PREFACE TO ORLANDO FURIOSO.

THE fabulous histories of wandering knights, distressed damsels, giants, enchanted castles, and the whole train of legendary adventures, that for a long time were the delight of our ancestors, are now universally exploded: the inimitable satire of Cervantes has contributed not a little to bring them into disrepute: but however justly he may have ridiculed their many absurdities, yet, perhaps, we have too rashly adopted the contempt, which almost every one now professes, for writings, from which it is certain that the greatest poets have derived many fine images; to which we are, probably, in a great measure, indebted for the Fairy Queen of our admired Spenser, and which have been the foundation of the Orlando Furioso, that has procured to its author the appellation of Divine.

The Italians have among them many works of a similar nature with this poem, being accustomed to translate, or compose romances in the octavo stanza. Among others, Bernardo Tasso, the father of the great Torquato, published a free translation of the Amadis de Gaul, divided into one hundred cantos: but the much greater part of these performances are not to be considered as rising to any degree of competition with Ariosto, being little else than wild stories of chivalry, with scarce any tincture of poetical imagery and expression; or heavy dull narratives of fiction without imagination, and of events without interest.

Most of these poems, or rather rhyming romances, are drawn from the current romances of the times; such as the history of king Arthur and his round table, and the account of Merlin and his prophecies: but the chief of them are built on the romantic history of Charlemain, and the twelve peers of France, called Paladins; which was a title of honour given by Charlemain to that number of valiant men belonging to his court, who employed their arms in defence of the faith. The principal of these was Orlando, the great hero of chivalry, whose fabulous achievements filled all the books and provincial songs of that age. It is recorded, that when William the Conqueror marched with his Normans to engage Harold, at the memorable battle of Hastings, his soldiers animated each other by singing the popular ballad of the exploits of Roland, or Orlando.

Dr. Burney, in his elegant History of Music, a book not merely professional, as the title might seem to indicate, but full of general information, has presented us with a great literary curiosity in this old military song, which he thus introduces: "Charlemain had a great passion for these heroic songs, and, like our Alfred, not only had them collected, but knew them by heart. One of these, in praise of Roland, the Orlando Incemorato, and the Furioso, of Boyardo, Berni, and Ariosto, was longer preserved than any of the rest. This, the French historians tell us, was begun at the battle of Hastings, by a knight called Taillefer, on whom this honour was conferred for his strong and powerful voice. Here he performed the office of herald minstrel at the head of the Norman army, and was among the first that fell in the onset." The song, to which I beg to refer the reader, so far as it is preserved, affords an admirable picture of the rough martial spirit of the times. I have here inserted one stanza, with the translation, that gives, though in a ludicrous vein, the exact character of Orlando, as drawn by the romance writers.

Pour l'ennemi qui resistoit,
Reservant toute son audace,
A celui qui se soumettoit,
Il accordoit toujours sa grace.
L'humanité dans son grand cœur,
Revenoit après la victoire,
Et le soir même le vainqueur
Au vaincu proposoit à boire.

PREFACE TO ORLANDO FURIOSO.

On stubborn foes he vengeance wreak'd,
 And laid about him like a Tartar;
 But if for mercy once they squeak'd,
 He was the first to grant them quarter.
 The battle won, of Roland's soul
 Each milder virtue took possession:
 To vanquish'd foes he o'er a bow!
 His heart surrender'd at discretion.

"The song," says Dr. Burney, "upon Roland, continued in favour among the French soldiers, so late as the battle of Poitiers, in the time of their king John, who, upon reproaching one of them with singing at a time when there were no Rolands left, was answered, that Rolands would be found if they had a Charlemain at their head!"

The romance of Charlemain is said to have been the production of a monk, about two hundred years after the time of that prince: to this story the author has prefixed the name of Turpin, archbishop of Rheims, a prelate of reputation, who accompanied Charlemain in most of his expeditions, and is reported to have written his life; which work is supposed to be lost.

The most celebrated of the Italian poems of the romance kind, before Ariosto, are the Morgante Maggiore of Pulci, and the Orlando Innamorato of Boyardo. The first of these was published in the year 1488, and has its name from Morgante a giant, the principal personage of the poem, whom the poet converts to Christianity, and makes the companion of Orlando in his adventures. This poem, which is of a very singular nature, concludes with the death of Orlando, and the defeat of the Christians in the valley of Roccavalles; and is thought by some to be entirely a burlesque on the fable of the Paladins: but though many parts of it may appear to be ludicrous, yet others are undoubtedly serious; as the relation of Orlando's death, where that hero, before he departs from life, utters a very devout prayer, which surely no imagination can construe into ridicule. The Italians have indeed many burlesque poems, and among others, one entitled Ricciardetto, written about the year 1700, wherein the characters of Orlando, Rinaldo, and other heroes of romance, are introduced evidently to ridicule the actions related of them, which ridicule consists in carrying the fictions to the highest pitch of incredibility: among other passages, the author describes a tree, the branches of which extended twenty miles round; at the foot of which was a damsel ready to be devoured by two toads, that are represented so large as to be capable of encountering with a whale. In another place, Orlandino and Rinaldaccio, the sons of Orlando and Rinaldo, attack the dwelling of Death, have a personal engagement with him, and by force take from him his scythe and darts. In fictions of this kind the intention of the poet is apparent; accordingly Ricciardetto is placed by Mr. Baretto among the mock epics, while the poems of Pulci, Boyardo, and Ariosto, are all ranked by him in the number of serious pieces.

Baillet, in his review of modern poets, seems to have little knowledge of Pulci, and only quotes the opinion of Father Rapin, who affirms that Pulci, in his poem of Morgante, observes no propriety, and appears to have debauched his fancy by the perusal of books of chivalry. But Monnoye, in his notes on Baillet, delivers himself thus: "Luigi Pulci was a Florentine, and undertook his Morgante at the instigation of Lucrezia Tomabuoni, the mother of Laurence de Médicis. This extraordinary poem, which is in the octavo stanza, is divided into twenty-eight cantos: the author has observed no rules in the composition of his work, and this not from a designed neglect, as Vincentio Gravina professes to believe, but because he was entirely ignorant of them. He has, without any regard to the judgment of the critics, confounded time and place, united the serious with the comic, and made the giant, his hero, die in a burlesque manner, by the bite of a sea-crab in his heel; which event happens in the 20th canto, so that he is spoken of no more in the eight following. The beauty of his narrative, however, compensates for all his faults, and the lovers of the Florentine dialect are to this day delighted with the Morgante. Some writers attribute this poem to Politian, and affirm that Pulci had it from him; but this appears very improbable, as all the Italian poems we have of Politian are in a very different style."

Mr. Baretto, in his account of the manners and customs of Italy, speaks thus of Pulci: "It is reported by the biographer of Luigi Pulci, that this poet, who flourished about the year 1450, used often to sing long cantos extempore at the table of Laurence de Medicis. It is even pretended he afterwards put into writing many of those cantos, by the advice and assistance of Laurence himself, Argyropolo, Politian, Giambullari, Marsilius Ficinus, and other learned men, familiarly admitted to the table of that famous patron of learning; and that the Morgante Maggiore was thus formed, a long poem of the epic kind, incoherent indeed and full of extravagancies, yet no less delightful than the Furioso itself."

But whatever merit Pulci may have with an Italian, he would be little relished by a mere English reader, to whom his fictions must appear highly extravagant, and his humour puerile and absurd: nor indeed could we bear, what must appear to us an unaccountable mixture of religion, heroism, chivalry, and buffoonery. The exordium of his poem is almost word for word from the beginning of St. John's Gospel³, and every canto opens with a religious address, or allusion to some point of scripture, which unaccountable practice seems to have been pursued by most of these kind of romance writers of that age.

It is to be observed, that though many of the names in Pulci are the same in Boyardo and Ariosto, yet the actions of the first have no sort of connection with those of the last mentioned poets.

In the year 1496, Matteo Maria Boyardo, count of Scandiano, published his Orlando Innamorato, the subject of which is the falling in love of Orlando, and the great actions performed by him for Angelica, in various parts of the world, interspersed with the adventures of many other personages, most of whom afterwards make their appearance in the Furioso.

It is said by Castelvetro, that the names of Agramant, Sacripant, Gradasso, &c. given to the heroes of Boyardo's romance, were the real names of the vassals of that count, living in Scandiano, a principality of the Modenese⁴.

This may perhaps be the case with respect to many of the names made use of by him; but it cannot be so with Agramant, Orlando, Rinaldo, Olivero, and others, that are known to have been popular in the current romances of the times.

This work abounds with a great variety of entertaining incidents, Boyardo being reckoned, by some, one of the greatest inventors that Italy ever produced: but as he was esteemed very inferior to Pulci in point of language and versification, though far beyond him in other respects, Dominichi attempted to reduce his poem to better Italian; and about fifty years after Boyardo's death, Francesco Berni, the modern Catullus of Italy, undertook to versify it again, and published his Rifacimento⁵ of the Orlando Innamorato, which met with such general approbation, that the original poem was soon neglected, and at this time the genuine work of Boyardo is little attended to. Berni was not satisfied with making the versification of this poem better; he inserted many stanzas of his own, and changed almost all the beginnings of the cantos, introducing each, after the manner of Ariosto, with some moral reflection arising from the subject.

Of the Orlando Innamorato no translation has appeared in English; and indeed, though it is a work highly entertaining in Berni's dress, it would scarce admit of a translation into English verse, the narrative descending to such familiar images and expressions as would by no means suit the genius of our language and poetry. In the year 1716, the celebrated Le Sage, author of Gil Blas, published in French a prose translation, or rather paraphrase, under the title of Roland L'Amoureux, in which he has taken considerable liberties with his author, not only changing the order of the incidents, but very often altering the fables, retrenching from the Italian, and adding circumstances of his own; not observing, in this conduct, the example of Berni, who has religiously adhered to the stories, as related by Boyardo, and which have not received any improvement from the imagination of the French translator.

The poem of Orlando Innamorato, though very long, consisting of 69 cantos, divided into three books, was left unfinished by the death of its author: several continuations were written by different persons, particularly one by Nicolo Agostini, in three books: but all these, being greatly inferior to Boyardo, were disregarded, till, in the year 1515, Ariosto, having taken up the same subject, gave the world his Orlando Furioso, which not only eclipsed all the other continuators of Orlando, but greatly surpassed the performance of Boyardo himself.

The poems of Boyardo and Ariosto, taken together, form a complete series of events, and require little or no reference to other romance writers, to give the reader a perfect knowledge of their story. Ariosto, indeed, is intimately connected with the narrative of Boyardo in the general plan of his poem, and in the continuation of several under parts; but Boyardo does not appear, in one instance, to have taken up and continued any single story from another. It is however certain that these poets have derived their general fable from various books and poems on the wars of Charlemain, and the actions of his Paladins, and other subjects of chivalry; and that both have frequent allusions to incidents recorded in these books, and particularly in one apparently prior to Boyardo, entitled Aspramonte, in cui si contiene le guerre di Re Guarnieri et Agolante contra Rotna e Carlo Magno, e di altre guerre e battaglie, massime dello avvenimento d'Orlando e di molti altri Reali di Francia. This book is in 23 cantos, in ottava rima; the date and author are altogether uncertain; but from many peculiarities of style and idiom, which strongly resemble the very early writers, it was probably written, if not before, about the time of Pulci; and the beginnings of all the cantos have the same strange allusions to scripture doctrine and story as the Morgante. As to the performance itself, it may be classed with the greater part of the numerous publications of the same nature, but will always retain a value from the consideration that it might have been the principal source of the Orlando Innamorato and Furioso.

With respect to the separate merits of Boyardo and Ariosto; Le Sage, in the preface to his translation, gives the following character of the two poets:

“These authors have given a free scope to their imagination, which in both was equally noble and lively: if Boyardo has the merit of invention, Ariosto, in return, has every advantage of style and manner, and the copy is doubtless greatly superior to the original. Ariosto is far more polished, his diction is chaster, and he possesses all the elegance of language: his verses are strong and honourous; his descriptions are admirable and often sublime. On the contrary, Boyardo is always grovelling and feeble: Ariosto, whether serious or pleasant, is every where entertaining, and preserves a degree of majesty even in his pleasantry: he is the only author who has found out the art of blending the serious with the comic, and the heroic with the familiar; by which means he is truly original, and such an original as no one has yet successfully imitated.”

I shall not enter upon the comparative merits of Tasso and Ariosto: the Italians, in general, give the preference to the Orlando, and other nations allot the first place to the Jerusalem, which undoubtedly has the advantage with respect to unity of design, regularity of disposition, and dignity of subject: these poems are of so different a nature, that they will not admit of a comparison. Mirabeau, the French translator of the Jerusalem, observes, that this matter cannot be more judiciously discussed, than in the words of Horatio Ariosto; nephew to Ludovico, who, however biased to give the palm to his uncle, has delivered himself in the following manner:

“We cannot easily enter upon a comparison of these two poets, who have not the least resemblance to each other: the style of the one is throughout serious and elevated, that of the other is often simple and full of pleasantry. Tasso has observed the precepts of Aristotle; Ariosto has taken no guide but nature; Tasso, by subjecting himself to the unity of action, has deprived his poem of a considerable advantage derived from the multiplicity of events; whereas Ariosto, being freed from such restraint, has filled his with a number of incidents that are very delightful to the reader: these great poets have nevertheless both attained the same end—that of pleasing; but they have attained it by different means.”

Girafolo tells us, that from the first publication of his poem in 1515, to the year 1552, when he gave an edition, with his last corrections and improvements, enlarged to the number of 46 cantos, Ariosto was continually revising and altering it, occasionally applying to the first wits in Italy for their opinion and advice, such as Bembo, Melzo, Novagero, and others mentioned in his concluding book; and that, like Apelles, he submitted his work to the criticisms of all that would examine it.

Ariosto has been called by some a comic poet; but it should seem that such an opinion must be formed, for want of due attention to the several parts of his work, which is undoubtedly serious upon the whole, though occasionally diversified with many sallies of humour. But should we, on this account, deny Ariosto the essentials of epic poetry, we must, with equal justice, refuse the tragic laurel to our own Shakespeare, because his plays are not pure tragedies. Our bard, in his dramatic representation, has drawn his whole picture from the natural world, where events are blended, and where not only the moral characters are varied, but where the same character is seen with very different aspect, at different times⁶.

But whatever liberties we may allow an author like Ariosto, with respect to mixture of character or style, yet proverbial and ludicrous expressions, or vulgar images, immediately mixed with subjects of pathos, or elevation, must be ever disgusting. On this occasion the author of the Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope makes some excellent remarks, which he is led to from some passages of this kind introduced by Mr. Pope in his Temple of Fame.

"Strokes of pleasantry and humour, and satirical reflections on the foibles of common life, are surely too familiar, and unsuited to a grave and majestic poem⁷. Such incongruities offend propriety, though I know ingenious persons have endeavoured to excuse them, by saying that they add a variety of imagery to the piece. This precept is even defended by a passage from Horace :

Et sermone opus est modo tristi, sepe jocoso,
Defendente vicem modo rhetoris atque poetæ,
Interdum urbani, parcentis viribus, atque
Extenuantis eas consulto⁸.

Lib. 1. sat. 10. ver. 11.

"But this judicious remark is, I apprehend, confined to ethic and preceptive kinds of writing, which stand in need of being enlivened with lighter images and sportive thoughts, and where strictures on common life may more gracefully be inserted. But in the higher kinds of poetry, they appear as unnatural and out of place, as one of the burlesque scenes of Helmkirke would do in a solemn landscape of Poussin.

"On the revival of literature the first writers seemed not to have observed any selection in their thoughts and images. Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, Ariosto, make very sudden transitions from the sublime to the ridiculous. Chaucer, in his Temple of Mars, among many pictures, has brought in a strange line :

The coke is scalded for all his long ladell.

"Again,

As Æsop's dogs contending for the bone⁹.

"No writer has more religiously observed the decorum here recommended than Virgil¹⁰."

If we examine the poems of Boyardo and Ariosto, we shall find that the second, with respect to the epic part, the wars of Charlemain and Agramant, is not defective in point of unity, as it sets forth one great action, the invasion of France by the Saracens, and concludes with the victory of the Christians by the death or defeat of all the Pagan leaders, although this great action is broken and interrupted, from time to time, by an infinity of episodes and romantic adventures, artfully connected with each other and interwoven with the general fable. But Boyardo has no pretence to unity in any part of his vast and heterogeneous composition, which, beside the lesser incidents, consists of three distinct great actions: the invasion of France by Gradassa, for the conquest of Durindana and Boyardo; the siege of Albracca by Agrican king of Tartary, and the other enemies of Calaphron, and his daughter Angelica; and the invasion of France by Agramant to revenge the death of Troyano.

But, notwithstanding Ariosto has undoubtedly a better claim to unity of action and regularity of design than his predecessor, yet it is very plain that he never intended to write a regular epic poem, but that he adopted the fashionable mode of that time. As an instance of the taste then prevalent for the wild and desultory narratives of romance, it is said, that when Bernardo Tasso conceived the design

⁶ See Dr. Johnson's preface to Shakespeare.

⁷ What is here said of an entire poem may equally be applied to any part of a poem that comes under this description.

⁸ Now change from grave to gay with ready art,
Now play the orator's or poet's part:
In raillery assume a gayer air,
Discreetly hide your strength, your vigour spare.—FRANCIS

⁹ Dryden has turned the first line thus :

of composing a poem from the Amadis de Gaul, he had at first reduced it to the plan of a regular epic, and in that state read part of it to his friends, who gave it so cool a reception, that he thought it advisable to change his purpose, and treat his subject in the same manner as the other popular writers, or romanzatori ¹¹.

Thus Ariosto, having undertaken to continue a well-known story, begun and left unfinished by Boyardo, was necessarily led to vary his narrative and diction as the different subjects required; and therefore in him is to be found a greater variety of style and manner, than perhaps in any other author.

From the romantic turn of this fable, and the motley character of his writing, many of the French critics, and some others, have been induced, in the cool phlegm of criticism, to pass the severest censures on Ariosto; but it will be seen that such censures are in general futile, being founded on the mistaken opinion, that the Orlando is to be tried by the rules of Aristotle, and the examples of Homer and Virgil: but as no writers of real taste, however strongly prejudiced with the idea of classic excellence, could peruse the Italian poem without sensibly feeling its beauties, it follows that their observations often appear a contradictory mixture of praise and censure, of which the reader will have some idea from the following passages of Baillet, in his Jugemens des savans ¹².

"It is a general received opinion in Italy, that the Orlando Furioso has entirely surpassed every performance that appeared before it, particularly the Orlando of Boyardo, and the Morgante of Pulci: the last by dignity of incidents and majesty of versification, and the former by completing and bringing to perfection the inventions of the count ¹³. M. Rosteau gives it as his opinion, that the Orlando Furioso had no superior, or rival, till the Godfrey of Tasso, which appeared afterwards in the world.

"Never was any other piece filled with so many and various events as the poem of Ariosto: the whole is a mixture of combats, enchantments, and grotesque adventures; and it is said, that the wits of Italy are still divided concerning the merits of this work and the Jerusalem Delivered.

"The Orlando seems to be a trophy raised from the spoils of every other Italian production, in which the author has neglected nothing that his genius or industry could supply him with, in order to enrich his poem, and give it the utmost perfection.

"Father Rapin has discovered many blemishes in the Orlando Furioso ¹⁴. In one part he finds that the poet has too much fire; in another, that he is crowded with supernatural events, which are like the crude imaginations of a distempered brain, and which can never be admitted by men of sense, as bearing no resemblance of truth.

"He says, besides, that his design is too vast, without proportion or justness; that his episodes are affected, improbable, injudiciously introduced, and often out of nature; that his heroes are only Paladins, and that his poem breathes more an air of romantic chivalry than a spirit of heroism.

"In other places, he confesses that Ariosto is pure, elevated, sublime, and admirable in expression; that his descriptions are master-pieces, but that he is altogether deficient in judgment; that the beauty of his expression, joined to the other charms of his versification, has imposed upon the world, and so far dazzled our poets, as to prevent their discovering his many absurdities. 'His genius,' continues Rapin, 'resembles those fertile lands that produce, at the same time, weeds and flowers; and though the several parts of his poem are very beautiful, yet the whole, when taken together, does not deserve the title of an epic poem.'¹⁵

Gravina, an Italian critic, of great taste and judgment, gives the following opinion of Ariosto: "After Boyardo, Ariosto took up the same story, but in a far more exalted strain of poetry, and gave a complete ending to the unfinished invention of his predecessor, interspersing every part of his narrative with strong and masterly pictures of the passions and habits of mankind, in so much, that the Furioso may be considered as an assemblage of all that actuates the human mind, love, hatred, jealousy, avarice, anger, and ambition, in their natural colours, with an infinity of examples of the punishments attendant upon vice. In Boyardo and Ariosto is to be seen the true system of honour known by the name of chivalry. I shall not dwell upon the philosophical and theological doctrines in various parts of Ariosto's poem, particularly in the cantos where St. John and Astolpho are introduced together. But this poet would not have attained his purpose, nor would posterity have found in him that lesson of instruction which is ever the province of poetry, if his work had only described the exalted comes of life, and not descended sometimes to the familiar and common manners, that every rank and station might meet with correction or reproof. For as in Homer, likewise in Ariosto, the general sublimity of character does not exclude the introduction, though rare, yet sometimes necessary, of passages of a lower order. To such a diversity of matter must be joined a diversity of style, which Ariosto has properly observed. In descriptions of dignity, the dignified style must be used; but where the passage approaches to common life, an humble phrase is required. In this respect Ariosto is superior to many, always rising and sinking with his subject. He is indeed reprehensible for the disagreeable breaks in his narrative, and for mingling sometimes, injudiciously, ludicrous reflections or licentious allusions with the most serious matter, for a strain of extravagant hyperbole, sometimes for the use of low and vulgar expressions, for his long and tedious digressions on the families of Ferrara, and his mistress. But such is the power of Ariosto, that while his work is perusing, almost all his faults and blemishes are lost in the multitude of his excellencies¹⁵.

Among the modern writers, Voltaire has been very severe upon Ariosto, particularly in his essay on epic poetry, where he speaks of him in the following invidious manner:

"Some readers," says he, "will be surprised, that Ariosto is not placed among the epic poets; but it will be proper to observe to them, that no one, speaking of tragedy, would mention l'Avare or *le Grandeur*¹⁶; and whatever may be the opinion of some Italians, the rest of Europe will never place Ariosto on a level with Tasso, till Don Quixote is ranked with the Æneid, or Callot with Corregio."

The same Voltaire, who has so far degraded Ariosto in the above passage, has since delivered his sentiments very differently, in a work lately published¹⁷, from which, for the uncommonness of the subject, and the manner in which he has treated it, I shall translate such passages as immediately relate to the present inquiry.

"The Odyssey of Homer," says he, "seems to have been the model of the Morgante, the Orlando Imamorato, and the Orlando Furioso; and, what rarely happens, the last of these poems is indubitably the best.

"The companions of Ulysses transformed to swine; the winds enclosed in a goat's-skin; musicians with tails of fishes, who devour those that approach them; Ulysses, who follows naked the chariot of a beautiful princess on her return from washing her garments; the same Ulysses disguised like a beggar, requesting alms, and afterwards killing all the suitors of his old wife, assisted only by his son and two servants; these are imaginations that have given rise to all the romances in verse, that have since been written on similar subjects.

"But the romance of Ariosto is so extensive, so full of variety, so fruitful in every kind of beauty, that after having perused it, I have more than once found my appetite excited to begin it again; and yet I could never read a single canto of this poem in our prose translations: such are the charms of natural poetry!

"What excited particularly my admiration in this wonderful performance, was the uncommon genius that seems to raise the author above his subject, which he treats with a kind of sportive negligence: he says the sublimest things with the utmost ease, and often concludes them with a stroke of refined and well-timed pleasantry. The Orlando Furioso is at once the Iliad, the Odyssey, and the Don Quixote; for the principal knight-errant runs mad, like the Spanish hero, but is infinitely more entertaining. We are interested for Orlando, but we take no part in the fortune of Don Quixote, who is represented by Cervantes, as a madman, exposed to universal derision.

"The Orlando Furioso has a merit altogether unknown to the writers of antiquity; which merit is exhibited in the openings of the several cantos. Each canto is an enchanted palace, the vestibule of which is always in a different style, sometimes majestic, sometimes simple, and sometimes grotesque. The poet is, by turns, moral, pleasant, and gallant, but never departs from truth and nature."

Voltaire, having then asserted that Ariosto equals Homer in his battles, and given some examples to support his assertion, proceeds thus:

"Ariosto has the peculiar talent of making a transition, from these descriptions of terrour, to the most voluptuous pictures, and from these last he can, with equal ease, change his subject to the refined doctrines of morality: but the greatest art of the poet appears in his interesting us so strongly for his heroes and heroines, though they are so many and various: the pathetic incidents in his poem are almost equal in number to the grotesque adventures; and his reader is so pleasantly accustomed to this mixture, that the change steals upon him with the least seeming violence.

"I know not who it was that first propagated the pretended question of cardinal Hippolito to the author; Messèr Ludovico, dove havete pigliate tante coglionerie? Signor Ludovico, where did you find so many absurdities? The cardinal ought rather to have said, Dove havete pigliate tante cose divine? Where did you find so many divine things?

"I formerly durst not rank in the number of epic poets one, whom at that time I considered as only the first of grotesque writers; but upon a more diligent perusal, I have found him to be as full of sublimity as pleasantry, and now make him this public reparation. It is indeed true, that Leo X. published a bull in favour of the Orlando Furioso, excommunicating all those who should presume to attack that poem; and I shall be very cautious how I incur the censure of such excommunication¹⁸."

Thus has this lively writer signed, as it were, a recantation of some of the errors of his poetical faith, in which perhaps it will appear, that he has no less exaggerated than he had before depreciated the merits of Ariosto: however, this example may serve to show how little stability appears in the opinion of this very extraordinary genius, whose spirit so warmly animated his pen at such an advanced age, but whose writings more frequently appeal to the imagination than judgment of his reader: I have formerly had occasion to combat some of his strictures on Tasso¹⁹; and we have a pregnant instance of his criticisms in his several attacks on Shakspeare, which have been exposed in a most elegant and judicious dissertation on the genius of that immortal poet²⁰.

A remarkable letter remains of Bernardo Tasso, the father of Torquato, in which there is this passage: Ne so io s' Aristotele nascesse a questo età e vedesse il vaghissimo poema del' Ariosto, conoscendo la forza del uso, e vedendo che tanto diletta, come l'esperienza si dimostra, mutasse opinione, e consentisse che si potesse far poema eroico di piu azzione. Con la sua mirabil dottrina e giudicio, dandogli nova norma e prescrivendogli novi leggi²¹.

Giuseppe Malatesta published a Dialogue on the New Poetry, or a Defence of the Furioso, and undertook to show, that this poem was composed agreeably to the several rules of poetry, and that it excelled the beauties of Homer and Virgil.

The only poem we have in English of the Gothic romance kind, is the Fairy Queen of Spenser; a poet, whose story and style bear the nearest resemblance to Ariosto: the greatest difference of these two poets is, that the adventures of the English poet are supported by shadowy characters, that set forth one continued allegory; whereas the Italian author gives a narrative of incidents, in which an allegory is only occasionally introduced. Hughes, in the preface to his edition of Spenser's works, professes the Fairy Queen on this account, alleging, that "though his fable is often wild, yet it is always emblematical." But, perhaps, upon appealing to the sensations of the reader, Ariosto may even, for this very reason, be found to have the preference; as it will admit of some doubt, whether the constant allegory does not considerably weaken the pathetic effect of the narrative: for what sympathy can we experience, as men, for the misfortunes of an imaginary being, whom we are perpetually reminded to be only the type of some moral, or religious virtue?

With regard to the fables contained in the Italian poets and the old romance writers, the same critic before cited has the following observations, containing an opinion which had been started before by Gravina.

"The writers of the old romances, from whom Ariosto and Spenser have borrowed so largely, are supposed to have had copious imaginations; but may they not be indebted for their invulnerable heroes, their monsters, their enchantments, their gardens of pleasure, their winged steeds, and the like, to the Echidna, to the Circe, to the Medea, to the Achilles, to the Syrens, to the Harpies, to the Phryxus, to the Bellerophon of the ancients? The cave of Polypheme might furnish out the ideas of their giants, and Andromeda might give occasion for stories of distressed damsels on the point of being devoured by dragons, and delivered at such a critical season by their favourite knights. Some faint traditions of the ancients might have been kept glimmering and alive through the whole barbarous ages, as they are called; and it is not impossible but these have been the parents of the Genii in the eastern, and the Fairies in the western world. To say that Amadis and Sir Tristan have a classical foundation, may at first sight appear paradoxical; but if the subject were examined to the bottom, I am inclined to think that the wildest chimeras in these books of chivalry, with which Don Quixote's library was furnished, would be found to have a close connection with ancient mythology."²

²⁰ Essay on the Genius and Writings of Shakspeare.

²¹ I question if Aristotle had been born in our times to have seen the poem of Ariosto, and had experienced the wonderful delight afforded by the perusal, whether he would not have altered his sentiments, and agreed that an heroic poem might consist of more than one action, and whether his admirable judgment would not have extended the poetic license, and given new laws for epic poetry.

But although Ariosto's poem is acknowledged to be defective in plan and regularity, yet every particular beauty of the highest species of poetry is to be found in the several parts of it, in which respect Boyardo is greatly deficient, who seldom attains more than to amuse the imagination by the pleasing variety of his fictions. But I must not here omit to take notice of one noble passage in the Innamorato, where the encounter of Orlando and Agrican is compared to the meeting of two thunder clouds. Our great Milton has the same simile in the second book of Paradise Lost, when Satan and Death prepare to engage. The Orlando Furioso may be considered as an epic, formed on the manners of chivalry. Where the subject of Ariosto rises, Tasso does not appear with greater dignity.

All the battles and single combats in Ariosto are excellent: in the last he is greatly superior to Tasso, and indeed to most other poets; for in this respect there appears some defect even in the poems of Homer and Virgil, in which there are few good descriptions of this kind. Our own countryman, Spenser, has succeeded best in these passages, for which perhaps he is not a little indebted to the Italian.

Though the general battles of the Iliad and Æneid are supported with wonderful fire, and every circumstance of terror inimitably introduced to keep the mind suspended and anxious for the event, yet those great poets do not seem to have attended in the same manner to the single encounters of their heroes, the issue of which, being generally soon determined, or at least foreseen, seldom raises much anxiety for the fate of the combatants. Virgil, it is true, has improved upon Homer, and the last important action between Æneas and Turnus, in the 19th book, is conducted with more judgment than any single combat in the Iliad.

Homer, indeed, introduces the duel between Hector and Ajax with unexampled sublimity: but when combatants meet, how soon is the conflict over, and how little are the readers kept in suspense!

Tasso has imitated this combat, with its attendant circumstances; and however he may fall short of his great original in some parts, he certainly has the advantage with respect to such particulars as tend to aggrandize the valour of his heroes.

I shall produce one more instance from Homer to support the foregoing assertion. When the mind has been long prepared for an engagement between the two great heroes of the poem, how must the expectation be excited from the idea of such a combat! But here, I believe, every unprejudiced reader will confess his disappointment, where Hector is represented flying at the mere sight of Achilles; and when, after having been thrice chased round the walls of Troy, he turns, at the instigation of Pallas, to engage his enemy, how little appears the prowess of the gallant Hector, who had so often stood the bulwark of his country; of that Hector who, notwithstanding the united efforts of an army, had set fire to the Grecian fleet, and whom the poet had opposed to Neptune himself!

The last combat of Tancred and Argantes, in the 19th book of the Jerusalem, excels every similar passage in the Iliad or Æneid; in the Italian poet the mind is kept in suspense for the event; and the several turns of fortune, between the two combatants, are well imagined: at the same time it must be confessed, that Tasso has not always shown equal judgment: he has sometimes, through a partial reverence for the examples of antiquity, followed his Greek master to a fault; amongst other instances, the death of Solyman by the hand of Rinaldo, in the 20th book, must in some sort offend the reader, like that of Hector by Achilles.

If we peruse Ariosto attentively, we shall find him free from every objection of this kind: his great art, in these rencounters, is to keep up the attention between hope and fear, and when he has involved the reader in distress for the danger of some favourite warrior, he, by an unexpected turn, relieves the anxiety he has raised, and gives victory to the seemingly conquered party.

Nor will our poet be found deficient in the tender and pathetic, which every reader of taste must acknowledge, when he peruses the stories of Zerbino and Brandimart, the episode of Cloridan and Medoro, and more especially the detail of Orlando's madness, in the 23d book, wherein the author has displayed the most intimate acquaintance with the human heart.

From the general plan of Ariosto's fable, which admits the agency of necromancers, witches, spirits and other preternatural powers, it will be easily expected, that the marvellous should be carried to an excessive length; and yet many of his fictions are not more incredible than those of the Greek and Latin poets. The metamorphosis of the ships to nymphs, in the Aeneid, is as violent a machine as the leaves to ships in the Orlando. The stories of the Italian poet are not more extravagant than the legendary tales of the saints, which were currently believed in his time, and are still objects of faith with the vulgar. Yet let it not be supposed that this apology for Ariosto, which respects the times in which he wrote, is meant as a general defence for such kind of fictions, critically or even poetically considered, for some of these the warmest of Ariosto's admirers must give up as not to be defended.

Yet, while we candidly allow the force of objection to such passages of Ariosto as are justly reprehensible, let us not adopt the fastidious pedantry of those French critics, who having little taste for the works of imagination of other nations, and no examples of such in their own, were continually declaiming against the false style, extravagant conceits, and absurd fictions, of the Italian poets, principally Ariosto and Tasso. Father Bohours, in many respects an excellent and judicious critic, has undoubtedly produced several exceptionable passages in their writings; but has too hastily given the following most extraordinary censure of Ariosto²³: De l'humeur dont vous êtes (repliqua Phalante) vous n'approuveriez pas ce que dit l'Arioste d'un de ses heroes, qui dans la chaleur du combat, ne s'étant pas apperçu qu'on l'avoit tué, il combattit toujours vaillamment tout mort qu'il étoit.

*Il pover' huomo, ed non s'en era accorto,
Andava combattendo ed era morto²⁴.*

This criticism, with the quotation undoubtedly made from memory, has been implicitly taken up by many, and produced as an example of the absurdity of the Italian poets in general, and of Ariosto in particular: but the truth is, no such lines are to be found in the whole poem of Orlando Furioso, nor was Ariosto capable of a fiction so truly ridiculous, as only to deserve a place in a burlesque composition. The passage that gave rise to this remark of Father Bohours is in Berni's Rifacimento of Boyardo, and is entirely his own, there being not the least foundation for it in the original work in Boyardo. The whole stanza runs thus:

*Orde ora avendo a traverso tagliato
Questo Pagan, lo fe sì destramente,
Che l'un pezzo in su l'altro suggellato
Rimase, senza muoversi niente:
E come avvien', quand uno è riscaldato,
Che le ferite per allor non sente,
Così colui del colpo non accorto,
Andava combattendo ed era morto.*

Orland. Innam. l. ii. c. xxiv. s. 60.

*He with his falchion aim'd so well the blow,
And sever'd with such art the Pagan foe,
That still, as one, the separate parts adher'd,
And still, entire, unhurt, the man appear'd:
And as the limbs, while warm in action, feel
No sense of anguish from the wounding steel;
So the fierce knight, with vigour yet unbroke,
Fought on, tho' dead, unconscious of the stroke.*

The champion who gave this wonderful stroke was Orlando, with his sword Durindana.

But if we consider that part of Ariosto's fable, which, independent of supernatural agents and visionary beings, exhibits merely a view of general manners so totally repugnant to the present system of political and social life, we shall find the picture much nearer than we imagined to the early times of feudal violence and oppression; and with respect to many descriptions in those writers, who are generally supposed to give us a world of their own creation, I beg to quote the following passage:

"The fictions of the Gothic romances were not so remote from credibility as they are now thought. In the full prevalence of the feudal institution, when violence desolated the world, and every baron lived in a fortress, forests and castles were regularly succeeded by each other, and the adventurer might very suddenly pass from the gloom of woods, or the ruggedness of moors, to seats of plenty, gaiety, and magnificence. Whatever is imaged in the wildest tale, if giants, dragons, and enchantments be excepted, would be felt by him, who, wandering in the mountains without a guide, or upon the sea without a pilot, should be carried amidst his terror and uncertainty to the hospitality and elegance of Rassay and Dunvegan *."

The same writer, having described the nature of the castles and fortified places formerly in use in the islands of Scotland, proceeds thus: "These castles afford another evidence that the fictions of romantic chivalry had, for their basis, the real manners of the feudal times, when every lord of a seignory lived in his hold lawless and unaccountable, with all the licentiousness and insolence of uncontested superiority and unprincipled power. The traveller, whoever he might be, coming to the fortified habitation of a chieftain, would probably have been interrogated from the battlements, admitted with caution at the gate, introduced to a petty monarch, fierce with habitual hostility, and vigilant with ignorant suspicion; who, according to his general temper, or accidental humour, would have seated a stranger as his guest at the table, or as a spy confined him to the dungeon **."

The characters of Ariosto are powerfully delineated, and admirably sustained; and however he may offend in the probability of his action, his pictures of the affection of the mind have the clearest historical truth. Let the reader of imagination, and only such readers are qualified to taste the beauties of Ariosto, when he opens his book, allow him in full force the ideas of chivalry and magic, and he will find infinite touches of nature in the manners of his heroes and heroines, with a discrimination and variety rarely to be excelled.

"Ariosto," says a late writer, "pleases; but not by his monstrous and improbable fictions, by his bizarre mixture of the serious and comic styles, by the want of coherence in his stories, or by the continual interruptions in his narration. He charms by the force and clearness of his expression, by the readiness and variety of his inventions, and by his natural pictures of the passions, especially of the gay and amorous kind **."

No one seems to have been more powerfully impressed with the merits of Ariosto than an elegant poet of our own time, who, in taking a review of the several epic writers, where, in a most spirited manner, he asserts the superiority of genius and fancy over rule and system, has characterized the author of Orlando Furioso in the following animated lines:

Indignant Fancy, who with scorn survey'd
The sleepy honours to proud Systems paid,
Smiling to see that on her rival's brow
The poppy lurks beneath the laurel bough,
Resolv'd in sportive triumph to display
The rich extent of her superior sway:
From Necromancy's hand, in happiest hour,
She caught the rod of visionary power;
And, as aloft the magic wand she rais'd,
A peerless Bard with new effulgence blaz'd,
Born every law of System to disown,
And rule by Fancy's boundless power alone.
High in mid air, between the Moon and Earth,
The Bard of pathos now, and now of mirth,
Pois'd with his lyre between a griffin's wings,
Her sportive darling Antorro sings.

PREFACE TO ORLANDO FURIOSO.

As the light cloud, whose varying vapours fly,
 Driven by the zephyr of the evening sky,
 Fixes and charms the never-wearied view,
 By taking every shape and every hue;
 So, by Variety's supreme control,
 His changeful numbers charm the willing soul:
 Enchanted by his song, Attention sits,
 With features catching every cast by fits,
 Like the fond infant, in whose tender brain
 Young Sensibility delights to reign;
 While rapid joy and pain each other chase,
 Through the soft muscles of its April face.
 In vain the slaves of System would discard
 From Glory's classic train this airy bard;
 Delighted Nature her gay favour crown'd,
 And Envy's clamour in her plaudit drown'd,
 Severe Morality, to censure mov'd,
 His wanton lyre with juster blame reprov'd;
 But his sweet song her anger so beguil'd,
 That ere she finish'd her reproof, she smil'd.

Hayley's Essay on Ep. Post. Ep. iii.

But whatever may be the power of Ariosto in the original, a translator will find great difficulties; and considerable liberties are to be allowed him, if he is expected to make his author graceful to an English reader. The great praise of Ariosto, amongst the intelligent of his countrymen, is simplicity of expression and purity of diction; and it is universally allowed, that no author had ever a more absolute command of his own language. There is a certain easy negligence in his muse that often assumes a playful mode of expression, incompatible with the nature of our present poetry, though some few examples of the kind may be met with in our old poets, particularly Spenser, who has adopted much of Ariosto's manner. To this it may be added, that the Italian appears to run into rhyme with a facility altogether unknown to us, which may be seen from what has been related of Pulci, on which subject I shall give a remarkable passage from Mr. Baretti, in the book before quoted.

"Among the general characteristics of the Tuscans, I have already touched upon their love of poetry; and, what is altogether singular in them, their common custom of improvvisare; that is, of singing verses extempore to the guitar, and other stringed instruments. I can aver that it is a very great entertainment, and what cannot fail of exciting very great surprise, to hear two of their best improvvisatori et cantare parati et rispondere parati, and, eager to excel, expatiate in ottava rima upon any subject moderately susceptible of poetical amplification. Several times have I been astonished at the rapidity of their expressions, the easiness of their rhymes, the justness of their numbers, the copiousness of their images, and the general warmth and impetuosity of their thoughts; and I have seen crowds of listeners hurried, as well as myself, into a vortex of delight, if I may so express it, whose motion acquired more and more violence as the birds grew more and more inflamed by the repeated shoutings of the by-standers, and by the force of the opposition which each encountered from his antagonist."

It is in this case, blended with occasional strength, that gives unspeakable grace and variety to the narratives of Ariosto; and an English translator will have frequent reason to regret the more rigid genius of his language, that rarely permits him, in this respect, to attempt even an imitation of his author. It will therefore be found, upon comparing this version with the original, that some parts are shortened, and that the style of others has been varied, retaining at the same time what was thought requisite to preserve the character of the writer; for which reason I have not omitted the puerile conceits at the end of his books, as they do not in the least affect the general merit of the work.

Concerning the compliments to the house of Este, which occur in different parts of the poem, I have endeavoured to take off from the dryness of the subject, by giving in the notes a concise account of the Italian history and families alluded to. But there is a heavy charge against Ariosto, to which no defence can be made; which is, that he sometimes gives himself up to an unwarrantable licentiousness of idea and language: however, it is hoped, that every passage of this nature is so far softened in the translation, as to give no just cause of offence,

As the far greater part of my readers must be supposed acquainted with the work on which this poem is immediately founded, I have thought it expedient to prefix to the Furioso a general view of Boyardo's principal story, as connected with Ariosto, and to insert in the notes an account of every adventure referred to in the former poem.

The reader will observe that Ariosto generally breaks off his stories abruptly, after the manner of Boyardo, and other romantic writers, in which practice he has been followed by Spenser. Some Italian writers have applauded this method, as tending to excite and keep up the attention, and prevent satiety, by a continual variation of the subject; as the poet himself says:

Como raccende il gusto il mutare cosa;
Così mi par, che la mia istoria, quanto,
Or quà, or là più variata, sia,
Meno, a chi l'udirà noia sia.

As at the board, with plenteous viands grac'd,
Cate after cate excites the sickening taste;
So, while my Muse repeats her vary'd strains,
Tale following tale the ravish'd ear detains.

Book xiii.

But perhaps the generality of readers will, with Grævina⁶⁶, be rather disgusted to have their curiosity so frequently raised, and almost as constantly disappointed, and that, sometimes, in the most critical and interesting part: it is likewise to be feared that these repeated breaks, by blending the adventures with each other, must rather tend to perplex and embarrass the story; though we cannot but admire the art of the poet, in connecting such an immense variety of incidents, and bringing them at last to one point. I have, therefore, set down the several continuations, after the example of some of the Italian editors, which method has likewise been pursued by sir John Harrington in his translation.

It will be proper, in this place, to say something of the five cantos printed after Ariosto's death, in addition to the forty-six cantos of the Orlando Furioso, and concerning which there have been different opinions amongst his own countrymen of the intention of the poet. Some have supposed that they were meant to have been incorporated with his great work; but such opinion must surely be erroneous, since the first of these additional cantos opens after Rogero had been converted to Christianity, and was made one of the Paladins of Charlemain, circumstances that certainly point out the conclusion of the Furioso. Others have, with much more reason, judged these five cantos to be the beginning of an entire new work, continued from the subject of the former: and by some writers, among whom is Porcacchi, it has been doubted, whether these cantos were the genuine production of Ariosto, to whom, however, the generality of his biographers, without scruple, give them; but it seems to be agreed by all, that they are very inferior in composition and elegance of style to his celebrated poem; nor are they ever quoted or referred to by any writer, as so frequently happens with respect to the Furioso. Some have thought that they were the work of his earlier years. It is certain that the fable appears very uninteresting after a perusal of the Furioso, and the fiction most absurdly extravagant, where he brings Rogero into the belly of a whale, when he meets with a hermit who had been there forty years, and who relates to him, that all who had escaped from Alcina were sooner or later imprisoned in this monster. Here he meets with Astolpho, and sees a church and dwelling for the inhabitants, all in the belly of the whale. On considering these five posthumous cantos, in which the story is brought to no conclusion, I am almost tempted to subscribe to the following judicious sentiments of sir John Harrington: "For the five cantos that follow Furioso, I am partly of opinion they were not his, both because methinks they differ in sweetness of style from the other, and beside it is not likely that a man of his judgment, having made so absolute a piece of work as his Furioso is, and having brought every matter to a great and well-pleasing conclusion, would, as it were, marre all again, and set them all by the ears, and bring Rogero in the whale's belly, and Astolpho with him for company, that a little before were conquerors of the world⁶⁷."

If novelty be any recommendation of the work now offered to the public, an English Ariosto may have that to plead, notwithstanding any translation that has yet appeared. We have indeed two versions of the Orlando Furioso; the first of which, by sir John Harrington before-mentioned, published in the reign of queen Elizabeth, and dedicated to that princess, is little known; the copies are become very scarce, and the genius of the performance, whatever merit it might claim at the time of the publication, affords now little encouragement to multiply them by a new impression. The last translation sent into the world, was professedly given by its author as a literal version, the very idea of which will necessarily exclude the thought of its being generally read as an English book; of which every one will judge, who is acquainted with the different idioms of the two languages.

Although this poem, like all the Italian writings of the kind, is written in the octave stanza, the present translation will be found, in that respect, to differ from the two first, which are rendered in the same form of versification as the Italian. I am aware that it has been, and is still, the opinion of some, whose judgment claims no little deference, that the English couplet is improper for a work of this nature, and that the stanza is the only manner suitable to romance: to which it may be answered, that the Italians, who made use of the first, applied it, and still continue to apply it, to the highest kind of poetry; it is therefore to be considered as their heroic style. It was not only used by Pulci, Boyardo and Ariosto, in their compositions of the Gothic fiction, but is employed by Tasso in his truly epic poem of the Jerusalem; and by many of the Italian writers in their translations of the Greek and Roman poets, which, I believe, few other modern translators would think of rendering in the stanza. The genius of our heroic verse admits of a great variety; and we have examples of very different species of writing, in the works of Dryden, and Pope, from the sublime style of Homer and Virgil, to the familiar narratives of Boccace and Chaucer.

But of all the various styles used by our best poets, none seems so well adapted to the mixed and familiar narrative as that of Dryden in his last productions, known by the name of his Fables, which, by their harmony, spirit, ease, and variety of versification, exhibit an admirable model for a translator of Ariosto.

In referring to the several commentators, I have been cautious how far I adopted their allegorical interpretations, as the temper of that class of writers frequently leads them to trace out a meaning, which the poet himself was a stranger to. That allegory, which requires explanation, is certainly defective; and it is notorious, that an inventive genius can convert the plainest narrative into mystery, as Tasso has done by his Jerusalem, to which he has prefixed an allegory, that renders the whole poem as completely visionary as the Fairy Queen of Spenser.

Should the English reader become more acquainted with this celebrated Italian, he will find the Orlando no bad elucidation of the Don Quixote of Cervantes, as a great part of the customs, at least the general genius of chivalry, may be learnt from it, without the drudgery of travelling through the old romances.

Though it is not here recommended that any one should imitate the extravagances of the Italian writers, yet while the enthusiastic spirit, that hurries away the reader, continues to be regarded as the glorious criterion of true poetry, every follower of the Muses will find ample subject for admiration in the perusal of the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, an author, whom, with all his faults, Dryden acknowledges to have been a great poet; an author, lately included in the highest praise of creative genius by one of our first critics, who thus describes that general effect from which the power of every poet ought to be estimated. "Works of imagination excel by their allurement and delight; by their power of attracting and detaining the attention. That book is good in vain which the reader throws away. He only is the master who keeps the mind in pleasing captivity; whose pages are perused with eagerness, and in hope of new pleasure are perused again; and whose conclusion is perceived with an eye of sorrow, such as the traveller casts upon departing day."

SOME authors, though with little authority, maintain, that the Ariosti derive their original from the Arieti, or Ariovisti: it is, however, certain that this family was very ancient in Bologna, where it had flourished in great estimation, when Obizzo III. marquis of Este, married Lippe Ariosta, a lady of excellent beauty and rare accomplishments, who, accompanying her husband to Ferrara, took with her several of her relations, and first established the house of the Ariosti in that place.

Among other branches of the name, lived Nicolo and his brothers, men of great consideration in Ferrara: Nicolo not only filled, under Hercules and Rorso, dukes of Ferrara, the most important posts in the city, but was chosen to the government of Rheggio and Modena, and several times sent ambassador to the pope, the emperor, and the king of France: but nothing contributed more to deliver his name down to posterity, than being the father of Ludovico.

While he was in the government of Rheggio, in Lombardy, he espoused Daria de Malaguzzi, a lady of wealth and family, descended from one of the first houses in Rheggio. By this marriage he had five sons, Ludovico, Gabriele, Carlo, Galasso, and Alessandro; and the same number of daughters. Ludovico was born on the eighth of September, in the year 1474, in the fortress of Rheggio, where his father was governor; as Galasso and Alessandro were born while he was in the government of Modena. These sons were all well accomplished, and, for their many excellent qualities, patronised by several princes. Gabriele gave himself up to literary pursuits, and is said to have arrived at great excellence in Latin poetry, but to have been too close an imitator of Statius: he died at Ferrara. Carlo, who was of a disposition more inclined to dissipation and gaiety, led the life of a courtier, and died at the court of Naples. Galasso embraced the profession of the church, was employed in several important offices, and, at last, ended his days, ambassador from the duke of Ferrara, at the court of Charles V. Alessandro, who was of an inquisitive and enterprising genius, having spent great part of his time in visiting foreign countries, at last finished his life in Ferrara.

To return to Ludovico, the subject of our present inquiry; as he was the first-born of his father's children, so he is reported to have surpassed the rest in the endowments of the mind; giving, from his tender years, uncommon presage of a future genius. Being yet in his rudiments, he composed a kind of tragedy from the story of Pyramus and Thisbe, which he caused to be represented by his brothers and sisters.

He applied himself very early to the study of the Latin, in which he made greater progress than almost any one of his age; and, in the very beginning of his studies, he composed and recited an elegant oration in that language, which gave the highest expectations of him. Tito Strozza, a man of great learning and consummate knowledge took particular delight to hear him, and to propose difficult questions for his solution; often encouraging a dispute, on literary subjects, between him and Hercules his son, a youth whose age and studies agreed with Ariosto.

But it happened to our poet, as to Ovid, Petarch, Tasso, and others, that his father Nicolo, having little taste for literature, and therefore disinclined to encourage his son in pursuing the bent of his genius, was rather desirous, that, as his eldest-born, he should endeavour to establish his fortune in the world, by taking some lucrative profession; and sent him to Padua, to apply himself to the study of the civil law, under Angelo Castrinse and Il Maimo; in which employment he spent five years, highly disagreeable to one of his disposition; which circumstance he laments in one of his satires addressed to Bembo.

Ahi lasso! quando ebbi al Pegasèo mèlo

L'età disposta, e che le fresche guancie

Non si vedeano ancor fiorir du'n pelo;

Mio padre mi cacciò con spiedi e laccio;

(Non che con sproni) a volger testi e chiose;

E m'occupò cinque anni in quelle ciancie.

Ere yet my cheeks were fledg'd with rising down,

When, smit with love of verse, I sought renew'd

On sweet Parnassus' hill; my sire's command

Compell'd me to forsake that happy land,

And chain'd me five long years to hear disputes

Of brawling lawyers and litigious suits.

Satire iv.

So Ovid complains that his father compelled him to study the law: De Tristibus, Lib. iv. Eleg. x.

At mihi jam puero coelestia sacra placebant,

Inque suum furtim Musa trahebat opus.

Sæpè pater dixit, "Studium quid inutile tentas?

Mœonides nullas ipse reliquit opea."

Motus eram dictis: totoque Helicœne relicto,

Scribera conabar verba soluta modis.

Spontis suâ carmen numeros veniebat ad aptos,

Et quod tentabam dicere, verus erat.

While yet a boy, sweet verse my genius fir'd;

The secret Muse her pleasing task inspir'd.

My sire oft cry'd, "This useless trade give o'er;

Mov'd at his words, I Pindus' hill resign'd,

And strove to write, by metre unconfin'd:

In vain—the Muse spontaneous verse bestow'd,

And all I wrote in tuneful numbers flow'd.

Milton, in like manner, desires his father to let him pursue the Muses:

Tu, tamen, ut similes teneras odiâse camœnas

Non odiâse reor, neque enim, pater, ire jubehas

Quâ via lata patet, quâ prouior arca lucri,

Certaque condendi fulges spes aurea nummi:

Nec rapia ad legis, malè custoditaque gentis

Jura, nec insulsis damnas clamoribus aurea.

Ad Patrem.

Thou canst not sure the gentle Muses hate,

Or bid me change, O sire! my peaceful state,

To tread the sordid paths, that open lies

To fields of wealth, where golden harvests rise.

Thou wilt not force me to th' ungrateful bar,

Where ill-kept laws supply the constant jar;

Or fix me there, long tedious days, to hear

Those sounds of discord to a poet's ear.

But although Ariosto durst not openly disobey his father, he could not so far conquer his inclinations, but that, during the course of this time, he found leisure to peruse many authors, particularly French and Spanish romances, with which languages he was well acquainted, having translated two or three of these authors himself into his native tongue; of which kind of performances he availed himself in his future works, making use of every beauty that occurred in these wild productions of imagination. Nicolo, at last, perceiving the aversion his son had to the profession of the law, and the little progress he made therein, resolv'd no longer to combat his desires, but permit him to obey the strong propensity of genius, which evidently pointed to what nature had designed him. This indulgence of Nicolo is said to have been, in a great degree, owing to the good offices of Pandolfo Ariosto, a youth of excellent endowments, and a near kinsman to Ludovico.

Ludovico, being now left at liberty, applied himself with unwearied assiduity to recover the advantages he had necessarily lost. He had now put himself, at the age of twenty, under the tuition of Gregorio de Spoleti, a person of admirable taste, and well versed in the Latin and Greek tongues, who then resided in the family of Rinaldo of Este, at Ferrara. Gregorio, observing the avidity with which Ariosto applied himself to study, took every possible care to cultivate his genius; and, by his instructions, his pupil soon made himself master of the most excellent Latin authors, particularly the poets, among whom Horace appears to have been his favourite. He explained many difficult and obscure parts in that author, which were never before understood. His intention was, in like manner, to have gone through a course of Greek literature; but as he was first desirous of perfecting himself in the Latin, he suddenly lost the assistance of his preceptor Gregorio, who was constrained to take a journey into France, at the desire of Isabella, daughter to Alphonsus of Naples, as tutor to her son; where he soon after died, to the insupportable grief of Ariosto.

About the same time died Nicolo Ariosto, the father of Ludovico, leaving behind him a numerous offspring. Ariosto, then only twenty-four years of age, found himself at once involved in the cares of a family, and obliged to take upon himself the management of domestic concerns, to introduce his brothers into the world, provide fortunes for his sisters, and, in every respect, supply to them the place of a father, who had left them but a very slender patrimony.

Mi morì il padre e da Maria il pensiero
 Drieto a Marta bisogna ch'io rivolga,
 Ch'io muti in squarci e in vacchette Omoro;
 Trovi marito e modo che si tolga
 Di casa una sorella e un' altra appresso,
 E che l'eredita non se ne dolga:
 Co' piccioli fratelli a' quasi successo
 Ero in luoco di padre far l'uffizio
 Che debito e pietà m'avea commesso.

My father dead, I took the father's part,
 And chang'd for household cares the Muse's art;
 For tuneful verse, each thoughtful hour I spend,
 To husband well the little Heaven had sent:
 Each sister claim'd, by turns, my guardian hand,
 To watch their youth, and form their nuptial band;
 While piety and love my heart engage,
 To rear my helpless brethren's tender age.

Satire vi.

He was now so wholly engrossed by a multiplicity of cares, as not only to give over his intended prosecution of the Greek language, but almost to abandon the Latin, which he had but lately recovered, had not Pandolfo Ariosto so far stimulated him, that he still continued, in some degree, his studies; till death deprived him of so pleasing a companion. Yet all these disappointments did not so much damp the vigour of his genius, but that he gave signal proofs of an excellent vein of poetry. He had now attained the age of twenty-nine years, and had acquired an uncommon reputation for his Latin verses, and numerous poems and sonnets full of spirit and imagination. His conversation was coveted by men of the greatest learning and abilities; inasmuch that cardinal Hippolito of Este, whose court was a receptacle for the most admired personages of the age, received him into his service, where he continued fifteen years; during which time, his mind being always intent on the Muses, he formed a design of writing a poem of the romance kind; in which no one had yet written with the dignity of which the subject was capable. The happy versatility of his genius was such, that he could equally adapt himself to every species of poetry; and an Italian writer of his life observes, that whatever he wrote, seemed, at the time, to be his particular study.

At about thirty years of age he began his Orlando; and cardinal Bembo, to whom he communicated his design, would have dissuaded him from writing in Italian, advising him to cultivate the Latin; to which Ariosto answered, that he would rather be the first among the Tuscan writers, than scarcely the second among the Latin. At the same time, it fortunately happened, that he had already written some stanzas of his Orlando; which communicating to several of his friends, he met with such encouragement, that he determined vigorously to prosecute his design. It may be here observed, that Dante, at first, intended to have written his poem in Latin; and actually composed some initial lines in that language.

He chose the subject of Boyardo, which was well known to all; and being left unfinished, had strongly excited the reader's curiosity, to see the end of a story so artfully begun. In the same manner, Virgil, of whom Ariosto appears a great imitator, formed his Æneid as a kind of sequel to the Iliad and Odyssey. And it may be remarked, that by adopting the fictions of Boyardo, Ariosto had not only an opportunity of bringing the romance of the court to a conclusion, but of celebrating, under the person of Rogero, the family of his patron.

Ariosto had proposed to write a poem in terza rima¹ (like Dante), in praise of the house of Este, different from the Furioso; but not being satisfied with the work, he laid it aside, and pursued the design of his Furioso, in ottava rima. The intended poem began thus:

Cantero l'armi, cantero 'gli affanni
D'amor, che un cavalier sottenne gravi
Peregrinando in terra e in mar molt' anni, &c.
I sing of arms, and sing the pains of love,
And all the toils a suffering hero bore,
Long destin'd far o'er land and sea to rove, &c.

In order to pursue his studies with less interruption, he chose the situation of Rheggio, retiring to a pleasant villa, belonging to Sigismundo Malaguzzi, his kinsman, where he spent his leisure in the prosecution of his principal design. In one of his satires he gives the following agreeable sketch of his retreat:

Gia mi fur' dolci inviti a empir le carte
I luoghi ameni, di che il nostro Rheggio
Il natio nido mio n'ha la sua parte:
Il tuo Mauritian sempre vagheggio
La bella stanza, e' l Rodano vicino,
Da le Naiade amato ombroso seggio:
Il lucido vivaio, onde il giardino
Si cinge intorno, il fresco rio che corre
Rigando l'erbe, ove poi fa il molino.
Non mi si po de la memoria torre
Le vigni, e i solchi del fecondo laccio,
Le valle e' l colle e la ben posta torre.

Blest be the time, when, from the world retir'd,
Fair Rheggio's peaceful scenes my Muse inspir'd:
Nurse of my infant years! Remembrance views
Thy pleasing seats, and every charm renews:
I see where Rhodan's tide delightful flows,
While sportive Naiads on the banks repose;
The fishy pool, with silvery lustre crown'd,
Whose dimpled water moats the garden round;
The living stream that pours a crystal rill
Through sprinkled herbage to the neighbouring mill;

¹ Of this terza rima of the Italians, the English reader will have a full idea, from the three cantos of the Inferno of Dante, translated with wonderful spirit and fidelity by Mr. Hayley, notwithstanding the confinement and difficulty of the metre. See Essay on Epic poetry, note to Epistle iii.

The clustering vines, that yield their purple store;
The hills, the vales, and ivy-circled tower.

Satire iv.

While he was busied in these literary pursuits, Alphonso, duke of Ferrara, having occasion to send an ambassador to Rome, in order to appease the anger of pope Julius II. who prepared to make war against him, was, by his brother the cardinal, recommended to Ariosto, as a proper person to be entrusted with such a negotiation. The duke, therefore, made choice of him; and he acquitted himself so well in his commission, that he returned with an answer much more favourable than was expected. However, the pope, still continuing at enmity with the duke, made a league with the Venetians, and collected a powerful army against Ferrara; but he gained little honour in this enterprise, being defeated at the battle of Ravenna. Part of a fleet was sent up the Po, against Ferrara; but met with a repulse from the duke's party. In this engagement, Ariosto, who was present, behaved with great courage, and took one of the largest of the enemy's vessels, filled with stores and ammunition.

The papal army being dispersed, Alphonso thought it advisable to send an ambassador again to Rome. But every one being afraid to engage in his service, knowing the pope's disposition, he dispatched Ludovico a second time, who found his holiness so incensed against the duke, that his indignation was very near showing itself to the ambassador; and it was not without difficulty that Ariosto escaped with life to Ferrara.

The duke's affairs being established, Ariosto returned to his studies; though, continuing still in the service of the cardinal, he was employed, at times, in various public occupations, that often broke in upon his retirement, and obliged him to defer the completion of his Orlando. However, he found means to steal so much leisure from his more serious employments, that he at last brought it to a conclusion: and though the work was far from having that perfection which he himself desired, yet, in order to avail himself of the general opinion of the public, he was determined to give it to the world; and accordingly caused it to be first printed in the year 1515.

Some time after, the cardinal having a design to go into Hungary, was desirous of being accompanied by the ingenious men who lived under his patronage; but Ariosto openly declared his inclination to be left behind; for, being now afflicted with a catarrh, he was fearful of the consequences from the fatigues and inconveniences of so long a journey. Besides, the service of the cardinal began to grow very irksome to him; those who were about him being frequently obliged to watch the greatest part of the night. It appears, likewise, that Ariosto was in his nature averse to travelling, and had visited few countries.

De'gi uomini son varii gli appetiti,
A chi piace la chiesa, a chi la spada,
A chi la patria, a chi gli strani liti.
Chi vuol andare a torno, a torno vada,
Vegga Inghilterra, Ungheria, Francia, e Spagna,
A me piace habitar la mia contrada.
Vist' ho' Toscana, Lombardia, Romaniaa,
Quel monte che divide, e quel che serra
Italia e un mare, e l'altro che la bagna:
Questo mi basta, il resto della terra,
Senza mai pagar l'oste, andò cercando
Con Tolomeo sia 'l mondo in pace o in guerra.
E tutto il mar senza far voti quando
Lampeggi il ciel, sicuro in sulle carte
Verro' più che su i legni volteggiando.

Various are men's pursuits; these seek renown
In fields of death; those choose the sacred gown:
Some quit their native for a foreign shore:
Let those, that wish, unnumber'd realms explore,
To France, Hungary, Spain, and England roam,
While I prefer a peaceful seat at home.
I've view'd what'er the Tuscan country yields,
Fair Lombardy, and wide Romagna's fields:

THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.

The hills, that Italy from Spain divide,
 And those extending to the surging tide.
 Let this suffice—the rest I can survey,
 In peace or war—nor host nor captain pay;
 With Ptolemy can safely trace the seas,
 Nor need with vows and prayers the storms appease:
 Better on pictur'd charts secure to sail,
 Than in frail vessels dare the treacherous gale!

Satire iv.

The refusal of Ariosto to accompany the cardinal so exasperated the prelate, that he, in a manner, withdrew his protection from him; which circumstance gave our poet great uneasiness; though it is thought that Hippolito might have taken him again into favour, but for the ill offices of some malicious persons, who had the address to keep them at a distance from each other. On this difference between the cardinal and him, Ariosto strongly dwells in his satires.

A me per esser stato contumace
 Di non veder Agrin ne Buda,
 Che si ritaglia il san gia non mi spiace.

I murmur not, to think my patron's hand
 Resum'd the grace my service once obtain'd;
 Since I refus'd to quit Italia's shores,
 To visit Agrin's^a walls, and Buda's^a towers.

And afterwards:

Che senza fede e senza amor mi nome
 E che dimostri con parole e conni
 Ch' in odio, ch' in dispetto habbia il mio nome.

Still let him, at his will, my faith reprove,
 And tax me still with breach of loyal love;
 With every word and deed to sh^h proclaim
 His seuk'd hatred of my hapless name!

The only consolation Ludovico had, was the leading a retired life, which suited his disposition the more than the continual bustle of a court. He now applied himself, without interruption, to give every improvement to his Orlando; and in the year 1521 published another edition of it, with further corrections.

In the mean time, cardinal Hippolito died; and Ariosto, who for fifteen years lived in a state of uneasy dependence, and had now reached the forty-fourth year of his age, was determined never more to be connected with a court: but being closely persuaded by his intimate friend Buonaventura Pistofolo, secretary to Alphonso, he engaged in the service of that prince, from whom he met with a most gracious and affectionate reception.

Not long after, when Adrian II. succeeded to the papal chair, Grafagnana, a province on the Apennine, being torn to pieces by factions, augmented by the licentiousness into which the people had degenerated, from a total remission of government, it was judged necessary to appoint a person, whose prudence and authority might reduce them to a due subjection. For this important trust Ariosto was chosen, who, though very averse to the journey, would not again hazard incurring the displeasure of his patron.

Ludovico continued three years in his new government, in which he acquitted himself so well, that he not only brought the people to a proper sense of their duty to their sovereign, but entirely gained their affections to himself; and was highly applauded by the duke for his good services. An extraordinary instance is here given of the veneration paid to his character by all ranks and degrees of men: At his first coming to the government, having occasion one day to cross a wood, with about six horsemen in his company, he was obliged to pass through a number of armed men, who, from their appearance, gave great cause of suspicion; the country being, at that time, all round greatly infested with robbers, the most formidable of whom were headed by Dominico Maroco and Filippo Pacchiona. Ariosto had scarcely got clear of this troop, before-mentioned, when the captain demanded of one of the servants, that happened to be behind the rest, who the stranger was; and being told it was Ludovico Ariosto, he immediately ran to overtake him, armed as he was. Ariosto, seeing him follow, stopped short, waiting with some anxiety for the end of this affair. His pursuer, coming up, saluted him with great respect; and, declaring that his name was Filippo Paocchio, begged pardon, that, not knowing him, he had suffered him to pass, without paying the respect due to his singular merit.

Mr. Baretti, in the preface to his Italian Library, relates this story, with different circumstances, in the following words; concluding with a reflection on the power of eloquence over savage minds, very apposite to the subject.

“ Among other striking instances of the people’s veneration for him, Ariosto had one of a very particular nature. The duke, his master, had sent him governor of Grafagnana, a province on the Apennine, whose inhabitants, seizing the opportunity of the general turbulences that were in Italy at that time, paid but little obedience to their sovereign. Ariosto took his residence in a fortified castle, from which it was imprudent to step out without guards; as the whole neighbourhood was swarming with outlaws, smugglers, and banditti, who, after committing the most enormous excesses all around, retired, for shelter against justice, amidst the rocks and cliffs. Ariosto, one morning, happened to take a walk without the castle, in his night-gown, and, in a fit of thought, forgot himself so much, that, step after step, he found himself very far from his habitation, and surrounded, on a sudden, by a troop of these desperadoes, who certainly would have ill-used, and perhaps murdered him, had not his face been known by one of the gang; who informing his comrades that this was signor Ariosto, the chief of the banditti addressed him with intrepid gallantry, and told him, that since he was author of the Orlando Furioso, he might be sure none of the company would injure him; but would see him, on the contrary, safe back to the castle: and so they did, entertaining him all along the way with the various excellencies they had discovered in his poem, and bestowing upon it the most rapturous praises. A very rare proof of the irresistible powers of poetry; and a noble comment on the fables of Orpheus and Amphion, who drew wild beasts, and raised walls, with the enchanting sound of their lyres.”

While Ariosto continued in the government of Grafagnana, Buonaventura Pistofalo often proposed to him, by letter, to go as ambassador from the duke to Clement VII. who had been a great patron of our poet; setting before him the honours and advantages that would accrue from such an employ. But Ludovico gave little heed to these solicitations; his mind being altogether detached from the views of interest or ambition. His general answer was, “ that he esteemed it better to enjoy a little, in peace and tranquillity, than to seek after a great deal, with fatigue and anxiety.” Some relate, that he had a repugnance to live at a distance from his country, on account of a lady residing at Ferrara, for whom he had conceived a violent passion; and, indeed, he plainly acknowledges this himself, in his fourth satire, to Annibale Maleguzzi.

Parmi vederti qui ridere e dire,
Che non amor di patri nè di studi,
Ma de donna eè cagion che non vogliore,
Libero t’el confesso, or chiudi
La bocca —————

Methinks you smile, and cry—nor love of home,
Nor study makes your friend averse to roam:
But some fair dame—I own the guilt at large;
Upbraid not him who triumphs in the charge.

The term of his government being expired, he returned to court, where, finding the duke took great delight in theatrical representations, he applied himself to the drama; and, besides the Comedia and Suppositi, he composed La Lena, and Il Negromante, in prose and verse, and the Scolastica in verse; though the last was left imperfect by his death, and the fifth act added by his brother Gabriele. Of these comedies, four were first printed in prose, and afterwards turned into verse. They were performed with universal applause, before many families of rank; the actors being generally persons of condition: inasmuch, that when the Lena was first acted, in 1528, signor Don Francisco of Este, afterwards marquis of Massa, spoke the prologue himself.

A remarkable anecdote is handed down, which shows how entirely his mind was, in the early part of his life, absorbed by his favourite studies. His father having taken some offence at the conduct of Ludovico, expostulated with him, one day, with uncommon warmth; to which his son listened without the least seeming notice, or returning any answer. Nicolo being gone, his brother Gabriele, who was with him, entered upon the same subject; to whom he gave such satisfactory reasons, as entirely removed every other objection that had been brought against him. His brother then asking why he had not made use of the same arguments to his father, he replied, that, at that time he was considering whether the scene, which passed between them, might not be of use to him in a comedy he was then writing, called the Cassaria; that he thought his father would serve as an excellent model for an old man, whom he had introduced, on a like occasion, reproaching his son: concluding, that his thoughts were so engrossed by the fiction, that he had forgot the reality.

Another anecdote is told, relative to these comedies, which shows how totally the attention of the people in Italy was taken up with the merits and reputation of the Orlando Furioso. Ricoboni conceived a design of exhibiting the Scolastica of Ariosto on the stage at Venice; and public notice being given of the representation. The name of Ariosto drew together a prodigious concourse of spectators. But it unfortunately happened, few of them knew that this author had written comedies; and, before the piece began, Ricoboni was informed, that they had a notion the play was taken from the Orlando Furioso; and, when the performance came on, not seeing Angelica, Orlando, Bradamant, and the other personages of their favourite poem, they began to express their dissatisfaction; which increased to such a degree, that Ricoboni was obliged to drop the curtain at the end of the fourth act.

Ariosto now appeared to lead a life of tranquillity; which was the more agreeable to him, as he was not so deeply engaged by the duke, but that he had sufficient leisure to pursue his studies; the service of Alfonso being far more easy than that of Hippolito. About this time he published his Satires, besides those he had formerly written; in the whole, to the number of seven; till, being again involved in family difficulties, and harassed with law-suits, he was obliged, for some time, to lay aside his compositions. At last, having brought his affairs to a happy crisis, he purchased a piece of ground opposite the church of St. Benedict, where he built a pretty commodious dwelling; which, some say, he was enabled to do by the liberality of the duke. He had a garden adjoining to this house, the usual scene of his poetical meditations. Here he passed the remainder of his life, as much as possible secluded from all public employments.

Having attained the 59th year of his age, he was seized, on the last day but one of the year 1532, with a lingering illness, though some say his illness first came upon him in October or November, about which time the ducal palace took fire, which accident consumed the superb theatre that had been built for the exhibition of his comedies; in the same year he had sent his Furioso to the press with his last improvements, corrected and enlarged as we now have it.

Some physicians attributed the cause of his malady to the custom he had of eating fast, and chewing his victuals little, that occasioned an indigestion; the means they made use of to remove this complaint, brought on a consumption, which, in spite of all the assistance of medicine, at last put a period to his life, at Ferrara, on the 6th of June, or, as others say, on the 8th of July, 1533.

Thus died Ludovico Ariosto, a man of uncommon eminence, whether we consider him as a member of the republic of society, or of the more extensive world of literature: as the first, he acquired the affection and esteem of persons of the highest consideration; he contracted the closest intimacy with the family of Medicis, and was beloved by Leo X. the Augustus of that age: as the second, he was one of the few great poets who see that reputation attend their works, during their life-time, which continues to be transmitted down to posterity; and perhaps few books have been so often printed as the Orlando, which has passed through upwards of eighty editions, and not only been rendered into all the European languages, but is said to have found its way into every part of the world. The uncommon popularity of this author may be further gathered from the numbers that have drawn their subjects from his originals.

Il Doni, an Italian writer, in a register of the manuscript works of several poets, has attributed two pieces to Ariosto, one called Rinaldo Ardito; and the other, Il Termine Del Desiderio; neither of which appears to have been printed. Besides the 46 books of his Orlando Furioso, he left behind him five books on the same story, which were first printed in addition to the original poem in the year 1545, twelve years after Ariosto's death?

An elegant sonnet was written by Nicolo Eugenio in his praise, which we shall here give the reader.

Porto gran tempo al mare altiero il corno
 Il Mincio, e sparso le sue arene d'oro
 Mentre che'l padre de Pierio Choro
 Fece nel grembo suo dolce soggiorno.
 Non men hor lieto, e d' equal' spoglie adorno
 Va'l Po, spargando il nuovo suo tesoro.
 Poi che cantando in lui cigno canoro
 Fa risonar le ricche sponde intorno.
 L'un perche irriga Mantua, donde uscio
 Que ch' i fatti d' Enea più che mortali
 Con stil divino a tutto 'l mondo aprio.
 L'altro Ferrara, onde i concetti eguali
 Spiegò chi l'opre di Ruggier scoprio
 Monstrandole ad ogn'un chiare immortali.
 Long time had Mincius, o'er his golden sand,
 Roll'd to the distant sea in kingly pride;
 While the great father of the Muses' band
 Held his fair dwelling near th' exulting tide.
 Not less elate, with equal honours crown'd,
 His treasure now triumphant Po can tell;
 While, as our Swan his music pours around,
 Along the banks the notes sonorous swell,
 Mincius to Mantua's wall his current leads,
 Whence rose the bard, who blaz'd th' immortal deeds
 Of great Eneas, in his deathless lays:
 Po bathes Ferrara, whence the poet sprung,
 Whose equal muse Rogero's glories sung,
 And o'er the world diffus'd his lineal praise!

Several writers have affirmed, that he was solemnly crowned with laurel by the victorious Charles V. in the city of Mantua, in the year 1532, for his Orlando Furioso; and this circumstance has been as positively denied by others. Mazzuchelli, in his Life of Ariosto, has considered the arguments on both sides; and observes, that the silence of those authors on the subject, who certainly would not have passed over such an event, may justly render the whole suspected; that, among others, surely little attention can be paid to the authority of one writer², who relates that Ariosto had scarcely received the laurel crown, when, transported with joy, and inspired as it were with a poetical phrensy, he ran through the city apparently as mad as his own Orlando. Fornari speaks of the coronation; but Pigna and Garafolo make no mention of it. Il Signore Dottore Barotti thus examines the supposed fact. "Many have doubted of the coronation by Charles, and writers, who speak of it, do not agree upon the time or place: some say that the ceremony was performed at Mantua, and others at Bologna: some, that it happened in 1530, and others, in 1532; but, surely it could not be in 1530, as the complete edition of the poem, with the praises of the emperor, was not published till 1532. In a manuscript book, delivered down for the hand-writing of his son Virginio, are these words: È una bacia che fosse coronato. But, in a public instrument between his son Virginio and his brother, in October 1542, we read as follows: Cum annis decem animam egerit magnificus et Laureatus D. Ludovicus Ariostus, &c. both which, the manuscript book and instrument, are in my possession. In a letter of Galasso Ariosto it is said, that Ariosto had scarce published the last edition of his work when he fell ill, and died after eight months. The publication was in October 1532, and it is difficult to suppose that he could be crowned in November, the time mentioned. Yet the epitaph, caused to be engraven by his nephew's son Ludovico, sets forth the coronation. If Pigna and Garzulo affirm that he fell ill in December, it may be understood that he then took to his bed; and as to the medal of Ariosto crowned, nothing can be proved from that."

² Among other productions that took their rise from the poem of Ariosto, Mazzuchelli tells us, that, in 1530, the whole poem was turned into a spiritual sense, and that Giulio Cesare Croce, in 1607, formed from it another work, on the Passion, Death, and Resurrection of Christ.

To this Mazzuchelli adds, that we may refer to the declaration of Franco, who asserts that he was not crowned; and concludes the argument, by opposing to all these, the authority of the exact Apostolo Zeno, who observes, that Franco petulantly denies that Ariosto was crowned poet, though, besides other testimonies, we have the exclusive privilege granted him by Charles V.

I have thus laid before the reader the chief arguments on the subject, that he may form his own opinion of a fact, which, upon the whole, appears to me at least extremely doubtful; and, indeed, the difficulty attending the proof of a matter, that must have been of such notoriety, and surely upon public record, is to me a forcible presumption against the fact itself, since we see that the account of this kind of honour, which was two hundred years before conferred on the poet Petrarch, has been brought down to us without any equivocal circumstances.

"The custom," says Dr. Burney, "of crowning persons who had distinguished themselves in poetry and music, which was almost as ancient as the arts themselves, subsisted till the reign of the emperor Theodosius, when the Capitoline games, being regarded as remnants of superstition, were utterly abolished. It was not till near the time of Petrarch that poetry recovered its ancient lustre or importance, or was invested with its former prerogatives."

It may not here be altogether foreign to my subject, or unentertaining to the English reader, whose curiosity may probably be excited by the mention of so extraordinary a ceremony, to give an account of this honour, which, as we have before mentioned, was bestowed on Petrarch; the particulars of which I shall transcribe from the elegant Life of that poet, published in the year 1775.

"Orso, count of Anguillara, was senator of Rome, when Petrarch arrived there in the spring of 1341, and was to continue in office but a few weeks longer. The day of the ceremony being fixed, the assembly was convoked early in the morning on Easter-day, which happened to be very serene and favourable to the solemnity. The trumpets sounded, and the people, eager to view a ceremony that had been discontinued for so many years, ran in crowds to behold it. The streets were strowed with flowers, and the windows filled with ladies dressed in the most sumptuous manner, who sprinkled as much perfumed waters on the poet, as would serve for a year in the kingdom of Spain.

"Petrarch appeared at last at the capitol, preceded by twelve young men in scarlet habits. These were chosen out of the first families in Rome, and recited his verses; while he, adorned with the robe of state which the king of Naples had given him, followed in the midst of six of the principal citizens clothed in green, with crowns of flowers on their heads: after whom came the senator, accompanied by the first men of the council. When he was seated in his place, Petrarch made a short harangue upon a verse drawn from Virgil: after which, having cried three times, 'Long live the people of Rome! Long live the senator! God preserve them in liberty!' he kneeled down before the senator, who, after a short discourse, took from his head a crown of laurel, and put it upon Petrarch's, saying, 'This crown is the reward of merit.' Then Petrarch recited a fine sonnet on the heroes of Rome. This sonnet is not in his works.

"The people showed their joy and approbation by loud and repeated shouts; by clapping their hands, and crying out several times, 'Long flourish the capitol! Long live the poet!' Stephen Colonna then spoke; and, as he truly loved Petrarch, he gave him that praise which comes from the heart.

"When the ceremony in the capitol was ended, Petrarch was conducted in pomp, with the same retinue, to the church of St. Peter, where, after a solemn mass, and returning thanks to God for the honour he had received, he took off his crown to place it among the offerings, and hung it up on the arch of the temple.

"The same day the count of Anguillara had letters patent drawn up, by which the senators, after a very flattering preface, declare Petrarch to have merited the title of a great poet and historian; and that at Rome, and in every other place, by the authority of king Robert, the Roman senate and the people of Rome, he should have full liberty to read and comment on poetry and history, or on any of the works of the ancients, and to publish any of his own productions, and to wear, on all solemn occasions, the crown of laurel, beech or myrtle, and the poetic dress. In fine, they declare him a citizen of Rome, with all the privileges thereof, as a reward for the affection he has always expressed for the city and republic.

"Petrarch was then brought to the palace of the Colonnas, where a magnificent feast was prepared for him, at which were assembled all the nobility and men of letters in Rome."¹⁰

To return to Ariosto. The name of this poet is still held in that kind of veneration by his countrymen with which the English consider their Shakespeare. Antonio Zatta, in his edition of Ariosto's works of 1773, relates, that a chair and ink-standish, which, according to tradition, belonged to Ariosto, were then in the possession of Il Signor Dottore Giovanni Andrea Barotti, at Ferrara, and that a specimen of his hand-writing was preserved in the public library of that city. The republic of Venice did him the honour to cause his picture to be painted, and hung up with the senators and other illustrious men in the great council hall, which was afterwards destroyed by fire.

It appears, however, that Ariosto did not finally receive from his professed patrons those rewards, or obtain that establishment, to which he thought his merits had entitled him. Probably the government of Grafagnana added more to his reputation than his fortune; and, from what he says in several parts of his Satires, he was by no means satisfied with his patrons of Ferrara. Nothing particular is recorded of the benefactions of the cardinal to him, before he incurred the displeasure of that prelate. The duke, indeed, gave him two assignments on certain gabels or taxes, the first of which ceased with the abolition of the tax; and the second, which produced him only twenty-five crowns every fourth month, collected, as he says himself, with great trouble, was contested and withheld from him during the war of Lombardy; and some say, that the cardinal, upon withdrawing his patronage, deprived him of this slender advantage. Ariosto himself seems to impute his loss to the duke, and speaks thus on the subject, in his satire addressed to A. M. Sigismondo Malaguzzi.

Tu dei saper, che la mia voglia avara
Unqua non fù; ch'io soleva star contento
De lo stipendio, che traea in Ferrara.
Ma non sai forse; come uscì poi lento
Succedendo la guerra, e come volse,
Il duca che restasse in tutto spento.

Thou know'st I ne'er was tutor'd wealth to crave,
Content with what Ferrara's patrons gave,
Th' allotted stipend——but thou 'rt yet to know
Succeeding wars had made the stipend low.
At length (so will'd the duke) the gain decreas'd
To less from little, till the whole had ceas'd.

Satire iv.

Such were the great advantages which he derived from those in whose service he had engaged, and whose names he had immortalized by his Muse.

Two medals are said to have been struck, both bearing his effigies, but the devices different: on the first was figured a serpent, over which was suspended a hand, with a pair of shears ready to cut off the head or sting; and the other representing a bee-hive, where the bees are driven from their habitation with fire and smoke, that the countryman may possess himself of their honey. The motto of both these medals was Pro bene malis. Some affirm, that these devices were of Ariosto's invention; the first to express the nature of his detractors; and the second, to show that, instead of honours and rewards for his labours, he met only with scoff and derision, alluding to the reception given his Orlando by the cardinal, who, having perused it, asked him, with the most tasteless indifference, where he had collected so many fooleries. Every reader of fine taste, with which fine feeling is inseparable, will form some idea of the poet's thoughts at that time, and may recollect the like illiberal reflection of the statesman Barleigh, on queen Elizabeth's bounty to our own Spenser, All this for a song.

Doice relates, that he caused the device of the serpent to be prefixed to the second edition of his poem; but that in the third he changed it into the bee-hive. In an edition of the Orlando, printed at ¹⁰ Life of Petrarch, vol. i. p. 237.

With respect to pope Leo X. the acknowledged patron of literature and arts, whom Fornari calls particularly liberal to poets, and by whom he relates that Ariosto was highly esteemed, he is said to have made him a present of some hundred crowns for the prosecution of his work, though Ariosto himself is silent upon that head; and yet in the verses published by Gabriele Simeoni, in his satire upon Avario, are these lines:

Successe a lui Leon poi lume e specchio
De cortesia, che fu la cagion prime,
Che al' Ariosto ancor porgiamo orecchio.

Leo to him succeeded, in whom we find
The light and mirror of a courteous mind:
To him we owe, that now, in tuneful strains,
Great Ariosto's page our ear detains.

And in the margin is this note: "Leo X. gave Ariosto several hundred crowns to complete his work."

Upon the exaltation of Leo X. to the papal chair, he paid a visit to that pontiff, with great expectations of advantage, as appears from his 7th satire. The pope gave him a very gracious reception, and gave him a grant of half the profits of a certain bull, the amount of which is altogether unknown; and possibly the sum arising from this may be the donation meant by Simeone. It is however certain, that he left Rome dissatisfied in his expectation: he declares that Fortune, when she raises men to dignities, dips them in Lethe: at the same time he bears testimony to the pope's honourable reception of him.

Testimonio son io di quel ch'io scrivo,
Ch'io nol 'ho ritrovato, quando il piede,
Gli baccia prima, di memoria privo.

Piegarsi a me de la beata sede,
La mano e poi le gote ambi mi prese,
E'l santo baccio in amendue mi diede,
De meza quella bolla anco cortese
Mi fù, de la qual ora il mio Bibiena
Espedito m' ha il resto a le mie spese.

This well I know, this truth can well attest,
When with my lips his reverend foot I press'd,
He seem'd not mindless of his grace design'd,
But lowly from his blessed seat declin'd:
My hand he gracious took, on either side,
He to my cheek a holy kiss apply'd;
And more—he gave me half the bull to share,
Consign'd me, at my cost, hy Bibiena's care.

Sat. iii.

But it seems that Ariosto had raised his thoughts to some great ecclesiastical preferment; on which occasion signor Rolli observes, that one reason why he was not preferred was, that he was devoted to Alphonso of Ferrara, whom the pope hated, and therefore could not give our author a cardinal's hat. Leo died in 1521, six years after the first publication, and the year in which Ariosto published the third edition of his poem. Perhaps had he lived longer, the poet might have experienced further marks of his generosity.

A very extraordinary circumstance is related, and has been received as truth by some, that pope Leo X. exerted the authority and influence of his apostolic character in promoting the success of Ariosto's poem, and that he went so far as to publish a bull in favour of the Orlando Furioso, denouncing the censure of excommunication on all those who should presume to find fault with that performance. Bayle, in his article of Leo X. gravely propagates the story in these words: Etoit ce garder le decorum de la papauté que d'expedier une bulle si favorable aux poésies de l'Arioste. Hippolite en jugea très bien, quand il dit, "D'où avez vous pris tant de fautes." Leo fut plus debonnaire en menaçant d'excommunication ceux qui les blameroient ou empêcheroient le profit de l'imprimeur.

This matter was very likely to be caught up by Voltaire, who accordingly alludes to it, with his usual gaiety, in his last opinion given of Ariosto¹¹.

