Hesperus leads forth the starry train ;
And now he raises, as the day-light fades,
His golden circlet in the deepening shades :
Three vases heap'd with copious fires display
O'er all the palace a fictitious day ;
From space to space the torch wide-beaming burns,
And sprightly damsels trim the rays by turns.

To whom the king : " Ill suits your sex to stay
Alone with men ! ye modest maids, away !
Go, with the queen the spindle guide ; or call
(The partners of her cares) the silver wool ;
Be it my task the torches to supply,
Ev'n till the morning lamp adorns the sky ;
Ev'n till the morning, with unwearied care,
Sleepless I watch ; for I have learn'd to bear."

Scornful they heard : Melanthe, fair and young,
(Melanthe from the loins of Dolius sprung,
Who with the queen her years an infant led,
With the soft fondness of a daughter bred)
Chiefly derides : regardless of the cares

Her queen endures, polluted joys she shares
Nocturnal with Eurymachus ! With eyes
That speak disdain, the wanton thus replies :
" Oh ! whither wanders thy distemper'd brain
Thou bold intruder on a princely train ?

Hence to the vagrant's rendezvous repair ;
Or shun in some black forge the midnight air.
Proceeds this boldness from a turn of soul,
Or flows licentious from the copious bowl ?
Is it that vanquish'd Irus swells thy mind ?
A foe may meet thee of a braver kind,

Who, shortening with a storm of blows thy stay,
Shall send thee howling all in blood away !"

To whom with frowns : " O impudent in wrong !
Thy lord shall curb that insolence of tongue ;
Know, to Telemachus I tell th' offence ;
The scourge, the scourge shall lash thee into sense."

With conscious shame they hear the stern rebuke,
Nor longer durst sustain the sovereign look.

Then to the servile task the monarch turns
His royal hands ; each torch refulgent burns
With added day : meanwhile, in museful mood
Absorpt in thought, on vengeance fix'd he stood.

And now the martial maid, by deeper wrongs
To rouse Ulysses, points the suitors tongues,
Scornful of age to taunt the virtuous man ;
Thoughtless and gay, Eurymachus began :

" Hear me" (he cries) " confederates and friends !
Some god, no doubt, this stranger kindly sends ;
The shining baldness of his head survey,
It aids our torch-light and reflects the ray.—"

Then to the king that levell'd haughty Troy,
" Say, if large hire can tempt thee to employ
Those hands in work ; to tend the rural trade,
To dress the walk, and form th' embowering shade ?
So food and raiment constant will I give :

But idly thus thy soul prefers to live,
And starve by strolling, not by work to thrive."

To whom incens'd : " Should we, O prince, engage

In rival tasks beneath the burning rage
Of summer suns ; were both constrain'd to wield,
Foodless, the scythe along the burthen'd field ;
Or should we labour, while the ploughshare wounds,
With steers of equal strength, th' allotted grounds :
Beneath my labours how thy wondering eyes
Might see the sable field at once arise !
Should Jove dire war unloose ; with spear and shield,
And nodding helm, I tread th' ensanguin'd field

Fierce in the van: then would'st thou, would'st thou,—say,—

Misname me, glutton, in that glorious day?
No, thy ill-judging thoughts the brave disgrace;
'Tis thou injurious art, not I am base.
Proud to seem brave among a coward train!

But know, thou art not valorous, but vain.
Gods! should the stern Ulysses rise in might,
These gates would seem too narrow for thy flight."

While yet he speaks, Eurymachus replies,
With indignation flashing in his eyes:
"Slave, I with justice might deserve the wrong!

Should I not punish that opprobrious tongue,
Irreverent to the great, and uncontroll'd,
Art thou from wine, or innate folly, bold?
Perhaps these outrages from Irus flow,
A worthless triumph o'er a worthless foe!"

He said, and with full force a footstool threw:
Whirl'd from his arm, with erring rage it flew;
Ulysses, cautious of the vengeful foe,
Stoops to the ground, and disappoints the blow.
Not so a youth who deals the goblet round,
Full on his shoulder it inflicts a wound,
Dash'd from his hand the sounding goblet flies,
He shrieks, he reels, he falls, and breathless lies.

Then wild uproar and clamour mounts the sky,
Till mutual thus the peers indignant cry:
"Oh! had this stranger sunk to realms beneath,
To the black realms of darkness and of death,
Ere yet he trod these shores! to strife he draws
Peer against peer; and what the weighty cause?
A vagabond! for him the great destroy,
In vile ignoble jars, the feast of joy."

To whom the stern Telemachus arose:
"Gods! what wild folly from the goblet flows?
Whence this unguarded openness of soul,
But from the license of the copious bowl?
Or Heaven delusion sends: but hence, away!
Force I forbear, and without force obey."

Silent, abash'd, they hear the stern rebuke,
Till thus Amphionus the silence broke:
"True are his words, and he whom truth offends,
Not with Telemachus, but truth, contends;
Let not the hand of violence invade
The reverend stranger, or the spotless maid;
Retire we hence, but crown with rosy wine
The flowing goblet to the powers divine;
Guard he his guest beneath whose roof he stands,
This justice, this the social rite demands."

The peers assent: the goblet Mullus crown'd
With purple juice, and bore in order round;
Each peer successive his libation pours
To the blest gods who fill th' ærial bowers;
Then, shall'd with wine, with noise the crowds obey,
And, rushing forth, tumultuous reel away.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XIX.

ARGUMENT.

THE DISCOVERY OF ULYSSES TO EURYCLEA.

ULYSSES and his son remove the weapons out of the armoury. Ulysses, in conversation with Penelope, gives a fictitious account of his adventures; then assures her, he had formerly entertained her husband in Crete; and describes exactly his person and dress, affirms to have heard of him in Phœacia and Thesprotia, and that his return is certain, and within a month. He then goes to bathe, and is attended by Euryclea, who discovers him to be Ulysses by the scar upon his leg, which he formerly received in hunting the wild boar on Parnassus. The poet inserts a digression, relating that accident, with all its particulars.

CONSULTING secret with the blue-ey'd maid,
Still in the dome divine Ulysses stay'd:
Revenge mature for act inflam'd his breast;
And thus the son the fervent sire address'd:
"Instant convey those steely stores of war
To distant rooms, dispos'd with secret care:
The cause demanded by the suitor-train,
To soothe their fears, a specious reason feign:
Say, since Ulysses left his natal coast,
Obscene with smoke, their beamy lustre lost,
His arms deform'd, the roof they won't adorn:
From the glad walls inglorious lumber torn.
Suggest, that Jove the peaceful thought inspir'd,
Lest they by sight of swords to fury fir'd,
Dishonest wounds, or violence of soul,
Defame the bridal feast, and friendly bowl."
The prince, obedient to the sage command,
To Euryclea thus: "The female band
In their apartments keep; secure the doors:
These swarthy arms among the covert stores
Are seemlier hid; my thoughtless youth they blame,

Imbrown'd with vapour of the smouldering flame."
"In happy hour," (pleas'd Euryclea cries)
Tutor'd by early woes, grow early wise!
Inspect with sharpen'd sight, and frugal care,
Your patrimonial wealth, a prudent heir.
But who the lighted taper will provide,
(The female train retir'd) your toils to guide?"

"Without infringing hospitable rite,
This guest" (he cried) "shall bear the guiding
I cheer no lazy vagrants with repast; [light:
They share the meal that earn it ere they taste."

He said; from female ken she straight secures
The purpos'd deed, and guards the bolted doors;
Auxiliary to his son, Ulysses bears
The plummy-crested helms, and pointed spears,
With shields indented deep in glorious wars,
Minerva viewless on her charge attends,
And with her golden lamp his toil befriends;
Not such the sickly beams, which, unincere,
Gild the cross vapour of this nether sphere!
A present deity the prince confest,
And wrapt with ecstasy the sire address'd:

"What miracle thus dazzles with surprise!
Distinct in rows the radiant columns rise:
The walls, where'er my wondering sight I turn,
And roofs, amidst a blaze of glory burn!
Some visitant of pure ethereal race,
With his bright presence deigns the dome to grace."
"Be calm," replies the sire, "to none impart,
But oft revolve the vision in thy heart:
Celestials, mantled in excess of light,
Can visit unapproach'd by mortal sight.
Seek thou repose; whilst here I sole remain,
To explore the conduct of the female train:

The pensive queen, perchance, desires to know
The sense of my toils, to soothe her woe."

With tapers flaming day his train attends,
His bright alcove th' obsequious youth ascends :
Soft slumberous shades his drooping eye-lids close,
Till on her eastern throne Aurora glows.

Whilst, forming plans of deaths, Ulysses stay'd
In council secret with the martial maid ;
Attendant nymphs in beauteous order wait
The queen, descending from her bower of state.
Her cheeks the warmer blush of Venus wear,
Chasten'd with coy Diana's pensive air.
An ivory seat with silver ringlets grac'd,
By fam'd Iomalius wrought, the menials plac'd :
With ivory silver'd thick the foot-stool shone,
O'er which the panther's various hide was thrown.
The sovereign seat with graceful air she press'd ;
To different tasks their toil the nymphs address'd :
The golden goblet some, and some restor'd
From stains of luxury the polish'd board :
These to remove th' expiring embers came,
While those with unctuous fir foment the flame.

'Twas then Melanthe, with imperious mien,
Renew'd th' attack, incontinent of spleen :
" Awaunt," she cry'd, " offensive to my sight !
Deem not in ambush here to lurk by night,
Into the woman-state assquint to pry ;
A day-devourer, and an evening spy !
Vagrant, be gone ! before this blazing brand
Shall urge"—and war'd it hissing in her hand.

Th' insulted hero rolls his wrathful eyes,
And, " Why so turbulent of soul ?" he cries ;
" Can these lean shrivell'd limbs, unner'd with age,
These poor but honest rags, enkindle rage ?
In crowds we wear the badge of hungry fate ;
And beg, degraded from superior state !
Constrain'd a rent-charge on the rich I live ;
Reduc'd to crave the good I once could give :
A palace, wealth, and slaves, I late possess'd,
And all that makes the great be call'd the bless'd :
My gate, an emblem of my open soul,
Embrac'd the poor, and dealt a bounteous dole.
Scorn not the sad reverse, injurious maid !
'Tis Jove's high will, and be his will obey'd !
Nor think thyself exempt : that rosy prime
Must share the general doom of withering time :
To some new channel soon, the changeful tide
Of royal grace th' offended queen may guide ;
And her low'd lord unplume thy towering pride.
Or were he dead, 'tis wisdom to beware :
Sweet blooms the prince beneath Apollo's care ;
Your deeds with quick impartial eye surveys,
Potent to punish what he cannot praise."

Her keen reproach had reach'd the sovereign's ear ;

" Loquacious insolent !" she cries, " forbear :
To thee the purpose of my soul I told ;
Venial discourse, unblam'd, with him to hold :
The storied labours of my wandering lord,
To soothe my grief, he haply may record :
Yet him, my guest, thy venom'd rage hath stung :
Thy head shall pay the forfeit of thy tongue !
But thou on whom my palace cares depend,
Eurynome, regard the stranger-friend :
A seat, soft-spread with furry spoils, prepare ;
Due-distant, for us both to speak, and hear."

The menial fair obeys with dutious haste :
A seat adorn'd with furry spoils she plac'd :
Due-distant for discourse the hero sat ;
When thus the sovereign from her chair of state :

" Reveal, obsequious to my first demand,
Thy name, thy lineage, and thy native land."

He thus : " O queen ! whose far resounding fame
Is bounded only by the starry frame ;
Consummate pattern of imperial sway,
Whose pious rule a warlike race obey :
In wavy gold thy summer vales are dress'd ;
Thy autumns beud with copious fruit oppress'd ;
With flocks and herds each grassy plain is stor'd ;
And fish of every fin thy seas afford ;
Their affluent joys the grateful realms confess,
And bless the power that still delights to bless.
Gracious permit this prayer, imperial dame !
Forbear to know my lineage, or my name :
Urge not this breast to heave, these eyes to weep ;
In sweet oblivion let my sorrow sleep !
My woes awak'd will violate your ear ;
And to this gay censorious train appear
A wiry vapour melting in a tear."

" Their gifts the gods resum'd," (the queen re-
" Exterior grace, and energy of mind : [join'd]
When the dear partner of my nuptial joy,
Auxiliar troops combin'd, to conquer Troy.
My lord's protecting hand alone would raise
My drooping verdure, and extend my praise !
Peers from the distant Samian shores resort ;
Here with Dulichians join'd, besiege the courts
Zacynthus, green with ever-shady groves,
And Ithaca, presumptuous, boast their loves :
Obtruding on my choice a second lord,
They press the Hymenean rite abhor'd.
Misrule thus mingling with domestic cares,
I live regardless of my state affairs :
Receive no stranger guest, no poor relive ;
But ever for my lord in secret grieve !—
This art, instinct by some celestial power,
I try'd, elusive of the bridal hour :
' Ye peers !' I cry, ' who press to gain a heart,
Where dread Ulysses claims no future part ;
Rebate your loves, each rival suit suspend,
Till this funereal web my labours end :
Cease, till to good Laertes I bequeath
A pall of state, the ornament of death.
For when to fate he bows, each Grecian dame
With just reproach were licens'd to defame ;
Should he, long honour'd in supreme command,
Want the last duties of a daughter's hand.'
The fiction pleas'd ! their loves I long elude ;
The night still ravell'd what the day renew'd,
Three years successful in my art conceal'd,
My ineffectual fraud the fourth reveal'd :
Befriended by my own domestic spies,
The woof unwrought the suitor-train surprise,
From nuptial rites they now no more recede,
And fear forbids to falsify the breed.
My anxious parents urge a speedy choice,
And to their suffrage gain the filial voice :
For rule mature, Telemachus deplores
His dome dishonour'd, and exhausted stores—
But, stranger ! as thy days seem full of fate,
Divide discourse, in turn thy birth relate :
Thy port asserts thee of distinguish'd race :
No poor unfather'd product of disgrace."

" Princess !" he cries, " renew'd by your command,

The dear remembrance of my native land
Of secret grief unseals the fruitful source ;
And tears repeat their long forgotten course !
So pays the wretch whom fate constrains to roam,
The dues of nature to his natal home !—

But inward on my soul let sorrow prey,
Your sovereign will my duty bids obey.

“ Crete awes the circling waves, a fruitful soil !
And ninety cities crown the sea-born isle:
Mix'd with her genuine sons, adopted names
In various tongues avow their various claims:
Cydonians dreadful with the bended yew,
And bold Pelasgi boast a native's due:
The Dorians, plum'd amid the files of war,
Her foodful glebe with fierce Achæians share;
Cnossus, her capital of high command,
Where accepter'd Minos with impartial hand
Divided right; each ninth revolving year
By Jove receiv'd in council to confer.
His son Deucalion bore successive sway;
His son, who gave me first to view the day!
The royal bed an elder issue blest,
Idomeneus, whom Ilian fields attest
Of matchless deeds: untrain'd to martial toll
I liv'd inglorious in my native isle,
Studios of peace; and Æthon is my name.
'Twas then to Crete that great Ulysses came;
For elemental war, and wintry Jove,
From Malea's gusty cape his navy drove
To bright Lucina's fane; the stealthy coast,
Where loud Amphis in the deep is lost.
His vessels moor'd, (an incommodious port !)
The hero speeded to the Cnossian court:
Ardent the partner of his arms to find,
In leagues of long commutual friendship join'd.
Vain hope! ten suns had warm'd the western
strand,

Since my brave brother with his Cretan band
Had sail'd for Troy: but to the genial feast
My honour'd roof receiv'd the royal guest:
Bees for his train the Cnossian peers assign
A public treat, with jars of generous wine.
Twelve days, while Boreas vex'd th' aerial space,
My hospitable dome he deign'd to grace:
And, when the north had ceas'd the stormy roar,
He wip'd his voyage to the Phrygian shore.”

Thus the fam'd hero, perfected in wiles,
With fair similitude of truth beguiles
The queen's attentive ear: dissolv'd in woe,
From her bright eyes the tears unbounded flow.
As snows collected on the mountain freeze,
When milder regions breathe a vernal breeze,
The fleecy pile obeys the whispering gales,
Ends in a stream, and murmurs through the vales:
So, melted with the pleasing tale he told,
Down her fair cheek the copious torrent roll'd:
She to her present lord laments him lost,
And views that object which she wants the most!
Withering at heart to see the weeping fair,
His eyes look stern, and cast a gloomy stare;
Of horn the stiff relentless balls appear,
Or globes of iron fix'd in either sphere;
Firm wisdom interdicts to softening tear.
A speechless interval of grief ensues,
Till thus the queen the tender theme renews:

“ Stranger! that e'er thy hospitable roof
Ulysses grac'd, confirm by faithful proof;
Delineate to my view my warlike lord,
His form, his habit, and his train record.”

“ 'Tis hard,” he cries, “ to bring to sudden sight
Ideas that have wing'd their distant flight;
Rare on the mind those images are trac'd,
Whose footsteps twenty winters have defac'd:
But what I can, receive.—In ample mode,
A robe of military purple flow'd

O'er all his frame: illustrious on his breast
The double-clasping gold the king confest:
In the rich woof a bound, Mosaic drawn,
Bore on full-stretch, and seiz'd a dappled fawn;
Deep in the neck his fangs indent their hold;
They pant, and struggle in the moving gold.
Fine as a filmy web beneath it shone
A vest, that dazzled like a cloudless sun:
The female train who round him through'd to gaze,
In silent wonder sigh'd unwilling praise.
A sabre, when the warrior press'd to part,
I gave, enamell'd with Vulcanian art:
A mantle purple-ting'd, and radiant vest,
Dimension'd equal to his size express'd
Affection grateful to my honour'd guest.
A favourite herald in his train I knew,
His visage solemn sad, of sable hue:
Short woolly curls o'erfric'd his bonding head,
O'er which a promontory-shoulder spread;
Eurybates! in whose large soul alone
Ulysses view'd an image of his own.”

His speech the tempest of her grief restor'd,
In all he told she recogniz'd her lord,
But when the storm was spent in plenteous showers;
A pause inspiring her languish'd powers:
“ Oh! thou,” she cry'd, “ whom first inclement
Made welcome to my hospitable gate; [fate
With all thy wants the name of poor shall end:
Henceforth live honour'd, my domestic friend!
The vest much envy'd on your native coast,
And regal robe with figur'd gold emboss'd,
In happier hours my artful hand employ'd,
When my lov'd lord this blissful bower enjoy'd:
The fall of Troy, erroneous and forlorn
Doom'd to survive, and never to return!”

Then he, with pity touch'd: “ O royal dame!
Your ever-anxious mind, and beauteous frame,
From the devouring rage of grief reclaim.
I not the fondness of your soul reprove
For such a lord! who crown'd your virgin love
With the dear blessing of a fair increase;
Himself adorn'd with more than mortal grace:
Yet while I speak, the mighty woo suspend;
Truth forms my tale; to pleasing truth attend.
The royal object of your dearest care
Breathes in no distant clime the vital air;
In rich Theoprotia, and the nearer bound
Of Thesaly, his name I heard renown'd:
Without retinues, to that friendly shore
Welcom'd with gifts of price, a sumless store!
His sacrilegious train, who dar'd to prey
On herds devoted to the god of day,
Were doom'd by Jove, and Phœbus' just decree,
To perish in the rough Trinacrian sea.
To better fate the blameless chief ordain'd,
A floating fragment of the wreck regain'd,
And rode the storm; till, by the billows tost,
He landed on the fair Phœacian coast.
That race, who emulate the life of gods,
Receive him joyous to their blest abodes:
Large gifts confer, a ready sail command,
To speed his voyage to the Grecian strand.
But your wise lord (in whose capacious soul
High schemes of power in just succession roll)
His Ithaca refus'd from favouring fate,
Till copious wealth might guard his regal state,
Phedon the fact affirm'd, whose sovereign sway
Thespritan tribes, a dutious race, obey:
And bade the gods this added truth attest,
(While pure libations crown'd the genial feast)

That anchor'd in his port the vessel stand,
 To wait the hero to his natal land.
 I for Dalichium urge the watery way,
 But first the Ulyssæan wealth survey:
 So rich the value of a store so vast
 Demands the pomp of centuries to waste!
 The darling object of your royal love,
 Was journey'd thence to Dodæan Jove;
 By the sure precept of the sylvan shrine,
 To form the conduct of his great design:
 Irresolute of soul, his state to shroud
 In dark disguise, or come a king avow'd?
 Thus lives your lord; nor longer doom'd to roam:
 Soon will he grace this dear paternal dome.
 By Jove, the source of good, supreme in power!
 By the blest genius of this friendly bower!
 I ratify my speech; before the Sun
 His annual longitude of Heaven shall run;
 When the pale empress of yon starry train
 In the next month renews her faded wane,
 Ulysses will assert his rightful reign." ["are due,
 "What thanks! what boon!" reply'd the queen,
 When time shall prove the storied blessing true:
 My lord's return should fate no more retard,
 Envy shall sicken at thy vast reward.
 But my prophetic fears, alas! presage,
 The wounds of destiny's relentless rage.
 I long must weep, nor will Ulysses come,
 With royal gifts to send you honour'd home!—
 Your other task, ye menial train, forbear:
 New wash the stranger, and the bed prepare:
 With splendid palls the downy fleeces adorn:
 Uprising early with the purple morn,
 His sinews shrank with age, and stiff with toil,
 In the warm bath foment with fragrant oil.
 Then with Telemachus the social feast
 Partaking free, my sole invited guest;
 Whoe'er neglects to pay distinction due,
 The breach of hospitable right may rue.
 The vulgar of my sex I most succeed
 In real fame, when most humane my deed:
 And vainly to the praise of queen aspire,
 If, stranger! I permit that mean attire,
 Beneath the feastful bower. A narrow space
 Confines the circle of our destin'd race;
 'Tis ours with good the scanty round to grace.
 Those who to cruel wrong their state abuse,
 Draped in life the matter'd curse pursue;
 By death disrob'd of all their savage powers,
 Then licens'd rage her hateful prey devour.
 But he whose inborn worth his acts commend,
 Of gentle soul, to human race a friend;
 The wretched he relieves diffuse his fame,
 And distant tongues extol the patron name."
 "Princess," he cry'd, "in vain your bounties
 On me, confirm'd and obdurate in woe. [flow
 When my lov'd Crete receiv'd my final view,
 And from my weeping eyes her cliffs withdrew;
 The tatter'd weeds (my decent robe resign'd)
 I chose the livery of a woeful mind!
 Nor will my heart-corroding cares abate
 With splendid palls, and canopies of state:
 Low-couch'd on earth, the gift of sleep I scorn,
 And catch the glances of the waking morn.
 The delicacy of your courtly train
 To wash a wretched wanderer would disdain;
 But if, in track of long experience try'd,
 And sad similitude of woes ally'd,
 Some wretch reluctant views aerial light,
 To her mean hand assign the friendly rite."

Pleas'd with his wise reply, the queen rejoic'd:
 "Such gentle manners, and so sage a mind,
 In all who grac'd this hospitable bower
 I ne'er discern'd, before this social hour.
 Such servant as your humble choice requires,
 To light receiv'd the lord of my desires,
 New from the birth: and with a mother's hand
 His tender bloom to manly growth sustain'd
 Of matchless prudence, and a duteous mind;
 Though now to life's extremest verge declin'd
 Of strength superior to the toil assign'd.—
 Rise, Euryclea! with officious care
 For the poor friend the cleansing bath prepare:
 This debt his correspondent fortunes claim,
 Too like Ulysses, and perhaps the same!
 Thus, old with woes, my fancy paints him now;
 For age untimely marks the careful brow!"
 Instant, obsequious to the mild command,
 Sad Euryclea rose: with trembling hand
 She veils the torrent of her tearful eyes;
 And thus impassion'd to herself replies:
 "Son of my love, and monarch of my cares;
 What pangs for thee this wretched bosom bears!
 Are thus by Jove who constant beg his aid
 With pious deed and pure devotion paid?
 He never dar'd defraud the sacred fame,
 Of perfect hecatombs in order slain:
 There oft implor'd his tutelary power,
 Long to protract the sad sepulchral hour;
 That, form'd for empire with paternal care,
 His realm might recognize an equal heir.
 Oh destin'd head! The pious vows are lost;
 His god forgets him on a foreign coast!—
 Perhaps, like thee, poor guest! in wanton pride
 The rich insult him, and the young deride!
 Conscious of worth revil'd, thy generous mind
 The friendly rite of purity declin'd;
 My will concurring with my queen's command,
 Accept the bath from this obsequious hand.
 A strong emotion shakes my anguish'd breast;
 In thy whole form Ulysses seems express'd:
 Of all the wretched harbour'd on our coast,
 None imagin'd e'er like thee my master lost."
 Thus half discover'd through the dark disguise,
 With cold composure feign'd, the chief replies:
 "You join your suffrage to the public vote;
 The same you think, have all beholders thought."
 He said. Replenish'd from the purest springs,
 The laver straight with busy care she brings:
 In the deep vase, that shone like burnish'd gold,
 The boiling fluid temperates the cold.
 Meantime revolving in his thoughtful mind
 The scar with which his manly knee was sign'd;
 His face averting from the crackling blaze,
 His shoulders intercept th' unfriendly rays:
 Thus cautious in the obscure he hop'd to fly
 The curious search of Euryclea's eye.
 Cautious in vain! nor ceas'd the dame to find
 The scar, with which his manly knee was sign'd.
 This on Parnassus (combating the boar)
 With glancing rage the tusky savage tore.
 Attended by his brave maternal race,
 His grandsire sent him to the sylvan chase,
 Autolycus the bold (a mighty name
 For spotless faith and deeds of martial fame;
 Hermes, his patron-god, those gifts bestow'd,
 Whose shrine with weanling lambs he wont to load.)
 His course to Ithaca this hero sped,
 When the first product of Laertes' bed

Or, instant should he quench the guilty flame
With their own blood, and intercept the shame;
Or to their lust indulge a last embrace,
And let the peers consummate the disgrace;
Round his swain heart the murmurous fury rolls;
As o'er her young the mother mastiff howls,
And bays the stranger groom: so wrath compress'd,
Recoiling, mutter'd thunder in his breast.

"Poor suffering heart!" he cried, "support the pain
Of wounded honour, and thy rage restrain.
Not fiercer woes thy fortitude could foil,
When the brave partners of thy ten years' toil
Dire Polypheme devour'd: I then was freed,
By patient prudence from the death decreed."

Thus anchor'd safe on reason's peaceful coast
Tempests of wrath his soul no longer toss'd;
Restless his body roll'd, to rage resign'd:
As one who long with pale-ey'd famine pin'd,
The savory cates on glowing embers cast
Incessant turns, impatient for repast;
Ulysses so, from side to side devolv'd,
In self-debate the suitors' doom resolv'd.

When, in the form of mortal nymph array'd,
From Heaven descends the Jove-born martial maid;
And hovering o'er his head in view confess'd,
The goddess thus her favourite care address'd:

"O thou, of mortals most inur'd to woes!
Why roll those eyes unfriended of repose?
Beneath thy palace-roof forget thy care;
Bless'd in thy queen! bless'd in thy blooming heir!
Whom, to the gods when suppliant fathers bow,
They name the standard of their dearest vow."

"Just is thy kind reproach," (the chief rejoind'd);
"Deeds full of fate distract my various mind
In contemplation wrapp'd. This hostile crew
What single arm hath prowess to subdue?
Or if, by Jove's and thy auxiliary aid,
They're doom'd to bleed; Oh! say celestial maid:
Where shall Ulysses shun, or how sustain,
Nations embattled to revenge the slain?"

"Oh, impotence of faith!" Minerva cries,
"If man on frail unknowing man relies,
Doubt you the gods? Lo! Pallas' self descends,
Inspires thy counsels, and thy toils attends.
In me affianc'd, fortify thy breast,
Though myriads leagu'd thy rightful claim contest:

My sure divinity shall bear the shield,
And edge thy sword to reap the glorious field.
Now pay the debt to craving nature due,
Her faded powers with balmy rest renew."
She ceas'd. Ambrosial slumbers seal his eyes;
His care dissolves in visionary joys:
The goddess, pleas'd, regains her natal skies.

Not so the queen: the downy bands of sleep
By grief relax'd, she wak'd again to weep:
A gloomy pause ensued of dumb despair:
Then thus her fate invoc'd, with fervent prayer:

"Diana! speed thy deathful ebon dart,
And cure the pangs of this convulsive heart.
Snatch me, ye whirlwinds! far from human race,
Toss'd through the void illimitable space:
Or, if dismounted from the rapid cloud,
Me with his whelming wave let Ocean shroud!
So, Pandarus, thy hopes, three orphan fair,
Were doom'd to wander through the devious air;
Thyself untimely and thy consort dy'd,
But four celestials both your cares supply'd.
Venus in tender delicacy rears
With honey, milk, and wine, their infant years:

Imperial Juno to their youth assign'd
A form majestic, and sagacious mind:
With shapely growth Diana grac'd the bloom;
And Pallas taught the texture of the loom.
But whilst, to learn their lots in nuptial love,
Bright Cytherea sought the bower of Jove
(The god supreme, to whose eternal eye
The registers of fate expanded lie;)
Wing'd harpies snatch'd th' unguarded charge
And to the Furies bore a greatful prey. [away,
Be such my lot! Or thou, Diana, speed
Thy shaft, and send me joyful to the dead;
To seek my lord among the warrior train,
Ere second vows my bridal faith profane.
When woes the waking sense alone assail;
Whilst night extends her soft oblivious veil,
Of other wretches' care the torture ends;
No truce the warfare of my heart suspends!
The night renews the day distracting theme,
And airy terrors sable every dream.
The last alone a kind illusion wrought,
And to my bed my lov'd Ulysses brought
In manly bloom, and each majestic grace,
As when for Troy he left my fond embrace;
Such raptures in my beating bosom rise,
I deem it sure a vision of the skies."

Thus, whilst Aurora mounts her purple throne,
In audible laments she breathes her moan;
The sounds assault Ulysses' wakeful ear:
Misjudging of the cause, a sudden fear
Of his arrival known, the chief alarms;
He thinks the queen is rushing to his arms.
Upspringing from his couch, with active haste
The fleece and carpet in the dome he plac'd
(The hide, without, imbib'd the morning air;)
And thus the gods invoc'd with ardent prayer:
"Jove, and ethereal thrones! with Heaven to
friend,

If the long series of my woes shall end,
Of human race now rising from repose
Let one a blissful omen here disclose:
And, to confirm my faith, propitious Jove,
Vouchsafe the sanction of a sign above!"

Whilst lowly thus the chief adoring bows,
The pitying god his guardian aid avows.
Loud from a sapphire sky his thunder sounds:
With springing hope the hero's heart resounds.
Soon, with consummate joy to crown his prayer,
An omen's voice invades his ravish'd ear.
Beneath a pile, that close the dome adjoin'd,
Twelve female slaves the gift of Ceres grind;
Task'd for the royal board to holt the bran
From the pure flour (the growth and strength of Discharging to the day the labour due, [man],
Now early to repose the rest withdrew;
One maid, unequal to the task assign'd,
Still turn'd the toilsome mill with anxious mind;
And thus in bitterness of soul divin'd:

"Father of gods and men, whose thunders roll
O'er the cerulean vault, and shake the pole;
Whoe'er from Heaven has gain'd this rare omen
(Of granted vows a certain signal sent)
In this blest moment of accepted prayer,
Piteous, regard a wretch consum'd with care!
Instant, O Jove! confound the suitor train,
For whom o'er-toil'd I grind the golden grain:
Far from this dome the lewd devourers cast,
And be this festival decreed their last!"

Big with their doom denounc'd in Earth and sky,
Ulysses' heart dilates with secret joy.

Meantime the genial train with unctuous wood
Heap'd high the genial hearth, Volcanian food:
When, early dress'd, advanc'd the royal heir:
With manly grasp he wav'd a martial spear,
A radiant sabre grac'd his purple zone,
And on his foot the golden sandal shone.
His steps suppetuous to the portal press'd;
And Euryclea thus he there address'd:

"Say thou, to whom my youth its hurtur'd owes,
Was care for due refection and repose
Bestow'd the stranger's guest? Or waits he griev'd,
His age not honour'd, nor his wants reliev'd?
Promiscuous grace on all the queen confers
(In woes bewilder'd, oft the wisest errs).
The wordy vagrant to the dole aspires,
And modest worth with noble scorn retires."

She thus: "Oh! cease that ever honour'd
name

To blenish now; if ill deserves your blame:
A bowl of generous wine suffic'd the guest:
In vain the queen the night-refection press'd;
Nor would he court repose in downy state,
Unless'd, abandon'd to the rage of fate!
A hide beneath the portico was spread,
And fleecy skins compos'd an humble bed:
A downy carpet, cast with duteous care,
Secur'd him from the keen nocturnal air."

His cornel javelin pois'd with regal port,
To the sage Greeks couven'd in Thémis' court,
Forth issuing from the domé the prince repair'd:
Two dogs of chase, a lion-hearted guard,
Behind him sourly stalk'd. Without delay
The dame divides the labour of the day;
Thus urging to the toil the menial train,
"What marks of luxury the marble stain!
Its wonted lustre let the floor regain!
The seats with purple clothe in order due;
And let th' abstensive vase the board renew:
Let some refresh the vase's sullied mould;
Some bid the goblets boast their native gold:
Some to the spring, with each a jar, repair,
And copious waters pure for bathing bear:
Dispatch! for soon the suitors will assay
The lunar feast-rites to the god of day."

She said: with duteous haste a bevy fair
Of twenty virgins to the spring repair:
With varied toll the rest adorn the dome.
Magnificent, and blithe, the suitors come.
Some wield the sounding axe: the dodder'd oaks
Divide, obedient to the forceful strokes,
Soon from the fount, with each a brimming urd,
(Eumæus in their trash) the maids return.
Three porkers for the feast, all brawny-chin'd,
He brought; the choicest of the tusk'd kind:
In lodgements first secure his care he view'd:
Then to the king his friendly speech renew'd:
"Now stay, my guest! the suitor-train
Still treat thy worth with lordly dull disdain:
Or speak their deed a doubtful mind humane?"
"Suffice pitying god" (Ulysses said reply'd)
"With rolled vengeance blast their towering
pride!

No conscious blush, no sense of right, restrains
The tides of lust that swell their boiling veins:
From vice to vice their appetites are lost,
All cheaply satiated at another's cost!"

While thus the chief his woes indignant told,
Melancholic, master of the bearded fold,
The goodliest goats of all the royal herd
Spontaneous to the suitors' feast prefer'd:

Two grooms assistant bore the victims bound;
With quavering cries the vaulted roofs resound;
And to the chief austere, aloud began
The wretch unfriendly to the race of man:

"Here, vagrant, still? offensive to my lords!
Blows have more energy than airy words;
These arguments I'll use: nor conscious shame,
Nor threats, thy bold intrusion will reclaim.
On this high feast the meanest vulgar boast
A plenteous board! Hence! seek another host!"

Rejoinder to the churl the king disdain'd;
But shook his head, and rising wrath restrain'd.
From Cephalenia cross the surgy main
Philæus late arriv'd, a faithful swain.

A steer ungrateful to the bull's embrace,
And goats he brought, the pride of all their race
Imported in a shallop not his own:
The dome re-echo'd to their mingled moan.
Straight to the guardian of the bristly kind
He thus began, benevolent of mind:

"What guest is he, of such majestic air?
His lineage and paternal clime declare:
Dim through th' eclipse of fate, the rays divine
Of sovereign state with faded splendour shine.
If monarchs by the gods are plung'd in woe,
To what abyss are we foredoom'd to go!"
Then affable he thus the chief address'd, Whilst with pathetic warmth his hand he press'd:

"Stranger; may fate a milder aspect show,
And spin thy future with a whiter clue!
O Jove, for ever deaf to human cries;
The tyrant, not the father of the skies;
Unpiteous of the race thy will began!
The fool of fate, thy manufacture, man,
With penury, contempt, repulse, and care,
The galling load of life is doom'd to bear.
Ulysses from his state a wanderer still,
Upbraids thy power, thy wisdom, or thy will,
O monarch ever dear!—O man of woe!—
FRESH flow my tears, and shall for ever flow!
Like thee, poor stranger-guest, denied his home!
Like thee, in rags obscene, decreed to roam!
Or, haply perish'd on some distant coast,
In Stygian gloom he glides a pensive ghost!
Oh! grateful for the good his bounty gave,
I'll grieve, till sorrow sink me to the grave!
His kind protecting hand my youth prefer'd,
The regent of his Cephalenian herd:

With vast increase beneath my care it spreads,
A stately breed! and blackens far the meads,
Constrain'd, the choicest beves I thence import
To cram these cormorants that crowd his court;
Who ill partition seek his realm to share;
Nor human right, nor wrath divine revere.
Since here resolv'd oppressive these reside,
Contenting doubts my anxious heart divide:
Now to some foreign clime inclin'd to fly,
And with the royal herd protection buy:
Thou happier thoughts return the nodding scale,
Light mounts despair, alternate hopes prevail:
In opening prospects of ideal joy,
My king returns; the proud usurpers die."

To whom the chief: "In thy capacious mind
Since daring zeal with cool debate is join'd;
Attend a deed already ripe in fate;
Attest, O Jove, the truth I now relate!
This sacred truth attest each genial power,
Who bless the board, and guard this friendly bower!"

Before thou quit the dome (nor long delay)
Thy wish produc'd in act, with pleas'd survey,
Thy wondering eyes shall view: his rightful reign
By arms avow'd Ulysses shall regain,
And to the shades devote the suitor-train."

"O Jove supreme!" the raptur'd swain replies,
"With deed consummate soon the promise'd joys!
These aged nerves, with new-born vigour strung,
In that blest cause should emulate the young"—
Assents Eumæus to the prayer address:
And equal ardours fire his loyal breast.

Meantime the suitors urge the prince's fate,
And deathful arts employ the dire debate:
When, in his airy tour, the bird of Jove
Truss'd with his sinewy pounce a trembling dove:
Sinister to their hope! This omen ey'd
Amphinomus, who thus presaging cry'd:

"The gods from force and fraud the prince defend;

O peers! the sanguinary scheme suspend:
Your future thought let sable fate employ;
And give the present hour to genial joy."

From council straight th' assenting peerage ceas'd,
And in the dome prepar'd the genial feast.
Disrob'd their vests apart in order lay,
Then all with speed succinct the victims slay:
With sheep and shaggy goats the porkers bled,
And the proud steer was on the marble spread.
With fire prepar'd, they deal the morsels round,
Wine rosy-bright the brimming goblets crown'd,
By sage Eumæus borne: the purple tide
Melanthius from an ample jar supplied;
High canisters of bread Philætius plac'd;
And eager all devour the rich repast.
Dispos'd apart, Ulysses shares the treat!
A trivet-table, and ignobler seat,
The prince appoints; but to his sire assigns
The tasteful inwards, and nectareous wines.
"Partake, my guest," he cry'd, "without control
The social feast, and drain the cheering bowl:
Dread not the railer's laugh, nor ruffian's rage;
No vulgar roof protects thy honour'd age;
This dome a refuge to thy wrongs shall be,
From my great sire too soon devolv'd to me!
Your violence and scorn, ye suitors, cease,
Lest arms avenge the violated peace." [young,
Aw'd by the prince, so haughty, brave, and Rage gnaw'd the lip, amazement chain'd the tongue.

"Be patient, peers!" at length Antinous cries;
"The threats of vain imperious youth despise:
Would Jove permit the meditated blow,
That stream of eloquence should cease to flow."

Without reply vouchsaf'd, Antinous ceas'd:
Meanwhile the pomp of festival increas'd:
By heralds rank'd, in marshall'd order move
The city-tribes, to pleas'd Apollo's grove:
Beneath the verdure of which awful shade,
The lunar hecatomb they grateful laid;
Partook the sacred feast, and ritual honours paid.
But the rich banquet in the dome prepar'd,
(An humble side-board set) Ulysses shar'd.
Observant of the prince's high behest,
His menial train attend the stranger-guest:
Whom Pallas with unpardoning fury fir'd,
By lordly pride and keen reproach inspir'd.
A Samian peer, more studious than the rest
Of vice, who teem'd with many a dead-born jest;
And urg'd, for title to a consort queen,
Unnumber'd acres asable and green

(Ctesippus nam'd); this lord Ulysses ey'd,
And thus burst out th' imposthume with pride:

"The sentence I propose, ye peers, attend:
Since due regard must wait the prince's friend,
Let each a token of esteem bestow;
This gift acquits the dear respect I owe;
With which he nobly may discharge his seat,
And pay the menials for the master's treat!"

He said: and of the steer before him plac'd,
That sinewy fragment at Ulysses cast,
Where to the pastern-bone, by nerves combin'd,
The well-horn'd foot indissolubly join'd;
Which whizzing high the wall unseemly sign'd.
The chief indignant grins a ghastly smile;
Revenge and scorn within his bosom boil:
When thus the prince with pious rage inflam'd:
"Had not th' inglorious wound thy malice aim'd
Fall'n guiltless of the mark, my certain spear
Had made thee buy the brutal triumph dear:
Nor should thy sire, a queen his daughter boast;
The suitor, now, had vanish'd in a ghost:
No more, ye lewd compeers, with lawless power
Invade my dome, my herds and flocks devour:
For genuine worth of age mature to know
My grape shall redder, and my harvest grow.
Or, if each other's wrongs ye still support,
With rapes and riot to profane my court;
What single arm with numbers can contend?
On me let all your lifted swords descend,
And with my life such vile dishonours end."

A long cessation of discourse ensued,
By gentler Agelaus thus renew'd:

"A just reproof, ye peers! your rage restrain
From the protected guest, and menial train:
And, prince! to stop the source of future ill,
Assent yourself, and gain the royal will,
Whilst hope prevail'd to see your sire restor'd,
Of right the queen refus'd a second lord.
But who so vain of faith, so blind to fate,
To think he still survives to claim the state?
Now press the sovereign dame with warm desire
To wed, as wealth or worth her choice inspires:
The lord selected to the nuptial joys,
Far hence will lead the long-contested prize;
Whilst in paternal pomp, with plenty bless'd,
You reign, of this imperial dome possess'd."

Sage and serene Telemachus replies:
"By him at whose behest the thunder flies,
And by the name on Earth I most revere,
By great Ulysses and his woes, I swear,
(Who never must review his dear domain;
Inroll'd, perhaps, in Pluto's dreary train!)
Whene'er her choice the royal dame avow,
My bridal gifts shall load the future spouse:
But from this dome my parent queen to chase!
From me, ye gods! avert such dire disgrace."

But Pallas clouds with intellectual gloom
The suitors' souls, insensate of their doom!
A mirthful phrenzy seiz'd the fated crowd;
The roofs resound with causeless laughter loud:
Floating in gore, portentous to survey!
In each discolour'd vase the viands lay:
Then down each cheek the tears spontaneous flow,
And sudden sighs precede approaching woe.
In vision rapt; the Hyperæian seer
Uprose, and thus divin'd the vengeance near:

"Oh race to death devote! with Stygian shade
Each destin'd peer, impending fates invade!

Theoclymenus.

With tears your wan distorted cheeks are drow'd ;
With sanguine drops the walls are rubied round :
Thick swarms the spacious hall with howling ghosts
To people Orcus and the burning coasts !
Nor gives the Sun his golden orb to roll,
But universal night usurps the pole !"

Yet warn'd in vain, with laughter loud elate
The peers reproach the sure divine of fate ;
And thus Eurymachus : " The dotard's mind
To every sense is lost, to reason blind :
Swift from the dome conduct the slave away ;
Let him in open air behold the day."

" Tax not" (the Heaven-illumined seer rejoind'd)
" Of rage, or folly, my prophetic mind.
No clouds of error dim th' ethereal rays,
Her equal power each faithful sense obeys.
Unguided hence my trembling steps I bend,
Far hence, before you hovering deaths descend ;
Lest, the ripe harvest of revenge begun,
I share the doom ye suitors cannot shun."

This said, to sage Pircus sped the secret,
His honour'd host, a welcome inmate there.
O'er the protracted feast the suitors sit,
And aim to wound the prince with pointless wit ;
Came one, with scornful leer and mimic voice,
" Thy charity we praise, but not thy choice ;
Why such profusion of indulgence shown
To this poor, timorous, toil-detesting drone ?
That other feeds on planetary schemes,
And pays his host with hideous noon-day dreams.
But, prince ! for once, at least, believe a friend,
To some Sicilian mart these courtiers send,
Where, if they yield their freight across the main,
Dear sell the slaves ! demand no greater gain."

Thus jovial they : but nought the prince replies ;
Pull on his sire he roll'd his ardent eyes ;
Impatient straight to flesh his virgin sword,
From the wise chief he waits the deathful word.
Nigh in her bright alcove, the pensive queen
To see the circlet sate, of all unseen.
Sated at length they rise, and bid prepare
An eve-repast, with equal cost and care :
But vengeance Pallas, with preventing speed,
A feast proportion'd to their crimes decreed ;
A feast of death ! the feasters doom'd to bleed !

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XXI.

ARGUMENT.

THE BENDING OF ULYSSES' BOW.

Penelope, to put an end to the solicitation of the suitors, proposes to marry the person who shall first bend the bow of Ulysses, and shoot through the ringlets. After their attempts have proved ineffectual, Ulysses, taking Eumæus and Philætius apart, discovers himself to them : then returning, desires leave to try his strength at the bow, which, though refused with indignation by the suitors, Penelope and Telemachus cause it to be delivered to his hands. He bends it immediately, and shoots through all the rings. Jupiter in the same instant thunders from Heaven ; Ulysses accepts the omen, and gives a sign to Telemachus, who stands ready armed at his side.

AND Pallas now, to raise the rival fires,
With her own art Penelope inspires :
Who now can bend Ulysses' bow, and wing
The well-aim'd arrow through the distant ring,
Shall end the strife, and win th' imperial dame ;
But discord and black death await the game !
The prudent queen the lofty stair ascends,
At distance due a virgin-train attends ;
A brazen key she held, the handle turn'd,
With steel and polish'd elephant adorn'd :
Swift to the inmost room she bent her way,
Where safe repos'd the royal treasures lay ;
There shone high-heap'd the labour'd brass and ore,
And there the bow which great Ulysses bore ;
And there the quiver, where now guiltless slept
Those winged deaths that many a matron wept.

This gift, long since when Sparta's shores he trod,
On young Ulysses Iphitus bestow'd :
Beneath Orsilochus's roof they met ;
One loss was private, one a public debt ;
Messena's state from Ithaca detains
Three hundred sheep, and all the shepherd-swains ;
And to the youthful prince to urge the laws,
The king and elders trust their common cause.
But Iphitus, employ'd on other cares,
Search'd the wide country for his wandering mares,
And mules, the strongest of the labouring kind ;
Hapless to search ! more hapless still to find !
For journeying on to Hercules, at length
That lawless wretch, that man of brutal strength,
Deaf to Heaven's voice, the social rite transgress'd ;
And for the beauteous mares destroy'd his guest :
He gave the bow ! and on Ulysses' part
Receiv'd a pointed sword and missile dart :
Of luckless friendship on a foreign shore
Their first, last pledges ; for they met no more !
The bow, bequeath'd by this unhappy hand,
Ulysses bore not from his native land ;
Nor in the front of battle taught to bend,
But kept, in dear memorial of his friend.

Now gently winding up the fair ascent,
By many an easy step, the matron went ;
Then o'er the pavements glides with grace divine,
(With polish'd oak the level pavements shine)
The folding gates a dazzling light display'd,
With pomp of various architectur'eraid.
The bolt, obedient to the silken string,
Forsakes the staple as she pulls the ring ;
The wards respondent to the key turn round ;
The bars fall back, the flying valves resound ;
Loud as a bull makes hill and valley ring,
So roar'd the lock when it releas'd the spring.
She moves majestic through the wealthy room,
Where treasure'd garments cast a rich perfume ;
There from the column where aloft it hung,
Reach'd, in its splendid case, the bow unstrung ;
Across her knees she laid the well-known bow,
And pensive sate, and tears began to flow.
To full satiety of grief she mourns,
Then silent to the joyous hall returns,
To the proud suitors bears in pensive state
Th' unbended bow, and arrows wing'd with fate.
Behind, her train the polish'd coffer brings,
Which held th' alternate brass and silver rings,
Full in the portal the chaste queen appears,
And with her veil conceals the coming tears ;

On either side awaits a virgin fair;
While thus the matron, with majestic air:
" Say you, whom these forbidden walls enclose,
For whom my victims bleed, my vintage flows;
If these neglected, faded charms can move?
Or is it but a vain pretence, you love?
If I the prize, if me you seek to wife,
Hear the conditions, and commence the strife:
Who first Ulysses' wondrous bow shall bend,
And through twelve ringlets the feat arrow send,
Him will I follow, and forsake my home,
For him forsake this lov'd, this wealthy dome,
Long, long the scene of all my past delight,
And still to last, the vision of my night!"

Grateful she said, and bade Eumæus show
The rival peers the ringlets and the bow.
From his full eyes the tears unbidden spring,
Touch'd at the dear memorials of his king.
Philætius too relents, but secret shed
The tender drops. Antinous saw, and said:
" Hence to your fields, you rustics! hence away,
Nor stain with grief the pleasures of the day;
Nor to the royal heart recall in vain
The sad remembrance of a perish'd man.
Enough her precious tears already flow—
Of spare the feast with due respect, or go
To weep abroad, and leave us to the bow:
No vulgar task! Ill suits this courtly crew
That stubborn horn which brave Ulysses drew.
I well remember (for I gaz'd him o'er
While yet a child) what majesty he bore!
And still (all infant as I was) retain
The port, the strength, the grandeur of the man."

He said, but in his soul fond joys arise,
And his proud hopes already win the prize.
To speed the flying shaft through every ring,
Wretch! is not thine! the arrows of the king.
Shall end those hopes, and fate is on the wing!

Then thus Telemachus: " Some god, I find,
With pleasing phrenzy has possess'd my mind;
When a lov'd mother threatens to depart,
Why with this ill-tim'd gladness leaps my heart?
Come then, ye suitors! and dispute a prize
Richer than all th' Achaian state supplies,
Than all proud Argos, or Mycæna knows,
Than all our isles or continents enclose:
A woman matchless, and almost divine,
Fit for the praise of every tongue but mine.
No more excuses then, no more delay;
Haste to the trial—Lo! I lead the way.
I too may try, and if this arm can wing
The feather'd arrow through the destin'd ring,
Then if no happier knight the conquest boast,
I shall not sorrow for a mother lost;
But, blest in her, possess these arms alone,
Heir of my father's strength, as well as throne."

He spoke! then, rising, his broad sword unbound,
And cast his purple garment on the ground.
A trench he open'd; in a line he plac'd
The level axes, and the points made fast
(His perfect skill the wondering gazers ey'd,
The game as yet unseen, as yet untry'd.)
Then, with a manly pace, he took his stand;
And grasp'd the bow, and twang'd it in his hand.
Three times, with beating heart, he made essay;
Three times, unequal to the task, gave way:
A modest boldness on his cheek appear'd:
And thrice he hop'd, and thrice again he fear'd,
The fourth had drawn it. The great sire with joy
Beheld, but with a sign forbade the boy.

His ardour straight th' obedient prince suppress'd,
And, artful, thus the suitor-train address'd:

" Oh, lay the cause on youth yet immature!
(For Heaven forbid such weakness should endure!)
How shall this arm, unequal to the bow,
Retort an insult, or repel a foe?
But you! whom Heaven with better nerves has blest,
Accept the trial, and the prize contest."

He cast the bow before him, and apart
Against the polish'd quiver propt the darts.
Resuming then his seat, Epithicus' son
The bold Antinous to the rest began:
" From where the goblet first begins to flow,
From right to left, in order take the bow;
And prove your several strengths"—The princes heard,

And first Laiodes, blameless priest, appear'd:
The eldest born of Cenoops' noble race,
Who next the goblet held his holy place:
He, only he, of all the suitor throng,
Their deeds detested, and abjur'd the wrong.
With tender hands the stubborn horn he strains,
The stubborn horn resisted all his pains!
Already in despair he gives it o'er:
" Take it who will," he cries, " I strive no more
What numerous deaths attend this fatal bow!
What souls and spirits shall it send below!
Better, indeed, to die, and fairly give
Nature her debt, than disappointed live,
With each new Sun to some new hope a prey,
Yet still tomorrow false: than today.

How long in vain Penelope we sought!
This bow shall ease us of that idle thought,
And send us with some humbler wife to live,
Whom gold shall gain, or destiny shall give."

Thus speaking, on the floor the bow he plac'd;
(With rich inlay the various floor was grac'd)
At distance far the father'd shaft he throws,
And to the seat returns from whence he rose.

To him Antinous thus with fury said:
" What words ill-omen'd from thy lips have fled!
Thy coward function ever is in fear;
Those arms are dreadful which thou canst not
bear.

Why should this bow be fatal to the brave?
Because the priest is born a peaceful slave.
Mark then what other can"—He ended there,
And bade Melanthius a vast pile prepare;
He gives it instant flame: then fast beside
Spreads o'er an ample board a bullock's hide.
With melted lard they soak the weapon o'er,
Chase every knot, and supple every pore.
Vain all their art, and all their strength as vain;
The bow inflexible resists their pain.
The force of great Eurymachus alone
And bold Antinous, yet untry'd, unknown:
Those only now remain'd; but those confus'd
Of all the train the mightiest and the best.

Then from the wall, and from the noisy crew,
The masters of the herd and flock withdrew.
The king observes them: he the hall forsakes
And, past the limits of the court, o'ertakes.
Then thus with accent mild Ulysses spoke:
" Ye faithful guardians of the herd and flock!
Shall I the secret of my breast conceal,
Or (as my soul now dictates) shall I tell?
Say, should some favouring god restore again
The lost Ulysses to his native reign?
How beat your hearts? what aid would you afford
To the great suitors, or your ancient lord?"

Philetus thus : " Oh were thy word not vain !
Would mighty Jove restore that man again !
These aged sinews with new vigour strung
In his blest cause should emulate the young."
With equal vows Eumæus too implor'd
Each power above, with wishes for his lord.

He saw their secret souls, and thus began :
" Those vows the gods accord : behold the man !
Your own Ulysses ! twice ten years detain'd
By woes and wanderings from this hapless land :
At length he comes : but comes despis'd, un-

known,
And finding faithful you, and you alone.
All else have cast him from their very thought,
E'en in their wishes, and their prayers forgot !
Hear then, my friends : If Jove this arm succeed,
And give you impious revellers to bleed,
My care shall be, to bless your future lives
With large possessions, and with faithful wives ;
Fast by my palace shall your domes ascend,
And each on young Telemachus attend,
And each be call'd his brother, and my friend.
To give you firmer faith, now trust your eye ;
Lo ! the broad scar indented on my thigh,
When with Antolycus's sons, of yore,
On Parস্য's top I chas'd the tusky boar."
His ragged vest then drawn aside disclos'd
The sign conspicuous, and the scar expos'd :
Eager they view'd, with joy they stood amaz'd ;
With tearful eyes o'er all their master gaz'd :
Around his neck their longing arms they cast,
His head, his shoulders, and his knees embrac'd :
Tears follow'd tears ; no word was in their power :
In solemn silence fell the kindly shower.
The king too weeps, the king too grasps their hands,
And moveless as a marble fountain stands.

