Thence to his wife a trusty mesial sent,
Instructed well to act his dire intent.

He bade him to the village seats repair,
And to Argia's ear this message bear; 900

That, by a fever's rage each vital power
Opprest, he fears she ne'er will see him more:
Hence (if the thoughts of love or duty sway)

She with the faithful guide would bend her way
To where in sickness on his bed he lay.

As thus deceiv'd he knew his wretched wife
Would deem no snare conceal'd against her life,

He charg'd the guide in some sequester'd place
To expiate with her blood his past disgrace.

Prepar'd to act his patron's dire intent, 910
The trusty envoy to his mistress went:

Her faithful dog the fair Argia took,
Her palfrey mounted, and her home forsook.

The dog had warn'd her of some evil near,
Yet bade her go, and go secure from fear,

Since he, her guard, with well experienc'd power,
Would yield assistance in the dangerous hour.

“They journey'd till they reach'd a crystal flood
From towering Apennine, where near it stood

A gloomy forest, black with tufted shade, 920
And here her guide, who, with design, had stay'd,

From towns and cities far, with look mysterious
stay'd.

This place he deem'd well suited to fulfil
The cruel purpose of his master's will.

His sword he drew, and to the dame declar'd
The judge's mandate, and the death prepar'd;

But pitying, warn'd her, ere the deadly stroke,
Offend'd Heaven for mercy to invoke.

“What secret magic could his aim deceive!
For when he rais'd his weapon to bereave 930

The dame of life, she vanish'd from his eyes,
And left him pale and speechless with surpris.

Around he sought her long, but sought in vain;
Then, baffled, to his patron turn'd again;

And told, but told with scarce recover'd breath,
Some miracle had sav'd his wife from death.

Full little thought the judge that, near her side,
The fairy Manto every need supply'd.

The beldame-crone that all the rest reveal'd
(I know not why) had this alone conceal'd. 940

What shall he do? His honour unredrest,
He still must groan, with load on load opprest:

Her fault to few disclos'd, he fears that fame
Will now divulge, and wider spread his shame:
One chance might rest conceal'd; but this made known,

From tongue to tongue would through the world be blown:

He deems, that since the servant's lips disclos'd
His vengeful thoughts against her life dispos'd,
She ever from her dreaded home to fly,

Would to some lover, in her fears, apply. 950
Of power to hold her from a husband's claim,

And in derision bear his injur'd name;
Perchance, with deeper guilt than lawless love,

His wife's adulterer and his ruffian prove,
Hence in her search, such evil to prevent,

Letters and messages around he sent,
To every town in Lombardy's extent.

Himself in person tidings strove to gain;
But every message, every search was vain.

At length the slave he call'd; the slave, whose hand
Was charg'd to execute his dire command, 961

And bade him thither lead, where late, he said,
Argia from his eyes so strangely fled;

Who, hid in brakes, by day had mock'd his sight,
And found, perchance, some sheltering roof at night.

The slave his patron led, where, midst the wood,
Once dark with shades, a stately structure stood:

The fair Argia, with her guardian's aid,
This wondrous palace by enchantment made

Of slabs of marble, beautiful to behold; 970
Within, without, the building flam'd with gold.

No fancy can conceive, no tongue declare,
Within how wealthy, and without how fair.

The dome thou saw'st but yesternight, compar'd
With this a cottage, scarcely claims regard.

Here richest silks, and hangings from the loom
Of brightest work, adorn'd each lofty room:

A thousand charms the dazzled senses strike. 979

Here vessels, wrought of gold and silver, flam'd;
There concave gems, red, green, and azure, fram'd

In plates or vases, crown'd the festive board;
And warblers shone with vests embroider'd stor'd.

“The judge arriving (as the verse has told)
With wonder gaz'd the building to behold,

When here he thought nor hut nor cottage stood,
But dreary wilds, lone paths, and tangled wood.

He gaz'd, and paus'd, and scarce his sight believ'd,
In doubt some dream his wandering sense deceiv'd.

“A female Æthiop²² at the gate was seen, 990
Of feature so deform'd, so loath'd a mien,

Of feature so deform'd, so loath'd a mien,

²² A liberty is here taken with the original, in varying the circumstance of the story, too gross to admit of the most distant allusion. We have before seen from Ruscelli, that Ariosto had expunged two stanzas from the xxvth book as too licentious; and the same Ruscelli further informs us, that Ariosto, in his own printed copy, had particularly marked this passage, undoubtedly with design to change the offensive circumstance; and observes, that it was exceedingly to be wished, that the poet had removed this blemish from so glorious a poem. The translator had given this part of the story another turn before he met with this passage of Ruscelli, and is happy to adduce such authority for the alterations he has made, as he may seem thus but to conform to the last intention of the poet himself, had he lived to give the world an-

That ne'er before, nor since, the world around
 Could such a foul misshapen wretch be found.
 Thick were her lips, and huge her pimpled nose;
 Her humpen back above her shoulders rose;
 She seem'd a beggar of the lowest tribe:
 No words can half her filth obscene describe;
 But such a hag to Paradise convey'd,
 Had wither'd by her looks the blissful shade.
 Anselmo wish'd to learn what prince or peer 1000
 Might there reside: the hag alone was near:
 'To her be then with courteous words apply'd:
 'This house is mine'—the filthy Ethiop cried,
 The judge believ'd she spoke in jesting vein:
 But she, with many an oath, affirm'd again
 The house was hers—inviting him at will
 The gate to enter, and behold his fill,
 And freely, for himself or friends, to bear
 From thence what'er he valu'd rich or rare.

"Anselmo to a menial gave in haste 1010
 His scud to hold, and o'er the threshold pass'd;
 Through chambers, halls, his sordid guide pursu'd,
 And every part with equal wonder view'd;
 The foin, the site, the ornaments that grace
 Each hall, each roof; the riches of the place.
 'Not all beneath the Sun,' full oft he cries,
 'To purchase such a palace can suffice.'
 To him in few the brutal hag rejoind'
 'And yet this palace has its price assign'd,
 Though silver nought we prize nor glittering gold,
 Yet will it at an easier rate be sold.' 1021

She said; and made the judge the same request,
 Which to his wife Adonio once address'd,
 Her beastly love the judge indignant spurn'd,
 And from the filthy hag resentful turn'd;
 But thrice repuls'd, still more the bedame woo'd,
 And with such soothing art her suit pursu'd,
 Her palace offering for the beastly hire,
 At length she bent him to her foul desire.

"His wife Argis, in the dome conceal'd, 1050
 Who him so taken in her fault beheld,
 Leapt sudden forth, and thus aloud exclaim'd:
 'Is this the reverend judge for wisdom faur'd?
 That thus his learned function can debase
 With such a hag, the scum of human race!'

"Think how the doctor look'd, think how he stood Abash'd and mute; how flush'd his cheek with blood;
 How oft he wish'd that Earth would open wide,
 And his transgression in the centre hide!
 The wife, who from herself would turn the blame
 By heep'd reproaches on Anselmo's shame, 1041
 Pursu'd—'What punishment should'st thou receive,

Who me, relentless, would'st of life bereave,
 For yielding to a lover's soft assault,
 When Love and Nature might excuse the fault?
 A youth, accomplish'd in his form and mind,
 A gift that leaves this palace far behind!
 If death I seem'd to merit at thy hands,
 Know that thy crime a hundred deaths demands.
 But though I here maintain the sovereign will, 1050
 Sole mistress of thy fate—to save, or kill—
 Yet shall I now no further vengeance take
 For thy transgression, but this league to make:

other edition of his Orlando. Is it not some kind of reproach on the Italian editors, that in the editions subsequent to 1533, the objectionable parts pointed out by Ariosto had not been expunged?

Lay by the husband—henceforth let us live
 In lasting peace, and all the past forgive;
 In word or deed I ne'er will more repine
 At thy offence, nor shalt thou censure mine.

"Thus she: the husband well approves the terms;
 He seals her pardon, and the peace confirms:
 With mutual confidence they homeward steer,
 And ever after hold each other dear." 1062

The pilot thus; and with his tale bequill'd
 The tedious hour, while good Rinaldo smil'd
 To hear the chance, yet pity'd much the shame
 So deeply planted on the doctor's name.
 He praise'd Argis much, whose wit had set,
 For such a bird, her well-invented net; Caught in that snare, in which (though truth to tell

With less reproach) herself so lately fell.
 When now the Sun from high his beams had shed,
 The Paladin commands the board to spread, 1070
 For which the Biscayan's hospitable care
 Supply'd exhaustless store of costly fare.
 Now to the left they leave a fertile land,
 Vast fens extending on their better hand:
 Argenta²³ now appears, and now it flies;
 And now the castle where Santerno lies.

As yet beside the stream no Bastia²⁴ stands,
 Where since, with little boast, the Spanish bands
 Their standards bring: but where the Italian train
 Attempt, with greater loss, the fort to gain. 1081
 Thence, with full speed, the sinewy rowers force
 The flying bark along the river's course:
 Till by a stagnant pool they bend their way,
 And reach Ravenna's towers at noon of day.

Though good Rinaldo oft was little stor'd
 With ready coin, at least he can afford
 So much at parting thence his thanks to show,
 And on the crew some light reward bestow.

Then, changing steeds, his journey he pursu'd,
 And Rimini, at close of evening, view'd; 1090
 Nor would at Montefort till morning wait,
 But reach'd, with rising Sol, Urbino's gate.
 No Guido²⁵ then, no Federico²⁶ there
 Resided; no Elisabetta²⁷ fair;
 Nor Leonora²⁸, nor Francesco nam'd
 In later times; for these a knight so fam'd
 With courteous welcome had awhile constrain'd
 To rest with honour in their seats detain'd;
 Such courteous welcome as they since have paid
 To every noble knight or virtuous maid. 1101
 Since none appear'd his courser's reins to take²⁹,
 Rinaldo hasten'd Cagli³⁰ to forsake;

²³ Argenta, a castle eighteen miles from Ferrara.

²⁴ Bastia, where the Spaniards suffered such a defeat from Alphonso. See Book xlii. Note to ver. i. &c.

²⁵ Federico di Montefeltro, a man beloved by all for his many virtues: of him and his wife Baptista was born a son, called Guidobaldo (or Guido) heir to his father's virtues. After his death
 Francesco Maria delle Rovere was created duke of Urbino, and married Leonora, daughter of Gonzaga. Elisabetta was wife of Guidobaldo. All these persons appear to have lived in the time of Ariosto, and to have resided at Ferrara.

²⁶ To stop him with a friendly welcome, he entertain him hospitably.

²⁷ Cagli was long in possession of the dukes of Urbino.

And to the mountain thence impatient sped,
Their streams where Gauno²⁵ and Meteorus²⁶ led.
The Apennines he pass'd: and now so move
Behold it on the right; then journey'd o'er
The Ombrian and Etruscan realms, then view'd
Imperial Rome; to Ostia then pass'd
His rapid way; and next by sea he gains 1110
An ancient town, where now in hallow'd plains
Anchises' pious son interr'd his sire's remains.

His vessel here he chang'd, and to the shore
Of Epidaurus' isle his voyage bore;
That isle the champions for their list design'd,
That isle, where since the six in battle join'd,
Rinaldo urg'd the jolly sailor train,
With oars and sail, to cleave the briny main.
At speed they fly; but adverse winds detain'd
His tardy vessel from the wish'd-for land. 1120
He came, but came what time Anglaterra's knight
Had reap'd the laurels of the glorious fight;
King Agrimaat and king Gradasso kill'd:
Yet had the conquest of the sanguine field;
Great Menodante's son was now no more;
And pale in anguish on the sea-beat shore
Lay Olivera, feeble with his pain,

Whose foot no longer would his bulk sustain.
The noble earl could not his tears withhold,
When good Rinaldo he embrac'd, and told 1130
The death of Brandimart, their friend belov'd,
In every chance of arms and friendship prov'd.
Not less Rinaldo, when the knight he view'd
With helmet cleft, his mournful cheeks bedew'd.
Then Olivero in his arms he press'd,
And with consoling words each chief address'd,
While each himself repin'd, that late he came,
Too late to share their dangers and their fame.

Now to the town destroy'd the menial train
Of Agrimaat and stern Gradasso slain, 1140
Each breathless corpse with dutious care convey'd,
And in the ruins of Biserta laid.

Meanwhile the conquest by Orlando won,
To Senecetto and Astolpho known,
Great joy in each man's'd, though damp'd to hear
The mournful end of one they held so dear:
The death of Brandimart each heart depress'd,
Each face the signs of deep-felt grief confess'd.
Ah! which of these who lov'd his friend so well,
To Floridella the killing news shall tell? 1150

As Floridella at night in slumber lay,
The night preceding that unhappy day,
She dreamt the mantle which her pious care
Had fashion'd for her Brandimart to wear,
His ornament in fight, now, strange to view,
Was sprinkled o'er with drops of sanguine hue:
She thought her erting hand the vest had stain'd,
And thus in slumber to herself complain'd:
"Did not my lord command these bands to make
His vest, his mantle, all of mournful black? 1160
Why have I then against his bidding spread
The sable ground with fearful spots of red?"
All others thence she drew.—Th' ensuing night
Arriv'd the tidings of the glorious fight;
Astolpho yet conceal'd, with tender fear,
A truth too dreadful for a wife to hear:
Till now, with Senecetto join'd, he came
(A mournful pair) before the lodging dame.

²⁵ Gauno, a small river, that has now probably lost its name.—Meteorus, a river famous for the death of Andral.

Soon as she view'd the face of either chief,
In such a conquest clouded o'er with grief, 1170
No more was peaceful—her distracted thought
Too well divin'd the fatal news they brought:
Chill grew her heart, and sickening at the sight,
Her closing eyes were cover'd o'er with night:
Senseless and pallid, stretch'd on earth she lay,
And look'd a wretched corpse of lifeless clay.
Her sense returning, frantic with despair,
She call'd her much-lov'd lord—she rent her hair—
She braid'd with cruel bands her groning breast,
She rav'd as if some fiend her soul possess'd. 1180
So seem'd the Menader²⁷, when wide were borne
Their shouts and clamours with the maddening bore.

From this, from that, she begg'd some sword or dart,
Some weapon's point to pierce her to the heart.
Now would she seek the ship that to the shore
The corpse of either Pagan monarch bore,
On their remains with momentary rage
To glut her vengeance and her grief average:
Now would she pass the seas, to seek where died
Her better half, and perish by his side. 1190
"Why did I leave thee, O my Brandimart?"
On such a day without me to depart!
I saw thee go—I faint'd at the view—
Why did not Floridella her lord pursue?
Had I been present in the hour of fight,
My eyes had watch'd thee with a lover's sight;
When fell Gradasso²⁸ rais'd behind his blade,
My single cry had given thee saving aid.
My speed perhaps had rush'd between, and found
The happy time to take thy threaten'd wound:
My beard, for this, had met the Pagan sword,
A worthless ransom for my bosom's lord! 1200
Yet will I die—though now my purring breath
Avails not thee, nor profits aught my death.
But had I died for thee—what heavenly power
To better use could bless my dying hour?
Had cruel fate, or Heaven averse withhold
My pious aid to save thy dearest blood,
At least I had obtain'd the mournful bliss,
To bathe with tears, to press with many a kiss
Thy ashy cheek, and ere with sons of light 1210
Thy soul had to her Maker wing'd its flight,
I might have said—"To heavenly peace ascend;
Thy flight ere long shall Floridella attend!"

²⁹ The Italian commentators have candidly observed, that it does not appear how Floridella came to the knowledge of the exact manner of Brandimart's death.

Thus crast thou, Brandimart, thy consort leave,
And is it thus thy sceptre I receive!
With thee at Damogira²⁸ thus I meet!
And thus thou shar'st with me thy regal seat!
How, ruthless Fortune! hast thou clouded o'er
My future prospects—hope is now no more! 1220
Since I have lost this good, all comfort dies!
And not another wish the world supplies!²⁹

In words like these the fair afflicted mourns,
And now again her frantic rage returns;
Again with cruel hand her cheeks she tears,
Beats her white breast, and rends her scatter'd hairs.

But leave the dame awhile to plaints and tears,
And let us seek Orlando and his peers.

Orlando wishes, for his kinsman's weal,
To find some leech his dreadful hurt to heal;
And on his breathless Brandimart bestow 1231
Such honour'd rites as friends to friendship owe.
The mountain now he sought³⁰, whose flaming ray
Dispel's the night, whose smoke obscures the day:
Propitious blew the wind, and, to the right,
Not distant far, the island rose in sight.
Soon as the Sun declin'd to evening shade,
The busy mariners their anchors weigh'd,
While from her horns, to light their watery road,
The silent goddess trembled on the flood. 1240
By dawn of day they trod the destin'd shore,
And thence their course to Agrigento³¹ bore;
And here Orlando on th' ensuing night
Hade all prepare to grace the funeral rite.

The pomp dispos'd, when now the Sun had left
The falling sky, and Earth of light bereft,
Amidst the peers, that, call'd by flying fame,
From distant towns to Agrigento³² came:
Amidst bright torches kindling all the strand:
Amidst loud cries and groans on every hand, 1250
Orlando to the breathless body turn'd
Of him so lov'd in life, in death so mourn'd.
Beside there, with years and sorrow bow'd,
Beside the sable bier lamented loud:
His eyes, that in the ship had pour'd a tide
Of briny tears, their fountains still supply'd.
He rav'd at Heaven, his cruel stars deplo'r'd,
And, like a lion pin'd in sickness, roar'd:
With frantic, trembling, wither'd hands he tore
His wrinkled flesh, and rent his tresses hoar. 1260
Soon as the crowds the earl approaching view'd,
Each with shrill sound his plaints and cries renew'd.
Orlando near the corse, with sad survey
Awhile in silence gaz'd, as prone it lay,
Pale as Acanthus, or some fading flower,
Untimely cropt at morn or evening hour:
Deeply he sigh'd, and bending still a look,
Fix'd on his lif'less friend, at length he spoke³³.

"O my brave friend! companion of my love!
Who, dying here, art liv'st in bliss above? 1270

²⁸ The capital of the kingdom of Monadant, mentioned by Boyardo.

³⁰ The capital of Sicily.

³¹ Tasso has followed this beautiful passage, which Ariosto had first drawn from Virgil, at the death of Pallas. The speech of Godfrey over the dead body of Dudo, nearly resembles this of Orlando; but the description of the funeral is more solemn in the Furioso than in the Jerusalem.

VOL. XLII.

A happy life thou gain'st, so more to know
The toils and changes of our world below.
Forgive me now th' involuntary tear,
That mourns I still am doom'd to linger here:
I weep not thou art fled from Earth's annoy,
But weep I cannot live with thee in joy.
Here art I left—thou taken from my sight,
What is there more t' afford my soul delight?
Distress and toil with thee inur'd to bear,
Why should I not thy peace and triumph share?
Great is my guilt, still clos'd in mortal clay, 1281
Forbid to follow on thy glorious way.
If I with thee could every loss sustain,
Why am I not a partner in thy gain?
Alone thou gain'st, and I alone have lost;
Thou blest in Heaven,—I here in trouble tost!
France, Germany, and Italy shall know
Thy death too surely, and partake my woe.
How will my kinsman³⁴, and my lord lament!
How will the Paladins their sorrows vent! 1290
How will our church and empire rue the day
That snatch'd, in thee, their best defence away!
How shall thy death the Pagan world relieve!
What strength and courage will the fues receive!
What must thy consort feel?—I see her eyes
All drown'd in tears! I hear her piercing cries!
Me she accuses, and must ever hate,
To think through me her lord has met his fate!
Yet, Floridella! one comfort shall remain
Amidst the anguish which his friends sustain, 1300
That every knight, who risks for fame his breath,
May envy Brandimart his glorious death.
Not he in Rome's dire gulf³⁵ absorb'd and lost,
The Decii³⁶ fam'd, or Codrus³⁷, Argos' boast!
Could nobler fall, and in their fall bestow
More than his country to thy lord shall owe."³⁸

Thus spoke Orlando o'er the warrior dead;
And now the priests their long procession led.
Black, white, and gray; while all the hallow'd
train,
In order rang'd, pac'd slowly o'er the plain, 1310
Imploring God, among the spirits blest,
To take the champion's soul to endless rest.
Innumerable torches pierc'd the veil of night,
And seem'd to emulate departed light.
The corse is rais'd; and thence the weight to bear,
Peers, nobles, knights, the honour'd contest share:
A pall of purple o'er the bier was spread,
Where gold and jewels mingled splendour shed:

³⁴ Charles.

³⁵ Marcus Curtius, a noble Roman, who is said to have devoted himself to death. In the middle of the Roman forum suddenly appeared an immense opening in the earth, which the people in vain endeavouring to fill up, at length had recourse to the oracle, and received for answer, that the gulf could only be closed by that in which consisted the strength of Rome. On this, Marcus Curtius, as if to show that arms and virtue were the true support of the city, put on his armour, and, mounting his horse, leapt headlong into the gulf; which immediately closed upon him.

³⁶ The two Decii, father and son, who devoted themselves to death for their country. Codrus, king of Athens, devoted himself in the same manner to death, the oracle having declared that Athens would be victorious if their king fell by the hands of the enemy.

Nor less the couch and pillow above, embost
With sparkling gems, and wrought with art and cost: 1320

Here stretch'd at length the lifeless knight was laid
In purple vests, of richest work, array'd.

Three hundred first selected through the land,
Of humble order, led the solemn band,
All cloth'd alike in vestments long, that clung
Around their limbs, and to their ankles hung.
A hundred pages next, and each a steed
Of mighty size bestrode, and warlike breed:

The steed and page alike in sable veil'd,
Along the ground their mourning vesture trail'd.
Before, behind, unnumber'd banners rais'd 1331

With various ensigns and devices blaz'd
Around the horse—the trophies of his might
From conquer'd legions won in dangerous fight:

All gain'd to Cæsar's and to Peter's power²²
By force that, now extinct, shall gain no more.
Then many a shield from many a warrior turn,
With proud impresses by their masters worn,

Two hundred then pursu'd, in ranks ordain'd
To swell the pomp: each better hand sustain'd
A kindled torch, and, like the rest, conceal'd 1341

In mournful black, nor mien nor face reveal'd,
Orlando follow'd next, with stifled sighs,
The tear big-swelling in his manly eyes.

Rinaldo then no less of grief betray'd:
But Olivero by his foot was stay'd.
'T were long each ceremonial to rehearse,
And paint the solemn obsequies in verse;—

What funeral gifts were made, what vestures fram'd
In various guise, what countless torches flam'd. 1350

Now to the hallow'd fane their steps they bent,
Nor left a cheek unmoisten'd as they went,
His goodness, valour, youth, and grace engage
The grief of either sex, and every age.

Amidst the fane each pious office done
Of unavailing tears and female moan,
Soon as the holy priests, in heavenly strain,
Their prayers had chanted o'er the warrior slain,

Within a tomb of polish'd stone compos'd,
On two fair pillars rais'd, the coves they clos'd:
O'er this, inwrought with gold, Orlando threw
A costly mantle of impurpled hue, 1363

The dead to honour, till his love could raise
A structure worthier of the warrior's praise!
Orlando, ere he left Sicilia's isle,
Rave costly marbles for the sumptuous pile,

From various parts procur'd with studious care;
Rich porphyry and alabaster fair.
He form'd the plan, and every artist skill'd
Employ'd, with high rewards, the tomb to build.

And Flordelis, when to the isle she came, 1371
Rich columns added to th' unfinished frame,
Which, when Orlando left Sicilia's shore,
The hapless dame, prepar'd, from Afric bore.

But when she found no tears her grief suffice,
Nor her sad soul reliev'd with endless sighs;
Nor prayers, nor masses for the dead address,
Appease the anguish of her wounded breast;

She there decreed her fix'd abode to make,
Till life's warm spirit should its hold forsake. 1380
Then in the tomb she fram'd her dreary cell,
Alone, secluded from the world to dwell.

Full many a message to the inourful dame
Orlando sent; himself in person came

To take her thence, and with provision fair
Had trusted her to Galerana's care²³;
Or would she rather with her sire reside,
Himself to Lizza would the motuere guide;

Or, at his cost, a cloister'd mansion raise
To dedicate to God her remnant days: 1390
But in the sepulchre unmov'd she stay'd,
There night and day with holy fervour pray'd,
Though few the hours that thus her life she led,
For soon the Parcae shear'd her vital thread²⁴.

Already from that isle, where bards have told
The Cyclops once were wont their place to hold,
The three brave knights of France with heavy mind
Departing, mourn'd the fourth they left behind;

But ere the warriors would the land forsake,
They sought with them some skillful leech to take
For Olivero's foot, which, sore aggriev'd, 1401
No lenient rest, no healing salve reliev'd.
While deep he groan'd, oppress'd with shooting pain,
They pitying heard; and, while they stood in vain
In deep debate, a thought the pilot mov'd,²⁵
When thus he spote, and each the advice ap-
prov'd.

Not far remote (he said) a rock there stood,
On which a hermit made his lone abode,
With whom none ever, at his greatest need,
Had fail'd in aid or counsel to succeed. 1410

Wonders he wrought that Heaven to man denies;
He made the blind to see, the dead to rise:
He, with the cross, could hush the winds asleep,
And still to calm the roarings of the deep:
And would they seek the man to God so near,
They soon might find, release'd of every fear,
Good Olivero from his hurts reliev'd:
Since oft the saint had greater deeds achiev'd.

Orlando heard, and bade, without delay,
Steer to the hallow'd seat their rapid way: 1420
With course direct they cut the briny tide,
And at Aurora's dawn the rock descri'd:
The bark, directed by the skilful crew,
Now near the shelvy land securely drew:
There by the menial train and seamen's aid,
The groaning marquis in the skiff they laid,
And through the dashing brine of willows hur'd,
In safety landed on the craggy shore,
Where dwelt the sage, who to Rogero gave
The rite baptismal in the cleansing wave. 1430

Heaven's holy servant, who in Christ believ'd,
With joy Orlando and his friends receiv'd;
With looks complacent every knight he bless'd;
And now inquir'd on what adventure prest.

They reach'd his cell; though by the saints fore-taught,
He knew what cause the warriors thither brought,
Orlando told his purpose, to implore
Some healing aid his kinsman to restore;

To take her thence, and with provision fair
Had trusted her to Galerana's care²³;
Or would she rather with her sire reside,
Himself to Lizza would the motuere guide;

Or, at his cost, a cloister'd mansion raise
To dedicate to God her remnant days: 1390
But in the sepulchre unmov'd she stay'd,
There night and day with holy fervour pray'd,
Though few the hours that thus her life she led,
For soon the Parcae shear'd her vital thread²⁴.

Already from that isle, where bards have told
The Cyclops once were wont their place to hold,
The three brave knights of France with heavy mind
Departing, mourn'd the fourth they left behind;

But ere the warriors would the land forsake,
They sought with them some skillful leech to take
For Olivero's foot, which, sore aggriev'd, 1401
No lenient rest, no healing salve reliev'd.

While deep he groan'd, oppress'd with shooting pain,
They pitying heard; and, while they stood in vain
In deep debate, a thought the pilot mov'd,²⁵
When thus he spote, and each the advice ap-
prov'd.

Not far remote (he said) a rock there stood,
On which a hermit made his lone abode,
With whom none ever, at his greatest need,

Wonders he wrought that Heaven to man denies;
He made the blind to see, the dead to rise:
He, with the cross, could hush the winds asleep,
And still to calm the roarings of the deep:
And would they seek the man to God so near,
They soon might find, release'd of every fear,
Good Olivero from his hurts reliev'd:
Since oft the saint had greater deeds achiev'd.

Orlando heard, and bade, without delay,
Steer to the hallow'd seat their rapid way: 1420
With course direct they cut the briny tide,
And at Aurora's dawn the rock descri'd:
The bark, directed by the skilful crew,
Now near the shelvy land securely drew:
There by the menial train and seamen's aid,

²² That is, subjected to the emperor and the pope.

²³ It does not appear in this poem who is meant by Galerana or Galerana, though the name is often to be met with in Boyardo, but without any explanation.

Era qui nella sola Galerana,
Orl. ina. b. i. c. i.

But in the romance of Aspramonte, it appears that Galerana was wife to Charlemain.

²⁴ Hera concludes the affecting episode of Flordelis, whose death forms an amiable contrast to the popular story of the Ephesian woman.

BOOK XLIV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rinaldo promises his sister Bradamant to Rogero, at the instigation of the hermit, and with the concurrence of Orlando. The knights take their leave of the hermit, and sail to Marseilles. Astolpho dismisses the forces of king Senapus, who repair to their own country, and the duke himself returns to France, where he meets at Marseilles with Orlando, Rinaldo, Rogero, Olivero, and Sobrino. Charles and all his nobles prepare to welcome the conquering knights, who enter the gates of Paris in triumph. Great festival on the occasion. Dispute between Amon and his son Rinaldo concerning Bradamant, whom Amon had promised to Leon, son of the emperor Constantine. Distress of Bradamant and Rogero. The singular request of Bradamant to the emperor. She is taken away from the court by Amon, and closely confined in a castle. Rogero resolves to kill his rival Leon, and departs in disguise from Paris attended with a single squire. He arrives at Belgrado, where he assists the Bulgarians, commanded by their king, against the Greeks commanded by Constantine and Leon, and entirely defeats the latter. Leon, in admiration of the valor of the strange knight, conceives a secret friendship for him. Gratitude of the Bulgarians. Rogero departs in pursuit of Leon.

Ort in the lowly roof, the bumble cell
Of poverty, where pain and sorrow dwell,
Sincerer virtues in the breast we meet
Than in the stately dome and regal seat;
Where lords and kings are nurs'd in courtly wiles,
Midst deep suspicions and insidious smiles;
Where love and charity no place can claim,
And sacred friendship lives not but in name. [pose,
Kings, popes, and emperors, leagues of peace con-
To day are friends, to morrow deadly foes: 10
Whate'er they seem, their thoughts in secret bear
No semblance oft to what their lips declare:
Nor right nor wrong they heed, but only prize
Those measures most, where most advantage lies!
All these in courts have ne'er the blessings try'd
Of godlike truth, for truth can ne'er reside
Where, or in deep debate, or sportive vein,
The tongue, in speaking, speaks not but to feign:
Yet these, when once by adverse fortune led Beneath the covert of some rustic shed, 20
May bend their souls to friendship's purer lore,
And taste a happiness unknown before!
The holy hermit in his cell could prove
More certain means to bind in cordial love
His noble guests, than courts could e'er dispense,
With all the turns of winning eloquence:
Their concord, firmly knit, shall ever live,
And death alone its fatal period give.
The saint with pleasure view'd each generous mind,
Where boldest hearts with gentlest manners join'd,
And truth, more white than swans, in native lustre shin'd. 31
Dissension now was chas'd from every thought,
The traces of each past offence forgot;
Nor warmer marks of friendship had they show'd,
Born of one race, and nurtur'd of one blood.

Whom, fighting for the faith, his friends with grief
Beheld in anguish hopeless of relief. 1440

The hermit bade them every doubt remove,
And promis'd Olivero soon should prove
His saving power; but since nor healing juice,
Medicines or simples could the rock produce;
The church he sought; there to his Saviour pray'd;
Then issu'd forth, secure of heavenly aid;
And now, by name th' Eternal Three address'd,
With hand outstretch'd the feeble knight he bless'd.
Oh! virtue given to those who Christ adore!
Good Olivero felt his pains no more! 1450
Firmly he trul, with more than strength renew'd;
While sage Sobrino, near, the wonder view'd.

Each day Sobrino's strength was more depress'd,
Each day the anguish of his wounds increas'd:
But when he, through the hermit's saving word,
Beheld the knight by miracle restor'd;
No more his soul will Mahomet believe,
But Christ in future for his God receive:
And, humble penitent, he begg'd the sire
To grant the baptism our rites require. 1460

He said; the sage his suit approv'd, and gave
The Christian cleansing in the limpid wave.
Nor this alone—with holy prayers he heal'd
His wounds, his strength renew'd, his pains dispell'd.

Not less Orlando, and each noble knight,
Rejoic'd to see the truth of Christian light
Disperse the Pagan darkness, than to see
Their lov'd compeer from pain and danger free.
But greater joy Rogero's soul confess'd,
While livelier faith and hope confirm'd his breast.
Rogero, by the tempest thither cast, 1471
His hours in converse with the sage had past.
Who midst the warriors now in semblance mild,
With useful lore the well-spent day beguill'd;
'Taught them to steer through this bad world of strife,

Of wretchedness—unjustly titled life;
Eatcorm'd by fools! and warn'd them not to miss
The road that leads to everlasting bliss.

Now bade Orlando from the vessel bear
Bread, wine, and viands, store of grateful fare, 1480
To heap the genial board; and these he plac'd
Before the man of God, whose simple taste,
Long us'd to roots and pulse, he gently press'd
To share with them a more luxurious feast.

Their spirits thus refresh'd with wine and food,
The knights and hermit their discourse renew'd;
And, as it oft befalls in social wise,
When round the circle vary'd subjects rise,
At length Rogero (whose high deeds were blown Throughout the world) was to Orlando known.
Then Olivero, and Rinaldo found 1491

In him that youth so far in arms renown'd;
Nor bad till then Rinaldo mark'd the knight,
With whom so late he met in listed fight.
Sobrino knew the young Rogero well,
When first he met him at the hermit's cell,

Yet held his peace: but when the rest had heard
That this was he, Rogero so rever'd
For warlike feasts—all eager round him press'd,
And each with open look and smiles address'd: 1500
One grasp'd his hand; one close embracing held;
One on his cheek the kiss of friendship seal'd:
But chief the lord of Mount Albano strove
To greet him with a brother's warmth of love.

Why he above the rest, I now conceal,
But with the book ensuing shall reveal.

The lord of Mount Albano first address'd
Renown'd Rogero, and the youth caress'd,
As one himself had found so well to wield
His glorious weapons in the listed field;
As one, whose courtesy so late he prov'd,
40 For courtesy o'er every knight below'd!
But chiefly gratitude employ'd his thought,
On all Rogero for his race had wrought.
He knew his arm had Richardetto freed,
By Spain's offended king to death decreed,¹
When in his daughter's bed the guard surpris'd
The amorous youth, in female weeds disguis'd:
By him, he knew, was either noble son
Of Buovo (as the tale before has shown)
Freed from the Soracen's unpitiful bands,
50 From Bertolapi and Maganza's hands.
Such service done, Rinaldo's generous mind
To love and honour the brave youth inclin'd;
And much he griev'd, so long forbid to pay
The debt he ow'd, till this auspicious day.
While one in Africa's Pagan court remain'd,
And one the cause of royal Charles maintain'd,
All greeting was deny'd—but when he view'd
Rogero here by hallow'd rites renew'd
60 To Christian life, full gladly he embrac'd
The wish'd occasion to redeem the past;
And zealous vows of future service made,
And grateful thanks and endless honours paid.

The holy sire, who saw with placid look
The cordial greeting, on their converse broke,
And thus began—"No further can remain,
(And this I trust without repulse to gain,
But since by friendship you are drawn, so nigh,
The bond to strengthen with a nearer tie,
Since from your houses join'd (whose separate name Beholds no equal in the world of fame)
A line shall come, whose lustre must efface
The rays of Sol throughout his annual race;
Whose honours shall descend from year to year,
And distant ages their renown revere;
While in their spheres the starry orbs are roll'd:
So God reveals, so bids me now unfold."

Thus spoke the holy sire, and more he said,
Though less requir'd Rinaldo to persuade,
80 Who gladly to Rogero's vows resign'd
His Bradsmant, the happy league to bind.
Good Olivero and Angiante's lord
Much prais'd between the knights the fair accord;
And deem'd that Charles and Amon must approve,
With all the realm of France, this noble love.

Thus they; but little yet to them was known
That Amon, by consent of Pepin's son,²
To Greece dispatch'd an envoy, with design
To treat with Greece's emperor Constantine;
90 Who for his son had ask'd the martial fair,
Leon his son, his mighty empire's heir;
Who, though unseen, enamour'd of the dame
By distant rumour, felt the lover's flame.
Amon reply'd, that ere himself pursu'd
The treaty, such a marriage to conclude,
He to Rinaldo must the cause report;
Rinaldo absent then from Charles's court;

Who, soon returning, would with joy sincere
The welcome news of such alliance hear:
Yet, for the love he bore his noble son,
100 He wish'd him to complete the league begun.
Meanwhile Rinaldo, from his father's view
Remote, of Leon's suit no tidings knew,
But, with Orlando's full consent, design'd
His sister's with Rogero's hand to bind;
While all the knights their union blest approv'd,
But chief the hermit, who such union mov'd;
Who deem'd that Amon would no less rejoice
At such a son of good Rinaldo's choice.

That day and night, and half th' ensuing day,¹¹⁰
In converse with the blest recluse they stay,
Unmindful of their ship, though now the gales
With prosperous breath invite the ready sails.
The mariners impatiently attend
Their tardy lords, and many a message send
To urge their voyage, till the knightly crew
Prepare to bid the holy sage adieu.

Rogero, who so long an exile prov'd,
Nor ever from the rock his feet remov'd,
120 A farewell of his sage instructor took,
Through whom his errors he for truth forsook.
Orlando by Rogero's side his sword
Replac'd; to him Frontino he restor'd,
With Hector's arms, and thus his love express'd,
Since these he knew the knight had once possess'd.
But though the Paladin might better claim
A title to the sword of magic fame,
Which he, with toil and peril huge obtain'd,
In Falerina's dreadful garden gain'd,
Than could Rogero, who the weapon ow'd
130 To him, whose gift Frontino had bestow'd,
A lawless thief! yet this, with generous mind,
Orlando with his other arms resign'd.

The pious hermit bless'd the warlike train,
Departing now their vessel to regain:
The seamen plumb'd their oars beneath the wave,
And to the favouring wind their canvass gave.
Calm was the sky; nor vows nor prayers they need,
For fair Marsailles their rapid course to speed.
The port secur'd, we leave them there to stay,¹⁴⁰
Till brave Astolpho thither we convey.

When duke Astolpho had the conquest known,
(A bloody conquest, by the victor won
With little joy,) and deem'd that France no more
Could fear an insult from the Pagan power,
He purpos'd that with all his numerous bands,
The king of Nubia to his native lands
Should homeward now his former course pursue,
By which he late against Biserta drew.
150 Already from Ugero's son³ return'd
The fleet, whose meeting Africa's lord had mourn'd,
When, wonders new! scarce leaving every ship,
The sable bands had issu'd from the deep,
Sudden the poop and prow no more appear'd,
No more the masts and cords are strain'd, the masts are rear'd;
Each vanish'd bark its ancient form receives,
And all th' armada shrinks again to leaves!

¹ See note to Book xli. ver. 198, for the full account of this adventure.

² Brunello, who gave his horse and sword to Rogero, as related at full in the General View of Boyardo's Story.

³ His return to them, ver. 200 of this Book.

¹ The reader will here recollect the adventure of Richardetto in the xxvth Book, who having been condemned by Marsilius to be burnt alive for an intrigue with his daughter Ploridespina, was delivered by Rogero.

² Charlemain.

The rapid eddies blew, and airy light
Whirl'd them aloft, and scatter'd far from sight.
From Afric now withdrew the Nubian force, 160

A countless host of mingled foot and horse;
But first Astolpho, for the troops bestow'd,
To great Senapus⁷ paid the thanks he ow'd,
Who drain'd his country's power such aid to yield,
And led them forth in person to the field.
To him Astolpho, in the bag confin'd
Commits the fury of the southern wind,
That fury, went at midmost day to sweep
The unstable desert, like the billow deep: 170
He gave him this amidst the burning waste,
To guard them safely from the dreary blast;
But charg'd him, when his native land he gain'd,
To free the wind in durance now detain'd.
Soon as the host approach'd to Atlas' heights,
Each steed again (as blameless Turpin writes)
Became a stone; and thence on foot the bands
Return'd in safety to the Nubian lands.

Now time requires Astolpho should repair
Once more to France; but first he bends his care
The strongest forts in Afric won to guard 181
From all assaults; then for his flight prepar'd:
He mounts his griffin-horse, and through the skies
Sardinia reaches; from Sardinia flies
To Corsus' shore; then hovers o'er the main,
Declining to the left his courser's rein;
At length to rich Provence with speed descends,
And in Marseilles his long voyage ends.
When now he turns his thought to set at large
The feather'd steed; for so his sacred charge 190
Th' apostle gave, that when the Christian knight
Provence had reach'd, he there should end his flight:
No more with bit or rein the steed confine,
But freely to his liberty resign.
Already had that world⁸ (whose orb contains What mortals love, and makes our loss her gains)
Of every sound his magic horn depriv'd;
For, soon as in those holy seats arriv'd
The glorious knight, his bugle lost its power,
And not a breath could wake its terrors more. 200

Astolpho reach'd Marseilles, what time the band
Of five brave knights had anchor'd on the strand:
Orlando, Olivero now restor'd
To health and strength, Alhano's noble lord,⁹
With sage Solvino; but, above the rest,
Roger, first of courteous knights confess'd,
The dear remembrance of their comrade kill'd
Each Paladin with generous sorrow fill'd;

⁷ "It seems very extraordinary, that in the taking of Biserta the poet does not mention Senapus, who might be supposed, as emperor, to have had the command of the army; or, if he had resigned that post to the superior qualities of Astolpho, at least it is reasonable to think, that he would have had some important charge."

Lavezuola.

This commentator's remark is so far just, that Senapus seems to be little attended to by Ariosto, though, in making the disposition for the attack, he gives him a place of honour. This the critic has overlooked. The command of the army was evidently left to Astolpho.

⁸ The poet means the Moon, where he tells that Astolpho found all things that had been lost on Earth.

⁹ Rinaldo.

And, in their generous breasts, that joy restrain'd
Which else had follow'd such a conquest gain'd 210

And now from Sicily to Charles had spread
The news of either Pagan monarch dead:
Of old Sobrino in the victor's chain;
Of valiant Bradamant untimely slain:
Of young Rogero, now baptiz'd, he heard:
His heart reviv'd, his face in smiles appear'd,
Deliver'd from the yoke of war, that late
Oppress'd his shoulders with the galling weight.
In honour now of those whose hands sustain
His empire's fame, the pillars of his reign,
He sends the nobles from his royal seat, 240
Along the Seine the glorious chiefs to meet;
Next issues from the walls himself, enclos'd
With kings and dukes in fair array dispos'd:
His royal consort near, and at her side
Fair courtly dames in splendid vesture ride.
Imperial Charles, the Paladin, nor less
The courtly nobles and the thronging press,
Than those, by nature bound in nearer tie,
Of great Angles as bend a raptur'd eye;
On him, and all his train, alike bestow 250
The love and reverence to their worth they owe,
While from the tongues of thousands echo'd round
The names of Clarmont and Moqrana¹⁰ sound.
Embraces now, and mutual greetings done,
Rinaldo, Olivero, Milo's son¹¹,
To Charles' high presence young Rogero bring,
And tell his lineage to the listening king;
That from Rogero, late of Risa nam'd,
The warrior born, was like his father fam'd
For virtuous deeds, and well in many a fight 260
Our troops could witness to his dauntless might.

Meantime with Bradamant, Marphisa fair
Appears, a friendly and illustrious pair!
This with a sister's love Rogero strain'd,
But that her virgin modesty retain'd.
The emperor bade Rogero now his seat
Again resume, who lowly at his feet
In reverence stood; and by his side he plac'd
The noble youth, with highest honours grac'd;
Who well he knew had late his faith secur'd 270
In Christian lore, and Mahomet abjur'd;
For every warrior, eager to unfold
His country's glory, all th' adventure told.

With pomp triumphant, and with festive state,
All turn and enter Paris' lofty gate.
The streets are green with boughs of cheerful bays,
Rich tap'stry covers all the public ways:
At gates and windows danc'd and damsels stand,
(A beauteous sight!) and from unsparring hand
With smiles upon the victor rain in showers 280
A thousand wreaths, and palms, and odorous flowers.
On every side, before th' admiring eyes,
The sculptur'd arch and figur'd trophy rise,
That, wrapt in smoke and flame, Beserta show,
And every deed achiev'd against the foe.
Here various throngs in games and sports commence,

There some attend the mimes and story'd scene;
While all around these words inscrib'd appear:
"THE GREAT DELIVERERS OF THE LAND REVEAL'D"
Amidst the trumpet's clangour echoing round, 290
Sonorous fifes, and every tuneful sound:

¹⁰ The two great families of Rinaldo and Orlando.

¹¹ Orlando.

Amidst the shouts, applauses, clamours loud,
 And maddening raptures of th' noisy crowd,
 The glorious emperor his palace raises,
 Discourts, and there the numerous throng detains
 For many days, with sport on sport increas'd.
 The mask, the dance, the tournament, and feast.

One day Rinaldo gave his sire to know
 His promise on Rogero to bestow
 His sister's hand; a promise duly weigh'd 280
 With Olivero and Orlando made;
 When each agreed the virgin ne'er could find
 Another consort of such noble kind;
 Much less a youth in virtue or in fame
 To rise superior to Rogero's name.

He said; with anger Amon heard his son,
 Who durst (unask'd of him) his purpose own
 To raise Rogero to his sister's bed,
 Whom he, with higher thoughts, design'd to wed
 The heir of Constantine, not one whose hand 290
 No sceptre sway'd, who shar'd nor wealth nor lapd.
 The boast of blood but little can avail,
 And virtueless, when large possessions fail.

But, more than Amon, Beatrice inflam'd
 Against her son's presumption loud exclaim'd:
 Abroad, at home, she ceas'd not to declare
 Rogero never should possess the fair;
 Restless ambition kindling in her breast
 To see her daughter empress of the East.
 Rinaldo to his purpose fix'd remain'd, 300
 And what he promis'd firmly yet maintain'd.
 The mother, who believes her daughter's will
 To hers concurr'd, incites the virgin still,
 To avow, she sooner would forgo the light,
 Than live the consort of a peedy knight;
 With threats she ne'er should boast her daughter's
 If from a brother she receiv'd such shame; [name,
 And row'd Rinaldo's power in vain should prove
 To force his sister to Rogero's love

Unhappy Bradamant with downcast eye 310
 Appear'd, nor to her mother made reply.
 Such was her reverence of maternal sway,
 That filial duty urg'd her to obey,
 While her free soul disdain'd to avow th' intent,
 To which her will could never yield consent.
 But ah! what will is hers, when passion reigns
 In every pulse, and every wish constrains!
 She dares not disapprove, nor dares appear
 Content, but sighs in silent doubt and fear;
 And when retir'd from every eye apart, 320
 She pours the tear to ease her burthen'd heart;
 Beats her white bosom, rends her golden hair,
 And thus in secret vents her soul's despair:

"Alas! I mourn these vows, which she whose will Should rule o'er mine, forbids me to fulfill:
 Shall I, of filial love forgetful grown,
 Thus to a mother's hopes prefer my own?
 What greater crime, than to neglect the claim
 A parent holds, can stain a daughter's name?
 Shall I a consort choose where she denies, 330
 Who claims obedience by the closest ties?
 Yet—must so strong my filial duty prove,
 To make me, my Rogero! e'er remove
 My thoughts from thee! expunge my faithful fires,
 To nourish other hopes, and new desires!
 Or shall I every dear respect forgo,
 Which pious children to their parents owe,
 And only prize the bliss that sways my heart?
 Ah! me—too well I know a daughter's part.
 I know—but ah! such knowledge nought avails,
 When passion conquers, and when reason fails! 341

Love rules—as he directs, I give my hand;
 I think—I act—I speak—at his command!
 Of noble Beatrice, and Amon born,
 I, slave to love—am made of love the scorn!
 Great I offend my parents—I may live
 To hope their pardon—but will love forgive
 If him I slight?—no reason will suffice
 To calm his anger—till his victim dies!
 How have I long unwearied sought to draw 350
 Rogero to embrace the Christian law!
 At length I have prevail'd—and lo! the fruit
 Another gathers of my vain pursuit!
 Thus never for herself the boe renews
 Her annual treasure of nectarous dew!
 But let me perish ere it shall be said
 I any consort, save Rogero, wed;
 And should I dare dispute my parent's sway,
 At least in this a brother I obey;
 Whose better judgment unobscur'd appears 360
 With weakness that attends declining years.
 Orlando, what Rinaldo seeks, approves,
 And each alike confirms our mutual loves:
 A pair, whom all mankind in honour place
 Above the rest of our illustrious race.
 Our choice approv'd by those whose merits shine
 The flower of Clairmont and Mogram's line;
 Ah! why must Amon claim peculiar right,
 Before Rinaldo and Anglante's knight?
 It most not be—the treaty scarce begun, 370
 Not Constantine can claim me for his son,
 But to Rogero plighted, Heaven has made us one."

If thus the virgin mourn'd with grief oppress'd,
 Not greater calm enjoy'd Rogero's breast.
 The fatal tidings, through th' imperial town
 Yet undivulg'd, by him too well were known;
 And oft he mourn'd his fortune's cruel spite,
 That robb'd his soul of every wish'd delight;
 Nor gave him sceptres, wealth, or ample land,
 Oft given the worthless with upspring hand, 380
 Of every other good mankind receive,
 Which study can acquire, or nature give;
 He view'd them centred in himself, and more
 Than ever yet a youth possess'd before.
 The comeliest person to his grace must yield,
 No prowess scarce can meet him in the field:
 And none of Fame's first sons have nobler shin'd,
 For birth illustrious, and a kingly mind.
 The vulgar herd that honours oft dispose,
 By turns exalting these, depressing those; 390
 That wretched vulgar riches only prize,
 Above the good, the generous, and the wise.
 Sense, virtue, daring, all that makes desert,
 The graceful person, and the blameless heart,
 In sordid breasts no favour'd place can hold,
 Till back'd by charms of ill-persuading gold!
 Nor here exempt we from the vulgar name,
 Save him, whom wisdom gives a better claim;
 Not sceptres, crowns, or mitres, can exclude
 Kings, popes or emperors, from the motley crowd,
 But wisdom only, and true judgment given, 401
 To few, the favourites of all-ruling Heaven!
 Rogero then—"If Amon's secret aim
 Would raise his daughter to an empress' name,
 Let him with Leon yet the league delay,
 Till once the Sun has couer'd his annual way:
 I trust, ere then, in fight to overthrow
 Both sire and son, and lay their glories low;
 And when this hand has Leon's sceptre won,
 I may deserve the rank of Amon's son. 410

But should he, as he threats, his daughter wed,
And give her now to bless the Grecian's bed;
The promise, made me by Rinaldo, slight,
Made by his kinsman, good Angiante's knight;
Which to confirm, that holy sage appear'd;
The marquis Olivero present heard,
Wah king Sobrino—Shall I tamely mourn?
By me such insult like a woman borne?
First let me die—but can I therefore move
My arms against the sire of her I love? 420
Should I against his life my weapon raise,
Would Heaven, would Earth, such action blame or praise?

Grant now, that Amun perish by my sword,
With all his race—would that relief afford
To what I feel!—Ah! no—'t would but ensure Increase of woe to what I now endure.
Shall I, whose dearest wish was still to gain
My fair-one's love, her hatred thus obtain?
For should I slay her sire, and on his race
My fury vent, would not such deed efface 430
All former kindness? Could she then bestow
Her hand on one so prov'd her kindred's foe?
Yet must I such dire wrongs unplied grieve?
Forbid it Heaven!—Death shall at least relieve
My breaking heart—but ere I die, shall fall,
With juster doom, that Leon, cause of all!
The wretch, who comes to rend a lover's peace,
Shall, with his father slain, this arm confess:
Not Helen's rape on Troy such woes entail'd:
Not Proserpine, in elder time assail'd 440

By rash Pirithoos¹⁹, could from Pluto's ire
Such vengeance urge, as now my soul, on fire,
Prepares to wreak against the son and sire.
Perchance thou griev'st not, idol of my heart!
From thy Rogero for this Greek to part:
And wilt thou, for thy sire, thy kindred's sake,
Forgo my love a stranger's hand to take?
Ah! much I doubt thou rather seek'st to give Ease to a parent than my woes relieve;
And, at thy nuptial hour, prefer'st to see 450
Caesar thy spouse, to one so poor as me!
Yet—can it be that e'er a regal name,
The mean regard that pomp and titles claim,
With all the wealth of all the East combin'd,
Should taint my Bradamant's exalted mind?
Should make her less esteem her promise given,
And break that faith so often vow'd to Heaven;
Nor rather stand for Amon's wrath prepar'd,
Than e'er forget what once her lips declar'd?"

Rogero thus; while oft some stranger near 460
Would chance his sighs and food complaints to bear:

And bance the fair, for whose dear sake he griev'd,
With tears the tidings of his woes receiv'd:
But most she mourn'd Rogero should suspect
She, for this Greek, could e'er her vows neglect.
To ease his fears, and from his breast remove
A thought injurious to her spotless love;
She from her menials chose a trusty maid,
By whom she thus her secret thoughts convey'd:
"Such as I was, Rogero I will I live, 470
And more, if more can be, while Heaven shall give

This pulse to beat—let love or smile, or frown,
Let fortune raise me high, or cast me down,
In me behold a rock of truth, that braves
The howling tempest and the dashing waves:
Not spring or winter have I chang'd my place,
Nor aught shall ever shake my steadfast base.
First softest metals, when assail'd in flame,
Shall sever adamant's impervious frame,
Ere cruel fortune, or relentless love, 480
Shall from my soul her constant faith remove.
First shall the stream to Alpine heights ascend,
Ere to new paths my wandering feet shall bend.
To thee, Rogero, I my heart resign;
(Nor weak the empire e'er a heart like mine)
No subjects can sincerer homage pay,
No king or emperor rule with firmer sway;
Nor need'st thou with a wall or fosse enclose
Thy city here against invading foes:
Without more force resistance shall be made, 490
And all repuls'd that dare the fort invade.
Think not that riches can my thoughts entice—
A noble heart yields not to such a price!
Nor proud nobility, nor dazzling height
Of regal state, that lures the vulgar sight;
Nor beauty, that can changeful bosoms move,
Shall from Rogero e'er estrange my love.
Fear not another form my heart shall shake:
My heart, by proof, not fram'd of wax, to take
Each new impression—Love his shafts may 500

send,
But thy dear image shall my breast defend.
Iv'ry, or stone, or gems of hardest vein,
Where forms, imprint by sculptur'd art, remain,
May easier break, than ever, to receive
Another form, the first impression leave.
Such is my heart, which love shall sooner break,
Than e'er compel a second form to take."

These words of greeting from the noble maid,
Fair hope and comfort to his soul convey'd;
Words, that had power a thousand times to give
The lover life, and bid the dying live. 511

But when, so long by stormy billows tost,
They hop'd for refuge from the friendly coast,
Behold an unexpected tempest bore
Their shatter'd vessel further from the shore:
For Bradamant a nobler proof prepar'd
Of generous love than what her words declar'd:
Her courage rous'd, each nice respect she broke,
To royal Charles she came, and thus she spok—
"If e'er my deeds my sovereign's grace have mov'd,
Be what I now demand, O king I approv'd. 521
But plight thy royal word, ere yet express
Thou know'st my suit, to grant what I request.
And sure my purpose, when disclos'd, I trust
Thou wilt not deem ignoble or unjust."

"O maid below'd!" imperial Charles reply'd,
"To worth like thine what suit shall be deny'd?
And here I solemn swear, shouldst thou require
My kingdom's half, to grant thy full desire."

"The boon I ask is this," the virgin said: 530
"Thou shalt not suffer one this hand to wed,
But he, O king! whose skill in battle shown,
Whose courage and whose force eclipse my own,
Who seeks my love, I first his arm will try,
At sword and shield in equal joint defy:
The first who wins shall take me for his spouse,
The vanquish'd to another bear his vows."

She said; and princely Charles with smiles re-joic'd,

That well her suit bescom'd her dauntless maid,

¹⁹ Pirithoos descended into Hell, with his companion Theseus, designing to carry off Proserpine, but was slain in the entrance by the three-headed dog Cerberus, and Theseus was kept by Pluto prisoner, till afterwards delivered by Hercules.

And bade her rest in certain faith assur'd, 340
That all she wish'd his royal word secur'd.

Thus they : the tidings of this converse came
That day to Amon and his haughty dame.
Against their daughter each alike exclaim'd :
With deep resentment each alike inflam'd,
Too well in this perceiv'd some close intent,
More to Rogero than to Leon meant ;
And hence they seiz'd by fraud the martial maid,
And to a castle from the court convey'd :
A strong-built castle on the sea-beat shore, 350
Which Charles to Atien gave some days before.
They held her there a prisoner close confin'd,
And thence to send her to the East design'd,
Resolv'd, whate'er befel, she should forsake
Rogero, and the hand of Leon take.
The generous maid, no less for mildness prais'd
Of female virtues, than for courage rais'd
Above her sex, with modest meekness bore
Sufferings inflicted by a father's power :
Yet was she firm the sharpest woes to prove, 360
Pains, bonds, or death, to keep unstain'd her love.

Rinaldo, who, by Amon's crafty slight,
Beheld his sister ravish'd from his sight,
No more at his disposal to remain,
His promise to Rogero pledg'd in vain,
Forgetting all respect to parents ow'd,
Against his father vents complaints aloud.
But little Amon heeds, resolv'd his voice,
And not his son's, should rule his daughter's choice.

This heard Rogero¹³, fearing yet to mourn 370
The virgin, from his arms for ever torn :
Should Leon live, he doubts long suit may gain
Her willing hand, or force at length constrain ;
And hence (to none disclos'd his secret mind)
The death of Leon in his soul design'd¹⁴ :
Resolv'd, if valour could assert his own,
The sire and son to slay, and seize the Grecian throne.

Those arms he took which Trojan Hector wore,
Which Mandricardo since in triumph bore ;
Then with the saddle good Frontino press'd ; 380
But chang'd his wonted surcoat, shield, and crest.
He chose not now his fam'd device to wield,
The argent eagle in a beavenly field,

¹³ Rogero was ignorant of what had passed between the emperor and Bradamant, which, though it came to the knowledge of Amon, does not appear to have been published till after the departure of Rogero, when proclamation was made by the command of Charles : Bradamant in the next Book speaks of the proclamation being issued after Rogero's departure.

" Ah ! my Rogero ! whither art thou fled ?
Art thou so far remote," the mourner said,
" That ne'er to thee our challenge stood reveal'd,
From thee alone, of all mankind, conceal'd ?
O ! could the news have reach'd thy faithful ear,
No speed, like thine, had met the summons here."
Ver. 743.

¹⁴ The Italian is,

—far che moia e fia d'Augusto, Dio.

A ludicrous expression, and probably a sarcasm on the custom of deifyng the Heathen emperors, " to make of Leon Augustus a God, by killing him," a turn not easily preserved in the translation, and perhaps scarcely worth the pains.

But on a ground, where deep vermilion glow'd,
A unicorn, all lily-white¹⁵, he show'd ;
Then singled from his train a squire well try'd,
In whom for truth he safely might confide,
Sole partner of his way, with strict command,
To keep his name conceal'd in every land.
He pass'd the Maes and Rhine, the country pass'd
Of Osterchie, and Hungaria trac'd ; 390
Along the Siter's banks his course pursu'd,
And, on the right, at length Belgrado view'd ;
Where to the Danube join'd, with double force
The Sava to the ocean bends his course.
He sees encamp'd a numerous army spread
Beneath th' imperial standard, proudly led
By Constantine, to repose the town,
Which from his rule Bulgaria's powers had won.
There Constantine himself in person came, 400
With him his son and every chief of fame
To assert the honour of the Grecian name.
Without Belgrado, stretch'd in prospect wide,
Down from the mountain to the subject tide,
Before the Greeks Bulgaria's army stood ;
And either army drank of Sava's food.
The Grecians o'er the stream prepar'd to throw
A length of bridge ; but this their wary foe
With arms oppos'd ; and fierce the contest grew
On either side, when near Rogero drew. 410
Four times the Greeks Bulgaria's bands surpass'd,
And barks they brought, and bridges fram'd to cast
Athwart the stream ; and oft their foes defy'd,
With threats by force to gain the adverse side.
Back from the stream, meantime, with cautious art
Leon retir'd, and on a different part
Far wheeling round the plain, the banks essay'd,
And join'd his bridges, and his passage made.

With twice ten thousand foot and horse he cross'd,
And on their flank assail'd Bulgaria's host 420
With sudden force—The emperor, who descri'd
His son advancing on the further side,
With barks to barks conjoin'd, his bridges cast,
And with the remnant of his army pass'd.
The king and leader of Bulgaria's band,
Active in fight, and prudent in command,
(Vatrance nam'd) in vain with dauntless breast
Against the Greeks his force and skill address :
Him Leon met, and with a numerous train
Surrounding, bur'd him headlong on the plain, 430
Whom, bravely scorning midst his foes to yield,
A thousand weapons slaughter'd on the field.
The fierce Bulgarians fought yet unabdud ;
But when on earth their king and chief they view'd,

And found on every side the tempest grow,
They turn'd their backs, and fled before the foe.
Rogero, mingled with the Greeks, beheld
Their arms prevailing, and Bulgaria's quell'd,
And now resolv'd their battle to restore,
For Constantine he loath'd, but Leon more. 440
He spur'd Frontino ; rapid as the wind
Frontino flying, left each steed behind ;
And soon arriving, where the routed train
Fled to the mountain, and forsook the plain ;
Now these, now those, he turn'd with bearten'd
breast,

To meet the Greeks ; then plac'd his lance in rest,

¹⁵ The crest or arms formerly borne by the princes of the house of Este.

While with such force his thundering steed he drove,
His looks might strike with terror Mars or Jove!

Amid the Grecians, in the van, he spy'd
A daring youth in vests with crimson dy'd! 650
That o'er his arms, resplendent to behold,
Of finest silk embroider'd, shone with gold;
Nephew to Constantine, his sister's son,
By him belov'd and honor'd as his own:
Roger's spear his shield and corselet tore,
And issu'd at his back besmear'd with gore:
He left him dead, and Balisarda drew,
Against the nearest of the Grecian crew:
On these, on those, by turns the steel he sped;
And here he clef't the trunk, and there the head: 660
Now in the throat or passing bosom dy'd
The smoking blade, now pierc'd the heaving side:
Arms, legs, and hands and thighs, asunder hew'd,
While blood, in gushing streams, the vale embu'd.
Such slaughter seen, no Grecian durst withstand
Th' unequal'd force of that destructive hand:
The face of war is chang'd—and those who fled
From bands, which Constantine victorious led,
Now felt new courage rise in every breast,
And with recover'd force the Grecians press'd: 670

At once the broken ranks were seen to yield,
And every standard turn'd to quit the field.
High on a hill imperial Leon plac'd,
Beheld below his numerous squadrons chas'd:
And while he mark'd them with a sad survey,
Where from afar the plain in prospect lay,
Fix'd on the knight he gaz'd, by whom alone
His men were slain, and all his camp o'erthrown;
Yet could not, while he felt his slaughtering
hand,

Without the praise his valiant deeds demand. 680
Well by his shining arms with gold inlaid,
His upper vest and shield's device display'd,
He knew the warrior came not with his foes,
Though now against him their defence he chose.
His more than human force with wondering eyes
He view'd; as if some angel from the skies
Was sent against the Grecians to dispense
The wrath of God for some unknown offence.
Thus what in vulgar breasts had hatred rais'd,
With noble soul exalted Leon prais'd: 690
Charm'd with his worth, far rather had he view'd
His towns dismantled, half his realm subdu'd,
For every ten a thousand press the plain,
Than such a godlike knight in combat slain.
As when some mother (even in anger mild)
Chides, from her sight, chastiv'd, her darling child;
The little innocent, with sobbing sighs,
Nor to the father nor the sister flies,
But turns to her, and soft in infant charms
Hangs at her breast, and fondles in her arms; 700
So Leon, while he sees Roger's hand
O'erthrow the first, and threat each remnant band,
Joys in his sight—for less th' offence can move
His hatred, than the glorious deeds that prove
The champion's valour, warm his soul to love.

While Leon him esteems, behold the knight
With ill return such friendly thoughts requite:
Roger him detests, and with his sword
Would now behold his rival's bosom gor'd.
Him long he seeks, and calls aloud, in vain, 710
The Greek to meet him on th' embattled plain:
But still, with caution, through the warlike lines
The prudent Greek th' unequal fight declines.
Leon, lest equal fate should seize on all,
Commands the squadrons from the field to call

With trumpet's sound; and sends' entreat his sire
Beyond the stream for safety to retire,
If safety might be found; while with his power
Himself the bridges sought he pass'd before,
And now securely reach'd the further shore. 720
What numbers by the fierce Bulgarians died,
Or captives groan'd! and but th' opposing tide
Forbade pursuit, all with their blood had stain'd
The hostile sword, or prisoners there remain'd,
Some from the bridges fell, and whelm'd beneath
The rushing current, found unlook'd-for death.
Some with swift foot to reach the river fled,
And some were captives to Belgrado led.

The battle ended, on one dangerous day,
In which their king and leader breathless lay; 730
Great loss and shame Bulgaria's bands had known,
Save for that aid the stranger's arm had shown:
The knight, who pictur'd on a crimson field
A unicorn, of snow-white hue, reveal'd.

Now all, who saw to him what palms they ow'd,
With shouts and clamours round the victor crowd:
In awful homage bent the circling band:
One kiss'd his feet, one bolder kiss'd his hand:
Each throo'g'd on each, more near and near they
press'd, 739

Who nearest view'd esteem'd his fortune bless'd;
But he most blest, whose touch that man explor'd,
Scarce held a man, but like a god ador'd!
While all on him with voices united cried,
Henceforth to lead them on—their king and guide.
Roger to their general suit agreed,
As king to rule them, and as chief to lead,
But would not truncheon then nor sceptre bear,
Nor to Belgrado on that day repair:

He Leon must pursue, ere from his sword
He further escap'd, or safe repass'd the ford: 750
Him must he follow, nor the track forsake,
Till giv'n by fate his hated life to take;
Since many a league he travers'd hill and plain,
To sate his great revenge with Leon slain.

This said; he parted thence, and eager flew
Through ways the squadrons taught him to pursue,
By which the Greek to reach the bridges try'd,
Ere danger, near at hand, the pass deny'd.

Roger follow'd close, inflam'd with ire,
Nor call'd nor waited for his lagging squire: 760
Yet such advantage Leon's flight could meet,
(For flight it must be call'd, and not retreat,)
He found the passage free, he cross'd the stream,
Then broke each bridge, and left the banks on flame.
Roger reach'd the banks when day withdrew
His parting beam, nor where to rest he knew:
And thence he journey'd by the Moon's pale light,
But yet no town nor castle met his sight.
Unknowing of his way, all night he press'd
His faithful steed, till, red in splendour drest, 770
Sol's eastern car the twilight gloom dispell'd,
When, on the left, a city he beheld.

There all the day he purpos'd to remain,
T' amend the wrong Frontino might sustain,
On whom, nor freed from bit, nor eas'd from toll,
That night he journey'd many a weary mile.

For Constantine, Unguardo held the place,
A man exalted in his sovereign's grace;
And now (in dangerous times) a numerous force
The walls contain'd of mingled foot and horse. 780

Where to his way the portal open stood,
Roger enter'd, and full gladly view'd
What seem'd to speak, he ne'er elsewhere could
A better welcome, and more wish'd retreat. [next

It chanc'd that where he stay'd, at evening light
 Arriv'd for shelter a Rumanian knight,
 Who present view'd the deeds his arm had wrought,
 When late to aid Bulgaria's troops he fought,
 This knight had scarce escap'd the bloody strife,
 And still he trembled for his threaten'd life; 790
 And still he saw in fancy's troubled eye,
 The furious knight pursue, the Grecians fly.
 Soon as his sight had caught the warrior shield,
 The noted ensign and vermilion field,
 He knew the knight, whose arm such buckler bore,
 Was he that dy'd the plains in Grecian gore:
 With eager step he sought the palace-gate,
 And audience gain'd, impatient to relate
 Such news as well might claim the ruler's ear,
 Such as shall in th' ensuing book appear. 800

BOOK XLV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero is betrayed in his sleep, and made prisoner by Unguardo, one of Constantine's governors. He is then delivered over to Theodora, sister to Constantine, desirous to revenge the death of her son killed by Rogero. The challenge of Bradamant is published by proclamation. She returns to the court. Leon generously delivers Rogero from prison. Afterwards, not knowing him to be Rogero, he engages him to enter the lists with Bradamant in his stead. Rogero, under the name and ensigns of Leon, fights with Bradamant, and then retires in despair to the woods. Lamentation of Bradamant. Marphisa pleads the cause of Rogero with Charles, and contests the claim of Leon. Orlando and Rinaldo side with them, and Amou opposes them.

WHEN highest plac'd on giddy Fortune's wheel,
 Unhappy man must soon expect to feel
 A sad reverse, and in the changing round
 With rapid whirl as sudden touch the ground.
 Of this Polycrates¹, with Lydia's lord²,
 And Dionysius³ ample proofs afford:
 With numbers that, from boasted wealth and fame,
 One day has sunk to poverty and shame.
 But when a man, by Fortune's frown distress'd,
 Is to the bottom of her wheel depress'd, 10
 He soon may find the turning circle raise
 His abject state, and bring him happier days.
 How oft to earth have those their head declin'd,
 Who dealt but late their laws to half mankind!
 As Servius, Marius, and Ventidius⁴, known
 In ancient times; and Lewis in our own⁵:

¹ Polycrates the tyrant, who reigned in the island of Samos, in the time of Cambyses, and maintained an absolute dominion over all the islands of the Archipelago, till at last, by a reverse of fortune, as Herodotus writes, he was treacherously taken prisoner by Oretes, a governor of Lydia, for the king of Persia, and miserably put to death. Porcacchi.

² Croesus king of Lydia, and Dionysius the tyrant of Syracuse, are well known to have fallen from the height of prosperity to the lowest adversity.

³ The names of three noble Romans who had experienced the like reverse of fortune.

⁴ He means Lewis XII. king of France, son of

That kingly Lewis, by his royal bride,
 In marriage to my noble duke ally'd,
 Who, at Albino, seiz'd in bloody strife,
 Had nearly paid the fees his forfeit life, 20
 Not long ere this, the great Corvino's bore
 Severer trials; but those trials o'er,
 Behold the first the realm of France obtain;
 Behold the second in Hungaria reign:—
 Examples may be found in every page
 Of modern times, or tales of earlier age,
 That good to ill, and ill succeeds to good,
 And praise or blame has each in turn pursu'd:
 Hence mortals ne'er securely must confide
 In wealth, in conquest, or in sovereign pride; 30
 Nor with despair in adverse fortune mourn,
 Whose restless orb has never ceas'd to turn.

Rogero by his enterprise begun,
 The field from Leon and the emperor won;
 So far confided in his single might,
 For sure success in every future fight,
 He deem'd himself, through thousands in array
 Of horse and foot, could force his bloody way,
 With single arm the sire and son to slay:
 But she⁶, who wills not man's presumptuous mind
 Should dare to promise all he hop'd to find, 41
 Soon taught him how she chang'd from high to low,
 And now a friend became, and now a foe:
 This to his cost he learnt from him who spread
 Danger and shame on his defenceless head;
 The knight, who lately from the sanguine strife
 Of routed Greeks had scarcely escap'd with life,
 He to Unguardo welcome tidings brought,
 That the fierce chief (whose arm such ruin wrought
 On Constantine, that many a rolling year) 50
 Could scarce the loss in that defeat repair)
 All day and night within those walls remain'd;
 Hence, favouring Fortune, by her lock detain'd,
 From him, their prisoner made, would haply bring Peace to their country, safety to their king:

Charles duke of Orleans. The duke of Orleans being suspected of treason in favouring the cause of Francis duke of Bretagne, against his lawful king, and being made prisoner with his son at St. Albino, was beheaded by Charles VIII. king of France, who for some time debated whether he should condemn the son to the same fate; but was satisfied with keeping him in prison. Charles VIII. afterwards dying, the fortune of Lewis entirely changed, and he succeeded to the crown of France, by the title of Lewis XII.

⁵ Unia de Vajuda had two sons, Ladislaw and Matteo Corvino, who slew the count di Caglia, a relation of Uhadislaw king of Hungary; though some relate that the count was killed by Ladislaw only. The news coming to the ears of the king, he caused Ladislaw to be beheaded, and kept Matteo in prison. The king soon after dying, Matteo was, with general consent, proclaimed king of Hungary, being only eighteen years of age. He proved a prince of as great valour and magnanimity as ever reigned in Hungary, and was a formidable enemy to the Turks. Engenica.

⁶ Fortune.

⁷ The knight of Romania, who after the battle between the Bulgarians and Greeks, in which the latter were defeated, discovered Rogero, and betrayed him to Unguardo.

Conclude the war with one decisive stroke,
 And on the proud Bulgarians fix the yoke.
 Unguardo, from the troops, that smit with dread,
 To him for refuge from the battle fled,
 (For numbers, band by band, arriv'd, who try'd 60
 In vain to pass the bridge, or ford the tide)
 Had heard what slaughter'd rage the Greeks pur-su'd,
 How half the host lay buried in their blood;
 That one sole champion, who an army brav'd,
 One suffering camp destroy'd, and one had sav'd;
 And much he marvel'd with himself to know,
 That, self-conducted to his fate, the foe
 Fell in the snare; and with a cheerful look,
 His joyful speech his secret triumph spoke.
 He stay'd till sleep had clos'd Rogero's eyes, 70
 Then sent, in arms, his people to surprise
 The unconscious knight, whom, sunk in rest profound,
 In bed they seiz'd, and fast with fetters bound.
 What could Rogero, when he wak'd, and spy'd
 His naked limbs with cords ignobly ty'd?
 By his own shield the champion thus betray'd,
 In Novengardo's walls was captive made
 To glad Unguardo, first of all mankind
 For stern demeanour and a ruthless mind.
 A trusty envoy now Unguardo sent, 80
 Who with the tidings to the emp'ror went.
 Imperial Constantine, his routed powers
 That past the stream, that night from Sara's shores
 Had safe to Beletoca's town convey'd,
 Whose laws Androphilus his kinsman sway'd:
 The sire of him, who first aim'd the fight,
 With shatter'd cuirass, felt the Herculean might
 Of that brave warrior's unresisted hands,
 Whom stern Unguardo held in captive bands.
 The emp'ror now commands with heedful care
 The walls to strengthen, and the works repair: 91
 For much he doubted the Bulgarian host,
 That such a warrior for their chief could boast,
 Would rest not here, but to the last pursue
 The scatter'd remnants of the Grecian crew:
 But, he a prisoner made, no more alarms
 The monarch felt, nor fear'd the world in arms.
 Joy swell'd his soul, and rapture scarce express'd
 Beam'd in his face, while oft his speech confess'd
 The warmest hopes—"Bulgaria's name, I trust, 100
 Shall soon," he cried, "be humbled to the dust."
 As he who views beneath his stronger hand
 The foe dimember'd, seems assur'd to stand
 Of certain palms—so fix'd in hope appear'd
 The emp'ror, when Rogero's fate he heard.
 Nor more rejoic'd the sire, than generous son,
 Not only as he deem'd Belgrado won
 From this event, and all the lands that lay
 Submitted to Bulgaria's haughty sway;
 But, as he meant each friendly art to prove, 110
 To bend the warrior's soul to peace and love,
 And win him to his side: with him to friend,
 The valiant peers that Charlemain defend
 He hears unmov'd; nor envies him the fame
 Of great Rinaldo, or Orlando's name.
 Far different passions Theodora felt,
 On whose ill-fated son Rogero desit
 The speeding lance, that in his cuirass stood,
 And issu'd at his back with reeking blood.
 This dame her brother Constantine address'd, 120
 Before his presence low her suit she press'd,
 And clasp'd his knees, while fast the tears pursu'd
 Each other's course, and all her breast bedew'd.

"Ne'er will I quit these feet, my liege!" she said,
 "Till on the wretch, by whom my child is dead,
 Thou giv'st me to revenge a mother's sighs,
 When now a captive in our power he lies.
 Thy sister's son!—reflect how thee he lov'd;
 Ah! think for thee what royal deeds he prov'd:
 And wilt thou hear his blood for justice call, 130
 Nor on his murderer's head avenge his fall?
 Behold, in pity of the Grecians' woe,
 How God has freed us from so dire a foe!
 And, like some bird in toil unheeded caught,
 Him unsuspecting prisoner hands has brought:
 To me, O gracious prince! this wretch consign,
 Let me with his pains alleviate mine!
 Then shall my offspring on the Stygian shore
 His death no longer unaveng'd deplore!"
 She said, and sobbing deep, with every art 140
 Of female grief assail'd the emperor's heart,
 And prostrate from his feet refus'd to move,
 Though Constantine with speech and gesture strove
 To raise the dame: the dame still closer press'd,
 Till forc'd at length, he granted her request;
 And, as she will'd, he issu'd his command
 To bring the knight and yield him to her hand.
 To cruel Theodora thus convey'd,
 The champion of the unicorn was made
 Her wretched thrall, whose unrelenting mind 150
 The direst death, of most opprobrious kind,
 For him esteem'd too mild: her thoughts she bent
 With every pain her captive to torment,
 That power could heap, or cruelty invent.
 With arms, and feet, and neck in shackles bound,
 Deep in a dreary tower, in gloom profound
 She cast him, where no ray of cheerful light
 From Phoebus e'er dispell'd the dismal night,
 Nor there with other food his hunger fed,
 But a short portion of unwholesome bread 160
 Putrid and foul, and oft withheld, to waste
 His life by slow degrees; and o'er him plac'd
 A keeper, who excell'd her barbarous zeal
 To make him every human misery feel.
 Had Amon's fair and valiant daughter heard,
 Or great Marphisa (both through Earth rever'd
 For deeds of arms), that thus with lingering pains
 Rogero prisoner lay in galling chains,
 To set him free, how soon, without regard
 Of death and danger, either had prepar'd; 170
 No more had Bradamant, to yield him aid,
 Respect to Beatrice or Amon paid.
 Meantime king Charles, revolving in his breast
 His promise given at Bradamant's request;
 That none in marriage should her hand obtain,
 But he who could in arms her force sustain,
 Not only at his court, with trumpet's sound
 Her challenge told, but through each region round
 That own'd his sway, he bade the list proclaim; 179
 Till wide from realm to realm was spread the fame.
 The terms were these, declar'd by herald's voice,
 That who on Amon's daughter fix'd his choice,
 Should first against her prove his single might
 From rising Phoebus till his setting light:
 And should he, unav'du'd, so long withstand
 The virgin's force, she by his stronger hand
 Would own her prowess conquer'd, nor deny
 Consent to knit with him the nuptial tie:
 That, waving all pretensions, would she yield
 To him the choice of weapons for the field; 190
 As well she might, inu'd all arms to bear,
 On foot, on horse, in every form of war.

Amor, who darst in such a cause so more
Oppose his sovereign, gave the contest o'er;
And, after various thoughts in vain resolv'd,
To lead his daughter to the court resolv'd.
Though deep resentment swell'd the mother's breast,

Now in herself her anger she suppress'd
Against the dame; yet, for her honour's sake,
She caus'd fair robes, with sumptuous cost, to make
Of blondest lutes, and, as her rank requir'd, 301
With these the lovely Bradamant sturr'd;
Who to the palace with her sire return'd,
Where soon, alas! her absent knight she mourn'd.
As one in April fair, or genial May,
Who leaves with blossom'd sweets the garden gay,
Again returning, when the solar rays
Decline more south, and shorter leave the days,
Thinks all a wild: so seem'd the court no more
To her that splendid court it look'd before. 310
She dares not ask, lest question might reveal
What in her heart she labours to conceal;
Yet listens off, and hopes some tongue may tell (Unask'd of her) what chance the knight befel.
All knew he left the court; but none divin'd
What course he took, or what his thoughts design'd:
Departing thence, he to his squire alone,
His faithful follower, made his purpose known.

Ah! how she sigh'd! ah! how with sudden dread
Her heart was seiz'd to hear her lover fled! 320
Ah! how she fear'd, lest he in absence sought
By slow degrees to drive her from his thought!
That finding thus their loves by Amor cross'd,
And every hope to be her consort lost;
He shunn'd her sight, by distance to remove
The cruel pangs of unavailing love:
Perchance, from realm to realm, to seek a dame
Whose merits might expunge his former flame.
A new reflection then succeeds, and shows
Rogero ever constant to his vows. 330
Herself she blames, that could his faith distrust
With weak surmises and with fears unjust.
Now she accuses, now her knight defends:
Now sinks the scale of hope, and now ascends!
Yet for her peace she rather strives to choose
The best opinion, and the worst refuse;
Then mourns, as for some crime, that e'er her mind,
To groundless fears and jealousies resign'd,
Should doubt his truth—then beats her breast and cries,

As if she present her Rogero spies: 340
"Forgive me—I have err'd—but ah! the cause,
Through which I err, to deeper error draws
My hapless soul—the cause is love, whose dart
Has trac'd thy dearest image in my heart:
There lives thy courage, there each grace enshrin'd,
Th' acknowledg'd praise, the theme of all mankind!
It cannot be, but every maid or dame
Who views thy charms must feel the gentle flame,
And every art employ, by woman known,
To loose my ties, and bind thee with her own. 350
Oh! had but love thy thoughts as justly trac'd
Within my heart, as there thy form is plac'd,
Full sure I were those undisguis'd to view
(What now conceal'd I deem them) just and true:
Then every anxious doubt and scruple o'er,
My heart shall thro' with jealous pangs no more.
As when the miser from his hoarded gold
Afar dijo'n'd, in thought must still behold
His dearer part, and sees, in fancy's eyes,
Some curious thief purloin the glittering prize: 360

So, my Rogero, when I cease to hear
Thy voice, to view thy face, soon chilling fear
All hopes destroys—I know my fears untrue,
But cannot, as I would, those fears subdue.
Turn, my Rogero, turn—that peace restore
Which grief has nearly kill'd, to rise no more.
As, when the setting Sun forsakes the skies,
With shades increas'd increasing terrors rise:
Soon as his beams return, the shades decrease,
And with the lessening shades our terrors cease:
Rogero absent, every hope is cross'd, 371
Rogero present, every fear is lost!
Turn, my Rogero, turn, ere fears destroy
Each little hope, and poison future joy!
As sparks by night diffuse a steamy ray,
That sudden fades at near approach of day;
So, when my sun withdraws his parting light,
My grief is strengthened with the men at night:
But when again in eastern state he burns,
My sorrows vanish, and my joy returns! 380
Come then, my dearest light! whose beams control
The sable terrors that surround my soul.
When the low Sun brings on the shortening days
The earth no more her worted charms displays;
The hollow wind: are clogg'd with ice and snow,
No birds are heard, no blossom'd odours blow:
So thou, my life's dear son, whose rays impart
The genial warmth to cheer my drooping heart,
When thou art gone, what cares my soul infer!
What more than winter desolates my breast! 390
Return, my cheering Sun, and with thee bring
The smiling treasures of the blooming Spring;
So shall my soul thy healing influence prove,
Oh! chase my winter, and my clouds remove!"

As Progne or as Philomela mourns,
That to her helpless young with food returns,
And finds the nest by cruel hands despoil'd:
As wails the turtle by her mate beguil'd:
So Bradamant laments her absent knight,
As torn for ever from her longing sight: 300
Around her cheek the trickling sorrows steal,
While yet she strives her anguish to conceal.
How had her grief to grief unequal'd grown,
Could she have heard (to her, alas! unknown)
That, kept in torment, her unhappy lord
Lay prisoner, sentenc'd to a death abhorrd!
The dreadful sufferings, and the lingering pains
Of that good knight, who grown'd in hostile chains,
(His fate by that relentless dame design'd
With tortures keen of unexampled kind) 310
All gracious Heaven (by suffering virtue won)
Lrought to the ear of Caesar's courteous son,
And his great soul inspir'd with means to save
The peerless hero from a cruel grave.
The noble Leon, who Rogero lov'd,
(His name unknown) by that high valour mov'd
Which, first on Earth, the wondering prince ac-teem'd

Above a man's, and more than mortal deem'd;
Long counsel'd with himself, in close debate;
At length devis'd such means t' elude his fate, 320
That Theodora never should complain,
Her wish'd revenge by him was render'd vain.
Apart to him he spoke, with whom remain'd
The prisoner's charge, whose yails the knight de-tain'd,

And told his purpose, ere the doom severe
Was finish'd, with the prisoner to confer.

'Twas night: he chose companion of his way
A friend, well try'd of every hard away:

Then to the captain of the tower he came,
 And instant gain'd access with Leon's name. 330
 The keeper, for the visit well prepar'd,
 Suspecting nought, without his wanted guard
 Led Leon and his friend, where lay confin'd
 The knight to death's severest pangs assign'd.
 Now near the place arriv'd, the wary two Pursu'd, and as the keeper stooping drew
 A portal's bar around his neck they cast
 The fatal noose—be grasp'd, and breath'd his last.
 A door they rais'd, and by a ladder plac'd
 For such intent, the prince, with friendly haste, 340
 Descending went to where Rogero lay,
 Excluded from the beams of cheerful day:
 A lighted torch he held, by which he found,
 Stretch'd on an iron bed, the champion bound,
 Where, on a palm, beneath his dreadful bed
 With putrid damps a stagnant water spread.
 Without the hangman, axe, or cord, or knife,
 The place had soon cut short his wretched life.
 Leon, dissolv'd in pity, to his breast
 Rogero closely held, and thus address'd: 350
 "Sir knight! thy virtues o'er my willing mind
 Full empire hold, and to thy service bind
 My future life—thy good o'er mine I prize,
 And for thy safety I my own despise.
 My friendship stands avow'd—thy love I place
 Above my sire, my kindred, all my race.
 Then hear me,—Leon am I call'd, the son
 Of Constantine, to thy assistance won:
 In person view me here, my love to show,
 With danger, should my sire my purpose know, 360
 To live an exile from his regal seat,
 Or in his court his frowns eternal meet:
 For thee he hates, by whom on yonder plain
 His hands were near Belgrado chas'd or slain."
 He said: and, while he thus discourse pursu'd,
 Whose gentle cordial ebbing life renew'd,
 His pious hands each straiten'd band untw'd:
 "What thanks to thee I owe?" Rogero cried,
 "This being, sav'd by thee, is mine no more;
 This to my dear deliverer I restore, 370
 Where'er, O prince! shall Heaven my prayers attend
 For thee my sword I use, my life to spend."
 Rogero thus, and from the dungeon fled,
 Where in his place remain'd the keeper dead,
 Himself unknown, unknown with him the two:
 Good Leon to his home Rogero drew,
 And there, in friendly guise, some days detain'd,
 With promise while in safety he remain'd,
 His arms and generous courser to restore,
 Though then withheld in stern Unguardo's power.
 The prison open'd, and the prisoner's flight, 381
 And keeper kill'd, were known by morning light.
 This way and that was away'd the hearer's mind,
 Each heard the tale, but none the truth divin'd,
 None through the world had Leon e'er believ'd
 The friend from whom Rogero aid receiv'd:
 Leon, when each suppos'd with hate pursu'd
 The knight, nor sought his safety but his blood.
 Meanwhile the matchless courtesy impress'd
 Such grateful wonder in Rogero's breast, 390
 So chang'd the purpose, that, for many a mile,
 Had led him thither with unceasing toil:
 Repentant now his former thoughts he view'd;
 For other thoughts the soften'd knight pursu'd:
 The first by hatred, gall and venom fed:
 The last by love and love-born peace inspir'd.
 At morn, at night, he ponder'd in his mind,
 (All other cares would scarce admittance find,)

How with like-courtesy, or more, to pay
 The grateful debt that on his honour lay: 400
 To him it seem'd, whate'er his life's extent,
 For such a friend should all his days be spent;
 A thousand times death ventur'd for his sake
 Would scarce, he deem'd, a just requiral make.
 At length from France the king's decree was known,
 Which wide around the herald's trump had blown,
 That he whose hand would Bradamant obtain,
 Must with his sword and shield her force sustain.
 Such little joy this news in Leon bred,
 That from his cheek the doubtful colour fled: 410
 For well he knew, by many a proof display'd,
 His arm too weak to meet the Durian maid.
 Now with himself he seem'd the means to spy,
 By art his want of vigour to supply;
 If in his garb this unknown knight conceal'd,
 He sent his proxy to the listed field;
 Whose force and courage well he deem'd might stand
 Against the best of Gallia's martial band.
 But first he rested to dispose the knight
 To enter for his sake the field of fight; 420
 Then, in his stead, from all disguis'd, to place
 In Grecian garb array'd the dame to face.
 Now to his friend the secret of his breast
 He told, and urg'd, with prayers, the dear request,
 Him, for his sake, beneath a borrow'd name,
 With foreign venture clad, to meet the dame.
 Much could the Grecian's eloquence, but more
 Than all his eloquence, the sacred power
 Of gratitude, that singly could control
 The tenderest feelings of Rogero's soul: 430
 While his heart shudder'd at the suit, he try'd
 With outward smiles his inward pangs to hide;
 And answer'd, that he soon prepar'd to prove
 All hazards due to noble Leon's love.
 Yet scarce his lips had given these accents breath,
 When, at his heart, he felt a stroke like death.
 By day, by night, the youth more wretched grew;
 By day, by night, nor peace nor rest he knew:
 He saw too well his future doom was seal'd,
 But never wish'd his promis'd word repeal'd: 440
 A thousand deaths he rather chose to die,
 Than e'er a suit; by Leon urg'd, deny.
 His death is fix'd: if Bradamant he leaves,
 He leaves his life, her loss his soul bereaves
 Of every bliss—but should his inward grief
 Too feeble prove to work its own relief,
 Himself can free with predetermin'd hand
 His tortur'd spirit from her fleshly band:
 Prepar'd for all, rather than living groan
 To see her made a bride—and not his own. 450
 Though resolute to die, his mind as yet
 Uncertain, wavers how his fate to meet;
 Sometimes he thinks his skill in arms to bide,
 And to the dame expose his naked side:
 For how so happy could he sink in death,
 As by her hand to yield his parting breath!

* Metastasio, in his Olympiad; has closely copied this beautiful passage of Rogero's grateful generosity to Leon. Megacles, secretly in love with Arietea, daughter to Cliteneas, king of Sicily, is in the drama requested by his friend Lycidas to enter the lists in his name, in order to win for him Arietea, who had been promised as the reward of the conqueror. Many circumstances in the elegant dramatist are delicately grafted on this inimitable original.

But soon reflection whisper'd to his thought,
Not so most Leon's friendship be forgot:
His faith be plighted in the single strife,
To win for him fair Bradamant to wife; 460
Not with feign'd show of fruitless arms deceive,
And Leon of his promis'd aid bereave.
Thus still unshain'd his candid faith be held;
And while his thoughts, now here, now there re-
bell'd,

He turn'd from all, save those that would persuade
His heart to keep the vow his friendship made.

Now Leon from his father Constantine
Had leave obtain'd to forward his design,
With arms and couriers and a numerous guard,
And all that suited for his rank prepar'd. 470

His march began: with him Rogero rode,
Who now his arms restor'd, and courser, ow'd
To Leon's care. Day following day they pass'd,
Till entering France, they Paris reach'd at last.
Here Leon stay'd without the city's gate,
Then pitch'd beneath the walls, in regal state,
His lofty tent, and one dispatch'd to bear
His princely greeting to the monarch's ear. [show'd]

Full glad was Charles, and well his friendship
By visits paid, and costly gifts bestow'd. 480

His cause of coming then the prince disclos'd,
And pray'd, to what the herald's voice propos'd,
A speedy issue, that the dame who chose
A lord that singly could her strength oppose,
The list would enter, since by her in arms
He came to die, or win her virgin charms.

Thus he; and Charles for Bradamant declar'd
That she th' ensuing morn, in steel prepar'd,
Would pass the gates, and in the list (by night Beneath the bulwarks form'd) await the fight. 490

How from the setting Sun to rising day,
Did and Rogero mourn the hours away!

So waits a wretch condemn'd the break of morn,
The light that must to him no more return
All arm'd he chose to enter in the field,
To keep from each his looks, his mien conceal'd:
No steed he rode, nor pointed spear would shake,
Nor, save his sword, would arms offensive take:

No lance he took, yet fear'd be not the power
Of that which fram'd of gold Argalia bore, 500

Which, next Astolpho, now the virgin held,
Which every warrior from his seat compell'd;
Yet none were conscious what the spear could do;
And none, whose hand the weapon wielded, knew
Its magic virtue, save the king alone,

Who made, and gave the weapon to his son,
Astolpho and the virgin, since decreed
To bear the lance in many a martial deed,
Both deem'd, alike in jousts their native might Bore off the palm from every other knight; 510
That every javelin, in their grasp, would gain,
Like this, the conquest of the listed plain.

* The reader will, it is hoped, indulge the translator with a general observation on the circumstances attending this duel between Rogero and Bradamant, that the romantic turn of the fiction is more than compensated for by the many fine strokes of nature introduced in the narrative; particularly when he tells us, that while Rogero with the tenderness of a lover blunts his weapon, through fear to wound her, she, with the sentiments suiting her situation, adds sharpness to hers: these are certainly the touches of a master.

Such fight Rogero now resolv'd to shun:
He fear'd Frontino in the tilt to run;
Him had the damsel seen, full well he knew,
Her heedful eyes might at a single view
That courser call to mind, which oft she rein'd,
Which long at Mount Albano she detain'd.
Rogero thus, whose every thought and care
Would keep his person secret from the fair, 520
Nor took his steed, nor aught that might reveal
By tokens what he labour'd to conceal.

Another sword he for the combat chose:
He knew for Balaarda's lightest blows,
Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail,
Nor strongly temper'd plate, nor twisted mail.
And ere the falchion by his side he plac'd,
Its point he blunted, and its edge defac'd.
To seem like Leon, o'er his arms he wore

The regal scarf, by Leon worn before; 530
The golden eagle, with his double head,
He bore emblazon'd on a field of red.

Well might the knights each other's vesture take,
Alike their stature, and alike their make:
Th' exchange complete, one issu'd to the field,
While one within the tent remain'd conceal'd.

Thus arm'd amid the lists Rogero stood,
When with the dawn the bright horizon glow'd.
From his far distant was the virgin's will:
Rogero, all in fear her blood to spill, 540

Rebates his weapon's edge: the haughty maid,
Eager with his to bathe her beamy blade,
Adds sharpness to the steel; and hopes to view,
Through sever'd plates, the wound each stroke pursue;

With point or edge to reach the vital part,
And drive the falchion to her suitor's heart.
As the bold courser, nerv'd for rapid pace,
Impatient waits the signal for the race;

Now here, now there, he shifts his feet by turns,
He pricks his ears, each smoking nostril burns: 550
So the fierce dame, who little thought the knight
Her dear Rogero thus prepar'd for fight;

The trumpet waiting, seem'd through all her frame
To swell with ardour, and to glow with flame.
As often to the thunder's dreadful sound
Dire winds succeed, and from the dark profound

Upturn the waves; or from the desert land
In thickening volumes lift the heavy sand:
Wild beasts and swains, with flocks affrighted fly,
Bleak hail and rain come rattling from the sky:

So seem'd the virgin, when the trumpet blew, 561
So, with drawn sword against Rogero drew.
Not less some ancient oak, or stone-built tower
Of deep foundation, yields to Borrea's power;

Not less some solid rock's resisting height
To angry billows, dash'd by day and night,
Than good Rogero (in his fated arms)
Which Hector wore, secur'd by Vulcan's charms)

* It appears here, that Rogero fought this duel with Bradamant in the enchanted armour, which he won from Maudricardo, which was impenetrable; over which he wore the regal vest of Leon:
and yet in the next Book, when he is brought back by Leon to the court of Charlemain, he is said to have the same arms which he wore in the list with Bradamant, and which are described to be hacked and battered in the combat: the poet's words are,
Con le medesme insegne, e sopra veste,
Che come dianzi nella pugna fero.

Erano tagliate ancor l'arme e peste.

Yields to the tempest, that with rage address'd,
Pours on his booms, side, his shield and crest. 570
Now at full length the maid her weapon drove;
Now ending thrust, while all intent she strove
Between the jointed plates immers'd to view
Her lover's blood the smoking steel imbrues.
Before, behind, now shifting side to side,
Oft wheeling round her furious strokes she ply'd;
And inward rav'd, oppress with high disdain,
To find that every stroke was aim'd in vain.
As one, that to some town strong siege applies,
Whose circling walls in solid bulwarks rise, 580
Oft gives th' assault; now seeks the gates to break,
Now fill the fosse, and now the ramparts shake:
He seeks his falling ranks with slaughter thin,
And vainly hopes his entrance soon to win.
So toil'd the dame—but nothing could avail
Her wanted force to shatter plate or mail.
Now from his cuirass, now his helmet high,
Now from his shield she makes the sparkles fly:
Thick, and more thick, as on the rustic shed
The pattering hail, her rapid blows she sped. 590
Roger stood collect'd, to attend
With skill his safety, nor the maid offend.
He lifts his shield, and parries with his steel
The strokes he sees the adverse weapon deal:
Seldom he strikes, or strikes with fondest care,
In doubt to hurt the lov'd yet cruel fair.
Meanwhile the virgin burns, as fading light
The sky forsaking, warn'd to end the fight.
And now she call'd to mind the terms propos'd,
Her danger pressing as the evening clos'd; 600
For should she fail in one day's course to slay,
Or take her suitor, she becomes his prey.
Now where the flood Alcides' pillars lave,
Phœbus prepar'd to plunge beneath the waves
His golden head, when first a doubt prevail'd
Of her own strength, and hope of conquest fail'd.
As sunk her hope, the more her fury grew,
And thick and heavier round her weapon flew,
To break that armour, which, essay'd in vain,
Could all the day her force unhurt sustain. 610
As one, who to his task his hand applies,
And sees the night th' unfinished work surprise,
In vain with double toil would time retrieve,
Till strength and day-light lost his views deceive.
O wretched dâmsel! wert thou given to know
The knight at whom thou aim'st the mortal blow;
Didst thou Rogero see, the youth on whom
Hang all thy wishes, all thy joys to come!
Far rather wouldst thou die than see his death,
On whose dear life depends thy fleeting breath; 620
And should thy own Rogero stand avow'd, [stow'd]
How wouldst thou mourn each stroke thy arm be-

—All those arms that in the list he bore,
With every mark of that day's fight confess,
With riven plate, pierc'd mail, and batter'd crest.
Ver. 413.

Arion appears to forget that these arms were enchanted.

Spenser has a passage similar to this, where Arthegal and Britonart fight together unknown to each other, and Arthegal, pressing her with great fury, the poet breaks out into this exclamation,

Ah! cruel hand, and th'ce more cruel heart,
That work'st such wreck on her to whom thou dearest art!

Fairy Queen, b. iv. c. vi. st. 16.

King Charles, and all th' assembled peers, who thought
That Leon thus, and not Rogero, fought,
Beholding how so match'd in equal field,
He stood with Bradamant his arms to wield;
How with such skill he could himself defend,
And yet the safety of the dame attend, [breast,
With wonder gaz'd—while breath'd from breast to Each to his fellow thus his thoughts express'd: 630
"Sure Heaven has aptly form'd this noble pair,
She merits well the knight, and he the fair!"

When Phœbus in the seas had quench'd his light,
Imperial Charles commands to stay the fight:
And dooms the maid no more delay to make,
But for her spouse victorious Leon take.

Rogero would not here his helm unlace,
Nor from his limbs the weighty mail unbrace,
But on a palfrey mounting, swiftly went
Where Leon waited in the regal tent: 640

His arms around the warrior Leon threw,
And like a brother to his boom grew;
Then swift his helmet rais'd, his face reveal'd,
And with a cordial kiss each cheek he seal'd.

"My all is yours! dispose of all," he cried,
"Partake my treasures and my power divide:
Ne'er shall I rest till some return I make,
For friendship thus display'd for Leon's sake.
Yet what return!—how shall I e'er repay
The boundless gift of this auspicious day? 650

Not though the crown of our imperial race
I take from mine, and on thy temples place."

Thus he: Rogero in anguish burn'd,
Who loath'd his being, no reply return'd;
But to the prince restor'd his vest and shield,
So late his ensigns in the list'd field:
His unicorn he took; and now, as prest
With heavy toil, and feigning want of rest,
He thence withdrew, and soon his tent regain'd,
Where when the night in middle silence reign'd,
Unseen of all, his limbs in arms he cas'd; 660
And on his generous steed the trappings plac'd;
'Then press'd the seat, resolv'd alone to stray,
And his fronting left to choose the way.

Fronting now direct, now devious past, [waste,
Now through the champaign, now the woodland
And all the remnant night his lord he bore,
Who ceas'd not once his fortune to deplore:
On death he call'd; from death invoc'd relief;
To heal the anguish of a lover's grief: 670
Death, and death only, could a perial give
For woes too exquisite to bear and live!

"Of whom, alas!" he cried, "shall I complain,
For all this suffering which I now sustain?
Ah! would I now revenge the pangs I feel,
On whom, alas! such vengeance shall I deal
But on myself?—To me my fate I owe,
From me alone my springs of sorrow flow.

It fits that on myself my rage I turn,
Myself the wretched cause of all I mourn! 680
But how, when on my Bradamant is brought
An equal woe, can I support the thought?

Though for myself I unreveng'd might grieve,
Her pains that vengeance claim, deny'd my own.
Yes—I will die for thee—far thy dear sake

This willing life shall some atonement make:
I but regret such fate I fail'd to prove,
Ere I so far had injur'd her I love!

Why died I not, when, down'd to cruel pains,
I lay in ruthless Theudora's chains? 690
Then had I hop'd to find the pitying tear
Of Bradamant bedew Rogero's bier:

But when she knows that Leon's bliss I held
Above her own; that, not by force compell'd,
To him I sacrific'd a lover's flame,
How will she, dead or living, loath my name !¹

White words like these his inward grief confess'd,
Sighs following sighs quick bursting from his breast.
Uprose the Sun, when gazing round he spy'd
Thick dreary wilds perplex'd on every side. 700
Fix'd in despair, and resolute to die,
Remote from man, where not a human eye
Might view his fate; this place appear'd design'd
To suit the dreadful purpose of his mind.
The wood he pierc'd, where deepest he survey'd
The meeting shade inwove with meeting shade;
But first from reins and bit Frontino freed,
Releas'd, and thus address'd his gallant steed :

" O my Frontino !² ! were it mine to give /What worth like thine should from thy lord receive,
Thou shouldst not envy him who now obtains 711
A starry seat on Heaven's ethereal plains:
Not Cyllarus and bold Arion claim
Superior praise, or ask a nobler fame:
Nor any steed, whose merits could engage
The Grecian or the Latian's story'd page; Since thou may'st rank with these, with these that most

Excel their breed; not one of which can boast
What thee exalts o'er all thy generous race;
For she, the pride of beauty, valour's grace, 720
Of with her hand supply'd the foodful grain,
Thy trappings girt, and fix'd thy curbing rein.
Dear wert thou to my dame—but therefore mine!
My dame no more!—that title I resign!—
I yield her to another—trusty sword!
Now turn thy point against thy faithless lord."

While thus Rogero through the desert grove
Can birds and beasts to share his sorrows rove,
For these alone his mournful plaints attend,
As down his breast the frequent tears descend; 730
Think not his faithful Bradamant remains
In Paris free from love's heart-rending pains:
No vain excuses more, no feign'd delay
With Leon can elude the nuptial day.
What would she do for her Rogero's sake,
Ere yield consent another lord to take?
Break every tie, the king, the court oppose,
Make parents, friends, and all the world her foes.
Should nothing yet avail, at least night death,
With sword or poison, and her hated breath: 740
And better far she deem'd to live no more,
Than living her Rogero's loss deplore.

" Ah! my Rogero, whither art thou fled?
Art thou so far remote," the mourner said,

¹ These speeches to horses are frequent in the romance writers, and are not without example in the greater poets, for which we may refer the reader to the speeches of Achilles and Hector to their horses. Cervantes, not improbably with an eye to this passage of Ariosto, makes Don Quixote, before he enters upon his penance in the mountain of Sierra Morena, upon releasing Rosinante, to address him in the following manner: " O steed, as excellent in thy performances as unfortunate by thy fate, he gives thee liberty who wants it himself. Go whither thou wilt; for thou hast it written in thy forehead, that neither Astolpho's Hippogriff nor the famous Frontino could match thee in speed."

Jarvis's Don Quixote, vol. I. b. iii. c. xl.

" That ne'er to thee our challenge stood reveal'd,
From thee alone, of all mankind conceal'd?
O! could the news have reach'd thy faithful ear,
No speed like thine had met the summons here.
Ah! wretch—what other can my thoughts suggest,
Than that which, but alarming, gives my breast?
Why com'st thou not to make my joys run o'er? 751
But ah! thou liv'st in bands—or liv'st no more!
Too surely Constantine's detested heir
Has for thy life or freedom spread the snare;
By fraud thy timely coming to prevent,
Lest thy return should frustrate his intent.
From mighty Charles a sovereign grant I gain'd,
A grant, which, save myself, had none obtain'd;
In firm belief, thou only in the list
Of single trial couldst my arms resist: 760
Thyself except—all others I defy'd—
Lo! God has punish'd such o'erweening pride;
And he, who never yet in arms had run
One glorious course, from me the palm has won.
But am I vanquish'd, that I fail'd to take Proud Leon's life, or him the captive make?
Can this be just!—Were these the terms agreed?
Or this the doom by partial Charles decreed?
What once I proffer'd, if I now disclaim,
I know inconstancy must brand my name: 770
But am I then the first or last to show
That change must ever govern all below?
Yet call me lighter than the leaves that strow
The plains of autumn from the sapless bough:
Let but my truth to him I lov'd be prov'd,
Firm as a rock by surging tides unmov'd,
Surpassing every praise by woman told,
In modern story, or in times of old !³

These words and many more the virgin spoke,
While sighs incessant from her bosom broke: 780
And all the live-long night in tears she lay,
The night succeeding that ill-omen'd day:
But when in grottoes of Cimberian shade
Retreating night her weary limbs had laid:
Heaven brought her aid—whose all-directing mind
In her Rogero's future bride design'd:
By Heaven impell'd, at morn the fearless dame,
Marphisa, to the sovereign presence came;
And said, her soul in secret had disdain'd
The wrong Rogero in his wife sustain'd: 790
His was the bride—nor would a sister view
Another's claim usurp her brother's due;
And proffer'd to maintain in single fight
The band of Bradamant Rogero's right;
But proffer'd chief before the destin'd bride
To prove the truth (if she such truth deny'd)
That in her presence she those words had heard
Of faith exchange'd, by all mankind rever'd;
Given to Rogero by the virgin fair
With every rite that binds th' affianc'd pair, 800
That each from each no second choice would prove,
Or to another e'er transfer their love. (aid,

Thus she; and Charles was mov'd at what she
And bade the virgin to his sight be led.
To her the king Marphisa's words declar'd,
And Arnon present, in the converse shar'd;
While Bradamant with eyes cast downward stood,
Nor yet the truth deny'd, nor yet avow'd;
Yet seem'd her mien and modest blush to own,
What thus Marphisa's friendly zeal made known.
Rinaldo much, and much Aglante's knight 811
Rejoic'd to hear Rogero's sacred right
So well maintain'd; his nuptials set aside,
And Leug baffled of his promis'd bride.

Rogero now must Bradamant espouse,
They deem, nor Amon more control their vows;
And she, deliver'd from her sire's command,
To good Rogero give her willing hand.

If thus between the pair the contract stood,
Rinaldo and Orlando might conclude 820
They promise well confirm'd: so strife might cease,
And all beneficent be union, love, and peace.

Impetient Amon then—"A shallow wile
Is this, contriv'd a parent to beguile.
But were that truth, which you in fraud pretend,
Believe not thus my fix'd resolves to bend.

For let us grant (what yet I still deny)
My daughter could in some fond hour comply
To give her hand in marriage to the youth,
And be to her had pledg'd his future truth: 830

Yet, when or where was this exchange of heart;
The time, the place, each circumstance impart.
Such contract must have been (if e'er believ'd)
Before Rogero had her faith receiv'd.

But what imports a contract made before
Rogero had embrac'd the Christian lore?
Such vows can never with our laws agree,
When he a Pagan, a believer she.

For this has Leon risk'd his name in vain
With Bradamant, on you contended plain? 840
And will our emp'rour, still for justice fam'd,
Reverse the sentence he so late proclaim'd?
These pleas of vain delay which each would bring
You should long since have urg'd, ere yet the king,
At her request, the martial challenge sped,
Which to the trial generous Leon led."

Thus Amon, who to part the lovers sought,
Against Rinaldo and Orlando brought
His specious charge—while Charles, to either side
Impartial, nor to this nor that reply'd. 850

As when some wood the north or south receives,
A murmuring noise is heard among the leaves;
Or Eolus his wrath on Neptune pours,
The loud waves dash, and reflux beat the shores;

The rumour thus of deep discussion bred
Among the peers, through all the kingdom spread:
On this alone each ear attentive hung;

This was the theme of every eager tongue.
Some with Rogero, some with Leon join'd;
But most to good Rogero's cause inclin'd. 860

For one that favour'd Amon, ten prefer'd
The lover's claim: the emp'rour silent heard,
Refer'd the just decision to the laws,
And to the nation's counsel left the cause.

The nuptials thus deferr'd, Marphisa came,
And new conditions thus began to frame. [cried,
"Since, while my brother lives, none else." she
"Can with this dame in wedlock's bands be ty'd,
Let Leon (if he seeks the maid to wife)
First meet Rogero's arms in single strife, 870

And be, by whom his noble foe is slain,
Without a rival shall his bliss obtain."

Marphisa said: the trial thus propos'd,
Imperial Charles to Leon's ear disclos'd,
Who, while he saw auxiliar at his side
The champion of the unicorn abide,
Secure of conquest o'er Rogero stood,
And every enterprise undaunted view'd.

He heard unmov'd Marphisa's challenge given;
But little dreamt that grief his friend had driven 880
To savage wilds, abandon'd and forlorn;
And vainly long expected his return.

And now he fear'd too boldly he press'd
Success, and rashly had his name engag'd.

One day, another came, nor yet appear'd
The absent knight, nor tidings yet were heard.
By proof too well assur'd he knew his band
Could ne'er in combat with Rogero stand;

And hence alarm'd, he sought with anxious mind
The warrior of the unicorn to find. 890

Through cities, towns, and villages he sent,
Afar and near his trusty envoys went:
Nor thus content, in person next he press'd
His speed, and to the search himself address'd:

He sought amidst th' unnumber'd Christian train;
But vain his search, inquiry all was vain,
Till sage Melissa came; what aid from her
He met, I to th' ensuing book defer.

BOOK XLVI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Leon goes in search of Rogero, and is met by Melissa, who conducts him to the wood where Rogero had retired with a resolution to end his life. Meeting of the two friends. Rogero discovers a himself to Leon. Generosity of Leon. Rogero returns with them to the court of Charles. His reception there. The Bulgarian ambassadors invite him to take possession of the crown of Bulgaria. Amon and Beatrice consent to give him Bradamant to wife, and the marriage is celebrated with great pomp. Particular description of the nuptial tent and bed provided by Melissa. On the last day of the festival a knight appears before the assembly, and challenges Rogero to single combat. The knight proves to be Rodomont. Rogero accepts the challenge; and, after a dreadful combat, Rodomont is slain; with whose death the poem concludes.

Now, if my chart be true, these longing eyes
Will soon perceive the port in prospect rise,

The very poetical opening of this last Book, with the metaphor drawn from a ship, appears to be imitated by Spenser in the first book of his Fairy Queen, canto xii.

Behold I see the haven nigh at hand,
To which I mean my weary course to bend,
Vere the main sheet and bear up with the land,
The which afore is fairly to be ken'd, &c. St. i.

Now strike your sails, ye jolly mariners,
For we be come into a quiet road,
Where we must land some of our passengers,
And light this weary vessel of her load.

Here she awhile may make her safe abode,
Till she, repaired, have her tackles spent,
And wants supply'd—And then again abroad
On the long voyage whereto she is bent,
Well may she speed, and fairly finish her intent.

St. xiii.

And Dante, in the beginning of his second,

Per correr miglior acqua alza le vele
Homai la navecella del mio ingegno,
Che lascia dietro a se mar sì crudele.

Now let my Muse's vessel court the wind
With spreading sails, securer seas to find,
And leave the cruel stormy main behind.

Berni has borrowed the two first lines of Dante,
B h

Where to that power I hope my vows to pay,
Who safely led me such a length of way;
When late I fear'd a wandering course to keep,
Or scarce return, escaping from the deep,
With shrouds and tackle torn—But now behold
Th' approaching bay its welcome arms unfold!
Hark! how the sounds of transport rend the sky!
Hark! how the thunders o'er the billows fly! 10
I hear the clang of bells, and trumpets loud,
Mix'd with the tumults of the shouting crowd!
All seem rejoic'd to hail me near the shore,
My voyage finish'd, and my perils o'er!

Oh! with what fair and prudent dames around!
Oh! with what knights I see the harbor crown'd!
See Mamma² and Genevra³ grace the coast,
Lo! there the daisied train, Corregio's boast.
See these Veronica of Gamba's⁴ join,
So dear to Phebus and th' Jönian Nine! 20

Pursue the triumph, and partake the gale?

Essay on Man, ep. i.

² He mentions Genevra three times, but it does not clearly appear whether they are all different persons. Mamma is so where else mentioned in the work.

³ A general praise of the females of the family of Corregio. See Book xlii. Note to ver. 668.

⁴ Signora Veronica de Gamba, countess of Corregio, and sister to the cardinal of Gamba, composed many verses, that show great marks of genius, in close imitation of Bembo. Fornari.

⁵ Another Julia is mentioned, ver. 54, and particularly characterized; but it is uncertain whether they are different persons.

⁶ Supposed to be one of the family of Ludovico Sforza, so often mentioned.

⁸ Emilia Pia is spoken of in the Cortegiano of Castiglione with great praise. Fornari.

⁹ See Note on Book xlii. ver. 466.

¹⁰ This Diana is supposed here to be the same person that is celebrated in the xliid Book, ver. 652.

¹⁴ Julius Caesar having conquered Gaul, marched with his victorious army towards Rome in order to demand the consulship, but halted on the banks of the Rubicon, it being a decree among the Romans, that whoever passed that river in arms was an enemy to the state. Caesar, having debated some time with himself, he said that a man of a gigantic stature suddenly appeared, who, snatching a trumpet from one of the soldiers, sounded a charge, on which Caesar exclaimed aloud, "Let us go—the die is cast:" and immediately crossed the river with all his army.

¹⁵ Frederico Gonzaga, surnamed of Besolo, from a castle on the river Oglio, was a valiant commander celebrated in the wars of France. Fornari.

¹⁶ He here celebrates all the noble ladies of Bologna and Milan, of Ferrara, Urbino, and Mantua. Fornari.

¹⁸ Isabella della Colonna, kinswoman to Julia Gonzaga, and wife of Luigi Gatzolo. Fornari.

¹⁹ Marchioness of Vasto, the illustrious wife of Alphonso Davulo, daughter to Ferrante of Arago.

²⁰ Signora Giustina, wife to Ascanio of Colonna.

²³ Hercules, son of Francisco Gonzaga, a man of singular virtues, the last of the marquises of Mantua, and brother to Frederic the first duke, was by Clement VII. made a cardinal of Mantua. Lorenzo Campeius of Bologna, a learned churchman and civilian, he composed many treatises: he was likewise made a cardinal by Clement VII.

²⁴ Lactantius and Claudius Ptolemy were of the same family, and bore the name of Ptolemy. Claudius was an excellent poet. Trissino, of Venice, was well read in Greek literature; he published many works in prose and verse, and was author of the epic poem entitled Italia Liberata. Paulo Panza was a Genoese, and wrote elegant Latin verses.

Fornari.

²⁵ By the Roman Juvenal is meant Cortegiano, famous in the time of Leo X. and Clement.

Fornari.

²⁶ Pumphilo Sasso, of Madonna, wrote many verses, and composed in Latin. For Maria Molza, see Note to Book xxvii. ver. 790.

²⁷ Lelio Capilupi, of Mantua, wrote sonnets and Latin verses; the poet says Capilupi in the plural number, meaning likewise the brother, called Hippolino, and perhaps the other three, they being five in all.

Fornari.

²⁸ Julio Camillo, a Latin poet, who published many treatises, among which was The Theatre of Knowledge, by which he professed to shorten the road to learning, in allusion to the fables of Hesiod, of suddenly becoming a poet by dreaming of Parmeno, and drinking of the water of Helicon.

³² Sanga was a skillful arithmetician, and for that quality much valued by Clement. Francesco Berna was a canon of the cathedral church of Florence: he composed many elegant poems full of wit and satire.

³³ Marco Antonio Flaminio da Imola was a writer on sacred and philosophical subjects, and likewise an excellent Latin poet.

Fornari.

³⁴ This Alexander being raised to the pontificate, assumed the name of Paul III. and being himself a scholar, he was a pattern of genius and learning.

Fornari.

³⁵ Phædro de Volterra was of the household of cardinal Pompeo della Colonna, together with Camillo Portis. For Capello, see Note to Book xxvii. ver. 57.

³⁶ By the first, the poet is thought to have meant Philip, surnamed Beronido of Bologna, who was entertained by Leo X. and made librarian of the Vatican, in which post he died. Maddalena, famous at the Roman court, composed two ingenious epigrams upon Echo, which passed some time for ancient, and were much applauded.

Fornari.

³⁷ Blasio Balledio was secretary to Clement VII. and well deserved to be mentioned by Ariosto among the worthies of the age. Pierio was a gentleman of Cividale, a writer in prose and verse: he published the various readings of Virgil, and a treatise on the Sphere, and wrote also a book on Egyptian learning.

Fornari.

³⁸ Raffaello Volteranno, a man of deep learning, M. Girolamo Vida, of Cremona, wrote on sacred subjects in Latin verse.

Fornari.

³⁹ Giovanni Lascari was the noblest and most learned of all the Greeks that took shelter in Italy from the Ottoman arms. He was well received by Lorenzo of Medicis, and sent by him into Greece, to bring away the ancient Greek books: he lived in splendour, though he was supported by the liberality of others; and died at Rome. M. Musuro was born in Crete; an elegant poet: he came to Rome, was liberally patronized by Leo X. and made archbishop of Ragusa; and, before he died, arrived at the dignity of cardinal.

Fornari.

⁴⁰ Andrea Novagero, a Venetian gentleman, was under the discipline of M. Antonio Sabellico, while he publicly read lectures in the Greek and Latin: He wrote witty epigrams, free from all licentiousness, and was a great enemy to Martial. He likewise followed, at one time, the profession of arms. He died of a fever, brought on by violent fatigue, in the forty-seventh year of his age, the king of France lamenting his death, and paying him funeral honours.

Two Alexanders³⁰ more in yonder band:
There Orelogi and Guarino stand³¹:
Lo! Marius of Oliveto³²! lo! where shine

The scourge of power and all the tyrant line.

²⁸ Andrea Maroni was a great favourite of pope Leo, by whom he was crowned poet, for his talent of composing Latin verses extempore. Monaco Severo is said by some to be a monk of the monastery of Angels of Florence, and an intimate friend of Ariosto. He was author of many excellent compositions in prose and verse. Fornari.

²⁹ By one of these he means Alexander Orelogi, a nobleman of Padua; and by the other Alexander Guarino. Fornari.

³¹ Pietro Aretino, a native of Arezzo, in Tuscany, born about the year 1490; a man of mean birth, but wonderful genius. He composed many satires and criticisms on the works of the learned, and disquisitions on the actions of the great. His writings were held in universal repute: retiring to Venice, he turned the force of his satire against kings, and obtained thereby the title of The Scourge of Princes. King Francis I. the emperor Charles V. the princes of Italy, several cardinals, and other great lords, purchased his friendship by considerable presents, either in fear of the poignancy of his wit, or in admiration of his talents. Hence the insolence of Aretino increased so far that he caused a medal to be struck, representing himself on one side with these words, IT DIVINO ARETINO; and on the reverse he appeared seated on a throne, receiving presents from the ambassadors of princes, with this inscription, IT FRANCIS TRIBUTATI DA POPOLI TRIBUTANO IL SERVIZIO LORO. Prince who receive tributes from the people, pay tribute to their servant.

At last the growing reputation of Nicolo Franco, his rival, and some blows which he received in chastisement from some Italian noblemen, greatly humbled him. He at times debased his genius by the grossest impiety and licentiousness, and the reading of many of his works was prohibited by the church, particularly his Dialogues, Letters, Discourses, and Twenty Sonnets on impure subjects, designed by Julio Romano, which were engraved by Marc Antonio, for which the engraver was thrown into prison by Clement VII. Towards the end of his life he composed a Paraphrase on the Psalms, under the title of Aretino Penitente; of, as otherwise, of Parleno Eitro, being the anagram of his own name. He wrote likewise The Lives of the Blessed Virgin of St. Catharine, Thomas Aquinas, and others. He died at Venice about the year 1556, in the 66th year of his age, and was buried in the church of St. Luke; a melancholy instance, in many respects, of the perversion of great and extraordinary talents, while the following epitaph, which were written on him, must be an eternal stain to his memory:—

Next two Jeronimo³⁴, and next I spy
Leuciceno and Mainardo³⁵ nigh:
Celio and Panizzato, Theocrine³⁶:
Bernardo Capel here³⁷; and there is seen
Pietro Bembo³⁸, whose example taught,
And to its purity our idiom brought.

Condit Aretini cineres lapis iste sepultos,
Mortales atro qui sale perfricuit.
Intactus Deus est illi, causamque rogatus,
Hanc dedit: Ille, inquit, non mihi notus erit.

This marble covers Aretino's remains,
Whose venom'd gall on all mankind was thrown;
He touch'd not God in his unhallow'd strains,
This cause assign'd—God was to me unknown.

Qui quicquid Petri Aretini amari tunc
Del' sem humani, la cui lingua trassera
E vivi e morti; d' Iddio mai non disse,
E si scuso co' dir, I no' concesso.

Here Aretino, man's bitter poison, lies,
Whose tongue the living and the dead could blot;
Of God alone no ill could he devise,
And thus excus'd his pen—I know him not.

An Italian writer, speaking of Aretino, says,
"Se sarebbe affatto cancellata la memoria se P Ariosto burlandosi dell' titolo ch' egli si aveva prese indebitamente non avesse detto nel Furioso.

Ecco il flagello

De principi, il divin Pietro Aretino."

"He would probably have been forgotten if Ariosto, in the derision of the title which he had so unwarrantably assumed, had not said in his Furioso,
Behold the scourge
Of princes, the divi e Peter Aretino."

But surely there can be no reason to think that Ariosto meant to fix any stigma upon his name, when he introduces him among so many whom he evidently extols for some virtue or great quality. It is much more to be believed that the poet joins the general suffrage of mankind in extolling one, than probably in the zenith of his reputation.

See Fornari, Bayle, &c.

³⁴ Girolamo (Jerónimo) Verita, a gentleman of Verona, and a poet.

³⁵ Nicolo Leoniceo, an able physician, was the first who translated Galen from the Greek into the Italian tongue; he was a great philosopher, and continent and abstemious in the highest degree. He was in great favour with Hercules II. duke of Ferrara, and with his son Alphonso. He translated some of Lucian's Dialogues, and the History of Dion; and by the sobriety of his life attained, with health, the ninetyeth year of his age. Mainardo was a physician of Ferrara, who wrote Medical Epistles, and gave many illustrations of the principles of physic, not before known.

Fornari.

³⁶ Celio Calcagnino of Ferrara, and long time a tutor to youth, and patronized by the duke. His genius was fertile, but most approved in his elegiac compositions, his prose being esteemed rather dry and inelegant. Fornari.

³⁷ Bernardo Capello, a Venetian gentleman, and an esteemed Tuscan poet. Fornari.

³⁸ Cardinal Bembo, often before mentioned, was the first who, since the time of Petrarch and Boccaccio, had revived the Tuscan Muse. Fornari.

See Gaspero Obizo ⁴⁷ next in place,
Who joys the fruits of Bembo's pen to trace.
With Fracastoro ⁴⁸, Bevezano ⁴⁹ here
I see, and Trifon Gabriele ⁵⁰ near:
See Tasco ⁵¹ distant from the noble crew: 120
Now Nicholo Tiepolo ⁵² I view:
With him see Nicholo Amario ⁵³ bend
On me his eyes; Fulgoso see ⁵⁴ attend
My prosperous course; and joy with wonders show
To view me near the land the billows plough.
Lo! my Valerio ⁵⁵ from the female traip
Steps forth, and seems a converse to maintain
With Barignan ⁵⁶, attending at his side,
How best defence in future to provide
Against the flames with which he still has burn'd
For that soft sex that ill his love return'd. 130
See grac'd with gifts, all human gifts above,
Pico and Pio ⁵⁷, join'd by blood and love.
With these I one behold, by nose excell'd,
Whom yet these longing eyes have ne'er beheld,

⁴⁷ A gentleman of Padua, chiefly known by the friendship of Bembo. Fornari.

⁴⁸ Girolamo Fracastoro, a physician of Verona, a poet, and writer on astrology in prose. Bevezano, a Venetian courtier, well known in the time of Leo X. and Clement: he afterwards led a retired life. Fornari.

⁵¹ A noble Venetian senator of great authority, one of the first reformers of Papuan studies. Fornari.

⁵² A gentleman of Cremona, and a doctor; he composed many verses. Fornari.

⁵³ It is imagined that the poet means Antonio Fulgoso, a Genoese, who had the command of four of his country galleys. Fornari.

⁵⁵ Piero Barignan, of Passara, a courtier at Rome in the time of Leo X. he wrote elegant verses, and was a member of the Roman academy. Fornari.

⁵⁶ Giovan Francesco Pico, count of Milanola, justly entitled the Phoenix, for the splendour of his birth and his rare endowments of body and mind. His works were well known. He died young, in the xxth year of his age, in 1491, ten years before Ariosto began his poem. Alberto Pio was born of an ancient and honourable family; he was a man of letters, and skilled in the profession of arms; he died at Paris, not much advanced in years, at the time that Charles V. and Solyman met near Vienna. Pico and Pio were related by a common descent from Manfredi. Fornari.

Great Sannazarius ⁵⁷, who the Muses' train
From mountains led to dwell beside the main.
Behold Pistophilo ⁵⁸, unblissful'd found,
For learning and for industry renown'd.
Th' Acciavoli and Anghisri here ⁵⁹,
No more my safety on the ocean fear. 140
Annibal Malaguzzi next I see ⁶⁰,
(My kinsman lov'd); then equal in degree
Good Adoardo; these, in future days,
I trust, the honour of my house shall raise ⁶¹,
And bear from Calpe's heights to Ind our lineal
praise.

Victorius Faustos ⁶², Tancred, hundreds more,
With welcome hail my glad approach to shore,
Dames, knights, and nobles of the gallant crew,
Seem all with joy my safe return to view;
Then let us speed the bark with every sail, 150
Since short the remnant course, and fair the gale.

Now turn we to Melissa, and relate
Her friendly aid t' avert Rogero's fate;
That wise Melissa, whose benign intent,
To Branimant and her Rogero bent,
Had ever watch'd, with fond maternal care,
What good or ill befel the faithful pair.
That wish on every wish and act conspir'd
To see that union which her soul desir'd,
Commanded now her spirits to and fro, 160
By magic art on her behests to go;

⁵⁷ Jacobo Sannazario, a Neapolitan, was born and bred at Naples, received into the familiarity of Federico of Aragon, and followed that prince in his misfortunes. He composed many things in Latin and in the Tuscan language. He wrote pious eclogues, and a serious poem, entitled, De partu Virginis. He died by a disease, brought on by vexation at seeing Margellina, his favourite village, laid waste by Philliberto Aurentio, one of the emperor's generals, and was buried in this place, in a church dedicated by him to the Virgin Mary. Fornari.

⁵⁸ M. Buonaventura Pistophilo was secretary to the duke of Ferrara, to whom Ariosto dedicates his seventh satire. Fornari.

⁵⁹ The three Acciavoli, of Florentine original, were at the court of Ferrara in Ariosto's time, when the edition of 1532 was published (for no mention is made in that of 1515). The elder was named Pietro Antonio, the son Giacomo, and the nephew Archelao. All three are recorded as excellent poets by Lilio Gregorio Giraldi, in his second dialogue, De poetis nostrorum temporum. Fornari.

⁶⁰ He calls this Annibal his kinsman, because the poet's mother was of the house of Malaguzzi. Fornari.

⁶¹ Rheggio, where the poet was born.

⁶² Victorio Fausto read Greek in Venice, with a provision of five hundred crowns, and two hundred more for superintending the galleys of the arsenal. Fornari.

For the rest of the illustrious persons, of both sexes, here immortized by the poet, Fornari, the Italian commentator, from whom the foregoing Notes are taken, declares, that he had not been able to come to the knowledge of them; yet Fornari's Commentary was written only sixteen years after Ariosto's death. He observes, that probably some of these were private friends, whose names were never handed down but in the records of the poet.

And still as one went forth, another came
 With tidings gather'd for his anxious dame,
 By these she learnt that good Rogero lay
 In desert wilds, to pining grief a prey,
 With dire resolve t' abstain from all repeat
 Of strengthening food, and waste with cruel fast
 His wretched life: but soon Melissa gave
 Her pitying aid the love-lorn knight to save.
 To seek him out her dwelling she forsook, 170
 And took, by chance, the path that Leon took:
 The prince she met, who late had sent before
 His envoys every region to explore;
 And now in person went with anxious mind
 The champion of the unicorn to find.

The sage enchantress, who a demon rein'd,
 That day, in likeness of a steed, constrain'd
 The saddle and the curbing bit to bear,
 Thus met with Constantine's imperial heir.

"If in your souls such courteous thoughts reside,
 As your fair noble mien bespeaks, she cried, 181
 Vouchsafe your aid and comfort to a knight,
 First of this age in virtue as in might,
 Who, if some power afford not swift relief,
 Draws near the period of his life and grief.
 The bravest knight that ever at his side
 The sword has girt, or to his breast apply'd
 The cuirass bright, that ever yet could wield
 The beamy spear, or lift the fencing shield;
 The gentlest, comeliest youth the world has 190
 known

In ancient times, or boasted in our own;
 For one unheav'd of act, in friendship's cause,
 Without some aid to life's sad period draws.
 Then deign, O prince! to view his wretched state,
 And prove if aught can yet avert his fate."
 She ceas'd: and Leon, who in thought divin'd
 That 't was he, the knight he wish'd to find,
 Pursu'd, without delay, the path she led,
 To snatch so brave a warrior from the dead;
 And ere they far had pierc'd the desert way, 200
 They came where next to death Rogero lay:
 They found him weak and spent, so nearly past
 All human help, with three days cruel fast,
 That scarce was vigour left him from the plain
 To rear his bulk, but all his strength in vain
 Had prov'd his trembling members to sustain.
 Out-stretch'd he lay, with armour cover'd o'er,
 His head the casque, his side the falchion bore;
 His pillow rude the famous targe he made,
 Whose field the snow-white unicorn display'd: 210
 There, while he griev'd how ill his deed return'd
 The faithful love with which his mistress burn'd,
 He sigh'd—he rav'd—he call'd himself ingrate,
 That gave the bitterest dregs of cruel fate
 To her he lov'd; while tears his face o'erflow'd,
 While every look and frantic gesture show'd
 His fix'd despair, and, lost to all beside,
 Nor Leon nor Melissa he deserv'd:
 Nor, at their sight, his tears or plaints suppress'd,
 Nor stopt the sighs deep bursting from his breast.

Leon attentive stood his speech to hear, 221
 Then left his steed, and now advancing near,
 He found that love had pierc'd his bleeding heart,
 But knew not her whose love had wing'd the dart:
 For while Rogero's lips his sorrows show'd,
 They nam'd not her from whom his sorrows flow'd.
 Near and more near the prince advancing drew,
 Till face to face he stood in open view;
 Then with a brother's warmth the youth address'd,
 Lay at his side, and clasp'd him to his breast. 230

Yet much I doubt the brave despairing knight
 Rejoic'd but little at his Leon's sight,
 From whose known zeal he well might fear to find
 A purpose to prevent his death design'd.

With gentlest words that friendship could impart
 To soothe the anguish of a wounded heart,
 Thus Leon spoke—"Refuse not to disclose
 The secret cause from which thy sorrow rose:
 Few are the pangs which human kind endure,
 But knowledge of the wound may point the cure:
 Tell me thy grief—while yet of life possess, 241
 Ah! let us ne'er of hope our souls divest.
 It grieves me sore, what touch'd thy woe or weal,
 Thou shouldst from me thy truest friend conceal:
 Not only now by friendship firmly ty'd,
 No time henceforth our union shall divide;
 Put from that moment, when thy victor sword
 Seem'd every cause of hatred to afford,
 Thou still wert mine, and mightst from me receive Whatever my wealth, my friends, my life could 250 give!

Decline not then t' impart thy secret grief,
 And leave a friend to work a friend's relief.
 Should all my help be fruitless to remove Thy soul's distress—the last sad refuge prove
 Of welcome death—but ah! such thoughts refrain,
 Till every human aid is try'd in vain."

He said; and with such friendly warmth address'd
 His soothing speech, and urg'd the dear request,
 That sad Rogero's heart, not fram'd of steel
 Or harden'd adamant, but made to feel 260
 Fair friendship's power, refus'd not to comply
 With what he deem'd discourteous to deny.
 Yet thrice he strove to speak, while on his tongue,
 With open lips, the faltering accents hung.

At length he spoke—"When I, O prince! proclaim

(As soon I shall) my unexpected name;
 Trust me, thou wilt no more oppose my fate,
 But rather wish this object of thy hate
 A speedier death—In me Rogero view!
 Whose rage so lately could thy life pursue; 270
 Who for this cause the Christian court forsook,
 And to thy camp his hostile journey took,
 Left Bradamant, obtain'd from me, should fill Thy happier arms; well known that Amon's will Favour'd thy suit—but since man's erring kind
 Oft plans what God has other far design'd,
 Thy unachless courtesy, O prince! repress'd
 The vengeful purpose of my jealous breast.
 Not only former hatred I resign'd,
 But to thy welfare all my thoughts inclin'd. 280
 Thou pray'dst me (little conscious that thy prayer Rogero urg'd) to win the peerless fair—
 To win for thee!—and, ah! thou mightst as well
 From this sad heart the vital flame expel:
 Yet ah! too sure the dear event has shown,
 If thy desires I priz'd beyond my own.
 Lo! Bradamant is thine!—secure with her
 Thy happiness, which I to mine prefer:
 But since to me she's lost—wilt thou deny 290
 My woe the only privilege to die?
 What can this breast of wretched life deprive,
 If I the loss of Bradamant survive?
 Yet more—thou canst not, while I live, address
 A lawful plea the virgin to possess:
 Oft have our names been join'd in nuptial vows,
 Nor can she link with me a second spouse."

When Leon, in his friend, Rogero view'd,
 Awhile unmov'd in silent gaze he stood:

Fix'd as a sculptur'd form memorial stands,
In some fair temple rais'd by pious hands. 500
He deem'd an act so courteous must excel
Whate'er the past or present times can tell.
When sudden thus Rogero stood confess'd,
No less affection warm'd his generous breast;
No less he for Rogero's sufferings bore,
Than once for him Rogero felt before:
And hence, to prove him worthy of his line,
Th' imperial heir of royal Constantine,
He will'd, howe'er in prowess left behind,
To emulate Rogero's courteous mind. 510

Then thus—"If on that memorable day
When to thy valiant arm my camp gave way,
Thy hated name to me had stood reveal'd,
(Thy name, Rogero, till this hour conceal'd,)
Still had thy worth no less my favour won,
Than when I view'd thy deeds, thyself unknown:
The love I bear thee now, alike confess
E'en then had banish'd hatred from my breast.
Rogero's name I loath'd before I knew
That to thyself this hated name was due. 520
Thus far I own—but think not what before
My hatred rais'd can raise my hatred more.
For had I known (when doom'd to racking pains
I sat thee free from Theodora's chains)
What since I know—my soul had still pursu'd
As now, whate'er might work thy future good.
If from my hand such friendship couldst thou prove,
Not bound by sacred ties of grateful love;
Should I not now thy dearest wish pursue,
Oh! I were basest of th' ungrateful crew. 530
Self-rob'd of every bliss, thy bosom ow'd
To Heaven and love—on me thou hast bestow'd
Th' invaluable gift—but, lo! to thee I give
Th' invaluable gift again, and bid thee live.
Happier in this, thy anguish to relieve,
Than from thy hand the virgin to receive.
No claim have I—to thee belongs her heart:
What though I love her for her high desert,
Should she another wed, my secret grief,
Not fix'd as thine, might find from time relief. 540
Ah! can I wish that death should loose the bands
That hold, in nuptial league, your plighted hands,
And give me, eas'd of every rival strife,
To take the virgin for my lawful wife?—
Not her alone—but all the world can give
I here abjure—O let me cease to live,
Rather than men shall say, one thought distress'd.
Through me, the peace of such a champion's breast!
Yet let me here thy doubts unkind reprove,
That thou, who like thy own my soul canst move,
Whose will is mine, shouldst sooner choose to die
Than on my friendly zeal for help rely." 550

These words, and many more, which, long to tell,
From Leon's lips in soft persuasion fell,
With reasons justly weigh'd, at length subdu'd
Rogero's purpose, who no more pursu'd
His dire resolve—"I yield, I yield!" he said,
"Nor longer seek to mingle with the dead.
But what to thee is due, whose saving breath 559
Has twice redeem'd me from the stroke of death?"
Then costly viands, and meats of flavoured taste,
Melissa's care before Rogero plac'd,
And with kind words consol'd the gentle knight,
Whose fainting spirit stood prepar'd for flight.
Meantime Frontino, who the neighing heard
Of kindred coursers, from the woods appear'd:
Him Leon bade th' attending squires receive,
And rais'd and saddled to his master give,

Who, led by Leon, scarce, with trampling feet
And sinking knees, could mount his wooted seat. 570
So was that strength decay'd, that strength which late

Had, 'midst an army, scatter'd death like fate,
When drest with cuirass, helm, and shield unknown,
The Greeks by him beheld their camp o'erthrown.

Now from the wood these three their way pursue,
And soon an abbey's friendly walls they view,
Whose kind retreat receives each welcome guest:
That day, and two succeeding days they rest,
Till, by the slumbering couch and genial board
The champion of the unicorn restor'd 580
To pristine vigour, with th' enchantress dame,
And Leon, to th' imperial city came.

These chosen envoys were receiv'd but late
On solemn business, from Bulgaria's state;
The grateful state that to their regal throne
Rogero chose, and doom'd in France alone
To find their prince, and thither sent to bring,
From royal Charles, their new elected king.
That each to him might pay a subject's vows,
And with the diadem enwrap his brows. 590

With these ambassadors the squire appear'd,
From whom the tidings of his lord were heard;
How near Belgrado's walls Rogero fought,
What deeds his valour for Bulgaria wrought,
When Leon and his sire his arm o'erthrew,
And all th' imperial host dispers'd or slew:
For which the victors vow'd to him their crown,
Rejecting every ruler of their own.

And how, in Novogrado's walls betray'd,
The youth by stern Unguardo was convey'd 600
To Theodora's hands; when soon was spread
The certain rumour of the keeper dead,
The prison open'd, and the prisoner fled.
But now by tidings or surmise could tell
What fortune since the noble knight befel.

Now observ'd, with treatments not his own,
Rogero enter'd Charles' imperial town
Through private ways; and at the morning light
With Leon came, before the emp'r's sight.
Rogero held, with double branching head, 610
The golden eagle on a field of red;

And, as agreed, the Grecian habit wore,
And all those arms which in the list he bore;
With every mark of that day's fight confess'd.
With riven plate, pierc'd mail, and batter'd crest;
That each believ'd in him the knight they view'd⁶²,
Who Bradamant in equal fight subdu'd.
With him, unarm'd, came Leon at his side,
Array'd in costly robes with regal pride;
And all around the prince was seen to wait 620
A train that well besem'd his lofty state.

To Charles he bow'd, who from his sovereign sent Already rose the noble pair to meet.
Good Leon by the hand Rogero led,
On whom all eyes were fix'd, and thus he said:

"Lo! here the knight, who late sustain'd the fray
From morning's early dawn till close of day.
Since Bradamant nor made him prisoner yield,
Nor slew, nor drove him, vanquish'd, from the field,
If rightly he conceives your high decree, 630
He asks, O king! the meed of victory,
The virgin won—and comes from thee to take
That hand, which valour thus his own could make.

⁶² For a remark on this passage, see Book xlv, ver. 567.

Though, from thy late disposal, none shall dare
Contend with him to woe the matchless fair;
Yet say, if courage may deserve the dame,
What other knight shall urge a nobler claim?
If he must win, who holds her most above
Her lovely sex, what heart like his can love?
And here he stands, prepar'd in single fight, 440
With arms undaunted to defend his right."

Imperial Charles, and all his court, amaz'd,
When this they heard, awhile in silence gaz'd;
Each deem'd that Leon had the combat won,
And not this knight, who seem'd to all unknown.

Morphisa, who, with many a noble peer,
Stood silent by, scarce gave a patient ear
Till Leon ceas'd; but with disdain inflam'd,
Stept forth, and thus in hasty words exclaim'd:

"Since absent hence, Rogero is deny'd" 450
T'assert his title to the plighted bride,
Lest, wanting friends to yield a generous aid,
Another undisputed should invade
His sacred rights—Lo! I, his sister, dare
The boldest he, who rashly shall declare
For Bradamant a lover's boasted name,
Or vie presumptuous with Rogero's claim."

Sternly she spoke; and from her eyes appear'd
Such fiery glances, that th' assistants fear'd,
Lest, not awaiting lies by Charles prepar'd, 460
Her hand had then some deed of vengeance dar'd.
Leon no more Rogero now conceal'd.

But, lifting up his helm⁶, his face reveal'd:
Then to Morphisa turn'd—"Behold," he cried,
"Himself appears the contest to decide!"⁷
As old Egeus gaz'd⁸, with ghastly hue,

When at the direful board his son he knew,
To whom he, by his impious wif' impell'd,
In ruthless ire the deadly poison held:
Who, had not then the monarch's eyes decay'd
The fatal sword, had by his father died: 470

So look'd Morphisa, when, by Leon shown,
She found Rogero in the knight unknown:
Sudden around his much-lov'd neck she clung
With eager grasp, and at his bosom hung.

Orlando then, Rinaldo then express'd
Their love; but first imperial Charles address'd
The noble youth: "Nix Olivero hold,
Not gallant Basilon, nor Scirino old,
Could from his wish'd embrace their arms withhold, 480

Knights, heroes, Paladins, alike enjoy'd
The happy change, that every thought employ'd.
Leon, whose lips in speaking could excel,
At length, these generous done, began to tell
Refore the king and nobles of the state
(Who stood to hear the prince his tale relate)
How brave Rogero's matchless strength in arms,
Though prov'd to his aid to his people's harms,

Could at Belgrado more excite his love,
Than all his realm endur'd his hatred move: 490
That, when to torture doom'd by her whose hands
Detai'd the noble knight in cruel bands,
He, mindless of the ties of blood, reliev'd
The wretched captive, and from death reliev'd;
Then how Rogero, from his prison freed,
Repaid the service with a generous deed,
That past nor future ages could exceed.
He told, how inj'ly stung with deep despair,
When for his friend he wou the impartial fair, 500
The knight resolv'd to die, and verg'd on death,
When timely aid prolong'd his fleeting breath:
And in such moving phrase the tale he dress'd,
That not an eye the feeling tear suppress'd.

He ended here; and then persuasive wou'd
Relentless Amen, till his words subdu'd
Tenuous age, not only from his thought
Drove his first purpose, but so far he wrought,
Amen refus'd not at Rogero's hand
To plead excuse, and urge the nuptial band; 510
Respeaking now the youth to crown his vows,
T'accept in him his sire, in Bradamant his spouse,
Soon to the virgin, where retir'd she sat,
And mourn'd the turns of her disastrous fate,
With gladsome accents many a tongue convey'd
The happy news, which, when the love-lost maid
At first receiv'd, the blood around her heart
By grief collected, from that vital part
So sudden flew, as near with joy had left
Her chilly frame of life itself bereft: 520
All trembling and unner'd her feet in vain,
With strength exhausted, would her weight sustain,
Though such her courage and her force made known

In many a fight, as oft the Muse has shown,
Not greater joy the wretch condemn'd can feel,
When sentenc'd by the gibbet, axe, or wheel,
To shameful death; or when the hangman's hand
Has fold'd o'er his sight the fatal band:
If chance his ears th' unhop'd-for sound receive
Of that best voice which brings his life's reprieve.

With transport Clacmont and Mograms view'd
Between each house what union fair ensu'd:
Not less Anselmo old and Gano⁹ mourn'd:
Not less Giammi, Gini, Fabron burn'd
With envious rage, while aach, with outward smiles,
Conceal'd a bosom fraught with serpent guiles,
To plaa, in future time, the murderous snare:
As lurks the crafty fox to seize the hare.
Of these had numbers (a degenerate train)
Fall'n by Orlando and Rinaldo slain. 540
Though oft the prudent king th' effects suppress'd,
Of what each treacherous mind might else suggest,
And still'd their plaints; yet Bertolagi kill'd,
With Pinaubel, their breasts with fury fill'd, where he found all the city in confusion by the machinations of Medes, who, at the arrival of Theseus, made him suspected by Egeus, and persuaded the king to destroy him at a banquet by poison: but fortunately, as the youth reached out his hand to receive the cup, Egeus perceived his sword, and, embracing him, acknowledged him for his son.

6 Ancient enemies to the houses of Charlemain;
Orlando and Rinaldo, so often mentioned by Boyardo, and other romance writers.

7 The whole of this episode of Leon and Rogero is admirably supported, and few discoveries can be imagined more interesting than this of Rogero.

8 Egeus, king of Athens, being on his travels entertained at the house of Pittacus, in Trozene, had an intrigue with Era his daughter, and when he departed left with her his sandals and sword, charg'd by her, if she should be brought-to-bed of a boy, to send him to Athens with these tokens. She was afterwards delivered of Theseus; who being grown up, took the sword and sandals, deposited

While what they knew, as half unknown they feign'd,
And deep conceal'd their rancorous thoughts restrain'd.

Th' ambassadors, that from Bulgaria sent,
(As late I told) to Charles impatient went,
In hopes that valiant knight, their king design'd,
The champion of the unicorn to find; 550
When him they met, they blest the happy hour
That to their wish could him they sought restore,
Their chief besor'd! and him on bending knees
Imploer'd with them Bulgaria's realms to see,
And visit Adrianople's regal town
That kept for him the sceptre and the crown.
Their hopes on him they plac'd, with conquering arms

To guard their threaten'd state in new alarms:
For Constantine in person, with a force
More numerous, thither bent his threaten'd course:
But with their king Rogero's presence blest, 561
They hop'd from Greece th' imperial sway to wrest.

Won by their gratitude, and loyal prayer,
Rogero gave consent the crown to wear;
And vow, if fought his purpose should withstand,
In three short months to reach Bulgaria's land.
Leon Augustus, at the converse nigh,
Here bade Rogero on a prince rely;
That since his hand Bulgaria's sceptre sway'd,
With them and Constantine the peace was made;
Nor need he hasten his departure thence 571
To head the legions for the realm's defence;
But pledg'd his honour (in his father's name)
Of all his conquests to renounce the claim.

No virtue that Rogero's soul possess'd,
Could move so far th' ambitious mother's breast,
Or to her love her promis'd son endear,
As join'd with his the name of king to bear.

The nuptials were perform'd with splendid pride,
As suited royal Charles, whose hand supply'd 580
The princely sums, and every honour frain'd,
As if from him a daughter's blood she claim'd.
Such was the virgin's worth, (nor need we join
To hers the worth of all her noble line).
The generous prince had scarcely deem'd it lost,
Though half his realm were wasted in the cost.
He bade, by sound of trumpet, wide proclaim
An open court, where each unquestion'd came;
And granted, till the ninth revolving day, 590
Free lists for all to meet in martial play.

Amid the plain he rear'd delightful bowers
Of twining branches, wreath'd with odoriferous flowers,
Where silk and gold display'd such blended light,
No eye had e'er beheld so fair a sight;
For not the walls of Paris could contain,
From various nations, such a countless train,
There rich and poor; there all degrees on Earth,
Of Grecians, Latian, and Barbarian birth, [late
Throughout the world: that tongue can scarce re-
The lords and envoys sent from every state; 600
All lodg'd at ease, in various shelters spread,
From rich pavilions, to the humble shed.

The night before, the sage divining dame
Had bent her ears the nuptial couch to frame,
And nuptial tent, for that great day design'd:
That day for ever present to her mind.
Long had she wish'd to see this pair unite
Their plighted hands in Hymen's holy rite; Since, from their stock, she knew what race must prove
The happy fruit of their connubial love. 610

And now, the genial bed Melissa plac'd
Amidst a wide pavilion, richly grac'd
With every art, beyond the proudest cost
That peace can furnish, or that war can boast.
This work of skill on Thracia's distant shore
From Constantine the wise enchantress bore,
With Leon's fair consent—but more to raise
The prince's wonder, and the court's amaze;
To show her matchless power, that could retain
Th' infernal dragon⁷ in her curbing chain 620
Of him, as suited her designs, dispose;
And all the bend of God's rebellious foes;
From vast Constantinople's regal towers
To Paris walls, by help of Egyptian powers,
This rich pavilion at the noon of day,
From Constantine who held imperial sway,
Through air she brought, and in the field she spread,
A sumptuous lodgment for Rogero's bed.
The feast complete, again the nuptial tent
To Constantine by miracle she sent. 630

Two thousand years had circled since a dame,
Of Ilion's race, employ'd her hand to frame
The wondrous work: her Heaven-instructed mind
Here great events of future days design'd.
Cassandra⁸ was her name: this tent she gave
Her brother Hector, bravest of the brave:
In texture fair of blended silks and gold,
She here had pictur'd, beautiful to behold,
The gentlest knight, that from his noblest race
Through rolling years a distant age should grace.
This Hector, as her gift, rejoic'd to take, 641
For the gift's value, and the giver's sake,
And priz'd till death: but when, by treason slain⁹,
He fell, and Greeks subdu'd the Trojan train;
When Sinon to his friends the gates unbarr'd,
And worse ensu'd than words have yet declar'd,
This tent, by lot, was Menelaus' share:
This tent he chose, and in Egypt's realm to bear,
There for his wife, of whom he stood bereft
By Proteus' hand¹⁰, with him the gift he left: 650

⁸ Daughter to Priam.

⁹ Ariosto, with the romantic writers in general, whenever the siege of Troy is alluded to in his poem, gives the story a partial turn in favour of the Trojans, from whose great hero Rogero is said to derive his origin. In the xxxivth Book, he makes St. John impute the account given by Homer of the Grecian heroes and heroines to the venality of the poet. He always speaks of the death of Hector as brought about by treachery. To this we may observe, that our great countryman, Shakspeare, whose materials are often drawn from popular stories, particularly from an old story book of the siege of Troy, has, in his Tronius and Cressida, represented the characters of the Trojans superior to the Greeks, and has made Achilles kill Hector at an unfair advantage.

¹⁰ Ariosto here alludes to a story of Helen told by Herodotus, that Paris, returning with Helen from Troy, was received by Proteus king of Egypt, who afterwards sending away Paris, detained

Helen her name, the loveliest of her kind,
 For whom to Proteus he the gift resign'd,
 Then to the Ptolemies in due descent
 It fell; and next to Cleopatra went;
 Till in the seas of dread Lacedæaia lost,
 It swell'd the plunder of Agrippa's boat;
 And by Augustus and Tiberius gain'd,
 Preserv'd at Rome till Constantine remain'd:
 That Constantine, for whom, while Heaven shall turn

 Around the pole, Nalia's sons will mourn. 660
 When Constantine remov'd from Tiber's shore,
 The precious tent he to Byzantium bore.
 This from another Constantine, the maid
 In magic skill'd, to distant France convey'd.

Rich cords of gold the fair pavilion strain'd,
 An ivory pole the canopy sustain'd:
 There comelier forms embroider'd rose to view,
 Than e'er Apelles' wondrous pencil drew.
 There gaily clad, in shining robes, are seen
 The Graces three, ministrant to a queen 670
 In matron throats⁷¹, of whom a child is born
 To bless his age, and all mankind adorn.
 See near him Jove, and speech-fam'd Hermes stand,

 And Mars and Venus: with unsparring hand
 Each sheds the tribute of ethereal flowers,
 And roscets unguents in celestial showers!
 The infant swaths in letter'd gold proclaim
 Hippolito—a future glorious name!

In riper years his Fortune shall convey
 Through every deed, and Virtue lead the way. 680
 The sign'd work a foreign train express'd,
 With length of hair and long-descending vest;
 These envoys from Corvino⁷² to require
 The growing infant of his tender sire:
 His parting duty Hæcuba receives:
 His mother Læonora next he leaves:
 The Danube now he gains, where round him pour
 The thronging tribes, and as a God adore.
 Hungaria's prudent king with wonder bears
 Such ripening knowledge in such early years; 690
 To his young merits every honour pays,
 And o'er his barons gives him sovereign praise.
 In sign of trust he to his infant hand
 Consigns the sceptre of Strigonia's land:

Helen, with all her treasure, at his court; and Ariosto here relates, that she was ransomed by Menelaus for this tent, which he gave to Proteus.

Eugenico, Porcacchi.

⁷¹ Leonora of Aragon, daughter of Ferdinando king of Naples, to whom the poet here gives the title of queen, married to duke Hercules I. by whom she had Hippolito of Este, Ariosto's patron, whose birth is here celebrated.

⁷² Beatrice, sister of Leonora, and wife of the great Mateo Corvino king of Hungary, being without children, sent for young Hippolito from his parents; who arriving in Hungary, was received by the king with every mark of esteem and affection, and afterwards made archbishop of Strigonie, before he had arrived at eighteen years of age. Ludovico Sforza, called Il Moro, the duke of Milan, who had married Beatrice, the sister of Hippolito, hearing of his great virtues, procured for him the bishopric of Milan; after which, being very young, he was created cardinal, and taken to assist him in the government.

Still at his side the youth his place maintains,
 Or in the palace, or the tented plains.
 Whene'er the monarch takes his glorious stand
 Against the German or the Turkish band,
 Hippolito is near to catch the flame
 Of early virtue from his patron's fame. 700

See Fusco near⁷³ attends with counsel sage,
 To point the senses of learning's ancient page:
 "Wouldst thou the mead of glory keep in view,
 This path reject, and that with zeal pursue."
 He seem'd to say—so well the figures wrought.
 By matchless art express'd the maker's thought.
 Soon in the Vatican behold him plac'd
 A stripling cardinal—while prudence, grac'd
 With soft persuasion, from his lip distils,
 And with surprise the hallow'd conclave fills. 710

What shall he prove when riper age be bears?
 (Thus each to each, in wonder rapt, declares)
 "Oh! should he e'er be cloth'd in Peter's vest,
 What robe so hallow'd, and what time so blest!
 Lo! there, are games and sports depictur'd view'd,
 The pastimes by th' illustrious youth pursu'd;
 Who now on Alpine heights the woodland bears,
 And now wild boars in fen and valley darts.

Borne on a course that outstrips the wind,
 He holds in chase the goat or faster hind; 720
 Till these o'er taken crown his rustic toils,
 The bleeding victims of his forest spoils!
 Behold him there amid the learned band
 Of sage philosophers and poets stand:
 One sets to view the planetary tribes,
 While one the Heavens, and one the Earth describes!
 These mournful elegy or joyous verse;
 Those epic strains or sprightly odes rehearse.

Music he hears in dulcet notes, that roll
 To lull the passions, or to fire the soul! 730

Thus lively painted in the tints of truth
 Was seen the childhood of the godlike youth,
 Cassandra there his virtues gave to see;
 His prudence, justice, valour, modesty;
 And that fifth virtue⁷⁴, which with these combines,
 Through which each other more exalted shines.
 Lo! there the youth, who now companion stands
 With him who hapless⁷⁵ rules th' Insubrian bands,
 With him in peace he sits, and counsel holds;
 With him in war the banner'd snakes unfolds, 740
 With him he seems one equal task to share
 In days of triumph, and in days of care;
 In fight he follows, comforts him in grief,
 And yields in danger aid; in pain, relief.
 See! where he sees each anxious thought to wake,
 For good Alphonso and Ferrara's sake.
 He meditates, with every art, to find
 The treason lurking in the traitor's mind,
 And to his noble brother shall declare
 What guile the nearest of his kin prepares. 750
 For which he to that title builds a claim,
 Which Rome of old annex'd to Tully's name⁷⁶.

⁷³ Tommaso Fusco, first tutor to Hippolito, and afterwards his private secretary. Casio Calcagnino dedicated to him his translation of Lucian.

⁷⁴ What the poet means by the fifth virtue is uncertain. Perhaps charity may be said to ennoble all the other virtues.

⁷⁵ Ludovico Sforza, duke of Milan, deposed by Lewis XII.

⁷⁶ Cicero was called father of his country, see

In other parts, with shining arms array'd,
He flies to give the threaten'd church his aid,
And with a few undisciplin'd oppose
A numerous host of well-appointed foes:
Alone his presence can suffice to cheer
The holy brethren, and relieve their fear,
And he whose hand so soon the flame repell'd, 759
May justly boast—I came—I saw—and quell'd?⁷⁷
Behold, where near his own paternal shore
He meets in arms the strongest naval power,
That ever yet from Venice' sea-girt race
Was sent the Turks or Argive force to face.
He this subdues, and to his brother's hand
Each captive gives, with all the spoils obtain'd,
And only to himself reserves that fame
He ne'er can graft upon another's name.

The knights and dames beheld with eyes intent,
But knew not what the mystic figures meant;⁷⁷ 770
Since none so learn'd was present to relate
These shadow'd emblems of succeeding fate:
Yet all with pleasure gaz'd, their sight amus'd
With each fair form, and all the scrolls perus'd.
But Bradamant alone the story knew,
Which she from sage Melissa's converse drew.
Roger, though his mind was here untaught,
Compar'd with Bradamant, yet he to thought
Recall'd, how midst his future race enroll'd,
Of this Hippolito Atlantes told, 780
And oft was wont his honours to unfold.

What verse the courteous praises can report
Of royal Charles, and all his splendid court?
Pleasures still new the festive hours afford,
And pteuous viands crown the smiling board.
Each hardy knight his hardy deeds essays,
Each day a thousand shiver'd spears displays:
By foot, by horse, are various battles wag'd,
Some pair'd, and some in mingled rout engag'd.
But o'er the rest Rogero bears the fame, 790
And wins the palm from every rival name;
In wrestling and the dance, in every kind
Of youthful feats he leaves the rest behind.

The last great day, ere games and tilting ceas'd,
The nobles seated at the solemn feast,
Where Charles upon his left Rogero plac'd,
And lovely Bradamant his right hand grac'd;
Lo! pacing o'er the plain, appear'd in view
A knight all-arm'd, who near th' assembly drew;
Himself, his steed with sable cover'd o'er, 800
His stature large, and semblance proud he bore:
This knight was Sarza's king, who smit with shame
What time the virgin at the bridge o'ercame

having delivered the republic from the conspiracy of Calisto.

⁷⁷ Julius Caesar having obtained a victory over Pharnaces king of Pontus, wrote to his friends in Rome this laconic account of his success, Veni, vidi, vici! Tasso has, like Ariosto, made a familiar use of these words in the xvith book of the Jerusalem, where the sultan of Egypt commissions Emerice to lead his army to the assistance of Atidat against the Christians.

⁷⁸ In the old poem of Aspramonte, is a description of the bridal bed of Rogero and Gallicella, the father and mother of our Rogero, from which, possibly, Ariosto might take his hint for the pavilion and bed here described.

See Aspramonte, c. x.

His boasted might, had sworn themselves to quit
His sword and arms, nor reis the fanning bit;
But like a hermit, in some lonely cell,
A year a month and day⁷⁹ in penance dwell:
So punish'd on himself each ancient knight
His honour tarnish'd by successful fight:
Though yet of Charles he heard loud rumour tell,
And what events the king his lord befel: 811
True to his oath, no more his sword he drew,
Then if nor Charles nor Agramant he knew.
But when at length, complete the time requir'd,
He saw the year the month and day expir'd,
With other armour, steed, and sword, and lance,
He reach'd with eager speed the court of France.

His courser's seat he kept unmov'd, nor bow'd
His haughty head, nor sign of reverence show'd;
As if he scorn'd king Charles and all the state 820
Of those high peers that there assembled sat.
Each one his wonder in his looks express'd,
To see this bold, this self-introding guest;
And all forgot their food and talk, intent
To hear the knight, and what his coming meant.
When now full opposite to Charles he stood,
Where by his side the noble youth he view'd,
With fiery glance the silence first he broke,
And thus aloud in threatening accents spoke:

" The prince of Sarza, Rodomont am I, 830
And thee Rogero to the list defy!
And ere the night extends her raven wing,
Will prove thee here disloyal to thy king!
That thou, whose name a traitor's deeds disgrace,
Deserv'st not midst these peers an honour'd place:

Though well to all thy falsehood must be known,
Nor thou, a Christian, canst the charge disown:
And now to fix on thee a traitor's stain,
I come to call thee to th' embattled plain.
Or, is there one will offer, for thy sake, 840
To meet my arms—his offer here I take;
Or if ye, singly, shrink the course to try—
Come more—your arms united I defy—Whate'er the odds, this sword you knight shall prove

A recreant to his lord and country's love.⁷⁹
He ceas'd: Rogero from the emperor's side
Arose, and thus, with leave of Charles, reply'd:
That he, or any tongue that durst defame
His deeds, and brand him with a traitor's name,
Most foully ly'd—that to his sovereign just, 850
None rightly could arraign his breach of trust:
And that he stood prepar'd his truth to prove
In loyal duty and a subject's love:
Nor needed others here his cause befriend,
His own right hand suffic'd him to defend
His name traduc'd, and well he deem'd it such,
The foe perchance might find that one too much.

⁷⁹ It was the common practice of the knights of chivalry to punish themselves for any defeat in battle, attended with humiliating circumstances, by a voluntary abjuration of the profession of arms for a certain stated time. Cervantes seems to allude to this custom, when he introduces the Knight of the Moon's making it one of the conditions of his duel with Don Quixote, that the knight of La Mancha, if vanquish'd, shall relinquish knight-errantry for the space of one year.

Up started then Rinaldo, Brava's knight⁸⁵,
The marquis⁸⁶, with the brethren⁸⁷, black and white; 859

Marphisa, Dudon,—these whom friendship draws
To engage the Pagan in Rogero's cause.
These seven united plead, that he whose hand
So late was knit in Hymen's holy band
Should at his nuptial feast from quarrels cease,
Nor stain with sanguine war the rites of peace.
"No more—no more—" Rogero thus replies,
"Think not such reasons can for me suffice."
Then swift those arms are brought, which late in fight

He conquer'd from the stern Tartarian⁸⁸ knight.
Charles girds his trusty scabbard to his side, 870
By great Orlando's hand his spurs are ty'd:
Marphisa and his Bradamant invest
With plate and mail his limbs and manly breast:
Astolfo brings his horse of generous breed:
The Dame's brave son⁸⁹ beside the ready steed
His stirrup holds: Rinaldo, and the care
Of Namus, for the knights the field prepare:
With these the marquis Oliviero join'd: 878
Now here, now there, they drive the vulgar kind
From the proud lists for deeds of arms assign'd.

The dames and damsels, struck with panic fear,
With features pale, like frightened doves appear,
That, driv'n by threaten'd tempest from the plain,
Quit for their dear-lov'd nests the springing grain,

When hollow winds are heard, when lightnings fly,
When thunders rumble from the darkening sky,
Presaging on the delug'd fields to pour
From low-hung clouds the hail or rattling shower.
Each female for Rogero felt alarms,
Oppos'd to such a dreadful foe in arms. 890

So fear the vulgar herd—while many a knight,
And many a baren seem'd to doubt the fight:
Those doubts were present yet to every thought,
Deeds which in Paris' walls the Pagan wrought,
When he, with single arm, by sword and fire
Such ruin spread, and made whole hosts retire.
Ruin that lasted still, that long remain'd,
And such as greater never realm sustain'd.

The heart of Bradamant, above the rest, 900
With all love's terrors heav'd her gentle breast:
Not that she deem'd, how'er for prowess held,
The Saracen Rogero's force excell'd,
Or thought that Rodomont must surely claim
The meed that crowns in arms the victor's name.
Yet could she not her busy doubts remove,
Such doubts as ever spring in those that love.
Oh! with what rapture had she provid her might
In all the dangers of this untry'd fight!
Though more than certain fate had there design'd
Her life's sad period—her unconquer'd mind 910
Had stand for one a thousand deaths to face,
(Could death so oft be met by human race,
Rather than see the lord of all her vows
A life far dearer than her own expose.
But since she knew no prayer would bend her knight

To yield to her the perils of the fight,

A sad spectatress, with dejected look,
She sate, while frequent sighs her bosom shook.
Meanwhile Rogero there, the Pagan hero,
Against each other rush with reared spear: 920
Like brittle ice the spears in fragments fly,
Like birds the fragments mount into the sky!
Without effect, though faithful to its aim,
The Pagan lance against the buckler came.
So temper'd was its orb which Vulcan form'd
For Hector's use:—his point Rogero aim'd
With better force, that, midst the hostile shield,
Through steel and bone its furious passage held,
That thrust had to the fight a period given, 929
But short the weapon boke, and swift to Heaven
The splinters flew; while stagger'd with the force
Back on his crupper fell each warrior-horse.
Full soon with spur and rein each fearless knight
His steed recover'd to pursue the fight.
Their useless spears dismiss'd, their swords they drew,
And wheel'd their steeds, while round their heads they threw

The flashing steel, and now with pointed blade
On plate and mail the weakest part essay'd,
No serpent skin then arm'd the Pagan's breast,
That hide which once the hostile stroke repress'd:
Nor Nimrod's dreadful sword that day he wore, 941
Nor on his brows the wouled helmet bore:
For when along the bridge the tilt was run,
And Bradamant from him the conquest won;
His arms against the sacred shrine he plac'd,
A mournful trophy of his deeds disarm'd.
Strong arms he wore, yet not in proof compar'd
With those that once were worn his limbs to guard;
But every temper must in vain oppose
The dreadful force of Balisarda's blow, 950
Which never metal forg'd by mortal hand,
Nor all the charms of magic could withstand.

So well to aim his point Rogero knew,
That oft he pierc'd the Pagan's armour through:
When Rodomont in many a part had view'd
His own bright mail with purple gore bedew'd,
And scarce could ward a stroke which swiftly sent
To reach the flesh through shield and corslet went;

He rag'd—he foam'd—not with such fury raves
The stormy sea, when black with wintry waves: 960
His buckler cast aside, his sword he drove,
With either hand, restless from above,
On good Rogero's crest—so from the sky
Some ponderous weight, by levers rais'd on high,
Falls thundering down—with every nerve the foe
Full on Rogero dealt the staggering blow.
Here well th' enchanted helm avail'd to save,
Else that dire blow the king of Algiers gave
Had sever'd horse and man—Rogero low
His head twice bending to the saddle bow, 970
Spread wide his arms, and, senseless with the pain,

Appear'd just falling headlong to the plain:
And ere his scatter'd sense the youth recalls,
From the stern foe the stroke repeated falls;
A third succeed—but soon the blade unfit,
With such fierce strokes, the temper'd canque to meet,

In hisbers breaks, its master's aim deceives,
And in his grasp the broken weapon leaves.
Still Rodomont, with fury unrestrain'd,
Rogero press'd, who senseless still remain'd; 980
So sore the blows had batter'd round his head,
Such mists of darkness o'er his sight were spread;

Him soon the Saracen from sleep awoke,
With nervous arms he clasp'd his neck, and shook
The gallant youth, till from his seat he drew
And to the ground the struggling warrior threw:
Scarce had he fall'n, when swift from earth he sprang

With anger deep, with shame yet deeper stung.
For, as on Bradamant he cast his eyes.
He saw pale terrors o'er her features rise: 990
She view'd, and trembling view'd, her dearest
knight

Hurl'd from his seat, and, sickening at the sight,
Her tender soul seem'd ready wing'd for flight.
Rogero, who to heal his shame prepar'd,
His falchion brandish'd, and the Pagan dar'd
To new assault;—the Pagan spurs his steed
T' o'erwhelm the knight; the knight with skillful head

Eludes the shock, and in his hand restrains
The hostile courser by the straiten'd reins.
He whirls him round, and stands with point address
To pierce the mailed side or plated breast: 1001
With two deep wounds he galls his thigh and side;
And fast from either flows the crimson tide.
Rern Rodomont, who in his bold retain'd
The hit and broken blade that yet remain'd,
With these a dreadful stroke, in fell intent,
At utmost strength on good Rogero sent.

Rogero, who his fair advantage knew,
Had seiz'd his arm, and now with force he drew
The furious king, and bending to and fro, 1010
Compell'd at length his saddle to forgo.
He fell—but whether by his force or skill,
So fell, he seem'd Rogero's equal still,
Alighting on his feet—but all the field
That saw Rogero yet his weapon wield,
High hopes conceiv'd—meanwhile, with every slight,
The youth essay'd to keep the Pagan knight
At distant bay, nor close too near with one
Of such huge limb, strong nerve, and giant bone.
He view'd the Pagan's gaping wounds, he view'd
His side and thigh with purple streams imbr'd,
And hop'd, with ebbing strength, he soon must yield 120

To him the glory of the well-fought field,
Still in his grasp the furious Pagan held
The broken weapon; this, with force impell'd,
He threw—the weapon sent with certain aim
Against Rogero's helm and shoulder came.
So dreadful was the stroke, the gentle knight
Ruff'd here and there, and scarce his utmost might Suffic'd to keep his tottering bulk upright. 1030
To close in nearer strife the Pagan try'd;
His wounded thigh his hasty step deny'd;
And while he urg'd his feeble nerves in vain,
One knee, beneath him bending, touch'd the plain.
His time Rogero took, he press'd his foe,
He whirl'd his falchion round, with blow on blow,
And laid once more the haughty Pagan low.
Again more fierce he rose; and now they join'd;
They grasp'd, with arms around each other twind.

His wounded side and thigh that vigour drain'd,
Which Rodomont so oft in fight sustain'd. 1041
Rogero well his pliant limbs could wield,
And long had practis'd in the wrestlers' field.
His 'vantage now he saw, and close pursu'd,
And where the Pagan's deepest wounds he view'd,
Where most he saw the purple current flow,
Close and more close he press'd th' enfeebled foe.

But Rodomont, with rage and shame impell'd,
By turns Rogero's neck and shoulders held,
Now forward drew, now backward thrust, and
press'd 1050

The youthful hero to his cruel breast,
And lifted high—now here, now there, he strain'd
The dauntless knight, and still his hold retain'd.
While every means he tries on earth to throw
The Christian youth; nor less his gallant foe,
Collected in himself, his art and might
Employs to disappoint the Pagan knight,
And keep him still beneath; oft wheeling round,
Rogero shifts his hold, and shifts his ground. 1059
At length fierce Rodomont his waist enclos'd
With firmest grasp—now, breast to breast op-

pos'd,
They toil—they pant—Rogero chief apply'd
His art against the Pagan's wounded side:
A thwart his bending knees one foot he thrust,
And, lifting, hurl'd him prostrate on the dust
Headlong.—When thus the furious Pagan fell
On the hard earth, the blood, as from a well, Stream'd from each wound, and deep on every side

The fatal plain with gory crimson dy'd,
Rogero now, with Fortune's favour crown'd, 1070
To keep the Pagan prisoner on the ground,
One hand the dagger to his sight address'd,
One hand with fearful grasp his throat com-

press'd,
While either knee his heaving bosom press'd.
As in Paenonian or Iberian⁴ gloom
Where wretched miners cheerless days consume
For shining ore, if fate above impends,
And sudden ruin on their head descends,
Crush'd up and bruis'd, their spirits scarcely find
A vent to leave their mortal part behind. 1080
So lay the Serzan prince, so, press'd beneath
The victor, struggled in the jaws of death.
The dagger, now unheath'd, Rogero took,
And at his visor seem'd to aim the stroke:
He bade him yield, as vanquish'd in the strife,
With plighted faith to spare his forfeit life:
But he, whose thought of death far less dismay'd
Than aught that signs of dastard fear betray'd,
Still bent and twin'd; while all in vain he prov'd
Against the knight, who kept his place unmov'd.
As when the mastiff, panting on the plain, 1091
Whose throat the sible greyhound's⁵ fangs con-

strain
With deadly gripe, in fruitless fury lies,
With jaws dire foaming, and with fiery eyes:
Not all his force the victor can elude,
By skill and vigour not by rage subdu'd:
So Rodomont essay'd each art, to make
The conquering youth his powerful hold forsake.
He strove to rise; but still the wary knight
Press'd him to earth with unabated might. 1100
Now, writhing here and there, the Pagan strain'd
Each nerve, and freed at length his better hand,
That in its grasp th' insidious poniard bore;
(The poniard from the sheath releas'd before)

⁴ He alludes to the metallic mines of Hungary and Spain, the latter so named from the river Hebrus.

⁵ Alano, the name of a peculiar kind of dog of great strength and agility.

With this he sought to aim the murderous wound
Beneath Rogero's reins—the youth renown'd
The danger saw, should still his generous heart
Defer the Pagan's death, his just desert.

Then at full stretch he rais'd his arm above
The prostrate king, and thrice the weapon drove Deep in his horrid front—so ends the strife, 1111
And leaves secur'd Rogero's fame and life!
Where Acheron's infernal waters spread⁸⁸,
Freed from her icy limbs, blaspheming fled ing so fully completed his story, which, with an infinity of episodes and adventures, had delighted the imagination, and fascinated the attention,

POSTSCRIPT.

HAVING brought this long work to a conclusion, I cannot close the volume without some acknowledgment for kindnesses received, and without expressing a hope that a perusal of my translation will not wholly disappoint those expectations which may have been raised by my preface, or entertained from a knowledge of that admiration which the Italians universally testify for their favourite poet.

It will be sufficiently flattering to me, should the English reader experience but a small part of that pleasure which has recompensed me for the hours of anxiety and application that must attend such an undertaking; but whatever support I may have found from that degree of enthusiasm which every translator, who has the least pretence to taste or genius, will imbibe from such a poet as Ariosto, I must likewise declare, that no little encouragement has been afforded me by the countenance of those friends, who, if I may be allowed to make use of the beautiful figure of my author, at the opening of his last book, "will, I trust, stand on the beach to welcome my return from so hazardous a voyage." To this I must add, that the favour shown by the public, in the reception of the first volume of my Orlando, would of itself, without any other consideration, have effectually determined me to persevere in making an entire version of this wonderful poem; a design which I had conceived and entered upon many years before I engaged in the translation of Tasso, but which the avocations of a life devoted to business long prevented me from pursuing.

In my preface, life, and notes, I have endeavoured to insert whatever might gratify curiosity, or give every necessary elucidation, on which occasion I must return my thanks to those gentlemen who have smoothed the way in this part of my labours, by giving me information and assistance; and here let me declare my sense of the kindness of one who was ever ready to patronise any apparent work of genius. My first obligations are due to the late Mr. Garrick, who gave me free access to the books in his collection: he saw the beginning of my translation, but did not live to see the completion of a work, in the success of which he once seemed kindly to interest himself. It never will be thought superfluous that I pay this regard to the memory of him, whose death I sincerely lamented, and who, however soon forgotten by many in the dissipation of the day, has, in the words of one of his most respectable friends, "left that gap in society which will not easily be filled up."

In the late Dr. Hawkesworth I have found reason to regret the loss of one, whose taste and friendship I had formerly experienced in my version of Tasso, and which would have been sensibly felt in the present publication: he saw the first part of the foregoing translation, and gave me every encouragement, declaring himself more struck with the wild beauties of the Orlando, than with the more classical merits of the Jerusalem.

I must here make my grateful acknowledgments to the friendship and politeness of Mr. Barnard of St. James's, for being honoured with the indulgence of consulting the royal library. To this gentleman's particular kindness, and general liberality of sentiment, every return is due for favours shown to the man, and to the translator.

Nor can I pass over unnoticed the very flattering manner in which, without any previous recommendation, I was permitted to make use of the library of the late reverend Mr. Crofts, a recourse the more grateful to me, as this collection has been allowed to exceed any other in the number of Italian books, amongst which are many early writers of the greatest rarity and estimation.

I must likewise confess the assistance which I have derived from the friendship of Mr. Saxton, of whose taste and knowledge in Italian literature I was happy to avail myself in any difficulty.

I owe my thanks to all my subscribers; but my first thanks are due for the great honour that has been conferred on me in the permission of introducing Ariosto to my countrymen with becoming dignity, by an insertion of such august names at the head of my encouragers.

I must not forget my obligations to the governor-general of Bengal; and to the rest of the gentlemen in the East-India company's service at that settlement, for their very generous patronage of my pro-possals: at the same time let me discharge a melancholy duty to the memory of a deceased friend, who showed his early attention to my attempt of giving an English Orlando, and whose disposition, as a friend, a scholar, and a patron of genius, led him in the most cordial manner to continue that countenance in India, which he had given to the work in England: with the name of major Pearson, whose loss I have every reason to regret, let me join the name of Mr. Clement Francis, now of Calcutta, who, with the ardour of unfeigned friendship, has done every thing to promote my subscription in that part of the world.

To Mrs. Angelica Kauffman, whose pencil needs no praise from me, I am beholden for the elegant design to the first volume, which she was pleased, in the most polite manner, to contribute towards the embellishment of my book.

To other friends am I indebted for acts of kindness. To Dr. Warton of Winchester, for his warm encouragement in the progress of my labour; to his brother Mr. Thomas Warton; to my friend Dr. Burney; all zealous admirers of our poet; and to the worthy and elegant author of Leucides, the great lover and judge of the works of imagination, by whom I was very early stimulated to so arduous an undertaking.

Among those whose good wishes have always gone along with the translator, it is with peculiar satisfaction that I can insert the name of Dr. Samuel Johnson; and I am happy in this opportunity of giving a public testimony of my sincere and respectful affection for him, whose friendship I consider as one of the most grateful circumstances of my life, since the value of his character can only be known by those who live with him in the habit of intimacy; but, alas! such knowledge leads us continually to lament the condition of mankind, in which, at a certain period, every warning of mortality makes us dread a dissolution of the dearest connections, while we are tempted to regret, that some of the apparently superfluous years allotted to the profligate or the useless, cannot be added to those whose lives are an honour to human nature.

JERUSALEM DELIVERED:

AN

HEROIC POEM.

TRANSLATED

FROM THE ITALIAN

TORQUATO TASSO,

BY

JOHN HOOLE.

TO THE QUEEN.

MADAM,

To approach the high and the illustrious has been, in all ages, the privilege of poets; and though translators cannot justly claim the same honour, yet they naturally follow their authors as attendants; and I hope that, in return for having enabled Tasso to diffuse his fame through the British dominions, I may be introduced by him to the presence of your majesty.

Tasso has a peculiar claim to your majesty's favour, as a follower and panegyrist of the house of Este, which has one common ancestor with the house of Hanover: and in reviewing his life, it is not easy to forbear a wish that he had lived in a happier time, when he might, among the descendants of that illustrious family, have found a more liberal and potent patronage.

I cannot but observe, madam, how unequally reward is proportioned to merit, when I reflect that the happiness, which was withheld from Tasso, is reserved for me; and that the poem, which once hardly procured to its author the countenance of the princes of Ferrara, has attracted to its translator the favourable notice of a British queen.

Had this been the fate of Tasso, he would have been able to have celebrated the condescension of your majesty in nobler language, but could not have felt it with more ardent gratitude, than,

madam,

your Majesty's

most faithful and devoted servant,

JOHN HOOLE.

ADVERTISEMENT,
BY THE TRANSLATOR,
TO
THE FIFTH EDITION.

HAVING completed a translation of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, with explanatory notes, and the favourable attention that has been paid to my version of Tasso making it necessary to give a new edition of the Jerusalem, I thought it expedient to revise the work ; and, in order not only to render it more worthy of the public favour, but to give an uniformity to the two publications, I have added to the present edition such notes as might be useful for explaining the historical allusions, and some few other passages : but as the Jerusalem is in itself complete, and wholly independent of every other poem, in which respect it has the advantage of the Orlando, and of the three great poems of antiquity ; and as the historical allusions are rare, compared to those of Ariosto, the bulk of the notes will be inconsiderable. It may possibly at first be thought, by some, that I have not dwelt sufficiently on the imitations and striking parts of this admirable poem ; but the truth is, I was unwilling to swell the pages with an unprofitable display of criticism ; and I hope I may add, without the imputation of vanity, that little commentary was required to an author with whom my countrymen are now acquainted. But it appeared to me that much was to be said, on the introduction of such a poem as Ariosto's, to open fully a poetical character so new and uncommon to the English reader.

PREFACE
TO
JERUSALEM DELIVERED.

Of all authors, so familiarly known by name to the generality of English readers as Tasso, perhaps there is none whose works have been so little read; and the few who have read them, have seldom estimated them by their own judgment. As some authors owe much of their reputation to the implicit acquiescence of the many in the encomiums bestowed upon them by some person with whom, for whatever reason, it has been thought honourable to acquiesce; so others have been rated much below their merit, merely because some fashionable critic has decried their performances: and thus it has happened to Tasso.

M. Boileau, in one of his satires, had ridiculed the absurdity of "preferring the tinsel of Tasso to the gold of Virgil:" this sentiment was hastily caught up by Mr. Addison, whose polite and elegant writings are an honour to our nation, but whose greatest excellence was not, perhaps, either poetry or criticism; and he has zealously declared, in one of his Spectators, that "he entirely agrees with M. Boileau, that one verse in Virgil is worth all the tinsel of Tasso." These declarations, indeed, amount to no more than that gold is better than tinsel, and true wit than false; a discovery which does no great honour to the author: but those, who are accustomed to take things in the gross, and to adopt the judgment of others because they will not venture to judge for themselves, have inferred, that all Virgil is gold, and that all Tasso is tinsel; than which nothing can be more absurd, whether M. Boileau and Mr. Addison intended the implication or not: it is as true, that the gold of Tasso is better than his tinsel, as that the gold of Virgil is better; and though a verse of Virgil is better than all Tasso's tinsel, it does not follow that it is also better than Tasso's gold. That Tasso has gold, no man, who wishes to be thought qualified to judge of poetry, will choose to deny. It will also be readily admitted, that he has tinsel; but it will be easy to show, not only that the gold preponderates, but that the tinsel, mingled with it, is not in a greater proportion than in many other compositions, which have received the applause of successive ages, and been preserved in the wreck of nations, when almost every other possession has been abandoned.

By tinsel is meant false thought, and, perhaps, incredible fiction; and whoever is acquainted with the writings of Ovid knows, that he abounds with false thoughts, that he is continually playing upon words, and that his fictions are in the highest degree incredible; yet his Metamorphoses have ever been held in great estimation by all judges of poetical merit.

But if Tasso's merit is to be decided by authority, may not that of M. Voltaire be opposed with great propriety to the pedantry of M. Boileau, and the echo of Mr. Addison? "There is," says he, in his Essay on Epic Poetry, "no monument of antiquity in Italy that more deserves the attention of a traveller, than the Jerusalem of Tasso. Time, which subverts the reputation of common performances, as it were by sap, has rendered that of the Jerusalem more stable and permanent: this poem is now sung in many parts of Italy, as the Iliad was in Greece; and Tasso is placed, without scruple, by the side of Homer and Virgil, notwithstanding his defects, and the criticisms of Despreaux. The Jerusalem appears, in some respects, to be an imitation of the Iliad; but if Rinaldo is drawn after Achilles, and Godfrey after Agamemnon, I will venture to say, that Tasso's copy is much superior to the original: in his battles he has as much fire as Homer, with greater variety; his heroes, like those of the Iliad, are distinguished by a difference of character; but the characters of Tasso are more skillfully introduced; more strongly marked, and infinitely better sustained; for there is scarce one in the Iliad that is not inconsistent with itself, and not one in the Jerusalem that is not uniform throughout. Tasso has painted what Homer only sketched; he has attained the art of varying his tints by different shades of the same colour, and has distinguished, into different modes, many virtues, vices, and passions, which others have thought to be the same. Thus the characteristic, both of Godfrey and Aladine, is sagacity, but the modes are finely varied; in Godfrey it is a calm circumspective prudence, in Aladine a cruel policy. Courage is predominant both in Tancred and Argantes; but in Tancred it is a generous contempt of danger, in Argantes a brutal fury: so love in Armida is a mixture of levity and desire; in Erminia it is a soft and amiable tenderness. There is, indeed, no figure in the picture that does not discover the hand of a master, not even Peter the hermit, who is finely contrasted with the enchanter Ismeno; two characters, which are surely very much superior to the Calchas and Talthypius of Homer. Rinaldo is, indeed, imitated from Achilles, but his faults are more excusable, his character is more amiable, and his leisure is better employed; Achilles dazzles us, but we are interrupted for Rinaldo.

"I am in doubt whether Homer has done right or wrong in making Priam so much the object of our pity, but it was certainly a master-stroke in Tasso to render Aladine odious; for the reader would otherwise have been necessarily interested for the Mahometans against the Christians, whom he would have been tempted to consider as a band of vagabond thieves, who had agreed to ramble from the heart of Europe, in order to desolate a country they had no right to, and massacre, in cold blood, a venerable prince, more than fourscore years old, and his whole people, against whom they had no pretence of complaint." M. Voltaire then observes, that this is indeed the true character of the crusades: but "Tasso," continues he, "has, with great judgment, represented them very differently; for, in his Jerusalem, they appear to be an army of heroes marching under a chief of exalted virtue, to rescue, from the tyranny of infidels, a country which had been consecrated by the birth and death of a God. The subject of his poem, considered in this view, is the most sublime that can be imagined; and he has treated it with all the dignity of which it is worthy, and has even rendered it not less interesting than elevated. The action is well conducted, and the incidents artfully interwoven: he strikes out his adventures with spirit, and distributes his light and shade with the judgment of a master: he transports his reader from the tumults of war to the sweet solitudes of love, and from scenes exquisitely voluptuous he again transports him to the field of battle: he touches all the springs of passion in a swift but regular succession, and gradually rises above himself as he proceeds from book to book: his style is in all parts equally clear and elegant; and when his subject requires elevation, it is astonishing to see how he impresses a new character upon the softness of the Italian language, how he sublimates it into majesty, and compresses it into strength. 'It must, indeed, be confessed, that in the whole poem there are about two hundred verses in which the author has indulged himself in puerile conceits, and a mere play upon words; but this is nothing more than a kind of tribute which his genius paid to the taste of the age he lived in, which had a fondness for points and turns that has since rather increased than diminished.'"

Such is the merit of Tasso's Jerusalem in the opinion of M. Voltaire: he has, indeed, pointed out with great judgment many defects in particular parts of the work, which he so much admires upon the whole; but this gives his testimony in behalf of Tasso, so far as it goes, new force; and if Tasso can be justified in some places where M. Voltaire has condemned him, it follows, that his general merit is still greater than M. Voltaire has allowed.

Having remarked some fanciful excesses in the account of the expedition of Ubald and his companion, to discover and bring back Rinaldo, who was much wanted by the whole army, M. Voltaire asks, "What was the great exploit which was reserved for this hero, and which rendered his presence of so much importance, that he was transported from the Pic of Teneriffe to Jerusalem? Why he was," says M. Voltaire, "destined by Providence to cut down some old trees, that stood in a forest which was haunted by hobgoblins." M. Voltaire, by this ludicrous description of Rinaldo's adventure in the enchanted wood, insinuates, that the service he performed was inadequate to the pomp with which he was introduced, and unworthy of the miracles which contributed to his return: but the enchantment of the forest being once admitted, this exploit of Rinaldo will be found greatly to heighten his character, and to remove an obstacle to the siege, which would otherwise have been insuperable, and would consequently have defeated the whole enterprise of the crusade: it was impossible to carry on the siege without machines constructed of timber; no timber was to be had but in this forest; and in this forest the principal heroes of the Christian army had attempted to cut timber in vain.

To this it may be added, that M. Voltaire has not dealt fairly, by supposing that Rinaldo was recalled to the camp for no other intent than to cut down the wood: the critic seems to have forgotten the necessity of this hero's presence to the general affairs of the Christians: it was he who was destined to kill Solyman, whose death was, perhaps, of equal consequence to the Christians, as that of Hector to the Grecians: the Damiah messenger had been miraculously preserved, and sent to deliver Sweeno's sword to Rinaldo, with a particular injunction for him to revenge the death of that prince on the sultan: we see further the importance of Rinaldo in the last battle, where he kills almost all the principal leaders of the enemy, and is the great cause of the entire defeat of the Egyptian army.

M. Voltaire's general censure of this incident, therefore, appears to be ill-founded. "But certain demons," says he, "having taken an infinite variety of shapes to terrify those who came to fell the trees, Tancred finds his Clorinda shut up in a pine, and wounded by a stroke which he had given to the trunk of the tree; and Armida issues from the bark of a myrtle, while she is many leagues distant in the Egyptian army."

Upon a review of this last passage, the first sentence will certainly be found to confute the censure implied in the second. In the first sentence we are told, "that the forms which prevented the Christian heroes from cutting down the trees were devils:" in the second it is intimated, that the voice of Clorinda, and the form of Armida, were no illusions, but in reality what they seemed to be: for where is the absurdity that a demon should assume the voice of Clorinda, or the figure of Armida, in this forest, though Clorinda herself was dead, and Armida in another place? Tasso, therefore, is acquitted of the charge of making Armida in two places at one time, even by the very passage in which the charge is brought.

To the authority of M. Voltaire, who, at the same time that he supposes Tasso to have more faults than he has; thinks his excellencies sufficient to place him among the first poets in the world, may be added that of Mr. Dryden, who, in the preface to the translation of Virgil, has declared the Jerusalem Delivered to be the next heroic poem to the Iliad and Æneid.

Mr. Dryden was too great a master in poetical composition, and had a knowledge too extensive, and a judgment too accurate, to suppose the merit of the Jerusalem to be subverted by improbabilities, which are more numerous and more gross in the works of Homer and Virgil. It is very likely that magic and enchantment were as generally, and firmly believed, when Tasso wrote his Jerusalem, as the visible agency of the Pagan deities at the writing of the Iliad, the Odyssey, and Æneid: and it is certain, that the events, which Tasso supposes to have been brought about by enchantment, were more congruous to such a cause than many fictions of the Greek and Roman poets to the Pagan theology; at least that a theology, which could admit them, was more absurd than the existence and operation of any powers of magic and enchantment. If we do not, therefore, reject the poems of Homer and Virgil as not worth reading, because they contain extravagant fables, we have no right to make that a pretence for rejecting the Jerusalem of Tasso; especially if the Gothic machines were more adapted to the great ends of epic poetry than the system of antiquity, as an ingenious author has endeavoured to show: his words are, "The current popular tales of elves and fairies were even fitter to take the credulous mind; and charm it into a willing admiration of the specious miracles, which wayward fancy delights in, than those of the old traditional rabble of Pagan divinities. And then, for the more solemn fancies of witchcraft and incantation, the horrors of the Gothic were above measure striking and terrible. The mummeries of the Pagan priests were childish; but the Gothic enchanters shook and alarmed all nature. We feel this difference very sensibly in reading the ancient and modern poets. You would not compare the Canidia of Horace with the witches of Macbeth: and what are Virgil's myrtles dropping blood, to Tasso's enchanted forest?" Letters on Chivalry and Romance, p. 48, 49.

As I think it is now evident that a reader may be pleased with Tasso, and not disgrace his judgment, I may, without impropriety, offer a translation of him to those who cannot read him in his original language. I may be told, indeed, that there is an English translation of him already, and therefore that an apology is necessary for a new one. To this I answer, that the only complete translation is that of Fairfax, which is in stanzas that cannot be read with pleasure by the generality of those who have a taste for English poetry; of which no other proof is necessary than that it appears scarcely to have been read at all: it is not only unpleasant, but irksome, in such a degree, as to surmount curiosity; and more than counterbalance all the beauty of expression, and sentiment, which is to be found in that work. I do not flatter myself that I have excelled Fairfax, except in my measure and versification, and even of these the principal recommendation is, that they are more modern, and better adapted to the ear of all readers of English poetry, except of the very few who have acquired a taste for the phrases and cadences of those times, when our verse, if not our language, was in its rudiments.

That a translation of Tasso into modern English verse has been generally thought necessary, appears by several essays that have been made towards it, particularly those of Mr. Brooke, Mr. Hooke, and Mr. Layng: if any of these gentlemen had completed their undertaking, it would effectually have precluded mine. Mr. Brooke's, in particular, is at once so harmonious, and so spirited, that I think an entire translation of Tasso by him would not only have rendered my task unnecessary, but have discouraged those from the attempt, whose poetical abilities are much superior to mine; and yet Mr. Brooke's performance is rather an animated paraphrase than a translation. My endeavour has been to render the sense of my author as nearly as possible, which could never be done merely by translating his words; how I have succeeded, the world must determine: an author is but an ill judge of his own performances: and the opinion of friends is not always to be trusted; for there is a kind of benevolent partiality which inclines us to think favourably of the works of those whom we esteem. I am, however, happy in the good opinion of some gentlemen whose judgment, in this case, could err only by such partiality; and as I am not less ambitious to engage esteem as a man, than to merit praise as an author, I am not anxiously solicitous to know whether they have been mistaken or not.

As many passages in the original of this work are very closely imitated from the Greek and Roman classics, I may perhaps, inadvertently, have inserted a line or two from the English versions of those authors; but as Mr. Pope, in his translation of Homer, has taken several verses from Mr. Dryden, and Mr. Pitt, in his translation of the Æneid, several both from Mr. Dryden and Mr. Pope, I flatter myself I shall incur no censure on that account.

I have incorporated some few verses both of Mr. Brooke's and Mr. Layng's version of Tasso with my own; but as I have not arrogated the merit of what I have borrowed to myself, I cannot justly be accused of plagiarism. These obligations I acknowledge, that I may do justice to others; but there are some which I shall mention to gratify myself. Mr. Samuel Johnson, whose judgment I am happy in being authorised to make use of on this occasion, has given me leave to publish it as his opinion, that a modern translation of the Jerusalem Delivered is a work that may very justly merit the attention of the English reader, and I owe many remarks to the friendship and candour of Dr. Hawkesworth, from which my performance has received considerable advantages.

Before I conclude this preface, it is necessary the English reader should be acquainted that the Italian poets, when they speak of infidels of any denomination, generally use the word Pagano: the word Pagan, therefore, in the translation, is often used for Mahometan; and Spenser has used the word Paynim in the same sense.

As the public is not at all concerned about the qualifications of an author, any further than they appear in his works, it is to little purpose that writers have endeavoured to prevent their writings from being considered as the standard of their abilities, by alleging the short time, or the disadvantageous circumstances, in which they were produced. If their performances are too bad to obtain a favourable reception for themselves, it is not likely that the world will regard them with more indulgence for being told why they are no better. If I did not hope, therefore, that the translation now offered, though begun and finished in the midst of employments of a very different kind, might something more than atone for its own defects, I would not have obtruded it on the public. All I request of my readers is, to judge for themselves; and if they find any entertainment, not to think the worse of it for being the performance of one, who has never before appeared a candidate for their suffrages as an author.

THE LIFE OF TASSO.

TORQUATO TASSO¹ was descended from the illustrious house of the Torregiani, lords of Bergamo, Milan, and several other towns in Lombardy. The Torregiani, being expelled by the Visconti, settled between Bergamo and Como, in the most advantageous posts of the mountain of Tasso, from which they took their name. This family supported itself by alliances till the time of Bernardo Tasso, whose mother was of the house of Cornaro. The estate of Bernardo, the father of our poet, was no ways equal to his birth; but this deficiency, in point of fortune, was in some measure compensated by the gifts of understanding. His works in verse and prose are recorded as monuments of his genius; and his fidelity to Ferrante of Sanseverino, prince of Salerno, to whom he was entirely devoted, entitled him to the esteem of every man of honour. This prince had made him his secretary, and taken him with him to Naples, where he settled, and married Portia di Rossi, daughter of Lucretia di Gambacorti, of one of the most illustrious families in that city.

Portia was six months gone with child, when she was invited by her sister Hyppolyta to Sorrento, to pay her a visit. Bernardo accompanied her thither: and in this place Portia was delivered of a son, on the 11th day of March 1544, at noon. The infant was baptized a few days after, in the metropolitan church of Sorrento, by the name of Torquato. Bernardo and Portia returned soon after to Naples, with little Tasso, whose birth, like Homer's, was afterwards disputed by several cities that claimed the honour of it: but it seems undeniably proved that he was born at Sorrento.

Historians relate incredible things of his early and promising genius: they tell us, that, at six months old, he not only spoke and pronounced his words clearly and distinctly, but that he thought, reasoned, expressed his wants, and answered questions; that there was nothing childish in his words, but the tone of his voice; that he seldom laughed or cried; and that, even then, he gave certain tokens of that equality of temper which supported him so well in his future misfortunes.

Towards the end of his third year, Bernardo his father was obliged to follow the prince of Salerno into Germany, which journey proved the source of all the sufferings of Tasso and his family. The occasion was this. Don Pedro of Toledo, viceroy of Naples for the emperor Charles V. had formed a design to establish the Inquisition in that city. The Neapolitans, alarmed at this, resolved to send a deputation to the emperor, and, for that purpose, made choice of the prince of Salerno, who seemed most able, by his authority and riches, to make head against the viceroy. The prince undertook the affair; and Bernardo Tasso accompanied him into Germany.

Before his departure, Bernardo committed the care of his son to Angeluzzo, a man of learning; for it was his opinion, that a boy could not be put too soon under the tuition of men. At three years of age, they tell us, little Tasso began to study grammar; and, at four, was sent to the college of the Jesuits, where he made so rapid a progress, that at seven he was pretty well acquainted with the Latin and Greek tongues: at the same age he made public orations, and composed some pieces of poetry, of which the style is said to have retained nothing of puerility. The following lines he addressed to his mother when he left Naples to follow his father's fortune, being then only nine years of age :

Ma dal sen de la madre empia Fortuna
Pargoletto divelse, ah di' que' baci
Ch' ella bagnò di lagrime dolenti
Coo sospir toi rimembra, e de gli ardenti
Preghi che sen portar l'anre fugaci,
Che i' non dovea giunger più volto A volto
Fra quelle braccia accolto
Con nodi così stretti, e sì tenaci,
Lasso, e seguì con mal sicure piante
Qual' Ascanio, o Camilla il padre errante.

Relentless Fortune in my early years
Removes me from a mother's tender breast:
With sighs I call to mind the farewell tears
That bath'd her kisses when my lips she press'd !
I hear her pray'rs with ardour breath'd to Heaven,
Aside now wafted by the devious wind ;
No more to her unhappy son 't is given
Th' endearments of maternal love to find !
No more her fondling arms shall round me spread,
Far from her sight reluctant I retire,
Like young Camilla or Ascanius, led
To trace the footsteps of my wandering sire !

The success the prince of Salerno met with in his embassy greatly increased his credit amongst the Neapolitans, but entirely ruined him with the viceroy, who left nothing unturned to make the emperor jealous of the great deference the people showed Ferrante, from which he inferred the most dangerous consequences. He so much exasperated the emperor against the prince of Salerno, that Ferrante, finding there was no longer any security for him at Naples, and having in vain applied to gain an audience of the emperor, retired to Rome, and renounced his allegiance to Charles V.

Bernardo Tasso would not abandon his patron in his ill fortune; neither would he leave his son in a country where he himself was soon to be declared an enemy; and foreseeing he should never be able to return thither, he took young Torquato with him to Rome.

As soon as the departure of the prince of Salerno was known, he, and all his adherents, were declared rebels to the state; and, what may seem very extraordinary, Torquato Tasso, though but nine years of age, was included by name in that sentence. Bernardo, following the prince of Salerno into France, committed his son to the care of his friend and relation Maurizio Cataneo, a person of great ability, who assiduously cultivated the early disposition of his pupil to polite literature. After the death of Seneceveno, which happened in three or four years, Bernardo returned to Italy, and engaged in the service of Guglielmo Gonzaga, duke of Mantua, who had given him a pressing invitation. It was not long before he received the melancholy news of the decease of his wife Portia: this event determined him to send for his son, that they might be a mutual support to each other in their affliction. He had left him at Rome, because his residence in that city was highly agreeable to his mother; but that reason now ceasing, he was resolved to be no longer deprived of the society of the only child he had left; for his wife, before her death, had married his daughter to Martino Senale, a gentleman of Sorrento.

Bernard was greatly surprised, on his son's arrival, to see the vast progress he had made in his studies. He was now twelve years of age, and had, according to the testimony of the writers of his Life, entirely completed his knowledge in the Latin and Greek tongues: he was well acquainted with the rules of rhetoric and poetry, and completely versed in Aristotle's ethica; but he particularly studied the precepts of Maurizio Cataneo, whom he ever afterwards revered as a second father. Bernardo soon determined to send him to the university of Padua, to study the laws, in company with the young Scipio Gonzaga, afterwards cardinal, nearly of the same age as himself. With this nobleman Tasso, then seventeen years of age, contracted a friendship that never ended but with his life.

He prosecuted his studies at Padua with great diligence and success: at the same time employing his leisure hours upon philosophy and poetry, he soon gave a public proof of his talents, by his poem of Rinaldo, which he published in the eighteenth year of his age.

This poem, which is of the romance kind, is divided into twelve books in ottava rima, and contains the adventures of Rinaldo, the famous Paladin of the court of Charlemain, who makes so principal a figure in Ariosto's work, and the first achievements of that knight for the love of the fair Clarice, whom he afterwards marries. The action of this poem precedes that of the Orlando Furioso. It was composed in ten months, as the author himself informs us in the preface, and was first printed at Venice in the year 1562. Paolo Boni speaks very highly of this performance, which undoubtedly is not unworthy the early efforts of that genius which afterwards produced the Jerusalem.

Tasso's father saw with regret the success of his son's poem: he was apprehensive, and not without reason, that the charms of poetry would detach him from those more solid studies, which he judged were most likely to raise him in the world: he knew very well, by his own experience, that the greatest skill in poetry will not advance a man's private fortune. He was not deceived in his conjecture; Torquato, insensibly carried away by his predominant passion, followed the examples of Petrarch, Boccaccio, Ariosto, and others, who, contrary to the remonstrances of their friends, quitted the severer studies of the law for the more pleasing entertainment of poetical composition. In short, he entirely gave himself up to the study of poetry and philosophy. His first poem extended his reputation through all Italy; but his father was so displeased with his conduct, that he went to Padua on purpose to reprimand him. Though he spoke with great vehemence, and made use of several harsh expressions, Torquato heard him without interrupting him, and his composure contributed not a little to increase his father's displeasure. "Tell me," said Bernardo, "of what use is that vain philosophy, upon which you pride yourself so much?" "It has enabled me," said Tasso modestly, "to endure the harshness of your reproach."

The resolution Tasso had taken to devote himself to the Muses was known all over Italy; the principal persons of the city and college of Bologna invited him thither by means of Pietro Donato Cesi, then vice-legate, and afterwards legate. But Tasso had not long resided there, when he was pressed by Scipio Gonzaga, elected prince of the academy established at Padua, under the name of Etherei, to return to that city. He could not withstand this solicitation; and Bologna being at that time the scene of civil commotion, he was the more willing to seek elsewhere for the repose he loved. He was received with extreme joy by all the academy, and being incorporated into that society, at the age of twenty years, took upon himself the name of Pentito; by which he seemed to show that he repented of all the time which he had employed in the study of the law.

In this retreat he applied himself afresh to philosophy and poetry, and soon became a perfect master of both: it was this happy mixture of his studies that made him an enemy to all kinds of licentiousness. An oration was made one day in the academy upon the nature of love; the orator treated his subject in a very masterly manner, but with too little regard to decency in the opinion of Tasso, who, being asked what he thought of the discourse, replied, "that it was a pleasing poison."

Here Tasso formed the design of his celebrated poem, Jerusalem Delivered: he invented the fable, disposed the different parts, and determined to dedicate this work to the glory of the house of Esté. He was greatly esteemed by Alphonso II. the last duke of Ferrara, that great patron of learning and learned men, and by his brother, cardinal Luigi. There was a sort of contest between these two brothers, in relation to the poem: the cardinal imagined that he had a right to be the Mæcenas of all Tasso's works, as Rinaldo, his first piece, had been dedicated to him: the duke, on the other hand, thought that, as his brother had already received his share of honour, he ought not to be offended at seeing the name of Alphonso at the head of the Jerusalem Delivered. Tasso for three or four years suspended his determination: at length, being earnestly pressed by both the brothers to take up his residence in Ferrara, he suffered himself to be prevailed upon. The duke gave him an apartment in his palace, where he lived in peace and affluence, and pursued his design of completing his Jerusalem, which he now resolved to dedicate to Alphonso. The duke, who was desirous of fixing Tasso near him, had thoughts of marrying him advantageously, but he always evaded any proposal of that kind: though he appeared peculiarly devoted to Alphonso, yet he neglected not to pay his court to the cardinal.

The name of Tasso now became famous through all Europe: and the caresses he received from Charles IX. in a journey he made to France, with cardinal Luigi, who went thither in quality of legate, show that his reputation was not confined to his own country.

We cannot perhaps give a more striking instance of the regard that monarch had for him, than in the following story. A man of letters, and a poet of some repute, had unfortunately been guilty of some enormous crime, for which he was condemned to suffer death. Tasso, touched with compassion, was resolved to petition the king for his pardon. He went to the palace, where he heard that orders had just been given to put the sentence immediately into execution. This did not discourage Tasso, who, presenting himself before the king, said: "I come to entreat your majesty that you would put to death a wretch, who has brought Philosophy to shame, by showing that she can make no stand against human depravity." The king, touched with the justness of this reflection, granted the criminal his life.

The king asked him one day, whom he judged superior to all others in happiness: he answered, "God." The king then desired to know his opinion, by what men resemble God in his happiness, whether by sovereign power, or by their capacity of doing good to others. A man more interested than Tasso might have said, that kings show their greatness by dispensing their benefactions to others: but he eluded the discourse; and replied, "that men could resemble God only by their virtues."

Another time, in a conversation held before the king by several learned men, it was disputed what condition in life was the most unfortunate. "In my opinion," said Tasso, "the most unfortunate condition is that of an impatient old man depressed with poverty: for," added he, "the state of that person is doubtless very deplorable, who has neither the gifts of fortune to preserve him from want, nor the principles of philosophy to support himself under affliction."

The cardinal's legation being finished, Tasso returned to Ferrara⁴, where he applied himself to finish his Jerusalem, and in the mean time published his Aminta, a pastoral comedy⁵, which was received with universal applause. This performance was looked upon as a master-piece in its kind, and is the original of the Pastor Fido and Filli di Sciro.

It was not easy to imagine that Tasso could so well paint the effects of love, without having himself felt that passion: it began to be suspected that, like another Ovid, he had raised his desires too high, and it was thought that in many of his verses he gave hints of that kind; particularly in the following sonnet:

Se d' Icara leggerti, e di Fetonte
 Ben sai come lu'n cadde in questo Guine
 Quando portar de l' Orientè il lume
 Volle, e di rai de sol cinger la fronte:
 E l'altro in mar, che troppo ardite, e pronte
 A volo alzo le sue cerate piume,
 E così va chi di tentar presume
 Strade nel ciel per fama a pena conte.
 Ma, chi dee parentare in alta impresa,
 S'avvien, ch'amor l'affide? e che non puote
 Amor, che non catena il cielo unisce?
 Egli giù trahè de le celesti rote
 Di terrena beltà Diana accessa
 E d'Ida il bel fanciullo al ciel rapisce.

OfT have we heard, in Po's imperial tide
 How hapless Phaëton was headlong thrown,
 Who durst aspire the Sun's bright steeds to guide,
 And wreathè his brows with splendours not his own?
 OfT have we heard, how 'midst th' Icarian main
 Fell the rash youth who tried too bold a flight;
 Thus shall it fare with him, who seeks in vain
 On mortal wings to reach th' empyreal height.
 But who, inspir'd by love, can dangers fear?
 What cannot love, that guides the rolling sphere;
 Whose powerful magic Earth and Heaven controls?
 Love brought Diana from the starry sky,
 Smit with the beauties of a mortal eye;
 Love snatch'd the boy of Ida to the polea.

There were at the duke's court three Leonoras, equally witty and beautiful, though of different quality. The first was Leonora of Estè, sister to the duke, who having refused the most advantageous matches, lived unmarried with Lauretta, duchess of Urbino, her elder sister, who was separated from her husband, and resided at her brother's court. Tasso had a great attachment to this lady, who, on her side, honoured him with her esteem and protection. She was wise, generous, and not only well read in elegant literature, but even versed in the more abstruse sciences. All these perfections were undoubtedly observed by Tasso, who was one of the most assiduous of her courtiers: and it appearing by his verses that he was touched with the charms of a Leonora, they tell us that we need not seek any farther for the object of his passion.

The second Leonora that was given him for a mistress was the countess of San Vitale, daughter of the count of Sala, who lived at that time at the court of Ferrara, and passed for one of the most accomplished persons in Italy. Those who imagined that Tasso would not presume to lift his eyes to his master's sister, supposed that he loved this lady. It is certain that he had frequent opportunities of discoursing with her, and that she had frequently been the subject of his verses.

The third Leonora was a lady in the service of the princess Leonora of Estè. This person was thought by some to be the most proper object of the poet's gallantry. Tasso, several times, employed his Muse in her service: in one of his pieces he confesses that, considering the princess as too high for his hope, he had fixed his affection upon her, as of a condition more suitable to his own. But if any thing can be justly drawn from this particular, it seems rather to strengthen the opinion, that his desires, at least at one time, had aspired to a greater height. The verses referred to above are as follow:

O con le Gratie eletta, e con gli Amori,
 Fanciulla avventurosa:
 A servir a colui, che Dio somiglia:
 Poi che' l mio sguardo in lei mira, e non oss,
 P' raggi e gli splendori,
 E' l bel seren de gli occhi, e de le ciglia,
 Nè l' alta meraviglia,
 Che ne discopre il lampeggiar del riso;
 Nè quanto ha de celeste il petto, e' l volto;
 Io gli occhi a te rivolto,
 E nel tuo vezzosetto, e lieto viso
 Dolcemente m' affiso.
 Bruna sei tu, ma bella,
 Qual virgine viola: e del tuo vago
 Sembante io fi m'appago,
 Che non disdegno Signoria d' Ancella.

O ! by the Graces, by the Loves design'd,
 In happy hour t' enjoy an envy'd place:
 Attendant on the fairest of her kind,
 Whose charms excel the charms of human race !

Pain would I view—but dare not lift my sight
 To mark the splendour of her piercing eyes;
 Her heavenly smiles, her bosom's dazzling white,
 Her nameless graces that the soul surprize.

To thee I then direct my humbler gaze;
 To thee uncensur'd may my hopes aspire:
 Less awful are the sweets thy look displays;
 I view, and, kindling as I view, desire.

Though brown thy hue, yet lovely is thy frame;
 (So blooms some violet, the virgin's care !)
 I burn—yet blush not to confess my flame,
 Nor scorn the empire of a menial fair.

However, it appears difficult to determine with certainty in relation to Tasso's passion; especially when we consider the privilege allowed to poets: though M. Mirabaud⁶ makes no scruple to mention it as a circumstance almost certain, and fixes it without hesitation on the piousess Leonora, Tasso himself, in several of his poems, seems to endeavour to throw an obscurity over his passion, as in the following lines:

Tro gran donne vid' io, ch'io esser belle Mostrau disparità, ma somigliante
 Si che ne gli atti, e'n ogni lor sembante
 Scriver Natura par'; Noi slaru sorella.
 Ben ciascun' io lodai, pur una delle
 Mi piacque si, ch'io ne divenni Amante,
 Et ancor fia, ch'io ne sospiri, e canto,
 E'l mio focco, e'l suo nome almi à le stelle
 Lei sol vagheggio; e se pur l'altre io miro,
 Guardo nel vago altrui quel, ch'è in lei vago,
 E ne gl' Idoli suoi vien ch'io l'adore:
 Ma contanto somiglia al ver l'imgago
 Ch'erro, e dolc' è l'error; pur ne sospiro,
 Come d'ingiusta idolatria d'Amore.

SONNET.

Three courtly dames before my presence stood;
 'All lovely form'd, though differing in their grace:
 Yet each resembled each; for Nature show'd
 A sister's air in every mien and face.
 Each maid I prais'd; but one above the rest,
 Soon kindled in my heart the lover's fire:
 For her these sighs still issue from my breast;
 Her name, her beauties, still my song inspire.
 Yet though to her alone my thoughts are due,
 Reflected in the rest her charms I view,
 And in her semblance still the nymph adora.
 Delusion sweet! from this to that I rove;
 But, while I wander, sigh, and fear to prove
 A traitor thus to Love's almighty power!

In the meanwhile Tasso proceeded with his Jerusalem, which he completed in the thirtieth year of his age: but this poem was not published by his own authority; it was printed against his will, as soon as he had finished the last book, and before he had time to give the revisions and corrections that a work of such a nature required. The public had already seen several parts, which had been sent into the world by the authority of his patrons. The success of this work was prodigious: it was translated into the Latin, French, Spanish, and even the Oriental languages, almost as soon as it appeared; and it may be said, that no such performance ever before raised its reputation to such a height in so small a space of time.

But the satisfaction which Tasso must feel, in spite of all his philosophy, at the applause of the public, was soon disturbed by a melancholy event. Bernardo Tasso, who spent his old age in tranquillity at Ostia upon the Po, the government of which place had been given him by the duke of Mantua, fell sick. As soon as this news reached his son, he immediately went to him, attended him with the most filial regard, and scarce ever stirred from his bedside during the whole time of his illness: but all these cares were ineffectual; Bernardo, oppressed with age, and overcome by the violence of his distemper, paid the unavoidable tribute to nature, to the great affliction of Torquato. The duke of Mantua, who had a sincere esteem for Bernardo, caused him to be interred, with much pomp, in the church of St. Egidius at Mantua, with this simple inscription on his tomb:

OSSA BERNARDI TASSI.

This death seemed to forebode other misfortunes to Tasso; for the remainder of his life proved almost one continued series of vexation and affliction. About this time a swarm of critics began to attack his Jerusalem, and the academy of Croaca, in particular, published a criticism of his poem, in which they scrupled not to prefer the rhapsodies of Pulci and Boyardo to the Jerusalem Delivered.

7 Ann. et. 31.

During Tasso's residence in the duke's court, he had contracted an intimacy with a gentleman of Ferrara^a, and having intrusted him with some transactions of a very delicate nature, this person was so treacherous as to speak of them again. Tasso reproached his friend with his indiscretion, who received his expostulation in such a manner, that Tasso was so far exasperated as to strike him: a challenge immediately ensued: the two opponents met at St. Leonard's gate; but, whilst they were engaged, three brothers of Tasso's antagonist came in and basely fell all at once upon Tasso, who defended himself so gallantly that he wounded two of them, and kept his ground against the others, till some people came in and separated them. This affair made a great noise at Ferrara: nothing was talked of but the valour of Tasso; and it became a sort of proverb, "That Tasso with his pen and his sword was superior to all men."

The duke, being informed of the quarrel, expressed great resentment against the four brothers, banished them from his dominions, and confiscated their estates; at the same time he caused Tasso to be put under arrest, declaring he did it to screen him from any future designs of his enemies. Tasso was extremely mortified to see himself thus confined; he imputed his detention to a very different cause from what was pretended, and feared an ill use might be made of what had passed, to ruin him in the duke's opinion.

Though writers have left us very much in the dark with regard to the real motives that induced the duke to keep Tasso in confinement, yet, every thing being weighed, it seems highly probable that the affair of a delicate nature, said to have been divulged by his friend, must have related to the princess Leonora, the duke's sister: and indeed it will be extremely difficult, from any other consideration, to account for the harsh treatment he received from a prince, who had before shown him such peculiar marks of esteem and friendship. However, Tasso himself had undoubtedly secret apprehensions that increased upon him every day, while the continual attacks which were made upon his credit as an author, not a little contributed to heighten his melancholy. At length he resolved to take the first opportunity to fly from his prison, for so he esteemed it, which after about a year's detention he effected, and retired to Turin, where he endeavoured to remain concealed; but notwithstanding all his precautions, he was soon known, and recommended to the duke of Savoy, who received him into his palace, and showed him every mark of esteem and affection. But Tasso's apprehensions still continued; he thought that the duke of Savoy would not refuse to give him up to the duke of Ferrara, or sacrifice the friendship of that prince to the safety of a private person. Full of these imaginations he set out for Rome^b, alone and unprovided with necessaries for such a journey. At his arrival there he went directly to his old friend Maurizio Cataneo, who received him in such a manner as entirely to obliterate for some time the remembrance of the fatigue and uneasiness he had undergone. He was not only welcomed by Cataneo, but the whole city of Rome seemed to rejoice at the presence of so extraordinary a person. He was visited by princes, cardinals, prelates, and by all the learned in general. But the desire of revisiting his native country, and seeing his sister Cornelia, soon made him uneasy in this situation. He left his friend Maurizio Cataneo one evening, without giving him notice; and, beginning his journey on foot, arrived by night at the mountains of Veletri, where he took up his lodging with some shepherds: the next morning, disguising himself in the habit of one of these people, he continued his way, and in four days time reached Gaeta, almost spent with fatigue: here he embarked on board a vessel bound for Sorrento, at which place he arrived in safety the next day. He entered the city and went directly to his sister's house: she was a widow, and the two sons she had by her husband being at that time absent, Tasso found her with only some of her female attendants. He advanced towards her, without discovering himself, and pretending he came with news from her brother, gave her a letter which he had prepared for that purpose. This letter informed her that her brother's life was in great danger, and that he begged her to make use of all the interest her tenderness might suggest to her, in order to procure letters of recommendation from some powerful person, to avert the threatened misfortune. For further particulars of the affair, she was referred to the messenger who brought her this intelligence. The lady, terrified at the news, earnestly entreated him to give her a detail of her bro-her's misfortune. The feigned messenger then gave her so interesting an account of the pretended story, that, unable to contain her affliction, she fainted away. Tasso was sensibly touched at this convincing proof of his sister's affection, and repented that he had gone so far: he began to comfort her, and, removing her fears by little and little, at last discovered himself to her. Her joy at seeing a brother whom she tenderly loved was inexpressible: after the first salutations were over, she was very desirous to know the occasion of his disguising himself in that manner. Tasso acquainted her with his reasons, and, at the same time, giving her to understand, that he would willingly remain with her unknown to the world, Cornelia, who desired nothing further than to acquiesce in his pleasure, sent for her children and some of her nearest relations, who she thought might be intrusted with the secret. They agreed that Tasso should pass for a relation of theirs, who came from Bergamo to Naples upon his private business, and from thence had come to Sorrento to pay them a visit. After this precaution, Tasso took up his residence at his sister's house, where he lived for some time in tranquillity, entertaining himself with his two nephews Antonio and Alessandro Bersale, children of great hopes. He continued not long in this repose before he received repeated letters from the princess Leonora of Esté, who was acquainted with the place of his retreat, to return to Ferrara: he resolved to obey the summons, and took leave of his sister, telling her he was going to return a voluntary prisoner. In his way he passed through Rome; where having been detained some time with a dangerous fever, he repaired from thence to Ferrara, in company with Gualingo, ambassador from the duke to the pope.

Concerning the motive of Tasso's return to Ferrara, authors do not altogether agree: some declare that, soon wearied of living in obscurity, and growing impatient to retrieve the duke's favour, he had resolved, of his own accord, to throw himself on that prince's generosity: this opinion seems indeed drawn from Tasso's own words, in a letter written by him to the duke of Urbino, in which he declares "that he had endeavoured to make his peace with the duke, and had for that purpose written severally to him, the duchess of Ferrara, the duchess of Urbino, and the princess Leonora; yet never received any answer but from the last, who assured him it was not in her power to render him any service." We see here that Tasso acknowledges himself the receipt of a letter from the princess; and in regard to what he says to be the purport of it, it is highly reasonable to suppose, that he would be very cautious of divulging the real contents to the duke of Urbino, when his affairs with that lady were so delicately circumstanced. This apparent care to conceal the nature of his correspondence with her, seems to corroborate the former suppositions of his uncommon attachment to her; and when all circumstances are considered, we believe it will appear more than probable that he returned to Ferrara at the particular injunction of Leonora.

The duke received Tasso with great seeming satisfaction, and gave him fresh marks of his esteem: but this was not all that Tasso expected; his great desire was to be master of his own works, and he was very earnest that his writings might be restored to him, which were in the duke's possession; but this was what he could by no means obtain: his enemies had gained such an ascendancy over the mind of Alphonso, that they made him believe, or pretend to believe, that the poet had lost all his fire, and that in his present situation he was incapable of producing any thing new, or of correcting his poems: he therefore exhorted him to think only of leading a quiet and easy life for the future: but Tasso was sensibly vexed at this proceeding, and believed the duke wanted him entirely to relinquish his studies, and pass the remainder of his days in idleness and obscurity. "He would endeavour," says he, in his letter to the duke of Urbino, "to make me a shameful deserter of Parnassus for the gardens of Epicurus, for scenes of pleasures unknown to Virgil, Catullus, Horace, and even Lucretius himself."

Tasso reiterated his entreaties to have his writings restored to him; but the duke continued inflexible, and, to complete our poet's vexation, all access to the princesses was denied him: fatigued at length with useless remonstrances, he once more quitted Ferrara, and fled (as he expresses it himself) like another Bias, leaving behind him even his books and manuscripts.

He then went to Mantua, where he found duke Guglielmo in a decrepit age, and little disposed to protect him against the duke of Ferrara: the prince Vincenzio Gonzaga received him indeed with great caresses, but was too young to take him under his protection. From thence he went to Padua and Venice; but carrying with him in every part his fears of the duke of Ferrara, he at last had recourse to the duke of Urbino¹¹, who showed him great kindness, but perhaps was very little inclined to embroil himself with his brother-in-law, on such an account: he advised Tasso rather to return to Ferrara; which counsel he took, resolving once more to try his fortune with the duke.

¹¹ Ann. et. 55.

Alphonso, it may be, exasperated at Tasso's flight, and pretending to believe that application to study had entirely disordered his understanding, and that a strict regimen was necessary to restore him to his former state, caused him to be strictly confined in the hospital of St. Anna. Tasso tried every method to soften the duke and obtain his liberty; but the duke coldly answered those who applied to him, "that instead of concerning themselves with the complaints of a person in his condition, who was very little capable of judging for his own good, they ought rather to exhort him patiently to submit to such remedies as were judged proper for his circumstances."

This confinement threw Tasso into the deepest despair; he abandoned himself to his misfortunes, and the methods that were made use of for the cure of his pretended madness had nearly thrown him into an absolute delirium. His imagination was so disturbed that he believed the cause of his distemper was not natural; he sometimes fancied himself haunted by a spirit, that continually disordered his books and papers; and these strange notions were perhaps strengthened by the tricks that were played him by his keeper. While Tasso continued in this melancholy situation, he is said to have written the following elegant, simple, and affecting lines, which cannot well be translated into English verse:

Tu che ne vai in Pindo
Ivi pende mia cetra ad un cipresso,
Salutala in mio nome, e dille poi
Ch'io son dagl'anni e da fortuna oppresso¹¹.

This second confinement of Tasso was much longer than the first. He applied in vain to the pope, the emperor, and all the powers of Italy, to obtain his liberty: till, at last, after seven years imprisonment, he gained what he so ardently wished for, in the following manner.

Cesar of Estè having brought his new spouse, Virginia of Medici, to Ferrara, all the relations of that illustrious house assembled together on this occasion, and nothing was seen in the whole city but festivals and rejoicings. Vincento Gonzaga, prince of Mantua, particularly distinguished himself among the great personages then at the duke's court. This nobleman interceded so earnestly with Alphonso for Tasso's liberty, that he at last obtained it¹², and carried him with him to Mantua, where he lived with him, some time after the death of duke Guglielmo, highly favoured.

It is said that the young prince, who was naturally gay, being desirous to authorize his pleasures by the example of a philosopher, introduced one day into Tasso's company three sisters, to sing and play upon instruments; these ladies were all very handsome, but not of the most rigid virtue. After some short discourse, he told Tasso, that he should take two of them away, and would leave one behind, and made him take his choice. Tasso answered, "that it cost Paris very dear to give the preference to one of the goddesses, and therefore, with his permission, he designed to retain the three." The prince took him at his word; and departed; when Tasso, after a little conversation, dismissed them all handsomely with presents.

At last, weary of living in a continual state of dependence, he resolved to retire to Naples, and endeavour to recover his mother's jointure, which had been seized upon by her relations when he went into exile with his father Bernardo. This appeared the only means to place him in the condition of life he so much desired. He applied to his friends, and, having procured favourable letters to the viceroy, he took leave of the duke of Mantua and repaired to Bergamo¹³, where he stayed some time, and from thence went to Naples¹⁴.

While Tasso continued at Naples, dividing his time between his studies and the prosecution of his law-suit, the young count of Palea, by whom he was highly esteemed, persuaded him to take up his residence with him for some time: but in this affair he had not consulted the prince of Conca, his father, who, though he had a value for Tasso, yet could not approve of his son's receiving into his house the only person that remained of a family once devoted to the prince of Salerno. A contention being likely to ensue, on this account, betwixt the father and son, Tasso, with his usual goodness of disposition, to remove all occasion of dispute, withdrew from Naples, and retired to Blaccio¹⁵, with his friend Maso, in whose company he lived some time with great tranquillity.

In this place Maso had an opportunity to examine the singular effects of Tasso's melancholy; and often disputed with him concerning a familiar spirit, which he pretended to converse with. Maso endeavoured in vain to persuade his friend that the whole was the illusion of a disturbed imagination: but the latter was strenuous in maintaining the reality of what he asserted; and, to convince Manso, desired him to be present at one of those mysterious conversations. Manso had the complaisance to meet him the next day, and, while they were engaged in discourse, on a sudden he observed that Tasso kept his eyes fixed upon a window, and remained in a manner immovable: he called him by his name several times, but received no answer: at last Tasso cried out, "There is the friendly spirit who is come to converse with me: look, and you will be convinced of the truth of all that I have said." Manso heard him with surprise: he looked, but saw nothing except the sun-beams darting through the window: he cast his eyes all over the room, but could perceive nothing, and was just going to ask where the pretended spirit was, when he heard Tasso speak with great earnestness, sometimes putting questions to the spirit, and sometimes giving answers, delivering the whole in such a pleasing manner, and with such elevated expressions, that he listened with admiration, and had not the least inclination to interrupt him. At last this uncommon conversation ended with the departure of the spirit, as appeared by Tasso's words: who, turning towards Manso, asked him if his doubts were removed. Manso was more amazed than ever; he scarce knew what to think of his friend's situation, and waved any further conversation on the subject.

At the approach of winter they returned to Naples, when the prince of Palena again pressed Tasso to reside with him; but Tasso, who judged it highly unadvisable to comply with his request, resolved to retire to Rome, and wait there the issue of his law-suit. He lived in that city about a year in high esteem with pope Sixtus V; when, being invited to Florence by Ferdinando, grand duke of Tuscany, who had been cardinal at Rome when Tasso first resided there, and who now employed the pope's interest to procure a visit from him, he could not withstand such solicitations, but went to Florence, where he met with a most gracious reception¹⁶. Yet not all the caresses he received at the duke's court, nor all the promises of that prince, could overcome his love for his native country, or lessen the ardent desire he had to lead a retired and independent life. He therefore took his leave of the grand duke, who would have loaded him with presents; but Tasso, as usual, could be prevailed upon to accept of no more than was necessary for his present occasions. He returned to Naples by the way of Rome¹⁷, and the old prince of Conca dying about this time, the young count of Palena prevailed upon Tasso, by the mediation of Manso, to accept of an apartment in his palace. Here he applied himself to a correction of his Jerusalem, or rather to compose a new work entitled Jerusalem Conquered, which he had begun during his first residence at Naples. The prince of Conca, being jealous lest any one should deprive him of the poet and poem, caused him to be so narrowly watched that Tasso observed it, and being displeased at such a proceeding, left the prince's palace, and retired to his friend Manso's, where he lived master of himself and his actions; yet he still continued upon good terms with the prince of Conca.

In a short time after he published his Jerusalem Conquered, which poem, as a French writer observes¹⁸, "is a sufficient proof of the injustice of the criticisms that have been passed upon his Jerusalem Delivered; since the Jerusalem Conquered, in which he endeavoured to conform himself to the taste of his critics, was not received with the same approbation as the former poem, where he had entirely given himself up to the enthusiasm of his genius." He had likewise designed a third correction of the same poem, which, as we are informed, was to have been partly compounded of the Jerusalem Delivered and Conquered; but this work was never completed. The above-cited author remarks, "that, in all probability, this last performance would not have equalled the first:" and indeed our poet seems to owe his fame to the Jerusalem Delivered, the second poem upon that subject being little known.

Manso's garden commanded a full prospect of the sea. Tasso and his friend being one day in a summer-house with Scipio Belprato, Manso's brother-in-law, observing the waves agitated with a furious storm, Belprato said, "that he was astonished at the rashness and folly of men who would expose themselves to the rage of so merciless an element, where such numbers had suffered shipwreck." "And yet," said Tasso, "we every night go without fear to bed, where so many die every hour. Believe me, death will find us in all parts, and those places that appear the least exposed are not always the most secure from his attacks."

While Tasso lived with his friend Manso, cardinal Hippolito Aldobrandini succeeded to the papacy by the name of Clement VIII. His two nephews, Cynthio and Pietro Aldobrandini, were created cardinals: the first, afterwards called the cardinal of St. George, was the eldest, a great patron of science, and a favourite of learned men: he had known Tasso when he resided last at Rome, and had the greatest esteem for him; and now so earnestly invited him to Rome, that he could not refuse, but once more abandoned his peaceful retreat at Naples.

gether in large companies. Tasso joined himself to one of these; but when they came within sight of Mola, a little town near Gaeta, they received intelligence that Sciarra, a famous captain of robbers, was near at hand with a great body of men. Tasso was of opinion that they should continue their journey, and endeavour to defend themselves, if attacked: however, this advice was over-ruled, and they threw themselves for safety into Mola, in which place they remained for some time in a manner blocked up by Sciarra. But this outlaw, hearing that Tasso was one of the company, sent a message to assure him that he might pass in safety, and offered himself to conduct him wherever he pleased. Tasso returned him thanks, but declined accepting the offer, not choosing, perhaps, to rely on the word of a person of such character. Sciarra, upon this, sent a second message, by which he informed Tasso, that, upon his account, he would withdraw his men, and leave the ways open. He accordingly did so; and Tasso, continuing his journey, arrived without any accident at Rome, where he was most graciously welcomed by the two cardinals and the pope himself. Tasso applied himself in a particular manner to cardinal Cynthio, who had been the means of his coming to Rome; yet he neglected not to make his court to cardinal Aldobrandini, and he very frequently conversed with both of them. One day the two cardinals held an assembly of several prelates, to consult, among other things, of some method to put a stop to the license of the Pasquinades. One proposed that Pasquin's statue should be broken to pieces and cast into the river. But Tasso's opinion being asked, he said, "it would be much more prudent to let it remain where it was, for otherwise from the fragments of the statue would be bred an infinite number of frogs on the banks of the Tyber, that would never cease to croak day and night." The pope, to whom cardinal Aldobrandini related what had passed, interrogated Tasso upon the subject, "It is true, holy father," said he, "such was my opinion; and I shall add moreover, that if your holiness would silence Pasquin, the only way is to put such people into employments as may give no occasion to any libels or disaffected discourse."

At last, being again disgusted with the life of a courtier, he obtained permission to retire to Naples to prosecute his law-suit²⁹. At his arrival there he took up his lodging in the convent of St. Severin, with the fathers of St. Benedict.

Thus was Tasso once more in a state of tranquillity and retirement, so highly agreeable to his disposition, when cardinal Cynthio again found means to recall him, by prevailing on the pope to give him the honour of being solemnly crowned with laurel in the capitol. Though Tasso himself was not in the least desirous of such pomp, yet he yielded to the persuasions of others, particularly of his dear friend Manso, to whom he protested that he went merely at his earnest desire, not with any expectation of the promised triumph, which he had a secret presage would never be. He was greatly affected at parting from Manso, and took his leave of him as of one he should never see again.

In his way he passed by Mount Cassino, to pay his devotion to the relics of St. Benedict, for whom he had a particular veneration. He spent the festival of Christmas in that monastery, and from thence repaired to Rome, where he arrived in the beginning of the year 1595³⁰. He was met at the entrance of that city by many prelates and persons of distinction, and was afterwards introduced, by the two cardinals Cynthio and Pietro, to the presence of the pope, who was pleased to tell him, "that his merit would add as much honour to the laurel he was going to receive, as that crown had formerly given to those on whom it had hitherto been bestowed."

Nothing was now thought of but the approaching solemnity: orders were given to decorate not only the pope's palace and the capitol, but all the principal streets through which the procession was to pass. Yet Tasso appeared little moved with these preparations, which he said would be in vain: and being shown a sonnet composed upon the occasion by his relation, Hercole Tasso, he answered by the following verse of Seneca:

Magnifica verba mors propè admota exentit.

His presages were but too true; for, while they waited for fair weather to celebrate the solemnity, cardinal Cynthio fell ill, and continued for some time indisposed; and, as soon as the cardinal began to recover, Tasso himself was seized with his last sickness.

Though he had only completed his fifty-first year, his studies and misfortunes had brought on a premature old age. Being persuaded that his end was approaching, he resolved to spend the few days he had yet to live in the monastery of St. Omaphrus. He was carried thither in cardinal Cynthio's coach, and received with the utmost tenderness by the prior and brethren of that order. His distemper was now so far increased, and his strength so exhausted, that all kind of medicine proved ineffectual. On the tenth of April he was taken with a violent fever, occasioned perhaps by having eaten some milk, a kind of aliment he was particularly fond of. His life now seemed in imminent danger: the most famous physicians in Rome tried all their art, but in vain, to relieve him: he grew worse and worse every day. Rinaldini, the pope's physician and Tasso's intimate friend, having informed him that his last hour was near at hand, Tasso embraced him tenderly, and with a composed countenance returned him thanks for his tidings; then looking up to Heaven, he "acknowledged the goodness of God, who was at last pleased to bring him safe into port after so long a storm." From that time his mind seemed entirely disentangled from earthly affairs: he received the sacrament in the chapel of the monastery, being conducted thither by the brethren. When he was brought back to his chamber, he was asked where he wished to be interred; he answered, In the church of St. Onuphrius; and being desired to leave some memorial of his will in writing, and to dictate himself the epitaph that should be engraven on his tomb; he smiled and said, "that in regard to the first, he had little worldly goods to leave, and as to the second, a plain stone would suffice to cover him." He left cardinal Cynthio his heir, and desired that his own picture might be given to Giovanni Baptista Manso, which had been drawn by his direction. At length having attained the fourteenth day of his illness, he received the extreme unction. Cardinal Cynthio hearing that he was at the last extremity, came to visit him, and brought him the pope's benediction, a grace never conferred in this manner but on cardinals and persons of the first distinction. Tasso acknowledged this honour with great devotion and humility, and said, "that this was the crown he came to receive at Rome." The cardinal having asked him "if he had any thing further to desire," he replied, "the only favour he had now to beg of him, was, that he would collect together the copies of all his works (particularly his Jerusalem Delivered, which he esteemed most imperfect) and commit them to the flames: this task, he confessed, might be found something difficult, as those pieces were dispersed abroad in so many different places, but yet he trusted it would not be found altogether impracticable." He was so earnest in his request, that the cardinal, unwilling to discompose him by a refusal, gave him such a doubtful answer as led him to believe that his desire would be complied with. Tasso then requesting to be left alone, the cardinal took his farewell of him with tears in his eyes, leaving with him his confessor and some of the brethren of the monastery. In this condition he continued all night, and till the middle of the next day, the 25th of April, being the festival of St. Mark; when finding himself fainting, he embraced his crucifix, uttering these words: In manus tuas, Domine—but expired before he could finish the sentence.

Tasso was tall and well-shaped, his complexion fair, but rather pale through sickness and study; the hair of his head was of a chestnut colour, but that of his beard somewhat lighter, thick and bushy; his forehead square and high, his head large, and the fore part of it, towards the end of his life, altogether bald; his eye-brows were dark; his eyes full, piercing, and of a clear blue; his nose large, his lips thin, his teeth well set and white; his neck well proportioned; his breast full; his shoulders broad, and all his limbs more sinewy than fleshy. His voice was strong, clear, and soft; he spoke with deliberation, and generally reiterated his last words: he seldom laughed, and never to excess. He was very expert in the exercises of the body. In his oratory, he used little action, and rather pleased by the beauty and force of his expressions, than by the graces of gesture and utterance, that compose so great a part of elocution. Such was the exterior of Tasso: as to his mental qualities, he appears to have been a great genius, and a soul elevated above the common rank of mankind. It is said of him, that there never was a scholar more humble, a wit more devout, or a man more amiable in society. Never satisfied with his works, even when they rendered his name famous throughout the world; always satisfied with his condition, even when he wanted every thing; entirely relying on Providence and his friends; without malevolence towards his greatest enemies; only wishing for riches that he might be serviceable to others, and making a scruple to receive or keep any thing himself that was not absolutely necessary. So blameless and regular a life could not but be ended by a peaceable death, which carried him off anno 1595, in the fifty-second year of his age.

He was buried the same evening, without pomp, according to his desire, in the church of St. Onuphrius, and his body was covered with a plain stone. Cardinal Cynthio had purposed to erect a magnificent monument to his memory; but the design was so long prevented by sickness and other accidents, that, ten years after, Manso coming to Rome, went to visit his friend's remains, and would have taken on himself the care of building a tomb to him; but this cardinal Cynthio would by no means permit, having determined himself to pay that duty to Tasso. However, Manso prevailed so far as to have the following words engraven on the stone:

HIC IACET TORQVATVS TASSVS.

Cardinal Cynthio dying without putting his design in execution, cardinal Bonifacio Bevilacqua, of an illustrious family of Ferrara, caused a stately sepulchre to be erected, in the church of St. Onuphrius, over the remains of a man whose works had made all other monuments superfluous.

JERUSALEM DELIVERED,

TRANSLATED BY HOOLE.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Christians, having assembled a vast army under different leaders for the recovery of Jerusalem from the Saracens, after various successes encamped in the plains of Tortosa. At this time the action of the poem begins: God sends his angel to the camp, and commands Godfrey to summon a council of the chiefs. The assembly meets. Godfrey, with universal consent, is elected commander in chief of all the Christian forces. He reviews the army. The different nations described. The names and qualities of the leaders. The army begins its march towards Jerusalem. Aladine, king of Jerusalem, alarmed at the progress of the Christians, makes preparations for the defence of the city.

Arms, and the chief I sing, whose righteous hands
Redeem'd the tomb of Christ from impious bands;
Who much in council, much in field sustain'd,
Till just success his glorious labours gain'd:
In vain the powers of Hell oppos'd his course,
And Asia's arms, and Libya's mingled force;
Heaven bless'd his standards, and beneath his care
Reduc'd his wandering partners of the war.

O sacred Muse! who ne'er, in Ida's shade,
With fading laurels deck'st thy radiant head;

¹ Some Italian commentators suppose the poet intends the Virgin Mary; thus likewise mentioned by Petrarch, Coronata di stelle,—but it probably means no more than a general appeal to some celestial being, in opposition to the Pagan theology. Thus Milton:

Descend from Heaven, Urania, by that name
If rightly thou art call'd, whose voice divine
Following, above th' Olympian hill I soar,
Above the flight of Pegasus wing.

But sitt'st enthron'd, with stars immortal crown'd,
Where blissful choirs their hallow'd strains resound;
Do thou inspire me with celestial fire,
Assist my labours, and my song inspire;
Forgive me, if with truth I fiction join,
And grace the verse with other charms than thine.
Thou know'st the world with eager transport throng
Where sweet Parnassus breathes the tuneful song;
That truth can oft, in pleasing strains convey'd,
Allure the fancy, and the mind persuade.
Thus the sick infant's taste² disguis'd to meet,
We tinge the vessel's brim with juices sweet;
The bitter draught his willing lip receives;
He drinks deceiv'd, and so deceiv'd he lives. [power
Thou, great Alphonso³! who from Fortune's
Hast safely brought me to the peaceful shore;
When, like a wanderer, o'er the seas I pass'd
Amid the threatening rocks and watery waste;
Vouchsafe, with smiles, my labours to survey;
These votive lines to thee the Muses pay.
Some future time may teach my loftier lays
To sing thy actions and record thy praise:
If e'er the Christian powers their strife forbear,
And join their forces for a nobler war;
With steeds and vessels pass to distant Thrace,
To gain their conquests from a barbarous race;
To thee the sway of earth they must resign,
Or, if thou rather choose, the sea be thine:
Meanwhile, to rival Godfrey's glorious name
Attend, and rouse thy soul to martial fame.
Five times the Sun his annual circuit ran,
Since first the Christian powers the war began:

The meaning, not the name, I call: for thou
Nor of the Muses nine, nor on the top
Of old Olympian dwell'st—

³ Alphonso of Este, duke of Ferrara.

By fierce assault, already Nice⁴ they held;
And made, by stratagem, proud Antioch⁵ yield;
There, with undaunted hearts, maintain'd their post
Against the numbers of the Persian host.
Tortosa won, the wintry months appear,
And close the conquests of the glorious year.

The season that oppos'd the victor's force
Began to yield to spring's benignant course;
When now th' Eternal, from his awful height,
Enthron'd in purest rays of heavenly light,
(As far remov'd above the starry spheres
As Hell's foundations from the distant stars)
Cast on the subject world his piercing eyes,
And view'd at once the seas, the earth, and skies:
He turn'd his looks intent on Syria's lands,
And mark'd the leaders of the Christian bands;
No secret from his searching eye conceal'd,
But all their boasts to his view reveal'd.
Godfrey he sees, who burns with zeal to chase
From Sidon's wall the Pagan's impious race;
And, while religious fires his breast inflame,
Despises worldly empire, wealth, and fame.
Far other schemes in Baldwin next he views,
Whose restless heart ambition's track pursues.
Tendered he sees his life no longer prize,
The insensate victim of a woman's eyes!
Besom'd he marks, intent to fix his reign
In Antioch's town, his new-acquir'd domain;
With laws and arts the people to improve,
And teach the worship of the powers above:
And while these thoughts alone his soul divide,
The prince is lost to every care beside.
He then beholds in young Rinaldo's breast
A warlike mind, that scorn'd ignoble rest:
Nor hopes of gold or power the youth inflame,
But sacred thirst of never-dying fame;
From Guelpho's lips, with kindling warmth, he hears

The ancients' glory, and their deeds revere.
When now the Sovereign of the world had seen
The cares and aims below of mortal men,
He call'd on Gabriel from th' angelic race,
Who held in glorious rank the second place⁶;
A faithful nunciato from the throne above,
Divine interpreter of heavenly love!
He bears the mandate from the realms of light,
And waits our prayers before the Almighty's sight.
To him th' Eternal: "Speed thy rapid way,
And thus to Godfrey's ear our words convey:
'Why this neglect?—Why linger thus the bands
To free Jerusalem from impious hands?'
Let him to council bid the chiefs repair,
There rouse the tardy to pursue the war:
The power supreme on him they shall bestow,
I here elect him for my chief below:
The rest shall to his sway submissive yield,
Companions oute, now subjects in the field."

⁴ The city where Solyman, king of the Turks, a principal character in the poem, once held his seat of empire.

⁵ This city, having been besieged eight months by the Christians, was at last taken by stratagem, by means of one Pyrrhus, who delivered a fort into the hands of Besom'd.

⁶ That is, amongst the seven spirits that are said to stand before the throne of God, Michael, Gabriel, Lameel, Raphael, Zachariel, Ansel, and Oribiel." Quastavini.

He said; and straight, with zealous ardour prest,
Gabriel prepares to obey his Lord's behest.
He clothes his heavenly form with ether light,
And makes it visible to human sight;
In shape and limbs like one of earthly race,
But brightly shining with celestial grace:
A youth he seem'd, in manhood's ripening years,
On the smooth cheek when first the down appears;
Refulgent rays his beauteous locks enfold,
White are his nimble wings, and edg'd with gold:
With these through winds and clouds he cuts his way,

Flies o'er the land, and skims along the sea.
Thus stood th' angelic power, prepar'd for flight,
Then instant darted from th' empyreal height,
Direct to Lebanon his course he bent,
There clos'd his plumes, and made his first descent;
Thence with new speed, his airy wings he steer'd,
Till now in sight Tortosa's plains appear'd.

The cheerful Sun his ruddy progress held,
Part rais'd above the waves, and part conceal'd:
Now Godfrey, as accustom'd, rose to pay
His pure devotions with the dawning ray:
When the bright form appearing from the east,
More fair than opening morn, the chief address'd:

"Again return'd the vernal season view,
That bids the host their martial toils renew:
What, Godfrey, now withhold the Christian bands
To free Jerusalem from impious hands?
Go, to the council every chief invite,
And to the pious task their souls incite.
Heaven makes thee general of his host below,
The rest submissive to thy rule shall bow.
Dispatch'd from God's eternal throne, I came
To bring these tidings in his awful name:
O think what zeal, what glory now demands
From such a host committed to thy hands!"

He ceas'd, and, ceasing, vanish'd from his sight
To the pure regions of his native light;
While, with his words and radiant looks amaz'd,
The pious Godfrey long in silence gaz'd.
But when, his first surprise and wonder fled,
He ponder'd all the heavenly vision said;
What ardour then possess'd his swelling mind
To end the war, his glorious task assign'd!
Yet no ambitious thoughts his breast inflame,
(Though singled thus from ev'ry earthly name)
But with his own, his Maker's will conspires,
And adds new fuel to his native fires.

Then straight the heralds round with speed he sends

To call the council of his warlike friends;
Each word employs the sleeping zeal to raise,
And wake the soul to deeds of martial praise.
So well his reasons and his prayers were join'd,
As pleas'd at once and won the vanquish'd mind.

The leaders came, the subject troops obey'd,
And Besom'd only from the summons stay'd.
Part wait without encamp'd (a numerous band),
While part Tortosa in her walls detain'd.
And now the mighty chiefs in council sat
(A glorious synod!) at the grand debate;
When, rising in the midst, with awful look,
And pleasing voice, the pious Godfrey spoke:

"Ye sacred warriors! whom th' Almighty Power
Selects his pure religion to restore,
And safe has led, by his preserving hand,
Through storms at sea, and hostile wiles by land;
What rapid course our conquering arms have run!
What rebel lands to his subjection won!

How o'er the vanquish'd nations spread the fame
Of his dread ensigns, and his holy name!
Yet, not for this we left our natal seats,
And the dear pledges of domestic sweets;
On treacherous seas the rage of storms to dare,
And all the perils of a foreign war:
For this, an end unequal to your arms,
Nor bleeds the combat, nor the conquest charms:
Nor such reward your matchless labours claim,
Barbarian kingdoms, and ignoble fame!
Far other prize our pious toils must crown;
We fight to conquer Sion's hallow'd town;
To free from servile yoke the Christian train
Oppress'd so long in slavery's galling chain;
To found in Palestine a regal seat,
Where piety may find a safe retreat;
Where none the pilgrim's zeal shall more oppose
To adore the tomb, and pay his grateful vows.
Full many dangerous trials have we known,
But little honour all our toils have won:
Our purpose lost, while indolent we stay,
Or turn the force of arms a different way.
Why gathers Europe such a host from far,
And kindles Asia with the flames of war?
Lo! all th' event our mighty deeds have shown—
Not kingdoms rais'd, but kingdoms overthrown!
Who thinks an empire midst his foes to found,
With countless inh'dels encompass'd round;
Where prudence little hopes from Grecian lands,
And distant lie remov'd the western bands,
Inevitable surely plans his future doom,
And rashly builds his own untimely tomb.
The Turks and Persians routed, Antioch won,
Are gallant acts, and challenge due renown. [hand
These were not ours, but wrought by him whose
With such success has crown'd our favour'd band.
But if, forgetful of that aid divine,
We turn these blessings from the first design;
Th' Almighty giver may forsake our name,
And nations round revile our former fame.
Forbid it, Heaven! such favour should be lost,
And vainly lavish'd on a thankless host!
All great designs to one great period tend,
And every part alike respects its end.
Th' suspicious season bids the war proceed;
The country open, and the passes freed:
Why march we not with speed to reach the town,
The prize decreed our conquering arms to crown?
To what I now protest, ye chiefs! give ear,
(The present times, the future age shall bear;
The host of saints be witness from above)
The time is ripe the glorious task to prove.
The longer pause we make our hopes are less,
Delays may change our now assur'd success,
My mind foretels, if long our march is staid,
Sion will gain from Egypt powerful aid.⁷
He ceas'd; a murmur at his words ensu'd:
When from his seat the hermit Peter⁷ stood;

⁷ Peter commonly called the Hermit, was a native of Amiens, had made the pilgrimage to Jerusalem, and being affected with the dangers to which the pilgrims were exposed since the inh'dels had gained possession of the Holy Land, first entertained the bold, and to all appearance impracticable, idea, of establishing the Christians in Jerusalem. He went from province to province, with a crucifix in his hand, exciting the princes and people to the holy war; and we have the incredible account from con-

Who sat with princes their debates to share—
The holy author of this pious war.

“What Godfrey speaks, with ardour I approve,
Such obvious truths must every bosom move;
’Tis yours, O chiefs! to own its genuine power;
But let me add to his one counsel more.
When now, revolving in my careful mind,
I view our actions past, by strife disjoint;
Our jarring wills; our disunited force,
And many plans obstructed in their course;
Methinks my judgment to their spring can trace
The troubled motions that our cause disgrace.
’Tis in that power, in many leaders join’d,
Of various tempers, and discordant mind,
If o'er the rest no sovereign chief preside,
To allot the several posts, the tasks divide;
To scourge th’ offender, or rewards bestow;
What riot and misrule the state o’erflow!
Then in one body join our social band,
And trust the rule to one important hand;
To him resign the sceptre and the sway,
And him their king th’ united host obey.”

Here ceas’d the reverend sage. O zeal divine!
What bosoms can withstand a power like thine?
Thy sacred breath the hermit’s words inspir’d,
And with his words the listening heroes fir’d;
Dispell’d their doubts, their passions lull’d to rest,
And vain ambition chas’d from every breast.
Then Guelpho first and William (chiefs of fame)
Saluted Godfrey with a general’s name,
Their chief elect: the rest approv’d the choice,
And gave the rule to him with public voice:
His equals once to his dominion yield,
Supreme in council, and supreme in field!
Th’ assembly ended, swift-wing’d Rumour fled,
And round from man to man the tidings spread.
Meantime before the soldiers Godfrey came,
Who hail’d him as their chief with loud acclaim:
Sedate he heard th’ applause on every side,
And mildly to their dutieous zeal reply’d;
Then on the morrow bade the troops prepare
To pass before his sight in form of war.

Now, to the east return’d, with purer ray
The glorious Sun reveal’d the golden day;
When, early rising with the morning light,
Appear’d each warrior sheath’d in armour bright;
Beneath their standards rang’d, the warlike train,
A goodly sight! were marshall’d on the plain;
While on a height the pious Godfrey stood,
And horse and foot at once distinctly view’d.

Say, Muse! from whom no time can truth conceal,
Who canst thy knowledge to mankind reveal,
Oblivion’s foe! thy poet’s breast inflame,
Teach him to tell each gallant leader’s name:
Disclose their ancient glories now to light,
Which rolling years have long obscur’d in night:
Let eloquence like thine assist my tongue,
And future times attend my deathless song!

First in the field the Franks their numbers bring,
Once led by Hugo⁸, brother to the king:

temporary authors, that six millions of persons assumed the cross, which was affixed to their right shoulder, and was the badge that distinguished such as devoted themselves to this holy warfare.

See Robertson’s History of Charles V. vol. i. and Hume’s History of England, vol. i.

⁸ Hugo, or Hugh, count of Vermandois, brother of Philip I. king of France.

From France they came, with verdant beauty crown'd,¹⁰
 Whose fertile soil four running streams surround;
 When Death's relentless stroke their chiefs subdu'd.
 Still the same cause the valiant band pursu'd:
 Beneath the brave Clotharius' care they came,
 Who vaunts no honour of a regal name:
 A thousand, heavy arm'd, compos'd the train,
 An equal number follow'd on the plain;
 And like the first their semblance and their mien,
 Alike their arms and discipline were seen:
 These brought from Normandy, by Robert led,¹¹
 A rightful prince amid their nation bred.
 William and Ademars¹² to these succeed,
 (The people's pastors) and their squadrons lead:
 Far different once their task by Heaven assign'd,
 Religious ministers t' instruct mankind!
 But now the helmet on their heads they bear,
 And learn the deathful business of his war.
 This brings from Orange and the neighbouring land
 Four hundred chosen warriors in his band;
 And that conducts from Poggio to the field
 An equal troop, no less in battle skill'd.
 Great Baldwin next o'er Boloign's force presides,
 And, with his own, his brother's people guides,
 Who to his conduct now resigns the post,
 Himself the chief of chiefs, and lord of all the host.
 Then came Caruti's earl¹³, not less renown'd
 For martial prowess than for counsel sound;
 Four hundred in his train: but Baldwin leads
 Full thrice the number arm'd on generous steeds.
 Near these, the plain the noble Guelpho¹⁴ press'd,
 By fortune equal to his merits bless'd;
 A chief, who by his Roman sire could trace
 A long descent from Este's princely race;
 But German by dominion and by name,
 To Guelpho's praise he join'd his lineal fame:
 He rul'd Carynthia, and the lands possess'd
 By Sueves and Rethians once, his way confess'd.

¹⁰ "Robert, duke of Normandy, had early enlisted himself in the crusade; but being unprovided with money, he resolved to mortgage, or rather sell his dominions, and offered them to his brother (William Rufus, king of England,) for ten thousand marks. The bargain was concluded, and Robert set out for the Holy Land."

See Hume's History of England, vol. 1.

¹¹ "William, archbishop of Orange, and Ademars, archbishop of Poggio. These, according to Paolo Emilio, were the first that on their knees besought pope Urban, at the council of Clermont, to be sent on the crusade." Guastavini.

¹² Stephano, earl of Carnuti, called afterwards earl of Chartres and Blois.

¹³ "There is extant a letter from Stephen, the earl of Chartres and Blois, to Adela his wife, in which he gives her an account of the progress of the crusaders. He describes the crusaders as the chosen army of Christ, as the servants and soldiers of God, as men who marched under the immediate protection of the Almighty, being conducted by his hand to victory and conquest. He speaks of the Turks as accursed, sacrilegious, and devoted by Heaven to destruction; and when he mentions the soldiers in the Christian army which had died, or were killed, he is confident that their souls were admitted directly into the joys of Paradise."

See Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. i.

¹⁴ Son of Aclius the fourth, marquis of Este, and of Cunigunda.

O'er these the chief, by right maternal, reign'd;
 To these his valour many conquests gain'd:
 From thence he brings his troop, a hardy race,
 Still ready death in fighting fields to face;
 Beneath their roofs secur'd from wintry skies,
 The genial feast each joyful day supplies;
 Five thousand once; now scarce a third remain'd,
 Since Persia's fight, of all the numerous band.
 Next those, whose lands¹⁵ the Franks and Germans bound,

 Where Rhine and Maas o'erflow the fruitful ground,
 For countless herds and plenteous crops renew'd.
 With these their aid the neighbouring isles supply'd,
 Whose banks defend them from th' encroaching tide:
 All these a thousand form'd, (a warlike band,)
 O'er whom another Robert held command.
 More numerous was the British squadron shown,
 By William led, the monarch's youngest son¹⁶.
 The English in the bow and shafts are skill'd:
 With them a northern nation seeks the field,
 Whom Ireland, from our world divided far,
 From savage woods and mountains, sends to war.

Tancred was next¹⁷, than whom no greater name
 (Except Rinaldo) fill'd the list of fame;
 Of gentler manners, comelier to the sight,
 Or more intrepid in the day of fight:
 If aught of blame could such a soul reprove,
 Or soil his glorious deeds, the fault was love:
 A sudden love, that, born amidst alarms,
 Was nurs'd with anguish in the din of arms.
 'Tis said, that, on that great and glorious day,
 When to the Franks the Persian host gave way,
 Victorious Tancred, eager to pursue
 The scatter'd remnants of the flying crew,
 O'erwent with labour, sought some kind retreat,
 To quench his thirst and cool his burning heat;
 When, to his wish, a crystal stream he found,
 With bowery shade and verdant herbage crown'd:
 There sudden rush'd before his wondering sight
 A Pagan damsel sheath'd in armour bright:
 Her helm unlac'd, her visage bare display'd,
 And tir'd with fight, she sought the cooling shade.
 Struck with her looks, he view'd the beautiful dame,

Admir'd her charms, and kindled at the flame.
 O wondrous force of Love's resistless dart,
 That pierc'd at once and rooted in his heart!
 Her helm she clos'd, prepar'd to assault the knight,
 But numbers drawing nigh constrain'd her flight;
 The lofty virgin fled, but left behind
 Her lovely form deep imagin'd in his mind;
 Still, in his thought, he views the conscious grove
 Eternal fuel to the flames of love!
 Pensive he comes, his looks his soul declare,
 With eyes cast downward and dejected air:
 Eight hundred horse from fertile seats he leads,
 From hills of Tyrrene and Campania's meads.
 Two hundred Grecians born, were next to see,
 Active in field, from weighty armour free;
 Their crooked sabres at their side they wear;
 Their backs the sounding bows and quivers bear:

¹⁵ The Flemings.

¹⁶ William Rufus was then king, but he had no legitimate offspring.

¹⁷ Son of a sister of Bosmond mad of Rogers, duke of Calabria: she married a marquis Gaglielmo. Bosmond and Rogers were born of Robert Guiscard, of the Norman race.

With matchless swiftness were their steeds endur'd,
 Inur'd to toil, and sparing in their food :
 Swift in attack they rush, and swift in flight,
 In troops retreating and dispers'd they fight:
 Tatinus¹⁶ led their force, the only band
 That join'd the Latian arms from Grecian land:
 Yet near the seat of war, (O lasting shame!
 O foul dishonour to the Grecian name!)
 Thou, Greece, canst bear unmur'd the loud alarms,
 A tame spectator of the deeds of arms!
 If foreign power oppress thy servile reign,
 Thou well deserv'st to wear the victor's chain.

A squadron now, the last in order, came,
 In order last, but first in martial fame;
 Adventurers call'd, and heroes fam'd afar,
 Terrors of Asia, thunderbolts of war!
 Cease, Argo, cease to boast thy warriors' might;
 And, Arthur, cease to vaunt each fabled knight;
 These all th' exploits of ancient times exceed!
 What chief is worthy such a band to lead?
 By joint consent to Dudo's sway they yield,
 Of prudent age, experienc'd in the field;
 Who youthful rigour joins with hoary hairs,
 His bosom mark'd with many many scars.
 Here stood Eustatius with the first in fame,
 But more enobled by his brother's¹⁷ name.
 Gerardo here, the king of Norway's son,
 Who vaunts his scepter'd race and regal crown;
 There Engertan, and there Rogero shin'd;
 Two Gerrards with Rambaldo's dauntless mind;
 With gallant Ubald and Gentonio join'd,
 Rosonudo with the bold must honour claim:
 Nor must oblivion hide Obino's name:
 Nor Lombard's brethren three be left untold,
 Achilles, Stozza, Palamedes bold:
 Nor Otho fierce, whose valour won the shield¹⁸
 That bears a child and serpent on its field.
 Nor Guasco, nor Ridolphus I forget,
 Nor either Guido, both in combat great:
 Nor must I Germain pass, nor Eborard,
 To rob their virtue of its due regard.
 But why neglects my Muse a wedded pair,
 The gallant Edward and Gildippe¹⁹ fair?
 O partners still in every battle try'd,
 Not death your gentle union shall divide!
 The school of love, which e'en the fearful warms,
 The dame instructed in the trade of arms:
 Still by his side her watchful steps attend;
 Still on one fortune both their lives depend:
 No wound in fight can either singly bear,
 For both alike in every anguish share;
 And oft one faints to view the other's wound,
 This shedding blood, and that in sorrow drowns'd!

¹⁶ Tatinus was sent with a squadron of horse, by the emperor Alexas, from Constantinople, to join the Christians in their expedition.

¹⁷ Godfrey.

¹⁸ At the time of the crusade, Otho of the Visconti overcame one Volucius, a leader of the Saracens, who had defied the Christians to single combat, and wore for his crest a serpent and child, which device was ever after worn by this Otho: this circumstance is mentioned by Ariosto.

¹⁹ Tasso, in one of his letters, writes, that Edward was an English baron, and that his wife, by whom he was tenderly beloved, accompanied him in this expedition, where they both perished.

But lo! o'er these, o'er all the host confest,
 The young Rinaldo²⁰ tower'd above the rest:
 With martial grace his looks around he cast,
 And gazing crowds admir'd him as he pass'd.
 Mature beyond his years his virtues shone,
 As, mix'd with blossoms, grows the budding fruit,
 When clad in steel, he seems like Mars to move;
 His face disclos'd, he looks the god of love!²¹
 This youth on Adige's fair winding shore,
 To great Bertoldo fair Sophia bore.
 The infant from the breast Matilda²² rears,
 (The watchful guardian of his tender years)
 And, while beneath her care the youth remains,
 His ripening age to regal virtue trains;
 Till the loud trumpet, from the distant east,
 With early thirst of glory fir'd his breast.
 Then (fifteen springs scarce changing o'er his head)
 Guideless, untaught, through ways unknown he led;
 Th' Egean sea he cross'd and Grecian lands,
 And reach'd, in climates remote, the Christian bands,
 Three years the warrior in the camp had seen,
 Yet scarce the dawn began to shade his chin.

Now all the horse were past: in order led,
 Next came the foot, and Raymond²³ at their head:
 Thoudous he governs, and collects his train
 Between the Pyreneans and the main:
 Four thousand arm'd in proof, well us'd to bear
 Th' inclement seasons, and the toils of war:
 A band approv'd in every battle try'd;
 Nor could the band an abler leader guide.
 Next Stephen of Amboise conducts his power:
 From Tours and Blois he brings five thousand more:
 No hardy nation this, inur'd to fight,
 Though form'd in shining steel, a martial sight!
 Soft is their soil, and of a gentle kind,
 And, like their soil, th' inhabitants inclin'd:
 Impetuous first they run to meet the foe,
 But soon, repuls'd, their forces languid grow.
 Alcastus was the third, with threatening mien;
 (So Capaneus of old at Thebes was seen)
 Six thousand warriors, in Helvetia bred,
 Plebeians fierce, from Alpine heights he led:
 Their rural tools, that wont the earth to rear,
 They turn'd to nobler instruments of war;
 And with those hands, accusom'd herds to guide,
 They boldly now the might of kings defy'd.