Upon a close inquiry it will perhaps appear, that there was no other foundation for this story than a diploma or licence granted by Leo for the sale of the work, and this merely from his authority as a temporal prince, in the same manner as patents or privileges are granted in other nations by their respective sovereigns.

We learn from Fontanini, that to the third edition of Ariosto's poem in 1521, published at Ferrara, was a diploma of Leo X. for printing the work (privativa della stampa), written by cardinal Jacobo Sadoletto, secretary of the briefs; and that other diplomas of the same nature were granted to Ariosto by the king of France, by the Venetians, by the Florentines, by the Genoese, and other powers. Apostolo Zeno relates that he had seen a fourth edition, which had once been in the possession of Peter Aretime, in the blank leaf of which were several poetical pieces by that poet; and that in the beginning was a diploma of Clement VII. written by Palladio Blossio, secretary of the briefs, dated January 1532, which grants to Ariosto the privilege of printing, publishing, and vending his Orlando Furioso, with any additions or corrections,—imprimere, corrigere, et suppleri, et in melius reformare.

In the college library at Winchester is an old edition of a Greek Pindar, printed at Rome in 1515, the year in which Ariosto's work was first published, with a diploma or privilege of Leo X. in the title-page¹²; and in 1513, a patent for printing masses, set to music, was granted by the same pope to Ottavio Petruccio.

After what has been said, I believe there can be little reason to doubt but that this pretended bull of Leo was nothing more than a common licence to a book, granted in the customary forms; which circumstance appears to have been violently exaggerated, from the religious fury of the times, to cast an odium on the papal authority in general, and on Leo in particular; and has since been received without examination.

The general character and qualities of Ariosto may be, in some sort, gathered from the foregoing narrative, to which his Italian biographers have added the following particulars.

In his conversation he was modest and affable to every body, demeaning himself in such a manner, as if altogether unconscious of that great superiority which Nature had given him: he was close in argument and ready in repartees, but was seldom observed to laugh more than became the dignity of a philosopher: yet, though his temper was rather inclined to melancholy, which is perhaps the nature of every great genius, he was very remote from a rigid disposition; being particularly open and sprightly in his conversation with women, by whom his company was much coveted. He was an avowed enemy to ceremony, though always ready to pay due respect to place and rank. He abhorred all those dignities that could only be acquired by servility: he was a sincere lover of his country, loyal to his prince, and steady in his friendships. In his diet he was abstemious, making only one meal a day, and that generally towards the evening, and was neither curious for variety or luxuries, being indeed a contender of luxury in general.

Io non hò molto gusto di vivande,
Che scalco sia, fui degno esser' al mondo,
Quando vivevan gli uomini di ghiande.

I little heed what plenteous wealth affords,
Where costly dainties pile luxurious boards:
Well had I liv'd, when man to hardship bred,
In early times on simple acorns fed!

Sat. ii.

While he was composing his Orlando, he would frequently rise in the middle of the night, and cause his servant Gianni to bring him pen, ink, and paper, when he wrote down what had immediately occurred to his imagination, which in the day he communicated to his friends.

His integrity was incorruptible, as appears by what he says to his brother Galasso of the old man, who, being possessed of great wealth, was fearful of being poisoned by his relations, and therefore would trust himself in no hands but Ariosto's.

¹¹ See preface, page 12.

¹² Impressi Romæ per Zachariam Calergi Cretensem, per missu S. D. N. Leonis X. Pont. Max. est etiam condicione, ut nequis alius per quinquennium hos imprimere, aut venundare libros possit, utque qui secus fecerit, in ab univevsa Dei Ecclesia, toto orbe terrarum expers communicatusque censetur,

His affection as a son and brother, is seen from the care he took of his family, after the death of his father: concerning his mother, he thus tenderly expresses himself:

L'età di nostra madre mi percore
Di pietà il core, che da tutti a un tratto
Senz' infamia lasciata esser non puote.

I view my mother's age with pitying eye,
That draws my soul by every tender tie:
Shall she be left by all! forbid it shame,
And every duty to a parent's name!

Sat. ii.

He took great delight in building, but was an economist in his expenses that way: A friend once expressing an astonishment, that he, who had described such magnificent edifices in his poem, should be contented with so poor a dwelling; Ariosto answered very aply, that "words were much easier put together than bricks;" and leading him to the door of his house, pointed to this distich which he had caused to be engraved on the portico:

Parva, sed apta mihi, sed nulli obnoxia, sed non Sordida, parva meo sed tamen ere domus.
Small is my humble roof, but well design'd
To suit the temper of the master's mind;
Hurtful to none, it boasts a decent pride,
That my poor purse the modest cost supply'd.

Notwithstanding what has been mentioned of his personal bravery in the engagement between the pope's vessels and the duke's, he is reported to have been naturally of a timid disposition: when on horseback he would alight on the least appearance of danger: he was particularly timorous on the water: and when he went out of a vessel, would always stay till the last, frequently using this expression, de puppe vicinius eri: in every other respect his temper was firm and unruffled.

His son Virginio has left behind him the following particulars relative to his father, which we will insert in his own words, as the least matter of information must gratify curiosity in the life of so extraordinary a man.

"He was never satisfied with his verses, but continually altering them. He was very fond of gardening, but so frequently varying his design, that he never suffered any plant to remain above three months; at the same time he knew little of botany. I remember, that once imagining he had planted capers, he was highly pleased to see them thrive so well, till at last, instead of capers, he found that he had planted elder. Of authors he highly approved Virgil and Tibullus: he greatly extolled Horace, but thought little of Propertius.

"He made no distinction in his food, but always eat of that which was next him, and often eat a small loaf or roll after he had dined. He was in general so lost in meditation, that he attended little to what passed. It so happened that a stranger once came to visit him at dinner-time, and while his guest was talking, Ariosto eat the meat that was set before him; for which being afterwards reproved by his brother, he only coolly replied, 'That the loss was the stranger's, and that he ought to have taken care of himself.'

Sir John Harrington has given the following anecdote of Ariosto, for which he has not mentioned his authority, and which does not appear in any of the biographers or commentators consulted in writing this life. Take the relation in sir John's own words.

"As he himself could pronounce very well, so it was a great penance to him to hear others pronounce ill that which himself had written excellent well. Inasmuch as they tell of him, how coming one day by a potter's shop that had many earthen vessels ready made to sell on his stall, the potter fortuned, at that time, to sing some stave or other out of Orlando Furioso, I think where Rinaldo requested his horse to tarry for him, in the first book, the 32d stanza;

Ferma, Baiardo, mio, deh, ferma il piede
Che l'esser senz de troppo mi nuoce.

Stay, my Bayardo, stay!—thy slight restraint,
Much has thy want to day perplex'd thy lord.

"Or some such grave matter fit for a potter; but he plotted the verses out so ill-favourably (as might well become his dirty occupation), that Ariosto being, or at least making semblance to be, in a great rage withal, with a little walking-stick he had in his hand, brake divers of the pots: the poor potter, put quite beside his song, and almost beside himself, to see his market half marred before it was a quarter done, in a pitiful tone or manner, between railing and whining, asked what he meant, to wrong a poor man that had never done him injury in all his life? 'Yes, verily!' quoth Ariosto, 'I am yet scarce even with thee for the wrong thou hast done me here before my face; for I have broken but half a dozen base pots of thine, that are not worth so many half-pence, but thou hast broken and mangled a few stanzas of mine worth a mark of gold!'"

A story of the same kind has been likewise told of Cambrus; and Mr. Mickle observes, that "both these silly tales are borrowed from Plutarch's Life of Arcefilaus, where the same dull humour is told of Philoxenus. He heard some brickmakers mistake one of his songs, and, in return, destroyed a number of their bricks!"

He was of an amorous constitution, and very apt to receive impressions from every beautiful object; violent in his attachments, impatient of a rival; but in his amours he was discreet, cautious, and secret. It has been said that he might possibly allude to this by the sculpture of his ink-standish, on the top of which was a Cupid, with his fore-finger placed on his lip, as an emblem of silence. This disposition to gallantry, which he retained to the last year of his life, is confirmed by many parts of his writings.

Persi, chi vuol, ch'el tempo i laoci scioglia
Che amore anoda, e che ci dorrem' anco,
Nomando questa leve e bassa voglia;
Ch'io per me voglio al capel nero e bianco,
Amare ed esortar che sempre s'ami,
E se in me tal voler dee venir manco;
Spezzi or la parca all' tua vita i stami.

There are who think, that time, with stealing hand,
Dissolves the knot of Cupid's tender hand;
That frozen age ill suits with amorous fire,
When wisdom bids us scorn each frail desire:
For me, let graceful ringlets deck my head,
Or hoary snows my wrinkled temples spread;
Still must I love—still woo the melting dame,
Exhorting all to love—but when the flame
Is quite extinct, the Sisters' fatal shears
May cut my thread, and end my useless years.

Elegy xv.

The names of the women, whom he loved, do not appear to be mentioned, except one whom he is said to be strongly attached to, of the name of Gencura, to whom he is supposed to allude in his sonnet.

Quel' arboscel, che in le solinghe riva
All' aria spiega i rami oridi et irti,
E d'odor vince i pin gli abeti e i mirti,
E lieto e verde al caldo e al ghiaccio vive,
Il nome hà di colei che mi prescrive
Termine e leggi a' travagliati spirti,
Da cui seguir non portrian' scille e sirti
Ritarmi, o le brumali ore o l'estive.
E se benigno influxo di pianeta,
Lunghe vigilie od amorosi sproni

THE LIFE OF ARIOSTO.

Son per condurmi ad onorata meta;
 Non voglio, o Febo, o Bacco, mi perdoni,
 Che lor frondi mi mostrino poeta;
 Ma che un Ginebro sia che mi coroni.

Yon tree, that near the rivulet's pleasing scene
 Than pines or myrtles sweeter scents the gale,
 Whose boughs, for ever gay, for ever green,
 Nor drop in summer, nor in winter fail,
 Bears her dear name¹³, whose beauties fill my heart,
 And o'er my senses boundless sway maintain;
 From whom no change can force me to depart,
 While Fortune shifts her vary'd face in vain!
 Should some fair planet, from benignant skies,
 Befriend a lover's cares, a lover's sighs,
 And kindly lead him to the goal design'd,
 Tho' haply Phoebus chide, or Bacchus frown,
 Their slighted leaves shall ne'er my temples crown,
 But this lov'd tree my happy brows shall bind.

Sonnet vii.

In his early life he contracted an intimacy with a noble Florentine called Nicolo Vespucci, whom he accompanied into Florence in 1513, being then thirty-nine years old, to perfect himself in the Tuscan dialect, and to be present at the magnificent ceremony used at the feast of St. Baptist: here he fell violently in love with a kinswoman of Vespucci, whom he found preparing a dress of silver embroidered with purple for her sons to appear in at the jousts. Ariosto, who was then deeply engaged in writing his poem, is supposed, from this circumstance, to have taken the idea of that beautiful simile in the twenty-fourth book, when he describes the wound received by Zerbino from the hand of Mandricardo.

Le lucide arme il caldo sangue irriga,
 Pen sin al piè di rubiconda riga,
 Così tal hora, un bel purpureo nastro
 Ho veduto partir tela d'argento,
 Da quella bianca man più ch' alabastro
 Da cui partir il cor sepeaso mi sento.

The warm blood issu'd with a crimson tide,
 And, trickling down, his shining armour dy'd:
 So have I seen a purple floweret spread,
 And stain the silver vest with blushing red;
 Wrought by her snowy hand with matchless art,
 That hand, whose whiteness oft has pierc'd my heart.

It has been the opinion of some, that he was privately married, but that he was obliged to keep it secret for fear of forfeiting some church benefices which he enjoyed: some go so far as to say, that his wife's name was Alexandra, and that he alludes to her in these lines. Ori. Fur. b. xx.

Alessandra gentil ch'umida avea,
 Per la pietà del giovanetto i rai.
 Fair Alexandra, in whose gentle eyes,
 Tears, for the youth, in sweet compassion rise.

Concerning the person of Ariosto, he was rather above the common size, of a countenance generally grave and contemplative, as appears from the admirable picture painted by Titian: his head was partly bald; his hair black and curling; his forehead high; his eye-brows raised; his eyes black and sparkling; his nose large and aquiline; his lips well formed; his teeth even and white; his cheeks rather thin, and his complexion inclining to the olive; he was well made, except that his shoulders were somewhat large, which made him appear to stoop a little; his walk was slow and deliberate, as indeed were his actions in general.

¹³ Ginebre, or Genuro, the juniper-tree, which, by the liberty the Italians give themselves, may be supposed to stand for Geneva.

Ariosto left behind him two sons by Alexandra, who were always considered illegitimate; Virginio before named, and J. Baptista; the first of whom being brought up under his father, who took great pains to instruct him, was made a canon of the house of Ferrara, and Ariosto resigned a great part of his benefices to him: the latter went very young into the army, and, having acquired considerable reputation as a soldier, returned to Ferrara a little while before Ariosto's death, and died himself an officer in the duke's service.

Ariosto is reported to have met his dissolution with the utmost composure, and to have told some of his friends, who were present at his last moments, that he left the world without the least reluctance; and the more so, because, as he believed, that, in another state, men would know each other, he was impatient to meet again so many friends that had gone before him.

He was interred in the church of St. Benedict, under a plain monument, which was afterwards enriched with a number of inscriptions in the Greek, Latin, and Tuscan languages, the greatest wits contending to celebrate his memory.

Ariosto, among his other Latin pieces, left the following epitaph written for himself, but which an Italian writer of his life supposes to have been considered as too ludicrous to be made use of upon the occasion:

LUDOVICUS ARIOSTUS humaniter omnia
 Sub hoc marmore, vel sub hoc humo, seu
 Sub quocumque voluit benignus heres,
 Sive herede benignior comes, seu
 Opportunus incidens victor;
 Nam scire haud potuit futura, sed nec
 Tanti erat vacuum sibi cadaver
 Ut urnam cuperet parare vivens,
 Vivens ita tamen sibi paravit,
 Quae inscribi voluit suo sepulchro
 Olim siquod haberet in sepulchrum¹⁶.

The false thought on which the whole point of this epitaph turns, has been lately justly exposed in an observation on a similar one written by Pope for himself:

Under this stone, or under this sill,
 Or under this turf, &c.

"When a man is once buried, the question under what he is buried, is easily decided. He forgot that though he wrote the epitaph in a state of uncertainty, yet it could not be laid over him till his grave was made."¹⁷

The death of Ariosto was lamented by every good man, and the monks of St. Benedict, contrary to their usual custom, attended his body to the grave; and so great was their veneration of his name, that they would, by no means, consent that his bones should be afterwards removed to a chapel or sepulchre erected for him by his son Virginio, in the garden belonging to his house, which was afterwards destroyed by an ignorant builder, without the concurrence and to the great mortification, of the owners of the dwelling. However, many years after, signor Agostino Mosti, who had a sincere regard for the memory of Ariosto, having been early initiated by him in the knowledge of polite letters, and who was concerned that so great a man should want a monument worthy of him, resolved to build one that should be answerable to the veneration he had for his many virtues. He therefore caused a marble sepulchre to be erected at his own expense in the same church of St. Benedict, adorned with proper emblems, and a fine statue of Ariosto; and to show the zeal with which he paid this last duty to his master, he deposited, with his own hands, the bones of this illustrious poet in their new sepulchre, with the following inscription, and the annexed verses composed by Lorenzo Frizoli.

But in the year 1612 a new and more magnificent monument was erected for him by his nephew's son Ludovico Ariosto, with the effigies of the poet, and two statues representing Glory and Poetry: to this his bones were removed, for the third time. This monument is still to be seen in the church of the Benedictines at Ferrara, with the following inscription:

From east to west the Muses crown with fame;
Whose pointed satire lash'd the vicious age;
Whose comic scenes inspir'd the laughing stage;
Whose martial trumpet, breathing loud alarms,
Could sing of mighty chiefs and bruising arms.
Hail, matchless bard! for Pindus' summit born,
Whose happy brows the triple bays adorn!

GENERAL VIEW
BOYARDO'S STORY, AS CONNECTED WITH ARISTO.

CHARLEMAIN, having proclaimed a solemn feast and tournament in Paris, at which were present many foreign princes and knights from various parts of the world, as well Pagan as Christian, on a certain day, when all the nobles and strangers were assembled, an unknown knight and lady entered the hall, attended by four giants of a dreadful stature. The lady, whose personal charms dazzled all the spectators, addressed herself to the emperor; and begging an audience, told him, that her name was Angelica, that she came with her brother Uberto, from a distant kingdom, attracted by the fame of the magnificence of his court; that her brother, who earnestly desired to prove his valour with the warriors then present, was ready to meet any of them in the field, whether Saracens or Christian, upon condition, that whoever was unhorsed by him should immediately become his prisoner; but that if he himself should be overthrown, he promised to depart with his giants, and leave his sister as the prize of the conqueror: she concluded with saying, that her brother would expect them at his pavilion without the city.

The lady, having received a gracious answer, retired with her company, while every knight, captivated with her charms, felt the utmost impatience to enter the list with the stranger: but above the rest, Orlando, whose eyes had been riveted on so beautiful an object, confessed the poison of love, though he studiously endeavoured to conceal his inward emotions: even Namus could not resist the power of such perfections, nor was Charlemain himself wholly exempted from the general contagion.

In the mean time Malagigi, a cousin to Rinaldo, who was deeply skilled in magic, suspecting that the uncommon visit of these strangers foreboded no good to the Christians, had recourse to his art; and upon consulting his spirits, received intelligence, that the lady was daughter to Galaphron, king of Cathay; that the knight her brother was not called Uberto, but Argalia; that the king their father, to effect a great design which he meditated, had procured for his son a suit of enchanted armour, a golden lance of such hidden virtue, that the least touch of it would dismount the stoutest warrior, and a horse of incomparable swiftness: to these gifts he added a ring of such wonderful efficacy, that being conveyed into the mouth it made the person invisible, and, being worn upon the finger, had the power to frustrate all enchantments: but that the king confided chiefly in the beauty of his daughter, not doubting but her charms would fascinate the champions of Charlemain, and that she would bring them prisoners to the throne of Cathay.

Malagigi having heard this, conceived the design of delivering his country from the impending danger: he caused himself to be transported, by his spirits, to the pavilion of Argalia, whom he found asleep, with Angelica near him, guarded by the four giants: these he soon cast into a deep slumber by the force of his spells, and drew his sword, with a determination to put an end to the life of this dangerous beauty: but, as he approached her, he began to feel sensations of a very different nature, till, every resolution giving way to the softer passions that inspired him, from a nearer view of her charms, he could no longer resist the powerful impulse, but advanced to embrace her.

Angelica, who had the ring upon her finger, which preserved her from the force of his incantations, suddenly awoke, and, finding herself in the arms of a man, uttered a loud cry: Argalia ran to her assistance, and seized Malagigi, while the princess made herself mistress of his magical book, and, calling upon his spirits, commanded them to convey the prisoner to her father's kingdom; which was performed in an instant.

In order to put an end to the dissension that had arisen in the Christian court, each champion claiming the preference to enter first the list with Argalia, the emperor commanded that lots should be drawn; when the names that appeared were Astolpho, Ferrau, Rinaldo, and next Charlemain, who would not be excluded, notwithstanding his age: after these came a number more before the name of Orlando appeared.

Astolpho being armed, as the first on the list of combatants, presented himself to encounter Argalia, was unhorsed by the golden lance, and sent prisoner into the pavilion. Next morning, at daybreak, Ferrau, a Spanish knight, came from the city to try his fortune, and was overthrown in the same manner: but refusing to yield to the conditions of the combat, the giants endeavoured to seize his person; these he slew, and compelled Argalia to engage him on foot. Angelica, fearing the issue of their combat, fled; when Argalia, perceiving her flight, followed her, and was as suddenly pursued by Ferrau.

Ferrau, after some time, entering the forest of Arden, found Argalia asleep, who had not been able to overtake his sister. The Spaniard, determined that he should not escape him, turned Argalia's horse loose, and waited with the utmost impatience till his enemy awoke. An obstinate battle then ensued, till victory at last declared for Ferrau; when Argalia, finding himself mortally wounded, entreated that when he was dead, his body, with all his arms, might be thrown into the river, that no one might wear them after him, and reproach his memory for suffering himself to be vanquished when he was defended with impenetrable armour. Ferrau promised to grant his request, having first desired the use of his helmet for a few days, his own being demolished in the battle.

After the departure of Argalia, Angelica, and Ferrau, Astolpho having recovered his liberty mounted his horse, took the golden lance which Argalia had left behind him, and returned to the city; in his way he met Rinaldo, who was impatient to learn the issue of the combat; and, having heard what had passed, determined to go in search of Angelica.

Orlando, who had felt no ease since the appearance of the lovely stranger, after Astolpho's return, left the court of Charlemain, and set out likewise to follow Angelica, and in his way met with various adventures.

When Rinaldo first left the court of Charlemain to follow Angelica, he entered the forest of Arden, where he came to the enchanted fountain made by Merlin the magician, to cure sir Tristram of his passion for Isotta; but though it so happened that the knight never tasted of the water, yet the virtue of it remained ever after. Rinaldo arriving here drank of the fountain, and immediately found his love for Angelica converted into hatred: he then came to the other fountain, likewise the work of Merlin, called the Fountain of Love, which had the faculty of inspiring the breast with that passion: here, tempted by the beauty of the place, he alighted from his horse; yet, as he had before quenched his thirst, he drank not of the stream, but, stretching himself on the turf, soon fell into a profound sleep.

Angelica, who had fled while her brother was engaged with Ferrau, was led by chance to the same place where Rinaldo lay; the princess, fatigued with her flight, and invited by the clearness of the water, drank a large draught, and conceived a violent passion for the sleeping knight, whom she stood contemplating with inexpressible pleasure till he awoke. As soon as Rinaldo opened his eyes, and beheld Angelica, who was now become the object of his most bitter aversion, he remounted his horse and left the place with the utmost precipitation, in spite of the most moving entreaties which the love-sick virgin made use of to detain him.

About this time Gradasso, king of Sericana, having been long desirous to get possession of Durindana, Orlando's sword, and of Bayardo, Rinaldo's horse, passed with a great army into France; and Orlando being absent, he defeated Charlemain in a general battle, and made him and many of his leaders prisoners. Charlemain promised, at the return of Orlando, to give up to him Durindana and Bayardo; but Astolpho, who was at Paris, and in possession of Bayardo, refused to resign him, and challenged Gradasso to the joust, whom he overthrew with the golden lance; when, according to the conditions of their rencounter, Charlemain and all the prisoners were set at liberty: Gradasso then joined himself to Marsilius.

After the return of Angelica to India, Agrican, king of Tartary, and father of Mandricardo, demanded her in marriage; but being refused by her, he raised a great army, and besieged her in Albracca, the capital of Cathay, inviting other nations to join him. Many gallant actions were performed at the siege. Orlando, Brandimart, Sacripant, Marphisa, Astolpho, and many others, took the part of Angelica; but Rinaldo, who at that time hated Angelica, from his having drunk of the enchanted fountain, joined himself to her enemies: in consequence of which he had several encounters with Orlando. After various successes on either side, and an infinity of adventures engaged in by the several knights during the siege, Agrican was slain by Orlando in single combat; and Angelica, hearing that Rinaldo, whom she then loved, was gone to France, persuaded Orlando to accompany her thither; and after her departure, the enemies of Albracca, taking advantage of the absence of Orlando, and her other brave defenders, entered the city by storm, and reduced it to ashes.

When Angelica, after the taking of Albracca, returned to France with Orlando, she passed again through the forest of Arden, and in her way happened to drink of the fountain of hatred, which entirely obliterated her former passion. About the same time Rinaldo, meeting with the contrary fountain, drank of the waters of love.

While the siege of Albracca was carrying on, Agramant, the young king of Africa, only twenty two years of age, and the bravest knight in the dominions of Africa, except Rodomont, king of Sarza, burning with desire to revenge the death of his father Troyano, slain by the Christians, ordered a council to be called in the city of Biserta, the capital of his empire, where two-and-thirty kings, his tributaries, being assembled, he proposed to them his design of invading the kingdom of Charlemain. After many debates it was at last resolved to transport a powerful force into France, notwithstanding the prophecy of the king of Garamanta, who declared that the expedition would prove fatal to Agramant and his army.

When the king of Garamanta had in vain endeavoured to dissuade Agramant from his designed invasion of France, he told the monarch, that there remained but one expedient by which he might hope to meet with any success against the Christians; this was, to take with him a young hero, named Rogero, who then resided with Atlantes, the magician, on mount Carena. Agramant having, in consequence of this advice, made many fruitless researches to find the fatal warrior, was directed, by the king of Garamanta, to procure the enchanted ring, then in possession of Angelica, daughter of Galaphron, king of Cathay, without which the retreat of Atlantes could never be discovered. Thereupon Agramant, offering great rewards to any one that would undertake this adventure, Brunello, a person of mean extraction, but well versed in the arts of fraud, engaged to perform it. Accordingly he went to Albracca, stole the ring from the princess, and brought it to Agramant, who, in recompense for his good service, made him king of Tingitana. In this excursion, Brunello likewise stole Sacripant's horse Frontino, Marphisa's sword, Orlando's sword Balisarda, which he had won from the enchantress Fabrina, and the famous horn which he had taken from Almontes.

Agramant having got possession of this precious ring, went, with all his court, to the mountain where Atlantes was said to reside; and the ring having dispelled every mist that enchantment had cast before their eyes, they soon discovered the rock on which was the wonderful dwelling; but the height forbidding all approaches to it, Agramant, by the advice of Brunello, ordered a tournament to be held on the plain at the foot of the rock. Rogero, roused with the sound of the warlike instruments, and fired with the sight of horses and armour, which he stood for some time contemplating from the summit of the rock, at last made Atlantes, though with great reluctance, descend with him to the plain. Brunello, who carefully watched the success of his project, soon espied Rogero with Atlantes, and drawing near them, entered into conversation: Brunello was then completely armed and mounted on Frontino, when, observing that Rogero was struck with the beauty of his horse and armour, he presented them to him, and the young warrior impatiently arming himself, and girding Balisarda to his side, leaped on Frontino, and entered the lists, where he overthrew every opponent, and obtained the whole honour of the day. All the combatants were astonished at the valour of this unknown champion, till Agramant, having at last discovered him to be Rogero, whom he had so eagerly sought for, received him with open arms, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and engaged him to accompany him to France, notwithstanding all the arguments used by Atlantes to dissuade the king from taking Rogero with him in that expedition.

After encountering a variety of dangers and adventures, Orlando and Angelica arrived at the Christian camp, where Orlando and Rinaldo meeting, a dreadful combat ensued between them for the lady; but Charlemain interposing with his authority, put an end to the battle, and delivered Angelica to the care of Nassau, duke of Bavaria¹.

Marsilius, king of Spain, being encamped near mount Albano, to which he prepared to lay siege, was joined by Rodomont, king of Sarza, who had passed from Africa before Agramant, and after having lost great part of his fleet in a storm, landed with the remainder of his forces near Monaco, where he met with a very warm reception from the Christians.

Charlemain, having collected the strength of the empire, marched with Orlando and Rinaldo to attack Marsilius, whose army being now reinforced by some of the bravest warriors, among whom were Rodomont and Ferrau, was able to make head against him. The battle was fought with great obstinacy on both sides. Orlando and Rinaldo, elevated with the hopes of possessing Anselica, performed prodigies of valour: Rodomont made great slaughter of the Christians, and Bradamant, sister to Rinaldo, signalized herself in a particular manner. In the mean time, Agramant, having embarked his forces at Biserta, was landed, and advanced with speedy marches towards mount Albano, bringing with him the flower of the African chivalry, among which was the young Rogero, who had been with difficulty drawn from the enchanted fortress, in which he had been shut by Atlantes, to avoid the destiny which threatened him, but whose presence, like that of Achilles, had been declared of the highest importance to the expedition. This young warrior was accompanied by Allantes, who, since he could not divert his charge from the pursuit of glory, was prompted by his anxiety to be near him in time of danger.

The whole force of the Saracens being now united, the battle raged with redoubled fury. Rogero, having overthrown numbers of the Christians, at last singled out Orlando; when Atlantes, fearing the event of such an encounter, by his magic art fascinated the eyes of Orlando, who, believing that he saw Charlemain in danger, abruptly left the field, and was made prisoner in an enchanted garden. At this time Mandricardo joined the army of Agramant, when Rogero and Rinaldo being engaged in single combat, the Christians began to give ground; till, being entirely discouraged by the absence of Orlando, the rout became general, and the tide of fugitives and pursuers parted Rinaldo and Rogero.

During this general battle between the Pagans and Christians, Bradamant, being engaged in single combat with Rodomont, received intelligence from Rogero, who chanced to be a spectator of their battle, that Charlemain was in imminent danger; upon which she desired to go to his assistance: but Rodomont opposing this, Rogero took her quarrel upon himself, encountered Rodomont, and disarmed him, who then retired vanquished by the courtesy of his enemy. After the departure of the prince of Sarza, Bradamant, struck with the manly deportment of Rogero, was desirous to learn who he was, and received from him the account of his origin.

Bradamant, in return, discovered her birth and name, and, taking off her helmet, surprised the young warrior with her beauty. At this instant a band of Pagans fell in with them, one of whom wounded Bradamant in the head, which was then unarmed. Rogero, who had by this time conceived a violent passion for the fair warrior, and enraged at the brutality of the action, advanced furiously to revenge it on the author; the Pagans then attacked him all at once; and Bradamant, who now began to feel the tenderest sentiments for Rogero, immediately joined him: their united force soon got the better of their adversaries, who were either slain, or put to flight: but it so happened, that in the pursuit the two lovers were separated, this being their first meeting; after this Bradamant continued to go in search of Rogero, and arrived at the dwelling of a hermit, or friar, who healed the wound that she had received in her head. Afterwards falling asleep on the banks of a river, she was seen by Flordespina, daughter to king Marsilius, who was hunting in the forest, and, being deceived by the arms and dress of Bradamant, supposing her to be a man, fell deeply in love with her*.

Orlando, having been delivered by Brandimart, Rogero and Gradasso, from the enchanted garden, where he had been confined by Atlantes, arrived at Paris when the city was closely besieged by Agramant, Marsilius, Rodomont, Mandricardo, Ferrau, and the whole power of the Pagans. Orlando and Brandimart attacked the enemy with great slaughter, and Rodomont attempting to scale the walls was thrown down by Orlando. The city was however at last in imminent danger of being taken, having been fired in several places; but a great storm arising, with a sudden violent shower of rain, extinguished the flames, and put an end to the battle for that time.

Here the great action of Boyardo breaks off unfinished, and the subject is again taken up by Ariosto in the eighth book of the Orlando Furioso.

* This story is completed by Ariosto, Orlando Furioso, book xiv.

BOOK I.

THE ARGUMENT.

Orlando arrives at the Christian camp with Angelica, where, to put an end to the dissection that had arisen between him and Rinaldo, she is taken from him by Charlemain, and given to the care of Namus. The Christian army is defeated, in a general battle, by the forces of Agramant and Marsilius. Angelica flies from the camp, and is met by Rinaldo, who fights for her with Ferrau, till the combat being broke off by the departure of the lady, they both go in search of her. Ferrau, endeavouring to recover his helmet from the river, sees the ghost of Angalia, who reproaches him with perjury. Angelica, having taken shelter in a bower, sees unexpectedly one of her former lovers, to whom she discovers herself: their conversation is interrupted by the arrival of a strange knight: a battle ensues, the stranger departing, they find Bayardo, Rinaldo's horse, and soon after meet Rinaldo himself.

DAMES, knights, and arms, and love! the deeds that spring

From courteous minds, and venturous feats, I sing!¹

¹ It is said cardinal Hippolito had been heard to declare that Ariosto was particularly difficult in composing the two first lines of his poem, and that he wrote them many times before he could satisfy himself. Marc Antonio Mureto, a most respectable writer of the 16th century, delivers himself thus on the subject: Audi vi maximis viris qui facillime id nosse poterant, Ludovicum Arceotum nobilissimum nobilissimæ domus præconem in duobus primis grandiosis illius poematis sui versibus, plusquam credi potest, laborasse, neque sibi prius animum explere potuisse, quam quum illos in omnem partem diu multumque versasset.

What time the Moors from Afric's hostile strand
Had cross'd the seas to ravage Gallia's land,
By Agramant, their youthful monarch, led,
In deep resentment for Troyano dead,²
With threats on Charlemain's vengeance his fate,
Th' imperial guardian of the Roman state.

Nor will I less Orlando's acts rehearse,
A tale not told in prose, nor sung in verse; 10
Who, once the flower of arms, and wisdom's boast,
By fatal love his manly senses lost.
If she, for whom like anguish wounds my heart,
To my weak skill her gracious aid impart,
The timorous bard shall needful succour find,
To end the task long ponder'd in his mind.

Vouchsafe, great offspring of th' Herculean line,
In whom our age's grace and glory shine,
Hippolito, these humble lines to take,
The sole return your poet e'er can make; 20
Who boldly now his gratitude conveys
In sheets like these, and verse for duty pays:
Nor deem the labour poor, or tribute small;
'T is all he has, and thus he offers all!

Here midst the bravest chiefs prepare to view
(Those honour'd chiefs to whom the lays are due)
Renown'd Rogero, from whose loins I trace
The ancient fountain of your glorious race:
My Muse the hero's actions shall proclaim,
His dauntless courage, and his deathless fame; 30
So you awhile each weightier care suspend,
And to my tale a pleas'd attention lend.

Orlando³, long with amorous passion fir'd,
The love of fair Angelica desir'd:
For her his arms immortal trophies won,
In Media, Tartary, and India known.
Now with her to the West he held his course,
Where Charlemain encamp'd his martial force,
And near Pyrene's hills his standard rear'd, 40
Where France and Germany combin'd appear'd,
That Spain and Afric's monarchs, to their cost,
Might rue their vain designs and empty boat:

² See General View of Boyardo's Story. 2 Idib.

This, summon'd all his subjects to the field,
Whose hand could lift the spear, or falchion wield;
That, once again impell'd the Spanish race,
To conquer Gallia, and her realm deface.
And hither to the camp Orlando drew,
But soon, alas! his fatal error knew:
How oft the wisest err! how short the span
Of judgment here bestow'd on mortal man! 50
She, whom from distant regions safe he brought,
She, for whose sake such bloody fields he fought,
No sword unsheath'd, no hostile force applied,
Amidst his friends was ravish'd from his side.
This Charles had doom'd the discord to compose,
That 'twixt Orlando and Rinaldo rose.
Each kindred chief the beauteous virgin claim'd;
Deep hatred hence each rival heart inflam'd:
The king, who griev'd to see the knights engage
With fatal enmity and jealous rage, 60
Remov'd th' unhappy cause, and to the care
Of great Bavaria's duke⁶ consign'd the fair;
Yet promis'd he should bear the maid away.
His valour's prize, on that important day,
Whose arm could best the Pagan might oppose,
And strow the sanguine plain with lifeless foes.
But Heaven dispers'd these hopes in empty wind:
The Christian bands th' inglorious field resign'd?
The duke, with numbers more, was prisoner made;
The tents, abandon'd, to the foes betray'd. 70
The damsel, doom'd to yield her blooming charms,

A recompense to grace the victor's arms,
With terror seiz'd, her ready palfrey took,
And, by a speedy flight, the camp forsook:
Her heart press'd that fortune's sickle turn
That day would give the Christian bands to mourn.
As through a narrow woodland path she stray'd,
On foot a warrior chanc'd to meet the maid;
The shining cuirass, and the helm he wore,
His side the sword, his arm the buckler bore; 80
While through the woods he ran with swifter pace
Than village swains half naked in the race.
Not with such haste the timorous maiden flew,
Who, unawares, a latent snake espies;
As, when Angelica beheld the knight,
She turn'd the reins, and headlong urg'd her flight.
This was the Paladin for valour known,
Lord of mount Alban, and duke Amon's son,
Rinaldo nam'd, who late, when fortune cross'd
The Christian arms, his steed Bayardo lost.⁸ 90
Soon as his eyes beheld th' approaching fair,
Full well he knew that soft enchanting air;
Full well he knew that face which caus'd his smart,
And held in love's strong net his manly heart.

⁴ "Marsilius, king of Spain, who being worsted by Gradasso, king of Sericane, did homage to him for his crown, and joined him: these princes afterwards turned their forces against Charlemain."

Orl. Innam. b. i. c. i, ii, &c.

⁵ Orlando and Rinaldo were cousins.

⁶ Namus, duke of Bavaria.

⁷ At this part Ariosto takes up the story from Boyardo, but passes over the particulars of the battle, which had been fully described by his predecessor. See General View of Boyardo's Story.

⁸ When Rinaldo, in the last general battle, dismounted to engage Rogero, who was on foot, his horse escaped from him.

Meantime th' affrighted damsel threw the reins
Loose on her coursers' neck, and scour'd the plains;
Through open paths she fled, or tangled shade,
Nor rough nor bushy paths her course delay'd;
But pale and trembling, struck with deep dismay,
She lets her flying palfrey choose the way. 100
Now here, now there, amidst the savage wood
She wander'd, till she saw a running flood;
Where on the lonely banks Ferrau she view'd,
With dust and sweat his weary limbs bedew'd:
Late from the fight he came with toil oppress'd,
To quench his thirst, and taste the sweets of rest;
When soon returning to the bloody fray,
An unexpected chance compell'd his stay;
For where the flood its circling eddies tost,
His helmet⁹, sunk amidst the sands, was lost. 110

Now to the stream the pining virgin flies,
And reads the air with supplicating cries;
The Pagan warrior, startled at the sound,
Leap'd from the shore, and cast his eyes around;
Till, earnest gazing, as she nearer drew,
Tho' pale with dread, the trembling fair he knew;
Then as a knight who courteous deeds profess'd,
And love, long since, enkindled in his breast;
Dauntless her person to defend he swore,
Though on his head¹⁰ no fencing helm he wore. 120
He grasp'd his sword, and mov'd with haughty stride
To meet Rinaldo, who his force defy'd,
And oft had each the other's valour try'd.

And now, on foot, oppos'd, and man to man,
With swords unsheath'd, a dreadful fight began;
In vain did plate and mail their limbs enclose,
Not massy anvils could resist their blows.
While thus his utmost force each warrior try'd,
His feet again the virgin's palfrey ply'd;
At his full stretch she drives him o'er the plain, 130
And seeks the shelter of the woods again.

Long had the knights contended in the field,
Nor this nor that could make his rival yield;
With equal skill could each his weapon bear,
Practis'd alike in all the turns of war,
When Alban's lord with amorous fears possess'd,
First to the Spanish foe these words address'd:

"While thus on me your thoughtless rage you turn,
Yourself," he cry'd, "have equal cause to mourn;
If yonder dame, the sun of female charms, 140
Has fill'd your glowing breast with soft alarms,
What gain is yours?—Suppose me prisoner made,
Or breathless, by the chance of battle, laid;
Yet could you not possess the beauteous prize,
For while we linger here, behold she flies!
But if the passion you profess is true,
Then let us first Angelica pursue:
This wisdom bids—be first secur'd the fair,
And let the sword our title then declare;
Else what can all our fond contention gain, 150
But fruitless toil and unavailing pain?"

Ferrau with pleasure heard the Christian knight,
Then both agreed th' adjourn the bloody fight;
And now so firmly were they bound to peace,
So far did rage and rival hatred cease,
That in no wise the Pagan prince would view
Brave Amon's son on foot his way pursue,

⁹ This circumstance of Ferrau leaving the battle, and losing his helmet in the river, is related by Boyardo.

¹⁰ See note to book xii. ver. 312.

Bot courtois had him mount the steed behind,
Then took the track Angelica to find.

O noble minds, by knights of old possess'd ! 160
Two faiths they knew, one love their hearts pro-
fess'd ;

And still their limbs the smarting anguish feel¹¹
Of strokes inflicted by the hostile steel.
Through winding paths and lonely woods they go,
Yet no suspicion their brave bosoms know.
At length the horse, with double spurring, drew
To where two several ways appear'd in view ;
When doubtful which to take, one gentle knight
For fortune took the left, and one the right,
Long through the devious wilds the Spaniard
pass'd, 170

And to the river's banks return'd at last :
The place again the wandering warrior view'd,
Where late he dropp'd his casque amidst the flood ;

Since all his hopes to find his love were vain,
Once more he sought his helmet to regain.
A tall young poplar on the banks arose ;
From this a branch he hew'd and lopt the boughs :
A stake thus fashion'd with industrious art,
He rak'd the river round in every part :
When, rising from the troubled brook was seen 180
A youth with features pale and ghastly mien :
Above the circling stream he rais'd his breast ;
His head aloof was bare, all arm'd the rest :
His better hand the fatal helmet bore,
The helmet that in vain was sought before :
Full on Ferrau he turn'd with threatening look,
And thus the ghost th' astonish'd knight bespoke :

" Wretch ! does this helm perplex thy faithless
mind,

A helm thou shouldst have long ere this resign'd ?
Remember fair Angelica, and view 190
In me her brother, whom thy weapon slew.

Diest thou not vow, with all my arms, to hide
My casque ere long beneath the wheeling tide ?
Though basely thou hast fail'd thy pledged word,
See juster fortune has my own restor'd :
Thou murmur not — or, if thou still must grieve,
Lament that e'er thy falsehood could deceive.
But if thou seek'st another helm to gain,
Seek one that may no more thy honour stain :
Seek one perchance of stronger temper'd charms ;
Such has Orlando, such Rinaldo arms : 201
Mambrino, this ; Almontes, that possess'd¹² ;
By one of these thy brows be nobler press'd :

¹¹ See note to book xii. ver. 312.

¹² I do not find these actions recorded in Boyardo, but, like many others mentioned in the work, Ariosto alludes to them as well-known incidents in the romance writers. In an old romance, in ottava rima, entitled Innamoramento di Rinaldo, apparently much prior to Ariosto, is a long account of a Pagan king, named Mambrino, who comes against Charlemain and the Christians with a vast army. He is at last killed by Rinaldo, but no particular mention is made of his helmet. This helmet of Mambrino, said by Ariosto to be won by Rinaldo, is the same which the reader must recollect to have seen so frequently mentioned in Don Quixote, and for which the knight of la Mancha took possession of a barber's basin. See Jarvis's Don Quixote, vol. i. b. iii. c. vii.

With respect to the death of Almontes, the

But what I claim by sacred faith for mine,
Forbear to seek, and willingly resign."

The Saracen beheld, with wild adright,
The strange appearance of the phantom-knight ;
Up rose his hair like histles on his head,
His utterance fail'd him, and his colour fled.
But when he heard Argalia¹³, whom he slew, 210
(Argalia was the name the warrior knew)
Reproach his tainted faith and breach of fame,
His haughty bosom glow'd with rage and shame.
Then by Lanfusa's life a sacred vow¹⁴
He made, to wear no head-piece o'er his brow,
But that which in fam'd Aspramont of yore,
From fierce Almontes' head Orlando tore.
And to this oath a due regard he paid,
And kept it better than the first he made.
Thence with sad steps in pensive mood he went, 220
And long remain'd in sullen discontent.
Now here, now there he seeks the Christian knight,
And in his panting bosom hopes the fight¹⁵.
Rinaldo, who a different path had try'd,
As fortune led, full soon before him spy'd
His gallant courser bounding o'er the plain —
" Stay, my Bayardo, stay — thy flight restrain :
Much has thy want to day perplex'd thy lord —"
The steed, regardless of his master's word, 230
Through the thick forest fled with speed renew'd,
While, fir'd with added rage, the knight pursu'd.

following account is given in the romance poem of Aspramonte.

Almontes, son of Agolant, and brother to Troyano, having embarked from Africa to revenge the death of Garnier king of Carthage, his grandfather, killed by Milo, father of Orlando, had performed many great actions and slain Milo. He one day came to a fountain called Sylvestra, which was said to be made by St. Silvester, and that by tasting these waters Constantine was converted. Almontes here fell asleep, and was soon after surprised by Charlemain. These two warriors then engaged in a dreadful combat, and Charlemain was very near being defeated ; when Orlando, seeking Almontes, in order to revenge the death of his father, was met by a hermit, who incited him to go to the assistance of Charlemain. Orlando, having lost his sword, took an enormous mace or club from a dead Turk, and soon reached the fountain, where he attacked Almontes, who had just overpowered the emperor. Orlando, after an obstinate battle, killed Almontes, who, before his death, recollecting the prophecy of his sister Galicella, that he should die by a fountain. Orlando then took possession of the armour of Almontes, which was enchanted, and of his horn, together with his horse Brihaduro, and his sword Durindana, both so celebrated in Ariosto. See Aspramonte, cant. xix.

¹³ For an account of the death of Argalia, see General View of Boyardo's Story.

¹⁴ Lanfusa was the mother of Ferrau. Such kind of vows were common with the knights in romance ; thus Don Quixote, in imitation of these, swears he will not rest till he has won a helmet by conquest. Don Quix. part i. b. ii. c. ii.

¹⁵ We hear no more of Ferrau till the 12th book, ver. 169, where he is introduced as one of the knights confined in the enchanted palace of Atlantes.

Now turn we to Angelica, who speeds¹⁶
 O'er savage wilds, and unfrequented meads;
 Nor thinks herself secure, but swiftly acude
 Through the deep mazes of surrounding woods;
 Starts at the leaves that rustle with the wind,
 And thinks the knight pursues her close behind:
 Each shadow that in hill or vale appears,
 Again recalls Rinaldo to her fears!
 So when a lawn or kid by chance has found,
 240 Atr'et the covert of his native ground,
 His hapless dam some furious leopard's prize,
 Who tears her throat and haunches as she lies;
 Far from the dreadful sight, with terror chas'd,
 From grove to grove he flies with trembling haste;
 While every bush he touches in his way,
 He thinks the cruel savage grips his prey.
 Unconscious where she pass'd that day and night,
 With half the next, the damsel urg'd her flight.
 At length she came, where rose a bowery shade,²⁵⁰
 Whose nodding branches to the breezes play'd:
 Two purling streams adorn the sylvan scene,
 And clothe the turf with never fading green:
 Along the meads they roll their easy tide,
 The stones, with murmuring noise, their passage chide.

Here hop'd the fair a safe retreat to find,
 And fondly deem'd Rinaldo far behind:
 O'ercome with toil, with burning heat oppress,
 She sought to ease her limbs with peaceful rest.²⁵⁹
 Then lighting on the ground, she look'd the reins,
 And gave her steed to graze th' enamell'd plains,
 Not distant far, an arbour struck her view,
 Where flowery herbs and blushing roses grew:

¹⁶ Tasso seems to have had a reference to this,
 and the former passage, ver. 95, in describing the flight of Erminia.

Mean while Erminia's rapid courser stry'd
 Through the thick covert of the woodland shade;
 Her trembling hand the rein no longer guides,
 And through her veins a chilling terror glides.
 Jerus. Del. b. vii. ver. 1.

Still flies the damsel to her fears resign'd,
 Nor dares to cast a transient look behind:
 All night she fled, and all th' ensuing day, &c.
 Ver. 13.

But our countryman Spenser more immediately follows Arkosto, in his account of Florimel, on a like occasion, in his Fairy Queen.

Like as an hind forth singled from the herd,
 That hath escaped from a ravenous beast,
 Yet flies away, of her own feet afford,
 And every leaf, that shaketh with the least
 Murmur of wind, her terror bath enorcast:
 So fled fair Florimel from her vain fear,
 Long after she from peril was releast:
 Each shade she saw, and each noise she did hear,
 Did seem to be the same, which she escap'd whyleare.

All that some evening she in flying spent,
 And all that night her course continued;
 Ne did she let dull sleep once to relent,
 Nor weariness to slack her haste, but fled
 Ever alike, as if her former dread
 Were hard behind, her ready to arrest:
 And her white palfrey having conquered
 The main'ring reins out of her weary wrist,
 Perforce her carried wherever he thought best.
 B. lii. c. vii.

Close by the bower the glassy mirror flow'd:
 The bower was shelter'd with a waving wood
 Of lofty oaks; the inner part display'd
 A cool retreat amidst surrounding shade.
 So thick the twining branches nature wove,
 No sight, no sun could pierce the dusky grove:
 A rising bank, with tender herbage spread,
 270 Had form'd for soft repose a rural bed.
 The lovely virgin here her limbs compos'd,
 Till downy sleep her weary eyelids clos'd.
 Not long she lay, for soon her slumber fled,
 A trampling steed her sudden terror bred:
 When, rising silent, near the river's side,
 A graceful warrior, sheath'd in arms, she spy'd.
 Uncertain if she view'd a foe or friend,
 Alternate hopes and fears her bosom rend,
 279 Th' approaching stranger now his steed forsook,
 And stretch'd his careless limbs beside the brook,
 His arm sustain'd his head, and, lost in thought,
 He seem'd a statue by the sculptor wrought.
 An hour and more (my lord¹⁷) the pensive knight
 With head reclin'd remain'd in mournful plight,
 At length began with such a doleful strain,
 To tell the list'ning woods his secret pain,
 That parting rocks might tender pity show,
 And savage tigers soften at his woe:
 He sigh'd; his breast like flaming Ætna glow'd,²⁹⁰
 While down his cheeks the tears like rivers flow'd.
 " Ah me!¹⁸ he cry'd, " whence comes this inward
 smart,
 These thoughts that burn at once and freeze my heart!

What to a tardy wretch, like me, remains?
 With happier speed the fruit another gains.
 To me were scarcely words and looks address'd,
 The last dear bliss another has possess'd.
 Since then I neither fruit nor flowers enjoy,
 Why should her love in vain my peace destroy?
 The spotless maid¹⁹ is like the blooming rose³⁰⁰
 Which on its native stem unsully'd grows;
 Where fencing walls the garden-space surround,
 Nor swains nor browsing cattle tread the ground:
 The earth and streams their mutual tribute lend,
 Soft breathe the gales, the pearly dews descend:
 Fair youths and amorous maidens with delight
 Enjoy the grateful scent, and bless the sight.
 But if some hand the tender stalk invades,
 Lost is his beauty, and its colour fades:
 309 No more the care of Heaven, or garden's boast,
 And all its praise with youths and maidens lost.
 So when a virgin grants the precious prize
 More choice than beauty, dearer than her eyes,
 To some lov'd swain; the power she once possess'd,
 She forfeits soon in every other breast:
 Since he alone can justly love the maid,
 To whom so bounteous she her love display'd.

¹⁷ Addressing his patron.

¹⁸ Imitated from Catullus.

Ut flos in septis secretos nascitur hortis,
 Ignotus pecori, nullo contusus aratro,
 Quem mulocti auræ, firmat sol, educat imber:
 Multi illum pueri, multas optavere puellas.
 Idem quum tenai carptus defloruit ungui,
 Nulli illum pueri, nullas optavere puellas:
 Si virgo dum intacta manet, tuum cara sua, sed,
 Quum castum amisit polluto corpore florem,
 Nec pueris jucunda manet, nec cara puellis.
 Carman Nuptiale.

While others triumph in each fond desire,
 Relentless fortune! I with want expire.
 Then shake this fatal beauty from thy mind, 320
 And give thy fruitless passion to the wind—
 Ah! no—this instant let my life depart,
 Ere her dear form is banish'd from my heart!"

If any seek to learn the warrior's name
 Whose mournful tears increas'd the running stream,
 'Twas Sacripant³³, to hapless love a prey,
 Whose rule Circassia's ample realms obey:
 For fair Angelica his course he bends
 From eastern climes to where the Sun descends.
 For pierc'd with grief, he heard in India's land 330
 With Brava's knight³⁴ she sought the Gallic strand;
 And after heard in France, the blooming fair
 Was given by royal Charles to Namus' care;
 The wish'd-for prize the champion to reward,
 Whose arms should best the golden lily guard,
 Himself that fatal conflict had beheld,
 When Pagan arms the Christian forces quell'd:
 Since then through many a winding track hestray'd,
 And sought with fruitless care the wandering
 maid.

While, grieving thus, in doleful state he lies, 340
 The tears like fountains gushing from his eyes,
 Beyond his wish, propitious fortune bears
 His soft complainings to his mistress' ears.
 Angelica attentive bears his moan,
 Whose constant passion long the fair had known:
 Yet, cold as marble, her obdurate breast
 No kindly pity for his woes confess'd:
 As one who treats mankind with like disdain,
 Whose wayward love no merit could obtain:
 But thus with perils clud'd on every side, 350
 She thinks in him that fortune might provide
 A sure defence, her champion and her guide.
 For who, when circling waters round him spread
 And menace present death, implores not aid?
 This hour neglected, never might she view
 A knight again so valiant and so true.
 Yet meant she ne'er t' assuage his amorous smart,
 Yet kept her deeply treasur'd in his heart;
 And with that happiness his pains reward,
 That happiness which lovers most regard: 360
 Some other new-fram'd wile the fair design'd
 To lure with hope his unsuspecting mind;
 And, when her fears were past, return again
 To all her cruelty and coy disdain.

Then, sudden issuing from the tufted wood,
 Confess'd in open sight the virgin stood;

³³ " Sacripant, king of Circassia, one of the bravest and most faithful of Angelica's lovers. When this princess was besieged in Albracca by Agrican, he marched to her assistance with a numerous army, and performed many gallant actions before the walls. Agrican, having one night by surprise gained admittance into the city, with three hundred of his followers, Sacripant, who then lay dangerously wounded, sallied out, armed only with his sword and shield, and bravely repulsed them, till, the whole army of Tartars entering the walls, he was compelled to retire into the fort, whence, at the request of Galaphron, he soon after set out to ask assistance from Gradasso, king of Sericane."

Orlando Innam. book i. c. x, xi.

³⁴ Orlando, so called from having the marquise of Brava.

As on the scene, from cave or painted grove,
 Appears Diana, or the queen of love.

" Hail! mighty warrior!" thus the damsel said,
 " May favouring Heav'n afford me timely aid, 370
 That you may still unsully'd keep my name,
 Nor with suspicion wring my spotless fame!"

Struck with the vision, Sacripant amaz'd
 On fair Angelica in rapture gaz'd:
 Not with such joy a mother views again
 Her darling offspring, deem'd in battle slain,
 Who saw the troops without him home return'd,
 And long his loss with tears maternal mourn'd.
 The lover now advanc'd with eager pace,
 To clasp his fair one with a warm embrace: 380
 While she, far distant from her native seat,
 Refus'd not thus her faithful knight to meet,
 With whom she hop'd ere long her ancient realms to greet.

Then all her story she at full express'd,
 E'en from the day, when urg'd by her request³⁵
 He parted, succours in the East to gain
 From fam'd Gradasso, king of Sericane:
 How great Orlando did her steps attend,
 And safe from danger and mischance defend;
 While, as she from her birth had kept unstain'd
 Her virgin fame, he still that fame maintain'd. 391

This might be true, but one discreet and wise
 Would scarcely credit such a fond surmise;
 Yet Sacripant with ease the maid believ'd,
 For mighty love had long his sense deceiv'd:
 Love, what we see, can from our sight remove,
 And things invisible are seen by Love.

" What though Anglante's knight³⁶ so long forborn
 To seize the best occasion in his power:—"
 Thus to himself in secret spoke the knight: 400
 " Shall I so coldly fortune's gifts requite?
 Or e'er repent I slighted beauty's charms
 When the glad hour had giv'n them to my arms!
 No—let me crop the fresh, the morning rose,
 Whose budding leaves untainted sweets disclose.
 Midst all disguise, full well the fair approve
 The soft, the pleasing violence of love.
 Then let no frigid complaints my soul affright,
 Nor threatenings rob me of the wish'd delight."

He said; and for the soft attack prepar'd: 410
 But soon a loud and sudden noise was heard:
 The noise, resounding from the neighbouring grove,
 Compell'd the knight to quit his task of love:
 His ready helmet on his head he plac'd;
 His other parts in shining steel were cas'd:
 Again with curbing bit his steed he rein'd,
 Remounted swiftly and his lance regain'd.
 Now, issuing from the wood, a knight is seen
 Of warlike countenance and commanding mien:
 Of dazzling white the furniture he wears, 420
 And in his casque a snowy plume he bears.
 But Sacripant, whom am'rous thoughts employ,
 Deftaund of his love and promis'd joy,
 Beholds th' intruding champion from afar
 With haughty looks, and eyes that menace war.
 Approaching nearer he defies his force,
 And hopes to hurl him headlong from his horse:
 With threatening words the stranger makes return,
 With equal confidence and equal scorn:
 At once he spoke, and to the combat press'd, 430
 His courser spurr'd, and plac'd his lance in rest;

³⁵ Alluding to a passage in Boyardo.

³⁶ Orlando, lord of Anglante.

King Sacripant return'd with equal speed ;
 And each on each impell'd his rapid steed,
 Not bulls or lions thus the battle wage
 With teeth and horns, in mutual blood and rage,
 As fought these eager warriors in the field :
 Each forceful javelin pierc'd the other's shield
 With hideous crash ; the dreadful clangours rise,
 Swell from the valcs, and echo to the skies !
 Through either's breast had pierc'd the pointed wood, 440

But the well-temper'd plates the force withstand.
 The fiery coursers, long to battle bred,
 Like butting rams encounter'd head to head.
 The stranger's with the shock began to reel,
 But soon recover'd with the goring steel ;
 While on the ground the Pagan's breathless fell,
 A beast that living, serv'd his master well.

The knight unknown, beholding on the mead
 His foe lie crush'd beneath the slaughter'd steed,
 And deeming here no further glory due, 450
 Resolv'd no more the contest to renew ;

But turning swift, again pursu'd his way,
 And left the fierce Circassian where he lay.
 As when, the thunder o'er, the ether clears,
 Slow rising from the stroke the hind appears,
 Where stretch'd he lay all senseless on the plain,
 Where fast beside him lay his oxen slain ;
 And see the pine, that once had rais'd in air
 Its stately branches, now of honours bare :

So rose the Pagan from the fatal place, 460
 His mistress present at the dire disgrace.
 He sigh'd full deeply from his inmost heart,
 Not for a wounded limb, or outward smart ;
 But shame alone his tortur'd bosom tore,
 A shame like this he ne'er confess'd before ;
 And more he sorrow'd, when the damsel freed
 His limbs encumber'd from the murder'd steed ;
 Long time he silent stood with downcast look,
 Till first Angelica the silence broke.

She thus began : " Let not my lord becomen 470
 His courser's fatal error, not his own ;
 For him had grassy mead been fitter far.
 Or stalls with grain surcharg'd, than feats of war !
 Yet little praise awaits you haughty knight,
 Nor can he justly glory in his might ;
 For he, methinks, may well be said to yield,
 Who first forsakes the fight and flies the field."

With words like these the drooping king she cheer'd,

When from the woods a messenger appear'd ;
 Tir'd with a length of way he seem'd to ride, 480
 His crooked horn and wallet at his side :

When now, approaching to the Pagan knight,
 He ask'd if he had seen, with buckler white,
 And snowy plume o'er his crest display'd,
 A warrior passing through the forest shade,
 To whom thus Sacripant in brief again ;

" The knight you seek has stretch'd me on the plain :
 But now be parted hence ; to him I owe
 My shame'd defeat, nor yet my victor know."
 " I shall not, since you wish me to reveal," 490
 Reply'd the messenger, your foe conceal :
 Know then, the fall you suffer'd in the light,
 A gallant virgin gave, unmatched in might,
 Of fame for deeds of arms, of greater fame
 For beauteous form, and Bradamant her name."

He said ; and turn'd his courser from the place :
 The Soracen, o'erwhelm'd with new disgrace,
 All mute with conscious shame dejected stood,
 While o'er his features flush'd the mantling blood ;

Till to the damsel's steed the knight address'd 500
 His silent steps, and now the saddle press'd ;
 Then plac'd the fair Angelica behind,
 Resolv'd some more secure retreat to find.

Ere far they rode, they heard a trampling sound,
 That all the forest seem'd to shake around :
 They look, and soon a stately steed behold,
 Whose costly trappings shine with burnish'd gold ;
 He leaps the steepy mounds, and crossing floods,
 And bends before his way the crashing woods.

" Unless the mingled boughs, with dusky shade, Deceive my erring sight," exclaim'd the maid, 510
 " I see Bayardo²³ in you gallant horse, [course :
 That through the woodland breaks his sounding
 One palfrey could but ill two riders bear,
 And fortune sends him to relieve our care."

King Sacripant, alighting on the plain,
 Drew near, and thought secure to seize the rein ;
 But swift as lightnings flash along the sky,
 With spurning heels Bayardo made reply.
 It chanc'd beside him the Circassian stood, 520
 Else had he mourn'd his rash attempt in blood ;
 Such dreadful force was in the courser's heel,
 The stroke had burst a mount of solid steel.

Then to Angelica with easy pace
 He moves, and humbly views her well-known face :

A spaniel thus, domestic at the board,
 Fawns after absence, and surveys his lord.
 The damsel was remember'd by the steed
 Wont at Albracca²⁴ from her hands to feed,
 What time Rinaldo, courted by the maid, 530
 With foul ingratitude her love repay'd.

Now boldly in her hand she took the rein, [made :
 Strook'd his broad chest, and smooth'd his ruffled
 While conscious he, with wondrous sense indu'd,
 Still as a lamb, beside her gently stood,
 The watchful Pagan leap'd into the seat,
 And curb'd, with streighten'd reins, Bayardo's heat.
 The palfrey to Angelica remain'd,
 Who gladly thus her former place regain'd.

Now as by chance she cast her eyes aside, 540
 A knight on foot in sounding arms she spy'd :
 When sudden terrour on her face was shown,
 Soon as the knight for Amon's son was known.

²³ Many wonders are told in the romances of this horse. It is said that he was found by Malagigi in a grotto, together with a suit of armour and the sword Fusberta, all under the guard of a horrible serpent, and that by his magic art he got possession of, and gave them to Rinaldo. See Innamoramento di Rinaldo, c. iv.

²⁴ Malagigi, who was made prisoner by Angelica, (see General View, &c.) being released upon his parole, endeavour'd to persuade Rinaldo to return her love ; but all his arguments proving ineffectual, he, in revenge, by a magical illusion, decoyed his cousin from the Christian camp : Bayardo, being left behind, came into the possession of Astolpho, who, going to the siege of Albracca, in aid of Angelica, was overthrown before the walls of that city, when his horse was seized by Agrican ; who being afterwards slain, Bayardo came into the hands of Orlando, who had lost his horse Brigliadoro. Orlando at last having recovered his own, and departing from Cathay on a new adventure, left Bayardo in Albracca with Angelica, who soon after sent him to his master Rinaldo. See Orlando Innam.

Loag had he woo'd, but she detests his love;
Not swifter from the falcon flies the dove.
He hated once, while she with ardour burn'd;
And now behold their several fortunes turn'd;
This cause at first from two fair fountains came,
Their waters different, but their look the same:
Amidst the shade of Arden's dreary wood, 530
Pull in each other's view the fountains stood:
Who drinks of one, inflames with love his heart,
Who drinks the other stream contemns his dart:
Rinaldo tasted that, and inly burn'd;
The damsel this, and hate for love return'd.

Soon as Angelica beheld the knight,
A sudden mist o'erspread her cheerful sight;
While with a faltering voice and troubled look
To Sacripant with suppliant tone she spoke;
And begg'd him not th' approaching chief to meet,
But turn his courser, and betimes retreat. 561

"Does then my prowess," Sacripant replies,
"Appear so mean and worthless in your eyes,
That you too feeble deem this slighted hand,
The force of yonder champion to withstand?
Have you forgot that memorable night⁶⁶
When at Albracca I maintain'd the fight?
In your defence, unarm'd, I durst oppose
King Agrican, and brav'd a host of foes."

"Not so," she said—nor to reply she knew; 570
As thus she spoke Rinaldo nearer drew,
Who now began the Pagan king to threaten.
Soon as his eyes the well-known courser met, [fir'd
And that lov'd face he view'd, whose charms had
His ravish'd bosom, and his soul inspir'd.

But cease we here: the ensuing book shall tell
What strife between these haughty warriors fell.

⁶⁶ "As many of these specious and wonderful tales in romance writers are borrowed from Greek or Latin poets, so this story of the two fountains of Ardena, with their different effects, is borrowed from Claudian, in his description of the gardens of Venus.

*Labeator gemini fontes, hic dulcis, amarus
Ater, et infusus corrumpit mella venenis:
Tunc Cupidincas armavit fama sagittas.*

Two fountains here, of different nature, rise:
This dulcet draughts, that bitter streams supplies:
While here dire poison flows to taint the heart,
Fame tells that Cupid tempers there his dart."

Upton, Notes on Spenser, b. iv. c. iii.

Spenser mentions one of these fountains in his Fairy Queen.

Much more of price, and of more gracious power,
Is this, than that same water of Arden,
The which Rinaldo drank in happy hour
Described by that famous Tuscan pen:
For that had might to change the hearts of men
From love to hate. Book iv. c. iii.

⁶⁷ See note on ver. 526. Concerning the force mentioned in romances to have been set down before Albracca, Milton, to express the idea of a prodigious concurrence, alludes to it in the following lines:

Such forces met not, nor so wide a camp,
When Agrican, with all his northern powers,
Besieg'd Albracca, as romances tell,
The city of Galaphron, from thence to win
The fairest of her sex, Angelica,
His daughter, sought by many prouest knights,
Both Paynim and the peers of Charlemain;
Such and so various was their chivalry.

Parad. Reg. b. iii. ver. 336.

BOOK II.

THE ARGUMENT.

Battle betwixt Sacripant and Rinaldo. Angelica, flying, meets with a hermit, who, by a magical illusion, parts the two rivals. Rinaldo, returning to Paris, is sent by Charlemain on an embassy to England. Bradamant, seeking her lover Roger, meets with Pinabelle, from whom she hears a melancholy story of his misfortunes.
She promises him assistance; and afterwards,
being deceived, falls into a pit.

Am! why so rare does cruel Love inspire
Two tender bosoms with a mutual fire!
Say, whence, perfidious, dost thou pleasure find,
To sow dissension in the human mind?
In shallow waters when I vain would keep,
Thou, to my ruin, draw'st me to the deep:
From those, that love me, dost avert my love,
To place it where no sighs, no sufferings move!
Thou giv'st Angelica to enslave the knight,
Yet mak'st him hateful in the virgin's sight: 10
But when she lov'd him, and his form admir'd,
He, with aversion, from her love retir'd.
With grief he now in flames empty'd burns,
Thus equal fortune scorn for scorn returns.

Rinaldo furious thus—"Base thief! aight!
Forsake my courser, and restore my right.
Think not such theft shall unreveng'd succeed,
Impending punishment awaits the deed;
But more—you daniel to my arms resign; 20
'Twere far unmeet such beauties should be thine.
Wert not a shame, that hence a thief should bear
A steed so stately, and a maid so fair!" [ous lie,"

"Thief! dost thou say!—take back th' opprobri-
With equal rage the Pagan made reply:
"But, if we trust the common voice of fame,
'Tis thou far more deserv'st th' opprobrious name.
This instant shall the important strife decide,
Who merits best the courser, and the bride:
Yet this, so far our thoughts conform, I own,
No equal to her charms the world has known." 30

As when two hungry natives from afar,
By hate or envy mov'd, prepare for war;
Slowly they meet, their threatening teeth they show,
With livid fire their glaring eye-balls glow:
At last with snarls the bitter fray they wage,
And bite and tear in mutual blood and rage.
So, after piercing taunts and vengeful words,
The mighty warriors drew their shining swords.

One urg'd the conflict from the courser's height,
One on his feet below maintain'd the fight: 40
Nor think the horseman could th' advantage boast,
His force was useless and his prowess lost;
For well, by nature taught, the faithful steed
Against his lord refus'd his strength and speed;

² In the Orlando innamorato, Orlando, who had lost his horse Brigliadoro, having got possession of Bayardo, and engaging in combat with Rinaldo,
a contest arising between them, the horse refuses,
in the same manner as here, to fight against his master. B. i. c. xxvi.

³ These kind of tales told of the great sagacity of horses, and the love which they bear their masters,
have more than poetical warrant for their truth;

Nor could Circassia's prince, by skill or force,
 With spur or bit direct the restif horse.
 Now prone to earth his head Bayardo thrust;
 Now wheel'd around; now furious spurn'd the dust;
 When haughty Sacripant in vain had try'd
 Each vary'd art to tame his headstrong pride, 50
 His hand he laid upon the saddle-bow,
 And swift alighted on the plain below.
 The Pagan thus escap'd Bayardo's might,
 Between the chiefs ensu'd a dreadful fight.
 Now high, now low, their rapid steel they ply;
 While from their arms the fiery sparkles fly!
 Not swifter the repeated strokes go round,
 Which hollow Etna's winding caves resound,
 When Vulcan bids the ponderous hammers move,
 To forge the thunder and the bolts of Jove. 60
 Sometimes they feign a stroke; sometimes they stay;
 Then aim the thrust, as skillful in the play.
 Sometimes they rise; then stoop upon the field;
 Now open lie; then crouch beneath the shield;
 Now ward; then with a slip elude the blow;
 Now forward step; then backward from the foe:
 Now round they move; and where the one gives
 The other presses on with eager pace. [place,

Brave Amon's son³, collecting all his might,
 His weapon rais'd to strike the Pagan knight; 70
 When Sacripant, to meet the falchion, held,
 Compos'd of bone and steel, his ample shield:
 The sword *Fusberta*⁴, rushing from on high,
 Pierc'd the tough plates; the sounding woods reply;
 The bone and steel, like ice, in shivers broke;
 His arm benumb'd confess'd the dreadful stroke.

This, when the fair and fearful damsel view'd,
 And well perceiv'd the mischief that ensu'd,
 A death-like paleness chas'd her rosy bloom,
 Like one who trembling waits his fatal doom. 80
 She thinks the time admits of no delay,
 And fears that hour to be Rinaldo's prey;
 Rinaldo, hateful to her virgin breast,
 Though love of her his amorous soul distress'd.
 She turn'd her palfrey to the woods in haste,
 And through a narrow thorny passage pass'd,
 While oft she cast behind her timorous view,
 And deem'd she heard Rinaldo close pursue.
 Not far she fled, but where a valley lay,
 She met an aged hermit on the way: 90
 His beard descending on his breast was seen,
 Severe his aspect, and devout his mien.
 He seem'd with years and frequent fasting worn,
 And gently on a slow-pac'd ass was born:
 While all his form bespoke a pious mind,
 From the vain follies of the world refus'd:

for historians relate the name of the horses of Alexander and Julius Cæsar.⁵

Upton, Notes on Spenser, b. v. c. iii.

³ Rinaldo.

⁴ This strange affection of giving names to swords was common with them; thus Joyosa is the name of Charlemin's sword, in Aspramonte;
Chrysur, is the name of Arthegal's sword, in Spenser; Caliburn, of king Arthur's, in the romance of that name; Ascalon, of St. George's, in the Seven Champions; Traschera, of Agrican's, in Boyardo; and in Ariosto, besides Fusberta, we have Rogero's Baisarda, and Orlando's Duriodana.
 In Spenser, Arthur's sword is called Mordure; and his shield or banner, Pridwen, and his spear, Roan,
 by the romance writers.

Yet, when the fair and blooming maid appear'd,
 So much her looks his drooping spirits cheer'd;
 Though cold and feeble, as his age requir'd,
 An unknown warmth his languid pulse inspir'd. 100

Of him the damsel sought the nearest way
 To where in port some ready vessel lay,
 That there embarking, she might quit the shore,
 And never bear Rinaldo mention'd more.
 The hermit, vers'd in magic, strove to cheer
 The virgin's thoughts, and dissipate her fear;
 Drew from his side a book his skill to prove,
 With promise every danger to remove.
 A leaf he'd scarce perus'd, when to their sight,
 In likeness of a page, appear'd a spright; 110
 Who, by the force of strong enchantment bound,
 Went where the knights in cruel strife be found;
 And when his eyes the furious fight espy'd,
 Between them boldly rush'd, and loudly cry'd:
 "Tell me, ye warriors! what avails the strife,
 Though either should deprive his foe of life;
 If without sword unsheath'd, without the fear
 Of shatter'd armour, or the lifted spear,
 Orlando now to Paris safe conveys

The maid, whose charms your fond contention raise?
 Not hence a mile, the couple I describ'd, 121
 Whose bitter taunts your empty pains deride.
 Attend my counsel—Cease your fruitless fight,
 And, while occasion serves, pursue their flight:
 For know, if Paris' walls they safely gain,
 Henceforth your hopes to see your love are vain."⁶

He said: the gallant knights on either hand,
 Struck with the news, abash'd and silent stand;
 Condemning each his judgment and his eyes,
 That thus their rival should obtain the prize. 130
 At length, a sigh deep-issuing from his breast,
 His steps Rinaldo to his steed address'd;
 And row'd, o'ercome with anger and disdain,
 To glut his vengeance on Orlando slain;
 Nor bade farwell, nor with a courteous mind,
 He proffer'd once to take the knight behind.⁷

Urg'd by the well-known spur, the fiery steed
 Bore all before him that oppos'd his speed:
 Nor trench, nor steepy mound, nor thorny shade,
 Nor crossing flood, Bayardo's passage stay'd. 140
 Deem it not strange, Rinaldo seiz'd again
 The generous courser, sought so long in vain;
 Who, fraught with human sense, when first he view'd
 The trembling damsel's flight, her track pursued.
 Not idly from the Christian camp he fled,
 But to regain the maid his master led,
 Who then, on foot, a dreadful combat wag'd
 With a fierce baron⁷, hand to hand engag'd:
 The faithful steed, to guide him where she went,
 His course sagacious to the forest bent: 150
 Nor suffer'd yet his generous lord to ride,
 Lest he should turn him from his path aside.
 By him Rinaldo twice the fair o'ertook,
 And twice the fair his eager sight forsook:
 For first Ferrau, as late my tale disclos'd,
 Then Sacripant his amorous hopes oppos'd,
 Bayardo now, confiding in the spright,
 Whose specious falsehood had amus'd the knight,

⁵ The poet returns to Angelica. Book viii, ver. 199.

⁶ We bear again of Sacripant in the 4th book,
 ver. 313, where he is delivered by Bradamant,
 with the other knights, from the castle of Atlantea.

⁷ Rogero, with whom Rinaldo fought at the last general battle. See General View of Boyardo's Story,

Pursued his way, and patient of command,
 Obedient the spur, and answer'd to the hand. 160
 Rinaldo, fir'd with love and stern disdain,
 To Paris flies, and gives up all his rein:
 So deep the tidings rankled in his thought,
 Which the vain phantom of the hermit brought.
 Nor ceas'd his eager journey morn or night,
 Till the near city rose before his sight;
 Where Charlemain, with his defeated crew,
 To unhappy remnants of his strength withdrew:
 A siege expecting now, he bends his care,
 Supplies of stores and forces to prepare. 170
 He sinks the trenches, fortifies the walls,
 And every aid, in time of danger, calls;
 Provides an embassy to England's shore,
 With speed auxiliar prowess to implore:
 Resolv'd again to tempt the doubtful field,
 And try what war another day might yield;
 Then sends Rinaldo to the British clime,
 Known by fair England's name in future time.
 Sore griev'd the Paladin at this command; 179
 Not that he shou'd to tread the British land,
 But that the hasty charge his prince enjoind,
 Bade him, reluctant, leave the fair behind;
 Yet, as his duty call'd, he takes his way,
 And speeds to Calais, restless of delay.

The knight, impatient to return again,
 Against the counsels of the sailor-train, [form,
 Tempts the black sea, that wears a threatening
 And, murmuring hoarse, forebodes the future storm.
 The Wind, who sees the knight his power despise,
 In dreadful tempests makes the billows rise, 190
 And with such fury whirls them from below,
 That o'er the mast th' insulting waters flow.
 The skilful mariners, with busy care,
 Strike their broad sails to shun the watery war;
 And think th' abandon'd harbour to regain,
 Whence, in ill hour, they dar'd to brave the main.
 "Fools! never hope" (the Wind indignant cried)
 "Unpunish'd thus my empire to deride!"
 Raging he speaks, and makes the crew obey
 On pain of shipwreck, as he points the way. 200
 Before, behind, unwear'd howls the blast:
 With humble sails the wandering vessel pass'd,
 Now here, now there, amidst the watery waste.

But since a web so various I prepare,
 Where every thread by turns demands my care,
 I leave Rinaldo⁸ in the stormy main,
 And turn to noble Bradamant the strain;
 The warlike virgin, whose resistless might
 Had from his courser thrown Circassia's knight.
 Not Charlemain, or joyful France, survey'd 210
 With less delight the valour of the maid,
 Than the known prowess of Rinaldo's arms.
 Such martial fire her daring bosom warm'd
 To her a gentle youth's affection bore,
 Who came with Agramant from Afric's shore;
 Whom Agolant's unhappy daughter⁹ bred,
 The vigorous offspring of Rogero's bed;

⁸ The poet returns to Rinaldo, book iv. 368.

⁹ For the loves of Rogero and Bradamant, see General View of Boyardo's Story.

¹⁰ For the genealogy of Rogero, take the following fictitious account from Boyardo.

"After the Grecians had taken Troy, and put most of their prisoners to the sword, among whom was Polyxena, daughter of Priam and Hecuba, who was sacrificed at the tomb of Achilles; in order entirely to extirpate the race of Hector, they

And she, nor nurs'd in wilds, nor savage-born,
 Receiv'd not love like his with maiden scorn;
 Though fortune yet had giv'n the dame and knight
 But once to speak and meet each other's sight. 221

Now Bradamant explores with fond desire
 Her lover, call'd Rogero from his sire;
 And unaccompany'd securely fir'd,
 As if a thousand squadrons were her guard.
 Soon as her arm had cast, in single fight,
 Low on his mother earth Circassia's knight;
 A wood she travers'd, then a mountain pass'd,
 And to a limpid river came at last.
 That through the mead its gentle current drew,
 Where ancient trees with spreading branches grew:
 A pleasing noise the murm'ring waters made, 231
 Inviting swains to drink beneath the shade:
 A rising hillock on the left was seen,
 That fenc'd from noon-tide heat the cheerful green.

Here, as the virgin turn'd her eyes aside,
 On the fair bank a comely youth she spy'd:
 Fast by the margin of the flood he lay,
 The margin with a thousand colours gay.
 Alone and silent in a pensive mood, 240
 With steadfast gaze the crystal stream he view'd:
 Not distant far a tree his courser held,
 Aloft were hung his helmet and his shield:
 His eyes were moist with tears, his head declin'd,
 Sad indications of a troubled mind.

Urg'd by desire which prompts each generous
 heart

In others woe to bear a friendly part,
 The virgin begs th' afflicted knight to show
 His secret state, and whence his sorrows flow:
 To whom the stranger all his grief display'd, 250
 Mov'd with the courteous speeches of the maid,
 And by her looks misled, that seem'd to tell
 Some gallant warrior prov'd in battle well.

Thus he—"Know, gentle knight, a valiant crew
 Of horse and foot, in aid of Charis, I drew,
 When near Pyrene's hills the Christian force
 Encamp'd t' oppose Mansilius in his course.
 With me a damsel went, from whom my breast
 Had long the powerful fire of love conferr'd:
 Whent, lo! we saw near Rhodan's rapid tide 260
 A knight all-arm'd a flying steed¹¹ bestride.

sought for Astyanax; but Andromache, to preserve his life, concealed him in a sepulchre, and took another child in her arms, with whom being found, they were both put to death. In the mean time,
 the real Astyanax was safely conveyed, by a friend of his father, to the island of Sicily, when, being grown to man's estate, he conquered Corinth and Argos: he established a government at Messina, and married the queen of Syracuse, but was afterwards killed by treachery; and his widow, being driven from the city by the Greeks, took shelter in Risa, where she was delivered of a son named Polydore, from whom descended Clovis and Constantius. Constantius was the head of the line of Pepin, father of Charlemain; and from Clovis came Rogero, who married Galicella, daughter of Agolant; Rogero, being cruelly murdered, and his city destroyed, his wife fled to the coast of Africa, where she was delivered of two children, a boy and a girl, and died soon after: the boy, called Rogero, was brought up by Atlantus, a magician."
 See Orlando Innam. h. ii. c. i. &c.

¹¹ The fiction of this griffin-horse is Ariosto's own, nothing like it occurring in Boyardo.

Soon as the robber (whether hollish spright
That with a human form deceiv'd the sight,
Or mortal horn) beheld my blooming fair,
Swift as a falcon through the yielding air,
He flew, and seiz'd her trembling with dismay,
Then bore her sudden in his arms away :
Unconscious of my loss, till with surprise
I heard in air her lamentable cries.
So from the clouds descends the ravening kite, 270
And grips the chicken in his mother's sight.

“ What could I do, alas ! encompass'd round
With steepy mountains and a rocky ground ?
His coarser flew, when mine, oppress'd with toil,
Could scarcely move amidst the stony soil.
Wild with my fate, I roiv'd with frantic mind,
Careless of life, and left my men behind ;
Thence turning, o'er the craggy deserts stray'd,
While love's blind impulse blindly I obey'd. 280
Six tedious days, from morn to eve, I pass'd
O'er many a pendent cliff and horrid waste ;
A pathless way, nocturnal and forlorn,
Where not a track of human feet was worn.
At length a wild and lonely vale I found,
With hills and dreadful caves encompass'd round.
Here, in the midst, a wondrous rock I view'd,
On which a strong and stately cattle stood :
It seem'd afar to shine like glowing flame ;
Nor harden'd earth, nor stone compos'd the frame. 290
As nearer to the mountain's base we drew,
The heauteous pile more struck my raptur'd view.
This fort, the demons, from th' infernal plains
By fuming incense drawn and magic strains,
Enclos'd with steel, to which the Stygian wave,
And Stygian fire eternal temper gave :
A dazzling polish brighten'd ev'ry tower.
Which spots could ne'er defile nor rust devour.

“ The robber scours the country day and night,
Thief, with his prey, he thither bends his flight :
Thither my fair, my better part he bore, 300
And never, never must I view her more !
What hope remain'd ? In vain with longing eyes,
I see the place where all my treasure lies !
The rock so high and steep, who enters there
Must learn to wing his passage through the air.
So when the mother-fox, with anguish stung,
Hears in the eagle's nest her crying young ;
She circles round the tree, with wild affright,
No wings vouchsaf'd her for so vast a flight.

“ While in suspense I stood, from far I spy'd 310
Two champions and a dwarf¹¹ that seem'd their guide ;

These with the hopes of praise had fir'd their mind,
But soon these hopes dissolv'd in empty wind.
They both were warriors of establish'd fame :
A monarch one, Gradasso was his name ;
The other was a youth of courage prov'd,
Rogero, in Biserta's court below'd.

“ They came (declar'd the dwarf) ‘ to try their power
Against the lord of this enchanted tower,
Who through the air, enclos'd in armour bright,
Directs his wondrous courser's rapid flight.’ 321
Then I—‘ Vouchsafe, O generous knights ! to hear
A wretch's fond complaints with pitying ear ;

Or if in fight your arms victorious prove,
(As sure I trust they shall) restore my love.’
Then all my griefs I spoke ; while tears that roll'd
Down my wan cheek confirm'd the tale I told.
“ With courteous words they answer'd my request,
And down the mountain to the castle press'd :
Aloof I stood the battle to survey, 330
Beseeching Heaven to aid the doubtful day.

“ Meanwhile the warriors to the rock drew nigh,
Disputing who should first th' adventure try.
At length Gradasso (whether lots design'd,
Or else Rogero to his will inclin'd)
Lifts to his mouth the horn : the cliffs around,
The rock and fortress to the noise resound !
When, lo ! the magic knight, with instant speed,
Rush'd from the portal on the flying steed.
At first he seems by slow degrees to rise : 340
Like cranes, prepar'd to sail to foreign skies,
Till, with collected wind, at once they spring
Aloft in air, and shoot upon the wing.
With such a flight the necromancer towers,
That scarce so high th' ethereal eagle soars !
But, when he sees his 'vantage best below,
With closing pinions on th' unwary foe,
He sinks precipitate—as from above
Descends the manag'd falcon on the dove.
And ere Gradasso can perceive his flight,
He feels the spear with dreadful strength alight :
The spear breaks short ; Gradasso strikes again ;
But furious strikes the yielding air in vain.
The stern magician, fearless on the wind
Ascending, leaves the champions far behind.
The good Alfana¹², with the force oppress'd,
Reclin'd on earth awhile the shock confess'd :
Alfana was the mare Gradasso rein'd,
The fairest beast that ever knight sustain'd. 360

“ And now the sorcerer mounts the starry skies,
Then wheels around, and down again he flies ;
Now on Rogero falls, who seeks to bring
His needful succour to th' astonish'd king.
The swift assault disturbs the youthful knight,
While scarce his horse supports th' unequal fight ;
And when he turns to strike, he sees the foe
Ride on the clouds and mock the frustrate blow.
In ample circles round he steers his course,
And threatening one, on t' other bends his force :
No praise he gives, but, rushing by surprise, 370
Confounds their senses and distracts their eyes

“ Thus did these three the doubtful strife maintain,
That high in air, these lowly on the plain ;
Till rising night her dusky veil display'd,
And wrapt each object in surrounding shade.

“ Think not my words in artful fiction dress'd,
Whate'er I speak was to my view confess'd :
Yet, with reluctance now, my tongue declares
A tale that such a face of falsehood wears.

“ On his left arm the foe was seen to wield, 380
Clas'd in a silken case, a mighty shield ;
Whose polish'd orb, whene'er reveal'd to sight,
The gazer strikes with such a powerful light,
In death-like slumber on the ground he lies,
And to the foe becomes an easy prize !

¹¹ Boyardo tells us, that after the deliverance of Orlando, Gradasso and Rogero were led by a dwarf to an adventure of a castle, which seems to be the story here continued by our poet. See Orlando lanc. l. iii. c. vi. vii.

¹² Alfana, the name of a wild breeding mare. It was very unusual for the knights in romance to make use of mares, esteeming it derogatory from their dignity ; but Gradasso is said to have taken an oath, never to mount a horse till he could get possession of Bayardo, Rinaldo's horse.

Bright as Pyropus¹⁴ shines the buckler's blaze;
No mortal e'er beheld such dazzling rays;
Full in their eyes the flashing splendour play'd,
And prone on earth each knight was senseless laid.
Like theirs, a sudden sleep my senses bound; 390
But when, at length, recovering from the ground
I rose, and sought the knights and dwarf again;
Dark was the mount and desolate the plain!
Th' unpitying foe had seiz'd the hapless pair,
And borne them to his castle¹⁵ through the air.
Thos, by the light that o'er their eyes he spread,
Their liberty is gone, o' hopes are fled!
Then from the place¹⁶ despairing I withdrew,
But ere I parted took a last adieu: 399
Now judge, what woes with mine can equal prove
Of all the various woes that spring from love."

¹⁴ Prince Arthur's shield in Spenser is something of this kind, which is always kept covered with a veil.

His warlike shield all closely cover'd was,
No might of mortal eye he ever seen,

The same to wight he never wou'd disclose,
But when as monsters huge he wou'd dismay,
Or daunt unequal armies of his foes;
Or when the flying heav'ns he wou'd affray;
For so exceeding shone his glist'ring ray,
That Phoebus' golden face it did attain,
As when a cloud his beams doth over-lay, &c.

Fairy Queen, b. i. c. vii.

Prince Arthur being engaged with the souldan, discovers his shield, in order to dazzle the eyes of the souldan's horses.

At last from his victorious shield he drew
The veil, which did his powerful light empeach,
And coming full before his horses' view,
As they upon him press'd, it plain to them did shew.
Like lightning flash that bath the gazer burn'd,
So did the sight thereof their sense dismay,
That back again upon themselves they turn'd,
And with their rider ran perforce away, &c.