Thus had their joy wept down the setting Sun,
But first the wise man ceas'd, and thus began :
" Enough—on other cares your thought employ,
For danger waits on all untimely joy.
Full many foes, and fierce, observe us near :
Some may betray, and yonder walls may hear.
Re-enter then, not all at once, but stay
Some moments you, and let me lead the way.
To me, neglected as I am, I know
The haughty suitors will deny the bow :
But thou, Eumæus, as 'tis borne away,
Thy master's weapon to his hand convey.
At every portal let some matron wait,
And each lock fast the well-compacted gate :
Close let them keep, whate'er invades their ear ;
Though arms, or shouts, or dying groans, they hear
To thy strict charge, Philetus, we consign
The court's main gate : to guard that pass be thine."

This said, he first return'd : the faithful swains
At distance follow, as their king ordains
Before the flame Eurymachus now stands,
And turns the bow, and chafes it with his hands :
Still the tough bow unmov'd. The lofty man
Sigh'd from his mighty soul, and thus began :
" I mourn the common cause ; for, oh, my friends !

On me, on all, what grief, what shame attends !
Not the lost nuptials can affect me more,
(For Greece has beauteous dames on every shore)
But baffled thus ; confess'd so far below
Ulysses' strength, as not to bend his bow !
How shall all ages our attempt deride !
Our weakness scorn !" Antinous thus reply'd :

" Not so, Eurymachus ; that no mind draws
The wondrous bow, attend another cause.
Sacred to Phœbus in the solemn day,
Which thoughtless we in games would waste away ;
Till the next dawn this ill-tim'd strife forego,
And here leave fix'd the ringlets in a row.
Now bid the sewer approach, and let us join
In due libations, and in rites divine,
So end our night : before the day shall spring,
The choicest offerings let Melanthius bring :
Let then to Phœbus' name the fatted thighs
Feed the rich smokes, high curling to the skies.
So shall the patron of these arts bestow
(For his the gift) the skill to bend the bow."

They heard well-pleas'd : the ready heralds bring
The cleansing waters from the limpid spring :
The goblet high with rosy wine they crown'd,
In order circling to the peers around.
That rite complete, uprose the thoughtful man,
And thus his meditated scheme began :

" If what I ask your noble minds approve,
Ye peers and rivals in the royal love !
Chief if it hurt not great Antinous' ear,
(Whose sage decision I with wonder hear)
And if Eurymachus the motion please ;
Give Heaven this day, and rest the bow in peace :
Tomorrow let your arms dispute the prize,
And take it he, the favour'd of the skies !
But, since till then this truce you delay,
Trust it one moment to my hands today :
Fain would I prove, before your judging eyes,
What once I was, whom wretched you despise ;
If yet this arm its ancient force retain ;
Or if my woes (a long-continued train)
And wants and insults, make me less than man ?"

Rage flash'd in lightning from the suitors' eyes,
Yet mix'd with terror at the bold exprime.
Antinous then : " Oh, miserable guest !
Is common sense quite banish'd from thy breast ?
Suffic'd it not within the palace plac'd
To sit distinguish'd, with our presence grac'd,
Admitted here with princes to confer,
A man unknown, a needy wanderer ?
To copious wine this insolence we owe,
And much thy betters wise can overthrow :
The great Eurytion when this phœrean stung,
Pirithous' roof with frantic riot rung ;
Boundless the Centaur rag'd ; till one and all
The heroes rose, and dragg'd him from the hall ;
His nose they shorten'd, and his ears they slit,
And sent him sober'd home with better wit.
Hence with long war the double race was ours'd,
Fatal to all, but to th' aggressor first.
Such fate I prophesy our guest attends,
If here this interdicted bow he bends :
Nor shall these walls such insolence contain ;
The first fair wind transports him o'er the main ;
Where Echetus to death the guilty brings,
(The worst of mortals, ev'n the worst of kings.)
Better than that, if thou approve our choice ;
Cease the mad strife, and share our bounty here."

To this the queen her just dislike express'd :
" 'Tis impious, prince, to harm the stranger
guest,
Base to insult who bears a suppliant's name ;
And some respect Telemachus may claim.
What, if th' immortals on the man bestow
Sufficient strength to draw the mighty bow,
Shall I, a queen, by rival chiefs ador'd,
Accept a wandering stranger for my lord ?

A hope so idle never touch'd his brain:
Then ease your bosoms of a fear so vain.
Far be he banish'd from this stately scene
Who wrongs his princess with a thought so mean."

"Oh fair! and wisest of so fair a kind!"

(Respectful thus Eurymachus rejoind'd)
"Mov'd by no weak surmise, but sense of shame,
We dread the all-arraigning voice of fame;
We dread the censure of the meanest slave,
The weakest woman: all can wrong the brave.
'Behold what wretches to the bed pretend
Of that brave chief, whose bow they could not
In came a beggar of the strolling crew, [bead.
And did what all those princes could not do.
Thus will the common voice our deed defame,
And thus posterity upbraid our name."

To whom the queen: "If fame engage your views,
Forbear those acts which infamy pursues;
Wrong and oppression no renown can raise;
Know, friend! that virtue is the path to praise.
The stature of our guest, his port, his face,
To him the bow, as he desires, convey;
And to his hand if Phoebus give the day,
Hence to reward his merit he shall bear
A two-edg'd falchion and a shining spear,
Embroider'd sandals, a rich cloak and vest,
And safe conveyance to his port of rest."

"O royal mother! ever-honour'd name!
Permit me," (cries Telemachus) "to claim
A son's just right. No Grecian prince but I
Has power this bow to grant, or to deny.
Of all that Ithaca's rough hills contain,
And all wide Elis' courser-breeding plain;
To me alone my father's arms descend,
And mine alone they are, to give or lend.
Retire, O queen, thy household task resume,
Tend with thy maids the labours of the loom;
The bow, the darts, and arms of chivalry,
These cares to man belong, and must to me."

Mature beyond his years, the queen admir'd
His sage reply, and with her train retir'd:
There, in her chamber as she sat apart,
Revolv'd his words, and plac'd them in her heart.
On her Ulysses then she fix'd her soul,
Down her fair cheek the tears abundant roll,
Till gentle Pallas, piteous of her cries,
In slumber clos'd her silver-streaming eyes.
Now through the press the bow Eumæus bore,
And all was riot, noise, and wild uproar.
"Hold! lawless rustic! whither wilt thou go?
To whom, insensate, dost thou bear the bow?
Ewil'd for this to some sequester'd den,
Far from the sweet society of men,
To thy own dogs a prey thou shalt be made;
If Heaven and Phoebus lend the suitors aid,"

Thus they. Aghast he laid the weapon down,
But bold Telemachus thus urg'd him on: [words;
"Proceed, false slave, and slight their empty
What! hopes the fool to please so many lords?
Young as I am, thy prince's vengeful hand,
Stretch'd forth in wrath, shall drive thee from the
Oh! could the vigour of this arm as well [land.
Th' oppressive suitors from my walls expell!
Then what a shoal of lawless men should go
To fill with tumult the dark courts below!"

The suitors with a scornful smile survey
The youth, indulging in the genial day.
Eumæus, thus encourag'd, hastes to bring
The strictfal bow, and gives it to the king:

Old Euryclea calling them aside,
"Hear what Telemachus enjoins," (he cry'd)
At every portal let some matron wait,
And each lock fast the well compacted gate;
And if unusual sounds invade their ear,
If arms, or shouts, or dying groans, they hear,
Let none to call or issue forth presume,
But close attend the labours of the loom."

Her prompt obedience on his order waits;
Clos'd in an instant were the palace gates.
In the same moment forth Philæus flies,
Secures the court, and with a cable ties
The utmost gate (the cable strongly wrought
Of Byblos' reed, a ship from Egypt brought);
Then unperceiv'd and silent at the board
His seat he takes, his eyes upon his lord.

And now his well-known bow the master bore,
Turn'd on all sides, and view'd it o'er and o'er:
Lest time or worms had done the weapon wrong,
Its owner absent and untry'd so long.
While some deriding—"How he turns the bow!
Some other like it sure the man must know,
Or else would copy; or in bows he deals;
Perhaps he makes them, or perhaps he steals—"
"Heaven to this wretch" (another cry'd), "be kind!
And bless, in all to which he stands inclin'd,
With such good fortune as he now shall find."

Hoodless he heard them; but disdain'd reply;
The bow perusing with exactest eye.
Then, as some heavenly minstrel, taught to sing
High notes responsive to the trembling string,
To some new strain when he adapts the lyre,
Or the dumb lute refits with vocal wire,
Relaxes, strains, and draws them to and fro;
So the great master drew the mighty bow:
And drew with ease. One hand aloft display'd
The bending horns, and one the string essay'd.
From his essaying hand the string let fly
Twang'd short and sharp, like the shrill swallow's cry.

A general hurour ran through all the race,
Sunk was each heart, and pale was every face.
Signs from above ensued: th' unfolding sky
In lightning burst: Jove thunder'd from on high.
Fir'd at the call of Heaven's almighty lord,
He snatch'd the shaft that glitter'd on the board:
(Fast by, the rest lay sleeping in the sheath,
But soon to fly the messengers of death).

Now sitting as he was, the cord he drew,
Through every ringlet levelling his view;
Then notch'd the shaft, releas'd, and gave it wing;
The whizzing arrow vanish'd from the string,
Sung on direct, and threaded every ring.
The solid gate its fury scarcely bounds;
Pierc'd through and through, the solid gate re-
sounds.

Then to the prince: "Nor have I wrought thee
Nor err'd this hand unfaithful to its aim; [shame;
Nor prov'd the toil too hard; nor have I lost
That ancient vigour, once my pride and boast,
Ill I deserv'd these haughty peers' disdain;
Now let them comfort their dejected train,
In sweet repeat the present hour employ,
Nor wait till evening for the genial joy:
Then to the lute's soft voice prolong the night;
Music, the banquet's most refin'd delight."

He said, then gave a nod; and at the word
Telemachus girds on his shining sword.
Fast by his father's side he takes his stand:
The beamy javelin lightens in his hand.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XXII.

ARGUMENT.

THE DEATH OF THE SUITORS.

Ulysses begins the slaughter of the suitors by the death of Antinous. He declares himself, and lets fly his arrows at the rest. Telemachus assists, and brings arms for his father, himself, Eumæus, and Philæus. Melanthius does the same for the wooers. Minerva encourages Ulysses in the shape of Mentor. The suitors are all slain, only Medon and Phemius are spared. Melanthius and the unfaithful servants are executed. The rest acknowledge their master with all demonstrations of joy.

Tax'd fierce the hero o'er the threshold strode ;
Stripp'd of his rags, he blaz'd out like a god.
Full in their face the lifted bow he bore,
And quiver'd deaths, a formidable store :
Before his feet the rattling shower he threw,
And thus, terrific, to the suitor crew :

" Ouc venturous game this hand has won today
Another, princes ! yet remains to play ;
Another mark our arrow must attain,
Phœbus, assist ! nor be the labour vain."
Swift as the word the parting arrow sings,
And bears thy fate, Antinous, on its wings :
Wretch that he was, of unpropheatic soul !
High in his hands he rear'd the golden bowl !
Ev'n then to drain it lengthen'd out his breath ;
Chang'd to the deep, the bitter draught of death :
For fate who fear'd amidst a feastful band !
And fate to numbers, by a single hand ?
Fell through his throat Ulysses' weapon pass'd,
And pierc'd the neck. He falls, and breathes his last.

The tumbling goblet the white floor o'erflows,
A stream of gore burst spouting from his nose ;
Grim in convulsive agonies he sprawls :
Beside him spurr'd the loaded table falls,
And spreads the pavements with a mingled flood
Of floating meats, and wine, and human blood.
Amaz'd, confounded, as they saw him fall,
Uprose the throngs tumultuous round the hall ;
O'er all the dome they cast a haggard eye,
Each look'd for arms : in vain ; no arms were nigh :
" Aim'st thou at princes ?" (all amaz'd they said)
" Thy last of games unhappy hast thou play'd ;
Thy erring shaft has made our bravest bleed,
And death, unlucky guest, attends thy dead.
Vultures shall tear thee."—Thus incept'd they spoke,

While each to chance ascrib'd the wondrous stroke,
Blind as they were ; for death ev'n a now invades
His destin'd prey, and wraps them all in shades.
Then, grimly frowning with a dreadful look,
That wither'd all their hearts, Ulysses spoke :
" Dogs, ye have had your day ! ye fear'd no
Ulysses vengeful from the Trojan shore ; [more
While, to your lust and spoil a guardless prey,
Our house, our wealth, our helpless handmaids lay :

Not so content, with bolder frenzy fir'd,
Ev'n to our bed presumptuous you aspir'd :
Laws or divine or human fail'd to move,
Or shame of men, or dread of gods above :
Her-less alike of infamy or praise,
Or fame's eternal voice in future days :
The hour of vengeance, wretches, now is come,
Impending fate is yours, and instant doom."

Thus dreadful he. Confus'd the suitors stood,
From their pale cheeks recodes the flying blood :
Trembling they sought their guilty heads to hide,
Alone the bold Eurymachus reply'd :

" If, as thy words impart," (he thus began)
Ulysses lives, and thou the mighty man,
Great are thy wrongs, and much hast thou sus-
tain'd

In thy spoil'd palace, and exhausted land ;
The cause and author of those guilty deeds,
Lo ! at thy feet unjust Antinous bleeds.
Not love, but wild ambition was his guide ;
To slay thy son, thy kingdoms to divide,
These were his aims ; but juster Jove deny'd.
Since cold in death th' offender lies : oh, spare
Thy suppliant people, and receive their prayer !
Brass, gold and treasures, shall the spoil defray,
Two hundred oxen every prince shall pay :
The waste of years refunded in a day.

Till then thy wrath is just"—Ulysses burn'd
With high disdain, and sternly thus return'd :

" All, all the treasures that enrich'd our throne
Before your rapines, join'd with all your own,
If offer'd, vainly should for mercy call ;
'Tis you that offer, and I scorn them all ;
Your blood is my demand, your lives the prize,
Till pale as yonder wretch each suitor lies.
Hence with those coward terms ; or fight or fly ;
This choice is left you, to resist or die ;
And die I trust ye shall."—He sternly spoke :
With guilty fears the pale assembly shook.

Alone Eurymachus exhorts the train :
" Yon archer, comrades, will not shoot in vain ;
But from the threshold shall his darts be sped,
(Whoe'er he be) till every prince lie dead ?
Be mindful of yourselves, draw forth your swords,
And to his shafts obtend these ample boards
(So need compels). Then all united strive
The bold invader from his post to drive ;
The city rous'd shall to our rescue haste,
And this mad archer soon have shot his last."

Swift as he spoke, he drew his traitor sword,
And like a lion rush'd against his lord :
The wary chief the rushing foe repress'd,
Who met the point, and forc'd it in his breast ;
His falling hand deserts the lifted sword,
And prone he falls extended o'er the board !
Before him wide, in mix'd effusion, roll
Th' untasted viands, and the jovial bowl.
Full through his liver pass'd the mortal wound,
With dying rage his forehead beats the ground,
He spurr'd the seat with fury as he fell,
And the fierce soul to darkness dir'd, and Hell.
Next bold Amphimachus his arm extends
To force the pass ; the godlike man defends.
Thy spear, Telemachus ! prevents th' attack,
The brazen weapon driving through his back,
Thence through his breast its bloody passage tore ;
Flat falls he thundering on the marble floor,
And his crush'd forehead marks the stone with gore
He left his javelin in the dead, for fear
The long incumbrance of the weighty spear

To the fierce spe advantage might afford,
To rush between and use the shorten'd sword.
With speedy ardour to his sire he flies,
And, "Arm, great father! arm," (in haste he cries.)
"Lo! hence I run for other arms to wield,
For missile javelins, and for helm and shield;
Fast by our side let either faithful swain
In arms attend us, and their part sustain."
"Haste and return," (Ulysses made reply).
"While yet th' auxiliari shafts this hand supply;
Lest thus alone, encounter'd by an host,
Driv'n from the gate, th' important pass be lost."

With speed Telemachus obeys, and flies
Where pil'd on heaps the royal armour lies;
Four brazen helmets, eight resplendent spears,
And four broad bucklers, to his sire he bears:
At once in brazen panoply they gonne,
At once each servant brac'd his armour on;
Around their king a faithful guard they stand,
While yet each shaft flew deathful from his hand:
Chief after chief expir'd at every wound,
And swell'd the bleeding mountain on the ground.
Soon as his store of flying fates was spent,
Against the wall he set the bow un bent:
And now his shoulders bear the massy shield,
And now his hands two beamy javelins wield:
He frowns beneath his nodding plume, that play'd
O'er the high crest, and cast a dreadful shade.

There stood a window near, whence looking down
From o'er the porch appear'd the subject town.
A double strength of valves secur'd the place,
A high and narrow, but the only pass:
The cautious king, with all-preventing care,
To guard that outlet, plac'd Eumæus there:
When Agelaus thus: "Has done the sense
To mount yon window, and alarm from thence
The neighbour town? The town shall force the door,

And this bold archer soon shall shoot no more."
Melanthius then: "That outlet to the gate
So near adjoins, that one may guard the strait.
But other methods of defence remain,
Myself with arms can furnish all the train;
Stores from the royal magazine I bring,
And their own darts shall pierce the prince and king."

He said; and, mounting up the lofty stairs,
Twelve shields, twelve lances, and twelve helmets
All arm, and sudden round the hall appears [beats:
A blaze of bucklers, and a wood of spears.

The hero stands oppress'd with mighty woe,
On every side he sees the labour grow:
"Oh curst event! and, oh! unlook'd for aid!
Melanthius, or the women have betray'd—
Oh, my dear son!"—the father with a sigh!
Then ceas'd; the filial virtue made reply:
"Falsehood is folly, and 'tis just to own
The fault committed; this was mine alone;
My haste neglected yonder door to bar,
And hence the villain has supply'd their war.
Run, good Eumæus, then, and (what before
I thoughtless err'd in) well secure that door:
Learn, if by female fraud this deed was done,
Or (as my thought misgives) by Dolius' son."

While yet they spoke, in quest of arms again
To the high chamber stole the faithless swain,
Not unobserv'd. Eumæus watchful ey'd,
And thus address'd Ulysses near his side:
"The miscreant we suspected takes that way;
Him, if this arm be powerful, shall I slay?

Or drive him hither, to receive the meed
From thy own hand, of this detested deed?"
"Not so" (reply'd Ulysses) "leave him there,
For us sufficient is another care:
Within the structure of this palace wall
To keep enclos'd his masters till they fall.
Go you, and seize the felon: backward bind
His arms and legs, and fix a plank behind;
On this his body by strong cords extend
And on a column near the roof suspend:
So study'd tortures his vile days shall end."

The ready swains obey'd with joyful haste,
Behind the felon unperceiv'd they pass'd,
As round the room in quest of arms he goes
(The half-shut door conceal'd his lurking foes):
One hand sustain'd a helm, and ope the shield
Which old Laertes wont in youth to wield,
Cover'd with dust, with dryness chapt and worn,
The brass corroded, and the leather torn:
Thus laden, o'er the threshold as he stepp'd,
Fierce on the villain from each side they leap'd,
Back by the hair the trembling dastard drew,
And down reluctant on the pavement threw.
Active and pleas'd the zealous swains fulfil
At every point their master's rigid will:
First, fast behind, his hands and feet they bound,
Then straighten'd cords involv'd his body round:
So drawn aloft, athwart the column ty'd,
The howling felon swung from side to side.

Eumæus scoffing then with keen disdain:
"These pass thy pleasing night, O gentle swain!
On that soft pillow, from that envy'd height
First may'st thou see the springing dawn of light;
So timely, rise, when morning streaks the east,
To drive thy victims to the suitors' feast."

This said, they left him, tortur'd as he lay,
Secur'd the door, and hasty strode away:
Each, breathing death, resum'd his dangerous post
Near great Ulysses; four against an host.
When, lo! descending to our hero's aid:
Jove's daughter Pallas, war's triumphant maid:
In Mentor's friendly form she join'd his side;
Ulysses saw, and thus with transport cry'd:

"Come, ever welcome, and thy succour lend:
Oh, every sacred name in one! my friend!
Early we lov'd, and long our loves have grown:
Whate'er through life's whole series I have done
Or good, or grateful, now to mind recall,
And, aiding this one hour, repay it all."

Thus he; but pleasing hopes his bosom warm
Of Pallas latent in the friendly form.
The adverse host the phantom warrior ey'd,
And first, loud threatening, Agelaus cry'd:
"Mentor, beware! nor let that tongue persuade
Thy frantic arm to lend Ulysses aid;
Our force successful shall our threat make good,
And with the sire and son's commit thy blood.
What hop'st thou here? Thee first the sword shall Then lop thy whole posterity away; [slay,
Far hence thy banish'd consort shall we send;
With his, thy forfeit lands and treasures blend;
Thus, and thus only, shalt thou join thy friend."

His barbarous insult ev'n the goddess fires,
Who thus the warrior to revenge inspires;
"Art thou Ulysses? where then shall we find
The patient body and the constant mind?
That courage, once the Trojans' daily dread,
Known nine long years, and felt by heroes dead?
And where that conduct, which reveng'd the lust
Of Eriam's race, and laid proud Troy in dust?

If this, when Helen was the cause, were done ;
What for thy country now, thy queen, thy son ?
Rise then in combat, at my side attend ;
Observe what vigour gratitude can lend,
And foes how weak, oppos'd against a friend !"

She spoke ; but, willing longer to survey
The sire and son's great acts, withheld the day ;
By farther toils decreed the brave to try,
And level pos'd the wings of victory :
Then with a change of form eludes their sight,
Part'd like a swallow on a rafter's height,
And unperceiv'd enjoys the rising fight.

Damasto's son, bold Agelaüs, leads
The guilty war ; Eurynomus succeeds ;
With these, Pisander, great Polycctor's son,
Sage Polybus, and stern Amphimedon,
With Demoptolemus : these six survive ;
The best of all, the shafts had left alive.
Amidst the carnage desperate as they stand,
Thus Agelaüs rous'd the lagging band.

"The hour is come, when yon fierce man no more
With bleeding princes shall bestrow the floor.
Lo ! Mentor leaves him with an empty boat ;
The four remain, but four against a host.
Let each at once discharge the deadly dart,
One more of six shall reach Ulysses' heart :
The rest must perish, their great leader slain ;
Thus shall one stroke the glory lost regain."

They all at once their mingled lances threw,
And thick all of one man's blood they flew ;
In vain ! Minerva turn'd them with her breath,
And scatter'd short, or wide, the points of death ;
With deaden'd sound, one on the threshold falls,
One strikes the gate, one rings against the walls :
The storm pass'd innocent. The godlike man
Now loftier trod, and dreadful thus began : [threw
"Tis now, (have friends) our turn, at once to (So speed them Heaven) our javelins at the foe.
That impious race to all their past misdeeds
Would add our blood. Injustice still proceeds."

He spoke : at once their fiery lances flew :
Great Demoptolemus Ulysses slew ;
Eurydamas receiv'd the prince's dart ;
The goatberd's quiver'd in Pisander's heart ;
Pierce Elatus by thine, Eumæus, falls ;
Their fall in thunder echoes round the walls.
The rest retreat ; the victors now advance,
Each from the dead resumes his bloody lance.
Again the foe discharge the steely shower ;
Again made frustrate by the virgin power.
Some, turn'd by Pallas, on the threshold fall ;
Some wound the gate, some ring against the wall ;
Some weak, or ponderous with the brazen head,
Drop harmless on the pavement sounding dead.

Then bold Amphimedon his javelin cast ;
Thy hand, Telemachus, it lightly raz'd :
And from Ctesippus' arm the spear clanc'd
On good Eumæus' shield and shoulder glanc'd :
Not lessen'd of their force (so slight the wound)
Each ang along, and dropp'd upon the ground.
Fate doom'd the next, Eurdamus, to bear
Thy death, ennobled by Ulysses' spear.
By the bold son Amphimedon was slain :
And Polybus recover'd, the faithful swain.
Pierc'd through the breast the rude Ctesippus bled,
And thus Philæus gloried o'er the dead. [doin ;

"There end thy pompous vaunts and high disdain ;
Oh ! steep in scornful, voluble, and vain !
How weak is mortal pride ! To Heaven alone
Th' event of actions and our fate are known :

Scoffer, behold what gratitude we bear :
The victim's heel is answer'd with this spear."

Ulysses brandish'd high his vengeful steel,
And Damastorides that instant fell ;
Fast by, Leocritus expiring lay,
The prince's javelin tore its bloody way
Through all his bowels : down he tumbles prone,
His batter'd front and brains besmear the stone.
Now Pallas shines confess'd ! aloft she spreads
The arm of vengeance o'er their guilty heads ;
The dreadful ægis blazes in their eye ;
Amaz'd they see, they tremble, and they fly :
Confus'd, distracted, through the rooms they fling,
Like oxen madden'd by the breeze's sting,
When sultry days, and long, succeed the gentle spring.

Not half so keen fierce vultures of the chase
Stoop from the mountains on the feather'd race,
When, the wide field extended snares beset,
With conscious dread they shun the quivering net :
No help, no flight : but, wounded every way,
Headlong they drop : the fowlers seize the prey.
On all sides thus they double wound on wound,
In prostrate heaps the wretches beat the ground,
Unmanly shrieks precede each dying groan,
And a red deluge floats the reeking stone.

Leiodes first before the victor falls ;
The wretched augur thus for mercy calls ;
"Oh gracious bear ! nor let thy suppliant bleed :
Still undishonour'd, or by word or deed,
Thy house, for me, remains ; by me oppress'd
Full gift was check'd th' injustice of the rest :
Averse they heard me when I counsell'd well,
Their hearts were harden'd, and they justly fell.
Oh ! spare an augur's consecrated head,
Nor add the blameless to the guilty dead !"

"Priest as thou art ! for that detested band
Thy lying prophecies deceiv'd the hand :
Against Ulysses have thy vows been made,
For them, thy daily orisons were paid :
Yet more, ev'n to our bed thy pride aspir'd :
One common crime one common fate requires."
Thus speaking, from the ground the sword he took
Which Agelaüs' dying hand forsook ;
Full through his neck the weighty falchion sped ;
Along the pavement roll'd the muttering head.

Phemius alone the hand of vengeance spar'd,
Phemius the sweet, the Heaven-instructed bard,
Beside the gate the reverend minstrel stands ;
The lyre, now silent, trembling in his hands ;
Dubious to supplicate the chief, or fly
To Jove's inviolable altar nigh,
Where oft Laërtes holy vows had paid,
And oft Ulysses smoking victims laid.
His honour'd harp with care he first set down,
Between the layer and the silver throne ;
Then prostrate stretch'd before the dreadful man,
Persuasive, thus with accent soft began :

"O king ! to mercy be thy soul inclin'd,
And spare the poet's ever gentle kind ;
A deed like this thy future fame would wrong ;
For dear to gods and men is sacred song.
Self-taught I sing ; by Heaven, and Heaven alone,
The genuine seeds of poetry are sown ;
And (what the gods bestow) the lofty lay,
The gods alone, and godlike worth, we pay.
Save then the poet, and thyself reward ;
'Tis thing to merit, mine is to record.
That here I sung, was force, and not desire ;
This hand reluctant touch'd the warbling wire ;

And let thy son attest, nor sordid pay,
Nor servile flattery, stain'd the moral lay."

The moving words Telemachus attends,
His sire approaches, and the bard defends.
"Oh! mix not, father, with these impious dead
The man divine; and forbeare that sacred head!
Medon, the herald, too our arms may spare,
Medon, who made my infancy his care;
If yet he breathes, permit thy son to give
Thus much to gratitude, and bid him live."

Beneath a table, trembling with dismay,
Couch'd close to earth, unhappy Medon lay,
Wrapp'd in a new-alain ox's ample hide:
Swift at the word he cast his screen aside,
Sprung to the prince, embrac'd his knee with tears,
And thus with grateful voice address'd his ears:

"O prince! O friend! lo! here thy Medon
Ah! stop the hero's unresisted hands; [stands;
Incens'd too justly by that impious brood
Whose guilty gloria now are set in blood."

To whom Ulysses with a pleasing eye:
"Be bold, on friendship and my son rely;
Live an example for the world to read,
How much more safe the good than evil deed:
Thou, with the Heaven-taught bard, in peace resort
From blood and carnage to thy open court:
Me other work requires"—With timorous awe
From the dire scene th' exempted two withdraw,
Scarce sure of life, look round, and trembling move

To the bright altars of protector Jove."

Meanwhile Ulysses search'd the dome, to find
If yet there live of all th' offending kind.
Not one! complete the bloody tale he found,
All steep'd in blood, all gasping on the ground.
So when, by hollow shores, the fisher train
Sweep with their arching nets the hoary main,
And scarce the meshy toils the copious draught
All naked of their element and bare, [contain,
The fishes pant and gasp in thinner air!
Wide o'er the sands are spread the stiffening prey,
Till the warm Sun exhales their soul away.

And now the king commands his son to call
Old Euryclea to the deathful hall:
The son observant not a moment stays:
The aged governess with speed obeys:
The sounding portals instant they display;
The matron moves, the prince directs the way.
On heaps of death the stern Ulysses stood,
All black with dust, and cover'd thick with blood.
So the grim lion from the slaughter comes,
Dreadful he glares, and terribly he foams,
His breast with marks of carnage painted o'er,
His jaws all dropping with the bull's black gore.

Soon as her eyes the welcome object met,
The guilty fall'n, the mighty deed complete;
A scream of joy her feeble voice assay'd:
The hero check'd her, and compos'dly said—
"Woman, experienc'd as thou art, control
Indecent joy, and feast thy secret soul.
T' insult the dead, is cruel and unjust;
Fate and their crime have sunk them to the dust.
Nor heeded these the censure of mankind;
The good and bad were equal in their mind.
Justly the price of worthlessness they paid,
And each now wails an unlamented shade.
But thou, sincere, O Euryclea! say
What maids dishonour us, and what obey?"

Then she: "In these thy kingly walls remain
(My son) full fifty of the handmaid train,

Taught by my care to cull the fleece, or weave,
And servitude with pleasing tasks deceive;
Of these, twice six pursue their wicked way,
Nor me, nor chaste Penelope obey;
Nor fits it that Telemachus command
(Young as he is) his mother's female band.
Hence to the upper chambers let me fly,
Where slumbers soft now close the royal eye;
There wake her with the news"—the matron cry'd.
"Not so," (Ulysses more sedate reply'd) [deeds:
"Bring first the crew who wrought these guilty
In haste the matron parts; the king proceeds:
"Now to dispose the dead, the care remains
To you, my son, and you, my faithful swains;
Th' offending females to that task we doom,
To wash, to scent, and purify the room.
These (every table cleans'd, and every throne,
And all the melancholy labour done)
Drive to yon court, without the palace wall,
There the revenging sword shall smite them all;
So with the suitors let them mix in dust,
Stretch'd in a long oblivion of their lust."

He said: the lamentable train appear,
Each vents a groan, and drops a tender tear;
Each heav'd her mournful burthen, and beneath
The porch, depos'd the ghastly heaps of death.
The chief severe, compelling each to move,
Urg'd the dire task imperious from above,
With thirsty sponge they rub the tables o'er,
(The swains unite their toil) the walls, the floor,
Wash'd with th' effusive wave, are purg'd of gore,
Once more the palace set in fair array,
To the base court the females take their way;
There compass'd close between the dome and wall,
(Their life's last scene) they trembling wait their fall.

Then thus the prince: "To these shall we afford
A fate so pure as by the martial sword?
To these, the nightly prostitutes to shame,
And base revilers of our house and name?"

Thus speaking, on the circling wall he strung
A ship's tough cable, from a column hung;
Near the high top he strain'd it strongly round,
Whence no contending foot could reach the ground,
Their heads above connected in a row,
They beat the air with quivering feet below:
Thus, on some tree hung struggling in the snare,
The doves or thrushes flap their wings in air.
Soon fled the soul impure, and left behind
The empty corse to waver with the wind.

Then forth they led Melanthius, and began
Their bloody work: they lopp'd away the man,
Morsel for dogs! then trimm'd with brazen sheets
The wretch, and shorten'd of his nose and ears;
His hands and feet last felt the cruel steel:
He roar'd, and torments gave his soul to Hell—
They wash, and to Ulysses take their way;
So ends the bloody business of the day.

To Euryclea then address'd the king:
"Bring hither fire, and hither sulphur bring,
To purge the palace: then, the queen attend,
And let her with her matron train descend;
The matron-train, with all the virgin band,
Assemble here to learn their lord's command."

Then Euryclea: "Joyful I obey,
But cast those mean dishonest rags away;
Permit me first the royal robes to bring:
Ill suits this garb the shoulders of a king." [cries
"Bring sulphur straight, and fire," (the monarch
She hears, and at the word obedient flies

With fire and sulphur, cure of noxious fumes,
He purg'd the walls, and blood-polluted rooms.
Again the matron springs with eager pace,
And spreads her lord's return from place to place.
They hear, rush forth, and instant round him stand
A gazing throng, a torch in every hand.
They saw, they knew him, and with fond embrace
Each humbly kiss'd his knee, or hand, or face;
He knows them all; in all such truth appears,
Ev'n he indulges the sweet joy of tears.

 THE ODYSSEY.

 BOOK XXIII.

ARGUMENT.

NEREIDA awakens Penelope with the news of Ulysses's return, and the death of the suitors. Penelope scarcely credits her; but supposes some god has punished them, and descends from her apartment in doubt. At the first interview of Ulysses and Penelope, she is quite unsatisfied. Minerva restores him to the beauty of his youth; but the queen continues incredulous, till by some circumstances she is convinced, and falls into all the transports of passion and tenderness. They recount to each other all that has past during their long separation. The next morning Ulysses, arming himself and his friends, goes from the city to visit his father.

TURN to the queen, as in repose she lay,
The nurse with eager rapture speeds her way;
The transports of her faithful heart supply
A sudden youth, and give her wings to fly. [cries:
"And sleeps my child?" the reverend matron
"Ulysses lives! arise, my child, arise!
At length appears the long-expected hour!
Ulysses comes! the suitors are no more!
No more they view the golden light of day!
Arise, and bless thee with the glad survey!"

Touch'd at her words, the mournful queen re-join'd,
"Ah! whither wanders thy distemper'd mind?
The righteous powers, who tread the starry skies,
The weak enlighten, and confound the wise,
And human thought with unresisted sway,
Depress or raise, enlarge or take away:
Truth, by their high decree, thy voice forsakes,
And folly, with the tongue of wisdom, speaks:
Unkind, the fond illusion to impose!
Was it to flatter or deride my woes?
Never did I a sleep so sweet enjoy,
Since my dear lord left Ithaca for Troy,
Why must I wake to grieve; and curse thy shore,
O Troy!—may never tongue pronounce thee more!
Be gone: another might have felt our rage,
But age is sacred, and we spare thy age."

To whom with warmth: "My soul a lie disdains;
Ulysses lives, thy own Ulysses reigns:
That stranger, patient of the suitors' wrongs,
And the rude licence of ungovern'd tongues,
He, he is thine. Thy son his latent guest
Long knew; but lock'd the secret in his breast;

With well-concerted art to end his woes,
And burst at once in vengeance on the foes."

While yet she spoke, the queen in transport sprung

Swift from the couch, and round the matron hung:
Fast from her eye descends the rolling tear,
"Say, could more say, is my Ulysses here?"

How could that numerous and outrageous band
By one be slain, though by an hero's hand?"

"I saw it not," she cries, "but heard alone,
When death was busy, a loud dying groan;
The damsel-train turn'd pale at every wound,
Immur'd we sat, and catch'd each passing sound;
When death had seiz'd her prey, thy son attends,
And at his nod the damsel-train descends;
There terrible in arms Ulysses stood,
And the dead suitors almost swam in blood;
Thy heart had leap'd the hero to survey,
Stern as the surly lion o'er his prey,
Glorious in gore now with sulphureous fires

The dome he purges, now the flame aspires:
Heap'd lie the dead without the palace walls,—
Haste, daughter, haste, thy own Ulysses calls!

Thy every wish the beauteous gods bestow,
Enjoy the present good and former woe;
Ulysses lives, his vanquish'd foes to see;
He lives to thy Telemachus and thee!"

"Ah! no;" with sighs Penelope rejoind;
"Excess of joy disturbs thy wandering mind;
How bless'd this happy hour, should he appear,
Dear to us all, to me supremely dear!
Ah! no; some god the suitor's deaths decreed,
Some god descends, and by his hand they bleed;
Blind! to contemn the stranger's righteous cause,
And violate all hospitable laws!

The good they hated and the powers defy'd;
But Heaven is just, and by a god they dy'd.
For never must Ulysses view this shore;
Never! the lov'd Ulysses is no more!"
"What words" (the matron cries) "have reach'd my ears?"

Doubt we his presence, when he now appears?
Then hear conviction: Ere the fatal day
That forc'd Ulysses o'er the watery way,
A boar fierce-rushing in the sylvan war
Plough'd half his thigh; I saw, I saw the scar,
And wild with transport had reveal'd the wound;
But ere I spoke, he rose, and check'd the sound.
Then, daughter, haste away! and if a lie
Flow from this tongue, then let thy servant die!"

To whom with dubious joy the queen replies:
"Wise is thy soul, but errors seize the wise;
The works of gods what mortal can survey?
Who knows their motives? who shall trace their
But learn we instant how the suitors trod [way?
The paths of death, by man, or by a god."

Thus speaks the queen, and no reply attends,
But with alternate joy and fear descends;
At every step debates her lord to prove!
Or, rushing to his arms, confess her love!
Then gliding through the marble valves, in state
Oppos'd, before the shining fire she sat.
The monarch, by a column high enthron'd,
His eye withdrew, and fix'd it on the ground;
Curious to hear his queen the silence break:

Amaz'd she sat, and impotent to speak;
O'er all the man her eyes she rolls in vain:
Now hopes, now fears, now knows, then doubts
At length Telemachus—Oh! who can find [again.
A woman like Penelope unkind?

Why thus in silence? why with winning charms
Thus slow, to fly with rapture to his arms?
Stubborn the breast that with no transport glows,
When twice ten years are pass'd of mighty woes:
To softness lost, to spousal love unknown,
The gods have form'd that rigid heart of stone!"

"O my Telemachus!" the queen rejoin'd,
"Distracting fears confound my labouring mind;
Powerless to speak, I scarce uplift my eyes,
Nor dare to question; doubts on doubts arise,
Oh! deign he, if Ulysses, to remove
These boding thoughts, and what he is, to prove!"

Fear'd with her virtuous fears, the king replies,
"Indulge, my son, the cautions of the wise;
Time shall the truth to sure remembrance bring:
This garb of poverty belies the king;
No more.—This day our deepest care requires,
Cautious to act what thought mature inspires.
If one man's blood, though mean, detain our
The homicide retreats to foreign lands; [hands,
By us, in heaps the illustrious peerage falls,
Th' important deed our whole attention calls."

"Be that thy care," Telemachus replies,
"The world conspires to speak Ulysses wise;
For wisdom all is thine! lo, I obey,
And dauntless follow where you lead the way;
Nor shalt thou in the day of danger find
Thy coward son degenerate lag behind."

"Then instant to the bath" (the monarch cries)
Bid the gay youth and sprightly virgins rise,
Thence all descend in pomp and proud array,
And bid the dome resound the mirthful lay;
While the swift lyrist airs of rapture sings,
And forms the dance responsive to the strings.
That hence th' eluded passengers may say,
Lo! the queen weds! we hear the spousal lay!
The suitors' death unknown, till we remove Far from the court, and act inspir'd by Jove."

Thus spoke the king: th' observant train obey,
At once they bathe, and dress in proud array:
The lyrist strikes the string; gay youths advance,
And fair-zoan'd damsels from the sprightly dance.
The voice attun'd to instrumental sounds,
Ascends the roof; the vaulted roof rebounds;
Not unobserved: the Greeks, eluded say,
"Lo the queen weds! we hear the spousal lay!
Instant! to admit the bridal hours."
Thus they—but nobly chaste she weds no more.

Meanwhile the weary'd king the bath attends;
With faithful cares Eurynomé attends,
O'er every limb a shower of fragrances sheds:
Then, dress'd in pomp, magnificent he treads.
The warrior-goddess gives his frame to shine
With majesty enlarg'd, and grace divine.
Back from his brows in wavy ringlets fly
His thick large locks of hyacinthine dye.
As by some artist, to whom Vulcan gives
His heavenly skill, a breathing image lives;
By Pallas taught, he frames the wondrous mould,
And the pale silver glows with fusile gold:
So Pallas his heroic form improves
With bloom divine; and like a god he moves;
More high he treads, and issuing forth in state,
Radiant before his gazing consort sate.
And, "Oh my queen!" he cries, "what power above
Has stepp'd that heart, averse to spousal love!
But Heaven, Demelpe, when Heaven restores
Thy lost Ulysses to his native shores,
Canst thou, oh Israel! unconcern'd survey
Thy lost Ulysses, on this signal day?"

Haste, Eurycles, and dispatchful spread
For me, and me alone, th' imperial bed:
My weary nature craves the balm of rest:
But Heaven with adamant has arm'd her breast."

"Ah! no!" she cries, "a tender heart I bear,
A foe to pride; no adamant is there;
And now, ev'n now it melts! for sure I see
Once more Ulysses, my belov'd, in thee!
Fix'd in my soul, as when he sail'd to Troy,
His image dwells: then haste thee head of joy!
Haste, from the bridal bower the bed translate,
Fram'd by his hand, and be it dress'd in state!"
Thus speaks the queen, still-dubious, with disguise;

Touch'd at her words, the king with warmth replies;
"Alas, for this! what mortal strength can move
The enormous burthen, who but Heaven above?
It mocks the weak attempts of human hands;
But the whole Earth must move, if Heaven com-
Then hear sure evidence, while we display [mands,
Words seal'd with sacred truth, and truth obey:
This hand the wonder fram'd; an olive spread
Full in the court its ever verdant head:
Vast as some mighty column's bulk, on high
The huge trunk rose, and heav'd into the sky;
Around the tree I rais'd aquapital bower,
And roof'd defensive of the storm and shower:
The spacious valve, with art inwrought, conjoins;
And the fair dome with polish'd marble shines:
I lopp'd the branchy head; aloft in twin
Sever'd the bole, and smooth'd the shining grain;
Then posts, capacious of the frame, I raise,
And bore it, regular, from space to space:
Athwart the frame, at equal distance, lie
Thongs of tough hides, that boast a purple dye;
Then, polishing the whole, the finish'd mould
With silver shows, with elephant, and gold.
But if o'ertur'd by rude, ungovern'd hands,
Or still inviolate the olive stands,
'Tis thine, O queen, to say: and how impart,
If fears remain, or doubts distract thy heart?"

While yet he speaks, her powers of life decay,
She sickens, trembles, falls, and faints away:
At length recovering, to his arms she flew,
And strain'd him close, as to his breast she grew:
The tears pour'd down amain: and, "Oh!" she
"Let not against thys pouse thine anger rise! [cries,
Oh! vers'd in every turn of human art,
Forgive the weakness of a woman's heart!
The righteous powers, that mortal lots dispose,
Decree us to sustain a length of woes,
And from the flower of life, the bliss deny
To bloom together, fade away, and die.
Oh! let me, let me not thine anger move,
That I forbore, thus, thus to speak my love;
Thus in fond kisses, while the transport warms,
Pour out my soul, and die within thy arms!
I dreaded fraud! Men, faithless men, betray
Our easy faith, and make the sex their prey:
Against the fondness of my heart I strove,
'Twas caution, O my lord! not want of love:
Like me had Helen fear'd, with wanton charms
Ere the fair mischief set two worlds in arms;
Ere Greece rose dreadful in th' avenging day;
Thus had she fear'd, she had not gone astray.
But Heaven, averse to Greece, in wrath decreed
That she should wander, and that Greece should Blind to the ills that from injunctive flow, [bleed
She colour'd all our wretched lives with woe.

But why these softows when my lord arrives?
I yield! I yield! my own Ulysses lives!
The secrets of the bridal bed are known
To thee, to me, to Actoris alone,
(My fathers' present in the spousal hour,
The sole attendant on our genial bower).
Since what no eye has seen thy tongue reveal'd,
Hard and distrustful as I am, I yield."

Touch'd to the soul, the king with rapture hears,
Hangs round her neck, and speaks his joy in tears.
As to the shipwreck'd mariner, the shores
Delightful rise, when angry Neptune's roars,
Then, when the surge in thunder mounts the sky,
And gulf'd in crowds at once the sailors die;
If one more happy, while the tempest raves,
Outlives the tumults of conflicting waves,
All pale, with ooze deform'd, he views the strand;
And plunging forth with transport grasps the land:
The ravish'd queen with equal rapture glows,
Claps her lov'd lord, and to his bosom grows.
Nor had they ended till the morning ray:
But Pallas backward held the rising day,
The wheels of night retarding, to detain
The gay Aurora in the wavy main:
Whose flaming steeds, emerging through the night,
Beam o'er the eastern hills with streaming light."

At length Ulysses with a sigh replies:
"Yet fate, yet cruel fate, repose denies;
A labour long, and hard, remains behind;
By Heaven above, by Hell beneath enjoind:
For, to Tiresias through th' eternal gates
Of Hell I trod, to learn my future fates.
But end we here—The night demands repose,
Bedeck'd the couch! and peace a while, my woes!"

To whom the queen: "Thy word we shall obey,
And deck the couch; far hence be woes away;
Since the just gods, who tread the starry plains,
Restore thee safe, since my Ulysses reigns.
But what those perils Heaven decrees, impart;
Knowledge may grieve, but fear distracts the heart.
To this the king: "Ah! why must I disclose
A dreadful story of approaching woes?"

Why in this hour of transport wound thy ears,
When thou must learn what I must speak with tears?
Heaven, by the Theban ghost, thy spouse decrees,
Torn from thy arms, to sail a length of seas;
From realm to realm a nation to explore
Who ne'er knew salt, or heard the billows roar,
Nor saw gay vessel stem the surgy plain,
A painted wonder, flying on the main;
An oar my hand must bear; a shepherd eyes
The unknown instrument with strange surprise,
And calls a corn-van: this upon the plain
I fix, and hail the monarch of the main;
Then bathe his altars with the mingled gore
Of victims vow'd, a ram, a bull, a boar:
Thence swift resailing to my native shores,
Due victims slay to all th' ethereal powers.
Then Heaven decrees in peace to end my days,
And steal myself from life by slow decays:
Unknown to pain, in age resign my breath,
When late stern Neptune points the shaft of death;
To the dark grave retiring as to rest;
My people blessing, by my people bless'd. [play

"Such future scenes th' all-righteous powers dis-
By their dread seer! and such my future day."

To whom thus firm of soul: "If ripe for death,
And full of days, thou gently yield thy breath:

While Heaven a kind release from ills foreshews;
Triumph, thou happy victor of thy woes!"

But Euryclæa with dispatchful care,
And sage Eurynomé, the couch prepare:
Instant they bid the blazing torch display
Around the dome an artificial day;
Then to repose her steps the matron bends,
And to the queen Eurynomé descends;
A torch she bears, to light with guiding fires
The royal pair; she guides them, and retires.
Then instant his fair spouse Ulysses led
To the chaste love-rites of the nuptial bed.

And now the blooming youths and sprightly fair
Cease the gay dance, and to their rest repair;
But in discourse the king and consort lay,
While the soft hours stole unperceiv'd away:
Intent he hears Penelope disclose

A mournful story of domestic woes,
His servants' insults, his invaded bed,
How his whole flocks and herds exhausted bleed,
His generous wines dishonour'd shed in vain,
And the wild riots of the goiter train.
The king alternate a dire tale relates,
Of wars, of triumphs, and disastrous fates;
All he unfolds; his listening spouse turns pale
With pleasing horror at the dreadful tale!

Sleepless devours each word; and bears how slain
Cicon on Cicon swell th' ensanguin'd plain;
How to the land of Lote unblest he sails;
And images the rills, and flowery vales!
How, dash'd like dogs, his friends the Cyclops tore,
(Not unreveng'd) and quaff'd the spouting gore;
How, the loud storms in prison bound, he sails
From friendly Æolus with prosperous gales;
Yet fate withstands! a sudden tempest roars,
And whirls him groaning from his native shores:

How, on the barbarous Læstrigonian coast,
By savage hands his fleet and friends he lost;
How scarce himself surviv'd; he paints the bower,
The spells of Circe, and her magic power;
His dreadful journey to the realms beneath,
To seek Tiresias in the vales of death;
How in the doleful mansions he survey'd
His royal mother, gale Anticlea's shade;
And friends in battle slain, heroic ghosts!

Then how, unarm'd, he pass'd the Syren-coasts,
The justling rocks where fierce Charybdis raves,
And howling Scylla whirls her thundering waves,
The cave of Death! How his companions slay
The oxen sacred to the god of day,
Till Jove in wrath the rattling tempest guides,
And whelms th' offenders in the roaring tides:

How, struggling through the surge, he reach'd the tier
Of fair Ogygia, and Calypso's bowers; [shores
Where the gay blooming nymph constrain'd his stay,
With sweet, reluctant, amorous delay;

And promis'd, vainly promis'd, to bestow
Immortal life, exempt from age and woe:
How, sav'd from storms, Phœacia's coasts he trod;
By great Alcinous honour'd as a god,
Who gave him last his country to behold;

With change of raiment, brass, and heaps of gold;
He ended, sinking into sleep, and shates
A sweet forgetfulness of all his cares.

Soon as soft slumber eas'd the toils of day,
Minerva rushes through the aerial way,
And bids Aurora, with her golden wheels,
Flame from the ocean o'er the eastern hills:
Uprose Ulysses from the genial bed,
And thus with thought mature the monarch said:

1-Tiresias.

"My queen! my consort! through a length of years,

We drank the cup of sorrow mix'd with tears,
Thou, for thy lord: while me th' immortal powers
Detain'd reluctant from my native shores.
Now, blest again by Heaven, the queen display,
And rule our palace with an equal sway:
Be it my care, by loans, or martial toils,
To throng my empty folds with gifts or spoils.
But now I haste to bless Laertes' eyes
With sight of his Ulysses ere he dies;
The good old man, to wasting woes a prey,
Weeps a sad life in solitude away.
But hear, tho' wise! This morning shall unfold
The deathful scene; on heroes, heroes roll'd,
Thou with thy maids within the palace stay,
From all the scene of tumult far away."

He spoke, and sheath'd in arms incessant flies
To wake his son, and bid his friends arise.
"To arms!" aloud he cries; his friends obey,
With glittering arms their manly limbs array,
And pass the city gate; Ulysses leads the way.
Now flames the rosy dawn, but Pallas shrouds
The latent warriors in a veil of clouds.

THE ODYSSEY.

BOOK XXIV.

ARGUMENT.

THE souls of the suitors are conducted by Mercury to the infernal shades. Ulysses in the country goes to the retirement of his father Laertes; he finds him busied in his garden all alone: the manner of his discovery to him is beautifully described. They return together to his lodge, and the king is acknowledged by Dolius and the servants. The Ithacensians, led by Eupithes, the father of Antinous, rise against Ulysses, who gives them battle, in which Eupithes is killed by Laertes: and the goddess Pallas makes a lasting peace between Ulysses and his subjects, which concludes the Odyssey.

CYLLENIUS now to Pluto's dreary reign
Conveys the dead, a lamentable train!
The golden wand, that causes sleep to fly,
Or in soft slumber seals the wakeful eye,
That drives the ghosts to realms of night or day;
Points out the long uncomfortable way.
Trembling the spectres glide, and plaintive vent
Thin, hollow screams, along the deep descent.
As in the cavern of some rifted den,
Where flock nocturnal bats, and birds obscene;
Cluster'd they hang, till at some sudden shock,
They move, and murmurs run thro' all the rock;
So cowering fled the sable heaps of ghosts,
And such a scream fill'd all the dismal coasts.
And now they reach'd the Earth's remotest ends,
And now the gates where evening Sol descends,
And Leuca's rock, and Ocean's utmost streams,
And now pervade the dusky land of Dreams,
And rest at last, where souls unbodied dwell
In ever-flowing meads of Asphodel.

The empty forms of men inhabit there,
Impassive semblance, images of air!
Nought else are all that shin'd on Earth before;
Ajax and great Achilles are no more!

Yet, still a master ghost, the rest he aw'd,
The rest ador'd him, towering as he trod;
Still at his side in Nestor's son survey'd,
And lov'd Patroclus still attends his shade.

Now as they were to that infernal shore,
The suitors stopp'd, and gaz'd the hero o'er,
When, moving slow, the regal form they view'd
Of great Atreides; him in pomp pursued
And solemn sadness through the gloom of Hell,
The train of those who by Ægyptus fell.

"O mighty chief!" Pelides thus began,
"Honour'd by Jove above the lot of man!
King of a hundred kings! to whom resign'd
The strongest, bravest, greatest of mankind.
Com'st thou the first to view this dreary state?
And was the noblest the first mark of fate?"

Condemn'd to pay the great arrears so soon,
The lot, which all lament, and none can shun;
Oh! better hadst thou sunk in Trojan ground,
With all thy full-blown honours cover'd round!
Then grateful Greece with streaming eyes might Historic marbles to record thy praise: [raise
Thy praise eternal on the faithful stone
Had with transmissive glories grac'd thy son.
But heavier fates were destin'd to attend:
What man is happy, till he knows his end?"

"O son of Peleus! greater than mankind!"
(Thus Agamemnon's kingly shade rejoin'd)

"Thrice happy thou! to press the martial plain
'Midst heaps of heroes in thy quarrel slain:
In clouds of smoke rais'd by the noble fray,
Great and terrific ev'n in death you lay,
And deluges of blood flow'd round you every way,
Nor ceas'd the strife, till Jove himself oppos'd,
And all in tempests the dire evening clos'd.
Then to the fleet we bore thy honour'd load,
And decent on the funeral bed bestow'd.
Then unguents sweet and tepid streams we shed;
Tears flow'd from every eye, and o'er the dead
Each clipt the curling honours of his head.
Struck at the news thy azure mother came;
The sea-green sisters wait'd on the dame:
A voice of loud lament through all the main
Was heard: and terror seiz'd the Grecian train:
Back to their ships the frighted host had fled;
But Nestor spoke, they listen'd, and obey'd.
(From old experience Nestor's counsel springs,
And long vicissitudes of human things.)