Lo! rais'd in air the standard proudly shown,
 In which appear the keys and papal crown:
 Seven thousand foot there good Camillus leads,
 In heavy arms that gleam across the meads:

²⁰ The poet, by a poetical anachronism, feigns this Rinaldo to have been at the siege of Jerusalem; for Rinaldo of Este, son of Bertoldo, was not born till the year 1175, and Jerusalem was taken in 1097.

²¹ Rinaldo, in many respects, is after the Achilles of Homer, who is represented not only the bravest, but the handsomest, of all the Greeks, except Nireus, thus mentioned in the catalogue of the forces:

Nireus in faultless shape and blooming years,
 The loveliest youth of all the Grecian race,
 Pelides only match'd his early charms.—

Pope's II. E. 81V.

²² See the notes to Book xvii. for an account of this extraordinary woman, here feigned to have presided over the education of Rinaldo.

²³ Raymond, count of Toulouse, a name well known in the history of those times.

O'erjoy'd he seems, decreed his name to grace,
And add new honours to his ancient race;
Whate'er the Latin discipline may claim,
In glorious deeds to boast an equal fame.

Now every squadron rang'd in order due,
Had pass'd before the chief in fair review;
When Godfrey straight the peers assembled holds,
And thus the purport of his mind unfolds.

"Soon as the morning lifts her early head,
Let all the forces from the camp be led,
With speedy course to reach the sacred town,
Ere yet their purpose or their march is known.
Prepare then for the way, for fight prepare,
Nor doubt, my friends, of conquest in the war!"

These words, from such a chieftain's lips, inspire
Each kindling breast, and wake the slumbering fire:
Already for th' expected fight they burn,
And pant impatient for the day's return.
Yet still some fears their careful chief oppress'd,
But these he smother'd in his thoughtful breast:
By certain tidings brought, he lately heard,
That Egypt's king his course for Gaza steer'd;
(A frontier town that all the realm commands,
And a strong barrier to the Syrian lands)
Full well he knows the monarch's restless mind,
Nor doubts in him a cruel foe to find.
Aside the pious leader Henry took,
And thus his faithful messenger bespoke:

"Attend my words, some speedy bark ascend,
And to the Grecian shore thy voyage bend:
A youth will there arrive of regal name,⁴⁴
Who comes to share our arms and share our fame;
Prince of the Danes, who brings from distant lands,
Beneath the frozen pole, his valiant bands:
The Grecian monarch, vers'd in fraud, may try
His arts on him, and every means employ
To stop the youthful warrior in his course,
And rob our hopes of this auxiliary force.

My faithful nunciate thou, the Dane invite,
With every thought the gallant prince excite,
Both for his fame and mine, to speed his way,
Nor taint his glory with ill-tim'd delay.
Thou wilt the sovereign of the Greeks remain,
To claim the succours promis'd oft in vain."

He said: and having thus reveal'd his mind,
And due credentials to his charge consign'd,
The trusty messenger his vessel sought,
And Godfrey calm'd awhile his troubled thought.

Soon as the rising morn, with splendous drest,
Unlocks the portals of the roscate east,
The noise of drums and trumpets fills the air,
And bids the warriors for their march prepare.
Not half so grateful to the longing swain
The lowering thunder that presages rain,
As to these eager bands the shrill alarms
Of martial clangours and the sound of arms.

At once they rose with generous ardour press'd,
At once their limbs in radiant armour dress'd,
And rang'd in martial pomp (a dreadful band)
Beneath their numerous chiefs in order stand.
Now man to man, the thick battalions join'd,
Unfur their banners to the sportive wind;
And, in th' imperial standard rais'd on high,
The cross triumphant blazes to the sky.
Meantime the Sun above the horizon gains
The rising circuit of th' ethereal plains:

The polish'd steel reflects the dazzling light,
And strikes with flashing rays the aching sight.
Thick and more thick the sparkling gleams aspire,
Till all the campaign seems to glow with fire;
While mingled clamours echo through the meads,
The clash of arms, the neigh of trampling steeds!

A chosen troop of horse, dispatch'd before,
In armour light, the country round explore,
Lest foes in ambush should their march prevent;
While other bands the cautious leader sent
The dikes to level, clear the rugged way,
And free each pass that might their speed delay.
No troops of Pagans could withstand their force;
No walls of strength could stop their rapid course:
In vain oppos'd the craggy mountain stood,
The rapid torrent and perplexing wood.
So when the king of floods in angry pride
With added waters swells his foamy tide,
With dreadful ruin o'er the banks he flows,
And nought appears that can his rage oppose.

The king of Tripoly had power alone,
(Well-furnish'd, in a strongly-guarded town,
With arms and men) to check the troops' advance,
But durst not meet in fight the host of France.
To appease the Christian chief, the heralds bring Pacific presents from the Pagan king;
Who such conditions for the peace receives,
As pious Godfrey in his wisdom gives.

There from mount Seir, that near to eastward stands,

And from above the subject town commands,
The faithful pour in numbers to the plain;
(Each sex and every age, a various train!)
Their gifts before the Christian leader bear;
With joy they view him, and with transport bear;
Gaze on the foreign garb with wondering eye,
And with unfeeling guides the host supply.

Now Godfrey with the camp pursues his way
Along the borders of the neighbouring sea:
For station'd there his friendly vessels ride,⁴⁵
From which the army's wants are well supply'd;
For him alone each Grecian isle is till'd,
For him their vintage Crete and Sciop yield.

The numerous ships the shaded ocean hide,
Load groans beneath the weight the burthen'd tide.
The vessels thus their watchful post maintain,
And guard from Saracens the midland main.
Besides the ships with teady numbers mann'd
From wealthy Venice and Liguria's strand,
England and Holland send a naval power,
And fertile Sicily, and Gallia's shore.
These, all united, brought from every coast
Provisions needful for the landed host;
While on their march impatient they proceed,
(From all defence the hostile frontiers freed)
And urge their haste the hallow'd soil to gain
Where Christ endur'd the stings of mortal pain.
But Fame with winged speed before them flies;
(Alike the messenger of truth and lies)
She paints the camp in one united band,
Beneath one leader, moving o'er the land,
By none oppos'd: their nations, numbers tells;
The name and actions of each chief reveals;
Displays their purpose, acts the war to view,
And terrifies with doubts th' usurping crew.

⁴⁴ Sweno, son to the king of Denmark. See note to Book viii.

⁴⁵ The poet means the Genoese, who had supplied a great number of armed galleys, under the direction of William Embraico.

More dreadful to their anxious mind appears
The distant prospect, and augments their fears;
To every light report their ears they bend,
Watch every rumour, every tale attend;
From man to man the murmurs, swelling still,
The country round and mournful city fill;
Their aged monarch, thus with danger prest,
Revolves dire fancies in his doubtful breast:
His name was Aladine²²; who scarce maintain'd
(With fears beset) his seat so lately gain'd:
By nature still to cruel deeds inclin'd,
Though years had something chang'd his savage mind.

When now he saw the Latian troops prepare
Against his city-walls to turn the war;
Suspicious, join'd with former fears, arose;
Alike he fear'd his subjects and his foes;
Together in one town he saw reside
Two people, whom their different faiths divide:
While part the purer laws of Christ believe,
More numerous those who Meccos' laws receive.
When first the monarch conquer'd Zion's town,
And sought securely there to fix his throne,
He freed his Pagans from the tax of state,
But on the Christians laid the heavier weight.
These thoughts inflam'd and rous'd his native rage
(Now chill'd and tardy with the frost of age):
So turns, in summer's heat, the venom'd snake,
That slept the winter harmless in the brake:
So the tame lion, urg'd to wrath again,
Resumes his fury, and erects his mane.

Then to himself: "On every face I view
The marks of joy in that perfidious crew:
In general grief their jovial days they keep,
And laugh and revel when the public weep:
Even now, perhaps, the dreadful scheme is plann'd
Against our life to lift a murderous hand;
Or to their monarch's foes betray the state,
And to their Christian friends unbar the gate.
But soon our justice will their crimes prevent,
And swift-wing'd vengeance on their heads be sent;
Example dreadful! death shall seize on all:
Their infants at the mothers' breast shall fall:
The flames shall o'er their domes and temples spread;

Such be the funeral piles to grace their dead!
But midst their votive gifts, to save our ire,
The priests shall first upon the tomb expire."

So threats the tyrant; but his threats are vain;
Though pity moves not, coward fears restrain;
Rage prompts his soul their guiltless blood to spill,

But trembling doubts oppose his savage will.
He fears the Christians, shrinks at future arms,
Nor dares provoke too far the victor's arm.
This purpose curb'd, to other parts he turns
The rage that in his restless bosom burns:
With fire he wastes the fertile country round,
And lays the houses level with the ground:
He leaves no place entire, that may receive
The Christian army, or their march relieve;
Pollutes the springs and rivers in their beds,
And poison in the wholesome water sheds;

²² Tasso, with the license of a poet, has made a king of Jerusalem; but the city, at that time, was in reality under the dominion of the caliph of Egypt, taken by him some time before from the Turks.

Cautious with cruelty! meantime his care
Had reinforc'd Jerusalem for war.
Three parts for siege were strongly fortify'd,
Though less securely fence'd the northern side.
But there, when first the threaten'd storm was heard,
New ramparts, for defence, in haste he rear'd;
Collecting in the town, from different lands,
Auxiliar forces to his subject bands.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Aladine transports an image of the Virgin from the temple of the Christians into the mosque, by the advice of Ismeno, who proposes thereby to form a spell to secure the city. In the night the image is secretly stolen away. The king, unable to discover the author of the theft, and incensed against the Christians, prepares for a general massacre. Sophronia, a Christian virgin, accuses herself to the king. Olindo, her lover, takes the fact upon himself. Aladine, in a rage, orders both to be burned. Clorinda arrives, intercedes for them, and obtains their pardon. In the mean time Godfrey, with his army, reaches Emmaus. He receives Argantes and Alethe, ambassadors from Egypt. The latter, in an artful speech, endeavours to dissuade Godfrey from attacking Jerusalem. His proposals are rejected, and Argantes declares war in the name of the king of Egypt.

WHILE thus the Pagan king prepar'd for fight,
The fam'd Ismeno came before his sight;
Ismeno, he whose power the tomb invades,
And calls again to life departed shades;
Whose magic verse can pierce the world beneath,
And startle Pluto in the realms of death;
The subject demons at his will restrain,
And faster bind or loose their servile chain.
Ismeno once the Christian faith avow'd,
But now at Meccos' impious worship bow'd:
Yet still his former rites the wretch retain'd,
And oft, with Pagan mix'd, their use profan'd.
Now from the caverns, where, retir'd alone
From vulgar eyes, he studied arts unknown,
He came assistance to his lord to bring:
An ill adviser to a tyrant king!

Then thus he spoke: "O king! behold at hand

That conquering host, the terror of the land!
But let us act as fits the noble mind:
The bold from Earth and Heaven will succour find.
As king and leader well thy cares preside,
And with foreseeing thought for all provide,
If all, like thee, their several parts dispose,
This land will prove the burial of thy foes.
Lo! here I come with thee the toils to bear,
To assist thy labours, and thy dangers share.
Accept the counsel cautious years impart,
And join to this the powers of magic art:
Those angels, call'd from th' ethereal plains,
My potent charms shall force to share our pains.
Attend the scheme, revolving in my breast,
The first enchantment that my thoughts suggest,
An altar by the Christians stands immur'd
Deep under ground, from vulgar eyes secur'd.
The statue of their goddess there is show'd,
The mother of their human, buried God!

Before the image burns continual light ;
A sowing veil conceals her from the sight.
On every side are tables there display'd,
And votive gifts by superstition paid.
Haste ! snatch their idol from that insidious race,
And in thy mosque the boasted figure place.
Then will I raise such spells of wondrous power,
This fated pledge (while there detain'd secure)
Shall prove the guardian of thy city's gate ;
And walls of adamant shall fence thy state."

He said, and ceas'd : his words persuasion wrought,

And swift the king the hidden temple sought :
Furious he drove the trembling priests away,
And seiz'd with daring hands the hallow'd prey :
Then to the mosque in haste the prize he bore ;
(Where rites profane offend th' Almighty Power)
There, o'er the sacred form, with impious zeal,
The foul magician mutter'd many a spell.

But soon as morning streak'd the east of Heaven,
The watch, to whom the temple's guard was given,
No longer in its place the image found,
And search'd with fruitless care the dome around.
Then to the king the strange report he bears ;
The king, inflam'd with wrath, the tidings bears :
His thoughts suggest some Christian's secret hand
Has thence purloin'd the guardian of the land :
But whether Christian zeal had thence convey'd
The hallow'd form ; or Heaven's power display'd,
To snatch from impious faces and roofs unclean
The glorious semblance of their virgin-queen,
Doubtful the fame ; nor can we dare assign
The deed to human art or hands divine.

The king each temple sought and secret place,
And vow'd with costly gifts the man to grace,
Who brought the image, or the thief reveal'd ;
But threaten'd those whose lips the deed conceal'd.
The wily sorcerer every art apply'd
To explore the truth : in vain his arts he try'd :
For whether wrought by Heaven, or Earth alone,
Heaven kept it, spite of all his charms, unknown.
But when the king perceiv'd his search was vain
To find th' offender of the Christian train :
On all at once his fierce resentment turn'd ;
On all at once his savage fury burn'd :
No bounds, no laws, his purpose could control,
But blood alone could sate his vengeful soul.
" Our wrath shall not be lost," aloud he cries,
" The thief amidst the general slaughter dies.
Guilty and innocent, they perish all !
Let the just perish, so the guilty fall.—
Yet wherefore just ? when none our pity claim ;
Not one but hates our rites, and hates our name.
Rise, rise, my friends ! the fire and sword employ,
Lay waste their dwellings, and their race destroy."

So spoke the tyrant to the listening crew ;
Among the faithful soon the tidings flew.
With horror chill'd, the dismal sound they heard,
While ghastly death on every face appear'd.
None think of fight, or for defence prepare,
Or seek to deprecate their fate with prayer :
But lo ! when least they hope, the limarous hands
Their safety owe to unexpected hands.

A maid there was among the Christian kind,
In prime of years, and of exalted mind :

Beautiful her form, but beauty she despis'd,
Or beauty grac'd with virtue only priz'd.
From flattering tongues the modest fair withdrew,
And liv'd secluded from the public view ;
But vain her cares to hide her beauty prov'd,
Her beauty worthy to be seen and lov'd.
Nor Love conceals, but soon reveals her charms,
And with their power a youthful lover warms ;
That Love who now conceals his piercing eyes,
And now, like Argus, every thing describes ;
Who brings to view each grace that shuns the light,
And midst a thousand guards directs the lover's
Sophronis she, Ofindo was his name ; [sight !
The same their city, and their faith the same.
The youth as modest as the maid was fair,
But little hop'd, nor durst his love declare :
He knew not how, or fear'd to tell his pain,
She saw it not, or view'd it with disdain :
Thus to this hour in silent grief he mourn'd,
His thoughts unmoted, or his passion scorn'd.

Meantime the tidings spread from place to place,
Of death impending o'er the Christian race :
Soon in Sophronis's noble mind arose
A generous plan to avert her people's woes :
Zeal first inspir'd, but bashful shame ensu'd,
And modesty awhile the thought withstood :
Yet soon her fortitude each doubt suppress'd,
And arm'd with confidence her tender breast ;
Through gazing throngs alone the virgin goes,
Nor strives to hide her beauties, nor disclose
O'er her fair face a decent veil is seen,
Her eyes declin'd with modest graceful mien :
As artless negligence compos'd her dress,
And nature's genuine grace her charms confess.
Admir'd by all, regardless went the dame,
Till to the presence of the king she came :
While yet he sav'd, she dar'd to meet his view,
Nor from his threatening locks her steps withdrew.
" O king !" she thus began, " awhile contain
Thy anger, and thy people's rage restrain :
I come to show, and to your vengeance yield
Th' offender from your fruitless search conceal'd."

She said, and ceas'd : the king in wonder gaz'd,
(Struck with her courage, with her looks amaz'd)
Her sudden charms at once his soul engage,
He calms his passion, and forgets his rage.
If milder she, or he of softer frame,
His heart had felt the power of beauty's flame :
But haughty charms can ne'er the haughty move ;
For anies and graces are the food of love.
Though love could not affect his savage mind,
He yet appear'd to gentle thoughts inclin'd.
" Disclose the truth at large," he thus reply'd,
" No harm shall to thy Christian friends betide."
Then she : " Before thy sight the guilty stands :
The theft, O king ! committed by these hands.
In me the thief who stole the image view ;
To me the punishment decreed is due."

Thus, fill'd with public zeal, the generous dame
A victim for her people's ransom came.
O great deceit ! O lie divinely fair !
What truth with such a falsehood can compare ?
In deep suspense her words the tyrant heard,
No wonted fury in his looks appear'd.
" Declare," thus mildly to the maid he spoke,
" Who gave thee counsel and the deed partook."
" The deed alone was mine," reply'd the fair :
" I suffer'd none with me the fame to share ;
Mine was the counsel, mine the first design,
And the last acting of the deed was mine."

¹ This passage is evidently borrowed from the ancient Palladium, by which the city of Troy was to be defended.

"Then only thou," he cry'd, "must bear the pain

Our anger now and just revenge obtain."

"'Tis just, since all the glory mine," she cried,

"That none with me the punishment divide."

With kindling ire the Pagan thus replies:

"Say, where conceal'd the Christian image lies?"

"'Tis not conceal'd," rejoin'd the dauntless dame,

"I gave the hallow'd statue to the flame;

So could no impious hands again profane

The sacred image, and her beauty stain.

Then seek no more what never can be thine,

But to! the thief I to thy hands resign;

If theft it may be call'd to seize our right,

Unjustly torn away by lawless might."

At this the king in threatening words return'd;

With wrath engovern'd all his bosom burn'd:

"Ah! hope no more thy pardon here to find,

O glorious virgin! O exalted mind!

In vain, against the tyrant's fury held,

Love for defence opposes beauty's shield."

Now doom'd to death, and sentenc'd to the flame,

With cruel hands they seize the beautiful dame.

Her veil and mantle rent bestrew the ground,

With ragged cords her tender arms are bound.

Silent she stands, no signs of fear express'd,

Yet soft convulsions gently heave her breast;

Her modest cheeks a transient blush disclose,

Where blies soon succeed the fading rose.

Meanwhile the people throng, (the rumour spread)

And with the rest Ólindo there was led:

The tale he knew, but not the victim's name,

Till near the tragic scene of fate he came:

Soon as the youth the prisoner's face survey'd,

And saw, condemn'd to death, his lovely maid;

While the stern guards their cruel task pursue,

Through the thick press with headlong speed he flew.

"She's guiltless!" to the king aloud he cries,

"She's guiltless of th' offence for which she dies!

She could not—durst not—such a work demand

Far other than a woman's feeble hands:—

What arts to lull the keeper could she prove?

And how the sacred image thence remove?

She fondly boasts the deed, unthinking maid!

'Twas I the statue from the mosque convey'd:

Where the high dome receives the air and light,

I found a passage, favour'd by the night:

The glory mine, the death for me remains,

Nor let her thus usurp my rightful pains:

The punishment be mine; her chains I claim;

Mine is the pile prepar'd, and mine the kindled

flame!"

At this her head Sophronia gently rais'd,

And on the youth with looks of pity gaz'd.

"Unhappy man! what brings thee guiltless here?

What phrensy guides thee, or what rash despair?

Say, cannot I, without thy aid, engage

The utmost threatening of a mortal's rage?

This breast undaunted can resign its breath,

Nor asks a partner in the hour of death."

She spoke; but wrought not on her lover's mind,

Who, firm, retain'd his purpose first design'd.

O glorious struggle for a fatal prize!

When love with fortitude for conquest vies,

Where death is the reward the victor bears,

And safety is the ill the vanquish'd fears!

While thus they both contend the deed to claim,

The monarch's fury burns with fiercer flame:

He rag'd to find his power so lightly priz'd,

And all the torments he prepar'd despis'd.

"Let both," he cried, "their wish'd design obtain,

And both enjoy the prize they seek to gain."

The tyrant said, and straight the signal made

To bind the youth: the ready guards obey'd.

With face averted to one stake confin'd,

With cruel cords the hapless pair they bind.

Now round their limbs they place the rising pyre;

And now with breath awake the slumbering fire;

When thus the lover, in a moving strain,

Bespeaks the lov'd companion of his pain:

"Are these the bands with which I hop'd to join,

In happier times, my future days to thine?

And are we doom'd, alas! this fire to prove,

Instead of kindly flames of mutual love?

Love promis'd gentler flames and softer ties;

But cruel fate far other now supplies!

Too long from thee I mourn'd my life dispos'd,

And now in death a hapless meeting find!

Yet am I blest, since thou the pains must bear,

If not thy bed, at least thy pile to share.

Thy death I mourn, but not my own lament,

Since dying by thy side I die content.

Could yet my prayer one further bliss obtain,

How sweet, how envy'd then were every pain!

O could I press my faithful breast to thine,

And on thy lips my fleeting soul resign!

So might we, fainting in the pang of death,

Together mix our sighs and parting breath!"

In words like these unblest Ólindo mourn'd;

To him her counsel thus the maid return'd:

"O youth! far other thoughts, and pure desires,

Far other sorrows now the time requires!

Dost thou forget thy aims? nor call to mind

What God has for the righteous souls assign'd?

Endure for him, and sweet the pains will prove;

Aspire with joy to happier seats above;

You glittering skies and golden Sun survey,

That call us hence to realms of endless day!"

Here, mov'd with pity, loud the Pagans groan:

But more conceal'd the Christians vent their moan.

The king himself, with thoughts unusual press'd,

Felt his fierce heart suspended in his breast:

But, scornful to relent, he turn'd his view

From the dire prospect, and in haste withdrew.

Yet thou, Sophronia, bear't the general woe,

And, wept by all, thy tears disdain to flow!

While thus they stand, behold a knight is seen,

(For such he seem'd) of fierce and noble mien!

Whose foreign arms and strange attire proclaim

An alien from a distant land he came.

The sculptur'd tigris on his helmet high

(A well-known crest!) attracts each gazer's eye.

This sign Clorinda in the field display'd,

All see and own by this the warrior-maid.

She, from a child, beheld with scornful eyes

Her sex's arts, despising female toys:

* With respect to the obstructor of a female warrior, however repugnant it may appear to our present ideas, the example of Virgil, and the tradition of the Amazons, may be sufficient authority for Tasso to introduce the beautiful variety in his poem, arising from the characters of Clorinda and Gildippe. There is a singular passage in one of Petrarch's letters, describing particularly an Amazonian woman, which it may not be here unpleasing to lay before the reader, from the Life of Petrarch, published in 1776.

"Of all the wonders I saw in my little journey,

Arachne's labours ne'er her hours divide,
 Her noble hands nor loom nor spindle guide ;
 From ease inglorious and from sloth she fled,
 And, mix'd in camps, a life usually'd led :
 With rigour pleas'd, her lovely face she arm'd
 With haughty looks, yet even in fierceness charm'd :
 In early years her tender hand restrain'd
 The fiery courser, and his courage rein'd :
 She pois'd the spear and sword : her growing force
 She try'd in wrestling and the dusty course ;
 Then through the mountain paths and lonely wood
 The bear and shaggy lion's tracks pursu'd :
 In war, the dread of men the virgin shin'd :
 In woods, the terror of the savage kind !
 From Persia, jealous of the Christian fame,
 To oppose the victor-host Clorinda came :

nothing surprised me more than the prodigious strength and extraordinary courage of a young woman called Mary, whom we saw at Puzzoli. She passed her life among soldiers, and it was a common opinion that she was so much feared, no one dared attack her honour. No warrior but envied her prowess and skill. From the flower of her age she lived in camps, and adopted the military rules and dress. Her body is that of a hardy soldier, rather than a woman, and seamed all over with the scars of honour. She is always at war with her neighbours ; sometimes she attacks them with a little troop, sometimes alone ; and several have died by her hand. She is perfect in all the stratagems of the military art ; and suffers, with incredible patience, hunger, thirst, cold, heat, and fatigue. In fine, she lies on the bare ground ; her shield serves for her pillow, and she sleeps armed in the open air.

" I had seen her in my first voyage to Naples, about three years ago ; but as she was very much altered, I did not know her again. She came forward to salute me ; I returned it as to a person I was not acquainted with. But by her laugh, and the gesture of those about me, I suspected something ; and observing her with more attention, I found under the helmet the face of this formidable virgin. Was I to inform you of half the things they relate of her, you would take them for fables. I will therefore confine myself to a few facts, to which I was witness. By accident several strangers who came to Puzzoli to see this wonder, were all assembled at the citadel, to make trial of her strength. We found her alone, walking before the portico of the church, and not surpris'd at the concourse of the people. We begged she would give us a proof of her strength. She excused herself at first, on having a wound in her arm ; but afterwards she took up an enormous block of stone, and a piece of wood loaded with iron. Upon these, said she, you may try your strength if you will. After every one had attempted to move them, with more or less success, she took and threw them with so much ease over our heads, that we remained confounded, and could hardly believe our eyes. At first some deceit was suspected, but there could be none. This has rendered credible what the ancients relate of the Amazons, and Virgil of the heroines of Italy, who were headed by Camilla."

See Life of Petrarch, vol. i. p. 330.

And, oft before, in fight her daring hand
 Had fatten'd with their blood the thirsty land.

When near the fatal place the virgin drew,
 And the dire scene appear'd before her view ;
 She spur'd her steed to observe the victims nigh,
 And learn th' unhappy cause for which they die.
 The yielding crowd gave way : the curious maid
 With steadfast eyes the pair in bonds survey'd.
 One mour'd blood, and one in silence stood ;
 The weaker sex the greater firmness show'd :
 Yet seem'd Olindo like a man to moan
 Who wept another's sufferings, not his own ;
 While silent she, and fixed on Heaven her eyes,
 Already seem'd to claim her kindred skies.

Clorinda view'd their state with tender woe,
 And down her cheeks the tears began to flow :
 Yet most she griev'd for her who grief disdain'd ;
 And silence, more than plaints, her pity gain'd ;
 Then to an aged sire who stood beside ;
 " Say, who are those to death devote," she cried ;
 " Declare what brought them to this woful state,
 Some secret crime, or blind decree of fate ?"
 Thus she. The reverend sire in brief display'd
 Their mournful story to the listening maid :
 She heard, surpris'd such matchless worth to find,
 And both acquitted in her equal mind.
 Already now resolv'd, by force or prayer,
 To save from threaten'd death th' unhappy pair,
 She ran, she stopp'd the flame with eager haste,
 (Already kindling) and the guards address'd :

" None in this cruel office dare to move,
 Till to the monarch I my suit approve ;
 My power, believe me, shall protect your stay,
 Nor shall your sovereign chide your short delay."

She said : th' attendants at her word obey'd,
 Mov'd with the presence of the royal maid :
 Then, turning swift, she met the king, who came
 To welcome to his court the warrior dame.
 To whom she thus : " Behold Clorinda here !
 Clorinda's name, perchance, has reach'd your ear.
 I come, O monarch ! thus in arms, prepar'd
 Thy kingdom and our common faith to guard :
 Command me now what task I must sustain,
 Nor high attempts I fear, nor low disdain :
 Or let my force in open field be shown ;
 Or here detain me to defend the town."

To whom the king : " What land so distant lies
 From where the Sun enlightens Asia's skies,
 O glorious virgin ! but resounds thy name,
 Whose actions fill the sounding trump of Fame ?
 Now to my aid thy conquering sword is join'd,
 I give my fears and scruples to the wind :
 Nor could I greater hopes of conquest boast,
 Though join'd by numbers, succour'd by a host !
 Methinks I seem to chide the lingering foe,
 And Godfrey, to my wish, appears too slow.
 Thou ask'st what labours I thy arm decree ;
 I deem the greatest only worthy thee
 To thee the rule of all our warrior-band
 I here submit ; be thine the high command."

Thus said the king. The maid, with grateful look,
 Her thanks return'd, and thus again she spoke :

" 'Tis sure, O prince ! a thing unusual heard,

Before the service done, to claim reward :
 Yet (by thy goodness bold) I make my prayer,
 And beg thy mercy yon condemn'd to spare ;
 Grant it for all my deeds in future time ;
 'Tis hard to suffer for a doubtful crime :
 But this I wave, nor here the reasons plead
 That speak them guiltless of th' imputed deed.

'Tis said some Christian hand the theft has wrought;
 But here I differ from the public thought:
 The spell Ismeno fram'd to aid our cause
 I deem an outrage on our sacred laws:
 Nor fits it idols in our fane to place,
 Much less the idols of this impious race.
 Methinks with joy the hand of Heaven I view,
 To Mason's power the miracle is due;
 Who thus forbids his hallow'd rites to stain
 With new religions in his awful fane.
 Ismeno leave to spells and magic charms,
 Since these to him supply the place of arms;
 While warriors, we, our foes in battle face;
 Our swords our arts, in these our hopes we place."

She ceas'd; and, though the king could scarcely bend
 His haughty soul, or ears to pity lend,
 He yields his fury to the gentle maid;
 Her reasons move him, and her words persuade.
 "Let both have life and freedom," he reply'd
 "To such a pleader nothing is deny'd.
 If innocent, by justice let them live:
 If criminal, I here their crime forgive."

Thus were they freed; and lo! what blissful fate,
 What turns of fortune on Olindo wait!
 His virtuous love at length awakes a flame
 In the soft bosom of the generous dame.
 Straight from the pile to Hymen's rites he goes,
 Made, of a wretch condemn'd, a joyful spouse:
 Since death with her he sought, the grateful fair
 Consents with him the gift of life to share.
 The Pagan monarch, whose suspicious mind
 Beheld with fear such woodrous virtue join'd,
 Sent both in exile, by severe command,
 Beyond the limits of Judea's land.
 Then many others (as his fury sway'd)
 Were banish'd thence, or deep in dungeons laid.
 But the fierce tyrant those remov'd alone,
 For strength approv'd, and daring spirits known:
 The tender sex and children he retain'd,
 With helpless age, as pledges in his hand.
 Thus, wretched wanderers, some were doom'd to roam

From parents, children, wives, and native home:
 Part rove from land to land with doubtful course;
 And part against him turn their vengeful force:
 These to the band of Franks unite their fate,
 And meet their army ent'ring Emmaüs' gate.

The town of Emmaüs near to Sion lay,
 Not half the journey of an easy day.
 The pleasing thought each Christian soul inspires,
 And adds new ardour to their zealous fires.
 But since the Sun had past his middle race,
 The leader there commands the tents to place.
 The host were now encamp'd; the setting Sun
 With milder lustre from the ocean shone;
 When, drawing near, two mighty chiefs were seen,
 In garb unknown, and of a foreign men;
 Their acts pacific, and their looks proclaim
 That to the Christian chief as friends they came:
 From Egypt's king dispatch'd, their way they bend,
 And menial servants on their steps attend.

Alethes one: his birth obscure he ow'd
 To the base refuse of th' ignoble crowd;
 Rais'd to the highest state the realm affords,
 By plausible speech, and eloquence of words:
 His subtle genius every taste could meet;
 In fiction prodapt, and skillful in deceit:
 Master of calumny such various ways,
 He most accuses when he seems to praise.

The other chief from fair Circassia came
 To Egypt's court, Argantes was his name:
 Exalted midst the princes of the land,
 And first in rank of all the martial band:
 Impatient, glory, and of rage unquell'd,
 In arms unconquer'd, matchless in the field;
 Whose impious soul contempt of Heaven avow'd,
 His sword his law, his own right hand his God!

Now these an audience of the leader sought,
 And now to Godfrey's awful sight were brought.
 There lowly seated, with his peers around,
 In modest garb the glorious chief they found.
 True valour, unadorn'd, attracts the sight,
 And shines conspicuous by its native light.
 To him a slight respect Argantes paid,
 As one who little place or honour weigh'd,
 But low Alethes bow'd in thought profound,
 And fix'd his humble eyes upon the ground;
 His better hand his passive bosom press'd,
 With all the adoration of the east:
 And while attention on his accents hung,
 These words, like honey, melted from his tongue:

"O worthy thou alone! to whose command
 Submit the heroes of this glorious band!
 To thee their laurels and their crowns they owe,
 Thy conduct brings them victors from the foe.
 Nor stops thy fame within Alcides' bounds,
 To distant Egypt Godfrey's name resounds!
 Fame through our spacious realm thy glory bears,
 And speaks thy valour to our listening ears.
 But on thy deeds our sovereign chiefly dwells,
 With pleasure hears them, and with pleasure tells:
 In thee, what others fear or hate, he loves;
 Thy virtue fires him, and thy valour moves:
 Pain would he join with thee in friendly bands,
 And mutual peace and amity demands.
 Since different faiths their sanction here deny,
 Let mutual virtue knit the sacr'd tie.
 But as he hears thy troops their marches bend
 To expel from Sion's walls his ancient friend;
 He now (to avoid those evils yet behind)
 By us unfolds the counsels of his mind.
 Then thus he says: Thy first design forbear,
 Content with what thou now hast gain'd in war:
 Nor on Judea's realm thy forces bring,
 Nor vex the lands protected by our king:
 So will the join'd with thee, thy power ensure,
 And fix thy yet uncertain state secure:
 United both; their conquest to regain,
 The Turks and Persians shall attempt in vain.
 Much hast thou done, O chief! in little space,
 Whose length of ages never can deface.

What cities won! what armies overthrown!
 What dangerous marches, and what ways unknown!
 The neighbouring states with terror own thy fame:
 And distant regions tremble at thy name.
 Your glory at the height, with heedful care
 Avoid the chances of a doubtful war:
 Increase of realm your further toils may crown,
 But conquest ne'er can heighten your renown;
 And should your arms be now in battle cross'd,
 Lost is your empire, and your glory lost!
 Insecure he who risks a certain state
 For distant prospects of uncertain fate:
 Yet our advice perchance will lightly weigh,
 And urge thy purpose, nor thy march delay;
 While uncontrol'd success thy soul inspires;
 While glows thy bosom with ambition's fires:
 That glorious frailty of the noble mind,
 To conquer nations and subdue mankind!

For this you fly from proffer'd peace afar,
 With more distaste than others shun the war:
 These motives bid thee still the path pursue,
 Which fate has open'd largely to thy view:
 Nor in the sheath return that dreaded sword,
 (Of every conquest in the field assur'd)
 Till in oblivion Macon's laws are hid,
 And Asia, by thy arms, a desert waste!
 Alluring sounds, and grateful to the ear;
 But O what dangers lurk beneath the noise!
 Then, if no cloud of passion dim thy sight,
 And cast a veil before thy reason's light;
 Well mayst thou see what little hopes appear,
 From every prospect of the lengthen'd war.
 Reflect how soon the gifts of fortune turn;
 Those who rejoice to day, to morrow mourn:
 And he who soars an unexpected flight,
 Oft falls as sudden from his towering height.
 Say, to thy harm, should Egypt take the field
 In arms, in treasure rich, in council skill'd;
 And add to these (the war again began)
 The Turks, the Persians, and Cassano's sons;
 What forces couldst thou to their power oppose;
 And how escape from such a host of foes?
 Or dost thou in the Grecian king confide;
 By sacred union to thy cause ally'd?
 To whom is not the Grecian faith display'd?
 What snares for thee the guileful race have laid!
 Will those, who once your common march withstood,

Now risk for you their lives in fields of blood?
 But thou perhaps (secure amidst thy foes)
 Dost in these squadrons all thy hopes repose;
 And deem'st the scatter'd bands thy force o'erthrew
 As easy, when united, to subdue; (noy'd,
 Though toilsome marches have your troops an-
 Your strength enfeebled, and your men destroy'd,
 Though unexpected nations should combine,
 And Egypt with the Turks and Persians join.
 Yet great that fate so strongly arms thy hand,
 No sword can conquer, and no foe withstand:
 Lo! Famine comes, with all her ghastly train;
 What further subterfuge, what hopes remain?
 Then draw the falchion, and the javelin wield;
 Then dream of conquest in the boasted field.
 Behold th' inhabitants have wasted wide
 The fertile country, and the fields destroy'd;
 And safely lodg'd in towers their ripen'd grain:
 What hopes are left thy numbers to sustain?
 Thy ships, thou say'st, will due provision send:
 Does then thy safety on the winds depend?
 Perhaps thy fortune can the winds restrain;
 Thy voice appease the roaring of the main.
 Yet think: should once our nation rise in fight,
 And with the Persians and the Turks unite,
 Could we not then oppose a numerous fleet,
 On equal terms, thy naval power to meet?
 If here, O chief! thou seek'st to gain renown,
 A double conquest must thy labours crown:
 One loss may sully every former deed:
 One loss may unexpected dangers breed:
 Before our vessels should thy navy fly,
 Thy forces here, oppress by famine, die:
 Or shouldst thou lose the battle here, in vain
 Thy fleet would ride victorious on the main.
 Then if thy soul reject the peace we bring,
 And scorn the friendship of th' Egyptian king;

This conduct (undisguis'd the truth I tell)
 Nor suits thy virtue, nor thy wisdom well.
 But if thy purpose seen to war inclin'd,
 Heaven change, to gentle peace, thy better mind:
 So Asia may at length from trouble cease,
 And thou enjoy thy conquer'd lands in peace.
 And you, ye leaders, who his dangers share,
 Fellows in arms, and partners of the war!
 Ah! let not fortune's smiles your souls excite,
 To tempt again the doubtful chance of fight!
 But as the pilot, 'scap'd the treacherous deep,
 Rests in the welcome port his weary ship;
 Now furl your sails with pleasure near the shore,
 And trust the perils of the sea no more."

Here came Ælethes; and the heroes round,
 With looks displeas'd, return'd a murmuring sound:
 With deep disdain the terms propos'd they heard,
 While discontent in every face appear'd.
 Then thrice the chief his eyes around him threw,
 And cast on every one his piercing view;
 Next to Ælethes turn'd his careful look,
 Who waited his reply, and thus he spoke.
 "Ambassador! with threats and praises join'd,
 Full wisely hast thou told thy sovereign's mind:
 If he esteem us, and our worth approve,
 With grateful pleasure we receive his love.
 But where thy words a threaten'd storm disclose
 Of Pagan armies, and confederate foes;
 To this I speak; to this my answer bear;
 An open purpose cloth'd in words sincere.
 Know first the cause for which we sustain'd
 Such various hazards both by sea and land;
 By day and night such pious toils have known:
 To free the passage to your hallow'd town;
 To merit favour from the King of Heaven,
 By freedom to the suffering Christians given.
 Nor shall we fear, for such a glorious end,
 Our kingdom, lives, and worldly fame to spend.
 No thirst of riches has our bosoms fir'd;
 No lust of empire our attempt inspir'd:
 If any thoughts like these our souls infect,
 Th' Eternal drive such poison from the breast!
 Still may his mercy o'er our steps preside,
 His hand defend us, and his wisdom guide!
 His breath inspir'd; his power has brought us far
 Through every danger of the various war:
 By this are mountains past, and rivers crost;
 This tempers summer's heat, and winter's frost;
 This can the rage of furious tempests bind,
 And loosen or restrain th' obedient wind:
 Hence lofty walls are burnt and tumbled down;
 Hence martial bands are slain and overthrow;
 Hence springs the hope and confidence we boast;
 Not from the fumes of a mortal host:
 Not from our vessels; nor from Grecian lands
 With numbers swarming; nor the Gallic bands;
 And if we still th' Almighty's care partake,
 Let nations, at their will, our cause forsake!
 Who knows the measure of his powerful hands,
 No other aid, in time of need, demands,
 But should he, for our sins, his help withdraw,
 (As who can fathom Heaven's eternal law!)
 Lives there a man who would not find his tomb,
 Where hallow'd earth did once his God inhume?
 So shall we die, nor envy those who live;
 Nor narrow'd shall we our death receive;
 Nor Asia shall rejoice to view our state;
 Nor we submit with sorrow to our fate.
 Yet think not that our wayward minds prefer
 To gentle peace, the horrid scenes of war."

* The son of the king of Antioch.

Nor think we ill your monarch's love return,
Or with contempt his friendly union scorn.
But wherefore do his cares on Zion bend?
And wherefore thus another's realms defend?—
Then let him not require our arms to cease;
So may he rule his native lands in peace!⁶

Thus answer'd Godfrey; and with fury swell'd
The fierce Argantes, nor his wrath repell'd:
The boiling passion from his bosom broke;
Before the chief he stood, and thus he spoke:

"Let him who will not proffer'd peace receive
Be sated with the plagues that war can give!
And well thy hatred of the peace is known,
If now thy soul reject our friendship shown."

This said, his mantle in his hand he took,⁴
And folding round before th' assembly shook,
Then thus again with threatening accent spoke:
"O thou! who every peril wouldst despise,
Lo! peace or war within this mantle lies!
See here th' election offer'd to thy voice;
No more delay—but now declare thy choice."

His speech and haughty mien each leader fir'd,
And with a noble rage their souls inspir'd.
"War! war!" aloud with general voice they cried;
Nor waited till their god-like chief replied.
At this the Pagan shook his vest in air—
"Then take defiance, death, and mortal war!"⁵

So fierce he spoke, he seem'd to burst the gates
Of Jeann's temple, and disclose the fates;
While from his mantle, which aside he threw,
Incessant rage and horrid discord flew:

Alecto's torch supply'd her hellish flame,
And from his eyes the flashing sparkles came.
So look'd the chief of old, whose impious pride,
With mortal works, the King of Heaven defy'd;
So stood, when Babel rear'd her front on high,
To threaten battle 'gainst the starry sky.

Then Godfrey:—"To thy king the tidings bear,
And tell him we accept the threaten'd war;
Go, bid him hasten here to prove our might,
Or on the bank of Nile expect the fight."

This said; the leader honour'd either guest,
And due respect, by different gifts, express'd.
Aethes first he gave a helm of price,
A prize among the spoils of conquer'd Nice.
A costly sword Argantes next obtain'd,
Well wrought and fashion'd by the workman's
hand:

Matchless the work, and glorious to behold,
The hilt with jewels blaz'd, and fram'd with gold.
With joy the Pagan chief the gift survey'd,
Admir'd the rich design and temper'd blade:
Then thus to Godfrey: "When we meet in field,
Behold how well our hands thy present wield!"

Now, parting from the camp, their leave they took,

And thus Argantes to Aethes spoke:
"Lo! to Jerusalem my course I take;
To Egypt thou thy purpos'd journey make:

⁴ Thus Livy relates of the Roman ambassador before the Carthaginian senate: Tum Romanus, sinu ex toga facto, 'Hic,' inquit, 'vobis bellum et pacem portamus; utrum placeat, sumite.' Sub haec vocem haud miris ferociter, 'daret, utrum vellet,' saccharatum est. Et omni is, sinu iterum effuso, 'bellum dare' dixisset; 'accipere se,' omnes respondissent, Ac. Lib. xxi. 48.

⁵ Nimrod, who built the tower of Babel.

Thou with the early rays of morning light;
But I impatient with the friendly night.
Well may th' Egyptian count my presence spite;
Suffice that thou the Christian's answer bear:
Be mine to mingle in the lov'd starth:
Of noble conflict, and the sound of arms.⁶

Thus he, ambassador of peace who came,
Departs a foe in action and in name;
Nor heeds the warrior, in his haughty mind,
The ancient laws of nations and mankind:
Nor for Aethes' answer design'd to stay,
But through surrounding shades pursu'd his way,
And sought the town, impatient of delay.

Now had the night her drowsy pillows spread;
The winds were hush'd, the weary waves were dead:
The fish repos'd in seas and crystal floods;
The beasts retir'd in covert of the woods;
The painted birds in grateful silence slept;
And o'er the world a sweet oblivion crept,
But not the faithful host, with thought oppress'd,
Nor could their leader taste the gift of rest;
Such ardent wishes in their bosoms burst;
So eager were they for the day's return,
To lead their forces to the hallow'd towri,
The soldier's triumph, and the victor's crown!
With longing eyes they wait the morning light,
To chase with early beams the dusk of night.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Christian army arrives before Jerusalem. The alarm is given to the Saracens, who prepare for the reception of the enemy. Clorinda makes the first rally; she encounters and kills Gardo; she meets and engages with Tancred; a short interview ensues between them. In the mean time, Argantes, falling on the Christians with a great slaughter, the action becomes more general. Erminia, from the walls, shoots and describes to the king the several commanders of the Christian army. Rinaldo and Tancred perform great actions. Dudo, having signalized himself, is killed by Argantes. The Pagans, being closely press'd, are at last compelled to retreat to the city. Godfrey causes Dudo to be interred with funeral honours; and sends his workmen to fell timber for making engines to carry on the siege.

Now from the golden east the Zephyrus bore,
Proclaim'd with balmy gales th' approach of morn;
And fair Aurora deck'd her radiant head
With roses crompt in Eden's bowery bed;
When from the sounding camp was heard afar
The noise of troops preparing for the war:
To this succeed the trumpet's loud alarms,
And rouse, with shriller notes, the host to arms.
The sage commander o'er their zeal presides,
And with a gentle rein their arduous guides;
Yet easier seem'd it, near Charybdis' caves
To stay the current of the boiling waves;
Or stop the north, that shakes the mountain's brow,
And whirls the vessels in the seas below.

⁶ By the law of nations, no person exercising the office of messenger or ambassador should take an active or hostile part till his office is completely expired.

He rules their order, marshals every band :
Rapid they move, but rapid with command.
With holy zeal their swelling hearts abound,
And their wing'd footsteps scarcely print the ground.
When now the Sun ascends th' ethereal way,
And strikes the dusty field with warmer ray,
Behold Jerusalem¹ in prospect lies!
Behold Jerusalem salutes their eyes!
At once a thousand tongues repeat the name,
And hail Jerusalem with loud acclaim.

To sailors thus, who, wandering o'er the main,
Have long explor'd some distant coast in vain,
In seas unknown and foreign regions lost,
By stormy winds and faithless billows tost,
If chance at length th' expected land appear,
With joyful shouts they hail it from afar;
They point, with rapture, to the wish'd-for shore,
And dream of former toils and fears no more.

At first, transported with the pleasing sight,
Each Christian bosom glow'd with full delight;
But deep contrition soon their joy suppress'd,
And holy sorrow sadden'd every breast:
Scarce dare their eyes the city walls survey,
Where, cloth'd in flesh, their dear Redeemer lay;
Whose sacred earth did once their Lord enclose,
And where triumphant from the grave he rose!
Each faltering tongue imperfect speech supplies,
Each labouring bosom heaves with frequent sighs;
At once their mingled joys and griefs appear,
And undistinguish'd murmurs fill the air.
So when the grove the fanning wind receives,
A whispering noise is heard among the leaves:
So, near the craggy rocks or winding shore,
In hollow sounds the broken billows roar.
Each took th' example as their chieftains led,
With naked feet² the hallow'd soil they tread:
Each throws his martial ornaments aside,
The crested helmets, with their plumed pride;
To humble thoughts their lofty hearts they bend,
And down their cheeks the pious tears descend:
Yet each, as if his breast no sorrow mov'd,
In words like these his tardy grief reprov'd:

"Here, where thy wounds, O Lord! distill'd a flood,
And dy'd the hallow'd soil with streaming blood,
Shall not these eyes their grateful tribute shower,
In sad memorial of that awful hour?
Ah! wherefore frozen thus my heart appears,
Nor melts in fountains of perpetual tears?
Why does my harden'd heart this temper keep?
Now mourn thy sins, thy Saviour's sufferings weep!"
Meantime the watch that in the city stood,
And from a lofty tower the country view'd,
Saw midst the fields a rising dust appear,
That like a thickening cloud obscur'd the air;
From which, by fits, a flashing splendour came,
A sudden gleams of momentary flame:
Refulgent arms and armour next were seen,
And steeds distinguish'd, and embattled men:

¹ The emphatical repetition of the name Jerusalem is adopted from Virgil, and has a fine effect in this book, which opens with wonderful solemnity:

Italian, Italian! primus conelamat Achates,
Æn. iii.

² This circumstance is recorded in the history of the crusades.

Then thus aloud—"What mist obscures the day?
What splendours in yon dusty whirlwind play?
Rise, rise, ye citizens! your gates defend:
Haste, snatch your weapons, and the walls ascend!
Behold the foe at hand!"—he said, and crew'd:
The Pagans heard, and snatch'd their arms in haste.
The helpless children, and the female train,
With feeble age that could not arms sustain,
Pale and affrighted to the mosques repair,
And humbly supplicate the powers with prayer.
But those of limbs robust, and firm of soul,
Already arm'd, impatient of control,
Part line the gates, and part ascend the wall:
The king with care provides, and orders all:
From place to place he marshall'd every crew,
Then to the summit of a tower withdrew,
For hence in prospect lay the subject-lands,
For hence he could with ease direct the bands.
And there Erminia by his side he plac'd,
The fair Erminia, who his palace grac'd,
Since Antioch fell before the Christian host,
And her dear sire the hapless virgin lost.

Now had Clorinda with impatient speed,
To attack the Franks, a chosen squadron led;
But, in a different part, Circesia's knight³
Stood at a secret gate prepar'd for fight.
The generous maid with looks intrepid stood,
Her brave companions, and with words inspir'd:
" 'Tis ours to found the glorious work,"⁴ she cries,
"The hope of Asia in our courage lies!"
While thus she speaks, she sees a Christian band
With rural spoils advancing o'er the land;
Who, as it were, to forage round the plain,
Now seek with flocks and herds the camp again.
Sudden on these she turn'd: their chief behind
Her threatening force, and met her in the field;
Gardo his name, a man approv'd in fight,
But weak his strength to oppose Clorinda's might.
Slain in the dreadful shock, on earth he lies,
O'erthrown before the Franks' and Syrians' eyes.
Loud, at the sight, exclaim the Pagan train,
And hail the omen,—but their hopes were vain!
Fierce on the rear the warlike virgin flew,
And pierc'd their battle, and their ranks o'erthrew;
And, where her slaughtering sword a passage bore,
Her following troops the glorious path parav'd.
Soon from the spoilers' hands their spoil they took.
The Franks, by slow degrees, the field forsake:
At length the summit of a hill they gain,
And, aided by the height, the foes sustain.

Now, like a whirlwind rushing from the skies,
Or swift as lightning through the ether flies,
At Godfrey's signal, noble Tancred near
His squadron moves, and shakes his beamy spear.
So firm his hands the ponderous javelin wield,
So fierce the youthful warrior scours the field,
The king, who view'd him from his towery height,
Esteem'd him sure some chief renown'd in fight:
Then to the maid beside him thus he spoke,
(Whose gentle soul with soft emotions shook)
"Thou canst, by use, each Christian's name reveal,
Though here disguis'd, and cas'd in shining steel:

³ Argantes.

⁴ The following passages, where Erminia describes the leaders of the Christian army, are closely copied from Homer; where Helen, in like manner, shows the Grecian commanders to Priam from the walls of Troy. Iliad, lib. vi.

Say, who is he, so brave in combat seen,
Of dauntless semblance, and erected mien ?
At this the virgin heav'd a tender sigh,
The silent drops stood trembling in her eye:
But, all she could, the fair her tears suppress'd,
And stopp'd the murmurs of her troubled breast:
Yet on her cheeks the trickling dew appear'd,
And from her lips a broken sigh was heard.
Then artful to the king she thus reply'd:
(And strove with angry words her thoughts to hide)

" Ah me ! I know him sure, have cause too well,
Among a thousand, that dire chief to tell ;
Oh have I seen him strow the purple plain,
And glut his fury with my people slain !
Alas ! how sure his blows ! the wounds they give Nor herbs can heal, nor magic arts relieve:
Tancrod his name—O ! grant some happier hour
May yield him, living, prisoner to my power !
So might my soul some secret comfort find,
And sweet revenge appease my restless mind !"

She said, and ceas'd. The king the damsel heard,
But to a different sense her speech refer'd ;
While, mingled with these artful words she spoke,
A sigh spontaneous from her bosom broke.

Meanwhile, her lance in rest, the warrior-dame
With eager haste to encounter Tancrod came.
Their vizors struck, the spears in shivers flew ;
The virgin's face was left expos'd to view ;
The thongs that held her helmet burst in twain ;
Hurl'd from her head, it bounded on the plain :
Loose in the wind her golden tresses flow'd,
And now a maid confess'd to all she stow'd ;
Keen flash her eyes, her look with fury glows ;
Yet 'e'en in rage each feature lovely shows:
What charms must these her winning smiles disclose ?

What thoughts, O Tancrod ! have thy bosom mov'd ?
Dost thou not see and know that face below'd ?
Lo ! there the face that caus'd thy anorous pains ;
Ask thy fond heart, for there her form remains :
Behold the features of the lovely dame
Who for refreshment to the fountain came !
The knight, who mark'd not first her crest and shield,

Astonish'd now her well known face beheld.
She o'er her head disarm'd the buckler threw,
And on her senseless foe with fury flew :
The foe retir'd ; on other parts he turn'd
His vengeful steel : yet still her anger burn'd ;
And with a threatening voice aloud she cried ;
And with a two-fold death* the chief defy'd.
Th' enamour'd warrior ne'er returns a blow,
Nor heeds the weapon of his lovely foe ;
But views, with eager gaze, her charming eyes,
From which the shaft of love unerring flies :
Then to himself—" In vain the stroke descends ;
In vain her angry sword the wound intends ;
While from her face unarm'd she sends the dart,
That pierces with surer aim my bleeding heart !"

At length resolv'd, though hopeless of relief,
No more in silence to suppress his grief,

And that the dame might know her rage pursu'd
A suppliant captive by her charms subdu'd ;
" O thou !" he cried, " whose hostile fury glows
On me alone amid this host of foes,
Together let us from the field remove,
And, hand to hand, our mutual valour prove."

The maid his challenge beard ; and, void of fear,
With head unarm'd rush'd furious to the war :
Her trembling lover's steps in haste pursu'd,
And now, prepar'd, in act of combat stood,
Already aim'd a stroke ; when loud he cried :
" First make conditions ere the strife be tried."

Awhile her lifted arm the virgin stay'd,
And thus the youth, by love embolden'd, said :

" Ah ! since on terms of peace thou wilt not join,
Transfix this heart, this heart no longer mine :
For thee with pleasure I resign my breath ;
Receive my life, and triumph in my death.
See, unresisting in thy sight I stand ;
Then say what cause withholds thy lingering hand ?
Or shall I from my breast the corselet tear,
And to the stroke my naked bosom bare ?"

Thus wretched Tancrod spoke ; and more had said

To unfold his sorrows to the wondering maid,
But sudden now his troops appear'd at hand,
Who closely press'd the Pagan's yielding band :
Or fear or art impell'd the Syrian race ;
One seem'd to fly, while 't' other held the chase,
When lo ! a soldier, who his foes pursu'd,
And, part expos'd, the fair Clorinda view'd,
Aim'd, as he pass'd behind th' unwary maid,
A sudden stroke at her defenceless head.
Tancrod, who sees, exclaims with eager cries,
And with his sword to meet the weapon flies.
Yet not in vain was urg'd the hostile steel,
On her fair neck, beneath her head, it fell :
Slight was the wound ; the crimson drops appear,
And tinge the ringlets of her golden hair.
So shines the gold, which skillful artists frame,
And, mix'd with rubies, darts a ruddy flame.
Fir'd at the deed, the prince in anger burn'd,
And, with his falchion, on the offender turn'd.
This flies, and that pursues with vengeful mind,
Swift as an arrow on the wings of wind !
The musing virgin view'd their course from far,
Then join'd her flying partners of the war.
By turns she flies ; by turns she makes a stand ;
And boldly oft attacks the Christian band.
So faces a bull, with mighty strength indu'd,
In some wide field by troops of dogs pursu'd ;
Oft as he shows his horns, the fearful train
Stop short, but follow when he flies again.
And still Clorinda, as she fled the field,
Her head defended with her lifted shield.
Now these the battle fly, and those pursue,
Till near the lofty walls appear in view ;
When, with a dreadful shout that fills the air,
The Pagans, turning swift, renew the war :
Around the plain in circuit wide they bend,
And flank the Christians, and their rear offend.
Then bold Argantes, from the city's height,
Pours with his squadron on the front of fight.

* See Book i. p. 408, where the first account is given of Tancrod's love to Clorinda, and the adventure here referred to.

* Con doppis morte—The Italian commentator explains this to mean, a natural death, and the death of love, una amara altera corporale.

* This circumstance, of Clorinda being wounded, is very similar to the passage in Boyardo, adopted by Ariosto, where Bradamant is in like manner wounded in the head by a Pagan, while she is parrying with Rogers.

Impatient of delay, before his crew,
With furious haste, the fierce Circassian flew.
The first he met his thundering javelin found,
And horse and horseman tumbled to the ground:
And ere the trusty spear in shivers broke,
What numbers more an equal fate partook!
His falchion next he drew, and every blow
Or slays, or wounds, or overturns the foe.
Clorinda saw, and kindled at the view,
And old Ardelius, fierce in battle, slew:
Robust in age! Two sons their father guard;
But nought can now the deadly weapon ward.
Alcander, eldest born, her fury found,
His sire deserting with a ghastly wound;
And Poliphernes, next his place in fight,
Scarce sav'd his life from brave Clorinda's might.

But Tancred, wearied with the fruitless chase
Of him whose courser fled with swifter pace.
Now turn'd his eyes, and saw his troops from far
Engag'd too boldly in unequal war:
He view'd them by surrounding Pagans press'd,
And spur'd his courser to their aid in haste.
Nor he alone, but to their rescue came
The band, the first in dangers as in fame;
The band by Dudon led, the heroes' boast.
The strength and bulwark of the Christian host,
Rinaldo, bravest of the brave confess'd,
Like flashing lightning shone before the rest!
Erminia soon the gallant prince beheld,
Known by the eagle² in an azure field.
Then to the king, who thither turn'd his eyes:
"Behold a chief, unmatched in arms!" she cries,
"No sword like his in yonder camp is seen,
Yet scarce appears the dawn to shade his chin.
Six champions more, his equals in the field,
Had made already conquer'd Syria yield:
The furthest regions had confess'd their sway,
The distant realms beneath the rising day!
And even the Nile, perhaps, his head unknown
Had vainly then conceal'd, the yoke to shun.
Such is the youth! his name Rinaldo call,
Whose hand with terror shakes the threaten'd wall!
Now turn your eyes, and yonder chief behold,
Array'd in verdant arms and shining gold:
Dudon his name, (the gallant band he leads,
Adventurers call'd, and first in martial deeds,)
Of noble lineage, with experience crown'd,
In age superior, as in worth renown'd.
See where yon leader clad in sable stands,
(Whose brother holds the rule of Norway's lands,)
Gerardo fierce, of no unwarlike name,
But with his pride he sullies all his fame,
The friendly couple, who, in venture white,
So close together share the task of fight,
Are Edward and Gildippe, (blameless pair!)
In love unequal'd, and renown'd in war!"

While thus she spoke, upon the plain below
They saw more deep the dreadful carnage grow:
There Tancred and Rinaldo's furious hands
Pierc'd the thick ranks, and broke the opposing bands.
Next, with his squadron, Dudon rush'd along,
And pour'd impetuous on the hostile throng.

² The white eagle in the azure field was the emblem of the house of Esté: much is said of this device by Ariosto, who gives it to Mandricardo and Rogero, and figns it to have been borne by Hector of Troy.

Even fierce Argantes, tumbled to the ground
By brave Rinaldo, scarce his safety found;
Nor had the haughty chief escap'd so well,
But, lo! Rinaldo's horse that instant fell,
And chancing on his master's foot to light,
Detain'd awhile the champion from the fight.
The routed Pagans, now oppress'd with dread,
Forsook their ranks, and to the city fled.
Alone Clorinda and Argantes bear
The raging storm that thunders on the rear.
Intrepid these maintain their dangerous post,
And break the fury of the conquering host:
Their daring hands the foremost battle meet,
Bid slaughter pause, and cover the retreat.
Impetuous Dudon chas'd the flying crew,
And fierce Tigranes, with a shock, o'erthrew;
Then through his neck the sword a passage found,
And left the carcass headless on the ground.
In vain his cuirass steel'd Algoroz wore;
Cosbano's temper'd casque avail'd no more!
This through the nape and face the weapon press'd;
That, through the back, and issu'd at his breast.
Then Amurath and Mabomet he slew;
Their souls reluctant from their bodies flew.
The stern Almanzor next his valour prov'd;
And scarce secure the great Circassian mov'd.
Argantes sav'd, his breast with fury burn'd,
And oft, retreating, on the foe he turn'd;
Till with a sudden stroke the chief he found,
And in his flank impress'd a mortal wound.
Prouce falls the leader, stretch'd on earth he lies,
An iron sleep invades his swimming eyes;
And thrice he strives to view the light in vain,
And on his arm his sinking bulk sustain;
Thrice backward falls, and sickens at the sight,
And shuts at length his eyes in endless night:
A chilly sweat o'er all his body streams,
A mortal coldness numbs his stiffening limbs.
The fierce Argantes stay'd not o'er the dead,
But, turning to the Franks, aloud he said—
"Warriors, attend! surrey this bloody sword,
But yester's Sun the present of your lord!
Mark how this hand has tried its use to day:
Haste! to his ears the glad report convey:
What secret pleasure must your leader feel,
To find his glorious gift approv'd so well!
Bid him, to nobler purpose soon address'd,
Expect this weapon buried in his breast;
And should he long delay our force to meet,
This hand shall tear him from his dark retreat."
Boastful he spoke; enrag'd the Christians
hear,

And furious round him drive the thickening war:
But he already, with the flying crew,
Safe in the shelter of the town withdrew.

Now from the wall the close defenders pour
Their stones, like storms of hail, a missile shower:
Unnumber'd quivers shafts for bows supply,
And clouds of arrows from the ramparts fly!
Awhile they force th' advancing Franks to stand,
Till in the gates retreat the Pagan band;
When lo! Rinaldo came, (who now had freed
His foot encumber'd by his fallen steed,)
Eager he rush'd, on proud Argantes' head
To take revenge for hapless Dudon dead:
Through all the ranks, inspiring rage, he flies:
"Why stand we lingering here?" the warrior
cries:
"Lost is that chief who sav'd our band of late,
Why haste we not to avenge the leader's fate?"

When such a cause our vengeful force demands,
Shall these weak ramparts stop our conquering hands?

Did walls of triple steel the town enclose,
Or adamantine baiwarks guard the fœe,
Yet vainly there should hope to lurk secure
The fierce Argantes from your wrathful power—
Haste! let us storm the gates!—He said, and flew
With foremost speed before the warring crew:
Dauntless he goes, nor falling stones he fears,
Nor storms of arrows, hissing round his ears:
So fierce he nods his crest, so towers on high,
Such lightning flashes from his angry eye:
The Pagans on the walls, with doubts oppress'd,
Feel sudden terrors rise in every breast.

While thus Rinaldo to the battle moves,
And these encourages, and these reproves;
Behold, dispatch'd by Godfrey's high commands,
The good Sigero stopp'd the advancing bands:
He, in the leader's name, reprov'd their heat,
And bade the Christians from the field retreat.
"Return, ye warriors!" thus aloud he cried,
"Till fitter season lay your arms aside:
This Godfrey wills, and be his will obey'd."—
He said: Rinaldo then his ardour stay'd,
And stern obedience to the summons paid.
He turn'd, but his disdainful looks reveal'd
The fury in his breast but ill conceal'd.

Now from the walls the unwilling squadrons go,
Retiring, unmolested by the foe;
Yet leave not Dudo's corse, in battle slain,
Depriv'd of rites, neglected on the plain:
Supported in their arms, with pious care,
His faithful friends their honour'd burthen bear.
Meanwhile aloft their leader Godfrey stood,
And from a rising ground the city view'd.
On two unequal hills* the city stands,
A vale between divides the higher lands.
Three sides without impervious to the foe:
The northern side an easy passage shows,
With smooth ascent; but well they guard the part
With lofty walls, and labour'd works of art.
The city lakes and living springs contains,
And cisterns to receive the falling rains:
But bare of herbage is the country round,
Nor springs nor streams refresh the barren ground.
No tender flower exalts its cheerful head;
No stately trees at noon their shelter spread;
Save where two leagues remote a wood appears,
Embrown'd with busioushade, the growth of years.

Where morning gilds the city's eastern side,
The sacred Jordan pours its gentle tide:
Extended lie, against the setting day,
The sandy borders of the midland sea:
Samaria to the north, and Bethel's wood,
Where to the golden calf the altar stood:
And on the rainy south, the hallow'd earth
Of Beth'lem, where the Lord receiv'd his birth.

While Godfrey thus, above the subject field,
The lofty walls and Zion's strength beheld;
And ponder'd where 'encamp his martial powers,
And where he best might storm the hostile towers;
Fell on the chief Erranna cast a look,
Then shew'd him to the king, and thus she spoke:

* A poet, in like manner, particularly describes the situation of the city of Paris, before the attack made by the Pagan army.

Orlando Furioso, book xiv. ver. 772.

"There Godfrey stands, in purple vesture seen—
Of regal presence and exalted mien.

He seems by nature born to kingly sway,
Vers'd in each art to make mankind obey:
Well skill'd alike in every task of fight;
In whom the soldier and the chief unite:
Nor can the troops of yonder numerous host
A wiser head or sturdier courage boast.
Raymond slopes with him the praise can share
Of wisdom in the cool debates of war;
Tancred alone and great Rinaldo claim
An equal glory in the field of fame." [port;

"All tongues," reply'd the king, "his worth re-
I saw and knew him at the Gallic court,
When Egypt sent me envoy into France;
Oft in the lists I saw him wield the lance,
A stripling then, for scarce the dawn began
To clothe his cheeks, the promise of a man!
Yet did his words and early deeds prave,
Too sure, alas! his fame in riper age!"

Sighing he spoke, and hung his pensive head,
Then rais'd his eyes again, and thus he said:

"Say, what is he who stands by Godfrey's side,
His upper garments with vermilion dy'd?
How near his air, his looks how much the same,
Though short his stature, less erect his frame!"
"Tis Baldwin, brother to the prince," she cried,
"In feature like, but more by deeds ally'd.
Now turn thy eyes where with a reverend mien,
In act to counsel, yonder chief is seen:
Raymond is he, in every conduct sage,
Mature in wisdom of experienc'd age:
None better warlike stratagems can frame,
Of all the Gallic or the Latian name.

Beyond, the British monarch's son bebods,
The noble William, with the queue of gold.
Next Guelpho, whom his birth and actions raise
Among the foremost names to equal praise:
Full well I know the chief, to sight confess,
By his broad shoulders and his ample chest.
But still, amidst you numerous troops below,
My eyes explore in vain their deadliest foe;
Resound, whose fury all my race pursued,
The stern destroyer of my royal blood!"

Thus commune they; while from the bill descends
The Christian chief, and joins his warlike friends.
The city view'd, he deems the attempt were vain,
O'er craggy rocks the steepy pass to gain.
Then on the ground, that rose with smooth ascent,
Against the northern gate he pitch'd his tent;
And thence proceeding to the corner tower,
Encamp'd in length the remnant of his power;
But could not half the city's wall enclose,
So wide around the spacious bulwarks rose.

But Godfrey well secures each several way
That might assistance to the town convey;
To seize on every pass his care he bests,
And round with trenches deep the camp defends.

These works perform'd, his steps the hero turn'd
Where lay the breathless corse of Dudo mourn'd
Arriv'd, the lifeless leader prone he found,
With many weeping friends encompass'd round.
High on a stately bier the dead was plac'd,
With funeral pomp and friendly honours grac'd.
When Godfrey enter'd, soon the mournful crowd
Indulg'd their secret woe, and wept aloud;

* The following passage is taken from Virgil's account of the behaviour of Æneas at the death of Pallas, Æn. xl. and from Ariosto's funeral of Bran-

While, with a face compos'd, the pious chief
Beheld in silence, and suppress'd his grief;
Till, having view'd awhile the warrior dead,
With thoughtful looks intent, at length he said—

“Nor plaints nor sorrow to thy death we owe,
Though call'd so sudden from our world below:
In Heaven thou liv'st again; thy mortal name
Has left behind thee glorious tracks of fame.
Well hast thou kept on Earth the Christian laws;
Well hast thou died a warrior in their cause!
Now, happy shade! enjoy thy Maker's sight,
Unfading laurels now thy toils requite!
Hail and be bless'd! we mourn not here thy fate,
But weep the chance of our deserted state.
With thee, so bravely parting from our host,
How strong a sinew of the camp is lost!
But though the fate which snatch'd thee from our eyes

Thy earthly succour to our cause denies,
Thy soul can yet celestial aids obtain,
Elected one of Heaven's immortal train.
Oft have we seen thee in th' embattled field,
A mortal then, thy mortal weapons wield;
So hope we still to see thee wield in fight
The fatal arms of Heaven's resistless might.
O hear our prayers; our pious vows receive;
With pity all our earthly toils relieve:
Procure us conquest, and our host shall pay
Their thanks to thee on that triumphant day!”
Thus spake the chief; and now the sable night
Had banish'd every beam of cheerful light;
And, with oblivion sweet of irksome cares,
Impus'd a truce on mortal plaints and tears.

But sleepless Godfrey lay, who saw 't were vain
To attempt, without machines, the walls to gain:
What forest might the ample planks provide,
And how to frame the piles, his thoughts employ'd.

Up with the Sun he rose, and left his bed
To attend the funeral rites of Dudson dead.
Near to the camp, beneath a hillock, stood
The stately tomb, compos'd of cypress-wood;
Above, a palm-tree spread its verdant shade:
To this the mourning troop the corpse convey'd.
With these the holy priests (a reverend train!)
A requiem chanted to the warrior slain.
High on the boughs were hung, display'd to sight,
The various arms and ensigns won in fight;
In happier times the trophies of his hands,
Gain'd from the Syrian and the Persian bands.
The mighty trunk his shining cuirass bore,
And all those arms which once the hero wore.
Then on the sculptor'd tomb these words appear:
“Here Dudson lies!—the glorious chief revere!”

Soon as the prince these pious rites had paid,
(The last sad office to the worthy dead)
He sent his workmen to the woods; prepar'd,
And well supported with a numerous guard,
Conceal'd in lowly vales¹ the forest stands;
A Syrian show'd it to the Christian bands.
To this they march to hew the timbers down,
To shake the ramparts of the hollow'd town.
To fell the trees each other they provoke;
The insulted forest groans at every stroke.

dimart, book xliiii. where Orlando is introduced making a noble and pathetic oration over his deceased friend.

¹ This forest was six miles distant from the city, and, agreeably to what the poet here says, was first pointed out to them by a Syrian.

Cut by the biting steel, on earth are laid
The pliant ash, the beech's spreading shade.
The sacred palm, the funeral cypress fall;
The broad-leav'd sycamore, the plantain tall.
The married elm his nodding head declines,
Around whose trunk the vine her tendrils twines.
Some fell'd the pine; the oak while others hew'd,
Whose leaves a thousand changing springs renew'd;
Whose stately bulk a thousand winters stood,
And scorn'd the winds that rood the lofty wood.
Some on the creaking wheels with labour stow'd
The unctuous fir, and cedar's fragrant load,
Scar'd at the sounding axe and cries of men,
Birds quit the nest, and beasts forsake the den!

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Pluto calls a council of the infernal powers. His speech to urge them to employ their machinations against the Christians. Hidsates, king of Damascus, incited by a demon, sends his niece Armida to the Christian camp. She is introduced to Godfrey; and endeavours by a feigned story of her misfortunes to raise his compassion. Many of the chiefs, touched with her pretended sorrows, and inflamed with her beauty, are very pressing with Godfrey to permit them to engage in her cause. He at length yields to their request. Armida, during her residence in the camp, captivates, by her arts, almost all the principal commanders.

WHILE these intent their vast machines prepare
To assail the city with decisive war;
The foe of man, whose malice ever burns,
His livid eyes upon the Christians turns.
He sees what mighty works their carwengings,
And grinds his teeth, and foms with inward rage;
And, like a wounded bull with pain oppress'd,
Deep groans rebel from his dolorous breast.
Then bending every thought on new schemes to frame,
For swift destruction on their hated name,
He summon'd in his court, to deep debate,
A horrid council of th' infernal state:
Insensate wretch! as if th' attempt were right
To oppose Jehovah's will, and dare his might—
Ah! too forgetful how the vengeful hand
Of Heaven's Eternal huris the ferky brand!
The trumpet now, with hoarse-responding breath,
Convenes the spirits in the shades of death:
The hollow caverns tremble at the sound;
The air re-echoes to the noise around!
Not louder terrours shake the distant pole,
When through the skies the rattling thunders roll;
Not greater tremours heave the labouring Earth,
When vapours, pent within, contend for birth!
The gods of Hell the awful signal heard,
And, thronging round the lofty gates, appear'd

¹ There can be little doubt but Milton made use of this passage in his account of the fallen angels, and in particular of the speech which Satan here puts into the mouth of Pluto (as he injudiciously calls him), which is very characteristic of his infernal disposition. The poet has, with singular judgment, made him use a phrase only suitable to the Supreme Being, “Let what I will be fate!”

In various shapes, tremendous to the view! [threw
 What terror from their threatening eyes they;
 Seem cloven feet with human faces wear,
 And curling snakes compose their dreadful hair;
 And from behind is seen, in circles cast;
 A serpent's tail voluminous and vast!
 A thousand Harpies foul and Centaurs here,
 And Gorgons pale, and Sphixes dire, appear;
 Unnumber'd Scyllas barking round the air;
 Unnumber'd Pythons hiss, and Hydras glare!
 Chimeras here are found ejecting flame,
 Huge Polypheme, and Geryon's triple frame;
 And many more of mingled kind were seen,
 All monstrous forms, unknown to mortal men!

In order seated now, th' infernal band
 Enclos'd their grisly king on either hand,
 Fall in the midst imperial Pluto sate,
 His arm sustain'd the many sceptre's weight,
 Nor rock nor mountain lifts its head so high;
 E'en towering Atlas, that supports the sky,
 A hillock, if compar'd with him, appears,
 When his large front and ample horns he rears!
 A horrid majesty his looks express'd,
 Which scatter'd terror, and his pride increas'd;
 His sanguine eyes with baleful venom stare,
 And, like a comet, cast a dismal glare;
 A length of beard, descending o'er his breast
 In rugged curls, conceals his hairy chest;
 And, like a whirlpool in the roaring flood,
 Wide gapes his mouth obscene with clotted blood:
 As smoky fires from burning Ætna rise,
 And steaming sulphur, that infects the skies,
 So from his throat the cloudy sparkles came,
 With pestilential breath and ruddy flame:
 And, while he spoke, fierce Corberus forsook
 His triple bark, and Hydra ceas'd to roar;
Cocytus stay'd his course; th' abysses awoke;—
 When from his lips these thundering accents broke:

“Tartarean powers! more worthy of a place
 Above the Sun, whom sprung your glorious race!
 Who lost with me, in one disastrous fight,
 You blissful seats, and realms of endless light!
 Too well our former injuries are known,
 Our bold attempt against th' Almighty's throne:
 See now be ruled at will the crystal sphere,
 And we the name of rebel angels bear;
 And (sad reverse!) exil'd from cloudless days,
 The golden Sun above, and starry rays,
 He shuts us here in dreary glooms immur'd,
 Our purpose thwarted, and our fame obscur'd;
 And now elects (a thought that stings me more Than all the pains I e'er endur'd before),
 To fill our station, man of abject birth,
 A creature fashion'd of the dust of earth!
 Nor this suffice'd; his only Son he gave
 (To oppress us more) a victim to the grave;
 Who came, and burst th' infernal gates in twain,
 And boldly enter'd Pluto's fatal reign;
 And thence releas'd the souls, by lot our due,
 And with his spoils to Heaven victorious flew:
 Triumphant there, our dire disgrace to tell,
 He spreads the banners wide of conquer'd Hell!
 But wherefore should I thus renew our woe?
 And who are those but most our sufferings know?”

But how infinitely superior is our great countryman in his first and second books of Paradise Lost, without any mixture of the Italian's possible and disgusting imagery!

Was there a time that e'er our foe we saw
 The purpose, which his wrath pursu'd, withdraw?
 Then cast each thought of former wrongs behind,
 And let the present outrage fill the mind.
 See now what arts he practises to gain
 The nations round to worship in his fan!
 And shall we lie neglectful of our name,
 Nor just revenge our kindling breasts inflame?
 And tamely thus behold, in Asia's lands,
 New vigour added to his faithful bands?
 Beneath his yoke shall Siou's city bend,
 And further still his curied fame extend?
 Shall other tongues be taught to sound his praise?
 For him shall others tune their grateful lays?
 Shall other monuments his laws proclaim?
 New sculptur'd brass and marble bear his name?
 Our broken idols cast to earth, and scorn'd?
 Our altars to his hated worship turn'd?
 To him shall gifts of myrrh and gold be made?
 To him alone be vows and incense paid?
 Where every temple once ador'd our power,
 Their gates be open to our arts no more?
 Such numerous souls no longer tribute pay,
 And Plato here an empty kingdom say?
 Ah! no—our former courage still we boast;
 That dauntless spirit which inspir'd our host,
 When, girt with flames and steel, in dire alarms
 We durst oppose the King of Heaven in arms!
 'Tis true we lost the day, (so Fate ordain'd,)
 But still the glory of th' attempt remain'd:
 To him was given the conquest of the field;
 To us, superior minds that scorn'd to yield.—
 But wherefore thus your well-known zeal detain?
 Go, faithful peers and partners of my reign,
 My pride and strength! our hated foes oppress,
 And crush their empire ere its power increase;
 Haste (ere destruction end Jodes's name),
 And quench the fury of this growing flame;
 Mix in their councils, fraud and force employ,
 With every art industrious to destroy:
 Let what I will be fate!—let some be slain,
 Some wander exiles from their social train;
 Some, sunk the slaves of love's lascivious power,
 An amorous eye or dimpled smile adore.
 Against its master turn th' insensate steel,
 And teach discordant legions to rebel.
 Perish the camp, in final ruin lost,
 And perish all remembrance of the host!

Scarcely had the tyrant ceas'd, when sudden rose
 The raging band of God's rebellious foes;
 And, eager to review the obsequial light,
 They rush'd impatient from the shades of night,
 As sounding tempests with impetuous force
 Burst from their native caves, with furious course,
 To blot the lustre of the gladsome day,
 And pour their vengeance on the land and sea;
 So these from realm to realm their pinions spread,
 And o'er the world their baneful venom shed;
 And all their bellish arts and frauds applied,
 In various shapes and forms before untied,
 Say, Muse! from whence, and how, the fiends began
 To vent their fury on the Christian train;
 For well to thee each secret work is known,
 Which Fame to us transmits but faintly down,
 O'er wide Damascus and the neighbouring land,
 A fam'd magician, Hidrotes, reign'd;
 Who from his youth his early studies bent
 To explore the seeds of every dark event:
 But, fruitless still! not all his arts declare
 The secret issue of the dubious war;

Nor fix'd nor wandering stars by aspects tell,
Nor truth he finds from oracles of Hell.
And yet (O knowledge of presuming man,
Of thought fallacious and of judgment vain!)
He deem'd that Heaven would sure destruction shower

To crush the Christians' still unconquer'd power;
His fancy view'd at length their army lost,
And palms and laurels for th' Egyptian host:
Hence sprung a wish his subject-bands might share,
With these, the spoils and glory of the war:
But, since the valour of the Franks was known,
Hence sprung a wish the conquest would be dearly won.
Now various plans his wily thoughts employ'd
To sow dissension, and their force divide:
So might his troops, with Egypt's numbers join'd,
An easier field against the Christians find.
While thus he thought, th' apostate angel came,
And added fuel to his impious flame;
And sudden with infernal counsels fir'd
His restless bosom, and his soul inspir'd.
A damsel for his niece the monarch own'd,
Whose matchless charms were through the East
To her was every art of magic known, (renown'd;
And all the wiles of woman-kind her own.
To her the king th' important task assign'd,
And thus reveal'd the purpose of his mind:

"O thou, my best, below'd! whose youthful charms
(Sweet smiles and graces, Love's resistless arms!)
A manly mind and thoughts mature conceal;
Whose arts in magic e'en my own excel;
Great schemes I frame: nor shall those schemes be vain,

Assist but thou the labours of my brain.
Then heed my counsel, in the task engage,
And execute the plan of cautious age.
Go seek the hostile camp; and there improve
Each female artifice that kindles love:
With speaking sorrows bathe thy powerful eyes,
And mix thy tender plaints with broken sighs;
For beauty, by misfortune's hand oppress'd,
Can fashion to her will the hardest breast.
With bashful mien relate the plausible tale;
With show of truth the secret falsehood veil.
Use every art of words and winning smiles
To allure the leader Godfrey to thy toils:
That thus, a slave to love and beauty won,
His soul may loathe his enterprise begun.
But if the Fates this snare shall render vain,
Inflame the boldest of the warrior train;
And lead them distant from the camp afar,
No'er to return and mingle in the war.
All ways are just to guard religion's laws,
All means are lawful in our country's cause."

The great attempt Armida's bosom warms,
(Proud of her bloom and more than mortal charms:)
She thence, at evening's close, departs alone
Through solitary paths and ways unknown;
And trusts, in female vests and beauty bright,
To conquer armies unshak'd in flight.
But various rumours of her flight, diffus'd
With purpos'd art, the vulgar-crowd amus'd.

Few days were past, when near the damsel drew
To where the Christian tents appear'd in view:
Her matchless charms the wondering bands surprise,
Provoke their whispers, and attract their eyes.
So mortals, through the midnight fields of air,
Observe the blaze of some unusual star.
Sudden they throng to view th' approaching dame,
Eager to learn herappings and her name.

Not Argos, Cyprus, or the Delian coast
Could e'er a form or mien so lovely boast.
Now through her snowy veil, half hid from sight
Her golden locks diffuse a doubtful light;
And now, unveil'd, in open view they show'd:
So Phoebus glimmers through a fleecy cloud,
So from the cloud again redeems his ray,
And sheds fresh glory on the face of day.
In wavy ringlets falls her beauteous hair,
That catch new graces from the sportive air:
Declin'd on earth, her modest look denies
To show the starry lustre of her eyes:
(O'er her fair face a rosy bloom is spread,
And stains her ivory skin with lovely red:
Soft-breathing sweets her opening lips disclose;
The native odour of the hudding rose!)
Her bosom bare displays its snowy charms,
Where Cupid frames and points his fiery arms:
Her smooth and swelling breasts are part reveal'd,
And part beneath her envious vest conceal'd;
Her robes oppose the curious sight in vain,
No robes oppos'd can amorous thoughts restrain:
The gazer, fir'd with charms already shown,
Explores the wonders of the charms unknown.
As through the limpid stream, or crystal bright,
The rays of Phoebus dart their piercing light:
So through her vest can daring fancy glide;
And view what modesty attempts to hide.
Thence paints a thousand loves and soft desires,
And adds fresh fuel to the lover's fires!

Thus pass'd Armida through th' admiring crowd,
(With secret joy her heart exulting glow'd)
She read their thoughts, and various wiles design'd,
And schemes of future conquest fill'd her mind.
While in suspense her cautious eyes explor'd
Some guide to lead her to the Christian lord,
Before her sight the young Eustatius stands,
Great Godfrey's brother, who the host commands:
Her beauty's blaze the warrior's breast alarms,
He stays, and, wondering, gazes on her charms:
At once the flames of love his soul inspire,
As o'er the stubble runs the blazing fire. [press'd,
Then bold through youth, by amorous passion
He thus, with courtly words, the dame address'd:
"Say, damsel! (if thou bear'st a mortal name,
For sure thou art'st not of terrestrial frame!)
Since Heaven ne'er gave to one of Adam's race
So large a portion of celestial grace!

What fortune bids thee to our camp repair?
What fortune sends to us a form so fair?
What art thou? If of heavenly lineage say,
So let me, prostrate, rightful homage pay."
"Too far thy praise extends," she made reply,
"My merits ne'er attain'd a flight so high:
Thy eyes, O chief! (a mortal) wretch survey,
To pleasure dead, to grief a living prey!
Unhappy fate my footsteps hither led,
A fugitive forlorn, a wandering maid!
Godfrey I seek, on him my hopes depend,
Oppression's scourge, and injur'd Virtue's friend!
Then, generous as thou seem'st, indulge my grief,
And grant me audience of thy godlike chief!"

Then he: "A brother sure may gain his ear,
May lead thee to him, and thy suit prefer:
Thou hast not chosen ill, O lovely dame!
Some interest in the leader's breast I claim:
Use as thou wilt (nor deem in vain my word)
His powerful sceptre and his brother's sword."
He ceas'd; and sought her where, retir'd in state,
Encircled by his chiefs, the hero sate.

With awful reverence at his sight she bow'd,
Then seem'd abash'd with shame, and silent
stood.

With gentle words the leader strove to cheer
Her drooping spirits, and dispel her fear:
Till thus she fram'd her tale with fraudulent art,
In accents sweet, that won the yielding heart:

“ Unconquer'd prince! whose far-resounding name
With every virtue fills the mouth of fame!
Whom kings themselves, subdu'd, with pride obey,
While vanquish'd nations glory in thy sway!
Known is thy valour, and thy worth approv'd,
By all esteem'd, and by thy foes belov'd!
E'en those confide in him they fear'd before,
And, when distress'd, thy saving hand implore.
I, who a different faith from thine profess;
A faith obnoxious, which thy arms oppress;
Yet hope, by thee, to ascend my rightful throne,
Where once my sires in regal lustre shone.
If, from their kindred, others aid demand,
To oppose the fury of a foreign band,
I, since my friends no ties of pity feel,
Against my blood invoke the hostile steel.
On that I call; in thee my hopes I place:
Tis thine alone my abject state to raise.
No less a glory shall thy labours crown,
To exalt the low, than pull the mighty down:
An equal praise the name of mercy yields
With routed squadrons in triumphant fields.
Oft hast thou snatch'd from kings the sovereign power;

Win now a like renown, and mine restore.
O may thy pitying grace my cause sustain,
Nor let me on thy help rely in vain!
Witness that power, to all an equal God!
Thy aid was ne'er in juster cause bestow'd.
But hear me first my hapless fortune show,
And speak the treachery of a kindred-foe.

“ In me the child of Arbilan survey,
Who o'er Damascus once maintain'd the sway:
He, sprung of humbler race, in marriage gain'd
Fair Charicles, and the crown obtain'd:
But she, who rais'd him to the sovereign state,
Ere I was born, receiv'd the stroke of fate.
Ow' fatal day my mother snatch'd from Earth;
The same, alas! beheld my hapless birth!
Five annual Suns had scarce their influence shed,
Since from the world my dearest parent fled,
When, yielding to the fate of all mankind,
My sire in Heaven his faithful consort join'd.
The monarch to a brother's guardian care
Consign'd his sceptre and his infant- heir;
In whom he deem'd he justly might confide,
If ever virtue did in man reside.

The kingdom's rule he seiz'd, but still he show'd
A zeal for me, and for my country's good;
While all his actions seem'd th' effects to prove
Of faith untainted and paternal love.
But thus, perchance, with shows of anxious zeal,
He sought his traitorous purpose to conceal:
Or else, sincere, to effect his deep design,
My hand in marriage with his son to join.
I grew in years, and with me grew his son;
In whom no knightly virtues ever shone:
Rude was his aspect, ruder was his soul;
Rapacious, proud, impatient of control:
Such was the man my guardian had decreed
To share my kingdom and my nuptial bed.
In vain to win me to his will he try'd;
I heard in silence, or his suit deny'd.

One day he left me, when his looks confess'd
Some fatal treason lurking in his breast;
Alas! methought I then could clearly trace
My future fortune in the tyrant's face:
From thence what visions did my soul affright,
Distract my sleep, and skim before my sight!
O'er all my spirits hung a mournful gloom,
A sure presage of every woe to come!
Oft to my view appear'd my mother's ghost,
A bloodless form, in tears and sorrows lost!
Ah me! far distant from her former look!
'Fly, fly, my daughter!' thus the phantom spoke,
'For thee the murderous steel the tyrant bears;
For thee his rage th' envenom'd bowl prepares!'

“ But what avail'd these bodings of my mind?
Why was I warn'd to shun the ill design'd?
Could I, a helpless maid, resolve to roam,
A willing exile from my native home?
A milder choice it seem'd to ease my sight
In that dear place where first I saw the light.
Yet death I fear'd, and fear'd from death to fly;
Nor knew on whom for counsel to rely.
To none I durst my secret thoughts relate,
But liv'd in dread suspense, uncertain of my fate!
Like one, who every moment thinks to feel
On his defenceless head th' impending steel.
But (whether fortune now was kinder grown,
Or Heaven reserv'd me yet for woes unknown)
A faithful courtier, who, with anxious cares,
Had bred my father from his infant years,
Touch'd with compassion for my death decreed,
Reveal'd the tyrant's meditated deed;
And own'd himself th' elected minister
That day the poison to my hand to bear.
He bade me fly, if still I wish'd to live,
And proffer'd every aid his power could give:
With soothing words against my fears he wrought;
And soon confirm'd my undetermin'd thought:
With him I then resolv'd at parting light
To fly, and trust my safety to my flight.

“ 'T was now the hour that silence reign'd around,
And welcome darkness brooded on the ground;
When, unperceiv'd, I pass'd the palace-gate;
(Two faithful maids companions of my fate)
Yet, with a tearful eye, and heavy mind,
I left my dear paternal seat behind;
While, as my tardy feet their course pursu'd,
With longing looks, my lov'd, lost home I view'd.
So seems a ship by sudden tempests tost,
And torn, unwilling, from its friendly coast.
All night, and all th' ensuing day, we pass'd
Through pathless deserts, and a dreary waste:
Till, seated on the borders of the land,
A castle's safe retreat at length we gain'd.
Here dwelt Arontes, who, with pious truth,
Preserv'd my life, the guardian of my youth.

“ But when the traitor saw his treason vain,
And found me thus escap'd his deathful train,
He, with inveterate rage and fraudulent mind,
Accus'd us of a crime himself design'd.
My bribes, he said, had false Arontes wrought
To mingle deadly poison in his draught;
That, when he could no more my will restrain,
To loose desires my soul might give the rein.
Ah! first let lightning on my head descend,
Ere, sacred Virtue! I thy laws offend!
With grief my tyrant on the throne I view'd,
And saw him thirsting still to shed my blood;
But, more than all, I mourn'd my virgin-name
Trudg'd, dishonour'd, made the sport of fame!

The wretch, who fear'd the vulgar herd enrag'd,
 With plausive tales the public ear engag'd;
 That dubious of the truth, in deep suspense,
 The city rose not in their queen's defence.
 Thus, while he feigns a zeal to efface the shame—
 My crimes have brought upon the regal name,
 He seeks my ruin, which he knows alone
 Can fix the basis of his tottering throne.
 And, ah! the wretch too sure success will find
 In the dire purpose of his ruthless mind! [rags.
 Since tears are vain, my blood must quench his Unless thy mercy in my cause engage.
 To thee, O mighty chief! I fly for aid,
 An ill-starr'd orphan, and a helpless maid!
 O let these tears, that have thy feet bedew'd,
 Present the effusion of my guiltless blood!
 Oh! by those feet that tread the proud in dust!
 By that right hand that ever helps the just!
 By all the laurels that thy arms have won!
 By every temple in yon hallow'd town;
 In pity grant what thou alone canst give;
 Restore my crown, in safety bid me live!—
 But what from pity can I hope to prove,
 If piety and justice fail to move!
 Thou, to whom Heaven and Fate decreed to will What's'er is just, and what thou wilt, fulfil;
 O stretch thy hand, my threaten'd life retrieve,
 And, in return, my kingdom's crown receive.
 Among the numbers that thy arms attend,
 Let ten selected chiefs my cause befriend;
 These, with my people and paternal train,
 May well suffice my ancient seat to gain:
 For he, to whom is given the portal's care,
 Will, at my word, by night the gates unbar:
 By his advice to implore thy aid I came;
 Thy least of succours will his hopes inflame;
 So much his soul reveres thy arms and name.”
 She said; and ceasing, waited his reply
 With silent eloquence and downcast eye.
 But various thoughts revolv'd in Godfrey's mind,
 Now here, now there, his dubious heart inclin'd:
 He fear'd the hostile guiles; for well he knew
 How little trust to Pagan faith was due:
 But tender pity still his soul confess'd,
 Pity, that sleeps not in a noble breast:
 Nor this alone within his bosom wrought;
 The common good employ'd his careful thought:
 He saw th' advantage that his arms might gain,
 Should fair Armida o'er Damascus reign:
 Was thence, her state dependent on his hands,
 Might furnish every aid the time demands,
 Against th' Egyptians and auxiliar bands.
 While thus he paus'd, the dame attentive stood,
 Dwelt on his face, and every gesture view'd;
 But when she found his speech so long delay'd,
 Her frequent sighs her doubts and fears betray'd.
 At length the leader her request denies;
 Yet stays with mild and gracious words replies:
 “If God, whose holy service arms our band,
 Did not, even now, our pious swords demand;
 Well might thy hopes expect the wish'd success,
 Nor find our pity only, but redress.
 But, while you city-walls and chosen flock
 We seek to free from proud oppression's yoke,
 It ill befits to turn aside our force,
 And stop our conquests in the middle course.
 Yet here to thee my solemn faith I give,
 And to that pledge do thou securely live;
 If e'er indifferent to our arms, 't is given
 To free thine holy walls, below'd of Heaven!

Then will we place thee in thy native lands,
 As justice bids, and piety commands:
 But piety, like this, must impious show,
 If first we pay not what to God we owe.”
 At this unwelcome speech the dame turn'd
 Her eyes awhile to earth, and silent mourn'd;
 Then rais'd them slow, with pearly drops bedew'd,
 And thus, with pleading looks, her plaint renew'd:
 “Ah, wretch! did ever Heaven on one bestow
 A life so fix'd in never-ending woe;
 That others even their nature shall forget,
 Ere I subdue the rigour of my fate!
 Why should I weep, since hopes no more remain,
 And prayers assail the human breast in vain?
 Or will my savage foe his ears incline
 To griefs, that fail to move a mind like thine?
 Yet think not that my words thy heart accuse,
 Whose firm resolves so small an aid refuse:
 Heaven I accuse; from thence my sorrows flow:
 Heaven steels thy heart against a virgin's woe!
 Not thou, O chief! but Fate this aid denies.
 Then let me view no more the hated skies,
 Suffic'd it not (by unrelenting doom)
 To lose my parents in their early bloom!
 But, exil'd, must I lead a wandering life,
 Or fall a victim to the murderer's knife?
 Since the chase laws, by which our sex is ty'd,
 Amidst your camp forbid me to reside,
 Where shall I fly? what friendly powers engage?
 How save my person from the tyrant's rage?
 No forts but open to his fury lie—
 Then wherefore hesitates my soul to die?
 And, since 't is vain with fortune to contend,
 This hand at once my life and woes shall end.”
 She ceas'd; and turn'd aside with regal grace,
 A generous anger kindling in her face:
 Disdain and sorrow seem her breast to rood,
 While from her eyes the copious tears descend,
 And, trickling, down her lovely visage run,
 Like lucid pearls transparent to the Sun!
 O'er her fair cheeks the crystal moisture flows,
 Where lilies mingle with the neighbouring rose.
 So, wet with dew, the flowers, at dawning day,
 To balmy gales their opening sweets display:
 Aurora views, and gathers from the mead
 A vary'd garland for her radiant bead.
 Thus sweet in woe appears the weeping dame,
 Her falling tears a thousand hearts inflame.
 O wondrous force of Love's mysterious fire,
 That lights in tears the flames of soft desire!
 Almighty Love the world in triumph leads,
 But now, by her inspir'd, himself exceeds!
 Her searing grief bids real sorrow flow,
 And melts the heart with sympathetic woe;
 While each apart, with indignation cries:
 “If Godfrey still his pitying ear denies,
 His infant years some hungry tigress fed,
 Some horrid rock on Alpine mountains bred;
 Or waves produc'd him 'midst the howling main,
 Who sees such beauty mourn, and mourn in vain!”
 But young Eustatius, by his zeal inspir'd,
 Whom most the torch of love and pity fir'd,
 (When others murmur'd or their words repress'd)
 Stood forth, and boldly thus the chief address'd:
 “O prince and brother! whose unshaken mind
 Too firmly holds its purpose first design'd,
 If still unpitying thou refuse to hear
 The sense of all, their universal prayer,
 I ask not that the chiefs whose care presides
 O'er subject kingdoms, and their actions guides,

Should from the hallow'd city's walls recede,
Neglectful of their task, by Heaven decreed;
But from our band, that independent came,
Adventurous warriors to the field of fame,
Ten champions yield, selected from the rest,
To cherish virtue and relieve th' opprest:
Nor does the man forsake the cause of Heaven,
Whose succour to a helpless maid is given:
For sure I deem a tyrant's death must prove
A grateful tribute to the powers above.
And should I wave th' advantage here in view,
That must undoubted to our cause ensue;
Yet duty would elude my arms excite;
By knight-hood sworn to guard a virgin's right.
Forbid it Heaven! that ever France should hear,
Or any land where courteous acts are dear,
That dangers or fatigues our souls dismay'd,
When piety and justice claim'd our aid!
No longer let me then this helmet wear,
No longer wield the sword, or corselet bear;
No more in steel, or glittering arms, delight;
No more usurp the honour'd name of knight!"

Thus spoke the youth*: his brave companions,
To open murmurs, all his words approv'd; [mov'd
With earnest suit around their leader press'd,
And urg'd the justness of the knight's request.

Then Godfrey thus: "Be what ye ask fulfill'd:
To such united prayers my will I yield:
Her aid requested let the dame receive;
Whom not my counsels, but your own relieve.
Yet, if my words can such desires control,
Subdue these warm emotions of the soul!"

No more he said: nor needed more reply,
All heard his grant, and heard with eager joy.
What cannot beauty, join'd with sorrow, move,
And tender accents from the lips of love?
Each rosy mouth supplies a golden chain
To bind the fancy, and the heart constrain.

Eustatius, then, the weeping fair address'd:
"O lovely maid! be now thy grief suppress'd:
Soon shalt thou find the succour from our hands,
Such as thy merit, or thy fear, demands."

At this Armida clears her clouded brow;
With rising joy her blooming features glow;
While, with her veil, she wipes the tears away,
And adds new lustre to the face of day.

Then thus—"For what your pitying grace be-
Accept the thanks a grateful virgin owes; [stows,
The world due honour to your worth shall give,
And in my heart your names shall ever live!"

She said; and what it seem'd her tongue deny'd,
Her looks with softer eloquence supply'd;
While outward smiles conceal'd, with fraudulent art,
The mighty mischief lurking in her heart.

Soon as she saw how far her power had won,
And fortune favouring thus her wiles begun,
She seiz'd th' occasion, and her schemes revolv'd,
To finish all her impious thoughts resolv'd,
With female beauty every breast to quell,
And Circe or Medea's charms excel;
And, like a Syren, with her soothing strain,
To lull the firmest of the warrior-train.

* In this episode of Armida, Tasso seems to have had his eye upon a passage in the beginning of Boyardo's poem, where Angelica is sent by her father Galaphron to the camp of Charlemain, on a like design with Armida, and captivates all the Christian commanders.

See Orlando Innamorato, B. i. c. i.

Each varied art to win the soul she tries:
To this, to that, a different mien applies;
Now scarcely dares her modest eyes advance,
And now she rolls them with a wanton glance:
She these repels, and those incites to love,
As various passions various bosoms move.
And when some youth appears, who doubts to name
His hidden thoughts, or struggles with his flame;
Soon on his face a chattering smile she bends,
And from her eyes a melting sweetness sends;
Revives his hopes, inflames his slow desire,
And thaws the frost of fear with amorous fire:
From him, who urg'd by fiercer passion roves
Beyond the bound that modesty approves,
The wily fair her gentle look withdraws,
And with rebukes and frowns his rashness averts:
Yet, 'midst the anger rising in her face,
A ray of pity blends the softening grace:
The lover, while he fears, pursues the dame,
And in her pride finds fuel to his flame.

With arts like these a thousand souls she gains,
From every eye the tender tear constrains:
In pity's flame she tempers Cupid's dart,
To pierce the warrior's unresisting heart.

Ah! cruel Love! thou bane of every joy,
Whose pains or sweets alike our peace destroy:
Still equal woes from thee mankind endure,
Fatal thy wounds, and fatal is the cure!

While thus she gives alternate frost and fire,
And joy, and grief, and hope, and fear inspires,
With cruel pleasure she their state surveys,
Exulting in those ill her power could raise,
 Oft when some lover trembling wooes the fair,
She seems to lend an unexperienc'd ear:
Or, while a crimson blush her visage dyes,
With coyness feign'd, she downward bends her eyes,
While shame and wrath with mingled grace adorns
Her glowing cheeks, like beams of early morn!
But when she sees a youth prepare to tell
The secret thoughts that in his bosom dwell;
Now sudden from his sight the damsel flies,
Now gives an audience to his plaints and sighs;
Thus holds from morn till eve his heart in play,
Then slips, delusive, from his hope away;
And leaves him like a hunter in the chase,
When night conceals the beast's uncertain trace.

With arms like these she made a thousand yield,
A thousand chiefs unconquer'd in the field.
What wonder, then, if love Achilles mov'd;
His power if Hercules or Theseus prov'd;
When those, who drew their sword in Jesus' cause,
Submissive bent beneath his impious laws?

BOOK V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Gernardo, aspiring to the command of the adventurers, is jealous lest Rinaldo should succeed to that honour. By his calumnies, he draws on himself the indignation of that hero, who kills him in the face of the whole army. Godfrey, incensed at this action of Rinaldo, resolves to bring him to a public trial: the latter, disdaining to submit to this, quits the camp, and goes into voluntary exile. Armida presses Godfrey for the promised succours: ten warriors are chosen by lot, with whom she leaves the camp. In the night, many others depart by stealth to accompany her. Godfrey receives ill advices from the fleet.

While the ether scarce the false Armida spread,
 And in the guileful toils the warriors led;
 Nor hop'd alone the promi'd aid to gain,
 But other chiefs, by further arts, obtain;
 The careful Godfrey ponder'd in his mind,
 To whom the doubtful charge should be consign'd:
 The worth and number of the adventures-band,
 Their various hopes his wavering thoughts detain'd.
 At length, by censure urg'd, the chief decreed
 Themselves should fix on one their hand to lead,
 Whose merit well might Dudson's loss supply;
 On whom th' election of the ten should lie:
 Thus, while to them he left th' important choice,
 No knight, displeas'd, could blame his partial voice.

The warriors then he call'd, and thus address'd:
 "Full well ye know the counsel of my breast:
 I would not accout to the same deny;
 But at a fitter time our aid supply.
 What once I speak, I now propose shew:
 Still may your better thoughts th' advice pursue:
 For here, in this unstable world, we find
 We oft must change our purpose first design'd.
 Yet if your souls, with generous ardour press,
 disdain the judgment of a cooler breast;
 I would not here unwilling arms detain,
 Nor, what I gave so lately, render vain.
 Still let me mildly rule each faithful band,
 And away the sceptre with a gentle hand.
 Then go, or stay; no longer I contend;
 And on your pleasure let the choice depend.
 But first elect, attend your martial train,
 A chief who may succeed to Dudson slain:
 To name the dame's champions be his care:
 Ten warriors only shall the adventure share:
 In this the sovereign power I still retain;
 In this alone his conduct I restrain."

Thus Godfrey spoke: not long his brother stay'd,
 But, with his friends' consent, this answer made:
 "With thee, full well, O prudent chief! agrees
 The cooler thought that each event foresees:
 But strength of hand, and hearts of martial fire,
 Are due from us, and what our years require:
 And that which bears in others wisdom's name,
 In us were baseness and reproachful shame.
 Therefore so fight the risk we may sustain,
 When justly weigh'd against th' expected gain;
 Th' elected ten shall go (by thee dismiss'd)
 And in this righteous cause a helpless maid assist."

He said; and thus, with show of public zeal,
 His words th' emotions of his heart conceal;
 While all profess in honour's name to move,
 And with that specious title veil their love.

But young Eustatius, by his passion sway'd,
 With jealous eye Sophia's consort eyed;
 His ev'ry mind these virtues could not bear
 That shone more brightly in a form so fair.
 He start'd with him Rinaldo should be choic'd,
 And 'gainst his father's cautious scheme design'd:
 The rival warrior then aside he took,
 And plann'd thus with wily words bespoke:

"O should, still greater than thy glorious sire,
 Whom, by a youth in arms, the world admire!
 Say, who shall now our valiant squadron lead?
 Who next to haught'ful Dudson (if succeed)
 I scarcely could that hero's rule obey,
 And to his years alone resign'd the sway.
 Who now, after Godfrey's brother shall command?
 Thou, thou alone of all our martial band:
 Thy glorious sire can match the noblest line;
 Thy warlike deeds superior far to mine.

Even Godfrey's self would own inferior might,
 And yield to thee in arduous fields of fight:—
 Thee, mighty warrior! thee our chief I claim,
 Whose soul disdain to attend the Syrian dame;
 And slight the trivial honour which proceeds
 From dark achievements and insidious deeds.
 Here will thy valour find an ample field;
 This camp to thee a nobler prospect yield.
 Accept, brave youth! to guide th' adventurer band;
 Myself will frame their minds to thy command.
 Thou, in return, attend my sole request;
 (Since doubtful thoughts as yet divide my breast)
 Whate'er I propose, let my will be free,
 To assist Armida, or remain with thee."

He ceas'd; and as these awful words he said,
 A sudden blush his conscious cheeks o'ercreas'd.
 Rinaldo, smiling, saw, with heedful eyes,
 His secret passion through the thin disguise.
 But he, whom less the darts of love had found,
 Whose bosom scarcely felt the gentle wound,
 With unconcern regards a rival's name,
 Nor frames a wish to attend the Pagan dame.
 On Dudson's hapless fate his thoughts were turn'd;
 For Dudson's death the generous hero mourn'd.
 He deem'd his former glories would be lost
 If long Argante liv'd the deed to boast:
 With pleasure yet Eustatius' words he heard,
 That to the rank deserv'd his youth prefer'd:
 His conscious heart exulted in the praise;
 Pleas'd with the tribute truth to virtue pays.

"Far rather would I choose," he thus replies,
 "To meet honour, than to honour rise.
 Let virtuous actions dignify my name,
 I envy not the great, nor sceptres claim.
 Yet if thou think'st so far my merits weigh,
 I shall not then reject the proffer'd sway;
 But prize (with gratitude and pleasure mov'd)
 So fair a token of my worth approve'd.
 I seek not, nor refuse, the chief command;
 But should the power be yielded to my hand,
 Thou shalt be one amongst th' elected band."

Thus he. Eustatius speeds his peers to find,
 And fashion to his will each warrior's mind.
 But that pre-eminence Gernando claims;
 And though at him her darts Armida aims,
 Yet not the power of beauty can control
 The thirst of honour in his haughty soul.
 From Norway's powerful kings this chief descends,
 Whose rule o'er many a province wide extends:
 The crowns and sceptres which his fathers hold
 From ancient times, with pride his bosom swell'd.
 Rinaldo in himself his glory plac'd,
 More than in distant deeds of ages past;
 Though long his sire with every fame was crown'd,
 In war illustrious, and in peace renown'd.

The barbarous prince, whose pride no worth allows,

Saw what from robes or dominion flows;
 And every virtue deems an empty name,
 Unless ennobled by a regal claim;
 Indignant sees a private warrior dare
 With him in merit and in praise compare:
 No bound, no law, his fiery temper knows;
 With rage he insults, and with shame he glows.

The fiend of Hell, who sees his torur'd mind
 Expos'd to all his subtle arts design'd,
 Unseen through all his treach'rous honours glides,
 There rules at will, o'er every thought proceeds;

His hate increases, and inflames his ire,
And rouses in his heart infernal fire;
While every moment, from within, he hears
This hollow voice resounding in his ears:

"Shall thus, oppos'd to thee, Rinaldo dare
His boasted ancestors with thine compare?
First let him court, whose pride thy equal stands,
His subject realms and tributary lands;
His sceptres show, and (whence his glory springs)
Mate his dead heroes with thy living kings.
Shall such a chief exalt his worthless head,
A servile warrior in Italia bred?

To him let fortune loss or gain decree,
He gains a conquest who contends with thee;
The world shall say (and great the fame will prove)
'Lo! this is he, who with Gerando strove.'

The place that once experience'd Dagon slipp'd,
New honours to thy former state may yield:
But be no less with thine in glory vie,
Who boldly dares demand so vast a price.

If human passions touch the breast above,
What holy wrath must aged Dodon move, [knight
When, from his Heaven, he sees this haughty
(A stripling-warrior in the field of fight)
Aspire so high; while some his counsels join,
And (shame eternal!) second his design.

If Godfrey such injustice tamely view,
And suffer him to usurp thy honours due;
It rests on thee to assert thy rightful claim,
Declare thy power, and vindicate thy name."

Pr'd at these words, more fell his fury grows,
Within his heart the torch of discord glows:
His raging passion, now to madness stung,
Flames in his eye, and points his haughty tongue.
Whatever his envious speech can turn to blame,
He boldly charges on Rinaldo's fame;

And every virtue that the youth adorns,
To foul reproach, with artful malice, turns:
He paints him proud and turbulent of mind,
And calls his valour headstrong, rash, and blind.

He scatters falsehood in the public ears,
Till even the rival knight the rumour hears.
But still th' insensate wretch pursues his hate,
Nor curbs the rage that hurries on his fate:
While the dire demon all his soul possess'd,
Rav'd from his lips, and madden'd in his breast.

Amid the camp appear'd a level space;
And warriors oft resorted to the place,
In tournaments, in wrestling, and the course,
Their limbs to supple, and improve their force.
Here, midst the throng (for so his doom requir'd)
He vented all his vengeful spleen inspir'd;
And 'gainst Rinaldo turn'd his impious tongue,
On which the venom of Averrus hung.

His contumacious speech Rinaldo hears,
And now no more his dreadful wrath forbears;
At once the base insulter he defies,
Unsheaths his falchion, and to vengeance flies;
His voice like thunder echoes from afar,
His threat'ning steel like lightning gleams in air.
Gerando sees, nor hopes to 'scape by flight,
For instant death appears before his sight.

Meanwhile, to all the wondering army's view,
A show of valour o'er his fears he threw:
He grasps his sword, he waits his mighty foe;
And stands prepar'd to meet the coming blow.

Now sudden, drawn from many warriors' thighs,
A thousand weapons flash against the skies.
In throngs around the gathering people press;
The tumult thickens, and the crowd increases:

Discordant murmur rises, and echo sound,
And mingled clamours to the clouds resound.
So, near the ocean on the rocky shore,
With broken noise the wind and billows roar.

But not their cries nor murmurs could detain
Th' offended warrior, or his wrath restrain:
He scours the force that dares his fury stay;
He whirle his sword with unobscured sway:
The throng divides; alone his arm prevails,
And, midst a thousand friends, the prince assails.
Then from his hand, that well his rage obey'd,
A thousand blows th' astonish'd foe invade.
Now here, now there, the rapid weapon flies,
Confounds his senses, and distracts his eyes:
At length, the cruel steel, with strength impair'd,
Rinaldo hurries in his panting breast.

Prono fell th' wretch, and sinking on the ground,
His blood and spirit issu'd through the wound.
The victor o'er the dead no longer stay'd,
But in the sheath return'd the reeking blade:
And, thence departing, to his tent retir'd,
His vengeance satid, and his wrath expir'd.

Now near the tumultuous Godfrey drew,
When the dire scene was open to his view,
Gerando pale with lifeless looks appear'd,
His hair and vest with corvid blood bespread.
He saw the tears his friends in pity shed,
And heard their plaints and sorrows o'er the dead:
Surpris'd, he ask'd what hand had wrought the deed,
And whence could such destructive rage proceed?

Arnaldo, dearest to the slaughter'd prince,
The tale relates, and aggravates the offence;
That urg'd by slender cause to impious strife,
Rinaldo's hand had robb'd the chief of life;
And turn'd that weapon, which for Christ he bore,
Against the champions of the Christian power;
And show'd how little he his leader priz'd,
How much his mandates and his sway despis'd:
That public justice to th' offence was due,
And death the bold offender should pursue.

Such acts must hateful be at every time;
But doubly here, the place enhanc'd the crime;
That should be pass absolv'd, the fatal deed
A dire example through the host might spread;
And all that own'd the murder'd warrior's side
Would take that vengeance which the law deny'd:
From which might contest spring and mutual rage,
As would the camp in civil broils engage.
He call'd to mind the merits of the slain,
All that could waken wrath, or pity gain.

To acquit his friend the noble Tancred tries,
And fearless for the knight accus'd replies:
While Godfrey hears, and with a brow severe,
But little gives to hope, and much to fear.

Then Tancred thus: "O prudent leader! view
What to Rinaldo and his worth is due:
Think from himself what honours he may claim,
What from his glorious race and Guelpho's name.
Not those who rule exalted o'er mankind
Should equal punishment for errors find:
In different stations crimes are different found,
By vulgar laws the great can ne'er be bound."

To him the leader thus: "In every state,
The vulgar learn obedience from the great;
Ill, Tancred, dost thou judge, and ill conceive,
That we the mighty should unpunish'd leave!
What is our empire and our vain command,
If only ruler o'er the ignoble band?
If such my sceptre and imperfect reign,
I here resign the worthless gift again."

But freely, from your choice, the power I hold,
Nor shall the privilege be now control'd :
And well I know to vary from my hand
Rewards and punishments, as times demand ;
And when, preserving all in equal state,
To include alike the vulgar and the great."

Thus Godfrey said ; and Tancred thought reply'd,
But, struck with awe, stood silent at his side.

Raymond, a lover of the laws severe
Of ancient times, exults his speech to bear.
" While thus," he cries, " a ruler holds the sway,
With reverence due the subjects will obey.
In government what discipline is found,
Where pardons more than punishments abound ?
E'en clemency destructive must appear,
And kingdoms fall, unless maintain'd by fear."

Thus they, while Tancred every sentence weigh'd,
Then, swift departing, seiz'd his rapid steed,
And with impatience to Rinaldo fled :
Him in his tent he finds, and there relates
The words of Godfrey, and the past debates ;
Then thus pursues : " Though outward looks we find
Uncertain tokens of the secret mind,
Since far too deep, conceal'd from prying eyes,
Within the breast the thought of mortals lies ;
Thus far methinks the chief's design I see ;
(In this his speeches and his looks agree)
Thou must submit, and by the laws be try'd,
When public justice shall thy cause decide."

At this a scornful smile Rinaldo show'd,
Where noble pride and indignation glow'd.
" Let those," he cried, " in bonds their cause main-
By nature slaves, and worthy of the chain : [taur,
Free was I born, in freedom will I live,
And sooner die than shameful bonds receive.

This hand is us'd the glorious sword to wield,
To palms of conquest, and disdain to yield
To base constraint : if thus we meet regard,
If Godfrey thus our merits would reward ;
And thinks to drag me hence, a wretch confin'd
To common prisons, like th' ignoble kind ;
Then let him come—I here shall firm abide,
And arms and fate between us shall decide :
Soon shall our strife in sanguine torrents flow,
A prospect grateful to the gazing foe !"

This said, he call'd for arms ; and soon around
His manly limbs the temper'd harness bound :
Then to his arm the ponderous shield apply'd,
And hung the fatal falchion at his side :
Now sheath'd in polish'd mail (a martial sight)
He shone terrific in a blaze of light.

He seem'd like Mars, descending from his sphere,
When rage and terror by his side appear !

Tancred, meanwhile, essays each soothing art
To calm the passions in his swelling heart.

" Unconquer'd youth!" he cries, " thy worth is
And victory in every fold thy own : [known,
Secure from ill, thy godlike virtue goes
Through toils and dangers midst embattled foes :
But Heaven forbid that e'er thy friends should feel
The cruel fury of the vengeful steel !
What wouldst thou do ? Say, what thy rage demands ;

In civil war to stain thy glorious hands ?
Thus, with the slaughter of the Christian name,
Transfixing Christ, in whom a part I claim,
Shall worldly glory (impotent and vain,
That fluctuates like the billows of the main !)
Shall this with more respect thy bosom move
Than zeal for crowns, that never fade above ?

Avert it, Heaven ! be hence thy rage resign'd ;
Religion claims this conquest o'er thy mind.
If early youth, like mine, may plead the right
To bring examples past before thy sight ;
I once was injur'd, yet my wrath suppress'd,
Nor with the faithful would the cause contest.
My arms a conquest of Cilicia made,
And there the banner'd sign of Christ display'd ;
When Baldwin came, and seiz'd, with covert wiles,
My rightful prize, and triumph'd in my spoils :
His seeming friendship won my artless mind,
Nor saw I what his greedy thoughts design'd.
Yet not with arms I strove my right to gain,
Though haply arms had not been try'd in vain,
But should thy soul disdain a prisoner's name,
And fear th' ignoble breath of vulgar fame ;
Be mine the friendly care thy cause to plead :
To Antioch thou, and straight to Borsmond speed :
Thou must not now before the chief appear,
And the first impulse of his anger bear.
But should th' Egyptian arms our force oppose,
Or other squadrons of the Pagan foes,
Then will thy valour shine with double fame,
And absence add new lustre to thy name :
Th' united camp shall mourn thy virtues lost,
A mangled body and a lifeless host !"

Hers Guelpho came, and, joining his request,
With speed to leave the camp Rinaldo press'd.
And now the noble youth his ear inclin'd,
And to their purpose bent his lofty mind.
A crowd of friends around the hero wait ;
All seek alike to attend and share his fate :
Their zeal he thanks ; and now his steed he takes,
And, with two faithful squires, the camp forsakes.
A thirst of virtuous fame his soul inspires,
That fills the noble heart with great desires :
He mighty actions in his mind resolves,
And deeds, unheard before, in thought resolves :
To assail the foe, and death or laurels gain ;
While still his arms the Christian faith maintain ;
Egypt to o'er-run ; and bend his daring course
To where the Nile forsakes his hidden source.

Rinaldo parting thence, without delay
To Godfrey's presence Guelpho took his way ;
Him drawing near the pious chief esp'd :
" Thou com'st in happy time," aloud he cried ;
" Even now the heralds through the camp I sent,
To seek, and bring thee, Guelpho, to our tent."

Then having first dismiss'd th' attending train,
He thus, with low and awful words, began :
" Too far, O Guelpho, does thy nephew stray,
As passion o'er his heart obscures the way :
And ill, I deem, his reason can suffice
To clear the stain that on his honour lies :

Yet happy shall I prove if this befall,
For Godfrey is an equal judge to all :
The right he will defend, and guard the laws,
And with impartial voice award the cause.
But if, as some allege, Rinaldo's hand,
Unwilling; err'd against our high command ;
Then let the fiery youth, submissive, bend
To our decision, and the dead defend :

* History relates, that Tancred, with his forces made a conquest of Cilicia, to which Baldwin claimed a right ; and that Tancred having likewise fixed his standard at Tarsus, Baldwin claimed the victory in the same manner ; in both which instances Tancred submitted.

Free let him come; no chains he shall receive;
(Lo! what I can I to his merits give)
But if his lofty spirit scorn to bow,
(As well his high unconquer'd pride we know)
The care be thine to teach him to obey,
Nor dare provoke too far our lenient sway;
And force our hand, with rigour, to maintain
Our slighted laws and violated reign."

Thus said the chief; and Guelpho made reply:
"A generous soul, disdain'g infamy,
Can ne'er endure, without a brave return,
The lies of envy, and the taunts of scorn:
And should th' offender in his wrath be slain,
What man can just revenge its bounds restrain?
What mind so govern'd, while resentment glows,
To measure what th' offence to justice owes?
'T is thy command the youth shall humbly come,
And yield himself beneath thy sovereign doom;
But this (with grief I speak) his flight denies:
A willing exile from the camp he flies.
Yet with this sword I offer to maintain,
'Gainst him who dares my nephew's honour stain,
That justly punish'd fierce Gernando died,
A victim due to calumny and pride.
In this alone (with sorrow I agree)
He rashly err'd, to break thy last decree."

Thus he; when Godfrey—"Let him wander far,
And strife and rage to other regions bear;
But vex not thou with new debates the peace;
Here end contention, here let anger cease."

Meantime Armida, midst the warrior-train,
Us'd all her power th' expected aid to gain:
In tears and moving prayers the day employ'd,
And every charm of wit and beauty try'd.
But when the night had spread her sable vest,
And clos'd the sinking day-light in the west,
Betwixt two knights and dames, from public view,
The damsel to her lofty tent withdrew.

Though well the fair was vers'd in every art
By words and looks to steal th' unguarded heart;
Though in her form celestial beauty shin'd,
And left the fairest of her sex behind; [pell'd,
Though in her strong, yet pleasing, charms con-
The greatest heroes of the camp she held;
In vain she strove, with soft bewitching care,
To lure the pious Godfrey to her snare:

In vain she sought his zealous breast to move
With early pleasures, and delights of love:
For, satiated with the world, his thoughts despise
These empty joys, and soar above the skies.
His steadfast soul, defended from her charms,
Contemns Love's weaknesses, and all his feeble arms.
No mortal bait can turn his steps aside,
His sacred faith his guard, and God his guide.
A thousand forms the false Armida tries,
And proves, like Proteus, every new disguise.
Her looks and actions every heart might move,
And warm the coldest bosom to her love:
But here, so Heaven and grace divine ordain,
Her schemes, her labours, and her wiles were vain.

Not less impervious to her fraudulent art,
The gallant Tancred kept his youthful heart:
His earlier passion every thought possess'd,
Nor gave another entrance to his breast.
As poison off the force of poison quells,
So former love the second love repels.
Her charms these two alone behold secure;
While others own'd resistless beauty's power.
Sore was she troubled in her gulfed mind,
That all succeeded not her wiles design'd:

Yet, 'midst her grief, the dame, exulting, view'd
The numerous warriors whom her smiles subdu'd:
Now, with her prey, she purpos'd to depart,
Ere chance disclos'd her deep-designing art;
Far from the camp her captives to detain,
In other bonds than love's too gentle chain.

'T was now the time appointed by the chief
To give th' afflicted damsel his relief:
Him she approach'd, and thus with lowly grace:
"The day prefix'd, O prince! has run its race;
And should the tyrant learn (by doubtful fame,
Or certain spies) that to the camp I came
To implore thy succour, his preventive care
Would all his forces for defence prepare.
But ere such tidings shall his ears attain,
O let my prayer some friendly succour gain!
If Heaven behold not with regardless eyes
The deeds of men, or hear the orphan's cries,
My realms I shall retrieve, whose subject-sway
To thee, in peace or war, shall tribute pay."

She said; the leader to her suit agreed;
(Nor could be from his former grant recede)
Yet since her swift departure thence she press'd,
He saw th' election on himself would rest:
While all, with emulative zeal, demand
To fill the number of th' elected band.

Th' insidious damsel fans the rivals' fires,
And envious fear and jealous doubt inspires,
To rouse the soul; for love, full well she knows,
Without these aids renies and languid grows:
So runs the courser with a slacken'd pace,
When none contend, his partners in the race.
Now this, now that, the soothing fair beguiles
With gentle speech, soft looks, and winning smiles;
That each his follow views with envious eyes,
Till mingled passions e'en to phrensy rise:
Around their chief they press, unaw'd by shame,
And Godfrey would in vain their rage reclaim.

The leader gladly, in his equal mind,
Would all content, alike to all inclin'd;
(Yet oft was fill'd with just disdain, to view
Th' ungovern'd rashness of the headlong crew)
At length his better thoughts the means supply'd,
To stay contention, and the strife decide.

"To chance," he cry'd, "your several names
Command;

Let lots decide it, and the contest end."

Sudden the rival knights their names dispos'd,
And in a slender urn the lots enclos'd:
The vase then shaken; first to view, the name
Of Pembroke's earl, Artemidorus, came;
Then Gerrard; Vincilais next was found,
An aged chief for counsel once renown'd,
A hoary lover now, in beauty's fetters bound!

These, happy thrice with sudden joy were fill'd;
The rest, by signs, their anxious fears reveal'd,
And hung upon his lips, with fix'd regard,
Who, drawing forth the lots, the names declar'd.
The fourth was Gusaco; then Ridolphus' name;
And next Ridolphus, Olderico came.
Rousillon then was read; and next appear'd
Henry the Frank; Bavarian Eberard;
Rambaldo last, who lost the Christian laws
And girt his weapon in the Pagan cause:
So far the tyrant Love his vassal drew!†

† The history makes mention of a soldier who abjured Christianity and went over to the infidels, but his name was Rainald, not Rambaldo; he was a native of Holland.

But those, excluded from the list, exclaim
On fickle Fortune as a partial dame;
Love they accuse, who suffered her to guide
His sacred empire, and his laws decide;
Yet many purpos'd to pursue the maid,
When parting light should yield to sable shade;
In fortune's spite, her person to attend.
And, with their lives, from every chance defend.
With gentle sighs and speeches half disclos'd,
Their willing minds to this she more dispos'd:
To every knight alike she fram'd her art,
And seem'd to leave him with dejected heart.

Now, clad in shining arms, th' slotted band
Dismission from their prudent chief demand.
The hero then admonish'd each aside,
How ill they could in Pagan faith confide;
So frail a pledge enjoin'd 'em to beware,
And guard their souls from every hidden snare.
But all his words were lost in empty wind;
Love takes not counsel from a wholesome mind.

The knights dismiss'd, the dame no longer stay'd,
Nor till th' ensuing morn her course delay'd.
Elate with conquest, from the camp she pass'd,
The rival knights, like slaves, her triumph grac'd,
While rack'd with jealousy's tormenting pain,
She left the remnant of the sutor-train.
But soon as night with silent wings arose,
The minister of dreams and soft repose,
In secret many more her steps pursue:
But first Eustatius from the tents withdrew:
Scarcely rose the friendly shade, when swift he fled,
Through darkness blind, by blind affection led.
He roves uncertain all the dewy night,
But soon as morning streaks the skies with light,
Armida's camp salutes his eager sight.

Fix'd at the view, th' impatient lover flies †
Him, by his arms, Rambaldo knows, and cries—
"What seek'st thou here, or whither dost thou bend?"

"I come," he said, "Armida to defend:
In me, no less than others, shall she find
A ready succour and a constant mind." [approve,
"Who dares," the knight replies, "that choice
And make such honour thine?" He answer'd—
"Love.

From Fortune thou, from Love my right I claim:
Say, whose the greatest boast and noblest name?"
Rambaldo then—"Thy empty titles fail,
Such fond delusive arts shall ne'er prevail.
Think not to join with us thy lawless aid,
With us the champions of the royal maid."
"Who shall oppose my will?" the youth reply'd,
"In me behold the man!" Rambaldo cried,
Swift at the word he rush'd; with equal rage
Eustatius sprung his rival to engage.
But here the lovely tyrant of their breast
Advanc'd between them, and their rage suppress'd.
"Ah! cease," to that she cried, "no more complain,

That thou a partner, I a champion gain:
Canst thou my welfare or my safety prize,
Yet thus deprive me of my new allies?—
In happy time," to this began the dame,
"Thou com'st, defender of my life and fame:
Reason forbids, that e'er it shall be said,
Armida scor'd so fair an offer'd aid."

Thus she; while some new champion every hour
Purs'd her standard, and increas'd her power.

Some wandering here, some there, the damed
join'd,
Though each concealing what his thoughts design'd,
Now scor'd⁷ with jealous looks his rivals there to find.

She seem'd on all to cast a gracious eye,
And every one receiv'd with equal joy.
Scarcely had the day dispell'd the shades of night,
When heedful Godfrey knew his warriors' sight;
And while his mind revolv'd their shameful doom,
He seem'd to mourn some threaten'd ills to come.
As thus he mus'd, a messenger appear'd,
Breathless and pale, with dust and sweat besnear'd.
His brow was deep impress'd with careful thought,
And seem'd to speak th' unwelcome news he brought.

Then thus—"O chief! th' Egyptians soon will Beneath their numerous feet the briny tide: [hide
William, whose rule Liguria's ships obey,
By me dispatch'd these tidings from the sea.
To this he adds; that, sending from the shore
The doe provisions for the landed power,
The steeds and camels, bending with their load,
Were intercepted in the midmost road;
Assail'd with dreadful rage on every hand,
Deep in a valley, by th' Arabian band:
Nor guards nor drivers could their posts maintain,
The stores were pillag'd, and the men were slain.
To such a height was grown the Arabs' force,
As ask'd some power to check their daring course;
To guard the coast, and keep the passage free,
Betwixt the Christian camp and Syrian sea."

At once from man to man the rumour fled,
And growing fears among the soldiers spread:
The threatening evils fill'd them with affright,
And ghastly famine rose before their sight.
The chief, who saw the terrors of the host,
Their former courage sunk, their armsness lost,
With looks serene and cheerful speeches strove
To raise their ardour and their fears remove.

"O friends! with me in various regions thro'wa,
Amidst a thousand woes and dangers known;
God's sacred champions! born to assert his cause,
And cleanse from stain the holy Christian law!
Who wintry climes and stormy seas have view'd,
And Persian arms and Grecian frauds subdu'd;
Who could the rage of thirst and hunger bear—
Will you resign your souls to abject fear?
Shall not th' Eternal Power (our sovereign guide,
And oft in more disastrous fortunes try'd)
Revive our hopes?—Deem not his favour lost,
Or pitying car averted from our host:
A day will come with pleasure to disclose
These sorrows past, and pay to God your vows.
Endure and conquer then your present state;
Live, and reserve yourselves for happier fate."

He said; but yet a thousand cares, suppress'd,
The hero bury'd in his thoughtful breast:
What means to nourish such a numerous train,
And midst defeat or famine to sustain:
How on the seas to oppose th' Egyptian force,
And stop the plundering Arabs in their course.

⁷ Alexas, emperor of Constantinople, though in the first book he appears to have sent a squadron of horse to the Christians, is said to have used many stratagems to frustrate the expedition; and had once made Hugo the Great prisoner, who was afterwards delivered by Godfrey.

BOOK VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Argantes sends a challenge to the Christians. Tancréd is chosen to oppose him; but while he is upon the point of entering the list, he is detained by the appearance of Clorinda. Otho, in the mean time, means Argantes, is vanquished, and made prisoner. Tancréd and Argantes then engage: they are parted by the heralds. Erminia, distressed with her fears for Tancréd, resolves to visit that hero. She disguises herself in Clorinda's armour, and leaves the city by night; but falling in with an advanced guard of the Christians, is assaulted, and flies.

But, in the town besieg'd, the Pagan crew,
With better thoughts their cheerful hopes renew:
Besides provisions which their roofs contain'd,
Supplies of various kind by night they gain'd:
They raise new fences for the northern side,
And warlike engines for the walls provide.
With strength increas'd the lofty bulwarks show,
And seem to scorn the battering-rams below.
Now here, now there, the king directs his powers,
The walls to thicken, or to raise the towers;
By day, or, sable eve, the works they ply,
Or when the Moon enlightens all the sky.
Th' artificers, with sweat and ceaseless care,
New arms and armour for the field prepare:
Meanwhile, impatient of inglorious rest,
Argantes came, and thus the king address'd:
"How long, inactive, must we here remain,
Coop'd in these gates, a base and heartless train?
From aqvils huge I hear the strokes rebound,
I hear the helm, the shield, the cuirass sound:
Say, to what use, while you rapacious bands
O'er-run the plains, and ravage all the lands?
And not a chief shall meet these haughty foes,
And not a trumpet break their soft repose?
In genial feasts the cheerful days they waste,
And undisturb'd enjoy each calm retreat:
By day at ease, by night at rest they lie;
Alas! securely all their moments fly.
But you at length, with pining want distress'd,
Must sink beneath the victor's force oppress'd;
Or barely fall to death an easy prey.
If Egypt should her succours long delay,
For me, no shameful fate shall end my days,
And with oblivion veil my former praise;
Nor shall the morning Sun, to sight expos'd,
Behold me longer in these walls enclos'd.
I stand prepar'd my lot unknown to prove,
Decreed already by the Fates above.
Ne'er be it said, the trusty sword untry'd,
Inglorious, undreveng'd, Argantes dy'd.
Yet if the seeds of valour, once posset,
Are not extinguish'd in thy generous breast;
Not only hope in fight to fall with praise,
But your high thoughts to life and conquest raise.
Then rush we forth united from the gate,
Attack the foe, and prove our utmost fate!
Beset with dangers, and with toils oppress,
The boldest counsels oft are prov'd the best.
But if thy prudence now refuse to yield,
To hazard all thy force in open field;
At least procure two champions to decide
Th' important strife, in single combat try'd:

And that the leader of the Christian race
With readier mind our challenge may embrace,
Th' advantage all be his the arms to name,
And at his will the full conditions frame.
For were the foe enclos'd with two fold might,
With heart undaunted in the day of fight,
Think no misfortune can thy cross attend,
Which I have sworn in combat to defend.
This better hand can fate itself supply;
This hand can give thee ample victory:
Behold I give it as a pledge secure;
In this confide, I bear thy reign secure."

He said: "Intrepid chief!" the king reply'd,
"Though o'erpeering age has damp'd my youthful pride,

Deem not this hand so slow the sword to wield,
Nor deem this soul so basely fears the field,
That rather would I tamely yield my breath,
Than fall cumber'd by a glorious death;
If aught I fear'd, if aught my thoughts foretold
Of want or famine which thy words unfold;
Forbid it, Heaven!—Then hear me now reveal
What from the east, with caution, I conceal.
Lo! Solyman of Nice, whose restless mind
Has vengeance for his former wrongs design'd,
Collects, beneath his care, from different lands
The scatter'd numbers of Arabia's bands;
With these will soon by night the foe invade,
And hopes to give the town supplies and aid.
Then grieve not thou to see our realms o'er-run,
Nor heed our plann'd towns, and castles won,
While here the sceptre still remains my own,
While here I hold my state and regal throne.
But, then, meantime, thy forward zeal assuage,
And calm awhile the heat of youthful breast:
With patience yet attend the hour of fate
Due to thy glory, and my injur'd state."

Now swell'd with high disdain Argantes breast
A rival long to Solyman profess'd;
Inly he griev'd, and saw with jealous eye
The king so firmly on his aid rely.

"'Tis thine," he cried, "O monarch! to declare
(This is th' undoubted power) or peace or war:
I urge no more—here Solyman attend,
Let him, who lost his own, thy realm defend!
Let him, a welcome messenger from Heaven,
To free the Pagans from their fears be given:
I safety from myself alone require;
And freedom only from this arm desire.
Now, while these walls the rest in sloth detain,
Let me descend to combat on the plain:
Give me to dare the Franks to single fight,
Not as thy champion, but a private knight."

The king reply'd: "Though future times detest my mind

Thy nobler courage and more needful hand,
Yet to thy wish I shall not this deny:
Then, at thy will, some hostile chief defy."

Thus he. Th' impatient youth no longer stay'd,
But, turning to the herald, thus he said:
"Haste to the leader of the Franks, and them
Before th' united host, this message bear:
Say, that a champion, whose superior mind
Scorns in these narrow walls to be confin'd,
Desires to prove, in either army's fight,
With spear and shield his utmost force in fight.
And comes prepar'd his challenge to maintain,
Betwixt the tents and city, on the plain;
A gallant proof of arms! and now defines
The boldest Frank that on his strength relies,

Nor one alone amid the hostile band ;
The boldest five that dare his force withstand,
Of noble lineage, or of vulgar race,
Unterrified he stands in field to face :
The vanquish'd to the victor's power shall yield,
So wills the law of arms and custom of the field."

Argantes thus. The herald straight withdrew,
His vary'd surcoat o'er his shoulders threw,
And thence to Godfrey's regal presence went,
By mighty chiefs surrounded in his tent.
"O prince!" he cried, "May here a herald dare,

Without offence, his embassy declare"
To him the chief: "Without constraint or fear,
In freedom speak, what we as freely hear."
The herald then the challenge fierce disclos'd,
In boastful words and haughty terms compos'd.
Fir'd at his speech, the martial bands appear'd,
And with disdain the stern defiance heard.
Then thus in answer pious Godfrey speaks :
"A mighty task your warrior undertakes ;
And well I trust, what'er his boasted might,
One champion may suffice his arms in fight.
But let him come; I to his will agree;
I give him open field, and conduct free;
And swear some warrior, from our Christian hand,
On equal terms, shall meet him hand to hand."

He ceas'd; the king-at-arms, without delay,
Impatient, measur'd back his former way;
From thence, with hasty steps, the city sought,
And to the Pagan knight their answer brought.
"Arm! valiant chief!" he cried, "for fight prepare,

The Christian powers accept thy proffer'd war :
Not only leaders fam'd demand the fight,
The meanest warriors burn to prove their might.
I saw a thousand threatening looks appear,
A thousand bands prepar'd the sword to rear :
The chief to thee a list secure will yield."
He ended: when, impatient for the field,
Argantes call'd for arms with furious haste,
And round his limbs the steely burthen cast.

The wary king Clorinda then enjoin'd :
"While he departs, remain not thou behind ;
But, with a thousand arm'd, attend the knight ;
Yet foremost let him march to equal fight ;
The care be thine to keep thy troops in sight."

The monarch spoke; and now the martial train
Forsook the walls and issu'd to the plain.

Advanc'd before the band, Argantes press'd
His foaming steed, in radiant armour dress'd.

Between the city and the camp was found
An ample space of level champaign ground,
That seem'd a list selected, by design,
For valiant chiefs in deeds of arms to join.
To this the bold Argantes singly goes,
And there, descending, stands before the foes ;
Proud in his might, with giant-strength indu'd,
With threatening looks the distant camp he view'd :
So fierce Enceladus in Phlegra show'd ;
So in the vale the huge Philistine stood.
Yet many, void of fear, the knight beheld,
Nor knew how far his force in arms excell'd.

Still Godfrey doubted, midst his valiant host,
What knight should quell the Pagan's haughty boast.

To Tancred's arm (the bravest of the brave)
The great attempt the public favour gave.
With looks, with whispers, all declar'd their choice;
The chief, by signs, approv'd the general voice.

Each warrior now his rival claim withdrew,
When each the will of mighty Godfrey knew.
"The field is thine!" to Tancred then he cried ;
"Go, meet yon Pagan, and chastise his pride!"
The glorious charge with joy the champion heard,
A dauntless ardour in his looks appear'd :
His shield and helmet from his squire he took,
And follow'd by a crowd, the vale forsook.
But ere he reach'd th' appointed list of fight,
The martial dæmol¹ met his eager sight :
A flowing vest was o'er her armour spread.
White as the snows that veil the mountain's head :
Her beaver rear'd, her lovely face disclos'd ;
And on a hill she stood at full expos'd.

No longer Tancred now the foe espies,
(Who rears his haughty visage to the skies)
But slowly moves his steed, and bends his sight
Where stands the virgin on a neighbouring height:
The lover to a lifeless statue turns ;
With cold he freezes, and with heat he burns :
Fixt in a stupid gaze, unmov'd he stands,
And now no more the promis'd fight demands.

Meantime Argantes looks around in vain,
No chief appears the combat to maintain.
"Behold I come," he cried, "to prove my might ;
Who dares approach, and meet my arms in fight ?"
While Tancred lost in deepest thought appear'd,

Nor saw the Pagan, nor his challenge heard,
Impetuous Otho spur'd his flaming horse,
And enter'd first the list with eager course.
This knight, before, by thirst of glory fir'd,
With other warriors to the fight aspir'd ;
But yielding then to Tancred's nobler claim,
Mix'd with the throng that to attend him came :
Yet when he thus th' enamour'd youth beheld
All motionless, neglectful of the field,
Eager he starts to attempt the glorious deed ;
Less swift the tiger's or the panther's speed !
Against the mighty Saracen he press'd,
Who sudden plac'd his ponderous spear in rest.

But Tancred now, recovering from his trance,
Saw fearless Otho to the fight advance :
"Forbear! the field is mine!" aloud he cries—
In vain he calls, the knight regardless flies.
Th' indignant prince beheld, with rage and shame ;
He blush'd another should defraud his name,
And reap th' expected harvest of his fame.

And now Argantes, from his valiant foe,
Full on his helm receiv'd the mighty blow.
With greater force the Pagan's javelin struck ;
The pointed steel through shield and corselet broke :
Prone fell the Christian thundering on the sand ;
Unmov'd the Saracen his seat maintain'd ;
And from on high, inflam'd with lofty pride,
Thus to the prostrate knight insulting cried :
"Yield to my arms! suffice the glory thine
To dare with me in equal combat join."

"Not so," cried Otho, "are we fram'd to yield,
Nor is so soon the Christian courage quell'd :
Let others with excuses hide my shame,
'Tis mine to perish, or avenge my fame!"

Then like Alecto, terrible to view,
Or like Medusa, the Circassian grew,
While from his eyes the flashing lightning flew.
"Now prove our utmost force," enrag'd he cries,
"Since thus thou dar'st our offer'd grace despise."
This said; he spur'd his steed, nor heeded more
Th' establish'd laws of arms and knightly lore.

¹ Clorinda.

The Frank, retiring, disappoints the foe,
 And, as Argantes pass'd, directs a blow,
 That, to the right descending, pierc'd his side;
 The smoking steel returns with crimson dyed:
 But what avails it, when the wound inspires
 New force and fury to the Pagan's fires?
 Argantes, wheeling round with sudden speed,
 Direct on Otho urg'd his fiery steed:
 Th' unguarded foe the dreadful shock receiv'd;
 All pale he fell, at once of sense bereav'd:
 Stretch'd on the earth his quivering limbs were spread,

And clouds of darkness hover'd o'er his head.
 With brutal wrath the haughty victor glow'd,
 And o'er the prostrate knight in triumph rode.
 "Thou every insolent shall fall," he cries,
 "As he who now beneath my courser lies!"
 But Tancred, who with noble wrath survey'd
 Th' unrightly cruel act, no longer stay'd;
 Resolv'd to veil the vanquish'd warrior's shame,
 And with his arms retrieve the Christian name:
 He flew, and cried—"O thou of impious kind!
 In conquest base, and infamous of mind!
 From deeds like these what glory canst thou gain?
 What praises from the courteous heart obtain?
 Thy manners sure were fram'd in barbarous lands,
 Among th' Arabian thieves, or savage hands!
 Hence! shun the light; to woods and wilds con-
 fin'd,

Among thy brethren of the brutal kind!"
 He ceas'd, impatience swell'd the Pagan's breast,
 But eager rage his struggling words suppress'd;
 He foam'd like beasts that haunt the gloomy wood:
 At length, releas'd, his anger roar'd aloud,
 Like thunder bursting from a distant cloud.

Now for the field th' impetuous chiefs prepare,
 And wheel around their couriers for the war.
 O sacred Muse! inflame my voice with fire,
 And ardour equal to the fight inspire:
 So may my verse be worthy of th' alarms,
 And catch new vigour from the din of arms!

The warriors place their beamy spears in rest;
 Each points his weapon at the adverse crest.
 Less swiftly to the goal a racer flies;
 Less swift a bird on pinions cleaves the skies.
 No chiefs for fury could with these compare;
 Here Tancred pour'd along, Argantes there!
 The spears against the helms in shivers broke;
 A thousand sparks flew diverse from the stroke.
 The mighty conflict shook the solid ground,
 The distant hills re-echo'd to the sound:
 But firmly seated, moveless as a rock,
 Each hardy champion bore the dreadful shock;
 While either courser tumbled on the plain,
 Nor from the field with speed arose again.
 The warriors then unsheath'd their falchions bright,
 And left their steeds, on foot to wage the fight.
 Now every pass with wary hands they prove;
 With watchful eyes and nimble feet they move.
 In every form their pliant limbs they show;
 Now wheel, now press, now seem to stun the foe:
 Now here, now there, the glancing steel they bend,
 And where they threaten least, the strokes descend.

Sometimes they offer some defenceless part,
 Attempting thus to baffle art with art.
 Tancred, unguarded by his sword or shield,
 His naked side before the Pagan held:
 To seize th' advantage swift Argantes clos'd,
 And left himself to Tancred's sword expos'd:

The Christian dash'd the hostile steel aside,
 And deep in Pagan gore his weapon dyed;
 Then sudden on his guard collected stood.
 The foe, who found his limbs bedew'd with blood,
 Grow'd with unvoiced rage, and rais'd on high
 His weighty falchion, with a dreadful cry:
 But, ere he strikes, another wound alights
 Where to the shoulder-bone the arm unites.
 As the wild boar that haunts the woods and hills,
 When in his side the biting spear he feels,
 To fury roar'd, against the bun or flies,
 And every peril scorns, and death defies;
 So fares the Saracen, with wrath unflin-Wound follows wound, and shame succeeds to shame;

While, burning for revenge, without regard
 He scorns his danger, and forgets to ward:
 He raves, he rushes headlong on the foe,
 With all his strength impelling every blow.
 Scarce has the Christian time his sword to wield,
 Or breathe awhile, or lift his fencing shield;
 And all his art can scarce the knight secure
 From the dire thunder of Argantes' power.

Tancred, who waits to see the tempest cease,
 And the first fury of his foe decrease,
 Now wards the blows, now circles o'er the plain;
 But when he sees the Pagan's force remain
 Untir'd with toil, he gives his wrath the rein:
 He whirls his falchion; art and judgment yield,
 And now to rage alone resign the field.
 No strokes escap'd from either champion, fail;
 The weapons pierce or sever plate and mail.
 With arms and blood the earth is cover'd o'er,
 And streaming sweat is mixt with purple gore:
 The swords, like lightning, dart quick flashes
 round,

And fall, like thunderbolts, with horrid sound.
 On either hand the gazing people wait,
 And watch the dreadful fight's uncertain fate:
 No motion in th' attentive host appear'd;
 No voice, no whisper, from the troops was heard:
 'Twixt hope and fear they stand, and nicely weigh
 The various turns and fortune of the day.

Thus stood the war: and now each weary knight
 Had undetermin'd left the chance of fight;
 When rising o'er her sable veil display'd,
 And wrapt each object in surrounding shade.
 From either side a herald bent his way,
 To part the warriors and suspend the fray.
 The one a Frank, Aridens was his name;
 Pindorus one, rever'd for wisdom's fame,
 Who with the challenge to the Christians came.
 Intrepid these before the chiefs appear'd,
 And 'twixt the swords their peaceful sceptres
 rear'd;

Secur'd by all the privilege they find
 From ancient rights and customs of mankind.
 "Ye gallant warriors!" thus Pindorus cried,
 "Whose deeds of valour equal praise divide;
 Here cease, nor with untimely strife profane
 The sacred laws of night's all-peaceful reign.
 The Sun our labour claims; with toil oppress,
 Each creature gives the night to useful rest;
 And generous souls disdain the conquests made
 In sullen silence, and nocturnal shade."

To him Argantes: "With regret I yield
 To quit th' unfinished contest of the field;
 Yet would I choose the day our deeds might view:—

Then swear my foe the combat to renew."

To whom the Christian: "Thou thy promise plight

Here to return, and bring thy captive knight;
Else shall no cause induce me to delay
Our present conflict to a future day."
This said; they swore. The heralds then decreed
The day that should decide th' important deed;
And, time allow'd to heal each wounded knight,
Nam'd the sixth morning to renew the fight.

The dreadful combat long remain'd imprest
In every Saracen and Christian breast:
Each tongue the skill of either warrior tells;
Each thought, with wonder, on their valour dwells.
Yet who the prize should gain, on either side
The vulgar vary, and in parts divide:
If fury shall from virtue win the field,
Or brutal rage to manly courage yield.

But fair Erminia, mov'd above the rest,
With growing fears torments her tender breast;
She sees the dearest object of her care
Expos'd to hazards of uncertain war;
Of princely lineage came this hapless maid,
From him who Antioch's powerful sceptre sway'd:
But, when her state by chance of war was lost,
She fell a captive to the Christian host.

Then gallant Tancred gave her woes relief,
And, 'midst her country's ruin, calm'd her grief:
He gave her freedom, gave her all the store
Of regal treasure she possess'd before,
And claim'd no tribute of a victor's power.
The grateful fair the hero's worth confess'd;
Love found admittance in her gentle breast:
His early virtues rais'd her first desire;
His manly beauty fann'd the blameless fire.
In vain her outward liberty she gain'd,
When, lost in servitude, her soul remain'd:
She quits her conqueror with a heavy mind,
And with regret her prison leaves behind.
But honour chides her stay, (for spotless fame
Is ever dear to every virtuous dame.)

And with her aged mother thence constrain'd
Her banish'd steps to seek a friendly land;
Till at Jerusalem her course she stay'd,
Where Aladine receiv'd the wandering maid.
Here, soon again by adverse fortune cross'd,
With tears the virgin mourn'd a mother lost.
Yet not the sorrow for her parent's fate,
Nor all the troubles of her exile's state,
Could from her heart her amorous pains remove,
Or quench the smallest spark of mighty love:
She loves, and burns!—Alas, unhappy maid!
No soothing hopes afford her sufferings aid:
She bears within the flames of fond desire;
Vain fruitless wishes all her thoughts inspire;
And, while she strives to hide, she feeds the stifled
Now Tancred near the walls of Sion drew,
And, by his presence, rais'd her hopes anew.
The rest with terror see the numerous train
Of foes unconquer'd on the dusty plain;
She clears her brow, her dewy sorrow dries,
And views the warlike bands with cheerful eyes:
From rank to rank her looks incessant rove,
And oft she seeks in vain her warrior-love:
And oft, distinguish'd 'midst the field of fight,
She singles Tancred to her eager sight.

Join'd with the palace, to the ramparts nigh,
A stately castle rises in the sky,

Whose lofty head the prospect wide commands,
The plain, the mountain, and the Christian bands:
There, from the early beams of morning light,
Till deepening shades obscure the world in night,
She sits, and fixing on the camp her eyes,
She communes with her thoughts, and vents her
'Twas thence she view'd the fight with beating
breast,

And saw expos'd her soul's far dearer part;
Thence, fill'd with terror and distracting care,
She watch'd the various progress of the war;
And, when the Pagan rais'd aloft his steel,
She seem'd herself the threatening stroke to feel.

When now the virgin heard some future day
Was destin'd to decide th' unfinished fray,
Cold fear in all her veins congeal'd the blood,
Sighs heav'd her breast, her eyes with sorrow flow'd;
And o'er her face a pallid hue was spread,
While every sense was lost in anxious dread.
A thousand horrid thoughts her soul divin'd;
In sleep a thousand phantoms fill'd her mind:
Oft, in her dreams, the much-lov'd warrior lies
All gash'd and bleeding; oft, with feeble cries,
Invokes her aid; then, starting from her rest,
Tears bathe her cheeks, and trickle down her
breast.

Nor fears alone of future evils fill
Her careful heart, she fears the present ill.
The wounds her Tancred late receiv'd in fight
Distract her mind with anguish and affright.
Fallacious rumours, that around are blown,
Increase with added lies the truth unknown.

Taught by her mother's skill, the virgin knew
The secret power of every herb that grew;
She knew the force of every mystic strain,
To close the wound, and ease the throbbing pain;
(In such repute the healing arts were held,
In those the daughters of the kings excell'd.)
Fain would she now her cares to Tancred show;
But fate condemns her to relieve his foe.
Now was she tempted noxious plants to choose,
And poison in Argantes' wounds infuse;
But soon her pious thoughts the deed disclaim,
And scorn with treachery to pollute her fame.
Yet oft she wish'd that every herb applied
Might lose its wonted power and virtue tried.
She fear'd not (by such various troubles tost)
Alone to travel through the adverse host;
Accustom'd wars and slaughter to survey,
And all the perils of the wanderer's way:
Thus use to daring had inur'd her mind
Beyond the nature of the softer kind;
But mighty love, superior to the rest,
Had quell'd each female terror in her breast:
Thus arm'd, she durst the sands of Afric trace,
Amidst the fury of the savage race.
Though danger still and death her soul despin'd,
Her virtue and her better fame she priz'd.

And now her heart conflicting passions rend;
There Love and Honour (powerful foes) contend.
Thus Honour seem'd to say: "O thou, whose mind
Has still been pure, within my laws confin'd;
Whom, when a captive 'midst yon hostile train,
I kept in thought and person clear from stain;
Wilt thou, now freed, the virgin boast forsake,
So well preserv'd when prisoner to the foe?
Ah! what can raise such fancies in thy breast?
Say what thy purpose, what thy hopes suggest,
Alone to wander 'midst a foreign race,
And with nocturnal love thy sex disgrace?"

Justly the victor shall reproach thy name,
And deem thee lost to virtue, as to shame;
With scorn shall bid thee from his sight remove,
And bear to vulgar souls thy proffer'd love."

But gentler counsels, on a different part,
Thus seem'd to whisper to her wavering heart:

"Thou wert not surely of a savage born,
Nor from a mountain's frozen entrails torn;
No adamant and steel compose thy frame;
Despise not then Love's pleasing dart and flame,
And blush not to confess a lover's name.

Go, and obey the dictates of thy mind— [kind]
But wherefore shouldst thou feign thy knight un-
Like thine his sighs may heave, his tears may flow;
And wilt not thou thy tender aid bestow?

Think, when thy pious care his health retrieves,
Life's welcome gift from thee the youth receives!
Thou shalt with him in every virtue share,
With him divide his future fame in war;
Then shall he clasp thee to his grateful breast,
And nuptial ties shall make thee ever blest:

Thou shalt be shown to all, and happy nam'd,
Among the Latian wives and matrons fam'd;
In that fair land where martial valour reigns,
And where religion pure her seat maintains."

With hopes like these allur'd, th' unthinking maid
A flattering scene of future bliss had laid:
But still a thousand doubts perplexing rise,
What means for her departure to devise.
The guards, incessant, near the palace stand,
And watch the portals, and the walls command;
Nor dare, amid the hazards of the war,
Without some weighty cause the gates unbar.

Full oft Erminia, to beguile her cares,
The time in converse with Clorinda shares:
With her each western Sun beheld the maid,
Each rising morn the friendly pair survey'd;
And when in gloomy shade the day was clos'd,
Both in one bed their weary limbs repos'd.

One secret only, treasure'd in her breast,
The food Erminia from her friend suppress'd;
With cautious fear her love she still conceal'd:
But when her plaints her inward pains reveal'd,
She to a different cause assign'd her weal,
And for her ruin'd state her sorrows seem'd to flow.

Through every chamber of the martial maid,
By friendship privileged, Erminia stray'd:
One day it chanc'd, intent on many a thought,
The royal fair her friend's apartment sought;
Clorinda absent, there her anxious mind
Revolv'd the means to effect her flight design'd,
While various doubts, by turns, the dame distress'd,
Aloft she mark'd Clorinda's arms and vest:

Then to herself, with heavy sighs, she said:
"How blest above her sex the warrior-maid!
How does her state, alas! my envy raise!
Yet not for female boast, or beauty's praise.
No length of sweeping vest her step restrains;
No envious cell her dauntless soul detains;
But, cloth'd in shining steel, at will she roves;
Nor fear withholds, nor conscious shame reproves.

Why did not Heaven with equal vigour frame
My softer limbs, and fire my heart to fame?
So might I turn the female robe and veil
To the bright helmet and the jointed mail:

My love would change of heat and cold despise,
And all the seasons of inclement skies,
In arms alone, or with my martial train,
By day or night to range on yonder plain.
Thy will, Argante, then thou hadst not gain'd,
And with my lord the combat first maintain'd:
This hand had met, and ah! that happy hour
Perchance had made him prisoner to my power:
So from his loving foe he should sustain
A gentle servitude and easy chain:
So might my soul awhile forget to grieve,
And Tancréd's bonds Erminia's bonds relieve.
Elate had his hand this panting bosom gor'd,
And through my heart impell'd the ruthless sword;
Thus had my dearest foe my peace restor'd!
Then had these eyes in lasting sleep been laid,
While the dear victor o'er the senseless dead,
Perchance, with pitying tears, had mourn'd my doom,

And given these limbs the honours of a tomb!—
But ah! I wander, lost in food desire,
And fruitless wishes fruitless thoughts inspire;—
Then shall I still reside with anguish here,
In abject state, the slave of female fear?
O no!—Confide, my soul, resolve and dare:
Can I not once the warrior's armour bear?
Yes—Love shall give the strength th' attempt requires;

Love, that the weakest with his force inspires;
That even to dare impels the timorous kind—
But 'tis no martial thought that fills my mind:
I seek, beneath Clorinda's arms conceal'd,
To pass the gates unquestion'd to the field.
O Love! the fraud thyself inspir'd, attend!
And Fortune with propitious smiles befriend!
'Tis now the hour for flight—(what then detains?)
While with the king Clorinda still remains."

Thus fix'd in her resolves, th' impatient maid,
By amorous passion led, no longer stay'd;
But to her near apartment thence repairs,
And with her all the shining armour bears.
No prying eyes were there her deeds to view;
For when she came the menial train withdrew;
While night, that theft and love alike befriends,
To assist the deed her sable veil extends.

Soon as the virgin saw the stars arise,
That faintly glimmer'd through the dusky skies,
She call'd, in secret, her design to aid,
A squire of faith approv'd, and favour'd maid:
To these in part her purpose she reveal'd,
But, with feign'd tales, the cause of flight conceal'd.

The trusty squire prepar'd, with ready care,
Whate'er was needful for the wandering fair.
Meantime Erminia had her robes unbound,
That, to her feet descending, swept the ground.
Now, in her vest, the lovely damsel shin'd
With charms superior to the female kind.
In stubborn steel her tender limbs she dress'd,
The massy helm her golden ringlets press'd:
Next in her feeble hand she grasp'd the shield,
A weight too mighty for her strength to wield.
Thus, clad in arms, she darts a radiant light
With all the dire magnificence of sight!
Love, present, laugh'd, as when he view'd of old
The female weeds Alcides' bulk ensold.

Heavy and slow, she moves along with pain;
 And scarce her feet th' unweighted load sustain.
 The faithful damsel by her side attends,
 And with assisting arm her step befriends.
 But Love her spirits and her hopes renews,
 And every trembling limb with strength induces:
 Till, having reach'd the squire, without delay
 They mount their ready steeds, and take their way.
 Disguis'd they pass'd amid the gloomy night,
 And sought the silent paths obscur'd from sight:
 Yet scatter'd soldiers here and there they spy'd,
 And saw the gleam of arms on every side.
 But none attempt the virgin to molest;
 All know her armour, e'en by night confest,
 The snow-white mantle and the dreadful crest.

Erminia, though her doubts were partly eas'd,
 Yet found not all her troubled thoughts appeas'd;
 She fear'd discovery, but her fears suppress'd,
 And reach'd the gates, and thus the guard address'd:
 "Set wide the portal, nor my steps detain.
 Commission'd by the king, I seek the plain."
 Her martial garb deceiv'd the soldiers' eyes;
 Her female accents favour'd the disguise.
 The guards obey'd; and, through the gate, in haste,

The princess, with her two attendants, pass'd;
 Thence from the city-walls, with caution, went
 Obliquely winding down the hill's descent.

Now safe at distance in a lonely place,
 Erminia check'd awhile her courser's pace.
 Escap'd the former perils of the night,
 No guards, no ramparts now to obstruct her flight;
 With thought mature she ran her purpose o'er,
 And weigh'd the dangers lightly weigh'd before.
 More arduous far she saw th' attempt would prove
 Than first appear'd to her desiring love:
 Too rash it seem'd, amidst a warlike foe,
 In search of peace, with hostile arms to go:
 For still she purpos'd to conceal her name,
 Till to the presence of her knight she came.
 To him she wish'd to stand reveal'd alone,
 A secret lover, and a friend unknown | (made,
 Then stopp'd the fair, and now, more heedful
 Thus to her squire, with better counsel, said:

"Tis thou, my friend! who must, with speed and care,

To yonder tents my destin'd way prepare.
 Go—let some guide direct thy doubtful eyes,
 And bring thee where the wounded Tancred lies.
 To him declare, there comes a friendly maid,
 Who peace demands, and brings him healing aid;
 Peace—for the war of love now fills my mind)
 Whence he may health, and I may comfort find.
 Say, that with him, secure from scorn or shame,
 A virgin to his faith commits her fame.
 In secret this—if more the knight require,
 Relate no further, but with speed retire.
 Here will I safely wait."—So spoke the maid;
 Her messenger at once the charge obey'd;
 He spur'd his courser, and the trenches gain'd,
 And friendly entrance from the guard obtain'd:
 Conducted then, the wounded chief he sought,
 Who heard with joy the pleasing message brought.
 The squire now leaves the knight to doubts re-
 sign'd,

(A thousand thoughts revolving in his mind)
 To bring the welcome tidings to the fair,
 That she, conceal'd, may to the camp repair.

Meanwhile the dame, impatient of his stay,
 Whose eager wishes fear the least delay,

Counts every step, and measures off in vain
 The fancied distance 'twixt the camp and plain:
 And oft her thoughts the messenger reprove,
 Too slow for the desires of ardent love!
 At length, advancing to a neighbouring height,
 The foremost tents salute her longing sight.

Now was the night in starry lustre seen,
 And not a cloud obscur'd the blue serene:
 The rising Moon her silver beams display'd,
 And deck'd with pearly dew the dusky glade.
 With anxious soul, th' enamour'd virgin strays
 From thought to thought, in love's perplexing maze;
 And vents her tender plaints, and breathes her sighs
 To all the silent fields and conscious skies.

Then, fudly gazing on the camp, she said:
 "Ye Latian tents, by me with joy survey'd!
 From you, methinks, the gales more gently blow,
 And seem already to relieve my woe!
 So may kind Heaven afford a milder state
 To this unhappy life, the sport of Fate!
 As 'tis from you I seek to assuage my care,
 And hope alone for peace in scenes of war!
 Receive me then!—and may my wishes find
 That bliss which love has promis'd to my mind;
 Which even my worst of fortune could afford,
 When made the captive of my dearest lord.
 I seek not now, inspir'd with fancies vain,
 By you my regal honours to regain:
 Ah no!—Be this my happiness and pride,
 Within your shelter humbly to reside!"

So spoke the hapless fair, who little knew
 How near her sudden change of fortune drew;
 For, pensive while she stood, the cloudless Moon
 Full on th' unheeded maid with splendour shone;
 Her snow-white vesture caught the silver beam;
 Her polish'd arms return'd a trembling gleam;
 And on her lofty crest, the tigers rais'd,
 With all the terrors of Clorinda blaz'd.

When lo! so will'd her fate, a numerous band
 Of Christian scouts were ambush'd near at hand,
 Dispatch'd to impede the passage, o'er the plain,
 Of sheep and oxen to the Pagan train.
 These Polypheros and Alexander guide,
 Two Luvian brethren, who the task divide.

Young Polypheros, who had seen his sire
 Beneath Clorinda's thundering arm expire,
 Soon as his eyes the dazzling vest survey'd,
 Confess'd the semblance of the martial maid;
 He fir'd his crew; and, heedless of control,
 Gave loose to all the fury of his soul;
 "Take this! and perish, by my weapon slain!"
 He said; and hurl'd his lance, but hurl'd in vain.

As when a hind, oppress'd with toil and heat,
 To some clear spring directs her weary feet;
 If, as she thinks to ease her fainting limbs
 In the cool shade, and drink the crystal streams,
 The fatal bounds arrive, she takes her flight,
 And all her thirst is lost in wild affright:

Thus she, who hop'd some kind relief to prove,
 And sought to allay the burning thirst of love,
 Soon as the warriors, clad in steel, appear,
 Forgets her former thoughts in sudden fear:
 She flies, nor dares th' approaching danger meet;
 The plain re-echoes with her courser's feet.
 With her th' attendants flies; the raging knight,
 First of the band, pursues the virgin's flight.

Now from the tents the faithful squire repairs,
 And to the dame his tardy tidings bears;
 Struck with like fear, he gives his steed the reins,
 And all are scatter'd diverse o'er the plain.

Alcander still, by cooler prudence sway'd,
Fix'd at his station, all the field survey'd :
A message to the camp he sent with speed,
That not the blowing east, nor waully breeze,
Nor prey like these was seen, but, suit with fear,
That serve (Corinthus fled his brother's spear.
Nre could he think that she, no private knight,
But one who bore the chief command in fight,
At such a time would issue from the gate,
Without some public weighty cause of state :
But Godfrey's wisdom must th' adventure weigh,
And what he bade Alcander should obey.

Soon to the camp the flying tidings came,
But first the Latian tents receiv'd the fame :
Tancred, whose soul the former message mov'd,
Now felt new terrors for the maid he lov'd.
"To me," he cried, "she came, with pious care,
Alas! for me this danger threatens fair!"
Then of his heavy arms a part he takes.
He mounts his courser, and the tent forakes
With silent haste; and, where the track he spies,
With furious course along the champaign flies.

BOOK VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Erminia, flying from the Christian guard, is received by a shepherd. Tancred, who pursued her, supposing her to be Clorinda, falls into Armida's snare, and is made prisoner in her castle. In the mean time Argantes, on the appointed day, enters the list to finish the combat with Tancred. Tancred being absent, none of the warriors have the courage to supply his place. Godfrey reproaches their pusillanimity, and resolves himself to meet Argantes. Raymond dissuades him. Many others then, filled with emulation, are desirous to engage. They cast lots; and the lot falls on Raymond. He enters the list, and, assisted by his guardian angel, has the advantage of Argantes; when Beelzebub incites Bradine to wound Raymond, and thus breaks off the combat. A general battle ensues. The Pagans are almost defeated; but the infernal powers raising a storm, the fortune of the day is changed. Godfrey, with his army, retires to his entrenchments.

MEANWHILE the courser with Erminia stray'd
Through the thick covert of a woodland shade :

¹ In my Notes to Ariosto, book i. I have pointed out that this flight of Erminia is closely copied from the flight of Angelica, and that both the Italian poets were afterwards followed by Spenser in his account of Florimel. The beginning of this book exhibits one of the most beautiful pastoral scenes in any language. Milton was not insensible to such poetry, and, in the following verses, may be thought to transfuse some ideas from the Italian:

Now more her way steps in th' eastern clime
Advancing, sow'd the earth with orient pearl:
When Adam wak'd: so custom'd, for his sleep,
Was airy light, from pure digestion bred,
And temperate vapours bland, which th' only sound

Her trembling hand the rein no longer guides,
And through her veins a chilling terror glides.
By winding paths her steed pursu'd his flight,
And bore at length the virgin far from sight.

As, after long and toilsome chase in vain,
The panting dogs unwilling quit the plain,
If chance the game their eager search elude,
Conceal'd in shelter of the favouring wood;
So to the camp the Christian knights return,
While rage and shame in every visage burn.
Still flies the damsel, to her fears resign'd,
Nor dares to cast a transient look behind.
All night she fled, and all th' ensuing day,
Her tears and sighs companions of her way:
But when bright Phœbus from his golden wain
Had loos'd his steeds, and sunk beneath the main,
To sacred Jordan's crystal flood she came;
There stay'd her course, and rested near his stream.
No nourishment her fainting strength renew'd,
Her woes and tears supplied the place of food.
But Sleep, who with oblivious hand can close
Unhappy mortals' eyes in soft repose,

To ease her grief, his gentle tribute brings,
And o'er the virgin spreads his downy wings:
Yet Love still breaks her peace with mournful themes,
And haunts her slumbers with distracting dreams.
She sleeps, till, joyful at the day's return,
The feather'd choirs salute the break of morn;
Till rising zephyrs whisper through the bowers,
Sport with the ruffled stream and painted flowers;
Then opens her languid eyes, and views around
The shepherds' cots amid the sylvan ground:
When, 'twixt the river and the wood, she hears
A sound, that calls again her sighs and tears.
But soon her plaints are stopp'd by vocal strains,
Mix'd with the rural pipes of village swains:
She rose, and saw, beneath the shady grove,
An aged sire that o'er baskets wove:
His flocks around him graz'd the meads along,
Three boys beside him tun'd their rustic song.

Scar'd at th' unusual gleam of armour bright,
The harmless band were seiz'd with sudden fright,
But fair Erminia soon dispels their fears;
From her bright face the shining helmet rears;
And undisguis'd her golden hair appears.
Pursue your gentle tasks with dread unmov'd,
O happy race!" she cried, "of Heaven belov'd!
Not to disturb your peace these arms I bear,
Or check your tuneful notes with sounds of war."
Then thus—"O father! midst these rude alarms,
When all the country burns with horrid arms,
What power can here your blissful seats ensure,
And keep you from the soldiers' rage secure?"

To whom the swain: "No dangers here, my son,
As yet my kindred or my flock have known:
And these abodes, remov'd to distance far,
Have ne'er been startled with the din of war.
Or whether Heaven, with more peculiar grace,
Defends the shepherds' inoffensive race:

Of leaves and fuming rills, Aurora's fan,
Lightly dispers'd, and the shrill matin song
Of birds on every bough—

Parad. Lost, book v. ver. 1.

Non si desto fin che garrir gli auzelli
Non senti lieti e salutar gli albori.
E mormorar il fume, e gli arboscelli,
E cond l'oxida scherzar l'aura e co i fiori;
Apri i languidi occhi—

Stanza v. ver. 29 of the translation.

Or, as the thunder scorns the vale below,
 And spends its fury on the mountain's brow;
 So falls alone the rage of foreign swords
 On sceptred princes and on mighty lords.
 No greedy soldiers here for plunder wait,
 Lur'd by our poverty and abject state:
 To others abject; but to me so dear,
 Nor regal power, nor wealth is worth my care.
 No vain ambitious thoughts my soul molest,
 No avarice harbours in my quiet breast.
 From limpid streams my draught is well supplied;
 I fear no poison in the wholesome tide.
 My little garden and my flock afford
 Salubrious viands for my homely board.
 How little, justly weigh'd, our life requires!
 For simple nature owns but few desires.
 Lo! there my sons (no menial slaves I keep)
 The faithful guardians of their father's sheep.
 Thus in the groves I pass my hours away,
 And see the goats and stags around me play;
 The fishes through the crystal waters glide,
 And birds with wings the yielding air divide.
 There was a time (when early youth inspires
 The mind of erring man with vain desires)
 I scorn'd in lowly vales my flock to feed,
 And from my native soil and country fled.
 At Memphis once I liv'd; and, highly grac'd,
 Among the monarch's household train was plac'd:
 And, though the gardens claim'd my cares alone,
 To me the wicked arts of courts were known.
 There long I stay'd, and irksome life endur'd,
 Still by ambition's empty hopes allur'd:
 But when, with flowery prime, those hopes were Red,

And restless passions with my youth were dead;
 Once more I wish'd to live a humble swain,
 And sigh'd for my forsaken peace again;
 Then bade adieu to courts; and, free from strife,
 Have since in woods enjoy'd a blissful life."

While thus he spoke, Brunnia silent hung
 In fixt attention on his pleasing tongue:
 His sage discourses, on her heart impress,
 Assault'd the tempest of her troubled breast -
 Till, after various thoughts, the princely maid
 Resolv'd to dwell beneath the lonely shade;
 At least, so long sequester'd to reside,
 Till fortune should for her return provide.

Then to the hoary swain her speech she mov'd:
 "O happy man! in fortune's frowns approv'd;
 If Heaven unenvying view thy peaceful state,
 Let pity touch thee for my hapless fate:
 Ah! deign to take me to your pleasing seat;
 To me how grateful were this kind retreat!
 Perhaps these lonely groves may ease in part
 The mournful burthen of my swelling heart.
 If gold or jewels can allure thy mind,
 (Those idols so ador'd by human kind!)
 From me thy soul may all its wishes find."

Then, while her lovely eyes with sorrows flow,
 She half reveals the story of her woe:
 The gentle swain her tale with pity hears,
 Sighs back her grief, and answers tears with tears:
 With kindly words consoles th' afflicted fair,
 At once receives her with a father's care,
 And thence conducts her to his ancient wife,
 The faithful partner of his humble life.

And now (her mind unbrae'd) the royal maid
 In rustic weeds her graceful limbs array'd;
 But, in her courtly looks and beauteous mien,
 Appear'd no tenant of the sylvan scene.

No dress could veil the lustre of her eyes,
 No outward form her princely air disguise:
 A secret charm, and dignity innate,
 Each act exalted of her lowly state.
 She drives the flock to pasture on the plain,
 And, with her crook, conducts to fold again:
 From the rough treat* she drew the milky stream,
 And press'd in circling vats the curdled cream.

Oft, when beneath some shady grove's retreat
 The flocks are shelter'd from meridian heat,
 On the smooth benches round the peopled dame
 Carves in a thousand forms her Tancred's name;
 Oft on a thousand plants in-crites her state,
 Her dire distress, and love's disastrous fate:
 And, while her eyes her own sad lines peruse,
 A shower of tears her lovely face bedews.
 Then thus she cries—"Ye friendly trees! retain
 My storied sorrows, and declare my pain:
 Should e'er, beneath your grateful shade, reside
 Some love-sick youth in true affection tried;
 His heart may learn with friendly grief to glow,
 Touch'd by my sad variety of woe:

So may he Love and Fortune's rigour blame,
 That thus reward a virgin's constant flame.
 If e'er indulgent Heaven vouchsafe to hear
 The tender wishes of a lover's prayer;
 E'en he may haply to these dwellings rove,
 Who heeds not now forlorn Erminia's love:
 And, casting on the ground his pitying eyes,
 Where clos'd in earth this breathless body lies,
 May to my sufferings yield a late return,
 And with a pious tear my fortune mourn.
 Thus, if my life was never doom'd to rest,
 At least in death my spirit shall be blest;
 And my cold ashes shall the bliss receive,
 Which here relentless Fate refus'd to give!"

Thus to the senseless trunks her pains she told,
 While down her cheek the copious sorrows roll'd.

Tancred, meantime, the damsel's slight pursu'd,
 And, guided by the track, had reach'd the wood:
 But there the trees so thick a gloom display'd,
 He rov'd uncertain through the dusky shade.
 And now he listens with attentive ear,
 The noise of weeds or sound of arms to hear.
 Each bird or beast that rustles in the brake,
 Each whispering breeze his amorous hope awakes,
 At length he leaves the wood: the favouring Moon
 Directs his wandering steps through paths unknown,
 A sudden noise at distance seems to rise,
 And thither straight th' impatient warrior flies.
 And now he comes where, from a rock distills
 A plenteous stream that falls in lucid rills;
 Then down a steep th' united waters flow,
 And murmur in the verdant banks below.
 Here Tancred call'd aloud: in vain he cried;
 No sound, save echo, to his voice replied.
 Meanwhile he saw the gay Aurora rise,
 And rosy blushes kindling in the skies:
 Inly he groan'd, accusing Heaven, that heid
 The flying damsel from his search conceal'd;
 And vow'd his vengeance on the head to bend
 Whose rashness should the much-lov'd maid offend.

* The Italian commentator justly observes, that the poet has very happily expressed the simple employment of making cheese.

—da Mante mamme il latte preme,
 E'n giro scollio poi lo stringe insieme.

At length the knight, though doubtful of the way,
Resolv'd to seek the camp without delay;
For near at hand the destin'd morning drew,
That with Argentes must his fight renew.
When, issuing from a narrow vale, he spy'd
A messenger, that seem'd on speed to ride,
His crooked horns depending at his side.
Tauscred from him demands the ready way
To where encamp'd the Christian army lay.
Then he—"Thou soon from me the path mayst
know,

Dispatch'd by Bosmond to the camp I go."
Th' unwary knight the guileful words believ'd,
And follow'd, by his uncle's name deceiv'd.
And now they came to where, amidst a flood
Obscene with filth, a stately castle stood;
What time the Sun withdrew his cheerful light,
And sought the sable caverns of the night.
At once the coarier blew a sounding blast,
And sudden o'er the moat the bridge was cast.
"Here, if a Latian," said the wily guide,
"Thou mayst at ease till morning dawn reside:
Three days are past since from the Pagan band
Cosenza's valiant earl this castle gain'd."

He ceas'd. The warrior all the fort survey'd,
Impregnable by art and nature made;
While he pass'd, suspecting in his mind
In such a place some secret fraud to find:
But, lo! to dangers and to toils inur'd,
He stood undaunted, in himself secur'd;
Resolv'd, whate'er or choice or chance procure,
His own right arm his safety should ensure:
But now another task his sword demands,
And from each new attempt restrains his hands.

Before the castle, close beside the flood,
In deep suspense awhile the hero stood;
Nor o'er the stream the doubtful passage tried,
Though oft invited by his treacherous guide:
When sudden on the bridge a knight was seen
All sheath'd in arms, of fierce and haughty mien;
His naked falchion, held aloft, he shook,
And thus in loud and threatening accents spoke:
"O thou! who thus hast reach'd Armida's land,
Or led by choice, or by thy fate constrain'd,
Hope not to fly—be here thy sword resign'd,
And let thy hands ignoble fetters bind;
This castle enter, and the laws receive,
The laws our sovereign mistress deigns to give:
And ne'er expect, for length of rolling years,
To view the light of Heaven or golden stars,
Unless thou swear, with her associate-train,
To war on all that Jesus' faith maintain."

He said; and, while his voice betray'd the knight,
On the known armour Tauscred fix'd his sight.
Rambaldo this, who with Armida came,
Who, for her sake, embrac'd the Pagan name;
And now was seen in arms to assert her cause,
The bold defender of her impious laws.
With holy zeal th' indignant warrior burn'd,
And to the foe this answer soon return'd:
"Lo! impious wretch! that Tauscred now appears,
Who still for Christ his faithful weapon wears;
His champion! taught by him the foes to quell,
That dare against his sacred word rebel.

Soon shalt thou find in me thy scourge is giv'n,
And own this hand the minister of Heaven."

Confounded at his name th' apostate stood;
Swift vanish'd from his cheek the frighted blood:
Yet thus, with courage feign'd, he made reply:
"Why com'st thou, wretch! predestin'd here to die?"

Here adie thy lifeless limbs on earth be spread,
And, sever'd from the trunk, thy worthless head
Soon to the leader of the Franks I'll send,
If fortune, as of old, my arms besfriend."

While thus he spoke, the day its beams withdrew,
And deeper shades obscur'd the doubtful view:
When straight a thousand lamps resplendent blaze,
And all the castle shines with starry rays.
Armida plac'd aloft (herself conceal'd)
Heard all the contest, and the knights beheld.
Th' undaunted hero for the fight prepares,
Collects his courage and his falchion bares;
Nor kept his steed, but leaping from his seat,
Approach'd on equal terms the foe to meet.
The foe advanc'd on foot, and held before
His fencing shield; his head the helmet wore;
In act to strike the naked steel he bore.
To him with dauntless pace the prince drew nigh,
Rage in his voice, and lightning in his eye.
The wary Pagan wheels his steps afar,
Now seems to strike, and now to shun the war.
Tauscred, though weak with many a former wound,
Though lately spent with toil, maintain'd his ground;

And, where Rambaldo abruak, his steps he press'd,
And oft the sword before his face address'd
With threatening point; but chiefly bent his art,
To aim the wounds at every vital part.
His dreadful voice he rais'd at every blow,
And pour'd a furious tempest on the foe:
Now here, now there, the foe deceives his eyes,
With sword and shield to ward the danger tries,
And from th' impending steel elusive flies.
Yet not so swift the Pagan can defend,
But swifter far the Christian's strokes descend.
Rambaldo's arms were now with blood bedew'd,
His shield was broken, and his helmet hew'd:
While in his heart contending passions strove,
Remorse, and fear, and shame, revenge and love.
At length, impell'd by fury and despair,
To prove the utmost fortune of the war,
His buckler cast aside, with either hand
He grasp'd his falchion, yet with blood unstain'd;
Then, instant closing, urg'd the vengeful steel:
On Tauscred's thigh the furious weapon fell,
And through the mail infus'd a ghastly wound;
His helmet next the Pagan's falchion found;
The helmet, struck, return'd a ringing sound.
The casque sustain'd the stroke, with temper
steel'd,

Beneath the force the staggering warrior reel'd;
But, soon recovering, gnash'd his teeth with ire,
While from his eye-balls dash'd avenging fire!

And now Rambaldo durst no longer wage
The doubtful fight with Tauscred's rising rage:
His startled ear the hissing sword confess'd;
He deem'd the point already in his breast:
He sees, he flies the blow: th' impetuous steel
With erring force against a column fell
Beside the flood; beneath the furious stroke
The marble in a thousand shivers broke.
Swift to the bridge th' affrighted traitor flies;
In swiftness all his hope of safety lies:

³ The following passage bears a nearer resemblance to the romances of chivalry than any part of the poem, and is such in the spirit of Ariosto.

Him Tancred chas'd, and step by step impell'd ;
 Now o'er his back the threatening sword he held :
 When lo ! (the trembling Pagan's sight to shield)
 A sudden darkness cover'd all the field :
 At once the lamps were vanish'd from the sight ;
 At once the Moon and stars withdrew their light.
 No more the victor could his foe pursue,
 In gloom of friendly night conceal'd from view.
 His eyes in vain explor'd the magic shade,
 While unsecure with doubtful feet he stray'd.
 Unconscious where he pass'd, with luckless tread
 He enter'd at a gate, as fortune led ;
 But sudden heard the portal clos'd behind,
 And found himself in prison drear confin'd.
 So the mute race from troubled waves retreat,
 To seek in peaceful bays a milder seat,
 And heedless enter in the fatal snare,
 Where fishers place their nets with guileful care.

The gallant Tancred prisoner thus remain'd,
 By strange enchantment in the fort detain'd ;
 In vain to force the gate his strength he tried,
 The stronger gate his utmost pains defy'd :

And soon a voice was heard—"Attempt no more,
 Armida's captive now, to escape her pow'r !
 Here live ; nor fear that death should prove thy doom,

Here living sentenc'd to a doleful tomb !"

Th' indignant knight his rising grief suppress'd,
 Yet green'd full deeply from his utmost breast ;
 Accusing love, from whence his errors rose,
 Himself, his fortune, and his treacherous foes.
 Thus oft in whispers to himself he moans :
 "To me no more the cheerful Sun returns !
 Yet that were little—these unhappy eyes
 Must view no more the sun of beauty rise !
 No more behold Clorinda's charms again,
 Whose power alone can ease a lover's pain !"
 The destin'd combat then his mind assail'd ;
 "Too much," he cried, "my honour here has fail'd :

Well may Argantes now despise my name ;
 O stain to glory ! O eternal shame !" [breast,

While thoughts like these distracted Tancred's
 Argantes scor'd the downy plumes of rest :
 Discord and strife his cruel soul employ ;
 Fame all his wish, and slaughter all his joy :
 And ere his wounds are heal'd, he burns to view
 Th' appointed day, the combat to renew.
 The night before the morn for fight design'd,
 The Pagan scarce to sleep his eyes inclin'd :
 While yet the skies their sable mantle spread,
 Ere yet a beam disclos'd the mountain's head,
 He rose, and call'd for arms ; his squire prepares,
 And to his lord the radiant armour bears ;
 Not that he wou'd to wear ; a nobler load,
 A costly gift, the monarch this bestow'd.
 Eager he seiz'd, nor gaz'd the present o'er,
 His limbs, with ease, the massy burthen bore.
 He girt the trusty falchion to his side ;
 Full well in many a dangerous combat tried,
 As shaking terrors from his blazing hair.
 A sanguine comet gleams through dusky air,
 To ruin states, and dire diseases spread,
 A baleful light on purple tyrants shed :
 So flam'd the chief in arms, and sparkling ire,
 He roll'd his eyes suffus'd with blood and fire :
 His dreadful threats the firmest hearts control'd,
 And with a look he wither'd all the bold :
 With horrid shout he shook his naked blade,
 And smote th' impressive air and empty shade.

"Soon shall the Christian chief," aloud he cries,
 "Who dares with me in fight dispute the prize,
 Vanquish'd and bleeding, press the hostile land,
 And soil his flowing tresses in the sand !
 Spite of his God, he living shall survey
 This hand, unpitied, rend his spoils away.
 Then shall his prayers in vain a grave implore,
 The dogs his mingled carcase shall devour !"

So fares a bull whom jealous fires enrage,
 Loudly he roars, and calls up all his rage,
 Against a tree his sharpen'd horns he tries,
 To battle vain the passing wind defies ;
 He spurns the yellow sands, and from afar
 His mortal rival dares to deadly war.
 These passions aselling in Argantes' breast,
 The herald straight he call'd, and thus address'd :
 "Haste to the camp, and there the fight proclaim
 With yonder champion of the Christian name."

This said, he seiz'd his steed, nor longer stay'd,
 Bat from the walls the captive knight convey'd.
 He left the city, and impetuous went
 With eager speed along the hill's descent.
 Impatient then his sounding horn he blew,
 And wide around the horrid echo flew ;
 The noise, like thunder, struck th' astonish'd ears,
 And every heart was fill'd with sudden fears.

The Christian princes, now conven'd, enclose
 Their prudent chief ; to these the herald goes,
 And Tancred first to combat dur demands,
 Then dares each leader of the faithful bands.

Now Godfrey casts around his heedful sight,
 No champion offers equal to the fight.
 The flower of all his warlike train is lost ;
 No news of Tancred yet has reach'd the host :
 Bemoan'd afar ; and exit'd from the field
 Th' unconquer'd youth who proud Gerando kill'd,
 Beside the ten, by lot of fortune nam'd,
 The heroes of the camp, for valour fam'd,
 Pursu'd the false Armida's guileful flight,
 Conceal'd in covert of the friendly night.
 The rest, less firm of soul or brave of hand,
 Around their chief unmov'd and silent stand ;
 Not one in such a risk would seek for fame ;
 In fear of ill was lost the sense of shame.

Well, by their silence and their looks display'd,
 Their secret fears the general soon survey'd,
 And, fill'd with noble warmth and high disdain,
 He started from his seat, and thus began :
 "Ah ! how unworthy is this breast of life,
 If now I shun to attempt the glorious strife ;
 Or let you Pagan foe our name disgrace,
 And tread in dust the glory of our race.
 Here let my camp secure, inactive, lie,
 And view my danger with a distant eye :
 Haste, bring my arms !"—Then, swift as winged thought,

His ponderous armour to the chief was brought.
 But Raymond (in experienc'd wisdom known,
 Whose courage with the first in peril shone ;
 Whose vigorous age the fire of youth confess'd)
 Turn'd to the leader, and these words address'd :
 "Forbidden, Heaven ! that e'er the Christian state
 Thus in their chief should hazard all their fate !
 On thee our empire and our faith depend,
 By thee must Babel's impious kingdom bend.
 'Tis thine to rule debates, the sceptre wield ;
 Let others boldly prove the sword in field.

Even I, though bending with the weight of age
 Refuse not here the danger to engage.
 Let others shun the force of yonder knight,
 No thoughts shall keep me from so brave a fight.
 Oh! could I boast an equal strength of years
 As you who stand dismay'd with heartless fears, (Whom neither shame nor indignation moves,
 While yonder foe your dastard train reproves)
 Such as I was, when all Germania view'd
 Stern Leopold beneath my arms subdu'd!
 At mighty Courade's court my weapon tore
 The warrior's breast, and drank his vital gore.
 Such was the deed! more noble far to bear
 The spoils of such a chief renown'd in war,
 Than singly here, unarm'd, in fight to chase
 A numerous band of this inglorious race.
 Had I the vigour now I then possess'd,
 This arm had soon the Pagan's pride suppress'd.
 But, as I am, this heart undaunted glows,
 No coward fear this aged bosom knows;
 And, should I breathless press the hostile plain,
 No easy conquest shall the foe obtain.
 Behold I am!—this day, with added praise,
 Shall crown the lustre of my former days."

So spoke the hoary chief; his words inspir'd
 Each kindling soul, and sleeping virtue fir'd:
 And those whose silence first their fear confess'd,
 With voice embolden'd to the combat press'd.
 No more a knight is sought; a generous band,
 By emulation urg'd, the fight demand:
 That task Rogaro, Goetho, Baldwin fam'd,
 Stephens, Germar, and either Guido claim'd:
 Pyrrhus, whose art the walls of Antioch won,
 And gave to Bezmoud's hand the conquer'd town.
 Brave Eberard the glorious trial wars;
 Ridolphus and Rosmondo, known in arms:
 And, with like thirst to gain a deathless name,
 The conflict Edward and Gildippe claim.
 But first the venerable warrior stands,
 And with superior zeal the fight demands.
 Already arm'd he darts resplendent fires,
 And now his burnish'd helm alone requires:
 Him Godfrey thus bespoke: "O glorious sage!
 Thou lively mirror of a warlike age!
 From thee our leaders catch the goldlike flame,
 Thine is the art of war and martial fame!
 Oh! could I now in youthful powers find
 Ten champions more, to match thy dauntless mind."

Soon should I conquer Babel's haughty towers,
 And spread the cross from Ind to Thule's shores.
 But here forbear; reserve for counsel sage
 The nobler glory of thy virtuous age:
 And let the rest their rival names enclose
 Within a vase, and chance the lots dispose;
 Or rather God dispose, whose sovereign will,
 Fortune and Fate, his ministers, fulfil."

He said; but Raymond still asserts his claim,
 And fearless with the rest includes his name.
 Then pious Godfrey in his helmet threw
 The lots, and, shaking round, the first he drew,
 Thaulouze's valiant earl appear'd in view.

With cheerful shouts the Christians hail the name,
 Nor dares a tongue the lot of Fortune blame.
 The hero's looks a sudden vigour warm,
 And a new youth his stiffen'd limbs informs.
 So the fierce snake with spoils renew'd appears,
 And to the Sun his golden circle rears.
 But Godfrey most extoll'd the hoary knight,
 And promis'd fame and conquest in the fight;

Then from his side his trusty falchion took,
 To Raymond this he gave, and thus he spoke:

"See here the sword which, drawn in many a field,
 The rebel Saxon⁶ once was wont to wield;
 This from his hand I won in glorious strife,
 And forc'd a passage for his hated life:
 This sword, that ever did my arm befriend,
 Receive, and equal fortune thine attend!"

Thus say. The haughty foe impatient stay'd,
 And with loud threats provok'd the strife delay'd.

"Unconquer'd nations! Europe's martial bands!
 Rebuild a single chief the war demands!
 Why comes not Tancred, once so fam'd in fight,
 If still he dare to trust his boasted might?
 Or, does he choose, in downy slumber laid,
 To wait again the night's auxiliary shade?
 If thus he fears, let others prove their force;
 Come all, united powers of foot and horse!
 Since not your thousands can a warrior yield
 Who dares oppose my might in single field,
 Lo! there the sepulchre of Mary's son—
 Approach, and pay your offering at the stone,
 Behold the way! what cause detains your band?
 Or does some greater deed your swords demand?"

These bitter taunts each Christian's rage provoke,
 But chiefly Raymond kindled as he spoke:
 Indignant shame his swelling breast inspires,
 And noble wrath his dauntless courage fires.
 He vaults on Aquiline, of matchless speed;
 The bank of Tagus bred this generous steed:
 There the fair mother of the warrior-brood
 (Soon as the kindly spring had fir'd her blood)
 With open mouth, against the breezes held,
 Receiv'd the gales with warmth prolific fill'd:
 And (strange to tell) inspir'd with genial seed,
 Her swelling womb produc'd this wondrous steed.
 Along the sand with rapid feet he flies,
 No eye his traces in the dust deseries;
 To right, to left, obedient to the rein,
 He winds the mazes of th' embattled plain.
 On this the valiant earl to combat press'd,
 And thus to Heaven his pious prayer address'd:
 "O thou! that gainst Goliath's impious head
 The youthful arms in Terebinthus sped,
 When the proud foe, who scoff'd at Israel's band,
 Fell by the weapon of a stripling's hand:
 With like example now thy cause maintain,
 And stretch you Pagan breathless on the plain:
 Let feeble age subdue the mighty's pride,
 Which feeble childhood once so well defy'd!"

So pray'd the earl; and straight his zealous prayers

Flow wing'd with faith, to reach the heavenly spheres,
 As flames ascend. Th' Eternal Father heard,
 And call'd an angel from th' ethereal guard,
 Whose watchful aid the aged chief might shield,
 And safe return him from the glorious field.
 Th' angelic power, to whom, decreed by Heaven,
 The care of Raymond from his birth was given,
 Soon as he heard anew his Lord's command,
 They'd the charge intrusted to his hand:
 He mounts the sacred tower, where, rang'd on high,
 The arms of all th' immortal legions lie. [see
 There shines the spear, by which the serpent driv'
 Lies pierc'd with wounds; the fiery bolts of Heaven;

⁶ The Saxons rebelled in Germany; and made Count Ridolphus their king, who was afterwards overcome and slain by Godfrey.

The viewless arrows that in faintest air
Disease and plagues to frighted mortals bear.
There, hung aloft, the trident huge is seen,
The deadliest terror to the race of men,
What time the solid Earth's foundations rose,
And tottering cities tremble from above!
But o'er the rest, on piles of armour, flam'd,
A shield immense of blazing diamond fram'd,
Whose orb could all the realms and lands contain
That reach, from Caucasus, th' Atlantic main!
This buckler guards the righteous prince's head;
O'er holy kingdoms this defence is spread:
With this the angel from his seat descends,
And near his Raymond, unperceiv'd, attends.

Meantime the walls with various throngs were
And now Clorinda (so the tyrant will'd) [sill'd;
Led from the city's gate an armed band,
And halted on the hill; the Christians stand
In rank of battle on a different hand.
Before the camp, in either army's sight,
An ample list lay open for the fight.
Argantes seeks his foe, but seeks in vain;
A knight unknown appears upon the plain.
Then Raymond thus—"The chief thine eyes would find,

Thy better fate has from our host disjoint'd:
Yet let not this thy empty pride excite,
Behold me here prepar'd to prove thy might.
For him I dare with thee the war maintain:
Nor think me meanest of the Christian train."
The Pagan smil'd, and scornful thus reply'd:
"Say, in what part does Tancred then reside?
He first, with boastful threats all Heaven defies,
Then trembling on his coward feet relies!
But let him fly, and veil his fears in vain
Beneath the central earth, or boundless main:
Not earth profound, nor ocean's whelming wave,
Shall from my hand the recreant warrior save!"
"Falsely thou say'st," the Christian thus replies,
"That he, thy better far, the combat flies."

To whom the foe jocos'd—"Then swift prepare,
I shall not here refuse thy proffer'd war:
Soon must we prove, on this contended plain,
How well thy deeds thy senseless boast maintain."
This said, the champions to the combat press'd,
And 'gainst the helm their threatening spears ad-dress'd.

True to his aim, good Raymond reach'd the foe,
Who, in his seat unmov'd, sustain'd the blow.
No less in vain was fierce Argantes' might;
The heavenly guardian, watchful o'er the fight,
The stroke averted from the Christian knight.
The Pagan gnaw'd his lips, with rage he shook,
And 'gainst the plain his lance, blaspheming, broke;
Then drew his sword, and swift at Raymond flew,
On closer terms the combat to renew.
Against him full he drove his furious steed;
So butting rams encounter head to head:
But Raymond to the right eludes the shock,
And on his front the passing Pagan struck:
Again the stern Circassian seeks the foe:
Again the Christian disappoints the blow;
And every turn observes with heedful eyes;
He fears Argantes' strength and giant size:
By fits he seem'd to fight, by fits to yield,
And round the list in flying circles wheel'd.
As when some chief a tower beleaguers round,
With few enclos'd, or on a hilly ground,
A thousand ways a thousand arts he proves:
Thus o'er the field the wary Christian moves.

In vain he strives the Pagan's scales to rend,
That well his ample breast and head defend;
But where the jointed plates an entrance show'd,
Thrice with his sword he drew the purple flood,
And stain'd the hostile arms with streaming blood.
His own, secure, the adverse weapon brav'd;
Untouch'd the plume o'er his helmet wav'd.
At length, amidst a thousand vainly spent,
A well-aim'd stroke the raging Pagan sent:
Then, Aquiline! thy speed had prov'd in vain,
That fatal blow had aged Raymond slain;
But here he fail'd not heavenly aid to prove;
The guard invisible, from realms above,
To meet the steel th' ethereal buckler held,
Whose blazing orb the powerful stroke repell'd.
The sword broke short, nor could the force with-
(No earthly temper of a mortal hand [stand;
Could arms divine, infragible, sustain)
The brittle weapon shiver'd on the plain.
The Pagan scarce believes; with wondering eye,
He sees on earth the glittering fragments lie:
And still he deem'd against the Christian's shield
His falchion broken strew'd the dusty field:
Good Raymond down'd no less; nor knew, from Heaven

What powerful guardian to his life was given.
But when disarm'd the hostile band he view'd,
Awhile suspended in himself he stood;
He fear'd such palms would little fame bestow,
With such advantage ravish'd from the foe.
"Go, seek a sword!"—the chief begins to say;
But different thoughts his generous purpose stay.
He fears alike to win the shield with shame;
He fears alike to risk the general fame.
While doubtful thus he stands, with rage anew
The bill Argantes at his helmet threw;
Then spur'd his steed to grapple with his foe;
The earl, unmov'd, receives the Pagan's blow,
And wounds his arm, that came with threatening
Fierce as a vulture rushing on its prey! [sway,
At every turn his sword Argantes found,
And pierc'd his limbs with many a ghastly wound.
Whate'er his art or vigour could conspire,
His former wrath, his now redoubled ire,
At once against the proud Circassian join,
And Heaven and Fortune in the cause combine.
But still the foe, with dauntless soul secure,
Resists, unterrified, the Christian's power.
So seems a stately ship, in billows tost,
Her tackle torn, her masts and canvass lost;
With strong-ribb'd sides the rushing storm she
Nor yet despairs amidst the roaring waves. [braves,
Even such, Argantes, was thy dangerous state,
When Beelzebub prepar'd to ward thy fate:
From hollow clouds he fram'd an empty shade,
(Woodrous to speak!) in human form array'd:
To this Clorinda's warlike looks he join'd;
Like her the form in radiant armour shin'd;
He gave it speech and accents like the dame;
The same the motion, and the mien the same,
To Oradine its course the phantom took,
And him, renown'd for archery, bespoke:
"O Oradine! whose never-failing art
To every mark directs the distant dart,
Think what a loss Judas must sustain,
Should thus the guardian of her walls be slain;
Should his rich spoils the haughty foe adorn,
And he in safety to his train return.
On yonder robber let thy skill be tried,
Deep in his blood be now thy arrows dy'd.

What endless praise were thine! nor praise alone.
The king with vast rewards the dead shall crown."

The spectre ceas'd. Not long the warrior stay'd;
The hopes of gain his greedy soul persuade:
From the full quiver, destin'd for the dead,
To the tough yew he fits the feather'd reed:
He bends the bow, loud twangs the trembling string,
The shaft impatient hisses on the wing;
Swift to the mark the airy passage finds,
Just where the belt the golden buckle binds;
The corselet piercing, through the skin it goes;
But scarce the wound with purple moisture flows;
The guard colonial stops its further course,
And robs the arrow of its threatening force.
The earl the weapon from his corselet drew,
And saw the sprinkling drops of sanguine hue;
Then on the Pagan turn'd, with fery mov'd,
And with loud threats his breach of faith reprov'd.

The pious Godfrey now, whose careful look
Was fix'd on Raymond, fond the truce was broke;
With fears he saw his lov'd associate bleed,
And urg'd his troops to avenge the treacherous deed.
Then might you see their ready beavers clos'd,
Their courses rein'd, their spears in rest dispos'd.
At once the squadrons, plac'd on either hand,
Move in their ranks, and thicken o'er the land:
The field is vanish'd; clouds of dust arise,
And roll in sable volumes to the skies.
They meet, they shock; the clamours echo round;
And helms and shields and shiver'd spears resound.
Here lies a steed, and there (his rider slain)
Another rees at random o'er the plain.
Here lies a warrior dead; in pangs of death,
There one, with groans, reluctant yields his breath.
Dire is the conflict; deep the tumult grows;
And now with all its rage the battle glows.
Argante's midst them flew with eager pace,
And from a soldier snatch'd an iron mace;
This whirl'd around, with unrestit sway,
Through the thick press he forc'd an ample way:
Raymond he seeks, on him his arms he turns,
On him alone his dreadful fury burns:
And, like a wolf, with savage wrath indu'd,
He thirsts insatiate for the Christian's blood.
But now, on every side, the numbers clos'd,
And thronging warriors his attempts oppos'd:
Ormano and Rogero, (names renown'd I)
Guido, with either Gerrard, there he found.
Yet more impetuous still his anger swell'd,
The more these gallant chiefs his force repell'd.
So, pent in narrow space, more dreadful grows
The blazing fire, and round destruction throws.
Guido he wounded; brave Ormano slew;
And midst the slain to earth Rogero threw,
Stun'd with the fall. While here the martial train
On either band an equal fight maintain;
Thus to his brother, Godfrey gave command:
"Now to the fight conduct thy warlike band;
And where the battle rages in its force,
There to the left direct thy speedy course."
He said; the warrior at his word obey'd,
And on their flank a sudden onset made.
Languid and spent the Asian troops appear,
Nor can the Franks' impetuous vigour bear: [round,
Their ranks are broke, their standards scatter'd
And men and steeds lie mingled on the ground.
The squadrons, on the right, now fed the plain;
Alone Argante dares the shock sustain;
Alone he turns, alone the torrent stands:
Not he who brandish'd in his hundred hands

His fifty swords and fifty shields in fight,
Could have surpass'd the fierce Argante's might!
The space's sweepy way, the clashing spears,
Th' impetuous shock of charging steeds he bears.
Alone he seems for all an equal force:
Now here, now there, by turns he shifts his course:
His limbs are bruise'd, his shatter'd arms resound;
The blood and sweat in mingled streams abound,
Yet whole he seems, and fearless of a wound.
But now so closely press'd the flying crew,
That in their flight the unwilling chief they drew:
Constrain'd he turn'd, nor longer could abide
Th' o'erbearing fury of the rapid tide.
Yet seems he not to fly, his looks declare
His dauntless soul, and still maintain the war;
Still in his eyes the glancing terrors glow,
And still with threatening voice he dares the foe.
With every art he tries, but tries in vain,
To stop the panic of the routed train:
No art, no rein, can rule the vulgar fear;
Nor earnest prayers, nor loud commands they hear.

The pious Godfrey, who, with zeal inspir'd,
Saw Fortune favouring all his soul desir'd,
Pursu'd with joy the battle's glorious course,
And to the victors sent auxiliar force.
And, but the fatal hour not yet was come,
Pursu'd by God in his eternal doom,
This day, perchance, their arms success had found,
This day had all their sacred labours crown'd.
But Hell's discords, who saw the conquering host,
And in the combat fear'd their empire lost,
(By Heaven permitted) spread the changing skies
With clouds condense'd, and gave the winds to rise.
Infernal horrors darken all the air,
Pale livid lightnings through the ether glare;
The thunder roars; the mingled hail and rain
With rattling torrents deluge all the plain:
The trees are rent; nor yield the trees alone,
The rocks and mountains to the tempest groan.
The wind and rain with force united strove,
And on the Christians' face impetuous drove:
The sudden storm their eager course repress'd,
And fatal terrors daunted many a breast:
While, round their banners, some maintain'd the
Nor yet the fortune of the day behold. [field,
But thus Clorinda from afar descries,
And swift to seize the wish'd occasion flies.

She spurs her steed, and thus her squadron warms:
"See! Heaven, my friends! assists our righteous arms:

His tempest lights not on our favour'd hands,
But leaves to action free our valiant hands:
Against th' astonish'd foe his wrath he bends,
Full in their face his vengeful storm descends:
They lose the use of arms and light of day:
Haste, let us go where Fortune points the way!"
She said, and rous'd her ardent troops to war;
And while behind th' infernal storm they bear,
With dreadful fury on the Franks they turn,
And mock their vigour, and their weapons scorn:
Meanwhile Argante on their forces flew,
(So lately victors) and with rage o'erthrew:
These, swift retreating from the field, oppose
Their backs against the storm and hostile blow.
Fierce on the rear the Pagan weapons poof;
Fierce on the rear their wrath the Furies shower.
The mingled blood in streaming torrents swell'd,
And purple rivers delug'd all the field.
There, midst the dying and the vulgar slain,
Pyrrhus and good Radolphus press'd the plains

The fierce Circassian this of life depriv'd;
From that Clorinda noble palms deriv'd.

Thus fled the Franks; while still th' infernal crew
And Syrian bands their eager flight pursue.
Godfrey alone the hostile arms defies,
The roaring storm and thunder of the skies;
With dauntless front amid the tumult moves,
And loud each leader's coward fear reproves.
Against Argantes twice he urg'd his horse,
And bravely twice repell'd the Pagan's course:
As oft on high his naked sword he rear'd
Where, thickest join'd, the hostile troops appear'd:
Till, with the rest constrain'd the day to yield,
He gain'd the trenches, and forsook the field.
Back to the walls return'd the Pagan band;
The wary Christians in the vale remain'd; [hear,
Nor then could scarce th' increasing tempest
And the wild rage of elemental war.
Now here, now there, the fires more faintly show;
Loud roar the winds; the rushing waters flow;
The tents are shatter'd, stakes in pieces torn;
And whole pavilions far to distance borne.
The thunder, rain, and wind, and human cries,
With deafening clamour rend the vaulted skies |

BOOK VIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

A Dane arrives at the Christian camp, and informs Godfrey that the band, conducted by Sweno, was attacked in the night near Palestine, by a numerous army of Arabs, commanded by Solyman; that the Danes were cut in pieces, and Sweno killed; and that himself only escaped the general slaughter: to this he adds, that he had received an injunction to present Sweno's sword to Rinaldo. The Christian army, deceived by appearances, suspect Rinaldo to have been assassinated. Argillan, instigated in a dream by Alecto, incites the Italians to revolt; and throws the odium of Rinaldo's supposed murder upon Godfrey. The disaffection spreads through the troops. Godfrey goes himself to quell the tumult; he causes Argillan to be arrested, and restores tranquillity to the camp.

Now ceas'd the thunder's noise, the storm was o'er,
And every blustering wind forgot to roar;
When the fair morning, from her radiant seat,
Appear'd with rosy front and golden feet:
But those, whose power the raging tempest brew'd,
Still with new wiles their ruthless hate pursu'd;
While one (Astorgas the fiend was nam'd)
Her partner, dire Alecto, thus inflam'd:
"Behold you knight, Alecto! on his way,
(Nor can our arts his destin'd purpose stay)
Who 'scap'd with life, on yonder fatal plain,
The great defender of th' infernal reign.
He to the Franks his comrades' fate shall tell,
And how in fight their daring leader fell.
This great event among the Christians known,
May to the camp recall Bertoldo's son.
Thou know'st too well if this our care may claim,
And challenge every scheme our power can frame.
Then mingle with the Franks to work their woe,
And each adventure to their harms dispose:
Go—shed thy venom in their veins, inflame
The Latian, British, and Helvetian name;

! Solyman.

Be every means, be every fraud applied,
And all the camp in civil broils divide:
Th' attempt were worthy thee, would crown thy
So nobly plight'd to our sovereign lord." [word,
She spoke: nor needed more her speech employ;
The fiend embrac'd the task with horrid joy.
Meantime the knight, whose presence thus they
Arriving, in the Christian camp appear'd: [fear'd,
Conducted, soon the leader's tent he sought;
(All thronging round to bear the news he brought)
Lowly he bow'd, and kiss'd the glorious hand
That shook the lofty towers of Babel's land.
"O chief," he cried, "whose wide-extended fame
Along the ocean bounds and starry frame;
Would Heaven I here with happier tidings stood!"
This said, he sigh'd, and thus his speech pursu'd:
"Sweno, the Danish monarch's only son,
(Pride of his age, and glory of his throne)
Impatient glow'd his name with theirs to join,
Who, led by thee, in Jesus' cause combine:
Nor toils nor dangers could his thought restrain,
Nor all the allurements of his future reign;
Not filial duty to his aged sire
Could in his bosom quench the glorious fire.
By thy example, and beneath thy care,
He burn'd to learn the labours of the war.
Already had he heard Rinaldo's name,
In bloom of youth, resound with deeds of fame:
But, far above an earthly frail renown,
His soul aspir'd to Heaven's eternal crown.
Remov'd to meet in arms the Pagan foe,
The prince a faithful daring squadron chose;
Direct for Thrace, with these, his way pursu'd,
Till now the Greek's imperial seat he view'd.
The Grecian king the gallant youth carri'd,
And in his court detain'd the royal guest.
There from the camp thy trusty envoy came,
Who told the triumphs of the Christian name:
How first you conquer'd Antioch's stately towers,
Then 'gainst the foe maintain'd the choicest warriors.
When Persia brought her numerous sons from far,
And seem'd to exhaust her spacious realms for war,
On thine, on every leader's praise he dwells,
And last the deeds of brave Rinaldo tells:
How the bold youth forsook his native land;
What early glory since his arms had gain'd.
To this he adds, that now the Christian powers
Had laid the siege to Siou's lofty towers;
And urg'd the prince with thee at least to share
The last great conquest of the sacred war.
These speeches gave new force to Sweno's zeal;
He thirsts in Pagan blood to drench his steel.
Each warrior's trophy seems his sloth to blame;
Each valiant deed upbraids his tardy fame.
One thought alone h's dauntless soul alarms;
He fears to join too late the victor's arms.
Impell'd by fate, he scarcely deigns to stay
Till the first blush of dawn renew'd the day.
We march'd, intrepid, o'er a length of land
Beset with various foes on every hand:
Now rugged ways we prove; now famine bear;
To ambush now expos'd or open war;
But every labour, fearless, we sustain;
Our foes were vanquish'd, or in battle slain.
"Success in danger every doubt suppress'd,
Presumptuous hope each swelling heart possess'd.
At length we pitch'd our tents one fatal day,
As near the bounds of Palestine we lay:
Our scouts were there surpris'd with loud alarms
Of savage clamour and the din of arms;

And countless banners they demy'd from far,
The streaming signals of approaching war.

“Our matchless chief onmov'd the tidings heard;
Firm was his voice, unchang'd his looks appear'd;
Through the dire peril startled many a breast,
And many a changing cheek its fears confess'd:
Then thus he cried: ‘Prepare for sure renown,
The victor's laurel, or the martyr's crown!
The first I hope, nor less the last I prize,
Whence greater merits, equal glories rise!
This field, O friends! shall future honours claim,
A temple sacred to immortal fame;
Where distant ages shall our trophies tell,
Or show the spot on which we greatly fell!’

“Thus said the chief, and straight the guard prepares,

Divides the task, and every labour shares.
He wits the troops in arms to pass the night,
Nor from his breast removes his corselet bright,
But sheath'd in mail expects the threaten'd fight.

“When now the silent night her veil extends,
The peaceful hour that balm'g sleep befriends:
The sky with dreadful howling echoes round,
And every cave returns the barbarous sound,
‘To arms! to arms!’ each startled soldier cries;
Before the rest impetuous Sweno flies,
He darts his eyes that glow with martial flame;
His looks the ardour of his soul proclaim.
And soon th' invading troops our camp enclose:
Thick and more thick the steely circle grows;
Javelins and swords around us form a wood,
And o'er our heads descends an iron cloud.

“In this unequal field the war we wag'd,
Where every Christian twenty foes engag'd;
Of these were many wounded midst the gloom:
By random shafts full many met their doom.
But none, amidst the dusky shades, could tell
The wounded warriors, or what numbers fell.
Night o'er our loss her sable mantle threw,
And, with our loss, conceal'd our deeds from view.
Yet fierce in arms, and towering o'er the rest,
The gallant Sweno stood to all contest;
Even through the dusk they mark his daring course,
And count the actions of his matchless force.
His thirsty sword the purple slaughter spread,
And round him rais'd a bulwark of the dead:
Where'er he turns, he scatters, through the band,
Fear from his looks and slaughter from his hand.

“Thus stood the fight: but when th' ethereal ray

With ruddy streaks proclaim'd the dawning day,
The morn reveal'd the fatal scenes of night,
And death's dire horrors open'd to our sight.
We saw a field with mangled bodies strown,
And in one combat all our force o'erthrown!
A thousand first compos'd our martial band,
And scarce a hundred now alive remain'd!
But when the chief beheld the dreadful plain,
The mangled troops, the dying and the slain,
‘T was doubtful how his soul sustain'd his part,
Or what emotions touch'd his mighty heart;
Yet thus aloud he fir'd his fainting crew:
‘Haste, let us now our slaughter'd friends pursue,

Who, far from Styx and black Avernus' flood,
Have mark'd our happy paths to Heaven in blood.’

“He said; and, fix'd his glorious fate to close,
Undaunted rush'd amidst the thickest foes:
He rives the helmet, and he bows the shield:
The strongest arms before his falchion yield:

With streams of hostile gore he dies the ground,
While all his form is one continued wound.
His life decays, his courage still remains;
Th' unconquer'd soul its noble pride retains:
With equal force his martial ardour burns;
He wounds for blows, and death for wounds returns:

When thundering near a dreadful warrior came,
Of stern demeanour and gigantic frame;
Who, join'd by many, on the hero flew,
And, after long and painful battle, slew.
Prouce fell the generous youth, (ah! hapless death!)
Nor one had power to avenge his parting breath.
Be witness yet, and bear me just record,
Ye last dear relics of my much-lov'd lord!
I sought not then to save my worthless life,
Nor shunn'd a weapon in the dreadful strife.
Had Heaven vouchsaf'd to close my mortal date,
I sure by actions well deserv'd my fate!
Alive I fell, and senseless press'd the plain,
Alone preserv'd amidst my comrades slain:
Nor can I further of the Pagans tell,
So deep a trance o'er all my senses fell.
But when again I rais'd my feeble sight,
The skies were cover'd o'er with shades of night,
And from afar I saw a glimmering light.
I saw like one who half in slumber lies,
And opes and shuts by fits his languid eyes.
But now my limbs a deeper anguish found,
The pains increas'd in every gaping wound;
While on the earth I lay, expos'd and bare
To damps unwholesome and nocturnal air.
Meanwhile advancing nearer drew the light,
By slow degrees, and gain'd upon my sight.
Low whispers then and human sounds I heard;
Again, with pain, my feeble eyes I rear'd;
And saw two shapes in sacred robes array'd;
Each in his hand a lighted torch display'd,
And thus an awful voice distinctly said:
‘O son! confide in him whose mercy spares;
Whose pitying grace prevents our pious prayers.’
Then, with uplifted hands, my wounds he bless'd,
And many a holy vow to Heaven address'd.
He bade me rise—and sudden from the ground
I rose; my limbs their former vigour found;
Fied were my pains, and clos'd was every wound!
Stupid I stood, all speechless and amaz'd,
And doubtful on the reverend stranger gaz'd.
‘O thou of little faith!’ the hermit cried,
‘What thought has led thy troubled sense aside?
Thou seest two bodies of terrestrial frame,
Two servants dedicate to Jesus' name:
From the vain world and all its follies fled,
In wilds and deserts here our lives are led.
Lo! I am sent thy safety to ensure,
By him who rules o'er all with sovereign power;
Who ne'er disdain'd by humble means to show
His wondrous works of providence below;
Nor here will suffer on the naked plains
To lie expos'd those honour'd lov'd remains,
That must again th' exalted mind receive,
And, join'd above, in bliss eternal live.
To Sweno's corse he wits a tomb to raise,
A tomb as lasting as his deathless praise;
Which future times with wonder shall survey,
Where future times shall every honour pay.
But lift thine eyes, ye friendly Moon behold
Through filmy clouds her silver face unfold.
To guide thy devious footsteps o'er the plain,
To find the body of thy leader slain.’

"Then from the peaceful regent of the night
I saw descend a ray of slanting light:
Where on the field the breathless corse was laid
There full the lunar beam resplendent play'd;
And show'd each limb deform'd with many a wound,
Midst all the mingled scene of carnage round.
He lay not prone, but, as his zealous mind
Still soar'd beyond the views of human kind,
In death he sought above the world to rise,
And claim'd with upward look, his kindred skies.
One hand was clos'd, and seem'd the sword to rear;
One press'd his bosom with a suppliant air,
As if to Heaven he breath'd his humble prayer.

"While o'er his wounds the copious tears I shed,
And, lost in fruitless grief, deplor'd the dead,
His lifeless hand the holy hermit seiz'd,
And from his grasp the fatal steel releas'd.
To me then turning: 'View this sword,' he said,
'Whose edge to day such copious streams has shed,
Still dy'd in gore; thou know'st its virtue well,
No tempo'r'd weapon can its force excel!
But since its lord, in glorious conflict slain,
No more shall grasp the mortal sword again;
It must not here be lost, decreed by Heaven,
To noble hands the mighty prize is given;
To hands that longer shall the weapon wield
With equal valour in a happier field:
From these the world expects the vengeance due
On him whose fury gallant Sweno slew.
By Solyman has Sweno press'd the plain;
By Sweno's sword must Solyman be slain.
Go then with this, and seek the tainted ground
Where Christian powers the hallow'd walls surround;

Nor fear, lest wandering o'er a foreign land,
The foe again thy purpos'd course withstand.
That Power, who sends thee, shall thy toils survey,
His hand shall guide thee on the dangerous way:
He wills that thou (from every peril freed)
Shouldst tell the virtues of the hero dead:
So, fir'd by him, may others learn to dare,
And on their arms the cross triumphant bear:
That every breast may pant for righteous fame,
And distant ages catch the glorious flame.
It now remains the champion's name to bear,
Whose arm must beat the fatal weapon rear:
Rinaldo be, a youth approv'd in fight,
In valour first of every Christian knight:
Present him this; inflame his generous ire;
Say, Heaven and Earth (let this his soul inspire)
From him alone the great revenge require.'

"While thus intent the sage's words I heard,
Where Sweno lay, a sepulchre appear'd,
That, rising slow, by miracle dispos'd,
Within its marble womb the corse enclos'd:
Grav'd on the monumental stone were read
The name and merits of the warrior dead.
Struck with the sight, I stood, with looks amaz'd,
And on the words and tomb alternate gaz'd.

"Then thus the sage: 'Beside his followers slain

Thy leader's corse shall here enshrin'd remain;
While, in the mansions of the blest above,
Their happy souls enjoy celestial love.
But thou enough hast mourn'd the noble dead,
To nature now her dues of rest be paid;
With me reside, till in the eastern skies,
Propitious to thy course, the morn arise.' [says,

"He ceas'd; and led me thence through rugged
Now high, now low, in many a winding maze;

Till underneath the mountain's pendant shade,
Beside a hollow cave, our steps we stay'd.
Here dwelt the sage, amidst the savage brood
Of wolves and bears (the terrors of the wood!)
Here, with his pupil, liv'd secure from hirsut:
More strong than shield or corselet, virtue arms
And guards the naked breast in all alarms.
My hunger first suffic'd with sylvan food,
A homely couch my strength with sleep renew'd.
But when, rekindled with the rising day,
The radiant morn reveal'd her golden ray;
Each wakeful hermit to his prayers arose,
And, ros'd with them, I left my soft repose:
Then to the holy sage I bade adieu,
And turn'd the course directed to pursue."

Here ceas'd the Dane*. Then thus the pious chieftain:

"Thou com'st a mournful messenger of grief:
Thy words, O knight! with pain our camp shall Thy tale shall sadden every breast with woe. [know
Such gallant friends, by hostile fury crost,
From all our hopes, alas! so sudden lost!
Where thy dear leader, like a flashing light,
But just appear'd, and vanish'd from the sight;
Yet blest a death like this, and nobler far
Than conquer'd towns and ample spoils of war!
Nor can the Capitol examples yield
Of wroaths so glorious, or so brave a field.
In Heaven's high temple now, with honours crown'd,
Immortal laurels every brow surround;
Each hero there with conscious transport glows,
And every happy wound exulting shows.
But thou, escap'd from peril, still to know
The toil and warfare of the world below;
This gloom of sorrow from thy brow remove,
And learn to triumph in their bliss above.
Seek'st thou Bertoldo's son? In exile lost,
Unknown he wanders from th' abandon'd host:
Nor think to trace his fight with doubtful foot,
Till certain tidings tell the youth's retreat."

These speeches heard, and young Rinaldo's name,
With former love each kindling mind inflame.

"Alas!" they cry, "amid the Pagan bands

"The blooming warrior roves in distant lands!"

Each tongue with pleasure on his glory dwells;

Each to the wondering Dane his valour tells,

And all his battles, all his deeds reveals.

While thoughts like these in every bosom raise

The dear remembrance of their hero's praise;

A band of soldiers, sent to scour the plain,

With plenteous pillage seek the camp again;

With lowing oxen, and the woolly breed,

And generous corn to cheer the hungry steed:

And, join'd with these, a mournful load they bore,

The good Rinaldo's arms, the rest he wore;

The armour pierc'd, the vesture stain'd with gore.

The doubtful chance the vulgar herd alarms,

With grief they throng to view the warrior's arms.

* This admirable and affecting episode is founded on historical fact, though enlarged and beautified by the poet with many poetical and interesting circumstances. Paolo Emilio, the writer of the history, gives the following account of this Sweno: Læta tristibus (at res humanæ sunt) miscbantur: Sweno Dani regis filius cum mille quingentis æquibus cruce insignitis, transiisset ad Constantinopolim Bosphoro inter Antiochiam et reliquos Latinos iter faciebat; insidiis Turcorum ad unum omnes cuncta regio juvene cæsi.

They see, and know too well the dazzling sight,
The ponderous cuirass, with its beamy light ;
The crest, where high the towering eagle shone,
That proves his offspring in the mid-day Sun.
Oft were they wont, amid th' embattled fray,
To see them foremost rule the bloody day ;
And now with mingled grief and rage beheld
Those glorious trophies broken on the field.

While whispers fill the camp, and every breath
Relates by various means the hero's death,
The pious Godfrey made the chief be sought
Who led the squadron that the pillage brought.
Brave Aliprando was the leader nam'd,
For truth of speech and noble frankness fam'd,
" Declare," cried Godfrey, " whence these arms ye
Nor hide a secret from your general's ear." " Bear,

" As far remov'd from hence," he thus replied,
" As in two days a trusty scout may ride :
Near Gaza's walls, a little plain is found,
From public ways with hills encompass'd round ;
A riv'let murmurs down the mountain's sides,
And through the shade with gentle current glides ;
Thick wood and brambles form a horrid shade ;
(A place by nature well for ambush made)
Here, while we sought for flocks and herds that came
To crop the mead beside the crystal stream,
Surpris'd we saw the grass distain'd with blood,
And on the banks a murder'd warrior view'd :
The arms and vest we knew (oft seen before)
Though now deform'd with dust, and foul with gore.
Then near I drew, the features to survey,
But found the sword had lopt the head away ;
The right hand sever'd ; and the body round
From back to breast was pierc'd with many a wound.
Nor far from thence the empty helm was laid.
Where the white eagle stood with wings display'd.
While someone sought from whom the truth to hear,
We saw a village swain approaching near ;
Who, having spy'd us, fled with sudden fear.
Him, following, soon we seize ; he trembling stands,
And gives a full reply to our demands.
That he, the former day, conceal'd, had view'd
A band of warriors issue from the wood, (shew'd
Whose mien and arms the Christians' likeness
One by the golden locks sustain'd a head,
That newly sever'd seem'd, and freshly bled :
The face appear'd a youth's of semblance fair,
The cheeks unconscious of a manly hair.
Soon o'er the head his scarf the soldier hung,
And at the saddle bow the trophy hung.
This heard, I stripp'd the corpse with pitying tears,
My anxious mind perplex'd with secret fears,
And hither brought these arms, and orders gave
To yield the limbs the honours of a grave :
But if this trunk is what my thoughts declare,
It claims far other pomp, far other care."

Hew Aliprando ceas'd ; the leader heard
His tale with sighs ; he doubted and he fear'd ;
By certain signs he wish'd the corpse to know,
And learn the hand that gave the murderous blow.

Meantime the night, with sable pinions spread,
O'er fields of air her brooding darkness shed ;
And sleep, the soul's relief, the balm of woe,
Lull'd every mortal sense in sweet repose.
Thou, Argillan ! alone with cares oppress,
Revolt'st dire fancies in thy troubled breast !
No quiet pow'r can close thy wakeful eyes,
But from thy couch the downy slumber flies.
This man was bold, of license unconfin'd,
Haughty of speech, and turbulent of mind :

Born on the banks of Trent, his early years
Were nurs'd in troubles and domestic jars ;
Till exit'd thence, he fill'd the hills and strand
With blood, and ravag'd all the neighbouring land ;
When now to war on Asia's plains he came,
And there in battle gain'd a nobler fame.
At length, when morning's dawn began to peep,
He clos'd his eyes, but not in peaceful sleep ;
Alecto o'er him sheds her venom'd breath,
And chains his senses like the hand of death :
In horrid shapes she chills him with affright,
And brings dire visions to his startled sight :
A headless trunk before him seem'd to stand,
All pierc'd with wounds, and lopt the better hand :
'Twas left the pale dimever'd visage bore,
The features grim in death, and soil'd with gore ;
The lips yet seem'd to breathe, and breathing spoke,
Whence, mix'd with sob's, these dreadful accents broke :

" Fly, Argillan ! behold the morning nigh—
Fly these dire tents, the impious leader fly !
Who shall my friends from Godfrey's rage defend,
And all the frauds that wrought my hapless end ?
Even now thy tyrant burns with caper'd hate,
And plans, alas ! like mine, thy threaten'd fate :
Yet if thy soul aspires to fame so high,
And dares so firmly on its strength rely,
'Then fly not hence ; but let thy reeking blade
Glat with his streaming blood my mournful shade !
Lo ! I will present rise your force to arm,
To string each nerve, and every bosom warn."

The vision said. With hellish rage inspir'd,
His furious breast a sudden madness fir'd ;
He starts from sleep ; he gazes wild with fear ;
With wrath and venom fill'd his eyes appear :
Already arm'd, with eager haste he flew,
And round him soon th' Italian warriors drew :
High o'er the brave Rinaldo's arms he stood,
And with these words inflam'd the listening crowd !

" Shall then a savage race, whose barbarous mind
No reason governs, and no laws can bind,
Shall these, insatiate still of wealth and blood,
Lay on our willing necks the servile load ?
Such are the sufferings and th' insulting scorn,
Which seven long years our passive train has borne,
That distant Rome may blush to hear our shame,
And future time reproach th' Italian name :
Why should I here of generous Tancred tell,
When by his gallant arms Cilicia fell ;
How the base Frank by treason seiz'd the land,
And fraud usurp'd the prize which valour gain'd ?
Nor need I tell, when dangerous deeds require
The boldest hands and claim the warrior's fire,
First in the field the flames and sword we bear,
And midst a thousand deaths provoke the war :
The battle o'er, when bloody tumults cease,
And spoils and laurels crown the soldiers' peace ;
In vain our merits equal share may claim :
Theirs are the lands, the triumphs, wealth and
These insults once might well our thoughts engage,
These sufferings justly might demand our rage ;
But now I name those lighter wrongs no more,
This last dire act surpasses all before.
In vain divine and human laws withstand,
Behold Rinaldo murder'd by their hand !
But Heaven's dread thunders seal not yet their doom,

Nor Earth receives them in her opening womb !
Rinaldo have they slain ; the soldiers' boast,
Guard of our faith, and buckler of our host !

And lies he unreveng'd?—No changing skies
All pale, neglected, unreveng'd he lies!
Ask ye whose barbarous sword the deed has wrought?
The dead must open lie to spy the thought.
All know, that, jealous of our growing fame,
Godfrey and Baldwin hate the Latian name.
But wherefore this?—Be Heaven my witness here,
(That Heaven who hears with wrath the perjurd swear)

What time this morn her early beams display'd,
I saw confess'd his wretched wandering shade,
Ah me! too plain his warning voice reveal'd
The snare for us in Godfrey's breast conceal'd.
I saw—'t was not a dream—before my eyes,
Where'er I turn, the phantom seems to rise!
What course for us remains? Shall he, whose hand
Is stain'd with murder, rule our noble band?
Or shall we hence conduct our social train
Where, distant far, Euphrates leaves the plain?
Where, midst a harmless race, in fields of peace,
He glads such numerous towns with large increase.
There may we dwell, and happier fate betide,
Nor shall the Franks with us those realms divide.
Then let us leave, if such the general mind,
These honour'd relics unreveng'd behind!—
But ah! if virtue still may claim a part,
(That frozen seems in every Latian heart)
This hateful pest, whose poisonous rage devours
The grace and glory of th' Italian powers,
Cut off from life, should pay the forfeit due,
A great example to the tyrant-crow!
Then thus I swear—be now your force display'd,
Let each that hears me lend his glorious aid,
This arm to day shall drive th' avenging sword
In that fell breast with every treason stor'd."

In words like these his fiery soul express'd,
With dread commotion fill'd each bearer's breast;
"To arms, to arms!" th' insensate warrior cried;
"To arms, to arms!" each furious youth replied,
Alecto round the torch of discord whirl'd,
And o'er the field her flames infernal burld;
Dissaid and madness rag'd without control,
And th' ruf of slaughter fill'd each vengeful soul.
The growing mischief flew from place to place,
And soon was spread beyond the Italian race:
Among th' Helveticans then it rais'd a flame,
And next diffus'd among the English name.
Nor public sorrow for Rinaldo slain
Aloose to phrensy fir'd the warrior-train,
But former quarrels, now reviv'd, conspire,
And add new fuel to their present fire.
Against the Franks they vent their threats aloud;
No more can reason rule the madd'ning crowd.
So in a brazen vase the boiling stream
Impetuous foams and bubbles to the brim;
Till, swelling o'er the brinks, the frothy tide
Now pours with fury down the vessel's side.
Nor can those few, who still their sense retain,
The folly of the vulgar herd restrain;
Camillus, Tambred, William, thence remov'd,
And every other in command approv'd.
Confus'd and wild th' unthinking soldiers swarm;
Through all the camp they run, they haste to arm.
Already warlike clangours echo round;
Seditious trumpets give the warning sound.
And now a thousand tongues the tidings bear,
And bid the pious chief for arms prepare.
Then Baldwin first in shining steel appear'd,
And stood by Godfrey's side, a faithful guard.
The chief, accus'd, to Heaven directs his eyes,
And on his God with wonted faith relies.

"O Thou, who know'st my soul with zealous care
Shuns the dire horrors of a civil war
From these the veil that dims their sight remove Repress their errors, and their rage reprove;
To thee reveal'd my innocence is known,
O let it now before the world be shown!"

He ceas'd; and felt his soul new firmness prove,
With warmth unusual kindled from above:
A sudden confidence inspir'd his mind,
While on his visage hope embolden'd shin'd.
Then, with his friends, he went, in awful state,
'Gainst those who sought to avenge Rinaldo's fate.
Not loudst clash of arms his course delay'd,
Nor impious threats his steps intrepid stay'd.
His back the cuirass arm'd, a costly vest
The hero wore, in pomp unusual drest;
Bare were his hands, his face reveal'd to sight,
His form majestic beam'd celestial light.
The golden sceptre (ensign of command)
He shook, to still the loud rebellious band:
Such were his arms: while thus the chief appear'd,
Sounds more than mortal from his lips were heard:
"What strange tumultuous clamours fill my ears?
Who dares disturb the peaceful camp with fears?
Thus am I grac'd? Is thus your leader known,
After such various toils and labours shown?
Is there who now with treason blots my name?
Or shall suspicion sully Godfrey's fame?
Ye hope, perchance, to see me humbly bow,
And with base prayers your servile doom attend:
Shall then that earth, which witness'd my renown,
Behold such insults on my glory thrown?
This sceptre be my guard, fair truth my shield,
And all my deeds in council and in field!
But justice shall her ear to mercy lend,
Nor on the offender's head the stroke descend.
Lo! for your merits I your crime forgive,
And bid you for your lov'd Rinaldo live.
Let Argilan alone the victim fall,
And with his blood atone th' offence of all,
Who, urg'd by light suspicion, rais'd th' alarms,
And fir'd your erring bands to rebel arms."

While thus he spoke, his looks with glory beam'd,
And from his eye the flashing lightning stream'd;
Even Argilan himself, surpris'd and quell'd,
With awe the terrors of his face beheld.
The vulgar throng, so late by madness led,
Who pour'd their threats and curses on his head;
Who grasp'd, as rage supply'd, with ready hand,
The sword, the javelin, or the flaming brand;
Soon as they heard his voice, with fear were struck,
No longer durst sustain their sovereign's look;
But tamely, while their arms begirt him round,
Saw Argilan in sudden fetters bound.

So when his shaggy mane a lion shakes,
And with loud roar his slumbering fury wakes;
If chance he view the man, whose soothing art
First tam'd the fierceness of his lofty heart,
His pride consents th' ignoble yoke to wear;
He fears the well-known voice and rule severe:
Vain are his claws, his dreadful teeth are vain,
He yields submissive to his keeper's chain.

'T is said, that, darting from the skies, was seen,
With lowering aspect and terrific mien,
A winged warrior with his guardian shield,
Which fall before the pious chief he held;
While, gleaming lightning, in his dreadful hand
He shook a sword with gory crimson stain'd:
Perchance the blood of towns and kingdoms, given
By frequent crimes to feel the wrath of Heaven.

The tumult thus appear'd, and peace restor'd,
Each warrior sheathes again the wrathful sword.
Now various schemes revolving in his thought,
His test again the careful Godfrey sought:
Resolv'd by storm to assail the city's wall,
Ere thrice the sable shades of evening fall;
And thence he went the timbers beawn to view,
Where towering high to huge machines they grew.

BOOK IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Solyman, incited by Alecto, attacks, with his Arabs, the Christian camp by night, and makes a great slaughter; till Godfrey encouraging his troops, opposes the sudden incursion. In the mean time Argantes and Clorinda march with their forces from the city, and join the Arabs. God sends the angel Michael to drive away the demons that assisted the Pagans. The battle is continued with great fury. Clorinda particularly distinguishes herself. Argilan, at day-break, escaping from his prison, rushes amongst the enemy, and kills many, till he himself falls by the hand of Solyman: the fortune of the day still remains doubtful: at length the Christians, receiving an unexpected aid, the victory declares in their favour: the Pagans are defeated, and Solyman himself is obliged to retreat.

But Hell's dire fiend, who saw the tumult cease,
And every vengeful boom calm'd to peace,
Still unrestrain'd, by Stygian rancour driven,
Oppos'd the laws of Fate and will of Heaven:
She flies, and where she takes her loathsome flight
The fields are parch'd, the Sun withdraws his light:
For new attempts she plies her rapid wings,
And other plagues and other furies brings!
She knew her comrades with industrious care
Had driven the bravest champions from the war;
That Taucrod and Bertoldo's greater son,
Remov'd afar, no more in battle shone.
"Then wherefore this delay?" the fury cries,
"Let Solyman th' unguarded foes surprise;
Fierce on their camp with dread incursion pour,
And crush their forces in the midnight hour."

This said, she flew where Solyman commands
The roving numbers of Arabia's bands;
That Solyman, than whom none fiercer rose
Among the race of Heaven's rebellious foes:
Nor could a greater rise, though teeming Earth,
Again provok'd, had given her giants birth.
O'er Turkey's kingdom late the monarch reign'd,
And then at Nice the imperial seat maintain'd.
Oppos'd to Greece, the nations own'd his sway,
That 'twixt Meander's flood and Sangar lay;
Where Mysians once, and Phrygians held their place,

With Lydia, Pontus, and Bithynia's race.
But, 'gainst the Turks and every faithless crew,
Since foreign states their arms to Asia drew,
His lands were wasted, and he twice beheld
His martial squadrons wasted in the field;
Till, every chance of war essay'd in vain,
Expell'd a wanderer from his native reign,
To Egypt's coast he fled; nor fail'd to meet
A royal welcome and secure retreat.

With joy the king his valiant guest survey'd,
With greater joy success'd his proffer'd aid;

Resolv'd in thought to guard the Syrian lands,
And stop the progress of the Christian bands.
But ere the king would open war declare,
He gives to Solyman th' important care,
With sums of gold to raise th' Arabian bands,
And teach them to obey a chief's commands.
Thus while from Asia and the Moorish reign,
Th' Egyptian monarch calls his numerous train,
To Solyman the greedy Arabs throng,
The lawless sons of violence and wrong.
Elected now their chief, Judea's plains
He scours around, and various plunder gains:
The country wide he wastes, and blocks the way
Between the Larian army and the sea:
And, not forgetful of his ancient hate
And the vast ruins of his falling state,
He mighty vengeance in his breast resolves,
And greater schemes, as yet unform'd, resolves.

To him Alecto comes, but first she wears
A warrior's semblance bent with weight of years;
All wrinkled seem'd her face; her chin was bare;
Her upper lip display'd a tuft of hair;
Thick linen folds her hoary head enclose;
Beneath her knees a length of vesture flows;
The sabre at her side; and stooping low,
Her back the quiver bears, her hand the bow.
Then thus she spoke: "While here our wandering
Rove o'er the desert plains and barren sands; [bands
Where nothing worthy can reward our toils,
Where conquest yields us but ignoble spoils;
See! Godfrey on th' imperial city falls,
He shakes the towers, he saps the lofty walls!
Aid yet we linger (O eternal shame!)
Till there he brings his arms and vengeful flame,
Are cots destroy'd, or sheep and oxen gain'd,
The boasted trophies of the sultan's hand?
Will this thy realm restore, retrieve thy name,
And on the Franks avenge thy injur'd fame?
Then rouse thy soul! against the Christian go,
Now sunk in sleep, and crush the hated foe:
Thy old Araxes speaks, his counsel bear,
In peace or exile faithful to thy ear.
No fear the unsuspecting chief alarms,
He scorns the Arabs and their feeble arms;
Nor deems their timorous bands so far can dare,
In flight and plunder bred, to mix in war:
Haste, with thy courage rouse thy kindling host,
And triumph o'er their camp, in slumber lost."

Thus said the fiend; and, breathing in his mind
Her venom'd rage, dissolves to empty wind.
The warrior lifts his hands, and loud exclaims:
"O thou! whose fury thus my heart inflames;
Whose hidden power a human form belies;
Behold I follow thee, my potent guide:
A mound shall rise, where now appears a plain—
A dreadful mould of Christian heroes slain:
The field shall float with blood: O grant thy aid,
And lead my squadron through the dusky shade."

He said: and instant bids the troops appear;
The weak be heartens, and dispels their fear.
His warlike transports every breast excite;
Eager they burn, and hope the promis'd fight.
Alecto sounds the trumpet; her hand unbinds
The mighty standard to the sportive winds:
Swift march the bands like rapid floods of flame,
And leave behind the tardy wings of fame.

The Fury then resumes her airy flight,
And seems a hasty messenger to sight,
And when the world a dubious light invades,
Between the setting day and rising shades,

She seeks Jerusalem, and, midst a ring
Of timid citizens, accosts the king;
Displays the purpose of the Arabian power,
The signal for th' attack, and fatal hour.

Now had the night her sable curtain spread,
And o'er the earth unwholesome vapours shed:
The ground no cool refreshing moisture knew,
But horrid drops of warm and sanguine dew;
Monsters and prodigies in Heaven were seen;
Dire spectres, shrieking, skim'd along the green:
A deeper gloom exulting Pluto made,
With added terrors from th' infernal shade.

Through this dread darkness tow'rd's the tented
face,

Secure from fear, the fiery sultan goes;
And, when the night had gain'd her middle throne,
From whence with rapid speed she courses down;
He came, where near the Christian army lay,
Forgetful of the cares and toils of day.
Here first the chief refresh'd his troops with food,
Then thus inflam'd their cruel thirst of blood:

"Survey you camp, an impious band of thieves,
That more from fortune than desert receives;
That, like a sea, within its ample breast
Absorbs the shining riches of the East:
The Fates for you these glorious spoils ordain;
(How small the peril, and how vast the gain!)
Your uncontested plunder there behold;
Their glittering arms and coursers deck'd with gold!
Not this the force that could the Persians quell,
By whom the powers of Nice in battle fell.
What numbers from their native country far,
Have fall'n the victims of a tedious war!
Were now their strength the same they once could boast,

Thus sunk in sleep, an unresisting host,
With ease they must resign their forfeit breath;
For short the path that leads from sleep to death!
On then, my friends! this falchion first shall gain
Your entrance to the camp o'er piles of slain.
From mine each sword shall learn to aim the blow;
From mine the stern demands of vengeance know!
This happy day the reign of Christ shall end,
And liberty o'er Asia's climes extend!"

He said; and rous'd their souls to martial deeds:
Then slow and silent on his march proceeds.

Now through the misty shades a gleam of light
Displays the heedful sentry to his sight:
By this his hopes are lost, to seize secure
The cautious leader of the Christian power.
Soon as the watch their numerous foes espy,
They take their flight, and raise a fearful cry:
The nearest guards awake; they catch th' alarm,
And, rousing at the tumult, snatch their arms.

Th' Arabian troops no longer silent pass,
[brass:]
But barbarous clangours pour through breathing
To Heaven's high arch the mingled noise proceeds
Of shouting soldiers and of neighing steeds:
The steepy hills, the hollow vales around,
The winding caverns echo to the sound.
Alecto shakes on high th' infernal brand,
And gives the signal from her lofty stand.

First flies the sultan, and attacks the guard,
As yet confus'd, and ill for fight prepar'd.
Rapid he moves; far less impetuous raves
A tempest bursting from the mountain caves:
A foaming flood, that trees and cots o'erturns;
The lightning's flash, that towers and cities burns;
Earthquakes, that fill'd with horror every age;
Are but a faint resemblance of his rage.

True to his aim the fatal sword descends;
A wound the stroke, and death the wound attends.
Dauntless he bears the storm of hostile blows,
And mocks the falchion of the rushing foe:
His helm resounded as the weapons fell,
And fire flash'd dreadful from the batter'd steel.

Now had his arm compell'd with single might
The foremost squadrons of the Franks to flight:
When, like a flood with numerous rivers swell'd,
The nimble Arabs pour along the field:
The Franks no longer can th' attack sustain;
But backward turn, and fly with loosen'd rein.
Pursuers and pursu'd, with equal haste,
Together mingled, o'er the trenches pass'd:
Then with unbounded wrath the victor storm'd,
And rage, and war, and death the camp deform'd!

A dragon on his casque the sultan wore,
That, stretching, bends his arching neck before;
High on his feet he stands with spreading wings,
And wreathes his forky tail in spiry rings: [shows]
Three brandish'd tongues the sculptur'd monster
He seems to kindle as the combat glows:
His gaping jaws appear to hiss with ire,
And vomit mingled smoke and ruddy fire!

Th' affrighted Christians through the gloomy light
The sultan view'd—so mariners by night,
When ocean's face a driving tempest sweeps,
By flashing flames behold the troubled deeps.
Some by their fears impell'd, for safety fly;
And some, intrepid, on their swords rely:
The night's black shade adds tumult to the press,
And, by concealing, makes their woes increase.

Amongst the chiefs, whose hearts undaunted
Latinus, born by Tiber's yellow flood, [glow'd,
Conspicuous o'er the rest in combat shin'd;
Nor length of years had damp'd his vigorous mind:
Five sons he told; and equal by his side
They mov'd in war, his ornament and pride:
To deeds of early fame their youth he warms,
And sheathes their tender limbs in ponderous arms.
These, while they strive to emulate their sire,
And glut with blood their steel and vengeful ire,
The chief bespeaks: "Now prove your valiant hands
Where you proud foe insults our shrinking hands;
Nor let the bloody samples of his force
Abate your ardour, or retain your course:
For, O my sons! the noble mind disdains
All praise but that which glorious danger gains!"

So leads the savage lioness her young,
Ere yet their necks with shaggy manes are hung;
When scarce their paws are sharpen'd nails disclose,
Nor teeth have arm'd their mouths in dreadful rows:
She brings them fearless to the dangerous chase,
And points their fury on the hunters' race;
That oft were wont to pierce their native wood,
And oft in flight the weaker prey pursu'd.

Now with the daring band the father goes;
These six assail, and Solyman enclose.
At once, directed by one heart and mind,
Six mighty spears against the chief comba'd:
But ah! too bold! (his javelin cast aside)
The eldest-born a closer conflict try'd;
And with his falchion vainly aim'd a blow
To slay the bounding courser of the foe.
But as a rock, whose foot the ocean waves,
Exalts its stately front above the waves,
Firm in itself, the wind and sea defies,
Nor fears the threats and thunder of the skies:
The fiery sultan thus unmov'd appears
Amidst the threatening swords and missile spears.

Furious he turns on him who struck the steed,
 And 'twixt the cheeks and eyebrows parts his head.
 Swift Aramantes hastes to his relief,
 And in his pious arms supports the chief:
 Vain, unavailing piety is shown,
 That to his brother's ruin adds his own!
 Full on his arm the Pagan drove the steel:
 Down the supported and supporter fell;
 Together fainting in the pangs of death,
 They mix their streaming blood and parting breath.
 Then with a stroke he cuts Sabinnus' spear,
 With which the youth had gall'd him from afar;
 And rushing on the steed with sudden force,
 Th' ill-fated stripling fell beneath his horse.
 Now trampled on the ground the warrior lies.
 The mournful spirit from its mansion flies;
 Unwilling leaves the light of life behind,
 And blooming youth with early pleasures join'd!

But Picus and Lauretes still remain'd;
 (The sole survivors of the filial band.)
 One day first gave this hapless pair to light,
 Whose likeness oft deceiv'd their parent's sight:
 But these no more with doubt their friends survey'd;
 A dire distinction hostile fury made:
 From this, the head divided rolls in dust;
 That, in his panting breast receives the thrust.

The wretched father (father now no more!
 His sons all slaughter'd in one dreadful hour!)
 View'd, in his offspring breathless on the place,
 His fate approaching, and his ruin'd race! [give,
 What power, O Muse! such strength in age could
 That midst these woes he still endures to live,
 Still lives and fights? Perchance the friendly night
 Conceal'd the horrors from a father's sight.
 Wild through the ranks his raging course he breaks,
 With equal ardour death or conquest seeks:
 Scarce knows he which his wishes would attain,
 To slaughter others, or himself be slain.

Then, rushing on the foe, aloud he cries:
 "Dost thou so far this feeble band despise,
 Not all its force can urge thy cruel rage
 To cope with wasting grief and wretched age?"
 He ceas'd; and, ceasing, aim'd a dreadful stroke,
 Through steel and jointed mail the falchion broke:
 The weapon pierc'd the unwary Pagan's side,
 And streaming blood his shining armour dy'd.
 Rous'd at the call and wound, at once he turns
 With brandish'd steel; more fell his fury burns:
 First through his shield he drives, which, seven times
 roll'd,

A tough bull-hide secur'd with winding fold;
 A passage next the corselet's plates afford;
 Then, in his bowels plung'd, he sheaths the sword.
 Unblest Latinus sobs, and, staggering round,
 Alternate from his mouth and gaping wound
 A purple vomit flows, and stains the ground.
 As falls a mountain oak, that ages past
 Has borne the western wind and northern blast,
 When, rooted from the place where once it stood,
 It crushes in its fall the neighbouring wood;
 So sunk the chief, and more than once he drew
 To grace his fate, and even in dying slew;
 Glorious he fell, and in his latest breath
 With dreadful ruin scatter'd fear and death.

While thus his inward hate the soldier fed,
 And glott'd his revenge with bills of dead;
 The Arabs pour impetuous o'er the field,
 The fainting Christians to their fury yield.
 Then English Henry, Hothiferous, slain
 By thee, O fierce Dragutes! press'd the plain.

Gilbert with Philip, Ariadenus slew,
 Who on the banks of Rhine their being drew.
 Beneath Albasar's mace Ernesto fell,
 And Engerlan by Algazelles' steel.

But who the various kinds of death can name,
 And multitudes that sunk unknown to fame?
 Meantime the tumults Godfrey's slumber broke;
 Alarm'd he started, and his couch forsook:
 Now clad in arms, he call'd a band with speed,
 And forth he mov'd intrepid at their head.
 But nearer soon th' increasing clamours drew,
 And all the tumult open'd to the view.
 He knew the Arabs scou'd the country far,
 Yet never deem'd their insolence would dare
 To storm his trenches with offensive war.

Thus while he marches from the adverse side,
 "To arms! to arms!" a thousand voices cried:
 At once a barbarous shout was rais'd on high,
 And dreadful howlings ocho'd to the sky.
 These were the troops of Aladine, who came
 Led by Argantes and the warrior-dame¹.

To noble Guelpho, who his station took
 The next in arms, the Christian leader spoke:
 "Hark! what new din of battle, labouring on,
 Swells from the hills, and thickens from the town?
 This claims thy courage, this thy skill demands,
 To meet the onset of th' approaching bands.
 Go then, yon quarter from their rage secure:
 But first divide with me my martial power;
 Myself will on a different band engage
 The daring foe, and check their impious rage."

This having said, the chiefs divide their force,
 And take, with equal cares, a varied course:
 Guelpho to reach the hill; while Godfrey drew
 To where, restless, rag'd th' Arabian crew:
 While as he march'd the distant fight to gain,
 Supplies were added to his eager train;
 Till now a powerful numerous band he led,
 And saw where Solyman the slaughter spread.
 So where the Po first leaves his native hills,
 His river scarce the scanty channel fills;
 But as new streams he gathers in his course,
 He swells his waves, and rises in his force;
 Above the banks his horned front he shows,
 And o'er the level meads triumphant flows;
 Through many currents makes his rapid way,
 And carries war, not tribute, to the sea.

Where Godfrey sees his timorous bands retreat,
 He thus upbraids them with a generous heat:
 "What fear is this; and whither bends your pace?
 O turn and view the foes that give you chase!
 A base degenerate throng, that neither know
 To give, nor take, in fight a manly blow:
 O turn again! your trusty weapons rear;
 Your looks will freeze their coward souls with fear."

This said, he spur'd his steed, and eager flew
 Where murderous Solyman appear'd in view.
 Through streaming blood and clouds of dust he goes,
 Through wounds and death amidst surrounding foes;
 Through breaking ranks his furious course he guides,
 And the close phalanx with his sword divides:
 No foes, on either hand, the shock sustain;
 Arms, steeds, and warriors tumble to the plain:
 High o'er the slaughter'd heaps, with bounding course,

The glorious leader drives his foaming horse.
 Th' intrepid soldier sees the storm from far,
 Nor turns aside, nor shuns the proffer'd war;

¹ Clorinda.

But, eager for the strife, his foe defies,
Whirls his broad sword and to the combat flies.
In these what matchless warriors Fortune sends
To prove their force from Earth's remotest ends!
With virtue fury now the conflict tries
In little space, the Asian world the prize!
What tongue the horrors of the fight can tell,
How gleam'd their falchions, and how swift they fell!

I pass the dreadful deeds their arms display'd,
Which envious night conceal'd in gloomy shade;
Deeds that might claim the Sun and cheerful skies
And all the world to view with wondering eyes!
Their courage soon the Christian bands renew,
And their brave leader's daring course pursue:
Their choicest warriors Solyma enclose,
And round him thick the steely circle grow.
Not less the Faithful than the Pagan band
With streaming blood stain the thirsty land;
By turns the victors and the vanquish'd mourn,
And wound for wound, and death for death return.
As when, with equal force, and equal rage,
The north and south in mighty strife engage;
Nor this, nor that, can rule the seas or skies,
But clouds on clouds and waves on waves arise;
So far'd the battle in the doubtful field,
Nor here nor there the firm battalions yield;
With horrid clangour swords to swords oppos'd,
Shields clash'd with shields, with helmets helmets
clash'd.

No less in other parts the battle rag'd,
Nor less the throng of warring chiefs engag'd;
High o'er the horns the Stygian floods repair,
And Hell's black myriads fill the fields of air.
These vigour to the Pagan troops supply;
None harbour fear, or turn their steps to fly:
The torch of Hell Argantes' soul inspires,
And adds new fury to his native fires!
He scatters soon in flight the guards around,
And leaps the trenches with an eager bound;
With mangled limbs he strows the sanguine plain,
And fills th' opposing fosse with heaps of slain.
Him o'er the level space his troops pursue,
And dye the foremost tents with purple hue.
Close at his side appears the martial dame,
Whose soul disdains the second place in fame.
Now fled the Franks; when sudden flew at hand
The noble Guelpho with his welcome band:
He stopp'd with generous zeal their fearful course,
And turn'd them back to face the Pagan force.

While thus on either side the combat stood,
And streaming gore in equal rivers flow'd,
The Heavenly Monarch from his awful height
Declin'd his eyes, and view'd the dreadful fight.
There, plac'd aloft, presides th' Omnipotent Cause,
And orders all with just and equal laws,
Above the confines of this earthly scene;
By ways unsearchable to mortal men.
There, on eternity's unbounded throne,
With triple light he blazes, Three in One!
Beneath his footstep Fate and Nature stand;
And Time and Motion wait his dread command.
There power and riches no distinction find;
Nor the frail honours that allure mankind:
Like dust and smoke they fleet before his eyes;
He mocks the valiant, and confounds the wise!
There from the blaze of his effulgent light
The purer saints withdraw their dazzled sight,
Around th' unnumbered blest for ever live,
And, though unequal, equal bliss receive:

The tuneless choirs repeat their Maker's praise:
The heavenly realms resound the sacred lays.

Then thus to Michael spoke the Word Divine;
(Michael, whose arms with lucid d'mond shine,
"See'st thou not yonder * from th' infernal coast
What impious bands distress my favour'd host?
Go—bid them swift forsake the deathful scene,
And leave the business of the war to men;
No longer dare amongst the living rise,
To blot the lustre of the purer skies:
But seek the shades of Acheron beneath,
Th' allotted realms of punishment and death!
There on the souls accur'd employ their hate;
Thus have I will'd; and what I will is fate."

He ceas'd. With reverence at the high command
Low bow'd the leader of the winged band:
His golden pinions he displays, and speeds
With rapid flight, that mortal thought exceeds.
The fiery region past; the seats of rest
He leaves; (eternal mansions of the blest!)
From thence he passes through the crystal sphere
That whirrs around with every shining star;
Thence to the left, before his piercing eyes,
With different aspects, Jove and Saturn rise;
And every star that mortals wandering call,
Though God's high power alike directs them all.
Then from the fields that flame with endless day,
To where the storms are bred, he bends his way;
Where elements in mix'd confusion jar,
And order springs from universal war.
The bright archangel gilds the face of night,
His heavenly features dart resplendent light:
So shines the beamy Sun through showery skies,
And paints the fleecy clouds with various dyes:
So through the liquid regions of the air,
With rapid radiance, shoots a falling star.
But now arriv'd where Hell's infernal crew
Their venom'd rage amongst the Pagans threw,
Hovering in air, on pinions strong he stay'd,
And shook his lance, and awful thus he said:

"Your force has prov'd the Sovereign of the World,

What thunders from his dreadful hand are hurl'd:
O blind in ill! that no remorse can know,
In torture proud, and obstinate in woe!
The sacred cross shall conquer Sion's wall;
Her gates must open, and her bulwarks fall:
And who shall Fate's resistless will withstand,
Or dare the terrors of th' Almighty hand?
Hence then, ye curs'd! to your realms beneath,
The realms of torment and eternal death!
There on devoted souls employ your rage;
Be there your triumphs, there the wars ye wage,
There, midst the sounding whips, the din of chains,
And gnashing teeth, laments, and endless pains!"
He said; and those that lingering seem'd to move,
Resistless with his fatal lance he drove.
With sighs, reluctant, from the field they fly,
And leave the golden stars and upper sky,
And spread their pinions to the realms of woe,
To wreak their fury on the damn'd below.

* Very similar to this, is the address of God to Raphael on seeing Satan's entrance into Paradise:
"Raphael," said he, "h'ou hear'st what stir on Earth
Satan from Hell, 'scap'd through the darkness
gulph,
Hath rais'd in Paradise——"

Parad. Lost, b. v. ver. 994.

Not o'er the seas in equal numbers fly
The feather'd race, to seek a warmer sky:
Not, when the wood the wintry blast receives,
In equal number Autumn strows her leaves.
Freed from th' infernal train³ and Stygian glooms,
Serene the night her wanted face resumes.

But not the less Argantes' fury glows,
Though Hell no more her venom'd fire bestows;
He whirls his sword with unresisted rage,
Where, closely prest, the Christian bands engage:
The high and low his equal prowess feel;
The bravest warriors sink beneath his steel.
Alike the carnage fierce Clorinda spread,
And strow'd the field with heaps of mangled dead.
Through Berlinger the fatal sword she guides,
And rives his heart where panting life resides;
The pointed steel its furious passage tore.
And issu'd at his back besour'd with gore.
Albino she wounds, where first the child receives
His food; and Gallus' head asunder cleaves.
Then Gernier's better hand, that aim'd a blow,
She sends divided to the plain below;
Yet still the parted nerves some life retain,
The trembling fingers still the falchion strain:
Discover'd thus a serpent's tail is seen
To seek the part divided on the green.
The foe thus maim'd, the dame no longer stay'd,
But 'gainst Achilles ran with treachant blade:
Between the neck and nape the weapon flew;
The neck it cleft, and cut the nerves in two:
First tumbled on the plain the parted head,
With dust obscure the pallid face was spread;
While in the saddle by the steed sustain'd,
(Dreadful to view!) the headless trunk remain'd;
But soon th' ungraven'd courier with a bound
Shook the sad burthen to th' emanguin'd ground.
While thus th' unconquer'd maid such numbers
slew,

And the thick squadrons of the West o'erthrew;
No less Gildippe fair the slaughter led,
And on the Sarcens her fury fed.
The same her sex, her daughter's mind the same,
And equal valour shone in either dame.
But these to meet in battle fate with-stands;
Both doom'd to prove the force of greater hands.
Now this, now that essay to pierce the tide,
In vain; the throng of troops the pass deny'd.
The noble Guelpho's sword Clorinda found,
And in her tender side impress'd a wound,
That ting'd the steel: the maid, on vengeance bent,
Betwixt his ribs her cruel answer sent.
Guelpho his stroke renew'd, but miss'd the foe;
Osnida, as he pass'd, receiv'd the blow:—
Deep in his front the deadly steel he found,
And perish'd by another's destin'd wound.
The numerous troops by Guelpho led enclose
Their valiant chief; whose thick the tumult grows;
While various bands from distant parts unite,
And swell the fury of the mingled fight.
Aurora now, in radiant purple drest,
Shone from the portals of the golden east:
When, midst the horrid clang and mingled cries,
Intrepid Argillan from prison flies:

³ So Milton, when the rebellious spirits are driven out of Heaven:

Disburthen'd Heaven rejoic'd—
Parad. Lost. b. vi. ver. 876.

The readiest arms he snatch'd with eager haste,
And soon his limbs in shining steel were cast:
Eager he comes, to efface his former shame
With glorious actions in the field of fame.
As when, to battle bred, the courser, freed
From plenteous stalls, regains the wooded wood,
There unrestrain'd amid the herds he roves,
Barbs in the stream, and wantons in the groves;
His mane dishevell'd o'er his shoulders spread,
He shakes his neck, and bears aloft his head:
His nostrils flame, his horny hoofs resound,
And his loud neighing fills the valleys round:
So Argillan appears; so fierce he shows,
While in his looks undaunted courage glows:
He bounds with headlong speed the war to meet,
And scarcely prints the dust beneath his feet:
When, midst the foes arriv'd, aloud he cries,
As one whose fury all their force defies—
“Refuse of Earth! ye vile Arabian bands!
What boldness now impels your coward hands?
Your limbs unus'd the arms of men to wield,
To bear the helmet, or sustain the shield;
Naked ye come, and fearful to the fight,
Chance guides your blows, your safety lies in sight:

Nocturnal deeds are all your power can boast,
When friendly night assists your trembling host:
What now remains? The beams of day require
The warrior's weapons and the warrior's fire.”

Raging he said; and, rushing as he spoke,
At Argillan aim'd a mortal stroke;
His jaws he cleft, and stopp'd his ready tongue,
While on his lips imperfect accents hung:
A sudden darkness shades his swimming eyes;
Through every vein a chilling tremour dies;
Headlong he falls, and breathes his latest breath,
And bites the hated soil in pangs of death.
With fury next on Saladine he flew,
And Agricalles and Melasces slew:
Then Aldiazelles' side his falchion found,
And cleft him through with one continu'd wound:
Through Ariadennus' breast the steel he guides,
And the fall'n chief with bitter taunts derides;
The dying warrior lifts his languid eyes,
And to th' insulting victor thus replies:

“Not thou, whose'er thou art, with vaunting breath

Shalt long enjoy the triumph of my death:
Like fate attends thee; by a mightier hand
Thou too must fall, and press with me the sand.”

Then Argillan, severely smiling, cried:
“Let Heaven's high will my future fate decide;
Die thou! to ravenous dogs and fowls a prey.”—
Then with his foot he press'd him as he lay,
And rent at once the steel and life away.

Meanwhile a stripping of the soidan's train
Mix'd in the shock of arms and fighting men:
On his fair cheeks the flower of youth was seen,
Nor yet the down had fledg'd his tender chin:
The sweat that trickled o'er his blooming face,
Like orient pearls, improv'd the blushing grace:
The dust gave beauty to his flowing hair,
And wrath was pleading in a form so fair.
He rode a courser white as new-fall'n snow
On hoary Apennine's aspiring brow:
Nor winds nor flames his swiftness could exceed,
Practic'd to turn, and matchless in his speed:
Grasp'd in the midst, the youth a javelin bore;
A crooked sabre at his side he wore:

With barbarous pomp (resplendent to behold!)
He shone in purple vestments wrought with gold.

While thus the boy, (whom martial fires inflame, Pleas'd with the din of arms, and new to fame)
Now here, now there, o'erthrew the warring band,
And met with none his fury to withstand;
Fierce Argillan, advancing, near him drew,
Then with a sudden stroke his steed he slew,
And on the tender foe impetuous flew.
In vain with moving prayers he sues for grace,
In vain he begs with supplicating face;
The sword is rais'd against the blooming boy,
The fairest work of Nature to destroy:
Yet pity seem'd to touch the senseless steel;
The edge turn'd, harmless, as the weapon fell:
But what avail'd it? when the cruel foe,
With the sharp point, retriev'd his erring blow.

Fierce Solyman, who, thence not distant far,
By Godfrey press'd, maintain'd a doubtful war;
Soon as his favourite's dangerous state he spies,
Forsakes the fight, and to his rescue flies:
Now with his thundering sword the ways are freed:
He comes to avenge, but not prevent the deed.
He sees, alas! his dear Leebinus slain,
Like a young flower that withers on the plain.
His dying eyes a trembling lustre shed;
On his fair neck declin'd his drooping head;
His languid face in mortal paleness charm'd,
And every breast to soft compassion warm'd:
Untouch'd before, now melts the marble heart,
And, midst his wrath, the gushing sorrows start.
And weep'st thou, Solyman! at pity's call,
Who, tearless, saw thy mighty kingdom's fall?
But when his eyes the hostile weapon view'd,
Still warm and reeking with the stripling's blood,
Th' indignant fury boiling in his breast,
While his pity and his tears suppress'd:
On Argillan the rapid steel he drives,
At once th' opposing shield and helmet rives,
And cleaves his head beneath the weighty blow:
A wound well worthy of so great a foe!
His wrath still unappeas'd, he quits his steed,
And wreaks his vengeance on the senseless dead.
So with the stone, that gall'd him from afar,
The mastiff wages unavailing war.