B. v. C. viii.

Perhaps, as Mr. Upton observes, the original may be found in the Ægis of the Greeks. Phoebus himself the rushing battle led;
A veil of clouds involv'd his radiant head:
High held before him, Jove's enormous shield
Portentous shone, and shaded all the field.
Vulcan to Jove th' immortal gift consign'd,
To scatter hosts, and terrify mankind.

Again—

As long as Phoebus bore unmov'd the shield,
Sate doubtful conquest hovering o'er the field:
But when aloft he shakes it in the skies,
Shouts in their ears, and lightens in their eyes,
Deep horror seizeth every Grecian breast, &c.

Pope's Iliad, b. iv. ver 348—360.

¹⁶ The allegory of the shield and castle is thus explained by the Italian commentators. The shield shows, how the eyes of the understanding are

Thus said the knight, and thus his fortune
mourn'd,

Then pensive to his silent grief return'd:
This was that earl, whose birth Maganza claim'd,
Anselmo's son, and Pinabello nam'd;
Who, like his race for wicked actions known,
Increas'd his kindred vices by his own.

The warlike virgin with attention stood,
While Pinabello his complaint pursu'd: 409
When first Rogero's much-lov'd name she heard,
A sudden gladness in her looks appear'd;
But when she found a base magician's pow'r
Detain'd him thus ignobly in a tower,
Her pitying bosom glow'd with anxious pain,
And oft she begg'd to hear the tale again.

Then full inform'd: "Sir knight," she cried,
"give o'er

This unavailing grief, and mourn no more.
Since from our meeting here, perchance may flow
Your happiness, and ruin to your foe.
Haste; to the castle be our course address'd. 420
Whose walls are with so rich a treasure blest:
Nor shall we find in vain our labour spent,
If favouring fortune answer my intent."

"And shall I, then, your luckless feet to guide, Again those mountainous pass?" the youth reply'd.

"For me, indeed, but little were the smart
To toil my body, having lost my heart.
Yet why should you steep rocks and barren plains
Thus rashly tread, to purchase slavish chains?
Hence, warn'd in time, if evil chance ensue, 430
Not me unjustly, but yourself accuse."

"Thus having said, he mounts without delay
To lead the noble daniel on the way;
Who for Rogero means the fight to prove,
And hazard life or freedom for her love.
When lo! a messenger that swiftly rode
Pursu'd them close behind, and call'd aloud:
The same, who told king Sacripant the force
Of Bradamant had hurl'd him from his horse;
Who from Montpellier and Narbona came, 440
With sudden tidings to the martial dame,
That all the land was kindled with alarms,
And all the coast of Acquamort in arms:
That, losing her, their safety and their guard,
Marseilles was for the foes but ill prepar'd;
And, by this message, with their fears dismay'd,
Implor'd her counsel and immediate aid.

Struck with the virtues of her dauntless mind,
The king to Amou's daughter had assign'd
This town, and for many miles, that lay 450
'Twixt Varez and Rodon stretching to the sea.

These tidings heard, a doleful pause ensu'd,
And undetermin'd for a while she stood:
On that side honour and her friends assail'd;
On this the stronger fires of love prevail'd.
At length resolv'd to end the talk'd sign'd,
And free Rogero in the tower confin'd;
Or, if her enterprise successful prov'd,
Remain a prisoner with the youth she lov'd.
The daniel first excus'd a short delay, 460
Then sent the messenger well-pleas'd away.

blinded by the desires of concupiscence; or represents the violence and frauds which worldly passions employ over reason and true virtue: the castle represents the carnal appetite, that holds men prisoners; as some say, that by Atlantes is figured love.

Now, turning round, her former path she took;
Her Pinabel pursu'd with alter'd look;
Conscious her lineage to that house she ow'd,
For which he ever nourish'd hate avow'd;
And anxious fears perplex'd his troubled mind,
Lest she should know him of Maganza's kind.
An ancient feud between these houses reign'd,
And both the strife and hatred still maintain'd;
Full oit oppos'd in stern debate they stood, 470
And dy'd the ground beneath with mutual blood.
For this the cairiff bent his thoughts to frame
Some treason to deceive th' unwary dame.

Such various passions had disturb'd his breast,
With enmity, with doubts and fears possess'd,
Unheeding where he pass'd, he lost his way,
And through a gloomy forest chanc'd to stray;
Where in the midst a steepy mount appear'd,
That in a craggy rock its summit rear'd.
Meanwhile the dame of Clarmont's noble kind, 480
With heedful steps pursu'd the knight behind.

When Pinabel beheld the dusky shade,
He powder'd in his thoughts to leave the maid;
And thus began—"While yet we view the light,
'T were best to seek a shelter from the night:
Beyond that hill, unless my mem'ry fail,
There stands a stately castle in the vale:
Here patient wait, while from yon height I try
To explore the prospect with a surer eye."

So saying, to the hill he bent his course, 490
And up the steepy summit spurr'd his horse;
Thence, looking round, he sought some path to take,

By which he might the dame's track forsake:
When sudden here a monstrous cave he found,
Hewn out with labour in the stony ground:
Full thirty cubits deep it seem'd in show:
A fair and lofty gate appear'd below,
Which, by its ample structure, seem'd design'd
For entrance to some larger place behind,
And through the shade a glimmering brightness 500 gave,

As of a torch that burnt within the cave.
While here in deep suspense the traitor stood,
The cautious virgin, who his steps pursu'd,
Fearful to lose the track, still kept in view
Her faithless guide, and near the cavern drew.

His first design thus foil'd, a sudden thought
Of treacherous purpose in his bosom wrought:
He makes the damsel from her steed alight,
And pointing out the cavern to her sight,
Tells her within its confines he had seen 510
A dame of beauteous face and graceful mien;
Whose courtly looks and costly garments show'd
Her birth deriv'd from no ignoble blood:
But from her eyes she pour'd a tender shower,
And seem'd her lost condition to deplore.
And when he thought 't attain a nearer view,
And learn the cause from which her grief she drew,
One from the inner grot with fury came,
And, seizing, carry'd off the weeping dame.

The dauntless Bradamant, whose generous mind,
Unconscious of the wile the wretch design'd, 521
With ardour glow'd to give the fair one aid,
Revolves how best she may the cave invade¹⁷.

¹⁷ One of the most favourite achievements of the knights of old was to search into caverns, where they met with many wonderful adventures. Thus Don Quixote descends into the cave of Montesinos,

When on a lofty elm she cast her eyes;
And midst the boughs a mighty branch espies:
This with hersword she hews, and lopt the leaves;
That done, the cavern's mouth the pole receives.
She prays her treacherous guide aloft to stand,
And grasp the end, tenacious, in his hand.
Now first within the cave her feet descend, 500
While as she sinks, her arms her weight suspend:
When Pinabello, scoffing, ask'd the maid
To leap below—then loos'd his grasp, and said:
"O! would that all thy race with thee were
join'd,

That thus I might at once destroy the kind."
But happier fortune than the traitor meant,
All gracious Heaven, to save the guiltless, sent:
The pole first lighted on the ground below,
And instant shiver'd with the forceful blow,
Yet thus the fury of the shock sustain'd, 510
That Bradamant preserv'd from death remain'd.
The sudden fall awhile surpris'd the maid,
As in th' ensuing book is full display'd.

BOOK III.

THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant, deceived by Pinabello, finds herself in Merlin's cave, where she meets with Melissa, who shows to her, in vision, all her descendants that were to make a figure in history. In this passage the poet pays a compliment to the most illustrious Italian families. Melissa then instructs Bradamant how to deliver Rogero from the castle in which he was confined by Atlantes, and dismisses her.

WHAT power! will teach me lofty words to find
For the great subject that inflames my mind?
What power will lend my venturous Muse a wing
In tuneful lays my high conceits to sing?
A vigour mightier far must here be shown
Than e'er my swelling bosom yet has known:

and, at his return, relates many extravagant incidents, which his distemper'd imagination had furnished him with in the true spirit of romance.—Don Quixote, part ii. c. xxii.

Who now shalt give unto me words and sound
Equal unto this haughty enterprise?
Or who shall lend me wings, with which from ground

My lowly verse may loftily arise,
And lift itself unto the highest skies?
More ample spirit than hitherto was wont
Here needs me, while the famous ancestries
Of my most dreaded sovereign I recount,
By which all earthly princes she doth far surmount,
Again—

Argument worthy of Meonian quill,
Or rather worthy of great Phœbus' rote,
Whereon the ruins of great Ossa hill,
And triumph of Phœgean Jove he wrote.

This veracemy patron claims, which dares to trace
The fountain whence he draws his glorious race!

Amidst th' illustrious chiefs by fate design'd
With righteous government to bless mankind; 10
O Phœbus! you, whose eye the world surveys,
Ne'er view'd a line like this, whose deathless praise,
In peace and war, shall fill the lips of fame;
Whose blooming honours shall endure the same,
(Or vain the light prophetic in my soul)
While Heaven, unchanging, whirls around the pole.
To blazon all their virtues would require
Not my weak lute, but that immortal lyre,
On which, the giants quell'd, you sung above
The grateful praises of eternal Jove! 20

O! should you here the wish'd-for aid impart,
And to the subject raise the sculptor's art;
Each noble image shall my fancy fill,
To challenge all my genius, all my skill;
Then what at first I may but roughly trace,
By slow degrees shall ripen into grace;
Till crown'd by you, I see with joyful eyes
Each labour'd form to full perfection rise.

But let the Muse to him the story bend,
Whose breast nor shield nor cuirass could defend; 30

The treacherous Pinabel, who hop'd in vain
With murderous guile the damsel to have slain.
The traitor deem'd her in the cavern dead,
And, with a visage pale through guilty dread,
The place, polluted by his crime, forsook,
Then instant speeding back, his courser took:
That every action might his soul betray,
He with him bears the virgin's steed away.
But leave we him*, who, while his craft is shown
To seek another's fall, procures his own; 40

And turn to her, who nearly 'scap'd the doom,
In one sad hour to find her death and tomb.
Soon as the maid again from earth was rais'd,
With the hard shock and sudden fall amaz'd,
She enter'd boldly through the gate, which gave
An entrance to the second, larger cave.
The building, square within, and spacious made,
A stately temple to the sight display'd,
Magnificent the sumptuous pile appear'd,
On pillars fair of alabaster rear'd. 50
An altar in the midst; and, kindled bright,
A lamp before cast round a trembling light.

Soon as the damsel view'd, with pious mind,
This sacred place for holy rites design'd,
Devoutly on her knees the earth she press'd,
And to the king of Heaven her prayers address'd.
Meantime a sudden jarring sound was heard,
When from a narrow gate a dame appear'd,
Ungirt, with feet unshod, with hair display'd, 59
Who by her name address'd the warrior-maid.

And thus—"O generous Bradamant!" she said,
"Not without Heaven's appointment hither led,
Merlin foretold, that by a passage new
Thou shouldst, descending here, his relics view;
And hence I stay'd, to set before thy eyes
The glorious fate destin'd in the skies.

* The story of Pinabelle is continued, b. xx. ver. 803.

† Melisee, an enchantress; a character introduced by Ariosto, who, throughout the poem, interests herself in all the concerns of Rugero and Bradamant.

Behold this ancient cave, by Merlin wrought,
Merlin, in every art of magic taught:

* According to Jeffery of Monmouth, the famous magician Merlin was born at Caermardin, i. e. Caermarthen, named by Ptolemy Maridunum. Merlin's mother, who was a niece and daughter of the king of Demetia (or South Wales), giving an account of her wonderful conception of her son, a philosopher explains it, that it was some demon, or incubus, "some guileful spright," partaking partly of the nature of man, partly of angels, and assuming a human shape, which begot Merlin; and this explains what Ariosto says, that Merlin was the son of a demon.

Di Merlin dico, del demonio figlio.

C. xxviii.

Drayton, in his Polyolbion, song v., thus sings of Merlin, who was born at Caermarden:

Of Merlin and his skill what region doth not hear?
Who of a British nymph was gotten, whilst she play'd
With a seducing spirit—

Thus Spenser,—

And sooth men say he was not the son
Of mortal sire, or other living wight,
But wond'rously begotten and begun
By false illusion of a guileful spright
On a fair lady—

Fairy Queen, b. iii. c. iii.

It is said that Merlin intended to build a wall of brass round Maridunum; and so says Drayton, Polyolbion, song iv.

How Merlin by his skill and magic's wondrous might [might;
From Ireland hither brought the Stonengid in a
And for Caermarden's sake would fain have brought to pass

About it to have built a wall of solid brass;
And set his fiends to work upon the mighty frame;
Some to the anvil; some that still enforc'd the stone;

But whilst it was in hand, by loving of an elf
(For all his wondrous skill) was cozen'd by himself.
For walking with his fay, her to the rock he brought
In which he oft before his necromancies wrought,
And going in therat his magics to have shown,
She stopt the cavern's mouth with an enchanted
stone:

Whose cunning strongly crost, amaz'd whilst he did stand,

She captive him convey'd into the fairy land.
Then flow the lab'ring spirits to rocks by fetters bound,

With bellows rumbling groans, and hammer
thund'ring sound,

A fearful horrid din still in the earth do keep,
Their master to awake, suppos'd by them to sleep;
As at their work how still the grieved spirits repine,
Tormented in the fire, and tired in the mine.

Spenser again,—

—A little while,
Before that Merlin dy'd, he did intend
A brazen wall in compass to compile
About Caermarthen, and did it commend
Unto his sprights to bring to perfect end;
During which time the lady of the lake,
Whom long he lov'd, for him in haste did send,

Here with bewitching looks, and wiles prepar'd,
The lady of the lake his heart ensnar'd. 70
" His sepulchre is here, whose womb contains
The deathless spirit, and decay'd remains:
To this he by her blandishments was led,
And what receiv'd alive, detains him dead.
His living soul must with his corse repose,
Till the last trump the fatal angel blows:
Then shall the just award his deeds requite,
With sin polluted, or with virtue white.
His voice survives, and oft is heard to come
In tuneful music from the marble tomb. 80
To all that question is his wisdom shown;
He tells the past, and makes the future known:

Who therefore forc'd his workmen to forsake,
Them bound till his return, their labour not to slake.

In the mean time by that false lady's train,
He was surpris'd and bury'd under bier,
Ne ever to his work return'd again, &c.

B. iii. c. iii.

This lady of the lake appears to have been a fairy or nymph, with whom Merlin was enamoured: the story of her deceiving him is thus related in the romance called Morte Arthur, or the life and death of prince Arthur, printed by Caxton in 1485.

" The lady of the lake and Merlin departed; and by the way, as they went, Merlin shewed to her many wonders, and came into Cornwall: And alwaies laid about the lady for to have her favour; and she was ever passing weary of him, and fain would have been delivered of him; for she was afraid of him, because he was a divells sonne, and she could not put him away by no means. And so, upon a time it hapned that Merlin shewed to her in a roche (rock) whereas a great wonder, and wrought by enchantment, which went under a stone, so by her craft and working she made Merlin to go under that stone, to let him wit of the marvelles there. But she wrought so there for him, that he came never out, for all the craft that he could doe."

B. i. c. ix.

But in the life of Merlin, this adventure is related with circumstances nearer the account given by our author.

" Merlin's mother having secretly conceived by a demon, was, after her delivery, condemned to be put to death, for breach of charity; but her son, an infant, defended, and set his mother at liberty. Merlin, being grown up, went to the court of Uther Pendragon, where he established the famous round table, wrought many wonderful works, and uttered a number of prophecies; here he fell in love with the lady of the lake, whom he used to call the white serpent; before his death, he erected a tomb, in the forest of Nortles, capable to hold him and his mistress; and having shewed it her, he taught her a charm that would close the stone, so that it could never be opened. The lady, who secretly hated him, began one day to caress him exceedingly, and at last made him go into the tomb, in order to try whether it was large enough: Merlin, being entered, she closed the stone upon him, where he died: his spirit being likewise confined by the force of the spell, continued from time to time to speak, and to give answers to such questions as were put to him."

I many days have in this cave remain'd,
To which I travell'd from a distant land;
For he, whose rage predictions never lied,
This hour for thy arrival prophes'd."

She said, and Amon's daughter, while she spoke,
With silence heard, amazement in her look;
When casting on the ground her bashful eyes,
She to the dame with modest grace replies: 90
" Alas! what praise has my unworthy name,
That prophets my arrival should proclaim?"
Then rapt with joy at such a blest event,
Silent she follow'd where the matron went,

We shall quote one more passage of Spenser, where he gives a noble description of the cave, which was the scene of Merlin's incantations. Britomart, and her nurse old Glauce, go to consult this magician:

To Mardinnam, that is now by change
Of name Cayr Mardin call'd, they took their way;
There the wise Merlin whilom went, they say,
To make his wonne, low underneath the ground,
In a deep delve, far from the view of day,
That of no living wight he mote be found,
When so he counsell'd with his sprights encompass'd round.

And if thou ever happen that same way
To travel, go to see that dreadful place:
It is an hideous, hollow cave, they say,
Under a rock that lies a little space
From the swift Barry, tumbling down apace
Amongst the woody hills of Dynevowre;
But dare thou not, I charge, in any case,
To enter into that same baleful bower,
For fear the cruel fiends should thee unware devour.

But standing high aloft, low lay thine ear,
And there such ghastly noise of iron chains,
And brazen cauldrons thou shalt rumbling hear,
Which thousand sprights with long enduring pains
Do toss, that it will stun thy feeble brains;
And oftentimes great groans, and grievous stounds,
When too huge toil and labour them constrains;
And oftentimes loud strokes, and ringing sounds
From under that deep rock most horribly rebound.
B. iii. c. iii.

This description is not entirely the fiction of the poet, as there are sufficient vouchers to produce the truth of the story. " In a rock of the island of Barry, in Glamorganshire, there is a narrow chink or cleft, to which if you put your ear, you shall perceive all such sort of noises, as you may fancy smiths at work under ground; strokes of hammers, blowing of bellows, grinding of tools, &c." See Camden's Britannia. Drayton, in the above lines, alludes to this story of the lady of the lake, and to this marvellous cave.

" Ariosto, with the liberty of a romance-writer, places Merlin's grot in France, and removes the scene of several of his actions to that place."

See Upton and Warton's Observations on Spenser.

Not far from Caernarthen, is a hill called Merlin's hill, near the brow of which is a rock, known by the name of Merlin's chair, in which it is said, that famous prophet used to sit, when he uttered his prophecies.

Slow leading to the tomb, in which detain'd
The ghost of Merlin with his bones remain'd.
Hard was the polish'd marble, smooth and bright,
And like a ruddy flame dispell'd the night,
Though here the Sun refus'd his cheering light.
Whether some marble, by its nature, shows 100
A beam, that like a torch in darkness glows:
Or else by verse, and fumigating powers,
Or signs impress in planetary hours,
(As heat may seem) this wonder was compos'd;
The lustre many a pleasing sight disclus'd;
Pictures and statues, that with various grace,
In order rang'd, adorn'd the sacred place.

Scarce o'er the threshold pass'd the warrior-dame,
And to the cavern's deep recesses came,
When from the breathless clay with pleasing strain,
Th' accost the fair the spirit thus began. 110

"May fortune all thy just endeavours aid,
O ever chaste, and ever honour'd maid! 115
From whose glad womb must spring the fruitful
That Italy, and all the world shall grace!
That ancient blood⁶, which once in Ilum shin'd,
By the two noblest streams in thee conjoin'd,
The joy, the flower of every race shall yield,
Between the Danube and the Nile⁷ reveal'd,
The Tagus and the Ind, or all that lies 120
Between Calisto and th' Antarctic skies.
Hence chiefs shall rise, and many a valiant knight.
Who with their counsel, and their arms in fight,
Shall on their Italy desolve their fame,
And spread in war the glory of her name.

Then righteous monarchs shall the sceptre hold,
Who, as the sage Augustus rul'd of old,
Or godlike Numa, with their gentle reign
Shall bring on Earth the golden age again.
Hence to fulfil what Heaven has long decreed, 130
For which 't is doom'd thou shalt Rogero wed,
Boldly pursue the ardour of thy soul,
Nor think that aught can thy desires controul;
For he who keeps thy knight in captive bands,
Shall sink oppress beneath thy conquering hands."

Here ceas'd the voice; the matron now prepares
To show to Bradamant her destin'd heirs.
A crew of spirits, summon'd by the dame,
Appear'd, (but well I know not whence they came)
Together now assembled in the place, 140
But differing each in habit, and in face.

Then, in the temple, by her side she plac'd
The warlike fair, but first a circle trac'd;
And, to defend her from the spirits, spread
A magic cover'g o'er the virgin's head;
She bade her silent stand, then op'd a book
In which she read, and with the demons spoke.
Lo! from the outward cave they rush'd to view,
And thickening, round the sacred circle drew;
But all attempts to enter fruitless found. 150
As if a fosse or rampart stretch'd around.

⁶ Rogero and Bradamant, both descended from Asyrazax: Rogero, son to Rogero of Risa, and Bradamant, niece to Charlemain. See note on B. ii. ver. 216.

⁷ The Danube, a river in Germany; the Nile, a river in Egypt; the Tagus, a river in Portugal; the Ind, or Indos, a river in India, whence the country receives its name; by the Antarctic skies, is meant the south pole; and by Calisto, the north, being a constellation in that part of the heavens.

Then in the cavern, where the shining tomb
Contain'd the holy relics in its womb,
The demons enter'd, when, in order due,
They thrice had past around in fair review.
"Should I" (th' enchantress thus bespoke the dame)
"Attempt to tell the deeds, and every name
Of these, who by their shadowy phantoms rise
Before their birth, to pass before your eyes,
The hours were short the story to repeat, 160
Nor could one night the mighty task complete;
And hence, as time may serve, my lips shall tell
These chiefs of me whose virtues most excel.

"Behold the first⁸, thy likeness form'd to bear
In comely countenance and graceful air;
In Italy the leader of thy race,
Sprung from Rogero's, and from thy embrace.
I deem to see by his victorious hand⁹
Maganza's treacherous blood stain the land;
To see his justice claim the vengeance due 170
From those, whose guilt his noble father slew.
By him shall Desiderius be repcill'd,
Who lost in Lombardy the sceptre held.
The emperor shall his valiant deeds repay
With Caloon and Estè's lordly sway.
Behold thy grandson next, Uberto near¹⁰,
The glory of Hesperia's land in war!
He shall his arms against the Moors extend,
And from their rage the holy church defend.
Survey Alberto¹¹, fam'd far warlike toils, 180
Who decks the temples with unnumber'd spoils.

⁸ It is to be observed, that this account of the descent of Rogero is fictitious; since Rizieri of Risa (or as he is here called Rogero) left no son; and this Rizieri, the first Paladin, lived a considerable time before Charlemain.—Dolce.

⁹ The father of this Rogero was said to have been traitorously murdered by the tribe of Maganza, when this son, growing up, was made general in the service of Charlemain, and revenged the death of his father. At this time Desiderius XXII. and last king of Lombardy, rebelled against the church; when pope Adrian calling in the assistance of Charlemain, Desiderius was constrained to shut himself up in Paris, and was afterwards driven into Lyons in France. In this service Rogero is said to have distinguished himself, and to have been rewarded by the emperor with the government of Padua. Eugenio.

¹¹ Berengarius I. having besieged and taken Milan, Alberto headed an army and defeated him: Hugo, son of Alberto, afterwards acquired the dominion of Milan, and planted his standard there, in which was painted a dragon or serpent. Otho, a valiant leader of that family, in the holy war of Jerusalem, under Godfrey, slew Volucius, a Saracen captain, who wore on his crest a serpent devouring a child; hence his descendants took a serpent for their arms. Eugenio.

Tasso, in his catalogue of warriors, mentions this Otho;

— Otho fierce, whose valour won the shield
That bears a child and serpent on its field.

B. i. ver. 417.

Hugo appears with him, his valiant son,
Who plants his conquering snakes in Milan's town.

The next is Azo¹³, who, his brother dead,
Shall o'er th' insubrious h's dominions spread.
See! Albertazo¹², who with counsel sage
Shall Berengarius and his son engage;
Well worthy to receive from Otho's hands
His daughter Alda, pledg'd in nuptial bands.
Another Hugo see¹⁴! O virtue known,
When the sire's courage dies not with the son! 180
'T is he, who shall with justice on his side
Abate the rancour of the Roman pride;
To Otho and the pope assistance give,
(Otho the third) and from their foes relieve.
See Fulco¹⁵, who forsakes th' Italian fields
And to his brother each possession yields;
While thence he goes, with better fate to gain
A mighty dukedom on the German plain.
He props the honours of the Saxon race 200
Which shall at length himself and offspring grace.

¹⁵ Of Albertazo and Alda were born Hugo and Fulco: after the death of the emperor Otho, who, before he came to the empire, was duke of Saxony, his daughter Alda succeeded to that duchy: whereupon Fulco resigned to his brother all his patrimony in Italy, and went into Saxony to succeed to his mother's inheritance, where he made himself duke of Saxony.

Azo the second is the next in sight¹⁶,
More fam'd for gentle peaceth than rugged fight.
On either hand see where his sons appear;
There Albertazo, and Bertoldo here.
By this shall second Henry be subdu'd,
And Parma's meadows stream with Belgian
blood;

By that the glorious countess shall be led,
(The chaste Matilda) to his bridal bed;
From mighty Henry sprung, who brings in dower
With her one half Italia to his power. 211
Behold Bertoldo's dearest pledge in view,
Thy own Rinaldo¹⁷ next; to whom is due
The fame of having freed the pontiff's lands
From impious Frederic Barbarossa's hands.
Behold another Azo, doom'd to reign
O'er fair Verona and its wide domain;
Who marquis of Ancona shall be known,
When Otho and Honorius fill the throne.
'T were long to tell the names of all thy race 230
That in the conclave shall obtain a place >
To tell each enterprise their arms shall gain,
What conquests for the Roman church obtain.

Lo! other Azos, other Hugos near:
See Fulco, and Obizo next appear.
Behold two Henrys, both the sire and son:
Two Guelphos¹⁸: this has conquer'd Umbria's
town;

See now Spoleti's ducal gown he wears:
And lo! who turns to smiles Italia's tears:

¹⁶ Bertoldo and Albertazo, sons of Azo II. opposed the emperor Henry II. who, being a cruel enemy to the church, compelled pope Gregory VII. to sell the benefices: at that time the countess Matilda, widow of Godfrey, a powerful lord, and grand-daughter of Henry I. and governess of many places, took the part of the church. Rodolpho, duke of Saxony, was made emperor in opposition to Henry, and a battle fought near Parma with great slaughter of the Belgians, when Henry was driven out of Italy. Rodolpho fell in the battle; with him was Bertoldo of Esté, a very valiant captain: Matilda married Albertazo; but a few years after, discovering that he was related to her first husband, the marriage was annulled, by the consent of the pope, and she led a holy life, leaving, at her death, her possessions to the church.

¹⁸ In the faction of the Guelphs and Ghibellines, arising from the disputes between the emperor Frederic II. and the pope; the lords of Esté sided with the Guelphs against the emperor, for which cause the church bestowed on them the duchy of Spoleti. This faction took its name from Guelpho and Ghibello, the heads of each party.

Of him I speak (Azo the fifth¹⁹ survey) 230
 To whom shall tyrant Ezellino pay
 His forfeit life; a wretch abhor'd on Earth,
 And to the demon said to owe his birth.
 He shall with cruelty his kingdom fill,
 And fair Ausonia²⁰ ravage at his will;
 That Marius', Nero's²¹, and Antonius' deeds,
 Caius²² and Sylla's crimes his guilt exceeds.
 Behold the second Frederic's forces yield,
 By second Azo conquer'd in the field,
 While he shall o'er the happy land preside²³, 240
 Where Phœbus, on the fatal river's side,
 Invok'd his breathless son²⁴ with tuneful lyre,
 His son, who sought to guide his father's fire:

¹⁹ Ezellino de Romano, for his unexampled cruelty, called the son of the devil, by the favour of the emperor Frederic II. entering Lombardy with a vast army, made himself master of many cities, among which was Padua; when desiring to usurp the dominion of Milan, he left it to go to the siege of Mantua. Azo V. having retaken Padua, set at liberty above two thousand prisoners, besides many women of quality. In the dungeons, above four hundred and sixty persons were found so worn with hunger, and covered with filth, as not to be known, though most of them afterwards appeared to be Paduans*. His prison was a labyrinth, in which he caused the person who made him the model, to be first shut up; at his return from the siege of Mantua, he commanded all the Paduans in Verona to be massacred; of eleven thousand, only twenty-eight remained alive. He then marched to Padua, but finding it not to be retaken, returned to Verona, and ordered the twenty-eight he had before spared, to be hanged in the market-place: at last being taken by Azo, who gave him three wounds, he was sent to Sonzino, where refusing nourishment, and, as some say, tearing open his wounds, he ended his detestable life.

* The cruelties of Ezellino are testified by Pietro Gerardo, of Padua, who was his contemporary.

²⁰ The ancient name for Italy.

²³ Phœton, who, undertaking to guide the chariot of the Sun, set the world on fire: he was thunder-struck by Jupiter, and fell into the Po: his sisters, lamenting his death, were changed into trees dropping amber, and his grandfather Cygnus into a swan. See Ovid, Met. b. ii.

Where the sad sisters tears of amber shed,
 And Cygnus, chang'd, his snowy plumage spread.
 This land he from the holy see obtains,
 A recompense for all his glorious pains!
 But where 's his brother Aldobrandin²⁵ lost,
 Who frees the popedom from a mighty host; 250
 When the fierce Ghibellines, by Otho led,
 Shall round the capitol their numbers spread;
 Whose fury has the neighbouring lands o'er-run,
 Whose force has Umbria and Piceno won?
 He, wanting treasure to pursue the war,
 Shall go supplies in Florence to prepare;
 And there, no other pledge he has to leave,
 His brother as his surety they receive.
 Then shall he spread his conquering signs again,
 And rout the German army on the plain;
 Replace the church upon her ancient seat, 260
 And fam'd Celano's earls with vengeance meet:
 Till, while he fights the sacred pastor's cause,
 He ends his youthful bloom with just applause!
 He leaves his brother Azo to command
 O'er fair Pisaura and Ancousa's land;
 Each town, from Trent to where Isonus glides,
 Between the Apennines and bringy tides;
 But (more than gold or gems) he leaves behind
 With him his virtues and heroic mind.
 Fortune all other gifts again may take, 270
 But never can the power of virtue shake.
 Rinaldo next²⁶, whose deeds his soul proclaim
 Worthy the glorious race from which he came,
 But cruel fortune views with envious eyes;
 At Naples, by conspiracy, he dies!
 Then young Obizo takes his grandsire's reign,
 And Modena and Rheggio adds to his domain.
 Such is his courage, that the people's choice
 Shall make him lord with one united voice.
 His offspring Azo see, the sixth²⁷ that wears 280
 The name, whose band the Christian standard bears.

Adria is his; in nuptial union tied,
 Sicilia's daughter shines his blooming bride.
 Lo! in yon amiable and friendly band,
 The most illustrious princes of the land,

²⁵ Otho IV. making war against the church, assisted by the Ghibelline faction, obliged pope Innocent IV. to retire into the capital. Aldobrandin of Este, the first marquis of Ferrara, with other powers, obliged Otho to return to Germany. The marquis, being in want of money to carry on the war, borrowed large sums of the Florentines, leaving his brother Azo with them in pledge; and having defeated the emperor, and killed the earl of Celano, who espoused the cause of Otho, he died in the flower of his age, not without suspicion of poison, leaving his brother Azo his heir.

²⁷ Many Christians being besieged in the city of Ptolemais in Syria, in the time of Charles II. king of Sicily and Naples, a crusade was proclaimed for their deliverance: in this enterprise Azo was made standard-bearer, and for his merits obtained to wife Beatrice, the daughter of king Charles.

Obizo, Aldobrand, for virtue nam'd:
 For love and clemency, Alberto fam'd²⁷;
 With Nicholas: but time denies t' explain
 How with Faenza they enlarg'd their reign;
 And Adria²⁸ more securely made their own, 390
 By whose proud name the briny seas are known;
 With that fair town, which from the blushing
 rose,

To Grecian bards its pleasing title owes²⁹.
 And, near the Po, a place whose walls contain
 A crew³⁰ that wish for tempests on the main.
 I leave Argento, Lago, many a town,
 And many a castle of desert'd renown.
 See Nicholas³¹! when yet in early years,
 To honour of command the land prefers,
 He shall the vain designs of Tydeus quell, 300
 Who rashly dares against his power rebel.
 In rising dawn of youth, his sole delight
 In rugged arms, and labours of the fight;
 By which he soon obtains a mighty name,
 Amid the greatest chiefs the first in fame.
 He makes his foes their vain endeavours mourn,
 And on themselves their cruel arts shall turn.
 Otho the third in vain his power withstands,
 (Tyrant of Rheggio and of Parma's lands)
 At once resigning, in the fatal strife, 310
 To him his kingdom and his wick'd life.
 He shall the limits of his sway extend,
 But ne'er, unjust, another's rights offend.
 For this th' Eternal Ruler of the Heaven
 No stated bound has to his empire given:
 All his designs shall ever prosperous prove,
 'Till snatch'd from Earth to grace the skies above.
 See Lionel³²; and next (a mighty name!)
 Borso behold, his happy age's fame!

²⁷ Nicholas of Estè, and Alberto his brother, purchased, for twenty thousand ducats, the city of Faenza, of John Awcutt, an English captain of the pope's: they afterwards obtained many victories against Bernabo Visconti and other potentates. Nicholas is said, never to have been too much elated with prosperity, or depressed by adversity.

²⁸ A city, not far from Ferrara, which gives name to the Adriatic gulf.

²⁹ He means Rovigo, called in Latin Rhodiginum, from Rhodos, which in Greek signifies a rose.

He shall in calm repose preserve with care 320
 Those realms his ancestors had gain'd in war.
 He cruel Mars in gloomy caves restrains,
 And binds the hands of Rage in iron chains.
 The great designs that fill his generous breast,
 Shall all be torn'd to make his people blest,
 Lo Hercules³³! of whom 'twere hard to tell
 If he in arts of peace or war excel.
 He, by his virtues, shall at length obtain
 The lordship, thirty years his right in vain!
 Pulians, Calabrians, and Lucanians find 350
 His glorious deeds, and bear them still in mind:
 Conquest for him her brightest wreath prepares,
 When, for the king of Catalan he dares
 Th' embattled field; nor shall one deed alone
 Exalt him midst the princes of renown:
 For ne'er before shall ruler of the land
 Deserve such honour at his country's hand:
 Not that their city (with industrious toil)
 He moves from fens, and builds in fertile soil;
 And for his citizens extends the bound, 340
 And sinks a fosse, and raises walls around;
 Adorns with porticos the spacious streets,
 With temples, theatres, and princely seats.
 Not that, unwear'd in his country's cause,
 He frees her from the winged lion's paws³⁴.
 Or when proud Gallia rouses all to arms,
 And Italy is kindled with alarms,
 His state alone enjoys a peace sincere,
 From subject tribute free and servile fear:
 Not even for these, and many blessings more, 350
 His native soil shall Hercules adore,
 So much, as that he leaves, to bless mankind,
 Alphonso and Hippolito³⁵ behind:

recommended them to the protection of Lionel, who, seizing the government, confined the two brothers at Naples, and reigned nine years. At his death, he left behind him a young son, named Nicholas, to the care of his brother Borso, who generously recalled the two brothers, and educated them as his own children. This prince was universally beloved for his many virtues; and having magnificently entertained the emperor Frederic, was by him honoured with the title of duke Ferrara, which title was confirmed by pope Paul II. since which time his successors retained the names of dukes of Ferrara.

³³ Hercules I. the second duke of Ferrara, after the death of Borso, succeeded to the dukedom which had been his right for thirty years, and beheaded Nicholas, the son of Lionel, who came with the aid of the marquis of Mantua, to get possession of the government. Being afterwards embroiled with the Venetians, he was despoiled of many lands, and besieged in Ferrara. A peace being made, Hercules fought in the service of Alphonso, king of the Catalans, and gained many victories for him: by his prudence and good conduct, he escaped the oppression of Charles VIII. king of France, who had subdued great part of Italy, and driven the before-mentioned Alphonso from his kingdom.

³⁴ The arms of the country, put, by a figure, for the country itself.

³⁵ Alphonso I. the third duke of Ferrara, and cardinal Hippolito, his brother, both patrons of Ariosto.

Whose friendship may be match'd with that of old
By story'd page of Leda's offspring told³⁷;
Who each, by turns, could seek the nether reign
To give his brother to the world again.

So stull these two for ever stand prepar'd,
Each with his own the other's life to guard;
And more defend their land in raging war, 360
Than steely bulwarks rais'd by Vulcan's care.

Alphonso see! the prince³⁸, whose soul shall shine
With wisdom and with piety divine;
That men shall deem Astræa left the Earth
To visit after ages at his birth!

Nor shall he less in adverse times require
The prudence and the valour of his sire;
For with a scanty force, he sees at hand
On one side Venice with a numerous band;

She, on the other, who may better claim
A fury's title, than a mother's name³⁹;
Against her offspring cruel wars to wage
With more than Progne's or Medea's rage! 370

Oh as he issues forth by day or night,
He puts his foes by land and sea to flight.
His forces shall Romania's power o'erthrow,
And stain with blushing streams the banks of Po.

The hired Spaniard shall his anger feel,
Who for the pontiff draws th' avenging steel.
The foe at first shall Bastia's castle gain, 380
The captain, in the sudden onset, slain.

But soon the victor must his conquest mourn:
See! great Alphonso swift to vengeance turn;
When not a wretch escapes the general doom
To bear the fatal tidings back to Rome.

His counsel, with his lance united, gains
The laurel'd glories of Romania's plains,
Against stern Julius, and the Spanish bands;
He gives the conquest into Gallia's hands.

The country round shall pour a crimson flood, 390
Where bounding steeds shall swim in seas of
blood;

³⁷ Castor and Pollux: Castor was the son of Tyndarus and Leda, and Pollux the son of Jupiter, begot by him, under the form of a swan. Of Leda: these brothers were celebrated for their friendship; and Pollux, who inherited immortality from Jupiter, desired that he might share it with his brother, which being granted, they are feigned to live and die by turns.

³⁹ The poet here seems to mean the pope, or mother church, that, till then, had always cherished the race of Esté as her sons.

The dead unbury'd lie: such heaps shall fall;
The Spaniard, Greek, Italian, Dutch, and Gaul!
He, whom his vest pontifical reveals,
Whose honour'd brows the sacred hat conceals,
Is he — the cardinal⁴⁰ in future time,
The church's great support! in prose and rhyme,
The theme of every tongue; whose boundless
praise,

Like Cæsar's, shall demand a Virgil's lays.
'T is his with noblest deeds t' adorn his race: 400
So Phoebus' beams the frame of nature grace,
Put Luna, and the fainting stars to flight,

And shining conquer every other light.
Methinks I see him with a scanty train,
Departing sad, return with joy again;
While fifteen galleys⁴¹ captive to the shore

He brings, besides a thousand vessels more.
Behold two Sigismundos next appear;
See the five sons of great Alphonso near;
Who shall their glories through the world display,
To fill the distant lands and spacious sea. 410

View Hercules the second⁴², first advance,
Who weds the daughter of the king of France.
See next Hippolito, whose arms shall shine,
And like his ancestors adorn his line:

The third Francisco call'd: one common name,
The latter couple from Alphonso claim.
But should I vainly thus attempt to tell
The names of all that in thy race excel,

Before my tale were done, the rising light 490
Must often chase the fleeting shades of night.
And now (if so you deem) 't is time to cease,
And give the sprites' dismissal hence in peace."

Here, when she found the damsel thus dispos'd,
Her magic book the learo'd enchantress clos'd.
At once the phantoms vanish'd from the view,
And, where the prophet's corse was laid, withdrew.

When Bradamant at length the silence broke,
And thus the sage prophetic dame bespoke:
"What mournful pair⁴³ was that, who plac'd between 430

Alphonso and Hippolito were seen?
Sighing they came, their eyes to earth declin'd,
And gloomy sadness seem'd to fill their mind;
Far from their brethren's way their steps they
press'd."

As if they shunn'd to mingle with the rest."
At this demand, the prophetess appears
With visage chang'd, her eyes are fill'd with tears.

⁴⁰ Hippolito.

⁴¹ The Venetians going up the Po with a fleet against Alphonso, cardinal Hippolito went out of the city with some horse and foot, and coming to Volona, a castle near the Po, planted the artillery there to such advantage, that finding the enemy's gallees unprovided, most of the crews being on shore, he sunk four of them and took fifteen; but Angelo Trivisano, the admiral, escaped with one.

⁴² Hercules II. the fourth duke of Ferrara.

⁴³ Ferrante of Esté, natural brother to Alphonso and Hippolito, either through views of ambition, or because Alphonso refused to procure him satisfaction for an injury which he had received from Hippolito, had conspired with Julko, his natural brother, to assassinate the duke; but the plot being discovered, they were condemn'd to perpetual imprisonment. Forcacchi.

"Unbappy youths! what misery," she cry'd,
 "For you the wiles of treacherous men⁴ provide.
 O race renew'd! O great Herculean seed! 440
 Ah! let your goodness for their errors plead:
 From your their veins the richest currents prove;
 Let justice here give way to brother's love!"
 She then proceeded in a softer tone:
 "Seek not to ask⁵, what must not now be shown:
 Ah! gentle maid! suffice the good you know;
 Nor wish for that, which found, may cause your woe.
 Soon as to morrow's dawning light we view,
 The readiest path together we'll pursue,
 To where Rogero is in durance laid: 450
 Myself will guide you through the forest-shade;
 And, when we reach the margin of the flood,
 Will teach you every winding of the road."
 All night the virgin in the cave remain'd,
 With sage discourse by Merlin entertain'd,
 Who often warn'd th' attentive maid to prove Propitious to her dear Rogero's love.
 Soon as the skies began to glow with light,
 She left the subterranean caves of night;
 But first with sage Melissa took her way 460
 Through gloomy paths impervious to the day;
 At length, ascending, reach'd a desert place
 With savage hills, untrod by human race.
 The live-long day, unresting, they pursue'd
 Their course, and many a rock and torrent view'd,
 Still, as they went, endeavouring to allay
 With sweet discourse the labours of the way.
 But chief the prophetess instructs the maid
 How she may best th' imprison'd champion aid.
 "Though you were Mars, or Pallas' self" (she cried)
 "And drew as many warriors on your side 471
 As Africa's prince, or mighty Charlemain,
 You would oppose th' enchanter's power in vain.
 Not only does he rear (amazing sight!)
 His tower of steel on such a steepy height:
 Not only does he rule a winged horse,
 That strangely through the air directs his course;

⁴ The poet, by this equivocal expression, seems desirous to cast a veil over the guilt of these brothers.

⁵ This passage is a close copy of Virgil, where Æneas, seeing in a vision his successors pass before him, in the same manner as is here related of Bradamant, asks the same question, and receives for answer,

— Lucrus ne quere tuorum. Æn. vi.
 Seek not the sorrows of thy race to know.

Concerning the misfortunes of the youths here alluded to, sir John Harrington tells the following story:

"It happened that Hippolito and one of these brothers fell in love with a courtesan, who, showing less affection to Hippolito, was one day very earnestly importuned by him to know what mov'd her to prefer his brother before him; she answered, it was his beautiful eyes; upon which, Hippolito order'd them to be thrust out; but the youth found means to preserve his sight, and meeting no redress, by making his complaint to the duke, he, and the other brother here mentioned, conspired to kill him; but at the time of the execution, their hearts failed them, and the plot being discovered, they were kept in perpetual imprisonment." Notes to sir John Harrington's Translation, b. iii.

But on his arm he bears a blazing shield,
 That casts the gazer senseless on the field;
 And should you keep your eye-lids clos'd, to shun
 The hidden force of this terrestrial sun, 481
 How then the battle's progress could you know,
 When your foe flies, or when he aims a blow?
 But to withstand his arts on me rely,
 Nor can the world an aid like this supply.
 King Agramant a ring⁶ of great import
 Has given to one Brunello of his court,
 Who now before us on the way is seen:
 This ring (late taken from an Indian queen⁷)
 Is such, that he who wears it on his hand, 490
 May every fraud of magic power withstand.
 No less Brunello knows of servile guiles,
 Than he, who keeps your knight, of magic wiles.
 This man, so skill'd and crafty in deceit,
 His monarch sends to work a hardy feat,
 That, by his cunning and enchanted ring,
 He from the castle might Rogero bring,
 Whom much the king esteems: but shall he owe
 His freedom to a Pagan, and our foe?
 Three days your course along the shore pursue;
 (The shore will soon appear before our view) 501
 The third your steps will to the dwelling bring,
 Where you shall meet the man that wears the ring.

His stature (keep the picture in your mind)
 Is not six spans, his head to earth inclin'd;
 Dark is his tawny skin, and black his hairs;
 On his pale face a bushy beard he wears:
 His eyes are swollen; his squinting looks aside;
 His eye-brows staring, and his nostrils wide:
 His dress, which gives you all the man complete,
 Is short and strait, and for a courier meet. 511
 With him you doubtless must awhile discourse
 On the strange castle, and th' enchanter's force.
 Then speak your wish to dare th' adventurous deed,
 And make in fight the necromancer bleed;
 But let him no suspicion entertain
 You know the ring that makes enchantments vain.
 Soon will he proffer on your way to ride,
 And to the rocky mountain he your guide.
 Then follow him, and mark my words aright, 520
 Soon as the rock appears before your sight,
 Your fix'd resolves let no compassion shake,
 But seize the wretch, he a forfeit life to take:
 For should his lips receive the ring, he flies
 Involv'd in mist from your astonish'd eyes."

Thus speaking; to the shore at length they drew,
 Where Bourdeaux and Garonna rose to view;
 And here, but first some tender tears they shed,
 They parted as their different purpose led.
 Duke Amon's daughter, whose impatient breast 530
 Rogero fill'd, her eager journey press'd,
 Till at an inn at length she ceas'd her way,
 And saw Brunello there at close of day.
 Full well she knew the man she sought to find,
 So well his form was treasur'd in her mind:
 She questions where he goes, and whence he came,
 While lies to all he frames; nor less the dame,

⁶ This seems to be a new attempt of Brunello to free Rogero a second time from the hands of Atlantes. It has been before related, from Boyardo, how he was taken from the enchanted garden on Mount Carema in Africa. See Note on b. ii. ver. 495.

⁷ Angelica, daughter of Galapron.

Warn'd of his arts, for falsehood, falsehood deals,
Her country feigns; her name, and race conceals;
While watchful on his hands her eye she bends, 340
And every look, his treachery known, attends.
As thus distrust on either side prevails,
A dreadful noise each startled ear assails.
But cease we here, my lord! to tell the cause;
And here awhile permit the tale to pause.

BOOK IV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant, following the advice of Melissa, takes the ring from Brunello, defeats Atlantes, the magician, and sets his prisoners at liberty: but soon after loses her lover Rogero, who is carried from her in a wonderful manner, by the contrivance of Atlantes. Rinaldo, who was sent on an embassy to England, being cast by a tempest on the coast of Scotland, is entertained at an abbey, where he is acquainted with the misfortune of Genevra, daughter to the king of Scotland, and undertakes to fight in her behalf.

Traces we too oft dissimulation find
Th' attendant vice of a degenerate mind;
Yet, since in this bad world we must oppose
A thousand perils and a thousand foes,
A blameless art, in time of need pursu'd,
Has oft been found the means of future good;
A sure defence from threatening danger prov'd;
Impending shame, and death itself remov'd.

If after proofs long try'd, and try'd in vain,
You scarce at last a faithful friend attain;
A friend to whom you truly can impart
Each little care that fills the secret heart:
How with Brunello shall the maid proceed,
Brunello, strange to every virtuous deed;
But as Melissa had display'd before,
Of treason fram'd, and vers'd in guileful lore?
She to deceive, no less her mind applies,
As best beseems with him, the sire of lies!
While thus their mutual converse they pursue,
Still on his hands she bends her heedful view; 20
When sudden cries their startled ears invade,
"O! glorious mother!" cried th' astonish'd maid,
"O! king of heaven! from what dread wonder grows

This strange alarm?" but soon the cause she knows;
She sees the host and all the household near;
Who in the window or the streets appear
Gazing aloft, as when the vulgar spy
A dark eclipse, or comet in the sky.
And now a wondrous sight the virgin saw,
(A wondrous sight, surpassing Nature's law) 30
A courser through the air directs his flight,
Who bore upon his back an armed knight.
Large were his wings, with different colours grac'd,
And in the midst the magic knight was plac'd:
His shining arms of polish'd steel appear'd,
And towards the western skies his course he steer'd;
Till sinking, he behind the mountains flew.
Then said the host (and well the truth he knew)

* The Virgin-Mary.

"Behold a strange magician fram'd after,
Oft seen to journey through the fields of air. 40
Sometimes he seems amid the stars to rise;
And now, more lowly, near the Earth he flies;
While every beautiful damsel in his way,
The necromancer seizes as his prey.
Thus all whose features charm transcendent share,
Or those, who give themselves the name of fair,
With terror struck, avoid his hated sight,
And shun the face of day with pale affright.
"On a high rock" (the host pursuing said)
"He holds a castle by enchantment made; 50
A fortress built of stone, whose frame excels
Whate'er of wondrous, old tradition tells.
Full many knights have sought the place in vain,
For none could boast they e'er return'd again;
That much I dread, so dear th' adventure cost,
His life, or liberty, each warrior lost!"

This tale with joy th' attentive virgin heard,
In hopes (not after, vain her hopes appear'd)
Soon, by the magic ring's assisting power,
To quell th' enchanter, and destroy his tower. 60
Then to the host she said: "Let one be found,
Whose steps may guide me to this fatal ground:
For know, I burn with rage to prove my might
On this magician in immediate fight."
"Thou shalt not want an aid" (Brunello cried),
"Behold, myself I proffer for your guide.
The windings of the road I can display,
With many secrets to beguile the way."
"With grateful thanks I take you for my guide,"
(In hopes to gain the ring) the maid reply'd: 70
The host a courser brought the virgin-knight,
Apt for the road, and strongly lin'd for fight;
On this she mounted, and her way pursu'd,
Soon as the rising morn the day renew'd,
From steep to steep, from wood to wood they pass'd,
Till fam'd Pyrene's hills* they reach'd at last,
There may the sight, in skies serene, explore
Gallia and Spain, with either distant shore:
Thence from the summit show'd a rough descent,
That winding to the lower valley went; 80
Where, in the midst, a rocky mountain stood,
On which aloft the fort of steel they view'd,
That rear'd to Heaven, with such stupendous height,
Made all beneath seem little in its sight.
"Behold th' enchanter's tower" (Brunello said),
"In which the knights and dames are prisoners made."

Hewn in four equal sides, the mountain rose
Above the plain; nor path nor step it shows
To assist the feet, but seem'd a place design'd 90
For some strange animal of winged kind.
The virgin now perceiv'd the hour was come
To seize the ring, and seal Brunello's doom:
But her great soul th' inglorious thought disdain'd,
To see, with blood like his, her weapon stain'd:
Since she might safely of his ring deprive,
And yet preserve the helpless wretch alive.

* Boyardo's enchanted garden was on Mount Carana in Africa; Ariosto's castle, on the hills that divide Spain from the furthest part of France, formerly called Aquitania. The plain at the foot of these hills was called Ronsevaux, (Ronsevalles) where romances tell us, the Christians met with that memorable defeat from the Saracens, in which fell almost all the principal knights and paladins of France.

Then, while Brunello unsuspecting pass'd,
She seiz'd him unawares, and bound him fast
To a strong trunk beneath the beech's shade:
But from his finger first the ring convey'd. 100
In vain his every art Brunello tries,
And begs his freedom with unmanly cries:
She leaves him; and, with steps secure and slow,
Forsook the hill, and seeks the plain below:
Then winds her horn, that echoes to the skies,
And having breath'd a blast, with shouting cries
She boldly to the field her foe defies.

Nor long she stays, the fierce enchanter hears,
And, issuing from the castle-gate, appears:
But Bradamant beheld with secret joy, 110
Her foe no weapons in the field's employ.
Nor lance, nor heavy mail, nor sword he wore,
To bruise the armour, and the corset bore.
On his left arm was brac'd a mystic shield,
Whose wondrous orb a crimson veil conceal'd
His right hand held a book, and while he read,
Illusive phantoms round his foes he spread.
With spear, or sword, he seem'd to urge the fight:

And oft had dazzled many a warrior's sight.
But no illusion was his flying steed; 120
A griffin and a mare the mingled breed
Compos'd; and like his sire his feet before,
His head, his feathers, and his wings he wore;
(In all the rest his mother-mare was shown)
And by the name of griffin-horse was known.
Such, though but rarely, in those hills appear,
Beyond where ocean feels the freezing year.
Thence had the enchanter drawn him by his skill,

And made him soon obedient to his will;
Taught him the saddle and the reins to wear, 130
And o'er the earth and seas his master bear.
But all the rest that in the fight he show'd,
From airy visions of enchantment flow'd:
Yet nought against the maid avail'd his art,
Such wisdom could the sacred ring impart.
And now she seems enrag'd to strike the wind;
Now darts before; then swiftly turns behind.
At last (for so Melissa had requir'd,
To win the palm which most the maid desir'd)
In fury from her steed she seems to light, 143
And eager on her feet pursue the fight.
This seen, the necromancer bends his care,
With one enchantment to conclude the war;
And, thinking now the damsel to confound,
Removes the covering from his buckler's round.
Such was his wont—awhile the shining ray
He kept conceal'd to bold the knights in play:
For, with a sportive mind, he took delight
To see them wield the sword and spear in fight.

³ Pinabello, in the second book, had described the magician as making use of weapons in the battle with Gradasso and Rogero; but it must be remembered, that his sight was deluded by magic, as Ariosto in this passage, says:

His right hand held a book, and while he read,
Illusive phantoms round his foes he spread.
With spear, or sword, he seem'd to urge the fight, &c.
Ver. 117.

But the poet now, speaking in his own person, represents the matter as it really appeared to Bradamant.

So when the wily cat⁴ a prisoner draws 150
Some hapless mouse within her cruel claws,
Wanton awhile she joys his fears to see,
Nor yet will kill, nor set the captive free.
To that we might, in every former war,
The foul magician and the knights compare:
But not in this, the ring with powerful aid
Here gave th' advantage to the warrior-maid,
Who watchful as she fought t' escape surprise,
Attentive on the sorcerer's fix'd her eyes:
Soon as she saw the buckler's blaze reveal'd, 160
She clos'd her eyes, and tumbled on the field:
Nor think the splendour of the beaming light,
As with the rest, had power to hurt her sight;
But the wise virgin took this artful course,
To lure the vain enchanter from his horse.
Her wile succeeding, swiftly wheeling round,
The flying horsemen lighted on the ground:
On foot he leapt, and left behind his shield,
Ty'd to his saddle, in the veil conceal'd,
Then hasten'd where th' expecting damsel lay; 170
So waits a wolf to make the kid his prey;
While, on the ground neglected, he forsook
(With which he wag'd the war) his magic book.
Now with a chain to bind his foe he thought,
A chain prepar'd, for such a purpose brought;
But here an unexpected difference found;
The noble damsel hurl'd him to the ground;
He far unfit a strife like this to wage;
She strong in youth, and he deprest with age. 175
Now Bradamant her conquering weapon spread,
And from his shoulders thought to part his head;
But, marking well his face, her hand restrain'd,
As if such mean revenge her soul disdain'd.
She view'd the visage of her prostrate foe,
With wrinkles furrow'd o'er, and worn with woe;
Who, by his silver locks and reverend mien,
At least the course of seventy years had seen.
"For Heaven's sake, youth! conclude the fatal strife,"

(The lost magician said) "and take my life."
But she no less to save his life conspir'd, 190
Than he to leave the hated light desir'd.
Meantime a new desire possess'd the dame,
To learn th' enchanter's country, and his name;
And what he by that rocky tower design'd,
Built in a wild, to ravage all mankind.

"Alas! for no ill purpose" (thus replies
The old enchanter, mingling tears and sighs)
"On yon steep rock I built my settled home,
Nor avarice makes me round the country roam;
But fond affection would my soul incite, 200
To save from peril great a gentle knight,
Long threaten'd by his stars in Gallia's land
To die a Christian by a treacherous hand.

⁴ Many passages in Ariosto are of the ludicrous kind, of which this simile is an example, which is taken from the most common and familiar image in life: there is an instance of this kind still more ludicrous, where he describes the universal terror spread by Atolpo's horn in the enchanted palace of Adlaurea. B. xiii. ver. 161.

In casa non resta gatta ne topo.
Nor cat nor mouse within the dwelling stay'd.
Such passages, blended with others truly epic, prove Ariosto's style and imagery to be of the mixed kind.

A youth like this, for looks and courage bold,
 Ne'er did the Sea 'twixt either pole behold;
 Rogero call'd : his infancy with care
 I nurs'd : Atlantes is the name I bear.
 Desire of fame, but more his cruel chance,
 With Agrament allard' his step to France :
 While I, who love him with a parent's love, 210
 Seek him from France and danger to remove :
 For this alone I rais'd the stately tower,
 To keep Rogero's life from fortune's power ;
 Where late I kept him prisoner safe, and where
 I vainly hop'd, alas ! yourself to bear !
 With gallant dames and knights I fill'd the place,
 With many others of the noblest race ;
 That, though deny'd to leave this safe retreat,
 Society might make his bondage sweet.
 Except their freedom, I with care provide 220
 For every want, for every wish beside.
 Whate'er the world affords each various coast
 To give delight, these castle walls can boast :
 The song, the dance, the costly garb, the feast ;
 Whate'er the heart can think, or tongue request !
 Well had I sworn, and well the fruits enjoy'd ;
 But thou art come, and all my works destroy'd.
 Alas ! if, like your gentle looks, you bear
 A gentle heart, in pity hear my prayer.
 That buckler take, which I with joy resign, 230
 And make that flying steed which once was mine.
 Or, hast thou friends in yonder tower confin'd ?
 Free one, or two ; remain the rest behind.
 Nay, all my prisoners, if thou seek'st, receive,
 So thou alone wilt my Rogero leave.
 But if, alas ! e'en him thou would'st remove ;
 Before thou lead'st to France the youth I love,
 Ah ! let me by thy pitying sword be slain,
 And free this spirit from her house of pain."
 To this the maid—" Thy fruitless plaints give o'er,
 For know, I will the captive knight restore ; 241
 Nor offer shield, nor courser to resign,
 No longer yours, by right of conquest mine :
 Or were they yours to give, could gifts like these
 For such a warrior's loss my mind appease ?
 For this Rogero is confin'd with care,
 To avoid the threatening influence of his star !
 O bind to fate ! or, grant you can foresee,
 What human power shall alter Heaven's decree ?
 But if your own near fate you never knew, 250
 Far less another's fate your art can view.
 Request not death from me ; such prayers are vain :
 Or if sincere you seek to end your pain ;
 Though all the world denies, the noble mind
 Can from itself its own dismission find.
 But first set wide the castle gate with speed,
 And let your prisoners all from bonds be freed."
 So spake the virgin ; and without delay,
 With old Atlantes took her eager way.
 Chains of his own the necromancer bind ; 260
 The cautious damsel follows close behind ;
 For, still in doubt, some secret guile she fear'd,
 Though deep submission in his face appear'd.
 Now near they came, where on the rocky side,
 Scarcely to be seen, a narrow cliff she spy'd,
 By which the steps, in windings from the mead,
 To the high summit of the mountain lead.
 Atlantes from the threshold mov'd a stone,
 Where mystic signs and characters were shown :
 Beneath were vessels, whence was seen expire 270
 Sulphureous smoke that came from hidden fire.
 All these the scor'rer broke ; and sudden grew
 The country desert, comfortless to view !

As oft from nets the thrushes take their flight,
 So swift the necromancer flew from sight :
 At once with him, dissolv'd to empty air,
 The vanish'd castle left the mountain bare.
 Surpris'd, themselves the knights and ladies found
 From stately rooms remov'd to open ground :
 While many view'd their present state with pain,
 And wish'd for pleasing slavery again. 281
 Gradasso, Sacripant were there to see :
 The knight Prasildo too, from prison free,
 Who with Rinaldo came from eastern lands ;
 (oldo^s join'd with him in friendly bands.
 Here noble Bradamant with joy perceiv'd
 Her lov'd Rogero, him for whom she griev'd ;
 Who, when he saw the beauteous maid, express'd
 The grateful transports of an amorous breast ;
 As one he valu'd to his soul more dear 290
 Than golden beams of light, or vital air,
 E'er since the day⁶ the fair her helm unbonded,
 And in her lovely head receiv'd a wound.
 Each other night and day they sought in vain,
 Nor till this blissful hour could meet again.
 Now when with longing eyes Rogero view'd
 Where she, his lov'd, his fair deliverer staid,
 So vast a pleasure fill'd his ravish'd mind,
 He deem'd himself the happiest of mankind.
 From shameful bondage freed, the warriors 300
 came,

Where in the valley stood the conquering dame :
 And where the wondrous courser they beheld,
 Who wore the buckler in the veil conceal'd.
 The damsel now to seize his reins essay'd,
 And, till she nearer drew, the courser stay'd ;
 But soon he spreads his wings, and spurs the plain ;
 Thence, at a little distance, lights again.
 Eager she follows, where she sees the steed
 Now here, now there descending on the mead.
 Thus, on the sandy shore, in many rounds, 310
 The wily crow the spaniel's search confounds.
 Gradasso, Sacripant, Rogero try'd ;
 Alike each knight his several art apply'd ;
 Some on the hills, some planted on the plain,
 As best they thought the winged steed to gain ;
 But he (when first he had the warriors led
 Up the rough paths to every mountain head,
 And in the marshy vales beneath convey'd)
 At length beside Rogero gently stay'd.
 This was Atlantes' work, whose aged breast 320
 A thousand anxious boding fears oppress'd.
 Who oft had rack'd his thoughts with pious care,
 To save Rogero from his fatal star.
 For this he bids the griffin-horse alight :
 To bear from Europe's climes the youthful knight.
 Rogero thought to lead him on the way,
 But the steed, stopping short, refus'd t' obey.
 From good Frontino⁷ then he leaps with speed,
 (Frontino was the champion's generous steed)

⁵ Christian knights in Bayardo's poem, who had been imprisoned with Rinaldo, Dudon, and others, in a castle in the East, and being afterwards delivered, set out with Rinaldo for France, to the assistance of Charlemain, and are here supposed to have been taken prisoners by Atlantes.

⁶ See General View of Boyardo's Story.

⁷ The horse which Brunello stole from Sacripant, and gave to Rogero.

See General View of Boyardo's Story.

He darts the strong-plum'd courser to bestride, 330
 And claps his goring rowels in his side;
 Who runs awhile, till, rising from the plain,
 He spurns the ground beneath and soars again.
 So when the master lets the falcon fly,
 At once he sees his prey, and shoots along the sky.

The maid, alarm'd, beheld, with shuddering sight,
 Her dear Rogero in this dangerous plight:
 Such various passions in her bosom wrought,
 She seem'd awhile depriv'd of sense and thought.
 What she of youthful Ganymede had heard, 340
 To Heaven by Jove's almighty will preferr'd,
 She doubts may prove of her Rogero true,
 Whose equal graces charm'd the gazer's view.
 His course she follows through the distant skies,
 While yet his course she reaches with her eyes;
 Even when the distance leaves her sight behind,
 She follows still, and views him in her mind.
 Her tender bosom heaves with labouring sighs,
 While ceaseless sorrows trickle from her eyes.
 But when her lover long in vain she mourn'd, 350
 Her looks upon his gallant steed she turn'd,
 Then, parting, took Frontino by the rein,
 In hopes to give him to his lord again.

Meantime the monster flew, nor knew the knight
 To rule the reins, or stop his rapid flight.
 He sees the face of Earth decreas'd in show,
 And every lofty summit left below;
 So far remov'd, no more his eye descries
 Where the vales sink, or where the mountains rise.
 But when the steed has gain'd so vast a height, 360
 He seem'd a little spot to mortal sight,
 He steer'd his course, to where in western streams
 The Sun descends, when Cancer feels his beams.
 He cuts his airy way, as vessels sail
 On prosperous seas before the driving gale.
 But let him go*, and well his voyage speed,
 While to Rinaldo must the tale proceed.

Rinaldo that, and all th' ensuing day,
 Was driv'n by tempests o'er the watery way:
 From morn till eve the wind unceasing blew: 370
 Now to the west, and now the north they drew;
 At last upon the shore of Scotland light,
 Where Caledonia's forest⁹ rose to sight,

* He returns to Rogero, b. vi. ver. 111, and to Bradamant, b. vii. ver. 212.

⁹ The forest of Caledonia, famous for its dreary solitudes, was the scene of the exploits of many of the knights errant, of which such fabulous accounts are given in the books of chivalry of those times: of these knights, the principal were the five following mentioned by our author.

Tristram, son of Meliadis, king of Leonis, and one of the first of the errant knights sworn at the round table. Marco, king of Cornwall, having engaged to marry Isotta, daughter of king Langwines, sent his nephew Tristram to Ireland, to fetch over the bride. Isotta's mother, having prepared an enchanted potion to make her daughter beloved by her husband, had entrusted it to a confidante, when it happened, that Tristram and Isotta, in the voyage, tasted of the potion, and became violently enamoured of each other. King Marco, having some time afterwards surprised the lovers together, snatched up Tristram's lance, which stood without the chamber, and slew him

That midst its ancient oaks was wont to hear
 The riven target, and the shiver'd spear:
 Here once were seen, beneath those shades rever'd.

Each errant-knight in Britain's combats fear'd:
 From regions far and near, well known to fame,
 From Norway, Germany, and Gallia came therewith: upon which Isotta fell on the body, and expired. Tristram's companion was,

Launcelot, a knight also sworn of the round table, and son of Bando, king of Benovich: he was deeply in love with queen Guenever, wife to king Arthur, and no less beloved by her: after her death he became a hermit. Launcelot was deceived by a daughter of king Piscatore, who, seeing his passion for the queen, by a crafty wile lay with him in her stead, and had by him a son called Galasso, who being created a knight by his father, was the first that sat in the chair of Merlin: he is said to have obtained the holy vessel in which our Saviour ate with his disciples; and was reputed a saint.

Arthur was the son of Uther Pendragon, king of England: Jeffery of Monmouth informs us, that Uther Pendragon fell in love with Igerne (or Jogerne) the wife of Gorlois, prince of Cornwall. In the absence of Gorlois, Merlin, by his magic, transformed Uther into the likeness of Jordan, a familiar friend of Gorlois, himself assuming the figure of one Brice; by means of which artifice Uther enjoyed Igerne, and begot king Arthur, who is said to have been the greatest king that ever lived: he was so renowned a warrior, that he slew with his own hand four hundred and sixty men in battle, and added other kingdoms to his own: he wore a golden helmet, with a dragon for his crest; thus Spencer in his Fairy Queen:

His haughty helmet, horrid all with gold,
 Both glorious brightness and great terror bred,
 For all the crest a dragon did enfold
 With greedy paws ——— D. i. c. vii.

On his shield was engraven the effigies of the virgin Mary: he bore a lance of uncommon size and weight, with which he slew his son Mordites, who had rebelled against him, and lay in ambush to assassinate him; hence Dante says:

Con ess' un colpo per le man d'Artù.

With this a blow from Arthur's hand——

This prince was the first that established the order of the round table, with so many famous knights: his end is uncertain; some say, that he received his mortal wound in fighting against his traitorous nephew Mordred; but the old Welch bards had a strange tradition, that he was not dead, but would return after a time, and reign in as great authority as ever.

Galvano (or Gawaine): there were two of this name, one the nephew of Arthur, a man of great valour, and one of the round table: the other was under Amadis de Gaule: they were both great knights, and achieved many adventures. On the beach of the sea, near Milford-haven, is a natural rock shaped into a chapel, which tradition reports to have been the burying place of sir Gawaine, the nephew of Arthur. See Porcacchi, Warton's, and Upton's notes on Spencer, &c.

Each gallant chief, who nobly scorn'd his life,
Where death or conquest crown'd the glorious strife!
Here Tristram mighty deeds perform'd of old,
Galasso, Launcelot, and Arthur bold,
Gaiamo brave; with more that titles drew
Both from the ancient table, and the new¹⁰;
Knights, who have left, to spend their valiant mind,
More than one trophy of their worth behind.

Rinaldo arms, his steed Bayardo takes,
And landing on the shore, the sea forsakes:
He bids the pilot Berwick speed to gain, 390
And there till his arrival to remain.

Without a squire the fearless knight perrades¹¹
The gloomy horror of those dreary shades;
Now here, now there, as most he hop'd to find
Adventures of a new and dreadful kind.
The first day brought him to an abbey fair,
Whose wealth was spent with hospitable care,
Beneath its roof reception to provide
For knights and dames that through the forest ride.
The monks and abbot, with a friendly grace, 400
Welcom'd the brave Rinaldo to the place;
Who now inquir'd (but not till grateful food
Had cheer'd his spirits and his strength renew'd),
How in the compass of that savage ground,
Adventures strange by wandering knights were found.

He might, they answer'd, 'midst the woods essay
A thousand perils in the lonely way;
But, as the place, so were the deeds conceal'd,
And seldom to the wondering world reveal'd.
"Far rather go," they cried, "where, done in sight,
Your actions may be view'd in open light; 411
Where after toil and danger follows fame,
With ready trump your praises to proclaim.
But if indeed your honour you regard,
Then hear the noblest enterprise prepar'd,
That ever yet, in ancient times or new,
A courteous warrior could in arms pursue.—
Our monarch's daughter needs a gallant knight,
In her defence to wage a single fight
Against a lord (Lorcanio is his name) 420
Who seeks to spoil her of her life and fame.
He to her father thus accus'd the maid,
(Perhaps by hatred more than reason sway'd)—
That she receiv'd, confess before his sight,
A lover at her window in the night.
Her crime in flames she expiats by the laws,
Unless a champion rises in her cause
Within a month, (now hastening to an end,)
Her life against th' accuser to defend.
The cruel laws of Scotland's realm decree 430
That every maid, of high or low degree,

¹⁰ "The round table was not peculiar to the reign of King Arthur, but was common in all the ages of chivalry. Any king was said to 'hold a round table,' when he proclaimed a tournament attended with some peculiar solemnities." See Reliques of Ancient Poetry, vol. i. p. 35.

¹¹ This passage has more the air of the old romances than most parts of the poem. A prince, sent from his sovereign on an embassy to a foreign power, being landed near a forest, instead of taking the nearest way to execute his commission, wanders up and down in search of adventures: however, the reader may perhaps be tempted to overlook this inconsistency for the sake of the episode thereby introduced.

Accus'd of yielding to the luring fire
Of lawless love, in torment shall expire:
Nor aught can save the wretched damsel's life,
Unless some warrior dare the generous strife.
The king, who for Geneura's safety fears,
(Such is the name his hapless daughter bears)
Proclaims through every city, far and near,
That he who dares in her defence appear,
Whose arm shall lay her proud accuser low, 440
(If he his birth to noble parents owe)
Shall for his bride the royal maid receive,
With such a dower as fits a prince to give.—
A deed like this should more your sword demand,

Than wandering thus amid the forest land.
You will the flower of beauteous dames obtain,
Twixt distant India and th' Atlantic main;
With power and wealth, and knighthood's envy'd
praise,

To crown with blessings all your future days.
Our king shall fix on you his sovereign grace, 450
Whose arm preserv'd the honour of his race.
Yet more, the law of chivalry demands,
To save from infamous and treacherous hands
A maid, who, by the world's consent, may claim
Among the chaste minds the foremost name."

Rinaldo mus'd awhile, then made reply:
"And must a damsel be condemn'd to die
Because she circled in her yielding arms,
And kindly bless'd her lover with her charms?
Accurs'd be those that could such laws procure! 460
Accurs'd be those that still such laws endure!
Let cruel virgins rather cease to live,
Not those who life to faithful lovers give:
Nor ask I now if with consenting ear
Geneura deign'd her suitor's vows to hear;
In her defence shall all my force be try'd:
Procure me speedily a skillful guide;
And give me but th' accuser's face to see,
I trust, in Heaven, to set Geneura free.
I mean not now (what truth perchance denies) 470
To affirm that guiltless of the deed she dies;
But mean to show what madness fill'd his mind,
Who first devis'd this law for woman-kind.
When man to multitudes his love displays,
Nor meets alone impunity, but praise.
And soon I hope, in Heaven, to prove the wrong,
To suffer tamely such an act so long."

The rest with good Rinaldo deem'd the same,
While all agreed their ancestors to blame:
Nor could the king escape from censure free, 480
Whose justice ne'er revers'd the harsh decree.

Soon as the rosy morn, with splendour bright,
Reveal'd the hemisphere of rising light,
Rinaldo arm'd, and mounted on his steed;
He took a trusty squire the way to lead;
Then left the abbey, and his course pursued,
For many miles along the gloomy wood,
To seek the city destin'd for the strife,
On which depended fair Geneura's life.
To make the shorter way, they chanc'd to take 490
A path more lonely, and the road forsake.
When near at hand they hear a screaming sound,
The forest echoes to the noise around,
One spur Bayardo, 't' other spur his steed,
To search the valley whence the cries proceed.
Betwixt two men a damsel there was seen,
Who distant seem'd of fair and comely mien;
But ne'er before did dame or damsel show
Looks more depreat with anguish or with woe.

On either side the ruffians ready stood 500
 With naked swords to dye the ground with blood ;
 While she, with prayers and many a flowing tear,
 Did for awhile the dreadful stroke defer.
 Rinaldo comes, and when the fair he spies,
 He hastens to her aid with threatening cries.

Soon as the murderers saw th' approaching
 knight,

At once they turn'd their backs in sudden flight ;
 Through the dark vale precipitate they flew ;
 Nor would the Paladin their steps pursue,
 But, drawing near the damsel, sought to hear 510
 Her deep distress, and whence her death so near ;
 Then, for dispatch, commands the squire to bear
 Behind him, on their way, the weeping fair ;
 While, as they rode, he better mark'd her face,
 Her beautiful features, and her pleasing grace
 That savour'd of a court ; though still appear
 Upon her troubled looks the marks of fear.
 Again Rinaldo ask'd, what cruel fate
 Had so deprest her to this wretched state ?
 She then, with lowly voice, began to tell 520
 What in th' ensuing book we shall reveal.

BOOK V.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rinaldo hears, from Dalinda, the tale of the loves of Ariodantes and Geneura, with the treachery of Polinesso, who had contrived to blacken the reputation of Geneura, and caused her to be openly accused of incontinence ; in consequence of which, by the laws of Scotland, she was condemned to death. Rinaldo takes up her cause before the king, and enters the list with her enemy.

THE beasts that haunt the wood or graze the plain,

Or tame or savage, mutual peace maintain ;
 But if sometimes they chance to mix in war,
 The generous males with females never jar :
 The she bear from the other never flies,
 The lioness beside the lion lies :
 The she-wolf with her mate securely lives,
 Nor the bull terror to the heifer gives.

What strife, or what Megara has possess'd
 The deep recesses of the human breast, 10
 That oft the husband and the wife engage
 In wordy conflict ; oft, with impious rage,
 Against each other aim the vengeful blow,
 While gushing tears the genial bed o'erflow ;
 Nor tears alone, but some, by fury fed,
 In crimson streams the vital current shed ?
 Accurs'd is he, and born in evil hour,
 Who dares rebel against the sovereign power
 Of Nature's laws, to strike the weeping fair,
 Or from her tresses rend a single hair : 20
 But he, whose breast such small remorse can feel,
 T'attempt her life with poison, or with steel,
 I ne'er can deem a man ; but, scap'd from woe,
 Some fiend infernal from the realms below.

The two assassins, such we justly name,
 Driv'n by the brave Rinaldo from the dame ;
 Whom to that lonely vale their guilt betray'd,
 To hide their dreadful crime in dreary shade :—
 I left the dame prepar'd to relate,
 The secret cause of her unhappy state, 30

To good Rinaldo, her preserver-knight ;
 And thus, pursuing, I the tale recite.

The damsel now began : " Prepare to hear
 Such deeds as never yet have reach'd the ear,
 As never stain'd the most inhuman crew :
 Not such Mycenæ, Thebes, or Argos knew ;
 If yonder Sun that darts his beams around,
 Shines more remotely on our native ground,
 'T is doubtfuls that he shuns this hated place,
 With horror viewing such an impious race. 40

" That men on foes exert their dreadful rage,
 Examples have been seen in every age ;
 But that dire mind what savage fury sways,
 Who friendship's warmth with fiend-like ill repays !
 That undiguis'd, you all the truth may know,
 I will from first the cause impartial show,
 Why these assassins did with barbarous ire
 Against my blooming tender youth conspire.

" Know then, my lord, I, yet a girl, was sent
 To court, and to Geneura's service went ; 50
 By her receiv'd, I flourish'd in her grace,
 And in the palace held an honour'd place :
 But cruel Love my state with envy saw,
 And soon, alas ! subdued me to his law :
 He made, of every youth and comely knight,
 The duke of Albany my sole delight.

We hear the speech, we see the looks express,
 But who can view the secrets of the breast ?
 His love, avow'd, my bosom first inspir'd
 With tender thoughts, with gentle wishes fir'd : 60
 So far at length my fond belief was led,
 That I receiv'd him to my virgin bed.
 Nor that alone ; but that recess I chose
 In which sometimes the princess would repose ;
 In which conceal'd her choicest treasure lies,
 A close retreat, remote from vulgar eyes !
 There by a gallery to the widow join'd,
 A favour'd friend might easy entrance find.
 By this I often introduc'd my love,
 A silken ladder throwing from above. 70

'T was thus I did th' enamour'd duke receive,
 When'er Geneura's absence gave me leave ;
 Who us'd to change her bed, sometimes to fly
 The burning heat, sometimes the freezing sky.
 Securely oft we met, and void of fear
 Indulg'd our flame, for 'gainst the palace bore
 Some lonely ruins stood, where night or day
 None ever pass'd his visits to survey.

" For many a month to all the court unknown,
 In frequent joys our secret hours had flown : 80
 So blind was I, I ne'er discover'd yet
 That little truth was his, but much deceit ;
 Though the base treasons of his faithless breast
 Were plainly by a thousand signs express'd.
 At length, without disguise, he durst confess
 His close design Geneura to possess :
 Nor know I if his love was then begun,
 Or ere he yet my giddy thoughts had won.
 Judge, in my bosom if he bore a part,
 Or rather, if he rul'd not all my heart ; 90
 He own'd his purpos'd suit, nor blush'd with shame

To ask my friendly aid to win the dame ;
 But vow'd his ardour feign'd, in hope alone
 To form a near alliance to the throne ;

¹ There is scarcely any part of the poem more simple and unadorned than this tale, and which admits of so little elevation in an English version.

As none, among the nobles of the blood,
Except the king, in rank before him stood:
And promis'd, should my counsel e'er ensure
His sovereign's favour, and the bride secure;
The service, ever present to his mind,
In ties of gratitude his soul should bind: 100
That I alone, his wife, his friends above,
Should reign th' unrival'd partner of his love.

"I (that his happiness endeavour'd still,
Nor e'er in thought or deed control'd his will)
Took all occasions that I saw to raise
In fair Geneura's ear my lover's praise.
Heaven knows how truly I employ'd my art
To serve him with a just and faithful heart |
But vain th' attempt my much-lov'd duke to place
With many a trial in the fair one's grace. 110

Another love was kindled in her breast,
Another lover all her soul possess'd:
A comely courteous knight had rais'd a flame,
A knight, who from a foreign region came:
He, with his youthful brother, left the port
Of distant Italy, for Scotland's court;
Where soon in arms such vast renown he gain'd,
No son of Britain greater praise obtain'd:
The king esteem'd him, and his favour show'd,
By gifts of honour, and of wealth bestow'd: 120
Castles and towns he gave to his command,
And rank'd him midst the barons of the land.
This knight the name of Ariodantes bore,
The monarch lov'd him much, his daughter
more:

The warrior's valiant deeds with warmth inspir'd
Her gentle soul, but more the lover stir'd:
Since well she knew, for her what flame possess'd
The gentle Ariodantes' constant breast.
Her growing passion made the virgin hear
My lover's praises with averted ear: 130
The more, to gain his suit, with prayers I strove,
The more her hatred rose and spur'd his love.

"I sooth'd his grief, and oft essay'd to make
Th' ambitious duke his vain design forsake.
I show'd him how the damsel's soul possess'd
With Ariodantes, for him alone confess'd
The darts of love.—When Poliness heard
(Such was his name) what little hopes appear'd
To obtain his wish, each thought of tender kind
Driv'n from his soul, his fierce revengeful mind,
Enrag'd to see another favour'd more, 141
To hate converted what was love before;

Between Geneura and her favourite knight,
Resolv'd to kindle rage and jealous spite,
And so the fire of enmity increase,
As ne'er again might be compos'd to peace:
Nor would he trust with me his treacherous thought,
But counsel only from himself he sought.

At last, he thus his speech began to frame:
'My dear Dalinda,' thus I'm known by name, 150
'Thou see'st the tree, though often hewn, will shoot

Fresh branches from the new divided root;
Thus nought can wholly my desires suppress,
Though leapt so often by their ill success;
Yet think not that I prize the haughty dame,
But baffled!—accus'd—my soul rejects the shame!
This is my will: Whene'er by love inspir'd
We meet, the princess to her bed retir'd,
Take every garment that aside she throws,
And on yourself her ornaments dispose: 160
Like her attempt to dress your flowing hair,
Let every gesture feign Geneura's air.

Before the window take your silent stand,
And let the ladder down with ready hand.
Then will I come, in fancy preposses't
That you are her you seem by mien and vest:
For well I trust, while thus myself I cheat,
To cure my fond desire with this deceit.'

"He said; and I, unconscious, ne'er perceiv'd
(So far had love my thoughts of sense bereav'd) 176
That what he ask'd, my treacherous lover meant,
With secret guilt e' effect some base intent;
But like Geneura cloth'd in vestment white,
Receiv'd his visits many a secret night;
Nor saw the reason working in his mind,
Till all had follow'd which his guile design'd.

"His purpose thus secur'd, the wily duke
Aside th' unwary Ariodantes took;
For once they liv'd in friendship's social band
Ere fatal rivals for Geneura's hand. 180

'With deep regret I find,' he thus address'd
The gentle knight, 'when singled from the rest,
Amidst my peers I show'd you most regard,
You should so ill my partial choice reward.
Full well you know what love (long time declar'd)
With mine Geneura's gentle heart has shar'd;
And see me now preparing to demand
The maid in marriage from my sovereign's hand.
Why will you then disturb my rightful claim?
Why thus indulge a rash and hopeless flame? 190
I swear, had Heaven revers'd our fates, to thee
My juster choice had left the fair-one free.'

"'It moves me more to view your fruitless pain,'
Thus Ariodantes answer'd him again,
'Since, ere your thoughts aspir'd to win the dame,
My soul had nourish'd long the growing flame;
And ne'er could sympathy more powerful prove,
To join two amorous minds in mutual love.

Why then respect not you our friendly band,
Or pay my vows the deference you demand? 200
Were you beheld with more propitious eyes,
Long since had I resign'd the beauteous prize:
But well I hope the princely maid to wed,
Though your possessions may be wider spread:
Not less my deeds by Scotland's king approv'd,
And by his daughter am I more belov'd.'

"'O'erweening confidence,' the duke rejoind'd,
'Has but deceiv'd thy fond distemper'd mind!
Sincere the progress of thy love impart,
And, in return, will I disclose my heart. 210
So he, who in success appears to yield,
Shall to his happier rival quit the field.
Whate'er thou speak'st, you' Heaven I here attest,
The tale shall safe within this bosom rest;

So shalt thou vow, thou never wilt disclose
Whate'er my friendship may in thee repose.'

"This said, each other's secrets to conceal
They swore; then Ariodantes began to tell
His love's pursuit, and, undisguis'd, display'd
His tender contract with the royal maid; 226
Who, if the king her sire her suit denied,
Vow'd, for his sake, to shun the name of bride.

He urg'd his hopes, by many battles won
In former fields, by trophies yet unknown,
Which still he hop'd in future fields to gain,
For the king's fame and welfare of his reign,
To rise so high in rank, the monarch's voice
Should yield his daughter, and confirm her choice.
'Behold,' he cried, 'the point my love has gain'd,
And none, I deem, has equal grace obtain'd. 236
I seek no other at Geneura's hand,
Till sanctify'd by Hymen's holy band:

'T were vain to ask her more, whose virtuous mind
Leaves every maid in chastity behind.'

'When Ariodantes thus with truth declar'd
How far he deem'd his love might find reward,
Duke Polinesso, who with guile devis'd
To make Genevra by her knight despis'd,
Thus fraudulent pursu'd—'Now hear me tell,
How far my happier chance can thee excel. 240
With thee she feigns, she scorns thy hated name,
While with vain hopes she feeds thy boasted flame;
But better proofs of love to me affords,
Than airy promises, and empty words;
Which, under secrecy, I shall reveal,
Though lady's favours we should still conceal.
No conscious month revolves, but sees me led
Full many a night to fair Genevra's bed;
Beholds me clasp her yielding in my arms,
And riot, unconfin'd, in all her charms.

Judge, if thy favours can with mine compare: 250
Then yield to me, and seek some kinder fair,
Since love has crown'd my happier fortune there.'

' 'T is false!' thus Ariodant increas'd replies,
'Thou hast defam'd the fair with odious lies;
And hast devis'd what thou hast said, to prove
If shallow tales can fright me from my love.
But since too much Genevra's fame they stain,
It fits, what thou hast spoken, to maintain.
This instant will I brand thee, ere we part, 260
A liar and a traitor in thy heart.'

' 'T were weak indeed,' the duke again replied,

'A strife like this by combat to decide;
When here I offer, what these lips have told,
Those eyes shall witness, and the truth behold.'

'At this to stagger Ariodant began,
While through his bones a chilling tremour ran:
And but some glimmering yet of hope remain'd,
His heart had scarce its vital heat retain'd.
His bosom throbb'd, his shifting colour fled, 270
As thus at length with fair'tring words he said:
'When you disclose this deed before my sight,
(Attend me here my sacred promise plight)
Thenceforth I vow to leave Genevra free,
So liberal found to you, so harsh to me!
In vain your words my constant mind would move,
Unless these eyes her fatal falsehood prove.'

'This said, they parted: soon was fix'd again
The night my treacherous duke to entertain:
When to complete the snare his craft had wrought,
My guileful lover Ariodantes sought; 281
And bade him take his stand th' ensuing night
Amidst those ruin'd piles, conceal'd from sight.

'But Ariodantes now in thought began
To doubt that this conceal'd some murderous plan;
That the false duke, by rival hatred sway'd,
A secret ambush for his life had laid,
Pretending there a cruel proof to give
Of what his thoughts till then could ne'er conceive.
Yet was he firm to go, but on his guard, 290
Resolv'd for all assaults to be prepar'd;
That, if the chance requir'd, he bravely might
Withstood his ambush'd enemy in fight.

His brother was a knight of prudence sound,
Of all the court in arms the most renown'd,
Lurcanio call'd, and less, with him, he fear'd,
Than if ten others on his side appear'd.
This gallant youth he bade his arms prepare,
And led th' adventure of the night to share.
Not that he told the secrets of his heart, 300
For these to him, nor none, would he impart.