'Forbear your flight! fair Thetis from the main,
To mourn Achilles, leads her azure train.'
Around thee stand the daughters of the deep,
Robe thee in heavenly vests, and round thee weep.
Round thee, the Muses, with alternate strain,
In ever-consecrating verse, complain.
Each warlike Greek the moving music hears,
And iron-hearted heroes melt in tears.
Till seventeen nights and seventeen days return'd,
All that was mortal or immortal mourn'd.
To flames we gave thee, the succeeding day,
And fatted sheep and sable oxen slay;
With oils and honey blaze th' augmented fires,
And, like a god ador'd, thy earthly part expires.
Unnumber'd warriors round the burning pile
Urg'd the fleet courier's or the racer's toil;
Thick clouds of dust o'er all the circle rise,
And the mix'd clamour thunders in the skies.

Soor as absorb in all-embracing flame
 Sunk what was mortal of thy mighty name,
 We then collect thy snowy bones, and place
 With wines and unguents in a golden vase
 (The vase to Thetis Bacchus gave of old,
 And Vulcan's art enrich'd the sculptur'd gold.)
 These we thy relics, great Achilles! blend
 With dear Patroclus, thy departed friend:
 In the same urn a separate space contains
 Thy next belov'd, Antilochus' remains.
 Now all the sons of warlike Greece surround
 Thy destin'd tomb, and cast a mighty mound:
 High on the shore the growing hill we raise,
 That wide th' extended Hellespont surveys;
 Where all, from age to age, who pass the coast,
 May point Achilles' tomb, and hail the mighty
 Thetis herself to all our peers proclaims (ghost.
 Heroic prizes and exequal games;
 The gods assented; and around thee lay
 Rich spoil and gifts, that blaz'd against the day.
 Oft have I seen, with solemn funeral games,
 Heroes and kings committed to the flames;
 But strength of youth, or valour of the brave,
 With nobler contest ne'er renown'd a grave.
 Such were the games by azure Thetis given,
 And such thy honours, O belov'd of Heaven!
 Dear to mankind thy fame survives, nor fades
 Its bloom eternal in the Stygian shades.
 But what to me avail my honours gone,
 Successful toils, and battles bravely won?
 Doom'd by stern Jove at home to end my life,
 By curst Ægysthus, and a faithless wife!"

Thus they; while Hermes o'er the dreary plain
 Led the sad numbers by Ulysses slain.
 On each majestic form they cast a view,
 And timorous pass'd, and awfully withdrew.
 But Agamemnon, through the gloomy shade,
 His ancient host Amphimedon survey'd:
 "Son of Melanthius!" (he began) "oh say!
 What cause compell'd so many, and so gay,
 To tread the downward, melancholy way?
 Say, could one city yield a troop so fair?
 Were all these partners of one native air?
 Or did the rage of stormy Neptune sweep
 Your lives at once, and whelm beneath the deep?
 Did nightly thieves, or pirates' cruel bands,
 Drench with your blood your pillag'd country's sands?"

Or well-defending some beleagu'rd wall,
 Say, for the public did ye greatly fall?
 Inform thy guest; for such I was of yore,
 When our triumphant navies touch'd your shore;
 Forc'd a long month the wintery seas to bear,
 To move the great Ulysses to the war."

"O king of men! I faithful shall relate"
 (Reply'd Amphimedon) "our hapless fate.
 Ulysses absent, our ambitious aim
 With rival loves pursued his royal dame:
 Her coy reserve, and prudence mix'd with pride,
 Our common suit nor granted, nor deny'd;
 But close with inward hate our deaths design'd;
 Vers'd in all arts of wily womankind.
 Her hand, laborious, in delusion spread
 A spacious loom, and mix'd the various thread;
 'Ye peers,' she cry'd, 'who press to gain my heart
 Where dead Ulysses claims no more a part,
 Yet a short space your rival suit suspend,
 Till this funereal web my labours end:
 Cease, till to good Laertes I bequeath
 A task of grief, his ornaments of death:

Lest, when the Fates his royal ashes claim,
 The Grecian matrons taint my spotless fame;
 Should he, long honour'd with supreme command,
 Wait the last duties of a daughter's hand.' (plies;

"The fiction pleas'd: our generous train com-
 Nor fraud mistrusts in virtue's fair disguise.
 The work she ply'd; but, studious of delay,
 Each following night revers'd the toils of day.
 Unheard, unseen, three years her arts prevail;
 The fourth, her maid reveal'd th' amazing tale,
 And show'd, as unperceiv'd we took our stand,
 The backward labours of her faithless hand.
 Forc'd, she completes it; and before us lay
 The mingled web, whose gold and silver ray
 Display'd the radiance of the night and day.

"Just as she finish'd her illustrious toil,
 Ill-fortune led Ulysses to our isle.
 Far in a lonely nook, beside the sea,
 At an old swineherd's rural lodge he lay:
 Thither his son from sandy Pyle repairs,
 And speedy lands, and secretly confers.
 They plan our future ruin, and resort
 Confederate to the city and the court.
 First came the son; the father next succeeds,
 Clad like a beggar, whom Eumæus leads;
 Propp'd on a staff, deform'd with age and care,
 And hung with rags, that flutter'd in the air.
 Who could Ulysses in that form behold?
 Scorn'd by the young, forgotten by the old,
 Ill-us'd by all! to every wrong resign'd,
 Patient he suffer'd with a constant mind.
 But when, arising in his wrath 't obey
 The will of Jove, he gave the vengeance way;
 The scattered arms that bung around the dome
 Careful he treasur'd in a private room:
 Then to her suitors bade his queen propose
 The archer's strife: the source of future woes,
 And omen of our death! In vain we drew
 The twanging string, and try'd the stubborn yew;
 To none it yields but great Ulysses' hands;
 In vain we threat; Telemachus commands:
 The bow he snatch'd, and in an instant bent;
 Through every ring the victor arrow went.
 Fierce on the threshold then in arms he stood:
 Pour'd forth the darts that thirsted for our blood,
 And frown'd before us, dreadful as a god!
 First bleeds Antinous: thick the shafts resound;
 And heaps on heaps the wretches strow the ground;
 This way, and that, we turn, we fly, we fall;
 Some god assisted, and unmann'd us all:
 Ignoble cries precede the dying groans;
 And batter'd brains and blood besmear the stones.

"Thus, great Atrides, thus Ulysses drove
 The shades thou seest, from yon fair realms above.
 Our mingled bodies, now deform'd with gore,
 Cold and neglected, spread the marble floor,
 No friend to bathe our wounds! or tears to shed
 O'er the pale corse! the honours of the dead."

"Oh, bless'd Ulysses!" (thus the king express'd
 His sudden rapture) "in thy consort bless'd!
 Not more thy wisdom, than her virtue shin'd;
 Not more thy patience, than her constant mind.
 Icarus' daughter, glory of the past,
 And model to the future age shall last:
 The gods, to honour her fair fame, shall raise (Their great reward) a poet in her praise.
 Not such, O Tyndarus! thy daughter's deed:
 By whose dire hand her king and husband bled
 Her shall the Muse to infamy prolong,
 Example dread; and theme of tragic song!"

The general sex shall suffer in her shame,
And ev'n the best that bears a woman's name."

Thus in the regions of eternal shade
Costers'd the mournful phantoms of the dead;
While, from the town, Ulysses and his band
Pass'd to Læertes' cultivated land.

The ground himself had purchas'd with his pain,
And labour made the rugged soil a plain.

There stood his mansion of the rural sort,
With useful buildings round the lowly court:
Where the few servants that divide his care,
Took their laborious rest, and homely fare;
And one Sicilian matron, old and sage,
With constant duty tends his drooping age.

Here now arriving, to his rustic band
And martial son, Ulysses gave command:
"Enter the house, and of the briefly swift
Select the largest to the powers divine.
Alone, and unattended, let me try
If yet I share the old man's memory:
If those dim eyes can yet Ulysses know,
(Their light and dearest object long ago)
Now chang'd with time, with shew, and with woe!"

Then to his train he gives his spear and shield;
The house they enter; and he seeks the field,
Through roots of shade, with various frutage
crown'd,

And labour'd scenes of richest verdure round.
Nor aged Dolius, nor his sons, were there,
Nor servants, absent on another care;
To search the woods for sets of flowery thorn,
Their orchard bounds to strengthen and adorn.

But all alone the hoary king he found;
His habit coarse, but warmly wrapt around;
His head, that bow'd with many a pensive care,
Fenc'd with a double cap of goatskin hair;
His buskins old, in former service torn,
But well repair'd; and gloves against the thorn.
In this array the kingly garden stood,
And clear'd a plant, cucumber'd with its wood.
Beneath a neighbouring tree the chief divine
Gaz'd o'er his sire, retracing every line,
The robes of himself! poor worn away
With age, yet still majestic in decay!
Sudden his eyes relax'd their watery store;
The march-conducting start could bear no more.
Doubtful he stood; if instant to embrace
His aged limbs, to kiss his reverend face,
With eager transport to disclose the whole,
And pour at once the torrent of his soul.—
Not so: his judgment takes the winding way
Of quietest discourse, and of soft easey
More gentle methods of weak age employs;
And moves the sorrow to enhance the joys.
Then to his sire with beating heart he moves;
And with a tender pleasurable reproves:
Who, digging round the plant, still hangs his head,
Nor ought results the work, while thus he said:
"Great is thy skill, O father! great thy toil,
Thy careful hand is stamp'd on all the soil,
Thy squand'ring vineyards well thy art declare,
The olive green, blue fig, and pendent pear;
And not one empty spot escapes thy care!
On every plant and tree thy cares are show'd,
Nothing neglected; but thyself alone,
Forgive me, father, if this fault I blame;
Age, as all us'd, may some indulgence claim.
Not for thy slow, I deem thy lot unkind;
Nor speak thy name, or name of service kind."

I read a monarch in that princely air,
The same thy aspect, if the same thy care;
Soft sleep, fair garments, and the joys of time,
These are the rights of age, and should be thine.
Who then thy master, say? and whose the land
So dress'd and manag'd by thy skillful hand?
But chief, oh tell me! (what I question most)
Is this the far-fam'd Ithacensian coast?
For so reported the first men I view'd,
(Some surly islander, of manners rude)
Nor further conference vouchsaf'd to stay;
Heedless he whistled, and pursued his way.
But thou! whom years have taught to understand,
Humanely hear, and answer thy demand:
A friend I seek, a wise one and a brave,
Say, lives he yet, or moulders in the grave?
Time was (thy fortunes then were at the best)
When at my house I lodg'd this foreign guest;
He said; from Ithaca's fair isle he came,
And old Læertes was his father's name.
To him, whatever to a guest is ow'd
I paid, and hospitable gifts bestow'd:
To him seven talents of pure ore I told,
Twelve cloaks, twelve vests, twelve tunics stiff with
gold;

A bowl, that rich with polish'd silver flames,
And, stiff'd in female works, four lovely dames."

At this the father, with a father's fears,
(His venerable eyes bedimm'd with tears)
"This is the land; but ah! thy gifts are lost,
For godless men, and rude, possess the coast:
Sunk is the glory of this once-fam'd shore!
Thy ancient friend, O stranger, is no more!
Full recompense thy bounty else had borne;
For every good man yields a just return:
So civil rights demand; and who begins
The track of friendship, not pursuing, still
But tell me, stranger, be the truth confess'd,
What years have circled since thou saw'st that
That hapless guest, alas! for ever gone! [guest!
Wretch that he was! and that I am! my son!
If ever man to misery was born,
'Twas his to suffer, and 'tis mine to mourn!
Far from his friends, and from his native reign,
He lies a prey to monsters of the main,
Or savage beasts his mingled relics tear,
Of screaming vultures scatter through the air:
Nor could his mother funeral unguents shed;
Nor wail'd his father o'er th' unquietly dead:
Nor his sad consort, on the mournful bier,
Seal'd his cold eyes, or dropp'd a tender tear!
But tell me, who thou art? and what thy race?
Thy town, thy parents, and thy native place?
Or, if a merchant in pursuit of gain,
What port receiv'd thy vessel from the main?
Or com'st thou single, or attend thy train?"

Then thus the son: "From Alysas I came,
My palace there; Eperitus my name.
Not vulgar born; from Aphidas, the king
Of Polyphemus's royal line, I spring,
Some adverse demon from Sicilia bore
Our wandering course, and drove us on your shore
Far from the town, an unfrequented bay
Reliev'd our weary'd vessel from the sea.
Five years have circled since these eyes pursued
Ulysses parting through the sable food;
Prosperous he sail'd, with dexter auguries,
And all the wing'd good omens of the skies.
Well hop'd we, then, to meet on this fair shore,
Whom Heaven, alas! destin'd to meet no more."

Quick thro' the father's heart these accents ran :
Grief seiz'd at once, and wrapt up all the man ;
Deep from his soul he sigh'd, and sorrowing spread
A cloud of ashes on his hoary head.

Trembling with agonies of strong delight
Stood the great son, heart-wounded with the sight :
He ran, he seiz'd him with a strict embrace,
With thousand kisses wander'd o'er his face,
" I, I am he ! O father, rise, behold
Thy son, with twenty winters now grown old !
Thy son, so long desir'd, so long detain'd,
Restor'd, and breathing in his native land :
These floods of sorrow, O my sire, restrain !
The vengeance is complete ; the sutor-train,
Stretch'd in our palace, by these hands lie slain."

Amar'd, Laertes : " Give some certain sign,
(If such thou art) to manifest thee mine."
" Lo here the wound," he cries, " receiv'd of yore,
The scar indent'd by the tusk'd boar,
When by thyself and by Anticlea sent,
To old Autolyce's realms I went.

Yet by another sign thy offspring know ;
The several trees you gave me long ago,
While, yet a child, these fields I lov'd to trace,
And trod thy footsteps with unequal pace ;
To every plant in order as we came,
Well-pleas'd you told its nature, and its name,
Whate'er my childish fancy ask'd, bestow'd ;
Twelve pear-trees bowing with their pendent load,
And ten, that red with blushing apples glow'd ;
Full fifty purple figs ; and many a row
Of various vines that then began to blow,
A future vintage ! when the Hours produce
Their latent buds, and Sol exalts the juice."

Amid with the signs, which all his doubts explain,
His heart within him melts ; his knees sustain
Their feeble weight no more ; his arms alone
Support him, round the lov'd Ulysses thrown ;
He faints, he sinks, with mighty joys oppress'd :
Ulysses clasps him to his eager breast.
Soon as returning life regains its seat,
And his breath lengthens, and his pulses beat ;
" Yes, I believe," he cries, " almighty Jove !
Heaven rules us yet, and gods there are above.
"Tis so—the suitors for their wrongs have paid—
But what shall guard us, if the town invade ?
If, while the news through every city flies,
All Ithaca and Cephallenia rise !"

To this Ulysses : " As the gods shall please
Be all the rest ; and set thy soul at ease,
Haste to the cottage by this orchard side,
And take the banquet which our cares provide :
There wait thy faithful band of rural friends,
And there the young Telemachus attends."

Thus having said, they trac'd the garden o'er,
And, stooping, enter'd at a lowly door.
The swains and young Telemachus they found,
The victim portion'd, and the goblet crown'd.
The hoary king, his old Sicilian maid
Perfum'd and wash'd, and gorgeously array'd.
Pallas attending gives his frame to shine
With awful port, and majesty divine ;
His gazing son admires the godlike grace,
And air celestial dawning o'er his face. [proves ?
" What god," he cry'd, " my father's form im-
How high he treads, and how enlarg'd he moves !"
" Oh ! would to all the deathless powers on high,
Pallas and Jove, and him who gilds the sky !"
(Reply'd the king, elated with his praise)

" My strength were still, as once in better days :

When the bold Cephaleus the leaguer form'd,
And proud Nericeus trembled as I storm'd,
Such were I now, not absent from your deed
When the last Sun beheld the suitors bleed,
This arm had aided yours ; this hand bestrown
Our floors with death, and push'd the slaughter on ;
Nor had the sire been separate from the son."

They commun'd thus ; while homeward bent their way

The swains, fatigu'd with labours of the day ;
Dolius the first, the venerable man :
And next his sons, a long succeeding train.
For due reflection to the bower they came,
Call'd by the careful old Sicilian dame,
Who nurs'd the children, and now tends the sire ;
They see their lord, they gaze, and they admire.
On chairs and beds in order seated round,
They share the gladsome board ; the roofs resound.
While thus Ulysses to his ancient friend :
" Forbear yout wonder, and the feast attend ;
The rites have waited long." The chief commands
Their loves in vain ; old Dolius spreads his hands,
Springs to his master with a warm embrace,
And fastens kisses on his hands and face ;
Then thus broke out : " Oh long, oh daily mourn'd !
Beyond our hopes, and to our wish, return'd !
Conducted sure by Heaven ! for Heaven alone
Could work this wonder : welcome to thy own !
And joys and happiness attend thy throne !
Who knows thy bless'd, thy wish'd return ? Oh, say,
To the chaste queen, shall we the news convey ?
Or hears she, and with blessings loads the day ?"

" Dismiss that care, for to the royal bride
Already is it known," (the king reply'd,
And straight resum'd his seat) while round him bows
Each faithful youth, and breathes out ardent vows :
Then all beneath their father take their place,
Rank'd by their ages, and the banquet grace.

Now flying fame the swift report had spread
Through all the city, of the suitors dead.
In throngs they rise, and to the palace crowd ;
Their sighs were many, and the tumult loud,
Weeping they bear the mangled heaps of slain,
Inhume the natives in their native plain,
The rest in ships are wafted o'er the main.
Then sad in council all the seniors sate,
Frequent and full, assembled to debate.

Amid the circle first Eupithes rose,
Big was his eye with tears, his heart with woes :
The bold Antinous was his age's pride,
The first who by Ulysses' arrow dy'd.
Down his wan cheek the trickling torrent ran,
As, mixing words with sighs, he thus began :

" Great deeds, O friends ! this wonderous man has wrought,
And mighty blessings to his country brought.
With ships he parted and a numerous train,
Those, and their ships, he bury'd in the main.
Now he returns, and first essays his hand
In the best blood of all his native land.
Haste then, and ere to neighbouring Pyle he flies,
Or sacred Elis, to procure supplies ;
Arise, (or ye for ever fall) arise !
Shame to this age, and all that shall succeed !
If unrevehg'd your sons and brothers bleed.
Prove that we live, by vengeance on his head,
Or sink at once forgotten with the dead."

Here ceas'd he, but indignant tears fell fall
Spoke when he ceas'd : dumb sorrow touch'd them all.

When from the palace to the wondering throng
Sage Medon came, and Phemius came along,
(Restless and early sleep's soft bands they broke);
And Medon first th' assembled chiefs bespoke:

"Hear me, ye peers and elders of the land,
Who deem this act the work of mortal hand;
As o'er the heaps of death Ulysses strode,
These eyes, these eyes beheld a present god,
Who now before him, now beside him stood,
Fought as he fought, and mark'd his way with
In vain old Mentor's form the god bely'd; [blood:
'Twas Heaven that struck, and Heaven was on his

A sudden horror all th' assembly shook, [side."
When, slowly rising, Halitherses spoke:
(Reverend and wise, whose comprehensive view
At once the present and the future knew)
"Me too, ye fathers, hear! from you proceed
The ill ye mourn; your own the guilty deed.
Ye gave your sons, your lawless sons, the rein
(Oft warn'd by Mentor and myself in vain);
An absent hero's bed they sought to soil,
An absent hero's wealth they made their spoil:
Immoderate riot, and intemperate lust!
Th' offence was great, the punishment was just.
Weigh then my counsels in an equal scale,
Nor rush to ruin—Justice will prevail."

His moderate words some better minds persuade:
They part, and join him; but the number stay'd.
They storm, they shout, with hasty frenzy fir'd,
And second all Eupithes' rage inspir'd.
They case their limbs in brass; to arms they run;
The broad effulgence blazes in the Sun.
Before the city, and in ample plain,
They meet; Eupithes heads the frantic train.
Fierce for his son, he breathes his threats in air;
Fate hears them not, and Death attends him there.

This pass'd on Earth, while in the realms above
Minerva thus to cloud-sompeiling Jove:
"May I presume to search thy secret soul?
O power supreme! O ruler of the whole!
Say, hast thou doom'd to this divided state,
Or peaceful amity, or stern debate?
Declare thy purpose; for thy will is fate."

"Is not thy thought my own?" (the god replies,
Who rolls the thunder o'er the vaulted skies)

"Hath not long since thy knowing soul decreed,
The chief's return should make the guilty bleed?
'Tis done, and at thy will the Fates succeed.

Yet hear the issue: since Ulysses' hand
Has slain the suitors, Heaven shall bless the land.
None now the kindred of th' unjust shall own;
Forgot the slaughter'd brother, and the son:
Each future day increase of wealth shall bring,
And o'er the past, Oblivion stretch her wing.
Long shall Ulysses in his empire rest,
His people blessing, by his people bless'd.
Let all be peace."—He said, and gave the nod
That binds the Fates; the sanction of the god:
And, prompt to execute the eternal will,
Descended Pallas from th' Olympian hill.

Now sat Ulysses at the rural feast,
The rage of hunger and of thirst repress'd:
To watch the foe a trusty spy he sent;
A son of Dolius on the message went,
Stood in the way, and at a glance beheld
The foe approach, embattled on the field.
With backward step he hastens to the bower,
And tells the news. They arm with all their power.
Four friends alone Ulysses' cause embrace,
And six were all the sons of Dolius' race:

Old Dolius too his rusted arms put on;
And, still more old, in arms Laertes shone.
Trembling with warmth, the hoary heroes stand,
And brazen panoply invests the band.
The opening gates at once their war display:
Fierce they rush forth: Ulysses leads the way.
That moment joins them with celestial aid,
In Mentor's form, the Jove-descended maid:
The suffering hero felt his patient breast
Swell with new joy, and thus his son address'd:
"Behold, Telemachus! (nor fear the sight)
The brave embattled; the grim front of fight!
The valiant with the valiant must contend:
Shame not the line whence glorious you descend,
Wide o'er the world their martial fame was spread;
Regard thyself, the living, and the dead."

"Thy eyes, great father! on this battle cast,
Shall learn from me Penelope was chaste."
So spoke Telemachus! the gallant boy
Good old Laertes heard with panting joy;
And, "Bless'd! thrice bless'd this happy day!"
he cries;

"The day that shows me, ere I close my eyes,
A son and grandson of th' Arcesian name
Strive for fair virtue, and contest for fame!"
Then thus Minerva in Laertes' ear:

"Son of Arcesius, reverend warrior, hear!
Jove and Jove's daughter first implore in prayer,
Then, whirling high, discharge thy lance in air,"
She said, infusing courage with the word:
Jove and Jove's daughter then the chief implor'd,
And, whirling high, dismiss'd the lance in air,
Full at Eupithes drove the deathful spear;
The brass-check'd helmet opens to the wound;
He falls, earth thunders, and his arms resound.

Before the father and the conquering son [run.
Heaps rush on heaps; they fight, they drop, they
Now by the sword, and now the javelin, fall
The rebel race, and death had swallow'd all;
But from on high the blue-ey'd virgin cry'd;
Her awful voice detain'd the headlong tide.

"Forbear, ye nations! your mad hands forbear
From mutual slaughter: Peace descends to spare."
Fear shook the nations: at the voice divine,
They drop their javelins, and their rage resign.
All scatter'd round their glittering weapons lie;
Some fall to earth, and some confus'd fly.
With dreadful shouts Ulysses pour'd along,
Swift as an eagle, as an eagle strong.

But Jove's red arm the burning thunder aims;
Before Minerva shot the livid flames;
Blazing they fell, and at her feet expir'd:
Then stopp'd the goddess, trembled, and retir'd.

"Descended from the gods! Ulysses, cease;
Offend not Jove; obey, and give the peace."
So Pallas spoke: the mandate from above
The king obey'd. The virgin-seed of Jove,
In Mentor's form, confirm'd the full accord,
"And willing nations knew their lawful lord."

END OF THE ODYSSEY.

CONCLUSION OF THE NOTES.

I must observe with what dignity Homer concludes the Odyssey: to honour his hero, he introduces two deities, Jupiter and Pallas, who interest themselves in his cause: he then paints Ulysses in the boldest colours, as he rushes upon the enemy with the utmost intrepidity, and his courage is so ungovernable, that Jupiter is forced to restrain it with his thunder. It is usual for orators to reserve the strongest arguments for the conclusion, that they may leave them fresh upon the reader's memory; Homer uses the same conduct: he represents his hero in all his terror, he shows him to be irresistible, and by this method leaves us fully possessed with a noble idea of his magnanimity.

It has been already observed, that the end of the action of the Odyssey is the re-establishment of Ulysses in full peace and tranquillity; this is not effected, till the defeat of the suitors' friends: and, therefore, if the poet had concluded before this event, the Odyssey had been imperfect. It was necessary that the reader should not only be informed of the return of Ulysses to his country, and the punishment of the suitors, but of his re-establishment, by a peaceful possession of his regal authority; which is not executed, till these last disorders raised by Eupithes are settled by the victory of Ulysses; and, therefore, this is the natural conclusion of the action.

This book opens with the morning, and ends before night, so that the whole story of the Odyssey is comprehended in the compass of one and forty days. Monsieur Dacier upon Aristotle remarks, that an epic poem ought not to be too long: we should be able to retain all the several parts of it at once in our memory: if we lose the idea of the beginning when we come to the conclusion, it is an argument that it is of too large an extent, and its length destroys its beauty. What seems to favour this decision is, that the Æneid, Iliad, and Odyssey, are conformable to this rule of Aristotle; and every one of those poems may be read in the compass of a single day.

I have now gone through the collections upon the Odyssey, and laid together what occurred most remarkable in this excellent poem. I am not so vain as to think these remarks free from faults, nor so disingenuous as not to confess them: all writers have occasion for indulgence, and those most who least acknowledge it. I have sometimes used Madam Dacier as she has done others, in transcribing some of her remarks without particularizing them; but, indeed, it was through inadvertency only that her name is sometimes omitted at the bottom of the note. If my performance has merit, either in these, or in my part of the translation, (namely, in the sixth, eleventh, and eighteenth books) it is but just to attribute it to the judgment and care of Mr. Pope, by whose hand every sheet was corrected. His other, and much more able assistant, was Mr. Fenton, in the fourth and the twentieth books. It was our particular request, that our several parts might not be made known to the world till the end of it: and if they have had the good fortune not to be distinguished from his, we ought to be the less vain, since the resemblance proceeds much less from our diligence and study to copy his manner, than from his own daily revision and correction. The most experienced painters will not wonder at this, who very well know, that no critic can pronounce even of the pieces of Raphael or Titian, which have, or which have not, been worked upon by those of their school; when the same master's hand has directed the execution of the whole, reduced it to one character and colouring, gone over the several parts, and given to each their finishing.

I must not conclude without declaring our mutual satisfaction in Mr. Pope's acceptance of our best endeavours, which have contributed at least to his more speedy execution of this great undertaking. If ever my name be numbered with the learned, I must ascribe it to his friendship, in transmitting it to posterity by a participation in his labours. May the sense I have of this, and other instances of that friendship, be known as long as his name will cause mine to last: and may I to this end be permitted, at the conclusion of a work, which is a kind of monument of his partiality to me, to place the following lines, as an inscription memorial of it:

ON THE ODYSSEY.

LET vulgar souls triumphal arches raise,
Or speaking marbles, to record their praise;
And picture (to the voice of Fame unknown)
The mimic feature on the breathing stone:
Mere mortals! subject to death's total sway,
Reptiles of Earth, and beings of a day!

'Tis thine, on every heart to grave thy praise,
A monument which worth alone can raise:
Sure to survive, when time shall whelm in dust
The arch, the marble, and the mimic bust:
Nor, till the volumes of th' expanded sky
Blaze in one flame, shalt thou and Homer die:
Then sink together, in the world's last fires,
What Heaven created, and what Heaven inspires.

If aught on Earth, when once this breath is fled,
With human transport touch the mighty dead:
Shakespeare, rejoice! his hand thy page refines;
Now every scene with native brightness shines;
Just to thy fame, he gives thy genuine thought;
So Tully publish'd what Lucretius wrote;
Prun'd by his care thy laurels loftier grow,
And bloom afresh on thy immortal brow.

Thus when thy draughts, O Raphael! time
[invades,

And the bold figure from the canvas fades,
A rival hand recalls from every part
Some latent grace, and equals art with art:
Transported we survey the dubious strife,
While each fair image starts again to life.

How long, untun'd, had Homer's sacred lyre
Jarr'd grating discord, all-extinct his fire!
This you beheld; and, taught by Heaven to sing,
Call'd the loud music from the sounding string.
Now wak'd from slumbers of three thousand years,
Once more Achilles in dread pomp appears,
Towers o'er the field of death; as fierce he turns,
Keen flash his arms, and all the hero burns;
With martial stalk, and more than mortal might,
He strides along, and meets the gods in fight:
Then the pale Titans, chain'd on burning floors,
Start at the din that rends th' infernal shores;
Tremble the towers of Heaven, Earth rocks her coasts,

And gloomy Pluto shakes with all his ghosts.
To every theme responds thy various lay;
Here rolls a torrent, there meanders play;
Sonorous as the storm thy numbers rise,
Toss the wild waves, and thunder in the skies;
Or softer than a yielding virgin's sigh,
The gentle breezes breathe away and die.

Thus, like the radiant god who sheds the day,
 You paint the vale, or gild the azure way;
 And, while with every theme the verse complies,
 Sink without groveling, without rashness rises.

Proceed, great bard! awake th' harmonious
 Be ours all Homer! still Ulysses sing. [string.
 How long! that hero by unskilful hands,
 Stripp'd of his robe, a beggar trod our lands:
 Such as he wander'd o'er his native coast,
 Shrupk by the wind, and all the warrior lost?
 O'er his smooth skin a bark of wrinkles spread;
 Old age disgrac'd the honours of his head:
 Nor longer in his heavy eye-ball shin'd,
 The glance divine, forth-beaming from the mind,
 But you, like Pallas, every limb in fold
 With royal robes, and bid him shine in gold;
 Touch'd by your hand, his manly frame improves
 With grace divine, and like a god he moves.

Even I, the meanest of the Muses' train,
 Injam'd by thee, attempt a nobler strain;
 Adventurous waken the Mæonian lyre,
 Tun'd by your hand, and sing as you inspire:
 So, arm'd by great Achilles for the fight,
 Patroclus conquer'd in Achilles' right:
 Like their's, our friendship! and I boast my name
 To thine united—For thy FRIENDSHIP'S PAME.

'This labour past, of heavenly subjects sing,
 While hovering angels listen on the wing,
 To hear from Earth, such heart-felt raptures rise,
 As, when they sing, suspended hold the skies:
 Or, nobly rising in fair virtue's cause,
 From thy own life transcribe th' unerring laws:
 Teach a bad world beneath thy sway to bend;
 To verse like thine fierce savages attend,
 And men more fierce: when Orpheus tunes the lay,
 Ev'n fiends relenting hear their rage away.

POSTSCRIPT.

BY MR. POPE.

I CANNOT dismiss this work without a few observations on the character and style of it. Whoever reads the Odyssey with an eye to the Iliad, expecting to find it of the same character, or of the same sort of spirit, will be grievously deceived, and err against the first principle of criticism, which is, to consider the nature of the piece, and the intent of its author. The Odyssey is a moral and political work, instructive to all degrees of pæna, and filled with images, examples, and precepts of civil and domestic life. Homer is here [a person,

Qui didicit, patriam quid debeat, & quid
 amicis, [hospes:

Quo sit amorem, quo frater amandus, &
 Qui quid sit pulchrum, quid turpe, quid utile, quid non,

Plenius & melius Chrysiippo & Crantore dicit.

The Odyssey is the reverse of the Iliad, in moral, subject, manner, and style; to which it has no sort of relation, but as the story happens to follow in order of time, and as some of the same persons are actors in it. Yet from this incidental connection many have been misled to regard it as a continuation or second part, and thence to expect a parity of character inconsistent with its nature.

It is no wonder that the common reader should fall into this mistake, when so great a critic as Longinus seems not wholly free from it; although what he has said has been generally understood to import a severer censure of the Odyssey than it really does, if we consider the occasion on which it is introduced, and the circumstances to which it is confined.

"The Odyssey" (says he) "is an instant, how natural it is to a great genius, when it begins to grow old and declines, to delight itself in narratives and fables. For that Homer composed the Odyssey after the Iliad, many proofs may be given, &c. From hence, in my judgment, it proceeds, that as the Iliad was written while his spirit was in its greatest vigour, the whole structure of that work is dramatic and full of action; whereas the greater part of the Odyssey is employed in narration, which is the taste of old age; so that in this latter piece we may compare him to the setting Sun, which has still the same greatness, but not the same ardour, or force. He speaks not in the same strain: we see no more that subtilty of the Iliad, which marches on with a constant pace, without ever being stopped, or retarded: there appears no more that hurry, and that strong tide of motions and passions, pouring one into another: there is no more the same fury, or the same volatility of fiction, so suitable to action, and all along drawing in such innumerable images of nature. But Homer, like the ocean, is always great, even when he ebbs and retires; even when he is lowest, and loses himself most in narrations and incredible fictions: as instances of this, we cannot forget the description of tempests, the adventures of Ulysses with the Cyclops, and many others. But, though all this be said, it is the gift of Homer—and it may be said for the credit of these fictions, that they are beautiful dreams, or, if you will, the dreams of Jupiter himself. I spoke of the Odyssey only to show, that the greatest poets, when their genius wants strength and warmth for the pathetic, for the most part employ themselves in padding the numbers. That Homer has done in characterizing the actors, and describing their way of life: which is properly a branch of comedy, whose peculiar business it is to represent the manners of men."

We must first observe, it is the substance of which Longinus is writing: that, and not the nature of Homer's poem, is his subject. After having highly extolled the fire and sublimity of the Iliad, he justly observes the Odyssey to have less of those qualities, and to turn more on the side of moral, and reflections on human life. Nor is it his business here to determine, whether the elevated spirit of the one, or the just moral of the other, be the greater excellence in itself.

Secondly, that fire and fury, of which he is speaking, cannot well be meant of the general spirit and inspiration which is to run through a whole epic poem, but of that particular warmth and impetuosity necessary in some parts, to imitate or represent actions or passions, of hate, thirst, and violence. It is on occasion of doing some such particular passages in Homer, that Longinus breaks into this reflection; which seems to determine his meaning chiefly to that sense.

Upon the whole, he affirms the Odyssey to have less sublimity and fire than the Iliad; but he does not say it wants the sublime, or wants fire. He affirms it to be narrative, but not that the narration is defective. He affirms it to abound in fictions, not that those fictions are ill invented, or ill executed. He affirms it to be nice and particular in painting the manners, but not that those manners are ill painted. If Homer has fully in these points accomplished his own design, and done all that the nature of his poem demanded or allowed, it still remains perfect in its kind, and as much a masterpiece as the Iliad.

The amount of the passage is this; that in his own particular taste, and with respect to the sublime, Longinus preferred the Iliad: and because the Odyssey was less active and lofty, he judged it the work of the old age of Homer.

If this opinion be true, it will only prove, that Homer's age might determine him in the choice of his subject, not that it affected him in the execution of it; and that which would be a very wrong instance to prove the decay of his imagination, is a very good one to evince the strength of his judgment. For had he (as Madam Dacler observes) composed the Odyssey in his youth and the Iliad in his age, both must in reason have been exactly the same as they now stand. To blame Homer for his choice of such a subject, as did not admit the same incidents and the same pomp of style as his former, is to take offence at too much variety, and to imagine, that when a man has written one good thing, he must ever after copy himself.

The Battle of Constantine, and the School of Athens, are both pieces of Raphael: shall we censure the School of Athens as faulty, because it has not the fury and fire of the other? or shall we say, that Raphael was grown grave and old, because he chose to represent the manners of old men and philosophers? There is all the gloom, tranquillity, and composure in the one, and all the warmth, hurry, and tumult in the other, which the subject of each required: both of them had been imperfect, if they had not been as they are. And let the poet or painter be young or old, who designs and performs in this manner, it proves him to have made the piece at a time of life when he was master not only of his art, but of his disposition.

Aristotle makes no such distinction between the two poems: he constantly cites them with equal praise, and draws the rules and examples of epic writing equally from both. But it is rather to the Odyssey that Horace gives the preference, in the Epistle to Lollius, and in the Art of Poetry. It is remarkable how opposite his opinion is to that of Longinus: and that the particulars he chooses to excel, are those very fictions, and pictures of the manners, which the other seems least to approve. These fables and manners are of the very essence of the work: but even without that regard, the fables themselves have both more invention and more instruction, and the manners more moral and exemplary, than those of the Iliad.

In some points (and those the most essential to the epic poem) the Odyssey is confessed to excel the Iliad; and principally in the great end of it, the moral. The conduct, turn, and disposition of the fable is also what the critics allow to be the better model for epic writers to follow: accordingly we find much more of the cast of this poem than of the other in the Aeneid, and (what next to that is perhaps the greatest example) in the Telemachus. In the manners, it is no way inferior: Longinus is so far from finding any defect in these, that he rather taxes Homer with painting them too minutely. As to the narrations, although they are more numerous as the occasions are more frequent, yet they carry no more the marks of old age, and are neither more prolix, nor more circumstantial, than the conversations and dialogues of the Iliad. Not to mention the length of those of Phoenix in the ninth book, and of Nestor in the eleventh (which may be thought in compliance to their characters), those of Glaucus in the sixth, of Aeneas in the twentieth, and some others, must be allowed to exceed any in the whole Odyssey. And that the propriety of style, and the numbers, in the narrations of each are equal, will appear to any who compare them.

To form a right judgment, whether the genius of Homer had suffered any decay; we must consider, in both his poems, such parts as are of a similar nature, and will bear comparison. And it is certain we shall find in each the same vivacity and fecundity of invention, the same life and strength of imaging and colouring, the particular descriptions as highly painted, the figures as bold, the metaphors as animated, and the numbers as harmonious, and as various.

The Odyssey is a perpetual source of poetry: the stream is not the less full, for being gentle; though it is true (when we speak only with regard to the sublime) that a river, foaming and thundering in cataracts from rocks and precipices, is what more strikes, amazes, and fills the mind, than the same body of water, flowing afterwards through peaceful vales and agreeable scenes of pasturage.

The Odyssey (as I have before said) ought to be considered according to its own nature and design, not with an eye to the Iliad. To censure Homer, because it is unlike what it was never meant to resemble, is as if a gardener, who had purposely cultivated two beautiful trees of contrary natures, as a specimen of his skill in the several kinds, should be blamed for not bringing them into pairs; when in root, stem, leaf, and flower, each was so entirely different, that one must have been spoiled in the endeavour to match the other.

Longinus, who saw this poem was "perly of the nature of comedy," ought not, for that very reason, to have considered it with a view to the Iliad. How little any such resemblance was the intention of Homer, may appear from hence, that, although the character of Ulysses was there already drawn, yet here he purposely turns to another side of it, and shows him not in that full light of glory, but in the shade of common life, with a mixture of such qualities as are requisite to all the lowest accidents of it, struggling with misfortunes, and on a level with the meanest of mankind. As for the other persons, none of them are above what we call the higher comedy: Calypso, though a goddess, is a character of intrigue; the suitors yet more approaching to it; the Phaeacians are of the same cast; the Cyclops, Melanthius, and Irus, descend even to droll characters; and the scenes that appear throughout are generally of the comic kind; banquets, revels, sports, loves, and the pursuit of a woman.

From the nature of the poem, we shall form an idea of the style. The diction is to follow the images, and to take its colour from the complexion of the thoughts. Accordingly the Odysee is not always clothed in the majesty of verse proper to tragedy, but sometimes descends into the plainer narrative, and sometimes even to that familiar dialogue essential to comedy. However, where it cannot support a sublimity, it always preserves a dignity, or at least a propriety.

There is a real beauty in an easy, pure, perspicuous description, even of a low action. There are numerous instances of this both in Homer and Virgil: and, perhaps, those natural passages are not the least pleasing of their works. It is often the same in history, where the representations of common, or even domestic things, in clear, plain, and natural words, are frequently found to make the liveliest impression on the reader.

The question is, how far a poet, in pursuing the description or image of an action, can attach himself to little circumstances, without vulgarity or trifling? what particulars are proper, and enliven the image; or what are impertinent, and clog it? In this matter painting is to be consulted, and the whole regard had to those circumstances which contribute to form a full, and yet not a confused, idea of a thing.

Epithets are of vast service to this effect, and the right use of these is often the only expedient to render the narration poetical.

The great point of judgment is to distinguish when to speak simply, and when figuratively: but whenever the poet is obliged by the nature of his subject to descend to the lower manner of writing, an elevated style would be affected, and therefore ridiculous; and the more he was forced upon figures and metaphors to avoid that lowness, the more the image would be broken, and consequently obscure.

One may add, that the use of the grand style on little subjects is not only ludicrous, but a sort of transgression against the rules of proportion and mechanics: it is using a vast force to lift a feather.

I believe, now I am upon this head, it will be found a just observation, that the low actions of life cannot be put into a figurative style, without being ridiculous, but things natural can. Metaphors raise the latter into dignity, as we see in the Georgics: but throw the former into ridicule, as in the Lutrin. I think this may very well be accounted for: laughter implies censure; inanimate and irrational beings are not objects of censure; therefore they may be elevated as much as you please, and no ridicule follow: but when rational beings are represented above their real character, it becomes ridiculous in art, because it is vicious in morality. The bees in Virgil, were they rational beings, would be ridiculous by having their actions and manners represented on a level with creatures so superior as men; since it would imply folly or pride, which are the proper objects of ridicule.

The use of pompous expression for low actions or thoughts, is the true sublime of Don Quixote. How far unfit it is for epic poetry, appears in its being the perfection of the mock epic. It is so far from being the sublime of tragedy, that it is the cause of all bombast; when poets, instead of being (as they imagine) constantly lofty, only preserve throughout a painful equality of festivity: that continued swell of language (which runs indiscriminately even through their lowest characters, and rattles like some mightiness of meaning in the most indifferent subjects) is of a piece with that perpetual elevation of tone which the players have learned from it, and which is not speaking, but vociferating.

There is still more reason for a variation of style in epic poetry than in tragic, to distinguish between that language of the gods proper to the Muse who sings, and is inspired: and that of men who are introduced speaking only according to nature. Farther, there ought to be a difference of style observed in the speeches of human persons, and those of deities; and again, in those which may be called set harangues, or orations, and those which are only conversation or dialogue. Homer has more of the latter than any other poet: what Virgil does by two or three words of narration, Homer still performs by speeches: not only replies, but even rejoinders are frequent in him, a practice almost unknown to Virgil. This renders his poems more animated, but less grave and majestic, and consequently necessitates the frequent use of a lower style. The writers of Tragedy lie under the same necessity, if they would copy nature; whereas that painted and poetical diction, which they perpetually use, would be improper even in orations designed to move with all the arts of Rhetoric: this is plain from the practice of Demosthenes and Cicero; and Virgil in those of Drances and Turnus gives an eminent example, how far removed the style of them ought to be from such an excess of figures and ornaments; which indeed fits only that language of the gods we have been speaking of, or that of a Muse under inspiration.

To read through a whole work in this strain, is like travelling all along the ridge of a hill; which is not half so agreeable as sometimes gradually to rise, and sometimes gently to descend, as the way leads, and as the end of the journey directs.

Indeed the true reason that so few poets have imitated Homer in these lower parts, has been the extreme difficulty of preserving that mixture of ease and dignity essential to them. For it is as hard for an epic poem to stoop to the narrative with success, as for a prince to descend to be familiar, without diminution to his greatness.

The sublime style is more easily counterfeited than the natural; something that passes for it, or sounds like it, is common in all false writers: but nature, purity, perspicuity, and simplicity, never walk in the clouds; they are obvious to all capacities; and where they are not evident, they do not exist.

The most plain narration not only admits of these, and of harmony, (which are all the qualities of style) but it requires every one of them to render it pleasing. On the contrary, whatever pretends to a share of the sublime, may pass, notwithstanding any defects in the rest; nay, sometimes without any of them, and gain the admiration of all ordinary readers.

Homer, in his lowest narrations or speeches, is ever easy, flowing, copious, clear and harmonious. He shows not less invention, in assembling the hamble, than the greater, thoughts and images; nor less judgment, in proportioning the style and the versification to these, than to the other. Let it be remembered, that the same genius that soared the highest, and from whom the greatest models of the sublime are divided, was also he who stooped the lowest, and gave to the simple narrative its utmost perfection. Which of these was the harder task to Homer himself I cannot pretend to determine; but to his translator I can affirm (how-ever unequal all his imitations must be) that of the latter has been more difficult.

Whoever expects here the same pomp of verse, and the same ornaments of diction, as in the Iliad, he will, and he ought to be, disappointed. Were the original otherwise, it had been an offence against nature; and were the translation so, it were an offence against Homer, which is the same thing.

It must be allowed that there is a majesty and harmony in the Greek language, which greatly contribute to elevate and support the narration. But I must also observe, that this is an advantage grown upon the language since Homer's time: for things are removed from vulgarity by being out of use; and if the words we could find in any present language were equally sonorous or musical in themselves, they would still appear less poetical and uncommon than those of a dead one, from this only circumstance, of being in every man's mouth. I may add to this another disadvantage to a translator, from a different cause: Homer seems to have taken upon him the character of an historian, antiquary, divine, and professor of arts and sciences, as well as a poet. In one or other of these characters he descends into many particularities, which as a poet only perhaps he would have avoided. All these ought to be preserved by a faithful translator, who in some measure takes the place of Homer; and all that can be expected from him is to make them as poetical as the subject will bear. Many arts therefore are requisite to supply these disadvantages, in order to dignify and solemnize these plainer parts, which hardly admit of any poetical ornaments.

Some use has been made to this end of the style of Milton. A just and moderate mixture of old abbey stones into a building, which I have sometimes seen, to give a kind of venerable air, and yet not destroy the neatness, elegance, and equality, requisite to a new work; I mean, without rendering it too unfamiliar, or remote from the present purity of writing, or from that ease and smoothness which ought always to accompany narration or dialogue. In reading a style judiciously antiquated, one finds a pleasure not unlike that of travelling on an old Roman way: but then the road must be as good, as the way is ancient; the style must be such in which we may evenly proceed, without being put to short stops by sudden abruptnesses, or puzzled by frequent turnings and transpositions. No man delights in furrows and stumbling-blocks: and let our love to antiquity be ever so great, a fine ruin is one thing, and a heap of rubbish another. The imitators of Milton, like most other imitators, are not copies but caricatures of their original; they are a hundred times more obsolete and cramp than he, and equally so in all places: whereas it should have been observed of Milton, that he is not lavish of his exotic words and phrases every where alike, but employs them much more where the subject is marvellous, vast, and strange, as in the scenes of Heaven, Hell, Chaos, &c. than where it is turned to the natural and agreeable, as in the pictures of Paradise, the loves of our first parents, entertainments of angels, and the like. In general, this unusual style better serves to awaken our ideas in the descriptions and in the imaging and picturesque parts, than it agrees with the lower sort of narrations, the character of which is simplicity and purity. Milton has several of the latter, where we find not an antiquated, affected, or uncouth word, for some hundred lines together; as in his fifth book, the latter part of the eighth, the former of the tenth and eleventh books, and in the narration of Michael in the twelfth. I wonder indeed that he, who ventured contrary to the practice of all other epic poets, to imitate Homer's lownesses in the narrative, should not also have copied his plainness and perspicuity in the dramatic parts: since in his speeches (where clearness above all is necessary) there is frequently such transposition and forced construction, that the very sense is not to be discovered without a second or third reading: and in this, certainly he ought to be no example.

To preserve the true character of Homer's style in the present translation, great pains have been taken to be easy and natural. The chief merit I can pretend to is, not to have been carried into a more plausible and figurative manner of writing, which would better have pleased all readers, but the judicious ones. My errors had been fewer, had each of those gentlemen who joined with me shown as much of the severity of a friend to me, as I did to them, in a strict animadversion and correction. What assistance I received from them, was made known in general to the public in the original proposals for this work, and the particulars are specified at the conclusion of it; to which I must add (to be punctually just) some part of the tenth and fifteenth books. The reader will now be too good a judge, how much the greater part of it, and consequently of its faults, is chargeable upon me alone. But this I can with integrity affirm, that I have bestowed as much time and pains upon the whole, as were consistent with the indispensable duties and cares of life, and with that wretched state of health which God has been pleased to make my portion. At least, it is a pleasure to me to reflect, that I have introduced into our language this other work of the greatest and most ancient of poets, with some dignity; and I hope, with as little disadvantage as the Iliad. And if, after the unmerited success of that translation, any one will wonder why I would enterprise the Odyssey; I think it sufficient to say, that Homer himself did the same, or the world would never have seen it.

I designed to have ended this postscript here: but since I am now taking my leave of Homer, and of all controversy relating to him, I beg leave to be indulged if I make use of this last opportunity to say a very few words about some reflections which the late Madam Dacier bestowed on the first part of my preface to the Iliad, and which she published at the end of her translation of that poem.

To write gravely an answer to them, would be too much for the reflections; and to say nothing concerning them, would be too little for the author. It is owing to the industry of that learned lady, that our polite neighbours are become acquainted with many of Homer's beauties, which were hidden from them before in Greek and in Eustathius. She challenges on this account a particular regard from all the admirers of that great poet; and I hope that I shall be thought, as I mean, to pay some part of this debt to her memory in what I am now writing.

Had these reflections fallen from the pen of an ordinary critic, I should not have apprehended their effect, and should therefore have been silent concerning them: but since they are Madam Dacier's, I imagine that they must be of weight; and in a case where I think her reasoning very bad, I respect her authority.

I have fought under Madam Dacier's banner, and have waged war in defence of the divine Homer against all the heretics of the age. And yet it is Madam Dacier who accuses me, and who accuses me of nothing less than betraying our common cause. She affirms that the most declared enemies of this author have never said any thing against him more injurious or more unjust than I. What must the world think of me, after such a judgment passed by so great a critic; the world, who decides so often, and who examines so seldom; the world, who even in matters of literature is almost always the slave of authority? Who will suspect that so much learning should mistake, that so much accuracy should be misled, or that so much candour should be biassed?

All this however has happened; and Madam Dacier's criticisms on my preface flow from the very same error, from which so many false criticisms of her countrymen upon Homer have flowed, and which she has so justly and so severely reprobated; I mean, the error of depending on injurious and unskilful translations.

An indifferent translation may be of some use, and a good one will be of a great deal. But I think that no translation ought to be the ground of optimism, because no man ought to be condemned upon another man's explanation of his meaning; could Homer have had the honour of explaining his before that august tribunal where Monsieur de la Motte presides, I make no doubt but he had escaped many of those severe animadversions with which some French authors have loaded him; and from which even Madam Dacier's translation of the Iliad could not preserve him.

How unhappy was it for me, that the knowledge of our island-tongue was as necessary to Madam Dacier in my case, as the knowledge of Greek was to Monsieur de la Motte in that of our great author; or to any of those whom she styles blind censurers, and blames for condemning what they did not understand.

I may say with modesty, that she knew less of my true sense from that faulty translation of part of my preface, than those blind censurers might have known of Homer's even from the translation of la Valterie, which preceded her own.

It pleased me however to find, that her objections were not levelled at the general doctrine, or at any essentials of my preface, but only at a few particular expressions. She proposed little more than (to use her own phrase) to combat two or three similes; and I hope that to combat a simile is no more than to fight with a shadow, since a simile is no better than the shadow of an argument.

She lays much weight where I laid but little, and examines with more scrupulosity than I writ, or than perhaps the matter requires.

These unlucky similes, taken by themselves, may perhaps render my meaning equivocal to an ignorant translator; or there may have fallen from my pen some expressions, which, taken by themselves likewise, may to the same person have the same effect. But if the translator had been master of our tongue, the general tenour of my argument, that which precedes and that which follows the passages objected to, would have sufficiently determined him as to the precise meaning of them: and if Madam Dacier had taken up her pen a little more leisurely, or had employed it with more temper, she would not have answered paraphrases of her own, which even the translation will not justify, and which say, more than once, the very contrary to what I have said in the passages themselves.

If any person has curiosity enough to read the whole paragraphs in my preface, or some mangled parts of which these reflections are made, he will easily discern that I am as orthodox as Madam Dacier herself in those very articles on which she treats me like an heretic: he will easily see that all the difference between us consists in this, that I offer opinions, and she delivers doctrines; that my imagination represents Homer as the greatest of human poets, whereas in hers he was exalted above humanity; infallibility and impeccability were two of his attributes. There was therefore no need of defending Homer against me, who, (if I mistake not) had carried my admiration of him as far as it can be carried, without giving a real occasion of writing in his defence.

After answering my harmless similes, she proceeds to a matter which does not regard so much the honour of Homer, as that of the times he lived in; and here I must confess she does not wholly mistake my meaning, but I think she mistakes the state of the question. She had said the manners of those times were so much the better, the less they were like ours. I thought this required a little qualification. I confessed that in my opinion the world was mended in some points; such as the custom of putting whole nations to the sword, condemning kings and their families to perpetual slavery, and a few others. Madam Dacier judges otherwise in this; but as to the rest, particularly in preferring the simplicity of the ancient world to the luxury of ours, which is the main point contended for, she owns we agree. This I thought was well; but I am so unfortunate that this too is taken amiss, and called adopting, or (if you will) stealing her sentiment. The truth is, she might have said her words, for I used them on purpose, being then professedly citing from her: though

I might have done the same without intending that compliment, for they are also to be found in Eustathius, and the sentiment I believe is that of all mankind. I cannot really tell what to say to this whole remark; only that in the first part of it, Madam Dacier is displeas'd that I do not agree with her, and in the last that I do: but this is a temper which every polite man should overlook in a lady.

To punish my ingratitude, she resolves to expose my blunders, and selects two which I suppose are the most flagrant, out of the many for which she could have chastised me. It happens that the first of these is in part the translator's, and in part her own, without any share of mine: she quotes the end of a sentence, and he puts in French what I never wrote in English: "Homer," I said, "opened a new and boundless walk for his imagination, and created a world for himself in the invention of fable;" which he translates, "Homer creâ pour son usage un monde mouvant, en inventant la fable."

Madam Dacier justly wonders at this nonsense in me; and I, in the translator. As to what I meant by Homer's invention of fable, it is afterwards particularly distinguished from that extensive sense in which she took it, by these words. "If Homer was not the first who introduced the deities (as Herodotus imagines) into the religion of Greece; he seems the first who brought them into a system of machinery for poetry."