O! vain attempt his sorrows to allay,
By rage insensate on the breathless clay!
Meantime the leader of the Christian train
Nor spends his anger nor his blows in vain.
A thousand Turks against him held the field.
Arm'd with the jointed mail, the helm, and shield:
Their limbs robust to hardy toils were bred;
And, skill'd in fight, their souls no danger dread.
These off with Solyman in battle stood,
And midst the deserts late his steps pursu'd;
In Araby partook his wandering state,
The faithful partners of his adverse fate:
These, close collected in one daring band,
The pressing valour of the Franks withstand.
Here noble Godfrey well his falchion ply'd,
And pierc'd Corcutes' brow, Rosteno's side;
Then from the shoulders sever'd Selim's head,
And lopp'd Rosano's arms with trenchant blade.
Nor these alone, but numbers more he kill'd,
And mangled trunks and limbs bestrow'd the field.

While thus he fought against the Turkish band,
And with intrepid force their rage sustain'd;
While Fortune still with equal pinions flew,
Nor hopes of conquest left the Pagan crew;

Behold a cloud of rising dust appear,
Teeming with threatening arms, and big with war;
And hence a sudden flash of armour bright
Fill'd all the Pagan host with panic fright.
Of purple hue there fifty warriors held
A cross triumphant in an argent field.
Had I a hundred mouths, a hundred tongues,
A voice of iron breath'd from iron lungs,
I could not all the Pagan numbers tell
That by this troop's impetuous onset fell:
The fearful Arab sinks; the Turk in vain
Resists the storm, and fights but to be slain.
Around the field in various forms appear,
Rage, Horror, Cruelty, and abject Fear;
On every side, exulting, Death is found,
And purple torrents deluge all the ground.

Now with a squadron, issuing from the gate,
(Unconscious of the Pagan's woeful state)
King Aladine appear'd, and from his height
Beheld the subject plain and doubtful fight:
Full soon his eyes the scene of slaughter meet,
And straight he gives command to sound retreat;
And off the monarch calls, but calls in vain,
Florida and Argantes from the plain:
The furious couple still reject his prayer,
With carnage drunk, insatiable of war!
At length they yield: yet every means they tried
Their troops in order from the field to guide.
But who with laws can dastard souls restrain?
The rout is general 'mongst th' affrighted train:
This casts aside his shield, and that his sword;
These useless burthens no defence afford.
A vale between the camp and city lies,
Stretch'd from the western to the southern skies;
There fled the timorous bands, with many a groan,
And clouds of dust roll'd onward to the town.
The Christian powers pursue their eager chase,
With dreadful slaughter of the Pagan race:
But when, ascending, near the walls they drew,
Where, with his aid, the king appear'd in view,
His victor-force the cautious Guelpho stay'd,
Nor would the dangerous rocky height invade:
While Aladine collects his men with care,
The scatter'd remnants of successful war.

The soldan's waning strength can now no more,
(The utmost stretch essay'd of human power)
His breath in shorter pantings comes and goes,
And blood with sweat from every member flows:
His arm grows weak beneath the weighty shield,
His weary hand can scarce the falchion wield;
Feebly he strikes, and scarce can reach the foe,
While the blunt weapon aims a fruitless blow.
And now he paus'd awhile, immers'd in thought,
A labouring doubt within his bosom wrought;
If by his own illustrious hand to bleed,
Nor leave the foes the glory of the deed;
Or if, survivor in the fatal strife,
To quit the field, and save his threaten'd life.
"Fate have subdu'd," at length the leader cried,
"My shame shall swell the haughty victor's
pride:

Again th' insulting foe my flight shall view,
Again my exile with their scores pursue;
But soon behold me turn in arms again,
To blast their peace, and shake their tottering reign.
Nor yield I now—my rage shall burn the same;
Eternal wrongs eternal vengeance claim:
Still will I rise a more inveterate foe,
And, dead, pursue them from the shades below!

BOOK X.

THE ARGUMENT.

Solyman, in his journey to Gaza, is accosted by Ismeno, who persuades him to return; and conveys him in an enchanted chariot to Jerusalem. The magician conducts the sultan through a subterraneous cave into the city, and brings him to the council-hall, where he stands, concealed in a cloud, and hears the debates. The speeches of Argantes and Orcaea. Solyman at last discovers himself, and is received with the greatest joy by the king. In the mean time it is known to Godfrey, that the warriors who came to his assistance were those who had followed Armida. One of them relates to the general their adventures. Peter foretells the return and future glory of Rinaldo.

While thus the sultan spoke, a steed he spy'd,
That wander'd near, unburthen'd of his guide;
Then instant, spent with toil and faint with heat,
He seiz'd the reins and press'd the welcome seat:
Fall'n is his crest, that late so dreadful rose,
His helm, disgrac'd, no more its splendour shows;
His regal vesture strows the dusty plains,
And not a trace of all his pomp remains!

As, from the nightly fold, the wolf pursu'd,
Flies to the shelter of the friendly wood;
Though fill'd with carnage, still he thirsts for more,
And licks his ravenous jaws impure with gore:
So fled the sultan, from the field compell'd,
Still bent on slaughter, still his rage unquell'd:
Safe from surrounding spears he took his flight,
And all the deathful weapons of the fight:
Alone, unseen, the warrior journey'd on,
Through solitary paths, and ways unknown:
His future course revolving in his mind;
Now here, now there, his doubtful thoughts inclin'd.
At length he fix'd to seek the friendly coast
Where Egypt's king collects his powerful host,
And join with him his fortune in the field,
To prove what arms another day would yield.
And, thus resolv'd, the well-known course he bore
That led to ancient Gaza's sandy shore.
Though now his weary limbs require repose,
And every wound with keener anguish bows;
Yet all the day he lies with eager haste,
Nor left his courser, nor his mail unbrac'd.
But when the dusky gloom perplex'd the sight,
And objects lost their colour by the night,
He swath'd his wounds; a palm-tree near him stood,
From this he shook the fruit (his homely food!)
His hunger thus appeas'd, the ground he press'd,
And sought to ease his limbs with needful rest:
On his hard shield his pensive head reclin'd,
He strove to calm the tumult of his mind.
Dread and grief his heart alternate rend,
And like two vultures in his breast contend.
At length when night had gain'd her midmost

way,
And all the world in peaceful silence lay,
O'ercome with labour, sleep his eyes oppress,
And steep'd his troubles in Lethæan rest.
While thus on earth he lay, a voice severe,
With these upbraids, thunder'd in his ear:
"O Solyman! regardless chief, awake!
In happier hours thy grateful slumber take.

Beneath a foreign yoke thy subjects bend,
And strangers o'er thy land their rule extend,
Here dost thou sleep? here close thy careless eyes,
While unstart'd each lov'd associate lies?
Here, where thy fame has felt the hostile score,
Canst thou, unthinking, wait the rising morn'?"

The sultan wak'd; then rais'd his sight, and view'd

A sire, of reverend mien, who near him stood:
Feeble he seem'd with age, his steps to guide
A friendly staff its useful aid supply'd. [cries,
"Say, what art thou, who dar'st," the monarch
"Dispel soft slumber from the traveller's eyes?
What part canst thou in all our glory claim,
And what to thee our vengeance or our shame?"

"In me behold a friend," the stranger said,
"To whom in part thy purpose stands display'd:
And here I proffer, with auxiliary care,
In all thy labours and designs to share.
Pardon my zeal; reproaches oft inspire
The noble mind, and raise the hero's fire.
Thou seek'st th' Egyptian king—such thoughts restrain,

Nor tempt a long and toilsome tract in vain;
Even now the monarch calls his numerous bands,
And moves his camp to assist Judæa's lands.
Think not thy worth at Gaza can be shown,
That 'gainst our foes thy force can there be known;
But follow where I lead, and, safe from harms,
Within yon wall, begirt by Latian arms,
To place thee, even at noon of day, I swear,
Without the brandish'd sword or lifted spear.
New toils, new dangers, there thy arms attend;
There shall thy force the town besieg'd defend,
Till Egypt's host, arriv'd, their succour yield,
And call thy courage to a nobler field."

Thus while he spoke, the listening Turk, amaz'd,
Full on the hoary sire in silence gaz'd:
His haughty looks no more their fierceness boast,
And all his anger is in wonder lost.

Then thus: "O father! ready to obey,
Behold I follow where thou point'st the way:
But ever best that counsel shall I prize,
Where most of toil, where most of danger lies."

The sire his words approv'd; then search'd, with care,

Each recent wound, annoy'd by chilling air;
With powerful juice instill'd, his strength renew'd,
And eas'd the pain, and stanch'd the flowing blood.

Aurora now her rosy wreaths displays,
And Phœbus gilds them with his orient rays.
"Time calls," he cries, "the Sun directs our way,
That summons mortals to the toils of day."
Then to a car, that near him ready stood,
He pass'd; the chief of Nice his steps pursu'd:
They mount the seat; the stranger takes the reins,
Before the lash the coursers occur the plains;
They foam, they neigh, their smoking nostrils blow,
And the champ'd bits are white with frothy snow.
Then (strange to tell) the air, condens'd in clouds,
With thickest veil the rolling chariot shrouds;
Yet not a mortal sight the mist espy'd,
Nor could an engine's force the cloud divide;
While from its secret womb, with piercing eyes,
They view'd around the plains, the hills, and skies,
Struck with the sight, his brows the sultan rais'd,
And steadfast on the cloud and chariot gaz'd;
While on their course with ceaseless speed they few:

Well by his looks the sire his wonder knew;

And, calling on his name, the chief he shook ;
 When, rousing from his trance, the warrior spoke :
 " O thou! whoe'er thou art, whose wondrous
 Can force the laws of Nature to thy will ; [skill
 Who, at thy pleasure, view'st with searching eyes
 The human breast, where every secret lies :
 If yet thy knowledge (which so far transcends
 All human thought) to future time extends ;
 O say! what rest or woe is doom'd by Fate
 To all the toils of Asia's broken state?
 But first declare thy name ; what hidden art
 Can power to work such miracles impart ?
 This wild amazement from my soul remove,
 Or vain will all thy future speeches prove."

To whom, with smiles, the ancient sire replied :

" In part thy wishes may be satisfied :
 Behold Ismeno! (no ignoble name)
 In magic lore all Syria owns my fame.
 But that my tongue should distant times relate,
 And trace the annals of mysterious fate,
 A greater power denies ; thy thoughts exceed
 The narrow bounds to mortal man decreed.
 Let each his valour and his wisdom show,
 To stem the tide of human ills below ;
 For oft 'tis seen, that with the brave and wise,
 The power to make their prosperous fortune lies,
 Thy conquering arms may prove a happier field ;
 Thy force may teach the boastful Franks to yield :
 Think not alone the city to defend,
 On which the Latian foes their fury bend ;
 Confide! be bold! for fire and sword prepare ;
 A happy issue still may crown the war.
 Yet to my words attend, while I recite
 What, as through clouds, I view with doubtful light.

I see, or seem to see, ere many a year
 Th' eternal planet gird the rolling sphere,
 A chief¹ whose rule shall fertile Egypt bless,
 Whose mighty actions Asia shall confess.
 Let this suffice ; not only in the field,
 Beneath his force the Christian powers shall yield ;
 But from their race his arms shall rend the sway,
 And all their state usurp'd in ruin lay :
 Till fenc'd by seas, within a narrow land
 Groan the sad relics² of the wretched band,
 He from thy blood shall spring."—Ismeno said :
 And thus the king his generous answer made ;
 (His bosom kindling at the hero's fame)

" O happy chief! whose deeds such glory claim !
 For me, let good or ill my life betide,
 And fortune, as prescrib'd above, provide:
 No power shall e'er my vigorous mind control,
 Or bend th' unconquer'd temper of my soul :
 First shall the Moon and stars their course forsake,
 Ere I my foot remove from glory's track."
 He said ; and, while he spoke, with martial ire
 His eyeballs flash'd, his visage seem'd on fire.

Thus commun'd they, till near the chariot drew
 To where the Christian tents appear'd in view.

A scene of carnage here their eyes survey'd,
 Where death appear'd in various forms display'd.
 Touch'd at the sight, the soldier's tears o'erflow,
 And all his face is spread with generous woe ;
 He sees, inflam'd with anger and disdain,
 His mighty standards scatter'd on the plain :
 He sees the Franks exulting o'er the dead,
 And on his dearest friends in triumph tread :
 While from the breathless corse the arms they tear,
 And from the field the glorious trophies bear.
 There some he views, whose funeral care attends
 Th' unbury'd relics of their Christian friends :
 And others here prepare the blazing pyre,
 Where Turks and Arabs feed one common fire.

Deeply he sigh'd, add straight his falchion drew,
 And from the lofty car impetuous flew :
 But soon Ismeno check'd his eager haste,
 And in the seat again the warrior plac'd ;
 Then sought the hill, while, distant on the plain,
 Behind their courage the Christian tents remain.

Then from the car they 'light (at once from view, Dissolv'd in air, the wondrous car withdrew)
 Still with the cloud inshrin'd, on foot they fare,
 And down the mountain to the vale repair ;
 Where Zion's hill, that here begins to rise,
 Jarius its broad back against the western skies,
 Th' enchanter stay'd ; and now, advancing nigh,
 Explor'd the steepy side with heedful eye :
 A hollow cavern open'd, in the stone,
 A darksome pass, in former ages known,
 But now with weeds and brambles overgrown:
 Through this the sorcerer soon the passage try'd,
 And held his better hand the prince to guide.

Then thus the souldan: " Through what dark-

some way
 Must here my steps by stealth inglorious stray ?
 O rather grant that, with this trusty blade,
 Through scatter'd foes a nobler path be made !"
 " Let not thy feet disdain," Ismeno said,
 " To tread the path which Herod wont to tread,
 Whose fame in arms o'er many regions spread.
 This monarch first the hollow cavern fram'd,
 What time his subjects to the yoke he tam'd :
 By this he could with ease the tower ascend,
 (Then call'd Antonia³ from his dearest friend)
 Thence with his troops could leave the town un-
 Or there re-enter with supplies of men. [seen,
 But now to me reveal'd, to me alone
 Of all mankind, this secret path is known.
 This way shall lead us to the regal seat,
 Where now the wise and brave in synod meet,
 Call'd by the anxious king to high debate,
 Who fears perhaps too far the frowns of Fate :
 Awhile in silence all their counsels bear,
 Till, breaking on their sight, thou shalt appear,
 And pour thy speech in every wondering ear."

He said, and ceas'd ; no more the warrior stay'd,
 But enter'd with his guide the gloomy shade ;
 Darkling they went through paths conceal'd from view,

And, as they pass'd, the cavern wider grew.
 Ismeno now unfolds a secret door ;
 They mount by steps long-time disus'd before :
 Here through a narrow vent, from upper day,
 Appears the glimmering of a doubtful ray.
 Now from the seats of night their course they bend,
 And sudden to a stately hall ascend ;

¹ He means Saladin, for his valour made souldan of Egypt, who took Jerusalem from the Christians, after they had been eighty years in possession of it, and had there established a seat of kingly government.

² The poet is here thought to mean Cyprus, which was given by Lusignan to Enrico count of Campagna, and which continued in possession of some of the Christians after the establishment of Saladin in the holy land.

³ Josephus relates that Herod gave this name to the tower from Marc Antony the triumvir.

Where, with his sceptre, crown'd in awful state,
Amidst his mournful court the mournful monarch sate.

The haughty Turk, within the cloud conceal'd,
In silence stood, and all that pass'd beheld;
Then heard the monarch in an awful tone
Address the senate from his lofty throne:

"O faithful peers! behold the turn of fate!
The last dire day how deadly to our state!
From every former hope of conquest thrown,
Our safety rests on Egypt's powers alone;
But these must join us from a distant land,
When present dangers present aid demand.
For this I bade you here the council hold,
And each the purport of his thoughts unfold."

He ceas'd: and soon a murmuring sound ensu'd,
Like zephyrs softly whispering through the wood:
Till, rising from his seat, with noble pride and fearless speech, Argantes thus replied:

"What words are these to damp the martial fire!
No aid from us thy wisdom can require.
O! in ourselves our hopes alone must rest,
If virtue ever guards th' intrepid breast:
Be that our arms, be that our wish'd supplies,
Nor let us life beyond our glory prize!
I speak not this because my anxious mind
Despairs from Egypt certain aid to find:
Forbid it! that my thoughts, so far mislead,
Should doubt the promise which my king has made.
But this my ardent soul has long desir'd,
To find a few with dauntless spirits fir'd,
That every chance can view with equal eyes,
Can seek for victory, or death despise."

Orcaus next arose, with plaintive grace,
Who, mix'd with princes, held the noblest place:
Once known in arms amid the field he shin'd;
But, to a youthful spouse in marriage join'd,
Proud of the husband and the father's name,
In slothful ease he stain'd his former fame.

Then thus he spoke: "Well pleas'd the words
I hear

Which spring, O monarch! from the soul sincere;
When the full heart with inbred ardour glows,
And generous threats the hero's warmth disclose.
Should now, transported with a noble rage,
The good Circassian's heat too far engage;
This may we grant to him whose dauntless might Displays like ardour in the field of fight.

It rests with thee his fury to control,
When youth too far transports his fiery soul.
'Tis thine to view, in equal balance weigh'd,
The present danger with the distant aid;
The hostile power that on our city falls,
Our new-raisd ramparts and our mouldering walls.

I speak the dictates of a faithful heart;
Our town is strong by nature, strong by art;
Yet, see what mighty schemes the foes intend,
What huge machines against the walls ascend!
Th' event remains unknown—I hope and fear
The various chances of uncertain war.
Th' unlook'd-for small supply of herds and corn
That yesternight within the town was borne,
Can ill suffice so vast a city's call,
If long the siege should last before our wall:
And last it must, though by th' appointed day
Th' Egyptian forces here their aid display:
But what our fate if longer they delay?
Yet grant those succours should prevent in speed
Their plighted promise, and our hope exceed:

I see not thence the certain conquest won,
Nor from the Christians freed the threaten'd town.
We must, O king! with Godfrey meet in fight,
Those gallant chiefs, those bands approv'd in might,

Whose arms so oft have scatter'd o'er the plain
The Syrian, Persian, and Arabian train.
Thou, brave Argantes! oft compell'd to yield,
Hast prov'd too well their valour in the field:
Oft hast thou fled the foe with eager haste,
And in thy nimble feet, thy safety plac'd.
Clorinda and myself have felt their host;
Nor let a warrior o'er his fellows boast.
Free let me speak, and unrestrain'd by fear
(Though yonder champion scorn the truth to hear,
And threaten death): my deep foreboding mind
Beholds these dreadful foes with fate combin'd:
Nor troops nor ramparts can their force sustain;
Here shall they fix at last their certain reign.
Heaven witness! what I speak the time requires,
Love for my country and my king inspires.
How wise the king of Tripoly! who gain'd
Peace from the Christians, and his realms retain'd;
While the proud sultan on the naked plains
Now breathes as lies, or wears ignoble chains;
Or hid in exile, trembling from the strife,
Prolongs in distant lands his wretched life:
Who, yielding part, with gifts and tribute paid,
Had still the rest in peace and safety sway'd."

He said; and thus his coward-thoughts disclose'd,
With artful words in doubtful phrase compos'd:
Yet durst not plainly his advice declare,
To see for peace, a foreign yoke to wear.
But, as his speeches fir'd with just disdain,
No more the sultan could his wrath restrain.
To whom Ismeno—"Can thy generous ear Without concern these vile reproaches hear?"
"Unwilling have I stay'd," the chief returns,
"My conscious soul with just resentment burn'd."
Scarce had he ended, when the mist, that threw
Its friendly veil around, at once withdrew;
Dissoolv'd in air was lost the fleecy cloud,
And, left in open light, the monarch stood;
Full in the midst his dreadful front he rears,
And sudden thus accosts their wondering ears:

"Lo! here the man you name, the sultan stands;
No timorous exile fled to distant lands!
This arm shall yonder dastard's lies disprove,
And show what fears his trembling bosom move.
I, who of Christian blood such torrents shed,
And pil'd the plain with mountains of the dead!
Left in the vale, by foes begirt in fight,
All succours lost! am I accus'd of flight?
But should this wretch, or any such, again,
False to his country, to his faith a stain,
Dare, with his words, to shameful peace betray,
(Do thou, O monarch! give my justice way)
This faction shall avenge the hateful part,
And stab the treason lurking in his heart.
First in one fold shall wolves and lambs remain,
One nest the serpent and the dove contain,
Ere with the Franks one land behold our state,
On any terms but everlasting hate!"

While haughty thus he spoke, with threatening mien,

His dreadful hand upon his sword was seen.
Struck with his presence, with his words amaz'd,
The pale assistants mute and trembling gaz'd.
Then, with a soften'd air and milder look,
To Aladine he turn'd, and thus he spoke:

"We trust, O monarch! welcome aid we bring,
When Solyman appears to assist the king."

Then Aladine, who near to meet him drew:
"How glows my heart a friend like thee to view!
No more I feel my slaughter'd legions lost,
No more my soul with anxious fears is tost,
Thou shalt my reign secure, and soon restore
(If Heaven permit) thy own subverted power."

This said, around his neck his arms he cast,
And with an eager joy his friend embrac'd.
Judea's sovereign then, this greeting done,
Gave to the mighty chief his regal throne:
Himself, beside him, to the left he plac'd,
Ismeno next with equal honours grac'd.
And while, inquiring every chance of fate,
In converse with the sire the monarch sate,
To honour Solyman the warrior-dame
Approach'd; then all, by her example, came.
Among the rest, Ormuzes rose, whose care
Preserv'd his faithful Arabs from the war:
These, while the hoets with mutual fury fought,
By night in safety to the walls he brought;
And, with supplies of herds and corn convey'd,
Gave to the famish'd town a needful aid.

Aloose, with lowering front and gloomy state,
In silence wrapt, the fierce Circassian sate:
So seems a lion, couching on the ground,
Who rullen rolls his glaring eyes around:
While low his head declin'd with pensive air,
The soldier's looks Orcaes could not bear.

In council thus Judea's tyrant sate,
The king of Nice, and nobles of the state.

But pious Godfrey, victor of the day, [way:
Had chas'd his foes, and clear'd each guarded
And now he paid his warriors, slain in fight,
The last due honours of the funeral rite;
Then bade the rest prepare (his mandate known)
The second day in arms to assault the town;
And threaten'd, with machines of every kind,
The rude Barbarians in their walls confid'.

The leader soon the timely squadron knew,
That brought him aid against the faithless crew:
In this the prime of all his friends he view'd,
Who once the fraudulent damsel's track pursu'd:
Here Tancred came, who late, by wiles restrain'd,
A prisoner in Armida's fort remain'd.
For these, to meet beneath his lofty tent,
Before the hermit and his chiefs, he sent.

Then thus he said: "Let some, O warriors! tell
Th' adventures that your wandering course befell;
And how you came, by Fortune thus convey'd,
In need so great to give such welcome aid."

He ceas'd; when, conscious of his secret blame,
Each hung his head depress'd with generous shame;
Till Britain's heir below'd the silence broke,
And rais'd his eyes as thus sincere he spoke:

"We went, whose names, undrawn, the urn
conceal'd,
Nor each to each his close design reveal'd,
The darksome paths of treacherous love to trace,
Lur'd by the features of a galleifal face:
Her words and looks (too late I own the shame)
Increas'd our mutual hate, our mutual flame:
At length we drew to where, in dreadful ire,
Heaven rain'd on Earth[§] of old a storm of fire,

§ The country of Sodom and Gomorrah. Aristotle and Galen both mention the lake here described by the poet, and give the same reason for its sup-

To avenge the wrongs which Nature's laws endur'd,

On that dirt race to wicked deeds inur'd:
Where once were fertile lands and meadows green,
Now a deep lake with sulphurous waves was seen:
Hence noisome vapours, baleful steams arise,
That breathe contagion to the distant skies.
In this each ponderous mass is thrown in vain,
The sluggish waters every weight sustain:
In this a castle stood, from which there lay
A narrow bridge to invite the wanderer's way.
We enter'd here; and, wondering, saw within
Each part present a lovely sylvan scene;
Soft was the air, the skies serene and mild,
With flowers adorn'd the hills and valleys smil'd:
A fountain, 'midst a bower of myrtle shade,
With lucid streams in sweet meanders stray'd:
On the soft herbage downy slumbers lay; [play;
Through whispering leaves the fanning breezes
And cheerful songsters warble on the spray.
I pass the domes our eyes beheld amaz'd,
Of costly gold and polish'd marble rais'd.

"There on the turf, with shade o'er-arching
grac'd,

Near purling rills the dame a banquet plac'd;
Where sculptur'd vases deck'd the costly board,
With viands choice of every flavour stor'd:
Whate'er to different climes and suns we owe,
Which earth, or air, or ocean can bestow:
With all that art improves; and while we ate,
A hundred beauteous nymphs in order wait.

"With gentle speech and soft enticing smiles,
She tempers other food and fatal wines;
While every guest receives the deadly flame,
And quaffs a long oblivion of his fame.

"She left us now, but soon resum'd her place,
When anger seem'd to kindle in her face.
Within her better hand a wand she bore;
Her left sustain'd a book of magic power:
Th' enchantress read, and mutter'd secret charms,
Whon, lo! a sudden change my breast alarm'd!
Strange fancies soon my troubled thoughts pursu'd,
Sudden I plung'd amid the crystal flood:
My legs, slunk up, their former function leave,
To either side my arms begin to cleave;
A scaly covering o'er my skin is grown,
And in the fish no more the man is known!
An equal change with me the rest partook,
And swam, transform'd, within the limpid brook.
Oft as my mind recalls th' event, I seem Lost in th' illusion of an idle dream.

"At length her art our former shape restor'd,
But fear and wonder chok'd each ensuing word.
As thus amaz'd we stood, with angry brows
She threaten'd added pains and future woes.

"Behold," she cried, "what power is in my hand!

I rule your fates with uncontrol'd command:
My will can keep you from ethereal light,
The helpless prisoners of eternal night;
Can bid you range among the feather'd kind,
Or, chang'd to trees, with rooted fibres bind;
Can fix in rocks, dissolve in limpid streams,
Or turn to brutal form the human limbs.
It rests on you to avert my vengeful ire;
Consent to obey what my commands require:

porting any heavy substance, the grossness and density of the water.

Embrace the Pagan faith, my realms defend,
And your keen swords on impious Godfrey bend."

"She said: the proffer'd terms carcass'd stain'd,
Her words alone the false Rinaldo gain'd,
Us (no defence avail'd) she straight constrains
In loathsome dungeons and coercive chains.
Thither was Tancréd led, by fortune cross'd,
Where, join'd with us, his liberty he lost.
But little time, confin'd within the tower,
The false enchantress kept us in her power.
'T was said, an envoy from Damascus came,
To gain her prisoners from th' unballow'd dame;
And thence, disarm'd, in fetters bound, to bring,
A welcome present to th' Egyptian king.

"We went, surrounded by a numerous guard,
When Heaven's high will unbop'd for aid prepar'd.
The good Rinaldo, who, with deeds of fame,
Adds every moment to his former name,
Our course impeding, on our leaders fell,
And prov'd that valour, often prov'd so well.
He slew, he vanquish'd all beneath his sword,
And soon again our former arms restor'd
To me, to all confess'd the youth appear'd;
We grasp'd his hand, his well-known voice we heard.

Here vulgar tongues fallacious tales proclaim;
The hero still survives to life and fame.
Three days are past since, parting from our band,
He with a pilgrim travell'd o'er the land,
To Antioch bound: but first he cast aside
His shatter'd arms with streaming crimson dy'd."

Here ceas'd the knight. Meanwhile his ardent eyes

The Hermit fix'd devoutly on the skies:
His looks, his colour chang'd; a nobler grace
Shone in his mien, and kindled in his face;
Full of the Deity, his raptur'd mind
With angels seem'd in hallow'd converse join'd:
He reads in future time's eternal page,
And sees th' events of many a distant age.
He spoke; while all intent and silent gaz'd,
Much at his looks and awful voice amaz'd,
"He lives! Rinaldo lives!" aloud he cries,
"Then heed not empty arts or female lies!
He lives! and Heaven, whose care his youth defends,

For greater praise his valued life extends!
These are but light forerunners of his fame,
(These deeds that now o'er Asia spread his name)
Lo! after rolling years, I plainly view
His arms shall many an impious power subdue;
His eagle guards, with silver wings display'd,
The church and Rome beneath its friendly shade.
Succeeding sons with equal virtue shine,
And children's children crown his glorious line!
To pull the mighty down, exalt the low;
To punish vice, on virtue aid bestow;
These be their arts! and thus his dazzling way
The bird of Esté soars beyond the solar ray!
To guard celestial truth his flight he breeds,
And with his thunders Peter's cause defends:
Where zeal for Christ each holy warrior brings,
He spreads, triumphant, his victorious wings:
The chief recall'd, must here his task resume,
Such is the will of Fate, and such th' eternal doom!"
Here ceas'd the sage; his words each doubt appear'd,

And every fear for young Rinaldo eas'd.
All, fill'd with transport, spoke their joys aloud;
While, fast in thought, the pious Godfrey stood.

Now had the night her sable mantle cast
O'er darke'd air, and earth around embrac'd;
The rest, retiring, sink in soft repose;
But, lost in cares, no sleep the leader knows.

BOOK XL

THE ARGUMENT.

The Christians make a solemn procession, and, with public prayers, implore the assistance of Heaven. The next morning a general assault is given to the city; and numbers are slain on both sides. A breach is made in the wall; Godfrey, preparing to enter first, is wounded by an arrow from Florinda, and obliged to retire from the field. The day then seems to change in favour of the Pagans. Solyman and Argantes signalize themselves. In the mean time Godfrey, being conveyed to his tent, is miraculously healed by an angel. He returns to the walls, and renews the attack, till night puts an end to the battle.

THE Christian leader now, with cares oppress'd,
The next assault resolv'd within his breast:
But, while he hastes his vast machines to frame,
Before his presence reverend Peter came;
The hermit sage apart the hero took,
And thus sedate with awful words bespoke:
"You, mighty prince! terrestrial arms prepare,
But first another duty claims your care. [paid,
To Heaven your thoughts be turn'd, your vows be
And call the angels and the saints to aid:
With public prayers their succour seek to gain,
So may your arms the wish'd success obtain.
Then let the priesthood in procession move,
And humbly supplicate the powers above:
And you, O chiefs! the vulgar herd inspire,
And kindle in their souls devotion's fire."
Severely thus the holy hermit said;
Th' observant leader his advice obey'd,
"O servant, lov'd of Jesus!" he replied,
"Well pleas'd I follow where thy counsels guide.
While I the chieftains of the camp invite,
Call thou the people's pastors to the rite,
William and Ademar, a reverend pair!
To adjust the sacred pomp, be thine the care."

Soon as th' ensuing morning's light arose,
The hermit with the priests assembled goes,
Where in a vale, to worship sacred made,
The Christians oft their pure devotions paid.
Robes, white as snow, the priestly band enfold;
The pastors shone in mantles rich with gold,
That hung divided on their breasts before,
And hallow'd wreaths around their brows they wore.
First Peter leads, and waves aloft in air
The sign which saints in Paradise revere:
Next in two ranks, with solemn steps and slow,
The tuneful choir in lengthen'd order go:
Then, side by side, the holy chiefs appear,
William and Ademar, and close the rear:

¹ History relates that, before the general assault, the Litany was chanted with a solemn religious procession. I have elsewhere observed, and I believe the reader will agree with me, that the following passage, for solemnity of description, is equal to any part of the poem.

Next Godfrey comes, like one of high command,
Alone and foremost of his martial band;
By two and two the field the leaders tread;
Then, smother'd in arms, the warrior-host succeed.
Thus from the trenches move the pious train,
Sedate and silent stretching o'er the plain;
Nor clang of arms, nor trumpet's sound is heard,
But holy hymns from humble hearts preferr'd.

Thee, Father! first, omnipotent, they sung,
Thee, Son, coequal! from the Father sprung!
Thee, Spirit! in whose influence both combine;
Thee, Virgin-mother of the man divine!
And you, ye leaders! who in Heaven above*,
Th' effulgent bands in triple circles move:
And thee, whose hand baptiz'd th' incarnate God
With the pure stream in Jordan's hallow'd flood.
Thee Peter! too, they hail in songs of praise,
The rock on which Heaven fix'd his church to raise;
Where now thy great descendant holds the place,
To unlock the gates of pardon and of grace:
And all the nuncios of th' ethereal reign,
Who testified the glorious death to man;
With those, the martyrs for the truth, who stood
To seal the precious doctrine with their blood:
And those, whose words or writings taught the way
To the lost regions of eternal day:
And her, the damsel true, of Christ belov'd,
Whose pious choice the better life approv'd:
The virgins chaste, in lonely cells enclow'd,
By mystic nuptial rites to Heaven espous'd:
With every other name in torments tried,
Whose zeal the nations and their kings defied!

Thus chanting hymns devout, the numerous
In ample circuit, mov'd along the plain: [train,
Their pensive march to Olivet they frame,²
Fruitful in olives, whence it bears the name;
Eastward it rises from the sacred town,
A monument by fame through every region known.
So pass the tuneful bands with cadence sweet,
The hollow vales the lengthen'd notes repeat;
The winding caverns and the mountains high
A thousand echoes to the sounds reply.

Meantime, in wonder fixt, the Pagan band³
All hush'd and silent on the ramparts stand;²
Struck with their solemn pace, their humble tone,
The pomp unusual, and the rites unknown.
But when their wonder ceas'd, th' ungodly crew
From impious tongues blaspheming curses threw.
With barbarous shouts they shake the bulwarks
round;

The hills and valleys to the noise resound!
But not their course the Christian powers refrain,
Nor cease their ritual or melodious strain;
Fearless they march, nor heed the clamours more
Than cries of birds loquacious on the shore.

Then on the summit of the hill they rear'd
A splendid altar, for the priest prepar'd;
On either side, refulgent to behold,
A beamy lamp was plac'd of burnish'd gold!
There William now, in coalier robes array'd,
His reverend homage at the altar paid;

* The angelical orders thus classed by the theological writers of that time, seraphim, cherubim, thrones, dominations, principalities, and powers; virtues, angels, and archangels. Thus Milton:
Thrones, dominations, principdoms, virtues, powers!

² All these circumstances are taken from the history.

There, with low voice, his humble suit prefers,
And supplicates with vows and holy prayers.
Devoutly hush'd the near assistants stand;
With eyes intent behold the distant band.
But when complete the mystic rites were ceas'd,
The sacred sire th' attending train dismiss'd,
And with his priestly band the squadrons bleas'd.

The pious troops return (this duty o'er)
And tread the path their feet had trod before:
Till, at the vale arriv'd, their ranks they broke;
When to the tents his way the hero took:
With smiles he parted from the vulgar band,
But there the captains of his host destin'd
To due repast; and full before him plac'd
Thoulose's valiant earl with honours grac'd.
The call of thirst and hunger now repeat,
The chief of chiefs his leaders thus address'd:
"Soon as the morn ascends her early throne,
Rise all in arms to assault Judea's town:
Be that the day to invade our auspicious foe;
The present hours to needful tasks bestow."

This said, the chiefs depart: with trumpet's
sound
Th' obedient heralds send his mandates round;
And bid each ardent warrior rise to fight,
Array'd in armour, with the dawning light.
In different works the tedious day they waste,
And various thoughts revolve in every breast,
Till welcome night, that irksome care relieves,
A grateful truce to mortal labour gives.

Aurora still with doubtful lustre gleams,
Scarce has the dawn display'd her orient beams;
No stubborn ploughs the yielding furrows tear,
No watchful shepherds to the meads repair;
Each bird secure his peaceful slumber takes;
Nor hound nor horn the silent forest wakes:
When now the trumpet's echoes rouse the morn,
"To arms! to arms!" the vaulted skies return;
"To arms! to arms!" with universal cry
A hundred legions to the notes reply.
First Godfrey rose, but now neglects to bear
His ponderous cuirass, oft approv'd in war;
A slight defence the fearless hero chose,
And o'er his limbs the lighter burthen throws;
Arm'd like the meanest of the martial name;
When aged Raymond to his presence came:
Soon as he view'd the chief, his thoughts divid'd
What deed the leader's secret soul design'd.
"Where is thy corselet's massy weight," he cry'd,
"Where all thy other arms of temper try'd?
What dost thou seek? a private palm to gain,
To scale the walls amongst the vulgar train?
Think not this task a general's sword demands:
Such dangers leave to less important hands.
Resume thy arms: regard thy safety most,
And save a life, the spirit of our host."

He ceas'd. The generous leader thus replied:
"When holy Urban girded to my side
This sword in Clarmont; and when first 't was given
To Godfrey's hand to wage the wars of Heaven,
To God I vow'd my social arms to wield,
A private warrior in the dangerous field.
Since I have every duty now display'd
As fits a chief by whom the host is led;

⁴ Pope Urban went in person to the council of Clarmont, a city of France, where he appointed numbers to the crusade, and among the first, Godfrey; giving to each adventurer the sacred badge of the expedition.

It next remains (with justice shalt thou own)
To march in equal arms to assault the town.
Thus shall I keep the faith to Heaven I gave;
His hand shall lead me, and his power shall save."

This said; his brethren soon th' example took;
Each knight of France his heavy arms forsook;
The other chiefs less cumbersome harness chose,
And boldly march'd on foot to assail the foe.
Alike prepar'd the Pagan troops ascend
Where tow'rd's the north the crooked ramparts
bend;

And where the west surveys the rising towers,
Of least defence against th' invading powers:
For, well secur'd on every part beside,
The town th' attempts of all their host defied.
Nor here alone the tyrant's watchful care
Had plac'd the best and bravest of the war;
But, summon'd in this utmost risk of state,
Old age and childhood share the toils of fate:
These to the brave supply (as time requires)
Sulphur, and stones, and darts, and missile fire.
With vast machines, and arms the walls they stow,
Whose rising height commands the plain below.
There from aloft, the sultan strikes the eyes,
In form a giant of stupendous size!

There on the ramparts, flaming from afar,
The fierce Argantes towers with threatening air:
And where the highest fort its summit rears,
The fam'd Clorinda o'er the rest appears,
And stor'd with darts her deadly quiver bears.
Already in her hand the bow she tries,
Now strains the nerve, and now the shaft applies.
Eager to strike, the lovely archer stands,
And waits, with longing eye, the hostile bands.
So feign'd of old, from Heaven's ethereal height,
The Delian virgin dealt a feather'd flight.

The boary king, forgetful of his state,
Within the city moves from gate to gate;
Renews again his orders on the wall,
And breathes a hope and confidence in all;
Here adds supplies of men, and there provides
Fresh store of arms, and o'er the whole presides.
But to the fane the matrons send repair,
And seek their fabled god with fruitless prayer.

"O! hear our vows! thy righteous arm advance,
And sudden break the Christian robber's lance!
And him who dares thy hallow'd name offend,
Now prone beneath the lofty gates extend!"

While thus the city bends her different cares,
The pious chief his arms and troops prepares:
And first he leads the foot, a numerous train,
In skilful order marshal'd on the plain:
Then in two squadrons he divides his powers
To attack, on either side, the hostile towers.
The huge ballistæ in the midst appear,
And every dreadful implement of war;
Whence on the walls, like thunderbolts, are thrown Enormous darts, and crags of ponderous stone.
The heavy-arm'd the weaker foot sustain;
The lighter horse are sent to scour the plain.
At length the word is given, the signals sound;
The bows are bent, the slings are whirl'd around:
Their deathful rage the mighty engines pour,
And gall the Pagans with a rocky shower:
Some quit their posts, and others headlong fall,
And thinn'd appear the ranks that guard the wall.

The Franks, impatient now to prove their force,
More near the walls advance with eager course.
Some, shield to shield in closest texture laid,
Above their heads an ample covering made:

And some, beneath machines, in safety move,
A sure defence from falling stones above.
And now the fosse th' advancing soldiers gain,
And seek the depth to level with the plain.
The bottom firm a safe foundation show'd,
This soon they fill'd, a late impervious road.
Adrastus foremost of the troop appears,
And 'gainst the walls a scaling-ladder rears:
Boldly he mounts, while round his head they pour
The stones and sulphur in a mingled shower:
The fierce Helvetic wond'ring crowds survey,
Who now had finish'd half his airy way:
When lo! with fury sent, a rugged stone,
With rapid force as from an engine thrown,
(Sent by the vigour of Circassia's knight)
Struck on his helm, and hurl'd him from his height.
Nor wound ensu'd, nor mortal was the stroke,
Yet prone he tumbled, senseless with the shock.
Then thus Argantes with a threatening cry:
"Fall'n is the first: who dares the second try?"
Behold, I fearless stand before your sight,
Why, warriors! draw ye not to open fight?
Think not those sheds can fence your dastard train,
For you, like beasts, shall in your caves be slain!"

He said: yet not for this the Christians stay;
But in their covert still pursue their way:
While others on their fencing bucklers bear
The storm of arrows, and the rattling war.
Now to the walls the battering rams drew nigh,
Enormous engines, dreadful to the eye!
Strong iron plates their massy heads compose:
The gates and ramparts fear th' approaching blows.
'Gainst these a hundred hands their force apply,
And roll vast beams and ruins from on high;
The ponderous fragments thunder on the fields;
At once they break the well-compacted shields,
And the crush'd helmet to the fury yields!
The plain is strewn with arms, and cover'd o'er
With shatter'd bones, and brains, and mingled gore!

The fierce assaults now, for bolder fight,
Forth from their covert rush'd to open light:
Some place their ladders, and the height ascend;
Against the ramparts some their engines bend,
The rams begin to shake the batter'd wall,
The nodding bulwarks threat a sudden fall.
But, watchful, from the town the foes prepare
Each various method of defensive war:
And where the forceful beams impetuous drove,
A mass of wool, suspended from above, (Whose yielding substance breaks the dreadful blows)

The wary Pagans 'gainst the storm oppose.

While thus, with dauntless hearts, the warrior-
train
Against the walls the bold attack maintain;
Seven times her twanging bow Clorinda drew,
As oft her arrow from the bow-string flew;
And every shaft that to the plain she sped,
Its steel and feathers dy'd with blushing red.
The noblest warriors drench'd her weapons o'er,
She scorn'd to dip their points in vulgar gore.

The first who, 'midst the tumult of the war,
Felt her keen darts, was England's youngest care;
Scarce from his fence his head appear'd in view,
When, wing'd with speed, the vengeful arrow flew:

Swift through his better hand it held its course,
Nor could the steely gauntlet stop the force.
Disabled thus, with grief he left the plain,
And deeper groan'd with anger than with pain.

Then, near the foss, the cart, of Amboise fell:
 Clotharius mounting found the deadly steel,
 That, pierc'd from back to breast, reluctant died:
 This headlong fell, transfixt from side to side.
 The Flemish chief the battering engine heav'd,
 When his left arm the sudden wound receiv'd:
 He stay'd, and furious strove to draw the dart,
 But left the steel within the wounded part.
 To reverend Ademar, who, plac'd afar,
 Uncautious stood to view the raging war,
 The fatal reed arriv'd, his front it found;
 He try'd to wrench the weapon from the wound;
 Another dart, with equal fury sent,
 Transfix'd his hand, and through his visage went.

He fell, and falling, pour'd a purple flood,
 And stain'd the virgin-shaft with holy blood.
 As Palamede to scale the bulwarks strove,
 In his right eye the fatal arrow drove,
 Through all the optic nerves its passage tore,
 And issu'd at his nape beamcarr'd with gore:
 At once he tumbles with a dreadful fall,
 And lies beneath the well-contested wall!

While thus the virgin round her shafts bestows,
 With new devices Godfrey press'd his foes:
 Aside he brought against a portal near,
 The largest of his huge machines of war;
 A tower of wood, stupendous to the sight,
 Whose top might mate the lofty rampart's height:
 Its ample womb could arms and men contain,
 And, roll'd on wheels, it mov'd along the plain.
 Near and more near the bulk enormous drew,
 While from within the darts and javelins flew.
 But, from the threaten'd walls, the wary foes
 With spear and stones th' advancing pile oppose;
 Against the front and sides their strokes they bend,

And heavy fragments on the wheels they send.
 So thick, on either side, the javelins pour,
 The air is darken'd with the missile shower:
 Cloud meets with cloud; and, clashing in the sky,

Back to the senders oft the weapons fly.
 As from the trees are torn the shatter'd leaves,
 What time the grove the stormy hail receives,
 As ripen'd fruit from loaded branches falls:
 So fell the Pagans from the lofty walls;
 While others that surviv'd, with deep dismay
 Flew from the huge machine's tremendous sway.
 Not so the soidan: fearless he remain'd,
 And with him many on the height detain'd.
 Then fierce Argantes thither beat his courses,
 And seiz'd a beam to oppose the hostile force:
 Firm in his hand th' enormous weight he held,
 By this his mighty strength the tower repell'd
 And kept aloof. With these the martial fair
 Appear'd, their glory and their toils to share.
 Meanwhile, with scythes prepar'd, the Franks divide

The cords to which the woolly fence is tied;
 No more sustain'd, at once on earth it falls,
 And undefended leaves the threaten'd walls.
 Now from the Christian tower more fierce below,
 The thundering ram redoubles every blow.
 A breach is made: when, fir'd with martial fame,
 The mighty Godfrey to the bulwarks came:
 His body cover'd with his amplest shield,
 (A weight his arm was seldom wont to wield)

* Clorinda.

He saw, as round he cast his careful view,
 Where from the walls fierce Solyman withdrew,
 And swift to guard the dangerous passage flew;
 While still Clorinda and Circassia's knight
 Maintain'd their station on the rampart's height.
 He sees, and instant from Siger's hands
 A lighter buckler and his bow demands.
 "Myself," he cries, "will first the dead essay
 Through you disjointed stones to force the way:
 'Tis time to show some act that merits praise,
 That may to either host our glory raise."

Then, changing shields, he scarce the word had said,
 When from the wall a vengeful arrow fled:
 The destin'd passage in his leg it found,
 Where strug each nerve, and painful is the wound.
 The deadly shaft from thee, Clorinda! came,
 To thee alone the world ascribes the fame:
 This day, preserv'd by thy unerring bow,
 Thy Pagan friends to thee their safety owe.
 But still his troops the dauntless leader fire,
 Still o'er the works his daring foot aspires:
 Till now he feels the wound's increasing pain:
 No more the leg his sinking bulk sustains;
 To noble Guelpho then a sign he made:
 "Behold, compell'd I leave the field," he said,
 "Thou, in my place, a leader's task sustain,
 And, in my absence, head my social train.
 Soon will I turn, the combat to renew—"
 He said, and on a courser thence withdrew,
 Yet not unnoted by the Pagan crew.

Thus parts th' unwilling hero from his post,
 And with him fortune quits the Christian host:
 While on the adverse side their force increas'd,
 And hope, rekindling, dawn'd in every breast.
 In every Christian heart sew terrors rose,
 And chilling fears their former ardour froze:
 Already flew their weapons slow to wound,
 And their weak trumpets breath'd a fainter sound.

Now on the rampart's height again appear
 The bands, so late dispers'd with coward fear.
 Incited by Clorinda's glorious fires,
 Their country's love the female train inspires:
 Eager they run to prove the tasks of war,
 With vestments girded and dishevel'd hair:
 They hurl the dart; nor fear, where danger calls,
 To expose their bosom for their native walls.
 But that which most the Franks with doubts oppress'd,

And banish'd fear from every Pagan breast,
 The mighty Guelpho, 'midst the rage of fight,
 Fell by a wound, in either army's sight:
 Amongst a thousand fates, on earth o'erthrown,
 Sent from afar he felt the missile stone.
 Another stone alike on Raymond flew,
 And prone to earth the hoary warrior threw.
 While in the foss the brave Eurastius stood,
 A weapon deeply drank his generous blood.
 This hour (ill fated for the Christian train)
 No Pagan weapon flies, that flies in vain.
 Fir'd with success, and swell'd to loftier pride,
 The fierce Circassian rais'd his voice and cried:
 "Not Antioch this; nor now the shades extend,
 The shades of night that Christian frauds befriend:
 A wakeful foe ye view, an open light,
 Far other forms, far other tasks of fight!
 No sparks of glory now your soul inflame,
 No more ye thirst for plunder or for fame;
 Do ye so soon from weak attacks refrain?
 O less than women, in the shape of men!"

He spoke, and scorn'd, in narrow walls confin'd,
To hide the fury of his daring mind:
With eager bounds he seeks the wall below,
Where gaping stones a dangerous passage show.
While doubtless there to guard the pass he lies,
To Solyman, who stood beside, he cries:

"Lo! Solyman, the place, the destin'd hour,
In danger's field to prove our martial power:
Why this delay? O rouse thy noble fire!
Who prizes fame must here to fame aspire."

He said: and either warrior's ardour grows:
At once they issue where the combat glows,
And, unexpected, thunder on the foe.
Beneath their arms what numbers press the ground,
What broken shields and helms are scatter'd round,
What rams and ladders cleft in ruins fall,
And raise new ramparts for the shatter'd wall!

Now those, who lately hop'd the town to gain,
Can scarce in arms the doubtful fight maintain.
At length they yield, and to the furious pair
Resign their engines and machines of war.
The Pagan chiefs, as native fury sway'd,
With dreadful shouts invoke the city's aid:
Now here, now there, they call for fiery brands,
And arm with flaming pines their dreadful hands;
Then on the tower with headlong speed they bend:—
So from the black Tartarian gates ascend
Plato's dire ministers, (tremendous names!)
With hissing serpents and infernal flames!

Tancred, no less with thirst of fame inspir'd,
In other parts his hardy Latians fir'd.
When now the spreading carnage he beheld,
And saw the torches blazing o'er the field,
He left the walls, and turn'd his rapid course
To oppose the Saracens' impetuous force:
He comes, he turns the scale of victory;
The vanquish'd triumph, and the victors fly!

Thus stood the war, while from the martial band

His lofty tent the wounded leader gain'd.
Baldwin and good Sigero near him stood,
And round of mourning friends a pensive crowd.
He strove to draw the shaft with eager speed,
And broke within the flesh the feather'd need:
Then swift he laid explore the wounded part,
And bare a passage for the barbed dart.
"Restore me swift to arms," the hero cries,
"Ere rising night th' unfinished strife surprise."
Now old Erotimus to assist him stood,
Who drew his birth by Po's imperial flood;
Who well the power of healing simples knew,
The force of plants and every virtuous dew;
Dear to the Muse: but, pleas'd with lowly fame,
He gain'd by private arts a humbler name.
His skill could mortals from the grave retrieve,
His verse could bid their names for ever live.

All unconcern'd the godlike chief appears,
While every pale assistant melts in tears.
The sage physician for the task prepares,
He girds his vesture, and his arm he bares;
With lenient medicine bathes th' afflicted part,
And with a gentle hand attempts the dart;
With pinners next the stubborn steel he strains,
Yet fast it stands, and mocks his utmost pains.
What means shall next his baffled art devise,
Since Fortune thus her favouring aid denies?
Full soon the chief th' increasing anguish found,
And fleeting life seem'd doubtful in the wound.
But now the guardian angel, touch'd with grief,
From Ida's summit brought the wish'd relief;

VOL. XXI.

A branch of dittany, of wondrous power,
Whose downy foliage bears a purple flower:
By nature taught (th' instructress of their kind)
The mountain goats its secret virtue find,
What time they feel the winged dart from far,
And in their wounded sides the arrow bear.
With this, though distant thence the region lies,
The pitying angel in a moment flies:
Unseen, with this the vase prepar'd he fills,
And odoriferous panacy distilla.

The leech anoints the part, and, (strange to tell!)
Loos'd from the wound, the shaft spontaneous fall:
The blood forbore to flow, the anguish ceas'd,
And strength, return'd, in every nerve increas'd.
Then thus Erotimus with wonder cries:
"No skill of mine thy sudden cure supplies:
A greater power his timely aid extends,
Some guardian angel from his Heaven descends:
I see celestial hands!—To arms! to arms!
Return, and rouse again the war's alarms!"

He said; and Godfrey, eager for the fight,
Soon o'er his thighs dispos'd the cuirasses bright;
He shook his ponderous lance, his helmet lac'd,
And his forsaken shield again embrac'd.
He moves: a thousand on his steps attend;
Thence to the town their rapid march they bend:
With clouds of dust the face of Heaven is spread,
Wide shakes the earth beneath the warrior's tread.
The foes behold the squadron drawing near,
And feel their blood congeal'd with chilling fear.
Thrice on the field his voice the hero rear'd;
Full well the welcome sound his people heard;
The sound that oft was wont to cheer the fight;
Then, fir'd anew, they rouse their fainting might.
Still at the walls, the haughty Pagan pair,
Plac'd in the breach, support the dangerous war;
Firm in the pass a bold defence maintain,
'Gainst noble Tancred and his valiant train.

Now, sheath'd in arms, the glorious chief drew
Dudain and anger flashing from his eye: [sigh,
On fierce Argantes all his force he bends,
'Gainst the foe his lance impatient sends.
Not with more noble some stone enormous flies,
Sent by an engine through th' affrighted skies;
Through sounding air its course the javelin held;
Argantes, fearless, lifts th' opposing shield:
The risen target to the force gives way,
Nor can the corselet's plates the fury stay:
Through shatter'd armour flies the missive wood,
And dips its thirsty point in Pagan blood.
Swift from his side the lance Argantes drew,
And to its lord again the weapon threw:
"Receive thine own," he cried—but, stooping low,
The wary Christian disappoints the foe:
The deadly point the good Sigero found,
Full in his throat he felt the piercing wound:
Yet with a secret joy he sunk in death,
Pleas'd in his sovereign's stead to yield his breath.

A craggy flint the raging sultan threw;
Resistless on the Norman chief it flew;
Stunn'd with the dreadful blow he reel'd around,
Then sudden tumbled headlong to the ground.
No longer Godfrey now his wrath repell'd,
Grasp'd in his hand the flaming sword he held;
And now to nearer fight his foes decid:
What deeds had soon been wrought on either side!
But night, to check their rage, her veil display'd,
And wrapt the warring world in peaceful shade:
Then Godfrey, ceasing, left th' unfinished fray,—
So clos'd the dreadful labours of the day!

H h

But ere the chief retir'd, with pious care,
He bade the wounded from the field to bear:
Nor would he leave (a welcome prey) behind
His warlike engines to the foes resign'd.
Safe from the walls he drew the loftiest tower,
Though broke and crush'd with many a horrid shower.

So seems a ship from seas and tempests borne,
Her planks all shatter'd and her canvass torn,
When, 'scap'd from furious winds and roaring tides,
Within the port she scarce securely rides.
The broken wheels no more the tower sustain,
Heavy and slow it drags along the plain,
The weight supported by th' assisting train:
And now the workmen haste, with ready care,
To search the pile, and every breach repair:
So Godfrey bade, who will'd that morning light
Should view the wondrous tower renew'd for fight.
On every side his watchful thoughts he cast,
And guards around the lofty engine plac'd.
But, from the walls, their speech the Pagans hear,
And strokes of hammers breaking on the ear:
A thousand torches gild the dusky air,
And all their purpose and their toils declare.

BOOK XII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Argantes and Clorinda undertake by night to burn the tower of the Christians. Arsetes, who had brought up Clorinda from her infancy, endeavours to dissuade her from the enterprise, but in vain: he then relates to her the story of her birth. The two adventurers sally from the town, and set fire to the tower: the Christians take arms; Argantes retreats before them, and gains the city in safety; but the gates being suddenly closed, Clorinda is left amongst the enemy. Tancred, not knowing her, pursues her as she is retiring towards the walls. They engage in a dreadful combat: Clorinda is slain, but, before she dies, receives baptism from the hand of Tancred. His grief and lamentation.

"T was night; but neither heat, with cares oppress,
Forgot their labours yet in balmy rest:
Here, under covert of the gloomy hour,
The Christians now repair'd their batter'd tower;
And there the Pagans, prest with equal care,
Review'd their bulwarks tottering from the war,
And propp'd the walls. Alike on either side,
The warriors' wounds each skillful leech employ'd.
These tasks perform'd, the Franks and faithless
train,

O'erwatch'd at length, from further toil refrain;
Till deeper darkness brooded on the ground,
And many an eye was clos'd in sleep profound:
But not in slumber sunk the martial dame¹,
Whose generous boom ever pants for fame:
With her Argantes join'd the watch partook;
Then thus in secret to her soul she spoke:

"What wondrous praise has Solyman obtain'd!
What, by his deeds to day, Argantes gain'd!
Alas, amidst you numerous host to go,
And crush the engines of the Christian foe!

While I, (how poor the vaunted fame I share!)
Here plac'd aloft, maintain'd a distant war:
'T is true my shafts may boast successful aim:
And is this all a woman's hand can claim?
'T were better far in woods and wilds to chase
And pierce with darts remote the savage race,
Than here, when manly valour braves the field,
Appear a maid in feats of arms unskill'd."

She said; and now revolving in her breast
Heroic deeds, Argantes thus address'd:
"Long has my soul unusual ardour prov'd,
And various thoughts this restless bosom mov'd;
I know not whether God th' attempt inspires,
Or man can form a God of his desires.
See! from you vale the Christians' glimmering lights.
My mind impels me, this auspicious night,
To burn their tower; at least the deed be tried,
And for th' event let Heaven alone provide.
But should it chance (the fate of war unknown)
You foes forbid me to regain the town;
I leave my damsel train thy care to prove,
And one that loves me with a father's love:
Protect them, chief! and safe to Egypt send
My mourning virgins and my aged friend:
O grant my prayer!—This duty from thy hands
Those claim by sex, and this by age demand."

With wonder fill'd, Argantes heard the dame,
And caught the kindling sparks of generous flame.
"Then shalt thou go, and leave me here behind,
Despair'd," he cried, "among th' ignoble kind!
Think'st thou that I secure with joyful eyes
Shall view afar the curling flames arise?
No—if in arms I ever grac'd thy side,
Let me this night thy doubtful chance divide;
I too can boast a heart despising death,
That prizes honour cheaply bought with breath!"
"O generous chief!" reply'd the fearless maid,
"In such resolves thy virtue stands display'd:
Yet here permit me to depart alone.
A loss like mine shall ne'er distress the town:
But (Heaven avert the omen!) shouldst thou fall,
What head shall longer guard Judea's wall?"

"In vain is each pretence," the knight rejoain'd,
"For six remains the purpose of my mind:
Behold I tread the path thy feet shall lead,
But, if refus'd, myself will dare the deed."

This said, they sought the careful king, who sat
In nightly council for the public state:
There midst the brave and wise (an awful train)
They came, and first Clorinda thus began:

"Vouchsafe awhile, O king! to bend thine ear,
And what we proffer with acceptance bear;—
Argantes vows (nor vainly boasts the power)
With vengeful flames to burn your hostile tower:
Myself will aid—our course alone we stay
Till added toil the foes in slumber lay."

To Heaven his trembling hands the monarch rears,
His wrinkled cheeks are wet with joyful tears:
"All praise to thee, O guardian power!" he cries,
"Who still thy people view'st with gracious eyes!
Long wilt thou yet preserve my threaten'd reign,
When souls like these the town's defence maintain.
For you, ye pair! what praises can I find?
What gifts to equal your heroic mind?
Fame shall to distant times your worth proclaim,
And Earth aloud repeat each glorious name.
Your deed be your reward—to this receive Such recompense as fits a king to give."

Thus Aladine; and, as she spoke, he prest'd
Now this, now that, with transport to his breast.

¹ Clorinda.

No more the listening soldier could control
The generous emulation in his soul:
"Think not," he cried, "in vain this sword I wear,
This hand with you shall every labour bear."
"Then let us issue all," the maid rejoin'd,
"Shouldst thou depart, who dares remain behind?"
And now, with envy fill'd and jealous pride,
Argestes his consent had here denied;
But straight the word Judea's monarch took,
And mildly thus the chief of Nice bespoke:

"Intrepid warrior! whom no dangers fright,
Nor toil can weary in the day of fight,
Full well I deem that, issuing on the foe,
Thy deeds would worthy of thy courage show;
But much unmet it seems, that, paring all,
None, fam'd in arms, remain within the wall.
Nor would I these permit th' attempt to dare,
(So high their safety and their lives I bear)
Were this a work of less important kind,
Or weaker hands could act the part design'd;
But since, so well 'gainst every chance dispos'd,
The lofty tower is round with guards enclos'd,
No little force can hope the pass to gain;
Nor must we issue with a numerous train:
Let those who claim the task, this valiant pair,
Of prov'd before in every risk of war,
Let these alone depart, in happy hour,
Whose strength is equal to a legion's power;
While thou, as best befits thy regal state,
Here with the rest remain within the gate.
And when (so fate succeed the glorious aim)
These shall return, and wide have spread the flame,
If chance a hostile band pursue their course,
Then haste and guard them from superior force."

So spoke the king; nor aught the Turk rejoind'd,
Those discontent lay raveling in his mind.
Then thus Ismeno: "You who boldly dare
Th' adventurous task, awhile th' attempt forbear;
Till various mixtures, call'd with art, I frame,
To burn the hostile tower with fiercer flame:
Perchance the guards, that now the piles surround,
May then be lost, in friendly slumbers drown'd."

To this they yield; and each, apart retir'd,
Expects the season for the deed design'd.
And now Clorinda threw her vest aside,
With silver wrought; her helmet's crested pride:
For these (ill omen!) sable arms she wore,
And sable casque that no plum'd honours bore.
She deem'd it easier, thus disguis'd to go,
And pierce the watchful squadrons of the foe.
The eunuch, old Arsetes, near her stay'd,
Who from her childhood bred the warrior-maid;
Who all her steps with faithful age pursu'd,
And near her now a trusty guardian stood.
He saw the virgin change her wonted arms;
Her rash design his anxious breast alarm'd:
He weeps, adjures her oft with earnest prayers,
By his long service, by his silver hairs,
By the dear memory of his former pains.
To cease th' attempt; but she unmov'd remains.
To whom he said: "Since, bent on future ill,
Thou stand'st resolv'd thy purpose to fulfill;
Since neither helpless age, nor love like mine,
Nor tears, nor prayers, can change thy dire design,
Attend—my tongue shall wondrous things reveal,
Nor longer now thy former state conceal.
That done, no more I strive thy thoughts to shake;
Resume thy purpose, or my counsel take:"
He said; with eyes intent the virgin took,
While thus the hoary sire his speech pursu'd.

"In Ethiopia once Senapus reign'd,
(And still perchance he rules the happy land)
Who kept the precepts given by Mary's Son,
Where yet the sable race his doctrines own.
There I, a Pagan, liv'd, remov'd from man,
The queen's attendant midst the female train.
Though native gloom was o'er her features spread,
Her beauty triumph'd through the dusky shade.
Her husband lov'd—but ah! was doom'd to prove
At once th' extremes of jealousy and love:
He kept her close, secluded from mankind,
Within a lonely deep recess confin'd;
While the sage matron mild submission paid,
And, what her lord decreed, with joy obey'd.
"Her pictur'd room a sacred story shows,
Where, rich with life, each mimic figure glows:
There, white as snow, appears a beautiful maid,
And near a dragon's hideous form display'd.
A champion through the beast a javelin sends,
And in his blood the monster's bulk extends.

"Here oft the queen her secret faults confess'd,
And prostrate here her humble vows address'd.
At length her womb disburthen'd gave to view
(Her offspring thou) a child of snowy hue.
Struck with th' unusual birth, with looks amaz'd,
As on some strange portent, the matron gas'd:
She knew what fears possess'd her husband's mind,
And hence to hide thee from his sight design'd,
And, as her own, expos'd to public view
A new-born infant like herself in hue:
And since the tower, in which she then remain'd,
Aloof her damsel and myself contain'd;
To me, who lov'd her with a faithful mind,
Her infant charge she unbaptiz'd consign'd;
With tears and sighs she gave thee to my care,
Remote from thence the precious pledge to bear.
What tongues her sorrows and her plaints can tell,
How oft she press'd thee with a last farewell!
With streaming tears each tender kiss is drown'd,
While frequent sighs her faltering words confound;
At length with lifted eyes—"O God!" she cried,
'By whom the secrets of my breast are tried;
If still my thoughts have untho't remain'd,
And still my heart its constancy maintain'd;
(Not for myself I ask thy pitying grace,
O thousand sins, alas! my soul deface!)
A thousand times, to whom, distress,
A mother thus denies her kindly breast:

* This alludes to the fabulous legend of Saint George, to which the poet here seems to give a mystical sense. Thus Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, canto xv. speaking of the spurs given by Sansonetto to Astolbo,

Belliv'd the champion's once, whose valiant deed
The holy virgin from the dragon freed.—Ver. 716.

* This fiction is apparently taken from the famous romance of Heliodorus, called Theagenes and Charicles, where Persina, lying with her husband in a chamber painted with the story of Perseus delivering Andromeda from the monster, was delivered of a daughter of a white complexion, afterwards called Charicles, which, fearful of incurring the jealousy of her husband, she exposed in the same manner as is here related of the mother of Clorinda.

* According to the custom of that country, the males could not be baptized till the age of fourteen, and the females till the age of sixteen.

Give her from me her spotless life to frame,
But copy in her fate some happier name!
Thou, heavenly chief! whose arm the serpent
brav'd,

And from his ravenous jaws the virgin sav'd:
If e'er Iapers bur'd with rites divine,
Or offer'd gold and incense at thy shrine;
For her I pray, that she, thy faithful maid,
On thee, in every chance, may call for aid.'

"She ceas'd; her heart convulsive anguish wring,

And on her face a mortal sorrow hung.

"With tears I took thee, and with care bestow'd
Within a chest, with leaves and flowers o'er-strow'd,
And bore thee thence conceal'd, a pleasing load!

At length remote, my lonely footsteps stray'd
Amidst a forest thick with horrid shade;
When lo! a tigress drawing near I view'd,
Her threatening eyes suffus'd with rage and blood:
Wild with affright I left thee on the ground,
And climb'd a tree, and thence my safety found:
The furious beast now cast her eyes aside,
And thee deserted on the herbage spy'd:
Intent she seem'd to gaze, and milder grew,
Till all the fierceness from her looks withdrew:
Approaching nigh, she fawn'd in wanton play,
And lick'd your infant members as you lay;
While you secure the savage form carew'd,
And strok'd with harmless hand her dreadful crest.

She offer'd then her teats, and (strange to view!)
Thy willing lips the milky moisture drew.

With anxious fear and wonder I beheld
A sight so new, that all belief excell'd.
Soon as she found thee sated with the food,
The beast departed, and regain'd the wood.
Then hastening down to where on earth you lay,
I with my charge resum'd my former way:
Till midst a village my retreat I made;
In secret there thy infancy was bred:

And there I dwell, till, coursing round, the Moon
Had sixteen changing months to mortals shown;
Till thy young feet began their steps to frame,
And from thy tongue imperfect accents came.

But sinking now, as middle life declin'd,
To hoary age, the wister of mankind;

Enrich'd with gold, which with a bounteous hand
The queen had given me when I left the land,
I loath'd this irksome life, with wandering tir'd,
And to review my native soil desir'd;

There midst my friends to pass my latter days,
And cheer my evenings with a social blaze,
To Egypt then I turn'd, my natal shore,
And thee the partner of my journey bore.

When, lo! a flood we gain'd—there thieves enclose
My doubtful pass, and here the current flows.
What should I do, reluctant to forgo
My dearest charge, or trust the barbarous foe?

I take the flood; one hand the torrent braves;
And one sustains thee while I plough the waves.
Swift was the stream, and in its midmost course
A circling eddy whirl'd with rapid force:

There round and round, with giddy motion tost,
Sudden I sunk, in depth of waters lost;
Thou soon I miss'd, but thee the waters bore,
And winds propitious wafted to the shore.

Breathless and faint at length I reach'd the land,
And there, with joy, my dearest pledge regain'd.

"But now what time to dusky shade consign'd,
Night spreads her veil of silence o'er mankind,

Behold a warrior in my dream appear'd,
And o'er my head a naked falchion rear'd.
"Hear my command!" he cried with threatening air:

"What once a mother trusted to thy care;
Thy infant charge, with sacred rites baptize;
Below'd of Heaven, with me her safety lies:
For her to ravenous beasts I pity gave,
And breath'd a living spirit in the wave.
Oh! wretched thou! if, such a warning given,
Thou dar'st to slight the messenger of Heaven!"

"He ceas'd; I wak'd, and then resum'd my
Soon as the morn reveal'd her early ray. [way,
But, partial to my faith, I kept thee still,
Nor would thy mother's last commands fail!

I heeded not the visions of the night,
But bred thy youth in every Pagan rite.
Mature in years now shone thy dauntless mind
Above thy sex, the rival of mankind!

In many a fight thy deeds have glory won;
Thy fortune since full well to thee is known.
In me thou still hast prov'd, in peace or war,
A servant's duty and a parent's care.

As yester-morn my mind, with thought oppress'd,
Lay senseless in a deep, a death-like rest,
The phantom-warrior came with fiercer look,
And dreadful with a louder accent spoke:

"Lo, wretch! th' appointed hour at hand," hecried,
"That must Clorinda from this life divide.
In thy despite the virgin shall be mine,
And thee to tears and anguish I resign!"

"He said; and vanish'd swift to fleeting air.
Then hear, my best belov'd! my tenderest care!
For thee these threatening visions Heaven has sent;
To thee, alas! foretells some dire event;

Perchance displeas'd by me to see thee train'd
In rites unpractic'd in thy natal land;
Remote perhaps from truth.—O! yet forbear;
Consent, no longer now those arms to wear:
Suppress thy daring, and relieve my care."

He ceas'd, and wept. In deep suspense she stay'd,

A dream, like his, her troubled soul dismay'd;
At length her looks she clear'd, and thus reply'd:
"That faith I deem the truth, be still my guide;
That faith I learn'd from thee in early years,
Which now thou seek'st to shake with causeless fears:

Nor will I (noble minds such thoughts disdain)
Forgo these arms, or from th' attempt refrain.
Though Death, in every shape that mortals fear,
Should undisguis'd before my eyes appear."

So spoke the generous maid, and gently strove
To calm his anguish, and his doubts remove.
Now came the season for the deed design'd,
When parting thence th' expecting knight she join'd;

Ismeno there to inflame each breast conspir'd
With goading speech, that neither breast requir'd,
And to their hands two sulphurous balls consign'd,
With secret fire in hollow reeds confin'd.

Now through the night their silent march they
Now leave the city, and the hill descend: [bend,
Till near the place arriv'd, where, towering high,
The hostile structure rises to the sky;

Their daring souls can scarcely now restrain
The warmth that breathes in every glowing vein:

Their cautious tread the watchful guard alarms ;
The signal those demand, and call aloud to arms.

No more conceal'd remain the generous pair,
But boldly rushing on provoke the war.
As missile stones from battering engines fly,
As fork'd thunders rend the troubled sky ;
One instant sees them, with resistless hand,
Attack, and pierce and scatter wide the band.
'Midst clashing spears and hissing darts they flew,
And unrepuls'd their glorious task pursue :
Now, held in sight, the ready fires they raise :
Now near the pile the threatening vapour blaze ;
Till on the tower the dreadful pest they bend ;
On every side the curling flames ascend :
Heavy and thick the smoky volumes rise,
And shade with sable clouds the starry skies ;
Flash follows flash, the mingled blaze aspires,
Ill all the ether glows with roddy fires !
Fann'd by the wind, the flame more furious grows :
Down falls the pile, the terror of the foes,
And one short hour the wondrous work o'erthrows !

Meanwhile with speed two Christian squadrons came,

Who from the field had seen the rising flame :
To these the bold Argantes turn'd, and vow'd
To quench the burning ruins with their blood :
Yet, with Clorinda join'd, retreating still,
By slow degrees he gain'd the neighbouring bill ;
While, like a flood by sounding rains increas'd,
Behind their steps the eager Christians press'd.

Soon was the gate unbarr'd, where ready stands
The king, surrounded by his numerous bands,
To welcome back (if Fate th' attempt succeed)
The pair triumphant from the glorious deed.
Now near the town the knight and virgin drew,
And swift behind the troop of Franks pursue ;
These Solyman dispers'd : the portal clos'd,
But left Clorinda to the foe expos'd ;
Alone expos'd ; for while the basty bands
Shut fast the sounding gate with ready hands,
She follow'd Arimon, by fury driven,
To avenge the wound his luckless arm had given :
His life she took : nor yet Argantes knew
That she, ill-fated ! from the walls withdrew.
All cares were lost, the tumult of the fight
Amaz'd the senses midst the gloom of night.
At length, her rage allay'd with hostile blood,
The maid at leisure all her peril view'd :
The numbers round, and clos'd the friendly gate,
She deem'd her life a prey to certain fate.
But when she finds no Christian eye descries
The hostile warrior in the dark disguise,
New schemes of safety in her mind arise.
Herself securely midst the ranks she throws,
And undiscover'd mingles with the foe.
Then, as the wolf retires besmear'd with blood,
And seeks the shelter of the distant wood ;
So, favour'd by the tumult of the night,
The dame, departing, shunn'd the prying sight.
Tancred alone perceiv'd, with heedful view,
Some Pagan foe as near the place he drew.
He came what time she Arimon had slain,
Then mark'd her course, and follow'd o'er the plain :

Eager he burn'd to prove her force in fight,
Esteem'd a warrior worthy of his might,
Her sex unknown. And now the virgin went
A winding way along the hill's ascent :
Impetuous he pursu'd, but ere he came,
His clashing armour round th' unwary dame.

Then turning swift—"What brought thou here?"
she cried.

"Lo! war and death I bring!"—the chief replied,
"Then war and death," the virgin said, "I give;
What thou to me would'st bring, from me receive!"
Intrepid then she stay'd; the knight drew near;
But when he saw the foe on foot appear,
He left his steed to meet in equal war. [rage:

Now with drawn swords they rush the fight to
With fury thus two jealous bulls engage.
What glorious deeds on either part were done,
That claim'd an open field and conscious Sun !
Thou, Night! whose envious veil with dark disguise
Conceal'd the warriors' acts from human eyes,
Permit me from thy gloom to snatch their fame,
And give to future times each mighty name;
So shall they shine, from age to age display'd,
For glories won beneath thy sable shade !
All art in fight the dusky hour denies,
And fury now the place of skill supplies.
The meeting swords with horrid clangour sound :
Each whirls the falchion, each maintains the Alternate furies either breast inflame, [ground ;
Alternate vengeance and alternate shame.

No pause, no rest, th' impatient warriors know,
But rage to rage, and blow succeeds to blow :
Still more and more the combat seems to rise,
That scarce their weapons can their wrath suffice ;
Till grappling, fierce, in nearer strife they close,
And helm to helm, and shield to shield oppose.
Thrice in his nervous arm he held the maid ;
And thrice elusive from his grasp she fled.
Again with threatening swords resum'd they stood,
And dy'd again the steel with mutual blood :
Till, spent with labour, each awhile retir'd,
And faint and breathless from the fight respir'd.

Now shines the latest star with fainter ray,
And roddy streaks proclaim the dawning day :
Each views the foe ; while, bending on the plain
The swords reverse'd their sinking bulks sustain,
Then Tancred marks the blood that stains his foe,
But sees his own with less effusion flow,
He sees with joy :—O mortals blind to fate,
Too soon with Fortune's favouring gale elate !
Ah! wretch! rejoice not—Thou too soon shalt mourn !

Thy boast and triumph must to sorrow turn !
Soon shall thy eyes distill a briny flood,
For all those purple drops of precious blood !

Thus for a while the weary warriors stay'd,
And speechless each the other's wound survey'd,
At length the silence gallant Tancred broke,
Besought her name, and mildly thus bespoke :
"Hard is our fate to prove our mutual might,
When darkness veils our deeds from every sight :
But since ill fortune envies valour's praise,
And not a witness here our strife surveys ;
If prayers from foes can e'er acceptance claim,
To me reveal thy lineage and thy name ;
So shall I know, whatever th' event be found,
Who makes my conquest or my death renown'd."

"Thou seek'st in vain," the haughty maid replied,

"To fathom what my soul resolves to hide.
Yet one of those thou see'st (whatever my name)
Who gave thy boasted tower to feed the flame."

At this with rage indignant Tancred burn'd :
"In hapless hour thou speak'st," he thus return'd ;
"Alike thy speech, alike thy silence proves,
And either, wretch! my arm to vengeance moves."

With rest refresh'd, with wrath inflam'd anew,
Again transported to the fight they flew.
What dreadful wounds on either side are given !
Through arms and flesh the ruthless swords are driven.

Though faint with blood effus'd from every vein,
Their staggering limbs can scarce their weight sustain,

Yet still they live, and still maintain the strife,
Disdain and rage withhold their fleeting life.
So seems th' Egean sea, the tempest past
That here and there its troubled waters cast ;
It still preserves the fury gain'd before,
And rolls the sounding billows to the shore.

But now beholds the mournful hour at hand,
In which the Fates Clorinda's life demand.
Full at her bosom Tancred aim'd the sword ;
The thirsty steel her lovely bosom gor'd ;
The sanguine current stain'd with blushing red
Th' embroider'd vest that o'er her arms was spread.
She feels approaching death in every vein ;
Her trembling knees no more her weight sustain :
But still the Christian knight pursues the blow,
And threats and presses close his vanquish'd foe :
She, as she fell, with moving voice address'd
The prince, and thus prefer'd her dear request ;
Some pitying angel form'd her last desire,
Where Faith, and Hope, and Charity conspire !
On the fair rebel Heaven such grace bestow'd,
And now in death requir'd the faith she ow'd.

" 'Tis thine, my friend !—I pardon thee the stroke—

O let me pardon too from thee invoke !—
Not for this mortal frame I urge my prayer,
For this I know no fear, and ask no care :
No, for my soul alone I pity crave ;
O'ertrause my lollies in the sacred wave !"

Feebly she spoke ; the mournful sounds impart
A tender feeling to the victor's heart ;
His wrath subsides, while softer passions rise,
And call the tear of pity from his eyes.
Not distant far, adown the mossy hill
In gentle murmurs roll'd a crystal rill :
There in his casque the limpid stream he took ;
Then sad and pensive hasten'd from the brook.
His hands now trembled, while her helm he rear'd,
Ere yet the features of his foe appear'd ;—
He sees !—he knows !—and senseless stands the knight !

O fatal knowledge—O distracting sight !
Yet still he lives, and rous'd with holy zeal,
Prepares the last sad duty to fulfill.
While from his lips he gave the words of grace,
A smile of transport brighten'd in her face :
Rejoic'd in death, she seem'd her joy to tell,
And bade for Heaven the empty world farewell.
A lovely paleness o'er her features flew ;
As lilies mix'd with lilies blend their hue,
Her eyes to Heaven the dying virgin rais'd ;
The Heavens and Sun with kindly piety gaz'd ;
Her clay-cold hand, the pledge of lasting peace,
She gave the chief ; her lips their music cease.
So life departing left her lovely breast ;
So seem'd the virgin lull'd to silent rest !

Soon as he found her gentle spirit fled,
His firmness vanish'd o'er the senseless dead.
Wild with his fate, and frantic with his pain,
To raging grief he now resigns the rein.
No more the spirits fortify the heart ;
A mortal coldness freezes every part.

Speechless and pale like her the warrior lay,
And look'd a bloody corpse of lifeless clay !
Then had his soul pursu'd the fleeting fair,
Whose gentle spirit hover'd yet in air ;
But here it chanc'd a band of Christians came
In search of water from the crystal stream :
Full soon their leader, with a distant view,
" Well by his arms the Latian hero knew :
With him the breathless virgin he beheld,
And wept the fortune of so dire a field :
Nor would he leave (though deem'd of Pagan kind)
Her lovely limbs to hungry wolves consign'd :
But either burthen, on their shoulders laid,
To Tancred's tent the mournful troop convey'd.
Thus step by step their gentle march they took,
Nor yet the warrior from his trance awoke ;
Yet oft he groan'd, and show'd that fleeting life
Still in his breast maintain'd a doubtful strife :
While hush'd and motionless, the damsel show'd
Her spirit parted from its mortal load.
Thus either body to the camp they bear,
And there apart dispose with pious care.

With every dutious rite, on either hand
Around the wounded prince th' assistants stand.
And now by slow degrees he lifts his sight,
Before his eyes appears a glimmering light ;
He feels the leech's hand, his ear receives
The sound of speech, but doubts if yet he lives :
Amaz'd he gazes round : at length he knows
The place, his friends, and thus laments his woes :
" And do I live ?—and do I yet survey
The hated beams of this unhappy day ?

Ah ! coward hand ! to righteous vengeance slow !
Though deeply vers'd in every murderous blow !
Durst thou not, impious minister of death !
Traffick this heart, and stop this guilty breath !
But haply us'd to deeds of horrid strain,
Thou deem'st 't ill-merry to conclude my pain.
Still, still 'tis mine with grief and shame to rove,
A dire example of disastrous love !
While keen remorse for ever breaks my rest,
And raging furies haunt my conscious breast ;
The lonely shades with terror must I view,
The shades shall every dreadful thought renew :
The rising Sun shall equal horrors yield,
The Sun that first the dire event reveal'd !
Still most I view myself with hateful eye,
And seek, though vainly, from myself to fly !—
But ah ! unhappy wretch ! what place contains
Of that ill-fated fair the chaste remains ?
All that escap'd my rage, my brutal power,
Perhaps the natives of the woods devour !
Ah ! hapless maid ! 'gainst whom alike conspire
The woodland savage and the hostile ire !
O let me join the dead on yonder plain,
(If still her beautiful limbs untouch'd remain)
Me too those greedy jaws alike shall tear,
Me too the monster in his paunch shall bear.
O happy envied hour ! (if such my doom)
That gives us both in death an equal tomb."

And now he heard that near his tent was laid
The lifeless body of his much-lov'd maid.
At this awhile his mournful look he clears :
So through the clouds a transient gleam appears,
And from the couch his wounded limbs he rears.
With faltering steps he thither bends his way,
Where plac'd apart the hapless virgin lay :
But when arriv'd he saw the wound impress'd,
With which his hand had pierc'd her tender
breast ;

And deadly pale, yet calm as evening's shade,
Behold her face, with every rose decay'd;
His trembling knees had sunk beneath their load,
But here his circling friends their aid bestow'd,
Till thus again he vents his plaints aloud:
"Oh! sight! that e'en to death can sweetness give,
But cannot now, alas! my woe relieve!
O thou dear hand, that once to mine was prest'd,
The pledge of amity and peace confes'd!
What art thou now? alas! how chang'd in death!
And what am I, that still prolong my breath?
Behold these lovely limbs in ruin laid,
The dreadful work my impious rage has made!
This hand, these eyes alike are cruel found;
That gave the stroke, and these survey the wound!
Thoughtless survey!—since tears are here denied,
My guilty blood shall pour the vital tide!"

He ceas'd; and groaning with his inmost breath,
First in despair and resolute on death,
Each bandage straight with frantic passion tore:
Forth gush'd from every wound the spouting gore:
But here excess of grief his will deceiv'd,
His senses fetter'd, and his life repriev'd.

Then to his bed again the knight was borne;
His spirits to their hated home return;
And soon around the tongues of Fame relate
The hero's sorrow, and his helpless fate.
Now Godfrey sought his tent; and with him came
Each noble chief, a friend to Tancred's name.
But nor reproof nor soothing yields relief,
And words are vain to calm his rage of grief.
So when some limb a mortal wound receives,
Each probing hand increasing anguish gives.
But reverend Peter's care the rest transcends,
(A shepherd thus his sickly charge attends)
With awful words the lover's breast he moves,
And wisely thus his wandering thought reproves:

"Unhappy prince! why thus indulge thy shame,
Why thus forgetful of thy former fame?
Why thus obscure thine eye, and deaf thine ear?—
View honour's charms, and virtue's summons hear.

Thy kind recalls thee to thy former post,
And shows the path thy erring feet have lost!
New tasks await thee in the field of fight,
The glorious station of a Christian knight!
Which thou hast left, by fatal love betray'd,
Lost in wild passion for a Pagan maid!
To thee this chastening is in mercy given,
And thou, dost thou reject the grace of Heaven?
Think where thy errors tend; thy state survey,
To senseless sorrow a regardless prey!
Thy feet are tottering on the brink of death,
Behold th' eternal gulf that gapes beneath!
Think, Tancred, think! this impious grief control,
That in a twofold death involves thy soul."

He ceas'd; nor here in vain the youth assail'd:
The fear of second death o'er all prevail'd;
His yielding heart confess'd the kind relief;
Returning reason calm'd his raging grief;
Yet still the frequent sighs his sorrow speak;
Still from his tongue the mournful accents break:
With tender sound his lips invoke the air,
Who lent perchance from Heaven a pitying ear.
Oh her, when sets the Sun, and when returns,
He calls incessant, and incessant moans.
So fares the nightingale, with anguish stung,
When some rude swain pursues her callow young,
Torn from the nest; all helpless and alone,
Each night she fills the woods with plaintive moan.

At length one morn, as sleep his eyes oppress'd
And o'er his sorrows shed the dews of rest;
Lo! in a dream, with starry robes array'd,
With heavenly charms appear'd the warrior-maid:
She seem'd to view him with a pitying look,
And dried his tears, and gently thus bespoke:
"Behold what glories round my person shine!
Then weep no more, thy faithful grief resign:
Such as I am, to thee my state I owe,
Who freed me from the vale of sin below:
Who made me worthy, midst the saints above,
To dwell with God in realms of endless love.
There wrapt in heavenly bliss, and crown'd with grace,

My hopes prepare for thee an equal place,
Where thou shalt stand before th' eternal throne,
Partake my glories, and enjoy thy own;
Unless thyself reject the mercy given,
Or sensual follies spurn the grace of Heaven:
Then live!—and know thou hast Clorinda's love,
As far as earthly thoughts can souls immortal move."

So speaking, from her eyes the lightning came,
And all her features glow'd with holy flame:
Then, lost in rays, she vanish'd from his sight,
And breath'd new comfort in the mourning knight,
Consoild he wak'd; and with a temperate mind
To skilful hands his wounded limbs consign'd,
And next he bade to inhume, with pious care,
The last dear relics of the breathless fair.
Though for the tomb no costly marbles came,
Nor hand Dardaëan wrought the sculptur'd frame;
Yet, as the time allow'd, the stone they chose,
And o'er the grave the figur'd structure rose.
With funeral pomp the troops the corpse convey'd,
While torches round their solemn light display'd:
High on the naked pine bet arms were plac'd,
And every rite the martial virgin grac'd.

Now Tancred sought the tomb, his vows to pay,
Where, cold in death, her precious relics lay:
Soon as he reach'd the pile, in which, embrin'd,
Repos'd the treasure of his tortur'd mind;
All pale and speechless for a time he stood,
Awful, with eyes unmov'd, the marble view'd:
At length releas'd, the gushing torrents broke,
He drew a length of sighs, and thus he spoke:
"O tomb rever'd! where all my hopes are fled;
O'er which my eyes such copious sorrows shed;
Thou bear'st not in thy womb a lifeless frame,
There love still dwells, and lights his wonted flame!
Still, still that form ador'd my breast inspires,
With not less ardent, but more painful fires!
O give these kisses, give these mournful sighs
To that lov'd form that is thy bosom lies,
Should e'er her spirit deign a look to turn,
Where sleep these relics in the silent urn;
Would she thy pity or my tears reprove?
Can hate or anger touch the blest above?
Ah! may she then my hapless crime forgive,
In that dear hope my soul consents to live:
She knows my erring hand the deed has wrought,
My heart was guiltless of so dire a thought:
Nor will she scorn that he, who owns his shame,
Should still, while life endures, adore her name;
Till death shall bid me here no longer rove,
But join us both in mutual peace above.
Then in one tomb our mortal parts may rest,
And in one Heaven our spirits may be blest!
So shall I dead enjoy what life denied,
O happy change! if Fate such bliss provide!"

Thus he: but now the dreadful tidings flew,
And spread in whispers through the hostile crew:
At length, the certain tale divulg'd around,
With cries and female shrieks the walls resound:
As if the foes had every fortress won,
And one vast blaze involv'd the ruin'd town.

But chief Arsetes every eye demands,
He o'er the rest in grief superior stands;
No tears from him like common sorrows flow,
Too deep his bosom feels the frantic woe.
With sordid dirt he soils his boary hairs,
He strikes his aged breast, his cheeks he tears.
While fix on him the vulgar held their look,
Thus in the midst the fierce Argantes spoke:

"When first I heard the city gates were clos'd,
And midst the foes the glorious dame expos'd,
Pain would I thoug have issu'd to her aid,
And shar'd one fortune with the hapless maid!
In vain I pray'd!—the king's command restrain'd,
And me reluctant in the town detain'd.
Oh! had I issu'd then, this faithful sword
Had safe the virgin to these walls restor'd:
Or, where her blood now stains the purple ground,
My days had run their race, with glory crown'd!
What could I more? What means remain'd untried?"

But men and gods alike my suit deny'd!
Pale lies she now, in fatal conflict slain;
Then hear what duties for this arm remain!
Hear, all Jerusalem! my purpose hear!
And conscious Heaven be witness whilst I swear!
I vow dire vengeance on the Christian's head:
And if I fail, on me thy bolts be shed!
The task be mine the murderer's life to take;
Ne'er shall this trusty sword my side forsake,
Till deep in Tancred's heart it finds a way,
And leaves his-come to ravenous fowls a prey!"

He spoke: well pleas'd his speech the Syrians
And loud applauses rend the sounding air. [Hear,
The hopes of vengeance all their pains relieve;
Each calms his sorrow, and forgets to grieve;
O empty words! O Heaven, in vain adjur'd!
Far other end disposing Fate ensur'd!
For soon subdu'd the Pagan boaster dies [lies!
By him who now in thought beneath his prowess

BOOK XIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Ismeno, by his enchantments, raises the demons, and appoints them to guard the wood which supplied the Christians with timbers to carry on the siege. The workmen being sent to fell the trees are terrified, and return to the camp. Several of the chiefs successively attempt the adventure, but in vain. Tancred then undertakes it, and penetrates into the wood; but at length retires, deceived by new illusions. The Christian army is afflicted with a drought, by which it is reduced to the utmost extremity. A disaffection spreads amongst the troops, several of whom withdraw themselves under favour of the night. Godfrey invokes the assistance of Heaven, and the camp is relieved by a seasonable shower.

But scarce consum'd in smouldering ashes falls
Th' enormous pile that shook the Pagan walls;

When other schemes Ismeno's arts compose,
To save the ramparts from th' invading foe:
He bends his thought to guard the woodland shade,
From which the Franks their mighty beams convey'd;

That thus their engines they no more may rear,
Nor Sion move the threatening fury fear.

Not far from where encamp'd the Christian bands,
Midst lonely vales, an aged forest stands:
Here, when the day with purest beams is bright,
The branches scarce admit a gloomy light;
Such as we view from morning's doubtful ray,
Or the faint glimmerings of departing day.
But when the Sun beneath the Earth descends,
Here mournful night her deeper veil extends;
Infernal darkness broods o'er every sight,
And chilling terrors every breast affright.

No shepherd here his flock to pasture drives;
No village swain, with lowing herd, arrives:
No pilgrim dares approach; but each dimitay'd
In distant prospect shows the dreary shade.
Here, with their minions, midnight hags repair,
Convey'd on sitting clouds through yielding air:
While one a dragon's fiery image bears;
And one a goat's mishapen likeness wears.
And here they celebrate, with impious rite,
The feasts profane and orgies of the night.
Thus went the fame: untouch'd the forest stood,
No hand presum'd to violate the wood;
Till now the fearless Franks its trees invade,
From these alone their vast machines they made.

The sorcerer hither came; the hour he chose,
When night around her deepest silence throws;
Close to his loins he girt his flowing vest,
Then form'd his circle, and his signs impress'd:
With one foot bare, amidst the magic round
He stood, and mutter'd many a potent sound.
Thrice turning to the east his face was shown;
Thrice to the regions of the setting Sun; [force
And thrice he shook the wand, whose wondrous
Could from the tomb recall the buried corpse:
As oft with naked foot the soil be struck,
Then thus aloud in dreadful accents spoke.

"Hear you! who once, by vengeful lightning
driven,

Fell headlong from the starry plains of Heaven!
Ye powers, who guide the storms and wintry war,
The wandering rulers of the middle air!
And you, the ministers of endless woe
To sinful spirits in the shades below,
Inhabitants of Hell! your aid I claim,
And thine, dire monarch of the realms of flame!
Attend my will; these woods in charge receive;
To you consign'd each fatal plant I leave.
As human bodies human souls contain,
So you enshrin'd within these trees remain.
Thus shall the Christians fly, at least forbear
To fell this forest, and your anger dare."

He said; and added many an impious spell,
Dreadful to bear, and terrible to tell.
While thus he murmur'd, from the face of night
Th' affrighted stars withdrew their glittering light;
The Moon, disturb'd, no more her beams reveal'd,
But, wrapt in clouds, her silver horns conceal'd.

Now, fill'd with wrath, he rais'd his voice again:
"Why are ye thus, ye fiends! inok'd in vain?
Why this delay? or do you wait to hear
More potent words, and accents more severe?
Though long disus'd, my memory yet retains
Each deeper art that every power constrains:

These lips conceal'd that name with terror heard,
That awful name by every demon fear'd;
The name that startles Hell's tremendous reign,
And calls forth Pluto from his own domain.
Hear! and attend!" No more th' enchanter said,
The spell was ended, and the fiends obey'd.

Unnumber'd spirits to the grove repair,
Of those that wander through the fields of air;
Of those that deep in Earth's foundations lie,
In seats far distant from the cheerful sky.
Still in their mind they bear the high command,
That late, from fields of fight, their host restrain'd:
Yet each compell'd the direful charge receives,
Intrudes the trunk, or lurks beneath the leaves.

The sorcerer now, his impious purpose wrought,
With secret joy the monarch's presence sought.
"O king! confirm thy hope, thy doubts give o'er,
Behold secur'd thy throne and regal power!
No more the Christians, as their thoughts intend,
Can bid their towers against the town ascend."
He said; and to th' attentive prince disclos'd
The various spells by magic power compos'd;
Then thus pursu'd—"To what my lips have told,
As grateful tidings let me now unfold.

Know, Mars and Sul will bow their force combine,
To dart their mutual beams from Leo's sign:
No fanning winds shall cool the burning ray,
Nor showers or dews refresh their sultry day.
But happy we such season here may bear,
Reliev'd with pleasing shade and gentle air:

This city shelter yields and plenteous streams,
And cooling gales to check the scorching beams;
While on the barren earth the Franks shall lie,
And feel the fury of th' inclement sky.
Thus, first subdu'd by Heaven, th' Egyptian traits
Shall o'er their bow an easy conquest gain.
So shall thy foes, without thy labour, yield:
Then tempt no more the fortune of the field.
But if too high Argantes' courage glows,
To bear, what prudence wills, a short repose:
If still, as wont, he urge thee to the fight,
The care be thine to curb th' impetuous knight:
For soon will Heaven on thee its peace bestow,
And whelm in ruin you flagitious foe."

With joy the king these welcome tidings heard,
The engines of the foe no longer fear'd:
But not for this he ceas'd his watchful care,
The walls to view, and every breach repair;
Alike the citizens the toils divide,
And various throughs the works incessant plied.

Meanwhile the pious chief, their labours know'd,
Remov'd no more to attempt the sacred town,
Till once again his lofty tower be rear'd,
And every engine for th' attack prepar'd.
Where midst the wood the living timbers grew,
The workmen swift he sent the trees to hew;
These reach'd at early dawn the gloomy shade,
But sudden fears their trembling souls dismay'd.

As simple children dread the hours of night,
When fabled spectres fill their minds with fright;
So these were seiz'd with dread: yet scarce they knew

From what new cause th' unwonted terrors grew.
Not fancy form'd perhaps a numerous train
Of empty phantasms, and chimeras vain!
Back from the wood with speed the camp they sought,

And wild reports, and tales uncertain brought.
The Christian warriors scorn'd their dastard fears,
And heard their words with unbelieving ears.

Then Godfrey next dispatch'd a squadron tried,
A valiant troop, that every chance defied,
To succour those, and urge their fringing bands
To act with courage what their chief commands.
Now near they came, where midst the horrid shade
The fiends conceal'd their impious dwelling made.
Soon as their eyes the dreary seats behold,
Each beating heart is numb'd with freezing cold,
Yet on they move, while looks of boldness hide
Th' ignoble thoughts that every breast divide.
Arriv'd at length within the vale they stood,
And reach'd the entrance of th' enchanted wood.
When sudden issu'd forth a rambling sound,
As when an earthquake rocks the trembling ground;
A hollow noise, like murmuring winds, they hear,
Or dashing billows breaking on their ear:
There serpents seem to hiss, and lions roar,
To howl the wolf, to grunt the tusk'd boar;
The trumpet's clangour sounds, the thunders roll,
And mingled clamours echo to the pole! [pleas'd];
At once their bloodless cheeks their thoughts die—
A thousand signs their timorous hearts betray'd:
No more could discipline their ranks sustain,
A secret power dismay'd the routed train;
At length they fled, when one, with looks confus'd,
To pious Godfrey thus their flight accus'd:

"No more we boast, O chief! these woods to sell,
Impervious woods, secur'd by hidden spell!
Infernal furies midst the gloom resort,
And Pluto there has fix'd his horrid court!
Of triple adamant his heart is made,
Who unappall'd beholds the fatal shade:
And more than mortal he, who, free from fear,
Can the dire howlings and the thunders hear."

He said; and while he thus his tale pursu'd,
Amongst the listening chief Alcaetus stood;
A man of courage rash, whose daring mind
Scorn'd every monster dreadful to mankind;
Nor storms nor earthquakes could his fear excite,
Nor aught that fills the world with pale affright.

He shook his head, and smiling thus replied:
"By me this arduous task shall soon be tried!
Alone I go you dreaded woods to fell,
Where visionary shapes and terrors dwell.
No ghastly spectres shall this hand restrain,
And fiends shall howl and thunders roar in vain!
Behold, my soul each threatening power defies,
Though Hell's dire passage gape before my eyes!"
Boastful he spoke: the leader gave consent:
Frore thence with daring steps the warrior went.
At length the forest to his sight appear'd,
And from within the mingled noise was heard.
But still the knight pursu'd his course unmov'd;
No terrors yet his dauntless bosom prov'd.
Now had his feet the soil forbidden trod,
When lo! a rising fire his steps withstood:
Wide and more wide it spread, and seem'd to frame
Huge lofty walls and battlements of flame!
The wondrous fence around the wood extend'd,
And from the sounding axe its trees defend'd.
What monsters arm'd upon the ramparts stand!
What horrid forms compose the grisly band!
With threatening eyes some view him from afar,
And some, with clashing arms, the champion dare,
At length he flies, but with a tardy flight;
So parts a lion yielding in the fight.
Surpris'd, his conscious heart the doubts confess'd,
And own'd the fears that struggled in his breast.
Then, to the camp return'd, with humbled pride,
From every eye he bought the shame to hide:

No longer darst, his face with grief o'erspread,
Among the warriors lift his haughty head.

By Godfrey summon'd now, awhile he stay'd,
And with excuses vain the time delay'd:
Slowly at length he came, unwilling spoke,
And from his lips imperfect accents broke.
Fell well the leader saw his troubled mind,
And, by his looks, the boaster's flight divin'd. [fend?

"What may," he cries, "these strange events por-
What tales are these that Nature's law transcend?
Is there a man who, fill'd with glorious heat,
Dares yet explore the forest's dark retreat?
Now let his courage yonder seats invade,
Or bring more certain tidings from the shade."

So spoke the chief: and three succeeding days
The boldest warriors, urg'd by thirst of praise,
Assay'd the dreary wood: but, struck with dread,
Each knight by turns the threatening terrors fled.

Now in her tomb has noble Tancred laid
The honour'd relics of his much-lov'd maid:
Pale are his looks, his languid limbs appear
Too weak the cuirass or the shield to bear.
But, since the Christian cause his sword requires,
Nor toil nor danger damps his generous fires,
Heroic ardours all his soul inflame,
And give new vigour to his feeble frame.

With native firmness arm'd, he hastes to prove
The secret perils of the magic grove.
Unmov'd his eyes the gloomy shade behold;
In vain the earthquakes rock'd, the thunders
At first a transient doubt assail'd his breast, [roll'd:
But each unworthy thought was soon repress'd.
Still on he pass'd, till full before his eyes
The burning walls and flaming ramparts rise.

At this awhile his hasty course he stay'd:
"What hero can arms avail?" the warrior said,
"Shall I, where you devouring furies wait,
Amidst the flames attempt a desperate fate?
Ne'er would I fly from death in glory's strife,
When fame, when public good, demands my life.

From useless perils yet the brave refrain;
The warrior's courage here were spent in vain:
Yet how will yonder camp my flight receive?
What other forest can their want relieve?

By Godfrey then the task will sure he try'd:
These fires perhaps may vanish when defy'd.
But be it as it may! th' attempt I claim!—"
He said, and fearless rush'd amidst the flame;
At once he leapt, and press'd unburt the ground,
Nor fire nor heat th' intrepid hero found:

At once the visionary flames were fled,
And all around a dismal darkness spread:
Tempests and clouds arose: but soon anew
The storms were vanish'd, and the clouds withdrew!
Surpris'd, but dauntless, noble Tancred stood,
And when the skies thus clear'd the warrior view'd,

With steps secure he pierc'd the unhallow'd glade,
And trac'd each secret winding of the shade.
No woodrout phantoms now his course oppos'd;
No burning towers the guarded wood enclos'd;
But off the trees, with tangled boughs entwin'd,
Perplex'd his passage, and his sight confin'd.

At length a sylvan theatre he found;
Nor plant nor tree within the verdant round;
Save in the midst a stately cypress rose,
And high in air advanc'd its spreading boughs.
To this the knight his wandering steps address'd,
And saw the trunk with various marks impress'd:
Like those (ere men were us'd in scriptur'd lore)
Mysterious Egypt us'd in days of yore.

Amidst the signs unknown he chanc'd to find
These words engrav'd conspicuous on the rind:

"O valiant knight! whose feet have dar'd to
These mansion's sacred to the silent dead, [bread
If pity e'er thy dauntless breast could move,
Forbear to violate this fatal grove.
Reverse the souls depriv'd of vital air,
Nor with the dead an impious war declare."

These lines the knight perus'd, and lost in thought
He long in vain the secret meaning sought.
Now through the leaves a whispering breeze he bears,
And human voices murmuring in his ears,
That various passions in his heart instill;
Soft pity, grief, and awe, his bosom fill.

At length, resolv'd, his shining steel he drew,
And struck the tree, when (dreadful to his view!)
The wounded bark a sanguine current shed,
And stain'd the grassy turf with streaming red.
With horror chill'd, yet fix'd th' event to know,
Again his arm renew'd the forceful blow:
When from the trunk was heard a human groan,
And plaintive accents in a female tone:

"Too much on me before thy rage was bent,
O cruel Tancred! cease,—at last relent!
By thee from life's delightful seat I fell,
Driven from the breast where once I us'd to dwell.
Why dost thou still pursue with ruthless hate
This trunk, to which I now am fix'd by fate?
Ah! cruel!—shall not death th' unhappy save?
And wouldst thou reach thy foes within the grave?
Clorinda once was I!—nor here confin'd,
My soul alone informs a rugged rind:

The like mysterious fortune waits on all
Who sink in fight beneath you lofty wall;
By strange enchantment here (relentless doom!)
They find in sylvan forms a living tomb;
These trunks and branches human senses endow,
Nor canst thou, guiltless, lop the vital boughs."

As one distemper'd, to whose sleeping eyes
A dragon or chimera seems to rise,
Attempts to fly, while yet he scarce believes
The monstrous phantom that his sense deceives:
So far'd the lover, doubting what he heard;
Yet, midst his doubts, he yielded and he fear'd.

A thousand tender thoughts his bosom pain'd,
No more his trembling hand the sword retain'd.
Now in his mind he views the offended fair
With all the sighs and tumults of despair:
Nor longer can he bear, with pitying eyes, [cries I
To view the streaming bark, or bear the mournful
Thus he, whose courage every deed had try'd,
And all the various forms of death defy'd,

Submits his reason to delusive charms,
And love's all-powerful name his breast disarms.
A whirlwind now arose with sudden roar,
Which from the wood his fallen saviour bore.
The warrior, thus subdu'd, no longer strove,
But left th' attempt, and issu'd from the grove.

His sword regaining, to the chief he came,
And thus at length began his tale to frame:
"Unthought-of truths, O prince! I shall reveal,
Wondrous to know, incredible to tell!
I heard the dreadful sounds, the fire I view'd
That, sudden rising, in my passage stood;
Like walls and battlements the flames were rear'd,
Where armed monsters for defence appear'd.
Yet free from heat I pass'd the burning towers,
Nor found my path oppos'd by hostile powers:
To this succeeded clouds, and storms, and night,
But soon again return'd the cheerful light.

More shall I speak?—A human spirit lives
In every tree, and sense and reason gives
To every plant—deep groans assail'd mine ear,
And still I seem the mournful sounds to hear.
Each parted trunk pours forth a purple stream,
Like sanguine currents from a wounded limb;
I own myself abdu'd—no more I dare
A branch discover, or a sapling tear."

While Tancred thus his wondrous tidings brought,
The leader waver'd, lost in anxious thought:
Uncertain if himself th' attempt to prove,
And try the dangers of th' enchanted grove;
Or seek what other distant wood might yield
The planks to frame his engines for the field;
But from his doubts the hermit soon relieves
The pensive chief, and thus his counsel gives:

"Forgo thy thoughts, nor yonder wood invade,
Another hand must pierce the fatal shade.
Now, now, the vessel gains the distant strand,
She furls her sails, she cuts the yielding sand!
See! where at length th' expected hero breaks
His shameful bondage, and the shore forsakes!
Full soon will Heaven yon towering walls o'erthrow,
And quell the numbers of th' Egyptian foe!

While thus he spoke, inflam'd his looks appear'd;
With more than mortal sound his voice was heard.

The pious Godfrey, still with cares oppress'd,
New plans revolv'd within his thoughtful breast.
But now, receiv'd in Cancer's fiery sign,
The Sun, with scorching rays, began to shine:
A direful drought succeeds; the martial train
No more the labours of the field sustain.

Each gentle star has quench'd its kindly beam:
From sullen skies malignant planets gleam;
Their baneful influence on the earth they shed,
And wide through air infectious vapours spread.
To dreadful day more dreadful night succeeds,
And each new morn increasing terror breeds.
The Sun no'er rises cheerful to the sight,
But sanguine spots disdain his sacred light:
Pale hovering mists around his forehead play,
The sad forerunners of a fatal day!

His setting orb in crimson veins to mourn,
Denouncing greater woes at his return;
And adds new horrors to the present doom,
By certain fear of evils yet to come!

All nature pants beneath the burning sky:
The earth is cleft, the lessening streams are dry:
The barren clouds, like streaky flames, divide,
Dispers'd and broken through the sultry void.
No cheerful object for the sight remains;
Each gentle gale its grateful breath retains;
Alone the wind from Libya's sands respire,
And burns each warrior's breast with secret fire.
Nocturnal meteors blaze in dusky air,
Thick lightnings flash, and livid comets glare!
No pleasing moisture nature's face renews:
The Moon no longer sheds her pearly dews
To cheer the mourning Earth; the plants and flowers
In vain require the soft and vital showers.
Sweet slumber flies from every restless night,
In vain would man his balmy power invite;
Sleepless they lie; but far above the rest,
The rage of thirst their fainting souls oppress'd;

¹ This drought, with which the Christian army was afflicted, is mentioned in history. In the particulars of the description the poet has made great use of Lucretia.

For, vers'd in guile, Juden's impious king
With poisonous juice had tainted every spring;
Whose currents now with dire pollution flow,
Like Styx and Acheron in realms below.
The slender stream, where Siloa's gentle wave
Once to the Christians draughts unstinted gave,
Now scarcely murmurs, in his channels dry,
And yields their fainting host a small supply.
But not the Po, when moist his waters swell,
Would seem too vast their raging thirst to quell:
Nor mighty Ganges, nor the seven-mouth'd Nile,
That with his deluge gladd' th' Egyptian soil.
If e'er their eyes, in happier times, have view'd,
Begin with grassy turf, some crystal food:
Or living waters foam from Alpine hills,
Or through soft herbage purl the limpid rills:
Such flattering scenes again their fancies frame,
And add new fuel to increase their flame.
Still in the mind the wish'd idea reigns:
But still the fever rages in their veins!
Then might you see on earth the warriors lie,
Whose limbs robust could every toil defy:
Inur'd the weight of ponderous arms to bear,
Inur'd in fields the hostile steel to dare:
Deep in their flesh the hidden furies prey,
And eat, by slow degrees, their lives away.

The courser, late with generous pride indur'd,
Now loathes the grass, his once delightful food:
With feeble steps he scarcely seems to tread,
And prone to earth is hung his languid head.
No memory now of ancient fame remains,
No thirst of glory on the dusty plains:
The conquer'd spoils and trappings once bestow'd,
His joy so late, are now a painful load!

Now pines the faithful dog, nor heads the board,
Nor heads the service of his dearer lord!
Out-stretch'd he lies, and, as he pants for breath,
Receives at every gasp new draughts of death.

In vain has Nature's law the air assign'd
To allay the inward heat of human kind:
What here, alas! can air mankind avail,
When fevers float on every burning gale?

Thus droop'd the earth, and, every glory lost,
Dire prospects terrified the faithful host:
Complaints aloud resound from every band,
And words like these are heard on either hand:

"What next can Godfrey hope? Why longer stay
Till one sad fate sweep all our camp away?
Still can he think yon lofty walls to gain,
What force is left, what engines now remain?
And sees not he, of all the host alone,
The wrath of God by every signal shown?
A thousand signs and prodigies declare
His will oppos'd against this fatal war.
What scorching rays the sickening land invade!
Nor Ind nor Libya asks a cooler shade!
Then thinks our leader no regard we claim,
And views us as a vile, a worthless name?
That souls like ours to death must tamely yield,
So he may still the imperial sceptre wield?
Behold! the boasted chief, the pious nam'd,
For acts of mercy and for goodness fam'd,
Forgets his people's weal, his power to raise,
And on their ruin build destructive praise! [dry'd,
While thus we mourn each spring; and fountain
From Jordan's stream his thirst was well supply'd;
Amidst his festive friends the prince reclines,
And mixes cooling draughts with Cretan wines."

Thus said the Franks; but louder far complain'd
The Grecian chief, who Godfrey's sway disdain'd;

Who with reluctance long his rule obey'd :
 " Why should I tamely perish here ?" he said,
 " And why with me on mine shall ruin wait ?
 If Godfrey blindly rush on certain fate,
 On him and on his Franks th' event be thrown,
 Nor let us fall for follies not our own."
 Thus said the chief, nor bade the boat adieu,
 But with his train at evening's close withdrew *.
 Soon as the morn beheld his squadron fled,
 On other troops the quick contagion spread.
 Those that in battle Ademar obey'd,
 And brave Clothareus, now in silence laid,
 (Since death, which all dissolves, had burst the bands

That held them subject to their lords' commands)
 Already meditate their secret fight ;
 And some depart beneath the favouring night.

All this full well observant Godfrey knew,
 Nor yet his soul would rigorous means pursue
 To oppose the ill ; resolv'd the faith to prove,
 That rapid streams can stay, and rocks remove ;
 The Ruler of the world with prayers implore
 The sacred fountains of his grace to pour.
 With hands conjoin'd, and eyes with zeal on flame,
 He thus aloud invoc'd the eternal name :

" O King ! and Father ! if thy pitying hand
 E'er shed thy manna in the desert land ;
 If e'er thy will to man such virtue gave,
 From veins of rock to draw the gushing wave ;
 Be now for these thy wondrous power display'd !
 But if their merits little claim thine aid,
 O let thy grace, to veil their faults be given,
 Still let thy warriors feel the care of Heaven !"

These righteous prayers, in humble words expressed,

On eagle-wings to Heaven their flight address'd ;
 There fall before the throne of God appear'd :
 Th' Eternal Father with complacence heard :
 His awful eyes he bent on Syria's lands,
 And view'd the labours of his faithful bands :
 He saw their sufferings with a gracious look,
 Then thus, with mild benevolence, he spoke :

" Lo ! to this hour, on Earth my camp below'd
 Has various woes and dreadful perils prov'd !
 The world, in arms, resist their glorious toils,
 And Hell obstructs their course with all its wiles.
 Now, chang'd the scene, a happier fate attends :
 From favouring clouds the friendly shower descends :
 Their matchless hero comes to exalt their name,
 And Egypt's host arrives to crown their fame."

Th' Almighty coas'd : Heaven trembled as he
 The stars and every wandering planet shook ; (spoke,
 The air was hush'd, the sea was calm'd to rest,
 And every hill and cave its awe confess'd.
 Swift to the left the lightning's blaze appear'd ;
 At once aloft the thunder's noise was heard.
 The troops transported view the lowering skies,
 And hail the rolling sound with joyful cries.
 Now thickening clouds their gloomy veil extend :
 Not these in vapours from the earth ascend
 By Phœbus' warmth ; but Heaven the deluge pours,
 And opens all the sluices of its stores.

* History mentions that, in the famine which the Christians suffered before Antioch, the Grecian commander departed, under pretence of seeking assistance from the emperor at Constantinople, and that he returned no more. The poet feigns this circumstance to have happened before the walls of Jerusalem.

The torrents fall impetuous from the skies ;
 Above their banks the foamey rivers rise.
 As on the shore, when heats have parch'd the plain,
 The cackling brood expect the kindly rain ;
 They greet the moisture with expanded wings,
 And sport and plunge beneath the cooling springs :
 The Christians thus salute with joyful cry
 The grateful deluge from the pitying sky.
 These on their locks or vests the stream receive ;
 From helmets or vases those their thirst relieve ;
 Some hold their hands beneath the cooling wave ;
 Their faces some, and some their temples lave :
 While Earth, that late her gaping rifts displac'd,
 And fainting lay to parching heat expos'd,
 Receives and ministers the vital showers
 To fading herbs, to plants, to trees and flowers :
 Her fever thus allay'd, new health returns.
 No more the flame within her bosom burns ;
 Again new beauties grace her gladden'd soil,
 Again renew'd her hills and valleys smile.

Now ceas'd the rain ; the Sun restor'd the day,
 And shed with grateful warmth a temper'd ray :
 As when his beams benign their influence bring
 To unlock, with genial power, the welcome spring,
 O wondrous faith ! that, trusting Heaven above,
 Can purge the air, and every ill remove ;
 Can change the seasons, and reverse their state,
 Subdue the stars, and stop impending fate !

BOOK XIV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Godfrey is admonished in a dream to recall Rinaldo to the camp. Guelpho pleads for his nephew's return, and Godfrey consents to it. Ubald and Charles the Dane are appointed the messengers for that purpose ; these by the directions of Peter proceed to Acalon, where they are entertained by a Christian magician, who shows them many wonders. He gives them a particular relation of the manner in which Rinaldo was insoured by Armida, and then instructs them fully how to deliver him from the power of the enchantress.

Now from her mother's ancient lap arose
 Indulgent Night, befriending sweet repose ;
 Soft breezes in her train attendant flew ;
 While from her robe she shook the pearly dew ;
 The fluttering Zephyrs breath'd a grateful wind,
 And sooth'd the balmy slumbers of mankind.

Now, every thought forgot, the peaceful host
 Their cares and labours in oblivion lost :
 But, ever watchful o'er her creatures' state,
 In light eternal Heaven's Almighty sate :
 His looks he turn'd, and view'd, from upper skies,
 The Christian leader with benignant eyes ;
 To him, with speed, he sent a mystic dream,
 To speak the purpose of the will supreme.
 Not far from where the Sun, with eastern ray,
 Through golden portals pours the beamy day,
 A crystal gate there stands, whose valves unfold
 Ere yet the skies their dawning light behold.
 From this the dreams arise, which heavenly power
 To pious mortals sends in gracious hour :
 From this to Godfrey's tent the vision fled,
 And o'er the chief his radiant pinions spread.
 No slumber o'er such pleasing scenes display'd,
 As now the hero in a trance survey'd ;

That brought the starry muses to his eyes,
And open'd all the secrets of the skies :
Then full reflected to his senses was shown
The happy state by righteous spirits known.

He seem'd aloft to realms of glory traiv'd,
Where beams on beams with mingled lustre blaz'd.
There, while he, wondering, view'd the seats around,
And heard the sacred choir their hymns resound,
Begirt with rays, and cloth'd with lambent flame,
Full in his sight a graceful warrior came.

His tuneful voice no sounds can reach below,
And from his lips these gentle accents flow :

"Then will not Godfrey own this face again,
And is thy friend, thy Hugo, seen in rain?"

To whom the chief reply'd: "That from divine,
Where circling beams of dazzling glory shine,
So far my feeble mortal sense obscur'd,
That scarcely yet my memory stands assur'd."
He said; and thrice with eager arms essay'd
With pious love to clasp the friendly shade:
And thrice the phantom mock'd his fruitless care,
And fled like empty dream or fleeting air.

"Think not," the vision cried, "thine eyes behold
A mortal substance of terrestrial mould:

A naked spirit stands before thy sight,
A citizen of this celestial light.

Behold God's temple! here his warriors rest,
With these shalt thou reside, far ever blest."

"When comes that happy hour?" the chief replies,
"Ah! now release my soul from earthly ties!"

"Soon shalt thou," Hugo thus return'd again,
"Partake the triumphs of th' immortal train:

But first thy warfare claims new toils below;
In fields of fight thy courage yet must glow.
'Tis time to free from impious Pagan bands
The sacred empire of Judea's lands;
And, firmly fix'd, the Christian throne to place,
The seat thy brother is decreed to grace.
But that thy breast may feel a hotter fire,
And purer pleasures purer thoughts inspire;
Contemplate well this place, these starry rays,
Where Heaven's Almighty pours the boundless blaze!

Hark! how th' angelic choir their hymns prolong,
And warble to the lyre celestial song!

Now cast thy sight to yonder globe below,
See! all that Earth on mortals can bestow!
Behold what vileness there obscures mankind;
Say, what rewards can there the virtuous find.

A naked solitude, a narrow space
Confines the senseless pride of human race.
Earth, like an isle, is round with waves embrac'd;
Survey you sea, the mighty and the vast!
Which here can no such glorious titles claim,
A pool unnoted, and a worthless name!"

He said; and Godfrey downward bent his eyes,
And view'd the Earth with pity and surprise:
He smil'd to see the numerous nations' boast,
Lands, floods, and oceans, in an atom lost;
Amaz'd that man, with sensual follies blind,
Should there, immerg'd in smoke, in gloom confin'd,
Pursue vain empire, and an airy name,
Nor heed the call of Heaven, and virtue's lasting fame.

Then thus he said: "Since 'tis not God's decree,
From mortal prison yet my soul to free;
O be my guide! Vouchsafe the path to show,
Amidst the errors of the world below."

"The path before thee," Hugo then replied,
"Pursue, nor from the track remove aside.

This only counsel from thy friend receive;
From exile brave Bertoldo's soon retrieve,
For, if to thee the almighty King of Heaven
The sovereign guidance of the host has given;

'Tis his decree no less, th' intrepid knight
Should execute thy high commands in fight:
'Tis thine the foremost duties to sustain,
To him the second honours must remain:
To him alone 'tis given the woods to fell,
So deeply guarded by the fiends of Hell;
From him the troops, that seem a lifeless host,
Their numbers weaken'd, and their courage lost;
That inly meditate a shameful flight,
Shall gain new vigour for th' approaching fight:
So shall they teach you haughty walls to yield,
And rout the eastern armies in the field."

He said, and ceas'd; when Godfrey made reply:
"The knight's return would fill my breast with joy:
Thou know'st (and thou my secret thought canst
That in my soul he meets a brother's love. {prove},
But say, what offers must I make? and where
To seek him shall the messengers repair?
How suits it with my state, the youth to greet,
To exact obedience, or with prayer entreat?"

To whom the shade: "The Eternal King, whose
To thee has given on Earth a leader's place, [grace
Decrees that those o'er whom he gave thee sway,
To thee, their head, should rightful homage pay:
Request not then—(thou canst not, void of blame,
With servile prayers debase a general's name)—
But when thy friends beseech, thine ears incline;
The part be theirs 't' entreat, to yield be thine:
To thee, inspir'd by Heaven, shall Guelpho plead,
And ask forgiveness for Rinaldo's deed.

Though now far distant from th' abandon'd host
He lives, in love and ease inglorious lost;
A few short days will bring the youth again,
To shine in arms amidst his social train:
For holy Peter can thy envoys send
Where certain tidings shall their search attend:
They shall be taught the arts, and given the power
The knight to free, and to the camp restore.
Then all thy wandering partners of the war
Shall Heaven at length reduce beneath thy care.
Yet, ere I cease, one truth I shall reveal,
Which well I know thy breast with joy shall fill:
His blood shall mix with thine, and thence a race
Of glorious names succeeding times shall grace!"

He ended here; and pass'd like smoke away,
Or fleeting clouds before the solar ray.
Then sleep, departing, left the hero's rest
At once with wonder and with joy possess.
The pious chief th' advancing morn survey'd,
And straight his limbs in weighty arms array'd.
Soon in his tent th' attending leaders met,
In daily council where conven'd they sat;
There every future act they weigh with care,
And every labour of the war prepare. [taught,

Then noble Guelpho, who, as Heaven had
New plans revolv'd within his careful thought,
First turn'd to Godfrey midst the warrior-train:
"O prince for mercy fam'd," (he thus began)
"I come to implore thy grace; thy grace disperse, Though rush the deed, though recent be the offence:

¹ The poet here, as in the fifth book, admirably preserves the decorum of Godfrey's character, by making the request of his recall come from Guelpho.

Hence may it seem too boldly here I stand,
 And immaturity urge the fond demand.
 But when I think, to Godfrey's friendly ear,
 For brave Rinaldo I my suit prefer;
 Or view myself, of no ignoble strain.
 That intercedes thy favouring grace to gain;
 I trust thou wilt not such a boon deny,
 Which all will here receive with equal joy.
 Ah! let the youth return, retrieves his name,
 And lave, in fields of blood, his sullied fame.
 What hand but his intrepid shall invade
 The forest-gloom, and bare the fatal shade?
 Who more adventurous in the field to dare,
 Despising death, amidst the ranks of war?
 Behold he shakes the walls, the gate o'erthrows,
 Or foremost scales the ramparts of the foe!
 Restore him to the camp!—O chief! restore
 The hope of battle, and the soldiers' power.
 Restore to me a nephew well belov'd,
 A champion to thyself, in arms approv'd:
 Nor let him in ignoble sloth remain,
 But give him to his rank and fame again:
 Thy conquering banners let him still pursue,
 So may the gazing world his virtues view:
 Great deeds he then shall show in open light,
 While thou, his leader, rul'st the field of fight.”

He ended here; and, while his suit he press'd,
 All join'd, with favouring murmurs, his request:
 And Godfrey now (each inward thought conceal'd)
 Seem'd to his reasons and his suit to yield.
 “Can I,” he cried, “refuse the grace requir'd,
 By all expected, and by all desir'd?
 Here rigour ends—enough your counsel moves;
 Then be it as the public voice approves.
 Let young Rinaldo view the camp again,
 But learn henceforth his anger to restrain:
 May he, with actions equal to your praise,
 Fulfill your wishes, and his glory raise!
 Him to recall, O Guelpho! be thy care:
 (And grateful sure the tidings to his ear!)
 ’Tis thine the trusty envoy to select,
 And where the youth resides his steps direct.”

He ceas'd; when, rising, thus the Dane began:
 “An envoy if you seek, behold the man!
 Nor length of way, nor perils I decline,
 To him this honour'd weapon to resign.”

So spoke the knight, with generous ardour mov'd,
 And noble Guelpho his desire approv'd;
 And join'd with him, the labours to divide,
 Ubald, in every art of wisdom tried,
 In youth, had many regions seen,
 Explor'd the customs and the ways of men;
 And wander'd long, with unremitting toil,
 From polar cold to Libya's burning soil;
 From different nations different arts he drew;
 Their laws, their manners, and their speech he knew:
 In age mature him Guelpho now career'd,
 His match-lov'd friend, and partner of his breast.

Such were the men, selected midst the host
 From exile to recall the champion lost:
 These Guelpho now instructs their course to bend
 Where mighty Besmond's regal walls ascend:
 Since all (for thus the public fame was blown)
 Had fix'd the knight's retreat in Antioch's town:
 But here the word the reverend hermit took,
 And, interposing, on their converse broke:
 “Ye warriors brave! attend my words,” he said,
 “Nor be by voice of vulgar fame misled;
 But haste to Ascalon, and seek the shores
 Where to the sea a stream its tribute pours:

There shall a sage, the Christians' friend, appear;
 Attend his dictates, and his counsel hear:
 Full well he knows, long since foretold by me,
 Of this your journey, fix'd by God's decree:
 'Tis his your steps to guide; from him receive Such welcome as a faithful heart can give.”

The hermit said; and, as his words requir'd,
 The ready knights observ'd what Heaven inspir'd:
 Direct to Ascalon they bent their way,
 Where breaks against the land the neighbouring
 Their ears perceive not yet the hollow roar [sea.
 Of dashing billows sounding on the shore:
 When now the chiefs a rapid stream beheld,
 With sudden noise and rushing torrents swell'd:
 The banks no more confine its headlong course;
 Swift as a shaft it drives with furious force.
 While in suspense they stand, a sage appears
 Of reverend aspect and experienc'd years.
 An oaken wreath surrounds his aged brows;
 In lengthen'd folds his snowy vesture flows;
 A wand he shakes; secure he treads the waves,
 And with his feet unbath'd the torrent waves.

So, near the freezing pole, the village swains
 (When winter binds the floods in icy chains)
 Oft o'er the Rhine in fearless numbers glide
 With hissing sound, and skim the solid tide.

Now came the sage to where, in deep surprise,
 On him the silent warriors fix their eyes;
 Then thus: “O friends! you tempt an arduous task,
 Your high designs unconsum'd guidance ask
 What toils, what dangers still attend your way,
 What seas to pass, what regions to survey!
 Far must you search, where other seas ascend,
 Beyond the limits of our world extend.
 But first vouchsafe to view my homely cell,
 The hidden mansion where retir'd I dwell:
 There shall my lips such wondrous truths declare,
 As well befits your purpose now to hear.”

He ceas'd; and had the stream a passage yield:
 Th' obedient stream a sudden path reveal'd;
 Full in the midst the parting waves divide,
 A liquid mountain rose on either side.
 Then by the hand he seiz'd the knights, and led
 Within the winding river's secret bed.
 There doubtful day scarce glimmers to their sight;
 As when pale Cynthia through the grove, by night,
 Sheds from her slender horns a trembling light.
 There caverns huge they view; from these arise
 The watery stores that yield the Earth supplies,
 To run in rills, in gushing springs ascend,
 To flow in rivers, or in lakes extend.
 There might they see whence Po and Ister come,
 Hydaspes, Ganges, and Euphrates' stream:
 Whence mighty Tanais first derives his course;
 And Nilus there reveals his secret source.
 Deep underneath they next a flood behold,
 Where sulphur mix'd with living silver roll'd:
 Till these, by Sol's enlivening rays refin'd,
 In solid gold or lucid crystal shin'd.

* Here begins the narrative of the wonders that with by these knights, in their embassy to recall Rinaldo, and the description of the enchantments of Armida; and I have little doubt, notwithstanding of the severity, and perhaps pedantry, of classical criticism, but every poetical reader will call these the finest passages of the Jerusalem. The reader will see what use our admirable Spenser has made of these xivth, xvth, and xvith books.

Along the banks they saw, on either side,
Unnumber'd jewels deck the wealthy tide:
From these, by fits, a flashing splendour play'd,
And char'd the horrors of the dusky shade.
There shines the sapphire gay with azure bright,
And there the jacinth gives a pleasing light:
There flames the ruby; there the diamond beams:
And milder there the verdant emerald gleams!

The warriors still pursu'd their reverend guide;
These wondrous scenes in deep amazement ty'd
Each various sense; till prudent Ubald broke
The silence first, and thus the sage bespoke:
"Say, father! what the place we now behold?
Where dost thou lead? and what thy state, unfold?
Scarce can I tell, bewilder'd with surprise,
If truth I view, or dreams deceive my eyes!"

Then he: "Lo! here the spacious womb of Earth,
Where all productions first receive their birth:
Nor could you thus her entrails dark explore,
Without my guidance and superior power:
Now to my palace I your steps convey (My palace shining with resplendent day).
A Pagan was I born, but gracious Heaven
A second life by cleansing streams has given.
Think not these wooders, that confound your thought,

By influence of the Stygian angels wrought.
Heaven shield I should invoke Cocytus' shore,
Or Phlegethon with impious arts implore!
But well my knowledge from its source reveals
The virtue every plant or spring conceals:
I meditate the stars, explore the cause
Of Nature's works, and trace her secret laws.
Yet deem not, ever distant from the skies,
In subterranean seats my dwelling lies.
For oft on Lebanon or Carmel's brow
I make abode and view the world below.
There Mars and Venus to my searching eyes,
Without a cloud, in all their aspects rise.
Each star I know, of swift or lingering course,
Of mild appearance, or malignant force:
Beneath my feet the vapours I survey,
Now dark, and now with Iris' colours gay.
What exhalations rains and dews compose
I mark, and how the wind obliquely blows:
What fires the lightning, how the bolt descends,
And through the air a dreadful passage rends.
There, near at hand, I see the meteors stream,
And wandering comets dart a fiery gleam!
Elate with pride, I deem'd my heart could soar
To every height, and fathom heavenly pow'r.
But when your Peter, in the sacred food,
With mystic rites my sinful soul renew'd;
I rais'd my thoughts, and own'd my wisdom's boast,
Without a guide divine, in darkness lost!
The minds of men, in truth's immortal ray,
Appear like birds of night before the day.
Inly I smil'd my follies past to view,
From which so late my empty pride I drew:
Yet (so your pious hermit gave command)
I still my former magic arts retain'd:
But all my knowledge now obeys his word,
'Tis his to bid, my teacher and my lord!
He now vouchsafes with me (a worthless name)
To intrust a task more righteous hands might claim:

To me he gives to call from distant lands
Th' unconquer'd hero to his social bands:
Lo! here I stay'd, your coming to behold;
For this went the lady sage foretold."

Thus spoke the sire; and now the knights he
Where in the lovely rock he made abode: [show'd
The mansion like an ample cave was seen,
And halls and stately rooms appear'd within.
There shone what'er th' all-breeding Earth contains
Of riches nourish'd in her fruitful veins:
There native splendour dwells in every part,
And nature rises o'er the works of art!
A hundred duteous slaves obsequious stand
To attend the guests, and wait their lord's command;
Magnificent the plenteous board is plac'd,
With vases huge of gold and crystal grac'd.
At length, the rage of thirst and hunger fed,
The wise magician to the warriors said,

"'Tis time, what most imports, should now be
To you in part Armida's arts are known: [shown;
How to the camp she came, and thence convey'd.
The bravest champions, by her wiles betray'd.
Full well you know that these, in bonds restrain'd,
Th' insidious dame within her tower detain'd;
And sent them guarded thence to Gaza's land,
When fortune, in the way, releas'd the band.
It now remains for me th' events to tell
(As yet unknown) which since that time befel.

"Soon as the enchantress saw her prisoners lost,
Her schemes defeated, and her labours cross;
Oppress'd with sudden grief, her hands she wrung,
And thus exclaim'd, with raging fury stung:

"Then shall he live to boast th' audacious deed,
My guards defeated, and my captives freed?
No—if his arms to others freedom give,
Let him in pains and shameful bondage live:
Nor he alone my just revenge shall claim,
My rage shall burst on all the Christian name!"

"Furious she spoke, and as she spoke design'd
A new device within her froward mind:

She sought the plain, where late Rinaldo's might
Her warriors vanquish'd, and dispers'd in flight:
The battle o'er, his mail the chief unbrac'd,
And on his limbs a Pagan's armour lac'd.
Perchance he sought to veil his glorious name,
Conceal'd in humbler dress unknown to fame.
His arms th' enchantress took, in these enclos'd
A beauteous trunk, and near a stream expos'd;
Here well she knew that, charg'd with daily care,
A band of Franks would from the camp repair,
And fast beside she station'd in the shade
A crafty slave in shepherd's garb array'd,
Instructed well suspicion's bane to spread:
He first amongst your troops th' infection shed;
That, wide diffusing, scatter'd discord far,
And threaten'd direful rage and civil war.
Thus, as her arts design'd, the Christian train
Believ'd by Godfrey brave Rinaldo slain;
'Till soon to all confess'd the truth appear'd,
And jealous doubts from every breast were clear'd.

"Behold the first device Armida tried;
Now, mark what next her wily thoughts employ'd.
The spot's recess stay'd by fam'd Orontes' stream,
Till near the banks the young Rinaldo came;
Where from the main a parting riv'let glides,
And forms an island in the limpid tides.
There by the shore a little bark appear'd;
A marble pillar close beside was rear'd;

* The following passage explains fully the account given in the viiith book to Godfrey by Ali-pardo, of the supposed death of Rinaldo. See end of page 448.

On this, as in suspense, awhile he stood,

Engrav'd in gold these words the hero view'd:

"O thou! whose'er thou art, whose steps are led,
By choice or fate, these lonely shores to tread;
No greater wonders east and west can boast,
Than you small island on its pleasing coast.
If e'er thy sight would blissful scenes explore,
This current pass, and seek the further shore."

"Th' incautious warrior, with th' advice comply'd,

And curious turn'd, resolv'd to cross the tide;
But, for the bark could only one contain,
Alone he pass'd, and bade his squires remain.
Now, to the land th' impatient hero brought,
With eager looks, the promis'd wonders sought;
Yet nought beheld save meadows deck'd with flowers,
Clear waters, cooling caves, and leafy bowers.
Th' enticing scenes awhile the youth delay'd;
He stretch'd his weary limbs beneath the shade;
Then from the measy helm his brows reliev'd,
And in his face the fresh breeze receiv'd.

"But soon he heard the stream, with bubbling
Remurmuring soft, and thither turn'd his eyes; [noise,
When midst the flood the circling waves he spy'd,
That form'd an eddy in the whirling tide:
Whence, rising slow, dishevell'd locks appear'd,
And female features o'er the water rear'd;
The snowy neck, and gently swelling breast;
A crystal veil beneath conceal'd the rest.
So from the parting stage is seen to rise
A nymph or goddess to the gazer's eyes.
This, though her form a Syren's charms display'd,
Was but a semblance and delusive shade;
Yet one of those she seem'd, who wont of yore,
In faithless seas, to infest the Tyrrhene shore.
Sweet as her looks, so sweet the tuneful voice;
And thus she sings, while winds and skies rejoice:

"O happy man! when youth reigns o'er your hours,

And strows the paths of life with smiling flowers:
Ah! yet not virtue with fallacious ray,
Or glory lead your tender mind astray;
Who learns the fruit each season yields to prize,
Who follows pleasure, he alone is wise.
Know, this is Nature's voice:—will you withstand
Her sacred laws, and slight her high command?
Insensate he who wastes his bloomy prime,
Nor takes the transient gifts of fleeting time.
Whate'er the world may worth or valour deem,
Is but a phantom, and delusive dream!
Say, what is fame, that idol of the brave,
Whose charms can thus deceiv'd mankind enslave?
An echo—or a shade—to none confin'd;
A shifting cloud, dispers'd with every wind!
Then rest secure; in every offer'd joy
Indulge your senses, and your soul employ.
Past woes forget, nor antedate your doom
By vain pretence of evils yet to come.
Let thunders roll, and nimble lightnings fly;
Yet heed not you the terrors of the sky.
This, this is wisdom: hence each blessing flows;
This Nature bids, and this the path she shows."

"Thus impious she: the soothing accents creep,
And lull the listening knight to balmy sleep:
In vain the thunder's noise had rent the skies,
Soo deep entranc'd in death-like rest he lies. [wood,
"Now fir'd with vengeance, hearing from the
The false enchantress o'er the warrior stood:
But, when she view'd intent his manly face,
His features glowing with celestial grace,

Rapt in suspense, bode the youth she hate,
And, as she view'd, forgot her former hate.
Low-bending o'er his charms she hangs amaz'd;
So once Narcissus in the fountain's gair'd.
Now from his cheeks she wipes the dew away;
Now bids the fanning breeze strow'd them play:
Now thro' the meads, that smit'd with various flowers,
She stray'd, and wanton crop the fragrant stores;
The rose and lily, with her hateful hands
Together join'd, she forms th' pleasing bands;
With these the warrior's arms and legs enfolds,
And gaily thus in flowery fetters holds.
Then, while in soft repose he senseless lies,
She lays him on her ear, and cuts the skies.
Nor seeks she to regain Damascus' lands;
Or where, with waves enclos'd, her castle stands;
But jealous of her prize, and fill'd with shame,
In ocean's vast profound she hides her flame:
Where from our coast no bark the billow ploughs,
There midst circumfluent tides an isle she chose;
Then to a mountain's lofty summit flies,
Forlorn and wild, expos'd to stormy skies:
She clothes the foot and sides with dreary snows,
While on the brow eternal verdure grows.
There, rear'd by spells, and more than mortal
Beside a lake her spacious palace stands; [hands,
Where, in unfailing spring, and shameful ease,
Th' imprison'd champion wastes his amorous days.
'Tis yours the jealous sorceress' guards to quell,
That watch th' ascent, and near the palace dwell.
Nor shall you want a guide your course to lead;
Nor arms to assist you in th' adventurous deed.
Soon as you quit my stream, your eyes shall view
A dame, though old in years, of youthful hue;
Known by the locks that o'er her forehead play,
And changeful robes, with various colours gay.
'Tis hers to guide you to the task decreed,
With more than eagle's wings or lightning's speed;
'Tis hers to waft you o'er the watery plain,
And safe return you from the roaring main.
The mount ascending, on whose towering height
Th' enchantress dwells, remote from human sight,
Your eyes shall numerous savage forms behold:
Three Pythons hiss, in dreadful volumes roll'd;
With horrid bristles stands the foaming boar:
With gaping jaws the bear and lion roar!
Then sudden shake this potent wand around,
And all with fear shall fly the hissing sound.

* See the passage in Spenser where Acrasia is describ'd with the knight in the bower of bliss:
And all the while right over him she hong,
With her false eyes fast fixed in his sight,
As seeking medicine, whence she was stung,
Or greedily depasturing delight, &c.

Fairy Queen, b. ii. c. 13. st. 73.
* The palmer that accompanies sir Guyon in Spenser, has a staff of the like virtue. Speaking of the wild beasts that attacked sir Guyon and his guide on their coming to the bower of Acrasia, the poet thus beautifully enlarges on the fiction of the Italian author:

But soon as they approach'd with deadly threat,
The palmer over them his staff upheld;
His mighty staff, that could all charms defeat:
Erasors their stubborn courages are quell'd,
And high advanced crests down meekly fell'd:
Instead of fraying, they themselves did fear,
And trembled, as those passing they beheld:

But when your feet the steepy summit gain,
 Yet greater perils in your way remain:
 A fountain rises there, whose streams invite
 Th' admiring stranger⁶, and the thirst excite;
 But, deep within th' alluring crystal hides
 A secret venom in its treacherous tides:
 One fatal draught can strange effects dispense,
 And fill with dire delight the madd'ng sense;
 Unbidden laughter swells the panting breath,
 Till lo! the dread convulsion ends in death!
 Then far! ah, distant far with speed remove,
 Nor let your lips the deadly waters prove:
 Nor let the banks with tasteful vands grac'd,
 Invite your senses to the rich repast:
 Nor heed th' enticing dames, whose voices decoy,
 Whose beauty poisons, and whose smile destroys:
 O fly their looks, their guileful words despise;
 And enter where the lofty gates arise.
 Within, high walls with winding paths surround
 The secret dwelling, and the march confound:
 Maze within maze distracts the doubtful sight:
 A map shall guide your wandering steps aright.
 Amidst the labyrinth lies the magic grove,
 Where every leaf impregnate seems with love.
 There shall you view, beneath th' embowering shade,

Th' enamour'd champion and the damsel laid.
 But when awhile the enchantress shall depart,
 And leave behind the partner of her heart;
 Then sudden issue forth, to sight reveal'd,
 And show the knight my adamantin shield:
 There shall he see, reflected to his eyes,
 His own resemblance, and obscure disguise:
 Th' ignoble sight his generous wrath shall move,
 And banish from his breast inglorious love.
 No more remains to tell; 'tis yours alone,
 To take secure the path my words have shown;
 Safe through the winding maze to bend your course,
 Nor fear th' opposing spells of magic force:
 Not e'en Armida (such is Heaven's decree)
 Can your arrival, by her arts, foresee.
 Nor less, returning from th' enchanted seat,
 Propitious powers shall favour your retreat.
 But now the waning hours to sleep invite;
 The morn must see you rise with dawning light."

Thus spoke the reverend sage; and speaking led
 The knights to slumber on a downy bed:
 There, fill'd with joy and wonder, either guest
 He left: and thence himself retir'd to rest.

Such wondrous power did in that staff appear,
 All monsters to subdue to him that did it bear!

Of that same wood it fram'd was cunningly,
 Of which caduceus whilom was made;
 Caduceus, the rod of Mercury,
 With which he wons the Stygian realms invade,
 Through ghastly horror and eternal shade:
 Th' infernal fiends with it he can assuage,
 And Orcus tame, whom nothing can persuade,
 And rule the Furies, when they most do rage:
 Such virtue in his staff had eke this palmer sage.

⁶ Pomponius Mela writes thus of such a fountain in the Fortunate Islands: Contra fortunatæ insulæ abundant sua sponte genitus et subinde aliis super aliis innascentibus; nihil sollicitos alunt beatius, quam aliis urbes excultas. Una singulari duorum fontium ingenio maxime insignis, alterum qui potaverit risu solvantur in mortem. Petrarch

VOL. XXI.

THE ARGUMENT.

The two knights take their leave of the hermit, and embark on a vessel steered by a female pilot, Their voyage along the Mediterranean described. They pass the Straits, and proceed to the Fortunate Islands. Their conversation with the pilot during the voyage. They arrive at the island of Armida, where the knights land, who overcomes all the obstacles they meet with in ascending the mountain, and afterwards withstand all the various allurements of pleasure offered to their senses.

Now rose the ruddy morn with gladsome ray,
 And waken'd mortals to the toils of day;
 When to the knights the sage the buckler bore,
 The map and golden wand of wondrous power:
 "Prepare to attempt your arduous way," he cries,
 "Ere yonder Sun advances o'er the skies.
 These are my promis'd gifts, and these your arms,
 To quell th' enchantress, and dissolve her charms."

At once the warriors rose, and eager round
 Their limbs robust the shining armour bound.
 Thence, as the hermit led, they bent their way
 Through paths e'er lighted by the cheerful day;
 Again their former steps returning tread:
 But when they reach'd the river's sacred bed,
 "I now dismiss you from my care," he cried:
 "Farewell! and prosperous fortune be your guide!"
 Soon as they came where still the parted flood
 On either side a crystal mountain stood,
 The waters clos'd, and from the depth upbore
 The knights, and left them on the flowery shore.
 So, from the branch by winds autumnal torn,
 Light on the tide the scatter'd leaves are borne.
 Now from the bank their eyes around they threw,
 And soon beheld the promis'd guide in view.
 Amidst the stream a little bark appear'd,
 A virgin, at the stern, the vessel steer'd:
 Depending ringlets o'er her forehead stray,
 And mild benevolence her looks display:
 Her lovely features beams effulgent shed,
 And heavenly glories blaze around her head.
 Her venture gay a thousand colours shows,
 Now flames with red, and now with azure glows:
 At every turn it shifts the transient light,
 And cheats with momentary hues the sight!
 Such various grace the billing dove assumes,
 Whose gentle neck is cloth'd with glossy plumes;
 For ever new the varied feathers play,
 Reflecting every tint of every ray;
 While as they move, successive beauties rise,
 And fill with strange delight the gazer's eyes!
 "Favour'd of Heaven! ascend this bark," she
 "In which secure I plough the swelling tide: [cried,
 The stormy winds their wonted rage restrain,
 While safe in this each freight may pass the main:
 From him, whose sovereign mercies wide extend,
 I come, at once your pilot and your friend."

likewise speaks of two fountains in the Fortunate Islands.

Fuor tutti i nostri lidi
 Nel' isole famose di fortuna
 Due fonti he, chi dell' una
 Bece muor ridendo.

So spoke the dame; and, hastening to the land,
The crooked keel divides the yielding strand.
Soon as her bark the noble pair receives,
She quits the shore, and swift the water cleaves;
Then gives the spreading canvass to the wind,
And guides the vessel from the helm behind.
So wide, so deep, the river swells its tide,
That lofty ships might there securely ride;
Though now a shallow stream could well suffice,
So light the pinnacle o'er the surface flies!
Now, rising from the land, th' inspiring gales
With prosperous breath distend the belling-sails:
The foaming stream is white with froth before,
Behind the stern the parted waters roar. [waves,
At length they came where, midst its mightier
The sea's vast gulf the river's store receives.

Soon as the vessel gains the briny tides,
The winds are hush'd, the angry surge subsides:
The clouds disperse, the south forgets to blow,
That threaten'd tempests to the work below:
Light zephyrs only brush along the main,
And scarcely end the smooth cerulean plain.

By Ascalon they pass'd; to left they veer'd,
And tow'rd the west the rapid vessel steer'd.
Then, guiding swift, to Gaza next they came,
An ancient harbour, not unknown to fame,
But now, for many a neighbouring ruin great,
An ample city, and a peopled state.
The warriors from the bark beheld the shore
With tents of various nations cover'd o'er:
There horse and foot, along the crowded way,
Swarm thick between the city and the sea.
There huddled camels move in solemn state,
And the huge elephant's unwieldy weight,
Safe in the port they see the vessels ride,
Or floating loose, or at their anchors tied.
Some hoist their spreading sails, while others sweep
With level strokes the surface of the deep.
Then thus the guiding maid: "Though here we view

The thronging numbers of this impious crew;
Yet these, that fill the seas and line the shore,
Compose not all the mighty tyrant's power.
These Egypt and the neighbouring lands supply:
But other aids he waits, that distant lie.
Far to the east extends his ample sway,
To realms that burn beneath the southern ray;
And hence I trust our swift return to make,
Ere these, departing, shall their tents forsake."

While thus she spoke, as through th' aerial space
An eagle towers above the feather'd race;
Till, soaring in the Sun, the sharpest eye
No more can trace his progress through the sky:
So midst the ships the bark its passage cleaves,
And far behind the lessening navy leaves.
Now, quick as thought, by Paphia's towers they
(The town that first Egyptian pilots hail [sail',
On Syria's land) then near the shore they fly,
And Rhinocera's barren sands espy.
Not distant far a mountain crown'd with wood,
Casts a brown shadow o'er the subject flood;
Around its rocky foot the billows rave;
There hapless Pompey's bones obtain'd a grave.

¹ I have elsewhere observed, in my notes to Arjasto, that this voyage of Charles and Ubaid through the Mediterranean, seems to be imitated from the voyage of Astolgo from the Indies to the Persian Gulf.

Fair Damians next the eye surveys,
Where ancient Nile his sacred tribute pays
Through seven wide mouths, and many a stream
His waters mingling with the briny tide. [beside,
They pass the city rais'd by him², whose name
To latest times shall bear the Grecian fame.
By Pharos then they glide, an isle no more,
An isthmus now projecting from the shore.
Nor Rhodes, nor Crete, they to the north survey,
But near the climes of Afric speed their way.
Fruitful her coast: but, more remote, her lands
Are fill'd with monsters dire and bursing sands.
By Marmarique they steer'd, and now they pass'd
Where five fair cities fam'd Cyrene grac'd.
Here Ptolemais stands, and here they view
Whence his slow stream the fabled Lethe drew.
The greater Syrtis next (the sailor's fear)
They leave aloof, and far to seaward veer:
And now Judeca's cape behind them stood;
And now they left the mouth of Magria's flood;
Now Tripoly's high rising towers essay'd,
Now Malta scarcely o'er the waves descri'd.
The Syrtis past; Alserbé they beheld,
Where once the race that fed on lotos dwell'd.
Tunis they see, whose crooked shores display,
With circumjacent arms, a spacious bay:
Tunis the rich, a place well known to fame,
No Libyan city boasts a greater name.
Near this Sicilia's fertile lands are spread;
There Libya's name rears its lofty head.

Now to the knights the daniel-pilot show'd
The spot where once imperial Carthage stood.
Ill-fated Carthage! scarce, amidst the plains,
A trace of all her ruin'd pomp remains!
Proud cities vanish, states and realms decay,
The world's unstable glories fade away!
Yet mortals dare of certain fate complain;
O impious folly of presuming man!
From thence they see Biserta's spires arise;
Far to the right Sardinia's island lies:
They view, where once the rude Numidian swain
Pursu'd a wandering life from plain to plain:
Algiers and Bugia then they reach, the seat
Of impious corsairs: next Oran they greet;
And now by Mauritania's strand proceed,
Where elephants and hungry hogs breed:
Morocco here and Fez their cities rear:
To these oppos'd Granada's lands appear. [bounds,
At length they came where, press'd in narrow
Between the capes the boiling deep resounds.
Tis feign'd that first Alcides forc'd a way,
And gave this passage to th' indignant sea.
And here perchance a lengthen'd tract of land
With one continued mound the flood restrain'd,
But now the ferrous main, with rushing tides,
From towering Caspé Abyla divides:
A strait 'twixt Libya now and Spain appears,
Such is the force of time and change of years!
Four times the east had seen the rising Sun,
Since first the vessel had its course begun:
Nor sheltering bays, nor ports its speed delay.
It shoots the strait, and leaves the midland sea.
But what are seas to Ocean's vast profound,
Whose circling arms the spacious Earth surround?
Soon from the sight, amid the waves, are lost
The fertile Gades, and each neighbouring coast.
Behind, the lessening shores retreating fly:
Sky bounds the ocean, ocean bounds the sky.

² Alexander the Great.

Then Ubald thus began: "Say, thou! whose Gives us these endless waters to explore; [power
Did ever prove before these seas divide,
Do mortals here in distant worlds reside?"

He ceas'd; the virgin pilot thus replied:
"Whoe great Alcides had the monsters slain
That wanted Libya and the realms of Spain;
Your hands subdu'd, at yonder strait he stay'd;
Nor durst old Ocean's surgy gulf invade.
He fix'd his pillars there, in vain design'd
To curb the searching spirit of mankind:
Urg'd by desire new regions to explore,
Ulysses scorn'd the confines of the shore:
He pass'd the bound'ry, loosening to the gales,
Amidst the wider flood, his daring sails:
But all his skill in naval arts was vain,
He sunk entomb'd beneath the roaring main:
And those, by tempests forc'd amidst the waves,
Have ne'er return'd, or found untimely graves,
Hence undiscover'd still the seas remain,
Thou numerous isles and mighty states contain.
Inhabitants abound on many a coast;
The lands, like yours, their fertile produce boast;
Where, not ungrateful to the labourer's toil,
The Sun prolific warms the pregnant soil."

Then Ubald: "Of those climes, remov'd afar,
The manners and religious rites declare."
"Various their lives," the virgin thus rejoind,
"Their speech, their custom, are of various kind:
Some worship beasts, the stars, or solar power;
And Earth, the common parent, some adore.
There are who stain their feasts with human blood,
And load their dreadful board with horrid food;
And every land, from Calpe's towering heights,
Is us'd to impious faith and cruel rites!"

"Will then that pitying God," the knight replied,

"Whodome with heavenly truths mankind to guide,
Leave, far excluded from the sacred light,
So large a portion of the world in night?"

"O no! the faith of Christ shall there be spread,"
She cried, "and Science rear her laurell'd head.
Think not this length of ocean's whelming tide
Shall from your future search those climes divide:

The time shall come, when sailors, yet unborn,
Shall name Alcides' narrow bounds in scorn:
Lands now unknown, and seas without a name,
Shall then through all your realms extend their Perils untried succeeding ships shall brave, [fame:
And cut, with daring course, the distant wave;
Through all the food's unfathom'd currents run,
Gird the vast globe, and emulate the Sun.
From fair Liguria see th' adventurer rise,
Whose courage first the threatening passage tries.
Nor raging seas, by furious whirlwinds tost,
Nor doubtful prospects of th' uncertain coast,
Shall in the straits of Abyla confin'd,
Detaim the ardour of his duntless mind!

'Tis thou, Columbus, to another pole
Shalt rear the mast, and o'er the surges roll;
While, with a thousand wings, and thousand eyes,
Fame scarce pursues thy vessel as it flies!

Let Bacchus or Alcides claim her praise,
Thy worth, in future time, her trump shall raise:
Thy deeds shall last in stor'd annals long,
The copious subject of some poet's song."

She said, and westward steer'd before the wind,
Then gently tow'rd the south her sails inclin'd.
Now in their front they see the Sun descend,
And now the moon behind her beams extend:

But when Aurora, from her radiant head,
Had all around her pearly moisture shed;
Before their eyes a mountain huge appear'd,
That midst the clouds its lofty summit rear'd.
Near as they came, the seating clouds withdrew,
And like a pyramid it show'd to view;
From whence black curling smoke was seen to rise;
As where 'tis feign'd th' Etean giant lies
Transfir'd, and breathes eruptions to the skies.
By day thick vapours from the mouth expire,
By night terrific flames of ruddy fire.

Then other islands midst the main they spy'd,
And lands less steepy rising o'er the tide.
Delightful isles, renew'd of ancient date,
And styl'd, by tuteful bards, The Fortunate.

'Twas said that Heaven to these such grace allow'd,
No shining share the sable furrows plough'd.
The lands until'd could plenteous crops produce;
And vines, unprun'd, supply nectareous juice.
Here olives bloom'd with never-fading green;
From hollow oaks was liquid honey seen.
The rivers murmuring from the hills above,
With crystal streams renew'd the vernal grove.
No sultry heat appear'd the grateful day;
Soft dews and zephyrs cool'd the solar ray.
And here were feign'd the mansions of the blest,
Th' Elysian seats of everlasting rest.

To these her course the damsel-pilot bore:
"Behold," she cried, "our destin'd voyage o'er:
The Isles of Fortune to your sight appear, fear:
Whose fame, though doubtful, yet has reach'd your Fair is their soil; but fame each wonder swells,
And every truth with added fiction tells."

While thus she spoke, along the main they flew,
Till near the foremost isle their vessel drew.
Then Charles began: "O ever-sacred dame!
If this the cause permits for which we came;
Grant that our feet awhile may tread the shore,
To view a race and land unknown before;
To observe their rites, and mark with curious eyes
Whate'er may claim th' attention of the wise:
So shall our lips declare, in future time,
The wonders witness'd in this foreign clime."

"Your suit demands my praise," the maid replied,

"But Heaven's decree the bold request denies.
The time arrives not yet, by God design'd,
To give the great discovery to mankind:
Nor must you, back from ocean's bosom borne,
With certain tidings to your world return.
To you, beyond the sailor's art, 'tis given
To pass these billows, by the will of Heaven;
To rouse your champion from his fatal sleep,
And safe convey him o'er the watery deep:
Let this suffice—with prouder thoughts elate,
'Twere impious folly to contend with Fate."

Thus while she spoke, the foremost isle withdrew,
And soon the second gair'd upon the view:
She show'd the warriors how the islands lay,
In order rang'd against the rising day.
The lands with equal space the sea divides,
And rolls between the shores its beating tides.
In seven are seen the marks of human care,
Where cultur'd fields and rural cots appear;
But three a barren desert soil reveal,
Where savage beasts in woods and mountains dwell.

Amidst these isles a lone recess they found,
Where circling shores the subject flood surround,

But when Aurora, from her radiant head,
Had all around her pearly moisture shed;
Before their eyes a mountain huge appear'd,
That midst the clouds its lofty summit rear'd.
Near as they came, the seating clouds withdrew,
And like a pyramid it show'd to view;

To pass these billows, by the will of Heaven;
To rouse your champion from his fatal sleep,
And safe convey him o'er the watery deep:
Let this suffice—with prouder thoughts elate,
'Twere impious folly to contend with Fate."

Thus while she spoke, the foremost isle withdrew,
And soon the second gair'd upon the view:
She show'd the warriors how the islands lay,
In order rang'd against the rising day.
The lands with equal space the sea divides,
And rolls between the shores its beating tides.
In seven are seen the marks of human care,
Where cultur'd fields and rural cots appear;
But three a barren desert soil reveal,
Where savage beasts in woods and mountains dwell.

Amidst these isles a lone recess they found,
Where circling shores the subject flood surround,

And, far within, a spacious bay enclose;
 Sharp rocks, without, the rushing surge oppose:
 Two lofty cliffs before the entrance rise,
 A welcome sign to future sailors' eyes:
 Within, the waves repose in peace serene;
 Black forests nod above, a sylvan scene!
 A grotto opens in the living stone,
 With verdant moss and ivy-leaves o'ergrown;
 The grateful shades a gentle murmur fill,
 While o'er the pavement glide the lucid rills.
 No cables need the floating ships secure,
 No bearded anchors here the vessels moor.
 To this retreat her course the pilot bore,
 And, entering, fur'd her sails, and reach'd the shore.
 "Behold," she cried, "where yonder structure
 stands

Rais'd on the mountain, and the isle commands!
 There, lost in festive sloth, in folly lost,
 Slumbers the champion of the Christian host.
 'Tis yours, when next the Sun forsakes the deep,
 With labouring feet to ascend the threatening steep:

Meanwhile this short delay with ease be borne;
 All times are inckless save the hour of morn:
 But to the mountain's foot pursue your way,
 While yet remains the light of parting day."

Thus she: the word th' impatient warriors took,
 And, leaping from the bark, the strand forsook.
 With ready steps a pleasing rind th' cross'd,
 And all their toils in sweet delusion lost.
 At length th' expected hill's broad base they gain,
 (The Sun yet hovering o'er the western main)
 From hence their eyes the arduous height survey,
 The pendent rains and the rocky way.
 Inclement frost the mountain's side deforms,
 And all around is white with wintry storms.
 The lofty summit yields a milder scene,
 With budding flowers and groves for ever green!
 There ends the frozen clime! there lilies blow,
 There roses blush upon the bordering snow.
 There youthful Spring, and hoary Winter here;
 Such power has magic o'er the changing year!

Now at the mountain's foot the heroes stay'd,
 And slept secure beneath a cavern's shade.
 But when the Sun (eternal fount of day!)
 Spread o'er the laughing skies his golden ray;
 At once they rose, at once their course renew'd,
 And up the steep ascent the way pursu'd.
 When lo! a serpent, rushing from his cell,
 Oppos'd their passage, horrible and fell!
 Aloft his head and squalid breast he held
 Bestreak'd with gold; his neck with anger swell'd;
 Fire fill'd his eyes; he hid the path beneath;
 And smoke and poison issu'd with his breath.
 Now in thick curls his scaly length he wound;
 Now trail'd his opening folds along the ground.
 Such was the dreadful guardian of the place,
 Yet on the heroes press'd with fearless pace.

⁴ Virgil and Milton have both excelled in describing the motion of this animal.

— Rapt orbes per humum. Virg.

— He leaping swiftly roll'd

In tangles— Milton.

But the commentator on Milton thinks that Tasso has surpassed both in the above passage, the beauty of which can scarcely be rendered into English:

Hor rientra in se stesso, hor le nodose
 Ruote distende e se dopo se tira.

The Dane his falchion draws, and eager flies
 To assail the snake, when sudden Uraid cries:
 "Forbear! can arms like these our foes repel?
 And think'st thou thus the monster's rage to quell?"

He said; and shook the golden wand around;
 The serpent fled, astonish'd at the sound.
 The knights proceed; a lion fierce descends,
 And roaring loud, the dangerous pass defends;
 He rolls his fiery eyes, his mane he rears,
 Wide as a gulf his gaping mouth appears;
 His lashing tail his slumbering wrath awakes:
 But, when his potent rod the warrior shakes,
 Unus'd fears the dreadful beast surprise,
 Sunk is his rage, he trembles, and he flies!

Still on they pass'd; but soon a numerous host
 Of monsters dire their daring passage cross'd.
 In various shapes the ghastly troops appear,
 With various yell they rood the startled ear.
 Each savage form that roves the burning sands,
 From distant Nilus to the Libyan lands,
 Here seem'd to dwell, with all the beasts that roam
 Hyrcania's woods, or deep Hircania's gloom!
 But not their numbers could the chiefs detain;
 The powerful wand made all their fury vain.
 These dangers past, the conquering pair ascend;
 Now near the brow their eager steps they bend;
 Yet, as they tread the cliffs, the sinking snows
 And slippery ice awhile their course oppose.
 But when at length they reach'd the rocky height,
 A spacious level opens to their sight.
 There youthful Spring salutes th' enraptur'd eye,
 Unfading verdure, and a gladsome sky;
 Eternal zephyrs through the groves prevail,
 And incense breathes in every balmy gale;
 No irksome change th' unvaried climate knows
 Of heat alternate, and alternate snows:
 A gen'ral power the tender herbage feeds,
 And decks with every sweet the smiling meads;
 Diffuses soft perfumes from every flower,
 And clothes with lasting shade each rural bower:
 There, rear'd aloft, a stately palace stands,
 Whose prospect wide the hills and seas commands.

The warriors, weary'd with the steep ascent,
 More slowly o'er th' enamell'd meadow went;
 Oft looking back, their former toils review'd,
 Now paus'd awhile, and now their course pursu'd.
 When sudden, falling from the rocky heights,
 A copious stream the traveller's thirst excites;
 From hence a thousand rills dispersing flow,
 And trickle through the grassy vale below:
 At length, uniting all their different tides,
 In verdant banks a gentle river glides,
 With murmuring sound a bowery gloom pervades,
 And rolls its sable waves through pendent shades:
 A cool retreat! the bowery border shows
 A pleasing couch, inviting soft repose.
 "Behold the fatal spring where laughter dwells,
 Dire poison lurking in its secret cells!
 Here let us guard our thoughts, our passions rein,
 And every loose desire in bounds detain:
 A deafen'd ear to dulcet music lend,
 Nor dare the Syren's impious lays attend."

The knights advanc'd till from their narrow bed,
 Wide in a lake the running waters spread.
 There on the banks a sumptuous table plac'd,
 With rare and savourous viands allur'd the taste,
 Two blooming damsels in the water leav'd,
 And laugh and plunge beneath the lucid wave.

⁵ All this beautiful passage is imitated, or rather

Now round in sport they dash the sprinkling tide ;
And now with nimble strokes the stream divide :
Now, sunk at once, they vanish from the eyes ;
And now again above the surface rise !

The naked wantons, with enticing charms,
Each warrior's bosom fill'd with soft alarms :
Awhile they stay'd their steps, and silent view'd,
As those their pastimes unconcern'd pursu'd,
Till one erect in open light appear'd,
And o'er the stream her ivory bosom rear'd ;
Her upward beauties to the sight reveal'd :
The rest, beneath the crystal scarce conceal'd.

As when the morning star, with gentle ray,
From seas emerging leads the purple day :
As when, ascending from the genial flood,
The queen of love on ocean's bosom stood :
So seems the damsel, so her locks diffuse
The pearly liquid in descending dews ;
Till on th' approaching chiefs she turn'd her eyes,
Then feign'd, with mimic fear, a coy surprise :
Swift from her head she loos'd, with eager haste,
The yellow curls in artful fillets lac'd ;
The falling tresses o'er her limbs display'd,
Wrapp'd all her beauties in a golden shade !
Thus hid in locks, and circled by the flood,
With side-long glance, o'erjoy'd, the knights she view'd.

Her smiles amid her blushes lovelier show ;
Amid her smiles, her blushes lovelier glow !
At length she rais'd her voice with melting art,
Whose magic strains might pierce the firmest heart.

" O happy strangers ! to whose feet 'tis given
To reach these blissful seats, this earthly Heaven !
View here those rapturous scenes so fam'd of old,
When early mortals view'd an age of gold,
No longer wear the helm, the scorpion wield,
The cumbersome corselet, or the weighty shield ;
Here hang your useless arms amidst the grove,
The warriors now of peace-inspiring love !
Our field of battle is the downy bed,
Or flowery turf amid the smiling mead.
Then let us lead you to our sovereign's eyes,
From whose diffusive power our blessings rise.

translated, by our Spenser, in his Fairy Queen, where Guyon is described with the palmer, entering the bower of bliss :

Two naked damsels he therein espy'd,
Which therein bathing seem'd to contend,
And wrestle wantonly, ne car'd to hide
Their dainty parts from view of any which them ey'd.

As that fair star, the messenger of morn,
His dewy face out of the sea does rear ;
Or as the Cyprian goddess, newly born
Of the Ocean's fruitful froth, did first appear ;
Such seem'd they, and so their yellow hair
Crystalline humour dropp'd down apace.

With that, the other likewise up arose,
And her fair locks, which formerly were bound
Up in one knot, she low adown did loose ;
Which flowing long and thick her cloth'd around,
And th' ivory in golden mantle bound ;
So that fair spectacle from him was rest,
Yet that which rest it, no less fair was found :
So hid in locks and waves from looker's theft,
Nought but her lovely face she for his looking left.
Fairy Queen, b. ii. c. 12. st. 65. 67.

She shall amongst those few your names receive,
Elected here in endless joys to live.
But first refresh your limbs beneath the tide,
And taste the viands which our cares provide."

She ceas'd ; her lovely partner join'd her prayer,
With looks persuasive, and enticing air.
So, in the scene, the active dancers bound,
And move responsive to the tuneful sound.
But firmly steeld was either champion's heart,
Against their fraudulent strains and soothing art ;
Or, if forbidden thoughts a wish inspire,
And wake the stumbling seeds of wild desire ;
Soon to their aid assisting reason came,
And quench'd the infant sparks of kindling flame.
Their arts in vain the vanquish'd damsels view'd :
The warriors thence their fated way pursu'd :
These seek the palace ; those indignant hide
Their shameful heads beneath the whelming tide.

BOOK XVI

THE ARGUMENT.

Charles and Ubald enter the palace of Armida,
The gardens are described. Rinaldo is seen with his mistress. At the departure of Armida, the two knights discover themselves ; and Ubald
reproves Rinaldo for his sloth and effeminacy.
The youthful hero, filled with shame, abandons those seats of pleasure, and follows the guidance of his deliverers. Armida pursues him, and makes use of every argument to move him, but in vain. He endeavours to pacify her : she then breaks out into bitter reproaches, till, her strength being exhausted, she falls into a swoon. The three warriors go on board their vessel, and set sail for Palestine. Armida, recovering, finds her lover gone : she then gives herself up to rage, and, resolving on revenge, destroys her enchanted palace, and takes her flight to Egypt.

In circling form the costly structure rose ;
And deep within the wondrous walls enclose
A beauteous garden, whose delightful scene
Eclips'd the fairest boast of mortal men.
The fiends had bent their skill a pile to raise,
Perplex'd with secret rooms and winding ways ;
And in the centre lay the magic bowers,
Impervious to the search of human powers.
Now through the loftiest gate the warriors pass'd,
A hundred gates the spacious structure grac'd)
With sculptur'd silver, glorious to behold,
The valves on hinges hung of burnish'd gold !
Surpris'd they saw, excell'd in every part,
The rich materials, by the sculptor's art.
In all but speech alive the figures rise ;
Nor speech they seem to want to wondering eyes.
In female converse there (inglorious state !)
Alcides midst Mæonia's damsels sate,
There he who propp'd the stars, and Hell subdu'd,
The distaff bore ; while Love beside him stood,
And with exulting smiles his conquest view'd.
There Iotë was seen, whose feeble hand
With pride the hero's poudrous claw sustain'd :
The lion's hide conceal'd the beauteous dame,
Too rough a covering for so soft a frame !
To this oppos'd, the chiefs a sea beheld ;
Its azure field with frothy billows swell'd.

There, in the midst, two hostile navies ride;
 Their arms in lightning flash from side to side.
 Augustus o'er his Romans here commands —
 There Anthony conducts from eastern lands
 His Indian, Arab, and Egyptian bands,
 Thou wouldst have thought the Cyclades o'ertop'd,
 And hills with hills in horrid conflict borne!
 So fierce the shock, when, joining ship with ship,
 The navies meet amidst the roaring deep!
 Firebrands and javelins fly from foe to foe;
 Unusual slaughter stains the flood below.
 Behold (while doubtful yet remains the fight)
 Behold where Cleopatra takes her flight.
 See! Anthony, of fame forgetful, flies,
 No more his hopes to glorious empire rise:
 Yet o'er his soul no servile fear prevails;
 Her flight alone impels his yielding sails.
 Contending passions all his soul inflame,
 Distain and rage, and love, and conscious shame;
 While, with alternate gaze, he views from far
 Her parting vessel, and the dubious war.
 Now Nile receives him on his watery breast;
 There, in his mistress' arms, he sinks to rest;
 There seems, resign'd, the threatening hour to wait,
 And soften, with her smiles, the stroke of fate.

With storied labours thus the portals grac'd,
 The heroes view'd, and thence intrepid pass'd.
 And now they try'd the labyrinth's winding maze:
 As fam'd Meander moves a thousand ways;
 Now rolls direct, now takes a devious course,
 Now seems to seek again his native source:
 The frequent turnings so their eyes deceiv'd;
 But soon the faithful map their doubts reliev'd;
 Display'd each various passage to their sight,
 And led through paths oblique their steps aright.

The garden then unfolds a beautiful scene,
 With flowers adorn'd and ever-living green.
 There silver lakes reflect the beaming day;
 Here crystal streams in gurgling fountains play:
 Cool vales descend, and sunny hills arise,
 And groves, and caves, and grottoes, strike the eyes.

Art show'd her utmost power; but art conceal'd,
 With greater charms the pleas'd attention held.
 It seem'd as Nature play'd a sportive part,
 And strove to mock the mimic works of art!
 By powerful magic breathes the vernal air,
 And fragrant trees eternal blossoms bear:
 Eternal fruits on every branch endure;
 Those swelling from their buds, and these mature.
 There, on one parent stock, the leaves among,
 With ripen'd figs, the figs unripen'd hung.
 Depending apples here the boughs unfold;
 Those green in youth, these mellow'd into gold.
 The vine luxuriant rears her arms on high,
 And curls her tendrils to the genial sky:
 There the crude grapes no grateful sweet produce,
 And here impurpled yield nectarous juice.
 The joyous birds, conceal'd in every grove,
 With gentle strife prolong the notes of love.
 Soft zephyrs breathe on woods and waters round;
 The woods and waters yield a murmuring sound:
 When cease the tuneful choir, the wind replies;
 But, when they sing, in gentle whispers dies:
 By turns they sink, by turns their music raise,
 And blend, with equal skill, harmonious lays.

Among the rest, with plumes of various dyes,
 And purple beak, a beautiful songster flies;
 Wondrous to tell, with human speech indu'd,
 He fills with vocal strains the blissful wood:

The birds attentive close their silent wings,
 While thus the fair, the soothing charmer sings:
 "Behold how lovely blooms the vernal rose!"
 When scarce the leaves her early bud disclose:
 When, half insuapt, and half to view reveal'd,
 She gives new pleasure from her charms conceal'd.
 But when she shows her bosom wide display'd,
 How soon her sweets exhale, her beauties fade!
 No more she seems the flower so lately lov'd,
 By virgins cherish'd, and by youths approv'd!
 So, swiftly fleeting with the transient day,
 Passes the flower of mortal life away!
 In vain the spring returns, the spring no more
 Can waning youth to former prime restore:
 Then crop the morning rose, the time improve,
 And, while to love 'tis given, indulge in love!
 He ceas'd: th' approving choir with joy renew
 Their rapturous music, and their loves pursue,
 Again in pairs the cooing turtles bill;
 The feather'd nations take their amorous fill.
 The oak, the chaste laurel seems to yield,
 And all the leafy tenants of the field:
 The earth and streams one soul appears to move,
 All seem impregnate with the seeds of love.

Through these alluring scenes of magic power
 The virtuous warriors pass'd, and pass'd secure:
 When 'twixt the quivering boughs they cast their sight,

And see the dame and the Christian knight.
 There sat Armida on a flowery bed;
 Her wanton lap sustain'd the hero's head:
 Her opening veil 'er ivory bosom show'd;
 Loose to the faint breeze her tresses flow'd;
 A languor seem'd diffus'd o'er all her frame,
 And every feature glow'd with amorous flame.
 The pearly moisture on her beautiful face
 Improv'd the blush, and heighten'd every grace:

* This song is closely translated by Spenser; but, as it has been observed very well, our poet has judiciously omitted the fanciful circumstance of a bird singing these words, which has been the subject of Voltaire's ridicule.

Al! see the virgin rose, how sweetly she
 Doth first peep forth with bashful modesty,
 That fairer seems, the less you see her may;
 Lo! see soon after, how more bold and free
 Her bared bosom the doth broad display;
 Lo! see soon after, how she fades and falls away.

So passeth, in the passing of a day,
 Of mortal life, the leaf, the bud, the flower,
 No more doth flourish after first decay,
 That erst was sought to deck both bed and bower,
 Of many a lady and many a paramour:
 Gather therefore the rose, whilst yet in prime,
 For soon comes age, that will her pride deflower:
 Gather the rose of love, whilst yet in time,
 Whilst loving thou may'st loved be with equal crime.

He ceas'd, and then 'gan all the quire of birds
 Their diverse notes 't attune unto his lay,
 As in approbance, &c.

* See Spenser.

Her snowy breast was bare to ready spoil
 Of hungry eyes, which note therewith be fill'd:
 And yet through languor of her late sweet toil,
 Few drops, more clear than nectar, forth distill'd,
 That like pure orient pearls adown it trill'd, &c.

Her wandering eyes confus'd a pleasing fire,
And shot the trembling beams of soft desire.
Now, fondly hanging o'er, with head inclin'd,
Close to his cheek her lovely cheek she join'd;
While o'er her charms he taught his looks to rove,
And drank, with eager thirst, new draughts of love.
Now, bending down, enraptur'd as he lies,
She kiss'd his vermeil lips and swimming eyes;
Till from his inmost heart the heav'd a sigh,
As if to herb his parting soul would fly!

All this the warriors from the shade survey,
And mark, conceal'd, the lovers' amorous play.
Dependent from his side (amusal sight!)
Appear'd a polish'd mirror, beauteous bright:
This in his hand th' enamour'd champion rais'd;
On this, with smiles, the fair Armida gaz'd.
She in the glass her form reflected 'spies:
And he consults the mirror of her eyes:
One proud to rule, one prouder to obey;
He bless'd in her, and she in beauty's sway.
"Ah! turn those eyes on me," exclaims the knight,
"Those eyes that bless me with their heavenly light!"

For know, the power that every lover warms,
In this fond breast Armida's image forms.
Since I, alas! am scorn'd; here turn thy sight,
And view thy native graces with delight:
Here on that face thy ravish'd looks employ,
Where springs eternal love, eternal joy!
Or rather tang'd through yon celestial spheres,
And view thy likeness in the radiant stars."

The lover ceas'd; the fair Armida smil'd,
And still with wanton toys the time beguil'd.
Now in a braid she bound her flowing hair;
Now smooth'd the waving locks with decent care:
Part, with her hand, in shining curls she roll'd,
And deck'd with azure flowers the waving gold.
Her veil compos'd, with roses sweet she dress'd
The native lilies of her fragrant breast.
Not half so proud, of glorious plumage vain,
The peacock sets to view his glittering train:
Not Iris shows so fair, when dewy skies
Reflect the hangeful light with various dyes.
But o'er the rest her wondrous crest shinn'd,
Whose mystic round her tender waist confin'd.
Here unembodied spells th' enchantress mix'd,
By potent arts, and in a girdle fix'd:
Repulses sweet, soft speech, and gay desires,
And tender accents that fans the lover's fires;
Engaging smiles, short sighs of mutual bliss,
The tear of transport, and the melting kiss,
All these she join'd, her powerful work to frame,
And awful temper'd in th' annealing flame.

Now with a kiss, the balmy pledge of love,
She left her knight, and issu'd from the grove.
Each day, awhile apart, the dame review'd
Her magic labours, and her charms renew'd;
While he, deep-musing, in her absence stray'd,
A lonely lover midst the conscious shade.

3 The idea of this girdle is from the cestus of Homer, which Juno borrows of Venus:

In this was every art, and every charm,
To win the wisest, and the coldest warm:
Fond love, the gentle vow, the gay desire,
The kind deceit, the still-reviving fire,
Persuasive speech, and more persuasive sighs,
Silence that spoke, and eloquence of eyes.

Pope's Iliad, b. xiv. ver. 247.

But when the silent glooms of steadily night
To mutual bliss th' enamour'd pair invites;
Beneath one roof, amid the bowers they lay,
And lov'd, entranc'd, the fleeting hours away.

Soon as Armida (so her arts requir'd)
From gentle love to other cares retir'd,
The warriors, from their covert, rush'd to sight,
In radiant arms they cast a gleamy light.

As when, from martial toil, the generous steed
Reloas'd, is given to range the verdant mead:
Forgetful of his former fame he roves,
And woods in slothful ease his dappled loves;
If chance the trumpet's sound invade his ears,
Or glittering steel before his sight appears,
He weighs aloud, and furious, pants to bear
The valiant chief, and pierce the files of war—

So fares Rinaldo, when the knights he spies:
When their bright armour lightens in his eyes:
At once the glorious beams his soul inspire;
His breast rekindles with a martial fire.
Then sudden, forth advancing, Ubal'd held
Before the youth his adamantine shield:
To this he turn'd, in this at once survey'd
His own resemblance fall to view display'd:
His sweeping robes he saw, his flowing hair
With odours breathing, his luxurious air.
His sword, the only mark of warlike pride,
Estrang'd from fight, hung idly at his side;
And, wreath'd with flowers, seem'd worn for empty show;

No dreadful weapon 'gainst a valiant foe.

As one, whom long lethargic slumber ties,
Recovers from his sleep with wild surprise:
So from his trance awakes the Christian knight,
Himself beholds, and sickens at the sight;
And wishes opening earth his shame would hide,
Or ocean veil him in its whelming tide.

Then Ubal'd thus began—"All Europe arms,
And Asia's kingdoms catch the loud alarms.
Now all that cherish fame, or Christ adore,
In shining armour press the Syrian shore;
While thee, Bertoldo's soul from glory's plain,
A narrow isle in shameful real detains;
Alone regardless of the voice of fame,
Th' ignoble champion of a wanton dame!
What fatal power can thus thy sense control?
What sloth suppress the vigour of thy soul?
Rise! rise!—thee Godfrey, thee the camp invites:
'Tis fortune calls, and victory invites!
Come, fated warrior! bid the fight succeed;
And crush those foes thou oft hast made to bleed;
Now let each impious sect thy vengeance feel,
And fall extinct beneath thy conquering steel."

He ceas'd: awhile the youth in silence mus'd,
All motionless he stood, with looks confus'd;
Till shame gave way, and stronger anger rose;
(A generous anger, that from reason flows)
O'er all his face a nobler ardour fires,
Flames on his cheek, and sparkles from his eyes.

Now, hasting from the bower, their way they try
And safely pass the labyrinth's winding fold. Thold,
Meanwhile Armida view'd, with deep dismay,
Where, breathless at the gate, the keeper lay:

4 There is an obscurity in this passage, for no mention has been made before by the poet of such a circumstance.

In tanto Armida de la regia porta
Mirò giassero il fier custode estato.

Then first suspicious in her bosom grew;
And soon her lover's flight too well she knew:
Herself beheld the darling hero fly:
O direful prospect to a lover's eye!

"Where wouldst thou go, and leave me here alone?"—

She strove to say; but, with a rising groan,
Too mighty grief her feeble words suppress'd,
Which deep remurmur'd in her tortur'd breast.
Ah wretched fair! a greater power disarm,
A greater wisdom mocks thy frustrate charms!
This sees the dame, who every art applies
To stay his flight: in vain each art she tries.
Whate'er the witches of Thessalia's strain
E'er mutter'd to the shades with lip profane,
That could the planets in their spheres control,
Or call from prisons drear the parted soul,
Full well she knew; but all in vain essay'd;
No Hell; responsive, her commands obey'd.
Abandon'd thus, she next resolv'd to prove
In suppliant beauty more than spells could move.
See! where, regardless of her former fame,
All wild with anguish runs the furious dame.
She who so late the laws of love despis'd,
Who scorn'd the lover, though the love she priz'd;
Whose conquering eyes could every heart subdue;
Behold her now a lover's steps pursue!
With soft persuasive grief her look she arms,
And bathes with tears her now neglected charms.
O'er rocks and snows her tender feet she plies,
And sends her voice before her as she flies:

"O thou! who bear'st away my yielding heart,
Who rob'st me of my best, my dearest part,
O give me death—or once again restore
My murder'd peace—thy hasty flight give o'er!
Hear my last words—I ask no parting kiss;
For happier lips reserve that mighty bliss:
What canst thou fear, ah cruel! to comply,
Since still with thee remains the power to fly?"

Then Ubaldo thus: "Awhile thy speed forbear,
And lend her woes, O prince! a courteous ear:
The praise be thine thy virtue to retain,
And hear unmov'd the vanquish'd Syren's strain:
So reason shall extend her sacred sway,
And teach the subject passions to obey."

He said; Rinaldo stay'd; and sudden came,
Breathless, o'erstep't with haste, the hapless dame.
Deep sorrow spread o'er all her languid air;
Yet sweet in woe and besetuous in despair:
Silent on him her eager look she bent;
Disdain, and fear, and shame her speech prevent;
While from her eyes the knight blush'd withdrew,
Or snatch'd, with wary glance, a transient view.

As fam'd musicians, ere the notes they raise
To charm the listening ear with tuneful lays,
In accents low, with prelude soft, prepare
The rapt attention for the promis'd air:
So she, yet mindful of her fraudulent art,
Would soften, ere she spoke, the hearer's heart;
First breath'd a sigh to melt the tender breast;
Then thus, at length, these plaintive words address'd:

"Ah cruel! think not now I come to prove
The prayers that lovers might to lovers move!
Such once we were!—But if thou scorn'st the name,
Yet grant the pity foes from foes may claim.
If me thy hate pursues, enjoy thy hate;
I seek not to disturb thy happy state!
A Pagan born, I every means employ'd
To oppress the Christians and their power divide.

Thou I pursu'd, and thee excluded far,
In distant climates, from the sound of war.
But more, which deeper seems thy scorn to move,
Add how I since deceiv'd thee to my love.
O foul deceit!—to yield my virgin flower,
To give my beauties to another's power!
To let one favour'd youth that gift obtain,
Which thousands fondly sought, but sought in vain!
These are my frauds; let these thy wrath engage;
Such crimes may well demand a lover's rage!
So mayst thou part without one tender thought,
And be these dear abodes at once forgot!
Haste!—pass the seas!—thy flying sails employ,
Go, wage the combat, and our faith destroy!
Our faith, alas!—Ah, no!—my faith no more;
I worship thee, and thee alone adore!
Yet hence with thee deceiv'd Armida bear;
The vanquish'd still attends the victor's car:
Let me be shown, to all the camp display'd,
The proud betrayer by thy guile betray'd.—
Wretch as I am! shall still these locks be worn,
These locks that now are grown a lover's scorn!
These bands shall cut the tresses from my head,
And o'er my limbs a servile habit spread:
Thou wilt I follow midst surrounding foes,
When all the fury of the battle glows.
I want not soul, so far at least to dare,
To lead thy courser, or thy javelin bear.
Let me sustain, or be myself thy shield;
Still will I guard thee in the dangerous field.
No hostile hand so savage can be found,
Through my poor limbs thy dearer life to wound:
Soft mercy e'en may fell revenge restrain,
And these neglected charms some pity gain—
Ah, wretch! and dare I still of beauty boast,
My prayers rejected, and my empire lost!"

Mops had said; but grief her words withstood,
Fast from her eyes distill'd the trickling flood:
With suppliant act she sought to grasp his hand,
She held his robe; unmov'd the chief remain'd;
Love found no more an entrance in his breast,
And firm resolves the starting tears suppress'd.
Yet pity soften'd soon his generous soul;
Sorrow could he now the tender dew control:
But still he strove his secret thoughts to hide,
Compos'd his looks, and thus at length replied:
"Armida! thy distress with grief I see;

O could I now thy labouring bosom free
From this ill-omen'd love!—Ah! hapless fair!
No scorn I harbour, and no hatred bear:
I seek no vengeance; no offence I know;
Nor canst thou be my slave, nor art my foe.
On either side I fear thy thoughts have stray'd,
As love deceiv'd thee, or as anger sway'd.
But human frailties human pity claim;
Thy faith, thy sex, thy years, acquit thy fame.
I too have err'd: and shall I dare reprove
Thy tender bosom with the faults of love?
Hence ever shall thy dear remembrance rest,
In joy and grief the partner of my breast!
Still must I be thy champion—thine as far
As Christian faith permits, and Asia's war.
But ah! let here our mutual weakness end;
No further now our mutual shame extend:
Here from the world, on this extreme coast,
Be all our follies in oblivion lost!
Midst all my deeds in Europe's clime reveal'd,
O still be these, and these alone, conceal'd!
Then let no rash ignoble thoughts disgrace
Thy worth, thy beauty, and thy royal race.

With me thou seek'st in vain to quit the land:
Superior powers thy food desire withstand.
Remain, or seek some happier place of rest,
And in thy wisdom calm thy troubled breast."

As thus the warrior spoke, the haughty dame
Scarce held her rage, now kindling to a flame;
Awhile she view'd him with a scornful look,
Then from her lips these furious accents broke:

"Boast not Bertoldo's nor Sophie's blood!
Thou sprung'st relentless from the stormy flood:
Thy infant years th' Hyrcanian tigress fed;
On frozen Caucasus thy youth was bred—
See! if he deigns one tender tear bestow,
Or pay one sigh in pity to my woe!
What shall I say, or whither shall I turn?
He calls me his!—yet leaves me here in scorn.
See how his foe the generous victor leaves,
Forgets her error, and her crime forgives!
Hear how sedate, how sage, his counsels prove;
This rigid cool Zenocrates in love!
O Heaven!—O gods!—and shall this impious race
Your temples savage, and your shrines deface?
Go,—wretch—Such peace attend thy tortur'd mind
As I, forsaken here, am doom'd to find!
Fly hence!—be gone!—but soon expect to view
My vengeful ghost thy traitorous flight pursue:
A fury arm'd with snakes and torch I'll prove,
With terrors equal to my former love!
If Fate decrees thee safe to pass the main,
Escap'd from rocks, to view th' embattled plain,
There shalt thou, sinking in the fatal strife,
Appease my vengeance with thy dearest life:
Oft shalt thou then by name Armida call
In dying groans, while I enjoy thy fall!"

She could no more; as these last words she spoke,
Scarce from her lips the sounds imperfect broke.
She faints! she sinks! all breathless pale she lies
In chilly sweats, and shuts her languid eyes.
Dost thou, Armida! now thy eyelids close?
Heaven envies sure one comfort to thy woe.
Ah! raise thy sight; behold thy deadly foe:
See down his cheek the kindly sorrow flow.
O couldst thou now, ill-fated lover! hear
His sighs soft breaking on thy raptur'd ear!
What Fate permits (but this thou canst not view)
He gives, and pity takes the last adieu.
What should he do?—thus leave her on the coast,
Twixt life and death her struggling senses lost?
Compassion pleads, and courtesy detains;
But dire necessity his flight constrains.
He parts:—and now a friendly breeze prevails,
(The pilot's tresses waving in the gales)
The golden sail o'er surging ocean speeds,
And from the sight the flying shore recedes.

But when, recover'd from her trance, she stood,
And all around the land forsaken view'd:
"And is he gone?—Has then the traitor fled?
Left me in life's extremest need?" she said;
"Would he not to my hapless state dispense
One moment's stay, or wait returning sense?
And do I love him still? still here remain,
And unreveng'd in empty words complain?
What then avail these tears, these female arms?
Far other arts are mine, and stronger charms.
I will pursue—nor Hell th' ingrate shall shield,
Nor Heaven shall safety from my fury yield:
Now, now I seize him! now his heart I tear,
And scatter round his mangled limbs in air!
He knows each various art of torture well,
In his own arts the traitor I'll excel!"

But ah! I wander!—O! untimely boast!
Unless'd Armida, whither art thou tost?
Then shouldst thou to thy wrath have given the rein,
When he lay captive in thy powerful chain,
Then did the wretch no less thy hatred claim;
Too late thy rage now kindles to a flame!
O beauty scorn'd! since you th' offence sustain,
Be yours the due revenge your wrongs demand.
Lo! with my person shall his worth be paid,
Who from the battle brings that hated head.
Ye gallant youths! whom faithful love inspires,
A dangerous, glorious task my soul requires;
Even I, to whom Damascus' realms shall bow,
The price of vengeance with myself bestow.
But, if, contemn'd, I must not this obtain,
Then nature gave these boasted charms in vain:
Take back th' unhappy gift!—myself I hate,
My birth, my being, and my regal state.
One soothing hope alone can comfort give;
For sweet revenge I still consent to live!"

Thus with wild grief she ran her phrensy o'er,
Then turn'd her footsteps from the desert shore:
Her fiery looks her stormy passions show;
Loose in the wind her locks dishovell'd flow;
And in her eyes the flashing sparkles glow!

Now, at her dome, she calls with hideous yell,
Three hundred deities from deepest Hell:
Soon murky clouds o'er all the skies are spread;
Th' eternal planet hides his sickening head.
On mountain-tops the furious whirlwinds blow;
Deep rocks the ground; Avernus groans below.
Through all the palace mingled cries resound;
Loud hissings, howls, and screams are heard around.
Thick glooms, more black than night, the walls en-
Where not a ray its friendly light bestows; [close,
Save that, by fits, sulphurous lightnings stream,
And dart through sullen shades a dreadful gleam!
At length the night dispers'd, and faintly shone,
With scarce recover'd looks, the doubtful Sun:
No longer now the stately walls appear'd;
No trace remain'd where once the pile was rear'd.
Like cloudy vapours of the changing skies,
Where towers and battlements in semblance rise,
That fit before the winds or solar beam,
Like idle phantoms of a sick-man's dream:
So vanish'd all the pile, and nought remain'd
But native horrors midst a rocky land!

Then swift th' enchastress mounts her ready car,
And, girt with tempests, cleaves the fields of air.
Declining from the pole, where distant lie
Nations unknown beneath the eastern sky;
Alcides' pillars now she journeys o'er;
Nor seeks Hesp'ria's strand, nor Africa's shore;
But o'er the subject seas suspended lies,
Till Syria's borders to her view arise.

She seeks not then Damascus' regal dome,
But shuns her once-lov'd seats and native home;
And guides her chariot to the fatal lands,
Where, midst Asphaltus' waves, her castle stands.
There, from her menial train and dancels' eyes,
All pensive, in a lone retreat she lies:
A war of thought her troubled breast assails;
But soon her shame subsides, and wrath prevails.
"Hence will I haste," she cried, "ere Egypt's king

To Sion's plains his numerous force can bring:
Try every art, in every form appear,
Bend the tough bow, and shake the missile spear.
My charms shall every leader's soul inspire,
And every breast with emulation fire.

O let the sweet revenge I seek be mine,
 And virgin honour I with joy resign!
 Nor thou, stern guardian, now my conduct blame:
 Thine are my deeds, to thee belongs the shame:
 Thy counsel first impell'd my tender mind
 To acts that ill-becom'd the female kind:
 Then all be thine, whate'er my errors prove,
 What now I give to rage, as once to love!"

She said; and thus resolv'd, she calls in haste
 Knights, squires, and damsels in her service plac'd.
 A splendid train in duteous order wait,
 All richly clad, attendant on her state.
 With these, impatient, on her way she goes:
 Nor Sun nor Moon beholds her take repose;
 Till near she comes to where the friendly bands
 Lie wide encamp'd on Gaza's sultry sands.

BOOK XVII.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Egyptian troops and auxiliaries are mustered before the caliph, seated on his throne. Armida unexpectedly appears with her forces: she identifies the leaders of the army with her beauty, and proffers her hand in marriage to any champion that shall kill Rinaldo. A contest, thereupon, ensues between Adrastus and Tusaphanes; but the caliph, interposing, puts a stop to it. Rinaldo and the two knights return to Palestine. On their landing, they are met by the hermit, who had before entertained Charles and Ubalde: he gives Rinaldo counsel for his future conduct, presents him with a suit of armour, and explains to him the actions of his ancestors that are represented in the shield. He then conducts the three warriors within sight of the camp, and dismisses them.

Plac'd where Judea's utmost bounds extend Towards fair Pelusium, Gaza's towers ascend:
 Fast by the breezy shore the city stands,
 Amid unbounded plains of barren sands,
 Which high in air the furious whirlwinds sweep,
 Like mountain billows of the stormy deep;
 That scarce th' affrighted traveller, spent with toil,
 Escapes the tempest of th' unstable soil.

Th' Egyptian monarch holds this frontier town,
 Which from the Turkish powers of old he won:
 Since opportunely near the plains it lies,
 To which he bends his mighty enterprise;
 He left awhile his court and ancient state,
 And hither now transferr'd his regal seat;
 And hither brought, encamp'd along the coast,
 From various provinces a countless host.

Say, Muse! what arms he us'd, what lands he sway'd,

What nations fear'd him, and what powers obey'd:
 How from the south he mov'd the realms afar,
 And call'd the natives of the east to war:
 Thou only canst disclose the dire alarms,
 The bands and chiefs of half the world in arms.

When Egypt 'gainst the Grecian sway rebell'd,
 The faith forsaking which her fathers held,
 A warrior, sprung from Macon, seiz'd the throne,
 And fix'd his seat in Cairo's stately town,
 A caliph call'd; from him each prince who wears
 Th' Egyptian crown the name of caliph bears.
 Thus Nile beheld succeeding Pharaohs shine,
 And Ptolemies enroll'd from line to line.

And now revolving years their course pursu'd,
 And well secur'd the empire's basis stood;
 O'er Libya wide and Asia spread its power,
 From far Cyrene to the Syrian shore;
 Where seven-fold Nile o'erflows the faten'd land,
 And where Syenna's sun-burnt dwellings stand;
 Where proud Euphrates leaves Assyria's fields;
 Her spicy stores where rich Maresanna yields:
 And far beyond extends the potent sway,
 To climates that nearer greet the rising day.

Vast in itself the mighty kingdom show'd,
 But added glories now its lord bestow'd:
 Of blood illustrious, and by virtues known,
 The arts of peace and war were all his own.
 Against the Turks' and Persians' force engag'd,
 With various fortune mighty wars he wag'd;
 Success and loss by turns ordain'd to meet,
 In conquest great, but greater in defeat.
 At length, with creeping age his strength decay'd,
 Reluctant at his side he sheath'd the blade:
 For yet his soul retain'd the martial flame,
 The thirst of empire and the lust of fame.
 His chiefs, abroad, their sovereign's wars maintain'd,
 While he, at home, in regal splendour reign'd.
 His name the realms of Afric trampling beard,
 And furthest Ind his distant rule rever'd:
 Some sent their martial bands, a willing aid,
 And some, with gold and gems, their tribute paid.

Such was the man who drew his various force
 From climates remote, to oppose the Christians' course:

Armida hither came, in happy hour,
 What time the king review'd his numerous power.

High on a stately throne himself was plac'd,
 Th' ascent a hundred steps of ivory grac'd:
 A silver canopy o'erspread his seat,
 And gold and purple lay beneath his feet:
 Around his head the snow-white linen roll'd,
 His turban form'd of many a winding fold:
 The sceptre in his better hand was seen,
 His beard was white, and awful was his mien.
 His thoughtful brow sedate experience shows,
 Yet in his eye-balls youthful ardour glows.
 Alike maintain'd, in every act, appears
 The pomp of power, or dignity of years.
 So when or Phidias' or Apelles' art
 To lifeless forms could seeming life impart;
 In such a shape they show'd to mortal eyes
 Majestic Jove when thundering from the skies.
 Beside the caliph, waits on either hand
 A mighty peer, the noblest of the land;
 This holds the seal, ministrant o'er the throne,
 And bends his cares to civil rule alone:
 But greater than, the sword of justice bears,
 And, prince of armies, guides the course of wars.

Beneath, with thronging spears a circling band,
 In deep array his bold Circassians stand:
 The cuirass-plates their manly breasts defend,
 And crooked sabres at their sides depend.

Thus sat the monarch, and from high beheld
 Th' assembled nations marshall'd on the field;
 While, as the squadrons pass'd his lofty seat,
 They bow'd their arms and ensigns at his feet.

First march'd the forces drawn from Egypt's lands,

Four were their chiefs, and each a troop command'd.
 Two came from upper, two from lower Nile,
 Where ocean's waters once o'erspread the soil:
 Now lie far distant from the briny food
 Those fields which once the coasting sailor view'd.

First of the squadrons mov'd the ready train
That dwell'd in Alexandria's wealthy plain;
Along the land that westward far declines,
Whose wide extent with Africa's border joins.
Atropes was their chief, who more excell'd
In close device than action in the field.
The troops succeed, on Asia's coast who lie,
Against the beams that gild the morning sky:
These leads Arotasus, not by virtue fir'd,
But with the pride of titles vain inspir'd:
No many helms, ere this, had press'd his brows,
Nor early trump disturb'd his soft repose:
But now from ease to scenes of toil he came,
By false ambition led with hopes of fame.
The next that march'd, appear'd no common band,
But a huge host that cover'd all the land:
It seem'd that Egypt's fields of waving grain
Could scarce suffice their numbers to sustain:
Yet these within one ample city dwell'd;
Thesea mighty Cairo in her circuit held.
From crowded streets she sends her sons to war;
And these Campanos brings beneath his care.
Then, under Gassel, march'd the troop who till'd
The neighbouring glebe with generous plenty fill'd;
And far above, where land the river roars,
And from on high its second cataract pours
No arms but swords and bows th' Egyptians bear,
Nor weighty mail, nor shining helmets wear:
Their habits rich, nor fram'd to daunt the foe,
But rouse to plunder with the pompous show.
Next Burca's tawny sons, a barbarous throng,
Beneath their chief, Alaron, march'd along:
Half arm'd they came these, long to plunder train'd,
A hungry life on barren sands sustain'd.
Zumara's king a fairer squadron leads;
To him the king of Tripoly succeeds:
Both weak in steady fight, but skill'd to dare
In sudden onset, and a flying war.
Then those whose culture each Arabia claim'd,
The stony that, and this the happy nam'd.
The last ne'er doom'd (if fame the truth declare)
The fierce extremes of heat and cold to bear.
Here odoriferous gums their sweets diffuse;
Th' immortal phoenix here his youth renews;
Here, on a pile of many a rich perfume,
Prepares at once his cradle and his tomb!
Less costly those their vests and armour wore;
But weapons like the troops of Egypt bore.
To these succeed the wandering Arab train,
Who shift their canvas towns from plain to plain:
Their accents female, and their stature low;
A sable hue their gloomy features show.
And down their backs the jety ringlets flow.
Long Indian came they arm with pointed steel,
And round the plain their steeds impetuous wheel:
Thou wouldest have thought the winds impell'd their course.
If speed of winds could match the rapid horse,
Arabia's foremost squadron Sypbas leads;
Before the second bold Ahdine proceeds.
The third have Albasar at their head;
A chief in rapine, not in knighthood, bred.
Then from the various islands march'd a train,
Whose rocks are 'compass'd by th' Arabian main:
These were they went, in arts of fishing skill'd,
To draw rich pearls from ocean's watery field.
And join'd with these, the neighbouring hands that Beside the Red-sea shore, their aids supply. [sic
These Agricaites, these Malasses guides,
Whose every faith and every law denies,

Next march'd the swarthy troops from Mevoe's soil,
That dwell'd 'twixt Astaborn and fruitful Nile;
Where Ethiopia spreads her sultry plains,
Whose vast extent three different states contains:
Two Assiniras and Canarice sway'd;
These Mevoe's laws and Egypt's rule obey'd,
And 'gainst the Christian host their forces led.
The third, whose sons the pure religion knew,
Mix'd not its warriors with the Pagan crew.
Two tributary kings their squadrons show,
That bear in fight the quiver and the bow.
Soldan of Ormus one, a barren land,
Where the vast gulf of Persia leaves the strand.
One in Boëcan held his regal place,
Whose kingdom oft the rising tides embrace;
But when the ebbing waves forsake the shore,
With feet unbatht the pilgrim passes o'er.
Not thee, O Altamorus! from the plain
Thy faithful spouse could in her arms detain:
She wept, she beat her breast, she tore her hair,
And begg'd thee oft thy purpose to forbear.
"Dost thou to me prefer, unkind!" she cried,
"The dreadful aspect of the stormy tide?
Are weapons gentler burthens to thy arms,
Than thy dear son, who smiles in infant charms?"
Samsarand's realms this powerful king obey;
No subject crown, no tributary sway:
In fields he shooe, conspicuous in the fight,
And stood supreme in courage as in might.
The cuirass on their breast his warriors brace;
Their side the sword, their saddle bears the mace.
Next from the seats of morn, beyond the shores
Of Pagan's stream, Adrastus brings his powers:
Around his limbs a serpent's skin he drew,
Diversified with spots of sable hue;
While for his steed he press'd (tremendous sight!)
A mighty elephant of towering height.
Then came the regal band, the caliph's host,
The flower of war and vigour of the host:
All arm'd in proof, well furnish'd for the field,
On foaming steeds their rapid course they held.
Rich purple vestments gleam upon the day,
And steel and gold reflect a mingled ray!
Alaron here and Hidraotes came;
Here Odemarus rode, a mighty name!
Here, midst the valiant, Rimedon appear'd,
Whose daring soul nor toil nor danger fear'd.
Tigranes here and Ormond fierce were found;
Ripoldo, once for piracy renown'd:
And Marabustes bold, th' Arabian nam'd,
Since late his might the rebel Arabs tam'd.
Here Pargas, Arimon, Orindus shone;
Brimartes, fam'd for many a conquer'd town:
Syphantes, skill'd the bounding steed to rein:
And thou, Aridamantes! form'd to gain
The prize of wrestling on the dusty plain!
Here Tisaphernes, with a dauntless air,
Tower'd o'er the rest, the thunderbolt of war!
Whose force in battle every force excell'd,
To lift the javelin or the falchion wield.
O'er these the sway a brave Armenian bears,
Who left the Christian faith in early years
For Pagan lore; his former name estrang'd,
To Emenees then was Clement chang'd:
Yet was he well esteem'd for faith sincere,
And far o'er all his sovereign held him dear.
No more remain'd; when now, to sudden view,
The fair Armida with her squadron drew.
High on a stately car, the royal dame
In martial pomp (a female archer) came:

A slender belt her flowing robe restrain'd ;
 Her side the shafts, her hand the bow sustain'd.
 Even sweet in wrath, her charms the gazer move,
 And while she threats her threatening kindles love !
 Her radiant car, like that which bears the Sun,
 Bright with the jacinth and pyropus shone.
 Beneath the golden yoke, in pairs constrain'd,
 Four unicorns the skillful driver rein'd.
 A hundred maids, a hundred pages, round
 Attend ; the quivers on their shoulders sound :
 Each in the field bestrides a milk-white steed,
 Practis'd to turn, and like the wind in speed.
 Her troop succeeds, which Aradine commands,
 And Hidraotes rais'd in Syria's lands.

As when, again reviv'd, the phoenix soars
 To visit Ethiopia's much-lov'd shores,
 And spreads his vary'd wings with plumage bright, (Sky-tinctur'd plumes that gleam with golden light)

On either hand the feather'd nations fly,
 And wondering trace his progress through the sky :
 So pass'd the fair, while gazing hosts admire
 Her graceful looks, her gesture and attire.
 If thus her face, in awful anger arm'd,
 Such various throngs with power resistless charm'd ;
 Well might her softer arts each bosom move,
 With winning glances and the smiles of love.

Armid's past; the king of kings commands
 Brave Emirenes, from the martial bands,
 To attend his will; to him he gives the post,
 O'er all the chiefs, to guide the numerous host.
 He came: his looks with grace majestic shin'd,
 And spoke him worthy of the rank design'd.
 At once the guard divides; a path is shown;
 He treads the steps ascending to the throne:
 There, on his humble knee, the ground he press'd,
 And bow'd his head low-bending o'er his breast.
 To him the king—"This sceptre, chief, receive,
 To thee the rule of yonder host I give.
 Thou, Emirenes! now my place supply;
 Deliver Sion's king, our old ally:
 Swift on the Franks my dread resentment pour;
 Go—~~and~~—and conquer—in th' avenging hour
 No Christian 'scape; their name no more be known,
 And bring the living, bound, before my throne."

The monarch spoke; the warrior from his hand
 Receiv'd the sovereign ensign of command.

"This sceptre from unconquer'd hands," he cried,

"I take, O king! thy fortune is my guide.
 Arm'd in thy cause I go, thy captain sworn,
 To avenge the wrongs which Asia's realms have borne:

Nor will I e'er return, but crown'd with fame;
 Death, if I fail, shall hide a warrior's shame!
 Should unexpected ills, ye powers! impend,
 On me alone let all the storm descend:

Preserve the host, while, victors, from the plain
 They bring their chief in glorious triumph slain."

He ceas'd; the troops with loud applause reply,
 And barbarous clangours echo to the sky.

And now departs, amid the mingled sound,
 The king of kings, with peers encompass'd round:
 These, summon'd to the lofty tent of state,
 In equal honours with the monarch sat;
 Himself benignant every chief address'd,
 And gave to each a portion of the feast.
 There, for her arts, fit time Armid found,
 While pleasure reign'd, and festive sport went round.

The banquet o'er, the dams, who well describe
 That all behold her charms with wondering eyes,
 Slow from her seat arose, with regal look,
 And thus respectful to the caliph spoke:

"O mighty king! behold, with these I stand
 To guard our faith, and combat for the land,
 A damsel, yet I boast a royal name;
 Nor scorn a queen to mix in fields of fame.
 Who seeks to reign, in arts of ruling skill'd,
 By turns the sceptre and the sword must wield.
 This hand in battle can the javelin use,
 And, where it strikes, the wound the strokes pursue."

Hast thou not heard how once I prisoners made
 The bravest knights whose arms the cross display'd?

These overcome, in rugged chains confin'd,
 To thee a glorious present I design'd:
 So had thy powers (their bravest champions lost)
 With sure success o'erthrown the Christian host.
 But fierce Rinaldo, who my warriors slew,
 Released, in evil hour, the captive crew.
 'Tis he! the wretch of whom I wrong'd complain,
 And unreveng'd these wrongs I yet sustain.
 A just resentment hence my bosom warms,
 And fires with added zeal my soul to arms.—
 But what my wrongs hereafter times shall speak;
 Let this suffice—a great revenge I seek!
 Revenge be mine!—and sure, not sent in vain,
 Some pointed shaft may fix him to the plain.
 Heaven oft from righteous hands directs the dart,
 And guides the weapon to the guilty heart.
 But should some knight, by thirst of glory led,
 Bring me, from yonder field, the Christian's head,
 These eyes with joy the welcome gift shall view;
 The victor chief shall find a victor's due:
 My hand in marriage shall the hero gain,
 With ample dowry and a large domain.
 Say—is there one who will the prize regard,
 And dare the peril meet for such reward?"

While thus the damsel spoke, with longing eyes
 Adrastus views her, and at length replies:

"Forbid it, Heaven! that e'er Rinaldo's heart
 Should feel the vengeance of Armid's dart!
 Shall such a wretch to thee resign his breath,
 And sweetly perish by an envy'd death?
 In me thy minister of wrath surres,
 His forfeit head before thy feet I'll lay;
 This hand shall rend his breast, and scatter far
 His mangled body to the fowls of air."

While thus the Indian proud Adrastus spoke,

These haughty words from Tisaphernes broke:
 "And what art thou, whose empty pride can dare
 Before our monarch thus thy wants declare?
 Know, many a chief (though silent here) exceeds Thy boasted valour with his martial deeds."

To him his rival with indignant scorn:
 "Lo! one for action, not for vaunting, born:
 And elsewhere hadst thou dar'd our wrath provoke,
 Thy last of words, insensate! hadst thou spoke."

Thus furious they; but with his awful hand
 Their common lord the growing strife restrain'd;
 Then to Armid thus—"Thy manly mind
 Seems far exalted o'er thy softer kind:
 With thee remains the power, transcendent dame!
 To calm these warriors, and their rage reclaim;
 'T is thine, at will, to hid their fury glow
 With nobler vengeance on the public foe:
 Then shall each champion's valour stand on foot,
 While emulation breathes from breast to breast."

This said, the monarch ceas'd, and either knight
Vow'd in her cause to wield the sword in fight.
Not these alone, but all, whom glory warms,
Now vaunt their courage and their force in arms:
All to the damsel proffer certain aid,
All vow deep vengeance on Rinaldo's head.

While thus against the hero, once belov'd,
Such various powers, such mighty foes she mov'd,
He, whom her hate pursu'd, the land forsook,
And through the main his prosperous voyage took.
The wind, that late impell'd the pilot's sails,
Now favour'd her return with western gales.
The knight the pole and either Bear survey'd,
And all the stars that gild night's sable shade:
He view'd the foamy flood, the mountains steep,
Whose shaggy fronts o'er shade the silent deep:
Now of the camp he asks, and now inquires
Of different nations, and their rites admires.
Thus through surrounding waves the warriors fly,
Till the fourth morning paints the eastern sky;
And when the setting Sun to sight was lost,
The rapid vessel gain'd the destin'd coast.
Then thus the virgin—"Here our voyage ends,
Here Palestine her welcome shore extends."

The heroes land, and from their wondering eyes
The mystic pilot in a moment flies.
Now e'er the prospect e'er her mantle threw,
And every object from the sight withdrew.
Uncertain midst the sandy wilds they stray,
No friendly beam to guide them on their way.
At length the pale-orb'd queen of silent night,
Slow-rising, streak'd the parting clouds with light:
Sudden the chiefs a distant blaze behold,
With rays of silver and with gleams of gold.
Approaching then, they radiant arms survey'd,
On which the Moon with full reflection play'd.
Thick-set as stars, with many a costly stone,
The golden helm and polish'd cuirass shone.
An aged tree the massy burden held:
Against the trunk was hung the mighty shield;
Mysterious forms embiaz'd its spacious field.
Beneath the branches from his rustic seat
A courteous hermit rose, the knights to meet.

When now the Dane and Ubald nearer drew,
In him their friend their ancient host they knew:
At once they greet the sage with glad surprise,
The sage with mild benevolence replies;
Then towards Rinaldo, who with wonder view'd
His reverend form, he turn'd, and thus pursu'd:

"For thy arrival, chief! and thine alone,
I here have stay'd in desert shades unknown.
In me thy friend behold—let these relate
How far my care has watch'd thy former state.
These, taught by me, th' enchantress' power de-fy'd,

And freed thy soul, in magic fetters ty'd.
Attend my words, nor harsh their tenour deem,
Though far unlike the Syren's wanton theme:
Deep in thy heart repose each sacred truth,
Till holier lips instruct thy listening youth.
Think not our good is plac'd in flowery fields,
In transient joys which fading beauty yields:
Above the steep, the rocky path it lies,
On virtue's hill, whose summit cleaves the skies:
Who gains th' ascent must many toils engage,
And spurn the pleasures of a thoughtless age.
Wilt thou, dismay'd, the arduous height forgo,
And lurk ignobly in the vale below?
To thee a face erect has Nature given
And the pure spirit of congenial Heaven,

That far from Earth thy generous thoughts might rise,

To gain, by virtuous deeds, th' immortal prize.
She gave thee courage, not with impious rage
To oppress thy friends, and civil combats wage;
But that thy soul with noble warmth might glow,

In fields of fight against the common foe.
Wisdom to proper objects points our ire,
Now gently cools, now fans the rising fire."

He spoke: with downcast eyes the hero stood,
While thus the words of truth resiless flow'd.
Full well his secret thoughts the hermit view'd—
"Now lift thine eyes, O son!" he thus pursu'd,
"See in that shield thy great forefathers shown,
Whose mighty deeds to distant times are known;
Wilt thou the glories of thy line disgrace,
And lag behind in honour's sacred race?
Rise, gallant youth! and while thy sires I name,
From their example catch the generous flame."

He said: with eager gaze the knight beheld
The sculptur'd stories to his sight reveal'd.

There, in a narrow space, the master's mind,
With woodrout art, a thousand forms design'd:
There shone great Esté's race, whose noble blood
From Roman source 'in streams unsully'd flow'd,
With laurel crown'd the godlike chiefs appear'd;
The sage their honours and their wars declar'd,
Caius he show'd*, who (when th' imperial sway Declining fell to alien hands a prey)
A willing people taught to own his power,
And first of Esté's line the sceptre bore.
When now the Goth[†] (a rude destructive name!)
Call'd by Honorius, big with ruin, came;
When Rome, oppress'd and captive to the foe,
Fear'd one dire hour would all her state o'erthrow;
He show'd how brave Aurelius from the bands
Of foreign foes pressur'd his subject lands,
Foretold then he nam'd[‡], whose noble pride
The Huns, the tyrants of the North, defy'd:

P

* The house of Esté was said to be descended from Actius, related by the mother's side to Augustus.

† At the time of the emperors Arcadius and Honorius, anno 403, Stilico, incited by ambition to weaken Honorius, who ruled in the West, invited to Italy Alaric and Radagasso, kings of the Goths and Vandals; at which time this Caius
Actius governed in Esté in the name of the emperor; where the Barbarians committing every kind of outrage, and the emperor taking no measures against them, Actius was by general consent elected absolute sovereign, in order to defend the country from these invaders.

‡ When Honorius, exasperated with the Romans, transferred the imperial seat to Ravenna, and invited Alaric again into Italy, who had been before invited by Stilico, Aurelius conducted himself so artfully, that the Goths, in their march towards Rome, with design to destroy that city, passed through his territories without committing the least depredations.

§ Attilie, king of the Huns, in the year 450, through an irreconcilable hatred to the Christians, prepared to march to the attack of Aquileia, as the key to Italy; and was several times defeated by Forestus, the son of Aurelius, with the assistance of the forces of Gilio, king of Padua, his re-

Faces Attila, their lord, of savage mien,
 By him subdu'd in single fight was seen.
 See next the patriot chief, with ceaseless care,
 For Aquileia's strong defence prepare;
 Th' Italian Hector in the task of war!
 But ah! too soon he ends his mortal state,
 And with his own includes his country's fate.
 Then Acarius² to his father's fame
 Succeeds, the champion of the Roman name.
 Not to the Huns, but Fate, Altius yields³,
 And, far retir'd, a sever kingdom builds:
 Deep in the vale of Po his city rose,
 (A thousand scatter'd cots the town compose)
 Which distant ages shall with pride proclaim
 The seat of empire of th' Estensian name.
 Th' Alami quell'd⁴, Acarius, in debate
 With Odoacer, meets the stroke of fate⁵:
 For Italy he bravely yields his breath,
 And shares paternal honour in his death.
 With him the gallant Alpharicus dies:
 To exile Actius⁶, with his brother, flies;
 But soon return'd (th' Erulean king⁷ o'erthrown)
 Again in council and in arms they shone.
 Next, as his eye receiv'd the barbed steel,
 A second brave Epaminondas fell⁸:
 See! where with smiles he seems his life to yield,
 Since Totila is fled, and safe his shield.
 His son Valerian emulates his name,
 And treads the footsteps of paternal fame:

lation. Forastus is said to have fought with Attila hand to hand.

² Acarius succeeded his father Forastus in the government of Estè and Montefice, and gained many victories over Attila.

³ The forces of Altius met with such continued ill success with Attila, that their misfortunes seem'd to have been the immediate dispensation of Providence; and hence the poet says, that Altius gave way to Fate, and not to the Huns.

⁴ It was under the conduct of Acarius that Aventino, Aazio, Trento, and other neighbouring villages, were reduced into the ruins of a city, and defended by a mole against the floods of the Po; and this was the foundation of the future town of Ferrara.

⁵ At this time Acarius was captain of horse, anno 463.

⁶ Acarius, and Alpharicus his brother, opposed king Odoacer, one of the chiefs in the army of Attila, who had made a descent into Italy, with many others, the remains of the forces of that barbarian.

⁷ Actius and Constantius, sons of Acarius, being invaded by Odoacer, were despoiled of all their possessions, and oblig'd to abandon Italy.

⁸ Odoacer, who was three times defeated by Theodoric Amelo, king of the Ostrogoths, and two years besieged in Ravenna, and at last killed, after Actius and Constantius had recovered their possessions.

⁹ By the title of second Epaminondas is meant Bonifacius. This event happened in the year 556, when Narsetes, sent by the emperor Justinian, overcame Totila, king of the Goths; in which battle Bonifacius being present, was shot in the right eye by an arrow, which pass'd through the nape of his neck; he was carried on his shield into his tent, where he soon expired. The poet

Scarce yet a man¹⁰, of manly force possess'd,
 His daring hand th' encroaching Goth repell'd.
 Near him with warlike mien Ernestus rose¹¹,
 Who sate in field the rough Sclavonian foe.
 With those intrepid Aldoard¹² is shewn,
 Who 'gainst the Lombard king defend'd Monceice's town.

Henry and Berengarius¹³ then appear'd,
 Who serv'd whate Charles¹⁴ his glorious business rear'd.

Then Lewis follow'd¹⁵, who the war maintain'd
 Against his nephew that in Latium reign'd.
 Next Otto with his sons¹⁶, a friendly band,
 Five blooming youths around their father stand.
 There Almeric¹⁷, Ferrara's monarch, came,
 (Ferrara, plac'd by Po's majestic stream)
 See! where he lifts to Heaven his pious eyes;
 Beneath his care what hallow'd fane arise!
 The second Actius¹⁸ shi'd a different side,
 Who bloody strife with Berengarius try'd;

compares him to Epaminondas the Theban general, of whom it is related, that, at the battle of Mantinea, being carried mortally wounded into his tent, he demand'd if his shield was safe; and being told it was, he order'd it to be brought to him, and, having kiss'd it with great apparent satisfaction, immediately died.

¹⁰ At the death of his father this youth was only fourteen years of age, and at that time was with Narsetes at the overthrow of the Goths.

¹¹ Ernestus, son of Eribert of Estè, performed many great actions in Dalmatia; which, from the name of Schiavi, took the name of Sclavonia: he defeated the Sclavonians so effectually in 711, that they were never again able to make head.

¹² Agilulpho, by his marriage with Theodotinda, became king of the Lombards, and, making peace with France, invaded Italy, and took Padua, at first defended by the prince of the house of Estè; and he endeavour'd to do the same by Montecceice.

¹³ Henry, son of Ernestus: Berengarius, son of Henry.

¹⁴ Charles the Great, serv'd with great valour by Henry and Berengarius.

¹⁵ After the death of Charles, Berengarius enter'd into the service of his son Lewis, who was created emperor, and carried on a war against Bernardo the son of Pepin, brother son of Charles, who had been by his father made king of Italy: he was defeated by Berengarius, taken prisoner, and afterwards stripp'd of his kingdom and deprived of sight, anno 819.

¹⁶ Otto, brother to Berengarius: his five sons were Marzio, Sigifredo, Uberto, Hugo, and Amizono.

¹⁷ Almeric was son of Amizono: through the favour of Hugo king of Italy, by whom he was greatly esteem'd, Almeric was call'd to the government of Ferrara, where he ruled with sovereign authority, and obtained the title of Marquis: he gave a considerable part of his revenues to the maintenance of churches and abbays, and employ'd his private fortune in building others, amongst which was the church of Saint George, afterwards the principal one of Ferrara.

¹⁸ He carried on a war with Berengarius II king of Italy, anno 930.

But, after many various turns of fate,
 Subdu'd his foe, and rul'd th' Italian state:
 Albertus now appear'd, his valiant son,
 Who from Germania mighty trophies won;
 Who foil'd the Danes; and to his nuptial bed,
 With ample dowry⁶², Otho's daughter led.
 Next Hugo, who the haughty Romans quell'd⁶³,
 And o'er the Tuscan lands dominion held.
 Tedaldo then⁶⁴; and now the sculpture show'd,
 With Beatrice where Bonifacius stood⁶⁵.
 No male succeeding⁶⁶ to the large domain,
 No son the father's honours to maintain;
 Matilda follow'd⁶⁷, who, with virtues try'd,
 Full well the want of manly sex supply'd:
 In arts of sway the wise and valiant dame
 O'er crown and sceptres rais'd the female fame:
 The Norman there she chas'd⁶⁸: here quell'd in field

Guiscard the brave, before untaught to yield:
 Henry she crush'd⁶⁹ (the fourth that bore the name)

And with his standards⁷⁰ to the temple came;
 Then in the Vatican, with honours grac'd,
 In Peter's chair the sovereign pontiff plac'd.

⁶² He obtained from the emperor Otho his daughter Adelaide to wife, with the dowry of Friburg in Germany, and several places in Italy, anno 973.

⁶³ This Hugo performed many exploits against the Romans, in behalf of pope Gregory, and the emperor Otho, about the year 995.

⁶⁴ Son of Actius II. duke of Ferrara and marquis of Este, count of Canossa, lord of Lucca, Placentia, Parma, and Reggio, anno 970.

⁶⁵ There were two of the name of Bonifacius, one son of the beforesaid Albertus, and the other son of Tedaldo, duke of Ferrara; this last succeeded to the possessions of his father, and obtained besides Mantua and Modena, and was imperial vicar anno 1007. He married Beatrice daughter of the emperor Conrad II. and received Verona with her in dowry in 1034.

⁶⁶ Bonifacius left only one male child, which died under the care of its mother Beatrice.

⁶⁷ Daughter of Bonifacius and Beatrice, according to the poet, and as likewise delivered by Pigna; but other authors differ in the account of the parentage of this celebrated woman.

⁶⁹ The emperor Henry IV. a bitter enemy to the church: he endeavoured to deprive her of the right of creating bishops, and twice created antipopes.

⁷⁰ This happened in Canossa 1081, at the time Gregory IX. was besieged there by Henry. This religious and magnanimous woman replaced two pontiffs in the papal chair; the one was Alexander II. who had been driven out by Giberto of Parma, sent by the emperor Henry IV. into Italy, which Henry favoured Canoino, who probably by his means was made antipope; the other was Gregory IX. persecuted by the same Henry.

See the 5th Actus⁷¹ near her person move,
 With looks of reverence and of dutious love,
 Actius the fourth⁷² a happier race has known;
 Thence Guelph issues, Kunigunda's son;
 Retiring, to Germania's call he yields,
 By fate transplanted to Bavarian fields:
 There on the Guelphian tree, with age decay'd,
 Great Esté's branch its foliage fair display'd:
 Then might you soon the Guelphian race behold
 Renew their sceptres and their crowns of gold.
 From hence Bertoldo rose⁷³, of matchless fame;
 Hence the sixth Actius, bright in virtue, came.

Such were the chiefs whose forms the shield ex-
 press'd;

And emulation fir'd Rinaldo's breast:
 In fancy rap, each future toll he view'd,
 Proud cities storm'd, and mighty hosts subdu'd.
 Swift o'er his limbs the burnish'd mail he throw'd,
 Already hopes the day, and triumphs o'er the foe.
 And now the Dane, who told how Sweno fell
 In fatal fight beneath the Pagan steel,
 To brave Rinaldo gave the destin'd blade;
 "In happy hour receive this sword," he said,
 "Avenge its former lord, whose worth demands,
 Whose love deserves this vengeance at thy hands."
 Then thus the hero—"Grant, O gracious

Heaven!

The hand to which this fated sword is given,
 With this may emulate its master's fame,
 And pay the tribute due to Sweno's name."

So they. But now the sage without delay
 Impell'd the warriors on their purpos'd way:
 "Haste, let us seek the Christian camp," he cried,
 "Myself will through the waste your journey guide."
 He said; and straight his ready car ascends;

(Each knight obsequious at his word attends)
 He gives the steed the reins, the lash applies:
 Swift to the east the rolling chariot flies.
 Again the hoary hermit silence broke.

And sudden, turning to Rinaldo, spoke:
 "To thee 'twas given the ancient root to trace,
 Whence sprung the branches of th' Estensian race:
 Still shall thine stock succeeding years supply,
 Nor, damp'd with age, the pregnant virtue die.
 O could I now, as late the past I told,
 The future ages to thy view unfold.

Succeeding heroes should thy wonder raise,
 Great as the first in number as in praise:
 But truths like these are hidden from my sight,
 Or seen through dusky clouds with doubtful light.
 Yet hear, and trust to what my words disclose;
 Since from a pure source this knowledge flows;

⁷¹ This, according to Pigna, was second husband to Matilda, after the death of her first husband Gottifredo Gibboso: but it being afterwards discovered that they were related, the marriage was annulled, and they were divorced by command of the pope.

⁷² This Actius was more fortunate in point of children than Bonifacius, who left only Matilda to succeed him; but this Actius had for his son Guelpho, by Kunigonda, daughter of Guelpho IV. duke of Bavaria.

⁷³ Bertoldo, son of Actius V. by Judith, born of Conrado II.; and of her was born Actius VI. This Bertoldo was father of Rinaldo; so that this shield contained all his progeny from the first original.

(From him ³¹, to whose far-piercing mind 'tis given
To view, unveil'd, the deep decrees of Heaven)
Thy sons, the heroes of the times to come,
Shall match the chiefs of Carthage, Greece, or Rome!

But o'er the rest shall rise Alphonso's fame,
Alphonso, second of the glorious name!
Born when an age corrupt, to vice declin'd,
Shall boast but few examples to mankind:
He, while a youth, in mimic scenes of war,
Shall certain signs of early worth declare;
In forest wilds shall chase the savage train,
And the first honours of the list obtain;
In riper years in war unconquer'd prove,
And hold his subjects in the bands of love.
'Tis his to guard his realms from all alarm,
Midst mighty powers and jarring states in arms:
To cherish arts, bid early genius grow,
And splendid games and festivals bestow:
In equal scales the good and bad to weigh;
And guard with care for every future day.
O should he rise against that impious race,
Whose deeds shall then the earth and seas deface,
Who, in those times, shall bold mankind in awe,
And give to more enlighten'd minds the law;
Then shall his righteous vengeance wide be known,
For shrines profan'd, and altars overthrown:
In that great hour, what judgment shall he bring
On the false sect, and on their tyrant king!
The Turk and Moor, with thousands in their train,
Shall seek to stop his conquering arms in vain:
Beyond the climate where Euphrates flows,
Beyond Mount Taurus, white with endless snows,
Beyond the realms of summer, shall he bear
The Cross, the Eagle, and the Lily fair;
The secret source of ancient Nile shall trace,
And in the faith baptiz'd the sable race."

He spoke: and transport fill'd the warrior's
To hear the glories of his line express. [breast,
Now had the light proclaim'd the dawning day,
And the east rodden'd with a warmer ray;
When high above the tents they saw from far
The streaming banners trembling in the air.

Then thus the reverend sire began anew:
"Before our eyes the Sun ascending view,
Whose friendly rays discover wide around
The plains, the city, and the tented ground.
Hence may you pass without a further guide:
A nearer prospect is to me deny'd."

He said; and instant bade the chiefs adieu;
And these, on foot, their ready way pursue.
Meanwhile the news of their arrival came
To all the camp, divulg'd by flying fame;
And Godfrey, rising from his awful seat,
With speed advanc'd, the welcome knights to meet.

BOOK XVIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rinaldo returns to the camp, and is graciously received by Godfrey. After offering his devotions on Mount Olivet, he enters upon the adventure of the enchanted wood. He withstands all the illusions of the demons, and dissolves the enchantment. The Christians then build new machines. In the mean time Godfrey has intelligence of the approach of the Egyptian army to raise the siege. Vafirao is sent as a spy to the Egyptian camp. Godfrey attacks the city with great resolution. The Pagans make an obstinate defence. Rinaldo particularly signalizes himself, and first scales the walls. Ismeno is killed. The archangel Michael appears to the Christian general, and shows him the celestial army, and the souls of the warriors, that were slain in battle, engaged in his cause. Victory now declares for the Christians: Godfrey first plants his standard on the wall, and the city is entered on all sides.

³¹ Peter the hermit.

And now they met: Rinaldo first began,
And thus sincere address'd the godlike man:
"O prince! the care t'efface my honour's stain
Impell'd my vengeance on the warrior slain:
But, late convinc'd, the rash offence I own;
And deep contrition since my soul has known.
By thee recall'd, I seek the camp again;
And may my future deeds thy grace obtain!"
Him lowly bending, with complacent look
Godfrey beheld, embrac'd, and thus bespoke:
"No more remembrance irascuous truths shall
The past shall ever in oblivion dwell: [tell;
Lo! all th' amends I claim—thy weapons wield,
And shine the wonted terror of the field.
'Tis thine to assist thy friends, dismay thy foes,
And the dire fiends in yonder wood oppose.
Yon wood, from whence our warlike piles we made,
Conceals deep magic in its dreadful shade:
Horrid it stands! of all our numerous host,
No hands to fell th' enchanted timbers boast.
Then go!—'tis thine the mighty task to try;
There prove thy valour, where the valiant fly."

Thus he. In brief again the warrior spoke,
And dauntless on himself th' adventure took.
Then to the rest he stretch'd his friendly hand,
And gladly greeted all the social band.
Brave Tancred now and noble Guelpho came,
With each bold leader of the Christian name.
The vulgar next he view'd with gracious eye,
And affable receiv'd the general joy.
Nor round him less the shouting soldiers press'd,
Than if the hero, from the conquer'd east,
Or mid-day realms, enrich'd with spoils of war,
Had rode triumphant on his glittering car.
Thence to his tent he pass'd; there plac'd in state,
Encircled by his friends, the champion sat.
There much he answer'd; much to know desir'd;
Of the warts and wondrous wood inquir'd.
At length, the rest withdrawn, the hermit broke
His silence first, and thus the youth bespoke:
"O chief! what wonders have thy eyes survey'd!

How far remote thy erring feet have stray'd!
Think what thou ow'st to him who rules on high:
He gave thee from th' enchanted seats to fly:
Thee, from his flock a wandering sheep, he sought,
And, now recover'd, to his fold has brought:
By Godfrey's voice he calls thee to fulfill
The mighty purpose of his sacred will.
But think not yet, impure with many a stain,
In his high cause to lift thy hand profane:
Nor Nile, nor Ganges, nor the boundless sea,
With cleansing tides, can wash thy crimes away.
Sincere, to God thy secret sins declare,
And sorrowing seek his grace with fervent prayer."

He said; and first the prince in humble strain
 Bewail'd his senseless love and rage as vain:¹
 Then low before the eagle's feet he kneel'd,
 And all the errors of his youth reveal'd.
 The pious hermit then absolv'd the knight,
 And thus pursu'd—"With early dawn of light,
 On yonder mount thy pure devotion pay,
 That rears its front against the morning ray.
 Thence seek the wood whose monsters thou must
 Let no vain frauds thy daring steps repel: [quell;
 Ah! let no tuneful voice, nor plaints beguile,
 Nor beauty win thee with enticing smile:
 Sternly resolv'd, avoid each dangerous snare,
 And scorn the treacherous look and well-dissembled
 prayer."

So counsel'd he. The youth obsequious heard,
 And eager for th' important deed prepar'd;
 In thought he pass'd the day, in thought the night;
 And, ere the clouds were streak'd with glowing light,
 Enclos'd his limbs in arms, and o'er him threw
 A flowing mantle of unwonted hue.
 Alone, on foot, his silent way he took,
 And left his comrades, and the tents forsok.
 Now night with day divided empire held,
 Nor this was fully ris'n, nor that expell'd:
 The cheerful east the dawning rays display'd,
 And stars yet glimmer'd through the western shade.
 To Olivet the pensive hero pass'd,
 And, musing deep, around his looks he cast,
 Alternate viewing here the spangled skies,
 And there the spreading light of morning rise.

Then to himself he said—"What beams divine
 In Heaven's eternal sacred temple shine!
 The day can boast the chariot of the Sun,
 The night the golden stars and silver Moon!
 But ah! how few will raise their minds so high!
 While the frail beauties of a mortal eye,
 The transient lightnings of a glance, a smile
 From female charms, our earthly scene beguile!"
 While thus he mused, he gain'd the hill's ascent,
 There low on earth with humble knee he bent:
 Then on the east devoutly fix'd his eyes,
 And rais'd his pious thoughts above the skies.

"Almighty Father, hear!—my prayers approve!

Far from my sins thy awful sight remove:
 O let thy grace each thought impure controul,
 And purge from earthly dross my erring soul!"

Thus while he pray'd, Aurora, rising bright,
 To radiant gold has chang'd her rosy light:
 O'er all his arms th' increasing splendour plays;
 The hallow'd mount and grove reflect the rays.
 Full in his face the morn' her breeze renews,
 And scatters on his head ambrosial dews:
 His robe, with lucid pearls besprinkled o'er,
 Receives a snowy hue unknown before.
 So with the dawn the drooping floweret blooms;
 The serpent thus a second youth assumes.

Surpris'd his alter'd vest the warrior view'd,
 Then turn'd his steps to reach the fatal wood.
 And now he came where late the bands retir'd,
 Struck with the dread the distant gloom inspir'd:
 Yet him nor secret doubts nor terrors move,
 But fair in prospect rose the magic grove.
 While, like the rest, the knight expects to hear
 Loud peals of thunder breaking on his ear,

A dulcet symphony his sense invades,
 Of Nymphs or Dryads warbling through the shades;
 Soft sighs the breeze, soft purls the silver rill,
 The feather'd choir the woods with music fill:
 The tuneful swan in dying notes complains;
 The mourning nightingale repeats her strains:
 Timbrels and harps and human voices join;
 And in one concert all the sounds combine.

In wonder wrapt awhile Rinaldo stood,
 And thence his way with wary steps pursu'd:
 When lo! a crystal flood his course oppos'd:
 Whose winding train the forest round enclos'd.
 On either hand, with flowers of various dyes,
 The smiling banks perfume'd the ambient skies.
 From this a smaller limpid current flow'd,
 And pierc'd the boom of the lofty wood:
 This to the trees a welcome moisture gave,
 Whose boughs, o'erhanging, trembled in its wave.
 Now here, now there, the ford the warrior try'd,
 When sudden rais'd a wondrous bridge he spy'd;
 That, built of gold, on stately arches stood,
 And show'd an ample passage o'er the flood:
 He trod the path, the further margin gain'd;
 And now the magic pile no more remain'd:
 The stream so calm, arose with hideous roar,
 And down its foamy surge the shining fabric bore.

The hero, turning, saw the tide o'erflow,
 Like sudden torrents swell'd with melting snow.
 Then new desires incite his feet to rove
 Through all the deep recesses of the grove,
 As, searching round, from shade to shade he strays,
 New scenes at once invite him and amaze.
 Where'er he treads, the earth her tribute pours
 In gushing springs, or volupary flowers:
 Here blooms the lily; there the fragrant rose:
 Here spouts a fountain; there a riv'let flows:
 From every spray the liquid manna trills;
 And honey from the softening bark distills.
 Again the strange, the pleasing sound he hears
 Of plaints and music mingling in his ears:
 Yet nought appears that mortal voice can frame,
 Nor harp nor timbrel whence the music came.

As fix'd he silent stands in deep surprise,
 And reason to the sense her faith denies;
 He sees a myrtle near, and thither bends,
 Where in a plain the path far-winding ends:
 Her ample boughs the stately plant display'd
 Above the lofty palm or cypress' shade;
 High o'er the subject trees sublime she stood,
 And seem'd the verdant empress of the wood.

While round the champion cast a doubtful view,
 A greater wonder his attention drew:
 A labouring oak a sudden cleft disclos'd,
 And from its bark a living birth expos'd;
 Whence (passing all belief!) in strange array,
 A lovely damsel issu'd to the day.
 A hundred different trees the knight believ'd,
 Whose fertile wombs a hundred nymphs reveal'd.
 As oft in pictur'd scenes we see display'd
 Each graceful goddess of the sylvan shade;
 With arms expos'd, with vesture girt around,
 With purple boskins, and with hair unbound;
 Alike to view, before the hero stood
 These shadowy daughters of the wondrous wood;
 Save that their bands nor bows nor quivers wield;
 But this a harp, and that a timbrel held.
 Now, in a circle form'd, the sportive train
 With song and dance their mystic rites began;
 Around the myrtle and the knight they sung;
 And in his ear these tuneful accents rung:

Kk

"All hail! and welcome to this pleasing grove,
Armida's hope, the treasure of her love!
Com'st thou (O long expected!) to relieve
The painful wounds the darts of absence give?
This wood, that frown'd so late with horrid shade,
Where peele despair her mournful dwelling made,
Behold at thy approach reviv'd appears.
At thy approach a gentler aspect wears!" [rose,

Thus they—Low thunders from the myrtle
And fright the bark a cleft wide-opening shows;
In wonder wrapt have ancient times survey'd
A rude Silenus issuing from the shade;
A fairer form the teeming tree display'd.
A damsel thence appear'd, whose lovely frame
Might equal beauties of celestial name;
On her Rinaldo fix'd his heedful eyes,
And saw Armida's features with surprise;
On him a sad, yet pleasing look she bends;
And in the glance a thousand passions blends.

Then thus—"And art thou now return'd from Agin to bless forlorn Armida's sight?" [sight,
Com'st thou the balm of comfort to bestow,
To ease my widow'd nights, my days of woe?
Or art thou here to work the further harms,
That thus thy limbs are sheath'd in hostile arms?
Com'st thou a lover, or a foe prepar'd?
Not for a foe the stately bridge I rear'd:
Not for a foe unlock'd th' impervious bowers,
And deck'd the shade with fountains, rills, and flowers.

Art thou a friend?—That envious helm remove;
Disclose thy face, return the looks of love;
Press lips to lips, to bosom bosom join;
Or reach at least thy friendly hand to mine!"

Thus as she spoke, she roll'd her mournful eyes,
And had soft blushes o'er her features rise:
Unwary pity here, with sudden charm,
Might melt the wisest, and the coldest warm;
While, well advis'd, the knight no longer stay'd,
But from the scabbard bar'd the shining blade;
Then, swift advancing, near the myrtle drew:
With trembling haste to guard the plant she flew;
The much-lov'd bark with eager arms enclos'd,
And, with loud cries, the threatening stroke op-
pos'd.

"Ah! dare not thus with savage rage invade
My darling tree, the pride of all the shade!
O cruel!—lay thy dire design aside,
Or through Armida's heart the weapon guide!
To reach the trunk, this bosom shall afford
(And this alone) a passage to thy sword!"

But, deaf to prayers, aloft the steel he rear'd;
When lo! Jew forms, new prodigies appear'd!
Thus, oft in sleep we view, with wild affright,
Dire monstrous shapes, the visions of the night!
Her limbs enlarge; her features lose their grace;
The rose and lily vanish from her face:
Now, towering high, a giant huge she stands,
An arm'd Briareus with a hundred hands.
With dreadful action fifty swords she wields,
And shakes aloft as many clashing shields;
Each nymph, transform'd, a horrid Cyclop stood;
Unmov'd the hero still his task pursu'd:
Against the trees redoubt strokes he bent;
Deep groans, at every stroke, the myrtle sent:
Infernal glooms the face of day deform;
And winds, loud roaring, raise a hideous storm:
With thunders hoarse the distant fields resound,
And lightnings flash, and earthquakes rock the ground.

But not these horrors can his force restrain,
And not a blow his weapon aims in vain:
Now sinking low, the nodding myrtle bends:
It falls—the phantoms fly—th' enchantment ends.

The winds are hush'd, the troubled ether clears,
The forest in its wonted state appears:
No more the dark retreat of magic made,
Though awful still, and black with native shade.
Again the victor tried if aught withstood
The lifted steel to lop the spreading wood:
Then smiling thus he said—"O phantoms vain!
Shall these illusions e'er the brave restrain?"

Now to the camp with hasty steps he press'd;
Meanwhile the hermit thus the bands address'd:
"Already freed I see th' enchanted ground!
Behold the chief returns with conquest crown'd!"
He said: when from afar, confess'd to sight,
In dazzling arms appear'd the victor-knight:
High on his crest the silver eagle shone,
And blaz'd with brighter beams against the Sun;
The troops salute him with triumphant cries;
From man to man the spreading clamours rise.
Then to his valour pious Godfrey pays
The willing tribute of unenvied praise:
When to the leader thus Rinaldo said:
"At thy command I sought you dreadful shade;
The deep recesses of the grove I view'd,
The wonders saw, and every spell subdu'd:
Now may thy train the region safe explore,
No magic charms shall vex their labours more."

Thus he; and straight the band the forest sought,
Whence mighty timbers to the camp they brought.
O'er all their work an able chief presides;
William, Ijuria's lord, the labour guides.
But late the empire of the seas he held,
Till forc'd before the Pagan fleets to yield;
With all their naval arms the sailor train
He brings, to increase the forces on the plain.
To him superior knowledge Heaven imparts:
A searching genius in mechanic arts!
A hundred workmen his commands obey,
Their tasks performing as he points the way.
Vast battering rams* against the city rise,
And missive engines of enormous size.
Of timbers huge he built a spacious tower:
A hundred wheels the mighty fabric bore:
With junctures strong he fix'd the solid sides,
And 'gainst the fire secur'd with moisten'd hides.
Suspended from below, with horned head,
The ram resistless on the bulwarks play'd;
While from the midst a bridge was form'd to fall,
That join'd th' approaching engine to the wall:
And from the top was seen at will to rise
A lesser tower, high-pointing to the skies.
The gazing throngs admire in every part
The strange invention and the workman's art:
Soon, like the first, two other piles they frame,
The same their figure and their height the same.

Thus they: while from the walls the Pagan spies
Observ'd the Christian camp with heedful eyes;
They saw the pines and elms in many a load
Drawn to the army from the friendly wood:
They saw them rise in warlike structures high,
But scarce could thence their distant forms descry.
They too machines compose with equal care,
Their ramparts strengthen, and their walls repair.

*The account of these military engines and towers is according to the history.

Ismsmidst the rest his engines brought,
From Sodom's lake, with fatal sulphur fraught
From Hell's black food, whose waters foul and slow
Nine times enfold the realms of endless woe!
Horrid with these, a fiery pest he stood,
Resolv'd to avenge his violated wood.

While thus the city and the camp prepar'd,
This to assault, and that the works to guard,
High o'er the tents, in all the army's view,
An airy dove with rapid pinions flew;
Now, from the lofty clouds declining down,
With nearer flight approach'd the sacred town:
When lo! a falcon chas'd her from above,
And threatening to the high pavilion drove:
Just as his claws the trembling bird oppress'd,
She shelter sought in pious Godfrey's breast.
The pitying chief the dove from fate reliev'd,
Then round her neck a slender band perceiv'd:
Beneath her wing a tablet hung conceal'd,
Which, open'd, to his sight these words reveal'd:
"To thee th' Egyptian chief his zeal commends,
And health to great Judæa's sovereign sends.
Fear not, O Monarch! still thy towers defend,
Till the fifth morn her welcome light extend:
Then shall our arms relieve you threaten'd wall;
Sion shall conquer, and the Christians fall."

Such was the secret in the tablet seal'd,
In barbarous phrase and characters reveal'd.
These winged heralds thus the mandates bear
Of eastern nations through the fields of air.

The prince now set the captive dove at large:
But she (a guiltless traitress to her charge)
As conscious of th' event, no more return'd,
But distant from her lord in secret mourn'd.

The leader then cover'd the princely train,
The tidings straight disclos'd, and thus began:
"Behold, O friends! how Heaven's high Monarch
Th' important secrets of our wily foe, [shows
No more delay—this present time demands
Our boldest hearts and most experienc'd hands.
Be every toil, be every peril tried,
The way to conquer on the southern side.
There, well by nature fence'd on every part,
The forts are less secur'd by works of art:
There, Raymond, let thy strength resistless fall,
There, with thy engines, shake the doubtful wall;
While I, upon a different side, prepare,
Against the northern gate, the storm of war.
So may the foes their forces thither bend,
And there deceiv'd, our chief assault attend.
From thence convey'd, shall then my lofty tower
Near other parts unlook'd-for vengeance pour.
On me, Camillus, thou the toils shalt share,
And the third pile be trusted to thy care."

He ceas'd: when Raymond, pondering in his
The public welfare, Godfrey thus address'd: (breast

"So well for all, O chief! thy cares provide,
Nor ought can be retranch'd, nor ought supply'd.
Yet let me with some artful spy were sent
To Egypt's camp, to sound their deep intent;
Who to our host might all their motions tell,
And certain tidings of their force reveal." [mine,

Then Tancred spoke: "A faithful 'squire is
Who seems well form'd to further your design;
He every wile, with ready wit, prepares;
He dares all perils, yet with caution dares.
Swift in the race, he lightly skims the field;
His pliant tongue in every speech is skill'd:
He shifts his mien, his action and his tone,
And makes the modes of various climates his own."

The 'squire, now call'd, before th' assembly stands,
And cheerful bears the task his lord demands:
Then smiling thus: "To me consign the care,
This instant see me for th' attempt prepare:
Swift will I reach (an unexpected spy)
The distant land where Egypt's forces lie;
There pierce the swarming vale at noon of day,
And every man and every steed survey.
I promise soon (nor vain esteem my boast)
To bring the state and numbers of their host;
To penetrate their leader's secret thought,
And view each purpose in his bosom wrought."
Thus bold Vafirno spoke; nor more delay'd,
But swift in vesture long his limbs array'd:
He bar'd his neck, and round his forehead roll'd
A turban huge in many a winding fold:
His back the Syrian bow and quiver bore,
And all his looks a foreign semblance wore.
The wondering crowds admir'd his ready tongue,
On which each nation's different accent hung;
That Egypt well might claim him for her own,
Or Tyre receive him as her rightful son.
Now from the camp he issu'd on a steed
That scarcely bent the grass beneath his speed.

Ere yet they view'd the third succeeding day,
The Franks, industrious, gain'd the rugged way.
In vain the rolling hours to rest invite,
They join to day the labours of the night:
Till all is for the great assault prepar'd,
And nought remains that can their schemes retard.

The Christian chief, on pious thoughts intent,
In humble prayer the day preceding spent,
And bade the faithful host their sins confess,
And take, from sacred hands, the bread of peace.
He then began his vast machines to show
On divers parts, to amuse the thoughtless foe.
The foe, deceiv'd, with joyful looks desied
His force directed on their strongest side.

But, soon as evening stretch'd her welcome shade,
He thence with ease his warlike pile convey'd:
This tow'rd the ramparts' weaker parts he brought,
Where less expos'd his hardy soldiers fought.
Experienc'd Raymond with his lofty tower
Against the southern hill his forces bore:
And, with the third, the brave Camillus press'd
Against the side declining to the west.

When now the cheerful harbinger of day
Had ting'd the mountains with a golden ray;
The foes the mighty tower with terror view'd;
Far distant from the place where late it stood;
And all around, till then unseen, beheld
Enormous engines thickening o'er the field.

With every art the wary Pagans form
Their best defence against th' approaching storm.
No less intent, the prudent chief, who knew
That nearer now th' Egyptian army drew,
Each pass secures; and, calling from the bands
Guelpho and either Robert, thus commands:

"You watchful on your steeds in arms remain,
While I attempt yon hostile wall to gain,
Where least defence appears: be yours the care
To guard our rear from unexpected war."

He ceas'd: and breathing courage man to man,
Three fierce assaults the Christian powers began.

Then hoary Aladine, with cares decay'd,
In arms, long since disus'd, his limbs array'd;
Trembling with feeble feet and tottering frame,
The aged king oppos'd to Raymond came.
Stern Solyman for Godfrey stood prepar'd;
And scarce Argantes good Camillus dar'd,

Here Tancred, led by fate, approach'd the wall,
Where by his arms his daring foe might fall.

The ready archers now their bows apply;
In deadly poison drench'd their arrows fly;
The face of Heaven is all in darkness lost,
Such clouds of weapons issue from the host.
With greater force the mural engines pour
Their sudden vengeance in a mingled shower.
Hence, sheath'd with iron, javelins huge are thrown;
Hence rocky fragments thunder on the town.
Not in the wound the javelins lose their force,
But furious hold their unremitting course;
Resistless here their bloody entrance find,
And issuing there, leave cruel death behind!
Where'er the stones alight, with dreadful way
Through men and arms they force their horrid way
Sweep life before them, crush the human frame,
And hide at once the figure and the name!

Still unappall'd the Pagan troops remain,
And boldly still the bold assault sustain:
Already had they spread with heedful care
Their woolly fences 'gainst the threatening war;
And where expos'd the thickest ranks they spy,
With missile weapons send a fierce reply:
Yet undismay'd the brave assailants press,
Nor from the threefold charge, intrepid, cease.
Some under vast machines securely move,
While storms of arrows hiss in vain above.
Some wheel th' enormous engines near the foes:
The Syrians, from the walls, th' attempt oppose.
Each ready tower to lanch its bridge essays;
Its iron head each ram incessant plays.

Meanwhile in generous doubt Rinaldo stands,
No vulgar deeds his glorious arm demands:
He rolls his ardent eyes; his thoughts aspire
To tempt the pass from which the rest retire.
Then to the warriors, late by Dudon led,
Th' intrepid hero turn'd, and thus besaid:
"O shame to sight! while here our squadrons
Behold yon fortress still remains in peace! [press,
No perils e'er can brave designs control,
All deeds are open to the dauntless soul.
Haste, let us thither march, and 'gainst the foes
A sure defence, with lifted shields, oppose."

He spoke. The warriors with one soul obey'd,
And o'er their heads extend an ample shade,
The bucklers join'd secur'd the moving train,
While from on high the ruins roll in rain.
Now to the walls they came: with eager haste
A scaling-ladder bold Rinaldo plac'd;
A hundred steps it bore, the hero's hand
Aloft with ease th' enormous weight sustain'd.
Spears, beams, and rafters from the ramparts pour;
Dauntless he mounts amid the ponderous shower:
Nor toils nor death the daring youth could dread,
Though pendent rocks had nodded o'er his head.
His ample shield receiv'd a feather'd wood;
His back sustain'd a falling mountain's load:
This arm the bulwarks shook; and that before
His towering front the feencing buckler bore.
His great example every warrior fir'd;
Each gallant chief to scale the works aspir'd.
But various fates they prove: some headlong fall;
And some are slaughter'd ere they mount the wall:
While he, ascending still, securely goes,
His friends encourages, and threats his foes.
The thronging numbers, with collected might,
Attempt in vain to hurl him from his height:
Still in th' unequal combat firm he stands,
And bears alone th' united furious bands.

And now his sword the spacious rampart clears,
And frees the passage for his brave compeer.
To one the hero gave a wish'd relief,
(Eustatius, brother to the pious chief)
With ready hand he stopp'd his fatal fall,
And friendly guarded while he gain'd the wall.
The Christian leader, on a different side,
With various perils various fortune try'd:
Nor men with men alone the combat sought,
There pile with pile, with engine engine, fought,
Above the walls a trunk the Syrians raise;
(A vessel's towering mast in ancient days)
To this thwart a mazy beam suspend;
Thick iron plates the solid head defend:
This with strong cables back the Pagans drew,
Then, swift recoiling, on the tower it flew.
The yielding timbers with the fury shook,
The joint gave way before the frequent stroke:
But soon the tower its needful arms supplies:
Two scythes prepar'd are rais'd of mighty size,
That, closing, with their sharpen'd edge divide
The twisted cords to which the beam is ty'd.
As, loos'd by time, or by rude tempests torn,
A rock's huge fragment from a mountain borne,
Impetuous whirling down the craggy steep,
Woods, cots, and herds before its fury sweep:
So drew the dreadful engine, in its fall,
Arms, men, and ruins, from the shatter'd wall.
The tower's vast summit nodded from on high,
The bulwarks tremble, and the hills reply!

Victorious Godfrey now, advancing on,
Already deem'd the hostile ramparts won:
When from the foes, with roaring thunders, broke
Whirlwinds of flame and deluges of smoke!
Not Aetna from her raging womb expires
Such poisonous streams and suffocating fires;
Not such dire fumes the clime of India yields,
When noxious vapours taint her sultry fields.
Thick sulphur pours and burning javelins fly;
Dark clouds arise, and intercept the sky. [meet;
The tower's strong planks the scorching mischief
The moisten'd hides now shrivel in the heat:
Around ascends a black and sanguine flame,
And the last ruin threatens the mighty frame.

Before the rest the glorious leader stood,
With looks unchang'd the growing danger view'd,
And on the pile commands his troops to pour
The cooling water in a copious shower.
Now deep distress the troubled host assails;
The fire increases, and the water fails;
When from the north a sudden wind arose,
And turn'd the raging flames against the foes:
The blazing fury on the Pagans falls, [walls
Where numerous works were rais'd to guard the
The light materials catch; the sparks aspire;
And all their fences crackle in the fire.
O favour'd chief! the Almighty's care approv'd:
By him defended, and by him belov'd:
Heaven in thy cause auxiliar arms supplies,
And at thy trumpet's call the winds obedient rise!

But thy Ismeno, who the flames beheld
By Boreas' breath against himself repell'd,
Revolv'd once more to prove his impious skill,
And force the laws of nature to his will.
With two magicians, that his arts pursue,
The dreadful sorcerer towers in open view:
Black, equal'd, foul! he rises o'er the bands:
So 'twixt two furias Dis or Charon stands.
And now the murmuring of the words was heard
By Phlegethos and deep Cocytus fear'd:

Already now the air disturb'd was seen,
The Sun with clouds obscur'd his face serene:
When from an engine flew, with hideous shock,
A ponderous stone, the fragment of a rock,
Through all the three's its horrid passage tore,
Crash'd every bone, and drench'd their limbs in gore:

With groans the sinful spirits take their flight
From the pure air and seats of upper light,
And seek th' infernal shades of endless pain:
O mortals! hence from impious deeds refrain.

At length the tower, preserv'd from threaten'd flame

By friendly winds, more near the ramparts came;
Now, from the midst, the bridge was seen to fall,
And now was fix'd upon the lofty wall:
But thither Solyman intrepid flies,
And there to cut the bridge his falchion tries:
Nor had he tried in vain, but, sudden rear'd,
Another tower upon the first appear'd:
Above the loftiest spires was seen on high
The wondrous fabric rising to the sky.
Struck with the sight th' astonish'd Pagans stood,
While far beneath the pile the town they view'd.
But still the fearless Turk his post maintain'd,
Though on his head a rocky tempest rain'd;
Nor yet despairs to part the bridge, and loud,
With threats and cries, incites the timorous crowd.

To Godfrey then, unseen by vulgar eyes,
Appear'd the archangel Michael from the skies,
In glorious panoply, divinely bright,
More dazzling than the Sun's unclouded light.

"Lo! Godfrey," he began, "the hour at hand
To free from bondage Sion's hallow'd land:
Decline not then to earth thy looks dismay'd:
Behold where Heaven assists with heavenly aid!
I now remove the filn, and teach thy sight
To bear the presence of the sons of light.

The souls of those, now heavenly beings, view,
That champions once for Christ their weapons drew:
With thee they fight, with thee they come to share
The glorious triumph of the sacred war.
There, where thou seest the dust and smoke on high
In mingled wares, where heaps of ruin lie,
There, wrapt in darkness, Hugo holds his place,
And heaves the bulwark from its lowest base.
See! Duden, arm'd against the northern towers,
With fire and sword celestial vengeance pours.

* Though the particular character of Isemeno is entirely the invention of the poet, yet history relates the death of certain magicians, that had placed themselves on the walls of Jerusalem, in order to oppose the machines of the Christians.

† This fiction seems to be taken from miracles recorded in the history of the crusade. The archbishop of Tiro relates, that the Christians being engaged with the Infidels, and nearly defeated, a soldier was seen to descend from Mount Olivet, bearing a shield of wonderful lustre, who encouraged the Christians to renew the battle with double vigour, and immediately disappeared. It was likewise said, that, at the siege of Antioch, Pyrrhus, a Turk, saw an infinite army of soldiers on white horses, with white arms and vestments, who fought on the side of the Christians. These afterwards disappeared, and were supposed to be angels and the souls of the blessed, sent from God to succour the Christians.

You sacred form that on the mount appears,
Who solemn robes with wreaths of priesthood wear,
Is Ademar⁵; a saint confess'd he stands:
See! still he follows, blesses still the bands.
But higher raise thy looks, behold in air
Where all the powers of Heaven combin'd appear.⁶

The hero rais'd his eyes, and saw above
A countless army of celestials move.
Three squadrons rang'd⁷ the wondrous force display'd,

Three diligent circles every squadron made,
Orb within orb; by just degrees they rose,
And nine bright ranks the heavenly host compose.⁸
His sense no more sustain'd the blaze of light,
And all the vision vanish'd from his sight.
Then round the plain his martial bands he 'spy'd.
And saw how conquest smil'd on every side.
With brave Rinaldo numbers scale the wall;
Before his arms in heaps the Syrians fall:
No longer Godfrey then his zeal restrain'd,
But snatch'd the standard from Alfero's hand;
And, rushing o'er the bridge, the passage try'd.
The furious Turk all passage there deny'd:

* The archbishop of Tiro gives the following extraordinary account: "That day Ademar, bishop of Poggio, a man of exemplary virtue and piety, who lost his life near Antioch, was seen by numbers in the holy city: and numbers, whose testimony is worthy of credit, affirmed that they saw him among the first to scale the walls, and inciting others to enter the town." All these traditions were authority sufficient for the beautiful machine with which Tasso has adorned his poem; the whole passage of which is taken from the sublime fiction of Virgil, in the 2d Æneid, where Æneas sees the gods of Greece engaged in the destruction of his native city.

† The Italian commentator explains these to mean the three celestial hierarchies, each divided into three orders: the first, seraphim, cherubim, and thrones; the second, dominations, principalities, and powers; the third, virtues, angels, and archangels. This opinion is according to St. Gregory and St. Bernard, from which other authors have differed.

‡ Some theologians have said that these circles diminished till they came to an indivisible point, wherein was centred the essence of Divinity. This abstruse and whimsical doctrine is mentioned by Dante, which passage may not be displeasing to the curious reader; where he speaks of these nine choirs or orders in the following manner:

Un punto vidi, che raggiava lume
Acuto sì, che'l viso ch'egli affoca,
Chiudor couviensi per lo forta acume:
Distante intorno al punto un cerchio d'igne
Si girava sì ratto, ch' avria vinto
Quel moto che più tosto il mondo cigue,
E questo era d'un altro circondito
E quel del terzo e'l terzo poi dal quarto
Dal quinto il quarto, e poi dal sesto il quinto
Sovra seguia il settimo sì sparto
Già di larghezza che'l mezzo di Giouo
Intero a contenerlo sarebbe arto.
Così l'ottavo, e'l nono; e ciarcheduno
Più tardo sì movea, secondo ch'era,
In numero distante, più da l'uno.

Paradiso, canto xviii.

A little space is now the glorious field
 Where valour's deeds a great example yield!
 "Here let me nobly fall!" the Pagan cries,
 "Be glory mine, let life the vulgar prize,
 O burst the bridge! and me alone expose;
 I shall not meanly sink beneath the foe."
 But now he sees th' affrighted numbers fly,
 And now beholds the dread Rinaldo nigh:
 "What should I do?" the wavering souldan said:
 "If here I fall, in vain my blood is shed."
 Then, other schemes revolving in his mind,
 He slowly to the chief the pass resign'd,
 Who threatening follow'd, with impetuous haste,
 And on the wall the holy standard plac'd.
 The conquering banner, to the breeze unroll'd,
 Redundant streams in many a waving fold:
 The winds with awe confess the heavenly sign,
 With purer beams the day appears to shine:
 The swords seem bid to turn their points away,
 And darts around it innocently play:
 The sacred mount the purple cross adores,
 And Zion owns it from her topmost towers.

Then all the squadrons rais'd a shouting cry,
 The loud acclaim of joyful victory!
 From man to man the clamour pours around:
 The distant hills reecho to the sound.
 And now, incens'd, impatient of delay,
 Against Argantes Tancred forc'd his way;
 At once he launch'd his bridge, the passage made,
 And straight his standard on the walls display'd.
 But tow'rd's the south where aged Raymond fought,
 And 'gainst the Pagan king his forces brought;
 There deeper toil engag'd the Christian power,
 There rocky paths delay'd the cumbrous tower.
 At length th' assailants and defenders hear
 The echoing shouts of conquest from afar.
 To Aladine and Raymond soon 't is known,
 That tow'rd's the plain are Zion's ramparts won:
 Then thus the earl aloud—"O hear, my friends!
 Before the Christian arms the city bonds!
 And does she, when subdu'd, our courage dare?
 Shall we alone no glorious triumph share?"
 But soon the Syrian king withdrew his force,
 Nor longer strove to oppose the victor's course;
 Retreating thence a lofty fort he gain'd,
 From which he hop'd their fury to withstand.
 Now all the conquering bands, oppos'd no more,
 Swarm o'er the walls and through the portals pour.
 The thirsty sword now rages far and wide,
 Death stalks with grief and terror at his side:
 Blood runs in rivers, or in pools o'erflows,
 And dead and dying, heap'd, a horrid scene compose!

BOOK XIX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Tancred and Argantes retire together from the walls, and engage in single combat: after an obstinate defence, the latter is slain; and Tancred himself, weakened by the loss of blood, falls into a swoon. In the mean time Rinaldo pursues the Infidels, and compels many of them to take refuge in Solomon's temple. Rinaldo at length bursting open the gate, the Christian troops enter, and make a terrible slaughter. Solyman and Aladine fortify themselves in David's tower. Solyman defends the pass with great intrepidity, but at last retires within the fort at the appearance of Godfrey and Rinaldo. Night puts an end to the operations on both sides. Vafirno enters the Egyptian camp, where he meets with Ermuzia. In their way to the Christian tents, they find Tancred in appearance dead: Ermuzia's lamentation; she recovers Tancred from his swoon, and, at his desire, he is conveyed with the body of Argantes to the city. Vafirno gives an account to Godfrey of the discoveries he has made; upon which the general determines to hold his army in readiness to encounter the Egyptian forces.

Now wide-destroying death or pale affright
 Remov'd the Pagans from their ramparts' height:
 Alone, still fix'd to triumph or to fall,
 Argantes turns not from th' abandon'd wall;
 Secure he stands, his front undaunted shows,
 And singly combats midst a host of foes:
 Far more than death he dreads a sullied name,
 And, if he dies, would close his days with fame.
 Before the rest intrepid Tancred flies,
 And lifts his falchion, and the chief defies:
 Well, by his mien and arms confess'd to view,
 His plighted for the fierce Argantes knew.
 "Thou dost thou, Tancred! keep thy faith?" he
 "Late art thou come our battle to decide: [cried,
 We meet not here as heroes heroes dare;
 Thou com'st a base artificer of war!
 Those engines are thy guard, those troops thy shield;
 Thou bring'st at strange weapons to disgrace the field!
 Yet hope not from this hand, in dreadful strife,
 (Thou woman! murderer!) now to 'scape with life!"