'And now approach'd so near the destin'd place
As from the hand a stone might fly the space,
He plac'd Lurcanio there, and thus he said:

'When need demands, then hasten to my aid;
But till my voice you hear, forbear to move;
Be silent, as you prize your brother's love.'
'Go, fear me not,'—his brother thus replied.
Then Ariodantes, parting from his side,
Went to th' appointed place, his station took, 310
And on my window fix'd his anxious look.
Now, from a different part the traitor came,
So ready to pollute Genevra's fame;
Without delay the wonted signal made
To me, who little knew what snare was laid.

Then in a dress Genevra us'd to wear,
Soon as I found my Polinesso there,
I from th' apartment to the gallery drew,
And stood, on ev'ry side expos'd to view. 320
My vest was white, and richly to behold,
Deck'd all around with costly fringe of gold;
A golden net descending from my head
With crimson flowers, was o'er my habit spread.

'Lurcanio now, who deem'd with anxious mind
Some ill for Ariodantes' life design'd,
And partly by a natural passion led,
Desire of knowing how his fortune sped,
With wary tread his brother's steps pursued,
And silent near him undiscover'd stood.

Meanwhile I thoughtless came: the silver Moon
Resplendent on my glittering garments shone: 331
Nor seem'd I much unlike the royal fair,
In outward person, or in borrow'd air;

And both the brethren, by the duke deceiv'd,
The well-concerted fraud for truth believ'd,
Judge at that time what cruel pangs possess'd
The wretched Ariodantes' tortur'd breast.

Now Polinesso comes, and full in sight
Receives the ladder, and ascends the height.
Then, thinking none beheld what fondly pass'd, 340
Around his neck my eager arms I cast,
And, as I ever had my duke caress'd,
With many a tender kiss his lips I press'd,
Which he with warmth return'd:—Th' unhappy
knight,

Who stood spectator of this hated sight,
So deeply sunk beneath the load of grief,
His soul resolv'd from death to seek relief;

Then drew the sword, despairing, from his side,
And to his breast the fatal point apply'd.
Lurcanio (who surpris'd my lover view'd 350
Ascend the gallery where disguis'd I stood,
But knew not for the duke) advanc'd with speed,
Soon as he saw his brother's frantic deed,
And seizing hastily his furious hand,

From his rash act the hapless knight restrain'd:
Had he been more remote, or longer stay'd,
In vain, alas! had prov'd his pious aid.

'Ah wretched, senseless brother!' thus he cried,
'What rage has turn'd your better thoughts
aside?

Thus for a woman is your death design'd? 360
All false, as clouds that fit before the wind!

Far rather let her die, her sex's stain!
But for a nobler end your life retain.
Before this crime she justly claim'd your love;
But now she should alone your hatred move;
Since your own eyes have witness'd to her shame,
And seen how low she prostitutes her fame.
Then let those arms, against yourself employ'd,
Before the king her sire her fate decide.'

"When Ariodantes sees his brother nigh, 370
He seeks no longer on his sword to die;
With seeming calm he veils his secret pains,
But still his former purpose fixt remains.
Departing thence, he with him bears the smart
That gives no ease to his distracted heart.

"Next morning early he the court forsook,
(Nor leave of brother or of friends he took)
None but Lurcanio and the duke could know
The cause that made him thus his home forgo;
While of his absence in the royal court, 380
And o'er the land, was various the report.

"Eight days elaps'd:—at length a pilgrim came
With mournful tidings to the princely dame,
That Ariodantes in the sea was lost:
Not by the Eastern wind, or Borras lost,
But that himself his own destruction found,
And leaping headlong in the waves, was drown'd.
'Ere this last fatal act,' the stranger said,

'He thus bespoke me, there by fortune led:
'Draw near my friend, and he Geneura told 390
The hidden cause of what you now behold:

Tell her 't is this; these eyes too much have seen,
Ah! happy, if these eyes had never been!"—
By chance we then upon a mountain stood
That tow'rd's Hibernia bellies o'er the flood.
Soon as he ceas'd to speak, I saw him leap
From the high rock, and plunge into the deep.
Him in the sea I left; and now I come
To bring the tidings of his hapless doom.'

"Half dead with grief the news Geneura heard;
A sudden paleness on her face appear'd. 401
O Heaven! what did she, and what words she said,

When laid in private on her faithful bed!
She strikes her bosom, and her garment tears,
She rends with cruel hands her golden hairs;
Repeating oft what, with his latest breath,
Said Ariodantes nam'd his cause of death;
That the strange issue of his fate was such,
His eyes in hapless hour had seen too much!

"Soon was the fame o'er all the kingdom spread,
Of Ariodantes thus untimely dead. 411

Not with dry eyes the king his loss survey'd;
While pious tears each knight and lady paid,
At these unhappy tidings; o'er the rest
Heart-piercing anguish fill'd his brother's breast;
By such example oft his soul inclin'd

To die, and be at least in death conjoin'd;
This many a time returning to his thought,
That false Geneura such destruction wrought.
At length revenge so far possess'd his mind, 420
So far did rage and grief his reason blind,

That he the royal grace no longer priz'd,
But the king's hatred, and the land's despis'd.
The peers assembled now, the time he took
To address the throne, and thus indignant spoke:

"Attend, my lord! while I the cause relate
That urg'd my brother to his hapless fate.
Your daughter's was the crime: 'twas she distress'd
With deep affliction Ariodantes' breast.
He lov'd the princess; (why should I conceal, 430
Or blush so pure a passion to reveal?)
And hop'd at length to obtain her for his bride,
By numerous virtues, and by service tried.
But while the bashful lover thus received
The modest odour of the distant leaves,

He sees another to the tree ascend,
And from the boughs the blooming fruitage rend.'

"He said, and instant to the king display'd
The seeming crime, so late to sight betray'd,
Attesting that himself beheld the dame 440
Receive the secret partner of her shame;

A wretch unknown, that veil'd in dark disguise
Conceal'd his person from observing eyes:
Concluding, that he stood in sight prepar'd
To prove the truth of all his tongue declar'd.

"Judge if the father struck with grief appear'd,
When he this fatal accusation heard;
Both with the tale surpris'd, and that he knew,
Unless to her defence some warrior drew
To give Lurcanio in the field the lie, 450
He must his dearest child condemn to die.

"Our laws, my lord! have doubtless reach'd your ear,

Where every damsel is by doom severe
Condemn'd to certain death, who yields her charms
To any other but a husband's arms:

Unless some knight th' accuser dares to brave,
And from her threaten'd fate the damsel save.

"The king has caus'd his heralds to proclaim,
(As deeming falsehood wrongs Geneura's fame)
That he who clears her honour from the stain, 460
The royal maid, with princely gifts, shall gain.

As yet no champions in her cause appear,
Each views his fellow's face with marks of fear;
In arms so dreadful is Lurcanio's might,
That all, with terror, seem to shun the fight.

Her cruel fortune adds this sorrow more,
Her absent brother treads a foreign shore,
The brave Zerbino, who in field displays
Such deeds as merit ever-during praise:

But could he hear in time her dangerous state, 470
How would he fly to avert his sister's fate!

"The monarch, who would all his thoughts employ
By other means, than arms, the truth to try,
Secur'd some damsels of Geneura's train
In hopes the fatal secret to explain;

And hence I dreaded, if myself were caught,
The duke and I in danger might be brought.
'That night, in fear, the palace I forsook,
And, privately withdrawing, sought the duke:

Declar'd how much to both it might import 480
That I without delay should quit the court.
He prais'd my prudence; promis'd to provide
A safe asylum where I might reside;

Appointing two, to guide me through the wood,
Where near, he said, his lonely fortress stood.
"Reflect, sir knight, if acts like mine should prove

To Polinesso marks of faithful love;
Then say, that maids must ever hope in vain
For tender love to be belov'd again.

"This cruel, perjur'd, and ungratef'ul man 490
At length to doubt my constant faith began;
And fearing lest I should at length reveal
The treacherous act he labour'd to conceal;

He feign'd I should awhile from court retire,
Apart to shun the king's impending ire;
And sent me thence to this remote retreat,
Here, not my safety, but my death to meet.

For secretly he gave my guides command,
Soon as their steps had reach'd this forest-land,
To take my life—lo! how my faith was paid! 500
Too well his dire command had been obey'd,
Had not my cries so timely reach'd your ears:

Behold how Love his votaries prefers!"

Thus to the Páladin^s Dalinda told
Her mournful tale, while still their way they hold;
And if before he meant t' assist the dame,
When just suspicion seem'd to tax her fame;
More earnest now his bosom's zeal appear'd,
When thus the cruel calumny he heard.
Then tow'rd's St. Andrew's town with eager haste
Rinaldo with the squire and damsel pass'd: 511
The king and court were there; and there the strife
Must soon decide his daughter's death or life.

As nearer to the neighbouring towns they drew,
They found a squire who gave them tidings new;
That a strange champion there in armour came,
Who undertook to clear Geneva's fame;
Unknown his cuirass, and unknown his shield,
His name and lineage from his squire conceal'd;
For since he first appear'd, he ne'er expos'd 520
His face to view, but wore his beaver clos'd.
This heard, Rinaldo swift his way pursued,
And soon the city and the gates he view'd.
There seem'd Dalinda sore oppress'd with fear,
Till brave Rinaldo's words her spirits cheer:
Observing how the gates were closely barr'd,
He ask'd the cause, and thus reply'd the guard:
That thence the crowd were fled to view the fight
Between Lurcanio and a stranger-knight,
Which, distant, on a spacious plain they wag'd, 530
And that the combatants were then engag'd.

None here Rinaldo's eager course oppos'd,
The porter open'd, and the gate re-clos'd:
Through the void city pass'd the gallant knight;
But, by the way, he made the dame alight;
And bade her wait the issue of the fight.

Impatient thence he hastens to the field, [wild];
Where the two knights their wrathful weapons
Who many blows had giv'n on either part:
There fought Lurcanio with revengeful heart 540
Against Geneva; while on t'other hand
The stranger's courage well her cause maintain'd.
With these, six warriors in the lists appear
On foot; the cuirass on their breast they wear.
The duke of Albany there takes his place,
Upon a gallant steed of generous race:
To him, as to high constable, they yield
To keep the order of the listed field.
Fierce were his looks, exulting in his thought,
To see Geneva in such danger brought. 550

Through the thick press Rinaldo forc'd his way;
No multitudes Bayardo's course could stay:
Those, who the tempest of his coming found,
Appear'd not slow to give the courser ground.
Rinaldo, eminent above the rest,
Appear'd the flower of chivalry confest:
Till, near the king arriv'd, his course he stay'd;
All listening round to hear the words he said.

"My noble lord," the champion thus began,
"The hands of yonder combatants restrain. 560

* See Shakespear's Much Ado About Nothing, where the circumstances of the plot, so far as relates to Claudio and Hero, are very similar to this story of Ariodantes and Geneva: but one of our last new tragedies, called the Law of Lombardy, is more immediately built on the incidents of Ariosto's fable. This story of Geneva was imitated by Melsin de Gelais, a French poet, about 1572. Another tale was written on the same subject, entitled, Conte de l'Infante Genevieve fille du roy d'Escosse, 1536.

Who'er shall perish in the doubtful strife,
Must undearn'd resign a noble life.
One thinks himself by justice only led,
But treason o'er his head a mist has spread:
That fatal error which his brother slew,
Himself to brave the dangerous combat drew:
The other knows not yet if wrong or right
Attend his cause, but issues to the fight,
The courteous prowess of his arms to try,
Rather than let such matchless beauty die. 570
Lo! here I come to give the guiltless aid,
Avenging on the traitor, the betray'd:
But first, bid each awhile his rage forbear,
Then audience give to what I shall declare."

The king was mov'd with what Rinaldo said,
Both by his words and noble presence sway'd;
Then, stretching out his hand, commands the peace,
And bids awhile the combatants to cease.
When to the king, and barons of the land,
The knights, and populace on either hand, 580
Rinaldo aft the subtle snare display'd
By Polinesso for Geneva laid.
The tale explain'd, he offer'd with his sword
E'en there to prove the truth of every word.
Now Polinesso, summon'd to the place,
Appear'd with deep confusion in his face;
But yet with boldness, he the fact deny'd:
"Soon shall we," said Rinaldo, "this decide."
Thus, ready arm'd, the list prepar'd in view,
They both, without delay, to combat drew. 590

What transport to the king, and all the land,
To hear Geneva's innocence maintain'd!
Each hop'd, that God would openly proclaim
How falsehood had defac'd her spotless name.
The duke was known for every treacherous art,
Unjust, and cruel, fraudulent of heart,
That none could wonder such a villain's mind
A snare so horrid and so black design'd!
Now Polinesso stands with fear confest,
With bloodless visage, and with panting breast. 600
Thrice sounds the trumpet, and at the warning blast,

His lance in rest the trembling traitor plac'd.
On t'other hand Rinaldo came, and try'd
At one fierce course the conflict to decide.
Nor err'd the weapon from the knight's intent,
But through the traitor's panting bosom went:
Pierc'd through and through, he, by the dreadful force,
Was borne to earth six feet beyond his horse.

Rinaldo now dismounts; and, as he lies,
Swift from the helpless wretch his helm unties. 610
But he, unable more to wage the war,
For mercy then prefers his humble prayer;
And to the king and court on every side,
Confess'd the fraud for which he justly dy'd.
While yet with weak and faltering words he spoke,
His utterance fail'd, and life his limbs forsook.

The king rejoic'd his much-lov'd child to see
From threaten'd death and ignominy free.
Not with such transport (had some hostile power
Driv'n him an exile from his native shore) 620
Had he his crown regain'd; and hence he gave Distinguish'd honours to Rinaldo brave;
But when, his helmet rais'd, he knew the knight,
(A face before no stranger to his sight)
With lifted hands his thanks to Heaven he paid,
That sent so fam'd a champion to his aid.

The knight, who first t' assist Geneva came,
(Unknown to all his country and his name)

Who, arm'd in her defence, had sought the field,
Remain'd apart; and all that pass'd beheld. 630
But now the king desir'd his name to know,
And begg'd him from his casque his face to show;
That as his generous purpose claim'd regard,
He might with royal gifts such worth reward.
At length, with much entreaty, from his head
He rais'd his helmet, and to sight display'd
What in th' ensuing book we shall reveal,
If grateful to your ear appears my tale.

BOOK VI.

THE ARGUMENT.

The conclusion of the story of Geneura. Rogero is carried by the flying-horse to Alcina's island, where he finds a knight turned into a myrtle, who gives him an account of his transformation, and warns him to shun the wiles of the sorceress. Rogero engages in combat with a troop of monsters, who oppose his passage from the city of Alcina; and is afterwards accosted by two ladies belonging to her palace.

Most wretched man, who hopes in long disguise
To veil his evil deeds from mortal eyes!
Though all were silent else, the sounding air,
The conscious earth his trespass shall declare:
Th' Almighty oft in wisdom so provides,
The sin to punishment the sinner guides,
Who, whilst he strives t' elude each watchful sight,
Unbooding brings his lurking guilt to light.

False Polinesso deem'd his state secure,
And all his treason from discovery sure; 10
Dalinda thus remov'd, from whom alone
He deem'd th' important secret could be known:
With crimes increasing, to the future blind,
Rehasten'd on that fate he shunn'd to find;
At once resigning wealth, the valu'd claim
Of friends, of life, and honour's nobler name!

Now each impatient, urg'd the stranger-knight
To show his face so long conceal'd from sight;
At length he lifted up the helm he wore,
Declaring features oft disclos'd before; 20
Then Ariodantes all with joy perceiv'd,
Him, for whose loss the realm of Scotland griev'd;
That Ariodantes, whom, by fame misled,
Geneura and his brother wept for dead;
For whom the king, the court, the people mourn'd;
So brave a knight, with every grace adorn'd!

In this the peasant's truth appear'd to fail,
Whose lips had told the fair that fatal tale;
Yet had his eyes beheld the desperate knight
Leap headlong from the rocky mountain's height.
But, as it oft befalls the wretch, whose grief 31
Calls death, when distant, to his wish'd relief;
To quit his purpose, when he sees him near,
So dark and comfortless his paths appear—
Thus Ariodantes, plunging in the wave,
With late repentance sought his life to save;
And strong of limbs above the waters bore
His head, and ply'd his arms and swam to shore.

Now every former thought of death he blam'd,
And senseless and unjust his fancy nam'd; 40
Then journey'd on with garments briny wet,
Till in a hermit's cave he shelter met;

Resolv'd awhile in secret there to stay,
Till time should to his ears the truth convey,
If for his loss suppos'd, Geneura griev'd,
Or if with joy the tidings she receiv'd.
And soon he heard so far her sorrows wrought,
As near to death th' unhappy virgin brought;
That stern Lurcanio, by resentment sway'd,
Had to the king accus'd the guiltless maid. 50
Now fierce his wrath against his brother turn'd,
Fierce as before for love his bosom burn'd.
With grief he learnt, that yet no gallant knight
Had ventur'd in Geneura's cause to fight:
Lurcanio's wisdom and his valour known,
All seem'd with care the doubtful strife to shun;
And thought the youth in such a dangerous
strife,

T' assert a falsehood ne'er would risk his life.

But Ariodantes by despair immov'd,
Resolv'd to meet his brother in the field. 60
"Can I behold," the faithful lover said,
"To cruel death my fair Geneura led?"
Whom still I must my queen and goddess prize,
Dear as the light that shines before my eyes!
Just or unjust the cause, still let me fly
For her lov'd sake to conquer or to die.
Yet, ah! too sure I shall the wrong defend;
But be it wrong; my blood the strife shall end!
One thought alone in death will give me pain,
That, if I fall, Geneura must be slain! 70
This comfort yet remains,—'twill then be prov'd
How well by Polinesso was she lov'd:
Then may she view her lover's faith display'd,
Who ne'er appear'd to combat in her aid;
While me, whose truth she could so ill requite,
She sees, for her defence, thus slain in fight,
Lurcanio too his punishment shall feel,
For having kindled first this flame of ill.
Remorse and grief shall rend his tortur'd breast,
When all the fatal conflict stands confess'd; 80
When, thinking to revenge his brother's death,
He finds him by his hand depriv'd of breath!"

So mus'd the knight; and, having thus decreed,
Procure'd new armour, and a horse with speed;
His scarf was black; and round his ample shield,
With yellow-green¹ was fring'd the sable field.
He next receiv'd a squire from fortune's hand
Unknown to all, a stranger in the land:
Thus well disguis'd, with him the knight pursu'd
His way, and arm'd before his brother stood. 90
What follow'd then, my tale before has show'd,
And how he was for Ariodantes known.

Not less the king rejoic'd his face to see,
Than his lov'd daughter from her danger free;
And justly deem'd he ne'er again could view
A youth in love so valiant and so true;
Who, when such seeming wrongs inflam'd his thought,

With his own brother, in her cause, had fought,
Urg'd by his court, and at Rinaldo's prayer
He gave to Ariodant Geneura fair: 100
Albania's dukedom, which the king again
Receiv'd, the traitor Polinesso slain,
Which could not chance in more propitious hour,
He gave his daughter for her marriage dower.

¹ The colour of fading leaves: in chivalry, this colour was worn as a mark of desperation. So Bradamant wears a scarf of the same colour. Book xxxii. ver. 383.

Rinaldo then Dalinda's cause embrac'd,
And pardon gain'd for all her errors past,
Who, weary'd with the world's unhappy state,
Had vow'd to Heaven her mind to dedicate.
Forsaking Scotland, she to Dacia went,
And there her days in hallow'd cloisters spent. 110
But now 't is time* to view Rogero's course,
Who cuts the skies upon the winged horse.

Though brave Rogero was to fear unbred,
Nor yet the colour from his cheeks had fled;
Full well I dare affirm, his heart must quake,
Like trembling leaves that to the breezes shake.
He now has left Europa's climes afar,
And past a mighty space, that region, where Unconquer'd Hercules, in ages past,
His boundary to the mariners had plac'd, 120
The griffin-horse, a beast most strange to sight,
With such a strength of pinion urg'd his flight;
No winged animal of swiftest breed,
Could dare to mate with him in rapid speed;
Nor can we, join'd with him, the bird compare
Whose mighty talons Jove's artillery bear.
Not swifter scarce the glancing lightning flies;
Or vengeful bolt that rends the sullen skies.
At length he seems preparing, tir'd with flight,
In airy rings upon an isle to light: 130
An isle like that, where, from her lover fled,
Long time conceal'd within her secret bed,
The virgin Arethusa runs in vain
By a strange course beneath the roaring main.
Midst all his way through ample fields of air,
Rogero had not seen a place so fair;
Nor, had he search'd the vary'd world around,
A more transporting climate could e'er have found.
To this the monster with his rider bends,
And, after many a spacious wheel, descends. 140

There cultur'd plains and grassy hills appear,
Green meadows, shady banks, and waters clear;
Delightful groves where palms and laurels grew,
Cedars, and myrtles pleasing to the view:
With flowers and fruits the orange stands between;
All intermix'd, a various sylvan scene!
These, with their shade, afford a safe retreat
From all the burning of meridian heat.
Amid the boughs secure, with fluttering wing,
The nightingales with tuneful voices sing; 150
While midst the roses red, and lilies fair,
For ever nurs'd by kindly Zephyr's care.
The nimble hares, in wanton mazes, play'd;
And stately stags with branching antlers stray'd:
Without the fear of hostile hands they stood
To crop, or ruminatè their grassy food.
The wild goats frolic; leap the nimble deer;
That in this rural place in troops appear.

Soon as the earth so nigh Rogero found,
To reach with safety, on th' enamell'd ground 160

* He returns again to Rinaldo, in the viiith book.

† The straits of Gibraltar, where Hercules was said to have planted his pillars, as the utmost bounds of navigation; the great ocean lying beyond: Thus Tasso—

Tempo verrà, che sian d'Ercole i segni.
Favola vile ai naviganti industri.

The time will come, when sailors yet unborn,
Shall name Alcides' narrow bounds in scorn.

Jer. Del. B. xv. ver. 220.

With gladsome heart he leaps, but still detain'd
His flying coursers by the straiten'd reins;
Till, 'twixt a laurel and a pine-tree plac'd,
He to a verdant myrtle ties him fast.
Near this a cool and crystal fountain flows,
Which fruitful palms and cedars round enclose.
His helm and buckler here aside he threw;
And from his hands his warlike gauntlets drew.
Now to the hills he turn'd, and now the seas,
Receiving in his face the kindly breeze, 170
Which gently in the oaks and beeches play'd,
Whose waving tops a pleasing murmur made.
Now in the limpid stream he bathes his lips;
And now his hands within the water dips,
To cool his throbbing pulse, and veins that glow'd
Opprest beneath his massy armour's load.
Nor was it strange he should so fiercely burn,
Who had no little time his curues worn;
But, thus completely arm'd, had made his way
Three thousand miles without a moment's stay. 180

Meantime his coursers, that beside him stood
In the close shadow of the tufted wood,
Drew sudden back, impell'd with starting fear,
As from some object in the covert near;
But while in vain to loose his hands he try'd,
He shook the myrtle where his reins were ty'd;
Shook with such force, as made the leaves around
Fall from the boughs, and strew in heaps the ground.
As, when by chance a hollow cane is plac'd
Amid the flames by slow degrees to waste, 190
Soon as the heat has rarefied the wind
That in its narrow womb remains confin'd,
Hissing it raves to be so closely pent,
Till freed at length the fury finds a vent:
So writh'd with pain th' offended tree appear'd,
Till, groaning, from its bark these words were heard*:
"If pity in your breast can entrance find,
As sure your looks proclaim a courteous mind;
From my torn trunk unbind this monster's reins:
Enough my own afflictions give me pain! 200
Nor need, alas! external rage be shown
T' increase the woes I have already known."

* Spenser has a story of this kind, where Fadrochio is described as turned into a tree: on which passage Mr. Upton has the following remark:

"I believe that the reader need not be put in mind, that this wonderful tale (so well adapted to the genius of romance) is taken from Virgil, where Æneas, plucking a bough of myrtle, sees from the rift drops of blood trickling down, from whence a piteous voice was heard:

Spare to pollute thy pious hands with blood—
O! fly from this inhospitable shore,
Warn'd by my fate, for I am Polydore.

Dryden Æn. B. iii. ver. 60.

"It is no wonder, that Ariosto, (who is an allegorical and a moral writer, as well as a romance writer) should copy this tale from Virgil. Rogero, having tied his winged horse to a myrtle-tree, the ghost, which was therein lodg'd by enchantment, speaks to him, and tells him he was formerly a knight; but by the witchcraft of Alcina, he was transform'd into a tree; and that others were chang'd into various beasts and other forms; the true image of the man being lost through sensuality."

Upton's Notes to Fairy Queen, B. I. c. ii.

Rogero started at the vocal sound,
 But when his ears the wondrous speaker found,
 Alas! he haster'd and his steed unt'y'd,
 His glowing face with flushing colour dy'd.
 "Forgive my crime, whate'er thou art," he said,
 "Or parted ghost, or goddess of the shade!
 Unknowing, that beneath thy rugged rind
 Conceal'd, an inmate spirit lay confin'd,
 I suffer'd thus thy leaves to strow the place,
 And to thy greens permitted this disgrace.
 But, gracious still, refuse not to declare
 Thy name that dost so strange a body wear,
 In which enclod'd a human spirit lies;
 So Heaven defend thee from inclement skies
 If all the power I from above receive
 Can ease thy suffering, or thy woes relieve;
 Behold, I promise by that virgin fair
 Whose image in my better part I bear,
 I will with word and deed thy cause maintain,
 As may deserve thy grateful thanks again."

Rogero cess'd; and, as the warrior spoke,
 From head to foot the trembling myrtle shook;
 Then from the bark exhal'd a dewy sweat;
 Like green wood crackling in the fiery heat.
 "Thy courtesy," the myrtle thus began,
 "Persuades me to reveal my secret pain;
 Both who I was, and what enchanted power
 Transform'd my shape upon this fatal shore."

A Paladin of France was I, by name
 Astolpho call'd, and not unknown to fame.
 Orlando and Rinaldo (who shall grace
 With mighty deeds the Earth) partake my race:
 And, at my father Otho's death, the land
 Of England would have fall'n to my command.
 So fair was I, that many a damsel sought
 My love, till I my own destruction wrought.
 Returning from those isles, around whose shores,
 Remote from hence, the Indian ocean roars;
 Where good Rinaldo and myself detain'd,
 With others long in prisons dark remain'd,
 Till we again review'd the joyful light,
 Freed by the valiant arm of Brava's knight:
 Against the West, along those sands we came
 That feel the southern heat of Phoebus' flame;
 There, as our way and cruel fortune drew,
 One morn we chanc'd a stately tower to view,
 And issu'd thence Alcina we esp'y'd
 Alone, and standing by the ocean side;
 Where without hook or net (most strange to thought)
 Whatever fish she pleas'd, to land she brought.

Astolpho makes a considerable figure in the Orlando innamorato, where, in the course of his adventures, he is imprisoned by Monodant, a Pagan king, in the East, together with Rinaldo, Gryphon, Aquilant, and Dudson: but these knights being afterwards delivered by Orlando, set out to go to the assistance of Charlemain. Astolpho, Rinaldo, and Dudson, travelling in company, arrive at the castle of Alcina, where Astolpho is decoyed from the rest, in the manner here related by Ariosto.

Ariosto has this tradition of a king of England by the name of Otho, from the romance writers. See the genealogy of the house of Clarmont, Book xliii. ver. 156.

Orlando, called the knight of Brava.

This passage is entirely taken from Boyardo:

At her command, the dolphins left the stream;
 With open mouths the mighty tunnies came;
 The sea-calves, rising troubled from their sleep,
 Forsook their beds, and hasten'd from the deep:
 Of various forms and size, a thousand more,
 In numerous shoals came swimming to the shore.
 The monsters of the seas, tremendous whales,
 Above the water show'd their ample scales.
 Among the rest a mighty whale we view'd,
 The greatest sure that ever swam the flood.
 And, as he lay unmov'd, by looks deceiv'd,
 We all the monster for an isle believ'd;
 So huge he seem'd, so vast a distance spread
 From his broad tail extending to his head!
 "Alcina drew the fishes to the shore,
 With nought but simple words and magic power.
 Her, with Morgana's, both for ill design'd,
 One womb produc'd to punish human kind."

Alcina fishing, her deceiving Astolpho with the whale which appeared an island, &c. may be seen in the Orlando innamorato. B. ii. c. xiii.

The various fishes taken by Alcina, are said to denote the different ranks and conditions of men, that are captivated by vice, and the whale which carries away Astolpho, to show that we often forsake solid happiness for fallacious appearances.

Morgana, a fairy, is a considerable personage in Boyardo, though but lightly touched upon in Ariosto; the former poet calls her the Fairy of Riches; she imprisons many knights in her enchanted palace, and among the rest Rinaldo, Dudson, Prasilido and Iroldo, who are released by the valour of Orlando: she tempts Orlando with the prospect of riches, which he despises. Spenser seems to have taken his idea of Mammon's tempting Guion, from this fiction of Boyardo. Orlando being urged to prosecute an adventure that was to procure him great treasure, replies:

— di pericol solo e di fatica,
 Il cavalier si pasce e si nutrica:
 Speranza d'acquistar oro ed argento,
 La spada non m'aria fatto cavare.

The hardy knight to deeds of glory bred,
 Is nurs'd by labour and with danger fed,
 Then deem not that I draw the sword in vain,
 The silver bright, or gleaming gold to gain.

Berni, Orlando innamorato. B. i. c. xxv.

Guion, in Spenser, makes much the same answer to Mammon:

Regard of worldly muck doth foully blend,
 And low abuse the high heroic spirit,
 That joys for crowns and kingdoms to contend:
 Fair shields, ray steeds, bright arms be my delight,
 These be the riches fit for an adventurous knight.

B. ii. c. vii.

Thus Rogero, in Ariosto, in the present book:

— la cagion ch'io veggio piastra e maglia,
 Non è per guadagnar terra né argento.

— these shining arms my limbs enfold,
 Not lands to conquer or to purchase gold.

Spenser, in his description of the riches of Mammon, visited by Guion, had undoubtedly an eye upon a similar passage in Boyardo, where that poet describes at large the subterraneous palace of the witch Morgana.—See Orlando innamorato. B. ii. c. viii. See likewise Note to Book xix. ver. 272.

Now on my face she cast her eager sight,
 And seem'd to view my features with delight,
 Then soon resolv'd me from my friends to part;
 And ah! too well she prov'd her wily art!
 For, near advancing, with a smiling look,
 With courteous, soft deportment, thus she spoke:
 "Sir knight! if you consent awhile to stay,
 And kindly here vouchsafe to pass the day,
 I'll show you, in the progress of my sport,
 Of countless fishes every different sort; 280
 Some soft, some hairy, some with scales all bright,
 In number more than are the stars of night.
 Or if you would a Syren view, whose voice
 With tuneful music makes the waves rejoice,
 Hence let us pass, and reach you neighbouring shore

To which she comes at this accustom'd hour.
 "As thus she said, the monstrous whale she show'd,
 Which seem'd a little island in the flood,
 While I, too rashly (which I now lament)
 Believ'd her words, and on the monster went; 290
 Rinaldo, Dædon, beckon'd, but in vain;
 Not all their cares my rash attempts restrain.
 Alcina, with a smile, my steps pursu'd,
 And left the two as on the strand they stood.
 The whale, instructed well in her design,
 Began to move, and cleave the foamy brine:
 Then all too late my folly I deplore,
 Soon as I see retreat the lessening shore.
 Rinaldo leap'd, I assist me, in the main,
 But scarce escap'd with life to land again; 300
 For then a furious wind was seen to rise,
 That swell'd the seas, and troubled all the skies;
 His following fortune¹⁰ ne'er attain'd my ear:
 Meantime to dissipate my growing fear
 Alcina gently strove, as all the day,
 And next ensuing night, we held our way
 Amidst the waves: at length this isle we gain,
 O'er most of which Alcina holds her reign;
 Which from her sister¹¹ she unjustly won,
 Who claims it, by her father's will, her own; 310
 For she alone was born in marriage bed,
 The others of incestuous mixture bred,
 As these are of a fraudulent, impious mind,
 And prone to every deed of evil kind;
 So does the other chastely spend her days,
 And all her soul incline to virtue's ways.
 Her sisters both conspire against her state,
 And many troops have rais'd, with deadly hate,
 To drive the virgin wholly from the land,
 And have, at times, a hundred castles gain'd. 320
 Now Logistilla (such her name) had known
 By this, the smallest portion here, her own;
 But that a gulf her kingdom here defends,
 And there a mountain's ridgy height ascends.
 Nor yet Alcina and Morgana cease,
 Now let her e'en possess this part in peace.
 As vice and shameful pleasures fill their breast,
 The virgin for her virtues they detest.
 But to return to what myself befel,
 And how I first became a tree, to tell. 330

¹⁰ Here Royardo entirely leaves Astolpho, and Ariosto takes up the story.

¹¹ Logistilla: there were three sisters, Logistilla, Alcina, and Morgana. The allegory here is obvious. Alcina and Morgana represent Luxury and Lasciviousness; Logistilla, Reason or Virtue; these are continually at war with each other.

"Alcina gave me nameless charms to taste,
 And all on me her ardent passion plac'd:
 While in my arms such matchless sweets I press'd,
 I seem'd at once of every joy possess'd;
 Of every joy, which fortune's hands bestow
 So sparingly on mortals here below.
 France I forgot, each dearer care beside,
 And love alone my amorous thoughts employ'd.
 My eyes were fix'd upon her face so fair,
 While every wish began, and crouted there. 340
 Her former lovers she esteem'd no more,
 For many lovers she possess'd before:
 I was her joy, was with her night and day,
 And all the rest my high commands obey,
 Mine was her love and mine the sovereign sway!
 But wherfore do I thus inflame the wound
 For which, I fear, no cure can e'er be found?
 Why recollect my happy hours, and know
 That all my former bliss is turn'd to woe?
 Too late, alas! I found her wavering mind 350
 In love inconstant as the changing wind!
 For scarce two months I held the fairy's grace,
 When a new youth was taken to my place.
 Rejected then, I join'd the banish'd herd
 That lost her love, as others were prefer'd:
 Lest these o'er various lands and nations spread,
 Should e'er divulge the shameful life she led,
 Some here, some there, her potent charms restrain
 In various forms imprison'd to remain;
 In beeches, olives, palms, or cedars clos'd; 360
 Or such, as me you here behold expos'd:
 In fountains some, and some in bears' confin'd,
 As suits the wayward fairy's cruel mind.
 And you, air knight, that in ill hour have found,
 By ways uncommon, this enchanted ground;
 For whom some hapless lover must be spur'd,
 And to a senseless stone or river turn'd;
 You shall such pleasures with Alcina find,
 To call yourself the happiest of mankind;
 But soon the common fate must be your own, 370
 Chang'd to a bear, a fountain, tree, or stone.
 Thus have I warn'd you of your dangerous state;
 Not that I think you can elude your fate;
 But yet, it fits you well inform'd to go,
 And part, at least, of her deceits to know.
 As different features in the face we find,
 So differs too the genius of the mind;
 And you, perhaps, some secret have in store
 To escape, what numbers ne'er escap'd before."

Rogero, who Astolpho knew by fame 380
 The valiant cousin to his beauteous dame,
 Much for his strange unheard-of fortune mourn'd,
 Whose form was to a senseless myrtle turn'd;
 And for her sake whose love his bosom fir'd
 To assist th' unhappy warrior much desir'd:
 But here his power no further aid affords
 Than kind consoling tears, and friendly words;
 Yet, all he can! and now he seeks to know
 If he to Logistilla's hands might go,
 By any windings o'er hill or plain. 390
 To shun the snares of false Alcina's reign.
 "A different path there lay," the myrtle said, [led,
 "Which through rough crags and thorny thickets
 If to the hill he kept the better hand.
 But hard the pass, for there a numerous band
 Of armed men were plac'd to guard the land."
 His thanks Rogero to the myrtle paid,
 Then took his leave, and parted from the shade,
 Instructed well: his courser, by the rein,
 He leads, but dares not press his back again; 400

While various schemes he fashions in his mind,
 How safely Logistilla's realm to find.
 Firm was his purpose every means to try,
 Rather than in Alcina's bondage lie.
 And first, he thought again to mount his horse,
 And spur him through the air a distant course:
 But fear soon made him lay that thought aside,
 Nor tempt the danger he so lately try'd.
 "Unless I err," thus to himself he said,
 "By force a passage yonder shall be made." 410
 Now, as he pass'd along the ocean's side,
 Alcina's stately city he descried.
 An ample wall the whole encompass'd round,
 Which wide enclos'd a mighty space of ground.
 The height appear'd to reach the distant skies,
 And seem'd of solid gold to wondering eyes!
 When now more nearly to the walls he drew,
 (Such walls as ne'er before could mortals view)
 He left the plain and beaten path, that straight
 Led o'er the meadow to the lofty gate; 420
 And to the right, that tow'rs the mountain lay,
 The warrior more securely took his way.
 But soon an hideous crew¹³ oppos'd his course
 With savage fury, and with brutal force.
 A crew so strange was never seen before,
 That such deform'd and monstrous figures wore.
 Some, from the neck below appear'd like men,
 While heads of apes and cats above were seen.
 Some, running, stamp'd with goatish feet the road,
 And some the shape of nimble centaurs show'd. 430
 Lascivious youths were there, and old men mad;
 Some naked, some in hairy vestments clad.
 One, without reins, a speedy courser rides;
 This, a slow ass; and that, an ox bestrides:
 Some on a centaur's back their seat maintain;
 Some press the ostrich, eagle, or the crane:
 One held a bowl; a horn another blew:
 Female and male; some, mixtures of the two.
 A file, one bore, and one a ladder took;
 A shovel, this; and that, an iron hook. 440
 The captain of the band was there beheld,
 His face was bloated, and his paunch was swell'd;
 Upon a tortoise heavily he sat.
 And mov'd along the field in tardy state;
 His limbs supported as he pass'd along;
 Drowsy with wine his heavy eye-lids hung.
 Some from his face and forehead wip'd the sweat,
 And others fann'd him to abate the heat.
 One, form'd with human feet, with hands and breast,
 But like a dog his head and ears conjoin'd, 450

¹³ This passage is copied by Spenser, in his Fairy Queen, where he describes the troop of carnal lusts besieging the fort or dwelling of Temperance.

B. li. c. xi.

Deformed creatures in strange difference;
 Some having heads like harts, some like to snakes,
 Some like wild boars late rous'd out of the brakes,
 ————
 Some like to hounds, some like to apes dismay'd,
 Some like to puttocks all in plumes array'd.

These monsters that attempt to stop Rogero, in his passage to Logistilla, or Virtue, signifying the different species of vice in the most brutal and scordid shapes. Their captain is Idleness, the promoter of every evil.

With barking sought Rogero's course to stay,
 And make him to the city bend his way.
 "You threat in vain," reply'd th' undaunted
 knight,
 "While I have power to wield this sword in fight."
 As thus he spoke, his shining blade he drew,
 And brandish'd it before the monster's view:
 The monster thought to strike him with his spear,
 But this Rogero saw, and, drawing near,
 Swift through his paunch the deadly weapon sent,
 That through his back, a foot behind, it went. 460
 And now, his courage rous'd, he brac'd his shield,
 But still his foes more numerous press'd the field,
 On every hand at once attack'd the knight,
 Who with unyielding force maintain'd the fight;
 While, as amid the furious throng he press'd,
 Some to the teeth he clove, and some the breast.
 Shield, helm, and cuirass no defence afford
 Against the edge of his descending sword.
 But now, thick swarming, round the youth they close,
 And so on every side his course oppose; 470
 To force the through a greater strength demands
 Than huge Briareus with his hundred hands.
 Yet from the covering had the knight reveal'd
 Before their eyes the necromancer's shield,
 (That shield whose lustre laid the gazers low,
 Left by Atlas at his saddle bow)
 At once their headlong fury had been quell'd,
 And prostrate all to press the earth compell'd:
 But here his generous soul perchance disdain'd
 To gain a conquest, not by valour gain'd. 480
 He fought determin'd rather on the field
 To die, than to such foes his freedom yield:
 When sudden from the gate appear'd in sight
 (Whereshone the walls with golden splendor bright)
 Two lovely dames¹⁴, whose air and habit show'd
 That not to lineage mean their birth they ow'd;
 Nor seem'd brought up in humble cottage state,
 But bred in rich apartments of the great;
 Each on a beautiful unicorn¹⁵ was plac'd,
 Whose snowy hue the ermin's white defac'd. 490
 So lovely both were form'd, so richly drest,
 And every look such dignity express'd,
 That each enraptur'd gazer seem'd to own
 Their charms were worthy heavenly eyes alone,
 Beauty and gallantry such forms must wear
 Would they embody'd to the sight appear!

¹³ By these two ladies, who easily persuade Rogero to turn again and enter the city of Alcina, may be generally understood, that though a good disposition will for a long time withstand the assaults of vice, which comes undisguis'd in its native deformity, it may, notwithstanding, yield to that temptation which appears dressed up in the garb of decency.

¹⁴ I see no particular allegorical allusion in the unicorns, on which these ladies are seated; which seem merely inserted for the sake of poetical description, and may be very allowable in this author, when Tasso, in the historical part of his poem, has employed the same fictitious animals to draw the chariot of Armida. Jerusalem. Del. B. xvii.

— Freno il dotto suriga al giogo adorno,
 Quattro unicorni, a coppia a coppia avvinti.
 Beneath the golden yoke, in pairs constrain'd,
 Four unicorns the skilful driver rein'd.

And now the damsels near the meadow drew,
Where brave Rogero closely press'd their view.
At once on every side disperse the bands:
The ladies to the knight present their hands, 500
Who, while his visage flush'd with rosy-red,
Return'd them thanks for such a courteous deed;
Then, at their suit, agreed to turn once more
And seek the golden gate he shunn'd before.

The ornaments that o'er the portal rise,
And jutting forward, seem to meet the eyes,
On every side are richly cover'd round,
With jewels that in eastern climes abound.
Huge stately columns, by a master-hand
Of di'mond fram'd, the solid weight sustain'd. 510
So fair a structure ne'er before was seen
To sate the ravish'd eyes of mortal men!
Before the threshold wanton damsels wait,
Or sport between the pillars of the gate:
But beauty more had brighten'd in their face,
Had modesty attempt'd every grace.

In vestures green each damsel swept the ground,
Their temples fair with leafy garlands crown'd.
These, with a courteous welcome led the knight
To this sweet Paradise of soft delight; 520
And sure we this a Paradise may name,
Where gentle Love first lights his lambent flame!
Where festive pleasures every day employ,
Where every moment passes wing'd with joy!
No thoughts of hoary age depress the mind,
Nor care nor want can here an entrance find;
While, with her horn, obsequious Plenty stands
To pour her riches forth from willing bands;

And with a smiling front for ever clear,
Inviting April revels through the year. 530
Enamour'd youths, and tender damsels, seem
To chant their loves beside a purling stream.
Some, by a branching tree, or mountain's shade,
In sports and dances press the downy glade;
While one discloses to his friend, apart,
The secret transports of his amorous heart.
High o'er the beech and oak with wing display'd,
High o'er the lofty pine and laurel shade,
The little Loves in sportive circles fly,
And view their triumphs with exulting eye: 540
One at a lover's breast his weapon aims;
With fraudulent art his nets another frames:
Here in the stream they temper shafts, and there
On circling stone their blunted points repair.

A stately courser soon was given the knight,
Of colour bay, and gallant in the fight;
His costly trappings, glorious to behold,
Were all with jewels deck'd and shone with gold!
The old magician's steed, of winged kind,
A youth receiv'd, and slowly led behind. 550
The damsels now, whose aid dispers'd the band
That durst Rogero's purpos'd course withstand,
Thus to the knight their gentle speech address'd:
"My lord! your valiant deeds, this day confess'd,
Have given us courage from your band to claim
A task that well befits your matchless fame:
Soon shall we come, where in our way there glides
A flood, that in two parts the plain divides.
A cruel wretch, we Eriphila's name,
Defends the bridge, and passage of the stream: 560

¹³ Eriphila is explained to mean Avarice: she is said to guard the bridge that leads to Alcina, to punish the avarice of women that will not satisfy the amorous desires of men, without liberal rewards.

On all that tempt the pass she furious flies;
Dreadful she seems, a giantess in size!
Poisonous her bite, long tushes arm her jaws;
And like a bear's, her nails and shaggy paws:
Nor here alone her threat'ning rage she bends,
And 'gainst each passenger the bridge defends;
But oft has round the garden-shades defac'd
With giant step, and laid their beauty waste,
Know, that the monstrous crew, whose fury late
Oppos'd your course without the golden gate, 570
Her offspring are; like her for prey they lust,
And like their dam are cruel and unjust."

Rogero then, "Not one alone demand,
But ask a hundred battles at my hand.
Whatever defence my prowess can afford,
Is yours—command my person and my sword:
'Tis hence, these shining arms my limbs enfold,
Not lands to conquer, or to purchase gold,
But to display, to all, my guardian care, 579
Much more to dames so courteous, and so fair!"

The dames return'd him thanks with grateful
In words that equal'd well his great desert. {heart,
In converse thus they pass'd, till near they drew,
Where both the bridge and stream appear'd in view.
There they the guardian of the pass behold
With jewels blazing rich on arms of gold.
But, till another book, I cease to tell,
What with the giantess the knight befel.

BOOK VII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero encounters Eriphila, and, conducted by the two damsels, arrives at the palace of Alcina, who receives him with great joy: he is seduced by her allurements, and leads a life of luxury and effeminacy. Bradamant, hearing no tidings of him, since he was carried away by the griffin-horse, is in great affliction for his absence; she is met by Melissa, who undertakes to deliver him. Melissa assumes the form of Atlantes, and accosts the young warrior, reproaching him with his degeneracy.

Who travels into foreign climes, shall find
What ne'er before was imagin'd to his mind;
Which, when he tells, the hearers shall despise,
And deem his strange adventures empty lies.
The herd unletter'd! nothing will believe
But what their senses plainly can perceive;

¹ The author here plainly declares, that the wonderful tales related by him have a concealed allegory: so Berni, Orlando Innam. B. i. c. xxv.

Questi draghi fatati, questi incanti,
Questi giardini, e libri, e corni, e cani,
Ed huomini selvatici, e giganti,
E fiere, e mostri, ch' hanno visi umani,
Son fatti per dar pasto agli ignoranti,
Ma voi, ch' avete gl' intelletti sani,
Mirate la dottrina, che s' asconde
Sotto queste coperte alie e profonde.

These fated dragons, every magic change,
These books, and horns, and dogs, and gardens strange:

Hence I shall ne'er with common minds prevail,
 But little credit will they yield my tale.
 Yet what imports to me the vulgar ear,
 Whence these my words, without conception, bear? 10
 To you I write*, whose judgment can descry
 The secret truths that, veild in fable, lie.
 I left you there when to the bridge and stream
 By Eriphila kept, the warrior came.
 A coat of mail of finest steel she wore,
 With gems of various colours cover'd o'er;
 The ruby red, the chrysolite was seen,
 The yellow topaz, and the emerald green.
 Her giant bulk no common steed bestrode;
 A mighty wolf² sustain'd her ponderous load: 20
 A wolf she rode; and o'er the river cross,
 With stately trappings of no vulgar cost.
 A beast so large Apulia never bred:
 High as an ox he rear'd his towering head:
 His frothy mouth no curbing bit restrain'd,
 Nor know I how his foaming course the rein'd;
 Her scarf a sandy hue display'd to sight,
 And o'er her armour cast a sullen light:
 Rais'd on her crest, and in her targe she held
 A pictur'd toad with loathsome poison swell'd. 30
 The damself show'd her to th' expecting knight,
 Where, from the bridge, she stood prepar'd for
 fight;
 And, as her custom was, his course to stay.
 Soon as she saw Rogero on the way,
 Ferocely she bade him turn: he wought replied,
 But grasp'd his spear, and her to fight defy'd.
 Nor less the giantess, with active heat,
 Spurr'd her huge wolf, and fix'd her in the seat;
 And, as she ran, her spear in rest she took,
 While trembling Earth beneath her fury shook: 40
 But soon, o'erthrown, supine her limbs were spread;
 So strong Rogero struck beneath her head,
 That, forc'd before the dreadful lance to yield,
 Six feet beyond she tumbled on the field.
 Then swift he drew his fashion from his side,
 Her head from her huge body to divide;
 As well he might, while in the Bowery way,
 Aeady senseless⁴ Eriphila lay.

These savage men, these shapes of giant race,
 And beasts and monsters with a human face,
 Are feign'd to please the vulgar ear: but you,
 Whom favouring pow'rs with better sense induce,
 Can see the doctrine sage, that hidden lies
 Beneath these mystic fables' deep disguise.

Thus Milton:

And if aught else great bards beside
 In sage and solemn tunes have sung
 Of turneys and of trophies hung,
 Of forests and enchantments drear,
 Where more is meant than meets the ear.

Il Penseroso.

* Some suppose that Ariosto here particularly addresses himself to Hippolito and Alphonso; but it rather seems a general apostrophe to every reader of taste and discernment.

² By the wolf, which is represented without reins, may be signified the insatiable nature of avarice, which is not to be restrained.

⁴ Eriphila being overthrown, but not killed, is said to denote that liberality used at the instigation of vice, is not perfect virtue, which entirely roots up avarice.

But here the ladies cry'd—"Enough, sir knight,
 No further urge the vengeance of the fight: 50
 Behold her quell'd—then sheath your conquering
 sword,

Let us our way resume, and pass the ford."

This said: they for awhile their course pursued
 Amidst the covert of a mazy wood;

There through a narrow craggy path they went,
 And reach'd at length the hill, with steep ascent;
 Where, on a spacious plain, the youth beheld
 A sumptuous pile that every pile excell'd.

First of her court, the fair Alcina press'd,
 Impatient to receive the stranger guest: 60

Before the portal, with a comely grace,
 She gave him courteous welcome to the place;

While all such honour paid the noble knight,
 As if some god had left his realms of light.

The palace with resplendent lustre shin'd
 Above the boasted wealth of human kind:

Fair is the dome; but fairer are the train
 Whose angel-forms its stately walls contain:

Alcina yet excels the rest by far,
 As Phoebus' rays obscure each feeble star. 70

Her matchless person's every charm combin'd
 Form'd in th' idea of a painter's mind.

Bound in a knot behind, her ringlets roll'd
 Down her soft neck, and seem'd like waving gold.

Her cheeks with lilies mix the blushing rose:
 Her forehead high, like polish'd ivory shows.

Beneath two arching brows with splendour shone
 Her sparkling eyes, each eye a radiant sun!

Here artful glances, winning looks appear,
 And wanton Cupid lies in ambush here: 80

'Tis hence he bends his bow, he points his dart,
 'Tis hence he steals th' unwary gazer's heart.

Her nose so truly shap'd, the faultless frame
 Not envy can deface, nor art can blame.

Her lips beneath, with pure vermilion bright,
 Present two rows of orient pearl to sight:

Here those soft words are form'd, whose power da-
 th' obdurate soul in love's alluring chains; (taias

And here the smiles receive their infant birth,
 Whose sweets reveal a Paradise on Earth. 90

Her neck and breast were white as falling snows;
 Round was her neck, and full her bosom rose.

Firm as the budding fruit⁵, with gentle swell,
 Each lovely breast alternate rose and fell.

⁵ This luxuriant description of the beauty of Alcina is quoted at large, as an idea of perfect beauty, by Dolce, in his dialogue on painting; of which the English reader has been favoured with an ingenious translation.

⁶ The expression in the Italian is:

— due pome acerbe

— two unripe apples:

Spenser has much the same image in his description of Belphebe:

Her dainty paps, which like young fruit in May,
 Now little 'gan to swell, and being ty'd
 Through their thin veil their places only signify'd.

B. j. c. iii.

Dryden, in his Cymon and Iphigenia, copies
 Spenser:

Her bosom to the view was only bare,
 Where two beginning paps were scarcely spy'd,
 For yet their places were but signify'd.

Thus, on the margin of the peaceful seas,
The waters heave before the fanning breeze.
Her arms well turn'd, and of a dazzling hue,
With perfect beauty gratify'd the view.
Her taper fingers long and fair to see,
From every rising vein and swelling free; 100
And from her vest below, with new delight,
Her slender foot attracts the lover's sight.
Her Argus' self her other charms could spy,
So closely veil'd from every longing eye;
Yet may we judge the graces she reveal'd
Surpass'd not those her modest garb conceal'd,
Which strove in vain from fancy's eye to hide
Each angel charm that seem'd to Heaven ally'd.

In all she did her ready snares were hung,
Whether she spoke, or mov'd, or laugh'd, or sung.
No wonder then Rogero's heart was caught 111
By her, whose show of love enslav'd his thought:
No more he can the myrtle's counsel trust,
No more believe her cruel and unjust.
He thinks deceit can never find a place
In the soft smiles of such a lovely face;
But rather now believes Alcina's power
Had justly chang'd Astolpho on the shore;
That rage and envy made the knight defence
With lying tales the fair Alcina's name. 120

The damsel whom he once so dearly held,
Is, of a sudden, from his heart expell'd.
The secret, by her art, the fairy found
To heal his breast of every former wound:
Then let Rogero some indulgence claim,
Since magic charms expung'd his virtuous flame.

Now, while they feast, the lute and tuneful lyre
Th' enraptur'd soul with harmony inspire:
Through the wide dome the trembling music floats,
And undulating air conveys the notes. 130
One with soft lays would tender bosoms move,
And paints the passions, and the joys of love;
Or sweetly bids inventive fancy rise,
That brings poetic visions to the eyes.
Not all the festivals in story told,
By Syrian luxury prepar'd of old;
Not that which Cleopatra's royal board
With pomp display'd before her Latin lord*,
Could with this sumptuous banquet claim regard,
Which for the knight th' enamour'd dame prepar'd:
Not such is seen, when Ganymede above 141
His service ministers to mighty Jove!

The tables now and viands thence convey'd,
The joyous train a pleasing circle made;
While each soft whisper'd in the other's ear,
Some secret, sweet to tell, or sweet to hear!
A grateful sport! by which, from all conceal'd,
The lovers well their amorous thoughts reveal'd;
Till both, at length, impell'd by soft desire,
That night agreed to indulge their mutual fire. 150
This gentle pastime done, the pages came
Before their usual hour, with torches' flame

To chase the night: a rich retinue led
The brave Rogero to a stately bed.
There they partook a slight repast anew
Of wine and fruits, and then the train withdrew;
And, dus obedience paid their gallant guest,
All to their several rooms retir'd to rest. [fame,

Now lay the knight in sheets that breath'd per-
And seem'd the labour of Arachne's loom; 160
Impatient, listening with attentive ear;
At every sound he deems Alcina near;
Each fancy'd tread alarms his beating breast;
Now rais'd by wishes, now by doubts deprest!
Th' alluring fair, bedew'd with odours sweet,
Prepar'd at length the longing knight to meet;
And, when each eye was clos'd with glowing charms,
She stole in secret to Rogero's arms.

When the fond youth, that held Astolpho's place,
Survey'd the beauties of that heavenly face; 170
And drank the poison from her sparkling eyes;
Through every vein a sudden lightning flies!
Then leaping from the couch, with eager haste,
His clasping arms enfold her lovely waist:
He gluts his ravish'd sight! the nymph undrest
Was cover'd only with a sars-net veal,
Which o'er a thin and spotted lawn she threw,
Of finest texture and of snowy hue.

The mantle falls before the furious knight,
And leaves alone the slender lawn in sight, 180
Whose thin transparent folds her charms disclose,
As a clear glass the lily or the rose.
Not half so close the ivy leaves are seen
Around a plant to writhe their curling green,
As twin'd in wanton folds the lovers lay,
And in soft murmurs breath'd their souls away,
While from their lips such balmy sweets they drew
As Ind, with all her spices, never knew.

Thus liv'd in wanton bliss the lawless pair:
While, through the palace, with officious care, 190
All, at Rogero's nod, obsequious stand,
For so th' enamour'd fairy gives command.
Whate'er can charm the heart, or lure the sense
To full delight, these happy seats dispense.
The feast, the game, the race their joys enhance,
The scene, the bath, the tilting and the dance.
Now, by clear streams, with grateful shade o'ercast,
They read the amorous lays of ages past:
Now midst deep vales, or smiling hills, prepare
To hunt the mazes of the fearful hare: 200

Now with agacious dogs the bush they beat
To rouse the whirring pheasants from their seat:
Now for the thrush fallacious springes set;
Now the sweet juniper with birdlime wet:
Now with barb'd hook, or meshy net, they try
From quiet flocks to drag the scaly fry.

While thus Rogero lives a joyous guest,
King Agrament and Charles are hardly prest;
Whose story shall not yet escape my mind,
Nor must I leave fair Bradamant behind; 210
Who long, ah! long, bewail'd her dearest knight,
By strange adventure ravish'd from her sight.

To her, before the rest, I turn my strain,
And tell, how far she sought with fruitless pain
Through cities, towns and camps; how far she pass'd
O'er mountains, plains, and many a dreary waste;
In vain each day of all she met, inquir'd;
She heard no news of what her soul desir'd.
Oft to the host of Saracens she went,
And sought her lover there from tent to tent: 220
Between her lips the wondrous ring she held,
Which kept her safe from every eye conceal'd:

* The successors of Ninus, first king of the Assyrians, to Sardanapalus, were famous for their luxury and effeminacy, and delighted in costly banquets.

* The post is said here to mean Julius Caesar, who, after the death of Pompey, was entertained by Cleopatra with a most magnificent banquet: or, perhaps, by this may be understood Marc Anthony, with whom she was known to have lived in the most amazing profligacy.

She cannot, darts not yet believe him dead,
For such a warrior's death had doubtless spread
From where the tide of fam'd Hydaspes flows,
To where the Sun descends to his repose.
Uncertain of his fate; she hopes, she fears:
Her mad compassions are her sighs and tears!
At length she find once more the cave to seek,
Where Merlin, from his tomb, was wont to speak,
And round the shrine such deep affliction show, 251
The marble cold should soften at her woe;
There might she learn if yet her knight surviv'd,
Or lay, by doom severe, of life depriv'd;
And thence, inform'd, her future course pursue,
As from the sage her counsel best she drew.
With this intent she took her lonely way
Towards the thick forest that by Poitiers lay;
Where deep the vocal tomb of Merlin stood,
Hid in drear caves, surrounded by a wood. 240

But that enchantress, whose benignant mind
Reveal'd to Bradamaunt her race design'd,
Each day desir'd to learn the virgin's state,
And often try'd her art to explore her fate.
Roger freed and lost again she knew,
And how to India's distant climes he flew;
She saw him living in luxurious peace,
In wanton feasting and inglorious ease;
Unmindful of himself, his promiss'd fame,
His sovereign's welfare, and his beautiful dame; 250
And thus she fear'd the flower of youthful bloom
A knight so gentle might in sloth consume,
While that pure portion of th' ethereal ray
Which still survives, when all is breathless clay,
Th' immortal part, in sensual pleasure lost
Would soon be shipwreck'd, and for ever lost!
But that sage matron, whose attentive mind
Watch'd o'er the good himself had cast behind,
Remov'd through irksome ways of toil and pain,
To bring him back to virtue's path again. 260
His medicines thus the wise physician deals,
And oft by fire, and steel, and poison heals:
Repairing first, the patient feels the smart,
Then owns the saving aid with grateful heart.
Yearduous was the task her thoughts design'd;
For old Atlantes, with affection blind,
Who sought but to preserve from dangerous strife
In ease inglorious his Roger's life;
Who rather wish'd him thus to lead his days,
Than change a year of shame for endless praise, 270
Had sent him to Alcina's isle afar,
There to forget the sound of arms and war;
And as a sage well vers'd in magic art,
He bound in chains so firm the fairy's heart,
She ne'er again her love should disengage,
Though good Roger liv'd to Nestor's age.

Now to the virgin let us bend our view,
Whose prophesying skill the future knew;
Who, while from realm to realm she thoughtful post,
The wandering Amou's daughter met at last. 280
When Bradamaunt beheld Melissa near,
A sudden hope dispell'd her former fear;
Till, struck with grief, th' unhappy virgin bore
Her lover prisoner, and his mind ensar'd
With pleasure's poison'd bait; but soon to calm
Her dread, th' enchantress pours the healing balm;
And plights her faith, ere many days are o'er,
Roger to her presence to restore. [charm
"Give me," she cry'd, "the ring, whose powerful
The wearer shields from every magic harm: 290
Soon will I put Alcina's arts to flight,
Who now detains your lover from your sight.

When evening rises will I take my way,
And reach the Indian climes by dawn of day."
Melissa spoke; and to the listening dame
Her purpose told, to draw the youth from shame.
And send him back once more to France and fame.
Then from her hand the noble dame gave
The wondrous ring; nor this alone to save
The knight had given, but with an equal mind 300
Had sent her heart, and life itself resign'd.
She gives the ring; and to her care commends
Herself, her lover more; to him she sends
A thousand greetings that her truth display,
And, parting, to Provence directs her way.
A different path the sage Melissa pass'd,
But soon as evening shade the skies o'er'cast,
She rais'd a palfrey by her magic art,
With one foot red, but black each other part:
Some fiend infernal, seeming thus in show, 310
Whom by her spells she drew from realms below:
On this she mounted; both her feet were bare,
Ungirt her gown, and loose her flowing hair.
Then with such speed through yielding clouds she
Next morn Alcina's isle appear'd in view. [flow,
Arriv'd, a strange illusion to the sight,
She adds a foot of stature to her height;
While every limb enlarg'd, like his appears
Who nurs'd Roger in his infant years:
A hoary beard she fixes on her chin, 320
And fills with wrinkles all her wither'd skin:
So well she feigns his speech, his voice, his air,
It seems as if Atlantes' self was there.

This done; & while she undiscover'd stood,
Till, as it chanc'd, one day the youth she view'd
Apart in solitude; unusual sight!
For scarce Alcina ever left the knight.
Now, to her wish, she found the youth retir'd
To taste the freshness which the morn inspir'd,
Beside a stream that from the hill's descent 330
To a clear lake with gentle murmur went.
His garments with effeminacy made,
Luxurious sloth and indolence display'd;
Wrought by Alcina's hands of silk and gold
Mingled with art, and costly to behold.
A string of jewels from his neck he wore,
That, to his breast descending, hung before;
And either warlike arm, that once could wield
The heaviest weapons in the listed field,
A bracelet bound: in either ear he hung 340
A ring of golden wire, to which was strung
A costly pearl, whose price by far excell'd
What India or Arabia e'er beheld.
His curling locks in nicest order set,
Wav'd round his head with liquid odours wet.
His gestures and his looks a mind declare
Bred to the wanton pleasures of the fair.
Roger now his name can only boast.
The rest is all in foul corruption lost:
So far estrang'd from what he was before 350
By fatal sorcery and beauty's power!

Now in Atlantes' form th' enchantress stood
Before the youth, that form he oft had view'd;

* This whole passage is a copy of Virgil, Æneid IV. where Mercury is sent by Jupiter to warn Æneas to leave Carthage. Tasso has closely followed both these poets, in his Jerusalem Delivered, b. xvi. but particularly Ariosto. Æneas, Roger, and Rinaldo, make pretty near the same figure.

With that stern eye, and countenance severe,
Which, when a child, he us'd so much to fear.

Then thus—"Are these the glorious fruits at
Of all my cares, of all my labours past? [last
Was it for this thy infancy I bred,
With marrow of the bears and lions fed?
Taught thee in gloomy caves or forest-lands, 360
To strangle serpents with thy tender hands?
Panthers and tigers of their claws deprive,
And tear their tushes from the boars alive?
That, after all, thou shouldst at length appear
Alcina's Atys¹⁰ or Adonis here?
Is this the fate which in the stars I read?
Is this what dreams and auguries have said?
'Twas promis'd, from thy birth, when thou hadst
gain'd 368

The ripening years which now thou hast attain'd,
That not a chief should match thy boundless praise:
And wouldst thou thus thy boasted trophies raise!
Thus wouldst thou rival Alexander's name,
Thus gain a Cæsar's, or a Scipio's fame?
Who could have thought (O scandal to the brave!)
To see thee here Alcina's wanton slave!
And that thy thralldom may to all be known,
Thy neck and arms her shameful shackles own.
If for thyself, fame cannot move thy mind,
Nor the great deeds that Heaven for thee design'd,
Yet wherefore from thy godlike race withhold 380
The future good, my lips have oft foretold?
A race (so fate decrees) to mortal eyes
More dear than Phœbus' light that gilds the skies!
Forbidden souls t' exist, which Heaven shall frame
With purest portions of ethereal flame:
Nor blast the promis'd palm, which virtue yields
In peaceful councils or triumphant fields,
By which thy sons, and each succeeding name,
Shall give to Italy her former fame.

But, o'er the rest, let two thy thoughts engage, 390
Two brethren, glories of thy favour'd age!
Alphono and Hippolito, whose praise,
O'er all thy line, shall bless their happy days.
On these I dwell, and joy to find thee hear
Their virtuous honours with a willing ear,
As if exulting in thy mind to trace
Such worthies springing from thy godlike race.
How has this queen thy fond affections won?
But thousands, like herself, the same had done:
Of all the numbers that her arts believ'd, 400
Thou know'st what recompense their loves receiv'd.
But that you may Alcina's faith behold,
I will her frauds and each disguise unfold.
This ring receive; and to the dame repair;
Then mark if she deserves the name of fair."

She cou'd: nor aught abasht'd Rogero said,
But, silent, hung to earth his drooping head.
Meantime she on his finger fix'd the ring,
That could once more his wandering senses bring:
Soon as the knight returning truth confess'd, 410
Such deep remorse his conscious soul depress'd,
He wish'd that yawning earth would open wide,
His visage from the face of man, to hide.

Her task perform'd, aside th' enchantress threw
Her borrow'd form, and stood disks'd to view;
Then to the wondering youth her name reveal'd,
Nor kept the cause, for which she came, conceal'd;

¹⁰ A beautiful youth beloved of Cybele, the mother of the gods.

"Sent by the fairest of her sex, whose care
No longer could her lover's absence bear;
To free him thence, where magic bands control, 420
In shameful servitude, his manly soul:
'That old Atlantes' borrow'd form she chose
A deeper reverence on his sense t' impose.
That gentle maid, whose fond affections burn
For thee, and merit well a kind return:
To whom, reflect what gratitude demands
For freedom late recover'd at her hands,
This ring, a safe defence from spellful art,
Here sends by me, and would have sent her heart,
If aught her heart avail'd to give thee aid." 430
The love of Bradamant she then display'd,
And, with her other noble virtues join'd,
Extoll'd the courage of her dauntless mind:
Till clearly banish'd from Rogero's breast,
She made him soon Alcina's name detest,
So late ador'd!—the ring his foe disarms,
Preserves him safe from future magic harms,
And strips Alcina of her borrow'd charms.
As when a child, who ripen'd fruit has stor'd,
In time forgetful of his former board, 440
By fortune to the place again convey'd,
Where many days before his trust was laid,
Beholds th' outgrowth of change with vast surprise,
Obscene and putrid, hateful to his eyes!
Rogero thus, by sage Melissa sent,
When to Alcina's sight again he went,
For that fair dame¹¹, the fairest of the fair,
Whom late he left, now, wondrous to declare,
A shape so loathsome saw, that search around,
One more deform'd and old could ne'er be found. 450
Her face was wrinkled, sharp, and pale of hue,
Her hair was turn'd to gray, and thinly grew;
Six spans in stature could she scarcely boast,
And every tooth her gums, disarrm'd, had lost;
As if her life more length of years had seen
Than Cuma's prophetic, or Priam's queen.
Yet such the force of spells, and magic power,
She seem'd in prime of age and beauty's flower:
But soon Rogero banish'd her his thought,
When all her useless wiles to light were brought. 460
Yet, by Melissa warn'd, he still suppress'd
The secret purpose of his wary breast:
At length his arms he seiz'd, that long had laid
Neglected, and his manly limbs array'd:
But first, each light suspicion to remove,
He told Alcina he desir'd to prove

¹¹ The allegory is here closely kept up; where the eyes of the understanding being cleared by the ring (reason), vice, which before appeared beautiful to the depraved imagination, then resumes its natural deformity.

¹² Spenser's Duessa, who had before appeared young and beautiful, divested of her rich apparel, is discovered to be a loathsome old woman. She is a copy of Ariosto's Alcina. The circumstances of Duessa's discovery are literally translated from the Italian poet: See Fairy Queen.

A knathy wrinkled hag, ill-favour'd old

Her crafty head was altogether bald
And

Was overgrown with scurf and filthy scald.
Her teeth out of her rotten gums were fled."

Warton's Obs. on Spenser.

If, living thus a recreant from the field,
His hands could yet their wonted weapons wield.
Then Balisarda ²² girding to his side,
So was his falchion nam'd, of temper try'd, 470
He took the buckler, whose enchanted blaze
Distracts the fainting eyes of all that gaze;
And with the silken covering o'er it hung,
The massy weight across his shoulders flung.
Then to the stall he went, and bade with speed
To fit the reins and saddle on a steed
Of coal-black hue: Melissa chose the horse;
For well she knew his swiftness in the course.
Him, Rabicano ²³ nam'd, and once the right
Of fam'd Astolpho, with that hapless knight 480
Who late was fix'd a myrtle on the shore,
The watry monster to this island bore.
Rogero might the griffin-horse unbind,
That next to Rabicano stood confin'd;
But here Melissa warn'd him to refrain,
As he but ill obey'd the curbing rein,
And promis'd soon t' instruct him to bestride
The flying courser, and his fury guide;
And less they would suspect his flight design'd,
If, parting thence, he left his steed behind. 490
Rogero all the maid's advice pursu'd,
Who, still invisible, beside him stood;
Then from the fatal palace swift he rode,
That ancient harlot's infamous abode;
And with impatience to the portal fled,
That tow'rd the realms of Logistilla led.
Here, on the guard at unawares he fell,
And forc'd his passage through with pointed steel:
While some he deeply wounded, some he slew,
Then o'er the bridge with speed impetuous flew; 500
And soon was distant far, ere spreading fame
Could to Alcina's ear his flight proclaim.
Th' ensuing book shall tell what course he past,
Till he to Logistilla came at last.

BOOK VIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero makes his escape from Alcina, and travels towards the country of Logistilla. Rinaldo leaves Scotland, and arrives in England, where he obtains succours from the regent to be transported to the assistance of Charlemain. Angelica is carried by magic art into a desolate island, where she is cast into a deep sleep by a hermit: from this place she is taken away by mariners to be devoured by a sea-monster. Orlando, disturbed with a dream, quits the city of Paris, then besieged by Agramant, and goes out disguised, in search of his mistress.

WHAT strange enchanters in our times abound!
What strange enchantresses alike are found!
Who, changing features, with deceitful art
Of either sex, contrap th' unwary heart:

²² The sword stolen from Orlando by Brunello, and given to Rogero.

²³ Boyardo relates, that this horse was produced by enchantment, and nourished only with the air. He was at first the property of Argalia, but when Ferras drove him home, (see General View of

Nor do they work these wonders on the mind
By influence of the stars, or sprites coufin'd;
But with dissimulation, fraud, and lies,
They bind it with indissoluble ties!
He, who from fortune can such grace obtain
The ring of fair Angelica to gain, 18
Or rather that of reason, should display
Their foul disguises to the face of day.
How blest Rogero then! whose ring dispell'd
Each error that his soul had prisoner held.
Rogero, as my tale before declar'd,
With Rabican came arm'd before the guard;
And when all unprovided these he spy'd,
Kept not his weapon idly by his side.
Ere far he rode the distant wood to gain,
He met a servant * of Alcina's train. 20
With ready falcon on his fist he came,
As wont each day to scour the field for game:
Oft to a neighbouring lake he let him fly;
The country round could store of prey supply.
He rode a palfrey, not with trappings gay;
His faithful dog companion of his way.
Soon as he saw Rogero's speed, his mind
Alcina's fugitive in him divin'd:
Advancing near, he, with a haughty air,
Bade him th' occasion of his flight declare: 30
The knight, disdainning question, nought replies;
To whom th' impatient swain indignant cries:
"What shall you say, if, spite of your intent,
I, with this falcon, should your haste prevent?"
This said, he let the falcon fly, whose speed
Not Rabican could, in his course, exceed;
The rider next, alighting from his seat,
Releas'd his palfrey from the curbing bit;
Who, snorting, spurn'd the ground, and instant flew
Swift as an arrow from the sounding yew: 40
No less the falconer follow'd close behind;
As sent by fire, or borne on wings of wind:
The dog with Rabican pursu'd the race,
As leopards hold the fearful hare in chase. [view
Now stopp'd the generous youth, who blush'd to
A man on foot so bold his flight pursue;
Who bore no weapon but a slender wand
With which he might his sporting dog command.
But when no other arms Rogero saw,
He much disdain'd on him his sword to draw. 50

Boyardo's Story,) he returned to the cave where he was bred, and whence he was taken by Argalia. Rinaldo, having lost his horse Bayardo, arrives at this cave where Rabican was kept; he kills a giant and two griffins that guarded him, and gets possession of the horse: Rinaldo afterwards going to Albracca, recovers his own from Astolpho, and leaves Rabican with him in his stead. See Orlando lusus.

* The allegory is here plainly opened by the poet.

* This passage considered literally has something odd in it: neither is the allegory of the servant, horse, dog, and falcon, very obvious. An Italian commentator thus explains it:

"The four animals that attack Rogero, are the four passions that govern the soul: the servant denotes fear; the bird, desire; the dog, grief; and the palfrey, joy. The shield signifies that the passions are to be conquered by opposing to them their contraries."

The falconer fiercely now attacks the knight;
 The dog attempts his courser's legs to bite.
 Near Rabican th' unbridled palfrey wheels,
 And oft assails him with his spurning heels:
 With sounding wing the falcon terrifies,
 And strikes him with her talons as she flies;
 The steed, whom such a strange assault dismays,
 But ill the bridle and the spur obeys.
 At length, constrain'd, his sword Rogero shows
 Unsheath'd; now here, now there his irksome foes 60
 He threats with edge or point, but threats in vain;
 For still his irksome foes th' attack maintain.
 He fears, if he delays, he soon shall view
 Alcina, with her train, his flight pursue:
 He hears loud clamours fill the vales around;
 He hears the bells, the drums, the trumpets sound;
 Now ill advis'd he seems, with sword in hand,
 Against a man unarm'd, and dog, to stand:
 'Twere better to disclose to view, he thought,
 The shining buckler by Atlantes wrought;
 Then from the shield the crimson covering rais'd;
 In every eye the flashing splendour blaz'd:
 The falconer tumbles senseless on the plain;
 The dog and palfrey fall; the wings sustain
 The bird no longer in his airy way;
 Rogero leaves them all to sleep a prey.

The fatal tidings soon Alcina heard,
 Rogero had escap'd and fur'd the guard;
 At this such grief was o'er her senses spread,
 That, for a time, her very soul was dead: 80
 She tore her garments, and her face she bruis'd,
 And oft of mad neglect herself accus'd.
 Then swift to arms she summon'd all her crew,
 When soon around her gather'd forces drew:
 Of these two bands she fram'd, while one she sent
 To explore the path her lov'd Rogero went;
 The other to the harbour took their way,
 And there, with speed embarking, put to sea:
 Their sails, unnumber'd, all the stream o'ercaust:
 With these the desolate Alcina pass'd; 90
 And, so Rogero had possess'd her mind,
 Her palace left without a guard behind.
 This gave Melissa, plac'd in secret there,
 An ample time her mischiefs to repair;
 To free the wretches who had long remain'd
 In hapless state, in cruel thralldom chain'd.
 Around the palace, searching every part,
 She saw the spells of her malicious art;
 The magic seals from many a piece she took;
 A thousand mystic forms and figures broke. 100
 Then o'er each field she pass'd, each mead or grove;
 Where the sad victims of Alcina's love,
 That, hid in fountains, trees, or beasts, deplor'd
 Their hopeless change, she to their shapes restor'd:
 These, when they once their forms recover'd, view'd
 The brave Rogero's steps in haste pursu'd
 To Logistilla, parting thence in peace
 To Scythia, Persia, India, and to Greece,
 With grateful hearts: but foremost of the train
 The English duke resum'd his form again: 110
 The duke, to beautiful Bradamant ally'd,
 For him the good Rogero first employ'd
 His influence with the wise enchantress-maid:
 And gave his wondrous ring the knight to aid.
 Astolpho thus each manly grace regain'd,
 And, by Melissa's means, his arms obtain'd,
 With that fam'd lance of gold, which forc'd to yield
 The strongest warrior in the listed field.

* This was the lance which Argalia brought with Argalia first, Astolpho next the lance

 Possess'd; by this they both acquir'd in France 120
 A mighty name: the lance Melissa found,
 Kept in the palace of th' enchanted ground,
 With all his other arms, which from the duke,
 At his arrival there, Alcina took.
 This done, she mounts the horse that cuts the wind,
 Then seats Astolpho on the steed behind;
 And thence to Logistilla they repair,
 Arriv'd an hour before Rogero there. [ascend,
 Meanwhile through rugged ways, with steep
 Rogero to sage Logistilla went; 130
 Till, numerous toils o'erpass'd, at noon of day
 Beside the seas he held his weary way;
 Slow pacing o'er the dry and barren strand,
 The flood on one, the hills on t' other hand:
 From the steep hills the beams reflected came;
 The earth was parch'd, the air was all on flame!
 The silent birds were hid in groves profound;
 The grass-hopper alone, with tedious sound;
 While in the leafy shades conceal'd he lies,
 Deafens the hills, the vales, the seas and skies! 140
 There heat, and thirst, and toil (an irksome crew!)
 The warrior's steps along the sand pursue.
 But since my Muse must various tales rehearse,
 Nor one alone can claim my partial verse,

him into France, (see General View of Boyardo's Story,) which after his death came into the possession of Astolpho, who at the tournament, made by Charlemain, overthrew with this all opponents. Boyardo, in Orlando Innam. calls it una lanza dorata. So the unerring spear of Cephalus, cuspa fuli aurea cuspis. Ovid Met. b. vii.

Britomartis, in Spenser, has a lance of the same kind:

— a mighty spear,
 Which Bladud made, by magic art of yore,
 And us'd the same in battle ay to bear,
 Sith which it had been bore preserv'd in store,
 For his great virtues proved long afore:
 For never wight so fast in sell could sit,
 But him perforce unto the ground it bore.

† In this hyperbole Ariosto seems to allude to the following line of Virgil:

Sole sub ardenti resouant arbusta cicadis!

To this passage in the edition of Virgil by Dr. Warton, is subjoined the following note, which is well worth transcribing, as it may be thought in some sort to apologize for the strength of Ariosto's expression.

"I don't know how every body almost in England came to imagine that the cicada is the Roman writers was the same with our grass-hopper, for their characters are different enough to have prevented any such mistake. The cicada is what the Italians now call cicala, and the French rigale. They make one constant uniform noise all day long in summer time, which is extremely disagreeable and tiresome, particularly in the great heats. Their note is sharp and shrill in the beginning of the summer, but hoarse and harsh towards the latter part of it. They are supposed to feed on the morning dew, and then fix on some sunny branch of a tree and sing all day long. It is hence that this insect is opposed to the ant in the old Æsopian fables, which is as industrious and inoffensive as the other is idle and troublesome. Virgil calls the cicada querulus and raucus. Martial egulus and

I leave Rogero^a here, and hasten o'er
To seek Rinaldo on the Scottish shore.

The king, his daughter fair, and all the land,
With great regard Rinaldo entertain'd:
At length the knight his embassy display'd
To beg from Scotland and from England aid; 150
He show'd, beside his monarch's earnest prayer,
How glory call'd them to support the war.
To this the king reply'd without delay,
That to the furthest limits of his sway
His soul was ever ready to maintain
The empire's rights, and weal of Charlemain;
With promise to prepare, ere many days,
Whatever force his utmost power could raise;
And had not years deprest his strength, he said,
Himself would combat at his army's head. 160
Yet should not age so damp his martial flame,
To keep him from the dangerous field of fame,
But that his son his absence well supply'd
With prudent counsel and with courage try'd.
Though distant now from his paternal reign,
He hop'd to see him soon return again;
While he th' auxiliary troops assembled drew,
To pass before his sight in just review.

The monarch spoke; and instant gives command
To levy horse and foot throughout the land; 170
Equips a numerous fleet to stem the tides,
And various stores for every need provides.

Now brave Rinaldo hastening to depart
For England's realm, the king with grateful heart
To Berwick's town convey'd the valiant peer,
There, parting, shed for grief a tender tear.
Soon in the poop the prosperous breezes blew;
Rinaldo went on board, and bade adieu.

The busy mariners their anchors ship,
And plough securely through the foamy deep 180
With rapid course: the silver Thames they gain,
Where first he mingles with the briny main:
Along the stream with oars and sails they fly,
Till London's stately towers salute their eye.

Rinaldo did from Charles and Otho bring (Otho besieg'd in Paris with the king)
Commission to the prince, whose honour'd hand
By deputation rul'd the English land,
To raise supplies; and from fair Albion's coast
Embark for Calais' shore the friendly host, 190
To Charlemain and France a welcome aid:
The prince, who then the regal sceptre sway'd
In Otho's stead, to brave Rinaldo's name
Such honours paid, as Otho's self might claim;
Then, answering his demands, he summon'd all
The neighbouring forces that obey'd his call;
With those that in the subject islands lay,
To meet together on a certain day.

But here, my lord^b, with various themes my Muse
Th' example of the lyrist's art pursues, 200

inhumanas. Their ants is the more troublesome, because in the great heats they sing alone. Any one who has passed a summer in Italy, or in the south of France, will not think the epithet inhumanas too severe for them. Spence.

See Dr. Warton's Eclog. II. ver. 16.

^b A fresh address to his patron: this frequently occurs in the course of the work. Rinaldo is mentioned again at the review of the forces, book x. ver. 307.

Who, shifting off the strings, with skillful hand
Now high, now low, the changing note commands.
While to Rinaldo was my verse confin'd,
Angelica again employ'd my mind,
Whom late we left, where, flying from his sight,
She on an aged hermit chanc'd to light.
Then to pursue her tale—she ask'd the way
That led to where some ready vessel lay:
Such anxious fears possess'd the tender maid,
She deem'd all Europe could not yield her aid. 210
Pleas'd with her wondrous charms, the hoary sire
Through his cold veins conferr'd a sudd'n fire;
Then strove with heavenly converse to detain
The parting fair-one, but he strove in vain.
A hundred times he struck his ass, but still
The stubborn beast was restive to his will:
His walk was heavy, and his trot was worse;
Nor could he make him mend his tardy course.
The virgin gone; when scarce his sight survey'd
The late-worn track her palfrey's feet had made 220
A cave he sought, remote from human eyes,
There caus'd from earth unhallow'd fiends to rise:
From this infernal band a sprite he chose,
On whom he best might his commands impose;
And bade him on the palfrey act his part,
That with the damsel bore away his heart.
As the staunch hound that through the mountain
With open mouth the hare or fox pursues, [dews
When wheeling round he sees the flying prey,
Oft seems to bend his speed a different way, 230
Till, unawares, upon the wretch he flies,
And grips with cruel jaws the bleeding prize:
The hermit thus, by hidden craft, design'd
Where'er she fled, Angelica to find.

His secret purpose well methinks I trace,
And shall discover in some future place.

The subtle demon, with his charge possess'd,
Now crept within th' unwary damsel's beast.
So lurking sparks at first in secret lie,
Till bursting sheets of flame involve the sky. 240
Near the salt flood her lonely path she held,
Where on the Gascon shore the billows swell'd:
But soon the fiend, that in her palfrey lay,
To the deep seas⁷ impell'd his headlong way.
With terror struck, she strives to turn the rein;
But further still he plunges in the main.
What should she do, but firmly fix her seat?
Her robe she gathers round; her timorous feet
She draws aloft; while o'er her shoulders flow
Her locks, and in her face the Zephyrs blow! 250
The rougher winds are hush'd; the surges cease
Their fury, by her charms compos'd to peace.
While flowing tears her cheeks and breast bedew,
Back to the shore she cast a mournful view;
She sees it now, alas! no longer near;
Still less and less the flying hills appear:
Till, wheeling to the right, a desert strand
The courser reach'd, and bore her safe to land,
Midst rocks and caves; what time the sinking light
Of Phoebus' beams resign'd the world to night. 260
Soon as the damsel found herself convey'd
To these drear wilds, whose sight alone dismay'd
The gazer's heart, immovable she stood;
So fix'd, had any eye her figure view'd,
She seem'd a statue on the lonely sands:
Her hair was hanging loose; her clasping hands
Together join'd; in silent grief she mourn'd
With lips unmov'd: her eyes were upward turn'd,

⁷ This whole passage is copied from Ovid, in the fable of Jupiter and Europa.

As if 't' accuse the high decrees of Heaven,
That all her days to misery had given! 270
At length she gave a vent to mighty woe,
Words found their way, and tears began to flow.

"Relentless Fate! what would'st thou more," she
"Since life itself will not thy rage suffice? [cries,
Why hast thou sav'd me from the gaping wave,
Where now my griefs had found a peaceful grave,
But that my life preserv'd might means supply
To persecute me more before I die!
By thee I'm banish'd from my regal seat,
Nor e'er must hope my native land to greet: 280
And O! far worse! have lost my spotless name;
For though my conscious thoughts are void of blame,
Yet, wandering thus, I give too just pretence,
For slander to defame my innocence!

What has that wretched damsel left to boast,
What good on Earth, whose virtuous praise is lost!
Alas! that fame which speaks me young and fair,
(Or true or false) but adds to my despair!
Nor can I thank to Heaven for charms bestow,
For luckless charms, whence all my sorrows flow. 290
Through these, my brother, poor Argalia, dy'd;
No succour his enchanted arms supply'd.

For these did Agrican, the Tartar king,
My father Galaphron to ruin bring,
Once monarch of Cathay⁸: 'tis hence I range
Forlorn, and every day my dwelling change.
My wealth, my friends, my honour, all is flown!
Yet am I still preserv'd for woes unknown.
Glut then thy utmost rage! O Fortune! send
Some savage beast these wretched limbs to rend. 300
From loathsome light my weary soul relieve,
And for my death my grateful thanks receive."

Thus in deep sorrow mourn'd the hapless dame,
Till in her sight the wily father came:
Her, from the summit of a rock, he view'd,
As on the plain below she weeping stood.
Six days before, arriv'd the hermit there,
Borne by a demon strangely through the air;
And now such looks of deep devotion wore,
Not holy Paul, or blest Hilario⁹ more! 310

When nearer fair Angelica he drew,
Nor she the features of the hermit knew,
The welcome sight her drooping spirits cheer'd,
Though still deep anguish on her face appear'd.
"O holy father! with thy pitying aid
Relieve," she cry'd, "a helpless, lonely maid;"
Then, with a broken voice, began to tell
That inournful story, which he knew so well.

In pious strains, with hypocritic air,
He now began to sooth the weeping fair; 320
While, as he spoke, his roving fingers press'd
Her alabaster neck and heaving breast;

⁸ Albracca having been long besieged, was at last taken by storm, though not by Agrican, who was slain by Orlando, but by the enemies of Angelica, who took advantage of the absence of Orlando, Sacripant, and the other brave defenders of that princess. See Orlando Innam.

⁹ "Paul, the first hermit, retired into the desert, in the time of the emperor Valerian, where he lived holily for one hundred and two years, in company with the blessed abbot Antonjo. Hilario, bishop of Gallia, was sent into exile with Eusebius, by the emperor, who was an enemy to the Christians: he led an exemplary life, and wrought many miracles." Porcacchi.