The other blunder she accuses me of is, the mistaking a passage in Aristotle, and she is pleas'd to send me back to this philosopher's treatise of Poetry, and to her preface on the Odyssey, for my better instruction. Now though I am saucy enough to think that one may sometimes differ from Aristotle without blundering, and though I am sure one may sometimes fall into an error by following him servilely; yet I own, that to quote any author for what he never said, is a blunder; (but, by the way, to correct an author for what he never said, is somewhat worse than a blunder.) My words were these: "As there is a greater variety of characters in the Iliad than in any other poem, so there is of speeches. Every thing in it has manners;" as Aristotle expresses it; that is, every thing is acted or spoken: very little passes in narration." She justly says, that "Every thing which is acted or spoken, has not necessarily manners merely because it is acted or spoken." Agreed: but I would ask the question, whether any thing can have manners which is neither acted nor spoken? If not, then the whole Iliad being almost spent in speech and action, almost every thing in it has manners; since Homer has been prov'd before, in a long paragraph of the preface, to have excelled in drawing characters and painting manners, and indeed his whole poem is one continued occasion of showing this bright part of his talent.

To speak fairly, it is impossible she could read even the translation, and take my sense so wrong as she represents it; but I was first translated ignorantly, and then read partially. My expression indeed was not quite exact; it should have been, "Every thing has manners, as Aristotle calls them." But such a fault methinks might have been spared, since if one was to look with that disposition she discovers towards me, even on her own excellent writings, one might find some mistakes which no context can redress; as where she makes Eustathius call Cratisthenes the Philiasian, Callisthenes the Physician². What a triumph might some slips of this sort have afforded to Homer's, here, and my enemies, from which she was only screen'd by their happy ignorance! How unlucky had it been, when she insulted Mr. de la Motte for omitting a material passage in the speech of Helen to Hector³, Iliad vi. if some champion for the moderns had by chance understood so much Greek, as to whisper him, that there was no such passage in Homer?

Our concern, zeal, and even jealousy, for our great author's honour were mutual, our endeavours to advance it were equal, and I have as often trembled for it in her hands, as she could in mine. It was one of the many reasons I had to wish the longer life of this lady, that I must certainly have regain'd her good opinion, in spite of all misrepresenting translators whatever. I could not have expected it on any other terms than being approv'd as great, if not as passionate, an admirer of Homer as herself. For that was the first condition of her favour and friendship; otherwise not one's taste alone, but one's morality had been corrupted, nor would any man's religion have been suspected, who did not implicitly believe in an author whose doctrine is so conformable to Holy Scripture. However, as different people have different ways of expressing their belief, some purely by public and general acts of worship, others by a reverend sort of reasoning and inquiry about the grounds of it; it is the same in admiration, some prove it by exclamations, others by respect. I have observ'd that the loudest huzzas given to a great man in triumph, proceed not from his friends but the rabble; and as I have fancied it the same with the rabble of critics, a desire to be distinguished from them has turn'd me to the more moderate, and, I hope, more rational method. Though I am a poet, I would not be an enthusiast; and though I am an Englishman, I would not be furiously of a party. I am far from thinking myself that genius, upon whom, at the end of these remarks, Madam Dacier congratulates my country: one capable of "correcting Homer, and consequently of reforming mankind, and amending this constitution." It was not to Great Britain this ought to have been apply'd, since our nation has one happiness for which she might have preferred it to her own, that, as much as we abound in other miserable misguided sects, we have at least none of the blasphemers of Homer. We stedfastly and unanimously believe, both his poem, and our constitution, to be the best that ever human wit invented: that the one is not more incapable of amendment than the other; and (old as they both are) we despise any French or Englishman whatever, who shall presume to retrench, to innovate, or to make the least alteration in either. Far therefore from the genius for which Madam Dacier mistook me, my whole desire is but to preserve the humble character of a faithful translator, and a quiet subject.

THE
WORKS OF VIRGIL.

TRANSLATED BY DRYDEN.

VERSES TO MR. DRYDEN.

TO

MR. DRYDEN,

ON HIS EXCELLENT TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL.

WHENEVER great Virgil's lofty verse I see,
The pompous scene charms my admiring eye:
There different beauties in perfection meet;
The thoughts as proper, as the numbers sweet:
And when wild fancy mounts a daring height,
Judgment steps in, and moderates her flight.
Wisely he manages his wealthy store,
Still says enough, and yet inspires still more:
For though the weighty sense be closely wrought,
The reader's left to improve the pleasing thought.

Hence we despair to see an English dross
Should e'er his nervous energy express;
For who could that in fetter'd rhyme enclose,
Which without loss can scarce be told in prose!

But you, great Sir, his manly genius raise;

And make your copy share an equal praise.

Oh how I see thee in soft ecstasies of love,
Renew those passions he alone could move!
Here Cupid's charms are with new art express'd,
And pale Elisa leaves her peaceful rest:
Leaves her Elysium, as if glad to live,
To love, and wish, to sigh, despair, and grieve,
And die again for him that would again deceive.

Nor does the mighty Trojan less appear
Than Mars himself amidst the storms of war.
Now his fierce eyes with double fury glow,
And a new dread attends th' impending blow:
The Daunian chiefs their eager rage abate,
And, though unwounded, seem to feel their fate.

Long the rude fury of an ignorant age,
With barbarous spite, profan'd his sacred page.
The heavy Dutchmen, with laborious toil,
Wrested his sense, and cramp'd his vigorous style;
No time, no pains, the drudging pedants spare;
But still his shoulders must the burden bear.

While through the mazes of their comments led,
We learn not what he writes, but what they read.
Yet, through these shades of undistinguish'd night
Appear'd some glimmering intervals of light;

Till mangled by a vile translating sect,
Like babes by witches in effigy ract;
Till Ogleby, mature in dulness, rose,
And Holborn doggrel, and low chiming prose,
His strength and beauty did at once depose.

But now the magic spell is at an end,
Since ev'n the dead in you hath found a friend;
You free the bard from rude oppressors' power,
And grace his verse with charms unknown before:

He, doubly thus oblig'd, must doubting stand,
Which chiefly should his gratitude command;
Whether should claim the tributes of his heart,
The patron's bounty, or the poet's art.

Alike with wonder and delight we view'd
The Roman genius in thy verse renew'd:
We saw thee raise soft Ovid's amorous fire,
And fit the tuneful Horace to thy lyre:
We saw new gall imbitter Juvenal's pen,
And crabbed Perseus made politely plain:
Virgil alone was thought too great a task;
What you could scarce perform, or we durst ask:
A task! which Waller's Muse could ne'er engage;
A task! too hard for Deaneham's stronger rage:
Sure of success they some slight sallies try'd,
But the fenc'd coast their bold attempts defy'd.
With fear their o'ermatch'd forces back they Quitted the province fate reserv'd for you. [drew,
In vain thus Phillip did the Persians storm;
A work his son was destin'd to perform.

"O had Roscommon liv'd to hail the day,
And sing loud Paeans through the crowded way;
When you in Roman majesty appear,
Which none know better, and none come so near!"
The happy author would with wonder see,
His rules were only prophecies of thee:
And were he now to give translators light,
He'd bid them only read thy work, and write.

For this great task our loud applause is due;
We own old favours, but must press for new:
Th' expecting world demands one labour more;
And thy lov'd Homer does thy aid implore,
To right his injur'd works, and set them free
From the lewd rhymes of groveling Ogleby.
Then shall his verse in grateful pomp appear,
Nor will his birth renew the ancient jar;
On those Greek cities we shall look with scorn,
And in our Britain think the poet born.

TO

MR. DRYDEN,

ON HIS TRANSLATION OF VIRGIL.

WE read, how dreams and visions heretofore
The prophet and the poet could inspire;
And make them in unusual rapture soar,
With rage divine, and with poetic fire.

O could I find it now;—would Virgil's shade
But for a while vouchsafe to bear the light;
To grace my numbers, and that Muse to aid,
Who sings the poet that has done him right.

It long has been this sacred author's fate,
To lie at every dull translator's will; (weight
Long, long his Muse has groan'd beneath the
Of mangling Ogleby's presumptuous quill.

Dryden, at last, in his defence arose;
The father now is righted by the son:
And while his Muse endeavours to disclose
That poet's beauties, she declares her own.

In your smooth, pompous numbers drest, each line,
Each thought, betrays such a majestic touch;
He could not, had he finish'd his design,
Have wish'd it better, or have done so much.

You, like his hero, though yourself were free,
And disentangled from the war of wit;
You, who secure might other dangers see,
And safe from all malicious censures sit.

Yet because sacred Virgil's noble Muse,
O'erlay'd by fools, was ready to expire:
To risk your fame again, you boldly chause,
Or to redeem, or perish with your sire.

Ev'n first and last, we owe him half to you,
For that his Eneids miss'd their threaten'd fate,
Was—that his friends by some prediction knew,
Hereafter, who correcting should translate.

But hold, my Muse, thy needless flight restrain,
Unless, like him, thou couldst a verse indite:
To think his faucey to describe is vain,
Since nothing can discover light, but light.

'Tis want of genius that does more deny:
'Tis fear my praise should make your glory less.
And therefore, like the modest painter, I
Must draw the veil, where I cannot express.

HENRY GRAHME.

TO MR. DRYDEN.

No undisputed monarch govern'd yet
With universal sway the realms of wit;
Nature could never such expense afford;
Each several province own'd a several lord.
A poet then had his poetic wife,
One Muse embrac'd, and married for his life.

By the stale thing his appetite was cloy'd,
His fancy lessen'd, and his fire destroy'd.
But Nature, grown extravagantly kind,
With all her treasures did adorn your mind.
The different powers were then united found,
And you wit's universal monarch crown'd.
Your mighty sway your great desert secures,
And every Muse and every Grace is yours,
To none confin'd, by turns you all enjoy,
Sated with this, you to another fly.
So sultan-like in your seraglio stand,
While wishing Muses wait for your command.
Thus no decay, no want of vigour find,
Sublime your fancy, boundless is your mind.
Not all the blasts of time can do you wrong;
Young, spite of age; in spite of weakness, strong.
Time, like Alcides, strikes you to the ground:
You, like Antæus, from each fall rebound.

H. ST. JOHN.

TO MR. DRYDEN,

ON HIS VIRGIL.

'Tis said that Phidias gave such living grace
To the carv'd image of a beauteous face,
That the cold marble might even seem to be
The life; and the true life, the imagery.

You pass'd that artist, sir, and all his power,
Making the best of Roman poets ours;
With such effect, we know not which to call
The imitation, which th' original.

What Virgil lent, you pay in equal weight,
The charming beauty of the coin no less;
And such the majesty of your impress,
You seem the very author you translate.

'Tis certain, were he now alive with us,
And did revolving destiny constrain
To dress his thoughts in English o'er again,
Himself could write no otherwise than thus.

His old eulogium never did appear
So true as now; Romans and Greeks, submit,
Something of late is in our language writ,
More nobly great than the fam'd Iliads were.

JA. WAIGHT.

WORKS OF VIRGIL.

TRANSLATED BY DRYDEN.

PASTORALS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE
HUGH LORD CLIFFORD,

BARON OF CHUDLEIGH.

MY LORD,

I HAVE found it not more difficult to translate Virgil, than to find such patrons as I desire for my translation. For though England is not wanting in a learned nobility, yet such are my unhappy circumstances, that they have confined me to a narrow choice. To the greater part, I have not the honour to be known; and to some of them I cannot show at present, by any public act, that grateful respect which I shall ever bear them in my heart. Yet I have no reason to complain of fortune, since, in the midst of that abundance I could not possibly have chosen better, than the worthy son of so illustrious a father. He was the patron of my manhood, when I flourished in the opinion of the world; though with small advantage to my fortune, till he awakened the remembrance of my royal master. He was that Pollio, or that Varus, who introduced me to Augustus: and though he soon dismissed himself from state-affairs, yet in the short time of his administration he shone so powerfully upon me, that, like the heat of a Russian summer, he ripened the fruits of poetry in a cold climate; and gave me wherewithal to subsist at least, in the long winter which succeeded. What I now offer to your lordship is the wretched remainder of a sickly age, worn out with study, and oppressed by fortune: without other support than the constancy and patience of a Christian. You, my lord, are yet in the flower of your youth, and may live to enjoy the benefits of the peace which is promised Europe. I can only hear of that blessing: for years, and, above all things, want of health, have shut me out from sharing in the happiness. The poets, who condemn their Tantalus to Hell, had added to his torments, if they had placed him in Elysium, which is the proper emblem of my condition. The fruit and the water may reach my lips, but cannot enter: and if they could, yet I want a palate as well as a digestion. But it is some kind of pleasure to me, to please those whom I respect. And I am not altogether out of hope, that these Pastorals of Virgil may give your lordship some delight, though made English by one, who scarce remembers that passion which inspired my author when he wrote them. These were his first essay in poetry, (if the Ceiras was not his:) and it was more excuseable in him to describe love when he was young, than for me to translate him when I am old. He died at the age of fifty-two, and I begin this work in my great climacteric. But having perhaps a better constitution than my author, I have wronged him less, considering my circumstances, than those who have attempted him before, either in our own, or any modern language. And though this version is not void of errors, yet it comforts me that the faults of others are not worth finding. Mine are neither gross nor frequent, in those Eclogues, wherein my master has raised himself above that humble style in which pastoral delights, and which I must confess is proper to the education and converse of shepherds: for he found the strength of his genius heretofore, and was even in his youth prelude to his Georgics, and his Aeneis. He could not forbear to try his wings, though his pinions were not hardened to maintain a long laborious flight. Yet sometimes they bore him to a pitch as lofty, as ever he was able to reach afterwards. But when he was admonished by his subject to descend, he came down gently circling in the air, and singing to the ground. Like a lark, melodious in her mounting, and continuing her song till she alights: still preparing for a higher flight at her next sally, and tuning her voice to better music. The fourth, the sixth, and the eighth Pastorals, are clear evidences of this truth. In the first he contains himself within his bounds; but addressing to Pollio, his great patron, and himself no vulgar poet, he no longer could restrain the freedom of his spirit, but began to assert his native character, which is sublimity. Putting himself under the conduct of the same Cumæan Sibyl, whom afterwards he gave for a guide to his Eneïas. It is true he was sensible of his own boldness; and we know it by the Paulo Majora, which begins his fourth Eclogue. He remembered, like young Maullius, that he was forbidden to engage; but what avails an express command to a youthful courage which presses victory in the attempt? Discouraged with success, he proceeds farther in the sixth, and invades the province of philosophy. And notwithstanding that Phœbus had forewarned him of singing of wars, as he there confesses, yet he presumed that the stars of nature was as free to him as to Læcretius, who at his age exploded it according to the principles of Epicurus. In his eighth Eclogue, he has innovated nothing; the former part of it being the complaint and despair of a forsaken lover: the latter a charm of an enchantress, to renew a lost affection. But the complaint perhaps contains some topics which are above the condition of his persons; and our author seems to have made his herdsmen somewhat too learned for their profession: the charms are also of the same nature; but both were copied from Theocritus, and had received the applause of former ages in their original. There is a kind of rusticity in all these pious verses; somewhat of a holiday shepherd strutting in his country bush. The like may be observed, both in the Pollio, and the Silenus; where the similitudes are drawn from the woods and meadows. They seem to me to represent our poet betwixt a farmer and a courtier, when he left Mantua for Rome, and dressed himself in his best habit to appear before his patron: somewhat too fine for the place from whence he came, and yet retaining part of its simplicity. In the ninth Pastoral he collects some beautiful passages, which were scattered in Theocritus, which he could not insert into any of his former Eclogues, and yet was unwilling they should be lost. In all the rest he is equal to his Sicilian master, and observes like him a just decorum, both of the subject and the persons. As particularly in the third Pastoral, where one of his shepherds describes a bowl, or mazer, curiously carved.

In medio duo signa: Conon, et quis fuit alter
Descripsit radio totidem qui gentibus orbem.

He remembers only the name of Conon, and forgets the other on set purpose (whether he means Anaximander or Eudoxus I dispute not); but he was certainly forgotten, to show his country swain was no great scholar.

After all, I must confess that the boorish dialect of Theocritus has a secret charm in it, which the Roman language cannot imitate, though Virgil has drawn it down as low as possibly he could: as in the Cujum Pecus, and some other words, for which he was so unjustly blamed by the bad critics of his age, who could not see the beauties of that Merum Rus, which the poet described in those expressions. But Theocritus may justly be preferred as the original, without injury to Virgil who modestly contents himself with the second place, and glories only in being the first who transplanted pastoral into his own country; and brought it there to beat as happily as the cherry-trees which Lucullus brought from Pontus.

Our own nation has produced a third poet in this kind, not inferior to the two former. For the Shepherd's Calendar of Spenser is not to be matched in any modern language. Not even by Tasso's Amyntas, which infinitely transcends Guarini's Pastor Fido, as having more of nature in it, and being almost wholly clear from the wretched affectation of learning. I will say nothing of the Piscatory Eclogues, because no modern Latin can bear criticism. It is no wonder that rolling down through so many barbarous ages, from the spring of Virgil, it bears along with it the filth and ordure of the Goths and Vandals. Neither will I mention Monsieur Fontenelle, the living glory of the French: It is enough for him to have excelled his master Lucian, without attempting to compare our miserable age with that of Virgil or Theocritus. Let me only add, for his reputation,

—Si Pergama dextra
Defendi possent, etiam hæc defensa fuissent.

But Spenser being master of our northern dialect, and skilled in Chaucer's English, has so exactly imitated the Doric of Theocritus, that his love is a perfect image of that passion which God infused into both sexes, before it was corrupted with the knowledge of arts, and the ceremonies of what we call good manners.

My lord, I know to whom I dedicate: and could not have been induced by any motive to put this part of Virgil, or any other into unlearned hands.

You have read him with pleasure, and I dare say, with admiration, in the Latin, of which you are a master. You have added to your natural endowments, which, without flattery, are eminent, the superstructures of study, and the knowledge of good authors. Courage, probity, and humanity are inherent in you. These virtues have ever been habitual to the ancient house of Cumberland, from whence you are descended, and of which our chronicles make so honourable mention in the long wars betwixt the rival families of York and Lancaster. Your forefathers have asserted the party which they chose till death, and died for its defence in the fields of battle. You have besides the fresh remembrance of your noble father; from whom you never can degenerate.

—Nec imbellem feroces
Progenerant aquilæ columbarum.

It being almost morally impossible for you to be other than you are by kind; I need neither praise nor incite your virtue. You are acquainted with the Roman history, and know without my information that patronage and clientship always descended from the fathers to the sons, and that the same plebeian houses had recourse to the same patrician line, which had formerly protected them; and followed their principles and fortunes to the last. So that I am your lordship's by descent; and part of your inheritance. And the natural inclination which I have to serve you, adds to your paternal right, for I was wholly yours from the first moment when I had the happiness and honour of being known to you. Be pleased therefore to accept the rudiments of Virgil's poetry: coarsely translated, I confess, but which yet retains some beauties of the author, which neither the barbarity of our language, nor my unskillfulness, could so much sully, but that they sometimes appear in the dim mirror which I hold before you. The subject is not unsuitable to your youth, which allows you yet to love, and is proper to your present scene of life. Rural recreations abroad, and books at home, are the innocent pleasures of a man who is early wise; and gives fortune no more hold of him, than of necessity he must. It is good, on some occasions, to think beforehand as little as we can; to enjoy as much of the present as will not endanger our futurity, and to provide ourselves with the virtuous's saddle, which will be sure to amble, when the world is upon the hardest trot. What I humbly offer to your lordship is of this nature. I wish it pleasant, and am sure it is innocent. May you ever continue your esteem for Virgil; and not lessen it, for the faults of his translator; who is, with all manner of respect and sense of gratitude,

my lord,
your lordship's most humble and
most obedient servant,
JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST PASTORAL;

OR,

TITYRUS AND MELIBŒUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

This occasion of the first pastoral was this. When Augustus had settled himself in the Roman empire, that he might reward his veteran troops for their past service, he distributed among them all the lands that lay about Cremona and Mantua: turning out the right owners for having sided with his enemies. Virgil was a sufferer among the rest; who afterwards recovered his estate by Mæcenas's intercession, and as an instance of his gratitude composed the following pastoral; where he sets out his own good fortune in the person of Tityrus, and the calamities of his Mantuan neighbours in the character of Melibœus.

MELIBŒUS.

BENEATH the shade which beechen boughs diffuse,
You, Tityrus, entertain your sylvan Muse:
Round the wide world in banishment we roam,
Forc'd from our pleasing fields and native home:
While stretch'd at ease you sing your happy loves;
And Amaryllis fills the shady groves.

TR. These blessings, friend, a deity bestow'd;
For never can I deem him less than God.
The tender firstlings of my woolly breed
Shall on his holy star often bleed.

He gave my kine to graze the flowery plain;
And to my pipe renew'd the rural strain.

MEL. I envy not your fortune, but admire,
That while the raging sword and wasteful fire
Destroy the wretched neighbourhood around,
No hostile arms approach your happy ground.
Far different is my fate: my feeble goats
With pains I drive from their forsaken cotes:
And this you see I scarcely drag along,
Who, yearning on the rocks, has left her young;
(The hope and promise of my failing fold.)
My loss by dire portents the gods foretold:
For had I not been blind, I might have seen
Yon riven oak, the fairest of the green,
And the hoarse raven, on the blasted bough,
By croaking from the left presag'd the coming blow.

But tell me, Tityrus, what heavenly power
Preserv'd your fortunes in that fatal hour?

TR. Fool that I was, I thought imperial Rome
Like Mantua, where on market-days we come,
And thither drive our tender lambs from home,

So kids and whelps their sires and dams express :
And so the great I measur'd by the less.
But country towns, compar'd with her, appear
Like shrubs when lofty cyresses are near.

MEL. What great occasion call'd you hence to Rome!
[slow to come:]

TR. Freedom, which came at length, though
Nor did my search of liberty begin,
Till my black hairs were chang'd upon my chin.
Nor Amaryllis would vouchsafe a look,
Till Galatea's meaner bonds I broke.
Till then a helpless, hopeless, homely swain,
I sought not freedom, nor aspir'd to gain :
Though many a victim from my folds was bought,
And many a cheese to country markets brought,
Yet all the little that I got, I spent,
And still return'd as empty as I went. [mourn:]

MEL. We stood amaz'd to see your mistress
Unknowing that she pin'd for your return :
We wonder'd why she kept her fruit so long,
For whom so late th' ungather'd apples hung ;
But now the wonder ceases, since I see
She kept them only, Tityrus, for thee.

For thee the bubbling springs appear'd to mourn,
And whispering pines made vows for thy return.

TR. What should I do? while here I was en-
No glimpse of godlike liberty remain'd ; [chain'd,
Nor could I hope in any place but there,
To find a god so present to my prayer.

There first the youth of heav'nly birth I view'd,
For whom our monthly victims are renew'd.
He heard my vows, and graciously decreed
My grounds to be restor'd, my former flocks to feed.

MEL. O fortunate old man! whose farm remains
For you sufficient, and requites your pains.
Though rushes overspread the neighbouring plains,
Though here the marshy grounds approach your
And there the soil a stony harvest yields, [fields,
Your teaming ewes shall no strange meadows try,
Nor fear a rot from tainted company.

Behold you bordering fence of sallow trees [bees :
Is fraught with flowers, the flowers are fraught with
The busy bees with a soft murmuring strain
Invite to gentle sleep the labouring swain.

While from the neighbouring rock, with rural songs
The pruner's voice the pleasing dream prolongs ;
Stockdoves and turtles tell their amorous pain,
And, from the lofty elms, of love complain.

TR. Th' inhabitants of seas and skies shall change,

And fish on shore, and stags in air shall range,
The banish'd Parthian dwell on Arar's brink,
And the blue German shall the Tigris drink :
Ere I, forsaking gratitude and truth,
Forget the figure of that godlike youth. [known,

MEL. But we must beg our bread in climes un-
Beneath the scorching or the freezing zone.
And some to far Oaxis shall be sold ;
Or try the Libyan heat, or Scythian cold.
The rest among the Britons be confin'd ;
A race of men from all the world disjoin'd.
O must the wretched exiles ever mourn,
Nor after length of rolling years return ?
Are we condemn'd by fate's unjust decree,
No more our houses and our homes to see ?

Or shall we mount again the rural throne,
And rule the country kingdoms, once our own !
Did we for these barbarians plant and sow,
On these, on these, our happy fields bestow ? [flow !
Good Heaven, what dire effects from civil discord

Now let me graft my pears, and prune the vine ;
The fruit is theirs, the labour only mine.
Farewel my pastures my paternal stock ;
My fruitful fields, and my more fruitful flock !
No more, my goats, shall I behold you climb
The steepy cliffs, or crop the flowery thyme !
No more extended in the grove below,
Shall see you browsing on the mountain's brow
The prickly shrubs ; and after, on the bare,
Lean down the deep abyss, and hang in air.
No more my sheep shall sip the morning dew ;
No more my sons shall please the rural crew :
Adieu, my tuneful pipe ! and all the world adieu !

TR. This night, at least, with me forget your care ;
Ch-snuts and curds and cream shall be your fare ;
The carpet-ground shall be with leaves o'erspread ;
And boughs shall weave a covering for your head.
For see you sunny hill the shade extends :
And curling smoke from cottages ascends.

THE SECOND PASTORAL ;

OR,

ALEXIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE commentators can by no means agree on the person of Alexis, but are all of opinion that some beautiful youth is meant by him, to whom Virgil here makes love in Corydon's language and simplicity. His way of courtship is wholly pastoral : he complains of the boy's coyness ; recommends himself for his beauty and skill in piping ; invites the youth into the country, where he promises him the diversions of the place, with a suitable present of nuts and apples : but when he finds nothing will prevail, he resolves to quit his troublesome armour, and betake himself again to his former business.

YOUNG Corydon, th' unhappy shepherd swain,
The fair Alexis lov'd, but lov'd in vain :
And underneath the beechen shade, alone,
Thus to the woods and mountains made his moan-
" Is this, unkind Alexis, my reward,
And must I die unpleas'd, and unheard ?
Now the green lizard in the grove is laid,
The sheep enjoy the coolness of the shade ;
And Thestylis wild thyme and garlic beats
For harvest hinds, o'erspent with toil and heats :
While in the scorching Sun I trace in vain
Thy flying footsteps o'er the burning plain,
The creaking locusts with my voice conspire,
They fry with heat, and I with fierce desire.
How much more easy was it to sustain
Proud Amaryllis and her haughty reign,
The scorns of young Menalcas, once my care,
Though he was black, and thou art heavenly fair.
Trust not too much to that enchanting face ;
Beauty's a charm, but soon the charm will pass :
White lilies lie neglected on the plain,
While dusky hyacinths for use remain.
My passion is thy scorn : nor wilt thou know
What wealth I have, what gifts I can bestow !

What stores my dairies and my folds contain ;
 A thousand lambs that wander on the plain :
 New milk that all the winter never fails,
 And all the summer overflows the pails :
 Amphion sung not sweeter to his herd,
 When summon'd stones the Theban turrets rear'd.
 Nor am I so deform'd ; for late I stood
 Upon the margin of the briny flood :
 The winds were still, and if the glass be true,
 With Daphnis I may vie, though judg'd by you.
 O leave the noisy town, O come and see
 Our country cots, and live content with me !
 To wound the flying deer, and from their cotes
 With me to drive a-field the browsing goats :
 To pipe and sing, and in our country strain
 To copy, or perhaps contend with Pan.
 Pan taught to join, with wax, unequal reeds,
 Pan loves the shepherds, and their flocks he feeds :
 Nor scorn the pipe ; Amyntas, to be taught,
 With all his kisses would my skill have bought.
 Of seven smooth joints a mellow pipe I have,
 Which with his dying breath Dametas gave :
 And said, ' This, Corydon, I leave to thee ;
 For only thou deserv'st it after me.'
 His eyes Amyntas durst not upward lift,
 For much he grudg'd the praise, but more the gift.
 Besides two kids that in the valley stray'd,
 I found by chance, and to my fold convey'd.
 They drain two bagging udders every day ;
 And these shall be companions of thy play.
 Both fleck'd with white, the true Arcadian strain,
 Which Thestylis had often begg'd in vain :
 And she shall have them, if again she sues,
 Since you the giver and the gift refuse.
 Come to my longing arms, my lovely care,
 And take the presents which the nymphs prepare.
 White lilies in full canisters they bring,
 With all the glories of the purple spring.
 The daughters of the flood have search'd the mead
 For violets pale, and cropp'd the poppies' head ;
 The short narcissus, and fair daffodil,
 Pansies to please the sight, and cassia sweet to
 And set soft hyacinths with iron-blue, [smell ;
 To shade marsh marigolds of shining hue.
 Some bound in order, others loosely strow'd,
 To dress thy bower, and trim thy new abode.
 Myself will search our planted grounds at home,
 For downy peaches and the glossy plum :
 And thrash the cheanuts in the neighbouring grove,
 Such as my Amaryllis us'd to love.
 The laurel and the myrtle sweets agree ;
 And both in nosegays shall be bound for thee.
 Ah, Corydon, ah poor unhappy swain,
 Alexis will thy homely gifts disdain :
 Nor, should'st thou offer all thy little store,
 Will rich lotus yield, but offer more.
 What have I done to name that wealthy swain,
 So powerful are his presents, mine so mean !
 The boar amidst my crystal streams I bring ;
 And southern winds to blast my flowery spring.
 Ah cruel creature, whom dost thou despise ?
 The gods to live in woods have left the skies.
 And godlike Paris in th' Idean grove,
 To Priam's wealth preferr'd Eone's love.
 In cities which she built, let Pallas reign ;
 Towers are for gods, but forests for the swain.
 The greedy lioness the wolf pursues,
 The wolf the kid, the wanton kid the browse :
 Alexis, thou art chas'd by Corydon ;
 All follow several games, and each his own.

See from afar the fields no longer smoke,
 The sweating steers, unharness'd from the yoke,
 Bring, as in triumph, back the crooked plough ;
 The shadows lengthen as the Sun goes low.
 Cool breezes now the raging heats remove ;
 Ah, cruel Heaven ! that made no cure for love !
 I wish for balmy sleep, but wish in vain :
 Love has no bounds in pleasure, or in pain.
 What frenzy, shepherd, has thy soul possess'd,
 Thy vineyard lies half prun'd, and half undress'd.
 Quench, Corydon, thy long unanswer'd fire :
 Mind what the common wants of life require :
 On willow twigs employ thy weaving care ;
 And find an easier love, though not so fair."

THE THIRD PASTORAL ;

OR,

PALEMÓN.

THE ARGUMENT.

DAMETAS and Menalcas, after some smart strokes of country raillery, resolve to try who has the most skill at a song ; and accordingly make their neighbour Palemón judge of their performances : who, after a full hearing of both parties, declares himself unfit for the decision of so weighty a controversy, and leaves the victory undetermined.

MENALCAS, DAMETAS, PALEMÓN.

MENALCAS.

Ho, swain, what shepherd owns those ragged sheep ?
 DAM. Ægon's they are, he gave them me to keep.

MEN. Unhappy sheep of an unhappy swain !
 While he Neera courts, but courts in vain,
 And fears that I the damsel shall obtain
 Thou, varlet, dost thy master's gains devour :
 Thou milk'st his ewes, and often twice an hour ;
 Of grass and fodder thou defraud'st the dams ;
 And of their mother's dugs, 'he starving lambs.

DAM. Good words, young catamite, at least to men :

We know who did your business, how, and when.
 And in what chapel too you play'd your prize ;
 And what the goats observ'd with leering eyes :
 The nymphs were kind, and laugh'd, and there your safety lies.

MEN. Yes, when I crop't the hedges of the leys ;
 Cut Micon's tender vines, and stole the stays.

DAM. Or rather, when beneath your ancient oak,
 The bow of Daphnis, and the shafts you broke :
 When the fair boy receiv'd the gift of right ;
 And, but for mischief, you had dy'd for spite.

MEN. What nonsense would the fool, thy master,
 prate,

When thou, his knave, canst talk at such a rate !
 Did I not see you, rascal, did I not ?
 When you lay snug to snap young Damon's goat ?
 His mongrel bark'd, I ran to his relief,
 And cry'd, " There, there he goes, stop, stop the Discover'd, and defeated of your prey, [thief !"
 You skulk'd behind the fence, and mesh'd away.

DAM. An honest man may freely take his own ;
 The goat was mine, by singing fairly won.

A solemn match was made; he lost the prize.
Ask Damon, ask if he the debt denies;
I think he dares not; if he does, he lies.

MEN. Thou sing with him, thou booby! never pipe

Was so prophan'd to touch that blubber'd lip:
Dunce at the best; in streets but scarce allow'd
To tickle, on thy straw, the stupid crowd.

DAM. To bring it to the trial, will you dare
Our pipes, our skill, our voices, to compare?
My brinded heifer to the stake I lay;
Two thriving calves she suckles twice a day:
And twice besides her beastings never fail
To store the dairy with a brimming pail.
Now back your singing with an equal stake.

MEN. That should be seen, if I had one to make.
You know too well I feed my father's flock:
What can I wager from the common stock?

A stepdame too I have, a curs'd she,
Who rules my henpecked sire, and orders me.
Both number twice a-day the milky dams;
At once she takes the tale of all the lambs.
But since you will be mad, and since you may
Suspect my courage, if I should not lay,
The pawn I proffer shall be full as good:
Two bowls I have, well turn'd, of beechen wood;
Both by divine Alcimedon were made;
To neither of them yet the lip is laid;
The ivy's stem, its fruit, its foliage, lark
In various shapes around the curious work.
Two figures on the sides emboss'd appear;
Conon, and, what's his name who made the sphere,
And show'd the seasons of the sliding year,
Instructed in his trade the labouring swain,
And when to reap, and when to sow the grain?

DAM. And I have two, to match your pair, at home;

The wood the same, from the same hand they come:
The kimbo handles seem with bearsfoot carv'd;
And never yet to table have been serv'd:
Where Orpheus on his lyre laments his love,
With beasts encompass'd, and a dancing grove:
But these, nor all the proffers you can make,
Are worth the heifer which I set to stake.

MEN. No more delays, vain boaster, but begin:
I prophesy beforehand I shall win.

Palæmon shall be judge how ill you rhyme:
I'll teach you how to brag another time.

DAM. Rhymer, come on, and do the worst you
I fear not you, nor yet a better man. [can
With silence, neighbour, and attention wait:
For 'tis a business of a high debate.

PAL. Sing then; the shade affords a proper place;
The trees are cloth'd with leaves, the fields with grass;

The blossoms blow; the birds on bushes sing;
And nature has accomplish'd all the spring.
The challenge to Dametas shall belong.

Menalcas shall sustain his under-song:
Each in his turn your tuneful numbers bring;
By turns the tuneful Muses love to sing.

DAM. From the great father of the gods above
My Muse begins; for all is full of Jove;
To Jove the care of Heaven and Earth belongs;
My flocks he blesses, and he loves my songs.

MEN. Me Phoebus loves; for he my Muse inspires;

And in her songs, the warmth he gave, requires.
For him the god of shepherds and their sheep,
My blushing hyacinths and my bays I keep.

DAM. My Phyllis me with pelted apples pierces,
Then tripping to the woods the wanton pies:
And wishes to be seen, before she flies.

MEN. But fair Amyntas comes unask'd to me,
And offers love; and sits upon my knee;
Not Delia to my dogs is known so well as he.

DAM. To the dear mistress of my lovesick mind,
Her swain a pretty present has design'd:
I saw two stockdoves billing, and ere long
Will take the nest, and hers shall be the young.

MEN. Ten ruddy wildings in the wood I found,
And stood on tiptoes, reaching from the ground;
I sent Amyntas all my present store;
And will, to-morrow, send as many more.

DAM. The lovely maid lay panting in my arms;
And all she said and did was full of charms.
Winds, on your wings to Heaven her accents bear!
Such words as Heaven alone is fit to hear.

MEN. Ah! what avails it me, my love's delight,
To call you mine, when absent from my sight!
I hold the nets, while you pursue the prey;
And must not share the dangers of the day.

DAM. I keep my birth-day: send my Phyllis
home;
At shearing-time, Iolas, you may come.

MEN. With Phyllis I am more in grace than you:
Her sorrow did my parting steps pursue:
"Adieu, my dear," she said, "a long adieu!"

DAM. The nightly wolf is baneful to the fold,
Storms to the wheat, to buds the bitter cold;
But from my frowning fair, more ills I find
Than from the wolves, and storms, and winter-
wind. [plain,

MEN. The kids with pleasure browse the bushy
The showers are grateful to the swelling grain:
To teeming ewes the sallow's tender tree;
But more than all the world my love to me.

DAM. Pollio my rural verse vouchsafes to read:
A heifer, Muses, for your patron, breed.

MEN. My Pollio writes himself; a bull he bred
With spurning heels, and with a butting head.

DAM. Who Pollio loves, and who his Muse admires,

Let Pollio's fortune crown his full desires.
Let myrrh instead of thorn his fences fill;
And showers of honey from his oaks distil.

MEN. Who hates not living Bavius, let him be (Dead Mævius) damn'd to love thy works and thee:
The same ill taste of sense would serve to join
Dog-foxes in the yoke, and shear the swine.

DAM. Ye boys, who pluck the flowers, and spoil
the spring,

Beware the secret snake that shoots a sting.

MEN. Graze not too near the banks, my jolly sheep,

The ground is false, the running streams are deep:
See, they have caught the father of the flock,
Who dries his fleece upon the neighbouring rock.

DAM. From rivers drive the kids, and sling your hook;

And I'll wash them in the shallow brook.

MEN. To fold, my flock; when milk is dry'd with
In vain the milkmaid tugs an empty teat. [heat,

DAM. How lank my bulls from plenteous pasture
come!

But love, that drains the herd, destroys the ground.

MEN. My flocks are free from love; yet look so
Their bones are barely cover'd with their skin. [thin,
What magic has bewitch'd the woolly dams,
And what ill eyes beheld the tender lambs?

MEN. Say, where the round of Heaven, which all contains,

To three short ells on Earth our sight restrains:
Tell that, and rise a Phœbus for thy pains.

MEN. Nay, tell me first, in what new region springs

A flower that bears inscrib'd the names of kings:
And thou shalt gain a present as divine
As Phœbus' self: for Phyllis shall be thine.

PAL. So nice a difference in your singing lies,
That both have won, or both deserv'd, the prize.
Rest equal happy both; and all who prove
The bitter sweets and pleasing pains of love.
Now dam the ditches, and the floods restrain:
Their moisture has already drench'd the plain.

THE FOURTH PASTORAL;

OR,

POLLIO.

THE ARGUMENT.

The poet celebrates the birth-day of Salomius, the son of Pollio, born in the consulship of his father, after the taking of Salomæ, a city in Dalmatia. Many of the verses are translated from one of the Sibyls, who prophesied of our Saviour's birth.

SICILIAN MUSE, begin a loftier strain!

Though lowly shrubs and trees, that shade the plain,
Delight not all; Sicilian Muse, prepare
To make the vocal woods deserve a consul's care.
The last great age, foretold by sacred rhymes,
Renews its finish'd course; Saturnian times
Roll round again, and mighty years, begun
From their first orb, in radiant circles run.
The base degenerate iron offspring ends;
A golden progeny from Heaven descends:
O chaste Lucina, speed the mother's pains;
And haste the glorious birth: thy own Apollo reigns!
The lovely boy, with his auspicious face!
Shall Pollio's consulship and triumph grace;
Majestic months set out with him to their appointed race.

The father banish'd virtue shall restore,
And crimes shall threat the guilty world no more.
The son shall lead the life of gods, and be
By gods and heroes seen, and gods and heroes see.
The jarring nations he in peace shall bind,
And with paternal virtues rule mankind.
Unbidden earth shall wreathing ivy bring,
And fragrant herbs, (the promises of spring)
As her first offerings to her infant king.
The goats, with strutting dugs, shall homeward speed,

And lowing herds secure from lions feed.
His cradle shall with rising flowers be crown'd;
The serpent's brood shall die: the sacred ground
Shall weeds and poisonous plants refuse to bear,
Each common bush shall Syrian roses wear.
But when heroic verse his youth shall raise,
And form it to hereditary praise;
Unlabour'd harvests shall the fields adorn,
And cluster'd grapes shall blush on every thorn.

The knotted oaks shall showers of honey weep,
And through the matted grass the liquid gold shall creep.

Yet of old fraud some footsteps shall remain,
The merchant still shall plough the deep for gain:
Great cities shall with walls be compass'd round;
And sharpen'd sbares shall vex the fruitful ground,
Another Typhis shall new seas explore,
Another Argos land the chiefs upon th' Iberian
Another Helen other wars create, [shore.
And great Achilles urge the Trojan fate.
But when to ripen'd manhood he shall grow,
The greedy sailor shall the seas forego;
No keel shall cut the waves for foreign ware;
For every soil shall every product bear.
The labouring hind his oxen shall disjoin,
No plough shall hurt the glebe, no pruninghook
the vine,

Nor wool shall in dissembled colours shine;
But the luxurious father of the fold,
With native purple, or unborrow'd gold,
Beneath his pompous fleece shall proudly sweat;
And under Tyrian robes the lamb shall bleat.
The Fates, when they this happy we have spun,
Shall bless the sacred clue, and bid it smoothly run.
Mature in years, to ready honours move,
O of celestial seed! O foster-son of Jove!
See, labouring Nature calls thee to sustain
The nodding frame of heaven, and earth, and main;
See, to their base restor'd, earth, seas, and air,
And joyful ages from behind, in crowding ranks appear, [long,

To sing thy praise, would Heaven my breath pro-
fusing spirits worthy such a song;
Not Thracian Orpheus should transcend my lays,
Nor Linus, crown'd with never-fading bays;
Though each his heavenly parent should inspire;
The Muse instruct the voice, and Phœbus tune the lyre.

Should Pan contend in verse, and thou my theme,
Arcadian judges should their god condemn.
Begin, auspicious boy, to cast about [out;
Thy infant eyes, and, with a smile, thy mother single
Thy mother well deserves that short delight,
The nauseous qualms of ten long months and travail to requite.

Then smile; the frowning infant's doom is read,
No god shall crown the board, nor goddess bless the bed.

THE FIFTH PASTORAL;

OR,

DAPHNIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Morsus and Menalcas, two very expert shepherds at a song, begin one by consent to the memory of Daphnis; who is supposed, by the best critics, to represent Julius Cæsar. Morsus laments his death, Menalcas proclaims his divinity: the whole eclogue consisting of an elegy and an apotheosis.

MENALCAS.

SINCE on the downs our flocks together feed,
And since my voice can match your tansel read,

Why sit we not beneath the grateful shade,
Which hazles, intermix'd with elms, have made?
MORS. Whether you please that sylvan scene to take,

Where whistling winds uncertain shadows make:
Or will you to the cooler cave succeed,
Whose mouth the curling vines have overspread?

MEN. Your merit and your years command the Amyntas only rivals you in voice. [choice:
MORS. What will not that presuming shepherd dare,

Who thinks his voice with Phœbus may compare?
MEN. Begin you first; if either Alcon's praise,
Or dying Phyllis, have inspir'd your lays:

If her you mourn, or Codrus you commend,
Begin, and Tityrus your flock shall tend.

MORS. Or shall I rather the sad verse repeat,
Which on the beech's bark I lately writ:
I writ, and sung betwixt; now bring the swain
Whose voice you boast, and let him try the strain.

MEN. Such as the shrub to the tall olive shows,
Or the pale fallow to the blushing rose;
Such is his voice, if I can judge aright,
Compar'd to thine, in sweetness and in height.

MORS. No more, but sit and hear the promis'd lay,
The gloomy grotto makes a doubtful day.
The nymphs about the breathless body wait
Of Daphnis, and lament his cruel fate.

The trees and floods were witness to their tears:
At length the rumour reach'd his mother's ears.

The wretched parent, with a pious haste,
Came running, and his lifeless limbs embrac'd.
She sigh'd, she sobb'd, and, furious with despair,
She rent her garments, and she tore her hair:
Accusing all the gods, and every star.

The swains forgot their sheep, nor near the brink
Of running waters brought their herds to drink.

The thirsty cattle, of themselves, abstain'd
From water, and their grassy fare disdain'd.

The death of Daphnis woods and hills deplore,
They cast the sound to Libya's desert shore;

The Libyan lions hear, and hearing roar.
Fierce tigers Daphnis taught the yoke to bear;

And first with curling ivy dress'd the spear;
Daphnis did rites to Bacchus first ordain;

And holy revels for his reeling train.
As vines the trees, as grapes the vines adorn,

As bulls the herds, and fields the yellow corn:
So bright a splendour, so divine a grace,

The glorious Daphnis cast on his illustrious race.
When envious fate the godlike Daphnis took,

Our guardian gods the fields and plains forsook:
Pales no longer swell'd the teeming graiu,

Nor Phœbus fed his oxen on the plain;
No fruitful crop the sickly fields return;

But oats and darnel choke the rising corn.
And where the vales with violets once were crown'd,

Now knotty burrs and thorns disgrace the ground.
Come, shepherds, come, and strow with leaves the

Such funeral rites your Daphnis did ordain. [plain;
With cypress boughs the crystal fountains hide,

And softly let the running waters glide,
A lasting monument to Daphnis raise,

With this inscription to record his praise:
"Daphnis, the field's delight, the shepherd's love,

Renown'd on Earth, and deify'd above,
Whose flock excell'd the fairest on the plains,

But less than he himself surpass'd the swains."

MEN. O heavenly poet! such thy verse appears,
So sweet, so charming, to my ravish'd ears,

As to the weary swain, with cares oppress,
Beneath the sylvan shade, refreshing rest:
As to the ferv'ish traveller, when first
He finds a crystal stream to quench his thirst.

In singing, as in piping, you excel;
And scarce your master could perform so well.

O fortunate young man! at least your lays
Are next to his, and claim the second praise.

Such as they are, my rural songs I join,
To raise our Daphnis to the powers divine;

For Daphnis was so good to love whate'er was mine.
MORS. How is my soul with such a promise rais'd!

For both the boy was worthy to be prais'd,
And Stimichon has often made me long

To hear, like him, so soft, so sweet a song.
MEN. Daphnis, the guest of Heaven, with wondering eyes,

Views in the milky way the starry skies.

And far beneath him, from the shining sphere,
Beholds the moving clouds, and rolling year.

For this, with cheerful cries the woods resound;
The purple spring arrays the various ground;

The nymphs and shepherds dance; and Pan himself is crown'd.

The wolf no longer prowls for nightly spoils,
Nor birds the springes fear, nor stags the toils:

For Daphnis reigns above, and deals from thence
His mother's milder beams and peaceful influence.

The mountain-tops unshorn, the rocks rejoice;
The lowly shrubs partake of human voice.

Assenting Nature, with a gracious nod,
Proclaims him, and salutes the new-admitted god.

Be still propitious, ever good to thine;
Behold four hallow'd altars we design;

And two to thee, and two to Phœbus rise;
On both are offer'd annual sacrifice.

The holy priests, at each returning year,
Two bowls of milk and two of oil shall bear;

And I myself the guests with friendly bowls will cheer.

Two goblets will I crown with sparkling wine,
The generous vintage of the Chian vine;

These will I pour to thee, and make the nectar
In winter shall the genial feast be made [thine

Before the fire; by summer in the shade.
Dæmetas shall perform the rites divine:

And Lyctian Ægon in the song shall join.
Alphesibeus, tripping, shall advance;

And mimic satyrs in his antic dance.
When to the nymphs our annual rites we pay,

And when our fields with victims we survey:
While savage boars delight in shady woods,

And finny fish inhabit in the floods;
While bees on thyme, and locusts feed on dew,

Thy grateful swains these honours shall renew.
Such honours as we pay to powers divine,

To Bacchus and to Ceres, shall be thine.
Such annual honours shall be giv'n, and thou

Shalt bear, and shalt condemn thy suppliants to their vow. [find!

MORS. What present worth thy verse can Mopsus
Not the soft whispers of the southern wind,

That play thro' trembling trees, delight me more;
Nor murmuring billows on the sounding shore;

Nor winding streams, that through the valley glide,
And the scarce cover'd pebbles gently chide.

Receive you first this tuneful pipe; the same
That play'd my Corydon's unhappy flame.

The same that sung Nessra's conquering eyes;
And, had the judge been just, had won the prize.

NOTE. Accept from me this sheep-hook, in exchange,

The handle brass, the knobs in equal range;
Antigenes with kisses often try'd
To beg this present in his beauty's pride;
When youth and love are hard to be deny'd.
But what I could refuse to his request,
Is yours unask'd, for you deserve it best.

THE SIXTH PASTORAL;

OR,

SILENUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Two young shepherds, Chromis and Mnasyllus, having been often promised a song by Silenus, chance to catch him asleep in this pastoral; where they bind him hand and foot, and then claim his promise. Silenus, finding they would be put off no longer, begins his song, in which he describes the formation of the universe, and the original of animals, according to the Epicurean philosophy; and then runs through the most surprising transformations which have happened in Nature since her birth. This pastoral was designed as a compliment to Syro the Epicurean, who instructed Virgil and Varus in the principles of that philosophy. Silenus acts as tutor, Chromis and Mnasyllus as the two pupils.

I first transferr'd to Rome Sicilian strains:
Nor blush'd the Doric Muse to dwell on Mantuan plains.

But when I try'd her tender voice, too young,
And fighting kings, and bloody battles, sung;
Apollo check'd my pride: and bade me feed
My fattening flocks, nor dare beyond the reed.
Admonish'd thus, while every pen prepares
To write thy praises, Varus, and thy wars,
My pastoral Muse her humble tribute brings;
Ah! yet not wholly uninspir'd she sings.
For all who read, and, reading, not disdain
These rural poems, and their lowly strain,
The name of Varus, oft inscrib'd shall see,
In every grove, and every vocal tree;
And all the sylvan reign shall sing of thee,
Thy name, to Phœbus and the Muses known,
Shall in the front of every page be shown;
For he who sings thy praise, secures his own.
Proceed, my Muse: Two Satyrs, on the ground,
Stretch'd at his ease, their sire Silenus found.
Dro' d with his fumes, and heavy with his load,
They found him snoring in his dark abode;
And seiz'd with youthful arms the drunken god.
His rosy wreath was dropt not long before,
Borne by the tide of wine, and floating on the floor.
His empty cans, with ears half worn away,
Was hung on high, to boast the triumph of the day.
Invaded thus, for want of better bands,
His garland they unstung, and bind his hands:
For, by the fraudulent god deluded long,
They now resolve to have their promis'd song.
Egle came in, to make their party good;
The fairest Nais of the neighbouring flood,

And, while he stares around, with stupid eyes,
His brows with berries, and his temples, dyes.
He finds the fraud, and, with a smile, demands
On what design the boys had bound his hands
'Loose me!' he cry'd; "'twas impudence to find
A sleeping god, 'tis sacrilege to bind.
To you the promis'd poem I will pay;
The nymph shall be rewarded in her way."
He rais'd his voice; and soon a numerous throng
Of tripping Satyrs crowd'd to the song;
And sylvan Fauns, and savage beasts, advanced,
And nodding forests to the numbers danced.
Not by Hæmonian hills the Thracian bard,
Nor awful Phœbus was on Pindus heard,
With deeper silence, or with more regard.
He sung the secret secrets of Nature's frame;
How seas, and earth and air, and active flame,
Fell through the mighty void, and in their fall
Were blindly gather'd in this goodly ball.
The tender soil then stiffening by degrees,
Shut from the boundless earth, the bounding seas.
Then earth and ocean various forms disclose;
And a new sun to the new world arose.
And mists, condens'd to clouds, obscure the sky;
And clouds, dissolv'd, the thirsty ground supply.
The rising trees the lofty mountains grace:
The lofty mountains feed the savage race,
Yet few, and strangers in th' unpeopled place.
From hence the birth of man the song pursued,
Ah! how the world was lost, and how renew'd.
The reign of Saturn, and the golden age;
Prometheus' theft, and Jove's avenging rage.
The cries of Argonauts for Hylas drown'd;
With whose repeated name the shores resound.
Then mourns the madness of the Cretan queen:
Happy for her, if herds had never been.
What fury, wretched woman, seiz'd thy breast?
The maids of Argos (though with rage possess'd,
Their imitated lowings fill'd the grove)
Yet shunn'd the guilt of thy preposterous love.
Nor sought the youthful husband of the herd,
Though labouring yokes on their own necks they fear'd; [heads rear'd.
And felt for budding horns on their smooth fore-
Ah, wretched queen! you range the pathless wood,
While on a flowery bank he chews the cud:
Or sleeps in shades, or through the forest rovs;
And roars with anguish for his absent loves.
Ye nymphs, with toils his forest-walk surround,
And trace his wandering footsteps on the ground.
But ah! perhaps my passion he disdains,
And courts the milky mothers of the plains.
We search th' ungrateful fugitive abroad;
While they at home sustain his happy load,
He sung the lover's fraud; the longing maid,
With golden fruit, like all the sex, betray'd:
The sister's mourning for the brother's loss;
Their bodies hid in barks, and farr'd with moss.
How each a rising slder now appears:
And o'er the Po darts her gummy tears.
Then sung, how Gallus, by a Muse's hand,
Was led and welcom'd to the sacred strand.
The senate, rising to salute their guest;
And Linus thus their gratitude express'd:
"Receive this present, by the Muses made;
The pipe on which th' Ascrean pastor play'd;
With which of old he charm'd the savage train,
And call'd the mountain ashes to the plain.
Sing thou on this, thy Phœbus; and the wood
Where once his fans of Parian marble stood.

On this his ancient oracles rehearse,
 And with new numbers grace the god of verse.
 Why should I sing the double Scylla's fate,
 The first by love transform'd, the last by hate.
 A beautiful maid above, but magic arts,
 With barking dogs deform'd her nether parts:
 What vengeance on the passing fleet she pour'd,
 The master frighted, and the mates devour'd,
 Then ravish'd Philomel the song express'd;
 The crime reveal'd; the sisters' cruel feast:
 And how in fields the lapwing Tereus reigns;
 The warbling nightingale in woods complains.
 While Progne makes on chimney-tops her moan;
 And hovers o'er the palace once her own.
 Whatever songs besides, the Delphian god
 Had taught the laurels, and the Spartan food,
 Silenus sung: the vales his voice rebound,
 And carry to the skies the sacred sound.
 And now the setting Sun had warn'd the swain
 To call his counted cattle from the plain:
 Yet still th' unwear'd sire pursues the tuneful
 strain,
 Till unperceiv'd the Heavens with stars were hung:
 And sudden night surpris'd the yet unfinished song.

THE SEVENTH PASTORAL;

OR,

MELIBŒUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

MELIBŒUS here gives us the relation of a sharp poetical contest between Thyrsis and Corydon; at which he himself and Daphnis were present: who both declared for Corydon.