He said; and Tancred, smiling with disdain,
 In words indignant thus replied again:
 "Late am I come?—Suppress thy senseless scorn;
 Soon shalt thou find too speedy my return;
 When thou shalt wish, to ease thy doubtful soul,
 That 'twixt us Alps might rise, or oceans roll;
 And know, by fatal proof too well display'd,
 Nor fear detain'd my arms, nor sloth delay'd.
 Come, glorious chief! thou terror of the plain,
 By whom are heroes quell'd and giants slain!
 With me retire, and prove thy boasted might;
 The woman's murderer darest thee to the fight!"

Then to his troops—"Withhold your wrathful
 This warrior now my sword alone demands; [hands,
 No common foe; by challenge him I claim;
 By former promise mine, and mine by fame."

"Descend," again the proud Circassian cried,
 "Or singly, or with aid, the cause decide:
 The place frequented or the desert try;
 With every odds thy prowess I defy!"

The stern convention made, at once they move,
 With mutual ire, the dreadful fight to prove.
 Already Tancred hopes the glorious strife,
 And burns with zeal to take the Pagan's life:
 He claims him wholly, all his blood demands,
 And envies even a drop to vulgar hands.
 He spreads his shield, forbids the threatening blow,
 And guards from darts and spears his mighty foe.
 They leave the walls, impatient of delay,
 And through a winding path pursue their way.
 At length, amid surrounding hills, they view'd
 A narrow valley, black with shady wood;
 That seem'd a sylvan theatre, design'd
 For chase or combat with the savage-kind.
 Here both the warriors stopp'd; when, passive grown,
 Argantes turn'd to view the suffering town.
 Tancred, who saw his foe no buckler wield,
 Str aight cast his own at distance on the field;

Then thus began—"What means this sudden gloom?
Think'st thou, at last, thy destin'd hour is come?
If such foreboding thoughts & doubt create,
Too late thy prescience, and thy fears too late."

"Von city fills my mind," the chief replied,
"The queen of nations, and Judea's pride,
That vanquish'd now must fall, while I in vain
Attempt her sinking ruins to sustain:
How poor a vengeance can thy life afford,
Thy life by Heaven devoted to my sword!"

He ceas'd; then wary each to combat drew:
For each his adverse champion's valour knew.
Tancred was light, his joints were firmly knit,
Swift were his hands, and ready were his feet.
Argantes tower'd superior by the head,
With larger limbs, with shoulders broader spread.
Now Tancred wheels, now bends to slide the foe,
Now with his sword averts th' impending blow.
But high erect the bold Argantes stood,
And equal art, with different action, show'd:
Now here, now there, impetuous from above,
Against the prince the brandish'd steel he drove.
That, on his art and courage most relies;
This, on his mighty strength, and giant size.

Two vessels thus their naval strife maintain,
When no rude wind disturbs the watery plain:
Their bulk though different, equal is the fight,
In swiftness one, and one excels in height.
But while the Christian seeks to reach the foe,
And shuns the sword that seems to threat the blow,
Full at his face the point Argantes shook;
Then swift, as Tancred turn'd toward the stroke,
He pierc'd his flank, and, loud exulting, said,
"Behold the crafty now by craft betray'd!"

With rage and shame indignant Tancred burn'd,
And all his thoughts to glorious vengeance turn'd;
Then with his falchion to the boast replies,
Where to his aim the vizzor open lies.
Argantes breaks the blow: with shorten'd sword
On him intrepid rush'd the Christian lord:
The Pagan's better hand he seiz'd, and dy'd
With many a ghastly wound his bleeding side.
"Receive this answer," loud the hero cries,
"The vanquish'd to his victor thus replies!"

The fierce Circassian foams with rage and pain,
But strives to free his captive arm in vain:
At length, dependent from the chain¹, he leaves
The trusty falchion, and his hand reprieves.
Each other now in rude embrace they press'd,
Arms lock'd in arms, and breast oppos'd to breast.
Not with more vigour, on the sandy field,
Great Hercules the mighty giant held.
Such is their conflict, so the warriors strain,
Till both together, sidelong, press the plain.
Argantes, as he fell, by chance or skill,
Bore high his better arm releas'd at will:
But Tancred's hand, that should the weapon wield,
Was held beneath him prisoner on the field.
Full well the Frank th' unequal peril view'd,
And, soon recovering, on his feet he stood.

More slow the Saracen the ground forsook,
And, ere he rose, receiv'd a sudden stroke.
But as the pine, whose leafy summit bends
To Eurus' blast, at once again aceeds;

So from his fall across the Pagan knight
With equal wrath and unabated might.
Again, with flashing swords, the war they wag'd:
Now less of art and more of honour rag'd. (blood;
From Tancred's wounds appear'd the trickling
But from Argantes pour'd a crimson flood:
Tancred full soon his feeble arm beheld
Slow and more slow the weighty falchion wield:
All hatred then his generous breast forsook,
And, back retreating, mildly thus he spoke:
"Yield, dauntless chief! enough thy worth is
Or, me, or fortune, for thy victor own: [shown;
I ask no spoils, no triumph from the fight,
Nor to myself reserve a conqueror's right."

At this, with rage renew'd, the Pagan burn'd:
"Use what thy fortune gives," he fierce return'd,
"And dar'st thou then from me the conquest claim?
Shall base concessions stain Argantes' fame?
Alike thy mercy and thy threats I prize;
This arm shall yet thy senseless pride chastise."
As, near extinct, the torch new light acquires,
Revises its flame, and in a blaze expires:
So he, when scarce the blood maintain'd its course,
With kindled ire recruits his dying force;
Resolv'd his last of days with fame to spend,
And crown his actions with a glorious end.
Grasp'd in each hand, his vengeful steel he took:
In vain the Christian's sword oppos'd the stroke:
Full on his shoulder fell the deadly blade,
Nor, deaden'd there, its eager fury stay'd,
But, glancing downward, deeply pierc'd his side,
And stain'd his armour with a purple tide.
Yet Tancred's looks nor doubt nor fear confess'd;
For Nature's self had steel'd his dauntless breast.
A second stroke the haughty Pagan try'd;
The wary Christian now his purpose spy'd,
And slip'd, elusive, from the steel aside.

Then, spent in empty airy strength in vain,
Thou fall'st, Argantes! headlong on the plain:
Thou fall'st! yet (unscold'd alike in all)
None but thyself can boast Argantes' fall!
Fresh stream'd the blood from every gaping wound,

And the red torrent delug'd all the ground:
Yet on his arm and knee the furious knight
His bulk supported, and provok'd the fight.
Again his hand the courteous victor stay'd:
"Submit, O chief! preserve thy life," he said:
But, while he pans'd, the fierce insidious foe
Full at his heel directs a treacherous blow.
And threats aloud. Then flash from Tancred's eyes
The sparks of wrath, while thus the hero cries:
"And dost thou, wretch! such base return afford
For life so long preserv'd from Tancred's sword!"
He said; and as he spoke, no more delay'd,
But through his vizzor plung'd th' avenging blade.
Thus fell Argantes: as he liv'd he died;
Untam'd his soul, unconquer'd was his pride:
Nor droop'd his spirit at th' approach of death,
But threats and rage employ'd his latest breath.

Then Tancred in the sheath his sword bewo'd,
And paid to God the thanks his conquest ow'd:
But dear his triumph has the victor cost:
His senses fail, his wonted strength is lost.
Again he strives to pass the valley o'er,
And tread the steps his feet had trod before.
Not far his tottering knees their load sustain,
His utmost strength he tries, but tries in vain.
Now, laid on earth, his arm supports his head,
(His arm, that trembles like a feeble reed)

¹ In Ariosto it is frequently mentioned, that the sword was fastened to the wrist by a chain, though his is the only passage where such a custom is alluded to by Tasso.

Each object swims before his giddy sight ;
The cheerful day seems chaug'd to dusky night ;
He faints—he swoons ! and scarce to mortal eyes
The victor differing from the vanquish'd lies.

While these, inflam'd with private hate, engag'd,
The wrathful Christians through the city rag'd.
What tongue can tell the woes that then were known,
And speak the horrors of a conquer'd town !
Each part is fill'd with death, with blood defil'd ;
The ghastly stain appear in mountains pil'd.
There, on th' unbury'd corpse the wounded spread ;
The living here interr'd beneath the dead.
With flowing hair pale mothers fly distress,
And clasp their harmless infants to the breast :
The spoiler here, impell'd by thirst of prey,
Bears on his laden back the spoils away :
The soldier there, by lust un govern'd sway'd,
Drags by her graceful locks th' affrighted maid.
But tow'rd's the mountain where the temple
stood,

The bold Rinaldo drove the trembling crowd :
Nor helm nor huckler could his force withstand ;
Th' unarm'd alone escap'd his vengeful hand.
He sought the brave, but scor'd with great disdain
To wreak his fury on a helpless train.
Then might you wondrous deeds of valour view,
How these he threatening chas'd, and those he slew ;

How with unequal risk, but equal fear,
The arm'd and naked fugitives appear.

Already, mingled with th' ignobler band,
A troop of warriors had the temple gain'd,
That, oft o'erthrown, and oft consum'd by flame,
Still bears its ancient founder's glorious name.
Great Solomon the stately fabric rear'd,
Where marble, gold, and cedar once appear'd :
Less costly now ; but 'gainst the hostile powers
Secur'd with iron gates, and guarded towers.

Rinaldo rais'd his threatening looks on high,
And view'd the fortress with an angry eye :
Now here, now there, he seeks some pass to meet,
And twice surrounds it with his rapid feet.
So when a wolf, beneath the friendly shades,
With hopes of prey the peaceful fold invades ;
He traverses the ground with fruitless pains,
Licks his dry chops, and thirsts for blood in vain.
The chief now paus'd before the lofty gate ;
The Pagans, from above, th' encounter wait.
While thus the hero stood, by chance he spies
A beam beside him of enormous size ;
(Whatever the use design'd) so high, so vast,
The largest ship may claim it for a mast :
This in his nervous arms aloft he shook,
And with repeated blows the portal struck :
Not the strong ram with greater fury falls,
Nor bombs more fiercely shake the tottering walls.
Nor steel nor marble could the force oppose ;
The fence gives way before the driving blows :
The bars are burst, the sounding hinges torn,
And hurl'd to earth the batter'd gates are borne.
Swift through the pass, the victor to sustain,
Fierce as a torrent rush th' exulting train.

Then, dire to see ! the dome devote to God,
With carnage swell'd, and pour'd a purple flood.
O sacred justice of th' Almighty, shed,
Though late, yet certain, on the guilty head !
Thy awful providence now stands confest,
And kindles wrath in every pious breast.
The Pagan with his blood must cleanse from stain
Those sacred shrines which once he durst profane.

But Solyman, meanwhile, to David's tower^{*}
Retreated with the remnant of his power ;
His troops with sudden works the fort enclose,
And stop each entrance from th' invading foe.
And Aladine the tyrant thither flies ;
To whom aloud th' intrepid souldan cries : [gain,
“ Come, mighty monarch ! lasts ! the fortress Whose strength shall yet preserve thy threaten'd reign ;

Here mayst thou still defend thy life, secur'd
From the dire fury of the wasting sword.”
“ Ah me ! relentless fate,” the king replied,
“ O'erturns the city, levels all her pride !—
My days are run—my empire now is o'er—
I liv'd—I reign'd—but live and reign no more !—
'T is past !—we once have been ! behold our doom—
The last, th' irrevocable hour is come !”

To whom with generous warmth the Souldan said :
“ Where, prince ! is all thy ancient virtue fled ?
Though of his realms by fortune disposess'd,
A monarch's throne is seated in his breast.
But come, and, here secur'd from hostile rage,
Refresh thy limbs decay'd with toils and age.”
Thus counsell'd he ; and straight, with careful
The hoary king within the bulwarks plac'd. [haste,
Himself to guard the dangerous pass appear'd,
With both his hands an iron mace he rear'd :
He girt his trusty falchion to his side,
And all the forces of the Franks defied.

On every part his thundering weapon flew,
And these he overturn'd, and those he slew.
All fled the guarded fort, with wild affright,
Where'er they saw his mace's fury light.
Now, led by fortune, with his dauntless train,
The fearless Raymond rush'd the pass to gain :
Against the Turk in vain he aim'd the blow ;
But not in vain return'd his haughty foe :
Full in his front the reverend chief he found,
And stretch'd him pale and trembling on the ground.

Again the vanquish'd breathe, the victors fly,
Or in the well-defended entrance die.
The souldan then, who, midst the vulgar dead,
Beheld on earth the Christian leader spread,
Incites his followers, with repeated cries,
To drag within the works their prostrate prize.

All spring to take him (a determin'd band),
But toils and dangers their attempt withstand.
What Christian can his Raymond's care forge ?
At once they fly to guard him from the foe.
There rage, here piety, maintains the fight ;
No common cause demands each warrior's might :
For Raymond's life or freedom they contend ;
And those would seize the chief, and these defend.
Yet had the souldan's force at length prevail'd,
For shields and helms before his weapon fail'd ;
But sudden, to relieve the faithful band,
A powerful aid appear'd on either hand ;
At once the chief of chiefs[†], resistless, came,
And he[‡], the foremost of the martial name.

As when loud winds arise, and thunders roll,
And glancing lightnings gleam from pole to pole,
The shepherd-swain, who sees the darkening air,
Withdraws from open fields his sheep care ;
And, thence retreating, to some covert flies
To shun the fury of th' inclement skies :

* The citadel of Jerusalem was so called.

† Godfrey.

‡ Rinaldo.

And with his voice and erob his flock constrains ;
Himself, behind them, last forsakes the plains :
So the fierce Pagan, who the storm beheld,
That like a whirlwind swept the dusty field,
Who heard the shouts of legions round the air,
And saw the flash of armour from afar,
Compell'd his troops within the sheltering tower ;
Himself, reluctant, from superior power
Retires the last, with unabated heat,
In caution brave, in pride in defeat. [haste,

Scarce were they enter'd, when, with headlong
Rinaldo o'er the broken fences pass'd :
Desire to vanquish one so fam'd in fight,
His plighted vows the hero's soul excites:
For still he keeps his solemn oath in view,
To take the warrior's life who Swenoew.
Then had his matchless arm the walls assail'd,
Then had their strength to shield the soldier fail'd :
But here the general bade surcease the fight,
For all the horizon round was lost in night.
There Godfrey straight compell'd his martial train,
Resolv'd at morn the hostile fort to gain.
Then cheerful thus his listening host he warns :
" Th' Almighty favours now the Christian arms :
At early dawn yon fortress shall be ours ;
The last weak refuge of the faithless powers.
Meantime your thoughts to pious duties bend,
The sick to comfort, and the wounded tend.
Go—pay the rites those gullible friends demand,
Who purchas'd with their blood this fated land ;
This temper better suits the Christian name,
Than souls with avarice or revenge on flame.
Too much, alas ! has slaughter stain'd the day ;
Too much has lust of plunder borne the sway.
Then cease from spoil, each cruel deed forbear ;
And let the trumpet's sound our will declare."

He said ; and went where, scarce repriev'd from death,

Still Raymond groan'd with new-recover'd breath.
Nor Solyman less bold, his friends address'd,
While in his thought the chief his doubts suppress'd.
" O warriors ! scorn the change of fortune's power ;
Still cheerful hope maintains her blooming flower :
Safe is your king, and safe his chosen train :
These walls the noblest of the realm contain.
Then let the Franks their empty conquest boast ;
Swift fate impends o'er all th' exulting host :
While rage and plunder every soul employ,
And lust and murder are their savage joy :
Amidst the mingled tumult shall they fall,
And one destructive hour o'erwhelm them all ;
If Egypt's troops, now hastening to our aid,
With numerous force their scatter'd bands invade.
From hence our missile weapons can we pour,
To whelm the city with a rocky shower ;
And with our engines from afar defend
The paths that to the sepulchre ascend."

While deeds like these were wrought, Vafriuo goes ;

A trusty spy, amidst a host of foes :
The camp he left, his lonely way he took,
What time the Sun the western sky forsook ;
By Ascalon he pass'd, ere yet the day
Shed from his orient throne the golden ray :
And when his car had reach'd the midmost height,
The hostile camp appear'd in open sight.
There, pitch'd around, unnumber'd tents he sees,
Unnumber'd streamers waving to the breeze.
Discordant tongues assail his wondering ears ;
Timbrels and horns and barbarous notes he hears.

The elephant and camel mix their cries ;
The generous steed, with shriller sound, replies.
Surpris'd he sees such numerous forces join'd,
Where Asia's realms and Afric's seem combin'd.

Now here, now there, his watchful looks he throws,
And marks what different works the camp enclose ;
Nor seeks in unfrequented parts to lie ;
Nor shuns the observance of the public eye ;
But boldly to each high pavilion goes,
And fearless communes with th' unconquered foes
Wise were his questions, well his answers made,
And deepest prudence all his actions sway'd.
The warriors, steady, and arms, attract his view ;
Full soon each leader's rank and name he knew.
At length, as wandering through the vale he went,
Chance led his footsteps to the general's tent :
There, while immers'd in deepest thought he stay'd,
His searching eyes a friendly gap survey'd ;
From this each voice within distinct was heard,
Through this reveal'd th' interior parts appear'd.
There watch'd Vafriuo, while he seem'd employ'd
To mend the town pavilion's opening side.

Bare-headed there he saw the chief confest,
With limbs in armour sheath'd, and purple vest ;
Two pages bore his helmet and his shield ;
His better hand a pointed javelin held ;
He view'd a warrior, who beside him stood,
Of limbe gigantic, and of semblance proud.
Vafriuo stay'd, intent their words to hear,
And sudden Godfrey's name assail'd his ear. [spoke,

" Think'st thou," the leader thus the knight be-
" That Godfrey sure shall fall beneath thy stroke ?"
Then he : " He surely falls ! and here I swear
Ne'er to return, but victor from the war,
This band my fellows' swords shall render vain ;
And let my deed this sole reward obtain ;
A glorious trophy of his arms to raise
In Cairo's town, and thus inscribe my praise :

" These from the Christian chief, whose force o'er-
All Asia's lands, in battle Ormond won ; [rua
And fix'd them here, that future times might tell
How, by his prowess vanquish'd, Godfrey fell."

" Think not our grateful king," the leader cries,
" Will view th' important set with thankless eyes ;
Full gladly will he yield to thy demand,
And crown thy service with a bounteous hand."

But now with speed the vests and arms prepare ;
The approaching day of combat claims thy care."
" All, all is now prepar'd"—the knight replied :
And here the converse ceas'd on either side.

Thus they. A stranger to the hidden sense,
The words Vafriuo heard in deep suspense ;
Oft-times debating, in his anxious mind,
What arms were purpos'd, and what wiles design'd.
He parted thence, and sleepless pass'd the night,
And watch'd impatient for the dawning light ;
But when the camp, as early morning shin'd,
Unfar'd the waving banners to the wind,
Mix'd with the rest he went, with these he stay'd ;
And round from tent to tent uncertain stray'd.

One day he came to where, in regal state,
Amidst her knights and dames Armida sat ;
Pensive she seem'd, with various cares oppress'd,
A thousand thoughts revolving in her breast :
On her fair hand her lovely cheek she plac'd ;
And prone to earth her starry eyes she cast,
All moist with tears. Full opposite he saw
Adrastus motionless with silent awe :
Fix'd on her charms, he gaz'd with fond desire,
And with the prospect fed his amorous fire.

But Tisaphernes both by turns beheld,
While different passions in his bosom swell'd ;
His changing looks a quick succession prove,
Now fir'd with hatred, now inflam'd with love.
From thence Vafrioo cast his sight aside,
And midst the damels Altamorus 'spy'd ;
Who curb'd the license of his roving eyes,
Or snatch'd his wary glances by surprise ;
Her hand, her face, with secret rapture view'd,
And oft, by stealth, a sweeter search pursu'd,
To explore the passage where th' uncautious veat
Reveal'd the beauties of her ivory breast.
At length her downcast looks Armida rears,
While through her grief a transient smile appears.
" O brave Adrastus ! in thy glorious boast
I feel," she cries, " my former anguish lost ;
And soon I trust a sweet revenge to find ;
For sweet is vengeance to an injur'd mind."

To whom the Indian—" Bid thy sorrow cease,
O royal fair ! compose thy soul to peace.
Doubt not to view, (ere many days are fled)
Cast at thy feet Rinaldo's impious head ;
Else shall he come, if so thy will ordains,
To servile dungeons, and eternal chains."

To Tisaphernes smiling then she said :
" And wilt not thou, O chief ! Armida aid ?"
" It suits not me," he taunting thus replied,
" With such a knight to combat side by side.
But I move slow, in fields of battle new,
Must far behind thy champion's steps pursue."
Sternly he said ; the word the monarch took,
And straight incens'd with pride ungovern'd spoke :
" 'T is thine, indeed, a distant war to wage,
Nor dare like me in nearer fight engage."

Then Tisaphernes shook his haughty head :
" O were I master of this arm," he said,
" Could I at will this faithful falchion yield,
We soon should see who best could brave the field :
Fierce as thou art, thy threats with scorn I hear !
Not thee, but Heaven and tyrant love, I fear."

He ceas'd ; Adrastus stern his force defy'd ;
But here Armida interpos'd, and cried :
" O warriors ! wherefore now, your promise vain,
Will you so soon resume your gift again ?
My champions are ye both—let this suffice
To bind your jarring souls in friendly ties :
At my command, this rash contention cease ;
He meets my anger first who wounds the peace."

Thus she : at once the rage their breast forsook,
And hearts discordant bow'd beneath her yoke.

Vafrioo, present, all their converse knew,
Then, pensive, from the lofty tent withdrew ;
He saw, though deeply yet in clouds enshri'd,
Some treason 'gainst the Christian chief design'd :
He question'd oft, resolv'd each means to try
To bear the secret thence, or bravely die.
In vain his search—till chance at length display'd
The treacherous snares for pious Godfrey laid.
Again he sought the tent, and view'd again
The princess seated midst her warrior train :
Then near a damsel with familiar air
He drew, and sportive thus address'd the fair :
" I too would gladly draw th' avenging blade,
Th' elected champion of some lovely maid :
Perhaps this arm Rinaldo's self may feel,
Or Godfrey breathless sink beneath my steel.
Ask from this hand (to me that service owe)
The head devoted of some barbarous foe."

So spoke the squire ; and smiling as he spoke,
A virgin view'd him with attentive look :

Sudden her eyes his well-known face compar'd,
Beside him soon she stood, and thus address'd :

" From all the train I here thy sword demand,
Nor ask ignoble service at thy hand :
I choose thee for my champion ; hence retire,
I now thy converse, as my knight, require."

She said ; and drew him from the throng aside :
" I know thee well, Vafrioo !" then she cried,
" Know'st thou not me ?"—Confus'd the Christian
Till with a smile he thus his speech renew'd : [stood,

" Ne'er have I seen thy charms, exalted fair,
Nor is the name thou speak'st the name I bear :
Born on Biseria's shore, my birth I claim
From Lessin', and Almazor is my name."

" Long have I known thee," thus the maid reply'd,
" Then seek no more in vain thyself to hide :
Dismiss thy fear—thou seest a faithful friend
For thee prepar'd her dearest life to spend.
Behold Erminia ! born of royal kind,
And once with thee in Tancred's service join'd :
Two happy moons a blissful captive there,
I liv'd in peace beneath thy gentle care."

Then on her face he beat his earnest view,
And soon the features of Erminia knew.

" Rest on my faith secure," the damsel cries,
" I here attest the Sun and conscious skies !
Ah ! let me now thy pitying aid implore ;
Erminia to her former bonds restore !
In irksome freedom since my hours were led,
Care fills my days, and slumber flies my bed.
Com'st thou the secrets of the boat to spy ?
In happy time—on me thou may'st rely :
I shall at full their purpos'd frauds explain,
Which thou, perchance, hadst long explor'd in vain."

Thus she ; while doubtful still Vafrioo mus'd
In silent gaze, with various thoughts confus'd :
He call'd Armida's former arts to mind :
Woman's a changeful and loquacious kind :
A thousand schemes their fickle hearts divide,
Insensate those that in the sex confide !
At length he spoke : " If hence you seek to fly,
Haste, let us go—your trusty guide am I.
Be this resolv'd—but let us yet beware,
And further speech till fitter time forbear."

Thus having said, they fir'd without delay,
Before the troops decamp'd to take their way.
Vafrioo parted thence ; the cautious maid
Awhile in converse with the damels stay'd,
Amus'd them with her champion lately gain'd,
And with a plausible tale each ear detain'd :
Till at th' appointed time the squire she join'd ;
Then mounts her steed, and leaves the camp behind.

The Pagan tents were vanish'd from the view ;
And near an unfrequented place they drew ;
When bold Vafrioo spoke—" Now, courteous fair !
The treason, fraud'd for Godfrey's life, declare."

" Eight knights," she cried, " the dire adventure
claim,

But Ormond fierce excels the rest in fame ;
These, urg'd by hatred, or inflam'd with ire,
In murderous league against your chief conspire :
Then hear their arts—what time on Syria's plain
Th' embattled host contend for Asia's reign ;
These on their arms the purple cross shall bear,
Disguis'd as Franks in white and gold appear,
Like Godfrey's guard, amid the mingled war.
But on his helm shall each a signal show, [know,
Which in the thickening fight their friends may
These shall the Christian leader's life pursue,
And deadly venom shall their steel imbue :

To me 'twas given each false device to frame;
 Compell'd to act what now I loath to name!
 Hence from the camp I fly with just disdain,
 From the dire mandates of an impious train:
 I scorn my thoughts with treason to defile,
 To assist the traitor, and partake the guile.
 For this—yet not for this alone, I fled—
 She cross'd; and ceasing bluish'd with rosy red:
 Declin'd to earth she held her modest look,
 And half again recall'd what last she spoke.
 But what her virgin scruples strove to hide,
 He sought to learn, and gently thus replied:
 "Why wilt thou strive thy sorrows to conceal,
 Nor to my faithful ear thy cares reveal?"
 She breath'd a sigh that instant from her breast,
 Then with a faltering voice the squire address'd:
 "Farewell, ill-tim'd reserve! no more I claim
 The modesty that fits a virgin's name. [sway'd;
 Such thoughts should long ere this my heart have
 But ah! they suit no more a wandering maid.
 That fatal night, my country's overthrow,
 When Antioch bow'd before the Christian foe;
 From that, alas! my following woes I date,
 The early source of my disastrous fate!
 Light was a kingdom's loss, an empire's boast,
 For with my regal state myself I lost.
 Thou know'st, Vafriño! how I trembling ran,
 Midst heaps of plunder and my subjects slain,
 To seek thy lord and mine, when, first in view,
 All sheath'd in arms he near my palace drew:
 Low at his feet I breath'd this humble prayer:
 'Unconquer'd chief! a helpless virgin hear!
 Not for my life I now thy mercy claim!
 But save my honour, guard my spotless fame!
 Ere yet I cens'd, my hand the hero took,
 And rais'd me from the earth, and courteous spoke:
 'O lovely maid! in vain thou shalt not sue;
 In me thy friend, thy kind preserver, view.'
 He said; a sudden pleasure fill'd my breast,
 A sweet sensation every thought possess'd,
 That, deeply spreading through my soul, became
 A wound incurable, a quenchless flame!
 "He saw me oft; he gently shar'd my grief,
 With words of comfort gave my woes relief.
 "To thee," he cried, "thy freedom I resign;
 Nor ought of all thy treasures shall be mine.
 O cruel gift! O bounty vainly shown!
 For, giving me myself, myself he won;
 And while he thus restor'd th' ignobler part,
 Usurp'd the sovereign empire o'er my heart.
 Alas! in vain I sought to hide my shame,—
 How oft with thee I dwelt on Taucered's name!
 Thou saw'st the tokens of a mind distress'd,
 And said'st—'Erminia! love disturbs thy breast.'
 Still I deny'd, but still deny'd in vain;
 My looks, my sighs, reveal'd my secret pain.
 At length, resolv'd my wishes to pursue,
 Love all respect of fear and shame o'erthrew.
 To seek my lord I went, in luckless hour:
 (He gave the wound, and he alone could cure.)
 But lo! new dangers in my way I met,
 A band of barbarous foes my steps beset:
 From these I scarce with life and freedom fled:
 Thence to the distant woods my course I sped;
 There chose with shepherd-swains retir'd to dwell,
 A humble tenant of the lonely cell.
 But when my flame, awhile my fear suppress'd,
 Once more, returning, kindled in my breast;
 Again I sought the paths I sought before;
 Again was cross'd by fickle Fortune's power:

A troop of spoilers in my way I found;
 (Egyptian forces, and to Gaza bound)
 Me to their chief they led: with gentle ear
 Their chief vouchsaf'd my mournful tale to hear:
 So was my virtue safe preserv'd from stain,
 Till plac'd in safety with Armida's train.
 Behold methus (so changing fate decreed)
 Now made a captive, now from bondage freed:
 Yet thus enslav'd, and thus releas'd again,
 I still am held in fond affection's chain.
 O thou! for whom such soft distress I prove,
 Repulse not with disdain my proffer'd love;
 But to a maid a kind reception give,
 And to her bonds a wretch forlorn receive."
 Thus spoke Erminia. All the night and day
 They journey'd on, and commun'd on their way.
 Vafriño shun'd the beaten track, and held
 His course through shorter paths, and ways conceal'd.
 Now near the town they came at evening light,
 What time the shade foretold th' approach of night:
 When here they saw the ground distain'd with blood,
 And, stretch'd on earth, a slaughter'd warrior
 view'd:
 His face was upward turn'd, with dauntless air,
 His aspect menac'd, ev'n in death severe.
 In him, as near the squire attentive drew,
 Some Pagan warrior by his arms he knew.
 Not far from thence another prone was seen,
 His garb was different, different was his mien.
 "Behold some Christian there," Vafriño said,
 Then mark'd his well known vest with looks dis-
 may'd:
 He quits his steed, the features view, and cries—
 "Ah me! hers slain unhappy Taucered lies!"
 Meanwhile th' ill-fated maid behind him stood,
 And with attentive gaze the Pagan view'd:
 But soon her ear the cruel sounds confess'd,
 As if a shaft had pierc'd her tender breast.
 At Taucered's name she starts in wild despair,
 No bounds can now restrain th' unhappy fair:
 She sees his face with paleness all o'erspread,
 She leaps, she flies impetuous from her steed;
 Low-bending o'er him, forth her sorrow breaks;
 And thus with interrupted words she speaks:
 "Was I for this, by fortune here convey'd?
 O dreadful object to a love-sick maid!
 Long have I sought thee with unwear'd pain,
 Again I see thee: yet I see in vain!
 Taucered no more Erminia present views,
 And, finding Taucered, I my Taucered lose!
 Ah me!—and did I think thou e'er should'st prove
 A sight ungrateful to Erminia's love?
 Now could I wish to quench the beams of light,
 And hide each object in eternal night!
 Alas! where now are all thy graces fled?
 Where are those eyes that once such lustre shed?
 Where are those cheeks, replete with crimson glow?
 Where all the beauties of thy manly brow?
 But senseless thus and pale thou still canst please!
 If yet thy gentle soul my sorrow sees,
 Yet views, not wholly fled, my fond desires,
 Permit th' embolden'd theft which love inspires:
 Give me (since fate denies a farther bliss.)
 From thy cold lips to snatch a parting kiss:
 Those lips from which such soothing words could
 To ease a virgin's and a captive's woe! [flow,
 Let me, at least, this mournful office pay,
 And rend in part from Death thy spoils away.
 Receive my spirit ready wing'd for flight,
 And guide from hence to realms of endless light."

She said; her bosom swell'd with labouring sighs,
And briny torrents trickled from her eyes.

At this the knight, who seem'd of sense depriv'd,
Wash'd with her tears, by slow degrees reviv'd;
A sigh he mingled with the virgin's sighs;
He sigh'd, but rais'd not yet his languid eyes.
His breath returning soon the dame perceiv'd;
A dawn of hope her fainting soul reliev'd.

"See, Tancred! see!" exclaim'd the tender maid,
"The mournful rites by dear affection paid.
Behold I come, thy fortune to divide—
Thus will I sink, thus perish by thy side!
Yet, yet awhile thy fleeting life retain—
O bear my last request, nor hear in vain!"

Then Tancred strove to view the cheerful fight,
But soon again withdrew his swimming sight:
Again Erminia vents her tears and sighs;
Again she mourns—"Forbear!" Vaffrino cries,
"Still, still be breathes; be then our care essay'd,
To heal the living ere we weep the dead."

He straight disarms the chief; she trembling
And to the office lends her friendly hands; [stands,
Then views the hero's wounds with skillful eyes,
And feels new hopes within her bosom rise;
But midst those deserts nought the fair can find,
Nought but her slender veil, his wounds to bind:
Yet love, inventive, every scheme ran o'er;
Love taught her various arts untry'd before,
Her locks she cut, with these she gently dry'd
The clotted blood; the bandage these supplied.
Though there nor dittany nor crocus grew,
Yet different herbs of lenient power she knew.
Already now is mortal sleep dispell'd,
The languid prince again his eyes un-aid'd:
He view'd his squire, he saw th' attending maid
In foreign vesture clad, and faintly said:
"From whence, Vaffrino! dost thou hither stray?
And who art thou, my kind preserver! say?"
She doubtful still, 'twixt joy and sorrow, sighs;
Then blushes rosy red, and thus replies:
"All shalt thou know, but now from converse cease:
Hear my commands, and calm thy thoughts to
I, your physician, will your health restore: [peace.
Be grateful for my care—I ask no more."

Then in her lap his head she gently laid:
In anxious doubt awhile Vaffrino stay'd,
How to the camp his wounded lord to bear,
Ere dewy night advanc'd to chill the air:
When sudden near a band of warriors drew,
And soon his eyes the troops of Tancred knew;
Who hither came, by happy fortune brought,
As fill'd with fear their absent chief they sought.
These rais'd th' enfeebled hero from the field,
And gently in their faithful arms upheld.
Then Tancred thus:—"Shall brave Argantes slain
Be left, a prey to vultures, on the plain?
Ah no! forbid it, Heaven! nor let him lose
A soldier's honours, or sepulchral dues.
I wage no battle with the silent dead;
In fight the glorious debt he boldly paid:
Then on his worth the rightful praise bestow;
'Tis all the living to the lifeless owe."

So he, Obsequious to their lord's command,
His breathless foe they rear'd from off the land.
Behind they bore him, while with guardian care
Vaffrino rode beside the royal fair.
Then spoke the prince as thus they journey'd on:
"Seek not my tents, but seek th' imperial town:
What chance so'er this mortal frame shall meet,
There let me find it in that holy seat:

From thence, where Christ's prey to death was given,
My soul will wing her readier flight to Heaven:
So shall I then my pilgrimage have made,
And the last vows of my devotion paid."

He said: to Sicily's walls the train address'd
Their ready course: there soon the warrior press'd
The welcome couch, and sunk to gentle rest.

And now Vaffrino for the virgin-fair
A secret place provides with silent care:
That done, to Godfrey's sight with speed he goes;
And enters boldly, (none his steps oppose)
Where sate the leader, bending o'er the bed
On which the wounded Raymond's limbs werespread,
And round their prince (a great assembly) stand
The best, the wisest, of the Christian band.
All gaz'd in silence, with attentive look,
While thus Vaffrino to the general spoke:

"O sacred chief! thy high commands obey'd,
I sought the faithless crew, their camp survey'd.
But here my skill to tell their number fails;
I saw them hide the mountains, fields, and vales:
Their thirst the copious streams and fountains drive,
And Syria's harvest scarce their food supplies.
But many a troop of horse and foot, in vain,
Unskill'd in battle, load th' encounter'd plain:
Nor order these obey, nor signals hear,
Nor draw the sword, but wage a distant war:
Yet some are forces prov'd, not new to fame,
Who once beneath the Persian standards came:
But chief o'er all those mighty warriors stand,
Th' immortal Squadron call'd, the Monarch's chosen
band.

The ranks unthinh'd no slaughter can deface;
Still, as one falls, another fills his place.
Brave Emirenes leads the numerous host;
And few can equal skill or courage boast;
And him, in every art of battle skill'd,
The caliph trusts to draw thee to the field.
Ere twice returning morn the day renew,
Expect to find th' Egyptian camp in view.
But thou, Rinaldo! most thy life defend;
For which, ere long, such warriors shall contend:
For this the noblest champions wield their arms;
With rival hate each breast Armida warms:
For with her beauty shall his deed be paid,
Who from the battle brings thy forfeit head.
Midst these, the noble chief from Persia's lands,
Samarcan's monarch, Altamorus stands.
Adrastus there is seen, of giant size,
Whose kingdom near Aurora's confines lies:
No common courser in the field he reins;
His bulk a towering elephant sustains.
There Tisaphernes boasts his glorious name,
Who bears in hardy deeds the foremost fame."

Thus he, Rinaldo, fill'd with generous ire,
Darts from his ardent eyes the sparkling fire:
He burns with noble zeal to meet the foe,
And all his soul with martial ardour glows.

Then to the chief the squire his speech renew'd:
"Yet more remains to speak," he thus pursu'd;
"For thee the Pagans deeper wiles prepare;
For thee has treason spread its blackest snare."
He said; and to the listening peers explain'd
The fatal purpose of th' insidious band;
Pierce Ormond's boast and proud demand disclos'd,
And all the murderous fraud at full expos'd.

Much was he ask'd; and much again replied:
Short silence then ensu'd on every side.
At length the leader, lost in various thought,
From hoary Raymond's wisdom counsel sought.

Then he: "Attend my words—at morning hour,
With forces deep enclose yon hostile tower;
And let the troops awhile recruit their might,
And rouse their vigour for a greater fight.
Thou, as shall best beseem, O chief! prepare,
For open action, or for covert war.
Yet this I most o'er every care commend,
In every chance thy valu'd life defend:
Thou giv'st success to crown our favour'd host;
And who shall guide our arms, if thou art lost?
That all the Pagan fraud may stand confest,
Command thy guard to change their wonted vest:
So shall the traitors through the field be known,
And on their heads their impious treason thrown."

"O still the same!" the leader thus replies, [wise] are
"Thou speak'st the friend, and all thy words are Now hear the purpose in our thoughts decreed:
Against the foe our battle will we lead:
In walls or trenches ne'er shall basely rest
A camp triumphant o'er the spacious east!
'Tis ours to meet yon barbarous troops in fight,
And prove our former worth in open light.
Before our sword, shall fly the trembling train:
Thus shall we firmly fix our future reign:
The tower shall soon our stronger force obey,
And, unsupported, yield an easy prey."
He ceas'd; and in his tent his steps address'd;
For now the sinking stars invite to rest.

BOOK XX.

THE ARGUMENT.

The Egyptian army arrives; the generals, on both sides, prepare for the battle. The speeches of Godfrey and Emirenes. The Christians make the onset: Gildippe signalizes herself and engages Altamorus, who had made great havoc of the Christians. Ormond is killed by Godfrey, and his associates are all cut to pieces. Rinaldo attacks the Moors and Arabs, and defeats them with great slaughter: He passes by Armida's chariot; her behaviour on that occasion. Solyman from the tower takes a prospect of the battle, and, fired with emulation, leaves his fortress: Aladine and the rest of the Pagans accompany him. Raymond is felled to the ground by Solyman; but Tancred, bearing the tumult, issues from the place where he lay ill of his wounds, and defends him from the enemy. Aladine is slain by Raymond. The sultan, having forced his way through the Syrians and Gascons that surrounded the tower, enters the field of battle. The deaths of Edward and Gildippe. Adrastus is killed by Rinaldo, and Solyman falls by the same hand. Emirenes endeavours, in vain, to rally his troops. Tisaphernes performs great actions, till he is slain by Rinaldo. Armida flies from the field; Rinaldo pursues her: The interview between them. Godfrey kills Emirenes, and takes Altamorus prisoner. The Pagans fly on all sides; and Godfrey enters the temple victorious, and pays his devotions at the tomb.

THE SUN had rous'd mankind with early ray,
And up the steep of Heaven advanc'd the day:
When from the lofty tower the Pagans spy
A dusty whirlwind, that obscur'd the sky,
Like evening's shade: at length reveal'd to sight,
The Egyptian host appear'd in open light:

The numerous ranks the spacious champaign fill'd,
Spread o'er the mountains, and the plains conceal'd,
Then sudden, from the troop besieg'd ascends
A general shout, that all the region rends.
With such a sound the cranes embodied fly
From Thracian shores, to seek a warmer sky;
With noise they cut the clouds, and leave behind
The wintry tempest, and the freezing wind.
Now hope, rekindling, fires the Pagan band;
Swells every threat, and urges every hand.
This soon the Franks perceiv'd, and instant knew
From whence their foes' recover'd fury grew.
They look'd; and midst the rolling smoke beheld
The moving legions that o'erspread the field.
At once a generous rage each bosom warms;
At once each valiant hero pants for arms:
Around their chief with eager looks they stand,
And loud the signal for the war demand.

But, well advis'd, the prudent chief denies
To wage the battle till the morn arise:
He rules their ardour, he controls their might,
And points a sifter season for the fight.

They hear, observant, and his voice obey,
But burn impatient for the dawning ray.

At length, high seated on her eastern throne,
The breezy morn with welcome lustre shone;
Wide o'er the skies she shed her ruddy streams,
And glow'd with all the Sun's enlivening beams;
While Heaven, serene and cloudless, would survey
The glorious deeds of that auspicious day.

Soon as the dawn appears, with early care,
His army Godfrey leads in form of war;
But leaves, to enclose the foes' beleagu'rd tower,
Experientia'd Raymond with the Syrian power,
That from the neighbouring lands auxiliar came,
And hail'd with joy their great deliverer's name;
A numerous throng!—nor these alone remain,
To these he adds the hardy Gascon train.

Now tower'd the leader, with exalted mien,
While certain conquest in his eyes was seen,
With more than wonted state he seem'd to tread;
A sudden youth was o'er his features spread:
Celestial favour beam'd in every look,
And every act a more than mortal spoke.

Now near advanc'd, the pious hero view'd
Where, deeply through'd, th' Egyptian squadrons stood;

And straight to seize a favouring hill he sends,
Whose height his army's left and rear defends.
His troops he rang'd; the midst the foot contain'd;
In either wing the lighter horse remain'd:
The left, that to the friendly hill was join'd,
The chief to either Robert's care consign'd:
The midst his brother held; himself the right,
Where open lay the dangers of the fight:
Here mix'd with horse, accustom'd thus t' engage,
A distant war on foot the archers wage.
Behind, th' adventurers to the right he led,
And plac'd the bold Rinaldo at their head.

"In thee, intrepid warrior!" Godfrey cries,
"Our strong defence, our hope of conquest, lies.
Behind the wing awhile remain conceal'd:
But, when the foes advance to invade the field,
Assail their flank, as vainly they contend
To wheel around us, and our rear offend."

Then, on a rapid steed, in open view,
From rank to rank, 'twixt horse and foot, he flew:

1 The history relates, that the morning on which the armies engaged was uncommonly fine.

From his rais'd helm his piercing looks he cast;
His eyes, his figure, lighten'd as he pass'd!
The cheerful he confirm'd, the doubtful rais'd,
And, for their former deeds, the valiant prais'd.
He bade the bold their ancient boasts regard;
Some urg'd with honour's, some with gold's reward.
At length he stays where thickening round him
The first, the bravest of the martial band: [stand
Then from on high his speech each bearer warms,
Swells the big thought, and fires the soul to arms.
As from steep hills the rushing torrents flow,
Increas'd with sudden falls of melting snow:
So from his lips, with swift effusion, pours
Mellibuous eloquence in copious showers.

"O you, the scourge of Jesus' foes protest,
O glorious heroes! conquerors of the east!
Behold the day arriv'd, so long desir'd,
The wish'd-for day to which your hopes aspir'd!
Some great event th' Almighty sure designs,
Who all his rebels in one force combines:
See! in one field he brings your various foes,
That one great battle all your wars may close.
Despise you Pagans, an un govern'd host,
Lost in confusion, in their numbers lost!
Our mighty force can troops like these sustain;
A rout undisciplin'd, a straggling train!
From sloth or servile labours brought from far,
Compell'd, reluctant, to the task of war!
Their swords now tremble, trembles every shield;
Their fearful standards tremble on the field.
I hear their doubtful sounds, their motions view,
And see death hovering o'er the fated crew.

You leader, fierce and glorious to behold,
In flaming purple and refulgent gold,
Might quell the Moorish and Arabian train,
But here his valour, here his worth is vain;
Wise though he be, what methods shall he prove,
To rule his army, or their fears remove? [name,
Scarce is he known, and scarce his troops can
Nor calls them partners of his former fame:
We every toil and every triumph share,
Fellows in arms and brothers of the war!
Is there a warrior but your chief can tell
His native country, and his birth reveal?
What sword to me unknown? what shaft that flies
With missile death along the liquid skies?
I ask but what I oft have gain'd before;
Be still yourselves, and Godfrey seeks no more.
Preserve your zeal! your fame and mine attend:
But, far o'er all the faith of Christ defend!
Go—crush those impious on the fatal plain:
With their defeat your sacred rights maintain.
What should I more?—I see your ardent eyes!
Conquest awaits you!—seize the glorious prize."

He ceas'd; and instant, like a flashing light,
When stars or meteor stream through dusky night,
A sudden splendour on his brow was shed,
And lambent glories play'd around his head.
All wondering gaze! and some the sign explain,
A certain omen of his future reign.
Perchance (if mortal thoughts so high may soar,
Or dare the secrets of the skies explore)
From heavenly seats his guardian angel flew,
And o'er the chief his golden pinions threw.

While Godfrey thus the Christian host prepares,
Th' Egyptian leader, press'd with equal cares,
Extends his numerous force to meet the foe:
The midst the foot, the wings the horse compose:
Himself the right; the midst Mulasses guides:
There, in the central war, Armida rides.

In pomp barbaric near the leader stand
Iodia's stern king, and all the regal band;
There Tisaphernes lifts his haughty head;
But where the squadrons to the left were spread,
(A wider space) there Altamorus brings
His Afric monarchs, and his Persian kings:
From thence their slings, their arrows they prepare,
And all the missile thunder of the war.

Now Emirenes every rank inspires.
The fearful raises, and the valiant fires:
To those he cried—"What mean your looks de-
-press'd,

What fear unmanly harbours in your breast?
Our near approach shall daunt you hostile train,
Our shouts alone shall drive them from the plain."
To these—"No more delay, ye generous bands!
Redeem the pillage from the spoilers' hands."
In some he waken'd every tender thought,
Each lov'd idea to remembrance brought:
"O, think by me your country begs," he cries,
"And thus, adjuring, on your aid relies!
Preserve my laws, preserve each sacred fame,
Nor let my children's blood my temples stain:
Preserve from ruffian force th' affrighted maid;
Preserve the tombs and ashes of the dead!
To you, oppress'd with bending age and woe,
Their silver locks your hoary fathers show:
To you, your wives, your lisping infants sue;
All ask their safety, and their lives from you."

He said, and ceas'd; for nearer now were seen
Th' advancing powers, and small the space be-tween.

Now front to front in dreadful pause they stand,
Burn for the fight, and only wait command.
The streaming banners to the wind are spread,
The plumage nods on every crested head;
Arms, vests, devices, catch the sunny rays,
And steel and gold with mingled splendour blaze!
Each spacious host on either side appears
A steely wood, a grove of waving spears.
They bend their bows, in rest their lances take,
They whirl their slings, their ready javelins shake.
Each generous steed to meet the fight aspires,
And seconds, with his own, his master's fires;
He neighs, he foams, he paws the ground beneath,
And smoke and flame his swelling nostrils breathe!

Even horror pleas'd in such a glorious sight,
Each beating bosom felt severe delight:
While the shrill trumpets, echoing from afar,
With dreadful transports animate the war.
But still the faithful bands superior stood,
More clear their notes, more fair their battle show'd;
Their louder trumpets rous'd a nobler flame,
And from their arms a brighter lustre came.

The Christians sound the charge; the foe reply'd;
And the mix'd clangours rattle in the sky:
Straight on their knees the Franks the soil adore,
And kiss the hallow'd earth, and Heaven implore.
And now between the troops the space is lost;
With equal ardour joins each adverse host.

What hero first, amidst the Christian name,
Gain'd from the faithless bands a wreath of fame?
'Twas thou, Gildippe! whose restless hand
O'erthrew Hircanes, who in Ormus reign'd;
(Such glory Heaven on female arms display'd)
Deep in his breast the spear a passage made;
Headlong he falls; and, falling, bears the foe
With joyful shouts applaud the forceful blow.
Her javelin broke, her trusty sword she drew,
The Persian pierc'd, and Zopyrus she slew;

Cleft where the circling belt his armour bound,
 He falls, divided, on the purple ground.
 Through fierce Alarcus' throat her weapon hew'd
 The double passage of the voice and food;
 Then Artaxerxes in the dust she laid,
 And through Argæus thrust her furious blade.
 At Ishmael's arm her rapid steel she guides,
 And the close juncture of the hand divides:
 The sever'd hand at once the rein forsook;
 Above the startled courser hiss'd the stroke;
 He rear'd aloft, and, seiz'd with sudden fright,
 Broke through the ranks, and discompos'd the fight.
 All these, and numbers more, her fury feel,
 Whose names in silence distant years conceal:
 But 'gainst her now the throbbing Persians came,
 And Edward ran to assist the matchless dame.
 With force united then, the faithful pair
 Undaunted bore the rushing storm of war.
 Neglectful of themselves amidst the strife,
 Each guards, with pious care, the other's life.
 Her ready shield the warlike damsel spread,
 And turn'd the weapons aim'd at Edward's head.
 He o'er his spouse his fencing buckler throws:
 Each seeks for each the vengeance on the foe.
 By him the daring Artaban was slain,
 Who in Boëcan's island held his reign:
 By him his instant fate Alvarès found,
 Who durst at fair Gildippe aim the wound.
 Then Arimontes' brow the cleft in two,
 Who, with drawn sword, against her consort flew.
 While these resistless midst the Persians rag'd;
 More dire Samarcand's king the Franks engag'd.
 Where'er he turn'd his steed, or drove his steel,
 The horse and foot before his fury fell:
 And those that 'scape the falchion's milder death,
 Beneath the courser's feet groan out their struggling breath!

By Altamorus on the dreadful plain,
 Brunello strong, Ardonio huge, was slain:
 Of that the helm and head the sword divides;
 The gory visage hangs on equal sides.
 This pierc'd where laughter first derives its birth,
 And the glad heart dilates to pleasing mirth,
 (Wonderous and horrid to the gazer's eyes!)
 Now laughs constrain'd, and as he laughs he dies!
 With these Gentonio, Guasco, Guido dy'd:
 And good Rosmondo swell'd the crimson tide.
 What tongue can tell the throng depriv'd of breath,
 The wounds describe, or dwell on every death?
 None yet appear'd, of all the warring band,
 Who durst sustain his valour hand to hand.
 Alone Gildippe 'gainst the monarch came;
 No fear could damp her generous thirst of fame.
 Less bold, on fair Thermodon's winding shore,
 Each warlike Amazon her buckler bore,
 Or rear'd her axe; than now, with glorious heat,
 Gildippe rush'd the Persian's rage to meet.
 She rais'd her sword, and struck the regal crown
 That round his helm with pomp barbaric shone.
 The glittering honours from his brows she rent;
 Beneath the force the mighty warrior bent.

* The circumstance of a male and female warrior, so tenderly connected with each other, makes a beautiful and affecting picture, and adds variety to the poem: it seems to have been first introduced by Tasso, and has already been observed to have its foundation in history.

See note * to book i. page 409.

The king with shame the powerful arm confess'd,
 And swift to avenge the blow his steel address'd:
 Full on her front so fierce the dame he struck,
 That sense her mind, and strength her limbs forsook.
 Then had she fall'n, but near with ready hand
 Her faithful lord her sinking weight sustain'd.
 No more the lofty foe his stroke pursu'd,
 But with disdain an easy conquest view'd:
 So the bold lion, with a scornful eye,
 Scowls on the prostrate prey, and passes by.

Meantime fierce Ormond, who, with murderous
 Had spread for Godfrey's life the fatal snare, [care,
 Disguis'd, was mingled with the Christian band,
 And near their chief his dire associates stand.
 So prowling wolves an entrance seek to gain,
 Like faithful dogs, amongst the woolly train;
 They watch the folds when welcome shades arise
 And hide their quivering tails between their thighs.
 Th' insidious band advanc'd, and now in view
 Near pious Godfrey's side the Pagan drew.
 Soon as the prince the white and gold survey'd,
 (The certain token which their wife betray'd)
 "Behold the traitor there confess'd," he cries,
 "Who veils his treason with a Frank's disguise!
 At me his followers aim the deadly blow!"
 He said, and rush'd against the treacherous foe:
 On Ormond swift th' avenging blade he rais'd;
 Th' astonish'd wretch, without resistance, gaz'd:
 And, while a sudden terror froze his blood,
 With stiffening limbs, a senseless statue stood.
 Each sword was turn'd against the fraudulent crew,
 At these the shafts from every quiver flew:
 In pieces hewn their bodies strew the plains;
 And not a single corpse entire remains!

Now, stain'd with slaughter, Godfrey bent his
 To where the valiant Altamorus' force (course
 His squadrons pierc'd, that fled with timorous haste,
 Like Afric sands before the southern blast,
 Load to his troops th' indignant hero cried,
 Stay'd those that fled, and him that chas'd defy'd.

Between those mighty chiefs a fight ensu'd,
 More dire than Ida or Scamander view'd.
 Meanwhile betwixt the foot the battle bled;
 These Baldwin rul'd, and these Mulasses led.
 Nor less, in other parts, the conflict rag'd,
 Where, next the mountain, horse with horse en-
 There Emirenes dealing fate was found; [rag'd.
 There fought the two³ in fields of death renown'd.
 Two Roberts there the Pagan force defy'd;
 With Emirenes one the combat try'd,
 While conquest yet declar'd on neither side:
 But one, with armour pierc'd and helmet hew'd,
 In harder conflict with Adrastus stood.
 Still Tisaphernes finds no equal foe
 To mate his strength, and measure blow for blow;
 But rushes where he sees the thickest train,
 And with a mingled carnage heaps the plain.
 Thus far'd the war; while neither part prevails,
 And hope and fear are pois'd in equal scales.
 O'erspread with shatter'd arms the ground appears,
 With broken bucklers, and with shiver'd spears.
 Here swords are stuck in hapless warriors kill'd,
 And useless there are scatter'd o'er the field.
 Here, on their face, the breathless bodies lie;
 There turn their ghastly features to the sky!
 Beside his lord the courser press'd the plain;
 Beside his slaughter'd friend the friend is slain;

³ Adrastus and Tisaphernes.

Foe near to foe; and on the vanquish'd spread
The victor lies; the living on the dead !
An undistinguish'd din is heard around,
Mix'd is the murmur, and confus'd the sound :
The threats of anger, and the soldiers' cry,
The groans of those that fall, and those that die.
The splendid arms that shone so gay before,
Now, sudden chang'd, delight the eyes no more.
The steel has lost its gleam, the gold its blaze :
No more the vary'd colours blend their rays :
Torn from the crest the sullied plumes are lost,
And dust and blood deform the pomp of either host !

Now, on the left, with Ethiopia's train,
The Moors and Arabs wheel around the plain.
The slingers next, and archers from afar,
Pour'd on the Franks a thick and missile war :
When lo ! Rinaldo with his squadron came,
Dire as an earthquake, swift as lightning's flame !
From Meroë, first of Ethiopia's bands,
Full in his passage Asimirus stands :
Rinaldo reach'd him, where the sable bead
Join'd to the neck, and mix'd him with the dead.
Soon as his sword the taste of blood confess'd,
New ardour kindled in the hero's breast.
Through all the throng the dreadful victor storm'd,
And deeds transcending human faith perform'd.
As, when th' venom'd serpent shoots along,
Furious he seems to dart a triple tongue :
At once the chief appears three swords to wield,
And hurl a threefold vengeance round the field.
The warthy kings, the Libyan tyrants die ;
Drench'd in each other's blood confus'd they lie.
Fierce with the rest his following friends engage,
His great example animates their rage.
Without defence th' astonish'd vulgar fall ;
One universal ruin levels all !

'T was war no more, but carnage through the field ;
Those lift the sword, and these their bosoms yield.
No longer now the Pagans sink, oppress
With wounds before, all honest on the breast ;
Lost are their ranks, they fly with headlong fear,
And pale confusion trembles in their rear :
Behind, Rinaldo pours along the plain,
And breaks and scatters wide the timorous train.
At length his generous arm from slaughter ceas'd,
And 'gainst a flying foe his wrath decreas'd.
So when high hills or tufted woods oppose,
With double force the wind indignant blows ;
No more oppos'd, no more its rage prevails,
But o'er the lawn it breathes in gentle gales.
So midst the rocks the sea resounding raves,
But, unconfined, more calmly rolls its waves.
Next on the foot the warrior bent his force,
Where late the Afric and Arabian horse
The squadrons flank'd ; but now dispers'd around,
They take their flight, or gasp upon the ground.
Swift on th' unguarded flies Rinaldo flew ;
As swift behind his brave competitors pursue ;
Spears, darts, and swords, in vain his might with-
Whole legions fall beneath his dreadful hand !
Not with such rage a hurrying tempest borne,
Sweeps o'er the field, and mows the golden corn.
The streaming blood in purple torrents swell'd,
And arms and mangled limbs the earth conceal'd :
There, uncontrol'd, the foaming coursers tread,
Bound o'er the plain, and trample on the dead !

Now came Rinaldo where, with martial air,
Appear'd Armida in her glittering car.
A train of lovers near her person wait,
A glorious guard, the nobles of the state !

She sees ! she knows !—conducting passions rush,
Desire and anger tremble in her eyes.

A transient blush the hero's visage burns ;
But heat and cold possess her heart by turns.
The knight, declining from the car, withdrew,
Not unregarded by the rival crew ;
Those lift the sword, and these the lance pretend ;
Even she prepares her threatening bow to bend ;
She fits the shaft, disdain her thoughts impell'd,
But love awhile the purpos'd stroke withhold ;
Thrice in her hand the missile reed she tries ;
And thrice her faltering hand its strength denies.
At length her wrath prevails, she twangs the string,
And sends the whizzing arrow on the wing :
Swift flies the shaft—as swiftly flies her prayer,
That all its fury may be spent in air !
She hopes, she fears, she follows with her eye,
And marks the weapon as it cuts the sky.
The weapon, not unfaithful to her aim,
Against the warrior's stubborn corselet came r
Harmless it fell ; aside the hero turn'd :
She deem'd her power despis'd, her anger scorn'd.
Again she bent her bow, but fail'd to wound,
While love with surer darts her bosom found.
" And is he than impervious to the steel ?
And fears he not," she cried, " the stroke to feel
Does tenfold adamant his limbs invest,
That adamant which guards his ruthless breast ?
So well secur'd, that safely he defies
The sword of battle, or the fair one's eyes ?
What further arts for wretched me remain ?
Attempt no more—for every art is vain !
Arm'd or disarm'd an equal fate I know,
Alike contem'd, a lover or a foe !
Where now, alas ! is every former boast ?—
Behold my warriors faint !—my hopes are lost !
Against his valour every strength must fail ;
Nor courage can withstand, nor arms avail !"
While thus she thought, her champions round
she view'd.

O'erthrown, or ta'en, or waiting in their blood,
What should she do ?—alone, unhelp'd remain ?
Already now she dreads the victor's chain :
Nor darts (the bow and javelin at her side)
In Pallas' or Diana's arms confide.
As when the fearful cygnet sees on high
The strong-pounc'd eagle stooping from the sky,
Trembling she cowers beneath th' impending fate ;
So seem'd Armida, such her dangerous state.
But Altamora, who from shameful flight
Still held the Persians, and maintain'd the fight,
Her peril view'd, and, careless of his fame,
His troops forsook, and to her rescue came.
With rapid sword he breaks amid the war,
And wheels around her, and defends the car ;
While dire destruction rages through his bands,
O'erthrown by Godfrey and Rinaldo's hands.
This sees th' unhappy prince, but sees in vain
Armida succour'd, now he turns again,
But flew too late to assist his routed train !
There all was lost ; a general panic spread ;
Dispers'd, around the broken Persians fled.
In other parts the fainting Christians yield ;
Two Roberts there in vain direct the field ;
One scarce escap'd with life ; his wounded breast
And bleeding front the hostile steel confess'd ;
While fierce Adrastus one his prisoner made :
Thus equal chance the dubious battle sway'd.
But Godfrey now his hardy warriors warn'd,
Again to fight his ready bands he form'd ;

Then bravely on the victor-forces flew :

They join, they thicken, and the war renew.
Each side appears disdain'd with adverse gore ;
Each side the glorious signs of triumph bore.
Conquest and Fame on either part are seen,
And Mars and Fortune doubtful stand between.

White thus the combat rages on the plain
Betwixt the Christian and the Pagan train ;
High on the tower the haughty sultan stood,
From whence, intent, the distant strife he view'd ;
Struck with the sight, his breast with envy swell'd,
He burn'd to mingle in the fatal field.

All around besides, he snatch'd with eager haste,
And on his head his radiant helmet plac'd :
" Rise ! rise ! " he said, " no longer slothful lie—
Behold the time to conquer or to die ! "

Then, whether Heaven's high providence inspir'd
His daring purpose, and his fury fir'd,
That thus at once the Pagan reign might end,
And all its glories on that day descend ;
Or whether, conscious of his death to come,
He felt an impulse now to meet his doom :
Sudden he bade the sounding gates unbar,
And issu'd forth with unexpected war ;
Nor waits his following band, but singly goes ;
Himself alone defies a thousand foes.
But soon the rest his martial rage partook,
Even aged Aladine the fust firakook :
The base, the cautious, catch at once the fire ;
Not hope excites them, but despair inspires.

The first the Turk before his passage found,
His valour tumbled breathless to the ground,
So swift he thunder'd on the faithful train,
That, ere they view'd his assault, their friends are slain.

First of the Christians, struck with panic fear,
The trembling Syrians for their flight prepare.
But still unrouted stood the Gascon band,
Though nearer these the sultan's rage sustain'd,
And fell in heaps beneath his slaughtering hand.
Not with such wrath the savage beast indu'd,
Leap o'er the fold, and dyes the ground with blood :
Not with such fury, through th' ethereal space,
Voracious vultures read the feather'd race.
Through plated steel his strength resistless drives,
While his keen falchion drinks the warriors' lives !
With Aladine the Pagans quit the tower,
And furious on their late besiegers pour.

But Raymond now advanc'd with fearless haste,
And saw where Solyman his squadron press'd ;
Nor yet the hoary chief his steps for bore,
Nor shunn'd that arm whose force he felt before.
Again to combat he defies the foe,
Again his front receives a dreadful blow :
Again he falls ; in vain declining age,
With strength unequal, would such power engage.
Behold a hundred swords and shields display'd ;
And these defend the knight, and those invade
But thence with speed th' impetuous sultan flies ;
(He deems him slain, or deems an easy prize)
Descending, o'er the ruin'd works he goes
To distant plains, where fiercer battle glows :
Far other scenes his barbarous rage demands,
Far other deaths must glut his cruel hands !

Meanwhile around the late beleaguerr'd tower,
New vigour now inspires the Pagan power ;
The warmth their leader breath'd they still retain,
And with the Christians still their fears remain.
Those seek to finish what their chief began ;
And these, retreating, seem to quit the plain ;

vol. XXI.

In dus array the hardy Gascons yield ;
The Syrians wide are scatter'd o'er the field.
The tumult thickens near where Tancréd lies,
He hears the din of arms, the soldiers' cries :
Straight from the couch his wounded limbs he rears,
And lo ! at once the mingled scene appears :
He sees on earth th' ill-fated Raymond laid,
Some slowly yield, and some in flight survey'd.
That courage true to every noble breast,
Nor lost by weakness, nor by pain suppress'd,
Now swell'd the hero's soul ; he grasp'd his shield,
Nor seem'd too faint the ponderous orb to wield :
His right hand held unheath'd his glittering blade,
Nor other arms he sought, nor more delay'd ;
But issuing thus—" Oh ! whither would you fly,
And leave your lord neglected here to die !
Shall then these Pagans rend his arms away,
And in their faces suspend the glorious prey ?
Go—seek your country—to his son reveal
That, where you fled, his noble father fell ! "

He said ; and durst against a thousand foes
His breast, still feeble with his wounds, oppose ;
While with his ample shield (a fencing shade,
With seven tough hides and plates of steel overlaid)
He kept the hoary Raymond safe from harms,
From swords, and darts, and all the missile arms :
He whirls his falchion with resistless sway :
The foes repuls'd forego their wish'd-for prey.
But soon the venerable hero rose,
His face with shame, his heart with anger, glow ;
In vain he seeks the chief by whom he fell,
Then 'gainst the vulgar turus his vengeful steel.
The Gascons rally'd, soon the fight renew,
And straight their gallant leader's steps pursue :
Now fears the troop that danger late disdain'd,
And courage now succeeds where terror reign'd.
They chase that yielded, those that chas'd give way :

So chang'd at once the fortune of the day !
While Raymond rag'd with unresisted hand,
And sought the noblest of the hostile band :
The realm's usurper, Aladine, he view'd,
Who midst the thickest press the fight purru'd ;
He saw, and 'gainst him rais'd his fatal steel,
Cleft through the head the dying monarch fell ;
Probe on his kingdom's soil resign'd his breath,
And grinning bit the bloody dust in death.
Now various passions move the Pagan foes :
Some 'gainst the spear their desperate breasts oppose ;

While some, with terror seiz'd, the fight forsake,
And in the fort their second refuge take :
But entering, mix'd with these, the victor-train
At once the conquest of the fortress gain.
Now all is won—in vain the Pagans fly ;
Whither they fall, or at the portal die.
Sage Raymond then ascends the lofty tower,
The mighty standard in his hand he bore,
There full in view, to either host display'd.
The cross triumphant to the winds he spread ;
Unseen of Solyman, who thence afar,
Impatient flew to mingle in the war ;
And now he reach'd the fatal rampart's field,
Where more and more the purple torrent swell'd.

† Tasso seems to have caught this circumstance from an incident in Boyardo, where Sacripant, in like manner, issues forth, armed only with his sword and shield, against Agrican, who had gained an entrance into Albracca.

Ll

There Death appear'd to hold his horrid reign,
There raise his trophies on the dreadful plain.
The soldier seiz'd a steed, the combat sought,
And sudden to the fainting Pagans brought
A short but glorious aid.—So lightning flies,
And unexpected falls, and instant dies;
But leaves in rifted rocks, with furious force,
The tokens of its momentary course.
A hundred warriors, great in arms, he slew;
Yet from oblivion Fame has snatch'd but two.
O Edward and Gildippe! faithful pair!
Your hapless fate, your matchless deeds in war,
(If equal praise my Tuscan Muse can give)
Consign'd to distant times shall ever live!
Some pitying lover, when the tale he bears,
Shall grace your fortune and my verse with tears.

Th' intrepid heroine spurr'd her steed, and flew
To where the raging Turk the troops o'erthrew:
Two mighty strokes her valiant arm impell'd,
One reach'd his side, one pierc'd his plated shield;
The furious chief her well-known vest descried:
"Behold the strumpet with her mate," he cried,
"Hence to thy female tasks! the distaff wield,
Nor dare with spear and sword to brave the field."

He said, and dreadful as the words he spoke,
His thundering weapon through her corselet broke:
Deep in her breast the ruthless falchion drove,
Her gentle breast, the seat of truth and love!
Her languid hand forgoes the useless rein;
Approaching death creeps cold in every vein.
To save his wife, unhappy Edward flies!
Too late he comes—his lov'd Gildippe dies!
What should he do?—distracting thoughts prevail,
Pity and wrath at once his heart assail:
That, bids his arm a kind support bestow,
This, prompts his vengeance on the barbarous foe.
While with his left he seeks to hold the fair,
His better hand provokes th' unequal war:
But vain his effort to support his bride,
Or reach the murderous chief by whom she died.
The sword the Pagan through his arm impell'd,
That with a fruitless grasp his consort held.
As when an axe the stately elm invades,
Or storms uproot it from its native shades,
It falls—and with it falls the mantling vine,
Whose curling folds its ample waist entwine:
So Edward sunk beneath the Pagan steel;
So, with her Edward, fair Gildippe fell.

They strive to speak, their words are lost in sighs,
And on their lips th' imperfect accent dies.
Each other still with mournful looks they view,
And, close embracing, take the last adieu:
Till, losing both the cheerful beams of light,
Their gentle souls together take their flight!

Soon spreading Fame the dire event declares,
And soon the tidings to Rinaldo bears:
Compassion, grief, and wrath at once conspire,
And all his generous thoughts to vengeance fire:
But firstAdrastus, in the soldier's sight,
His passage cross'd, and dar'd him to the fight.

Then thus the king—"By every sign display'd
Thou sure art he for whom my search is made.
Each buckler have I long explor'd in vain,
And oft have call'd thee through th' embattled
plain.

Now shall my former vows be fully paid,
And justice sat'd with thy forfeit head:
Come!—let us here our mutual valour show,
Armida's champion I, and thou her foe!"

Boastful he spoke; then whirp'd his flashing steel;
Swift on the Christian's head the tempest fell:
In vain—the temper'd casque the force withstood;
But oft the warrior in the saddle bow'd:
Rinaldo's falchion thenAdrastus found,
And in his side impress'd a mortal wound:
Proud falls the giant-king, no more a name!
One fatal blow concludes his life and fame!

With horror seiz'd, the gazing Pagans stood,
While fear and wonder froze their curdling blood.
Even Sojman surpris'd the stroke beheld,
His alter'd looks his troubled thoughts reveal'd:
He sees his doom, and (wonderous to relate!)
Suspended stands to meet approaching fate.
But Heaven's high will, for ever uncontroll'd,
Unnerves the mighty, and confounds the bold!
As oft the sick in dreams attempt to fly,
What time the fainting limbs their speed deny,
In vain their lips a vocal sound essay,
Nor cries nor voice can find their wanted way.
So strove the soldier now th' assassin to deter,
He rous'd his soul to meet the threaten'd war;
In vain—so more the thirst of fame prevail'd;
His spirits droop'd, his wonted vigour fail'd;
He scorn'd to yield or fly: yet, unresolv'd,
A thousand thoughts his warring mind revolv'd.

While thus he paus'd, the conquering chief drew nigh,

Furious he rush'd tremendous to the eye!
He seem'd to move with more than mortal course,
And look'd a match for more than mortal force.
The Pagan scarce resists, yet even in death
Preserves his fame, and nobly yields his breath;
Nor shuns the sword, but, midst his ruin great,
Without a groan receives the stroke of fate!
Thus he, who, when subdu'd by stronger foes,
From every fall like old Atreus rose
With force renew'd, now reach'd his destin'd hour,
And press'd at length the earth, to rise no more.

Then Fame from man to man the tidings bears;
A doubtful face no longer Fortune wears;
No longer then the war's event suspends,
But joins the Christians, and their arms befriends.
Soon from the fight recede the regal band,
The pride, the strength of all the eastern land;
Once call'd immortal; now the name is lost,
And ruin triumphs o'er an empty boast!
Th' astonish'd bearer with the standard fled,
Him Emirenes stopp'd, and sternly said:

"Art thou not he, selected from the train,
Our monarch's glorious banner to sustain?
Was it for this (Oh! scandal to the brave!)
That to thy hand th' important charge I gave?
And canst thou, Rimeon, thy chief surrey,
Yet basely leave him, and desert the day?
What dost thou seek—thy safety?—here it lies—
With me return—death waits for him who flies.
Here let him bravely fight who hopes to live;
Here honour's deeds alone can safety give."

He heard, and instant to the field return'd;
Died and shame his conscious bosom burn'd.
No less the rest th' intrepid chief retain'd,
These urg'd by threats, and those by force con-strain'd.

"Who dares to fly from yonder sword," he cries,
"Who dares to tremble, by this weapon dies!"
Thus rang'd again his routed files he view'd,
The war rekindled, and his hopes renew'd:
While Tisaphernes with resistless might
Maintain'd the combat, and forbade the flight.

Brave deeds that day renown'd the warrior's band ;
 His single force dispers'd the Norman band :
 By him were chas'd the Flemings from the plain,
 And Gernier, Gerrard, and Rogero slain.
 When acts like these had grac'd his last of days,
 And crown'd his short but glorious life with praise,
 As careless what succeeding fate might yield,
 He sought the greatest perils of the field ;
 He saw Rinaldo, well the youth he knew,
 Though all his arms were dy'd to sanguine hue.
 " Lo ! there the terror of the plain," he cries,
 " May Heaven assist my daring enterprise !
 So shall Armida her revenge obtain :
 O Macon ! let my sword this conquest gain,
 And his proud arms shall hang devoted in thy face."

Thus pray'd the knight ; his words are lost in air,
 No Macon hears his unavailing prayer.
 As the bold lion, eager to engage,
 With jashing tail provokes his native rage ;
 So fares the furious warrior ; love inspires,
 Swells all his soul, and rouses all his fires.
 He hears aloft his shield ; he spurs his steed ;
 The Lation hero rush'd with equal speed.
 At once they meet ; at once, on either hand,
 In deep suspense the gazing armies stand.
 Such skill, such courage, either champion shows,
 So swift their weapons, and so fierce their blows ;
 Each side awhile forget their wonted rage,
 And drop their arms, to see the chiefs engage.
 In vain the Pagan strikes ; secur'd from harms,
 The Christian combats in ethereal arms :
 From him more fatal every stroke descends ;
 The foe from wounds no temper'd steel defends ;
 His shield is rent away, his helm is hew'd,
 And the plain blushes with a stream of blood.

The fair enchantress, who the fight survey'd,
 Beheld how fast her champion's strength decay'd.
 She saw the rest, a pale and heartless train,
 That scarce from fight their trembling feet restrain ;
 Till she, who late such guards around her view'd,
 Alone, forsaken, in her chariot stood :
 She loathes the light, and servitude she fears,
 Of conquest or revenge alike despairs.
 Then, leaping from her car in pale affright,
 She mounts a steed, and takes her speedy flight.
 But, like two hounds that snuff the tainted dew,
 Anger and love her parting steps pursue.
 When Cleopatra, by her fears betray'd,
 Of old from Actium's fatal conflict fled ;
 And left, to Caesar's happier arms expos'd,
 Her Roman lord [§] with perils round enclos'd ;
 He soon, forgetful of his former fame,
 Spread every sail to join the flying dame :
 So Timperness (but his foe withstood)
 Had from the field Armida's flight pursu'd ;
 His fair one vanish'd from his longing eyes,
 The Sun seem'd blotted from the cheerful skies :
 Fierce at Rinaldo then, in wild despair,
 He rais'd aloft his vengeful-blade in air.
 Not with such weight, to frame the forky brand,
 The ponderous hammer falls from Brontes' hand.
 Full on his front the thundering stroke he sent :
 Beneath the force the staggering warrior bent ;
 But soon recovering, whirl'd his beaming sword :
 The thirty point the Pagan's bosom gor'd ;
 A furious passage through his cuisses made,
 Till at his back appear'd the reeking blade :

§ Mark Anthony.

The steel, drawn forth, a double vent supplied ;
 The soul came floating in a purple tide.

Rinaldo, pausing, cast around his view,
 To mark what friends to aid, what foes pursu'd.
 Wide o'er the field he sees the Pagans fly ;
 On earth their broken arms and ensigns lie.
 And now his thoughts recall th' unhappy fair
 Who furious fled abandon'd to despair ;
 Her woeful state might well his pity claim,
 Her love neglected, and her ruin'd fame !
 For still in mind his tender faith he bore,
 Her champion plighted when he left her shore.
 Then, where her rapid courser's track he view'd,
 Th' impatient knight the flying dame pursu'd.

Meanwhile Armida chanc'd a vale to find
 That seem'd for dire despair and death design'd :
 Well-pleas'd herself she saw by fate convey'd
 To end her woes in such a grateful shade.
 There, 'lighting from her steed, she laid aside
 Her bow, her quiver, all her martial pride.
 " Unfaithful arms !" she cries, " essay'd in vain,
 Return'd unbat'h'd from such a sanguine plain ;
 Here buried lie, and prove the field no more,
 Since you so ill aveng'd the wrongs I bore.
 If vainly thus at other hearts you fly,
 Dure you a female's wretched bosom try ?
 Here—enter mine, that naked meets the blow,
 Here raise your trophies, here your triumph show !
 Love knows how well this breast admits the dart ;
 Love, that so deep has pierc'd my tender heart !
 Unblest Armida ! what is now thy fate.
 When this alone can cure thy wretched state ?
 The weapon's point must heal the wound of Love,
 And friendly Death my heart's physician prove.
 Food Love, farewell !—but come, thou fell Disdain !
 For ever partner with my ghost remain ;
 Together let us rise from realms below,
 To haunt th' ungrateful author of my woe ;
 To bring dire visions to his fearful sight,
 And fill with horror every sleepless night !"

She ceas'd ; and, fix'd her mournful life to close,
 The sharpest arrow from her quiver chose ;
 When lo ! Rinaldo came and saw the fair
 So near the dreadful period of despair :
 Already now her frantic hand she rear'd,
 And death already in her looks appear'd :
 He rush'd behind her, and restrain'd the dart ;
 The fatal point just bent against her heart.

Armida turn'd, and straight the knight beheld,
 (Unheard he came, and sudden stood reveal'd)
 Surpris'd she sees, and, shrieking with affright,
 From his lov'd face averts her angry sight ;
 She faints ! she sinks !—as falls a tender flower,
 Whose feeble stem supports the head no more :
 His arms he threw around her lovely waist,
 Her weight supported, and her zone unbrac'd ;
 While, gently bending o'er the fair distress'd,
 His sorrows bath'd her face and lovely breast.
 As, wet with pearly drops of morning dews,
 The drooping rose her wonted grace renews :
 So she, recovering soon, her visage rears,
 All moist and trickling with her lover's tears.
 And thrice she rais'd her eyes the youth to view,
 Thrice from his face her sight awhile withdrew.
 Oft from the strict embrace in vain she strove,
 With languid hand, his stronger arm to move :
 The pitying warrior still his grasp retain'd,
 And closer to his breast the damsel staid :
 At length, as thus in dear restraint she lay,
 Her words with gushing torrents found their way :

Yet still on earth she bent her steadfast look,
Nor dar'd to meet his glance, while thus she spoke:
"O cruel, when thou left'st me first to mourn!

And O! as cruel now in thy return!
Why wouldst thou thus thy fruitless cares employ
To save a life thy perjur'd destroy?

Say, to what future wrongs, what future shame,
What woes unknown is doom'd Armida's name!

Full well thy wily purpose I descry—
But she can little dare, who dares not die.

One triumph still to grace thy pomp remains;
A hapless princess bound in captiv' chains;

At first betray'd, thou made by force thy prize;
From acts like these thy mighty glories rise!

Once life and happiness 'twas thine to give;
Now death alone my sufferings can relieve!

But not from thee this blessing I demand;
All gifts are hateful from Rinaldo's hand!

Yet, cruel as thou art, myself can find
Some friendly way to elude the ill design'd:

If to a helpless wretch in bondage ty'd,
Are poisonous drugs and piercing steel deny'd;

Yet (thanks to Heaven!) a path remains to death;
Thou shalt not long detain this hated breath:

Cease then thy soothing arts, thy feints give o'er,
And nudge my soul with flattering hopes no more."

Thus mournful she; while love and anger drew
Fast from her beauteous eyes the briny dew.

He, touch'd with pity, melts as he equal we,
And, mix'd with hers, his kindly sorrows flow.

In me thou with tender words hast thus replied:
At length with tender words he thus replied:

"Armida! lay thy doubts, thy fears, aside;
Love—not to suffer shame, to empire live;

In me thy champion, not thy foe, receive.
Behold these eyes, if still thou doubt'st my zeal,

Let these, the truth of what I speak, reveal.
I swear to place thee on thy regal throne,

The seat of splendour where thy father shone.
O would to Heaven! the rays of truth as well

Might from thy mind the Pagan mist dispel,
As I shall raise thee to so high a state,

No eastern dame shall match thy glorious fate."
He spoke; and, speaking, sought her breast to move

With sighs and tears, the eloquence of love!
Till, like the melting flakes of mountain snow,

Where shines the Sun, or tepid breezes blow;
Her anger, late so fierce, dissolves away,

And gentle passions bear a milder way.
"Ah me! I yield!" the soften'd fair replies,

"Still on thy faith my easy heart relies;
'Tis thine at will to guide my future way,

And, what thou biddest, Armida must obey."
Thus they; Meanwhile th' Egyptian chief beheld

His regal standard cast upon the field:
And Rimedon all breathless press the plain,

By one fierce stroke from mighty Godfrey slain.
Or kill'd, or routed, all his troops appear,

Yet, to the last, he scorns ignoble rear;
And seeks, what now his hopes alone demand,
A death illustrious from a noble hand.

He spurs his steed, and swift on Godfrey flies;
No greater foe amid the plain he spies:

Fierce as he thunders through the ranks of war,
He shows the last brave tokens of despair:

Then to the chief he rais'd his voice on high:
"I come by thee in glorious strife to die!"

"Thine death I seek—but, ere I yield to fate,
I trust to crush thee with my sinking weight."

Thus he. At once they rush to meet the fight;
At once, on either side, their swords alight.

The Pagan's steel the Christian's buckler cleaves;
His hand, disarm'd, the sudden wound receives.

From Godfrey next descends a mightier blow
Full on the cheek of his unwary foe:

Half back he fell; and, while to rise he strove,
Deep in his ruin the Frank his falchion drove.

Now, Emirance dead, but few remain
Of all the numbers of th' Egyptian train:

While Godfrey these from place to place pursu'd,
Brave Altamorus on the field he view'd,

Who midst his foes th' unequal fight maintain'd,
Alone, on foot, with hostile blood stain'd:

With broken sword and shield the king appears,
And close surrounded with a hundred spears.

Then to his warriors pious Godfrey cried:
"Forbear, my friends! and lay your arms aside:

And thou, O chief! no more contest the field;
Forgo thy weapons, and to Godfrey yield."

He said; and he, who till that fatal hour
Ne'er bow'd his lofty soul to human power,

Soon as the great, the glorious name he heard,
(A sound from Libya to the pole rever'd)

At once resign'd his sword to Godfrey's hands:
"I yield!" he cried, "nor less thy worth de-

Thy triumph gain'd o'er Altamorus' name, [mands:
Is crown'd on less with riches than with fame.

My kingdom with its gold, my pious wife
With jewels, shall redeem my forfeit life."

"Heaven has not given me," thus the chief re-
"A mind to covet gold, or jewels prize: {plies,

Still keep what'er is thine from India's shore,
And still in peace enjoy thy Persian store;

No price for life, no ransom I demand;
I was, but traffic not, in Asia's land."

He ceas'd; and with his guards the monarch plac'd,

Then from the field the scatter'd remnants chas'd;
These to the trench in vain their flight pursued;

Inevitable death o'erstake the trembling crew:
Gigantic slaughter stalks on every side,

And swells from tent to tent the dreadful tide:
Helmets, crests, and radiant shields are purpled o'er,

And costly trappings drop with human gore.
Thus conquer'd Godfrey; and as yet the day

Gave from the western waves the parting ray,
Swift to the walls the glorious victor rode,

The domes where Christ had made his bless'd abode:
In sanguine vest, with all his princely train,

The chief of chiefs then sought the sacred fane;
There o'er the hollow'd tomb his arms display'd,
And there to Heaven his ro'w'd devotions paid.

INTRODUCTION.

IF a concatenation of events centred in one great action, events which gave birth to the present commercial system of the world; if these be of the first importance in the civil history of mankind, the Lusiad, of all other poems, challenges the attention of the philosopher, the politician, and the gentleman.

In contradistinction to the Iliad and the Æneid, the Paradise Lost has been called the Epic Poem of Religion. In the same manner may the Lusiad be named the Epic Poem of Commerce. The happy completion of the most important designs of Henry duke of Visco, prince of Portugal, to whom Europe owes both Gama and Columbus, both the eastern and the western worlds, constitutes the subject of that celebrated epic poem (known hitherto in England almost only by name) which is now offered to the English reader. But before we proceed to the historical introduction necessary to elucidate a poem founded on such an important period of history, some attention is due to the opinion of those theorists in political philosophy, who lament that either India was ever discovered, and who assert that the increase of trade is big with the real misery of mankind, and that commerce is only the parent of degeneracy, and the nurse of every vice.

Much indeed may be urged on this side of the question, but much also may be urged against every institution relative to man. Imperfection, if not necessary to humanity, is at least the certain attendant on every thing human. Though some part of the traffic with many countries resemble Solomon's importation of apes and peacocks; though the superfluities of life, the baubles of the opulent, and even the luxuries which enervate the irresolute and administer disease, are introduced by the intercourse of navigation; the extent of the benefits which attend it is also to be considered, ere the man of cool reason will venture to pronounce that the world is injured, and rendered less virtuous and less happy by the increase of commerce.

If a view of the state of mankind, where commerce opens no intercourse between nation and nation, be neglected, unjust conclusions will certainly follow. Where the state of barbarians, and of countries under the different degrees of civilization, are candidly weighed, we may reasonably expect a just decision. As evidently as the appointment of Nature gives pasture to the herds, so evidently is man born for society. As every other animal is in its natural state when in the situation which its instinct requires; so man, when his reason is cultivated, is then, and only then, in the state proper to his nature. The life of the naked savage, who feeds on acorns, and sleeps like a beast in his den, is commonly called the natural state of man; but if there be any propriety in this assertion, his rational faculties compose no part of his nature, and were given not to be used. If the savage therefore live in a state contrary to the appointment of Nature, it must follow that he is not so happy as Nature intended him to be. And a view of his true character will confirm this conclusion. The reveries, the fairy dreams of Rousseau may figure the paradisiacal life of a Hottentot, but it is only in such dreams that the superior happiness of the barbarian exists. The savage, it is true, is reluctant to leave his manner of life; but unless we allow that he is a proper judge of the modes of living, his attachment to his own by no means proves that he is happier than he might otherwise have been. His attachment only exemplifies the amazing power of habit, in reconciling the human breast to the most uncomfortable situations. If the intercourse of mankind in some instances be introductive of vice, the want of it as certainly excludes the exertion of the noblest virtues; and if the seeds of virtue are indeed in the heart, they often lie dormant, and even unknown to the savage possessor. The most beautiful description of a tribe of savages, which we may be assured is from real life, occurs in these words: And the five spies of Dan "came to Laish, and saw the people that were there, how they dwelt careless after the manner of the Zidonians, quiet and secure, and there was no magistrate in the land that might put them to shame in any thing. . . . And the spies said to their brethren, 'Arise, that we may go up against them; for we have seen the land, and behold it is very good' . . . and they came unto Laish, unto a people that were quiet and secure; and they smote them with the edge of the sword, and burnt the city with fire; and there was no deliverer, because it was far from Zidon, and they had no business with any man."—However the happy simplicity of this society may please the man of fine imagination, the true philosopher will view the men of Laish with other eyes. However virtuous he may suppose one generation, it requires an alteration of human nature, to preserve the children of the next in the same generous estrangement from the selfish passions, from those passions which are the parents of the acts of injustice. When his wants are easily supplied, the manners of the savage will be simple, and often humane, for the human heart is not vicious without objects of temptation. But these will soon occur; he that gathers the greatest quantity of fruit will be envied by the less industrious: the uninformed mind seems insensible of the idea of the right of possession which the labour of acquirement gives. When want is pressing, and the supply at hand, the only consideration with such minds is the danger of seizing it; and where there is "no magistrate to put to shame in any thing," depredation will soon display all its horrors. Let it be even admitted that the innocence of the men of Laish could secure them from the consequences of their own unrestrained desires; could even this impossibility be surmounted; still they are a wretched prey to the first invaders: and because they have no business with any man, they will find no deliverer. While human nature is the same, the fate of Laish will always be the fate of the weak and defenceless; and thus the most amiable description of savage life raises in our minds the strongest imagery of the misery, and impossible continuance of such a state. But if the view of these innocent people terminate in horror, with what contemplation shall we behold the wilds of Africa and America? The tribes of America, it is true, have degrees of policy greatly superior to any thing understood by the men of Laish. Great masters of martial oratory, their popular assemblies are schools open to all their youth. In these they not only learn the history of their nation, and what they have to fear from the strength and designs of their enemies, but they also imbibe the most ardent spirit of war. The arts of stratagem are their study, and the most athletic exercises of the field their employment and delight. And what is their greatest praise, they have "magistrates to put to shame." They inflict no corporeal punishment on their countrymen, it is true; but a reprimand from an elder, delivered in the assembly, is esteemed by them a deeper degradation, and severer punishment, than any of those, too often most impolitically adopted by civilized nations. Yet, though possessed of this advantage, an advantage impossible to exist in a large commercial empire, and though masters of great martial policy, their condition, upon the whole, is big with the most striking demonstration of the misery and unknawal state of such very imperfect civilization. "Multiply, and replenish the earth," is an injunction of the best political philosophy ever given to man. Nature has appointed man to cultivate the earth, to increase in number by the food which its culture gives, and by this increase of brethren to remove some, and to mitigate all the natural miseries of human life. But in direct opposition to this is the political state of the wild Americans. Their lands, luxuriant in climate, are often desolate wastes, where thousands of miles hardly support a few hundreds of savage hunters. Attachment to their own tribe constitutes their highest idea of virtue; but this virtue includes the most brutal depravity, makes them esteem the man of every other tribe as an enemy, as one with whom Nature has placed them in a state of war, and had commanded to destroy¹. And to this principle, their customs and ideas of honour serve as rituals and ministers. The cruelties practised by the American savages on their prisoners of war (and war is their chief employment) convey every idea expressed by the word diabolical, and give a most shocking view of the degradation of human nature².

² Unless when compelled by European troops, the exchange of prisoners is never practised by the American savages. Sometimes, when a savage loses a son in war, he adopts one of the captives to his stead; but this seldom occurs; for the death of the prisoner seems to give them much more satisfaction. The victim is tied to a tree, his teeth and nails are drawn, burning wood is held to every tender part, his roasted fingers are put into the bowl of a pipe and smoked by the savages; his tormentors with horrid howls dance round him, wounding him at every turn with their poniards; his eyes are at last thrust out, and he is let loose to stagger about as his torture impels him. As soon as he expires, his discovered

But what peculiarly completes the character of the savage is his horrible superstition. In the most distant nations the savage is in this the same. The terror of evil spirits continually haunts him; his God is beheld as a relentless tyrant, and is worshipped often with cruel rites, always with a heart full of horror and fear. In all the numerous accounts of savage worship, one trace of filial dependence is not to be found. The very reverse of that happy idea is the Hell of the ignorant mind. Nor is this barbarism confined alone to those ignorant tribes, whom we call savages. The vulgar of every country possess it in certain degrees, proportioned to their opportunities of conversation with the more enlightened. All the virtues and charities, which either dignify human nature or render it amiable, are cultivated and called forth into action by society. The savage life on the contrary, if we may be allowed the expression, instinctively narrows the mind; and thus, by the exclusion of the nobler feelings, prepares it, as a soil, ready for every vice. Sordid disposition and base ferocity, together with the most unhappy superstition, are every where the proportionate attendants of ignorance and severe want. And ignorance and want are only removed by intercourse and the offices of society. So self-evident are these positions, that it requires an apology for insisting upon them; but the apology is at hand. He who has read, knows how many eminent writers², and he who has conversed knows how many respectable names, limbs are boiled in the war kettle, and devoured by his executioners. And such is the power of custom and the ideas of honour, that the unhappy sufferer under all this torment betrays no sign of fear or grief. On the contrary, he upbraids his executioners with their ignorance of the art of tormenting, and boasts how many of their kindred had found their grave in his belly, whom he had put to death in a much severer manner.

If the civilized, he adds, enjoy the elegancies of life, have better food, and are more comfortably defended against the change of the seasons, it is use which makes these things necessary, and they are purchased by the painful labours of the multitude, who are the basis of society. To what outrages is not the man of civil life exposed? If he has property, it is in danger; and government or authority is, according to this author, the greatest of all evils. If there is a famine in the north of America, the savage, led by the wind and the sun, can go to a better climate; but in the burrows of famine, war, or pestilence, the ports and barriers of polished states place the subjects in a prison, where they must perish. Il resteroit encore—There still remains an infinite difference between the lot of the civilized and the savage; a difference, toute entière, all entirely to the disadvantage of society, that injustice which reigns in the inequality of fortunes and conditions. "In fine," says he, "as the wish for independence is one of the first instincts of man, he who can join to the possession of this primitive right, the moral security of a subsistence" (which we were just told the savage could do) "is incomparably more happy than the rich man surrounded with laws, superiors, prejudices, and fashions, which endanger his liberty."

Such are the sentiments of the abbé Raynal, a writer whose spirited manner and interesting subject have acquired him many readers. As he is not singular in his estimate of savage happiness, his arguments merit examination; and a view of the full tendency of his assertions will sufficiently refute his conclusions. Nothing can be more evident than that if habit destroy the relish of the elegancies of life, habit will also destroy the pleasure of hunting and fishing, when these are the sole business of the savage. If the savage has no care and no superior, these very circumstances naturally brutalize his mind, and render him vicious, fierce, and selfish. Nor is he so free from care, as some philosophers on their couches of down are apt to dream. Because hunting and fishing seem pleasant to us, are they also a pleasure to the wretch who in all seasons must follow them for his daily sustenance? You may as well maintain that a postillion, jaded with fatigue, and shivering with wet and cold, is extremely happy, because gentlemen ride on horseback for their pleasure. That we cannot want what we do not desire, nor desire what we do not know, are just positions: but does it follow, that such a state is happier than that which brings the wishes and cares of civil life? By no means: for according to this argument, insensibility and happiness proceed in the same gradation, and of consequence an oyster³ is the happiest of all animals. The advantages ascribed to the savage over the civilized life, in the time of war and famine, in the equality of rank, and security of liberty, offer an outrage to common sense, and are striking instances that no paradox is too gross for the reveries of modern philosophy. This author quite forgets what dangers the savages are every where exposed to; how their lands, if of any value, are sure to be seized by their more powerful neighbours, and millions of their persons enslaved by the more polished states. He quite forgets the infinite distance between the resources of the social and savage life; between connect the idea of innocence and happiness with the life of the savage and the unimproved rustic. To fit the character of the savage is therefore necessary, and we examine the assertion, that "it had been happy for both the old and new worlds, if the East and West Indies had never been discovered." The bloodshed and the attendant miseries which the unparalleled rapine and cruelties of the Spaniards spread over the new world, indeed disgrace human nature. The great and flourishing empires of Mexico and Peru, steeped in the blood of forty millions of their sons, present a melancholy prospect, which must excite the indignation of every good heart. Yet such desolation is not the certain consequence of discovery. And even should we allow that the depravity of human nature is so great, that the avarice of the merchant and rapacity of the soldier will overwhelm with misery every new discovered country, still are there other more comprehensive views to be taken, are we decide against the intercourse introduced by navigation. When we weigh the happiness of Europe in the scale of political philosophy, we are not to confine our eye to the dreadful ravages of Attila the Hun, or of Alaric the Goth. If the waters of a stagnated lake are disturbed by the spede when led into new channels, we ought not to inveigh against the alteration because the waters are fouled at the first; we are to wait to see the streamlets refine and spread beauty and utility through a thousand vales which they never visited before. Such were the conquests of Alexander; temporary evils, but civilization and happiness followed in the bloody track. And though disgraced with every barbarity, happiness has also followed the conquests of the Spaniards in the other hemisphere. Though the villainy of the Jesuits defeated their schemes of civilization in many countries, the labours of that society have been crowned with a success in Paraguay and in Canada, which reflects upon their industry the greatest honour. The customs and cruelties of many American tribes still disgrace human nature; but in Paraguay and Canada the natives have been brought to relish the blessings of society, and the arts of virtuous and civil life. If Mexico is not so populous as it once was, neither is it so barbarous; the shrieks of the human victim do not now resound from temple to temple; nor does the human heart, held up reeking to the Sun, imprecate the vengeance of the comforts administered by society to infirmity and old age, and the miserable state of the savage when he can no longer pursue his hunting and fishing. He also forgets the infinite difference between the discourse of the savage hut, and the cœna deorum, the friendship and conversation of refined and elevated understandings. But to philosophize is the contagion which infects the esprits forts of the continent; and under the mania of this disease, there is no wonder that common sense is so often crucified. It is only the reputation of those who support some opinions that will apologize for the labour of refuting them. We may therefore, it is hoped, be forgiven, if, en bagatelle, we smile at the triumph of our author, who thus sums up his arguments: "Après tout, un mot prot terminer ce grand procès—After all, one word will decide this grand dispute, so strongly canvassed among philosophers: Demand of the man of civil life, if he is happy? Demand of the savage, if he is miserable? If both answer, No, the dispute is determined." By no means; for the beast that is contented to wallow in the mire, is by this argument in a happier state than the man who has one wish to satisfy, however reasonably he may hope to do it by his industry and virtue.

den of social life, in having the happiness to lose the use of reflection, of those thoughts which led him back to the past, or taught him to dread the future." But this is as erroneous in fact, as such happiness is false in philosophy. Alexander Selkirk fell into no such state of happy idiotism. By his own account he acquired indeed the greatest tranquillity of mind, which arose from religious submission to his fate. He had with him a Bible, some books of mathematics and practical divinity; the daily perusal of which both fortified his patience and amused his tedious hours. And he professed that he feared he would never again be so good a Christian. In his domestic economy he showed every exertion of an intelligent mind. When captain Rogers found him in 1709, the accounts which he gave of the springs and vegetables of the island, were of the greatest service to the ship's company. And the captain found him so able a sailor, that he immediately made him mate of his ship. Having seen captain Rogers's vessel at sea, he made a fire in the night, in consequence of which a boat was sent to examine the shore. He said he had seen some Spaniards at different times land on the island, but he had always fled from them, judging they would certainly put him to death, in order to prevent any account which he might be able to give of the South Seas. This is not the reasoning of the man who has forgotten his name and his country. And even his amusements discover humour, and a mind by no means wrapt up in dull or savage tranquillity. He had taught a number of his tame goats and cats to dance on their hinder legs; and he himself sang and danced along with them. This he exhibited to captain Rogers and his company. The captain, indeed, says he seemed to have forgotten part of his language, as he spoke his words by halves. But let it be remembered, that Selkirk was born in a county of Scotland where the vulgar say, fat ir ye deen, and far ir ya gawn, in place of what are you doing, and where are you going. Selkirk, it is true, had been some little while on board Dampier's ship; but not to mention what little improvement of his speech might from thence be received, certain it is that disuse of the acquired tongue, as well as sudden passion, will recall the native dialect.—It is no wonder, therefore, that an Englishman should think he spoke his words by halves. Selkirk had not been full four years on the island of Fernandez, and on his return to England, the narrative which he gave of his sufferings afforded the hint of Robinson Crusoe.

Heaven on the guilty empire ⁴. And, however impolitically despotic the Spanish governments may be, still do these colonies enjoy the opportunities of improvement, which in every age arise from the knowledge of commerce and of letters; opportunities which were never enjoyed under the dominion of Montezuma and Atabalipa. But if from Spanish, we turn our eyes to British America, what a glorious prospect! Here formerly on the wild lawn, perhaps twice in the year, a few savage hunters kindled their evening fire, kindled it more to protect them from evil spirits and beasts of prey, than from the cold; and with their feet pointed to it, slept on the ground. Here now population spreads her thousands, and society appears in all its blessings of mutual help ⁵, and the mutual lights of intellectual improvement. "What work of art, or power, or public utility, has ever equalled the glory of having peopled a continent, without guilt or bloodshed, with a multitude of free and happy commonwealths, to have given them the best arts of life and government!" To have given a savage continent an image of the British constitution is indeed the greatest glory of the British crown, "a greater than any other nation ever acquired;" and from the consequences of the genius of Henry duke of Visco did the British American empire arise, an empire which, unless retarded by the illiberal and inhuman spirit of religious fanaticism, will in a few centuries, perhaps, be the glory of the world.

Stagnant indeed must be the theorist, who will deny the improvement, virtue, and happiness, which, in the result, the voyage of Columbus has spread over the western world. The happiness which Europe and Asia have received from the intercourse with each other, cannot hitherto, it must be owned, be compared either with the possession of it, or the source of its increase established in America. Yet let the man of the most melancholy views estimate all the wars and depredations which are charged upon the Portuguese and other European nations, still will the eastern world appear considerably advantaged by the voyage of Gama. If seas of blood have been shed by the Portuguese, nothing new was introduced into India. War and depredation were no unheard-of strangers on the banks of the

⁴ The innocent simplicity of the Americans in their conferences with the Spaniards, and the dreadful cruelties they suffered, divert our view from their complete character. But almost every thing was horrid in their civil customs and religious rites. In some tribes, to cohabit with their mothers, sisters, and daughters, was esteemed the means of domestic peace. In others, catanites were maintained in every village; these went from house to house, as they pleased, and it was unlawful to refuse them what victuals they choosed. In every tribe the captives taken in war were murdered with the most wanton cruelty, and afterwards devoured by the victors. Their religious rites were, if possible, still more horrid. The abominations of ancient Moloch were here outnumbered; children, virgins, slaves, and captives, bled on different altars, to appease their various gods. If there was a scarcity of human victims, the priests announced that the gods were dying of thirst for human blood. And to prevent a threatened famine the kings of Mexico were obliged to make war on the neighbouring states, to supply the altars. The prisoners of either side died by the hand of the priest. But the number of the Mexican sacrifices so greatly exceeded those of other nations, that the Tlascalans, who were hunted down for this purpose, readily joined Cortez with about 200,000 men, and, fired by the most fixed hatred, enabled him to make one great sacrifice of the Mexican nation. Without the assistance of these potent auxiliaries Cortez never could have conquered Mexico. And thus the barbarous cruelty of the Mexicans was the real cause of their very signal destruction. As the horrid scenes of gladiators amused ancient Rome, so their more horrid sacrifices seem to have formed the chief entertainment of Mexico. At the dedication of the temple of Vitzuliputzli, (A. D. 1486,) 64,080 human victims were sacrificed in four days. And, according to the best accounts, their annual sacrifices required several thousands. The skulls of the victims sometimes were hung on strings which reached from tree to tree around their temples, and sometimes were built up in towers and cemented with lime. In some of these towers Andrew de Tapia one day counted 136,000 skulls*. When the Spaniards gave to the Mexicans a pompous display of the greatness of their monarch Charles V. Montezuma's orators in return boasted of the power of their emperor, and enumerated among the proofs of it, the great number of his human sacrifices. He could easily conquer that great people, the Tlascalans, they said, but he chooses to preserve them to supply his altars. During the war with the Spaniards they increased their usual sacrifices, till priest and people were tired of their bloody religion. Frequent embassies from different tribes complained to Cortez that they were weary of their rites, and entreated him to teach them his law. And though the Peruvians, it is said, were more polished, and did not sacrifice quite so many as the Mexicans, yet 200 children was the usual hecatomb for the health of the Ynca, and a much larger one of all ranks honoured his obsequies. The method of sacrificing was thus: six priests laid the victim on an altar, which was narrow at top, when five bending him across, the sixth cut up his stomach with a sharp flint, and while he held up the heart reeking to the Sun, the others tumbled the carcass down a flight of stairs near the altar, and immediately proceeded to the next sacrifice. See Acosta, Gomara, Caceri, the Letters of Cortez to Charles V. &c. &c.

⁵ This was written ere the commencement of the unhappy civil war in America. And under the influence of the spirit of the British constitution, that country may perhaps again deserve this character.

Ganges; nor could the nature of the civil establishments of the eastern nations secure a lasting peace. The ambition of their native princes was only diverted into new channels; into channels which, in the natural course of human affairs, will certainly lead to permanent governments, established on improved laws and just dominion. Yet even ere such governments are formed, is Asia no loser by the arrival of Europeans? The horrid massacres and unbounded rapine, which, according to their own annals, followed the victories of their Asian conquerors, were never equalled by the worst of their European vanquishers. Nor is the establishment of improved governments in the East the dream of theory. The superiority of the civil and military arts of the British, notwithstanding the hateful character of some individuals, is at this day beheld in India with all the astonishment of admiration; and admiration is always followed, though often with retarded steps, by the ardent desire of similar improvement. Long after the fall of the Roman empire, the Roman laws were adopted by nations which ancient Rome esteemed as barbarous. And thus, in the course of ages, the British laws, according to every test of probability, will, in India, have a most important effect, will fulfil the prophecy of Camoëns, and transfer to the British the high compliment he pays to his countrymen:

Beneath their sway majestic, wise, and mild,
Proud of her victor's laws, thrice happier India smil'd.

In former ages, and within these few years, the fertile empire of India has exhibited every scene of human misery, under the undistinguishing ravages of their Mohammedan and native princes; ravages only equalled in European history by those committed under Attila, surnamed the Scourge of God, and the Destroyer of Nations. The ideas of patriotism and of honour were seldom known in the cabinets of the eastern princes till the arrival of the Europeans. Every species of assassination was the policy of their courts, and every act of unrestrained rapine and massacre followed the path of victory. But some of the Portuguese governors, and many of the English officers, have taught them, that humanity to the conquered is the best, the truest policy. The brutal ferocity of their own conquerors is now the object of their greatest dread; and the superiority of the British in war has convinced their princes*, that an alliance with the British is the surest guarantee of their national peace and prosperity. While the English East India company are possessed of their present greatness, it is in their power to diffuse over the East every blessing which flows from the wisest and most humane policy. Long ere the Europeans arrived, a failure of the crop of rice, the principal food of India, had spread the devastations of famine over the populous plains of Bengal. And never, from the seven years famine of ancient Egypta to the present day, was there a natural scarcity in any country which did not enrich the proprietors of the granaries. The Mohammedan princes and Moorish traders have often added all the horrors of an artificial to a natural famine. But however some Portuguese or other governors may stand accused, much was left for the humanity of the more exalted policy of an Albuquerque or a Castro. And under such European governors as these, the distresses of the East here often been alleviated by a generosity of conduct and a train of resources formerly unknown in Asia. Absurd and impracticable were that scheme, which would introduce the British laws into India, without the deepest regard to the manners and circumstances peculiar to the people. But that spirit of liberty upon which they are founded, and that security of property which is their leading principle, must, in time, have a wide and stupendous effect. The abject spirit of Asiatic submission will be taught to see, and to claim those rights of nature, of which the dispirited and passive Gentoos could, till lately, hardly form an idea.

From this, as naturally as the noon succeeds the dawn, must the other blessings of civilization arise. For though the four great tribes of India are almost inaccessible to the introduction of other manners and of other literature than their own, happily there is in human nature a propensity to change. Nor may the political philosopher be deemed an enthusiast, who would boldly prophesy, that unless the British be driven from India, the general superiority which they bear, will, ere many generations shall have passed, induce the most intelligent of India to break the shackles of their absurd superstitions, and lead them to partake of those advantages which arise from the free scope and due cultivation of the rational powers. In almost every instance the Indian institutions are contrary to the feelings and wishes of nature. And ignorance and bigotry, their two chief pillars, can never secure unalterable du-

* Mohammed Ali Khan, nabob of the Carnatic, declared, "I met the British with that freedom of openness which they love, and I esteem it my honour, as well as security, to be the ally of such a nation of princes."

tion⁸. We have certain proof, that the horrid custom of burning the wives along with the body of the deceased husband, has continued for upwards of 1500 years; we are also certain, that within these twenty years it has begun to fall into disuse. Together with the alteration of this most striking feature of Indian manners, other assimilations to European sentiments have already taken place⁹. Nor can the obstinacy even of the conceited Chinese always resist the desire of imitating the Europeans, a people who in arts and in arms are so greatly superior to themselves. The use of the twenty four letters, by which we can express every language, appeared at first as miraculous to the Chinese. Prejudice cannot always deprive that people, who are not deficient in selfish cunning, of the ease and expedition of an alphabet; and it is easy to foresee, that, in the course of a few centuries, some alphabet will certainly take place of the 60,000 arbitrary marks, which now render the cultivation of the Chinese literature, not only a labour of the utmost difficulty, but even the attainment of it impossible, beyond a very limited degree. And from the introduction of an alphabet, what improvements may not be expected from the laborious industry of the Chinese! Though most obstinately attached to their old customs, yet there is a tide in the manners of nations which is sudden and rapid, and which acts with a kind of instinctive fury against ancient prejudice and absurdity. *It was that nation of merchants, the Phœnicians, which diffused the use of letters through the ancient, and commerce will undoubtedly diffuse the same blessings through the modern world.

To this view of the political happiness, which is sure to be introduced in proportion to civilization, let the divine add, what may be reasonably expected from such opportunity of the increase of religion. A factory of merchants, indeed, has seldom been found to be the school of piety; yet, when the general manners of a people become assimilated to those of a more rational worship, something more than ever was produced by an infant mission, or the neighbourhood of an infant colony, may then be reasonably expected, and even foretold.

In estimating the political happiness of a people, nothing is of greater importance than their capacity of, and tendency to, improvement. As a dead lake (to continue our former allusion) will remain in the same state for ages and ages, so would the bigotry and superstitions of the East continue the same. But if the lake is begun to be opened into a thousand rivulets, who knows over what unnumbered fields, barren before, they may diffuse the blessings of fertility, and turn a dreary wilderness into a land of society and joy!

In contrast to this, let the Golden Coast and other immense regions of Africa be contemplated:

Affric behold; alaa, what alter'd view!
 Her lands uncultur'd, and her sons untrue;
 Ungrac'd with all that sweetens human life,
 Savage and fierce they roam in brutal strife;
 Eager they grasp the gifts which culture yields,
 Yet naked roam their own neglected fields.
 Unnumber'd tribes as bestial grazers stray,
 By laws unform'd, unform'd by reason's way.
 Far inward stretch the mournful sterile dales,
 Where on the parcht hill-side pale Famine wails.

Lusiad x.

Let us view what millions of these unhappy savages are dragged from their native fields, and cut off for ever from all the hopes and all the rights to which human birth entitled them; and who would hesitate to pronounce that negro the greatest of patriots, who, by teaching his countrymen the arts of society, should teach them to defend themselves in the possession of their fields, their families, and their own personal liberties?

Evident however as it is, that the voyages of Gama and Columbus have already carried a superior degree of happiness, and the promise of infinitely more, to the eastern and western worlds; yet the advantages derived from the discovery of these regions to Europe may perhaps be denied. But let us view what Europe was, ere the genius of Don Henry gave birth to the spirit of modern discovery.

Several ages before this period the feudal system had degenerated into the most absolute tyranny. The barons exercised the most despotic authority over their vassals, and every scheme of public utility was rendered impracticable by their continual petty wars with each other; and to which they led their dependents as dogs to the chase. Unable to read, or to write his own name, the chieftain was entirely possessed by the most romantic opinion of military glory, and the song of his domestic minstrel constituted his highest idea of fame. The classics slept on the shelves of the monasteries, their dark but happy asylum; while the life of the monks resembled that of the fattened bees which loaded their tables. Real abilities were indeed possessed by a Duns Scotus, and a few others; but these were lost in the most trifling subtleties of a sophistry, which they dignified with the name of casuistical divinity. Whether Adam and Eve were created with navels, and how many thousand angels might at the same instant dance upon the point of the finest needle without jostling one another, were two of the several topics of like importance which excited the acumen and engaged the controversies of the learned. While every branch of philosophical, or rational investigation was thus unpursued and unknown, commerce, incompatible in itself with the feudal system, was equally neglected and unimproved. Where the mind is enlarged and enlightened by learning, plans of commerce will rise into action; and these, in return, will, from every part of the world, bring new acquisitions to philosophy and science. The birth of learning and commerce may be different, but their growth is mutual, and dependent upon each other. They not only assist each other, but the same enlargement of mind which is necessary for perfection in the one, is also necessary for perfection in the other; and the same causes impede, and are alike destructive of both. The intercourse of mankind is the parent of each. According to the confinement or extent of intercourse, barbarity or civilization proportionably prevail. In the dark monkish ages, the intercourse of the learned was as much impeded and confined as that of the merchant. A few unwieldy vessels coasted the shores of Europe; and mendicant friars and ignorant pilgrims carried a miserable account of what was passing in the world from monastery to monastery. What doctor had last disputed on the Peripatetic philosophy at some university, or what new heresy had last appeared, not only comprised the whole of their literary intelligence, but was delivered with little accuracy, and received with as little attention. While this thick cloud of mental darkness overspread the western world, was Don Henry prince of Portugal born, born to set mankind free from the feudal system, and to give to the whole world every advantage, every light that may possibly be diffused by the intercourse of unlimited commerce:

⁸ The impossibility of alteration in the religion of the Bramins, is an assertion against facts. The high antiquity and unadulterated sameness of their religion are impositions on Europe. For a clear demonstration of this, see the Inquiry, &c. at the end of the viith Lusiad.

⁹ See the above Inquiry, &c.

———For then from the ancient gloom emerg'd
The rising world of Trade, the genius, that,
Of Navigation, that in hopeless sloth
Had slumber'd on the vast Atlantic deep
For idle ages, starting, heard at last
The Lusitanian prince, who, heaven-inspir'd,
To love of useful glory rous'd mankind,
And in unhounded commerce mix'd the world.

Thomson.

In contrast to the melancholy view of human nature, sunk in barbarism and benighted with ignorance, let the present state of Europe be impartially estimated. Yet though the great increase of opulence and learning cannot be denied, there are some who assert, that virtue and happiness have as greatly declined. And the immense overflow of riches, from the East in particular, has been pronounced big with destruction to the British empire. Every thing human, it is true, has its dark as well as its bright side; but let these popular complaints be examined, and it will be found, that modern Europe, and the British empire in a very particular manner, have received the greatest and most solid advantages from the modern enlarged system of commerce. The magic of the old romances, which could make the most withered, deformed hag appear as the most beautiful virgin, is every day verified in popular declamation. Ancient days are there pointed in the most amiable simplicity, and the modern in the most odious colours. Yet what man of fortune in England now lives in that stupendous gross luxury, which every day was exhibited in the Gothic castles of the old chieftains? Four or five hundred knights and squires in the domestic retinue of a warlike earl were not uncommon, nor was the pomp of embroidery inferior to the profuse waste of their tables; in both instances unequalled by all the mad excesses of the present age.

While the baron thus lived in all the wild glare of Gothic luxury, agriculture was almost totally neglected, and his meaner vassals fared harder, infinitely less comfortably, than the meanest industrious labourers of England do now. Where the lands are uncultivated, the peasants, ill-clothed, ill-lodged, and poorly fed, pass their miserable days in sloth and filth, totally ignorant of every advantage, of every comfort which Nature lays at their feet. He who passes from the trading towns and cultured fields of England, to those remote villages of Scotland or Ireland which claim this description, is astonished at the comparative wretchedness of their destitute inhabitants; but few consider that these villages only exhibit a view of what Europe was, ere the spirit of commerce diffused the blessings which naturally flow from her improvements. In the Hebrides the failure of a harvest almost depopulates an island. Having little or no traffic to purchase grain, numbers of the young and hale betake themselves to the continent in quest of employment and food, leaving a few, less adventurous, behind, to beget a new race, the heirs of the same fortune. Yet, from the same cause, from the want of traffic, the kingdom of England has often felt more dreadful effects than these. Even in the days when her Henries and Edwards plumed themselves with the trophies of France, how often has famine spread all her horrors over city and village! Our modern histories neglect this characteristic feature of ancient days; but the rude chronicles of these ages inform us that three or four times, in almost every reign of continuance, was England thus visited. The failure of one crop was then severely felt, and two bad harvests together were almost insupportable. But commerce has now opened another scene, has armed government with the happiest power that can be exerted by the rulers of a nation; the power to prevent every extremity¹⁰ which may possibly arise from bad harvests; extremities, which, in former ages, were esteemed more dreadful visitations of the wrath of Heaven, than the pestilence itself. Yet modern London is not so certainly defended against the latter, its ancient visitor in almost every reign, as the commonwealth by the means of commerce, under a just and humane government, is secured against the ravages of the former. If, from these great outlines of the happiness enjoyed by a commercial over an uncommercial nation, we turn our eyes to the manners, the advantages will be found no less in favour of the civilized.

Whoever is inclined to declaim on the vices of the present age, let him read, and be convinced, that the Gothic ages were less virtuous. If the spirit of chivalry prevented effeminacy, it was the foster father of a ferocity of manners now happily unknown. Rapacity, avarice, and effeminacy, are the vices ascribed to the increase of commerce; and in some degree, it must be confessed, they follow her steps. Yet infinitely more dreadful, as every palatinate in Europe often felt, were the effects of the two first under the feudal lords, than possibly can be experienced under any system of trade. The virtues and vices of human nature are the same in every age: they only receive different modifications, and lie dormant or are awaked into action under different circumstances. The feudal lord had it infinitely more in his power to be rapacious than the merchant. And whatever avarice may attend the trader, his intercourse with the rest of mankind lifts him greatly above that brutish ferocity which actuates the savage, often the rustic, and in general characterizes the ignorant part of mankind. The abolition of the feudal system, a system of absolute slavery, and that equality of mankind which affords the protection of property, and every other incitement to industry, are the glorious gifts which the spirit of commerce, called forth by prince Henry of Portugal, has bestowed upon Europe in general; and, as if directed by the manes of his mother, a daughter of England, upon the British empire in particular. In the vice of effeminacy alone, perhaps, do we exceed our ancestors; yet even here we have infinitely the advantage over them. The brutal ferocity of former ages is now lost, and the general mind is humanized. The savage breast is the native soil of revenge; a vice, of all others, ingratitude excepted, peculiarly stamped with the character of Hell. But the mention of this was reserved for the character of the savages of Europe. The savage of every country is implacable when injured, but among some, revenge has its measure. When an American Indian is murdered, his kindred pursue the murderer, and soon as blood has atoned for blood, the wilds of America hear the hostile parties join in their mutual lamentations over the dead; and, as an oblivion of malice, the murdered and the murderer are buried together. But the measure of revenge, never to be full, was left for the demi-savages of Europe. The vassals of the feudal lord entered into his quarrels with the most inexorable rage. Just or unjust was no consideration of theirs. It was a family feud; no further inquiry was made; and from age to age the parties, who never injured each other, breathed nothing but mutual rancour and revenge. And actions, suitable to this horrid spirit, every where confessed its virulent influence. Such were the late days of Europe, admired by the ignorant for the innocence of manners. Retalment of injury indeed is natural; and there is a degree which is honest, and, though warm, far from inhuman. But if it is the hard task of humanized virtue to preserve the feeling of an injury unmixed with the slightest criminal wish of revenge, how impossible is it for the savage to attain the dignity of forgiveness, the greatest ornament of human nature! As in individuals, a virtue will rise into a vice, generosity into blind profusion, and even mercy into criminal lenity, so civilized manners will lead the opulent into effeminacy. But let it be considered, this consequence is by no means the certain result of civilization. Civilization, on the contrary, provides the most effectual preventive of this evil. Where classical literature prevails, the manly spirit which it breathes must be diffused. Whenever frivolousness predominates, when refinement degenerates into whatever enervates the mind, literary ignorance is sure to complete the effeminate character. A mediocrity of virtues and of talents is the lot of the great majority of mankind; and even this mediocrity, if cultivated by a liberal education, will infallibly secure its possessor against those excesses of effeminacy which are really culpable. To be of plain manners, it is not necessary to be a clown, or to wear coarse clothes; nor is it necessary to lie on the ground and feed like the savage, to be truly manly. The beggar who, behind the hedge, divides his offals with his dog, has often more of the real sensualist than he who dines at an elegant table. Nor need we hesitate to assert, that he who, unable to preserve a manly elegance of manners, degenerates into the petit maître, would have been, in any age or condition, equally insignificant and worthless. Some, when they talk of the debauchery of the present age, seem to think that the former were all innocents. But this is ignorance of human nature. The debauchery of a barbarous age is gross and brutal; that of a gloomy superstitious one, secret, excessive, and murderous; that of a more polished one, not to make an apology, much happier for the fair sex¹¹; and certainly in no circumstance so big with political unhappiness. If one disease has been imported from Spanish America, the most valuable medicines have likewise been brought from these regions; and distempers, which were thought invincible by our forefathers, are now cured. If the luxuries of the Indies usher disease to our tables, the consequence is not unknown; the wise and the temperate receive no injury; and intemperance has been the destroyer of mankind in every age. The opulence of ancient Rome produced a luxury of manners which proved fatal to that mighty empire. But the effeminate sensualists of those ages were men of no intellectual cultivation. The enlarged ideas, the generous and manly feelings inspired by liberal study, were utterly unknown to them. Unformed by that wisdom which arises from science and true philosophy, they were gross barbarians, dressed in the mere outward tinsel of civilization¹². Where the enthusiasm of military honour characterizes the rank of gentlemen, that nation will rise into empire. But no sooner does conquest give a continued security, than the mere soldier degenerates; and the old veterans are soon succeeded by a new generation, illiterate as their fathers, but destitute of their virtues and experience. Polite literature not only humanizes the heart, but also wonderfully strengthens and enlarges the mind. Moral and political philosophy are its peculiar provinces, and are never happily cultivated without its assistance. But where ignorance characterizes the body of the nobility, the most insipid dissipation, and the very idleness and effeminacy of luxury, are sure to follow. Titles and family are then the only merit; and the few men of business who surround the throne, have it then in their power to aggrandize themselves by riveting the chains of slavery. A stately grandeur is preserved, but it is only outward; all is decayed within, and on the first storm the weak fabric falls to the dust. Thus rose and thus fell the empire of Rome, and the much wider one of Portugal. Though the increase of wealth did indeed contribute to that corruption of manners which unerved the Portuguese, certain it is, the wisdom of legislature might have prevented every evil which Spain and Portugal have experienced from their acquisitions in the two Indies. Every evil which they have suffered from their acquisitions arose, as shall be hereafter demonstrated, from their general ignorance, an ignorance which rendered them unable to investigate, or apprehend, even the first principles of civil and commercial philosophy. And what other than the total eclipse of their glory could be expected from a nobility, rude and unlettered as those of Portugal are described by the author of the Lusiad, a court and nobility, who scaled the truth of all his complaints against them, by suffering that great man, the light of their age, to die in an almshouse! What but the fall of their state could be expected from barbarians like these! Nor can the annals of mankind produce one instance of the fall of empire, where the character of the grandees was other than that ascribed to his countrymen by Camoens.

¹² The degeneracy of the Roman literature preceded the fate of that empire, and the reason is obvious. The men of fortune grew frivolous, and superficial in every branch of knowledge, and were therefore unable to hold the reins of empire. The degeneracy of literary taste is, therefore, the surest proof of the general declension.

THE HISTORY OF THE DISCOVERY OF INDIA.

NO lesson can be of greater national importance than the history of the rise and the fall of a commercial empire. The view of what advantages were acquired, and of what might have been still added; the means by which such empire might have been continued, and the errors by which it was lost, are as particularly conspicuous in the naval and commercial history of Portugal, as if Providence had intended to give a lasting example to mankind; a chart, where the course of the safe voyage is pointed out, and where the shelves and rocks, and the seasons of tempest, are discovered, and foretold.

The history of Portugal, as a naval and commercial power, begins with the enterprises of prince Henry. But as the improvements introduced by this great man, and the completion of his designs, are intimately connected with the political state of his age and country, a concise view of the progress of the power, and of the character, of that kingdom, will be necessary to elucidate the history of the revival of commerce, and the subject of the Lusiad.

During the centuries, when the effeminated Roman provinces of Europe were desolated by the irruptions of northern or Scythian barbarians, the Saracens, originally of the same race, a wandering banditti of Asiatic Scythia, spread the same horrors of brutal conquest over the finest countries of the eastern world. The northern conquerors of the finer provinces of Europe embraced the Christian religion as professed by the monks, and, contented with the luxuries of their new settlements, their military spirit soon declined. Their ancient brothers, the Saracens, on the other hand, having embraced the religion of Mohammed, their rage of war received every addition which may possibly be inspired by religious enthusiasm. Not only the spoils of the vanquished, but their beloved Paradise itself, were to be obtained by their sabres, by extending the faith of their prophet, by force of arms and usurpation of dominion. Strengthened and inspired by a commission which they esteemed divine, the rapidity of their conquests far exceeded those of the Goths and Vandals. A great majority of the inhabitants of every country which they subdued, embraced their religion, imbibed their principles, united in their views; and the professors of Mohammedism became the most formidable combination that ever was leagued together against the rest of mankind. Morocco and the adjacent countries, at this time amazingly populous, had now received the doctrines of the Koran, and incorporated with the Saracens. And the infidel arms spread slaughter and desolation from the south of Spain to Italy and the islands of the Mediterranean. All the rapine and carnage committed by the Gothic conquerors were now amply returned on their less warlike posterity. In Spain, and the province now called Portugal, the Mohammedans erected powerful kingdoms, and their lust of conquest threatened destruction to every Christian power. But a romantic military spirit revived in Europe, under the auspices of Charlemagne. Several religious military orders were established. Celibacy, the study of religion, and the exercise of arms, were the conditions of their vow, and the defence of their country and of the faith, their ambition and sole purpose. He who fell in battle was honoured and envied as a martyr. And most wonderful victories crowned the ardour of these religious warriors. The Mohammedans, during the reign of Charlemagne, made a most formidable irruption into Europe, and France in particular felt the weight of their fury; but the honour which was paid to the knights who wore the badge of the cross, drew the adventurous youth of every Christian power to the standards of that political monarch, and in fact (a circumstance however neglected by historians) gave birth to the Crusades, the beginning of which, in propriety, ought to be dated from his reign. Few indeed are the historians of this age, but enough remain to prove that though the writers of the old romance have greatly disguised it, though they have given full room to the wildest flights of imagination, and have added the inexhaustible machinery of magic to the adventures of their heroes, yet the origin of their fictions was founded on historical facts¹. And, however this period may thus resemble the fabulous ages of Greece, certain it is, that an Orlando, a Rinaldo, a Rugero, and other celebrated names in romance, acquired great honour in the wars which were waged against the Saracens, the invaders of Europe. In these romantic wars, by which the power of the Mohammedans was checked, several centuries elapsed, when Alonzo, king of Castile, apprehensive that the whole force of the Mohammedans of Spain and Morocco was ready to fall upon him, prudently imitated the conduct of Charlemagne. He availed himself of the spirit of chivalry, and demanded leave of Philip I. of France, and of other princes, that volunteers from their dominions might be allowed to distinguish themselves under his banners against the infidels. His desire was no sooner known, than a brave romantic army thronged to his standards, and Alonzo was victorious. Honours and endowments were distributed among the champions, and to one of the bravest of them, to Henry², a younger son of the duke of Burgundy, he gave his daughter Teresa in marriage, with the sovereignty of the countries south of Galicia in dowry, commissioning him to extend his dominions by the expulsion of the Moors. Henry, who reigned by the title of count, improved every advantage which offered. The two rich provinces of Entre Minho e Douro, and Trallos Montes, yielded to his arms; great part of Beira was also subdued; and the Moorish king of Lamego became his tributary. Many thousands of Christians, who had lived in miserable subjection to the Moors, or in desolate independency on the mountains, took shelter under the generous protection of count Henry. Great numbers also of the Moors changed their religion, and chose rather to continue in the land where they were born, under a mild government, than be exposed to the severities and injustice of their native governors. And thus, on one of the most beautiful and fertile spots³ of the world, and in the finest climate, in consequence of a crusade⁴ against the Mohammedans, was established the sovereignty of Portugal, a sovereignty which in time spread its influence over the world, and gave a new face to the manners of nations.

Count Henry, after a successful reign, was succeeded by his infant son Don Alonzo-Henry, who, having surmounted several dangers which threatened his youth⁵, became the first of the Portuguese kings. In 1159 the Moors of Spain and Barbary united their forces to recover the dominions from which they had been driven by the Christians. According to the lowest accounts of the Portuguese writers, the army of the Moors amounted to 400,000; nor is this number incredible, when we consider what great armies they at other times brought to the field; and that at this time they came to take possession of the lands which they expected to conquer. Don Alonzo, however, with a very small army, gave them battle on the plains of Ourique, and, after a struggle of six hours, obtained a most glorious and complete victory⁶, and which was crowned with an event of the utmost importance. On the field of battle Don Alonzo was proclaimed king of Portugal by his victorious soldiers, and he in return conferred the rank of nobility on the whole army. But the constitution of the monarchy was not settled, nor was Alonzo invested with the regalia, till six years after this memorable day. The government the Portuguese had experienced under the Spaniards and Moors, and the advantages which they saw were derived by their own valour, had taught them a love of liberty, which was not to be complimented away in the joy of victory, or by the shouts of tumult. Alonzo himself understood their spirit too well to venture the least attempt to make himself a despotic monarch; nor did he discover the least inclination to destroy that bold consciousness of freedom which had enabled his army to conquer, and to elect him their sovereign. After six years spent in further victories, in extending and securing his dominions, he called an assembly of the prelates, nobility, and commons, to meet at Lamego. When the assembly opened, Alonzo appeared seated on the throne, but without any other mark of regal dignity. And ere he was crowned, the constitution of the state was settled, and eighteen statutes were solemnly confirmed by oath, as the charter of king and people⁷; statutes diametrically opposite to the ius divinum of kings, to the principles which inculcate and demand the unlimited passive obedience of the subject.

Conscious of what they owed to their own valour, the founders of the Portuguese monarchy transmitted to their heirs those generous principles of liberty which complete and adorn the martial charac-

4er. The ardour of the volunteer, an ardour unknown to the slave and the mercenary, added to the most romantic ideas of military glory, characterized the Portuguese under the reigns of their first monarchs. In almost continual wars with the Moors, this spirit, on which the existence of their kingdom depended, rose higher and higher; and the desire to extirpate Mohammedism, the principle which animated the wish of victory in every battle, seemed to take deeper root in every age. Such were the manners, and such the principles of the people who were governed by the successors of Alonzo the First; a succession of great men, who proved themselves worthy to reign over so military and enterprising a nation.

By a continued train of victories Portugal increased considerably in strength, and the Portuguese had the honour to drive the Moors from Europe. The invasions of these people were now required by successful expeditions into Africa. And such was the manly spirit of these ages, that the statutes of Lamego received additional articles in favour of liberty; a convincing proof that the general heroism of a people depends upon the principles of freedom. Alonzo IV.⁸ though not an amiable character, was perhaps the greatest warrior, politician, and monarch of his age. After a reign of military splendour he left his throne to his son Pedro, who from his inflexible justice was surnamed the Just, or, the Lover of Justice. The ideas of equity and literature were now diffused by this great prince⁹, who was himself a polite scholar, and most accomplished gentleman: and Portugal began to perceive the advantages of cultivated talents, and to feel its superiority over the barbarous politics of the ignorant Moors. The great Pedro, however, was succeeded by a weak prince, and the heroic spirit of the Portuguese seemed to exist no more under his son Fernando, surnamed the Careless.

But the general character of the people was too deeply impressed, to be obliterated by one inglorious reign; and under John I.¹⁰ all the virtues of the Portuguese shone forth with redoubled lustre. Happy for Portugal, his father bestowed a most excellent education upon this prince, which added to, and improving, his great natural talents, rendered him one of the greatest of monarchs. Conscious of the superiority which his own liberal education gave him, he was assiduous to bestow the same advantages upon his children; and he himself often became their preceptor in the branches of science and useful knowledge. Fortunate in all his affairs, he was most of all fortunate in his family. He had many sons, and he lived to see them men, men of parts and of action, whose only emulation was to show affection to his person, and to support his administration by their great abilities.

There is something exceedingly pleasing in the history of a family which shows human nature in its most exalted virtues and most amiable colours; and the tribute of veneration is spontaneously paid to the father who distinguishes the different talents of his children, and places them in the proper lines of action. All the sons of John excelled in military exercises, and in the literature of their age; Don Edward and Don Pedro¹¹ were particularly educated for the cabinet; and the mathematical genius of Don Henry, one of his youngest sons, received every encouragement which a king and a father could give, to ripen it into perfection and public utility.

History was well known to prince Henry, and his turn of mind peculiarly enabled him to make political observations upon it. The wealth and power of ancient Tyre and Carthage showed him what a maritime nation might hope; and the flourishing colonies of the Greeks were the frequent topic of his conversation. Where the Grecian commerce, confined as it was, extended its influence, the deserts became cultivated fields, cities rose, and men were drawn from the woods and caverns to unite in society. The Romans on the other hand, when they destroyed Carthage, buried, in her ruins, the fountain of civilisation, of improvement and opulence. They extinguished the spirit of commerce; the agriculture of the conquered nations, Britannia¹² alone, perhaps, excepted, was totally neglected. And thus, while ⁹ For anecdotes of this monarch, see the note to book iii. ver. 1118.

¹² The honour of this is due to Agricola. He employed his legions in cutting down forests and in clearing marshes. And for several ages after his time, the Romans drew immense quantities of wheat from their British province.

the luxury of Rome consumed the wealth of her provinces, her uncommercial policy dried up the sources of its continuance. The egregious errors of the Romans, who perceived not the true use of their distant conquests, and the inexhaustible fountains of opulence which Phœnicia had established in her colonies, instructed prince Henry what gifts to bestow upon his country, and, in the result, upon the whole world. Nor were the inestimable advantages of commerce the sole motives of Henry. All the ardour which the love of his country could awake, conspired to stimulate the natural turn of his genius for the improvement of navigation.

As the kingdom of Portugal had been wrested from the Moors and established by conquest, so its existence still depended on the superiority of the force of arms; and, ere the birth of Henry, the superiority of the Portuguese navies had been of the utmost consequence to the protection of the state. Such were the circumstances which united to inspire the designs of Henry, all which were powerfully enforced and invigorated by the religion of that prince. The desire to extirpate Mohammedism was patriotism in Portugal. It was the principle which gave birth to, and supported, their monarchy: their kings avowed it; and prince Henry, the piety of whose heart cannot be questioned, always professed, that to propagate the gospel was the great purpose of his designs and enterprises. And however this, in the event, was neglected¹³, certainly is, that the same principles inspired, and were always professed by king Emmanuel, under whom the eastern world was discovered by Gama.

The crusades to rescue the Holy Land from the infidels, which had already been, however, disregarded by historians, of the greatest political service to Spain and Portugal¹⁴, began now to have some effect upon the commerce of Europe. The Hans Towns had received charters of liberty, and had united together for the protection of their trade against the numerous pirates of the Baltic. A people of Italy, known by the name of the Lombards, had opened a lucrative traffic with the ports of Egypt, from whence they imported into Europe the riches of the east; and Bruges in Flanders, the mart between them and the Hans Towns, was, in consequence, surrounded with the best agriculture of these ages¹⁵: a certain proof of the dependence of agriculture upon the extent of commerce. Yet though these gleams of light, as morning stars, began to appear; it was not the gross multitude, it was only the eye of a Henry which could perceive what they prognosticated, and it was only a genius like his which could prevent them from again setting in the depths of night. The Hans Towns were liable to be buried in the vicissitudes of a tyrant, and the trade with Egypt was exceedingly insecure and precarious, Europe was still enveloped in the dark mists of ignorance, and though the mariner's compass was invented before the birth of Henry, it was improved to no naval advantage. Traffic still crept, in an infant state, along the coasts, nor was the construction of ships adapted for other voyages. One successful tyrant might have overwhelmed the system and extinguished the spirit of commerce, for it stood on a much narrower and much feebler basis, than in the days of Phœnician and Grecian colonization. Yet these mighty fabrics, many centuries before, had been swallowed up in the demolitions of unpolitical conquest. A broader and more permanent foundation of commerce than the world had yet seen, an universal basis, was yet wanting to bless mankind, and Henry duke of Visco was born to give it.

On purpose to promote his designs, prince Henry was by his father stationed the commander in chief of the Portuguese forces in Africa. He had already, in 1412, three years before the reduction of Ceuta¹⁶, sent a ship to make discoveries on the Barbary coast. Cape Nam¹⁷, as its name intimates, was then the ne plus ultra of European navigation; the ship sent by Henry however passed it sixty ¹³ Neglected in the idea of the commanders; the idea of Henry however was greatly fulfilled. For the dominion of the Portuguese in the Indian sea cut the sinews of the Egyptian and other Mohammedan powers. But of this afterwards.

¹⁴ See the note on the crusades, Lusid vii.

leagues, and reached Cape Bojador. Encouraged by this beginning, the prince, while he was in Africa, acquired whatever information the most intelligent of the Moors of Fez and Morocco could give. About a league and one half from the Cape of St. Vincent, in the kingdom of Algarve, Don Henry had observed a small but commodious situation for a sea-port town. On this spot, supposed the Promontorium Sacrum of the Romans, he built his town of Sagres, by which the best planned and fortified of any in Portugal. Here, where the view of the ocean, says Faria, inspired his hopes and endeavours, he erected his arsenals, and built and harboured his ships. And here, leaving the temporary bustle and cares of the state to his father and brothers, he retired like a philosopher from the world, on purpose to render his studies of the utmost importance to its happiness. Having received all the light which could be discovered in Africa, he continued unwearied in his mathematical and geographical studies; the art of ship-building received very great improvement under his direction, and the truth of his ideas of the structure of the terraqueous globe is now confirmed. He it was who first suggested the use of the compass, and of longitude and latitude in navigation, and how these might be ascertained by astronomical observations; suggestions and discoveries which would have held no second place among the conjectures of a Bacon, or the improvements of a Newton. Naval adventurers were now invited from all parts to the town of Sagres, and in 1481 Juan Gonzalez Zarco and Tristram Vaz set sail on an expedition of discovery, the circumstances of which give us a striking picture of the state of navigation, as it was now modelled by the genius of Henry.

Cape Bojador, so named from its extent¹⁸, runs about forty leagues to the westward, and for about six leagues off land there is a most violent current, which, dashing upon the shelves, makes a tempestuous sea. This was deemed impassable, for it was not considered, that by standing out to the ocean the current might be avoided. To pass this formidable cape was the commission of Zarco and Vaz, who were also ordered to proceed as far as they could to discover the African coast, which, according to the information given to Henry by the Moors and Arabs, extended at least to the equinoctial line¹⁹. Zarco and Vaz, however, lost their course in a storm, and were driven on a little island, which, in the joy of their deliverance, they named Puerto Santo, or the Holy Haven. Nor was prince Henry, on their return, less joyful of their discovery, than they had been of their escape: a striking proof of the miserable state of navigation; for this island is only about 160 leagues, the voyage now of three or four days in moderate weather, from the promontory of Sagres.

The discoverers of Puerto Santo, accompanied by Bartholomew Perestrello, were with three ships sent out on further trial. Perestrello, having sowed some seeds, and left some cattle on Holy Haven²⁰, returned to Portugal. But Zarco and Vaz directing their course southward, in 1419, perceived something like a cloud on the water, and, sailing toward it, discovered an island covered with wood, which from thence they named Madeira²¹. And this rich and beautiful island, which soon yielded a considerable revenue, was the first reward of the enterprises of prince Henry.

If the duke of Visco's liberal ideas of establishing colonies, those notions of a commercial state, or his views of African and Indian commerce, were too refined to strike the gross multitude; yet other advan-

¹⁹ It was known that the Arabian sea washed the eastern side of Africa: it was surmised therefore that a southern promontory bounded that continent. And certain it is, from the concurrent testimony of all the writers who treat of Don Henry's discoveries, that Africa was supposed to terminate near to the equinoctial line. The account of Marco Paolo's map, which, it is said, placed the southern cape in its proper latitude, seems to have been propagated on purpose to discredit prince Henry's reputation. The story stands thus: Anthony Galvin relates, that Fran. de Sousa Tavorres told him that Don Ferdinand told him that in 1296, he found, in the monastery of Acobaga, a chart of Africa, 120 years old, which was said to have been copied from one at Venice, which also was believed to have been copied from one of Marco Paolo, which, according to Ramusius, marked the Cape of Good Hope. Marco Paolo is said to have travelled into India and China in the fourteenth century.

ages resulting from his designs, one would conclude, were self-evident. Nature calls upon Portugal to be a maritime power, and her naval superiority over the Moors, was, in the time of Henry, the surest defence of her existence as a kingdom. Yet though all his labours tended to establish that naval superiority on the surest basis, though even the religion of the age added its authority to the clearest political principles in favour of Henry; yet were his enterprises and his expected discoveries derided with all the insolence of ignorance, and the bitterness of popular clamour. Barren deserts like Libya, it was said, were all that could be found, and a thousand disadvantages, drawn from these data, were foreseen and foretold. The great mind and better knowledge of Henry, however, were not thus to be shaken. Though twelve years from the discovery of Madeira had elapsed in unsuccessful endeavours to carry his navigation further, he was now more happy; for one of his captains, named Galianez, in 1434, passed the Cape of Bojador, till then invincible; an action, says Faria, in the common opinion, not inferior to the labours of Hercules.

Galianez, the next year, accompanied by Gonzalez Baldaya, carried his discoveries many leagues farther. Having put two burtheners on shore to discover the face of the country, the adventurers, after riding several hours, saw nineteen men armed with javelins. The natives fled, and the two horsemen pursued, till one of the Portuguese, being wounded, lost the first blood that was sacrificed to the new system of commerce. A small beginning, a very small streamlet, some perhaps may exclaim, but which soon swelled into oceans, and deluged the eastern and western worlds. Let such philosophers, however, be desired to point out the design of public utility, which has been unpolliuted by the depravity of the human passions. To suppose that Heaven itself could give an institution which could not be perverted, and to suppose no previous alteration in human nature, is contradictory in proposition; for as human nature now exists, power cannot be equally possessed by all, and whenever the selfish or vicious passions predominate, that power will certainly be abused. The cruelties therefore of Cortez, and that more horrid barbarian Pizarro^m, are no more to be charged upon Don Henry, and Columbus, than the villanies of the Jesuits and the horrors of the Inquisition are to be ascribed to him, whose precepts are summed up in the great command. To do to your neighbour as you would wish your neighbour to do to you. But if it is still alleged that he who plans a discovery ought to foresee the miseries which the vicious will engraft upon his enterprise, let the objector be told, that the miseries are uncertain, while the advantages are real and sure; and that the true philosopher will not confine his eye to the Spanish campaigns in Mexico and Peru, but will extend his prospect to all the inestimable benefits, all the improvements of laws, opinions, and manners, which have been introduced by the interposse of universal commerce.

In 1440 Anthony Gonzalez brought some Moors prisoners to Lisbon. These he took two and forty leagues beyond Cape Bojador, and in 1443 he returned to Africa with his captives. One Moor escaped, ^m Some eminent writers, both at home and abroad, have of late endeavoured to soften the character of Cortez, and have wined the necessity of war for the slaughters he committed. These authors have also greatly softened the horrid features of the Mexicans. If one, however, would trace the true character of Cortez and the Americans, he must have recourse to the numerous Spanish writers, who were either witnesses of the first wars, or soon after travelled in those countries. In these he will find many anecdotes which afford a light not to be found in our modernised histories. In these it will be found, that Cortez set out to take gold by force, and not by establishing any system of commerce with the natives, the only just reason of effecting a settlement in a foreign country. He was naked by various states, what commodities or drugs he wanted, and was promised abundant supply. He and his Spaniards, he answered, had a disease at their hearts, which nothing but gold could cure; and he received intelligence, that Mexico abounded with it. Under pretence of a friendly conference, he made Montezuma his prisoner, and ordered him to pay tribute to Charles V. Immense sums were paid, but the demand was boundless. Tumults ensued. Cortez displayed amazing generalship, and some millions of those, who in enumerating to the Spaniards the greatness of Montezuma, boasted that his yearly sacrifices consumed 20,000 men, were now sacrificed to the disease of Cortez's heart. Pizarro, however, in the barbarity of his soul far exceeded him. There is a very bright side of the character of Cortez. If we forget that his arrival was the cause of a most unjust and most bloody war, in every other respect he will appear as one of the greatest of heroes. But Pizarro is a character completely detestable, destitute of every spark of generosity. He massacred the Peruvians, he said, because they were barbarians, and he himself could not read. Atabalipa, amazed at the art of reading, got a Spaniard to write the word Dios (the Spanish for God) on his finger. On trying if the Spaniards agreed in what it signified, he discovered that Pizarro could not read. And Pizarro, in the revenge of the contempt he perceived in the face of Atabalipa, ordered the prince to be tried for his life, for having concubines, and being an idolater. Atabalipa was condemned to be burned; but on submitting to baptism, he was only hanged.

from him, but ten blacks of Guinea and a considerable quantity of gold dust were given in ransom for two others. A rivulet at the place of landing was named by Gonzalez, Rio del Oro, or the River of Gold. And the islands of Adeget, Arguim, and de las Garças, were now discovered.

These Guinea blacks, the first ever seen in Portugal, and the gold dust, excited other passions beside admiration. A company was formed at Lagos, under the auspices of prince Henry, to carry on a traffic with the new-discovered countries; and as the Portuguese considered themselves in a state of continual hostility with the Moors, about two hundred of these people, inhabitants of the islands of Nar and Tider, in 1444, were brought prisoners to Portugal. This was soon revenged. Gonzalo de Cintra was the next year attacked by the Moors, fourteen leagues beyond Rio del Oro, where with seven of his men he was killed.

These hostile proceedings displeased prince Henry, and in 1446 Anthony Gonzalez and two other captains were sent to enter into a treaty of peace and traffic with the natives of Rio del Oro, and also to attempt their conversion. But these proposals were rejected by the barbarians, one of whom, however, came voluntarily to Portugal; and Juan Fernandez remained with the natives, to observe their manners and the products of the country. In the year following, Fernandez was found in good health, and brought home to Portugal. The account he gave of the country and people affords a striking instance of the misery of barbarians. The land, an open, barren, sandy plain, where the wandering natives were guided in their journeys by the stars and sights of birds; their food, milk, lizards, locusts, and such herbs as the soil produced without culture; and their only defence from the scorching heat of the Sun some miserable tents, which they pitched, as occasion required, on the burning sands.

In 1447 upwards of thirty ships followed the route of traffic which was now opened; and John de Castilla obtained the infamy to stand the first on the list of those names whose villainies have disgraced the spirit of commerce, and afforded the loudest complaints against the progress of navigation. Dissatisfied with the value of his cargo, he ungratefully seized twenty of the natives of Gomera, (one of the Canaries,) who had assisted him, and with whom he was in friendly alliance, and brought them as slaves to Portugal. But prince Henry resented this outrage, and, having given them some valuable presents of clothes, restored the captives to freedom and their native country.

The conversion and reduction of the Canaries was also this year attempted; but Spain having claimed a right to these islands²², the expedition was discontinued. In the Canary islands was found a feudal custom; the chief man or governor was gratified with the first night of every bride in his district.

In 1448 Fernando Alonso was sent ambassador to the king of Cabo Verde with a treaty of trade and conversion, which was defeated at that time by the treachery of the natives. In 1449 the Azores were discovered by Gonzalo Vello, and the coast sixty leagues beyond Cape Verde was visited by the fleets of Henry. It is also certain that some of his commanders passed the equinoctial line. It was the custom of his sailors to leave his motto, TALENT DE BIEN FAIRE, wherever they came; and in 1495 Loaysa, a Spanish captain, found that device carved on the bark of a tree in the isle of St. Matthew, in the second degree of south latitude.

Prince Henry had now with the most inflexible perseverance prosecuted his discoveries for upwards of forty years. His father, John I. concurred with him in his views, and gave him every assistance; his brother king Edward, during his short reign, was the same as his father had been; nor was the eleven years regency of his brother Don Pedro less suspicious to him²³. But the misunderstanding between Pedro and his nephew Alonso V. who took upon him the reins of government in his seventeenth year, retarded the designs of Henry, and gave him much unhappiness²⁴. At his town of Sagrez, from whence he had not moved for many years, except when called to court on some emergency of state, Don Henry, now in his sixty-seventh year, yielded to the stroke of fate, in the year of our Lord 1463, gratified with the certain prospect, that the route to the eastern world would one day crown the enterprises to which he had given birth. He had the happiness to see the naval superiority of his country over the Moors established on the most solid basis, its trade greatly upon the increase, and, what he esteemed his greatest happiness, he flattered himself that he had given a mortal wound to Mohammedism, and had opened the door to an universal propagation of Christianity and the civilization of mankind. And to him, as to their primary author, are due all the inestimable advantages which ever have flowed, or will flow, from the discovery of the greatest part of Africa, of the East and West Indies. Every improvement in the state and manners of these countries, or whatever country may be yet discovered, is strictly due to him; nor is the difference between the present state of Europe and the monkish age in which he was born, less the result of his genius and toils. What is an Alexander²⁶ crowned with trophies at the head of his army, compared with a Henry contemplating the ocean from his window on the rock of Sagres! The one suggests the idea of the evil demon, the other of a tutelary angel.

²² Some time before this period, John de Betapouze, a Frenchman, under the king of Castile, had made a settlement in the Canaries, which had been discovered, it is said, about 1340, by some Biscayners.

From the year 1448, when Alonzo V. assumed the power of government, till the end of his reign in 1471, little progress was made in maritime affairs, and Cape Catharine only was added to the former discoveries. But under his son John II. the designs of prince Henry were prosecuted with renewed vigour. In 1481 the Portuguese built a fort on the Golden Coast, and the king of Portugal took the title of Lord of Guinea. Bartholomew Diaz, in 1486, reached the river, which he named del Infante, on the eastern side of Africa; but deterred by the storms of that region from proceeding farther, on his return he had the happiness to be discoverer of the promontory, unknown for many ages, which bounds the south of Africa. This, from the storms he there encountered, he named the Cape of Tempests; but John, elated with the promise of India, which this discovery, as he justly deemed, included, gave it the name of the Cape of Good Hope. The arts and valour of the Portuguese had now made a great impression on the minds of the Africans. The king of Congo, a dominion of great extent, sent the sons of some of his principal officers to be instructed in arts and religion; and ambassadors from the king of Benin requested teachers to be sent to his kingdom. On the return of these his subjects, the king and queen of Congo, with 100,000 of their people, were baptized. An ambassador also arrived from the Christian emperor of Abyssinia, and Pedro de Covillam and Alonzo de Payva were sent by land to penetrate into the east, that they might acquire whatever intelligence might facilitate the desired navigation to India. Covillam and Payva parted at Tora in Arabia, and took different routes. The former having visited Comnor, Calicut, and Goa in India, returned to Grand Cairo, where he heard of the death of his companion. Here also he met the rabbi Abraham of Beja, who was employed for the same purpose by king John. Covillam sent the rabbi home with an account of what countries he had seen, and he himself proceeded to Ormuz and Ethiopia; but, as Camoëns expresses it,

Men, whose genius led them to maritime affairs, began now to be possessed by an ardent ambition to distinguish themselves; and the famous Columbus offered his service to the king of Portugal. Every one knows the discoveries of this great adventurer, but his history is generally misunderstood²⁷. It is by some believed that his ideas of the sphere of the Earth gave birth to his opinion that there must ²⁶ It has been said by some French writers, that the conquests of Alexander were intended to civilize, and unite the world in one grand interest; and that for this great purpose he built cities and established colonies in Asia. Those, however, who have studied the true character of that vain-glorious conqueror, the wild delirium of his ambition, and his as wild fondness of Asiatic manners, will allow this refinement of design to hold no place in the motives of the pretended son of Jupiter.

²⁷ Greatly misunderstood, even by the ingenious author of the Account of the European Settlements in America. Having mentioned the barbarous state of Europe; "Mathematical learning," says he, "was little valued or cultivated. The true system of the Heavens was not dreamed of. There was no knowledge at all of the real form of the Earth, and in general the ideas of mankind were not extended beyond their sensible horizon. In this state of affairs Christopher Columbus, a native of Genoa, undertook to extend the boundaries which ignorance had given to the world. This man's design arose from the just idea he had formed of the figure of the Earth."—But this is all a mistake. Nor is the author of the Histoire Philosophique, &c. less unhappy by the common opinion of Columbus, he has thus pompously clothed it in the dress of imagination.—Un homme obscur, says he, plus avancé que son siècle, &c.—thus literally. "An obscure man, more advanced than his contemporaries in the knowledge of astronomy and navigation, proposed to Spain, happy in her internal dominion, to aggrandize herself abroad. Christopher Columbus felt, as if by instinct, that there must be another continent, and that he was to discover it. The antipodes, treated by reason itself as a chimera, and by superstition as error and impiety, were in the eyes of this man of genius an incontestable truth. Full of this idea, one of the grandest which could enter the human mind, he proposed, &c.—The ministers of this princess (Isabel of Spain) esteemed as a visionary, a man who pretended to discover a world.—" But be an immense unknown continent in the east, such as America is now known to be; and that his proposals were to go in search of it. But the simple truth is, that Columbus, who, as we have certain evidence, acquired his skill in navigation among the Portuguese, could be no stranger to the design long meditated in that kingdom, of discovering a novel route to India, which they endeavoured to find by compassing the coast of Africa. According to ancient geographers and the opinion of that age, India was supposed to be the next land to the west of Spain. And the idea of discovering a western passage to the east, is due to the genius of Columbus; but no more: to discover India and the adjacent islands of spices, already famous over all Europe, was every where the avowed and sole idea of Columbus. A proposal of this kind to the king of Portugal, whose fleets had already passed the Cape of Good Hope, and who esteemed the route to India as almost discovered, and in the power of his own subjects, could at the court of Lisbon expect no success. And the offered services of the foreigner were rejected, even with some degree of contempt. Columbus, however, met a more favourable reception from Ferdinand and Isabella, the king and queen of Castile. To interfere with the route, or discoveries, opened and enjoyed by another power, was at this time esteemed contrary to the laws of nations. Columbus, therefore, though the object was one, proposed, as Magalhaens afterwards did for the same reason, to steer the westward course; and having in 1492 discovered some western islands, in 1493, on his return to Spain, he put into the Tagus with great tokens of the riches of his discovery. Some of the Portuguese courtiers, the same ungenerous minds, perhaps, who advised the rejection of Columbus because he was a foreigner, proposed the assassination of that great man, thereby to conceal from Spain the advantages of his navigation. But John, though Columbus rather roughly upbraided him, looked upon him now with a generous regret, and dismissed him with honour. The king of Portugal, however, was alarmed, lest the discoveries of Columbus should interfere with those of his crews, and gave orders to equip a war fleet to protect his rights. But matters were adjusted by embassies, and that celebrated treaty by which Spain and Portugal divided the western and eastern worlds between themselves. The eastern half of the world was allotted for the Portuguese, and the western for the Spanish navigation. A line from pole to pole, drawn a hundred leagues to the westward of the Azores, was their boundary; and thus each nation had one hundred and eighty degrees, within which they might establish settlements and extend their discoveries: and a papal bull, which, for obvious reasons, prohibited the propagation of the gospel in these bounds by the subjects of any other state, confirmed this amicable and extraordinary treaty.

Soon after this, while the thoughts of king John were intent on the discovery of India, his preparations were interrupted by his death. But his earnest desires and great designs were inherited, together with his crown, by his cousin Emanuel. And in 1497, the year before Columbus made the voyage which discovered the mouth of the river Oronoko, Vasco de Gama sailed from the Tagus on the discovery of India.

This dream of discovering a world never entered the head of Columbus. And be it ours to restore his due honours to the prince of Portugal. By the most indubitable and concurrent testimony of all the Portuguese historians of this period, Henry had undertaken to extend the boundaries which ignorance had given to the world, and had extended them much beyond the sensible horizon, long ere Columbus appeared. Columbus indeed taught the Spaniards the use of longitude and latitude in navigation, but he himself learned these among the Portuguese. Every alteration here ascribed to Columbus, had almost fifty years before been effected by Henry. Even Henry's design of sailing to India was adopted by Columbus. It was every where his proposal. When he arrived in the West Indies, he thought he had found the Ophir of Solomon*, and thence these islands received their general name. And on his return he told John II. that he had been at the islands of India. When he landed in Cuba, he inquired for Cipango, the name of Japan, according to Marco Paolo, and by the mistake of the natives, who thought he said Cibao, he was informed of the richest mines of Hispaniola. And even on his fourth and last voyage in 1502, three years after Gama's return, he promised the king of Spain to find India by a westward passage. But though great discoveries rewarded his toils, his first and last purpose he never completed. It was reserved for Magalhaens to discover the westward route to the eastern world.

* Gomara and other Spanish writers relate, that, while Columbus lived in Madeira, a pilot, the only survivor of a ship's crew, died at his house. This pilot, they say, had been driven to the West Indies or America by tempest, and on his death-bed communicated the journal of his voyage to Columbus. But this story, as it stands at large, is involved in contradiction without proof, and is every where esteemed a fable of malice.

* And so deeply had ancient geography fixed this idea, that Sebastian Cabot's proposal to Henry VII. 1497, was to discover Cathay, and thence India, by the north-west. See Haklinit, tom. iii. p. 7. and Ramusius, Prefat. tom. iii.—Columbus endeavoured, first, to discover India directly by the west, and afterward, by the south-west.

* Peter Martyr (who lived at that time at the court of Spain). Dec. l. l. l.

Of this voyage, the subject of the Lusiad, many particulars are necessarily mentioned in the notes; we shall therefore only allude to those, but be more explicit on the others, which are omitted by Camoëns, in obedience to the rules of the epopœia.

Notwithstanding the full torrent of popular clamour against the undertaking, Emmanuel was determined to prosecute the views of prince Henry and John II. Three sloops of war and a store-ship manned with only 160 men were fitted out; for hostility was not the purpose of this humane expedition. Vasco de Gama, a gentleman of good family, who, in a war with the French, had given signal proofs of his naval skill, was commissioned admiral and general, and his brother Paul, for whom he bore the sincerest affection, with his friend Nicholas Coello, were at his request appointed to command under him. All the enthusiasm of desire to accomplish his end, joined with the greatest heroism, the quickest penetration, and coolest prudence, united to form the character of Gama. On his appointment to the command, he declared to the king that his mind had long aspired to this expedition. The king expressed great confidence in his prudence and honour, and gave him, with his own hand, the colours which he was to carry. On this banner, which bore the cross of the military order of Christ, Gama, with great enthusiasm to merit the honours bestowed upon him, took the oath of fidelity.

About four miles from Lisbon there is a chapel on the sea-side. To this, the day before their departure, Gama conducted the companions of his expedition. He was to encounter an ocean untried, and dreaded as unavigable; and he knew the force of the ties of religion on minds which are not inclined to dispute its authority. The whole night was spent in the chapel, in prayers for success, and in the rites of their devotion. On the next day, when the adventurers marched to the ships, the shore of Belem²⁰ presented one of the most solemn and affecting scenes perhaps recorded in history. The beach was covered with the inhabitants of Lisbon. A numerous procession of priests in their robes sang anthems and offered up invocations to Heaven. Every one beheld the adventurers as brave innocent men going to a dreadful execution, as rushing upon certain death; and the vast multitude caught the fire of devotion, and joined aloud in the prayers for success. The relations, friends, and acquaintance of the voyagers wept; all were affected; the sigh was general; Gama himself shed some manly tears on parting with his friends; but he hurried over the tender scene, and hastened aboard with all the alacrity of hope. Immediately he gave his sails to the wind; and so much affected were the many thousands who beheld his departure, that they remained immovable on the shore till the fleet, under full sail, vanished from their sight.

It was on the eighth of July when Gama left the Tagus. The flag ship was commanded by himself, the second by his brother, the third by Coello, and the store-ship by Gonçalo Nunio. Several interpreters, skilled in the Ethiopian, Arabic, and other oriental languages, went along with them. Ten malefactors, men of abilities, whose sentences of death were reversed, on condition of their obedience to Gama in whatever embassies or dangers among the barbarians he might think proper to employ them, were also on board. The fleet, favoured by the weather, passed the Canary and Cape de Verde islands; but had now to encounter other fortune; sometimes stopped by dead calms, but for the most part tost by tempests, which increased their violence and horrors as they proceeded to the south. Thus driven far to sea, they laboured through that wide ocean which surrounds St. Helena, in seas, says Faria, unknown to the Portuguese discoverers, none of whom had sailed so far to the west. From the 28th of July, the day they passed the isle of St. James, they had seen no shore; and now on November the 4th they were happily relieved by the sight of land. The fleet anchored in a large bay²¹, and Coello was sent in search of a river, where they might take in wood and fresh water. Having found one convenient for their purpose, the fleet made toward it; and Gama, whose orders were to acquaint himself with the manners of the people wherever he touched, ordered a party of his men to bring him some of the natives by force or stratagem. One they caught as he was gathering honey on the side of a mountain, and brought him to the ships. He expressed the greatest indifference for the gold and fine clothes which they showed him, but was greatly delighted with some glasses and little brass bells. These with great joy he accepted, and was set on shore; and soon after many of the blacks came for, and were gratified with the like trifles; and for which in return they gave great plenty of their best provisions. None of Gama's interpreters, however, could understand a word of their language, or receive any information of India: and the friendly intercourse between the fleet and the natives was soon interrupted by the imprudence of Veloso²², a young Portuguese, which occasioned a scuffle, wherein Gama's life was endangered. Gama and some others were on shore taking the altitude of the Sun, when, in consequence of Veloso's rashness, they were attacked by the blacks with great fury. Gama defended himself with an oar, and received a dart in his foot. Several others were likewise wounded, and they found their safety in retreat. The shot from the ships facilitated their escape; and Gama, esteeming it imprudent to waste his strength in attempts entirely foreign to the design of his voyage, weighed anchor, and steered in search of the extremity of Africa.

In this part of the voyage, says Oecrius, the heroism of Gama was greatly displayed. The waves swelled like mountains in height, the ships seemed now heaved up to the clouds, and now appeared as precipitated by gulfy whirlpools to the bed of the ocean. The winds were piercing cold, and so boisterous, that the pilot's voice could seldom be heard, and a dismal, almost continual darkness, which at that tempestuous season involves these seas, added all its horrors. Sometimes the storm drove them southward, at other times they were obliged to stand on the tack, and yield to its fury, preserving what they had gained with the greatest difficulty.

With such mad seas the daring Gama fought

Thomson.

During this gloomy interval of the storm, the sailors, wearied out with fatigue, and abandoned to despair, surrounded Gama, and implored him not to suffer himself, and those committed to his care, to perish by so dreadful a death. The impossibility that men so weakened should stand it much longer, and the opinion that this ocean was torn by eternal tempests, and therefore had hitherto been and was impassable, were urged. But Gama's resolution to proceed was unalterable. A formidable conspiracy was then formed against his life; but his brother discovered it, and the courage and prudence of Gama defeated its design²². He put the chief conspirators and all the pilots in irons; and he himself, his ²² The voyage of Gama has been called merely a coasting one, and therefore much less dangerous and heroic than that of Columbus, or of Magalhaens. But this, it is presumed, is one of the opinions hastily taken up, and founded on ignorance. Columbus and Magalhaens undertook to navigate unknown oceans, and so did Gama; with this difference, that the ocean around the Cape of Good Hope, which Gama was to encounter, was believed to be, and had been avoided by Diaz as impassable. Prince Henry suggested that the current of Cape Bojador might be avoided by standing to sea, and thus that cape was first passed. Gama for this reason did not coast, but stood to sea for upwards of three months of tempestuous weather. The tempests which afflicted Columbus and Magalhaens, are by their different historians described with circumstances of less honour and danger than those which attacked Gama. All the three commanders were endangered by mutiny; but none of their crews, save Gama's, could urge the opinion of ages, and the example of a living captain, that the dreadful ocean which they attempted was unnavigable. Columbus and Magalhaens always found means, after detecting a conspiracy, to keep the rest in hope; but Gama's men, when he put the pilots in irons, continued in the utmost despair. Columbus was indeed ill obeyed; Magalhaens sometimes little better; but nothing, save the wonderful authority of Gama's command, could have led his crew through the tempest which he surmounted ere he doubled the Cape of Good Hope. Columbus, with his crew, must have returned. The expedients with which he used to soothe them, would, under his authority, have had no avail in the tempest which Gama rode through. From every circumstance it is evident that Gama had determined not to return, unless he found India. Nothing less than such resolution to perish or attain his point could have led him on. But Columbus, ill obeyed indeed, returned from the mouth of the river Oronoko, before he had made a certain discovery whether the land was isle or continent. When Gama met a strong current off Ethiopia, he bore on, though driven from his course. Columbus steering southward in search of continent, met great currents. He imagined they were the rising of the sea towards the canopy of Heaven, which for aught he knew, say the authors of the Universal History, they might touch towards the south. He therefore turned his course, and steered to the west. The passing of the straits of Magellan, however hazardous, was not attended with such danger as Gama experienced at the Cape. The attempt to cross the Pacific was greatly daring, but his voyage in that sea was happy. The navigation of the straits of Magellan and the Pacific are in this country little known; but the course of Gama is at this day infinitely more hazardous than that of Columbus. If Columbus found no pilots to conduct him, but encountered his greatest dangers in sounding his course among the numerous western islands, Gama, though in the Indian ocean assisted by pilots, had as great trials of his valour, and much greater ones of his prudence. The warlike strength, and deep treacherous arts of the Moors, were not found in the west. All was simplicity among the natives there. The prudence and foresight of Gama and Columbus were of the highest rate; Magalhaens was in these sometimes rather inferior. He lost his own, and the lives of the greatest part of his crew, by hazarding a land engagement at the advice of a judicial astrologer. See the note on this line:

To watch thy deeds shall Magalhaens aspire.

brother, Coello, and some others, stood night and day to the helm, and directed the course. At last, after having many days, with unconquered mind, withstood the tempest and an enraged sea, (no less perfidious) the storm suddenly ceased, and they beheld the Cape of Good Hope.

On November the 20th all the fleet doubled that promontory, and steering northward, coasted along a rich and beautiful shore, adorned with large forests and numberless herds of cattle. All was now alacrity; the hope that they had surmounted every danger revived their spirits, and the admiral was beloved and admired. Here, and at the Bay, which they named St. Blas, they took in provisions, and beheld those beautiful rural scenes described by Camoëna. And here the store-ship, now of no further service, was burnt by order of the admiral. On December the 8th a violent storm drove the fleet from the sight of land, and carried them to that dreadful current²⁴ which made the Meuse drunk it impossible to double the Cape. Gama, however, though unhappy in the time of navigating these seas, was safely carried over the current by the violence of a tempest; and having recovered the sight of land, as his safest course, he steered northward along the coast. On the 10th of January they descried, about 230 miles from their last watering place, some beautiful islands, with herds of cattle frisking in the meadows. It was a profound calm, and Gama stood near to land. The natives of this place, which he named Terra de Natal, were better dressed and more civilized than those they had hitherto seen. An exchange of presents was made, and the black king was so pleased with the politeness of Gama, that he came aboard his ship to see him. On the 15th of January, in the dusk of the evening, they came to the mouth of a large river, whose banks were shaded with trees loaded with fruit: On the return of day they saw several little boats with palm-tree leaves making towards them, and the natives came aboard without hesitation or fear. Gama received them kindly, gave them an entertainment, and some silken garments, which they received with visible joy. Only one of them however could speak a little broken Arabic. From him Fernan Martinho learned, that not far distant was a country where ships, in shape and size like Gama's, frequently resorted. Herberto Gama had found only the rudest barbarians on the coasts of Africa, alike ignorant of India and of the naval art. The information he here received, that he was drawing near to civilized countries, gave the adventurers great spirits, and the admiral named this place The River of Good Signs.

Here, while Gama careened and refitted his ships, the crews were attacked with a violent scurvy, which carried off several of his men. Having taken in fresh provisions, on the 24th of February he set sail, and on the first of March they descried four islands on the coast of Mozambic. From one of these they perceived seven vessels in full sail bearing toward them. These knew Gama's ship by the admiral's ensign, and made up to her, saluting her with loud huzzas and their instruments of music. Gama received them aboard, and entertained them with great kindness. The interpreters talked with them in Arabic. The island, in which was the principal harbour and trading town, they said, was governed by a deputy of the king of Quiloa; and many Saracen merchants, they added, were settled here, who traded with Arabia, India, and other parts of the world. Gama was overjoyed, and the crew with uplifted hands returned thanks to Heaven.

Pleased with the presents which Gama sent him, and imagining that the Portuguese were Mohammedans from Morocco, Zacocia the governor, dressed in rich embroidery, came to congratulate the admiral on his arrival in the east. As he approached the ships in great pomp, Gama removed the sick out of sight, and ordered all those in health to attend above deck, armed in the Portuguese manner; for he foresaw what would happen when the Mohammedans should discover their mistake. During the entertainment provided for him, Zacocia seemed highly pleased, and asked several questions about the arms and religion of the strangers. Gama showed them his arms, and explained the force of his cannon, but he did not affect to know much about religion: however, he frankly promised to show him his books of devotion whenever a few days refreshment should give him a more convenient time. In the meanwhile he entreated Zacocia to send him some pilots who might conduct him to India. Two pilots were next day brought by the governor, a treaty of peace was solemnly concluded, and every office of mutual friendship seemed to promise a lasting harmony. But it was soon interrupted. Zacocia, as soon as he found the Portuguese were Christians, used every endeavour to destroy them. The life of Gama was attempted. One of the Moorish pilots deserted, and some of the Portuguese, who were on shore to get fresh water, were attacked by seven barks of the natives, but were rescued by a timely assistance from the ships.

²⁴ This current runs between the cape from thence named Corrientes, and the south-west extremity of Madagascar.

Besides the hatred of the Christian name, inspired by their religion, these Mohammedan Arabs had other reasons to wish the destruction of Gama. Before this period, they were almost the only merchants of the east. Though without any empire in a mother country, they were bound together by language and religion, and, like the modern Jews, were united together, though scattered over various countries. Though they esteemed the current of Cape Corrientes, and the tempestuous seas around the Cape of Good Hope, as impassable, they were the sole masters of the Ethiopian, Arabian, and Indian seas; and had colonies in every place convenient for trade on these coasts. This crafty mercantile people clearly foresaw the consequences of the arrival of Europeans, and every art was soon exerted to prevent such formidable rivals from effecting any settlement in the east. To these Mohammedan traders, the Portuguese, on account of their religion, gave the name of Moors.

Immediately after the skirmish at the watering-place, Gama, having one Moorish pilot, set sail, but was soon driven back to the same island by tempestuous weather. He now resolved to take in fresh water by force. The Moors perceived his intention, about two thousand of whom, rising from ambush, attacked the Portuguese detachment. But the prudence of Gama had not been asleep. His ships were stationed with art, and his artillery not only dispersed the hostile Moors, but reduced their town, which was built of wood, into a heap of ashes. Among some prisoners taken by Paulus de Gama was a pilot, and Zaccois, begging forgiveness for his treachery, sent another, whose skill in navigation he greatly commended.

A war with the Moors was now begun. Gama perceived that their jealousy of European rivals gave him nothing to expect but secret treachery and open hostility; and he knew what numerous colonies they had on every trading coast of the east. To impress them therefore with the terror of his arms on their first act of treachery was worthy of a great commander. Nor was he remiss in his attention to the chief pilot, who had been last sent. He perceived in him a kind of anxious endeavour to hear near some little islands; and suspecting there were unseen rocks in that course, he confidently charged the pilot with guilt, and ordered him to be severely whipped. The punishment produced a confession, and promises of fidelity. And he now advised Gama to stand for Quiloa, which he assured him was inhabited by Christians. Three Ethiopian Christians had come aboard while at Zaccois's island, and the current opinions of Prestor John's country inclined Gama to try if he could find a port, where he might expect the assistance of a people of his own religion. A violent storm, however, drove the fleet from Quiloa; and being now near Mombaza, the pilot advised him to enter that harbour, where, he said, there were also many Christians.

The city of Mombaza is agreeably situated on an island, formed by a river which empties itself into the sea by two mouths. The buildings are lofty and of firm stone, and the country abounds with fruit-trees and cattle. Gama, happy to find a harbour where every thing wore the appearance of civilization, ordered the ships to cast anchor; which was scarcely done, when a galley in which were 100 men in Turkish habit, armed with bucklers and sabres, rowed up to the flag ship. All of these seemed desirous to come aboard, but only four, who by their dress seemed officers, were admitted; nor were these allowed, till stript of their arms. As soon as on board, they extolled the prudence of Gama in refusing admittance to armed strangers; and by their behaviour seemed desirous to gain the good opinion of the adventurers. Their country, they boasted, contained all the riches of India, and their king, they professed, was ambitious of entering into a friendly treaty with the Portuguese, with whose renown he was well acquainted. And that a conference with his majesty and the offices of friendship might be rendered more convenient, Gama was requested and advised to enter the harbour. As no place could be more commodious for the recovery of the sick, and the whole fleet was sickly, Gama resolved to enter the port; and in the mean while sent two of the pardoned criminals as an embassy to the king. These the king treated with the greatest kindness, ordered his officers to show them the strength and opulence of his city; and on their return to the navy, he sent a present to Gama of the most valuable spices, of which he boasted such abundance, that the Portuguese, he said, if they regarded their own interest, would seek for no other India.

To make treaties of commerce was the business of Gama; one so advantageous, and so desired by the natives, was therefore not to be refused. Fully satisfied by the report of his spies, he ordered to weigh anchor, and enter the harbour. His own ship led the way, when a sudden violence of the tide made Gama apprehensive of running aground. He therefore ordered his sails to be furled and the anchors to be dropt, and gave a signal for the others to follow his example. This manoeuvre, and the cries of the sailors in executing it, alarmed the Mozambic pilots. Conscious of their treachery, they thought their design was discovered, and leapt into the sea. Some boats of Mombaza took these up, and refusing to put them on board, set them safely on shore, though the admiral repeatedly demanded the restoration of the pilots. These circumstances, evident proofs of treachery, were further confirmed by the behaviour of the king of Mombaza. In the middle of the night Gama thought he heard some noise, and, on examination, found his ships surrounded by a great number of Moors, who, in the utmost privacy, endeavoured to cut his cables. But their scheme was defeated; and some Arabs, who remained on board, confessed that no Christians were resident either at Quilon or Mombaza. The storm which drove them from the one place, and their late escape at the other, were now beheld as manifestations of the Divine favour; and Gama, holding up his hands to Heaven, ascribed his safety to the care of Providence. Two days, however, elapsed, before they could get clear of the rocky bay of Mombaza, and having now ventured to hoist their sails, they steered for Melinda, a port, they had been told, where many merchants from India resorted. In their way thither they took a Moorish vessel, out of which Gama selected fourteen prisoners, one of whom he perceived by his mien to be a person of distinction. By this Saracen Gama was informed that he was near Melinda, that the king was hospitable, and celebrated for his faith, and that four ships from India, commanded by Christian masters, were in that harbour. The Saracen also offered to go as Gama's messenger to the king, and promised to procure him an able pilot to conduct him to Calicut, the chief port of India.

As the coast of Melinda appeared to be dangerous, Gama anchored at some distance from the city, and unwilling to hazard any of his men, he landed the Saracen on an island opposite to the town. This was observed, and the stranger was brought before the king, to whom he gave so favourable an account of the politeness and humanity of Gama, that a present of several sheep, and fruits of all sorts, was sent by his majesty to the admiral, who had the happiness to find the truth of what his prisoner had told him, confirmed by the masters of the four ships from India. These were Christians from Cambaya. They were transported with joy on the arrival of the Portuguese, and gave several useful instructions to the admiral.

The city of Melinda was situated in a fertile plain, surrounded with gardens and groves of orange-trees, whose flowers diffused a most grateful odour. The pastures were covered with herds, and the houses, built of square stones, were both elegant and magnificent. Desirous to make an alliance with such a state, Gama requited the civility of the king with the most grateful acknowledgments. He drew nearer the shore, and urged his instructions as apology for not landing to wait upon his majesty in person. The apology was accepted; and the king, whose age and infirmities prevented himself, sent his son to congratulate Gama, and enter into a treaty of friendship. The prince, who had some time governed under the direction of his father, came in great pomp. His dress was royally magnificent, the nobles who attended him displayed all the riches of silk and embroidery, and the music of Melinda resounded all over the bay. Gama, to express his regard, met him in the admiral's barge. The prince, as soon as he came up, leapt into it, and, distinguishing the admiral by his habit, embraced him with all the intimacy of old friendship. In their conversation, which was long and sprightly, he discovered nothing of the barbarism, says Oronius, but in every thing showed an intelligence and politeness worthy of his high rank. He accepted the fourteen Moors, whom Gama gave to him, with great pleasure. He seemed to view Gama with enthusiasm, and confessed that the make of the Portuguese ships, so much superior to what he had seen, convinced him of the greatness of that people. He gave Gama an able pilot, named Melema Cana, to conduct him to Calicut; and requested, that on his return to Europe he would carry an ambassador with him to the court of Lisbon. During the few days the fleet stayed at Melinda, the mutual friendship increased, and a treaty of alliance was concluded. And now, on April 22, resigning the helm to his skilful and honest pilot, Gama hoisted sail and steered to the north. In a few days they passed the line, and the Portuguese with ecstasy beheld the appearance of their native sky. Orion, Ursa major and minor, and the other stars about the northern pole, were now a more joyful discovery than the southrd pole had formerly been to them. Having passed the meridian, the pilot now stood directly to the east, through the Indian ocean; and after sailing about three weeks, he had the happiness to congratulate Gama on the view of the mountains of India. Gama, transported with ecstasy, returned thanks to Heaven, and ordered all his prisoners to be set at liberty, that every heart might taste of the joy of his successful voyage.

²¹ It afterwards appeared, that the Moorish king of Mombaza had been informed of what happened at Mozambique, and intended to revenge it by the total destruction of the fleet.

²² A circumstance in the letters of Americo Vespucci deserves remark. Describing his voyage to America, having past the line, says he, come desideroso d'essere autore che segnassi la stella—“desirous to be the namer and discoverer of the pole star of the other hemisphere, I lost my sleep many nights in contemplating the stars of the other pole.” He then laments, that as his instruments could not discover any star of less motion than ten degrees, he had not the satisfaction to give a name to any one. But as he observed four stars, in form of an almond, which had but little motion, he hoped in his next voyage he should be able to mark them out.—All this is truly curious, and affords a good comment on the temper of the man who had the art to defraud Columbus by giving his own name to

About two leagues from Calicut Gama ordered the ships to anchor, and was soon surrounded by a number of boats. By one of these he sent one of the pardoned criminals to the city. The appearance of unknown vessels on their coast brought immense crowds around the stranger, who no sooner entered Calicut, than he was lifted from his feet and carried hither and thither by the concourse. Though the populace and the stranger were alike earnest to be understood, their language was unintelligible to each other, till, happy for Gama in the event, a Moorish merchant accosted his messenger in the Spanish tongue. The next day this Moor, who was named Mouzaida, waited upon Gama on board his ship. He was a native of Tunis, and the chief person, he said, with whom John II. had at that port contracted for military stores. He was a man of abilities and great intelligence of the world, and an admirer of the Portuguese valour and honour. The engaging behaviour of Gama heightened his esteem into the sincerest attachment. He offered to be interpreter for the admiral, and to serve him in whatever besides he could possibly befriend him. And thus, by one of those unforeseen circumstances which often decide the greatest events, Gama received a friend, who soon rendered him the most critical and important service.

At the first interview, Mouzaida gave Gama the fullest information of the climate, extent, customs, religions, and various riches of India, the commerce of the Moors, and the character of the sovereign. Calicut was not only the imperial city, but the greatest port. The king or samorin, who resided here, was acknowledged as emperor by the neighbouring princes; and as his revenue consisted chiefly of duties on merchandize, he had always encouraged the resort of foreigners to his harbours.

Pleased with this promising prospect, Gama sent two of his officers with Mouzaida to wait on the samorin at his palace of Pandarene, a few miles from the city. They were admitted to the royal apartment, and delivered their embassy; to which the samorin replied, that the arrival of the admiral of so great a prince as Emmanuel, gave him inexpressible pleasure, and that he would willingly embrace the offered alliance. In the meanwhile, as their present station was extremely dangerous, he advised them to bring the ships nearer to Pandarene, and for this purpose he sent a pilot to the fleet.

A few days after, the samorin sent his first minister, or casual, attended by several of the mayres, or nobility, to conduct Gama to the royal palace. As an interview with the samorin was absolutely necessary to complete the purpose of his voyage, Gama immediately agreed to it, though the treachery he had already experienced, since his arrival in the eastern seas, showed him the personal danger which he thus hazarded. He gave the command of the ships during his absence to his brother Paulus and his friend Coello; and in the orders he left them he displayed a heroism superior to that of Alexander when he crossed the Granicus. That of the Macedonian was ferocious and frantic, the offspring of vicious ambition; that of Gama was the child of the strongest reason, and the most valorous mental dignity: it was the high pride of honour, a pride, which the man, who in the fury of battle may be able to rush on to the mouth of a cannon, may be utterly incapable of, even in idea.

The revenge of the samorin arose chiefly from the traffic of the Moors; the various colonies of these people were combined in one interest, and the jealousy and consternation which his arrival in the eastern seas had spread among them, were circumstances well known to Gama: and he knew also what he had to expect both from their force and their fraud. But duty and honour required him to complete the purpose of his voyage. He left peremptory command, that, if he was detained a prisoner, or any attempt made upon his life, they should take no step to save him, to give ear to no message which might come in his name for such purpose, and to enter into no negotiation on his behalf. Though they were to keep some boats near the shore, to favour his escape if he perceived treachery ere detained by force; yet the moment that force rendered his escape impracticable, they were to set sail, and to carry the tidings of the discovery of India to the king of Portugal. For as this was his only concern, he would suffer no risk that might lose a man, or endanger the homeward voyage. Having left these unalterable orders, he went ashore with the casual, attended only by twelve of his own men; for America, of which he challenged the discovery. Near fifty years before the voyage of Americo Vespucci the Portuguese had crossed the line; and Diaz fourteen, and Gama near three years before, had doubled the Cape of Good Hope, had discovered seven stars in the constellation of the south pole, and, from the appearance of the four most luminous, had given it the name of The Cross, a figure which it better resembles than that of an almond.

he would not weaken the naval force, though he knew that the pomp of attendance would have been greatly in his favour at the court of India.

As soon as landed, he and the casual were carried in great pomp, in order, upon men's shoulders, to the chief temple; and from thence, amid immense crowds, to the royal palace. The apartment and dress of the zamorin were such as might be expected from the luxury and wealth of India. The emperor lay reclined on a magnificent couch, surrounded with his nobility and ministers of state. Gama was introduced to him by a venerable old man, the chief brahin. His majesty, by a gentle nod, appointed the admiral to sit on one of the steps of his sofa, and then demanded his embassy. It was against the custom of his country, Gama replied, to deliver his instructions in a public assembly, he therefore desired that the king and a few of his ministers would grant him a private audience. This was complied with; and Gama, in a manly speech, set forth the greatness of his sovereign Emmanuel, the same he had heard of the zamorin, and the desire he had to enter into an alliance with so great a prince; nor were reciprocal advantages of such a treaty omitted by the admiral. The zamorin, in reply, professed great esteem for the friendship of the king of Portugal, and declared his readiness to enter into a friendly alliance. He then ordered the casual to provide proper apartments for Gama in his house; and having promised another conference, he dismissed the admiral with all the appearance of sincerity.

The character of this monarch is strongly marked in the history of Portuguese Asia. Avarice was his ruling passion; he was haughty or mean, bold or timorous, as his interest rose or fell in the balance of his judgement; wavering and irresolute whenever the scales seemed doubtful which to preponderate. He was pleased with the prospect of bringing the commerce of Europe to his harbours, but he was also influenced by the threats of the Moors.

Three days elapsed ere Gama was again permitted to see the zamorin. At this second audience he presented the letter and presents of Emmanuel. The letter was received with politeness, but the presents were viewed with an eye of contempt. Gama beheld it, and said he only came to discover the route to India, and therefore was not charged with valuable gifts, ere the friendship of the state, where they might choose to traffic, was known. Yet that indeed he brought the most valuable of all gifts, the offer of the friendship of his sovereign, and the commerce of his country. He then entreated the king not to reveal the contents of Emmanuel's letter to the Moors, and the king with great seeming friendship desired Gama to guard against the perfidy of that people. And at this time, it is highly probable, the zamorin was sincere.

Every hour since the arrival of Gama, the Moors had held secret conferences. That one man might not return was their purpose; and every method to accomplish this was meditated. To influence the king against the Portuguese, to assassinate Gama, to raise a general insurrection, to destroy the foreign navy, and to bribe the casual, were determined. And the casual, the master of the house where Gama lodged, accepted the bribe, and entered into their interest. Gama, however, was apprised of all these circumstances, by his faithful interpreter Mozaida, whose affection to the foreign admiral the Moors had hitherto not suspected. Thus informed, and having obtained the faith of an alliance from the sovereign of the first port of India, Gama resolved to elude the plots of the Moors; and accordingly, before the dawn, he set out for the sea above, in hope to escape by some of the boats which he had ordered to hover about the coast.

But the Moors were vigilant. His absence was immediately known; and the casual, by the king's order, pursued and brought him back by force. The casual, however, for it was necessary for their schemes to have the ships in their power, behaved with great politeness to the admiral, though now detained as a prisoner, and still continued his specious promises to use all his interest in his behalf.

The eagerness of the Moors now contributed to the safety of Gama. Their principal merchants were admitted to a formal audience, when one of their orators accused the Portuguese as a nation of faithless plunderers; Gama, he said, was an exiled pirate, who had marked his course with depredation and blood. If he were not a pirate, still there was no excuse for giving such warlike foreigners any footing in a country already supplied with all that nature and commerce could give. He expatiated on the great services which the Moorish traders had rendered to Calicut, or wherever they settled; and ended with a threat, that all the Moors would leave the zamorin's ports, and find some other settlement, if he permitted these foreigners to have any share in the commerce of his dominions.

However staggered with these arguments and threats, the zamorin was not blind to the self-interest and malice of the Moors. He therefore ordered, that the admiral should once more be brought before him. In the mean while the casual tried many stratagems to get the ships into the harbour; and at last, in the name of his master, made an absolute demand that the sails and rudders should be delivered up, as the pledge of Gama's honesty. But these demands were as absolutely refused by Gama, who sent a letter to his brother by Monzaida, enforcing his former orders in the strongest manner, declaring that his fate gave him no concern, that he was only unhappy lest the fruits of all their labours and dangers should be lost. After two days spent in vain altercation with the casual, Gama was brought as a prisoner before the king. The king repeated his accusation, upbraided him with non-compliance to the requests of his minister; yet urged him, if he were an exile or pirate, to confess freely; in which case he promised to take him into his service, and highly promote him on account of his abilities. But Gama, who with great spirit had baffled all the stratagems of the casual, behaved with the same undaunted bravery before the king. He asserted his innocence, pointed out the malice of the Moors, and the improbability of his piracy; boasted of the safety of his fleet, offered his life rather than his sails and rudders, and concluded with threats in the name of his sovereign. The zamorim, during the whole conference, eyed Gama with the keenest attention, and clearly perceived in his unflinching when the dignity of truth, and the consciousness that he was the admiral of a greater monarch. In their late address, the Moors had treated the zamorim as somewhat dependent upon them, and he saw that a commerce with other nations would certainly lessen their dangerous importance. His avarice strongly desired the commerce of Portugal: and his pride was flattered in humbling the Moors. After many proposals, it was at last agreed, that of Gama's twelve attendants, he should leave seven as hostages; that what goods were aboard his vessels should be landed, and that Gama should be safely conducted to his ship; after which the treaty of commerce and alliance was to be finally settled. And thus, when the assassination of Gama seemed inevitable, the zamorim suddenly dropt the demand of the sails and the rudders, rescued him from his determined enemies, and restored him to liberty and the command of his ships.

As soon as he was aboard⁷⁷ the goods were landed, accompanied by a letter from Gama to the zamorim, wherein he boldly complained of the treachery of the casual. The zamorim, in answer, promised to make inquiry, and to punish him if guilty; but did nothing in the affair. Gama, who had now anchored nearer to the city, every day sent two or three different persons on some business to Calicut, that as many of his men as possible might be able to give some account of India. The Moors, in the meanwhile, every day assaulted the ears of the king, who now began to waver; when Gama, who had given every proof of his desire of peace and friendship, sent another letter, in which he requested the zamorim to permit him to leave a consul at Calicut, to manage the affairs of king Emmanuel. But to this request, the most reasonable result of a commercial treaty, the zamorim returned a refusal full of rage and indignation. Gama, now fully master of the character of the zamorim, resolved to treat a man of such an inconstant dishonourable disposition with a contemptuous silence. This contempt was felt by the king, who, yielding to the advice of the casual and the entreaties of the Moors, seized the Portuguese goods, and ordered two of the seven hostages, the two who had the charge of the cargo, to be put in irons. The admiral remonstrated by the means of Monzaida, but the king still persisted in his treacherous breach of royal faith. Repeated solicitations made him more haughty; and it was now the duty and interest of Gama to use force. He took a vessel in which were six Naysres or noblemen, and nineteen of their servants. The servants he set ashore to relate the tidings; the noblemen he detained. As soon as the news had time to spread through the city, he hoisted his sails, and though with a slow motion, seemed to proceed on his homeward voyage. The city was now in an uproar: the friends of the captive noblemen surrounded the palace, and loudly accused the policy of the Moors. The king, in all the perplexed distress of a haughty, avaricious, weak prince, sent after Gama, delivered up all the hostages, and submitted to his proposals; nay even solicited that an agent should be left, and even descended to the meanness of a palpable lie. The two factors, he said, he had put in irons, only to detain them till he might write letters to his brother Emmanuel, and the goods he had kept on shore, that an agent might be sent to dispose of them. Gama, however, perceived a mysterious trifling, and, previous to any treaty, insisted upon the restoration of the goods.

The day after this altercation, Monzaida came aboard the admiral's ship in great perturbation. The Moors, he said, had raised great commotions, and had enraged the king against the Portuguese. The king's ships were getting ready, and a numerous Moorish fleet from Mecca was daily expected. To delay Gama till this force arrived, was the purpose of the court and of the Moors, who were now confident of success. To this information Monzaida added, that the Moors, suspecting his attachment to to Gama, had determined to assassinate him. That he had narrowly escaped from them; that it was impossible for him to recover his effects, and that his only hope was in the protection of Gama. Gama rewarded him with the friendship he merited, took him with him, as he desired, to Lisbon, and procured him a recompense for his services.

Almost immediately after Monzaida, seven boats arrived, loaded with the goods, and demanded the restoration of the captive noblemen. Gama took the goods on board, but refused to examine if they were entire, and also refused to deliver the prisoners. He had been promised an ambassador to his sovereign, he said, but had been so often deluded, he could trust such a faithless people no longer, and would therefore carry the captives in his power, to convince the king of Portugal what insults and injustice his ambassador and admiral had suffered from the zamorim of Calicut. Having thus dismissed the Indians, he fired his cannon and hoisted his sails. A calm, however, detained him on the coast some days, and the zamorim seizing the opportunity, sent what vessels he could fit out, twenty of a larger size, sixty in all, full of armed men, to attack him. Though Gama's cannon were well played, confident of their numbers, they pressed on to board him, when a sudden tempest, which Gama's ships rode out in safety, miserably dispersed the Indian fleet, and completed their ruin.

After this victory, the admiral made a halt at a little island near the shore, where he erected a cross ², bearing the name and arms of his Portuguese majesty. And from this place, by the hand of Monzaida, he wrote a letter to the zamorim, wherein he gave a full and circumstantial account of all the plots of the casual and the Moors. Still, however, he professed his desire of a commercial treaty, and promised to represent the zamorim in the best light to Emmanuel. The prisoners, he said, should be kindly used, were only kept as ambassadors to his sovereign, and should be returned to India when they were enabled from experience to give an account of Portugal. The letter he sent by one of the captives, who by this means obtained his liberty.

The fame of Gama had now spread over the Indian seas, and the Moors were every where intent on his destruction. As he was near the shore of Anchediva, he beheld the appearance of a floating isle, covered with trees, advance towards him. But his prudence was not to be thus deceived. A bold pirate, named Timoja, by linking together eight vessels full of men, and covered with green boughs, thought to board him by surprise. But Gama's cannon made seven of them fly; the eighth, loaded with fruits and provisions, he took. The beautiful island of Anchediva now offered a convenient place to careen his ships and refresh his men. While he staid here, the first minister of Zabajo king of Goa, one of the most powerful princes of India, came on board, and in the name of his master, congratulated the admiral in the Italian tongue. Provisions, arms, and money were offered to Gama, and he was entreated to accept the friendship of Zabajo. The admiral was struck with admiration, the address and abilities of the minister appeared so conspicuous. He said he was an Italian by birth, but, in sailing to Greece, had been taken by pirates, and, after various misfortunes, had been necessitated to enter into the service of a Mohammedan prince, the nobleness of whose disposition he commended in the highest terms. Yet, with all his abilities, Gama perceived an artful inquisitiveness, that nameless something which does not accompany simple honesty. After a long conference, Gama abruptly upbraided him as a spy, and ordered him to be put to the torture.—And this soon brought a confession, that he was a Polonian Jew by birth, and was sent to examine the strength of the Portuguese by Zabajo, who was mustering all his power to attack them. Gama on this immediately set sail, and took the spy along with him, who soon after was baptized, and named Jasper de Gama, the admiral being his godfather. He afterwards became of great service to Emmanuel.

Gama now stood westward through the Indian ocean, and after being long delayed by calms, arrived off Magadoza, on the coast of Africa. This place was a principal port of the Moors; he therefore levelled the walls of the city with his cannon, and burned and destroyed all the ships in the harbour. Soon after this he descried eight Moorish vessels bearing down upon him; his artillery, however, soon made them use their oars in flight, nor could Gama overtake any of them for want of wind. He now reached the hospitable harbour of Melinda. His men, almost worn out with fatigue and sickness, here received, a second time, every assistance which an accomplished and generous prince could bestow. And having taken an ambassador on board, he again gave his sails to the wind, in trust that he might pass the Cape of Good Hope while the favourable weather continued, for his acquaintance with the eastern seas now suggested to him, that the tempestuous season was periodical. Soon after he set sail, his brother's ship struck on a sand bank, and was burnt by order of the admiral. His brother and part of the crew he took into his own ship, the rest he sent on board of Coello; nor were more hands now alive than were necessary to man the two vessels which remained. Having taken in provisions at the island of Zaasibar, where they were kindly entertained by a Mohammedan prince of the same sect with the king of Melinda, they safely doubled the Cape of Good Hope on April 26, 1499, and continued till they reached the island of St. Iago in favourable weather. But a tempest here separated the two ships, and gave Gama and Coello an opportunity to show the goodness of their hearts, in a manner which does honour to human nature.

The admiral was now near the Azores, when Paulus de Gama, long worn with fatigue and sickness, was unable to endure the motion of the ship. Vasco, therefore, put into the island of Tercera, in hope of his brother's recovery. And such was his affection, that rather than leave him, he gave the command of his ship to one of his officers. But the hope of recovery was vain. John de Sa proceeded to Lisbon with the flag ship, while the admiral remained behind to soothe the death-bed of his brother, and perform his funeral rites. Coello, in the mean while, landed at Lisbon, and hearing that Gama was not arrived, imagined he might either be shipwrecked, or beating about in distress. Without seeing one of his family, he immediately set sail, on purpose to bring relief to his friend and admiral. But this generous design, more the effect of friendship than of just consideration, was prevented by an order from the king, ere his ship got out of the Tagus.

The particulars of the voyage were now diffused by Coello, and the joy of the king was only equalled by the admiration of the people. Yet while all the nation was fired with zeal to express their esteem of the happy admiral, he himself, the man who was such an enthusiast to the success of his voyage, that he would willingly have sacrificed his life in India to secure that success, was now, in the completion of it, a dejected mourner. The compliments of the court and the shouts of the street were irksome to him, for his brother, the companion of his toils and dangers, was not there to share the joy. As soon as he had waited on the king, he shut himself up in a lonely house near the sea-side at Bethlehem, from whence it was some time ere he was drawn to mingle in public life.

During this important expedition, two years and almost two months elapsed. Of 160 men who went out, only 55 returned. These were all rewarded by the king. Coello was pensioned with 100 ducats a year, and made a fidalg, or gentleman of the king's household, a degree of nobility in Portugal. The title of Don was annexed to the family of Vasco de Gama; he was appointed admiral of the eastern seas, with an annual salary of 3000 ducats, and a part of the king's arms was added to his. Public thanksgivings to Heaven were celebrated throughout the churches of the kingdom, and feasts, interludes, and chivalrous entertainments, the taste of that age, demonstrated the joy of Portugal.

As the prophetic song in the tenth Lusiad requires a commentary, we shall now proceed to a compendious history of the negotiations and wars of the Portuguese in India; a history, though very little known, yet of the utmost importance to every commercial state, particularly to that nation which now commands the trade of the eastern world.

THE HISTORY OF THE RISE AND FALL

THE PORTUGUESE EMPIRE IN THE EAST.

THE power, interest, and disposition of the Moors, the masters of the eastern seas, pointed out to Emmanuel what course he ought to follow, if he intended to reap either honour or advantage from the discovery of India. The accumulated treachery of the Moors had kindled a war; force was now necessary; a fleet therefore of thirteen sail and 1500 men was fitted out for India, and the command of it given to an experienced officer, Pedro Alvarez de Cabral.

The chief instructions of Cabral were to enter into a treaty of friendship with the zamorin, and to obtain leave to build a fort and factory near Calicut. But if he found that prince still perfidious, and averse to an alliance, he was to proceed to hostilities on the first instance of treachery.

Cabral, in this voyage, was driven to America by a tempest, and was the first who discovered the Brazils. As he doubled the south of Africa, he encountered a most dreadful storm; the heavens were covered with pitchy darkness for many days, and the waves and winds vied with each other in noise and fury. Four ships were lost, and all their crews perished; among whom was the celebrated Bartholomew Diaz, the discoverer of the Cape of Good Hope, which, as if prophetic of his fate, he had named the Cape of Tempests.

When Cabral reached the coast of Zofala, he had only six ships. Here he engaged and took two Moorish vessels, laden mostly with gold dust. But finding they belonged to the zeque Foteyma, an uncle of the king of Melinda, he not only restored the prizes, but treated the zeque with the greatest courtesy. At Mozambique he agreed with a pilot to conduct him to Quiloa. The king of this place and the admiral had a pompous interview. An alliance was solemnly concluded. But Homaris, brother to the king of Melinda, was at Quiloa; and by him Cabral was informed of a treacherous preparation to attack him. As his destination was for Calicut, he delayed revenge, and proceeded to Melinda. Here he lauded the Melindian ambassador, who had been sent to Portugal; and here his generous treatment of Foteyma strengthened the friendship and good offices which had begun with Gama.

When he arrived at Calicut, whither he was conducted by two Melindian pilots, he sent Ayres Correa on shore to settle the manner how the zamorin and the admiral were to meet. Six principal brahmins, whose names were brought from Portugal by the advice of Monzaida, were given as hostages for the safety of the admiral; and the Indian noblemen, who had been carried away by Gama, were returned. After much delay with the wavering zamorin, a commercial alliance, by which the Portuguese vessels were to receive their lading before those of any other nation, was solemnly confirmed by oath, and a house was appointed as a factory for the Portuguese. Of this, Correa, with seventy men under his command, in the name of the king his master, took immediate possession.

If the smallest circumstances in the history of an infant colony are not attended to, the secret springs and principles of action escape us, and we are sure to be led into error. Cabral's fleet was to be laden with spicery; but the Moorish merchants, still intent on the ruin of their rivals the Portuguese, did every thing in their power to retard it, in hope of another rupture. While promises to Cabral trifled away the time, the zamorin desired his assistance to take a large ship belonging to the king of Cobhin, who not only intended to invade his dominions, he said, but had also refused to sell him an elephant, which was now aboard that ship. There were two Moorish agents with whom Cabral was obliged to transact business. One of these named Cemireci, pretending great friendship to the admiral, advised him by all means to gratify the zamorin by taking the ship of Cochin. This vessel was large and full of soldiers, but Cabral appointed one of his smallest, commanded by Pedro Ataide, not a sixth part of her size, to attack her. When Ataide first made towards the enemy, the Indian insulted him with every sign of reproach; but the Portuguese cannon drove her into the port of Cananor, a place forty miles to the north of Calicut. Here she lay all the night, while Ataide watched the mouth of the harbour; and, fearing to be burnt in the port, in the morning she again took to sea. But Ataide soon came up with her, and by the dexterous use of his artillery made her steer what course he pleased, and at last drove her in triumph before him into the harbour of Calicut.

This encounter was of great consequence to the Portuguese. It not only raised a high idea of their valour and art of war, but it discovered a scene of treachery, and gave them a most beneficial opportunity to display their integrity and honour. When Cabral conversed with the captives, he found that the story of the elephant and the invasion were false, and that they had been warned by Cemireci, that the Portuguese, a set of lawless pirates, intended to attack them. On this, Cabral not only restored the ship to the king of Cochin, but paid for what damage she had sustained, and assured him he had been abused by the villany of the Moors.

The zamorim professed the greatest admiration of the Portuguese valour, yet while he pretended to value their friendship at the highest rate, he used every art to delay the lading of their ships. Twenty days was the time stipulated for this purpose; but three months were now elapsed, and nothing done. Cabral several times complained to the zamorim of the infringement of treaty, that many Moorish vessels had been suffered to lade, while he could obtain no cargo. The zamorim complained of the arts of the Moors, and gave Cabral an order, on paying for the goods, to unlade whatever Moorish vessels he pleased, and to supply his own. Cabral, however, was apprehensive of some deep design, and delayed to put this order in execution. Correa, upon this, severely upbraided him with neglect of duty, and he at last seized a vessel which happened to belong to one of the richest of the Moors. A tumult was immediately raised, the Portuguese factory was suddenly beset by four thousand of that people, and before any assistance could come from the ships, Correa, and the greatest part of his companions, were massacred. Cabral, though greatly enraged, waited sufficient time to hear the excuse of the zamorim; but he waited in vain. Ten large Moorish vessels burnt in the harbour, the city of Calicut bombarded one day, and 600 of its inhabitants slain, revenged the death of Correa.

The king of Cochin, when Cabral returned the ship which he had taken, highly pleased with his honour, invited him to traffic in his port. Cabral now sailed thither, and was treated in the most friendly manner. A strong house was appointed for a factory, and a treaty of commerce solemnly concluded. Ambassadors also arrived from the kings of Cananor, Caulan, and other places, intreating the alliance of the Portuguese, whom they invited to their harbours.

About eight hundred years before this period, according to tradition, Perimal, the sovereign of India, having embraced the religion of Mohammed, in which he had been instructed by some Arabian merchants, resolved to end his days as a hermit at Mecca. He therefore divided his empire into different sovereignties, but rendered them all tributary to the zamorim of Calicut. From this port Perimal set sail, and the Arab merchants conceived such a superstitious affection for this harbour, though not so commodious as many others around, that on the arrival of Gama it was the great centre of the Moorish commerce in India. A desire to throw off their dependence on the zamorim, without doubt had its influence in prompting the tributary kings to invite the Portuguese to their harbours. But it was impossible they should have so acted, unless they had conceived a high idea of the Portuguese virtue and valour, which was thus rewarded by the friendship of some powerful princes, who ever after remained true to the cause of Emmanuel.

When Cabral was about to sail from Cochin, he received information from the king, that the zamorim, with a large fleet containing 15,000 soldiers, intended to attack him. Cabral prepared for battle, and the Indian fleet fled. He afterwards touched at Cananor, where he entered into a friendly alliance. The king, suspecting from the small quantity of spicery which he bought, that the admiral was in want of money, entreated him to give a mark of his friendship by accepting, upon credit, of what goods he pleased. But Cabral showed a considerable quantity of gold to the king's messengers, politely thanked him, and said he was already sufficiently loaded. Having left factors on shore, and received ambassadors on board, he proceeded on his homeward voyage. Near Melinda he took a large ship, but finding she belonged to a merchant of Cananor, he set her at liberty, and told the commander, "that the Portuguese monarch was only at war with the zamorim and the Moors of Mecca, from whom he had received the greatest injuries and indignities." The king of Melinda, and other Mohammedan princes, who had entered into alliances with Gama and Cabral, were not of the tribe or confederacy of those who had in different parts attempted the ruin of the Portuguese. That people were now distinguished by the name of the Moors of Mecca, their principal harbour; and therefore to distress that port became now a principal object of the Portuguese.

Emmanuel, now fully informed by Cabral of the states and traffic of the Indian seas, perceiving that the reinforcement of three vessels, which he had sent under John de Nova¹, could little avail, fitted out twenty ships, the command of which warlike fleet was given to the celebrated Vasco de Gama. At the same time the pope issued a bull, in which he styled Emmanuel, Lord of the Navigation, Conquests, and Trade, of Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, and India.

Gama, having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, touched at Sofala, and made a treaty with the Mohammedan sovereign of that rich country. Mozambic was now governed by a new monarch, who entered an alliance with the Portuguese, which was granted; and the isle where Gama had the battle with the Moors², became, for long after, a most convenient watering-place for the Portuguese navies. In revenge of the plots against himself, and the injuries received by Cabral, he battered the city of Quilon with his cannon, and made the king submit to pay tribute to Emmanuel. As he proceeded for Calicut, he met a large ship of Mecca, which, with many people of distinction who were going on a pilgrimage to the tomb of their prophet, had lately left that harbour. This vessel, after an obstinate struggle, in which 300 Moors were killed³, he took and burnt. And from some vessels of Calicut, as he approached that port, he took about thirty prisoners. As soon as he anchored near the city, the zamorim sent a message to offer terms of friendship, to excuse the massacre of the Portuguese under Correa, as the sole action of an enraged populace, with which government had no concern; and added, that the fate of the ship of Mecca he hoped would suffice for revenge. Gama, previous to any new treaty, demanded a restitution of the goods of which the Portuguese factory had been plundered, and threatened to put his prisoners to death and batter the city in case of refusal. After waiting some time in vain for an answer, Gama ordered his thirty prisoners to be hanged, and their bodies to be sent ashore, together with a letter, declaring war against the zamorim, in the name of the king of Portugal. And next day having for several hours played his cannon upon the city, he steered his course for the more friendly port of Cochin.

Here the factors who had been left by Cabral gave Gama the highest character of the faith of the king, and his earnest desire to cultivate the friendship of the Portuguese; and the former alliance was mutually confirmed by the king and the admiral. The zamorim, who with rage and regret beheld the commerce of Europe carried to other harbours, sent a bramin to Gama, while he was lading at Cochin, entreating an oblivion of past injuries, and a renewal of the league of amity. The admiral, still desirous to cultivate friendship, gave the command of the fleet to his cousin Stephen de Gama, and with two ships only, in order to try the zamorim's sincerity, sailed for Calicut; yet, lest treachery should be intended, he ordered Vincent Sodre with five ships to follow him. On his arrival at the city, he found that dissimulation was still the character of the sovereign. Four-and-thirty vessels, full of armed men, attacked Gama's ship with great fury; for the other vessel he had sent to hasten the squadron of Sodre. In this situation nothing but a brisk wind could possibly have saved Gama; and a brisk gale in this extremity arose, and carried him beyond the reach of the fleet of Calicut. But having met the reinforcement of Sodre, he immediately returned, and totally destroyed the fleet of the enemy.

Disappointed in war, the zamorim now by entreaties and threats endeavoured to bring the king of Cochin into his interest. But that prince, with the greatest honour, refused to betray the Portuguese; and Gama having promised to leave a squadron to protect his harbour, sailed with thirteen loaded ships for the port of Cananor. On his way thither, as he past within a few miles of Calicut, he was again vigorously attacked by twenty-nine vessels fitted out by the zamorim on purpose to intercept him. Gama ordered three ships, which had the least loading, to begin the engagement, and victory soon declared in his favour. He then proceeded to Cananor, where he entered into a treaty with the sovereign, who bound himself never to make war on the king of Cochin or to assist the zamorim. And Gama having left six ships under the command of Sodre, for the protection of Cochin and Cananor, sailed for Portugal, where, after a prosperous voyage, he arrived with twelve ships loaded with the riches of the east.

As soon as Gama's departure was known, the zamorim made great preparations to attack Cochin. It was the purpose of Emmanuel, that Sodre should be left with a squadron to cruise about the mouth of the Red Sea, and annoy the Moors of Mecca; but Gama, whose power was discretionary, ordered him not to leave Cochin, unless every thing bore appearance of peace with the zamorim. Sodre, however, though hostility was every day expected, prepared to depart. Diagu Correa, the Portuguese agent left at Cochin, urged him in the strongest manner to do his duty and continue at that port; but in vain. While the king of Cochin resolutely refused, though advised by many of his council, to deliver up the Portuguese residents to the zamorim, Sodre, contrary to the orders of Gama, sailed for the Red Sea, in hope of the rich prizes of Mecca; and thus basely deserted his countrymen, and a prince, whose faith to the Portuguese had involved him in a war which threatened destruction to his kingdom.

The city of Cochin is situated on an island, divided from the continent by an arm of the sea, one part of which, at low water, is fordable. At this pass the zamorim began the war, and met some defeats. At last, by the force of numbers and the power of bribery, he took the city, and the king of Cochin fled to the island of Viopia. Yet, though stript of his dominions, he still retained his faith to the Portuguese. He took them with him to this place, where a few men could defend themselves; and though the zamorim offered to restore him to his throne if he would deliver them up, he replied, "that his enemy might strip him of his dominions and his life, but it was not in his power to deprive him of his fidelity."

While Trimumpara, king of Cochin, was thus shut up in a little rock, Sodre suffered a punishment worthy of his perfidy. His ship was beaten to pieces by a tempest, and he and his brother lost their lives. The other commanders considered this as the judgement of Heaven, and hastened back to the relief of Cochin: by stress of weather, however, they were obliged to put into one of the Anchidivian islands. Here they were joined by Francis Albuquerque, who, on hearing the fate of Cochin, though in the rigour of the tempestuous season, immediately set sail for that port. When the fleet appeared in sight of Viopia, Trimumpara, exclaiming "Portugal, Portugal," ran in an ecstasy to the Portuguese; and they, in return, with shouts of triumph, announced the restoration of his crown. The garrison left in Cochin by the zamorim immediately fled. Trimumpara was restored to his throne without a battle, and Albuquerque gave an instance of his masterly policy. Together with the assurances of the friendship of Emmanuel, he made the king of Cochin a present of 10,000 ducats; an act which wonderfully excited the admiration of the princes of India, and was a severe wound to the zamorim.

Francis and Alonzo Albuquerque and Duarte Pacheco were now at Cochin. The princes, tributary to Trimumpara, who had deserted to the zamorim, were severely punished by the troops of Cochin, headed by the Portuguese, and their depredations were carried into the zamorim's own dominions. A treaty of peace was at last concluded, on terms greatly advantageous to the Portuguese commerce. But that honour which had been of the greatest benefit to their affairs was now stained. A ship of Calicut was unjustly seized by the Portuguese agent at Cochin; nor would Francis Albuquerque make restitution, though required by the zamorim. Soon after this, Francis sailed for Europe, but gave another instance of his infamy ere he left India. The zamorim had again declared war against the king of Cochin, and Francis Albuquerque left only one ship, three barges, and about one hundred and fifty men, for the defence of Trimumpara; but this small body was commanded by Pacheco. Francis Albuquerque, and Nicholas Coelho, celebrated in the Lusiad, sailed for Europe, but were heard of no more.

Anthony Saldanna and Roderic Ravasco were at this time sent from Lisbon on purpose to cruise about the mouth of the Red Sea. The king of Melinda was engaged in a dangerous war with the king of Mombassa, and Saldanna procured him an honourable peace. But Ravasco acted as a lawless pirate on the coast of Zanzibar. Though the innocent inhabitants were in a treaty of peace with Gama, he took many of their ships, for which he extorted large ransoms, and compelled the prince of Zanzibar to pay an annual tribute and own himself the vassal of Emmanuel. The pope's bull, which gave all the east to the king of Portugal, began now to operate. The Portuguese esteemed it as a sacred charter; the natives of the east felt the consequence of it, and conceived a secret jealousy and dislike of their new masters. The exalted policy and honour of many of the Portuguese governors delayed the evil operation of this jealousy, but the remedy was only temporary. The Portuguese believed they had a right to demand the vassalage of the princes of the east, and to prohibit them the navigation of their own seas. When the usurpation of dominion proceeds from a fixed principle, the wisdom of the ablest governor can only skin over the mortal wound; for even the grossest barbarians are most acutely sensible of injustice, and carefully remember the breaches of honour.

Along with these ideas of their right to claim dominion and to conquer, the Portuguese brought to India an image of the degenerated constitution of Lisbon. The governor acted under a few general instructions, which contained rather advices⁴ than orders, against what countries he should direct the force of his arms: and in the executive power he was arbitrary. The revenue and regulations of commerce were also left to his discretion; such was the insecure and capricious plan of the Portuguese commercial establishment in India. It was (of all, the most liable to abuse) the worst of all monopolies, a regal one. Every ship which sailed from Portugal to India was the king's property. Their Indian cargoes were deposited in the custom-house of Lisbon, and managed, for the use of the crown, by the revenue officers. The tribute paid by the vassal princes of Asia was the king's; and the factories and forts were built and supported at his charge⁵. In a word, a military government was established in India, and it was the duty of the governor to superintend his majesty's revenues and commercial monopoly.

The zamorim had now collected a formidable power for the destruction of Cochin. But before we mention the wonderful victories of Pacheco, it will be necessary to give some account of the land and maritime forces of the east. And here it is to be lamented that the Portuguese authors have given us but very imperfect accounts of the military arts of India. Yet it is to be gathered from them, that though fire-arms were not unknown, they were but very little used before the arrival of the Portuguese. Two natives of Milan, who were brought to India by Gama on his second voyage, deserted to the zamorim, and were of great service to him in making of powder and casting of cannon. The Persian despised the use of fire-arms, as unmanly; and the use of artillery on board of a fleet is several times mentioned as peculiar to the Moors of Mecca. The vessels of the zamorim were large berges rowed with oars, and crowded with men, who fought with darts and other missile weapons. We are told by Orosius, that the pilot of Melinda, who conducted Gama to Calicut, despised the astrolabe, as if used to superior instruments. We doubt, however, of his superior knowledge, for we know that he coasted northward to a particular limit, and then stood directly for the rising sun. We are also told by the Jesuits of the perfection of the Chinese navigation, and that they have had the use of the compass for 3000 years; but this is also doubtful. Some have even supposed, that Marco Paolo, or some of the earliest mercantile pilgrims, carried the loadstone to China ere its use in navigation was fully known in Europe. Certain it is, that at this day the Chinese cannot arm the needle with the virtues of the loadstone, and of consequence have the compass in great imperfection. In place of hanging the needle, they lay the loadstone upon cork, and swim it in water. Vertomachus relates, that travelling to Mecca, he saw the Arab use the compass to direct them through the sandy deserts of Arabia. But of this also we doubt; for there is not a name in any eastern language, except the Chinese, for that instrument; nor do the Arab know how to make one. They purchase them of Europeans, and the Italian word bussola is the name of the compass among the Turks, and all the natives of the east on this side of China.

While the zamorim was preparing his formidable armament against Cochin, the security which appeared on the mien of Pacheco prompted Trimumpare to suspect some fraud: and he entreated that captain to confess what he intended. Pacheco felt all the resentment of honour, and assured him of victory. He called a meeting of the principal inhabitants, and uttered the severest threats against any person who should dare to desert to the zamorim, or to leave the island⁶. Every precaution, by which the passage to the island of Cochin might be secured, was taken by Pacheco. The Portuguese took the sacrament, and devoted themselves to death. The king of Cochin's troops amounted only to 5000; the fleet and army of the zamorim consisted of 57,000 men. Yet this great army, though provided with brass cannon, and otherwise assisted by the two Milanese engineers, was defeated by ⁶ Soon after this order, two fishermen were brought before him, who had been following their employment beyond the limits he had prescribed. Pacheco ordered them to be hanged in prison. The king pleaded for their lives, but Pacheco in public was inexorable. In the night, however, he sent the two fishermen to the king's palace, where he desired they might be concealed with the greatest secrecy; and the severity of their fate was publicly believed. Such were the humanity and strict discipline of this brave officer.

Pacheco. Seven times the zamorim raised new armies, some of them more numerous than the first, but all of them were defeated at the fords of Cochin by the stratagems and intrapidity of Pacheco. Though the zamorim in the latter battle exposed his own person to the greatest danger, and was sometimes sprinkled with the blood of his attendants; though he had recourse to poison and every art of fraud, all his attempts, open and private, were baffled. At last, in despair of revenge, he resigned his crown, and shut himself up for the remainder of his days in one of his idol temples. Soon after the kingdom of Cochin was thus restored to prosperity, Pacheco was recalled to Europe. The king of Portugal paid the highest compliments to his valour; and as he had acquired no fortune in India, in reward of his services he gave him a lucrative government in Africa. But merit always has enemies. Pacheco was accused, and by the king's order brought to Lisbon in irons: and those hands which preserved the interest of Portugal in India, were in Portugal chained in a dungeon a considerable time, ere a legal trial determined the justice of this severity. He was at last tried, and honourably acquitted; but his merit was thought of no more, and he died in an almshouse. Merit thus repaid, is a severe wound to an empire. The generous ardour of military spirit cannot receive a colder check, than such examples are sure to give it.

Before the departure of Pacheco, a fleet of thirteen ships, commanded by Lopez Soares, arrived in India. The new zamorim beheld with regret the ruined condition of his kingdom, his tributary princes not only now independent, but possessed of the commerce which formerly enriched Calicut, the fatal consequence of his uncle and predecessor's obstinacy. Taught by these examples, he desired a peace with the Portuguese; but Soares would hear nothing till the two Milanese deserters were delivered up. This the zamorim resolutely refused. And Soares, regardless of the fate of some Portuguese who had been left at Calicut by Cabral, battered the city two days, in place of granting an honourable and commercial peace. Now was this his only political error. By showing such eagerness to secure the Milanese engineers, he told the zamorim the value of these European artists. And that prince soon after applied to the sultan of Egypt, who sent him four Venetians, able engineers, and masters of the art of the foundery of cannon.

In the stately spirit of conquest Soares traversed the Indian seas, destroyed many Calicutian and Moorish vessels, and made various princes pay tribute, and confess themselves the vassals of Emmanuel. But the sultan of Egypt began now to threaten hostilities, and a stronger force of the Portuguese was necessary. Francisco d'Almeida, an officer of distinguished merit, was therefore appointed viceroy of India, and was sent with two-and-twenty ships to assert his jurisdiction. And according to the uncommercial ideas of Gothic conquest with which he set out, he continued to act. On his arrival at Quilon, a meeting between him and the king was appointed. Almeida attended, but the king did not; for a black cat, as he set out, happened to cross his way, and, intimidated by this evil omen, he declined the interview. On this, Almeida levelled his city with the ground, and appointed another king, tributary to Emmanuel. Some late treacheries of Mombassa were also revenged by the destruction of that city and the vassalage of its monarch. When the viceroy arrived in India, he defeated the king of Onor, built forts and left garrisons in various places. Trimumpara, king of Cochin, had now retired to spend the evening of his life in a brahmin temple, and his nephew, who with great pomp was crowned by Almeida, acknowledged himself the tributary of the king of Portugal.

The sultan of Egypt was at this time one of the greatest princes of the world. Much of the lucrative commerce of the east had long flowed to the west through his dominions. His fleets and his armies were thus rendered numerous and powerful, and bound by their political religion, every Mohammedan prince, in a war with the Christians, was his ally. A heavy revenge of the crusades was in meditation, and Europe, miserably divided in itself, invited its own ruin; when, as it is expressed by the abbé Raynal, the liberties of mankind were saved by the voyage of Vasco de Gama. The arrival of the Portuguese in the eastern sea entirely unbiassed the strongest fences of the Mohammedan power; and the sinews of the Egyptian and Turkish strength were cut asunder by that destruction of their commerce which followed the presence of the Europeans. And thus also Europe is taught the means which will for ever secure her against the ravages of the Saracens, and other eastern barbarians, whom she has already experienced as more cruel invaders, and whom Greece still feels as more dreadful tyrants, than the Goths and the Vandals⁷.

⁷ A view of the commerce of the eastern world, and the channels in which it flowed, before the arrival of the Portuguese, is thus accurately given by Faria y Sousa. "Before these our discoveries, the spicery and riches of the eastern world were brought to Europe with great charge and immense trouble. The merchandise of the clove of Malucca, the mace and nutmeg of Banda, the sandal-wood

Enraged with the interruption which his trade had already received, the sultan resolved to prevent its utter ruin. He threatened the extirpation of all the Christians in his dominions, if the court of Rome would not order the king of Portugal to withdraw his fleets for ever from the eastern seas. One Maunus, a monk, was his ambassador to Rome and Lisbon, but in place of promises of compliance, he returned with the severer threats of Emmanuel. War was now determined by the sultan, and a most formidable fleet, sixty vessels of which were larger than the Portuguese, manned with Turks experienced in war, were sent to the assistance of the zamorin. But by the superior naval skill and romantic bravery of Almeyda and his son Lorenzo, this mighty armament was defeated.

At this time Tristan de Cugna, and the celebrated Alphonso Albuquerque, arrived in the east, and carried war and victory from Sofala to India. Allured by the honour and commercial treaties of Gama and Cabral, several princes of India invited these strangers to their harbours. But the alteration of the behaviour and claims of the Portuguese, had altered the sentiments of the natives. Almost every port now opposed the entrance of the Portuguese, and the cargo of almost every ship they loaded was purchased with blood. At the sack of the city of Lamo, some of the soldiers under Cugna cut off the hands and ears of the women, to get their bracelets and ear-rings with more expedition. But though these miscreants, by overloading their boat with their plunder, were all drowned, this stain on the Portuguese character made destructive war against the Portuguese name and interest. When Albuquerque arrived before Ormuz, he summoned the king to become the vassal of Emmanuel, and to be happy under the protection of so great a prince. The king of Ormuz, who expected such a visit, had provided an army of 33,000 men, 6000 of whom were expert archers, auxiliaries of Persia. Yet these were defeated by 460 disciplined men, well played cannon, and the dauntless valour of Albuquerque. And the king of Ormuz submitted to vassalage. Lords of the seas also, the Portuguese permitted no ship to sail without a Portuguese passport. Nor was this regarded, when avarice prompted that the passport was forged*. A rich ship of Cananor was on this pretence taken and plundered, and the unhappy crew, to conceal the villany, were sewed up in the sail-cloths and drowned. Vaz, it is true, the commander of this horrid deed, was broken. But the bodies of the Moors were thrown on shore by the tide, and the king of Cananor, the valuable ally of Portugal, in revenge of this treachery, joined the zamorin, and declared war against the Portuguese. Another powerful armament, commanded by Mir Hocem, a chief of great valour, was sent by the sultan. Persia also assisted. And even the mountaineers of Dalmatia†, by the connivance of Venice, were robbed of their forests, to build navies in Arabia to militate against the Portuguese.

Almeyda sent his brave son Lorenzo to give battle to Mir Hocem, but Lorenzo fell the victim of his romantic bravery. While the father prepared to revenge the death of his son, his recall, and the appointment of Albuquerque to succeed him, arrived from Europe; but Almeyda refused to resign till he had revenged his son's defeat. On this, a dispute between the two governors arose, of fatal consequence to the Portuguese interest in Asia. Albuquerque was imprisoned, and future governors often of Timor, the camphire of Borneo, the gold and silver of Luconia, the spices, drugs, dyes, and perfumes, and all the various riches of China, Java, Siam, and the adjacent kingdoms, centred in the city of Malacca, in the golden Chersonesus. Hither all the traders of the countries as far west as Ethiopia and the Red Sea resorted, and bartered their own commodities for those they received; for silver and gold were esteemed as the least valuable articles. By this trade the great cities of Calicut, Cambaya, Ormuz, and Aden, were enriched; nor was Malacca the only source of their wealth. The western regions of Asia had full possession of the commerce of the rubies of Pegu, the silks of Bengal, the pearls of Calicut, the diamonds of Narsinga, the cinnamon and rubies of Ceylon, the pepper and every spicery of Malabar, and wherever in the eastern islands and shores Nature had lavished her various riches. Of the more western commerce Ormuz was the great mart; for from thence the eastern commodities were conveyed up the Persian gulf to Bassora on the mouth of the Euphrates, and from thence distributed in caravans to Armenia, Trebisond, Tartary, Aleppo, Damascus, and the port of Barut on the Mediterranean. Suez on the Red sea was also a most important mart. Here the caravans loaded and proceeded to Grand Cairo, from whence the Nile conveyed their riches to Alexandria; at which city and at Barut some Europeans, the Venetians in particular, loaded their vessels with the riches of the eastern world, which at immense prices they distributed throughout Europe. While the eastern commerce flowed through these channels, the eastern kingdoms were wonderfully strengthened and enriched by it. By the arrival of the Portuguese every thing was reversed, and the safety of Europe secured.

* Sometimes, in place of a pass, the Moorish vessels carried their own letters of condemnation. As thus, "The owner of this ship is a very wicked Moor. I desire the first Portuguese captain to whom this is shown may make prize of her." Vid. Faria.

† The timber was brought through the Mediterranean to Cairo, and from thence was carried by camels to the port of Suez.

urged this example on both sides of the question, both to protract the continuance, and press the instant surrender of office. Almeyda, having defeated the zamorim and his Egyptian allies, sailed for Europe¹⁰, crowned with military laurels. But though thus plumed in the vulgar eye, his establishments were contrary to the spirit of commerce. He fought, indeed, and conquered; but he left more enemies of the Portuguese in the east than he found there. The honours he attained were like his, who, having extinguished a few houses on fire, marches out of a city in triumph, forgetful of the glowing embers left in every corner, ready to burst forth in a general flame. It was left for the great Albuquerque to establish the Portuguese empire in Asia on a surer basis, on acts of mutual benefit to the foreign colonists and native princes.

Albuquerque, as soon as he entered upon his government, turned his thoughts to the solid establishment of the Portuguese empire. To extinguish the power of Calicut, and to erect a fortified capital for the seat of government, were his first designs; and in these he was greatly assisted, both by the arms and the counsel of Timoja the pirate, who, very much injured by the Indian princes, was glad to enter into alliance with the Portuguese. Don Fernando Coutinho, previous to the advancement of Albuquerque, had arrived in India, vested with a discretionary power independent of the will of the governor. The natural consequences of this extraordinary policy soon appeared. With thirty vessels and 2400 men, Albuquerque and Coutinho sailed from Cochin to besiege Calicut. It was agreed, that the troops under Coutinho should have the honour to land first. Those under Albuquerque, however, galled by the enemy, leapt first ashore. Coutinho, on this, roughly upbraided him: "To conquer the feeble Indians," he said, "was no such honour as some boasted. And I will tell the king of Portugal," he added, "that I entered the palace of the zamorim with only my cane in my hand." Albuquerque remonstrated the danger of rashness in vain. Coutinho ordered Jasper de Gama, the Polonian Jew, to conduct him to the palace; to which, with 800 men, he marched in confused speed. Albuquerque, whose magnanimity could revenge no insult when his country's interest was at stake in the hour of battle, followed in good order with 600 men, and left others properly stationed, to secure a retreat; for he foresaw destruction. Coutinho, after several attacks, at last, with the loss of many men, entered the palace, and gave his soldiers liberty to plunder. All was now disorder among them. And Albuquerque, who perceived it, entreated Coutinho, by message, to beware of a fiercer attack. He was answered, "He might take care of the troops under his own command." After two hours spent in plundering the palace, Coutinho set fire to it, and marched out. But ere he could join Albuquerque, both parties were surrounded by enraged multitudes. Coutinho and his bravest officers fell; Albuquerque was wounded by arrows in the neck and left arm. At last, struck on the breast by a large stone, he dropped down, to appearance dead. On his shield he was carried off with great difficulty. All was confusion in the retreat, till the body of reserve, placed by Albuquerque, came up and repulsed the enemy. Albuquerque was carried on board without hope of recovery. His health, however, was restored at Cochin, and the zamorim allowed a fort to be built near Calicut, and submitted to the terms of peace proposed by the Portuguese governor.

The island of Goa, on the coast of Decan, a most commodious situation for the seat of empire, and whose prince had been treacherous to Gama, after various desperate engagements, was at last yielded to Albuquerque. According to his design, he fortified it in the best manner, and rendered it of the utmost consequence to the preservation of the Portuguese power. He now turned his thoughts to Malacca, the great mart of the eastern half of the oriental world. Under the government of Almeyda, Squeira had sailed thither, and while about settling a treaty with the natives, narrowly escaped a treacherous massacre, in which several of his men were slain. Albuquerque offered peace and commerce, but demanded atonement for this injury. His terms were rejected, and this important place, won by most astonishing victories, was now added to the Portuguese dominion.

Albuquerque now devoted his attention to the grand object of his wishes, the permanent establishment of the Portuguese dominion in Asia. His ideas were great and comprehensive; and his plan, perhaps, the best ever produced under an arbitrary government. His predecessor Almeyda had the same object in view, but he thought the conquest and settlement of cities would weaken and divide the Portuguese strength. Superiority at sea he esteemed as the surest method to command all India; and one safe station, where the ships might winter, was all the establishment he desired. Albuquerque, on the contrary, deemed the possession of many harbours, and adjoining territory, as the only effectual means to ensure the continuance of the naval superiority. He esteemed the supply of the regal monopoly, says Orosius, as an inferior consideration; to enlarge and render permanent the revenues of sovereignty was his grand design. As one tempest might destroy the strength of their navy, while there was only one harbour to afford refuge, he considered the Portuguese dominion not only as very insecure, but also as extremely precarious, while they depended upon military and naval supplies from Lisbon. To prevent and remedy these apparent evils was therefore his ambition; and for these purposes he extended his settlements from Ormuz in Persia to the Chinese sea. He established custom-houses in every port, to receive the king's duties on merchandise; and the vast revenue which arose from these and the tributes of the vassal princes, gave a sanction to his system. At Goa, the capital of this new empire, he coined money, instituted a council-chamber for the government of the city, and here and at all his settlements he erected courts of justice¹¹, and gave new regulations to such as had been formerly established. And that this empire might be able to levy armies and build fleets in its own defence, he encouraged the marriage of the Portuguese with the natives¹². His female captives he treated with the utmost kindness, and having married them to his soldiers, gave them settlements in the island of Goa. And hence, during the regency of John de Castro, little more than thirty years after, the island of Goa itself was able to build the fleets and to levy the armies, which, by saving the important fort and city of Dio, preserved the Portuguese interest in India.

In consequence of his plan of empire, Albuquerque constituted Malacca the capital of the eastern part of the Portuguese dominion. Here, as at Goa, he coined money, and by his justice, and affable, generous manner, won the affection and esteem of the people whom he had conquered. He received from and sent ambassadors to the king of Siam and other princes, to whom he offered the trade of Malacca on more advantageous conditions than it had hitherto been. And an immense commerce from China and all the adjacent regions soon filled that harbour. For here, as at Ormuz and Goa, the reduction which he made in the customs, gave an increase of trade which almost doubled the revenue of the king of Portugal. When Albuquerque returned to Goa, he was received, says Paris, as a father by his family. The island was at this time besieged by 20,000 of Hydr Ali Can, the lord of Decan's troops, yet victory declared for Albuquerque. But to display the terror of the Portuguese arms was only the second motive of this great man. To convince the Indian princes of the value of his friendship was his first care, and treaties of commerce were with mutual satisfaction concluded with the king of Bismagar, the king of Narsinga, and other powerful princes. The city of Aden, near the mouth of the Red Sea, was of great importance to the fleets of the sultan. Albuquerque twice attacked this place, but could not carry it for want of military stores. By the vessels, however, which he kept on these coasts, he gave a severe wound to the Egyptian and Moorish commerce; and by the establishments which he made in India, entirely ruined it. Mahomet, the expelled tyrant of Malacca, assisted by 20,000 Javans, attempted to recover his throne; but the wish of the people was fulfilled, and Albuquerque, who sailed to its relief, was again victorious. The Persians, to whom Ormuz had been tributary, endeavoured to bring it again under their yoke¹³; but Albuquerque hastened from Malacca, and totally defeated them, to the sincere joy of the inhabitants. Here he fell sick, and, being advised by his physicians to go to India for the recovery of his health, the king of Ormuz, who called him his father, parted from him with tears. On his way to India he received intelligence, that a fleet, arrived from Portugal, had brought his recall; that Lopez Suarez was appointed to succeed him, and that Iago Mendez was come to be governor of Cochin. When he heard this, he exclaimed, "Are these whom I sent prisoners to Portugal for heinous crimes, are these returned to be governors! Old man, Oh, for thy grave! Thou hast incurred the king's displeasure for the sake of the subjects, and the subjects' for the sake of the king! Old man, fly to thy grave, and retain that honour thou hast ever preserved!" A profound melancholy now seized

¹¹ Utimutirajah, a native of Java, and one of the greatest men of Malacca, was, together with his son and son-in-law, detected in a conspiracy against the Portuguese. For this they were publicly tried in the court established by Albuquerque; were condemned, and publicly executed. This is the first instance of the execution of natives under the authority of European courts.

¹³ When the Persians sent a demand of tribute, Albuquerque said it should be paid; and a large silver basin, under cover, was presented to the ambassador. When uncovered, leaden bullets and points of spears appeared. "There," said Albuquerque, "is the tribute which the kings of Portugal pay." Admiration of the virtues of their enemies was the ancient character of the Persians. Ismael, the sophi from whom Ormuz was rent, soon after professed the highest idea of the valour of Albuquerque. He courted his friendship, and sent ambassadors to Emmanuel. In this correspondence the progress of fire-arms in the east may be traced. In 1515 he solicited that Portuguese artists might be sent to teach his subjects the art of casting cannon. Vid. Osor. l. 1.

him; but finding the certain approaches of death, he recovered his cheerfulness, and with great favour gave thanks to God, that a new governor was ready to succeed him. On the bar of Goa, in the sixty-third year of his age, he breathed his last¹⁴, after a regency of little more than five years. Yet, in this short space, he not only opened all the eastern world to the commerce of Portugal, but by the regulations of his humane and exalted policy, by the strict distribution of justice which he established, secured its power on a basis, which nothing but the discontinuance of his measures could subvert. Under Albuquerque the proud boast of the historian Faria was justified. "The trophies of our victories," says he, "are not bruised helmets and warlike engines hung on the trees of the mountains; but cities, islands, and kingdoms, first humbled under our feet, and then joyfully worshipping our government." The princes of India, who viewed Albuquerque as their father, clothed themselves in mourning on his death, for they had experienced the happiness and protection which his friendship gave them. And the sincerity of their grief showed Emmanuel what a subject he had lost. He was buried at Goa, and it became customary for the Mohamiredan and Gentoo inhabitants of that city, when injured by the Portuguese, to come and weep at his tomb, utter their complaints to his manes, and call upon his God to revenge their wrongs.

Accustomed to the affable manners of Albuquerque, the reserved haughty dignity assumed by Soares gave the Indian allies of Portugal the first proof that the mourning which they wore for his predecessor was not without cause. Now, say the Portuguese authors, commenced the period when the soldier no more followed the dictates of honour, when those who had been captains became traders, and rapacious plunderers of the innocent natives. Hitherto the loading of the king's vessels had been the principal mercantile business of the Portuguese. They now more particularly interfered with the commerce of the Moors and Indians. Many quitted the military service, and became private adventurers; and many who yearly arrived from Portugal, in place of entering into the king's service, followed this example. But their commerce was entirely confined to the harbours of the east, for it was the sole prerogative of the king to send cargoes to Europe. This coasting trade in the hands of the Portuguese increased the revenue of the royal custom-houses. But the sudden riches which it promised, drew into it many more adventurers than, it was feared, the military government of India could afford to lose. And thence the discouragement of this trade was esteemed the duty, and became a principal object of the Portuguese viceroys. And indeed in its best state it was only worthy of transported felons. It was governed by no certain laws. The courts established by Albuquerque were either corrupted or without power, and the petty governor of every petty fort was arbitrary in his harbour. Under these disadvantages, so inauspicious to honest industry, the Portuguese adventurers in this coasting trade became mere pirates, and it was usual for them to procure the loading of their ships, says Faria, in the military way, as if upon the forage in an enemy's country. Nor was this coasting trade solely in the hands of private adventurers. The king had a large share in it, and undoubtedly the most advantageous. This is confirmed by Faria (sub ann. 1540 and 1541) who mentions his majesty's goods, as carried from port to port, and committed from one officer to the charge of another. Such was the miserable state of the free trade of the Portuguese in India, a trade, whose superior advantages (for superior advantages must be implied in the argument) have lately been held forth¹⁵ as an example and proof of the expediency of depriving the English East India company of their charter. In the conclusion we shall cite the words of the philosopher to whom we allude. And an attention to the facts of this history will prepare the reader for a discussion of that important question.

Where there are no fixed laws of supreme authority, immediate confusion must follow the removal of the best governor. Such confusion constituted the political character of the regency of Soares. His military expeditions do him as little honour. Having performed the parade of a new governor, in visiting the forts, and in breaking and raising officers, Soares prepared, according to his orders, to reduce the coasts of the Red Sea to the obedience of Portugal. Another great Egyptian fleet, commanded by a Turk, named Raec Solyman, had sailed from Suez; and Soares, with twenty-seven ships, ¹⁴ A little before he died he wrote this manly letter to the king of Portugal. "Under the pangs of death, in the difficult breathing of the last hour, I write this my last letter to your highness; the last of many I have written to you full of life, for I was then employed in your service. I have a son, Blas de Albuquerque; I entreat your highness to make him as great as my services deserve. The affairs of India will answer for themselves, and for me." Osorius says, the latter part of the Gospel of John was, at his desire, repeatedly read to him; and he expired with the greatest composure. Long after his death his bones were brought to Portugal; but it was with great difficulty, and after long delays, ere the inhabitants of Goa would consent to part with his remains.

set sail in search of it. When he came before Aden, he found that strong city defenceless. The governor had offended the court of Egypt, and Solymán, by order of the sultan, had levelled a part of the wall. The governor of Aden, thus at his mercy, artfully offered the keys to Soarez, and entreated his friendship. Secure of the Moor's honesty, Soarez delayed to take possession till he had given battle to the sultan's fleet. This he found in the port of Gidda or Jodda, under protection of the cannon of the walls. He therefore did not engage it; and after burning a few defenceless towns, he returned to Aden. But the breaches of the fort were now repaired, and his own force, which had suffered greatly by tempestuous weather in the Red Sea, was, he deemed, unable to take that city, which now refused to surrender. While Soarez was employed in this inglorious expedition, Goa was reduced to the greatest danger. A quarrel about a Portuguese deserter had kindled a war, and Hydal Can, with an army of 30,000 men, laid siege to that important city. But the arrival of three Portuguese ships raised the siege, at a time when famine had almost brought the garrison to despair. Nor was Malaca happier than Goa; the uncurbed tyranny of the Portuguese had almost driven trade from that harbour, and the dethroned king once more invaded the island with a great army. But Alexis de Meneses, appointed governor of that place, arrived, in the most critical time, with 300 men, and saved Malaca. The trade with China after this greatly increased, and the king of Ceylon, with whom Albuquerque had established a valuable commerce, was compelled by Soarez to pay tribute to the king of Portugal. A surveyor of the king's revenue about this time arrived in India, vested with a power, which interfered with, and lessened that of the governor. Hence complaints and appeals were by every fleet carried to Europe, and by every fleet that returned the removal of officers was brought. Integrity now afforded no protection, and to amass wealth with the utmost expedition, was now the best way to secure its possession. Rapacity prevailed among the Portuguese, and all was discontent among the natives, when in 1518, after a regency of about three years, Soarez was recalled, and in power and title of governor succeeded by Iago Lopez de Sequeyra. Albuquerque left Portuguese Asia in the most flourishing condition. Soarez left every thing embarrassed, and in the decline. Albuquerque was dreadful to his enemies in war, and to his soldiers on the least appearance of disobedience: but at other times, his engaging manners won the hearts of all. And his knowledge of human nature, which formed his political conduct, was of the first rate. Soarez, on the contrary, the man who refused an equitable treaty offered by the zamorin, and was for such acts of incapacity sent prisoner to Lisbon by Albuquerque, betrayed in all his transactions the meanest abilities. All his capacity seemed to reach no further than to preserve that solemn face of dignity, that haughty reserved importance with which men of slender abilities transact the most trifling affairs; a solemnity of which heavy intellects are extremely jealous and careful, which the ignorant revere, and which the intelligent despise.

Sequeyra, the discoverer of Malaca, began his regency with the relief of that important mart; and the king of Bintam, the besieger, after several attempts, was compelled to submit to a treaty dictated by the Portuguese. Forty-eight ships, under the command of the governor, sailed to reduce the strong fort and harbour of Diu or Dio, on the coast of Cambaya, an object of great importance to the Portuguese, but nothing was attempted. Continual skirmishes, however, dyed every shore with blood, while no method of cultivating the friendship of the hostile natives was even in view. Every thing on the contrary tended to inflame them. John de Borba, shipwrecked on the coast of Achem, was generously relieved by the sovereign. George de Brito arrived soon after, and Borba informed him, that in the sepulchres of the kings were immense treasures of gold; and that the present king, his benefactor, had formerly robbed some Portuguese vessels. Brito, at the head of 200 men, immediately began hostilities, but was defeated and killed, and the kings of Achem became the inveterate enemies of the Portuguese, and often gave them infinite trouble. The Maluco islands were now discovered. The kings of these, at strife with each other, were each earnest for the alliance of the Portuguese. But they, led by their usual ideas, soon involved themselves in war and slaughter. Ormuz, where Albuquerque was beloved as a father, was now unable to bear the Portuguese yoke. The tribute was raised, and the king complained that his revenues could not afford to pay it. Sequeyra on this sent Portuguese officers to impose and collect the king's customs. This impolitical step was soon followed by its natural consequence. The insolence and oppression of the officers produced a revolt. Sequeyra, however, defeated the people of Ormuz, and almost doubled the tribute which before they were unable to pay. It is truly astonishing how men should expect that dominion thus supported should continue long; that they could not see that such victories both sowed and nourished the seeds of future war. Even the Portuguese historians adopted the impolitical uncommercial ideas of their governors. Faria y Sousa makes an apology for mentioning the fate of the first Portuguese who traded to China; calls it a matter of commerce, a subject unworthy of grave history. The political philosopher, however, will esteem it of more importance, and will draw the best of precepts from it. The king of Portugal, desirous of the trade of China, sent an ambassador and one of his captains to propose a commercial alliance. The ambassador was gladly received, and sent by land to Nankin, and the honourable behaviour of Pedro de Andrade gained the important traffic of the harbour of Canton. On this officer's return to India, Sequeyra the governor sent Simon de Andrade, brother to Pedro, with five ships to China; and whatever were his instructions, the absurdity of his actions was only equalled by his gross insolence. As if he had arrived among beings of an inferior order, he assumed an authority like that which is claimed by man over the brute creation. He seized the island of Tamou, opposite to Canton. Here he erected a fort and a gallows; and while he plundered the merchants, the wives and daughters of the principal inhabitants were dragged from their friends to his garrison, and the gibbet punished resistance. Nor did he stop even here. The Portuguese in India wanted slaves, and Andrade thought he had found the proper nursery. He published his design to buy the youth of both sexes, and in this inhuman traffic he was supplied by the most profligate of the natives. These proceedings, however, were soon known to the emperor of China, and the Portuguese ambassador and his retinue died the death of spies. Andrade was attacked by the Chinese itao, or admiral, and escaped with much loss, by the favour of a tempest, after being forty days harassed by a fleet greatly superior to his own. Next year Alonzo de Melo, ignorant of these transactions, entered the harbour of Canton with four vessels. But his ships were instantly seized, and the crews massacred, as spies and robbers, by the enraged Chinese. And though the Portuguese afterwards were permitted to some trade with China, it was upon very restricted and disgraceful conditions¹⁵, conditions which treated them as a nation of pirates, as men who were not to be trusted unless fettered and watched.

While Sequeyra was engaged in a second attempt upon Dio, Duarte de Menezes arrived in India, and succeeded him in office. Unmeaning slaughter on the coasts of Madagascar, the Red Sea, India, and the Maluco islands, comprise the whole history of his regency.

About this time died Emmanuel, king of Portugal. If this history seem to arraign his government, it will also prove how difficult it is for the most vigilant prince always to receive just intelligence. For Emmanuel was both a great and a good king. Of great vigilance in council, of great magnanimity in the execution of all his enterprises: of great capacity in distinguishing the abilities of men, and naturally liberal in the reward of merit. If such a prince as Emmanuel erred, if his administration of Indian affairs in any instance arraign his policy, let it thence be inferred, what exactitude of intelligence is necessary to the happy government of a distant colony.

The mal-administration of Indian affairs was now the popular complaint at the court of Lisbon. The traffic of India, which had raised the caliphs of Egypt to the height of their formidable power, and which had enriched Venice, was now found scarcely sufficient to support the military method of commanding it, practised by the Portuguese. A general of the first abilities was wanted, and the celebrated Vasco da Gama, old as he now was, honoured with the title of count de Vidigueyra, was appointed viceroy by John III. In 1524, Gama arrived the third time in India. Cochin, the faithful ally, and chief trading port of the Portuguese, was threatened by a powerful army of the zamorim, and the Indian seas were infested by numberless fleets of the Moors, whom their enemies called pirates. To suppress these Gama sent different squadrons, which were successful in executing his orders. But while he meditated far greater designs, designs of the same exalted and liberal policy which had been begun by himself, and so gloriously prosecuted by Albuquerque, death, at the end of three months, closed the regency of Gama. It was the custom of the kings of Portugal, to send commissions, or writs of succession, sealed up, to India, with orders which should be first opened when a successor to government was wanted. Gama, who brought with him three of these, fluding the approach of dissolution, opened the first writ of succession. And as Henry de Menezes, therein named, was at Goa, he appointed Lopez Vaz de Sampaio, a man of great abilities, to take the command till Menezes arrived. When Menezes arrived at Cochin, he prohibited the usual marks of public joy on his elevation, and said, "it was more necessary to mourn for the loss of their late viceroy." Nor did the public conduct of the new governor, the first, says Faira, who honoured the memory of his predecessor, deviate from this generous principle. A Portuguese vessel at this time committed several depredations on states at peace with Portugal. This ship, by order of Menezes, was taken, and the crew were impaled. A noble instance of justice, of more political service than all the victories of a Soarez. The danger of Cochin required war, and Menezes carried it into the territories of the zamorin, whom he severely humbled. The Portuguese arms cleared the seas of pirates, took the strong city of Dofar, and reduced some valuable islands on the Red Sea. Great preparations were also made for the reduction of Dio, when Menezes, after a regency of thirteen months, died of a mortification in his leg. That he left the military power of the Portuguese much more formidable than he found it, is the least of his praise. Every where, at Ormuz in particular, he curbed the insolence and rapacity of his countrymen, and proved that time only was wanting for him to have restored the situation of India as left by Albuquerque. He convinced the Indian princes that rapacity was not the character of all the Portuguese, for he accepted of no present, though many, as the custom of the country, were offered to him. At his death, which happened in his thirtieth year, thirteen reals and a half, not a crown in the whole, was all the private property found in the possession of this young governor.

Other transactions now succeed. The second and third commissions, brought by Gama, were unopened, and lest he who was first named should be distant, Menezes, on his death-bed, appointed Francis de Sa to assume the command until the arrival of the proper governor. On opening the second commission, Pedro de Mascarenhas was found named. As this officer was at Malaca, a council was held, wherein it was resolved to set aside Francis de Sa, and open the third commission. Sampaio, who in this was appointed, took an oath to resign on the arrival of Mascarene, and immediately he assumed the power of government. Mascarene about this time performed some actions of great military splendour in defence of Malaca. The king of Bintam, with several auxiliary princes, who with numerous armies threatened destruction to the Portuguese settlement, were defeated by this brave officer. The Spaniards about this time took possession of some of the Maluco islands, where the treachery of the Portuguese had made their name odious. Don George de Menezes and don Garcia Enriquez, two captains on this station, put one another alternately in irons. They at last came to a civil war, wherein Garcia was worsted; and Menezes was defeated by the Spaniards, who publicly executed some of his officers, as traitors to Charles V. to whom they owed no allegiance. Oppressed by the tyranny of the Moors, the king of Sunda implored the protection of the Portuguese, offered to pay a considerable tribute, and entreated them to build a fort in his dominions. Yet it was not in the power of Sampaio to restore the tranquillity of the Malucos, or to improve the offers of Sunda. He had engaged in a scheme of policy which fettered his operations. One villany must be defended by another, and the public interest must be secondary in the politics of the most able usurper of power. Sampaio was resolved to withhold the regency from Mascarene, and therefore to strengthen himself at Cochin was his first care. Where his own interest and that of the public were one, Sampaio behaved as a great commander; but where they were less immediately connected, that of the latter was even necessarily neglected, and fell into ruin. It was his interest to crush the zamorin, and he gained considerable victories over Cutial, admiral of the most formidable fleet which had hitherto been fitted out from the ports of Calicut. Sampaio then sailed to Goa, where Francis de Sa refused to acknowledge him as governor. This dispute was submitted to the council of the city, and the man in power was confirmed. Sa was then sent to build a fort in Sunda, but the politics of Sampaio could not spare a force sufficient to overawe the Moors, and Francis de Sa was unable to effect his design.

The artful Sampaio now wrote to the king of Portugal, that a most formidable hostile alliance was in meditation. The northern princes were ready to assist the king of Cambaya, and Solymann, the Turkish admiral, had promised the sultan to drive the Portuguese from India, if he would give him a competent armament. It was the interest of Sampaio to make every preparation for defence, and every excuse for preparation. But he still kept near Cochin. The brave Hector de Bylveira was sent to Dio and other places, and the reputation of the actions he performed strengthened the authority of the usurper. A fleet of fire ships now arrived from Portugal, and brought two new writs of succession. These, according to the royal authority, ought not to have been opened while an unrecalled governor was alive. But, conscious undoubtedly of their contents¹⁸, these, in defiance of the established rule, were opened by Meida, inspector of the revenue, and Lopez Vaz de Sampayo, contrary to the former commissions, was found in these new writs prior to Pedro de Mascarene. The fraud of office is here evident; and from the resentment of the king, if we suppose he had one idea of justice, it afterwards appeared that this new commission was surreptitiously obtained. Sampayo, when he took the oath to resign to Mascarene, dispatched a message to Malacca with the tidings. Mascarene immediately assumed his power there, and Sampayo, who now expected his arrival, held a council at Cochin. It is almost needless to name the result. He was present, and in power; and it was resolved that Mascarene should not be acknowledged as governor. Sampayo then retired to Goa, and left Mexia at Cochin to give Mascarene the reception concerted between them. Immediately as Mascarene landed, Mexia's spear ran him through the arm, several of his company were wounded by the armed attendants of Mexia, and a retreat to the fleet saved the lives of Mascarene and his friends.

When the tidings of this reached Goa, Henry Figuero, supposed the friend of the ejected governor, was dispossessed of the command of Conlam, and Mexia was by Sampayo appointed to succeed. Anthony de Sylveira was sent to take Mascarene at sea, to put him in irons, and to deliver him prisoner to Simon de Menezes, commander of Cananor; all which was performed. This haughty tyranny, however, produced loud complaints. The murmur was general at Goa. Souza, commander of Chaul, remonstrated, and the brave Hector de Sylveira boldly upbraided Sampayo for his unworthy treatment of Mascarene, to whom a trial had been refused. Sampayo, fierce, and resolute to persist, Hector retired, and summoned the council of Goa. A letter signed by three hundred, who promised to support him as governor, was sent to Mascarene. It was also agreed to seize Sampayo; but he was no stranger to this design, and imprisonment was the fortune of the brave Hector. Menezes, governor of Cananor, as soon as he received information from Goa of the cause why Mascarene was in chains, set him free, and, together with Souza, commandant of Chaul, and Anthony de Azevedo, admiral of the Indian seas, acknowledged him governor. The Portuguese were now on the eve of a war among themselves, when Azevedo and other leaders proposed to accommodate disputes by arbitration. Sampayo with great address managed this affair. He delayed his consent, though on the brink of ruin, till he knew who were named as judges, and till he had procured a pardon for Alonzo Mexia, his friend, who had attempted the life of Mascarene. Yet, though the defenders of this brave officer had influence to remove one of the appointed judges, and to add five others of their own nomination, the arts of Sampayo prevailed. The chief inhabitants of Cochin attended, and, conscious of their former vote in council against Mascarene, declared, that if his title was preferred, they would revolt to the Moors. He who does a man an injury, generally becomes the rancorous enemy of the injured man; and even the friends of him whose power is on the decline, cautiously withdraw from his interest. The council of Goa, who had promised to support, now deserted Mascarene, forward to make their peace where they feared to oppose. Sampayo was declared lawful governor, and Mascarene embarked for Lisbon, where he was honourably received by the king, and, in reward of his merit, appointed governor of Azamor in Africa; on his return from whence he perished at sea.

Sampayo, now undisturbed by a rival, but conscious of the accusations which Mascarene would lay against him, exerted all his abilities to recommend himself to his sovereign. But Almeyda, not Albuquerque, was the pattern he imitated. The principal leaders of the Turkish fleet had been assassinated by the friends of each other, and their war ships were scattered in different places. Sampayo sent Azevedo to destroy all he could find, and Alonzo de Melo was dispatched with a proper force to erect a fort on the island of Sunda. What heavy accusation of his former conduct, devoted to his private interest, was this late execution of these important designs! Other captains were sent upon various expeditions. Hector de Sylveira, one of the most gallant officers ever sent from Portugal to India, greatly distinguished himself; John Deza destroyed the remains of the zamorim's fleets, commanded by Cutiale, a Chinese admiral; and Sampayo himself spread slaughter and devastation over the seas and shores of India. Every where, says Faria, there was fire and sword, ruin and destruction. In the midst of this bloody career, Nunio de Cunha arrived with a commission to succeed Sampayo. Sampayo pleaded to finish what he had begun, to clear the seas of pirates; and Nunio, according to the honour of that age, granted his request, that it might not be said he had reaped the laurels already grasped by another. Some time after this, Nunio, in his way to Cochin, put into the harbour of Cananor. Sampayo, who happened to be there, sent his brother-in-law, John Deza, to Nunio, inviting him to come ashore and receive the resignation of the governor. But Nunio perhaps feared a snare; he insisted that Sampayo should come on board. He came, and, having resigned with the usual solemnities, was ordered by Nunio to attend him to Cochin, where, by order of the new governor, his effects were seized, and his person imprisoned. And soon after, amid the insults of the crowd, he was put on board a ship, and sent prisoner to Lisbon, where his life and his property were left to the determination of the sovereign¹⁷, by whom he was condemned and punished for usurpation. The acts and character of this extraordinary mandemand the attention of every country possessed of colonies. His abilities were certainly of the first rate; but having made one step of villany, the necessity of self-defence rendered his talents of little benefit, rather of great prejudice to his country. The Portuguese writers, indeed, talk in high terms of his eminent services and military glory. But there is a surer test than their opinion. The Indian princes sincerely mourned over the ashes of Albuquerque, whom they called their father; but there was a general joy on the departure of their tyrant Sampayo; a certain proof that his conduct was of infinite prejudice to the interest of Portugal. However high and dreadful they may seem, men in his situation never dare to punish without respect of the offender's connexions. The tyranny of George de Menezes, governor of Maluco, under Sampayo, disgraces human nature. He openly robbed the houses of the Moorish merchants, cut off the hands of some, and looked on, while a magistrate, who had dared to complain, was, by his order, devoured by dogs¹⁸. If the embarrassment of Sampayo was the only protection of this miscreant, others, however, had his sanction. Camoëns, that enthusiast of his nation's honour, in an apostrophe to Mascarene, thus characterizes the regency of the usurper: "Avarice and ambition now in India set their face openly against God and justice; a grief to thee, but not thy shame!" And Camoëns is exceeding accurate in the facts of history, though, with the rest of his countrymen, he admired the military renown of Sampayo. But if Sampayo humbled the Moors, it should also be remembered, that, according to Faria, these people had improved the divisions made by his politics, greatly to the hurt of the Portuguese settlements. And when he did conquer, pushed on by the rage to do something eminent, every victory was truly Gothic, and was in its consequence un-commercial. Malaca, while governed by the injured Mascarene, was the only division of Portuguese Asia where commerce flourished. After his departure, all was wretchedness; Portuguese against Portuguese, piracy and rapine bore and at the Malucas. In what condition the rest were left by Sampayo will soon appear.

The king of Cochin, the valuable ally and auxiliary of the Portuguese, was confined by the small-pox when Nunio arrived. Nunio offered to wait upon him; but the king declined the interview on account of the infection, though a sight of the new governor, he added, he was sure would cure his fever. Nunio waited upon him, and heard a long list of the injuries and rapine committed by Sampayo and Mexia. These, in true policy, Nunio redressed; and the king, who complained that he had been kept as a slave in his own palace, was now made happy. Nunio visited the other princes in alliance with Portugal, and at every court and harbour found oppression and injustice. At Ormuz in particular, tyranny and extortion had defied resistance. Nunio soothed and relieved the wrongs of the various princes. Proclamation was every where made, inviting the injured Moors and Indians to appear before him, and receive redress. Many appeared, and, to the astonishment of all India, justice was conspicuously distributed.

¹⁷ When Sampayo was arrested, "Tell Nunio," said he, "I have imprisoned others, and am now imprisoned, and one will come to imprison him." When this was reported, "Tell Sampayo," said Nunio, "that I doubt it not; but there shall be this difference between us: he deserves imprisonment, but I shall not deserve it." When the ship which carried Sampayo arrived at the isle of Terra, an officer, who waited his arrival, put him in irons. When he landed at Lisbon, he was set upon a mule, loaded with chains, and amid the insults of the populace, carried to the castle, and there confined in a dungeon, where not even his wife was permitted to see him. After two years, the duke of Braganza, who admired his military exploits, procured his trial. When he was brought before the king, who was surrounded with his council and judges, his long white beard, which covered his face, and the other tokens of his sufferings, says Faria, might have moved Mascarene himself to forgiveness. He made a long masterly speech, wherein he enumerated his services, pleaded the necessities of public affairs, and urged the examples of others, who had been rewarded. His defence staggered the king's resolution against him, but his usurpation could not be forgiven. He was sentenced to pay Mascarene 10,000 ducats, to forfeit his allowance as governor, and to be banished into Africa. But he was afterwards allowed to return in a private station to Portugal. His friend, Alonzo Mexia, the inspector of the revenue, was also severely punished, if less than his rapacity deserved may be called severe.

¹⁸ This tyrant, on his return to Lisbon, was banished to the Brazils, where, in a rencounter with the natives, he was taken prisoner, and died the death of an American captive. A death proper to awake the remembrance of his own cruelties. See Introduction, p. 520.

Raaz Xarâf, the creature of Sampaio, prime minister, or rather tyrant of the king of Ormuz, stood accused of the most horrid crimes of office. His rapine had been defended by murder; and the spirit of industry, crushed to the ground, sighed for support amid the desolate streets. Innocence and industry were now protected by Nunio; and Xarâf, though a native of India, was sent in irons to Lisbon to take his trial. Nor was Nunio forgetful of the enemies, while thus employed in restoring to prosperity the allies of Portugal¹⁹. Hector de Sylveira, with a large fleet, made a line across the gulph at the mouth of the Red Sea, and suffered not a Moorish or Egyptian vessel to escape. Anthony Galvam, a very enthusiast in honesty, was sent by Nunio to succeed Ataide, governor of the Maluccos, a tyrant who trod in the steps of Meuzes. All was confusion when Galvam arrived; but he had infinitely more difficulty, says Paria, to suppress the villany of the Portuguese, than to quell the hostile natives. By his wisdom, however, resolution, and most scrupulous integrity, the Maluccos once more became a flourishing settlement, and the neighbouring kings, some of whom he had vanquished, entreated his continuance when he received his recall. Anthony Sylveira spread the terror of his arms along the hostile coast of Cambaya, and from thence to Bengal. Stephen de Gama, son of the great Vasco, was sent to Malaca, which he effectually secured by the repeated defeats of the neighbouring princes in hostility; and the governor himself attempted Dio. But while he was employed in the reduction of the strongly fortified island of Beth, where the brave Hector de Sylveira fell, a great reinforcement commanded by Mustafa, a Turk, entered Dio, and enabled that city to hold out against all the vigorous attacks of Nunio²⁰.

While the governor was thus employed in restoring the strength of the Portuguese settlements, scenes new to the Portuguese opened, and demanded the exertion of all his wisdom and abilities. One of those brutal wars, during which the eastern princes desolate kingdoms and shed the blood of millions, now broke forth. Badur, king of Guzarat or Cambaya, one of those horrid characters common in oriental history, ascended the throne, through the blood of his father and elder brothers. Innumerable other murders, acts of perfidy, and unjust invasion of his neighbours, increased his territories. The Mogul, or king of Delhi, sent a demand of homage and tribute; but Badur slayed the ambassadors alive, and boasted that thus he would always pay his tribute and homage. Armies of about 300,000 men were raised on each side, and alternately destroyed, sometimes by the sword, sometimes by famine. New armies were repeatedly mustered, inferior kingdoms were desolated as they marched along, and Badur was at last reduced to the lowest extremity. In his distress he implored the assistance of the Portuguese, and the Mogul had also made large offers to the governor; but Badur's terms were accepted. His territory lay nearest to Goa, and he not only yielded Dio, a city among almost inaccessible rocks, the great object of the Portuguese plan of empire, but gave permission to Nunio to fortify it as he pleased²¹. And the king of Delhi's army soon after withdrew from Cambaya. The king of Decan, entitled Hydal Can, had about this time laid siege to Golconda with an army of near half a million, but Cotamalucco, the prince whom he besieged, found means to defeat him by famine²². The Hydal Can

²¹ One lago Botello performed the most wonderful voyage, perhaps, upon record, on this occasion. He was an exile in India; and as he knew how earnestly the king of Portugal desired the possession of Dio, he hoped, that to be the messenger of the agreeable tidings would procure his pardon. Having got a draught of the fort, and a copy of the treaty with Badur, he set sail on pretence for Cambaya, in a vessel only sixteen feet and a half long, nine broad, and four and a half deep. Three Portuguese, his servants, and some Indian slaves, were his crew. When out at sea he discovered his true purpose: this produced a mutiny, in which all that were sailors were killed. Botello, however, proceeded, and arrived at Lisbon, where his pardon was all his reward; though, in consequence of his intelligence, a fleet was immediately fitted out, to supply the new acquired garrison. His vessel, by the king's order, was immediately burned, that such evidence of the safety and ease of the voyage to India might not remain.

died suddenly; and Abraham, his son by a slave, one of his principal officers, usurped the throne, and thrust out the eyes of his legitimate son Mutecham, or Mealecan, who was yet in his noilage. Abraham continued the war, and Azadacam, an expert Mohammedan, at the head of a large army, endeavoured to revenge Mutecham, when the people of Decan, desolated by these brutal wars, entreated Nunio to take the dominion of their country, and deliver them from utter ruin. As the Decan forms the continent opposite to Gos, the offer was accepted, and ratified by the consent of Azadacam. Azadacam now fled to the king of Bisnagar, the old enemy of the Decan, and Abraham, now assisted by Cotamalucco, the prince who had been besieged in Gulconda, invaded Bisnagar with an army of 400,000 men and 700 elephants. But while human blood flowed in rivulets, Azadacam made his peace with Abraham, and Cotamalucco, in disgust of the favour shown to his enemy, joined the king of Bisnagar. Badur, who owed the possession of his crown to the Portuguese, now meditating their ruin, entered into a league with the Hydal Can. And Azadacam, who had ratified the treaty, by which the miserable inhabitants of Decan put themselves under the protection of the Portuguese dominion, now advised his master to recover his territory by force of arms. A war ensued, but neither Azadacam, nor Solyman Aga with his Persian auxiliaries, could expel the Portuguese. Hydal Can, tired by the groans of the people, ordered hostilities to cease, but was not obeyed by Azadacam, who, to cover his treason, attempted to poison Hydal Can. His treachery was discovered, yet soon after the traitor bought his pardon with gold, for gold is omnipotent in the sordid courts of the east. Nunio, however, compelled Azadacam to a truce; when a new enemy immediately arose. The zamorin, encouraged by Badur, raised an army of about 50,000 men, but was six times defeated by the Portuguese. Badur had now recourse to perfidy. He entreated a conference with Nunio at Dio, and with Souza, the governor of the fort, with intention to assassinate them both. But ere his scheme was ripe, Souza, one day, in stepping into Badur's barge, fell into the water. He was taken up in safety; but some Portuguese, who at a distance beheld his danger, rowed up hastily to his assistance, when Badur, troubled with a villain's fears, ordered Souza to be killed. Four Portuguese gentlemen, seeing Souza attacked, immediately boarded the barge, and rushed on the tyrant. Iago de Mesqueta wounded him; but though these brave men lost their lives in the attempt, they forced Badur to leap overboard for safety. A commotion in the bay ensued, and the king, unable to swim any longer, declared aloud who he was, and begged assistance. A Portuguese officer held out an oar; but as Badur laid hold of it, a common soldier, moved with honest indignation, struck him over the face with a halbert, and, repeating his blows, delivered the world of a tyrant, whose remorseless perfidy and cruelty had long disgraced human nature.