Till, bolder grown, he clasp'd her in his arms:
But here, resentment kindling all her charms,
Back with her hand the feeble wretch she threw,
While every feature glow'd with rosy hue.
Then from his scrip¹⁰ he takes, of sovereign use,
A little vial fill'd with magic juice,
In those bright eyes, where Love was wont to frame
His sharpest darts, and raise his purest flame, 330
A drop he sprinkles that had power to steep
Her heavy eye-lids in the dew of sleep.
Now prone on earth she sinks, a lovely prize,
Defenceless at his lawless will she lies;
While, at his pleasure, he can wander o'er
Each nameless beauty, every grace explore.
Oft to her mouth his trembling lips are prest;
And oft his kisses print her ivory breast.
None view his actions, on that desert coast:
But the soft hour of love with him is lost. 340
The hoary dotard, whose impure desire
Forgets what sage and reverend years require,
Shame of his kind! with drowsy age oppress,
By slow degrees resigns his limbs to rest,
And every sense in dull oblivion laid,
Soon lies in slumber by the slumbering maid.

But now a fresh disaster Fortune sent,
Who seldom leaves till all her darts are spent:
And here I must th' occasion first display
That draws me something from the path away: 350
In seas remote, beneath the western skies,
Beyond the Irish coast an island lies,
Ebuda call'd, on whose ill-fated ground
Th' inhabitants are now but thinly found.
A dreadful orc¹¹, and numerous monsters more,
By Proteus sent¹², have ravag'd all the shore.
The ancient stories (strange to hear!) relate,
A powerful monarch govern'd once the state:
This prince a daughter fair and young possess'd,
With every grace and every virtue blest; 360
Whose heavenly charms, as on the strand she stood,
Inflam'd the heart of Proteus midst the flood:

¹⁰ Boyardo has a story something similar to this of Ariosto, where Flordelis, wife to Brandimart, meets with such another hermit, who casts her in a deep sleep, and carries her away from her husband, when she is afterwards delivered by a lion, who terrifies the hermit that had conveyed her to a cave. See likewise the old Fisherman and Florimel in Spenser, Fairy Queen, b. iii. c. viii.

¹¹ The word orca in the Italian has no particular signification, but is applied to any monster or creature of the imagination: in the sixth book, orca is used for a deformed and dreadful giant: the word orc occurs in Milton:

The haunts of seals and orcs and sea-mews' clang!
Par. Lost, b. xi. ver. 835.

¹² Ariosto makes a strange mixture of the Christian and Pagan theology: Neptune, Proteus, and the other marine gods, are here introduced without scruple. Spenser in like manner employs the fables and symbols of the ancients, and makes the Heathen deities agents in his poem; and, like Ariosto, brings Proteus into the above-mentioned tale of Florimel and the Fisherman:

Proteus is shepherd of the seas of yore,
And hath the charge of Neptune's mighty herd;
An aged sire with head all frothy hore,
And sprinkled frost upon his dewy beard, &c.

The bloomy virgin by his love compell'd,
Her pregnant womb a growing burthen swell'd,
Most hateful to her sire was this to hear,
Above all others impious and severe!
Nor would he by remorse, or love, be led
To save his hapless child's devoted head.
His grandson (harmless object of his spite)
Was murder'd ere he yet had seen the light! 370
Proteus, to whom 'tis given in charge to keep
The herds of Neptune, ruler of the deep,
For his lov'd consort's death indignant burn'd,
Aid to revenge her all his fury turn'd.
With speed he sent ashore his savage train,
The phocæ, orcs, and monsters of the main;
That not alone their rage on herds employ'd,
But villages and husbandmen destroy'd.
The soldiers arm'd, by night and day prepar'd,
High on the city's walls maintain'd the guard, 380
While from the fields the trembling people flew:
At length to learn what course they must pursue
To end their plague, the oracle they sought;
And thence the deputies this answer brought:

"That Heaven requir'd them with unwear'd care
To seek a damsel, like the former, fair;
A victim doom'd beside the roaring tide,
To appease the god for her that guiltless dy'd.
So might th' offended power the maid receive,
And from their woes th' afflicted land relieve. 390
But if the scourge remain'd, they must present
Another dame, till Proteus' wrath was spent."

I dare not true, nor false, this story hold,
Which former annals have of Proteus told:
Thus far 'tis known—in this unhappy place,
A law prevails against the female race,
To nourish daily with their guiltless blood
An hideous monster, rising from the flood,
A dreadful orc, that near the isle remain'd,
When every other had the seas regain'd. 400
Hard is the lot of woman ever found,
But harder still on this un pitying ground.
O wretched virgins! in a luckless hour
By force cast on this ill-omen'd shore,
Where, by the waves, in cruel watch they stand
To seize on strangers with an impious hand;
Whose lives may for the nation's guilt atone,
And thus preserve the numbers of their own.
From port to port the vessels scour the main, 410
New victims for the sacrifice to gain,
Some maids by force they win, and some by stealth,
By flattery those, and those by hopes of wealth;
And thus they drew such numbers in their power,
As every prison fill'd, and every tower.
A pinnace, that had sail'd from land to land,
Passing before the solitary strand,
Where on the grassy turf the lovely maid,
Ublact Angelica, asleep was laid,
Their anchor cast, the seamen stopp'd, to bring
Wood from the grove, and water from the spring, 420
And there beheld the flower of beauty's charms
Clasp'd in the holy father's reverend arms!

O precious prize! adorn'd with every grace!
Too precious far for such a barbarous race!
O cruel Fortune! canst thou then maintain
Thy sway on Earth with such relentless reign,
To yield an offering to a monster's rage,
Those graces that could Agrican engage
From Caucasus Albracca's force to brave,
With half of Scythia there to find a grave! 430

That beauty priz'd by Sacripant before
His martial glory and his regal power;

That beauty, which the mighty fame defac'd
Of Anglant's knight, and laid his senses waste;
That beauty, which had rais'd such chiefs to arms,
And fill'd the Eastern empire with alarms;
Now lies forlorn, to woe and death betray'd,
Without a friend to hear, a friend to aid.

The damsel sleeping on the senseless ground,
Before she wak'd, with ready chains they bound; 440
They seiz'd the hermit too; and with their prey
Back to the strand again resum'd their way.
To the high mast the belying canvass strain'd,
The vessel soon the mournful island gain'd.
Yet pity wrought so far her charms to spare,
For many days they kept the virgin-fair;
Till now, exhausted all their hapless store,
Weeping they led her to the destin'd shore.
What tongue can tell the sorrows, tears, and sighs.
The lamentations loud that pierc'd the skies! 450
'Twas strange the pitying rocks did not divide,
When to the stone her lovely limbs were ty'd.
I can no more—such pangs my breast assail,
The Muse must leave untold the piteous tale;
And to a theme less gloomy turn the strain,
Till her torn mind recovers strength again.
Nor squallid snakes, nor spotted tigress stung
With dreadful fury for her ravish'd young,
Or aught that in the tract of Afric lands 460
Eunom'd wanders o'er the burning sands,
Could view without remorse this maiden's cruel
bands.

Had fame the tidings¹³ to Orlando brought,
Who late in Paris' walls his fair one sought;
Or the two warriors, whom the fair misled
With lying forms in Stygian darkness bred:
For her a thousand dangers had they dar'd,
And flown with speed to be the virgin's guard;
But should the fatal news their souls surprise,
The distance now their timely aid denies.

Meantime was Paris¹⁴ close besieg'd around 470
By King Troyano's son in arms renown'd:
One dreadful day the foes so warmly press'd,
They nearly enter'd and the town possess'd,
Then had not Heaven fulfill'd the Christian prayer,
And pour'd a deluge¹⁵ through the darken'd air,

¹³ See the before-cited book in Spenser, where Florimel falls into the hands of the old fisherman:

O ye brave knights, that boast this lady's love,
Where be ye now ———
But if that thou sir Satyrane didst weet,
Or thou sir Peridure, her sorry state,
How soon would ye assemble many a fleet,
To fetch from sea what ye at land lost late!
Towers, cities, kingdoms ye would rinate,
In your arrougement and dispiteous rage;
Ne ought your burning fury mote abate:
But if sir Calidore could it presage,
No living creature could his cruelty assuage.

"This apostrophe to the knights of Fairy Land,
and calling on them by name, to assist the distressed Florimel, seems imitated from Ariosto, who twice uses the same kind of apostrophe; where Angelica is going to be devoured by a monster, and where Rogero is hung into prison."

Upton's Notes on Spenser.

¹⁴ He returns to Angelica, the xth book, ver. 647.

¹⁵ In this short account of the siege of Paris,
Ariosto alludes to a more particular description

That day had sunk before the Pagan lance,
The sacred empire, and the fame of France!
The great Creator turn'd his eyes, and heard
The just complaint by aged Charles preferr'd,
And sudden, where all human help was vain, 480
The fire extinguish'd with tempestuous rain.
The wise will ever to th' Almighty bend,
Whose power can bust the falling state defend.
The pious monarch own'd, in grateful thought,
The hand divine that had his safety wrought.
At night Orlando, on his restless bed,
Revolves distressful fancies in his head;
While here and there his thoughts each other chase,
And never long maintain their fitting place.
So from a water clear¹⁶, the trembling light 490
Of Phoebus, or the silver queen of night,
Along the spacious rooms with splendour plays,
Now high, now low, and shifts a thousand ways.
Who scarce was ever from his thoughts disjoint'd,
He feels with double force the pain increase,
That seem'd awhile by day compos'd to peace.
With her from India to the West he came,
Where fortune robb'd him of his beautiful dame:
And vainly trac'd her steps, since Bourdeaux'
field¹⁷ 500
Compell'd the handed powers of France to yield.
For this Orlando's careful breast was mov'd,
And off for this his folly he reprov'd.
" My life's best joy! how have I err'd!" he said,
" Why have I thus so fair a nymph betray'd?
When on thy charms each day to feed my sight,
On thy dear converse dwell with food delight,
Thy goodness gave—e'en then—O fatal hour!
I tamely gave thee into Namus' power!
Well might my soul have such an act excus'd; 510
Not Charles himself had my desires refus'd.

which had been given by Boyardo, in the latter end of his poem. See General View of Boyardo's Story.

The continuation of this siege is resumed by Ariosto, l. xiv. ver. 491.

¹⁶ See Virgil. Æn. viii.

Sicut aquæ tremulum labris ubi lumen ænis
Sole repercussum, aut radiantis imagine Lunæ,
Omnia pervolvit late loca: jamque sub auras
Erigitur, ænæque ferit laquearia tecti.

So from a brazen vase the trembling stream
Reflects the lunar or the solar beam;
Swift and elusive of the dazzled eyes,
From wall to wall the dancing glory flies;
Thence to the ceiling shoot the glancing rays,
And o'er the roof the quivering splendour plays.

Pitt.

Camões, as Mr. Mickle observes, has the same simile:

As in the Sun's bright beam the gamesome boy
Plays with the shining steel or crystal toy,
Swift and irregular, by sudden starts,
The living ray with viewless motion darts,
Swift o'er the wall, the roof, the floor, by turns,
The sun-beam dances, and the radiance burns.

Mickle's Lusiad, b. viii.

¹⁷ The great battle in which the Christian army was defeated, described by Boyardo, and mentioned by Ariosto in the beginning of the poem.

First had I every chance of battle try'd;
First let them from my breast my heart divide!
But Charles, and all his force, too weak had prov'd
To ravish from my arms the maid I lov'd!
At least I might have plac'd her with a guard
in Paris, or some strong retreat prepar'd:
Who like myself, should every danger brave
From threatening ills the virgin-fair to save!
Far dearer than the blood that bathes my heart; 590
How ill have I perform'd a lover's part!
Ah! whither now, without my aid, ah, ah,
Whither, so young and beautiful, art thou gone!
As when the Sun¹⁸ withdraws his evening rays,
A lamb, forsaken, midst the forest strays
With tender bleats, in hopes the shepherd's ear
At length may chance the plaintive notes to hear;
Till from afar the wolf the sound receives,
And for his loss the hapless shepherd grieves.
Then art thou fall'n to cruel wolves a prey, 530
Thy faithful knight Orlando far away!
That dear, that virgin treasure, which possess
Had made Orlando with th' immortals blest,
Which at thy chaste desire I kept unstain'd,
Some cruel spoiler now perhaps has gain'd,
Forbid it Heaven! all other sufferings shed,
All other plagues, on my devoted head!
But should it be—this hand shall yield relief,
And end at once my being and my grief!"
Now lost in sleep the whole creation lay, 540
And cheer'd their spirits from the toils of day.
Some sunk in down; and some the herbage press'd;
While some on rocks, on oaks, or myrtles rest.
Yet thou, Orlando, seek'st in vain to close
Thy wakeful lids, distracted from repose:
Or, if a moment seals thy weary eyes,
In thy short slumber painful visions rise.
Orlando dreamt, that on a river's side,
With odorous flowers and shrubs diversify'd,
He gaz'd transported on that heavenly face, 550
Which Love himself had tinged with rosy grace;
On those bright stars, whose glances food supply
To souls that in his nets entangled lie;
On that dear virgin, whose all-conquering eyes
Could in his breast his amorous heart surprise!
While thus he seem'd possess'd of every joy
That can a happy lover's thoughts employ,
A sudden storm the cheerful day o'ercast,
The tender flowerets wither'd in the blast,
The forest shook, as when, in wintry skies, 560
South, East, and West with mingled fury rise!
Now while he shelter sought, the mournful knight
Seem'd in the gloom to lose the damsel's sight.
Now here, now there, he search'd the woods around,
And made the country with her name resound,
But while a thousand fears his soul dismay'd,
He heard her well-known voice imploring aid:
Swift to the sound he turn'd, but turn'd in vain,
His eyes no more the object lov'd regain;
When to his ears this dreadful warning came, 570
" Ne'er hope on Earth again to see the dame!"
The lover, waking, found the vision fled,
And saw his falling tears bedew the bed.
Unmindful now that dreams are empty shade,
By fancy form'd, he deem'd his dearest maid
With danger press'd, and from his couch he flew,
And o'er his limbs his plated armour drew;

¹⁸ This is a tender beautiful simile, and altogether original.

Then Brigliadoro¹⁹ took without delay,
 But not a squire attendant on his way,
 From prying eyes the more to hide his name, 580
 Nor give each vulgar tongue t' asperse his fame,
 He wore not those known arms²⁰, and ample shield
 With red and white distinguish'd in the field;
 But arms of sable hue, whose darkness shows
 A just resemblance to his inward woes.
 Not many years elaps'd, his matchless might
 From Amontes²¹ won this suit in fight.

Now midst the silence of the midnight hour,
 He left his sovereign Charles; the Christian power
 He left; nor bade adieu to Brandimart²², 590
 Once his lov'd friend and partner of his heart!
 But when, with golden tresses round her head,
 The Morn arose from rich Titibonus' bed,
 And from Earth's face the humid curtains drew,
 Orlando's sight, incens'd, the monarch knew:
 With deep concern his nephew's loss he heard
 When honour call'd him now, where danger rear'd
 Her dreadful front, to guard from hostile hands
 His king, his country, and his social bands.
 Nor could he hide his anger, but express'd 600
 The just resentment kindled in his breast;
 With threats, if absent long, the recreant knight
 Should dearly mourn this ill-concocted fight.
 But noble Brandimart, whose faith well try'd
 No chance could shake, whom nothing could divide
 From his lov'd friend; who iuly hop'd once more
 Orlando to his fellows to restore;
 And scorn'd to bear reproach his fame upbraid,
 Swift from the host his eager steps convey'd;
 Nor would to Flordelis his thoughts disclose, 610
 Lest her fond love should his design oppose.
 His wedded dame was she, his soul's delight,
 Scarce was he ever absent from her sight:
 The charms of beauty in her person shin'd,
 And every prudent grace adorn'd her mind!
 Yet, parting thus, he hop'd ere close of day
 Again to measure back his former way:
 But many a chance the wandering warrior prov'd,
 That long detain'd him from the fair he lov'd.
 A tedious month his consort stay'd in vain, 620
 In hopes to see her Brandimart again;

¹⁹ Briglia-d'oro, i. e. golden bridle: the name of Orlando's horse in Boyardo, whence Spenser calls Sir Guyon's horse, Brigadore: this horse was formerly the property of Almontes. See note to book i. ver. 202.

²⁰ The armour which Orlando won from Almontes, brother to Troyano.

²¹ The name of this warrior, who is not mentioned in Boyardo, appears in a muster of the forces brought over by Almontes: after the death of Almontes he was killed by Orlando.

See Aspramonte, c. v. xx.

²² Brandimart is one of the principal personages in the Orlando Innamorato, where he makes a more conspicuous figure than in the Furioso. Brandimart and Flordelis are described by Boyardo, as a pattern of conjugal affection, and this character of them is preserved by Ariosto: they were Pagans by birth, but Flordelis was first converted by Rinaldo, and Brandimart afterwards by the joint arguments of Orlando and Flordelis. Brandimart is introduced as the almost inseparable companion of Orlando, whom he accompanies to the siege of Albracca. See Orlando Innam.

Till fear and love her breast so strongly rend,
 She quits the walls without a guide or friend;
 And seeks him long in many a distant state,
 As, in its place, the story shall relate:
 Of these no more—the Muse with nobler flight
 Now turns the strain to great Anglante's knight;
 Who, having chang'd his arms of well-known fame,
 Won from Almontes, to the portal came,
 And to a chief, who there maintain'd the guard, 630
 In a low voice his mighty name declar'd:
 Soon at the word, he let the draw-bridge down,
 When swift Orlando issu'd from the town,
 And took the way to pass the slumbering foe:
 What follow'd then th' ensuing book shall show.

BOOK IX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Orlando seeking Angelica, hears of the cruel custom of the people of Eubuda, who every day sacrificed a virgin to a sea-monster. He resolves to go against those islanders, but, in his way, being cast ashore by a tempest, meets with Olympis, who relates to him a melancholy tale of her misfortunes and expulsion from her hereditary dominions. Orlando undertakes to restore her to her possessions, and revenge her on her enemy.

To what will cruel treacherous Love constrain
 A heart, once taken captive in his chain,
 Since he can thus Orlando's breast divide,
 And turn his duty from his lord aside!
 He, who was once with deepest wisdom stor'd,
 The holy church defending with his sword,
 Ere since in love's bewildering path he trod,
 Forgets himself, his sovereign, and his God!
 Yet would I gladly here acquit his fame,
 O'erjoy'd, with mine, to find so great a name: 10
 For still with eyes averse the right I view,
 But with a ready will the wrong pursue.

Now, cloth'd in sable arms, his course he took,
 Without remorse his dearest friends forsook,
 And saw the troops of Africa and Spain
 Encamp'd, unnumber'd, o'er the spacious plain:
 In shelters from the storm¹ dispers'd they lay;
 Some distant far, and some a nearer way:
 Deep sunk in sleep was every weary band,
 These stretch'd on earth, those leaning on the hand. 20

Then might the earl have slain a numerous crew,
 Nor yet his Durindana² once he drew.

² Durindana, or Durlindana, the name of Orlando's sword, so called in Pulci and Boyardo; this sword was made by enchantment, and would penetrate every kind of armour. See note to book i. ver. 202.

"Durinda is the name of Roland's sword in Turpin's romance, which Ariosto and Boyardo copy so faithfully. As a specimen of that historian's style and manner, I shall present the reader with Roland's mottoquy addressed to this sword, when he was mortally wounded by a Saracen giant. O omnis pulcherrime! sed semper lucidissime,

Too noble was Orlando's soul, to show
Inglorious hatred on a slumbering foe!

Through every part he sought the royal maid,
While those he waking found he gently pray'd
(Her form describing and her garb) to tell,
What chance the virgin, whom he lov'd, befel.
The next returning morn the knight again
Explor'd the camp of Agramant in vain: 50
Where in the Arabian dress from all conceal'd,
And in the language of the country skill'd,
Three days he rov'd secure from place to place,
And seem'd a native of the Moorish race.
Through towns and cities next his course he bends,
Where'er proud France her ample realm extends;
Through Brittany, Provence, the Gascon's reign;
From fruitful Picardy to distant Spain.

What time November strips the flowery field,
And bids the Earth her verdant covering yield 40
To hoary frost; when trees dishonour'd stand,
And birds in clusters seek a foreign land;
His friends he left; nor yet his labours ceas'd
With wintry skies; nor spring his cares releas'd.
While thus the knight his eager search pursu'd,
He came one day to where a stream he view'd
That slowly to the seas was wont to glide,
And Britanny from Normandy divide.
But now the waters, swell'd with heavy rains
And melted snows, had delug'd all the plains; 50
And loudly foaming, with resistless force,
Had borne the bridge before them in their course.

Orlando, pausing here, awhile explor'd
Each neighbouring part to cross th' opposing ford:
As thus he linger'd, midst the flood appear'd
A slender bark, whose helm a damsel steer'd:
The Paladin besought her from the land
To give him passage to the further strand.

"This bark," she answer'd, "ne'er receives a knight
Unless he first his sacred promise plight, 60
At my request, the noblest war to wage,
That ever can a champion's arms engage.
If here, sir knight, you seek the further shore,
First give your faith that, ere this month is o'er,
You to th' Hibernian monarch will unite
Your force, who now assembles all his might
The fatal isle Euboda to confound,
The most inhuman which the seas surround.
Know that afar, midst many a neighbouring isle,
Euboda lies beyond the Irish soil; 70
That, by an ancient law, to foreign lands
Sends many vessels fill'd with warlike bands,
To seize and bear unhappy dames away,
Doom'd for a dreadful monster's living prey:
Merchants and corsairs to the coast repair,
And traffic with them for the wretched fair:
There, on the strand, each day a virgin dies;
Think then what numbers fall a sacrifice!
But if soft pity can your bosom move, 80
Or if your soul is not averse to love,
Consent your name with those allies to join,
Who now for such a glorious cause combine."

Scarce had she ended, when th' impatient knight
Vow'd to be foremost in so just a fight;

capulo eburneo candidissime, cruce aurea splendididissime, superficie deaurate, pomo beryllino deca-rate, magno nomine Dei inscripte, acuminis legiti-time, virtute omni prædite, quis amplius virtute tua utetur? Quis, &c." Turpini Hist. de Gestis Caroli Mag. cap. xxii.

Warton's Observ. on Spenser.

As one whose soul detested cruel deeds;
And soon a new alarm his fancy breeds;
He fears, lest, thither by ill fate betray'd,
That island crew had seiz'd the lovely maid
Whom late he sought; and now his anxious mind
Resolves with speed the cruel realm to find. 90
Then, ere the Sun descended to the deep,
He reach'd Saint Malo, and procur'd a ship.
The bellying canvass catch'd the driving blast,
And in the night Saint Michael's Mount they past:
Breco and Landriglier, behind they leave,
And now by Britanny the billows cleave;
Then steer directly tow'rd the chalky shore
Whence England once the name of Albion bore.
But soon the southern breeze begins to fail,
And adverse winds from west and north prevail: 100
The sails are fur'd to shun the furious force
That drives the vessel from its destin'd course.
Four days in vain they plough the foamy sea,
In one they measure back their former way;
While from the land the careful pilot steers.
Where secret shelves and dangerous rocks he fears.
At length the wind that o'er the stormy main
Four days had driv'n them, chang'd its course again;
And let the shatter'd bark securely ride
Where Antwerp's river seeks the briny tide. 110

Soon as the crew, reliev'd from care and toil,
Had safely anchor'd on the friendly soil,
Lo! from the right, before them, came in view
An ancient sire with locks of silver hue,
Who, first to each his courteous greeting paid,
Bespoke Orlando whom he deem'd their head;
And, in his mistress' name, besought the knight,
To glad her sorrows with his welcome sight;
Who not alone the prize of beauty held,
But all her kind in virtuous gifts excell'd: 120
Or, if he rather chose awhile to stay,
Herself would to his vessel take her way:
For never warrior yet, by tempests tost,
Or led by land to that unhappy coast,
Refus'd to hear the dame her tale relate,
And give her counsel in her woeful state.

The gallant chief, whose pitying aid to gain
Misfortune never su'd, and su'd in vain,
Consents to quit the vessel, and pursue
The sage's steps, till near a pile they drew 130
Of stately frame, but fill'd with mournful gloom,
Where funeral black was held in every room.
Orlando here beheld a damsel fair,
Whose looks and gesture spoke her deep despair:
With gentle welcome she receiv'd the knight,
Then thus began her sorrows to relate:
"Know first, my lord, the hapless wretch you view
From Holland's earl her birth disastrous drew:
Two brothers did with me the blessing prove
Which children find in fond paternal love. 140
While thus domestic peace each hour endear'd,
The duke of Zealand at our court appear'd;
Who went a war against the Moors to wage,
In flower of beauty and in blooming age:
His person pleas'd, but more his passion gain'd,
And soon my easy heart in fetters chain'd.
While adverse winds forbade his purpos'd way,
Our mutual love beguil'd his lingering stay:
The time an age to his impatient crew,
With me, alas! how swift the moments flew! 150
And oft we vows exchang'd to join our hands,
At his return, in solemn nuptial bands.

"Scarce had our country was Bireno gone,
(The name by which my faithful love was known)

When Friza's king, who long with artful mind
 To wed me to his only son design'd,
 Arbantes nam'd, dispatch'd a courtly train
 My hand in marriage of my sire to gain:
 But I, who ne'er could change my constant love,
 Or so ungrateful to Bireno prove, 160
 Soon with my father all my power apply'd
 To set this fatal embassy aside:
 And said, 'I rather far would yield my life,
 Than e'er in Friza's realms be made a wife.'
 My loving sire, who all I ask'd approv'd,
 Who ne'er would view my breast with sorrow mov'd,
 To make me from my tears and plaints desist,
 Without consent th' ambassadors dismiss'd.
 At this with rage the king of Friza burn'd,
 And all his baughty soul to vengeance turn'd. 170
 Our lands he enter'd, and with carnage fill'd,
 In which, alas! my kindred all were kill'd.
 Besides his mighty strength, in arms beheld,
 That few his vigour, in our age, excell'd;
 He weapons us'd, to former times unknown,
 And, in the present, us'd by him alone.
 An iron tube he bore, whose womb enclos'd
 A ball and nitrous grain, with art compos'd.
 Now to a vent, scarce obvious to the sight,
 Behind the barrel he directs a light: 180
 A surgeon thus the lancet's point applies;
 The fatal bullet from the concave flies,
 With lightning flashes and with thunder's sound,
 And scatters death and desolation round.
 With this device our bands he twice o'erthrew
 In open field, and both my brethren slew.
 The elder first was doom'd the stroke to feel,
 His heart transpierc'd through plates of jointed steel:
 In vain the second strove from fate to fly;
 He, like his brother, was condemn'd to die. 190
 Sent from afar, the ball its force impress'd
 Fall at his back and issu'd at his breast.
 One only castle to my sire remain'd,
 Each other part the cruel king had gain'd.
 This while he sought to guard with fruitless care,
 He fell the last and victim of the war.
 The traitor mark'd him as he walk'd the round,
 And pierc'd his forehead with a mortal wound.
 "My sire and brethren slaughter'd, I remain'd
 The hapless heiress of my father's land. 200
 The king of Friza, who desir'd to gain
 A lasting footing in his new domain,
 On friendly terms propos'd the war to cease,
 And grant to me and mine a lasting peace,
 Would I consent to what I late deny'd,
 And yield to be his son Arbantes' bride.
 But this I still refus'd—my steadfast mind
 Detested justly him and all his kind.
 By him my sire and brethren's death I mourn'd,
 My country wasted and my cities burn'd. 210
 Still was I fix'd to shun the marriage bed,
 Till he return'd whom I had sworn to wed.
 To shake my stern resolves my people try,
 And every art of prayers and threats employ:
 When all their prayers and threats they found in
 But saw me still my purpose firm maintain, [vain,
 The terms with him agreed, themselves to save,
 Me and the fort into his hands they gave.
 "The king receiv'd me mildly, and assur'd
 My life and lands alike should rest secur'd, 220
 Would I my stubborn purpose yet forsake,
 And, for my spouse, his son Arbantes take.
 Thus cruelly beset on every side,
 I gladly would 'scape his power have dy'd.

Yet unreveng'd to die, had griev'd me more
 Than all the sufferings I endur'd before:
 But flinging, when I every thought had weigh'd,
 Dissembling could alone my purpose aid;
 To ask forgiveness of the past I feign'd,
 And gave consent to take Arbantes' hand. 230
 "Two brethren in my father's court were bred,
 Of loyal heart and of inventive head:
 To these my thoughts discover'd, they vow'd to join
 Their mutual aid to second my design.
 One, to secure my flight, a ship retain'd;
 One, near my person, at the court remain'd.
 "While strangers tow, and natives all were led
 To attend the nuptial rites, a rumour spread
 That, in Biscaina rais'd, a naval power
 Bireno brought to invade the Holland shore: 240
 For when in luckless fight our army fail'd,
 In which I first a brother's death bewail'd,
 With speed I sent to let my lover know
 The fatal inroad of our barbarous foe.
 Meanwhile the ruthless king his course pursu'd,
 Till all our realm his conquering arms subdu'd.
 Bireno, now, who heard not all was lost,
 Had loos'd his vessels from Biscaina's coast:
 These tidings to the king of Friza known,
 He left th' approaching nuptials to his son; 250
 And sailing with his fleet engag'd the duke,
 His ships destroy'd, and him a prisoner took.
 "Now had the youth my hand receiv'd, and led
 At night impatient to the nuptial bed.
 Soon as my faithful friend, who stood beside
 Conceal'd, the bridegroom drawing near esp'y'd,
 Behind him with an axe so fierce he struck,
 That life and speech at once the wretch forsook;
 As sinks the slaughter'd ox beam'd with gore,
 So fell Arbantes, born in luckless hour! 260
 Spite of Cymosco, doom'd his end to find,
 So call'd the king, the basest of mankind!
 By whom my sire and brethren found their fate,
 Who now, to ensure possession of my state,
 Espous'd me to his son—some future day
 To take perhaps my wretched life away.
 "My choicest treasures then secur'd, I flew
 The hated place, and with my guide withdrew,
 Whose trusty care my hasty steps convey'd
 To where his brother with the vessel stay'd. 270
 We court the winds, our oars divide the main,
 Till Heaven decrees us safe this land to gain.
 'Twere hard to tell which bore a greater part,
 Or grief, or rage, in fell Cymosco's heart:
 Grief for his hapless son depriv'd of breath,
 Or rage against the author of his death.
 He, with his joyful feet, the land regain'd,
 Elate with conquest, and Bireno chain'd,
 He came prepar'd a nuptial feast to share,
 And view'd his triumph chang'd to black despair.
 Nor day, nor night, he found a moment's rest, 281
 Revenge and sorrow rankling in his breast:
 But since the dead regard not all our grief,
 And hate from vengeance only finds relief;
 He murder'd those that friends to me were held,
 Their wealth he seiz'd; or from the realm expell'd
 The hapless train; a thousand schemes engage
 His cruel thoughts on me to mate his rage.
 The tyrant doubtless had Bireno slain,
 The greatest woe he knew I could sustain: 290
 But while he spar'd his life, he surely thought
 He held a net by which I might be caught.
 Before the youth he sets these terms severe:
 His fate he respite for a single year.

But death denounces then with lingering pain,
 Unless he first, by fraud or force, attain,
 By any means, my person to secure,
 And, sacrificing mine, his life ensure.
 Whate'er I could, except myself, I gave,
 Each art I try'd his dearest life to save. 300
 Six castles have I since in Flanders sold,
 And part employ'd in secret sums of gold
 To bribe his guards; and part employ'd t' excite
 German and English powers to do me right.
 Whether my envoys us'd their charge but ill,
 Or wanted means their purpose to fulfil,
 Instead of succour, words I found alone,
 Till with my riches all my hopes were flown.
 And now the fatal time is nearly clos'd,
 The period to Bireno's life propos'd, 310
 When force or gold will come too late to save
 My plighted consort from th' untimely grave.
 For him my all is lost;—and nought remains
 But now to yield these hands to cruel chains!
 Yet, ah! could this redeem the youth I love,
 My bosom dares the stern condition prove!
 But when th' usurper has my person gain'd,
 When I have all his vengeful wrath sustain'd,
 I fear he ne'er will set Bireno free,
 To owe his freedom and his life to me; 320
 That all I feel of slow-consuming pain
 Unblest Bireno must endure again.
 For this to you my fortune I unfold,
 And thus with many a warrior counsel hold,
 In hopes that some their succour may engage,
 That when I'm yielded to the tyrant's rage,
 He may not still in bonds my love detain,
 Or, when I'm dead, command him to be slain.
 But to this hour I ne'er have found a knight
 Who durst the sacred faith of knight-hood plight, 330
 To guard me from the king Cymoso's power
 Should he refuse Bireno to restore.
 So much his fatal arms their courage quell'd,
 Whose force no temper'd cuirass e'er repell'd.
 Now, if your valour not unlike is seen
 To your fierce semblance and Herculean mien;
 Vouchsafe with me to seek the Holland strand,
 And their resign me to his hated hand:
 So shall I firmly on your aid rely.
 That, though I fall, my lover will not die." 340
 The damsel here her mournful story clos'd,
 While oft her sighs and tears were interpos'd.
 Orlando then no time in speech affords,
 As one by nature little us'd to words †;
 But instant vows, by generous pity fir'd,
 To grant that aid her helpless state requir'd;
 Nor means she shall, to save Bireno, go
 A willing prisoner to her cruel foe;
 But thinks them both to safety to restore,
 If still his sword retain its wonted power. 350
 Now toward's the poet they bend their eager way,
 The prosperous winds their vessel swift convey:
 Orlando hastened, whose impatient mind
 To seek Ebuda's island had design'd.
 Now here, now there, the pilot shifts the sails,
 And cuts the deep before the driving gales.

† A French story on this subject was published in 1584, called Olympie; and another in 1605, called Les Amours d' Olympie et de Birene.

‡ Orlando is painted in the same manner in the Innamorato, ever ready to succour the distressed, but sparing of professions.

The isles of Zealand soon appear'd in view,
 Some sunk behind, as others nearer drew.
 The third auspicious morn the coast they gain'd:
 The champion landed, but the dame remain'd; 360
 Orlando will'd her, ere she trod the shore,
 To hear her foe Cymoso was no more.
 Himself descends the deck with ready speed,
 And sheath'd in armour mounts a dappled steed,
 In Flanders nourish'd, and of Danish race,
 More strong and bold than active in the chase:
 For when to cross the stream the bark he took,
 In Brittany his courser he forsook;
 The gallant Brigliadoro, who for fame,
 Alone was equall'd by Bayardo's name. 370
 Orlando soon the guarded fortress view'd,
 Where ready arm'd the hostile squadron stood
 To oppose invading force: for fame declar'd,
 A kinsman to th' imprison'd lord prepar'd
 From Zealand with a fleet and numerous host,
 To make a bold incursion on the coast.
 Orlando, fearless, one of these requir'd
 To tell the king, a wandering knight desir'd
 With sword or pointed spear to prove his might.
 On these conditions to commence the fight: 380
 The king, if he the challenger o'erthrew,
 Should have the lady that Arbantes slew:
 But on the other part the king should swear,
 That if himself were vaquish'd in the war,
 He would Bireno with his chains release,
 And give the youth to leave the realm in peace.

The soldier swift the bold defiance bore:
 But he, who ne'er was train'd to virtuous lore,
 Whose churlish soul no courteous deeds could bind,
 To fraudulent arts apply'd his treacherous mind, 390
 In hopes, if first his arms the knight detain,
 The hated damsel in his power to gain.

Now from the gate he sends a chosen force,
 That wheeling round the plain with silent course
 Cut off the foe's retreat; while vainly there
 Orlando waits to wage an equal war.
 The king deludes him still with fraudulent lies,
 Till he the foot and cavalry espies
 Rang'd at the destin'd place; and then in view
 Himself with others from the portal drew. 400
 As crafty fishers in Volana's tide ‡
 Surround the fish with nets on every side;
 Thus all his guile to seize alive the knight,
 With care providing to prevent his flight,
 Cymoso proves; and thinks the deed to find
 So certain, that he leaves his tube behind.
 Nor would he now those thundering arms employ,
 Where here he meant t' imprison, not destroy.
 So cautious fowlers, bent on greater gain,
 Preserve the birds that first their arts detain, 410
 Whose sportive play and songs may lure from far
 Their thoughtless fellows to the fatal snare.
 But little here his treacherous schemes avail'd;
 Against Orlando every treason fail'd.

The knight of Anglant now has couch'd his spear
 Where closely prest the men and arms appear:
 First one, and then another, helpless dies;
 Through six at once the lance impetuous flies,
 And in the seventh inflicts so deep a wound,
 That prone he tumbles lifeless to the ground. 420

‡ Volana, a town situated on the Po, near Pri-maio and Volano, two branches of that river. See note to b. iii. ver. 395.

Thus by some standing pool or marshy place,
We see an archer slay the croaking race
With pointed arrow, nor the slaughter leave
Till the full weapon can no more receive.

Orlando now his broken spear forsakes,
Grasp'd in his hand his fatal sword he takes,
That sword, which never yet in vain he drew,
Whene'er it fell, a foot or horseman slew:
At every blow he aims, the streaming blood
Stains their gay armour with a crimson flood. 430

Cymosco wishes now his tube and fire,
Where present dangers most their aid require;
He bids them straight be brought; but bids in vain,
Who once a shelter in the walls can gain,
Returns no more: when thus their fears he view'd,
The king, with equal fear, their steps pursu'd:
Swift through the gate he bent his eager flight,
And bade the bridge he rais'd t' oppose the knight;
But close behind, the knight with equal haste
Had gain'd the bridge and through the portal pass'd.
First of the troops the king impels his speed, 441
Rust in th' exelling swiftness of his steed.

Orlando heeded not th' ignoble crowd,
His vengeance only on the traitor vow'd;
But now the chase his horse so slowly plies,
One scarcely seems to move, while t' other flies.
Cymosco now is vanish'd from the view,
Yet soon, with different arms, returns anew;
With dreaded engine to resume the fight,
And lies in secret ambush for the knight. 450

The huntsman thus with dogs and sylvan war
Expects the boar descending from afar,
Whose rage upturns the soil, the trees destroys,
While all the wood rebellows to the noise!

Soon as the king the warrior near espies,
He fires the tube, and swift the bullet flies:
At once the lightning flashes, shakes the ground,
The trembling bulwarks echo to the sound,
The peat, that never spends in vain its force,
But shatters all that dares oppose its course, 460

Whizzing impetuous flies along the wind,
Yet miss'd the fatal mark the wretch design'd:
Whether his eagerness or haste conspir'd,
To make him fail where he so much desir'd;
Or whether, inly prest with panic fear,
His trembling heart had caus'd his hand to err;
Or whether Heaven's high will might so ordain,
That his lov'd champion should not thus be slain;
Beneath the knight the ball resistless flew,
And, through the belly pierc'd, the courser slew. 470

Both horse and horseman fell with clashing sound;
One press'd, the other scarcely touch'd the ground:
As once Antæus, on the Libyan strand,
More fierce recover'd when he reach'd the sand:
So seem'd to rise again with added might,
Soon as he felt the earth, the Christian knight.
Whene'er has seen the winged lightning fly
By Jove in thunder brandish'd from the sky,
And penetrate some secret cavern, stor'd

With nitrous powder and a sulphurous hoard, 480
At once inflam'd, with vast explosion driven,
The ruin seems to mingle Earth and Heaven;
The bursting fires the walls and buildings rend,
And to the stars the shatter'd stones ascend!
Resistless thus th' indignant chief appear'd,
When from the plain his mighty limbs he rear'd;
And with such rage to instant vengeance flew,
That Mars had trembled at the dreadful view.
The Frizeland monarch, struck with pale affright,
Whisp'rd round his horse to urge his eager flight:

With rapid speed his feet Orlando plies; 491
Less swift an arrow from the bowstring flies!
And where before his tardy courser fail'd,
(Wonderous to see!) his lighter feet prevail'd*.
Full soon th' impatient knight o'ertook the foe,
Then at his helmet aim'd a deadly blow:
Deep in his head the sword a passage found,
And sent the lifeless body to the ground.

Within the city now was heard afar
A different clamour and alarm of war: 500
Bireno's kinsman, who had gain'd the coast,
And found the guards deserted from their post,
The portal enter'd with his eager band,
And cour'd the city round on every hand:

While none attempt his purpose to molest,
Such dread Orlando on their minds impress'd:
Nor less the Holland troops confess their fear,
Unconscious whence or why these foes appear:
But when they noted, by their speech and dress,
These came from Zealand's isle, they suit'd for peace;
And proffer'd to the chief their willing aid 511
'Gainst those who had their lord in prison laid.

This people ever to the Frizeland power,
And to their king, a settled hatred bore;
Urg'd by his avarice, cruelty, and pride,
By whom their lov'd, their hapless sovereign died.

Orlando, friend to either, interpos'd;
And soon in lasting peace the parties clos'd;
Thus join'd, they then their common foes pursue,
And all of Friza prisoners made or slew. 520

* As bold as this hyperbole may appear in Ariosto, instances may be found equally strong in the poets. Aruns, in Virgil, terrified at the slaughter made by Camilla in the Trojan army, in order to escape, craftily urges her to alight from her horse to engage him on foot: Aruns then claps spurs to his horse, and flies with all speed from the battle: but the virgin, though on foot, soon outstripe him, and kills him in the same manner as is here related of Orlando and Cymosco:

He, like a true Ligurian, born to cheat,
(At least while fortune favour'd his deceit)
Cries out aloud, "What courage have you shown,
Who trust your courser's strength, and not your own?
Forgo the vantage of your horse, alight, [own?
And then on equal terms begin the fight:
It shall be seen, weak woman, what you can,
When foot to foot you combat with a man."
He said: she glows with anger and disdain,
Dismounts with speed to dare him on the plain;
And leaves her horse at large among her train;
With her drawn sword denies him to the field,
And marching lifts aloft her maiden shield:
The youth, who thought his cunning did succeed,
Reins round his horse and urges all his speed,
Adds the remembrance of the spur, and hides
The goring rowels in his bleeding sides.
"Vain fool, and coward!" said the lofty maid,
"Caught in the train, which thou thyself hast laid:
On others practise thy Ligurian arts:
Thin stratagems and tricks of little hearts
Are lost on me; nor shalt thou safe retire.
With vaunting lies to thy fallacious sire."
At this, so fast her flying feet she sped,
That soon she strain'd beyond his horse's head;
Then, turning short, at once she seiz'd the rein,
And laid the boaster grovelling on the plain.

Dryden, Æn. b. xi. var. 1038.

The prison gates they from their hinges broke,
 And threw to earth: Bireno now forsook
 His dreary cell; and gave, for life restor'd,
 His grateful praises to Anglante's lord.
 Then, with a numerous train, he sought the strand
 Where fair Olympia in the ship remain'd:
 So was the virgin nam'd whose rightful sway
 The Holland realms should by descent obey.
 The people honour her with dutious zeal;
 What fond endearments pass'd, were long to tell;
 How oft with joy the tender pair caress'd; 531
 Or to the valiant earl their thanks express'd.
 Her subjects then, their vow'd allegiance paid,
 To her paternal seat restor'd the maid;
 While she consign'd to love Bireno's hand,
 Herself, her people, and recover'd land.
 He, other thoughts revolving in his mind,
 The earldom to his cousin's care resign'd.
 To Zealand thence he purpos'd to remove
 With her, the dearest object of his love; 540
 To tempt his fortune next in Friza's land,
 For which he held a precious pledge in hand,
 A daughter to the king deceas'd, whom there
 A captive found, he took beneath his care,
 And to his brother meant to wed the blooming fair.

The Roman warrior⁷ now the place forsook,
 The day Bireno he from prison took:
 But nothing would the champion bear away,
 From all the spoils of that victorious day,
 Save that device, whose unresisted force 550
 Resembled thunder in its rapid course.

Yet not for his defence the gallant knight
 E'er meant t' avail him of such arms in fight:
 His generous soul th' ignoble thought disdain'd,
 To seek the field, with such an aid sustain'd;
 For different purpose thence the prize he bore,
 The powder, balls, and all the deathful store;
 Resolv'd the murdering engine to remove,
 Where man might never more its fury prove.
 Soon as he saw the ship forsake the coast, 560
 When to the sight the lessening land was lost;
 When nought appear'd but waves on every side;
 He held it in his hand, and thus he cry'd:

"That ne'er again a knight by thee may dare,
 Or dastard cowards, by thy help in war,
 With vantage base, assault a nobler foe,
 Here lie for ever in th' abyss below!
 O curst device!⁸ base implement of death!
 Fram'd in the black Tartarcan realms beneath!
 By Beelzebub's malicious art⁹ design'd, 570
 To ruin all the race of human-kind;

⁷ Orlando, called by Pulci and Boyardo, il senatore Romano, il cavalier Romano: the Roman senator, the Roman knight.

⁸ Mr. Mickle observes very well on this passage: "Orlando, having taken the first invented cannon from the king of Friza, throws it into the sea with the most heroic execrations. Yet the heroes of chivalry think it no disgrace to take every advantage afforded by invulnerable hides and enchanted armour." Note to xth Lusind.

On this subject see further note to book xi. ver. 170, of this translation.

⁹ Thus Milton imputes the invention of artillery to the devil. See Paradise Lost, b. vi.

It is very extraordinary that Mr. Addison, in his observations on Paradise Lost, should take no notice, that Milton apparently took the hint of his

Hence, to thy native scat!¹⁰—He said, and gave
 The ponderous engine to the greedy wave.

Now the swift winds the swelling sails extend,
 And to the cruel isle their course they bend.
 So burns the knight impatient to explore
 The fatal prisons of Ebuda's shore,
 For her, whose charms above the world be priz'd,
 For whom he every joy of life despis'd!
 He fears to touch Hibernia in his way, 580
 Lest some adventure should prolong his stay:
 Nor England then, nor Ireland's coast he makes,
 Nor any respite in his voyage takes.
 But let him go, with Love his blindfold guide,
 Whose arrows in his bleeding heart are dy'd.
 Of him no further here the Muse proceeds,
 But now our steps again to Holland leads:
 For 't would dispense us to be absent thence,
 When festiye mirth and sport their joys dispense.

Though the bright pomp that riches can display
 Was us'd to celebrate the nuptial day, 591
 With more magnificence the Zealand race
 Prepar'd the union of their lord to grace.
 Yet all in vain such thoughts their mind employ,
 A sudden change must damp each promis'd joy!
 Which in th' ensuing book shall next appear;
 If you th' ensuing book vouchsafe to hear.

BOOK X.

THE ARGUMENT.

Continuation of the story of Olympia. Rogero travels towards the country of Logistilla, and arrives safely at her castle, Alcina in vain endeavouring to oppose him. Description of the beauties of the habitation of Logistilla. The departure of Rogero and Astolpho, the former of whom returns with the griffin-horse to Europe; in his flight, he visits England, where he is present at a review of the forces that had been raised to assist Charlemain. He then passes near the island of Ebuda, where he sees Angelica bound to a rock, ready to be devoured by the sea-monster.

Among the faithful hearts whose constant love
 Nor time can change, nor fortune's frowns remove,
 Olympia fair may boast the brightest name:
 Or should another equal merit claim,
 Yet past nor present days e'er set to view
 A flame more tender and a breast more true.
 What stronger tokens could Bireno find
 To speak the firmness of a lover's mind?
 Whose faith untainted, for its just reward, 10
 Requir'd his gratitude and sole regard.
 No other dame should lure him from her arms,
 Not she, whose face¹ fill'd Asia with alarms;
 Or one, could one be found, of more exalted
 charms;
 Far rather let him quit his life and fame,
 And every good that bears the dearest name.

artillery among the devils from Ariosto; but the truth, I believe, is, that Italian literature was then little attended to.

But if Bireno, faithful to the maid,
 With equal warmth her matchless truth repay'd;
 If, join'd with her, he stemm'd the constant tide,
 Nor ever turn'd his changing sails aside,
 Soon shall we tell; and when the truth you know,
 Rage shall contract the lip and bend the brow. 21
 Who, gentle virgins! will again receive
 The words of lovers, or their oaths believe!
 The youth, who pants to gain the amorous prize,
 Forgets that Heaven with all-discerning eyes,
 Surveys the secret heart; and when desire
 Has, in possession, quench'd its short-liv'd fire,
 The devious winds aside each promise bear,
 And scatter all his solemn vows in air!
 Warn'd by the Muse's voice, with cautious ear, 30
 The well-feign'd plaints and seeming sorrows hear!
 Reflect, ye gentle dames! that much they know,
 Who gain experience from another's woe.
 Ah! by the dangerous train, whose looks disclose
 The flowery bloom that early youth bestows;
 Where each warm passion bursts with sudden blaze,
 Which soon again, like stubble fir'd, decays.
 As on the hill or plain the hunter's race
 The trembling hare, in every season, chase;
 But view, when taken, with a cold survey, 40
 And only seek with joy the flying prey:
 So while you shun their love, the youthful crew
 Attend your every glance, with ardent sue,
 To gain your smiles—but when your smiles they gain,
 Lost are the trophies of your boasted reign!
 From your high state to abject slaves debas'd,
 While on another's charms their wavering hearts are plac'd!

Yet think not that my verse forbids to love,
 Such thoughts far distant from your hard remove!
 The lonely maid is like the vine, that knows 50
 No friendly elm with tendrils to enclose,
 But creeps neglected—yet, ye virgin-fair,
 The down of young inconstancy beware;
 Let not th' unripen'd fruits your care engage,
 Nor gather those too far matur'd with age.

Bireno, as my tale before explain'd,
 Cymoso's daughter in his power detain'd,
 Whom, in his secret soul, he first design'd
 In marriage with his brother to be join'd. 60
 But soon new passions in his bosom rise,
 He views, and envies him so rich a prize;
 Nor thinks another should by him obtain
 That treasure, which himself aspires to gain.

Scarce fourteen summers had the virgin seen,
 Sweet were her looks, her gesture and her mien,
 So infant roses from the bud display
 Their opening beauties to the genial ray.

When first he view'd her lovely features spread
 With pious tears to 'wail a father dead,
 What sudden warmth possess'd his beating heart!
 Not half so swift the flames their rage impart, 71
 Where hostile force or envious hands conspire
 To give the ripen'd corn to wasting fire!
 Sate with love and cloy'd with full delight,
 Olympia now was hateful in his sight:
 But yet so far he veil'd his guileful thought,
 Till time his purpos'd scheme to action brought,
 He seem'd for fair Olympia still to prove
 A tender truth that answer'd all her love!
 Or if, perchance by sudden impulse sway'd, 80
 Unguarded he caress'd the Frizeland maid,
 None censur'd what they saw, but each inclin'd
 To ascribe it to a good and pious mind.

To every generous deed our praise we owe,
 To raise the wretch whom fortune whirls below;
 To sooth the anguish of a heart distress'd;
 Much more an orphan with her woes oppress'd.

O gracious Heaven! how oft do clouds abuse
 Weak mortals' eyes, and bound their partial views!
 Bireno's foul and impious deeds appear 90
 The pious tokens of a soul sincere.

Now seize the ready mariners their oars,
 And, launching in the waves, forsake the shores;
 With joyful strokes they cleave the briny main
 To bear along Bireno and his train.

Behind they leave low Holland's marshy coast,
 Which quickly to the flying sight is lost:
 To shun the Frizeland realm aside they steer,
 While nearer Scotland to the left they veer.

At length o'er'taken by a devious blast, 100
 Three days uncertain, o'er the billows cast,
 The third they saw, as near the evening drew,
 A wild and desert isle arise to view.

Soon as the vessel to a creek they bore,
 Bireno with Olympia went on shore:
 Beneath a tent the slaves their cates prepar'd,
 The unsuspecting dame the banquet shar'd,

Then to the couch, for gentle slumber dress'd,
 Contented, with her lord retir'd to rest;
 While to their bark the weary crew retreat, 110
 And, sunk in sleep, their former toils forget.

In sweet oblivion lost, Olympia lay,
 Tir'd with the labours of the watery way:
 In her calm breast no irksome fears arose;
 Such fears as once had banish'd her repose.

Herself she view'd in safety on the shore,
 'Midst the deep silence of the midnight hour,
 Her lover at her side: but slumber fled
 His eyes, whose waking thoughts deep treason bro'd.

Soon as he sees her wrapt in sleep*, he takes 120
 With speed his vesture, and the bed forsakes;
 Then, as if borne along the wings of wind,
 Flies to the ship, and leaves the tent behind:

Silent he wakes his mates, and gives command
 To lurch into the deep and quit the land.
 Unblest Olympia on the shore remain'd,
 Whom long the pleasing bands of sleep restrain'd,

Till from her golden wheels Aurora threw,
 On verdant meads, the drops of sparkling dew;
 And on the margin of the wavy flood 130
 Aleyone her ancient plaints renew'd:

When now, nor scarce asleep, nor yet awake,
 She thought Bireno in her arms to take:
 Her touch deceiv'd; again she backward drew;
 Then fondly stretch'd her longing arms anew.

* The reader will see that this whole passage, where Bireno forsakes Olympia, is copied from the story of Theseus and Ariadne.

See Ovid's Epistles, Ariadne to Theseus.

† Thus Ovid:

Teropus erat, vitrea quo primum terra pruina
 Spargitur, et lectæ fronde queruntur aves.
 Now earth first glitters with the morning dew,
 And birds, in bowery shades, their plaints renew.

‡ Ovid exactly:

Incertum virgilis, a somno languida, movi,
 Thesea prensurata semisupina roanua.
 Nullus erat: referoque manus, iterumque retento,
 Perque torum moxve brachia: nullus erat.

See the whole Epistle.

At length, dispell'd by fear, her slumber fled ;
 Her looks, and looking sees the abandon'd bed.
 Her griefs increasing as her fears augment,
 She quits the couch, and issues from the tent.
 While to the sea she runs with headlong pace, 140
 And fiods, alas ! too certain her disgrace.
 She beats her breast and face, her hair she rends,
 While on the shore her frighted look she bends.
 The favouring Moon her trembling beam supplies,
 Yet nought hut sea and desert land she spies ;
 She calls Bireno's name ; the caves around
 With pity to Bireno's name resound.

A rock beside the ocean's limits stood,
 That, worn by surges, belly'd o'er the flood :
 To the high summit swift Olympia flew, 150
 Such added vigour from despair she drew :
 Thence from afar beheld the parting sails
 Of false Bireno drive before the gales :
 She saw, or seem'd to see : for yet the light
 Could scarce dispel the sullen shades of night.
 Trembling she falls : a chilly sweat invades
 Her alter'd visage, and her colour fades.
 But, when recover'd, with her fruitless cries
 She calls the vessel, while the vessel flies ;
 And where her lips refuse their accents weak, 160
 Her clasping hands and frantic gestures speak.

 Thy bark has left her dearest freight behind !
 Return—return—and since thou bear'st away
 My better part, O take this lifeless clay.”

While thus she spoke, her garments in her hand
 She wav'd, to lure the vessel back to land.
 But the same winds that through the billows bear
 His swelling sails, disperse her plaints in air.
 Thrice, cruel to herself, she thought to throw 170
 Her wretched body in the sea below.

At length she ceas'd to view the shores in vain,
 And sought, with feeble steps, the tent again.

Her face reclining on the conscious bed,
 She pour'd a shower of plenteous tears, and said :

“ Last night in thee, alas ! two lovers lay ;
 Why did not two together rise to day !
 Forsworn Bireno ! fatal was the birth
 That gave accurst Olympia to the Earth !
 Where shall I turn !—no human forms appear, 180
 No marks of human industry are here !

From pining hunger must I find my doom,
 Where none shall lay me in the silent tomb ;
 But savage wolves, that howl in every cave,
 Shall in their wombs afford a dreadful grave !
 Now, now, methinks, so swift is fear, I view
 Yon dreary shades send forth their murderous crew :
 Bears, lions, tigers, beasts that Nature arms
 With sharpen'd teeth and claws for human harms.
 But ah ! what death so dire can these bestow 190
 As thou, ungrateful author of my woe !

These will but once my wretched carcass tear,
 By thee, alas ! a thousand deaths I bear.
 What if some pilot, wandering o'er the deep,
 Should take me hence in safety to his ship ;
 That thus the lions, bears, and wolves I 'scape,
 Or want, and death in every horrid shape ;
 Shall I to Holland fly, where thy command
 Defends the harbour, and forbids to land ?
 How shall I seek again my natal shore, 200
 When thou, by fraud, hast made it mine no more ?

How ready did thy troops their post maintain,
 To take possession of their new-found reign !
 Shall I to Flanders turn ? for thee, the rest
 I sold, the little that I there possess'd :

All was employ'd, ingrate ! to set thee free—
 What crime will now receive unhappy me !
 Shall I the realm of Priza seek to gain,
 Where once for thee I scorn'd a queen to reign,
 And hence my brethren and my sire were slain ?
 But wherefore should I seek my deeds to tell,
 Or paint th' affection thou hast known so well !
 Then claims a love like mine no more regard ?
 Is this, unjust Bireno, my reward ?
 Perhaps some pirate, that infests the wave,
 May seize and snatch me hence a helpless slave !
 Ah ! rather, come each roaring savage here !
 Let dreadful lions, tigers, wolves appear ;
 With rending claws this panting body tear,
 And to their den my limbs dismember'd bear !” 220

While thus she spoke, her furious hands she
 And rent the golden tresses from her head : [spread,
 Again she sought the beach in wild despair,
 Loose to the breezes flow'd her scatter'd hair.
 With more than mortal rage she seem'd possess'd,
 As if some demon struggled in her breast :

Like Hecuba, when on the Thracian shore
 Breathless she view'd her murder'd Polydore ;
 Till, seated on a rock, in doleful mood 230
 She seem'd a statue hanging o'er the flood.

But let her for awhile her sorrows mourn,
 Now to Rogero must the story turn ;
 Who midst the burning of meridian day
 Along the sands pursu'd his weary way.
 On his bright arms the Sun its beams impress'd,
 And his hot cuirass glow'd upon his breast.
 While thus beside the ocean fled the knight,
 Fatigue and thirst companions of his fight ;
 Beneath the shadow of an ancient tower
 He saw three damsels landed on the shore, 240
 Whom, by their vestments and their outward port,
 He knew belong'd to false Alcina's court.
 On Alexandrian carpets vases plac'd,
 With wines and costly cakes allur'd the taste,
 Their bark attending at the strand was ty'd,
 Where the calm waters gently lay'd its side,
 In expectation till the sleeping gales
 Should rise again to fill the flagging sails.

When near Rogero drew, whose lips appear'd
 All parch'd with thirst, his face with dust besmear'd, 250
 With courteous mien the dames address'd the knight,
 And begg'd him from his course to alight,
 With them awhile in sweet retirement laid,
 To rest his weary limbs beneath the shade.

And now prepar'd a smiling damsel stands
 To hold his stirrup with officious hands ;
 Another lifts on high the sparkling bowl,
 And with a fiercer thirst inflames his soul.
 But he, who knew the time forbade delay,
 Regardless of their wiles, still held his way. 260
 Not with such fury, touch'd by sudden fire,
 From nitrous salt or sulphur, flames expire :
 Not with such rage the foamy waves ascend,
 When o'er the deep tempestuous clouds extend ;
 As one amidst the damsel train, with spite,
 And row'd revenge, pursu'd the warrior's flight.

“ Thou art not,” loud exclaiming, thus she cry'd,
 “ A knight, nor yet to gentle blood ally'd !
 The arms thou wear'st, thy theft alone could gain ;
 Thy theft alone that generous steel obtain :” 270

* He returns to Olympia in the next book,
 ver. 216.

Soon shall I see thee yield thy dastard breath
By cutt'd hands and by a shameful death!
Thy worthless ashes scatter'd to the wind,
Lugrate and proud! the scandal of thy kind!"

These words and more, from passions swelling high,

Rogero heard, but deign'd not to reply:
Then, with her sisters⁶, where their vessel lay,
She went on board, and through the watery way
Urg'd all her speed, and, hastening every oar,
Pursu'd his course along the winding shore; 280
While her foul lips, accustom'd well to rail,
With every keen reproach his ears assail.

Now view'd Rogero, with a glad survey,
Where 'cross the narrow seas his passage lay
To Logistilla; whence he soon espied
An ancient sire, that from the adverse side
Unmoor'd his bark: the knight's approach he knew,
And gladly waited till he came in view.

Soon as he saw him pacing o'er the sand,
He came prepar'd to waft him from the land. 290
A man might in the pilot's features find
The traces of a just, benignant mind.

With thanks to Heaven the bark Rogero takes,
And issuing to the sea the strand forsakes;
Still as he pass'd discoursing with the sage,
By long experience taught and wise with age.

The pilot much extoll'd the youthful knight,
Who timely from Alcina took his flight,
T' escape her snares; and now with purer thought
The virtuous domes of Logistilla sought; 300
Whose everlasting joys such sweets dispense,
As feed the soul, yet never cloy the sense.

"Where she," he cried, "can once her power
impart,

With reverential awe she fills the heart:
Till by her beauties fir'd, the purer mind
Casts every abject pleasure far behind!
Reverie from earthly love her love appears,
That fills the breast with anxious hopes and fears;
Is this, desire can claim no greater store,
Views, is happy, and can ask no more! 310

She will to nobler feats your thoughts advance,
Than singing, bathing, tilting, and the dance;
Teach how th' expanded soul can mount on high,
Beyond the cloudy vapours of the sky;
And how on Earth the mortal part may prove
A taste of peace that crowns the blest above."

Thus speaking, through the flood the pilot steer'd,
While distant yet the safer shore appear'd:
When lo! a numerous sail of ships they 'spy'd,
That with spread canvass skimm'd along the tide.

With these Alcina came; and with her drew, 321
Fir'd with her past affront, a powerful crew;
Resolv'd t' expose her person and her reign,
Her lately ravish'd treasure to regain.

Though love not slightly urg'd her secret heart,
Yet indignation bore an equal part:
Their dashing oars so swift the seamen ply,
To either land the frothy waters fly:

* "By these three damsels are figur'd the allurements and batteries of the world; and by Rogero, who refuses to comply with their invitation, a wise man, who adheres to the path of virtue: the ill language given to Rogero is the abuse thrown out by the vulgar on those who despise common pleasures: the pilot, that takes him on board, denotes perfect judgment." Valvasori Porcacchi.

Resound the seas; resounds each crooked shore,
And Echo, from her caves, returns the roar. 330

"Now, now, thy magic shield, Rogero, show,
Or yield thy life, or freedom to the foe!"

Thus Logistilla's pilot eager cried,
And at the word, he threw the veil aside,
Reveal'd the dazzling light, whose beams expos'd
In darkness every hostile eye-lid clos'd:
Some headlong quit the prow; while others fall
From the high poop: one sleep o'erwhelms them all!

A sentinel, that on the watch-tower stood,
Beheld Alcina's vessels in the flood: 340

The bell then gave th' alarm—a warrior band
Pour'd from the fort and crowded all the strand;
Th' artillery⁷ from the walls its rage employ'd,
Which, like a storm, Rogero's foes annoy'd;
And thus from every part assistance came,
To save his life, his liberty and fame.

Of beauteous form, four virgins⁸ trod the shore,
Whom Logistilla timely sent before:

Fair Andronica, first in valour plac'd,
The wise Phronesia, and Dicilla chaste, 350
With pure Sophrosyne, who ever press'd
In sacred virtue's cause above the rest.

Beneath the castle, in the sheltering bay,
A numerous fleet of mighty vessels lay:
At every signal given by day or night,
Prepar'd to sail and ready mann'd for fight.

Thus either force once more to combat drew,
And both by land and sea the war renew;
By which the kingdom was again restor'd
Which once Alcina conquer'd by the sword. 360

What various chances in the field are tried,
And who the fate of battles can decide!

Alcina, anxious to prevent his flight,
Not only lost her lover and her knight,
But from that fleet, whose countless sails display'd
Cast o'er the subject seas a dreadful shade,
While on the rest the flames resistless fed,
Scarce with one bark, alone, escaping fled.

Thus fled Alcina, while her bands were slain,
Enslav'd, or burnt, or whelm'd beneath the main.
But fir'd Rogero most her plaints she pour'd, 371
His loss; o'er every woe, her soul deplor'd.
For this, each night, each day she breath'd her sighs,

For this the sorrows trickled from her eyes;
While oft reflection added to her grief,
That death refus'd to yield her pains relief.
No fairy's life the hand of fate restrains,

While Phoebus shifts his place or Heaven remains;
Else Clotho⁹ sure a welcome aid had sped,
And parted with the shears her fatal thread: 380

⁷ It appears doubtful what the poet here means by artillery; some commentators explain it to be the machines used by the ancients for throwing great stones.

⁸ Andronica represents Fortitude; Phronesia, Prudence; Sophrosyne, Temperance; and Dicilla, Justice: these are the four virtues that deliver men from the hands of Alcina or Vice. Dolce.

⁹ One of the Parcae, or three fatal sisters, whose office was to preside over the thread of life; their names were Clotho, Lachesis and Atropos. Clotho held the distaff; Lachesis wound off the wool; and Atropos cut the thread: but Ariosto has ascribed this task to Clotho.

Her own right hand had rais'd the sword, t' expel
Her sufferings, as Phœnician Dido fell:
Or like the queen of Nilus¹⁰, had she prov'd
The poisonous asp, and every care remov'd!

But let us leave Alcina¹¹ in her pain,
And to renown'd Rogero turn the strain,
Who, disembarking, trod the friendly shores
With grateful thanks to Heaven's protecting power,
And with impatient steps his way pursu'd
To where the fairy's stately palace stood. 390
For strength or show no place with this could vie,
But the bright mansions of th' eternal sky.
Thick-set with stones that dart their mingled rays,
The walls, with more than mortal lustre, blaze!
Not so the diamond shifts its trembling beam;
Not so the ruby flames with ruddy gleam.
On these immortal gems who turns his eyes,
Beholds the mind in all her colours rise;
Each fault, each virtue views; nor flattery's dress
Can bind his soul, nor envy's tongue depress. 400
And he, O Phœbus! who can these display,
Without thy aid, creates another day:
'T were hard to tell which claim'd the nobler part,
The rich materials, or the forming art!

Here rais'd aloft, on sumptuous arches high,
That seem'd the vast supporters of the sky,
Were spacious gardens, which for æthereous show
Might vanquish others stretch'd on plains below.
Amidst the shining battlements were seen
The trees of odorous scent, with branches green,
Where the fruit ripens, and the blossom blows, 411
Through every season that the Sun bestows.
No plants like these in earthly soils arise,
Nor autumn there such grateful shade supplies;
Like these no violets or lilies bloom,
No roses breathe like these a rich perfume;
Not such the mortal amarantline bowers,
Or fragrant jessamine, where short-liv'd flowers
Sbrunk with each blast, with every heat decay'd,
Ere yet they flourish, droop their heads and fade:
But here perpetual verdure clothes the ground, 421
And with perpetual sweets the flowers are crown'd.
Not that benignant Nature so ordains,
Or with a kindlier power their life sustains,
But Logistilla, by her skillful care,
Without the help of suns or genial air,
What to a vulgar thought may strange appear,
Maintains eternal spring throughout the year.

The fairy-dame her pleasure testify'd
To see with her so brave a knight reside: 430
While every one by her example strove
To show the warrior greater marks of love.
Astolpho, who ere this her palace gain'd,
With friendly looks Rogero entertain'd;
Soon came the rest, who, in a happy hour,
Regain'd their shapes by sage Melissa's power.

Rogero and Astolpho now address
The dame with grateful thanks, and humbly press
Their fair dismission thence: Melissa joins
The just request, and seconds their designs. 440

To whom the fairy courteously replied,
She would for either warrior's way provide.
Then with herself she secret counsel took
How best t' assist Rogero and the duke;

¹⁰ Cleopatra, queen of Egypt.

¹¹ Alcina appears no more in the course of this work.

At length resolv'd the horse that soar'd in air,
To Aquitanian shores the first should bear.
She now prepar'd a bit, with curbing rein,
To rule the courser and his speed restrain;
This done, with care she next instructs the knight
To bid him rise or lower in his flight; 450
To urge his swifter pace, or in a ring
To make him wheel, or hang upon the wing:
Till as the experienc'd horseman rules the horse,
And o'er the plains below directs his course,
With equal ease the warrior soon bestrides,
And through the fields of air the courser guides.
The brave Rogero hasten'd to depart,
But first his leave he took with grateful heart,
And, flying, left her pleasing seats behind,
Her goodness ever treasur'd in his mind. 460
Now let us follow his adventurous flight,
And after tell how England's noble knight,
With greater length of time and heavier pain,
Return'd to Gallia's court and Charlemain.

A different way the champion meant to soar
Than that which late compell'd he pass'd before,
When the fierce griffin whirl'd him first away,
While lands and pathless seas beneath him lay.
In his first flight he left the Spanish strands,
And pass'd direct to India's distant lands; 470
To India's lands where swells the Eastern main,
Where the two fairies held divided reign;
But now would visit other climes than those
Where blustering Eolus for ever blows¹²;
Nor thinks his purpos'd journey to conclude,
Till, like the Sun, he round the Earth has view'd.
O'er spacious Quinsai he directs his way,
Thence viewing Mongians and Catha;
And now o'er Imaüs his sight he takes,
Then Sericana to the left forsakes: 480
Still more declining from the Scythian cold,
To where th' Hircanian sea his billows roll'd;
At length Salmatia's ample realm he found,
And, leaving Asia, enter'd Europe's bound;
There, stretch'd beneath his eyes in wide survey,
Russia, Prutenia, and Pomeria lay.

Though Bradamant with love Rogero fir'd,
Though every hope to see the maid conspir'd;
Yet could he not the pleasure now restrain
To journey thus o'er cities, land, and main. 490
But he to Poland and Hungaria flew,
Till wide Germania's plains appear'd in view;
And every other barbarous region cross'd,
He came at length to England's distant coast¹³.

Yet deem not here, my lord, th' advent'rous
knight
Unceasing still pursu'd so long a flight,
Each closing eye, his courser's speed repress,
He chose some fair retreat for ease and rest:
One morn he reach'd fair London's stately towers,
And stay'd his course by Thames' fair winding shores, 500

¹² Rogero, in his first flight, had passed over the vast Atlantic ocean, where Eolus is said to blow continually, as the sea is supposed to be moov'd particularly under the dominion of the winds.

¹³ Ultima Iughiterra—
Thus Horace:

— in ultimos
Orbis Britannice—
Likewise Virgil, Eclog. 1.

— pennis toto divinis orbe Britannicis,

Whose neighbouring meads display'd a mighty force
Of hardy warriors, mingled foot and horse,
That to the martial life and trumpet's sound
In beautiful order stretch'd their ranks around,
The good Rinaldo¹⁴ these to battle led,
The first of knights, and of a host the head!
Who came, ambassador from Charlemain,
Assistance on the British coast to gain.

Rogero near the place, by fortune, drew,
Just as each squadron pass'd in fair review: 510

And now alighting with a swift descent,
He ask'd a warrior what the concourse meant,
To him the courteous stranger thus replied:
"These troops, whose banners all the country hide,
From Scotland, Ireland, and from England's soil
Arrive, and some from every neighbouring isle:
The ready vessels in the harbour stand,
To waft them safely to the Gallic land.
The powers of France, besieg'd by Pagan force,
In these supplies have plac'd their last resource:
But that your eyes may every squadron know, 521
Attend while I their different nations show¹⁵.

"Yon ensign view, where waving in the wind
Appear the fleur-de-lys and leopards join'd:
That trophy'd sign the gallant chief displays,
Whose sovereign rule each subject band obeys:
Amidst these warriors mighty is his fame,
And Lionel his ever honour'd name;
The duke of Lancaster, of valour try'd,
Is counsel sage and to the king ally'd. 530

The banner next behold, that, rang'd behind,
Streams towards the hills and trembles in the wind;
With three white wings upon a verdant field,
By mighty Richard, earl of Warwick, held,
Intrepid Gloster's duke the standard rears,
Where the stag's head with branching horns appears.
The duke of Clarence brings a torch of light;
The duke of York reveals a tree in sight:

¹⁴ Rinaldo is mentioned again in the sixth book, ver. 705.

¹⁵ The following review of the forces, it is feared, will appear but ungraceful in English, from the familiarity of the names and titles, which are with difficulty to be reduced to English verse, though they have a different effect in the original: the Italians, from the genius of their language, and the liberty they are accustomed to take with proper names, give a uniformity to different sounds, and soften them to their own tongue: but it was thought a license of this kind could not be taken in the translation with the well-known English titles.

This passage is imagined by some to be intended by the poet as a compliment to the British nobility. The description of the several leaders, with their arms, banners, and whimsical devices, is exactly in the spirit of chivalry: thus Don Quixote, taking the two flocks of sheep for armies, paints their fancied appearance, in the following manner, to Sancho: "The knight you see yonder with the gilded armour, who bears in his shield a lion crowned couchant at a damsel's foot, is the valorous Laurencio, lord of the silver bridge: the other, with the armour flowered with gold, who bears three crowns argent in a field azure, is the formidable Micoccolambo, grand duke of Quercia, &c."

See Jarvis's Don Quixote, vol. i. b. iii. c. iv.

See! Norfolk's duke the banner'd sign advance,
That, in three pieces, gives a shiver'd lance, 540
The noble earl of Kent the thunder bears:

The griffin next, the earl of Pembroke wears,
The balance there the duke of Suffolk akes;
The earl of Essex holds the yoke and makes;
And yonder garland in an azure shield
Northumberland produces in the field.
Behold the earl of Arundel, who shows
A sinking vessel where the ocean flows:

See! Berkeley's gallant marquis next appear;
The earl of March, in equal splendour near; 550
The first, in white, has giv'n a cloven mound;
A palm is in the second banner found,
And in the third a pine in surges drown'd.
The earls of Ancaster and Dorset, known
One by the ear, the other by the crown.

That falcon on his nest, with plumage spread,
By Raymond earl of Devonshire is led,
See Winchester the black and yellow wear;
Derby the bound, and Oxford has the bear.
The prelate of the Bath, amidst his peers 560
For riches fam'd, a cross of crystal rears.

There Somerset's great duke attracts the gaze,
Who, strange device! a broken seat displays,
Of heavy arm'd, and archers on the steed,
Full forty thousand to the fight proceed;
And thrice as many of the footmen-train,
Beat with their steps the far-resounding plain.
See! where they throng, with various ensigns
spread;

By Godfrey, Henry, Herman, Edward, led,
The first for duke of Buckingham is known; 570
The next is for the earl of Salisbury shown.
Then Abergarnny comes, advanc'd in years;
Last Edward, earl of Shirewsbury, appears,
All these that stretch along the eastern lands,
Compose the numbers of the English bands.

Now view the west, and forty thousand there
Of hardy Scotchmen wave their signs in air.
Yon lion, plac'd two unicorns between,
That rampant with a silver sword is seen,
Is for the king of Scotland's banner known; 580
Zerbino¹⁶ there encamps, his gallant son!

No form so graceful can your eyes behold,
For Nature made him, and destroy'd her mould.
The title of the duke of Ross he bears,
No chief with him for dauntless mind compares.
The earl of Athol next unfolds to view
A gilded bar upon a field of blue.
The neighbouring banner by the duke of Mar
is rais'd, who brings a leopard to the war.

See! gallant Alcabron, his standard brought 590
With various fancy'd birds and colours fraught;
Of no degree of earl or marquis vain,
But first in place amid the sylvan train.
The duke of Stafford shows the bird to sight
That dares with steadfast eyes Apollo's light.
Lucanio, lord of Angus, shows a chase,
Where the fierce bull two nimble greyhounds trace.

¹⁶ Zerbino, son to the king of Scotland, and brother to the princess Genevra, who was delivered from death in the fifth book by Rinaldo. The character of Zerbino appears to be entirely Ariosto's own, and is one of the most amiable in the whole poem: the lover of this prince, and the chaste Isabella, make a very beautiful and affecting episode. See note to b. xiii. ver. 39.

The duke of Albany¹⁷, his banner view,
Who fills his field with colours white and blue:
Buchanan's earl amidst his standard bears 600
Yon vulture that a speckled dragon tears.
Valiant Armaso next upon the field
Appears, with white and sable on his shield,
The earl of Arrol, on his right, is seen,
Who gives a flambeau in a field of green.

"Now, in two bands behold the Irish spread,
The first is by the earl of Kildare led:
The second, by the earl of Desmond brought
From savage mountains, has the battle sought:
The first has, in his sign, a flaming brand; 610
In white, the second, a vermilion band.
Nor do the English, Scotch, and Irish here
Alone in aid of Charlemain appear,
But Sweden's realm and Norway send their powers,
And e'en the climes remote of Iceland shores:
With many a land, in distant regions far,
By nature foes to peace and friends to war.
Near seventeen thousand to the battle come,
Drawn from the hollow caves and forest gloom.
Round their white banner throng'd, the plain appears 620

A wood of arms, a grove of bristled spears:
His banner white the chief Morato bore.
Resolv'd to dye it soon with Moorish gore."

While thus Rogero sees the bands, and hears
The names and titles of the British peers,
First one, and then another, with surprise
Approaching views his breast with steadfast eyes,
Amaz'd at such a strange unusual sight,
And soon the circle thickens round the knight.

But now Rogero, with design to raise 630
His pleasure, and increase the crowd's amazé,
Gives to his steel the rein, and makes him feel,
With gentle touch, the going of the steel;
He, swiftly mounting, soars upon the wind,
And leaves the gazing multitude behind!

Then, having past the soil of England o'er
From side to side, he reach'd the Irish shore,
The fabulous Hibernia; where, 'tis said,
The holy sage a secret cavern made¹⁸,
In which, such grace th' offended mortal wins, 640
He, purging there, atones for all his sins;
And thence he guides his courser o'er the waves,
Where the rough sea the lesser Britain laves:
When, looking down, a doleful sight he spy'd,
The fair Angelica in letters ty'd!
Ty'd to a rock on sorrow's fatal isle,
For sorrow's name well suits the hateful soil;
Whence (as my tale but late display'd before)
Arm'd vessels coasted round from shore to shore,

¹⁷ Ariodantes, brother to Laresnio, married to Genura, and after the death of Polinosso created duke of Albany, as related in the sixth book.

¹⁸ Pope Celestine sent bishop Germano into England, to convert the inhabitants to the Catholic faith, and Palladio to the Scots: he likewise sent bishop Patrick into Ireland: this last, after having exemplified many virtues, at last miraculously caused a well to appear, into which every day all those entered, who had committed any great sin, and proclaimed that they thereby obtained remission: this well was called St. Patrick's purgatory. Ireland, or Hibernia, is here called fabulous (fabulosa), because whoever came out of this cave related many marvellous things.—Dolce, Porcacchi,

To seize and bear unhappy Games away, 636
Doom'd to devouring jaws a daily prey!

That morn the virgin on the rock was plac'd
To glut the monster of the watery waste;
The virgin who in hapless hour was bound
By those that view'd her prostrate on the ground,
Beside th' unhallow'd sire in magic sleep profound
Th' inhuman race, of unrelenting mind,
To brutal rage the hapless fair resign'd,
And on the shore her tender frame expos'd,
As Nature first her naked limbs disclos'd; 660
Nor, cruel, left one slender veil, to spread
O'er the white lilies, and the roses red;
Fkwers that with her can equal lustre boast,
In heats of July or December's frost!

Rogero first¹⁹ the distant virgin thought
Some lovely form, of alabaster wrought,
Or purest marble, which the sculptor's hand
Had fix'd with art to grace the desert strand.
But soon he view'd, midst unimaged snow,
And roses red, the dewy sorrows flow, 670
Which, trickling, down her panting bosom stray'd,
While in her golden hair the Zephyrs play'd.
When now on hers the champion fix'd his eyes,
The thoughts of Bradamant began to rise:
Pity and love, by turns, his soul detain,
And scarce his kindly tears their course restrain:
He first his winged courser's speed repress'd,
Then gently thus the weeping maid address'd:
"O damsel! worthy only of the chains"²⁰
With which his captives conquering Love restrains!
Unworthy this, or any woe to find! 681
What wretch so harden'd with obdurate mind
Could by the rugged force of iron bands
Compress the softness of those lovely hands?"

While yet he spoke her rising blushes spread,
So polish'd ivory shows when stain'd with red:
Abash'd she found those latent charms expos'd,
Which modesty, though beautiful, strives to hide;
Her face had from her hands concealment found,
But to the flinty rock her hands were bound. 690
Yet (all she could) a shower of tears she shed,
And strove to earth to bend her drooping head.
While mingled sobs and plaints her fate bewail,
A sudden noise cuts short her mournful tale.
For, lo! the monster ploughs the watery field,
Half rais'd above the waves, and half conceal'd,
As fearing Boreas' rage or Auster's force,
The vessel to the harbour steers her course:
So hastening to his welcome prey is seen
The venomous orc, and small the space between. 700
The damsel views, half dead with chilling fear,
Nor can the knight her drooping spirits cheer.
His lance, but not in rest, Rogero held,
And on the furious orc the stroke impell'd:
How shall my Muse his dreadful form explain,
A bulk enormous! floundering in the main!
His eyes and pointed tusks a bear proclaim,
The rest, a mass unshap'd, without a name.
Be'tween his brows the stroke Rogero try'd:
The monster, moveless as a rock, defy'd 710

¹⁹ Compare the remaining part of this book with the latter end of the fourth of Ovid's Metamorphoses, where Perseus delivers Andromeda from the sea-monster.

²⁰ Thus Ovid:

— non istis digna catenis,

Sed quibus inter se cupidi junguntur amantes!

The baffled spear; and now the fearless knight
 Prepar'd on closer terms to wage the fight.
 The orc, who saw the winged courser's shade,
 That here and there upon the waters play'd,
 Forsook the certain helpless prey in view,
 And raging at the empty shadow flew;
 While, as he turn'd, Rogero sunk below,
 And watchful ply'd with strokes his dreadful foe.
 As when an eagle darting from the skies,
 Amidst the grass a wandering serpent spies, 720
 Or sees him on the sunny bank unfold
 His azure glories and his scales of gold;
 Eager to seize, yet cautious still, he fears
 Where from his mouth the hissing tongue appears.
 At length he grips the prize, then spreads his wing,

Nor dreads the terrors of the forky sting.
 Rogero thus, with sword and spear, pursues
 Not where his teeth and threatening tusks he views;
 But 'twixt his ears the forceful blow descends;
 Now on his back, now where his tail extends. 730
 Oft as the monster turns, aside he flies,
 And watches when to sink and when to rise:
 But all in vain! his labour nought avails,
 No steel can pierce th' impenetrable scales.

With the gaunt mastiff thus the fly maintains
 Audacious fight when August dries the plains:
 In July's month when ripening barvests shine,
 Or rich September yielding generous wine:
 Now on his jaws he fixes, or his eyes;
 And still in ever-wheeling circles flies, 740
 To elude the teeth, that vainly bite the air;
 For one dire stroke would finish all his care!

Lash'd by the monster's tail the surges fly,
 And dash with sprinkling from the distant sky:
 Scarce knows Rogero if his courser waves
 His wings in air, or in the ocean laves:
 Full oft he wishes now to gain the shore:
 For much he fears, if still the billows roar,
 When the damp plumes no more his steed sustain.
 No friendly bark will bear him from the main. 750

But soon far better thoughts his mind engage
 With other arms to quell the brutal rage;
 He now resolves the buckler to display,
 And strike his senses with th' enchanted ray;
 Then flies to land, and first to screen the maid
 (Whose naked limbs were on the rock display'd)
 From the fierce light, he fixes on her hand
 The ring that could the magic power withstand,
 The ring, which noble Bradamant before
 To save her lover from Brunello bore;* 760
 And next to free him from Alcina's hands,
 By sage Melissa sent to India's lands;²²
 Who many youths, with this, from fate renrier'd;
 From her the knight the wondrous gift receiv'd.
 This, with foreseeing care, he gave the dame,
 To screen her from his buckler's blazing flame;
 And save those lovely eyes, whose soft regard
 Already had his amorous heart ensnar'd.
 Then swift he turns to where the monster press'd
 One half the sea beneath his ample breast; 770
 And, standing on the shore, the veil he rears,
 When, lo! another Sun on Earth appears!
 Full on th' astonish'd orc the splendour plays;
 His senses vanish with the dazzling blaze!
 As, when the skies with sultry vapours glow,
 The panting fishes faint and sink below;

* See book iv. and vii.

So, midst the billows of the deep, is shown
 The hideous monster, horribly o'erthrown!
 Rogero then no rest, no pause allows,
 But plies him close with unavailing blows. 780

The beautiful damsel now besought the knight
 With earnest prayers to cease the fruitless fight:
 "Ah! turn," she weeping cry'd, "and loose my chains,

Before the cruel orc his sense regains.
 Ah! rather whelm me in the gaping food,
 Ere these poor limbs be made his trembling food."

Rogero, pitying, heard the dame deplore,
 Then burst her bonds and took her from the shore.
 He spurs; the courser spurns the sand, and flies -
 Aloft in air, and travels through the skies. 790

While on the saddle sits the gallant knight,
 Behind, the crupper bears the virgin bright.
 Thus brave Rogero snatch'd the maid away
 To rob the monster of so fair a prey;
 And, as he flew along, full oft he press'd
 With kisses sweet her eyes and snowy breast.
 No more his purpos'd voyage fills his mind,
 He seeks no more the Spanish coast to find;
 But to the neighbouring land his courser guides,
 Where lesser Britain breaks the briny tides; 800
 Where branching oaks a peaceful covert screen,
 And Philomela warbles through the acene.
 Along the meadow pours a purling rill,
 On either hand appears a lonely hill.

Th' enamour'd warrior here express'd his speed,
 And soft descended on the verdant mead;
 His griffin wings he now restrain'd from flight,
 Those wings that never more must bear the knight!
 Alighting from his steed, he burns to prove
 A gentler voyage on the coast of love. 810
 And now the glowing youth with eager haste
 Impatient from his limbs the steel unbraç'd;
 By turns this plate, confus'd, then that he try'd,
 And while he loosen'd one, another ty'd.

But since my lines beyond the bound extend,
 And may, perchance, my lord, your ears offend,
 No longer will I now my tale pursue,
 But at a fitter time the verse renew,

BOOK XL

THE ARGUMENT.

Angelica, by the help of her ring, leaves Rogero, who loses his flying horse, and afterwards, being deceived by the appearance of Bradamant engaged in combat with a giant, is decyvd to the enchanted castle of Atlante. Orlando, in pursuit of Angelica, arrives at the island of Ebuda, where he finds Olympia exposed to be devoured by the sea-monster: he kills the monster, and delivers her. Oberto, king of Ireland, arriving at the same time, falls in love with Olympia, and marries her. Orlando departs to continue the search of Angelica.

In mid career the rider oft restrains
 The fiery courser's speed with gentle reins;
 But seldom reason's curb will hold confin'd
 Th' unruly passions of an amorous mind.
 So when a bear, that tuds with honey stor'd
 A welcome vase, can taste the luscious board,
 Or from afar the odorous scent receive,
 His feet refuse th' enticing bait to leave.

No sage reflection can suffice to make
 Rogero now th' alluring bliss forsake,
 The bliss, with fair Angelica to prove,
 In friendly shades, the gifts of lawless love.
 No longer Bradamant his thoughts possess'd,
 Once the sole object reigning in his breast;
 Those charms that might Xenocrates inspire¹,
 Inflam'd the gentle youth with fierce desire:
 His buckler and his lance aside he threw,
 And from his limbs the mail impatient drew;
 When, casting down by chance her bashful eyes,
 The maid the ring upon her finger spies; 20
 The ring, which at Albracca from the dame
 Brunello stole²; with which to France she came;

¹ Xenocrates, a disciple of, and successor to Plato, celebrated for his probity, wisdom, and chastity. He refused the presents of Alexander the Great. It was a saying of his, that we often repented of speaking too much, but never of having held our peace. He was so eminent for continency, that having been one day left alone with Phryne, a beautiful courtesan, who made use of every enticement to seduce him, she afterwards declared that she had not been with a man, but a statue. Others relate that he underwent the same trial with Lais, another famous courtesan.