BENEATH a holm, repair'd two jolly swains;
 Their sheep and goats together graz'd the plains;
 Both young Arcadians, both alike inspir'd
 To sing, and answer as the song requir'd.
 Daphnis, as umpire, took the middle seat;
 And fortune thither led my weary feet.
 For while I fenc'd my myrtles from the cold,
 The father of my flock had wander'd from the fold,
 Of Daphnis I inquir'd; he, smiling, said,
 "Dismiss your fear," and pointed where he fed.
 "And, if no greater cares disturb your mind,
 Sit here with us, in covert of the wind.
 Your lowing heifers, of their own accord,
 At watering time, will seek the neighbouring ford.
 Here wanton Mincius winds along the meads,
 And shades his happy banks with bending reeds:
 And see from yon old oak, that mates the skies,
 How black the clouds of swarming bees arise."
 What should I do! nor was Alcippe nigh,
 Nor absent Phyllis could my care supply,
 To house, and feed by hand, my weaning lambs,
 And drain the strutting udders of their dams?
 Great was the strife betwixt the singing swains:
 And I prefer'd my pleasure to my gains.
 Alternate rhyme the ready champions chose:
 These Corydon rehears'd, and Thyrsis those.
 COR. Ye Muses, ever fair, and ever young,
 Assist my numbers, and inspire my song.

With all my Codrus O inspire my breast,
 For Codrus, after Phœbus, sings the best,
 Or if my wishes have presum'd too high,
 And stretch'd their bounds beyond mortality,
 The praise of artful numbers I resign:
 And hang my pipe upon the sacred pine.
 ΤΑΥΡΑ. Arcadian swains, your youthful poet crow
 With ivy wreaths: though surly Codrus frown,
 Or if he blast my Muse with envious praise,
 Then fence my brows with amulets of bays:
 Lest his ill arts, or his malicious tongue,
 Should poison or bewitch my growing song.
 COR. These branches of a stag, this tanky bear,
 (The first essay of arms untry'd before)
 Young Mycon offers, Delia, to thy shrine;
 But speed his hunting with thy power divine.
 Thy statue then of Parian stone shall stand;
 Thy legs in buskins with a purple band.
 ΤΑΥΡΑ. This bowl of milk, these cakes, (our country fare)

For thee, Priapus, yearly we prepare,
 Because a little garden is thy care.
 But if the falling lambs increase my fold,
 Thy marble statue shall be turn'd to gold.
 COR. Fair Galatea, with thy silver feet,
 O, whiter than the swan, and more than Fybia
 Tall as a poplar, taper as the bole, sweet;
 Come, charm thy shepherd, and restore m' soul;
 Come when my lated sheep at night return;
 And crown the silent hours, and stop the ro' y morn.
 ΤΑΥΡΑ. May I become as subject in thy sight,
 As seaweed on the shore, and black as night:
 Rough as a bur, desert'd like h' → aw
 Sardinian herbage to contract his jaws;
 Such and so monstrous let thy swain appear,
 If one day's absence looks not like a year.
 Hence from the field, for shame; the flock deserves
 No better feeding, while the shepherd starves.
 COR. Ye mossy springs, inviting easy sleep,
 Ye trees, whose leafy shades those mossy fountains
 keep,

Defend my flock; the summer heats are near,
 And blossoms on the swelling vines appear.
 ΤΑΥΡΑ. With happy fires our cheerful hearth is
 crown'd;
 And firs for torches in the woods abound:
 We fear not more the winds, and wintry cold,
 Than streams the banks, or wolves the bleating fold.
 COR. Our woods with juniper and chesnuts
 crown'd,
 With falling fruits and berries paint the ground;
 And lavish Nature laughs, and strows her stores.
 But if Alexis from our mountains fly, [around.
 Ev'n running rivers leave their channels dry.
 ΤΑΥΡΑ. Parch'd are the plains, and frying is the field,
 Nor withering vines their juicy vintage yield.
 But if returning Phyllis bless the plain,
 The grass revives; the woods are green again;
 And Jove descends in showers of kindly rain.
 COR. The poplar is by great Alcides worn;
 The brows of Phœbus his own bays adorn;
 The branching vine the jolly Bacchus loves;
 The Cyprian queen delights in myrtle groves.
 With hazle Phyllis crowns her flowing hair;
 And while she loves that common wreath to wear,
 Nor bays, nor myrtle boughs, with hazle shall compare.

ΤΑΥΡΑ. The towering ash is fairest in the woods;
 In gardens pines, and poplars by the floods:

But if my Lycidas will ease my pains,
And often visit our forsaken plains,
To him the towering ash shall yield in woods ;
In gardens pines, and poplars by the floods.

MSL. These rhymes I did to memory commend,
When vanquish'd Thyris did in vain contend ;
Since when 'tis Corydon among the swains,
Young Corydon without a rival reigns,

THE EIGHTH PASTORAL ;
OR,
PHARMACUTRIA.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS pastoral contains the songs of Damon and Alphesiborus. The first of them bewails the loss of his mistress, and repines at the success of his rival Mopous. The other repeats the charms of some enchastrum, who endeavoured, by her spells and magic, to make Daphnis in love with her.

THE mournful Muse of two despairing swains,
The love rejected, and the lover's pains,
To which the savage lynxes listening stood,
The rivers stood on heaps, and stopp'd the running flood :

The hungry herd their needful food refuse ;
Of two despairing swains I sing the mournful Muse.

Great Pollio, thou for whom thy Rome prepares
The ready triumph of thy finish'd wars,
Whether Timavus or th' Illyrian coast,
Whatever land or sea thy presence boast ;
Is there an hour in fate reserv'd for me,
To sing thy deeds in numbers worthy thee ?
In numbers like to thine, could I rehearse
Thy lofty tragic scenes, thy labour'd verse ;
The world another Sophocles in thee,
Another Homer should behold in me :
Amidst thy laurels let this ivy twine,
Thine was my earliest Muse ; my latest shall be thine. draw ;

Search from the world the shades of night with-
Scarce were the flocks refresh'd with morning dew,
When Damon, stretch'd beneath an olive shade,
And wildly staring upwards, thus inveigh'd
Against the conscious gods, and curs'd the cruel maid :

" Star of the morning, why dost thou delay ?
Come, Lucifer, drive on the lagging day ?
While I my Nisa's perjur'd faith deplore ;
Witness, ye powers, by whom she falsely swore !
The gods, alas ! are witnesses in vain ;
Yet shall my dying breath to Heaven complain.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.

" The pines of Mænalus, the vocal grove,
Are ever full of verse, and full of love :
They hear the hinds, they hear their god complain ;
Who suffer not the reeds to rise in vain.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.

" Mopous triumphs ; he weds the willing fair :
When such is Nisa's choice, what lover can despair !
Now griffons join with mares ; another age
Shall see the bound and hind their thirst assuage

Promiscuous at the spring : prepare the lights,
O Mopous ! and perform the bridal rites.

Scatter thy nuts among the scrambling boys :
Thine is the night, and thine the nuptial joys.
For thee the Sun declines : O happy swain !

Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.
" O, Nisa ! justly to thy choice condemn'd !

Whom hast thou taken, whom hast thou condemn'd ;
For him, thou hast refus'd my browsing herd,
Scorn'd my thick eyebrows, and my shaggy beard.

Unhappy Damon sighs, and sings in vain :
While Nisa thinks no god regards a lover's pain.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.

" I view'd thee first, how fatal was the view !
And led thee where the ruddy wildings grew
High on the planted hedge, and wet with morning
dew.

Then scarce the bending branches I could win,
The callow down began to clothe my chin ;
I saw, I perish'd ; yet indulg'd my pain :

Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.
" I know thee, Love ; in deserts thou wert bred ;
And at the dugs of savage tigers fed :

Alien of birth, usurper of the plains : [strains.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian

" Relentless love the cruel mother led,
The blood of her unhappy babes to shed :
Love lent the sword ; the mother struck the blow ;
Inhuman she ; but more unhappy thou.

Alien of birth, usurper of the plains : [strains.
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian

" Old dotting Nature, change thy course anew :
And let the trembling lamb the wolf pursue :
Let oaks now glitter with Hesperian fruit,
And purple daffodils from alder shoot.

Fat amber let the tamarisk distil :
And hooting owls contend with swans in skill.
Hoarse Tityrus strive with Orpheus in the woods ;
And challenge fam'd Arion on the floods.

Or, oh ! let Nature cease, and chaos reign :
Begin with me, my flute, the sweet Mænalian strain.

" Let earth be sea ; and let the whelming tide
The lifeless limbs of luckless Damon hide :
Farewell, ye secret woods and shady groves,
Haunts of my youth, and conscious of my loves !

From you high cliff I plunge into the main ;
Take the last present of thy dying swain :

And cease, my silent flute, the sweet Mænalian
strain."

Now take your turns, ye Muses, to rehearse
His friend's complaints ; and mighty magic verse.

" Bring running water ; bind those altars round
With fillets ; and with vervain strow the ground :
Make fat with frankincense the sacred fires,
To re-inflame my Daphnis with desires,

'Tis done, we want but verse. Restore, my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

" Pale Phebe, drawn by verse, from Heaven descends ;
And Circe chang'd with charms Ulysses' friends.

Verse breaks the ground, and penetrates the brake,
And in the winding cavern splits the snake.
Verse fires the frozen veins : restore, my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

" Around his waxen image first I wind
Three woollen fillets of three colours join'd :
Thrice bind our throats with thrice-devoted head,
Which round the sacred altar thrice is led.

Unequal numbers please the gods : my charms,
Restore my Daphnis to my longing arms.

"Knit with three knots the fillets, knit them straight;

Then say, 'These knots to love I consecrate.'
Haste, Amaryllis, haste; restore, my charms,
My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

"As fire this figure hardens, made of clay;
And this of wax with fire consumes away;
Such let the soul of cruel Daphnis be;
Hard to the rest of women; soft to me.

Crumble the sacred mole of salt and corn,
Next in the fire the bays with brimstone burn.
And while it crackles in the sulphur, say, [away.]
'This, I for Daphnis burn; thus Daphnis burn
This laurel is his fate: restore, my charms,
My lovely Daphnis to my longing arms.

"As when the raging heifer, through the grove,
Stung with desire, pursues her wandering love;
Faint at the last, she seeks the weedy pools
To quench her thirst, and on the rushes rolls:
Careless of night, unmindful to return;
Such fruitless fires perfidious Daphnis burn.
While I so scorn his love; restore, my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

"These garments once were his; and left to me;
The pledges of his promis'd loyalty:
Which underneath my threshold I bestow;
These pawns, O sacred Earth! to me my Daphnis
As these were his, so mine is he: my charms, [owe.
Restore their lingering lord to my deluded arms.

"These poisonous plants, for a magic use design'd,
(The noblest and the best of all the beneful kind,)
Old Mæris brought me from the Pontic strand,
And cull'd the mischief of a bounteous land.
Smear'd with these powerful juices, on the plain
He howls a wolf among the hungry train:
And oft the mighty necromancer boasts,
With these, to call from tombs the stalking ghosts;
And from the roots to tear the standing corn,
Which, whirl'd aloft, to distant fields is borne.
Such is the strength of spells: restore, my charms,
My lingering Daphnis to my longing arms.

"Bear out these ashes; cast them in the brook;
Cast backwards o'er your head, nor turn your look:
Since neither gods, nor godlike verse can move,
Break out, ye smother'd fires, and kindle smother'd love.

Exert your utmost power, my lingering charms,
And force my Daphnis to my longing arms.

"See, while my last endeavours I delay,
The waking ashes rise, and round our altars play:
Run to the threshold, Amaryllis; bark,
Our Hylas opens, and begins to bark.
Good Heaven! may lovers what they wish believe;
Or dream their wishes, and these dreams deceive!
No more, my Daphnis comes; no more, my
charms;

'He comes, he runs, he leaps, to my desiring arms.'

THE NINTH PASTORAL;

OR,

LYCIDAS AND MÆRIS.

THE ARGUMENT.

When Virgil, by the favour of Augustus, had recovered his patrimony near Mantua, and went in hope to take possession, he was in danger to be slain by Arius the centurion, to whom those lands were assigned by the emperor, in reward of his service against Brutus and Cassius. This pastoral therefore is filled with complaints of his hard usage; and the persons introduced, are the bailiff of Virgil, Mæris, and his friend Lycidas.

LYCIDAS.

Ho, Mæris! whither on thy way so fast?
This leads to town.

MÆR. O Lycidas, at least
The time is come I never thought to see,
(Strange revolution for my farm and me)
When the grim captain, in a surly tone,
Cries out, "Pack up, ye rascals! and be gone."
Kick'd out, we set the best face on 't we cou'd,
And these two kids t' a pease his angry mood
I bear, of which the Furies give him good!

LYC. Your country friends were told another tale:
That from the sloping mountain to the vale,
And dodder'd oak, and all the banks along,
Menalcas sav'd his fortune with a song.

MÆR. Such was the news, indeed; but songs and Prevail as much in these hard iron times, [rhymes
As would a plump of trembling fowl, that rise
Against an eagle soaring from the skies.

And had not Phœbus warn'd me by the croak
Of an old raven, from a hollow oak,
To shun debate, Menalcas had been slain,
And Mæris not surviv'd him, to complain [indeed
LYC. Now Heaven defend! could barbarous rage
The brutal son of Mars t' insult the sacred Muse!
Who then should sing the nymphs, or who rehearse
The waters gliding in a smoother verse:!

Or Amaryllis praise, that heavenly lay,
That shorten'd, as we went, our tedious way.
O Tityrus, tend my herd, and see them fed;
To morning pastures, evening-waters, led:
And ware the Libyan rigel's butting head.

MÆR. Or what unfinish'd be to Varus read;
Thy name, O Varus, (if the kinder powers
Preserve our plains, and shield the Mantuan towers, Obnoxious by Cremona's neighbouring crime.)
The wings of swans, and stronger-pinion'd rhyme,
Shall raise aloft, and soaring bear above
Th' immortal gift of gratitude to Jove.

LYC. Sing on, sing on, for I can ne'er be cloy'd,
So may thy swarms the baleful yew avoid:
So may thy cows their burden'd bags distend,
And trees to goats their willing branches bend.
Mean as I am, yet have the Muses made
Me free, a member of the tuneful trade:
At least, the shepherds seem to like my lays,
But I discern their flattery from their praise:
I nor to Cinna's ears, nor Varus' dare aspire;
But gabble like a goose, amidst the swan-like quire.

MÆR. 'Tis what I have been conning in my
Nor are the verses of a vulgar kind. [mind:
C. me, Galatea, come, the seas forsake;
What pleasures can the tides with their hoarse murmurs make?

See, on the shore inhabits purple sp'ng,
Where nightingales their lovesick ditty sing;
See, meads with purling streams, with flowers the
ground,

The grottoes cool, with shady poplars crown'd,
And creeping vines on arbours weav'd around.

Come then, and leave the waves' tumultuous roar,
Let the wild surges vainly beat the shore.

lvc. Or that sweet song I heard with such delight:
The same you sung alone one starry night;
The tune I still retain, but not the words.

mzx. Why, Daphnis, dost thou search in old
To know the seasons when the stars arise?
records,

See Cæsar's lamp is lighted in the skies:
The star, whose rays the blushing grapes adorn,
And swell the kindly ripening ears of corn.
Under this influence graft the tender shoot;
Thy children's children shall enjoy the fruit.
The rest I have forgot, for cares and time
Change all things, and untane my soul to rhyme:
I could have once sung down a summer's sun,
But now the chime of poetry is done.
My voice grows hoarse; I feel the notes decay,
As if the wolves had seen me first to day.
But these, and more than I to mind can bring,
Mænalas has not yet forgot to sing.

lvc. Thy faint excuses but inflame me more;
And now the waves roll silent to the shore.
Humbt winds the topmost branches scarcely bend,
As if thy tuneful song they did attend:
Already we have half our way o'ercome;
Far off I can discern Bianor's tomb; [bow'r
Here, where the labourer's hands have form'd a
Of wreathing trees, in singing waste an hour.
Rest here thy weary limbs, thy kids lay down,
We've day before us yet, to reach the town:
Or if, ere night, the gathering clouds we fear,
A song will help the beating storm to bear.
And that thou may'st not be too late abroad,
Singing, I'll ease thy shoulders of thy load.
mzx. Cease to request me; let us mind our
Another song requires another day. [way;
When good Mænalas comes, if he rejoice,
And find a friend at court, I'll find a voice.

THE TENTH PASTORAL;

OR,

GALLUS.

THE ARGUMENT.

GALLUS, a great patron of Virgil, and an excellent poet, was very deeply in love with one Cytheris, whom he calls Lycoris; and who had forsaken him for the company of a soldier. The poet therefore supposes his friend Gallus retired in his height of melancholy into the solitudes of Arcadia (the celebrated scene of pastorals); where he represents him in a very languishing condition, with all the rural deities about him, pitying his hard usage, and condoling his misfortune.

THEY sacred succour, Arethusa, bring,
To crown my labour: 'tis the last I sing.
Which proud Lycoris may with pity view;
The Muse is mournful, though the numbers few.
Refuse me not a verse, to grief and Gallus due.

So may thy silver streams beneath the tide,
Unmix'd with briny seas, securely glide.
Sing then my Gallus, and his hopeless vows;
Sing, while my cattle crop the tender brows.
The vocal grove shall answer to the sound,
And echo, from the vales, the tuneful voice rebound.
What lawns or woods withheld you from his aid,
Ye nymphs, when Gallus was to love betray'd;
To love, unpity'd by the cruel maid?
Nor steepy Pindus cou'd retard your course,
Nor cleft Parnassus, nor th' Aonian source:
Nothing that owns the Muses cou'd suspend
Your aid to Gallus, Gallus is their friend.
For him the lofty laurel stands in tears,
And hung with humid pearls the lowly shrub ap-
Mænalian pines the godlike swain bemoan; [pear-
When spread beneath a rock he sigh'd alone;
And cold Lycæus wept from every dropping stone.
The sheep surround their shepherd, as he lies:
Blush not, sweet poet, nor the name despise:
Along the streams his flock Admis fed,
And yet the queen of beauty blest his bed.
The swains and tardy neat-herds came, and last
Mænalas, wet with beating winter mast.
Wondering they ask'd from whence arose thy
Yet more amaz'd, thy own Apollo came. [flame;
Flush'd were his cheeks, and glowing were his eyes;
"Is she thy care? is she thy care?" he cries.
"Thy false Lycoris flies thy love and thee:
And for thy rival tempts the raging sea,
The forms of horrid war, and Heaven's inclemency."
Sylvanus came: his brows a country crown
Of fennel, and of nodding lilies, down.
Great Pan arriv'd; and we beheld him too:
His cheeks and temples of vermillion hue.
"Why, Gallus, this immoderate grief," he cry'd:
"Think'st thou that love with tears is satisfy'd?
The meads are sooner drunk with morning dew;
The bees with flowery shrubs, the goats with browes."

Unmov'd, and with dejected eyes he mourn'd;
He paus'd, and then these broken words return'd:
" 'Tis past; and pity gives me no relief:
But you, Arcadian swains, shall sing my grief:
And on your hills my last complaints renew;
So sad a song is only worthy you.
Now light would lie the turf upon my breast,
If you my sufferings in your songs exprest?
Ah! that your birth and business had been mine;
To penn the sheep, and press the swelling vine!
Had Phyllis or Amyntas caus'd my pain,
Or any nymph, or any shepherd on the plain.
Though Phyllis brown, though black Amyntas were,
Are violets not sweet, because not fair?
Beneath the willows, and the shady vine,
My loves had mix'd their pliant limbs with mine;
Phyllis with myrtle wreaths had crown'd my hair,
And soft Amyntas sung away my care.
Come, see what pleasures in our plains abound;
The woods, the fountains, and the flowery ground.
As you are beautiful, were you half so true,
Here could I live, and love, and die with only you.
Now I to fighting fields am sent afar,
And strive in winter camps with toils of war;
While you, (alas, that I should find it so!)
To shun my sight, your native soil forego,
And climb the frozen Alps, and tread th' eternal snow.
Ye frosts and snows, her tender body spare;
These are not limbs for icicles to tear.

For me, the wilds and deserts are my choice;
 The Muses, once my care; my once harmonious
 There will I sing, forsaken and alone, [voice.
 The rocks and hollow caves shall echo to my moan:
 The rind of every plant her name shall know;
 And as the rind extends, the love shall grow.
 Then on Arcadian mountains will I chase
 (Mix'd with the woodland nymphs) the savage race.
 Nor cold shall hinder me, with horns and bounds
 To thrud the thickets, or to leap the mounds.
 And now methinks o'er steepy rocks I go,
 And rush through sounding woods, and bend the Parthian bow:

As if with sports my sufferings I could ease,
 Or by my pains the god of love appease.
 My frenzy changes, I delight no more
 On mountain tops to chase the tusky boar;
 No game but hopeless love my thoughts pursue:
 Once more, ye nymphs, and songs, and sounding woods, adieu.¹

Love alters not for us his hard decrees,
 Not though beneath the Thracian clime we freeze;
 Or Italy's indulgent heaven forego;
 And in mid-winter tread Sithonian snow.
 Or when the barks of elms are scorch'd, we keep
 On Meroë's burning plains the Libyan sheep.
 In Hell, and Earth, and Sea, and Heav'n above,
 Love conquers all; and we must yield to love.
 My Muses, here your sacred raptures end:
 The verse was what I ow'd my suffering friend.
 This while I sung, my sorrows I deceiv'd,
 And bending osiers into baskets weav'd.
 The song, because inspir'd by you, shall shine:
 And Gallus will approve, because 'tis mine.
 Gallus, for whom my holy flames renew
 Each hour, and every moment rise in view:
 As alders, in the spring, their boles extend;
 And heave so fiercely, that the bark they rend.
 Now let us rise, for boariness oft invades
 The singer's voice who sings beneath the shades.
 From juniper unwholesome dewa distil, [kill;
 That blast the sooty corn, the withering herbage
 Away, my goats, away: for you have brows'd your fill.

VIRGIL'S GEORGICS.

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE

PHILIP

EARL OF CHESTERFIELD.

MY LORD,

I CANNOT begin my address to your lordship, better than in the words of Virgil,

—Quod optanti Divam promittere nemo
 Anderet, volvenda dies, en, attulit ultro.

Seven years together I have concealed the longing which I had to appear before you: a time as tedious as Æneas passed in his wandering voyage, before he reached the promised Italy. But I considered that nothing which my meanness could produce, was worthy of your patronage. At last this happy occasion offered, of presenting to you the best poem of the best poet. If I balked this opportunity,

 I was in despair of finding such another; and if I took it, I was still uncertain whether you would vouchsafe to accept it from my hands. It was a bold venture which I made, in desiring your permission to lay my unworthy labours at your feet.
 But my rashness has succeeded beyond my hopes:
 and you have been pleas'd not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world for want of that protection, of which he had so long been ambitious. I have known a gentleman in disgrace, and not daring to appear before king
 Charles the Second, though he much desired it.
 At length he took the confidence to attend a fair lady to the court, and told his majesty, that under her protection he had presumed to wait on him.
 With the same humble confidence I present myself before your lordship, and attending on Virgil hope a gracious reception. The gentleman succeeded, because the powerful lady was his friend;
 but I have too much injured my great author, to expect he should intercede for me. I would have translated him; but, according to the literal
 French and Italian phrases, I fear I have traduced him. It is the fault of many a well-meaning man, to be officious in a wrong place, and do a prejudice, where he had endeavoured to do a service. Virgil wrote his Georgics in the full strength and vigour of his age, when his judgment was at the height, and before his fancy was declining.
 He had (according to our homely saying) his full swing at this poem, beginning it at about the age of thirty-five; and scarce concluding it before he arrived at forty. It is observed both of him and Horace, and I believe it will hold in all great poets: that though they wrote before with a certain heat of genius which inspired them, yet that heat was not perfectly digested. There is required a continuance of warmth to ripen the best and noblest fruits. Thus Horace, in his first and second book of Odes, was still rising, but came not to his meridian till the third. After which his judgment was an overpoise to his imagination;
 he grew too cautious to be bold enough, for he depended in his fourth by slow degrees, and in his Satires and Epistles, was more a philosopher and a critic than a poet. In the beginning of summer the days are almost at a stand, with little variation of length or shortness, because at that time the diurnal motion of the Sun partakes more of a right line, than of a spiral. The same is the method of nature in the frame of man. He seems at forty to be fully in his summer tropic; somewhat before, and somewhat after, he finds in his total but small increases or decays. From fifty to threescore the balance generally holds even, in our colder climates: for he loses not much in fancy; and judgment, which is the effect of observation, still increases: his succeeding years afford him little more than the stubble of his own harvest: yet if his constitution be healthful, his mind may still retain a decent vigour; and the gleanings of that Ephraim, in comparison with others, will surpass the vintage of Abiezer. I have called this somewhere, by a bold metaphor, a green old age, but Virgil has given me his authority for the figure.

Jam senior; sed cruda Deo, viridisque senectus.

Among those few who enjoy the advantage of a latter spring, your lordship is a rare example: who being now arrived at your great climacteric, yet give no proof of the least decay of your excellent judgment, and comprehension of all things which are within the compass of human understanding. Your conversation is as easy as it is instructive, and I could never observe the least vanity or the least assuming in any thing you said: but a natural unaffected modesty, full of good sense, and well digested. A clearness of notion, expressed in ready and unstudied words. No man has complained, or ever can, that you have discoursed too long on any subject; for you leave in us an eagerness of learning more; pleased with what we hear, but not satisfied, because you will not speak so much as we could wish. I dare not excuse your lordship from this fault; for though it is none in you, it is one to all who have the happiness of being known to you. I must confess the critics make it one of Virgil's beauties, that having said what he thought convenient, he always left somewhat for the imagination of his readers to supply: that they might gratify their fancies, by filling more in what he had written, than at first they could, and think they had added to his thoughts when it was all there beforehand, and he only saved himself the expense of words. However it was, I never went from your lordship, but with a longing to return, or without a hearty curse to him who invented ceremonies in the world, and put me on the necessity of withdrawing, when it was my interest, as well as my desire, to have given you a much longer trouble. I cannot imagine (if your lordship will give me leave to speak my thoughts) but you have had a more than ordinary vigour in your youth. For too much of heat is required at first, that there may not too little be left at last. A prodigal fire is only capable of large remains: and yours, my lord, still burns the clearer in declining. The blaze is not so fierce as at the first, but the smoke is wholly vanished; and your friends who stand about you are not only sensible of a cheerful warmth, but are kept at an awful distance by its force. In my small observations of mankind, I have ever found, that such as are not rather too full of spirit when they are young, degenerate to dulness in their age. Sobriety in our riper years is the effect of a well-concocted warmth; but where the principles are only phlegm, what can be expected from the waterish matter, but an insipid manhood, and a stupid old infancy; discretion in leading strings, and a confirmed ignorance on crutches? Virgil, in his third Georgic, when he describes a colt, who promises a courser for the race, or for the field of battle, shows him the first to pass the bridge, which trembles under him, and to stem the torrent of the flood. His beginnings must be in rashness; a noble fault: but time and experience will correct that error, and tame it into a deliberate and well-weighed courage; which knows both to be cautious and to dare, as occasion offers. Your lordship is a man of honour, not only so unstained, but so unquestioned, that you are the living standard of that heroic virtue: so truly such, that if I would flatter you, I could not. It takes not from you, that you were born with principles of generosity and probity; but it adds to you, that you have cultivated nature, and made those principles the rule and measure of all your actions. The world knows this, without my telling; yet poets have a right of recording it to all posterity.

Dignum laude virum, Musa vetat mori.

Epaminondas, Lucullus, and the two first Caesars, were not esteemed the worse commanders, for having made philosophy and the liberal arts their study. Cicero might have been their equal, but that he wanted courage. To have both these virtues, and to have improved them both, with a softness of manners, and a sweetness of conversation, few of our nobility can fill that character: one there is, and so conspicuous by his own light, that he needs not

Digito monstrari, et dicier hic est.

To be nobly born, and of an ancient family, is in the extremes of fortune, either good or bad; for virtue and descent are so inheritance. A long series of ancestors shows the native with great advantage at the first; but if he any way degenerate from his line, the least spot is visible on ermine. But to preserve this whiteness in its original purity, you, my lord, have, like that ermine, forsaken the common track of busi-which is not always clean: you have chosen for yourself a private greatness, and will not be polluted with ambition. It has been observed in former times, that none have been so greedy of employments, and of managing the public, as they who have least deserved their stations. But such only merit to be called patriots, under whom we see their country flourish. I have laughed sometimes (for who would always be an Heraklitus?) when I have reflected on those men, who from time to time have shot themselves into the world. I have seen many successions of them: some bolting out upon the stage with vast applause, and others hissed off, and quitting it with disgrace. But while they were in action, I have constantly observed, that they seemed desirous to retreat from business: greatness they said was nauseous, and a crowd was troublesome; a quiet privacy was their ambition. Some few of them I believe said this in earnest, and were making a provision against future want, that they might enjoy their age with ease: they saw the happiness of a private life, and promised to themselves a blessing, which every day it was in their power to possess. But they deferred it, and lingered still at court, because they thought they had not yet enough to make them happy: they would have more, and laid in to make their solitude luxurious. A wretched philosophy, which Epicurus never taught them in his garden: they loved the prospect of this quiet in reversion, but were not willing to have it in possession, they would first be old, and made as sure of health and life, as if both of them were at their disposal. But put them to the necessity of present choice, and they preferred continuance in power: like the wretch who called Death to his assistance, but refused him when he came. The great Scipio was not of their opinion, who indeed sought honours in his youth, and endured the fatigues with which he purchased them. He served his country when it was in need of his courage and conduct until he thought it was time to serve himself: but dismounted from the saddle when he found the beast which bore him began to grow restif and ungovernable. But your lordship has given us a better example of moderation. You saw betimes that ingratitude is not confined to commonwealths; and therefore though you were formed alike, for the greatest of civil employments, and military commands, yet you pushed not your fortune to rise in either; but contented yourself with being capable, as much as any whosoever, of defending your country with your sword, or assisting it with your counsel, when you were called. For the rest, the respect and love which was paid you, not only in the province where you live, but generally by all who had the happiness to know you, was a wise exchange for the honours of the court: a place of forgetfulness, at the best, for well-deservers. It is necessary for the polishing of manners, to have breathed that air; but it is infectious even to the best morals to live always in it. It is a dangerous commerce, where an honest man is sure at the first of being cheated; and he recovers not his losses, but by learning to cheat others. The undermining smile becomes at length habitual; and the drift of his plausible conversation, is only to flatter one, that he may betray another. Yet it is good to have been a looker-on, without venturing to play; that a man may know false dice another time, though he never means to use them. I commend not him who never knew a court, but him who forsakes it because he knows it. A young man deserves no praise, who out of melancholy zeal leaves the world before he has well tried it, and runs headlong into religion. He who carries a maidenhead into a cloister, is sometimes apt to lose it there, and to repent of his repentance. He only is like to endure austerities, who has already found the inconvenience of pleasures. For almost every man will be making experiments in one part or another of his life; and the danger is the less when we are young; for, having tried it early, we shall not be apt to repeat it afterwards. Your lordship therefore may properly be said to have chosen a retreat, and not to have chosen it until you had maturely weighed the advantages of rising higher with the hazards of the fall. Res non parva labore, sed relicta, was thought by a poet to be one of the requisites to a happy life. Why should a reasonable man put it in the power of fortune to make him miserable, when his ancestors have taken care to release him from her? let him venture, says Horace, qui zonam perdidit. He who has nothing, plays securely; for we may win, and cannot be poorer if he loses. But he who is born to a plentiful estate, and is ambitious of offices at court, sets a stake to fortune, which she can seldom answer: if he gains nothing, he loses all, or part of what was once his own; and if he gets, he cannot be certain but he may refund.

In short, however he succeeds, it is covetousness that induced him first to play, and covetousness is the undoubted sign of ill sense at bottom. The odds are against him, that he loses; and one loss may be of more consequence to him than all his former winnings. It is like the present war of the Christians against the Turk;

every year they gain a victory, and by that a town; but if they are once defeated, they lose a province at a blow, and endanger the safety of the whole empire. You, my lord, enjoy your quiet in a garden, where you have not only the leisure of thinking, but the pleasure to think of nothing which can discompose your mind. A good conscience is a port which is landlocked on every side, and where no winds can possibly invade, no tempests can arise. There a man may stand upon the shore, and not only see his own image, but that of his Maker, clearly reflected from the undisturbed and silent waters. Reason was intended for a blessing, and such it is to men of honour and integrity: who desire no more than what they are able to give themselves: like the happy old Coricyan, whom my author describes in his fourth Georgic: whose fruits and sallads, on which he lived contented, were all of his own growth, and his own plantation. Virgil seems to think that the blessings of a country life are not complete, without an improvement of knowledge by contemplation and reading.

O fortunatos nimium, bona si sua norint,
Agricolas!

It is but half possession not to understand that happiness which we possess: a foundation of good sense, and a cultivation of learning, are required to give a seasoning to retirement, and make us taste the blessing. God has bestowed on your lordship the first of these, and you have bestowed on yourself the second. Eden was not made for beasts, though they were suffered to live in it, but for their master, who studied God in the works of his creation. Neither could the Devil have been happy there with all his knowledge, for he wanted innocence to make him so. He brought envy, malice, and ambition into paradise, which soured to him the sweetness of the place. Wherever inordinate affections are, it is Hell. Such only can enjoy the country, who are capable of thinking when they are there, and have left their passions behind them in the town. Then they are prepared for solitude; and in that solitude is prepared for them

Et secura quies, et nescia fallere vita.

As I began this dedication with a verse of Virgil, so I conclude it with another. The continuance of your health, to enjoy that happiness which you so well deserve, and which you have provided for yourself, is the sincere and earnest wish of your lordship's most devoted, and

most obedient servant,

JOHN DRYDEN.

THE FIRST BOOK OF
THE GEORGICS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE poet, in the beginning of this book, propounds the general design of each Georgic: and, after a solemn invocation of all the gods who are any way related to his subject, he addresses himself in particular to Augustus, whom he compliments with divinity; and after strikes into his business. He shows the different kinds of tillage proper to different soils, traces out the original of agriculture, gives a catalogue of the husbandman's tools, specifies the employments peculiar to each season, describes the changes of the weather, with the signs in Heaven and Earth that forebode them, instances many of the prodigies that happened near the time of Julius Cæsar's death, and shuts up all with a supplication to the gods for the safety of Augustus, and the preservation of Rome.

WHAT makes a plenteous harvest, when to turn
The fruitful soil, and when to sow the corn;
The care of sheep, of oxen, and of kine;
And how to raise on elms the teeming vine;
The birth and genius of the frugal bee,
I sing, Mæcenas, and I sing to thee.
Ye deities! who fields and plains protect,
Who rule the seasons, and the year direct;
Bacchus and fostering Ceres, powers divine,
Who gave us corn for mast, for water wine;
Ye fawns, propitious to the rural swains, [plains,
Ye nymphs, that haunt the mountains and the
Join in my work, and to my numbers bring
Your needful succour, for your gifts I sing.
And thou, whose trident struck the teeming Earth,
And made a passage for the courser's birth;
And thou, for whom the Cæan shore sustains
The milky herds, that graze the flowery plains;
And thou, the shepherds tutelary god,
Leave for a while, O Pan! thy lov'd abode:
And, if Arcadian fleeces be thy care,
From fields and mountains to my song repair.
Inventor, Pallas, of the fattening oil,
Thou founder of the plough and ploughman's toil;
And thou, whose hands the shroud-like cypress
Come, all ye gods and goddesses that wear [rear;
The rural honours, and increase th: year.
You, who supply the ground with seeds of grain;
And you, who swell those seeds with kindly rain:
And chiefly thou, whose undetermin'd state
Is yet the business of the gods' debate;
Whether in after-times to be declar'd
The patron of the world, and Rome's peculiar
Or o'er the fruits and seasons to preide, [guard,
And the round circuit of the year to guide;
Powerful of blessings, which thou strew'st around,
And with thy goddess mother's myrtle crown'd.
Or wilt thou, Cæsar, choose the watery reign,
To smooth the surges, and correct the main?
Then mariners, in storms, to thee shall pray,
Ev'n utmost Thulé shall thy power obey;
And Neptune shall resign the fœces of the sea.
The watery virgins for thy bed shall strive,
And Tethys all her waves in dowry give. N

Or wilt thou bless our summers with thy rays,
 And seated near the Balance, poise the days:
 Where in the void of Heaven a space is free,
 Betwixt the Scorpion and the Maid, for thee.
 The Scorpion, ready to receive thy laws,
 Yields half his region, and contracts his claws.
 Whatever part of Heaven thou shalt obtain,
 For let not Hell presume of such a reign;
 Nor let so dire a thirst of empire move
 Thy mind, to leave thy kindred gods above.
 Though Greece admires Elysium's blest retreat,
 Though Proserpine affects her silent seat,
 And, importun'd by Ceres to remove,
 Prefers the fields below to those above.
 But thou, propitious Cæsar! guide my course,
 And, to my bold endeavours, add thy force.
 Pity the poet's and the ploughman's cares,
 Interest thy greatness in our mean affairs,
 And use thyself betimes to hear and grant our prayers.

While yet the spring is young, while earth un-
 Her frozen bosom to the western winds; [binds
 While mountain-snows dissolve against the Sun,
 And streams, yet new, from precipices run;
 Ev'n in this early dawning of the year,
 Produce the plough, and yoke the sturdy steer,
 And goad him till he groans beneath his toil,
 Till the bright share is bury'd in the soil.
 That crop rewards the greedy peasant's pains,
 Which twice the Sun, and twice the cold sustains,
 And bursts the crowded barns, with more than pro-
 mis'd gains.

But ere we stir the yet unbroken ground,
 The various course of seasons must be found;
 The weather, and the setting of the winds,
 The culture suiting to the several kinds
 Of seeds and plants, and what will thrive and rise,
 And what the genius of the soil denies.
 This ground with Bacchus, that with Ceres suits;
 That other loads the trees with happy fruits;
 A fourth with grass, unbidden, decks the ground:
 Thus Tmolus is with yellow saffron crown'd;
 India, black ebony and white ivory bears;
 And soft Idume weeps her odoriferous tears.
 Thus Pontus sends her beaver stones from far;
 And naked Spaniards temper steel for war.
 Epirus for th' Elean chariot breeds
 (In hopes of palms) a race of running steeds.
 This is th' original contract; these the laws
 Impos'd by Nature, and by Nature's cause,
 On sundry places, when Deucalion hur'd
 His mother's entrails on the desert world:
 Whence men, a hard laborious kind, were born.
 Then borrow part of winter for thy corn:
 And early with thy team the glebe in furrows turn.

That, while the turf lies open and unbound,
 Succeeding suns may bake the mellow ground.
 But if the soil be barren, only scar
 The surface, and but lightly print the share,
 When cold Arcturus rises with the Sun:
 Lest wicked weeds the corn should over-run
 In watery soils; or lest the barren sand
 Should suck the moisture from the thirsty land.
 Both these unhappy soils the swain forbears,
 And keeps a sabbath of alternate years:
 That the spent earth may gather heat again;
 And, better'd by cessation, bear the grain.
 At least, where vetches, pulse, and tares have stood,
 And stalks of lupines grew, (a stubborn wood)

Th' ensuing season, in return, may bear
 The bearded product of the golden year.
 For flax and oats will burn the tender seed,
 And sleepy poppies harmful harvests yield,
 But sweet vicissitudes of rest and toil
 Make easy labour, and renew the soil.
 Yet sprinkle sordid ashes all around,
 And load with fattening dung thy fallow ground.
 Thus change of seeds for meagre soils is best;
 And earth manur'd, not idle, though at rest.
 Long practice has a sure improvement found,
 With kindled fires to burn the barren ground;
 When the light stubble, to the flames resign'd,
 Is driven along, and crackles in the wind.
 Whether from hence the hollow womb of Earth
 Is warm'd with secret strength for better birth;
 Or, when the latent vice is cur'd by fire,
 Redundant humours through the pores expire;
 Or that the warmth distends the chinks, and makes
 New breathings, whence new nourishment she takes;

Or that the heat the gaping ground constrains,
 New knits the surface, and new strings the veins,
 Lest soaking showers should pierce her secret seat,
 Or freezing Boreas chill her genial heat;
 Or scorching suns too violently beat.

Nor is the profit small, the peasant makes,
 Who smooths with harrows, or who pounds with rakes

The crumbling clods: nor Ceres from on high
 Regards his labours with a grudging eye;
 Nor his, who ploughs across the furrow'd ground,
 And on the back of earth inflicts new wounds;
 For he with frequent exercise commands
 Th' unwilling soil, and tames the stubborn lands.

Ye swains, invoke the powers who rule the sky,
 For a moist summer, and a winter dry:
 For winter drought rewards the peasant's pain,
 And broods indulgent on the bury'd grain.
 Hence Mysia boasts her harvests, and the tops
 Of Gargarus admire their happy crops.
 When first the soil receives the fruitful seed,
 Make no delay, but cover it with speed:
 So fenc'd from cold; the pliant furrows break,
 Before the surly clod resists the rake.
 And call the floods from high, to rush amain
 With pregnant streams, to swell the teeming grain.
 Then, when the fiery suns too fiercely play,
 And shrivell'd herbs on withering stems decay,
 The wary ploughman, on the mountain's brow,
 Undams his watery stores, huge torrents flow;
 And, rattling down the rocks, large moisture
 yield,

Tempering the thirsty fever of the field.
 And lest the stem, too feeble for the freight,
 Should scarce sustain the head's unwieldy weight,
 Sends in his feeding flocks betimes t' invade
 The rising bulk of the luxuriant blade;
 Ere yet th' aspiring offspring of the grain
 O'ertops the ridges of the furrow'd plain:
 And drains the standing waters, when they yield
 Too large a beverage to the drunken field.
 But most in autumn, and the showery spring,
 When dubious months uncertain weather bring.
 When fountains open, when impetuous rain
 Swells hasty brooks, and pours upon the plain;
 When earth with slime and mud is cover'd o'er,
 Or hollow places spue their watery store.
 Nor yet the ploughman, nor the labouring steer,
 Sustain alone the hazards of the year;

But glutton geese, and the Strymonian crane,
 With foreign troops, invade the tender grain:
 And towering weeds malignant shadows yield;
 And spreading succory chokes the rising field.
 The sire of gods and men, with hard decrees,
 Forbids our plenty to be bought with ease:
 And wills that mortal men, inur'd to toil,
 Should exercise, with pains, the grudging soil.
 Himself invented first the shining share,
 And whetted human industry by care:
 Himself did handicrafts and arts ordain,
 Nor suffer'd sloth to rust his active reign.
 Ere this, no peasant vex'd the peaceful ground,
 Which only turfs and greens for altars found:
 No fences parted fields, nor marks nor bounds
 Distinguish'd acres of litigious grounds:
 But all was common, and the fruitful Earth
 Was free to give her unexacted birth.
 Jove added venom to the viper's brood,
 And swell'd, with raging storms, the peaceful flood:
 Commission'd hungry wolves t' infest the fold,
 And shook from oaken leaves the liquid gold.
 Remov'd from human reach the cheerful fire,
 And from the rivers bade the wine retire:
 That studious need might useful arts explore:
 From furrow'd fields to reap the foodful store;
 And force the veins of clashing flints t' expire
 The lurking seeds of their celestial fire.
 Then first on seas the hollow'd alder swam;
 Then sailors quarter'd Heaven, and found a name
 For every fir'd and every wandering star:
 The Pleiads, Hyads, and the Northern Car.
 Then toils for beasts, and lime for birds were found,
 And deepmouth'd dogs did forest-walks surround:
 And casting-nets were spread in shallow brooks,
 Drags in the deep, and baits were hung on hooks.
 Then saws were tooth'd, and sounding axes made
 (For wedges first did yielding wood invade);
 And various arts in order did succeed.
 (What cannot endless labour, urg'd by need?)
 First Ceres taught, the ground with grain to sow,
 And arm'd with iron shares the crooked plough,
 When now Dodonian oaks no more supply'd
 Their mast, and trees their forest-fruit deny'd.
 Soon was his labour doubled to the swain,
 And blasting mildews blacken'd all his grain.
 Tough thistles chok'd the fields, and kill'd the corn,
 And an unthrifty crop of weeds was borne.
 Then burs and brambles, an unbidden crew
 Of graceless guests, th' unhappy field subdue:
 And oats unblest, and darnel domineers,
 And shoots its head above the shining ears.
 So that unless the land with daily care
 Is exercis'd, and with an iron war
 Of rakes and arrows the proud foes expell'd,
 And birds with clamours frighted from the field;
 Unless the boughs are lopp'd that shade the plain,
 And Heaven invoc'd with vows for fruitful rain,
 On other crops you may with envy look,
 And shake for food the long abandon'd oak.
 Nor must we pass untold what arms they wield,
 Who labour tillage and the furrow'd field:
 Without whose aid the ground her corn denies,
 And nothing can be sown, and nothing rise.
 The crooked plough, the share, the towering height
 Of waggons, and the cart's unwieldy weight;
 The sled, the tumbrel, hurdles, and the flail,
 The fan of Bacchus, with the flying sail.
 These all must be prepar'd, if ploughmen hope
 The promis'd blessing of a bounteous crop.

VOL. XIX.

Young elms with early force in coppers bow,
 Fit for the figure of the crooked plough.
 Of eight foot long a fasten'd beam prepare,
 On either side the head produce an ear,
 And sink a socket for the shining share.
 Of beech the plough-tail, and the bending yoke;
 Or softer linden harden'd in the smoke.
 I could be long in precepts, but I fear
 So mean a subject might offend your ear.
 Delve of convenient depth your threshing-floor:
 With temper'd clay then fill and face it o'er:
 And let the weighty roller run the round,
 To smooth the surface of th' unequal ground;
 Lest crack'd with summer heats the flooring flies,
 Or sinks, and through the crannies weeds arise.
 For sundry foes the rural realms surround:
 The field-mouse builds her garner under ground,
 For gather'd grain the blind laborious mole
 In winding mazes works her hidden hole.
 In hollow caverns vermin make abode,
 The hissing serpent, and the swelling toad:
 The corn-devouring weasel here abides,
 And the wise ant her wintry store provides.

Mark well the flowering almonds in the wood;
 If odorous blooms the bearing branches load,
 The glebe will answer to the sylvan reign,
 Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.
 But if a wood of leaves o'ershadeth the tree,
 Such and so barren will thy harvest be:
 In vain the hiead shall vex the threshing-floor,
 For empty chaff and straw will be thy store.
 Some steep their seed, and some in caldrons boil
 With vigorous nitre, and with lees of oil,
 O'er gentle fires; th' exuberant juice to drain,
 And swell the flattering husks with fruitful grain.
 Yet is not the success for years assur'd,
 Though chosen is the seed, and fully cur'd;
 Unless the peasant, with his annual pain,
 Renews his choice, and culls the largest grain.
 Thus all below, whether by Nature's curse,
 Or Fate's decree, degenerate still to worse.
 So the boat's brawny crew the current stem,
 And, slow advancing, struggle with the stream:
 But if they slack their hands, or cease to strive,
 Then down the flood with headlong haste they drive.
 Nor must the ploughman less observe the skies,
 When the Kids, Dragon, and Arcturus rise,
 Than sailors homeward bent, who cut their way Through Helle's stormy straits, and oyster-breeding sea.

But when Astrea's balance, hung on high,
 Betwixt the nights and days divides the sky,
 Then yoke your oxen, sow your winter grain;
 Till cold December comes with driving rain.
 Linseed and fruitful poppy bury warm,
 In a dry season, and prevent the storm.
 Sow beans and clover in a rotten soil,
 And millet, rising from your annual toil:
 When with his golden horns, in full career,
 The Bull beats down the barriers of the year;
 And Argos and the Dog forsake the northern sphere.

But if your care to wheat alone extend,
 Let Maia with her sisters first descend,
 And the bright Gnosian diadem downward bend;
 Before you trust in earth your future hope:
 Or else expect a listless lazy crop.
 Some swains have sown before, but most have found
 A husky harvest, from the grudging ground.
 Vile vetches would you sow, or lentils lean,
 The growth of Egypt, or the kidney-bean?

Begin when the slow Waggoner descends;
 Nor cease your sowing till mid-winter ends:
 For this, through twelve bright signs Apollo guides
 The year, and Earth in several climes divides.
 Five girdles bind the skies, the torrid zone
 Glows with the passing and re-passing Sun.
 Far on the right and left, th' extremes of Heaven,
 To frosts and snows and bitter blasts are given.
 Betwixt the midst and these, the gods assign'd
 Two habitable seats for human kind:
 And cross their limits cut a sloping way,
 Which the twelve signs in beauteous order sway.
 Two poles turn round the globe; one seen to rise
 O'er Scythian hills, and one in Libyan skies.
 The first sublime in Heaven, the last is whirl'd
 Below the regions of the nether world.
 Around our pole the spiry Dragon glides,
 And like a winding stream the Bears divides;
 The Less and Greater, who by Fate's decree
 Abhor to dive beneath the southern sea;
 There, as they say, perpetual night is found
 In silence brooding on th' unhappy ground:
 Or when Aurora leaves our northern sphere,
 She lights the downward Heaven, and rises there.
 And when on us she breathes the living light,
 Red Vesper kindles there the tapers of the night.
 From hence uncertain seasons we may know;
 And when to reap the grain, and when to sow;
 Or when to fell the fuzes; when 'tis meet
 To spread the flying canvas for the fleet.
 Observe what stars arise or disappear;
 And the four quarters of the rolling year.
 But when cold weather, and continued rain,
 The labouring husband in his house restrain,
 Let him forecast his work with timely care,
 Which else is huddled when the skies are fair:
 Then let him mark the sheep, or what the shining share,

Or hollow trees for boats, or number o'er
 His sacks, or measure his increasing store;
 Or sharpen stakes, or head the forks, or wine
 The sallow twigs to tie the straggling vine;
 Or wicker baskets weave, or air the corn,
 Or grinded grain betwixt two marbles turn.
 No laws, divine or human, can restrain
 From necessary works the labouring swain.
 Ev'n holydays and feasts permission yield,
 To scot the meadows, or to fence the field,
 To fire the brambles, snare the birds, and steep
 In wholesome waterfalls the woolly sheep.
 And oft the drudging ass is driven, with toil,
 To neighbouring towns with apples and with oil:
 Returning late, and laden home with gain
 Of barter'd pitch, and hand-mills for the grain.

The lucky days, in each revolving Moon,
 For labour choose: the fifth be sure to shun:
 That gave the Furies and pale Pluto birth,
 And arm'd, against the skies, the sons of Earth.
 With mountains piled on mountains, thrice they
 To scale the steepy battlements of Jove: [strove
 And thrice his lightning and red thunder play'd,
 And their demolish'd works in ruin laid.
 The seventh is, next the tenth, the best to join
 Young oxen to the yoke, and plant the vine.
 Then, weavers, stretch your stays upon the web:
 The ninth is good for travel, bad for theft.
 Some works in dead of night are better done;
 Or when the morning dew prevents the Sun.
 Parch'd meads and stubble mow by Phoebe's light,
 Which both require the coolness of the night;

For moisture then abounds, and pearly rains
 Descend in silence to refresh the plains.
 The wife and husband equally conspire
 To work by night, and rake the winter fire:
 He sharpens torches in the glimmering room;
 She shoots the flying shuttle through the loom:
 Or boils in kettles must of wine, and skins
 With leaves, the dregs that overflow the brims
 And till the watchful cock awakes the day,
 She sings to drive the tedious hours away.
 But in warm weather, when the skies are clear,
 By daylight reap the product of the year:
 And in the Sun your golden grain display,
 And thrash it out, and winnow it by day.
 Plough naked, swain, and naked sow the land,
 For lazy winter numbs the labouring hand.
 In genial winter, swains enjoy their store,
 Forget their hardships, and recruit for more.
 The farmer to full bowls invites his friends,
 And what he got with pains, with pleasure spends.
 So sailors, when escap'd from stormy seas,
 First crown their vessels, then indulge their ease.
 Yet that's the proper time to thrash the wood
 For most of oak, your fathers' homely food.
 To gather laurelberries and the spoil
 Of bloody myrtles, and to press your oil.
 For stalking cranes to set the guileful snare,
 To enclose the stags in toils, and hunt the hare,
 With Balearic slugs, or Gnosian bow,
 To persecute from far the flying doe.
 Then, when the fleecy skies new clothe the wood,
 And cakes of rustling ice come rolling down the flood.

Now sing we stormy stars, when autumn weight
 The year, and adds to nights, and shortens days;
 And suns declining shine with feeble rays:
 What cares must then attend the tolling swain;
 Or when the lowering spring, with lavish rain,
 Beats down the slender stem and bearded grain,
 While yet the head is green, or, lightly swaf'd
 With milky moisture, overlooks the field!
 Ev'n when the farmer, now secure of fear,
 Sends in the swains to spoil the finish'd year:
 Ev'n while the reaper fills his greedy hands,
 And binds the golden sheaves in brittle bands:
 Oft have I seen a sudden storm arise,
 From all the warring winds that sweep the skies:
 The heavy harvest from the root is torn,
 And whirl'd aloft the lighter stubble borne;
 With such a force the flying rack is driven,
 And such a winter wears the face of Heaven:
 And oft whole sheets descend of sluicy rain,
 Suck'd by the spongy clouds from off the main:
 The lofty skies at once come pouring down,
 The promis'd crop and golden labours drown.
 The dikes are fill'd, and with a roaring sound
 The rising rivers float the nether ground; [bound
 And rocks the bellowing voice of boiling seas re:
 The father of the gods his glory shrouds;
 Involv'd in tempests, and a night of clouds,
 And from the middle darkness flashing out,
 By fits he deals his fiery bolts about.
 Earth feels the motions of her angry god,
 Her entrails tremble, and her mountains nod;
 And flying beasts in forests seek abode:
 Deep horror seizes every human breast,
 Their pride is humbled, and their fear confus'd:
 While he from high his rolling thunder throws,
 And fires the mountains with repeated blows:
 The rocks are from their old foundations rent;
 The winds redouble, and the rains augment;

The waves on heaps are dash'd against the shore,
And now the woods, and now the billows roar.

In fear of this, observe the starry signs,
Where Saturn houses, and where Hermes joins.
But first to Heaven thy due devotions pay,
And annual gifts on Ceres' altars lay.
When winter's rage abates, when cheerful hours
Awake the spring, the spring awakes the flowers.
On the green turf thy careless limbs display,
And celebrate the mighty mother's day.

For then the hills with pleasing shades are crown'd,
And sleeps are sweeter on the silken ground:
With milder beams the Sun securely shines;
Fat are the lambs, and luscious are the wines.
Let every swain adore her power divine,
And milk and honey mix with sparkling wine:
Let all the choir of clowns attend the show,
In long procession, shouting as they go;
Invoking her to bless their yearly stores,
Leaving plenty to their crowded floors.