In this abridged view of the dark barbarous politics, unblushing perfidy, and desolating wars of king Badur, the king of Delhi, and the Hydal Can, we have a complete epitome of the history of India. Century after century contains only a repetition of the same changes of policy, the same desolations, and the same deluges of spilt blood. And who can behold so horrid a picture, without perceiving the inestimable benefits which may be diffused over the east by a potent settlement of Europeans, benefits which true policy, which their own interest demand from their hands, which have in part been given, and certainly will one day be largely diffused? Nunio, as much as possibly he could, improved every opportunity of convincing the natives, that the friendship of his countrymen was capable of affording them the surest defence. Greatly superior to the gross ideas of Gothic conquest, he addressed himself to the reason and the interests of those with whom he negotiated. He called a meeting of the principal inhabitants and merchants of Cambaya, and laid the papers of the dead king before them. By these the treacherous designs of king Badur fully appeared, and his negotiation to engage the grand Turk to drive the Portuguese from India was detected. Coje Zofar, one of the first officers of Badur, and who was present at his death, with several others, witnessed the manner of it: and Moors and Pagans alike acquitted the Portuguese. Letters to this purpose, in Arabic and Persian, signed by Coje Zofar and the chief men of Cambaya, were dispersed by Nunio every where in India and the coasts of Arabia. Nor did this great politician stop here. Superior to bigotry, he did not look to the pope's bull for the foundation of authority. The free exercise of the Mohammedan and Brahmin religions was permitted in every Portuguese territory, and not only the laws, the officers appointed, but even the pensions given by king Badur, were continued. The Portuguese settlements now enjoyed prosperity. A privateering war with the Moors of Mecca, and some hostilities in defence of the princes, his allies, were the sole incumbrances of Nunio, while India was again steeped in her own blood. While the new king of Cambaya was dethroned, while Orsum King of Delhi lost an army of above 400,000 men in Bengal, and while Xercham, the king of that country, together with his own life, lost almost as many in the siege of Calijor, Nunio preserved his territory in the Decan in a state of peace and safety, the wonder and envy of the other provinces of India. But the armament of the Turk, procured by Badur, now arrived, and threatened the destruction of the Portuguese. Selim, sultan of Constantinople, a few years before, had defeated the sultan of Egypt, and annexed his dominions to the Turkish empire. The Mohammedan strength was now more consolidated than ever. The Grand Turk was at war, and meditated conquests in Europe. The traffic of India was the mother and nurse of his naval strength, and the presents sent by king Badur gave him the highest idea of the riches of Indostan. Seventy large vessels, well supplied with cannon and all military stores, under the command of Solyman, bashaw of Cairo, sailed from the port of Soes, to extirpate the Portuguese from India. The seamen were of different nations, many of them Venetian galley-slaves, taken in war, all of them trained sailors; and 7000 janisaries were destined to act on shore. Some Portuguese renegades were also in the fleet; and Coje Zofar²³, who had hitherto been the friend of Nunio, with a party of Cambayans, joined Solyman. The hostile operations began with the siege of Dio; but when Nunio was ready to sail to his relief with a fleet of eighty vessels, Garcia de Noronha arrived with a commission to succeed him as governor. Nunio immediately resigned; and Noronha, in providing a greater force, by a criminal loss of time, reduced the garrison of Dio to the greatest extremity. Here the Portuguese showed miracles of bravery. Anthony de Sylveira, the commander, was in every place. Even the women took arms. The officers' ladies went from rampart to rampart, upbraiding the least appearance of languor. Juan Roderigo, with a barrel of powder in his arms, passed his companions: "Make way," he cried, "I carry my own and many a man's death." His own, however, he did not, for he returned safe to his station: but above a hundred of the enemy were destroyed by the explosion of the powder, which he threw upon one of their batteries. Of 600 men, who at first were in the garrison, forty were not now able to bear arms; when Coje Zofar, irritated by the insolence of Solyman, forged a letter to the garrison, which promised the immediate arrival of Noronha. This, as he designed, fell into the hands of Solyman, who immediately hoisted his sails, and, with the shattered remains of his formidable fleet, fled to Arabia, where, to avoid a more dreaded punishment, he died by his own hands.

But while Nunio thus restored the affairs of India, the uncommercial principles of the court of Lisbon accumulated their malignity. He did not amuse the king and nobility with the glare of unmeaning Gothic conquests, and the wisdom of his policy was by them unperceived. Even their historians seem insensible of it, and even the author of the Histoire Philosophique, in his account of Portuguese India, pays no attention to Nunio, though the wisdom and humanity of his politics do honour to human nature; though in the arts of peace he effected more than any of the Portuguese governors; and though he has left the noblest example for imitation which the history of Portuguese Asia affords. Recalled from his prosperous government by the mandate of a court blind to its true interest, chains in place of rewards were prepared in Portugal for this great commander; but his death at sea, after a happy regency of about ten years, prevented the completion of his country's ingratitude.

Noronha, the new viceroy, the third who had been honoured with that superior title²⁴, began his government with an infamous delay of the succours destined by Nunio for Dio. Coje Zofar, by the same spirit of delay, was permitted, long after the departure of Solyman, to harass the Portuguese of that important place. The Hydal Cen, many other princes, and even the zamorim himself, awed by the dignity and justice of Nunio's government, had entreated the alliance of Portugal, and Noronha had the honour to negotiate a general peace; a peace which, on the part of the zamorim, gave the Portuguese every opportunity to strengthen their empire, for it continued thirty years.

These transactions, the privateering war with the Moors; some skirmishes in Ceylon; the design, contrary to the king's commission, to appoint his son to succeed him; his death, and the public joy which it occasioned; comprise the history of the regency of the unworthy successor of the generous Nunio.

Both the Portuguese and the natives gave unfeigned demonstrations of joy on the appointment of Stephen de Gama, the son of the great Vasco. By his first act he ordered his private estate to be publicly valued, and by his second he lent a great sum to the treasury, which by Noronha was left exhausted. He visited and repaired the forts, and refitted the fleets in every harbour. By his officers he defeated the king of Achem, who disturbed Malacca. He restored tranquillity in Cambaya, where the Portuguese territory was invaded by a very powerful army, led by Bramaluco, a prince who had been dethroned

²³ This officer was by birth an Albanese, of catholic parents, and had served in the wars in Italy and Flanders. Having commenced merchant, he was taken at sea by the Turks, and carried to Constantinople, from whence he went to Cambaya, where he embraced Mohammedism, and became the prime minister and favourite of king Badur.

²⁴ Almeyda and Gama were the only two who had been thus honoured before him.

by king Badur; and his brother Christoval he sent on an expedition into Ethiopia⁶⁶. The Moors of Mecca, as already observed, were the most formidable enemies the Portuguese had hitherto found in the east. In naval art they were greatly superior to the other nations of Asia, and from their numerous fleets, which poured down the Red Sea, the Portuguese had often experienced the greatest injury; and a check to their power was now wanted. The governor himself undertook this expedition, and sailed to the Red Sea with a fleet equipped at his own private expense. Here he gave a severe wound to the naval strength of both the Turks and the Moors⁶⁷. But while every thing was in prosperity under the brave and generous Stephen, he was suddenly superseded by the elevation of Martin Alonzo de Souza. Though no policy can be more palpably ruinous than that which recalls a governor of decided abilities ere he can possibly complete any plan of importance, yet such recalls, ere now, had been frequently issued from the court of Lisbon. But none of them, perhaps, gave a deeper wound to the Portuguese interest than this. Stephen de Gama trod in the steps of his father, of Albuquerque, and of Nunio. Souza's actions were of a different character. He began his government with every exertion to procure witnesses to impeach his predecessor; but though he pardoned a murderer⁶⁸ on that condition, every accusation was refuted, and Stephen de Gama was received with great honour at Lisbon. Having refused, however, to give his hand to a bride, chosen for him by John III, he found it convenient to banish himself from his native country, the country which his father had raised to its highest honours. And he retired to Venice, his estate 40,000 crowns less than when he entered upon his short government of two years and one month.

Wars of a new character now took place. By the toleration which Nunio gave to the religions of the natives he rendered the Portuguese settlements happy and flourishing. But gloomy superstition now prevailed, and Souza was under the direction of priests, who esteemed the butcheries of religious persecution as the service of Heaven. The temples of Malabar were laid in ashes, and thousands of the unbappy natives, for the crime of idolatry, were slaughtered upon their ruined altars. This the Portuguese historians mention as the greatest honour of the piety of their countrymen, ignorant of the detestation which such cruelty must certainly bring upon the religion which inspires it; ignorant too, that true religion, under the toleration of a Nunio, possesses its best opportunity to conquer the heart by the display of its superior excellence. Nor was Souza's civil government of the Portuguese less capricious. Highly chagrined to see the military rank unenvied, and his forces weakened by the great numbers who quitted the service on purpose to enrich themselves in the coasting trade, he endeavoured to render commerce both disadvantageous and infamous. He laid the custom-houses under new regulations. He considerably lowered the duties on the traffic of all Moorish and Asiatic merchants, and greatly heightened the rates on the Portuguese traders. And felons and murderers, banished from Lisbon, were by Souza protected and encouraged to become merchants, as only proper for such employ. Yet while he thus laboured to render the military service as only worthy of Portuguese ambition, he began his regency with a reduction of the pay of the military. At the siege of Batecala, the Portuguese soldiers quarrelled about the booty, and, while fighting with each other, were attacked by the natives, and put to flight. Souza commanded them to return to the charge and revenge their repulse. "Let those who are rich revenge it," exclaimed the soldiers, "we came to make good by plunder the pay of which we are unjustly deprived."—"I do not know you," replied Souza, "you are not the same men I left in India two years ago." To this the soldiery loudly returned, "Yes, the men are the same, but the governor is not the same." Finding the mutiny violent, Souza retired to the ships; but the next day he renewed the siege, and the city was taken, and the streets ran with blood: such was the rage of the army to recompense themselves by plunder. The yearly tribute imposed by Albuquerque upon the king of Ormuz was 12,000 ducats. It was now raised to 100,000, and the king, unable to discharge such an enormous burthen, was 500,000 ducats in arrear; and a resignation of all the revenues of his crown was proposed, and accepted by Souza, Azadacem, now in open war with his master the Hydal Can Abraham, drew Souza to his party. The design was to dethrone Abraham, who was then in alliance with the Portuguese, and to place Mealecan his brother in his dominions. The Portuguese officers murmured at this shameless injustice; but only Pedro de Faria, trusting to his venerable years, had the courage to remonstrate with the governor. Souza, haughty as he was, listened to the man of fourscore, and confessed that he had saved both his life and his honour. The attempt, however, was highly resented by the Hydal Can, who gathered such a storm to crush the Portuguese, that Souza, foreseeing the tempest which was hovering over him, threatened to open the writs of succession, and resign to the governor next named. He complained that he could not govern men who had neither truth nor honour: he did not consider, however, that his unjust treatment of the common soldiers occasioned their disorder and disobedience. But while he thus meditated a treacherous and cowardly retreat, treacherous because it was to desert his post in the hour of danger, a fleet from Portugal brought the great John de Castro, the successor of the embarrassed undetermined Souza.

⁶⁶ For his melancholy fate, see note to book x. ver. 685.

⁶⁷ During this expedition he took the important city and sea-port of Toro in Arabia; after which he marched to mount Sinai, where he knighted several of his officers, a romantic honour admired by Charles V. De Luis de Ataide, having behaved with great courage as a volunteer, at the battle where Charles V. defeated the duke of Saxony, was offered knighthood by the emperor; but he replied, he had already received that honour upon mount Sinai. The emperor, so far from being offended, declared in presence of his officers, that he more envied that honour than rejoiced in his victory. The same spirit of romantic gallantry, arising from religious veneration, seems to have possessed don Stephen himself. He ordered his epitaph to consist of these words, "He that made knights upon mount Sinai ended his course here." Don Alvaro, the son of the great John de Castro, was also one of these knights, and his father thought it so great an honour, that he took for his crest the Catherine-wheel, which his family still retains. There is a chapel dedicated to St. Catherine on mount Sinai, said, by the popish writers, to have been built by angels.

The naval and military strength of the Portuguese in India was in a very sickly condition. Great discontent among the few who were honest; all was villany and disorder, rapine and piracy among the rest. On the solicitations of Souza, Meale Can took refuge in Goa. When the Hydal Can made his formidable preparations for war, he demanded as the previous condition of peace, that Meale should be delivered up to him. This Souza refused, but promised to send him to Malaca, where he should remain under guard. Immediately on the accession of Castro, the Hydal Can renewed his proposal for the surrender of Meale, who was yet at Goa; but the new governor rejected this demand with firmness. It was deemed good policy by several of the Portuguese governors to espouse the cause of this injured prince⁶⁸. They esteemed him as an engine, which, under their management, would either overawe the Hydal Can, or dethrone him when they pleased. But the event did not justify this theoretical wisdom. It had been pusillanimity in Castro, had he surrendered a prince who was under protection of the Portuguese faith; but the contrary conduct, the consequence of Souza's policy, produced an invasion of the Portuguese continental territory; and though Castro was victorious, the Hydal Can continued ever ready for hostilities, and occasion was ever at hand. Scarcely had Castro given Hydal Can the first repulse, when Mahumud, the nephew of king Badur, the heir of his crown and fierce disposition, instigated by Cuje Zofar, and assisted by the Hydal Can and about 8000 troops from Constantnople, among whom were 1000 janisaries, commenced hostilities, and threatened the total extirpation of the Portuguese: their warlike operations began with the siege of Dio. John de Mascarene, the governor, made a brave defence, and the Portuguese displayed many prodigies of valour. Azadacem, Cuje Zofar, and others, of the greatest military reputation, directed the attacks, and perished in their attempts. Whenever a breach was made, the Turks and Indians pressed on by ten thousands, but were always repulsed. Nor were the ladies of the officers less active and courageous than in the former siege. Various reinforcements were sent by the governor, one of which was commanded by his son don Fernando. Unnumbered artillery thundered on every side, and mines were sprung, by one of which Fernando was with his battalion blown up in the air. When Castro received the tidings of this disaster, he was at Goa. He bore it with the greatest composure, and though it was the tempestuous season, he immediately dispatched his other son don Alvaro with another reinforcement to Dio. After eight months had elapsed in this desperate siege, the governor arrived with a large fleet, and without opposition entered the fort. From thence he marched out at the head of 2500 Portuguese, and some auxiliaries of Cochim. The numerous army of Mahumud continued in their trenches, which were defended with ramparts and a profusion of artillery. But the enemy were driven from their works, and pursued with incredible slaughter through the streets of the city. Rume Can, the son of Zofar, rallied about 8000 of his bravest troops, and was totally defeated by Castro⁶⁹. It was necessary to prosecute the war; and the governor, ⁶⁸ The Portuguese historians disagree in their accounts of this Hydal Can Abraham. Barros says, he was not of the blood royal. But Faria, who selected his work from Barros, and several other authors, calls him the brother of Meale; whom he unjustly dethroned. When Souza, on pretence of doing justice, endeavoured to place Meale on the throne, the usurper in an artful epistle asked him what right the Portuguese had to dethrone the kings of the east, and then pretend to do justice to an exiled prince? Possession, he said, proved the approbation of God; and the Portuguese, he added, had no other title to dominion in Asia.

⁶⁹ During the heat of this engagement, father Casal, with a crucifix on the point of a spear, greatly animated the Portuguese. Rume Can, notwithstanding all the efforts of Castro, put his troops, in great want of money to carry it on, meditated a loan of 20,000 pardaos from the citizens of Goa. He ordered the grave of don Fernando his son to be opened, on purpose to send his bones as a pledge; but the putrid state of the carcase prevented this, and he sent a lock of his own mustache as a security for the loan; a security indeed uncommon, but which included in it a signal pawn of his honour. The pledge was respectfully returned, and more money than he required was sent; and even the women stripped themselves of their bracelets and other jewels to supply his want. The ladies of Chaul followed the example, and by the hands of their little daughters sent him their richest jewels. The jewels, however, he returned; and having with great assiduity improved his naval and military strength, he and his captains carried fire and sword over the dominions of the hostile princes, while Hydal Can, with an army of 150,000 men, retired before him. The king of Achem was also defeated at Malaca, and the stubborn villany of the debauched Portuguese soldiers and traders was the only enemy unsubdued. To prevent the ruin of the state, says his historian Andrada, he made it unlawful for a soldier to become merchant. But while he laboured in this much more arduous war, in correcting the abuses of the revenue, and the distribution of justice, grief, it is said, impaired Castro's health, and hastened his end, at a time when Hydal Can and all who had been in arms against the Portuguese were suing for peace. On the approach of death he appointed a council of select persons to take the management of affairs. And so poor was the great Castro, that the first act of this committee was an order to supply the expenses of his death-bed from the king's revenue; for a few reals, not half a dozen, was all the property found in his cabinet.³⁰

With the eulogium of Castro, Camoëns concludes his prophetic song, and here also the most glorious period of the Portuguese empire in Asia terminates. But the circumstances of its fall, and the noble and partly successful struggles which it sometimes made, when its total extinction seemed inevitable, are highly worthy of the attention of the political philosopher, and form also the necessary conclusion of this history.

Garcia de Sa, an experienced officer, succeeded Castro, and concluded the various treaties of peace, procured by the arms, and in agitation at the death of that great man, highly to the advantage and honour of Portugal. The celebrated St. Francis Xavier was now a principal character in Portuguese Asia. And while the conversion of the east was all he professed, he rendered the throne of Portugal the most political service. His unremitting diligence, and the danger and toil of his journeys from kingdom to kingdom, bespeak a great mind, ardently devoted to his enterprise; and the various princes who received baptism from his hands, and the many thousands who, on his preaching, assumed the Christian name, displayed a success which his admirers esteemed miraculous. Nothing, however, could be easier than such conversion. Xavier troubled his new converts with no restraint, and required from them at last in great disorder. But though the general could not, the priest led them to victory. A weapon broke off an arm of the crucifix, and Casal exclaiming aloud, "Sacrilege, sacrilege, revenge the sacrilege," inspired a fury which determined the battle. In many other engagements the leaders promoted their interest in this manner. They often saw the sign of the cross in the air, and at different times some Moorish prisoners inquired after the beautiful young woman, and venerable old man, who appeared in the front of the Portuguese squadrons. And the Portuguese soldiers, who saw no such personages, were thus taught to believe themselves under the particular care of the virgin and St. Joseph.

³⁰ Castro, though he disdained private emolument, was fond of public magnificence. After his victories he frequently entered Goa in the manner of a Roman triumph. That, after his happy return from Dio, was so remarkably splendid, that the queen of Portugal said, he had conquered like a Christian, but had triumphed like a heathen. The gates and houses were hung with silk and tapestry. The cannon and arms taken from the enemy were carried in the front. The officers in armour, with plumed helmets, followed: Castro, crowned with laurel, and with a laurel bough in his hand, walked upon silk, while the ladies from the windows showered flowers and perfumes upon him; and Casal, with the maimed crucifix, walked in his surplice immediately before him. Military and church music by turns resounded. And Jazarcan, the general of the Indian horse, and 600 prisoners, guarded and in chains, closed the procession. When he wrote to the king of Portugal the particulars of the relief of Dio, he solicited his recall; but this was rejected, and he was appointed to continue three years longer, with the additional honour of the title of viceroy. His school companion, the infant don Lewis, wrote him an affectionate letter requesting his acquiescence, in which he uses this expression: "After your performance of the royal will, I trust you will cover the tops of the rocks of Cintra with chapels and trophies of your victories, and long enjoy them in profound repose." Cintra, for rocky hills, woods, and rivers, the most romantic situation in nature, was the family estate of Castro. It is said he was the first who brought the orange-tree to Europe, and that he esteemed this gift to his country, as the greatest of his actions. Three orange-trees are still preserved at Cintra, in memorial of the place where he first planted that valuable fruitage. He died, soon after he was named viceroy, in his forty-eighth year. His family still remain.

no knowledge of the Christian principles. He baptized them, and gave them crucifixes to worship, and told them they were now sure of Heaven. But while he was thus superficial as an apostle, as a politician he was minute and comprehensive. Several friars of different orders had ere now attempted the conversion of some Indians; but a regular system, of the most extensive operation, was reserved for the sons of Ignatius Loyola; and Xavier, his friend and arch-disciple, laid the bold and arduous plan of reducing the whole east to the spiritual vassalage of the papal chair. What is implied in this he well knew, and every offer of religious instruction which he made, was attended with the most flattering promises of alliances; of alliances, however, which were calculated to render the natives dependent on the Portuguese, and mere tributaries. In this plan of operation the great abilities of Xavier were crowned with rapid success. Kings and kingdoms, won by his preaching, sued for the friendship of the Portuguese. But while the offer of peace seemed ready to spread its boughs over India, the unrelenting villainy of the Portuguese soldiers and merchants counteracted the labours of Xavier; and several of the new baptized princes, in resentment of the injuries they received, returned to paganism and hostility. Xavier, who acted as a spy on the military and civil government of India, not only, from time to time, laid these abuses before the king of Portugal, but also interested himself greatly both in the military²² and civil councils of Portuguese Asia. He was the intimate friend and counsellor of the great Castro, and his political efforts were only baffled by the hardened corruption of the Portuguese manners.

While Xavier thus laboured in the direction of the springs of government, Garcia de Sa died suddenly, and in authority was succeeded by George de Cabral. The sarravin, the king of Pimenta, and eighteen vassal princes, among whom was the late converted king of Tamor, who now had renounced his baptism, joined in a league against the king of Cochin, the faithful ally of Portugal, and took the field with near 200,000 men. Cabral basted to the assistance of Cochin, and in several expeditions gained considerable advantages over the enemy. The enemy's main army was now in the island of Cochin, and Cabral with 100 sail, and an army of 40,000 Cochinians, had reduced them to the lowest extremity; when, on the very day upon which the eighteen vassal princes were to have been given up as hostages, a new viceroy, don Alonzo de Noronha, arrived, and instantly stopped the operations of Cabral; and by the misunderstanding between the two governors, the whole army of the enemy escaped. Xavier remonstrated, by letter, in the strongest terms to the king of Portugal, and advised the severity of punishment; but to these salutary warnings no attention was paid by the court of Lisbon.

During Sá's government, the coasting trade of the private adventurers became more and more piratical, and continually gave birth to an endless succession of petty but bloody wars. Though the king of Cochin had ever been the faithful ally of Portugal, Cabral ordered, without even the pretence of complaint, one of his richest pagodas²³ to be plundered. This attempt, in the true spirit of the private traders, was defeated; but the royal monopoly, already miserably inadequate both to its means and object, suffered by this breach of faith. It was the cause, says Ferri, that the homeward fleet, of only three ships, set out ill laden, and late in the season, when the tempests were coming on.

When Noronha opened his patent of commission, he found that his power had received a limitation unknown before. A council was therein nominated, by whose advice he was enjoined to govern. But it does not appear, from his envious and ruinous transaction with Cabral, or from any other of his measures, that he was either restrained or influenced by their control. Petty wars and usual depredation marked the beginning of his regency; the latter part of it was truly infamous. The Portuguese had valuable settlements in the rich island of Ceylon, and the king of Cota, their ally, was now treacherously invaded, in breach of a solemn peace, by Madure king of Ceytavaca. In one of the first battles the king of Cota lost his life, and his successor implored the stipulated assistance of the Portuguese. Noronha himself hastened to Ceylon, and his first action was to put to the rack some of the domestics of the king whom he came to defend, in order to make them discover their prince's treasures. He then ²² In 1547 Malaca was saved by Xavier. The king of Achem, the inveterate enemy of Portugal, fitted out 60 vessels against that port. And when the governor refused to sail in search of the enemy, ere they were fully equipped, Xavier persuaded the merchants to fit out ten vessels. He went on board, and, by his persuasions and prophecies of success, so encouraged this small squadron, that they gained a complete victory over the fleet of Achem.

²³ The Indian pagodas or temples are the repositories of their most valuable treasures. When they intend to build a pagoda, says Ferri, they sow the ground with kidney-beans. When these are green, they bring a gray cow to feed among them, and on the spot where she first dungs, they erect the throne of the idol to whom the pagoda, which they build around it, is to be dedicated. Pythagoras's veneration for beans, together with his metempsychosis, was perhaps borrowed from the Indians.

plundered the palace of the late king, and demanded 200,000 ducats to defray his charges, which sum was immediately given to him. He afterwards defeated Madure, and rased his city in search of treasure, and very considerable riches were found. By agreement one half of the booty was due to the king of Cota, but Noronha paid no regard to the faith of treaty. Nor would he leave one Portuguese soldier to defend his injured ally, though earnestly solicited, and though the king of Ceytavaca remained in the mountains ready for revenge on the departure of the viceroy²².

The Grand Turk, still intent on the extirpation of the Portuguese from India, fitted out three formidable squadrons during the regency of Noronha. The first, commanded by a bold pirate named Pirbec, sailed from Suez with an armament of 16,000 men. He plundered the Portuguese settlement at Mascate, and even the city of Ormuz, though the fort held out against him. Having also plundered other coasts, he returned to Constantinople with great riches, which he presented to the sultan. But, as nothing effectual was done towards the extirpation of the Europeans, in place of reward, Pirbec's head was struck off by order of the grand signior.

The strenuous and long continued efforts of the Porte to expel the Portuguese from the eastern seas, display the vast importance of the naval superiority of the Europeans in Asia. Though immediate gain seems to have been the sole motive of the Europeans who first went to India, the Moors and Turks perceived the remote political consequences of their arrival, in the clearest light. Dissatisfied with the undecided expedition of Pirbec, two other formidable Turkish squadrons were sent against the Portuguese. But both of these were commanded by officers of mean abilities, and were totally defeated by shipwreck and battle. The zamorim and the king of Pimenta, whose combined army Noronha had formerly permitted to escape, had continued, during the war in Ceylon and with the Turks, to harass the Portuguese fleets, and the king of Cochin, their ally. Noronha, now at leisure, went in person to revenge these insults, and the rich islands of Alçada, subject to the king of Pimenta, after a desperate defence, were destroyed with fire and sword. Our military poet, Camoëns, at this time arrived in India, and discovered his valour as a volunteer in this expedition.

While the royal monopoly and the coasting trade were thus reduced and exposed, under the languor and weakness of the military operations, the active spirit of Xavier was untired. Having visited almost every settlement, every where endeavouring to inspire political vigour and unanimity, he was now busied in adding the Chinese language to his other laborious acquirements of the oriental tongues; for the spiritual dominion of China was the grand object of his stupendous plan. But, alarmed at the spreading odium raised by the cruel and unjust actions of Noronha in Ceylon, he hasted thither, for he foresaw the malign influence of the Portuguese insolence and oppression. From Ceylon he went to the Maluccos and Japan, and when ready to enter China, his death in the isle of Sancyon closed his unwearied labours of twelve years in the east. To restrain the Portuguese injustice and tyranny, and to win the affection of the natives, were the means by which Xavier endeavoured to establish his stupendous plan of the vasaalage of the eastern world. And, had he lived in the more virtuous days of Albuquerque, his views would probably have been crowned with success. By the mean artifices and frauds of the Jesuits who succeeded in his mission, whose narrow minds were earnest for present emolument, what good effects the superior mind of Xavier had produced, were soon counteracted, and totally lost.

After a regency of three years, don Alphonso de Noronha was succeeded by don Pedro de Mascarenhas, a gentleman in his seventieth year. Meale Can was now at Goa. Mascarene adopted the former policy of supporting Meale's title to the throne of Hydal Can, and proclaimed him king of Visapor. But Mascarene's death, ere he had governed thirteen months, closed his regency, and Francisco Barreto, his successor, entering into his views, and desirous of the immense emoluments of an Indian war, prosecuted his designs. The great Castro, by his patronage of Meale, had kept the Hydal Can in awe; but Castro's faith and abilities were now wanting. In breach of a treaty of peace with the Hydal Can, and on pretence of doing justice to an exiled prince, Barreto kindled a war, which proved highly injurious to the Portuguese. Meale was defeated and taken prisoner in his kingdom of Visapor; and several bloody undecided campaigns displayed the resentment of the Hydal Can²³. Nor were the affairs of the Maluccos less unhappy. Deza, the Portuguese governor, treacherously imprisoned the king of Ternate and his whole family, and ordered them to be starved to death. He was relieved, ²² By order of the king of Portugal, and by means of Xavier, the extortions of Noronha were afterwards restored to the king of Cota.

²³ See the note on Barreto, in the Life of Camoëns.

however, by the neighbouring princes, who took arms in his defence; and the submission of the Portuguese, who deprived Deza of his command, ended the war.

While the military reputation of the Portuguese had almost lost its terrors, while their empire in the east was thus hastening to its fall, John III was succeeded by Sebastian, an infant; and don Constantine de Braganza, of the blood-royal, was appointed deputy-king of India. He governed three years, and never performed one action which did honour to his abilities. The officers he sent out on various expeditions were generally defeated, particularly in a war with the Turks on the coasts of Arabia. He himself shared the same fate, and once saved his life, at the city of Jafanapatan, by inglorious flight. His views were of no importance. He imprisoned Luis de Melo for losing too much time in a victorious expedition on the coast of Malabar. In a descent on Ceylon, the Portuguese seized the tooth of a monkey, a relic held sacred by the pagans, for which, according to Lipschoten, 700,000 ducats were offered in ransom; but Constantine ordered it to be burned. The kings of Siam and Pegu pretended the real tooth was saved by a Bannian, and each asserting that he was in possession of the genuine one, bloody wars, which much endangered the Portuguese eastern settlements, were kindled; and Constantine, finding himself embarrassed, resigned, contrary to the desire of the council of Lisbon. He is celebrated for his great politeness and affability; and his government is distinguished by the establishment of the inquisition at Goa.

Don Constantine was succeeded by the count de Redondo. Petty wars continued as usual on every coast. In 1564, a Portuguese ship, contrary to the treaty of peace, was attacked by three vessels of Malabar; Redondo complained, and was answered by the zamorin, that some rebels had done it, whom he was welcome to seize and chastise. Irritated by this reply, and on purpose to retort it, he sent Dominic de Mesquita with three ships to scour the coast of Malabar. And Mesquita soon murdered above 9000 Malabrians, the greatest part of whom he sewed up in their own sail cloths and wantonly drowned. Redondo, however, died suddenly, ere the zamorin complained; but such was the sameness of ideas among the Portuguese, that Juan de Mendoza, his successor, in answer to the zamorin's complaint, adopted the intended witticism of Redondo, and retorted the zamorin's reply, "it was done by rebels, whom he was welcome to seize and chastise." A spirited reprisal is often the most decisive measure; but this inhuman one, surely, was not dictated by wisdom. A bold woman of quality, whose husband had been murdered by Mesquita, with all the fury ascribed to an ancient druidess, ran from place to place, execrating the Portuguese, and exciting to revenge. Many of the Moors entered into an oath, never to lay down their arms till they had rooted the Portuguese out of India. They suddenly beset the fort of Cananor, and burned above thirty Portuguese ships that rode under its cannon; and a tedious war ensued. Mendoza, after six months, was superseded by don Antonio de Noronha, who ended the war of Cananor with the desolation of the adjacent country. Confusion and bloodshed covered the rich island of Ceylon, and the new converts, the allies of Portugal, were hunted down by the other natives. The king of Achem and other princes began now to mediate a general league for the extirpation of the Portuguese. And the Grand Turk, desirous of acquisition in India, became a zealous auxiliary. But though the first attempt upon Malaca was defeated by the valour of don Leonis, the commander, the league continued in agitation, while the Portuguese seemed to invite and to solicit their own destruction. The rapine of individuals became every year more shameless and general. While an idiotic devotion to saints and images rendered them inexorable in their cruelty to those of a different worship, they abandoned themselves without restraint to the most lascivious luxury, and every officer had his seraglio of five, six, or eight of the finest women. Indian women of quality were publicly dragged from their kindred by Portuguese ravishers. The inhabitants of Amboyna had received the Portuguese with the greatest friendship. At a banquet given by the natives, a young officer, in the face of all the company, and in presence of her husband, attempted to ravish one of the principal ladies, and was unreprieved by his countrymen. The tables were instantly overturned, and the Portuguese expelled the island. And here, as at Ceylon and other parts of India, the popular fury was first glutted with the blood of those natives, now esteemed as traitors, who had embraced the religion of the Portuguese. Immediately another most daring breach of humanity called aloud upon the princes of the east to unite in the defence of each other. Ayero²³, king of Ter-state, had always been friendly and tributary to the Portuguese; yet on receiving a treaty of alliance, after having mutually sworn on the arms of Portugal, he was stabbed by order of the Portuguese commander. Nor did this treachery appease the murderer. In presence of his queen and daughters, who in vain implored permission to bury him, his body was cut into pieces and salted, put into a chest, and thrown into the sea. He had a son, however, Chil Babu, who, in revenge of this, proved the most formidable enemy the Portuguese had ever known in the east. His ambassadors hastened from court to court, and the princes of India, harassed by their cruel awful tyrants, who trampled on every law of humanity and good policy, combined with him in a general league for the utter expulsion of the Portuguese; and so confident were the natives of success, that not only the division of the Portuguese settlements, but the possession of the most beautiful of their wives and daughters, was also settled among them. Five years was this league in forming, and eastern politics never produced a better concerted plan of operation. The various forts and territories of the Portuguese were allotted to the neighbouring princes. Goa, Onor, and Bragalor were to reward the victories of the Hydal Can; Chaul, Damnam, and Baçaim were to be taken by Nizamaloo, a king of the Decan; the zamorim was to possess himself of Cannor, Nungalur, Cochim, and Chale; the king of Achem was to reduce Malacca; and the king of Ternate was to attack the Malucos. Besides these, many other princes had their appointed lines of action; and this tremendous storm was to burst, in every quarter, at the same instant. Don Luis de Ataide was governor of India when this war began. The Hydal Can, with an army which consisted of 100,000 infantry, 35,000 horse, 9140 elephants, and 530 pieces of cannon, covered the continent opposite to Goa for several leagues, and the disposition of his extensive posts displayed great generalship. Every eminence was fortified, and his batteries, of two leagues in extent, thundered upon Goa. The dispositions of Ataide, however, not only protected that island, but his unexpected invasions often carried terror and slaughter through this immense encampment. The Hydal Can, though greatly dispirited, began to plant gardens and orchards, and build banqueting-houses, as if resolved to conquer, at whatever distance of time. While Goa was thus besieged, Chaul, a place of less defence, was invested by Nizamaloo, at the head of an army of 150,000 men, Turks, Moors, Ethiopians, Persians, and Indians. The king of Ternate attacked the Malucos; the queen of Gariopa carried her arms against Onor; and Surat was seized by Agalchem, a prince tributary to the Mogul. And even the ancient Christians of St. Thomas, persecuted by the inquisition of Goa, for non-submission to the see of Rome¹⁶, joined the Pagans and Mohammedans against the natives of Portugal. But where ever the embers of haughty valour remain, danger and an able general will awake them into a flame. Don Luis, the victor, was advised to withdraw the Portuguese from the exterior parts for the support of Goa, the seat of their empire. But this he gallantly refused, and even permitted a fleet with 400 men to sail for Portugal¹⁷. The zamorim and the king of Achem, having met some repulses at sea, were not punctual in the agreed commencement of hostility. This favoured Ataide; and no sooner did he gain an advantage in one place, than he sent relief to another. He and the best troops hastened from fort to fort, and victory followed victory, till the leaders of this most formidable combination sued for peace. A signal proof of what valour and military art may do against the greatest multitudes of undisciplined militia.

²³ This is the same prince whom Deza treacherously imprisoned, and attempted to starve. He continued, however, faithful to the Portuguese, till his nephew was murdered by some of their officers. Three of the aggressors were seized by the king's order, and put to death. On renewing the alliance with the Portuguese, he was treacherously murdered by the commandant's nephew. As he was stab-

bed, he laid hold of a cannon which bore the arms of Portugal, and exclaimed, "Ah! cavaliers, is it thus you reward the most faithful subject of your king my sovereign!"

¹⁶ See Geddes's History of the Malabrian Church. The Christians of St. Thomas, according to the Portuguese historians, disturbed the new converts, by telling them that the religion the Portuguese taught them was not Christianity. This gave great offence to the Jesuits, who in revenge persecuted the Thomists with all the horrors of the newly established inquisition. The following short account of the Christians of the east may perhaps be acceptable. In the south parts of Malabar, about 200,000 of the inhabitants professed Christianity before the arrival of the Portuguese. They called themselves the Christians of St. Thomas, by which apostle their ancestors had been converted. For 1300 years they had been under the patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their metropolitane or archbishop. Dr. Geddes, in his History of the church of Malabar, relates, that Francisco Roz, a Jesuit missionary, complained to Menezes, the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, that when he showed these people an image of our Lady, they cried out, "Away with that filthiness! we are Christians, and do not adore idols or pagods."

Don Frey Aleixo de Menezes, archbishop of Goa, did "endeavour to thrust upon the church of Malabar the whole mass of popery, which they were before unacquainted with." To this purpose he had engaged all the neighbouring princes to assist him; "and had secured the major part of the priests present, in all one hundred and fifty-three, whereof two thirds were ordained by himself, and made them abjure their old religion, and subscribe the creed of pope Pius IV."—Miller's History of the Progress of Christianity.

¹⁷ This was the trading fleet, or regal monopoly, the delay of which might have produced his recall.

A highly honourable peace was concluded with Nizamaluco; but while the Hydai Can was in treaty, and while the zamorim, who was now in arms both by sea and land, proposed conditions to which Ataide would not listen²⁸, that brave commander was superseded by the arrival of his successor, Antonio de Noronha. When Ataide left India, the Hydai Can was still before Goa, and the new viceroy had the honour to conclude the treaty of peace. But the important fortress of Chale, near Calicut, surrendered to the zamorim, who was still in arms. And the new commission of Noronha involved the east in perplexities unknown before. At the very time when the league began to exert its apparently invincible force, at that very time king Sebastian, now about his sixteenth year, divided his eastern empire, as if it had been in the most flourishing condition, into three governments, independent of each other. Noronha was to command from Cape Gardafa, on the mouth of the Red Sea, to the coast of Pegu, with the title of viceroy of India. From Gardafa to Cape Corrientes, below Madagascar, was given to Francisco Barreto, late governor of Portuguese Asia, now entitled governor of Monomotapa; and from Pegu to China, with the title of governor of Malacca, was appointed to Antonio Moniz Barreto. In this pompous division of empire, Moniz Barreto was to be equipped from India; but Portuguese India could not afford the force which his patent appointed, and Moniz refused to sail to Malacca with an inferior equipment. The celebrated Echebar, the Great Mogul, or emperor of Hindostan, had now possessed himself of the throne of Cambaya²⁹, and as Basaim and Damam had formerly belonged to that kingdom, he meditated the recovery of these territories from the Portuguese: but while he was ready to invest Damam, Noronha entered the river with so formidable a fleet, that Echebar consented to a peace which confirmed the Portuguese right of possession, on condition of their alliance. The king of Achem, who according to the league was to have invaded Malacca, now performed his part, and reduced that settlement, which had no governor, to the deepest distress. The arms of Ternate were also prosperous in the Malucas. To the relief of these Noronha sent some supplies, but while he was preparing to send more, an order from Portugal arrived, which empowered don Gaspar archbishop of Goa to depose Noronha, and invest Moniz with the government of India. Don Leonis de Pereyra was at the same time appointed governor of Malacca. Moniz urged him to sail to the relief of his settlement, but Leonis refused to go thither with less than the appointed equipment. Though on the private accusations of Moniz, Noronha was degraded for a like refusal; though Noronha was then at war, and Moniz now at peace; and though Leonis abated in his demand, Moniz was immovable. Leonis therefore sailed for Portugal, where his conduct was justified, yet no punishment allotted to Moniz; such was the unflinching partiality with which the ministers of Sebastian governed the falling empire of Portuguese Asia.

While Malacca was thus deserted by its governor, the king of Achem and the queen of Japan, with numerous fleets and armies, poured all the horrors of war upon that valuable territory. Time after time, as the shattered fleets of the one retired to repair, the new armaments of the other immediately filled their stations. And the king of Ternate, the author of the league, was victorious in the isles of Maluco. The several supplies of relief, sent by Moniz, one of which consisted of 2000 troops, all perished by shipwreck ere they reached their destined ports. The murderer of king Ayco was stabbed by the populace, and the Portuguese were totally expelled from this settlement, which commanded the spice islands. Nor was the government of Francis Barreto, in Monomotapa, less unhappy. He, who had been governor of India, says Paris, accepted of this diminished command for three reasons; because he was poor, because it was the king's will, and because it was a post of great danger. His commission was to make himself master of the mines which supply Sofala and the neighbouring ports with gold and silver: and one Mouchiaros, a jesuit, accompanied him, without whose concurrence he was prohibited to act. He sailed from Lisbon, with only three ships and a thousand men, in 1569, and having received some supplies at Mozambique, together with tools for miners, camels³⁰ and other beasts of burden,

²⁸ "He would make no peace," he said, "but upon such terms as the zamorim might expect, were the Portuguese in the most flourishing condition."

²⁹ Mahumud, nephew of king Badur, was betrayed into Echebar's hands by one of his officers. The traitor was beheaded by order of Echebar.

³⁰ Cortez is justly admired for the ready dexterity with which he improved every opinion of the Mexicans to his own advantage. Barreto gave an instance of this art upon this expedition. When the Cafres were suing for peace, and Barreto in great want of provisions, one of the camels having broke loose from its keepers, and after running till tired, happened to be met by Barreto, to whom it instantly knelt, as is usual for that creature when it receives its burden. The Cafres, who had never before seen such an animal, thought it spoke to the governor, and earnestly asked what it said. "These creatures," replied Barreto, "live upon human flesh; and this one has been sent from its brethren to beg I would not make peace with you, otherwise they must be starved." After much entreaty, Barreto pro-

he proceeded to his visionary government. He landed in the river of Good Signs, and proposed to march to the mines by the route of Sofala. But to this Monclaros would not consent, and by his direction he took a more distant course. After a march of ten days along the river Zambeze, during which his small army suffered greatly by extreme heat and thirst, he saw the mountains and valleys covered with innumerable multitudes of armed men. These, however, were dispersed by his fire-arms; and soon after another army, as numerous as the former, shared the same fate. The Cafres now sued for peace, and offered to discover the mines. But when now on the eve of success, Monclaros commanded him to desert from his ruinous expedition, and immediately to return to Mozambique. And so deeply was Barreto affected with this disappointment and dishonour, that overwhelmed with the fever of indignation, without any other symptom of ail, he breathed out his life in sighs, after the violent mental agitation of two days. Among his papers was found a commission for Vasco Homem, his major, to succeed him; who, persuaded by the Jesuit, immediately returned to Mozambique. But Monclaros having sailed for Portugal, Homem, upbraided by the officers of that station, returned to Monomotapa. He landed at Sofala, and from thence, by a short and easy march, arrived at the place where the mines were expected. After some skirmishes with the Cafres, the king of Chicanga pretended to be friendly, and offered to show the mines. Having led the Portuguese from province to province, he at last brought them to a place where he had ordered some ore to be buried and scattered, and here he told them was a rich silver mine. While the Portuguese were several days busied in digging around, the Cafres escaped; and Homem, his provisions beginning to fail, retired to Sofala, leaving a captain named Cardoso, with 200 men, to make further trial. Fearless of this small party, the Cafres returned, and with confident promises offered to discover the richest and easiest worked mines in their country. Cardoso believed them, and was led into desiles, where he and all his men perished by the weapons of the artful barbarians. Such was the end of the government of Monomotapa, the golden dream, the ill-concerted and ill-conducted plan of the weak ministers of a giddy empire hastening to its fall.

Moniz, after he had governed three years, the term now usually named in the writs of succession, was succeeded by don Iago de Menezes, under whom the bloodshed of the usual petty wars with the Moors and Malabrians continued. His regency is distinguished by no warlike event of note: and after he had held the sword of command about two years, he was superseded by the brave Ataide count de Autouguia, whose art and valour had lately triumphed over the most formidable efforts of the general league.

To suppose that Sebastian or his ministers perceived the precarious and ruinous state of their eastern empire, when they appointed this able officer to that very critical command, were to allow them a merit, which every other part of their conduct relative to India disclaims. Don Sebastian's ideas were totally debauched by the most romantic thirst of military glory, and it was his ambition from his childhood to distinguish himself at the head of an army in Africa. Ataide strenuously opposed this wild expedition, which, he was justly convinced, was ill-adapted to the state of his country. But Sebastian, now in his twenty-fourth year, to be relieved of his disagreeable counsel, ordered him to resume the viceroyship of India. The speech which Sebastian made to Ataide, upon this his second appointment, strongly characterizes the frivolousness which now prevailed at the court of Lisbon. Don Constantine de Braganza, of the blood royal, was one of the weakest governors that ever ruled India. Ataide, on the contrary, had performed most incredible actions; had saved the Portuguese from the greatest dangers they ever surmounted in Asia. Yet Sebastian did not bid him reign as he had formerly done. No, he bid him reign like don Constantine—a man, whose abilities reached no further than perhaps to open a bell gracefully, for his politeness was his only commendation. When errors in government begin, the wise see the secret disease, but it is the next generation which feels the worst of its effects. Camoëna, whose political penetration was perhaps unequalled in his age and country, saw the declension of manners, and foretold in vain the fall of empire. Portugal owed its existence to the spirit of chivalry and the ideas of liberty, which were confirmed by the statutes of Lamego. Camoëna, in a fine allegory, laments the decay of the ancient virtues. Under the character of a huntsman he paints the wild romantic pursuits of king Sebastian, and wishes that he may not fall the victim of his blind passion. The courtiers he characterises, as the most venal of self-interested flatterers: and the clergy, the mass of letters, he says,

— trimm'd the lamp at night's mid hour,
To plan new laws to arm the regal power,

misled to persuade the camels to be contented with the flesh of bees; upon which the Cafres gladly supplied them with as many herds as he desired.

Sleepless at night's mid hour to raze the laws,
 The sacred bulwarks of the people's cause,
 Framed ere the blood of hard-earn'd victory
 On their brave fathers' helm-backt swords was dry.

Unperceived by the unlettered nobility, the principles of the constitution gradually expired under the artful increase of the royal prerogative. If Sebastian was more resolute than John I, his power was bought by the degeneracy of his subjects, and weakness of the state, the certain price with which monarchs purchase their beloved despotism. The neglect of one man of merit is the signal for the worthless, if rich, to crowd to court. Many of these signals were given in the reigns of Emmanuel, John III, and Sebastian, and thus the labours of an Albuquerque, a Nunio, a Castro, and an Ataide, were frustrated and reversed. These governors, bred in war, enthusiasts in honour, all died poor. Xarab, the creature of Saupayo, the tyrant of his master the king of Ormus, justly accused of murders and the most unbounded extortion, was sent in irons to Lisbon. But he carried his treasures with him, and was restored to his employments. Anthony Galvam, the most honest of men, saved the Malucos, returned poor to Portugal, and, like Pacheco, died in an almshouse. But these, the errors and crimes of former reigns, were of little effect compared to the evil consequences of the inattention to, and ignorance of Indian affairs, discovered by the ministers of Sebastian. They ordered don George de Castro, who surrendered the fort of Chale to the sultan, to be tried and beheaded; and he died on the scaffold at Goa. Yet a year after this, the court of Lisbon issued a commission appointing him to command on another station. The poverty of an Albuquerque, a Nunio, and a Castro, was now the public jest of the Portuguese⁴¹ commandants. Under the shade of silken umbrellas, some of the late viceroys rode to battle, in chairs carried on men's shoulders. All was disunion, gross luxury, and audacious weakness in Portuguese Asia, when Sebastian lost his crown in his African expedition. And what greatly hastened their ruin, the natives now perceived their weakness, and foretold their approaching fall. About fifty years before this period, it was the general opinion of India, that the Portuguese were among men what lions are among beasts: "and for the same reason," said an Indian captive to a Portuguese officer, "nature has appointed that your species should be equally few." But as soon as their luxury began to appear, these sentiments were changed. "Let them alone," said one Indian prince to another, "the friends of their revenue, and their love of luxury will soon ruin them. What they gain as brave soldiers they will soon lose as avaricious merchants. They now conquer Asia, but Asia will soon conquer them." And a king of Persia asked a Portuguese captain, "how many of the Indian viceroys had been beheaded by the kings of Portugal?" "None," replied the officer. "Then you will not long," returned the Persian, "be the masters of India."

When Ataide sailed for India on his second viceroyship, he dreaded the disasters which would follow the precipitate, ill-concerted expedition of Sebastian. And it was his first care, after his arrival in the east, to prevent the evil consequences of the unhappy event. He immediately fitted out a fleet which struck the princes of India with awe and terror. Any particular destination of this armament was never known; for so formidable did Ataide appear, that the tidings of the death and total defeat of Sebastian in Africa produced no war in India. Sebastian was succeeded by an old weak man, his grand uncle, the cardinal Henry. Two years closed Henry's puillanymous sway. And Philip II of Spain soon after made himself master of the kingdom of Portugal. The brave Ataide, after having humbled the Hydal Can for a breach of treaty, and concluded a peace, fell into a deep melancholy, of which he died in the third year of his regency; so sincerely was he affected with the fall of his country, which he foresaw and foretold⁴². He was succeeded by Hernan Tellez de Menezes, appointed by the five regents who governed Portugal after the demise of Henry. Under Menezes, Mascate was plundered by the Turks. A squadron was fitted out to its relief; but this the commander never attempted. He avoided the Turkish galleys, but plundered and laid in ashes the rich cities of Pesani, Gandel, and Teis, on the coast of the Nuytaques, near Cambaya, with whom the Portuguese were not at war. After a government of six months, Menezes was superseded by don Francisco de Mascarenhas, the first viceroy appointed by Philip. His brave defence of Chaul against Nizamalucos entitled him to this distinction; and Philip for obvious reasons loaded him with honours, powers, and emoluments, superior to those enjoyed by any former viceroy. He was commissioned to proclaim Philip in India; but Menezes, though he lost his reward, had already performed this confirmation of the usurper's title⁴². But though Mascarene found Philip peacefully acknowledged, all was confusion and weakness in the Portuguese settlements. Turks and Moguls, the zamorim, and other princes, in little squadrons unconnected with each other, spread all the horrors of piratical war from Melinda to Malaca. The Portuguese squadrons were frequently defeated, and their military reputation was in deep decline. Cochin had long been the faithful and valuable ally of Portugal; but the present king, unable to pay the enormous, ungenerous taxes demanded by Mascarene, resigned his revenues to the Portuguese. Twenty thousand Cochinitians bound themselves in an oath to die in defence of their ancient rights, and Mascarene was necessitated to suspend his acquirement, an acquirement which was relinquished by don Duarte de Menezes, who, after the usual regency of three years, succeeded him in command. Malaca, invaded by the king of Ujantana, was now decimated by famine. About a hundred people died every day, and mothers exchanged their children, that they might not eat their own offspring. The island of Ceylon was also steeped in blood, and the Portuguese there reduced to the deepest distress. But though don Paulo de Lima displayed the ancient valour of his countrymen in the relief of Malaca and the fort of Columbo in Ceylon, the frequent repulses of the Portuguese emboldened the natives to seize every opportunity of hostility:

Under the government of Menezes, a court of chancery, in 1586, was erected at Goa. The citizens, long oppressed by military tyrants, had requested Philip for such jurisdiction. But what chiefly distinguishes this period, is the alteration of the royal monopoly, and the establishment of a Portuguese East India company. The reveques of India, received by the exchequer of Lisbon, amounted to little more than a million of crowns. This, yearly sent to Portugal in Indian goods on board of his majesty's ships, had long been inadequate to the expense of the armaments almost annually equipped in Portugal for the support of the Indian dominion⁴³. And Philip, unwilling to continue such preposterous course, farmed the trade of India to a company of merchants, under regulations of the same spirit by which the Spanish trade to Mexico and the Portuguese commerce with Brazil⁴⁴ have ever been governed. As in those the sovereign is sole master of the garrisons and territory, which are protected by his fleets and armies, so Philip remained sovereign of Portuguese India. And as the annual lotas which sail to Mexico and Brazil are under severe restrictions, but have the exclusive privilege of trading to those regions, so the merchants who undertook the annual equipment of the Indian squadron, in reward of the revenue stipulated to be paid, received the exclusive privilege of trading with India. An establishment upon other principles would have been inconsistent with every idea of colonization understood, or ever practised, by the courts of Spain and Portugal.

When this new commercial regulation was known in India, it excited the greatest discontent. And all the authority of the viceroy and of the clergy was hardly sufficient to suppress an insurrection at Goa. By its due operation, the lucrative licentiousness of the private traders would have received some bounds; and a check upon their immense profits gave a general alarm. There were stated voyages performed under the direction of the viceroy to collect the king's revenues in the different settlements. And the commanders of these squadrons, acted now, without restraint, as private merchants, and their profits were almost incredible⁴⁵. The idea of preventing the military to become merchants was now no more. And even the viceroys, after Castro and Ataide, became private traders. Besides their yearly salaries now raised to 18,000 crowns, some of them cleared 3, some 5, and some 800,000 ducats, by their own merchandise. And those who bore the title of don were not now ashamed to command their own ⁴² By the statutes of Lamego, the magna charta of Portugal, a foreigner cannot hold the Portuguese sceptre.

⁴⁴ The trade to these places is confined to particular ports, annual lotas and register ships, and even the quantity of goods limited. See Account of the European settlements in America, 5th edit. vol. i. p. 234, &c. and 315.

⁴⁵ According to Faria's estimate, the voyage from Goa to China and Japan brought the captain 100,000 crowns, for only the freight of the goods of others which he carried; that from Coromandel to Malaca, 20,000; from Goa to Mozambique, 24,000; and the short voyage to Ceylon, 4000. And the profits of their own trade were equally great.

piratical merchant ships. After Castro, some of the first nobility of Portugal were sent to govern India; and their historians bluntly confess, that they went thither to repair their fortunes. But though the new regulations were in the spirit of the Spanish trade to Mexico, nothing like the regularity of the botas was attained in India. The viceroy still retained the care of fitting out the homeward ships, and the exigencies of India rendered their number and cargoes ever precarious.

Don Duarte de Menezes was succeeded, in 1588, by Emanuel de Souza Coutinho, who in 1590 resigned the sword to Matthias de Albuquerque, who governed about seven years. In 1597, don Francisco de Gama, count de Vidigueyra, and grandson of the discoverer of India, ascended the throne of Portuguese Asia. But not more degenerate were the times, than were his actions and manners from those of his illustrious ancestor. He was the most detested and most insulted ruler that ever governed India; and the meanness of his abilities, the ferocious ungrateful haughtiness of his carriage, and his gross injustice, merited the signal contempt with which he was treated. The peninsula of Pudepatam, between Goa and Cochín, was at this time possessed by a Moorish pirate, named Mahomet Cunnale Marca, who made war alike on the Portuguese and the subjects of the zamorim. The zamorim and the viceroy entered into a treaty to crush this pirate; and the former, with an army of 20,000 men, and don Luis de Gama, brother of the latter, with a fleet of above fifty vessels, laid siege to Marca's peninsula; but both were ignominiously repulsed; and the Portuguese arms under don Luis received the greatest disgrace, says Faria, they had ever, except at Ormuz, experienced in the east. Andreas de Fortado, the only Portuguese officer of this period whose name is recorded with honour, soon after compelled Marca to surrender on condition of life; a condition which was brutally violated by the ungenerous Gama. But what principally marks the fatal regency of this count de Vidigueyra, is the arrival of the first warlike squadron of the Dutch in India, the heralds of the total subversion of the Asiatic empire of Portugal.

For the last twelve years, the Portuguese cruelties in Ceylon had disgraced human nature. And for many years, annual fleets had regularly been sent to the coasts of Malabar and the north of Goa, to make piratical wars, on pretence of the suppression of pirates. Yet, as if all their former cruelties had been too little, a host of crusade, in 1594, arrived in India, commanding the Portuguese to reduce the infidels to the faith by the force of arms. This was a new pretence to plunder the pagodas, the repositories of the Gentoos treasures, and was procured by the Jesuits, who now governed the springs of action over all Portuguese Asia. Though most adroit in fraudulent cabals, that which bears the dishonest name of low cunning was their only talent. Cruel, obstinate, and narrow in their minds, the grossest compulsion, and the horrors of the inquisition, were the methods by which they endeavoured to propagate their religion. Avaricious of power and riches, and eager for immediate possession, they thrust themselves into every public transaction. The idle luxurious military easily suffered themselves to be guided by them: and their intrigues and ignorance of the arts of civil and military government embroiled and perplexed every operation. In almost every expedition was a monclarus: and it became usual for the defeated commanders to vindicate themselves by accusing the Jesuits. Imprest with the enumeration of the facts from which the above conclusions are drawn, and having mentioned a dispute amicably adjusted by a Jesuit, "The religious," says the historian Souza, "are successful agents in the promotion of peace between lay governors; but when they take upon themselves the government of secular affairs, they bring every thing to confusion and ruin."

While the Jesuits thus cankered and confounded every spring of government, the civil and military officers, intent only on their own present gain, beheld the public weakness with the most languid indifference. Almost totally engrossed by their immense American empire, and the politics of Europe, the ‡ Don Hierome de Azevedo commanded in Ceylon during the ruinous wars already mentioned. When he kept the field, and had gained any advantage, he compelled the Indian mothers to cast their children between millstones, and to look on while they were ground in pieces. At other times he ordered his soldiers to hold up the shrieking infants on the tops of their pikes. This he did for a most wretched pun. The natives of Ceylon called themselves Galas, and Gallos is Spanish for a cock. "Hark how these young cocks crow"—is recorded as his usual speech, when the infants screamed on the lance.

§ So different from Xavier were the Jesuits of this period, that they totally impeded the conversion of the Gentoos, by the most absurd topics of contest. The Gentoos wear a tessera of three threads, (of which see note to book x. line 793) and are bigoted to the use of this their ancient badge. But the Jesuits, who said it was instituted by the devil, obstinately insisted that it should be relinquished by their new converts. The badge and their old religion were therefore continued.

Spanish court paid little attention to Portuguese India. The will of the viceroy, now more arbitrary than ever, was the supreme law; headlong in its operation in his presence, and headlong where his creatures, who shaped it to their pleasure, were armed with power; but it was feeble and misinterpreted, often contemned and disobeyed, in the distant settlements. The commanders on the different stations ceased to act in concert with each other; and their forts were often in a state of blockade, under all the miseries of famine. It was now usual for commanders and whole bands of the Portuguese, without the consent of their superiors, to undertake piratical expeditions, and to enter into the service of the Asiatic princes²¹; and in many actions they fought against each other with the greatest rancour. Their mother country groaned under the yoke of Spain. Mostly natives of the east, the Portuguese in India lost all affection for Portugal, and indeed the political chain which bound them together was now but a slender thread. Unrestrained by regular government, the will of the captain of the fort was absolute, and his protection of the most audacious plunderers was the support of his power. Detested by the natives, at strife among themselves, every circumstance concurred to invite other merchants to India. In this wretched condition of Portuguese Asia, Houtman, a Dutch merchant, while in jail for debt at Lisbon, planned the establishment of his countrymen in the east. The Hollanders paid his debts; he sailed for Asia, and returned with credentials of his promise, which gave birth to the Dutch India company, an institution of deep commercial wisdom; a regular machine, connected in all its operations, and the very reverse of that blind monster, that divided polygus, the Portuguese despotical anarchy.

The spice islands offered the fairest field for the Dutch operations. Here the Portuguese were both weakest and most detested. And at Amboina and Ternate the strangers were gladly received, and conditions of commerce settled²². In 1608, Ayres de Saldana²³ succeeded the weak count de Vidiguera; but he was equally remiss, and made no head against the Dutch. One of his captains only, the brave Purtado, for five years carried on a petty war with the Hollanders among the Malucos; but though he gained several victories, he was unable to expel the new intruders. And new squadrons from Holland arrived yearly, and carried their hostilities from Mozambique to Bengal and other parts of India. The Portuguese valour seemed to revive, and the Dutch, in many engagements, were defeated. Their vanquished fleets, however, carried rich cargoes to Europe, and brought fresh supplies. The Jesuits omitted no device, no fraud, that might inflame the natives against them; even their republican form of government was represented as big with ruin to the Indian princes. But the detestation of the Portuguese name was deep in India; and that rooted odium, to which their villainies and cruelties had given birth, and had long nourished, was now felt to militate against them more than millions in arms. Had the general conduct of the Portuguese governors been like that of Albuquerque, had the princes of In-²¹ About 1586, the Turks with powerful armies invaded Persia. Some years after the immense armies of the Mogul invaded the regions beyond the Ganges. And the great kingdoms of Pegu and Siam were alternately laid waste by each other. Portuguese adventurers distinguished themselves in all these wars; nor did they consult the viceroy when they went off with their shipping and soldiers. Two of these renegades, by the most detestable treachery and cruelty, rose to the sovereign rank; and, under the regal title, negotiated with the Portuguese viceroys. Of these hereafter.

The history of one of these renegades throws light on Portuguese Asia. Jago Soares de Melo, guilty of murder, fled from the sentence of death in Portugal. He was several years a pirate in the eastern seas. On his promise to accuse don Stephen de Gama, he was pardoned by M. Alonzo de Souza, the new governor. He afterwards, with above 1000 Portuguese, who renounced allegiance to their sovereign, went to Pegu, where he was appointed general of the army, gratified with immense treasure, and entitled the king's brother. In this height of his fortune, he happened to pass by the house of a rich merchant on the day of his daughter's wedding. He entered in with his armed followers, and was invited to partake of the sumptuous entertainment. Struck with the beauty of the young lady, he attempted to take her away by force; the bridegroom and his kindred, who offered resistance, were slaughtered upon the banquetting tables; and the frantic bride fled from the scene of horror, and ended her life with a cord. Soon after, however, the power of Melo, and the thousand Portuguese who served under him, were not sufficient to protect him from the rage of the people. The king delivered him up, and he was torn in pieces by the multitude.

²² Nothing but the deep detestation of the Portuguese could have procured such favour; for previous to this, the very first operation of the Dutch had displayed their character. They were detected in offering money of base metal for the cargo of the first ship which they loaded with spice. Those who offered it were seized by the natives; and the squadron which first arrived at Ternate endeavoured to rescue their countrymen at Java, by force of arms, but were repulsed, and compelled to pay the ransom which the natives demanded.

²³ He renewed the treaty of alliance with the celebrated Hocheber, or Akhar, who was now master of all India, as far south as Visapor.

dis returned over their graves, no strangers had ever established themselves on the ruin of such allies. Though repeatedly defeated in war, the Dutch commerce increased, the harbours of India received them with kindness, and gave them assistance; while the friendless detested Portuguese, though victorious in almost every skirmish, were harassed out and daily weakened. Like beasts of prey in their den, or mountaineer banditti, they kept their gloomy fortresses, their destruction the wish of the natives, who yet were afraid too openly to provoke the rage of such wolves and tigers. About four years after the arrival of the Dutch, the English also appeared in India. The Dutch, who pleaded the law of nature, without ceremony entered the best harbours, and endeavoured to drive the Portuguese from their settlements. The English, in 1601, under sir James Lancaster, erected several factories in India; but they went to ports open to all, and offered injury to neither Dutch, Portuguese, nor Moorish settlement. Twenty English fleets made the voyage to India without hostility with the natives, when the Portuguese Jesuits brought on a rupture, which ended in the loss of the Portuguese military reputation. Every treacherous art which the Moors practised against Gama was repeated by the Jesuits, and the event was the same: for he who fights with the weapons of fraud, whenever he misses his blow; stands naked and weakened, and every wound he receives is mortal.

In 1604 Kaldasera the viceroy was succeeded in office and languid negligence by don Alonso de Castro; and on Castro's death, in the third year of his government, don Frey Alexio de Meneses, archbishop of Goa, was invested with the authority, though not with the title of viceroy. The patronage of the inquisition, and the reduction of the Christians of St. Thomas, of Ethiopia and Armenia²⁴, to the see of Rome, were the sole employments of this governor. In 1609, the brave Furtado received the sword of command: he was a soldier; and his first ambition was the expulsion of the Hollanders. He called the council and principal citizens of Goa, and urged them to assist him in striking a decisive blow, which might ruin the Dutch. His speech was heard with joy; but when he had filled the port of Goa with a formidable navy, Ruy Lorenzo de Tavora arrived from Portugal, and superseded Furtado, in the third month of his regency. The only circumstance for which Tavora is distinguished is his generous acknowledgment, that he thought it was Furtado who governed, when he saw such warlike preparations, and that he was unhappy to supersede so worthy a governor. And unhappy it was for the Portuguese interest. It was now twelve years since the English, and fifteen since the Dutch, had portended the ruin of the Portuguese; yet, except the armament of Furtado, no regular plan had ever been concerted for the expulsion of such formidable rivals. About this time, captain Best, in a large English ship, and captain Salmon, in a bomb-ketch, lay near Surat; Nunno de Cunha, with four large gallies, and twenty-five frigates, part of the armament prepared by Furtado, was sent by Tavora to take or destroy them. The Mogul had an army at this time upon the shore. The beach and the eminences were covered with spectators. And now those who had deemed the Portuguese invincible at sea, with astonishment beheld nine-and-twenty ships vanquished and put to flight by two vessels²⁵. And a few days after,

²⁴ For the miseries with which the Jesuits distressed Ethiopia, see the note to book x. line 643. Though attended with less bloodshed, their conduct was the same in Armenia. This archbishop was a most zealous patron of this method of conversion. See page 372.

²⁵ An Indian, who had been aboard the English ships, told Nunno that they had not above a week's provision, and that he had nothing to do but to prevent them to take in fresh water. Nunno replied, that "he would not spend a week's provision upon his own men to purchase a victory that might be gained in an hour." And in the same high spirit he sent Canning, an English prisoner in his custody, to help his countrymen to fight, boasting that "he would soon take him again with more company." As Nunno advanced, with red banners displayed, Best weighed his anchors, and began the fight in the centre of the four large gallies; and captain Salmon, in the bomb-ketch, behaved with equal courage. Withington, a writer of king James's time, thus mentions the engagement: "Captain Salmon of the bomb-ketch, the Oslander, was like a salamander amid the fire, dancing the way about the Portuguese, frisking and playing like a salmon." The Portuguese writers ascribe these victories to the excellence of the English, and incapacity of their own gunners. Soon after, however, the English commerce in India greatly declined. The Dutch pretended that their hostilities in India were in revenge of the Spanish tyranny in the Netherlands. Portugal also bowed down beneath the same cruel yoke: yet this, in the Dutch logic, was her crime; and thus, because the Portuguese groaned under Spanish oppression, the Spanish oppression in the Netherlands was revenged upon them. The truth is, the Portuguese settlements were little regarded by Spain, and the Dutch intruded upon them as the stronger bears in a German forest shoulder the weaker ones from the best fall of acorns. Though best off by the herdsmen, the stronger bears persist and return; so the Dutch persisted, till they secured possession. Every thing, however, was different in the first settlement of the English. The author of the Histoire Philosophique, &c. seems to decry the policy of the first captains, who made themselves masters of no port, but bought their cargoes of the native merchants. But he ought to have owned that the hostilities of the Turks, and Mogul, and the treachery of the latter in expelling the English factors, rendered retribution just.

Thomas Best, in a harder conflict, was again victorious. Don Hieronimo de Azevedo, whose cruelties in Ceylon disgraced the name of man, in 1619 succeeded Tavora in the viceroyship of India. In every view of importance, the history of Portuguese Asia terminates with his government. And the occurrences of his regency are strongly characteristic, not of a falling, but of a fallen empire.

The most fearless insolence and treachery were now the characteristics of the Portuguese commanders on every station. Poreyra, captain of the fort of Mombassa, treacherously bribed the Cafres to murder the king, whose head he sent as a trophy to the viceroy Azevedo. The insolence of don Luis de Gama brought the hostilities of the Turks and Persians upon Ormuz and the adjoining territories. In Ceylon the common soldiers robbed the natives at pleasure, and the commanders added rapes and adulteries; "till the people," says Faria, "sought refuge among the wild beasts of the mountains, to shun the more brutal outrage of men." Near Surat, a Portuguese captain, in breach of the peace, took a rich ship from Mecca, the property of the Mogul, and carried her in triumph into the harbour of Goa. Restitution was refused, and the Mogul, whose dominion was now extended from the kingdom of Delhi to the confines of Calicut, detained all the Portuguese ships in his harbours; and, together with his tributary the king of Decan, laid siege to Damara, Chaul, and Begaun, and desolated the country around. Even the unwarlike Chinese were exasperated, and the humble submission of the Portuguese to new and severe laws preserved their continuance at Macao. In 1606, a Dutch fleet had blocked up the mouth of the Tagus, and prevented the annual supplies to India; and their power was now greatly increased in the east. The natives, in hatred of the Portuguese, in every part favoured them: the kings of Achem and Ternate often assisted them with powerful armies against Malacca and the Maluccos, and the Hollanders were now frequently victorious. While the eastern world was thus in arms against the Portuguese, insurrections among themselves raged in every settlement. While the goldsmiths and merchants of Goa had a bloody engagement, the peace-officers robbed the shops of both parties. An armament of seven ships and 250 soldiers was found necessary to suppress the murderous tumults at Meliapor. In the tumults of Chaul, Begaun, Trapoor, and Tana, some of the Portuguese were almost daily slaughtered by each other; and while they were murdering one another in Ceylon, the natives issued from the forests and mountains, and reduced them to the greatest extremity. Iago Simoens, for services rendered to the emperor of Monomotapa, had received a grant of all the mines of that country in favour of the king of Portugal, and had built some forts on the river Zambeza. To ensure his success, he solicited a reinforcement from the viceroy, which was sent under the command of Fonseca Pinto, a lawyer. But this reinforcement turned their arms against Simoens, and brought him and his settlement to utter ruin. Fonseca, who was sent as judge to Mozambique, enriched himself by the most flagitious acts of injustice and tyranny²⁶, an example which was followed by his successors, who, without the authority of Azevedo, condemned an officer to the gibbet, and alternately imprisoned each other.

But with all the sang froid of a materialist, the English perceived, says he, that great riches could not be acquired without great injustice; and that to attain the advantages enjoyed by the Portuguese and Dutch, they must also adopt their measures, and establish themselves by force of arms. But James, he adds, as if he condemned such narrow policy, was too pusillanimous, and too much engaged in controversial divinity to allow warlike operations. The treaty of the English with the potent king of Persia, however, he mentions as an effort of great political wisdom. But sir D. Cotton's embassy into Persia, in the Clarendon state papers, vol. i. p. 36. fol. throws another light upon this affair. The treaty with Persia was the idlest step the English could possibly have taken. According to this authentic record, the great monarch of Persia appears little better than a captain of Italian handitti; and his prime minister raised from the meanest station, as a greater shuffler and villain than his master. The treaty with Persia, indeed, alarmed the Mogul, the Portuguese, and the Dutch, and brought hostilities upon the English, which the pusillanimous James would not allow them to punish as justice required. But it was not two months together in the mind, nor was it in the power of the tyrant of Persia to give any effectual assistance to the English. A Persian struck lord Shirley, the soppis ambassador, in the presence of James, and each charged the other with imposture. The king of Persia and his minister did nothing but scruple the credentials sent from England, and endeavour to extort presents. While James thus amused himself with his Persian negotiation, as sagacious and fruitless as those he held with the court of Spain and the prince palatine, the commerce of his subjects languished in India. Hopeless of any help from Persia, they entered into a kind of partnership in some of the Dutch settlements. But when the Hollander found his opportunity, the English of Amboyna and other places experienced injuries and cruelties which are yet unatoned, and which for many years rendered them of little or no consequence in the east.

²⁶ He even sold the provisions, implements, and mining tools which he carried to Simoens, whom he accused to the emperor as a rebel against the viceroy, and urged the emperor to kill him. He seized the lands of Simoens, and sold his slaves and effects. He deposed Ruy de Melo, governor of Mozambique, and also seized his estate, which he appropriated to himself. Melo was acquitted at Goa. Iago de

By concessions and presents the viceroy had now purchased peace with the Mogul, who, influenced by the arts of the Jesuit Pereyro, interdicted commerce with the English and Dutch; and the Portuguese merchantships which were detained in his harbours were released. During the last thirty years, the strength and commerce of the Turks, had considerably increased on the coasts of Arabia²⁷. Their trade with the ports of the Mogul was great, and considerable quantities of the produce of India were now again sent to Europe by Egypt and Constantinople. The subjects of the Mogul refused commerce with the English, and the Turks had offered hostilities to sir Henry Middleton in the Red Sea. Middleton therefore appealed to the force of arms; but he did not act as a pirate. He seized some Mogul vessels near Arden, but for the Indian traffic which he took from them, he gave them full value in English goods, according to the estimation of the east, professing that he only desired an equitable commerce. Fearful of such rivals, Azevedo fitted out a fleet of eight ships, some of 8, some of 6, 5, and 400 tons, besides 60 frigates, and some fly boats. But after a faint attack, Azevedo withdrew; and though often braved by the English, reinforced only with four vessels, to the deeper astonishment of India, he declined the combat, and suffered the enemy, unmolested, to proceed homeward with loaded ships.

Nor was Miranda, the admiral of the seas of Malaca, more prosperous. After a hard engagement with a great fleet of Achem, he was totally defeated²⁸ by a Dutch squadron of eight vessels. The trade with China was now annually interrupted by the Dutch, who, not satisfied with the route by the Cape of Good Hope, had now passed the straits of Magellan, and opened a trade with Japan²⁹. A Portuguese adventurer, named Sebastian Gonzalez Tibao³⁰, who, by betraying the Indian princes who favoured him, established himself in Sundava, was there proclaimed king, and became an independent monarch. Conscious that the king of Arracam, his late ally, whom he had treacherously deserted when invaded by the Mogul, would meditate revenge, he sent an embassy to Azevedo, to whom he offered alliance, and proposed a war with the king of Arracam. Allured by Tibao's report of the immense treasures of that prince, Azevedo, contrary, says Faria, to all laws, human and divine, concluded the desired treaty with the renegade, and invaded Arracam. But here also the Portuguese arms were disgraced, and Tibao, deprived of every foot of territory, was reduced to his original meanneſs. Even more unfortunate was Philip de Brito e Nicota. By the most ungrateful treachery to the king of Tangu and other Indian princes, he also had raised himself to the sovereign power, had been proclaimed king of Pegu, and his name was the terror of Siam and the neighbouring regions. The king of Ava, in revenge of his vassal the king of Tangu, with an army of 120,000 men, and a fleet of 400 vessels, laid siege to Brito in his strong fort of Siriam. Azevedo, in hope that he might prove an auspicious ally, sent an armament of five gallies to the support of Brito; but Brito, ere its arrival, was overpowered, after a brave defence³¹. His wife and soldiers were maimed and sent into slavery; and he himself and his male kindred were impaled on the ramparts of his garrison.

Such were now the civil insurrections, such the wars of the Portuguese³²; the spirit of Azevedo's trea-

Cunha, another lawyer, was appointed to authority equal with Fonseca, with command to restore Melo. When they arrived, they imprisoned Fonseca, but an officer named Guerra relieved him, and imprisoned Cunha. And he, as Fonseca had done, bribed his keepers, and escaped to Mombassa, where Melo then was. Melo and Cunha now sailed for Mozambique, and Fonseca with immense wealth fled to Goa; but Guerra, who remained, was tried by Cunha, and executed.

²⁷ By this increase, the customs of Ormuz and Mascate were greatly reduced. Vid. Faria, sub ann. 1616.

²⁸ So completely was he defeated, that he escaped to shore with only six men.

²⁹ This country was discovered by the Portuguese, who opened a trade with it, about 1543.

³¹ Brito had no powder to repel the enemy, an officer whom he had sent with money to purchase that article having never returned. He was impaled with his face to his house, and lived two days, says Faria, in that dreadful condition.

³² Though under the same monarch, the Spanish governor of the Philippine isles sent a party of men, in 1602, who, in defiance of the remonstrances and threats of the Portuguese commander, built a fort at the port of Pinal. Some years after, however, the increase of the Dutch power inclined the governor of Manilla to solicit the assistance of Azevedo, to expel the Dutch from the Maluccos. But the viceroy could only afford an armament which consisted chiefly of transported felons. And these wholly deserted, ere they came to action. The admiral having, contrary to his orders, touched at Malaca, gave them the final opportunity.

ties are even more characteristic. Won by Middleton's gallant behaviour, and regardless of the viceroy's resentment, the Mogul, contrary to the late treaty, not only admitted the English to free commerce with his subjects, but the English admiral was entertained, by his order, with all the splendour of eastern pomp. The samin, the king of Cochin, and the king of the little island of Para, prepared for hostilities; Azevedo sent rich presents, and begged for peace: the presents were accepted, but the most contemptuous pretences excused delay, and the conditions were never settled. An embassy, with rich presents, was sent to Abas Xa, king of Persia, who meditated the conquest of Ormuz; but this was also treated with scorn; and the Persians, assisted by the English, soon after wrested Ormuz and its territory from the Portuguese. Idle, undetermined treaties, were renewed with the Mogul, and transacted with the king of Siam, who would not consent to expel the English from his harbour. The reasons he urged speak the deepest contempt: he excused the hostilities of the queen of Patana, his vassal, by saying she was mad; and he liked the English, he said, because they were useful to him, and showed him great respect. The prince of Pandar, a kingdom of Ceylon, though the Portuguese had lately murdered an ambassador from his neighbour the king of Candea, sent proposals of peace and offered tribute to the viceroy; but finding the Portuguese less formidable than he had esteemed, he recanted; and Azevedo concluded the treaty, on condition of only one half of the tribute first proposed. But the most contemptuous treatment is yet unmentioned. The king of Ava, alarmed at the treaty with Siam, and apprehensive of revenge for the death of Brito, sent an embassy to the viceroy. Azevedo accepted his proposals, and Martinho de Costa Falcam, his ambassador, went to ratify the treaty at the court of Ava. But the monarch's fears, and the reputation of the Portuguese valour, were now no more. After many days spent by Falcam in vain solicitations for an audience, the hour of midnight was at last appointed. In the dark he was brought to an apartment, and in the dark also was ordered to deliver his embassy, for the king, they said, was there, and listened. He delivered it, and received no answer. Yet though this haughty silence told him he had been talking to the walls, Falcam still meekly solicited to see the sovereign; and the former refined contempt was renewed. A day, and a place in the street were named, where Falcam might see his majesty as he rode out on his elephant. The day came, but the king never deigned to turn his eye to the place where the ambassador stood. And Falcam, thus loaded with the most contemptuous disgrace, returned to Goa.

On a voyage to Dio, Azevedo fell in with four English vessels. He held a council of war, and it was resolved not to fight, because the state of India, should victory declare against them, could not sustain the loss of the large galleon in which the admiral sailed. Such was the poverty of the Portuguese custom-houses in the east; and the exchequer of Lisbon received an equally small and precarious revenue from the company of merchants who were the proprietors of the goods brought to Portugal. In some of the last fifteen years, not a Portuguese ship sailed from India to Europe; and half of those which ventured out, were either taken by enemies, or, having sailed late in the season, were destroyed by tempest.

While thus degraded and broken down, the Spanish court completed the ruin of the Portuguese eastern empire. The expense of the supplies, lately sent against the Dutch and English, far exceeded the taxes of the company, reaped by Spain; and Azevedo received an order from the court of Madrid, to dispose of every employment, of every office under him, by public sale, that money might be raised to support his government. We now need add few circumstances more, for the history of the fall of the Portuguese empire in Asia is here essentially complete.

While the Indian state was so poor, that it could not afford to risk the loss of a single galleon, Azevedo the viceroy was immensely rich. As he complained one day of the great losses sustained by his trading vessels, near the latter part of his reign, one of his officers told him he was still worth 4 or 500,000 ducats. To this he replied, "I am still worth more than that sum in cattle only."

Though the ministry of Spain seemed to have abandoned India, they beheld the success of the Dutch with great resentment. Because he had not defeated the Dutch and English, Azevedo was recalled, was stripped of his riches, and condemned to a dungeon, in which he ended his life, and in which he was maintained by the Jesuits, who afterwards honourably buried him: a debt, no doubt, of gratitude for the services which he had rendered that society in India.

Even deeper dejection followed the reign of Azevedo. The numerous Portuguese forts, almost every where stripped of territory, had been long suffered to fall into decay; for their commanders were only intent on their own sudden aggrandisement. Shipwrecks and dreadful tempests added to the miseries of the

* To the instances of Azevedo's cruelties already mentioned, let another be added. He used to amuse himself and his soldiers, by throwing his prisoners over the bridge of Malvana, to see the crocodiles devour them. "The crocodiles," says Faria, "were so used to this food, that they would lift their heads above water and crowd to the place, at the sight of the victims."

Portuguese: and the most remarkable events of the government of John count de Redondo, who in 1617 superseded Azevedo, are the solemn fasts held at Goa. In some of these, the citizens lay day and night on the floors of the churches, imploring the divine mercy, in the deepest and most awful silence, while not a sound was to be heard in the mournful streets.

Though Azevedo was punished for not defeating the Dutch and English, so little regard did Spain pay to India, that Herman de Albuquerque, who after Redondo governed for three years, never received one letter from the court of his sovereign. In 1622, don Francisco de Gama sailed from Lisbon with four ships, and the commission of viceroy. On his voyage, the three vessels which attended, contemptuously left him; and to save himself from a Dutch squadron, he burned his own ship on the coast of Mozambique, from whence, in a galliot, he proceeded to India. After a regency of five years, in which he neither executed nor planned one action of the smallest consequence, he resigned the government to don Luis de Brito, the bishop of Cochim. Malacca, again besieged by the king of Achem, was again reduced to the deepest distress; but the bishop would fit out no armament to its relief, jealous, it was thought, lest the commander of it should be appointed viceroy. On the bishop's death, which happened after his having benumbed every business of state for nearly two years, the writs of succession were opened, and two governors were found named, one for the civil, the other for the military department. But so vague were the terms of expression, that two gentlemen of different names claimed the sword of command. The dispute was submitted to the council of Goa, and Alvarez Botello was declared governor. By a vigorous effort he relieved Malacca; but he fell soon afterwards in an engagement where the Hollanders were victorious; and Malacca was again invested by the neighbouring princes, assisted by a squadron of twelve Dutch ships. Mozambique, Ceylon, various parts of the Moluccas and on every coast of India, were alternately lost and recovered, were again repeatedly attacked by the enemy, and at last finally abandoned by the Portuguese. In 1622, under the vicerealty of the count de Linares, "our European enemies," says Paris, "raved over the seas without opposition, took away many of our ships and ruined our trade. They also every where incensed the Indian princes against us: for we had no agents at any of their courts to vindicate our cause." Yet, deep as such declension appears, Linares, on his return to Europe, presented the king of Spain with a hat-band, and the queen with a pair of pendants, a gift valued at 100,000 crowns. In 1639, while another archbishop of Goa was governor, a squadron of nine Dutch vessels rode in triumph in the river of Goa, and burnt three galleons in the harbour, without opposition; "for the fort," says Paris, "was destitute both of ammunition and men." In 1640, the kingdom of Portugal, by one of the noblest efforts upon record, threw off the yoke of Spain; and the Portuguese in India acknowledged the duke of Braganza as their sovereign. And in 1642, a vicerey was sent to India by John IV. But though the new monarch paid attention to India, and though the English, during their civil wars, abandoned the commerce of the east, the Dutch were now so formidable, and their operations so well connected and continued, that every exertion to recover the dominion of India was fruitless and lost. Soon after the civil wars, the English arose to more power and consequence, than even the Dutch in Asia; and many of the Portuguese merchants became their agents and naval carriers. Towards the end of the seventeenth century, the court of Lisbon turned its attention to the Brazils, and neglected India. A succession of viceroys was however continued; but of all their numerous settlements on every coast of the eastern world, the ports of Goa and Dio in India, and the isle of Macao in the bay of Canton, only remained in the possession of the Portuguese. And, according to the information procured by the abbé Raynal, (who published his Histoire Philosophique, &c. about ten years ago,) two small vessels, often Chinese, once in the year carry some porcelain to Goa and Dio: but these must touch at Surat and other ports to complete their return of silks and spicery. And one ship, with a poor cargo, partly furnished by the two sloops of Macao, and partly purchased from the English, sails once in the year from Goa to Lisbon. Such is the fall of that power, which once commanded the commerce of Africa and Asia, from the straits of Gibraltar to the eastern side of Japan!

But Dio and Goa are unrivalled situations; and the island of Macao, on the coast of China, is a possession of the utmost value, a possession which might be envied by the first power of Europe. Would the Portuguese abolish the inquisition of Goa, says Raynal, and open their ports upon liberal principles, the Portuguese flag might again flow triumphant over the eastern ocean. But though this flourish cannot be realised, while the power of the British and Dutch continue, there is a wide and favourable field open for the increase of the Portuguese Indian commerce; and a beginning that promises future importance has already taken place. In 1773, the late king of Portugal new-modelled the government of his Asiatic settlements. By the new laws the power of the governor is altered, and the title of viceroy is changed to that of captain-general. The inquisition of Goa, formerly more dreadful in its cruelties than even that of Portugal, is utterly abolished; and about six or seven vessels are now annually cleared from Lisbon for India; but the commerce of these fleets is a royal monopoly, and regulated in the same spirit by which the trade to Brazil is now, and has always been, conducted and governed.

The histories of wars, from the earliest times, are much alike; the names of the countries ravaged, the towns destroyed, and captains slain are different; the motives and conduct of the oppressors, and the miseries of the oppressed, are the same. Portugal raised the first commercial empire of the modern world; the history of her fate therefore opens a new field for the most important speculation. The transactions of the Portuguese in India are peculiarly the wars and negotiations of commerce, and therefore offer instructions to every trading country, which are not to be found in the campaigns of a Cæsar or a Marlborough. The prosperity and declension of foreign settlements, resulting from the wisdom or errors of the supreme power at home, from the wisdom or imprudence, the virtues or vices of governors abroad; the stupendous effects of unstained honour and faith; the miserable ruinous embarrassments which attend dishonest policy, though supported by the greatest abilities in the field or in the council; the uncommercial and dreadful consequences of wars unjustly provoked, though crowned with a long series of victories; the self-destructive measures, uncommercial spirit, and inherent weakness of despotic rule: the power, affluence, and stability which reward the liberal policy of humane government; in a word, all those causes which nourish the infancy, all those which as a secret disease undermine, or as a violent poison suddenly destroy the vital strength of a commercial empire; all these are developed and displayed, in the most exemplary manner, in the history of the transactions of Portuguese Asia.

And all these combine to ascertain the great principles upon which that stupendous commonwealth the British East India company must exist or fall. The commerce of India is of most essential value to the British nation. By the Indian goods distributed over Europe, the essential balance of trade is preserved in our favour. But whether the Indian commerce should be conducted by an exclusive company, or laid open to every adventurer, is the question of the day, a question of the very first importance to the British empire. And to this question the example of the Portuguese is of the first consequence. Both in the senate, and in the works of some political writers, this example has been appealed to; an exact knowledge of the commercial principles of Portuguese Asia is therefore highly necessary; particularly, if the most gross misrepresentations of it have already been given, with the professed view of influencing the legislature. And an authenticated state of the principles of the Portuguese Asiatic commerce, were it only to guard us against the visionary and dangerous schemes of theory, cannot but be of some utility to that nation which now commands the commerce of India.

Throughout the foregoing history of Portuguese Asia, the characteristics and principles of the Portuguese military and commercial government have been stated and authenticated. But a retrospect will be necessary, to bring the Portuguese example decisively home; and several facts, as for their proper place, have been hitherto reserved for the following

RECAPITULATION.

When Gama arrived in India, the Moors, great masters of the arts of traffic, were the lords of the eastern seas. They had settlements on every convenient station, from Sofala to China; and, though under different governments, were in reality one great commonwealth. They clearly foresaw what injury their trade would sustain, were Europeans to become acquainted with the Asiatic seas. They exerted every fraudulent art, that not one man of Gama's fleet might return to Europe. And when these arts were defeated, with the most determined zeal, they commenced hostilities⁶⁵.

Garrisons and warlike fleets were now absolutely necessary to the existence of a naval commerce between Europe and Asia. And on the return of Gama, Cabral was sent with an armed fleet of thirteen vessels. His commission was to make alliances, to establish forts and factories, and to repel hostilities. His commission he executed, and the commanders who succeeded him greatly extended the Portuguese settlements, which were reduced by Albuquerque into a regular plan of empire.

To increase the population and riches, and thence the strength of the mother country, by the exportation of her domestic manufactures, raised from her domestic staples, is the great and only real advantage of foreign settlement. But this was not understood by the Portuguese. To raise a revenue for the king his master, was the idea of Albuquerque. And the stupendous fabric which he raised does his genius immortal honour: for it must be remembered, that even had he understood the domestic advantages of a free trade, it was not in his power to open it. The king of Portugal was sole merchant, every factory was his, and the traffic between Portugal and India was, in the strictest sense, a regal monopoly. There was a species of free trade indeed allowed in the eastern seas; but from this the mother country received no benefit; and the principles upon which it existed, naturally produced the fall of the Portuguese eastern empire. We need not repeat its piratical anarchy. The greatest and most accomplished of the Portuguese governors saw its fatal tendency, and every method was attempted to restrict and render it infamous.

The tribute of the vassal princes, the territorial levies, and the duties of the various custom-houses, produced under some governors a considerable revenue. But how miserably obvious is this system to every abuse! The foregoing history demonstrates how, period after period, it fell into deeper and deeper disorder. The yearly salary of Almeyda, the first viceroy, was only 15,000 rials, (i. e. 1041*l*. 13*s*. 1*d*. sterling;) about fourscore or a hundred years after, the salary and profits of three years vicerealty amounted to about one million and a half of ducats. Paria y Sousa has given, from the archives of Portugal, an exact list of all the ships cleared from Portugal for India, from the discovery of Gama to the year 1640⁹⁰. During the first fifty years, which was the most flourishing period of Portuguese Asia, only nine or ten vessels sailed yearly from Portugal to India. And from that period to the end of the Spanish usurpation, only one or two vessels carried the annual traffic of India to Portugal.

Besides the misconduct which naturally results from that worst of all monopolies, a regal one, many were the other circumstances which included the future ruin of the Portuguese.

The vague terms of the viceroy's commission (for which see the Appendix) and his arbitrary power, from which there was no appeal to any body of laws of supreme authority, naturally produced the unjust wars, the insolence, cruelty, and fearless rapine of the Portuguese governors and their dependent officers.

From every circumstance it appears, that the courts of Lisbon and Madrid never considered the commerce of India as an object worthy of their attention. Sovereignty and revenue were the advantages they expected, and endeavoured to find in the east.

Every historian of Portuguese Asia complains of the sudden recalls of the viceroys; and the stated term of three years vicerealty is most apparently absurd and ruinous. Every historian of these transactions mentions it as the general practice, that the new viceroy stopped and reversed every preparation and plan of his predecessor.

Though no vessels but those of his majesty carried the commodities of India to Europe, a contraband traffic of the officers and sailors had been, most assuredly, of the earliest commencement. By a statute passed in 1687, it appears that the viceroys had formerly obtained the privilege for themselves, and of granting licenses to others, to carry certain articles and quantities of their own private traffic, on board of his majesty's vessels to Portugal. When this grant commenced, we have not been able to determine. Certain it is, however, that it must have been mentioned, had it been in existence when Castro, Ataíde, and other viceroys exerted the most strenuous efforts to discourage the mercantile pursuits of the native Portuguese. Were we allowed to venture a conjecture, we would place this exclusive grant to the viceroy and his creatures in the reign of John IV. who made a faint and vain endeavour to recover the dominion of India. And it outrages probability to suppose it older than the extraordinary but uncertified emoluments recorded as given by Philip II. to the viceroys of India. Whenever it commenced, however, in 1687 the legal right to this private traffic was abolished; but the contraband practice, which certainly began with the first voyage of Cabral, was as certainly continued.

The exclusive company of merchants, who in 1587 contracted to fit out the Indian fleets, appear to ⁹⁰ From the commencement of the Indian commerce under Cabral, in 1500, to the death of the great Castro, in 1548, 494 ships sailed from Lisbon for India, of which 41 were lost on the voyage. On an average, therefore, about 19 ships in each two years arrived in India. As many of these were war ships, sent to continue in the east, we cannot suppose that, making allowance for shipwrecks, more than five returned annually to Portugal. From 1548 to the accession of Philip, 173 sailed from Lisbon for India, of which 17 were lost. The yearly average is therefore near five ships sent, and the return, as above proportioned, about three. During 57 years under the crown of Spain, only 285 sailed for India, whereof only 236 arrived. Some years not one ship sailed, either from Lisbon to India, or from India to Lisbon. At this period, say all our authors, the ships were mostly overloaded, and sailed at improper seasons, by which means many were lost, and many were taken by the Dutch and English. And thus, upon an average, at least, from about the year 1616, not more than three vessels in each two years arrived at Lisbon.

have had little influence in the affairs of India. The power of the viceroy and the practical anarchy were still predominant. While only one or two sailed annually for Portugal, the sloops and other vessels employed in the trade of the private adventurers amounted to a considerable number. Captain Best met a trading fleet of 240 Portuguese vessels on the coast of Cambaya: and when the Mogul declared war against the Portuguese, in 1617, the number of their vessels detained in his harbours (Vid. Far. sub. an.) was 900. Yet were the adventurers in this trade liable to every inconvenience usually suffered by smugglers and freebooters. It is true they carried the commodities of Ethiopia and the coasts around Ormus, to Malacca and China; and in return distributed the products of the eastern over the western shores of the Indian ocean. But they had no certain protection of their property, and they were surrounded with monopolies. The viceroys and commanders of forts had monopolies of their own in every station between Ethiopia and China. And it is easy to conceive how their creatures must have lorded it over all those who dared to interfere with their profits. To render a foreign trade prosperous, the honest merchant must have every possible encouragement. It is easy to acquire a handsome independence in an honourable channel, the sons of men of property and of countries will adventure; and where capital stock and real abilities are best rewarded, commerce must greatly increase. If on the other hand, the merchant is fettered with difficulties, only men of desperate fortune will settle in a distant climate. And these, conscious of the restraints under which they labour, conscious that they have much to gain and little to lose, will, in the nature of things, be solely influenced by the spirit of the mere adventurer; by that spirit which utterly ruined the Portuguese in India.

Each of the fleets which sailed annually from Lisbon to India, carried out, upon an average, about 3000 men. Very few of these ever returned to settle in Portugal. They married in the east, and became one people with the descendants of those Portuguese, who, at various periods, had settled and married with the natives, in the numerous colonies of Portuguese Asia. Their great commonwealth, in the beginning of the seventeenth century, was a mere anarchy, and its revenue of so little value to the mother country, that Philip III. abandoned India in the most extraordinary manner: he made an edict, that every office under the government should be sold by public sale, an edict that merit should be neglected, and that only the most worthless and rapacious should be intrusted with the affairs of state.

THE APPLICATION

Of the example of Portuguese Asia cannot be better enforced than by an examination of the popular arguments relative to the British commerce with India. A recent writer on the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations, has stood forth as the philosophical champion for the abolition of the monopoly of the English united East India company. His arguments may be reduced to these four positions.

- I. Exclusive companies are in every respect pernicious.
- II. In the Portuguese commerce with India, for more than a century there was no exclusive company; such monopoly is therefore unnecessary for the support of the Indian commerce.
- III. Under a free trade, factors will settle in India of their own accord, and every commercial accommodation of selling and purchasing cargo will naturally follow.
- IV. Where forts and garrisons are absolutely necessary, these will be best under the immediate protection of the sovereign, under whose care his native subjects will find themselves perfectly safe and easy.

The fable of Procrustes and his iron bed, was perhaps designed by the ancients to signify a system builder and his system. The reader will soon be enabled to form his own judgment on the justice of this explanation.

The first position is thus maintained by our author: "Of all the expedients that can well be contrived to stunt the natural growth of a new colony, that of an exclusive company is undoubtedly the most effectual." Vol. ii. p. 171.

Having distinguished monopolies into two kinds, our author thus concludes his chapter: "Such exclusive companies, therefore, are nuisances in every respect, always more or less inconvenient to the countries in which they are established, and destructive to those which have the misfortune to fall under their government." Vol. ii. p. 236.

Thus, and throughout our author's whole work, monopolies are represented as always, every where, and in every respect pernicious. Yet when some historical facts, and the manners of nations, are put in the other balance, the scale, loaded with these assertions, will instantly fly up and kick the beam.

However some men may declaim, there was a time when the founding of abbeys and monasteries was the most political method by which the monarchs of Europe could introduce civilization among their barbarous subjects. And, however ill adapted to the present times, that old monopoly, the institution of corporations, was at one period highly political, and absolutely necessary to support infant commerce against the surrounding oppressions and uncommercial spirit of the feudal system. The commerce of the Hans Towns began not only with incorporated companies, but also with a general stipulated league of these companies; for such union was absolutely necessary to protect the infancy of their naval commercial intercourse against the numerous bands of savage pirates, who at that time infested the Baltic, the Danish, and the German seas.

When prince Henry of Portugal, at his own private expense, had discovered Madeira, his brother, King Edward, made him proprietor of that island. Henry divided it into districts, which he gave to some of his captains, who in return paid him a revenue. When the same prince had discovered the coast of Guinea, the united efforts of a company appeared to him as the most vigorous method of prosecuting his designs. Under a charter from him, and for which they paid him a revenue, several of his captains erected a commercial company at Lagos, and the vigour of their pursuits answered the expectations of Henry. In the third year of their establishment, fourteen ships sailed from that port upon trade and further discovery; and fifteen were the same year fitted out from Madeira. In 1471, Alonzo V, engrossed by domestic quarrels, and the affairs of Morocco, granted Fernando Gomez a monopoly of the Guinea trade, for the small sum of 300 ducats annually, but upon condition that during the first five years he should extend his discoveries 500 leagues further along the sea coast. This condition highly vindicates the wisdom of this monopoly; as the numerous fleets of Lagos and Madeira justify Henry. Discovery was a most unpopular measure, and neither the attention of Alonzo, nor the finances of the state, could afford to fit out squadrons on expeditions of hope. Even in 1497, two of the four ships which were sent to discover India, were purchased from subjects; (see Appendix;) so unable were the royal dock-yards of Portugal to fit out fleets for discovery.

Without the regular connexion of a company, under the sanction of legislative authority, the Dutch might have as rationally attempted to establish a commerce with the Moors as with India. The natives, it is true, received at first, both the Dutch and the English with joy. But the Portuguese were infinitely too strong for all the unconnected attempts of all the private merchants of Europe, and it was their interest to prevent intruders. Nor did the good-will of the natives arise from any other cause than their deep hatred of the Portuguese. It was the interest of the Moors, Egyptians, and Turks, that no Europeans should navigate the eastern seas; and had the Dutch and English been the first who discovered India, they must have encountered the whole force of the east, and all the rage of the Moors.

A sovereign who desires to open a commerce with a distant country, under the circumstances of India, has only this alternative: he must either give exclusive privileges to a company, or he must put his exchequer to the enormous expense of forts and garrisons, and warlike fleets year after year, to awe the hostile natives. In this last supposition, the trade with such countries may be either reserved as a monopoly of the crown, or laid open and free to all the subjects. Exclusive companies were chosen by the Dutch and English, in their prosecution of the commerce of India. And a crown monopoly was adopted by the kings of Portugal. But no sovereign was ever so deep a theorist as to take upon himself the enormous and uncertain expense of conquering and bridling distant and warlike nations, in order that, after enriching themselves with the commerce of such countries, his subjects might be better enabled to pay what future taxes he might think proper to impose upon them.

The second position ascribed to our author is deduced from these sentences: "The Portuguese carried on the trade both to Africa and the East Indies, without any exclusive companies." Vol. ii. p. 248.

"Except in Portugal, and within these few years in France, the trade to the East Indies has, in every European country, been subjected to an exclusive company." Vol. ii. p. 242.

"That such companies are not in general necessary for carrying on the East India trade, is sufficiently demonstrated by the experience of the Portuguese, who enjoyed almost the whole of it for more than a century together, without any exclusive company." Vol. ii. p. 246.

In political philosophy an exclusive company and exclusive trade are exactly the same. Our author himself gives the very worst of characters of a regal monopoly; but it seems to have been utterly unknown to him, that such ever was, and is, the Portuguese commerce between Europe and India; utterly unknown to him, that the Portuguese free trade in the Indian seas was a disgrace to commerce, was ruinous in every principle, was esteemed infamous, only fit for slaves, in the days of the Portuguese prosperity; and, in order to its suppression, was taxed greatly beyond the trade carried on by the na-

tiven. The continuance or abolition of the East India company is a matter of the first importance. If either method be adopted upon false principles, the consequences will be severely felt. We shall therefore claim some merit in holding up a conspicuous example to future philosophers, how imprudent it is to trust to the self-sufficiency of speculation, when, on the most important topics, they appeal to historical facts as a sufficient demonstration of the ease and safety of their theoretical schemes.

The third position ascribed to our author will be found at great length in his fourth book. In Sweden and Denmark he owns that the encouragement of a monopoly was necessary to their trade with India. But where monopolies are necessary, such countries, he says, ought not to trade directly to the East Indies. He takes it for granted, that the smallness of the national capital stock, which cannot be spared in the slow returns of so distant a trade, produces this necessity. And it were better, he adds, for such countries to buy their Indian goods "somewhat dearer" from other nations. But when a nation is rich enough to trade with India, a free commerce, according to our author, would naturally spring up in the most beautiful order. He states the objection of the impossibility of a private merchant's capital being able to support factors and agents in the different parts of India; to which he thus replies, (vol. ii. p. 246.) "There is no great branch of trade in which the capital of any one private merchant is sufficient for carrying on all the subordinate branches, which must be carried on in order to carry on the principal branch. But when a nation is ripe for any great branch of trade, some merchants naturally turn their capitals towards the principal, and some towards the subordinate branches of it. . . . If a nation therefore is ripe for the East India trade, a certain portion of its capital will naturally divide itself among all the different branches of that trade. Some of its merchants will find it for their interest to reside in the East Indies, and employ their capitals there in providing goods for the ships which are to be sent out by other merchants, who reside in Europe."

When this scheme of commerce with India cannot be effected, it is a proof, according to our author (p. 247.) that such country, at that particular time, was not ripe for that trade; and had better buy their Indian goods, "even at a higher price," from other nations. But had the Portuguese, Dutch, and English, waited for such theoretical ripeness, they had never yet set one foot in India.

In the most favourable view of such establishment of commerce with the great world of Asia, its perfection cannot spring up in a few years, and would be always precarious. When the Moors were in force, such peaceful establishments were impossible, for they knew their present interest too well to listen to the promises of European speculation; and the present character of the Indian nations gives no prophecy when arts and garrulous will become unnecessary to the European residents in India. Our author seems aware of this, in the sentence which immediately follows the last cited, and which vindicates the fourth position into which we have divided his argument.

But it will be here necessary to give a short analysis of the great principles of our author's system.

The wealth of nations, he says, arises from labour; the value of which, he often tells us, is only to be fixed by the higgling of the market. That share of land rent which is claimed by the sovereign, is his favourite source of revenue. And were every subject allowed a free trade too, the whole nation would be enriched, and this source of revenue, of consequence, greatly enlarged. But monopolies of all kinds, by stunting the use of stock and the consequent increase of riches, stunt the sources of revenue. Monopolies are therefore every where and in every respect prejudicial to sovereign and people. As the sovereign is chiefly interested in the flourishing state of the land-rent revenue, it is most likely to flourish under his care. And over and above, as the population of foreign colonies must enlarge the above natural source of revenue, for all other sources are round about; so the population of foreign colonies is the chief end of colonisation.

From this analysis, which challenges the severest test, the proposition to put the forts and territory of British India into the hands of the sovereign, naturally follows. We shall give it in our author's own words:

"The settlements," says he, "which different European nations have obtained in the East Indies, if they were taken from the exclusive companies to which they at present belong, and put under the immediate protection of the sovereign, would render this residence" (i. e. of the voluntary unconnected adventurers before mentioned) "both safe and easy, at least to the merchants of the particular nations to whom those settlements belong."

But ere we examine this bold proposition, our author's great objections against the Dutch and English East India companies require our previous attention. "These," says our author, "though possessed of many considerable settlements, both upon the coast of Africa and in the East Indies, have not yet established in either of those countries such numerous and thriving colonies as those in the islands and continent of America. (p. 247.) . . . In the spice islands, the Dutch burn all the spice which a plentiful season produces, beyond what they expect to dispose of in Europe with such a profit as they think sufficient. . . . They have reduced the population of several of the Moluccas. Under the government even of the Portuguese, however, those islands are said to have been tolerably well inhabited. The English company have not yet had time to establish in Bengal so perfectly destructive a system. The plan of their government, however, has had exactly the same tendency. It has not been uncommon, I am well assured, for the chief, that is the first clerk of a factory, to order a peasant to plough up a rich field of poppies, and sow it with rice or some other grain. The pretence was to prevent a scarcity of provisions; but the real reason to give the chief an opportunity of selling at a better price a large quantity of opium, which he happened then to have upon hand. Upon other occasions the order has been reversed, and a rich field of rice or other grain has been ploughed up, in order to make room for a plantation of poppies." p. 250. And thus, as our author expresses it, p. 253, "monopolies stunt the natural growth of some parts, at least, of the surplus produce of the country, to what is barely sufficient for answering the demand of the company."

Our author's abhorrence of commercial pursuits, and his keen predilection for land-rent revenue, are strongly marked in the following sentence: "A company of merchants are, it seems, incapable of considering themselves as sovereigns, even after they have become such. Trade, or buying in order to sell again, they still consider as their principal business, and, by a strange absurdity, regard the character of the sovereign as but an appendix to that of the merchant, as something which ought to be made subservient to it, or by means of which they may be enabled to buy cheaper in India, and thereby to sell with a better profit in Europe. They endeavour for this purpose to keep out, as much as possible, all competitors. . . . Their mercantile habits draw them in this manner, almost necessarily, though perhaps insensibly, to prefer, upon all ordinary occasions, the little and transitory profit of the monopolist, to the great and permanent revenue of the sovereign." p. 252.

Such are the evils which attend the Dutch and English East India companies: the advantages which would follow, were such monopolies to be abolished, and the sovereign to be sole master of Indian acquisition are these: all his subjects, who pleased, might turn their stock to the commerce of India. By such means, the population of the colonies, and, of consequence, the regal share of their revenue, would be greatly increased.

And thus, according to our author, commerce is of very inferior consequence; and the importation of the sovereign's revenue the very maximum bonus of the political wisdom of colonization. But these very suspicious data demand a much deeper investigation than our author has bestowed upon them. In many places he expresses the most cordial affection for the kingly power. Because it is the sovereign's interest that his colonies should prosper, he supposes, therefore, that colonies, if under his immediate protection, will and must flourish⁹⁷. And because a monarch, at the head of a standing army, may despise the rudest and most licentious libellers, he concludes, p. 311, that "a standing army is propitious to the cause of liberty⁹⁸." That perfection of wisdom, magnanimity, and attention, which is most essentially implied in these suppositions, is not, however, to be found in a succession of monarchs. No, not in an individual sovereign, if we may believe an assertion which has escaped from our author, p. 441. "The servants," says he, "of the most careless private person are, perhaps, more under the eye of their master, than those of the most careful prince."

When the Portuguese Indian commerce was farmed by a company of merchants, in 1587, about 87 years after its commencement, the regal monopoly was altered, not abolished; for this commerce was continued, according to every idea ever known in the Spanish or Portuguese colonies. It was carried on in a limited number of register ships; and the sovereign authority of the Indian viceroys was still predominant. Our author confesses, p. 171, that the commerce of register ships is "very nearly upon the same principles as that of an exclusive company." And certainly, with respect to his system, they are exactly the same. In describing the management of trade, where it is the sole property of the sovereign, our author has given, though very undesignedly, a very accurate sketch of the regal monopoly of Portugal. Talking of the mercantile pursuits of princes; "They have scarce ever succeeded", says he, p. 414. "The profusion with which the affairs of princes are always managed, renders it almost impossible that they should. The agents of a prince regard the wealth of their master as inexhaustible; are careless at what price they buy; are careless at what price they sell; are careless at what expense they transport his goods from one place to another. Those agents frequently live with the profusion of princes, and sometimes too, in spite of that profusion, and by a proper method of making up their accounts, acquire the fortunes of princes. It is thus, we are told by Machiavel, that the agents of Lorenzo of Medicia, not a prince of mean abilities, carried on his trade." And thus, also, the corrupted viceroys of India conducted the trade of the kings of Portugal.

⁹⁷ This argument, absolutely essential to his system, is supported by our author, vol. II, p. 251, &c.

⁹⁸ What a pity it is, that France and Spain have never found out this secret! What arbitrary impositions might be avoided, and what expense of legions of spies might be saved, could they perceive our author's advantages of a standing army!

But it may be said, the consequences of the above are inapplicable; for a regal monopoly of revenue, and not of trade, is our author's system. His system is held forth as such indeed, yet we apprehend its consequences would be the same. A hostile country, of vast extent, bridled and awed, and the revenue of an immense territory, governed by the troops and officers of a distant sovereign, is something exceedingly like the Portuguese plan. The consequences of the Portuguese system, therefore, requires our strictest attention.

The Portuguese viceroys, it may be said, were arbitrary, and governed by no code of known laws: and the officers of a British sovereign will not be armed with such power. Yet our author is of opinion that the servants of the India company assume such power, and that it is completely foolish to expect they would not. Monopoly, he says, is the interest of a company and its servants. A free trade and revenue is the interest of a sovereign. But does it follow, as our author's argument implies, that such is the interest of his servants also? By no means. We may well inquire, what is that wonderful virtue, essential to our author's argument, which is conferred by the royal commission; that virtue, which would correct all the selfish passions which influence the clerks of a counting-house, and would save the poppies and the rice of Bengal from an untimely plough? If the territory of British India is to be the king's, he must have men in office to manage it under him, and these will have their private interests to serve, as well as the officers of a company. Whence, then, are we to expect their superior virtue? Not, surely, from their greater opportunities of extortion, and of evading inquiry.--But we shall here adopt a sentence from our author, (vol. ii. p. 233,) only substituting the word king, where he writes counting-house: "Nothing can be more completely foolish than to expect that the clerks of a great king, at ten thousand miles distance, and consequently almost quite out of sight, should, upon a simple order from their master, give up, at once, doing any sort of business upon their own account, abandon for ever all hopes of making a fortune, of which they have the means in their hands, and content themselves with the moderate salaries which their master allows them." Our author pursues his argument, how the servants of a company establish monopolies of their own; and such, attended with every circumstance of unrestrained enormity, was the conduct of the crown officers of Portuguese Asia.

The superior opportunities of extortion and rapine, enjoyed by the military governors of a very distant and rich country, are self-evident. The clerks of a crown office have infinitely better opportunities of evading detection, and of amassing perquisites, than those of a company. Our author has already been cited to explain how the servants of a prince abuse their trust. "It is perfectly indifferent," says he, vol. ii. p. 255, "to the servants of the India company, when they have carried their whole fortune with them, if, the day after they left it, the whole country was swallowed up by an earthquake." And, in the name of God, will not such disaster be equally indifferent to a royal general, or a royal custom-house officer, whenever he finds it convenient to retire from India?

But this is not applicable, it may be said, to our author's system, which is to plant colonies, like those of America, in India, on purpose to draw a revenue from them; and the prosperity of the country will then be the interest of the royal officers. But a hard question here obtrudes itself. Will it be the desire of fixed residents to export a revenue, or to be careful of it? Though many of the Portuguese were natives of the east, war was their harvest; and, like the savages of Louisiana, who cut down the tree when they desire the fruit, their rapacity destroyed the roots and sources of revenue. The nature of their situation, explained by our author in the case of Lorenzo of Medicia, vindicates this assertion, and every period of Portuguese Asia enforces its truth. Though all the artillery of arguments, drawn from the abuses committed by the servants of a company, may thus, with accumulated force, be turned against the servants of a prince; arguments of deeper import still remain.

Whenever a society emerges from what is called the shepherd state, luxuries become its inseparable attendants. And imported luxuries, however neglected and undervalued in our author's estimate, offer not only a plentiful, but the safest mode of taxing the wages of labour, the profits of stock, and the rent of land. The industry of the manufacturer and husbandman can never thus be impeded or injured, which they most certainly are, for a time, by every new tax upon labour and land. The luxuries imported by the East India company have afforded a revenue⁶⁶ which has been equal to the land-tax of England. The question then is, whether would this valuable revenue be diminished or increased, were every port open, and every adventurer free to fit out what ships he pleased, to traffic with India?

But were this allowed, what an army of custom-house officers must there be in waiting at every port of the kingdom! for who knows what port a vessel from India once in seven years may choose to enter? What a door for smuggling the luxuries of India would this open! And we need not add, what a diminution of revenue!

Besides the great revenue which it pays, the East India company forms one of the most active sinews of the state. Public funds are peculiar to England. The credit and interest of the nation depend upon their support⁶⁷; and the East India company is not the least of these. It has often supported government with immense loans, and its coathurance includes the promise of future support on the like emergencies.

And must this stupendous and important fabric be demolished, to make way for an untried theory⁶⁸?

For a free trade, which, while it increased our imported luxuries, would greatly diminish the revenue which arises from them:

For a trade, which would injure our own manufactures⁶⁹, were the present restrictions abolished:

For a trade, which could not be established in India for many years, and which, perhaps, is in its nature impracticable:

“For a transition, which, though possible, must be attended with innumerable difficulties, considering what convulsions, even the smallest stroke of legislative authority upon private property generally produces, notwithstanding all the precautions which may be used.”⁷⁰

For a system, which must render the sovereign the military despot of an immense and rich territory⁷¹, and make him the sole master of an unconstitutional revenue; a revenue, which, in the hands of a corrupt ministry, would easily defeat the noblest check against arbitrary power provided by the British constitution, the right of taxation in the house of commons.

America, passively submissive at the feet of a junta in power, could not, for several centuries, afford the means of corruption, which India, already deeply enslaved, would freely yield, for at least a few years.

In every probability, for only a few years—however highly our author may think of the great and ⁶⁶ The revenue paid by the goods of the company, and the ventures of their servants, together with the former annual donation, have been above two millions yearly. The land-tax falls short of two millions.

⁶⁷ “The credit and the interest of the nation depend on the support of the public funds.—While the annuities, and interest for money advanced, are there regularly paid, and the principal insured by both prince and people, (a security not to be had in other nations,) foreigners will lend us their property, and all Europe be interested in our welfare; the paper of the companies will be converted into money and merchandise, and Great Britain can never want cash to carry her schemes into execution. In other nations, credit is founded on the word of the prince, if a monarchy; or on that of the people, if a republic; but here it is established on the interests of both prince and people, which is the strongest security.”—Guthrie.

⁶⁹ Silks, muslins, calicoes, embroidery, cottons, toys, and many of the Indian manufactures, would greatly injure those of this country, were a free importation allowed. The woven manufactures of India, imported by the company, are restricted to foreign markets.

⁷⁰ This sentence in inverted commas is from a pamphlet, entitled Thoughts on our Acquisitions in the East Indies—written by Governor Johnstone.

⁷¹ “The immense power which would be added to the crown, by our dominion in the east falling preponderatingly under its management, must be a serious consideration, with every one who believes the preponderating weight which that part of the constitution already possesses; and who wishes, at the same time, to preserve the just balance. Every intelligent mind must foresee the immense additional influence that would accrue, by the command of such a number of troops, the administration of such extensive revenues, and the disposal of so many offices. The author of these Reflections is persuaded, we might expect the same effects that followed the annexation of the rich orders of St. Iago, Calatrava, and Alcantara, to the crown of Spain; which, a celebrated Spanish historian says, contributed more towards enervating that country, than all the other insidious arts and expedients of Ferdinand and Isabella.”—Gov. Johnstone’s Thoughts, &c.

permanent revenue of the sovereign; and however he may despise the little and transitory profit of the merchant, we will venture to support the very opposite opinions.

Our author laments, that merchants will never consider themselves as sovereigns, when they have really become such. Commerce was despised, and sovereignty was the ambition of the Portuguese. Immense extension of dominion, greatly superior to the settlements of both the Dutch and English, became therefore their object: and uncommercial often wars naturally followed this search for revenue. And this system as naturally produced the deepest ruin. Wars after wars will ever be produced by a sovereignty assumed in a distant region. The Spanish method of extirpation is the only preventive. Some territory is necessary to settlements in India. But such extension as would depress the grand system of the Indian commerce, must, like the Portuguese sovereignty, end in ruin. The plan of sovereignty directly leads to war with the jealous natives of India. Such revenue, therefore, cannot be permanent, and most probably will not be great for a length of years. Our author apprises the India company, because their colonies in India are not so populous and thriving as those in America. But were the Indian colonies as safe from the natives, as his scheme of unconnected settlers requires; as populous, and their revenue as great, as his idea of perfection may possibly include, how long would he ensure the permanency of their revenue against the interruption of a revolt or rebellion, or such colonies themselves from a sudden and final dismemberment?—Alas! at this present hour we feel a most melancholy proof of the difficulties and disappointments of raising a revenue in a distant country. May God never curse Great Britain, by fixing her views and hopes on such distant, such little and transitory support!

If properly watched and defended, if not sacrificed to the dreams and dotage of theory, the grand machine of her commerce will ever render Great Britain both prosperous and formidable. In this grand machine the East India company forms a principal wheel. The concentrated support which it gives to the public credit; the vast and most rational home tax which its imported luxuries afford, a tax which forms a constitutional source of revenue, ever in our own hands, never to be affected by the politics of distant colonies; the population which it gives to the mother country, by the domestic industry employed upon the staple commodities⁷³ which it exports; and the essential balance of trade given ⁷³ The first source of the wealth of nations, however neglected in our author's estimate, most certainly consists in its staples; and the plenty of these, and the degrees of their importance, is admitting to the wants and desires of mankind, fix the natural difference between the riches of countries. And to this source, the labour necessary to fit these staples to their respective uses is dependent and secondary, if the fruit may be called dependent on, and secondary to, the root of the tree. It is therefore the great duty of the statesman to protect, direct and cherish the manufacture of staples; and by making colonies contribute to this purpose, he produces the natural, advantageous, and permanent use of foreign acquisition. This, however, is so far from being a part of our author's system, that he even reprobates the idea, that the legislature should give any protection or direction to any branch of manufacture. He calls it a power with which no minister can safely be trusted. Vol. ii. p. 36. "It is," he says, "in some measure to direct people in what manner they ought to employ their capitals," of which, he tells us, p. 35, they are much better judges than any statesman or lawyer. Nay, he even asserts, p. 37, &c. that were any branch of manufacture, for he excepts none, to fall into utter decay, by the freedom of foreign importation, the country would lose nothing by it. The manufacturers, he owns, might sustain the loss of their tools and workshops*, but they would immediately turn their capitals and industry into other channels, which would be of equal advantage to their country. Nay, further, government bounty to the introduction of a new manufacture is hurtful; for that will diminish the revenue, and, of consequence, the national capital: p. 38.

Thus says theory. But let it be asked, if branches of our manufacture must thus, for the good of the nation, be suffered to fall into decay, what must become of the staples, for our author excepts no

* Some people are apt to apprehend the greatest inconvenience, from setting a number of artificers adrift in search of new employment. But this is nothing, according to our author, who tells us, that 100,000 soldiers and seamen, discharged at the last peace, immediately found employment. Very true; for the labourer took to his spade, the tailor to his needle, the shoe-maker to his awl, and the seaman to the merchant service. But were only 10,000 weavers thrown out of employ, the case would be widely altered. But the certainty of finding an unknown employment, fully as advantageous as the branch perfectly known, forms a part of our author's system. It was a silly notion, he tells us, vol. ii. p. 196, to defend Portugal, last war, for the sake of its trade. "Had that trade been lost," says he, "it would only have thrown the Portuguese merchants out of business for a year or two, till they found out as good a method of employing their capitals." Some politicians have thought, the more channels of commerce, the more success; but our author does not care how many were shut up; for this good reason, new ones are sure to be found. But this is like knocking a man down, because he is sure to get up again.

and secured by the exportation of its imports, are the great and permanent consequences of the commercial system, consequences which can never arise from the importation of the greatest revenue. And soon would all these advantages be lost, were the India company to relinquish the mercantile character, and, according to our author's plan⁷⁶, assume that of the sovereign. Nor can we take leave of our author, without remarking, that he has been rather unhappy in fixing upon the Portuguese as his favourites. His three great reasons for this predilection are obvious⁷⁷; and that these reasons were extremely rash and ill founded is also equally evident. His reasons are—the Portuguese had no extensive African or Indian companies—A most unlucky mistake! And

The population and revenue of the Portuguese colonies are exactly in the spirit of his system.

But the kingdom of Portugal suffered the severest evils from its vain sovereignty of India; and the exclusive companies of England and Holland, however reprobated by our author, have long been, and still are, by their vast commerce, of the most essential advantage to their mother countries, materials, upon which the abandoned manufacture was employed? Their former value must be greatly diminished, if sold unworked to foreigners; and if unsold, annihilated. And thus the national capital will be most effectually injured. Our author talks very confidently of the ease with which individuals will find a proper field for their industry; but, surely, where a number of the staples are thus reduced, the field for domestic industry must be proportionally narrowed; for it is hard to make bricks without straw. "Every individual," says our author, p. 32. "is continually exerting himself to find out the most advantageous employment for whatever capital he can command." But this position, absolutely necessary to our author's system, we flatly deny. There is not only a torpor on the general mind of such districts as are ignorant of commerce, which requires to be roused into action by those of superior intelligence; but there is also a stubborn attachment in such minds to their ancient usages, which half a century can hardly remove. Our author might have seen both this stupor and obtinacy strongly exemplified in the vast difficulty of introducing modern agriculture into a certain country. But, "No regulation of commerce," says he, p. 2. "can increase the quantity of industry in any society beyond what its capital can maintain." It is our author's great leading principle, that no nation ought to attempt any branch either of manufacture or commerce, till its capital be ripe for such branch; and till such time, it is their interest, he says, to buy the articles of such branches from their neighbours. But here let it be asked, how is the capital to be increased in this state of torpor? Elizabeth, and some of her predecessors, imagined that bounties and regulations of commerce would rouse to action, and thence to the increase of capital. At great expense they introduced the manufactures of the continent into their own dominions. And hence England became what she now is. But a view of the state of our author's native country will bring his theory to the fullest and fairest trial. According to his system, Scotland ought to be the most flourishing commercial country in Europe; for certain it is, and he himself often tells it, that the trade of North Britain is under much fewer regulations and restrictions than that of England, Holland, or any of her commercial neighbours. There was a time, indeed, before and in the fifteenth century, when her Jameses assumed the unsafe trust of directing the channels of industry; when they pensioned foreign artificers to settle in their kingdom, and made regulations of commerce. The consequence was, the Scots were the masters of their own fisheries, and the shipping of Scotland were then greatly superior to their present number. Soon after, however, our author's plan, that government should leave every subject to the course of his own industry, took place in the fullest latitude. And the consequence of government ceasing to watch over and direct the channels of commerce, as fully appeared. The Scottish navy fell into deep decline; and their fishery, perhaps the most valuable in the world, was seized by those monopolists the Dutch, who now enjoy it. A most excellent proof how the unencouraged and undirected Scots turned their capitals and industry to the best advantage! Neglected by government, the Scottish commerce long and deeply languished, till Mr. Pelham, of late, endeavoured to rouse it into action. But the people still follow our author's precept, of buying, from their neighbours, the greatest part of the manufactures they use. And the consequence of all is, many thousands of the Scots find a field for their ingenuity and industry in every commercial country of the world, except in their own.

⁷⁶ Yet, strange as it may seem, our author, vol. ii. p. 415. condemns the East India company for adopting the ideas of sovereigns. It has made them bad traders, he there says, and, he adds, has almost brought them to bankruptcy.

⁷⁷ According to our author, vol. ii. p. 248. it is owing to the genius of exclusive companies that the colonies of other nations in India have been less populous than those of Portugal. He who reads this work, however, will find another cause for the Portuguese population; and never were any colonies so vexed with monopolies within monopolies, as those of Portuguese Asia. Our author, with the same knowledge of his subject, always represents the Portuguese colonies as of more advantage to the mother country than those of England in America. The latter, he says, "have been a source of expense and not of revenue. But the Portuguese colonies have contributed revenue towards the defence of the mother country, or the support of her civil government."—Vol. ii. p. 194.

* Of such value is this fishery, that the arrival of the first fleet of husses is celebrated in Holland with public rejoicings, similar to those of the Egyptians on the overflow of the Nile.

Having thus followed our author's argument for laying open the India trade, through every gradation of his reasoning, a retrospect may not now perhaps be improper. He finds his argument on the absolute perniciousness of all monopolies, in every circumstance: the safety of laying open the East India trade, he asserts, is sufficiently demonstrated by the experience of the Portuguese. Were the exclusive India companies abolished, European merchants, he says, would voluntarily settle in India, by whom every office of factorship would be discharged. And where forts are necessary, these and the settlements, he asserts, would be most advantageous and prosperous under the immediate protection of the sovereign. In support of this last argument, he appeals to the abuses committed by the servants of a company. And the advantages which he deduces from his system, are, a free trade with India, in which every subject may employ his capital, and the importation of a royal revenue; which last circumstance he estimates as of infinitely more real importance than all the benefits resulting from commerce. But we have proved, by historical evidence, that monopolies and exclusive associations were absolutely necessary in the infancy of trade, and that their effects were rapid, extensive, and highly prosperous. We have likewise brought demonstration, both from the history and the archives of Portugal, confirmed by every principle of Spanish or Portuguese commerce, that his appeal to the experience of the Portuguese is founded upon a most egregious and capital error. Every page of the history of Portuguese Asia, and the present state of India, demonstrate the impossibility of the scheme of unconnected and unprotected settlers. And from the example of the Portuguese, confirmed by every experience, certain it is that every argument against the servants of a company may be turned, with redoubled force, against the officers of a crown. And were even this system, whose basis is overturned by historical facts, were it even founded on truth, the consequences which he deduces from it are neither certain nor advantageous. By an appeal to undeniable principles, we have held up to view the unavoidable disadvantages⁷⁸ of laying open the Indian commerce; and from other principles, equally fixed and evident, it amounts to demonstration, that a despotic revenue, raised in a distant country, must ever be productive of war, transitory, unconstitutional, and dangerous. On the contrary, we have evinced, that the benefits arising from the commerce of India, on the great principles of its present establishment, are important, domestic, and permanent. In an suspicious principle, therefore, we must submit to that necessity of circumstances which we cannot alter; we must not shut our eyes against the broad glare of the light of facts, and amputate the limbs and dislocate the joints of commerce, in order to shorten or to lengthen it to the standard of theory, as Procrustes is fabled to have fitted his unhappy captives to the standard of his iron bed.

Every institution relative to man is not only liable to corruption, but, such is the imperfection of human nature, is sure to be corrupted. Both the servants of a company, and the officers of a king, are liable to the influence of self-interest. But the monarch's ear is hard of access, and often guarded; and the regulations of a regal monopoly, or despotic revenue, are variable at his will. Appeal here must be hopeless. But, under a company, governed by fixed institutions, there exists not only a legal claim of redress, but a legal right of opposition. If errors and corruption, therefore, be natural to every system of human government, let the system most open to inspection and correction be preserved, and let its errors and corruptions be corrected. And happily the British parliament is possessed of the power of such inspection and correction; and happily also such authority is the very reverse of a regal power to raise a foreign revenue, this parliamentary power is constitutional.

The abbé Raynal, in his reflections on the fate of the Portuguese, informs his reader, that while the court of Lisbon projected the discovery of India, and expected inexhaustible riches, the more moderate and enlightened foresaw and foretold the evils which would follow success. And time, says he, the supreme judge of politics, hastened to fulfil their predictions. He, however, who is acquainted with the Portuguese historians must perceive the errors of this representation. The objections against the voyage of Gama were by no means of the enlightened kind. They were these: nothing but barren deserts, like Libya, were to be found; or, if the discovered lands were rich, the length of the voyage would render it unprofitable: or, if profitable, the introduction of wealth would beget a degeneracy of manners fatal to the kingdom. Foreign settlements would produce a depopulation and neglect of agriculture; or, if foreign colonies were necessary, Ethiopia offered both nearer and better settlements. And the wrath of the sultan of Egypt, and a combination of all Europe against Portugal, completed the prophecy of the threatened evils. But it was neither foreseen nor foretold, that the unexampled misconduct of the Portuguese would render the most lucrative commerce of the world a heavy, and at last insupportable expense on the treasury of Lisbon or Madrid; nor was it foretold, that the shameless villany, the faithless piracies and rapine of their countrymen would bring down destruction upon their empire. Of the objections here enumerated, few are named by our author. Nor does the evil of the increase of wealth, the depopulation and neglect of agriculture, which he mentions as the consequences of the navigation to India, do honour to the political wisdom, either of those who foretold them, or of those who adopt the opinion. The great population of Holland arises from its naval trade; and had the science of commerce been as well understood at the court of Lisbon as at Amsterdam, Portugal, a much finer country, had soon become more populous, and every way more flourishing than Holland is now.

Mines of gold, though most earnestly desired, are the least valuable parts of foreign acquisition. The produce of mines, like the importation of revenue, neither puts into motion nor cherishes domestic industry. To increase the population of the mother country is the only real wealth; and this can only be attained by increasing the means of employment, in such manner as will naturally inspire the spirit of industry. The staple commodities of a country must therefore be manufactured at home, and from hence agriculture will of necessity be improved. He, therefore, who foretels the neglect of agriculture on the increase of commerce, foretels an event contrary to the nature of things; and nothing but an infatuation, which cannot at a distance be foreseen, may possibly fulfil the prediction. To export the domestic manufacture, and import the commodities of foreign countries, are the great, the only real uses of foreign settlements. But did Spain and Portugal derive these advantages from their immense acquisitions in the east and west? Every thing contrary. The gold of Mexico and Peru levied the armies of Charles V. but established or encouraged no trade in his kingdom. Poverty and depopulation, therefore, were not the natural consequences of the discoveries of Columbus; but the certain result of the evil policy of Spain. We have seen how the traffic of India was managed by Portugal. That commerce, which was the foundation of the maritime strength of the Mohammedan powers, and which enriched Venice, was not only all in the power of the Portuguese; but it was theirs also to purchase that traffic on their own terms, with the commodities of Europe. But sovereignty, with its revenue, and not commerce, was the sole object of the Portuguese ambition.

Many have pronounced, that the same evils which overwhelmed the Portuguese are ready to burst upon the British empire. Ignorance of the true principles of commerce, that great cause of the fall of the Portuguese empire, does not at present, however, threaten the British; nor is the only natural reason of that fall applicable to Great Britain. The territory of Portugal is too small to be the head of so extensive an empire as once owned its authority. Auxiliaries may occasionally assist; but permanency of dominion can only be insured by native troops. The numerous garrisons of Portugal in Brazil, in Africa, and Asia, required more supplies than the uncommercial seat of empire could afford, without depriving itself of defence in case of invasion. In the event, the foreign garrisons were lost for want of supplies; and the seat of empire, on the shock of one disaster, fell an easy prey to the usurpation of Spain. Great Britain, on the contrary, by the appointment of nature, reigus the commercial empress of the world. The unrivalled island is neither too large nor too small. Ten millions of inhabitants are naturally sufficient to afford armies to defend themselves against the greatest power; nor is such radical strength liable to fall asunder by its own weight. Neither is nature less kind in the variety of the climate of the British isles. That variety in her different provinces alike contributes to the production of her invaluable staples and hardy troops. Wou and defended from the Mohammedans in wars esteemed religious, the circumstances of Portugal produced a high and ardent spirit of chivalry, which raised her to empire; but when success gave a relaxation to the action of this spirit, the general ignorance and corruption of all ranks sunk her into ruin. The circumstances of the British empire are greatly different. Her military spirit is neither cherished by, nor dependent upon, causes which exist in one age and not in another. Nor is the increase of wealth big with such evils as some esteem. Portugal did not owe her fall to it, for she was not enriched by the commerce of India. If Great Britain ever suffer by enormous wealth, it must be by a general corruption of manners. This, however, is infinitely more in the power of government than the many surmise. To remedy an evil, we must trace its source. And never was there national corruption of manners, which did not flow from the vices and errors of government. Where merit is the only passport to promotion, corruption of manners cannot be general. Where the worthless can purchase the offices of trust, universal profligacy must follow. Mankind, it may be said, are liable to be corrupted, and wealth affords the opportunity. But this axiom will greatly mislead us from the line of truth, if taken in a general sense. The middle rank of men is infinitely more virtuous than the lowest. Profligacy of manners is not, therefore, the natural consequence of affluence; it is the accident which attends a vulgar mind, in whatever external situation. And when vulgar minds are preferred to the high offices of church or state, it is the negligence or wickedness of government, and not the increase of wealth, which is the source of the national corruption. Some articles of traffic have an evil influence on a people. But neither is this injustice to be charged on the increase of national trade. The true principles of commerce, on the contrary, require the restriction of many⁷⁹, and perhaps the prohibition of some articles. And ignorance of the true spirit of commerce, and neglect in the legislature, are therefore the real sources of these evils.

While our popular declaimers foresee nothing but ruin in the increase of commerce and wealth, they overlook, or know not, the greatest danger to which foreign acquisition lies open, and which it even invites. The rapacity of distant governors, so strongly exemplified by the Portuguese, has a direct tendency to the production of every evil which can affect a commercial empire. Every governor feels two objects soliciting his attention, objects frequently incompatible, at least not easily to be reconciled—the public, and his own private interest. If institutions cannot be devised to render it the true interest of governors, to make that of the public their first care, stability cannot be preserved. The voluntary poverty of Albuquerque and of Nunio was nobly adapted to the high and romantic ideas of Spanish honour, and without doubt had a wide effect. But no government has a right to require such an example; and in British India it would be useless and absurd, for we have no visionary principles on which it could possibly operate. He who devotes his life to the service of his country, merits a reward adequate to his station. An estimate of the reward which true policy will give, may be drawn from the fate of the Dutch settlement at Brazil. Prince Maurice of Nassau, the general of a Dutch West India company, expelled the Portuguese from one half of this rich and extensive country. In reward of his service he was appointed governor; but his mercantile masters, earnest for immediate gain, and ignorant of what was necessary for future security, were offended at the grandeur in which he lived, the number of fortresses which he built, and the expense of the troops which he kept. They forced him by ill-treatment to resign, and the ideas of the mere counting-house were now adopted. The expense of troops and of fortresses was greatly reduced; even that of the court of justice was retrenched; in their commerce with their new subjects, every advantage of the sordid trader was taken, and payment was enforced with the utmost rigour. Cent. per cent. was now divided in Holland, and all was happy in the idea of the burgo-masters, the lords of this colony; when the Portuguese, invited by the defenceless condition, and joined by the discontented subjects of the Dutch, overwhelmed them with ruin. Though the states now interested themselves vigorously, all the great expense of their armaments was lost. Brazil was recovered by the Portuguese, and this Dutch West India company was utterly extinguished.

Nor can we close our observations without one more. Nunio acquired an extensive territory in India. Harassed by the horrible wars of their native princes, the regions around Goa implored the Portuguese to take them under protection. And, safe and happy, while all around was steeped in blood, the territory under the dominion of Nunio was the envy and wonder of India. Taught by this example, every humane breast must warm on the view of the happiness which the British India company may diffuse over the east; a happiness which the British⁸⁰ are peculiarly enabled to bestow. Besides the many in-

⁷⁹ That private vices, the luxury and extravagance of individuals, are public benefits, has been confidently asserted, yet no theoretical paradox was ever more false. Luxuries, indeed, employ many hands, but all hands in employment conduce not alike to the service of the state. Those employed on the natural staples are of the first-rate service; but those engaged on luxuries often require materials which contribute to turn the balance of trade against the country where they reside; and as the sale of their labours depends upon fashion and caprice, not upon the real wants of life, they are apt to be thrown out of employ, and to become a dangerous burden on the commonwealth. Nor is all which is spent by individuals gained, as some assert, by the public. National wealth consists of the labour of the people, added to the value of the materials laboured upon. Every bankruptcy, therefore, annihilates the value of as much labour as its deficiency of payment amounts to; and thus the public is injured. Nor is this all; where private luxury is cherished as a public benefit, a national corruption of manners, the most dreadful political disease, will be sure to prevail, sure to reduce the most flourishing kingdom to the most critical weakness.

⁸⁰ The form of the government, and the national character of the British, peculiarly enable them to diffuse the blessings which flow from the true spirit of commerce. The Dutch have a parsimoniousness in their manners, and a palpable selfishness in their laws, ill relished by the neighbours of their settlements. They want a mixture of the blood of gentlemen; or, to drop the metaphor, they want that liberal turn of idea and sentiment which arises from the intercourse and conversation of the merchant stances of Portuguese tyranny and misconduct already enumerated, there was a defect in their government, which must ever prove fatal to a commercial empire. All the stupendous fabrics of Portuguese colonization were only founded on the sands, on the quick-sands of human caprice and arbitrary power. They governed by no certain system of laws. Their governors carried to India the image of the court of Lisbon; and against the will of the ruler there was no appeal to a supreme civil power. Confidence in the high justice of a Nuncio may give nations habituated to oppression a temporary spirit of industry; but temporary it must be, as a hasty journey made in the uncertain intervals of a tempest. The cheerful vigour of commerce can only be uniform and continued, where the merchant is conscious of protection, on his appeal to known laws of supreme authority. On the firm basis of her laws, the colonies of Great Britain have wonderfully prospered, for she gave them an image of her own constitution. And, even where the government of the natives cannot be new-modelled, an easy appeal to the supremacy of civil laws must place commerce upon the surest foundation. It is not the spirit of Gothic conquest; it is not the little cunning finesse of embroiling the Indian princes among themselves; of cajoling one, and winning another; it is not the grovelling arts of intrigue, often embarrassed, always shifting, which can give lasting security. An essential decisive predominancy of the justice of laws like the British can alone secure the prosperity of the most powerful commercial system, or render its existence advantageous or even safe to the seat of empire.

with the man of property, educated in independence. India, perhaps the most fertile country in the world, has suffered more by famine than any other. For the thousands who have died of hunger in other countries, India has buried millions of her sons, who have thus perished. Amazingly populous, the failure of a crop of rice is here dreadful. It is the true spirit of commerce to prevent famine, by bringing provision from one country to another. And may this true spirit of it be exerted by the British in India!

LIFE OF LUIS DE CAMOENS.

When the glory of the arms of Portugal had reached its meridian splendour, Nature, as if in pity of the literary rudeness of that nation, produced one great poet, to record the numberless actions of high spirit performed by his countrymen. Except Osorius, the historians of Portugal are little better than dry journalists. But it is not their inelegance which rendered the poet necessary. It is the peculiar nature of poetry to give a colouring to heroic actions, and to express an indignation against the breaches of honour, in a spirit which at once seizes the heart of the man of feeling, and carries with it an instantaneous conviction. The brilliant actions of the Portuguese form the great hinge which opened the door to the most important alteration in the civil history of mankind. And to place these actions in the light and enthusiasm of poetry, that enthusiasm which particularly assimilates the youthful breast to its own fires, was Luis de Camoens, the poet of Portugal, born.

Different cities claimed the honour of his birth. But, according to N. Antonio, and Manuel Correa his intimate friend, this event happened at Lisbon, in 1517. His family was of considerable note, and originally Spanish. In 1570, Vasco Perez de Caamans, disgusted at the court of Castile, fled to that of Lisbon, where king Ferdinand immediately admitted him into his council, and gave him the lordships of Sardoul, Punete, Marano, Amedo, and other considerable lands; a certain proof of the eminence of his rank and abilities. In the war for the succession, which broke out on the death of Ferdinand, Caamans sided with the king of Castile, and was killed in the battle of Aljubarrota. But though John I. the victor seized a great part of his estate, his widow, the daughter of Gonsalo Tereyro, grand master of the order of Christ, and general of the Portuguese army, was not reduced beneath her rank. She had three sons, who took the name of Camoens. The family of the eldest intermarried with the first nobility of Portugal, and even, according to Casters, with the blood royal. But the family of the second brother, whose fortune was slender, had the superior honour to produce the author of the Lusiad.

Early in his life the misfortunes of the poet began. In his infancy, Simon Vaz de Camoens, his father, commander of a vessel, was shipwrecked at Goa, where, with his life, the greatest part of his fortune was lost. His mother, however, Anne de Macedo de Santarene, provided for the education of her son Luis at the university of Coimbra. What he acquired there, his works discover: an intimacy with the classics, equal to that of a Scaliger, but directed by the taste of a Milton or a Pope.

When he left the university, he appeared at court. He was handsome², had speaking eyes, it is said, and the finest complexion. Certain, it is, however, he was a polished scholar, which, added to the natural ardour and gay vivacity of his disposition, rendered him an accomplished gentleman. Courts are the scenes of intrigue, and intrigue was fashionable at Lisbon. But the particulars of the amours of Camoens rest unknown. This only appears: he had aspired above his rank, for he was banished from the court; and in several of his sonnets he describes this misfortune to love.

He now retired to his mother's friends at Santarene. Here he renewed his studies, and began his poem on the Discovery of India. John III. at this time prepared an armament against Africa. Camoens, tired of his inactive obscure life, went to Ceuta in this expedition, and greatly distinguished his valour in several encounters. In a naval engagement with the Moors, in the straits of Gibraltar, in the conflict of boarding he was among the foremost, and lost his right eye. Yet neither the hurry of actual service, ² The French translator gives us so fine a description of the person of Camoens, that it seems to be borrowed from the Fairy Tales. It is universally agreed, however, that he was handsome, and had a most engaging mien and address. He is thus described by Nicolas Antonio: Mediocri statura fuit, et carne plena, capillis usque ad croci colorem flavescensibus, maxime in juventute. Erinebat ei frons, et medius nasus, cætera longus, et in fine crassiusculus.

now the dissipation of the camp, could stifle his genius. He continued his Lusiadas, and several of his most beautiful sonnets were written in Africa, while, as he expresses it,

One hand the pen, and one the sword employ'd.

The fame of his valour had now reached the court, and he obtained permission to return to Lisbon. But while he solicited an establishment which he had merited in the ranks of battle, the malignity of evil tongues, as he calls it in one of his letters, was injuriously poured upon him. Though the bloom of his early youth was effaced by several years residence under the scorching heavens of Africa, and though altered by the loss of an eye, his presence gave uneasiness to the gentlemen of some families of the first rank, where he had formerly visited. Jealousy is the characteristic of the Spanish and Portuguese; its resentment knows no bounds; and Camoens now found it prudent to banish himself from his native country. Accordingly, in 1553, he sailed for India, with a resolution never to return. As the ship left the Tagus, he exclaimed, in the words of the sepulchral monument of Scipio Africanus, Ingrata patria, non possidebis ossa mea! "Ungrateful country, thou shalt not possess my bones!" But he knew not what evils in the east would awake the remembrance of his native fields.

When Camoens arrived in India, an expedition was ready to sail to avenge the king of Cochin on the king of Pimenta. Without any rest on shore after his long voyage he joined this armament, and in the conquest of the Alagada islands displayed his usual bravery. But his modesty, perhaps, is his greatest praise. In a sonnet he mentions this expedition: We went to punish the king of Pimenta, says he, e succedones bem, "and we succeeded well." When it is considered that the poet bore no inconsiderable share in the victory, no ode can conclude more elegantly, more happily than this.

In the year following, he attended Manuel de Vasconcello in an expedition to the Red Sea. "Here," says Faria, "as Camoens had no use for his sword, he employed his pen." Nor was his activity confined in the fleet or camp. He visited Mount Felix, and the adjacent inhospitable regions of Africa, which he so strongly pictures in the Lusiad, and in one of his little pieces, where he laments the absence of his mistress.

When he returned to Goa, he enjoyed a tranquillity which enabled him to bestow his attention on his epic poem. But this serenity was interrupted, perhaps by his own imprudence. He wrote some satires which gave offence; and by order of the viceroy, Francisco Barreto, he was banished to China.

Men of poor abilities are more conscious of their embarrassment and errors than is commonly believed. When men of this kind are in power, they affect great solemnity; and every expression of the most distant tendency to lessen their dignity is held as the greatest of crimes. Conscious also how severely the man of genius can hurt their interest, they bear an instinctive antipathy against him, are uneasy even in his company, and, on the slightest pretence, are happy to drive him from them. Camoens was thus situated at Goa; and never was there a fairer field for satire than the rulers of India at this time afforded. Yet, whatever esteem the prudence of Camoens may lose in our idea, the nobleness of his disposition will doubly gain. And so conscious was he of his real integrity and innocence, that in one of his sonnets he wishes no other revenge on Barreto, than that the cruelty of his exile should ever be remembered.

The accomplishments and manners of Camoens soon found him friends, though under the disgrace of banishment. He was appointed commissary of the estates of the defunct in the island of Macao, on the coast of China. Here he continued his Lusiad; and here also, after five years residence, he acquired a

* Casters, who always condemn Camoens, as if guilty of sacrilege, when the slightest reproach of a grandee appears, tells us, "that posterity by no means enters into the resentment of our poet; and that the Portuguese historians make glorious mention of Barreto, who was a man of true merit." The Portuguese historians, however, knew not what true merit was. The brutal uncommercial wars of Sempayo are by them mentioned as much more glorious than the less bloody campaigns of a Nunio, which established commerce and empire. But the actions of Barreto shall be called to witness for Camoens.

We have already seen his ruinous treaty with Meale Can, which ended in the disgrace of the Portuguese arms. The king of Cinde desired Barreto's assistance to crush a neighbouring prince, who had invaded his dominions. Barreto went himself to relieve him; but having disagreed about the reward he required, (for the king had made peace with his enemy,) he burned Tata, the royal city, killed above 8000 of the people he came to protect; for eight days he destroyed every thing on the banks of the Indus, and loaded his vessels, says Faria, with the richest booty hitherto taken in India. The war with Hydal Can, kindled by Barreto's treachery, continued. The city of Dabul was destroyed by the viceroy, who, soon after, at the head of 17,000 men, defeated Hydal Can's army of 20,000. Horrid desolation followed these victories, and Hydal Can continued the implacable enemy of Portugal while he lived. Such was Barreto, the man who exiled Camoens!

fortune, though small, yet equal to his wishes. Don Constantine de Braganza was now viceroy of India, and Camoens, desirous to return to Goa, resigned his charge. In a ship, freighted by himself, he set sail, but was shipwrecked in the gulf near the mouth of the river Mecon, in Cochin-China. All he had acquired was lost in the waves: his poems, which he held in one hand, while he saved himself with the other, were all he found himself possessed of when he stood friendless on the unknown shore. But the natives gave him a most humane reception: this he has immortalized in the prophetic song in the tenth Lusiad; and in the seventh he tells us, that here he lost the wealth which satisfied his wishes:

Agora da esperança ja adquirida, &c.

Now blest with all the wealth food hope could crave,

Soon I beheld that wealth beneath the wave

For ever lost;—

My life, like Judah's heaven-doom'd king of yore,

By miracle prolong'd—

On the banks of the Mecon, he wrote his beautiful paraphrase of the Psalm, where the Jews, in the finest strain of poetry, are represented as hanging their harps on the willows by the rivers of Babylon, and weeping their exile from their native country. Here Camoens continued some time, till an opportunity offered to carry him to Goa. When he arrived at that city, don Constantine de Braganza, whose characteristic was politeness, admitted him into intimate friendship; and Camoens was happy till count Redondo assumed the government. Those who had formerly procured the banishment of the satirist were silent while Constantine was in power; but now they exerted all their arts against him. Redondo, when he entered on office, pretended to be the friend of Camoens; yet, with all that unfeeling indifference with which he planned his most horrible witticism on the samorim, he suffered the innocent man to be thrown into the common prison. After all the delay of bringing witnesses, Camoens, in a public trial, fully refuted every accusation of his conduct while commissary of Macao, and his enemies were loaded with ignominy and reproach. But Camoens had some creditors; and these detained him in prison a considerable time, till the gentlemen of Goa began to be abashed, that a man of his singular merit should experience such treatment among them. He was set at liberty; and again he resumed the profession of arms, and received the allowance of a gentleman volunteer, a character at that time common in Portuguese India. Soon after, Pedro Barreto, appointed governor of the fort at Sofala, by high promises allured the poet to attend him thither. The governor of a distant fort, in a barbarous country, shares, in some measure, the fate of an exile. Yet, though the only motive of Barreto was, in this unpleasant situation, to retain the conversation of Camoens at his table, it was his least care to render the life of his guest agreeable. Chagrined with his treatment, and a considerable time having elapsed in vain dependence upon Barreto, Camoens resolved to return to his native country. A ship, on the homeward voyage, at this time touched at Sofala, and several gentlemen* who were on board were desirous that Camoens should accompany them. But this the governor ungenerously endeavoured to prevent, and charged him with a debt for board. Anthony de Cabral, however, and Hector de Sylveira, paid the demand; and Camoens, says Faria, and the honour of Barreto, were sold together.

After an absence of sixteen years, Camoens, in 1569, returned to Lisbon, unhappy even in his arrival, for the pestilence then raged in that city, and prevented his publication for three years. At last, in 1572, he printed his Lusiad, which, in the opening of the first book, in a most elegant turn of compliment, he addressed to his prince, king Sebastian, then in his eighteenth year. "The king," says the French translator, "was so pleased with his merit, that he gave the author a pension of 4000 reals, on condition that he should reside at court. But this salary, says the same writer, was withdrawn by cardinal Henry, who succeeded to the crown of Portugal, lost by Sebastian at the battle of Alcazar.

But this story of the pension is very doubtful. Correa, and other cotemporary authors, do not mention it, though some late writers have given credit to it. If Camoens, however, had a pension, it in

* Having named the Mecon:

Este recebera placido, e brando,

No seu regaço o Canto, que molhado, &c.

Literally thus: "On his gentle hospitable bosom (sic brando poetical) shall he receive the song, wet from woeful unhappy shipwreck, escaped from destroying tempests, from ravenous dangers, the effect of the unjust sentence upon him, whose lyre shall be more renowned than enriched." When Camoens was commissary, he visited the islands of Ternate, Timor, &c. described in the Lusiad.

* According to the Portuguese Life of Camoens, prefixed to Gedron's, the best edition of his works, Diego de Couto, the historian, one of the company in this homeward voyage, wrote annotations upon the Lusiad, under the eye of its author. But these unhappily have never appeared in public.

highly probable that Henry deprived him of it. While Sebastian was devoted to the chase, his grand uncle, the cardinal, presided at the council-board; and Camoëns, in his address to the king, which closes the Lusiad, advises him to exclude the clergy from state affairs. It was easy to see that the cardinal was here intended. And Henry, besides, was one of those statesmen who can perceive no benefit resulting to the public from elegant literature. But it ought also to be added, in completion of his character, that under the narrow views and weak hands of this Henry, the kingdom of Portugal fell into utter ruin; and on his death, which closed a short inglorious reign, the crown of Lisbon, after a faint struggle, was annexed to that of Madrid. Such was the degeneracy of the Portuguese, a degeneracy lamented in vain by Camoëns, and whose observation of it was imputed to him as a crime.

Though the great patron^s of one species of literature, a species the reverse of that of Camoëns, certain it is that the author of the Lusiad was utterly neglected by Henry, under whose inglorious reign he died in all the misery of poverty. By some it is said he died in an alms-house. It appears, however, that he had not even the certainty of subsistence which these houses provide. He had a black servant, who had grown old with him, and who had long experienced his master's humanity. This grateful Indian, a native of Java, who, according to some writers, saved his master's life in the unhappy shipwreck where he lost his effects, begged in the streets of Lisbon for the only man in Portugal on whom God had bestowed those talents, which have a tendency to erect the spirit of a downward age. To the eye of a careful observer, the fate of Camoëns throws great light on that of his country, and will appear strictly connected with it. The same ignorance, the same degenerated spirit, which suffered Camoëns to depend on his share of the alms begged in the streets by his old hoary servant, the same spirit which caused this, sunk the kingdom of Portugal into the most abject vassalage ever experienced by a conquered nation. While the grandees of Portugal were blind to the ruin which impended over them, Camoëns beheld it with a pungency of grief which hastened his exit. In one of his letters he has these remarkable words, Em fim accabery à vida, e verram todos que fuy afeiçoada a minha patria, &c. "I am ending the course of my life, the world will witness how I have loved my country. I have returned, not only to die in her bosom, but to die with her." In another letter, written a little before his death, he thus, yet with dignity, complains: "Who has seen, on so small a theatre as my poor bed, such a representation of the disappointments of fortune? And I, as if she could not herself subdue me, I have yielded and become of her party; for it were wild audacity to hope to surmount such accumulated evils."

In this unhappy situation, in 1579, in his sixty-second year, the year after the fatal defeat of don Sebastian, died Luis de Camoëns, the greatest literary genius ever produced by Portugal; in martial courage, and spirit of honour, nothing inferior to her greatest heroes. And in a manner suitable to the ^s Cardinal Henry's patronage of learning and learned men is mentioned with cordial esteem by the Portuguese writers. Happily they also tell us what that learning was. It was to him the Romish friars of the east transmitted their childish forgeries of inscriptions and miracles (for some of which, see note on line 843, book 1). He corresponded with them, directed their labours, and received the first accounts of their success. Under his patronage it was discovered that St. Thomas ordered the Indians to worship the cross; and that the Moorish tradition of Perimal (who, having embraced Mohammedism, divided his kingdom among his officers, whom he rendered tributary to the zamorim) was a malicious misrepresentation; for that Perimal, having turned Christian, resigned his kingdom, and became a monk. Such was the learning patronised by Henry, who was also a zealous patron of the inquisition at Lisbon, and the founder of the inquisition at Goa, to which place he sent a whole apparatus of holy fathers to suppress the Jews and reduce the native Christians to the see of Rome. Nor must the treatment experienced by Buchanan at Lisbon be here omitted, as it affords a convincing proof that the fine genius of Camoëns was the true source of his misfortunes. John III. earnest to promote the cultivation of polite literature among his subjects, engaged Buchanan, the most elegant Latinist, perhaps, of modern times, to teach philoaphy and the belles lettres at Lisbon. But the design of the monarch was soon frustrated by the cardinal Henry and the clergy. Buchanan was committed to prison, because it was alleged he had eaten flesh in Lent; and because, in his early youth, at St. Andrew's in Scotland, he had written a satire against the Franciscans; for which, however, ere he would venture to Lisbon, John had promised absolute indemnity. John, with much difficulty, procured his release from a loathsome jail, but could not effect his restoration as a teacher. He could only change his prison; for Buchanan was sent to a monastery to be instructed by the monks, the men of letters patronised by Henry. These are thus characterized by their pupil Buchanan,—nec inhumanis, nec malis, sed omnis religionis ignorant. "Not uncivilised, not flagitious, but ignorant of every religion." A satirical negative compliment, followed by a charge of gross barbarism. In this confinement, Buchanan wrote his elegant version of the Psalms. Camoëns, about the same time, sailed for India. The blessed effects of the spirit which persecuted such men are well expressed in the proverb, "A Spaniard strip of all his virtues makes a good Portuguese."

poverty in which he died was he buried. Soon after, however, many epitaphs honored his memory; the greatness of his merit was universally confessed, and his Lusiad was translated into various languages*. Nor ought it to be omitted, that the man so miserably neglected by the weak king Henry, was earnestly inquired after by Philip of Spain, when he assumed the crown of Lisbon. When Philip heard that Camoens was dead, both his words and his countenance expressed his disappointment and grief.

From the whole tenour of his life, and from that spirit which glows throughout the Lusiad, it evidently appears that the courage and manners of Camoens flowed from true greatness and dignity of soul. Though his polished conversation⁷ was often courted by the great, he appears so distant from servility, that his imprudence in this respect is by some highly blamed. Yet the instances of it by no means deserve that severity of censure with which some writers have condemned him. Unconscious of the feelings of a Camoens, they knew not that a carelessness in securing the smiles of fortune, and an open honesty of indignation, are almost inseparable from the enthusiasm of fine imagination. The truth is, the man possessed of true genius feels his greatest happiness in the pursuits and excursions of the mind, and therefore makes an estimate of things, very different from that of him whose unremitting attention is devoted to his eternal interest. The profusion of Camoens is also censured. Had he dissipated the wealth he acquired at Macao, his profusion indeed had been criminal; but it does not appear that he ever enjoyed any other opportunity of acquiring independence. But Camoens was unfortunate, and the unfortunate man is viewed — through the dim shade his fate casts o'er him:

A shade that spreads its evening darkness o'er
His brightest virtues, while it shows its foibles.
Crowding and obvious as the midnight stars,
Which in the sunshine of prosperity
Never had been descried — — —

Yet, after the strictest discussion, when all the causes are weighed together, the misfortunes of Camoens will appear the fault and disgrace of his age and country, and not of the man. His talents would have secured him an apartment in the palace of Augustus, but such talents are a curse to their possessor in an illiterate nation. In a beautiful digressive exclamation, at the end of the fifth Lusiad, he gives us a striking view of the neglect which he experienced. Having mentioned how the greatest heroes of antiquity revered and cherished the Muse, he thus characterizes the nobility of his own age and country:

Alas! on Tago's hapless shores alone
The Muse is slighted and her charms unknown.
For this, no Virgil here attunes the lyre,
No Homer here awakes the hero's fire.
Unheard, in vain their native poet sings,
And cold neglect weighs down the Muse's wings.

And what particularly seems to have touched him—

Even he whose veins the blood of Gama warms⁸
Walks by, unconscious of the Muse's charms:

* According to Gedron, a second edition of the Lusiad appeared in the same year with the first. There are two Italian and four Spanish translations of it. A hundred years before Castera's version it appeared in French. Thomas de Faria, bishop of Targa in Africa, translated it into Latin, and printed it without either his own or the name of Camoens: a mean but vain attempt to pass his version upon the public as an original. Le P. Niecron says there were two other Latin translations. It is translated also into Hebrew, with great elegance and spirit, by one Luzzetto, a learned and ingenious Jew, author of several poems in that language, and who, about thirty years ago, died in the Holy Land.

⁷ Camoens has not escaped the fate of other eminent wits. Their ignorant admirers contrive anecdotes of their humour, which in reality disgrace them. Camoens, it is said, one day heard a potter singing some of his verses in a miserable mangled manner, and by way of retaliation broke a parcel of his earthen ware. "Friend," said he, "you destroy my verses, and I destroy your goods." The same foolish story is told of Ariosto; nay, we are even informed, that Rinaldo's speech to his horse in the first book, was the passage mistuned; and that, on the potter's complaint, the injured poet replied, "I have only broken a few base pots of thine, not worth a groat; but thou hast murdered a fine stanza of mine, worth a mark of gold." But both these silly tales are borrowed from Plutarch's Life of Arcefilaus, where the same dull humour is told of Philoxenus. "He heard some brickmakers mistake one of his songs, and in return he destroyed a number of their bricks."

Ferma Baiardo mio, &c.

⁸ The political evils impending over his country, which Camoens almost alone foresaw, gave not, in

For him no Muse shall leave her golden loom,
 No palm shall blossom, and no wreath shall bloom.
 Yet shall my labours and my cares be paid
 By fame immortal —

In such an age, and among such barbarous nobility, what but wretched neglect could be the fate of Camoens! After all, however, if he was impudent on his first appearance at the court of John III., if the honesty of his indignation led him into great imprudence, as certainly it did, when at Goa he satirized the viceroy and the first Goths in power; yet let it also be remembered, that "The gifts of imagination bring the heaviest task upon the vigilance of reason; and to bear those faculties with unerring rectitude or invariable propriety, requires a degree of firmness and of cool attention which doth not always attend the higher gifts of the mind. Yet difficult as Nature herself seems to have rendered the task of regularity to genius, it is the supreme consolation of dullness and of folly to point with Gothic triumph to those excesses which are the overflowings of faculties they never enjoy. Perfectly unconscious that they are indebted to their stupidity for the consistency of their conduct, they plume themselves on an imaginary virtue, which has its origin in what is really their disgrace. Let such, if such dare approach the shrine of Camoens, withdraw to a respectful distance; and should they behold the ruins of genius, or the weakness of an exalted mind, let them be taught to lament, that Nature has left the noblest of her works imperfect."⁹

And poetry is not only the noblest, but also not the least useful, if civilization of manners be of advantage to mankind. No moral truth may be more certainly demonstrated, than that a Virgil or a Milton are not only the first ornaments of a state, but also of the first consequence, if the last refinement of the mental powers be of importance. Strange as this might appear to a Burleigh¹⁰ or a Locke, it is their fulfilment, a stronger proof of his superior abilities, than his prophecy of don Francisco de Gama—

 Nem as Filhas do Tejo, que deixassem
 As tellas do oro fino, e que o cantassem.—

"No nymph of Tagus shall leave her golden embroidered web, and sing of him"—affords of his knowledge of men. Camoens was superior to a mean resentment; he most undoubtedly perceived that ignorance, unmanly arrogance, and insignificance of abilities, which 18, and 38 years after his death, disgraced the two viceroys of his hero's grandson. Justice to the memory of Camoens, and even to the cause of polite literature itself, requires some short account of this nobleman, who appears to have treated our author with the most mortifying neglect. He was named don Francisco de Gama, count de Vidigueyra. Facts will best give his character. He had not one idea that the elegant writer who immortalized his ancestor had the least title to his countenance. Several years after the death of Camoens, he was made viceroy of India by the king of Spain. Here he carried himself with such state, says Faria, that he was hated by all men. When he entered upon his government, he bestowed every place in his gift upon his parasites, who publicly sold them to the best bidders. And though Cunnale, the pirate, who had disgracefully defeated don Luis de Gama, the viceroy's brother, had surrendered, upon the sole condition of life, to the brave Furtado, Cunnale, his nephew Cinnale, and 40 Moors of rank, were brought to Goa. But the Moors were no sooner landed, than the lawless rabble tore them in pieces, and Cunnale and his nephew were publicly beheaded by order of the viceroy. And thus, says Faria, government and the rabble went hand in hand in murder and the breach of faith. Over the principal gate of Goa stood a marble statue of Vasco de Gama. This, in hatred of the grandson, the enraged inhabitants broke down in the night, and in the morning the quarters were found gibbeted in the most public parts of the city. And thus the man who despised the wreath with which Camoens crowned his grandfather, brought that grandfather's effigies to the deepest insult which can be offered to the memory of the deceased. Nor were his own effigies happier. On his recall to Europe, the first object that struck him, when he went on board the ship appointed to carry him, was a figure hanging by the neck at the yard-arm, exactly like himself in feature and habit. He asked what it meant; and was resolutely answered, "It represents you, and these are the men who hung it up." Nor must another insult be omitted. After being a few days at sea, he was necessitated to return to the port from whence he had sailed, for fresh provisions, for all his live stock, it was found, was poisoned. After his return to Europe, he used all his interest to be reinstated in India, which, in his old days, after twenty years solicitation at the court of Madrid, he at last obtained. His second government, however, is wrapped in much obscurity, and is distinguished by no important action or event.

⁹ This passage in inverted commas is cited, with the alteration of the name only, from Dr. Labhorn's Account of the Life of William Collins.

¹⁰ Burleigh, though an able politician, and deep in state intrigue, had no idea, that to introduce polite literature into the vernacular tongue was of any benefit to a nation; though her vernacular literature was the glory of Rome when at the height of empire, and though empire fell with its declension. Spenser, the man who greatly conduced to refine the English Muses, was by Burleigh esteemed a ballad-maker, unworthy of regard. Yet the English polite literature, so greatly indebted to Spenser, is at this day, in the esteem which it commands abroad, of more real service to England than all the reputation or intrigues of Burleigh.—And ten thousand Burleighs, according to sir W. Temple, are born for one philosophically accounted for by Bacon; nor is Locke's opinion either inexplicable or irrefutable. The great genius of Aristotle, and that of his great ressembler, sir Francis Bacon, saw deeper into the true spirit of poetry and the human affections than a Burleigh. In ancient Greece, the works of Homer were called the reason or philosophy of kings; and Bacon describes the effects of poetry in the most exalted terms. What is deficient of perfection in history and nature, poetry supplies; it thus erects the mind, and confers magnanimity, morality, and delight; "and therefore," says he, "it was ever thought to have Spenser. Ten thousand are born, says sir William, with abilities requisite to form a great statesman, for one who is born with the talents or genius of a great poet. Locke's ideas of poetry are accounted for in one short sentence—he knew nothing about the matter. An extract from his correspondence with M. Molyneux, and a citation from one of his treatises, shall demonstrate the truth of this assertion.

Molyneux writes to Locke:

"Mr. Churchill favoured me with the present of sir R. Blackmore's King Arthur. I had read Prince Arthur before, and read it with admiration, which is not at all lessened by this second piece. All our English poets (except Milton) have been ballad-makers in comparison to him. Upon the publication of his first poem, I intimated to him, through Mr. Churchill's hands, how excellently I thought he might perform a philosophic poem, from many touches he gave in his Prince Arthur, particularly from Mopsa's song. And I perceive by his preface to King Arthur he has had the like intimations from others, but rejects them as being an enemy to all philosophic hypothesis."

Mr. Locke answers:

"I shall, when I see sir R. Blackmore, discourage him as you desire. There is, I with pleasure find, a strange harmony throughout, between your thoughts and mine."

Molyneux replies:

"I perceive you are so happy as to be acquainted with sir Rich. Blackmore; he is an extraordinary person, and I admire his two prefaces as much as I do any part of his books. The first, wherein he exposes 'the licentiousness and immorality of our late poetry,' is incomparable; and the second, wherein he prosecutes the same subject, and delivers his thoughts concerning hypotheses, is no less judicious; and I am wholly of his opinion relating to the latter. However, the history and phenomena of Nature we may venture at; and this is what I propose to be the subject of a philosophic poem. Sir R. Blackmore has exquisite touches of this kind, dispersed in many places of his books; (to pass over Mopsa's song) I'll instance one particular in the most profound speculations of Mr. Newton's philosophy, thus curiously touched in King Arthur, book ix. p. 243.

The constellations shifts at his command,
He form'd their radiant orbs, and with his hand
He weigh'd, and put them off with such a force
As might preserve an everlasting course*.

"I doubt not but sir R. Blackmore, in these lines, had a regard to the proportionment of the projective motion of the vis centripeta, that keeps the planets in their continued courses.

"I have by me some observations, made by a judicious friend of mine, on both of sir R. Blackmore's poems. If they may be any ways acceptable to sir R., I shall send them to you."

Mr. Locke again replies:

"Though sir R. B.'s vein in poetry be what every body must allow him to have an extraordinary talent in; and though, with you, I exceedingly valued his first preface, yet I must own to you, there was nothing that I so much admired him for, as for what he says of hypotheses in his list. It seems to me so right, and is yet so much out of the way of the ordinary writers and practitioners in that faculty, that it shows as great a strength and penetration of judgment as his poetry has shown signs of fancy."

As the best comment on this, let an extract from Locke's Essay on Education fully explain his ideas:—

"If he have a poetic vein, 'tis to me the strangest thing in the world that the father should desire or suffer it to be cherished or improved. Methinks the parents should labour to have it stifled and suppressed as much as may be; and I know not what reason a father can have to wish his son a poet, who does not desire to have him bid defiance to all other callings or business; which is not yet the worst of the case; for if he proves a successful rhymist, and gets once the reputation of a wit, I desire it may be considered, what company and places he is like to spend his time in, nay, and estate too; for it is very seldom seen that any one discovers mines of gold or silver in Parnassus. 'Tis a pleasant air, but barren soil, and there are very few instances of those who have added to their patrimony by any thing they have reaped from thence. Poetry and gaming, which usually go together, are alike in this too, that they seldom bring any advantage but to those who have nothing else to live on. Men of estates almost constantly go away losers; and 'tis well if they escape at a cheaper rate than their whole estates, or the greatest part of them. If therefore you would not have your son the fiddle to every jovial company, without whom the sparks could not relish their wine, nor know how to spend an afternoon idly; if you would not have him waste his time and estate to divert others, and condemn the dirty acres left him by his ancestors, I do not think you will much care he should be a poet."

This ignorance of poetry is even worse than the Dutch idea of it. But this, and his opinion of Blackmore, fully prove, that Locke, however great in other respects, knew no difference between a Shakespeare, that unequalled philosopher of the passions, and the dullest Grub-street plodder; between a Milton and the tavern rhymers of the days of the Second Charles. But Milton's knowledge of the affections some participation of divineness¹². The love of poetry is so natural to the stronger affections, that the most barbarous nations delight in it. And always it is found, that as the rude war-song and eulogy of the dead hero refine, the manners of the age refine also. The history of the stages of poetry is the philosophical history of manners; the only history in which, with certainty, we can behold the true character of past ages. True civilization, and a humanised taste of the mental pleasures, are therefore synonymous terms. And most certain it is, where feeling and affection reside in the breast, these must be most forcibly kindled and called into action by the animated representations and living fire of the great poetry. Nor may Milton's evidence be rejected; for though a poet himself, his judgment is founded on nature. According to him, a true taste for the great poetry gives a refinement and energy to all other studies, and is of the last importance in forming the senator and the gentleman. That the poetry of Camoens merits this high character in a singular manner, he that reads it with taste and attention must own: a dissertation on it, however, is the duty of the translator.

discovered in the cultivation of the Muses an use of the first importance. A taste formed by the great poetry, he esteems as the ultimate refinement of the understanding. "This (says he, in his Tractate on the Education of Youth,) would make them soon perceive what deepicable creatures our common rhymers and play-writers be; and show them what religious, what glorious and magnificent use might be made of poetry, both in divine and human things. From hence, and not till now, will be the right season of forming them to be able writers and composers in every excellent matter . . . whether they be to speak in parliament or council, honour and attention would be waiting on their lips. There would then also appear in pulpits other visages, other gestures, and stuff otherwise wrought, than what we now sit under."—Milton evidently alludes to the general dullness of the furious sectaries of his own time. The furious bigots of every sect have been as remarkable for their inelegance as for their rage. And the cultivation of polite literature has ever been found the best preventive of gloomy enthusiasm and religious intolerance. In Milton, and every great poet, the poet and sublime philosopher are united, though Milton was perhaps the only man of his age who perceived this union or sameness of character. Lord Clarendon seems to have considered poetry merely as a puerile sing-song. Waller, he says, addicted himself to poetry at thirty, the time when others leave it off. Nor was Charles I. less unhappy in his estimate of it. In the dedication of sir John Denham's works to Charles II. we have this remarkable passage: "One morning, waiting upon him (Charles I.) at Cauxham, smiling upon me, he said he could tell me some news of myself, which was that he had seen some verses of mine the evening before, and asking when I made them, I told him two or three years since; he was pleased to say, that having never seen them before, he was afraid I had written them since my return into England; and though he liked them well, he would advise me to write no more, allegins, that when men are young, and have little else to do, they might vent the overflowings of their fancy that way; but when they were thought fit for more serious employments, if they still persisted in that course, it would look as if they minded not the way to any better." Yet this monarch, who could perceive nothing but idle puerility in poetry, was the zealous patron of architecture, sculpture, and painting; and his favourite, the duke of Buckingham, laid out the enormous sum of 400,000*l.* on paintings and curiosities. But had Charles's bounty given a Shakespeare or a Milton to the public, he would have done his kingdoms infinitely more service than if he had imported into England all the pictures and all the antiques in the world.

The reader who is desirous to see a philosophical character of the natural and acquired qualifications necessary to form a great poet, will find it delineated, in a masterly manner, in Rasselas, Prince of Abyssinia, an eastern tale, by Dr. Johnson.

¹¹ His high idea of poetry is thus philosophically explained by the great Bacon:

"So likewise I finde some particular writings of an elegant nature, touching some of the affections, as of anger, of comfort, upon adverse accidents, of tenderness of countenance, and other. But the poets and writers of histories are the best doctors of this knowledge; where we find painted forth with the life, how affections are kindled and incited, and how pacified and restrained; and how again contained from act and farther degree: how they disclose themselves, how they worke, how they vary, how they gather and fortify, how they are inwrapped one within another, and how they do fight and encounter one with another, and other the like particularities; amongst the which this last is of special use in moral and civile matters."

Here poetry is ranked with history; in the following its effect on the passions is preferred:—

"The use of this fined history (poetry) hath been to give some shadow of satisfaction to the mind of man in those points in which nature doth deny it: the world being in proportion inferior to the soul: by reason whereof there is agreeable to the spirit of man a more ample greatness, a more exact goodness, and a more absolute variety than can be found in the nature of things. Therefore, because the events of true history have not that magnitude which satisfieth the mind of man, poesy fayneth acts and events greater and more hercail; because true history propoundeth the success and issues of actions not so agreeable to the merits of virtue and vice; therefore poesy faynes them more just in retribution, and more according to revealed Providence: because true history representeth actions and events more ordinary and less interchanged; therefore poesy endueth them with more rarenesse, and more unexpected and alternative variations. So then it appeareth that poesy serveth and conferreth to magnanimity, morality, and delectation; and therefore it was ever thought to have some participation of divinenesse, because it doth raise and erect the mind, by submitting the shewes of things to the desires of the mind; whereas reason doth humble and bow the mind unto the nature of things."

DISSERTATION ON THE LUSIAD,

AND

OBSERVATIONS UPON EPIC POETRY.

VOLTAIRE, when he was in England, previous to the publication of his Henriade, published in English an Essay on the Epic Poetry of the European nations'. In this he highly praised and severely

¹ In his French editions of this Essay, he has made various alterations, at different times, in the article of Camoëns. The original English, however, shall be here cited, and the French alterations attended to as they occur. Nor is it improper to premise, that some most curious falsities will be detected; the gross misrepresentation of every objection refuted; and demonstration brought, that when Voltaire wrote his English Essay, his knowledge of the Lusiad was entirely borrowed from a very slight acquaintance with the bald, harsh, unpoetical version of Fanshawe.

"While Trissino" says Voltaire "was clearing away the rubbish in Italy, which barbarity and ignorance had heaped up for ten centuries, in the way of the arts and sciences, Camoëns in Portugal steered a new course, and acquired a reputation which lasts still among his countrymen, who pay as much respect to his memory, as the English to Milton.

"He was a strong instance of the irresistible impulse of nature, which determines a true genius to follow the bent of his talents, in spite of all the obstacles which would check his course.

"His infancy lost amidst the idleness and ignorance of the court of Lisbon; his youth spent in romantic loves, or in the war against the Moors; his long voyages at sea, in his riper years; his misfortunes at court, the revolutions of his country,—none of all these could suppress his genius.

"Emmanuel the second king of Portugal, having a mind to find a new way to the East Indies by the ocean, sent Velasco de Gama with a fleet, in the year 1497, to that undertaking, which, being new, was accounted rash and impracticable, and which of course gained him a great reputation when it succeeded.

"Camoëns followed Velasco de Gama in that dangerous voyage, led by his friendship to him, and by a noble curiosity, which seldom fails to be the character of men born with a great imagination.

"He took his voyage for the subject of his poem; he enjoyed the sensible pleasure, which nobody had known before him, to celebrate his friend, and the things he was an eye witness of.

"He wrote his poem, part on the Atlantic sea, and partly on the Indian shore. I ought not to omit, that on a shipwreck on the coasts of Malabar, he swam ashore, holding up his pen in one hand, which otherwise had been perhaps lost for ever.

"Such a new subject, managed by an uncommon genius, could not but produce a sort of epic poetry unheard of before. There no bloody wars are fought, no heroes wounded in a thousand different ways; no woman enticed away, and the world overturned for her cause; no empire founded; in short, nothing of what was deemed before the only subject of poetry.

"The poet conducts the Portuguese fleet to the mouth of the Ganges, round the coasts of Africa. He takes notice in the way of many nations who live upon the African shore. He interweaves artfully the history of Portugal. The simplicity of his subject is raised by some fictions of different kinds, which I think not improper to acquaint the reader with.

"When the fleet is sailing in the sight of the Cape of Good Hope, called then the Cape of the Storms, a formidable shape appears to them, walking in the depth of the sea; his head reaches to the clouds; the storms, the winds, the thunders, and the lightnings hang about him; his arms are extended over the waves. 'Tis the guardian of that foreign ocean unpiouged before by any ship. He complains of being obliged to submit to fate, and to the audacious undertaking of the Portuguese, and foretels them all the misfortunes which they must undergo in the Indies. I believe, that such a fiction would be thought noble and proper in all ages, and in all nations.

"There is another, which perhaps would have pleased the Italians as well as the Portuguese, but no other nation besides: it is the enchanted island, called the Island of Bliss, which the fleet finds in her way home, just rising from the sea, for their comfort and for their reward:—Camoëns describes that place, as Tasso did some years after, his island of Armida. There a supernatural power brings in all the beauties, and presents all the pleasures which Nature can afford, and which the heart may wish for; a goddess, enamoured with Velasco de Gama, carries him to the top of a high mountain, from whence she shows him all the kingdoms of the Earth, and foretels the fate of Portugal.

attacked the Lusiad. Yet this criticism, though most superficial and erroneous, has been generally esteemed throughout Europe, as the true character of that poem. The great objections upon which he condemns it, are, an absurd mixture of Christian and Pagan mythology, and a want of unity in the action and conduct. For the mixture of mythology, a defence shall be offered, and the wild exaggerations of Voltaire exposed. And an examen of the conduct of the Lusiad will clearly evince, that the Eneid itself is not more perfect in that connection, which is requisite to form one whole, according to the strictest rules of epic unity.

The term epopœia is derived from the Greek, ἔπος, discourse, and hence the epic may be rendered the narrative poem. In the full latitude of this definition, some Italian critics have contended, that the poems of Dante and Ariosto were epic. But these consist of various detached actions, which do not constitute one whole. In this manner Telemachus and the Faerie Queene are also epic poems. A definition more restricted, however, a definition descriptive of the noblest species of poetry, has been given by “After Camouëns hath given loose to his fancy, in the lascivious description of the pleasures which Gama and his crew enjoyed in the island, he takes care to inform the reader, that he ought to understand by this fiction, nothing but the satisfaction which the virtuous man feels, and the glory which accrues to him by the practice of virtue; but the best excuse for such an invention is, the charming style in which it is delivered (if we believe the Portuguese); for the beauty of the elocution makes sometimes amend for the faults of the poet, as the colouring of Rubens makes some defects in his figures pass unregarded.

“There is another kind of machinery continued throughout all the poem, which nothing can excuse, in any country whatever; 'tis an injudicious mixture of the heathen gods with our religion. Gama in a storm addresses his prayers to Christ, but 'tis Venus who comes to his relief; the heroes are Christians, and the poet heathen. The main design which the Portuguese are supposed to have, (next to promoting their trade,) is to propagate Christianity; yet Jupiter, Bacchus, and Venus, have in their hands all the management of the voyage. So incongruous a machinery casts a blemish upon the whole poem; yet shows, at the same time, how prevailing are its beauties, since the Portuguese like it with all its faults.

“Camouëns hath a great deal of true wit, and not a little share of false; his imagination hurries him into great absurdities. I remember, that after Velasco de Gama hath related his adventures to the king of Melinda, ‘Now,’ says he, ‘O king, judge if Ulysses and Æneas have travelled so far, and undergone so many hardships.’ As if that barbarous African was acquainted with Homer and Virgil.

“His poem, in my opinion, is full of numberless faults and beauties, thick sown near one another; and almost in every page there is something to laugh at, and something to be delighted with. Among his most lucky thoughts, I must take notice of two, for the likeness which they bear to two most celebrated passages of Waller, and sir John Denham.

“Waller says, in his Epistle to Zeluada;

Thy matchless form will credit bring
To all the wonders I can sing.

“Camouëns says, in speaking of the voyages of the Argonauts and of Ulysses, that the undertaking of the Portuguese shall give credit to all those fables, in surpassing them.

“Sir John Denham, in his poem on Cooper's-Hill, says to the Thames;

O could I flow like thee, and make thy stream
My great example, as it is my theme;
Though deep, yet clear, though gentle, yet not dull,
Strong without rage, without o'erflowing full.

“Camouëns addresses the nymphs of Tagus in the like manner; ‘O nymphs, if ever I sung of you, inspire me now with new and strong lays; let my style flow like your waves; let it be deep and clear, as your waters, &c.’”

Such is the original criticism of Voltaire on the Lusiad. And never, perhaps, was there such a random reverie, such a mass of misrepresentations and falsities as the whole of it exhibits. The most excusable parts of it are superficial in the highest degree. Both the poet and the hero are misnamed by him. The name of the hero has been corrected, that of Camouëns remains still in Voltaire, the only author who ever spelled it in this manner. There never was an Emmanuel the Second of Portugal. Camouëns was not shipwrecked on the coast of Malabar, but on the river Mecon in Cochinchina. “That Gama went a new way to the East Indies by the ocean,” though corrected in the edition of 1768, affords a most striking proof of Voltaire's very careless perusal of the Lusiad, at the time when he first presumed to condemn it. For it is often repeated in the poem, that there was no way to India by the ocean before. That the infancy of Camouëns was lost amidst the idleness and ignorance of the court of Lisbon, is certainly false. His youth could not have been spent in idleness or ignorance, for his works display a most masterly accuracy in every branch of ancient literature.

Though Voltaire has corrected his error in sending Camouëns to the East Indies along with Gama, such an original unparalleled romance ought to be recorded. Gama sailed on the discovery of India in 1497. Camouëns was born in 1517, and was not seven years of age when Gama died. These facts were immediately objected to Voltaire, but at first he would not yield. Contrary to the testimony of Aristotle; and the greatest critics have followed him, in appropriating to this species the term of epopœia, or epic. The subject of the epopœia, according to the great father of criticism, must be one. One action must be invariably pursued, and heightened through different stages, till the catastrophe close it in so complete a manner, that any further addition would only inform the reader of what he

Camoëns himself, and every circumstance of his life, an hypothesis * must defend this favourite supposition. In his Amsterdam edition of 1738, Voltaire boldly asserts that Camoëns was a Spaniard, born in the reign of Ferdinand and Isabel, that he came to Lisbon in the first year of Emmanuel, and was in intimate friendship with Gama, whom he accompanied in his first voyage. Certain it is, however, by the archives of Portugal, that Camoëns was in the east about seventy-two years after this voyage; and that, according to this hypothesis of Voltaire, he must have been near a hundred years old when he published his Lusiad. Voltaire, however, at last, confesses that Camoëns did not accompany Gama. Yet such is his accuracy, that even in the edition of 1768, in an essay which he calls Idee de la Henriade, a few pages before this confession, the old assertion is still retained. Le Camoëns, qui est le Virgile de Portugal, a celebré un événement dont il avait été témoin lui-même.—“Camoëns, the Portuguese Virgil, has celebrated an event of which he himself had been witness.”

No anecdotes ever threw more light upon a character than those thrown upon that of Voltaire. The assertion that the epic poet “enjoyed the sensible pleasure, which nobody had known before him, to celebrate his friend and the things he was an eye-witness of,” can only be accounted for by the supposition, that Voltaire was pleased with the idea, and in a little time mistook his strong impression for the remembrance of a fact. The laboured absurd hypothesis, which would defend this fanciful error, cannot be placed in so fair a light. And the error confessed, and still retained, is a true Voltairism. Yet the idea of his accuracy, which these accounts of the poet must inspire, will even be heightened by the examination of his criticism on the poem. The narrative of a voyage constitutes great part of the Odyssey, and of the Æneid; and forms the body of the Lusiad. Yet the Lusiad, says Voltaire, contains “nothing of what was deemed before the only subject of poetry.” It forms, indeed, “a sort of epic poetry unheard-of before;” but here Voltaire’s objection points out its true praise. “No heroes,” says he, “are wounded a thousand different ways, no woman enticed away and the world overturned for her cause.”—And must the fate of Helen, and the thousand different wounds described by Homer, be copied by every epic poet? If this sentence has any meaning, this is included. Yet what is this partiality of criticism in comparison of Voltaire’s assertions, that in the Lusiad “no bloody wars are fought, no empire founded?”—If the destruction of Troy be allowed to be in the Æneid, there are wars enough in the poem of Camoëns. The effect of fire-arms on people who never before beheld those dreadful engines, and a hostile town burnt by a fleet, are finely described in that part which is called the action of the epic poem. But Voltaire was as utter a stranger to the first book of the Lusiad, as to the one subject of the poem, the founding of the Portuguese empire in the east. “No battle fought, no empire founded!” What insult to the literary world is this! A late correction will never disprove his ignorance when he wrote this. Should a pretended critic on Virgil tell his reader that the poet conducted Æneas to the mouth of the Thames, could we believe he was acquainted with his author? Yet Voltaire tells us, that Camoëns “conducts the Portuguese fleet to the mouth of the Ganges near the coasts of Africa.”—Camoëns, indeed, conducts his fleet to Calicut on the coast of Malabar. But though the scene of the action of the four last books lies upon this coast, Voltaire was not happy enough to dip into any of the numerous passages which fix the geography. He has, therefore, given the voyage of Gama a dimension almost as much beyond the real one given by Camoëns, as the West Indies are distant from England. Such errors are convincing proofs that Voltaire only dips here and there into the Lusiad, even after the critics set him right in some places; for this gross error is still retained. But a misrepresentation, not founded on ignorance, now offends itself. “Gama in a storm,” says Voltaire,

*This honest hypothesis, which makes Camoëns a Spaniard, is of a piece with another of the same ingenious author. In his unhappy Essay on Epic Poetry †, he asserted, that Milton built his Paradise Lost upon an Italian comedy, written by one Andreino. This was immediately denied, and even some Italian literati declared, that no such author or comedy was known in Italy. Voltaire, however, would not yield, and very gravely he tells the reader, il n'est pas étonnant—“it is not at all astonishing, that having carefully searched in England for whatever related to that great man (Milton) I should discover circumstances of his life, of which the public were ignorant.”—This, therefore, is the authority from which we are to believe that Milton borrowed his Paradise Lost from a comedy which nobody ever saw. From the same researches in England Voltaire also learned other circumstances, of which the public were totally ignorant. The writing by which Milton sold his Paradise Lost to one Simmonds, a bookseller, is still extant. But Voltaire discovered, that he sold it to Tompson for thirty pistoles, “c’est Tompson lui donna trente pistoles de cet ouvrage.” Lord Sommers and Dr. Atterbury, (he adds,) resolving that England should have an epic poem, prevailed on the heirs of Tompson (he means Tomson, perhaps) to print a splendid edition of it. And Addison wrote (says he) and the English were persuaded, that they had an epic poem.

† Yet, in the same essay, he gives a true Voltairism; he condemns this very assertion. Talking of the plagiarism ascribed to Virgil, “All that,” says he, “ought to be flatly denied.—T is just as some people say Milton hath stolen his poem from an Italian stroler called Andreino.”

already perceives. Yet in pursuing this one end, collateral episodes not only give that variety so essential to good poetry, but, under judicious management, assist in the most pleasing manner to facilitate and produce the marvellous, or catastrophe. Thus the anger of Achilles is the subject of the Iliad. He withdraws his assistance from the Greeks. The efforts and distresses of the Grecian army in his “addresses his prayers to Christ, but ‘tis Venus who comes to his relief.”—A bold assertion still also retained, but there is no such passage in the Lusiad. Gama, in a tempest, prays to “the holy Power, to whom nothing is impossible, the sovereign of earth, sea, and land, who led Israel through the waves, who delivered Paul, and who protected the children of the second father of the world from the deluge.” But Christ is not once mentioned in the whole passage. To say that Gama was a good Catholic, and intended Christ under these appellations, is unworthy of poetical criticism, for the whole ridicule consists in the opposition of the names of Christ and Venus. Such is the candour of Voltaire! Nor is it difficult to trace the source of this unfair representation. Fanshew thus translates the mention of Paul,

Thou who didst keep and save thy servant Paul—

Monsieur Voltaire wanted us more. Thy servant Paul was to him enough to vindicate the ridicule he choosed to bestow. But unhappily for the misguided critic, the original says only, Tuque livraste Paulo—“Thou who deliveredst Paul.”—And thus we are furnished with a sure hint of the medium by which our critic studied the Lusiad. To this last unblushing falsity, that Gama prays to Christ, is added in the edition of 1768, Bacchus et la Vierge Marie se trouveront tout naturellement ensemble. “Bacchus and the Virgin Mary are very naturally found together.” If words have meaning, this informs the reader, that they are found together in the Lusiad. Yet the truth is, in the whole poem there is no such personage as the Virgin Mary.

After these gross falsities, Voltaire adds: A parler serieusement, un merveilleux si absurde de figure tout l'ouvrage aux yeux de lecteurs sensés. “To speak seriously, such an absurdity in the marvellous disfigures the whole work in the eyes of sensible readers.” To such as take Voltaire's word for it, it must indeed seem disfigured; but what literary murder is this! Nor does it end here. A simile must enforce the shameless misrepresentation. “It is like the works of Paul Veronese, who has placed Benedictine fathers and Swiss soldiers among his paintings from the Old Testament.” And to this also is added, Le Camoëns tombe presque toujours dans les telles disparates. “Camoëns almost continually falls into such extravagancies.” Yet with equal justice may this sentence be applied to Virgil; and peculiarly unhappy is the instance which Voltaire immediately gives: “I remember,” says he, “Vasco de Gama says to the king of Melinda, ‘O king, judge if Ulysses and Æneas have travelled so far, and undergone so many hardships:’ as if that barbarous African was acquainted with Homer and Virgil.” This sentence is still retained in Voltaire's last edition of his works. But, according to history, the Melindians were a humane and polished people; their buildings elegant, and in the manner of Spain. The royal family and grandees were Mohammedan Arabs, descended of those tribes, whose learning, when it suits his purpose, is the boast of Voltaire. The prince of Melinda, with whom Gama conversed, is thus described by the excellent historian Ocorius: In omni autem sermone princeps ille non hominis barbari specimen dabat, sed ingenium et prudentiam eo loco dignam præ se forebat.—“In the whole conversation the prince betrayed no sign of the barbarian; on the contrary, he carried himself with a politeness and intelligence worthy of his rank.” It is also certain that this prince, whom Voltaire is pleased to call a barbarous African, had sufficient opportunity to be acquainted with Homer; for the writings of Homer are translated into the Syriac, in a dialect of which the interpreters of Gama talked with the prince of Melinda*.

“The Lusiad, in my opinion,” says Voltaire, “is full of numberless faults and beauties, thick sown near one another, and almost in every page there is something to laugh at, and something to be de-fighted with.” This sentence, though omitted in the French editions, had some source, and that source we shall easily trace. Nor is the character of the king of Melinda so grossly falsified by Voltaire, as the character of the Lusiad of Camoëns is here misrepresented. Except the polite repartee of Veloso, (of which see book v. lin. 280,) there are not above two or three passages in the whole poem, which even border upon conceit. The most uniform simplicity of manly diction is the true character of the Po-

* The Arabs have not only innumerable volumes of their own, but their language is also enriched with translations of several Greek writers. The fate of Euclid is well known. And to mention only two of their authors,—Ben-Shobna, who died in 1478, a little before the arrival of Gama, wrote an universal history, which he calls Rawdhat a'menadhir si ilm alawail walawachir; that is, The meadow of the eye of ancient and modern knowledge. And Abul Pharajius, who lived in the thirteenth century, wrote a history in Arabic, in ten chapters, the first of which treats of the patriarchs, from Adam to Moses; the second of the judges and kings of Israel; the third of the Jewish kings; the fourth of the kings of Chaldea; the fifth of the kings of the Magi; the sixth of the ancient Pagan Greeks; the seventh of the Romans; the eighth of the Constantinopolitan emperors; the ninth of the Arabian Mohammedan kings; and the tenth of the Moguls. The same author acquaints us, that Homer's two works are elegantly translated into the Syriac; which language is sister to that spoken by the Arabs of Melinda. Camoëns, who was in the country, knew the learning of the Arabians. Voltaire, led by the desire to condemn, was hurried into absurdities from which a moment's consideration would have preserved him.

absence, and the triumphs of Hector, are the consequences of his rage. In the utmost danger of the Greeks, he permits his friend Patroclus to go to battle. Patroclus is killed by Hector. Achilles, to revenge his fall, rushes to the field. Hector is killed, the Trojans defeated, and the rage of Achilles is soothed by the obsequies of his friend. And thus also the subject of the Eneid is one. The remains of the Trojan nation, to whom a seat of empire is promised by the oracle, are represented as endangered by a tempest at sea. They land at Carthage. Eneas, their leader, relates the fate of Troy to the hospitable queen; but is ordered by Jupiter to fulfil the prophecies, and go in search of the promised seat of that empire which was one day to command the world. Eneas again sets sail, many adventures befall him. He at last lands in Italy, where prophecies of his arrival were acknowledged. His fated bride, however, is betrothed to Turnus. A war ensues; and the poem concludes with the death of the rival of Eneas. In both these great poems, a machinery suitable to the allegorical religion of those times is preserved. Juno is the guardian of the Greeks, Venus of the Trojans. Narrative poetry without fiction can never please. Without fiction it must want the marvellous, which is the very soul of poetry; and hence a machinery is indispensable in the epic poem. The conduct and machinery of the Lusiad are as follow: The poem opens with a view of the Portuguese fleet before a prosperous gale on the coast of Ethiopia. The crews, however, are worn with labour, and their safety depends upon their fortune in a friendly harbour. The gods of ancient or poetical mythology are represented as in council. The fate of the eastern world depends upon the success of the fleet. (But as we trace the machinery of the Lusiad, let us remember that, like the machinery of Homer and Virgil, it is also allegorical.) Jupiter, or the lord of fate, pronounces that the Lusians shall be prosperous. Bacchus, the evil demon or genius of Mohammedism, who was worshipped in the east, foreseeing that his empire and altars would be overturned, opposes Jove, or Fate. The celestial Venus, or heavenly Love, pleads for the Lusians. Mars, or divine Fortitude, encourages the lord of fate to remain unaltered; and Maia's son, the messenger of Heaven, is sent to lead the navy to a friendly harbour. The fleet arrives at Mozambic. Bacchus, like Juba in the Eneid, raises a commotion against the Lusians. A battle ensues, and the victorious fleet pursue their voyage under the care of a Moorish pilot, who advises them

Portuguese Lusiad. Where then did Voltaire find the false wit, and something to laugh at almost in every page? If there be a translation which strictly deserves this character, we cannot suppose that Voltaire hit this character, and at the same time was so wide of the original, merely by chance. No, he dived into Fanshaw's Lusiad, where, in every page, there are puns, conceits, and low quaint expressions, uncountenanced by the original. Some citations from Fanshaw will soon justify this character of his work. Yet, however decisive this proof may be, it is not the only one. The resemblance found by Voltaire between sir John Denham's address to the Thames, and that of Camoëns to the nymphs of the Tagus, does not exist in the original. This sentence, "Let my style flow like your waves, let it be deep and clear as your waters"—contains indeed the same allusion as that expressed in the lines cited by Voltaire from Denham. But no such idea or allusion exists in the Portuguese. Though Voltaire still retains this sentence, its want of authenticity has been detected by several critics. But it was left for the present translator to discover the source of this wide mistranslation. He suspected the allusion might be in Fanshaw, and in Fanshaw he found it. The nymphs of the Tagus are in sir Richard's version thus addressed:

If I in low, yet tuneful verse, the praise
Of your sweet river always did proclaim,
Inspire me now with high and thundering lays,
Give me them clear and flowing like his stream.

He who has read Camoëns and Fanshaw, will be convinced where Voltaire found the "something to laugh at in every page." He who has read neither the original nor that translation, will now perceive that Voltaire's opinion of the Lusiad was drawn from a very partial acquaintance with the unfaithful and unpoetical version of Fanshaw.

And, as if all his misrepresentations of the Lusiad were not enough, a new and most capital objection is added in the late editions of Voltaire. Mais de tous les défauts de ce poëme, &c. "But of all the faults of this poem, the greatest is the want of connection, which reigns in every part of it. It resembles the voyage which is its subject. The adventures succeed one another," [a wonderful objection] "and the poet has no other art, than to tell his tales well." Indeed! but the reader cannot now be surprised at any of our critic's misrepresentations, a critic, who in many instances has violently condemned the Lusiad upon circumstances which have no place in that poem.

After publication of the first edition of the Lusiad, the translator was informed of the following anecdote:—When Voltaire's Essay on Epic Poetry was at the press in London, he happened to show a proof-sheet of it to colonel Bladon, the translator of Cæsar's Commentaries. The colonel, who had been in Portugal, asked him if had read the Lusiad: Voltaire confessed he had never seen it, and could not read Portuguese. The colonel put Fanshaw's translation into his hands, and in less than a fortnight after, Voltaire's critique made its appearance.

to enter the harbour of Quikim. According to history, they attempted this harbour, where their destruction would have been inevitable; but they were driven from it by the violence of a sudden tempest. The poet, in the true spirit of Homer and Virgil, ascribes this to the celestial Venus,

— whose watchful care
Had ever been their guide—

They now arrive at Mombassa. The malice of the evil demon or genius of Mohammedism still excites the arts of treachery against them. Hermes, the messenger of Heaven, in a dream, in the spirit of Homer, warns the hero of the poem of his danger, and commands him to steer for Melinda. There he arrives, and is received by the prince in the most friendly manner. Here the hero receives the first certain intelligence or hope of India. The prince of Melinda's admiration of the fortitude and prowess of his guests, the first who had ever dared to pass the unknown ocean by Cape Corrientes, (see book v. line 612,) artfully prepares the reader for a long episode. The poem of Virgil contains the history of the Roman empire to his own time. Camoëns perceived this, and trod in his steps. The history of Portugal, which Gama relates to the king of Melinda, is not only necessary to give their new ally a high idea of the Lusian prowess and spirit, but also naturally leads to, and accounts for, the voyage of Gama: the event which, in its consequences, sums up the Portuguese honours. It is as requisite for Gama to tell the rise of his nation to the king of Melinda, as it is for Eneas to relate to Dido the cause of his voyage,—the destruction of Troy. Pleased with the fame of their nation, the king of Melinda vows lasting friendship with the Lusians, and gives them a faithful pilot. As they sail across the great Indian ocean, the machinery is again employed. The evil demon implores Neptune and the powers of the sea to raise a tempest to destroy the fleet. The sailors on the night-watch fortify their courage by relating the valiant acts of their countrymen; and an episode, in the true poetical spirit of chivalry, is introduced. Thus Achilles in his tent is represented as singing to his lyre the praises of heroes. And in the epic conduct, this narrative and the tales told by Nestor, either to restrain or inflame the rage of the Grecian chiefs, are certainly the same.

The accumulation of the tempest in the meanwhile is finely described. It now descends. Celestial Venus perceives the danger of her fleet. She is introduced by the appearance of her star, a stroke of poetry which would have shined in the Eneid. The tempest is in its utmost rage,

The sky and ocean bleeding, each on fire,
Seem'd as all nature struggled to expire,
When now the silver star of Love appear'd;
Bright in her east her radiant front she rear'd;
Fair through the horrid storm the gentle ray
Announced the promise of the cheerful day.
From her bright throne celestial Love beheld
The tempest burn—

And in the true spirit of Homer's allegory (see the note on book vi. line 716) she calls her nymphs, and by their ministry stills the tempest. Gama now arrives in India. Every circumstance rises from the preceding one; and, as fully pointed out in the notes, the conduct in every circumstance is as exactly Virgilian, as any two tragedies may possibly be alike in adherence to the rules of the drama. Gama, having accomplished his purpose in India, sets sail for Europe, and the machinery is for the last time employed. Venus, to reward her heroes, raises a Paradiisical island in the sea. Voltaire, in his English Essay, has said, that no nation but the Portuguese and Italians could be pleased with this fiction. In the French he has suppressed this sentence, but has compared it to a Dutch brothel allowed for the sailors. Yet this idea of it is as false as it is gross. Every thing in the island of Love resembles the statue of Venus de Medicis. The description is warm indeed, but it is chaste as the first loves of Adam and Eve in Milton; and entirely free from that grossness (see the note on book ix. line 780) often to be found in Dante, Ariosto, Spenser, and in Milton himself. After the poet has explained the allegory of the island of Love, the goddess of the ocean gives her hand and commits her empire to Gama, whom she conducts to her palace, where, in a prophetic song, he hears the actions of the heroes who were to establish the Portuguese empire in the east. In epic conduct nothing can be more masterly. The funeral games in honour of Patroclus, after the Iliad has turned upon its great hinge, the death of Hector, are here most happily imitated, after the Lusiad has also turned upon its great hinge, the discovery of India. The conduct is the same, though not one feature is borrowed. Ulysses and Eneas are sent to visit the regions of the dead; and Voltaire's hero must also be conveyed to Hell and Heaven. But how superior is the spirit of Camoëns! He parallels these striking adventures by a new fiction of his own. Gama in the island of Bliss, and Enceas in Hell, are in epic conduct exactly the same; and in this un-borrowing sameness he artfully interweaves the history of Portugal: artfully, as Voltaire himself confesses. The episode with the king of Meliada, the description of the painted emigna, and the prophetic song, are parallel in manner and purpose with the episode of Diado, the shield of Enceas, and the vision in Elysium. To appease the rage of Achilles, and to lay the foundation of the Roman empire, are the grand purposes of the Iliad and Eneid: the one effected by the death of Hector; the other by the alliance of Latinus and Enceas, rendered certain by the death of Turnus. In like manner, to establish the Portuguese Christian empire in the east is the grand design of the Lusiad, rendered certain by the happy return of Gama. And thus, in the true spirit of the epos, ends the Lusiad, a poem where every circumstance rises in just gradation, till the whole is summed up in the most perfect unity of epic action.

The machinery of Homer (see the note on book vi. line 716) contains a most perfect and masterly allegory. To imitate the ancients was the prevailing taste when Camoëns wrote; and their poetical manners were every where adopted. That he esteemed his own as allegorical, he assures us in the end of the ninth book, and in one of his letters. But a proof, even more determinate, occurs in the opening of the poem. Castor, the French translator, by his over refinement, has much misrepresented the allegory of the Lusiad. Mars, who never appears but once in the first book, he tells us, signifies Jesus Christ. This explanation, so open to ridicule, is every way unnecessary; and surely never entered the thought of Camoëns. It is evident, however, that he intended the guardian powers of Christianity and Mohammedism under the two principal personages of his machinery. Words cannot be plainer:

Where'er this people should their empire raise,
She knew her altars should unnumber'd blaze;
And barbarous nations at her holy shrines
Be humanis'd and taught her lore divine:
Her spreading honours thus the one inspir'd,
And one the dread to lose his worship fir'd.

And the same idea is on every opportunity repeated and enforced. Pagan mythology had its celestial as well as terrestrial Venus*. The celestial Venus is therefore the most proper personage of that mythology to figure Christianity. And Bacchus, the conqueror of the east, is, in the ancient poetical allegory, the most natural protector of the stars of India. Whatever may be said against the use of the ancient machinery in a modern poem, candour must confess, that the allegory of Camoëns, which arms the genius of Mohammedism† against the expedition of his heroes, is both sublime and most happily interesting. Nor must his choice of the ancient poetical machinery be condemned without examination. It has been the language of poetry these three thousand years, and its allegory is perfectly understood. If not impossible, it will certainly be very difficult to find a new, or a better machinery for an epic poem. That of Tasso is condemned by Boileau‡, yet that of Camoëns may plead the authority of that celebrated critic, and is even vindicated, undesignedly, by Voltaire himself. In an essay prefixed to his Henriade, Le mot d'Amphitrite, says he, dans notre poésie, ne signifie que la mer, & non l'épouse de Neptune—"the word Amphitrite in our poetry signifies only the sea, and not the wife of Neptune." And why may not the word Venus in Camoëns signify divine love, and not the wife of Vulcan? "Love," says Voltaire, in the same essay, "has his arrows, and

* The celestial Venus, according to Plato, was the daughter of Ouranus or Heaven, and thence called Urania. The passage stands in the Symposium of that author as follows:

Ἐπειτα γὰρ ἔπειθ' ὅτι τὴν ἑστῆσαν Ἐρῆναι Ἀφροδίτην ἑστῆσαν δὲ πάλιν πάλιν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν καὶ Ἐρῆναι ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν, ἡδὲ αὖτε τὴν ἑστῆσαν ἑστῆσαν.

† This Urania-Venus, according to Pausanias and other writers, had sumptuous temples in Athens, Phœnicia, &c. She was painted in complete armour; her priestesses were virgins; and no man was allowed to approach her shrine. Xenophon says, she presided over the love of wisdom and virtue, which are the pleasures of the soul, as the terrestrial Venus presided over the pleasures of the body.

‡ For several collateral proofs, see the note on book v. line 439, and text in Lusiad VIII where Bacchus, the evil demon, takes the form of Mohammed, and appears in a dream to a priest of the Koran.

§ On account of his magic. But magic was the popular belief of Tasso's age, and has afforded him a fine machinery, though his use of it is sometimes highly blameworthy; as when he makes an enchanter oppose the arch-angel Michael, armed with the authority of the true God, &c. &c.

Justice a balance, in our most Christian writings, in our paintings, in our tapestry, without being esteemed as the least mixture of Paganism." And if this criticism has justice in it, why not apply it to the Lusiad as well as to the Henriade? Camoëns will not only apply it to the Lusiad, but will also add the authority of Boileau. He is giving rules for an epic poem :

Dans le vaste récit d'une longue action,
 Se soutient par la fable, et vit de fiction.
 Là pour nous enchanter tout est mis en usage :
 Tout prend un corps, une ame, un esprit, un visage ;
 Chaque vertu devient une divinité ;
 Minerve est la prudence, et Venus la beauté.
 Ce n'est plus la vapeur qui produit le tonnerre,
 C'est Jupiter armé pour effrayer la terre.
 Un orge terrible aux yeux des matelots,
 C'est Neptune, en courroux, qui gourmande les stots . . .
 Sans tons ces ornemens le vers tombe en langueur ;
 La poésie est morte, ou rampe sans vigueur :
 Le poëte n'est plus qu'un orateur timide,
 Qu'un froid historien d'une fable insipide.

Every idea of these lines strongly defends the Lusiad. Yet, it must not be concealed, a distinction follows which may appear against it. Boileau requires a profane subject for the epic Muse. But his reason for it is not just :

De la foi d'un Chrétien les mysteres terribles
 D'ornemens égayés ne sont point susceptibles.
 L'évangile à l'esprit n'offre de tous cotés
 Que penitence à faire, et tourmens mérités :
 Et de vos fictions le mélange coupable
 Même à ses vérités donne l'air de la fable.

The mysteres terribles afford, indeed, no subject for poetry. But the Bible offers to the Muse something besides "penitence" and "merited torments." The Paradise Lost, and the works of the greatest painters, evince this. Nor does this criticism, false as it is, contain one argument which excludes the heroes of a Christian nation from being the subject of poetry. Modern subjects are indeed condemned by Boileau; and ancient fable, with its Ulysses, Agamemnon, &c.—norms heureux semblent nés pour les vers—are recommended to the poet. But, happy for Camoëns, his feelings directed him to another choice. For, in contradiction of a thousand Boileaus, no compositions are so miserably uninteresting as our modern poems, where the heroes of ancient fable are the personages of the action. Unless, therefore, the subject of Camoëns may thus seem condemned by the celebrated French critic, every other rule he proposes is in favour of the machinery of the Lusiad. And his own example proves, that he thought the Pagan machinery not improper in a poem where the heroes are modern⁵. But there is an essential distinction in the method of using it. And Camoëns has strictly adhered to this essential difference. The conduct of the epic poem is twofold; the historical, and allegorical. When Paganism was the popular belief, Diomed might wound Mars or Venus⁷; but when the names of these deities became merely allegorical, such also ought to be the actions ascribed to them. And Camoëns has strictly adhered to this rule. His heroes are Christians; and Santa Fé, Holy Faith, is often mentioned in the historical parts where his heroes speak and act. But it is only in the allegorical parts where the ⁵ Thus, when the Henriade is to be defended, the arrows of Cupid convey no mixture of Paganism. But when the island of Love in the Lusiad is to be condemned, our honnete critic must ridicule the use of these very arrows—C'est là que Venus, aidée des conseils du Pere Eternel, et secondée en même tems des fleches de Cupidon: "It is there that Venus, aided by the counsels of the Eternal Father, and at the same time seconded by the arrows of Cupid, renders the Nereides amorous of the Portuguese." But this, one of his latest additions, is as unlucky as all the rest. The Eternal Father is the same Jove who is represented as the Supreme Father in the first book. (St. 22. Portuguese.) and in book ix. st. 19, is only said to have ordained Venus to be the good genius of the Lusitanians. There is not a word about the assistance of his counsel; that was introduced by Voltaire, solely to throw ridicule upon an allegory, which, by the by, when used in the Henriade, has not the least fault, in his opinion; but is there every way in the true style of poetry.

⁶ He uses the Pagan mythology in his poem on the passage of the Rhine by the French army in 1672.

⁷ Thus it was the belief of the first ages of Christianity, that the Pagan gods were fallen angels. Mil-

Pagan or the poetical mythology is introduced. And in his machinery, as in his historical parts, there is no mixture of Pagan and Christian personages. The deliverance of the Lusian fleet, ascribed to the celestial Venus, so ridiculed by Voltaire, is exactly according to the precepts of Boileau. It is the historical opposition or concert of Christian and Pagan ideas which forms the absurd, and disfigures a poem. But this absurd opposition or concert of personages has no place in the Lusiad, though it is found in the greatest of modern poets. From Milton both the allowable and blameable mixture of Christian and Pagan ideas may be fully exemplified. With great judgment, he ranks the Pagan deities among the fallen angels. When he alludes to Pagan mythology, he sometimes says, "as fables feign;" and sometimes he mentions these deities in the allegory of poetical style; as thus,

— When Bellous storms,
With all her battering engines bent to raise
Some capital city —

And thus, when Adam smiles on Eve;

— as Jupiter
On Juno smiles when he impregus the clouds
That shed May flowers —

Here the personages are mentioned expressly in their allegorical capacity, the use recommended by Boileau. In the following the blameable mixture occurs. He is describing Paradise —

— Universal Pan
Knit with the Graces and the Hours in dance
Led on th' eternal spring. Not that fair field
Of Enna, where Proserpin, gathering flowers,
Herself a fairer flower, by gloomy Dis
Was gathered: which cost Ceres all that pain
To seek her through the world —

— might with this Paradise
Of Eden strive —

The mention of Pan, the Graces and Hours, is here in the pure allegorical style of poetry. But the story of Proserpin is not in allegory; it is mentioned in the same manner of authenticity as the many scripture histories introduced into the Paradise Lost. When the angel brings Eve to Adam, she appears — in naked beauty more adorn'd

More lovely than Pandora, whom the gods
Endow'd with all their gifts, and O too like
In sad event, when to th' unwiser son
Of Japhet brought by Hermes she ensow'r'd
Mankind with her fair looks, to be avenged
On him who had stole Jove's authentic fire.

ton, with admirable judgment, has adopted this system. His Mammon, the architect of Pandemonium, he also calls Vulcan:

Nor was his name unheard or unador'd
In ancient Greece, and in Ausonian land:—
Men call'd him Mulciber; and how he fell
From Heav'n, they fabled, thrown by angry Jove—
On Lemnos, th' Egean isle: Thus they relate Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
Fell long before.

Moloch and Vulcan are therefore mentioned together with great propriety in the Paradise Lost. The belief of the first Christians, with respect to demons, was unabated in the age of Camoëns; for the oracles of the Pagan deities were then believed to have been given by evil spirits. Bacchus might therefore, in a Christian poem of such age, represent the evil demon; and it was on this principle that Tasso felt no impropriety in calling Pluto his king of Hell, the grand foe of mankind, and making him talk of the birth of Christ. In like manner, when Camoëns says that the Christian altar mised (Book II.) to deceive the Lusians was the illusion of Bacchus, he says no more than what was agreeable to the popular belief of the Heathen oracles, and no more than what poetry allows when a storm is ascribed to Neptune, or arrows given to Cupid.

Here we have the Heathen gods, another origin of evil, and a whole string of fables, alluded to as real events, on a level with his subject⁸.

Nor is poetical use the only defence of our injured author. In the age of Camoëns, Bacchus was esteemed a real demon: and celestial Venus was considered as the name by which the Ethnics expressed the divine love. But if the cold hyper-critic will still blame our author for his allegory, let it be reported, that of all Christian poets Camoëns is in this the least reprehensible. The Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise of Dante, form one continued unallegorical texture of Pagan and Scriptural names, descriptions, and ideas. Ariosto is continually in the same fault. And, if it is a fault to use the ancient poetical machinery in a poem where the heroes are Christians, Voltaire himself has infinitely more of the mélange coupable than Camoëns. The machinery of his Henriade is, as confessed by himself, upon the idea of the Pagan mythology. He cites Boileau:

C'est d'un scrupule vain s'allarmer sottement,
Et vouloir aux lecteurs plaire sans agrément,
Bien-tôt ils défendront de peindre la prudence,
De donner a Thémis ni bandeau, ni balance. . . .
Et par-tout des discours, comme un idolatrie,
Dans leur faux zèle iront classer l'allégorie.

But he suppresses the verses which immediately follow, where the introduction of the true God is prohibited by the critic,

Et fabuleux Chrétiens, n'allons point dans nos songes,
Du Dieu de vérité faire un Dieu de mensonges.

Yet the God of truth, according to the Christian idea, in direct violation of this precept, is a considerable person in the Pagan allegorical machinery of the Henriade. But the couplet last cited, though as direct against the Henriade as if it had been written to condemn it, is not in the least degree applicable to the machinery of the Lusiad; a machinery infinitely superior in every respect to that of Voltaire⁹, though Camoëns wrote at the revival of learning, ere criticism had given her best rules to the modern Muse.

The poem of Camoëns, indeed, so fully vindicates itself, that this defence of it perhaps may seem unnecessary. Yet one consideration will vindicate this defence. The poem is written in a language unknown in polite literature. Few are able to judge of the original, and the unjust clamour raised against it by Rapin and Voltaire¹⁰, has been received in Europe as its true character. Lord Kaimes and

⁹ The machinery of the Henriade is briefly thus: The soul of St. Louis acts the part of Venus in the Æneid, and always protects the hero. When D'Aumale is wounded, and in danger of being killed, La Discorde sees it, and covering him with her iron immense impenetrable buckler, flies away with him to the gates of Paris, where she cures his wounds. She then comforts Mayenne, the chief of the league against Henry. She then flies in a whirlwind to the Vatican, where she meets La Politique. They then find humble Religion in a desert, and clothing themselves in her sacred vestments, return to Paris, where they ride about in a bloody chariot, along with the authors of the league. These soon after are represented as at a magical sacrifice, an obvious imitation of that of Camoëns, (Lusiad VIII.) where they take a Jew for their priest: and Henry appears to them riding in a chariot of victory. St. Louis then takes Henry, in a dream, through Heaven and Hell. La Discorde goes in search of Love, who is her brother; and Love takes a journey to France, where, by the charms of Mademoiselle d'Utrech, he entices Henry to neglect the war. St. Louis then sends the Genius of France to rouse Henry. He returns to the siege of Paris, but, on the point of carrying the city by storm, the angel of France prevents him. D'Aumale, on the part of the league, fights a duel; and all the monsters of Hell fly to his assistance. But the heavens now open, and an angel descends on the throne of heaven, with the olive of peace, and the sword of God's vengeance, D'Aumale falls, and the infernal monsters fly away. But St. Louis will not allow Henry to take the city. The saint goes to the throne of God, and prays for Henry's conversion. The Eternal consents; Truth descends from Heaven to the hero, who turns Roman Catholic. St. Louis then appears, with an olive bough in his hand, and leads Henry to the gates of Paris, which now open at his call, and receive him in the name of God. And thus the machinery and the poem conclude together.

Nor is the ridicule of this machinery more evident, than the want of unity of action which characterizes the Henriade. Henry's journey to England, though it fills near three parts of the poem, has no connection with the other parts of the action; and the events do not arise from each other; for St. Louis prevents the effects of every victory. And the catastrophe is brought about by Henry's conversion, independent of every exertion of his generalship or valour, which are properly the subject of the poem.

¹⁰ It is an unhappy thing to write in an unread tongue. Never was author so misrepresented by ignorance as the poet of Portugal. Rapin, that cold-blooded critic, tells us, that to write a good epic, it faut observer de la proportion dans le dessein, "it is necessary to observe proportion in the design, justness in the thought, and not to fall into rambling."—We then assert, that Camoëns tre-passes against all other authors very cordially condemn its mixture of Pagan and Christian mythology¹²; even condemn it in terms as if the Lusiad, the poem which of all other modern ones is the most unexceptionable in this, these rules—that he wants discernment and conduct—that he thought of nothing but to express the pride of his nation; for his style, he says, est fier et fastueux, “fierce and stilted.” In another place he says, “poetical diction ought to be clear, natural, and harmonious, and obscurity is its greatest blemish;” to which, having named Camoëns, he adds, ses vers sont si obscurs, qu’ils pourroient passer pour des mystères—“his verses are so obscure that they may pass for mysteries.”—Perhaps the old French version may deserve this character; but certain it is from hence, that Rapin never read the original. Perspicuity, elegant simplicity, and the most natural unstrained harmony, is the just characteristic of the style of Camoëns. The appeal is to the world. And the first linguist of the age has given the style of Camoëns a very different character from this of Rapin: Camœnsium Lusitanum, cujus poësis adeo venusta est, adeo polita, ut nihil esse possit jucundius; interduam verb, adeo cista, grandiloquus, ac sonora, ut nihil fingi possit magnificentius.—Jones, Pœnes Asiaticæ. Comment.

Montesquieu’s high idea of the Lusiad is cited in the note on book v. line 538. We shall only add the suffrage of the great Cervantes, who in his Don Quixote, c. iv. l. 6, most warmly expresses his idea of the excellence of the genius of Camoëns.

“Lord Kaimes thus follows Voltaire: “Portugal was rising in power and splendour” [it was hastening to the very last stages of declension] “when Camoëns wrote the Lusiad; and with respect to the music of verse it has merit. The author, however, is far from shining in point of taste.” [Most masterly description and boundless variety, however, are his characteristic. He has given the two finest fictions in poetry. And according to Voltaire the story of Inez is equal to the best written parts of Virgil.] “He makes a strange jumble of Heathen and Christian deities. ‘Gama,’ observes Voltaire, ‘is a storm addresses his prayers to Christ, but it is Venus who comes to his relief.’ Voltaire’s observation is but too well founded.” [And it is indeed, in the name of truth!] “In the first book, Jove summons a council of the gods, which is described at great length, for no earthly purpose but to show that he favoured the Portuguese: Bacchus, on the other hand, declares against them on the following account, that he himself had gained immortal glory as conqueror of India, which would be eclipsed if the Indies should be conquered a second time by the Portuguese. A Moorish commander having received Gama with smiles, but with hatred in his heart, the poet brings down Bacchus from Heaven to confirm the Moor in his wicked purposes, which would have been perpetrated, had not Venus interposed in Gama’s behalf. In the second canto Bacchus feigns himself to be a Christian, in order to deceive the Portuguese, but Venus implores her father Jupiter to protect them.”

Such is the view of the Lusiad given by a professed critic. It is impossible to make any remark on it without giving offence to false delicacy. But to that goddess the translator of the injured Camoëns will offer no sacrifice. We have fully proved, and Bacon has been cited to explain the philosophical reason of it, that the spirit of poetry demands something supernatural. Lucan has been severely censured, by the greatest of ancient and modern critics, for the want of poetical clothing or allegory. The spirit of poetry exists in personification:

Tout prend un corps, une ame, un esprit, un visage —

and as allegorical machinery is essential to the epopœia. In this manner Virgil and Homer conduct their poems. (See the note on b. vi. l. 716.) But our critic perceives nothing of this kind in Camoëns. Though the whole conduct of the Lusiad depends upon the council held by Jove, upon the allegorical parts taken by the personages of the machinery;

Her spreading honours thus the one inspir’d,
And ooe the dread to lose his worship fir’d—

and though this allegory is finely sustained throughout the whole poem, where celestial Love is ever mindful (See B. ix.) that Jove, or Fate, had decreed that her altars should be reared in consequence of the success of her heroes; though all this is truly Homeric, is what the world ever esteemed the true epic conduct, our critic can see no “earthly purpose” in the council of Jove, but to show that he favoured the Lusians; no reason for the opposition of Bacchus, but that he had been conqueror of India, and was averse it should be conquered a second time. In the same ignorance of the epic conduct is the vacant account of Bacchus and the Moor. But let our critic be told, that through the sides of Camoëns, if his blow will avail, he has murdered both Homer and Virgil. What condemns the council of Jove in the Lusiad, condemns the councils of Jove in these models of the epopœia*. What condemns Bacchus and the Moor, condemns the part of Juno in the Æneid, and every interposition of Juno and Neptune in Homer. To make the Lusians believe that Mombassa was inhabited by Christians, the Moors took the ambassadors of Gama to a house, where they shewed them a Christian altar. This is history. Camoëns, in the true spirit of the epic poetry, ascribes this appearance to the illusion of Bacchus. Hector and Turnus are both thus deceived. And Bacchus, as already proved, was esteemed a fallen angel when our poet wrote. Nor are the ancients alone thus reprobated in the sentence passed upon Camoëns. If

* It is truly astonishing, that one who has read the epic poets should have made this objection. A school-boy needs not to be told how often a council of the gods occurs in the Iliad, Odyssey, and Æneid. A part of Mr. Pope’s note on the fifth Odyssey may with propriety be here cited. “This look, as well as the first,” says he, “opens with an assembly of the gods. This is done to give an air of importance to his poem, and to prepare the mind of the reader to expect every thing that is great and noble, when Heaven is engaged in the care and protection of his heroes.”

were in this mixture the most egregiously insufferable.—Besides, whatever has the sanction of the celebrated name of Voltaire will be remembered, and, unless circumstantially refuted, may one time, perhaps, be appealed to, as decisive, in the controversies of literary merit¹².

Other views of the conduct of the Lusiad now offer themselves. Besides the above remarks, many observations on the machinery and poetical conduct are in their proper places scattered throughout the notes. The exuberant exclamations of Camoëns are there defended. Here let it only be added, that the unity of action is not interrupted by these parentheses, and that if Milton's beautiful complaint of his blindness be not an imitation of them, it is in the same manner and spirit. Nor will we scruple to pronounce, that such addresses to the Muse would have been admired in Homer, are an interesting improvement on the epopeia, and will certainly be imitated, if ever the world shall behold another real epic poem.

The Lusiad, says Voltaire, contains "a sort of epic poetry unheard-of before. No heroes are wounded a thousand different ways; no woman enticed away and the world overturned for her cause."—But the very want of these, in place of supporting the objection intended by Voltaire, points out the happy judgment and superior excellence of Camoëns. If Homer has given us all the fire and hurry of battles, he has also given us all the uninteresting tiresome detail. What reader but must be tired with the deaths of a thousand heroes, who are never mentioned before nor afterward in the poem. Yet in every battle we are wearied out with such gazette returns of the slain and wounded—

"Εὐαί τὴν σφῆρα, εἴνα Ἴ δ' ἄρα τὸν ἠρώμενον
 "Εὐαί Πρασιπύδης, ἴνα σὶ Ζεὺς αὐτῶν Δαίμων.
 "Αἰσῆσι πῶς σφῆρα, καὶ Ἀρτίμας, καὶ Ὀσίριος,
 Καὶ Δάδωρος Κλειώτης, καὶ Ὀφίλιον, ἢ Ἀγύλαον,
 Διόσκουρος ἢ Ἐπίον ἐκ, καὶ Ἰωνίαν μνηστέρην
 Τὴν δὲ τῷ ἠρώμενον Δαίμων ἴδεν ἀετὸς Ἰωνῶν
 Πλατῶν, δὲ ἴδεν, &c.

Il. lib. xi. lin. 999.

his machinery must be condemned, with what accumulated weight must his sentence fall upon the greatest of our modern poets! But the mystery is easily explained. There are a race of critics, who cannot perceive the noble prosopopœia of Milton's angels, who prefer Voltaire's Henriade to the Paradise Lost, who reduce a Virgil to a Lucan, a Camoëns to a mere historian; who would strip Poetry of all her ornaments, because they cannot see them, of all her passions, because they cannot feel them; in a word, who would leave her nothing but the neatness, the cadence, and the tinkle of verse.

¹² Voltaire's description of the apparition near the Cape of Good Hope, is just as wide of the original as bombast is from the true sublime: yet it has been cited by several writers. In Camoëns a dark cloud hovers over the fleet, a tremendous noise is heard, Gama exclaims in amazement, and the apparition appears in the air,

— rising through the darken'd air,
 Appall'd we saw a hideous phantom glare.

Every part of the description in Camoëns is sublime and nobly adapted for the pencil. In Voltaire's last edition the passage is thus rendered—C'est une fantôme que s'élève—"it is a phantom which rises from the bottom of the sea, his head touches the clouds; the tempests, the winds, the thunders are around him, his arms are stretched afar over the surface of the waters."—Yet not one picturesque idea of this is in the original. If the phantom's arms are stretched upon the surface of the waters, his shoulders and his head, which touch the clouds, must only be above the tide. Yet, though this imagery, with tempests, winds, and thunders hanging around him, would be truly absurd upon canvass, a celebrated Italian writer has not only cited Voltaire's description, as that of the original, but has mended that of the Frenchman by a stroke of his own. "The feet of the phantom," says signor Algarotti, "are in the unfathomable abyss of the sea." (See his Treatise on Newton's Theory of Light and Colours.) And certainly, if his shoulders and head reached from the surface of the water to the clouds, the length which the signor has given to his parts under the water was no bad calculation. Nor is Algarotti the only absurd retailer of Voltaire's misrepresentations. An English traveller, who lately published an account of Spain and Portugal, has quite completed the figure. Ses bras s'étendent au loin sur la surface des eaux, says Voltaire; and our traveller thus translates it, "His arms extend over the whole surface of the water." And thus the burlesque painter is furnished with the finest design imaginable for the mock sublime. A figure up to the arm-pits in the water, its arms extending over the whole surface of the sea, its head in the clouds, and its feet in the unfathomable abyss of the ocean! Very fine indeed, it is impossible to mend it further.

¹³ As we have paid attention to the strictures of Voltaire, some is also due to the praises which he bestows upon the Lusiad. Though he falsely asserts that it wants connection, he immediately adds, Tout cela prouve enfin, que l'ouvrage est plein des grandes beautés—"This only proves, in fine, that the work is full of grand beauties, since these two hundred years it has been the delight of an ingenious

Thus servilely imitated by Virgil,

Cædicens Alcathoum obruncet, Sacrorat Hydaspem :
 Partheniumque Rapo, et prædorum viribus Oræo :
 Messapus Cloniumque, Lyaoninmque Ericetem :
 Illum, infænis equi lapsu tellure jacentem ;
 Hunc, peditem pedes. Et Lycius processerat Agis,
 Quam lætam haud expers Valeris virtutis avitas
 Dejicit : Atrociùm Salius ; Saliumque Nealces—

Æd. I. v. 747.

With such catalogues is every battle extended ; and what can be more tiresome than such uninteresting descriptions and their imitations ! If the idea of the battle be raised by such enumeration, still the copy and original are so near each other, that they can never please in two separate poems. Nor are the greater parts of the battles of the Eneid much more distant from those of the Iliad. Though Virgil with great art has introduced a Camilla, a Pallas, and a Lausus, still in many particulars, and in the fights, there is, upon the whole, such a sameness with the Iliad, that the learned reader of the Eneid is deprived of the pleasure inspired by originality. If the man of taste, however, will be pleased to mark how the genius of a Virgil has managed a war after a Homer, he will certainly be tired with a dozen of epic poems in the same strain. Where the siege of a town and battles are the subject of an epic, they will of necessity, in the characters and circumstances, be a resemblance to Homer ; and such poem must therefore want originality. Happy for Tasso, the variation of manners, and his masterly superiority over Homer in describing his duels, have given his Jerusalem an air of novelty. Yet with all the difference between Christian and Pagan heroes, we have a Priam, an Agamemnon, an Achilles, &c. armies slaughtered, and a city besieged. In a word, we have a handsome copy of the Iliad in the Jerusalem Delivered. If some imitations, however, have been successful, how many other epics of ancient and modern times have hurried down the stream of oblivion ! Some of their authors had poetical merit, but the fault was in the choice of their subjects. So fully is the strife of war exhausted by Homer, that Virgil and Tasso could add to it but little novelty ; no wonder, therefore, that so many epics on battles and sieges have been suffered to sink into utter neglect. Camoëns, perhaps, did not weigh these circumstances ; but the strength of his poetical genius directed him. He could not but feel what it was to read Virgil after Homer ; and the original turn and force of his mind led him from the beaten track of Hefens and Lavinias, Achilles, and Hectors, sieges and slaughters, where the hero hews down and drives to flight whole armies with his own sword. To constitute a poem worthy of the name of epic in the highest and strictest sense, some grand characteristics of subject and conduct, peculiarly its own, are absolutely necessary. Of all the moderns, Camoëns and Milton have alone attained this grand peculiarity in an eminent degree. Camoëns was the first genuine and successful poet who wooed the modern epic Muse, and she gave him the wreath of a first lover : "A sort of epic poetry unheard-of before ;" or, as Voltaire calls it in his last edition, une nouvelle espèce d'épopée. And the grandest subject it is (of profane history) which the world has ever beheld¹⁴. A voyage esteemed too great for man to dare ; the adventures of this voyage, through unknown oceans, deemed unnavigable ; the eastern world happily discovered, and for ever indissolubly joined and given to the western ; the grand Portuguese empire in the east founded ; the humanization of mankind, and universal commerce the consequence ! What are the adventures of an old fabulous hero's arrival in Britain, what are Greece and Latium in arms for a woman, compared to this ! Troy is in ashes, and even the Roman empire is no more. But the effects of the voyage, adventures, and bravery of the hero of the Lusiad, will be felt and beheld, and perhaps increase in importance, while the world shall remain.

nation."—The fiction of the apparition, he owns, will please in every age ; and of the episode of Inez, he says, Il y a peu d'endroits dans Virgile plus attendrissans et mieux écrits—"There are few parts of Virgil more tender or better written."

¹⁴ The drama and the epopœia are in nothing so different as in this : the subjects of the drama are inexhaustible, those of the epopœia are perhaps exhausted. He who chooses war and the warlike characters, cannot appear as an original. It was well for the memory of Pope, that he did not write the epic poem he intended. It would have been only a copy of Virgil. Camoëns and Milton have been happy in the novelty of their subjects ; and these they have exhausted. There cannot possibly be so important a voyage as that which gave the eastern world to the western. And did even the story of Columbus afford materials equal to that of Gama, the adventures of the hero, and the view of the extent of his discoveries, must now appear as servile copies of the Lusiad. The view of Spanish America, given in the Auracana, is not only a mere copy, but is introduced even by the very machinery of Camoëns.

Happy in his choice, happy also was the genius of Camoëns in the method of pursuing his subject. He has not, like Tasso, given it a total appearance of fiction; nor has he, like Lucan, excluded allegory and poetical machinery. Whether he intended it or not, for his genius was sufficient to suggest its propriety, the judicious precept of Petronius is the model of the Lusiad. That elegant writer proposes a poem on the Civil War: Ecce Belli Civili, says he, *ingros opus—Non enim res gestæ veribus comprehendendæ sunt (quod longè melius historici faciunt) sed per ambages deorumque ministeria, et fabulosum sententiarum tormentum præcipiendus est liber spiritus: ut potius furentis animi vaticinatio appareat, quam religiosæ orationis sub testibus fides—No poem, ancient or modern, merits this character in any degree comparative to the Lusiad. A truth of history is preserved, yet, what is improper for the historian, the ministry of Heaven is employed, and the free spirit of poetry throws itself into fictions which make the whole appear as an effusion of prophetic fury, and not like a rigid detail of facts given under the sanction of witnesses. Contrary to Lucan, who, in the above rules drawn from the nature of poetry, is severely condemned by Petronius, Camoëns conducts his poem “per ambages deorumque ministeria.” The apparition, which in the night hovers athwart the fleet near the Cape of Good Hope, is the grandest fiction in human composition; the invention his own! In the island of Venus, the use of which fiction in an epic poem is also his own, he has given the completest assemblage of all the flowers which ever adorned the bowers of love. And never was the furentis animi vaticinatio more conspicuously displayed than in the prophetic song, the view of the spheres, and the globe of the Earth. Tasso’s imitation of the island of Venus is not equal to the original; and though “Virgil’s myrtles dropping blood are nothing to Tasso’s enchanted forest¹⁵,” what are all Ismeab’s enchantments to the grandeur and horror of the appearance, prophecy, and evanishment of the spectre of Camoëns¹⁶!—It has been long agreed among the critics, that the solemnity of religious observances gives great dignity to the historical narrative of the epopœia. Camoëns, in the embarkation of the Beet, and in several other places, is peculiarly happy in the dignity of religious allusions. Manners and character are also required in the epic poem. But all the epics which have appeared, are, except two, mere copies of the Iliad in these. Every one has its Agamemnon, Achilles, Ajax, and Ulyses, its calm, furious, gross, and intelligent hero. Camoëns and Milton happily left this beaten track, this exhausted field, and have given us pictures of manners unknown in the Iliad, the Æneid, and all those poems which may be classed with the Thebaid. The Lusiad abounds with pictures of manners, from those of the highest chivalry, to those of the rudest, fiercest, and most innocent barbarism. In the fifth, sixth, and ninth books, Leonardo and Veloso are painted in stronger colours than any of the inferior characters in Virgil. But striking character, indeed, is not the excellence of the Æneid. That of Monzaida, the friend of Gama, is much superior to that of Achates. The base, selfish, perfidious, and cruel character of the zamorim and the Moors, are painted in the strongest colours; and the character of Gama himself, is that of the finished hero. His cool command of his passions, his deep sagacity, his fixed intrepidity, his tenderness of heart, his manly piety, and his high enthusiasm in the love of his country, are all displayed in the superlative degree. And to the novelty of the manners of the Lusiad, let the novelty of fire-arms also be added. It has been said, that the buckler, the bow and the spear, must ever continue the arms of poetry. Yet, however unsuccessful others may have been, Camoëns has proved that fire-arms may be introduced with the greatest dignity and finest effect in the epic poem.*

As the grand interest of commerce and of mankind forms the subject of the Lusiad, so with great propriety, as necessary accompaniments to the voyage of his hero, the author has given poetical pictures of the four parts of the world. In the third book a view of Europe; in the fifth, a view of Africa; and in the tenth, a picture of Asia and America. Homer and Virgil have been highly praised for their judgment in their selection of subjects which interested their countrymen, and Statius has been as severely condemned for his uninteresting choice. But though the subject of Camoëns be particularly interesting to his countrymen, it has also the peculiar happiness to be the poem of every trading nation. It is the epic poem of the birth of commerce. And in a particular manner the epic poem of that country which has the control and possession of the commerce of India.

An unexhausted fertility and variety of poetical description, an unexhausted elevation of sentiment,

¹⁵ See Letters on Chivalry and Romance.

¹⁶ The Lusiad is also rendered poetical by other fictions. The elegant satire on King Sebastian, under the name of Actœon; and the prosopopœia of the populace of Portugal venting their murmurs upon the beach when Gama sets sail, display the richness of our author’s poetical genius, and are not inferior to any thing of the kind in the classics.

and a constant tenour of the grand simplicity of diction, complete the character of the Lusiad of Camoëns: a poem, which, though it has hitherto received from the public most unmerited neglect, and from the critics most flagrant injustice, was yet better understood by the greatest poet of Italy. Tasso never did his judgment more credit, than when he confessed that he dreaded Camoëns as a rival; or his generosity more honour, than when he addressed this elegant sonnet to the hero of the Lusiad:

SONNETTO.

Vasco, le cui felici, ardite antenne
In contro al sol, che ne riporta il giorno
Spiegar le vele, e fer collà ritorno,
Dove egli par che di cadere accenne;
Non più di te per aspro mar sostenne
Quel, che fece al Ciclope oltraggio, e scorno;
Ne chi tortò l'Arpie nel suo soggiorno;
Ne diè più bel soggetto a colte penne.
Et hor quella del colto, e buon' Luigi,
Tant' oltre stende il glorioso volo
Che tuoi spalmati legni andar men lungo.
Ond' a quelli, a cui s'alza il nostro polo,
Et a chi ferma in contra i suoi vestigi,
Per lui del corso tuo la fama aggiunge.

SONNET.

Vasco, whose bold and happy bowsprit bore
Against the rising morn; and, homeward fraught,
Whose sails came westward with the day, and brought
The wealth of India to thy native shore:
Ne'er did the Greek such length of seas explore,
The Greek, who sorrow to the Cyclop wrought;
And he, who, victor, with the Harpies fought,
Never such pomp of naval honours wore.
Great as thou art, and peerless in renown,
Yet thou to Camoëns ow'st thy noblest fame;
Further than thou didst sail, his deathless song
Shall bear the dazzling splendour of thy name;
And under many a sky thy actions crown,
While Time and Fame together glide along.

It only remains to give some account of the version of the Lusiad which is now offered to the public. Besides the translations mentioned in the Life of Camoëns, M. Duperron de Castéra, in 1735, gave in French prose a loose unpoetical paraphrase of the *Lusiad*¹⁷. Nor does sir Richard Fanshew's English

¹⁷ Castéra was every way unequal to his task. He did not perceive his author's beauties. He either suppresses or lowers the most poetical passages, and substitutes French tinsel and impertinence in their place. In the necessary illustrations in the notes, the citations from Castéra will vindicate this character.

Soon after the first publication of the English Lusiad, a new French prose translation of Camoëns was published by M. de la Harpe. He confesses that he received a literal translation of his author, from a person well acquainted with the original. This, he says, he proposed to animate with the fire of poetry; and he owns he has sometimes abridged his text. His style, however, is much less poetical than even Castéra's, whom he severely condemns. A literal prose translation of poetry is an attempt as absurd as to translate fire into water. What a wretched figure do the most elegant odes of Horace make in a literal prose translation! And no literal translation for the use of schools was ever more unlike the original, in spirit, vigour and elegance, than the sometimes literal, and sometimes mangled version of M. de la Harpe, which seems to be published as a sacrifice to the wounded vanity of his admired Voltaire. La Harpe stands forth, against Castéra, as the defender of Voltaire's criticism on the Lusiad. Castéra, indeed, has sometimes absurdly defended his author; but a translator of the Lusiad, who could not perceive the many gross misrepresentations of Voltaire, must have hurried over his author with very little attention. He adopts the spirit of all Voltaire's objections, and commends only where he commends. Want of unity in the epic conduct is Voltaire's very rash character of Camoëns. And la Harpe as rashly asserts that the poem ends in the seventh book when Gama arrives in India. But he might as well have asserted that the Æneid ends with the landing of Æneas in Italy. Both version, published during the usurpation of Cromwell, merit a better character. Though stanzas be rendered for stanzas, though at first view it has the appearance of being exceedingly literal, this version is nevertheless exceedingly unfaithful. Uncountenanced by his original, Fanshaw—"teems with many a dead-born jest"¹⁸.—Nor had he the least idea of the dignity of the epic style¹⁹, or of the true spirit of heroes have much to accomplish after their arrival in the desired country. And the return of Gama, after having subdued every danger, is exactly parallel to the death of Turous. And this return, without which Gama's enterprises is incomplete, is managed by Camoëns, at the close of his poem, in the concise and true spirit of Virgil. A translator of the Lusiad, who could not perceive this, is indeed most ingeniously superficial. But La Harpe's sentence on the Paradise Lost, which he calls digne d'un siècle de barbarie—"worthy of an age of barbarity," will give the English reader a just idea of his poetical taste.

¹⁸ Pope, Odysæ. xx.

¹⁹ Richard Fanshaw, esq., afterwards sir Richard, was English ambassador both at Madrid and Lisbon. He had a taste for literature, and translated from the Italian several pieces, which were of service in the refinement of our poetry. Though his Lowiad, by the dedication of it to William earl of Strafford, dated May 1, 1655, seems as published by himself, we are told by the editor of his Letters, that, "during the unsettled times of our anarchy, some of his MSS., falling by misfortune into unskilful hands, were printed and published without his consent or knowledge, and before he could give them his last finishing strokes: such was his translation of the Lusiads."

The great respect due to the memory of a gentleman who, in the unpropitious age of a Cromwell, endeavoured to cultivate the English Muses, and the acknowledgment of his friend, that his Lusiad received not his finishing strokes, may seem to demand that a veil should be thrown over its faults. And not a blemish should have been pointed out by the present translator, if the reputation of Camoëns were unconcerned, and if it were not a duty he owed his reader to give a specimen of the former translation. We have proved that Voltaire read and drew his opinion of the Lusiad from Fanshaw. And Rapin most probably drew his from the same source. Perspicuity is the characteristic of Camoëns; yet Rapin says, his verses are so obscure they appear like mysteries. Fanshaw is indeed so obscure, that the present translator, in dipping into him, into parts which he had even then translated, has often been obliged to have recourse to the Portuguese to discover his meaning. Sancho Panza was not fonder of proverbs. He has thrust many into his version. He can never have enough of conceits, low allusions, and expressions. When gathering of flowers, as boninas apaubando, is simply mentioned (C. 9. st. 24) he gives it, "gather'd flowers by pecks." And the Indian regent is avaricious (C. 8. st. 95)

Meaning a better penny thence to get.

But enough of these have already appeared in the notes. It is necessary now to give a few of his stanzas entire, that the reader may form an idea of the manner and spirit of the old translation. Nor shall we select the specimen. The noble attitude of Mars, in the first book, is the first striking description in the poem, and is thus rendered:

Lifting a little up his helmet-sight
(Twas adamant) with confidence enough,
To give his vote himself he placed right
Before the throne of Jove, arm'd valiant, tough:
And (giving with the butt-end of his pyke
A great thump on the floor of purest stuffe)
The Heavens did tremble, and Apollo's light
It went and came, like colour in a fright.

And the appearance of Indians in canoes approaching the fleet, is the very next description which occurs:

For streight out of that isle which seem'd most neer
Unto the continent, behold a number
Of little boats in companie appear,
Which (clapping all wings on) the long sea sunder!
The men are rapt with joy, and with the meer
Excess of it, can only look, and wonder.

"What nation's this," within themselves they say,
"What rites, what laws, what king do they obey?"

Their coming thus; in boats with fins; nor flat,
But apt t' o're-set (as being pincht and long)
And then they'd swim like rats*. The sayles, of mat
Made of palm-leaves wove curiously and strong.
The men's complexion the self-same with that Hee gave the Earth's burnt parts (from Heaven flung),
Who was more brave than wise; that this is true
The Po both know and Lampetusa rue.

It may be necessary to add, the version of Fanshaw, though the Lusiad very particularly requires them, was given to the public without one note.

* Not in the original.

poetical translation. For this, indeed, no definite rule can be given. The translator's feelings alone must direct him; for the spirit of poetry is sure to evaporate in literal translation.

Literal translation of poetry is in reality a solecism. You may construe your author, indeed, but if with some translators you boast that you have left your author to speak for himself, that you have neither added nor diminished, you have in reality grossly abused him, and deceived yourself. Your literal translation can have no claim to the original felicities of expression, the energy, elegance, and fire of the original poetry. It may bear, indeed, a resemblance, but such an one as a corpse in the sepulchre bears to the former man, when he moved in the bloom and vigour of life.

Nec verbum verbo curabis reddere, fides was the taste of the Augustan age. None but a poet can translate a poet. The freedom which this precept gives will therefore, in a poet's hands, not only infuse the energy, elegance, and fire of his author's poetry into his own version, but will give it also the spirit of an original.

He who can construe may perform all that is claimed by the literal translator. He who attempts the manner of translation prescribed by Horace ventures upon a task of genius. Yet, however daring the undertaking, and however he may have failed in it, the translator acknowledges, that in this spirit he endeavoured to give the Lusiad in English. Even further liberties, in one or two instances, seemed to him advantageous—But a minuteness in the mention of these ²⁰ will not, in these pages, appear with a good grace. He shall only add, in this new edition, that some of the most eminent of the Portuguese literati, both in England and on the continent, have approved of these freedoms; and the original is in the hands of the world.

It is with particular pleasure that the translator renews his acknowledgments to those gentlemen who have patronised his work. On his first proposals to give the Lusiad in English, the ingenious Mr. Magellan, of the family of the celebrated navigator, was zealous to promote its success. To many Portuguese gentlemen he owes the assistance of books and information, conferred in the most liberal manner: and their approbation of his first edition reconciles him to a review of his labour. Both to public and private libraries he is much indebted; particularly to the valuable collection of Thomas Pearson, esq. of the East India company's service. The approbation expressed by several gentlemen of the East India company, on the appearance of the poem on the discovery of India in its English dress, gave the translator the sincerest satisfaction. To governor Johnstone, whose ancestors have been the hereditary patrons of the ancestors of the translator, he is under every obligation which the warmest zeal to promote the success of his undertaking can possibly confer. To this gentleman, in a great measure, the appearance of the Lusiad in English is due. To the friendship of Mr. Hoole, the elegant translator of Tasso, he is peculiarly indebted. To James Boswell, esq. he confesses many obligations. And while thus he recollects with pleasure the names of many gentlemen from whom he has received assistance or encouragement, he is happy to be enabled to add Dr. Johnson to the number of those, whose kindness for the ²⁰ Some liberties of a less poetical kind, however, require to be mentioned. In Homer and Virgil's lists of slain warriors, Dryden and Pope have omitted several names which would have rendered English versification dull and tiresome. Several allusions to antient history and fable have for this reason been abridged. e. g. in the prayer of Gama (Book vi.) the mention of Paul, "thou who deliverest Paul, and defendest him from quicksands and wild waves—"

Das scyrtas arenosas et ondas fea—

is omitted. However excellent in the original, the prayer in English, such is the difference of languages, would lose both its dignity and ardour, if burdened with a further enumeration. Nor let the critic, if he find the meaning of Camoens in some instances altered, imagine that he has found a blunder in the translator. He who chooses to see a slight alteration of this kind, will find an instance, which will give him an idea of others, in Can. 8. st. 48, and another in Can. 7. st. 41. It was not to gratify the dull few, whose greatest pleasure in reading a translation is to see what the author exactly says; it was to give a poem that might live in the English language which was the ambition of the translator. And for the same reason he has not confined himself to the Portuguese or Spanish pronunciation of proper names. It is ingeniously observed in the Rambler, that Milton, by the introduction of proper names, often gives great dignity to his verse. Regardless, therefore, of Spanish pronunciation, the translator has accepted Granada, Evora, &c. in the manner which seemed to him to give most dignity to English versification. In the word Sofala he has even rejected the authority of Milton, and followed the more sonorous usage of Fanshew. Thus sir Richard: "Against Sofala's batter'd fort." And thus Milton: "And Sofala thought Ophir—" Which is the most sonorous there can be no dispute. If the translator, however, is found to have trespassed against good taste in these liberties in the pronunciation of proper names, he will be very willing to acknowledge and correct his error.

man, and good wisher for the translation, call for his sincerest gratitude. Nor must a tribute to the memory of Dr. Goldsmith be neglected. He saw a part of this version; but he cannot now receive the thanks of the translator.

But, though previous to publication the translator was thus flattered with the approbation of some names, for whom the public bear the greatest respect; though he introduced to the English reader a poem truly Virgilian, he confessed he had his fears for its fate. And however the approbation of some of the greatest names in the English polite literature may have since gratified his faltering hopes, the consciousness of his inability, and the character of the age, gave no false foundation to his uneasy apprehensions. We are not, indeed, in the condition of ancient Rome, when, in the declension of her literature, the Latin tongue was despised, and the Greek only admired. Yet, though a masterly treatise in some branches of literature would immediately receive the reward due to merit; ere the just reputation of his poetry be fixed, the author perhaps may be where the applause of the world cannot come. Long after Shakespeare wrote, and thirty years after the Paradise Lost was published, Shaftsbury pronounced that the English Muses were lisping in their cradles. And Temple, a much greater authority in poetical taste, esteems Sidney the greatest of all modern poets. Nor was his neglect of Milton singular. Even though that immortal author's reputation be now fixed, I have known a learned gentleman who could not endure a line of the Paradise Lost; who yet, with seeming rapture, would repeat whole pages of Ovid. There is a charm in the sound of a language which is not debased by familiar use. And as it was in falling Rome, nothing in his vernacular tongue will be highly esteemed by the scholar of dull taste. A work which claims poetical merit, while its reputation is unestablished, is beheld, by the great majority, with a cold and a jealous eye. The present age, indeed, is happily auspicious to science and the arts; but poetry is neither the general taste, nor the fashionable favourite of these times⁴¹. Often, in the dispirited hour, have these views obtruded upon the translator. While he has left his author upon the table and wandered in the fields, these views have clothed themselves almost imperceptibly in the stanza and allegory of Spenser. Thus connected with the translation of Camoëns, unfinished as they are, they shall close the introduction to the English Luclid.

Hence, vagrant minstrel, from my thriving farm,
Far hence, nor ween to shed thy poison here:
My hinds despise thy lyre's ignoble charm;
Seek in the slogger's hovers thy ill-earn'd cheer:
There while thy idle chaunting soothes their ear,
The noxious thistle chokes their sickly core;
Their apple boughs, ungraft'd, sour wildings bear,
And o'er the ill-fenced dales with fleeces torn Unguarded from the fox, their lambskins stray forlorn.

Such ruin withers the neglected soil,
When to the song the ill-starr'd swain attends.
And well thy meed repays thy worthless toil;
Upon thy houseless head pale want descends
In bitter shower: and taunting scorn still rends,
And wakes thee trembling from thy golden dream:
In vetchy bed, or loathly dungeon ends
Thy idled life—What fitter may beseem,
Who poisons thus the fount, should drink the poison'd stream.

And is it thus, the heart-stung minstrel cried,
While indignation shook his silver'd head,
And is it thus, the gross-fed lordling's pride,
And hind's base tongue the gentle bard upbraid?
And must the holy-song be thus repaid
By sun-busk'd ignorance, and chorlish scorn?
While listless drooping in the languid shade

⁴¹ "Poetry makes a principal amusement among unpolished nations; but in a country verging to the extremes of refinement, Painting and Music come in for a share. As these offer the feeble mind a less laborious entertainment, they at first rival Poetry, and at length supplant her; they engross all that favour once shown to her, and, though but younger sisters, seize upon the elder's birthright."—Goldsmith.

DISSERTATION ON THE LUSIAD, &c.

Of cold neglect, the sacred Bard must mourn,
Though in his hallowed breast Heaven's purest ardours burn!

Yet how sublime, O Bard, the dread behest,
The awful trust to thee by Heaven assign'd!
'Tis thine to humanise the savage breast,
And form in Virtue's mould the youthful mind;
Where lurks the latent spark of generous kind,
'Tis thine to bid the dormant ember blaze:
Heroic rage with gentlest worth combur'd
Wide through the land thy forming power displays—
So spread the olive boughs beneath Dan Phœbus' rays.

When Heaven decreed to soothe the seeds that bore
The wolf-eyed barons, whom unlettered rage
Spurn'd the fair Muse; Heaven bade on Avon's shore
A Shakespeare rise and soothe the barbarous age:
A Shakespeare rose; the barbarous heats abate—
At distance due how many bards attend!
Enlarged and liberal from the narrow cage
Of blinded zeal new manners wide extend,
And o'er the generous breast the doors of Heaven descend.

And fits it you, ye sons of hallowed power,
To hear, unmoved, the tongue of scorn spread
The Muse neglected in her wintry tower;
While proudly flourishing in princely shade
Her younger sisters lift the laurel'd head—
And shall the pencil's boldest mimic rage,
Or softest charms, fore-doomed in time to fade,
Shall these be vaunted o'er th' immortal page,
Where passion's living fires burn undimur'd by age?

And shall the warbled strains or sweetest lyre,
Thrilling the palace roof at night's deep hour;
And shall the nightingales in woodland choir
The voice of Heaven in sweeter raptures pour?
Ah no, their song is transient as the flower
Of April morn: In vain the shepherd boy
Sits listening in the silent autumn bower;
The year no more restores the short-lived joy;
And never more his harp shall Orpheus' hands employ.

Eternal silence in her cold deaf ear
Has closed his strain; and deep eternal night
Has o'er Apelles' tints, so bright while-ere,
Drawn her blank curtains—never to the sight
More to be given—But cloth'd in Heaven's own light
Homer's bold painting shall immortal shine;
Wide o'er the world shall ever sound the might,
The raptur'd music of each deathless line:
For death nor time may touch their living soul divine.

And what the strain, though Perce swell the note,
High though its rapture, to the Muse of Greece!
Ah what the transient sounds, devoid of thought,
To Shakespeare's flame of ever-burning ire,
Or Milton's flood of mind, till time expire
Fore-doom'd to flow; as Heaven's dread energy
Unconscious of the bounds of place—

"Dada na cidade de Lisboa, &c.

El Rey."

NOTICIAS.

1. Os vice-reys da India tinham huma juradição suprema, como se vê das suas patentes: e erão unicamente sujeitos, no fim do seu governo, e huma devaça de residencia, que el rey mandava tirar do seu procedimento, por hum ministro civil. Nesta devaça devião jurar todas as ordens do estado; principiando-se pela camera (ou seja concelho municipal); e continuando-se pelos officiaes das mais repartições civis, como a relação de Goa, os ministros e officiaes da fazenda, os generaes e officiaes militares, sem excepção de pessoa alguma.

Esta devaça era remetida em direitura a Lisboa. Porém, se o novo vice-rey [tendo precedido quizes à corte do seu antecessor] trazia ordens particulares; podia mandalo logo prezo a Lisboa, achando-o culpado.

2. Na India avia alem do vice-rey e de dous secretarios de estado, os tribunaes seguintes em Goa: a inquirição para as couzas da religião: o tribunal do ordinario para os mais negocios ecclesiasticos: uma junta das missões, independente do bispo, mas sujeita à inspecção dos vice-reys, na qual junta prezidia o superior dos jezuitas: huma relação (tribunal superior de judicatura) com hum chancelier-mór para os negocios civis, com appellação para o tribunal supremo do reino (em Portugal): hum concelho da fazenda, e o senado da camera.

3. O vice-rey era regedor das justicias & como tal era presidente da sobre dita relação & do referido concelho da fazenda: não se podendo dispender couza alguma sem hum despacho, ou portaria do mesmo vice-rey. Este, como lugartenente d'el rey, governava sem limitação sobre os militares; conferia patentes até o posto de capitães inclusivè: nomeava interinamente todos os mais postos superiores; e continha todos os governos da sua dependencia, que não vinhão providos pela corte. Nos casos cri-

miuses, assim civis, como militares, a reia e o concelho de guerra da India tinham o direito supremo de vida e morte: e o vice-rey, como presidente, tinha o direito de desempate nos casos de igualdade de votos.

4. Alem dos referidos estabelecimentos, o senado da camera tinha os mesmos direitos de policia, que tem todos os do reino: e alem disso o direito de representação e o mesmo vice-rey; e de se queixar, ao corpo de tribunal, em direitura à sua magestade a Lisboa.

5. Quando avia vacancia de vice-reys, por cauza de morte, o arcebispo o chanceler da reia, e o official militar de maior patente, tomavam o governo do estado; e exercitavam prominciantemente todas as funcões, assignando todos juntos as ordens que davão.

6. O commercio da Asia pertencia inteiramente a el rey, e todo se fazia por conta da coroa, em navios proprios: para o que tinham estabelecido, por parte de mesma coroa, e à sua custa, diferentes feitorias em todos os estabelecimentos da Asia, administrados por feitores e officiaes da fazenda real, debaixo da jurisdicção dos vice-reys; os quaes davão contas no fim de 3 annos da sua administração, ao concelho da fazenda da India: e este se dava ao concelho-ultramarino de Lisboa, na sequente monção. Este commercio se fazia em frotas, que partião da India e depositavam tudo nos Armazens reais da casa assim chamada (da India) em Lisboa: donde se vendia por conta da fazenda real, aos nacionaes, e aos estrangeiros.

7. Os vice-reys obtiverão a liberdade de fazerem commercio para o reino; porém não podião exceder de huma porção limitada, que se lhes arbitrou. A mesma faculdade se estendeu andepois disso a muitas outras pessoas, tanto civis, como militares; perem com grandes limitações e reservas; exceptuando sempre as pedras preciosas, perolas e aljofar, cujo commercio se deu exclusivamente ás rainhas de Portugal, para seu patrimonio: assim como também o da pimenta. O commercio dos outras especias, do salitre, sandalo, e porcelana, sempre foi reservada à coroa.

8. Prohibio-se em fim aos vice-reys e a todos os officiaes civis e militares de fazerem commercio algum por huma lei que foi promulgada no anno de 1687.

9. O governo da India foi alterado no anno de 1773. Abolio-se o vice-reynado, ficando em capitães generaes. Deu-se uma nova formã à arrecadação da Fazenda, estabelecendo-se hum erario regio, na forma do erario de Lisboa. Abolio-se a inquisição, e o tribunal de relação: ficando a administração da justiça, nas mãos dos ouvidores geraes, com appellação para Lisboa. Mandou-se estabelecer no mesmo estado o mesmo regulamento militar, que se practica em Portugal: e pagar as tropas por conta da coroa em dinheiro; por quanto esta despesa era feita d'antes pelos capitães que exercião monoplios onerosos, pagando aos soldados o sustento e o fardamento por sua conta.

Copy of the king's letters patent, given to the vice-roys, supreme commanders of Portuguese East-India, according to the original kept in the king's office, called Concelho Ultramarino in Lisbon.

"Don N... by the grace of God king of Portugal and Algarves, on this side of the sea, and on that of Africa; lord of Guines, and of the conquest, navigation, and commerce of Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, and India, &c.

"Be it known to all to whom this my letter patent may come, that, attentive to the qualities, merits, and talents of N... I am pleased to name him (as I do hereby) to the office of vice-roy and generalissimo of the sea and land, in the states of India, and dependencies thereon, for the space of three years, and till such time after as I shall appoint another to succeed him; and on account of this government I appoint him a salary of 24,000¹ cruzados, to be paid to him every year according to this my commission: and he shall enjoy all the honours, powers, command, jurisdiction, and authority, which now holds the present vice-roy, and formerly did his predecessors in the same government, and besides whatever further grants I may allow to him as vice-roy, generalissimo, and my locum-tenens immediate to my royal person. On account of which I order the till now vice-roy of India, or whosoever holds in his stead the government of that state, to deliver up to the said N... the same government at his arrival. And moreover I order all the officers of war, of the king's-bench, and of the exchequer, to obey him in every respect, and execute his orders or commands, as their vice-roy and generalissimo: and the lord treasurer or high receiver of the revenue in that state, shall make him payment of the aforesaid salary quarterly, according to this present letter patent, without waiting for any further orders of mine;

¹ Two thousand six hundred and sixty-six pounds sterling.

which payment being registered in the book of the expenses of state, shall be reckoned as one of them. And the said N... shall swear in the high court of my chancery in the accustomed form; an attestation of which shall be taken on the back of this letter patent: and before his departure from shore, he shall swear obedience, and do homage on my royal hands, for the said government of India and its dependencies: and as a test and confirmation of the whole, I have ordered this my letter patent to be passed, which shall be signed by me, and sealed with the great seal of my arms, &c.

“Given at Lisbon, &c.

The King.”

OBSERVATIONS.

1. The vice-roys of India held a supreme jurisdiction, as appears by their letters patent, and were only subject at the end of their government to an inquest on the discharge of their official duty and personal behaviour, which the king always ordered to be made by a civil magistrate. Into this inquest were to be sworn all ranks of the state, the members of the supreme council of the India administration, and those of all the other councils and courts, the king's bench of judges at Goa, the ministers and officers of the India exchequer and king's revenue, as well as all the generals and military officers of the state, without exception to any person soever.

The result of this general inquest was to be sent directly to the king's council at Lisbon: and there to be judged accordingly. But if the new vice-roy, in consequence of any complaints having been made to the king's privy council against his predecessor, had got particular orders from the king, he then could, on finding him guilty by the aforesaid inquest, commit him to prison, and send him under confinement to Lisbon, to be judged by the king's privy council, or by the king himself.

2. There were in India, besides the vice-roy and two secretaries of state, who acted with him as a kind of privy council, the following tribunals in Goa, viz. The inquisition of the affairs of religion: an ecclesiastical or spiritual court, with the bishop at their head, for the affairs which fall under the cognizance of the church: a board of council for the propagation of the Gospel, without any dependence upon the bishop, but only subject to the inspection of the vice-roy, of which council the superior of the Jesuits was president: the king's bench, consisting of a chancellor and a certain number of high judges, named by the king, for the civil affairs, from whom there could be no appeal but to the supreme king's bench of the highjudges at Lisbon: a council or court of the exchequer for the king's revenue: and a kind of a court, [like the common council of London,] but very few in number, for the police of Goa.