² Boyardo relates that Brunello climbed secretly up a steep and almost inaccessible rock, to the walls of Albracca, and making his way where Angelica stood, amidst her people, to view the battle from the ramparts, took the ring from off her finger, unperceived by her, and, returning by the way he came, escaped with his prize, though the princess had now taken the alarm, and commanded him to be pursued.

Orl. Inn. b. ii. c. v.

The ancients appear to have had great faith in the art of making rings, under the influence of particular planets or stars, accompanied with certain mysterious ceremonies, that should communicate qualities and virtues to the wearer, preserve him from sickness, poison, or enemies, and guard him from every attack of demon or evil spirits. Philostratus relates, that Larca, a prince of India, gave Apollonius seven rings, with the names and virtues of the seven planets, of which he every day wore one by turns, and maintained his youth a hundred and thirty years. Aristotle likewise speaks of the ring of Battus, which inspired the wearer with gratitude and honour. In another we read of a certain philosopher, named Eudamus, who made rings that were preservatives against the bite of serpents and the spells of sorcery or witchcraft. We read that Gyges, king of Lydia, had a ring of wonderful virtue, that upon turning the stone inwardly towards the palm of his hand, he immediately became invisible, and that by help of this ring he seduced the queen, slew the king Candaules, and gained possession of the kingdom of Lydia. Other writers relate, that Candaules, through an extravagant vanity for the uncommon beauty of his wife, concealed Gyges in her chamber, that he might behold her naked. The queen coming to the knowledge of this, compelled Gyges to enter into a conspiracy against Candaules, whom he slew, and afterwards succeeded to his crown and bed.

When the first Christian court her brother's gain'd
 And with his golden lance such fame obtain'd;
 Which next the Paladin Astolpho held:
 This ring the charms of Malagigi quell'd:
 By this Orlando, with a knightly train,
 One morn she freed from Dragontina's chain;
 With this unseen she left the castle, where
 An old enchanter kept th' imprison'd fair. 30
 But wherefore should I these adventures tell,
 Adventures which yourselves must know so well?
 From her Brunello stole the wondrous ring,
 Urg'd by command of Agrument the king;
 Since when, by adverse fortune ever cross'd,
 The hapless maid at length her kingdom lost.
 When now she view'd, and view'd with ravish'd eyes

The ring long lost, o'erwhelm'd with great surprise,
 She fears some empty dream her sense deceives,
 And scarce, by sight or touch, the truth believes; 40
 Then from her hand she took with eager haste,
 And twist her lips the shining circlet plac'd,
 And instant vanish'd from Rogero's sight,
 Like Phabus, when a cloud obscures his light.
 The youth, abandon'd thus, with looks amaz'd
 Around the mead a while in silence gaz'd;
 But when remembrance to his thoughts return'd
 The magic ring, too late his loss he mourn'd.
 Too late the change bewail'd—"Ungrateful maid!
 Are thus," he cry'd, "my services repaid? 50
 Say, wouldst thou rather of my ring bereave
 This hand by theft, than as my gift receive?
 Not that alone—but take my horse and shield—
 To thee what'er is mine I freely yield;
 Yet from my sight no more those charms remove.
 Thou hear'st, alas! but answer'st not my love!"

"Some of the old romance and legendary writers speak of a ring that gave to its wearer the knowledge of the language of birds, thus mentioned by Chaucer,

Canace

That own'd the virtuous ring of glass.

And fuller by the old poet Lydgate:

And evermore depointen might see
 How, with her ring, goodly Canace
 Of every fowle the leden and the song
 Could understand as she hem walk'd among."
 Warton's Observations on Spenser.

³ Argolis.

⁴ Orlando going to the assistance of Angelica, when he understood to be besieged in Albracca by Agrican king of Tartary, whose suit she had rejected, arrives at a bridge where he drinks of the water of oblivion, offered by a damsel, and is decoyed into the garden of Dragontina, a powerful enchantress.—where many other knights are detained prisoners by the force of her spells. Angelica leaves Scarpant, with two other kings, to defend Albracca, and privately sets out to procure further assistance. In her way she is enticed by an old man into a castle, from which she escapes by means of her ring, which is afterwards stolen from her by Brunello. She arrives at the garden of Dragontina, where she finds Orlando, Brandimart, Gryphon, Aquilant, and many other knights, all whom she delivers from the power of the enchantress, and engages them to go with her, and endeavour to raise the siege of Albracca.

Orlando Innam. b. i. c. vi. ix. xi. xiv.

So saying, by the fountain's side in haste
He search'd around, and oft in hope embrac'd
Her beautiful form; but when his arms would find
The fleeting fair, he clasp'd th' impassive wind! 60

Meantime Angelica at distance pass'd,
Till to a spacious cave she came at last,
Beneath a mountain hollow'd in the ground,
Where all provisions for her need she found.
In this his life an aged herdsman led,
Who numerous mares beneath the mountain fed:
Along the vales, in pastures green, they play'd,
By crystal streams that through the herbage stray'd:
Around the cave were stalls, to which they run
T' avoid the fervour of the mid-day Sun. 70

Her dwelling here, unseen, the virgin chose,
Till day declin'd, and shadowy night arose;
Then, cheer'd with rest and food, no longer stay'd,
But her fair limbs in humble weeds array'd;
Weeds far unmet for her, who once could boast
The richest garments wrought with skilful coat;
Yet, through her lowly vestments beauty shin'd,
And grace that spoke her of no vulgar kind.

Let ancient bards no longer tune the verse,
Neræ's charms or Phyllis' to rehearse; 80
The sweets of Amaryllis to recite,
Or Galatea lovely in her sight;
Let Maro's shepherds cease their boasting strains,
Since India's queen without a rival reigns.

Around the vales the damsel cast a look,
And from the grazing mares the fairest took;
For now a sudden thought inspir'd her breast,
Alone to travel tow'ards her native East.

While Rogero stay'd, in hope to view
The royal fair, that from his sight withdrew, 90
Again return; but, ah! in vain he stay'd,
Nor reach'd his fond complaints the absent maid.
Once more he purpos'd thence to steer his course,
And turn'd to where he left his winged horse;
Where there he found, so ill his fortune sped,
The reins were broken, and the courser led;
Lies heap'd on loss! forlorn and wretched left,
At once of mistress and of steed bereft;
But most to lose his wondrous ring he griev'd,
The wondrous ring from Bradamant receiv'd, 100
Which less he valued for its secret power,
Than for her sake whose band the token wore.

With heavy heart he brac'd his armour on;
His radiant targe behind his shoulder thrown;
He leaves the seas, and through the verdant meads,
All pensive, to a spacious vale proceeds;
Then takes a path that midst the forest leads.
Not far he pass'd, ere, echoing from the right,
Where thickest trees perplex'd the doubtful sight,
A dreadful clash of arms he hears; he flies, 110
And through the gloom two combatants espies
With fury clos'd: a giant one is seen,
A knight the other, and of fearless mien.
This seems to dare the fight with sword and shield,
And with undaunted skill maintain the field,
While oft he shuns the club's impending stroke,
Which, grasp'd with either hand, the giant shook.

⁵ The poet does not seem here wholly inattentive to his moral, since in consequence of Rogero's yielding to the temptation before him, forgetting his faith to Bradamant, and indulging his pursuit of unlawful pleasure, he loses his ring, and flying home,

Beside him lies his horse depriv'd of life;
Rogero stands spectator of the strife:
The knight he favours; but his noble mind 120
Awaits to see how fortune's lot inclin'd,
In silent gaze: at length a dreadful blow
The monster aims to crush th' unwary foe;
The club his helmet strikes; on earth he lies:
To end his life the cruel giant flies,
His helm uncloses, and reveals to sight
What to Rogero, in the prostrate knight,
Appears the roseate bloom, the golden hair,
And well-known features of the martial fair,
His Bradamant belov'd, that seems to lie 130
A victim by the giant doom'd to die;
At once the champion darts around his eyes,
And to the fight the tow'ring foe dedies:
But he, who seeks not to renew the fray,
Takes from the ground his senseless conquer'd prey,
And in his arms the prize resistless bears:
So with a wolf the lamb unpy'd fares;
So the fierce eagle, while he soars above,
In his strong talons gripes the helpless dove.

T' assist the virgin, at her seeming need, 140
Rogero follows with impatient speed;
But with such swiftness the stern giant flew,
Rogero scarce retains him in his view.
While thus (pursuing one, one held in chase)
Thro' winding ways the savage gloom they trace,
Wide and more wide the lengthening path extends,
Till in a spacious plain their labour ends.
But here we pause⁶—the story hastes to tell
What chance to great Orlando next befell,
Who to the seas Cymoco's pest consign'd, 150
No more to be restor'd, and curse mankind;
Yet little this avail'd—th' infernal foe,
Who fram'd the engine in the shades below,
To imitate the forky bolt, that rends
The sable clouds, and from the sky descends;
With this no less could human race deceive,
Than with the fruit of old th' unhappy Eve:
He, in our grandseires' time, to second birth
Th' invention drew⁷, to plague the sons of Earth;
This many a year engulf'd in seas was laid, 160
Till, taught by him, a sorcerer thence convey'd
The pest abhor'd; which first the Germans try'd,
And, by the demon's aid, to arms apply'd.

Thence Italy and France, and every part
Where war extends, has learnt th' inhuman art.
For some the hollow wounds of brass they make,
Wrought in the fire; for others iron take:
Capacious some, and some of lesser frame,
That from their various authors hold their name.
"O! wretched soldier!⁸! now your armour bright
Forsake, and only gird your sword in fight: 171

⁶ Mention is again made of Rogero in the ninth book, ver. 114, where the enchanted palace is fully described.

⁷ The invention of gunpowder is ascribed to a chemist, who, as some say, was a monk of Germany; this man, making experiments with a mixture of nitre, sulphur, charcoal, and other inflammatory matter, in which he chanced to drop a spark of fire, discovered such effects as were soon afterwards applied to new engines of destruction called fire-arms, which were first made use of in the war between the Venetians and Genoeses, anno 1380.

⁸ This apostrophe of the poet, and likewise the

But this dread weapon on your shoulders bear,
Or never hope the victor's wreaths to share.
How couldst thou, curst invention, ever find
Reception in the brave, the generous mind !
By thee the glorious war is turn'd to shame,
By thee the trade of arms has lost its fame !
By thee, no more shall gallantry or might
Avail the warrior in the field of fight.
By thee so many lords and knights are slain, 180
By thee such numbers yet must press the plain,
Before the war shall cease, whose rage has torn
The world, but caus'd Italia most to mourn.
Accurst be he, who first this mischief bred !
Heaven, sure, on him its deepest wrath has shed,
And doom'd his wretched soul to endless woe,
Near impious Judas in the realms below !"

But let us to the knight; who seeks the shore,
Each dreadful day besurround'd with virgin gore.
Against Orlando now the wind prevails; 190
Now on the poop it blows in gentle gales;
And now by turns a sudden calm succeeds;
That little on her course the vessel speeds.
For Heaven's high will forbade the crew to land
Before th' Hibernian king had reach'd the strand,
To forward that event, which since befell,
And which, in order due, the Muse shall tell.

Now near the coast the prow the billows broke,
When thus Orlando to his pilot spoke :
"Haste! launch the boat, and here the ship detain,
While to you rock I hasten through the main: 201
The largest cable to my hand consign;
The largest anchor to the cable join;
And mark my purpose, when in dang'rous fight,
I dare with yonder monster prove my might."

This said; with anchor and with cable stow'd,
The boat they launch'd amid the dashing flood:
Then all his arms, except his sword, he leaves,
And tow'rd the rock, alone, the billows cleaves:

speech of Orlando in the ixth book, on the same occasion, are in the true spirit of chivalry, and may remind the reader of part of Don Quixote's oration on arms and letters, where speaking of the invention of guns, he inveighs, almost in the words of our author, against the use of such weapons.

"A blessing on those bappy ages that were strangers to the dreadful fury of these devilish instruments of artillery, whose inventor, I verily believe, is now in hell, receiving the reward of his diabolical invention; by means of which it is in the power of a cowardly and base hand to take away the life of the bravest knight, and, to which is owing, that without knowing how or from whence, in the midst of that resolution and bravery which inflames and animates gallant spirits, comes a chance ball, shot off by one, who perhaps fled, and was frighted at the very flash of the pan, and in an instant puts an end to the life of him who deserved to have lived for many ages: and therefore when I consider this, I could almost say I repent of having undertaken this profession of knight-errantry, in so detestable an age as this in which we live; for though no danger can daunt me, still it gives me some concern to think, that powder and lead may chance to deprive me of the opportunity of becoming famous and renowned, by the valour of my arm and the edge of my sword, over the face of the whole Earth."

Jarvis's Don Quixote, vol. i. h. ix. c. xi.

Close to his breast he draws the sturdy oar; 210
And turns his back upon the destin'd shores.
Anon a pow' had rais'd her radiant head,
And to the Sun her golden tresses spread;
Half seen above the waves, and half conceal'd,
To old Timothus' jealous eyes reveal'd:—
When to the barren rock approach'd so nigh,
As from the vigorous hand a stone might fly;
He heard, and yet he scarcely seem'd to hear,
A tender plaintive voice assault his ear:
Sudden he view'd against the rock's steep side 220
A lovely dame in cruel fetters ty'd:
Naked she stands above the briny wave,
While her fair feet intruding waters lave.
He sees, but vainly strives from far to trace
The downcast features of her bashful face;
Then pines for nearer view his eager ear—
When, hark! the seas, the woods, the caverns roar!
The billows swell; and from the depths below,
In open view appears his monstrous foe.
As from the humid vale black clouds ascend, 230
When gathering storms their pregnant wombs
distend:

So through the liquid brine the monster press'd
With furious course; beneath his hideous breast
Vex'd ocean groans—Orlando, void of fear,
Nor chang'd his colour, nor his wonted cheer:
Firm in himself, to guard the weeping maid,
And her dire foe with powerful arm invade,
Between the land and orc his course he ply'd,
But kept undrawn the falchion at his side.
Soon as the monster, that to shore pursu'd 240
His deathful way, the boat and champion view'd,
He op'd his greedy throat that might enshroud
A horse and horsemen in its living tomb!
Near and more near Orlando dauntless rows;
Then in his mouth the ponderous anchor throws,
Whose width forbids the horrid jaws to close.
So miners, while they urge their darkling toil,
With heedful prop support the crumbling soil.
His teeth secur'd, Orlando with a bound
Leap'd in the yawning gulf; and whirling round
His trenchant blade, the dark retreat explor'd, 251
And with repeated wounds the monster gor'd.
What city longer can defence maintain,
Whose foes within the walls an entrance gain?
Mad with the pain, he rises o'er the tides,
And shows his jointed back and scaly sides;
Then downward plunging in the bottom laves,
And throws the troubled sands above the waves.
The Paladin, who felt the rushing streams,
Forsook the orc, and out'd with nervous limbs 260
The billowy brine, while in his hand he bows
The anchor's cable till he reach'd the shore.
There firmly fix'd, upon the rock he stood,
And strain'd each nerve, while struggling through the flood

* Thus Ovid,

— Unda

Insonuit: veniensque immenso bellua ponto
Eminet, et latum sub pectore possidet aequor.
Metam. lib. iv. ver. 687.

Concerning this battle between Orlando and the orc, though some part must be acknowledged to be highly extravagant, and bordering upon the ludicrous, particularly the manner in which the knight gives him his death's wounds, yet, in general, the description is undoubtedly worked up with great strength of imagination.

The monster follow'd, by that arm compell'd
Whose strength the strength of mortal man excell'd.
As when a bull at unawares had found

With straiten'd cords his horns encompass'd round,
Furious he leaps, he bounds from side to side,
The hangers all his fruitless pains deride: 270

So far'd the orc, while from his mouth he shed
A tide, that dyes the ocean still with red;
Iash'd by his tail with many a sounding blow,
The parting sea reveals th' abyss below:

Now dash'd aloft the briny waves are thrown,
Foliate the day, and blot the golden Sun.
The neighbouring forests, and the mountains roar,
The winding rocks rebellow to the roar.

Ross'd at the tumult, from his pearly bed,
Old Proteus o'er the water rais'd his head: 280

Soon as his eyes beheld so strange a sight
Between the monster and the Christian knight,
He left his flock and urg'd his fearful flight.
E'en Neptune on his car (such terror spread)
With dolphins rein'd to Æthiopia bed.

Ino, whose breast her Melicerta bears;
The sea-green sisters, with disbevel'd hairs;
Glaucus and Triton; all the watery train,
In diverse parts, fly scatter'd o'er the main.

Anglante's warrior now, the conflict o'er, 290
Had drawn the dreadful monster to the shore;
Which scarce he reach'd, when spent with toil,
and spread

Along the sand, his shapeless bulk lay dead.
Soon swarming o'er the coast the island crew
Came hastening down the woodroos sight to view;

And loudly cried, that mighty Proteus' rage
Would once again his savage herds engage
To waste the land, unless with humble prayer
They mov'd the god, themselves and race to spare;

And, as an offering for his monster slain, 300
They whelm'd th' offending champion in the main.
As spreads from torch to torch th' increasing light
Till all the region with the blaze is bright;

So through the madding vulgar swiftly ran
The fierce contagion, caught from man to man.
One takes a sling, a bow another takes;

This draws a sword, and that a javelin shakes.
They shout, they run, they cumber all the strand,
And close him far and near on every land.

The generous Paladin surpris'd beheld 310
Th' ungrateful throng with hostile thoughts im-
pell'd:

Instead of meeting fame and high regard,
He sees them thus his valiant deeds reward.
But as a bear, for public pastime bred,

In Russia or in Lithuania led,
Concerns the yelping cur; with like disdain
Orlando near beholds the dastard train,

Against him leagu'd, with stupid anger wield
Their idle weapons to dispute the field. 320
Soon Durindana from the sheath he drew,

And midst his foes with noble fury flew,
Who hop'd with ease t' oppress a single knight;
Nor fear'd with shield, nor cas'd in armour bright.

They little deem'd his skin from head to heel,
Like adamant, could no impression feel:
But while himself secure un wounded stood,
He dy'd his weapon in th' assailants' blood.

At ten fierce strokes, beneath his conquering hand
Fell thirty fell, and soon he clear'd the strand.
While thus th' unequal strife the knight main-
tain'd, 330

Hibernia's troops the fatal island gain'd,

And disembark'd where none to oppose they view'd;
A dreadful slaughter through the land ensu'd:
Justice their plea to veil the soldier's rage,
All pity lost, they spar'd nor sex nor age!

The wretched natives here were seen but few,
And these poor discipline nor order knew:
Their goods were pillag'd by the Irish train,
The houses set on fire, the people slain:

The walls were raz'd, and scarce remain'd behind
A man alive of this devoted kind. 341

Orlando hastens now the dame to free,
Prepar'd for death beside the roaring sea:
Near and more near he draws, and thinks he spies
Features but late familiar to his eyes;

Lo! imagin'd to his thought Olympia's face,
She, most unhappy of the female race
By man betray'd—Olympia born to prove
The woes and changes of ungrateful love.

'T was her, whom fortune gave the pirate band 350
Their lovely victim on Ebuda's strand.
Full well the damsel knew th' approaching knight,
But from his look she turn'd her bashful sight;

Confus'd and mov'd she hung her drooping head,
While burning blushes on her cheeks were spread.
The warrior then inquir'd what envious power
Had led her step to that inhuman shore,

From where he left her crown'd with joy and peace,
Partaking with her consort every bliss?
"Alas! I know not," she began to say, 360
"If for my life I grateful thanks should pay,

Or rather mourn the day again must close,
And not behold a period to my woes:
My grateful thanks for these poor limbs I owe,
Sav'd from the jaws of my unnatural foe:

But little I rejoice that still I live,
Since death alone to me can comfort give.
Then let thy hand, in pity to my grief,
With welcome death afford the sole relief."

She said; and sobbing deep, her sorrows spoke,
How her false lord his faith and honour broke, 371
To leave her sleeping on the desert shore,
Whence to the ship their prey the pirates bore.

While this she told, she turn'd, and blushing show'd
A form like Dian, pictur'd in the flood
With naked beauties, when incens'd she threw
On rash Actæon's brows the sprinkling dew.

Orlando, pacing on the shelly strand,
Awaits his ship to anchor near the land; 379
That thence with vestures he may clothe the dame:

While this his thought employ'd, Oberto came¹⁰;
Hibernia's king, who heard, the monster slain
There lay extended by the dashing main;

That, swimming thro' the seas, a knight unknown
Had in his jaws a ponderous anchor thrown,
And drawn him to the beach, as barks, secur'd
With twisted cables, on the ground are moor'd.

Now tow'rd's the shore, to learn the truth, in haste
Oberto came; meanwhile the land to waste,
His soldiers, unstrain'd, their rage employ'd, 390
And towns and men with fire and sword destroy'd.

Soon as th' Hibernian king Orlando view'd,
(Tho' dropp'd with water and deform'd with blood,
With blood which from the monster's throat he drew)
By every look the Paladin he knew.

¹⁰ Oberto, king of Ireland, mentioned in the ninth book to have collected a force to invade the island of Ebuda.

When first the deed he heard, his noble mind
The glorious author from the deed divid'd,
Him well he knew, with him in Gallia bred,
At Charles' high court his infant years were led,
Which late he left to seek his native land, 400
(His father dead) the sceptre to command.
Oft had he seen the knight, and oft before
With him in converse past the social hour.

His helmet rais'd, he ran with eager pace
To hold Orlando in a warm embrace;
Nor less Orlando felt, the king to view,
And round his neck his friendly arms he threw.
Orlando to Oberto then display'd
The cruel sufferings of the fair betray'd;
From false Bireno doom'd her wrongs to mourn, 410
From whom she least deserv'd such base return.
What proofs Bireno of her love could boast;
For him her kindred slain, her country lost;
For him prepar'd her dearest life to yield:
All this he knew, and part himself beheld.

While thus he speaks, the gushing sorrows rise,
And trickle from the fair one's weeping eyes:
Like vernal skies her lovely visage show'd,
When, gentle showers descending from a cloud, 419
Frequent and soft, the Sun with cheering gleams
Dart through the watery veil his trembling beams:
As then in foliage wet with glistening dews,
Sweet Philomel her plaintive note renews;
So Cupid in her grief reviv'd appears,
And bathes his plume in her pearly tears.
His golden shaft he kindles in the flame,
That from her piercing eyes like lightning came,
And tempers in the crystal stream that flows
Between the lily fair and blushing rose.
His arrow now prepar'd, the bow he bends, 430
And at th' unguarded youth his weapon sends;
For whose defence no arms could here avail,
Nor plated shield, nor double coat of mail:
While rapt in gaze he stands, he feels the dart,
He knows not how, infix'd within his heart.

Olympia's form was such as few can find,
For every part was perfect in its kind.
Her eyes, her cheeks, her lips, her nose, her hair,
Her shoulders, neck, beyond description fair,
Her skin as ivory smooth, and white as snows, 440
Which yet unskill'd winter's bosom shows!
Her lovely breasts with frequent heavings seem
As in the rustic vase the trembling cream
When gently mov'd: the beautiful space between,
Like that, where frost has silver'd o'er the green,
Which some fair vale discloses to divide
Two little hills that rise on either side:
Her limbs, so truly shap'd, might justly claim
The skill of Phidias, or a greater name.
Had she been present in th' Idæan grove, 450
And seen by Paris, though the queen of love
From either goddess beauty's triumph held,
Her charms had scarce Olympia's charms excell'd:
Nor had he sought perhaps the Spartan lauds,
In breach of sacred hospitable bands;
But thus declar'd,—"You fair one let me gain,
And Helen with her consort still remain."
Or had she in Crotona's town been found,
When Zeuxis gather'd all the beauties round,
Culling each grace from many a naked dame, 460
For Juno's fanc a faultless shape to frame:
She for his model had alone suffic'd,
Since all perfection was in her compris'd.
What heart will think Bireno e'er could view
Her charms unveil'd, or half his blessing knew;

So far to steel his unrelenting mind,
And leave her in that desert isle behind?
Oberto, fir'd with love, no more suppress'd
The passion struggling in his amorous breast.
He bade th' afflicted fair no longer mourn, 470
But hope her sorrow soon to joy might turn;
With vows t' attend her steps to Holland's shore,
And there replace her in the sovereign power;
Nor cease till in her treacherous spouse he gain'd
A just revenge for all her wrongs sustain'd.

And now he sends for female robes to find;
Nor long they sought for robes of various kind,
Since every day the vestment there was stor'd
Of some lost virgin by the orc devour'd.
From these the king Olympia's limbs attir'd, 480
But could not clothe her as his soul desir'd;
For should the choicest silks from far be brought,
With every cost of art and genius wrought,
Should e'en Minerva all her skill unfold,
And Lemnos' god supply the purest gold;
Yet to th' enamour'd prince 't would scarce appear
A covering worthy for the dame to wear.

With secret joy Orlando saw conceal'd
Th' increasing passion in Oberto's breast;
For hence he knew the monarch would be led 490
T' avenge her wrongs on false Bireno's head;
That thus, himself, releas'd from further stay,
No longer need his amorous search delay;
Who came not thither in her cause to prove
His prowess, but from death to save his love;
Whom vainly there he sought, nor yet could tell,
If thither brought, or what the fair befell:
For, slaughter'd by the foe's destroying hand,
Not one surviv'd of all Ebusa's band.

Next morn the king, the dame, and friendly crew,
Embarking, from the cruel port withdrew: 501
With these Orlando to Hibernia went,
Who thence to France his speedy voyage meant.
Scarce on the island he remain'd a day;
Not all their friendly prayers could bribe his stay:
Cupid, the wandering lover's constant guide,
No longer there permits him to reside;
But ere he went, he to Oberto's care
The cause intrusted of the injur'd fair:
The king, already by her quarrel fir'd, 510
In zeal exceeded what the earl requir'd:

A league with England and with Scotland made;
He rais'd a force the traitor to invade,
Drove him, an outcast, from the Belgic shore,
And next in Friza ruin'd all his power:
He rous'd his native Zealand to rebel,
Nor ceas'd, till in the war Bireno fell:
He fell; yet scarce his wretched life could prove
A forfeit equal to his breach of love. 520
Olympia soon Oberto's bride is seen,
A countess late, and now a powerful queen!¹

But let us to Orlando turn the strain;
Who sailing night and day divides the main,
Till in the port again his vessel rides,
The port from which he first had plough'd the tides.
He leaps on shore, and Brigliodoro takes,
All arm'd he mounts, and wind and sea forsakes,
Ere winter's months in due succession roll'd,
Full many an action worthy to be told,
The knight achiev'd, but blame not here the bard,
If worth conceal'd should pass without regard: 531

¹ The poet speaks no more of Oberto and Olympia in the course of this work.

Far reader was the Paladin to court
 From deeds true glory, than those deeds report;
 And never yet, without some witness near,
 His great exploits had reach'd the general ear.
 But when the Sun with circling course attain'd
 The prudent beast that Phryxus once sustain'd¹²
 Through narrow seas, and to our joyous sphere
 His beams diffus'd renew'd the laughing year;
 When gentle Zephyrus with genial wing 540
 Return'd to lead again the blossom'd Spring;
 Then, with the rising flowers and budding green,
 Orlando's matchless fame again was seen.
 On hill, on plain, on champaign, field and shore,
 A tedious tract of land he journeys o'er:
 When entering now a forest's gloomy shade,
 Distressful cries his startled ears invade:
 He grasps his sword, he spurs his fiery steed,
 And to the sound impels his eager speed.
 But till some future time I here suspend 550
 The cause to tell, if you the tale attend,

BOOK XII

THE ARGUMENT.

Orlando, deceived by the likeness of Angelica, is drawn to the enchanted castle of Atlantea. Angelica arrives at the same place, where she finds Orlando, Sacripant, Ferrau, Gradasso, and many other knights. By the virtue of her ring she delivers Orlando, Sacripant, and Ferrau, from the power of the magician. Battle between Orlando and Ferrau. Angelica leaves the combatants, and Sacripant departs in search of her. The battle being stopped between Orlando and Ferrau, they separate. Orlando meets two bands of Pagans, which he defeats: he then continues his pursuit of Angelica, and finds a damsel detain'd in a cave of outlaws.

WAS Ceres from maternal Ida flew,
 And swiftly to th' acoustom'd vale withdrew,
 Where thunder-struck Euceladus remains,
 Who burning Ætna on his limbs sustains,
 And there no more her Proserpine beheld,
 Sequester'd late in Enna's flowery field,
 With grief she rav'd, and, frantic with despair,
 Her bosom beat, and tore her golden hair:
 Two pines she lighted then at Vulcan's fire,
 And bade the kindled torches ne'er expire: 10
 These, seated in her car, the goddess took,
 (Two scaly dragons harness'd to her yoke)
 Then search'd the fields, the mountains, plains,
 and woods,

The vales, the streams, the torrents and the floods;
 Till having circled earth and ocean round,
 She sunk beneath, and reach'd the Stygian sound.

¹² The fable relates that Phryxus and Helle his sister flying to escape the persecutions of their step-dame, by the advice of Juno mounted upon a ram, the fleece of which was gold, and attempted to cross a narrow arm of the sea. Helle fell into the water, which was afterwards called the Hellespont; but Phryxus arrived safe at the court of Æetes king of the Colchians, and there, in gratitude for his safety, sacrificed the ram, which was placed among the signs of the zodiac. The golden fleece remained in possession of Æetes, and was afterwards won by Jason.

If good Orlando power in love could claim
 But equal to the Eleusinian dame¹,
 No region would escape his piercing sight,
 Nor lands, nor seas, nor shade of endless night: 20
 But since forbid to guide thro' viewless air
 His flying snakes; with unremitting care,
 As far as man could seek, he sought the fair.
 France has he search'd; and next, with ceaseless
 Would range the German and Italian soil; [toil,
 The new and old Castile he means t' explore,
 Then cross the Spanish main to Libya's shore.
 Such thoughts revolving in his anxious breast,
 He seem'd to hear the cries of one distress'd:
 He spur'd his steed, and soon before him spy'd 30
 A knight upon a strong-limb'd courser ride;
 Who bore by force across his saddle-bow,
 A female form with every mark of woe:
 She struggled in his arms, she wept, she pray'd,
 And call'd Anglante's valiant prince to aid.
 Now on the dame Orlando bent his view,
 And well the features of her face he knew:
 At least it seem'd Angelica the fair,
 Whom long he sought with unavailing care.

When he, in semblance of a maid distress'd, 40
 Beheld her image that his soul possess'd
 Thus borne away,—fire flashing from his eyes,
 He call'd the knight with loud and threatening cries:
 He call'd aloud, and, thundering on his steed,
 Let loose the reins to Brigliadoro's speed.
 The felon nought reply'd, nor deign'd to stay,
 But all intent upon his lovely prey,
 Through the thick forest held so swift a pace,
 The wind had lagg'd behind him in the race.
 Thus flying, one pursuing, one pursu'd, 50
 While shrill complainings echo'd thro' the wood,
 They reach'd a mead, where in the midst appear'd
 A stately pile, with various marble rear'd.
 Here pass'd the stranger through the golden door,
 Who in his arms the seeming virgin bore,
 And soon the entrance Brigliadoro gain'd,
 That fierce Orlando on his back sustain'd:
 Orlando, entering, cast his eyes around,
 And neither knight nor damsel more was found.

With fury fir'd, alighting from his steed, 60
 He rushes thro' the dome with restless speed:
 Now here, now there, his step impatient bends,
 Till, all below explor'd, the earl ascends
 The winding stairs, and round with equal pain,
 Each gallery, ball, and chamber views in vain.
 Of silk and gold he sees each costly bed,
 Rich figur'd hangings o'er the walls are spread,
 And, for the floor, the feet on tap'stry tread.
 Above, below, unweary'd seeks the knight,
 Yet finds not what alone can glad his sight, 70
 Nor sees Angelica, nor him espies
 Who snatch'd her beauties from his longing eyes.
 While thus intent he rovd the palace round,
 Ferrau² and king Gradasso³ here he found:

¹ The ancient poets often gave titles to their deities, derived from the several places where they were worshipped. Ceres is here called the Eleusinian dame, because in Eleusis, a city of the Athenians, her name was held in great veneration.

² We have not heard of this knight since book i. ver. 223, where he sees the ghost of Argalia.

³ Gradasso was last mentioned as one of the prisoners in Atlante's castle, delivered by Bradamant, book iv. ver. 233.

King Sacripant⁴ and Brandimart he view'd,
With various warriors, who like him pursu'd
A fruitless search, and of the wrongs complain'd
They from the master of the dome sustain'd ;
Who still, himself unseen, their sight abus'd,
Whom each of some discourteous theft accus'd. 80
One for his courser stol'n with anger burn'd ;
Another for his ravish'd mistress mourn'd :
From various causes others there remain'd ;
And many knights were weeks and months detain'd.

Still search'd Orlando round ; and oft he cry'd :
" My cares, perchance, are all in vain apply'd
For him who by some secret gate withdrew,
And, distant now, defies me to pursue
The virgin fair."—Debating thus, with speed
He left the dome, and travers'd o'er the mead, 90
Still gazing round with downcast look to trace
What tracks of feet had lately mark'd the place.

A voice he heard, that call'd Orlando's name ;
He look'd, and thought he view'd his much-lov'd dame ; [chang'd

That much-lov'd dame, whose beauty's power
His newly heart, and every thought estrang'd.
Nigh at a window stood the seeming maid,
And thus, in moving words, implor'd his aid :
" Ah ! help !—I give to thy protecting care
My honour, dearer than the vital air ! 100
Shall this vile ravisher his will pursue
Unpunish'd, in my dear Orlando's view ?
Ah ! rather let thy sword prevent my shame,
And save by timely death my virgin fame."

These words repeated oft in mournful strain,
Impell'd the knight with frequent steps again
To explore the dome, by turns with anger fir'd,
By turns with vain, yet pleasing hope inspir'd.
Soon he stopp'd, anon he seem'd to hear
The well-known accents breaking on his ear. 110
While thus he listen'd, though th' imploring dame
Appear'd not far his needful aid to claim,
He knew not whence the sounds disastrous came.

But turn we to Rogero ; who pursu'd
The maid and giant through the shady wood ;
Whence to a spacious mead his course he bore,
(The place to which Orlando came before)
Within the gate the tow'ring giant pass'd,
Him close behind Rogero press'd as fast ;
The portal entering (wondrous to the knight) 120
The maid and giant vanish'd from his sight.
In every part he sought with fruitless care,
And much he marvel'd how his foe could bear
So sudden from his view the captive fair.
Through chambers, halls, and fair saloons he went,
Then search'd beneath the winding stairs' ascent ;
At length he turn'd him to the neighbouring wood,
In hope—but soon a voice his steps pursu'd ;
A voice, that late Atlantes' knight appal'd,
And now Rogero to the dome recall'd. 130

The form and speech illusive that deceiv'd
Orlando, for Angelica believ'd,
To good Rogero seem'd the Dardan dame,
Whose virgin charms his amorous heart inflame.

This strange device, the like unknown before,
By old Atlantes of Carena's love
Was fram'd, to keep Rogero safe from war,
Till past the influence of his evil star

⁴ The last we heard of this knight was when he was left by Angelica, after their duel for Angelica, book ii. ver. 136.

That menac'd early death : Atlantes' power
For this had rais'd the steel-embattled tower ; 140
For this had try'd Alcina's guileful chain,
In love the youthful champion to detain.
Not him alone, but all whose martial fame (name,
For valorous deeds had spread thro' France their Atlantes' hero confin'd in magic thrall, [fall ;
Lest by their hands⁵ the much-lov'd youth should
And all provisions due prepar'd so well,
That knight and dames might here with pleasure dwell.

Now to Angelica the tale we bend,
Whose finger wore the ring that could defend 150
From deepest spells, that in her mouth convey'd
Conceal'd her person like a viewless shade.
The virgin in the cave her limbs attir'd,
And found such food as nature's wants requir'd :
A mare she singled from the grazing train,
Resolv'd to view her native seats again,
Fair India's realms—and gladly would she take King Sacripant, or brave Orlando make
Guide of her way ; tho' neither knight she priz'd,
But both their amorous suits alike despis'd. 160
Yet hending eastward her adventurous course,
By towns and castles girt with hostile force,
Some guard she wish'd, that danger could defy,
And well their valour might her want supply ;
Them long in cities, towns, and woods she sought,
Till chance at length the wandering virgin brought
Where Sacripant, and where Orlando bound
By feted spells ; where join'd with these she found
Gradasso stern, Rogero and Ferrau,
And many more in abject state she saw. 170

The gate she fearless pass'd, to none reveal'd,
E'en from Atlantes by her ring conceal'd.
Orlando here and Sacripant she view'd,
Who thro' the dome their fruitless search pursu'd.
She knew Atlantes, by her likeness feign'd,
Orlando and king Sacripant detain'd
With covert wiles ; of these she long resolv'd
The doubtful choice, and scarce at length resolv'd
On whom to fix, but stood in deep suspense,
Between Orlando and Circassia's prince. 180
Full well she knew Orlando's dauntless might
Could best defend her in the day of fight ;
But knew not how hereafter to displace⁶
A lover thus exalted in her grace,

⁵ It may appear very extraordinary, that Atlantes should bring together in one place with Rogero the knights, from some of whom he feared the prophecy might be fulfilled that threatened the young warrior's life: the commentators have observed, that during their abode in this enchanted dwelling, the knights were totally unknown to each other, and that consequently Rogero was in no danger from any national hostility ; and that every person, being engaged by the spell, on his own particular loss, had no leisure to attend to Rogero, who therefore continues perfectly safe : but surely it is difficult to understand how his safety is more secured by this device of Atlantes.

⁶ It appears to me that Angelica was not meant for an amiable character, but is rather a natural lively picture of, and covert satire on, the coquetry and levity of many of the fair sex ; and I believe every reader will confess, through all the course of the adventures, or even in any misfortunes which befall her, that she never takes hold of the

When, danger past, she meant t' abridge his power,
Or send him back, repuls'd, to Galla's shore:
But let her raise Circeasia to the skies,
Again submissive at her foot he lies,
Should she command; and hence each reason weigh'd
Inclin'd to him the long debating maid; 190
Then sudden from her mouth the ring she took,
And, lo! the mist king Sacripant forsook;
But while she meant from Sacripant to draw
Th' obscuring veil, Orlando and Ferrau
Saw near him view'd, who both had long explor'd
The magic roof for her their souls ador'd.

Around the princess through'd th' impatient three,
No more deny'd their lov'd-ones' charms to see.
Two warriors on their breast the cuirass wore,
Alarm'd in proof, their heads the helmet bore; 200
Nor night, nor day, they cast aside their arms,
Since first they reach'd this seat of magic charms;
Nor seem'd, by use inur'd, their limbs to feel
The weighty pressure of encumbering steel.
The third, Ferrau, in radiant mail was cas'd,
But o'er his brows no temper'd helmet loc'd:
All helmets he renounc'd, till that he gain'd
Which once Orlando's valorous arm obtain'd
From great Almonies; such the oath he took,
When for Argalia's casque he search'd the brook.
Now stood Argalia's champion at his side, 211
Nor him to battle yet Ferrau defy'd:
For neither (such th' illusions of the place)
While there detain'd, could in his mind retrace
The least resemblance of another's face.
Here night and day the ponderous mail they wore,
And constant on their arm the buckler bore;
In stalls at hand their harness'd couriers stood,
By plenteous cribs surcharg'd with generous food.
No longer could Atlantes' baffled power 220
Detain the champions captive in his tower;
Who, lightly leaping on their steeds, withdrew
In haste, the rosy damsel to pursue.
The black-ey'd virgin, bright with golden hair,
Who now to flight impell'd her gentle mare:
Displeas'd the knights she view'd, nor wish'd to prove

At once three rival-suitors for her love.
When these so far were led, she fear'd no more
Th' enchanter's arts could work their baleful power;
The ring, in danger ever prov'd her shield, 230
The fair between her ruby lips conceal'd;
That done, she vanish'd from their longing sight,
And mute with wonder left each gazing knight.
The wayward damsel who so late design'd
Orlando or king Sacripant to find,
Now, sudden chang'd, far other thoughts pursu'd,
And both the chiefs alike disdainful view'd,
Remov'd to neither's arm that aid to owe,
Which, in their stead, her ring might well bestow.
Meantime the lovers, who deluded stood, 240
On either side amid the gloomy wood,
Alternate gaz'd: like bounds that lose the trace
Of hare or fox, which long they held in chase.
Herself invisible, the scornful maid
Their baffled plight with secret smiles survey'd.
One only path amid the forest led,
That seem'd to point the way by which she fled.
Orlando and Ferrau with eager speed
The search pursu'd, and Sacripant his steed best like Bradamant, Flordelis, Isabella, and others, evidently drawn by the poet for models of female excellence.

As swiftly spur'd, while left behind, the dame 250
Her bride check'd, and softly pacing came.

But, branching now in tangled brakes, was lost
The winding way, that through the woodland crost:
With heedful eyes the champions sought around
What track of horses' feet had mark'd the ground:
Ferrau, of kings the proudest midst the proud,
Thus, turning tow'rd the two, exclaim'd aloud:
"Say--whither would ye go?--your course refrain--
Unless you breathless mean to press the plain.
Think not in love a rival will I view, 260
Or let another her I love pursue."

Then to Circeasia's king Orlando spoke:
"Who dares our wrath unpunish'd thus provoke,
Must deem us, sure, a vile and object pair,
More fit the distaff than the lance to bear.
Thou wretch!" indignant, to Ferrau he said,
"But that I view no helm defends thy head,
This arm should teach thee to repent the wrong,
And curse th' un govern'd license of thy tongue."

To whom the Pagan—"Lo! I stand prepar'd,
Nor think my head defenceless I regard: 273
Tho' here without a helm, I trust full well
This hand your force united can repel."
Then thus Orlando Sacripant address'd:
"Lend him awhile your helm at my request,
Till with this weapon I chastise in fight
Th' unequal'd folly of yon boasting knight." [cry'd]
"Great were my weakness then," the monarch
"But if thou seek'st to have his wants supply'd,
Thy own bestow--nor deem me less prepar'd 280
Than thou, to give a fool his just reward."

Ferrau rejoind'--"Insenate both! for know
Did I a helmet seek to meet the foe,
Yourselves had prov'd my prowess to your cost,
And each had now his casque in combat lost.
Bare-headed thus, and bound by solemn vows,
Learn, never covering must surround my brows
But what Orlando wears, the glorious prize
I seek to gain."--With smiles the earl replies:
"Wilt thou secure, with head defenceless dare 290
Assail the Paladin in equal war,
To win from him such honour as he won
In Aspramont from Agolantes' son?
I rather deem his near approach would make
From head to foot thy frame with terror shake;
Make thee the helmet's boasted claim forgo,
To yield thyself and weapons to the foe."

To whom the Spanish boaster thus reply'd:
"Pull off this arm Orlando's force has try'd;
When I at pleasure, not his helm alone, 300
But all his armour might have made my own;
Then little priz'd,--though now I seek to gain
The temper'd helm, and trust shall soon obtain."
His patience lost, corag'd Orlando cries:
"Thou infidel! artifice of lies!
When was the time, and where the fatal ground
On which thy arms o'er mine th' advantage found?
Behold that champion, little thought so near,
Behold in me the Paladin is here!--
Prove if thy force can make this helmet thine, 310
Or this right hand thy shield and armour mine;
Nor seek I any vantage?"--Thus he said,
And swift the casque unlacing from his head,

7 Both the poet and Orlando, and likewise Ferrau before, ver. 271, seem to have forgot the enchantment, by which each knight was incapable of being wounded. But one general observation will serve for all these circumstances, whenever they occur; they are such slips as will be found in every

He hung it on a tree in open view,
 And Durindana from the scabbard drew.
 No less Ferrau was seen his sword to wield,
 While o'er his head he rais'd the fencing shield:
 They rein their steeds, they strike, they ward by
 Their fury kindles as the combat burns. [turns;
 Where best their force can plate or joint invade, 320
 They speed the thrust or whirl the beamy blade.
 Not all the world a fearless knight can show
 Like each of these to meet a fearless foe:
 For courage both, for prowess both renown'd,
 And both alike incapable of wound.
 Oft have you heard, my lord, that magic art
 Secur'd Ferrau in every vital part,
 Save that alone, which first the nurture gives
 Whilst in the womb the helpless infant lives.
 Not less Angiante's knight⁸, by potent charm, 330
 Was kept in combat safe from every harm
 Of weapon's edge; while pervious to the steel
 His feet, beneath, the piercing wound could feel:
 But each secur'd, in every bloody strife,
 With double plates, the place endangering life.
 Thus less for need than pomp of outward show,
 They went in arms array'd against a foe.

More dreadful grew the war—Ferrau so well
 His weapon aim'd, it struck, whene'er it fell,
 With point or edge: nor less at every stroke 340
 Orlando's sword the mail in shivers broke.
 There stood Angelica, conceal'd from sight,
 The single witness of so fierce a fight.
 For Sacripant, who deem'd the royal maid
 Not far remote, amid the forest stray'd,
 Soon as Orlando and Ferrau he view'd
 Engag'd in strife, her fancy'd course pursu'd⁹.
 Angelica awhile in equal scales

The conflict sees, where neither side prevails:
 At length desire some new device to prove 350
 Incites her thence the helmet to remove;
 In harmless pastime, meant slow to view
 What part the rival warriors would pursue.
 Then in a sportive mood the casque she took,
 And soon the place and combatants forsook,
 Unseen of each, so eager in the fight:
 At length Ferrau, who turn'd aside his sight,
 First held his hand, and to Orlando said,
 "Lo! how our late companion has betray'd 359
 The faith of knights! What prize for us remains,
 When he, by fraud, the victor's meed obtains?"
 Then on the tree Orlando bent his view;
 The helm he miss'd, and fierce his anger grew;
 And with Ferrau agreed, that this, in scorn
 Of either's claim, Circassia thence had borne.
 The earl his Brigliadoro through the wood
 Impatient urg'd; as swift Ferrau pursu'd;
 Till different tracks of horses' feet they found,
 Left by the knight and damsel on the ground.

great work; and to which, though the reference is rather common, we may always apply the words of Horace:

— aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus.

— sometimes good Homer sleeps.

⁸ He makes Orlando and Ferrau invulnerable, according to the common fable of Achilles and Cygnus. See this matter discussed at large, book xxix. note to ver. 122.

⁹ Sacripant appears again, book xxii. ver. 92.

Here to the left his course Orlando bore, 370
 The course Circassia's king had held before;
 Ferrau, by chance, more near the mountain stray'd,
 Through late worn traces of the flying maid.

Meantime the virgin to a fountain drew,
 Where verdant bowers with leaves o'er shading grew:

Where pilgrims, shelter'd from the sultry beam,
 With draughts refreshing from the limpid stream
 Allay'd their thirst: here, fearless of surprise,
 Angelica (who on her ring relies
 In every danger) to the bank descends, 380
 And on a bough the glittering helm suspends;
 Then seeks a place where, ty'd at ease, her breast
 Might crop from flowery meads the verdant feast.

The Spanish knight, who close pursu'd the dame,
 By equal windings to the fountain came,
 Not unobserv'd, for instant from his sight
 She vanish'd, and prepar'd her speedy flight;
 But vainly strove the helmet to regain,
 That roll'd to distance bounded on the plain.

When first the Pagan prince with raptur'd eyes 390
 Beholds Angelica—he hastes, he flies
 To meet the fair-one, who his hope deceives,
 As some light form th' awaken'd dreamer leaves.
 He seeks her round in covert, shade, and bower,
 But seeks in vain—blaspheming every power,
 With Trevigant and Mahomet¹⁰, ador'd
 By Pagan votaries, as gods impior'd,
 And every name his sect repeats with awe,
 The priests and teachers of this impious law.

Now near the fount again the warrior drew, 400
 And, cast on earth, Orlando's helmet knew,
 By characters that round its edge explain'd
 When, and from whom, the precious prize was gain'd;

While much he griev'd to lose the lovely maid,
 Who unapparent, like a phantom shade,
 Escap'd his sight, he seiz'd with eager haste,
 And on his head the long-sought helmet plac'd.

¹⁰ The name of Trevigant is common in the romances of chivalry and in the old ballads, where Trevigant and Mabound (Mahomet) frequently occur.

So likewise Spenser:

And oftentimes by Termagaunt and Mabound swore.

Fairy Queen, book vi. c. vii.

"Termagaunt (or as here called Trevigant) is the name given in the old romances to the god of the Saracens, in which he is constantly linked with Mabound: thus in the old Legend of Sir Guy,

So help me Mabowne of might,

And Termagaunt my god so bright.

"Perhaps Termagaunt had been a name given to some Saxon idol, and our ignorant ancestors, who thought all that did not receive the Christian law were necessarily Pagans and idolators, supposed the Mahometan creed was in all respects the same with that of their Pagan forefathers, and therefore made no scruple to give the ancient name Termagaunt to the god of the Saracens: the French romancers, who had borrowed the word from us, corrupted it into Tervagaunte: the Italians called it Trevigante."

See Reliques of Ancient Poetry, vol. i. p. 76. 3d edit.

One only wish remain'd yet unpossest,
 To find his mistress and in love be blest.
 He search'd the woods, till every hope was lost, 410
 Then turn'd to Paris, to the Spanish host :
 But though desponding with a lover's grief,
 His vow fulfill'd afforded some relief, [chief.
 Since thus the helm he gain'd from great Anglante's
 Son as these tidings to the earl were brought,
 Long time from land to land Ferrau he sought ;
 Nor cess'd, till from his head the prize he drew,
 And him between " two neighbouring bridges slew.
 Angelica with sad and pensive look,
 Alone, inviaible, her journey took : 420
 The helmet lost employ'd her anxious mind,
 Which near the fount her haste had left behind.
 " My too officious care," exclaim'd the maid,
 " His trusty head-piece from the earl convey'd :
 And is it thus his merits I regard,
 And claims from me his service such reward ?
 Heaven knows my secret heart ! (though now th' event

Has other prov'd) my blameless purpose went
 To vey the fight ; but ah ! I little thought 429
 To give you brutal knight the prize he sought !"

Repentant thus she mourn'd the deed that left
 Anglante's champion of his helm bereft ;
 And eastward journey'd, now to sight reveal'd,
 Now by her ring from every eye conceal'd ;
 Through many a region, many a city pass'd,
 Till to a lonely wood arriv'd at last,
 Between two warriors slain a youth she view'd.
 Whose wounded breast a crimson stream bedew'd.

But here Angelica we leave¹⁹, and tell
 What new adventures many a knight befell : 440
 Nor of Ferrau, nor Sacripant²⁰ we sing,
 But tune to different themes the various string.
 Far other task demands us to record
 The valiant deeds of Brava's noble lord²¹ ;
 What long laborious search he yet sustain'd
 To gain that blessing which he never gain'd.
 Another casque the careful hero bought,
 (For still to keep himself unknown he sought)

¹⁹ The incident here mentioned appears not when in the Orlando Furioso, but probably Ariosto alludes to a story in some popular romance, familiar to his Italian readers, though not known to his translator. Fauste de Longjumeau, an Italian commentator, tells us that Ferrau was of a gigantic stature, and came over with Agramant against Charlemain, in which war he made many French nobles prisoners, but was afterwards slain by Orlando. Some say that he invaded France with twenty thousand Saracens, sent by the admiral of Babylon, that he had in himself the strength of forty men, and was stabbed by Orlando in the navel, in which part only Boyardo and Ariosto tell us that he was vulnerable. We have the testimony of Marcus Antonius Sabellicus, a noted writer of the sixteenth century, that there was a Moorish Spaniard, named Ferrau, a redoubted champion of the age of Charlemain.

²⁰ He returns to Angelica in the sixth book, ver. 122.

²¹ Ferrau appears again in the review of the Pagan army, book xiv. ver. 111, and Sacripant is spoken of, book xxvii. ver. 92.

²² Orlando.

But nor the metal, nor the temper try'd,
 His fated skin the edge of steel defy'd ; 450
 Then follow'd her, whose love he held so dear,
 Through every season of the changing year.

As Phœbus from the fields of Ocean drew
 His smooth-hair'd coursers wet with briny dew ;
 What time Aurora stream'd with ruddy light,
 And stars yet glimmer'd in the rear of night :
 Not far remote from Paris' regal town,
 Orlando gain'd new laurels of renown.

Two bands he met : one Manilardo led,
 A Pagan reverenc'd for his hoary head ; 460
 Of Norway king ; once gallant in the field ;
 But better now in arts of council skill'd.
 To lead the other, with his standard came
 The king of Tremizen, of mighty fame
 In Afric, and Alzirio was his name.

These troops, with all the numerous Pagan host,
 In towns and castles held their winter's post ;
 Some near the walls, which Agramant in vain
 Had waited long with powerful siege to gain ;
 And now resolv'd, in all the dreadful form 470
 Of horrid war, at one assault to storm.

For this intent he summon'd every power ;
 Not those alone that came from Afric's shore,
 Or those by king Marcellus brought from Spain ;
 But those which France had added to his train :
 For late from Paris' walls to Arlis' food,
 He many a town in Gascony subdu'd.

When now, unchain'd from winter's icy cold,
 Within their beds the murmuring currents roll'd ;
 When the glad meads resum'd their vivid green, 480
 And budding leaves to deck the trees were seen ;
 Then gave king Agramant his wide command,
 To muster all his forces, band by band :
 For this the king of Tremizen in haste,

And king of Norway, o'er the country pass'd,
 To lead their squadrons, where the army drew
 To pass before their chiefs in just review.

When now Alzirio led the earl espy'd,
 Whose like in arms not all the world supply'd,
 Whose limbs and mien heroic from afar 490
 D. nounc'd defiance, like the god of war ;
 He deem'd him first of every martial band,
 And rashly long'd to meet him hand to hand.

Young was Alzirio, and of lofty pride,
 Of daring courage, and of vigour try'd.
 His social ranks, in evil hour, he left,
 And spur'd his steed, of better sense bereft,
 At once the foe's prevailing force to feel,
 And sink triumph'd by great Anglante's steel.
 The courser flies affrighted o'er the plains, 500
 No master on his back to guide the reins !
 Now rose a dreadful tumult, when they view'd
 The youth all pale and weltering in his blood :
 Some couch'd their spears, and some their falchions
 And on the knight with headlong fury flew ; [drew,
 While some with darts and arrows gall'd from far
 The flower of champions in a missive war.

As gathering round with hoarse obtreperous cry
 Appear the swine, when from some cavern nigh
 The wolf or bear, to seize their prey descends, 510
 And with fell jaws a bleeding porker rends ;
 So seem'd the crew, inflam'd with barbarous spite,
 And urg'd each other on to assault the knight.
 A thousand darts, and spears, and swords rebound
 From his broad shield, or on his cuirass sound.
 One struck behind him with a ponderous mace ;
 One stood beside ; one met him face to face :

But he who ne'er a thought of fear allow'd,
 With careless eye beheld th' ignoble crowd ;
 Thus, leaping o'er the fence in nightly folds, 500
 A wolf the number of the sheep beholds.
 His hand was seen the thundering sword to wield,
 By which such numerous Pagans press'd the field.
 Hard were the task, amid the throng, to tell
 The warriors that beneath his weapon fell !
 A purple torrent all the plain o'erflow'd,
 That scarce suffic'd to bear the ghastly load.
 No quilted vest, nor fencing turban roll'd
 Around the head in many a winding fold,
 Nor plated shield, nor temper'd casque defends, 530
 Where Durindana's trenchant edge descends.
 Loud groans and cries the dying soldiers yield.
 And heads and arms are scatter'd o'er the field.
 Death stalks amidst the crimson ranks of fight,
 In various forms, all horrible to sight ;
 " Yon weapon in Orlando's hand," he cries,
 " With my fell scythe in copious slaughter vies !"
 The wounded fly, nor longer will await
 A second wound, but fear the stroke of fate ;
 While those who thought a single knight to make
 Their easy conquest, now the plain forsake, 541
 Nor one remains with him his dearest friend to take.
 Regardless of the way, with fearful speed
 This plies his feet, that spurs his rapid steed.
 Lo ! Virtue bears her mirror in the field,
 Which every blemish of the soul reveal'd ;
 None look'd therein, except a hoary sire ;
 Age shrunk his nerves, but could not damp his fire :
 He saw 'twas nobler far in fight to die,
 Than with dishonour turn his back to fly. 550
 This sage was Norway's king, who grasp'd his lance,
 And fearless met the matchless peer of France.
 Against the shield's round boss the weapon broke ;
 Unmov'd the Paladin receiv'd the stroke.
 As Manilardo pass'd, Orlando aim'd
 His deadly falchion that like lightning flam'd ;
 But fortune favour'd here the king so well,
 The blade fell flat, yet with such fury fell,
 The reverend warrior senseless lay for dead,
 And swooning darkness o'er his eye-balls spread.
 Orlando left him there, and eager flew 561
 To chase the remnant of the flying crew.
 As birds affrighted wing their airy way,
 When the fierce hawk pursues his trembling prey :
 So far'd these bands before the Christian knight,
 Some main'd, some slain, and some dispers'd in Orlando now, tho' well the land he knew, [flight
 Uncertain where his mistress to pursue ;
 To left or right, wher'er his course inclin'd,
 On other parts still ran his anxious mind ; 570
 Through woods, through plains, he sought the beautiful dame,
 Till near a mountain's craggy steep he came ;
 Thence, from a cleft, a stream of yellow light
 Pierc'd the dun shadows of surrounding night.
 As in the shelter which the bushes yield,
 Or midst the stubble of the new-reap'd field,
 In brake or dell, th' unwary'd hunter's care
 Winds the deep mazes of the fearful hare :
 So, with a beating heart, by hope betray'd,
 The knight, who saw the sudden gleam that play'd
 Amidst the trees, the hill explor'd, and found 581
 A spacious cavern hewn within the ground,
 The mouth with brambles fence'd ; a safe retreat
 For those that fix'd in woods their rustic seat
 From human haunts !—the taper's ray reveal'd
 With glimmering light the cave by day conceal'd.

Orlando, while he mus'd what savage race
 Might there reside, resolv'd to explore the place.
 His Briagliadoco first securely ty'd,
 He clear'd the branches that access deny'd ; 590
 Then in the tomb, that held the living, went
 By many steps a narrow deep descent.
 Large was the cave, but scarce at noon of day
 The winding mouth receiv'd a feeble ray ;
 Yet from an opening to the right appear'd
 A beam of sunshine that the dwelling cheer'd.
 Here, seated near a blazing hearth, he found,
 In budding prime, a tender virgin crown'd,
 With beauty that might every heart entice,
 And make this gloomy grot a Paradise ; 600
 Though in her eyes the starting tear confess'd
 Some hidden anguish rankling in her breast.
 With her an aged beidame seem'd to jar
 (As women oft are wont) in wordy war :
 But when Orlando in their presence came,
 Each held her peace: the knight to either dame
 Fair greeting gave, as one whose noble mind
 Was ever gentle to the gentle kind.
 They rising sudden, his salutes repaid,
 Though each at first appear'd with looks dismay'd,
 To bear his voice, and entering there behold 611
 A man all arm'd whose mien might freeze the bold.
 With wonder fill'd, Orlando sought to know
 What savage wretch, to human race a foe,
 Could keep entomb'd in such a lonely place,
 The sweet attractions of such virgin grace.
 Scarce to the knight the damsel can reply,
 Her words out short by many a heavy sigh,
 Which from her coral lip her griefs exhale,
 While still she strives to speak her woeful tale. 620
 Tears stain her lovely cheek ; as oft we view
 The rose and lily wet with morning dew.
 Th' ensuing book, my lord, the sequel shows,
 For time requires that here the book we close.

BOOK XIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Isabella relates her story to Orlando, who delivers her from the outlaws. Bradamant, lamenting for the absence of Roger, is comforted by Melissa, and instructed how she may set him at liberty from the castle of Atlantes. Melissa, at the request of Bradamant, tells her the names of many illustrious women that are to descend from her race. She then conducts her near the castle of Atlantes, and takes leave of her. Agramant prepares to muster his forces.

Roger venturous were the knights of old renown'd,
 Who in the desert shade, the vales profound,
 The gloomy cavern, or the forest dell,
 Where serpents, bears, and roaring lions dwell,
 Found many a dame of such exalted mien,
 As rarely now in palaces are seen,
 Who, in their earliest bloom of charms, might bear
 The prize from all—the fairest of the fair.

I told how to Orlando was reveal'd
 A tender virgin in a cave conceal'd, 10
 Of whom he sought the hidden cause to know
 That kept her there ; and now with heart-felt woe,
 She spoke her griefs, enforc'd by many a sigh.
 And made, in pleasing accents, this reply :

"Though, courteous knight, my mournful tale
disclos'd,

To certain punishment I stand expos'd:
Since yonder woman will my words relate
To him, who holds me in this captive state;
Yet let it come—what can I from his hand,
More grateful than the stroke of death demand? 90
Hear first, that Isabella's name I own,
Daughter of him who fills Galicia's throuce:
Once was I his—but now, alas! the heir
Of desolation, sorrow, and despair!
From love I trace the cause of all my smart,
From love, that steals the virgin's gentle heart.
Once was I young and beautiful, rich and blest,
Now poor and low, with fortune's frowns oppress.
Yet let me, undiguish'd, sir Knight, disclose
The early cause of all my present woes; 30
And should you fail to cure, at least my grief
May from your generous pity find relief.

"Twelve months are past, since in Bayona's land
My royal sire a tournament ordain'd,
To which, invited by the trump of fame,
From various regions various champions came.
But, whether love misled my partial mind,
Or that his virtues o'er the warrior kind
So brightly blaz'd—Zerbino! singly won
My soul's dear praise. Zerbino only son 40
To Scotland's king, whose knightly feats of arms
My throbbing bosom fill'd with soft alarms.
I lov'd—yet happy seem'd to place my heart
Upon an object of such high desert.
Zerbino, every lord my eyes beheld,
In comely form and bravery excell'd.
Not less sincere than mine his passion glow'd;
And though forbid to meet, our flames we vow'd
By message oft, and while we liv'd disjoint'd,
We felt the tenderest union of the mind. 50

"Zerbino now, when clos'd the solemn feast,
To Scotland's realm again his course address'd.
If e'er your soul the hour of parting knew,
Reflect what sorrow must his loss ensue.
He night and day was present to my thought;
While like affection in his bosom wrought,

"A Scotch author, Drummond of Hawthornden, in his History of Scotland says, that though Ariosto did not know him personally, he complimented the virtues of James V. in the character of Zerbino; and having cited Ariosto, he adds some verses from Ronsard in praise of that prince. Another author says, that when James V. married the duke of Guise's daughter, he made an excursion from France into Italy, and became acquainted with Ariosto. James was a most accomplished prince: Latin was, in his time, the favourite study of Scotland, and to the utmost gallantry of disposition he added a singular love for polite literature, and was himself a poet. Christ Kirk on the Green, and some of his other ballads, contain genuine description and humour. James died, at the age of thirty-one or two, of grief. Just as his army was going to give battle to the English, he sent one Oliver Sinclair, his favourite, with a commission to supersede the general; upon which the whole army yielded themselves prisoners of war, without one blow being struck: his high spirit could not brook this affront, and he expired in a few days in the fever of indignation."

For the above note I am indebted to my friend

And bade him every secret means employ
With my lov'd sight to crown his future joy.
Our different faiths forbade him to require
My hand in marriage of the king my sire. 60
A Pagan I, and he a Christian bred;
With open rites he us'er must hope to wed
Galicia's princess: hence his fearless mind
To bear me from my native land design'd.

"Ort in a garden, deck'd with summer's pride,
Where near the gay parterres a crystal tide
Meandering roll'd, upon the banks I stood,
And view'd afar the hills and surgy flood.
This place I effect his bold design he chose,
That nothing might our union more oppose: 70
To me his secret thoughts he first declar'd,
Then, well equipp'd, a rapid bark prepar'd,
By Odorico the Biscayan's care,
On sea and land a master of the war.
Zerbino, by his aged father sent,
With all his powers in aid of Gallia went:
Himself forbid to stay, he left behind
This Odorico, and to him consign'd
Th' important charge: as one he still had found
By every act of love and duty bound; 80
On whom he deem'd his friendship might rely,
If benefits conferr'd could fix the tie.

"Now, in my garden, on th' appointed day,
Till night I stay'd, a voluntary prey:
When Odorico near the city drew,
And up the river with his chosen few,
Advancing silent, sudden leapt on shore,
And me in triumph to his galley bore,
Ere yet the tumult had the town alarm'd;
My household train, affrighted and unarm'd; 90
Part in the skirmish fell, while others fled,
And part, surpris'd, with me were captive led.
Joyful I bade my native soil adieu,
In hopes my lov'd Zerbino soon to view.
Scarce had our ship the cape of Mongia past,
When, rising from the left, a stormy blast
Drove clouds on clouds, made mountain-surges rise
And dash their spumy foreheads in the skies,
While from her track the wind our vessel bore,
And gather'd strength with every dreadful hour:

Mr. Mickle, the excellent translator of Camoens; but on further examination of the matter, there appeared a great objection to the account of Drummond. James died in the year 1542 or 1543, being then thirty-one or thirty-two years of age, so that when Ariosto published his Furioso in 1515, James was only five or six years old; unless we suppose that any characteristic compliment was inserted by the author in the last edition, which passage may be cited by Drummond. The last edition published in the life of the poet was in 1532, at which time James was about twenty-one years of age, but had not entered upon public life, being detained in the power of the earl of Angus. With respect to the journey made by James into Italy, mentioned by the other author, on the prince's marriage with the duke of Guise's daughter, it is certain this marriage did not take place till about the year 1539, and that Ariosto died in 1533. Hence we may observe, how little dependence is to be had on these kind of stories so readily adopted by the partiality of historians, to do honour to a favourite national character.

See Hume's History of England, vol. iv. oct. edit.

Not all the sailors' art could stem the tide, 101
 Nor could the cordage work the bark to guide:
 In vain we strike the sail against the mast,
 We bind the courses, from the deck we cast
 Each useless load; we find, as thus we strive,
 Our ship against the rocks of Rochelle drive.
 Swift as a shaft before the storm it drove,
 And none could save, but us who rules above!
 "Struck with our peril, the Biscayan try'd
 A last resource, too oft in vain apply'd: 110
 With him he bade me from the ship descend,
 And to the shallow skiff our lives commend.
 Two more descended; and a numerous band
 As soon had follow'd, but with sword in hand
 Compell'd, alas! their entrance we deny'd,
 Our cable cut, and floated on the tide,
 Till safe we landed on the rocky coast;
 But with the vessel wreck'd the crew were lost
 And all her freight—my hands to Heaven I rais'd,
 And for my life preserv'd my Maker prais'd, 120
 Who left me not to perish far from shore,
 And never see my dear Zerbino more.
 Though with the sinking ship remain'd behind
 My vests and jewels, wealth of every kind,
 Yet blest with hopes to find my prince again,
 Unmov'd I saw them swallow'd by the main.
 "Wild was the land, uncultivate and rude,
 Nor track of foot, nor roofs of men we view'd;
 Nought but a mountain, round whose craggy brow
 The loud winds blew, the billows roar'd below. 130
 "Here cruel Love, that false perfidious boy,
 Prompt to deceive, and watchful to destroy,
 With suit dishonest, by his froward will,
 My joy to sorrow chang'd, my good to ill.
 That friend, in whom his trust Zerbino plac'd,
 Froze in his faith, and burnt with flames unchaste.
 Whether at sea he felt th' unhallo'd fire,
 But durst not then avow his black desire:
 Or whether this remote and lonely place
 Inspir'd his bosom with a thought so base: 140
 The traitor now a secret plan resolv'd;
 T' accomplish what his impious soul resolv'd;
 And hence of two that 'scap'd with us the flood
 Would one dismiss, a youth of Scottish blood,
 Almonio nam'd, and by Zerbino lov'd,
 In faith unsully'd, as in arms approv'd:
 Him Odorico bade to weigh the same,
 Should they to Rochelle's walls a princely dame
 On foot convey; and begg'd him hence with speed
 From Rochelle to supply our present need. 150
 "Almonio, fearing nought, his course pursu'd
 To where, conceal'd from view beyond the wood,
 Six miles remote, the peopled city stood.
 His friend remain'd: to him the traitor meant
 Without disguise t' unveil his foul intent:
 Corebo of Bilbao was his name;
 Whom Odorico, nothing aw'd by shame,
 Would tempt to break his faith; with him he led
 His early life; with him from childhood bred,
 He hop'd to see him prize his friend's desire 160
 Above the ties that virtue might require.
 Corebo, great of soul, and nobly born,
 Abhorr'd the deed, and with indignant scorn
 Reproach'd his breach of faith, and firmly strove
 By every means t' oppose his impious love.
 From threat to threat increasing passion grew
 In either breast, till each his weapon drew:
 When, struck with terror to behold the fight,
 I turn'd me to the woods in speedy flight.
 "Soon Odorico, long to battle train'd, 170
 By skill superior, such advantage gain'd,
 He left Corebo on the ground for dead,
 And follow'd me who thence so sadly fled.
 Love surely lent him pinions to pursue;
 Love taught his tongue with soothing speech to
 But fruitless all—for rather than comply [wco;
 With such desires, I stood resolv'd to die.
 When prayers, and threats, and batteries nought
 With open force my honour he assail'd. [avail'd,
 In vain I wept—implo'r'd—in vain I press'd 180
 The sacred friendship to his lord profess'd;
 Bade him reflect that to his faith sincere
 Zerbino trusted all he held most dear.
 Entreaties lost, and every hope of aid
 Far, far remote to save a wretched maid;
 While he with impious rage and force increas'd,
 Assail'd my virtue like some ravenous beast,
 With hands and feet in my defence I strove,
 With teeth and nails repuls'd his brutal love:
 His hair and beard I tore, his flesh I rent, 190
 And pierc'd with shrieks the vaulted firmament.
 I know not if by fortune thither led,
 Or by my voice that round the country spread
 Its piercing notes; or wont to scour the strand
 When vessels bulg'd, or strew'd with wrecks the
 But from the summit of the hill I spy'd [sand;
 A crew descending to the ocean's side:
 Th' impure Biscayan, seiz'd with guilty fright,
 His purpose left, to save himself by flight.
 Behold me by this band in happy hour 200
 Preserv'd, my lord, from that false traitor's power,
 Yet but preserv'd the proverb to fulfil;
 "Who 'scapes one mischief meets another still."
 'T is true—I am not yet so curst to find
 My honour wrong'd, though this degenerate kind
 No virtues hold in awe; but thirst of gain
 Incites them from my person to abstain,
 Which kept, as now, in maiden lustre pure,
 Will for my purchase ampler sums secure.
 Eight months claps'd, I see the ninth arrive, 210
 Since here I wretched dwell entomb'd alive.
 All hopes of my Zerbino now must fail—
 From these I learn, my beauty set to sale,
 And terms agreed, a merchant will receive,
 And me, unhappy, to the Soldan give."
 So spoke the lovely maid, and as she spoke,
 Sighs following sighs her angel speeches broke:
 Her tender grief compassion might infuse
 In asps and tigers, while she thus renews
 Her tender sorrows, or in plaintive strain 220
 Allays the anguish of her secret pain.
 Thus they; when sudden in the cave appears
 A crew with knotty clubs, with staves and spears:
 Th' ill-favour'd leader of the brutal crew
 His single eye around the cavern threw;
 A woman that chanc'd upon his face to light,
 Had crypt his nose and clos'd one eye in night.
 Soon as he saw the chief, who listen'd gate
 To hear the virgin-fair her tale relate,
 He turn'd, and joyful to his fellows said: 230
 "Behold a bird for whom no net was spread!"
 Then to the earl—"For me in luckier hour
 No stranger ever reach'd this place before;
 Thou mayst have heard I long have sought in vain,
 Such radiant arms and vest like thine to gain:
 And gladly I behold thee thus at hand,
 To answer now what'er thy wants demand."
 Swift starting from his seat with noble pride,
 Orlando smil'd severe, and thus reply'd:
 "These arms I value at a price so high, 240
 Who hopes their purchase must full dearly buy."
 Then from the blazing hearth a brand he took,
 All red with fire and hissing from the smoke,

And sudden threw—above the ostiff's nose,
By chance it strikes between the meeting brows;
And instant quenches in eternal night
His only wretched minister of light;
And sends his ghost to join the dreary train
By Charon's doom'd to lakes of fiery pain.
A table, form'd in square, of ponderous wood, 230
Of size capacious, in the cavern stood;
Which, ill-sustain'd with rude unshapen feet,
The thief and all his fellows held at meat:
Easy, as from his hand dismiss in air,
The dextrous Spaniard sends the cane afar,
Wondrous to tell! this weight Orlando threw,
Where throng'd together press'd th' ungodly crew.
The shatter'd limb, crush'd head, and gory breast,
The crackling hose the thundering mass confess'd:
Some crippled every part, some slain outright: 260
Who least is hurt attempts to 'scape by flight.
So when in clustering knot, a smoky brood,
Bev'ring joyful with the spring renew'd,
Bask in the sun, if by some peasant thrown
Amidst them lights a huge unwieldy stone,
On all the curling heap what mischief flies!
This leaves his sever'd tail; that, mangled dies:
Another crush'd and bruise'd attempts with pain
To drag behind his sinuous length of train:
Another happier 'midst the grassy way 270
Escapes, and hissing glides anew for prey.
Such was the havoc here—less strange to tell,
Since from Orlando's arm the ruin fall.
Good Turpin's page declares that sev'n alone
Escap'd the weight by fierce Orlando thrown.
While to their feet their safety these commend,
The champion stands what mischief flies!
With pinewood arms he drags them forth to view,
Where with thick bought an aged service grew:
The leaves he clears, and hangs them quivering 280
there

A living prey to all the fowls of air.
Nor needs he iron bands, or strong link'd chain,
To purge the Earth of such an impious train;
The tree its branches yields, with these supply'd,
Orlando by the neck the struggling wretches ty'd.
That aged helmsman, to the thieves a friend,
Who saw their ill-spent lives disastrous end,
With shrieks and outcries, tearing from her head
The hoary hairs, to woods and deserts fled;

* Of these burning lakes in which thieves and murderers are punished, an account is given in Dante, Canto xxv of his Inferno; where he assigns to these the seventh gulf, and where, he tells us, Chiron the Centaur, and his companions, stand armed with darts, which they shoot at the damned, as often as they attempt to escape from the lake of torment. Some commentators read in this passage of Ariosto, Chiron instead of Charon. Zatta, in the last edition of 1773, tells us, that in the editions of 1516 and 1532, both corrected by the author, it is printed Chiron and not Charon; and Fornari, in his commentary, gives it Chiron.

† The poet alludes to an exercise used among the Spaniards, requiring much dexterity and agility; it was performed on horseback, and consisted chiefly in throwing canes or reeds to a great distance.

109. 12A.

Till near a stream she met, as chance befel, 290
A knight, whose name I here forbear to tell,
And turn to her, who still Orlando pray'd
With guardian power to watch a helpless maid;
And wou'd her steps should all his steps attend:
The noble warrior, like a tender friend,
Her sorrows sooth'd; and when Aurora drest
In rosy garland and in purple vest,
Resum'd her wonted track through morning air,
The knight departs with Isabella fair.
Then many a day they journey'd ere befel 300
Adventures worthy of the Muse to tell.
At length, amidst a mingled crew, they found
A champion dragg'd along, in fetters bound.
To Amos's daughter now we change the strain,
To her, whom late we left in amorous pain.
The valiant maid, whom every breast must mourn,
Who vainly hopes Rogero's swift return,
Still near Marseilles resides in anxious woe, 309
And every day annoys the Pagan foe,
That wide o'er hill and dale with plundering bands
O'er-run Provence and all the neighbouring lands,
Where the bright maid a great example gave,
Of prudent leader as of warrior brave.

Long has the time elapsed that to her sight
Should once again restore her dearest knight;
In dread suspense, a thousand thoughts molest,
For lov'd Rogero's stay, her tender breast.
One day, of many a day, retir'd to mourn
Her fate alone, she sees that dame return,
Who in the wondrous ring the medicine bore, 320
To heal the heart that felt Alcina's power.
But when (such tedious hours of absence past)
She sees her come without the knight at last,
Swift from her cheek the fading roses fly,
And scarce her trembling knees their aid supply.
Soon as th' enchantress sees the virgin's fear,
She hastes to meet her with reviving cheer,
Where every look such speaking comfort bears,
As his are wot who happy tidings bears.
"Let no vain doubts," she cry'd, "thy bosom 330
shake;

Rogero lives, and lives but for thy sake;
Yet lives, compell'd his freedom to forgo,
Again the prisoner to thy constant foe.
Now wouldst thou seek him, mount thy ready steed
Without delay, and follow where I lead.
Soon shalt thou, virgin, well instructed see
The means to set thy lov'd Rogero free."

This said; she all the magic guile declar'd
Which for the knight Atlantes had prepar'd,
Who Bradamant's resembling features wore, 340
The seeming captive in a giant's power,
When to th' enchanted dune the youth he drew,
Then instant vanish'd from his wondering view;
And how, with like device, th' enchanter wrought
On knights and damsels to his castle brought;
Who from his sight such various passions prov'd;
Who view'd in him, by strange deception mov'd,
Friend, squire, companion, steed, or dame belov'd,
Urg'd by delusive hope they fondly trace,
With ceaseless toil, the visionary place. 350
"Soon as thy feet," she cries, "shall reach the land

Where, near, the wondrous pile is seen to stand,

* He resumes this story, Book xx, ver. 779.

† He returns to Orlando and Isabella, Book xiii, ver. 388.

Th' enchanter shalt thou meet, who to thy sight
Will seem thy love, oppress by stronger might;
But lest, by magic guile, thou here shouldst fall
In snares, that till this hour have fetter'd all,
Distrust thy sense, and when thou see'st him nigh,
Unsheath thy sword, and bid the traitor die.
Nor think of life Rogero to deprive,
But him from whom thy woes their source derive.
Hard must it prove to aim the mortal blow 361
On him whose looks thy knight's resemblance
show:

Then ere I lead thee hence you come to find,
Finn to the purpose steel thy constant mind,
For ne'er to thee may Fate Rogero give,
If through thy weakness now thy foe should live."

The warlike virgin, with determin'd will
To free her lover and the sorcer's kill,
Appears in arms, impatient to pursue
Her guiding steps whose truth so well she knew.
Melissa leads her thence with eager haste, 371
O'er many a cultur'd land and dreary waste,
Thro' wood and lawn; while sage discourse beguiles
The tedious journey, and relieves their toils.
Much of the virgin's race th' enchantress tells,
On this, her lov'd, her favourite theme, she dwells:
That from Rogero and herself should rise
Heroes and demi-gods to claim the skies.
As to Melissa every power was given
To view the secrets of mysterious Heaven; 380
Her searching eye could each event presage,
Long hence decreed in time's succeeding page.

"O friend approv'd! O ever prudent guide!"
Thus to the prophetic virgin cry'd,
"Whose art has many a famous man foretold,
My unborn sons, when years on years have roll'd:
Vouchsafe to speak of some illustrious dame
(If such my line may boast) whose future fame
Among the virtuous and the fair may rise."
She ceas'd—the matron mildly thus replies: 390
"Great dames from thee descend, of whom shall spring

The potent emperor and scepter'd king;
All these, in sweeping vast, have equal praise
With crested knights, that bright in armour blaze:
For wisdom, piety, and courage, crown'd
With fame, but most for chastity renown'd.
Hard task to name, where many stand so high,
Not one I see to pass in silence by.
Yet, midst a thousand, let me (to pursue
What time permits) select the nobler few. 400
O! hadst thou in the cave thy thoughts display'd,
Thine eyes had then each passing form survey'd.

"See! from thy glorious stem a dame descend,
To virtuous deeds and liberal arts a friend:
With her for grace and beauty rests the prize,
Chaste with the chasteest, with the wisest wise;
Fam'd Isabella?, whose resplendent light
Shall glid with equal beams, by day, or night,
The walls which Minicius' silver waters lave,
The land whose title⁶ Cenus' mother gave. 410

⁷ Isabella, the wife of Francisco Gonzaga, who was general of the Venetians against Charles VIII. in aid of the Genoese: she was daughter to the first Hercules duke of Ferrara, and sister to Alphonso and Hippolito, a lady of great qualities and virtue.
Purcacchi, Eugenio.

⁶ He means Mantua, built by the fairy Manto, mother of Cenus, according to the words which he

There shall she long a bright example give,
And, with her lord, in sweet contention live,
Who best shall rear, who dearest Virtue hold,
Who widest of Benevolence unfold
The sacred gates: in Rheims or Tero's land,
While Gauls repuls'd confess his conquering hand,
She, like Penelope, the purest dame,
Not less than her Ulysses lives to fame.
Of her great things, and many I reveal,
Comprisd in little space, but more conceal, 420
Which when I left the busy world, and sought
The cavern'd dome, prophetic Merlin taught.
In this vast ocean should my vessel dare,
Not Tiphys' voyage⁸ could with mine compare.
Let this suffice—what Virtue can bestow
Of good or great, shall Isabella know.
Nor less her sister Beatrice¹⁰ shall claim
Each gift, that well befits a sister's name;
Blest in herself, shall equal bliss afford
To all around, but chief her plighted lord; 430
Who, at her death, a sad reverse shall know,
And sink from height of bliss to depth of woe:
While she survives, Calabria's ears remain,
Unquell'd, with Moro and with Sforza gain
A dreadful name, from Hyperborean snows
To where remote the gulf of Persia flows
O'er ruddy sands—from India's furthest bound
To where your seas in Gades' straits resound,
Her death lamented shall reverse their fate,
And whelm, with them, in bonds th' Insulbian state.
All Italy's sufferings shall deplore, 441
And wisdom like her own be seen no more:
Before her birth shall many a matron claim
With worth no less the like illustrious name.
Of these must one (a dame rever'd) enclose
With fair Pannonia's crown her honour'd brows:
And one, when low in earth¹¹ her frail remains
She leaves behind, shall on th' Ausonian plains
Amidst the saints with hallow'd rites be plac'd,
Her votive shrine with gifts and incense grac'd. 450
The rest I pass—though each might singly ask
The lofty trump, and all the Muse's task.
Still in my breast I bear each generous dame,
Of Constance, Lucrece, and Bianca's name;

puts in the fairy's mouth, Book xliiii. ver. 723, in the tale of Adonio:

Lo! I, whom men the fairy Manto call,
Who founded first yon city's favour'd wall,
Which thou must oft have heard from flying fame
Has since been Mantua call'd from Manto's name.

Some say that this city was founded by her son.

¹¹ Beatrice of Esté, esteemed a saint, and whose body was deposited in the mountains of Padua, in a place called Ganola, four miles from Esté, where, on the top of a hill, was a nunnery richly endowed.

All that through wide Italia's states shall shine,
 Mothers and saviours of their noble line,
 Above each favour'd race thy house shall most
 In female issue glorious fortune boast :
 Each mother in her none not happier found,
 Than each fair consort in her spouse renown'd : 460
 "Behold Richarda", left in widow'd youth,
 Pattern of courage and consubial truth ;
 Left by her lord in luckless hour behind
 To Fortune's frowns, which oft the virtuous find.
 She sees her sons depriv'd of native home,
 And exil'd far in foreign regions roam :
 Left in the hands of their insulting foe,
 Till all their wrongs a happy period know.
 Nor midst these heroines I forget to place
 Th' illustrious queen¹³ of Aragonian race ; 470
 Than whom, for chaste reserve and counsel sage,
 None more adorn'd the Greek or Roman page.
 Not one shall more the smiles of Fortune see ;
 She, mother of a beauteous progeny,
 Shall with Alphonso give, to bless the earth,
 Hippolito and Isabella birth :
 This shall be Leonora—doom'd to twine
 (S' Heaven decrees) her happy branch with thine.
 How shall my words an equal tribute raise
 To her, the next in order, next in praise ? 480
 Lucretia Borgia¹⁴—who in beauty's power,
 In virtue, fortune, and in fame shall soar
 Above her sex—who spreads her fostering shade
 Like the green sapling in a fruitful glade.
 As dross to gold, as lead to silver shows ;
 The field-bred poppy to the garden rose ;
 The willow pale to ever verdant hays ;
 Or painted crystal to the diamond's blaze ;
 E'en so to her, of whom unborn I tell,
 Shall each appear that else might most excel. 490
 Of every virtue, whose transcendent fame
 Shall grace, alive or dead, her spotless name,
 Be this the chief, her Hercules to raise
 With all her sons to deeds of martial praise ;
 To plant the seeds that future wreaths may yield
 To bind their brows in council and in field.
 Nor must I here Renata¹⁵ fail to place,
 (Lucretia's near ally'd) of Gallia's race,

¹³ This Richarda might justly be called an example of fortitude. She was daughter of a marquis of Salazzo, and wife of Nicholas of Esté : being left a widow, she saw the inheritance of Hercules seized by Lionello and Borso, and her sons expelled and driven in search of some new establishment ; all which she supported with the utmost courage. Hercules retired to the court of Alphonso of Aragon, till by a change of fortune he was put in possession of the government.

Porcacchi, Eugenica.

¹⁴ Duke Hercules retiring to the court of Alphonso, by his virtue and valour gained to wife Leonora, daughter of Ferrando king of Naples : by her he had three children, Hippolito, Alphonso, and Isabella, here celebrated by Ariosto.

¹⁵ Daughter of Pope Alexander VI. of the house of Borgia. Her first husband was Giovanni Sforza, lord of Pisaro : her second was Aloisio Sforza, natural son of King Alphonso, and after his death she married Alphonso duke of Ferrara. Eugenica.

¹⁶ Lewis XII., after he came into possession of the realm of France, having divorced his first wife,

Of Lewis born (the twelfth that bears the name)
 And her, of Britanny the lasting fame. 500
 Each virtue woman has been found to know,
 Since fire was seen to burn, or streams to flow,
 Since you bright orbs have circled round the pole,
 I see comprid in fair Renata's soul.
 Of noble Aida (Saxon born) to tell
 I pass ; nor on Celano's countess dwell :
 Bianca sage, in Catalonia bred,
 The royal offspring of Sicilia's bed ;
 And lovely Lippa, of Bologna's strain,
 With numbers more that yet unfold remain : 510
 For should I singly count their praises o'er,
 I venture on a sea without a shore."

Thus to the listening maid the dame reveal'd
 Names yet in Time's remotest womb conceal'd :
 At length, arriving where Atlantes made
 His near abode, her course Melissa stay'd ;
 Nor would she further now her way pursue,
 But shunn'd to meet the false enchanter's view :
 Then having warn'd the dame, and urg'd once more
 Her pressing counsel, urg'd so oft before, 520
 Her leave she took—the martial maid alone
 Pursu'd a narrow track her guide had shown.
 Not far she rode, when lo ! before her sight
 Appear'd the likeness of her much-lov'd knight,
 Her dear Rogero, cloed in fight between
 Two mighty giants, who with dreadful mien
 Wield their huge weapons, while he pants for breath,

And seems just sinking in the jaws of death.
 Soon as the virgin sees so sorely prest
 One, in whose form Rogero stands confest, 530
 Her faith is vanish'd, new suspicion wakes,
 And every late resolve her breast forsakes.
 She thinks through hatred to Rogero grown
 From some strange cause, from some offence unknown,

Melissa this unheard-of snare had spread,
 By her, who lov'd him, to behold him dead.
 "Is that Rogero," to herself she cries,
 "Still at my heart—and sure before my eyes ?
 If 't is not him I see—if thus deceiv'd—
 Henceforth can aught be known or aught believ'd ?
 And shall I (every certain sense deny'd) 541
 Too blindly in another's faith confide ?
 Unseen my sympathising heart can tell,
 If near or absent he I love so well."