Thus in the spring, and thus in summer's heat,
Before the sickles touch the ripening wheat,
On Ceres call; and let the labouring hind
With oaken wreaths his hollow temples bind:
On Ceres let him call, and Ceres praise,
With uncouth dances, and with country lays.

And that by certain signs we may presage
Of heats and rains, and wind's impetuous rage,
The sovereign of the Heavens has set on high
The Moon, to mark the changes of the sky: [swain
When southern blasts shall cease, and when the Should near their folds his feeding flocks restrain.

For, ere the rising winds begin to roar,
The working seas advance to wash the shore:
Soft whispers run along the leafy woods,
And mountains whistle to the murmuring floods:
E'er then the doubtful billows scarce abstain
From the toss'd vessel on the troubled main;

When crying cormorants forsake the sea,
And, stretching to the covert, wing their way;
When sportful coots run skimming o'er the strand;
When watchful herons leave their watery stand;
And mounting upward with erected flight,
Gain on the skies, and soar above the sight.

And oft before tempestuous winds arise,
The seeming stars fall headlong from the skies;
And, shooting through the darkness, gild the night
With sweeping glories, and long trails of light:
And chaff with eddy winds is whirl'd around,
And dancing leaves are lifted from the ground;
And floating feathers on the waters play.

But when the winged thunder takes his way
From the cold north, and east and west engage,
And at their frontiers meet with equal rage,
The clouds are crush'd, a glut of gather'd rain
The hollow ditches fills, and floats the plain,
And sailors furl their dropping sheets amain.

Wet weather seldom hurts the most unwise,
So plain the signs, such prophets are the skies:
The wary crane foresees it first, and sails
Above the storm, and leaves the lowly vales:
The cow looks up, and from afar can find
The change of Heaven, and snuffs it in the wind.
The swallow skims the river's watery face, [race.
The frogs renew the croaks of their loquacious

The careful ant her secret cell forsakes,
And drags her eggs along the narrow tracks.
At either horn the rainbow drinks the flood,
Rage flocks of rising rooks forsake their food,
And, crying, seek the shelter of the wood,

Besides, the several sorts of watery fowls,
That swim the seas, or haunt the standing pools:
The swans that sail along the silver flood,
And dive with stretching necks to search their food,
Then lave their backs with sprinkling dews in vain,
And stem the stream to meet the promis'd rain.
The crow, with clamorous cries, the shower do
And single stalks along the desert sands. [mands,
The nightly virgin, while her wheel she plies,
Foresees the storms impending in the skies,
When sparkling lamps their sputtering light ad-
And in the sockets oily bubbles dance. [vance,

Then after showers, 'tis easy to decry
Returning suns, and a serener sky:
The stars shine smarter, and the Moon adorns,
As with unborrow'd beams, her sharpen'd horns.
The filmy gossamer now sits no more,
Nor halcyons bask on the short sunny shore:
Their litter is not toss'd by sows unclean,
But a blue droughty mist descends upon the plain,
And owls, that mark the setting Sun, declare
A starlight evening, and a morning fair
Towering aloft, avenging Nisus flies,
While dar'd below the guilty Scylla lies.
Wherever frighted Scylla flies away,
Swift Nisus follows, and pursues his prey.
Where injur'd Nisus takes his airy course,
Thence trembling Scylla flies, and shrugs his force.
This punishment pursues th' unhappy maid,
And thus the purple hair is dearly paid.
Then, thrice the ravens read the liquid air,
And croaking notes proclaim the settled fair.
Then, round their airy palaces they fly,
To greet the Sun: and seiz'd with secret joy,
When storms are over-blown, with food repair
To their forsaken nests, and callow care.

Not that I think their breasts with heavenly souls
Inspir'd, as man, who destiny controls;
But with the changeful temper of the skies,
As rains condense, and sunshine rarifies;
So turn the species in their alter'd minds,
Compos'd by calms, and decompos'd by winds.
From hence proceeds the birds' harmonious voice?
From hence the cows exult, and frisking lambs re-
Observe the daily circle of the Sun, [joice.

And the short year of each revolving Moon:
By them thou shalt foresee the following day;
Nor shall a starry night thy hopes betray.
When first the Moon appears, if then she shrouds
Her silver crescent, tipp'd with sable clouds;
Conclude she bodes a tempest on the main,
And brews for fields impetuous floods of rain.

Or if her face with fiery flushing glow,
Expect the rattling winds aloft to blow.
But four nights old, (for that's the surest sign,)
With sharpen'd horns if glorious thee she shine;
Next day, not only that, but all the Moon,
Till her revolving race be wholly run,
Are void of tempests both by land and sea,
And sailors in the port their promis'd vows shall
Above the rest, the Sun, who never lies, [pay.

Foretels the change of weather in the skies;
For, if he rise, unwilling to his race,
Clouds on his brow, and spots upon his face;
Or if through mist he shoots his sullen beams,
Frugal of light, in loose and straggling streams
Suspect a drizzling day, with southern rain,
Fatal to fruits, and flocks, and promis'd grain.
Or if Aurora with half-open'd eyes,
And a pale sickly cheek; salute the skies,

How shall the vine, with tender leaves defend
Her teeming clusters, when the storms descend;
When rigid roofs and tiles can scarce avail
To bar the ruin of the rattling hail?
But, more than all, the setting Sun survey,
When down the steep of Heaven he drives the day.
For oft we find him finishing his race
With various colours erring on his face;
If fiery red his glowing globe descends,
High winds and furious tempests he portends:
But if his cheeks are swoln with livid blue,
He bodes wet weather by his watery hue;
If dusky spots are vary'd on his brow,
And streak'd with red a troubled colour show;
That sullen mixture shall at once declare
Winds, rain, and storms, and elemental war.
What desperate madmen then would venture o'er
The frith, or haul his cables from the shore?
But if with purple rays he brings the light,
And a pure Heaven resigns to quiet night,
No rising winds, or falling storms are nigh:
But northern breezes through the forest fly,
And drive the rack, and purge the ruffled sky.
Th' unerring Sun by certain signs declares,
What the late ev'n, or early morn prepares:
And when the south projects a stormy day, [away.
And when the clearing north will puff the clouds

The Sun reveals the secrets of the sky;
And who dares give the source of light the lie?
The change of empires often he declares,
Fierce tumults, hidden treasons, open wars.
He first the fate of Cæsar did foretel,
In iron clouds conceal'd the public light;
And impious mortals fear'd eternal night.

Nor was the fact foretold by him alone:
Nature herself stood forth, and seconded the Sun.
Earth, air, and seas, with prodigies were sign'd,
And birds obscene, and howling dogs divin'd.
What socks did Ætna's bellowing mouth expire
From her torn entrails; and what floods of fire!
What clanks were heard, in German skies afar,
Of arms and armies, rushing to the war!
Dire earthquakes rent the solid Alps below,
And from their summits shook th' eternal snow:
Pale spectres in the close of night were seen;
And voices heard of more than mortal men,
In silent groves, dumb sheep and oxen spoke,
And streams ran backward, and their beds forsook:
The yawning Earth disclose'd th' abyss of Hell:
The weeping statues did the wars foretel;
And holy sweat from brazen idols fell.
Then rising in his might, the king of floods
Rush'd through the forests, tore the lofty woods;
And rolling onward, with a sweepy sway,
Bore houses, herds, and labouring hinds away.
Blood sprang from wells, wolves howl'd in towns by
night,

And boding victims did the priests affright.
Such peals of thunder never pour'd from high,
Nor forky lightnings flash'd from such a sullen
Red meteors ran across th' ethereal space; [sky.
Stars disappear'd, and comets took their place.
For this, th' Emathian plains once more were strow'd
With Roman bodies, and just Heaven thought good
To fatten twice those fields with Roman blood.
Then, after length of time, the labouring swains,
Who turn the turfs of those unhappy plains,
Shall rusty piles from the plough'd furrows take,
And over empty helmets pass the rake.

Amaz'd at antique titles on the stones,
And mighty relics of gigantic bones.

Ye homeborn deities, of mortal birth!
Thou, father Romulus, and mother Earth,
Goddess unmov'd! whose guardian arms extend O'er Tuscan Tiber's course, and Roman towers defend;

With youthful Cæsar your joint powers engage,
Nor hinder him to save the sinking age.
O! let the blood, already spilt, atone
For the past crimes of curst Laomedon! [know,
Heaven wants thee there; and long the gods, we
Have grudg'd thee, Cæsar, to the world below:
Where fraud and rapine, right and wrong confound!
Where impious arms from every part reason,
And monstrous crimes in every shape are crown'd.
The peaceful peasant to the wars is prest;
The fields lie fallow in inglorious rest;
The plain no pasture to the flock affords,
The crooked scythes are straighten'd into swords:
And there Euphrates her soft offspring arms,
And here the Rhine rebellows with alarms;
The neighbouring cities range on several sides,
Perfidious Mars long plighted leagues divide,
And o'er the wasted world in triumph rides.
So four fierce coursers starting to the race,
Scour through the plain, and lengthen every pace:
Nor reins, nor curbs, nor threatening cries they
But force along the trembling charioteer. [far,

THE SECOND BOOK OF
THE GEORGICS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THE subject of the following book is planting. In handling of which argument, the poet shows all the different methods of raising trees: describes their variety; and gives rules for the management of each in particular. He then points out the soils in which the several plants thrive best: and thence takes occasion to run out into the praises of Italy. After which he gives some directions for discovering the nature of every soil; prescribes rules for dressing of vines, olives, &c. and concludes the georgic with a paenegyric on a country life.

Thus far of tillage, and of heavenly signs;
Now sing, my Muse, the growth of generous vines;
The shady groves, the woodland progeny,
And the slow product of Minerva's tree.

Great father Bacchus! to my song repair;
For clustering grapes are thy peculiar care:
For these large bunches load the bending vine,
And the last blessings of the year are thine;
To thee his joys the jolly Autumn owes,
When the fermenting juice the vat o'erflows.
Come strip with me, my god, come drench all o'er
Thy limbs in must of wine, and drink at every pore.

Some trees their birth to bounteous Nature owe;
For some without the pains of planting grow.
With others thus the banks of brooks abound,
Sprung from the watery genius of the ground:
From the same principle gray willows come;
Herculean poplar, and the tender broom.
But some from seeds enclos'd in earth arise;
For thus the mastful chestnut mates the skies.

nee rise the branching beech and vocal oak,
 here Jove of old oraculously spoke.
 me from the root a rising wood disclose ;
 us elms, and thus the savage cherry grows :
 as the green bay, that binds the poet's brows,
 not, and is shelter'd by the mother's boughs.
 These ways of planting, Nature did ordain,
 v trees and shrubs, and all the sylvan reign.
 hers there are, by late experience found :
 me cut the shoot, and plant in furrow'd ground ;
 me cover rooted stalks in deeper mould :
 me cloven stakes, and (wondrous to behold),
 air sharpen'd ends in earth their footing place,
 id the dry poles produce a living race.
 me bow their vines, which, bury'd in the plain,
 air tops in distant arches rise again.
 hers no root require, the labourer cuts
 ang slips, and in the soil securely puts.
 f'n stamps of olives, bar'd of leaves, and dead,
 vive, and oft redeem their wither'd head.
 is usual now, an innate graft to see ith insolence invade a foreign tree :
 us pears and quinces from the crab-tree come ;
 id thus the ruddy coral bears the plum.
 Then let the learned gardener mark with care
 e kinds of stocks, and what those kinds will bear, explore the nature of each several tree ;
 id known, improve with artful industry ;
 id let no spot of idle earth be found,
 id cultivate the genius of the ground.
 r open Ismarus will Bacchus please ;
 abrus loves the shade of olive-trees.
 The virtues of the several soils I sing.
 lacans, now thy needful succour bring !
 thou ! the better part of my renown,
 spire thy poet, and thy poem crown ;
 smart with me, while I new tracks explore,
 'th flying sails and breezes from the shore :
 at that my song, in such a scanty space,
 o large a subject fully can embrace :
 at though I were supply'd with iron lungs,
 hundred mouths, all'd with as many tongues :
 st steer my vessel with a steady hand,
 id coast along the shore in sight of land.
 or will I tire thy patience with a train
 f produce, or what ancient poets feign.
 e trees, which of themselves advance in air,
 e barren kinds, but strongly built and fair :
 cease the vigour of the native Earth sustain the plant, and makes a manly birth.
 at these, receiving grafts of other kind,
 r these transplanted, change their savage mind ;
 heir wildness lose, and quitting Nature's part,
 bey the rules and discipline of art.
 he same do trees, that, sprung from barren roots
 open fields, transplanted bear their fruits.
 r where they grow, the native energy
 urns all into the substance of the tree, arves and destroys the fruit, is only made
 r brawny bulk, and for a barren shade.
 he plant that shoots from seed, a sullen tree
 t leisure grows, for late posterity ;
 he generous flavour lost, the fruits decay,
 id savage grapes are made the birds' ignoble prey.
 uch labour is requir'd in trees, to tame heir wild disorder, and in ranks reclaim.
 fell must the ground be digg'd, and better dress'd,
 ew soil to make, and meliorate the rest.
 id stakes of olive-trees in plants revive ;
 y the same methods Paphlagon myrtles live ;
 ut nobler vines by propagation thrive.

From roots hard hazles, and from cyons rise
 Tall ash, and taller oak that mates the skies :
 Palm, poplar, fir, descending from the steep
 Of hills, to try the dangers of the deep,
 The thin-leaf'd arbut, hazle-grafts receives,
 And planes huge apples bear, that bore but leaves.

Thus mastful beech the bristly chesnut bears,
 And the wild ash is white with blooming pears,
 And greedily swine from grafted elms are fed
 With falling acorns, that on oaks are bred.

But various are the ways to change the state
 Of plants, to bud, to graft, t' inoculate.
 For where the tender rinds of trees disclose
 Their shooting gems, a swelling knot there grows ;
 Just in that space a narrow slit we make,
 Then other buds from bearing trees we take :
 Inserted thus, the wounded rind we close,
 In whose moist womb th' admitted infant grows.
 But when the smoother bole from knots is free,
 We make a deep incision in the tree ;
 And in the solid wood the slip enclose,
 The battening bastard shoots again and grows ;
 And in short space the laden boughs arise,
 With happy fruit advancing to the skies.
 The mother-plant admires the leaves unknown
 Of alien trees, and apples not her own.

Of vegetable woods are various kinds,
 And the same species are of several minds.
 Lotes, willows, elms, have different forms allow'd,
 So funeral cypress rising like a shroud.
 Fat olive-trees of sundry sorts appear,
 Of sundry shapes their unctuous berries bear.
 Raddii long olives, orchites round produce,
 And bitter Pausia pounded for the juice.
 Alcinois' orchard various apples bears :
 Unlike are bergamots and pounder pears.
 Nor our Italian vines produce the shape,
 Or taste, or flavour of the Lesbian grape.
 The Thasian vines in richer soils abound,
 The Meriotique grow in barren ground.
 The Pythian grape we dry : Lagan juice
 Will stammering tongues and staggering feet pro-
 Rathe ripe are some, and some of later kind duce.

Of golden some, and some of purple rind.
 How shall I praise the Ræthean grape divine,
 Which yet contends not with Falernian wine !
 Th' Amicean many a consulship survives,
 And longer than the Lydian vintage lives,
 Or high Phœneus king of Chian growth :
 But for large quantities and lasting both,
 The less Argitis bears the prize away.
 The Rhodian, sacred to the solemn day,
 In second services is pour'd to Jove ;
 And best accepted by the gods above.
 Nor must Bumastus his old honours lose,
 In length and largeness like the dugs of cows.
 I pass the rest, whose every race and name,
 And kinds, are less material to my theme.
 Which who would learn, as soon may tell the sands,

Driven by the western wind on Lybian lands ;
 Or number, when the blustering Euros roars,
 The billows beating on Ionian shores.

Nor every plant on every soil will grow :
 The sallow loves the watery ground, and low ;
 The marshes, alders ; nature seems t' ordain
 The rocky cliff for the wild ash's reign ;
 The baleful yew to northern blasts assigns ;
 To shores the myrtles, and to mounts the vines.

Regard th' extremest cultivated coast,
 From hot Arabia to the Scythian frost :
 All sorts of trees their several countries know,
 Black ebony only will in India grow :
 And odorous frankincense on the Sabæan bough.
 Balm slowly trickles through the bleeding veins
 Of happy shrubs, in Idumean plains.
 The green Egyptian thorn, for medicine good ;
 With Ethiop's hoary trees and woolly wood,
 Let others tell : and how the Seres spin
 Their fleecy forest in a slender twine.
 With mighty trunks of trees on Indian shores,
 Whose height above the feather'd arrow soars,
 Shot from the toughest bow ; and by the brawn
 Of expert archers with vast vigour drawn.
 Sharp-tasted citrons Median climes produce :
 Bitter the rind, but generous is the juice :
 A cordial fruit, a present antidote
 Against the direful stepdame's deadly draught ;
 Who, mixing wicked deeds with words impure,
 The fate of envy'd orphans would procure.
 Large is the plant, and like a laurel grows,
 And did it not a different scent disclose,
 A laurel were : the fragrant flowers contain
 The stormy winds, tenacious of their stem.
 With this the Medes to labouring age bequeath
 New lungs, and cure the sourness of the breath.

But neither Median woods, (a plenteous land)

Fair Ganges, Hermus rolling golden sand,
 Nor Bactria, nor the richer Indian fields,
 Nor all the gummy stores Arabia yields ;
 Nor any foreign earth of greater name,
 Can with sweet Italy contend in fame.
 No bulls, whose nostrils breath a living flame,
 Have turn'd our turf, no teeth of serpents here
 Were sown, an armed host, an iron crop to bear.

But fruitful vines, and the fat olive's freight,
 And harvests heavy with their fruitful weight,
 Adorn our fields ; and on the cheerful green,
 The grazing flocks and lowing herds are seen.
 The warrior horse, here bred, is taught to train :
 There flows Clitumnus through the flowery plain ;
 Whose waves for triumphs, after prosperous war,
 The victim ox and snowy sheep prepare.
 Perpetual spring our happy climate sees ;
 Twice breed the cattle, and twice bear the trees ;
 And summer suns recede by slow degrees.

Our land is from the rage of tigers freed,
 Nor nourishes the lion's angry seed ;
 Nor poisonous aconite is here produc'd,
 Or grows unknown, or is, when known, refus'd.
 Nor in so vast a length our serpents glide,
 Or rais'd on such a spiry volume ride.

Next add our cities of illustrious name,
 Their costly labour, and stupendous frame :
 Our forts on steepy hills, that far below
 See wanton streams in winding valleys flow.
 Our twofold seas, that, washing either side,
 A rich recruit of foreign stores provide.
 Our spacious lakes ; thee, Larius, first ; and next
 Benacus, with tempestuous billows vex.
 Or shall I praise thy ports, or mention make
 Of the vast mound that binds the Lucrine lake ;
 Or the disdainful sea, that, shut from thence,
 Roars round the structure, and invades the fence ;
 There, where secure the Julian waters glide,
 Or where Avernus' jaws admit the Tyrrhene tide ;
 Our quarries deep in Earth were fam'd of old
 For veins of silver, and for ore of gold,

Th' inhabitants themselves their country grace ;
 Hence rose the Marsian and Sabelian race ;
 Strong-limb'd and stout, and to the wars inclin'd,
 And hard Iugurians, a laborious kind ;
 And Volscians, arm'd with iron-headed darts,
 Besides an offspring of undaunted hearts,
 The Decii, Marii, great Canillus came
 From hence, and greater Scipio's double name :
 And mighty Cæsar, whose victorious arms
 To farthest Asia carry fierce alarms ;
 Avert unwarlike Indians from his Rome ;
 Triumph abroad, secure our peace at home.

Hail, sweet Saturnian soil ! of fruitful grain
 Great parent, greater of illustrious men,
 For thee my tuneful accents will I raise,
 And treat of arts disclos'd in ancient days :
 Once more unlock for thee the sacred spring,
 And old Aærcæan verse in Roman cities sing.

The nature of their several soils now see,
 Their strength, their colour, their fertility :
 And first for heath, and barren, hilly ground,
 Where meagre clay and flinty stones abound ;
 Where the poor soil all succour seems to want,
 Yet this suffices the Palladian plant.
 Undoubted signs of such a soil are found,
 For here wild olive shoots o'erspread the ground,
 And heaps of berries strew the fields around.
 But where the soil, with fattening moisture fill'd,
 Is cloth'd with grass, and fruitful to be till'd,
 Such as in cheerful vales we view from high ;
 Which dripping rocks with rolling streams supply,
 And feed with ooze, where rising hillocks run
 In length, and open to the southern Sun ;
 Where fern succeeds, ungrateful to the plough,
 That gentle ground to generous grapes allow ;
 Strong stocks of vines it will in time produce,
 And overflow the vats with friendly juice ;
 Such as our priests in golden goblets pour
 To gods, the givers of the cheerful hour ;
 Then when the bloated Tuscan blows his horn,
 And reeking entrails are in chargers borne.

If herds or flocks be more thy care,
 Or goats that graze the field, and burn it bare,
 Then seek Tarentum's laws and farthest coast,
 Or such a field as hapless Mantua lost :
 Where silver swans sail down the watery road,
 And graze the floating herbage of the flood,
 There crystal streams perpetual tenour keep,
 Nor food nor springs are wanting to thy sheep,
 For what the day devours, the nightly dew
 Shall to the morn in pearly drops renew.
 Fat crumbling earth is fitter for the plough,
 Putrid and loose above, and black below ;
 For ploughing is an imitative toil,
 Resembling nature in an easy soil.
 No land for seed like this, no fields afford
 So large an income to the village-lord !
 No toiling teams from harvest labour come
 So late at night, so heavy laden home.
 The like of forest land is understood,
 From whence the surly ploughman grabs the
 Which had for length of ages idle stood. [wood,
 Then birds forsake the ruins of their seat, [forget
 And flying from their nests their callow young
 The coarse lea : gravel on the mountain sides,
 Scarce dewy beverage for the bees provides :
 Nor chalk nor crumbling stones, the food of snakes,
 That work in hollow earth their winding tracks
 The soil exhaling clouds of subtle dews,
 Imbibing moisture which with ease she spews,

Which rests not from, and whose mould is clean,
Well cloth'd with cheerful grass, and ever green,
Is good for olives, and aspiring vines,
Embracing husband elms, in amorous twines!
Is fit for feeding cattle, fit to sow,
And equal to the pasture and the plough.

Such is the soil of fat Campanian fields,
Such large increase the land that joins Vesuvius yields;

And such a country could Acerra boast,
Till Clanius overflow'd th' unhappy coast.
I teach thee next the differing soils to know;
The light for vines, the heavier for the plough.
Choose first a place for such a purpose fit,
There dig the solid earth, and sink a pit.
Next fill the hole with its own earth again,
And trample with thy foot, and tread it in;
Then if it rise not to the former height
Of surface, conclude that soil is light:
A proper ground for pasture and vines.
But if the sullen earth, so press'd, repines,
Within its native mansion to retire,
And stays without, a heap of heavy mire;
'Tis good for arable, a glebe that asks
Tough teams of oxen, and laborious tasks.

Salt earth and bitter are not fit to sow,
Nor will be tam'd and mended by the plough,
Sweet grapes degenerate there, and fruits, declin'd
From their first flavours taste, renounce their kind.

This truth by sure experiment is try'd:
For first an osier colander provide
Of twigs thick wrought (such toiling peasantswise,
When through strait passages they strain their wine;)

In this close vessel place that earth accurs'd,
But fill'd brimful with wholesome water first:
Then run it through, the drops will rope around,
And by the bitter taste disclose the ground.
The fatter earth by handling we may find,
With ease distinguish'd from the meagre kind:
Poor soil will crumble into dust, the rich
Will to the fingers cleave like clammy pitch:
Moist earth produces corn and grass, but both
Too rank and too luxuriant in their growth.
Let not my land so large a promise boast,
Lest the lank ears in length of stem be lost.
The heavier earth is by her weight betray'd,
The lighter in the poisoning hand is weigh'd:
'Tis easy to distinguish by the sight,
The colour of the soil, and black from white.
But the cold ground is difficult to know,
Yet this the plants, that prosper there, will show;
Black ivy, pitch trees, and the baleful yew
These rules consider'd well, with early care
The vineyard destin'd for thy vines prepare:
But, long before the planting, dig the ground,
With furrows deep that cast a rising mound:
The clouds expos'd to winter winds will bake,
For putrid earth will best in vineyards take,
And hoary frosts, after the painful toil
Of delving hinds, will rot the mellow soil.

Some peasants not t' omit the nicest care,
Of the same soil their nursery prepare,
With that of their plantation; lest the tree
Translated, should not with the soil agree.
Beside, to plant it as it was, they mark
The Heaven's four quarters on the tender bark;
And to the north or south restore the side,
Which at their birth did heat or cold abide.

So strong is custom, such effects can see
In tender souls of pliant plants produce.

Choose next a province for thy vineyard's reign,
On hills above, or on the lowly plain:
If fertile fields or vallies be thy choice,
Plant this k. for bounteous Bacchus will rejoice
In close plantations there. But if the vine
On rising ground be plac'd, or hills supine,
Extend thy loose battalions largely wide,
Opening thy ranks and files on either side:
But marshall'd all in order as they stand,
And let no soldier straggle from his band,
As legions in the field their front display,
To try the fortune of some doubtful day,
And move to meet their foes with sober pace,
Strict to their figure, though in wider space,
Before the battle joins; while from afar
The field yet glitters with the pomp of war,
And equal Mars like an impartial lord,
Leaves all to fortune, and the dint of sword;
So let thy vines in intervals be set,
But not their rural discipline forget:
Indulge their width, and add a roomy space,
That their extremest lines may scarce embrace:
Nor this alone t' indulge a vain delight,
And make a pleasing prospect for the sight:
But for the ground itself, this only way
Can equal vigour to the plants convey;
Which, crowded, want the room their branches to display.

How deep they must be planted, would'st thou
know?

In shallow furrows vines securely grow.
Not so the rest of plants; for Jove's own tree,
That holds the woods in awful sovereignty,
Requires a depth of lodging in the ground;
And, next the lower skies, a bed profound:
High as his topmost boughs to Heaven ascend,
So low his roots to Hell's dominion tend.
Therefore, nor winds, nor winter's rage o'erthrows
His bulky body, but unmov'd he grows.
For length of ages lasts his happy reign,
And lives of mortal man contend in vain.
Full in the midst of his own strength he stands,
Stretching his brawny arms, and leafy hands;
His shade protects the plains, his head the hills
commands.

The hurtful hazle in thy vineyard shun;
Nor plant it to receive the setting Sun:
Nor break the topmost branches from the tree;
Nor prune, with blunted knife, the progeny.
Root up wild olives from thy labour'd lands:
For sparkling fire from hinds' unwear'd hands,
Is often scatter'd o'er their unctuous rinds,
And after spread abroad by raging winds.
For first the mouldering flame the trunk receives,
Ascending thence, it crackles in the leaves;
At length victorious to the top ascends,
Involving all the wood in smoky fires,
But most, when driven by winds, the flaming storm
Of the long files destroys the beauteous form,
In ashes then th' unhappy vineyard lies,
Nor will the blasted plants from ruin rise:
Nor will the wither'd stock be green again,
But the wild olive shoots, and shades th' ungrateful plain.

Be not seduc'd with wisdom's empty shows,
To stir the peaceful ground when Boreas blows.
When winter frosts constrain the field with cold,
The fainty root can take no steady hold.

But when the golden spring reveals the year,
And the white bird returns, whom serpents fear;
That season deem the best to plant thy vines,
Next that, is when autumnal warmth declines;
Ere heat is quite decay'd, or cold begun,
Or Capricorn admits the winter Sun.

The spring adorns the woods, renews the leaves,
The womb of Earth the genial seed receives.
For then almighty Jove descends, and pours
Into his buxom bride his fruitful showers:
And, mixing his large limbs with hers, he feeds
Her birth with kindly juice, and fosters teeming seeds.

Then joyous birds frequent the lonely grove,
And beasts, by Nature stung, renew their love.
Then fields the blades of bury'd corn disclose,
And, while the balmy western spirit blows,
Earth to the breath her bosom dafes expose.
With kindly moisture then the plants abound,
The grass securely springs above the ground;
The tender twig shoots upward to the skies,
And on the faith of the new Sun relies.
The swerving vines on the tall elms prevail
Unhurt by southern showers or northern hail.
They spread their gems the genial warmth to share,
And boldly trust the buds in open air.
In this soft season (let me dare to sing)
The world was hatch'd by Heaven's imperial king:
In prime of all the year, and holidays of spring.
Then did the new creation first appear;
Nor other was the tenour of the year:
When laughing Heaven did the great birth attend,
And eastern winds their wintery breath suspend:
Then sheep first saw the Sun in open fields;
And savage beasts were sent to stock the wilds:
And golden stars flew up to light the skies,
And man's relentless race from stony quarries rise.
Nor could the tender, new creation, bear
Th' excessive heats or coldness of the year;
But, chill'd by winter, or by summer fir'd,
The middle temper of the Spring requir'd.

When warmth and moisture did at once abound,
And Heaven's indulgence brooded on the ground.
For what remains, in depth of earth secure
Thy cover'd plants, and dung with hot manure;
And shells and gravel in the ground enclose;
For through their hollow chinks the water flows:
Which, thus imbib'd, returns in misty dews,
And, steaming up, the rising plant renews.
Some husbandmen, of late, have found the way,
A hilly heap of stones above to lay,
And press the plants with shreds of potters' clay.
This fence against immoderate rain they found:
Or when the Dog-star cleaves the thirsty ground.
Be mindful, when thou hast entomb'd the shoot,
With store of earth around to feed the root;
With iron teeth of rakes and prongs to move
The crusted earth, and loosen it above.
Then exercise thy sturdy steers to plough
Betwixt thy vines, and teach the feeble row
To mount on reeds and wands, and, upward led,
On ashen poles to raise their forky head.
On these new crutches let them learn to walk,
Till, swerving upwards, with a stronger stalk,
They brave the winds, and, clinging to their guide,
On tops of elms at length triumphant ride.
But in their tender nonage, while they spread
Their springing leaves, and lift their infant head,
And upward while they shoot in open air,
Laduge their childhood, and the nursing spare.

Nor exercise thy rage on newborn life,
But let thy hand supply the pruning-knife;
And crop luxuriant stragglers, nor be loth
To strip the branches of their leafy growth:
But when the rooted vines, with steady hold,
Can clasp their elms, then, husbandmen, be bold
To lop the disobedient boughs, that stray'd
Beyond their ranks: let crooked steel invade
The lawless troops, which discipline disdain,
And their superfluous growth with rigour tame.
Next, fence'd with hedges and deep ditches round,
Exclude th' encroaching cattle from thy ground,
While yet the tender germs but just appear,
Unable to sustain th' uncertain year;
Whose leaves are not alone foul winter's prey,
But oft by summer suns are scorch'd away;
And, worse than both, become th' unworthy browse,
Of buffaloes, salt goats, and hungry cows.
For not December's frost that burns the boughs,
Nor dog-days parching heat that splits the rocks,
Are half so harmful as the greedy flocks; [stock
Their venom'd bite, and scars indented on the
For this the malefactor goat was laid
On Bacchus' altar, and his forfeit paid.
At Athens thus old comedy began,
When round the streets the reeling actors ran;
In country villages, and crossing ways,
Contending for the prizes of their plays:
And glad, with Bacchus, on the grassy soil,
Lept o'er the skins of goats bescur'd with oil.
Thus Roman youth, deriv'd from ruin'd Troy,
In rude Saturnian rhymes express their joy:
With taunts, and laughter loud, their audience
please,

Deform'd with vizards, cut from barks of trees:
In jolly hymns they praise the god of wine,
Whose earthen images adorn the pine,
And there are hung on high, in honour of the vine;
A madness so devout the vineyard fills,
In hollow vallies and on rising hills;
On what'er side he turns his honest face,
And dances in the wind, those fields are in his grace.
To Bacchus therefore let us tune our lays,
And in our mother-tongue resound his praise.
Thin cakes in chargers, and a guilty goat,
Dragg'd by the horns, be to his altars brought;
Whose offer'd entrails shall his crime reproach,
And drip their fatness from the hazle broach.
To dress thy vines new labour is requir'd,
Nor must the painful husbandman be tir'd:
For thrice, at least, in compass of a year,
Thy vineyard must employ the sturdy steer,
To turn the glebe; besides thy daily pain
To break the clods, and make the surface plain:
To unload the branches, or the leaves to thin,
That suck the vital moisture of the vine.
Thus in a circle runs the peasant's pain,
And the year rolls within itself again.
Ev'n in the lowest months, when storms have shed
From vines the hairy honours of their head,
Not then the drudging hind his labour eads,
But to the coming year his care extends:
Ev'n then the naked vine he persecutes;
His pruning-knife at once reforms and cuts.
Be first to dig the ground, be first to burn
The branches lopt, and first the props return
Into thy house, that bore the burden'd vines;
But last to reap the vintage of thy vines.
Twice in the year luxuriant leaves o'er shade
Th' encumber'd vine; rough brambles twice invade;

Hard labour both! commend the large excess
Of spacious vineyards; cultivate the least.
Besides, in woods the shrubs of prickly thorn,
Sallows and reeds, on banks of rivers born,
Remain to cut: for vineyards useful found,
To stay thy vines, and fence thy fruitful ground.
Nor when thy tender trees at length are bound;
When peaceful vines from pruning-hooks are free,
When husbands have survey'd the last degree,
And utmost files of plants, and order'd every tree;
Er'n when they sing at ease in full content,
Insulting o'er the toils they underwent;
Yet still they find a future task remain:
To turn the soil, and break the clods again;
And after all, their joys are unsincere,
While falling rains on ripening grapes they fear.
Quite opposite to these are olives found,
No dressing they require, and dread no wound;
No rakes nor harrows need, but fix'd below,
Rejoice in open air, and unconcern'dly grow.
The soil itself due nourishment supplies: •
Plough but the furrows, and the fruits arise;
Content with small endeavours till they spring.
Soft peace they figure, and sweet plenty bring:
Then olives plant, and hymns to Pallas sing.

Thus apple-trees, whose trunks are strong to bear
Their spreading boughs, exert themselves in air;
Want no supply, but stand secure alone,
Not trusting foreign forces, but their own;
Till with the ruddy freight the bending branches
groan.

Thus trees of Nature, and each common bush,
Uncultivated thrive, and with red berries blush;
Vile shrubs are shorn for browse: the towering
height

Of unctuous trees are torches for the night.
And shall we doubt (indulging easy sloth)
To sow, to set, and to reform their growth?
To leave the lofty plants; the lowly kind
Are for the shepherd or the sheep design'd.
Er'n a humble broom and osiers have their use,
And shade for sheep, and food for flocks, produce;
Hedges for corn, and honey for the bees:
Beside the pleasing prospect of the trees.
How goodly looks Cytorus, ever green
With boxen groves! with what delight are seen
Narycian woods of pitch, whose gloomy shade
Seems for retreat of heavenly Muses made!
But much more pleasing are those fields to see,
That need not ploughs, nor human industry.
Er'n old Caucasian rocks with trees are spread,
And wear green forests on their hilly head.
Though bending from the blast of eastern storms,
Though sheat their leaves, and shatter'd are their arms;

Yet Heaven their various plants for use designs:
For houses cedars, and for shipping pines;
Cypress provides for spokes, and wheels of wains;
And all for keels of ships that scour the watery plains.

Willows in twigs are fruitful, elms in leaves;
The war from stubborn myrtle shafts receives:
From cornels javelins; and the tougher yew
Receives the bending figure of a bow.
Nor box, nor limes, without their use are made,
Smooth grain'd, and proper for the turner's trade;
Which curious hands may carve, and steel with ease invade.

Right alder stems the Po's impetuous tides,
And bees in hollow oaks their honey hide.

Now balance with these gifts the fummy joys
Of wine, attended with eternal noise.
Wine urg'd to lawless lust the Centaurs' train,
Through wine they quarrel'd, and through wine were slain.

O happy, if he knew his happy state!
The swain, who, free from business and debate,
Receives his easy food from Nature's hand,
And just returns of cultivated land!
No palace, with a lofty gate, he wants,
To admit the tides of early visitants,
With eager eyes devouring, as they pass,
The breathing figures of Corinthian brass.
No statues threaten from high pedestals;
No Persian arras hides his homely walls,
With antic vests; which, through their shady fold,
Betray the streaks of ill-dissembled gold.
He boasts no wool, whose native white is dy'd
With purple poison of Assyrian pride.
No costly drugs of Araby defile
With foreign scents the sweetness of his oil.
But easy quiet, a secure retreat,
A harmless life that knows not how to cheat,
With homelord plenty the rich owner bless,
And rural pleasures crown his happiness.
Unvex'd with quarrels, undisturb'd with noise,
The country king his peaceful realm enjoys:
Cool grots, and living lakes, the flowery pride
Of meads, and streams that through the valley
And shady groves that easy sleep invite, [glide,
And after toilsome days a soft repose at night.
Wild beasts of nature in his woods abound;
And youth, of labour patient, plough the ground,
Inur'd to hardship, and to homely fare,
Nor venerable age is wanting there,
In great examples to the youthful train;
Nor are the gods ador'd with rites profane.
From hence Astrea took her flight, and here
The prints of her departing steps appear.

Ye sacred Muses, with whose beauty fir'd,
My soul is ravish'd, and my brain inspir'd;
Whose priest I am, whose holy fillets wear,
Would you your poet's first petition bear:
Give me the ways of wandering stars to know:
The depths of Heaven above, and Earth below.
Teach me the various labours of the Moon,
And whence proceed th' eclipses of the Sun.
Why flowing tides prevail upon the main,
And in what dark recess they shrink again,
What shakes the solid earth, what cause delays
The summer nights, and shortens winter days.
But if my heavy blood restrain the flight,
Of my free soul, aspiring to the height
Of Nature and unclouded fields of light;
My next desire is, void of care and strife,
To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life:
A country cottage near a crystal flood,
A winding valley, and a lofty wood.
Some god conduct me to the sacred shades,
Where bacchanals are sung by Spartan maids,
Or lift me high to Hemus' hilly crown;
Or in the plains of Tempe lay me down:
Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race.

Happy the man, who, studying Nature's laws,
Through known effects can trace the secret cause.
His mind possessing in a quiet state,
Fearless of Fortune, and resign'd to Fate.
And happy too is he, who decks the bowers
Of sylvans, and adores the rural powers:

Whose mind, unmov'd, the bribes of courts can see;
 Their glittering baits and purple slavery.
 Nor hopes the people's praise, nor fears their frown,
 Nor when contending kindred tear the crown,
 Will set up one, or pull another down.

Without concern he hears, but hears from far,
 Of tumults and descents, and distant war:
 Not with a superstitious fear is aw'd,
 For what befalls at home, or what abroad.
 Nor envies he the rich their heapy store,
 Nor his own peace disturbs, with pity for the poor.
 He feeds on fruits, which, of their own accord,
 The willing ground and laden trees afford.
 From his lov'd home no lucre him can draw;
 The senate's mad decrees he never saw;
 Nor heard, at bawling bars, corrupted law,
 Some to the seas and some to camps resort,
 And some with impudence invade the court.
 In foreign countries others seek renown;
 With wars and taxes others waste their own,
 And houses burn, and household gods deface,
 To drink in bowls which glittering gems enchain:
 To loll on couches, rich with Cytron steds,
 And lay their guilty limbs on Tyrian beds,
 This wretch in earth intombs his golden ore,
 Hovering and brooding on his bury'd store.
 Some patriot fools to popular praise aspire
 Of public speeches, which worse fools admire;
 While from both benches, with redoubled sounds,
 Th' applause of lords and commoners abounds.
 Some through ambition, or through thirst of gold,
 Have slain their brothers, or their country sold;
 And leaving their sweet homes, in exile run
 To lands that lie beneath another sun

The peasant, innocent of all these ills,
 With crooked ploughs the fertile fallows tills;
 And the round year with daily labour fills.
 And hence the country-markets are supply'd:
 Enough remains for household charge beside:
 His wife and tender children to sustain,
 And gratefully to feed his dumb deserving train.
 Nor cease his labours, till the yellow field
 A full return of bearded harvest yield:
 A crop so plentiful as the land to load,
 O'ercome the crowded barns, and lodge on ricks abroad.

Thus every several season is employ'd:
 Some spent in toil, and some in ease enjoy'd.
 The yearning ewes prevent the springing year;
 The laded boughs their fruits in autumn bear:
 'Tis then the vine her liquid harvest yields,
 Bak'd in the sunshine of ascending fields.
 The winter comes, and then the falling mast
 For greedy swine provides a full repast.
 Then olives, ground in mills, their fatness boast,
 And winter fruits are mellow'd by the frost.
 His cares are eas'd with intervals of bliss;
 His little children climbing for a kiss,
 Welcome their father's late return at night;
 His faithful bed is crown'd with chaste delight.
 His kine, with swelling udders, ready stand,
 And, lowing for the pail, invite the milker's hand.
 His wanton kids, with budding horns prepar'd,
 Fight harmless battles in his homely yard:
 Himself in rustic pomp, on holidays,
 To rural powers a just oblation pays;
 And on the green his careless limbs displays.
 The hearth is in the midst; the herdsmen, round
 The cheerful fire, provoke his health in goblets
 crown'd.

He calls on Bacchus, and propounds the prize;
 The groom his fellow-groom at butts defies;
 And bends his bows, and levels with his eyes,
 Or, stript for wrestling, smears his limbs with oil,
 And watches with a trip his foe to foil.
 Such was the life the frugal Sabines led;
 So Remus and his brother god were bred:
 From whom th' austere Etrurian virtus rose;
 And this rude life our homely fathers chose.
 Old Rome from such a race deriv'd her birth,
 (The seat of empire, and the conquer'd Earth;)
 Which now on seven high hills triumphant reigns,
 And in that compass all the world contains.
 Ere Saturn's rebel son usurp'd the skies,
 When beasts were only slain for sacrifice;
 While peaceful Crete enjoy'd her ancient lord;
 Ere sounding hammers forg'd th' inhuman sword;
 Ere hollow drums were beat, before the breath
 Of brazen trumpets rung the peals of death;
 The good old god his hunger did assuage
 With roots and herbs, and gave the golden age;
 But, overlabour'd with so long a course,
 'Tis time to set at ease the smoking horse.

THE THIRD BOOK OF
 THE GEORGICS.

THE ARGUMENT.

THIS book begins with the invocation of some rural deities, and a compliment to Augustus: after which Virgil directs himself to Mæcenas, and enters on his subject. He lays down rules for the breeding and management of horses, oxen, sheep, goats, and dogs; and interweaves several pleasant descriptions of a chariot-race, of the battle of the bulls, of the force of love, and of the Scythian winter. In the latter part of the book he relates the diseases incident to cattle; and ends with the description of a fatal murrain that formerly raged among the Alps.

Thy fields, propitious Pales, I rehearse;
 And sing thy pastures in no vulgar verse,
 Amphrysian shepherd; the Lycæan woods;
 Arcadia's flowery plains, and pleasing floods.

All other themes that careless minds invite,
 Are worn with use, unworthy me to write.
 Busiris' altars, and the dire decrees
 Of hard Eurystheus, every reader sees:
 Hylas the boy, Latona's erring isle,
 And Pelops' ivory shoulder, and his toil
 For fair Hippodame, with all the rest
 Of Grecian tales, by poets are express;
 New ways I must attempt, my groveling name
 To raise aloft, and wing my flight to fame.
 I, first of Romans, shall in triumph come
 From conquer'd Greece, and bring her trophies
 home:

With foreign spoils adorn my native place;
 And with Idume's palms my Mantua grace.
 Of Parian stone a temple will I raise,
 Where the slow Mincius thro' the valley strays;
 Where cooling streams invite the flocks to drink,
 And reeds defend the winding water's brink.

Full in the midst shall mighty Cæsar stand :
 Hold the chief honours ; and the dome command.
 Then I, conspicuous in my Tyrian gown,
 (Submitting to his godhead my renown)
 A hundred coursers from the goal will drive ;
 The rival chariots in the race shall strive.
 All Greece shall flock from far, my games to see ;
 The whorlbat and the rapid race shall be
 Reserv'd for Cæsar, and ordain'd by me.
 Myself, with olive crown'd, the gifts will bear ;
 Ev'n now methinks the public shouts I hear ;
 The passing pageants and the pomps appear.
 I, to the temple will conduct the crew ;
 The sacrifice and sacrificers view ;
 From thence returns, attended with my train,
 Where the proud theatres disclose the scene :
 Which interwoven Britons seem to raise,
 And show the triumph which their shame displays.

High o'er the gate, in elephant and gold,
 The crowd shall Cæsar's Indian war behold ;
 The Nile shall flow beneath ; and on the side
 His shatter'd ships on brazen pillars ride,
 Next him, Niphates, with inverted urn,
 And dropping sedge, shall his Armenia mourn ;
 And Asian cities in our triumph borne.
 With backward bows the Parthian shall be there ;
 And, spurring from the fight, confess their fear.
 A double wreath shall crown our Cæsar's brows,
 Two differing trophies, from two different foes.
 Europe with Afric in his fame shall join ;
 But neither above his conquest shall confine.
 The Parian marble, there, shall seem to move,
 In breathing statues, not unworthy Jove ;
 Resembling heroes, whose ethereal root
 Is Jove himself, and Cæsar is the fruit.
 Troy and his race the sculptor shall employ ;
 And he the god, who built the walls of Troy.
 Envy herself, at last grown pale and dumb,
 (By Cæsar combated and overcome)
 Shall give her hands ; and fear the curling snakes
 Of lashing Furies, and the burning lakes :
 The pains of famish'd Tantalus shall feel ;
 And Sisyphus, that labours up the hill
 The rolling rock in vain ; and curst Ixion's wheel.

Mean time we must pursue the sylvan lands :
 (Th' abode of nymphs untouch'd by former hands ;)
 For such, Mæcenas, are thy hard commands.
 Without thee nothing lofty can I sing ;
 Come then, and with thyself thy genius bring :
 With which inspir'd, I brook no dull delay,
 Cytheron loudly calls me to my way ;
 Thy hounds, Tæygetus, open, and pursue their prey.
 High Epidaurus urges on my speed,
 Fam'd for his hills and for his horses' breed :
 From hills and dales the cheerful cries rebound :
 For Echo hunts along and propagates the sound.

A time will come, when my maturer Muse
 In Cæsar's wars, a nobler theme shall choose,
 And through more ages bear my sovereign's praise,
 Than have from Tithon past to Cæsar's days.

The generous youth, who, studious of the prize,
 The race of running coursers multiplies ;
 Or to the plough the sturdy bullock breeds,
 May know that from the dam the worth of each
 proceeds.

The mother cow must wear a lowering look,
 Sour-headed, strongly neck'd to bear the yoke.
 Her double dew-lap from her chin descends :
 And at her thighs the ponderous surthen ends,

Long as her sides and large, her limbs are great ;
 Rough are her ears, and broad her horny feet.
 Her colour shining black, but fleck'd with white ;
 She tosses from the yoke ; provokes the fight ;
 She rises in her gait, is free from fears,
 And in her face a bull's resemblance bears ;
 Her ample forehead with a star is crown'd ;
 And with her length of tail she sweeps the ground.
 The bull's insult at four she may sustain ;
 But, after ten, from nuptial rites refrain.
 Six seasons use ; but then release the cow,
 Unfit for love, and for the labouring plough.

Now while their youth is fill'd with kindly fire,
 Submit thy females to the lusty sire ;
 Watch the quick motions of the frisking tail,
 Then serve their fury with the rushing male,
 Indulging pleasure lest the breed should fail.
 In youth alone, unhappy mortals live ;
 But, ah ! the mighty bliss is fugitive !
 Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,
 And age, and death's inexorable doom.
 Yearly thy herds in vigour will impair :
 Recruit and mend them with thy yearly care ;
 Still propagate, for still they fall away,
 'Tis prudence to prevent th' entire decay.

Like diligence require the courser's race ;
 In early choice, and for a longer space.
 The colt, that for a stallion is design'd,
 By sure presages shows his generous kind,
 Of able body, sound of limb and wind.
 Upright he walks on pasterns firm and straight,
 His motions easy ; prancing in his gait ;
 The first to lead the way, to tempt the flood ;
 To pass the bridge unknown, nor fear the trembling
 wood ;

Dauntless at empty noises ; lofty neck'd ;
 Sharp-headed, barrel-belly'd, broadly back'd,
 Brawny his chest, and deep ; his colour grey ;
 For beauty dappled, or the brightest bay ;
 Faint white and dun will scarce the rearing pay.

The fiery courser, when he hears from far
 The sprightly trumpets, and the shouts of war,
 Pricks up his ears, and, trembling with delight,
 Shifts place, and paws ; and hopes the promis'd
 fight.

On his right shoulder his thick mane reclin'd,
 Ruffles at speed, and dances in the wind.
 His horny hoofs are jetty black and round,
 His chine is double ; starting with a bound.
 He turns the turf, and shakes the solid ground.
 Fire from his eyes, clouds from his nostrils flow ;
 He bears his rider headlong on the foe.

Such was the steed in Grecian poets fam'd,
 Proud Cyllarus, by Spartan Pollux tam'd ;
 Such coursers bore to fight the god of Thrace ;
 And such, Achilles, was thy warlike race.
 In such a shape, grim Saturn did restrain
 His heavenly limbs, and flow'd with such a mane ;
 When, half surpriz'd, and fearing to be seen,
 The lecher galliop'd from his jealous queen ;
 Ran up the ridges of the rocks amain, [plain,
 And with shrill neighings fill'd the neighbouring

But worn with years when dire diseases come,
 Then hide his not ignoble age at home :
 In peace t' enjoy his former palms and pains :
 And gratefully be kind to his remains.
 For when his blood no youthful spirits move,
 He languishes and labours in his love.
 And when the sprightly seed should swiftly come,
 Dribbling he drudges, and defrauds the womb.

In vain he burns like hasty stubble fires ;
And in himself his former self requires .

His age and courage weigh : nor those alone ,
But note his father's virtues and his own ;
Observe , if he disdains to yield the prize ;
Of loss impatient , proud of victories .

Hast thou beheld , when from the goal they start ,
The youthful charioteers with heaving heart
Rush to the race ; and , panting , scarcely bear
Th' extremes of fev'rish hope , and chilling fear ;
Stoop to the reins , and lash with all their force ;
The flying chariot kindles in the course :
And now a-low , and now aloft they fly ,
As borne through air , and seem to touch the sky .
No stop , no stay , but clouds of sand arise ,
Spurn'd and cast backward on the follower's eyes .
The hindmost blows the foam upon the first ;
Such is the love of praise , an honourable thirst .

Bold Erichonius was the first , who join'd
Four horses for the rapid race design'd ;
And o'er the dusty wheels presiding sate ;
The Lapithæ to chariots add the state
Of bits and bridles ; taught the steed to bound ;
To run the ring , and trace the mazy round .
To stop , to fly , the rules of war to know :
To obey the rider , and to dare the foe .

To choose a youthful steed , with courage fir'd ;
To breed him , break him , back him , are requir'd
Experienc'd masters , and in sundry ways :
Their labours equal , and alike their praise .
But once again the batter'd horse beware ,
The weak old stallion will deceive thy care .
Though famous in his youth for force and speed ,
Or was of Argos or Epurian breed , [ceed.

Or did from Neptune's race , or from himself pro-
These things premis'd , when now the nuptial
Approaches for the stately steed to climb ; [time
With food enable him to make his court ;
Distend his chine , and pamper him for sport .
Feed him with herbs , whatever thou canst find ,
Of generous warmth , and of salacious kind .
Then water him , and (drinking what he can)
Encourage him to thirst again , with bran .
Instructed thus , produce him to the fair :
And join in wedlock to the longing mare .
For , if the sire be faint , or out of case ,
He will be copied in his famish'd race :
And sink beneath the pleasing task assign'd :
(For all's too little for the craving kind .)

As for the females , with industrious care
Take down their mettle , keep them lean and bare ;
When conscious of their past delight , and keen
To take the leap , and prove the sport again ;
With scanty measure then supply their food ;
And , when athirst , restrain them from the food ;
Their bodies harass , sink them when they run ;
And fry their melting marrow in the Sun .
Starve them , when barns beneath their burthen
groan ;

And winnow'd chaff by western winds is blown ;
For fear the rankness of the swelling womb
Should scant the passage , and confine the room .
Lest the fat furrows should the sense destroy
Of genial lust , and dull the seat of joy .
But let them suck the seed with greedy force ,
And close involve the vigour of the horse .

The male has done ; thy care must now proceed
To teeming females , and the promis'd breed .
First let them run at large , and never know
The taming yoke , or draw the crooked plough .

Let them not leap the ditch , or swim the flood ,
Or lumber o'er the meads , or cross the wood :
But range the forest , by the silver side
Of some cool stream , where Nature shall provide
Green grass , and fattening clover , for their fare ,
And mossy caverns for their noontide laze :
With rocks above to shield the sharp nocturnal air .
About th' Alburnian groves , with holly green ,
Of winged insects mighty swarms are seen :
This flying plague (to mark its quality)
Æstros the Grecians call : asylus , we :
A fierce loud buzzing breeze ; their stings draw blood ,
And drive the cattle gadding through the wood .
Seiz'd with unusual pains , they loudly cry ;
Tausgras hastens thence , and leaves his channel dry .
This curse the jealous Juno did invent ,
And first employ'd for Io's punishment .
To shun this ill , the cunning leach ordains
In summer's sultry heats (for then it reigns)
To feed the females , ere the Sun arise ,
Or late at night , when stars adorn the skies .
When she has calv'd , then set the dam aside ;
And for the tender progeny provide .
Distinguish all betimes , with branding fire ;
To note the tribe , the lineage , and the sire .
Whom to reserve for husband of the herd ,
Or who shall be to sacrifice prefer'd ;
Or whom thou shalt to turn thy globe allow ;
To smooth the furrows , and sustain the plough :
The rest , for whom no lot is yet decreed ,
May run in pastures , and at pleasure feed .
The calf , by nature and by genius made
To turn the glebe , breed to the rural trade ;
Set him betimes to school , and let him be Instructed there in rules of husbandry :
While yet his youth is flexible and green ,
Nor bad examples of the world has seen .
Early begin the stubborn child to break ;
For his soft neck a supple collar make
Of bending osiers ; and (with time and care
Inur'd that easy servitude to bear)
Thy battering method on the youth pursue :
Join'd with his schoolfellows by two and two ,
Persuade them first to lead an empty wheel ,
That scarce the dust can raise , or they can feel :
In length of time produce the labouring yoke
And shining shares , that make the furrow smoke .
Ere the licentious youth be thus restrain'd ,
Or moral precepts on their minds have gain'd ;
Their wanton appetites not only feed
With delicates of leaves , and marshy weed ,
But with thy sickle reap the rankest land ;
And minister the blade with bounteous hand .
Nor be with harmful parsimony won
To follow what our homely sires have done :
Who fill'd the pail with beatings of the cow ;
But all her udder to the calf allow .