3. The vice-roy being, on account of his office, a kind of high chancellor of the state, was in consequence thereof president of the supreme king's bench of high or great judges, and of the court of the exchequer already mentioned: nor could any expense or disbursement be made by this last, without consent and permission signed by himself. He, as a locum-tenens of the king, had an unlimited authority and command over the whole military departments: he conferred all the military commissions in the army, not above those of captains; and even appointed any superior officers, till those offices were filled up by the king's nomination; and, finally, he nominated and gave all other commissions and charges under him, which were not provided by the king. In all criminal cases, both civil and military, the above king's bench of high judges, and the council of war, or court martial, held the decisive authority of life and death: but the vice-roys had the casting-vote, as presidents of both, in case of an equality of votes.

4. Besides the aforesaid civil establishments, the municipal court, under the name of senate of the camera, [which was like the common council of London, though composed of much fewer members] was vested with the same authority and exclusive power, in regard to matters of police, as that of Portugal; it had also the right of addressing and petitioning the vice-roys, and even of applying by common consent, as a civil body, for redress, to the king himself, at Lisbon.

5. On the death of the vice-roy, during his government, the archbishop of Goa, the chancellor of the king's bench or council of justice, and the military officer of highest rank and of oldest commission, were to take the government of the state, and to exercise conjointly all its functions; all three signing together whatever orders they gave.

6. The whole commerce of Asia belonged solely to the king; and was carried on, on account of the crown, in the king's ships. To this end there were established different factories, by the authority, and at the expense of the crown, in all the settlements of Asia, with proper officers and clerks, under the jurisdiction of the vice-roys; who at the end of every three years were to render an account of their management to the India exchequer, by which it was sent to the high council ultramarine at Lisbon in the next monsoon*. This commerce was carried on by fleets, which sailed from India, and deposited their cargoes in the royal warehouses of the East India house at Lisbon; from whence they were sold on behalf of the royal revenue, both to the Portuguese and to foreigners³.

* Monsoon means here the stated times in which the Portuguese India ships used to sail to Lisbon.

7. In course of time the vice-roys obtained leave to trade, on their own account, from India to Portugal; but they were not allowed to exceed a limited and determined portion. Afterwards the same power was extended to many other persons, both of the civil and of the military profession: but this was to be done within great limitations and restrictions. The commerce of precious stones, and pearls of every size, was always excepted. The trade of these, and of pepper, was the exclusive right of the queens of Portugal, as a part of their patrimony⁴. The trade of the other spices, of nitre, sandalot, and that of porcelain, was always reserved to the crown.

8. In fine, the vice-roys of India, and all officers, both civil and military, were prohibited carrying on any kind of commerce between India and Portugal, by a law which was published in the year 1667.

9. The government of the Portuguese East India was lately altered, in the year 1778. The title of vice-roy was abolished, and changed into that of captain-general. A new form of levying the duties and managing the king's revenue was established. A new royal treasury or exchequer was erected, like that of Lisbon, known by the name of royal erarium. The court of inquisition was abolished, as well as the supreme tribunal of the king's bench, the administration of justice being put into the hands of auditors general, from whom there may be an appeal to the high tribunal at Lisbon. The same military regulations, as now practised in Portugal, were extended to India: and the troops were ordered to be paid in ready money, on account of the crown; the pay of the soldiers having formerly passed through the hands of the captains, who exercised considerable monopolies in the management of it, by paying them in provisions and clothes, &c. from their own warehouses.

Ambitious of giving his historical narrative the last confirmation, the translator applied for assistance to some gentlemen, who, on the appearance of the English Lusiad, honoured him with their correspondence. He entreated that, if possible, a copy of the commission of the viceroys might be procured, together with an abstract of the laws and constitution of Portuguese Asia. And the foregoing papers, of which he has given a translation, were remitted to him from the continent. During the Spanish usurpation, the affairs of India fell into the deepest anarchy. When John IV. ascended the throne of Portugal, he endeavoured to restore regularity to the government of his eastern empire; and from the regulations of that monarch and his successors the above noticias were carefully extracted. There is no copy of the viceroy's commission of older date than the beginning of the reign of John IV. the former papers relative to the government of India having probably been removed to Madrid. But the commission itself bears a proof that it was in the usual form; and the regulations of John, which remain upon record, appear, by the testimony of history, to be only a confirmation of the former government of India, with a great diminution of the viceroy's salary, and perhaps some few novel establishments which did not affect the spirit of the constitution. By the latest alterations, it appears that the constitution of Lisbon ever was, and is, the grand model of the government of Portuguese Asia.

* * * Whatever circumstances have a tendency to elucidate the manners and policy of former times, or to give us an accurate idea of the energy and strength of her various governments, when Europe began to emerge from the inactivity of the Gothic ages, are highly worthy of the careful investigation of the philosopher and politician. Roused into action by prince Henry of Portugal, the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth century became the great era of maritime discovery. The three grand expeditions were those of Gama, Columbus, and Magalhaens. And the object of all was the same, the discovery of India. The force of the various fleets which attempted this arduous undertaking will give us an idea of the state of maritime affairs in the reigns when they were fitted out. In 1486, Bartholomew Diaz, a Portuguese captain, with three ships, attempted the discovery of India by the coast of Africa; but, harassed by tempest, his crew routed, and having discovered the river del Infante, on the eastern side of Africa, he returned to Europe. About fourteen years after, this expedition was happily completed by Gama; and the force with which he went out is thus circumstantially described by Hernan Lopez de Castaneda, a cotemporary writer, and careful journalist of facts.

⁴ The queens of Portugal have a kind of patrimony assigned to them by the state: it consists of different cities, towns, and villages, whose duties and customs belong to the queen's household or revenue. They have a secretary of state, with a council of their own, an exchequer for their own revenue: and all the justices of peace, judges, and officers of the queen's state are of her majesty's nomination.

⁵ A kind of red wood, for dyeing with, like the Brazil wood.

"Kamuseel, earnest to prosecute what his predecessor don John had begun for the discovery of India, ordered Fernan Lorenzo, treasurer of the house of the Myna (on the golden coast), to build, with the timber that was bought in king John's time, two ships, which, after they were finished, he named the Angel Gabriel, being of one hundred and twenty tons burden, and the Saint Raphael, of one hundred tons. And to accompany these ships the king bought of a pilot who was born in Lagos, named Berio, a caravel of fifty tons, which bore the name of the Pilot. Beside these, he bought a ship of two hundred tons of one Ayres Correa. . . . The king also appointed Bartholomew Diaz to go along with him in a caravel to the Myna. And because the ships of war could not carry provisions sufficient for the voyage, the king gave orders that the ship of Correa should be laden with provisions, and accompany the fleet to the bay of St. Bias, where it would be necessary to take in fresh water; and the store-ship was to be there unloaded and burnt. The captain-general went in the ship called St. Gabriel, having for pilot one Pedro de Almaguer, who had been pilot to Bartholomew Diaz, when he discovered the river called El ryo del Ynfante. Paulos de Gama, brother of the captain-general, went in the ship called St. Raphael; Nicolaus Cocho went in the caravel named Berio; and Gonsalo Gomez commanded the store-ship." The number of the crews of this squadron, according to Castaneda, was 148 men; according to others 160. Gama and his brother, and the ten manufacturers who were on board, were perhaps not included in Castaneda's account.

The voyage of Columbus has been called the most daring and grand ever attempted by man. Columbus himself, however, seems to have had a very different idea of it; for certain it is, he expected to reach India by the westward passage in the space of not many weeks. The squadron with which he attempted this discovery consisted of only three vessels. Dr. Robertson calls the largest which Columbus commanded, "of no considerable burden;" and the two others, "hardly superior in burden or force to large boats." The crew consisted of ninety men, and a few adventurers. And the expense of fitting out this equipment did not exceed 4000*l* sterling, for which queen Isabella pawned her jewels.

The enterprise of Magalhaens was infinitely more daring than that of Columbus. India and the continent of America were now both discovered, and now known to be at vast distances from each other. To find a route to India beyond the great American continent was the bold design of Magalhaens; which he attempted, according to Faria, with 250 men and five ships; which, with respect to its purpose, Dr. Robertson calls, "a proper squadron."

When Gama sailed from Lisbon, it was unknown that a great and potent commonwealth of Mohammedan merchants, deeply skilled in all the arts and views of commerce, were scattered over the eastern world. Gama, therefore, did not sail to India with a warlike fleet, like that which first followed him under Cabral, but with a squadron every way proper for discovery. The Portuguese historians describe the shipwreck of many Portuguese vessels on the voyage between Europe and India to the avarice of their owners, in building them of an enormous bulk, of 4, 5, and 600 tons. The fleet of Gama was therefore not only of the most perfect size which the art of ship-building could then produce, but was also superior in number, and nearly of the draught of water with the vessels which at this day are sent out on voyages of discovery*. The disposition of Gama's voyage is also worthy of notice: the captain who had already passed the great southern promontory of Africa, to accompany him to a certain latitude; the pilot who had sailed with that captain, to go the whole voyage; the size of Coello's caravel, proper to enter creeks and rivers; and the appointment of the store-ship; are circumstances which display a knowledge of and attention to maritime affairs, greatly superior to any thing discovered by the court of Spain in the equipments of Columbus and Magalhaens. The warlike strength of Gama's fleet was greatly superior to that of the first voyage of Columbus, and little inferior to that of Magalhaens; though Magalhaens, who had been in India, well knew the hostile disposition of the natives. In the art of war the Indians were greatly inferior to the Moors, and the Moors were as inferior to the Portuguese. And the squadron of Gama not only defeated the whole naval force of the first maritime state of India, but in every attack was victorious over the superior numbers of the Moors. These circumstances are clearly evinced in our history of the discovery of India; and this comparative discussion will not only give an accurate idea of the progress which the Portuguese had made in navigation, but is also, perhaps, necessary in support of the reputation of this work. Had an author of ordinary rank represented the squadron of Gama as "extremely feeble, consisting only of three vessels, of neither burden nor force adequate to the service"—such condemnation of our narrative had been here unnoticed. But when a celebrated and justly admired historian, in a work published about one year and a half after the first appearance of the Lusiad, has given such representation of the equipment of Gama, directly contrary to the light in which it is there placed, the foregoing detail will not appear, it is hoped, an unnecessary or rude vindication. We have followed the ample and circumstantial accounts of the Portuguese writers, and not the imperfect and cursory abstracts of the Spanish historians when they allude to the affairs of their sister kingdom.

•• To our former accounts of Portuguese literature let the following be added:—In 1741, an heroic poem was published in Portuguese by the count de Ericeyra. It is named Henriqueida, and celebrates the establishment of the kingdom of Portugal. Though it has some extravagancies, it contains an ardent spirit of true poetry. And in the preface and notes the author has given many judicious criticisms, and by his opinion of Milton discovers a strength of mind greatly superior to that frivolousness, and poverty of taste, which the French generally betray, when they criticise the works of that great poet. The translator has been favoured with the following account of this noble author by a learned and ingenious gentleman of Portugal; for whose favours he here returns his acknowledgments.

"Dom Francisco Xavier de Menezes, fourth count of Ericeyra, was one of the most learned men of this age, and a great ornament to Portugal; he was born at Lisbon the 29th of January, 1673, and died in the same city the 21st of December, 1743. To the qualities of a soldier, a politician, a philosopher, a mathematician, an historian, and a poet, he joined that of a man of honour and probity. He was director and censor of the Royal Academy of Portuguese History; he spoke the Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish languages with as much ease and elegance as his own, and wrote in them all with accuracy. Although he never went out of Portugal, he was known and admired in all Europe, and obtained the esteem and the praises of pope Innocent XIII. and Lewis XIV. of France, as well as some of the most eminent men of that age, such as Muratori, Bianchini, Crescimbeni, Dumont, Galletti, Le Clerc, Bayle, Despreaux, Renardot, Bignon, Salazar, Feijoo, Mayans, &c. With all these he appears to have kept a literary correspondence; was member of the Arcadian Academy of Italy, and of the Royal Society of London, and much respected by the Russian Academy. He composed a great number of excellent pieces in prose and verse, many of which have been published."

BOOK I.

And the heroes, who from Lisbon's shore,

¹ In the original, Os Lusíadas, The Lusiads, derived from Lusus or Lysas, the companion of Bacchus in his travels, and who settled a colony in Lusitania. See Plin. l. iii. c. 1.

² M. Duperron de Casters, the French translator of the Lusiad, has given a long note on this passage, which, he tells us, must not be understood literally. His arguments are these: Our author, says he, could not be ignorant that the African and Indian oceans had been navigated before the times of the Portuguese. The Phœnicians, whose fleets passed the straits of Gibraltar, made frequent voyages in these seas, though they carefully concealed the course of their navigation, that other nations might not become partakers of their lucrative traffic. It is certain that Solomon, and Hiram king of Tyre, sent ships to the east by the Red Sea. It is also certain that Hanno, a Carthaginian captain, made a voyage round the whole coast of Africa, as is evident from the history of the expedition, written by himself in the Punic language, a Greek translation of which is now extant. Besides, Pliny, Pomponius Mela, Ptolemy, and Strabo assure us, that Mozambique and the adjacent islands, and some parts of India, were known to the Romans: and these words of Macrobius,—Sed nec monstruosis carnibus abstinētis, inserentes poculis testiculos castorum et venenata corpora viperarum; quibus admiscetis quidquid India nutrit—sufficiently prove that they carried on a considerable traffic with the east. From all which, says M. Casters, we may conclude that the Portuguese were rather the restorers than the discoverers of the navigation to the Indies.

In this first book, and throughout the whole poem, Camoëns frequently describes his heroes as passing through seas which had never before been navigated; and

Que só dos foyos focas se navega.

Where but sea-monsters cut the waves before.

Beyond where Ceylon lifts her spicy breast,
And waves her woods above the watery waste,

That this supposition afforded our author a number of poetical images, and adds a solemn grandeur to his subject, might perhaps with M. Casters be esteemed a sufficient apology for the poetical license in such a violation of historical truth. Yet whatever liberties an epic or tragic poet may commendably take in embellishing the actions of his heroes, an assertion relative to the scene where his poem opens, if false, must be equally ridiculous as to call Vespasian the first who had ever assumed the title of Cæsar. But it will be found that Camoëns has not fallen into such absurdity. The poem opens with a description of the Lusitanian fleet, after having doubled the Cape of Good Hope, driving about in the great Ethiopian ocean so far from land that it required the care of the gods to conduct it to some hospitable shore. Therefore, though it is certain that the Phœnicians passed the Ne plus ultra of the ancients; though it is probable they traded on the coast of Cornwall, and the isles of Scilly; though there is some reason to believe that the Madeiras and Carribees were known to them; and though it has been supposed that some of their ships might have been driven by storm to the Brazils or North America; yet there is not the least foundation in history to suppose that they traded to the Indies by the Cape of Good Hope. There is rather a demonstration of the contrary; for it is certain they carried on their traffic with the east by a much nearer and safer way, by the two ports of Eloth and Eziongeber on the Red Sea. Neither is it certainly known in what particular part, whether in the Persian gulf, or in the Indian ocean, the Tarshish and Ophir of the ancients are situated. Though it is certain that Hanno doubled the Cape of Good Hope, it is also equally certain that his voyage was merely a coasting one, like that of Nearchus in Alexander's time, and that he never ventured into the great ocean, or went so far as Garna. The citation from Macrobius proves nothing at all relative to the point in question; for it is certain that the Romans received the merchandise of India by the way of Syria and the Mediterranean, in the same manner as the Venetians imported the commodities of the east from Alexandria before the discoveries of the Portuguese. It remains, therefore, that Gama, who sailed by the compass, after having gone farther than his contemporary Bartholomew Diaz, was literally the first who ever spread sail in the great southern ocean, and that the Portuguese were not the restorers, but literally the discoverers of the present route of navigation to the East Indies.

³ "He interweaves artfully the history of Portugal."—Voltaire.

⁴ In no period of history does human nature appear with more shocking features than in the Spanish conquest of South America. To the immortal honour of the first Portuguese discoverers, their conduct was in every respect the reverse. To establish a traffic equally advantageous to the natives as to themselves was the principle they professed, and the strictest honour, and that humanity which is ever inseparable from true bravery, presided over their transactions. Nor did they ever proceed to hostilities till provoked, either by the open violence or by the perfidy of the natives. Their honour was admired, and their friendship courted by the Indian princes. To mention no more, the name of Gama was dear to them, and the great Albuquerque was beloved as a father, and his memory honoured with every token of affection and respect by the people and princes of India. It was owing to this spirit of honour and humanity, which in the heroic days of Portugal characterized that nation, that the religion of the Portuguese was eagerly embraced by many kings and provinces of Africa and India; while the Mexicans with manly disdain rejected the faith of the Spaniards, professing they would rather go to Hell to escape these cruel tyrants, than go to Heaven, where they were told they should meet them. Zeal for the Christian religion was esteem'd, at the time of the Portuguese grandeur, as the most cardinal virtue; and to propagate Christianity and extirpate Mohauism were the most certain proofs of that zeal. In all their expeditions this was profess'd a principal motive of the Lusitanian monarchs; and Camoens understood the nature of epic poetry too well to omit, that the design of his hero was to deliver the law of Heaven to the eastern world; a circumstance which gives a noble air of importance and of interest to the business of his poem.

No more the Trojan's wandering voyage boast,
 What storms he brav'd on many a per'ous coast:
 No more let Rome exult in Trajan's name,
 Nor eastern conquests Ammor's pride proclaim;
 A nobler hero's deeds demand my lays
 Than e'er adorn'd the song of ancient days;
 Illustrious Gama, whom the waves obey'd,
 And whose dread sword the fate of empire wagg'd.

 While you have lister'd, and by moonshine seen
 My footsteps wander o'er your banks of green,
 O come auspicious, and the song inspire
 With all the boldness of your hero's fire:
 Deep and majestic let the numbers flow,
 And, rapt to Heaven, with ardent fury glow;
 Unlike the verse that speaks the lover's grief,
 When heaving sighs afford their soft relief,
 And humble reeds bewail the shepherd's pain:
 But like the warlike trumpet be the strain 40
 To rouse the hero's ire; and far around,
 With equal rage, your warriors' deeds resound.
 And thou, O born the pledge of happier days,
 To guard our freedom and our glories raise,

⁵ King Sebastian, who came to the throne in his minority. Though the warm imagination of Camoens anticipated the praises of the future hero, the young monarch, like Virgil's Poëlio, had not the happiness to fulfil the prophecy. His endowments and enterprising genius promised indeed a glorious reign. Ambitious of military laurels, he led a powerful army into Africa, on purpose to replace Muley Hamet on the throne of Morocco, from which he had been deposed by Muley Mollucco. On the 4th of August 1578, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, he gave battle to the usurper on the plains of Alcazar. This was that memorable engagement, to which the Moorish emperor, extremely weakened by sickness, was carried in his litter. By the impetuosity of the attack, the first line of the Moorish infantry was broken, and the second disordered. Muley Mollucco on this mounted his horse, drew his sabre, and would have put himself at the head of his troops, but was prevented by his attendants. On this act of violence, his emotion of mind was so great that he fell from his horse, and one of his guards having caught him in his arms, conveyed him to his litter, where, putting his fingers on his lips to enjoin them silence, he immediately expired. Hamet Taba stood by the curtains of the carriage, opened them from time to time, and gave out orders as if he had received them from the emperor. Victory declared for the Moors, and the defeat of the Portuguese was so total, that not above fifty of their whole army escaped. Hieron de Mendoga and Sebastian de Mesa relate, that Don Sebastian, after having two horses killed under him, was surrounded and taken: but the party who had secured him quarrelling among themselves whose prisoner he was, a Moorish officer rode up and struck the king a blow over the right eye, which brought him to the ground, when despairing of ransom, the others killed him. Faria y Sousa, an exact and judicious historian, reports, that Lewis de Brito meeting the king with the royal standard wrapped round him, Sebastian cried out, "Hold it fast, let us die upon it." Brito affirmed that after he himself was Given to the world to spread religion's ray,

And pour o'er many a land the mental day,

taken prisoner, he saw the king at a distance unpursued. Don Lewis de Lima afterwards met him making towards the river: and this, says the historian, was the last time he was ever seen alive. About twenty years after this fatal defeat there appeared a stranger at Venice, who called himself Sebastian king of Portugal. His person so perfectly resembled Sebastian, that the Portuguese of that city acknowledged him for their sovereign. Philip II. of Spain was now master of the crown and kingdom of Portugal. His ambassador at Venice charged this stranger with many atrocious crimes, and had interest to get him apprehended and thrown into prison as an impostor. He underwent twenty-eight examinations before a committee of the nobles, in which he clearly acquitted himself of all the crimes that had been laid to his charge; and he gave a distinct account of the manner in which he had passed his time from the fatal defeat at Alcazar. It was objected, that the successor of Muley Molucco sent a corpse to Portugal which had been owned as that of the king by the Portuguese nobility who survived the battle. To this he replied, that his valet-de-chambre had produced that body to facilitate his escape, and that the nobility acted upon the same motive: and Meas and Baena confess that some of the nobility, after their return to Portugal, acknowledged that the corpse was so disfigured with wounds that it was impossible to know it. He showed natural marks on his body, which many remembered on the person of the king whose name he assumed. He entered into a minute detail of the transactions that had passed between himself and the republic, and mentioned the secrets of several conversations with the Venetian ambassadors in the palace of Lisbon. The committee were astonished, and showed no disposition to declare him an impostor; the senate however refused to discuss the great point, unless requested by some prince or state in alliance with them. This generous part was performed by the prince of Orange, and an examination was made with great solemnity, but no decision followed, only the senate set him at liberty, and ordered him to depart their dominions in three days. In his flight he fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who conducted him to Naples, where they treated him with the most barbarous indignities. After they had often exposed him, mounted on an ass, to the cruel insults of the brutal mob, he was shipped on board a galley as a slave. He was then carried to St. Lucar, from thence to a castle in the heart of Camille, and never was heard of more. The firmness of his behaviour, his singular modesty and heroic patience, are mentioned with admiration by Le Ciede. To the last he maintained the truth of his assertions:—a word never alipt from his lips which might countenance the charge of imposture, or justify the cruelty of his persecutors. All Europe was astonished at the ministry of Spain, who, by their method of conducting it, had made an affair as little to their credit, the topic of general conversation; and their assertion, that the unhappy sufferer was a magician, was looked upon as a tacit acknowledgment of the truth of his pretensions.

Thy future honours on thy shield behold,
The cross, and victor's wreath, emboss in gold:
At thy commanding frown we trust to see
The Turk and Arab bend the suppliant knee: 50
Beneath the morn, dread king, thine empire lies⁶,
When midnight veils thy Lusitanian skies;
And when descending in the western main
The Sun still rises on thy lengthening reign⁷:
Thou blooming scion of the noblest stem,
Our nation's safety, and our age's gem,—
O young Sebastian, hasten to the prime
Of manly youth, to Fame's high temple climb:
Yet now attentive hear the Muse's lay
While thy green years to manhood speed away: 60
The youthful terrors of thy brow suspend,
And, O propitious, to the song attend,
The numerous song, by patriot-passion fir'd,
And by the glories of thy race inspir'd:
To be the herald of my country's fame,
My first ambition and my dearest aim:
Nor conquests fabulous, nor actions vain,
The Muse's pastime, here adorns the strain:
Orlando's fury, and Roger's rage,
And all the heroes of the Aonian page, 70
The dreams of bards surpass'd the world shall view,
And own their boldest fictions may be true;
Surpass'd and dimm'd by the superior blaze
Of Game's mighty deeds, which here bright Truth displays.
Nor more let History boast her heroes old;
Their glorious rivals here, dread prince, behold:
Here shine the valient Nuncio's deeds unfeign'd,
Whose single arm the falling state sustain'd;
Here fearless Egas' wars, and, Feus, thine,
To give full ardour to the song combine; 80
But arduous equal to your martial ire
Demands the thundering sounds of Homer's lyre.
To match the twelve so long by bards renown'd⁸,
Here brave Magricio and his peers are crown'd⁹,
(A glorious twelve!) with deathless laurels, won
In gallant arms before the English throne.

⁶ When we consider the glorious successes which had attended the arms of the Portuguese in Africa and India, and the high reputation of their military and naval prowess, for Portugal was then empress of the ocean, it is no matter of wonder that the imagination of Camoens was warmed with the view of his country's greatness, and that he talks of its power and grandeur in a strain, which must appear as mere hyperbole to those whose ideas of Portugal are drawn from its present broken spirit and diminished state.

⁷ Imitated perhaps from Rutilius, speaking of the Roman empire,

Volvitur ipse tibi, qui compicit omnia, Phœbus,
Atque tuis ortus in tua condit equos;

or more probably from these lines of Buchanan, addressed to John III. king of Portugal, the grandfather of Sebastian,

Inque tuis Phœbus regnis oriensque cadensque
Vix longam fesso conderet axe diem.
Et quœcumque vago se circumvolvit Olympe
Affugit ratibus flammæ ministra tuis.

Unwatch'd no more the Gallic Charles shall stand,
 Or Cæsar's name the first of praise command:
 Of nobler acts the crown'd Alonzos see,

 Of vanquish'd Afric bow'd. Nor less in fame,
 He who confin'd the rage of civil flame,
 The godlike John, beneath whose awful sword
 Rebellion crouch'd and trembling own'd him lord.
 Those heroes too, who thy bold flag unsur'd,
 And spread thy banners o'er the eastern world,
 Whose spears subdued the kingdoms of the morn,
 Their names and glorious wars the song adorn;
 The daring Gama, whose unequal'd name
 Proud monarch shines o'er all of naval fame: 100
 Castro the bold, in arms a peerless knight,
 And stern Pacheco, dreadful in the fight:
 The two Almeidas, names for ever dear,
 By Tago's nymphs embalm'd with many a tear;
 Ah, still their early fate the nymphs shall mourn,
 And bathe with many a tear their hapless urn:
 Nor shall the godlike Albuquerque restrain
 The Muse's fury; o'er the purpled plain
 The Muse shall lead him in his thundering car
 Amidst his glorious brothers of the war, 110
 Whose fame in arms resounds from sky to sky,
 And bids their deeds the power of death defy.
 And while to thee I tune the dutious lay,
 Assume, O potent king! thine empire's sway;
 With thy brave host through Afric march along,
 And give new triumphs to immortal song:
 On thee with earnest eyes the nations wait,
 And cold with dread the Moor expects his fate;
 The barbarous mountaineer on Taurus' brows
 To thy expected yoke his shoulder bows; 120
 Fair Thetis woos thee with her blue domain,
 Her nuptial son, and fondly yields her reign;
 And from the bowers of Heaven thy gradisaires* see
 Their various virtues bloom afresh in thee;
 One for the joyful days of peace renown'd,
 And one with war's triumphant laurels crown'd:
 With joyful hands to deck thy manly brow,
 They twine the laurel and the olive-bough;
 With joyful eyes a glorious throne they see,
 In Fame's eternal dome, reserv'd for thee. 130
 Yet while thy youthful hand delays to wield
 The sceptre'd power, or thunder of the field,
 Here view thine Argonauts, in seas unknown,
 And all the terrors of the burning zone,
 Till their proud standards, rear'd in other skies,
 And all their conquests meet thy wondering eyes¹¹.

¹¹ Some critics have condemned Virgil for stopping his narrative to introduce even a short observation of his own. Milton's beautiful complaint of his blindness has been blamed for the same reason, as being no part of the subject of his poem. The address of Camoëns to dux Sebastian has not escaped the same censure; though in some measure undervalued, as the poet has had the art to interweave therein some part of the general argument of his poem.

Now far from land, o'er Neptune's dread abode,
 The Lusitanian fleet triumphant rode;
 Onward they trac'd the wide and lonesome main,
 Where changeful Proteus leads his scaly train; 140
 The dancing vanes before the zephyrs flow'd,
 And their bold keels the trackless ocean plough'd;
 Unplough'd before the green-tinged billows rose,
 And curl'd and whiten'd round the nodding prow.
 When Jove, the god who with a thought controls
 The raging seas, and balances the poles,
 From Heav'n beheld, and will'd in sovereign state,
 To fix the eastern world's depending fate:
 Swift at his nod th' Olympian herald flies,
 And calls th' immortal senate of the skies; 150
 Where, from the sov'reign throne of Earth and
 Th' immutable decrees of Fate are giv'n. [Heaven,
 Instant the regents of the spheres of light,
 And those who rule the pæler orbs of night,
 With those, the gods whose delegated sway
 The burning South and frozen North obey;
 And they whose empires see the day-star rise,
 And evening Phœbus leave the western skies;
 All instant pour'd along the milky road,
 Heaven's crystal pavements glittering as they trode:
 And now, obedient to the dread command, 161
 Before their awful lord in order stand.

Sublime and dreadful on his regal throne,
 That glow'd with stars, and bright as lightning shone,
 Th' immortal sire, who darts the thunder, sat,
 The crown and sceptre added solemn state; [rays
 The crown, of Heaven's own pearls, whose ardent

His breath such gales of vital fragrance shed,
 As might, with sudden life, inspire the dead: 170

 Appear'd, and mark'd the monarch of the skies.
 On seats that burn'd with pearl and ruddy gold,
 The subject gods their sovereign lord ensold,

 The towers of Heaven, the world's dread ruler spok'

 The Fates' decree, and ancient warlike fame 181
 Of that bold race which boasts of Lusus' name;
 That bold adventurous race, the Fates declare,
 A potent empire in the east shall rear,
 Surpassing Babel's or the Persian fame,
 Proud Græcia's boast, or Rome's illustrious name.
 Oft from these brilliant seats have you beheld
 The sons of Lusus on the dusty field,
 Though few, triumphant o'er the numerous Moors,
 Till from the beautiful laws on Tago's shores 190
 They drove the cruel foe. And oft has Heaven
 Before their troops the proud Castilians driven;
 While Victory her eagle-wings display'd
 Where'er their warriors wave the shining blade.
 Nor resta unknown how Lusus' heroes stood
 When Rome's ambition dyed the world with blood;
 What glorious laurels Viriatus¹² gain'd,
 How oft his sword with Roman gore was stain'd;

 Beyond their conquests on the southmost bay
 Of Afric's swarthy coast, on floating wood
 They brave the terrors of the dreary flood,
 Where only black-wing'd mists have hover'd o'er,
 Or driving clouds have sail'd the wave before;
 Beneath new skies they hold their dreadful way
 To reach the cradle of the new-born day: 310

shake off the yoke. Being appointed general, he defeated Vetilius the pretor, who commanded in Lusitania, or further Spain. After this he defeated, in three pitched battles, the pretors C. Plautius Hypsæus, and Claudius Unimanus, though they led against him very numerous armies. For six years he continued victorious, putting the Romans to flight wherever he met them, and laying waste the countries of their allies. Having obtained such advantages over the proconsul Servilius, that the only choice which was left to the Roman army was death or slavery; the brave Viriatus, instead of putting them all to the sword, as he could easily have done, sent a deputation to the general, offering to conclude a peace with him on this single condition, that he should continue master of the country now in his power, and that the Romans should remain possessed of the rest of Spain.

The proconsul, who expected nothing but death or slavery, thought these very favourable and moderate terms, and without hesitation concluded a peace, which was soon after ratified by the Roman senate and people. Viriatus, by this treaty, completed the glorious design he had always in view, which was to erect a kingdom in the vast country he had conquered from the Republic. And had it not been for the treachery of the Romans, he would have become, as Florus calls him, the Romulus of Spain: he would have founded a monarchy capable of counterbalancing the power of Rome.

The Senate, still desirous to revenge their late defeat, soon after this peace ordered Q. Servilius Cæpio to exasperate Viriatus, and force him by repeated affronts to commit the first acts of hostility. But this mean artifice did not succeed. Viriatus would not be provoked to a breach of the peace. On this the conscript fathers, to the eternal disgrace of their republic, ordered Cæpio to declare war, and to proclaim Viriatus, who had given no provocation, an enemy to Rome. To this baseless Cæpio added still a greater; he corrupted the ambassadors which Viriatus had sent to negotiate with him, who, at the instigation of the Roman, treacherously murdered their protector and general while he slept.—Univ. But now, the tedious length of winter past, Distress'd and weak, the heroes faint at last.
 What gulfs they dar'd, you saw, what storms they brav'd,

Beneath what various heavens their banners wav'd
 Now Mercy pleads, and soon the rising land
 To their glad eyes shall o'er the waves expand. 320
 As welcome friends the natives shall receive,
 With bounty feast them, and with joy relieve.
 And when refreshment shall their strength renew,
 Thence shall they turn, and their bold route pursue.¹⁴

So spoke high Jove: the gods in silence heard,
 Then, rising, each, by turns, his thoughts preferr'd:
 But chief was Bacchus of the adverse train¹⁵;
 Fearful he was, nor fear'd his pride in vain,
 Should Lusus' race arrive on India's shore,
 His ancient honours would be known no more; 330
 No more in Nyæ¹⁶ should the native tell
 What kings, what mighty hosts before him fell,
 The fertile vales beneath the rising Sun
 He view'd as his, by right of victory won,
 And deem'd that ever in immortal song
 The conqueror's title should to him belong.
 Yet Fate, he knew, had will'd, that, loos'd from Spain,
 Boldly adventurous through the polar main,
 A warlike race should come, renown'd in arms,
 And shake the eastern world with war's alarms,
 Whose glorious conquest and eternal fame 341
 In black oblivion's waves should whelm his name.

Urania-Venus¹⁷, queen of sacred love,
 Arose, and fix'd her asking eyes on Jove:
 Her eyes, well pleas'd, in Lusus' sons could trace
 A kindred likeness to the Roman race,
 For whom of old such kind regard she bore¹⁸;
 The same their triumphs on Barbaria's shore,
 The same the ardour of their warlike flame,
 The manly music of their tongue¹⁹ the same. 350

¹⁴ The French translator has the following note on this place: Le Camoëns n'a pourtant fait en cela que suivre l'exemple de l'Ecriture, comme on le voit dans ces paroles du premier chapitre de Job. Quidam autem die cum venissent, &c. Un jour que les enfans du Seigneur s'étoient assemblés devant son trône, Satan y vint aussi, &c.

¹⁶ We have already observed, that an allegorical machinery has always been esteemed an essential requisite of the epopœia, and the reason upon which it is founded has been pointed out. The allegorical machinery of the Lusiad has now commenced; and throughout the poem the hero is guarded and conducted by the Celestial Venus, or Divine Love. The true poetical colouring is thus supported and preserved: but in illustration of this, see the Preface, and the note on the allegory of Homer, near the end of the Sixth Lusiad.

Affection thus the lovely goddess sway'd,
Nor less what Fate's unblotted page display'd;
Where'er this people should their empire raise,
She knew her altars would unnumber'd blaze,
And barbarous nations at her holy shrines
Be humaniz'd, and taught her love divine.
Her spreading honours thus the one inspir'd,
And one the dread to lose his worship fir'd.
Their struggling factions shook th' Olympian state
With all the clamorous tempest of debate. 260
Thus when the storm with sudden gust invades
The ancient forest's deep and lofty shades,
The bursting whirlwinds tear their rapid course,
The shatter'd oaks crash, and with echoes hoarse
The mountains groan, while whirling on the blast
The thickening leaves a gloomy darkness cast.
Such was the tumult in the blest abodes,
When Mars, high towering o'er the rival gods,
Stepp'd forth; stern sparkles from his eye-balls
glanc'd;

And now, before the throne of Jove advanc'd, 270
O'er his left shoulder his broad shield he throws,
And lifts his helm above his dreadful brows:
Bold and enrag'd he stands, and, frowning round,
Strikes his tall spear-staff on the sounding ground;
Heaven trembled, and the light turn'd pale¹⁸—Such
His fierce demeanour o'er Olympus spread: [dread
When thus the warrior,—“O eternal sire,
Thine is the sceptre, thine the thunder's fire,
Supreme dominion thine; then, father, hear. 279
Shall that bold race which once to thee was dear,
Who, now fulfilling thy decrees of old, [hold,
Through these wild waves their fearless journey
Shall that bold race no more thy care engage,
But sink the victims of unballow'd rage!
Did Bacchus yield to reason's voice divine,
Bacchus the cause of Lusus' sons would join;
Lusus, the lov'd companion of his cares,
His early toils, his dangers, and his wars:
But envy still a foe to worth will prove,
To worth though guarded by the arm of Jove. 280

“Then thou, dread lord of fate, unmov'd remain,
Nor let weak change thine awful counsels stain,
For Lusus' race thy promis'd favour show:
Swift as the arrow from Apollo's bow
Let Maia's son explore the watery way,
Where spent with toil, with weary hopes, they stray;
And safe to harbour, through the deep untried,
Let him, impower'd, their wandering vessels guide;
There let them hear of India's wish'd-for shore,
And balmy rest their fainting strength restore.” 300
He spoke: high Jove assenting bow'd the head,
And floating clouds of nectar'd fragrance shed:
Then lowly bending to th' eternal sire,
Each in his dutious rank, the gods retire. [weigh'd, Whilst thus in Heaven's bright palace fate was Right onward still the brave armada stray'd:
Right on they steer by Ethiopia's strand
And pastoral Madagascar's¹⁹ verdant land.

¹⁸ The thought in the original has something in it wildly great, though it is not expressed in the happiest manner of Camoëns,

O Ceo tremeo, e Apollo detornado
Hum pouco a luz perdeo, como infado.

¹⁹ Called by the ancient geographers Menuthis, and Cerna Ethiopia; by the natives, the Island of the Moon; and by the Portuguese, the Isle of St. Laurence, on whose festival they discovered it.

Before the balmy gales of cheerful spring, [wing;
With Heav'n's their friend, they spread the canvass
The sky cerulean, and the breathing air, 311

Behind them now the caps of Præse bend,
Another ocean to their view extends,
Where black-top'd islands, to their longing eyes,
Lav'd by the gentle waves²¹, in prospect rise.
But Gæus (captain of the vent'rous band,
Of bold emprise, and born for high command,
Whose martial fires, with prudence close allied,
Ensurd the smiles of fortune on his side) [pear'd,
Bears off those shores which waste and wild ap-
And eastward still for happier climates steer'd: 322
When gathering round and blackening o'er the tide,
A fleet of small canoes the pilot spied;
Hoisting their sails of palm-tree leaves, inwove
With curious art, a swarming crowd they move:
Long were their boats, and sharp to bound along
Through the dash'd waters, broad their oars and
The bending towers on their features bore [strong;
The swarthy marks of Phætoe's²² fall of yore, 330
When flaming lightnings scorch'd the banks of Po,
And nations blacken'd in the dread o'erthrow.
Their garb, discover'd as approaching nigh,
Was cotton, strip'd with many a gaudy dye:
‘T was one whole piece; beneath one arm, confin'd;
The rest hung loose and flutter'd on the wind;
All, but one breast, above the loins was bare,
And swelling turbans bound their jetty hair:
Their arms were bearded darts and falchions broad,
And warlike music sounded as they row'd. 340
With joy the sailors saw the boats draw near,
With joy beheld the human face appear: [plore,
What nations these, their wondering thoughts en-
What rites they follow, and what god adore.
And now with hands and kerchiefs wav'd in air
The barb'rous race their friendly mind declare.
Glad were the crew, and wou'd that happy day
Should end their dangers and their toils repay.
The lofty masts the simple youths ascend,
The ropes they haul, and o'er the yard-arms bend;
And now their bowsprit pointing to the shore, 351

Neptune diaccio'd new isles which he did play
About, and with his billows danco't the bay.

Virg. Æn. x. l. 189.

The historical foundation of the fable of Phætoe is this: Phætoe was a young enterprising prince of Libya. Crossing the Mediterranean in quest of adventures, he landed at Epirus, from whence he went to Italy to see his intimate friend Cyncus. Phætoe was skilled in astrology, from whence he arrogated to himself the title of the son of Apollo. One day in the heat of summer, as he was riding along the banks of the Po, his horses took fright at a clap of thunder, and plunged into the river, where, together with their master, they perished. Cyncus, who was a poet, celebrated the death of his friend in verse, from whence the fable.

Vid. Plutar. in Vit. Pyrr.

With cheerful shouts they furl the gather'd sail,
 That less and less flaps quivering on the gale;
 The prows, their speed stopp'd, o'er the surges nod,
 The falling anchors dash the foaming flood:
 When sudden as they stopp'd, the swarthy race
 With smiles of friendly welcome on each face,
 The ship's high sides swift by the oarage climb:
 Illustrious Games, with an air sublime, 360
 Soften'd by mild humanity, receive,
 And to their chief the band of friendship gives;
 Bids spread the board, and, instant as he said,
 Along the deck the festive board is spread:
 The sparkling wine in crystal goblets flows,
 And round and round with cheerful welcome flows.
 While thus the wine its sprightly glee inspires,
 From whence the fleet, the swarthy chief inquires;
 What seas they pass'd, what vantage would attain,
 And what the shore their purpose hop'd to gain?
 "From furthest west," the Lusian race reply, 371
 "To teach the golden eastern shores we try.
 Through that unbounded sea whose billows roll
 From the cold northern to the southern pole;
 And by the wide extent, the dreary vast
 Of Afric's bays, already have we past;
 And many a sky have seen, and many a shore,
 Where but sea-monsters cut the waves before.
 To spread the glories of our monarch's reign,
 For India's shore we brave the trackless main, 380
 Our glorious toil, and at his nod would brave
 The dismal gulfs of Acheron's black wave.
 And now, in turn, your race, your country tell,
 If on your lips fair truth delights to dwell;
 To us, unconscious of the falsehood, show,
 What of these seas and India's site you know."
 "Rude are the natives here," the Moor replied,
 "Dark are their minds, and brute-desire their guide:
 But we, of alien blood and strangers here,
 Nor hold their customs nor their laws reverse. 390
 From Abram's race our holy prophet²² sprung,
 An angel taught, and Heaven inspir'd his tongue;
 His sacred rites and mandates we obey,
 And distant empires own his holy sway.
 From isle to isle our trading vessels roam,
 Mozambique's harbour our commodious home.
 If then your sails for India's shores expand,
 For sultry Ganges or Hydaspes' strand,
 Here shall you find the pilot skill'd to guide
 Through all the dangers of the perilous tide, 400
 Though wide-spread shelves and cruel rocks unseem,
 Lark in the way, and whirlpools rage between.
 Accept, mean while, what fruits these islands hold,
 And to the regent let your wish be told.
 Then may your mates the needful stores provide,
 And all your various wants be here supplied."

So spoke the Moor, and bearing smiles untrue,
 And signs of friendship, with his bands withdrew.
 O'erpower'd with joy unhop'd the sailors stood,
 To find such kindness on a shore so rude. 410
 Now, shooting o'er the flood his fervid blaze,
 The red-brow'd Sun withdraws his beamy rays;
 Safe in the bay the crew forget their cares,
 And peaceful rest their wearied strength repairs.
 Calm Twilight²³ now his drowsy mantle spreads,
 And shade on shade the gloom still deepening sheds.

²² Mohammed, who was descended from Ishmael, the son of Abraham by Hagar.

²³ Camoëns, in this passage, has imitated Homer in the manner of Virgil: by diversifying the

The Moon, full-orb'd, forsakes her watery cave,
 And lifts her lovely head above the wave.
 The snowy splendours of her modest ray [play:
 Stream o'er the glistening waves, and quivering
 Around her, glittering on the Heaven's arch'd brow,
 Unnumber'd stars, enclos'd in azure glow, 422
 Thick as the dew-drops of the April dawn,
 Or May-flowers crowding o'er the daisy-law:
 The canvass whitens in the silvery beam,
 And with a mild pale red the pendants gleam:
 The mast's tall shadows tremble o'er the deep;
 The peaceful winds a holy silence keep;
 The watchman's carol, echo'd from the prow,
 Alone, at times, awakes the still repose. 430

Aurora now, with dewy lustre bright,
 Appears ascending on the rear of night,
 With gentle head, as seeming off to pause,
 The purple curtains of the morn she draws;
 The Sun comes forth, and soon the joyful crew,
 Each aiding each, their joyful tasks pursue.
 Wide o'er the decks the spreading sails they throw;
 From each tall mast the waving streamers flow;
 All seems a festive holiday on board
 To welcome to the fleet the island's lord. 440
 With equal joy the regent sails to meet,
 And brings fresh cates, his offerings, to the fleet:
 For of his kindred race their line he deems,
 That savage race who rush'd from Caspia's streams,
 And triumph'd o'er the east, and, Asia won,
 In proud Byzantium fix'd their haughty throne.
 Brave Vasco hails the chief with honest smiles,
 And gift for gift with liberal hand he piles.
 His gifts, the boat of Europe's arts disclose,
 And sparkling red the wine of Tagus flows. 450
 High on the shrouds the wondering sailors hung,
 To note the Moorish garb and barbarous tongue:
 Nor less the subtle Moor, with wonder fired,
 Their mien, their dress, and lordly ships admired:
 Much he inquires, their king's, their country's name,
 And, if from Turkey's fertile shores they came:
 What God they worshipp'd, what their sacred lore,
 What arms they wielded, and what armour wore.
 To whom brave Gama: "Nor of Hagar's blood scene he has made the description his own. The passage alluded to is in the Eighth Iliad:

ὅς τ' ἴσ' ἵς ἕσπερ' ἄστρα φασσὶν ἀπὸν οὐρανὸν φασσὶν ἀσπερίαν, &c.

Thus elegantly translated by Pope:

As when the Moon, refulgent lamp of night,
 O'er Heaven's clear azure spreads her sacred light,
 When not a breath disturbs the deep serene,
 And not a cloud o'ercasts the solemn scene;
 Around her throne the vivid planets roll,
 And stars unnumber'd gild the glowing pole,
 O'er the dark trees a yellow verdure shed,
 And tip with silver every mountain's head;
 Then shine the vales, the rocks in prospect rise,
 A flood of glory bursts from all the skies:
 The conscious swains, rejoicing in the sight,
 Eye the blue vault, and bless the useful light.

On Earth, by him, his holy lore was given,
On Earth he came to raise mankind to Heaven. 470
And now behold, what most your eyes desire,
Our shining armour, and our arms of fire;
For who has once in friendly peace beheld,
Will dread to meet them on the battle-field."

Straight as he spoke, the warlike storm display'd
Their glorious show, where, tire on tire inlaid,
Appear'd of glittering steel the carabines;
There the plumed helms and ponderous briganddices;

O'er the broad bucklers sculptur'd orbs embos'd, 479
The crooked falchions' dreadful blades were cross;
Here clasp'd greaves, and plated mail-quilts strong,
The long-bows here, and rattling quivers hung;
And like a grove the burnish'd spears were seen,
With darts, and halberds double-edged between;
Here dread grenadoes, and tremendous bombs,
With deaths ten thousand lurking in their wombs;
And far around, of brown and dusky red,
The pointed piles of iron balls were spread.

The bombardiers now to the regent's view
The thundering mortars and the cannon drew; 490
Yet at their leader's nod, the sons of flame
(For brave and generous ever are the same)

Withheld their hands, nor gave the seeds of fire
To rouse the thunders of the dreadful fire.
For Gama's soul disdain'd the pride of show,
Which acts the lion o'er the trembling roe.

His joy and wonder oft the Moor express'd,
But rankling hate lay brooding in his breast;
With smiles obedient to his will's controul,
He veils the purpose of his treacherous soul. 500

For pilots conscious of the Indian strand
Brave Vasco sues, and bids the Moor command
What bounteous gifts shall recompense their toils:
The Moor prevents him with assenting smiles,
Resolved that deeds of death, not words of air,
Shall first the hatred of his soul declare:
Such sudden rage his rankling mind possess'd,
When Gama's lips Messiah's name confess'd.
O depth of Heaven's dread will, that rancorous hate

On Heaven's best lov'd in every clime should wait!
Now sailing round on all the wondering crew, 511
The Moor attended by his bands withdrew:

"This, and of consequence, the reason of the Moor's hate, together with the fine description of the armour, is entirely omitted by Casters. The original is, the Moor conceived hatred, "knowing they were followers of the truth which the son of David taught." Thus rendered by Fanshaw:

Knowing they follow that unerring light
The son of David holds out in his book.

By this Solomon must be understood, not the Messiah, as meant by Camoëns.

"Zacocia (governor of Mozambique) made no doubt but our people were of some Mohammedan country.—The mutual exchange of good offices between our people and these islanders promised a long continuance of friendship, but it proved otherwise. No sooner did Zacocia understand the strangers were Christians, than all his kindness was turned into the most bitter hatred; he began to meditate their ruin, and sought by every means to destroy the fleet."—Orosius Silvensis *Epic. de Rebus Eman. His nimble barges soon approach'd the land,
And shouts of joy receiv'd him on the strand. {held,
From Heaven's high dome the vintage-god be-(Whom nine long months his father's thigh con-ceal'd")

Well-pleas'd he mark'd the Moor's determin'd hate,
And thus his mind revolv'd in self-debate:

"Has Heaven, indeed, such glorious lot ordain'd!
By Lusur's race such conquests to be gain'd 520
O'er warlike nations, and on India's shore,
Where I, unrival'd, claim'd the palm before!

I, sprung from Jove! and shall these wandering few,
What Ammon's son unconquer'd left, subdue!
Ammon's brave son, who led the god of war
His slave auxiliary at his thundering car!

Must these possess what Jove to him deny'd,
Possess what never sooth'd the Roman pride!
Must these the victor's lordly flag display
With hateful blaze beneath the rising day, 530

My name dishonour'd, and my victories stain'd,
O'erturn'd my altars, and my shrines profan'd!
No—be it mine to fan the regent's hate;
Occasion seiz'd commands the action's fate.

'T is mine—this captain, now my dread no more,
Shall never shake his spear on India's shore."

So spake the power, and with the lightning's
For Afric darted through the fields of light. [light
His form divine he cloth'd in human shape,"
And rush'd impetuous o'er the rocky carpe. 540

In the dark semblance of a Moor he came,
For art and old experience knows to fame:
Him all his peers with humble deference heard,
And all Mozambique and its prince rever'd:

The prince in haste he sought, and thus express'd
His guileful hate in friendly counsel dress:

"And to the regent of this isle alone
Are these adventurers and their fraud unknown?
Has fame conceal'd their rapine from his ear?
Nor brought the groans of plunder'd nations here?

Yet still their hands the peaceful olive bore 551
Whene'er they anchor'd on a foreign shore:
But nor their seeming, nor their oaths I trust,
For Afric knows them bloody and unjust.

The nations sink beneath their lawless force,
And fire and blood have mark'd their deadly course.
We too, unless kind Heaven and thou prevent,
Must fall the victims of their dire intent;

And, gasping in the pangs of death, behold
Our wives led captive, and our daughters sold. 560
By stealth they come, ere morrow dawn, to bring
The healthful beverage from the living spring:

Arm'd with his troops the captain will appear;
For conscious fraud is ever prone to fear.
To meet them there, select a trusty band,
And in close ambush take thy silent stand;

There wait, and sudden on the heedless foe
Rush, and destroy them ere they dread the blow.
Or say, should some escape the secret snare
Sav'd by their fate, their valour, or their care, 570

Yet their dread fraud shall celebrate our isle,
If fate consent, and thou approve the guile.

"According to the Arabians, Bacchus was nourished during his infancy in a cave of Mount Meros, which in Greek signifies a thigh. Hence the fable.

Exiit: in vultus sese transformata aniles,
Et frontem obscenam rugis arat.*—

Give then a pilot to their wandering fleet,
Bold in his art, and tutor'd in deceit; [guide
Whose hand adventurous shall their helms mis-
To hostile shores, or whelm them in the tide."

So spoke the god, in semblance of a sage
Renown'd for counsel and the craft of age.
The prince, with transport glowing in his face,
Approv'd, and caught him in a kind embrace; 580
And instant at the word his bands prepare
Their bearded darts and iron fangs of war,
That Lusus' sons might purple with their gore
The crystal fountain which they sought on shore:
And still regardful of his dire intent,
A skilful pilot to the bay he sent,
Of honest men, yet practis'd in deceit,
Who far at distance on the beach should wait,
And to the 'scap'd, if some should 'scape the snare,
Should offer friendship and the pilot's care; 590
But when at sea, on rocks should dash their pride,
And whelm their lofty vanes beneath the tide.

Apollo now had left his watery bed,
And o'er the mountains of Arabia spread
His rays that glow'd with gold; when Gama rose,
And from his bands a trusty squadron chose:
Three speedy barges brought their oars to fill
From gurgling fountain, or the crystal rill:
Full-arm'd they came, for brave defence prepar'd,
For martial care is ever on the guard: 600
And secret warnings ever are imprest
On wisdom such as wak'd in Gama's breast.

And now, as swiftly springing o'er the tide
Advanc'd the boats, a troop of Moors they spy'd;
O'er the pale sands the able warriors crowd,
And toss their threatening darts, and shout aloud.
Yet seeming artless, though they dar'd the fight,
Their eager hope they plac'd in artful flight,
To lead brave Gama where unsee'd by day
In dark-brow'd shades their silent ambush lay. 610
With scornful gestures o'er the breach they stride,
And push their level'd spears with barbarous pride;
Then fix the arrow to the bended bow,
And strike their sounding shields, and dare the foe.
With generous rage the Lusian race behold,
And each brave breast with indignation swell'd,
To view such foes like snarling dogs display
Their threatening tusks, and brave the sanguine
Together with a bound they spring to land, {fray:
Unknown whose step first trod the hostile strand.

Thus⁶², when to gain his beautiful charmer's smile, 620
The youthful lover dares the bloody toil,
Before the nodding bull's stern front he stands,
He leaps, he wheels, he shouts, and waves his hands!
The horrid brute disdain the stripling's rage,
His nostrils smoke, and, eager to engage,
His horned brows he levels with the ground,
And shuts his flaming eyes, and, wheeling round,

⁶² This simile is taken from a favourite exercise in Spain, where it is usual to see young gentlemen of the best families, adorned with ribbons, and armed with a javelin or kind of cutlass, which the Spaniards call machete, appear the candidates of fame in the lists of the bull-fight. Though Camoëns in this description of it has given the victory to the bull, it very seldom so happens, the young caballeros being very expert at this valorous exercise, and ambitious to display their dexterity, which is a sure recommendation to the favour and good opinion of the ladies.

With dreadful howling rusher on the foe,
And lays the boastful gaudy champion low. 630
Thus to the fight the sons of Lusus sprung,
Nor slow to fall their ample vengeance hung:
With sudden roar the carabines resound,
And bursting echoes from the hills rebound;
The lead flies hissing through the trembling air,
And death's fell demons through the flashes glare,
Where, up the land, a grove of palms enclose,
And cast their shadows where the fountain flows,
The lurking ambush from their treacherous stand
Beheld the combat burning on the strand: 640
They see the flash with sudden lightnings flare,
And the blue smoke slow rolling on the air:
They see their warriors drop, and, starting, hear
The lingering thunders burting on their ear.
Amaz'd, appall'd, the treacherous ambush fled,
And rag'd⁶³, and curs'd their birth, and quak'd with dread.

The bands that vaunting show'd their threaten'd
With slaughter gor'd, precipitate in flight; [might,
Yet oft, though trembling, on the foe they turn
Their eyes, that red with lust of vengeance burn:
Agast with fear and stern with desperate rage
The flying war with dreadful bows they wage,
Flints⁶⁴, clods, and javelins hurling as they fly,
As rage and wild despair their hands supply.
And soon dispers'd, their bands attempt no more
To guard the fountain or defend the shore:
O'er the wide lawns no more their troops appear;
Nor sleeps the vengeance of the victor here;
To teach the nations what tremendous fate
From his dread arm on perjurd' vows should wait,
He seiz'd the time to awe the eastern world. 661
And on the breach of faith his thunders hurl'd,
From his black ships the sudden lightnings blaze,
And o'er old ocean flash their dreadful rays:
White clouds on clouds inroll'd the smoke ascends,
The bursting tumult Heaven's wide concave rends:
The bays and caverns of the winding shore
Repeat the cannon's and the mortar's roar:
The bombs, far-flaming, hiss along the sky,
And whirling through the air the bullets fly: 670
The wounded air with hollow deafen'd sound
Grows to the direful strife, and trembles round,
Now from the Moorish town the sheets of fire,
Wide blaze succeeding blaze, to Heaven aspire.
Black rise the clouds of smoke, and, by the gales
Borne down, in streams hang hovering o'er the vales;
And, slowly floating round the mountain's head,
Their pitchy mantle o'er the landscape spread.
Unnumber'd sea-fowl, rising from the shore,
Beat round in whirls at every cannon's roar: 680

⁶³ ——— e maldizia

O velho inerte, e a may, que o filho cria.

Thus translated by Farnshaw,

——— curs't their ill luck,

Th' old devil, and the dam that gave them suck.

⁶⁴ Janque faces et saxa volant, furor arma ministrat. Virg. Æn. I.

The Spanish commentator on this place relates a very extraordinary instance of the furor arma ministrans. A Portuguese soldier, at the siege of Diu in the Indies, being surrounded by the enemy, and having no ball to charge his musket, pulled out one of his teeth, and with it supplied the place of a bullet.

Where o'er the smoke the masts' tall heads appear,
 Hovering they scream, then dart with sudden fear;
 On trembling wings far round and round they fly,
 And fill with dismal clang their native sky.
 Thus led in rout confus'd the treacherous Moors
 From field to field, then, hast'ning to the shores,
 Some trust in boats their wealth and lives to save,
 And wail with dread they plunge into the wave;
 Some spread their arms to swim, and some beneath
 The whelming billows, struggling, pant for breath,
 Then wain'd aloft their nostrils spout the brine; 691
 While showering still from many a carabine
 The leaden hail their sails and vessels tore,
 Till struggling hard they reach'd the neighb'ring
 Due vengeance thus their perfidy repay'd, [shore:
 And Gama's torments to the east display'd.

Imbrow'd with dust a beaten pathway shows
 Where 'midst umbrageous palms the fountain flows;
 From thence at will they bear the liquid health;
 And now sole masters of the island's wealth. 700
 With costly spoils and eastern robes adorn'd,
 The joyful victors to the fleet return'd.

With Hell's keen fires, still for revenge athirst,
 The regent barns, and weons, by fraud accurst,
 To strike a surer, yet a secret blow,
 And in one general death to whelm the foe.
 The promis'd pilot to the fleet he sends,
 And deep repentance for his crime pretends.
 Sincere the herald seems, and while he speaks,
 The winning tears steal down his hoary cheeks. 710
 Brave Gama, touch'd with generous woe, believes,
 And from his hand the pilot's hand receives:
 A dreadful gift I instructed to decoy,
 In gulfs to whelm them, or on rocks destroy.

The valiant chief, impatient of delay,
 For India now resumes the watery way;
 Bids weigh the anchor and unfurl the sail,
 Spread full the canvass to the rising gale:
 He spoke; and proudly o'er the foaming tide,
 Borne on the wind, the fall-wing'd vessels ride; 720
 While as they rode before the bounding prow,
 The lovely forms of sea-born nymphs arose.
 The while brave Vasco's unsuspecting mind
 Yet fear'd not aught the crafty Moor design'd:
 Much of the coast he asks, and much demands
 Of Africa's shores and India's spicy lands.

The crafty Moor, by vengeful Bacchus taught,
 Employ'd on deadly guile his baneful thought;
 In his dark mind he plann'd on Gama's head
 Full to revenge Mozambic and the dead. 730
 Yet all the chief demanded he reveal'd,
 Nor aught of truth, that truth he knew, conceal'd:
 For thus he wain'd to gain his easy faith,
 And, gain'd, betray to slavery or to death.
 And now securely trusting to destroy.

As erst false Sinon snar'd the sons of Troy,
 "Behold, disclosing from the sky," he cries,
 "Far to the north, yon cloud-like isle arise:
 From ancient times the natives of the shore
 The blood-stain'd image on the cross adore." 740
 Swift at the word the joyful Gama cried,
 "For that fair island turn the helm aside,
 O bring my vessels where the Christians dwell,
 And thy glad lips my gratitude shall tell."
 With sullen joy the treacherous Moor comply'd,
 And for that island turn'd the helm aside.

For well Quiloa's swarthy race he knew,
 Their laws and faith to Hagar's offspring true;
 Their strength in war, through all the nations round,
 Above Mozambic and her powers renown'd; 750

He knew what hate the Christian name they bore,
 And hop'd that hate on Vasco's bands to pour.

Right to the land the faithless pilot steers,
 Right to the land the glad armada bears;
 But heavenly love's fair queen³¹, whose watchful
 care

Had ever been their guide, beheld the snare.
 A sudden storm she rais'd: loud howl'd the blast,
 The yard-arms rattled, and each groaning mast
 Bended beneath the weight. Deep sunk the prows,
 And creaking ropes the creaking ropes oppos'd; 760
 In vain the pilot would the speed restrain;
 The captain shouts, the sailors toil in vain;
 Astoep and gliding on the leeward side
 The bounding vessels cut the roaring tide:
 Soon far they past; and now the alack'd sail
 Trembles and bellies to the gentle gale:
 Till many a league before the tempest tost
 The treacherous pilot sees his purpose cross:
 Yet vengeful still, and still intent on guile,
 "Behold," he cries, "you dim emerging isle: 770
 There live the votaries of Messiah's lore
 In faithful peace and friendship with the Moor."
 Yet all was false, for there Messiah's name,
 Revil'd and scorn'd, was only known by fame.
 The grovelling natives there, a brutal herd,
 The sensual lore of Hagar's son preferr'd.
 With joy brave Gama hears the artful tale,
 Bears to the harbour, and bids furl the sail.
 Yet watchful still fair love's celestial queen
 Prevents the danger with a hand unseen; 780
 Nor past the bar his vent'rous vessels guides;
 And safe at anchor in the road he rides.

Between the isle and Ethiopia's land
 A narrow current laves each adverse strand;
 Close by the margin where the green tide flows,
 Full to the bay a lordly city rose:

³¹ When Gama arrived in the east, the Moors were the only people who engrossed the trade of those parts. Jealous of such formidable rivals as the Portuguese, they employed every artifice to accomplish the destruction of Gama's fleet, for they foresaw the consequences of his return to Portugal. As the Moors were acquainted with these seas and spoke the Arabic language, Gama was obliged to employ them both as pilots and interpreters. The circumstance now mentioned by Camoens is an historical truth. The Moorish pilot, says de Barros, intended to conduct the Portuguese into Quiloa, telling them that place was inhabited by Christians; but a sudden storm arising, drove the fleet from that shore, where death or slavery would have been the certain fate of Gama and his companions. The villainy of the pilot was afterwards discovered. As Gama was endeavouring to enter the port of Mombaze his ship struck on a sand-bank, and finding their purpose of bringing him into the harbour defeated, two of the Moorish pilots leaped into the sea and swam ashore. Alarmed at this tacit acknowledgment of guilt, Gama ordered two other Moorish pilots who remained on board to be examined by whipping, who, after some time, made a full confession of their intended villainy. This discovery greatly encouraged Gama and his men, who now interpreted the sudden storm which had driven them from Quiloa as a miraculous interposition of Divine Providence in their favour.

With fierce blaze the glowing evening pours
 His purple splendours o'er the lofty towers;
 The lofty towers with milder lustre gleam,
 And gently tremble in the glassy stream. 590
 Here reign'd a boary king of ancient fame,
 Mombaze the town, Mombaze the island's name.

As when the pilgrim, who with weary pace
 Through lonely wastes untrod by human race,
 For many a day disconsolate has stray'd,
 The turf his bed, the wild-wood boughs his shade,
 O'erjoy'd beholds the cheerful seats of men
 In grateful prospect rising on his ken;
 So Gama joy'd, who many a dreary day
 Had trac'd the vast, the lonesome watery way, 600
 Had seen new stars unknown to Europe rise,
 And brav'd the horrors of the polar skies:
 So joy'd his bounding heart, when, proudly rear'd,
 The splendid city o'er the wave appear'd,
 Where Heaven's own lore, he trusted, was obey'd,
 And holy faith her sacred rites display'd.
 And now swift crowding through the horned bay
 The Moorish barges wing'd their fomy way:
 To Gama's fleet with friendly smiles they bore
 The choicest products of their cultur'd shore: 710
 But there fell rancour veil'd its serpent-head,
 Though festive roses o'er the gifts were spread.
 For Bacchus, veil'd in human shape, was here,
 And pour'd his counsel in the sovereign's ear.

O piteous lot of man's uncertain state!
 What woes on life's unhappy journey wait!
 When joyful hope would grasp its fond desire,
 The long-sought transports in the grasp expire.
 By sea what treacherous calms, what rushing storms,
 And death attendant in a thousand forms! 720
 By land what strife, what plots of secret guile,
 How many a wound from many a treacherous smile!
 O where shall man escape his numerous foes,
 And rest his weary head in safe repose!

LUSIAD II.

The fervent lustre of the evening ray
 Behind the western hills now died away,
 And night ascending from the dim-brow'd east,
 The twilight gloom with deeper shades increas'd;
 When Gama heard the creaking of the oar,
 And mark'd the white waves length'ning from the shore.

In many a skiff the eager natives came,
 Their semblance friendship, but deceit their aim.
 And now by Gama's anchor'd ships they ride,
 And, "Hail, illustrious chief," their leader cried,
 "Your fame already these our regions own, 11
 How your bold prow from worlds to us unknown
 Have brav'd the horrors of the southern main,
 Where storms and darkness hold their endless reign, Whose whelmy waves our westward prows have barr'd

From oldest times, and ne'er before were dar'd
 By boldest leader:—Earnest to behold
 The wondrous hero of a toil so bold,
 To you the sovereign of these islands sends
 The holy vows of peace, and hails you friends. 20
 If friendship you accept, whate'er kind Heaven
 In various bounty to these shores has given,
 Whate'er your wants, your wants shall here supply,
 And safe in port your gallant fleet shall lie;
 Safe from the dangers of the faithless tide,
 And sudden bursting storms, by you untry'd;

VOL. XII.

Yours every bounty of the fertile shore,
 Till belmy rest your wearied strength restore.
 Or if your toils and ardent hopes demand
 The various treasures of the Indian strand, 30
 The fragrant cinnamon, the glowing clove,
 And all the riches of the spicy grove;
 Or drugs of power the fever's rage to bound,
 And give soft languor to the smarting wound;
 Or if the splendour of the diamond's rays,
 The sapphire's azure, or the ruby's blaze,
 Invite your sails to search the eastern world,
 Here may these sails in happy hour be fur'd:
 For here the splendid treasures of the mine,
 And richest offspring of the field, combine 40
 To give each boon that human want requires,
 And every gem that lofty pride desires:
 Then here, a potent king your gen'rous friend, [end.]
 Here let your per'ous toils and wand'ring searches

He said: Brave Gama smiles with heart sincere,
 And prays the herald to the king to bear
 The thanks of grateful joy: "But now," he cries,
 "The blackening evening veils the coast and skies,
 And through these rocks unknown forbids to steer:
 Yet when the streaks of misty dawn appear 50
 Edging the easterly wave with silver hoar,
 My ready prows shall gladly point to shore;
 Assur'd of friendship, and a kind retreat,
 Assur'd and proffer'd by a king so great."
 Yet mindful still of what his hopes had cheer'd,
 That here his nation's holy shrines were rear'd,
 He asks, if certain as the pilot told,
 Meccah's lore had flourish'd there of old,
 And flourish'd still? The herald mark'd with joy
 The pious wish, and watchful to decoy, 60
 "Messiah here," he cries, "has altars more Than all the various shrines of other lore."
 O'erjoy'd brave Vasco heard the pleasing tale,
 Yet fear'd that fraud its viper-sting might veil
 Beneath the glitter of a show so fair;
 He half believes the tale, and arms against the snare.

With Gama sail'd a bald advent'rous band,
 Whose headlong rage had urg'd the guilty hand:

¹ After Gama had been driven from Quiloa by a sudden storm, the assurance of the Mozarabic pilot, that the city was chiefly inhabited by Christians, strongly inclined him to enter the harbour of Mombaze; Nec ullum locum, says Osorius, magis opportunum curandis atque reficiendis aegrotis posse reperiri. Jam eo tempore bona pars eorum, qui cum Gama condescerant, variis morbis consumptis fuerat, et qui evaserant, erant gravi invaletudine debilitati. . . . Tellus abundat fructibus et oleibus, et frugibus, et pecorum et armentorum gregibus, et aquis dulcibus. Utitur præterea mira cæli temperie. Homines vivunt admodum laute, et domos more nostræ edificant.—Missi rex nuncios, qui Gama nomine illius salutarent. . . . Aiunt deinde regionem illam esse opulentissimam, earumque rerum omnium plenissimam, quarum gratia multi in Indiam navigabant. Regem ad eum esse in illas voluntate propensum ut nihil esset tam difficile, quod non se eorum gratia facturum polliceretur.—Osor.

² Erant enim in ea classe decem homines capita damnati, quibus fuerat ea lege vita concessa, ut quibuscumque in locis a Gama relicti fuissent, regiones læstrarent, hominumque mores et instituta cognoscerent.—Osor.

During the reign of Rammanuel, and his predecessor John II, few criminals were executed in

Stern justice for their crimes had ask'd their blood,
 And pain in chains condemn'd to death they stood ;
 But sav'd by Gama from the shameful death, 71
 The bread of peace had seal'd their plighted faith.
 The coast unknown, when order'd to explore,
 And dare each danger of the hostile shore :
 From this bold band he chose the subtlest two,
 The port, the city, and its strength to view,
 To mark if fraud its secret head betray'd,
 Or if the rites of Heaven were there display'd.
 With costly gifts, as of their truth secure,
 The pledge that Gama deem'd their faith was pure,
 These two his heralds to the king he sends : 81
 The faithless Moors depart as smiling friends.
 Now through the wave they cut their foamy way,
 Their cheerful songs resounding through the bay :
 And now on shore the wondering natives greet,
 And fondly hail the strangers from the fleet.
 The prince their gifts with friendly vows receives,
 And joyful welcome to the Lusians gives :
 Where'er they pass, the joyful tumult hears,
 And through the town the glad applause attends. 90
 But he whose cheeks with youth immortal show,
 The god whose wondrous birth two mothers own,
 Whose rage had still the wandering fleet annoy'd,
 Now in the town his guileful rage employ'd.
 A Christian priest he seem'd ; a sumptuous shrine 3
 He rear'd, and tended with the rites divine :

Portugal. These great and political princes employed the lives which were forfeited to the public in the most dangerous undertakings of public utility. In their foreign expeditions the condemned criminals were sent upon the most hazardous emergencies. If death was their fate, it was the punishment they had merited : if successful in what was required, their crimes were expiated ; and often, as in the voyage of Gama, they rendered their country the greatest atonement for their guilt, which men in their circumstances could possibly make. Besides the merit of thus rendering forfeited lives of service to the community, the Portuguese monarchs have the honour of carrying this idea still further. They were the first who devised that most political of all punishments, transportation to foreign settlements. India and the Brazils received their criminals ; many of whom became afterwards useful members to society. When the subject thus obtrudes the occasion, a short digression, it is hoped, will be pardoned. While every feeling breast must be pleased with the wisdom and humanity of the Portuguese monarchs, indignation and regret must rise on the view of the present state of the penal laws of England. What multitudes every year, in the prime of their life, end their days by the hand of the executioner ! That the legislature might devise means to make the greatest part of these lives useful to society, is a fact which surely cannot be disputed ;—though perhaps the remedy of an evil so shocking to humanity may be at some distance.

3 On it, the picture of that shape he plac'd,
 In which the Holy Spirit did alight,
 The picture of the dove, so white, so chaste,
 On the blest Virgin's head, so chaste, so white.

In these lines, the best of all Fanshew, the happy repetition "so chaste, so white," is a

O'er the fair altar waved the cross on high,
 Upheld by angels leaning from the sky ;
 Descending o'er the Virgin's sacred head
 So white, so pure, the Holy Spirit spread 100
 The dove-like pictured wings, so pure, so white ;
 And, hovering o'er the chosen twelve, alight
 The tongues of hallow'd fire. Amazed, oppress'd,
 With sacred awe their troubled looks confess'd
 The inspiring Godhead, and the prophet's glow,
 Which gave each language from their lips to flow.
 Where thus the guileful power his magic wrought,
 De Gama's heralds by the guides are brought :
 On bended knees low to the earth they fall,
 And to the Lord of Heaven in transport call : 110
 While the feign'd priest awakes the ceases' fire,
 And clouds of incense round the shrines aspire.
 With cheerful welcome here, carew'd, they stay,
 Till bright Aurora, messenger of day,
 Walk'd forth ; and now the Sun's resplendent rays,
 Yet half emerging o'er the waters, blaze,
 When to the fleet the Moorish oars again
 Dash the curl'd waves, and waft the guileful train :
 The lofty decks they moor. With joy etate,
 Their friendly welcome at the palace-gate, 120
 The king's sincerity, the people's care,
 And treasures of the coast the spies declare :
 Nor pass'd untold what most their joys inspired,
 What most to bear the valiant chief desired,
 That their glad eyes had seen the rites divine,
 Their country's worship, and the sacred shrine.
 The pleasing tale the joyful Gama bears ;
 Dark fraud no more his generous bosom fears :
 As friends sincere, himself sincere, he gives
 The hand of welcome, and the Moors receives. 130
 And now, as conscious of the destin'd prey,
 The faithless race, with smiles and gestures gay,
 Their shafts forsaking, Gama's ships ascend,
 And deep to strike the treacherous blow attend.
 On shore the truthless monarch arms his hands,
 And for the fleet's approach impatient stands ;
 That soon as anchor'd in the port they rode,
 Brave Gama's decks might reek with Lusian blood :
 Thus weening to revenge Mozambique's fate,
 And give full snuff to the Moorish hate. 140
 And now, their bowsprit bending to the bay,
 The joyful crew the ponderous anchors weigh,
 Their shouts the while resounding. To the gale
 With eager hands they spread the fore-mast sail.
 But love's fair queen the secret fraud beheld :
 Swift as an arrow o'er the battle-field,
 From Heaven she darted to the watery plain,
 And call'd the sea-born nymphs, a lovely train,
 From Nereus sprung ; the ready nymphs obey,
 Proud of her kindred birth, and own her sway. 150 beauty which, though not contained in the original, the present translator was unwilling to lose.

4 The French translator has the following note on this place: Oet endroit est l'un de ceux qui montrent combien l'auteur est habile dans la mythologie, et en même temps combien de pénétration son allégorie demande. Il y a bien peu de gens, qui en lisant ici, &c.—"This is one of the places which discover our author's intimate acquaintance with mythology, and at the same time how much attention his allegory requires. Many readers, on finding that the protectress of the Lusians sprung from the sea, would be apt to exclaim, 'Behold the birth of the terrestrial Venus ! How can a nativity so disgraceful be ascribed

She tells what ruin threats her far'rite race;
Unwonted ardour glows on every face;
With keen rapidity they bound away,
Dash'd by their silver limbs, the billows gray
Foam round: fair Doto, fir'd with rage divine,
Darts through the wave; and onward o'er the brine
The lovely Nyse and Nerine's spring
With all the vehemence and the speed of wing.

to the celestial Venus, who represents religion? I answer, that Camoëns had nothine eye on those fables, which derive the birth of Venus from the foam of the waves, mixed with the blood which flowed from the dishonest wound of Saturn: he carries his views higher; his Venus is from a fable more noble. Nigidius relate, that two fishes one day conveyed an egg to the sea shore: this egg was hatched by two pigeons whiter than snow, and gave birth to the Asevrian Venus, which, in the Pagan theology, is the same with the celestial: she instructed mankind in religion, gave them the lessons of virtue and the laws of equity. Jupiter, in reward of her labours, promised to grant her whatever she desired. She prayed him to give immortality to the two fishes who had been instrumental in her birth, and the fishes were accordingly placed in the zodiac. . . . This fable agrees perfectly with religion, as I could clearly show; but I think it more proper to leave to the ingenious reader the pleasure of tracing the allegory." Thus Casters.—Besides the above, mythology gives two other accounts of the origin of the sign Pisces. When Venus and Cupid fled from the rage of Typhon, they were saved by two fishes, who carried them over the river Euphrates. The fishes, in return, were placed in the zodiac. Another fable says that that favour was obtained by Neptune for the two dolphins, who first brought him his beloved Amphitrite. This variety in the Pagan mythology is, at least, a proof that the allegory of a poet ought not, without full examination, to be condemned on the appearance of inconsistency.

Cloto, or Clotho, as Casters observes, has by some error crept into almost all the Portuguese editions of the Lusiad. Clotho was one of the Fates, and neither Hesiod, Homer, nor Virgil have given such a name to any of the Nereides; but in the ninth Æneid Doto is mentioned,

— Magnique jubebo
Æquoris esse Deas: qualis Neris Doto
Et Galatæa secant spumantem pectore pontum.

The Nereides, in the Lusiad, says Casters, are the virtues divine and human. In the first book they accompany the Portuguese fleet;

— before the bounding prows

The lovely forms of sea-born nymphs arose.

"And without doubt," says he, "this allegory, in a lively manner, represents the condition of mankind. The virtues languish in repose; adversities animate and awake them. The fleet sailing before a favourable wind is followed by the Nereides, but the Nereides are scattered about in the sea. When danger becomes imminent, Venus, or Religion, assembles them to its safety." That this manner of allegory is in the true spirit of Homer, see the note on the allegorical machinery of that great father of poetry, near the end of the Sixth Lusiad. The

The curving billows to their breasts divide,
And give a yielding passage through the tide. 160
With furious speed the goddess rush'd before;
Her beauteous form a joyful Triton bore,
Whose eager face, with glowing rapture fired,
Betray'd the pride which such a task inspired.
And now arriv'd where to the whistling wind
The warlike navy's heaving masts reclin'd,
As through the billows rush'd the speedy prows,
The nymphs, dividing, each her station chose.
Against the leader's prow, her lovely breast
With more than mortal force the goddess press'd;
The ship recoiling trembles on the tide. 171
The nymphs in help pour round on every side,
From the dread bar the threaten'd keels to save;
The ship bounds up, half lifted from the wave,
And, trembling, hovers o'er the watery grave,
As when alarm'd, to save the hoarded grain,
The care-carr'd move for winter's dreary reign,
So toil, so tug, so pant, the labouring emmet train;
So toil'd the nymphs, and strain'd their panting force

To turn the navy from its fatal course⁶: 180
Back, back the ship recedes; in vain the crew
With shouts on shouts their various toils renew;
In vain each nerve, each nautic art they strain,
And the rough wind distends the sail in vain:
Enrag'd, the sailors see their labours cross;
From side to side the reeling helm is tost;
High on the poop the skilful master stands;
Sudden he shrieks aloud, and spreads his hands—
A lurking rock its dreadful rift betrays,
And right before the prow its ridge displays; 190
Loud shrieks of horror from the yard-arms rise,
And a dire general yell invades the skies.
The Moors start, fear-struck, at the horrid sound,
As if the rage of combat roar'd around.
Pale are their lips, each look in wild amaze
The horror of detected guilt betrays.
Pierc'd by the glance of Gama's awful eyes,
The conscious pilot quits the helm and flies,
From the high deck he plunges in the brine;
His mates their safety to the waves consign; 200
Dash'd by their plunging falls, on every side
Foams and boils up around the rolling tide.
Thus the hoarse tenants of the sylvan lake,⁷
A Lycian race of old, to fight betake;

following, from Casters, is indeed highly pedantic: "Doto," continues he, "is derived from the verb δαΐω, I give. According to this etymology Doto is Charity, Nyse is Hope, and Nerine, Faith. For the name Nyse comes from νῆσ, I swim. For the action of Hope agrees with that of swimming, and is the symbol of it. Nerine is a term composed of νεῖρ, an old word, which signifies the waters of the sea, and of γῆν, a file; as if one should say, The file of the sea waters, a mysterious expression, applicable to Faith, which is the file of our soul, and which is rendered perfect by the water of baptism." Our French paraphrast wisely adds, that perhaps some persons may despise this etymology, but that for his part, he is unwilling to reject it, as it tends to unravel the allegory of his author.

⁶ Imitated from Virgil:

Cymothœ simul, et Triton aduixit, scuto
Detrudunt naves scopulo.——Virg. Æn. 1.

⁷ Latona, says the fable, flying from the serpent Python, and faint with thirst, came to a pond

At every sound they dread Latona's hate,
 And doubled vengeance of their former fate;
 All, sudden plunging, leave the margin green,
 And but their heads above the pool are seen.
 So plung'd the Moors, when, horrid to behold!
 From the bar'd rock's dread jaws the billows roll'd,
 Opening in instant fate the fleet to whirl, 211
 When ready Vasco caught the staggering helm:
 Swift as his lofty voice resounds aloud
 The ponderous anchors dash the whitening flood, where some Lycian peasants were cutting the bulrushes. In revenge of the insults which they offered her in preventing her to drink, she changed them into frogs. This fable, says Oester, like almost all the rest, is drawn from history. Philocorus, as cited by Boocce, relates, that the Rhodians having declared war against the Lycians, were assisted by some troops from Delos, who carried the image of Latona on their standards. A detachment of these going to drink at a lake in Lycia, a crowd of peasants endeavoured to prevent them. An encounter ensued; the peasants fled to the lake for shelter, and were there slain. Some months afterwards their companions came in search of their corpses; and finding an unusual quantity of frogs, imagined, according to the superstition of their age, that the souls of their friends appeared to them under that metamorphosis.

Is it allowable in epic poetry to introduce a comparison taken from a low image? This is a question which has exercised the abilities of critics and translators, till criticism has degenerated into trifling, and learning into pedantry. To some it may perhaps appear needless to vindicate Camoëns, in a point wherein he is supported by the authority of Homer and Virgil. Yet as many readers are infected with the sang froid of a Rollin or a Perrault, an observation in defence of our poet cannot be thought impertinent. If we examine the finest effusions of genius, we shall find, that the most genuine poetical feeling has often dictated those similes which are drawn from familiar and low objects. The sacred writers, and the greatest poets of every nation, have used them. We may therefore conclude, that the criticism which condemns them is a refinement not founded on nature. But, allowing them admissible, it must be observed, that to render them pleasing requires a peculiar happiness and delicacy of management. When the poet attains this indispensable point, he gives a striking proof of his elegance, and of his mastery in his art. That the similes of the emmits and of the frogs in Camoëns are happily expressed and applied, is indisputable. In that of the frogs there is a peculiar propriety both in the comparison itself, and in the allusion to the fable; as it was the intent of the poet to represent not only the fight, but the baseness of the Moors. The simile here seems to have copied from Dante, Inf. cant. 9.

Come le rane innanzi a la nemica
 Biscia per l'acqua si dileguan' tutte
 Fin che a la terra ciascuna s'abbica.

And cant. 92.

E come a l'orlo de l'acqua d'un fosso
 Swan' il ranocchi pur col muso fuori
 Si' che celano i piedi, e l'altro grosso.

And round his vessel, nodding o'er the tide,
 His other ships, bound by their anchors, ride.
 And now revolving in his piercing thought
 These various scenes with hidden import fraught;
 The boastful pilot's self-accusing flight,
 The former treason of the Moorish spite; 220
 How heading to the rock the furious wind,
 The boiling current, and their art combin'd;
 Yet though the groaning blast the canvass well'd.
 Some wondrous cause, unknown, their speed withheld:

Amaz'd, with hands high rais'd and sparkling eyes,
 "A miracle!" the raptur'd Gama cries,
 "A miracle! O hail, thou sacred sign,
 Thou pledge illustrious of the care divine!
 Ah! fraudulent malice! how shall wisdom's care
 Escape the poison of thy gilded snare! 230
 The frown of honesty, the faintly show,
 The smile of friendship, and the holy vow;
 All, all conjoin'd our easy faith to gain,
 To whelm us, shipwreck'd, in the ruthless main;
 But where our prudence no deceit could spy,
 There, heavenly guardian, there thy watchful eye
 Behold our danger: still, O still prevent,
 Where human foresight fails, the dire intent,
 The lurking treason of the smiling foe;
 And let our toils, our days of lengthening woe, 240
 Our weary wanderings end. If still for thee,
 To spread thy rites, our toils and vows agree,
 On India's strand thy sacred shrines to rear,
 Oh, let some friendly land of rest appear!
 If for thine honour we these toils have dar'd,
 These toils let India's long-sought shores reward!"

³ Oesrius gives the following account of this adventure. Talking of the two exiles whom Gama had sent on shore; Rex læta et hilari fronte exules accipit, imperavitque domesticis suis, ut illis urbis situm et pulchritudinem demonstrarent. Ubi vero reversi sunt, rex multa aromatum genera, quæ ex India deportari solent, illis ostentat, et quantum visum est donat, at Gama monstrare possent, et admonere, quanto esset utilius apud regem amicorum rem gerere, quam vitam tam periculose navigationi committere. Cum his mandatis redeunt exules in classem, Gama mirificè lætatos est, et postridie anchoras tolli jubet, et navæ prope urbem constitui. Cùm verò illius navis astus incitatus celeriter, quam commodum esset, invehetur, timens ille nè in vadum incideret, vela contrahere et anchoras demittere confestim jussit. . . . Quo factò Mozambiquenses gubernatores metu repentino pertulsi, se precipites in mare dejecerunt, et ad litora quædam, quæ non procul aberat, nando confugerunt. . . . At Gama magnis vocibus ad eos, qui in litribus erant, inclamavit, ut sibi suos gubernatores redderent: at illi clamores illius asperuati, gubernatores in terram exproauerunt. Hic Gama cum et conjectura, et aliquo etiam Arabie gubernatorum indicio, et multis præterea signis, perspexisset à quanto periculo fuisset auxilio divino liberatus, manus in caelum sustulit. Barros and Castaneda, in relating this part of the voyage of Gama, say, that the fleet, just as they were entering the port of Mombasa, were driven back, as it were, by an invisible hand. The safety of the armada depended upon this circumstance.

So spite the chief: the pious accents move
The gentle bosom of celestial Love:
The beauteous queen to Heaven now darts away;
In vain the weeping nymphs implore her way: 250
Behind her now the morning star she leaves,
And the sixth Heaven⁹ her lovely form receives.
Her radiant eyes such living splendours cast,
The sparkling stars were brighten'd as she pass'd;
The frozen pole with sudden streamlets flow'd,
And as the burning zone with fervour glow'd,
And now, confest before the throne of Jove,
In all her charms appears the queen of love:
Flush'd by the ardour of her rapid flight
Through fields of ether and the realms of light, 260
Bright as the blushes of the roseate morn,
New blooming tints her glowing cheeks adorn;
And all that pride of beauteous grace she wore,
As when in Ida's bower she stood of yore¹⁰,
When every charm and every hope of joy
Enraptured and allured the Trojan boy.
Ah! had that hunter¹¹, whose unhappy fate
The human visage lost by Jisu's hate,
Had he beheld this fairer goddess move,
Not bounds had slain him, but the fires of love. 270
Adorn her neck, more white than virgin snow,
Of softest hue the golden tresses flow;
Her heaving breasts of purer, softer white
Than snow-hills glistening in the Moon's pale light,

⁹ As the planet of Jupiter is in the sixth Heaven, the author has with propriety there placed the throne of that god.—Cætera.

¹⁰ J'entends les censeurs, says Cætera, se récrier que cet endroit-ci ne convient nullement à la Venus céleste.—“I am aware of the objection, that this passage is by no means applicable to the celestial Venus. I answer once for all, that the names and adventures of the Pagan divinities are so blended and uncertain in mythology, that a poet is at great liberty to adapt them to his allegory as he pleases. Even the fables, which, to those who penetrate no deeper than the rind, may appear as profane, even these contain historical, physical, and moral truths, which fully atone for the seeming licentiousness of the letter. I could prove this in many instances, but let the present suffice.—Paris, son of Priam, king of Troy, spent his first years as a shepherd in the country. At this time Juno, Minerva, and Venus disputed for the apple of gold, which was destined to be given to the most beautiful goddess. They consented that Paris should be their judge. His equity claimed this honour. He saw them all naked. Juno promised him riches, Minerva the sciences, but he decided in favour of Venus, who promised him the possession of the most beautiful woman. What a ray of light is contained in this philosophical fable! Paris represents a studious man, who, in the silence of solitude, seeks the supreme good. Juno is the emblem of riches and dignities; Minerva, that of the sciences purely human; Venus is that of religion, which contains the sciences both human and divine; the charming female, which she promises to the Trojan shepherd, is that divine wisdom which gives tranquility of heart. A judge so philosophical as Paris would not hesitate a moment to whom to give the apple of gold.”

¹¹ The allegory of Camoëns is here obvious. If Acton and the slaves of their violent passions

Except where covered by the ash, were bare,
And Love¹², unseen, smil'd soft, and panting there.
Nor less the zone the god's fond zeal employs;
The zone awakes the flame of secret joys.
As ivy tendrils, round her limbs divine
Their spreading arms the young Desires entwine;
Below her waist, and quivering on the gale, 281
Of thinnest texture flows the silken veil:
(Ah! where the lucid curtain dimly shows,
With doubled fires the roving fancy glows!)
The hand of Modesty the foldings throw,
Nor all conceal'd, nor all was given to view.
Yet her deep grief her lovely face betrays,
Though on her cheek the soft smile fluttering plays.
All Heaven was mov'd—as when some damsel coy,
Hurt by the rudeness of the amorous boy, 290
Offended chides and smiles; with angry mien,
Thus mixt with smiles, advanc'd the plaintive
And thus¹³: “O thunders! O potent sire! {queen:
Shall I in vain thy kind regard require!
Alas! and cherish still the fond deceit,
That yet on me thy kindest smiles await!
Ah Heaven! and must that valour which I love
Awake the vengeance and the rage of Jove!
Yet mov'd with pity for my favourite race
I speak, though frowning on thine awful face 300
I mark the tenour of the dread decree,
That to thy wrath consigns my sons and me.
Ye! I let stern Bacchus bless thy partial care,
His be the triumph, and be mine despair.
The bold advent'rous sons of Tago's clime
I loved—alas! that love is now their crime:
O happy they, and prosperous gales their fate,
Had I pursued them with relentless hate!
Yes! let my woeful sighs in vain implore,
Yes! let them perish on some barb'rous shore, 310
For I have lov'd them.”—Here, the swelling sigh
And pearly tear-drop rushing in her eye,
As morning dew hangs trembling on the rose,
Though fond to speak, her further speech oppose—
Her lips, then moving, as the pause of woe
Were now to give the voice of grief to flow;
When kindled by those charms, whose woes might
And melt the prowling tiger's rage to love, (move,
The thundering god her weeping sorrows ey'd,
And sudden threw his awful state aside: 320
With that mild look which stills the driving storm,
When black roll'd clouds the face of Heaven deform;
With that mild visage and benignant mien
Which to the sky restores the blue serene, could discover the beauties of true religion, they would be astonished and reclaimed; according to the expression of Seneca, Si virtus cerni posset oculis corporeis, omnes ad amorem suum perliceret.—Cætera.

¹² “That is, divine love, which always accompanies religion. Behold how our author insinuates the excellence of his moral!”—Cætera.

Camoëns, as observed in the preface, has twice asserted, that his machinery is allegorical. The poet's assertion, and the taste of the age in which he wrote, sufficiently vindicate the endeavour to unravel and explain the allegory of the Lusiad.

¹³ The following speech of Venus and the reply of Jupiter are a fine imitation from the first Æneid, and do great honour to the classical taste of the Portuguese poet.

MICKLE'S TRANSLATION

Her snowy neck and glowing cheek he press'd,
 And wip'd her tears, and clasp'd her to his breast:
 Yet she, still sighing, dropp'd the trickling tear,
 As the child nursing, mov'd with pride and fear,
 Still sighs and moans, though fondled and caress'd;
 Till thus great Jove the Fates' decrees confes'd: 330
 " O thou, my daughter, still below'd as fair,
 Vain are thy fears, thy heroes claim my care:
 No power of gods could e'er my heart incline,
 Like one fond smile, one powerful tear of thine.
 Wide o'er the eastern shores shalt thou behold
 The flags far streaming, and thy thunders roll'd;
 While nobler triumphs shall thy nation crown,
 Than those of Roman or of Greek renown.

" If by mine aid the sapient Greek could brave
 The Ogygian seas, nor sink a deathless slave;¹⁴
 If through th' Illyrian shelves Antenor bore, 341
 Till safe he landed on Timarvus' shore;
 If, by his fate, the pious Trojan led,
 Safe through Charybdis' barking whirlpools sped:
 Shall thy bold heroes, by my care disclaim'd,
 Be left to perish, who, to worlds unnam'd
 By vanquish'd Rome, pursue their dauntless way?
 No—soon shalt thou with ravish'd eyes survey,
 From stream to stream their lofty citels spread,
 And their proud turrets rear the warlike head: 350
 The stern-brow'd Turk shall bend the suppliant knee,

And Indian monarchs, now secure and free,
 Beneath thy potent monarch's yoke shall bend,
 Till thy just laws wide o'er the east extend.
 Thy chief, who now in error's circling maze
 For India's shore through shelves and tempests strays;

That chief shalt thou behold, with lordly pride,
 O'er Neptune's trembling realm triumphant ride.
 O wondrous fate! when not a breathing gale
 Shall curl the billows or distend the sail!¹⁵ 360
 The waves shall boil and tremble, aw'd with dread,
 And own the terror o'er their empire spread.
 That hostile coast, with various streams supplied,
 Whose treacherous sons the fountain's gifts deny'd;
 That coast shalt thou behold his port supply,
 Where oft thy weary fleets in rest shall lie.
 Each shore which wear'd for him the spars of death,
 To him these shores shall pledge their offer'd faith;
 To him their boughty lords shall lowly bend,
 And yield him tribute for the name of friend. 370
 The Red-sea were shall darken in the shade
 Of thy broad sails in frequent pomp display'd;

¹⁴ i. e. the slave of Calypso, who offered Ulysses immortality on condition he would live with her.

¹⁵ After the Portuguese had made great conquests in India, Gama had the honour to be appointed viceroy. In 1524, as he sailed thither to take possession of his government, his fleet was becalmed on the coast of Cambaya, and the ships stood motionless on the water: instantly, without the least change of weather, the waves were shaken with the most violent agitation. The ships were tossed about; the sailors were terrified, and in the utmost confusion, thinking themselves lost; when Gama, perceiving it to be the effect of an earthquake, with his wonted heroism and prudence, exclaimed, " Of what are you afraid? Do you not see how the ocean trembles under its sovereigns!" Barros, l. 9. c. 1. and Faria (tom. 1. c. 9.) who says, that such as lay sick of fevers were cured by the fright.

Thine eyes shall see the golden Ormuz' shore,
 Twice thine, twice conquered, while the furious
 Moors,

Amaz'd, shall view his arrows, backward driven,¹⁶
 Shower'd on his legions by the hand of Heaven.
 Though twice assail'd by many a vengeful hand,
 Unconquer'd still shall Dio's ramparts stand;
 Such prowess there shall raise the Lusian name
 That Mars shall tremble for his blighted fame; 380
 There shall the Moors, blaspheming, sick in death,
 And curse their prophet with their parting breath.

" Where Goe's warlike ramparts from on high,
 Pleas'd shalt thou see thy Lusian banners fly;
 The Pagan tribes in chains shall crowd her gate,
 While she sublime shall tower in regal state,
 The fatal scourge, the dread of all who dare
 Against thy sons to plan the future war.

Though few thy troops who Conanour sustain,
 The foe, though numerous, shall assault in vain. 390
 Great Calicut, for potent hosts renew'd,
 By Lisbon's sons assail'd shall strew the ground:
 What floods on floods of vengeful hosts shall wage
 On Cochim's walls their swift repeated rage!
 In vain: a Lusian hero¹⁷ shall oppose
 His dauntless bosom, and disperse the foe,
 As high-swell'd waves, that thunder'd to the shock,
 Disperse in feeble stragglers from the rock.
 When blackening broad and far o'er Actium's tide¹⁸

Augustus' fleets the slave of love defy'd, 400
 When that fallen warrior to the combat led
 The bravest troops in Bactrian Scythia bred,
 With Asian legions, and, his shameful base,
 The Egyptian queen attendant in the train;
 Though Mars raged high, and all his fury poor'd,
 Till with the storm the boiling surges roar'd;
 Yet shall thine eyes more dreadful scenes behold,
 On burning surges burning surges roll'd,
 The sheets of fire far billowing o'er the brize,
 While I my thunder to thy sons resign. 410
 Thus many a sea shall blaze, and many a shore
 Resound the horror of the combat's roar,
 While thy bold prow triumphant ride along
 By trembling China to the isles unsung

¹⁶ Both Barros and Castaneda relate this fact. Albuquerque, during the war of Ormuz, having given battle to the Persians and Moors, by the violence of a sudden wind the arrows of the latter were driven back upon themselves, whereby many of their troops were wounded.

¹⁷ Pacheco;—in the siege of Cochim he defeated successively seven numerous armies raised by the zamorin for the reduction of that city.

By ancient bard, by ancient chief unknown,
Till ocean's utmost shore thy bondage owns.

" Thus from the Ganges to the Gadian strand,
From the most northern wave to southmost land;
That land decreed to bear the injur'd name
Of Magalhães, the Lusian pride and shame"⁴⁹; 490
From all that vast, though crown'd with heroes old,
Who with the gods were demi-gods enroll'd;
From all that vast no equal heroes shine
To match in arms, O lovely daughter, thine."

So spake the awful ruler of the skies,
And Maia's son swift at his mandate flies:
His charge, from treason and Mourbassa's king
The weary fleet in friendly port to bring,
And while in sleep the brave De Gama lay,
To warn, and fair the shore of rest display. 490
Fleet through the yielding air Cyllenius glides,
As to the light the nimble air divides.

The mystic helmet on his head he wore,
And in his right the fatal rod he bore⁵⁰;
That rod, of power to wake the silent dead,
Or o'er the lids of care soft slumbers shed.
And now, attended by the herald Fame,
To fair Melinda's gate conceal'd he came;
And soon loud rumour echoed through the town,
How from the western world, from waves unknown,
A noble band had reach'd the Æthiop shore, 441
Through seas and dangers never dared before.
The godlike dread attempt their wonder thro',
Their generous wonder fond regard inspires,
And all the city glows their aid to give,
To view the heroes, and their wants relieve.

"Twas now the solemn hour when midnight reigns,

And dimly twinkling o'er the ethereal plains
The starry host, by gloomy silence led,
O'er earth and sea a glimmering paleness shed; 450
When to the fleet, which hemm'd with dangers lay,
The silver-wing'd Cyllenius darts a way.
Each care was now in soft oblivion steep'd,
The watch alone accustom'd vigils kept;
E'en Gama, wearied by the day's alarms,
Forgets his cares, reclined in slumber's arms.
Scarce had he closed his careful eyes in rest,
When Maia's son in vision stood confest:
" And fly," he cried, " O Lusitanian, fly;
Here guile and treason every nerve apply: 460
An impious king for thee the toil prepares,
An impious people weave a thousand snares:
O fly these shores, unroll the gather'd sail,
Lo, Heaven, thy guide, commands the rising gale;
Hark, loud it rustles; see, the gentle tide
Invites thy prow; the winds thy lingering chide.
Here such dire welcome is for thee prepared
As Dionæda's unhappy strangers shared"⁵¹;

⁴⁹ Magalhães, a most celebrated navigator. Neglected by John II. king of Portugal, he offered his service to the kingdom of Spain, under whom he made most important discoveries round the Straits which bear his name, and in the back parts of South America; acquisitions, which at this day are of the utmost value to the Spanish empire. Of this hero see further Lusiad X. in the notes.

⁵⁰ Tum virgam capit. hac animas ille evocat Orco
Pallentes, alias sub tristis Tartara mittit,
Dat somnos adinæque, et lumina morte resignat.
Virg. Æn. iv.

⁵¹ Dionæda, a tyrant of Thrace, who sed his

His hapless guests at silent midnight bled,
On their toru limbs his smorting couriers fed. 470
O fly, or here with strangers' blood imbrued
Busiris' altars thou shalt find renew'd:
Amidst his slaughter'd guests his altars stood
Obscene with gore, and bark'd with human blood:
Then thou, below'd of Heaven, my counsel hear;
Right by the coast thine onward journey steer,
Till where the sun of noon no shade begets,
But day with night in equal tenour sets.
A sovereign there, of generous faith unfeign'd,
With ancient bounty and with joy unfeign'd 480
Your glad arrival on his shore shall greet,
And soothe with every care your weary feet.
And when again for India's golden strand
Before the prosperous gale your sails expand,
A skilful pilot oft in danger try'd,
Of heart sincere, shall prove your faithful guide."

Thus Hercules spoke, and as his flight he takes Melting in ambient air, De Gama wakes.
Chill'd with amaze he stood, when through the night
With sudden ray appear'd the bursting light; 490
The winds loud whizzing through the cordage sigh'd—

" Spread, spread the sail," the raptur'd Vasco
" Aloft, aloft, this, this the gale of Heaven; [cried;
By Heaven our guide th' auspicious sign is given:
Mine eyes beheld the messenger divine;
' O fly,' he cried, and gave the favouring sign,
' Here treason lurks.'"—Swift as the captain spake
The mariners spring bounding to the deck,
And now with shouts far-echoing o'er the sea,
Proud of their strength the ponderous anchors 500 weigh.

When Heaven again its guardian care display'd⁵²;
Above the wave rose many a Moorish head—
Conceal'd by night they gently swam along,
And with their weapons sawed the cables strong,
That by the swelling currents whirl'd and tost.
The navy's wrecks might strew the rocky coast:
But now discover'd, every nerve they ply,
And dive, and swift as frighten'd vermin fly.

Now through the silver waves that curling rose,
And gently murmur'd round the sloping prows, 510
The gallant fleet before the steady wind
Sweeps on, and leaves long foamy tracks behind;

horses with human flesh; a thing, says the grave
Cætera, præque incroyable, almost incredible.
Busiris was a king of Egypt, who sacrificed strangers.

Quis—illaudati nascit Busiridis aras?

Virg. Geor. iii.

Hercules vanquish'd both these tyrants, and put them to the same punishments which their cruelty had inflict'd on others. Isocrates compos'd an oration in honour of Busiris; a masterly example of Attic railery and satire. To this Cætera wisely appeals, to prove the truth of the history of that tyrant.

⁵² Having mentioned the escape of the Moorish pilots, Omerius proceeds: Rex deinde homines magno cum silentio scaphis et litribus submittebat, qui securibus anchoralia nocte præciderunt.
Quod nisi fuisset à noctris singulari Gama industria vigilatum, et insidiis scelerati illius regis oc-cursum, nostri in summum vitam discrimen incidissent.

While as they sail the joyful crew relate
Their wondrous safety from impending fate;
And every bosom feels how sweet the joy
When dangers past the grateful tongue employ.

The Sun had now his annual journey run,
And blazing forth another course began,
When smoothly gliding o'er the hoary tide
Two sloops afar the watchful master spied; 530
Their Moorish make the seaman's art display'd;
Here Gama weens to force the pilot's aid:
One, base with fear, to certain shipwreck flew;
The keel, dash'd on the shore, escap'd the crew.
The other bravely trusts the generous foe,
And yields, ere slaughter struck the lifted bow,
Ere Vulcan's thunders bellowed. Yet again
The captain's prudence and his wish were vain;
No pilot here his wandering course to guide,
No lip to tell where rolls the Indian tide; 530
The voyage calm, or perilous, or afar,
Beneath what Heaven, or which the guiding star:
Yet this they told, that by the neighbouring bay
A potent monarch reign'd, whose pious way
For truth and noblest bounty far renown'd,
Still with the stranger's grateful praise was crown'd.
O'erjoy'd brave Gama heard the tale, which seal'd
The sacred truth that Maia's sun reveal'd;
And bids the pilot, warn'd by Heaven his guide,
For fair Melinda turn the helm aside. 540

'T was now the jovial season, when the morn
From Taurus flames, when Amalthea's horn
O'er bill and dale the rose-crown'd Flora pours,
And scatters corn and wine, and fruits and flowers.
Right to the port their course the fleet pursued,
And the glad dawn that sacred day renew'd,
When with the spoils of vanquish'd death adorn'd
To Heaven the victor of the tomb return'd.
And soon Melinda's shore the sailors spy;
From every mast the purple streamers fly; 550
Rich-flour'd tap'stry now supplies the sail,
The gold and scarlet tremble in the gale;
The standard brood its brilliant hues bewrays,
And floating on the wind wide-blowing plays;
Shall through the air the quivering trumpet sounds;
And the rough drum the rousing march rebounds.
As thus regardful of the sacred day
The festive navy out the watery way,
Melinda's sons the shore in thousands crowd,
And offering joyful welcome shout aloud; 560
And truth the voice inspired. Unawed by fear,
With warlike pomp adorn'd, himself sincere,
Now in the port the generous Gama rides;
His stately vessels range their pitchy sides
Around their chief; the bowsprits nod the head,
And the barb'd anchors gripe the harbour's bed.
Straight to the king, as friends to generous friends,
A captive Moor the valiant Gama sends,
The Lusitan fame the king already knew,
What gulfs unknown the fleet had labour'd through,
What shelves, what tempests dar'd: his liberal mind
Exalts the captain's manly trust to find; 570
With that ennobling worth, whose food employ
Benefits the brave, the monarch owns his joy,
Entreats the leader and his weary band
To taste the dews of sweet repose on land,
And all the riches of his cultured fields
Obedient to the nod of Gama yields.
His care meanwhile their present want attends,
And various fowl and various fruits he sends; 580
The oxen low, the fleecy lambskins bleat,
And rural sounds are echoed through the fleet.

His gifts with joy the valiant chief receives
And gifts in turn, confirming friendship, gives
Here the proud carlet darts its ardent rays,
And here the purple and the orange blaze:
O'er these profuse the branching coral spread,
The coral woodroos in its watery bed²³;
Soft there it creeps, in curving branches thrown;
In air it hardens to a precious stone. 590
With these a herald, on whose melting tongue
The copious rhet'ric of Symbia hung²⁴,
He sends, his wants and purpose to reveal,
And holy vows of lasting peace to seal.
The monarch sits amid his splendid bands,
Before the regal throne the herald stands,
And thus, as eloquence his lips inspired,
"O king!" he cries, "for sacred truth admired,
Ordain'd by Heaven to bend the stubborn knees
Of daught'ring nations to thy just decrees; 600
Fear'd as thou art, yet sent by Heaven to prove That empire's strength results from public love;
To thee, O king, for friendly aid we come;
Nor lawless robbers o'er the deep we roam:
No lust of gold could e'er our breasts inflame
To scatter fire and slaughter where we came;
Nor sword nor spear our harmless hands employ
To seize the careless, or the weak destroy.
At our most potent monarch's dread command 609
We spread the sail from lordly Egropes' strand:
Through seas unknown, through gulfs untried be-
We force our journey to the Indian shore. {fore,
"Alas, what ravour fires the human breast!
By what stern tribes are Affric's shores possess'd!
How many a wile they try'd, how many a snare!
Not wisdom sav'd us, 'twas the Heaven's own care
Nor harbours only, e'en the barren sands
A place of rest deny'd our weary bands:
From us, alas, what harm could prudence fear!
From us so few, their numerous friends so near! 623
While thus from show to cruel shore long driven,
To thee conducted by a guide from Heaven,
We come, O monarch, of thy truth assured,
Of hospitable rites by Heaven secured;
Such rites as old Alcinous' palace grac'd²⁵,
When lost Ulysses sat his favour'd guest.
Nor deem, O king, that cold suspicion taints
Our valiant leader, or his wish prevents:
Great is our monarch, and his dread command
To our brave captain interdicts the land. 650
Till Indian earth be tread. What nobler cause
Than loyal faith can wake thy fond applause,
O thou, who know'st the ever-pressing weight
Of kingly office, and the cares of state!"

²⁶ Castera's note on this place is so characteristic of a Frenchman, that the reader will perhaps be pleased to see it transcribed. In his text he says, Toi qui occupes si dignement le rang suprême.—In the note he thus apologizes, Le poëte dit, Tens de rey o officio, Toi qui fais le metier de Roi.—The poet says, 'Thou who holdest the

And hear, ye conscious Heavens, if Gama's heart
Forget thy kindness, or from truth depart,
The sacred light shall perish from the Sun,
And rivers to the sea shall cease to run."

He spake:—a murmur of applause succeeds,
And each with wonder own'd the val'rous deeds 640
(Of that bold race, whose flowing vanes had wav'd
Beneath so many a sky, so many an ocean brav'd.
Nor less the king their loyal faith reveres,
And Lisbon's lord in awful state appears,
Whose least command on furthest shores obey'd,
His sovereign grandeur to the world display'd.
Elate with joy, uprose the royal Moor,
And, smiling, thus: "O welcome to my shore!
If yet in you the fear of treason dwell,
Far from your thoughts th' ungenerous fear expell:
Still with the brave the brave will honour bid, 651
And equal ardour will their friendship bind.
But those who spurn'd you, men alone in show,
Rode as the bestial herd, no worth they know;
Such dwell not here: and since your laws require Obedience strict, I yield my food desire.

business of a king.' I confess I found a strong inclination to translate this sentence literally. I find much nobleness in it. However, I submitted to the opinion of some friends, who were afraid that the ears of Frenchmen would be shocked at the word business applied to a king. It is true, nevertheless, that royalty is a business. Philip II. of Spain was convinced of it, as we may discern from one of his letters. 'Hailo, says he, me muy embaraçado, &c. 'I am so entangled and encumbered with the multiplicity of business, that I have not a moment to myself. In truth, we kings hold a laborious office, there is little reason to envy us.'" May the politeness of England never be disgusted with the word business applied to a king!

The propriety and artfulness of Homer's speeches have been often and justly admired. Camoëns is peculiarly happy in the same department of the epopœia. The speech of Gama's herald to the king of Melinda is a striking instance of it. The compliments with which it begins have a direct tendency to the favours afterwards to be asked. The assurance of the innocence, the purpose of the voyagers, and the greatness of their king, are happily touched. The exclamation on the barbarous treatment they had experienced, "Not wisdom sared us, but Heaven's own care," are masterly insinuations. Their barbarous treatment is again repeated in a manner to move compassion: "Alas! what could they fear, &c." is reasoning joined with the pathetic. That they were conducted to the king of Melinda by Heaven, and were by Heaven assured of his truth, is a most delicate compliment, and in the true spirit of the epic poem. The allusion to Alcibiades is well timed. The apology for Gama's refusal to come on shore is exceeding artful. It conveys a proof of the greatness of the Portuguese sovereign, and affords a compliment to loyalty, which could not fail to be acceptable to a monarch. In short, the whole of the speech supplicates warmly, but at the same time in the most manly manner; and the adjuration concludes it with all the appearance of warmth and sincerity. Eustathius would have written a whole chapter on such a speech in the Iliad or Odyssey.

Though much I wish'd your chief to grace my Fair be his duty to his sovereign lord: [board,
Yet when the morn walks forth with dewy feet
My barge shall wait me to the warlike fleet; 660
There shall my longing eyes the heroes view,
And holy vows the mutual peace renew.
What from the blustering winds and lengthening tide

Your ships have suffer'd, shall be here supply'd.
Arms and provisions I myself will send,
And, great of skill, a pilot shall attend."

So spake the king: and now, with purpled ray,
Beneath the shining wave the god of day
Retiring, left the evening shades to spread;
And to the fleet the joyful herald sped. 670
To find such friends each breast with rapture glows,
The feast is kindled, and the goblet flows;
The trembling comet's imitated rays
Bound to the skies, and trail a sparkling blaze:
The vaulting bombs awake their sleeping fire,
And like the Cyclops' bolts, to Heaven aspire:
The bombardiers their roaring engines ply,
And earth and ocean thunder to the sky,
The trumpet and fife's shrill clarion far around
The glorious music of the fight resound. 680

Nor less the joy Melinda's sons display,
The sulphur bursts in many an ardent ray,
And to the Heaven ascends in whizzing gyros,
And ocean flames with artificial fires.

In festive war the sea and land engage,
And echoing shouts confess the joyful rage.
So pass'd the night: and now with silvery ray
The star of morning ushers in the day.
The shadows fly before the roscate hours,
And the chill dew hangs glittering on the flowers:

The pruning-hook or humble spade to wield, 690
The cheerful labourer hastens to the field;
When to the fleet with many a sounding oar
The monarch sails; the natives crowd the shore.

Their various robes in one bright splendour join,
The purple blazes, and the gold-stripes shine;
Nor as stern warriors with the quivering lance,
Or moon-arch'd bow, Melinda's sons advance;
Green boughs of palm with joyful hands they wave,
An omen of the mood that crowns the brave. 700
Fair was the show the royal barge display'd,
With many a flag of glistening silk array'd,
Whose various hues, as waving through the bay,
Return'd the lustre of the rising day:

And onward as they came, in sovereign state
The mighty king amid his princes sat:
His robes the pomp of eastern splendour show,
A proud tiara decks his lordly brow:
The various tissue shines in every fold,
The silken lustre and the rays of gold. 710

His purple mantle boasts the dye of Tyre,
And in the sun-beam glows with living fire.
A golden chain, the skilful artist's pride,
Hung from his neck; and glittering by his side
The dagger's hilt of star-bright diamond shone,
The girding baldric burns with precious stone;
And precious stone in studs of gold enchased,
The shaggy velvet of his buskins grac'd:
Wide o'er his head, of various silks inlaid,
A fair umbrella cast a grateful shade. 720

A band of menials, bending o'er the prow,
Of horn wreath'd round the crooked trumpets
blow;
And each attendant barge aloud rebounds
A barbarous discord of rejoicing sounds.

With equal pomp the captain leaves the fleet,
 Melinda's monarch on the tide to greet :
 His barge nods on amidst a splendid train,
 Himself adorn'd in all the pride of Spain :
 With fair embroidery shows his armed breast,*
 For polish'd steel supply'd the warrior's vest ; 730
 His sleeves, beneath, were silk of paly hue
 Above, more loose, the purple's brightest hue
 Hung as a scarf, in equal gatherings roll'd ;
 With golden bottons and with hoops of gold :
 Bright in the sun the polish'd radiance burns,
 And the dimen'd eye-hell from the lustre turns.
 Of crimson satin, dazzling to behold,
 His camock swell'd in many a curving fold ;
 The make was Gallic, but the lively bloom
 Camoens'd the labour of Venetia's loom : 740
 Gold was his sword, and warlike trousers, faced
 With thongs of gold, his manly legs embraced :
 With graceful mien his cap aslant was turn'd ;
 The velvet cap a nodding plume adorn'd.
 His noble aspect, and the purple's ray,
 Amidst his train the gallant chief bewray.
 The various vestments of the warrior train,
 Like flowers of various colours on the plain,
 Attract the pleas'd beholder's wondering eye,
 And with the splendour of the rainbow vie. 750
 Now Gama's bands the quivering trumpet blow,
 Thick o'er the wave the crowding barges row,
 The Moorish flags the curling waters sweep,
 The Lusian mortars thunder o'er the deep ;
 Again the fiery roar Heaven's concave tears,
 The Moors astonish'd stop their wounded ears :
 Again loud thunders rattle o'er the bay,
 And clouds of smoke wide-rolling blot the day ;
 The captain's barge the generous king ascends,
 His arms the chief enfold ; the captain bends, 760
 A reverence to the sceptred grandeur due :
 In silent awe the monarch's wondering view
 Is fixt on Vasco's noble mien* ; the while
 His thoughts with wonder weigh the hero's toil.
 Esteem and friendship with his wonder rise,
 And free to Gama all his kingdom lies.
 Though never son of Lusius' race before
 Had met his eye, or trod Melinda's shore,
 To him familiar was the mighty name,
 And much his talk extols the Lusian fame ; 770
 How through the vast of Africa's wildest bound
 Their deathless feats in gallant arms resound ;
 When that fair land where Hesper's offspring
 reign'd,
 Their valour's prize the Lusian youth obtain'd.
 Much still he talk'd, enraptured of the theme,
 Though but the faint vibrations of their fame
 To him had echoed. Pleas'd his warmth to view,
 Convinced his promise and his heart were true,
 The illustrious Gama thus his soul express'd,
 And own'd the joy that labour'd in his breast : 780

* Camoens seems to have his eye on the picture of Gama, which is thus described by Faria y Sousa : " He is painted with a black cap, cloak and breeches edged with velvet, all slashed, through which appears the crimson lining, the doublet of crimson satin, and over it his armour inlaid with gold."

† The admiration and friendship of the king of Melinda, so much insisted on by Camoens, is a judicious imitation of Virgil's Dido. In both cases such preparation was necessary to introduce the long episodes which follow.

" O thou, benign, of all the tribes alone,
 Who feel the rigour of the burning zone,
 Whose piety, with mercy's gentle eye
 Beholds our wants, and gives the wish'd supply ;
 Our navy driven from many a barbarous coast,
 On many a tempest-harrowed ocean tost,
 At last with thee a kindly refuge finds,
 Safe from the fury of the howling winds.
 O generous king, may he whose mandate rolls
 The circling Heavens, and human pride controls,
 May the Great Spirit to thy breast return 791
 That needful aid, bestowed on us forlorn !
 And while yon Sun emits his rays divine,
 And while the stars in midnight azure shine,
 Where'er my sails are stretch'd the world around,
 Thy praise shall brighten, and thy name resound."

He spoke ; the painted barges swept the flood,
 Where, proudly gay, the anchor'd navy rode ;
 Earnest the king the lordly fleet surveys ;
 The mortars thunder, and the trumpets raise 800
 Their martial sounds Melinda's ears to greet ;
 Melinda's sons with timbrels hail the fleet.
 And now no more the sulphury tempest roars ;
 The boatmen leaning on the rested oars
 Breathe short ; the barges now at anchor moor'd,
 The king, while silence listen'd round, implored
 The glories of the Lusian wars to hear,
 Whose faintest echoes long had pleas'd his ear :
 Their various triumphs on the Afric shore
 O'er those who hold the son of Hagar's lore, 810
 Fond he demands, and now demands again
 Their various triumphs o'er the western main :
 Again, ere readiest answer found a place,
 He asks the story of the Lusian race ;
 What god was founder of the mighty line,
 Beneath what heaven their land, what shores adjoining
 And what their climate, where the sinking day
 Gives the last glimpse of twilight's silvery ray.
 " But most, O chief," the zealous monarch cries,
 " What raging seas you braved, what lurking 820
 skies ;

What tribes, what rites you saw ; what savage hate
 On our rude Afric proved your hapless fate :
 O tell ! for lo, the chilly dawning star
 Yet rides before the morning's purple car ;
 And o'er the wave the Sun's bold couriers raise
 Their flaming fronts, and give the opening blaze ;
 Soft on the glassy wave the zephyrs sleep,
 And the still billows holy silence keep.
 Nor less are we, undaunted chief, prepar'd
 To hear thy nation's gallant deeds declared ; 830
 Nor think, though scorch'd beneath the car of day,
 Our minds too dull the debt of praise to pay ;
 Melinda's sons the test of greatness know,
 And on the Lusian race the palm bestow.

" If Titan's giant brood* with impious arms
 Shook high Olympus' brow with rude alarms ;
 If Theseus and Pirithous dared invade
 The dismal horrors of the Stygian shade,
 Nor less your glory, nor your boldness less,
 That thus expiring Neptune's last recess 840
 Contemn his waves and tempestal ! If the thirst
 To live in fame, though fam'd for deeds accurst,
 Could urge the caitiff, who to win a name
 Gave Dian's temple to the wasting flame ;

* For a defence of the king of Melinda's leaving, ignorantly objected, by Voltaire, see the preface.

If such the ardour to attain renown,
How bright the lustre of the hero's crown,
Whose deeds of fair surprise his honours raise,
And bind his brows, like thine, with deathless bays!"

LUSIAD III.

O's now, Calliope, thy potent aid!
What to the king th' illustrious Gama said
Clothe in immortal verse. With sacred fire
My breast, if e'er it loved thy lore, inspire:
So may the patron of the healing art,
The god of day, to thee consign his heart!
From thee, the mother of his darling son,¹
May never wandering thought to Daphne run!
May never Clytia, nor Leucothoe's pride
Henceforth with thee his changeful love divide! 10
Then aid, O fairest nymph, my fond desire,
And give my verse the Lusian warlike fire:
Fired by the song, the listening world shall know
That Aganippe's streams from Tagus flow.
Oh, let no more the fowers of Pindus shine
On thy fair breast, or round thy temples twine:
On Tagus' banks a richer chaplet bloom,
And with the tuneful god my bosom glow:
I feel, I feel the mighty power infuse,
And bathe my spirit in Aonian dews! 20

Now silence woo'd th' illustrious chief's reply,
And keen attention watch'd on every eye;
When slowly turning with a modest grace,
The noble Vasco raised his manly face;
"O mighty king," he cries, "at thy command
The martial story of my active hand
I tell; but more my doubtful heart had joy'd
Had other wars my praiseful lips employ'd.
When men the honours of their race commend,
The doubts of strangers on the tale attend: 30
Yet though reluctance falter on my tongue,
Though day would fail a narrative so long,
Yet well assured no fiction's glare can raise,
Or give my country's fame a brighter praise;
Though less, far less, what'er my lips can say,
Thou truth must give it, I thy will obey.

"Between that zone where endless winter reigns,
And that where flaming heat consumes the plains;
Array'd in green, beneath indulgent skies,
The queen of arts and arms, fair Europe, lies. 40
Around her northern and her western shores,
Throng'd with the fenny race old Ocean roars;
The midland sea, where tide ne'er swell'd the waves,
Her richest laws, the southern border, leaves.

¹ Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, and mother of Orpheus. Daphne, daughter of the river Peneus, flying from Apollo, was turned into the laurel. Clytia was metamorphosed into the sun-flower; and Leucothoe, who was buried alive by her father for yielding to the solicitations of Apollo, was by her lover changed into an incense tree. The physical meaning of these fables is obvious.

* The preface to the speech of Gama, and the description of Europe which follows, are happy imitations of the manner of Homer. When Camoëns describes countries, or musters an army, it is after the example of the great models of antiquity. By adding some characteristic feature of the climate or people, he renders his narrative pleasing, picturesque, and poetical.

Against the rising moon, the northmost bound
The whirling Tanais parts from Asian ground,
As tumbling from the Scythian mountains cold
Their crooked way the rapid waters hold
To dull Mæotid' lake; her eastern line,
More to the south, the Phrygian waves confine; 30
Those waves, which, black with many a navy, bore
The Grecian heroes to the Dardian shore;
Where now the seamen rapt in mournful joy
Explore in vain the sad remains of Troy.
Wide to the north beneath the pole she spreads;
Here piles of mountains rear their rugged heads,
Here winds on winds in endless tempests roarl,
The valleys sigh, the lengthening echoes howl.
On the rude cliffs with frosty spangles gray,
Weak as the twilight gleams the solar ray; 60
Each mountain's breast with snows eternal shrouds,
The streams and seas eternal frost confines.
Here dwelt the numerous Scythian tribes of old,
A dreadful race! by victor ne'er controll'd,
Whose pride maintain'd that theirs the sacred earth,
Not that of Nile, which first gave man his birth.
Here dismal Lapland spreads a dreary wild,
Here Norway's wastes, where harvest never smil'd,
Whose groves of fir in gloomy horror frown,
Nod o'er the rocks, and to the tempest groan. 70
Here Scandinavia's clime her rugged shores extends,
And far projected, through the ocean bends;
Whose soar' dread footsteps yet Anaxias wears,²
And yet proud Roose in mournful vain bears.

² In the year 409 the city of Rome was sacked and Italy laid desolate by Alaric, king of the Scandian and other northern tribes. In mentioning this circumstance Camoëns has not fallen into the common error of little poets, who on every occasion bewail the outrage which the Goths and Vandals did to the arts and sciences. Those arts and sciences, however, which give vigour to the mind, long ere the irruption of the northern tribes were in the most languid state. The southern nations of Europe were sunk into the most contemptible degeneracy. The sciences, with every branch of manly literature, were almost unknown. For near two centuries no poet or writer of note had adorned the Roman empire. Those arts only, the abuse of which has a certain and fatal tendency to enervate the mind, the arts of music and cookery, were passionately cultivated in all the refinements of effeminate abuse. The art of war was too laborious for their delicacy, and the generous warmth of heroism and patriotism was incompatible with their effeminacy. Whoever reads the history of the later emperors of Rome will find it hard to explain how minds illuminated, as it is pretended, by letters and science, could at the same time be so broken as to suffer the basest subjection to such weak and wanton tyrants. That the general mind of the empire did suffer, for several centuries, the weakest and most cupricious tyranny, is a fact beyond dispute, a fact, which most strongly marks their degenerated character. On these despicable Sybarites* the North poured her brave and hardy sons, who, though ignorant of polite literature

When summer bursts stern winter's icy chain,
 Here the bold Swede, the Prussian, and the Dane,
 Hoist the white sail, and plough the foamy way,
 Cheer'd by whole months of one continual day.
 Between these shores and Tanais' rushing tide
 Livonia's sons and Russia's hordes reside. 80
 Stern as their clime the tribes, whose sires of yore
 The name, far dreaded, of Sarmatians bore.
 Where, famed of old, th' Hercynian forest lour'd,
 Oft seen in arms the Polish troops are pour'd
 Wide foraging the downs. The Saxon race,
 The Hungar dextrous in the wild-boar chase;
 The various nations whom the Rhine's cold wave,
 The Elbe, Amasis, and the Danube lave,
 Of various tongues, for various princes known,

 Where hapless Helle left her name; and died,
 The dreadful god of battles' kindred race,
 Degenerate now, possess the hills of Thrace.

 And proud Byzantium, long with empire crown'd;
 Their ancient pride, their ancient-virtue fled,

 And here those happy lands where genius shows 100

 In all the pride of elegance and arms,
 Which to the Heavens resounded Grecia's name,
 And left in every age a deathless fame.

ture, were possessed of all the manly virtues of the Scythians in a high degree*. Under their conquests Europe wore a new and a vigorous face; and which, however rude, was infinitely preferable to that languid and sickly female countenance which it had lately worn. Even the ideas of civil liberty were lost. But the rights of mankind were claimed, however rude their laws, by the northern invaders. And however ignorance may talk of their barbarity, it is to them that England owes her constitution, which, as Montesquieu observes, they brought from the woods of Saxony. The spirit of gallantry and romantic attachment to the fair sex, which distinguished the northern heroes, will make their manners admired, while, considered in the same point, the polished ages of Greece and Rome excite our horror and detestation. To add no more, it is to the irruption of these brave barbarians that modern Europe owes those remains of the spirit of liberty, and some other of the greatest advantages which she may at present possess. They introduced a vigour of mind, which, under the consequences of the crusades, and a variety of other causes, has not only been able to revive the arts and improve every science, but has also investigated and ascertained the political interest and rights of mankind, in a manner unknown to the brightest ages of the ancient world.

* See Wartoo's Hist. of Eng. Poetry, dissert. ii. p. 3.

Here Italy her benignant landscapes shows;
 Around her sides his arms old Ocean throws;
 The dashing waves the rampart's aid supply;
 The heavy Alps, high towering to the sky,
 From shore to shore a rugged barrier spread,
 And loud destruction on the hostile tread.
 But now no more her hostile spirit brags;
 There now the saint in humble vespers mourns;
 To Heaven more grateful than the pride of war,
 And all the triumphs of the victor's car. 120
 Onward fair Gallia opens to the view
 Her groves of olive, and her vineyards blue:
 Wide spread her harvests o'er the scenes renown'd,
 Where Julius proudly strode with laurel crown'd.
 Here Segus,—how fair when glistening to the Moon!
 Rolls his white wave! and here the cold Garoon;
 Here the deep Rhine the flowery margin laves;
 And here the rapid Rhone imperious raves.
 Here the gruff mountains, faithless to the vows
 Of lost Pyrene, rear their cloudy brows; 130
 Whence, when of old the flames their woods devour'd,
 Streams of red gold and melted silver pour'd.
 And now, as head of all the lordly train
 Of Europe's realms, appears illustrious Spain 3.
 Alas, what various fortunes has she known!
 Yet ever did her woes her wrongs atone;
 Short was the triumph of her haughty foes,
 And still with fairer bloom her honour rose.
 Where, lock'd with land the struggling currents boil,
 Fam'd for the godlike Theban's latest toil*, 140
 Against one coast the Ponic strand extends,
 And round her breast the midland ocean bends:
 Around her shores two various oceans swell,
 And various nations in her bosom dwell;
 Such deeds of valour dignify their names,
 Each the imperial right of honour claims.
 Proud Arragon, who twice her standard rear'd
 In conquer'd Naples; and for art revered,
 Galicia's prudent sons; the fierce Navar;
 And he far dreaded in the Moorish war, 150

* She was daughter to Bebryx, a king of Spain, and concubine to Hercules. Having one day wandered from her lover, she was destroyed by wild beasts, on one of the mountains which bear her name. Diodorus Siculus, and others, derive the name of the Pyreneans from pyr, fire. To support which etymology they relate, that by the negligence of some shepherds the ancient forests on these mountains were set on fire, and burned with such vehemence, that the melted metals spouted out and ran down from the sides of the hills. The allusion to this old tradition is in the true spirit of Homer and Virgil.—C.

* It is remarkable, that in this description of Europe, England should be entirely omitted; of so little consequence in the political scale did she then seem. The time when Camoëns wrote this may be estimated from the beginning of the seventh book, which appears to have been written in the reign of Henry VIII. though the Lusiad was not published till the fourteenth of Elizabeth.

* Hercules, says the fable, to crown his labours, separated the two mountains Calpe and Abyla, the one now in Spain, the other in Africa, in order to open a canal for the benefit of commerce. Upon this opening, the ocean rushed in, and formed the Mediterranean, the Egean, and Euxine seas.

The bold Asturias; nor Beville's race,
Nor thine, Granada, claim the second place.
Here too the heroes who command the plain
By Betis water'd; here, the pride of Spain,
The brave Castilian pauses o'er his sword,
His country's dread deliverer and lord.
Proud o'er the rest, with splendid wealth array'd,
As crown'd to this wide empire, Europe's head,
Fair Lusitania smiles, the western bound,
Whose verdant breast the rolling waves surround,
Where gentle evening pours her lambent ray, 161
The last pale gleaming of departing day:
This, this, O mighty king, the sacred earth,
This the lov'd parent-soil that gave me birth.
And oh, would bounteous Heaven my prayer regard,
And fair success my perilous toils reward,
May that dear land my latest breath receive,
And give my weary bones a peaceful grave!

" Sublime the honours of my native land,
And high in Heaven's regard her heroes stand; 170
By Heaven's decree? 'twas theirs the first to quell
The Moorish tyrants, and from Spain expell;
Nor could their burning wilds conceal their flight,
Their burning wilds confess'd the Lusian might.
From Lusitania famed, whose honour'd name we bear,
(The son of Iacchos or the bold cumpeer,)
The glorious name of Lusitania rose,
A name tremendous to the Roman foes,
When her bold troops the valiant shepherd led,
And foul with rout the Roman eagles fled; 180
When haughty Rome achiev'd the treach'rous blow^a.

That own'd her terror of the matchless foe.
But when no more her Viriatus fought,
Age after age her deeper thralldom brought;
Her broken sons by ruthless tyrants spurs'd,
Her vineyards languish'd, and her pastures
moura'd;

Till time revolving raised her drooping head,
And o'er the wondering world her conquests spread.
Thus rose her power: the lands of lordly Spain
Were now the brave Alonzo's wide domain; 190
Great were his honours in the bloody fight,
And Fame proclaim'd him champion of the right.
And oft the groaning Saracen's proud crest
And shatter'd mail his awful force confess'd.
From Calpe's summits to the Caspian shore
Loud-tongued renown his godlike actions bore,
And many a chief from distant regions came^b
To share the laurels of Alonzo's fame;

^a This boast is according to the truth of history. In the days of Portuguese heroism, this first expulsion of the Moors was esteemed as a mark of the favour with which Heaven had crownd their defence of the Catholic faith. See the Preface.

^b The assassination of Viriatus. See book I. note 19. p. 634.

^c Don Alonzo, king of Spain, apprehensive of the superior number of the Moors, with whom he was at war, demanded assistance from Philip I. of France, and of the duke of Burgundy. According to the military spirit of the nobility of that age, no sooner was his desire known than numerous bodies of troops thronged to his standard. These, in the course of a few years, having shown signal proofs of their courage, the king distinguished the leaders with different marks of his regard. To Henry, a younger son of the duke of Burgundy,

Yet more for holy Faith's unspotted cause
Their spears they wielded, than for Fame's applause. 200

Great were the deeds their thundering arms display'd,

And still their foremost swords the battle sway'd.
And now to honour with distinguish'd deed
Each hero's worth, the generous king decreed.
The first and bravest of the foreign lands
Hungaria's younger son brave Henry stands²⁰.
To him are given the fields where Tagus flows,
And the glad king his daughter's hand bestows;
The fair Teresa abines his blooming bride,
And owns her father's love, and Henry's pride. 210
With her, besides, the sire confirms in dower
Whate'er his sword might rescue from the Moor;
And soon on Hagar's race the hero pours
His warlike fury—soon the vanquish'd Moors
To him far round the neighbouring lands resign,
And Heaven rewards him with a glorious line.
To him is born, Heaven's gift, a gallant son,
The glorious founder of the Lusian throne.

he gave his daughter Teresa in marriage, with the sovereignty of the countries to the south of Galicia, commissioning him to enlarge his boundaries by the expulsion of the infidels. Under the government of this great man, who reigned by the title of count, his dominion was greatly enlarged, and became more rich and populous than before. The two provinces of Entre Minho e Douro, and Fia los Montes, were subdued, with that part of Beira which was held by the Moorish king of Lamego, whom he constrained to pay tribute. Many thousands of Christians, who had fled to the mountains, took shelter under the protection of count Henry. Great multitudes of the Moors also chose to submit, and remain in their native country under a mild government. These advantages, added to the great fertility of the soil of Henry's dominions, will account for the numerous armies and the frequent wars of the first sovereigns of Portugal.

²⁰ Camoens, in making the founder of the Portuguese monarchy a younger son of the king of Hungary, has followed the old chronologist Galvan. The Spanish and Portuguese historians differ widely in their accounts of the parentage of this gallant stranger. Some bring him from Constantinople, and others from the house of Lorraine. But the clearest and most probable account of him is in the chronicle of Fleury, wherein is preserved a fragment of French history, written by a Benedictine monk in the beginning of the twelfth century, and in the time of count Henry. By this it appears, that he was a younger son of Henry, the only son of Robert, the first duke of Burgundy, who was a younger brother of Henry I. of France. Fanshaw, having an eye to this history, has taken the unwarrantable liberty to alter the fact as mentioned by his author:

Amongst these Henry, saith the history,
A younger son of France, and a brave prince,
Had Portugal in lot—
And the same king did his own daughter tie
To him in wedlock, to infer from thence
His firmer love—

 Whose hallow'd waters bath'd the Saviour-God;
 And Salem's gate her open folds display'd,
 When Godfrey conquer'd by the hero's aid.
 But now no more in tented fields opposed,
 By Tagus' stream his honour'd age he closed;
 Yet still his dauntless worth, his virtue lived,
 And all the father in the son survived.
 And soon his worth was proved; the parent dame¹²

and other Portuguese historians, are at great pains to prove that she was the legitimate daughter of Alonzo and the beautiful Ximera de Guzman. But it appears from the more authentic chronicle of Flourey, that Ximera was only his concubine. And it is evident from all the historians, that dona Urraca, the heiress of her father's kingdom, was younger than her half-sister, the wife of count Henry.

¹¹ His expedition to the Holy Land is mentioned by some monkish writers, but from the other parts of his history it is highly improbable. Camoëns, however, shows his judgment in adopting every traditional circumstance that might give an air of solemnity to his poem.

¹² Don Alonzo Enriquez, son of count Henry, was only entered into his third year when his father died. His mother assumed the reins of government, and appointed don Fernando Perez de Traba to be her minister. When the young prince was in his eighteenth year, some of the nobility, who either envied the power of don Perez, or were really offended with the reports that were spread of his familiarity with the prince's mother, of his intention to marry her, and to exclude the lawful heir, easily persuaded the young count to take arms, and assume the sovereignty. A battle ensued, in which the prince was victorious. Teresa, it is said, retired into the castle of Legonaso, where she was taken captive by her son, who condemned her to perpetual imprisonment, and ordered chains to be put upon her legs. That don Alonzo made war against his mother, vanquished her party, and that she died in prison about two years after, A. D. 1130, are certain. But the cause of the war, that his mother was married to, or intended to marry, don Pons, and that she was put in chains, are uncertain.

Your crime was vengeance on the faithless sire,
 But here ambition with foul lust conspires. 250
 'T was rage of love, O Scylla¹³, urged the knife
 That robb'd thy father of his fatal life;
 Here growser rage the mother's breast inflames,
 And at her guiltless son the vengeance aims;
 But aims in vain; her slaughter'd forces yield,
 And the brave youth rides victor o'er the field.
 No more his subjects lift the thirsty sword,
 Add the glad realm proclaims the youthful lord.
 But ah, how wild the noblest tempers run!
 His filial duty now forsakes the son; 260
 Secluded from the day, in clanking chains
 His rage the parent's aged limbs constrains.
 Heaven frown'd—dark vengeance looming on his brow,

And sheath'd in brass the proud Castilian rose,
 Resolved the rigor to his daughter shown
 The battle should avenge, and blood atone.
 A numerous host against the prince he sped,
 The valiant prince his little army led:
 Dire was the shock; the deep riven beams re-
 sound,

And foes with foes lie grappling on the ground. 270
 Yet though around the stripling's sacred head
 By angel hands ethereal shields were spread;
 Though glorious triumph on his valour smiled,
 Soon on his van the baffled foe recoil'd:

With bands more numerous to the field he came,
 His proud heart burning with the rage of shame.
 And now in turn Guimaria's lofty wall,
 That saw his triumph, saw the hero fall:
 Within the town immured, distress he lay,
 To stern Castilla's sword a certain prey. 280

When now the guardian of his infant years,
 The valiant Egas, as a god appears;
 To proud Casteel the suppliant noble bows,
 And faithful homage for his prince he vows.
 The proud Casteel accepts his honour'd faith,
 And peace succeeds the dreadful scenes of death.
 Yet well, alas, the generous Egas knew
 His high-soul'd prince to men would never sue,
 Would never stoop to brook the servile stain,
 To hold a borrow'd, a dependent reign. 290

And now with gloomy aspect rose the day,
 Decreed the plighted servile rites to pay;
 When Egas to redeem his faith's disgrace
 Devotes himself, his spouse, and infant race.
 In gowns of white, as sentenced felons clad,
 When to the stake the sons of guilt are led,
 With feet unshod they slowly moved along,
 And from their necks the knotted balts hang.
 'And now, O king,' the kneeling Egas cries,
 Behold my perjured honour's sacrifice: 300
 If such mean victims can atone thine ire,
 Here let my wife, my babes, myself expire.
 If generous bosoms such revenge can take,
 Here let them perish for the father's sake:

¹³ The Scylla here alluded to was, according to fable, the daughter of Nisus king of Megara, who had a purple lock, in which lay the fate of his kingdom. Minos of Crete made war against him, for whom Scylla conceived so violent a passion, that she cut off the fatal lock while her father slept. Minos on this was victorious, but rejected the love of the unnatural daughter, who in despair flung herself from a rock, and in the fall was changed into a lark.

The guilty tongue, the guilty hands are these,
Nor let a common-death thy wrath appease;
For us let off the rage of torture burn,
But to my prince, thy son, in friendship turn.¹⁴

"He spoke, and bow'd his prostrate body low,
As one who waits the lifted sabre's blow, 310

When o'er the block his languid arms are spread,
And death, forestast, whelms the heart with dread.
So great a leader thus in humbled state,
So firm his loyalty, and zeal so great,

The brave Alonzo's kindled ire subdued,
And lost in silent joy the monarch stood;

Then gave the hand, and sheath'd the hostile sword,
And to such honour honour'd peace restored¹⁵.

"O Lusian faith! O seal beyond compare!
What greater danger could the Persian dare, 320

Whose prince in tears, to view his mangled woe,
Forgot the joy for Babylon's or' throw¹⁶?

And now the youthful hero shines in arms,
The banks of Tagus echo war's alarms:

O'er Ourique's wide campaign his ensigns wave,
And the proud Saracen to combat brave.

Though prudence might arraign his fiery rage
That dared, with one, each hundred spears engage,

In Heaven's protecting care his courage lies,
And Heaven, his friend, superior force supplies. 330

Five Moorish kings against him march along,
Ismar, the noblest of the armed throng;

Yet each brave monarch claim'd the soldier's name,
And far o'er many a land was known to fame.

In all the beautiful glow of blooming years,
Beside each king a warrior nymph appears¹⁷;

Each with her sword her valiant lover guards,
With smiles inspires him, and with smiles rewards.

Such was the valour of the beautiful maid¹⁷,
Whose warlike arm proud Iliac's fate delay'd: 340

Such in the field the virgin warrior shone,
Who drank the limpid wave of Thermodon¹⁸.

"T' was morn's still hour, before the dawning ray
The stars' bright twinkling radiance died away;

When lo, resplendent in the Heaven serene,
High o'er the prince the sacred cross was seen;

The godlike prince with faith's warm glow inflamed,

"Oh, not to me, my bounteous God," exclaim'd;
"Oh, not to me, who well thy grandeur know,

But to the Pagan herd thy wonders show." 350

"The Lusian host, enraptured, mark'd the sign
That witness'd to their chief the aid divine:

Right on the foe they shake the beamy lance,
And with firm strides, and heaving breasts, advance;

Then burst the silence, "Hail, O king," they cry;
"Our king, our king," the echoing dales reply.

Fired at the sound, with fiercer ardour glows
The heaven-made monarch; on the warless foes

Rushing, he speeds his ardent bands along:
So when the chase excites the rustic throng, 360

Roused to fierce madness by their mingled cries,
On the wild bull the red-eyed mastiff flies:

The stern-brow'd tyrant roars and tears the ground,
His watchful horns portend the deathful wound;

The nimble mastiff, springing on the foe,
Avoids the furious sharpness of the blow:

Now by the neck, now by the gory sides
Hangs force, and all his bellowing rage derides:

In vain his eye-balls burn with living fire,
In vain his nostrils clouds of smoke respire; 370

His gorge turn'd down, down falls the furious prize
With hollow thundering sound, and raging dies¹⁹.

Thus on the Moors the hero rush'd along,
Th' astonish'd Moors in wild confusion throng;

They snatch their arms, the busy trumpet sounds,
With horrid yell the dread alarm rebounds;

The warlike tumult maddens o'er the plain,
As when the flame devours the bearded grain:

The nightly flames the whistling winds inspire,
Fierce through the hazy thicket pours the fire: 380

rously left them, exclaiming, "God forbid that my sword should interrupt such love!"

¹⁹ It may, perhaps, be agreeable to the reader to see Homer's description of a bull overpowered, as translated by Pope.

As when a lion, rushing from his den,
Amidst the plain of some wide-water'd fen,
(Where num'rous oxen, as at ease they feed,
At large expatiate o'er the ranker mead,)
Leaps on the herds before the herdsman's eyes;
The trembling herdsman far to distance flies;
Some lonely bull (the rest dispers'd and fled)
He singles out, arrests, and lays him dead,
Thus from the rage of Jove-like Hector flew
All Greece in heaps; but one he seiz'd, and slow, Mycenaean Periphas. Pope, ll. xv.

¹⁴ The authors of the Universal History, having related the story of Egaz, add, "All this is very pleasant and entertaining, but we see no sufficient reason to affirm that there is one syllable of it true."

But though history afford no authentic document of this transaction, tradition, the poet's authority, is not silent. And the monument of Egaz in the monastery of Paço de Souza gives it countenance. Egaz and his family are there represented, in his relief, in the attitude and garb, says Casters, as described by Camoëns.

¹⁵ When Darius laid siege to Babylon, one of his lords, named Zopyrus, having cut off his nose and ears, persuaded the enemy that he had received these indignities from the cruelty of his master. Being appointed to a chief command in Babylon, he betrayed the city to Darius. Vid. Justin.

¹⁶ The Spanish and Portuguese histories afford several instances of the Moorish chiefs being attended in the field of battle by their mistresses, and of the romantic gallantry and Amazonian courage of these ladies. Where this is mentioned, the name of George de Sylveyra ought to be recorded. When the Portuguese assisted the king of Melinda against his enemy of Oja, they gave a signal defeat to the Moors in a forest of palm-trees. In the pursuit Sylveyra saw a Moor leading off a beautiful young woman through a by-path of the wood. He pursued, and the Moor, perceiving his danger, discovered the most violent agitation for the safety of his mistress, whom he entreated to fly while he fought his enemy. But she with equal emotion refused to leave him, and persisted in the resolution to share his fate. Sylveyra, struck with this tender strife of affection, gene-

Rous'd by the crackling of the mounting blaze,
From sleep the shepherds start in wild amaze;
They snatch their clothes with many a woeful cry;
And, scatter'd devous, to the mountains fly.
Such sudden dread the trembling Moors alarms,
Wild and confused they snatch the nearest arms;
Yet flight they scorn, and eager to engage
They spur their foamy steeds, and trust their furious rage:

Amidst the horror of the headlong shock,
With foot unshaken as the living rock, 390
Stands the bold Lusian firm; the purple wounds
Gush horrible, deep groaning mope resounds;
Reeking behind the Moorish backs appear
The shifting points of many a Lusian spear;
The mail-coats, hauberts, and the harness steel'd,
Bruis'd, hackt, and torn, lie scatter'd o'er the field;
Beneath the Lusian sweepy force o'erthrown,
Crush'd by their batter'd mails the wounded groan;
Burning with thirst they draw their panting breath.
And curse their prophet as they write in death. 400
Arms sever'd from the trunks still grasp the steel²⁰,
Heads gasping roll; the fighting squadrons reel;

²⁰ There is a passage in Xenophon, upon which perhaps Camoëns had his eye. Ἐὰν δὲ τὰς ἀγῶν ἀπέστη, ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος ἀσφύγιον, &c. "When the battle was over one might behold, through the whole extent of the field, the ground purpl'd with blood, the bodies of friends and enemies stretched over each other, the shields pierced, the spears broken, and the drawn swords, some scattered on the earth, some plunged in the bosoms of the slain, and some yet grasped in the hands of the dead soldiers."

As it was necessary in the preface to give a character of the French translation of the Lusiad, some support of that character is necessary in the notes. To point out every instance of the unpoetical taste of Casters, were to give his paraphrase of every fine passage in Camoëns. His management of this battle will give an idea of his manner; it is therefore transcribed. Le Portugais heurte impetueusement les soldats d'Almar, les renverse et leur ouvre le sein à coups de lance; on se rencontre, on se choque avec une fureur qui ébranleroit le sommet de montagnes. La terre tremble sous les pas des coursiers fougueux; l'impitoyable Erinny voit des blessures énormes et de coups dignes d'elles: les guerriers de Lusie brient, coupent, taillent, enfoncent plastrons, armures, boucliers, cuirasses et turbans; la Parque étend ses ailes affreuses sur les Mauritaïnes, l'un expire en mordant la poussière, l'autre implore le secours de son prophete; têtes, jambes et bras volent et bondissent de toutes parts, l'œil n'approit que des visages couverts d'une paleur livide, que corps déchirés et qu'entrailles palpitantes. Had Casters seriously intended to burlesque his author, he could scarcely have better succeeded. As translation cannot convey a perfect idea of an author's manner, it is therefore not attempted. "The attack was with such fury that it might shake the tops of the mountains." This bombast, and the wretched anticlimax ending with turbans, are not in the original; from which indeed the whole is extremely wide. Had he added any poetical image, any flower to the embroidery of his author, the increase of the richness of the tissue would

Pointy and weak with languid arms they close,
And staggering grapple with the staggering foes:
So when an oak falls headlong on the lake,
The troubled waters, slowly settling, shake:
So faints the languid combat on the plain,
And settling staggers o'er the heaps of slain.
Again the Lusian fury wakes its fires,
The terror of the Moors new strength inspires; 410
The scatter'd few in wild confusion fly,
And total rout resounds the yelling cry.
Deft'd with one wide sheet of reeking gore,
The verdure of the lawn appears no more:
In babbling streams the lazy currents run,
And shoot red flames beneath the evening Sun.
With spoils enrich'd, with glorious trophies have rendered his work more pleasing. It was therefore his interest to do so. But it was not in the feelings of Casters to translate the Lusiad with the spirit of Camoëns.

²¹ This memorable battle was fought in the plains of Ourique, in 1139. The engagement lasted six hours; the Moors were totally routed with incredible slaughter. On the field of battle Alonzo was proclaimed king of Portugal. The Portuguese writers have given many fabulous accounts of this victory. Some affirm, that the Moorish army amounted to 380,000; others, 430,000, and others swell it to 600,000; whereas don Alonzo's did not exceed 13,000. Miracles must also be added. Alonzo, they tell us, being in great perplexity, sat down to comfort his mind by the perusal of the Holy Scriptures. Having read the story of Gideon, he sunk into a deep sleep, in which he saw a very old man in a remarkable dress come into his tent and assure him of victory. His chamberlain coming in, waked him, and told him there was an old man very importunate to speak with him. Don Alonzo ordered him to be brought in, and no sooner saw him than he knew him to be the old man whom he had seen in his dream. This venerable person acquainted him, that he was a fisherman, and had led a life of penance for sixty years on an adjacent rock, where it had been revealed to him, that if the count marched his army the next morning, as soon as he heard a certain bell ring, he should receive the strongest assurance of victory. Accordingly, at the ringing of the bell, the count put his army in motion, and suddenly beheld in the eastern sky the figure of the cross, and Christ upon it, who promised him a complete victory, and commanded him to accept the title of king, if it was offered him by the army. The same writers add, that as a standing memorial of this miraculous event, don Alonzo changed the arms which his father had given, of a cross azure in a field argent, for five escutcheons, each charged with five bezants, in memory of the five wounds of Christ. Others assert, that he gave in a field argent five escutcheons azure, in the form of a cross, each charged with five bezants argent, placed saltierwise, with a point sable, in memory of five wounds he himself received, and of five Moorish kings slain in the battle. There is an old record, said to be written by don Alonzo, in which the story of the vision is related upon his majesty's oath. The Spanish critics, however, have discovered many inconsistencies in it. They find the language intermixed with phrases not then in use: it bears the date of the year of our Lord, at a time when that era had not been introduced into Spain; and John, bishop of Coimbra, signs as a witness before John, metropolitan of Braga, which is contrary to ecclesiastical rule. These circumstances, however, are not mentioned to prove the falsehood of the vision, but to vindicate the character of don Alonzo from any share in the oath which passes under his name. The truth is, the Portuguese were always unwilling to pay any homage to the king of Castile. They adorned the battle which gave birth to their monarchy, with miracle, and the new sovereignty with a command from Heaven. circumstances extremely agreeable both to the military pride and the superstition of these times. The regal dignity and constitution of the monarchy, however, were not settled till about six years after the battle of Ourique. "For mankind," say the authors of the Universal History, "were not then so ignorant and barbarous as to suffer a change of government to be made without any further ceremony than a tumultuous huzzah." An account of the coronation of the first king of Portugal, and the principles of liberty which then prevailed in that kingdom, are worthy of our attention. The arms of don Alonzo having been attended with great success, in 1145, he called an assembly of the prelates, nobility, and commons, at Lameira. When the assembly opened, he appeared seated on the throne, but without any other marks of regal dignity. Laurence de Viegas then demanded of the assembly, whether, according to the election on the field of battle at Ourique, and the briefs of pope Eugenius III. they chose to have don Alonzo Enriquez for their king? To this they answered, they were willing. He then demanded, if they desired the monarchy should be elective or hereditary. They declared their intention to be, that the crown should descend to the heirs male of Alonzo. Laurence de Viegas then asked, "Is it your pleasure that he be invested with the ensigns of royalty?" He was answered in the affirmative; and the archbishop of Braga placed the crown upon his head, the king having his sword drawn in his hand. As soon as crowned, Alonzo thus addressed the assembly: "Blessed be God, who has always assisted me, and has enabled me, with this sword, to deliver you from all your enemies. I shall ever wear it for your defence. You have made me a king, and it is but just that you should share with me in taking care of the state. I am your king, and as such let us make laws to secure the happiness of this kingdom." Eighteen short statutes were then framed, and assented to by the people. Laurence de Viegas at length proposed the great question, whether it was their pleasure that the king should go to Leon, to do homage and pay tribute to that prince, or to any other. On this, every man, drawing his sword, cried with a loud voice, "We are free, and our king is free; we owe our liberty to our courage. If the king should at any time submit to such an act, he deserves death, and shall not reign either over us, or among us." The king then, rising up, approved this declaration, and declared that if any of his descendants consented to such a submission, he was unworthy to succeed, should be reputed incapable of wearing the crown, and that the election of another sovereign should immediately take place.

⁴² Fentshaw's translation of this is curious. It is literal in the circumstances, but the debasements marked in Italic are his own:

In these five shields he paints the recompense
(Os trinta dinheiros, the thirty denarii, says Camões.)

For which the Lord was sold, in various ink
Writing his history, who did dispense
Such favour to him, more than heart could think.
(Writing the remembrance of him, by whom

In every of the five he paints five-pence
So sums the thirty by a cinque fold cinque
Accounting that which is the center, twice,
Of the five cinques, which he doth place cross-wise.

⁴³ The tradition that Lisbon was built by Ulysses, and thence called Olyssipolis, is as common as that (and of equal authority with it) which says that Brute landed a colony of Trojans in England, and gave the name of Britannia to the island.

⁴⁴ The conquest of Lisbon was of the utmost importance to the infant monarchy. It is one of the finest ports in the world, and, ere the invention of cannon, was of great strength. The old Moorish wall was flanked by seventy-seven towers, was about six miles in length, and fourteen in circumference. When besieged by don Alonzo, according to some, it was garrisoned by an army of 200,000 men. This, not to say impossible, is highly incredible. That it was strong, however, and wellarrisoned, is certain. It is also certain, that Alonzo owed the conquest of it to a fleet of adventurers, who were going to the Holy Land, the greatest part of whom were English. One Udal sp Rhys, in his tour through Portugal, says that Alonzo gave them Almada, on the side of the Tagus opposite to Lisbon, and that Villa Franca was peopled by them, which they called Cornualia, either in honour of their native country, or from the rich meadows in its neighbourhood, where immense herds of cattle are kept, as in the English Cornwall.

⁶⁶ This assertion of Camoens is not without foundation, for it was by treachery that Herimeneric, the Goth, got possession of Lisbon.

When as a bull, whose lustful veins betray
The maddening tumult of inspiring May;
If, when his rage with fiercest ardour glows,
When in the shade the fragrant heifer lows,
If then perchance his jealous burning eye
Behold a careless traveller wander by,
With dreadful bellowing on the wretch he lies;
The wretch defenceless torn and trampled dies.
So rush'd Alonso on the gaudy train,
And pour'd victorious o'er the mangled chain; 530
The royal Moor precipitates in flight;
The mountain echoes with the wild affright
Of flying squadrons; down their arms they throw,
And dash from rock to rock to shun the foe.
The foe! what wonders may not virtue dare!
But sixty horsemen wag'd the conquering war⁶⁷.
The warlike monarch still his toil renews;
New conquest still each victory pursues.
To him Badajaz's lofty gates expand,
And the wide region owns his dread command. 540
When now enrag'd proud Leon's king beheld
Those walls subdu'd which saw his troops expell'd;
Enrag'd he saw them own the victor's sway,
And hems them round with battalious array.
With generous ire the brave Alonso glows,
By Heaven unguarded, on the numerous foes
He rushes, glorying in his wonted force,
And spurs with headlong rage his furious horse;
The combat burns, the scouring courser bounds,
And paws impetuous by the iron mounds: 550
O'er gasping foes and sounding hacklers trod
The raging steed, and headlong as he rode Dash'd the fierce monarch on a rampie bar—
Low gravelling in the dust, the pride of war,
The great Alonso lies. The captive's fate
Succeeds, alas, the pomp of regal state.
"Let iron dash his limbs," his mother cried, [died;
"And steel revenge my chains!" she spoke, and
And Heaven assented.—Now the hour was come,
And the dire curse was fall'n Alonso's⁶⁸ doom. 560

⁶⁷ The history of this battle wants authenticity.

⁶⁸ As already observed, there is no authentic proof that don Alonso used such severity to his mother as to put her in chains. Brandan says it was reported that don Alonso was born with both his legs growing together, and that he was cured by the prayers of his tutor Egas Nuncio. Legendary as this may appear, this however is deducible from it, that from his birth there was something amiss about his legs. When he was prisoner to his

No more, O Pompey, of thy fate complain,
 No more with sorrow view thy glory's stain;
 Though thy tall standards tower'd with lordly pride
 Where northern Phœnix rolls his icy tide;
 Though hot Syene, where the Sun's fierce ray
 Begets no shadow, own'd thy conquering sway;
 Though from the tribes that shiver in the gleam
 Of cold Bootes' watery glistening tear,
 To those who, parch'd beneath the burning line,
 In fragrant shades their feeble limbs recline, 570
 The various languages proclaim'd thy fame,
 And trembling own'd the terrors of thy name;
 Though rich Arabia, and Sarmatia bold,
 And Colchis, famous for the fleece of gold;
 Though Judah's land, whose sacred rites implor'd
 The one true God, and, as he taught, ador'd;
 Though Cappadocia's realm thy mandate away'd,
 And base Sophenia's sons thy nod obey'd;
 Though vast Cilicia's pirates wore thy bands,
 And those who cultur'd fair Armenia's lands, 580
 Where from the sacred mount two rivers flow,
 And what was Eden to the pilgrim show;
 Though from the vast Atlantic's bounding wave
 To where the northern tempests howl and rave
 Round Taurus' lofty brows: though vast and wide
 The various climes that bended to thy pride;
 No more with pining anguish of regret
 Bewail the borrows of Phœnix's fate:
 For great Alonzo, whose superior name
 Unequal'd victories consign to fame, 590
 The great Alonzo fell—like thine his woe;
 From optul kindred came the fatal blow.

When now the hero, humbled in the dust,
 His crime aton'd, confess'd that Heaven was just,
 Again in splendour he the throne ascends:
 Again his bow the Moorish chieftain bends.
 Wide round th' embattled gates of Santarcon
 Their shining spears and banner'd moons are seen.
 But holy rites the pious king preferr'd;
 The martyr's bones on Vincent's cape interr'd, 600
 (His sainted name the cape shall ever bear *),
 To Lisboa's walls he brought with votive care,
 And now the monarch, old and feeble grown,
 Resigns the falchion to his valiant son.
 O'er Tago's waves the youthful hero past,
 And bleeding hosts before him shrunk aghast:
 Chok'd with the slain, with Moorish carnage dy'd,
 Sevilia's river roll'd the purple tide.
 Burning for victory the warlike boy
 Spares not a day to thoughtless rest or joy. 610
 Nor long his wish unsatisfied remains:
 With the besiegers' gore he dyes the plains
 That circle Beja's wall: yet still untam'd,
 With all the fierceness of despair inflam'd, son-in-law don Fernando king of Leon, he recovered his liberty ere his leg, which was fractured in the battle, was restored to strength, on condition that as soon as he was able to mount on horseback, he should come to Leon, and in person do homage for his dominions. This condition, so contrary to his coronation agreement, he found means to avoid. He would never more mount on horseback, but, on pretence of lameness, ever after affected to ride in a cafish. This his natural, and afterward political, infirmity, the superstitious of those days ascribed to the curses of his mother.

* Tu quoque litoribus nostris, Æneia nutrit,
 Æternam moriens famam, Cætera, dediti.

Virg. Æn. vii.

The raging Moor collects his distant might;
 Wide from the shores of Atlas' starry height,
 From Amphelonia's cape, and Tingia's bay,
 Where stern Antæus held his brutal sway,
 The Mauritanian trumpet sounds to arms,
 And Juba's realm returns the hoarse alarms; 620
 The swarthy tribes in burnish'd armour shjue,
 Their warlike march Abeyla's shepherds join.
 The great Miramolín²⁰ on Tago's shores
 Far o'er the coast his banner'd thousands pours;
 Twelve kings and one beneath his ensigns stand,
 And wield their sabres at his dread command.
 The plundering bands far round the region haste,
 The mournful region lies a naked waste.
 And now sock'd in Santarcon's high towers
 The brave don Sancho shuns th' unequal powers;
 A thousand arts the furious Moor pursues, 631
 And ceaseless still the fierce assault renews.
 Huge clefts of rock, from horrid engines whirl'd,
 In smouldering volleys on the town are hurl'd;
 The brazen rams the lofty turrets shake,
 And, min'd beneath, the deep foundations quake:
 But brave Alonzo's son, as danger grows,
 His pride inflam'd, with rising courage glows;
 Each coming storm of missile darts he wards,
 Each nodding turret, and each port he guards. 640
 In that fair city, round whose verdant meads
 The branching river of Mondego spreads,
 Long worn with warlike toils, and bent with years,
 The king repos'd, when Sancho's fate he bears.
 His limbs forget the feeble steps of age,
 And the hoar warrior burns with youthful rage.
 His daring veterans, long to conquest train'd,
 He leads;—the ground with Moorish blood is stain'd;
 Turbans, and robes of various colours wrought,
 And shiver'd spears in streaming carnage float. 650
 In harrow gay lies many a weltering steed,
 And low in dust the groaning masters bleed.
 As proud Miramolín in horror fled,
 Don Sancho's javelin stretch'd him with the dead.
 In wild dismay, and torn with gushing wounds,
 The rout wide scatter'd fly the Lusian bounds.
 Their hands to Heaven the joyful victors raise,
 And every voice resounds the song of praise;
 "Nor was it stumbling chance, nor human might,
 "T was guardian Heaven," they sung, "that rul'd the fight." 660

This blissful day Alonzo's glories crown'd;
 But pale disease gave now the secret wound;
 Her icy hand his feeble limbs invades,
 And pining languor through his vitals spreads.
 The glorious monarch to the tomb descends,
 A nation's grief the funeral torch attends.
 Each winding shore for thee, Alonzo, mourns,
 Alonzo's name each woeful bay returns²¹;

²⁰ Not the name of a person, but a title, quasi sultan. The Arabs call it emir-almouminin, the emperor of the faithful.

²¹ In this poetical exclamation, expressive of the sorrow of Portugal on the death of Alonzo, Camões has happily imitated some passages of Virgil:

— Ipsæ te, Tityre, pinus,
 Ipsæ te fontes, ipsæ hæc arbusta vocabant. Ecl. i.

— Eurydicon vox ipsæ et frigida lingua,
 Ab miseram Eurydicon, animæ furiente, vocabat;
 Eurydicon toto referebant flumina ripas. G. iv.
 — Iittus, Hyla, Hyla, omnes sonaret. Ecl. vi.

For thee the rivers sigh their groves among,
And funeral murmure, wailing, roll along; 670
Their swelling tears o'erflow the wide campaign;
With floating he ds, for thee, the yellow grain,
For thee the willow browses and copes weep,
As their tall boughs lie trembling on the deep;
Adown the streams the tangled vine-leaves bow,
And all the landscape wears the look of woe.
Thus o'er the wondering world thy glories spread,
And thus thy mournful people bow the head;
While still, at eve, each dale Alonzo sighs,
And, Oh, Alonzo! every hill replies; 680
And still the mountain echoes trill the lay,
Till blushing morn brings on the noiseful day.

The youthful Sancho to the throne succeeds,
Already far renown'd for valorous deeds;
Let Betis ting'd with blood his prowess tell,
And Beja's laws, where boastful Afric fell.
Nor less, when king, his martial ardour glows,
Proud Sylves' royal walls his troops enclose:
Fair Sylves' laws the Moorish peasant plough'd,
Her vineyards cultur'd, and her valleys sow'd; 690
But Lisboa's monarch reap'd. The winds of Heaven
Roar'd high—and headlong by the tempest driven.
In Tago's breast a gallant navy sought
The sheltering port, and glad assistance brought.³²
The warlike crew, by Frederic the Kéd,
To rescue Judah's prostrate land were led;
When Guido's troops, by burning thist subdu'd,
To Saladine the foe for mercy sued.³³
Their vows were holy, and the cause the same,
To blot from Europe's shores the Moorish name. 700
In Sancho's cause the gallant navy joins,
And royal Sylves to their force resigns.

³² The Portuguese, in their wars with the Moors, were several times assisted by the English and German crusaders. In the present instance the fleet was mostly English, the troops of which nation were, according to agreement, rewarded with the plunder, which was exceeding rich, of the city of Silves.—Nuniz de Leon as cronica das Reis de Port.

³³ In the reign of Guido, the last Christian king of Jerusalem, the streams which supplied his army with water were cut off by Saladine, the victorious Mameluke; by which means Guido's army was reduced to submission. During the crusades, the fountains which supplied the Christians had been often perverted and poisoned; and it was believed that some lepers, who had been turned out of the Christian camp, assisted the enemy, by magical arts, in thus destroying them. Hence it was also believed, that every wretch afflicted with the leprosy was a magician, and that by magic they held an universal intelligence with one another over the whole world, on purpose to injure the Christian cause. On this opinion these unhappy objects of compassion were persecuted throughout Europe: several of them were condemned, and burnt at Paris; and where they experienced less severity, they were turned out of the hospitals erected for their reception. It stands upon authentic record, that the poor old lepers of St. Bartholomew's hospital, in the vicinage of Oxford, were severely persecuted for poisoning the fountains near Jerusalem. Such were the gross opinions of rank and igno- rance, ere enlightened and civilized by the intercourse of commerce.—Fox, Martyr. p. 364. Ansel. Mon. Brinton. Ox. p. 13.

Thus sent by Heaven a foreign naval band
Gave Lisboa's ramparts to the sire's command.
Nor Moorish trophies did alone adorn
The hero's name; in warlike camps though born,
Though fence'd with mountains, Leon's martial race
Smile at the battle-sign, yet foul disgrace
To Leon's haughty sons his sword achiev'd;
Proud Tui's peck his servile yoke receiv'd; 710
And far around falls many a wealthy town,
O valiant Sancho, humbled to thy frown.

While thus his laurels flourish'd wide and fair,
He dies: Alonzo reigns, his much-lov'd heir.
Alicazar lately conquer'd by the Moor,
Reconquer'd, streams with the defenders' gore.
Alonzo dies: another Sancho reigns:
Alas, with many a sigh the land complains!
Unlike his sire, a vain unthinking boy,
His servants now a jarring sway enjoy. 720

As his the power, his were the crimes of those Whom to dispense that sacred power he chose.
By various counsels waver'd and confused,
By seeming friends, by various arts abused;
Long undetermin'd, blindly rash at last,
Enrag'd, numan'd, untutor'd by the past.
Yet not like Nero, cruel and unjust,
The slave capricious of unnatural lust:
Nor had he smil'd had flames consum'd his Troy;
Nor could his people's groans afford him joy; 730
Nor did his woes from female manners spring,
Unlike the Syrian³⁴, or Sicilia's king.
No hundred cooks his costly meal prepar'd,
As heav'd the board when Rome's proud tyrant
Nor dar'd the artist hope his ear to gain, [far'd³⁵;
By new-form'd arts to point the stings of pain³⁶.
But proud and high the Lusian spirit soar'd,
And ask'd a godlike hero, for their lord,

To none accustomed but an hero's sway,
Great must he be whom that bold race obey. 740

Complaint, loud murmur'd, every city fills,
Complaint, loud echo'd, murmurs through the hills.
Alarm'd, Bulonia's warlike earl awake,³⁷
And from his listless brother's mission takes

³⁴ Sardanapalus.

³⁵ Heliogabalus, infamous for his gluttony.

³⁶ Alluding to the story of Phalaris.

³⁷ Canoëns, who was quite an enthusiast for the honour of his country, has in this instance disguised the truth of history. Don Sancho was by no means the weak prince here represented, nor did the miseries of his reign proceed from himself. The clergy were the sole authors of his and the public calamities. The Roman see was then in the height of its power, which it exerted in the most tyrannical manner. The ecclesiastical courts had long claimed the sole right to try the ecclesiastics; and to prohibit a priest to say mass for a twelve-month was by the brethren, his judges, esteem'd a sufficient punishment for murder, or any other capital crime. Alonzo II. the father of don Sancho, attempted to establish the authority of the king's courts of justice over the offending clergy. For this the archbishop of Braga excommunicated Gonzalo Mendez, the chancellor; and Honorius the pope excommunicated the king, and put his dominions under an interdict. The exterior offices of religion were suspended, the vulgar fell into the utmost dissoluteness of manners; Muhammadism made great advances, and public confusion every where

The awful sceptre.—Soon was joy restor'd,
And sove, by just succession, Lisbon's lord,
Belov'd, Alonzo nam'd the Bold, he reigns;
Nor may the limits of his sire's domains
Confine his mounting spirit. When he led His smiling consort to the bridal bed,
"Algarbia's realm," he cried, "shall prove thy dower,"

And soon Algarbia conquer'd own'd his power.
The vanquish'd Moor with total rout expell'd,
All Lusuz' shores his might univall'd held.
And now brave D.niz reigns, whose noble fire
Bespoke the genuine lineage of his sire.
Now heavenly Peace wide wav'd her olive bough,
Each vale display'd the labours of the plough
And smil'd with joy: the rocks on every shore
Resound the dashing of the merchant-oar. 760
Wiselaws are form'd, and constitutions weigh'd,
And the deep-rooted base of empire laid.
Not Ammon's son with larger heart bestow'd,
Nor such the grace to him the Muses ow'd.
From Helicon the Muses wing their way;
Mondego's flowery banks invite their stay.
Now Coimbra shines Minerva's proud abode;
And fill'd with joy, Parnassus' bloomy god
Beholds another dear-lov'd Athens rise,
And spread her laurels in indulgent skies; 770
Her wreath of laurels ever green he twines
With threads of gold, and Baccarus' adjoins.
Here castle walls in warlike grandeur tower,
Here cities swell and lofty temples tower:
In wealth and grandeur each with other vies;
When old and lov'd the parent-monarch dies.
His son, alas, remiss in filial deeds,
But wise in peace and bold in fight, succeeds,
The fourth Alonzo: ever arm'd for war
He views the stern Casteel with watchful care. 780
Yet when the Libyan nations cross'd the main,
And spread their thousands o'er the fields of Spain,
The brave Alonzo drew his awful steel,
And sprung to battle for the proud Casteel.

prevailed. By this policy the holy church constrained the nobility to urge the king to a full submission to the papal chair. While a negotiation for this purpose was on foot Alonzo died, and left his son to struggle with an enraged and powerful clergy. Don Sancho was just, affable, brave, and an enamoured husband. On this last virtue faction first fixed its envenomed fangs. The queen was accused of arbitrary influence over her husband, and, according to the superstitious of that age, she was believed to have disturbed his senses by an enchanted draught. Such of the nobility as declared in the king's favour were stigmatized, and rendered odious, as the creatures of the queen. The confusions which ensued were fomented by Alonzo, earl of Bologna, the king's brother, by whom the king was accused as the author of them. In short, by the assistance of the clergy and pope Innocent IV. Sancho was deposed, and soon after died at Toledo. The beautiful queen, donna Menoia, was seized as a prisoner, and conveyed away by one Raymond Portocarrero, and was never heard of more. Such are the triumphs of faction!

Or lady's glove, an herb to which the Druids and ancient poets ascribed magical virtues.

Virg. Ecl. vii.

When Babel's haughty queen unsheath'd the sword,
And o'er Hydraspas' lawns her legions pour'd;
When dreadful Attila, to whom was given
That fearful name, the Scourge of angry Heaven³⁹,
The fields of trembling Italy o'er-ran
With many a Gothic tribe and northern clan;
Not such unnumber'd banners then were seen,
As now in fair Tartesia's dales converse; 790
Numidia's bow and Mauritania's spear,
And all the might of Hagar's race was here;
Granada's mogrels join their numerous host,
To those who dar'd the seas from Libya's coast.
Awd by the fury of such ponderous force
The proud Castilian tries each hop'd resource;
Yet not by terror for himself inspir'd,
For Spain be trembled, and for Spain was fir'd.
His much-lov'd bride his messenger he sends⁴⁰,
And to the hostile Lusian lowly bends. 800
The much-lov'd daughter of the king imploer'd,
Now sues her father for her wedded lord.

The beautiful dame approach'd the palace gate,
Where her great sire was thron'd in regal state:
On her fair face deep-seated grief appears,
And her mild eyes are bath'd in glistening tears;
Her careless ringlets, as a monarch's, bow
Adown her shoulders and her breasts of snow:
A secret transport through the father ran,
While thus, in sighs, the royal bride began: 810
"And know'st thou not, O warlike king," she
"That furious Afric pours her peopled tide, [cried,
Her barbarous nations o'er the fields of Spain?
Morocco's lord commands the dreadful train.
Ne'er since the surge bath'd the circling coast,
Beneath one standard march'd so dread an host:
Such the dire fierceness of their brutal rage,
Pale are our bravest youth as palid age;
By night our fathers' shades confess their fear⁴¹,
Their shrieks of terror from the tombs we hear:
To stem the rage of these unnumber'd bands, 820
Alone, O sire, my gallant husband stands;
His little host alone their breasts oppose
To the barb'd darts of Spain's innumerable foes:
Then haste, O monarch, thou whose conquering
Haschill'd Malucca's sultry waves with fear; [spear
Haste to the rescue of distress'd Casteel,
(Oh! be that smile thy dear affection's seal!)
And speed, my father, ere my husband's fate
Be fixt, and I, depriv'd of regal state, 830
Be left in captive solitude forlorn,
My spouse, my kingdom, and my birth to mourn."

³⁹ A king of the Huns, surnamed The Scourge of God. He lived in the fifth century. He may be reckoned among the greatest of barbarous conquerors.

⁴¹ Camoens says, "A mortos faz espanto." To give this elegance in English required a paraphrase. There is something wildly great, and agreeable to the superstitious of that age, to suppose that the dead were troubled in their graves, on the approach of so terrible an army. The French translator, contrary to the original, ascribes this terror to the ghost only of one prince; by which, this stroke of Camoens, in the spirit of Shakespeare, is greatly reduced.

In tears, and trembling, spoke the final queen :
 So lost in grief was lovely Venus seen *,
 When Jove, her sire, the beauteous mourner pray'd
 To grant her wandering son the promise aid.
 Great Jove was mov'd to hear the fair deplore,
 Gave all she ask'd, and griev'd she ask'd no more.
 So griev'd Alonzo's noble heart. And now
 The warrior binds in steel his awful brow ; 840
 The glittering squadrons march in proud array,
 On burnish'd shields the tremblingsun-beams play :
 The blaze of arms the warlike rage inspires,
 And wakes from slothful peace the hero's fires.
 With trampling hoof. Evora's plains rebound,
 And sprightly neighings echo far around ;
 Far on each side the clouds of dust arise,
 The drum a rough rattling rolls along the skies ;
 The trumpet's shrilly clangour sounds alarms,
 And each heart burns, and ardent pants for arms.
 Where their bright blaze the royal ensigns pour'd,
 High o'er the rest the great Alonzo tower'd ;
 High o'er the rest was his bold front admir'd,
 And his keen eyes new warmth, new force inspir'd.
 Proudly he march'd, and now in Tariff's plain
 The two Alonzos join their martial train :
 Right to the foe, in battle-rank updrawn,
 They pause ;—the mountain and the wide-spread
 Afford not foot-room for the crowded foe : [lawn
 Aw'd with the horrors of the lifted blow 860
 Pale look'd our bravest heroes. Swell'd with pride,
 The foes already conquer'd Spain divide, [stride.
 And lordly o'er the field the promise'd victors
 So strode in Elab's vale the towering height
 Of Gath's proud champion ; so with pale affright
 The Hebrews trembled, while with impious pride
 The huge-limb'd foe the shepherd boy defy'd :
 The valiant boy advancing fits the string,
 And round his head he whirls the sounding sling ;
 The monster staggers with the successful wound, 870
 And his vast bulk lies groaning on the ground.
 Such impious scorn the Moor's proud booms swell'd
 When our thin squadrons took the battle-field ;
 Unconscious of the Power who led us on,
 That Power whose nod confoundeth infernal thrones ;
 Led by that Power, the brave Castilian bar'd
 The shining blade, and proud Morocco dar'd ;
 His conquering brand the Lusian hero drew,
 And on Granada's sore resistless flew ;
 The spear-staffs crash, the splinters hiss around,
 And the broad bucklers rattle on the ground. 881
 With piercing shrieks the Moors their prophet's
 And ours their guardian saint aloud acclaim. [name,
 Wounds gush on wounds, and blows rebound to
 A lake of blood the level plain o'erflows ; [blows,
 The wounded, gasping in the purple tide,
 Now find the death the sword but half supplied.
 Though wove and quilted by their ladies' hands *
 Vain were the mail-plates of Granada's bands.

Usus

Quem pœnes arbitrium est, et jus et norma loquendi: and Dryden, Pope &c. often use usque as a participle in place of the harsh-sounding usque, a word almost incompatible with the elegance of versification. The most harmonious word ought therefore to be used; and we will ascertain its definition in grammar. When the spirit of chivalry pre-

With such dread force the Lusian rush'd along, 890
 Steep'd in red carnage lay the boastful throng.
 Yet now diadainful of so light a prize,
 Fierce o'er the field the thundering hero flies,
 And his bold arm the brave Castilian joins
 In dreadful conflict with the Moorish lines.

The parting Sun now pour'd the ruddy blaze,
 And twinkling Vesper shot his silvery rays
 Athwart the gloom, and clos'd the glorious day,
 When low in dust the strength of Afric lay.
 Such dreadful slaughter of the boastful Moor 900
 Never on battle-field was heap'd before.
 Not he whose childhood vow'd eternal hate
 And desperate war against the Roman state,
 Though three strong coursers bent beneath the
 Of rings of gold, by many a Roman knight, [weight
 Erewhile, the badge of rank distinguish'd, worn,
 From their cold hands at Canus's slaughter torn ;
 Not his dread sword bespread the reeking plain
 With such wide streams of gore, and hills of slain ;
 Nor thine, O Titus, swept from Salem's land 910
 Such floods of ghosts, roll'd down to death's dark
 Though ages ere she fell, the prophets old [strand ;
 The dreadful scene of Salem's fall foretold
 In words that breathe wild horror : nor the shore,
 When carnage chok'd the stream, so smok'd with gore,
 When Marius' fainting legions drank the flood,
 Yet warm and purpled with Ambronian blood ; *
 Not such the heaps as now the plains of Tariff strew'd.

While glory thus Alonzo's name adorn'd,
 To Lisboa's shores the happy chief return'd, 920
 In glorious peace and well-deserv'd repose,
 His course of fame, and honour'd age to close.
 When now, O king, a damsel's fate severe *,
 A fate which ever claims the woeful tear, vailed, every youthful warrior had his mistress, to whose favour he laid no claim till he had distinguished himself in the ranks of battle. If his first addresses were received, it was usual for the lady to present her lover with some weapon or piece of armour, adorned with her own needle-work; and of the goodness of whose metal and fabric, it was supposed, she was confident.

* When the soldiers of Marius complained of thirst, he pointed to a river near the camp of the Ambrones: "There," says he, "you may drink, but it must be purchased with blood." "Lead us on," they replied, "that we may have something liquid, though it be blood." The Romans forcing their way to the river, the channel was filled with the dead bodies of the slain. Vid. Plut.

* This unfortunate lady, doña Inez de Castro, was the daughter of a Castilian gentleman, who had taken refuge in the court of Portugal. Her beauty and accomplishments attracted the regard of don Pedro, the king's eldest son, a prince of a brave and noble disposition. La Neuville, le Ciede, and other historians, assert, that she was privately married to the prince ere she had any share in his bed. Nor was his conjugal fidelity less remarkable than the ardour of his passion. Afraid, however, of his father's resentment, the severity of whose temper he well knew, his intercourse with doña Inez passed at the court as an intrigue of gallantry. On the accession of don Pedro the Cruel to the throne of Castile, many of the dis-

Diagn'd his honours—On the nymph's horn bend
 Relentless rage thy bitterest rancour shed :
 Yet such the zeal her princely lover bore,
 Her breathless corse the crown of Lisbon wore.
 'T was thou, O Love, whose dreaded shafts controul'd
 The hind's rude heart, and tear the hero's soul; 930
 Thou ruthless power, with bloodbad never cloy'd,
 'T was thou thy lovely votary destroy'd,
 Thy thirst still burning for a deeper woe,
 In vain to thee the tears of beauty flow ;
 The breast that feels thy purest flames divine,
 With spouting gore must bathe thy cruel shrines.
 Such thy dire triumphs!—Thou, O nymph, the Propbetick of the god's un pitying guile, [while,
 In tender scenes by love-sick fancy wrought,
 By fear oft shifted as by fancy brought, 940
 To sweet Mondego's ever-variant bowers,
 Languish'd away the slow and lonely hours:
 While now, as terror wak'd thy boding fears,
 The conscious stream receiv'd thy pearly tears ;
 And now, as hope reviv'd the brighter flame,
 Each echo sigh'd thy princely lover's name.
 Nor less could absence from thy prince remove
 The dear remembrance of his distant love :
 Thy looks, thy smiles, before him ever glow,
 And o'er his melting heart endearing flow : 950
 By night his slumbers bring thee to his arms,
 By day his thoughts still wander o'er thy charms :
 By night, by day, each thought thy loves employ,
 Each thought the memory or the hope of joy.
 Though fairest princely dames involk'd his love,
 No princely dame his constant faith e-uld move :
 For thee alone his constant passion burn'd,
 For thee the proffer'd royal maids he scorn'd.
 Ah, hope of bliss too high ;—the princely dames
 Refus'd, dread rage the father's breast inflames ; 960
 He, with an old man's wintery eye, surveys
 The youth's fond love, and coldly with it weighs
 The people's murmurs of his son's delay
 To bless the nation with his nuptial day.
 (Alas, the nuptial day was past unknown, [own,)
 Which but when crown'd the prince could dare to
 And with the fair one's blood the vengeful sire
 Resolves to quench his Pedro's faithful fire. [gore,

 Thou awful terror of the prostrate Moor, 970
 What rage could aim thee at a female breast,
 Unarm'd, by softness and by love possess'd ?"
 Dragg'd from her bower by murderous ruffian
 Before the frowning king fair Inez stands ; [hands,
 Her tears of artless innocence, her air
 So mild, so lovely, and her face so fair,
 Mov'd the stern monarch ; when with eager zeal
 Her fierce destroyers urg'd the public weal ;
 Dread rage again the tyrant's soul possess'd,
 And his dark brow his cruel thoughts confess : 980

gusted nobility were kindly received by don Pedro, through the interest of his beloved Inez. The favour shown to these Castilians gave great uneasiness to the politicians. A thousand evils were foreseen from the prince's attachment to his Castilian mistress : even the murder of his children by his deceased spouse, the princess Constantia, was unmiss'd ; and the enemies of donna Inez finding the king willing to listen, omitted no opportunity to increase his resentment against the unfortunate lady. The prince was about his 28th year when his amour with his beloved Inez commenced.

O'er her fair face a sudden paleness spread,
 Her throbbing heart with generous anguish bled,
 Anguish to view her lover's hopeless woes,
 And all the mother in her bosom rose.
 Her beauteous eyes, in trembling tear-drops drown'd,
 To Heaven she lifted, but her hands were bound ;
 Then on her infants turn'd the piteous glance,
 The look of bleeding woe ; the babes advance,
 Smiling in innocence of infant age,
 Unaw'd, unconscious of their grandsire's rage ; 990
 To whom, as bursting sorrow gave the flow,
 The native heart-sprung eloquence of woe,
 The lovely captive thus :—" O monarch, hear,
 If e'er to thee the name of man was dear,
 If prowling tigers, or the wolf's wild brood,
 Inspir'd by nature with the lust of blood,
 Have yet been mov'd the weeping babe to spare,
 Nor left, but tended with a nurse's care,
 As Rome's great founders to the world were given ;
 Shalt thou, who wear'st the sacred stamp of Heaven,
 The human form divine, shalt thou deny 1001
 That aid, that pity, which e'en beasts supply !
 O that thy heart were, as thy looks declare,
 Of human mould, superfluous were my prayer ;
 Thou couldst not then a helpless damsel slay,
 Whose sole offence in fond affection lay ;

Ad caelum tendens ardentia lumina frustra ;
 Lumina, nam teneras arcebant vincula palmae.
 Virg. Æn. ii.

It has been observed by some critics, that Milton on every occasion is fond of expressing his admiration of music, particularly of the song of the nightingale, and the full woodland choir. If in the same manner we are to judge of the favourite taste of Homer, we shall find it of a less delicate kind. He is continually describing the feast, the huge chine, the savoury viands on the glowing coals, and the foaming bowl. The ruling passion of Camoëns is also strongly marked in his writings. One may venture to affirm, that there is no poem of equal length which abounds with so many impassioned ecomiums on the fair sex, and the power of their beauty, as the Lusiad. The genius of Camoëns seems never so pleased as when he is painting the variety of female charms : he feels all the magic of their allurements, and riots in his descriptions of the happiness and miseries attendant on the passion of love. As he wrote from his feelings, these parts of his works have been particularly honoured with the attention of the world. Tasso and Spenser have copied from his Island of Bliss, and three tragedies have been formed from this episode of the unhappy Inez. One in English, named Elvira ;—the other two are by M. de la Motte, a Frenchman, and Luis de Velez Guvara, a Spaniard. How these different writers have handled the same subject is not unworthy of the attention of the critic. The tragedy of M. de la Motte, from which Elvira is copied, is highly characteristic of the French drama. In the Lusiad the beautiful victim expresses the strong emotions of genuine nature. She feels for what her lover will feel for her ; the mother rises in her breast, she implores pity for her children ; she feels the horrors of death, and would be glad to wander an exile with her babes, where her only solace would be the remembrance of her faithful passion. This however, it appears, would not suit the taste of a Paris

In faith to him who first his love consent,
Who first to love allur'd her virgin breast.

audience. On the French stage the stern Roman heroes must be polite petits-maitres, and the tender Inez a blustering Amazon. Lee's Alexander cannot talk in a higher rant. She not only wishes to die herself, but desires that her children and her husband don Pedro may also be put to death.

Hé bien, seigneur, suivez vos barbares maximes,
On vous amene encor de nouvelles victimes,
Immolez sans remords, et pour nous punir mieux,
Ces gages d'un Hymen si coupable à vos yeux.
Ils ignorent le sang, dont le ciel les a fit naître,
Par l'arrêt de leur mort faites les reconnaître,
Consummez votre ouvrage, et que les mêmes coups
Rejoignent les enfans, et la femme, et l'époux.

The Spaniard, however, has followed nature and Camoëns, and in point of poetical merit his play is infinitely superior to that of the Frenchman. Don Pedro talks in the absence of his mistress with the beautiful simplicity of an Arcadian lover, and Inez implores the tyrant with the genuine tenderness of female affection and delicacy. The reader, who is acquainted with the Spanish tongue, will thank me for the following extracts.

Inez. A mis hijos me quitais?

Rey don Alonso, señor,
Porque me quereis quitar
La vida de tantas vezes?
Advertid, señor mirad,
Que el coraçon a pedaços
Dividido me arancais.

Rry. Llevaldos, Alvar Gonzalez.

Inez. Hijos míos, donde vais?
Dunde vais sin vuestra madre?
Falta en los hombres piedad?
Adonde vais luzes mais?
Como, que assi me dexais
En el mayor desconuelo
En manos de la crueldad.

Nino Alonso. Consuelate madre mia,
Y a Dios te puedes quedar,
Que vamos con nuestro abuelo,

Y no querrá hazermas mal.
Inez. Possible es, señor, rey mio,
Padre, que assi me cerreis
La puerta para el perdón?

Aora, señor, aora,
Aora es tiempo de mostrar
El mucho poder que tiene
Vuestra real magestad.

Como, señor? vos os vais
Y a Alvar Gonzalez, y a Coello
Inhumanos me entregais?
Hijos, hijos de mi vida,
Dexad me los abraçar;
Alonso, mi vida hijo,
Dionis, a mores; tornad,
Tornad a ver vuestra madre:
Pedro mio, donde estas
Que an i te olvidas de mi?
Possible es que en tanto mal
Me falta tu vista, esposo?
Quien te pudiera avisar
Del peligro en que sfigida
Dona Inez tu esposa esta.

In these my babes shalt thou thine image see,
And still tremendous hurl thy rage on me? 1010
Me, for their sakes, if yet thou wilt not spare,
Oh! let these infants prove thy pious care!
Yet pity's lenient current ever flows
From that brave breast where genuine valour glows;
That thou art brave, let valquish'd Afric tell,
Then let thy pity o'er mine anguish swell;
Ah, let my woes, unconscious of a crime,
Procure mine exile to some barbarous clime:
Give me to wander o'er the horning plains
Of Libya's deserts, or the wild domains 1020
Of Scythia's snow-clad rocks and frozen shore;
There let me, hopeless of return, deplore.
Where ghastly horror fills the dreary vale,
Where shrieks and howlings die on every gale,
The lions roaring, and the tigers yell,
There with mine infant race consign'd to dwell,
There let me try thpt piety to find,
In vain by me implo'r'd from human-kind:
There in some dreary cavern's rocky womb,
Amid the horrors of sepulchral gloom, 1030
For him whose love I mourn, my love shall glow,
The sigh shall murmur, and the tear shall flow:
All my fond wish, and all my hope, to rear
These infant pledges of a love so dear,
Amidst my griefs a soothing, glad employ,
Amidst my fears a woeful, hopeless joy."

In tears she utter'd:—As the frozen snow,
Touch'd by the spring's mild ray, begins to flow,
So just began to melt his stubborn soul;
As mild-ray'd pity o'er the tyrant soul; 1040
But destiny forbade: with eager zeal,
Again pretended for the public weal,
Her fierce accusers urg'd her speedy doom;
Again dark rage diffus'd its horrid gloom
O'er stern Alonso's brow*: swift as the sign,
Their swords unsheath'd around her brandish'd
O foul disgrace, of knighthood lasting stain, [shine:
By men of arms an helpless lady slain!

The drama from which these extracts are taken is entitled, Reynar despues de morir. And as they are cited for the tenderness of the original expression, a translation of them is not attempted.

* To give the character of Alonso IV. will throw light on this inhuman transaction. He was an undutiful son, an unnatural brother, and a cruel father; a great and fortunate warrior, diligent in the execution of the laws, and a Machiavelian politician. That good might be attained by villainous means, was his favourite maxim. When the enemies of Inez had persuaded him that her death was necessary to the welfare of the state, he took a journey to Coimbra, that he might see the lady, when the prince his son was absent on a busting party. Donna Inez with her children threw herself at his feet. The king was moved with the distress of the beautiful suppliant, when his three counsellors, Alvaro Gonzalez, Diego Lopez Pacheco, and Pedro Coello, reproaching him for his disregard to the state, he relapsed into his former resolution. She was dragged from his presence, and brutally murdered by the hands of his three counsellors, who immediately returned to the king with their daggers reeking with the innocent blood of the princess his daughter-in-law. Alonso, says La Neufville, avowed the horrid assassination, as if he had done nothing for which he ought to be ashamed.

Thus Pyrrhus, burning with unmanly ire,
 Fulfill'd the mandate of his furious sire; 1050
 Disdainful of the frantic matron's prayer,
 On fair Polyxena, her last fond care,
 He rush'd, his blade yet warm with Priam's gore,
 And dash'd the daughter on the sacred floor;
 While mildly she her saving mother eyed,
 Resign'd her bosom to the sword, and died.
 Thus Inez, while her eyes to Heaven appeal,
 Resigns her bosom to the murdering steel:
 That snowy neck, whose matchless form sustain'd
 The loveliest face where all the graces reign'd, 1060
 Whose charms so long the gallant prince inflam'd;
 That her pale corse was Lisbon's queen proclaim'd;
 That snowy neck was stain'd with spouting gore,
 Another sword her lovely bosom tore.
 The flowers that gladden'd with her tears bedew'd,
 Now shrunk and languish'd with her blood im-
 As when a rose, ere while of bloom so gay, [brued.
 Thrown from the careless virgin's breast away,
 Lies faded on the plain, the living red,
 The snowy white, and all its fragrance fled; 1070
 So from her cheeks the roses died away,
 And pale in death the beautiful Inez lay;
 With dreadful smiles, and crimson'd with her blood,
 Round the wan victim the stern murderers stood,
 Unmindful of the sure, though future hour,
 Sacred to vengeance and her lover's power.

O Son, couldst thou so foul a crime behold,
 Nor veil thine head in darkness, as of old
 A sudden night unworied horror cast
 O'er that dire banquet, where the sire's repast 1080
 The son's torn limbs supplied!—Yet you, ye vales!
 Ye distant forests, and ye flow'ry dales!
 When pale and sinking to the dreadful fall,
 You heard her quivering lips on Pedro call;
 Your faithful echoes caught the parting sound,
 And Pedro! Pedro! mournful, sigh'd around.
 Nor less the wood-nymphs of Mondego's groves
 Bewail'd the memory of her hapless loves:
 Her griefs they wept, and to a plaintive rill [still Transform'd their tears, which weeps and murmurs
 To give immortal pity to her woe 1091
 They taught the riv'let through her bowers to flow,
 And still through violet beds the fountain pours
 Its plaintive wailing, and is nam'd Amours.
 Nor long her blood for vengeance cried in vain:
 Her gallant lord begins his awful reign.
 In vain her murderers for refuge fly,
 Spain's wildest hills no place of rest supply.
 The injur'd lover's and the monarch's ire, 1100
 And stern-brow'd justice in their doom conspire:
 In hissing flames they die, and yield their souls in fire 1107

* At an old royal castle near Mondego, there is a rivulet called the fountain of Amours. According to tradition, it was here that don Pedro resided with his beloved Inez. The fiction of Camoens, founded on the popular name of the rivulet, is in the spirit of Homer.

 When the prince was informed of the death of his beloved Inez, he was transported into the most violent fury. He took arms against his father. The country between the rivers Minho and Douro was laid desolate: but by the interposition of the queen and the archbishop of Braga the prince was softened, and the further horrors of a civil war were prevented. Don Alonzo was not only reconciled to his son, but laboured by every means to oblige him, and to efface from his memory the injury and insult he had received. The prince, however, still continued to discover the strongest marks of affection and grief. When he succeeded to the crown, one of his first acts was a treaty with the king of Castile, whereby each monarch engaged to give up such malecontents as should take refuge in each other's dominions. In consequence of this, Pedro Coelho and Alvaro Gonzalez, who, on the death of Alonzo, had fled to Castile, were sent prisoners to don Pedro. Diego Pacheco, the third murderer, made his escape. The other two were put to death with the most exquisite tortures, and most justly merited, if exquisite torture is in any instance to be allowed. After this the king, don Pedro, summoned an assembly of the states at Cantanedes. Here, in the presence of the pope's nuncio, he solemnly swore on the holy gospels, that having obtained a dispensation from Rome, he had secretly, at Braganza, espoused the lady Inez de Castro, in the presence of the bishop of Guarda, and of his master of the wardrobe; both of whom confirmed the truth of the oath. The pope's bull, containing the dispensation, was published; the body of Inez was lifted from the grave, placed on a magnificent throne, and, with the proper regalia, was crowned queen of Portugal. The nobility did homage to her skeleton, and kissed the bones of her hand. The corpse was then interred at the royal monastery of Aloubece, with a pomp before unknown in Portugal, and with all the honours due to a queen. Her monument is still extant, where the statue is adorned with the diadem and the royal robe. This, with the legitimation of her children, and the care he took of all who had been in her service, consoled him in some degree, and rendered him more conversable than he had hitherto been; but the cloud which the death of his Inez brought over the natural cheerfulness of his temper, was never totally dispersed.—A circumstance strongly characteristic of the rage of his resentment must not be omitted: when the murderers were brought before him, he was so transported with indignation, that he struck Pedro Coelho several blows on the face with the shaft of his whip. Some grave writers have branded this action as unworthy of the magistrate and the hero; and those who will, may add, of the philosopher too: something great, however, belongs to don Pedro. A regard which we do not feel for any of the three, will, in every bosom capable of genuine love, inspire a tender sympathy for the agonies of his heart, when the presence of the inhuman murderers presented to his mind the horrid scene of the butchery of his beloved spouse.

Nor this alone his steadfast soul display'd:

The impression left on the philosophical mind by these historical facts, will naturally suggest some reflections on human nature. Every man is proud of being thought capable of love; and none more so than those who have the least title to the name of lover; those whom the French call les hommes de galanterie, whose only happiness is in variety, and to whom the greatest beauty and mental accomplishments lose every charm after a few months enjoyment. Their satiety they scruple not to con-

Of red-arm'd justice. From the shades of night
 He dragg'd the foul adulterer to light:
 The robber from his dark retreat was led,
 And he who spilt the blood of murder bled.
 Unmov'd he heard the proudest noble plead:
 Where justice aim'd her sword, with stubborn speed
 Fell the dire stroke. Nor cruelty inspir'd, 1110
 Noblest humanity his bosom fir'd.
 The califf, starting at his thoughts, repeat
 The seeds of murder springing in his breast.
 His outstretch'd arm the lurking thief withheld,
 For flix as fate he knew his doom was seal'd.

feels, but are not aware, that in doing so, they also confess, that the principle which inspired their passion was gross and selfish. To constitute a genuine love, like that of don Pedro, requires a nobleness and goodness of heart, totally incompatible with an ungenerous mind. The youthful fever of the reins may, for a while, inspire an attachment to a particular object; but an affection so unchangeable and sincere as that of the prince of Portugal, can only spring from a bosom possessed of the finest feelings and of every virtue.

st History cannot afford an instance of any prince who has a more eminent claim to the title of just than Pedro. His diligence to correct every abuse was indefatigable, and when guilt was proved, his justice was inexorable. He was dreadful to the evil, and beloved by the good; for he respected no persons, and his inflexible severity never digressed from the line of strict justice. An anecdote or two will throw some light on his character. A priest having killed a mason, the king dissembled his knowledge of the crime, and left the issue to the ecclesiastical court, where the priest was punished by one year's suspension from saying mass. Pedro upon this privately ordered the mason's son to revenge the murder of his father. The young man obeyed, was apprehended, and condemned to death. When his sentence was to be confirmed by the king, he inquired what was the young man's trade. He was answered, that he followed his father's. Well then, said the monarch, I shall commute his punishment, and interdict him from meddling with stone or mortar for a year. After this he fully established the authority of the king's courts over the clergy, whom he punished with death when their crimes were capital. When solicited to refer the causes of such criminals to a higher tribunal, by which they tacitly meant that of the pope; he would answer very calmly, "That is what I intend to do: I will send them to the highest of all tribunals, to that of their Maker and mine." Against adulterers he was particularly severe, often declaring it his opinion, that conjugal infidelity was the source of the greatest evils, and that therefore to restrain it was the interest and duty of the sovereign. Though the fate of his beloved Inez chagrined and soured his temper, he was so far from being naturally sullen or passionate, that he was rather of a gay and sprightly disposition, affable and easy of access; delighted in music and dancing; a lover of learning, was himself a man of letters, and an elegant poet. Vide Le Clede, Mariana, Farla.

Of this brave prince the soft degenerate son, 1120
 Fernando the remiss, ascends the throne,
 With arm unnerv'd the lawless soldier lay,
 And own'd the influence of a nerveless sway:
 The stern Castilian drew the vengeful brand,
 And strode proud victor o'er the trembling land.
 How dread the hour, when injur'd Heaven in rage
 Thunders its vengeance on a guilty age!
 Unmanly sloth the king, the nation stain'd;
 And lewdness, foster'd by the monarch, reign'd:
 The monarch own'd that first of crimes unjust,
 The wanton revels of adulterous lust: 1131
 Such was his rage for beauteous Leonorest,
 Her from her husband's widow'd arms he tore;
 Thro' with unblest, unhallow'd nuptials stain'd
 The sacred altar and its rites profan'd.
 Alas! the splendour of a crown how vain,
 From Heaven's dread eye to veil the dimmest stain!
 To conquering Greece, to ruin'd Troy, what woes,
 What ills on ills, from Helen's rape arose!
 Let Appius own, let banish'd Tarquin tell 1140
 On their hot rage what heavy vengeance fell.
 One female ravish'd Gibeah's streets beheldst,
 O'er Gibeah's streets the blood of thousands swell'd
 In vengeance of the crime; and streams of blood
 The guilt of Zion's sacred bard pursu'dst.
 Yet love full oft with wild delirium blinds,
 And fans his basest fires in noblest minds:
 The female garb the great Alcides wore,
 And for his Omphale the distaff borest.

st This lady, named Leonora de Telles, was the wife of don Juan Lorenzo d'Acugna, a nobleman of one of the most distinguished families in Portugal. After a sham process this marriage was dissolved, and the king privately espoused her, though at that time he was publicly married by proxy to donna Leonora of Arragon. A dangerous insurrection, headed by one Velasquez, a tailor, drove the king and his adulterous bride from Lisbon. Soon after he caused his marriage to be publicly celebrated in the province between the Douro and Minho. Henry king of Castile, informed of the general discontent that reigned in Portugal, marched a formidable army into that kingdom, to revenge the injury offered to some of his subjects, whose ships had been unjustly seized at Lisbon. The desolation hinted at by Camoens ensued. After the subjects of both kingdoms had severely suffered, the two kings ended the war, much to their mutual satisfaction, by an intermarriage of their bastard children.

To conclude the notes on this book, it may not be unnecessary to observe, that Camoens, in this episode, has happily adhered to a principal rule of the epopœia. To paint the manners and characters of the age in which the action is placed, is as requisite in the epic poem, as it is to preserve the unity of the character of an individual. That gallantry of bravery, and romantic cast of the military adventures, which characterized the Spaniards and Portuguese during the Moorish wars, is happily supported by Camoens in its most just and striking colours. In history we find surprising victories obtained over the infidels: in the Lusidæ we find

 When he beheld the breathing roses glow;
 And the soft heavings of the living snow;

LUSIAD IV.

As the tost vessel on the ocean rolls,
 When dark the night, and loud the tempest howls,
 When the torn mariner, in every wave
 That breaks and gleams, forebodes his watery grave;
 But when the dawn, all silent and serene,
 With soft-pac'd ray dispels the shades obscene,
 With grateful transport sparkling in each eye,
 The joyful crew the port of safety spy:
 Such darkling tempests and portended fate,
 While weak Fernando liv'd, appall'd the state; 10
 Such, when he died, the peaceful morning rose,
 The dawn of joy, and sooth'd the public woe.
 As blazing glorious o'er the shades of night,
 Bright in his east breaks forth the lord of light,
 So valiant John with dazzling blaze appears,
 And from the dust his drooping nation rears.
 Though sprung from youthful passion's wanton Great Pedro's son in noble soul he proves; (loves, the heroes breathing that enthusiasm which led them to conquest, that enthusiasm of military honours so strongly expressed by Alonzo V. of Portugal, at the siege of Azila. In storming the citadel, the count de Marialva, a brave old officer, lost his life. The king leading his only son, the prince don Juan, to the body of the count while the blood yet streamed from his wounds. "Behold," he cried, "that great man! May God grant you, my son, to imitate his virtues! May your honour, like his, be complete!"

¹ No circumstance has ever been more ridiculed by the ancient and modern pedants than Alexander's pretensions to divinity. Some of his courtiers expostulating with him one day on the absurdity of such claim, he replied, "I know the truth of what you say, but these," pointing to a crowd of Persians, "these know no better." The report that the Grecian army was commanded by a son of Jupiter spread terror through the east, and greatly facilitated the operations of the conqueror. The miraculous speech of the infant, attested by a few monks, was adapted to the superstition of the age of John I. and, as he was a bastard, was of infinite service to his cause. The pretended fact, however, is differently related. By some thus: When don John, then regent of Portugal, was going to Coimbra, to assist at an assembly of the states, at a little distance from the city he was met by a great number of children riding upon sticks, who no sooner saw him than they cried out, "Blessed be don John, king of Portugal; the king is coming, don John shall be king." Whether this was owing to art or accident, it had a great effect. At the assembly the regent was elected king.

⁴ Possessed of great beauty and great abilities, this bad woman was a disgrace to her sex, and a curse to the age and country which gave her birth. Her sister, donna Maria, a lady of unblemished virtue, had been secretly married to the infant don Juan, the king's brother, who was passionately attached to her. Donna Maria had formerly endeavoured to dissuade her sister from the adulterous marriage with the king. In revenge of this, the queen Leonora persuaded don Juan that her sister was unfaithful to his bed. The enraged husband basted to his wife, and without inquiry or expostulation, says Mariana, dispatched her with two strokes of his dagger. He was afterwards convinced of her innocence, and was completely wretched. Having sacrificed her honour and her first husband to a king, says Paris, Leonora soon sacrificed that king to a wicked gallant, a Castilian nobleman, named don Juan Fernandez de Andeyro. An unjust war with Castile, wherein the Portuguese were defeated by sea and land, was the first fruits of the policy of the new favourite. Andeyro one day having heated himself by some military exercise, the queen tore her veil, and pub-

Acty gave it him to wipe his face. The grand master of Avis, the king's bastard brother, afterwards John I., and some others, expostulated with her on the indecency of this behaviour. She dissembled her resentment, but soon after they were seized and committed to the castle of Evora, where a forged order for their execution was sent; but the governor, suspecting some fraud, showed it to the king, and their lives were saved. Yet such was her ascendancy over the weak Fernando, that, though convinced of her guilt, he ordered his brother to kiss the queen's hand, and thank her for his life. Soon after Fernando died, but not till he was fully convinced of the queen's conjugal infidelity, and had given an order for the assassination of the gallant. Not long after the death of the king, the favourite Andeyro was stabbed in the palace by the grand master of Avis, and don Roy de Pereyra. The queen expressed all the transport of grief and rage, and declared she would undergo the trial ordeal in vindication of his and her innocence. But this she never performed: in her vows of revenge, however, she was more punctual. Don Juan, king of Castile, who had married her only daughter and heiress, at her earnest entreaties invaded Portugal, and was proclaimed king. Don John, grand master of Avis, was proclaimed by the people protector and regent. A desperate war ensued. Queen Leonora, treated with indifference by her daughter and son-in-law, resolved on the murder of the latter; but the plot was discovered, and she was sent prisoner to Castile. The regent was besieged in Lisbon, and the city reduced to the utmost extremities, when an epidemical distemper broke out in the Castilian army, and made such devastation, that the king suddenly raised the siege, and abandoned his views in Portugal. The happy inhabitants ascribed their deliverance to the valour and vigilance of the regent. The regent reproved their ardour, exhorted them to repair to their churches, and to return thanks to God, to whose interposition he solely ascribed their safety. This behaviour increased the admiration of the people; the nobility of the first rank joined the regent's party; and many garrisons in the interest of the king of Castile opened their gates to him. An assembly of the states met at Coimbra, where it was proposed to invest the regent with the regal dignity. This he pretended to decline. Don John, son of Pedro the Just and the beautiful Inez de Castro, was by the people esteemed their lawful sovereign, but was, and had long been, detained a prisoner by the king of Castile. If the states would declare the infant don John their king, the regent professed his willingness to swear allegiance to him; that he would continue to expose himself to every danger, and act as regent, till Providence restored to Portugal her lawful sovereign. The states however saw the necessity that the nation should have a head. The regent was unanimously elected king, and some articles in favour of liberty were added to those agreed upon at the coronation of don Alonzo Enriquez, the first king of Portugal.

Don John I. one of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs, was the natural son of Pedro the

Casteel's proud monarch to the nuptial bed
In happier days her royal daughter led:
To him the furious queen for vengeance cries,
Implores to vindicate his lawful prize.
The Lusian sceptre, his by spousal right:
The proud Castilian arms and daren the fight.
To join his standard as it waves along.
The warlike troops from various regions throng: 60
Those who possess the lands by Rod'ric given's,
What time the Moor from Turra's banks was driven;
That race who joyful smile at war's alarms,
And scorn each danger that attends on arms;
Whose crooked ploughshares Leon's uplands tear,
Now cas'd in steel in glittering arms appear,
Those arms erewhile so dreadful to the Moor:
The Vandals glorying in their might of yore
March on; their helms and moving lances gleam
Along the flowery vales of Betis' stream: 70
Nor staid the Tyrian islanders⁶ behind,
On whose proud ensigns floating on the wind
Alcides' pillars tower'd; nor wonted fear
Withheld the base Galician's sordid spear;
Though still his crimson scamy scars reveal
The auro-aim'd vengeance of the Lusian steel.
Where tumbling down Casocca's mountain side
The murmuring Tagus rolls his foamy tide,
Along Toledo's laws, the pride of Spain,
Toledo's warriors join the martial train: 80
Nor less the furious lust of war inspires
The Biscayner, and wakes his barbarous fires,
Which ever burn for vengeance, if the tongue
Of hapless stranger give the fancy'd wroog.
Npr bold Asturia, nor Guipuscoa's shore,
Farr'd for their steely wealth, and iron ore,
Delay'd their vaunting squadrons; o'er the dales
Cas'd in their native steel, and belted mails,

Just, by donna Teresa Lorenza, a Galician lady, and born some years after the death of Inez. At seven years of age he was made grand master of Avis, and by his father's particular care he received an excellent education; which, joined to his great parts, produced him early on the political theatre. He was a brave commander, and a deep politician, yet never forfeited the character of candour and honour. To be humble to his friends, and haughty to his enemies, was his leading maxim. His prudence gained him the confidence of the wise, his steadiness and gratitude the friendship of the brave, his liberality the bulk of the people. He was in the twenty-seventh year of his age when declared protector, and in the twenty-eighth was proclaimed king.

The following anecdote is much to the honour of this prince when regent. A Castilian officer having six Portuguese gentlemen his prisoners, out of their noses and hands, and sent them to don John. Highly incensed, he commanded six Castilian gentlemen to be treated in the same manner. But before the officer, to whom he gave the orders, had quitted the room, he relented. "I have given enough to resentment," said he, "in giving such a command. It were infamous to put it in execution. See that the Castilian prisoners receive no harm."

⁵ The celebrated hero of Corneille's tragedy of the Cid.

⁶ The inhabitants of Cadix; of old a Phœnician colony.

Blow gleaming from afar they march along,
 And join with many a spear the warlike throng. 90
 As thus, wide sweeping o'er the trembling coast,
 The proud Castilian leads his numerous host,
 The valiant John for brave defence prepares,
 And in himself collected greatly dares:
 For such high valour is his bosom glow'd,
 As Samson's locks by miracle bestow'd:
 Safe in himself resolved the hero stands,
 Yet calls the leaders of his anxious bands:
 The council summon'd, some with prudent mien,
 And words of grave advice, their terrors screen; 100
 By death debas'd, no more the ancient fire
 Of patriot loyalty can now inspire;
 And each pale lip seem'd opening to declare
 For tame submission, and to shut the war;
 When glorious Nunio, starting from his seat,
 Claim'd every eye, and closed the cold debate:
 Singling his brothers from the dastard train,
 His rolling looks, that flash'd with stern disdain,
 On them he fix'd, then snatch'd his hill in ire,
 While his bold speech bewray'd the soldier's fire,
 Bold and unpolish'd; while his burning eyes 111
 Seem'd as he dared the ocean, earth, and skies:
 "Heavens! shall the Lusian nobles tamely yield!
 Oh shame! and yield untried the martial field!
 That land whose genius, as the god of war, [car;
 Was own'd, where'er approach'd her thundering
 Shall now her sons their faith, their love deny,
 And, while their country sinks, ignobly fly!
 Ye timorous herd, are ye the genuine line
 Of those illustrious shades, whose rage divide 120
 Beneath great Henry's standards awed the foe,
 For whom ye tremble, and would stoop so low!
 That foe, who, boastful now, then basely fled,
 When your undaunted sires the hero led,
 When seven bold earls in chains the spoil adorn'd,
 And proud Casteel through all her kindred's moan'd,

Casteel, your awful dread—yet, conscious, say,
 When Dinez reign'd, when his bold son bore sway,
 By whom were trodden down the bravest bands
 That ever march'd from proud Castilia's lands? 130
 'T was your brave sires—and has one languid reign
 Fix'd in your tainted souls so deep a stain,
 That now, degenerate from your noble sires,
 The last dim spark of Lusian flame expires?
 Though weak Fernando reign'd in war unskill'd,
 A godlike king now calls you to the field—
 Oh! could like his your mounting valour glow,
 Vain were the threatenings of the vaunting foe,
 Not proud Casteel, oft by your sires o'erthrown,
 But every land your dauntless rage should own. 140
 Still if your hands, benumb'd by female fear,
 Shun the bold war, hark! on my sword I swear,
 Myself alone the dreadful war shall wage—
 Mine be the fight"—and trembling with the rage
 Of valorous fire, his hand half-drawn display'd
 The awful terror of his shining blade—
 "I and my vassals dare the dreadful shock;
 My shoulders never to a foreign yoke
 Shall bend; and by my sovereign's wrath I vow,
 And by that loyal faith renounced by you, 150

³ This speech in the original has been much admired by the foreign critics, as a model of military eloquence. The critic, it is hoped, will perceive that the translator has endeavoured to support the character of the speaker.

My native land unconquer'd shall remain,
 And all my monarch's foes shall heap the plain."
 The hero paused—'T was thus the youth of Rome,

The trembling few who 'scaped the bloody doom
 That dyed with slaughter Cannæ's purple field,
 Assembled stood, and bow'd their necks to yield;
 When nobly rising with a like disdain
 The young Coriolanus rag'd,⁴ nor rears in vain:
 On his dread sword his daunted peers he swore,
 (The reeking blade yet black with Punic gore) 160
 While life remain'd their arms for Rome to wield,
 And but with life their conquer'd arms to yield.
 Such martial rage brave Nunio's mien inspired;
 Fear was no more: with rapturous ardour fired,
 "To horse, to horse!" the gallant Lusians cried;
 Rattled the belted mails on every side, [waved
 The spear-staffs trembled; round their heads they
 Their shining falchions, and in transport raved,
 "The king our guardian!" loud their shouts rebound,
 And the fierce common echo back the sound. 170
 The mails that long in rusting peace had hung,
 Now on the hammer'd anvils hoarsely rung:
 Some soft with wool the plumed helmets line,
 And some the breast-plate's scaly belts entwine:
 The gaudy mantles some, and vests prepare,
 Where various lightsonic colours gaily flare;
 And golden tissue, with the warp entwined,
 Displays the emblems of their youthful love.

The valiant John, begirt with warlike state,
 Now leads his bands from fair Abrantes' gate; 180
 Whose lawns of green the infant Tagus laves,
 As from his spring he rolls his coolly waves,
 The daring van in Nunio's care could boast
 A general worthy of the unnumber'd host,
 Whose gaudy banners trembling Greece defied,
 When boastful Xerxes lash'd the Sæstian tide:
 Nunio, to proud Casteel as dread a name,
 As erst to Gaul and Italy the fame
 Of Attila's impending rage. The right
 Brave Roderic led, a chieftain train'd in fight; 190
 Before the left the bold Almada rode,
 And proudly waving o'er the centre nod
 The royal ensign, glittering from afar,
 Where godlike John inspires and leads the war.
 'T was now the time, when from the stubbly plain
 The labouring hinds had borne the yellow grain;
 The purple vintage heapt the foamy tun,
 And fierce and red the Sun of August shone;

⁴ This was the famous P. Corn. Scipio Africanus. The fact, somewhat differently related by Livy, is this. After the defeat at Cannæ, a considerable body of Romans fled to Canusium, and appointed Scipio and Ap. Claudius their commanders. While they remained there, it was told Scipio, that some of his chief officers, at the head of whom was Cæcilius Metellus, were taking measures to transport themselves out of Italy. He went immediately to their assembly, and, drawing his sword, said, "I swear that I will not desert the commonwealth of Rome, nor suffer any other citizen to do it. The same oath I require of you, Cæcilius, and of all present: whoever refuses, let him know that this sword is drawn against him." The historian adds, that they were as terrified by this, as if they had beheld the face of their conqueror Hannibal. They all swore, and submitted themselves to Scipio. Vid. Liv. b. 22. c. 53.

When from the gate the squadrons march along :
Crowds prest on crowds, the walls and ramparts through : 200

Here the sad mother rends her hoary hair,
While hope's fond whispers struggle with despair :
The weeping spouse to Heaven extends her hands,
And cold with dread the modest virgin stands ;
Her earnest eyes, suffused with trembling dew,
Far o'er the plain the plighted youth pursue ;
And prayers and tears and all the female wail,
And holy vows the throne of Heaven assail.

Now each stern host full front to front appears,
And one joint shout Heaven's airy concave tears :
A dreadful pause ensues, while conscious pride 210
Strives on each face the heart-felt doubt to hide :
Now wild and pale the boldest face is seen ;
With mouth half open and disorder'd mien
Each warrior feels his creeping blood to freeze,
And languid weakness trembles in the knees.

And now the clangour of the trumpet sounds,
And the rough rattling of the drum rebounds ;
The flse shrill whistling cuts the gale ; on high
The flourish'd ensigns shine with many a dye 220
Of blazing splendour : o'er the ground they wheel
And choose their footing, when the proud Casteel
Bids sound the horrid charge ; loud bursts the sound,
And loud Artabro's rocky cliffs rebound : .

The thundering roar rolls round on every side,
And trembling sinks Guidana's rapid tide :
The slow-paced Darius rushes o'er the plain,
And fearful Tagus hastens to the main.

Such was the tempest of the dread alarms,
The babes that prattled in their nurses' arms 230
Shriek'd at the sound : with sudden cold imprest,
The mothers strain'd their infants to the breast,
And shook with horror ;—now, far round, begin
The bow-strings whizzing, and the brazen din *
Of arms on armour rattling ; either van

Are mingled now, and man opposed to man :
To guard his native fields the one inspires,
And one the raging lust of conquest fires :
Now with fixt teeth, their writhing lips of blue,
Their eye-balls glaring of the purple hue, 240
Each arm strains swiftest to impel the blow ;
Nor wounds they value now, nor fear they know,
Their only passion to offend the foe.

In might and fury, like the warrior god,
Before his troops the glorious Nuncio rode :
That land, the proud invaders claim'd, he sows
With their spilt blood, and with their corsees strews.
Their forceful volleys now the cross-bows pour,
The clouds are darken'd with the arrow shower ;
The white foam reeking o'er their wary mane, 250
The sporting coursers rage and paw the plain ;
Beat by their iron hoofs, the plain rebounds,
As distant thunder through the mountains sounds :
The ponderous spears crash, splintering far around ;
The horse and horsemen founder on the ground ;
The ground groans with the sudden weight opprest,
And many a buckler rings on many a crest.
Where wide around the raging Nuncio's sword
With furious sway the bravest squadrons gored,

* Homer and Virgil have, with great art, gradually heightened the fury of every battle, till the last efforts of their genius were lavished in describing the superior prowess of the hero in the decisive engagement. Camoens, in like manner, has bestowed his utmost attention on this his principal

The raging foes in closer ranks advance, 260
And his own brothers shake the hostile lance *.
Oh ! horrid fight ! yet not the ties of blood,
Nor yearning memory his rage withstood ;
With proud disdain his honest eyes behold
Who'er the traitor, who his king has sold.
Nor want there others in the hostile band
Who draw their swords against their native land ;
And headlong drives, by impious rage accurst,
In rank were foremost, and in fight the first.
So sons and fathers, by each other slain, 270
With horrid slaughter dyed Pharamia's plain.
Ye dreary ghosts, who now, for treasons foul,
Amidst the gloom of Stygian darkness howl ;
Thou Castiline, and, stern Sertorius, tell battle. The circumstances preparatory to the engagement are happily imagined, and solemnly conducted, and the fury of the combat is supported with a poetical heat, and a variety of imagery, which, one need not hesitate to affirm, would have done honour to an ancient classic.

* The just indignation with which Camoens treats the kindred of the brave Nuncio Alvaro de Pereyra, is condemned by the French translator. Dans le fond, says he, les Pereyras ne meritoient aucune s6tresse, &c.—'The Pereyras deserve no stain on their memory for joining the king of Castile, whose title to the crown of Portugal was infinitely more just and solid than that of don John.' Casters, however, is grossly mistaken. Don Alonzo Enriquez, the first king of Portugal, was elected by the people, who had recovered their liberties at the glorious battle of Ourique. At the election the constitution of the kingdom was settled in eighteen short statutes, wherein it is expressly provided, that none but a Portuguese can be king of Portugal ; that if an infant marry a foreign prince, he shall not, in her right, become king of Portugal ; and a new election of a king, in case of the failure of the male line, is by these statutes declared to be legal. By the treaty of marriage between the king of Castile and donna Beatriz, the heiress of Fernando of Portugal, it was agreed, that only their children should succeed to the Portuguese crown ; and that, in case the throne became vacant ere such children were born, the queen-dowager Leonora should govern with the title of regent. Thus, neither by the original constitution, nor by the treaty of marriage, could the king of Castile succeed to the throne of Portugal. And say pretence he might found on the marriage-contract was already forfeited ; for he caused himself and his queen to be proclaimed, added Portugal to his titles, coined Portuguese money with his bust, deposed the queen regent, and afterwards sent her prisoner to Castile. The lawful heir, don Juan, the son of Inez de Castro, was kept in prison by his rival the king of Castile ; and, as before observed, a new election was, by the original statutes, declared legal in cases of emergency. These facts, added to the consideration of the tyranny of the king of Castile, and the great services which don John had rendered his country, upon whom its existence as a kingdom depended, fully vindicate the indignation of Camoens against the traitorous Pereyras.

With triumph fell them, some of Lusian race

Like you have earn'd the traitor's foul disgrace.

As waves on waves, the foes' increasing weight
Bears down our foremost ranks and shakes the fight;
Yet firm and undimay'd great Nuno stands, 480
And braves the tumult of surrounding bands.
So, from high Ceuta's rocky mountains stray'd,
The raging lion braves the shepherd's shade;
The shepherds, hastening o'er the Tetusa plain,
With shouts surround him, and with spears re-
strain:

He stops, with grinning teeth his breath he draws,
Nor is it fear, but rage, that makes him pause;
His threatening eyeballs burn with sparkling fire,
And his stern heart forbids him to retire;
Amidst the thickness of the spears he sings: 490
So midst his foes the furious Nuno springs:
The Lusian grass, with foreign gore distain'd,
Displays the carnage of the hero's hand.

So when, returning from the plunder'd folds,
The lioness her emptied den beholds,
Enraged she stands, and, listening to the gale,
She hears her whelps low howling in the vale;
The living sparkles flashing from her eyes,
To the Massyllian shepherd-tents she flies 12;

¹¹ The Castilians, so called from one of their ancient kings, named Brix, or Brigus, whom the monkish fabulists call the grandson of Noah.

¹² These lines marked in the text with turned commas, are not in the common editions of Camoens. They consist of three stanzas in the Portuguese, and are said to have been left out by the author himself in his second edition. The translator, however, as they breathe the true spirit of Virgil, was willing to preserve them with this acknowledgment. In this he has followed the example of Casters.

"Our dear-loved freedom on our lances lies;
Behold your friend, your monarch, leads the way,
And daren the thickest of the iron fray;
Sav, shall the Lusian race forsake their king,
Where spears infuriate on the bucklers ring!"

festes with lions, particularly that part of it called tains.

¹⁴ This, which is almost literal from

Muitos lançara o ultimo suspiro—

and the preceding circumstance of don John's brandishing his lance four times,

E sopessando a lança quatro vezes—

are truly poetical, and in the spirit of Homer.
They are omitted, however, by Casters, who substitutes the following in their place, Il dit, et d'un bras, &c.—"He said, and with an arm whose blows are inevitable, he threw his javelin against the fierce Maidonat. Death and the weapon went together. Maidonat fell, pierced with a large wound, and his horse tumbled over him."
Besides Maidonat, Casters has, in this battle, introduced several other names which have no place in Camoens. Carrillo, Robledo, John of Lorea, Salazar of Seville were killed, he tells us: and "Velasquez and Sanchez, natives of Toledo, Galbes, surnamed the Soldier without Fear, Mpotanchoes, Oropesa, and Mondumedo, all six of proved valour, fell by the hand of young Antony, qui porte dans le combat ou plus d'adresse ou plus de bonheur qu'eux, who brought to the fight either more address or better fortune than these." Not a word of this is in the Portuguese.

The fate of another hero shall conclude the specimens of the manner of Casters. The following is literally translated: "Guevar, a vain man, nourished in indolence, staid his arms and face with the blood of the dead whom he found stretched on the dust. Under the cover of this frivolous imposture, he pretended to pass himself for a formidable warrior. He published, with a high voice, the number of the enemies he had thrown to the ground. Don Pedro interrupted him with a blow of his sabre: Guevar lost his life;
his head, full of fumes of a ridiculous pride, bounced far away from his body, which remained defiled with its own blood; a just and terrible punishment for the lies he had told." It is almost unnecessary to add, that there is not one word of this in the original.

¹⁵ This is as literal as the idiom of the two lan-

The first in honour of Saint Jago's band¹⁶,
A naked ghost now sought the gloomy strand;
And he, of Calatrave the sovereign knight, 356
Girt with whole troops his arm had slain in fight,
Descended in murmuring to the shades of night.
Blaspheming Heaven, and gasb'd with many a

Brave Nunio's rebel kindred gnaw'd the ground,
And curs'd their fate, and died. Ten thousands
Who held no title and no office bore, [more
And nameless nobles who promiscuous fell,
Appeas'd that day the flaming dog of Hell.
Now low the proud Castilian standard lies
Beneath the Lusitan flag, a vanquish'd prize. 360
With furious madness fired, and stern disdain,
The fierce Iberians to the fight again
Rush headlong; groans and yellings of despair¹⁷
With horrid uproar rend the trembling air.
Hot boils the blood, thirst burns, and every breast
Pants, every limb with fainty weight oppress
Slow now obeys the will's stern ire, and slow
From every sword descends the feeble blow;
Till rage grew languid, and tired slaughter found
No arm to combat, and no breast to wound. 370
Now from the field Castec's proud monarch flies¹⁸,
In wild dismay he rolls his madd'ning eyes,
And leads the pale-lip'd fight. Swift wing'd with this of Camoëns, but which is not in his original:

Their bucklers clash: thick blows descend from high,
And flakes of fire from their hard helmets fly.

¹⁶ Grand master of the order of St. James, named don Pedro Nunio. He was not killed, however, in this battle, which was fought on the plains of Aljubarota, but in that of Valverde, which immediately followed. The reader may perhaps be surprised to find, that every soldier mentioned in these notes is a don, a lord. The following piece of history will account for the number of the Portuguese nobles. Don Alonzo Enriquez, count of Portugal, when saluted king by his army at the battle of Ourique; in return, dignified every man in his army with the rank of nobility. Vid. the 9th Stat. of Lamego.

¹⁷ The last efforts of rage and despair are thus described in Pope's translation of the fifth battle at the ships. Il. xv.

Thou wouldst have thought, so furious was their fire,
No force could tame them, and no toil could tire;
As if new vigour from new fights they won,
And the long battle was but then begun.
Greece yet unconquer'd kept alive the war,
Secure of death, confiding in despair.
Troy in proud hopes already view'd the main,
Bright with the blaze, and red with heroes slain;
Like strength is felt from hope and from despair,
And each contends as his were all the war.

Yet not the while the restless Nunio staid:

Sevilia's standard on his spear he bore,
And Andalusia's ensigns steep in gore.

in blood, was on his final defeat overwhelmed with all the phrensy of grief. In the night after the decisive battle of Aljubarota, he fled upwards of thirty miles upon a mule. Don Lanreoco, archbishop of Braga, in a letter written in old Portuguese to don John, abbot of Alcobaca, gives this account of his behaviour. "O condestrabre à me far saber ca o rey de Castella se viera à Santarem como homem trevaliado, quem maldezia seu viver, è puzava poles barbas; è à bo lê. bon amigo, mel-hor e que o faga ca non fagermolo nos, ca buenen, alhas. i. e. The constable has informed me that he saw the king of Castile at Santarem, who behaved as a madman, cursing his existence, and tearing the hairs of his beard. And in good faith, my good friend, it is better that he should do so to himself than to us; the man who thus plucks his own beard, would be much better pleased to do so to others." The writer of this letter, though a prelate, fought at the battle of Aljubarota, where he received on the face a large wound from a sabre.

Castera relates this anecdote of him: the flattery of a sculptor had omitted the deep scar: when the archbishop saw the statue, he laid hold of an at-tendant's sword, with which he disfigured the face.
"I have now," said he, "supplied what it wanted."

¹⁹ As a certain proof of the victory, it was required, by the honour of these ages, that the victor should encamp three days on the field of battle.
By this knight-errantry, the advantages which ought to have been pursued were frequently lost.
Don John, however, though he complied with the reigning ideas of honour, sent don Nunio, with a proper army, to reap the fruits of his victory.

²⁰ Castera's note on this place is literally thus:
"They were the daughters of John duke of Lancaster, son of Edward IV. of England, both of great beauty: the eldest, named Catherine, was married to the king of Castile; the youngest, Isabel, to the king of Portugal." This is all a mistake. John of Portugal, about a year after the battle of Aljubarota, married Philippa, eldest daughter of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, son of Edward III. who assisted the king, his son-in-law, in an irruption into Castile, and at the end of the campaign promised to return with more numerous forces for the next. But this was prevented by the marriage of his youngest daughter Catalina with don Henry, eldest son of the king of Castile. The king of Portugal on this entered Galicia, and reduced the cities of Tuy and Salvaterra.

mutilated a new war, he was killed by a fall from his horse, and leaving no issue by his queen Beatrice, the king of Portugal's daughter, all pretensions to that crown ceased. The throne was now prolonged for fifteen years, and though not strictly legal, yet at least the substance of the English queen Catalina prevailed, and a just peace, happy for both kingdoms, ensued.

11 Ceuta is one of the strongest fortresses in Africa ; it lies almost opposite to Gibraltar, and the possession of it was of the greatest importance to the Portuguese during their frequent wars with the Moors. Before the reduction, it was the asylum of Spanish and Portuguese renegades and traitors. The character of this great prince shins a place in those notes, as it affords a comment on the judiciousness of Camoens, who has made him the hero of the epick. His birth, excellent education, and modesty conduct when regent, have already been mentioned. The same justice, prudence, and heroism always accompanied him when king. He had the art to join the most winning ability with all the manly dignity of the sovereign. To those who were his friends, when a private man, he was particularly attentive. His nobility shined at his table, he frequently made visits to them, and introduced among them the taste for, and the love of letters. As he felt the advantages of education, he took the utmost care of that of his children. He had many sons, and he himself often instructed them in solid and useful knowledge, and was amply repaid. He liv'd to see them men, men of parts and of action, whose only emulation was to show affection to his person, and to support his administration, by their great abilities. One of his sons, don Henry, duke of Viseu, was that great prince whose excellent passion for meritorious officers gave birth to all the modern improvements in navigation. The clergy, who had disturbed almost every other reign, were so convinced of the wisdom of his, that they ceased to be sought to be supported out of the treasures of the church, and gratified him the church plate to be cover'd. When the pope ordered a rigorous inquiry to be made into the living brought ecclesiastics before his holiness, the clergy had the singular honour to dissent what was styled the church inalienable, and to own that justice had been impartially administered. He died in the seventy-eighth year of his age, and in the forty-eighth of his reign. His affection to his queen Philippa made him kind of the English, whose friendship he cultivated, and by whom he was frequently assisted.

12 Camoens, in this instance, has raised the character of one brother at the other's expense, to give the poem an air of solemnity. The hope of Portugal was proposed in contrast. The king's troubles differed in their opinions : that of don Fernando, though a humble rank soldier, was approved of by the young nobility. The friends Henry and Ferdinand, as the head of 7000 men, held large to Portugal, and were surrounded by a numerous army of Moors, as some writers say of the hundred thousand. On condition that the Portuguese should be allowed to return home, the infants proposed to renounce Ceuta. The Moors gladly accepted of the terms, but demanded one of the infants as an hostage. Fernando offered himself, and was left. The king was willing to comply with the terms to relieve his brother, but the court considered the value of Ceuta, and would not consent.

The pope also interposed his authority, don Craxid should be kept as a check on the rebels, and proposed to make a crusade for the delivery of Jerusalem. In the meanwhile large offers were made for his liberty. These were rejected by the Moors, who would accept of nothing but Ceuta, whose vast importance was superior to any sum. When negotiation failed, king Edward assembled a large army to effect his brother's release ; but just as he was setting out he was seized with the plague, and died, leaving orders with his queen to deliver up Ceuta for the release of his brother. Thus, however, was never performed. Don Fernando realized of his behaviour gained him their esteem and admiration, nor is there good reason that he received any extraordinary rigorous treatment ; the contrary is rather to be inferred from the romantic notions of military honour which then prevailed among the Moors. Some, however, without Eastern follow, make his sufferings little inferior to those without proof likewise, ascribed to Rodrigo.

Don Fernando is to this day celebrated as a saint and martyr in Portugal, and his memory is commemorated on the 11th of June. King Ferdinand required only five years and a month. He was the most elegant man in his dominions, noble and brave. Latin elegantly, was author of several books, one on horsemanship, in which we are collected. He was brave in the field, active in business, and rendered his country illustrious service by

 Beneath his yoke the Mauritanians groan'd,
 And still they groan beneath the Lusian sway.

 Which but the son of Jove had snatch'd before.
 The palm and laurel round his temples bound,

 When proud Arzilla's strength, Alcazer's towers,
 And Tingia, boastful of her numerous powers, 441

 Their ramparts levell'd, and their temples burn'd.

reducing the laws to a regular code. He was knight of the order of the garter, which honour was conferred upon him by his cousin Henry V. of England. In one instance he gave great offence to the superstitious populace. He despised the advice of a Jew astrologer, who entreated him to delay his coronation, because the stars that day were unfavourable. To this the misfortune of the army at Tangier was ascribed, and the people were always on the alarm while he lived, as if some terrible disaster impended over them.

⁴⁴ When Henry IV. of Castile died, he declared that the infant Joana was his heiress, in preference to his sister donna Isabella, married to don Ferdinand, son to the king of Arragon. In hopes to attain the kingdom of Castile, don Alonzo, king of Portugal, obtained a dispensation from the pope to marry his niece donna Joana; but after a bloody war, the ambitious views of Alonzo and his courtiers were defeated.

 The martial boy beheld the deathful scene.
 With curving movement o'er the field he rode,
 Th' opposing troops his wheeling squadrons mov'd:
 The purple dawn and evening Sun beheld
 His tent encamp assert the conquer'd field.
 Thus when the ghost of Julius hover'd o'er
 Philippi's plain, appear'd with Roman gore,
 Octavia's legions left the field in flight,
 While happier Marcus triumph'd in the fight.

 Through Italy they reach the port that gave
 The fair Parthenope an honour'd grave:
 That shore which oft has felt the servile chain,
 But now smiles happy in the care of Spain.
 Now from the port the brave advent'ers bore,
 And cut the billows of the Rhodian shore;
 Now reach the strand where noble Pompey bled⁴⁶;
 And now, repair'd with rest, to Memphis sped;
 And now, ascending by the vales of Nile, 500

 While Israel's favour'd race the table bottom trode:
 Behind them glistering to the morning skies,

⁵⁰ The emperor Trajan extended the bounds of the Roman empire in the east far beyond any of his predecessors. His conquests reached to the river Tigris, near which stood the city of Ctesiphon, which he subdued. The Roman historians boasted that India was entirely conquered by him; but that could only mean Arabia Felix. Vid. Dion. Cass. Ensch. Chron. p. 205.

Carmanian borders and Indian tribes they saw,
And many a barbarous rite and many a law 520
Their search explor'd; but to their native shore.
Enrich'd with knowledge, they return'd no more.
The glad completion of the Fates' decree,
Kind Heaven rear'd, Emmanuel, for thee,
The crown, and high ambition of thy sires;
To thee descending, wak'd thy latent fires;
And to command the sea from pole to pole,
With restless wish inflam'd thy mighty soul.

"Now from the sky the sacred light withdrawn,
O'er Heaven's clear azure shone the stars of dawn,
Deep silence spread her gloomy wings around, 531
And human griefs were wrapt in sleep profound.
The monarch slumber'd on his golden bed,
Yet anxious cares possess'd his thoughtful head;
His generous soul, intent on public good,
The glorious duties of his birth review'd.
When sent by Heaven a sacred dream inspir'd
His labouring mind, and with its radiance fir'd;
High to the clouds his towering head was rear'd,
New worlds, and nations, fierce and strange, appear'd; 540

The purple dawning o'er the mountains flow'd,
The forest-boughs with yellow splendour glow'd;
High from the steep two copious glassy streams
Roll'd down, and glitter'd in the morning beams.
Here various monsters of the wild were seen,
And birds of plumage, azure, scarlet, green:
Here various herbs, and flowers of various bloom;
There black as night the forest's horrid gloom,
Whose shaggy brakes, by human step untrod, 550
Darken'd the glaring lion's dread abode,
Here, as the monarch fix'd his wondering eyes,
Two hoary fathers from the streams arise;
Their aspect rustic, yet a reverend grace
Appear'd majestic on their wrinkled face:
Their tawny beards uncomb'd, and sweepy long,
Adown their knees in shaggy singlets hung;
From every lock the crystal drops distill,
And bathe their limbs as in a trickling rill; 559
Gay wreaths of flowers, of fruitage, and of boughs,
Nameless in Europe, crown'd their furrow'd brows.
Bent o'er his staff, more silver'd o'er with years,
Worn with a longer way, the one appears;
Who now slow-beckoning with his wither'd hand,
As now advanc'd before the king they stand:

"O thou, whom worlds to Europe yet unknown
Are doom'd to yield and dignify thy crown;
To thee our golden shores the Fates decree;
Our necks, unbow'd before, shall bend to thee. 569
Wide through the world resounds our wealthy fame;
Haste, speed thy prou, that fated wealth to claim.
From Paradise my hallow'd waters spring;
The sacred Gauges I, my brother king
Th' illustrious author of the Indian name:
Yet tui shall languish, and the fight shall flame,
Our fairest lawns with streaming gore shall smoke,
Ere yet our shoulders bend beneath the yoke;
But thou shalt conquer: all thine eyes survey,
With all our various tribes, shall own thy sway."

"He spoke: and melting in a silvery stream 580
Both disappear'd; when waking from his dream,
The wondering monarch, thrill'd with awe divine,
Weighs in his lofty thoughts the sacred sign.

"Now morning, bursting from the eastern sky,
Spreads o'er the clouds the blushing rose's dye;

The nations wake, and at the sovereign's call
The Lusian nobles crowd the palace hall.
The vision of his sleep the monarch tells;
Each heaving breast with joyful wonder swells:
'Fulfill,' they cry, 'the sacred sign obey, 590
And spread the canvass for the Indian sea.'
Instant my looks with troubled ardour burn'd,
When keen on me his eyes the monarch turn'd:—
What he beheld I know not; but I know,
Big swell'd my bosom with a prophet's glow:
And long my mind, with wond'rous bodings fir'd,
Had to the glorious dreadful toil aspir'd:
Yet to the king, whate'er my looks betray'd,
My looks the omen of success display'd.
When, with that sweetness in his mein express, 600
Which unrestrained wins the generous breast,
'Great are the dangers, great the toils,' he cried,
'Ere glorious honours crown the victor's pride.
If in the glorious strife the hero fall,
He proves no danger could his soul appall
And but to dare so great a toil, shall raise
Each age's wonder and immortal praise.

For this dread toil, new oceans to explore,
To spread the sail where sail ne'er flow'd before;
For this dread labour, to your valour due, 610
From all your peers I name, O Vasco, you.
Dread as it is, yet light the task shall be
To you, my Gama, as perform'd for me.—
My heart could bear no more—'Let skies on fire,
Let frozen seas, let horrid war conspire,
I dare them all,' I cried, 'and but repine
That one poor life is all I can resign.

Did to my lot Alcides' labours fall,
For you my joyful heart would dare them all;
The ghastly realms of Death could man invade, 620
For you my steps should trace the ghastly shade.'

"While thus with loyal zeal my bosom swell'd,
That panting zeal my prince with joy beheld:
Honour'd with gifts I stood, but honour'd more
By that esteem my joyful sovereign bore.
That generous praise which fires the soul of worth,
And gives new virtues unexpected birth,
That praise e'en now my heaving bosom fires,
Inflames my courage, and each wish inspires.

"Mov'd by affection, and allur'd by fame, 630
A gallant youth, who bore the dearest name,
Palus, my brother, boldly su'd to share
My toils, my dangers, and my fate in war:
And brave Coello urg'd the hero's claim
To dare each hardship, and to join our fame:
For glory both with restless ardour burn'd,
And silken ease for horrid danger spurn'd;
Alike renown'd in council or in field,
The snare to haffle, or the sword to wield.

Through Lisbon's youth the kindling ardour ran,
And bold ambition thrill'd from man to man; 641
And each the meanness of the venturous band
With gifts stood honour'd by the sovereign's hand.
Heavens! what a fury swell'd each warrior's
breast,

When each, in turn, the smiling king address'd!
Fir'd by his words the direst toils they scorn'd,
And with the horrid lust of danger fiercely burn'd.

"With such bold rage the youth of Myntia glow'd,
When the first keel the Euxine surges plow'd;
When bravely venturous for the golden fleece 650
Orac'lous Argo sail'd from wondering Greece."

Where Tago's yellow stream the harbour leaves,
 And slowly mingles with the ocean waves,
 In warlike pride my gallant navy rode,
 And proudly o'er the beach my soldiers strode.
 Sailors and land-men marshall'd o'er the strand,
 In garbs of various hue around me stand,
 Each earnest first to plight the sacred vow,
 Oceana unknown and gulfs untry'd to plow:
 Then turning to the ships their sparkling eyes, 660
 With joy they heard the breathing winds arise;
 Elite with joy beheld the flapping sail,
 And purple standards floating on the gale;
 While each pressag'd that great as Argus's fame,
 Our feet should give some starry band a name.

"Where foaming on the shore the tide appears,
 A sacred fane its hoary arches rears:
 Dim o'er the sea the evening shades descend,
 And at the holy shrine devout we bend:
 There, while the tapers o'er the altar blaze, 670
 Our prayers and earnest vows to Heaven we raise.
 'Safe through the deep, where every yawning
 Skill to the sailor's eye displays his grave; [wave
 Through howling tempests, and through gulfs
 untry'd,

O mighty God! be thou our watchful guide.
 While speeling thus before the sacred shrine,
 In holy faith's most solemn rite we join;
 Our peace with Heaven the bread of peace confirms,
 And meek contrition every bosom warms.
 Sudden, the lights extinguish'd, all around 680
 Dread silence reigns, and midnight glooms profound;
 A sacred horror pants on every breath,
 And each firm breast devotes itself to death,
 An offer'd sacrifice, sworn to obey
 My nod, and follow where I lead the way,
 Now prostrate round the hallow'd shrine we lie 32,
 Till rosy morn bespreads the eastern sky;
 Then, breathing first resolves, my daring mates

Thousands on thousands crowding, press along, 690
 A woeful, weeping, melancholy throng.
 A thousand white-robb'd priests our steps attend,
 And prayers and holy vows to Heaven ascend.

 Of parting friends, constrain'd my tears to flow.
 To weigh our anchors from our native shore—
 To dare new oceans never dar'd before—
 Perhaps to see my native coast no more—religiosi, sed reliqui omnes voce maxima cum lacrymis à Deo precabantur, ut bene et prosperè illa tam periculosa navigatio omnibus eveniret, et universi re bene gesta incolentes in patriam redirent.

Forgive, O king, if as a man I feel,
 I bear no bosom of obdurate steel!— 700
 (The godlike hero here suppress'd the sigh,
 And wip'd the tear-drop from his manly eye;)
 Then thus resum'd:—"All the poop'd shore
 An awful silent look of anguish wore;
 Affection, friendship, all the kindred ties
 Of spouse and parent languish'd in their eyes;
 As men they never should again behold,
 Self-offer'd victims to destruction sold,
 On us they fix'd the eager look of woe,
 While tears o'er every cheek began to flow; 710

When thus aloud: "Alas! my son, my son!"
 An hoary sire exclaims; "oh! whither run,
 My heart's sole joy, my trembling age's stay,
 To yield thy limbs the dread sea-monster's prey!
 To seek thy burial in the raging wave,
 And leave me cheerless sinking to the grave!
 Was it for this I watch'd thy tender years,
 And bore each fever of a father's fears!
 Alas! my boy!"—his voice is heard no more,
 The female shriek resounds along the shore: 720

With hair dishevell'd through the yielding crowd
 A lovely bride springs on, and screams aloud:
 "Oh! where, my husband, where to seas unknown,
 Where wouldst thou fly me, and my love disown!
 And wilt thou, cruel, to the deep consign
 That valu'd life, the joy, the soul of mine:
 And must our loves, and all the kindred traile
 Of rapt endearments, all expire in vain!
 All the dear transports of the warm embrace,
 When mutual love inspir'd each raptur'd face;
 Must all, alas! be scatter'd in the wind, 731
 Nor thou hastest one lingering look behind!"

"Such the lorn parents' and the spouses' woes,
 Such o'er the strand the voice of wailing rose;
 From breast to breast the soft contagion crept,
 Mov'd by the woeful sound the children wept;
 The mountain echoes catch the big-soul'd sighs,
 And through the dales prolong the matron's cries;
 The yellow sands with tears are silver'd o'er,
 Our fate the mountains and the beach deplore. 740
 Yet firm we march, nor turn one glance aside
 On hoary parent, or on lovely bride.
 Though glory fix'd our hearts, too well we knew
 What soft affection and what love could do.
 The last embrace the bravest worst can bear:
 The bitter yearnings of the parting tear
 Sullen we shun, unable to sustain
 The melting passion of such tender pain.

"Now on the lofty decks prepar'd we stand,
 Whentowering o'er the crowd that veil'd the strand,
 A reverend figure fix'd each wondering eye 34, 751
 And, beckoning thrice, he wav'd his hand on high,

34 By this old man is personified the populace of Portugal. The endeavours to discover the East-Indies by the southern ocean, for about eighty years had been the favourite topic of complaint; and never was any measure of government more unpopular than the expedition of Gama. Eumanuel's councils were almost unanimous against the attempt. Some dreaded the introduction of wealth, and its attendant luxury and effeminacy; while others affirmed, that no adequate advantages could arise from so perilous and remote a navigation. Others, with a foresight peculiar to politicians, were alarmed, lest the Egyptian sultan, who was powerful in the east, should signify his

LUSIAD V.

" While on the beach the holy father stood,
 And spoke the murmurs of the multitude,
 We spread the canvass to the rising gales;
 The gentle winds distend the snowy sails;
 As from our dear-lov'd native shores we fly,
 Our votive shouts, refoabled, rend the sky;
 'Success! success!' far echoes o'er the tide,
 While our broad hulks the foamy waves divide.
 From Leo now, the lordly star of day,
 Intensely blazing, shot his fiercest ray; 10
 When slowly gliding from our wistful eyes,
 The Lusian mountains mingled with the skies;
 Tago's lov'd stream, and Cyntra's mountains cold,
 Dim fading now, we now no more behold:
 And still with yearning hearts our eyes explore,
 Till one dim speck of land appears no more.
 Our native soil now far behind, we ply
 The lonely dreary waste of seas and boundless sky.
 Through the wild deep our venturous navy bore,
 Where but our Henry's plough'd the wave before:
 The verdant islands, first by him descri'd, 21
 We pass'd; and now in prospect opening wide,
 Far to the left, increasing on the view,
 Rose Mauritania's hills of paly blue;
 Far to the right the restless ocean roar'd,
 Whose bounding surges never keel explor'd;
 If bounding shore, as reason deems, divide
 The vast Atlantic from the Indian tide.

" Nam'd from her woods, with fragrant bowers
 adorn'd,
 From fair Madeira's purple coast we turn'd: 30
 Cyprus and Paphos vales the smiling Loves
 Might leave with joy for fair Madeira's groves;
 A shore so flowery, and so sweet an air,
 Venus might build her dearest temple there.
 Onward we pass Massilia's barren strand,
 A waste of wither'd grass and burning sand;
 Where his thin herds the meagre native leads,
 Where not a rivulet laves the doleful meads;
 Nor herds nor fruitage deck the woodland maze:
 O'er the wild waste the stupid ostrich strays, 40
 In devious search to pick her scanty meal,
 Whose fierce digestion gnaws the temper'd steel.

fleet; the affecting grief of their friends and fellow-citizens, who viewed them as self-devoted victims, whom they were never more to behold; and the angry exclamations of the venerable old man, give a dignity and interesting pathos to the departure of the fleet of Gama, unborrowed from any of the classics. In the Æneid, where the Trojans leave a colony of invalids in Sicily, nothing of the awfully tender is attempted. And in the Odyssey there is no circumstance which can be called similar.

² The discovery of some of the West-Indian islands by Columbus was made in 1492 and 1493. His discovery of the continent of America was not till 1498. The fleet of Gama sailed from the Tagus in 1497.

From the green verge where Tigitania ends,
 To Ethiopia's line the dreary wild extends.
 Now past the limit, which his course divides,
 When to the north the Sun's bright chariot rides,
 We leave the winding bays and swarthy shores,
 Where Senegal's black wave impetuous roars;
 A flood, whose course a thousand tribes surveys,
 The tribes who blacken'd in the fiery blaze, 50
 When Phaeton, devious from the solar height,
 Gave Afric's sons the sable hue of night.
 And now from far the Libyan cape is seen.
 Now by my mandate nam'd the Cape of Green.
 Where midst the billows of the ocean smiles
 A flowery sister-train, the happy isles,
 Our onward prow the murmuring surges leave;
 And now our vessels plough the gentle wave,
 Where the blue islands, nam'd of Hesper old,
 Their fruitful bosoms to the deep unfold. 60
 Here changeful Nature shows her various face,
 And frolics o'er the slopes with wildest grace:
 Here our bold fleet their ponderous anchors throw,
 The sickly cherish, and our stores renew.
 From him the warlike guardian power of Spain,
 Whose spear's dread lightning o'er th' embattled
 plain

Has oft o'erwhelm'd the Moors in dire distray,
 And fix'd the fortune of the doubtful day.
 From him we name our station of repair,
 And Jago's name that isle shall ever bear. 70
 The northern winds now curl'd the blackening
 Our sails unfurl'd we plough the tide again!
 Round Afric's coast our winding course we steer,
 Where bending to the east the shores appear.
 Here Jalofo's wide extent displays,
 And vast Mandinga shows its numerous bays:

⁴ Called by Ptolemy Caput Asinarium.

⁵ Called by the ancients Insula Fortunata, now the Canaries.

⁷ The province of Jalofo lies between the two rivers, the Gamben and the Zanago. The latter has other names in the several countries through which it runs. In its course it makes many islands, inhabited only by wild beasts. It is navigable 150 leagues, at the end of which it is crossed by a stupendous ridge of perpendicular rocks, over which the river rushes with such violence, that travellers pass under it without any other inconvenience than the prodigious noise. The Gambea, or Rio Grande, runs 180 leagues, but is not so far navigable. It carries more water, and runs with less noise than the other, though filled with many rivers which water the country of Mandinga. Both rivers are branches of the Niger. Their waters have this remarkable quality; when mixed together they operate as an emetic, but when separate they do not. They abound with great variety of fishes, and their banks are covered with horses, crocodiles, winged serpents, elephants, ounces, wild boars, with great numbers of other animals, wonderful for the variety of their nature and different forms.

The Gambia here his serpent journey takes,
And through the lawns a thousand windings makes;
A thousand swarthy tribes his current leaves, 81

The Gorgades⁹ we pass'd, that hated shore,
Fam'd for its terrors by the bards of yore;
Where but one eye by Phorens' daughters shar'd,
The lord beholders into marble star'd;
Three dreadful sisters! down whose temples roll'd
Their hair of snakes in many a hissing fold;
And scattering horror o'er the dreary strand,
With swarms of vipers sow'd the burning sand. 90
Still to the south our pointed keels we guide,
And through the Austral gulf still onward ride.
Her palmy forests mingling with the skies,
Leona's rugged steep¹⁰ behind us lies:
The Cape of Palms that jutting land we name,
Already conscious of our nation's fame.
Where the vast waves against our bulwarks roar,
And Lusian towers o'erlook the bending shore:
Our sails wide-awelling to the constant blast,
Now by the isle from Thomas nam'd we past; 100
And Cougo's spacious realm before us rose,
Where copious Zayra's limpid billow flows;
A flood by ancient hero never seen,
Where many a temple o'er the banks of green,
Rear'd by the Lusian heroes¹¹, through the night
Of Pagan darkness, pours the mental light.

¹⁰ This ridge of mountains, on account of its great height, was named by the ancients ὄρος ὄξυς, the chariot of the gods. Camoëns gives it its Portuguese name, Serra Lioa, the rock of lions.

¹¹ During the reign of John II. the Portuguese erected several forts, and acquired great power in the extensive regions of Guinea. Azambuja, a Portuguese captain, having obtained leave from Caramanza, a negro prince, to erect a fort on his territories, an unlucky accident had almost proved fatal to the discoverers. A huge rock lay very commodious for a quarry; the workmen began on it; but this rock, as the devil would have it, happened to be a negro god. The Portuguese were driven away by the enraged worshippers, who were afterwards with difficulty pacified by a profusion of such presents as they most esteemed.

The Portuguese having brought an ambassador from Congo to Lisbon, sent him back instructed in the faith. By his means the king, queen, and about 100,000 of the people were baptized; the idols were destroyed, and churches built. Soon after, the prince, who was then absent at war, was baptized by the name of Alvaro. His younger brother, Aquitimo, however, would not receive the faith, and the father, because allowed only one wife, turned apostate, and left the crown to his pagan son, who, with a great army, surrounded his brother, when only attended by some Portuguese and Christian blacks, in all only thirty-seven. By the bravery of these, however, Aquitimo was defeated, taken, and slain. One of Aquitimo's officers declared, they were not defeated by the thirty-seven Christians, but by a glorious army who fought under a shining cross. The idols were again destroyed, and Alonzo sent his sons, grandsons, and nephews, to Portugal to study; two of whom were afterwards bishops in Cougo.—Extracted from Faria y Sousa.

¹² According to fable, Callisto was a nymph of Diana. Jupiter having assumed the figure of that goddess, completed his amorous desire. On the discovery of her pregnancy, Diana drove her from her train. She fled to the woods, where she was delivered of a roe. Juno changed them into bears, and Jupiter placed them in Heaven, where they form the constellation of Ursa Major and Minor. Juno, still enraged, entreated Thetis never to suffer Callisto to bathe in the sea. This is founded on the appearance of the northern pole-star to the inhabitants of our hemisphere; but when Gama approached the southern pole, the northern, of consequence, disappeared under the waves.

¹³ The constellation of the southern pole was called the Cross by the Portuguese sailors, from the appearance of that figure formed by seven stars, four of which are particularly luminous. Dante, who wrote before the discovery of the southern hemisphere, has these remarkable lines in the first canto of his Purgatorio:

I mi volsi a man destra, e posì man
All' altro polo, e vidi quattro stelle
Non vieta mai, fuor ch' alia prima gente.

Voltaire somewhere observes, that this looked like

Voltaire somewhere observes, that this looked like

Seven radiant stars compose the hallov'd sign
That rose still higher o'er the wavy brine;
Beneath this southern axis of the world,
Blewer, with daring scorch, was flag unfurl'd;
Nor pilot knows if bounding shores are plac'd,
Or if one dreary sea o'erflows the lonely waste. 140
" While thus our heels still toward boldly stray'd,
Now tost by tempest, now by calm delay'd,
To tell the terrors of the deep untry'd,
What toils we suffer'd, and what storms defy'd;
What rattling deluges the black clouds pour'd,
What dreary weeks of solid darkness lour'd;
What mountain surges mountain surges lash'd,
What sudden hurricanes the ocean dash'd;
What bursting lightnings, with innocent fare,
Kindled in one wide flame the burning air; 150
What roaring thunders bellow'd o'er our head.
And seem'd to shake the reeling ocean's bed;—
To tell each horror in the deep reveal'd,
Would ask an iron throat with tenfold vigour steel'd:
Those dreadful wonders of the deep I saw,
Which fill the sailor's breast with sacred awe;
And which the sages, of their learning vain,
Esteem the phantoms of the dreadful brain.
That living fire, by seamen held divine¹⁴,
Of Heaven's own care in storms the holy sign, 160
Which midst the horrors of the tempest plays,
And on the blast's dark wings will gaily blaze;
These eyes distinct have seen that living fire
Glide through the storm, and round my sails aspire.

a prophecy, when, in the succeeding age, these four stars were known to be near the antarctic pole. Dante, however, spoke allegorically of the four cardinal virtues.

In the southern hemisphere, as Camoëns observes, the nights are darker than in the northern, the skies being adorned with much fewer stars.

¹⁴ The ancients thus accounted for this appearance:—The sulphureous vapours of the air, after being violently agitated by a tempest, unite; and when the humidity begins to subside, as is the case when the storm is almost exhausted, by the agitation of their atoms they take fire, and are attracted by the masts and cordage of the ship. Being thus naturally the pledges of the approaching calm, it is no wonder that the superstition of sailors should in all ages have calcem'd them divine, and

Of Heaven's own care in storms the holy sign.
In the expedition of the Golden Fleece, in a violent tempest these fires were seen to hover over the heads of Castor and Pollux, who were two of the Argonauts, and a calm immediately ensued. After the spotaches of these heroes, the Grecian sailors invoked those fires by the names of Castor and Pollux, or the sons of Jupiter. The Athenians called them Σωτήρες, saviours; and Homer, in his Hymn to Castor and Pollux, says,

*Μακρὰν ἀπὸ πύργου καθὼς κίονες, ἢ δὲ Δόρυς
Υψηλοῦ, κινεῖσθαι τὴν ἠέλειον πύραυλον.*

Phi. Nat. Hist. l. ii. Seneca, Quæst. Nat. c. i. and Cæsar de Bell. Afr. c. vi. mention these fires as often seen to alight and rest on the points of the spears of the soldiers. By the French and Spaniards they are called St. Helena's fire; and by the Italians, the fires of St. Peter and St. Nicholas. Modern discoveries have proved that these appearances are the electric fluid attracted by the spindle of the mast, or the point of the spear.

And still, while wonder thrill'd my breast, mine eyes
To Heaven have seen the watery column rise.
Slender at first the visible form appears,
And writhing round and round its volume rears:
Thick as a mist the vapour swells its side;
A curling whirlwind lifts it to the skies: 170
The tube now straightens, now in width extends,
And in a hovering cloud its summit ends:
Still gulf on gulf it sucks the rising tide,
And swells the cloud, with cushion'd weight supply'd.
Full-gorg'd, and blackening, spreads, and moves, more slow.

And waving trembles to the waves below.
Thus when to chase the summer's sultry beam
The thirsty heifer seeks the cooling stream,
The eager horse-leech, fixing on her lips,
Her blood with aëret throat imminute sips, 180
Till the gorg'd glutton, swell'd beyond her size,
Drops from her wounded hold, and bursting dies—
So bursts the cloud, o'erloaded with its freight,
And the dash'd ocean staggers with the weight.
But say, ye sages¹⁵, who can weigh the cause,
And trace the secret springs of Nature's laws,
Say, why the wave, of bitter brine erewhile,
Should to the bottom of the deep recoil
Robb'd of its salt, and from the cloud distill
So wet as the waters of the limpid rill? 190
Ye sons of boastful wisdom, fam'd of yore,
Whose feet unnumber'd wand'ring many a shore,
From Nature's wonders to withdraw the veil,
Had you with me unbur'd the daring sail,
Had view'd the wondrous scenes mine eyes survey'd,
What seeming miracle the deep display'd,

¹⁴ In this book, particularly in the description of Massilia, the Gorgades, the fires called Castor and Pollux, and the water-spout, Camoëns has happily imitated the manner of Lucan. It is probable that Camoëns, in his voyage to the East-Indies, was an eye-witness of the phenomena of the fire and water-spout. The latter is thus described by Pliny, l. ii. c. 51. Fit et caligo, bellum simul nubes dire navigantibus: vocatur et columna, cum spiritus humor igneque ipse sustinet, et in locum veluti itulianæ nubes aquam trahit. Dr. Priestley, from signor Beccaria, thus describes the water-spouts: "They generally appear in calm weather. The sea seems to boil, and send up a smoke under them, rising in a hill towards the spout. A rumbling noise is heard. The form is that of a speaking-trumpet, the wider end being towards the clouds, and the narrower towards the sea. The colour is sometimes whitish, and at other times black. Their position is sometimes perpendicular, sometimes oblique, and sometimes in the form of a curve. Their continuance is various: some vanish instantly and presently rise again; and some continue near an hour." Modern philosophers ascribe them to electricity, and esteem them of the same nature as whirlwinds and hurricanes on land. Camoëns says, the water of which they are composed becomes freshen'd; which some have thus accounted for; when the violent heat attracts the waters to rise in the form of a tube, the marine salts are left behind by the action of rarefaction, being too gross and fixed to ascend. It is then, when the overladen vapour bursts, that it descends

Sweet as the waters of the limpid rill.

What secret virtues various Nature show'd—

O! Heaven! with what a fire your page had glow'd!

“ And now since wandering o'er the foamy
Our brave armada beld her venturous way, [spray,
Five times the changeful compass of the night 201
Had flid' her shining horns with silver light,
When sudden from the main-top's airy sound
'Land! land!' is heard.—At the joyful sound,
Swift to the crowded decks the bounding crew
On wings of hope and battering transport flew,
And each strain'd eye with aching sight explor'd
The wide horizon of the eastern shores:
As thin blue clouds the mountain summits rise,
And now the laws salute our joyful eyes; 210
Loud through the fleet the echoing shouts prevail,
We drop the anchor, and restrain the sail;
And now descending in a spacious bay,
Wide o'er the coast the venturous soldiers stray,
To spy the woanders of the savage shore,
Where stranger's foot had never trod before.

I and my pilots on the yellow sand
Explore beneath what sky the shores expand.
That sage device, whose sundress we proclaim
Th' immortal honour of its author's name 220
The Sun's bright meazur'd, and my compass
The painted globe of ocean and of land. [canon'd,
Here we perceiv'd our venturous heels had past,
Unharm'd; the southern tropic's bowling blast;
And now approach'd dread Neptune's secret reign,
Where the stern power, as o'er the Austral main
He rides, wide scatters from the polar star
Hail, ice, and snow, and all the wintery war.
While thus attentive on the beach we stood,
My soldiers, hastening from the upland wood, 230
Right to the shore a trembling negro brought,
Whom on the forest-height by force they caught,
As distant wander'd from the cell of home,
He suck'd the honey from the poprus comb.
Horror glared to his look, and fear extreme,
In mien more wild than brutal Polypheme:
No word of rich Arabia's tongue he knew,
No sign could answer, nor our gems would view:
Froze garments strip'd with shining gold he torn'd;
The stary diamond and the silver sparv'd. 240
Straight at my side are worthless trinkets brought;
Round beads of crystal as a brooch wrought,
A cap of red; and dangling on a string
Some little bells of brass before him ring:
A wide-mouth'd laugh confess'd his barbarous joy,
And both his hands he rais'd to grasp the toy:
Pleas'd with these gifts we set the savage free,
Homeward he springs away, and bounds with glee.