While thus she thinks, she hears or seems to hear
 Rogero's well-known voice assail her ear
 Imploing help—and now she sees him wheel
 His courser round, and with the goring steel
 Urge all his haste, while each gigantic foe 550
 As swift pursues : nor was the virgin slow
 To mark their course, but urges all her speed
 Till at the magic gate she checks her steed.
 No sooner enter'd, but Atlantes' wile
 Involves her senses in the common guile.
 In vain her speech, now here, now there she bends,
 Explains each part below, and now ascends,
 Nor day nor night her anxious rest she took,
 Yet oft the virgin with Rogero spoke,

who was sister to Charles VIII., he married Anna the daughter of Francis duke of Bretagne, with a view to gain the hereditary dominions which that princess held from her father. Of Lewis and Anna was born this Renata, who was daughter-in-law to Lucretia Borgia. Eugenica.

And oft they met, though neither (strange to tell)
The other knew—so strong the magic spell! 560
Here leave we Bradamant¹, nor vex thy mind
To leave her thus by fraudulent spells confin'd:
When time shall serve, behold the charm we break,
And both the lovers from their bondage take.
As, at the board with plecteous viands grac'd,
Cate after cate allures the sickening taste;
So, while my Muse repeats her varied strains,
Tale following tale the listening ear detains,
Full many a thread my busy fingers weave,
To form the various web my thoughts conceive. 570
Then hear, how drawn from every winter's post,
Before king Agramant the Moorish host
Pass in review, by different names enroll'd,
And threat with arms the fleur-de-lys of gold.
From these what gallant leaders late were lost,
Of Ethiopia, Spain, and Libya's coast!
A These to replace, with all the unnumber'd train
To it breathless lie on many a well-fought plain,
Ma Julius calls from Spain his subject powers,
And Agramant from Africa's distant shores, 580
Appa ming each, to every marshal'd band,
(As ac ed requires) new leaders to command.
Here cease, my lord—the tale awhile we close;
Th' epa ing book their names and order shows.

BOOK XIV.

THE ARGUMENT.

The review of the Pagan forces by Agramant and Marsilius; the names and characters of the several leaders. First appearance of Mandricardo, king of Tartary; he bears off the defeat of the two bards by Orland, and engages to go in search of that knight; in his way he meets with Doralis, daughter to the king of Granada, betrothed to Rodomont; he attacks her guard, and carries her off by force. In the mean while Agramant prepares for a general assault of Paris: the behaviour of the emperor Charles upon the occasion: God commands his angel, with the assistance of Silence, to conduct the Christian army under Rinaldo to the walls of Paris, and bids him send Discord against the Pagans. Description of the house of Sleep. Agramant begins the assault: the appearance of Rodomont, king of Sarra, who is the first to win the works, and makes a dreadful slaughter of the Christians: the gallant defence made by the besieged.

In many a fierce assault and cruel fight,
When Spain and Afric prov'd with Syria their might,
Unnumber'd warriors pale and breathless lay,
To hungry wolves and ravenous birds a prey!
But while the Gallic legions, to their coast,
The Pagans met, and mourn'd the battle lost,
The boastful foes, though victors from the plain,
More wept their valiant chiefs and princes slain.
Such, great Alphonso, if the verse may dare
With present times the times of old compare, 10
Such was the victory our arms obtain'd,
Due to thy glory, by thy virtues gain'd:

¶ He returns to Bradamant, Book xii, ver. 141.

Such was the slaughter, that the rolling years
Must fill Ravenna's heavy eyes with tears!
When first the Christians in the sanguine field
Began before their haughty foes to yield,
Thy conquering arms oppos'd the Spanish force,
And check'd their banner in its midmost course;
Whilst thy undaunted youths (a glorious band)
Pursu'd thy steps, to merit from thy hand, 20
That fateful day their great reward to hold,
The golden falchion and the spurs of gold:
These with such ardour join'd thy arms in fight,
They shar'd each danger, when, with dauntless might,
Thy warlike arm the golden accors shook,
The yellow and vermilion trancheon broke.
To thee, that guard'st the fleur-de-lys from shame,
To thee alone is due the laurel'd fame;
While, for his Rome Fabricio sav'd⁴ bestows
Another wreath to deck thy honour'd brows: 30
This mighty column of the Roman state,
By thee subdu'd, by thee preserv'd from fate,
Gives thee more praise than if thy single hand
Had crush'd the numbers of that threatening band
Who with their blood Ravenna's farrow fed,
Or those, who trembling from their standards fled,
When nought avail'd to chase th' ignoble fear
Of Aragon, Castile, and proud Navarre!
Though many a blessing from our conquest
flow'd,

Our arms successful little joy bestow'd; 40
Too much we mourn'd our Gallic leader slain,
And numerous princes lifeless on the plain;
Who, from beyond where cold the Alps arise,
Had pass'd to guard their kingdoms and allies.
Our weal, our lives we to our conquest owe,
Though dearly won—by this full well we know
The clouds dispers'd, whence Jove prepar'd to shed
The wint'ry storms on our devoted head.
But ill in joy or festival we share,
When round we hear the cries of deep despair, 50
From Gallia's widows clad in sable stole,
Down whose wan cheek big tears of anguish roll.

¹ The poet here alludes to the siege of Ravenna, laid by Mark Antonio Colonna for the pope, and attacked by M. de Foix, general of the French army. The capture of this city was chiefly owing to the valour and conduct of Alphonso I. Esté, though both sides suffered greatly, and the victors, as well as vanquished, had long reason to lament the loss they sustained.

² Alphonso rewarded the valour of those who had fought under him with presents of rich swords and spurs, the ornaments of knight-hood.

⁴ Fabricio Colonna surrendered himself prisoner to Alphonso on condition that he might not be given into the hands of his ancient enemies the French, to which condition Alphonso agreed, and notwithstanding the most earnest solicitations from the French, afterwards generously gave him his liberty, and sent him safe to the pope. Eugenio,

Now comes the hour when Lewis must provide
New leaders his forsaken troops to guide,
When to his country's praise, his vengeful hand
Shall punish those, whose sacrilegious band
Wives, matrons, daughters durst alike invade,
The holy brotherhood and cloister'd maid,
To make each silver vase^s their impious prize,
While cast on earth their great Redeemer lies | 60
Unblest Ravens! why the victor's power
Durst thou resist?—Why not, in happier hour,
Rather example take from Brescia's fate,
Than Rimini's and sad Faenza's state,
Warn by thy ruin, though Trivultius sage
By Lewis sent, essay'd with words of age
To rule thy people, and persuasive tell,
For crimes like theirs what mighty nations fell?

As now our Gallic king, oppress with cares,
New leaders for his powers encamp'd prepares, | 70
So Spain and Africa's monarchs to provide
Such chiefs as best best their troops to guide,
From where they long maintain'd their winter's
In order summon'd all the numerous host [post,
By squadrons rang'd, t' appoint for every band
Such chosen chieftains as the times demand.

Marsilius first, then Agramant to view
Bids every squadron pass in order due,
Before the rest the Catalans appear,
And Doriphobus' waving banners rear: | 80
Then march (no more by Fulvian's led,
Their gallant king by brave Rinaldo dead)
Those of Navarre; the Spanish king's command
Commits them now to Isolero's hand^a.

Next Balugantes Leon's people leads;
Gracioso then Algarbi's troop precedes,
Marsilius' brother: Palsirones arm'd
The less Castile; around his banner swarm'd
Those that with Madama's Scyllia leave,
And peopled Malaga; from Gades' wave | 90
To where her pastures green Cordova shows,
And Betis o'er his flowery border flows.

Then Stordilano and Tessira lead,
With Barricondo, numbers that succeed,
In proud array—the first Granada sway'd;
The second Ulirbona's rule obey'd;
The third Majorca held—in blood ally'd,
Tessira reign'd a king when Larbin dy'd.
Galicians came, that, Maricaldo lost, | 100
On Serpentino fix'd to guide their host;

Then Calatrava, and Toledo's bands,
Whose streaming ensign Sibegou's commands
But late confess'd—with all the tribes that lave
In Gundiana's flood or drink his wave,
Whom Matalista rules—Astorgo's train
By Bianzardin guided, press the plain,
Form'd in one troop—these Piganza yields;
Those Salamanca and Palencia's fields;
And those Avila and Zamora send:
Beneath one leader all their ranks extend. | 110

The Saragozan troops and household bands
Of king Marsilius' court, Ferrau commands,
All strongly arm'd, and well in combat known:
Here Malgarino, Balinverno shone.

Here Malzarines and Morgantes, led
By equal fate a foreign soil to tread;
Whom each, of kingdom and of wealth bereav'd,
Marsilius in his regal dome receiv'd.
Here Pollicones, great Marsilius' son,
Whose sire to lawless love Almeria won. | 120
There Doricantes, Analaro here;
And Argalifa and Savartes rear.
The noble earl of Sagontino's name,
And Langhiran esteem'd in fields of fame
With Archidantes Ammarantes stands;
And Malagur, of all the martial bands [praise
Deep vers'd in guile—with numbers more whose
The Muse shall blazon in recording lays.

These numbers marshall'd, next in fair review
The chiefs of Agramant their forces drew. | 130
Oran's huge king appear'd upon the plain,
A giant-leader o'er his vassal train.

The following squadron march'd with sorrow fill'd
For Martasin, whom Bradamant had kill'd;
And much they griev'd that ever woman's breath
Should want the king of Garamant's death,
Marmonda third sends forth her mourning host,
In Gascoony their chief Argosto lost:

These leaders slain, king Agramant to guide | 139
The widow'd bands, would other chiefs provide,
Though few he boasts—at length three names
He brave Baraldo and Oruido chose, [arose:
With these Arganio, whom at utmost speed
He sent, as time requir'd, the troops to lead.
Arganio rules the Libician train,
Who wept for sable Dudriusso slain.

With eyes cast downward and with cloudy brow,
Brunello brings his Tingitanian crew:
For since beneath the near o'erhanging wood,
Where on the rock Atlantes' castle stood, | 150
He lost to Bradamant the fatal ring,
He liv'd disgrac'd with Africa's potent king;
And had not Isolero, who beheld
Brunello bound, to Agramant reveal'd

The truth at full, a gibbet had receiv'd
The wretched culprit, and of life bereav'd,
The king to mercy by their prayers dispos'd,
Releas'd the fatal noose already clos'd;
But solemn vow'd, the next offence he gave,
No plea again his forfeit life should save. | 160

Next Farurantes see! with him a force
Maurina sends of mingled foot and horse.
Libanio, near, his new-made king defends;
And with him Constantina's troop attends
On him, but late, the crown and golden rod
Which Pinadorus bore, the king bestow'd.
Hesperia's nation Soridano leads:
With those of Setta, Dorilon proceeds.

O'er Nasamoni's Palian's hand presides,
Amonia's train king Agricaltes guides. | 170
Fizans' race Malahufenzo shows:

The following troop to Fivadurus owes
Its martial discipline, who brings the bands
From far Canaris and Morocco's sands.
Balastro leads the powers who lately knew
Tardocco king—two squadrons these pursue
From Mulga and Arzilla—this retains
Its ancient lord; to that no more remains
Its leader mourn'd; brave Chovineus try'd,
His ancient friend, the king elects their guide.

O'er Almanaila, where Tanfrico reign'd, | 181
Caicus now the kingly power obtain'd:
To Rimedon he gave Galicia's land:
Then Balinfrotes came with Casca's band.

^s Alluding to the rapacity of some of the soldiers, who carried off the vessels of the sacrament, and threw the consecrated wafer on the ground.

The rule o'er those who came from Bolga's field,
 (Clarindo lost) to Mirabald he yields.
 Next Baliveros march'd, and not a name
 Of all the throng so stain'd the list of fame.
 No nobler banner through the camp was spread,
 Than that which valiant sage Subrino led. 190
 Through all the host could few with him compare,
 In tents to counsel, or in fields to dare.
 The troops by Gualciotto late display'd,
 Now Rodomont's imperious rule obey'd;
 Of horse and foot he led united powers,
 New rais'd by Agramant, from Afric's shores.
 What time the Sun obscur'd⁷ his glorious light
 In dreadful tempests of surrounding night,
 From mountain billows his afflicted band,
 But three days since, he safely brought to land. 200
 No bolder Saracen in all their host,
 No stronger warrior Afric's camp could boast;
 Nor midst their countless legions could they show
 To Christian faith a more inveterate foe,
 And Paris more his cruel prowess fear'd,
 Than all the forces that combin'd appear'd,
 By Agramant and by Marsilius led,
 Their hostile banners on our plains to spread.
 Then Fruson, Alvarocchia's king, proceeds:
 Zumana's sovereign Dardanello leads 210
 His forces next—sure luckless birds of night,
 Or crows, or ravens of ill-omen'd flight,
 To these from mouldering roof or lonely bower,
 Presag'd the chance of some disastrous hour!
 For Heaven decrees, to-morrow's fatal field
 Shall see each chief his life in battle yield.

The squadrons past, in numerous order train'd,
 Save Tremizen and Norway none remain'd:
 Of these no martial standards yet appear'd,
 Of these no tidings in the field were heard. 220
 When Agramant awhile in anxious thought
 Had weigh'd their absence, to his sight was brought
 A squire, who serving late (amidst his guard)
 The king of Tremizen, the truth declar'd;
 That Manifardo and Atzirio quell'd,
 With numbers slaughter'd press'd the sanguine field.
 "Scarce have I escap'd by headlong flight," he cried;
 "And had not Fortune turn'd his course aside,
 The knight, O king! whose conquering arm alone
 O'erthrew these troops, had all your camps o'erthrown."

⁷ The character of Rodomont is continued from the Orlando Innamorato; the features are the same in both poets, and appear to originate in the Mezentius of Virgil. Boyardo relates, that Rodomont, after having waited some days at Algiers for a fair wind to embark his troops for France, at length compelled the pilot to leave the port in the middle of the night with his whole fleet, when he met with a terrible storm, and that while the rest were imploring Heaven for their safety, he vented his fury and impatience in blasphemies, according to what Ariosto says of him further in this book, ver. 873.

when others to the skies
 Breathe fervent prayers, he God's high power defies.

The fleet having been some time tost about at the mercy of the waves, at length made the coast of France, where the landing of the troops was for some time opposed by the Christians; till Rodomont, after incredible efforts of valour, effected a landing, having first lost numbers by the sea and by the enemy. Ork. Inn. book ii. c. vi.

No more can horse or foot oppose his rage 231
 Than goats or sheep the prowling wolf engage.

"Few days had past, since to the Turkish host
 A champion came, in arms his country's boast;
 None mightier strength or firmer courage knew,
 And from the West his glorious birth he drew:
 Him Agramant with honours due caress'd,
 The valiant heir of Tartary confest,
 The son of Agrican, of story'd fame,
 And Mandricardo⁸ his redoubted name. 240

⁸ This character is a continuation from Boyardo; he was son of Agrican king of Tartary, who laid siege to Albracca for the love of Angelica, and was slain by Orlando. Boyardo gives the following extravagant account of him.

The pride and cruelty of this prince was such, that, disdainful to reign over any but those that were strong and courageous in battle, he gave command for all others to be put to death; for which cause his subjects fled from their country till the whole land became almost a desert: at length an old man had the courage to remonstrate with him, representing that while he was thus venting his fury on the innocent, he forgot to revenge the death of his father Agrican, killed by Orlando. Mandricardo, struck with the reproach, resolved to go in search of Orlando.

The manner in which he gained possession of the armour of Hector, with the wonders he met with in achieving that adventure, are thus related in the third book, and first and second cantos of Orlando Innamorato.

Having committed the government of his kingdom to the care of a vicegerent, he set out one day on foot, and without armour, like a pilgrim, determining to expiate his neglect hitherto by the greatest exertions of valour in encountering every difficulty. Thus travelling alone, he passed through Armenia, and came at length to a fountain of green, blue, red, and yellow marble, the water of which was transparent as crystal, and near the fountain stood a pavilion, where he immediately entered with a resolution to seize by force the first horse or armour he should find. No person appeared, but he heard a voice from the fountain that addressed him in these words: "Sir knight, thou art now made a prisoner, thy rash courage has betrayed thee into a danger from which thou never canst escape." Mandricardo, without attending to the voice, continued to search the pavilion, and found a suit of complete armour, with the weapons befitting a knight, and soon perceived a horse ready caparisoned tied to a pine-tree. He immediately put on the armour, and, mounting the horse, was preparing to depart, when a sudden fire sprung up which consumed the pine-tree, and, spreading wider and wider, burnt all the trees and shrubs, the fountain and pavilion alone remaining unharmed: this enchanted fire now began to enclose the knight, and at last seizing on his armour, he felt such intolerable heat, that, unable longer to support it, he leaped in fury from his horse, and, running to the fountain, plunged himself headlong in the water; but the fire had such effect upon his arms and vesture, that cuirass, helmet, shield, and every part of his dress shrank to ashes; and he remained naked in the water, where he soon found himself in the embraces of a

His deeds had through the world diffus'd his praise;
Not one eclips'd each deed of former days;

When at the Syrian fairy's drear abode,
The seat of magic, dauntless might he show'd, beautiful lady, who having kissed him, told him that he was prisoner in the fountain of a fairy with Gradasso, Gryphon, Aquilion, and many more; but that, if his valour was unshaken, it rested with him to set all the knights at liberty. She told him, that near was a stately castle belonging to a fairy, in which were preserved all the arms of Hector except the sword; that after the death of Hector (whom Achilles slew by treachery) the sword named Dariodana was taken by Peuthesilea, was afterwards possessed by Almoates, and then by Orlando. After the destruction of Troy, the armour of Hector came to Æneas; but Æneas by misfortune falling into the power of an inhuman king, who kept him confined in a sepulchre, he was delivered by this fairy, who opened the sepulchre, and as a reward for the service done demanded these arms, which she had ever since kept by enchantment: the lady concluded her account by offering to conduct the knight where he might prove his courage in so marvellous an adventure, as to attempt the conquest of Hector's armour.

Mandricardo, upon hearing this, declared his resolution to undertake the adventure; but expressing some uneasiness at being thus exposed naked, the damsel unbound her hair, and, clasping the knight to her, entirely covered herself and him with her long and beautiful tresses; and thus, concealed as with a veil, they issued together from the fountain, and entered the pavilion, where having remained some time, the knight being already provided by his companion with horse, armour, and other apparel, and she mounting on a palfrey, they began their journey towards the castle of the fairy; where he was informed that he must first enter the list with Gradasso the fairy's champion, before he was admitted to attempt the conquest of the arms.

Mandricardo being arrived at the castle engaged Gradasso, and came off victorious; but the night drawing on, the lady told him he must defer the further proof of his valour till morning, as the castle gates would not be opened that night: she then carried him to the palace of a lady that inhabited near, and was accustomed to receive with hospitality all knights and damsels that wandered that way: the lady gave him a courteous welcome; but soon after his arrival her dwelling was attacked by a cruel giant named Malapress, who was used frequently to molest her: Mandricardo engaged with and slew the giant; and after being refreshed with a night's repose, he and his guide next morning returned to the castle of the fairy, where the enchanted arms were kept.

The knight and his companion having reached the castle, now passed the bridge, and entered the gate without molestation: here as soon as any knight had past the threshold, he was sworn upon the faith of knighthood to touch with his sword the shield of Hector, which shield, of a bright azure colour, was placed in the middle of a spacious court, supported by a golden pillar, on which were these words: "Do not presume to touch this shield unless thou art another Hector, for he who first bore this shield had not his equal in the world."

The damsel here alighted from her palfrey, and bowed herself with great reverence to the earth; and Mandricardo doing the same by her example, advanced, without meeting with any resistance, to the middle of the court, where drawing his sword he lightly touched the boss of the shield, and immediately a violent earthquake shook the building, accompanied with most dreadful thunder, as if the world was hastening to its final dissolution: a secret portal, called the gate of the treasure, flew open and discovered a field of corn, the blade and ears of which were of gold; but the portal of the east by which they had entered, suddenly closed. The damsel then addressed him thus: "Most noble and valiant knight! no one must ever hope to escape from this place, unless he first shall mow the field of corn, and tear up by the roots that spreading tree, which you see placed in the middle of the field." She had no sooner ended these words, but Mandricardo entered the field with his sword in hand, and began to cut the corn, when a strange enchantment followed: every ear that fell to the ground became alive, and was immediately changed into the form of some fierce and dreadful animal, a lion, a tiger, or wild boar, and attacked the knight. Mandricardo exerted his utmost valour; but his strength, incredible as it was, must have been at length exhausted in such a conflict, his enemies continually increasing as the ears fell: at length, stooping down, he took a stone in his hand, which stone was enchanted, though the virtue was unknown to him: he cast this among the army of beasts, and immediately they attacked each other with great fury, and in a few hours the knight beheld his formidable assailants slain by themselves.

Mandricardo then prepared to pursue the adventure and not up the tree that had a thousand branches, every branch covered with blossoms: he grasped the trunk and endeavoured with all his force to tear it from the ground, while, as he shook it, the leaves and blossoms fell in great abundance round him, and, as they fell, changed into every species of ravenous birds, ravens, falcons, vultures, and eagles; all which assailed the knight, and, notwithstanding he was covered and defended by his armour, so effectually molested him, that it was long before he could, with his utmost efforts, put an end to his labour. At length, redoubling his force, he tore the tree up by the roots, and suddenly a loud thunder was again heard, and a rushing wind arose that beat all his feathered enemies to the ground. Turpin relates that the wind issued from the womb of the earth, where the root was buried, and the ponderous stones were hurled aloft as if cast from an engine. The champion then cast his eyes down, and beheld an enormous serpent issuing from this subterraneous cave with one head, but branching into ten distinct bodies. Mandricardo, eager to put a speedy end to the adventure, attacked the serpent with his sword, and aimed a stroke at his head; but the scales, which were impenetrable, defeated his intent. The monster then leaped upon the knight, and winding two of his tails round the champion's legs, others round his body, and others round his arms, drew

Would strike the boldest heart with chilling fear,
What time he won the cuirass, which, 'of yore,
In fields of battle Trojan Hector wore."

This chief the squire's unwelcome tidings heard,
And, fir'd with rage, his haughty visage rear'd ;
Resolv'd at once the knight unknown to find, 251
But kept his purpose secret in his mind, [thought
Whate'er the cause — perchance he fear'd his Disceolv'd, in others like design had wrought.
He bade to ask the squire, what vestments o'er
His mailed arms the drended champion bore ;
To this he answer'd—" Black his mournful vest,
Black was his shield and unador'd his crest :"
And true he spoke, for with dejected mind
Orlando left his blazon'd shield behind, 260
That by his outward garb might stand reveal'd
The hidden sorrows which his breast conceal'd.

him forcibly to the earth, and, fixing his teeth in Mandricardo's side, began to crush his armour like some brittle substance. The knight, exerting all his remaining strength, struggling with the monster, at last fell with him into the cave, and by good fortune falling with all his weight upon the serpent's head crushed him to death in an instant.

The serpent being dead, the knight examined the cave on all sides, and by the light of a carbuncle discovered it to be a sepulchre cut out of a rock, covered over and adorned with coral, amber, silver, and gold. In the middle appeared a kind of tomb of polished ivory, supported by a gold and azure dragon : on the tomb appeared to lie an armed knight, but, upon nearer inspection, instead of a body was deposited the empty armour : this was the armour so celebrated of Hector, but without the shield or sword ; the first, as has been related, was suspended to the golden pillar in the court of the castle, and the last was in the hands of Orlando : these arms were of most inestimable value, adorned with pearls and emeralds, and in the front of the helmet was the large carbuncle which gave light to all that gloomy habitation.

While Mandricardo was gazing with admiration on these unparalleled arms, he heard a noise behind him ; when suddenly a gate opened, and many damsels issuing forth with instruments of various sorts congratulated the warrior in songs and dances for the great victory which he had obtained, and having finished their songs and dances fell on their knees before him. Then one of them rising gave the knight infinite praises for the achievement of so perilous an adventure, and two other damsels, having disarmed him, led him out of the cave ; then covering him with a mantle of fine silk, and scenting him with the most exquisite perfumes, they resumed their songs and dances, and reconducted him by a stair-case of marble into the palace where the shield of Hector was suspended in the court ; and here he found a great number of knights and ladies assembled, who, as soon as Mandricardo appeared, paid every honour to him as to a prince. In the midst of this company, on a rich throne sat the fairy, who calling the victor before her spoke to him thus : " Sir knight, thou hast this day won a treasure that has not its equal in the world ; but as it behoves thee to add to these arms the sword, thou must here

To Mandricardo late a beauteous steed
The king Marcellus gave, of generous breed,
His colour bay, but black his feet and mane,
His dam of Friza, and his sire of Spain.
This, Mandricardo sheath'd in steel, bestrode,
And spur'd impetuous o'er the field, and vow'd
To view the camp no more, till he survey'd
The unknown knight in sable arms array'd. 270
Soon many a wretch he met that, smit with dread,
From fierce Orlando's prowess trembling fled :
One mourn'd a son's, and one a brother's death,
Before their eyes depriv'd of vital breath :
Speechless and pale around the plain they roiv'd,
While every face their dastard terrors prov'd,
Ere far he pass'd, he came where he beheld
A dreadful field with sanguine torrents swell'd,
And mingled carnage, where too plain appear'd
What Agramant so late with anguish heard. 280

swear to me upon thy faith, that thou wilt by force take from the earl Orlando the enchanted sword Durindana, formerly the property of Hector ; and know that till thou hast achieved this adventure, thou shalt not wear by thy side any other weapon, or place the regal crown on thy head : but take heed never to be deprived of the silver eagle painted on that glorious shield, for remember that in possessing these arms and that device, thou hast the noblest treasure that ever recompens'd the valour of a knight."

King Mandricardo then, making a low obeisance to the fairy, pledged the oath imposed upon him, and immediately the damsels, in her presence, buckled on him the famous armour : the knight, being completely armed, took leave of the fairy, having thus dissolved the enchantment by which many lords and knights had been so long detained, among whom were Isobero the Spanish knight, king Gradasso, young Gryphon, and his brother Aquilant. Gradasso and Mandricardo departed together from the castle of the fairy, and performed many and great exploits before they arrived in France. Ori. Iun. book iii. c. i. ii.

This adventure of Mandricardo exhibits one of the most romantic stories of chivalry, at the same time attended with many circumstances that speak strongly to the imagination : it is to be observed, that although Ariosto has taken up the general story of Boyardo, and continued the same characters, yet he has no fiction so out of nature in all his poem, unless we except the battle between Astolpho and Orilo, (book xv.) which is not of his own invention, but taken up and continued from Boyardo.

In the Fairy Queen is a passage not unlike that part of Boyardo, where Mandricardo is burnt with the enchanted fire, and leaps into the fountain. Pyrrhicles, having been engaged with Furor, constructs an inward heat that seems to prey upon his vitals, and seeks relief by plunging into the water.

— to the flood he came,
There without stop or stay, he fiercely leapt
And deep himself beduck'd in the same.

I burn, I burn, I burn ! then loud he cry'd,
O bow I burn with implacable fire !
Yet nought can quench my ruly flaming side, &c.
Fairy Queen, b. ii. c. v

The warrior cast his angry eyes around,
Sorrow'd the slain, and measur'd every wound
With greedy gaze, while envy rot his breast,
To see such numbers by one hand oppress.
As when a wolf or mastiff gains the field,
Where sturdy hinds the labouring ox have kill'd,
When dogs and fowls have reat the flesh away,
And only left the fragments of their prey,
The hoofs and hide: the longing beast in vain
Beholds the spoils: thus on the reeking plain 290
The cruel Pagan stood, and curs'd his fate,
That brought him to the feast of death so late.

That day and half the next, in eager thought,
Inquiring oft, the sabbie knight he sought:
When lo! he view'd a meadow, crown'd with shade,
Where a deep stream with circling waters stray'd:
Thus fair Otricoli the Tyber laves,⁹
And near encloses with circumfluent waves.
To guard the narrow pass, a numerous band
Of hardy warriors, clad in armour, stand. 300
The Pagan asks what chief had thither sent
So strong a force, and what the concourse meant?
To him their leader scorn'd not to reply,
Mov'd with his lordly speech; whose presence high,
And arms, enrich'd with gold and gems¹⁰, proclaim
Some mighty warrior not unknown to fame.

⁹ A piece of land near Rome, where the Tyber winding forms a peninsula.

¹⁰ Boyardo gives a most splendid description of these arms of Hector, in the adventure related in the former note: the words of Berni are,

Forbita eran quell' armi luminose,
Ch'el occhio a pena soffire di vederle,
Fregiate d'oro, e pietre preziose,
Di rubini, emeraldi, e grosse perle.
Mandricardo le voglie avea bramoso,
E' mill' armi gli pare infocoso averle:
Se le volge per man, si meraviglia.
Ma sopra tutto all'elmo alza la ciglia.
In cima all'elmo, d'oro era un liono,
Ch'un breve avea d'argento in sua zampa,
Di sotto a lui pur d'oro era il torchione,
Con vinte sei formagli d'una stampa;
Nell' mezzo della fronte era il carbone,
Ch'a guisa riluciva di chiara lampa,
Faceva lume, com' è sua natura,
Per ogni canto della grotta scura.

Orl. Inn. lib. iii. c. ii.

These glorious arms were polish'd beamy bright,
That scarce the eyes could bear the flashing light,
Bedeck'd with gold and many a costly stone,
Where rubies, mix'd with pearls and emeralds, shone.

Fierce Mandricardo with impatience glow'd
To feel his limbs sustain the radiant load.
He turn'd the ponderous mail with looks amaz'd,
But on the helmet chief in rapture gaz'd:
A golden lion on the crest dispos'd,
A silver label in his paw enclos'd:
Beneath the crest was seen a wreath of gold,
Enrich'd with sparkling studs of sembian mould.
Full in the front the carbuncle appear'd,
Whose ruddy blaze the lonely dwelling cheer'd,
And (such its wondrous kind) a light display'd
That pierc'd the murky grotto's dismal shade.

"In this manner," says Mr. Upton, "sir Tristram casts his eyes with the bright spoils and goodly

"Sent by our lord," he cried, "we hither bring
The royal daughter of Granada's king;
Whom now, though scarce the tidings yet have spread,

He gives to bless the king of Sarra's¹¹ bed. 310
When evening casts her welcome shadows round,
And grasshoppers increase their grating sound,
We to her sire encamp'd shall lead the maid,
Meanwhile she lies repos'd in yonder shade."

But he, whose daring beat the world despair'd,
Resolv'd to prove how far these warriors priz'd
Their sovereign's treasure; if their force avail'd
To guard their mistress, or in combat fail'd
He thus—"The virgin doubtless then is fair:
Pain would I view the charge that claims your care;
Lead me to her, or here the dame convey, 321
For haste forbids me longer to delay."

"What madness has thy better thoughts mislead?"
Granada's captain said—nor further said:
The Tartar plac'd his eager spear in rest,
Which furious rush'd against the speaker's breast:
Before the stroke the shatter'd cuirass flies,
And, prone on earth, a lifeless corpse he lies.

armour of a dead knight, handling them and turning them a thousand ways.

But Tristram then despoiling that dead knight

Of all those goodly implements of praise,
Long fed his greedy eyes with the fair sight

Of the bright metal shining like sun rays,
Handling and turning them a thousand ways, &c.

Fairy Queen, b. vi. c. iii.

"It seems to me that Mr. Pope, when he translated that beautiful passage in Homer, where Thetis brings to her son his arms, just as they came from the forge of Vulcan, had his eye on this passage of Spenser, for he uses his words; the verses are very harmonious, and well worth transcribing.

Then drops the radiant burthen on the ground,
Clang the strong arms, and ring the shores around;
Back shrink the Myrmidons with dread surprise,
And from the broad effulgence turn their eyes;
Unmov'd the hero kindles at the show,
And feels with rage divine his bosom glow:
He turns the radiant gift, and feeds his mind
On all th' immortal artist had design'd.

Iliad ix. ver. 15.

"This passage in Homer has been borrowed by Virgil, where Venus is in like manner introduced bringing armour to her son.

Ille Deas doctis, et tanto letus honore,
Experti nequit, atque oculos per singula volvit,
Miraturque, interque manus et brachia versat
Terribilem cristis galeam, flammisque romentem,
Patiferumque eusem; loricaem ex aere rigentem,
Sanguineam, ingentem. Æn. lib. viii.

Proud of the gift he roll'd his greedy sight
Around the work, and gaz'd with vast delight:
He lifts, he turns, he poises, and admires
The crested helm that vomits radiant fire.
His hands the fatal sword and corslet hold;
One keen with temper'd steel, one stiff with gold;
Both ample, flaming both, and beamy bright—
Dryden, ver. 819.¹²

See Upton's Notes on Spenser.

¹¹ Rodomont.

The son of Agrican his spear regain'd,
 Nor other weapon in the field sustain'd; 330
 Nor sword nor mace he held: that fated hour,
 When, won by conquest, Hector's arms he bore,
 The sword he miss'd, and vow'd that never blade
 Should grace his side (nor vain the vow he made)
 Save Durindana, by Almontes borne,
 Orlando's now, and once by Hector worn.
 Great was the courage of the Tartar knight,
 On such unequal terms to wage the fight.
 "Who dares dispute my pass?" enrag'd he cries,
 And with couch'd spear amid their hattle flies. 340
 This drew the sword, that plac'd the lance in rest,
 And round him close the furious numbers press'd.
 In heaps they fell—at length the javelin broke,
 The broken truncheon in each hand he took.
 As Hebrew Sampson, wielding in his hand
 The fatal jaw, o'erthrew the hostile band
 Of stern Philistine—shields and helmets fly;
 And oft at once the horse and horseman die.
 To death these wretches run with headlong pace,
 Nor though one falls, another shuns his place. 350
 Less hard it seem'd to yield their vital breath,
 Than thus to perish by so strange a death:
 Nor could they bear, beneath a splinter'd spear
 To fall, and lose what'er in life was dear;
 To perish thus like frogs or hissing snakes,
 In reedy marshes or entangled brakes.
 But since, by fatal coat, too well they find
 That cruel still is death of every kind,
 Two thirds already kill'd, the remnant-train
 Attempt t' escape in safety from the plain: 360
 But the fierce Saracen their flight withstood,
 And still insatiate, thirsting still for blood,
 Disdain'd that one amidst the trembling band
 Should scape with life from his destroying hand.
 As in the open fields, or sunny meads,
 The brittle stubble and the spiky reeds
 Resist but little, when the wary hind
 Kindles the flame, to which the northern wind
 Gives double force, till wide around it preys,
 And all the furrows crackle in the blaze: 370
 So these alike in vain defence engage
 With haughty Mandricardo's dreadful rage.
 Soon as the passage freed the champion view'd,
 Where late the sentry to defend it stood,
 Amid the new-worn path, with eager tread,
 He press'd the turf by sounds of sorrow led
 And loud laments, to judge how truly fame
 Had rais'd the beauties of Granada's dame.
 Where the stream winding gave the Pagan way
 He pass'd, while round him slaughter'd warriors lay;
 Till midst the mead his matchless prize he found,
 The gentle Doralis with beauty crown'd; 382
 So was nam'd—beneath its ancient shade,
 An oak's rough trunk sustain'd the trembling maid,
 Her tears, like springs that unexhausted flow,
 Fell trickling down, and stain'd her breast of snow,
 And on her features plain reveal'd appear'd,
 She wept for others, for herself she fear'd.
 Her fears redoubled, when the knight she view'd
 With visage stern, and arms with blood bedew'd, 390
 Blood of her friends: her wailings rent the sky;
 Her sad attendants join'd the piercing cry;
 Whom, added to her train, a parent's care
 Had round her plac'd to tend the royal fair;
 Sage matrons, squires, and dames (a chosen band)
 The best and fairest of Granada's land.
 Soon as the Tartar prince that face beheld,
 Whose charms the brightest charms of Spain excell'd;

That e'en in grief can spread the fame of love;
 (How must she then in joy each bosom move!) 400
 He conquers but to yield: enrapt he stands,
 A willing prisoner in his captive's hands.
 Yet would he not so far her empire own,
 To yield his right in arms so lately won.
 Though lost in woe, he hopes by love's soft wiles
 To change her grief to joy, her tears to smiles.
 Then on a milk-white steed, without delay,
 He seats the damed to pursue his way:
 But first, in gentle words he bids adieu
 To dames, to squires, and all the weeping crew. 410
 "Henceforth in me will be her guard," he cries,
 "I shall, her squire, her lord, her mate suffice
 At every need—my friends, farewell!"—They hear,
 And helpless part with many a sigh and tear.
 "What grief, what anguish," to themselves they said,
 "Will pierce her father's soul! what thoughts invade
 Her consort's breast! What vengeance shall assuage
 His cruel pangs, and satiate his dreadful rage!
 Why comes he not at this disastrous hour?
 O! were he here, from yon Barbarian power, 420
 Ere yet too late, to save from foul disgrace
 Th' illustrious blood of Stordilano's race!"
 The Tartar, bappy in his prize obtain'd,
 A prize by fortune and by valour gain'd,
 Abates the speed, with which so late he press'd
 T' overtake the champion of the sable west.
 By slow degrees his former zeal declin'd,
 Far other thoughts revolving in his mind,
 To reach some kind retreat, and ease the smart
 His youthful bosom felt for Cupid's dart. 430
 Meantime he soothes his fair-one's grief and fears,
 Whose cheeks and lovely eyes are wet with tears:
 Full oft he feigns, and vows her beauty's fame
 Long in his soul had fed the growing flame;
 That, for her sake, he left his realm and crown,
 Whose rule extends to lands of far renown,
 Not to contemplate France or Spain, he cries,
 But the soft beauties of her beaming eyes.
 "If love unfeign'd may ever hope to prove
 The virgin's smiles—I merit then your love: 440
 If high descent—who nobler can aspire?
 I boast the mighty Agrican my sire.
 If wealth or power—what name exceeds my own?
 In empire I submit to God alone:
 If valour—well my deeds to day declare
 My valour pleads my title to the fair."
 These words, and many more which love had taught,
 In Doralis, with soft persuasion, wrought
 A gentle change, till freed from former fear,
 With less restraint she seem'd his suit to hear; 450
 When yielding by degrees, and courteous grown,
 She gives him answers in a milder tone;
 Nor on his face disdains sometimes to bend
 Her languid eyes, where pity seems to blend
 With young desire: the Pagan hence, whose heart
 Had oft confess'd the painful pleasing smart,
 Drew certain omens that the beauteous dame
 Would not for ever scorn his amorous flame.
 Thus journeying on, in thought elate and gay,
 With Doralis, companion of his way, 460
 The hour advanc'd, when friendly night prepares
 Its balmy rest to banish mortal cares:
 Now half conceal'd the sinking Sun he views,
 And with redoubled haste his course pursues,
 Till distant sounds of rustic pipes he hears,
 And curling smoke from village roofs appears:

These harmless shepherds hold their humble seat,
No sumptuous dwelling, but a calm retreat.
The master of the herds with simple grace
Welcom'd the knight and damsel to the place; 470
Who pleas'd his welcome heard; for not alone
In towns and courts are courteous manners known;
Full oft in wilds, beneath the lonely shed
Of Nature's sons, are social virtues bred.

What pass'd beneath the night's all covering shade
Between the Tartar prince and blooming maid
I dare not now reveal—let each surmise
Those truths which here we veil from vulgar eyes:
Yet either seem'd all difference to compose,
For light and blithesome with the morn they rose.
And Doralis her grateful thanks express'd 481
To him, whose roof receiv'd her for his guest.
Thence, roving on, from place to place they stray'd,
At length they came, where near a bowery shade
To reach the sea, with silent course and slow,
A river flow'd, yet scarcely seem'd to flow:
So clear, so pure the stream; the sands so bright;
The channel lay reveal'd to every sight.

Here in cool shelter, on the banks reclin'd,
Two warriors and a dame¹⁸ unknown they find. 490

The genius that forbids me to pursue
One path unchang'd, here leads my steps anew
To where the Moors their thousand banners rear,
(With shouts and clamours deafening Gallia's ear)
Round the high tent, where king Troyano's son
With haughty pride defies th' imperial throne:
Where Sarza's monarch¹⁹ threats to wrap in flame
Fair Paris' walls, and raze the Roman name.

Now heard king Agramant that England's powers
Had past the narrow seas from Britain's shores: 500
Marsilius, Garbo's ancient king, and all
The Pagan leaders, at the herald's call
In council meet: and in one voice unite,
Against the walls to bend their strongest might;
For well they knew that Paris ne'er would yield,
When once th' expected aids had reach'd the field.
Unnumber'd scaling-ladders they prepare,
And every engine of besieging war.

Above the rest the king unweari'd goes,
The first and second squadron to dispose: 510
Himself resolves with these th' assault to make,
And every toil and danger to partake.

Ere yet th' assault began²⁰, the Christian lord
In Paris' walls with holy rites implor'd
Th' offended powers; and rang'd in meet array
The priests and brethren, sable, white, and grey²¹,
Sung fervent hymns; while those repentant bands,
By pure confession snatch'd from Stygian hands,
In blest communion join'd the dear repast,
As if th' ensuing morn were doom'd their last. 520
Th' imperial chief, on pious acts intent,
By peers and senators surrounded, went,
By knights and princes, to the loftiest fane,
Himself th' example to his subject train;

¹⁸ He pursues this story, Book xxxiii. ver. 518.

¹⁹ Rodomont.

²⁰ The acts of devotion here described to be executed by the Christian leader, appear to be imitated by Tasso, particularly in the solemn procession at the beginning of the eleventh book, which is perhaps one of the finest passages in the Jerusalem Delivered.

²¹ Milton, in his Limbo of Vanity, "Black, white, and grey."

There, with clasp'd hands, and eyes to Heaven
address,

He pray'd—"O God! though sins pollute my breast,
Yet let not these for present vengeance call.
Lest, through my guilt, thy faithful people fall.
If 'tis decreed that thy Almighty hand
Must deal those sufferings which our crimes demand,
At least awhile thy righteous ire forgo, 531
Nor let thine enemies inflict the blow.
Should these subdue us, while we boast the grace
Of Christian faith, esteem'd thy favour'd race,
The Heathen world that power may useless call
Which lets its votaries unaided fall:

For one that now rejects thy hallow'd name,
Behold a hundred then thy faith disclaim!
So Babel's laws o'er all mankind shall spread,
And pure Religion hide her sacred head. 540
Preserve thy chosen flock—!o! these the hands
That freed thy apostrophe from impious hands:
Lo! these the chiefs—that oft have stood prepar'd
Thy blameless pastors and thy church to guard.
Too well we feel when we for mercy pray,
Against our faults how light our merits weigh:
But let thy grace our deep contrition wake,
Our souls will soon a second nature take:
Nor can we doubt thy saving help to find,
Thy help so oft bestow'd on lost mankind." 550

So spoke the prince devout, and meekly pour'd
His fervid vows to Heaven's eternal Lord,
With heart-felt anguish, such as well became
Himself, his danger, and his regal name.
Nor was his humble suit in vain address:
The guardian angel²², in his seats of rest,
Receives the prayer, then spreads his hallow'd wings,
And to his Saviour's ear the offering brings.
Unnumber'd vows that instant thus prefer'd
By those blest spirits, Heaven's Eternal heard: 560
At this the souls in endless bliss above²³,
With features blending pity, peace, and love,
All turn'd to him, the source of endless grace,
With one request to save the Christian race.

²² Not unlike this passage is the beginning of Book vi. Paradise Lost, where Milton represents our first parents addressing their supplications to Heaven after the fall.

————— To Heav'n their prayers
Flew up, nor miss'd the way, by envious winds
Blown vagabond or frustrate: in they pass'd
Dimensionless through heav'nly doors; then clad
With incense, where the golden altar fum'd,
By their great Intercessor, came in sight,
Before the Father's throne, then the glad Son Presenting ———

²³ Ariosto mentions the compassion of the blessed saints and angels for the sufferings of man.

— Come gli ascoller l'anime sante,
Depinte di pietà il viso pio,
Tutti miraro il sempeterno amante, &c.

Milton, in like manner, represents the angels as sympathising with the miseries of mankind at the fall.

— Soon as th' unwelcome news
From Earth arriv'd at Heaven's gate, displeas'd
All were who heard, dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visage, yet mix'd
With pity, violat'd not their bliss.

Par. Lost, b. x. ver. 91.

The Goodness Infinite, whose ear to gain
The upright heart has ever pray'd in vain,
Cast round his pitying eye, and with his hand,
Call'd faithful Michael from th' angelic band;
Then thus he spoke—"Go! seek the Christian power!¹⁸

With friendly vessels brought from England's shore;
Lead these to Paris from the distant coast, 571
Unheard, unnoticed, by the Pagan host.
Find Silence first—command him to prepare
Whate'er befits with thee the task to share—
Such is my will—then seek a different road,
Where in her cavern Discord makes abode:
Bid her with speed her steel and fuel take,
And in the Moorish camp new flames awake;
Amongst the chiefs for mightiest prowess known,
Let every seed of wild debate be sown;
Let war intestine, mutual death succeed, 580
Let some be captives, some in combat bleed,
And some, in rage, self-exil'd from the host,
Their sovereign leave to mourn his champions lost.¹⁹

He said: the blessed angel¹⁸ thought replies,
But swift t' obey his heavenly Maker flies:
Where'er his course the radiant envoy steers,
The clouds disperse, the troubled ether clears;
And round him plays a circling blaze of light,
Such as when meteors stream thro' dusky night.

While still he ponders in his zealous mind 591
Where best this enemy of speech to find;
At length he deems that Silence sure may dwell
With monks and abbots in the cloister'd cell,
The church's hallow'd walls; where never ear
Might other sound than chanted psalters hear:

¹⁸ The whole conduct of this admirable machine has been greatly extolled by Dryden in the following passage of the notes to his translation of Virgil. "The only beautiful machine which I remember in the modern poets, is in Ariosto, where God commands St. Michael to take care that Paris, then besieged by the Saracens, should be succoured by Rinaldo. In order to this, he enjoins the archangel to find Silence and Discord. The first to conduct the Christian army to relieve the town, with so much success, that their march should not be discovered; the latter to enter the camp of the Infidels, and there to sow dissension among the principal commanders. The heavenly messenger takes his way to an ancient monastery, not doubting there to find Silence in her primitive abode; but instead of Silence finds Discord: the monks, being divided into factions, about the choice of some new officer, were at mic and snee with their drawn knives. The satire needs no explanation. And here it may be also observed, that ambition, jealousy, and worldly interest, and point of honour, had made variance both in the cloister and the camp; and strict discipline had done the work of Silence, in conducting the Christian army to surprise the Turks." Note to ivth Georgic, ver. 660.

¹⁹ Ariosto makes Silence of the male gender.

¹⁸ The Italian has—benedetto angel—blessed bird—an expression not to be hazarded in English, and which seems reprehensible in any language. So Dante.

— Angel divino —

Parad. c. ii.

Where, fed with slender meals, each quiet sleep
Where every room inscrib'd the name of Silence keeps.

To meet him there he certain hope assumes,
And moves with speed increas'd his golden plumes;
Nor him alone, but there expects to find 601
Fair Peace and Charity together join'd.
No Silence there he found, he view'd alone
His name enroll'd, himself no longer known:
Nor Peace, nor Charity was there to see,
Nor Love, nor Faith, nor meek Humility;
These held their station there in days of yore,
But now, long since expell'd, are seen no more.
For these, Wrath, Av'rice, Gluttony, and Pride,
Sloth, Cruelty, and Envy there reside. 610

The angel, wond'ring at a sight so new,
Saw Discord soon amidst the brutal crew, [mand
Her, in whose search, he meant, at Heaven's court
To explore Averous' ever mournful strand;
And lo! he finds her now, most strange to tell,
Midst prayers and masses in this earthly Hell.
He knew her by the venture's hundred dyes,
Of lists unnumber'd of unequal size,
Which rent in shreds, but ill those limbs conceal'd
By every step or breath of wind reveal'd. 620
Her uncomb'd hairs seem'd constant strife to hold,
Of various hues, black, silver, brown and gold.
Some hung in ringlets, some in knots were tied;
Her bosom some, and some her shoulders hide:
Her hands and lap a countless medley bore
Of writs, citations (an exhaustless store)
Oppression's various forms, that make the poor
In cities never find their state secure.

Before, behind, on either side her stand
Attorneys, notaries,—a brawling band! 630

Her Michael call'd, and bade her instant go
To seek where lay encamp'd the Pagan foe,
And every art essay, that might engage
Their bravest knights in strife and deathful rage.
For Silence then he ask'd, of whom full well
He deem'd that Discord might some tidings tell;
As one, who still on kindling flames intent,
Through every land of Earth's wide region went.
"Amidst my travel," Discord thus replies, 640
"That Silence never yet has met my eyes:
Though oft his name from many I have heard,
Or heard his praise for craft and guile prefer'd;
But Fraud, sometime the partner of his way,
Our comrade here, can best his haunts betray—
Lo! where she stands"—She said, and pointing show'd

Where Fraud appear'd amidst the motley crowd,
Her garb was decent, lovely was her face,
Her eyes were bashful, sober was her pace;
With speech, whose charms might every heart assail,
Like his who gave the blest salute of—Hail! 650
But all deform'd and brutal was the rest,
Which close she cover'd with her ample vest,
Beneath whose folds, prepar'd for bloody strife,
Her hand for ever grasp'd a poison'd knife.

Of her the angel ask'd, and Fraud replied:
"Silence was wont with Virtue to reside,
With Benedict and old Elias²⁰ train,
In convents where religion first began:

²⁰ "He here speaks of the monasteries that were founded under the names of Benedict and Elias. Benedict was of Norcino, and built his first monastery on mount Cassino, where he lived a most

Much time he chose in learned schools to pass,
 With Architas and wise Pythagoras⁶⁶, 660
 But when those saints and sages were no more,
 That kept him true to Wisdom's righteous lore,
 His godly customs learnt he soon forsook,
 And to new paths his wandering feet betook.
 Fond lovers first at midnight hour he pair'd ;
 Then, mix'd with thieves, in all their counsels shar'd.
 With Treason oft he dwells, and him I view'd
 Late join'd with Murder stain'd in human blood.
 With coiners has he oft been known to dwell
 Remote from view, in some sequester'd cell. 670
 So much he shifts his partners and his place,
 'T is hard t' affirm where best his steps to trace :
 Yet have I hope to guide your course aright :
 Go—seek, when shade proclaims the middle night,
 The house of Sleep, there mayst thou Silence find,
 Where oft he rests remote from human kind."

Though Fraud was ever wont in lies to deal,
 Yet here such seeming truth her words reveal,
 The angel trusts her faith, nor longer stays,
 But speeding from the convent, wide displays 680
 His rapid wings, to reach by noon of night
 The house of Sleep with unremitting flight.

A pleasing vale⁶⁷ beneath Arabia's skies,
 From peopled towns and cities distant lies :
 Two lofty mountains hide the depth below,
 Where ancient firs and sturdy beeches grow.
 The Sun around reveals his cheering day,
 But the thick grove admits no straggling ray
 To pierce the boughs: immers'd in secret shades,
 A spacious cave the dusky rock pervades. 690

The creeping ivy on the front is seen,
 And o'er the entrance winds her curling green.
 Here drowsy Sleep has fix'd his noiseless throne,
 Here indolence reclines his limbs o'ergrown { feet
 Through sluggish ease; and Sloth, whose trembling
 Refuse their aid and sink beneath her weight.
 Before the portal dull Oblivion goes,

He suffers none to pass, for none he knows.
 Silence maintains the watch and walks the round
 In shoes of felt, with sable garments bound ; 700
 And oft as any thither bend their pace,
 He waves his hand, and warns them from the place.

The angel gently whisper'd in his ear :
 " Heaven bids thee now (and Heaven's high mandate hear !)

Conduct Rinaldo, with his social powers,
 In aid of Charles, to Paris' lofty towers :

exemplary life. Elias was the prophet spoken of in Holy Scripture, who is believed by many to be still living in the terrestrial paradise with St. John and Enoch: he lived a long time on Mount Carmel, from which circumstance originated the order of the Carmelites." Porcacchi.

⁶⁶ Pythagoras, an ancient philosopher of great celebrity, who enjoined his scholars five years silence at their entrance into his school: he taught women as well as men. Architas was his disciple, who was likewise a great philosopher and well skilled in mathematics. He is said to have invented a dove of wood, that by the action of mechanical powers kept itself suspended in the air :
 he was a great friend of Plato. Porcacchi.

⁶⁷ This fine description of the house of Sleep appears to be partly taken from Ovid and Statius, but varied with such circumstances as to make the picture in a manner Ariosto's own.

Be such their march, so wary and so still,
 That not a sound the Pagan's ear may fill :
 Till, ere loud Fame bespeak the Christians near.
 Their force shall thunder on the hostile rear." 710

No answer Silence gave, but bow'd his head
 In signal of the heavenly charge obey'd.
 Together now they take their speedy flight,
 And soon in fruitful Picardy alight.
 There Michael urges on each fearless band,
 (Woodrout to tell !) so swift from land to land ;
 Ere day declin'd, to Paris' walls he brought
 The numerous troops, yet not a human thought
 Perceiv'd that Heaven the miracle had wrought.

No less attentive, Silence, to pursue 720
 Th' important charge, around the legions threw
 A darken'd veil to intercept the sight,
 Though all the forces march'd in open light,
 While the thick cloud forbade each Pagan ear
 The shrill-mouth'd trump or deep-ton'd horn to hear.

While thus, by Silence and the angel led,
 His rapid march the bold Rinaldo sped ;
 So hush'd that not a Saracen could know
 From rumour's voice the near approaching foe ;
 King Agramant his numerous foot had plac'd 730
 In suburbs near ; where part encamping fac'd
 The threaten'd walls, far stretch'd from tower to
 In that assault to prove his utmost power. [tower,
 What countless myriads rang'd in deep array
 That hour combin'd against the Christian sway !
 Who these can tell, may tell the plants that grow
 On fertile Apennine's o'er-shading brow ;
 May number, where the surgy ocean laves
 Old Atlas' feet, the Mauritanian waves ;
 Or count the stars, when Heaven with all its eyes⁶⁸
 At midnight hour the lover's theft describes. 741

Frequent and deep the hallow'd bells around
 With dreadful echo give their warning sound.
 In every temple many a hand they rear,
 And breathe thro' many a lip the fervent prayer.
 Could blest immortals with desiring eyes
 Behold that wealth which men so highly prize,
 Each saint might hope in future to behold
 His voice statue fram'd of purest gold.
 The white-hair'd sire deploras his wretched state,
 Reserv'd to drain the bitterest drops of fate ; 751
 He calls his lov'd forefathers doltily blest,
 Long clos'd in earth and laid for years at rest.

While those whose younger breasts no fears appall,
 Advance on every side to guard the wall :
 There barons, paladins, and earls, and knights,
 Kings, dukes, and lords, with all whom fame invites,
 Soldiers from far, or natives of the land,
 To die for Christ in arms undaunted stand :
 All ardent urge the king each bridge to lower, 760
 And on the Saracens their fury pour :
 With joy he sees the warriors' noble fires,
 But prudence checks what patriot zeal inspires.
 Meantime he bids in various parts dispose
 Their generous ranks against th' invading foes.

⁶⁸ Catullus requesting to receive from Læbia as many kisses as there are grains of sand on the sea shore, adds,

Aut quam sidera multa, cum tacet nox
 Furtivos hominum videt amores.

And our Spenser :
 More eath to number with bow many eyes
 High Heaven beholds yad lover's sightly thiccreries.

Where strong the wall, less thick the troops
ascend,

But lines on lines each weaker pass defend.
Some watch the huge machines; and some prepare
With sulph'rous flame to meet the storm of war,
While wary Charles in no fix'd place abides, 770
But through the works for every chance provides.

Amidst a spacious plain fair Paris stands,
(The heart of France) and all the realm commands:
A river, that beneath the ramparts glides,
The city parts, but first with branching tides
An island forms, securing from the rest,
Of all the town the strongest and the best:

Each other part (three parts the whole compose)
The fosse, without, and stream, within, enclose.
The city, stretch'd around, in circuit wide, 780
Might yield a place t' assault on every side;

But Agramant against the western towers
Collects the force of all his threatening powers:
For hence, no realms or forts behind him lay
To distant Spain, but ow'd his ample sway.
Far as the walls extend, so far the care
Of Charles is seen the bulwarks to repair.
On mould'ring works he bids new works arise,
And every engine of defence supplies.

Where the stream enters, where the town it leaves,
He draws huge chains across the passing waves; 791
With Argus' eyes the son of Pepin heads
His heedful watch, where Agramant intends
The great assault; nor could the Pagan crew
Against the Christians their designs pursue:
But soon their foes' preventive care they knew.

Now fierce in arms Marsilius press'd the plain
With all his squadron drawn from distant Spain.
There Serpentine and Ferrau were found, 800
Grandonio, Isolero, names renown'd.

There Bulugantes shone with equal might,
And Falsirones, well approv'd in fight;
There, on the left, beside the winding flood
Of silver Seine, Sobrino, Pullion stood,
With Dardinello, brave Almontes' son,
Oran's huge king, for giant stature known!
Why seems my pen more slow to speak their praise,
Than these their weapons in the field to raise?
There Sarza's king, impatient to engage,
Blasphemes aloud, nor curbs his impious rage. 810

As eager flies²⁴ in buzzing legions play,
Midst the warm sunshine of a summer's day,
Where rural vessels have allur'd their taste,
Or the sweet relics of a late repast;
As round the rip'ning grapes of purple dye
The plummy race in busy clusters fly:

²⁴ Mr. Upton says these similes are after the cast of Homer; and indeed there can be little doubt but Ariosto had in view the simile in the second Iliad, to express the number of the Grecian troops that passed in review.

— thick as insects play,

The wand'ring nation of a summer's day,
That drawn by milky steams, at evening hours,
In gather'd swarms surround the rural bowers:
From pail to pail with busy murmur ran,
The gilded legions glitt'ring in the Sun.

Pope, ver. 552.

Milton has the following,

Or as a swarm of flies, in vintage-time,
About the wine-press where sweet must is pour'd.

Parad. Reg. b. iv.

So to the fierce assault the Moors repair,
While shouts and barbarous clamours rend the air.
The wary Christians from their rampart's height
With javelins, darts, and swords, maintain the fight,
With stones and mingled fire; unmor'd they stand,
And scorn the fury of the Pagan band: 822

And oft as this, now that ill-fated bleeds,
Another fearless to his place succeeds.
Back to the ditch the Saracens withdrew,
So thick the weapons of the faithful flew:

Huge massy fragments from the walls they rend,
And crumbling bulwarks on the foes descend.
From many a hand the boiling streams employ'd
With dreadful heat the suffering Moors annoy'd;
Resistless pour'd on each advancing crest, 831

Through the cloud'd helmet pierc'd the liquid pest,
Not so the sword can waste—What tongue shall tell,
How from above the lime destructive fell
In dismal clouds! bow burning vessels pour'd
Pitch, sulphur, nitre; all their flaming board;
Whence hissing torrents sent in tides below,

With fearful ruin gall'd the Pagan foe!
Meantime the king of Sarza²⁵ brought his powers
(The second band) beneath the Christian towers:
With these Buraldo and Ormidia went; 841

That Garamanda, this Marpooda sent.
Beside him Soridon, Cleriando came,
Nor Setta's king declin'd the field of fame.
Morocco's king, and Casco's these, pursue.
Resolv'd that all their noble deeds might view,
High on his banner, that with crimson glow'd,

The Sarzan Rodomont a lion show'd,
Whose savage mouth disdain'd not to receive
The curb a courtly damsel seem'd to give; 850
The beast bespeaks the knight; the beauteous dame

Whose gentle hands the lordly lion tame,
Bespeaks the charms of Stordilano's heir,
Granada's princess, Doralia the fair!
Her, whom so lately Mapdricardo won
From all her guards (as well the verse has shown),
And her whom Rodomont had learnt to prize,
Dear as his kingdom, dearer than his eyes!

For whom he wrought such deeds of endless fame;
Nor knew her yielded to a stranger's flame. 860

At once a thousand ladders rais'd in air,
With crowded steps the swarming soldiers bear:

A second urges him who foremost leads
The daring way, and him a third succeeds. [fear;
Through courage some, and some attack through
Though girt with dangers, none must tremble here,
For Rodomont o'erlooks the dreadful fray,
And wounds or kills who dares desert the day.

Thus on the town the thick'ning legions fall,
Through flames and ruins rush to scale the wall.

But while the rest with wary search attend 871
Where least the foes each guarded pass defend,
The king of Algiers scorns his arms to wield
But where dire peril frowns upon the field:

In that dread hour, when others to the skies
Breathe fervent vows, he God's high power defies²⁶.

²⁵ It has been already said, that the character of Rodomont is drawn closely after Boyardo; the device on his banner is likewise taken by Ariosto from his predecessor.

²⁶ See the behaviour of Capaneus at the siege of Thebes, who was thunderstruck while he blas-phemed Jupiter.

Statius Theb. book x.

To fence his breast a serpent's jointed scale
Supply'd the corselet tough and plated mail;
These arms his grandsire won, whose impious
might 879

Would heav'n invade with Babel's towery height:
Who sought to drive th' Almighty from his throne,
And make the empire of the stars his own!
For this intent th' accurs'd blasphemer made
His shield, his helm, and strongly-temper'd blade.

Stern Rodomont a second Nimrod ⁸⁷ stood,
Like him unconquerable, fierce, and proud:
He little heeds what guards the passes keep,
How strong the bulwarks, or the fosse how deep;
Headlong he plunges in—he wades—he flies—
Above his breast the troubled waters rise. 890

All drench'd and grin with ooze he makes his way,
While round him arrows, flames, and engines play
In rattling storms—As through the sedgy moor,
Where spreads our Malean plain ⁸⁸, the woodland boar

Lifts his strong chest, around his tusks he throws,
And breaks through all that would his course oppose:

So the fierce Pagan lifts his shield on high,
And scorns the towering walls, and threats the sky.

Now from the fosse stern Rodomont attains
The firmer land, and now the summit gains, 900
Where the broad ramparts form a platform wide,
To range the Christian files on either side.

Where many a soldier, many a knight and lord
Now feel the edge of his resistless sword.

Head, arms, are lost—while from the lofty towers
Down the steep fosse the sanguine torrent pours.
His buckler cast behind, he grasp'd his steel
With either hand, and on Arnolfo fell;
A duke, who came from where the Rhine, that laves

The neighbouring meads, is lost in briny waves; 910
Not more the wretch devoted 'scapes his ire,
Than thro' of sulphur 'scapes the wasting fire;
Swift thro' his neck the bloody falchion sped,
There heav'd the dying limbs, here roll'd the gasping head.

Now with a backward stroke the mortal wound
Oldrado, Prando, and Anselmo found,
With Spinelocco—midst the thronging train,
And narrow space, no blow was aim'd in vain.

The Flemings first his dreadful fury feel:
The Normans next bestain his smoking steel. 920

Orybetto of Maganza sinks to rest:
Aim'd at his front the weapon through his breast

Divides his bleeding corse: then from above
He Andropino and Mochino drove;

Headlong they fell—the first was wont to shine
In priestly robes; the last in draughts of wine

Steep'd all his hours: like bane or viper's blood
He abun'd to taste the cooling limpid food.

Lo! here he dies, and more regrets his death,
In water's loathsome drench to yield his breath. 930

Sever'd in two provincial Lewis lies:
Through Arnold of Thoulouse the weapon flies.

Oberto, Claudio, Dionysius pour
Their souls, with Hugo, in a stream of gore.

⁸⁷ Boyardo makes Rodomont a descendant of Nimrod, who built the tower of Babel.

⁸⁸ A low marshy land in the district of Ferrara, on the left of the Po, near the sea, abounding at that time with wild boars. Zatta.

Near these of Paris four to death succeed:

Ambaldo, Odo, and Gualtaro bleed,
With Satalocoes—heaps on heaps there fell!
Nor can the Muse their names and country tell.

Not less behind the swarming troops prevail;
They fix the ladders, and the bulwarks scale: 940

But 'twixt the walls and second rampire steep,
Where sinks the fosse, all horrible and deep,
The Christians from th' interior works renew
A strong defence against the Pagan crew;
With spears and darts they rain an iron cloud,
To check the numbers of th' advancing crowd;
And soon had check'd, but that the dauntless might
Of Ulien's son ⁸⁹ inspir'd and urg'd the fight.
He drives them on, and each though loth obeys,
With threatenings these incites, and those with praise: 950

Who turns a step to fly, his fate receives:
His breast he pierces, or his helm he cleaves;
And down the steep he drives so huge a train,
That scarce the fosse their numbers can contain.

While thus compell'd the rude barbarians go,
Or tumble headlong to the depth below,
The king of Serza every muscle strains,
And lo! (as if a strength of wing sustains
Each agile member) with a wondrous bound 959
Leaps o'er the fosse, and lights upon the ground
With all his armour's weight, though yawning wide,

Full thrice ten feet it stretch'd from side to side,
Swift as a greyhound o'er the space he flies,
Nor to his feet the silent earth replies,
So light he leapt—now round his blows he drives,
And the mail'd plate, like brittle substance, rives.
Not moss the sylvan bark a tree defends,
When on its trunk the sounding axe descends:
Thick folds of steel can no defence afford,
Such his huge nerve, and such his sweepy sword.

Meantime our legions in the depth below 971
Have plac'd their snares to catch th' incautious foe.

Serewood and pitch beneath the banks they hide,
And many a vessel closely rang'd, supply'd
With nitre, oil, or sulphur, to conspire
In one vast blaze to spread the murderous fire.

And now prepar'd each wary soldier stands
To crush the folly of the Moorish hands,
Who blindly from the trench's depth assail,
And strive, with many a ladder rear'd, to scale 980
The town's last works—when at a signal given
From different parts, the bursting fires are driven
Amid the foe:—huge conflagration rolls
From side to side, and mounting to the poles Might dry the vapoury Moon, while dark as night

Thick smoke obscures the Sun and blots the light:
And rumbling peals re-echo long and loud,
Like thunders breaking from a fearful cloud!

Now frantic sounds in mingled tumults rise,
Of dreadful howlings, groans, and dying cries; 990
As by their leader's cruel rashness slain,
One wretched fate involv'd the Pagan train,
While the flame crackling on their members
prey'd,

And with their shrieks a horrid concert made.

But cease we here—nor more the tale prolong,
For my hoarse voice forbids the lengthen'd song.

⁸⁹ Rodomont,

BOOK XV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Continuation of the siege of Paris. Astolpho is dismissed with presents from Logistilla, who sends Andronica and Sophrosyne to conduct him safely to his passage home. Their voyage described. Astolpho hears the future glory of Charles V. and many great men of his age. They reach the gulf of Persia, and Astolpho pursues his journey by land: he arrives in Egypt, and is warned by a hermit to shun the dwelling of Caligoricant: his adventure with that giant. He finds the magician Orilo engaged in combat with Gryphon and Aquilant, who endeavour in vain to deprive him of life. Astolpho undertakes that adventure. Astolpho, Gryphon, and Aquilant, enter Jerusalem, where they are hospitably received by Sansonetto, the Christian regent. Gryphon hears from a pilgrim unwelcome news of his mistress Origilla.

Great honours every victor must obtain,
Let Fortune give success, or Conduct gain:
Yet oft a battle, won with blood, will yield
Less praise to him who boasts the conquer'd field.
But ever glorious is that leader's name,
And adds new laurels to his martial fame,
Who, while the forces of his foes o'erthrown
Proclaim his might, from loss preserves his own.
Such was the war by thee, my patron, wag'd,
When Leo on the waves had fiercely rag'd,
Had seiz'd each shore from where the Po descends,
And to the sea from Franco-lino's heads.
Though from afar we seem'd his roar to hear,
When present thou, each breast forgot to fear:
Well dost thou teach us victory to gain:
By thoe thy friends were sav'd, thy foes were slain.

Not so the Pagan chief who rashly bent
On Christian slaughter, down the deep descent
Compell'd unpitying his reluctant powers,
Where the dire flame the lapless hand devours.
The fosse, though large, could scarce the throng receive,

But while the raging fires of life bereave
Each struggling wretch, on every limb they prey
Till shrank to little space the mingled ashes lay.

Here thousands, as their chieftain's rashness led,
Midst flames and smoke are number'd with the dead:
Aloft in air their groaning spirits soar,
Their bodies, soon consumed, are seen no more;
While he, from whom their dreadful sufferings rise,
Ere long Rodomont escapes, and as he flies
High bounding o'er the fosse that yawns below,
Lights on th' interior ramparts of the foe:
But had the trench the fearless chief receiv'd,
No more his arm had deeds of death achiev'd!

Now when he turns to view th' infernal vale,
And sees on every side the flames assail
His social bands, and hears their shrieks and cries,
Impious he raves and loud blasphemes the skies.

While thousands here a strife unequal wag'd,
Where ruthless war with death and horror rag'd,
King Agramaqt before his army's head
The fierce assault against a portal led,
Where less perchance he deem'd the Christian
Prepar'd in arms to guard their threaten'd towers.

¹ A place forty miles from the mouth of the Po.

With him in field king Bamberago shin'd;
And Baliverio, basest of mankind!
With Chorinens, Prusio shares his toils,
The wealthy king who rules the happy isles.
Mainsbuffenzo, who the region sways
Of Fez, for ever scorch'd with solar rays;
And many a chief, with others long inur'd
To fields of fight, and well in mail secur'd.
Though arm'd, yet numbers asked seek the field,
For not a thousand plates the coward shield.
But, all unthought, the king of Afric there
Found the strong sinews of the Christian war:
Imperial Charles, with him a generous train,
King Salomons, and the noble Dams;
Each Angelino there his station took,
With either Guido and Bavaria's duke.
There Ganslone, Berlinger appear;
Avino, Otho, and Avolio near:
Unnumber'd more, of less reputed name,
Who from the Fleming, Frank, and Lombard came:
Alike prepar'd before their sovereign's sight,
To show their valour with the first in fight.

Of these the tale shall speak some future time:
Now to a noble duke I bend my rhyme;
The bold Astolpho, born on Albion's strand:
Him late, far distant from his native land
I left; who now impatient seems to mourn
His exil'd state, and languish to return,
As promis'd oft by her, whose power had quell'd
Alcina's navy and her flight compell'd:
Hers was the care to speed him on his way,
To shield from danger and prevent delay.
For this a galley had she launch'd, the best
That ever plough'd the curling ocean's breast;
And lest (for so her fears had oft divin'd)
Alcina should impede his course design'd,
She Andronica sends, with ships prepar'd,
And fair Sophrosyne the knight to guard,
Till in his sight th' Arabian sea appears,
And through the Persic tide his vessel steers.
She bids him rather coast the Scythian shore,
And Nabatei and India's realms explore,
With Persia's gulf, than tempt the seas where rave
Eternal winds that swell the northern wave.
And where, for many a month, no sun displays
Above th' horizon his enlivening rays.
Thus all dispos'd, the dame with friendly heart
Now grants the duke permission to depart,

⁶ Fortitude and Temperance, as mentioned in notes to Book x. ver. 348.

⁷ Un grossa armata—a powerful fleet. —There is some obscurity in this narrative, for it does not clearly appear what vessels went with Astolpho. It seems by the poet's words, when Astolpho leaves the port of India, that he had only one galley, in which he sailed with Andronica and Sophrosyne; nothing is said of any armed force throughout the voyage, till they come to the gulf of Persia, when the poet mentions ships in the plural number.

— pigliaro il porto, e fur converti
Con la poppa alla ripa i legai vagli.

They seek the port, and resting on the strand,
With poop to shore the painted vessels stand.

But first, on many a subject grave and sage,
Instruction gives, too long to swell the page.
And lest a hostile power should once again
His senses fetter in some magic chain,
She on the knight⁶ a wondrous book bestow'd,
Which fair to see full many a secret show'd:
This for her sake he took—a faithful guide,
Aguard against enchantments to provide. 100
Here, while his eyes the learned leaves peruse,
Each spell'd mystery explain'd he views.
Another gift she brought of magic power,
(A gift so rare was never seen before,)
A sounding horn⁷ that scatters instant fear
With horrid noise in every trembling ear.
Such was the din, where'er its echoes spread,
The boldest knight, appall'd with terrour, fled.

⁶ The fiction of the book is drawn from Boyardo. Orlando having delivered a young man from the power of a giant, receives from the father a present of a book that would resolve all doubts. Orlando ascends a mountain, the summit of which was inhabited by a Sphinx, of whom he inquires after Angelica: the monster proposes a riddle to him, but he being unable to answer it, kills her, and afterwards finds the riddle explained in this book. Flordelis has likewise a book by which she enters into a detail with Rinaldo of the several wonders of the garden of Falerina.

Orl. Innam. b. i. c. v. xvii.

⁷ This horn appears to have been in a great measure the invention of Ariosto, at least in the extent of the wonderful effects here ascribed to it: it is copied by Spenser. When Arthur is brought by Una to deliver the Red-cross knight from the giant Orgoglio, his squire, on their arrival at the castle gate, sounds a horn, which is thus described.

Was never wight that heard that shrilling sound,
But trembling fear did feel in every vein;
Three miles it might be easy heard around,
And echoes three arower'd itself again;
No false enchantment, or deceitful train,
Might once abide the terror of that blast,
But presently was void and wholly vain;
No gate so strong, no lock so firm and fast,
But with that piercing noise flew open quite and brast.
Fairy Queen, b. i. c. vii.

Mr. Warton says, "It seems rather strange that Spenser should make so little use of this horn. He has not scrupled to introduce the shield, though as manifestly borrowed from Ariosto, upon various occasions."—Notes to Fairy Queen.

"Turpin mentions a wonderful horn which belonged to Roland. Olaus Magnus relates, that this horn, which was called Olivant, was won, together with the sword Duranda, (Durindana, so celebrated in Ariosto) from the giant Jutmundus by Roland; that its miraculous effects were frequently sung by the old Islandic bards in their spirited odes, and that it might be heard at the distance of twenty miles. A horn was a common expedient for dissolving enchantments. Cervantes alludes to this incident of romance where the devil's horn is sounded as a prelude to the disenchanting of Dulcinea. Dante mentions the horn of Orlando thus: while they are wandering along the banks of Phlegethon as the twilight of evening approaches,

Not such the mingled roar when winds resound,
When thunders roll, and earthquakes rock the ground! 110

Rich in the fairy's gifts, th' intrepid duke
His last farewell with grateful feeling took:
He leaves the port, the quiet bay he leaves,
And in his poop the prosperous breeze receives.
And now along the spicy shore he flies¹⁰,
Where India's rich and peopled towns arise.
He sees a thousand isles on either hand
Dispers'd—and now he views Tomaso's land¹¹:

Dante suddenly hears the sound of a horn more loud than thunder or the horn of Orlando.

Ma io sento sonare alto corno —
Non sono sì terribilmente Orlando —

"Virgil's Alecto's horn is as high and extravagant as any thing of the kind in romance,

— coruque recurro

Tartaream intendit vocem: qua protenus omne
Contremuit nemus, et sylvæ intonuere profundæ:
Anxiet et Trivivæ longæ lacus, audit amnis
Sulphureæ Nar albus aqua —

Æneid. lib. vii. ver. 513.

— to her crooked horn,

Such as was then by Lælian shepherds borne,
Adds all her breath: the rocks and woods around
And mountains tremble at th' infernal sound;
The sacred lake of Trivia from afar,
The Veline fountains and sulphureous Nar,
Shook at the baleful blast, the signal of the war!

Dryden.

See Warton's History of Poetry, vol. iii. p. 246.

"It is said (in an old romance) that Alexander gave the signal to his whole army by a wonderful horn, of immense magnitude, which might be heard at the distance of sixty miles, and that it was blown or sounded by sixty men at once. This is the horn which Orlando won from the giant Jutmundus, and which, as Turpin and the Islandic bards report, was endued with magical power. Cervantes says, that it was bigger than a weaver's beam. Boyardo, Berni, and Ariosto have all such a horn, and the fiction is here traced to its original source."

See Warton's History of Poetry, vol. i. p. 132.

¹⁰ There can be little doubt but Tasso had an eye to this book when he described the voyage of Charles and Ubaldo to bring Rinaldo from the island of Armida. The whole passage, particularly the prophecy relating to the future discoveries in navigation, is exactly in the spirit of Ariosto.

¹¹ By the land of Tomaso is meant the province of Malabar, where St. Thomas the apostle, after having preached the gospel to many nations, it is said, at last suffered martyrdom.

"While Gama lay at anchor among the islands of St. George, near to Mazambie, there came three Ethiopians on board, (says Faria v. Sousa,) who seeing St. Gabriel painted on the poop, fell on their knees in token of their Christianity, which had been preached to them in the primitive times, now corrupted. It is reported that the Portuguese found two or three Abyssinian Christians in the city of Mombaze, who had an oratory in their house. In the south parts of Mulebar, about 200,000 of the inhabitants professed Christianity before the arrival of the Portuguese. They called

And here her course the wary pilot veers,
 And bending to the north the vessel steers: 120
 The golden soil of Chersonesus past,
 She ploughs the billows of the wat'ry waste;
 And views, as near she coasts the fertile shores,
 Where Ganges to the sea his waters pours
 With whitening foam—the Taprobana views,
 And Coris next; and now her course pursues
 Where mariners th' advancing cliffs survey,
 That form, with seas confin'd, a narrow bay:
 At length the realm of Cochín she perceives,
 And thence the furthest bound of India leaves. 130

While thus Astolpho cuts the briny tide,
 Safe in the conduct of a skilful guide,
 He Andronica asks¹², if e'er 't was known
 That regions, titled from the setting Sun, themselves the Christians of St. Thomas, by which apostle their ancestors had been converted. For 1340 years they had been under the patriarch of Babylon, who appointed their archbishop. Francisco Rez, a Jesuit missionary, complained to the Portuguese archbishop of Goa, that when he showed these people an image of our lady, they cried out: 'Away with that filthiness! we are Christians, and do not adore idols or pagoda.'¹³

Mickle's note to the Iid Lusiad of Camoëns.

Camoëns at the conclusion of his poem has a particular passage relative to St. Thomas, in describing the religious state of the several provinces of India.

Here India's angel weeping o'er the tomb
 Where Thomas sleeps, implores the day to come;
 The day foretold—when India's utmost shore
 Again shall hear Messiah's blissful lore.
 By India's banks the holy prophet trol,
 And Ganges heard him preach the Saviour-God.
 Where pale disease ere-while the cheek consum'd,
 Health, at his word, in ruddy fragrance bloom'd:
 The grave's dark womb his awful voice obey'd,
 And to the cheerful day restor'd the dead:
 By heavenly power he rear'd the sacred shrine,
 And gain'd the nations by his life divine.

Mickle's Lusiad, b. x.

See the whole passage and the note annexed, for a full account of this matter.

It is observed by Mazzoni, in his Defence of Dante, that it was impossible from the Chersonesus for Astolpho to see the land of St. Thomas, being at a distance of four hundred miles on the coast of Malabar, neither could he, having past the Chersonesus, see the mouth of the Ganges, which he must have left some hundred miles behind him in doubling Cape Comorin. But Ariosto's geography appears very erroneous; he speaks of Cochín as the last country which they left in India, whereas Cochín lay the farthest country to the east, and the course of Astolpho was westward to the Red Sea. Tasso is much more correct in his voyage of Rinaldo, book xiv.

¹² Ubald, in Tasso, inquires nearly in the same manner of his pilot, if any navigators had gone the like voyage before.

Then Ubald thus began—"Say thou, whose power Gives us these endless waters to explore, Did ever prow before those seas divide?"

Tasso's Jerusalem, b. xv. ver. 177.

Had sent a venturous bark with oars and sail,
 To catch in eastern seas the driving gales;
 Or vessels thence their constant track might keep
 To France or Britain thro' th' unfathom'd deep?
 Then Andronica thus—"The Earth embrac'd
 With Ocean's arms that circle round her waste, 140
 On every part collected waters sees,
 Where summers scorch them, or where winters freeze;

But since, where Æthiopia south extends,
 Far tow'rd's the pole the savage land descends,
 There are who say that Neptune's power withstood,
 Here finds a barrier to th' indignant flood.
 Hence from our clime no vessel courts the breeze,
 To spread her daring sail on Europe's seas:
 Nor pilot yet, from distant Europe, braves
 The lengthen'd tides to stem our eastern waves. 150
 Far in the west¹³, when years their course have roll'd,
 I see new Argonauts their sails unfold;
 And many a Tiphys ocean's depths explore,
 To open wondrous ways untry'd before.
 Some coasting round the shelves of Afric¹⁴, trace
 Th' extended country of the sable race,
 To pass the line whence blazing Phœbus burns,
 And to your realms from Capricorn returns:
 At length the Cape's extremest point they gain 159
 That seems to part from ours the western main:
 Each clime they view, and search, with ceaseless toils,

The Persian, Indian, and Arabian isles.
 Some pass the pillars rais'd on either strand,
 The well-known labour of Alcides' hand,
 And like the circling Sun, with sails unfurl'd,
 Explore new lands in some remoter world.
 Behold the sacred cross uprais'd, behold
 On the green turf th' imperial staff unroll'd.
 Lo, some to guard their infant navy run,
 Some haste to seize the land their toils have won.
 A thousand chas'd by ten forsake the fields: 177
 To Aragon the furthest India yields.
 The chiefs of Charles (the fifth that bears the name)
 Where'er they pass, behold them crown'd with fame!
 Heaven wills these climes¹⁴, to future sailors shown,
 Now rest, and shall for ages rest unknown,
 Till in due time a monarch great and wise
 Shall, like Augustus, o'er the nations rise:
 From Aragonian and from Austrian blood¹⁵
 I see, beside the Rhine's far winding flood, 180

¹³ The poet here alludes to the discoveries in navigation made by the Spaniards and Portuguese, the first directing their course to the west, and the second to the east.

¹⁴ The poet, in the following passage, alludes to the discoveries of the new world by Christopher Columbus; of whom also Tasso.

'T is thou, Columbus, to another pole
 Shall rear the mast and o'er the surges roll,
 While with a thousand wings and thousand eyes
 Fame scarce pursues thy vessel as it flies!

Book xv. ver. 234.

¹⁵ He celebrates the emperor Charles V. who was born at Ghent in Flanders, in the year 1510. His father, Philip the Handsome, archduke of Austria, was the son of the emperor Maximilian, and of Mary, the only child of Charles the Bald, the last prince of the house of Burgundy. His mother Joanna was the second daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella, king and queen of Castile and Aragon.

This ruler born, whose valour shall excell
 What pens before could write, or tongues could tell
 By him Aratra see recall'd to Earth,
 Or rather, dead, reviv'd to second birth;
 And every virtue by her hand replac'd,
 Which wretched mortals from the world hadchas'd.
 For these deserts th' eternal will of Heaven,
 Not only to his sovereign rule has given
 The crown which Trajan and Augustus wore,
 Which Marcus and Severus held before, 190
 But bids his power to every realm extend,
 Where suns by turns arise, by turns descend;
 And wills that under his auspicious sway
 One faithful flock one shepherd should obey.
 To work these ends th' Almighty shall decree
 For him unconquer'd chiefs by land and sea.
 Lo! Cortez¹⁶ who shall Caesar's arms extend,
 And to his potent laws new cities bend;
 With kingdoms so remote, that yet their name
 From western regions ne'er to India came. 200
 Behold where Prospero Colonna stands¹⁷:
 Pescara's marquis¹⁸ next my voice demands;

A long train of fortunate events had opened the way for this young prince to the inheritance of more extensive dominions than any European monarch since Charlemain. He was contemporary with Francis I. of France, and Henry VIII. of England. See Robertson's History of Charles V.

Many of these predictions were inserted, or enlarged, in the latter editions of the poem, for the first edition was only fifteen years after the birth of Charles, and some of the events did not take place till after the first publication; which observation will hold good in several other parts of the work.

¹⁷ In the war of the Milanese 1521, the Imperial troops took the field under the command of Prospero Colonna, the most eminent of the Italian generals, whose extreme caution, the effect of long experience in the art of war, was opposed, with great propriety, to the impetuosity of the French. He afterwards drove the French out of Milan, having defeated them at the battle of Bicocca: he made himself master of Genoa. Colonna at the age of fourscore defended Milan against the French, who attacked it under the command of Bonnevit.

See Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. ii.

¹⁸ "The marquis of Pescara was joined with Prospero Colonna in the war of the Milanese: he took Milan by assault: he is particularly applauded for his generous attention to the chevalier Bayard, at the death of that brave man. When Mezieres was besieged by the Imperialists, the French committed the defence of the place to the chevalier Bayard, distinguished among his contemporaries by the appellation of the knight without fear and without reproach. The punctilious honour and formal gallantry of this man, bore a nearer resemblance than any thing recorded in history, to the character ascribed to the heroes of chivalry; he possessed all the talents that form a great general. When the French were obliged to quit the Milanese, the chevalier received in an

 Such is Alphonso¹⁹, such his worth appears,
 So far above the promise of his years, 210
 Th' imperial monarch shall in him confide
 To lead his armies and his councils guide,
 Till by this chief his warlike thunders haul'd
 Shall spread his banners o'er the subject world.
 Nor less his empire where the billows roar
 From Europe's bounds to Afric's burning shore:
 There equal conquest shall his arms attend,
 When gallant Dorea he secures his friend.

action a mortal wound, and being unable to continue any longer on horseback, he ordered one of his attendants to place him under a tree, with his face towards the enemy; then fixing his eyes on the guard of his sword, which he held up instead of a cross, he addressed his prayers to God; and in this posture, which became his character, both as a soldier and as a Christian, he calmly waited the approach of death. Bourbon, who led the foremost of the enemy's troops, found him in this situation, and expressed regret and pity at the sight. 'Pity not me,' cried the high-spirited chevalier; 'I die as a man of honour ought, in the discharge of my duty: they indeed are objects of pity, who fight against their king, their country, and their oath.' The marquis de Pescara, passing soon after, manifested his admiration of Bayard's virtues, as well as his sorrow for his fate, with the generosity of a gallant enemy; and finding that he could not be removed with safety from that spot, ordered a tent to be pitched there, and appointed proper persons to attend him. He died, notwithstanding their care, as his ancestors for several generations had done, in the field of battle. Pescara ordered his body to be embalmed, and sent to his relations. Pescara died at the age of thirty-six, and left behind him the reputation of being one of the greatest generals and ablest politicians of that century."

Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. ii.

¹⁹ Alphonso d'Avolo, marquis of Vasco, succeeded the marquis of Pescara. He was governor in Milan. He was remarkable for the beauty of his countenance. He was taken by Philipppo Dorea, at the siege of Naples, and contracted an intimate friendship with Andrew Dorea. These three were captains of Charles V. in all his victories over Francis: he died the year before Francis.

Eugenico, Porcaccio.