If to the warlike steed thy studies bend ,
Or for the prize in chariots to contend ;
Near Pisa's flood the rapid wheels to guide ,
Or in Olympian groves aloft to ride ,
The generous labours of the courser , first
Must be with sight of arms and sound of trumpets
nur'd :
Inur'd the groaning axletree to bear ;
And let him clashing whips in stables bear .
Sooth him with praise , and make him understand
The loud applauses of his master's hand :
This from his weaning let him well be taught ;
And then betimes in a soft squall wrought :

Before his tender joints with nerves are knit ;
 Untry'd in arms, and trembling at the bit,
 But when to four full springs his years advance,
 Teach him to run the round, with pride to prance ;
 And (rightly manag'd) equal time to beat ;
 To turn, to bound in measure, and curvet.
 Let him, to this, with easy pains be brought :
 And seem to labour, when he labours not.
 Thus, form'd for speed, he challenges the wind ;
 And leaves the Scythian arrow far behind :
 He scours along the field, with loosen'd reins ;
 And treads so light, he scarcely prints the plains.
 Like Boreas in his race, when rushing forth,
 He sweeps the skies, and clears the cloudy north :
 The waving harvest bends beneath his blast ;
 The forest shakes, the groves their honours cast ;
 He flies aloft, and with impetuous roar
 Pursues the foaming surges to the shore.
 Thus o'er th' Elean plains, thy well-breath'd horse
 Impels the flying car, and wins the course,
 Or, bred to Belgian waggons, leads the way ;
 Untri'd at night, and cheerful all the day.

When once he's broken, feed him full and high :
 Indulge his growth, and his gaunt sides supply.
 Before his training, keep him poor and low :
 For his stout stomach with his food will grow ;
 The pamper'd colt will discipline disdain,
 Impatient of the lash, and restiff to the rein.

Wouldst thou their courage and their strength improve,

Too soon they must not feel the stings of love.
 Whether the bull or courser be thy care,
 Let him not leap the cow, or mount the mare.
 The youthful bull must wander in the wood ;
 Behind the mountain, or beyond the flood :
 Or, in the stall at home his fodder find ;
 Far from the charms of that alluring kind.
 With two fair eyes his mistress burns his breast ;
 He looks, and languishes, and leaves his rest ;
 Forsakes his food, and, pining for the lass,
 Is joyless of the grove, and spurns the growing grass.
 The soft seducer, with enticing looks,
 The bellowing rivals to the fight provokes.

A beauteous heifer in the wood is bred,
 The stooping warriors, aiming head to head,
 Engage their clashing horns ; with dreadful sound
 The forest rattles, and the rocks rebound.
 They fence, they push, and pushing loudly roar ;
 Their dewlaps and their sides are bath'd in gore.
 Nor when the war is over, is it peace ;
 Nor will the vanquish'd bull his claim release :
 But, feeding in his breast his ancient fires,
 And cursing fate, from his proud foe retires.
 Driven from his native land, to foreign grounds,
 He with a generous rage resents his wounds ;
 His ignominious flight, the victor's boast,
 And more than both, the loves, which unreveng'd he lost.

Often he turns his eyes, and with a groan,
 Surveys the pleasing kingdoms once his own.
 And therefore to repair his strength he tries :
 Hardening his limbs with painful exercise,
 And rough upon the stony rock he lies.
 On prickly leaves and on sharp herbs he feeds,
 Then to the prelude of a war proceeds.
 His horns, yet sore, he tries against a tree :
 And meditates his absent enemy.
 He snuffs the wind, his heels the sand excite,
 But, when he stands collected in his might,
 He roars, and promises a more successful fight.

Then, to redeem his honour at a blow,
 He moves his camp, to meet his careless foe.
 Nor with more madness, rolling from afar,
 The spumy waves proclaim the watery war,
 And, mounting upwards, with a mighty roar,
 March onwards, and insult the rocky shore.
 They mate the middle region with their height ;
 And fall no less than with a mountain's weight :
 The waters boil, and belching from below
 Black sands, as from a forceful engine throw.

Thus every creature, and of every kind,
 The secret joys of sweet coition find :
 Not only man's imperial race, but they
 That wing the liquid air, or swim the sea,
 Or haunt the desert, rush into the flame ;
 For love is lord of all, and is in all the same.

'Tis with this rage, the mother-lion stung,
 Scours o'er the plain, regardless of her young :
 Demanding rites of love ; she sternly stalks ;
 And haunts her lover in his lonely walks.

'Tis then the shapeless bear his den forsakes,
 In woods and fields a wild destruction makes.
 Boars whet their tusks, to battle tigers move ;
 Enrag'd with hunger, more enrag'd with love.
 Then woe to him, that in the desert land
 Of Libya travels, o'er the burning sand.

The stallion snuffs the well-known scent afar,
 And snorts and trembles for the distant mare :
 Nor bits nor bridles can his rage restrain ;
 And rugged rocks are interpos'd in vain :
 He makes his way o'er mountains, and contemns
 Unruly torrents and unforded streams.

The bristled boar, who feels the pleasing wound,
 New grinds his arming tusks, and digs the ground.
 The sleepy lecher shuts his little eyes ;
 About his churning chaps the frothy bubbles rise ;
 He rubs his sides against a tree ; prepares
 And hardens both his shoulders for the war.
 What did the youth, when love's unerring dart
 Transfix'd his liver, and inflam'd his heart ?
 Alone, by night, his watery way he took ;
 About him, and above, the billows broke ;
 The sluices of the sky were open spread,
 And rolling thunder rattled o'er his head.
 The raging tempest call'd him back in vain,
 And every boding omen of the main.

Nor could his kindred, nor the kindly force
 Of weeping parents, change his fatal course.
 No, not the dying maid, who must deplore
 His floating carcase on the Sestian shore.

I pass the wars that spotted lynxes make
 With their fierce rivals, for the females' sake :
 The howling wolves, the mastiff's amorous rage ;
 When ev'n the fearful stag dares for his hind engage.
 But, far above the rest, the furious mare,
 Barr'd from the male, is frantic with despair.
 For when her pouting vent declares her pain,
 She tears the harness, and she rends the rein ;
 For this (when Venus gave them rage and power),
 Their masters' mangled members they devour ;
 Of love defrauded in their longing hour.

For love they force through thickets of the wood,
 They climb the steepy hills, and stem the flood.

When at the spring's approach their marrow
 burns

(For with the spring their genial warmth returns),
 The mares to cliffs of rugged rocks repair,
 And with wide nostrils snuff the western air :
 When (wondrous to relate) the parent-wind,
 Without the stallion, propagates the kind.

Then, fir'd with amorous rage, they take their flight
 Through plains, and mount the hills' unequal height;
 Nor to the north, nor to the rising Sun,
 Nor southward to the rainy regions run;
 But boring to the west, and hovering there,
 With gaping mouths, they draw prolific air:
 With which impregnate, from their groins they shed
 A slimy juice, by false conception bred.
 The shepherd knows it well; and calls by name
 Hippomanes, to note the mother's flame.
 This, gather'd in the planetary hour, [power,
 With noxious weeds, and spell'd with words of Dire stepdames in the magic bowl infuse;
 And mix, for deadly draughts, the poisonous juice.
 But time is lost, which never will renew,
 While we too far the pleasing path pursue;
 Surveying Nature with too nice a view.
 Let this suffice for herds: our following care
 Shall woolly flocks and shaggy goats declare.
 Nor can I doubt what oil I must bestow,
 To raise my subject from a ground so low:
 And the mean matter which my theme affords,
 T' embellish with magnificence of words.
 But the commanding Muse my chariot guides:
 Which o'er the dubious cliff securely rides:
 And pleas'd I am, no beaten road to take:
 But first the way to new discoveries make.

Now, sacred Pales, in a lofty strain
 I sing the rural honours of thy reign.
 First, with assiduous care, from winter keep
 Well-fodder'd in the stalls, thy tender sheep:
 Then spread with straw, the bedding of thy fold;
 With fern beneath, to fend the bitter cold.
 That free from gouts thou may'st preserve thy care,
 And clear from scabs, produc'd by freezing air.
 Next let thy goats officiously be nurs'd:
 And led to living streams, to quench their thirst.
 Feed them with winter-browse, and for their lare
 A cote that opens to the south prepare:
 Where, basking in the sunshine, they may lie,
 And the short remnants of his heat enjoy.
 This during winter's drizzly reign be done:
 Till the new Ram receives th' exalted Sun:
 For hairy goats of equal profit are
 With woolly sheep, and ask an equal care. [juice,
 'Tis true, the fleece, when drunk with Tyrian
 Is dearly sold; but not for needful use:
 For the salacious goat increases more;
 And twice as largely yields her milky store.
 The still distended udders never fail;
 But, when they seem exhausted, swell the pail.
 Meantime the pastor shears their hoary beards;
 And cases of their hair, the loaden herds.
 Their camolets, warm in tents, the soldier hold;
 And shield the shivering mariner from cold.

On shrubs they browse, and on the bleak top
 Of rugged hills, the thorny bramble crop.
 Attended with their bleating kids they come
 At night unask'd, and mindful of their home;
 And scarce their swelling bags the threshold over-
 So much the more thy diligence bestow [come.
 In depth of winter, to defend the snow:
 By how much less the tender helpless kind,
 For their own ill, can fit provision find.
 Then minister the browse, with bounteous hand;
 And open let thy stacks all winter stand.
 But when the western winds with vital power
 Call forth the tender grass, and budding flower;
 Then, at the last, produce in open air
 Both flocks, and send them to their summer fare.

Before the Sun, while Hesperus appears;
 First let them sip from herbs the pearly tears
 Of morning dew; and after break their fast
 On greensward ground (a cool and grateful taste);
 But when the day's fourth hour has drawn the dew,
 And the Sun's sultry heat their thirst renews;
 When creaking grass-hoppers on shrubs complain,
 Then lead them to their watering troughs again.
 In summer's heat some bending valley find,
 Clos'd from the Sun, but open to the wind:
 Or seek some ancient oak, whose arms extend
 In ample breadth thy cattle to defend:
 Or solitary grove, or gloomy glade,
 To shield them with its venerable shade.
 Once more to watering lead; and feed again
 When the low Sun is sinking to the main;
 When rising Cynthia sheds her silver dew,
 And the cool evening breeze the meads renews;
 When linnets fill the woods with tuneful sound,
 And hollow shores the halcyon's voice rebound.

Why should my Muse enlarge on Libyan swains;
 Their scatter'd cottages, and ample plains?
 Where oft the flocks without a leader stray;
 Or through continued deserts take their way;
 And, feeding, add the length of night to day.
 Whole months they wander, grazing as they go;
 Nor folds, nor hospitable harbour know;
 Such an extent of plains, so vast a space
 Of wilds unknown, and untasted grass,
 Allures their eyes: the shepherd last appears,
 And with him all his patrimony bears:
 His house and household gods! his trade of war,
 His bow and quiver; and his trusty cur.
 Thus, under heavy arms, the youth of Rome
 Their long, laborious marches overcome:
 Cheerly their tedious travels undergo;
 And pitch their sudden camp before the foe.

Not so the Scythian shepherd tends his fold;
 Nor he who bears in Thrace the bitter cold:
 Nor he who treads the bleak Meotian strand;
 Or where proud Ister rolls his yellow sand.
 Early they stall their flocks and herds; for there
 No grass the fields, no leaves the forests wear:
 The frozen earth lies buried there below
 A hilly heap, seven cubits deep in snow:
 And all the west allies of stormy Boreas blow.

The Sun from far peeps with a sickly face;
 Too weak the clouds and mighty fogs to chase;
 When up the skies he shoots his rosy head,
 Or in the ruddy ocean seeks his bed.
 Swift rivers are with sudden ice constrain'd;
 And studded wheels are on its back sustain'd.
 An hostry now for waggons, which before
 Tall ships of burden on its bosom bore.
 The brazen caldrons with the frost are thaw'd;
 The garment, stiff with ice, at hearths is thaw'd;
 With axes first they cleave the vine, and thence
 By weight, the solid portions they dispense.
 From locks uncomb'd, and from the frozen beard,
 Long icicles depend, and crackling sounds are heard.
 Meantime perpetual sleet, and driving snow,
 Obscure the skies, and hang on herds below.
 The starving cattle perish in their stalls,
 Huge oxen stand enclos'd in wintry walls
 Of snow congeal'd; whole herds are bury'd there
 Of mighty stags, and scarce their horns appear.
 The dextrous huntsman wounds not these afar,
 With shafts or darts, or makes a distant war
 With dogs, or pitches toils to stop their flight;
 But close engages in unequal fight;

And while they strive in vain to make their way
 Through hills of snow, and pitifully bray,
 Assaults with dint of sword, or pointed spears,
 And homeward, on his back, the joyful burden bears.
 The men to subterranean caves retire;
 Secure from cold, and crowd the cheerful fire:
 With trunks of elms and oaks the hearth they load,
 Nor tempt th' inclemency of Heaven abroad,
 Their jovial nights in frolics and in play
 They pass, to drive the tedious hours away,
 And their cold stomachs with crown'd goblets cheer,
 Of windy cider, and of barny beer.
 Such are the cold Riphean race; and such
 The savage Scythian, and unwarlike Dutch.
 Where skins of beasts the rude barbarians wear,
 The spoils of foxes, and the furry bear.
 Is wool thy care? Let not thy cattle go
 Where bushes are, where burs and thistles grow;
 Nor in too rank a pasture let them feed;
 Then of the purest white select thy breed.
 Ev'n though a snowy ram thou shalt behold,
 Prefer him not in haste for husband to thy fold.
 But search his mouth; and if a swarthy tongue
 Is underneath his humid palate hung,
 Reject him, lest he darken all the flock;
 And substitute another from thy stock.
 'Twas thus with fleeces milky white (if we May trust report), Pan, god of Arcady,
 Did bribe thee, Cynthia; nor didst thou disdain,
 When call'd in woody shades, to cure a lover's pain.
 If milk be thy design: with plenteous hand
 Bring clovergrass; and from the marshy land
 Salt herbage for the foddering rack provide
 To fill their bags, and swell the milky tide:
 These raise their thirst, and to the taste restore
 The savour of the salt, on which they fed before.
 Some, when the kids their dams too deeply drain,
 With gags and muzzles their soft mouths restrain.
 Their morning milk, the peasants press at night:
 Their evening meal before the rising light
 To market bear; or sparingly they steep
 With seasoning salt, and stor'd, for winter keep.
 Nor last, forget thy faithful dogs; but feed
 With fattening whey the mastiff's generous breed,
 And Spartan race: who, for the fold's relief,
 Will prosecute with cries the nightly thief:
 Repulse the prowling wolf, and hold at bay
 The mountain robbers, rushing to the prey.
 With cries of bounds, thou may'st pursue the fear
 Of flying hares, and chase the fallow deer;
 Rouse from their desert dens the bristled rage
 Of boars, and beamy stags in toils engage.
 With smoke of burning cedar scent thy walls,
 And fume with stinking galbanum thy stalls:
 With that rank odour from thy dwelling-place
 To drive the viper's brood, and all the venom'd race.
 For often under stalls unmov'd they lie, [eye.
 Obscure in shades, and shunning Heaven's broad
 And snakes, familiar to the hearth, succeed,
 Disclose their eggs, and near the chimney breed.
 Whether to rooify houses they repair,
 Or sun themselves abroad in open air,
 In all abodes of pestilential kind
 To sheep and oxen, and the painful hind.
 Take, shepherd, take, a plant of stubborn oak;
 And labour him with many a sturdy stroke:
 Or with hard stones, demolish from afar
 His haughty crest, the seat of all the war;
 Invasde his hissing throat, and winding spires;
 Till, stretch'd in length, th' unfolded foe retires.

He drags his tail, and for his head provides:
 And in some secret cranny slowly glides;
 But leaves expos'd to blows, his back and batter'd sides.

In fair Calabria's woods a snake is bred,
 With curling crest, and with advancing head:
 Waving he rolls, and makes a winding track;
 His belly spotted, burnish'd is his back:
 White springs are broken, while the southern air
 And dropping heavens the moisten'd earth repair,
 He lives on standing lakes and trembling bogs;
 He fills his maw with fish, or with loquacious frogs;
 But when, in muddy pools, the water sings,
 And the chapt earth is furrow'd o'er with chinks:
 He leaves the fens, and leaps upon the ground;
 And hissing, rolls his glaring eyes around.
 With thirst inflam'd, impatient of the heats,
 He rages in the fields, and wide destruction threats.
 Oh let not sleep my closing eyes invade
 In open plains, or in the secret shade,
 When he, renew'd in all the speckled pride
 Of pompous youth, has cast his slough aside,
 And in his summer livery rolls along,
 Erect, and brandishing his forky tongue,
 Leaving his nest, and his imperfect young;
 And, thoughtless of his eggs, forgets to rear
 The hopes of poison, for the following year.

The causes and the signs shall next be told,
 Of every sickness that infects the fold.
 A scabby tetter on their pelts will stick,
 When the raw rain has pierc'd them to the quick;
 Or searching frosts have eaten through the skin;
 Or burning icicles are lodg'd within:
 Or when the fleece is shorn, if sweat remains
 Unwash'd, and soaks into their empty veins:
 When their defenceless limbs the brambles tear;
 Short of their wool, and naked from the shear.

Good shepherds after shearing drench their sheep,
 And their flock's father (forc'd from high to leap)
 Swims down the stream, and plunges in the deep.
 They oint their naked limbs with mother'd oil;
 Or from the founts where living sulphurs boil,
 They mix a medicine to foment their limbs;
 With scum that on the molten silver swims.
 Fat pitch, and black bitumen, add to these,
 Besides the waxen labour of the bees:
 And hellebore, and squills deep rooted in the seas,
 Receipts abound, but, searching all thy store,
 The best is still at hand—to lance the sore,
 And cut the head, for till the core be found,
 The secret vice is fed, and gathers ground:
 While, making fruitless moan, the shepherd stands,
 And, when the lancing knife requires his hands,
 Vain help, with idle prayers, from Heaven demands.
 Deep in their bones when fever fix their seat,
 And rack their limbs, and lick the vital heat;
 The ready cure to cool the raging pain,
 Is underneath the foot to breathe a vein.
 This remedy the Scythian shepherds found:
 Th' inhabitants of Thracia's hilly ground,
 The Gelons use it, when for drink and food
 They mix their cruddled milk with horses' blood.

But, when thou seest a single sheep remain
 In shades aloof, or crouch'd upon the plain;
 Or listlessly to crop the tender grass;
 Or late to lag behind, with truant pace;
 Revenge the crime, and take the traitor's head,
 Ere in the faultless flock the dire contagion spread.
 On winter seas we fewer storms behold,
 Than foul diseases that infect the fold.

Nor do those ills on single bodies prey ;
But outward bring the nation to decay ;
And sweep the present stock and future hope away.

A dire example of this truth appears :
When, after such a length of rolling years,
We see the naked Alps, and thin remains
Of scatter'd cots, and yet unpeopled plains :
Once fill'd with grazing flocks, the shepherd's happy reigns.

Here from the vicious air, and sickly skies,
A plague did on the dumb creation rise :
During th' autumnal heats th' infection grew,
Tame cattle, and the beasts of nature slow.
Poisoning the standing lakes, and pools impure :
Nor was the foodful grass in fields secure.
Strange death ! For when the thirsty fire had drunk
Their vital blood, and the dry nerves were shrunk ;
When the contracted limbs were cramp'd, even then

A watrish humour swell'd and ooz'd again ;
Converting into bane the kindly juice,
Ordain'd by Nature for a better use.
The victim ox, that was for altars prest,
Trim'd with white ribbons, and with garlands drest,
Sunk of himself, without the gods' command :
Preventing the slow sacrificer's hand.
Or, by the holy butcher if he fell,
Th' inspected entrails could no fates foretel :
Nor, laid on altars, did pure flames arise ;
But clouds of smouldering smoke forbade the sacri-
scarcely the knife was redden'd with his gore, [sic.
Or the black poison stain'd the sandy floor.
The thriven calves in meads their food forsake,
And render their sweet souls before the plenteous rack.

The fawning dog runs mad, the weasing swine
With coughs is chok'd, and labours from the chine :

The victor horse, forgetful of his food,
The palm renounces, and abhors the food.
He paws the ground, and, on his hanging ears,
A doubtful sweat in clammy drops appears :
Parch'd is his hide, and rugged are his hairs.
Such are the symptoms of the young disease ;
But in time's process, when his pains increase,
He rolls his mournful eyes, he deeply groans
With patient sobbing, and with manly moans.
He heaves for breath : which from his lungs
supply'd,

And fetch'd from far, distends his labouring side.
To his rough palate, his dry tongue succeeds ;
And rosy gore he from his nostrils bleeds.
A drench of wine has with success been us'd ;
And through a horn the generous juice infus'd :
Which timely taken op'd his closing jaws ;
But, if too late, the patient's death did cause.
For the too vigorous dose too fiercely wrought,
And added fury to the strength it brought.
Recruited into rage, he grinds his teeth
In his own flesh, and feeds approaching death.
Ye gods, to better fate good men dispose,
And turn that impious error on our foes !

The steer, who to the yoke was bred to bow,
(Studios of tillage, and the crooked plough)
Falls down and dies, and dying spews a flood
Of foamy madness, mix'd with clotted blood.
The clown, who, cursing Providence, repines,
His mournful fellow from the team disjoins :
With many a groan forsakes his fruitless care,
And in th' unfinished furrow leaves the share.

The pining steer no shades of lofty woods,
Nor flowery meads, can ease ; nor crystal floods,
Roll'd from the rock : his flabby flanks decrease ;
His eyes are settled in a stupid peace.

His bulk too weighty for his thighs is grown ;
And his unwieldy neck hangs drooping down.
Now what avails his well-deserving toil,
To turn the glebe, or smooth the rugged soil !
And yet he never supp'd in solemn state,
Nor undigested feasts did urge his fate ;
Nor day to night luxuriously did join ;
Nor surfeited on rich Campanian wine.
Simple his beverage, homely was his food ;
The wholesome herbage, and the running flood.
No dreadful dreams awak'd him with affright ;
His pains by day secur'd his rest by night.

'Twas then that buffaloes, ill pair'd, were seen
To draw the car of Jove's imperial queen,
For want of oxen ; and the labouring swain
Scratch'd with a rake a furrow for his grain :
And cover'd with his hand the shallow seed again.
He yokes himself, and up the hilly height,
With his own shoulders draws the waggon's weight.

The nightly wolf, that round th' enclosure prow'd
To leap the fence, now plots not on the fold :
Tam'd with a sharper pain, the fearful doe
And flying flag, amidst the greyhounds go ;
And round the dwellings roam of man, their fierce
The scaly nations of the sea profound, [foe.
Like shipwreck'd carcasses are driven aground :
And mighty phoœa, never seen before
In shallow streams, are stranded on the shore.
The viper dead within her hole is found ;
Defenceless was the shelter of the ground.
The watersnake, whom fish and paddocks fed,
With staring scales lies poison'd in his bed :
To birds their native Heavens contagious prove,
From clouds they fall, and leave their souls
above.

Besides, to change their pasture 'tis in vain ;
Or trust to physic : physic is their bane.

The learned leaches in despair depart :
And shake their heads, depending of their art.

Tisiphone, let loose from under ground,
Majestically pale, now treads the round ;
Before her drives diseases and affright ;
And every moment rises to the sight :
Aspiring to the skies, encroaching on the light.
The rivers and their banks, and hills around,
With lowings and with dying beats resound.
At length, she strikes an universal blow :
To death at once whole herds of cattle go :
Sheep, oxen, horses fall ; and, heap'd on high,
The differing species in confusion lie.
Till, warn'd by frequent ills, the way they found,
To lodge their loathsome carrion under ground,
For, useless to the carrier were their hides ;
Nor could their tainted flesh with ocean tides
Be freed from filth : nor could Vulcanian flame
The stench abolish, or the savour tame.
Nor safely could they shear their fleecy store (Made drunk with poisonous juice, and stiff with gore) ;

Or touch the web ; but if the vest they wear,
Red blisters rising on their paps appear,
And flaming carbuncles and noisome sweat,
And clammy dews, that loathsome lice begot :
Till the slow creeping evil eats his way,
Consumes the parching limbs, and makes the life his prey.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF
THE GEORGICS.

THE ARGUMENT.

Vindt has taken care to raise the subject of the georgic. In the first he has only dead matter on which to work. In the second he just steps on the world of life, and describes that degree of it which is to be found in vegetables. In the third he advances to animals: and in the last singles out the bee, which may be reckoned the most sagacious of them, for his subject.

In this georgic he shows us what station is most proper for the bees, and when they begin to gather honey; how to call them home when they swarm; and how to part them when they are engaged in battle. From hence he takes occasion to discover their different kind; and, after an excursion, relates their prudent and politic administration of affairs, and the several diseases that often rage in their hives, with the proper symptoms and remedies of each disease. In the last place he lays down a method of repairing their kind, supposing their whole breed lost, and gives at large the history of its invention.

THE gifts of Heaven my following song pursues,
Aerial honey, and ambrosial dew.
Mecenas, read this other part, that sings
Embattled squadrons and adventurous kings;
A mighty pomp, though made of little things.
Their arms, their arts, their manners I disclose,
And how they war, and whence the people rose:
Slight is the subject, but the praise not small,
If Heaven assist, and Phoebus hear my call.

First, for thy bees a quiet station find,
And lodge them under covert of the wind:
For winds, when homeward they return, will drive
The loaded carriers from their evening hive.
Far from the cows' and goats' insulting crew,
That trample down the flowers, and brush the dew:
The painted lizard, and the birds of prey,
Foes of the frugal kind, be far away.
The titmouse, and the pecker's hungry brood,
And Frogue, with her bosom stain'd in blood:
These rob the trading citizens, and bear
The trembling captives through the liquid air;
And for their callow young a cruel feast prepare.
But near a living stream their mansion place,
Edg'd round with moss, and tufts of matted grass:
And plant (the wind's impetuous rage to stop)
Wild olive-trees, or palms, before the busy shop,
That when the youthful prince, with proud alarm,
Calls out the venturesome colony to swarm; [wing,
When first their way through yielding air they
New to the pleasures of their native spring;
The banks of brooks may make a cool retreat
For the raw soldiers from the scalding heat:
And neighbouring trees, with friendly shade, invite
The troops, unus'd to long laborious fight.
Then o'er the running stream, or standing lake,
A passage for thy weary people make;
With osier-boats the standing water strow;
Of massy stones make bridges, if it flow:

That basking in the Sun thy bees may lie,
And resting there, their flaggy pinions dry:
When, late returning home, the laden host
By raging winds is wreck'd upon the coast.
Wild thyme and savory set around their cell;
Sweet to the taste, and fragrant to the smell;
Set rows of rosemary with flowering stem,
And let the purple violets drink the stream.

Whether thou build the palace of thy bees
With twisted osiers, or with barks of trees;
Make but a narrow mouth: for as the cold
Congeals into a lump the liquid gold;
So 'tis again dissolv'd by summer's heat,
And the sweet labours both extremes defeat.
And therefore, not in vain, th' industrious kind
With dawby wax and flowers the chinks have lin'd.
And with their stores of gather'd glue, contrive
To stop the vents and crannies of their hive.
Not birdlime, or Idean pitch, produce
A more tenacious mass of clammy juice.

Nor bees are lodg'd in hives alone, but found
In chambers of their own, beneath the ground:
Their vaulted roofs are hung in pumices,
And in the rotten trunks of hollow trees.

But plaster thou the chinky hives with clay,
And leafy branches o'er their lodging lay.
Nor place them where too deep a water flows,
Or where the yew, their poisonous neighbour,
grows:

Nor roast red crabs t' offend the niceness of their
Nor near the steaming stench of muddy ground:
Nor hollow rocks that render back the sound,
And doubled images of voice rebound.

For what remains, when golden suns appear,
And under earth have driven the winter year:
The winged nation wanders through the skies,
And o'er the plains and shady forest flies:
Then, stooping on the meads and leafy bowers,
They skim the floods, and sip the purple flowers.
Exalted hence, and drunk with secret joy,
The young succession all their cares employ:
They breed, they brood, instruct, and educate,
And make provision for the future state:
They work their waxen lodgings in their hives,
And labour honey to sustain their lives.
But when thou seest a swarming cloud arise,
That sweeps aloft, and darkens all the skies,
The motions of their hasty flight attend;
And know to floods, or woods, their airy march they bend.

Then milfoil beat, and honeysuckles pound,
With these alluring savours strew the ground,
And mix with tinkling brass, the cymbal's droning
sound.

Straight to their ancient cells, recall'd from air
The reconcil'd deserters will repair.
But if intestine broils alarm the hive,
(For too pretenders oft for empire strive)
The vulgar in divided factions jar;
And murmuring sounds proclaim the civil war.
Inflam'd with ire, and trembling with disdain,
Scarce can their limbs their mighty souls contain,
With shouts the coward's courage they excite,
And martial clangors call them out to fight!
With hoarse alarms the hollow camp rebounds,
That imitates the trumpet's angry sounds:
Then to their common standard they repair;
The nimble horsemen scour the fields of air.
In form of battle drawn, they issue forth,
And every knight is proud to prove his worth

Press'd for their country's honour, and their king's,
On their sharp beaks they wet their pointed stings;
And exercise their arms, and tremble with their wings.

Full in the midst the haughty monarchs ride,
The trusty guards come up, and close the side;
With shouts th' daring foe to battle is defy'd.
Thus in the season of unclouded spring,
To war they follow their undaunted king:
Crowd through their gates, and in the fields of light,

The shocking squadrons meet in mortal fight:
Headlong they fall from high, and wounded wound,
And heaps of slaughter'd soldiers bite the ground.
Hard hailstones lie nor thicker on the plain,
Nor shaken oaks such showers of acorns rain.
With gorgeous wings, the marks of sovereign sway,

The two contending princes make their way;
Intrepid through the midst of danger go;
Their friends encourage, and amaze the foe.
With mighty souls in narrow bodies prest,
They challenge, and encounter breast to breast;
So fix'd on fame, unknowing how to fly,
And obstinately bent to win or die;
That long the doubtful combat they maintain,
Till one prevails (for one can only reign).
Yet all those dreadful deeds, this deadly fray,
A cast of scatter'd dust will soon allay;
And undecided leave the fortune of the day.
When both the chiefs are sunder'd from the fight,
Then to the lawful king restore his right.
And let the wasteful prodigal be slain,
That he, who best deserves, alone may reign.
With ease distinguish'd is the regal race:
One monarch wears an honest open face:
Shap'd to his size, and godlike to behold,
His royal body shines with specks of gold,
And ruddy scales; for empire he design'd,
Is better born, and of a nobler kind.
That other looks like nature in disgrace,
Gaunt are his sides, and sullen is his face:
And like their grizzly prince appears his gloomy race:

Grim, ghastly, rugged, like a thirsty train
That long have travell'd through a desert plain,
And spit from their dry chaps the gather'd dust again.

The better brood, unlike the bastard crew,
Are mark'd with royal streaks of shining hue;
Glittering and ardent, though in body less:
From these, at 'pointed seasons, hope to press
Huge heavy honeycombs, of golden juice,
Not only sweet, but pure, and fit for use:
T' ally the strength and hardness of the wine,
And with old Bacchus, new metheglin join.

But when the swarms are eager of their play,
And loath their empty hives, and idly stray,
Restrain the wanton fugitives, and take
A timely care to bring the truants back.
The task is easy, but to clip the wings
Of their high-flying arbitrary kings:
At their command, the people swarm away;
Copsine the tyrant, and the slaves will stay.
Sweet gardens, full of saffron flowers, invite
The wandering gluttons, and retard their flight.
Besides the god obscene, who frights away,
With his lath sword, the thieves and birds of prey.

With his own hand, the guardian of the bees,
For slips of pines, may search the mountain trees:
And with wild thyme and savory plant the plain,
Till his hard horny fingers ache with pain:
And deck with fruitful trees the fields around,
And with refreshing waters drench the ground.

Now, did I not so near my labours end,
Strike sail, and hastening to the harbour tend,
My song to flowery gardens might extend.
To teach the vegetable arts to sing
The Præstan roses, and their double spring:
How succory drinks the running stream, and how
Green beds of parsley near the river grow;
How cucumbers along the surface creep,
With crooked bodies, and with bellies deep.
The late narciss-us, and the winding trail
Of bears-foot, myrtles green, and ivy pale.
For where with stately towers Tarentum stands,
And deep Galesus soaks the yellow sands,
I chanc'd an old Corycian swain to know,
Lord of few acres, and those barren too;
Unfit for sheep or vines, and more unfit to sow:
Yet, labouring well his little spot of ground,
Some scattering pot-herbs here and there he found:
Which, cultivated with his daily care,
And bruis'd with vervain, were his frugal fare.
Sometimes white lilies did their leaves afford,
With a wholesome poppy-flowers to mend his homely board:

For late returning home he supp'd at ease,
And wisely deem'd the wealth of monarchs less:
The little of his own, because his own, did please.
To quit his care, he gather'd first of all
In spring the roses, apples in the fall:
And when cold winter split the rocks in twain,
And ice the running rivers did restrain,
He stripp'd the bears-foot of its leafy growth,
And, calling western winds, accus'd the spring of sloth;

He therefore first among the swains was found,
To reap the product of his labour'd ground,
And squeeze the combs with golden liquor crown'd.
His limes were first in flowers; his lofty pines,
With friendly shade, secur'd his tender vines.
For every bloom his trees in spring afford,
An autumn apple was by tale restor'd.
He knew to rank his elms in even rows:
For fruit the grafted pear-tree to dispose:
And tame to plums, the sourness of the sloes.
With spreading planes he made a cool retreat,
To shade good fellows from the summer's heat.
But, straiten'd in my space, I must forsake
This task; for others afterwards to take.

Describe we next the nature of the bees,
Bestow'd by Jove for secret services;
When, by the tinkling sound of timbrels led,
The king of Heaven in Cretan caves they fed.
Of all the race of animals, alone
The bees have common cities of their own,
And common sons, beneath one law they live,
And with one common stock their traffic drive.
Each has a certain home, a several stall:
All is the state's, the state provides for all.
Mindful of coming cold, they share the pain:
And board, for winter's use, the summer's gain.
Some o'er the public magazines preside,
And some are sent new forage to provide:
These drudge in fields abroad, and those at home
Lay deep foundations for the labour'd comb,
With dew, narcissus' leaves, and clammy gum.

To pitch the waxen flooring some contrive;
 Some nurse the future nation of the hive;
 Sweet honey some condense, some purge the brood;
 The rest, in cells apart, the liquid nectar shut.
 All, with united force, combine to drive
 The lazy drones from the laborious hive.
 With envy stung, they view each other's deeds:
 With diligence the fragrant work proceeds.
 As when the Cyclops, at th' almighty nod,
 New thunder hasten for their angry god:
 Subdued in fire the stubborn metal lies,
 One brawny smith the puffing bellows plies;
 And draws, and blows, reciprocating air:
 Others to quench the hissing mass prepare:
 With lifted arms they order every blow,
 And chime their sounding hammers in a row:
 With labour'd anvils Ætna groans below.
 Strongly they strike, huge flakes of flames expire,
 With tongs they turn the steel, and vex it in the fire.
 If little things with great we may compare,
 Such are the bees, and such their busy care:
 Studious of honey, each in his degree,
 The youthful swain, the grave experienc'd bee:
 That in the field; this in affairs of state,
 Employ'd at home, abides within the gate:
 To fortify the combs, to build the wall,
 To prop the ruins, lest the fabric fall:
 But late at night, with weary pinions, come
 The labouring youth, and heavy laden home.
 Plains, meads, and orchards, all the day he plies;
 The gleans of yellow thyme distend his thighs:
 He spoils the saffron flowers, he sips the blues
 Of violets, wilding blooms, and willow dew.
 Their toil is common, common is their sleep;
 They shake their wings when morn begins to peep;
 Rush through the city-gates without delay,
 Nor ends their work but with declining day:
 Then, having spent the last remains of light,
 They give their bodies due repose at night:
 When hollow murmurs of their evening bells
 Dismiss the sleepy swains, and toll them to their cells.
 When once in beds their weary limbs they sleep,
 No buzzing sounds disturb their golden sleep,
 'Tis sacred silence all. Nor dare they stray,
 When rain is promis'd, or a stormy day:
 But near the city-walls their watering take,
 Nor forage far, but short excursions make.
 And as when empty barks on billows float,
 With sandy ballast sailors trim the boat,
 So bees bear gravel-stones, whose poisoning weight
 Stems thro' the whistling winds their steady flight.
 But, what's more strange, their modest appetites,
 Averse from Venus, fly the nuptial rites.
 No lust enervates their heroic mind,
 Nor wastes their strength on wanton womankind,
 But in their mouths reside their genial powers,
 They gather children from the leaves and flowers.
 Thus make they kings to fill the regal seat:
 And thus their little citizens create:
 And waxen cities build, the palaces of state.
 And oft on rocks their tender wings they tear,
 And sink beneath the borthen which they bear.
 Such rage of honey in their bosom beats:
 And such a zeal they have for flowery sweets.
 Thus through the race of life they quickly run;
 Which in the space of seven short years is done;
 Th' immortal line in sure succession reigns,
 The fortune of the family remains:
 And granddaughters' grandsons the long list contains.

Besides, not Egypt, India, Media, more
 With servile awe, their idol-king adore:
 While he survives, in concord and content,
 The commons live, by no divisions rent; [ment.
 But the great monarch's death dissolves the govern-
 All goes to ruin, they themselves contrive
 To rob the honey, and subvert the hive.
 The king presides, his subjects' toil surveys;
 The servile rout their careful Cæsar praise:
 Him they extol, they worship him alone:
 They crowd his levees, and support his throne:
 They raise him on their shoulders with a shout:
 And, when their sovereign's quarrel calls them out,
 His foes to mortal combat they defy,
 And think it honour at his feet to die.

Induc'd by such examples, some have taught
 That bees have portions of etherial thought:
 Endu'd with particles of heavenly fires:
 For God the whole created mass inspires; [throws
 Through Heaven, and Earth, and Ocean's depth he
 His influence round, and kindles as he goes. [fowls,
 Hence flocks, and herds, and men, and beasts, and
 With breath are quicken'd, and attract their souls.
 Hence take the forms his prescience did ordain,
 And into him at length resolve again.
 No room is left for death, they mount the sky,
 And to their own congenial planets fly.

Now when thou hast decreed to seize their stores,
 And by prerogative to break their doors:
 With sprinkled water first the city choke,
 And then pursue the citizens with smoke.
 Two honey-harvests fall in every year:
 First, when the pleasing Pleiades appear,
 And, springing upward, spurn the briny seas:
 Again, when their affrighted quire surveys
 The watery Scorpion mend his pace behind,
 With a black train of storms, and winter wind,
 They plunge into the deep, and safe protection find.
 Prone to revenge, the bees, a wrathful race,
 When once provok'd, assault th' aggressor's face:
 And through the purple veins a passage find;
 There fix their stings, and leave their souls behind.

But if a pinching winter thou foresee,
 And wouldst preserve thy furnish'd family;
 With fragrant thyme the city fumigate,
 And break the waxen walls to save the state,
 For-lurking lizards often lodge, by stealth,
 Within the suburbs, and perjoin their wealth:
 And lizards, shunning light, a dark retreat
 Have found in combs, and undermin'd the seat.
 Or lazy drones, without their share of pain,
 In winter-quarters free, devour the grain:
 Or wasps infect the camp with loud alarms,
 And mix in battle with unequal arms:
 Or secret maths are there in silence fed;
 Or spiders in the vault their snary webs have spread.

The more oppress'd by foes, or famine pin'd,
 The more increase thy care to save the sinking kind,
 With greens and flowers recruit their empty hives,
 And seek fresh forage to sustain their lives.

But since they share with man one common fate,
 In health and sickness, and in turns of state;
 Observe the symptoms when they fall away,
 And languish with insensible decay. [stare,
 They change their hue, with haggard eyes they
 Lean are their looks, and shagg'd is their hair:
 And crowds of dead, that never must return
 To their lov'd hives, in decent pomp are borne:
 Their friends attend the hearse, the next relations
 mourn.

The sick, for air, before the portal gasp,
 Their feeble legs within each other clasp,
 Or idle in their empty hives remain,
 Benumb'd with cold, or listless of their gain.
 Soft whispers then and broken sounds are heard,
 As when the woods by gentle winds are stirr'd,
 Such stifled noise as the close furnace hides,
 Or dying murmurs of departing tides.
 This when thou seest, Galbanean odours use,
 And honey in the sickly hive infuse.
 Through redden pipes convey the golden flood,
 T' invite the people to their wonted food:
 Mix it with thicken'd juice of sodden wines,
 And raisins from the grapes of Pnythian vines:
 To these add pounded galls, and roses dry,
 And with Cecropian thyme, strong-scented century.

A flower there is that grows in meadow ground,
 Amellus call'd, and easy to be found:
 For from one root the rising stem bestows
 A wood of leaves, and violet-purple boughs.
 The flower itself is glorious to behold,
 And shines on altars like refulgent gold:
 Sharp to the taste, by shepherds near the stream
 Of Mella found, and thence they gave the name.
 Boil this restoring root in generous wine,
 And set beside the door the sickly stock to dine.
 But if the labouring kind be wholly lost,
 And not to be retriev'd with care or cost,
 'Tis time to touch the precepts of an art,
 Th' Arcadian master did of old impart:
 And how he stock'd his empty hives again;
 Renew'd with putrid gore of oxen slain.
 An ancient legend I prepare to sing,
 And upward follow Fame's immortal spring:

For where, with sevenfold horns, mysterious Nile
 Surrounds the skirts of Egypt's fruitful isle,
 And where in pomp the sunburnt people ride,
 On painted barges, o'er the teeming tide,
 Which, pouring down from Ethiopian lands,
 Makes green the soil with slime, and black prolific
 sands;

That length of region, and large tract of ground,
 In this one art a sure relief have found.
 First, in a place, by nature close, they build
 A narrow flooring, gutter'd, wall'd, and til'd.
 In this, four windows are contriv'd, that strike
 To the four winds oppos'd, th' ir beams oblique.
 A steer of two years old they take, whose head
 Now first with burnish'd horns begins to spread:
 They stop his nostrils, while he strives, in vain,
 To breathe free air, and struggles with his pain.
 Knock'd down, he dies: his bowels bruis'd within,
 Betray no wound on his unbroken skin.
 Extended thus, in his obscene abode, [strow'd
 They leave the beast; but first sweet flowers are Beneath his body, broken boughs and thyme,
 And pleasing cassia just renew'd in prime.
 This must be done, ere spring makes equal day,
 When western winds on curling waters play:
 Ere painted meads produce their flowery crops,
 Or swallows twitter on the chimney-tops.
 The tainted blood, in this close prison pent,
 Begins to boil, and through the bones ferment.
 Then, wondrous to behold, new creatures rise,
 A moving mass at first, and short of thighs;
 Till shooting out with legs, and imp'd with wings,
 The grubs proceed to bees with pointed stings:
 And more and more affecting air, they try
 Their tender pinions, and begin to fly.

At length, like summer storms from spreading clouds,

That burst at once, and pour impetuous floods,
 Or flights of arrows from the Parthian bows,
 When from afar they gall embattled foes,
 With such a tempest through the skies they steer,
 And such a form the winged squadrons bear.

What god, O Muse! this useful science taught?
 Or by what man's experience was it brought?

Sad Aristæus from fair Tempe fled,
 His bees with famine, or diseases, dead;
 On Peneus' banks he stood, and near his holy head.
 And while his falling tears the stream supply'd,
 Thus mourning, to his mother goddess cry'd:
 "Mother Cyrene, mother, whose abode
 Is in the depth of this immortal flood:
 What boons it, that from Phœbus' loins I spring,
 The third, by him and thee, from Heaven's high
 O! where is all thy boasted pity gone, [king?
 And promise of the skies to thy deluded son?
 Why didst thou me, unhappy me, create?
 Odious to gods, and born to bitter fate!
 Whom, scarce my sheep, and scarce my painful
 plough,

The needful aids of human life allow:
 So wretched is thy son, so hard a mother thou.
 Proceed, inhuman parent, in thy scorn;
 Root up my trees, with blights destroy my corn;
 My vineyards ruin, and my sheep-folds burn.
 Let loose thy rage, let all thy spite be shown,
 Since thus thy hate pursues the praises of thy son."
 But from her mossy bower below the ground,
 His careful mother heard the plaintive sound,
 Encompass'd with her sea-green sisters round.
 One common work they ply'd: their distaffs fall
 With carded locks of blue Milesian wool.
 Spio with Drymo brown, and Xanthe fair,
 And sweet Phylodoce, with long dishevell'd hair:
 Cydippe with Licorias, one a maid,
 And one that once had call'd Lucina's aid.
 Clio and Beroe, from one father both,
 Both girt with gold, and clad in party-colour'd cloth.
 Opis the meek, and Deiopeia proud;
 Nisæa lofty, with Ligæa loud;
 Thalia joyous, Ephyre the sad,
 And Arethusa, once Diana's maid,
 But now, her quiver left, to love betray'd.
 To these, Clymene the sweet theft declares
 Of Mars, and Vulcan's unavailing tears:
 And all the rapes of gods, and every love,
 From ancient Chaos down to youthful Jove.

Thus while she sings, the sisters turn the wheel,
 Empty the woolly rack, and fill the reel.
 A mournful sound again the mother hears;
 Again the mournful sound invades the sister's ears:
 Starting at once from their green seats, they rise;
 Fear in their heart, amazement in their eyes,
 But Arethusa, leaping from her bed,
 First lifts above the waves her beauteous head:
 And, crying from afar, thus to Cyrene said:
 "O sister! not with causeless fear possessat,
 No stranger voice disturbs thy tender breast.
 'Tis Aristæus, 'tis thy darling son,
 Who to his careless mother makes his moan!
 Near his paternal stream he sadly stands,
 With downcast eyes, wet cheeks, and folded hands:
 Upbraiding Heaven from whence his lineage came,
 And cruel calls the gods, and cruel thee, by name."
 Cyrene, mov'd with love, and seiz'd with fear,
 Cries out, "Conduct my son, conduct him here:

'Tis lawful for the youth, deriv'd from gods,
To view the secrets of our deep abodes."
At once she wav'd her hand on either side,
At once the ranks of swelling streams divide.
Two rising heaps of liquid crystal stand,
And leave a space betwixt, of empty sand.
Thus safe receiv'd, the downward track he treads,
Which to his mother's watery palace leads.
With wondering eyes, he views the secret store
Of lakes, that, pent in hollow caverns, roar.
He hears the crackling sound of coral woods,
And sees the secret source of subterranean floods.
And where, distinguish'd in their several cells,
The fount of Phasis and of Lycus dwells;
Where swift Enipeus in his bed appears,
And Tyber his majestic forehead rears.
Whence Anio flows, and Hypanis, profound,
Breaks thro' th' opposing rocks with raging sound.
Where Po first issues from his dark abodes,
And, awful in his cradle, rules the floods,
Two golden horns on his large front he wears,
And his grim face a bull's resemblance bears.
With rapid course he seeks the sacred main,
And fattens, as he runs, the fruitful plain.

Now to the court arriv'd, th' admiring son
Beholds the vaulted roofs of pory stone,
Now to his mother goddess tells his grief,
Which she with pity hears, and promises relief.
Th' officious nymphs, attending in a ring,
With water drawn from their perpetual spring,
From earthly dregs his body purify,
And rub his temples, with fine towels, dry:
Then load the tables with a liberal feast,
And honour with full bows their friendly guest.
Their sacred altars are involv'd in smoke,
And the bright quire their kindred gods invoke.
Two bows the mother fills with Lydian wine;
Then thus: "Let these be pour'd, with rites divine,
To the great author of our watery line.
To father Ocean, this; and this," she said,
"Be to the nymphs, his sacred sisters, paid,
Who rule the watery plains, and hold the woodland
shade."

She sprinkled thrice, with wine, the vestal fire,
Thrice to the vaulted roof the flames aspire.
Rais'd with so blest an omen, she begun,
With words like these, to cheer her drooping son.
"In the Carpathian bottom makes abode
The shepherd of the seas, a prophet and a god;
High o'er the main in watery pomp he rides,
His azure car and sinny coursers guides:
Proteus his name: to his Pallenian port
I see from far the weary god resort.
Him, not alone, we river-gods adore,
But aged Nereus hearkens to his lore.
With sure foresight, and with unerring doom,
He sees what is, and was, and is to come.
This Neptune gave him, when he gave to keep
His scaly flocks, that graze the watery deep.
Implore his aid, for Proteus only knows
The secret cause, and cure of all thy woes.
But first the wily wizard must be caught,
For, unconstrain'd, he nothing tells for naught;
Nor is with prayers, or bribes, or flattery, bought.
Surprise him first, and with hard fetters bind;
Then all his frauds will vanish into wind.
I will myself conduct thee on thy way,
When next the southing Sun inflames the day:
When the dry herbage thirsts for dews in vain,
And sheep, in shades, avoid the parching plain;

Then will I lead thee to his secret seat;
When, weary with his toil, and scorcht'd with heat,
The wayward sire frequents his cool retreat.
His eyes with heavy slumber overcast;
With force invade his limbs, and bind him fast:
Thus surely bound, yet be not over bold,
The slippery god will try to loose his hold:
And various forms assume to cheat thy sight;
And with vain images of beasts affright.
With foamy tusks will seem a bristly boar,
Or imitate the lion's angry roar;
Break out in crackling flames to shun thy snare,
Or hiss a dragon, or a tiger stare:
Or with a wile, thy caution to betray,
In fleeting streams attempt to slide away.
But thou, the more he varies forms, beware
To strain his fetters with a stricter care:
Till, tiring all his arts, he turns again
To his true shape, in which he first was seen."

This said, with nectar she her son anoints:
Infusing vigour through his mortal joints:
Down from his head the liquid odours ran:
He'breath'd of Heaven, and look'd above a man.
Within a mountain's hollow womb there lies
A large recess, conceal'd from human eyes;
Where heaps of billows, driven by wind and tide,
In form of war, their watery ranks divide;
And there, like sentries set, without the mouth abide;

A station safe for ships, when tempests roar,
A silent harbour, and a cover'd shore.
Secure within resides the various god,
And draws a rock upon his dark abode.
Hither with silent steps, secure from sight,
The goddess guides her son, and turns him from the light:

Herself, involv'd in clouds, precipitates her sight.
'Twas noon; the sultry dog-star from the sky
Scorch'd Indian swains, the rivell'd grass was dry;
The Sun, with flaming arrows, pierc'd the flood,
And, darting to the bottom, bak'd the mud:
When weary Proteus, from the briny waves,
Retir'd for shelter to his wonted caves:
His sinny flocks about their shepherd play,
And, rolling round him, spirt the bitter sea.
Unwieldily they wallow first in ooze,
Then in the shady covert seek repose.
Himself their herdsman, on the middle mount,
Takes of his muster'd flocks a just account.
So, seated on a rock, a shepherd's groom
Surveys his evening flocks returning home:
When lowing calves, and bleating lambs, from far,
Provoke the prowling wolf to nightly war.
Th' occasion offers, a: the youth complies:
For scarce the weary god had clos'd his eyes,
When rushing on, with shouts, he binds in chains
The drowsy prophet, and his limbs constrains.
He, not unmindful of his usual art,
First in dissembled fire attempts to part:
Then roaring beasts and running streams he tries,
And wearies all his miracles of lies:
But, having shifted every form to scape,
Convinc'd of conquest, he resum'd his shape;
And thus, at length, in human accent spoke:
"Audacious youth, what madness could provoke
A mortal man t' invade a sleeping god?
What business brought thee to my dark abode?"
To this th' audacious youth: "Thou know'st full well

My name, and business, god, nor need I tell:

No man can Proteus cheat; but, Proteus, leave
 Thy fraudulent arts, and do not thou deceive.
 Following the gods' command, I come t' implore
 Thy help, my perish'd people to restore."
 The seer, who could not yet his wrath assuage,
 Roll'd his green eyes, that sparkled with his rage;
 And gnash'd his teeth, and cry'd, "No vulgar god
 Pursues thy crimes, nor with a common rod.
 Thy great misdeeds have met a due reward,
 And Orpheus' dying prayers at length are heard;
 For crimes, not his, the lover lost his life,
 And at thy hands requires his murder'd wife;
 Nor (if the Fates assist not) canst thou 'scape
 The just revenge of that intended rape.
 To shun thy lawless lust, the dying bride,
 Unwary, took along the river's side:
 Nor at her heels perceiv'd the deadly snake,
 That keeps the bank, in covert of the brake.
 But all her fellow-nymphs the mountains tear
 With loud laments, and break the yielding air:
 The realms of Mars rearmur'd all around,
 And echoes to th' Athenian shores rebound.
 Th' unhappy husband, husband now no more,
 Did on his tuneful harp his loss deplore,
 And sought his mournful mind with music to re-
 On thee, dear wife, in deserts all alone, [store.
 He call'd, sigh'd, sung, his griefs with day began,
 Nor were they finish'd with the setting Sun.
 Ev'n to the dark dominions of the night
 He took his way, through forests void of light:
 And dar'd amidst the trembling ghosts to sing,
 And stood before th' inexorable king.
 Th' infernal troops like passing shadows glide,
 And, listening, crowd the sweet musician's side.
 Nor flocks of birds, when driven by storms or night,
 Stretch to the forest with so thick a flight,
 Men, matrons, children, and th' unmarried maid;
 The mighty hero's more majestic shade;
 And youths on funeral piles before their parents
 All these Corytus bounds with squalid reeds, [laid.
 With muddy ditches, and with deadly weeds:
 And baleful Styx encompasses around, [ground.
 With nine slow circling streams, th' unhappy
 Ev'n from the depths of Hell the damn'd advance,
 Th' infernal mansions nodding seem to dance:
 The gaping three-mouth'd dog forgets to snarl,
 The Furies hearken, and their snakes uncurl:
 Ixion seems no more his pain to feel,
 But leans attentive on his standing wheel.
 "All dangers past, at length the lovely bride
 In safety goes, with her melodious guide;
 Longing the common light again to share,
 And draw the vital breath of upper air:
 He first, and close behind him follow'd she,
 For such was Proserpine's severe decree.
 When strong desires th' impatient youth invade;
 By little caution and much love betray'd;
 A fault which easy pardon might receive,
 Were lovers judges, or could Hell forgive.
 For near the confines of ch'erial light,
 And longing for the glimmering of a sight,
 Th' unwary lover cast his eyes behind,
 Forgetful of the law, nor master of his mind.
 Straight all his hopes exhal'd in empty smoke;
 And his long toils were forfeit for a look.
 Three dashes of blue lightning gave the sign
 Of covenants broke, three peals of thunder join.