“ Soon as the gleamy streaks of purple morn
The lofty forest's topmost boughs adorn, 250
Down the steep mountain's side, yet hoar with dew,
A naked crowd, and black as night their hue,
Come tripping to the shore: their wishful eyes
Declare what tawdry trifles meet their prize:
These to their hopes were giv'n, and, void of fear,
Mild seem'd their manners, and their looks sincere.

A bold rash youth, ambitious of the fame
Of brave adventurer, Veloso his name,
Through pathless brakes their homeward steps
And on his single arm for help depends. [attends,
Long was his stay: my earnest eyes explore, 261
When rushing down the mountain to the shore
I mark'd him; and terror urg'd his rapid strides;
And soon Coello's skill the wave divides.
Yet are his friends admir'd, the trencherous foe
Trod on his latest steps, and aim'd the blow.
Mow'd by the danger of a youth so brave,
Myself now snatch'd an oar, and sprung to save:
When sudden, blackeering down the mountain's
Another crowd pursu'd his panting flight; [height,
And soon an arrow and a flinty shower 271
Thick o'er our heads the fierce barbarians pour
Nor proud in vain; a feather'd arrow stood
Fix'd in my leg 27, and drank the gushing blood.

27 Camoens, in describing the adventure of Fernando Veloso, by departing from the truth of history, has shown his judgment as a poet. The place where the Portuguese landed they named the bay of St. Helena. They caught one of two negroes, says Faria, who were busied in gathering booty on a mountain. Their behaviour to this savage, whom they gratified with a red cap, some glasses and belts, induced him to bring a number of his companions for the like trifles. Though some who accompanied Gama were skilled in the various Ethiopic languages, not one of the natives could understand them. A commerce however was commenced by signs and gestures. Gama behaved to them with great civility; the fleet was cheerfully supplied with fresh provisions, for which the natives received clothes and trinkets. But this friendship was soon interrupted by a young rash Portuguese. Having contracted an intimacy with some of the negroes, he obtained leave to penetrate into the country along with them, to observe their habitations and strength. They conducted him to their huts with great good nature, and placed before him, what they esteemed an elegant repast, a sea-calf dressed in the way of their country. This so much disgusted the delicate Portuguese, that he instantly got up and abruptly left them. Nor did they oppose his departure, but accompanied him with the greatest innocence. As fear, however, is always jealous, he imagined they were leading him as a victim to slaughter. No sooner did he come near the ships, than he called aloud for assistance. Coello's boat immediately set off for his rescue. The Ethiopians fled to the woods; and now esteeming the Portuguese as a band of lawless plunderers, they provided themselves with arms, and lay in ambush. Their weapons were javelins, headed with short pieces of horn, which they threw with great dexterity. Soon after, while Gama and some of his officers were on the shore, taking the altitude of the Sea by the astrolabium, they were suddenly and with great fury attacked by the ambush from the woods. Several were much wounded.—mikos convulserant, inter quem Gama in pede vultu accipit,—and Gama received a wound in the foot. The admiral made a speedy retreat to the fleet, prudently choosing rather to leave the negroes the honour of the victory, than to risk the life of one man in a quarrel to resign to the destination of his expedition; and 26 The astrolabium, an instrument of infinite service in navigation, by which the altitude of the Sun and distance of the stars are taken. It was invented in Portugal during the reign of John II. by two Jew physicians named Roderic and Joseph. It is asserted by some that they were assisted by Martin of Bohemia, a celebrated mathematician. Partly from Casteln. Vid. Barros, Dec. l. 1. 4. c. 8.

Vengeance as sudden every word repays,
 Fall in their fronts our flashing lightnings blaze;
 Their shrieks of horreur instant pierce the sky,
 And wing'd with fear at fullest speed they fly.
 Long tracks of gore their scatter'd flight betray'd,
 And now, Veloso to the fleet convey'd, 980
 His sportful mates his brave exploits demand,
 And what the curious wonders of the land:
 'Hard was the hill to climb, my valiant friend,
 But oh! how smooth and easy to descend!
 Well hast thou prov'd thy swiftness for the chase,
 And shown thy matchless merits in the race!
 With look unmov'd the gallant youth replied:
 'For you, my friends, my fleetest speed was tried;
 'Twas you the fierce barbarians meant to slay;
 For you I fear'd the fortune of the day; 990
 Your danger great without mine aid I knew,
 And swift as lightning 'd to your rescue flew.'

where, to impress the terror of his arms could be of no service to his interest. When he came nearer to India he acted in a different manner. He then made himself dreaded wherever the treachery of the natives provoked his resentment.—Collected from Paria and Omaria.

The critics, particularly the French, have vehemently declaimed against the least mixture of the comic, with the dignity of the epic poem. It is needless to enter into any defence of this passage of Camoëns, further than to observe, that Homer, Virgil, and Milton have offended the critics in the same manner; and that this piece of railery in the Lusiad is by much the politest, and the least reprehensible, of any thing of the kind in the four poets. In Homer are several strokes of low railery. Patroclus, having killed Hector's charioteer, puns thus on his sudden fall: "It is a pity he is not nearer the sea! He would soon catch abundance of oysters, nor would the storms frighten him. See how he dives from his chariot down to the sand! What excellent divers are the Trojans!" Virgil, the most judicious of all poets, descends even to the style of Dutch painting, where the commander of a galley tumbles the pilot into the sea, and the sailors afterward laugh at him, as he sits on a rock spewing up the salt water:

— Segnempne Menosten,

In mare precipitem poppi deturbat ab altis.

At gravis ut fundo vix tandem redditis imo est

Jam senior, madidague fœnis in veste Menosten;

Summa petit scopuli, sicætaque in rupe resedit.

Illum et labentem Teucri, et risere natantem;

Et salces ridet revocentem pectore notus.

And though the characters of the speakers (the ingenious defence which has been offered for Milton) may in some measure vindicate the railery which he puts into the mouth of Satan and Belial, the lowness of it, when compared with that of Camoëns, must still be acknowledged. Talking of the execution of the diabolical artillery among the good angels, they, says Satan,

Flew off, and into strange vagaries fell,

As they would dance; yet for a dance they seem'd

Somewhat extravagant and wild, perhaps

For joy of offer'd peace.—

To whom thus Belial, in like gamesome mood:

Leader, the terms we sent were terms of weight,

Of hard contents, and full of force urg'd home,

He now the treason of the foe relates,
 How, soon as past the mountain's upland straits,
 They chang'd the colour of their friendly shoo,
 And force forbade his steps to tread below:
 How down the covert of the steepy brake
 Their lurking stand a treacherous ambush take;
 On us, when speeding to defend his fight,
 To rush, and plunge us in the shades of night: 300
 Nor while in friendship would their lips unfold
 Where India's ocean lav'd the orient shores of gold.
 "Now prosperous gales the heading canvas swell'd;
 From these rude shores our fearless course we hold:
 Beneath the glittering wave the god of day
 Had now five times withdrawn the parting ray,
 When o'er the prow a sudden darkness spread,
 And slowly floating o'er the mast's tall head
 A black cloud hover'd; nor appear'd from far
 The Moon's pale glimpse, nor faintly twinkling star;
 So deep a gloom the hazing vapour cast, 311
 Transist with awe the bravest stood aghast.
 Meanwhile a hollow hursting roar resound,
 As when hoarse surges lash their rocky bounds;
 Nor had the blackening wave nor frowning beaves
 The wonted signs of gathering tempest given.
 Amaz'd we stood— O thou, our fortune's guide,
 Avert this once, mighty God," I cried;
 'Or through forbidden climes adventurous stray'd,
 Have we the secrets of the deep survey'd, 320
 Which these wide solitudes of seas and sky
 Were doom'd to hide from man's unshallow'd eye!
 What'er this prodigy, it threatens more
 Than midnight tempests and the mingled war,
 When sea and sky combine to rock the marble shore.'

"I spoke, when rising through the darken'd air,
 Appall'd we saw a hideous phantom glare:
 High and enormous o'er the flood he tower'd,
 And thwart our way with sullen aspect lower'd:
 An earthly paleness o'er his cheeks was spread, 330
 Erect uprose his hairs of wither'd red;
 Writhing to speak, his sable lips disclose,
 Sharp and disjoin'd, his gnashing teeth's blue rows;
 His haggard beard flow'd quivering on the wind,
 Revenge and horreur in his mien combin'd;
 His clouded front, by wittiering lightnings scar'd,
 The inward anguish of his soul declar'd.
 His red eyes glowing from their dusky caves
 Shot livid fires: far echoing o'er the waves
 His voice resounded, as the cavern'd shore 340
 With hollow groan repeats the tempest's roar.
 Cold gliding borrows thrill'd each hero's breast,
 Our bristling hair and tottering knees confess'd
 Wild dread; the while with visage ghastly wan,
 His black lips trembling, thus the fiend began: 350

Such as we might perceive amov'd them all,
 And stambled many—

— this gift they have beside,

They show us when our feet walk not upright.

The partiality of translators and editors is become almost proverbial. The admiration of their author is supposed when they undertake to introduce him to the public; that admiration, therefore, may without a blush be confessed: but if the reputation of judgment is valued, all the jealousy of circumspection is necessary; for the transition from admiration to partiality and hypercriticism is not only easy, but to oneself often imperceptible. Yet however guarded against this

"O you, the boldest of the nations, fir'd,
By daring pride, by lust of fame inspir'd, partiality of hypercriticism the translator of Camoëns may deem himself, he is aware that some of his colder readers may perhaps, in the following instance, accuse him of, it. Regardless, however, of the sang-froid of those who judge by authority and not by their own feelings, he will venture to appeal to the few whose taste, though formed by the classics, is untainted with classical prejudices. To these he will appeal, and to these he will venture the assertion, that the fiction of the apparition of the Cape of Tempeste, in sublimity and awful grandeur of imagination, stands unsurpassed in human composition.—Voltaire, and the foreign critics, have confessed its merit.—In the prodigy of the Harpies in the Æneid, neither the

Pestis et ira delum Stygiis sese extulit undis:
Nor the predictions of the harpy Cæleso, can, in point of dignity, bear any comparison with the fiction of Camoëns. The noble and admired description of Fame, in the fourth Æneid, may seem indeed to challenge competition:

*Fama, malum quo non aliud velocius ullum:
Mobilitate viget, viresque acquirit eundo:
Parva metu primò; mox sese attollit in auras,

Fame, the great ill, from small beginning grows;
Swift from the first, and every moment brings
New vigour to her sights, new pinions to her wings.
Soon grows the pigmy to gigantic size,
Her feet on earth, her forehead in the skies:
Enrag'd against the gods, revengeful Earth
Produc'd her last of the Titaoian birth.
Swift in her walk, more swift her winged haste,
A monstrous phantom, horrible and vast;
As many plumes as raise her lofty flight,
So many piercing eyes enlarge her sight:
Millions of opening mouths to Fame belong,
And every mouth is furnish'd with a tongue,
And round with listening ears the flying plague is
She fills the peaceful universe with cries; [hung;
No slumbers ever close her wakeful eyes:
By day from lofty towers her head she shows.

territat urbes, are all very great, and finely imagined. But the whole picture is the offspring of careful attention and judgment; it is a noble display of the calm majesty of Virgil, yet it has not the enthusiasm of that heat of spontaneous conception, which the ancients honoured with the name of inspiration. The fiction of Camoëns, on the contrary, is the genuine effusion of the glow of poetical imagination. The description of the spectre, the awfulness of the prediction, and the horror that breathes through the whole, till the phantom is interrupted by Gama, are in the true spirit of the wild and grand terrific of a Homer or a Shakespeare. But however Camoëns may, in this passage, have excelled Virgil, he himself is infinitely surpassed by two passages of Holy Writ. "A thing was secretly brought to me," says the author of the book of Job, "and mine ear received a little thereof. In thoughts from the visions of the night, when deep sleep falleth on men, fear came upon me, and trembling, which made all my bones to shake: then a spirit passed before my face; the hair of my flesh stood up: it stood still, but I could not discern the form thereof: an image was before mine eyes, there was silence, and I heard a voice: 'Shall mortal man be more just than God! shall a man be more pure than his maker! Behold, he put no trust in his servants, and his angels he charged with folly; how much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust, and who are crushed before the moth!'"

This whole passage, particularly the indistinguishable form and silence, are as superior to Camoëns in the imitably wild terrific, as the following, from the Apocalypse, is in grandeur of description. "And I saw another mighty angel come down from Heaven, clothed with a cloud, and a rainbow was upon his head, his face was as it were the sun, and his feet as pillars of fire. . . . and he set his right foot upon the sea, and his left foot upon the earth, and cried with a loud voice, as when a lion roareth. . . . and he lifted up his hand to Heaven, and swore by Him that liveth for ever and ever, . . . that Time should be no more."

"On the return of Gama to Portugal, a fleet of thirteen sail, under the command of Pedro Alvarez de Cabral, was sent out on the second voyage to India, where the admiral with only six ships arrived. The rest were mostly destroyed by a terrific tempest at the Cape of Good Hope, which lasted twenty days. "The day-time," says Faria,

That gallant navy, by thy whirlwinds tost
 And raging seas, shall perish on my coast:
 Then he who first my secret reign descried,
 A naked corsair flouting o'er the tide
 Shall drive—Unless my heart's full raptures fail,
 O Lusua! oft shalt thou thy children wail; 569
 Each year thy shipwreck'd sons shalt thou deplore,
 Each year thy sheeted masts shall strew my shore.

"With trophies plum'd behold a hero come,"
 Ye dreary wilds, prepare his yawning tomb.
 Though smiling fortune bless his youthful morn,
 Though glory's rays his laurel'd brows adorn,
 Full oft though he beheld with sparkling eye
 The Turkish moons in wild confusion fly,
 While he, proud victor, thunder'd in the rear,
 All, all his mighty fame shall vanish here.

Quiloa's sons, and thine, Mombaze, shall see 580
 Their conqueror bend his laurel'd head to me;
 While proudly mingling with the tempest's sound,
 Their shouts of joy from every cliff rebound.

"The howling blast, ye slumbering storms,
 A youthful lover, and his haughty fair, [prepare,
 Triumphant sail from India's ravag'd land;
 His evil angel leads him to thy strand.

Through the torn bulk the dashing waves shall roar,
 The shatter'd wrecks shall blacken all thy shore.
 Themselves escap'd, despoil'd by savage hands,
 Shall naked wander o'er the burning sands, 591

Spar'd by the waves far deeper woes to bear,
 Woes e'en by me acknowledg'd with a tear.
 Their infant race, the promis'd heirs of joy,
 Shall now no more a hundred hands employ;
 By cruel want, beneath the parents' eye,
 In these wide wastes their infant race shall die.

Through dreary wilds where never pilgrim trod,
 Where caverns yawn, and rocky fragments nod,
 The hapless lover and his bride shall stray, 400
 By night unsbelter'd and forlorn by day.

In rain the lover o'er the trackless plain
 Shall dart his eyes, and cheer his spouse in vain.
 Her tender limbs, and breast of mountain snow,
 Where ne'er before intruding blast might blow,
 Farch'd by the Son, and shrivell'd by the cold
 Of dewy night, shall he, fond man, behold.

"was so dark, that the sailors could scarcely see each other, or hear what was said for the horrid noise of the winds. Among those who perished was the celebrated Bartholomew Diaz, who was the first modern discoverer of the Cape of Good Hope, which he named the Cape of Tempests."

Don Francisco de Almeyda. He was the first Portuguese viceroy of India, in which country he obtained several great victories over the Mohammedans and Pagans. He conquered Quiloa and Mombaze or Mombaze. On his return to Portugal he put into the bay of Saldama, near the Cape of Good Hope, to take in water and provisions. The rudeness of one of his servants produced a quarrel with the Caffres or Mottentots. His attendants, much against his will, forced him to march against the blacks. "Ah, whither," he exclaimed, "will you carry the infirm man of sixty years?" After plundering a miserable village, on the return to their ships they were attacked by a superior number of Caffres, who fought with such fury in rescue of their children, whom the Portuguese had seized, that the viceroy and fifty of his attendants were slain.

Thus wandering wide, a thousand ills o'erpast,
 In fond embraces they shall sink at last;
 While pitying tears their dying eyes o'erflow, 410
 And the last sigh shall wail each other's woe."

"Some few, the sad companions of their fate,
 Shall yet survive, protected by my hate,
 On Tagus' banks the dismal tale to tell,
 How, blasted by thy frown, your heroes fell."

"He paus'd, in act still further to disclose
 A long, a dreary prophecy of woes:
 When, springing onward, loud my voice resound'd;
 And midst his rage the threatening shade comforted:
 'What art thou, horrid form, that rid'st the air? 420
 By Heaven's eternal light, stern fiend, declare.'
 His lips he writhes, his eyes far round he throws,
 And from his breast deep hollow groans arose;

"This poetical description of the miserable catastrophe of don Emmanuel de Souza, and his beautiful spouse Leonora de Sá, is by no means exaggerated. He was several years governor of Din in India, where he amassed immense wealth. On his return to his native country, the ship in which were his lady, all his riches, and five hundred men, his sailors and domestics, was dashed to pieces on the rocks at the Cape of Good Hope. Don Emmanuel, his lady, and three children, with four hundred of the crew, escaped, having only saved a few arms and provisions. As they marched through the rude uncultivated deserts, some died of famine, of thirst, and fatigue; others, who wandered from the main body in search of water, were murdered by the savages, or devoured by the wild beasts. The horror of this miserable situation was most dreadfully aggravated to doña Leonora: her husband began to discover signs of insanity. 'They are arrived at last at a village inhabited by Ethiopian banditti. At first they were courteously received; and Souza, partly stupified with grief, at the desire of the barbarians yielded up to them the arms of his company. No sooner was this done, than the savages stripped the whole company naked, and left them destitute to the mercy of the desert. The wretchedness of the delicate and exposed Leonora was increased by the brutal insults of the negroes. Her husband, unable to relieve, beheld her miseries. After having travelled about 300 leagues, her legs swelled, her feet bleeding at every step, and her strength exhausted, she sunk down, and with the sand covered herself to the neck, to conceal her nakedness. In this dreadful position, she beheld two of her children expire. Her own death soon followed. Her husband, who had been long contemner of her beauty, received her last breath in a distracted embrace. Immediately he snatched his third child in his arms, and uttering the most lamentable cries, he ran into the thickest of the wood, where the wild beasts were soon heard to growl over their prey. Of the whole four hundred who escaped the waves, only six-and-twenty arrived at another Ethiopian village, whose inhabitants were more civilized, and traded with the merchants of the Red Sea: from hence they found a passage to Europe, and brought the tidings of thy unhappy fate of their companions. Jerome de Cortereal, a Portuguese poet, has written an affecting poem on the shipwreck and deplorable catastrophe of don Emmanuel and his beloved spouse. Vid. Faria, Barros, &c.

Sternly assumes he stood : with wounded pride
And anguish torn, ' In me, behold,' he cried,
While dark-red sparkles from his eye-balls roll'd,
' In me the spirit of the Cape behold,
That rock by you the Cape of Tempests named,
By Neptune's rage in horrid earthquakes framed,
When Jove's red bolts o'er Titan's offspring
flamed. 430

With wide-stretch'd piles I guard the pathless strand,

And Afric's southern mound unmov'd I stand ;
Nor Roman prow nor daring Tyrian oar
Ere dash'd the white wave foaming to my shore ;
Nor Greece nor Carthage ever spread the sail
On these my seas to catch the trading gale.
You, you alone have dared to plough my main,
And with the human voice disturb my lone reign.

" He spoke, and deep a lengthen'd sigh he drew,
A doleful sound, and vanish'd from the view " : 440

¶ The circumstances of the disappearance of the spectre are in the same poetical spirit of the introduction. To suppose this spectre the spirit of that huge promontory the Cape of Tempests, which by night makes its awful appearance to the fleet of Gama, while wandering in an unknown ocean, is a noble flight of imagination. As already observed in the preface, the machinery of Camoens is allegorical. To establish Christianity in the east, is expressly said in the Lusiad to be the great purpose of the hero. By Bacchus, the demon who opposes the expedition, the genius of Mohammedism, must of consequence be understood; and accordingly, in the eighth book, the Evil Spirit and Bacchus are mentioned as the same personage; where, in the figure of Mohammed, he appears in a dream to a Mohammedan priest. In like manner, by Adamastor, the genius of Mohammedism must be supposed to be meant. The Moors, who professed that religion, were, till the arrival of Gama, the sole navigators of the eastern seas, and by every exertion of force and fraud, they endeavoured to prevent the settlements of the Christians. In the figure of the spectre, the French translator finds an exact description of the person of Mohammed, his fierce demeanour and pale complexion; but he certainly carries his unravelment too far in several instances: to mention only two; "Mohammed," says he, "was a false prophet, so is Adamastor, who says Emmanuel de Souza and his spouse shall die in one another's arms, whereas the husband was devoured by wild beasts in the wood. . . By the metamorphosis of Adamastor into a huge mass of earth and rock, laved by the waves, is meant the death and tomb of Mohammed. He died of a dropy, behold the waters which surround him; voilà les eaux qui l'entourent.—His tomb was exceeding high; behold the height of the promontory." By such latitude of interpretation, the allegory which was really intended by an author, becomes suspected by the reader. As Camoens, however, has assured us that he did allegorize, one need not hesitate to affirm, that the amour of Adamastor is an instance of it. By Thetis in figured Renown, or true Glory, by the fierce passion of the giant, the fierce rage of Ambition, and by the rugged mountain that filled his deluded

The frighten'd billows gave a rolling swell,
And distant far prolong'd the dismal yell;
Faint and more faint the howling echoes die,
And the black cloud dispersing leaves the sky.
High to the angel host, whose guardian care
Had ever round us watch'd, my hands I rear,
And Heaven's dread king implore, as o'er our head
The bend, dissolved, an empty shadow fled;
So may his curses by the winds of Heaven
Far o'er the deep, their idle sport, be driven!" 450

With sacred horror thrill'd, Melinda's lord
Held up the eager hand, and caught the word ;
" Oh wondrous faith of ancient days," he cries,
" Conceal'd in mystic lore, and dark disguise I Taught by their sires, our hoary fathers tell,
On these rude shores a giant spectre fell, [throws ;
What time from Heaven the rebel band were
And oft the wandering gamin has heard his moan.
While o'er the wave the clouded Moon appears
To hide her weeping face, his voice he hears 460
O'er the wild storm. Deep in the days of yore
A holy pilgrim trod the nightly shore ;
Stern groans he heard; by ghostly spells controul'd,
His fate, mysterious, thus the spectre told :

" By forceful Titan's warm embrace oppress'd,
The rock-ribb'd mother Earth his love confess'd ;
The hundred-handed giant at a birth
And me she bore: nor slept my hopes on Earth ;
My heart avow'd my sire's ethereal flame;
Great Adamastor then my dreading name. 470
In my bold brother's glorious toils engaged,
Tremendous war against the gods I waged:
Yet not to reach the throne of Heaven I try,
With mountain piled on mountain to the sky ;
To see the conquest of the seas before,
In his green realm the second Jove to quell.
Nor did ambition all my passions hold ;
'T was love that prompted an attempt so bold.

Ah me, one summer in the cool of day
I saw the Nereids on the sandy bay 480
With lovely Thetis from the wave advance.
In mirthful frolic, and the paked dance,
In all her charms reveal'd the goddess trode ;
With fiercest ire my struggling bosom glow'd ;
Yet, yet I feel them burning in my heart,
And hopeless languish with the raging smart,
For her, each goddess of the Heavens I scorn'd,
For her alone my fervent ardour burn'd.
In vain I woo'd her to the lover's bed ;
From my grim form with horror quate she fled. 490
Madd'ning with love, by force I went to gain
The silver goddess of the blue domain ;
To the hoar mother of the Nereid band 50
I tell my purpose, and her aid command ;
By fear impell'd, old Doris tries to move,
And win the spouse of Peleus to my love.
The silver goddess with a smile replies, [prize]
' What nymph can yield her charms a giant's
Yet from the horrors of a war to save,
And guard in peace our empire of the wave, 500 arms, the infamy acquired by the brutal conquest of Mohammed. The hint of this last circumstance is adopted from Castor.

¶ Doris, the sister and spouse of Nereus. By Nereus, in the physical sense of the fable, is understood the water of the sea, and by Doris, the bitterness or salt, the supposed cause of its prolific quality in the generation of fishes.

What'er with honour he may hope to gain,
 That let him hope his wish shall soon attain.
 The promised grace infused a bolder fire,
 And shook my mighty limbs with force desire.
 But ah, what error spreads its dreadful night,
 What phantoms hover o'er the lover's sight!
 The war resign'd, my steps by Doris led,
 While gentle eve her shadowy mantle spread,
 Before my steps the snowy Thetis shone
 In all her charms, all naked, and alone. 510
 Swift as the wind with open arms I sprung,
 And round her waist with joy delirious clung:
 In all the transports of the warm embrace,
 A hundred kisses on her angel face,
 On all its various charms my rage bestows,
 And on her cheek my cheek enraptured glows.
 When, oh, what anguish while my shame I tell!
 What fixt despair, what rage my bosom swell!
 Here was no goddess, here no heavenly charms,
 A rugged mountain fill'd my eager arms, 520
 Whose rocky top, o'erhung with matted brier,
 Reeked the kisses of my amorous fire. * - [blood;
 Waked from my dream, cold horror froze my Fixt as a rock before the rock I stood;
 'O fairest goddess of the ocean train,
 Behold the triumph of thy proud disdain!
 Yet why', I cried, 'with all I wish'd decoy,
 And when exulting in the dream of joy,
 A horrid mountain to mine arms convey!'
 Madd'ning I spoke, and furious sprung away. 530
 Far to the south I sought the world unknown,
 Where I unheard, uncur'd, might wail alone,
 My foul dishonour, and my tears to hide,
 And shun the triumph of the goddess' pride.
 My brothers now by Jove's red arm o'erthrown,
 Beneath huge mountains piled on mountains groan;
 And I, who taught each echo to deplore,
 And tell my sorrows to the desert shore,
 I felt the hand of Jove my crimes pursue;
 My stiffening flesh to earthy ridges grew, 540
 And my huge bones, no more by narrow warm'd,
 To horrid piles and ribs of rock transform'd,
 Yon dark-brow'd cape of monstrous size became,
 Where round me still, in triumph o'er my shame,
 The silvery Thetis bids her surges roar.
 And woft my groans along the dreary shore.'"
 Melinda's monarch thus the tale pursued
 Of ancient faith; and Gama thus renew'd—
 "Now from the wave the chariot of the day
 Whirl'd by the fiery coursers springs away, 550
 When full in view the giant Cape appears,
 Wide spreads its limbs, and high its shoulders rears;
 Behind us now it curves the bending side,
 And our bold vessels plough the eastern tide.
 Nor long excursive off at sea we stand,
 A cultured shore invites us to the land.
 Here their sweet scenes the rural joys bestow,
 And give our wearied minds a lively glow."

* Variety is no less delightful to the reader than to the traveller, and the imagination of Camoëns gave an abundant supply. The insertion of this pastoral landscape, between the terrific scenes which precede and follow, has a fine effect. "Variety," says Pope, in one of his notes on the Odyssey, "gives life and delight; and it is much more necessary in epic than in comic or tragic poetry, sometimes to shift the scenes to diversify and embellish the story." The authority of an-

The tenants of the coast, a festive band,
 With dances meet us on the yellow sand; 560
 Their brides on slow-paced oxen rode behind;
 The spreading horns with flowery garlands twined,
 Bespoke the dew-lapt bees their proudest boast,
 Of all their bestial store they valued most.
 By turns the husbands and the brides prolong
 The various measures of the rural song.
 Now to the dance the rustic reeds resound;
 The dancers' heels light-quivering beat the ground;
 And now the lambs around them bleating stray,
 Feed from their hands, or round them frisking play. 570

Methought I saw the sylvan reign of Pan,
 And heard the music of the Mæonian swan—
 With smiles we hail them, and with joy behold
 The blissful manners of the age of gold.
 With that mild kindness, by their looks display'd,
 Fresh stores they bring, with cloth of red repair'd:
 Yet from their lips no word we know could flow,
 Nor sign of India's strand their hands bestow.
 Fair blow the winds; again with sails unfrid
 We dare the main, and seek the eastern world. 580
 Now round black Africa's coast our navy veer'd,
 And to the world's mid circle northward steer'd:
 The southern pole low to the wave declined,
 We leave the isle of Holy Cross²² behind;
 That isle where erst a Lusitan, when he past
 The tempest-beaten Cape, his anchors cast,
 And own'd his proud ambition to explore
 The kingdoms of the morn could dare no more.
 From thence, still on, our daring course we bold
 Through trackless gulfs, whose billows never roll'd
 Around the vessel's pitohy sides before; 591
 Through trackless gulfs, whose mountain surge
 For many a night, when not a star appear'd, [set,
 Nor infant Moon's dim horns the darkness cheer'd;
 For many a dreary night and cheerless day,
 In calms now fetter'd, now the whirlwind's play,
 By ardent hope still fired, we forced our dreadful
 Now smooth as glass the shining waters lie, [way.
 No cloud slow-moving smil the azure sky;
 Slack from their height the sails unmoved decline,
 The airy streamers form the downward line. 601

other celebrated writer offers itself: Les Portugais naviguant sur l'Océan Atlantique, découvrirent le point le plus méridionale de l'Afrique; ils virent une vaste mer; elle les porta aux îles Orientales; leurs périls sur cette mer, et la découverte de Mozambique, de Melinde, et de Calicut, ont été chantés par le Camoëns, dont le poëme fait sentir quelque chose des charmes de l'Odyssée, et de la magnificence de l'Énéide. i. c.
 "The Portuguese sailing upon the Atlantic ocean discovered the most southern point of Africa: here they found an immense sea, which carried them to the East Indies. The dangers they encountered in the voyage, the discovery of Mozambique, of Melinda, and of Calicut, have been sung by Camoëns, whose poem unites the charms of the Odyssey with the magnificence of the Æneid." Montesquieu, Spirit of Laws, b. xxi. c. 21.

* A small island, named Santa Cruz by Bartholomew Diaz, who discovered it. According to Faria y Sousa, he went twenty-five leagues further, to the river del Infante, which, till passed by Gama, was the utmost extent of the Portuguese discoveries.

No gentle quarter owns the gentle gale,
Nor gentle swell distends the ready sail;
First as in ice the slumbering prows remain,
And silence wide extends her solemn reign.
Now to the waves the burbling clouds descend,
And heaven and sea in meeting tempests blend;
The black-wing'd whirlwinds o'er the ocean sweep,
And from his bottom roars the staggering deep.
Driven by the yelling blast's impetuous sway 610
Staggering we bound, yet onward bound away.
And now escaped the fury of the storm,
New danger threatens in a various form;
Though fresh the breeze the swelling canvass
swell'd,

A current's headlong sweep our prows withhold⁴⁷:
The rapid force impress on every keel,
Backward, o'erpower'd, our rolling vessels reel:
When from their southern caves the winds enraged
In horrid conflict with the waves engaged;
Beneath the tempest groans each loaded mast, 620
And o'er the rushing tide our bounding navy past.

"Now shined the sacred morn, when from the Three kings the holy cradled babe address, (east
And hail'd him Lord of Heaven: that festive day
We drop our anchors in an opening bay;
The river from the sacred day we name,
And stores, the wandering seaman's right, we claim.
Stores we received; our dearest hope in vain;
No word they utter'd could our ears retain;
Nought to reward our search for India's sound, 630
By word or sign our ardent wishes crown'd."

"Behold, O king, how many a shore we tried!
How many a fierce barbarian's rage defied!
Yet still in vain for India's shore we try,
The long-sought shores our anxious search defy.
Beneath new heavens, where not a star we knew,
Through changing climes, where poison'd air we drew;

Wandering new seas, in gulfs unknown, forlorn,
By labour weaken'd, and by famine worn;
Our food corrupted, pregnant with disease, 640
And pestilence on each expected breeze;
Not even a gleam of hope's delusive ray
To lead us onward through the devious way;
That kind delusion which full oft has cheer'd
The bravest minds, till glad success appear'd;
Worn as we were each night with dreary care,
Each day with danger that increased despair,—

⁴⁷ It was the force of this rushing current which retarded the further discoveries of Diaz. Gama got over it by the assistance of a tempest. It runs between Cape Corrientes, and the south-west of Madagascar. It is now easily avoided.

⁴⁸ The frequent disappointment of the Portuguese, when they expect to hear some account of India, is a judicious imitation of several parts of Virgil; who, in the same manner, magnifies the distresses of the Trojans in their search for the fated seat of empire:

O gens

Infelix! cui te exitio fortuna reservat?
Sceptra post Trojæ excidium jam vertitur æstas;
Cum freta, cum terras omnes, tot inhospita saxa
Sideraque emensæ ferimur; dum per mare magnum

Italiam sequimur fugientem, et volvimur undis.

Æt. v.

O monarch! judge what less than Lusian fire
Could still the hopeless score of fate inspire!
What less, O king, than Lusian faith withstand, 650
When dire despair and famine gave command
Their chief to murder, and with lawless power
Sweep Afric's seas, and every coast devour!
What more than men in wild despair still bold!
These more than men in there my band behold!⁴⁹
Sacred to death, by death alone subdued,
These all the rage of fierce despair withstood;
Firm to their faith, though fondest hope no more
Could give the promise of their native shore!

"Now the sweet waters of the stream we leave,
And the salt waves our gliding prows receive; 661
Here to the left, between the bending shores,
Torn by the winds the whirling billow roars,
And boiling raves against the sounding coast,
Whose mines of gold Sofala's merchants boast:
Full to the gulf the showery south-winds blow,
Aslant against the wind our vessels roll:
Far from the land, wide o'er the ocean driven,
Our helms resigning to the care of Heaven,
By hope and fear's keen passions tost, we roam, 670
When our glad eyes beheld the surges foam
Against the beacons of a cultured bay,
Where sloops and barges cut the watery way.
The river's opening breast some upward ply'd,
And some came gliding down the sweepy tide.
Quick throbs of transport heaved in every breast
To view the knowledge of the seaman's art;
For here we hoped our ardent wish to gain,
To hear of India's strand, nor hoped in vain.
Though Ethiopia's sable host they bore, 680
No look of wild surprise the natives wore:
Wide o'er their heads the cotton turban swell'd,
And cloth of blue the decent loins conceal'd.
Their speech, though rude and disjoint of sound,
Their speech a mixture of Arabian own'd.
Ferreando, skill'd in all the copious store
Of fair Arabia's speech and flowery lore,
In joyful converse heard the pleasing tale.
That o'er these seas full oft the frequent sail,
And lordly vessels, tall as ours, appear'd, 690
Which to the regions of the morning steer'd,
And back returning to the southern land,
Convey'd the treasures of the Indian strand;
Whose cheerful crews, resembling ours, display
The kindred face and colour of the day⁵⁰.

⁴⁹ It had been extremely impolitic in Gama to mention the mutiny of his followers to the king of Melinda. The boast of their loyalty besides, has a good effect in the poem, as it elevates the heroes, and gives uniformity to the character of bravery, which the dignity of the epopeia required to be ascribed to them. History relates the matter differently. "In standing for the Cape of Good Hope, Gama gave the highest proofs of his resolution, In illo autem cursu validè Gama virtus enituit. The fleet seemed now tossed to the clouds, ut modo nubes coactegere, and now sunk to the lowest whirlpools of the abyss. The winds were insufferably cold, and to the rage of the tempest was added the horror of an almost continual darkness. The crew expected every moment to be swallowed up in the deep. At every interval of the storm, they came round Gama asserting the impossibility to proceed further, and imploring to return. But this he resolutely refused. See the preface.

⁵⁰ Gama and his followers were at several ports,

Blaze with joy we raise the glad acclaim,
And, River of Good Signs²¹, the port we name:
Then, sacred to the angel guide, who led
The young Töbiash to the spousal bed,
And safe return'd him through the perilous way,
We rear a column on the friendly bay.⁷⁰⁰

"Our keels, that now had steer'd through many a clime,

By shell-fish roughen'd, and incas'd with slime,
Joyful we clean, while bleating from the field
The fleecy dams the smiling natives yield:
But while each face an honest welcome shows,
And big with sprightly hope each bosom glows,
(Alas! how vain the bloom of human joy!
How soon the blasts of woe that bloom destroy!)
A dread disease its rankling horrors shed,⁷¹⁰
And death's dire ravage through mine army spread.
Never mine eyes such dreary sight beheld,
Ghastly the mouth and gums enormous swell'd²²;
And instant, putrid like a dead man's wound,
Poison'd with fetid streams the air around:
No sage physician's ever-watchful soul,
No skilful surgeon's gentle hand to heal,
Were found: each dreary mournful hour we gave
Some brave companion to a foreign grave:

A grave, the awful gift of every shore!⁷²⁰
Alas! what weary toils with us they bore!
Long, long endear'd by fellowship in woe,
O'er their cold dust we give the tears to flow;
And in their hapless lot forbode our own,
A foreign burial, and a grave unknown.

"Now deeply yearning o'er our deathful fate,
With joyful hope of India's shore elate,
We loose the hawsers and the sail expand,
And upward coast the Ethiopian strand,
What danger threaten'd at Quiloa's isle,⁷³⁰
Mozambique's treason, and Mornhassan's guile;
What miracles kind Heaven, our guardian wrought,
Loud Fame already to thine ear has brought:
Kind Heaven again that guardian care display'd,
And to thy port our weary fleet convey'd,
Where thou, O king, Heaven's regent power below,
Bidst thy full beauty and thy truth to flow:
Health to the sick, and to the weary rest,
And sprightly hope revived in every breast,
Proclaim thy gifts, with grateful joy repaid,⁷⁴⁰
The brave man's tribute for the brave man's aid.
And now in honour of thy fond command,
The glorious annals of my native land;
And what the perils of a route so bold,
So dread as ours, my faithful lips have told.
These judge, great monarch, if the world before
Ere saw the prow such length of seas explore!

so their first arrival in the East, thought to be Moors. See note, 35, book I.

²¹ Rio dos bons sinais.

²² It was the custom of the Portuguese navigators to erect crosses on the shores of the new-discovered countries. Gama carried materials for pillars of stone along with him, and erected six of these crosses during his expedition. They bore the name and arms of the king of Portugal, and were intended as proofs of the title which accrues from the first discovery.

²³ This poetical description of the scurvy is by no means exaggerated above what sometimes really happens in the course of a long voyage, and in an unhealthy climate, to which the constitution is unaccustomed.

Nor sage Ulysses, nor the Trojan pride,
Such raging gulfs, such whirling storms defied;
Nor one poor tooth of my dread course explored,
Though by the Muse as demigods adored.⁷⁵¹

"O thou whose breast all Helicon inflamed,
Whose birth seven rearing cities proudly claim'd;
And thou whose mellow lute and rural song,
In softest son, led Mincio's waves along
Whose warlike numbers as a storm impell'd,
And Tiber's surges o'er his borders swell'd;
Let all Parnassus lend creative fire,
And all the Nias with all their warmth inspire;
Your demigods conduct through every scene⁷⁶⁰
Cold fear can paint, or wildest fancy feign;
The Syren's guttural lay, dice Circe's spell,
And all the horrors of the Cyclops' cell;
Bid Scylla's barking waves their mazes o'erwhelm,
And Auri the guardian pilot from the helm²⁴;
Give sails and oars to fly the purple shore,
Where love of absent friend awakes no more²⁵;
In all their charms display Calypso's smiles,
Her flowery arbores and her amorous wiles;
In skins confined the blustering winds control²⁶,
Or o'er the feast bid leathern harpies prove^{27, 771}

²⁴ See Æn. v. 833.

²⁵ The Lotophagi, so named from the plant lettuce, are thus described by Homer:

Not prone to ill, nor strange to foreign guest,
They eat, they drink, and Nature gives the feast;
The trees around them all their fruit produce;
Lotos the name; divine, nectarous juice;
(Thence called Lotophagi) which whose tastes,
Instigate riots in the sweet reports,
Nor other home nor other care intends,
But quite his house, his country, and his friends:
The three we sent, from off th' embarking ground
We dragg'd reluctant, and by force we bound:
The rest in haste forsook the pressing shore,
Or, the charm tasted, had return'd no more.

Pope, Odys. ix.

The natural history of the lotos, however, is very different. There are various kinds of it. The Libyan lotos is a shrub like a bramble, the berries like the myrtle, but purple when ripe, and about the bigness of an olive. Mixed with bread-corn it was used as food for slaves. They also made an agreeable wine of it, but which would not keep above ten days. See Pope's note in loco.

²⁶ The gift of Æolus to Ulysses.

The adverse winds in leathern bags he brac'd,
Compress'd their force, and lock'd each struggling blast:

For him the mighty sire of gods assign'd,
The tempest's lord, the tyrant of the wind;
His word alone the list'ning storms obey,
To smoothe the deep, or swell the foamy sea.
These in my hollow ship the monarch hung,
Securely fetter'd by a silver thong;
But Zephyrus exempt, with friendly gates
He charg'd to fill, and guide the swelling sails:
Rare gift! but oh, what gift to fools avail.

Pope, Odys. x.

The companions of Ulysses imagined that these bags contained some valuable treasure, and opened them while their leader slept. The tempests meeting out drove the fleet from Rhæce, which was then in sight, and was the cause of a new train of miseries.

²⁷ See the third Æneid.

And lead your bones through the dread shades
Of tortured spectres and infernal gods;⁸
Give every flower that decks Aeneas' hill.
To grace your fables with divinest skill;
Beneath the woodens of my tale fall, [all.]
Where truth all unador'd and pure exerts them

While thus illustrious Gama charm'd their ears,
The look of wonder each Melindian wears,
And pleas'd attention witness'd the command 780
Of every movement of his lips or hand.

The king enraptur'd own'd the glorious fame
Of Lisboa's monarchs, and the Lusian name;
What warlike rage the victor-kings inspired,
Nor less their warriors' loyal faith admired.
Nor less his martial train, in wonder lost,
Repeat the gallant deeds that please them most,
Each to his mate; while sat in fond amaze
The Lusian features every eye surveys;
While present to the view, by fancy brought, 790
Arise the wonders by the Lusians wrought;
And each bold feat to their wondering sight
Displays the captured ardour of the fight.

Apollo now withdrew the cheerful day,
And left the western sky to twilight gray;
Beneath the wave he sought fair Thetis' bed,
And to the shore Melinda's sovereign sped.

What boundless joys are thine, O just renown,
Thou hope of virtue, and her noblest crown;
By thee the seeds of conscious worth are sown, 800
Hero by hero, fame by fame inspired:
Without thine aid how soon the hero dies!
By thee upborne his name ascends the skies.
This Agurion knew, and own'd his Homer's lyre
The noblest glory of Pelides' sire.
This knew Augustus, and from Mantua's shade
To courtly ease the Roman bard convey'd;
And soon exulting flow'd the song divine,
The noblest glory of the Roman line.

Dear was the Muse to Julius: dear dear 810
To Scipio, though the ponderous conquering spear
Roughen'd his hand, th' immortal pen he knew,
And to the tented field the gentle Muses drew.
Each glorious chief of Greek or Latin line,
Or barbarous race, ador'd th' Aonian shrine;⁹
Each glorious name, e'er to the Muse endear'd,
Or woo'd the Muses, or the Muse revered.

Alas, on Tago's happy shores alone
The Muse is slighted, and her charms unknown;¹⁰
For this, no Virgil here attunes the lyre, 820
No Homer here awakes the hero's fire.
On Tago's shores are Scipios, Cæsars born,
And Alexanders Lisboa's clime adorn:
But Heaven has stamp'd them in a rougher mould,
Nor gave the polish to their genuine gold.

⁸ See the sixth Æneid, and the eleventh Odyssey.

⁹ We have already observed that Camoëns was not misled by the common declamations against the Gothic conquerors. "Theodoric the second king of the Ostrogoths, a pious and humane prince, restored in some degree the study of letters. . . . He adopted into his service Boethius, the most learned and almost only Latin philosopher of that period. Cassiodorus, another eminent Roman scholar, was his grand secretary. . . . Theodoric's patronage of learning is applauded by Claudian, &c. Many other Gothic kings were equally attached to the works of peace." Warton, Hist. Eng. Poetry.

vol. XII.

Careless and rude or to be known or know,
In vain to them the sweetest numbers flow;
Unheard, in vain their native post sings,
And cold neglect weighs down the Muse's wings.
E'en he whose veins the blood of Gama warms¹¹ 830
Walks by, unconscious of the Muse's charms:
For him no Muse shall leave her golden loom,
No palm shall blossom, and no wreath shall bloom;
Yet shall my labours and my cares be paid
By fame immortal, and by Gama's shade¹²!

¹⁰ Don Fran. de Gama, grandson of the hero of the Lusiad. For his insignificant and worthless character, see the life of Camoëns.

¹¹ Aristotle has pronounced, that the works of Homer contain the perfect model of the epic poem. Homer never gives us any digressive declamation spoken in the person of the poet, or interruptive of the thread of his narrative. For this reason Milton's beautiful complaint of his blindness has been censured as a violation of the rules of the epopeia. But it may be presumed there is an appeal beyond the writings of Homer, an appeal to the reason of these rules. When Homer laid the plan of his works, he felt that to write a poem like a history, whose parts had no necessary dependence and connexion with each other, must be uninteresting and tiresome to the reader of real genius. The unity of one action adorned with proper collateral episodes therefore presented itself in its progressive dependencies of beginning, middle, and end; or, in other words, a description of certain circumstances, the actions which these produce, and the catastrophe. This unity of conduct, as most interesting, is indispensably necessary to the epic poem. But it does not follow, that a declamation in the person of the poet, at the beginning or end of a book, is properly a breach of the unity of the conduct of the action; the omission therefore of such declamations by Homer, as not founded on the nature of the epic poem, is no argument against the use of them. If this however will not be allowed by the critic, let the critic remember, that Homer has many digressive histories, which have no dependence on, or connexion with, the action of the poem. If the declamation of Camoëns in praise of poetry must be condemned, what defence can be offered for the long story of Maron's wine in the ninth Odyssey, to which even the numbers of a Pope could give no dignity! Yet however a Bossu or a Rapin may condemn the digressive exclamations of Camoëns, the reader of taste, who judges from what he feels, would certainly be unwilling to have them expunged. The declamation with which he concludes the Seventh Lusiad must please, must touch every breast. The feelings of a great spirit in the evening of an active and military life, sinking under the pressure of neglect and dependence, yet the complaint expressed with the most manly resentment, cannot fail to interest the generous, and, if adorned with the dress of poetry, to plead an excuse for its admission with the man of taste. The declamation which concludes the present book has also some arguments to offer in its defence. As the fleet of Gama has now safely conquered many difficulties, and are promised a pilot to conduct them to India, it is a proper contrast to the murmurs of the populace, expressed

Him shall the song on every shore proclaim,
The first of heroes, first of naval fame,
Rude and ungrateful though my country be,
This proud example shall be taught by me,
* Where'er the hero's worth demands the skies, 830
To crown that worth some generous bard shall rise !¹

LUSIAD VI.

With heart sincere the royal Pagan Joy'd,
And hospitable rites each hour employ'd ;
For much the king the Lusian band admired,
And much their friendship and their aid desired ;
Each hour the gay festivity prolongs,
Melindian dances, and Arabian songs ;
Each hour in mirthful transport steals away,
By night the banquet, and the chase by day :
And now the bosom of the deep invites,
And all the pride of Neptune's festive rites ; 10
Their silken banners waving o'er the tide,
A jovial band, the painted galleys ride ;
The net and angle various hands employ,
And Moorish timbrels sound the notes of joy.
Such was the pomp², when Egypt's beauteous
Bade all the pride of naval show convene, [queen
In pleasure's downy bosom to beguile
Her love-sick warrior : o'er the breast of Nile
Dazzling with gold the purple ensigns show'd,
And to the lute the gilded barges row'd, 20
While from the wave, of many a shining hue,
The anglers' lines the panting fishes drew.

Now from the west the sounding breezes blow,
And far the hoary flood was yet to plough,
The fountain and the field bestow'd their store,
And friendly pilots from the friendly shore,
Train'd in the Indian deep, were now aboard,
When Gama, parting from Melinda's lord,
The holy vows of lasting peace renew'd,
For still the king for lasting friendship sued ; 30
That Lusian heroes in his port supplied,
And tasted rest, he own'd his dearest pride ;
And vow'd that ever while the seas they roam,
The Lusian fleets should find a hounteous home ;
And ever from the generous shore receive
What'er his port, what'er his land could give³.

ed by the old man, at the end of the fourth Lusiad, and is by no means an improper conclusion to the episode which so highly extols the military fame of the Lusian warriors.

¹ Every display of eastern luxury and magnificence was lavished in the fishing parties on the Nile, with which Cleopatra amused Mark Antony, when at any time he showed symptoms of uneasiness, or seemed inclined to abandon the effeminate life which he led with his mistress. At one of these parties, Mark Antony having procured divers to put fishes upon his hooks while under the water, he very gallantly boasted to his mistress of his great dexterity in angling. Cleopatra perceived his art, and as gallantly outwitted him. Some other divers received her orders, and in a little while Mark Antony's line brought up a fried fish in place of a live one, to the vast entertainment of the queen and all the convivial company.—Octavius was at this time on his march to decide who should be master of the world.

² The friendship of the Portuguese and Melindians was of long continuance. See the preface.

Nor less his joy the grateful chief declared,
And now to seize the valued hours prepared.
Full to the wind the swelling sails he gave,
And his red prow divide the foamy wave : 40
Full to the rising Sun the pilot steers,
And far from shore through middle ocean bears.
The, vaulted-sky now widens o'er their heads,
Where first the infant morn his radiance sheds,
And now with transport sparkling in his eyes
Keen to behold the Indian mountains rise,
High on the decks each Lusian hero smiles,
And proudly in his thoughts reviews his toils.
When the stern demon, burning with disdain,
Beheld the fleet triumphant plough the main : 50
The powers of Heaven, and Heaven's dread Lord
Resolved in Lisbon glorious to renew [the knees,
The Roman honours—raging with despair
From high Olympus' brow he cleaves the air,
On Earth new hopes of vengeance to devise,
And sue that aid denied him in the skies :
Blaspheming Heaven, he pierced the dread abode
Of ocean's lord, and sought the ocean's god.
Deep where the bases of the hills extend,
And Earth's huge ribs of rock enormous bend, 60
Where roaring through the caverns roll the waves
Responsive as the ærial tempest raves,
The ocean's monarch, by the Nereid train
And watery gods encircled, holds his reign.
Wide o'er the deep, which line could ne'er explore,
Shining with hoary sands of silver ore,
Extends the level, where the palace rears
Its crystal towers, and emulates the spheres ;
So starry bright the lofty turrets blaze,
And vie in lustre with the diamond's rays. 70
Adorn'd with pillars and with roofs of gold,
The golden gates their massy leaves unfold :
Inwrought with pearl the lordly pillars shine ;
The sculptured walls confess a hand divine.
Here various colours in confusion lost,
Old Chaos' face and troubled image boast.
Here rising from the mass, distinct and clear,
Apart the four first elements appear.
High o'er the rest ascends the blaze of fire,
Nor fed by matter did the rays aspire, 80
But glow'd ethereal, as the living flame, [frame
Which, stolen from Heaven, injured the vital
Next, all-embracing air was spread around,
Thin as the light, incapable of wound ;
The subtle power the burning south pervades,
And penetrates the depth of polar shades.
Here mother Earth, with mountains crown'd, is seen,
Her trees in blossom, and her lawns in green ;
The lowing herds adorn the clover vales ; 90
The fleecy dams bespread the sloping dales ;
Here land from land the silver streams divide ;
The sportive fishes, through the crystal tide,
Bedropt with gold their shining sides display :
And here old Ocean rolls his billows gray ;
Beneath the Moon's pale orb his current flows,
And round the Earth his giant arms he throws.
Another scene display'd the dread alarms
Of war in Heaven, and mighty Jove in arms :
Here Titan's race their swelling nerves distend
Like knotted oaks, and from their bases rend 100
And tower the mountains to the thundering sky,
While round their heads the forked lightnings dy :
Beneath huge Ætna vanquish'd Typhon lies,
And vomits smoke and fire against the dark'd
skies.

Here seems the pictured wall possest of life;
Two gods contending in the noble strife,
The choicest boon to human kind to give,
Their toils to lighten, or their wants relieve:
While Pallas here appears to wave her hand,⁴
The peaceful olive's silver boughs expand: 110
Here, while the ocean's god indignant frown'd,
And raised his trident from the wounded ground,
As yet intangled in the earth appears
The warrior horse, his ample chest he rears,
His wide red nostrils smoke, his eye-balls glare,
And his fore hoofs, high pawing, smite the air.

Though wide and various o'er the sculptured stone⁵

The feats of gods and god-like heroes shone,
On speed the vengeful demon views no more:
Forward he rushes through the golden door, 120
Where ocean's king, enclosed with nymphs divine,
In regal state receives the king of wine:
"O Neptune!" instant as he came, he cries,
"Here let my presence wake no cold surprise,
A friend I come, your friendship to implore
Against the Fates unjust, and Fortune's power;
Beneath whose shafts the great celestials bow:
Yet ere I more, if more you wish to know,
The watery gods in awful senate call,
For all should hear the wrong that touches all." 130

³ According to fable, Neptune and Minerva disputed the honour of giving a name to the city of Athens. They agreed to determine the contest by a display of their wisdom and power, in conferring the most beneficial gift on mankind. Neptune struck the earth with his trident and produced the horse, whose bounding motions are emblematical of the agitation of the sea. Minerva commanded the olive-tree, the symbol of peace and riches, to spring forth. The victory was adjudged to the goddess, from whom the city was named Athens. As the Egyptians and Mexicans wrote their history in hieroglyphics, the taste of the ancient Grecians clothed almost every occurrence in mythological allegory. The founders of Athens, it is most probable, disputed whether their new city should be named from the fertility of the soil or from the marine situation of Attica. The former opinion prevailed, and the town received its name in honour of the goddess of the olive-tree.

⁴ As Neptune struck the earth with his trident. Minerva, says the fable, struck the earth with her lance. That she waved her hand while the olive-boughs spread, is a fine poetical attitude, and varies the picture from that of Neptune, which follows it.

⁵ The description of palaces is a favourite topic several times touched upon by the two great masters of epic poetry, in which they have been happily imitated by their three greatest disciples among the moderns, Camoëns, Tasso, and Milton. The description of the palace of Neptune has great merit. Nothing can be more in place than the picture of chaos and the four elements. The war of the gods, and the contest of Neptune and Minerva are touched with the true boldness of poetical colouring. But perhaps it deserves censure thus to point out, what every reader of taste must perceive. To show to the mere English reader that the Portuguese poet is, in his manner, truly classical, is the intention of many of these notes.

Neptune alarm'd, with instant speed commands
From every shore to call the watery bands:
Triton, who boasts his high Neptunean race,
Sprung from the god by Salacé's embrace,
Attendant on his sire the trumpet sounds,
Or through the yielding waves, his herald, bounds:
Huge is his bulk deform'd, and dark his hue;
His bushy beard and hairs that never knew
The smoothing comb, of sea weed rank and long,
Around his breast and shoulders dangling hung, 140
And on the matted locks black muscles clung;
A shell of purple on his head he bore,⁶
Around his loins no tangling garb he wore,
But all was cover'd with the slimy brood,
The snail offspring of the unctuous flood.
And now obedient to his dreadful sire,
High o'er the wave his brown arms aspire;
To his black mouth his crooked shell applied,
The blast rebellous o'er the ocean wide:
Wide o'er their shores, where'er their waters flow, 150
The watery powers the awful summons know;
And instant darting to the palace hall,
Attend the founder of the Dardan wall 7.

⁶ In the Portuguese,

Na cabeça por gorra tinha posta,
Huma mui grande casca de lagosta.

Thus rendered by Fanshaw,

He had (for a monster's*) on his crown
The shell of a red lobster overgrown.

The description of Triton, who, as Fanshaw says,

Was a great nasty clown—

is in the style of the classics. His parentage is differently related. Hesiod makes him the son of Neptune and Amphitrite. By Triton, in the physical sense of the fable, is meant the noise, and by Salacé, the mother by some ascribed to him, the salt of the ocean. The origin of the fable of Triton, it is probable, was founded on the appearance of a sea animal, which, according to some ancient and modern naturalists, in the upward parts resembles the human figure. Pausanias relates a wonderful story of a monstrously large one, which often came ashore on the meadows of Bœotia. Over his head was a kind of finny cartilage, which, at a distance, appeared like hair, the body covered with brown scales, and nose and ears like the human; the mouth of a dreadful width, jagged with teeth like those of a panther; the eyes of a greenish hue; the hands divided into fingers, the nails of which were crooked, and of a shelly substance. This monster, whose extremities ended in a tail like a dolphin's, devoured both men and beasts as they chanced in his way. The citizens of Tanagra, at last, contrived his destruction. They set a large vessel full of wine on the sea shore. Triton got drunk with it, and fell into a profound sleep, in which condition the Tanagrarians beheaded him, and afterwards, with great propriety, hung up his body in the temple of Bacchus; where, says Pausanias, it continued a long time.

⁷ Neptune.

* Mascara, the Spanish word for a huntsman's cap.

Old father Ocean, with his numerous race
 Of daughters and of sons, was first in place.
 Nereus and Doris, from whose nuptials sprung
 The lovely Nereid train for ever young,
 Who people every sea on every strand,
 Appear'd, attended with their filial band;
 And changeful Proteus, whose prophetic mind⁸
 The secret cause of Bacchus' rage divin'd, 161
 Attending, left the flocks, his scaly charge,
 To graze the bitter weedy foam at large.
 In charms of power the raging waves to tame,
 The lovely spouse of ocean's sovereign came;
 From Heaven and Vesta sprung the birth divine,
 Her snowy limbs bright through the vestments shine.

Here with the dolphin, who persuasive led¹⁰
 Her modest steps to Neptune's spousal bed,
 Fair Amphitrité moved, more sweet, more gay, 170
 Than vernal fragrance and the flowers of May;
 Together with her sister spouse she came,
 The same their wedded lord, their love the same;
 The same the brightness of their sparkling eyes,
 Bright as the Sun and azure as the skies.
 She who the rage of Athamas to shun¹¹
 Plunged in the billows with her infant son;
 A goddess now, a god the smiling boy,
 Together sped: and Glaucus lost to joy¹²,
 Curt in his love by vegeful Circe's hate, 180
 Attending wept his Scylla's hapless fate.

⁸ The fullest and best account of the fable of Proteus is in the fourth Odyssey.

⁹ Thetis.

¹⁰ Castara has a most curious note on this passage. "Neptune," says he, "is the vivifying spirit, and Amphitrité the humidity of the sea, which the dolphin, the divine intelligence, unites for the generation and nourishment of fishes. Who," says he, "cannot but be struck with admiration to find how consonant this is to the sacred Scripture; Spiritus Domini fertur super aquas; The spirit of God moved upon the face of the water."

¹² A fisherman, says the fable, who, on eating a certain herb, was turned into a sea god. Circe was enamoured of him, and, in revenge of her slighted love, poisoned the fountain where his mistress usually bathed. By the force of the enchantment the favoured Scylla was changed into a hideous monster, whose loins were surrounded with the ever-barking heads of dogs and wolves. Scylla, on this, threw herself into the sea, and was metamorphosed into the rock which bears her name. The rock Scylla at a distance appears like the statue of a woman: the furious dashing of the waves in the cavities which are level with the water, resembles the barking of wolves and dogs. Hence the fable.

And now assembled in the hall divine,
 The ocean gods in solemn council join;
 The goddesses on pearl embroidery sate,
 The gods on sparkling crystal chairs of state;
 And proudly honour'd on the regal throne,
 Beside the ocean's lord, Thyoneus shone¹³.
 High from the roof the living amber glows¹⁴,
 High from the roof the stream of glory flows,
 And richer fragrance far around exhales 190
 Than that which breathes on fair Arabia's gales.

Attention now in listening silence waits:—
 The power, whose bosom rag'd against the Fates,
 Rising, casts round his vegeful eyes, while rage
 Spread o'er his brows the wrinkled seams of age:
 "O thou," he cries, "whose birthright sovereign
 From pole to pole the raging waves obey; [sway
 Of human race 't is thine to fix the bounds,
 And fence the nations with thy watery bounds:
 And thou, dread power, O father Ocean, hear! 200
 Thou, whose wide arms embrace the world's wide
 'T is thine the haughtiest victor to restrain, [sphere;
 And bind each nation in its own domain:
 And you, ye gods! to whom the seas are given,
 Your just petition with the gods of Heaven;
 You who of old unpunish'd never bore
 The daring trespass of a foreign or;
 You who beheld, when Earth's dread offspring strove
 To scale the vaulted sky, the seat of Jove,
 Indignant Jove deep to the nether world 210
 The rebel band in blazing thunders hurld.
 Alas! the great monition lost on you.
 Suppose you slumber, while a roving crew,
 With impious search, explore the watery way,
 And unresisted through your empire stray,
 To seize the sacred treasures of the main;
 Their fearless prowls your ancient laws disdain:
 Where far from mortal sight his hoary head
 Old Ocean hides, their daring sails they spread;
 And their glad shouts are echoed where the roar 220
 Of mounting billows only howl'd before.
 In wonder, silent, ready Boreas sees
 Your passive languor and neglectful ease;
 Ready with force auxiliar to restrain
 The bold intruders on your awful reign;
 Prepared to burst his tempests, as of old,
 When his black whirlwinds o'er the ocean roll'd,
 And rent the Mynian sails, whose impious pride 4
 First braved their fury, and your power defied.
 Nor deem that, fraudulent, I my hope demy; 230
 My darken'd glory sped me from the sky.
 How high my honours on the Indian shore!
 How soon these honours must avail no more!
 Unless these rovers, who with doubled shame
 To stain my conquests, bear my vassal's name¹⁵,
 Unless they perish on the billow way—
 Then rouse, ye gods, and vindicate your sway.
 The powers of Heaven in vengeful anguish see
 The tyrant of the skies, and Fate's decree;

¹³ Thyoneus, a name of Bacchus.

¹⁴ ——— From the arched roof,
 Pendent by subtle magic, many a row
 Of starry lamps, and blazing cressets, fed
 With naphtha and asphaltus, yielded light
 As from a sky. Milton.

¹⁵ The sails of the Argonauts, inhabitants of Mysia.

¹⁶ See the first note on the First Book of the Lucretius.

The dread decree, that to the Lusian train
 Consigns, betrays your empire of the main:
 Say, Shall your wrong alarm the high abodes?
 Are men exalted to the rank of gods,
 O'er you exalted, while in careless ease
 You yield the wrested trident of the seas;
 Usurp'd your monarchy, your honours stain'd,
 Your birthright ravish'd, and your waves profan'd!
 Alike the daring wrong to me, to you,
 And shall my lips in vain your vengeance sue!
 This, this to sue from high Olympus bore—" 250
 More he attempts, but rage permits no more.
 Pierce bursting wrath the watery gods inspires,
 And their red eye-balls burn with livid fires:
 Heaving and panting struggles every breast,
 With the fierce billows of hot ire oppress.
 Twice from his seat divining Proteus rose,
 And twice he shook enraged his sedge brows:
 In vain; the mandate was already given,
 From Neptune sent, to loose the winds of Heaven:
 In vain; though prophecy his lips inspired, 260
 The ocean's queen his silent lips required.
 Nor less the storm of headlong rage denies,
 Our council to debate, or thought to rise.
 And now the god of tempests swift unbinds
 From their dark caves the various rushing winds:
 High o'er the storm the power impetuous rides,
 His howling voice the roaring tempest guides;
 Right to the dauntless fleet their rage he pours,
 And first their headlong outrage tears the shores;
 A deeper night involves the darken'd air, 270
 And livid flashes through the mountains glare:
 Up-rooted oaks, with all their leafy pride, [side;
 Roll thundering down the greening mountain's
 And men and herds in clamorous uproar run,
 The rocking towers and crashing woods to shun.
 While thus the council of the watery state,
 Enraged, decree the Lusian heroes' fate,
 The weary fleet before the gentle gale
 With joyful hope display'd the steady sail;
 Through the smooth deep they plough'd the lengthening way; 280
 Beneath the wave the purple ear of day
 To sable night the eastern sky resign'd,
 And o'er the decks cold breathed the midnight wind.
 All but the watch in warm pavilions slept;
 The second watch the wonted vigils kept;
 Supine their limbs, the mast supports the head,
 And the broad yard-sail o'er their shoulders spread
 A grateful cover from the chilly gale,
 And sleep's soft dews their heavy eyes assail.
 Languid against the languid power they strive, 290
 And sweet discourse preserves their thoughts alive.
 When Leonardo, whose enamour'd thought
 In every dream the plighted fair—one sought—
 The dews of sleep what better to remove
 Than the soft, woeful, pleasing tales of love?
 "Ill-timed, alas," the brave Veloso cries,
 "The tales of love, that melt the heart and eyes.
 The dear enchantments of the fair I know,
 The fearful transport and the rapturous woe:
 But with our state ill suits the grief or joy; 300
 Let war, let gallant war our thoughts employ:
 With dangers threaten'd, let the tale inspire
 The scorn of danger, and the hero's fire."
 His mates with joy the brave Veloso hear,
 And on the youth the speaker's toil confer.
 The brave Veloso takes the word with joy,
 "And trath," he cries, "shall these slow hours decoy.

The warlike tale adorns our nation's fame;
 The twelve of England give the nobles theme."
 "When Pedro's gallant heir, the valient
 John, 310
 Gave war's full splendour to the Lusian throne,
 In haughty England, where the winter spreads
 His snowy mantle o'er the shining meads"¹⁷,
 The seeds of strife the fierce Erinnyes sows;
 The baleful strife from court dissension rose,
 With every charm adorn'd, and every grace,
 That spreads its magic o'er the female face,
 Twelve ladies shined the courtly train among,
 The first, the fairest of the courtly throng:
 But envy's breath reviled their injured name, 320
 And stain'd the honour of their virgin fame,
 Twelve youthful barons own'd the foul report,
 The charge at first, perhaps, a tale of sport.
 Ah, base the sport that lightly dares defame
 The sacred honour of a lady's name!
 What sleighthood asks the proud accusers yield"¹⁸,
 And dare the damsels' champions to the field.

¹⁷ In the original,

La na grande Inglaterra, que de neve
 Boreal sempre abunda —

that is, "In illustrious England, always covered with northern snow." Though the translator was willing to retain the manner of Homer, he thought it proper to correct the error in natural history fallen into by Camoëns. Fanshew seems to have been sensible of the mistake of his author, and has given the following, unaccounted for by the Portuguese, in place of the eternal snow ascribed to his country:

In merry England, which (from cliffs that stand
 Like hills of snow) once Alblon's name did give.

¹⁸ The translator, either by his own researches, or by his application to some gentlemen who were most likely to inform him, has not been able to discover the slightest vestige of this chivalrous adventure in any memoirs of the English history.
 It is probable, nevertheless, that however adorned with romantic ornament, it is not entirely without foundation in truth. Castern, who unhappily does not cite his authority, gives the names of the twelve Portuguese champions; Alvaro Vas d'Almada, afterwards count d'Avranche in Normandy;
 another Alvaro d'Almada, surnamed the Juster,
 from his dexterity at that warlike exercise; Lopez
 Fernando Pacheco; Pedro Hodges d'Acosta;
 Juan Augustin Pereyra; Luis Gonzalez de Malafay; the two brothers Alvaro and Rodrigo Mendez de Cerveyra; Ray Gomez de Sylva; Suneyro d'Acosta, who gave his name to the river Acosta in Africa; Martin Lopez d'Azevedo; and Alvaro Gonzalez de Couigno, surnamed Magricio. The names of the English champions and of the ladies, he confesses, are unknown, nor does history positively explain the injury of which the dames complained. It must however, he adds, have been such as required the atonement of blood;—il falloit qu'elle fût sanglante;—since two sovereigns allowed to determine it by the sword. "Some critics," says Castern, "may perhaps condemn this episode of Camoëns; but for my part," he continues, "I think the adventure of Olindo and So-phronia, in Tasso, is much more to be blamed.

' There let the cause, as honour will, be tried,
 And let the lance and ruthless sword decide.'
 The lovely dames implore the courtly train, 330
 With tears implore them, but implore in vain:
 So famed, so dreaded tower'd each boastful knight,
 The damsels' lovers shunn'd the proffer'd fight.
 Of arm unable to repel the strong,
 The heart's each feeling conscious of the wrong,
 When robb'd of all the female breast holds dear,
 Ah Heaven, how bitter flows the female tear!
 To Lancaster's bold duke the damsels sue;
 Adown their cheeks, now paler than the hue
 Of snowdrops trembling to the chilly gale, 340
 The slow-paced crystal tears their wrongs bewail.
 When down the beautiful face the dew-drop flows,
 What manly bosom can its force oppose!
 His hoary curls th' indignant hero shakes,
 And all his youthful rage restored awakes:
 ' Though loth,' he cries, ' to plunge my bold
 In civil discord, yet appease your tears: [compens

 Had mark'd how bold the Lusian heroes shone, 350

The episode of the Italian poet is totally exuberant, il cartout-à-fait postiche,—whereas that of the Portuguese has a direct relation to his proposed subject; the wars of his country, a vast field, in which he has admirably succeeded, without prejudice to the first rule of the epopeia, the unity of the action." To this may be added the suffrage of Voltaire, who acknowledges that Camoens artfully interweaves the history of Portugal. And the severest critic must allow that the episode related by Veloso is happily introduced. To one who has ever been at sea, the scene must be particularly pleasing. The fleet is under sail, they plough the smooth deep,

And o'er the decks cold breathed the midnight wind.
 All but the second watch are asleep in their warm pavilions; the second watch sit by the mast, sheltered from the chilly gale by a broad sail-cloth; sleep begins to overpower them, and they tell stories to entertain one another. For beautiful picturesque simplicity there is no sea-scene equal to this in the Odyssey or Aeneid. And even the prejudice of a Scaliger must have confessed, that the romantic chivalrous narrative of Veloso,

What dangers threaten'd, let the tale inspire
 The scorn of danger, and the hero's fire—

is better adapted to the circumstances of the speaker and his audience, than almost any of the long histories, which on all occasions, and sometimes in the heat of battle, the heroes of the Iliad relate to each other. Pope has been already cited, as giving his sanction to the fine effect of variety in the epic poem. The present instance, which has a peculiar advantage, in agreeably suspending the mind of the reader after the storm is raised by the machinations of Paccus, may be cited as a confirmation of the opinion of that judicious poet.

¹⁹ John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, claimed the crown of Castile in the right of his wife, donna Constantin, daughter of don Pedro, the late king. Assisted by his son-in-law, John I. of Portugal, he

How matchless pour'd the tempest of their might,
 When thundering at his side they ruled the fight:
 Nor less their ardent passion for the fair, [care,
 Generous and brave, he view'd with wondering
 When crown'd with roses to the nuptial bed
 The warlike John his lovely daughter led—
 ' From Lusitania's clime,' the hero cries,
 ' The gallant champions of your fame shall rise:
 Their hearts will burn, for well their hearts I
 know, 360

To pour your vengeance on the guilty foe.
 Let courtly phrase the heroes' worth admire,
 And for your injured names that worth require:
 Let all the soft endearments of the fair,
 And words that weep your wrongs, your wrongs declare.

Myself the heralds to the chiefs will send,
 And to the king, my valiant son, commend.'
 He spoke; and twelve of Lusian race he names.
 All noble youths, the champions of the dames.
 The dames by lot their gallant champions choose²⁰,
 And each her hero's name exulting views. 371
 Each in a various letter hails her chief,
 And earnest for his aid relates her grief:
 Each to the king her courtly homage sends,
 And valiant Lancaster their cause commends.
 Soon as to Tagus' shores the heralds came,
 Swift through the palace pours the sprightly flame
 Of high-soul'd chivalry; the monarch glows
 First on the listed field to dare the foe;
 But regal state withheld. Alike their fires, 380
 Each courtly noble to the toil aspires:
 High on his helm, the envy of his peers,
 Each chosen knight the plume of combat wears.
 In that proud port half-circled by the wave²¹,
 Which Portugallia to the nation gave,
 A deathless name, a speedy sloop receives
 The sculptured bucklers, and the clashing greaves,
 The swords of Ebro, spears of lofty size,
 And breast-plates flaming with a thousand dyes,
 Helmet-high-plumed, and, pawing for the fight, 390
 Bold steeds, whose harness shone with silvery light
 Dozzling the day. And now the rising gale
 Invites the heroes, and demands the sail,
 When brave Magricio thus his peers address,
 ' Oh, friends in arms, of equal powers confest,
 Long have I hoped through foreign climes to stray,
 Where other streams than Douro wind their way;
 To note what various shares of bliss and woe
 From various laws and various customs flow.
 Nor deem that, artful, I the fight decline; 400
 England shall know the combat shall be mine.

entered Galicia, and was proclaimed king of Castile at the city of St. Jago de Compostella. He afterwards relinquished his pretensions on the marriage of his daughter Catalina with the infant don Henry of Castile. See note 20 of Lusiad IV.

²⁰ The ten champions, who in the fifth book of the Jerusalem are sent by Godfrey for the assistance of Armida, are chosen by lot. Tasso, who had read the Lusiad, and admired its author, undoubtedly had the Portuguese poet in his eye.

²¹ Oporto, called by the Romans Calle. Hence Portugal.

Yet something more than human warmth my breast⁴²⁰,
And sudden whispers, in our fortunes blest,
Nor envious chance, nor rocks, nor whelmy tide,
Shall our glad meeting at the list divide.

“He said: and now the rites of parting friends 410
Sufficed, through Leon and Casteel he bends.

On many a field erupt the hero stood,
And the proud scenes of Lusian conquest view'd.
Nave he pass'd, and pass'd the dreary wild,
Where rocks on rocks o'er yawning ghyas are piled;
The wolf's dread range, where to the evening skies
In clouds involved the cold Pyrenians rise.

Through Gallia's flowery vales and wheaten plains
He strays, and Belgia now his steps detains.

There, as forgetful of his vow'd intent, 420
In various cares the fleeting days he spent:

His peers the while direct to England's strand,
Plough the chill northern wave; and now at land,
Adorn'd in armour, and embroidery gay,
To lordly London holds the crowded way.

Bold Lancaster receives the knights with joy;
The feast and warlike song each hour employ.

The beauteous dames attending wake their fire,
With tears enrage them, and with smiles inspire.

And now with doubtful blushes rose the day, 430
Decreed the rites of wounded fame to pay.

The English monarch gives the listed bounds,
And, fixt in rank, with shining spears surrounds.

Before their dames the gallant knights advance,
Each like a Mars, and shake the beamy lance:

The dames, adorn'd in silk and gold, display
A thousand colours glittering to the day:

Alone in tears, and doleful mourning, came,
Unhonour'd by her knight, Magricio's dame.

'Fear not our prowess,' cry the bold eleven, 440
'In numbers, not in might, we stand uneven;

More could we spare, secure of dauntless might,
When for the injured female name we fight.'

“Beneath a canopy of regal state,
High on a throne the English monarch sate;

All round, the ladies and the barons bold,
Shining in proud array, their stations hold.

Now o'er the theatre the champions pour,
And facing three to three, and four to four,

Flourish their arms in prelude. From the bay 450
Where flows the Tagus, to the Indian sea,

The Sun beholds not in his annual race
A twelve more sightly, more of manly grace

Than tower'd the English knights. With frothing jaws

Furious each steed the bit restrictive gnaws;
And rearing to approach the rearing foe,

Their wavy manes are dash'd with foamy snow;
Cross-darting to the Sun a thousand rays

The champions' helmets as the crystal blaze.
Ah now, the trembling ladies' cheeks how wan! 460
Cold crept their blood; when through the tumult ran

A shout loud gathering: turn'd was every eye
Where rose the shout, the sudden cause to spy.

And lo, in shining arms a warrior rode,
With conscious pride his snorting courser trod;

“In the Portuguese,

Mas se a verdade o espirito me adevinha.

literally, “But if my spirit truly divine.” Thus rendered by Fauchaw,

But in my aug'ring ear a bird doth sing.

Low to the monarch and the dames he bends,
And now the great Magricio joins his friends.

With looks that glow'd, exulting rose the fair,
Whose wounded honour claim'd the hero's care:

Aside the doleful weeds of mourning thrown, 470
In dazzling purple and in gold she shone.

Now loud the signal of the fight rebounds
Quivering the air; the meeting shock resounds

Hoarse crashing uproar; griding splinters spring
Far round; and hucklers dash'd on bucklers ring:

Their swords flash lightning; darkly reeking o'er
The slining mail-plates flows the purple gore.

Torn by the spur, the loosened reins at large,
Furious the steeds in thundering plunges charge;

Trembles beneath their hoofs the solid ground, 480
And thick the fiery sparkles flash around,

A dreadful blaze! with pleasing horrors thrill'd,
The crowd behold the terrors of the field.

Here stunn'd, and staggering with the forceful
blow,

A bending champion grasps the saddle bow;
Here backward bent a falling knight reclines,

His plumes dishonour'd lash the courser's loins.
So tired and stagger'd toil'd the doubtful fight,

When great Magricio, kindling all his might,
Gave all his rage to burn: with headlong force, 490
Conscious of victory, his bounding horse

Wheels round and round the foe; the hero's spear
Now on the front, now flaming on the rear,

Mows down their firmest battle; groans the ground,
Beneath his courser's smiting hoofs; far round

The cloven helms and splinter'd shields resound.
Here, torn and trail'd in dust the barons gay,

From the fallen master springs the steed away;
Obscene with dust and gore, slow from the ground

Rising, the master rolls his eyes around, 500
Pale as a spectre on the Stygian coast,

In all the rage of shame confused and lost.
Here low on earth, and o'er the riders thrown,

The wallowing coursers and the riders groan:
Before their glimmering vision dies the light,

And deep descends the gloom of death's eternal night.

They now who boasted, ‘Let the sword decide,’
Alone in flight's ignoble aid confide:

Loud to the sky the shout of joy proclaims
The spotless honour of the ladies' names. 510

“In painted halls of state and rosy bowers,
The twelve brave Lusians crown the festive hours.

Bold Lancaster the princely feast bestows,
The goblet circles, and the music flows;

And every care, the transport of their joy,
To tend the knights the lovely dances employ;

The green-boughed forest by the laws of Thames
Behold the victor-champions and the dames

Rouse the tall roe-buck o'er the dews of morn,
While through the dales of Kent resounds the bugle-horn. 520

The sultry noon the princely banquet owns,
The minstrel's song of war the banquet crowns;

And when the shades of gentle evening fall,
Loud with the dance resounds the lordly hall:

The golden roofs, while Vesper shines, prolong
The trembling echoes of the harp and song.

Thus pass'd the days on England's happy strand,
Till the dear memory of their natal land

Sigh'd for the banks of Tagus. Yet the breast
Of brave Magricio spurns the thoughts of rest: 530

In Gaul's proud court he sought the listed plain,
In arms an injured lady's knight again.

As Rome's Corvinus o'er the field he strode⁴³,
And on the foe's huge cuirass proudly trod,
No more by tyranny's proud tongue reviled,
The Flaccidian countess on her hero smiled⁴⁴.
The Rhine another pass'd, and proved his might⁴⁵,
A fraudulent German dared him to the fight;
Strain'd in his grasp the fraudulent boaster fell—⁴⁶
Here sudden stoop'd the youth; the distant yell 340
Of gathering tempest sounded in his ears,
Unheard, unheeded by his listening peers.

⁴³ Valerius Maximus, a Roman tribune, who fought and slew a Gaul of enormous stature, in single combat. During the duel a raven perched on the helm of his antagonist, sometimes pecked his face and hand, and sometimes blinded him with the flapping of his wings. The victor was thence named Corvinus. Vid. Liv. l. viii. c. 26.

⁴⁵ "This was Alvaro Vaz d'Almada. The chronicle of Garibay relates, that at Basil he received from a German a challenge to measure swords, on condition that each should fight with his right side unarmed; the German by this hoping to be victorious, for he was left-handed. The Portuguese, suspecting no fraud, accepted. When the combat began he perceived the inequality. His right side unarmed was exposed to the enemy, whose left side, which was nearest to him, was defended with half a cuirass. Notwithstanding all this, the brave Alvaro obtained the victory. He sprung upon the German, seized him, and, grasping him forcibly in his arms, stifled and crushed him to death; imitating the conduct of Hercules, who in the same manner slew the cruel Anteus. Here we ought to remark the address of our author; he describes at length the injury and grief of the English ladies, the voyage of the twelve champions to England, and the prowess they there displayed. When Veloso relates these, the sea is calm; but no sooner does it begin to be troubled, than the soldier abridges his recital: we see him follow by degrees the preludes of the storm, we perceive the anxiety of his mind on the view of the approaching danger, hastening his narration to an end. Voilà ce que s'appelle les coups de maître. 'Behold the strokes of a master.'"—Castera.

João Franco Barreto, whose short nomenclator is printed as an index to the Portuguese editions of the Lusiad, informs us, that Magricio was son of the mariscal Conçalo Coutinho, and brother to don Vasco Coutinho, the first count de Marialva.

Earnest at full they urge him to relate
Magricio's combat, and the German's fate.
When shrilly whistling through the decks resounds
The master's call, and loud his voice rebounds:
Instant from converse and from slumber start
Both hands, and instant to their toils they dart.
" Aloft, O speed, down, down the topsails," cries
The master, " sudden from my earnest eyes 350
Vanish'd the stars, slow rolls the hollow sigh,
The storm's dread herald."—To the topsails fly
The bounding youths, and o'er the yard-arms whirl
The whizzing ropes, and swift the canvass foil;
When from their grasp the bursting tempests bore
The sheets half-gather'd, and in fragments tore.
" Strike, strike the main-sail," loud again he rear
His echoing voice; when roaring in their ears,
As if the starry vault by thunders riven,
Rush'd downward to the deep the walls of Heaven:
With headlong weight a fiercer blast descends, 361
And with sharp whirling crash the main-sail rears;
Loud shrieks of horror through the fleet resound,
Bursts the torn cordage, rattle far around
The splinter'd yard-arms; from each bending mast,
In many a shroud, far streaming on the blast
The canvass floats; low sinks the leeward side,
O'er the broad vessels rolls the swelling tide:
" Oh strain each nerve," the frantic pilot cries,
" Oh now—" and instant every nerve applies, 370
Tugging what cumbersome lay with strainful force;
Dash'd by the ponderous loads the surges hoarse
Roar in new whirls: the dauntless soldiers ran
To pump, yet ere the groaning pump began
The wave to vomit, o'er the decks o'erthrown
In grolving heaps the stagger'd soldiers groan:
So rolls the vessel, not the boldest three,
Of arm robustest, and of firmest knee,
Can guide the starting rudder; from their hands
The helm bursts; scarce a cable's strength com- 380

The staggering fury of its starting bounds,
While to the forceful beating surge resounds
The hollow crazing hulk: with kindling rage
The adverse winds the adverse winds engage:
As from its base of rock their banded power
Strove in the dust to strew some lordly tower,
Whose dented battlements in middle sky
Frown on the tempest and its rage defy;
So roar'd the winds: high o'er the rest upborne
On the wide mountain-wave's slant ridge forlorn,
At times discover'd by the lightnings blue, 390
Hangs Gama's lofty vessel, to the view
Small as her boat; o'er Paulus' shatter'd prow Falls the tall main-mast prone with crashing roar;

Their hands, yet grasping their uprooted hair,
The sailors lift to Heaven in wild despair;
The Saviour-God each yelling voice employs:
Nor less from brave Coelho's war-ship pours
The shriek, shrill rolling on the tempest's wings:
Dire as the bird of death at midnight shriek 400
His dreary howlings in the sick man's ear,
The answering shriek from ship to ship they bear.
Now on the mountain-billows upward driven,
The navy mingles with the clouds of Heaven;
Now rushing downward with the sinking waves,
Bare they behold old ocean's vaulty caves.
The eastern blast against the western pours,
Against the southern storm the northern roars:
From pole to pole the flashy lightnings glare,
One pale blue twinkling sheet enwraps the air; 410

In swift succession now the volleys fly,
 Bared in-pointed curvings o'er the sky,
 And through the horrors of the dreadful night,
 O'er the torn waves they shed a ghastly light;
 The breaking surges flame with burning red,
 Wider and louder still the thunders spread,
 As if the solid Heavens together crush'd,
 Expiring worlds on worlds expiring rush'd,
 And dim-brow'd Chaos struggled to regain
 The wild confusion of his ancient reign. 620
 Not such the volley when the arm of Jove
 From Heaven's high gates the rebel Titans drove;
 Not such fierce lightnings blazed athwart the flood,
 When, saved by Heaven, Deucalion's vessel rode High o'er the deluged hills. Along the shore
 The halcyons, mindful of their fate, deplore⁶²;
 As beating round on trembling wings they fly,
 Shrill through the storm their woeful clamours die.
 So from the tomb, when midnight veils the plains,
 With shrill, faint voice, th' untimely ghost occurs

⁶² Coys, king of Trachinis, son of Lucifer, married Alcyone, the daughter of Eolus. On a voyage to consult the Delphic oracle he was shipwrecked. His corpse was thrown ashore in the view of his spouse, who, in the agonies of her love and despair, threw herself into the sea. The gods, in pity of her pious fidelity, metamorphosed them into the birds which bear her name. The halcyon is a little bird, about the size of a thrush, its plumage of a beautiful sky blue, mixed with some traits of white and carnation. It is vulgarly called the King, or Martin Fisher. The halcyons very seldom appear but in the finest weather, whence they are fabled to build their nests on the waves. The female is no less remarkable than the turtle, for her conjugal affection. She nourishes and attends the male when sick, and survives his death but a few days. When the halcyons are surprised in a tempest, they fly about as in the utmost terror, with the most lamentable and doleful cries. To introduce them therefore in the picture of a storm, is a proof both of the taste and judgment of Camoëns.

⁶³ It may not perhaps be unentertaining to cite madam Dacier, and Mr. Pope, on the voices of the dead. It will, at least, afford a critical observation, which appears to have escaped them both. "The shades of the suitors (observes Dacier) when they are summoned by Mercury out of the palace of Ulysses, emit a feeble, plaintive, inarticulate sound, æquæ, strident: whereas Agamemnon, and the shades that have been long in the state of the dead, speak articulately. I doubt not but Homer intended to show, by the former description, that when the soul is separated from the organs of the body, it ceases to act after the same manner as while it was joined to it; but how the dead recover their voices afterwards is not easy to understand. In other respects Virgil paints after Homer:

————— Pars tollere rocem

Æquum: inceptus clamor frustratur hiantes."

To this Mr. Pope replies, "But why should we suppose, with Dacier, that these shades of the suitors (of Penelope) have lost the faculty of speaking? I rather imagine that the sounds they uttered were signs of complaint and discontent, and pro-

 Imbrow the surface of the boiling deep.
 High to the poop the valiant Gama springs,
 And all the rage of grief his bosom wrings, 640

ceeded not from an inability to speak. After Patroclus was slain, he appears to Achilles, and speaks very articulately to him; yet to express his sorrow at his departure, he acts like these suitors: for Achilles

Like a thin smoke beholds the spirit fly,
 And bears a feeble, lamentable cry.

Dacier conjectures, that the power of speech ceases, till they are admitted into a state of rest; but Patroclus is an instance to the contrary in the Iliad, and Elpenor in the Odyssey, for they both speak before their funeral rites are performed, and consequently before they enter into a state of repose amongst the shades of the happy."

The critic, in his search for distant proofs, often omits the most material one immediately at hand. Had madam Dacier attended to the episode of the souls of the suitors, the world had never seen her ingenuity in these mythological conjectures; nor had Mr. Pope any need to bring the case of Patroclus or Elpenor to overthrow her system. Amphimedon, one of the suitors, in the very episode which gave birth to Dacier's conjecture, tells his story very articulately to the shade of Agamemnon, though he had not received the funeral rites:

Our mangled bodies now deform'd with gore,
 Cold and neglected spread the marble floor;
 No friend to bathe our wounds! or tears to shed
 O'er the pale corpse! the honours of the dead.

Odys. xxiv.

On the whole, the defence of Pope is almost as idle as the conjectures of Dacier. The plain truth is, poetry delights in personification: every thing in it, as Aristotle says of the Iliad, has manners; poetry must therefore personify according to our ideas. Thus in Milton:

Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth—

And thus in Homer, while the suitors are conducted to Hell;

Trembling the spectres glide, and plaintive vent
 Thin, hollow screams, along the deep descent:

and, unfettered with mythological distinctions, either shriek or articulately talk, according to the most poetical view of their supposed circumstances.

O thou! while ocean bursting o'er the world
 Roar'd o'er the hills, and from the sky down hur'd
 Rush'd other headlong oceans; Oh! as then
 The second father of the race of men
 Safe in thy care the dreadful billows roil,
 Oh! save us now, be now the Saviour God!
 Safe in thy care, what dangers have we past!
 And shalt thou leave us, leave us now at last
 To perish here—our dangers and our toils
 To spread thy laws unworthy of thy smiles; 660
 Our vows unheard—Heavy with all thy weight,
 O horror, come! and come, eternal night!"

He paused;—then round his eyes and arms he
 In gesture wild, and thus: "O happy you! [threw
 You, who in Afric fought for holy faith,
 And, pierced with Mocciah spears, in glorious death
 Beheld the smiling Heavens your toils reward,
 By your brave mates beheld the conquest shared;
 Oh happy you, on every shore renown'd! 669
 Your vows respected, and your wishes crown'd!"

He spoke: redoubled rage the mingled blasts;
 Through the torn cordage and the shattered masts
 The winds loud whistled, fiercer lightnings blazed,
 And louder roars the doubled thunders raised,
 The sky and ocean blending, each on fire,
 Seem'd as all Nature struggled to expire.

When now the silver star of Love appear'd,
 Bright in her east her radiant front she rear'd;
 Fair through the horrid storm of gentle ray
 Announced the promise of the cheerful day; 680
 From her bright throne celestial Love beheld
 The tempest burn, and blast on blast impell'd:

"And must the furious demon still," she cries,
 "Still urge his rage, nor all the past suffice!
 Yet as the past, shall all his rage be vain—"
 She spoke, and darted to the roaring main;
 Her lovely nymphs she calls, the nymphs obey,
 Her nymphs the virtues who confess her away;
 Round every brow she bids the rose-buds twine,
 And every flower adown the locks to shine, 690
 The snow-white lily and the laurel green,
 And pink and yellow as at strife be seen.

Instant amid their golden ringlets strive
 Each floweret, planted by the hand of Love;
 At strife, who first th' enamour'd powers to gain,
 Who rule the tempests and the waves restrain:
 Bright as a starry band the Nereids shone,
 Instant old Eolus' sons their presence own⁶⁶;
 The winds die faintly; and in softest sighs
 Each at his fair one's feet deprecating liea. 700

The bright Orithia, threatening, sternly chides
 The furious Boreas, and his faith derides:
 The furious Boreas owns her powerful bands:
 Fair Galatea with a smile commands
 The raging Notus, for his love, how true,
 His fervent passion and his faith she knew.
 Thus every nymph her various lover chides;
 The silent winds are fetter'd by their brides;
 And to the goddess of celestial loves,
 Mild as her look, and gentle as her doves, 710

In flowery bands are brought. Their amorous flame
 The queen approves: "And ever burn the same,"
 She cries, and joyful on the nymphs' fair hands,
 Th' Eolian race receive the queen's commands,
 And vow, that henceforth her armada's sails
 Should gently swell with fair propitious gales⁶⁷.

⁶⁶ For the fable of Eolus see the tenth Odyssæy.

⁶⁷ In innumerable instances Canoëns discovers

Now morn, serene in dappled gray, arose
 O'er the fair laws where murmuring Ganges flows; himself a judicious imitator of the ancients. In the two great masters of the epic are several prophecies oracular of the fate of different heroes, which give an air of solemn importance to the poem. The fate of the armada thus obscurely anticipated, resembles in particular the prophecy of the safe return of Ulysses to Ithaca, foretold by the shade of Tiresias, which was afterwards fulfilled by the Phæaciens. It remains now to make some observations on the machinery used by Camoëns in this book. The necessity of machinery in the epopœia, and the perhaps insurmountable difficulty of finding one unexceptionably adapted to a poem where the heroes are Christians, or, in other words, to a poem whose subject is modern, have already been observed in the preface. The descent of Bacchus to the palace of Neptune in the depths of the sea, and his address to the watery gods are noble imitations of Virgil's Juno in the first Æneid. The description of the storm is also masterly. In both instances the conduct of the Æneid is joined with the descriptive exuberance of the Odyssæy. The appearance of the star of Venus through the storm is finely imagined, the influence of the nymphs of that goddess over the winds, and their subsequent nuptials, are in the spirit of the promise of Juno to Eolus;

Sunt mihi bis septem præstanti corpore nymphæ:
 Quarum, quæ forma pulcherrima, Deiopeiam
 Connubio jungam stabili, propriamque dicabo:
 Omnes ut tecum meritis pro talibus annos
 Exigat, et pulchra faciat te prole parentem.

And the fiction itself is an allegory exactly in the manner of Homer. Orithia, the daughter of Erecteus, and queen of the Amazons, was ravished and carried away by Boreas. Her name, derived from ἄρα, bound or limit, and θῆρα, violence, implies, says Casters, that she moderated the rage of her husband. In the same manner, Galatea, derived from γάλας, milk, and θεά, a goddess, signifies the goddess of candour or innocence.

"If one would speak poetically," says Bossu, "he must imitate Homer. Homer will not say that salt has the virtue to preserve dead bodies, or that the sea presented Achilles a remedy to preserve the corpse of Patroclus from putrefaction: he makes the sea a goddess, and tells us that Thetis, to comfort Achilles, promised to perfume the body with an ambrosia, which should keep it a whole year from corruption.—All this is told us poetically; the whole is reduced into action; the sea is made a person who speaks and acts, and this prosopopœia is accompanied with passion, tenderness, and affection."

It has been observed by the critics, that Homer, in the battle of the gods, has, with great propriety, divided their auxiliary forces. On the side of the Greeks, he places all the gods who preside over the arts and sciences. Mars and Venus favour the adultery of Paris, and Apollo is for the Trojans, as their strength consisted chiefly in the use of the bow. Talking of the battle, "With what art," says Eustathius as cited by Pope, "does the poet engage the gods in this conflict! Neptune opposes Apollo, which implies, that things most

Bounding he rises, and with eyes on fire
Surveys the limits of his proud desire.

By toils like thine immortal fame is given.

and dry are in continual discord. Pallas fights with Mars, which signifies that rashness and wisdom always disagree. Juno is against Diana, that is, nothing more differs from a marriage state than celibacy. Vulcan engages Xanthus, that is, fire and water are in perpetual variance. Thus we have a fine allegory concealed under the veil of excellent poetry, and the reader conceives a double satisfaction at the same time, from the beautiful verses and an instructive moral." And again, "The combat of Mars and Pallas is plainly allegorical. Justice and wisdom demanded, that an end should be put to this terrible war: the god of war opposes this, but is worsted.—No sooner has our reason subdued one temptation, but another succeeds to re-inforce it, thus Venus succours Mars.—Pallas retreated from Mars in order to conquer him; this shows us that the best way to subdue a temptation is to retreat from it."

These explications of the manner of Homer ought, in justice, to be applied to his imitator; nor is the moral part of the allegory of Camoëns less exact than the mythological. In the present instances, his allegory is peculiarly happy. The rage and endeavours of the evil demon to prevent the interests of Christianity are strongly marked. The storm which he raises is the tumult of the human passions; these are most effectually subdued by the influence of the virtues, which more immediately depend upon celestial Love; and the union which she confirms between the virtues and passions, is the surest pledge of future tranquillity.

Not he, the feeble son of ease, may claim
Thy wreath, O Gama, or may hope thy fame.

Bears his proud knighthood's badge, his honours
Who cloth'd in steel, by thirst, by famine worn,
Through raging seas by bold ambition borne,

LUSIAD VII.

Hail, glorious chief ! where never chief before
Forced his bold way, all hail on India's shore !
And hail, ye Lusian heroes ! fair and wide
What groves of palm to haughty Rome denied,
For you by Ganges' lengthening banks unfold !
What laurel forests on the shores of gold

²⁰Once more the translator is tempted to confess his opinion, that the contrary practice of Homer and Virgil affords in reality no reasonable objection against the exclamatory exuberances of Camoëns. Homer, though the father of the epic poem, has his exuberances, as has been already observed, which violently trespass against the first rule of the epopœia, the unity of the action: a ruler which, strictly speaking, is not outraged by the digressive exclamations of Camoëns. The one now before us, as the severest critic must allow, is happily adapted to the subject of the book. The great dangers which the hero had hitherto encountered are particularly described. He is afterwards brought in safety to the Indian shore, the object of his ambition, and of all his toils. The exclamation therefore, on the grand hinge of the poem has its propriety, and discovers the warmth of its author's genius. It must also please, as it is strongly characteristic of the temper of our military poet. The manly contempt with which he speaks of the luxurious inactive courtier, and the delight and honour with which he talks of the toils of the soldier, present his own active life to the reader of sensibility. His campaigns in Africa, where in a gallant attack he lost an eye, his dangerous life at sea, and the military fatigues, and the battles in which he bore an honourable share in India, rise to our ideas, and possess us with an esteem and admiration of our martial poet, who thus could look back with a gallant enthusiasm, though his modesty does not mention himself, on all the hardships he had endured ; who thus could bravely esteem the dangers to which he had been exposed, and by which he had severely suffered, as the most desirable occurrences of his life, and the ornament of his name.

For you their honours ever vendant rear,
 Proud with their leaves to twist the Lusian spear!
 Ah Heaven! what fury Europe's sons controule!
 What self-consuming discord fires their souls! 10
 'Gainst her own breast her sword Germany turns;
 Through all her states fraternal massacre burns;
 Some, blindly wandering, holy faith disclaim;¹
 And fierce through all wild rages evil fame,
 High sound the titles of the English crown,
 King of Jerusalem, his old renown!²
 Alas! delighted with an airy name,
 The thin dim shadow of departed fame,
 England's stern monarch, sunk in soft repose,
 Lascivious riots mid his northern snows: 20
 Or if the starting burst of rage succeed,
 His brethren are his foes, and Christians bleed;
 While Hagar's brutal race his titles stain,
 In weeping Salem unmolested reign,
 And with their rites impure her holy shrine profane.
 And thou, O Gaul, with gaudy trophies pleased,
 Most Christian named; alas, in vain assumed!
 What impious lust of empire steals thy breast?
 From their just lords the Christian lands to wrest!
 While holy faith's hereditary foes 30
 Possess the treasures where Cyniflo flows;³
 And all secure, behold their harvests smile
 In waving gold along the banks of Nile.
 And thou, O lost to glory, lost to fame,
 Thou dark oblivion of thy ancient name,
 By every vicious luxury debased,
 Each noble passion from thy breast erased,

¹ The constitution of Germany, observes Puffendorf, may be said to verify the fable of the Hydra, with this difference, that the heads of the German state bite and devour each other. At the time when Cambrés wrote, the German empire was plunged into all the miseries of a religious war, the catholics using every endeavour to rivet the chains of popery, the adherents of Luther as strenuously endeavouring to shake them off.

² This is a mistake. The title of King of Jerusalem was never assumed by the kings of England. Robert, duke of Normandy, son of William the Conqueror, was elected king of Jerusalem by the army in Syria, but declined it in hope of ascending the throne of England; which attempt was defeated. Regnier, count d'Anjou, father of Margaret, queen of Henry VI, was flattered with the mock royalty of Naples, Cyprus, and Jerusalem; his armorial bearing for the latter, Luna, a cross potent, between four crosses Sol.—Hen. VIII. filled the throne of England when our author wrote this part of the Lusidæ: his Gothic luxury and conjugal brutality amply deserved the censure of the honest poet.

³ The French translator very cordially agrees with the Portuguese poet in the strictures upon Germany, England, and Italy. But when his own country is touched upon, Malgré l'estime, says he, que j'ai pour mon auteur, je ne craindrai pas de dire qu'il tombe ici dans une grande injustice: "For all the regard I have for my author, I will not hesitate to say, that here he has committed an enormous injustice." All Ensope besides however will witness the truth of the assertion, which stigmatizes the French politics with the lust of extending their monarchy.

⁴ A river in Africa.

Nervous in sloth, stuffing arts thy bound,
 O Italy, how fallen, how low, how lost!

⁵ However these severe reflections on modern Italy may displease the admirers of Italian manners, the picture on the whole is too just to admit of confutation. Never did the history of any court afford such instances of villainy, and all the baseness of intrigue, as that of the popes. The faith and honour of gentlemen banished from the politics of the Vatican, every public virtue must of consequence decline among the higher ranks; while the lower, broken by oppression, sink into the deepest poverty, and its attendant vices of meanness and dissimulation. That this view of the lower ranks in the pope's dominions is just, we have the indubitable testimony of an Addison, confirmed by the miserable depopulation of a province, which was once the finest and most populous of the Roman empire. It has long been the policy of the court of Spain, to encourage the luxury and effeminate dissipation of the Neapolitan nobility; and those of modern Venice resemble their warlike ancestors only in name. That Italy can boast many individuals of a different character, will by no means overthrow these general observations founded on the testimony of the most authentic writers. Our poet is besides justifiable, in his censures, for he only follows the severe reflections of the greatest of the Italian poets. It were easy to give fifty instances; two or three however shall suffice. Dante in his sixth Canto, del Purg.

Ahi, serva Italia, di dolore ostello,
 Nave senza nocchiero in gran tempesta,
 Non donna di provincie, ma bordello—

"Ah, slavish Italy, the inn of dolour, a ship without a pilot in a horrid tempest, not the mistress of provinces, but a brothel."

Ariosto, Canto 17.
 O d'ogni vitio fetida sentina
 Dormi Italia inebriata—

"O inebriated Italy, thou sleepest the sink of every filthy vice."

And Petrarch;
 Del' empia Babilonia, ond' e fuggita
 Ogni veuggogna, ond' ogni bene è fuori,
 Allergo di dolor, madre d'errori
 Son fuggit' io per allungar la vita.

"From the impious Babylon (the papal court) from whence all shame and all good are fled, the inn of dolour, the mother of errors, have I hastened away to prolong my life."

A much admired sunset from the same author shall close these citations.

SONETTO.

La gola, e' sonno, e l'ottioso pigiame
 Hanno del mondo ogni virtù sbandita;
 Ond' è dal corso suo quasi smarrita
 Nostra natura vinta dal costume:
 Ed è sì spento ogni benigno lume
 Del ciel; per cui s'informa tu umana vita
 Che per coes miserabile s'addita
 Che vuol far d'Helicon nascer seme
 Quel vaghezza di lustro, quel di mir to'
 Povera e nuda vai filosofa,

In vain to thee the eoil of glory sounds,
 Thy sword alone thy own soft bosom wounds.
 Ah, Europe's sons, ye brother-powers, in you
 The fables old of Cadmus now are true * :
 Fierce rose the brothers from the dragon teeth,
 And each fell crimson'd with a brother's death.
 So fall the breast of the Christian name †,
 While dogs unclean Messiah's lore blaspheme,
 And howl their curses o'er the holy tomb,
 While to the sword the Christian race they doom.
 From eye to eye, from shore to distant shore, ‡
 By various princes led, their legions pour ;

Dice la turba al vil guadagno intesa.
 Pochi compagni havrai per l'alta via ;
 Tanto ti prego p'è ; gentile spirito,
 Non lassar la magnanima tua impresa.

Though this elegant little poem is general, yet as the author and the friend to whom he addresses it were Italians, it must be acknowledged that he had a particular regard to the state of their own country. His friend, it is supposed, was engaged on some great literary work, but was discouraged by the view of the dissipation and prodigality of his age. I have thus attempted it in English :

SONNET.

Ah ! how, my friend, has full-gorged luxurie,
 And blasted slumbers on the slothful down,
 From the dull world all manly virtue thrown,
 And slaved the age to custom's tyrannie !

The blessed lights so lost in darkness be, [strown,
 Those lights by Heaven to guide our minds be-
 Mad were he deem'd who brought from Helicon
 The hallowed water or the laurel tree.

Philosophy, ah ! thou art cold and poor,
 Exclaim the crowd, on scorn'd gain intent ;
 Few will attend thee on thy lofty road ;
 Yet I, my friend, would fire thy zeal the more ;
 Ah, gentle spirit, labour on unspent,
 Crown thy fair toils, and win the smile of God.

* Cadmus having slain the dragon which guarded the fountain of Dirce in Bœotia, sowed the teeth of the monster. A number of armed men immediately sprang up; and surrounded Cadmus, in order to kill him. By the counsel of Minerva he threw a precious stone among them, in striving for which they slew one another. Only five survived, who afterwards assisted him to build the city of Thebes. Vid. Ovid. Met. iv.

The foundation of this fable appears to be thus: Cadmus having slain a famous freebooter, who infested Bœotia, a number of his banditti, not improperly called his teeth, attempted to revenge his death; but quarrelling about the presents which Cadmus sent them to distribute among themselves, they fell by the swords of each other.

 Belligeri placuit aulicos habitura triumphos ?
 Heu, quantum potuit terras pælagique parari
 Hoc, quem civiles bauerant, sanguine, dextræ !

United all in one determined aim,
 From every land to blot the Christian name.
 Then wake, ye brother-powers, combined awake,
 And from the foe the great example take.
 If empire tempt ye, lo, the East expands,
 Fair and immense, her summer-garden lands :
 There beautiful wealth displays her richest stores ;
 Pactol and Hermus' streams o'er golden ore
 Roll their long way, but not for you they flow ; †
 Their treasures blaze on the stern soldier's brow :
 From him Assyria plies the loom of gold,
 And Africa's sons their deepest mines unfold
 To build his haughty throne. Ye western powers,
 To throw the mimic bolt of Jove is yours,
 Yours all the art to wield the arms of fate ;
 Then bid the thunders of the dreadful tire
 Against the walls of proud Byzantium roar,
 Till headlong driven from Europe's ravish'd shores
 Their cold Syrian wilds, and dreary deserts, ‡
 By Caspian mountains, and uncultured fens,
 Their fathers' seats beyond the Wolgian lake §,
 The barbarous race of Saracens betake.
 And hark, to you the woful Greek exclaims,
 The Georgian fathers and the Armenian dames,
 Their fairest offspring from their bosoms torn,
 A dreadful tribute, loud imploring mourns †,
 Alas, in vain ! their offspring captive led,
 In Hagar's son's unshallow'd temples bred,
 To rapine train'd, arise a brutal host, ††
 The Christian terror, and the Turkish boast.

Yet sleep, ye powers of Europe, careless sleep,
 To you in vain your eastern brethren weep ;
 Yet not in vain their woe-wrung tears shall see ;
 Though small the Lusian realms, her legions few,
 The guardian orb by Heaven ordain'd before,
 The Lusian race shall guard Messiah's lore.
 When Heaven decreed to crush the Moorish foe,
 Heaven gave the Lusian spear to strike the blow.
 Whom Heaven's own laws o'er Africa's shores wert
 The sacred shrine the Lusian heroes rear'd ††† ;
 Nor shall their zeal in Asia's bounds expire, ††††
 Asia subdu'd shall fame with battle's fire :
 When the red Sun the Lusian shore forsakes,
 And on the lap of deepest west awakes †††††,
 O'er the wild plains, beneath unnumber'd skies
 The Sun shall view the Lusian altars rise.
 And could new worlds by human step be trod,
 Those worlds should tremble at the Lusian nod †††††.

‡ By this barbarous policy the tyranny of the Ottomans has been long sustained. The troops of the Turkish infantry and cavalry, known by the name of Janizaries and Spahis, are thus supported, and the scribes in office called Muffi, says Sandys, " are the sons of Christians (and thus the most completely furnished by nature) taken in their childhood from their miserable parents by a law made every five years, or oftener or seldomer, as occasion requireth."

††† If our former defenders of the embusant declamations of Camões are allowed by the critic, we doubt not but the digression, now concluded, will appear with peculiar propriety. The poet having brought his heroes to the shores of India, indulges himself with the review of the state of the western and eastern worlds; the latter of which is now, by the labour of his heroes, rendered accessible to the former. The purpose of his poem is also strictly kept in view. The west and the east he considers as two great empires, the one of the true religion, the other of a false. The professors of the true, disunited and destroying each other; the professors of the false religion all combined to extirpate the adherents of the other. He upbraids the professors of the true religion for their vices, particularly for their disunion, and for deserting the interests of holy faith. His countrymen, however, he boasts, have been its defenders and planters; and, without the assistance of their brother-powers, will plant it in Asia. This, as it is the purpose of his hero, is directly to the subject of the poem, and the honour, which Heaven, he says, vouchsafed to his countrymen, in choosing them to defend and propagate its laws, is mentioned in the genuine spirit of that religious enthusiasm which breathes through the two great epic poems of Greece and Rome, and which gives an air of the most solemn importance to the Gierusalemme of Tasso.

Yet whatever liberties a poet may be allowed to take when he treats of the fabulous ages, any absurdity of opinion, where authentic history, and the state of modern nations afford the topic, must to the intelligent reader appear ridiculous, and therefore a blemish in a solemn poem. There are many, the translator is aware, to whom a serious and warm exhortation to a general crusade will appear as an absurdity, and a blemish of this kind, "The crusaders," according to what M. Voltaire calls their true character, des brigands ligés pour venir, &c. "were a band of vagabond thieves, who had agreed to ramble from the heart of Europe in order to desolate a country they had no right to, and massacre, in cold blood, a venerable prince more than fourscore years old, and his whole people, against whom they had no pretence of complaint."

Yet however confidently Voltaire and others may please to talk, it will be no difficult matter to prove that the crusades were neither so unjustifiable, so impolitical, nor so unhappy in their consequences, as the superficial readers of history are habituated to esteem them.

Were the aborigines of all America to form one general confederacy against the descendants of those Europeans who massacred upwards of forty millions of Mexicans, and other American natives, and were these confederates totally to dispossess the present possessors of an empire so unjustly acquired, no man, it is presumed, would pronounce that their combination and hostilities were against the law of nature or nations. Yet, whatever Voltaire may please to assert, this supposition is by no means unapplicable to the confederacy of the cross. A party of wandering Arabs are joined by the Turks or Turcomans, who inhabited the frozen wilds of mount Caucasus, and whose name signifies wanderers; these, incorporated with other banditti, from the deserts of Scythia, now called Tartary, over-run the regions of Syria, to which they had no title, whose inhabitants had given them no offence. They profess that they are commissioned by Heaven to establish the religion of Mohammed by violence and the sword. In a few ages they subdue the finest countries around the Euphrates, and the Christian inhabitants, the rightful possessors, are treated with the most brutal policy and all its attendant cruelties. Bound by their creed to make war on the Christians, their ambition neglects no opportunity to extend their conquests; and already possessed of immense territory, their acknowledged purpose and their power threaten destruction to the Christian empire of the Greeks.

Having conquered and proselyted Africa, from the Nile to the Straits of Gibraltar, the princes of that country, their tributaries and allies, combining in the great design to extirpate Christianity, turn their arms against Europe, and are successful: they establish kingdoms in Spain and Portugal; and France, Italy, and the western islands of the Mediterranean, suffer by their excursions; while Hungary, Bohemia, Poland, and Italy itself, form its vicinage to Dalmatia, are immediately concerned in the impending fate of the Grecian empire. While such dangers threatened, it is impossible the princes of Europe could have been unconcerned. Nor were precat injures wanting to stimulate them to arms. Cosmas, a writer of the sixth century, mentions the considerable trade which the Franks carried on with Syria through the Levant. He himself travelled to India, and he informs us that in his time Justinian sent two monks to China. In the ninth century, says M. de Guignes, an association of French merchants went twice a year to Alexandria, from whence they brought to Europe the commodities of India and Arabia. Kalif Haroun made a formalcession of the holy sepulchre to Charlemagne, and allowed the Franks to build houses of hospitality for the reception of pilgrims in various places of Syria. Nor was devotion the only motive of pilgrimage. The emoluments of commerce were also attended to, and the houses of hospitality possessed by the Franks, Italians, and Venetians in the east, were of the nature of factories. But these were seized, and plundered by the Saracens, and the eastern commerce which flowed to Europe through the Levant was almost totally interrupted. To these considerations let it be added, that several eastern Christians fled to Europe, and begging as pilgrims from country to country, implored the assistance of the Christian power to dispossess the cruel and unjust usurpers of their lands. At this period the crusades commence. To suppose that the princes of Europe were so insensible to the danger which threatened them, as some modern writers who have touched upon that subject appear to be, is to ascribe a degree of stupidity to them, by no means applicable to their military character. Though superstition inflamed the multitude, we may be assured, however, that several princes found it their political interest to fan the flames of that superstition; and accordingly we find that the princes of Spain and Portugal greatly availed themselves of it. The immense resources which the Turks received from Egypt, and the neighbouring countries, which had not been attempted by Godfrey and the first crusaders, determined their successors to alter the plan of their operations. They began their hostilities in Spain and Portugal, and proceeded through Barbary to Egypt. By this new route of the crosses, the Spaniards and Portuguese* were enabled not only to drive the Moors from Europe, but to give a fatal blow to their power in Africa. Nor was the safety of the Greek empire less necessary to Italy and the eastern kingdoms of Europe. Injuries, however, offered by the crusaders, who even seized the throne of Constantinople, upon which they placed an earl of Flanders, excited the resentment of the Greeks; and their aversion † to the papal supremacy rendered them so jealous of the crusaders, that the successors of Godfrey, for want of auxiliary support, after about ninety years possession, were totally driven from their new-erected kingdom in the Holy Land. By the fall of the Greek empire, an event which followed, and which had been long foreseen, the Venetians, the Austrians, the Poles, and the Russians, became the natural enemies of the Turks; and many desperate wars, attended with various success, have been continued to the present time. Not much above fifty years ago, their formidable efforts to possess themselves of the Venetian dominions alarmed all the Christian powers; and had it not been for the repeated defeats they received from prince Eugene, a great part of the Austrian territories must have yielded to their yoke. However overlooked, it requires but little political philosophy to perceive the security which would result to Europe were there a powerful and warlike kingdom on the eastern side of the Turkish empire. The western conquests of that fierce warrior Bajazet I. were interrupted by Tamerlane, and by the enemy they found in Kouli Khan, the enraged Porte was prevented from revenging the triumphs of Eugene. A few years ago we beheld them trample on the laws of nations, send an ambassador to prison, and command the Russian empress to desert her allies. And however the foresight of the narrow politician may dread the rising power of the Russ, it is to be wished that the arms of Muscovy may fix such barriers to the Turkish empire as will for ever prevent their long meditated, and often attempted design, to possess themselves of the Venetian dominions; or to extend their conquests on the west, conquests which would render them the most dangerous power to the peace of Europe.

In a word, the crusades, a combination which tended to support the Greek empire for the security of the eastern part of Europe, and to drive the enemy from the southern, whatever the superstition of its promoters and conductors might have been, can by no means deserve to be called a most singular monument of human folly. And however the inutility and absurdity of their professed aim, to rescue the tomb of Christ, may excite the ridicule of the modern philosopher, it was a motive admirably adapted to the superstition of the monkish ages; and where it is necessary that an enemy should be restrained, an able politician will avail himself of the most powerful of all incitements to hostility, the superstitious or religious fervour of his army. And by thus resting the war on a religious motive, the English, who were most remote from Mohammedan depredation, were induced to join the confederacy, to which, at various times, they gave the most important assistance.

It is with peculiar propriety therefore that Camoëns upbraids his age for negligently permitting the aggrandisement of the Mohammedan power. Nor is the boast, that his countrymen will themselves effect this great purpose, unfounded in truth. As already observed in the introduction, the voyage of Gama saved the liberties of mankind. The superiority of the Asiatic seas in the hands of Europeans, the consequence of that voyage, is the most effectual and most important completion of the crusades.

It will be found, that Camoëns talks of the political reasons of a crusade, with an accuracy in the philosophy of history, as superior to that of Voltaire, as the poetical merit of the Lusiad surpasses that of the Henriade. And the critic in poetry must allow, that, to suppose the discovery of Gama, the completion of all the former endeavours to overthrow the great enemies of the true religion, gives a dignity to the poem, and an importance to the hero, similar to that which Voltaire, on the same supposition, allows to the subject of the Jerusalem of Tasso.

Having entered so far into the history of the crusades, it may not be improper to take a view of the happy consequences which flowed from them. "To these wild expeditions," says Robertson, "the effect of superstition or folly, we owe the first gleams of light which tended to dispel barbarity and ignorance, and introduce any change in government or manners." Constantinople, at that time the seat of elegance, of arts and commerce, was the principal rendezvous of the European armies. The Greek writers of that age speak of the Latins as the most ignorant barbarians; the Latins, on the other hand, talk with astonishment of the grandeur, elegance, and commerce of Constantinople. The most stupid barbarians, when they have the opportunity of comparison, are sensible of the superiority of civilized nations, and, by an acquaintance with them, begin to resemble their manners, and emulate their advantages. The fleets which attended the crosses introduced commerce and the freedom of commercial cities into their mother countries. This, as Robertson observes, proved destructive to the feudal system, which had now degenerated into the most gloomy oppression, and introduced the plans of regular government. "This acquisition of liberty," says the same most ingenious historian, "made such a happy change in the condition of all the members of communities, as roused them from that stupidity and inac-

Independence was established, and wealth flowed into cities which had long been the seat of poverty and oppression."

¹² This is according to the truth of history. While the messenger, sent ashore by Gama, was borne here and there, and carried off his feet by the throng, who understood not a word of his language, he was scooted in Spanish by a Moorish merchant, a native of Tunis, who, according to Oeserius, had been the chief person with whom king John II. had formerly contracted for military stores. He proved himself an honest agent, and of infinite service to Gama, with whom he returned to Portugal, where, according to Paris, he died in the Christian communion. He was named Meacanda.

 And now their pinnace cuts the briny tide:
 The Moor, with transport sparkling in his eyes,
 The well-known make of Gama's navy spies,
 The bending bowsprit, and the mast so tall,
 The sides black frowning as a castle wall,
 The high-tower'd stern, the lordly nodding prow,
 And the broad standard slowly waving o'er
 The anchor's moony fangs. The stiff he leaves,
 Brave Gama's deck his bounding step receives;
 And, "Hail!" he cries: in transport Gama sprung,
 And round his neck with friendly welcome hung;
 Exrapt, so distant o'er the dreadful main 162
 To hear the music of the tongue of Spain.
 And now beneath a painted shade of state
 Beside the admiral the stranger sat:
 Of India's clime, the natives, and the laws,
 What monarch sways them, what religion sways?
 Why from the tombs devoted to his sires
 The son so far? the valiant chief inquires.
 In act to speak the stranger waves his hand, 170
 The joyful crew in silent wonder stand,
 Each gently pressing on with greedy ear,
 As erst the beading forests stoop'd to hear
 In Rhodope, when Orpheus' heavenly strain¹⁵
 Deplor'd his lost Eurydice in vain;
 While with a mien that generous friendship won
 From every heart, the stranger thus begon:
 "Your glorious deeds, ye Lusians, well I know,
 To neighbouring earth the vital air I owe;
 Yet though my faith the Koran's lore revere, 180
 So taught my sires; my birth at proud Tangier,
 An hostile clime to Lisbon's awful name,
 I glow enraptur'd o'er the Lusian fame;
 Proud though your nation's warlike glories shine,
 These proudest honour yield, O chief, to thine;
 Beneath thy dread achievements low they fall,
 And India's shore discover'd crowns them all.
 Won by your fame, by fond affection sway'd,
 A friend I come, and offer friendship's aid.
 As on my lips Castilia's language glows, 190
 So from my tongue the speech of India flows;
 Mozaide my name, in India's court beloved,
 For honest deeds, but time shall speak, approved.

part of it, and gave the rest to the fugitive, assuring him of safety. As they approached the house, they met a crowd who carried the murdered core of the nobleman's beloved son. The incensed populace demanded the murderer, who stood beside him, to be delivered to their fury. The father, though overwhelmed with grief and anger, replied, "We have eaten together, and I will not betray him." He protected the murderer of his son from the fury of his domestics and neighbours, and in the night facilitated his escape.

¹⁵ The well-known fable of the descent of Orpheus to Hell, and the second loss of his wife, is thus explained: Aëdonus, king of Thesprotia, whose cruelty procured him the name of Pluto, tyrant of Hell, having seized Eurydice, as she fled from his friend Aristæus, detained her as a captive. Orpheus having charmed the tyrant with his music, his wife was restored, on condition that he should not look upon her, till he had conducted her out of Thesprotia. Orpheus, on his journey, forfeited the condition, and irrecoverably lost his spouse.

When India's monarch greets his court again,
 For now the banquet on the tented plain
 And sylvan chase his careless hours employ ¹⁶;
 When India's mighty lord, with wondering joy,
 Shall hail you welcome on his spacious shore,
 Through oceans never plough'd by keel before,
 Myself shall glad interpreter attend, 200
 Mine every office of the faithful friend.
 Ah! but a stream, the labour of the oar,
 Divides my birth-place from your native shore;
 On shores unknown, in distant worlds, how sweet
 The kindred tongue, the kindred face to greet!
 Such now my joy; and such, O Heaven, be yours!
 Yes, bounteous Heaven your glad success secures.
 Till now impervious, Heaven alone subdued
 The various horrors of the trackless flood;
 Heaven sent you here for some great work divine, 210
 And Heaven inspires my breast your sacred tolls
 To join.

"Vast are the shores of India's wealthy soil;
 Southward, sea-girt, she forms a demi-isle:
 His cavern'd cliffs with dark-brow'd forests crown'd,
 Hemodius Taurus frowns her northern bound:
 From Caspia's lake th' enormous mountains spread ¹⁷,
 And heading eastward rears a thousand heads;
 Far to extremest sea the ridges thrown,
 By various names through various tribes are known:
 Here down the waste of Taurus' rocky side 220
 Two infant rivers pour the crystal tide,
 Indus the one, and one the Ganges named,
 Darkly of old through distant nations famed:
 One eastward curving holds his crooked way,
 One to the west gives his swollen tide to stray:
 Declining southward many a land they lave,
 And widely swelling roll the sea-like wave,
 'Till the twin offspring of the mountain sire
 Both in the Indian deep ingulf'd expire.
 Between these streams, fair smiling to the day, 230
 The Indian lands their wide domains display,
 And many a league far to the south they bend,
 From the broad region where the rivers end,
 Till, where the shores to Ceylon's isle oppo-
 In conic form the Indian regions close.

¹⁸ One captain Knox, who published an account of Ceylon, in 1681, has the following curious passage: "This for certain," says he, "I can affirm, that oftentimes the devil doth cry with an audible voice in the night: it is very shrill, almost like the barking of a dog. This I have often heard myself, but never heard that he did any body any harm. Only this observation the inhabitants of the land have made of this voice, and I have made it also; that either just before, or very suddenly after, this voice, the king always cuts off people. To believe that this is the voice of the devil these reasons urge; because there is no creature known to the inhabitants that cries like it, and because it will on a sudden depart from one place, and make

To various laws the various tribes incline,
 And various are the rites esteem'd divine:
 Some as from Heaven receive the Koran's love,
 Some the dread monsters of the wild adore;
 Some bend to wood and stone the prostrate head, 240
 And rear unhallow'd altars to the dead.
 By Ganges' banks, as wild traditions tell,
 Of old the tribes lived healthful by the smell;
 No food they knew, such fragrant vapours rose
 Rich from the flowery lawns where Ganges flows ¹⁹;
 Here now the Delhian, and the fierce Patan
 Feed their fair flocks; and here, a Heathen clan,
 Stern Decan's sons the fertile valleys till,
 A clan, whose hope to shun eternal ill,
 Whose trust from every stain of guilt to save, 250
 Is fondly placed in Ganges' holy wave;
 If to the stream the breathless corpse be given,
 They deem the spirit wings her way to Heaven.
 Here, by the mouths where hallowed Ganges ends,
 Bengala's beauteous Eden wide extends;
 Unrivall'd smile her fair luxurious vales:
 And here Cambaya spreads her palmy dales ²⁰;
 A warlike realm, where still the martial race
 From Porus famed of yore their lineage trace.
 Narsinga ²¹ here displays her spacious line; 260
 In native gold her sons and ruby shine:

a noise in another, quicker than any fowl can fly, and because the very dogs will tremble when they hear it; and it is so counted by all the people."

—Knox, Hist. Ceyl. p. 78. We need not have recourse to the devil, however, for this quick transposition of sound. Birds which live by suction in marshy grounds, the bittern in particular, often set up a hideous screaming cry by night, and instantly answer one another at the distance of several miles.

¹⁹ Pliny, imposed upon by some Greeks, who pretended to have been in India, relates this fable. Vid. Nat. Hist. lib. xii.

²⁰ Now called Gazarate. "The inhabitants are ingenious, cultivate letters, and are said to be particularly happy in the agreeable romance. According to ancient tradition, Porus was sovereign of this country. His memory is still preserved with an éclat worthy of that valour and generosity which attracted the esteem of the great Alexander."—Castera. This country was known to the ancients by the name of Gedrosia.

²¹ The laws of Narsinga oblige "the women to throw themselves into the funeral pile, to be burnt with their deceased husbands. An infallible secret to prevent the desire of widowhood."—Castera from Barros, dec. 4.

There are many accounts in different travellers of the performance of this most barbarous ceremony. The two following are selected as the most picturesque of any in the knowledge of the translator:—

"At this time (1710) died the prince of Marata, aged above eighty years. The ceremony of his funeral, where his forty-seven wives were burned with his corpse, was thus: A deep circular pit was dugged in a field without the town; in the middle of the trench was erected a pile of wood, on the top of which, on a couch richly ornamented, lay the body of the deceased prince in his finest robes. After numberless rituals performed by the Brahmans, the pile was set on fire, and immediately

Alas, how vain! these gaudy sons of fear,
Trembling, bow down before each hostile spear.

the unhappy ladies appeared, sparkling with jewels and adorned with flowers. These victims of this diabolical sacrifice walked several times about the burning pile, the heat whereof was felt at a considerable distance. The principal lady then, holding the dagger of her late husband, thus addressed herself to the prince his successor: 'Here,' said she, 'is the dagger which the king made use of, to triumph over his enemies: beware never to employ it to other purpose, never to embroe it with the blood of your subjects. Govern them as a father, as he has done, and you shall live long and happy, as he did. Since he is no more, nothing can keep me longer in the world; all that remains for me is to follow him.' With these words she resigned the dagger into the prince's hands, who took it from her without showing the least sign of grief or compassion. The princess now appeared agitated. One of her domestics, a Christian woman, had frequently talked with her on religion, and, though she never renounced her idols, had made some impressions on her mind. Perhaps these impressions now revived. With a most expressive look she exclaimed, 'Alas! what is the end of human happiness! I know I shall plunge myself headlong into Hell!' On these words, a horror was visible on every countenance; when, resuming her courage, she boldly turned her face to the burning pile, and, calling upon her gods, flung herself into the midst of the flames. The second lady was the sister of a prince of the blood, who was present, and assisted at the detestable sacrifice. She advanced to her brother, and gave him the jewels wherewith she was adorned. His passion gave way, he burst into tears, and fell upon her neck in the most tender embraces. She, however, remained unmoved, and with a resolute countenance sometimes viewed the pile, and sometimes the assistants. Then loudly exclaiming 'Chiva! Chiva!' the name of one of her idols, she precipitated herself into the flames as the former had done. The other ladies soon followed after, some decently composed, and some with the most bewildered, downcast, sorrowful looks. One of them, snatched above the rest, ran to a Christian soldier, whom she beheld among the guards, and, banging about his neck, implored him to save her. The new convert, stunned with surprise, pushed the unfortunate lady from him; and shrieking aloud she fell into the fiery trench. The soldier, all shivering with terror, immediately retired, and a delirious fever ended his life in the following night. Though many of the unhappy victims discovered at first the utmost intrepidity, yet no sooner did they feel the flames, than they roared out in the most dreadful manner; and, welters over each other, strove to gain the brim of the pit; but in vain: the assistants forced them back with their poles, and heaped new fuel upon them. The next day the Bramins gathered the bones, and threw them into the sea. The pit was levelled, a temple built on the spot, and the deceased prince and his wives were reckoned among the deities. To conclude; this detestable cruelty has the appearance of the free choice of the women. But that freedom is only specious; it is almost impossible to avoid it.

And now behold;—and while he spoke he rose;
Now with extended arm the prospect shows,—

If they do, they must lie under perpetual infamy; and the relations, who esteem themselves highly disgraced; leave no means untried to oblige them to it. Princesses, and concubines of princes, however, are the only persons from whom this species of suicide is expected. When women of inferior rank submit to this abominable custom, they are only urged to it by the impulse of a barbarous pride and vanity of ostentation."—Extracted from a letter from Father Martin, on the mission of Comorandel, to Father de Villette, of the Society of Jesus, published at Paris in 1719.

Mr. Holwell, the advocate and warm admirer of the Gentoos, has taken great pains to vindicate the practice of this horrid sacrifice, and the principles upon which, he says, it is established. These we have given in the Inquiry at the end of this Lusid. His narrative is as follows:—

"We have been present," says he, "at many of these sacrifices; in some of the victims we have observed a pitiable dread, tremour and reluctance, that strongly spoke repentance for their declared resolution, but it was too late to retract or retreat; Bismoo was waiting for the spirit. If the self-doomed victim discovers want of courage and fortitude, she is with gentle force obliged to ascend the pile, where she is held down with long poles, held by men on each side of the pile, until the flames reach her; her screams and cries in the mean time being drowned amidst the deafening noise of loud music, and the acclamations of the multitude.—Others we have seen go through this Gery trial with most amazing steady, calm resolution, and joyous fortitude. It will not we hope be unacceptable, if we present our readers with an instance of the latter, which happened some years past at the East India company's factory at Coximbuzaar, in the time of sir Francis Russell's chiefship; the author and several other gentlemen of the factory were present, some of whom are now (1765) living.

"At five of the clock on the morning of Feb. 4, 1742-3, died Rhaam Chund, pundit of the Mahabarrator tribe, aged twenty-eight years: his widow, (for he had but one wife,) aged between seventeen and eighteen, as soon as he expired, disdaining to wait the term allowed her for reflection, immediately declared to the Bramins and witnesses present, her resolution to burn.—Lady Russell," says Mr. H. "all the merchants, and the victim's own relations, used every endeavour to dissuade her, but in vain. When urged to live on account of her three infant children, she replied. He that made them would take care of them; and when told she would not be permitted to burn, she affirmed that she would starve herself.

"The body of the deceased was carried down to the water side early the following morning; the widow followed about ten o'clock, accompanied by three very principal Bramins, her children, parents and relations, and a numerous concourse of people. The order of leave* for her burning did

* On this Mr. H. has the following note: "The Gentoos are not permitted to burn, without an order from the Mahomedan government, and this permission is commonly made a perquisite of."

" Behold these mountain-tops of various size
Blend their dim ridges with the fleecy skies;

not arrive till after one, and it was then brought by one of the soubah's own officers, who had orders to see that she burnt voluntarily. The time they waited for the order was employed in praying with the Bramins, and washing in the Ganges: as soon as it arrived she retired, and stayed for the space of half an hour in the midst of her female relations, among whom was her mother; she then divested herself of her bracelets and other ornaments, and tied them in a cloth which hung like an apron before her, and was conducted by her female relations to one corner of the pile: on the pile was an arched arbour, formed of dry sticks, boughs, and leaves, open only at one end to admit her entrance; in this the body of the deceased was deposited, his head at the end opposite to the opening. At the corner of the pile to which she had been conducted, the Bramin had made a small fire, round which she and the three Bramins sat for some minutes; one of them gave into her hand a leaf of the bale-tree (the wood commonly consecrated to form part of the funeral pile) with sundry things on it, which she threw into the fire; one of the others gave her a second leaf, which she held over the flame, whilst he dropped three times some ghee on it, which melted and fell into the fire (these two operations were preparatory symbols of her approaching dissolution by fire); and whilst they were performing this, the third Bramin read to her some portions of the Aughtorrah Bhade, and asked her some questions, to which she answered with a steady and serene countenance; but the noise was so great, we could not understand what she said, although we were within a yard of her:—these over, she was led with great solemnity three times round the pile, the Bramins reading before her: when she came the third time to the small fire, she stopped, took her rings off her toes and fingers, and put them to her other ornaments: here she took a solemn majestic leave of her children, parents, and relations; after which one of the Bramins dipped a large wick of cotton in some ghee, and gave it ready lighted into her hand, and led her to the open side of the arbour; there all the Bramins fell at her feet—after she had blessed them they retired weeping—by two steps she ascended the pile, and entered the arbour; on her entrance she made a profound reverence at the feet of the deceased, and advanced and seated herself by his head; she looked, in silent meditation, on his face for the space of a minute, then set fire to the arbour in three places: observing that she had set fire to leeward, and that the flames blew from her, instantly seeing her error, she rose, and set fire to windward, and resumed her station. Ensign Daniel with his cane separated the grass and leaves on the windward side, by which means we had a distinct view of her as she sat. With what dignity, with what an undaunted countenance she set fire to the pile the last time, and assumed her seat, can only be conceived, for words cannot convey a just idea of her.—The pile being of combustible matters, the supporters of the roof were presently consumed, and it tumbled upon her.

" There have been instances known, when the

Nature's rude wall, against the fierce Canas
They guard the fertile lawns of Malabar
Here from the mountain to the surgy main, 270
Fair as a garden, spreads the smiling plain:
And lo, the empress of the Indian powers,
There lofty Calicut resplendent towers;
Hers every fragrance of the spicy shore,
Hers every gem of India's countless store:
Great Samoreem, her lord's imperial style,
The mighty lord of India's utmost soil:
To him the king's their dutious tribute pay,
And at his feet confess their borrow'd sway.
Yet higher tower'd the monarch's ancient boast, 280
Of old one sovereign ruled the spacious coast,²⁸
A votive train, who brought the Koran's lore,
What time great Perimal the sceptre bore,
From blest Arabia's groves to India came:
Life were their words, their eloquence a flame
Of holy zeal: fired by the powerful strain
The lofty monarch joins the faithful train,
And vows, at fair Melina's shrine, to close
His life's mild eve in prayer and sweet repose.
Gifts he prepares to dock the prophet's tomb, 290
The glowing labours of the Indian loom,
Orix's spices and Golconda's gems;
Yet, ere the fleet th' Arabian ocean stems,
His final care his potent regions claim,
Nor his the transport of a father's name;
His servants now the regal purple wear,
And high enthroned the golden sceptres bear.
Proud Cochim one, and one fair Chale sways,
The spicy isle another lord obeys:
Coulam and Cananoor's luxurious fields, 300
And Cranganora to various lords he yields.
While these and others thus the monarch graced,
A noble youth his care unmindful pass'd:
Save Calicut, a city poor and small,
Though lordly now, no more remain'd to fall:
Grieved to behold such merit thus repaid,
The sapient youth the king of kings he made,
And honour'd with the name great Samoreem,
The lordly titled boast of power supreme.
And now great Perimal resigns his reign, 310
The blissful bowers of Paradise to gain:
Before the gale his gaudy navy flies,
And India sinks for ever from his eyes.
And soon to Calicut's commodious port
The fleets, deep-edging with the wave, resort:
Wide o'er the shore extend the warlike piles,
And all the landscape round luxurious smiles.
And now, her flag to every gale unfurl'd,
She towers the empress of the eastern world:
Such are the blessings sapient kings bestow, 320
And from thy stream such gifts, O Commerce, flow.

victim has, by Europeans, been forcibly rescued from the pile. It is currently said and believed (how true we will not aver) that the wife of Mr. Job Charnock was by him snatched from this sacrifice:—be this as it may, the outrage is considered by the Gentiles, an atrocious and wicked violation of their sacred rites and privileges."

²⁸ " Whatever Monzaida relates of the people and their manners, is confirmed by the histories of India, according to Barros, Castaneda, Maffens, and Ocorius. Our author, in this, imitates Homer and Virgil, who are fond of every opportunity to introduce any curious custom or vestige of antiquity."—Castera.

"From that sage youth, who first reign'd king of kings,

He now who sways the tribes of India springs.
Various the tribes, all led by fables vain,
Their rites the dotage of the dreamful brain.
All, save where Nature whispers modest care,
Naked they blacken in the sultry air.
The haughty nobles and the vulgar race
Never may join the conjugal embrace;
Nor may the stripling, nor the blooming maid, 390
Oh lost to joy, by cruel rites betray'd!
To spouse of other than their father's art;
At love's connubial shrine unite the heart:
Nor may their sons, the genius and the view
Confined and fetter'd, other art pursue.
Vile were the stain, and deep the foul disgrace,
Should other tribe touch one of noble race;
A thousand rites, and washings o'er and o'er,
Can scarce his tainted purity restore.

Poles the labouring lower clans are named; 340
By the proud Nayres the noble rank is claim'd;
The toils of culture and of art they scorn,
The warrior's plumes their haughty brows adorn;
The shining falchion brandish'd in the right,
Their left arm wields the target in the fight;
Of danger scornful, ever arm'd they stand
Around the king, a stern barbarian band.
Whate'er in India holds the sacred name
Of pious or lore, the Bramins claim:
In wildest rituals, vain and painful, lest, 350
Bramah their founder as a god, they boast
To crown their meal no meaneest life expires,
Pulse, fruit, and herbs alone their board requires:
Alone in lewdness riotous and free,
No spousal ties withhold, and no degree:
Lost to the heart-ties, to his neighbour's arms
The willing husband yields his spouse's charms:
In undear'd embraces free they blend;
Yet but the husband's kindred may ascend
The nuptial couch: alas, too blest, they know 360
Nor jealousy's suspense, nor burning woe;
The bitter drops which oft from dear affection flow.
But should my lips each wondrous scene unfold,
Which your glad eyes will soon amazed behold,
Oh, long before the various tale could run,
Deep in the west would sink yon eastern Sun.
In few—all wealth from China to the Nile,
All balsams, fruit, and gold on India's bosom smile."

While thus the Moor his faithful tale reveal'd,
Wide o'er the coast the voice of rumour swell'd;—
As first some upland vapour seems to float, 371
Small as the smoke of lonely shepherd cot,
Soon o'er the dales the rolling darkness spreads,
And wraps in hazy clouds the mountain heads,
The leafless forest and the utmost sea,
And wide its black wings hover o'er the sea;
The tear-dropt bough hangs weeping in the vale,
And distant navies rear the mist-wet sail;—
So Fame, increasing, loud and louder grew,
And to the sylvan camp resounding flew; 380
"A lordly band," she cries, "of warlike mien,
Of face and garb in India never seen,
Of tongue unknown, through gulfs undared before,
Unknown their aim, have reach'd the Indian shore."
To hail their chief the Indian lord prepares,
And to the fleet he sends his banner'd nayres,
As to the bay the nobles press along,
The wondering city pours th' unnumber'd throng.
And now brave Gama and his splendid train,
Himself adorn'd in all the pride of Spain, 390

In gilded barges slowly bend to shore,
While to the lute the gently-falling oar
Now breaks the surges of the briny tide,
And now the strokes the cold fresh stream divide.
Pleased with the splendour of the Lusian band,
On every bank the crowded thousands stand.
Begirt with high-plumed nobles, by the flood
The first great minister of India stood,
The actual his name in India's tongue;
To Gama swift the lordly regent sprung: 400
His open arms the valiant chief unfold,
And now he lends him on the shore of gold:
With pomp unwonted India's nobles greet
The fearless heroes of the warlike fleet.
A couch on shoulders borne, in India's mode,
With gold the canopy and purple glow'd,
Receives the Lusian captain; equal rides
The lordly actual, and onward guides,
While Gama's train, and thousands of the throng
Of India's sons, encircling pour along. 410
To bold discourse in various tongues they try;
In vain; the accents naremember'd die
Instant as utter'd. Thus on Babel's plain
Each builder heard his mate, and heard in vain.
Gama the while, and India's second lord,
Hold glad responses, as the various word
The faithful Moor unfolds. The city gate
They pass, and onward, tower'd in sumptuous state,
Before them now the sacred temple rose;
The portals wide the sculptured shrines disclose. 420
The chiefs advance, and, entered now, behold
The gods of wood, cold stone, and shining gold;
Various of figure, and of various face,
As the foul demon will'd the likeness base.
Taught to behold the rays of godhead shine
Fair-imag'd in the human face divine,
With sacred horror thrill'd, the Lusians view'd
The monster-forms, chimera-like, and rude.
Here spreading horns a human visage bore;
So frown'd stern Jove in Libya's fane of yore. 430
One body here two various faces rear'd;
So ancient Janus o'er his shrine appear'd.
A hundred arms another brandish'd wide;
So Titan's son the race of Heaven defied.
And here a dog his snarling tusks display'd;
Anubis thus in Memphis' hallowed shade
Grin'd horrible. With vile prostrations low
Before these shrines the blinded Indians bow.

³⁹ Chimera, a monster slain by Bellerophon.

First, dire Chimera's conquest was enjoy'd,
A mingled monster of no mortal kind;
Behind a dragon's fiery tail was spread,
A goat's rough body born a lion's head;
Her pitchy nostrils flaky flames expire,
Her gaping throat emits infernal fire.

Pope's ll. vi.

⁴⁰ Briareus.

⁴¹ In this instance, Camoëns has with great art deviated from the truth of history. As it was the great purpose of his hero to propagate the law of Heaven in the east, it would have been highly absurd to have represented Gama and his attendants as on their knees in a Pagu temple. This, however, was the case. "Gama, who had been told," says Georius, "that there were many Christians in India, conjectured that the temple, to which the actual led him, was a Christian church. At their entrance they were met by four priests

And now again the splendid pomp proceeds;
 To India's lord the haughty regent leads. 440
 To view the glorious leader of the fleet,
 Increasing thousands swell o'er every street;
 High o'er the roofs the struggling youths ascend,
 The hoary fathers o'er the portals bend,
 The windows sparkle with the glowing blaze
 Of female eyes, and mingling diamonds' rays.
 And now the train, with solemn state and slow,
 Approach the royal gate, through many a row
 Of fragrant wood walks, and of balmy bowers,
 Radiant with fruitage, ever gay with flowers. 450
 Spacious the dome its pillar'd grandeur spread,
 Nor to the burning day high tower'd the head;
 The citron groves around the windows glow'd,
 And branching palms their grateful shade bestow'd;
 The yellow light a pleasing radiance cast;
 The marble walls Dædalian sculpture graced.
 Here India's fate, from darkest times of old⁴⁷,
 The wondrous artist on the stone enrol'd;

who seem'd to make crosses on their foreheads. The walls were painted with many images. In the middle was a little round chapel, in the wall of which, opposite to the entrance, stood an image which could hardly be discovered; Krat enim locus ita ab omni solis radio seclusus, ut vix aliquis malignæ lucis splendor in eam penetraret. The four priests ascending, some entered the obel by a little brass door, and, pointing to the benighted image, cried aloud, 'Mary, Mary.' The casual and his attendants prostrated themselves on the ground, while the Lusians on their bended knees adored the blessed Virgin. Virginemque Dei matrem more nostris usitato venerantur.—Thus Osorius. Another writer says, that a Portuguese sailor, having some doubt, exclaimed, "If this be the Devil's image, I however worship God."

⁴⁸ The description of the palace of the zamorim, situated among aromatic groves, is according to history; the embellishment of the walls is in imitation of Virgil's description of the palace of king Latinus:

*Tectum augustum, ingens, centum sublime co-
 Urbe fuit summa, &c.* [Lucretius,
 The palace built by Picus, vast and proud,
 Supported by a hundred pillars stood,
 And round encompass'd with a rising wood.
 The pile o'erlook'd the town, and drew the sight,
 Surprised at once with reverence and delight. . . .
 Above the portal, carved in cedar wood,
 Placed in their ranks, their godlike grandfairs stood.
 Old Saturn, with his crooked scythe on high;
 And Itales, that led the colony;
 And ancient Janus, with his double face,
 And bunch of keys, the porter of the place.
 There stood Sabinus, planter of the vines,
 On a short pruning-hook his head reclines
 And studiously surveys his generous wines;
 Then warlike kings who for their country fought,
 And honourable wounds from battle brought.
 Around the posts hung helmets, darts, and spears;
 And captive chariots, axes, shields, and bars;
 And broken beaks of ships, the trophies of their wars.
 Above the rest, as chief of all the band,
 Was Picos placed, a buckler in his hand;
 His other waved a long divining wand,
 Girt in his gable gown the hero sat—
 Dryd. Æn. vii.

Here o'er the meadows, by Hydaspes' stream,
 In fair array the marshal'd legions seem: 460
 A youth of gleeful eye the squadrons led,
 Smooth was his cheek, and glow'd with purest red;
 Around his spear the curling vine-leaves waved;
 And by a streamlet of the river laved,
 Behind her founder, Nyssa's walls were rear'd⁴⁷;
 So breathing life the ruddy god appear'd,
 Had Semele⁴⁸ beheld the smiling boy.
 The mother's heart had proudly heav'd with joy.
 Unnumber'd here were seen th' Assyrian throng,
 That drank whole rivers as they march'd along: 470
 Each eye seem'd earnest on their warrior queen,
 High was her port, and furious was her mien;
 Her valour only equal'd by her lust;
 Fast by her side her courser paw'd the dust,
 Her son's vile rival⁴⁹; reeking to the plain
 Fell the hot sweat-drops as he champ'd the rein,
 And here display'd, most glorious to behold,
 The Grecian banners, opening many a fold,
 Seem'd trembling on the gale; at distance far
 The Ganges laved the wide-extended war⁴⁷. 480
 Here the blue marble gives the helmet's gleam,
 Here from the cuirass shoots the golden beam.
 A proud-eyed youth, with palms unnumber'd gay,
 Of the bold veterans led the brown array;
 Scornful of mortal birth enshrined he rode,
 Call'd Jove his father⁵⁰, and assumed the god.

While dauntless Gama and his train survey'd
 The sculptured walls, the lofty rogent said;
 "For nobler wars than these you wondering see
 That ample space th' eternal Fates decree: 490
 Sacred to these th' unpleur'd wall remains,
 Unconscious yet of vanquish'd India's chains.
 Assured we know the awful day shall come,
 Big with tremendous fate, and India's doom.
 The sons of Bramah, by the god their sire
 Taught to illumine the dread divining fire,
 From the drear mansions of the dark abodes
 Awake the dead, or call th' infernal gods;
 Then round the daime, while glittering ghastly blue,

Behold the future scene arise to view. 500
 The sons of Bramah in the magic hour
 Beheld the foreign foe tremendous lour;
 Unknown their tongue, their face, and strange attire,
 And their bold eye-balls burn'd with warlike ire:
 They saw the chief o'er prostrate India rear
 The glittering terrors of his awful spear.

⁴⁷ This is in the perspective manner of the beautiful descriptions of the figures on the shield of Achilles. II. xviii.

⁴⁸ The Theban Bacchus, to whom the Greek fabulists ascribed the Indian expedition of Semotris or Osiris king of Egypt.

⁴⁹ "The infamous passion of Semiramis for a horse, has all the air of a fable invented by the Greeks to signify the extreme libidiny of that queen. Her incestuous passion for her son Nynias, however, is confirmed by the testimony of the best authors. Shocked at such a horrid amour, Nynias ordered her to be put to death."—Cætera.

⁵⁰ The son met of Olympias, on this pretension of her son Alexander, was admired by the ancients. "This bot-headed youth, forsooth, cannot be at rest unless he embroil me in a quarrel with Juno."—Quint. Curt.

But swift behind these wintry days of woe
A spring of joy arose in liveliest glow,
Such gentle manners leagu'd with wisdom reign'd
In the dread victors, and their rage restrain'd : 510
Beneath their away majestic, wise, and mild,
Proud of her victors' laws, thrice happier Indis
So to the prophets of the Bramin train [smiled.
The visions rose²¹, that never rose in vain.²²

The regent ceased ; and now with solemn pace
The chiefs approach the regal hall of grace.
The tap'stried walls with gold were pictured o'er,
And flowery velvet spread the marble floor²³ :
In all the grandeur of the Indian state,
High on a blazing couch the monarch sat, 520
With starry gems the purple curtains shined,
And rhy flowers and golden foliage twined
Around the silver pillars : high o'er head
The golden canopy its radiance shed :

²¹ The pretensions to, and belief in, divination and magic are found in the history of every nation and age. The sources from whence those opinions sprung, may be reduced to these: The strong desire which the human mind has to pry into futurity: the consciousness of its own weakness; and the instinctive belief, if it may be so called, in invisible agents. On these foundations it is easy for the artful to take every advantage of the simple and credulous. A knowledge of the virtues of plants, and of some chemical preparations, appeared as altogether supernatural to the great bulk of mankind in former ages. And such is the proneness of the ignorant mind to resolve, what it does not comprehend, into the marvellous, that even the common medicinal virtues of plants were esteemed as magical, and dependent upon the incantation which was muttered over the application of them. But we must not suppose that all the professors of magical knowledge were determined cheats and conscious impostors. So far from such idea of the futility of their pretended art, they themselves were generally the dupes of their own prejudices, of prejudices imbibed in their most early years, and to which the veneration of their oldest age was devoutly paid. Nor were the priests of savage tribes the only professors and students of enchantment. The very greatest names of Pagan antiquity, during the first centuries of the Christian era, firmly believed in divination, and were earnestly devoted to the pursuit of it. If Cicero, once or twice in his life, consulted the flight of birds, or the manner in which chickens picked up their corn; the great philosopher Marcus Aurelius Antoninus carried his veneration for the occult sciences much further. When he might have attacked the Quadi and Marcomanni with every prospect of success, he delayed to do it, till the magical sacrifice prescribed by Alexander of Pontus, the magician, could be performed. But when this was performed, the barbarians happened to be greatly reinforced, and Antoninus was defeated, with the loss of 20,000 men. Yet his devout observation of such rites never suffered the least abatement. And the enlarged and philosophical mind of the accomplished Julian, by some called the Apostate, was, amid all his other great avocations, most assiduously devoted to the study of magic.

²² According to Orosius.

Of cloth of gold the sovereign's mantle shone,
And his high turban flamed with precious stow.
Sublime and awful was his sapient mien,
Lordly his posture, and his brow serene.
A hoary air submits on headed knee,
(Low bow'd his head,) in India's luxury, 530
A leaf²⁴, all fragrance to the glowing taste,
Before the king each little while replaced.
The patriarch Bramin, soft and slow he rose,
Advancing now to lordly Gama bows,
And leads him to the throne; in silent state
The monarch's nod assigns the captain's seat ;
The Lusian train in humbler distance stand :
Silent the monarch eyes the foreign band,
With awful mien; when valiant Gama broke
The sulema pause, and thus majestic spoke : 540
" From where the crimson Sun of evening laves
His blazing chariot in the western waves,
I come, the herald of a mighty king,
And holy vows of lasting friendship bring
To thee, O monarch, for resounding fame
Far to the west has borne thy princely name,—
All India's sovereign thou! Nor deem I see,
Great as thou art, the humble suppliant's due.
Whate'er from western Tagus to the Nile
Inspires the monarch's wish, the merchant's toil,
From where the north-star gleams o'er seas of frow,
To Ethiopia's utmost burning coast, 550
Whate'er the sea, whate'er the land bestow,
In my great monarch's realm unbounded flow.
Pleased thy high grandeur and renown to hear,
My sovereign offers friendship's bands sincere :
Mutual he asks thou, unok'd of disguise ;
Then every bounty of the smiling skies
Shower'd on his shore and thine, in mutual flow,
Shall joyful commerce on each shore bestow. 560
Our might in war, what vanquish'd nations fell
Beneath our spear, let trembling Afric tell ;
Survey my floating towers, and let thine ear,
Dread as it roars, our battle thunder hear.
If friendship then thy honest wish explore,
That dreadful thunder on thy foes shall roar.
Our banners o'er the crimson field shall sweep,
And our tall navies ride the foamy deep,
Till not a foe against thy land shall rear
Th' invading bowsprit or the hostile spear ; 570
My king, thy brother, thus thy wars shall join,
The glory his, the gainful harvest thine."

Brave Gama spake. The Pagan king replies :
" From lands which now behold the morning rise,

²³ The betel. This is a particular luxury of the east. The Indians powder it with the fruit of areca, or drunken date-tree, and chew it, swallowing the juice. Its virtues, they say, preserve the teeth, strengthen the stomach, and incite to venery. It is so esteemed in India, that its origin is derived from Heaven. Degastri, one of the wives of the celestial spirits, carried Argioetia, an Indian, one day to Heaven, from whence he stole the betel, and planted it on Earth. And for this reason, he who cultures the betel must, as necessary to its thriving, steal the stock which he plants. The leaf is so like our common ivy, that some Indian ambassadors at Lisbon have used the latter mixed with the cypress apple instead of the areca, and have said, that in virtue it was much the same with the Indian plant. Our dictionaries call the betel, the bastard pepper.

While eve's dim clouds the Indian sky enfold,
 Glorious to us an offer'd league we hold.
 Yet shall our will in silence rest unknown,
 Till what your hand, and who the king you own,
 Our council deeply weigh. Let joy the while
 And the glad feast the fleeting hours beguile. 580
 Ah! to the wearied mariner, long tost
 O'er briny waves, how sweet the long-sought coast!
 The night now darkens; on the friendly shore
 Let soft repose your wearied strength restore,
 Assured an answer from our lips to bear, [hear.
 Which, not displeas'd, your sovereign lord shall More now we add not.—" From the hall of state
 Withdrawn, they now approach the regent's gate;
 The sumptuous banquet glows; all India's pride
 Heap'd on the board the royal feast supplied. 590
 Now o'er the dew-drops of the eastern lawn
 Gleam'd the pale rad'ance of the star of dawn,
 The valiant Gama on his couch reposed,
 And balmy rest each Lusian eye-lid closed;
 When the high casual, watchful to fulfil
 The cautious mandates of his sovereign's will,
 In secret converse with the Moor retires,
 And, earnest, much of Lusur's sons inquires; 598
 What laws, what holy rites, what monarch sway'd
 The warlike race? When thus the just Monzaid:
 "The land from whence these warriors well I know,
 (To neighbouring earth my hapless birth I owe,) Illustrious Spain, along whose western shores
 Gray-dappled eve the dying twilight pours—
 A wondrous prophet gave their holy lore,
 The godlike seer a virgin-mother bore,
 Th' Eternal Spirit on the human race,
 So be they taught, bestow'd such awful grace.
 In war unmatched they rear the trophy crest:
 What terrors oft have thrill'd my infant breast!³¹
 When their brave deeds my wondering fathers told;

611

How from the lawns where, crystalline and cold
 The Guadiana rolls his murmuring tide;
 And those where, purple by the Tago's side,
 The lengthening vineyards glisten o'er the field;
 Their warlike sires my routed sires expell'd.
 Nor paused their rage; the furious seas they braved;
 Nor loftiest walls nor castled mountains saved;
 Round Afric's thousand bays their navies rode,
 And their proud armies o'er our armies trod. 620
 Nor less let Spain through all her kingdoms own,
 O'er other foes their dauntless valour shone:
 Let Gaul confess, her mountain ramparts wild,
 Nature in vain the hoar Pyreneans piled.

³¹ The tenour of this first conversation between the zamorin and Gama is according to the truth of history.

³² The enthusiasm with which Monzaida, a Moor, talks of the Portuguese, may perhaps to some appear unnatural. Camoëns seems to be aware of this, by giving a reason for that enthusiasm in the first speech of Monzaida to Gama;

Heaven sent you here for some great work divine,
 And Heaven inspires my breast your sacred toils
 to join.

That this Moor did conceive a great affection for Gama, whose religion he embraced, and to whom he proved of the utmost service, is according to the truth of history.

No foreign lance could o'er their rage restrain,
 Unconquer'd still the warrior race remain.
 More would you hear, secure your care may trust
 The answer of their lips, so nobly just;
 Conscious of inward worth, of manners plain,
 Their manly souls the gild-d lie disdain. 630
 Then let thine eyes their lordly might admire,
 And mark the thunder of their arms of fire:
 The shore with trembling hears the dreadful sound,
 And rampired walls lie smoking on the ground.
 Speed to the fleet; their arts, their prudence weigh,
 How wise in peace, in war how dread, survey."

With keen desire the craftful Pagan burn'd;
 Soon as the morn in orient blaze return'd,
 To view the fleet his splendid train prepares;
 And now attended by the lordly mayres, 640
 The shore they cover; now the oar-men sweep
 The foamy surface of the azure deep:
 And now brave Paulus gives the friendly hand,
 And high on Gama's lofty deck they stand.
 Bright to the day the purple sail-cloths glow,
 Wide to the gale the silken ensigns flow;
 The pictured flags display the warlike strife;
 Bold scream the heroes as inspired by life.
 Here arm to arm the single combat strains,
 Here burns the battle on the tented plains. 650
 General and fierce; the meeting lances thrust,
 And the black blood seems smoking on the dust.
 With earnest eyes the wandering regent views
 The pictured warriors, and their history sees.
 But now the ruddy juice, by Noah found³³,
 In foaming goblets circled swiftly round,
 And o'er the deck swift rose the festive board;
 Yet, smiling oft, refrains the Indian lord:
 His faith forbade with other tribe to join
 The sacred meal, esteem'd a rite divine³⁴. 660
 In bold vibrations, thrilling on the ear,
 The battle sounds the Lusian trumpets rear;
 Loud burst the thunders of the arms of fire,
 Slow round the sails the clouds of smoke aspire,
 And, rolling their dark volumes o'er the day,
 The Lusian war, in dreadful pomp, display.
 In deepest thought the careful regent weigh'd
 The pomp and power at Gama's nod betray'd,
 Yet seem'd alone in wonder to behold
 The glorious heroes and the wars half told. 670
 In silent poesy—Swift from the board
 High crown'd with wine, arose the Indian lord;
 Both the bold Gamas, and their generous peer,
 The brave Coelho, rose, prepared to hear,
 Or, ever courteous, give the meet reply:
 First and inquiring was the regent's eye:
 The warlike image of a hoary sire,
 Whose name shall live till Earth and Time ex-
 pite,

His wonder fix'd; and more than human glow'd
 The hero's look; his robes of Grecian mode; 680
 A bough, his ensign, in his right he waved,
 A leafy bough—But I, fond man deprav'd!
 Where would I speed, as madding in a dream,
 Without your aid, ye Nymphs of Tago's stream!

³³ Gen. ix. 20. And Noah began to be an husbandman; and he planted a vineyard, and he drank of the wine, &c.

³⁴ The opinion of the sacredness of the table is very ancient in the east. It is plainly to be discovered in the history of Abraham and the Hebrew patriarchs.

Or yours, ye Dryads of Mondego's bowers !
 Without your aid how vain my wearied powers !
 Long yet and various lies my arduous way
 Through luring tempests and a boundless sea.
 Oh then, propitious hear your son implore,
 And guide my vessel to the happy shore. 690
 Ah! see how long what perilous days, what woes
 On many a foreign coast around me rose,
 As dragg'd by Fortune's chariot wheels along
 I sooth'd my sorrows with the warlike song³⁰;
 Wide ocean's horrors lengthening now around,
 And now my footstep trod the hostile ground;
 Yet mid each danger of tumultuous war
 Your Lusian heroes ever claim'd my care :
 As Canace of old, ere self-destroy'd³¹,
 One hand the pen, and one the sword employ'd.
 Degraded now, by poverty abhorr'd, 701
 The guest dependent at the lordling's board :
 Now blest with all the wealth fond hope could crave,
 Soon I beheld that wealth beneath the wave³²
 For ever lost; myself escaped alone,
 On the wild shore all-friendless, hopeless, thrown;
 My life, like Judah's Heaven-doom'd king of yore³³,
 By miracle prolong'd; yet not the more
 To end my sorrows: woes succeeding woes
 Belied my earnest hopes of sweet repose : 710
 In place of hay around my brows to shed
 Their sacred honours, o'er my destined head
 Foul calumny proclaim'd the fraudulent tale,
 And left me mourning in a dreary jail³⁴.
 Such was the meed, alas ! on me bestow'd,
 Bestow'd by those for whom my numbers glow'd,
 By those who to my toils their laurel honours owed.
 Ye gentle Nymphs of Tago's rosy bowers,
 Ah, see what letter'd patron-lords are yours ! 720
 Dull as the herds that graze their flowery dales,
 To them in vain the injured Muse bewails:
 No fostering care their barbarous hands bestow,
 Though to the Muse their fairest fame they owe.
 Ah, could my prove the future priest of fame
 Taught by my fate: yet will I not disclaim
 Your smiles, ye Muses of Mondego's shade,
 Be still my dearest joy your happy aid !
 And hear my vow: Nor king, nor loftiest peer
 Shall e'er from me the song of flattery bear;
 Nor crafty tyrant, who in office reigns, 730
 Smiles on his king, and binds the land in chains;

³⁰ Though Camoëns began his Lusiad in Portugal, almost the whole of it was written while on the ocean, while in Africa, and in India. See his Life.

³¹ Canace, daughter of Eolus. Her father having thrown her incestuous child to the dogs, sent her a sword, with which she slew herself. In Ovid she writes an epistle to her husband-brother, where she thus describes herself:

Dextra tenet calamum, strictum tenet altera fer-rum;

³² See the Life of Camoëns.

³³ Hezekiah. See Isaiah xxxviii.

³⁴ This, and the whole paragraph from

Degraded now, by poverty abhorr'd—

alludes to his fortunes in India. The latter circumstance relates particularly to the base and inhuman treatment he received on his return to Goa, after his unhappy shipwreck. See his Life.

His king's worst foe:—nor he whose raging ire,
 And raging wants, to shape his course, conspire;
 True to the clamours of the blinded crowd,
 Their changeful Proteus, insolent and loud:
 Nor he whose honest mien secures applause,
 Grave though he seem, and father of the laws,
 Who, but half-patriot, niggardly denies
 Each other's merit, and withholds the prize:
 Who spurns the Muse³⁵, nor feels the raptur'd
 strain, 740

Useless by him esteem'd, and idly vain:
 For him, for these, no wreath my hand shall twine;
 On other brows th' immortal rays shall shine:
 He who the path of honour ever trod,
 True to his king, his country, and his God;
 On his blest head my hands shall fix the crown,
 Wove of the deathless laurels of renown.

³⁵ Similarity of condition has produced similarity of sentiment in Camoëns and Spenser. Each was the ornament of his country and of his age; and each was cruelly neglected by the men of power, who, in truth, were incapable to judge of their merit, or to relish their writings. We have seen several of the strictures of Camoëns on the barbarous nobility of Portugal. The similar complaints of Spenser will show that neglect of genius, however, was not confined to the court of Lisbon.

O grief of griefs! O gall of all good hearts!
 To see that Virtue should despised be
 Of such as first were raised for Virtue's parts,
 And now broad spreading like an aged tree,
 Let none shout up that sigh them planted by.
 O let not those of whom the Muse is scorned,
 Alive or dead be by the Muse adorned.

Ruins of Time.

It is thought lord Burleigh, who withheld the bounty intended by queen Elizabeth, is here meant. But he is more clearly stigmatized in these remarkable lines, where the misery of dependence on court-favour is painted in colours which must recall several strokes of the Lusiad to the mind of the reader.

Full little knowest thou that hast not tried,
 What bell it is, in suing long to bide;
 To lose good days, that might be better spent,
 To waste long nights in pensive discontent;
 To speed to day, to be put back to-morrow,
 To feed on hope, to pine with fear and sorrow;
 To have thy princess' grace, yet want her peer's;
 To have thy asking, yet wait many years;
 To fret thy soul with crosses and with cares;
 To eat thy heart through comfortless despair;
 To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,
 To spend, to give, to want, to be undone.

Mother Hubbard's Tale.

These lines exasperated still more the inelegant, the illiberal Burleigh. So true is the observation of Mr. Hughes, that "even the signs of a miserable man are sometimes resented as an affront by him that is the occasion of them."

The arrival of Gama in India.—In several parts of the Lusiad the Portuguese poet has given ample proof that he could catch the genuine spirit of Homer and Virgil. The seventh Lusiad throughout bears a striking resemblance to the seventh and eighth Æneid. Much of the action is naturally the same; Æneas lands in Italy, and Gama to India; but the conduct of Camoëns, in his masterly imitation of his great model, particularly demands observation. Had Statius or Ovid described the landing or reception of Æneas, we should undoubtedly have been presented with pictures different from those of the pencil of Virgil. We should have seen much bustle and fire, and perhaps much smoke and false dignity. Yet if we may judge from the Odyssey, Homer, had he written the Æneid, would have written as the Roman poet wrote, would have presented us with a calm majestic narrative, till every circumstance was explained, and then would have given the concluding books of hurry and fire. In this manner has Virgil written, and in this manner has Camoëns followed him, as far as the different nature of his subject would allow. In Virgil, king Latinus is informed by prodigies and prophecy of the fate of his kingdom, and of the new-landed stranger. Æneas enters Latium. The dinner on the grass, and the prophecy of famine turned into a jest. He sends ambassadors to Latinus, whose palace is described. The embassy is received in a friendly manner. Juno, enraged, calls the assistance of the Scends, and the truce is broken. Æneas, admonished in a dream, seeks the aid of Evander. The voyage up the Tiber, the court of Evander, and the sacrifices in which he was employed, are particularly described. In all this there is no blaze of fire, no earnest hurry. These are judiciously reserved for their after and proper place. In the same manner Camoëns lands his hero in India; and though in some circumstances the resemblance to Virgil is evident, yet he has followed him as a free imitator, who was conscious of his own strength, and not as a copyist. He has not deserved that shrewd satire which Mr. Pope, not unjustly, throws on Virgil himself. "Had the galley of Sergestus been broken," says he, "if the chariot of Eumelus had not been demolished? or Mnestheus been cast from his helm, had not the other been thrown from his seat?" In a word, that calm dignity of poetical narrative which breathes through the seventh and eighth Æneid, is judiciously copied, as most proper for the subject; and with the hand of a master characteristically sustained throughout the seventh book of the poem which celebrates the discovery of the eastern world.

INQUIRY

RELIGIOUS TENETS AND PHILOSOPHY

OF THE

BRAMINS.

An account of the celebrated sect of the Bramins, and an inquiry into their theology and philosophy, are undoubtedly requisite in the notes of a poem which celebrates the discovery of the eastern world; of a poem where their rites and opinions are necessarily mentioned. To place the subject in the clearest and most just view, as far as his abilities will serve him, is the intention of the translator. If he cannot be so warm in his admiration of the religious philosophy of the Hindoos, as some late writers have been, some circumstances of that philosophy, as delivered by themselves, it is hoped, will very fully exculpate his coolness.

But before we endeavour to trace the religion and philosophy of the Bramins by the lights of antiquity, and the concurrent testimony of the most learned travellers who have visited India since the discovery of that country by the hero of the Lusiad, it will not be improper to pay particular attention to the systematical accounts of the doctrines of the Gentoos, which have lately been given to the public by Mr. Holwell and Mr. Dow. A particular attention is due to these gentlemen: each of them brands all the received accounts of the Gentoos as most ignorantly fallacious, and each of them claims an opportunity of knowledge enjoyed by no traveller before himself. Each of them has been in Asia, in the East India company's service, and each of them assures us that he has conversed with the most learned of the Bramins.

Mr. Holwell's system we have endeavoured with the utmost exactness thus to abridge. "It is an allowed truth," (says he, chap. viii. p. 3.) "that there never was yet any system of theology broached to mankind, whose first professors and propagators did not announce its descent from God; and God forbid we should doubt of, or impeach the divine origin of any of them! for such eulogium they possibly all merited in their primitive purity, could they be traced up to that state."

Again, in p. 30. "The religions which manifestly carry the divine stamp of God, are, first, that which Bramah was appointed to declare to the ancient Hindoos; secondly, that law which Moses was destined to deliver to the ancient Hebrews; and thirdly, that which Christ was delegated to preach to the latter Jews and Gentiles, or the Pagan world."

The divine economy of these different revelations is thus accounted for by our author: "Let us see how far the similitude of doctrines, (p. 72.) preached first by Bramah, and afterwards Christ, at the distinct period of above 3000 years, corroborate our conclusions; if they mutually support each other, it amounts to proof of the authenticity of both. Bramah preached the existence of one only, eternal God, his first created angelic being, Birmah, Birtnoo, Sieb, and Moissnoor; the pure Gospel dispensation teaches one only eternal God, his first begotten of the father Christ; the angelic beings Gabriel, Michael, and Satan, all these corresponding under different names minutely with each other, in their respective dignities, functions, and characters. Birmah is made prince and governor of all the angelic bands, and the occasional vicegerent of the Eternal One; Christ is invested with all power by the Father; Birtnoo is destined to works of power and glory, so is Christ; Birtnoo to acts of benevolence, so is Gabriel; Sieb to acts of terror and destruction, so is Michael—Moissnoor is represented as a prime angel, and the instigator and Rader of the revolt in Heaven, so is the Satan of the Gospel."—After much more in this strain, our author adds, "It is no violence to faith (p. 80.) if we believe that Birmah and Christ are one and the same individual celestial being, the first begotten of the Father, who had most probably appeared at different periods of time, in distinct parts of the Earth, under various mortal forms of humanity and demarcations."—Having thus seen who Birmah is, we now proceed to our author's account of the scriptures which he delivered to mankind. Christ, he tells us, (p. 80.) styled Birmah by the easterns, delivered the great primitive truths to man at his creation: but these truths being effaced by time and the industrious influence of Satan, a written record became necessary, and Bramah accordingly gave the Shastah. This, we are told (ch. iv. p. 12.), was at the beginning of the present age (or world) when Bramah having assumed the human form, and the government of Indostan, translated the Chatah Bhade Shastah from the language of angels into the Sanscrit, a tongue at that time universally known in India. "These scriptures," says our author, (ch. viii. p. 71.) "contains, to a moral certainty, the original doctrines and terms of restoration, delivered from God himself by the mouth of his first created Birmah to mankind at his first creation in the form of man." And in p. 74, he tells us that "the mission of Christ is the strongest confirmation of the authenticity and divine origin of the Chatah Bhade Shastah of Bramah; the doctrines of both," according to our author, "being originally the same."

We now proceed to give an account of the system which Mr. H. has laid before the public as the pure and sublime doctrine of the Brahmans.

God is one; the creator of all that is; he governs by a general providence, the result of fixed principles: it is vain and criminal to inquire into the nature of his existence, or by what laws he governs. In the fullness of time he resolved to participate his glory and essence with beings capable of feeling and sharing his beatitude, and of administering to his glory. He willed, and they were—he formed them in part of his own essence; capable of perfection, but with the powers (as Mr. Holwell terms it) of imperfection, both depending on their voluntary election. God has no prescience of the actions of free agents, but he knows the thought of every being the moment it is conceived. He first created Birmah; then Bistnoo, Sieb, and Moissasoor; then all the ranks of angelic beings. He made Birmah his vicegerent and prince of all spirits, whom he put in subjection under him; Bistnoo and Sieb were his coadjutors.—Over every angelic band he placed a chief. Moissasoor, chief of the first band, led the song of praise and adoration to the Creator, and the song of obedience to Birmah, his first created. Joy compassed the throne of God for millions of years. Envy and jealousy at last took possession of Moissasoor, and Rheabon the angel next to him in dignity. They withheld their obedience from God; denied submission to his vicegerent, and drew a great part of the angelic host into their rebellion. God sent Birmah, Bistnoo, and Sieb, to admonish and persuade them to return to their duty, but this mercy only hardened them. The Eternal One then commanded Sieb to go armed with his omnipotence, to drive them from Heaven, and plunge them into interminable darkness for ever. Here they groaned 425,000,000 years. (See ch. iv. p. 47 and 119.) Birmah, Bistnoo, Sieb, and the faithful angels, never ceased imploring the Eternal One for their pardon and restoration. By their intercession he at length relented. He declared his gracious intentions; and, having given his power to Birmah, he retired into himself, and became invisible to all the angelic host for the space of 5000 years. At the end of this period he again appeared, and, resuming his throne, proposed the creation of the material universe, which was to consist of fifteen regions or planets. In these the delinquent spirits were to be united to mortal bodies, in which they were to undergo a state of purgation, probation, and purification, and to suffer natural evils, according to the degrees of their original guilt. Bistnoo, by God's command, created the material universe, and united the fallen spirits to mortal bodies. Eighty-nine transmigrations form the term of purgation and trial. Eighty-seven of these are through various animals, according to the original degree of turpitude. The less criminal spirits animate bees, singing birds, and other innocent creatures; while those of deeper guilt become wolves and tigers. "And it shall be," (says Mr. H.'s version of that part of the Shastah,) "that when the rebellious Dehtah (spirit) shall have accomplished and passed through the eighty-seven transmigrations, they shall, from my abundant favour, (it is the Deity who speaks,) animate a new form, and thou, Bistnoo, shalt call it Chojj (i. e. the cow). And it shall be, that when the mortal body of the Chojj shall by a natural decay become inanimate, the delinquent Dehtah shall, from my more abundant favour, animate the form of Mhurd (i. e. man) and in this form I will enlarge their intellectual powers, even as when I first created them free; and in this form shall be their chief state of their trial and probation." In the next sentence the cow is ordered to be deemed sacred and holy¹.

Of the fifteen planets made for the reception of the rebel spirits, seven are called lower, and seven higher, than the Earth. The lower ones are the regions of punishment and purgation; our Earth, the principal seat of probation; and the higher ones are the regions of purification, from whence the approved spirits are again received into the divine presence in the highest Heaven. Mr. Holwell's Shastah says, that God, "although he could not force the effect of his mercy on the future conduct of the delinquents, yet, unwilling to relinquish the hopes of their repentance, he declared his will."—The principal terms of acceptance were, that they should do all good offices to, and love one another. Unnatural lust and self-murder are declared as crimes for which no more probation shall be allowed, but the spirit who offends in these is to be plunged into the Onderah, or intense darkness, for ever. What pity is it that these crimes, against which "th' Eternal has fixt his canon," should be mentioned together with the absurdities which follow!—Whatever animal destroys the mortal form of another, be it that of gnat, bee, cow, or man, its spirit shall be plunged into the Onderah for a space*, and from thence shall begin snow the eighty-nine transmigrations, notwithstanding whatever number it may have formerly completed.

¹ Mr. H. tells us that, when a cow suffers death by accident or violence, or through the neglect of the owner, it is esteemed a sign of God's wrath against the spirit of the proprietor, and as a warning that at the dissolution of his human form, he shall be obliged to undergo anew all the eighty-nine transmigrations. "Hence it is," says Mr. H., "that not only mourning and lamentation ensue on the violent death of either cow or calf, but the proprietor is frequently enjoined, and oftener voluntarily undertakes, a three years pilgrimage in expiation of his crime. Forfeaking his friends, family, and relations, he subsists during his pilgrimage on charity and alms.—It is worthy remark, that the penitent thus circumstanced ever meets with the deepest commiseration, as his state is deemed truly pitiable. Two instances have fallen within our own knowledge, where the penitents have devoted themselves to the service of God, and a pilgrimage during the term of their life."

The time which the purgation and trial of the rebel spirits is to continue is also ascertained. It is divided into four jogues, or ages, which in reality are new creations of the universe. Three of these are past—The suttee jogue, or age of truth, lasted 3,200,000 years. In this period the life of man was 100,000 years. The tirta jogue continued 1,600,000 years, in which the life of man consisted of 10,000 years. The devapaur jogue was shortened to 800,000, and the human life to 1000 years. The last, the kules jogue, or age of pollution, is to expire after a period of 400,000 years. In this, human life is reduced to 100 years, and the man is deemed to hasten his exit who dies under that number. In the present A. D. 1777, 4877 years of this age have only elapsed, and therefore 539,123 are yet to come.

When Bistnoo proposed the terms of mercy to the fallen spirits in the Onderah, all except Moissasoor, Rhasoon, and the other leaders of the rebellion, accepted, with the utmost joy, of the divine favour. Moissasoor and his party were permitted to range through the Earth and the lower regions of punishment, and to continue their temptations †.

* "The obvious construction of the mouth and digestive faculties of man," says Mr. H., "mark him destined to feed on fruits, herbage, and milk." Anatomists, however, assert the very contrary. And the various allotment of food in various countries implies the approbation of Nature. In the warmer climates, the most cooling oils and fruits, &c. are in the greatest abundance. Where colder regions require the nutritive strength of animal food, bees and sheep, &c. are in the greatest plenty and perfection; and sea fish, of all elements the sharpest and hottest in their salts, are profusely thrown around the cold shores of the North. The Gentoo, who live solely upon rice and vegetables, are, of all mankind, the feeblest, most short-lived, and pusillanimous.

† "When we peruse some portions of Milton's account of the rebellion and expulsion of the angels," says Mr. H., "we are almost led to imagine, on comparison, that Brahmah and he were both instructed by the same spirit; had not the soaring, ungovernable, inventive genius of the latter, engaged him to illustrate his poem with scenes too gross and ludicrous, as well as manifestly repugnant to, and inconsistent with, sentiments we ought to entertain of an Omnipotent Being (as before remarked), in which we rather fear he was inspired by one of those malignant spirits (alluded to in the Shastah and elsewhere), who have, from their ori-

Bistnoo, and the other good angels, petitioned for permission to undergo the eighty-nine transmigrations, and particularly to become men. It is these benevolent spirits, say the Gentoo, who at different times, under the various characters of ginal defection, been the declared enemies of God and man. For however we are astonished and admire the sublimity of Milton's genius, we can hardly sometimes avoid concluding his conceits are truly diabolical."—The former remark Mr. H. refers to, is, the supposition that angels opposed God in battle; any other than an instant act of expulsion being unworthy of omnipotence. Milton, however, needs no defence. In the true spirit of poetry, he opposes angel to angel; but these strictures of our author lead us to some obvious observations on his account of the Gentoo system. God, he tells us, previous to the creation, fought 5000 years with Modoo and Kytou; but this is excused by allegory, and these are only Discord and Tumult; and an instant act of omnipotence, it seems, was not here necessary. According to Mr. H.'s divine system of the Gentoo, God has no prescience of the actions of free agents. To strip the Supreme Being of prescience gives a severe shock to reason; and most assuredly it is the highest presumption in a finite mind, to deny an attribute essential to omnipotence and omniscience, because its confined ideas cannot conceive the manner of that attribute's operation*. But the grossest impiety still remains. The restoration of the fallen spirits, according to Mr. Holwell's Gentoo system, flowed not from God. He is not their fountain of mercy. The compassion of the good angels alone produced this divine favour, after the solicitation of 426 millions of years. In Milton we have no such absurdities, no such impieties as these suppositions and assertions contain.

* To reconcile the divine prescience with the liberty of volition, has vainly employed many philosophers. Freedom of choice has been denied, and the gross impiety of fatalism has by many been adopted, to avoid the gross absurdity which would limit the powers of the eternal mind. Yet nothing, we presume, is easier than to satisfy sound reason on this subject. Let us remember our intellectual powers are very limited; let us remember we cannot form the faintest idea of the act of creation. "God said let there be light, and there was light," is an expression most truly sublime; but it conveys not the least idea of the modus how his power either acted upon that which was not, or upon that which afterwards was. Yet, we know we exist, and that we did not create ourselves. In this case we rest satisfied that we cannot comprehend the manner how the Deity acts. To deny prescience to omnipotent omniscience is just as reasonable as to deny the creation. As we readily resolve the one, let us also resolve the other, into an attribute peculiar to the existence of the Deity. This solution is not only perfectly easy, but the power of creation stamps the highest authority of analogy upon it. Each of the other two solutions, fatalism and negation of divine prescience, are founded upon, and end in, the most impious absurdity.

kings, generals, philosophers, lawgivers, and prophets, have given shining examples of fortitude, virtue, and purity. Many of these incarnations took place in the former jogues, but in the present one they are very rare; the good angels, however, are permitted invisibly to assist the penitent, and to afford them support and protection. When the 359,123 years yet remaining of the present jogue are expired, all the obdurate spirits who have not attained the first region of purification, shall be thrown into the Ouderah for ever. The eight regions of probation shall be then destroyed. And when the spirits in the seven planets of purification shall have attained the highest Heaven, these regions shall also be no more. A long time after this, says the Shastah, there shall be another creation, but of what kind, or upon what principles, the Eternal One only knows.

Such are the terms of salvation offered by the Shastah as given by Mr. Holwell. Almost innumerable are the wild, fanciful accounts of the creation contained in the sacred books of India. Some of them are most boisterously impure, (See Faria y Sousa, tom. ii. p. 4. c. i.) and almost all of them have a whimsical meanness, or grossness of idea. The account given by Mr. H., as that of the genuine inspired Shastah, is thus: "When the Eternal One first began his intended new creation of the universe, he was opposed by two mighty powers, (i. e. giants) which proceeded from the

* The devil and his chiefs, according to Mr. H., have often, as well as the good angels, taken the human form, and appeared in the character of tyrants, and corruptors of morals, or philosophers; who, according to Mr. H., are the devil's faithful deputies. The great engines of Satan's temptations, says Mr. H. (p. 150. ch. viii.), are the use of animal food, and vicious and spirituous petitions. "To give the devil his due," says he, "it must in justice be acknowledged that the introduction of these two first-rate vices was a masterpiece of politics in Moissasoor, or Satan, who alone was capable of working so diabolical a change in rational intellectual beings." The system by which Satan effected this change, says Mr. H., was thus: "He began with the priesthood. He suggested the religious use of animal sacrifices and of vicious libations. The priests soon began to taste, and the laity followed their example. And these two vices," says he, "are the roots from which all moral evils sprang, and continue to flourish in the world." And, indeed, Mr. H. is serious; nay, he hopes the time is near when animal food will be totally disused, and very earnestly he advises the butchers to turn bakers; so occupation which, he assures them, will be much more agreeable to their humanity of disposition. And here we must remark that Mr. H. tells us, "it is more than probable that Moses himself was the very identical spirit, deputed in an earlier age to deliver God's will under the style and title of Bramah." But whence then the bloody sacrifices of the Mosaic law? Why, the answer is perfectly easy on Mr. H.'s scheme.—As St. Peter by his sanction to kill and eat corrupted the pure doctrine of Christ or Bramah, so Aaron the high-priest by his bloody sacrifices corrupted the pure doctrine of Moses or Bramah.

wax of Brum's (i. e. Birmah's) ear; and their names were Modoo and Kytoo. And the Eternal One contended and fought with Modoo and Kytoo five thousand years; and he smote them on his thigh, and they were lost and assimilated with murto (earth)."

Birmah is then appointed to create, Bistoo to preserve, and Sieb to change or destroy.—Mr. H. thus proceeds: "And when Brum (Birmah) heard the command, which the mouth of the Eternal One had uttered, he straightways formed a leaf of betel, and he floated on the betel leaf over the surface of the waters, and the children of Modoo and Kytoo fled from before him, and vanished from his presence: and when the agitation of the waters had subsided by the powers of the spirit of Brum, Bistoo straightways transformed himself into a mighty boar, and descending into the abyss of waters, brought up the Murto on his tusks. Then spontaneously issued from him a mighty tortoise and a mighty snake. And Bistoo put the snake erect upon the back of the tortoise, and placed Murto upon the head of the snake. And all things were created and formed by Birmah."—Mr. Holwell informs us, that all this is sublime allegory; that Modoo and Kytoo signify Discord and Confusion; that the boar is the Gentoo's symbol of strength; the tortoise, of stability; and the serpent, of wisdom. And thus the strength of God placed wisdom on stability, and the Earth upon wisdom. But what the betel leaf, and the wax of Brum's ear signify, Mr. H. has not told us.

As an account of the doctrines of the Bramins is a necessary illustration of the Seventh Lusia, some observations on their opinions are also requisite. Mr. Holwell talks in the highest terms of these philosophers; he calls them "a people who, from the earliest times, have been an ornament to the creation." At the same time he confesses, "that unless we dive into the mysteries of their theology they seem below the level of the brute creation." Our first remarks shall therefore be confined to that system which is given by Mr. H. as the pure and primary revelation which God gave to the rebellious spirits by Christ, at that time named Birmah.

"The creation and propagation of the human form, according to the scriptures of Bramah," says Mr. H., "are clogged with no difficulties, no ludicrous unintelligible circumstances, or inconsistencies. God previously constructs mortal bodies of both sexes for the reception of the angelic spirits—these were all doomed to pass through many successive transmigrations in the mortal prisons, as a state of punishment and purgation, before they received the grace of animating the human form, which is their chief state of probation and trial." This, however, without hesitation, (the reader, we fear, will smile at the pains we take,) we will venture to call highly unphilosophical. Nature has made almost the whole creation of fishes to feed upon each other. Their purgation therefore is only a mock trial; for, according to Mr. H., whatever being destroys a mortal body must begin its transmigrations anew; and thus the spirits of the fishes would be just where they were, though millions of the four jogues were repeated. Mr. H. is at great pains to solve the reason why the fishes were not drowned at the general deluge, when every other species of animals suffered death. The only reason for it, he says, is, that they were more favoured of God, as more innocent. Why then are these less guilty spirits united to bodies whose natural instinct precludes them the very possibility of salvation? There is not a bird perhaps but eats occasionally insects and reptiles. Even the Indian philosopher himself, who lets vermin overrun him, who carefully sweeps his path ere he treads upon it, lest he should dislodge the soul of an insect, and who covers his mouth with a cloth, lest he should suck in a goat with his breath; even he, in every sallah which he eats, and in every cup of water which he drinks, causes the death of innumerable living creatures.—His salvation, therefore, according to Mr. H.'s Gentoo system, is as impossible as that of the fishes. Nor need we scruple to pronounce the purgation of spirits, by passing through brutal forms, as "ludicrously unintelligible." The young of every animal has most innocence. An old vicious ram has made a strange retrograde purgation, when we consider that he was once a lamb, the mildest and most innocent of creatures.

The attentive reader, no doubt, has ere now been apt to inquire, How is the person and revelation of Christ and of Birmah one and the same? Mr. H. thus solves the difficulty: The doctrine of Christ, as it is delivered to us, is totally corrupted. Age after age has disfigured it. Even the most ancient record of its history, the N. T., is grossly corrupted. St. Paul by his reveries, as Mr. H. says, and St. Peter by his sanction to kill and eat, began this woeful declension and perversion of the doctrines of Christ.

A traveller, says Mr. H. who describes the religious tenets of any nation, but does not dive into the mysteries of their theology, "dishonestly imposes his own reveries on the world, and does the greatest injury and violence to letters and the cause of humanity." And here it must be again repeated, that Mr. H. assures us, that he received his instructions from some of the most learned Bramins; an opportunity which he deems superior to whatever had been enjoyed by any former inquirer.

A few years after Mr. Holwell's treatises were given to the public, Mr. Dow, who had also been in India, published also his account of the religion and philosophy of the Bramins. The superior opportunities of knowledge enjoyed by Mr. Dow are thus mentioned by himself.

Talking of the whole body of modern travellers, he says, "They have prejudiced Europe against the Bramins, and, by a very unfair account, have thrown disgrace upon a system of religion and philosophy which they did by no means investigate." After this he tells us, (Dissert. p. xxii.) "that conversing by accident one day with a noble and learned Bramin, he perceived the error of Europeans; and having resolved to acquire some knowledge of the Sanscrita language, the grand repository of the religion, philosophy, and history of the Hindoos, his noble friend the Bramin procured him a pundit (or teacher) from the university of Benaris, well versed in the Sanscrita, and master of all the knowledge of that learned body." Mr. Dow, however, confesses, that he had not time to acquire the Sanscrita; but his pundit, he says, procured some of the principal Shasters, and "explained to him as many passages of those curious books, as served to give him a general idea of the doctrine which they contain."

Such an opportunity of superior knowledge as this, is certainly singular. But though it is thus confessedly partial, and entirely dependent on the truth of his pundit, the claims of authenticity alleged by other travellers (p. xxvii.) are thus reprobated—"They affirm, that they derived their information from the Hindoos themselves. This may be the case; but they certainly conversed upon that subject only with the inferior tribes, or with the unlearned part of the Bramins: and it would be as ridiculous to hope for a true state of the religion and philosophy of the Hindoos from those illiterate casts, as it would be in a Moham-medan in London, to rely upon the accounts of a parish beadle, concerning the most abstruse points of the Christian faith; or to form his opinion of the principles of the Newtonian philosophy from a conversation with an English car-man."

Having thus established his own authority, our author proceeds to a view of the religion and philosophy of the Bramins. But here it is proper to observe, that having mentioned Mr. Holwell, Mr. Dow informs his reader, that he "finds himself obliged to differ almost in every particular concerning the religion of the Hindoos, from that gentleman."

The Bedang, or sacred book of the Bramins, says Mr. Dow, contains various accounts of the creation; one philosophical, the others allegorical. The philosophical one is contained in a dialogue between Brinba and his son Narud. God is here thus defined: "Being immaterial, he is above all conception; being invisible, he can have no form; but from what we behold in his works, we may conclude that he is eternal, omnipotent, knowing all things, and present every where." This Mr. Dow informs us, in a note, is literally translated; and, "whether we," says he, "who profess Christianity, and call the Hindoos by the detestable names of Pagans and idolaters, have higher ideas of the supreme divinity, we shall leave to the unprejudiced reader to determine." Yet surely God is not above all conception. Nor is his invisibility to his creatures a philosophical proof that he can have no form.

Narud's inquiries into the nature of the soul or intellect are thus answered—"It is a portion of the Great Soul, breathed into all creatures to animate them for a certain time; after death it either animates other bodies, or is absorbed into the divine essence. The wicked are not at death disengaged from the elements, but clothed with bodies of fire, air, &c., and for a time are punished in Hell; and the good are absorbed "in a participation of the divine nature, where all passions are utterly unknown, and where consciousness is lost in bliss." Mr. Dow confesses that a state of unconsciousness is in fact the same with annihilation; and indeed it is, though he says that the Shaster "seems here to imply a kind of delirium of joy." By this unintelligible sublimity we are put in mind of some of the reveries of a Shaftesbury or a Malebranche, and that wild imaginations are the growth of every country.

Narud then inquires into the continuance and dissolution of the world. And here we have a legend much the same with Mr. Holwell's four jogues or ages; after which the world shall be destroyed by fire, matter be annihilated, and God exist alone. Our year, according to the Bramins, says Mr. Dow, makes one planetary day. The first jug, or age of truth, contained four; the second three; the third two; and the present jug, or age of pollution, is to contain one thousand of these planetary years. According to Mr. Dow, at the end of these periods there is not only a dissolution of all things, but between the dissolutions and renovations of the world, a period of 3,720,000 of our years. In the note on the Ptolemaic system in Lusid X., we trust we have investigated the source of these various ages of the Bramins, and traced the origin of that idea into a natural planetary appearance.

In Mr. Dow's, or rather his pundit's translation of the sacred Shaster, we have the following account of the creation. It is contained in what our author (p. xlvi.) calls the philosophical catechism. Namd inquires, How did God create the world? and is answered; "Affection dwelt with God from all eternity. It was of three different kinds; the creative, the preserving, and the destructive. The first is represented by Brimba, the second by Bisben, and the third by Shihab. You, O Nerud, are taught to worship all the three, in various shapes and likenesses, as the creator, the preserver, and the destroyer. The affection of God then produced power; and power, at a proper conjunction of time and fate, embraced goodness, and produced matter. The three qualities then acting upon matter, produced the universe in the following manner: From the opposite actions of the creative and destructive quality in matter, self-motion first arose. Self-motion was of three kinds; the first inclining to plasticity, the second to discord, and the third to rest. The discordant actions then produced the akash, which invisible element possessed the quality of conveying sound; it produced air, a palpable element; fire, a visible element; water, a fluid element; and earth, a solid element."

Such is the philosophical cosmogony placed by Mr. Dow, but for what reason we cannot discover, in opposition to the allegorical accounts which the Bramins give of the creation.

The Shasters, according to Mr. Dow, are divided into four Bedas (i. e. the Bhades of Mr. H.). The first, he says, treats principally of the science of divination; the second, of religious and moral duties; the third, of the rites of religion, sacrifices, penances, &c.; and the fourth, of the knowledge of the good being, and contains the whole science of theology and metaphysical philosophy.

And thus the Bramins avow, and their sacred books contain, that most despicable of all pretensions to learning, judicial astrology; that mother of superstition in every country, that engine of villany, by which the philosophers of India and the gypsies of England impose on the credulous and ignorant. "When a child is born," says Mr. Dow, (p. xxxiii.) "some of the Bramins are called: they pretend, from the horoscope of his nativity, to foretell his future fortune, by means of some astrological tables, of which they are possessed." They then tie a string, called the zinar, round his neck, which all the Hindoos wear, says our author, by way of charm or amulet.

That the Gentooes are divided into two great sects is confessed, though differently accounted for, by both Mr. Howell and Mr. Dow. By the latter they are distinguished as the followers of Bedang, the most ancient; and the Needines, a later Shaster. This, which by its followers is held as sacred, is said to have been written; says our author, by a "philosopher called Goutam, near 4000 years ago." As a specimen of this most abstruse metaphysician, take the following—Five things must of necessity be eternal: first, the pirum attima, or the great soul, which is immaterial, omniscient, &c.; the second, the jive attima, or the vital soul; the third, time or duration; the fourth, space or extension; the fifth, the akash, or heavenly element, "which fills up the vacuum or space, and is compounded of purmans, or quantities, infinitely small, indivisible, and perpetual. God," says he, "can neither make nor annihilate these atoms, on account of the love which he bears to them, and the necessity of their existence; but they are in other respects totally subservient to his pleasure."

Not to be tedious, we shall only look into this metaphysical labyrinth. Goutam supposes the vital soul is material, says Mr. D., by giving it the following properties; number, quantity, motion, contraction, extension, divisibility, perception, pleasure, pain, desire, aversion, accident, and power. How Mr. D. discovers that Goutam supposes perception, desire, &c., as the characteristics of matter, we know not; neither can we conceive the number, quantity or divisibility of a living soul. The akash, or atoms, which God can neither make nor destroy, were formed by him into the seeds of all productions, when jive attima, or the vital soul, associating with them, animals and plants were produced. And thus the greatest act of creation is ascribed to jive attima, a principle or quality which God did not produce. "The same vital soul," says Goutam, "which before associated with the atom of an animal, may afterwards associate with the atom of a man: the superiority of man consisting only in his finer organization." "The followers of the Bedang," says Mr. Dow, "affirm, that there is no soul in the universe but God: the sect of Needines strenuously hold that there is, as they cannot conceive that God can be subject to such affections and passions as they feel in their own minds, or that he can possibly have a propensity to evil." That is, in plain words, some do, and some do not, think themselves to be God. Wherefore, according to Goutam, the author of the humbler sect, the vital soul is the source of evil, and is of necessity co-eternal with the eternal mind. But the necessity of the co-eternity of the vital soul is as unphilosophical, we apprehend, as the much superior agency ascribed to it by Goutam, in the work of creation, is blasphemous and absurd. Yet Mr. D. has told us, (p. lxxvi.) that the Hindoo doctrine, while it teaches the purest morals, is systematically formed on philosophical opinions.

Goutam, says Mr. Dow, admits a particular providence. But "though he cannot deny the possibility of its existence," says our author, "without divesting God of his omnipotence, he supposes that the Deity never exerts that power, but that he remains in eternal rest, taking no concern, neither in human affairs, nor in the course of the operations of Nature."

This may be called philomorphy; but surely this article in the creed of Goutam is incompatible with the idea of religion, the philosophical definition of which is certainly thus: a filial dependence on the Creator, similar to that of a child who sincerely wishes to render himself acceptable to his father.

"The learned Bramins," says Dow, "with one voice deny the existence of inferior divinities. Their polytheism is only a symbolical worship of the divine attributes; and it is much to be doubted, whether the want of revelation and philosophy, those necessary purifiers of religion, ever involved any nation in gross idolatry, as many ignorant zealots have pretended." . . . "Under the name of Bramha, they worship the wisdom and creative power of God; under the appellation of Bishea, his providential and preserving quality; and under that of Shibah, that attribute which tends to destroy."

"Shibah," says the same author, "among many others, is known by the names of Maholssur, the great demon; Bamdebo, the frightful spirit; and Mohilla, the destroyer."

The same authority also informs us, that they erect temples to Granesh, or Policy, whom they worship at the commencement of any design, represented with the head of an elephant with only one tooth: that they have many figurative images of Bramah, one of which represents him riding on a goose, the emblem of simplicity among the Hindoos: that they worship Kartic, or Fame; Cobere, or Wealth; Soorage, or the Sun; Chunder, or the Moon; the deities of water, fire, &c.; besides an innumerable herd of local divinities." In another place, our author confesses that there are two religious sects in India: "The one," says he, "look up to the divinity through the medium of reason and philosophy; while the others receive as an article of their belief every holy legend and allegory which have been transmitted down from antiquity." He confesses, also, the grossness of the vulgar of all countries, who cannot comprehend abstract subjects. "Nay," he says, "it cannot be denied (p. xlix.) but that the more ignorant Hindoos do believe in the existence of their inferior divinities, in the same manner that Christians do in angels." Yet, along with all this, Mr. D. is several times offended with the charge of idolatry brought against the Bramins. Fearless, however, of the name of ignorant zealot, we will not scruple to assert, that the refined opinions of a very few ought by no means to fix the characteristic of the religion of any country. To call the obvious idolatry of India only a symbolical worship of the divine attributes, is only to present to us a specious shadow, which will disperse and vanish as soon as the light of just examination shines upon it.

That the polytheism of Egypt, the worship of dogs, crocodiles, and onions, was only a symbolical worship of the divine attributes, has been often said, and with equal justice. For our part, we can distinguish no difference between the worship of Janus with two faces, or of Bramah with four. The philosophers of Rome were as able to allegorise as those of India. The apology for the idolatry of the Bramins is applicable to that of every nation, and, as an argument, falls nothing short of that of a learned Arab, who about the eleventh century wrote a treatise to prove that there never was such a thing as idolatry in the world; for, every man, he said, intended to worship some attribute of the divinity, which he believed to reside in his idol.

Nor is a sentiment of Mr. Dow inapplicable to this: "Let us rest assured," says he, "that whatever the external ceremonies of religion may be, the self same infinite being is the object of universal adoration." Yet whatever the metaphysician may think of this ingenious refinement, the moral philosopher will be little pleased with it, when he considers that the vulgar, that is ninety-nine of every hundred, are utterly incapable of practising their idolatry, according to this philosophical definition. That the learned Bramins with one voice assert there is but one supreme God, has been acknowledged by almost all modern travellers. Xavier himself confesses this. But be their hidden religion what it will, the Bramins, in public, worship and teach the worship of idols. To give an account both of the popular and what is called the philosophical religion of India, is the purpose of this essay. To abstract our view therefore from the popular practice of the country, and to indulge the spirit of encomium on the enlarged tenets of the learned few, is just the same as if a traveller should tell us there is no popery at Rome, or that the divine mission of Mohammed is denied at Constantinople; because at the one place he conversed with a deistical bishop, or at the other with a philosophical mufti. However pleased therefore the metaphysician may be with ingenious refinement, the moralist will consider that the question is not, how the philosopher may refine upon any system, but how the people will, of consequence, practise under its influence. And on this view alone, he will pronounce it reprehensible or commendable. That the religion of the Bramins is highly reprehensible every moralist must allow, when he considers; that the most unworthy ideas of the Divinity, ideas destructive of morality, naturally arise from idol-worship; and the vulgar, it is every where confessed, cannot avoid the abuse. What can he think of the piety of a poor superstitious Indian, when he worships the great demon, the destroyer, and frightful spirit? Does he love what he worships? And can piety exist where the object of adoration is hated? Nor can we stop here: the futility of our refined apology for idolatry will still appear in a stronger light. What will the definition avail in the balance of morality, when all the inhuman, impure, and immoral rites of idolatry are laid in the other scale? Palestine, Tyre, and Carthage, made their children pass through the fire unto Moloch; and human sacrifices have prevailed at one time or other in every land. The human sacrifices of Mexico (of which see the Introduction) afford the most dreadful example of human depravity. Yet the Mexicans in this most detestable, most criminal superstition, in their own way worshipped God. No philosophers ever entertained sublimer ideas of the Divinity, and of the human soul, than the ancient Druids. Yet what shall we think of the wicker man! A gigantic figure; the body, each leg and arm was a mast, to which a hundred or more human victims were bound with wicker. When there was a deficiency of malefactors or prisoners of war, the innocent helpless were seized, that the horrid sacrifice might be complete. When all the rites were performed, the sublime Druids gave the becatomb to the flames, as an offering grateful to their gods, as the most acceptable insurance of the divine protection. In the most polished ages of ancient Greece and Rome, the rites of religion were often highly immoral, basely impure. To mention any particular would be an insult to the scholar. Impurities which make the blood recoil, which, like Swift, make one detest the Yahoo species, are a part of the religious externals of many barbarous tribes. A citation from Baumgarten's Travels, as quoted by Mr. Locke, here offers itself. Insuper sanctum illum, quem eo loco [in Egypt] vidimus, publicis apprimè commendari, eum esse bonimum sanctum, divinum à integritate præcipuum; eo quod, nec fœminarum unquam esset, nec puerorum, sed tantummodo aælarum concubitor atque mularum. Decency will allow no translation of this. In a word, where idolatry is practised, whether in the churches of Rome, or in the temples of Bramah, the consequences are felt, and a remedy is wanted: the vulgar are gross idolaters; the wiser part see the cheat, and, as the human mind has a woeful propensity to over step the golden mean, they become almost indifferent to every tie of religion.

Though Mr. Holwell and Mr. Dow most essentially disagree in their systems of Indian philosophy, yet they most cordially coincide in their opinion of the high antiquity and unadulterated sameness of the Gentoo philosophy and religion, an antiquity and sameness to which they ascribe about 4000 years. Conscious that the accounts which the Greek and Roman writers have given of the Brachmanes most effectually refute this sameness, Mr. H. denies the authority of these authors, though he acknowledges the invasion of Alexander. His reasons are these:

"The Greek and Latin construction and termination of the names and places of the princes and kingdoms of Indostan, said by Alexander's historians to be conquered by him, bear not the least analogy or idiom of the Gentoo language, either ancient or modern." Vid. ch. iv. p. 3.

But if this will prove what Mr. H. intends, the Greeks and Romans were unacquainted with the opinions of every nation they visited; for they always gave their own idiomatic construction and termination to the proper names of every place where they came.

Had the great author of the Paradise Lost continued the visions of the eleventh, in place of the far inferior narrative of the twelfth book, what a dreadful display of the consequences of his disobedience might the angel have given to Adam, had he presented him with a view of the horrid sacrifices of Mexico, or the wicker man? What horror must the parent of mankind have felt, had Michael showed him his adversary, Satan, seated on a neighbouring mountain delighted with the yells and the steam of these terrible hecatombs? But what even deeper horror must Adam have felt, had the devil conjured up a philosopher to desire him to "rest assured that whatever the external ceremonies of religion may be, the self-same infinite Being is the object of universal adoration?"

Mr. H. denies that Porus ever existed. "The Gentoo annals," he says, "make not the least mention of him." Camoëna, however, who lived many years in the east, and was no duped inquirer, assures us (Lus. VII.) that the warlike kingdom of Cambaya claimed Porus. And Ferrieta's history of Hindostan, as translated by Mr. Dow, tells us that Porus the father of Porus was overthrown, and killed in battle, by Alexander.

Mr. H.'s third and last argument is, the shortness of time employed in Alexander's expedition, and the vast difficulty of acquiring the Gentoo tongue. "Can it be possibly believed," says he, "that any of Alexander's followers could in this short space acquire such perfection in the Gentoo language as could enable them justly to transmit down the religious system of a nation with whom they can scarcely be said to have had any communication?"

But Mr. H. ought to have known, that the Greeks were well acquainted with the Persian, and the Persians with the Indian, language; and that Alexander found many thousands in the east who talked Greek, who were the descendants of those bands of invalids who had been left by Xenophon. And that thus Alexander's followers had, from these various and numerous interpreters, the best opportunity, perhaps, which ever existed, of acquainting themselves with the Indian philosophy.

Having thus proved that some credit is due to the ancients, we proceed to the various accounts they have given, in which we hope the credible will easily be distinguished from the misapprehended and fabulous. Pliny talks of men in India with dogs' heads; others with only one leg, yet Achilles for swiftness of foot; of a nation of pigmies; of some who lived by the smell; of tribes who had only one eye in their forehead; and of some whose ears hung down to the ground.

Ctesius, as cited by Photius, talks in the same style, of fountains of liquid gold, and of men with tails in India. Even in Horace's time it appears that the faith of Indian travellers was proverbial:

— Quæ loca fabulosæ
Lambit Hydaspeæ.

Yet we ought to remember that Fernando Alarcon, a Spanish voyager of undoubted credit, saw men with tails on the coast of California; and that several others have seen men with dogs' heads. But let not a certain living author rejoice in Alarcon's authority as a proof of the truth of his opinion, that the human form had originally the appendix of a posterior tail; for Alarcon tells us that the tails which he saw were discovered to be fictitious. And we are also assured that the dog-headed men were found to wear vizards. The Indian fountains of gold will also be found a very easy, though ignorant error. We need only suppose that the Indian legends of worlds made of silver and gold with fountains of milk and oil, were mistaken for the natural history of India.

If these wild tales of Pliny and others, the misapprehensions of weak and ignorant travellers, have discredited the authority of the ancients, other circumstances will prove their better intimacy with the Indian opinions and manners.

All the ancients⁶ concur in their accounts of the dreadful penances of the Brachmanes; these, they say, consist of sitting-naked in all changes of weather, of most painful postures, of fixing the eye all day unshakably on the Sun or some other object; with several other circumstances, which are all most liberally confirmed by every modern traveller who has written of these philosophers.

The metempsychosis of the Indians was also well known to the ancients. All the Gæotto legends mentioned by the ancients are in the same wild spirit, and some even the same in circumstances, with those acknowledged by Holwell and Dow. Calanus, celebrated by the historians of Alexander, told Onesicritus the philosopher, says Strabo, that there had been a world of gold, where the fountains streamed with milk, honey, wine, and oil; and where the wheat was as plentiful as dust. But that God, in punishment of human wickedness, had altered it, and had imposed a life of labour and misery on men. Onesicritus was desirous to hear more; but a Bramin penance was imposed by Calanus as the condition, and the Greek philosopher was contented with what he had heard.

Here we have indubitable proof that the ancients were well acquainted with the Indian philosophers. Jerome (Adv. Jovian. lib. 1.) mentions not only the burning of widows, but their ardent desire of giving this testimony of affection. This custom still continues as a rite performed upon principle, but the self-murder of the Bramin philosophers is not now, as formerly, by fire, or at all common: yet we have the concurrent testimony of the ancients, that on the approach of disease, the infirmities of age, and even in the mere dread of calamity, the Indian, upon principle, made his exit in the flames. Cicero, Tusc. Quest. 1. 3. and Lucan, l. 3. mention this custom as universally known.

Several ambassadors were sent by a king of India, a king of six hundred kings, to Augustus Cæsar. (Sueton. c. 21.) One of these, a Bramin philosopher, burned himself at Athens. His life had been extremely prosperous, and he took this method, he said, to prevent a reverse of fortune. Amid a great concourse of people, he entered the fire naked, anointed, and laughing. The epitaph which he desired might be inscribed on his tomb, was, "Here rests Zarmanochagas, the Indian of Barygasa, who, according to the custom of his country, made himself immortal." And it was on the advances of a distemper that Calanus amused Alexander with this exhibition of Indian philosophy. But this custom is disused. And from hence we have certain proof that the customs of the Bramins have undergone most considerable alterations. This will further appear by the testimony which antiquity gives of the simplicity of their worship. The Indians who had any idols are mentioned by the ancients as few in number and gross barbarians. The Brachmanes, on the contrary, are commended for the simplicity of their worship: The laborious philosopher Porphyry, though possessed of all the knowledge of his age, though he mentions their metempsychosis and penances, has not a word of any of their idols, or the legends of Bramah or his brothers. On the contrary, he represents their worship as extremely pure and simple. Strabo's account of them is similar. And Eusebius has assured us they worshipped no images?

With these weighty evidences of the principled self-murder and simplicity of the worship of the Brachmanes, antiquity closes her account of these philosophers. Eusebius lived in the fourth century, Gama at the end of the fifteenth; and those who followed him in the beginning of the sixteenth; found their innumerable temples filled with innumerable idols of the most horrid figures. The adoration of these was so complex and various, and their religious rites so multiplied, that, as Mr. Holwell confesses, a priest became necessary in every family. The wild absurdities of the Arabian Nights Entertainments fall infinitely short of those of the innumerable mythological legends of India; and human depravity, in no quarter of the globe, ever produced such detestable fictions of impurity, as are contained in the legendary histories of the deities of the Bramins.

Carnoon, whose depth of observation rendered him greatly superior to the imposition of the most specious Bramin, and who was long in the east, gives us in the preceding book a very unfavourable idea of the religious worship and manners of India. The state in which the first discoverers of the east found the religion and philosophy of the Bramins deserves very particular attention: and Faria y Souza has been careful to give us a full and comprehensive view of the opinions which prevailed when his countrymen landed in India.

According to Faria their system of the universe is thus: "The Heaven rests on the Earth: the Sun and Moon move like fishes in the water, from east to west by day, and by night run northward along the edge of the horizon, to the place of their rising. And the Earth is supported by the snake Ananta. They hold an eternal succession of worlds. Every thing at the end of these periods is destroyed, except Ixoretta or the Deity, which is then reduced to the size of a dew drop; when, having chirped like a cricket, the divine substance in itself produces the five elements, (for what they call the heavenly matter they esteem the fifth,) and then dividing itself, the Heavens and the Earth are formed. In terra, simul ac formata est, apparet mons argenteus, cujus in vertice conspiciuntur vâ alûa, quæ verum Ixoretta sive Nunen spellant, et causam causarum. These, which are worshipped in their temples, first produce Ixora, Bramah, and Viktnu, the three primary deities. Some most ludicrous impurities follow in Faria. A female named Chati is produced by magical words from Ixora's back; and these we turning themselves into different animals beget the different kinds of all living creatures, men, beasts, devils, and the heavenly spirits. The amounts of Bramah, Vistnu, and Ixora are insupportable. Their offspring have the heads of elephants, goats, monkeys, &c. and they are always killing each other and springing up in some new chimeriform, but the greater deity is always outwitted. Bramah, Vistnu, and Ixora pass through many transmigrations, and are born as the filthiest of animals, monkeys, hogs, snakes, &c. Vistnu being spawned a fish, recovers the law or Shastah from the bottom of the sea, whither it had been carried by Breniacem, who stole it from the heavenly spirits. While Vistnu's mother Axoda was big with him, the diviners told his father that the child would kill him. Hence his youth resembles the labours of Hercules. At seven years of age he deflowers all his nuptial maids, is whipped for it, and is revenged by a repetition of his offence. Vistnu's exploits are innumerable. But what is esteemed his greatest action in all its transmigrations is one day's labour of the same kind of that for which he was whipped; but which extended to sixteen thousand one hundred and eight. Vistnu is sometimes represented as the greatest God. In this character he lies sleeping on his back in a sea of milk; yet in this condition he governs the whole world. He lies on the snake Ananta. At other times Ixora is the greatest God.

If some of these legends outrage the bounds of allegory, part of the following is obvious. Bramah and Vistnu envying Ixora's greatness, he promised, that if they could find his beginning or end, they should become his superiors. Vistnu turned himself into a hog, and with his snout dug up the earth in search of Ixora's feet, till he was deterred by a snake. Bramah went in search of his head, but at last was dissuaded to desist by roses. These, however, he bribed to testify that he had seen Ixora's head. Ixora, conscious of the fraud, strikes off one of Bramah's five heads; and in penance for this crime, Ixora travels as a pilgrim. He meets with men who throw wild beasts at him; some he slays, and clothes himself with their skins; he is at last overruled. Vistnu in the shape of a beautiful virgin relieves him. Ixora gets her with child, and Vistnu bears a son. They quarrel who

* This is exactly in the spirit of the Talmudical legends. In these the prophet or Rabbi invariably outwits his God, and the Devil the prophet. E. g. David having performed an action agreeable to Heaven, Nathan is sent to order him to make what request he pleased. He desires to die on a Sabbath evening at sun-set. Again Nathan comes on a like occasion, and he desires he may never die while he is reading the law. From this time David was always sure to be reading the law on the Sabbath evening. By his life thus prolonged, religion flourished, and the Devil was piqued. The love of some peasant that grew under his window was now David's ruling passion. Just at sun-set, one Sabbath eve, the Devil shakes the pear-tree and cries, Thieves, thieves. David starts up from the book of the law, sees the thieves running away, and a rope-ladder at the window. David with the sword of Goliath thinks to pursue them from the window, but the ladder was an illusion, and David fell down and broke his neck. One would think a Bramin had been the inventor of this legend.

† For this same legend see Dow.

shall have the infant, but are reconciled by a heavenly spirit, who takes it to himself and breeds it an expert archer, on purpose to guard him against the giant with 500 heads and 1000 hands, who sprang from the head of Bramah when cut off by Ixora.

In Paria we find the severe penances, the seas of milk and oil, and the fanciful legends mentioned by the ancients. These, and what mythological reveries he gives us, are in part the same, and all in the true spirit of what is told us by our two late writers. As Vistnu lies in the sea of milk, a rose springs from his navel. Through the hollow stalk of this rose Bramah descends into Vistnu's belly. Here he sees the ideas of all things, and from looking on these, he creates the world.

In Paria we find Bramah the creator of the world; Ixora the perfecter, and Vistnu the governor of all things. We find these deities also, with different numbers of heads and hands. Ixora holds in his sixteen hands, a deer, a chair, a fiddle, a bell, a basin, a trident, a rope, a book, an ax, fire, a drum, beads, a staff, a wheel, a scale, and a horned moon towards his forehead. All this is exactly similar to the accounts of Holwell and Dow.

By the concurrent testimony of all the travellers of the 16th and 17th centuries, that rifest of brains, the monkey, is held in high veneration. Various are the legends which relate the reason of this. Paria says that Ixora and Chati, having turned themselves into apes, produced one named Anuman, on whom they bestowed great power. Near the city of Proseti was a wood full of apes, esteemed of a divine race, and of the household of Perimal, in whom some thousands of the gods had taken refuge. In the city of Cidambaram, says Linschoten, was a stately temple erected to one of these apes, named Hanuman: (probably Anuman: such variations are common in Indian mythology.) Being threatened with some danger, Hanuman put himself at the head of many thousand of his brother gods, and led them to the sea side; where finding no ship, he took a leap into the ocean, and an island immediately rose under his feet. At every leap the miracle was repeated, and in this manner he brought his divine brotherhood all safe to the island of Ceylon. A tooth of Hanuman was kept there as a sacred relic, and many pilgrims † Patracali, Ixora's daughter, has eight faces and sixteen arms, has boars' teeth, her hair of peacocks' tails, is clothed with snakes, and carries two elephants in her ears for pendants. Ixora has a son with an elephant's head, has four arms, is of an enormous bulk, and rides upon a mouse. We are told, however, that these fictions do not escape ridicule even in India. The writers who have treated of the mission of Xavier relate, that there are extant in India the writings of a Malabar poet, who wrote nine hundred epigrams, each consisting of eight verses, in ridicule of the worship of the Bramins, whom he treats with great asperity and contempt. This poet is named Palcazar by Paria. Would any of our diligent inquirers after oriental learning favour the public with an authentic account of the works of this poet of Malabar, he would undoubtedly confer a singular favour on the republic of letters.

things were made to visit it. In 1553, the Portuguese made a descent on that island, and among other things seized the holy tooth. The Indian princes offered 500,000 ducats in ransom, but by the persuasion of the archbishop, don Constantine de Braganza, the Portuguese viceroy, burned it in the presence of the Indian ambassadors. A Benian, however, had the art to persuade his countrymen that he was invisibly present when the Portuguese burnt the tooth, that he had secreted the holy one, and put another in its place, which was the one committed to the flames. His story was believed, says our author, and the king of Bisnager gave him a great sum for a tooth which he produced as the sacred relic. The striking resemblance which this fable of the apes bears to the Egyptian mythology, which tells us that their gods had taken refuge in dogs, crocodiles, onions, frogs, and even in cloacis, is worthy of observation¹¹.

According to Joannes Oranus, the Bramins of Agra say, that the world shall last four ages or worlds, three whereof are past. The first continued one million seven hundred and twenty-eight thousand years. Men in that world lived ten thousand years, were of enormous stature, and of great integrity. Thrice in that period did God visibly appear upon the Earth. First in the form of a fish, that he might recover the book of Bra-

¹¹ Both Camoëns and Faria assert that several of the Indian idols resemble those of the Grecian fable:

Here spreading borne an human visage bore;
So frown'd stern Jove in Libya's face of yore.
One body bore two various faces rear'd;
So ancient Janus o'er his shrine appear'd.
An hundred arms another brandish'd wide;
So Titan's son the race of Heav'n defied.
And here a dog his snarling tusks display'd;
Anubis thus in Memphis' hallow'd shade
Grin'd horrible —

In the temple of the Elephant, says Faria, is the giant Briareus with his hundred hands; Pasiphae and the Bull, and an angel turning a male and a female out of a delicious grove. This he esteems the expulsion of Adam and Eve from Paradise. In the same temple, says he, is an idol called Mahamurta; with one body and three faces; on his head a triple marble crown of admirable workmanship, exactly resembling the papal mitre. According to the same authority Vistnou having metamorphos'd himself into his younger brother Sri Christina, overcame the serpent Caliga, of nine leagues in length, which lived in a lake made by its own venom. This and the origin of Chati, afford some obvious hints to the investigators of mythology. Tavernier's Travels into India ought also here to be cited: Bismoo, he was told, had been nine times incarnate; had been a lion, a swine, a tortoise, &c. In the eighth time he was a man, born of a virgin at midnight. At his birth the angels sung, and the sky showered bowers. In his manhood he fought and killed a great giant who flew in the air, and darkened the Sun. In this conflict he was wounded in the side, and fell; but by his fall overcame, and ascended into Heaven.

mah, which one Causacar had thrown into the sea. The second time in the form of a snail, (see Dow's account of the symbolical representations of Bramah,) that he might make the Earth dry and solid. The other time like a bog, to destroy one who called himself God, or, as others say; to recover the Earth from the sea, which had swallowed it. The second world lasted one million ninety-two thousand and six years, in which period men were as tall as before, but only lived a thousand years. In this, God appeared four times, once as a monstrous lion, with the lower parts of a woman, to repress the wickedness of a pretender to deity. Secondly, like a poor Bramin, to punish the impiety of a king who had invented a method to fly to Heaven. Thirdly, he came in the likeness of a man called Paracaram, to revenge the death of a poor religious man. And lastly in the likeness of one Ram, who slew Paracaram. The third world continued eight hundred and four thousand years, in which time God appeared twice. The fourth world shall endure four hundred thousand years, whereof only four thousand six hundred and ninety-two are elapsed. In this period God is to appear once, and some hold that he has already appeared in the person of the emperor Echebar.

The accounts of the god Bramah, or Brimha, and their whole mythology, are inconceivably various. According to father Bohours, in his life of Xavier, the Bramins hold that the great God having a desire to become visible, became man. In this state he produced three sons, Mayso, Vistnou, and Bramah; the first, born of his mouth, the second, of his breast, the third, of his belly. Being about to return to his invisibility, he assigned various departments to his three sons. To Bramah he gave the third Heaven, with the superintendance of the rites of religion. Bramah having a desire for children, begat the Bramins, who are the priests of India, and who are believed by the other tribes to be a race of demi-gods, who have the blood of Heaven running in their veins. Other accounts say that Bramah produced the priests from his head, the more ignorant tribes from his breast, thighs, and feet.

According to the learned Kircher's account of the theology of the Bramins, the sole and supreme god Vistnou formed the secondary god Bramah out of a flower that floated on the surface of the great deep before the creation; and afterwards, in reward of the virtue, fidelity, and gratitude of Bramah, gave him power to create the universe.

According to the Danish missionaries¹², "the First Being," say the Bramins, "begat Eternity, Eternity begat Tschinen, Tschinen begat Tschaddy, Tschaddy begat Putady, or the elementary world, Putady begat Sound, Sound begat Nature, Nature begat the great god Tschataatchinen, from whom Bramah was the fourth in a like descent. Bramah produced the soul, the soul produced the visible heaven, the heaven produced the air, the air the fire, the fire the water, and the water the earth." What Mr. Dow calls the philosophical catechism seems only a refinement of this legend.

This genealogical nonsense, however, is not con-

ined to India. Hesiod's genealogy of the gods, though refined upon by the schools of Plato, is of the same class. The Jewish fables, foolish questions and genealogies, reproved by Saint Paul, (epist. Tit.) were probably of this kind, for the Talmudical legends were not then sprung up. Binnah, or Understanding, said the cabalists, begat Cochmah, or Wisdom, &c. till at last comes Milcab, the Kingdon, who begat Shekinah, the Divine Presence. In the same manner the Christian Gnostics, of the sect of Valentinus, held their Πατριάρχαι, and their thirty ages. Ampaiu and Auran, they tell us, i. e. Profundity and Silence, begat Bacua and Tharthuu, Mind and Truth; these begat Ubuca and Thardadie, Word and Life, and these Meruca and Astartha, Man and Church. The other conjunctions of their thirty Aones are of similar ingenuity. The prevalence of the same spirit of mythological allegory in such different nations, affords the philosopher a worthy field of speculation.

Faria y Sousa, as if conscious that he had tired his reader with Indian legends, adds, that a concise view of this monstrous medley ought to be given by a writer who treats of Indian manners.

The Gentoo religion has a principle peculiar to itself: it admits of no proselytes.

God, they say, has appointed different religions for different tribes and countries, is with the Bramin in the temple, with the Mo'ammedan in the mosque, with the Christian in the church, and with the Jew in the synagogue.

They have many feasts and fasts which they celebrate with many extravagant rites. In commemoration of the death of a martyr, says Mr. Dow, "some of the vulgar, on the fast of Oposse, suspend themselves on iron hooks, by the flesh of the shoulder blade, to the end of a beam. This beam runs round with great velocity, upon a pivot, on the head of a high pole. The enthusiast not only seems insensible of pain, but very often blows a trumpet as he is whirled round above, and at certain intervals sings a song to the gaping multitude below, who very much admire his fortitude and devotion."

The Gentoo has a particular veneration, says Mr. Holwell, for the numbers one and three. But of this see a note in Lusiad X.

The Bramin idea of a future state of retribution is strangely ambiguous. Of the human soul they say, that after various transmigrations and purifications, it shall be absorbed in the Deity, and consciousness lost in bliss. By this unintelligible sublimity, we are put in mind of some of the reveries of a Shaftesbury or a Malebranche; but wild imaginations are the growth of every country.

The dreadful penances of the Bramins still continue. These they esteem as the certain means of purification from sin. Many rituals are also believed to confer holiness. Of these, immersion in the river Ganges, and sprinkling of cow dung, are venerated as peculiarly efficacious. Yet alteration of heart, repentance, or abhorrence of moral turpitude, appear to be no conditions of this purification. However a few individuals, whose ideas have been improved by conversation with Europeans, may gloss and refine, that gross ignorance of moral philosophy, which has no idea of moral turpitude, is the just character of Bramin piety. Nor has their boasted philosophy been able to perceive the immorality of their penance, and of committing self-murder as the certain passport to Heaven. What can the true moralist think of the Indian, who, upon religious principles, draws himself in the Ganges, or throws himself under the wheels of his pagod's chariot, to be crushed to death by the holy load? The duties we owe to our relatives in particular, and to society in general, the Author of Nature has imposed upon us by an indispenable canon. Yet these duties by the pious suicide are refused on the principles of the weakest superstition. Nor can the moralist view the dreadful austerities to which the Bramin philosophers submit themselves in any other light. He who fixes his eyes on his nose till he can see in no other direction; he who clenches his fist till the nails grow out at the back of his hand; and he who twists his neck about till his face is fixed unalterably backward; (three modes of penance mentioned by Mr. Dow;) and he who drowns himself at once, equally incapacitate themselves for the duties of society.

And not only the millions who thus do idle penance, but numerous sects of pilgrims also, are mere burdens upon the industrious. The Fakiers are very numerous. These, according to Mr. Dow, are a set of sturdy beggars, who admit my ruffian for good parts to join them; and, under pretence of religious pilgrimages, ramble about in armies of ten or twelve thousand men. The country people fly before them, leaving their goods and their wives (who esteem it a holiness to be embraced by a Fakier) to the mercy and lust of these villains. The prayers of a Fakier are highly esteemed, and often implored, in cases of sterility. The wife and the Fakier retire together to prayer, a signal is left that the Fakier is with the lady, and a sound drubbing is the reward should the husband dare to interrupt their devotions¹².

The city of Benaris is the great seminary of the Bramin learning. Modern travellers have called it an university. Here the Gentoo study divination, and such kind of philosophy as Messrs H. and D. have laid before us.

Postellus (de Orig. c. 13. et 15.) fancies that the Bramins are descended of Abraham by Keturah, and named Brachmanes, quasi Abrahamicos.

Every traveller who has visited the east, Messrs. Holwell and Dow not excepted, represent the great multitude of the Indians as the most superstitious and most abandoned of people. The most striking particulars may be thus summed up: the innumerable superstitious performances on the banks of the Ganges, afford a pitiable picture of the weakness of humanity. As mentioned by Camoëns, (Lusiad VII. and X.) not only dead corpses are conveyed from distant regions to be thrown into the sacred water, but the sick are brought to the river side, where

On beds and litters o'er the margin laid,
The dying lift their hollow eyes, and crave
Some pitying hand to hurl them in the wave:
Thus Heaven, they deem, though vilest guilt they bear.

Unceasing, unchanged, will view that guilt no more.

And hence it is no uncommon scene for the English ships to be surrounded with the corpses which come floating down this hallowed stream.

In consequence of their belief in the transmigration of souls, many of the Bramins abstain from all animal food. Yet however auster in other respects, they freely abandon themselves to every species of lechery, some of them esteeming the most unnatural abominations as the privilege of their senility.

The Gentoo mythology provides every deity with a spouse; a god without a wife being, according to them, as preposterous and unaccomplished as a fire without heat, or a bird without wings.

Every devil or infernal spirit has also his wife. Like the ancient Jews, the Bramins ascribe every disease to a devil. The gout, says Faria, they attribute to the devils in the shape of swine.

A species of the ancient manicheism of Persia is mixed with their religion, and the destroyer, or the frightful demon, as already observed, is worshipped by the authority of their sacred books. The first thing they meet in the morning, be it sun, hog, or dog, they worship during the course of the day. Scarcely more stupid were the Pelusians: Crepitos ventre infati, says Herodotus, Pelusiacæ religio est.

The horrid sacrifice of the widows burnt along with the corpse of the deceased husband is peculiar to India. The opinion, that it was instituted to prevent them from poisoning their husbands, must be false, for the sacrifice must be voluntary. "The Bramins," says Mr. H. "take unvaried pains to encourage, promote, and confirm in the minds of the Gentoo wives, this spirit of burning." And the origin of it, according to our author, is thus: At the demise of Bramah's mortal part, his wives (so it seems our angel kept a seraph) inconsolable for his loss offered themselves voluntary victims on his funeral pile. All the good wives of the rajahs and the Gentoos, unwilling to be thought deficient in affection, followed the heroic example, and the Bramins gave it the stamp of religion, and pronounced "that the delinquent spirits of these heroines immediately ceased from their transmigrations, and entered the first Boboon of purification." The Bramins, says our author, strained some obscure passages of Bramah's Shastah to countenance this their declared sense; instituted the ceremonies that were to accompany the sacrifice, and added it into the Chatah and Aughtorrah Bhades.

Mr. Dow gives a very different account of this sacrifice. His words are these: "The extraordinary custom of the women burning themselves with their deceased husbands, has, for the most part, fallen into desuetude in India; nor was it ever reckoned a religious duty, as has been very erroneously supposed in the west." Whence then this late alteration? The beginning of an assimilation to European ideas can only account for it. For surely it did not proceed from any text of their sacred scriptures. Nay, a text of the sacred Shaster, as cited by Mr. D. plainly encourages the horrid practise, "The woman who dies with her husband shall enjoy life eternal with him in Heaven." Feeble minds, says he, misinterpreted this into a precept. To those, however, who are unskilled in glossing casuistry no admonition can be more obvious.

And nothing can be more evident than that this sacrifice is a priestly institution; the priests and their scriptures encourage, direct, and attend it: it is therefore a religious ceremony.

Yet amid all this gross superstition it cannot be supposed but that some virtues, however obliquely, are occasionally taught. They particularly inculcate the comprehensive virtue of humanity, which is enforced by the opinion, that Divine Beings often assume the habit of mendicants, in order to distinguish the charitable from the inhuman. The Malabrians have several traditions of the virtuous on these happy trials being translated into Heaven; the best designed, incentive to virtue, perhaps, which their religion contains. Besides the Bramins, the principal sect of that vast region called India, there are several others, who are divided and subdivided, according to innumerable variations, in every province. In Cambaya, the Banian, a sect who strictly abstain from all animal food, are numerous.

From their religion and philosophy, these pilots of human manners, we now proceed to the peculiar characteristics of the Gentoos.

As the Gentoo tribe never intermarry, India may properly be said to contain four different nations. They will neither eat together, nor drink out of the same vessel. The Bramins are allowed to eat nothing but what is cooked by themselves; if they trespass in these, or in many other similar points, they are held as polluted, rejected from their tribe, and are obliged to herd with a despised crew, called the Hallachores, who are the lowest of the community, the rabble of India.

This prohibition of intermarriage gives us a very mean idea of Indian policy. The bent of genius

"A very pretty allegory from Faria's account of the Bramin legends will be here in place. "Darmaputrem, being favoured with a view of Hell, saw a man encompassed with immense treasure, yet miserably perishing with hunger." He inquired the reason, and was answered, that upon Earth the sufferer had enjoyed these treasures, but had never given any alms; only that one time, by pointing with his finger, he had directed a poor man to the house where the rice given away in charity was kept. Darmaputrem bade him put the finger with which he pointed into his mouth. The sufferer did so, and immediately was refreshed by the taste of the most excellent viands. Darmaputrem on his return to the Earth gave great alms, and afterward for his charity was received into Paradise."

and affection, as Camoëns observes, are thus barbarously sacrificed. If a nobleman, says our poet, should touch or be touched by one of another tribe,

A thousand rites, and washings o'er and o'er
Can scarce his tainted purity restore.

Nothing, says Osorius, but the death of the unhappy offender can wipe off the pollution. Yet we are told by the same author, that Indian nobility (and in Europe it is too much the same) cannot be forfeited, or even tarnished, by the basest and greatest of crimes; nor can one of mean birth become great or noble by the most illustrious actions. But what above all may be called the characteristic of the Indian, is his total insensibility to the passion of love;

Lost to the heart-ties, to his neighbour's arms
The willing husband yields his spouse's charms.
In unobserv'd embraces free they blend;
Yet but the husband's kindred may ascend
The nuptial couch—

Sentiment, or the least delicacy of affection, have no share in the intercourse of the sexes in India. This grossness of their ideas is indisputably proved by the very spirit of their laws, which suppose that female chastity cannot exist. Conjugal fidelity is neither enjoined, nor hoped for; and the right of succession by law devolves to the sister's children, it being esteemed impossible for any man to know which is his own son; whereas the affinity of the female line is by nature certain. To some perhaps the feebleness of the constitutions of the Gentoos may account for this wretched apathy; and to several circumstances may their feebleness be attributed. The men marry before fourteen and the women at about ten or eleven. Rice, their principal food, affords but little nourishment, and they are extremely averse to any manly exercise. It is better to sit than to walk, they say, to lie down than to sit, to sleep than to wake, and death is better than all. The unparalleled pusillanimity with which they have long submitted to the oppressions of a few Arabs, their Mohammedan masters, likewise shows their deadness to every manly resentment: 100 millions enslaved by 10 millions, (the number, according to Mr. Orme, of the Gentoos and their Mohammedan masters) is a deep disgrace to human nature. Yet notwithstanding all this dormancy of the nobler passions, though incapable of love, they prove the position, (for which physicians can easily account,) that debility and the very fever of the vilest lechery go hand in hand¹⁴. Many of the Bramins are

¹⁴ Montesquieu, in enumerating his reasons why Christianity will never prevail in the east, advances, as one, the prohibition of polygamy, which he mentions as the appointment of nature, and necessary in these climates. Tristram Shandy tells us, that his father was a most excellent system-builder, was sure to make his theory look well, though no man ever crucified the truth at such an unmerciful rate. With all due deference to the great genius of Montesquieu, his philosophy here is exactly contrary to experience. In every country the births of males and females are nearly proportioned to each other. If in any country merchants; and by every authority they are described as the most artful, most hypocritical, and most fraudulent of traders. To sum up their character, let it be added, that the freedom with which their friends ascend the nuptial bed, in matters of love, perhaps, the least of their unsentimental inodificacy. The best Portuguese authors assure us, that the women of every tribe, the wives of princes not excepted, were free to the embraces of the sanctified Bramins; and the Fakiers at this day, under the sanction of privilege, spread pollution, when they please, over every virgin or marriage bed among the Gentoos.

And surely the warmest admirer of Indian philosophy and manners, cannot dispite the picture we have drawn, when he is referred to Messrs. Holwell and Dow for the fullest virtual confirmation of the truth of every feature. At the entrance upon his work, Mr. H. calls the Bramins "a people who from the earliest times have been an ornament to the creation, if so much can with propriety be said of any known people upon Earth!" But at the end of his VIIIth chapter, after having necessarily confessed many circumstances which speak loudly against them, he thus characterises the Gentoos: "In general," says he, "they are a degenerate, crafty, superstitious, litigious and wicked a people, as any rare of beings in the known world, if not eminently more so, especially the common run of the Bramins; and we can truly aver, that during almost five years that we presided in the judicial Cutcherry court of Calcutta, never any murder, or atrocious crime, came before us, but it was proved in the end, a Bramin was at the bottom of it: but then," adds our author, "the remnant of Bramins (whom we have before excepted) who seclude themselves from the communications of the busy world, in a philosophic and religious retirement, and strictly pursue the tenets and true spirit of the Charitab Rhade of Brahmah, we may with equal truth and justice pronounce, are the purest models of genuine piety that now exist, or can be found on the face of the Earth."

This latter sentence sounds very high; but every liberal mind, who has conversed with the world, is polygamy is the appointment of nature, the more athletic nations of Europe have the best claim. But the warlike independent spirit of the northern tribes, who viewed their princes as their companions in war, would never allow their leaders to appropriate eight hundred or a thousand of the finest women, each for his own particular luxury. Their natural ideas of liberty forbade it; while on the other hand the slavish Asiatics, who viewed their rajahs as beings of a superior rank, submitted to the lust of these masters, whose debility prompted the desire of unbounded variety. The history of polygamy will be found to be just. Polygamy is not the child of nature, it is the offspring of tyranny, and is only to be found where the most absolute tyranny subsists. Neither to the genial vigour of passion, but to raging, irritated debility, both the philosopher and physician will attribute the unblushing prevalence of some crimes, crimes which disgrace human nature, and which particularly characterise the depraved manners of the enfeebled east.

convinced that worthy men are to be found in every sect, that of the Indian Fakier perhaps alone excepted; men whose natural sagacity and strong native goodness of heart are preservatives against the full influence of the most pernicious tenets. And thus Mr. Holwell, if we make a little allowance for his most evident partiality, ends his superlative encomiums on the Bramins in a compliment by no means peculiar, in a mere nothing.

The most important question relative to the Gentoos, the very distant and superior antiquity of their scriptures, remains yet unconsidered. Messrs. Holwell and Dow, however opposite in their accounts of the Shastah and its doctrines, most perfectly agree in ascribing to that work an antiquity more remote than that of any known writings. But the testimony of other travellers, ere we proceed further, requires an impartial examination. "The Bedaing or Shaster, the sacred book of the Bramins," says Dow, "contains various accounts of the creation, one philosophical, the others allegorical. These latter," says he, "have afforded ample field for the invention of the Bramins. From the many allegorical systems of creation contained in the Shasters, many different accounts of the cosmogony of the Hindoos have been promulgated in Europe, some travellers adopting one system, some another." By this confession the jarring accounts of other travellers are accounted for, and we have already seen that every striking feature of the pictures they have given is most effectually confirmed by Messrs. H. and D. And thus, the accounts of the superstitious and idolatry of the Bramins; which, till lately, were unquestioned, were by no means without foundation. And indeed it were an unparalleled circumstance, were the concurrent testimony of the most authentic writers and intelligent travellers of the 16th and 17th centuries to deserve no credit. Many of these were men of profound, of superior learning, and of unblemished candour; and for a superior number of years than either Mr. H. or D. conversed with the most learned, and we have no reason to doubt, with the most honest of the Bramins.

One of these, Abraham Roger, lived fifteen years among the Bramins, and was in intimate friendship with one of them, named Padmanaba. He returned to Holland in 1647, where he published his writings, which prove him to have been a learned man, and a diligent inquirer. Of his good sense let one passage bear testimony. "Can we believe," says he, "that there is a generous spirit residing in a people who for two or three thousand years have placed the greatest degree of sanctity and prudence in half starving themselves, and in depriving themselves of the lawful conveniences of life? Yet such austerities were the chief employments of the ancient Brachmans, and are now of the modern Bramins." The sentiment here contained, in value of just observation, true philosophy, true piety, and good common sense, is worth all that our late travellers, for these thirty years past, have written on the philosophy and religion of India.

Mr. Holwell candidly owns that Baldeus sided thirty years among the Bramins; that his translation of the Viedam (the Malabar word for Shastah) is literal, and that it is a monster (ch. iv. p. 69.) that shocks reason and probability; and this happened, he says, by his not attending to the allegory. The errors of other travellers, he owns, did not proceed from misinformation, but from not drawing the veil, from not penetrating; by the help of allegory, into the true doctrines of India. But this we presume in plain English will run thus: former travellers gave us a true picture of the popular religion of India, but they did not attend to the gloss and refinement of the recluses remnant of the Bramins.

And for this very reason we judge them just so much the more worthy of credit. No man needs to take a voyage to India, or to study the sacred Shanscrita, on purpose to discover how the few either gloss or philosophize. He is an idle traveller who gives us the refinements of a learned Jesuit as the religion of Rome. He who displays the true character of it, will tell us what superstition possesses the general mind; will tell us, that supreme veneration for the authority of the pope and holy church, is the only religious principle which has any fixed hold on the belief or practice of the multitude.

And according to the concurrent testimony of all former travellers, who did not allegorize, the date of the first appearance of the Bramin Shasters is involved in the utmost uncertainty. Mr. Holwell and Mr. Dow are the two great champions of the opinion, that the sacred books of India are of higher antiquity than the writings of any other nation, and that the Jewish scriptures are founded upon, and borrowed from them. As each of these writers decries, with no small contempt, the testimony of every traveller except himself, the accounts which these gentlemen have given of the origin of the Shasters require our attention.

Mr. Holwell well knew that the books held sacred in India contain many of the grossest impleties. He therefore owns that the Shastah had undergone two remarkable innovations; and that the Bramins "in process of time lost sight of their divine original, and in its place substituted new and strange doctrines."—"The steadfast faith of the Gentoos touching the antiquity of their scriptures," he tells us (ch. iv. p. 22.) is thus,—"they date the birth of the tenets and doctrines of the Shastah from the expulsion of the angelic beings from the heavenly regions." That 4877 years ago these tenets were reduced into a written body of laws by Bramah, and published to the people of Indostan. That one thousand years after, they underwent a remarkable innovation in the publication of the Chatah Rhade Shastah; and that 3377 years ago (computing from the present year 1777) these original scriptures again suffered "a second and last change or innovation in the publication of the Aughtorrah Rhade Shastah; which occasioned the first and only schism amongst the Gentoos, that subsists to this day, namely between the followers of the Aughtorrah Rhade Shastah and the followers of the Viedam."

These changes of their scriptures our author ascribes to the craft of the priests, who by these means enslaved the people to their own authority. The first innovation was a paraphrase on the Shastah, in which the original was retained. At this time the Bramins appropriated the Sanscrit character to themselves, and introduced that which is now the common one of Hindostan. In the second innovation, says our author, "the original text was in a manner sunk or alluded to only." In these commentaries mythology was first introduced; the history of their princes, numberless ceremonies, and new divinities were added, and "the whole enveloped in impenetrable obscurity by fable and allegory, beyond the comprehension even of the common tribe of Bramins themselves." Again, says our author, "The Bramins having tasted the sweets of priestly power by the first of their innovations, determined to enlarge and establish it by the promulgation of the last.—In this the exterior modes of worship were so multiplied, and such a numerous train of new divinities created—the daily obligations of religious duties, which were by these new institutes imposed on every Gentoos, from the highest to the lowest rank of the people, were of so intricate and alarming a nature, as to require a Bramin to be at hand, to explain and officiate in the performance of them.—From this period superstition, the sure support of priestcraft, took fast possession of the people—every head of a family was obliged to have a house-hold Bramin,—and in fact they became mere machines, actuated and governed, as either the good or evil intentions of their household tyrant dictated."

The schism produced by the last innovation of the Shastah is thus mentioned by our author: "The Bramins of Cormandell and Malabar, finding their brethren upon the course of the Gauges had taken this bold step to enslave the laity, set up for themselves, and formed a scripture of their own, founded, as they said, upon the Chatah Bhade of Bramah; this they called the Viedam,—or the divine words of the mighty spirit."

Thus, the Gentoos Scriptures were translated from the language of angels and first reduced to writing by Bramah 4877 years ago; that is, when Methuselah was a boy. They underwent a great change 100 years after, which was near 800 years before Abraham was born; and a still greater change 500 years after, which was before Jacob went into Egypt. Since which time they have continued unchanged, and esteemed by their different sects as sacred.

Mr. Dow on the other hand assures us, (Dissert. p. xxvii.) The Bramins maintain that the Bedas (Mr. H's Bhades) are the divine laws, which Brimha, at the creation of the world, delivered for the instruction of mankind. But they affirm that their meaning was perverted in the first age, by the ignorance and wickedness of some princes, whom they represent as evil spirits who then haunted the Earth. They call those evil genii Dewtas, and tell many strange allegorical legends concerning them; such as, that the Bedas being lost, were afterwards recovered by Bishen, in the form of a fish, who brought them up from the bottom of the ocean, into which they were thrown by a deo or demon." Here we are told that the Bramins maintain that Brimha was the author of their Scriptures. Yet in the next page Mr. D. tells us the Bramins deny that any such person as Brimha ever existed.

"The first credible account we have of the Bedas" (says Mr. D.) "is, that about the commencement of the Cal Jug, of which era the present year (1768) is the 4886th year; they were written, or rather collected by a great philosopher and reputed prophet called Beas Muni, or Beas the inspired. The Bramins do not give to Beas Muni the merit of being the author of the Bedas. They however acknowledge that he reduced them into the present form, dividing them into four distinct books, after having collected the detached pieces of which they are composed from every part of India. It is, upon the whole, probably, that they are not the work of one man, on account of their immense bulk." And for the same reason it is also probable that all the British acts of parliament are not the work of one man.

These four Bedas Mr. D. distinguishes by the name of the Bedas Shaster. Of Goutam the author of the Nandiraen Shaster we have already given a sufficient account. By what we have already cited, Mr. Dow's most cordial acquiescence in the high antiquity of the Shasters is evident. In the following it is brought to a point. "Whether the Hindoos" (says he, Pref. p. viii.) "possess any true history of greater antiquity than other nations, must altogether rest upon the authority of the Bramins, till we shall become better acquainted with their records. They give a very particular account of the origin of the Jewish religion in records of unobscured antiquity. Raja Tusa, say they, who is placed in the first ages of the Cal Jug, had a son who apostatized from the Hindoo faith, for which he was banished by his father to the west. The apostate fixed his residence in a country called Mohgod, and propagated the Jewish religion, which the impostor Mahommed further corrupted. The Cal Jug commenced about 4885 years ago, and whether the whole story may not relate to Jerah and his son Abraham, is a point, which" (after our undoubted hints have decided, Mr. D. might have said) "we leave others to determine."

"There is one circumstance," he continues, "which goes far to prove that there is some connection between the Bramin Bedas and the doctrines contained in the Old Testament. Ever since the promulgation of the religion of Mahommed, which is founded upon Moses and the prophets, the Bramins have totally rejected their fourth Bedas, called the Obstar Bah, as the schism of Mahommed, according to them, has been founded upon that book. However extraordinary this reason is for rejecting the fourth part of their religious records, it can scarcely be doubted, as it is in the mouth of every Bramin."

Having now ascertained Mr. Holwell's and Mr. Dow's opinion of the superior antiquity of the Bramin records, we shall proceed to examine the merits of this claim. But we shall by no means altogether rest upon the authority of the Bramins. This, we presume, would be an unworthy of a man of common sense, as it would be weak in an historian to rest altogether with implicit belief on the characters of men and events, which an exiled tyrant may have been pleased to give, when for his own consolation he wrote the memoirs of his own merited fall. Nor will we suspend our opinion of the Bramin records, till we shall become better acquainted with them. For we have already most ample matter even from Mess. Holwell and Dow themselves, from which, by every criterion of analogy and of collateral and internal evidence, we may be fully enabled to form our judgment.

We shall begin with the two last sentences from Mr. Dow. And surely it cannot escape the slightest attention, that he gets out with begging a point,

(a point never to be granted,) and that immediately upon such begged authority, he slips upon us, what he calls an undoubted authority. Mr. Dow strenuously insists that all the learned Bramins assert the unity of the Deity. And nothing is more certain than that this, and not the great body of the rituals of the Jewish religion, was the principal doctrine which the Jews received from Abraham. And surely the following reasoning will never bear the touch. The imposture of Mahomedism is founded upon Moses and the prophets; that imposture is also so certainly founded upon the fourth Bedas, that the Gentooes for that reason have rejected that part of their scripture: therefore this goes far to prove that Moses and the prophets are connected with, or (as the hint implies) derived from the Bedas. (This is the fair analysis of our author's reasoning: but unhappily for his whole argument, Mahomedism is not founded on Moses and the prophets. Let him again peruse his Koran; and he will find that it indeed contains a strange perversion of Moses and the New Testament. But surely Mr. D. will not pretend that the historical passages of the O. and N. T. which thus fill the Koran, are founded upon the Obatar Bah. The duty of prayer, and the worship of One God, were borrowed by Mahomed, who was bred a Pagan, from Moses and the prophets. But surely Mr. Dow will not persist to insinuate that these, the doctrines of the spouse Abraham, were borrowed from those who banished him for apostasy; or that a sameness in these doctrines will prove the superior antiquity of the Obatar Bah. Yet to these circumstances, for no other can be supposed, most his observations be reduced. But who has ever read this Obatar Bah?¹⁶ Why truly Mr. D. tells us, p. xxix. that "the language of the Obatar Bah is now become obsolete, so that very few Bramins pretend to read it with propriety." And this in our opinion goes far to prove that the Bramins know little or nothing about the contents of it. In discussing an argument repetition is often necessary: both Mr. Holwell and Mr. Dow assure us that they received their information from some of the most learned of the Bramins. And an equal credit is certainly due to each of these gentlemen. But this affords us a clear demonstration that the Bramins contradict each other in the most essential circumstances, in matters of no less importance, than in the question, who were the authors, and what are the contents of their sacred Scriptures.

Nothing can be more evident than that both Mess. Holwell and Dow have endeavoured to give sanction to their favourite systems, by the authority of their admired Gentooes. Mr. Holwell's system is a species of Christianity. And Mr. Dow surely cannot be offended, if we call his, radically the reverse of every such species. And whatever deference we willingly pay to the veracity of both these gentlemen, yet we must observe that, one of their learned Bramins must have been amazingly erroneous. And one of these gentlemen has perhaps given a deeper attention to his subject than the other. If we can determine whether Mr. Holwell or Mr. Dow be most authentic, some light will from thence be thrown on the fabrication of the Gentoo Scriptures. Nor will we hesitate one moment to pronounce, that, in our opinion, Mr. Holwell's account, upon the whole, is the most authentic. Our reasons are these: Mr. Dow confesses that he had neither time nor leisure to acquire the Sanscrit language, the tongue in which the sacred books of India are written, but that he trusted entirely to his pundit or interpreter. Mr. Holwell tells us that he read and understood the Sanscrit. Mr. Dow tells us, "the Mahomedans know nothing of the Hindoo learning, and that it is utterly inaccessible to any but those of their own cast." His words are these, "The Bedas are, by the Bramins, held so sacred that they permit no other sect to read them. . . . they would deem it an unpardonable sin to satisfy their curiosity in that respect, were it even within the compass of their power. The Bramins themselves are bound by such strong ties of religion, to confine those writings to their own tribe, that were any of them knows to read them to others, he would be immediately excommunicated. This punishment is worse than even death itself among the Hindoos. The offender is not only thrown down from the noblest order to the most polluted cast, but his posterity are considered for ever incapable of being received into his former dignity." (See Dissert. p. xxix.) And Mr. D. adds, "Not all the authority of Akbar could prevail with the Bramins to reveal the principles of their faith."¹⁷ p. xxv. And all this does very well when brought as an argument against the accounts which every other writer has given of the Bramins. But surely Mr. Dow ought to have paid some respect to his reader's power of memory, ought to have told him by what means it happened that he was the only man who ever overleapt the dreadful fences which guard the Gentoo faith in impenetrable darkness. Excommunication, that punishment worse than death itself, was, it seems, disregarded on his account; and, what the great emperor Akbar could never obtain, the principles of the Bramin faith were laid open to him. In the very page preceding the above quotation of the impossibility of getting a Bramin to read his Scriptures to one of another cast, Mr. Dow, without the least hint how the dread difficulty was overcome, simply tells us that he "prevailed upon his noble friend the Bramin, ¹⁶ So strict in this are they, says Mr. Dow, that only one Mussulman was ever instructed in it, and his knowledge was obtained by fraud. Mahomed Akbar, emperor of India, though bred a Mahomedan, studied several religions. Is the Christian he was instructed by a Portuguese. But finding that of the Hindoos inaccessible, he had recourse to art. A boy of parts, named Feizi, was, as the orphan of a Bramin, put under the care of one of the most eminent of these philosophers, and obtained full knowledge of their hidden religion. But the fraud being discovered, he was laid under the restraint of an oath, and it does not appear that he ever communicated the knowledge thus acquired.

¹⁷ It is curious to observe that the Obatar Bah, so ancient according to Mr. D. that hardly any body can read it, is nevertheless executed by Mr. H. as the most modern, and most corrupted of all the Gentoo Scriptures. Mr. D. himself mentions this disagreement.

to procure for him a pundit from the university of Benares, well versed in the Shastras, and master of all the knowledge of that learned body." And this pundit or interpreter, thus openly procured from an university, read to Mr. Dow, as he assures us, the sacred books of the Bramins, and explained to him the principles of their faith.

On this we shall make no further remark; but proceed to some other reasons why we prefer the authority of Mr. Holwell. Mr. D. has in some instances discovered rather a partial acquaintance with his subject; and even a desire to suppress what he did not like. He undertakes to give us an account of the religious rites and principles of the Bramins; he laments that the classics have given us such imperfect accounts of the Druids; and hints that his account of the Bramins will leave posterity no room to complain of a like defect. Yet how unkind to future ages has he been! He says not one word of the holiness of the Gentoos cows. He says not one word of the remission of sin, and subsequent holiness which they ascribe to the sprinkling of cow-pas and cow-dung; though no fact can be better ascertained than the supreme veneration which the Bramins pay to the cow and to her merest excrements; for no doctrine was ever more generally received in any country than this in India. His total omission therefore of the most popular religious ceremony of the Gentoos is quite unpardonable.

"It is an allowed truth," says Mr. Holwell, "that there never was yet any system of theology broached to mankind, whose first professors and propagators did not announce its descent from G-d." Yet though this observation be universally and incontestably just, and though no people lay bolder claims to various revelations than the Gentoos, though such is the very spirit of every legend, yet all this will be quite unknown to future ages; for Mr. Dow passes over all these pretensions in the slightest manner. "The existence of Brimbs," he says, "is not believed. Bekas Muni, the author of the Bedang, was a reputed prophet; and Goutam, the founder of the other sect, was only a philosopher." And thus the Gentoos' pretension to divine revelations, a fact as notorious as the Gentoos' veneration of cow-dung, is also very handsomely suppressed.

Mr. Holwell, on the other hand, has also his foibles. His system, and all the arguments he has brought in support of it, are pretty well spiced with insanity. Yet whenever he was so happy as to lose sight of his favourite system, Mr. Holwell's accounts of Gentoos opinions and manners bear every mark of authenticity, and are fully confirmed by the most intelligent of former travellers. Mr. Holwell's account therefore of the origin of the Gentoos Scriptures deserves some regard.

According to Mr. Dow, Bekas Muni, or the inspired, the collector of the Bedang, lived about 4000 years ago, and some ages after him his Bedang was revised by one Sirder Swami. "Since which," he says, "it has been reckoned sacred, and not subject to any further alterations." And Goutam, the author of the other sect, lived near 4000 years ago. Mr. Holwell on the other hand affirms that there were two great corruptions of the Bramin doctrine. And his manner of accounting for it, that the priests of one half of India and those of the other half ried with each other in inventing wild and monstrous legends, on purpose to raise their power by means of the deepest superstition, is infinitely more credible, than that these huge volumes of absurd metaphysics, and numberless contradictory fables, the Bedang and Neshirin Shasters, were collected and compiled by two or three profound philosophers.

Both Mr. H. and Mr. D. agree that since the innovations and compilings which they mention, the Shasters have remained unaltered, and have been held by their followers as sacred. That there should be such a number of commentators upon the Scriptures of Bramah, about 4000 years ago, and none since that time, appears to us highly incredible: that the priests of that period found it their interest to invent new legends, but that the priests of succeeding ages added nothing, appears to us as the weakest of suppositions. By a succession of commentators other countries trace the antiquity of their books of religion and philosophy to certain periods. Nothing is more natural than that this kind of proof should arise. Yet nothing of this kind is offered to ascertain the high antiquity of the books of Hindostan.

The consequence therefore is, that, like the legends of the Komiah nation, these Shasters are the accumulated superstition of many ages, some of which were very distant from each other, and some of them not very distant from our own times. Not to mention the authority of Ferishta¹⁸, the Persian historian of Hindostan, who denies the high antiquity of the Gentoos writings; certain it is, from internal evidence, that the doctrines of the pure Shastah of Mr. Holwell were unknown or unregarded by the Bramins who lived about 2000

¹⁸ Ferishta asserts, that the Hindoos have no history of better authority than the Mahaberit, which is a legendary poem, composed by the present Bramins of a much later date than the Shasters. Mr. Dow, however, sets this authority aside. "The Mohammedans," he says, "knew nothing of the Hindoo learning," and Ferishta collected his accounts from Persian authors, being altogether unacquainted with the Sanscrit, or learned language of the Bramins, in which the internal history of India is comprehended." In invalidating the authority of the history which he gave to the public, Mr. Dow might have added one circumstance which most effectually would have served his purpose; a circumstance which makes the whole of Ferishta's history appear as a mere fabrication. This historian, though he treats of that particular period, has not one word of the arrival, or of the wars of the Portuguese in India. Though they reigned lords of all the Asiatic seas; though his native country, Persia, and every prince of India, were, at different times, for almost a whole century, harassed by their wars; though the politics of every court of Hindostan were influenced by the conquests and neighbourhood of these warlike and powerful strangers, who treated with Achebar, honest Ferishta, in his history of that very period, as translated by Mr. Dow, appears never to have heard one word about the matter. What pity is it that Mr. Dow, who shows such good will to condemn his author's authority, should have omitted this conclusive and most extraordinary circumstance!

years ago. When a religious rite is in direct opposition to a cardinal injunction, we must give up the antiquity of the one or the other. Mr. Holwell tells us that the pure Shastah of Bramah prohibits self-murder under the dreadful penalty of eternal damnation; that the soul which commits it shall never have another state of probation in a mortal body. Yet no fact in ancient history is more certain than that the Indian philosophers, about 2000, and 1500 years ago, usually and ostentatiously in public, committed self-murder, in the belief that it would convey them immediately to Heaven. Did these philosophers know or believe what the pure Shastah of Bramah says of suicide? Or did Bramah's wives, and the priests who instituted the rites of this horrid self-murder of widows, did they know of this dreadful prohibition?

Mr. Holwell assures us (ch. viii. p. 15.) that the angelic fall, and its consequent metastempsychosis, the one the crime, the other the punishment of these unhappy free agents, form the res qua non of the Gentoos*. But Mr. Dow says not one word of the angelic fall; so far from it, his Bramin system excludes such supposition. From hence, and from numberless other irrefragable proofs, certain it is that the Bramins are irreconcilably divided among themselves upon what are the doctrines of the Shastah. Different sects of all religions give different interpretations to their records held sacred. But it is peculiar to the religions of India to contradict each other in the most essential historical circumstances.

This disagreement, peculiar to the learned Bramins, is easily accounted for. They have a great multiplicity of Shasters; as many perhaps as there were fanatic sermons in the days of Cromwell. And to this let it be added, they are written in a dead language, in a tongue and character different from those of common use in India; and their contents are concealed with the most jealous care. The Bramins are the sole masters of them; and to read and explain them to the man of another cast incur the most dreadful of all the Gentoos punishments. On account of this secrecy some may venerate the wisdom and secretism of their doctrines. For our part we cannot help being led, by this very cue, to suspect that there is something extremely absurd, frivolous, and childish, in what is thus religiously enveloped in the veil of darkness.

* Yet in ch. vii., p. 151, he tells us that the Gentoos have lost sight of their original sin, or defection; "(i. e. the angelic fall) and that the whole conduct of the drama of the Chatah and Aughturah Bhades—has not the smallest retrospect to their first transgression, or the means of atoning for it.—This," adds he, "is the situation of the bulk of the people of Indostan, as well as of the modern Bramins; amongst the latter, if we except one in a thousand, (i. e. who can allegorize,) we give them over-measure."

 Mr. Dow says, (p. xxxviii. in a note,) "There are many shasters among the Hindoos, so that those writers who affirmed, that there was but one Shaster in India, which, like the Bible of the Christians, or Koran of the followers of Mahomed, contained the first principles of the Bramin faith, have deceived themselves and the public."

In the course of this inquiry we have seen some most striking alterations in the Bramin tenets and character. These philosophers do not now upon principle die by fire. Sixteen hundred years ago they had no idols. Yet on the arrival of the modern Europeans in India, all the superstition of ancient Egypt in the adoration of animals and vegetables seemed more than revived by the Bramins. Two hundred years ago the Gentoos princes offered immense sums for the sacred tooth of the monkey Hachimant. We are assured by gentlemen of observation who have been long in India, that there is not now a Gentoos of fortune who would give a farthing for it. And both Mr. H. and D. found such able philosophers and allegorizers among the Bramins, as sever any former traveller conversed with in India.

"Sieb," says Mr. H., "literally signifies a destroyer, an avenger, a punisher, and is the object of great dismay and terror to the Gentoos, but modern exponents of Bramah's Shastah have softened the rigour of his character by giving him names and attributes of a very different nature from that of Sieb. They call him Moomor, (a contraction of Mahamoor, the most mighty destroyer of evil,) and under this soothing title he is worshipped, not as Sieb the destroyer, but as the destroyer of evil. The other epithet they have given to him is Moidéb (a contraction of Mahadebtah, the most mighty angel); in this sense he is worshipped as the avenger of evil, and under this character he has the most altars erected to him."

After this most egregious instance of modernizing, nothing need be added in proof that the present are very different from the ancient doctrines of India. In a word, the Rabbinical pretensions that Adam, Seth, and Enoch wrote great part of the Talmud, and that Abraham taught astronomy and mathematics in the plains of Mamre, are not more absurdly ridiculous than the Gentoos pretensions to a similar antiquity of their sacred books. Every one, who is acquainted with the history of the human mind, knows what an alteration in the manners of that most bigoted people the Jews was introduced by the Babylonian captivity. Before that period amazingly dull and stupid, after their return from Assyria they began to philosophize. The superstition and idolatry of the modern Bramins have certainly, in the same manner, received great improvement of features from the conversation of Europeans, whose example, however otherwise vicious, could not fail to convince them of the absurdity of such mental weakness. Nor can we pass unobserved the rejection of the fourth Beda. By its subject, the knowledge of the Good Being, it seems to be the most valuable of the whole, except the second, which treats of the religious and moral duties. Yet the Bramins, says Mr. Dow, have long rejected it, because the Mahomedan religion, they say, is borrowed from it. On the supposition, which they pretend, that their sacred books were dictated by divine authority, the rejection of any part is as unwarrantable as the reason for rejecting the fourth Beda is submissive and ridiculous. The rejection of a part of their sacred scriptures thus openly confessed, and yet the whole most carefully concealed from the eyes of every inquirer; the alterations of their tenets and character; the propensity the human mind has to improve when under long and favourable opportunities, all concur in demonstrating that not only the systems of Messrs. H. and D. are widely different from those of the ancient Gentoo; but that whatever in future may be given by the most learned Bramins, as their genuine ancient tenets, ought by no means to be depended upon as such. While the Bramins continue a sect, those leading principles of human nature, zeal for what is esteemed sacred, and partiality to national honour, will ever influence them, when they lay their philosophy before the eyes of strangers, particularly where the boasted secrecy of near 4000 years promises the impossibility of detection. Shall we believe that the glosses and refinements of the modern learned Bramins contain the genuine ideas and principles of the ancient Hindoos? We may as well believe that the popish priests on the Indian mission will give the Bramins a faithful history of the detestable tyranny and abominable wickedness of the popes and their holy church during the monkish ages. Who that considers these striking facts, and their certain consequences, can withhold his contempt when he is told of the religious care with which the Bramins have these four thousand years preserved their sacred rites? An absurdity only equal to that of those who tell us, that God instructed Adam in the mysteries of free masonry, and that Noah every new moon held a mason's lodge in the ark.

And yet all this is nothing to the ridicule of what follows: Where does the pure Shastah of Bramah exist? Mr. D.'s learned pundit seems never to have heard a word about it. Why truly, the original text of Bramah is preserved, says Mr. H., ch. iv. p. 13, in the Chatah Bhade, or six scriptures of the mighty spirit. This work, he says, is a paraphrase on the pure Shastah, which consisted only of four scriptures; therefore the original text must be only interspersed. And this paraphrase Mr. H. reprobates as the infamous work of priestcraft, and the original cause of the polytheism of the Gentoo. And this pure text is not only to be picked up, at discretion and pleasure, out of this mother of idolatry, but the ability so to do is confined to a very few families. "The original, plain, pure, and simple tenets" (says Mr. H. p. 15.) "of the Chatah Bhade of Bramah" (1500 years after its first promulgation) "became by degrees utterly lost; except to three or four Goseyn families, who at this day are only capable of reading and expounding it, from the Sanscrit character; to these may be added a few objects of the tribe of Batteezaz Bramins, who can read, and expound from the Chatah Bhade which still preserved the text of the original, as before remarked."