 Normanby's translation. DRYDEN.

Then thus the bride: "What fury seiz'd on thee,
 Unhappy man! to lose thyself and me?
 Dragg'd back again by cruel destinies,
 An iron slumber shut my swimming eyes.
 And now farewell, involv'd in shades of night,
 For ever I am ravish'd from thy sight.
 In vain I reach my feeble hands to join
 In sweet embraces; ah! no longer thine!"
 She said, and from his eyes the fleeting fair
 Retir'd like subtle smoke dissolv'd in air;
 And left her hopeless lover in despair.
 In vain, with folding arms, the youth essay'd
 To stop her flight, and strain the flying shade:
 He prays, he raves, all means in vain he tries,
 With rage inflam'd, astonish'd with surprise;
 But she return'd no more, to bless his longing eyes.
 Nor would th' infernal ferryman once more
 Be brib'd, to waft him to the farther shore.
 What should he do, who twice had lost his love?
 What notes invent, what new petitions move?
 Her soul already was consign'd to fate,
 And shivering in the leaky sculler sat.
 For seven continued months, if false say true,
 The wretched swain his sorrows did renew;
 By Strymon's freezing streams he sat alone,
 The rocks were mov'd to pity with his moan:
 Trees bent their heads to hear him sing his wrongs;
 Fierce tigers couch'd around, and loll'd their sawing tongues.
 So, close in poplar shades, her children gone,
 The mother nightingale laments alone,
 Whose nest some prying churl had found, and thence,
 By stealth, convey'd th' unfeather'd innocence;
 But she supplies the night with mournful strains,
 And melancholy music fills the plains.
 "Sad Orpheus thus his tedious hours employs,
 Averse from Venus, and from nuptial joys.
 Alone he tempts the frozen floods, alone
 Th' unhappy climes, where spring was never known;
 He mourn'd his wretched wife, in vain restor'd,
 And Plato's envenom'd boon deplo'r'd.
 "The Thracian matrons, who the youth accus'd
 Of love disdain'd, and marriage-rites refus'd,
 With furrows and nocturnal orgies fir'd,
 At length, against his sacred life conspir'd.
 Whom ev'n the savage beasts had spar'd, they kill'd,
 And strew'd his mangled limbs about the field,
 Then, when his head from his fair shoulders torn,
 Wash'd by the waters, was on Hebrews borne;
 Ev'n then his trembling tongue invoc'd his bride;
 With his last voice, 'Eurydice!' he cry'd,
 'Eurydice!' the rocks and river-banks reply'd."
 This answer Proteus gave, nor more he said,
 But in the willows plung'd his hoary head;
 And where he leas'd, the waves in circles widely spread.
 The nymph return'd, her drooping son to cheer,
 And bade him banish his superfluous fear:
 "For now," said she, "the cause is known, from whence
 Thy woes succeeded, and for what offence:
 The nymphs, companions of th' unhappy maid,
 This punishment upon thy crimes have laid;
 And sent a plague among thy thriving bees.
 With vows and suppliant prayers their powers ap-
 The soft Napean race will soon repent [pass;
 Their anger, and remit the punishment:
 The secret in an easy method lies;
 Select four strowy bulks for sacrifice,

Which on Lydian grass, without a guide;
 Add four fair heifers yet in yoke untry'd:
 For these, four altars in their temple rear,
 And then adore the woodland powers with prayer.
 From the slain victims pour the streaming blood,
 And leave their bodies in the shady wood:
 Nine mornings thence, Lethæan poppy bring,
 'T' appease the manes of the poets' king:
 And, to propitiate his offended pride,
 A fatted calf, and a black ewe, provide:
 This finish'd, to the former woods repair."
 His mother's precepts he performs with care;
 The temple visits, and adores with prayer.
 Four altars raises, from his herd he culls,
 For slaughter, four the fairest of his bulls;
 Four heifers from his female store he took,
 All fair, and all unknowing of the yoke.
 Nine mornings thence, with sacrifice and prayers,
 The powers aton'd, he to the grove repairs.
 Behold a prodigy! for, from within
 The broken bowels, and the bloated skin,
 A buzzing noise of bees his ears alarms,
 Straight issue through the sides assembling swarms,
 Dark as a cloud they make a wheeling flight,
 Then on a neighbouring tree, descending light:
 Like a large cluster of black grapes they show,
 And make a large dependance from the bough.
 Thus have I sung of fields, and flocks, and trees,
 And of the waxen work of labouring bees:
 While mighty Caesar, thundering from afar,
 Seeks on Euphrates' banks the spoils of war;
 With conquering arts asserts his country's cause,
 With arts of peace the willing people draws:
 On the glad Earth the golden age renews,
 And his great father's path to Heaven pursues.
 While I at Naples pass my peaceful days,
 Affecting studies of less noisy praise:
 And bold, thro' youth, beneath the beechen shade,
 The lays of shepherds, and their loves, have play'd.

VIRGIL'S AENEIS.

TO THE MOST HONOURABLE

JOHN,

LORD MARQUIS OF NORMANBY, EARL OF MULOVAE, &c.

AND

KNIGHT OF THE MOST NOBLE ORDER OF THE GARTER.

AN heroic poem, truly such, is undoubtedly the greatest work which the soul of a man is capable to perform. The design of it is to form the mind to heroic virtue by example; it is conveyed in verse, that it may delight while it instructs: the action of it is always one, entire, and great. The least and most trivial episodes, or under-actions, which are interwoven in it, are parts either necessary, or convenient, to carry on the main design. Either so necessary, that without them the poem must be imperfect; or so convenient, that no others can be imagined more suitable to the place in which they are. There is nothing to be left void in a firm building; even the cavities ought not to be filled with rubbish, which is of a perishable kind, destructive to the strength: but with brick or stone, though of less pieces, yet of the same nature, and fitted to the crannies. Even the least portions of them must be of the epic kind; all things must be grave, majestic, and sublime: nothing of a foreign nature, like the trifling novels, which Aristotle and others have inserted in their poems: by which the reader is misled into another sort of pleasure, opposite to that which is designed in an epic poem. One raises the soul; and hardens it to virtue; the other softens it again, and unbends it into vice. One obduces to the poet's aim, the completing of his work, which he is driving on, labouring and hastening in every line; the other slackens his pace, diverts him from his way, and locks him up like a knight-errant in an enchanted castle, when he should be pursuing his first adventure. Statius, as Bætu has well observed, was ambitious of trying his strength with his master Virgil, as Virgil had before tried his with Homer. The Grecian gave the two Romans an example, in the games which were celebrated at the funerals of Patroclus: Virgil imitated the invention of Homer, but changed the sports. But both the Greek and Latin poet took their occasions from the subject; though, to confess the truth, they were both ornamental, or, at best, convenient parts of it, rather than of necessity arising from it. Statius, who, through his whole poem, is noted for want of conduct and judgment, instead of staying, as he might have done, for the death of Capaneus, Hippomedon, Tydeus, or some other of his seven champions (who are heroes all alike), or more properly for the tragical end of the two brothers, whose exequies the next successor had leisure to perform, when the siege was raised, and in the interval betwixt the poet's first action and his second, went out of his way, as it were on pre-pense malice, to commit a fault: for he took his opportunity to kill a royal infant, by the means of a serpent (that author of all evil), to make way for those funeral honours which he intended for him. Now if this introit had been of any relation to his Thœbus; if he had either furthered or hindered the taking of the town, the poet might have found some sorry excuse at least for the detaining the reader from the promised siege. On these terms, this Capaneus of a poet engaged his two immortal predecessors, and his success was answerable to his enterprise.

If this ecotony must be observed in the mi-

metest parts of an epic poem, which, to a common reader, seem to be detached from the body, and almost independent of it, what soul, though sent into the world with great advantages of nature, cultivated with the liberal arts and sciences, conversant with histories of the dead, and enriched with observations on the living, can be sufficient to inform the whole body of so great a work? I touch here but transiently, without any strict method, on some few of those many rules of imitating nature, which Aristotle drew from Homer's Iliads and Odyssees, and which he fitted to the drama; furnishing himself also with observations from the practice of the theatre, when it flourished under Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles. For the original of the stage was from the epic poem. Narration, doubtless, preceded acting, and gave lays to it: what at first was told artfully, was, in process of time, represented gracefully to the sight and hearing. Those episodes of Homer, which were proper for the stage, the poets amplified each into an action: out of his limbs they formed their bodies: what he had contracted they enlarged: out of one Hercules were made infinity of pygmies; yet all endued with human souls: for from him, their great creator, they have each of them the divine particular auras. They flowed from him at first, and are at last resolved into him. Nor were they only animated by him, but their measure and symmetry was owing to him. His one, entire, and great action was copied by them according to the proportions of the drama: if he finished his orb within the year, it sufficed to teach them, that their action being less, and being also less diversified with incidents, their orb, of consequence, must be circumscribed in a less compass, which they reduced within the limits either of a natural or an artificial day: so that as he taught them to amplify what he had shortened, by the same rule applied the contrary way, he taught them to shorten what he had amplified. Tragedy is the miniature of human life: an epic poem is the draught at length. Here, my lord, I must contract also: for, before I was aware, I was almost running into a long digression, to prove that there is no such absolute necessity that the time of a stage-action should so strictly be confined to twenty-four hours, as never to exceed them, for which Aristotle contends, and the Grecian stage has practised. Some longer space, on some occasions, I think may be allowed, especially for the English theatre, which requires more variety of incidents than the French. Cornille himself, after long practice, was inclined to think, that the time allotted by the ancients was too short to raise and finish a great action: and better a mechanic rule were stretched or broken, than a great beauty were omitted. To raise, and afterwards to calm the passions, to purge the soul from pride, by the examples of human miseries, which befall the greatest; in few words, to expel arrogance, and introduce compassion, are the great effects of tragedy. Great, I must confess, if they were altogether as true as they are pompous. But are habits to be introduced at three hours' warning? Are radical diseases so suddenly removed? A mountebank may promise such a cure, but a skilful physician will not undertake it. An epic poem is not so much in haste: it works leisurely; the changes which it makes are slow; but the cure is likely to be more perfect. The effects of tragedy, as I said, are too violent to be lasting. If it be answered, that for this reason tragedies are often to be seen, and the dose to be repeated; this is tacitly to confess, that there is more virtue in one heroic poem, than in many tragedies. A man is humbled one day, and his pride returns the next. Chymical medicines are observed to relieve oftener than to cure: for it is the nature of spirits to make swift impressions, but not deep. Galenical decoctions, to which I may properly compare an epic poem, have more of body in them; they work by their substance and their weight. It is one reason of Aristotle's to prove that tragedy is the more noble, because it turns in a shorter compass: the whole action being circumscribed within the space of four-and-twenty hours. He might prove as well that a mushroom is to be preferred before a peach, because it shoots up in the compass of a night. A chariot may be driven round the pillar in less space than a large machine, because the bulk is not so great: is the Moon a more noble planet than Saturn, because she makes her revolution in less than thirty days, and he in little less than thirty years? Both their orbs are in proportion to their several magnitudes; and, consequently, the quickness or slowness of their motion, and the time of their circumsolutions, is no argument of the greater or less perfection. And besides, what virtue is there in a tragedy, which is not contained in an epic poem: where pride is humbled, virtue rewarded, and vice punished; and those more amply treated, than the narrowness of the drama can admit? The shining quality of an epic hero, his magnanimity, his constancy, his patience, his piety, or whatever characteristic virtue his poet gives him, raises first our admiration: we are naturally prone to imitate what we admire: and frequent acts produce a habit. If the hero's child quality be vicious, as for example, the choleric and obstinate desire of vengeance in Achilles, yet the moral is instructive: and besides, we are informed in the very proposition of the Iliads, that his anger was pernicious; that it brought a thousand ills on the Grecian camp. The courage of Achilles is proposed to imitation, not his pride and disobedience to his general, nor his brutal cruelty to his dead enemy, nor the selling his body to his father. We abhor these actions while we read them, and what we abhor we never imitate: the poet only shows them like rocks or quicksands, to be shunned.

By this example, the critics have concluded that it is not necessary the manners of the hero should be virtuous. They are poetically good if they are of a piece. Though where a character of perfect virtue is set before us, it is more lovely: for there the whole hero is to be imitated. This is the Æneas of our author: this is that idea of perfection in an epic poem, which painters and statuaries have only in their minds; and which no hands are able to express. These are the beauties of a god in a human body. When the picture of Achilles is drawn in tragedy, he is taken with those warts, and moles, and hard features, by those who represent him on the stage, or he is no more Achilles: for his creator Homer has so described him. Yet even thus he appears a perfect hero, though an imperfect character of virtue. Horace paints him after Homer, and delivers him to be copied on the stage with all those imperfections. Therefore they are either not faults in an heroic poem, or faults common to the drama. After all, on the whole merits of the cause, it must be acknowledged that the epic poem is more for the manners, and tragedy for the passions. The passions, as I have said, are violent: and acute distempers require medicines of a strong and speedy operation. Ill habits of the mind are, like chronic diseases, to be corrected by degrees, and cured by alteratives: wherein though purges are sometimes necessary, yet diet, good air, and moderate exercise, have the greatest part. The matter being thus stated, it will appear that both sorts of poetry are of use for their proper ends. The stage is more active, the epic poem works at greater leisure, yet is acted too, when need requires. For dialogue is imitated by the drama, from the more active parts of it. One puts off a fit like the quinquina, and relieves us only for a time; the other roots out the distemper, and gives a healthful habit. The Sun enlightens and cheers us, dispels fogs, and warms the ground with his daily beams; but the corn is sowed, increase, is ripened, and is reaped for use in process of time, and in its proper season. I proceed from the greatness of the action, to the dignity of the actors, I mean the persons employed in both poems. There likewise tragedy will be seen to borrow from the epopee; and that which borrows is always of less dignity, because it has not of its own. A subject, it is true, may lend to his sovereign; but the act of borrowing makes the king inferior, because he wants, and the subject supplies. And suppose the persons of the drama wholly fabulous, or of the poet's invention, yet heroic poetry gave him the examples of that invention, because it was first, and Homer the common father of the stage. I know not of any one advantage which tragedy can boast above heroic poetry, but that it is represented to the view, as well as read: and instructs in the closet, as well as on the theatre. This is an uncontended excellence, and a chief branch of its prerogative; yet I may be allowed to say, without partiality, that herein the actors share the poet's praise. Your lordship knows some modern tragedies which are beautiful on the stage, and yet I am confident you would not read them. Tryphon, the stationer, complains they are seldom asked for in his shop. The poet who flourished in the scene, is damned in the Ruelle; nay more, he is not esteemed a good poet by those who see and hear his extravagancies with delight. They are a sort of stately fustian, and lofty childishness. Nothing but nature can give a sincere pleasure; where that is not imitated, it is grotesque painting, the fine woman ends in a fish's tail.

I might also add, that many things, which not only please, but are real beauties in the reading, would appear absurd upon the stage: and those not only the speciosa miracula, as Horace calls them, of transformations, of Scylla, Antiphones, and the Lestrigons, which cannot be represented even in operas, but the prowess of Achilles, or Æneas, would appear ridiculous in our dwarf-heroes of the theatre. We can believe they routed armies in Homer, or in Virgil; but he Hercules contra duos in the drama. I forbear to instance in many things, which the stage cannot, or ought not to represent. For I have said already more than I intended on this subject, and should fear it might be turned against me, that I plead for the pre-eminence of epic poetry, because I have taken some pains in translating Virgil; if this were the first time that I had delivered my opinion in this dispute. But I have more than once already maintained the rights of my two masters against their rivals of the scene, even while I wrote tragedies myself, and had no thoughts of this present undertaking. I submit my opinion to your judgment, who are better qualified than any man I know to decide this controversy. You come, my lord, instructed in the cause, and needed not that I should open it. Your essay of poetry, which was published without a name, and of which I was not honoured with the confidence, I read over and over, with much delight, and as much instruction: and, without flattering you, or making myself more moral than I am, not without some envy. I was loth to be informed how an epic poem should be written, or how a tragedy should be contrived and managed, in better verse, and with more judgment, than I could teach others. A native of Parnassus, and bred up in the studies of its fundamental laws, may receive new lights from his contemporaries; but it is a grudging kind of praise which he gives his benefactors. He is more obliged than he is willing to acknowledge: there is a tincture of malice in his commendations. For where I own I am taught, I confess my want of knowledge. A judge upon the bench may, out of good-nature, or at least interest, encourage the pleadings of a puny counsellor; but he does not willingly commend his brother sergeant at the bar; especially when he controls his law, and exposes that ignorance which is made sacred by his place. I gave the unknown author his due commendation, I must confess: but who can answer for me, and for the rest of the poets, who heard me read the poem, whether we should not have been better pleased to have seen our own names at the bottom of the title-page? Perhaps we commended it the more, that we might seem to be above the censure. We are naturally displeas'd with an unknown critic, as the ladies are with a lampooner; because we are bitten in the dark, and know not where to fasten our revenge. But great excellencies will work their way through all sorts of opposition. I applauded rather out of decency than affection; and was ambitious, as some yet can witness, to be acquainted with a man with whom I had the honour to converse, and that almost daily, for so many years together. Heaven knows, if I have heartily forgiven you this deceit. You extorted a praise, which I should willingly have given, had I known you. Nothing had been more easy than to commend a patron of a long standing. The world would join with me, if the encomiums were just; and if unjust, would excuse a grateful flatterer. But to come anonymous upon me, and force me to commend you against my interest, was not altogether so fair, give me leave to say, as it was politic. For, by concealing your quality, you might easily understand how your work succeeded; and that the general approbation was given to your merit, not your title. Thus, like Apollo, you stood unseen behind your own Vases, and received the praises of the passing multitude: the work was commended, not the author: and I doubt not, this was one of the most pleasing adventures of your life.

I have detain'd your lordship longer than I intended in this dispute of preference betwixt the epic poem and the drama: and yet have not formally answer'd any of the arguments which are brought by Aristotle on the other side, and not in the fairest light by Ducler. But I suppose, without looking on the book, I may have touch'd on some of the objections. For, in this address to your lordship, I design not a treatise of heroic poetry, but write in a loose epistolary way, somewhat leading to that subject, after the example of Horace, in his first epistle of the second book to Augustus Cæsar, and of that to the Pico, which we call his Art of Poetry. In both of which he observes no method that I can trace, whatever Scaliger the father, or Heinsius, may have seen, or rather think they had seen. I have taken up, laid down, and resum'd, as often as I pleas'd, the same subject: and this loose proceeding I shall use through all this prefatory dedication. Yet all this while I have been sailing with some side-wind or other toward the point I propos'd in the beginning: the greatness and excellency of an heroic poem, with some of the difficulties which attend that work. The comparison therefore which I made betwixt the epopes, and the tragedy, was not altogether a digression: for it is concluded on all hands, that they are both the master-pieces of human wit.

In the mean time, I may be bold to draw this corollary from what has been already said, that the file of heroic poets is very short: all are not such who have assumed that lofty title in ancient or modern ages, or have been so esteem'd by their partial and ignorant admirers.

There have been but one great bias, and one Æneis, in so many ages. The next, but the next with a long interval betwixt, was the Jerusalem: I mean not so much in distance of time, as in excellency. After these three are entered, some lord chancellorain should be appointed, some critic of authority should be set before the door, to keep out a crowd of little poets, who pass for admission, and are not of quality. Mævius would be deserving your lordship's care, with his

*Fortunatus Prius castabo, & tibi bellum.
Mere fustian, as Horace would tell you from be-* hind, without pressing forward, and more smoke than fire. Pulci, Boyardo, and Ariosto, would cry out, make room for the Italian poets, the descendants of Virgil in a right line. Father Le Moine, with his Saint Louis; and Soudery with his Alaric, for a godly king, and Gothic conqueror; and Chapelain would take it ill that his maid should be refused a place with Helen and Lavinia. Spenser has a better plea for his Fairy Queen, had his action been finished, or had been one. And Milton, if the devil had not been his hero, instead of Adam, if the giant had not foiled the knight, and driven him out of his strong hold, to wander through the world with his lady-errant; and if there had not been more machining persons than human, in his poem. After these, the rest of our English poets shall not be mentioned. I have that honour for them which I ought to have; but if they are worthies, they are not to be ranked amongst the three whom I have named, and who are established in their reputation.

Before I quitted the comparison betwixt epic poetry and tragedy, I should have acquainted my judge with one advantage of the former over the latter, which I now casually remember out of the preface of Sograis before his translation of the Æneis, or out of Bossu, no matter which. The style of the heroic poem is, and ought to be, more lofty than that of the drama. The critic is certainly in the right, for the reason already urged: the work of tragedy is on the passions; and, in a dialogue, both of them abhor strong metaphors, in which the epopee delights. A poet cannot speak too plainly on the stage: for, volat irrevocabile verbum; the sense is lost, if it be not taken flying; but what we read alone, we have leisure to digest. There an author may beautify his sense by the boldness of his expression, which, if we understand not fully at the first, we may dwell upon it, till we find the secret force and excellence.— That which cures the manners by alterative physic, as I said before, must proceed by insensible degrees; but that which purges the passions, must do its business all at once, or wholly fail of its effect, at least in the present operation, and without repeated doses. We must beat the iron while it is hot, but we may polish it at leisure.— Thus my lord, you pay the fine of my forgetfulness; and yet the merits of both causes are where they were, and undecided, till you declare whether it be more for the benefit of mankind to have their manners in general corrected, or their pride and hard-heartedness removed.

I must now come closer to my present business;

and not think of making more invasive wars abroad, when, like Hannibal, I am called back to the defence of my own country. Virgil is attacked by many enemies: he has a whole confederacy against him, and I must endeavour to defend him as well as I am able. But their principal objections being against his moral, the duration or length of time taken up in the actions of the poem, and what they have to urge against the manners of his hero; I shall omit the rest as mere cavils of grammarians: at the worst but casual slips of a great man's pen, or inconsiderable faults of an admirable poem, which the author had not leisure to review before his death. Macrobius has answered what the ancients could urge against him; and some things I have lately read in Tanaquay, in Fevre, Valeis, and another whom I name not, which are scarce worth answering. They begin with the moral of his poem, which I have elsewhere confessed, and still must own, not to be so noble as that of Homer. But let both be fairly stand; and, without contradicting my first opinion, I can show that Virgil's was as useful to the Romans of his age, as Homer's was to the Grecians of his: in what time sever he may be supposed to have lived and flourished. Homer's moral was to urge the necessity of union, and of a good understanding betwixt confederate states and princes engaged in a war with a mighty monarch; as also of discipline in an army, and obediences in their several chiefs, to the supreme commander of the joint forces. To inculcate this, he sets forth the ruinous effects of discord in the camp of those allies, occasioned by the quarrel betwixt the general, and one of the tent in office under him. Agamemnon gives the provocation, and Achilles resents the injury. Both parties are faulty in the quarrel, and accordingly they are both punished: the aggressor is forced to sue for peace to his inferior on dishonourable conditions; the deserter refuses the satisfaction offered, and his obstinacy costs him his best friend. This works the natural effect of choler, and turns his rage against him by whom he was last affronted, and most sensibly. The greater anger expels the less; but his character is still preserved. In the mean time the Grecian army receives loss on loss, and is half destroyed by a pestilence into the bargain.

Quicquid delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.

As the poet, in the first part of the example, had shown the bad effects of discord, so after the reconciliation he gives the good effects of unity.— For Hector is slain, and then Troy must fall. By this it is probable, that Homer lived when the Median monarchy was grown formidable to the Grecians; and that the joint endeavours of his countrymen were little enough to preserve their common freedom from an encroaching enemy.—Such was his moral, which all critics have allowed to be more noble than that of Virgil, though not adapted to the times in which the Roman poet lived. Had Virgil flourished in the age of Ennius, and addressed to Scipio, he had probably taken the same moral, or some other not unlike it. For then the Romans were in as much danger from the Carthaginian commonwealth, as the Grecians were from the Assyrian or Median monarchy. But we are to consider him as writing his poem in a time when the old form of government was subverted, and a new one just established by Octavius Cæsar: in effect by force of arms, but seemingly by the consent of the Roman people. The commonwealth had received a deadly wound in the former civil wars betwixt Marius and Sylla. The commons, while the first prevailed, had almost shaken off the yoke of the nobility; and Marius and Cinna, like the captains of the mob, under the specious pretence of the public good, and of doing justice on the oppressors of their liberty, revenged themselves, without form of law, on their private enemies. Sylla, in his turn, proscribed the heads of the adverse party: he, too, had nothing but liberty and reformation in his mouth (for the cause of religion is but a modern motive to rebellion, invented by the christian priesthood, refining on the heathen). Sylla, to be sure, meant no more good to the Roman people than Marius before, whatever he declared; but sacrificed the lives, and took the estates of all his enemies, to gratify those who brought him into power: such was the reformation of the government by both parties. The senate and the commons were the two bases on which it stood; and the two champions of either faction, each destroyed the foundations of the other side: so the fabric of consequence must fall betwixt them, and tyranny must be built upon their ruins. This comes of altering fundamental laws and constitutions. Like him, who, being in good health, lodged himself in a physician's house, and was over-persuaded by his landlord to take physic, of which he died, for the benefit of his doctor: Stavo ben (was written on his monument) ma, perstar meglio, sto qui.

After the death of those two usurpers, the commonwealth seemed to recover, and held up its head for a little time. But it was all the while in a deep consumption, which is a flattering disease. Pompey, Crassus, and Cæsar, had found the sweets of arbitrary power; and, each being a check to the other's growth, struck up a false friendship amongst themselves, and dividel the government betwixt them, which none of them was able to assume alone. These were the public-spirited men of their age, that is, patriots of their own interest. The commonwealth looked with a florid countenance in their management, spread in bulk, and all the while was wasting in the vitals. Not to trouble your lordship with the repetition of what you know: after the death of Crassus, Pompey found himself outwitted by Cæsar; broke with him, overpowered him in the senate, and caused many unjust decrees to pass against him: Cæsar, thus injured, and unable to resist the faction of the nobles, which was now uppermost (for he was a Marian) had recourse to arms; and his cause was just against Pompey, but not against his country; whose constitution ought to have been sacred to him; and never to have been violated on the account of any private wrong. But he prevailed; and Heaven declaring for him, he became a providential monarch, under the title of perpetual dictator. He being murdered by his own son, whom I neither dare commend, nor can justly blame, (though Dante, in his Inferno, has put him and Cassius, and Judas Iscariot betwixt them, into the great devil's mouth) the commonwealth popped up its head for the third time, under Brutus and Cassius, and then sunk forever.

Thus the Roman people were grossly gulled, twice or thrice over; and as often enslaved in one century, and under the same pretence of reformation. At last the two battles of Philippi gave the decisive stroke against liberty; and not long after, the commonwealth was turned into a monarchy, by the conduct and good fortune of Augustus. It is true, that the despotic power could not have fallen into better hands, than those of the first and second Cæsar. Your lordship well knows what obligations Virgil had to the latter of them: he saw, beside, that the commonwealth was lost without resource: the heads of it destroyed; the senate new moulded, grown degenerate; and either bought off, or thrusting their own necks into the yoke, out of fear of being forced. Yet I may safely affirm for our great author (as men of good sense are generally honest) that he was still of republican principles in his heart—

Secretisque piis, his dantem jurâ Catonem.

I think, I need use no other argument to justify my opinion, than that of this one line, taken from the eighth book of the Æneid. If he had not well studied his patron's temper, it might have ruined him with another prince. But Augustus was not discontented, at least that we can find, that Cato was placed, by his own poet, in Elysium; and there giving laws to the holy souls, who deserved to be separated from the vulgar sort of good spirits. For his conscience could not but whisper to the arbitrary monarch, that the kings of Rome were at first elective, and governed not without a senate: that Romulus was no hereditary prince, and though, after his death, he received divine honours, for the good he did on Earth, yet he was but a god of their own making: that the last Tarquin was expelled justly for overt-acts of tyranny, and male-administration; for such are the conditions of an elective kingdom: and I meddle not with others: being, for my own opinion, of Montaigne's principles, that an honest man ought to be contented with that form of government, and with those fundamental constitutions of it, which he received from his ancestors, and under which himself was born. Though at the same time he confessed freely, that if he could have chosen his place of birth, it should have been at Venice: which, for many reasons, I dislike, and am better pleased to have been born an Englishman.

But to return from my long rambling: I say that Virgil having maturely weighed the condition of the times in which he lived; that an entire liberty was not to be retrieved: that the present settlement had the prospect of a long continuance in the same family, or those adopted into it: that he held his paternal estate from the bounty of the conqueror, by whom he was likewise enriched, esteemed, and cherished: that this conqueror, though of a bad kind, was the very best of it: that the arts of peace flourished under him: that all men might be happy, if they would be quiet: that now he was in possession of the whole, yet he shared a great part of his authority with the senate: that he would be chosen into the ancient offices of the commonwealth, and ruled by the power which he derived from them; and prorogued his government from time to time: still, as it were, threatening to dismiss himself from public cares, which he exercised more for the common good, than for any delight he took in greatness: these things, I say, being considered by the poet, he concluded it to be the interest of his country to be so governed: to infuse an awful respect into the people towards such a prince: by that respect to confirm their obedience to him: and by that obedience to make them happy. This was the moral of his divine poem: honest in the poet:

honourable to the emperor, whom he derives from a divine extraction; and reflecting part of that honour on the Roman people, whom he derives also from the Trojans; and not only profitable, but necessary to the present age; and likely to be such to their posterity. That it was the received opinion that the Romans were descended from the Trojans, and Julius Cæsar from Iulus the son of Æneas, was enough for Virgil: though perhaps he thought not so himself: or that Æneas ever was in Italy, which Bochartus manifestly proves. And Homer, where he says that Jupiter hated the house of Priam, and was resolved to transfer the kingdom to the family of Æneas, yet mentions nothing of his leading a colony into a foreign country, and settling there; but that the Romans valued themselves on their Trojan ancestry, is so undoubted a truth, that I need not prove it. Even the seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them, though they were all graven after his death, as a note that he was deified. I doubt not but one reason, why Augustus should be so passionately concerned for the preservation of the Æneis, which its author had condemned to be burnt, as an imperfect poem, by his last will and testament, was, because it did him a real service, as well as an honour; that a work should not be lost, where his divine original was celebrated in verse, which had the character of immortality stamped upon it.

Neither were the great Roman families which flourished in his time, less obliged to him than the emperor. Your lordship knows with what address he makes mention of them, as captains of ships or leaders in the war; and even some of Italian extraction are not forgotten. These are the single stars which are sprinkled through the Æneis; but there are whole constellations of them in the fifth book. And I could not but take notice, when I translated it, of some favourite families to which he gives the victory, and awards the prizes, in the person of his hero, at the funeral games which were celebrated in honour of Anchises. I insist not on their names; but am pleased to find the Memmii amongst them, derived from Menestheus, because Lucretius dedicates to one of that family, a branch of which destroyed Corinth. I likewise either found or formed an image to myself of the contrary kind: that those who lost the prizes, were such as disobliterated the poet, or were in disgrace with Augustus, or enemies to Mæcenas: and this was the poetical revenge he took. For genus irritabile Vatum, as Horace says. When a poet is thoroughly provoked, he will do himself justice, however dear it cost him, animamque in vulnere ponit. I think these are not bare imaginations of my own, though I find no trace of them in the commentators; but one poet may judge of another, by himself. The vengeance we defer, is not forgotten. I hinted before, that the whole Roman people were obliged by Virgil, in deriving them from Troy: an ancestry which they affected. We, and the French, are of the same humour: they would be thought to descend from a son, I think, of Hector: and we would have our Britain both named and planted by a descendant of Æneas. Spenser favours this opinion what he can. His prince Arthur, or whoever he intends by him, is a Trojan. Thus the hero of Homer was a Grecian, of Virgil a Roman, of Tasso an Italian.

I have transgressed my bounds, and gone farther than the moral leads me. But if your lordship is not tired, I am safe enough.

Thus far, I think, my author is defended. But as Augustus is still shadowed in the person of Æneas, of which I shall say more when I come to the manners which the poet gives his hero, I must prepare that subject, by showing how dextrously he managed both the prince and people, so as to displease neither, and to do good to both: which is the part of a wise and an honest man, and proves, that it is possible for a courtier not to be a knave. I shall continue still to speak my thoughts like a freborn subject, as I am: though such things perhaps, as no Dutch commentator could, and I am sure no Frenchman durst. I have already told your lordship my opinion of Virgil; that he was no arbitrary man: obliged he was to his master for his bounty; and he repays him with good counsel, how to behave himself in his new monarchy, so as to gain the affections of his subjects, and deserve to be called the father of his country. From this consideration it is, that he chose the ground-work of his poem, one empire destroyed, and another raised from the ruins of it. This was the just parallel. Æneas could not pretend to be Priam's heir, in a lineal succession: for Anchises, the hero's father, was only of the second branch of the royal family; and Helenus, a son of Priam, was yet surviving, and might lawfully claim before him. It may be, Virgil mentions him on that account. Neither has he forgotten Priamus, in the fifth of his Æneis, the son of Polites, youngest son to Priam; who was slain by Pyrrhus, in the second book. Æneas had only married Creusa, Priam's daughter, and by her could have no title, while any of the male issue were remaining. In this case, the poet gave him the next title, which is that of an elective king. The remaining Trojans chose him to lead them forth, and settle them in some foreign country. Iliouens, in his speech to Dido, calls him expressly by the name of king. Our poet, who all this while had Augustus in his eye, had no desire he should seem to succeed by any right of inheritance, derived from Julius Cæsar: such a title being but one degree removed from conquest. For what was introduced by force, by force may be removed. It was better for the people that they should give, than he should take. Since that gift was indeed no more at bottom than a trust; Virgil gives us an example of this, in the person of Mezentius. He governed arbitrarily, he was expelled; and came to the deserved end of all tyrants. Our author shows us another sort of kingship, in the person of Latinus: he was descended from Saturn, and; as I remember, in the third degree. He is described a just, and gracious prince; solicitous for the welfare of his people; always consulting with his senate, to promote the common good. We find him at the head of them, when he enters into the council-hall. Speaking first, but still demanding their advice, and steering by it, as far as the iniquity of the times would suffer him. And this is the proper character of a king by inheritance, who is born a father of his country. Æneas, though he married the heiress of the crown, yet claimed no title to it during the life of his father-in-law. Pater arma Latinus habeto, &c. are Virgil's words. As for himself, he was contented to take care of his country-gods, who were not those of Latium: wherein our divine author seems to relate to the after-practice of the Romans, which was to adopt the gods of those they conquered, or received as members of their commonwealth. Yet withal, he plainly touches at the office of the high priesthood, with which Augustus was invested: and which made his person more sacred and inviolable, than even the tribunial power. It was not therefore for nothing, that the most judicious of all poets made that office vacant, by the death of Pantheus, in the second book of the Æneis, for his hero to succeed in it; and consequently for Augustus, to enjoy. I know not that any of the commentators have taken notice of that passage. If they have not, I am sure they ought; and if they have, I am not indebted to them for the observation; the words of Virgil are very plain,

Sacra, suosque tibi commendat Troja Penates.

As for Augustus, or his uncle Julius, claiming by descent from Æneas; that title is already out of doors, Æneas succeeded not, but was elected. Troy was foredoomed to fall for ever.

Postquam res Asia, Priamique evertere regnum
Immeritum visum Superis,— Æneis, lib. iii. l.

Augustus, it is true, had once resolved to rebuild that city, and there to make the seat of empire; but Horace writes an ode on purpose to deter him from that thought: declaring the place to be accursed, and that the gods would as often destroy it, as it should be raised. Hereupon the emperor laid aside a project so ungrateful to the Roman people. But by this, my lord, we may conclude that he had still his pedigree in his head; and had an itch of being thought a divine king, if his poets had not given him better counsel.

I will pass by many less material objections, for want of room to answer them; what follows next is of great importance, if the critics can make out their charge: for it is levelled at the manners which our poet gives his hero, and which are the same which were eminently seen in his Augustus: those manners were, piety to the gods, and a dutiful affection to his father; love to his relations; care of his people; courage and conduct in the wars; gratitude to those who had obliged him, and justice in general to mankind.

Piety, as your lordship sees, takes place of all, as the chief part of his character: and the word in Latin is more full than it can possibly be expressed in any modern language; for there it comprehends not only devotion to the gods; but filial love and tender affection to relations of all sorts. As instances of this, the deities of Troy, and his own penates, are made the companions of his flight: they appear to him in his voyage, and advise him; and at last he replaces them in Italy, their native country. For his father, he takes him on his back; he leads his little son; his wife follows him; but, losing his footsteps through fear or ignorance, he goes back into the midst of his enemies to find her; and leaves not his pursuit till her ghost appears, to forbid his farther search. I will say nothing of his duty to his father while he lived, his sorrow for his death; of the games instituted in honour of his memory; or seeking him, by his command, even after his death, in the Elysian fields. I will not mention his tenderness for his son, which every where is visible: of his raising a tomb for Polydorus, the obsequies for Misenus, his pious remembrance of Delphobus; the funeral of his nurse; his grief for Pallas, and his revenge taken on his murderer, whom otherwise, by his natural compassion, he had forgiven; and then the poem had been left imperfect: for we could have had no certain prospect of his happiness, while the last obstacle to it was unremoved. Of the other parts which compose his character, as a king, or as a general, I need say nothing; the whole Æneis is one continued instance of some one or other of them; and where I find anything of them taxed, it should suffice me, as briefly as I can, to vindicate my divine master to your lordship, and by you to the reader. But herein, Segrain, in his admirable preface to his translation of the Æneis, as the author of the Dauphin's Virgil justly calls it, has prevented me. Him I follow, and what I borrow from him, am ready to acknowledge to him. For, impartially speaking, the French are as much better critics than the English, as they are worse poets. Thus we generally allow, that they better understand the management of a war, than our islanders; but we know we are superiour to them in the day of battle. They value themselves on their generals, we on our soldiers. But this is not the proper place to decide that question, if they make it one. I shall perhaps say as much of other nations, and their poets, excepting only Tasso; and hope to make my assertion good, which is but doing justice to my country; part of which honour will reflect on your lordship, whose thoughts are always just; your numbers harmonious, your words chosen, your expressions strong and manly, your verse flowing, and your turns as happy as they are easy. If you would set us more copies, your example would make all precepts needless. In the mean time, that little you have written is owned, and that particularly by the poets (who are a nation not over lavish of praise to their contemporaries), as a principal ornament of our language: but the sweetest essences are always confined in the smallest glasses.

When I speak of your lordship, it is never a digression, and therefore I need beg no pardon for it; but take up Segrain where I left him, and shall use him less often than I have occasion for him. For his preface is a perfect piece of criticism, full and clear, and digested into an exact method; mine is loose, and, as I intended it, epistolary. Yet I dwell on many things which he durst not touch: for it is dangerous to offend an arbitrary master; and every patron who has the power of Augustus, has not his clemency. In short, my lord, I would not translate him, because I would bring you somewhat of my own. His notes and observations on every book are of the same excellency; and, for the same reason, I omit the greater part.

He takes no notice that Virgil is arraigned for placing piety before valour; and making that piety the chief character of his hero. I have already said, from Bossu, that a poet is not obliged to make his hero a virtuous man: therefore neither Homer nor Tasso are to be blamed, for giving what predominant quality they pleased to their first character. But Virgil, who designed to form a perfect prince, and would insinuate that Augustus, whom he calls Æneas in his poem, was truly such, found himself obliged to make him without blemish; thoroughly virtuous: and a thorough virtue both begins and ends in piety. Tasso, without question, observed this before me; and therefore split his hero in two: he gave Godfrey piety, and Rinaldo fortitude, for their chief qualities or manners. Homer, who had chosen another moral, makes both Agamemnon and Achilles vicious; for his design was, to instruct in virtue, by showing the deformity of vice. I avoid repetition of what I have said above. What follows is translated literally from Segrais.

Virgil had considered, that the greatest virtues of Augustus consisted in the perfect art of governing his people: which caused him to reign above forty years in great felicity. He considered that his emperor was valiant, civil, popular, eloquent, politic, and religious: he has given all these qualities to Æneas. But, knowing that piety alone comprehends the whole duty of man towards the gods, towards his country, and towards his relations, he judged that this ought to be his first character, whom he would set for a pattern of perfection. In reality, they who believe that the praises which arise from valour, are superior to those which proceed from any other virtues, have not considered (as they ought) that valour, destitute of other virtues, cannot render a man worthy of any true esteem. That quality, which signifies no more than an intrepid courage, may be separated from many others which are good, and accompanied with many which are ill. A man may be very valiant, and yet impious and vicious. But the same cannot be said of piety, which excludes all ill qualities, and comprehends even valour itself, with all other qualities which are good. Can we, for example, give the praise of valour to a man who should see his gods profaned, and should want the courage to defend them? to a man who should abandon his father, or desert his king in his last necessity?

Thus far Segrais, in giving the preference to piety, before valour. I will now follow him where he considers this valour, or intrepid courage, singly in itself; and this also Virgil gives to his Æneas, and that in an heroic degree.

Having first concluded that our poet did for the best in taking the first character of his hero from that essential virtue on which the rest depend, he proceeds to tell us, that in the ten years' war of Troy, he was considered as the second champion of his country; allowing Hector the first place; and this, even by the confession of Homer, who took all occasions of setting up his own countrymen the Grecians, and of undervaluing the Trojan chiefs. But Virgil (whom Segrais forgot to cite) makes Diomedes give him a higher character for strength and courage. His testimony is this, in the eleventh book:

—Stetimus tela aspera contra,
 Contulimusque manus: experto credite, quantus
 In clypeum assurgat, quo turbine torquet hastam.
 Si duo præterea tales Idæa tulisset
 Terra viros; ultro Inachias venisset ad urbes
 Dardanus, & versis lugere Græcia fatis.
 Quicquid apud duræ cessatum est moenia Trojæ,
 Hectoris, Æneæque manu victoria Graiùm
 Hæsit, & in decimum vestigia retulit annum.
 Ambo animis, ambo insignes præstantibus armis:
 Hic pietate prior.—

I give not here my translation of these verses; though I think I have not ill succeeded in them: because your lordship is so great a master of the original, that I have no reason to desire that you should see Virgil and me so near together. But you may please, my lord, to take notice, that the Latin author refines upon the Greek, and insinuates that Homer has done his hero wrong, in giving the advantage of the duel to his own countryman; though Diomedes was manifestly the second champion of the Grecians; and Ulysses preferred him before Ajax, when he chose him for the champion of his nightly expedition; for he had a head-piece of his own; and wanted only the fortitude of another, to bring him off with safety; and that he might compass his design with honour.

The French translator thus proceeds: they who accuse Æneas for want of courage, either understand not Virgil, or have read him slightly; otherwise they would not raise an objection so easy to be answered. Hereupon he gives so many instances of the hero's valour, that to repeat them after him would tire your lordship, and put me to the unnecessary trouble of transcribing the greatest part of the three last Æneids. In short, more

Should not be expected from an Amadis, a sir Lancelot, or a whole round table, than he performs. Prælia quæque metit gladio, is the perfect account of a knight errant. If it be replied, continued Segrais, that it was not difficult for him to undertake and achieve such hardy enterprises, because he wore enchanted arms; that acoutation, in the first place, must fall on Homer ere it can reach Virgil. Achilles was as well provided with them as Æneas, though he was invulnerable without them: and Ariosto, the two Tamoa, Bernardo, and Torquato, even our own Spenser; in a word, all modern poets have copied Homer, as well as Virgil; he is neither the first nor last, but in the midst of them; and therefore is safe, if they are so. Who knows, says Segrais, but that his fated armour was only an allegorical defence, and signified no more than that he was under the peculiar protection of the gods? born, as the astrologers will tell us, out of Virgil (who was well versed in the Chaldean mysteries), under the favourable influence of Jupiter, Venus, and the Sun. But I insist not on this, because I know you believe not there is such an art; though not only Horace and Persius, but Augustus himself thought otherwise. But, in defence of Virgil, I dare positively say, that he has been more cautious in this particular, than either his predecessor or his descendants. For Æneas was actually wounded, in the twelfth of the Æneis; though he had the same god-smith to forge his arms, as had Achilles. It seems he was no war-luck, as the Scots commonly call such men, who, they say, are iron-free, or lead-free. Yet after this experiment, that his arms were not impenetrable, when he was cured indeed by his mother's help: because he was that day to conclude the war by the death of Turnus, the poet durst not carry the miracle too far, and restore him wholly to his former vigour: he was still too weak to overtake his enemy; yet we see with what courage he attacks Turnus, when he faces and renews the combat. I need say no more: for Virgil defends himself without needing my assistance; and proves his hero truly to deserve that name. He was not then a second-rate champion, as they would have him, who think fortitude the first virtue in a hero. But being beaten from this hold, they will not yet allow him to be valiant: because he wept more often, as they they think, than well becomes a man of courage.

In the first place, if tears are arguments of cowardice, what shall I say of Homer's hero? Shall Achilles pass for timorous, because he wept, and wept on less occasions than Æneas? Herein Virgil must be granted to have excelled his master: For once both heroes are described, lamenting their lost loves: Brieteis was taken away by force from the Grecian; Cressa was lost for ever to her husband. But Achilles went roaring along the salt-sea shore; and, like a booby, was complaining to his mother, when he should have revenged his injury by his arms. Æneas took a nobler course; for, having secured his father and son, he repeated all his former dangers to have found his wife, if she had been above ground. And here your hardness may observe the address of Virgil; it was not for nothing that this passage was related with all these tender circumstances. Æneas told it; Dido heard it. That he had been so affectionate a husband, was no ill argument to the coming dowager, that he might prove as kind to her. Virgil has a thousand secret beauties, though I have not leisure to remark them.

Segrais, on this subject of a hero shedding tears, observes, that historians commend Alexander for weeping, when he read the mighty actions of Achilles. And Julius Cæsar is likewise praised, when, out of the same noble envy, he wept at the victories of Alexander. But, if we observe more closely, we shall find, that the tears of Æneas were always on a laudable occasion. Thus he weeps out of compassion, and tenderness of nature, when in the temple of Carthage he beholds the pictures of his friends, who sacrificed their lives in defence of their country. He deplores the lamentable end of his pilot Palinurus; the untimely death of young Pallas his confederate; and the rest, which I omit. Yet even for these tears, his wretched critics dare condemn him. They make Æneas little better than a kind of St. Swithin-hero, always raining. One of these censors is bold enough to arraign him of cowardice: when, in the beginning of the first book, he not only weeps, but trembles at an approaching storm.

*Extemplo Æneæ solvuntur frigore membra :
Ingenit, & duplices tendens ad sidera palmas, &c.*

But to this I have answered formerly; that his fear was not for himself, but for his people. And what can give a sovereign a better commendation, or recommend a hero more to the affection of the reader? They were threatened with a tempest, and he wept; he was promised Italy, and therefore he prayed for the accomplishment of that promise. All this in the beginning of a storm; therefore he showed the more early piety, and the quicker sense of compassion. Thus much

I have urged elsewhere in the defence of Virgil; and since I have been informed, by Mr. Moyle, a young gentleman whom I can never sufficiently commend, that the ancients accounted drowning an accursed death. So that, if we grant him to have been afraid, he had just occasion for that fear, both in relation to himself and to his subjects. I think our adversaries can carry this argument no farther, unless they tell us that he ought to have had more confidence in the promise of the gods: but how was he assured that he had understood their oracles aright? Heleneus might be mistaken, Phoebus might speak doubtfully; even his mother might flatter him, that he might prosecute his voyage, which, if it succeeded happily, he should be the founder of an empire. For that she herself was doubtful of his fortune, is apparent by the address she made to Jupiter on his behalf. To which the god makes answer in these words:

*Parce metu, Cytheræ; manent immota tuorum
Fata tibi, &c.*

Notwithstanding which, the goddess, though comforted, was not assured: for even after this, through the course of the whole Æneis, she still apprehends the interest which Juno might make with Jupiter against her son. For it was a moot point in Heaven whether he could alter fate, or not. And indeed, some passages in Virgil would make us suspect that he was of opinion Jupiter might defer fate, though he could not alter it. For, in the latter end of the tenth book, he introduces Juno begging for the life of Turnus, and flattering her husband with the power of changing destiny. Tua qua potes, orsa reflectas. To which he graciously answers:

*Si mora præsentis lethi tempusque caduco
Oratur juveni, meque hoc ita ponere sentis;
Tolle fugâ Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fati.
Hactenus indulstæ vacat. Sin altior istis
Sub precibus venia ulla latet, totumque moveri
Mutarive putas bellum, spes pascis inanes.*

But that he could not alter those decrees, the king of gods himself confesses, in the book above cited: when he comforts Hercules, for the death of Pallas, who had invoked his aid before he threw his lance at Turnus:

*—Trojæ sub mœnibus altis,
Tot nati cecidere Deum quin occidit unâ
Sarpedon mea progenies: etiam sua Turnum
Fata manent, metasque dati pervenit ad ævi.*

Where he plainly acknowledges, that he could not save his own son, or prevent the death which he foresaw. Of his power to defer the blow, I once occasionally discoursed with that excellent person sir Robert Howard: who is better conversant, than any man that I knew, in the doctrine of the Stoics, and he set me right, from the concurrent testimony of philosophers and poets, that Jupiter could not retard the effects of fate, even for a moment. For when I cited Virgil, as favouring the contrary opinion in that verse,

Tolle fugâ Turnum, atque instantibus eripe fati,

he replied, and I think with exact judgment, that when Jupiter gave Juno leave to withdraw Turnus from the present danger, it was because he certainly foreknew that his fatal hour was not come: that it was in destiny for Juno at that time to save him; and that himself obeyed destiny, in giving her that leave.

I need say no more in justification of our hero's courage, and am much deceived if he ever be attacked on this side of his character again. But he is arraigned with more show of reason by the ladies: who will make a numerous party against him, for being false to love, in forsaking Dido. And I cannot much blame them; for, to say the truth, it is an ill precedent for their gallants to follow. Yet, if I can bring him off with flying colours, they may learn experience at her cost; and, for her sake, avoid a cave, as the worst shelter they can choose from a shower of rain, especially when they have a lover in their company.

In the first place, Segrais observes, with much acuteness, that they who blame Æneas for his insensibility of love, when he left Carthage, contradict their former accusation of him, for being always crying, compassionate, and effeminately sensible of those misfortunes which befel others. They give him two contrary characters; but Virgil makes him of a piece, always grateful, always tender-hearted. But they are impudent enough to discharge themselves of this blunder, by laying the contradiction at Virgil's door. He, say they, has shown his hero with these inconsistent characters: acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted; but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested. For Dido had not only received his weather-beaten troops before she saw him, and given them her protection, but had also offered them an equal share in her dominion.

*Vultis & his mecum pariter considerare regni?
Urbem quam statuo, vestra est.*

This was an obligation never to be forgotten; and the more to be considered, because antecedent to her love. That passion, it is true, produced the usual effects of generosity, gallantry, and care to please; and thither we refer them. But when she had made all these advances, it was still in his power to have refused them: after the intrigue of the cave, call it marriage, or enjoyment only, he was no longer free to take or leave, he had accepted the favour; and was obliged to be constant, if he would be grateful.

My lord, I have set this argument in the best light I can, that the ladies may not think I write booty: and perhaps it may happen to me, as it did to Dr. Cudworth, who has raised such strong objections against the being of a God and Providence, that many think he has not answered them. You may please at least to hear the adverse party. Segrais pleads for Virgil, that no less than an absolute command from Jupiter could excuse this insensibility of the hero, and this abrupt departure, which looks so like extreme ingratitude. But, at the same time, he does wisely to remember you, that Virgil had made piety the first character of Æneas: and this being allowed, as I am afraid it must, he was obliged, antecedent to all other considerations, to search an asylum for his gods in Italy, for those very gods, I say, who had promised to his race the universal empire. Could a pious man dispense with the commands of Jupiter, to satisfy his passion; or, take it in the strongest sense, to comply with the obligations of his gratitude? Religion, it is true, must have moral honesty for its ground-work, or we shall be apt to suspect its truth; but an immediate revelation dispenses with all duties of morality. All casuists agree, that theft is a breach of the moral law: yet, if I might presume to mingle things sacred with profane, the Israelites only spoiled the Egyptians, not robbed them; because the property was transferred by a revelation to their lawgiver. I confess, Dido was a very infidel in this point; for she would not believe, as Virgil makes her say, that ever Jupiter would send Mercury on such an immoral errand. But this needs no answer, at least no more than Virgil gives it:

Fata obstant, placidasque viri Deus obstruit aures.

This notwithstanding, as Segrais confesses, he might have shown a little more sensibility, when he left her; for that had been according to his character.

But let Virgil answer for himself. He still loved her, and struggled with his inclinations to obey the gods:

*Curam sub corde premebat,
Multa gemens, magnoque animum labefactus
amora.*

Upon the whole matter, and humanely speaking, I doubt there was a fault somewhere; and Jupiter is better able to bear the blame than either Virgil or Æneas. The poet, it seems, had found it out, and therefore brings the deserting hero and the forsaken lady to meet together in the lower regions: where he excuses himself when it is too late, and accordingly she will take no satisfaction, nor so much as hear him. Now Segrais is forced to abandon his defence, and excuses his author, by saying that the Æneis is an imperfect work, and that death prevented the divine poet from reviewing it, and for that reason he had condemned it to the fire: though, at the same time, his two translators must acknowledge, that the sixth book is the most correct of the whole Æneis. Oh, how convenient is a machine sometimes in an heroic poem! This of Mercury is plainly one, and Virgil was constrained to use it here, or the honesty of his hero would be ill defended. And the fair sex, however, if they had the deserter in their power, would certainly have shown him no more mercy than the Bacchanals did Orpheus. For if too much constancy may be a fault sometimes; then want of constancy, and ingratitude, after the last favour, is a crime that never will be forgiven. But of machines, more in their proper place; where I shall show, with how much judgment they have been used by Virgil: and, in the mean time, pass to another article of his defence, on the present subject; where, if I cannot clear the hero, I hope at least to bring off the poet; for here I must divide their causes. Let Æneas trust to his machine, which will only help to break his fall, but the address is incomparable. Plato, who borrowed so much from Homer, and yet concluded for the banishment of all poets, would at least have rewarded Virgil, before he sent him into exile. But I go farther, and say, that he ought to be acquitted; and deserved, beside, the bounty of Augustus, and the gratitude of the Roman people. If, after this, the ladies will stand out, let them remember, that the jury is not all agreed; for Octavia was of his party, and was of the first quality in Rome: she was also present at the reading of the sixth Æneid, and we know not that she condemned Æneas; but we are sure she presented the poet, for his admirable elegy on her son Marcellus.