Can pretensions to the most remote antiquity be more completely ridiculous! By these three or four families who only can discover, read, and expound the pure Shastah of Bramah, we must understand those Bramins with whom Mr. H. con-

* The absurdity of this arbitrary selection of the pure shastah is demonstrated, undesignedly, by Mr. H. himself. He says the pure Shastah of Bramah contained no mythology; and yet what he has selected as the pure Shastah, as the quotations already given, evince, is mythological.

vented, and whom, in the utmost probability, he taught to say as he said; and then (like those who have been to the cunning man on inquiry after stolen goods or a sweetheart) came home highly satisfied with having his own misrepresentation to him in other words.

And thus, from the concurrent testimony of all former travellers, most virtually confirmed by Messrs. H. and D. we have displayed the wild, capricious, and gross spirit of the Gentoo theology; the endless confusion of their legends; the impiety and perversity of their metaphysics; their ignorance of natural philosophy; the immorality of their penances and idolatry; the general torpidity and baseness of the Hindu character; the alteration of their principles and manners in various ages; the utter uncertainty of the various dates of their writings held sacred; and, above all, the absurdity of those who have maintained that these writings have remained unaltered almost three 4000 years, and are of superior antiquity to the records of any other nation.

It is an observation founded on experience, that the zeal of any sect, in giving an account of his religion to one who knows nothing about it, will give every circumstance the best gloss, and strain every feint, as much as possible, to a conformity to the ideas of his intelligent friend. And from the contradictory accounts of Mr. H. and Mr. D. let future travellers beware: less they intrude upon Europe the opinions of two or three Bramins, as the only genuine definitions of the Gentoo. The irreconcilable contradictions of these philosophers have been demonstrated. And these contradictions evidently appear to have thus arisen: The philosophy and mythology of the Gentoo form such a boundless chaos of confusion and contradictions, that no two of these philosophers, unacquainted with each other, can possibly give the same or a consistent account of their tenets: And whenever one of superior liberality rams up a fine philosophical theory out of the original mass, another, perhaps equally ingenious, comes and puts one in mind of the fable of the bee and the spider in Swift's Battle of the Books: The spider had with great pains just finished his web to catch flies, when in this manner Josephus, a man of great abilities wrote the history of the Jews. He has altered, suppressed, glossed, and falsified on purpose to adopt the manners and opinions of his countrymen, as much as possible, to the taste of the Greek and Roman philosophers. In the same manner, we believe, it may be asserted that every Jesuit behaves, when he defends popery in conversation with an indignant disserter from the church of Rome, who has the art to appear ignorant of the doctrines of the papacy, and of the writers of that communion: One may often meet with a sensible papist, who, either from ignorance of the history of his own religion, or from prejudice in its favour, will very confidently deny the horrid cruelties, superstitions, and villainous acts of holy orders; those intrigues and transactions which form the principal part of the history of Europe during six or three thousand centuries. Yet what will men will upon such evidence reject the testimony of ages? The alibi is apt, and the inference is the same.

the bag blundered that way, and demolished it. "A plague split you," quoth the spider, "for a giddy whoremonger, is it you, with a vengeance, have made all this litter and do you think I have nothing else to do, in the devil's name, but to mend and repair after your a—?"

And verily, verily, in this strain may the most learned of the modern Bramine exclaim to each other.

LUSIAD VIII.

With eye unmoved the silent catastrophe
The pictured sire with seeming life endued
A verdant vine-bough waving in his right,
Smooth shined his swartest beard of glossy white;
When thus, as swift the Moor unfolds the word,
The valiant Paulus to the Lusitan lord;

"Bold though these figures frown, yet bolder far
These godlike heroes shined in ancient war.

In that hoar sire, of mien serene, august,
Lusus behold, no robber chief unjust; 10
His cluster'd though, the same which Bacchus bore,
He waves, the emblem of his care of yore;
The friend of savage man; to Bacchus dear,
The son of Bacchus, or the bold compeer,
What time his yellow locks with vine-leaves curl'd,
The youthful god subdued the savage world,
Made vineyards sward o'er the desart waste;
And humanised the nations as he past.

Lusus, the loved companion of the god,
In Spain's fair bosom first his last abode, 20
Our kingdom founded, and illustrious reign'd
In those fair isles, the blest Elysium feign'd,

¹ Caposini immediately before, and in the former book, calls the ensign of Lusus a bough; here he calls it the green thyrus of Bacchus,

O verde tyro, foi de Bacco usado.

The thyrus however was a jacinth twisted with ivy leaves, used in the sacrifices of Bacchus.

² In this assertion our author has the authority of Strabo, a foundation sufficient for a poet. Nor are there wanting several Spanish writers, particularly Barbosa, who seriously affirms that Homer drew the fine description of Elysium, in his fourth Odyssey, from the beautiful valleys of Spain, where in one of his voyages, it is said, he arrived. Egypt, however, seems to have a better title to this honour. The fable of Charon, and the judges of the poetical Hell, are evidently borrowed from the Egyptian rites of burial, and are older than Homer. After a ferryman had conveyed the corpse over a lake, certain judges examined the life of the deceased, particularly his claim to the virtues of loyalty, and, according to the report, decreed or refused the honours of sepulture. The place of the catacombs, according to Diodorus Siculus, was surrounded with deep canals, beautiful meadows, and a wilderness of groves. And it is universally known that the greatest part of the Grecian fables were fabricated from the customs and opinions of Egypt. Several other nations have also claimed the honour of affording the idea of the fields of the blessed. Even the Scotch challenge it. Many Grecian fables, says an author of that country, are evidently founded on the reports of the Phœnician sailors. That these navigators traded to the coast

Where whirling off the Guadiana roves,
And Douro murmurs through the flowery groves,
Hera with her horns he left his deathless fame,
And Lusitania's clime shall ever bear his name.
That other chief th' embroidered silk displays,
Tost o'er the deep whole years of weary days,
On Tago's banks at last his vows he paid:
To wisdom's godlike power, the Jove-born maid, 30
Who fired his lips with eloquence divine,
On Tago's banks he reared the hallowed shrine:
Ulysses he, though fated to destroy
On Asian ground the heaven-built towers of Troy,
On Europe's strand, more grateful to the skies,
He made th' eternal walls of Lisbon rise."

"But who that godlike terror of the plains,
Who strews the smoking field with heaps of slain?
What numerous legions fly in dire dismay,
Whose standards wide the eagle's wings display?"
The pagan asks; the brother chief replies, 41
"Unconquer'd doom'd, proud Rome's dread standard flies.

His crook thrown by, fired by his nations' woes,
The hero shap'd Viriatus rose;
His country saved proclaim'd his warlike fame,
And Rome's wide empire trembled at his name.

of Britain is certain. In the middle of summer, the season when the ancients performed their voyages, for about six weeks there is no night over the Orkney islands; the disk of the Sun during that time scarcely sinking below the horizon. This appearance, together with the calm which usually prevails at that season, and the beautiful verdure of the islands, could not fail to excite the admiration of the Tyrians; and their accounts of the place naturally afforded the idea that these islands were inhabited by the spirits of the just. This, says our author, is countenanced by Homer, who places his islands of the happy at the extremity of the ocean. That the fables of Scylla, the Gorgades, and several others, were founded on the accounts of navigators, seems probable; and on this supposition the Insula Fortunatae and Purpurariae, now the Canary and Madeira islands, also claim the honour of giving colour to the description of Elysium. The truth however appears to be this: that a place of happiness is reserved for the spirits of the good is the natural suggestion of that anxiety and hope concerning the future, which animates the human breast. All the barbarous nations of Africa and America agree in placing their Heaven in beautiful islands at an immense distance over the ocean. The idea is universal, and is natural to every nation in that state of barbarous simplicity.

³ Alluding to the fable of Neptune, Apollo, and Laomedon.

⁴ For some account of this tradition see note 24 of Lusiad III. Ancient traditions, however fabulous, have a good effect in poetry. Virgil has not scrupled to insert one, which required an apology.

—Prisca fides factio, sed fama pomonia.

Spenser has given us the history of Brute and his descendants at full length in the Fæerie Queen; and Milton, it is known, was so fond of that absurd legend, that he intended to write a poem on the subject; and by this fondness was induced to mention it as a truth in his Introduction to the History of England.

⁵ Paulus de Gama.

That generous pride which Rome to Pyrrhus⁶
bore,

To him they show'd not; for they fear'd him more.

Not on the field o'ercome by manly force;

Peaceful he slept, and now a mangled corpse 50

By treason slain he lay. How stern, behold,

That other hero, firm, erect, and bold:

The power by which he boasted he divin'd,

Beside him pictur'd stands, the milk-white hind:

Injured by Rome, the stern Sertorius fled

To Tago's shore, and Lusius offspring led;

Their worth he knew; in scatter'd flight he drove

The standards painted with the birds of Jove.

And lo, the flag whose shining colours own

The glorious founder of the Lusian throne! 60

Some deem the warrior of Hungarian race⁷,

Some from Lorraine the godlike hero trace⁸,

From Tagus' banks the haughty Moor expell'd,

Galicja's sons, and Leon's warriors quell'd,

To weeping Salem's ever-hallowed meads

His warlike bands the holy Henry leads,

By holy war to sanctify his crown,

And to his latest race auspicious waft it down.⁹

"And who this awful chief?" aloud exclaims

The wondering regent: "O'er the fields he flames¹⁰

In dazzling steel, where'er he bends his course

The battle sinks beneath his headlong force;

Against his troops, though few, the numerous foes

In vain their spears and towery walls oppose.

With smoking blood his armour sprinkled o'er,

High to the knees his courser paws in gore;

O'er crowns and blood-stain'd ensigus scatter'd

round

He rides; his courser's brazen hoofs resound."¹¹

"In that great chief," the second Ganna cries,

"The first Alonzo¹² strikes thy wondering eyes. 80

From Lusius' realm the pagan Moors he drove;

Heaven, whom he loved, bestow'd on him such

love,

Beneath him, bleeding of its mortal wound,

The Moorish strength lay prostrate on the ground.

Nor Ammon's son, nor greater Julius dared

With troops so few, with hosts so numerous war'd:

Nor less shall fame the subject heroes own:

Behold that hoary warrior's careful frown!

On his young pupil's fight his burning eyes¹³

He darts, and, 'Turn thy flying host,' he cries, 90

Back to the field!—the veteran and the boy

Back to the field exult with furious joy:

Their ranks now'd down, the boastful foe recedes,

The vanquish'd triumph, and the victor bleeds.

Again that mirror of unshaken faith,

Egax behold, a chief self doom'd to death¹⁴.

Beneath Castilia's sword this monarch lay;

Homage he wou'd his helpless king should pay;

His haughty king relieved, the treaty spurns,

With conscious pride the noble Egax burns; 100

His comely spouse and infant race he leads,

Himself the same, in sentenced felon's weeds;

Around their necks the knotted halters bound,

With naked feet they tread the stony ground;

And prostrate now before Castilia's throne

Their offer'd lives their monarch's pride atone.

Ah, Rome! no more thy generous counsel¹⁵ boast,

Whose low submission saved his ruin'd host:

No father's woes assail'd his steadfast mind:

The dearest ties the Lusian chief resign'd. 110

"There, by the stream, a town besieged behold,

The Moorish tents the shatter'd walls infold.

Fierce as the lion from the covert springs,

When hunger gives his rage the whirlwind's wing;

From ambush, lo, the valiant Fuaz pours,

And whelms in sudden rout th' astonish'd Moor.

The Moorish king in captive chains he sends¹⁶;

And low at Lisbon's throne the royal captive bends

Fuaz again the artist's skill displays;

Far o'er the ocean shade his ensigus' rays: 120

In crackling flames the Moorish galleys fly,

And the red blaze ascends the blushing sky:

O'er Avila's high steep the flames aspire,

And wrapt the forests in a sheet of fire:

They seem the waves beneath the plow to boil;

And distant far around for many a mile

The glassy deep reflects the ruddy blaze;

Far on the edge the yellow light decays, [dread

And blends with hovering blackness. Great and Thus shone the day when first the combat bled,

The first our heroes battled on the main, 151

The glorious prelude of our naval reign,

Which now the waves beyond the burning zone

And northern Greenland's frost-bound blazes own.

Again behold brave Fuaz dares the fight!

O'erpower'd he sinks beneath the Moorish might;

Smiling in death the martyr-hero lies,

And lo, his soul triumphant mounts the skies.

Here now behold, in warlike pomp pourtray'd.

A foreign navy brings the pious aid¹⁷. 140

Lo, marching from the decks the squadrons spread,

Strango their attire, their aspect firm and dread.

⁶ When Pyrrhus king of Epirus was at war with the Romans, his physician offered to poison him. The senate rejected the proposal, and acquainted Pyrrhus of the designed treason. Florus remarks on the infamous assassination of Viriatus, that the Roman senate did him great honour; ut videretur alter vinci non potuisse; it was a confession that they could not otherwise conquer him. Vid. Flor. 1. 17. For a fuller account of this great man, see note 13 of Lusiad I.

⁷ See note 10 of Lusiad III.

⁸ King of Portugal. See note 21 of Lusiad III.

⁹ "Some, indeed most writers, say, that the queen," (of whom see Lusiad III.) "advancing with her army towards Guimaraes, the king, without waiting till his governor joined him, engaged them and was routed: but that afterwards the remains of his army being joined by the troops under the command of Egax Munitz, engaged the army of the queen a second time, and gained a complete victory." Univ. Hist.

¹⁰ See the same story, Lusiad III, verse 293.

¹¹ So, Posthumus, who, overpowered by the Samnites, submitted to the indignity of passing under the yoke or gallowes.

¹² The Alcaides, or tributary governors under the miramolin or emperor of Morocco, are often by the Spanish and Portuguese writers styl'd kings. He who was surpris'd and taken prisoner by Don Fuaz Roopinho was named Ganna. Fuaz, after having gained the first naval victory of the Portuguese, also experienced their first defeat. With one-and-twenty sail he attacked fifty-four large galleys of the Moors. The sea, says Braxilas, which had lately furnished him with trophies, now supplied him with a tomb.

¹³ A navy of crossers, mostly English. See Lusiad III, verse 447.

The holy cross their ensigns bold display,
 To Salem's aid they plough'd the watery way;
 Yet first, the cause the same, on Tago's shore
 They dye their maiden swords in pagan gore.
 Proud stood the Moor on Lisboa's warlike towers,
 From Lisboa's walls they drive the Moorish powers:
 Amid the thickest of the glorious fight,
 Lo, Henry falls, a gallant German knight, 150
 A martyr falls: that holy tomb behold,
 There waves the blossom'd palm the boughs of gold:

O'er Henry's grave the sacred plant arose,
 And from the leaves, Heaven's gift, gay health redundant flows¹⁴.

"'Aloft, unfurl,' the valiant Pains cries;
 Instant new wars on new-spread ensigns rise.
 In robes of white behold a priest advance¹⁵!
 His sword in splinters smites the Moorish lances:
 Arrocbez won revenges Lira's fall:
 And lo, on fair Savilia's batter'd wall, 160
 How boldly calm amid the crashing spears,
 That hero-form the Lusian standard rears.
 There bleeds the war on fair Vandalia's plain:
 Lo, rushing through the Moors o'er hills of slain
 The hero rides, and proves by genuine claim
 The son of Egas¹⁶, and his worth the same.
 Pierced by his dart the standard-bearer dies;
 Beneath his feet the Moorish standard lies:
 High o'er the field, behold the glorious blaze;
 The victor-youth the Lusian flag displays. 170
 Lo, while the Moon through midnight azure rides,
 From the high wall adown his spear-staff glides
 The dauntless Gerrald: in his left he bears¹⁷
 Two watchmen's heads, his right the falchion
 The gate he opens; swift from ambush rise [rears:
 His ready bands, the city falls his prize:

¹⁴ This legend is mentioned by some ancient Portuguese chronicles. Homer would have availed himself, as Camoens has done, of a tradition so enthusiastical, and characteristic of the age.—Henry was a native of Bonneville near Cologne. His tomb, says Castera, is still to be seen in the monastery of St. Vincent, but without the palm.

¹⁵ Theotonius, prior of the regulars of St. Augustine of Conynbra. Some ancient chronicles relate this circumstance as mentioned by Camoens. Modern writers assert, that he never quitted his breviary." Castera.

¹⁷ "He was a man of rank, who, in order to avoid the legal punishment to which several crimes rendered him obnoxious, put himself at the head of a party of freebooters. Tiring, however, of that life, he resolved to reconcile himself to his sovereign by some noble action. Full of this idea, one evening he entered Evora, which then belonged to the Moors. In the night he killed the sentinels of one of the gates, which he opened to his companions, who soon became masters of the place. This exploit had its desired effect. The king pardoned Gerrald, and made him governor of Evora. A knight with a sword in one hand, and two heads in the other, from that time became the armorial bearing for the city." Castera.

Evora still the grateful honour pays,
 Her banner'd flag the mighty deed displays:
 There fronts the hero; in his left he bears
 The two cold heads, his right the falchion rears.
 Wrong'd by his king, and burning for revenge¹⁸, 185
 Behold his arms that proud Castilian change;
 The Moorish buckler on his breast he bears,
 And leads the fiercest of the pagan spears.
 Abrantes falls beneath his raging force,
 And now to Tago bends his furious course.
 Another fate he met on Tago's shore,
 Brave Lopez from his brows the laurels tore;
 His bleeding army strew'd the thirsty ground,
 And captive chains the rageful leader bound. 190
 Resplendent far that holy chief behold!
 Aside he throws the sacred staff of gold,
 And wields the spear of steel. How bold advance
 The numerous Moors, and with the rested lance
 Hem round the trembling Lusians! Calm and bold
 Still towers the priest, and lo, the skies unfold¹⁹:
 Cheer'd by the vision brighter than the day
 The Lusians trample down the dread array
 Of Hagar's legions: on the reeking plain
 Low with their slaves four haughty kings lie slain.
 In vain Alcazar rears her brazen walls, 201
 Before his rushing host Alcazar falls.
 There, by his altar, now the hero shines,
 And with the warrior's palm his mitre twines.
 That chief behold: though proud Castilia's host
 He leads, his birth shall Tago's ever boast.
 As a pent flood bursts headlong o'er the strand,
 So pours his fury o'er Algarbia's land:
 Nor rampired town nor castled rock afford
 The refuge of defence from Payo's sword. 210
 By night-veil'd art proud Sylves falls his prey,
 And Tavila's high walls at middle day
 Fearless he scales: her streets in blood deplore
 The seven brave hunters murder'd by the Moor²⁰.

¹⁸ Don Pedro Fernando de Castro, injured by the family of Lara, and denied redress by the king of Castile, took the infamous revenge of bearing arms against his native country. At the head of a Moorish army he committed several outrages in Spain, but was totally defeated in Portugal.

¹⁹ "According to some ancient Portuguese histories, Don Matthew, bishop of Lisbon, in the reign of Alonzo I., attempted to reduce Alcazar, then in possession of the Moors. His troops being suddenly surrounded by a numerous party of the enemy, were ready to fly, when, at the prayers of the bishop, a venerable old man, clothed in white, with a red cross on his breast, appeared in the air. The miracle dispelled the fears of the Portuguese; the Moors were defeated, and the conquest of Alcazar crowned the victory." Castera.

²⁰ "During a truce with the Moors, six cavaliers of the order of St. James were, while on a hunting party, surrounded and killed by a numerous body of the Moors. During the fight, in which the gentlemen sold their lives dear, a common carter, named Garcia Rodrigo, who chanced to pass that way, came generously to their assistance, and lost his life along with them. The poet, in giving all seven the same title, shows us that virtue constitutes true nobility. Don Payo de Corra, grand master of the order of St. James, revenged the death of these brave unfortunates, by the sack of Tavila, where his just rage put the garrison to the sword." Castera.

These three bold knights how dread! Through Spain and France²³

At just and tourney with the tilted lance
Victors they rode: Castilia's court beheld (swell'd:

Her peers o'erthrown; the peers with rancour
The bravest of the three their swords surround;

Brave Ribelir strews them vanquish'd o'er the ground.
Now let thy thoughts, all wonder and on fire, 230

That darling son of warlike fame admire!
Prostrate at proud Castilia's monarch's feet

His land lies trembling: lo, the nobles meet:
Softly they seem to breathe, and forward bend

The servile neck; each eye distrusts his friend;
Fearful each tongue to speak; each bosom cold:

When colour'd with stern rage, erect and bold
The hero rises: 'Here no foreign throne

Shall fix its base; my native king alone 230
Shall reign!—Then rushing to the fight he leads;

Low vanquish'd in the dust Castilia bleeds.
Where proudest hope might deem it vain to dare,

God led him on, and crown'd the glorious war.
Though fierce as numerous are the hosts that dwell

By Betis' stream, these hosts before him fell.
The fight beheld; while absent from his bands,

Prest on the step of fight his army stands,
To call the chief an herald speeds away:

Low on his knees the gallant chief survey! 240
He pours his soul, with lifted hands implores,

And Heaven's assisting arm, inspired, adores.
Panting and pale the herald urges speed:

With holy trust of victory decreed,
Careless he answers, 'Nothing urgent calls:'

And soon the bleeding foe before him falls.
To Numas thus the pale patricians fled;

'The hostile squadrons o'er the kingdom spread,'
They cry; unmoved the holy king replies,

'And I, behold, am offering sacrifice' 250
Earnest I see thy wondering eyes inquire

Who this illustrious chief, his country's sire?
The Lusian Scipio well might speak his fame²⁴,

But nobler Numa shines a greater name:
On earth's green bosom, or on ocean gray,

A greater sever shall the Sun survey.

²³ Nothing can give us a stronger picture of the romantic character of their age, than the manners of these champions, who were gentlemen of birth; and who, in the true spirit of knight-errantry, went about from court to court in quest of adventures. Their names were, Gonçalo Ribeiro; Fernando Martinez de Santarém; and Vasco Avez, foster-brother to Mary, queen of Castile, daughter of Alonso IV. of Portugal.

²⁴ This line, the simplicity of which, I think, contains great dignity, is adopted from Pindar,

And I, ye see, am offering sacrifice,— who has here caught the spirit of the original:

A quem lbe a dona nova estava dando,
Pois eu, responde, estou sacrificando.

i. e. To whom when they told the dreadful things, "And I," he replies, "am sacrificing." The pity of Numa was crown'd with victory. Vid. Plut. in vit. Num.

²⁵ Casters justly observes the happiness with which Camoëns introduces the name of this truly great man. Il va, says he, le nommer tout à l'heure-avec une adresse et une magnificence dignes d'un si beau sujet.

"Known by the silver cross and sable shield²⁵,
Two knights of Malta there command the field;

From Tago's banks they drive the booty prey;
And the tired ox lows on his weary way: 260

When, as the falcons through the forest glide
Darts on the leveret, from the brown-wood shade

Darts Roderic on their rear; in sudden fight
They leave the booty herds the victor's right.

Again, behold, in gore he bathes his sword;
His captive friend, to liberty restored²⁶,

Glow to review the cause that wrought his woe,
The cause, his loyalty as tasteless show,

Here treason's well-earn'd meed allures thine eye,
Low grovelling in the dust the traitor dies; 270

Great Elvas gave the blow: Again, behold²⁷,
Chariot and steed in purple slaughter roll'd:

Great Elvas triumphs; wide o'er Xeres' plain
Around him reeks the noblest blood of Spain.

"Here Lisbon's spacious harbour meets the view;
How vast the foes, the Lusian fleet how few!

Castel's proud war-ships, circling round, enclose
The Lusian galleys; through their thundering rows,

Pierce pressing on, Pœnic's leopards ride;

His hooked irons grasp the Admiral's sides: 280
Confusion maddens; on the dreadful knight

Castilia's navy pours its gather'd might:

²⁵ These knights were distinguished knights Hospitallers of St. John of Jerusalem, afterwards knights of Rhodes, from whence they were driven to Messina, ere Malta was assigned to them, where they now remain. By their oath of knighthood they are bound to protect the holy sepulchre, from the profanation of infidels; and immediately on taking this oath, they retire to their colleges, where they live on their revenues in all the idleness of monkish luxury. Their original habit was black with a white cross; their arms gules, a cross argent.

²⁶ Before John I. mounted the throne of Portugal, one Vasco Poreallo was governor of Villaviciosa. Roderic de Landreal and his friend Alvarez Ouytalo, having discovered that he was in the interest of the king of Castile, drove him from his town and fortress. On the establishment of king John, Poreallo had the art to obtain the favour of that prince, but no sooner was he reinstated in the garrison, than he delivered it up to the Castilians; and plundered the house of Ouytalo, whom, with his wife, he made prisoner; and, under a numerous party, ordered to be sent to Olivença. Roderic de Landreal, hearing of this, attacked and defeated the escort, and set his friend at liberty.—Castera.

²⁷ While the kingdom of Portugal was divided, some holding with John the newly elected king, and others with the king of Castile, Roderic Marin, governor of Campo-Major, declared for the latter. Fernando d'Elvas endeavoured to gain him to the interest of his native prince, and a conference, with the usual assurances of safety, was agreed to. Marin, at this meeting, seized upon Elvas, and sent him prisoner to his castle. Elvas having recovered his liberty, a few days after met his enemy in the field, whom in his turn he made captive; and the traitorous Marin, notwithstanding the endeavours of their captain to save his life, met the reward of his treason from the soldiers of Elvas.—Partly from Castera.

Perire dies, their self-devoted prey,
And safe the Lusian galleys speed away²⁷.

"Lo, where the lemon-trees from yon green hill
Thrust their cool shadows o'er the crystal rill;
There twice two hundred fierce Castilian foes
Twice eight, forlorn, of Lusian race enclose:
Perlon they seem; but traitless flow'd their blood
From those three hundred who of old withstood; 290
Withstood, and from a thousand Romans tore
The victor-wreath, what time the shepherd²⁸ bore
The leader's staff of Lusus: equal Gaine
Inspired these few, their victory the same²⁹.
Though twenty lances brave each single spear,
Never the foes' superior might to fear
Is our inheritance, our native right,
Well tried, well proved in many a dreadful fight.

"That dauntless earl behold; on Libya's coast,
Far from the succour of the Lusian host³⁰, 300
Twice hard besieged he holds the Ceutan towers
Against the banded might of Africa's powers.
That earl³¹;—behold the port he bore;
So trod stern Mars on Thracia's hills of yore.
What groves of spears Alcazar's gates surround!
There Africa's nations blacken o'er the ground.
A thousand ensigns glittering to the day
The waning Moon's slant silver horns display.
In vain their rage; no gate, no turret falls,
The brave De Vian guards Alcazar's walls. 310
In hopeless conflict lost his king appears;
Amid the thickest of the Moorish spears
Plunges bold Vian: in the glorious strife
He dies, and dying saves his sovereign's life.

"Illustrious, lo, two brother-heroes shine,
Their birth, their deeds, adorn the royal line;
To every king of princely Europe known³²,
In every court the gallant Pedro shone.

²⁷ "A numerous fleet of the Castilians being on their way to lay siege to Lisbon, Ruy Percyra, the Portuguese commander, seeing no possibility of victory, boldly attacked the Spanish admiral. The fury of his on-set put the Castilians in disorder, and allowed the Portuguese galleys a safe escape. In this brave piece of service the gallant Percyra lost his life."—Castera.

²⁸ Viriatus.

²⁹ "The Castilians having laid siege to Almada, a fortress on a mountain near Lisbon, the garrison, in the utmost distress for water, were obliged at times to make sallies to the bottom of the hill in quest of it. Seventeen Portuguese thus employed, were one day attacked by four hundred of the enemy. They made a brave defence and happy retreat into their fortress."—Castera.

³⁰ When Alonzo V. took Ceuta, don Pedro de Menezes was the only officer in the army who was willing to become governor of that fortress; which, on account of the uncertainty of succour from Portugal, and the earnest desire of the Moors to regain it, was deemed untenable. He gallantly defended his post in two severe sieges.

³¹ He was the natural son of don Pedro de Menezes. Alonzo V. one day having rode out from Ceuta with a few attendants, was attacked by a numerous party of the Moors, when De Vian, and some others under him, at the expense of their own lives, purchased the safe retreat of their sovereign.

³² "The sons of John I. Don Pedro was called the Ulysses of his age, on account both of his eloquence and his voyages. He visited almost every court of Europe, but he principally distinguished himself in Germany, where, under the standards of the emperor Sigismund, he signalised his valour in the war against the Turks."—Castera.

³³ In pursuance of the reasons assigned in the Preface, the translator has here taken the liberty to make a transposition in the order of his author. In Camoens, don Pedro de Menezes, and his son De Vian, conclude the description of the pictured ensigns. Don Henry, the greatest man perhaps that ever Portugal produced, has certainly the best title to close this procession of the Lusian heroes. And as he was the father of navigation, particularly of the voyage of Gama, to sun up the narrative with his encomium, it may be hoped has even some critical propriety. It remains now to make a few observations on this seeming episode of Camoens. The shield of Achilles bore many imitators, some in one degree, others in another. The imitation of Ariosto, in the xxxiii canto of his Orlando Furioso, is most fancifully ingenious: and on this undoubtedly the Portuguese poet had his eye. Pharamond, king of France, having resolved to conquer Italy, desires the friendship of Arthur, king of Britain. Arthur sends Merlin the magician to assist him with advice. Merlin, by his supernatural art, raises a sumptuous hall, on the sides of which all the future wars, unfortunate to the French in their invasions of Italy, are painted in colours exceeding the pencils of the greatest masters. A description of these pictures, an episode much longer than this of Camoens, is given to the heroine Bradamant, by the knight who kept the castle of sir Tristram, where the enchanted hall was placed. But though the poetry be pleasing, the whole fiction, unless to amuse the warlike lady, has nothing to do with the action of the poem. Unity of design, however, is neither claimed by Ariosto in the exordium of his work, nor attempted in the execution. An examination therefore of the conduct of Homer and Virgil will be more applicable to Camoens. To give a landscape of the face of the country which is the scene of action, or to describe the heroes and their armour, are the becoming ornaments of an epic poem. Milton's beautiful description of Eden, and the admirable painting of the shield of Achilles, are, like the embroidery of a suit of clothes, a part of the subject, and injure not the gracefulness of the tale; or, in other words, destroy not the unity of the action. Yet let it be observed, that, admirable as they are, the pictures on the shield of Achilles, considered by themselves, have no relation to the action of the Iliad. If six of the apartments may be said to rouse the hero to war, the other six may with equal justice be called an obvious admonition or a charge to turn husbandman. In that part of the Æneid where Virgil greatly improves upon his master, in the visions of his future race which Anchises gives to Æneas in Elysium, the business of the poem is admirably sustained, and the hero is inspired to encounter every danger on the view of so great a reward. The description of the shield of Æneas, however, is less connected with the conduct of the fable. Virgil, indeed, intended that his poem should contain all the honours of his

Henry the chief, who first, by Heaven inspired, country, and has therefore charged the shield of his hero with what parts of the Roman history were omitted in the vision of Elysium. But so foreign are these pictures to the war with Turnus, that the poet himself tells us Aeneas was ignorant of the history which they contained.

Talia, per clypeum Vuleavi, dona parentis
Miratur: rerumque ignarus imagine gaudet.

These observations, which the translator believes have escaped the critics, were suggested to him by the conduct of Camoëns, whose design, like that of Virgil, was to write a poem which might contain all the triumphs of his country. As the shield of Aeneas supplies what could not be introduced in the vision of Elysium, so the ensigns of Gama complete the purpose of the third and fourth Lusiads. The use of that long episode, the conversation with the king of Melinda, and its connexion with the subject, have been already observed. The seeming episode of the pictures, while it fulfils the promise,

And all my country's wars the song adorn—is also admirably connected with the conduct of the poem. The Indians naturally desire to be informed of the country, the history, and power of their foreign visitors, and Paulus acts it before their eyes. In every progression of the scenery the business of the poem advances. The regent and his attendants are struck with the warlike grandeur and power of the strangers; and to accept of their friendship, or to prevent the forerunners of so martial a nation from carrying home the tidings of the discovery of India, becomes the great object of their consideration. And from the passions of the Indians and Moors, thus agitated, the great catastrophe of the Lusiad is both naturally and artfully produced.

As every reader is not a critic in poetry, to some perhaps the expressions

And the tired ox lows on his weery way—
—loud shouts around the ear—

And the abrupt speech of an enraged warrior, ascribed to a picture

—Here no foreign thronè
Shall fix its base, my native king alone
Shall reign—

may appear as unwarrantable. This however, let them be assured, is the language of the genuine spirit of poetry, when the productions of the sister Muse are the object of description. Let one very bold instance of this appear in the picture of the dance of the youths and maidens on the shield of Achilles, thus faithfully rendered by Mr. Pope:

Now all at once they rise, at once descend,
With well-taught feet: now shape, in oblique ways,
Confus'dly regular, the moving maze:
Now forth, at once, too swift for sight they spring,
And undistinguish'd blend the flying ring:
So whirls a wheel, in giddy circles tost,
And rapid as it runs, the single spokes are lost.
The gazing multitudes admire around;
Two active tumblers in the centre bound;
Now high, now low, their pliant limbs they bend:
And gen'ral songs the sprightly revel end. ll, xviii.

The conscious sailor left the sight of shore,
And dared new oceans, never ploughed before.
The various wealth of every distant land
He bade his fleets explore, his fleets command.
The ocean's great discoverer he shines;
Nor less his honours in the martial lines:
The painted flag the cloud-wrapt siege displays;
Three Ceuta's rocking wall its front betrays. 300
Black yawns the breach: the point of many a spear
Gleams through the smoke; loud shouts around the ear. [word

Whose step first trod the dreadful pass? whose Hew'd its dark way, first with the foe beset?
'T was thine, O glorious Henry, first to dare
The dreadful pass, and thine to close the war!
Taught by his might, and humbled in her gore,
The boastful bride of Afric tower'd no more.

"Numerous though these, more numerous warriors shine

Th' illustrious glory of the Lusian line. 340
But ah, forlorn, what shame to barbarous pride!
Friendless the master of the pencil died 340;
Immortal fame his deathless labours gave;
Poor man! he sunk neglected to the grave."

The gallant Paulus faithful thus explain'd
The various deeds the pictured flags retain'd.
Still o'er and o'er, and still again untired,
The wondering regent of the wars inquired;
Still wondering heard the various-pleasing tale,
Till o'er the decks cold sigh'd the evening gale: 350
'The falling darkness dimm'd the eastern shore,
And twilight hover'd o'er the billows hoar
Far to the west, when with his noble band
The thoughtful regent sought his native strand.

O'er the tall mountain-forest's waving boughs
Aslant the new Moon's slender horns were seen;
Near her pale chariot shone a twinkling star,
And, save the murmuring of the wave afar,
Deep-brooding silence reign'd; each labour ceased,
In sleep's soft arms the sons of soil reposed. 360
And now no more the Moon her glimpses shed,
A sudden black-wing'd cloud the sky o'erspread.
A sullen murmur through the woodland ground,
In woe-swain sighs the hollow winds bemoan'd;
Borne on the plaintive gale a pattering shower
Increased the horrors of the evil hour.

Thus when the God of earthquakes rocks the ground,
He gives the prelude in a dreary sound;
O'er Nature's face a horrid gloom he throws,
With dismal note the cock unusual crows, 370

Sometimes when describing a picture, poetry will say, the figures seem to move, to tremble, or to sing. Homer has once or twice, on the shield of his hero, given this hint how to understand him. But often to repeat the qualification were quite opposite to the bold and free spirit of poetry, which delights in personification, and in giving life and passion to every thing it describes. It is owing to the superior force of this spirit, together with the most beautiful colouring of its landscape views, that the shield of Achilles, in poetical merit, so greatly exceeds the buckler of Aeneas, though the divine workman of the latter had the former as a pattern before him.

31 In the original,

Mes faitambes pintel, faitambes cores,
Honra, premio, favor, que as artes cria.

"But the pencil was wanting, colours were want-

A shrill-voiced howling trembles through the air,
 As passing ghosts were weeping in despair ;
 In dismal yells the dogs confess their fear,
 And shivering own-oms dreadful presence near.
 So lowe'd the night, the silent howl the same,
 And mid the black-wind's gloom stern Bacchus
 The form and garb of Hagar's son he took, [came ;
 The ghost-like aspect, and the threatening look 26,
 Then o'er the pillow of a furious priest,
 Whose burning zeal the Koran's loins profest, 380
 Reveal'd he stood conspicuous in a dream,
 His semblance shining as the Moon's pale gleam 28 :
 And " Guard," he cries, " my son, O timely guard,
 Timely defeat the dreadful snare prepared :—
 And canst thou careless, unaffected sleep,
 While these stern lawless rovers of the deep
 Fix on thy native shure a foreign throne,
 Before whose steps thy latest race shall groan ?"
 He spoke : cold horror shook the Moorish priest ;
 He wakes, but soon reclines in wonted rest : 390
 An airy phantom of the slumbering brain
 He deem'd the vision ; when the fiend again
 With sterner mien and fiercer accent spoke :
 " Oh faithless ! worthy of the foreign yoke !
 And know'st thou not thy prophet sent by Heaven,
 By whom the Koran's sacred lore was given,
 God's chiefest gift to men ?—And must I leave
 The bowers of Paradise, for you to grudge,
 For you to watch, while thoughtless of your woe
 Ye sleep, the careless victims of the foe ; 400
 The fire, whose rage will soon with cruel joy,
 If unopposed, my sacred shrines destroy :—
 Then while kind Heaven th' auspicious hour bestows,
 Let every nerve their infant strength oppose,
 When softly usher'd by the milky dews
 The Sun first rises o'er the daisied lawn 37, ing, honour, reward, favour, the nourishers of the art." This seemed to the translator as an impropriety, and contrary to the purpose of the whole speech of Paulus, which was to give the actual a high idea of Portugal. In the fate of the imaginary painter, the Lusian poet gives us the picture of his own, and resentment wrung this impropriety from him. The spirit of the complaint bowerer is preserved in the translation. The couplet,

Immortal fame his deathless labours gave ;
 Poor man, he sunk neglected to the grave !

is not in the original. It is the sigh of indignation over the unworthy fate of the unhappy Camoëns.

26 Mahommed, by all historians, is described as of a pale livid complexion, and trux aspectus et vox terribilis, of a fierce threatening aspect, voice, and demeanour.

28 We have already seen the warm encomium paid by Tasso to his cotemporary, Camoëns. That great poet, the ornament of Italy, has also testified his approbation by several imitations of the Lus'ad.
 Virgil, in no instance, has more closely copied
 Homer, than Tasso has imitated the appearance of Bacchus, or the evil demon, in the dream of the Moorish priest. The enchanter Iameno thus appears to the sleeping Solyman :

Sollman! Salimano, i tuoi silenti
 Riposì a miglior tempo homai riserva:
 Che sotto il dogo de straniere genti
 La patria, ove regnasti, ancor e serva.
 In questa terra dormi, e non rabinenti,
 Ch' insopita da tuoi Koch conserva?

His silver lustre, as the shining dew
 Of radiance mild, unbars the eye may view ;
 But when on high the noon-tide flaming rays
 Give all the force of living fire to blaze, 410
 A giddy darkness strikes the conquer'd sight,
 That dares in all his glow the lord of light.
 Such, if on India's soil the tender shoot
 Of these proud cedars fix the stubborn root,
 Such shall your power before them sink decay'd,
 And India's strength shall wither in their shade."
 He spoke ; and instant from his votry's bed,
 Together with repose, the demon fled.
 Again cold horror shook the zealot's frame,
 And all his hatred of Messiah's name 420
 Burn'd in his venom'd heart, while veil'd in night
 Right to the palace sped the demon's flight.
 Sleepless the king he found in dubious thought ;
 His conscious fraud a thousand terrors brought :

Ove si gran' vestigio e del tuo scorno,
 Tu nebbittoso aspetti il novo giorno?

Thus elegantly translated by Mr. Hoole :

Oh! Solyman, regardless chief, awake !
 In happier hours thy grateful slumber take :
 Beneath a foreign yoke thy subjects bend,
 And arrangers o'er thy land their rule extend.
 Here dost thou sleep? here close thy careless eyes
 While uninter'd each lov'd associate lies?
 Here where thy fame has felt the hostile scorn,
 Comest thou, unthinking, wait the rising morn?
 " I deceive myself greatly," (says Casters,) " if this simile is not the most noble and the most natural that can be found in any poem. It has been imitated by the Spanish comedians, the illustrious Lopez de Vega, in his comedy of Orpheus and Eurydicos, act i. scene 1.

Como mirar puede ser
 El sol al amanecer,
 I quando se enciende, no."

Casters adds a very loose translation of these Spanish lines in French verse. The literal English is, " As the Sun may be beheld at his rising, but, when illustriously kindled, cannot." Naked however as this is, the imitation of Camoëns is evident,
 As Casters is so very bold in his encomium of this fine simile of the Sun, it is but justice to add his translation of it, together with the original Portuguese, and the translation of Fenshaw. Thus the French translator :

Les yeux peuvent s'ôlâmir la clarté du Soleil naissant, mais lorsqu'il s'est avancé dans sa carrière lumineuse, et que ses rayons répandent les ardeurs du midi, on tomberoit en vain de l'envisager ; un prompt aveuglement seroit le prix de cette audace.

Thus elegantly in the original :

Em quanto he fraca a força desta gente,
 Ordens como em tudo se resiste,
 Porque quando o sol se, facilmente
 Se pôde nelle por a aguda vista :
 Porém depois que se de claro, et ardente,
 Se a aguda dos olhos o conquista
 Tao cega se, quando ficava,
 Se raisse crier he nao talente.

And thus humbled by Fenshaw :

Now whilst this people's strength is not yet knit,
 Think how ye may resist them by all wits.

All gloomy as the hour, around him stand
With haggard looks the hoary magi band;
To trace what fates on India's wide domain
Attend the rovers from unheard-of Spain,

For when the Sun is in his nonage yet,
But let him once up to his zenith get,
Upon his morning beauty men may gaze;
He strikes them blind with his meridian rays;
So blind will ye be, if ye look not to't,
If ye permit these cedars to take root.

²⁸ Or the Bramins, the diviners of India. Am-mianus Marcellinus, l. 23. says, that the Persian magi derived their knowledge from the Brach-manes of India. And Arianus, l. 7. expressly gives the Bramins the name of magi. The magi of India, says he, told Alexander, on his pretensions to divinity, that in every thing he was like other men, except that he took less rest, and did more mischief. The Bramins are never among modern writers called magi.

We have already observed that the wonderful virtues peculiar to some plants very naturally contributed to establish the belief in magic. And certain it is that many of the unlettered natives of Asia and South America have a knowledge of several drugs most powerful in their effects, either as poison, antidotes of poison, or as disturbers of the imagination. Their ignorance makes them esteem these virtues as magical, and their revenge against all Europeans prompts them to the most religions concealment. In the voyage of James Neccius, a Dutchman, in 1608, we have the account of a strange delirium which seized all those of his crew, who, near the kingdom of Siam, had eaten of a certain fruit like a plum. Some imagined the ship was overpowered by enemies, and boldly defended their cabins; others danced and sung, and thought themselves on shore at a drunken banquet with their friends. And while some chanted hallelujahs, and believed they saw God and his angels, others lay howling on the decks, and imagined themselves among the damned in Hell. (Vide Navig. Jacobi Neccii.) This delirium appears to take possession of whatever temperament of mind happens at the time to be predominant; but happily it is cured by a sound sleep.
It is a fact well attested, that the Bramin pre-tenders to magic have a method of affecting the phantasies of those who apply to them. This is done by some intoxicating potion, administered with the solemnities of witchcraft: while it begins to operate, the magician's conversation fixes the imagination on the objects he wishes to raise; and after recovering sleep these objects are remembered as the clearest visions. In the apprehensions of natural madness the imagination is intensely fixed upon some particular object or affection.
This indicates a particular alliance between this species of intoxication, and that most dreadful disease. The Portuguese authors mention other kinds of natural magic, as known to the Indians.
When Albuquerque was on the way to Malacca, he attacked a large ship, but just as his men were going to board her, she suddenly appeared all in flames, which obliged the Portuguese to bear off.
Three days afterward the same vessel sent a boat to Albuquerque, offering an alliance, which was accepted. The flames, says Coariva, were only

Prepared in dark futurity to prove 439
The hell-taught rituals of infernal Jore: [and Muttering their charms and spells of dreary
With naked feet they beat the hollow ground;
Blue gleams the altar's flame along the walls,
With dismal hollow groans the victim falls;
With earnest eyes the priestly band explore
The entrails throbbing in the living gore.
And lo, permitted by the Power Divine,
The hovering demon gives the dreadful sign.
Here furious War her gleamy falchion draws;
Here lean-ribb'd Famine writhes her falling jaw;
Dire as the fiery pestilential star, 441
Darting his eyes, high on his triumphed car
Stern Tyranny sweeps wide o'er India's ground,
On culture wings fierce Rapine hovers round;
Ills after ill, and India's fetter'd right,
Th' eternal yoke—Loud shrieking at the sight, artificial, and did not the least damage. Another wonderful adventure immediately happened. The admiral soon after sent his long-boats to attack a ship commanded by one Neloada Beegua. The enemy made an obstinate resistance. Neloada himself was pierced with several mortal wounds, but lost not one drop of blood, till a bracelet was taken off his arm, when immediately the blood gushed out, and he expired. According to Osonus, this was said to be occasioned by the virtue of a stone in the bracelet taken out of an animal called caebria, which when worn on the body could prevent the effusion of blood from the most grievous wounds. It was natural for the Portuguese soldiers to magnify any appearance of a styptic, which they did not understand. And certain it is that many barbarous tribes are possessed of some natural secrets which the learned of Europe do not yet know. It is not long since an eminent disciple of Newton esteemed the discovery of electricity as the dream of a disordered brain. Barbosa relates that one Machamut, who expelled the king of Guzarat and seized the throne, had so accustomed himself to poisons, that he could kill whoever offended him by spitting at them. His cucubines never survived a second evening. This perhaps may be thought to confirm what is said of Mithridates; but both stories are undoubtedly somewhat exaggerated.

²⁹ This is an allusion to the truth of history. Barrow relates, that an augur being brought before the zamorin, Kim hum vaso de agua [the moorish lunas nao, que vin vaso de muy hongo para a toda, e que a gente d'ellas seria total destruyam dos Mouros de aquellas partes.—"In a vessel of water he showed him some ships which from a great distance came to India, the people of which would effect the utter subversion of the Moors." Camões has certainly chosen a more poetical method of describing this divination, a method in the spirit of Virgil; nor in this is he inferior to his great master. The supernatural flame which seizes on Lavinia, while assisting at the sacrifice, alone excepted, every other part of the augury of Latinus, and his dream in the Albanian forest, whither he went to consult his ancestor the god Faunus, in dignity and poetical colouring cannot come in comparison with the divination of the magi, and the appearance of the demon in the dream of the Moorish priest.

³⁰ This picture, it may perhaps be said, is but a

The starting words from the altar fly,
And silent horror glares in every eye;
Pale stands the monarch, lost in cold dismay,
And now impatient waits the lingering day. 450

With gloomy aspect rose the lingering dawn,
And dropping tears flow'd slowly o'er the lawn;
The Moorish priest, with fear and vengeance fraught,
Soon as the light appear'd his kindred sought;
Appall'd and trembling with ungenerous fear,
In secret council met, his tale they hear;
As check'd by terror or impell'd by hate,
Of various means they ponder and debate;
Against the Lusian train what arts employ,
By force to slaughter, or by fraud destroy; 460
Now black, now pale, their bearded cheeks appear,
As boiling rage prevails, or boiling fear;
Beneath their shady brows their eye-balls roll,
Nor one soft gleam bespeaks the generous soul:
Through quivering lips they draw their panting
breath,

While their dark fraud decrees the works of death:
Nor unresolv'd the power of gold to try.
Swift to the lordly casual's gate they lie—
Ah, what the wisdom, what the sleepless care
Efficient to avoid the traitor's snare! 470

What human power can give a king to know
The smiling aspect of the lurking foe!
So let the tyrant plead—"the patriot king
Knows men, knows whence the patriot virtues spring;
From inward worth, from conscience firm and bold,
Not from the man whose honest name is sold,
He hopes that virtue, whose unalter'd weight
Stands fix'd, unswerving with the storms of state.

Lured was the regent with the Moorish gold,
And now agreed their fraudulent course to hold, 480
Swift to the king the regent's steps they tread;
The king they found o'erwhelm'd in sacred dread.
The word they take, their ancient deeds relate,
Their ever faithful service of the state";

bad compliment to the heroes of the Lusiad, and the fruits of their discovery. A little consideration, however, will vindicate Camoëns. It is the demon and the enemies of the Portuguese who procure this divination; every thing in it is dreadful, on purpose to determine the zamorin to destroy the fleet of Gama. In a former prophecy of the conquest of India, (when the casual describes the sculpture of the royal palace) our poet has been careful to ascribe the happiest effects to the disquietery of his heroes:

Beneath their sway majestic, wise, and mild,
Proud of her victor's laws, thrice happy India smiled.

"In this short declamation, a seeming excess of the business of the poem in reality is carried on. The zamorin, and his prime minister the casual, are artfully characterized in it; and the assertion,

Lured was the regent with the Moorish gold, is happily introduced by the many declamatory repetitions which immediately precede it.

"An explanation of the word Moor is here necessary. When the east afforded no more field for the sword of the conqueror, the Saracens, assisted by the Moors, who had embraced their religion, laid the finest countries in Europe in blood and desolation. As their various embarkations were from the empire of Morocco, the Europeans gave the name of Moors to all the professors of the

"For ages long, from shore to distant shore,
For thee our ready keels the traffic bore:
For thee we dared each horror of the wave;
Whate'er thy treasures boast our labours gave,
And wilt thou now confer our long-earn'd due,
Confer thy favour on a lawless crew? 490

The race, y' boast, as tigers of the wild
Bear their proud sway by justice uncontrol'd.
Yet for their crimes, expell'd that bloody home,
Thence, o'er the deep, rapacious plunderers roam.
Their deeds we know; round Africa's shores they came,

And spread, where'er they past, detouring flame;
Mozambique's towers enroll'd in sheets of fire,
Blazed to the sky, her own funereal pyre.
Imperial Calicut shall feel the same,
And these proud state-rooms feed the funeral
flame; 500

While many a league far round, their joyful eyes
Shall mark old ocean reddening to the skies.
Such dreadful fates, o'er thee, O king, depend,
Yet with thy fall our fate shall never blend:
Ere o'er the east arise the second dawn,
Our fleets, our nation from thy land withdrawn,
In other climes, beneath a kinder reign
Shall fix their port:—yet may the threat be vain!
If wiser thou with us thy powers employ,
Soon shall our powers the robber-crow destroy, 510
By their own arts and secret deeds o'ercome,
Here shall they meet the fate escap'd at home."

Mahomedan religion. In the same manner the eastern nations bleaded all the armies of the Crusaders under one appellation, and the Franks, of whom the army of Godfrey was mostly composed, became their common name for all the inhabitants of the west. The appellation even reached China. When the Portuguese first arrived in that empire, the Chinese, softening the ru into li, called both them and their cannon by the name of Palank, a name which is still retained at Canton, and in other parts of the Chinese dominions. Before the arrival of Gama, as already observed, all the traffic of the east, from the Ethiopian side of Africa to China, was in the hands of Arabian Mahomedans, who, without incorporating with the Pagan natives, had their colonies established in every country commodious for commerce. These the Portuguese called Moors; and at present the Mahomedans of India are called the Moors of Hindostan by the latest of our English writers. The intelligence which these Moors gave to one another, relative to the actions of Gama; the general terror with which they beheld the appearance of Europeans, whose rivalry they dreaded as the destruction of their power; the various frauds and arts they employed to prevent the return of one man of Gama's fleet to Europe; and their threat to withdraw from the dominions of the zamorin; are all according to the truth of history. The speeches of the zamorin and of Gama, which follow, are also founded in truth. They are only poetical paraphrases of the speeches ascribed by Olorius to the Indian sovereign and the Portuguese admiral. Where the subject was so happily adapted to the epic Muse, to neglect it would have been reprehensible: and Camoëns, not unjustly, thought, that the reality of his hero's adventures gave a dignity to his poem. When Gama, in his discourse with the king of Melinda, finishes the description

While thus the priest detain'd the monarch's ear,
His cheeks confess'd the quivering pulse of fear.
Unconscious of the worth that fires the brave,
In state a monarch, but in heart a slave,
He view'd brave Vasco and his generous train,
As his own passions stamp'd the conscious stain:
Nor less his rage the fraudulent regent fired;
And valiant Gama's fate was now consigned. 520
Ambassadors from India Gama sought,
And oaths of peace for oaths of friendship brought;
The glorious tale, 't was all he wish'd to tell;
So Ilhou's fate was seal'd when Hector fell.

Again convuked before the Indian throne,
The monarch meets him with a regal frown;
And "Own," he cries, "the naked truth reveal,
Then shall my bounteous grace thy pardon seal.
Feign'd is the treaty thou pretend'st to bring,
No country owns thee, and thou own'st no king. 530
Thy life, long roving o'er the deep, I know,
A lawless robber, every man thy foe.
And think'st thou credit to thy tale to gain?
Mad were the sovereign, and the hope were vain,
Through ways unknown, from utmost western shore,
To hid his fleets the utmost east explore.
Great is thy monarch, so thy words declare;
But sumptuous gifts the proof of greatness bear:
Kings thus to kings their empire's grandeur show;
Thus prove thy truth, thus we thy truth allow. 540
If not, what credence will the wise afford?
What monarch trust the wandering seaman's word?
No sumptuous gift thou bring'st"—Yet, though some crime

Has thrown thee banish'd from thy native clime,
(Such oft of old the hero's fate has been)
Here end thy toils, nor tempt new fates unseen;
Each land the brave man nobly calls his home:
Or if, bold pirates, o'er the deep you roam,
Skill'd the dread storm to brave, O welcome here!
Fearless of death or shame confess sincere: 550
My name shall then thy dread protection be,
My captain thou, unrival'd on the sea."

Oh now, ye Muses, sing what goddess fired
Gama's proud bosom, and his lips inspired,
Fair Acidalia, love's celestial queen,*
The graceful goddess of the fearless men, of his voyage, he makes a spirited apostrophe to Homer and Virgil; and asserts, that the adventures which he had actually experienced, greatly exceeded all the wonders of their fables. Camoëns also, in other parts of the poem, avails himself of the same assertion.

* "As the Portuguese did not expect to find any people but savages beyond the Cape of Good Hope, they only brought with them some preserves and confections, with trinkets of coral, of glass, and other trifles. This opinion however deceived them. In Melinda and in Calicut they found civilised nations, where the arts flourished; who wanted nothing, who were possessed of all the refinements and delicacies on which we value ourselves. The king of Melinda had the generosity to be contented with the present which Gama made: but the zamorin with a disdainful eye beheld the gifts which were offered to him. The present was thus: four mantles of scarlet, six hats adorned with feathers, four chaplets of coral beads, twelve Turkey carpets, seven drinking-cups of brass, a chest of sugar, two barrels of oil, and two of honey."—Castro.

* Castro derives Acidalia from acidus, which,

Her graceful freedom on his look bestow'd,
And all collected in his bosom glow'd.

"Sovereign," he cries, "oft witness'd, well I know
The rageful falsehood of the Moorish foe; 560
Their fraudulent tales, from hatred bred, believed,
Thine ear is poison'd, and thine eye deceived.
What light, what shade the courtier's mirror gives,
That light, that shade, the guarded king receives.
Me hast thou view'd in colours not mine own,
Yet bold I promise shall my truth be known.
If o'er the seas a lawless pest I roam,
A blood-stain'd exile from my native home,
How many a fertile shore and beautiful isle,
Where Nature's gifts unclaim'd, unbounded smile,
Mad have I left, to dare the burning zone, 570
And all the horrors of the gulfs unknown
That roar beneath the axle of the world,
Where ne'er before was daring sail assur'd!
And have I left these beautiful shores behind,
And have I dared the rage of every wind, [frost,
That now breathed fire, and now came wing'd with Lured by the plunder of an unknown coast?

Dread and stupendous, more than death-doom'd
Might hope to compass, more than wisdom plan,
To thee my toils, to thee my dangers rise:
Ah! Lisbon's kings beheld with other eyes,
Where virtue calls, where glory leads the way,
No dangers move them, and no toils dismay.
Long have the kings of Lusitania daring race
Resolved the limits of the deep to trace,
Beneath the morn to ride the furthest waves,
And pierce the furthest shore old ocean leaves. 590
Sprung from the prince's, before whose matchless
The strength of Afric wither'd as a flower [power
Never to bloom again, great Henry above,
Each gift of nature and of art his own;
Bold as his sire, by toils on toils untired,
To find the Indian shore his pride aspir'd.
Beneath the stars that round the Hydra shine,
And where fam'd Argos hangs the heavenly sign,
Where thirst and fever burn on every gale,
The dauntless Henry rear'd the Lusian sail. 600
Embolden'd by the deed that crown'd his toils,
Beyond the wide-spread shores and numerous isles,
Where both the tropics pour the burning day,
Succeeding heroes forc'd th' exploring way:
That race which never view'd the Pleiades' car,
That barbarous race beneath the southern star,
Their eyes beheld—Dread roar'd the blast—the Boils to the sky, the meeting whirlwinds rave [wave
O'er the torn heavens; loud on their awe-struck ear
Great Nature seem'd to call, 'Approach not here—
At Lisbon's court they told their dread escape, 610
And from her raging tempests named the Cape."
'Thou southmost point, the joyful king exclaim'd,
'Cape of Good Hope be thou for ever named!
Onward my fleets shall dare the dreadful way,
And find the regions of the Infant day.
In vain the dark and ever-howling blast
Proclaim'd, 'This ocean never shall be past—'
Through that dread ocean, and the tempest's roar,
My king commanded, and my course I bore. 620

he says, implies to act without fear or restraint. Acidalia is one of the names of Vento, in Virgil; derived from Acidalius, a fountain sacred to her in Ercotia.

* See the Preface.

The pillar thus of deathless fame U. began
 By other chiefs, beneath the rising Sun
 In thy great realm now to the skies I raise,
 The deathless pillar of my nation's praise.
 Through these wild seas no costly gift I brought;
 Thy shore alone and friendly peace I sought.
 And yet to thee the noblest gift I bring
 The world can boast—the friendship of my king.
 And mark the word, his greatness shall appear
 When next my course to India's strand I steer, 630
 Such proofs I'll bring as never man before
 In deeds of strife or peaceful friendship bore.
 Weigh now my words, my truth demands the light,
 For truth shall ever boast, at last, resistless might."

Boldly the hero spake with brow severe,
 Of fraud alike unconscious as of fear:
 His noble confidence with truth imprest
 Sunk deep, unwelcome, in the monarch's breast;
 Nor waiting charms his avarice to gain
 Appear'd the commerce of illustrious Spain. 640
 Yet as the sick man loathes the bitter draught, Though rich with health he knows the cup comes fraught;

His health without it, self-deceiv'd, he weighs,
 Now hastes to quaff the drug, and now delays:
 Reluctant thus as wavering passion veer'd,
 The Indian lord the dauntless Gama heard;
 The Moorish threats yet sounding in his ear,
 He acts with caution, and is led by fear.
 With solemn pomp he bids his lords prepare
 The friendly banquet, to the regent's care 650
 Commends brave Gama, and with pomp retires:
 The regent's hearths awake the social fires;
 Wide o'er the board the royal feast is spread,
 And fair embroidered shins De Gama's bed.
 The regent's palace high o'erlook'd the bay
 Where Gama's black-ribb'd fleet at anchor lay.

Ah, why the voice of ire and bitter woe
 O'er Tago's banks, ye Nymphs of Tago, show;
 The flowery garlands from your ringlets torn,
 Why wandering wild with trembling steps forlorn
 The demon's rage you saw, and mark'd his flight 661
 To the dark mansions of eternal night:
 You saw how howling through the shades beneath
 He waked new horrors in the realms of death.
 What trembling tempests shook the thrones of Hell,
 And groan'd along her caves, ye Muses, tell.
 The rage of baddled fraud, and all the fire
 Of powerless hate, with teufold flames conspire;
 From every eye the tawny lightning's glare,
 And Hell, illumined by the ghastly fare, 670
 (A dear blue gleam) in tenfold horror shows
 Her darkling caverns; from his dungeon rose
 Hagar's stern son, pale was his earthy hue,
 And from his eye-balls flash'd the lightnings blue;
 Convulsed with rage the dreadful shade demands
 The last assistance of th' infernal bands.
 As when the whirlwinds, sudden bursting, bear
 Th' autumnal leaves high-floating through the air;
 So rose the legions of th' infernal state,
 Dark fraud, base art, fierce rage, and burning hate:
 Wing'd by the furies, to the Indian strand 681
 They beat; the demon leads the dreadful band,

71 Till I now ending what those did begio,
 The furthest pillar in thy realm advance,
 Breaking the element of moiten tin,
 Through horrid storms I lead to thee the dance. Fanshaw.

And in the bosom of the raging Moors
 All their collected living strength he pours.
 One breast alone against his rage was steel'd,
 Secure in spotless truth's celestial shield.
 One evening past, another evening closed,
 The regent still brave Gama's suit opposed;
 The Lusian chief his guarded guest detain'd,
 With arts on arts, and vows of friendship feign'd.
 His fraudful art, though veil'd in deep disguise, 691
 Shone bright to Osma's manner-piercing eyes.
 As in the Sun's bright beam the gamesome boy
 Plays with the shining steel or crystal toy,

72 Imitated from Virgil, who, by the same simile, describes the fluctuation of the thoughts of Aeneas,
 on the eve of the Latian war:

—Laomedontius heros
 Cuncta videns, magno curam fluctuat aequo,
 Atque animum nunc huc celerem, nunc dividit
 illic,

In partemque rapit varias, perque omnia versat.
 Sicut aequo tremulum labris ubi lumen ahenis
 Sole repercutsum, aut radiantis imagine Lunae,
 Omnia pervolat latè loca: jamque sub auras
 Erigitur, summique ferit laquearia tecti.

This way and that he turns his anxious mind,
 Thinks, and rejects the counsels he design'd;
 Espies himself in vain, in every part,
 And gives no rest to his distracted heart:
 So when the Sun by day or Moon by night
 Strike on the polish'd brass their trembling light,
 The glittering species bore and there divide,
 And cast their dubious beams from side to side;
 Now on the walls, now on the pavement play,
 And to the ceiling flash the glaring day.

Ariosto has also adopted this simile in the eighth book of his Orlando Furioso:

Qual d'acqua chiara il tremolante lume
 Dal Sol percossa, o da' notturni rai,
 Per gli amplii tetti va con lungo salto
 A destra, ed a sinistra, e basso, ed alto.

So from a water clear, the trembling light
 Of Phœbus, or the silver ray of night,
 Along the spacious rooms with splendour plays,
 Now high, now low, and shifts a thousand ways.
 Hoole.

But the happiest circumstance belongs to Camoëns. The velocity and various shiftings of the sun-beam, reflected from a piece of crystal or polished steel in the hand of a boy, give a much stronger idea of the violent agitation and sudden shiftings of thought, than the image of the trembling light of the Sun or Moon reflected from a vessel of water. The brazen vessel however, and not the water, is only mentioned by Dryden. Nor must another inaccuracy pass unobserved: that the reflection of the Moon "flashed the glaring day" is not countenanced by the original. The critic however, who, from the mention of these, will infer any disrespect to the name of Dryden, is, as critics often are, ignorant of the writer's meaning. A very different inference is intended: if so great a master as Dryden has erred, let the reader remember, that other translators are liable to fail, and that a few inaccuracies ought by no means to be produced as the specimens of any composition.

Swift and irregular, by sudden starts,
The living ray with viewless motion darts,
Swift o'er the wall, the floor, the roof, by turns
The son-beam dances, and the radiance burns:
In quick succession thus a thousand views
The sapient Lusian's lively thought pursues; 700
Quick as the lightning every view revolves,
And, weighing all, fixt are his dread resolves.
O'er India's shore the subtle night descends,
And Gama, now, secluded from his friends,
Detain'd a captive in the room of state,
Anticipates in thought to-morrow's fate;
For just Mozambique no generous care delays,
And Vasco's trust with friendly toils repays. 708

LUSIAD IX.

Ran rose the dawn; roll'd o'er the low'ring sky;
The scattering clouds of tawny purple fly.
While yet the day-spring struggled with the gloom,
The Indian monarch sought the regent's dome.
In all the luxury of Asian state
High on a gem-starr'd oocah the monarch sat;
Then on th' illustrious captive bending down
His eyes, stern darken'd with a threatening frown,
" Thy truthful tale," he cries, " thy art appears,
Confer infamous by thy cautious fears. 10
Yet still if friendship, honest, thou implore,
Yet now command thy vessels to the shore:
Generous as to thy friends thy sails resign,
My will commands it, and the power is mine:
In vain thy art, in vain thy might withstands,
Thy sails, and rudders too, my will demands:
Such be the test, thy boasted truth to try,
Each other test despised, I first deny.
And has my regent sued two days in vain?
In vain my mandate, and the captive chain! 20
Yet not in vain, proud chief, yourself shall see
From thee the honour to my friendship due:
Ere force compel thee, let the grace be thine,
Our grace permits it, freely to resign,
Freely to trust our friendship, ere too late
Our injured honour fix thy dreadful fate!"

While thus he spake his changeful look declared,
In his proud breast what starting passions war'd.
No feature mov'd on Gama's face was seen,
Stern he replies, with bold yet anxious mien, 30
" In me my sovereign represented see,
His state is wounded, and he speaks in me:
Unawed by threats, by dangers uncontrol'd,
The laws of nations bid my tongue be bold.
No more thy justice holds the righteous scale,
The arts of falsehood and the Moors prevail;
I see the doom my favour'd foes decree,
Yet, though in chains I stand, my fleet is free.
The bitter taunts of scorn the brave disdain:
Few be my words, your arts, your threats are vain.
My sovereign's fleet I yield not to your sway *; 41
Safe shall my fleet to Lisbon's strand convey

* According to history. See the Preface.

* The circumstance of Gama's refusing to put his fleet into the power of the zamorin, is thus rendered by Fanshew;

The Malabar protests that he shall rot
In prison, if he send out for the ships.
He constant, (and with noble anger hot)
His naughty mouce weighs not at two ships.

The glorious tale of all the toils I bore,
Afric surrounded, and the Indian shore
Discovered—These I pledged my life to gain;
These to my country shall my life maintain.
One wish alone my earnest heart desires,
The sole impression'd hope my breast requires;
My flesh'd labours may my sovereign hear!
Beside that wish; our hope I know, nor fear. 58
And in the victim of your rage I stand,
And bare my breast to the murderer's hand."
With lofty mien he spake. In stern disdain,
" My threats," the monarch cries, " were never vain:

Swift give the sign!"—Swift as he spake, appear'd
The dancing streamer o'er the palace rear'd;
Instant another ensign distant rose, [thrus
Where, jutting through the flood, the mountain
A ridge enormous, and on either side
Defends the harbours from the furious tide. 60
Proud on his coach th' indignant monarch sat,
And awful silence fill'd the room of state.
With secret joy the Moors, exulting, glow'd,
And bent their eyes where Gama's navy rode;
Then, proudly heaved with panting hope, explore
The wood-crown'd upland of the bending shore.
Soon o'er the palms a small's tall pendant flow'd,
Bright to the Sun the purple radiance glow'd;
In martial pomp, far streaming to the skies,
Vaned after vanes in swift succession rise, 70
And through the opening forest-boughs of green
The sail's white lustre moving on is seen;
When sudden rushing by the point of land
The bowsprit nod, and wide the sails expand;
Full pouring on the sight, in warlike pride,
Extending still the rising squadrons ride:
O'er every deck, beneath the morning rays,
Like ruffled gold the broken spear-points blaze;
Each prow surrounded with a hundred oars,
Old ocean boils around the crowded prows: 80
And five times now in number Gama's might,
Proudly their boastful shouts provoke the fight;
Far round the shore the echoing peal rebounds,
Behind the hill an answering shout resounds:
Still by the point now-a-reading sails appear,
Till seven times Gama's fleet concludes the rear.
Again the shout triumphant shakes the bay;
Form'd as a crescent, wedg'd in firm array,
Their bow's wide horns the Lusian ships unclasp,
Prepared to crush them in their iron grasp. 90
Shouts echo shouts—with stern disdainful eyes
The Indian king to manly Gama cries,
" Not one of thine on Lisbon's shore shall tell
The glorious tale, how bold thy heroes fell."
With alter'd visage, for his eyes flash'd fire,
" God sent me here, and God's avengful ire Shall blast thy perjury," great Vasco cried,
" And humble in the dust thy wither'd pride."
A prophet's glow inspired his panting breast;
Indignant smiles the monarch's scorn confest. 100
Again deep silence fills the room of state,
And the proud Moors, secure, exulting wait:
And now enclasping Gama's in a ring,
Their feet sweep on—loud whizzing from the string

The black-wing'd arrows foot along the sky,
And rising clouds the falling clouds supply.
The lofty crowding spears, that bristling stood
Wide o'er the galleys as an upright wood,
Bend sudden, level'd for the closing fight;
The points wide-waving shed a glimny light. 110

Plate with joy, the king his aspect rears,
 And valiant Gama, thrill'd with transport, hears
 His drums' bold rattling raise the battle sound;
 Echo deep-toned hoarse vibrates far around;
 The shivering trumpets tear the shrill-voiced air,
 Quivering the gale, the flashing lightnings flare,
 The smoke rolls wide, and sudden bursts the roar,
 The lifted waves fall trembling, deep the shore
 Groans; quick and quicker blaze embraces blaze
 In flashing arms; louder the thunders raise 120
 Their roaring, rolling o'er the bended skies
 The burst incessant; awe-struck echo dies
 Faltering and deafen'd; from the brazen throats,
 Cloud after cloud, inroll'd in darkness, floats,
 Curling their sulph'rous fohs of fiery blue,
 Till their huge volumes take the fiery hue,
 And roll wide o'er the sky; wide as the sight
 Can measure Heaven, slow rolls the cloudy white:
 Beneath, the smoky blackness spreads afar
 Its hovering wings, and veils the dreadful war 130
 Deep in its horrid breast; the fierce red glare,
 Chequering the rifted darkness, fires the air,
 Each moment lost and kindled, while around
 The mingling thunders swell the lengthen'd sound.
 When piercing sudden through the dreadful roar
 The yelling shrieks of thousands strike the shore:
 Presaging horror through the monarch's breast
 Crept cold; and gloomy o'er the distant east
 Through Gata's hills the whirling tempest sigh'd †,
 And westward sweeping to the blacken'd tide, 140
 Howl'd o'er the trembling palace as it past,
 And o'er the gilded walls a gloomy twilight cast;
 Then, furious rushing to the darken'd bay ‡,
 Resistless swept the black-wing'd night away,
 With all the clouds that hover'd o'er the light,
 And o'er the weary combat pour'd the fight.

As by an Alpine mountain's pathless side
 Some traveller strays, unfriended of a guide;
 If o'er the hills the sable night descend,
 And gathering tempests with the darkness blend, 150
 Deep from the cavern'd rocks beneath aghast
 He hears the howling of the whirlwind's blast;
 Above resounds the crash, and down the steep
 Some rolling weight groans on with foundering
 Aghast he stands amid the shades of night, (sweep;
 And all his soul implores the friendly light:
 It comes; the dreary lightnings quivering blaze,
 The yawning depth beneath his lifted step betrays;
 Instant unmann'd, aghast in horrid pain,
 His knees no more their aetkly weight sustain; 160
 Powerless he sinks, no more his heart-blood flows:
 So sunk the monarch, and his heart-blood froze;
 So sunk he down, when o'er the clouded bay
 The rushing whirlwind pour'd the sudden day:
 Disaster's giant arm in one wide sweep
 Appear'd, and ruin blacken'd o'er the deep;
 The sheeted masts drove floating o'er the tide,
 And the torn hulks mill'd tumbling on the side;
 Some shatter'd plank each heaving billow tost,
 And by the hand of Heaven dash'd on the coast 170

† For the circumstances of the battle, and the tempest which then happened, see the Preface.

Groan'd procs ingulf'd, the lashing surges rave
 O'er the black keels upturn'd, the swelling wave
 Kisses the kuffy mast's reclining head;
 And far at sea some few torn galleys fled.
 Amid the dreadful scene triumphant rode
 The Lusian war-ships, and their aid bestow'd:
 Their speedy boats far round assisting ply'd,
 Where plunging, struggling, in the rolling tide,
 Grasping the shatter'd wrocks, the vanquish'd foes

Rear'd o'er the dashing waves their haggard brows.
 No word of scorn the lofty Gama spoke, 181
 Nor India's king the dreadful silence broke.
 Slow pass'd the hour, when to the trembling shore
 In awful pomp the victor-navy bore:
 Terrific, nodding on, the bowsprits bend,
 And the red streamers o'er her portend:
 Soon bursts the roar; the bombs tremendous rise,
 And trail their blackening rainbows o'er the skies;
 O'er Calicut's proud domes their rage they pour,
 And wrap her temples in a sulph'rous shower. 190
 'Tis o'er!—In threatening silence rides the West:
 Wild rage and horror yell in every street;
 Ten thousands, pouring round the palace gate;
 In clamorous uproar wait their wretched fate:
 While round the dome with lifted hands they kneel'd,

“ Give justice, justice to the strangers yield—
 Our friends, our husbands, sons, and fathers slain!
 Happier, alas, than these that yet remain—
 Curt by the councils, and the art unjust—
 Our friends in chains—our city in the dust— 200
 Yet, yet prevent—”

—————The silent Vasco saw

The weight of horror and o'erpowering awe
 That shook the Moors, that shook theregout's knees,
 And sunk the monarch down—By swift degrees
 The popular clamour rises. Lost, unmann'd,
 Around the king the trembling council stand; }
 While, wildly glaring on each other's eyes,
 Each lip in vain the trembling accents tries;
 With anguish sicken'd, and of strength bereft,
 Earnest each look inquires, “ What hope is left!”
 In all the rage of shame and grief aghast, 211
 The monarch, faltering, takes the word at last:
 “ By whom, great chief, are these proud warships sway'd,

Are there thy mandates honour'd and obey'd?
 Porgive, great chief, let gifts of price restrain
 Thy just revenge—Shall India's gifts be vain!—
 Oh spare my people and their doom'd abodes—
 Prayers, vows, and gifts appease the injured gods:
 Shall man deny?—Swift are the brave to avenge:
 The weak, the innocent confess their care— 220
 Helpless as innocent of guile to thee,
 Behold these thousands bend the suppliant knee—
 Thy navy's thundering sides black to the land
 Display their terrors—yet mayst thou command.”
 O'erpower'd he pass'd. Majestic and serene
 Great Vasco rose: then pointing to the scene
 Where bled the war, “ Thy fleet, proud king, behold
 O'er ocean and the strand in carriage roll'd!
 So shall this palace smother in the dust,
 And yon proud city weep thy arts unjust. 230

* See the history in the Preface.

† This most magnanimous resolution, to sacrifice his own safety or his life for the safe return of the fleet, is strictly true. See the Preface.

The Moors I know, and, for their fraud prepared,
I left my first command my navy's guard;
Whatever from shore my name or seal convey'd
Of other weight, that first command forbade;
Thus, ere its birth destroy'd, prevented fell
What fraud might dictate, or what force compel.
This more the sacrifice of fraud I stood,—
But hark, there lives the brother of my blood,
And lives the friend, whose cares conjoin'd control
These floating towers, both brothers of my soul. 240
' If thrice,' I said, ' arise the golden morn,
Ere to my fleet you mark my glad return,
Dark feud with all her Moorish arts withstands,
And force or death withhold me from my bands;
Thus judge, and swift unfurl the homeward sail,
Catch the first breathing of the eastern gale,
Unmindful of my fate on India's shore:
Let but my march know, I wish no more—'
Each, panting while I spoke, impatient cries,
The tear-drop bursting in their manly eyes, 250
' In all but one thy mandates we obey,
In one we yield not to thy generous sway:
Without thee never shall our sails return;
India shall bleed, and Calicut shall burn—
Thrice shall the morn arise; a flight of bombs
Shall then speak vengeance to their guilty domes:
Till noon we pause; then shall our thunders roar,
And desolation sweep the treacherous shore—'
Behold, spread high, their signal in the sky,
Near his meridian tower the Sun rides high. 260
O'er Calicut no more the evening shade
Shall spread her peaceful wings, my wrath unstay'd;
Dire through the night her smoking dust shall gleam, [scream.]
Dire through the night shall strike the female
" Thy worth, great chief," the pale-lip'd regent
cries,
" Thy worth we own: Oh, may these woes suffice!
To thee each proof of India's wealth we send;
Ambassadors, of noblest race, attend—"
Slow as he falter'd, Gama catch'd the word,
" On terms I talk not, and no truce afford: 270
Captives enough shall reach the Lusian shore:
Once you deceived me, and I treat no more.
Even now my faithful sailors, pale with rage,
Gnaw their blue lips, impatient to engage;
Ranged by their brazen tubes, the thundering band
Watch the first movement of my brother's hand;
E'en now, impatient, o'er the dreadful fire
They wave their eager onces besuit with fire;
Metinks my brother's anguish'd look I see,
The panting nostril and the trembling knee, 280
While keen he eyes the Son: On busy strides,
Hurried along the deck, Coello chides
His cold slow lingering, and impatient cries,
' Oh, give the sign, illumine the sacrifice.
A brother's vengeance for a brother's blood—'
He spake; and stern the dreadful warrior stood;
So seem'd the terrors of his awful nod,
The monarch trembled as before a god;
The treacherous Moors sunk down in faint dismay,
And speechless at his feet the council lay: 290
Abrupt, with out-stretch'd arms, the monarch cries?

" What yet—" but dared not meet the hero's eyes,

† Gama's declaration, that no message from him to the fleet could alter the orders he had already left, and his rejection of any further treaty, have

" What yet may save?"—Great Vasco stern re-joins,

" Swift, undisputing, give th' appointed signs:
High o'er thy loftiest tower my flag display,
Me and my train swift to my fleet convey:
Instant command—behold the Sun rides high—"
He spake, and rapture glow'd in every eye;
The Lusian standard o'er the palace flow'd;
Swift o'er the bay the royal barges row'd. 300
A dreary gloom a sudden whirlwind throw,
Amid the howling blast, emerg'd, withdrew
The vanquish'd demon—Soon in lustre mild,
As April smiles, the Sun auspicious smiled:
Elate with joy the shouting thousands trod,
And Gama to his feet triumphant rode.
Soft came the eastern gale on belmy wings:
Each joyful sailor to his labour springs;
Some o'er the bars their breasts robust recline,
And with firm tugs the rollers † from the brine, 310
Reluctant dragg'd, the slime-brown'd anchors rise;
Each gliding rope some nimble hand obeys;
Some bending o'er the yard-arm's length on high,
With nimble hands the canvas wings untie,
The flapping sails their widening folds disend,
And measured echoing shouts their sweaty toil
Nor had the captives lost the leader's care, [attend
Some to the shore the Indian barges bear;
The noblest few the chief detains to own
His glorious deeds before the Lusian throne, 320
To own the conquest of the Indian shore;
Nor wanted every proof of India's store:
What fruits in Ceylon's fragrant woods abound,
With woods of cinnamon her hills are crown'd:
Dry'd in its flower the nut of Banda's grove,
The burning pepper and the sable clove;
The clove, whose odour on the breathing gale
Far to the sea Malucco's plains exhale:
All these provided by the faithful Moor,
All these, and India's gems, the navy bore. 330
The Moor attends, Mozaide, whose zealous care
To Gama's eyes unveil'd each treach'rous ware?;
So burn'd his breast with Heaven-illumined flame,
And holy reverence of Messiah's name.

a necessary effect in the conduct of the poem. They hasten the catastrophe, and give a verisimilitude to the abrupt and full submission of the zamorim.

† The capstones.—The capstone is a cylindrical windlass, worked with bars, which are moved from hole to hole as it turns round. It is used to weigh the anchors, raise masts, &c. The name roller describes both the machine and its use, and, it may be presumed, is a more poetical word than capstone. The versification of this passage in the original affords a most noble example of imitative harmony:

Mas ja nas nuos os bons trabalhadores
Volvem o cabrestante, et repartidos
Pello trabalho, hums puxao pella amarra,
Outros quebrao eo puto dam a barra.

‡ Had this been mentioned sooner, the interest of the catastrophe of the poem must have languished. Though he is not a warrior, the unexpected friend of Gama bears a much more considerable part in the action of the Lusian, than the faithful Achates, the friend of the hero, bears in the business of the Æneid.

Oh, favour'd Africa, by Heaven's own light
Call'd from the dreary shades of error's night;
What man may dare his seeming ills arraign,
Or what the grace of Heaven's designs explain!
Far didst thou from thy friends a stranger roam,
There wast thou call'd to thy celestial home ³²⁹ 340

With rustling sound now swell'd the steady sail;
The lofty masts reclining to the gale
On full-spread wings the navy springs away,
And far behind them foams the ocean gray:
Afar the lessening hills of Gata fly,
And mix their dim blue summits with the sky:
Beneath the wave low sinks the spicy shore,
And roaring through the tide each nodding prore
Points to the Cape, great Nature's southmost bound,
The Cape of Tempests, now of Hope renew'd. 350
Their glorious tale on Lisbon's shore to tell
Inspires each bosom with a rapt'rous swell;
Now through their breasts the chilly tremours glide,
To dare once more the dangers dearly tried—
Soon to the winds are these cold fears resign'd,
And all their country rushes on the mind;
How sweet to view their native land, how sweet
The father, brother, and the bride to greet!
While listening round the hoary parent's board
The wondering kindred glow at every word; 360
How sweet to tell what woes, what toils they bore,
The tribes and wonders of each various shore!
These thoughts, the traveller's loved reward, em-
And swell each bosom with unutter'd joy ³⁷. [play,

³² This exclamatory address to the Moor Monzaida, however it may appear digressive, has a double propriety. The conversion of the eastern world is the great purpose of the expedition of Gama, and Monzaida is the first fruits of that conversion. The good characters of the victorious heroes, however neglected by the great genius of Homer, have a fine effect in making an epic poem interest us and please. It might have been said, that Monzaida was a traitor to his friends, and who crowned his villainy with apostasy. Camoëns has therefore wisely drawn him with other features, worthy of the friendship of Gama. Had this been neglected, the hero of the Lusiad might have shared the fate of the wise Ulysses of the Iliad, against whom, as Voltaire justly observes, every reader hears a secret ill-will. Nor is the poetical character of Monzaida unsupported by history. He was not an Arab Moor, so he did not desert his countrymen. By force these Moors had determined on the destruction of Gama: Monzaida admired and esteemed him, and therefore generously revealed to him his danger. By his attachment to Gama he lost all his effects in India, a circumstance which his prudence and knowledge of affairs must have certainly foreseen. By the known dangers he encountered, by the loss he thus voluntarily sustained, and by his after constancy, his sincerity is undoubtedly proved.

³¹ We are now come to that part of the Lusiad, which, in the conduct of the poem, is parallel to the great catastrophe of the Iliad, when, on the death of Hector, Achilles thus addresses the Grecian army:

—Ye sons of Greece, in triumph bring
The corse of Hector, and your Patrons sing:
Be this the song, slow moving tow'rd the shore,
"Hector is dead, and Ilion is no more."

The queen of love, by Heaven's eternal grace,
The guardian goddess of the Lusian race;
The queen of love, clad with joy, surveys
Her heroes, happy, plough the watery maze:
Their dreary toils revolve in her thought,
And all the woes by vengeful Bacchus wrought; 370
These toils, these woes her yearning curv's employ,
To bathe and balm in the streams of joy.
Amid the bosom of the watery waste,
Near where the bowers of Paradise were plac'd ³⁸,
An isle, array'd in all the pride of flowers,
Of fruits, of fountains, and of fragrant bowers,
She means to offer to their homeward prow,
The place of glad repast and sweet repose;
And there before their raptur'd view to raise
The heaven-top'd column of their deathless praise.

The goddess now ascends her silver car, ³⁸⁰
Bright was its hue as love's translucent star;
Beneath the reins the stately birds, that sing
Their sweet-ton'd death-song, spread the snowy
The gentle winds beneath her chariot sigh, [wing,
And virgin blushes purple o'er the sky:
On milk-white pious borne, her cooling doves
Form playful circles round her as she moves;
And now their beaks in fondling kisses join,
In amorous nods their fondling necks entwine. 390
O'er fair Idalia's bowers the goddess rode,
And by her altars sought Idalia's god:
The youthful bowyer of the heart was there;
His falling kingdom claim'd his earnest care ³⁹.

Our Portuguese poet, who in his machinery and many other instances has followed the manner of Virgil, now forsakes him. In a very bold and masterly spirit he uses models his poem by the steps of Homer. What of the Lusiad yet remains, in poetical conduct, though not in an imitation of circumstances, exactly resembles the latter part of the Iliad. The games at the funeral of Patroclus, and the redemption of the body of Hector, are the completion of the rage of Achilles. In the same manner, the reward of the heroes, and the consequences of their expedition, complete the unity of the Lusiad. I cannot say it appears that Milton ever read our poet; (though Faustus's translation was published in his time;) yet no instance can be given of a more striking resemblance of plan and conduct, than may be produced in two principal parts of the poem of Camoëns, and of the Paradise Lost. Of this however hereafter in its proper place.

³² According to the opinion of those who place the garden of Eden near the mountains of Inanus, from whence the Ganges and Indus derive their source.

³³ This fiction, in poetical conduct, bears a striking resemblance to the digressive histories, with which Homer enriches and adorns his poems, particularly to the beautiful description of the feast of the gods with the blameless Ethiopians. It also contains a masterly commentary on the machinery of the Lusiad. The divine Love conducts Gama to India. The same divine Love is represented as preparing to reform the corrupted world, when its attention is particularly called to bestow a foretaste of immortality on the heroes of the expedition which discovered the eastern world. Nor do the wild fantastic Loves, mentioned in this little episode, afford any objection against this explana-

His bands he masters, through the myrtle groves
On buxom wings he trains the little Loves.

don, an explanation which is expressly given in the episode itself. These wild fantastic amours signify, in the allegory, the wild sects of different enthusiasts, which spring up under the wings of the best and most rational institutions; and which, however contrary to each other, all agree in defying their authority from the same source.

* The French translator has the following characteristic note: "This passage is an eternal monument of the freedoms taken by Camoëns, and at the same time a proof of the impudence of poets; an authentic proof of that prejudice which sometimes blinds them, notwithstanding all the light of their genius. The modern Acton, of whom he speaks, was King Sebastian. He lived the chase; but that pleasure, which is one of the most innocent and one of the most noble we can possibly taste, did not at all interrupt his attention to the affairs of state, and did not render him savage, as our author pretends. On this point the historians are rather to be believed. And what would the lot of princes be, were they allowed no relaxation from their toils, while they allow that privilege to their people? Subjects as we are, let us venerate the amusements of our sovereigns; let us believe that the august cares for our good, which employ them, follow them often even to the very bosom of their pleasures."

Many are the strokes in the Lusiad which mark and exalt the character of Camoëns to every reader of sensibility. The noble freedom and manly indignation with which he mentions the fable of his prince, and the flatterers of his court, would do honour to the greatest names of Greece or Rome. While the shadow of freedom remained in Portugal, the greatest men of that nation, in the days of Lusian heroism, thought and conducted themselves in the spirit of Camoëns. A noble anecdote of this brave spirit offers itself. Alonzo IV. assumed the Drave, ascended the throne of Portugal in the vigour of his age. The pleasures of the chase engrossed all his attention. His confidants and favourites encouraged and allured him to it. His time was spent in the forests of Cimbra, while the affairs of government were neglected, or executed by those whose interest it was to keep their sovereign in ignorance. His presence, at last, being necessary at Lisbon, he entered the council with all the brisk impetuosity of a young sportsman, and with great familiarity and gaiety entertained his nobles with the history of a whole month spent in hunting, in fishing, and shooting. When he had finished his narrative, a nobleman of the first rank rose up: "Courts and camps," said he, "were allotted for kings, not woods and deserts. Even the affairs of private men suffer when recreation is preferred to business. But when the whims of pleasure engross the thoughts of a king, a whole nation is consigned to ruin. We came here for other purposes than to hear the exploits of the Indesert wilds devoted to the chase:

Each dear enchantment of the female face
Spur'd and neglected: Him enraged he sees,
And sweet, and dread his punishment decrees.
Before his ravish'd sight, in sweet surprise,
Naked in all her charms shall Dian rise; [born 15,
With her's fierce frowns his frozen heart shall Coldly his suit, the nymph, unmoved, shall spurn.

chase, exploits which are only intelligible to grooms and falconers. If your majesty will attend to the wants, and remove the grievances of your people, you will find them obedient subjects; if not——" The king, starting with rage, interrupted him. "If not, What——" "If not," resumed the nobleman, in a firm tone, "they will look for another and a better king." Alonzo, in the highest transport of passion, expressed his resentment, and hastened out of the room. In a little while however he returned, calm and reconciled, "I perceive," said he, "the truth of what you say. He who will not execute the duties of a king, cannot long have good subjects. Remember, from this day, you have nothing more to do with Alonzo the sportsman, but with Alonzo the king of Portugal." His majesty was as good as his promise, and became, as a warrior and politician, one of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs.

"It is said, that upon the faith of a portrait, don Sebastian fell in love with Margaret of France, daughter of Henry II. and demanded her in marriage, but was refused. The Spaniards treated him no less unfavourably, for they also reject his proposals for one of the daughters of Philip II. Our author considers these refusals as the punishment of don Sebastian's excessive attachment to the chase; but this is only a consequence of the prejudice with which he viewed the amusements of his sovereign. The truth is, these princesses were refused for political reasons, and not with any regard to the manner in which he filled up his moments of leisure."

Thus Castera, who, with the same spirit of sagacity, starts and answers the following objections: "But here is a difficulty; Camoëns wrote during the life of don Sebastian, but the circumstance he relates (the return of Gaton), happened several years before, under the reign of Emmanuel. How therefore could he say that Cupid then saw don Sebastian at the chase, when that prince was not then born? The answer is easy: Cupid, in the allegory of this work, represents the love of God, the Holy Spirit, who is God himself. Now the Divinity admits of no distinction of time; one glance of his eye beholds the past, the present, and the future; every thing is present before him."

The defence of the fiction of Acton is not more absurd than useless. The free and bold spirit of poetry, and in particular the nature of allegory, defend it. The poet might easily have said, that Cupid foresaw; but had he said so, his satire had been much less general. As the sentiments of Castera on the passage are extremely characteristic of the French ideas, another note from him will perhaps be agreeable. "Several Portuguese writers have remarked," says he, "that the wild,

-Of these loved dogs that saw his passions away,
-Ah! may he never fall the highest prey!

Of these loved dogs that now his passions sway, 418
Ah, may he never fall the hapless prey!

Enraged he sees a vessel herd, the shame
Of human race, assume the lifted name;¹⁴
And each, for some base interest of his own,
With flattery's manna'd lips assail the throne.
He sees the ones, whom holiest senitians bind
To poverty, and love of humanitarian;
While swift as drop the dews of beauteous May, 420
Their words preach virtue and her charms display,
He sees their eyes with lust of gold on fire,
And every wish to lordly state aspire;
He sees them trim the lamp at night's mid hour,
To plan new laws to arm the regal power;
Sleepless at night's mid hour to raise the laws,
The sacred bulwarks of the people's cause,
Fram'd ere the blood of hard-earn'd victory
On their brave fathers' helm-back, words was dry.

Nor these alone, each rank, debased and rade,
Mean objects, worthless of their love, pursued: 431
Their passions thus rebellious to his love, had in it an air of prophecy; and Fats, in effect, seemed careful to accomplish it, in making the presaged woes to fall upon don Sebastian. If he did not fall a prey to his pack of hounds, we may however say that he was devoured by his favourites, who mislead his youth and his great soul. But at any rate our poet has carried his similitude too far. It was certainly injurious to don Sebastian, who nevertheless had the bounty not only not to punish this audacity, but to reward the just eulogies which the author had bestowed on him in other places. As much as the indiscretion of Camoëns ought to surprise us, as much ought we to admire the generosity of his master.¹⁵

This foppery, this slavery in thinking, cannot fail to rouse the indignation of every manly breast, when the facts are fairly stated. Don Sebastian, who ascended the throne when a child, was a prince of great abilities and great spirit, but his youth was poisoned with the most romantic ideas of military glory. The affairs of state were left to his ministers, (for whose character see the next note), his other studies were neglected, and military exercises, of which he not unjustly esteemed the chase a principal, were almost his sole employ. Camoëns beheld this romantic taste, and in a general allegorical satire forebode its consequences. The wish, that his prince might not fall the prey of his favourite passion, was in vain. In a rash, ill-concerted expedition into Africa, don Sebastian lost his crown in his twenty-fifth year, an event which soon after produced the fall of the Portuguese empire. Had the nobility possessed the spirit of Camoëns, had they, like him, endeavoured to check the Quixotry of a young generous prince, that prince might have reigned long and happy, and Portugal might have escaped the Spanish yoke, which soon followed the defeat of Alcazar; a yoke which sunk Portugal into an abyss of misery, from which, in all probability, she will never emerge in her former splendour.

¹⁴ "After having ridiculed all the pleasures of don Sebastian, the author now proceeds to his courtiers, to whom he has done no injustice. Those who are acquainted with the Portuguese history will readily acknowledge this."—Castara.

The little Loves, light hovering in the air, [para:
Tearing their silk-bow-strings, and their arms pre-
Some on th' immortal anvils point the dark,
With power vainless to inflame the heart;
Their arrow heads they dip with soft desires,
And all the warmth of love's celestial fires;
Some sprinkle o'er the shafts the fears of men, 440
Some store the quiver, some steel-spring the bow;
Each chanting as he works the tuneful strain
Of love's dear joys, of love's luxurious pain:
Champ'd was the lay to conquer and refine,
Divine the melody, the song divine.

Already now began the vengeful war,
The witness of the god's benignant care;
On the hard bosoms of the stubborn crowd
An arrow shower the bowyer train bestow'd¹⁷;
Pierced by the whizzing shafts, deep sighs the air, 450
And answering sighs the wounds of love declare.
Though various featured and of various hue,
Each nymph seems loveliest in her lover's view;
Fired by the darts by novice archers sped,
Ten thousand wild fantastic loves are bred:
In wildest dreams the rustic hind aspires,
And haughtiest lords confess the humblest fires.

The snowy arms of love's celestial queen
Now land her chaplet on the shore of green;
One knee display'd she trends the bowyer strand,
The gather'd robs fall loosely from her hand; 461
Half-seen her bosom leaves the living snow, and on her smiles the living roses glow.
The bowyer god, whose subtle shafts u'er fly
Mistaken, in vain, in vain on Earth or sky
With rosy smiles the mother power receives;
Around her clinging, thick as ivy leaves,
The vassal Loves in food contention join
Who first and next shall kiss her hand divine.
Swift in her arms she caught her wanton boy, 470
And, "Oh, my son," she cries, "my pride, my joy,
Against thy might the dreadful Typhon fail'd,
Against thy shaft, nor Heaven, nor Love prevail'd;
Unless thine arrow wake the young desires,
My strength, my power, in vain each charm expires:
My son, my hope, I claim thy powerful aid,
Nor be the boon, thy mother sues, delay'd;
Whose e'er, so will th' eternal Fates, where e'er,
The Lusian race the victor standards rear,
There shall my hymns resound, my alters flame,
And heavenly love her joyful love proclaim. 481
My Lusian heroes, as my Romans, brave,
Long last, long hopeless on the storm-torn wave,
Wearied and weak, at last on India's shore
Arrived, new toils, repose denied, they bore;
For Bacchus there with tenfold rage pursued
My dauntless sons; but now his might subdued,
Amid these raging seas, the scene of woes,
Thine shall be now the balm of sweet repose;
Thine every joy the noblest heroes claim, 490
The raptur'd, forestate of immortal fame.
Then bend thy bow and wound the Nersid train,
The lovely daughters of the azure main;
And lead them, while they pant with amorous
fire,

Right to the isle which all my smiles inspire:

¹⁷ There is an elegance in the original of this line, which the English language will not admit;

Nos duos coramens de pibe durs:—

In the hard hearts of the hard vulgar.—

Now shall my care that behauteous life supply,
Where Zephyr, breathing love, on Flora's lap shall sigh.

There let the nymphs the gallant heroes meet,
And strew the pink and rose beneath their feet:
In crystal halls the feast divine proking,
With wine nectarous and immortal song: 500
Let every nymph the snow-white bed prepare,
And, fairer far, resign her bosom there;
There to the greedy riotous embrace
Resign each hidden charm with dearest grace:
Thus from my native waves a hero line
Shall rise, and o'er the east illustrious shine¹²;
Thus shall the rebel world thy prowess know,
And what the boundless joys our friendly powers bestow.¹³

She said; and smiling view'd her mighty boy;
Swift to the chariot springs the god of joy; 510
His ivory bow, and arrows tip with gold,
Blas'd to the sun-beam as the chariot roll'd:
Their silver harness shining to the day
The swans on milk-white pinnacles spring away,
Smooth gliding o'er the clouds of lovely blue;
And Fame, so will'd the god, before them flew¹⁴:
A giant goddess, whose ungovern'd tongue
With equal zeal proclaims or right or wrong;
Oft had her lips the god of love blasphem'd,
And oft with tenfold praise his conquests nam'd:
A hundred eyes she rolls with ceaseless care, 520
And thousand tongues what these behold declare:
Fleet is her flight, the lightning's wing she rides,
And though she shifts her colours swift as glides
The April rainbow, still the crowd she guides.
And now aloft her wondering voice she rais'd,
And with a thousand glowing tongues she prais'd
The bold discoverers of the eastern world—
In gentle swells the listening surges curl'd,
And murmur'd to the sounds of plaintive love 530
Along the grottoes where the Nereids rove.
The drowsy power, on whose smooth easy mien
The smiles of wonder and delight are seen,
Whose glossy simpering eye bespeaks her name,
Credulity, attends the goddess Fame.
Fired by the heroes' praise, the watery gods¹⁵,
With ardent speed forsake their deep abodes;

¹² "By the line of heroes to be produced by the union of the Portuguese with the Nereids, is to be understood the other Portuguese, who, following the steps of Gama, established illustrious colonies in India."—Castera.

¹³ This passage affords a striking instance of the judgment of Camoens. Virgil's celebrated description of Fame (see note 19 of Lusid V.) is in his eye; but he copies it, as Virgil, in his best imitations, copies after Homer. He adopts some circumstances; but by adding others he makes a new picture, which justly may be called his own.

¹⁴ To mention the gods in the masculine gender, and immediately to apply to them,

O peito feminino, que levanta
Muda quazaquer propositos tomados.—

The ease with which the female breast changes its revolutions, may to the hyperstrophic appear reprehensible. The expression however is classical, and therefore retained. Virgil uses it, where Æneas is conducted by Venus through the flames of Troy;

Their rage by vengeance Bacchus rais'd of late,
Now stung remorse, and love succeeds to hate.
Ah, where remorse in female bosom bleeds, 540
The tenderest love in all its glow succeeds.
When fancy glows, how strong, O Love, thy power!
Nor shipp'd the eager god the happy bow;
Swift by his arrows o'er the billowy main,
Wing'd with his fires, nor flies a shaft in vain:
Thus, ere the face the lover's breast inspires,
The voice of fame awakes the soft desires.
While from the bow-string start the shafts divine,
His ivory moon's wide horns incessant join,
Swift twinkling to the view; and wide he pours
Omnipotent in love his arrowy showers. 551
E'en These' self confess'd the tender smart
And pour'd the murmurs of the wounded heart;
Soft o'er the billows pasts the amorous eye;
With wishful languor melting on each eye
The love-sick nymphs explose the tardy sails
That waft the heroes on the lingering gales.

Give way, ye lofty billows, low subside,
Smooth as the level plain, your swelling pride, 560
Lo, Venus comes! Oh, soft, ye surges, sleep;
Smooth be the bosom of the azure deep.
Lo, Venus comes! and in her vigorous train
She brings the healing balm of love-sick pain.
White as her swans, and stately as they rear¹⁶
Their snowy crests when o'er the lake they steer,
Slow moving on, behold, the fleet appears,
And o'er the distant billow onward steers.
The beauteous Nereids flush'd in all their charms
Surround the goddess of the soft alarms:
Right to the isle she leads the smiling train, 570
And all her art her betray lips explain;
The fearful languor of the asking eye,
The lovely blush of yielding modesty,
The grieving look, the sigh, the favouring smile,
And all th' endearments of the open wife,
She taught the nymphs—in willing breasts that heaved

To hear her lore, her love the nymphs received.

As now triumphant to their native shore
Through the wide deep the joyful navy bore;
Earliest the pilot's eyes sought cape or bay, 580
For long was yet the various watery way;
Bought cape or isle from whence their boats might
The healthful bounty of the crystal spring; (bring
When sudden, all in nature's pride array'd,
The Isle of Love its glowing breast display'd.
O'er the green bosom of the dawy lawn
Soft blazing flow'd the silver of the dawn,
The gentle waves the glowing lustre shew,
Arabia's balm was sprinkled o'er the air.
Before the fleet, to catch the heroes' view, 590
The floating isle fair Acidalia drew;

Descendo, ac ductante Deo, flammam later et Expedior.— [Hostes

This is in the manner of the Greek poets, who use the word Θεός for god or goddess.

¹⁶ A distant fleet compared to swans on a lake is certainly a happy thought. The allusion to the pomp of Venus, whose agency is immediately concerned, gives it besides a peculiar propriety. This simile, however, is not in the original. It is adopted from an uncommon happiness of Parashaw;

The pregnant sayles be Neptune's surface creep,
Like her-down swans, to gate, out-shut, and feather.

Soon as the floating verdure caught their sight⁶⁰,
 She fix'd, unmor'd, the island of delight.
 So when in child-birth of her Jove-sprung load,
 The sylvan goddess and the bowyer god,
 In friendly pity of Latona's woe⁶¹,
 Amid the waves the Delian isle arose.
 And now led smoothly o'er the furrow'd tide,
 Right to the isle of joy the vessels glide:
 The bay they enter, where on every hand 600
 Around them clasp the flower-enamell'd land;
 A safe retreat, where not a blast may shake
 Its fluttering pinions o'er the stilly lake.
 With purple shells, transfus'd as marble veins,
 The yellow sands celestial Venus stains.
 With graceful pride three hills of softest green
 Rear their fair bosoms o'er the sylvan scene:
 Their sides embroider'd boast the rich array
 Of flowery shrubs in all the pride of May;
 The purple lotos and the snowy thorn, 610
 And yellow pod-flowers every slope adorn.
 From the green summits of the leafy hills
 Descend with murmuring lapse three limpid rills;
 Beneath the rose-trees loitering slow they glide,
 Now tumbles o'er some rock their crystal pride;
 Sonorous now they roll adown the glade,
 Now plaintive tinkle in the secret shade,
 Now from the dawning grove, beneath the beam
 Of roddy morn, like melted silver stream,
 Edging the painted margins of the bowers, 620
 And breathing liquid freshness on the flowers.
 Here bright reflected in the pool below
 The vermeil apples tremble on the bough;
 Where o'er the yellow sands the waters sleep,
 The primrose banks, inverted, dew-drops weep;
 Where murmuring o'er the pebbles purls the stream
 The silver trout in playful curvings gleam.
 Long thins and various every rivulet strays,
 Till closing now their long meandering maze,
 Where in a smiling vale the mountains end, 630
 Form'd in a crystal lake the waters blend⁶²:

⁶⁰ As the departure of Gama from India was abrupt (see the Preface), he put into one of the beautiful islands of Anchediva for fresh water. While he was here encircling his ships, says Paris, a pirate named Timoja attacked him with eight small vessels, all linked together and covered with boughs, that they formed the appearance of a floating island. This, says Casters, afforded the notion of the floating island of Venus. "The fictions of Camoëns," says he, "sont d'autant plus merveilles, qu'elles ont toutes leur fondement dans l'histoire, are the more marvellous, because they are all founded in history. It is not difficult to find why he makes his island of Anchediva to wander on the waves; it is in allusion to a singular event related by Barra." He then proceeds to the story of Timoja, as if the genius of Camoëns stood in need of so weak an assistance.

⁶¹ Latona, in pregnancy by Jupiter, was persecuted by Juno, who sent the serpent Python in pursuit of her. Neptune, in pity of her distress, raised the island of Delos for her refuge, where she was delivered of Apollo and Diana.—Ovid. Met.

⁶² Casters also attributes this to history; "The Portuguese actually found in this island," says he, "a fine piece of water ornamented with hewn stones and magnificent aqueducts; an ancient and superb work, of which nobody knew the author."

Fring'd was the border with a woodward shade,
 In every leaf of various green array'd,
 Each yellow-tinged, each mingling tint between
 The dark ash-verdure and the silvery green.
 The trees now bending forward slowly shake
 Their lofty honours o'er the crystal lake;
 Now from the flood the graceful boughs retire
 With coy reserve, and now again admire
 Their various liveries by the summer drest, 640
 Smooth-gloss'd and softened in the mirror's breast.
 So by her glaze the wishful virgin stays,
 And oft retiring steals the lingering gaze.
 A thousand boughs aloft to Heaven display
 Their fragrant apples shining to the day;
 The orange here performs the buxott's air⁶³,
 And boasts the golden hue of Daphne's hair,
 Near to the ground each spreading bough descends,
 Beneath her yellow load the citron bends;
 The fragrant lemon accents the cobby grove; 650
 Fair as when ripening for the days of love
 The virgin's breasts the gentle swelt avow;
 So the twin fruitage swell on every bough.
 Wild forest trees the mountain sides array'd
 With curling foliage and romantic shade:
 Here spreads the poplar, to Alcides dear;
 And dear to Phœbus, ever verdant here,

In 1505 don Francisco Almeyda built a fort in this island. In digging among some ancient ruins he found many crucifixes of black and red colour, from whence the Portuguese conjectured, says Osorio, that the Anchedivian islands had in former ages been inhabited by Christians. Vid. Osor. l. iv.

⁶³ Frequent allusions to the fables of the ancients form a characteristic feature of the poetry of the 16th and 17th centuries. A profusion of it is pedantry; a moderate use of it, however, in a poem of these times pleases, because it discovers the stages of composition, and has in itself a fine effect, as it illustrates its subject by presenting the classical reader with some little landscapes of that country through which he has travelled. The description of forests is a favourite topic in poetry. Chancer, Tasso, and Spenser, have been happy in it, but both have copied an admired passage in Statius;

—Cedit ardua fagus,

Chaoniamque nemus, brumaque illæsa cypressus;
 Procumbunt piceæ, flammis alimenta supremis,
 Ornique, ilicæque trabes, metuendaque succo
 Taxos, et infandos belli potura cruores
 Fraxinus, atque sita non expugnabile robur:
 Hinc audax abies, et odoro vulnere pinus
 Scinditur, acclinant intonsæ cacumina terræ
 Alnus amica fretis, nec inhospitæ vitibus ulmus.

In rural descriptions three things are necessary to render them poetical; the happiness of epithet, of picturesque arrangement, and of little landscape views. Without these, all the names of trees and flowers, though strung together in tolerable numbers, contain no more poetry than a nurseryman or a florist's catalogue. In Statius, in Tasso and Spenser's admired forests, (Gier. Libr. c. 3. st. 75, 76, and F. Queen, b. i. c. 1. st. 8, 9.) the poetry consists entirely in the happiness of the epithets. In Camoëns, all the three requisites are admirably attained, and blended together.

The laurel joins the bowers for ever green,
 The myrtle bowers below'd of beauty's queen.
 To Jove the oak his wide-spread branches rears;
 And high to Heaven the fragrant cedar bears; 651

 Sacred to Cybele the whispering pine
 Loves the wild grottoes where the white cliffs shine;
 Here towers the cypress, preacher to the wise,
 Less'ning from earth her spiral honours rise,
 Till, as a spear-point rear'd, the topmost spray
 Points to the Eden of eternal day.
 Here round her fostering elm the smiling vine 670
 In food embraces gives her arms to twine;
 The numerous clusters pendant from the boughs,
 The green here glistens, here the purple glows:
 For here the genial Seasons of the year
 Danc'd hap'd in hand, no place for Winter here;
 His grisly visage from the shore expell'd,
 United sway the smiling Seasons held.
 Around the swelling fruits of deepening red,
 Their snowy hues the fragrant blossoms spread;
 Between the bursting buds of lucid green 680
 The apple's ripe vermilion blush is seen;
 For here each gift Pomona's hand bestows
 In cultured garden, free, uncultured flows,
 The favour sweeter, and the hue more fair,

 The cherry here in shining crimson glows;

 The bending boughs the mulberries o'erload²⁴;
 The bending boughs careen'd by Zephyr nod.

 Far from his native earth, the Persian soil,
 The velvet peach of softest glossy blue,

 where the author intended a festive landscape. It must be confessed however, that the description of the island of Venus is infinitely the best part of all Fanshew's translation. And indeed the dullest prose translation might obscure, but could not possi-

Of fairer tapestry, and of richer bloom,
 Than ever glow'd in Persia's boasted loom:
 As glittering rainbows o'er the verdure throws,
 O'er every woodland walk th' embroidery shows,
 Here o'er the watery mirror's lucid bed 710
 Narcissus, self-enamur'd, hangs the head;
 And here, bedew'd with love's celestial tears,
 The wee-mark'd flower of slain Adonis rears²⁶
 Its purple head, prophetic of the reign
 When lost Adonis shall revive again.
 At strife appear the lawns and purpl'd skies,
 Which from each other stole the beauteous dyes²⁷.
 The lawn in all Aurora's lustre glows,
 Aurora steals the blushes of the rose,
 The rose displays the blushes that adorn 720
 The spotless virgin on the nuptial morn.
 Zephyr and Flora emulous conspire
 To breathe their graces o'er the field's attire;
 The one gives healthful freshens, one the hue,
 Fairer than e'er creative pencil drew.
 Pale as the love-sick hopeless maid they dye
 The modest violet; from the curious eye
 The modest violet turns her gentle head,
 And by the thorn weeps o'er her lowly bed;
 Bending beneath the tears of pearly dawn 730
 The snow-white lily glitters o'er the lawn;
 Lo, from the bough reclines the damask rose,
 And o'er the lily's milk-white bosom glows;
 Fresh in the dew far o'er the painted dales,
 Each fragrant herb her sweet-scent exhales;
 The hyacinth bewrays the doleful Aï²⁸,
 And calls the tribute of Apollo's sigh;

²⁶ "The anemone.—This," says Casters, "is applicable to the celestial Venus; for, according to mythology, her amour with Adonis had nothing in it impure, but was only the love which Nature bears to the Sun." The fables of antiquity have generally a threefold interpretation, an historical action, a physical and a metaphysical allegory. In the latter view, the fable of Adonis is only applicable to the celestial Venus. A divine youth is outrageously slain, but shall revive again at the restoration of the golden age. Several nations, it is well known, under different names, celebrated the anniversary, or the death and resurrection of Adonis; among whom were the British Druids, as we are told by Dr. Stukely, in the same manner Cupid, in the fable of Psyche, is interpreted by mythologists, to signify the divine love weeping over the degeneracy of human nature.

²⁷ On this passage Casters has the following ob-servable though turgid note: "This thought," says he, "is taken from the idyllium of Anacronius on the rose;

Ambigeres raperent rosas Aurora roboret,
 An daret, et flores tingeret orta dies.

Camoëns, who had a genius rich of itself, still further enriched it at the expense of the ancients. Behold what makes great authors! Those who pretend to give us nothing but the fruits of their own growth, soon fail, like the little rivulets which dry up in the summer; very different from the floods, who receive in their course the tribute of an hundred and an hundred rivers, and which even in the dog-days carry their waves triumphant to the ocean."

Still on its bloom the mournful flower retains
The lovely blue that dy'd the stripling's veins.
Pomona fired with rival envy views 740
The glaring pride of Flora's darling hues;
Where Flora bids the purple iris spread,
She bangs the winking blossom white and red;
Where wild thyme purple, where the daisy grows
The curving slopes, the melon's pride she throws;
Where by the stream the lily of the vale,
Primrose, and cowslip meek, perfume the gale,
Beneath the lily and the cowslip's bell
The scarlet strawberries luxuriant swell.
Nor these alone the teeming Eden yields, 750
Each harmless bestial crops the flowery fields;
And birds of every note and every wing
Their loves responsive through the branches sing;
In sweet vibrations thrilling o'er the skies,
High-poise'd in air, the lark his warbling tries;
The swan slow sailing o'er the crystal lake
Tunes his melodious note; from every brake
The glowing strain the nightingale returns,
And in the bowers of love the turtle moans.
Pleased to behold his branching horns appear, 760
O'er the bright fountain bends the fearless deer;
The hare starts trembling from the bushy shade,
And, swiftly dithering, crosses of the glade.
Where from the rocks the bobbling founts distill,
The milk-white lambi come bleating down the hill;
The dappled heifer seeks the vales below,
And show the thicket springs the bounding doe.
To his lov'd nest, on fondly fluttering wings,
In chirping bill the little songster brings.
The food untasted; transport thrills his breast; 770
'Tis nature's touch; 'tis instinct's heaven-like
Thus bowers and lawn were deckt with Eden's
And song and joy immortaliz'd the bowen.
And soon the Bore their ready anchors threw:

On whistling feet that bounded to the strand
The nuptial Argonauts dance to land 780.

The expedition of the Golden Fleece was esteemed in ancient poetry one of the most daring adventures, the success of which was recounted miraculous. The allusions of Camoëns to this voyage, though in the spirit of his age, are by no means improper.

We now come to the passage condemned by Voltaire as so lascivious, that no nation in Europe, except the Portuguese and Italians, could bear it. But the author of the detestable poem La Pucelle d'Orléans talks of the island of Yenna with that same knowledge of his subject with which he made Camoëns, who was not then born, a companion to Gama in the expedition which discovered the route to India. Though Voltaire's cavils, I trust, are in general fully answered in the Preface, a particular examination of the charge of indecency may not be unnecessary ere the reader enter upon the passage itself. No painter then, let it be remembered, was ever blamed for drawing the Graces unveiled or naked. In sculpture, in painting, and poetry, it is not nakedness, it is the expression or manner only that offends decency. It is this which constitutes the difference between a Venus de Medicis and the lascivious paintings in the apartments of a Tiberius. The fate of Camoëns has hitherto been very peculiar. The mixture of Pagan and Christian mythology in his machinery has been anathematized, and his island of Love represented as a brothel. Yet both accusations are the arrogant assertions of the most superficial acquaintance with his works, a hearsay, echoed from critic to critic. His poem itself, and a comparison of its parts with the similar conduct of the greatest modern poets, will clearly evince, that in both instances no modern epic writer of note has given less offence to true criticism.

Not to mention Ariosto, whose descriptions will often admit of no palliation, Tasso, Spenser, and Milton, have always been esteemed as the chastest of poets, yet in the deficiency of warm description, the inartificial modesty of nature, none of them can boast the continued uniformity of the Portuguese poet. Though there is a warmth in the coloring of Camoëns, which even the genius of Tasso has not reached; and though the island of Armida is evidently copied from the Lusiad; yet those who are possessed of the finer feelings will easily discover an essential difference between the love-scenes of the two poets, a difference greatly in favour of the delicacy of the former. Though the nymphs in Camoëns are detected naked in the woods and in the stream, and though desirous to captivate, still their behaviour is that of the virgin who hopes to be the spouse. They act the part of offended modesty, even when they yield they are silent, and behave in every respect like Milton's Eve in the state of innocence, who — What was honour knew —

And who displayed

Her virtue, and the conscience of her worth,
That would be wooed, and not unsought be won.

To sum up all, the nuptial sanctity draws its lowered curtains, and a masterly allegory shuts up the love-scenes of Camoëns.

How different from all this is the island of Armida in Tasso, and its translation, the bower of Acrasia, in Spenser! In these virtues seduced; the scene therefore is less delicate. The nymphs, while they are basking in the modesty of the bride, as in Camoëns, employ all the arts of the lascivious wanton. They stay not to be wooed; but, as Spenser gives it,

The amorous sweet spoils to greedy eyes reveal.
One stanza from our English poet, which however is rather fuller than the original, shall here suffice:

Withal she laughed and she blush'd withal,
That blushing to her laughter gave more grace,
And laughter to her blushing, as did fall.
Now when they spy'd the knight to slack his pace,

Here from the bowers that crown the plaintive rill
The solemn harp's melodious warblings thrill;

Them to behold, and in his sparkling face
The secret signs of kindling lust appear,
Their wanton merriments they did increase,
And to him beckon'd to approach more near,
And shew'd him many sights, that courage cold could rear.

This and other descriptions,

Upon a bed of roses she was laid
As faint through heat, or dight to pleasant sin—

present every idea of lascivious voluptuousness. The allurements of speech are also added. Songs, which breathe every persuasive, are heard; and the nymphs boldly call to the beholder;

E' dolce campo di battaglia il letto
Fiari, e l'herbetta morbida de' prati. — Tasso.

Our field of battle is the downy bed,
Or flowery turf amid the smiling mead.—

Hoole.

There and the whole scenes in the domains of Arctida and Acrasia are in a turn of manner the reverse of the island of Venus. They are the scenes of guilt and remorse. In Camoëns, the supposition of the purest honour and innocence gives a nameless delicacy; and though the colouring be warm, yet the modesty of the Venus de Medicis is still preserved. In every thing he describes there is still something strongly similar to the modest attitude of the arms of that celebrated statue. Though prudery, that usual mask of the impurest minds, may condemn him, yet those of the most chaste though less gloomy turn will allow, that in comparison with others he might say,—Virgibus puerisque canto.

Spenser also, where he does not follow Tasso, is often gross; and even in some instances, where the expression is more delicate, the picture is nevertheless indecently lascivious. The third and fourth of the five concluding stanzas, which in his second edition he added to the third book of the Faerie Queene, afford a striking example. The virgin Britomart, the pattern of chastity, stands by, while sir Scudamore and Amoret

Nor is even Spenser's wife of Malbecco more indelicate than some lines of the Paradise Lost. The reply of the angel to Adam's description of his nuptials contains some strokes intolerably disgusting. And the first effect of the forbidden fruit offers a remarkable contrast to that delicacy of expression which adorns the first loves of Adam and Eve. If there is propriety, however, in thus representing the amours of guilty intoxication, by which figure Milton calls it, some of the terms of expression are still indelicately indelicate. In a word, so unjust is the censure of Voltaire, a censure which never arose from a comparison of Camoëns with other poets, and so ill-grounded is the charge

Here from the shadows of the upland grove
The mellow lute renews the swelling note,
As fair Diana and her virgin train,
Some gaily ramble o'er the flowery plain,
In feign'd pursuit of hare or bounding roe,
Their graceful mien and beauteous limbs to show;
Now seeming careless, fearful now and coy, 790
(So taught the goddess of unutter'd joy.)
And gliding through the distant glades display
Each limb, each movement, naked as the day.
Some light with glee in careless freedom take
Their playful revels in the crystal lake;
One trembling stands no deeper than the knee,
To plunge reluctant, while in sportful glee
Another o'er her sudden waves the tide;
In pearly drops the wishful waters glide,
Reluctant dropping from her breasts of snow; 800
Beneath the wave another seems to glow;
The amorous waves her bosom fondly kiss'd,
And rose and fell, as panting on her breast.
Another swims along with graceful pride,
Her silver arms the glistening waves divide,
Her shining sides the fondling waters lave,
Her glowing cheeks are brighten'd by the wave,
Her hair, of mildest yellow, flows from side
To side, as o'er it plays the wanton tide;
And careless as she turns, her thighs of snow 810
Their tapering rounds in deeper lustre show.

Some gallant Lusians sought the woodland prey,
And through the thickets forced the pathless way;
And some, in shades impervious to the beam,
Supinely listen'd to the murmuring stream:
When sudden through the boughs the various dyes
Of pink, of scarlet, and of azure rise.
Swift from the verdant banks the loiterers spring,
Down drops the arrow from the half-drawn string:
Soon they behold 't was not the rose's hue, 820
The jonquil's yellow, nor the pansy's blue:
Dazzling the shades the nymphs appear—the zone
And flowing scarf in gold and azure shone.
Naked as Venus stood in Ida's bower,
Some trust the dazzling charms of native power;
Through the green boughs and darkling shades they
The shining lustre of their native snow, [show
And every tapering, every rounded swell
Of thigh, of bosom, as they glide, reveal.
As visions cloth'd in dazzling white they rise, 830
Then steal unnoted from the hurried eyes:
Again apparent, and again withdrawn,
They shine and wanton o'er the smiling lawn.
Amazed and lost in rapture of surprise,
"All joy, my friends," the brave Veloso cries, against him, that we cannot but admire his superior delicacy; a delicacy not even understood in his age, when the grossest imagery often found a place in the pulpits of the most pious divines; when in the old liturgy itself it was esteemed no indelicacy of expression to enjoin the wife to be buxom in bed and at board. We know what liberties were taken by the politest writers of the Augustan age; and such is the change of manners, that Shakespeare and Spenser might with justice appeal from the judgement of the present, when it condemns them for indelicacy. Camoëns, however, may appeal to the most polished age; let him be heard for himself, let him be compared with others of the first name, and his warmest descriptions need not dread the decision.

"What'er of goddesses old fable told,
Or poet sung of sacred groves, behold.
Sacred to goddesses divinely bright
These beauteous forests own their guardian might.
From eyes profane, from every age conceal'd, 840
To us, behold all Paradise reveal'd!
Swift let us try if phantoms of the air,
Or living charms appear divinely fair!"
Swift at the word the gallant Lusians bound,
Their rapid footsteps scarcely touch the ground;
Through copse, through brake, impatient of their prey,

Swift as the wounded deer they spring away:
Fleet through the winding shades in rapid flight
The nymphs, as wing'd with terror, fly their sight.
Fleet though they fled, the mild reverted eye 850
And dimpling smile their seeming fear deny.
Fleet through the shades in parted rout they glide:
If winding path the chosen pairs divide,
Another path by sweet mistake betrays.
And throws the lover on the lover's gaze:
If dark-brow'd bower conceal the lovely fair,
The laugh, the shriek, confess the charmer there.

Luxurious here the wanton Zephyrs toy,
And every fondling favouring art employ.
Fleet as the fair ones speed, the busy gale 860
In wanton frolic lifts the trembling veil;
White through the veil, in fairer brighter glow,
The lifted robe displays the living snow:
Quick fluttering on the gale the robe conceals,
Then instant to the glance each charm reveals,
Reveals, and covers from the eyes on fire,
Reveals, and with the shade inflames desire.
One, as her breathless lover hastens on,
With wily stumble sudden lies o'erthrown;
Confus'd she rises with a blushing smile; 870
The lover falls the captive of her guile:
Tript by the fair he tumbles on the mead,
The joyful victim of his eager speed.

Afar, where sport the wantons in the lake,
Another band of gallant youths betake;
The laugh, the shriek, the revel and the toy,
Bespeak the innocence of youthful joy:
The laugh, the shriek, the gallant Lusians hear,
As through the forest glades they chase the deer;
For arm'd to chase the bounding roe they came,
Unhop'd the transport of a nobler game. 881
The naked wantons, as the youths appear,
Shrill through the woods resound the shriek of fear.
Some feign such terror of the forced embrace,
Their virgin modesty to this gives place,
Naked they spring to land, and speed away
To deepest shades unpierc'd by glaring day;
Thus yielding freely to the amorous eyes
What to the amorous arms their fear denies.
Some well assume Diana's virgin shame, 890
When on her naked sports the hunter came;
Unwelcome—plunging in the crystal tide,
In vain they strive their beauteous limbs to hide;
The lucid waves, 't was all they could, bestow
A milder lustre and a softer glow.
As lost in earnest care of future need,
Some to the banks to snatch their mantles speed,
Of present view regardless; every wile
Was set, and every set of amorous guile.
What'er the terror of the feign'd alarm, 900
Display'd, in various force, was every charm.

Nor idle stood the gallant youth; the wing
Of rapture lifts them, to the fair they spring;
Some to the copse pursue their lovely prey;
Some, cloth'd and shod, impatient of delay,
Impatient of the stings of fierce desire,
Plunge headlong in the tide to quench the fire.
So when the Fowler to his cheek uprears
The hollow steel, and on the mallard bears,
His eager dog, ere bursts the flashing roar, 910
Fierce for the prey springs headlong from the shore,
And barking cuts the wave with furious joy:
So mid the billow springs each eager boy,
Springs to the nymph, whose eyes, from all the

A son of Mars was there, of generous race,
His every elegance of manly grace;
Amorous and brave, the bloom of April youth
Glow'd on his cheek, his eye spoke simplest truth;
Yet love, capricious to th' accomplish'd boy, 920
Had ever turn'd to gall each promis'd joy,
Had ever spurn'd his vows; yet still his heart
Would hope, and nourish still the tender smart:
The purest delicacy fann'd his fires,
And proudest honour nur'd his fond desires,
Not on the first that fair before him glow'd,
Not on the first the youth his love bestow'd,
In all her charms the fair Ephyre came,
And Leonardo's heart was all on flame.

Affection's melting transport o'er him stole, 930
And love's all generous glow entranced his soul;
Of selfish joy unconscious, every thought
On sweet delirium's ocean stream'd about.
Pattern of beauty did Ephyre shine,
Nor less she wish'd these beauties to resign:
More than her sisters long'd her heart to yield,
Yet swifter fled she o'er the smiling field.
The youth now panting with the hopeless chase,
"O turn," he cries, "O turn thy angel face,
False to themselves, can charms like these conceal
The hateful rigour of relentless steel; 940
And did the stream deceive me when I stood
Amid my peers reflected in the flood?
The easiest port and fairest bloom I bore—
False was the stream—while I in vain deplore,
My peers are happy; lo, in every shade,
In every bower, their love with love repaid!
I, I alone through brakes, through thorns pursue
A cruel fair—Ah, still my fate proves true,
True to its rigour—who, fair nymph, to thee 950
Reveal'd, 't was I that sued I unhappy me!
Born to be spurn'd though honesty inspire—
Alas, I faint, my languid sinews tire;
O stay thee—powerless to sustain their weight,
My knees sink down, I sink beneath my fate!"
He spoke: a rustling urges through the trees;
Instant new vigour strings his active knees;
Wildly he glares around, and raging cries,
"And must another snatch my lovely prize?
In savage grasp thy beauteous limbs constrain! 960
I feel, I madden while I feel the pain!
O lost, thou fiest the safety of my arms,
My hand shall guard thee, softly seize thy charms;
No brutal rage inflames me, yet I burn!
Die shall thy ravisher—O goddess, turn,
And smiling fore the error of my fear;
No brutal force, no ravisher is near;
A harmless roebuck gave the rustling sounds;
Lo, from the thicket swift as thee he bounds!
Ah, vain the hope to tire thee in the chase, 970
I faint, yet hear, yet turn thy lovely face.

Vain are thy fears; were e'en thy will to yield
 The harvest of my hope, that harvest field [rear
 My fate would guard, and walls of brass would Between my rickles and the golden ear.
 Yet fly me not; so may thy youthful prime Ne'er fly thy cheek on the gray wing of time.
 Yet hear, the last my parting breath can say,—
 Nor proudest kings nor mightiest hosts can sway
 Fate's dread decrees; yet thou, O nymph divine,
 Yet thou canst more, yet thou canst conquer mine.
 Unmoved each other yielding nymph I see; 982
 Joy to their lovers, for they touch not thee!
 But thee—Oh, every transport of desire,
 That melts to mingle with its kindred fire,
 For thee respire—alone I feel for thee
 The dear wild rage of longing ecstasy:
 By all the flames of sympathy divine
 To thee united, thou by right art mine.
 From thee, from thee the hallowed transport flows,
 That severed rages, and for union glows; 991
 Heaven owns the claim—Hah, did the lightning glare?

Yes, I beheld my rival, though the air
 Grew dim; e'en now I heard him softly tread;
 O rage! he waits thee on the flowery bed!
 I see, I see thee rushing to his arms,
 And sinking on his bosom all thy charms
 To him resigning in an eager kiss,
 All I implored, the whelming tide of bliss!
 And shall I see him riot on thy charms, 1000
 Dissolved in joy exulting in thine arms—
 O burst, ye lightnings, round my destin'd head,
 O pour your flashes—” Madd'ning as he said,
 Amid the windings of the bowery wood
 His trembling footsteps still the nymph pursued.
 Wooed to the flight she wing'd her speed to hear
 His amorous accents melting on her ear.
 And now she turns the wild walk's serpent maze;
 A roseate bower its velvet couch displays;
 The thickest moss its softest verdure spread, 1010
 Crocus and mingling pansy fring'd the bed,
 The woodbine dropt its honey from above,
 And various roses crown'd the sweet alcove.

* At the end of his Homer, Mr. Pope has given an index of the instances of imitative and sentimental harmony contained in his translations. He has also often in his notes pointed out the adaption of sound to sense. The translator of the Lusiad hopes he may for once say, that he has not been inattentive to this great essential of good versification;—how he has succeeded the judicious only must determine. The speech of Leonard to the careless reader may perhaps sometimes appear careless, and sometimes turgid and stiff. That speech, however, is an attempt at the imitative and sentimental harmony, and with the judicious he rests its fate. As the translation in this instance exceeds the original in length, the objection of a foreign critic requires attention. An old purry abbé (and critics are apt to judge by themselves) may indeed be surprised that a man out of breath with running should be able to talk so long. But had he consulted the experience of others, he would have found it was no wonderful matter for a stout and young cavalier to talk twice as much, though fatigued with the chase of a couple of miles, provided the supposition is allowed, that he treads on the last steps of his flying mistress.

Here as she hastens, on the hopeless boy
 She turns her face, all bathed in smiles of joy;
 Then, sinking down, her eyes, sufficed with love,
 Glowing on his, one moment lost reprove.
 Here was no rival, all he wish'd his own;
 Lock'd in her arms soft sinks the stripling down—
 Ah, what soft murmurs panting through the bowers
 Sigh'd to the raptures of the paramours! 1091
 The wishful sigh and melting smile conspire,
 Devouring kisses fan the fiercer fire;
 Sweet violence with dearest grace assails,
 Soft o'er the purpos'd frown the smile prevails;
 The purpos'd frown betrays its own deceit,
 In well-pleas'd laughter ends the rising threat;
 The coy delay glides off in yielding love,
 And transport murmurs through the sacred grove.
 The joy of pleasing adds its sacred zest, 1099
 And all is love, embracing and embraced.

The golden morn beheld the scenes of joy;
 Nor, sultry noon, mayst thou the bowers annoy;
 The sultry noon-beam shines the lover's aid,
 And sends him glowing to the secret shade.
 O'er every shade and every nuptial bower
 The love-sick strain the virgin turtles pour;
 For equal faith and holy rites combined,
 The Luvian benches and the nymphs conjoin'd.
 With flowery wreaths, and laurel chaplets, bound
 With ductile gold, the nymphs the heroes crown'd:
 By every spousal holy ritual tied, 1049
 No chance they vow shall e'er their hands divide,
 In life, in death, attendant as their fame;
 Such was the oath of ocean's sovereign dame:
 The dame (from Heaven and holy Vesta sprung,
 For ever beautiful and for ever young,
 Ecstasied views the chief whose deathless name
 The wondering world and conquer'd seas proclaim.

With stately pomp she holds the hero's hand, 1058
 And gives her empire to his dread command,
 By spousal ties confirm'd; nor past untold
 What Fate's unalter'd page had will'd of old:
 The world's vast globe in radiant sphere she show'd,
 The shores immense, and seas unknown, unplow'd;
 The seas, the shores, due to the Luvian keel
 And Luvian sword, she hastens to reveal.
 The glorious leader by the hand she takes,
 And, dim, below, the flowery bowers forsakes.
 High on a mountain's starry top divine 1060
 Her palace walls of living crystal shine;
 Of gold and crystal blaze the lofty towers:
 Here bathed in joy they pass the blissful hours:
 In gulph'd in tides on tides of joy, the day
 On dowry pinions glides unknown away.
 While thus the sovereigns in the palace reign,
 Like transport riots o'er the humbler plain,
 Where each in generous triumph o'er his peers
 His lovely bride to every bride prefers.

“Hence, ye profane!”—the song melodious rose, 1070
 By mildest zephyrs wafted through the boughs,

* We have already observed, that in every other poet the love scenes are generally described as those of guilt and remorse. The contrary character of those of Camoëns, not only gives them a delicacy unknown to other moderns; but by the fiction of the spousal rites, the allegory and machinery of the poem are most happily conducted.—See the Introduction.

Unseen the warblers of the holy strain—
 " Far from these sacred bowers, ye lewd profane!
 Hence each unhallowed eye, each vulgar ear;
 Chaste and divine are all the raptures here.
 The nymphs of ocean, and the ocean's queen,
 The isle angelic, every raptur'd scene,
 The charms of honour and its meed confess,
 These are the raptures, these the wedded bliss;
 The glorious triumph and the laurel crown, 1080
 The ever-blossom'd palms of fair renown,
 By time unwither'd and untaught to cloy;
 These are the transports of the isle of Joy.
 Such was Olympus and the bright abodes;
 Renown was Heaven, and heroes were the gods.
 Thus ancient times, to virtue ever just,
 To arts and valour rear'd the worshipp'd bust.
 High, steep and rugged, painful to be trod,
 With toils on toils immense is virtue's road;
 But smooth at last the walks umbrageous smile,
 Smooth as our lawns, and cheerful as our isle. 1091
 Up the rough road Alcides, Hermes, strove,
 All men like you, Apollo, Mars, and Jove:
 Like you to bless mankind Minerva toil'd;
 Diana bound the tyrants of the wild;
 O'er the waste desert Bacchus spread the vine;
 And Ceres taught the harvest field to shine.
 Fame rear'd her trumpet; to the blest abodes
 She rais'd, and hail'd them gods and sprung of gods.

" The love of fame, by Heaven's own hand im-
 press'd, 1100

The first and noblest passion of the breast,
 May yet mislead—O guard, ye hero train,
 No harlot robes of honours false and vain,
 No tinsel yours, be yours all native gold,
 Well-earn'd each honour, each respect you hold:
 To your lov'd king return a guardian band,
 Return the guardians of your native land;
 To tyrant power be dreadful; for the jaws
 Of fierce oppression guard the peasant's cause.
 If youthful fury pant for shining arms, 1110
 Spread o'er the eastern world the dread alarms;
 There bends the Saracen the hostile bow,
 The Saracen thy faith, thy nation's foe;
 There from his cruel gripe tear empire's reins,
 And break his tyrant sceptre o'er his chains.
 On adamantine pillars thus shall stand
 The throne, the glory of your native land,
 And Lusian heroes, an immortal line,
 Shall ever with us share our isle divine."

DISSERTATION

ON THE FICTION OF THE ISLAND OF VENUS.

FROM the earliest ages, and in the most distant nations, palaces, forests and gardens, have been the favourite themes of poets. And though, as in Homer's island of Rhodamanthus, the description is sometimes only cursory; at other times they have lavished all their powers, and have vied with each other in adorning their edifices and landscapes. The gardens of Alcinoüs in the Odyssey, and the Elysium in the Æneid, have excited the ambition of many imitators. Many instances of these occur in the later writers. These subjects, however, it must be owned, are so natural to the genius of poetry, that it is scarcely fair to attribute to an imitation of the classics, the innumerable descriptions of this kind, which abound in the old romances. In these, under different allegorical names, every passion, every virtue and vice, had its palace, its enchanted bower, or its dreary cave. The fictions of the Arabs were adopted by the Troubadours and first Gothic romancers. Among the Italians, on the revival of letters, Pulci, Boyardo, and others, borrowed from the Troubadours; Ariosto borrowed from Pulci and his followers; and Spenser has copied Ariosto and Tasso. In the sixth and seventh books of the Orlando Furioso, there is a fine description of the island and palace of Alcina or Vico; and in the tenth book, but inferior to the other in poetical colouring, we have a view of the country of Logistilla or Virtue. The passage of this kind, however, where Ariosto has displayed the richest poetical painting, is in the xxxivth book, in the description of Paradise, whither he sends Astolpho, the English duke, to ask the aid of St. John to recover the wits of Orlando. The whole is most admirably fanciful. Astolpho mounts the clouds on the winged horse, sees Paradise, and, accompanied by the evangelist, visits the Moon; the description of which orb is almost literally translated in Milton's Limbo. But the passage which may be said to bear the nearest resemblance to the descriptive part of the island of Venus, is the landscape of Paradise, of which the ingenious Mr. Hoole, to whose many acts of friendship I am proud to acknowledge myself indebted, has obliged me with his translation, though only ten books of his Ariosto are yet published.

O'er the glad earth the blissful season pours
 The vernal beauties of a thousand flowers
 In varied tints: there show'd the ruby's hue,
 The yellow topaz, and the sapphire blue,
 The mead appears one intermingled blaze, [rays,
 Where pearls and diamonds dart their trembling
 Not emerald here so bright a verdure yields
 As the fair turf of those celestial fields.
 On every tree the leaves unfading grow,
 The fruitage ripeens, and the flowrets blow.
 The frolic birds, gay-plum'd, of various wing,
 Amid the boughs their notes melodious sing:
 Still lakes and murmuring streams, with waters
 Charm the fixt eye, and lull the listening ear. [clear,
 A softening genial air, that ever seems
 In even tenour, cools the solar beams
 With fanning breeze; while from th' enamell'd field,
 Whate'er the fruits, the plants, the blossoms yield
 Of grateful scent, the stealing gales disperse
 The blended sweets to feed th' immortal sense.

Amid the plain a palace dazzling bright,
 Like living flame, emits a streamy light,
 And wrapt in splendour of refulgent day
 Outshines the strength of every mortal ray.
 Astolpho gently now directs his speed
 To where the spacious pile enfolds the mead
 In circuit wide, and views with eager eyes
 Each nameless charm that happy soil supplies.
 With this compar'd he deems the world below
 A dreary desert and a seat of woe,
 By Heaven and Nature, in their wrath bestow'd,
 In evil hour for man's unblest abode.
 Near and more near the stately walls he drew,
 In steadfast gaze, transported at the view:

They seem'd one gem entire, of purer red
Than deepening gleams transparent rubies shed.
Stupendous work! by art Medallian rais'd,
Transcending all, by feeble mortals prais'd!
No more henceforth let boasting tongues proclaim
Those wonders of the world, so chronicled by fame!

Camoëns read and admired Ariosto; but it by no means follows that he borrowed the hint of his island of Venus from that poet. The luxury of flowery description is as common in poetry as are the tales of love. The heroes of Ariosto meet beautiful women in the palace of Alcina:

Before the threshold wanton damsels wait,
Or sport between the pillars of the gate:
But beauty more had brighten'd in their face
Had modesty temper'd every grace;
In vestures green each damsel swept the ground,
Their temples fair with leafy garlands crown'd.
These, with a courteous welcome, led the knight
To this sweet Paradise of soft delight . . .
R enamour'd youths and tender damsels seem
To chant their loves beside a purling stream.
Some by a branching tree or mountain's shade
In sports and dances press the downy glade,
While one discloses to his friend, apart,
The secret transports of his amorous heart. B. vi.
But these descriptions also, which bring the heroes of knight-errantry into the way of beautiful wantons, are as common in the old romances as the use of the alphabet; and indeed the greatest part of these love adventures are evidently borrowed from the fable of Circe. Astolpho, who was transformed into a myrtle by Alcina, thus informs Rogero:

Her former lovers she esteem'd no more,
For many lovers she possess'd before;
I was her joy—
Too late, alas, I found her wavering mind
In love inconstant as the changing wind!
Scarce had I held two months the fairy's grace,
When a new youth was taken to my place:
Rejected then I join'd the banish'd herd
That lost her love, as others were preferr'd . . .
Some here, some there, her potent charms retain,
In divers forms imprison'd to remain;
In beeches, olives, palms, and cedars clos'd,
Or such as me you here behold expos'd;
In fountains some, and some in beasts confin'd,
As suits the wayward fairy's cruel mind.

Hoole, Ar. b. vi.

When incidents, character and conduct confess the resemblance, we may with certainty pronounce from whence the copy is taken. Where only a similar stroke of passion or description occurs, it belongs alone to the arrogance of dulness, to tell us on what passage the poet had his eye. Every great poet has been persecuted in this manner; Milton in particular. His commentators have not left him a flower of his own growth. Yet, like the creed of the atheist, their system is involved in the deepest absurdity. It is easy to suppose, that men of poetical feelings, in describing the same thing, should give us the same picture. But that the Paradise Lost, which forms one animated whole of the noblest poetry, is a mere cento, compiled from innumerable authors, ancient and modern, is a supposition which gives Milton a cast of talents infinitely more extraordinary and inexplicable than the greatest poetical genius. When Gaspar Poussin painted clouds and trees in his landscapes, he did not borrow the green and the blue, of the leaf and the sky, from Claud Lorrain. Neither did Camoëns, when he painted his island of Venus, spend the half of his life in collecting his colours from all his predecessors, who had described the beauties of the vernal year or the stages of passion. Camoëns knew how others had painted the flowery bowers of love; these formed his taste and corrected his judgment. He viewed the beauties of Nature with poetical eyes, from thence he drew his landscapes; he had felt all the allurements of love, and from thence he describes the agitations of that passion.

Nor in the description of fairy bowers and palaces, though most favourite topics, peculiar to the romances of chivalry. The poetry of the Orientals also abounds with them, yet with some characteristic differences. Like the constitutions and dress of the Asiatics, the landscapes of the eastern Muse are warm and feeble, brilliant and slight, and, like the manners of the people, wear an eternal sameness. The western Muse, on the contrary, is nervous as her heroes, sometimes flowery as her Italian or English fields, sometimes majestically great as her rustic forests of oak and pine; and always various as the character of her inhabitants. Yet with all these differences of feature, several oriental fictions greatly resemble the island of Circe and the flowery dominions of Alcina. In particular, the adventures of prince Agib, or the third Calender, in the Arabian Tales, afford a striking likeness of painting and catastrophe.

If Ariosto, however, seem to resemble any eastern fiction, the island of Venus in Camoëns bears a more striking resemblance to a passage in Chaucer. The following beautiful piece of poetical painting occurs in the Assembly of the Fowles:

The bildir oak, and eke the hardie ashe,
The pillir elme, the coffir unto carmine,
The boxe pipetre, the holme to whippis lashe,
The sailing birre, the cypress deth to plaire,
The shorthir ewe, the aspe for shaftis plaine,
The olive of poce, and eke the drowin viue,
The victor palme, the laurir to divine.

A garden sawe I full of blossomed bowis,
Upon a river, in a grene mede
There as sweetness evirmore enough is
With flouris white, and blewes, yelows, and rede,
And colds and clere wellestremis, nothing dour,
That swommin full of smale fishes light,
With dunnis rede, and scalis silver bright.

On every bough the birdis herd I syng
With voise of angell, in their harmonie
That busied 'hem, ther birdis forthe to bryng,
And little pretie conies to ther plaine gam hit;
And furthir all about I gan espie
The drefful roe, the buck, the hart and bind,
Squirils, and bestis smal of gentle kind.

Of instrumentes of stringis, in acorde
Herd I so plaine a ravishyng sweetness,
That God, that makir is of all the lordes,
Ne herd never a better, as I gesse,
There with a winde, unmeth it might be lesse,
Made in the levis grene a noisè soft
Accordant to the soulis song on left.

The aire of the place so attempre was,
That ner was there grevaunce of hot ne cold—

* * * * *

Under a tree beside a well I see
 Cupid our lord's arrows forge and file,
 And at his feet his bow all red lie,
 And well his daughter temper'd all the while
 The heeds in the well, and with her wife
 She couch'd them as if they should serve,
 Some for to file, and some to wound and carve.
 * * * * *

And upon pillars grete of iaspir long
 I saw a temple of brasse ifoundid strong.

And about the temple daucid alwaie
 Women inow, of which some there ywere
 Faire of herself, and some of them were gale,
 In kirtils all deshevel'd went thei there,
 That was ther officer from yere to yere,
 And on the temple sawe I white and fuire
 Of doves sitting many a thousand paire.

Here we have Cupid forging his arrows, the woodland, the streams, the music of instruments and birds, the frolics of deer and other animals; and women inow. In a word, the island of Venus is here sketched out, yet Chaucer was never translated into Latin or any language of the Continent, nor did Camoëns understand a line of English. The subject was common, and the same poetical feelings in Chaucer and Camoëns pointed out to each what were the beauties of landscapes and of bowers devoted to pleasure.

Yet, though the fiction of bowers, of islands, and palaces, was no novelty in poetry, much however remains to be attributed to the poetical powers and invention of Camoëns. The island of Venus contains, of all others, by much the completest gradation, and fullest assemblage of that species of luxuriant painting. Nothing in the older writers is equal to it in fullness. Nor can the island of Armida in Tasso be compared to it, in poetical embroidery or passionate expression; though Tasso has undoubtedly built upon the model of Camoëns, as Spenser appropriated the imagery of Tasso, when he described the bower of Acrasia, part of which he has literally translated from the Italian poet. The beautiful fictions of Armida and Acrasia, however, are much too long to be here inserted, and they are well known to every reader of taste.

But the chief praise of our poet is yet unmentioned. The introduction of so beautiful a fiction, as an essential part of the conduct and machinery of an epic poem, does the greatest honour to the invention of Camoëns. The machinery of the former part of the poem not only acquires dignity, but is completed by it. And the conduct of Homer and Virgil has in this not only received a fine imitation, but a masterly contrast. In the finest allegory the heroes of the Lusiad receive their reward; and by means of this allegory our poet gives a noble imitation of the noblest part of the Æneid. In the tenth Lusiad, Gama and his heroes hear the nymphs in the divine palace of Thetis sing the triumphs of their countrymen in the conquest of India: after this the goddess gives Gama a view of the eastern world, from the Cape of Good Hope to the furthest islands of Japan. She poetically describes every region and the principal islands, and concludes, "All these are given to the western world by you." It is impossible any poem can be summed up with greater sublimity. The fall of Troy is nothing to this. Nor is this all: the prophecy of Anchises, which forms the most masterly fiction, finest compliment, and ultimate purpose of the Æneid, is not only nobly imitated; but the conduct of Homer, in concluding the Iliad, as already observed, is paralleled, without one circumstance being borrowed. Poetical conduct cannot possibly bear a stronger resemblance, than the reward of the heroes of the Lusiad, the prophetic song, and the vision shown to Gama, bear to the games at the funeral of Patroclus and the redemption of the body of Hector, considered as the completion of the anger of Achilles, the subject of the Iliad. Nor is it a greater honour to resemble a Homer and a Virgil, than it is to be resembled by a Milton. Though Milton perhaps never saw the Lusiad in the original tongue, he certainly heard of Faushaw's translation, which was published fourteen years before he gave his Paradise Lost to the world. But whatever he knew of it, had the last book of the Lusiad been two thousand years known to the learned, every one would have owned that the two last books of the Paradise Lost were evidently formed upon it. But whether Milton borrowed any hint from Camoëns, is of little consequence. That the genius of the great Milton suggested the conclusion of his immortal poem in the manner and machinery of the Lusiad, is enough. It is enough that the part of Michael and Adam in the two last books of the Paradise Lost, is in point of conduct exactly the same with the part of Thetis and Gama in the conclusion of the Lusiad. Yet this difference must be observed; in the narrative of his last book, Milton has flagged, as Addison calls it, and fallen infinitely short of the untired spirit of the Portuguese poet.

LUSIAD X.

Far o'er the western ocean's distant bed*
 Apollo now his fiery coursers sped,
 Far o'er the silver lake of Mexic roll'd¹
 His rapid chariot wheels of burning gold:

¹ The city of Mexico is environed with an extensive lake; or, according to Cortez, in his second narration to Charles V., with two lakes, one of fresh, the other of salt water, in circuit about fifty leagues. This situation, said the Mexicans, was appointed by their god Vitziliputzli, who, according to the explanation of their picture-histories, led their forefathers a journey of fourscore years, in search of the promised land; the apish devil, say some Spanish writers, in this imitating the journeys of the Israelites. Four of the principal priests carried the idol in a coffer of reeds. Whenever they halted they built a tabernacle for their god in the midst of their camp, where they placed the coffer and the altar. They then sowed the land, and their stay or departure, without regard to the harvest, was directed by the orders received from their idol, till at last by his command they fixed their abode on the site of Mexico. The origin of the Mexicans is represented by men coming out of caves, and their different journeys and encampments are portrayed in their picture-histories; one of which was sent to Charles V., and is said to

The eastern sky was left to dusky gray,
 And o'er the last hot breath of parting day,
 Cool o'er the sultry noon's remaining flame,
 On gentle gales the grateful twilight came.
 Dimpling the lucid pools, the fragrant breeze
 Sighs o'er the lawns and whispers through the trees;
 Refresh'd the lily rears the silver head, 11
 And opening jasmies o'er the arbours spread.
 Fair o'er the wave, that gleam'd like distant snow,
 Graceful arose the Moon, serenely slow;
 Not yet full-orb'd, in clouded splendour drest,
 Her married arms embrace her pregnant breast.
 Sweet to his mate, recumbent o'er his young,
 The nightingale his spousal anthem sung;
 From every bower the holy chorus rose,
 From every bower the rival anthem flows. 20
 Translucent twinkling through the upland grove,
 In all her lustre shines the star of love;
 Led by the sacred ray from every bower,
 A joyful train, the wedded lovers pour:
 Each with the youth above the rest approved,
 Each with the nymph above the rest beloved,
 They seek the palace of the sovereign dame;
 High on a mountain glow'd the wondrous frame:
 Of gold the towers, of gold the pillars shone,
 The walls were crystal, starr'd with precious stone.
 Amid the ball arose the festive board, 31
 With Nature's choicest gifts promiscuous stor'd:
 So will'd the goddess to renew the smile
 Of vital strength, long worn by days of toil.
 On crystal chairs that shined as lambent flame
 Each gallant youth attends his lovely dame;
 Beneath a purple canopy of state
 The beauteous goddess and the leader sat:
 The banquet glows—Not such the feast when all
 The pride of luxury in Egypt's hall 40
 Before the love-sick Roman⁴ spread the boast
 Of every teeming sea and fertile coast.
 Sacred to noblest worth and virtue's ear,
 Divine as genial was the banquet here;
 The wife, the song, by sweet returns inspire,
 Now waks the lover's, now the hero's fire.
 On gold and silver from th' Atlantic main,
 The sumptuous tribute of the sea's wide reign,
 Of various savour was the banquet piled;
 Amid the fruitage mingling roses suited, 50
 In cups of gold, that shed a yellow light,
 In silver, shining as the Moon of night,
 Amid the banquet flow'd the sparkling wine,
 Nor gave Palernia's fields the parent vine:
 Palernia's vintage, nor the fabled power
 Of Jove's ambrosia in th' Olympian bower
 To this compare not; wild nor frantic fires,
 Divinest transport this alone inspires.
 The beverage, foaming o'er the goblet's breast,
 The crystal fountain's cooling aid confest; 60

be still extant in the Escurial. According to the reigns of their kings, their first emigration was about A. D. 720. Vide Boterus, Gomara, Acosta, and other Spanish writers.

⁵ It was a custom of the ancients in warm climates to mix the coldest spring water with their wine, immediately before drinking; not, we may suppose, to render it less intoxicating, but on account of the heightened flavour it thereby received. Homer tells us, that the wine which Ulysses gave to Polypheme would bear twenty

The while, as circling flow'd the cheerful bowl,
 Sapient discourse, the banquet of the soul,
 Of richest argument and brightest glow,
 Array'd in dimpling smiles, in easiest flow,
 Pour'd all its graces: nor in silence stood
 The powers of music, such as erst subdued
 The horrid frown of Hell's profound domains⁶,
 And sooth'd the tortur'd ghosts to slumber on their
 To music's sweetest chords in loftiest vein [chains. 70
 An angel Syren joins the vocal strain;
 The silver roofs resound the living song,
 The harp and organ's lofty mood prolong
 The hallow'd warblings; listening silence rides
 The sky, and o'er the bridled winds presides;
 In softest murmurs flows the glassy deep,
 And, each lull'd in his shade, the bestial sleep.
 The lofty song ascends the thrilling skies,
 The song of godlike heroes yet to rise;
 Jove gave the dream, whose glow the Syren fired,
 And present Jove the prophecy inspired. 80
 Not he, the bard of love-sick Dido's board,
 Nor be the minstrel of Phœacia's lord, [string,
 Though fam'd in song, could touch the warbling
 Or with a voice so sweet, melodious sing.
 And thou, my Muse, O fairest of the train,
 Calliope, inspire my closing strain.
 No more the summer of my life remains⁷,
 My autumn's lengthening evenings chill my veins;
 Down the bleak stream of years by woes on woes
 Wing'd on, I hasten to the tomb's repose, 90
 The port whose deep dark bottom shall detain
 My anchor, never to be weigh'd again, measures of water. Modern luxury, by placing the bottle in preserved ice, has found a method to give the wine the most agreeable coolness, without reducing its quality.

⁶ Alluding to the fable of Orpheus. Fanshaw's translation, as already observed, was published fourteen years before the Paradise Lost. These lines of Milton,

What could it less, when spirits immortal sung?
 Their song was partial, but the harmony
 Suspended Hell, and took with ravishment
 The thronging audience—

bear a resemblance to these of Fanshaw,

Musical instruments not wanting, such
 As to the damned spirits once gave ease
 In the dark vaults of the infernal hall.—

"To slumber amid their punishment," though omitted by Fanshaw, is literal,

Fixerao descansar de eterna pena—

⁷ It is not certain when Camoëns wrote this. It seems however not long to precede the publication of his poem, at which time he was in his fifty-fifth year. This apostrophe to his Muse may perhaps by some be blam'd as another digression; but so little does it require defence, that one need not hesitate to affirm, that had Homer, who often talks to his Muse, introduced, on these favourable opportunities, any little picture or history of himself, these digressions would have been the most interesting parts of his works. Had any such little history of Homer complained like this of Camoëns, it would have been bedewed with the tears of ages.

Never on other sea of life to steer
 The human course—Yet thou, O goddess, bear,
 Yet let me live, though round my silver'd head
 Misfortune's bitterest rage unpitying shed
 Her coldest storms; yet let me live to crown
 The song that boasts my nation's proud renown.
 * Of godlike heroes sung the nymph divine,
 Heroes whose deeds on Gama's crest shall shine;
 Who through the seas by Gama first explor'd 101
 Shall bear the Lusian standard and the sword,
 Till every coast where roars the orient main,
 Blest in its sway, shall own the Lusian reign;
 Till every Pagan king his neck shall yield,
 Or vanquish'd gnaw the dust on battle field.
 "High priest of Malabar," the goddess sung,
 "Thy faith repent not, nor lament thy wrong";
 Though for thy faith to Lusus' generous race
 The raging zamoreem thy helda deface; 110
 From Tagus, lo, the great Pacheco sails
 To India, wafted on auspicious gales.
 Soon as his crooked prow the tide shall press,
 A new Achilles shall the tide confess;
 His ship's strong sides shall groan beneath his weight †,
 And deeper waves receive the sacred freight.

* P. Alvarez Cabral, the second Portuguese commander who sailed to India, entered into a treaty of alliance with Trimumpara king of Cochin and high-priest of Malabar. The zamorim raised powerful armies to dethrone him; but his fidelity to the Portuguese was unalterable, though his affairs were brought to the lowest ebb. For an account of this war, and the almost incredible achievements of Pacheco, see the history in the Preface.

† Thus Virgil:

simul accipit alveo
 Ingentem Æneam. Gemuit sub pondere cymba
 Sutilis, et multam accepit rimosa paludem.

That the visionary boat of Charon groaned under the weight of Æneas is a fine poetical stroke; but that the crazy rents let in the water is certainly lowering the image. The thought, however, as managed in Camoëns, is much grander than in Virgil, and affords a happy instance, where the hyperbole is truly poetical.

Poetical allusions to, or abridgments of, historical events are either extremely insipid and obscure, or particularly pleasing to the reader. To be pleasing, a previous acquaintance with the history is necessary, and for this reason the poems of Homer and Virgil were peculiarly relished by their countrymen. When a known circumstance is placed in an animated poetical view, and clothed with the graces of poetical language, a sensible mind must feel the effect. But when the circumstance is unknown, nothing but the most lively imagery and finest colouring can prevent it from being tiresome. The Lusiad affords many instances which must be highly pleasing to the Portuguese, but dry to those who are unacquainted with their history. Nor need one hesitate to assert, that were we not acquainted with the Roman history from our childhood, a great part of the Æneid would appear to us intolerably uninteresting. Sensible of this disadvantage, which every version of historical poetry must suffer, the translator has not only

Soon as on India's strand he shakes his spear,
 The burning east shall tremble, chill'd with fear:
 Reeking with noble blood, Cambalao's stream
 Shall blaze impurpled to the evening beam. 120
 Urged on by raging shame, the monarch brings,
 Banded with all their powers, his vassal kings:
 Narsinga's rocks their cruel thousands pour,
 Bipur's stern king attends, and thine, Tanore:
 To guard proud Calicut's imperial pride,
 All the wide north swoops down its peopled tide:
 Join'd are the sects that never touch'd before †,
 By land the Pagan, and by sea the Moor.
 O'er land, o'er sea the great Pacheco strews
 The prostrate spearmen, and the founder'd pros ‡.
 Submiss and silent, palsied with amaze, 131
 Proud Malabar th' unnumber'd slain surveys:
 Yet burns the monarch; to his shrine he speeds;
 Dire howl the priests, the groaning victim bleeds;
 The ground they stomp, and from the dark abodes
 With tears and vows they call th' infernal gods.
 Enraged with dog-like madness to behold
 His temples and his towns in flames enroll'd,
 Secure of promised victory, again
 He fires the war, the laws are heapt with slain. 140
 With stern reproach he brands his routed Nayres,
 And for the dreadful field himself prepares;
 His harness'd thousands to the fight he leads,
 And rides exulting where the combat bleeds:
 Amid his pomp his robes are sprinkled o'er,
 And his proud face dash'd with his menials' gore †:
 From his high couch he leaps, and speeds to fight
 On foot inglorious, in his army's sight.
 Hell then he calls, and all the powers of Hell,
 The secret poison, and the charnted spell; 150
 Vain as the spell the poison'd rage is shed,
 For Heaven defends the hero's sacred head.
 Still fiercer from each wound the tyrant burns,
 Still to the field with heavier force returns.
 The seventh dread war he kindles: high in air
 The hills dishonour'd lift their shoulders bare;
 Their woods roll'd down now strew the river's side,
 Now rise in mountain turrets o'er the tide;
 Mountains of fire and spires of bickering flame,
 While either bank rounds the proud acclaim, 160

in the notes added every incident which might elucidate the subject, but has also, all along, in the episode in the third and fourth books, in the description of the painted ensigns in the eighth, and in the allusions in the present book, endeavoured to throw every historical incident into that universal language, the picturesque of poetry. The circumstances improper for imagery are hastened over, and those which can best receive it presented to the view. When Hector sturms the Grecian camp, when Achilles marches to battle, every reader understands and is affected with the bold painting. But when Nestor talks of his exploits at the funeral games of Amarynceus, (Iliad xxiii.) the critics themselves cannot comprehend him, and have vied with each other in inventing explanations.

† To touch, or be touched by, one of an inferior cast, is esteem'd among the Gentoes as the greatest pollution.

‡ Proas, or paraoas, Indian vessels which lie low on the water, are worked with oars, and carry 40 men and upwards apace.

§ See the history in the Preface.

Come floating down, round Lusus's feet to pour
Their sulph'rous entrails in a burning shower.
Oh, rain the bope—Let Rome her boast resign;
Her palms, Pacheco, never bloom'd like thine;
Nor Tyber's bridge, nor Marathon's red field¹¹,
Nor thine, Thermopylae, such deeds hebel'd;
Nor Fabius' arts such rushing storms repell'd.
Swift as, repulsed, the famish'd wolf returns
Fierce to the fold, and, wounded, fiercer burns;
So swift, so fierce, seven times all India's might 170
Returns unnumber'd to the dreadful fight;
One hundred spears, seven times in dreadful stower,
Strews in the dust all India's raging power."

The lofty song, for paleness o'er her spread,
The nymph suspends, and bows the languid head;
Her faltering words are breath'd on plaintive sighs,
"Ah, Belisarius, injured chief," she cries,
"Ah, wipe thy tears; in war thy rival see,
Injured Pacheco falls despoil'd like thee;
In him, in thee dishonour'd virtue bleeds, 180
And valour weeps to view her fairest deeds,
Weeps o'er Pacheco, where forlorn he lies
Low on an altar-house bed¹², and friendless dies.
Yet shall the Muses plume his humble bier,
And ever o'er him pour th' immortal tear;
Though by the king, alone to thee unjust,
Thy head, great chief, was humbled in the dust,
Loud shall the Muse indignant sound thy praise,
Thou gav'st thy monarch's throne its proudest blaze.

Whileround the world the Sun's bright car shall ride, 190

So bright shall shine thy name's illustrious pride;
Thy monarch's glory, as the Moon's pale beam,
Eclipsed by thine, shall shed a sickly gleam.
Such meed attends when soothing flattery sways,
And blinded state its sacred trust betrays!"

Again the nymph exalts her brow, again
Her swelling voice resounds the lofty strain:
"Almeida comes, the kingly name he bears,
Deputed royalty his standard rears;
In all the generous rage of youthful fire, 200
The warlike son attends the warlike sire.
Quitoe's blood-stain'd tyrant now shall feel
The righteous vengeance of the Lusian steel.
Another prince, by Lisbon's throne beloved,
Shall bless the land, for faithful deeds approved.
Mombaze shall now her treason's meed behold,
When curling flames her proudest domes unfold;
Involved in smoke, loud crashing, low shall fall
The wounded temple and the castled wall.
O'er India's seas the young Almeida pours, 210
Scorching the wither'd air, his iron showers;
Turn masts and rudders, hulks and canvas riven,
Month after month before his prow are driven.

¹¹ When Portenna besieged Rome, Horatius
Cocles defended the pass of a bridge till the Romans destroyed it behind him. Having thus saved the pass, heavy armed as he was, he swam across the river to his companions. The Roman history, however, at this period, is often mixt with fable. Miltiades obtained a great victory over Darius at Marathon. The stand of Leonidas is well known. The battles of Pacheco were in defence of the fords by which the city of Cochín could only be entered. The numbers he withstood by land and sea, and the victories he obtained, are indeed highly astonishing. See the Preface.

¹² See the history in the Preface.

But Heaven's dread will, where clouds of darkness
That awful will, which knows alone the best, [rest,
Now blunts his spear: Cambaya's squadrons join'd
With Egypt's fleets, in Pagan rage combined,
Engraap him round; red boils the staggering flood,
Purpled with voileying flames and hot with blood;
Whirl'd by the cannon's rage, in shivers torn 220
His thigh, far scatter'd o'er the wave, is borne.
Bound to the mast the godlike hero stands¹³,
Waves his proud sword, and cheers his woful bands.
Though winds and seas their wouted aid deny,
To yield he knows not, but he knows to die:
Another thunder tears his manly breast:
O fly, blest spirit, to thy heavenly rest—
Hark, rolling on the groaning storm I hear
Reistless vengeance thundering on the rear!
I see the transports of the furious sire, 230
As o'er the mangled corse his eyes flash fire.
Swift to the fight, with stern though weeping eyes,
Fixt rage fierce burning in his breast, he flies;
Fierce as the bull that sees his rival rove
Free with the heifers through the wounded grove,
On oak or beech his madd'ning fury pours;
So pours Almeida's rage on Dabul's towers.
His vanes wide waving o'er the Indian sky,
Before his prow the fleets of India fly¹⁴:
On Egypt's chief his mortars' dreadful tire 240
Shall vomit all the rage of prison'd fire: [tide,
Heads, limbs, and trunks shall choke the struggling
Till every surge with reeking crimson dyed,

¹³ The English history affords an instance of similar resolution in admiral Bembo, who was supported in a wooden frame, and continued the engagement after his legs and thighs were shivered in splinters. Contrary to the advice of his officers, the young Almeida refused to bear off, though almost certain to be overpowered, and though both wind and tide were critically against him. His father had sharply upbraid him for a former retreat, where victory was thought impossible. He now fell the victim of his father's ideas of military glory. See the Preface.

¹⁴ After having cleared the Indian seas, the viceroy Almeida attacked the combined fleets of Egypt, Cambaya, and the zamorim, in the entrance and harbour of Diu, or Dio. The fleet of the zamorim almost immediately fled. That of Melique Yaz, lord of Diu, suffered much; but the greatest slaughter fell upon the Egyptians and Turks, commanded by Mir-Hocem, who had defeated and killed the young Almeida. Of 8000
Mamulucks or Turks, who fought under Mir-
Hocem, only 22, says Osorius, survived this engagement. Melique Yaz, says Faria y Sousa, was born in slavery, and descended of the Christians of Roxia. The road to preferment is often a dirty one; but Melique's was much less so than that of many other favourites of fortune. As the king of Cambaya was one day riding in state, an unlucky kite dived upon his royal head. His majesty in great wrath swore he would give all he was worth to have the offender killed. Melique, who was an experienced archer, immediately dispatched an arrow, which brought the audacious hawk to the ground. For the merit of this eminent service he was made lord of Diu, or Dio, a considerable city, the strongest and most important fortress at that time in all India. See Faria, l. ii. c. 2.

Around the young Almeйда's hapless urn
His conqueror's naked ghosts shall howl and mourn.
As meteors flashing through the darken'd air,
I see the victors' whirling falchions glare;
Dark rolls the sulph'rous smoke o'er Dio's skies,
And shrieks of death and shouts of conquest rise,
In one wide tumult blended : the rough roar 250
Shakes the brown tents on Ganges' trembling shore;
The waves of Indus from the banks recoil;
And matrons, howling on the strand of Nile,
By the pale Moon their absent sons deplore—
Long shall they wail; their sons return no more.

" Ah, strikes the notes of woe," the Syren cries,
" A dreary vision swims before my eyes.
To Tago's shore triumphant as he bends,
Low in the dust the hero's glory ends :
Though bended bow, nor thundering engines hail,
Nor Egypt's sword, nor India's spear prevail, 161
Fall shall the chief before a naked foe ¹⁵, [the blow;
Rough clubs and rude hurl'd stones shall strike
The Cape of Tempests shall his tomb supply,
And in the desert sands his bones shall lie,
No boastful trophy o'er his ashes rear'd :
Such Heaven's dread will, and be that will rever'd!
" But lo, resplendent shines another star,"
Loud she resounds, " in all the blaze of war!
Great Cunis guards Melinda's friendly shore ¹⁶, 270
And dyes her seas with Oja's hostile gore;
Lamo and Brava's towers his vengeance tell :
Green Madagascar's flowery dales shall swell
His echoed fame, till ocean's southmost bound
On isles and shores unknown his name resound.

" Another blaze, behold, of fire and arms!
Great Albuquerque awakes the dread alarms :
O'er Ormuz' walls his thundering flames he pours,
While Heaven, the hero's guide, indignant showers ¹⁷

Their arrows backward on the Persian foe, 280
Tearing the breasts and arms that twang'd the bow.
Mountains of salt and fragrant gums in vain
Were spent untainted to embalm the slain.
Such heaps shall strew the seas and faithless strand
Of Gerum, Mazcate, and Calayat's land,
Till faithless Ormuz own the Lusian away,
And Baren's pearls her yearly safety pay.

" What glorious palms on Goa's isle I see ¹⁸,
Their blazons spread, great Albuquerque, for thee!
Through castled walls the hero breaks his way, 290
And opens with his sword the dread array

¹⁶ Tristan de Cunha, or d'Acugna. See the history in the Preface.

¹⁷ See note 15 of Lusiad II. Some writers relate, that when Albuquerque besieged Ormuz, a violent wind drove the arrows of the enemy backward upon their own ranks. Oonivius says, that many of the dead Persians and Moors were found to have died by arrows. But as that weapon was not used by the Portuguese, he conjectures, that in their despair of victory many of the enemy had thus killed themselves, rather than survive the defeat.

¹⁸ This important place was made an archbishoprick, the capital of the Portuguese empire in the east, and the seat of their viceroys. It is advantageously situated for these purposes on the coast of Decan. It still remains in the possession of the Portuguese.

Of Moors and Pagans; through their depth he rides,

Through spears and showering fire the battle guides.
As bulls enraged, or lions snear'd with gore,
His bands sweep wide o'er Goa's purpled shore.
Nor eastward far though fair Malacca lie ¹⁹,
Her groves embosom'd in the morning sky :
Though with her amorous sons the valiant line
Of Java's isle in battle rank combine,
Though poison'd shafts their ponderous quivers store; 300

Malacca's spicy groves and golden ore,
Great Albuquerque, thy dauntless toils shall crown !
Yet art thou stain'd ²⁰—Here with a sighful frown

¹⁹ The conquest of this place was one of the greatest actions of Albuquerque. It became the chief port of the eastern part of Portuguese India, and second only to Goa. Besides a great many pieces of ordnance which were carried away by the Moors who escaped, 3000 large cannon remained the prize of the victors.

²⁰ A detail of all the great actions of Albuquerque would have been tedious and unpoetical. Camoens has chosen the most brilliant, and has happily suppressed the rest by a display of indignation. The French translator has the following note on this passage : " Behold another instance of our author's prejudice ! The action which he condemns had nothing in it blameable : but as he was of a most amorous constitution, he thought every fault which could plead an amour in its excuse ought to be pardoned ; but true heroes, such as Albuquerque, follow other maxims. This great man had in his palace a beautiful Indian slave. He viewed her with the eyes of a father, and the care of her education was his pleasure. A Portuguese soldier named Ruy Diaz had the boldness to enter the general's apartment, where he succeeded so well with the girl, that he obtained his desire. When Albuquerque heard of it, he immediately ordered him to the gallows."

Camoens, however, was no such undistinguishing libertine as this would represent him. In a few pages we find him praising the continence of Don Henry de Menezes, whose victory over his passions he calls the highest excellence of youth. Nor does it appear by what authority the Frenchman assures us of the chaste paternal affection which Albuquerque bore to this Indian girl. It was the great aim of Albuquerque to establish colonies in India, and for that purpose he encouraged his soldiers to marry with the natives. The most sightly girls were selected, and educated in the religion and household arts of Portugal, and portioned at the expense of the general. These he called his daughters, and with great pleasure he used to attend their weddings, several couples being usually joined together at one time. At one of these nuptials, says Faria, the festivity having continued late, and the brides being mixed together, several of the bridegrooms committed a blunder. The mistakes of the night however, as they were all equal in point of honour, were mutually forgiven in the morning, and each man took his proper wife whom he had received at the altar: This delicate anecdote of Albuquerque's sons and daughters is as bad a commentary on the note of Costers, as it is on the severity which the com-

 The humble soldier's blood, his only crime
 The amorous frailty of the youthful prime!
 Incest's cold honour here no glow restrain'd,
 Nor sacred nuptial bed was here profaned,
 Nor here unwelcome force the virgin seized;

mander showed to poor Diaz. Nor does Camoëns stand alone in the condemnation of the general. The historian agrees with the poet. Mentioning the death of D. Antonio Noronha, "This gentleman," says Faria, "used to moderate the violent temper of his uncle Albuquerque, which soon after showed itself in rigid severity. He ordered a soldier to be hanged for an amour with one of the slaves whom he called daughters, and whom he used to give in marriage. When some of his officers asked him what authority he had to take the poor man's life, he drew his sword, told them that was his commission, and instantly broke them." To marry his soldiers with the natives was the plan of Albuquerque: his severity therefore seems unaccountable, unless we admit the perhaps of Camoëns, ou de cielos, "perhaps it was jealousy."—But whatever incensed the general, the execution of the soldier was contrary to the laws of every nation³²; and the honest indignation of Camoëns against one of the greatest of his countrymen, one who was the grand architect of the Portuguese empire in the east, affords a noble instance of that manly freedom of sentiment which knows no right by which king or peer may do injustice to the meanest subject. Nor can we omit the observation, that the above note of Casters is of a piece with the French devotion we have already seen him pay to the name of king; a devotion which breathes the true spirit of the blessed advice given by Father Paul to the republic of Venice: "When a nobleman commits an offence against a subject," says that Jesuit, "let every means be tried to justify him. But if a subject has offended a nobleman, let him be punished with the utmost severity."

³¹ Campaspe, the most beautiful concubine of Alexander, was given by that monarch to Apelles, whom he perceived in love with her. Araspas had strict charge of the fair captive Panthea. His attempt on her virtue was forgiven by Cyrus.

³² Oorinus represents the crime of Diaz as mutiny, having been against the strict orders of Albuquerque. Diaz, however, was guilty of no breach of military duty, which alone constitutes the crime of mutiny.

Nor Cyrus thus reproved Araspas' fire;
 Nor laughtier Carlo thus assumed the fire,
 Though iron Baldwin to his daughter's tower,
 An ill-match'd lover, stole in secret hour:
 With uobler rage the lofty monarch glow'd,
 And Flandria's earldom on the knight bestow'd³³.
 "Again the nymph the song of famous sounds; 330
 "Lo, sweeping wide o'er Ethiopia's bounds,
 Wide o'er Arabia's purple shore on high
 The Lusian ensigns blaze along the sky!
 Mecca aghast beholds the standards shine,
 And midnight horror shakes Medina's shrine³⁴,
 Th' unhallowed altar bodes the approaching foe,
 Fore-doom'd in dust its prophet's tomb to strow.
 Nor Ceylon's isle, brave Soeres, shall withhold
 Its incense, precious as the burish'd gold,
 What time o'er proud Columbo's loftiest spire 340
 Thy flag shall blaze: nor shall th' immortal lyre

³³ "Baldwin, surnamed Ironarm, grand forester of Flanders, being in love with Judith, the daughter of Charles the Bald, and widow of Ethelwolve, king of England, obtained his desire by force. Charles, though at first he highly resented, afterwards pardoned his crime, and consented to his marriage with the princess."—Casters.

This digression in the song of the nymph bears, in manner, a striking resemblance to the histories which the heroes of Homer often relate to each other. That these little episodes have their beauty and propriety in an epic poem, will strongly appear from a view of M. de la Motte's translation of the Iliad into French verse. The four-and twenty books of Homer he has contracted into twelve, and these contain no more lines than about four books of the original. A thousand embellishments which the warm poetical feelings of Homer suggested to him, are thus thrown out by the Frenchman. But what is the consequence of this improvement? The work of la Motte is unread, even by his own countrymen, and despised by every foreigner who has the least relish for poetry and Homer.

³⁴ Medina, the city where Mohammed is buried. About six years after Gane's discovery of India, the sultan of Egypt sent Maurus, the abbot of the monks at Jerusalem, who inhabit Mount Sion, on an embassy to pope Julius II. The sultan, with severe threats to the Christians of the east, in case of refusal, entreated the pope to desire Emmanuel king of Portugal to send no more fleets to the Indian seas. The pope sent Maurus to Emmanuel, who returned a very spirited answer to his holiness, assuring him that no threats, no dangers could make him alter his resolution, and lamenting that it had not yet been in his power to fulfil his promise of demolishing the sepulchre and erasing the memorials of Mohammed from the earth. This, he says, was the first purpose of sending his fleets to India. Nobis enim, cum iter in Indiam clausibus nostris aperire, et regiones majoribus nostris incognitas explorare decrevimus, hoc propositum fuit, ut ipsum Mahumetane sectæ caput extingueremus—It is with great art that Camoëns so often reminds us of the grand design of the expedition of his heroes, to subvert Mohammedism and found a Christian empire in the east. But the dignity which this given his poem is already observed in the Preface.

Forget thy praise, Sequeyra ! To the shore
 Where Sheba's sapient queen the sceptre bore³⁶,
 Braving the Red Sea's dangers shalt thou force
 To Abyssinia's realm thy novel course ;
 And isles, by jealous Nature long conceal'd,
 Shalt to the wondering world be now reveal'd.
 Great Menez next the Lusian sword shall bear ;
 Menez, the dread of Afric, high shall rear
 His victor lance, till deep shall Ormuz groan, 350
 And tribute doubled her revolt atone.

" Now shines thy glory in meridian height,"
 And loud her voice she raised ; " O matchless
 knight,

Thou, thou, illustrious Gama, thou shalt bring
 The olive-bough of peace, deputed king !
 The lands by thee discover'd shall obey
 Thy sceptred power, and bless thy regal sway.
 But India's crimes, outrageous to the skies,
 A length of these Saturnian days denies :
 Snatch'd from thy golden throne the Heavens shall claim 360

Thy deathless soul, the world thy deathless name³⁷.

" Now o'er the coast of faithless Malabar Victorious Henry³⁸ pours the rage of war ;
 Nor less the youth a nobler strife shall wage,
 Great victor of himself though green in age ;
 No restless slave of wanton amorous fire,
 No lust of gold shall taint his generous ire.
 While youth's bold pulse beats high, how brave the boy

Whom harlot smiles nor pride of power decoy !
 Immortal be his name ! Nor less thy praise, 370
 Great Mascarene³⁹, shall future ages raise :
 Though power, unjust, withhold the splendid ray
 That dignifies the crest of sovereign sway,
 Thy deeds, great chief, on Bintam's humbled shore,
 Deeds such as Asia never view'd before,
 Shall give thy honest fame a brighter blaze
 Than tyrant pomp in golden robes displays.

³⁶ The Abyssinians contend that their country is the Sheba mentioned in the Scripture, and that the queen who visited Solomon bore a son to that monarch, from whom their royal family, to the present time, is descended.

³⁷ Gama only reigned three months viceroy of India. During his second voyage, the third which the Portuguese made to India, he gave the zamorim some considerable defeats by sea, besides his victories over the Moors. These, however, are judiciously omitted by Camoens, as the less striking part of his character.

The French translator is highly pleased with the prediction of Gama's death, delivered to himself at the feast. " The siren," says he, " persuaded that Gama is a hero exempt from weakness, does not hesitate to mention the end of his life. Gama listens without any mark of emotion; the feast and the song continue. If I am not deceived, this is truly great."

³⁸ Don Henry de Menezes. He was only twenty-eight when appointed to the government of India. He died in his thirtieth year, a noble example of the most disinterested heroism. See the Preface.

³⁹ Pedro de Mascarenhas. The injustice done to this brave officer, and the usurpation of the government by Lopez Vaz de Sampayo, a sort one of the most interesting periods of the history of the Portuguese in India. See the Preface.

Though bold in war the fierce usurper shine,
 Though Cutial's potent navy o'er the brine
 Drive vanquish'd; though the Lusian Hector's sword 380

For him reap conquest, and confirm him lord ;
 Thy deeds, great peer, the wonder of thy foes,
 Thy glorious chains unjust, and generous woes,
 Shall dim the fierce Sampayo's fairest fame,
 And o'er his honours thine aloud proclaim.
 Thy generous woes ! Ah gallant injured chief,
 Not thy own sorrows give the sharpest grief.
 Thou seest the Lusian name her honours stain,
 And lust of gold her heroes' breasts profane ;
 Thou seest ambition lift the impious head, 390
 Nor God's red arm, nor lingering justice dread ;
 O'er India's bounds thou seest these vultures prowl,
 Full-gorged with blood, and dreadful of control ;
 Thou seest and weep'st thy country's blotted
 name,

The generous sorrow thine, but not the shame.
 Nor long the Lusian ensigns stain'd remain :
 Great Nunio comes⁴⁰, and razes every stain.
 Though lofty Calé's warlike towers he rear ;
 Though haughty Melic groan beneath his spear ;
 All these, and Dio yielded to his name, 400
 Are but th' embroidery of his nobler fame.
 Far haughtier foes of Lusian race be braves ;
 The awful sword of justice high he waver :
 Before his bar the injured Indian stands,
 And justice boldly on his foe demands,
 The Lusian foe ; in wonder lost the Moor
 Beholds proud rapine's vulture grips restore ;
 Beholds the Lusian hands in fetters bound
 By Lusian hands, and wound repaid for wound.
 Oh, more shall thou by Nunio's worth be won, 410
 Than conquest reaps from high-plumed hosts o'erthrown.

Long shall the generous Nunio's blissful sway
 Command supreme. In Dio's hopeless day
 The sovereign toil the brave Noronha takes ;
 Awe'd by his famethesierce-soul'd Rumienshakes⁴¹,
 And Dio's open'd walls in sudden flight forsakes.
 A son of thine, O Gama, now shall hold⁴²
 The helm of empire, prudent, wise, and bold :
 Malacya saved and strengthen'd by his arms,
 The banks of Tor shall echo his alarms ; 420
 His worth shall bless the kingdoms of the morn,
 For all thy virtues shall his soul adorn.
 When fate resigns thy hero to the skies,
 A veteran, famed on Brazil's shore, shall rise⁴³ :

⁴⁰ Nunio de Cunha, one of the most worthy of the Portuguese governors. See the Preface.

⁴¹ That brave generous spirit, which prompted Camoens to condemn the great Albuquerque for injustice to a common soldier, has here deserted him. In place of poetical compliment, on the terrors of his name, Noronha deserved infamy. The siege of Dio, it is true, was raised on the report of his approach, but that report was the stratagem of Coie Zofar one of the general officers of the assailants. The delays of Noronha were as highly blamable, as his treatment of his predecessor, the excellent Nunio, was unworthy of a gentleman. See the Preface.

⁴² Sebastian de Gama. See the Preface.

⁴³ Martin Almeida de Souza. He was celebrated for clearing the coast of Braz Not several pirates, who were formidable to that infant colony.

The wide Atlantic, and the Indian main,
By turns shall own the terrors of his reign.
His aid the proud Cambayan king implores,
His potent aid Cambaya's king restores.
The dread Mogul with all his thousands flies,
And Dio's towers are Souza's well-earn'd prize. 430
Nor less the zamorim o'er blood-stain'd ground²²
Shall speed his legions, torn with many a wound,
In headlong rout. Nor shall the boastful pride
Of India's navy, though the shaded tide
Around the squadron'd masts appear the down
Of some wide forest, other fate renown.
Loud rattling through the hills of Cape Camore
I hear the tempest of the battle roar!
Clong to the splinter'd masts I see the dead
Badala's, shores with horrid wrock bespread; 440
Batcala inflamed by treacherous hate,
Provokes the horrors of Badala's fate:
Her seas in blood, her skies enwrap in fire,
Confess the sweeping storm of Souza's ire.
No hostile spear now rear'd on sea or strand,
The awful sceptre graces Souza's hand;
Peaceful he reigns, in counsel just and wise;
And glorious Castro now his throne supplies:
Castro, the host of generous fame, afar
From Dio's strand shall sway the glorious war. 450
Madd'ning with rage to view the Lusian band,
A troop so few, proud Dio's towers command,
The cruel Ethiop Moor to Heaven complains,
And the proud Persiau's languid zeal arraigns.
The Rumien fierce, who boasts the name of Rome²³,
With these conspires and vows the Lusians' doom.
A thousand barbarous nations join their powers
To bathe with Lusian blood the Dion towers.
Dark rolling sheets, forth belch'd from brazen
wombs,
And bored, like showering clouds, with hailing bombs, 460

²² This is as near the original as elegance will allow—de sangue cheyo—upon which Fanshaw has thus punned,

Sending him home again by Weeping-Cross.—

²³ When the victories of the Portuguese began to overspread the east, several Indian princes, by the counsels of the Moors, applied for assistance to the sultan of Egypt and the grand signior. The troops of these Mahomedan princes were in the highest reputation for bravery, and, though composed of many different nations, were known among the Orientals by one common name. Ignorance delights in the marvellous. The history of ancient Rome made the same figure among the easterns, as that of the fabulous or heroic ages does with us, with this difference, it was better believed. The Turks of Rumania and Egypt pretended to be the descendants of the Roman conquerors, and the Indians gave them and their auxiliaries the name of Rumes, or Romans. It has been said that the gipsies who are now scattered over Europe, were, about four or five centuries ago, driven by war from Egypt and Syria. The name by which, in their dialect, they call themselves, Rumetch, or Rumetchin, favours this opinion.

O'er Dio's sky spread the black shades of death:
The mine's dread earthquakes shake the ground beneath.

No hope, hold Mascarene²⁴, mayst thou expire,
A glorious fall alone, thy just desire.
When lo, his gallant son brave Castro sends—
Ah Heaven, what fate the hapless youth attends!
In vain the terrors of his falchion glare;
The cavern'd mine bursts, high in pitchy air,
Kampire and squadron whirl'd convulsive, borne
To Heaven, the hero dies in fragments torn. 470
His loftiest bough though fall'n, the generous sire
His living hope devotes with Roman ire.
On wings of fury flies the brave Alvar
Through oceans bowling with the wintery war,
Through skies of snow his brother's vengeance
bears:

And soon in arms the valiant sire appears:
Before him victory spreads her eagle-wing
Wide sweeping o'er Cambaya's haughty king.
In vain his thundering coursers shake the ground,
Cambaya bleeding of his might's last wound. 480
Sinks pale in dust: fierce Hydal-Kan in vain²⁵
Wakes war on war; he bites his iron chain.
O'er Indus' banks, o'er Ganges' smiling vales,
No more the hind his plunder'd field bewails:
O'er every field, O peace, thy blossoms glow,
The golden blossoms of thy olive bough;
Firm based on wisdom's laws great Castro crowns,
And the wide east the Lusian empire owns.

²⁴ These warlike chiefs, the sons of thy renown,
And thousands more, O Vasco, doom'd to crown 490
Thy glorious toils, shall through these seas unfold
Their victor-standards, blazed with Indian gold;

²⁴ The commander of Diu, or Dio, during this siege, one of the most memorable in the Portuguese history.

²⁵ The title of the lords or princes of Decan, who in their wars with the Portuguese have sometimes brought 400,000 men into the field. The prize here mentioned, after many revolts, was at last finally subdued by don John de Castro, the fourth viceroy of India, with whose reign our poet judiciously ends the prophetic song. Albuquerque laid the plan, and Castro completed the system of the Portuguese empire in the east. It is with propriety therefore that the prophecy given to Gama is here summed up. Nor is the discretion of Camoens in this instance inferior to his judgment. He is now within a few years of his own times, when he himself was upon the scene in India. But whatever he had said of his contemporaries would have been liable to misconception, and every sentence would have been branded with the epithets of flattery or malice. A little poet would have been happy in such an opportunity to resent his wrongs. But the silent contempt of Camoens does him true honour.

In this historical song, as already hinted, the translator has been attentive, as much as he could, to throw it into those universal languages, the picturesque and characteristic. To convey the sublimest instruction to princes, is, according to Aristotle, the peculiar province of the epic Muse. The striking points of view, in which the different characters of the governors of India are here placed, are in the most happy conformity to this ingenious canon of the Stagyræ.

And in the bosom of our flowery ile,
Embedd'd in joy shall o'er their labours smile.
Their nymphs like yours, their feast divine the same,

The raptur'd foretaste of immortal fame."

So sung the goddess, while the sister train
With joyful anthem close the sacred strain;
"Though Fortune from her whirling sphere bestow
Her gifts capricious in unconstant flow, 500
Yet laurel'd honour and immortal fame
Shall ever constant grace the Lusian name."

So sung the joyful chorus, while around
The silver roofs the lofty notes resound.
The song prophetic, and the sacred feast,
Now shed the glow of strength through every breast.
When with the grace and majesty divine,
Which round immortals, when enamour'd, shine,
To crown the banquet of their deathless fame,
To bappy Gama thus the sovereign dame: 510

"O loved of Heaven, what never man before,
What wondering science never might explore,
By Heaven's high will, with mortal eyes to see
Great Nature's face unsoil'd, is given to thee.
Thou and thy warriors follow where I lead:
Firm be your steps, for arduous to the tread
Through matted brakes of thorn and brier, bestrow'd
With splinter'd flint, winds the steep slippery road."
She spake, and smiling caught the hero's hand,
And on the mountain's summit soon they stand;
A beauteous lawn with pearl enamel'd o'er, 521
Emerald and ruby, as the gods of yore
Had sported here. Here in the fragrant air
A wondrous globe appear'd, divinely fair!

Through every part the light transparent flow'd,
And in the centre as the surface glow'd.
The frame ethereal various orbs compose,
In whirling circles now they fell, now rose;
Yet never rose nor fell²⁶, for still the same
Was every movement of the wondrous frame; 530
Each movement still beginning, still complete,
Its author's type, self-poised, perfection's seat.

²⁶ The motions of the heavenly bodies, in every system, bear, at all times, the same uniform relation to each other: these expressions, therefore, are strictly just. The first relates to the appearance, the second to the reality. Thus while to us the Sun appears to go down, to the more western inhabitants of the globe he appears to rise, and while he rises to us, he is going down to the more eastern; the difference being entirely relative to the various parts of the Earth. And in this the expressions of our poet are equally applicable to the Ptolemaic and Copernican systems. The ancient hypothesis, which made our Earth the centre of the universe, is the system adopted by Camoens, a happiness, in the opinion of the translator, to the English Lusiad. The new system is so well known, that a poetical description of it would have been no novelty to the English reader. The other has not only that advantage in its favour; but this description is perhaps the finest and fullest that ever was given of it in poetry, that of Lucretius, l. v. being chiefly argumentative, and therefore less picturesque.

Our author studied at the university of Coimbra, where the ancient system and other doctrines of the Aristotelians then, and long afterwards, prevailed.

Great Vasco thrill'd with reverential awe,
And rapt with keen desire the wondrous saw.
The goddess mark'd the language of his eyes,
"And here," she cried, "thy largest wish subsice.

Great Nature's fabric thou dost here behold,
Th' ethereal pure, and elemental mold,
In pattern shown complete, as Nature's God
Ordain'd the world's great frame, his dread abode;
For every part the Power Divine pervades, 541
The Sun's bright radiance and the central shades.
Yet let not haughty reason's bounded line
Explore the boundless God, or where define,
Where in himself in uncreated light,
(While all his worlds around seem wrapt in night,)
He holds his loftiest state²⁷. By primal laws
Imposed on Nature's birth, himself the cause,
By her own ministry through every maze
Nature in all her walks unseen he sways. 550
These spheres behold²⁸; the first in wide embrace
Surrounds the lesser orbs of various face;
The Empyrean this, the holiest Heaven
To the pure spirits of the blest is given:
No mortal eye its splendid rays may bear,
No mortal bosom feel the raptures there.
The Earth in all her summer pride array'd
To this might seem a drear sepulchral shade.
Unmoved it stands: within its shining frame,
In motion swifter than the lightning's flame, 560
Swifter than aught the moving parts may spy,
Another sphere whirls round its rapid sky.
Hence motion darts its force²⁹, impulsive draws,
And on the other orbs impresses laws:

²⁷ Called by the old philosophers and school divines the sensorium of the Deity.

²⁸ According to the Peripatetics, the universe consisted of eleven spheres enclosed within each other, as Fanshew has familiarly expressed it by a simile which he has lent our author. The first of these spheres, he says,

— doth (as in a nest
Of boxes) all the other orbs comprize—

In their accounts of this first mentioned, but eleventh sphere, which they called the Empyrean, or Heaven of the Blest, the disciples of Aristotle, and the Arab Moors, gave a loose to all the warmth of imagination. And several of the Christian fathers applied to it the descriptions of Heaven which are found in the Holy Scripture.

²⁹ This is the tenth sphere, the primum mobile of the ancient system. To account for the appearances of the Heavens, the Peripatetics ascribed double motion to it. While its influence drew the other orbs from east to west, they supposed it had a motion of its own from west to east. To effect this, the ponderous weight and interposition of the ninth sphere, or crystalline Heaven, was necessary. The ancient astronomers observed that the stars shifted their places. This they called the motion of the crystalline Heaven, expressed by our poet at the rate of one pace during two hundred solar years. The famous Arab astronomer Abulhasan, in his work entitled Meadows of Gold, calculates the revolution of this sphere to consist of 49,000 of our years. But modern discoveries have not only corrected this calcula-

The Sun's bright car attentive to its force
Gives night and day, and shapes his yearly course;
Its force stupendous asks a pond'rous sphere
To poise its fury and its weight to bear:
Slow moves that pond'rous orb; the stiff, slow pace
One step scarce gains, while wide his annual race
Two hundred times the Sun triumphant rides; 571
The crystal Heaven is this, whose rigour guides
And binds the starry sphere⁶¹: that sphere behold,

With diamonds spangled, and emblaz'd with gold;
What radiant orbs that azure sky adorn,
Fair o'er the night in rapid motion borne!
Swift as they trace the Heaven's deep circling line,
Whirl'd on their proper axes bright they shine.
Wide o'er this Heaven a golden belt displays
Twelve various forms; behold the glittering blaze! 580

Through these the Sun in annual journey tours,
And o'er each clime their various tempers pours.
In gold and silver of celestial mine
How rich far round the constellations shine!
Lo, bright emerging o'er the polar tides
In shining frost the Northern Chariot rides⁶²:

tion⁶⁰, but have also ascertained the reason of the apparent motion of the fixt stars. The Earth is not a perfect sphere; the quantity of matter is greater at the equator; hence the Earth turns on her axis in a rocking motion, revolving round the axis of the ecliptic, which is called the procession of the equinoxes, and makes the stars seem to shift their places at about the rate of a degree in 72 years; according to which all the stars seem to perform one revolution in the space of 25,920 years, after which they return exactly to the same situation as at the beginning of this period. However imperfect in their calculations, the Chaldaic astronomers perceived that the motions of the Heavens compos'd one great revolution. This they call'd the annus magnus, which those who did not understand them mistook for a restoration of all things to their first originals, and that the world was at that period to begin anew in every respect. Hence the old Egyptian notion, that every one was at the end of thirty-nine thousand years to resume every circumstance of his present life, to be exactly the same in every contingency. And hence also the legends of the Bramins and Mandarins, their periods of millions of years, and the worlds which they tell us are already past, and eternally to succeed each other.

⁶¹ This was call'd the firmament or eighth Heaven. Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Venus, Mercury, and Diana, were the planets which gave name to, and whose orbits compos'd the other spheres or Heavens.

⁶² Commonly call'd Charleswain. Of Calisto, or the Bear, see note 18 of Lucial V. Andromeda was the daughter of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and of Cassiope. Cassiope boasted that she and her daughter were more beautiful than Juno and the Nereids. Andromeda, to appease the goddess, ⁶⁰ However deficient the astronomy of Abulhasan may be, it is nothing to the calculation of his prophet, Mohammed, who tells his disciples, that the stars were each about the bigness of a house, and hung from the sky on chains of gold.

Mid treasur'd snows here gleams the griny Bear,
And icy flakes encrust his shaggy hair.
Here fair Andromeda, of Heaven beloved:
Her vengeful sire, and by the gods reproved 590
Beauteous Cassiope. Here, fierce and red,
Portending storms, Orion lifts his head;
And here the Dogs their raging fury shed.
The Swan—sweet melodist! in death he sings—
The milder swan here spreads his silver wings.
Here Orpheus' Lyre, the melancholy Hare,
And here the watchful Dragon's eye-balls glare;
And Theseus' ship, Oh, less renew'd than thus,
Shall e'er o'er these skies illustrious shine.
Beneath this radiant firmament behold 600
The various planets in their orbits roll'd:
Here in cold twilight hoary Saturn rides,
Here Jove shines mild, here fiery Mars presides;
Apollo here enthroned in light appears
The eye of Heaven, emblazer of the spheres;
Beneath him beauteous glows the Queen of Love,
The proud heart's her sacred influence pours;
Here Hermes famed for eloquence divine,
And here Diana's various faces shine;
Lowest shrides, and through the shadowy night
Pours on the glistening Earth her silver light. 611
These various orbs, behold, in various speed
Pursue the journeys at their birth decreed.
Now from the centre far impell'd they fly,
Now nearer Earth they sail a lower sky,
A shorten'd course: such are their laws impress'd
By God's dread will, that will for ever best⁶³.

was, at her father's command, chained to a rock to be devoured by a sea monster, but was saved by Perseus, who obtained of Jupiter that all the family should be placed among the stars. Orion was a hunter, who, for an attempt on Diana, was stung to death by a serpent. The star of his name portends tempests. The Dogs: fable gives this honour to those of different hunters. The faithful dog of Erigone, however, that died mad with grief for the death of his mistress, has the best title to preside over the dog-days. The Swan: that whose form Jupiter borrowed to enjoy Leda. The Hare, when pursued by Orion, was saved by Mercury, and plac'd in Heaven, to signify that Mercury presides over melancholy dispositions. The Lyre, with which Orpheus charmed Pluto. The Dragon, which guarded the golden apples of the Hesperides, and the ship Argo, complete the number of the constellations mentioned by Camoens. If our author has blended the appearances of Heaven with those of the painted artificial sphere, it is in the manner of the classics. Ovid, in particular, thus describes the Heavens, in the second book of his Metamorphoses.

⁶³ Though a modern narrative of hardy-boat adventures in the South Seas by no means requires the supposition of a particular providence, that supposition, however, is absolutely necessary to the grandeur of an epic poem. The great examples of Homer and Virgil prove it; and Camoens understood and felt its force. While his feet combat all the horrors of unplough'd oceans, we do not view his heroes as idle wanderers; the cure of Heaven gives their voyage the greatest importance. When Gama falls on his knee: and spreads his hands to Heaven on the discovery of India, we are presented with a figure infinitely more noble

"The yellow Earth, the centre of the whole,
There lordly rests sustain'd on either pole.

The limpid air enfolds in soft embrace
The pond'rous orb, and brightens o'er her face.

than that of the most successful conqueror, who is supposed to act under the influence of fatalism or chance. The human mind is conscious of its own weakness. It expects an elevation in poetry, and demands a degree of importance superior to the caprices of unmeaning accident. The poetical reader cannot admire the hero who is subject to such blind fortuity. He appears to us with an subject uninteresting littleness. Our poetical ideas of permanent greatness demand a Gama, a hero whose enterprises and whose person interest the care of Heaven and the happiness of his people. Nor must this supposition be confined merely to the machinery. The reason why it pleases also requires that the supposition should be uniform throughout the whole poem. Virgil, by dismissing Æneas through the ivory gate of Elysium, has hinted that all his pictures of a future state were merely dreams, and has thus destroyed the highest merit of the compliment to his patron Augustus. But Camoëns has certainly been more happy. A fair opportunity offered itself to indulge the opinions of Lucretius and the Academic grove; but Camoëns, in ascribing the government of the universe to the will of God, has not only preserved the philosophy of his poem perfectly uniform, but has also shown that the Peripatetic system is, in this instance, exactly conformable to the Newtonian. But this leads us from one defence of our author to another. We have seen that the supposition of a Providence is certainly allowable in a poet: nor can we think it is highly to be blamed, even in a philosopher. The Principia of Newton offer, what some perhaps may esteem, a demonstration of the truth of this opinion. Matter appeared to sir Isaac as possessed of no property but one, the vis inertia, or dead inactivity. Motion, the centripetal and centrifugal force, appeared therefore to that great man, as added by the agency of something distinct from matter, by a Being of other properties. And from the infinite combinations of the universe united in one great design, he inferred the omnipotence and omniscience of that primary Being.

If we admit, and who can possibly deny it? that man has an idea of right and wrong, and a power of agency in both, he is then a moral, or, in other words, a reasonable agent; a being placed in circumstances, where his agency is infallibly attended with degrees of happiness or misery infinitely more real and durable than any animal sensation. Now to suppose that the Being who has provided for every want of animal nature, who has placed even the meanest insect in its proper line, and has rendered every purpose of its agency or existence complete,—to suppose that he has placed the infinitely superior intellectual nature of man in an agency of infinitely greater consequence, but an agency of which he takes no superintendance—to suppose this, is only to suppose that the Author of Nature is a very imperfect being. For no proposition can be more self-evident, than that an attention to the merest comparative trifles, attended with a neglect of infinitely greater concerns, implies an intellectual imperfection. Yet some philosophers, who tell us there never was an atheist, some who are not only in raptures with the great machinery of the universe, but are lost in admiration at the admirable adaption of an oyster shell to the wants of the animal; some of these philosophers, with the utmost contempt of the contrary opinion, make no scruple to exclude the care of the Deity from any concern in the moral world. Dazzled, perhaps, by the mathematics, the case of many a feeble intellect; or bewildered and benighted in metaphysics, the case of many an ingenious philosopher; they erect a standard of truth in their own minds, and utterly forgetting that this standard must be founded on partial views, with the utmost assurance they reject whatever does not agree with the infallibility of their beloved test. There is another cast of philosophers no less ingenious, whose minds, absorbed in the innumerable wonders of natural inquiry, can perceive nothing but a god of cockle-shells, and of grubs turned into butterflies. With all the arrogance of superior knowledge, these virtuosi smile at the opinion which interests the Deity in the moral happiness or misery of man. Nay, they will gravely tell you, that such misery or happiness does not exist. At ease themselves, in their elbow-chairs, they cannot conceive there is such a thing in the world as oppressed innocence feeling its only consolation in an appeal to Heaven, and its only hope, a trust in its care. Though the Author of Nature has placed man in a state of moral agency, and made his happiness or misery to depend upon it, and though every page of human history is stained with the tears of injured innocence and the triumphs of guilt, with miseries which must affect a moral or thinking being, yet we have been told, that "God perceiveth it not; and that what mortals call moral evil vanishes from before his more perfect sight." Thus the appeal of injured innocence and the tear of bleeding virtue fall unregarded, unworthy of the attention of the Deity*. Yet with what raptures do these enlarged virtuosos behold the infinite wisdom and care of their Beelzebub, their god of flies, in the admirable and various provision he has made for the preservation of the eggs of vermin, and the generation of maggots!

Much more might be said in proof that our poet's philosophy does not altogether deserve ridicule. And those who allow a general, but deny a particular providence, will, it is hoped, excuse Camoëns, on the consideration, that if we estimate a general moral providence by analogy of that providence which presides over vegetable and animal nature, a more particular one cannot possibly be wanted. If this life is a state of probation, there must be a particular providence to decide on the individual. If a particular providence, however,

* Perhaps, like Lucretius, some philosophers think this would be too much trouble to the Deity. But the idea of trouble to the Divine Nature, is much the same as another argument of the same philosopher, who, having asserted that before the creation the gods could not know what different seeds would produce, from thence wisely concludes, that the world was made by chance.

Here, softly floating o'er th' aërial blue,
Fringed with the purple and the golden hue,
The fleecy clouds their swelling sides display;
From whence fermented by the sulph'rous ray
The lightnings blaze, and heat spreads wide and rare;

And now in fierce embrace with frozen air,
Their wombs compress soon feel parturient throes,
And white-wing'd gales bear wide the teeming snows.
Thus cold and heat their warring empires hold, 630
Averse, yet mingling, each by each control'd;
The highest air and ocean's bed they pierce,
And Earth's dark centre feels their struggles fierce.

"The seat of man, the Earth's fair breast, behold;
Here wood-crown'd islands wave their locks of gold.
Here spread wide continents their bosoms green,
And hoary ocean heaves his breast between.

Yet not th' inconstant ocean's furious tide
May fix the dreadful bounds of human pride.
What madd'ning seas between these nations roar!
Yet Lusur's hero-race shall visit every shore. 641

What thousand tribes whom various customs sway,
And various rites, these countless shores display!

Hers every art, and hers all wisdom's charms,
Hers nation's tribute round her foot-stool spread,
Here Christian Europe lifts the regal head.

Affric behold, alas, what alter'd view!
Her lands uncultured, and her sons untrue;
Ungraced with all that sweetens human life, 650
Savage and fierce they roam in brutal strife;
Eager they grasp the gifts which culture yields,
Yet naked roam their own neglected fields.
Lo, here enrich'd with hills of golden ore,
Monomotapa's empire hems the shore.

There round the Cape, great Affric's dreadful bound
Army'd in storms, by you first compass'd round,
Unnumber'd tribes as bestial grazers stray,
By laws unform'd, unform'd by reason's sway:
Far inward stretch the mournful strail dales, 660
Where on the parch'd hill side pale Famine wails.
On gold in vain the naked savage treads;
Low clay-built huts, behold, and reedy sheds,
Their dreary towns. Gonzalo's zeal shall glow
To these dark minds the path of light to show:

is still denied, another consideration obtrudes itself; if one pang of a moral agent is unregarded, one tear of injured innocence left to fall unpitied
by the Deity, if Indit in humanis divina potentia rebns, the consequence is, that the human conception can form an idea of a much better god:
and it may modestly be presumed we may hazard the laugh of the wisest philosopher, and without scruple assert, that it is impossible that a created mind should conceive an idea of perfection, superior to that which is absolutely possessed by the Creator and Author of existence.

¶ Vts Europa Christian.—As Europe is already described in the third Lusiad, this short account of it has as great propriety, as the manner of it has dignity.

¶ This just and strongly picturesque description of Africa is finely contrasted with the character of Europe. It contains also a masterly compliment to the expedition of Gama, which is all along represented as the harbinger and diffuser of the blessings of civilization.

¶ Christianity was planted here in the first century, but mixed with many Jewish rites unused by other Christians of the east. This appears to give some countenance to the pretensions of their emperors, who claim their descent from Solomon and the queen of Sheba, and at least reminds us of Acts viii. 27; where we are told, that the treasurer of the queen of Ethiopia came to worship at Jerusalem. Innumerable monasteries, we are told, are in this country. But the clergy are very ignorant, and the laity gross barbarians. Much

* He must be a dull reader indeed who cannot perceive and relish the amazing variety which prevails in our poet. In every page it appears.
 In the historical narrative of wars, where it is most necessary, yet from the sameness of the subject, most difficult to attain, our author always attains it with the most graceful ease. In the description of countries he not only follows the manner of Homer and Virgil, not only distinguishes each region by its most striking characteristic, but he also

There on the gulf that laves the Persian shore, 730
 Far through the surges, bend Cape Asabore.
 There Barem's isle[†]; her rocks with diamonds
 And emulate Aurora's glittering rays. [blaze,
 From Barem's shore Euphrates' flood is seen,
 And Tygris' waters, through the waves of green,
 In yellow currents many a league extend,
 As with the darker waves averse they bleed.
 Lo, Persia there her empire wide unfolds!
 In tented camp his state the monarch holds:
 Her warrior sons disdain the arms of fire[‡], 740
 And with the pointed steel to fame aspire;
 Their springy shoulders stretching to the blow,
 Their sweepy sabres hew the shrieking foe.
 There Gerup's isle the hoary ruin wears[§] [spears
 Where Time has trod: there shall the dreadful
 Of Sousa and Menezes strew the shore
 With Persian ashes, and embathe with gore
 Carpella's cape and sad Carmanis's strand,
 There parch'd and bare their dreary wastes expand.
 A fairer landscape here delights the view: 750
 From these green hills, beneath the clouds of blue,
 The Indus and the Ganges roll the wave,
 And many a smiling field propitious lave.
 Luxurious here Ulcinda's harvests smile,
 And here, disdainful of the seaman's toil,
 The whirling tides of Jaquet furious roar;
 Alike their rage when swelling to the shore,
 Or tumbling backward to the deep, they force
 The boiling fury of their gulfly course:
 Against their headlong rage nor oars nor sails, 760
 The steaming prow alone, hard toiled, prevails.
 Cambaya here begins her wide domain;
 A thousand cities here shall own the reign
 Of Lisbon's monarchs: he who first shall crown
 Thy labours, Gama, here shall boast his own[¶].
 The lengthening sea that washes India's strand,
 And laves the cape that points to Ceylon's land,
 (The Taprobanean isle, renown'd of yore,)
 Shall see his ensigns blaze from shore to shore.
 Behold how many a realm array'd in green 770
 The Ganges' shore and Indus' bank between!

great victory, near Ormuz, over the combined fleets of the Moors, Turks, and Persians.

† The island of Barem is situated in the Persian gulf, near the influx of the Euphrates and Tygris. It is celebrated for the plenty, variety, and fineness of its diamonds.

‡ This was the character of the Persians when Gama arrived in the east. Yet, though they thought it dishonourable to use the musket, they esteemed it no disgrace to rush from a thicket on an unarmed foe. This reminds one of the spirit of the old romance. Orlando, having taken the first invented cannon from the king of Friza, throws it into the sea with the most heroic execrations. Yet the heroes of chivalry think it no disgrace to take every advantage afforded by invulnerable hides and enchanted armour.

§ Presuming on the ruins which are found on this island, the natives pretend that the Armuzia of Pliny and Strabo was here situated. But this is a mistake, for that city stood on the continent.
 The Moors, however, have built a city in this isle, which they call by the ancient name.

²⁶ There are, to talk in the Indian style, a cast of gentlemen, whose hearts are all impartiality and candour to every religion except one, the most moral one which ever the world knew. A tale of a Bramin or a priest of Jupiter would to them appear worthy of poetry. But to introduce an apostle—common sense, however, will prevail; and the episode of St. Thomas will appear to the true critic equal in dignity and propriety. In propriety, for

To renew and complete the labours of the apostle, the messenger of Heaven, is the great design of the hero of the poem, and of the future missions in consequence of the discoveries which are the subject of it.

The Christians of St. Thomas, found in Malabar on the arrival of Gama, we have already mentioned in the Preface: but some further account of that subject will certainly be agreeable to the curious. The Jesuit missionaries have given most pompous accounts of the Christian antiquities of India and China. When the Portuguese arrived in India, the head of the Malabar Christians, named Jacob, styled himself metropolitan of India and China. And a Chaldaic breviary* of the Indian Christians offers praise to God for sending St. Thomas to India and China. In 1625, in digging for a foundation near Sigantú, metropolis of the province of Xensi, was found a stone with a cross on it, full of Chinese and some Syriac characters, containing the names of bishops, and an account of the Christian religion, "that it was brought from Judæa; that having been weakened, it was renewed under the reign of the great Tam," (cir. A. D. 630.) But the Christians, say the Jesuits, siding with the Tartars, cir. A. D. 1200, were extirpated by the Chinese. In 1543, Fernand Pinto, observing some ruins near Peking, was told by the people, that 200 years before, a holy man, who worshipped Jesus Christ, born of a virgin, lived there; and being murdered, was thrown into a river, but his body would not sink; and soon after the city was destroyed by an earthquake. The same Jesuit found people at Caminam who knew the doctrines of Christianity, before they said were preached to their fathers by John the disciple of Thomas. In 1635, some Heathens by night passing through a village in the province of Poklen, saw some stones which emitted light, under which were found the figures of crosses. From China St. Thomas returned to Meliapore in Malabar, at a time when a prodigious beam of timber floated on the sea near the coast. The king endeavoured to bring it ashore; but all the force of men and elephants was in vain. St. Thomas desired leave to build a church with it, and

* The existence of this breviary is a certain fact. These Christians had the Scripture also in the Chaldaic language.

The day foretold, when India's utmost shore
A sign shall bear Messiah's blissful lore.
By Indus' banks the holy prophet trod,
And Ganges heard him preach the Saviour-God;
Where pale disease erewhile the cheek consum-
ed,

Health at his word in ruddy fragrance bloom'd;
The grave's dark womb his awful voice obey'd,
And to the cheerful day restored the dead:
By heavenly power he rear'd the sacred shrine,
And gain'd the nations by his life divine.

immediately dragged it to shore with a single thread. A church was built, and the king baptized. This enraged the Bramins, the chief of whom killed his own son, and accused Thomas of the murder. But the saint, by restoring the youth to life, discovered the wickedness of his enemies. He was afterwards killed by a lance while kneeling at the altar; after, according to tradition, he had built 2300 stately churches, many of which were rebuilt, cir. 800, by an Armenian, named Thomas Cananeus. In 1523, the body of the apostle, with the head of the lance beside him, was found in his church by D. Duarte de Menezes; and in 1556 was by D. Constantine de Braganza removed to Goa. To these accounts, selected from Faria y Sousa, let two from Oonius be added. When Martin Alonso de Sousa was viceroy, some brazen tables were brought to him, inscribed with unusual characters, which were explained by a learned Jew, and imported that St. Thomas had built a church in Meliapore. And by an account sent to cardinal Henriquez, by the bishop of Cochim, in 1562, when the Portuguese repaired the ancient chapel of St. Thomas*, there was found a stone cross with several characters on it, which the best antiquarians could not interpret, till at last a Bramin translated it, "That in the reign of Sagam, Thomas was sent by the Son of God, whose disciple he was, to teach the law of Heaven in India; that he built a church, and was killed by a Bramin at the altar."

A view of Portuguese Asia, which must include the labours of the Jesuits, forms a necessary part in the comment on the Lusiad: this note, therefore, and some obvious reflections upon it, are in place. It is as easy to bury an inscription and find it again, as it is to invent a silly tale; but though suspicion of fraud on the one hand, and silly absurdity on the other, lead us to despise the authority of the Jesuits, yet one fact remains indisputable. Christianity had been much better known in the east, several centuries before, than it was at the arrival of Gama. Where the name was unknown, and where the Jesuits were unconcerned, crosses were found. The long existence of the Christians of St. Thomas, in the midst of a vast Pagan empire, proves that the learned of that empire must have some knowledge of their doctrines. And those facts give countenance to some material conjectures concerning the religion of the Bramins. For these we shall give scope immediately,

* This was a very ancient building, in the very first style of Christian churches. The Portuguese have now disfigured it with their repairs and new buildings.

The priests of Brahma's hidden rites beheld, 790
 And envy's bitterest gall their bosoms swell'd.
 A thousand deathful snares in vain they spread;
 When now the chief that wore the triple thread,⁷⁹
 Fired by the rage that gnaws the conscious breast
 Of holy fraud, when worth shines forth confess,
 Hell he invokes, nor Hell in vain he sues;
 His son's life-gore his wither'd hands imbrues;
 Then, bold assuming the vindictive ire,
 And all the passions of the woeful air,
 Weeping he bends before the Indian throne, 800
 Arraigns the holy man, and wails his son:
 A band of hoary priests attend the deed,
 And India's king condemns the seer to bleed.
 Inspired by Heaven the holy victim stands,
 And o'er the murder'd corpse extends his hands,
 'In God's dread power, thou slaughter'd youth,
 And name thy murderer! aloud he cries. [arise,
 When, dread to view, the deep wounds instant
 And fresh in life the slaughter'd youth arose, [close,
 And named his treacherous sire. The conscious

⁷⁹ Of this, thus Orosius: Terna fila ab humero dextero in latus sinistrum gerunt, ut designent trinitam in natura divina rationem. "They (the Bramins) wear three threads, which reach from the right shoulder to the left side, as significant of the trinal distinction in the divine nature." That some sects of the Bramins wear a symbolical tress of three threads, is acknowledged on all hands; but from whatever the custom arose, it is not to be supposed that the Bramins, who have thousands of ridiculous contradictory legends, should agree in their accounts or explanations of it. Faria says, that according to the sacred books of the Malabrians, the religion of the Bramins proceeded from fishermen, who left the charge of the temples to their successors, on condition they should wear some threads of their nets, in remembrance of their original. Their accounts of a divine person having assumed human nature are innumerable. And the god Brahma, as observed by Cudworth, is generally mentioned as united in the government of the universe with two others, sometimes of different names. They have also images with three heads rising out of one body, which they say represent the divine nature. The Platonic idea of a trinity of divine attributes was well known to the ancients, before the various imitations of Christian mythology existed; and every nation has a trinity of superior deities. Even the wild Americans had their Otono, Messou, and Atahauts; yet perhaps the Athanasian controversy offers a fairer field to the conjecturist. That controversy for several ages engrossed the conversation of the east. All the subtlety of the Greeks was called forth, and no speculative contest was ever more universally or warmly disputed; so warmly, that it is a certain fact that Mahommed, by inserting into his Koran some declarations in favour of the Arians, gained innumerable proselytes to his new religion. Abyssinia, Egypt, Syria, Persia, and Armenia, were perplexed with this unhappy dispute, and from the earliest times these countries have had a commercial intercourse with India. And certain it is,

Receives, and wide o'er all his regal bounds
 The God of Thomas every tongue resounds.
 Long taught the holy seer the words of life:
 The priests of Brahma still to deeds of strife,
 So boiled their ire, the blinded herd impell'd,
 And high to deathful rage their rancour swell'd.
 'T was on a day, when melting on his tongue 820
 Heaven's offer'd mercies glow'd, the impious throng,
 Rising in mad'ning tempest, round him shower'd
 The splinter'd flint; in vain the flint was pour'd.
 But Heaven had now his flesh'd labours seal'd;
 His angel guards withdraw th' ethereal shield;
 A Bramin's javelin tears his holy breast—
 Ah Heaven, what woes the widowed land express'd!
 Thee, Thomas⁸⁰, thee, the plaintive Ganges
 mourn'd,
 And Indus' banks the murmuring moan return'd;
 O'er every valley where thy footsteps strid'd, 830
 The hollow winds the gliding sighs convey'd.
 What woes the mournful face of India wore,
 These woes in living pangs his people bore.
 His sons, to whose illumined minds he gave
 To view the rays that shine beyond the grave,
 His pastoral sons bedew'd his corpse with tears:
 While high triumphant through the heavenly spheres,
 With songs of joy the smiling angels wing
 His raptur'd spirit to th' eternal King.
 O you, the followers of the holy seer, 840
 Foredoom'd the shrines of Heaven's own lore to rear,
 You, sent by Heaven his labours to renew,
 Like him, ye Lusians, simplest truth pursue⁸¹.

the Bramin theology has undergone considerable alterations, of much later date than the Christian era. See the Inquiry, &c. end of Lusiad VII

⁸⁰ The verification of the original is here exceedingly fine. Even those who are unacquainted with the Portuguese may perceive it.

⁸¹ It is now the time to sum up what has been said of the labours of the Jesuits. Diametrically opposite to this advice was their conduct in every Asiatic country where they pretended to propagate the Gospel. Sometimes we find an individual sincere and pious; but the great principle which always actuated them as an united body was the lust of power and secular emolument, the possession of which they thought could not be better secured, than by rendering themselves of the utmost importance to the see of Rome. Before the institution of the society of Jesus, the Portuguese priests gave evident proofs of their sincerity, and Cubilonez, who came to India as father confessor to Gama, was indefatigable in his labours to convert the Indians. But when the Jesuits arrived about fifty years after, a new method was pursued. Wherever they came, their first care was to find what were the great objects of the fear and adoration of the people. If the Sun was esteemed the giver of life, Jesus Christ was the son of that luminary, and they were his younger brethren, sent to instruct the ignorant. If the barbarians were to

Vain is the impious toil with borrow'd grace,
To deck one feature of her angel face;

dread of evil spirits, Jesus Christ came on purpose to banish them from the world, had driven them from Europe*, and the Jesuits were sent to the east to complete his unfinished mission. If the Indian converts still retained a veneration for the powder of burnt cow-dung, the Jesuits made the sign of the cross over it, and the Indian besmeared himself with it as usual. Heaven, or universal matter, they told the Chinese, was the god of the Christians, and the sacrifices of Confucius were solemnized in the churches of the Jesuits. This worship of Confucius, Voltaire (Gen. Hist.) with his wonted accuracy denies. But he ought to have known, that this, with the worship of Tien or Heaven, had been long complained of at the court of Rome, (see Dupin,) and that after the strictest scrutiny the charge was fully proved, and Clement XI, in 1703, sent cardinal Tournon to the small remains of the Jesuits in the east with a papal decree to reform these abuses. But the cardinal, soon after his arrival, was poisoned in Siam by the holy fathers. Xavier, and the other Jesuits who succeeded him, by the dextrous use of the great maxims of their master Loyola,—Omnibus omnia, et omnia mundamundie,—gained innumerable proselytes. They contradicted none of the favourite opinions of their converts; they only baptized, and gave them crucifixes to worship, and all was well. But their zeal in uniting to the see of Rome the Christians found in the east descended to the minutest particulars. And the native Christians of Malabar were so violently persecuted as schismatics, that the Heathen princes, during the government of Ataide, (see Geddes, Hist. of Malab.) professed their defence, as a cause of hostility. Abyssinia, by the same arts, was steeped in blood, and two or three emperors lost their lives in endeavouring to establish the pope's supremacy. An order at last was given from the throne, to hang every missionary without trial, wherever apprehended; the emperor himself complaining that he could not enjoy a day in quiet, for the intrigues of the Roman friars. In China also they soon rendered themselves insufferable. Their skill in mathematics and the dependent arts introduced them to great favour at court, but all their cunning could not conceal their villany. Their unwillingness to ordain the natives raised suspicions against a profession thus monopolized by strangers; their earnest zeal in amassing riches, and their interference with, and deep designs on secular power, the fatal rock on which they have so often been shipwrecked, appeared, and their churches were levelled with the ground. About 90,000 of the new converts, together with their teachers, were massacred, and their religion was prohibited. In

* This trick, it is said, has been played in America within these twenty years, where the notion of evil spirits gives the poor Indians their greatest misery. The French Jesuits told the Six Nations, that Jesus Christ was a Frenchman, and had driven all evil demons from France; that he had a great love for the Indians, whom he intended also to deliver, but taking England in his way, he was crucified by the wicked Londoners.

Behind the veil's broad glare she glides away,
And leaves a rotten form of lifeless painted clay.

Japan the rage of government even exceeded that of China: and in allusion to their chief object of adoration, the cross, several of the Jesuit fathers were crucified by the Japanese, and the revival of the Christian name was interdicted by the severest laws. Thus, in a great measure, ended in the east the labours of the society of Ignatius Loyola, a society which might have diffused the greatest blessings to mankind, could honesty have been added to their great learning and abilities. Had that zeal which laboured to promote the interests of their own brotherhood and the Roman see, had that indefatigable zeal been employed in the real interests of humanity and civilization, the great design of diffusing the law of Heaven, challenged by its author as the purpose of the Lasiad, would have been simply completed, and the remotest hordes of Tartary and Africa ere now had been happily civilized. But though the Jesuits have failed, they have afforded a noble lesson to mankind:

Though fortified with all the brazen moulds
That art can rear, and watch'd by eagle eyes,
Skill will some rotten part betray the structure
That is not based on simple honesty.

It must be confessed, however, that the manners of the Gentoo form a most formidable barrier against the introduction of a new religion. While the four great tribes of India continue in their present principles, intercommunity of worship cannot take place among them. The Hallachores are the mere rabble, into which the delinquents of the four tribes are degraded by excommunication. It is among these only, says Scrafton, that the popish missionaries have had any success. Urbano Cerri, in his account of the Catholic religion, mentions a Jesuit named Robertus de Nobili, who preached that every one ought to remain in his own tribe, and by that means made many converts. He also proposed to erect a seminary of Christian Bramins. But the holy see disapproved of this design, and defeated his labours. Jealousy of the secular arts of the Portuguese was also a powerful preventive of the labours of their priests. A Spaniard being asked by an Indian king, how his Spanish majesty was able to subdue such immense countries as they boasted to belong to him? the don honestly answered, that "he first sent priests to convert the people, and having thus gained a party of the natives, he sent fleets and soldiers, who with the assistance of the new proselytes subdued the rest." The truth of this confession, which has been often proved, will never be forgotten in the east. But if the bigoted adherence of the Indians to the rites of their tribes, and other causes, have been a bar to the propagation of Christianity among them, the same reasons have also prevented the success of Mahomedism, a religion much more palatable to the luxurious and ignorant. Though the Mogul, and almost all the princes of India, have these many centuries professed the religion of the Koran, Mr. Orme, as already cited, computes that all the Mahomedans of Hindostan do not exceed ten millions; whereas the Gentoo amount to about ten times that number,

"Mach have you view'd of future Lusian reign;
 Broad empires yet and kingdoms wide remain,
 Scenes of your future toils and glorious sway— 850
 And lo, how wide expands the Ganges bay!

 And here Oryxa boasts her cloth of gold.
 The Ganges here in many a stream divides,
 Diffusing plenty from his fattening tides,
 As through Bengala's ripening vales he glides;
 Nor may the fleetest hawk, untired, explore
 Where end the rice groves that crown the shore.

 Yet still their fury Nature's God arraign'd. 870

⁶⁰ See the Inquiry into the tenets of the Dramas, at the end of the Fifth Lusiad.

⁶¹ The tradition of this country boasted this infamous and impossible original. While other nations pretend to be descended of demi-gods, the Pegusians were contented to trace their pedigree from a Chinese woman and a dog, the only living creatures which survived a shipwreck on their coast—See Faria. This infamy, however, they could not deserve. Animals of a different species may generate together, but nature immediately displays her abhorrence, in invariably depriving the unnatural offspring of the power of procreation.

⁶² Thus in the original:

Aqui soante arame no instrumento
 Da geração costimado, o que usario
 Por manha da Raynha, que inventando
 Tal uso, deitou fora o error nefando.

Relatum est de regina quadam terræ Peguensis, quod ad coercendum crimen turpissimum subditorum suorum, legem tulit, ut universi mares orbiculatum vel orbiculos quosdam aratos in peneum illatos gererent. Ita sit: cuthro penis cuticulam dividunt, eamque in orbiculos huc superinducunt: statim a prima septimana vulnus conglutinetur. Inseruntur plerumque tres orbiculi: magnitudine infimus ad modum juglandis, primus ferme ad tenerioris gallinæ ovi modum extat. Trium liberorum parens ad libitum onus exentiat. Si horum aliquis a rege dono detur, ut gemma quantivis pretii æstimatur. To this let the testimony of G. Arthus (Hist. Ind. Orient. p. 313.) be added: Virgines in hoc regno omnino nullas reperire licet: puellæ enim omnes statim a pueritia sua medicamentum quoddam usurpant, quo mulieria distendunt et aperta continentur: idque propter globulos quos in virgine viri gestant; illis enim admittendis virgines arctiores nullo modo sufficerent.

According to Balby, and Casar Frederic, the empire of Pegu, which the year before sent armies of two millions to the field, was in 1598, by famine and the arms of the neighbouring princes of Ava,

Ah, mark the thunders rolling o'er the sky!
 Yes, bathed in gore shall rank pollution lie.
 "Where to the morn the towers of Tava shine,
 Begins great Siam's empire's far-stretch'd line.
 On Queda's fields the genial rays inspire
 The richest gust of spicery's fragrant fire.
 Malaca's castled harbour here survey,
 The wealthful seat foredoom'd of Lusian sway.
 Here to their port the Lusian fleet shall steer,
 From every shore far round assembling here 880
 The fragrant treasures of the eastern world:
 Here from the shore by roaring earthquakes hurl'd,
 Through waves all foam Sumatra's isle was riven,
 And mid white whirlpools down the ocean driven⁶³.
 To this fair isle, the golden Chersonese,
 Some deem the sapient monarch plough'd the seas,
 Ophir its Tyrian name⁶⁴. In whirling roars
 How fierce the tide boils down these clasping shores!
 High from the strait the lengthening coast afar,
 Its moon-light curve points to the northern star,
 Opening its bosom to the silver ray 891
 When fair Aurora pours the infant day.
 Patane and Pam, and nameless nations more,
 Who rear their tents on Meoam's winding shore,
 Their vassal tribute yield to Siam's throne;
 And thousands more, of laws, of names unknown,

That vast of land inhabit⁶⁵. Proud and bold,
 Proud of their numbers here the Laos hold
 The far-spread lawns; the skirting hills obey
 The barbarous Avas and the Bramas' sway. 900
 Lo, distant far another mountain chain
 Rears its rude cliffs, the Guio's dread domain;
 Here brutalized the human form is seen,
 The manners fend-like as the brutal mien:
 With frothing jaws they suck the human blood,
 And gnaw the reeking limbs⁶⁶, their sweetest food;

Brama, and Siam, reduced to the most miserable state of desolation, the few natives who survived having left their country a habitation for wild beasts.

⁶³ See the same account of Sicily. Virg. Æn. iii.
⁶⁴ Sumatra has been by some esteemed the Ophir of the Holy Scriptures; but the superior firmness of the gold of Sofala, and its situation nearer the Red Sea, favour the claim of the latter. See Buchart, Geogr. Sacr.

⁶⁵ The extensive countries between India and China, where Ptolemy places his man-eaters, and where Mandeville found men without heads, who saw and spoke through holes in their breasts, continues still very imperfectly known. The Jesuits have told many extravagant lies of the wealth of these provinces. By the most authentic accounts they seem to have been peopled by colonies from China. The religion and manufactures of the Siamese, in particular, confess the resemblance. In some districts, however, they have greatly degenerated from the civilization of the mother country.

⁶⁶ Much has been said on this subject, some denying and others asserting the existence of anthropophagi or man-eaters. Porphyry (de Abstin. l. 4. § 21.) says that the Messagetæ and

* Ἰσχυροὶ γὰρ Μασσαγῆται; ἃ ἄλλοις ἀλλοδαποῖς ἡγίετο τὸν σισίον τὸν ἀνθρωποφάγον, καὶ ἀνθρώπων διὰ τὸ φάγεσθαι κτανάσθαι, ἢ ἰσχυροὶ τὸν φιλτάτου τὸν τὸν γυροφάγον.

Horrid with figured seams of burning steel
Their wolf-like frowns their ruthless lust reveal.

Derbices (people of north-eastern Asia) esteeming those most miserable whodied of sickness, killed and ate their parents and relations when they grew old, holding it more honourable thus to consume them, than that they should be destroyed by vermin. Hieronymus has adopted this, word for word, and has added to it an authority of his own. Quid loquar, says he, (Adv. Jov. l. ii. c. 6.) de cæteris nationibus; cum ipse adolescentulus in Gallia viderim Scotos, gentem Britannicam, humanis vesci caribus, et cum per sylvas porcorum greges et armentorum, pecudumque reperiant, pastorum gates, et fœminarum papillas sœvè abscindere, et has solas ciborum delicias arbitrari? Mandeville ought next to be cited: "Afterward men goe be many yles be see unto a yle that men clepen Milbe: there is a full cursed peple: they deleyten in ne thing more than to fighten and to sle men, and to drynken gladdest mannes blood, which they clepen Dien," p. 225. Yet whatever absurdity may appear on the face of these tales; and what can be more absurd, than to suppose that a few wild Scots or Irish (for the name was then proper to Ireland) should so lord it in Gaul, as to eat the breasts of the women and the hips of the shepherds? Yet whatever absurdities our Mandevilles may have obtruded on the public, the evidence of the fact is not thereby wholly destroyed. Though Dampier and other visitors of barbarous nations have assured us that they never met with any man-eaters, and though Voltaire has ridiculed the opinion, yet one may venture the assertion of their existence, without perking of a credulity similar to that of those foreigners, who believed that the men of Kent were born with tails like sheep, (see Lambert's Peramb.) the punishment inflicted upon them for the murder of Thomas à Becket. Many are the credible accounts, that different barbarous nations used to eat their prisoners of war. According to the authentic testimony of the best writers, many of the savage tribes of America, on their high festivals, brought forth their captives, and, after many barbarous ceremonies, at last roasted and greedily devoured their mangled limbs. Thus the fact was certain, long before a late voyage discovered the horrid practice in New Zealand. To drink human blood has been more common. The Gauls and other ancient nations practised it. When Magalhaens proposed Christianity to the king of Subo, a north-eastern Asiatic island, and when Francis de Castro discovered Santigana and other islands, a hundred leagues north of the Maluccos, the conversion of their kings was confirmed by each party drinking of the blood of the other. Our poet Spenser tells us, in his View of the State of Ireland, that he has seen the Irish drink human blood, particularly, he adds, "at the execution of a notable traitor at Limerick, called Murrough O'Brien, I saw an old woman, who was his foster-mother, take up his head whilst he was quartering, and suck up all the blood that ran thereout, saying, that the earth was not worthy to drink it, and therewith also steeped her face and breast and tore her hair, crying and shrieking most terribly." It is worthy of regard that the custom of marking themselves with hot irons, and tattooing, is the characteristic both of the Guicos of Camoëns and of the present inhabitants of New Zealand. And if, as its animals indicate, the island of Otabeite was first peopled by a shipwreck, the friendship existing in a small society might easily obliterate the memory of one custom, while the less unfriendly one of tattooing was handed down, a memorial that they owed their origin to the north-eastern parts of Asia, where that custom particularly prevails.

The fate of shipwreck on the Mecon's shore⁹⁸.

⁹⁷ That queen Elizabeth reigned in England, is not more certain than that the most ignorant nations in all ages have had the idea of a state after death. The same faculty which is conscious of existence, whispers the wish for it; and so little acquainted with the deductions of reasoning have some tribes been, that not only their animals, but even the ghosts of their domestic utensils have been believed to accompany them in the islands of the blessed. Long ere the voice of philosophy was heard, the opinion of an after-state was popular in Greece. The works of Homer bear incontestable evidence of this. And there is not a feature in the history of the human mind better ascertained, than that no sooner did speculation seize upon the topic, than belief declined; and, as the great Bacon observes, the most learned became the most atheistical ages. The reason of this is obvious. While the human mind is all simplicity, popular opinion is cordially received; but when reasoning begins, proof is expected, and deficiency of demonstration being perceived, doubt and disbelief naturally follow. Yet, strange as it may appear, if the writer's memory does not greatly deceive him, these certain facts were denied by Hobbes. If he is not greatly mistaken, that gentleman, who gave a wretched, a most unpoetical translation of Homer, has so grossly misunderstood his author, as to assert that his mention of a future state was not in conformity to the popular opinion of his age, but only his own poetical fiction. He might as well have assured us, that the sacrifices of Homer had never any existence in Greece. But as no absurdity is too gross for some geniuses, our murderer of Homer, our Hobbes, has likewise asserted, that the belief of the immortality of the human mind was the child of pride and speculation, unknown in Greece till long after the appearance of the Iliad.

moens suffered the unhappy shipwreck which rendered him the sport of fortune during the remainder of his life. Our poet mentions himself and the saving of his Lusiads with the greatest modesty. But though this indifference has its beauty in the original, it is certainly the part of a translator to add a warmth of colouring to a passage of this nature. For the literal translation of this place and further particulars, see the Life of Camoens.

According to Le Comte's Memoirs of China, and those of other travellers, the mariner's compass, fire-arms, and printing, were known in that empire, long ere the invention of these arts in Europe. But the accounts of De Halde, Le Comte, and the other Jesuits, are by no means to be depended on. It was their interest, in order to gain credit in Europe and at the court of Rome, to magnify the splendour of the empire where their mission lay, and they have magnified it into romance itself. It is pretended that the Chinese used fire-arms in their wars with Zenghis Khan, and Tamerlane; but it is also said that the Sogdianians used cannon against Alexander. The mention of any sulphurous composition in an old writer is with some immediately converted into a regular tire of artillery. The Chinese, indeed, on the first arrival of Europeans, had a kind of mortars, which they called fire-pans, but they were utter strangers to the smaller fire-arms. Verbiest, a Jesuit, was the first who taught them to make brass cannon set upon wheels. And even so late as the hostile menace which Anson gave them, they knew not how to level or manage their ordnance to any advantage. Their printing is indeed much more ancient than that of Europe, but it does not deserve the same name, the blocks of wood with which they stamp their sheets being as inferior to the use of, as different from the moveable types of Europe. The Chinese have no idea of the graces of fine writing; here most probably the fault exists in their language; but the total want of nature in their painting, and of symmetry in their architecture, in both of which they have so long been experienced, affords a heavy accusation against their genius. In improving every spot of their country by agriculture they are unequalled; and their taste in gardening has been highly praised. Nature, as it were friseur'd, however, and the gloomy vistas, adorned with gibbets, are certainly unpleasing. And even in their boasted gardening their genius stands accused. The art of ingrafting, known to ancient Greece, is still unknown to them. And hence their fruits are vastly inferior in flavour to those of the western world. The amazing wall of defence against the Tartars, though 1500 miles in extent, is a labour inferior to the canals, lined on the sides with hewn stone, which every where enrich and adorn their country; some of which reach 1000 miles, and are of depth to carry vessels of burden. These grand remains of antiquity prove there was a time when the Chinese were a much more accomplished people than at present. Though their princes for these many centuries have discovered no such efforts of genius as these, the industry of the people still remains, in which they rival and resemble the Dutch. In every other respect they are the most unamiable of mankind: amazingly uninventive; for, though possessed of them, the arts have made no progress among the Chinese these many centuries: even what they were taught by the Jesuits is almost lost: so false in their dealings, they boast that none but a Chinese can cheat a Chinese: the crime which disgraces human nature, is in this nation of atheists and the most stupid of all idolaters, common as that charter'd libertine, the air. Destitute even in idea of that elevation of soul, which is expressed by the best sense of the word piety, in the time of calamity whole provinces are desolated by self-murder; and end, as Hume says of some of the admired names of antiquity, not unworthy of so detestable a character: and, as it is always found congenial to baseness of heart, the most dastardly cowardice completes the description of that of the Chinese.

And here the trembling people sought the north,
 Ere time in Europe brought the wonder forth.

Unimproved as their arts is their learning. Though their language consists of few words, it is almost impossible for a stranger to attain the art of speaking it. And what an European learns ere he is seven years old, to read, is the labour of the life of a Chinese. In place of our 24 letters, they have more than 60,000 marks, which compose their writings; and their paucity of words, all of which may be attained in a few hours, requires such an infinite variety of tone and action, that the slightest mistake in modulation renders the speaker unintelligible. And in addressing a great man, in place of my lord, you may call him a beast, the word being the same, all the difference consisting in the tone of it. A language like this must ever be a bar to the progress and accomplishments of literature. Of medicine they are very ignorant. The ginseng, which they pretended was an universal remedy, is found to be a root of no singular virtue. Their books consist of odes without poetry, and of moral maxims, excellent in themselves, but without investigation or reasoning. For to philosophical discussion and the metaphysics they seem utterly strangers, and when taught the mathematics by the Jesuits, their greatest men were lost in astonishment. Whatever their political wisdom has been, at present it is narrow and barbarous. Jealous lest strangers should steal their arts, arts which are excelled at Dresden and other parts of Europe, they preclude themselves from the great advantages which arise from an intercourse with civilized nations. Yet in the last which they impose on every foreign ship which enters their ports for traffic, they even exceed the cunning and avarice of the Hollanders. In their internal policy the military government of Rome under the emperors is revived with accumulated barbarism. In every city and province the military are the constables and peace officers. What a picture is this! Nothing but Chinese or Dutch industry could preserve the traffic and population of a country under the control of armed ruffians. But hence the emperor has leisure to cultivate his gardens, and to write despicable odes to his concubines.

Whatever was their most ancient doctrine, certain it is that the legislators who formed the present system of China presented to their people no other object of worship than Tien Kamti, the material heavens and their influencing power; by which an intelligent principle is excluded. Yet finding that the human mind in the rudest breasts is conscious of its weakness, and prone to believe the occurrences of life under the power of lucky or unlucky observances, they permitted their people the use of sacrifices to these Lucretian gods of superstitious fear. Nor was the principle of devotion, imprinted by Heaven in the human heart, alone perverted; another unextinguishable passion was also misled. On tables, in every family, are written the names of the last three of their ancestors, added to each, Here rests his soul; and before these tables they burn incense and pay adoration. Confucius, who, according to their histories, had been in the west about 500 years before the Christian era, appears to be only the confirmer of their old opinions; but the accounts of him and his doctrine are involved in uncertainty. In their places of worship, however, boards are set up, inscribed, This is the seat of the soul of Confucius; and to these and their ancestors they celebrate solemn sacrifices, without seeming to possess any idea of the intellectual existence of the departed mind. The Jesuit Ricci, and his brethren of the Chinese mission, very honestly told their converts, that Tien was the god of the Christians, and that the label of Confucius was the term by which they expressed his divine majesty. But after a long and severe scrutiny at the court of Rome, Tien was found to signify nothing more than heavenly or universal matter, and the Jesuits of China were ordered to renounce this heresy. Among all the sects who worship different idols in China, there is only one who have any tolerable idea of the immortality of the soul; and among these, says Leland, Christianity at present obtains some footing. But the most interesting particular of China yet remains to be mentioned. Conscious of the obvious tendency, Voltaire and others triumphed in the great antiquity of the Chinese, and in the distant period they ascribe to the creation. But the bubble cannot bear the touch. If some Chinese accounts fix the era of creation 40,000 years ago, others are contented with no less than 884,953. But who knows not that every nation has its Geoffry of Monmouth? And we have already observed the legends which took their rise from the annus magnus of the Chaldean and Egyptian astronomers, an apparent revolution of the stars, which in reality has no existence. To the fanciful, who held this annus magnus, it seemed hard to suppose that our world was in its first revolution of the great year, and to suppose that many were past was easy. And that this was the case we have absolute proof in the doctrines of the Bramina, see the Inquiry, &c. end of Lusiad VII.) who, though they talk of hundreds of thousands of years which are past, yet confess, that this, the fourth world, has not yet attained its 6000th year. And much within this compass are all the credible proofs of Chinese antiquity comprehended. To three heads all these proofs are reducible: their form of government, which, till the conquest of the Tartars in 1644, bore the marks of the highest antiquity; their astronomical observation; and their history.

Simply and purely patriarchal, every father was the magistrate in his own family, and the emperor, who acted by his substitutes, the mandarines, was venerated and obeyed as the father of All. The most passive submission to authority thus branched out, was inculcated by Confucius and the other philosophers as the greatest duty of morality. But if there is an age in sacred or profane history, where the manners of mankind are thus delineated, no superior antiquity is proved by the form of Chinese government. Their ignorance of the very ancient art of ingrafting fruit-trees, and the state of their language, so like the Hebrew in its paucity of words, a paucity characteristic of the ages when the ideas of men required few syllables to clothe them, prove nothing further than the early separation of the Chinese colony* from the rest of mankind. Nothing further, except

* The Chinese colony! Yes, let philosophy smile; let her talk of the different species of men which are found in every country, let her brand as absurd the opinion of Montesquieu, which derives all the human race from one family. Let her enjoy her triumph. But let common sense be contented with the demonstration (see Whiston, Bentley, &c.) that a creation in every country is not wanted, and that one family is sufficient in every respect for the purpose. If philosophy will talk of black and white men as different in species, let common sense ask her for a demonstration, that climate and manner of life cannot produce this difference, and let her add, that there is the strongest presumptive experimental proof, that the difference thus happens. If philosophy draw her inferences from the different passions of different tribes; let common sense reply, that, stript of every accident of brutalization and urbanity, the human mind in all its faculties, all its motives, hopes and fears, is most wonderfully the same in every age and country. If philosophy talk of the impossibility of peopling distant islands and continents from one family, let common sense tell her to read Bryant's Mythology. If philosophy assert that the Celts, wherever they came, found aborigines, let common sense reply, there were tyrants enough almost 2000 years before their emigrations, to drive the wretched survivors of slaughtered hosts to the remotest wilds. She may also add, that many islands have been found which bore not one trace of mankind, and that even Otahite bears the evident marks of receiving its inhabitants from a shipwreck, its only animals being the hog, the dog, and the rat. In a word, let common sense say to philosophy, "I open my egg with a penknife, but you open yours with the blow of a sledge hammer."

Not built, created seems the frowning mound;
 O'er loftiest mountain tops and vales profound Extends the wondrous length, with warlike castles that they have continued till very lately without any material intercourse with the other nations of the world.

A continued succession of astronomical observations, for 4000 years, was claimed by the Chinese, when they were first visited by the Europeans. Voltaire, that son of truth, has often with great triumph mentioned the indubitable proofs of Chinese antiquity; but at these times he must have received his information from the same dream which told him that Camoëns accompanied his friend Gama in the voyage which discovered the East Indies. If Voltaire and his disciples will talk of Chinese astronomy and the 4000 years antiquity of its perfection, let them enjoy every consequence which may possibly result from it. But let them allow the same liberty to others. Let them allow others to draw their inferences from a few stubborn facts; facts which demonstrate the ignorance of the Chinese in astronomy. The Earth, they imagined, was a great plain, of which their country was the midst; and so ignorant were they of the cause of eclipses, that they believed the Sun and Moon were assaulted, and in danger of being devoured by a huge dragon. The stars were considered as the directors of human affairs; and thus their boasted astronomy ends in that silly imposition, judicial astrology. Though they had made some observations on the revolutions of the planets, and though in the emperor's palace there was an observatory, the first apparatus of proper instruments ever known in China was introduced by father Verbiest. After this it need scarcely be added, that their astronomical observations, which pretend an antiquity of 4000 years, are as false as a Welch genealogy, and that the Chinese themselves, when instructed by the Jesuits, were obliged to own that their calculations were erroneous and impossible. The great credit and admiration which their astronomical and mathematical knowledge procured to the Jesuits, afford an indubitable confirmation of these facts.

Ridiculous as their astronomical are their historical antiquities. After all Voltaire has said of it, the oldest date to which their history pretends is not much above 400 years. During this period 236 kings have reigned, of 22 different families. The first king reigned 100 years; then we have the names of some others, but without any detail of actions, or that concatenation of events which distinguishes authentic history. That mark of truth does not begin to appear for upwards of 2000 years of the Chinese legends. Little more than the names of kings, and these often interrupted with wide chasms, compose all the annals of China, till about the period of the Christian era. Something like a history then commences; but that is again interrupted by a wide chasm, which the Chinese know not how to fill up otherwise, than by asserting that a century or two elapsed in the time, and that at such a period a new family mounted the throne. Such is the history of China, full brother in every family feature to those ⁷⁶ Tartary, Siberia, Samoyada, Kamchatka, &c. A short account of the Grand Lama of Thibet Tartary shall complete our view of the superstitious of the east. While the other Pagans of Asia worship the most ugly monstrous idols, the Tartars of Thibet adore a real living god. He sits cross-legged on his throne in the great temple, adorned with gold and diamonds. He never speaks, but sometimes elevates his hand in token that he approves of the prayer of his worshippers. He is a ruddy well-looking young man, about 25 or 27, and is the most miserable wretch on Earth, being the mere puppet of his priests, who dispatch him whenever age or sickness makes any alteration in his features; and another, instructed to act his part, is put in his place. Princes of very distant provinces send tribute to this deity and implore his blessing, and, as Voltaire has merrily told us, think themselves secure of benediction, if favoured with something from his godship, esteemed more sacred than the hallowed oow-dung of the Bramins.

⁷⁷ By this beautiful metaphor, omitted by Castelnau, Camoëns alludes to the great success which in his time attended the Jesuit missionaries in Japan. James I. sent an embassy to the sovereign, and opened a trade with this country, but it was soon suffered to decline. The Dutch are the only Europeans who now traffic with the Japanese, which it is said they obtain by trampling on the cross and by abjuring the Christian name. In religion the Japanese are much the same as their neighbours of China. And in the frequency of self-murder, says Voltaire, they vie with their brother-islanders of England.

⁷³ Streams of this kind are common in many countries. Castera attributes this quality to the excessive cold of the waters, but this is a mistake. The waters of some springs are impregnated with stony particles, which adhering to the herbage or the clay on the banks of their channel, burden stone and incrust the original retainers.

Legendary tradition says, that Adam, after he was expelled from Paradise, did penance 300 years on this hill, on which he left the print of his footstep. This tale seems to be Jewish or Mahomedan, for the natives, according to captain Knox, who was twenty years a captive in Ceylon, pretend the impression was made by the god Buddow, when he ascended to Heaven, after having, for the salvation of mankind, appeared on the Earth. His priests beg charity for the sake of Buddow, whose worship they perform among groves of the Bogahah-tree, under which, when on Earth, they say, he usually sat and taught.

⁷⁸ The sublimity of this eulogy on the expedition of the Lusian has been already observed. What follows is a natural completion of the whole; and, the digressive exclamation at the end excepted, is exactly similar (see the Preface) to the manner in which Homer has concluded the Iliad.

⁷⁹ We are now presented with a beautiful view of the American world. Columbus discovered the West Indies before, but not the continent till 1498, the year after Gama sailed from Lisbon.

⁸⁰ Cabral, the first after Gama who sailed to India, was driven by a tempest to the Brazil's; a proof that more ancient voyagers might have met with the same fate. It is one of the finest countries in the new world, and still remains subject to the crown of Portugal.

⁸¹ Camoens, though he boasts of the actions of Magalbaens as an honour to Portugal, yet condemns his defection from his country, and calls him

"In deeds truly a Portuguese, but not in loyalty." And others have bestowed upon him the name of traitor, but perhaps undeservedly. Justice to the name of this great man requires an examination of the charge. Ere he entered into the service of the king of Spain, by a solemn act he unnaturalized himself. Osorius is very severe against this unavailing rite, and argues that no injury which a prince may possibly give, can authorize a subject to act the part of a traitor against his native country. This is certainly true, but it is not strictly applicable to the case of Magalhaens. Many eminent services performed in Africa and India encouraged him to aspire to the rank of fidalgó, or gentleman of the king's household, an honour which, though of little emolument, was esteemed as the reward of distinguished merit, and therefore highly valued. But for this, Magalhaens petitioned in vain. He found, says Faria, that the malicious accusations of some men had more weight with his sovereign than all his services. After this unworthy repulse, what patronage at the court of Lisbon could he hope? And though no injury can vindicate the man who draws his sword against his native country, yet no moral duty requires that he who has some important discovery in meditation should stifle his design, if uncountenanced by his native prince. It has been alleged, that he embroiled his country in disputes with Spain. But neither is this strictly applicable to the neglected Magalhaens. The courts of Spain and Portugal had solemnly settled the limits within which they were to make discoveries and settlements, and within these did Magalhaens and the court of Spain propose that his discoveries should terminate. And allowing that his calculations might mislead him beyond the bounds prescribed to the Spaniards, still his apology is clear; for it would have been injurious to each court, had he supposed that the faith of the boundary treaty would be trampled upon by either power. If it is said that he aggrandised the enemies of his country, the Spaniards, and introduced them to a dangerous rivalry with the Portuguese settlements, let the sentence of Faria on this subject be remembered: "Let princes beware," says he, "how by neglect or injustice they force into desperate actions the men who have merited rewards." As to rivalry, the case of Mr. Law, a North Briton, is apposite. This gentleman wrote an excellent treatise on the improvement of the trade and fisheries of his native country; but his proposals were totally neglected by the commissioners, whose office and duty it was to have patronised him. Was Law, therefore, to sit down in obscurity on a barren field, to stifle his genius, lest a foreign power, who might one day be at war with Great Britain, should be aggrandised by his efforts in commercial policy? No, surely. Deprived of the power of raising himself at home, Mr. Law went to France, where he became the founder of the Mississippi and other important schemes of commerce; yet Law was never branded with the name of traitor. The reason is obvious. The government of Great Britain was careless of what they lost in Mr. Law, but the Portuguese perceived their loss in Magalhaens, and their anger was vented in reproaches.

In the end of the 15th and beginning of the 16th centuries, the spirit of discovery broke forth in its greatest vigour. The east and the west had been visited by Gama and Columbus; and the bold idea of sailing to the east by the west was revived by Magalhaens;—revived; for, misled by Strabo and Pliny, who place India near the west of Spain, Columbus expected to find that country in a few weeks of westward voyage. Though America and the Moluccs were now found to be at a great distance from each other, the genius of Magalhaens still suggested the possibility of a western passage. And accordingly, possessed of his great design, and neglected with contempt at home, he offered his service to the court of Spain, and was accepted. With five ships and 250 men he sailed from Spain in September 1519, and after many difficulties, occasioned by mutiny and the extreme cold, he entered the great Pacific Ocean or South Seas by those straits which bear his Spanish name, Magellan. From these straits, in the 52^d degree of southern latitude, he traversed that great ocean, till in the 10th degree of north latitude he landed on the island of Subo or Marten. The king of this country was then at war with a neighbouring prince, and Magalhaens, on condition of his conversion to Christianity, became his auxiliary*. In two battles the Spaniards were victorious; but in the third, Magalhaens, together with one Martinho, a judicial astrologer, whom he usually consulted, was unfortunately killed. Chagrined with the disappointment of promised victory, the new baptized king of Subo made peace with his enemies, and having invited to an entertainment the Spaniards who were on shore, he treacherously poisoned them all. The wretched remains of the fleet arrived at the Portuguese settlements in the isles of Banda and Ternate, where they were received, says Faria, as friends, and not as intruding strangers; a proof that the boundary treaty was esteemed sufficiently sacred. Several of the adventurers were sent to India, and from thence to Spain, in Portuguese ships †, one ship only being in a condition to return to Europe by the Cape of Good Hope. This vessel, named the Vitoria, however, had the honour to be the first ship which ever surrounded the globe. Thus unhappily ended, says Osorius, the expedition of Magalhaens. But the good bishop was mistaken, for a few years after he wrote, and somewhat upwards of fifty after the return of the Vitoria, Philip II. of Spain availed himself of the discoveries of Magalhaens. And the navigation of the South Seas between Spanish America and the Asian Archipelago, at this day forms the basis of the power of Spain.

"Thus far, O favoured Lusians, bounteous Heaven
Your nation's glories to your view has given. 1071
What ensigns, blessing to the worn, pursue
The path of heroes, open'd first by you !
Still be it yours the first in fame to shine :
Thus shall your brides new chaplets still entwine,
With laurels ever new your brows enfold,
And braid your wavy locks with radiant gold.

"How calm the waves, how mild the halmy gale !
The halcyons call, ye Lusians, spread the sail !
Old Ocean now appeas'd shall rage no more, 1080
Haste, point the bowsprit to your native shore :
Soon shall the transports of the natal soil [toil."
O'erwhelm in bounding joy the thoughts of every

And soon the joyful heroes crowd the strand.

were about ten feet in height ; since which voyage they have risen and fallen in their stature, according to the different humours of our sea with.

We are now come to the conclusion of the fiction of the Island of Venus, a fiction which is divided into three principal parts. In each of these the poetical merit is obvious, nor need we fear to assert that the happiness of our author, in uniting all these parts together in one great episode, would have excited the admiration of Longinus. The heroes of the Lusiad receive their reward in the Island of Love. They are led to the palace of Thetis, where, during a divine feast, they hear the glorious victories and conquests of the heroes who are to succeed them in their Indian expedition, sung by a Syren ; and the face of the globe itself, described by the goddess, discovers the universe, and particularly the extent of the eastern world, now given to Europe by the success of Gama. Neither in the happiness or grandeur of completion may the Æneid or Odyssey be mentioned in comparison. The Illiad alone in epic conduct (as already observed) bears a strong resemblance. But however great in other views of poetical merit, the games at the funeral of Patroclus and the redemption of the body of Hector, considered as the interesting conclusion of a great whole, can never in propriety and grandeur be brought into competition with the admirable episode which concludes the poem on the Discovery of India.

Soon after the appearance of the Lusiad, the language of Spain was also enriched with an heroic poem. The author of this has often imitated the Portuguese poet, particularly in the fiction of the globe of the world, which is showed to Gama. In the arcanus, a globe, surrounded with a radiant sphere, is also miraculously supported in the air ; and on this an echaster shows to the Spaniards the extent of their dominions in the new world. But don Alonso d'Arcilla is in this, as in every other part of his poem, greatly inferior to the poetical spirit of Camoëns. Milton, whose poetical conduct in concluding the action of his Paradise Lost, as already pointed out, seems formed upon the Lusiad, appears to have had this passage particularly in his eye. For though the machinery of a visionary sphere was rather improper for the situation of his personages, he has nevertheless, though at the expense of an impossible supposition, given Adam a view of the terrestrial globe. Michael sets the father of mankind on a mountain,

From whose top

The hemisphere of earth in clearest ken
Stretch'd out to th' amplest reach of prospect lay—
His eye might there command wherever stood
City of old or modern fame, the seat
Of mightiest empire, from the destined walls
Of Cambalu—, &c.
On Europe thence and where Rome was to sway
The world—

And even the mention of America seems copied by Milton :

—in spirit perhaps he also saw

Rich Mexico, the seat of Montezume,
And Cusco in Peru, the richer seat
Of Atabalipa, and yet unspoil'd
Guiana, whose great city Geryon's sons
Call El Dorado—

It must also be owned by the warmest admirer of the Paradise Lost, that if the names enumerated by Milton convey grandeur of idea, the description of America in Camoëns,

Vedes a grande terra, que continua
Vai de Calisto ao seu contrario polo—

To farther north that world enormous bends,
And cold beneath the southern pole-star ends—
is certainly more picturesque ; and therefore, at least, not less poetical.

Some short account of the writers, whose authorities have been adduced in the course of these notes, may not now be improper. Fernando Lopez de Castagneda went to India on purpose to do honour to his countrymen, by enabling himself to record their actions and conquests in the east. As he was one of the first writers on that subject, his geography is often imperfect. This defect is remedied in the writings of John de Barros, who was particularly attentive to this head. But the two most eminent, as well as fullest writers on the transactions of the Portuguese in the east, are Manuel de Faria y Sousa, knight of the order of Christ, and Hieronimus Osorius, bishop of Sylves. Faria, who wrote in Spanish, was a laborious inquirer, and is very full and circumstantial. With honest indignation he reprehends the rapine of commanders, and the errors and unworthy resentments of kings. But he is often so drily particular, that he may rather be called a journalist than a historian. And by this uninteresting minuteness, his style for the greatest part is rendered inelegant. The bishop of Sylves, however, claims a different character. His Latin is elegant, and his

Nor leave the youths their lovely brides behind,
 In wedded bands, while time glides on, conjoin'd :
 Fair as immortal fame in smiles array'd, 1090
 In bridal smiles, attends each lovely maid.
 O'er India's sea, wing'd on by balmy gales
 That whisper'd peace, soft swell'd the steady sails :
 Smooth as on wing unmoved the eagle flies,
 When to his eyrie cliff he sails the skies,
 Swift o'er the gentle billows of the tide,
 So smooth, so soft, the prow of Gama glide ;
 And now their native fields, for ever dear,
 In all their wild transporting charms appear ;
 And Tago's bosom, while his banks repeat 1100
 The sounding peals of joy, receives the fleet.
 With orient titles and immortal fame
 The hero band adorn their monarch's name ;
 Sceptres and crowns beneath his feet they lay,
 And the wide east is doom'd to Lusian sway *.

Enough, my Muse, thy wearied wing no more
 Must to the seat of Jove triumphant soar.
 Chill'd by my nation's cold neglect, thy fires
 Glow bold no more, and all thy rage expires.
 Yet thou, Sebastian, thou, my king, attend ; 1110
 Behold what glories on thy throne descend !
 Shall haughty Gaul or sterner Albion boast
 That all the Lusian fame in thee is lost !
 Oh ! be it thine these glories to renew,
 And John's bold path and Pedro's course pursue † :
 Snatch from the tyrant noble's hand the sword,
 And be the rights of human-kind restored ;

manly and sentimental manner entitles him to the name of historian, even where a Livy or a Tacitus is mentioned. But a sentence from himself, unexpected in a father of the communion of Rome, will characterize the liberality of his mind. Talking of the edict of king Emmanuel, which compelled the Jews to embrace Christianity, under severe persecution : Nec ex lege, nec ex religione factum tibi assumas, (says he,) ut libertatem voluntatis impediatis, et vincula mentibus effrenatis injiciatis ? At id neque fieri potest, neque Christi sanctissimum nomen approbat. Voluntarium enim sacrificium non vi mala coactum ab hominibus expetit: neque vim mentibus inferri, sed voluntates ad studium veræ religionis allici et lavitari jubet.

It is said, in the Preface to Oronius, that his writings were highly esteemed by queen Mary of England, wife of Philip II. What a pity is it, that this manly indignation of the good bishop against the impiety of religious persecution, made no impression on the mind of that bigoted princess !

* Thus in all the force of ancient simplicity, and the true sublime, ends the poem of Camoëns. What follows, is one of those exuberances we have already endeavoured to defend in our author, nor in the strictest sense is this concluding one without propriety. A part of the proposition of the poem is artfully addressed to king Sebastian, and he is now called upon in an address, which is an artful second part to the former, to behold and preserve the glories of his throne.

† John I. and Pedro the Just, two of the greatest of the Portuguese monarchs.

The statesman prelate to his vows confine,
 Alone auspicious at the holy shrine ; [its fires,
 The priest, in whose meek heart Heaven pours
 Alone to Heaven, not Earth's vain pomp, aspires,
 Nor let the Muse, great king, on Tago's shore,
 In dying notes the barbarous age deplore.
 The king or hero to the Muse unjust
 Sinks as the nameless slave, extinct in dust.
 But such the deeds thy radiant morn portends,
 As'd by thy frown e'en now old Atlas bends
 His hoary head, and Atpehuza's fields
 Expect thy sounding steeds and rattling ahfelds.
 And shall these deeds unsung, unknown, expire ?
 Oh, would thy smiles relume thy fainting ire ! 1131
 I then inspired, the wondering world should see
 Great Ammon's warlike son revived in thee † ;
 Revived, unenvied of the Muse's flame
 That o'er the world resounds Pelides' name.

* Thus imitated, or rather translated into Italian by Guarini.

Con sì sublime stil' forse cantato
 Harrei del mio Signor l'armi e l'honori
 Ch' or non havria de la Meonia trumba
 Da invidiar Achille—

Similarity of condition, we have already observed, produced similarity of complaint and sentiment in Spenser and Camoëns. Each was unworthily neglected by the Gothic grandees of his age, yet both their names will live, when the remembrance of the courtiers who spurned them shall sink beneath their mountain tombs. Three beautiful stanzas from Phineas Fletcher's Purple Island, on the memory of Spenser, may also serve as an epitaph for Camoëns. The unworthy neglect, which was the lot of the Portuguese bard, but too well appropriates to him the elegy of Spenser. And every reader of taste, who has perused the Lusiad, will think of the cardinal Henrique, and feel the indignation of these manly lines—

Witnesse our Colin †, whom tho' all the Graces
 And all the Muses nurs'd ; whose well-taught song
 Parnassus self and Glorian † embraces,
 And all the learn'd and all the shepherds throng ;
 Yet all his hopes were crost, all suits deny'd ;
 Discourag'd, scorn'd, his writings vilify'd : [died.
 Poorly (poor man) he liv'd ; poorly (poor man) he
 And had not that great hart (whose honour'd †)
 Ah lies full low] pity'd thy woful plight, [head
 There hadst thou lien unwept, unburied,
 Unblest, nor grac'd with any common rite :
 Yet shalt thou live, when thy great foe † shall sink
 Beneath his mountain tombe, whose fame shall stink ;
 And time his blacker name shall blur with blackness ink.

O let th' Iambic Muse revenge that wrong
 Which cannot slumber in thy sheets of lead ;
 Let thy abused honour cry as long
 As there be quills to write, or eyes to read ;
 On his rank name let thine own votes be turn'd,
 " Oh may that man that hath the Muse's scorn'd, Alive, nor dead, be ever of a Muse adorn'd !"

* Colin Clout, Spenser.

† Glorian, Elizabeth in the Faerie Queene.