²⁰ "Andrew Dorea was the ablest sea-officer of his age: by his assistance, Lautrec, generalissimo of the French, made himself master of Genoa. At length, disgusted with the French, he revolted to the emperor: this gallant officer, the citizen of a republic, and trained up from his infancy in the sea-service, retained the spirit of independency natural to the former, together with the plain liberal manners peculiar to the latter. A perfect stranger to the arts of submission or flattery, necessary in courts, but conscious at the same time of his

Not such was Pompey's praise²¹, though wasting

Of corsairs he subdu'd with Roman arms;
 For what was Dorea's, nam'd with Pompey's power,
 That bow'd each state and ravag'd every shore?
 Yet he by conduct wise and dauntless might
 Sl all purge the seas—till from rude Capè's height
 To sevenfold Nile, whence'er his name they hear,
 I see the distant nations shake with fear.
 Behold, conducted by this leader's hand²²,
 Imperial Charles²³ has reach'd Bologna's land. 250
 Lo! to admit him, wide the gates are thrown,
 His awful brows receive the sacred crown.
 His country's freedom patriot Dorea gains,
 When others for themselves had forg'd her chains.
 Such generous zeal shall longer glory yield,
 Than Julius' battles in the sanguine field;
 Where Gallia, Spain, or Britain's distant shore,
 Afric or Thessaly confus'd his power.
 Not great Octavius; nor Antonius great,
 The mighty rival of Octavius' state. 240
 Such wreaths deserves—th' ambition that annoy'd
 Their nation's freedom every praise destroy'd!
 Let these, let all who strive their country's fame
 To sink in bondage, glow with guilty shame;
 Nor dare to lift their eyes, where'er they hear
 Great Dorea's honours breath'd in every ear.
 Behold where Charles (whose ample bounty flows
 On virtuous Dorea's worth) on him bestows
 A fruitful soil²⁴, which gift in Puglia lays
 The first foundation of the Norman praise. 250

own merit and importance, he always offered his service with freedom, and often preferred his complaints and remonstrances with boldness. Dorea, having left the French service, meditated the delivery of Genoa from the yoke it groan'd under; which he soon effected; and it was then in his power to have rendered himself the sovereign of his country; but with a magnanimity, of which there are few examples, he sacrificed all thoughts of aggrandising himself, to the virtuous satisfaction of establishing liberty in his country: by his wise conduct he put a stop to all faction, and lived to a great age, beloved, respected, and honoured: his memory is still revered by the Genoese, and he is distinguished in the public monuments, and celebrated in the works of their historians, by the most honourable of all appellations, THE FATHER OF HIS COUNTRY, AND THE RESTORER OF ITS LIBERTY.²⁵

See Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. iii.

²¹ Andrew, with twelve galleys, fired the ports and seas from corsairs: and the terror of his name was so great, that Barbarossa, the admiral of Tunis, many times shunn'd to engage him. Pompey the Great was deputed by the senate to clear the seas of pirates, which he effected in a short time; but as Pompey was supported by the whole force of the Roman empire, the poet here extols the valour and conduct of Dorea, who performed such service with so inconsiderable a force.

²² The emperor Charles V. coming to Bologna to receive from pope Clement the crown of the empire, embarked at Barcelona on board Dorea's galleys, who having driven the French from Genoa, received the emperor in that city, in order to conduct him thence to Bologna.

²³ The emperor having created Dorea high admiral of the seas, gave him in Puglia the principality of Melfi. Porca chi.

Nor he alone, but all like him, who dare
 In Cæsar's cause the deathful combat share,
 Partake his smiles, and happier Cæsar's breast
 For lands and cities, through his grace possess
 For those he loves, or those whose worth obtains
 His bounty, than for all the realms he gains.²⁶

While Andronica thus each chief displays
 Whose fate decides the name of Charles shall raise;
 Her fair companion²⁷ to the eastern gales
 Now shifts: and now extends the bending sails; 260
 Now this, now that she courts to speed their course,
 And now decreases, now augments their force.
 At length the Persian sea their vessel laves,
 And round them flows a vast expanse of waves.
 Few days were past, when to the gulf they came,
 To which of old the Magi gave the name²⁸:
 They seek the port, and resting on the sand
 With stop to shore the painted vessels stand.
 And now Astolpho from Alcina's power
 Pursues his path in safety on the shore. 270

Where many a plain he travels, many a wood,
 And many a desert vale and mountain rude.
 There oft by day, and oft by midnight shade,
 What murderous bands his lonely steps invade!
 Lions and dragons fell his eyes survey,
 With every beast that haunts the dreary way.
 But when he to his lip the horn applies,
 Each ruffian foe, each savage monster flies.

Arabia nam'd the happy, now he gains,
 Incense and myrrh perfume her grateful plains:
 The virgin phoenix there in seats of rest, 281
 Selects from all the world her balmy nest.

He saw, where once for Israel's chosen band,
 Th' avenging waters, by divine command,
 Proud Pharaoh with his numerous host o'erthrew;
 At length he near the land of heroes drew²⁹.
 By Trajan's banks he spurs with winding course³⁰
 His steed, unmatched in swiftness as in force;
 When o'er the field he leads the bounding race,
 No eye his footstep in the dust can trace: 290
 Soft snows and tender grass his hoofs sustain,
 He sweeps unbathe'd the billows of the main:
 Argalia own'd him late—no mortal sire
 He knew, conceiv'd of nimble wind and fire:
 Not fill'd with earthly food, his purer frame
 Was nur'd with air, and Rabican his name³¹.

Astolpho still his eager way pursu'd
 To where the Nile receives the lesser flood.
 But ere he reach'd the river's mouth, he spy'd
 A bark that tow'rd's him swiftly stemm'd the tide.
 An aged hermit in the stern appear'd, 301
 Adown his bosom sav'd his silver beard.

²⁶ Fernari allegorizes the passage thus:—Andronica (Fortitude) speaks of high achievements and victories: Sophrosyne (Temperance) rules and represses the wind; that is, governs and keeps in due bounds the passions and affections of the soul.

²⁷ The Magi were an ancient sect of Persia, that for a long time usurped the kingdom. In the Persian gulf was a port called from them the port of the Magi.

²⁸ By this must be understood the land celebrated for the herbs of ancient story.

²⁹ He means by this the cut made by Trajan, extending from the Nile to the Red Sea.

³⁰ The account of this horse is in Boyardo. See note to book vii. ver. 481.

With frequent cries he call'd the knight to take
 With him protection, and the land forsake,
 "O! if thou prizest life, my son," he said,
 "Nor seek'st this day to mingle with the dead,
 Speed to the further shore without delay,
 For yonder path to death will lead thy way.
 Scarce shalt thou pass a few short miles, before
 Thine eyes shall view the dwelling red with gore.
 In this his life a dreadful giant leads, 311
 Whose height, by many a foot, the height exceeds

Of human race—no traveller, or knight
 Can hope t' escape alive by force or flight.
 All cruelties his fiend-like arts contrive,
 He slaughters some, and some devours alive.
 To seize the wretch his glutton maw destroys,
 With cruel sport he first a net employs
 Of wondrous make, and near the cave with care
 Hides in the yellow sands the fatal snare. 320
 Who comes untutor'd in his subtle wiles,
 Nor knows the danger, nor suspects the toils:
 Then tow'rd the destin'd place with horrid cries,
 He drives the stranger, who affrighted flies,
 Till with loud laughter he beholds his net
 With tangling meshes every limb beset.
 No traveller he spares, nor knight, nor dame
 Of high repute or undistinguish'd name:
 He sucks the marrow and the blood he drains,
 He chews the flesh; the bones bestrow the plains; 330

And dire with human skins on every side
 He hangs his dwelling round in horrid pride.
 Then hear, my son, consent you path to take
 That to the sea secure thy way will make."

"Good father, thanks, and deem not I despise
 Thy proffer'd love," the fearless knight replies;
 "But danger light against my glory weighs,
 Nor life I prize compar'd with endless praise.
 Thou seek'st to shake my fix'd resolves in vain.
 Behold I haste you drear abode to gain. 340
 With loss of honour safety might be won,
 Yet more than death such safety must I shun.
 If now I go, what can I suffer more
 Than what such numbers there have met before?
 But should Heaven's pow'r so far my arms sustain
 That he should yield, and victor I remain,
 Behold I make you path secure for all:
 Slight harm may chance, but greater good befall,
 My single life expos'd in balance weigh Against the thousands I may save to day?" 350

"Go then in peace, my son," the hermit cries,
 "Heaven send his angel Michael from the skies
 To guard thy person in the hour of fight!"
 So spoke the simple sire, and bless'd the knight,
 Who, as by Nilus' banks the steed he guides,
 More in his horn than in his sword confides.

Between the rapid stream and fens there lay
 Amid the sands a narrow lonely way,
 That soon the champion to the dwelling drew,
 Whose ruthless host o' tender pity knew. 360
 Of wretches thither led, around were strung
 Discover'd heads, and naked limbs were hung;

* The dwelling of this giant resembles the den
 of Cacus in Virgil,

semperque recenti

Cæde tepetbat humus; foribusque affixa superbis
 Ora virum tristi pendebant pallida tabo.

Æneid, lib. viii.

And not a gate, or window there, but show'd
 Some horrid fragment dropping sable blood.
 As in the Alpine he glit: or rustic town,
 The hunter, long in sylvan perils known,
 Aloft suspends the paws and shaggy spoils
 Of savage bears, the trophies of his toils;
 So the fierce giant would the mightiest tell
 That in his power by cruel fortune fell. 370
 The bones of others spread the country o'er,
 And every ditch is fill'd with human gore.

Before the cave Caligorant appears,
 (Such is the name the dreadful giant bears)
 Who, for rich rooms with gold and tap'stry spread,
 Adorns his horrid mansion with the dead.
 He sees the duke at distance on the plain;
 He sees, and scarcely can his joy contain:
 For thrice the Moon had chang'd, and not a knight
 Had past that way to glut his lounging sight. 380
 Now tow'rd's the fen with rager pace he speeds,
 (The fen o'er-grown with seige and spiky reeds,
 In hope to drive the champion in the bands
 That close were spread beneath the treacherous sands,

As oft before he many a wretch had caught,
 Whom evil destiny had thither brought.
 Soon as the Paladin the foe survey'd,
 Awhile in deep suspense he cautious stay'd,
 Lest, as the hermit warn'd, his courser's feet
 Should unawares th' entangling meshes meet. 390
 But here his magic horn the warrior tries;
 His magic horn its wonted aid supplies.

The giant hear, and struck with sudden fright
 Reprints his backward steps: the Christian knight
 Repeats the blast: amaz'd in every sense
 The giant flies, but knows not where nor whence:
 Headlong he rushes on the toils, ensnar'd
 In his own toils for others oft prepar'd.
 The net extending drags him to the ground,
 And claps in twining links his body round. 400
 Astolpho, who th' enormous bulk survey'd
 Low stretch'd on earth, at once with naked blade
 Leap'd from his steed, for many a thousand dead
 To take due vengeance on the murderer's head.
 But now he fears, to kill his wretched thrall,
 Mankind would baseness more than courage call,
 While on the plain all motionless he lies
 Fast fetter'd with indissoluble ties.

This net of steel with more than mortal art 409
 Had Vulcan fram'd, to break whose smallest part
 No strength avail'd: with this of old were bound
 Venus and Mars in Love's embraces found.
 The jealous god contriv'd the subtle toils
 To entrap the god of arms and queen of smiles.
 Hermes from Vulcan this by stealth remov'd
 To seize fair Chloris³⁰, long his best belov'd;

With copious slaughter smok'd the purple floor;
 Pale heads hung horrid on the lofty door,
 Dreadful to view, and dropp'd with crimson gore.

Pitt, ver. 237.

See likewise Polypheme in Homer.

³⁰ Chloris was a nymph of whom Zephyrus was enamour'd, and having spoiled her of her virginity, he gave her the name of Flora. She was also called Zephyretta, from the name of the wind: Pope gives this last name to one of his Sylphids.

The fluttering fan be Zephyretta's care.

Rape of the Lock

Chloris, of bright Aurora's train, who flies
 Before the Sun, and round the dappled skies
 From her full vest the silver kity strows,
 The purple violet and blushing rose. 420
 Her closely Hermes watch'd, till with the snare
 One day he caught the flying nymph in air.
 Then was it known for ages to remain
 Within Canopus at Anubis' fane.
 Three thousand years elaps'd, at last arose
 Caligorant, the worst of impious foes,
 Who seiz'd with daring hand the net divine,
 And fir'd the town and robb'd the holy shrine.

From this Astolpho takes a length to bind
 The catiff's arms; these pinion'd close behind 430
 With band on band secur'd he firmly ties,
 Then from the net he frees and bids him rise.
 His fierceness tam'd, submissive now he stands,
 Mild as some damsel, to the knight's commands,
 Who thinks to lead him thence, in triumph shown
 Through many a city, fort, and peopled town:
 With him resolv'd the wondrous net to take,
 Whose like no mortal tool or band could make.
 Then on his captive's back he lays the weight,
 And leads behind him, in victorious state, 440
 The wretch, consigning to his servile care
 The ponderous helm and massy shield to bear;
 And welcome joy imparts where'er he goes,
 Since fear no more³ the pilgrim's bosom knows.

Thus pass'd Astolpho, till he near espies
 The well-known pyramids of Memphis rise;
 Memphis, that draws her greatest fame from these;
 Now crowded Cairo he before him sees.

The people flock to view with eager eye 449
 The giant's towering height, and wondering cry—
 "Whence could yon pigmy knight such prowess show
 To bind in captive chains so huge a foe?"
 While each beholds him with enraptur'd gaze,
 And gives him every palm of knightly praise.

Not then such streets and domes could Cairo boast
 As now suffice not half th' unnumber'd host
 That there reside; though great each mansion's height,

'T is said that hundreds pass'd unboas'd the night.
 There in a castle fair the Soldan dwells,
 Whose spacious structure others far excells; 460
 And thrice five thousand, held in vassal awe,
 All renegades from the Christian law,
 With wives and steeds, and each domestic train,
 Beneath one roof his ample walls contain.

Where Nile his stream to Damietta guides,
 And where he rushes in the briny tides,
 Astolpho pass'd, yet none (so went the fame)
 Escap'd alive or free that thither came.
 There on the shore and near the mouth of Nile,
 Lodg'd in a tower, a robber liv'd by spoil 470
 Of travellers and pilgrims thither led,
 And even to Cairo's gates his rapine spread.

³ "Ariosto, by Caligorant and his net, had an historical allusion to a famous sophist and heretic of his own time, who entangled people in his sophistical net of false logic: this heretic and sophist became an orthodox and useful man afterwards, as Caligorant did, when foiled by his weapon and well instructed by Astolpho. Ariosto's poem, like Spenser's, is full of historical allusions, as well as moral allegories. Ariosto has imagined the giant and net of Caligorant from the giant Zambardo in Orlando Innamorato, book i. c. vi."

Upton's Notes on Spenser.

For though his limbs a thousand wounds receiv'd,
 Not one the catiff could of life bereave.
 To prove if aught avail'd in bloody strife
 To make the Sisters cut his thread of life,
 Astolpho now to Damietta came
 And sought the wretch—Orilo was his name.
 Arriving where the sea receives the Nile,
 He sees the castle on the sandy soil, 480
 Where dwelt th' enchanted soul, no son of earth,
 Who from an imp and fairy drew his birth.
 Already there the fight with dreadful rage
 He sees two warriors with Orilo wage.
 Alone Orilo stood, but such his might
 That scarce their skill suffic'd each noble knight
 Himself to guard; yet long for valour known,
 Their fame in arms o'er all the world was blown.
 These youths their birth from Olivero take,
 Gryphon the white, and Aquilant the black. 490

When first the field the necromancer sought,
 With great advantage on his side he fought:
 With him a monster came, to whom the earth
 Of Egypt gives its unpropitious birth.
 He basks on shore, or dives beneath the flood,
 And human bodies are his dreadful food,
 When thoughtless pilgrims by his rage are slain,
 Or wretched mariners that plough the main.

The breathless monster stretch'd along the sand,

A victim lies to each brave brother's hand. 500
 But not a wound can stem Orilo feel,
 Though both the youths their blows united deal,
 Full oft his limbs they lop, but lop in vain,
 Nor though dismember'd can he yet be slain,
 Depriv'd of hand or leg, his magic power
 Returns it to the place it held before.

Now Gryphon to the teeth drives through his crest;
 Now Aquilant divides him to the breast.
 He laughs at all their blows in fell disdain,
 They rave to find their blows bestow'd in vain. 510
 So when we see the liquid metal fall,
 Which chymists by the name of Hermes call,
 Though here and there the parts dis sever'd roll,
 They soon again unite to form the whole.
 His head lopt off, Orilo swift descends,
 And eager in its search his arm extends;
 Now by the nose he takes it, now the hairs,
 And, fixing on the neck, the loss repairs.

⁴ Here follows one of the most extravagant of Ariosto's fictions: it is continued from the Orlando Innamorato; the story is thus told by Boyardo.

"After the brothers Gryphon and Aquilant were delivered from the castle of the fairy, where Mandricardo had won the arms of Hector, they pursued their journey together till they met two ladies, attended by two dwarfs; one lady was clothed in white and the other in black vestments, the dwarfs were apparelled in like manner, and one lady rode a white and the other a black palfrey. These ladies, knowing that the stars threatened the two knights with untimely death in France, in order to prevent their fate, engaged them to undertake the conquest of Orilo, who could not be killed by a mortal weapon. The knights had a dreadful battle with him, and slew a crocodile, which the necromancer brought with him, and the event continued undecided when a knight arrived, leading a giant in chains."

Orl. Innam. b. i. c. ii. iii.

Then vainly in the stream that near them flows,
Brave Gryphon's hand the sever'd visage throws:
Orilo dives, the bottom to explore, 521
And with his head returns unhurt to shore.

Two lovely dames, in comely garments dress'd,
This clad in white, and that in sable vest,
Who first to battle urg'd each gallant knight,
Stood near beside to view th' unequal fight.
These were the fairies²³, whose benignant care
Had bred from earliest years the noble pair,
When from two ravenous birds they snatch'd away
The harmless babes that in their talons lay: 530
Convey'd from weeping Sigismunda's hand,
And borne far distant from their native land.
But wherefore should I on this story dwell,
A story all mankind have known so well?

Now from these climes²⁴ withdraws the golden
The happy isles²⁵ receive the parting ray: {day,
Pale in the shade the misty objects gleam,
And the Moon glimmers with a doubtful beam:
When fierce Orilo to his fort retir'd;
For now the white and sable dame requir'd 540
To stay the combat, till the roscate morn
In eastern skies should make her wish'd return.
Astolpho now, to whom before were known,
By each device, but more their valour shown,
Gryphon and Aquilant, with eager pace
Advanc'd and held them in a strict embrace.
Not less the brethren, when in him who drew
The giant chair'd, the English duke they knew,
With joy caress'd him, who to Galla came
Known by the baron of the leopard's name. 550

The virgins led the warriors to repose,
Where near in view a stately palace rose;
Whence squires and damsels met them on the way,
With many a torch that cast a blazing ray.
Their coursers to th' attending grooms consign'd,
The knights unarm, and in a garden find,
Plac'd by a crystal fountain's murmuring tide,
A plenteous board with various cates supply'd.
Then with a massy ponderous chain they bind
The giant, on the grassy turf confin'd, 560
Tied to an oak's rough trunk, whose sturdy height
Had years defied; and lest the foe by night
Should seek to loose his bonds, and work them harm,
Ten soldiers round him watch'd to give th' alarm.

The costly wines that crown the sumptuous
board,

With savoury viands, less delight afford,
Than the sweet converse of the social hour:
But chief Orilo and his magic power
Engross the talk; while still to every mind
It seems a dream, that head or arm disjoint'd, 570
And cast to earth, should thus again unite,
And he return more daring to the fight.

Already good Astolpho counsel took;
And soon he gathers, from his wondrous book,

²³ See the foregoing note. Boyardo lightly touches on the education and early adventures of these brothers, with the care taken of them by the two fairies, but seems, for particulars, to allude to some other story, which, though it has escaped the translator's knowledge, might be familiar to the readers of Boyardo and Ariosto.

²⁴ All the following passage to the conclusion of the adventure with Orilo, is Ariosto's own, though engrafted on Boyardo's fiction.

²⁵ The Canary islands.

No mortal hands Orilo's life can end,
Till from his head one fatal hair they rend;
That lost, he dies—thus far the book can show,
But tells not how the fatal hair to know.
Nor less Astolpho conquer now enjoys,
'Than if his arms had won the glorious prize; 580
And soon to each he makes his purpose known
To take th' adventure on himself alone,
To slay Orilo; would the brethren yield
To him the trial of the doubtful field.
These, well assur'd his courage vain to find,
Freely to him the arduous task resign'd.
Aurora through the skies her light extends,
When the fierce robber from his fort descends.
Astolpho and Orilo rush to fight:
One wields the mace, and one the falchion bright.
Astolpho long essays some well-aim'd blow 591
To chase the groaning spirit from his foe.
Now, with the mace lopt off, his better hand,
Now either arm, falls bleeding on the sand:
With backward strokes he cuts him now in twain,
And with his members piecemeal strows the plain.

As oft Orilo bids the party unite,
And wondrous stands with new-recover'd might.
Him in a hundred parts Astolpho hews;
As oft his sever'd frame itself renews. 600
Amidst a thousand strokes, one, happier sped,
At length above the shoulders reach'd his head:
The head and helmet from the trunk it rends:
Sudden Astolpho from his seat descends:
Now in the matted locks with eager speed
His hand he fastens and remounts his steed:
Against the course of Nile he spurs, he flies,
And far from sad Orilo bears the prize.

Meantime the wizard hastens to explore
(Unconscious what had past) the sandy shore. 610
But when he finds the knight and courser fled,
Had to the distant forest borne his head;
He takes his steed, and on his saddle light
He leaps, and hastens to pursue the knight.
He would have cried to bid the warrior stay,
But the fierce duke had borne his tongue away.
He spurs, he gives the rein; but like the wind
Soon Rabicano leaves him far behind.

And now Astolpho for the fatal hair
Explor'd the head with unavailing care; 620
Eager to find, what found would end the strife,
From which Orilo drew immortal life.
Perplex'd he view'd the locks, alike in hue,
Nor where to fix his doubtful choice he knew:
At length—"Let all be shorn," the warrior cries,
And well his sword the place of shears supplies.
The head his left, the sword his right-hand bears,
With this he shaves around th' innumerable hairs.
Among the rest the fatal hair he shears,
Ghastly and pale²⁶ at once the face appears: 630

²⁶ Whatever may be the extravagance of the fiction, yet the descriptive force of these lines must be allowed to be admirable, and the instant change of the features, on cutting the fatal hair, exhibits a most striking picture. Metastasio has a fine passage of a similar kind, where the head of Holofemes is cut off by Judith, which she thus describes:

— Ecco l'orribil capo
D'agli omeri diviso.
Guizza il tronco reciso
E al sanguigno terren: balzarmi sento

The eyes roll inward, every symptom shows
That life at last has touch'd its wretched close:
The headless trunk that follow'd, sudden lies
Fall'n from its seat, no more again to rise.

Astolpho now the dames³³ and warriors sought,
In his victorious grasp the head he brought,
With all the signs of late departed breath,
And show'd afar the carcase stretch'd in death.
'T was doubtful, when the brother champions
view'd

Orilo slain, what secret thoughts ensu'd 640
In either breast, perchance displeas'd to find
Their hop'd-for wreaths another's temples bind.
Nor yet more grateful than to either knight,
Seen'd to each dame the issue of the fight,
Who held them with Orilo there engag'd
In fruitless toil, while thus the war they wou'd,
To keep them both from France, where cruel strife
Had menac'd won to close their youthful life.
Soon as in Darmata's town declar'd,
Orilo's death had reach'd the castle guard, 650

Il teschio semivivo
Sotto la man, ch'el sostinea: quel volto
A un tratto scolorir; mute parole,
Quel labro articular; quegli occhi intorno
Cercar del sole i rai,
Morire, e minacciar, vidi o tremar!

Betulia.

— Behold the dreadful visage
Now sever'd from the trunk, the headless trunk
Sinks on th' insanguin'd earth—beneath my hand
That bore the weight, I felt the gasping head
Half living, move convulsive—from the face
All colour fled—the lips essay'd in vain,
The uniform'd world—the ghastly rolling eyes
Yet sought the light, and threaten'd even in death.
I saw and trembled!

Bethulia Delivered.

An Italian commentator says, that by Orilo the poet figures a noted alchemist of his time, and by Astolpho, who deprives him of the means of re-joining his limbs, he denotes the person who cured him of his error.

³³ The story broken off by Boyardo is taken up by Ariosto, who brings Astolpho with Caligorant prisoner, to finish the adventure by the help of his book. The circumstances of the battle between the brothers and Orilo, are nearly the same in both poets.

"The difficulty which prince Arthur finds in killing Maleger, seems to be copied by Spenser, from the encounter of Gryphon and Aquilant with Orilo, who, like Maleger, receives no injury from all the wounds that are given him; and the circumstance, by which Maleger's death is effected, partake much of the fantastic extravagance of those by which Orilo is at last killed."

Warton's Observations on Spenser.

He stroke at him so sternly, that he made
An open passage through his riven breast,
That half the steel behind his breast did rest;
Which drawing forth he looked evermore,
When the heart blood should gush out of his chest,
Or his dead corse should fall upon the floor,
But his dead corse upon the floor fell nathermore.

Fairy Queen, b. ii. c. xi. st. 37.

The chief (as there the eastern nations use)
Disuis'd a dove³⁴ to Cairo with the news.
The message swift he bears; beneath his wing
The letter fasten'd by a slender string.
Another dove dismiss, the tidings spread
O'er Egypt soon of fierce Orilo dead.

Th' adventure finish'd thus, Astolpho warms
The brother-knights to noble deeds of arms
In aid of Charles—yet little each requires
To fan the generous ardour that inspires 660
His gallant breast 't assert the church's cause,
From insult to defend the Roman laws,
And midst their social bands to merit first applause.

Thus Aquilant and Gryphon took their leave
Of either dame, who while they deeply grieve
At such resolve, yet could not here oppose
The glorious purpose which from virtue rose.
But ere the warriors bent to France their way,
They turn'd aside their pious rites to pay
In sainted regions, with the presence blest 670
Of God him-self, in human flesh confest. [show'd

The right they follow'd, though the left hand
A path more pleasing, where the winding road
Close by the sea in easy journey lay:
Lonely the right, and horrid was the way;
But sooner this, by many tedious days,
To Palestine the traveller conveys. [plain,
Here streams were found, and herbage cloth'd the
But every other good is sought in vain.

Hence, ere they parted, with foreseeing care 680
They due provisions for their use prepare.
And on the giant's shoulders place the freight,
Whose strength suffic'd to bear a castle's weight.
Soon as they reach'd the mountain's arduous
height,

Lo! sudden stretch'd before their raptur'd sight
That holy land, where never-ending Grace
Cleans'd with his blood the sins of human race.

When now the warriors near the city drew,
They met a noble youth, whom well they knew,
Of Mecca, Sansonetto³⁵ was his name, 690
His virtues great, and great his knightly fame:
In early prime of life, above his years
For prudence fam'd, and reverch'd by his peers.
Orlando to our faith had brought the knight,
And with his hand bestow'd the Christian rite.

Him there employ'd in building forts they find,
Against th' Egyptian caliph's bounds design'd;
And now he frames the walls, 't enclose around
Mount Calvary, and fence the hallow'd ground.

From him such welcome every knight receives,
As the free soul to worth congenial gives. 701
He leads them to the gates with courteous grace,
And in his court assigns an honour'd place.
Those parts he rul'd; and there vicegerent made
By royal Charles, the empire justly sway'd.
To him Astolpho gave his conquer'd prize,
That captive giant of so huge a size,
With whose strong nerves enormous weights to bear,
Ten beasts of burthen scarcely could compare.

³⁴ This practice followed in Egypt of sending advices to distant parts, is described by Tasso.

These winged heralds thus the mandates bear
Of eastern nations through the fields of air.

B. xviii. ver. 350.

³⁵ The name of this knight does not appear in the Innamorato.

With him Astolpho on the knight bestow'd 710
The wondrous net to which he conquest ow'd.
From Samsonetto then the duke receiv'd
A costly belt with rich embroidery weav'd;
And wo fair spurs, resplendent to behold,
Gold were the buckles, and the rowels gold,
Believ'd the champion's once, whose valiant deed
The holy virgin from the dragon freed²⁵;
With many a prize as rare were these obtain'd
By Samsonetto, when he Zaffa gain'd.

Their sins absolv'd, amidst a saintly band 720
Of fathers held in reverence through the land
For pious works, they visit every shrine,
To meditate on mysteries divine:
These shrines, which now the sacrilegious Moor
Has wrested from the Christian's waning power,
O foul disgrace! To arms is Europe fir'd,
But wars not where her arms are most requir'd.
While these with rites of pure devotion²⁷ pour'd
Their souls in prayer, and Heaven's high grace
implo'r'd,

A Grecian pilgrim came, who tidings brought 730
That deep distress in Gryphon's bosom wrought,
Absorb'd each calmer thought in black despair,
And scatter'd all his pious vows in air.
Much lov'd the knight, yet lov'd but to his shame,
A damsel, Origilla was her name²⁸;

²⁵ St. George, the tribune of Cappadocia, according to the legendary fable, travelling through Libya, delivered a virgin, a king's daughter, who was on the point of being devoured by a dragon: but Ariosto seems rather to allude to the mystic sense of the story, by which the virgin is made the type of Faith or Religion, and the dragon her ancient enemy (the old serpent) subdued by holy Fortitude. Tasso has a passage, where he describes the mother of Clorinda paying her secret devotions to a picture of this kind, which seems to give the whole an allegorical turn.

Her pictur'd room a sacred story shows,
Where rich with life each mimic figure glows:
There white as snow appears a lovely maid,
And, near, a dragon's hideous form display'd:
A champion through the beast a javelin sends,
And in his blood the monster's bulk extends:
Here oft the queen her secret faults confess'd—
Again—in her prayer—
Thou, heavenly Chief! whose arm the serpent
brav'd, &c.

Jerusal. Del. b. ii. ver. 179.

²⁷ Samsonetto and Astolpho appear again, B. xviii. ver. 649.

²⁸ Orlando going in search of Angelica, came one day to a bridge, guarded by a knight, where he found this Origilla hanging by the hair of her head on a tree, and was prevented from releasing her by the interposition of the knight, who told him a long story of her wickedness; but Origilla denying the charge, and Orlando pitying her condition, overthrew four knights, and carried her away with him: she deceived him by a wile, and stole his horse Brigliadoro, which he afterwards recovered. She then betrayed Orlando into the hands of the Pagan king Monodant, on condition that Gryphon, whom she loved, and who, with Aquilant, was prisoner to the king, should be given up to her. Gryphon and Aquilant, being

With her but few could vie in charms of face,
And few like her of mind deprav'd and base.
Late, in the walls of Constantine²⁹ behind
He left the fair, by sharp disease confin'd:
A fever's rage—and when return'd again 740
He hop'd to find her from her bed of pain
In charms restor'd, he heard the faithless dame
Had, with a new-found object of her flame,
To Antioch past,—perchance impatient grown
In prime of beauty's bloom to sleep alone.

From this sad moment Gryphon knows not rest,
By day, by night, sighs issue from his breast.
Let those that e'er have found Love's cruel smart,
Judge if he feels not now his keenest dart:
And more he suffers, doom'd the woes to feel, 750
Which conscious shame forbids him to reveal.
His brother Aquilant had oft reprov'd
His senseless passion; oft, with pity mov'd,
Strove from his heart to drive a worthless dame,
Who liv'd the scandal of the female name.
Yet, spite of truth, would Gryphon fain abuse
Himself unhappy, and her faults excuse.
At length he purpos'd to depart, unknown
Of Aquilant, and haste to Antioch's town;
And thence recover to his longing arms 760
The dame, who first enslav'd him with her charms;
To drag his rival forth, and make him prove
His dreadful vengeance for insulted love.

How this he wrought, and what in course befell
His purpos'd search, th' ensuing book shall tell.

BOOK XVI.

THE ARGUMENT.

The meeting of Gryphon and his mistress Origilla. The siege of Paris continued. Rodomont, having leaped within the walls, makes a great slaughter. While Agramant, with his forces, is endeavouring to enter at a gate, Rinaldo, conducted by the angel and Silence, comes to the assistance of the Christians. Speech of Rinaldo to his army. General battle described. Valour of Rinaldo. Zerbino signalizes himself. During the battle, Charles, who was engaged in a different quarter, in the defence of the city walls, hears the devastation made in the heart of the city by Rodomont, who was destroying all with fire and sword.

O's woes in love unnumber'd hearts complain,
And I with these an equal share sustain:
If then with speech or pen I should declare
What pains oppress, and what are light to bear,
Confide in him, who from himself can tell
Those sufferings which he oft has known so well.
Though from her lover's sight the fair-one flies,
Frowns on his sorrows, and his suit denies;
Condemns him still unrecompens'd to waste
The tedious moments; if his heart is plac'd 10

both set at liberty, the two knights, with Origilla, between whom and Gryphon a close attachment had been formed, pursued their journey, till Origilla being taken sick, was left behind on the way, at which part Ariosto takes up her story. See Ori. Innam. b. i. ii.

²⁹ Byzantium, Constantinople.

On virtuous beauty, let him cease to mourn,
Nor deem his state of every hope starv'd :
But let him weep, him wretched most we call,
Whom lovely locks and sparkling eyes enthral,
Whose beauty serves but as a treacherous blind
To hide each vice that taints the female mind.
He seeks to fly, but, like a wounded hart,
Where'er he goes, he bears the fatal dart ;
He blushes for himself, he feels his shame,
He knows no cure, nor dares avow his blame,— 80
Such was unhappy Gryphon's state, who views
His fault too well, and still that fault pursues,
He sees how ill his doting thoughts are plac'd
On Origilla, faithless and unchaste ;
Yet reason to controlling love gives way,
And passion over will usurps the way,
Her baseness, her ingratitude he knows,
And still pursues her steps where'er she goes.

Now to resume the pleasing tale :—Unknown
To all, he issu'd from the walls alone : 30
Nor to his brother durst his purpose move,
Whose better wisdom oft had check'd his love,
But turning to the left, without delay,
To distant Rome he takes the ready way.
Six days elap'd, Damascus strikes his eyes,
And thence his course to Antioch's city lies :
When near Damascus' walls the knight he met
On whom his faithless dame¹ had newly set
Her changeful heart, and well the pair agreed
As with the fetid flower the poisonous weed. 40
Both fickle, base, and vers'd in every wile,
With courteous show concealing mutual guile.
Thus, as I said, the base deceiver rode,
And, arm'd in pomp, a stately steed bestrode,
With Origilla, richly to behold
Array'd in azure garments fring'd with gold,
Two squires beside him pac'd along the field,
Who bore by turns his helmet and his shield.
For now he sought, with every splendour shown,
To attend a tilting in Damascus' town. 50
It chanc'd the Syrian monarch then declar'd,
By trumpet's sound, a sumptuous feast prepar'd ;
Hence, from afar (as candidates for fame)
Adorn'd with every cost the warriors came.

Soon as the dame beheld her injur'd knight,
Brave Gryphon near, she tumbled with afright.
She knew her lover's force too weak to wield
His arms against him in an equal field.
But vers'd in fraud, each feature soon she clears,
No voice, no gesture tells her inward fears : 60
Now with her partner she concerta the guile,
Then hastes to Gryphon with a treacherous smile :
In well-dissembled joy her arms she throws
Around his neck, and to his bosom grows :
With honied words, with every soothing art
Of dalliance fond she melts his easy heart.

Then weeping thus—“ Is this, my long-lost lord,
Is this, alas! my constant love's reward?
Twelve tedious months neglected and alone,
Gryphon nor hears my sighs, nor heeds my moan ; 70

And had I stay'd his wish'd return to see,
That day perchance had ne'er been seen by me!
When with impotence from Nicosia's court,

(Where rosy a knight and damsel made resort)
I hop'd thy swift return to me bereft
Of every joy, by thee unkindly left ;
When the fell fever prey'd upon my life,
And death stood threatening in the dubious strife ;
I heard my Gryphon (all his vows forgot)
Had Syria reach'd—How cruel then my lot ! 80
Hopeless to follow—desperate thoughts suggest
With my own hand to pierce my wretched breast.
But favouring Fortune's better care supply'd
That succour, which thy cold neglect deny'd :
She, in my brother, sent a valu'd friend
From all unchance my honour to defend ;
And now, a bliss above each blessing dear,
Gives me to meet my lord, my Gryphon here!
Sure but for this my soul had wing'd her flight
In fond impatience for thy much-lov'd sight !” 90

So spoke the damsel fraudulent of mind,
Mistress of art and basest of her kind ;
So well she knew her feign'd complaints to frame,
That all to Gryphon she transferr'd the blame ;
And made him with such eyes her minion view,
As if their birth they from one parent drew ;
And with such specious tales beguill'd the youth,
Not John nor Luke bore clearer marks of truth.
Thus she, as foul in heart as fair in look,
Disarm'd brave Gryphon of prepar'd rebuke : 100
Enough, that from himself he can remove
The heavy charge of her neglected love.

Th' impostor greeting now, with him he steer'd
His friendly way, and as they journey'd, heard
That Syria's wealthy king proclaim'd a court,
For splendid show, where knights of every sort,
Of Christian faith, or bred in Pagan laws,
Whom rumour to the festive meeting draws,
Without the walls, or in the town secure,
Remain, unquestion'd, while the jousts endure. 110

Yet think me not so eager still to dwell
On Origilla², and her story tell,
(Whose life each lover, that her smiles believ'd,
A thousand times with female guile deceiv'd,)
That here my Muse forgets again to turn
Where warring squadrons throng'd on squadron burn

With martial fury, while in arms they make
Proud Paris tremble, and her bulwarks shake.
I left where Agramant assail'd a gate
He vainly deem'd in weak defenceless state, 120
But not a part more strongly could oppose,
With chosen troops, th' incursion of the foes.
There Charles himself, with leaders well prepar'd,
There Ocho and Avolio kept the guard :
Two Guidos, either Angelino there,
Avino, Angeleri, Berlinger.

Each Pagan warrior to new fame aspires,
Nor less each Christian glows with generous fires :
All anxious in their sovereign's sight to gain
The meed and praise which loyal deeds obtain. 130
Nor yet the Moors with hardy feats of arms
Erase the stain of late inflicted harms ;
While countless numbers, slaughter'd by the foe,
A dire example to the living show.
Thick from the walls, like hail, the arrows pour,
And whelm th' assailants with an iron shower.
From either host in deafening clamour rise
Tumultuous shouts, and mingle in the skies.

¹ This intrigue of Origilla is not mentioned by Boyardo, but appears to be an incident naturally grafted on her story by Ariosto, and suitable to her character in the Orlando Innamorato.

² The story of Origilla and Gryphon is continued, Book xvii. ver. 118.

But leave we Charles and Agramant awhile,
And to the Mars of Afric turn our style, 140
The dreadful Rodomont, who uncontrol'd
Rag'd through the city, who, as late we told,
Left in the dreadful trench his hapless powers
Where, dire to see! the flame each limb devours,
While o'er the fosse that girt the city rood,
He safely fights within the hostile ground.
Soon was the fatal Saracen espy'd,³
Known by his foreign arms and scaly hide;
Where weak old age and those unnerv'd with fear,
To catch each rumour lent a trembling ear. 150
They ring their hands, loud cries and groans
ascend,

And shrill laments the starry region rend.
To houses some, and some to temples run;
Each seeks by flight his threaten'd death to shun.
But this to few the murderous faction yields,
That whirling round the furious Pagan wilds.
Here, on the ground, discover'd limbs are spread,
Far from the trunk, there falls the bounding head:
Through one, with backward stroke, the steel he guides,

And one, down cleft, from head to breast divides:
Of all he wounded, kill'd, or held in chase, 161
Not one would turn to meet him face to face.
As midst the harmless herds by Ganges' waves,
Or in th' Hircanian fields the tiger raves;
Or where, o'erwhelm'd by rocks, Typhæus lies,
On goats and lambs the wolf restless flies:
The savage Pagan thus unpitiful slew
Not martial squadrons, but a heartless crew:
Mere vulgar souls that ne'er in arms could vie,
Souls only worthy to be born and die. 170

Thence to Saint Michael's bridge with eager haste
Fence Rodomont the timorous people chas'd,
Alike with him the lord, the servant fares;
His ruthless hand nor saint nor sinner spares.
Religion to the priest is no defence;⁴
Nor to the babe avails its innocence.
Nor dames nor virgins find relenting grace
For lovely eyes or for a blooming face:
Nor hoary age is safe—against the foes
Not more the Pagan proofs of valour shows 180
Than cruel thirst of blood—sex, rank, and age
Fall undistinguish'd by his fiend-like rage.
Nor this fell king, of impious kings the worst,
On human lives exhausts his wrath accur'd:
Against the senseless domes his arm conspires,
The sacred fane, the stately roof he fires.
In Paris (fuel meet to feed the flame)
Of timber then was rais'd each ample frame;
And now, in many a street, as travellers tell,
Her citizens in wooden structures dwell. 190

³ Thus Virgil describes Turnus when by chance shut within the walls of the enemy.

*Agrosunt faciem invisam atque inmania membra
Turbati subito Eneadae* — Æn. ix. 735.

— his blazing buckler they descrie,
The sparkling fires that shot from either eye,
His mighty members and his ample breast,
His rattling armour and his crimson crest.

Dryden.

⁴ Thus Statius in the xth book of his Thebaid.

— non ullius ætas,

*Non cultus, non forma movet, pugnantibus idem
Supplicibusque fuit—*

Unsated yet while thus his hate he fed,
And round him wide the conflagration spread;
The strongest pillars in his grasp he took,
And from its base the nodding mansion shook!
Not Padua's engines, of the mightiest size
Thou o'er hast seen, with force that could suffice
T' o'erturn the piles which (terrible to view)
Dread Sarza's king in smoking ruins threw.

While thus the tyrant sword and fire employ'd,
And burnt the town and lives on lives destroy'd,
Had Agramant without alike prevail'd, 201
Paris had sunk and all her glory fail'd!
But this the Paladin forbade, who came
From distant Albion to the field of fame,
Beneath whose care the Scotch and English spread
Their hands, by Silence and the angel led.
Heaven will'd when Rodomont at first engag'd
In blood, and slaughter through the city rag'd,
That Clarmont's leader⁵, with auxiliar powers,
Should near advance to Paris, suffering towers. 210

Above the town a bridge prepar'd he threw,
And to the left his winding forces drew,
That when he led them rang'd against the foes,
No crossing river might their march oppose.
Six thousand archers first, with banner spread,
He sent on foot, by gallant Edward led;
With these two thousand horse, whose chosen bands,
All lightly arm'd, brave Arimon commands;

Who near Saint Martin and Saint Dennis' gate,
Might enter Paris and relieve her state, 220
He sends apart each car and loaded wain,
And every charge that might their speed detain;
While, higher up the Seine, with circling course,
Himself conducts the remnant of his force,
With barks and bridges fram'd to pass the tide,
Whose depth the eager troops to ford deny'd.
All safely past, and every bridge with care
Behind destroy'd, he forms in rank of war
His various powers, but first he summons all
The knights and barons: each obeys his call: 230
He mounts a height, whence every eye and ear
May view his gesture and his speeches bear.

Then thus—"T is yours, O chiefs! to lift his praise

Your hands to Heaven, who now decrees to raise
Your favour'd names, one glorious labour o'er,
And give such wreaths as ne'er were given before.
Chase from yon sacred walls our impious foe,
Two princes shall to you their safety owe⁶;
Your sovereign first, whose hopes on you depend
To guard his freedom and his life defend: 240
Then, royal Charles, whose virtues have excell'd
Whoe'er on Earth has rule imperial bid:
With these full many a king, and chief of fame,
Of various countries and of various name.

Thus while your arms preserve you grateful town,
Not only Paris shall your succours own;
Paris, whose sons now stand a heartless train,
Less fearing for the woes themselves sustain,
Than for their helpless wives and children's sake,
Who equal danger with themselves partake; 250
And holy maids, whom cloister'd walls enclose,
This day perchance defrauded of their vows;

⁵ Rinaldo.

⁶ He here addresses himself particularly to the English: by their sovereign he means Otho king of England, father of Astolpho, then besieged in Paris with Charlemain and many others.

But every country far and near, whose laws
 Submit o' his and own his hallow'd cause:
 For not a Christian town but sees expos'd
 Some citizens in yonder gates enclaid.
 If once, by public voice, the ancients gave
 A civic crown to him, whose arms might save
 A single life—what honours must be yours,
 Whose aid unnumber'd souls from death secures!
 But if or fear or envy should impede 261
 Th' achievement of so great, so just a deed,
 Should hostile force destroy yon sacred wall,
 Soon Italy and Germany may fall,
 With every realm that worships him who sign'd
 With blood a ransom for redeem'd mankind.
 Nor hope the Moors will from your lands abstain,
 (Your lands encircled by the roaring main)
 If these could once from Zibelterra's strand,
 Or Gades' confines, rush with daring hand, 270
 To waste your isles—how must their power increase,

When Gallia's conquer'd states their sway confess!
 But grant, nor honour nor advantage rise
 To crown our toils in this day's enterprise,
 Yet duty bids us with their arms unite,
 Who for one cause, for one religion fight!
 Soon shall I lead your victor-bands to throw
 In disarray the legions of the foe,
 That all unskill'd in labours of the plain,
 Appear a weak, unarm'd and heartless train." 280

With words like these address'd, Rinaldo fir'd
 Th' attentive leaders, and his host inspir'd;
 When, as the proverb speaks, was little need,
 As with sharp spur to goad the willing steed.

His speech thus clos'd, his triple force he leads,
 And up the stream with silent course proceeds,
 Beneath their standards rang'd in fair array,
 Nor drums, nor shout, their wary march betray.
 He gives Zerbino first the glorious post
 To attack with Scottish arms the Pagan host; 290
 While bending round, far stretching o'er the plain,
 He sends the warriors of Hibernia's train.
 The duke of Lancaster his central bands,
 Compas'd of English foot and horse, commands.
 These orders given, the Paladin pursu'd
 His eager course along the winding flood
 Beyond Zerbino's troops—when now appear
 Oran's huge king and king Sobrino near;
 Who, first of Afric's sons, with dauntless air,
 Their weapons to receive the foes prepare. 300

Soon as the Christian host, with banners spread,
 By Silence and the heavenly angel led,
 Perceive the foe, no longer they suppress
 That kindling warmth repeated shouts confess.
 The skies re-echo to the trumpet's blast,
 And every Pagan sbrinks with fears aghast.
 Rinaldo flies, with martial ardour prest,
 His courser spurs, and bears his lance in rest:
 No longer in the ranks remain'd coust'd,
 But leaves the Scots an arrow's flight behind. 310
 As when a whirlwind's rage resistless flies
 Before a tempest gathering in the skies:
 So, darting from the files, th' intrepid knight
 Impell'd Boyardo to the wish'd-for fight.

Soon as the Paladin was seen in arms,
 The conscious Moors presage approaching harms:
 See in each hand the fearful javelin shake,
 The trembling knee in every stirrup quake!

Alone king Pulisano knows not fear,
 Who little deem'd Rinaldo's arm so near; 320
 Nor thinking here to oppose such matchless force,
 Faciles his rapid steed to brave the course.
 Firm o'er his spear he bends, and aiming just,
 In all his strength collects him to the thrust:
 With either spur he gores his fiery steed,
 And all the reins abandons to his speed:
 While he, whose blood in Anron's veins had run,
 Whose deeds might speak him Mars' redoubt'd son,
 Displays at full, what art or grace can yield
 To crown the glory of the dreadful field, 330
 Alike each chief his threatening spear address'd,
 With skilful aim against the adverse crest,
 But far unlike th' event!—one breathless liea,
 Slain in the shock: one gains the victor's prize,
 More proofs of valour must in arms appear
 Than with a martial air to wield the spear;
 But Fortune's partial smiles o'er all prevail,
 Without whose aid even Valour's self will fail.

His trusty lance the knight in rest replac'd,
 And next Oran's gigantic sorreizin fac'd, 340
 Whose dastard mien bespoke his trembling heart,
 Though large his bones and strong each nervous
 part.

No buckler could the fatal wound prevent,
 Deep in his belly's rim the weapon went,
 And holding on its course without control,
 From the vast body drove the little soul.
 The steed inur'd long sultry hours to sweat
 Beneath his giant lord's unwieldy weight,
 To good Rinaldo seem'd his thanks to pay,
 Who freed him from the burthen of the day. 350

His javelin broke, Rinaldo turns his steed
 Swift as if wings impell'd his rapid speed,
 And midst the thickest press with eager course,
 He thunders on, resistless in his force.
 With desperate sway Fusberta round he wields;
 Before whose edge the brittle armour yields.
 Not temper'd steel nor scaly mail defends.
 But to the quick the thirsty steel descends.
 Shields lin'd with hides or fenc'd with plated wood,
 Turbans and quilted vests disdain'd with blood, 360
 Confess his arm; where'er his stroke pursues,
 Helm, cuirass, shield, he pierces, breaks, and hews,
 Which such resistance to his sword oppose,
 As grass against the scythe, or corn when Boreas
 blows.

The foremost band was now dispers'd and fled,
 When to the fight his van Zerbino led:
 First of the throng, with spear in rest, he flew:
 Beneath his standard all his troops pursue
 With equal valour—not with greater rage
 Lions and wolves with goats or sheep engage. 370
 Each spurs his courser on the adverse host,
 And soon the closing space between is lost.
 They meet, they shock—but meet with chance unlike;

The Scots alone with conquering weapons strike.
 The Pagans faintly strike, or breathless lie,
 As if they sought the battle but to die.
 A sudden chillness every Moor oppress'd:
 A sudden ardour swell'd each Scottish breast.

Godfrey to his army before the last general battle.

The swords now tremble, trembles every shield,
 Their fearful standards tremble on the field.

† Tasso has the same idea in the speech of

The troops of Afric, struck with panic fear,
 In every Christian think Rinaldo here. 380
 Sobrino now to combat moves, while all
 His troops obey, nor wait the herald's call.
 This squadron o'er the rest might honour claim
 For arms, for valour, and its leader's fame.
 His Dardinello led, but ill secur'd
 In tatter'd arms, and worse to fight usur'd;
 While on his head a shining helm he plac'd,
 And every limb in jointed armour cas'd.
 The following squadron Isolero led;
 Then Thraso, duke of Mar, his banner spread. 390
 Now Ariodantes, adding to his name
 Albania's dukedom, with his warriors came,
 Where Isolero bravely he beheld
 With forces of Navarre invade the field.
 Shrill trumpets mix't with many a barbarous sound
 Join the hoarse drums*: wheels clatter o'er the ground:

Huge engines creak: stones rattle from the sling!
 From twanging bows unnumber'd arrows sing;
 While louder clamours seem to rend the skies,
 Triumphant shouts, and grans, and dying cries:
 Such is the din where falling Nilus roars, 400
 And deafens, with his surge, the neighbouring shores!
 From either army storms of arrows fly,
 Whose dismal shadows* intercept the sky;
 While sultry vapours mix'd with dust ascend.
 And black as night in clouds condens'd extend.
 Now these, now those to fickle chance give way;
 Lo! this pursues, and that deserts the day.
 One breathless here is stretch'd, while near him slain
 His foe beneath him there has prest the plain. 410
 When spent with toil one squadron seems to yield,
 Another hastens to sustain the field.
 Now here, now there, the throng of arms increas'd;
 There thrust the foot, and here the horsemen prest'd.
 The earth on which they fought, impuried grew,
 And chang'd her green for robes of sanguine hue:
 Where flowerets lately deck'd th' enamell'd way,
 Now horse and man in mingled carnage lay.

First of the field Zerbino's might appears
 Beyond the promise of his early years: 420
 Fierce on the foes that near him thickening drew,
 He rush'd, and round him wide destruction threw,
 While to his band which newly here he sway'd,
 Brave Ariodantes deeds of worth display'd;
 Dispersing chilling fear and wonder far
 Amidst the ranks of Castile and Navarre.
 Two bastards, Mosco and Chelindo, bred
 In Aragon of Calabrou dead;
 And one, who late from Barcelona came,
 Calamidorus, not unknown to fame, 430
 To seek Zerbino's death, around him prest'd,
 And to his courser's flank their spears address'd:

* This passage may be adduced as an example of the fire of Ariosto's battles, the noise occasioned by the encounter of the two armies is nobly compared to the cataracts of the Nile. Petrarch has a similar allusion.

— come il Nil d'alto cagendo
 Co'l gran suono i vicin d'intorno assorda.

* Ariosto seems here to allude to the known answer made by Epaminondas, the Spartan general, to one who told him the arrows of the enemies were so numerous, that their flight would obscure the Sun: "Then (replied the Spartan) we shall fight in the shade."

Pierc'd by their spears he fell, with him to ground
 Zerbino fell, but fell without a wound.
 When soon recovering on his feet he rose,
 To avenge his courser on th' exulting foe.
 Through Mosco first (who rashly hop'd to take The knight dismounted, and his prisoner make)
 He thrust his blade with unabated force,
 And laid on earth a pale and lifeless corse. 440

When now Chelindo saw his brother slain,
 He rag'd, and 'gainst Zerbino spur'd again
 His trampling steed, but heedful to the shock
 Zerbino, as he pass'd, the bridle took,
 And sent the beast to earth, no more to rise,
 No more to need from generous corn supplic.
 Zerbino with such force the stroke impell'd,
 At once the courser and his lord he fell'd.
 Calamidorus, who beheld them slain,
 Scar'd at the blow, turn'd round his horse's rein. 450
 "Stay, traitor, stay!"—enrag'd Zerbino cries,
 And aims a stroke behind him as he flies.
 The sword fell short and miss'd the knight's intent,
 Yet miss'd not far—behind the wretch it went,
 A furious passage through the crupper found,
 And brought the courser lifeless to the ground.
 The rider quits his seat, in hopes to gain
 On foot his safety, but he hopes in vain:
 Duke Thraso passing by (so will'd his fate)
 O'erturn'd and crush'd him with his courser's weight. 460

Now Ariodantes with Lurcanio drew
 Where fought Zerbino in the thickest crew;
 With these came lords and knights of great account,
 Who brought their aid Zerbino to remount.
 His falchion Ariodantes whirl'd around,
 Which Attalico and Margano found,
 But chief the strokes his deathful weapon dealt,
 Hecarchus and Cassimirus felt.
 The former couple wounded left the plain:
 The last, more luckless, by his arm were slain. 470
 Alike Lurcanio marks of prowess show'd,
 Who round confusion, death, and terror strow'd.
 Deem not that less in field the conflict rag'd,
 Than where the squadrons near the stream engag'd:
 Nor think the army lagg'd behind, which brought
 By Clarence' noble duke the battle sought:
 This fierce the banner'd powers of Spain defy'd,
 While equal fortune paus'd on either side,
 Alike in both, foot, horse, and chieftains wield
 Their skillful weapons to dispute the field. 480
 Oldrado first and Pharamond appear:
 The valiant dukes of York and Glo'ster near.
 With these bold Richard earl of Warwick shines,
 And Henry, duke of Clarence, guides the lines.
 To these oppos'd (with each his martial band)
 There Mattalista, Follicone stand;
 With Baricundo—one Almeria sway'd,
 Granada this, Majorca that obey'd.
 Awhile with equal arms the battle rag'd,
 Nor this, nor that with better chance engag'd. 490
 By turns they chase, by turns are backward borne,
 As to the breeze of May quick shifts the standing
 corn;
 Or as the sea, whose waters ne'er repose,
 Plays on the strand with ceaseless ebbs and flows;
 Till Fortune, that had held in equal scale
 Each adverse host, bade Albion's arms prevail
 Against the Moor—The duke of Glo'ster's force
 Hurl'd Mattalista headlong from his horse;
 While in his shoulder Pharamond a wound
 Impress'd, and Follicone threw to ground: 500

Thustow on earth each hapless Pagan laid,
Was captive to the English camp convey'd;
And Baricondo in the fatal strife,
To noble Clarence yields his forfeit life.
Such terrors now each Pagan foe oppress'd,
Such courage swell'd in every Christian breast,
That those no longer wield their arms in fight,
But quit their ranks and turn their backs to flight:
While these advancing as their foes withdrew,
Press'd on their rear and unresisted flew: 510
And had not succour reach'd the fainting host,
That day had quell'd each Pagan's haughty boast.

Ferrau, who distant thence till now engag'd,
On king Marsilius' side the battle wag'd,
Soon as the flying standards he beheld,
The slaughter'd troops and half his army quell'd,
His foaming courser spur'd, and instant flew
Amidst the thickest of the warring crew;
Where first he saw fall headlong to the plain,
Cleft through the head-piece, young Olympio
slain¹⁰:

Once was he skill'd in sweetest lays to sing 521
Soft notes responsive to the tuneful string;
And boasted with his harp and voice to move
The sternest breast to blandishment and love.
Well if contented with his humbler fame,
He ne'er had sought the warrior's dangerous name,
But loath'd the buckler, quiver, shield and lance,
That wrought his downfall in the fields of France.
When now Ferrau, who priz'd him dear, beheld
The stripling pale, and bleeding on the field, 530
For this his ruthless bosom sorrow'd more
Than all the thousands that were slain before.
Against the victor swift his rage he bent,
Sheer through his casque the steel resistless went,
Saver'd between the brows his gushing head,
Cleft to the breast, and hurl'd him with the dead.
Nor thus appeas'd, he whirl'd around his blade,
Through helm and mail its edge a passage made.
Through face or breast the speeding steel he thrust:
There drops an arm; here rolls a head in dust. 540
Where late th' ignoble vulgar, fill'd with dread,
Dispers'd and broken from the battle field;
Now here, now there he hew'd his bloody way,
And sudden chang'd the fortune of the day.

Meanwhile king Agramant advancing, came
To prove his valour in the field of fame;
He Baliverno, Ferrarantes brought;
With him king Prusio, Bamberago fought,
And Soridano—with a throng, whose blood
Might drench the meadows in an ample flood. 550
Their number such—'t were easier to explore
Th' autumnal leaves that strow the valleys o'er.
Now Agramant collects a chosen force
(Drawn from the walls) of mingled foot and horse;
These, guided by the king of Fez, he sent
To guard his camp that stretch'd in wide extent,
On which th' Hibernian chiefs their forces bent.

This task perform'd, the monarch summons all
The remnant powers; they thicken at his call.

These to the charge with rapid haste he leads, 560
Where near the stream the fight his presence needs:
And whence a message in Sobrino's name,
But late arriv'd, his sudden aid to claim.
Beneath him rang'd, a vast innumerable throng
(His army's better half) now pours along:
So loud their march, the Scots suspended hear,
They leave their ranks and stain their fame with fear.

Alone Zerbino and Lurcanio stay,
With Ariodante, in the dreadful day.
Zerbino still unhors'd perchance had died, 570
But that Rinaldo timely aid supply'd.
The glorious Paladin had driven in flight
A hundred banners from the fatal fight,
When to his ear dispers'd by ready fame,
The tidings of Zerbino's danger came,
Whom single and on foot to death expos'd,
His troops had left by shouting Moors enclos'd.
He heard, and turn'd his steed with ire,
Where from the field he saw the Scots retire.
And thus aloud—"Ah! whither would ye haste?
What shameful panic has your arms disgrac'd?
Shall this vile race your ancient honours score?
Behold the spoils that should your fames adorn!
Great is your praise, from circling foes to run,
And leave unhors'd, alone, your monarch's son."

Then from his squire a mighty spear he took,
And Prusio king of Alavrecchia struck,
Who met the weapon on his breast, and left
His lofty steed, of seat and life bereft:
He Agricaltes slew, and hurl'd to ground, 590
Stretch'd Bamberago with a mortal wound:
Brave Soridano next his spear had slain,
But with the stroke the weapon burst in twain.
His javelin broke, Fusberta next he drew,
And rushing fierce on Serpentine flew,
Who on his shield a star conspicuous bore,
And armour, forg'd by fatal magic, wore:
Yet fell the sword with such resistless sway,
That stunn'd and breathless on the plain he lay.

When the brave chief of Caledonia's band 600
Beheld the wish'd relief, his ready hand
A courser seiz'd from those that o'er the plains
Freed from their riders ran with loosen'd reins.
In happy time the vacant seat he gain'd,
For lo! with many a gallant troop sustain'd,
Young Dardinel and Agramant appear,
The king Sobrino and Belastro near.
But fearless, from his courser he survey'd
The thickening crowd, and, whirling round his blade,

Now this, now that dispatch'd to shades of Hell, 610
The lives, which mortals led on Earth, to tell.
Rinaldo, who, with generous ardour fir'd,
To vanquish those of highest name aspir'd,
On Agramant, who tower'd in arms above
A thousand chiefs, Bayardo swift he drove
With sidelong shock, and sent, with thundering force,
To earth at once the horseman and the horse.

While thus without the walls the hosts engag'd,
Where mutual hatred, death and horror rag'd,
In Paris Rodomont the people slew, 620
And fire amidst the domes and temples threw.
Imperial Charles, who thence at distance fought,
Nor saw nor heard what woes the Pagan wrought;
And now intent auxiliary force to gain,
Receiv'd within the gates the British train,
By Arimou and gallant Edward led:
When lo! a squire, his visage pale with dread,

¹⁰ There is a great resemblance between the following passage describing the death of Olympio and the behaviour of Ferrau upon the occasion, with that of Tasso, in the ninth book of the Jerusalem, where Solyman sees his favourite page killed by Argellino. The circumstances are beautiful in each poet, nor can Tasso be accused of taking much more than the hint from Ariosto.

Appears, and oft in undistinguish'd cries
Exclaims, ere breath his further speech supplies.

" This day behold the Roman empire lost! 630
This day has Christ abjur'd the Christian host!
This day, some demon, 'scap'd from deepest Hell,
Forbids us longer in these walls to dwell.
Satan (no less a fiend such rage can breathe)
Deforms the wretched town with woe and death.
Ah! turn and see where blackening to the skies,
From crackling flames the smoky volumes rise!"

He said, and while he spoke, th' Imperial chief
The mingled clamours heard that claim'd relief.
And saw the ruddy blaze—As one who hears 640
The sacred bells that tinkling in his ears,
Proclaim the fire, to others first reveal'd,
Though most his loss from him alone conceal'd:
So look'd the monarch when the truth he knew,
When the dire prospect rose before his view:
Around him he collects a chosen force,
And to the city's square with rapid course
His banner turns, for thence the tumult came,
There fierce the Pagan raves with sword and flame:
There Charles beholds with cruel carnage spread
Th' unpurpled earth, the dying and the dead. 650

But here we pause—let those who would pursue
The tale, some future time the tale renew.

BOOK XVII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Charles and his Paladins go against Rodomont.
Gryphon, Martano, and Origilla, arrive in the city of Damascus, where they are hospitably entertained by a knight, who relates to them the story of king Norandino and Lucina, and their adventures with the orc: he declares that the king had instituted a tournament to be held in commemoration of the deliverance of himself and his queen. The knights agree to be present at this solemnity. The tournament described. Cowardice of Martano. Valour of Gryphon, who overcomes all opponents. Martano by fraud obtains the prize of the jousts, and Gryphon is openly put to shame.

WAS, ripe for punishment, our sinful race
Have past the limits of supernal grace,
T' assert his justice on offending Earth,
God gives to tyrants and to monsters birth;
Strengthens their power and rage t' afflict mankind:
Domitian, Scylla, Marius¹, hence design'd
The plagues of man, each Nero, Caius² came,
And Antonine (the last that bore the name):
Hence, from the refuse of plebeian clay,
He lifted Maximin to sovereign sway: 10
Creon he sent the Theban throne to fill:
Mezentius³ dire his people's blood to spill;

¹ The names of several Roman emperors and others, celebrated for acts of tyranny and cruelty.

² Caius Caligula.

³ A king of Tuscany, whose cruelty is thus mentioned by Virgil:—

Mortua quæ etiam jungebat corpora vivis,
Componens manibusque manus atque oribus ora,

And to the Huns, the Goths, and Lombards gave,
In later times, Italia to enslave.

How shall I speak of Attila? How dwell
On Roman Ezzellino's⁴ crimes, or tell
A thousand more, by God's high doom assign'd
His fearful ministers to scourge mankind?
This awful truth not ancient times alone
Declare, but well the present age has shown; 20
When us, his wandering and forsaken sheep,⁵
His anger gives to ravenous wolves to keep;
Who not content to glut their cruel rage,
And with their blood their horrid thirst assuage,
Invite from foreign woods a fiercer brood
Of wolves more ravenous, at their feast to feed.
Th' unbury'd heaps that Thrasymene beheld,
The blood that Canne's plain⁶, or Trebbia swell'd,
Are little to the slaughter that imbro'd
Our fields, by many a passing river view'd. 30
For sins long past, perchance has Heav'n decreed
Our woes from them, whose crimes our own exceed:
But justice once fulfill'd, our happier bands
May turn hereafter on their hostile lands,
When healing pardon to our prayer is given,
And they in turn confess the wrath of Heaven.

What guilt must now the Christian cause debate,
To draw such suffering on their wretched race!
See in each part the Turk and Moor usual!
See pillage, insult, rape and death prevail! 40
But o'er the rest their complicated woes
From Rodomont's infernal fury rose.

And now imperial Charles, with grieving eye,
Beheld around his slaughter'd people lie;
His palace burning, and his fates o'erthrown,
And desolation through the wretched town,
Spread wide and wider—"Whither, heartless crew!
Is now your flight—does none his peril view?
What city else can save your trembling bands,
Should this be wrested from your dastard hands? 50
Say, shall one man, surrounded by his foes,
Whom, thus forbid to fly, your walls enclose;
Shall he, with single arm, your glory stain,
And 'scape un wounded, while yourselves are slain?"

So spoke indignant Charles, and nearer drew
To where the Saracen his subjects slew;
Where thronging crowds, by common danger
brought,

Within the regal dome their safety sought;
That with strong walls secur'd, and well prepar'd
With needful stores, the bold assailant dar'd 60

(Tormenti genus!) et sanie taboque fuentes
Complexu in misero longa sic morte necabat.

Æn. viii. ver. 485.

The living to the dead, at his command,
Were coupled face to face and hand to hand;
Till, chok'd with stench, in loath'd embraces tied,
The ling'ring wretches pin'd away and died.

Dryden, ver. 650.

⁴ See notes to Book iii.

⁵ After the defeat at Ravenna, Pope Julius invited the Switzers and other nations into Italy, when many cities were taken, battles fought, and great slaughter made in different parts.

⁶ Two memorable battles in which the Romans were defeated by Hannibal. So great was the slaughter at Canne, that Hannibal is said to have sent to Carthage three bushels filled with rings taken from the dead Roman knights.

To lengthen'd siege—Meantime, with fury swell'd,
 Pierce Rodomont the square triumphant held,
 And scorn'd the world in arms—one dreadful hand
 The fatchion shook, one wav'd the blazing brand.
 Now furious on the palace gates he struck;
 The lofty gates resounded to the shock.
 From the high roof? the Christians hurl'd below
 Huge broken fragments thundering on the foe.
 None costly piles of ancient splendour spar'd;
 Fair marble domes one common ruin shar'd; 70
 Pillars and beams o'erlaid with fretted gold,
 The stately works their fathers priz'd of old.
 Before the gate the king⁷ of Sarza press'd,
 In shining steel⁸ that arm'd his head and breast,
 So when the serpent issuing from the brakes,
 With spring return'd his squalid coat forsakes;
 Proud of his new-gain'd spoils and youth renew'd,
 He glides along with fresher strength end'd;
 Three tongues he darts, his eyes are red with fire,
 And, where he moves, his fellow brutes retire. 80
 Not beams, nor rafters, from the fabric rent,
 Not stones, nor arrows from the Pagan sent,
 Nor whirling slings, his dreadful arm can stay:
 The crashing portal to his stroke gives way,
 While, from within, the pale and haggard crew
 Through many a breach their dire besieger view!
 The court is fill'd with death; loud clamours rise;
 The shrieking females join the soldier's cries;
 They beat their breasts, they fly from place to place,
 The portals and the genial beds embrace; 90
 Now threaten'd to receive a foreign race.
 Such was their state, so near to ruin brought,
 When, with his barons, Charles the palace sought,
 And turning to the chiefs, whose might before
 Had oft been seen in danger's direst hour:
 "Are ye not those, whose courage prov'd," he cried,
 "Once Agolant in Aspramont defy'd?
 And say, shall aught that valour now repel
 By which Troyano and Almontes fell,
 With thousands more?—Will you, O dire disgrace!
 Shrink from one man of that detested race? 101
 No—let this infidel your prowess find,
 This infidel who massacres mankind!
 Be still yourselves—the brave can death despise,
 And dies contented, if with fame he dies.
 Your presence is my hope—whene'er you join
 Your social arms, the victory is mine!"
 He said; and ceasing, with his lance in rest,
 Against the Saracen his courser press'd.
 With him the Paladin Ugero came; 110
 Namus and Olivero, chiefs of fame.

⁷ The following passages are imitated from Virgil, Æn. ii.

Aurastisque tabes, veterum decora alta parentum
 Convellunt—

And gilded roofs came tumbling from on high,
 The marks of state and ancient royalty. Dryden.

⁸ Vestibulum ante ipsum, primoque in limine
 Pyrrhus,

Faukat telis, et luce corruscus athena.

Before the gate stood Pyrrhus threat'ning loud,
 With glittering arms conspicuous in the crowd.

Dryden.

⁹ In chiaro sciar—Ariosto, in the warmth of classic imitation, seems here to forget the serpent's hide, with which he has represented Rodomont to have been armed.

With these Avino and Avolio dar'd,
 Otho and Berlinger the glory shar'd.
 All these on Rodomont their spears unite;
 Some on his breast, some on his helmet light.
 But let us cease, my lord, the deathful strain
 That sings of raging arms and warriors slain;
 Enough of Rodomont¹⁰—Now turn the style
 Where, near Damascus¹¹, Gryphon, left erewhile
 With Origilla, seems the verse to claim, 120
 And he who falsely bore a brother's name.

Of wealthy cities on the eastern coast
 Her numerous sons may proud Damascus boast:
 A journey thence of seven succeeding days
 The pilgrim to Jerusalem conveys.
 On fruitful plains it stands in wholesome air,
 Alike in winter as in summer fair;
 Against the town a mountain's neighbouring bright
 Reflects the first faint blush of dawning light:
 Two crystal rivers through the city glide, 130
 And, branching, in a thousand rills divide;
 That each its tribute to a garden pours,
 To nourish odoriferous plants and flowers.
 'T is said the scented waters there might fill
 A channel'd bed to speed th' industrious mill¹².
 O'er all the midmost street resplendent lie
 Rich vests and tapestry of various dye.
 Herbs of all hues and scents their smell dispense,
 Whence soft perfumes delight the gentle sense.
 Each gate, each window charms the stranger's sight,
 With costly stuffs reflecting mingled light; 141
 But chief, with many a fair and stately dame,
 Whose garments gay with gold and jewels fame!
 Here sprightly youths in tuneful measures lead
 The various dance, there mount the manag'd steed.
 Whate'er in India or Maramma shines,
 (Their pearly stores, or treasure of their mines)
 Damascus in refulgent pomp displays,
 While lords, and knights, and squires with wonder gaze.

As Gryphon and his train their way pursue, 150
 Devouring all they saw with greedy view;
 A knight accosts, and courteous from their steeds
 The train invites, and to his dwelling leads;
 There with refreshing baths their toil relieves,
 And at his board, with welcome smiles, receives.
 He tells them how the mighty king, who held
 The Syrian rule, and in Damascus dwell'd,
 Next day by trumpets bade the jousts proclaim.
 Where native knights or knights of foreign name
 Might show their skill and right to knightly fame.
 There, did their mien their courage truly speak,
 His guests might prove their worth, nor further trial seek.

Though Gryphon came not thither with intent
 Of tilts or combat, his high courage bent
 On noble deeds, accepts the proffer'd field,
 Nor shuns the palm that Fortune seems to yield.
 He asks what cause the festival ordain'd,
 If every year in solemn rite maintain'd,

¹⁰ The poet returns to him in the xviiith Book, ver. 35.

¹¹ See Book xvi. ver. 110.

¹² Zatta tells us, that travellers at the time of Ariosto made use of this hyperbolic expression, to give an idea of the great abundance of sweet or scented waters at Damascus, according to the vulgar phrase in use amongst us of the wind, "enough to turn a mill."

Or by the king now first decreed to try
How far his knights in deeds of arms may vie. 170
To whom the boat—"Each third revolving light
Of monthly Luna must renew the night;
In memory of our king's escape, who led
Four tedious moons half number'd with the dead.

"Then hear the tale—Our king, who bears the name

Of Normandino, lov'd a beauteous dame,
Whose royal father rap'd the Cyprian land:
At length the monarch won the virgin's hand,
And, many a knight and lady in his train,
Steer'd with his bridle by Syria's fair domain. 180
While distant from the port, with canvas swell'd,
Our vessel through Carpathian billows held
Her rapid way, so fierce around us spread
A gathering storm, the pilot shook with dread,
Three days and nights uncertain where we past,
Heartless and pale, by mountain surges cast,
Weary'd and drench'd at length we reach'd the strand

Where riv'lets lav'd the hills and verdant land.
Our tents unshipp'd, we soon with gladsome cheer
Between the trees the spread pavilions rear: 190
Some kindle fires, and some with busy care
On carpets tables for the meal prepare.
The Syrian king for sylvan game explores
The neighbouring valleys and the secret bowers;
The browsing goat, the deer or stag to find;
And two attendants bear his bow behind.

"While joyful on the turf ourselves we place,
To wait our lord returning from the chase,
Along the shore we see, with looks aghast,
The dreadful orc⁴³ to our pavilion haste.— 200
Heaven guard you all from such a fearful sight,
Nor let so dire a form your souls affright!
'Tis better with the tale describ'd to quake,
Than, at his view, with freezing horror shake!—
Such was his form⁴⁴, no language can suffice
To paint his bulk misshap'd and giant size.
Instead of eyes, upon his dreadful face
Two bones projecting fill'd each eyeless space.
He spy'd, and chas'd our trembling steps before,
And seem'd a mountain moving on the shore. 210

Like some wild boar's his spreading tusks appear'd,
Vast were his jaws, his hairy breast bespear'd
With filth obscene, he trail'd upon the ground
His nose, sagacious as the scenting hound.
All, that beheld him, think destruction nigh,
Where'er our terror drives in heaps we fly.
His blindness bought avail'd our fear to quell,
His sense of smelling but supply'd too well
The want of eyes; his course like Eurus light,
That wings must be their aid who scape by flight.

⁴³ The general idea of this story of the orc and Lucina is taken from Boyardo, but the particular incidents in both poets are evidently from the Polypheme of Homer, though it must be confessed that several circumstances introduced, are extremely puerile, in which I fear our poet will be found more liable to criticism and ridicule than in any part of his poem. This narrative will surely, more than once, recall to the reader's mind the extravagant tales of a garrulous old nurse for the amusement of children.

⁴⁴ Not unlike this passage is the description in Spenser, where a monstrous savage carries off
Amoret.

See Fairy Queen.

Of forty, whom he chas'd around the plain. 221
Scarce ten by swimming could the bark regain.
In clusters some beneath his arm he bore,
Some at his bosom in his vest before:
With some he fill'd a wallet deep and wide,
That like a scrip hung dangling at his side.

"The eyeless monster bears us to his cave,
Hewn in a rock, where near the dashing wave
On the bleak strand the lonely dwelling rose
Of purest marble, white as falling snow. 230
With him a matron dwells, whose looks declare
Her anxious thoughts inur'd to grief and care;
With her were dames and virgins kept confin'd,
Deform'd and fair, of every age and kind.
Beside his dwelling, in the cavern'd rock
A stall, no less in size, contain'd his flock:
A troop innumerable; these his wont to keep
In every season, shepherd o'er his sheep.
By turns he folds them, or to pasture drives,
And pleasing solace from the charge derives. 240

But at each meal he makes his horrid food
Of human flesh—this soon, alas! we view'd,
When, entering in the cave, with bloody hand
Three youths he takes of our devoted band:
These, while in vain beneath his grasp they strive,
The giant in his maw devours alive!
And, lifting a huge stone, his woolly care
He drives from covert, and secures us there.
Then to th' accustomed meads his herd he tends,
And sounds a reed that from his neck depends. 250
Meantime our prince returning, mark'd around
The tents forsaken and deserted ground,
And knew his loss—where late his friends remain'd,
On every side a dreary silence reign'd.

What wrought the dire mischance he little knew,
But fill'd with terror to the shore he flew;
He saw the mariners their anchor weigh,
And to the wind their parting sail display.
Soon as they view him pacing o'er the strand,
The skiff they send to bear him from the land. 260

"When wretched Normandino heard too late,
The orc's dire fury and his comrades' fate:
Whatever ensu'd, he vow'd in every strife,
For dear Lucina's sake to risk his life,
And perish or redeem his ravish'd wife.
Where in the sands the traces he beheld
Of steps impress'd, he ran, as love impell'd;
At length he reach'd the cavern where we lay
Half dead with fear, the orc's expected prey:
At every noise we think the monster near, 270
In every wind the direful glutton hear.
It chanc'd the king arriv'd, what time to roam
The prowling orc had left his wife at home:
Soon as she view'd a stranger—"Fly," she cried,
'Ah! wretched thou, if by the orc spy'd.'
"Then he—"Let him epey, and save or slay—

Such threats of danger never can dismay
A soul resolv'd—by choice, not error led,
I come to perish by my consort dead— 270
If Heaven so wills!"—He tidings then besought
Of those whom near the shore the monster caught,
But chief he ask'd of fair Lucina's fate,
If slain, or kept in wretched captive state.

"With courteous speech the matron comfort
And tells the prince his lov'd Lucina lives; [gives;
She bids no needless fears distract his mind,
The hungry orc ne'er preys⁴⁵ on wolvish-kind.

⁴⁵ Amorico Vespucio relates of certain savage,
I.

"To prove this truth, behold myself," she cried,
 'And all these females that with me reside.
 To me, nor them, he shows no signs of ill, 290
 While here content we stay; but should our will Once adverse prove—should any seek to fly,
 On her his wrath would every torment try;
 Bind her in chains, with earth alive encluse,
 Or naked to the Sun on burning sands expose.
 When in this cavern he thy friends confin'd,
 He drew not from the males the female kind,
 But left them mingled here—his perfect smell,
 Without the help of sight, each sex can tell.
 The women scape unhurt: the men must die, 300
 And four or six each day his meal supply.
 To hear thy consort hence can I devise
 No friendly means—let this alone suffice:
 No fears of death need here attend the fair,
 With us one common safety will she share—
 But hence, my son, O fly this fatal shore
 Ere yet surpris'd the ore thy life devour!
 Soon as he comes, each place he searches well,
 And not a cat escapes his piercing smell¹⁶.
 The king reply'd, he ne'er would thence remove Till her he view'd—dear object of his love; 311
 Far rather would he by her side be slain,
 Than banish'd from Lucina's sight remain.
 When long the prudent dame had vainly try'd
 To make him lay his rash design aside,
 She to relieve his grief her thoughts apply'd.

"Within the grotto many a carcase lay
 Of sheep, of lambs, and goats, which day by day
 Food for herself and all the household gave,
 And various skins were hung around the cave. 320
 She bids him from a goat's deep entrails take
 The rancid fat, and hence an ointment make,
 And to deceive the monster o'er him spread
 The fetid unctuous grease from foot to head.
 That done, she wraps the hairy goats-skin round
 The monarch's limbs—thence, growelling on the ground,

She leads him where a stone clos'd up the way,
 And where confin'd his beautiful consort lay.
 "There Norandino near the entrance mourn'd,
 Impatient till the goats and sheep return'd: 330
 At evening tide he hears the sounding reed
 At distance call them from the humid mead.
 He sees the hairy goats and woolly train,
 And close behind he sees the giant swain.
 Judge if his heart confess'd a moment's fear,
 When to the cavern's mouth the ore drew near:
 But though short doubts at first his breast assail'd,
 Soon constant love o'er every fear prevail'd.
 The ore remov'd the stone that clos'd the rock,
 And Norandino enter'd with the flock. 340
 Amid our crew the dreadful ore descends,
 But first the entrance with the stone defends:
 Then, scenting nound, he seizes two, decreed
 With gory flesh his hungry maw to feed.
 Still, still his tusks in my remembrance dwell,
 Cold fear congeals me while the tale I tell.
 The giant gone, the monarch cast aside
 His goat-skin, and embrac'd his lovely bride:

that feed upon human flesh, but says that they never eat the women.

¹⁶ An instance, among many, of the ludicrous vein of expression, so often indulged by our author, and which cannot admit of elevation in an English version.

While she, who shudders at his moch-lov'd sight,
 Now terror feels, where once she felt delight. 350
 She sees him come self-offer'd there to fall,
 Without the power to save herself from thrall.

"Midst all my woes, my dearest lord!" she said,
 'One thought alone my greatest comfort bred;
 That thou wert absent when that fatal day
 Beheld us hither brought the monster's prey.
 How'er, condemn'd to this unhappy state,
 Nature might tremble at approaching fate,
 Yet should I but my single death bewail,
 Nor tenfold fears for thee my breast assail. 360
 For shouldst thou perish here, thy death alone
 Would claim my grief, forgetful of my own.'

"To her the king—" I come in hopes to free,
 From such dire hold, this wretched train and thee;

Ah! let me rather on destruction run,
 Than let me live without thy light, my earthly Sun!
 The way I came consent with me to try;
 To you, to all, the same may open lie:
 If, like myself, you scorn not now to wear
 This unctuous skin unclean and shaggy hair.' 370

"He said; and taught us what the dame before
 Had taught, with skins our limbs to cover o'er.
 We hear instructed, and his voice obey:

In number, equal to ourselves, we slay
 The rankst goats, and with the fat beamear
 Our limbs, and in the hairy spoils appear.
 Soon as the Sun his golden couch forsakes,
 And from the east with beamy splendour breaks,
 The giant, to his cave repairing, calls
 With ready pipe the herd to quit the stalls. 380
 But o'er the cavern's mouth his hand he holds,
 Lest we, with these, should issue from the folds.
 He felt us while we pass'd, and as he press'd
 The hair and wool, dismiss'd us with the rest.
 Thus males and females safe their freedom gain'd,
 And, save Lucina, none behind remain'd.
 But whether, less than need requir'd, the dame
 Smear'd the foul unction o'er her lovely frame;
 Or whether slow she mov'd, or fill'd with dread
 Could imitate but ill the bestial tread; 390
 Or whether, when he touch'd her as she pass'd,
 Forgetful of her state, she shriek'd aghast;
 Or that her loosen'd hair dishevell'd fell—
 He knew and dragg'd her backward to his cell.

"Of this sad chance we nothing yet beheld,
 Though of ourselves all other thoughts expell'd,
 Till turning at her cries, we saw the fair
 Stripp'd from her rugged vest of goat-skin hair.
 Meantime myself and all that left the rock,
 Safe in our covering, mingled with the flock, 400
 Pass'd on securely as the shepherd led,
 Where clos'd with hills a smiling meadow spread.
 When now beneath the wood's embowering shade,
 We see the giant-ore in slumber laid,
 One seeks the shore; one climbs the mountain's
 height;

But Norandino joins not in our flight:
 Once more affliction urg'd him midst the train
 Of sheep and goats to seek the cave again.
 Nor ever more the dire abode forsake,
 Unless his love from cruel bonds can take 410
 His dear Lucina. When he late survey'd
 His faithful wife again a captive made,
 Despair impell'd him first himself to throw
 A willing victim to his glutton-foe:
 But hope soon bade him lurk amidst the fold,
 Hope still to bear her from her cruel hold.

"When to their stall at night the monster led
His following herds, and found his prisoners fed:—
Robb'd of his meal—on poor Lucina falls
His vengeful wrath, and her the cause he calls; 420
Then dooms her, fetter'd in a galling chain,
High on a rock for ever to remain.
The king beholds her suffer for his sake,
And raving begs in vain of Heaven to take
His wretched life: each morn and night he hears
Her groans and plaints resounding in his ears;
When with the flock at eve the cave he gains,
And when at morn he seeks with them the plains:
While she by every power that rules the sky,
With looks and voice implores him thence to fly;
Nor longer his all-valu'd life expose, 431
When nothing human can relieve her woe.
With her no less the prudent matron tries
To shake his purpose, but the king denies
To leave the place where all his treasure lies.
"At length it fortun'd Agricines' heir⁴⁷
And king Gradasso to the coast repair⁴⁸,
Where, such their valorous arm and prudent aid,
They fair Lucina from the rock convey'd,
And safely bore her to the distant wave, 440
Where to her sire, at early dawn, they gave
His long-lost child; while yet within the rock
King Morandino stay'd amidst the flock.
But when the morn arose in beamy light,
He from the matron heard Lucina's sight.
His grateful thanks he paid to Heaven, that freed
The blooming dame from thralldom, or decreed

⁴⁷ Mandricardo.

⁴⁸ Ariosto passes lightly over the account of Lucina's deliverance from the orc, that having been fully related by Boyardo with the following particulars.

After the adventure of the castle of the fairy, and the conquest of Hector's arms, Mandricardo and Gradasso travelled together till they came to a rock by the sea-shore, on the summit of which they perceived a lady in great affliction bound with a chain: she acquainted the knights that she was in the power of a cruel monster, called an orc, and warn'd them by flight to avoid the certain death that must attend their falling into his hands. The knights, upon hearing this, resolv'd to attempt her deliverance, and engag'd in battle with the orc, when Gradasso was worsted and made prisoner in the cavern. Mandricardo continued the combat with the monster, but, having no sword, he threw at him huge pieces of the rock, though without effect: at last, the orc, pursuing Mandricardo from rock to rock, chanced to fall down a precipice, and Mandricardo availing himself of this circumstance, ran to the cavern and released Gradasso, when both, taking off Lucina's chain, escap'd with her safe to a vessel, on board which was her father the king of Cyprus. In the mean time the orc having recover'd from his fall, pursued the fugitives, and hurled a vast fragment of a rock after them into the sea; but the vessel being cleared from the load, continued her voyage till she was overtaken by a terrible storm: at length the crew landed safely on the coast of Acquamort, and found themselves among the forces of Agramant and Charles.

Orl. Innam. B. iii. c. iii. v.

Her fate with those, whence arms, or wealth, or power,

Might to his love his soul's dear hope restore.
Then fill'd with joy, he issu'd with the train 450
Of sheep and goats returning to the plain;
There lurk'd secure, till, on the grass repos'd,
The orc in sleep his heavy eyelids clos'd;
Then all the day and livelong night he went,
Till safe at distance from the monster's scent,
He reach'd a ship, and now three moons have wand'
Since from Satalis's coast the Syrian realm he gain'd.
"Through Rhodes, and Cyprus, every town and tower

In Asia, Turkey, and on Egypt's shore,
The king of fair Lucina tidings sought; 460
When yester's Sun the welcome tidings brought,
That in Nicosia's court his niece receiv'd
The wand'ring fair from dangers great repriv'd,
When on th' unstable sea improper gales⁴⁹
Had many days oppos'd her lingering sails.
Hence, fill'd with joy, our king prepares the feast
In memory of himself and queen releas'd.
And every fourth returning month shall view
The jousts resum'd: four moons he saw renew
Their waning horns, while with the herds he lay
In hairy vestments, till the joyful day, 471
(Joyful as that to morrow's Sun may prove)
Had given him back to liberty and love.
Part what myself so late beheld I tell,
Or speak from those who witness'd what befel
Our suffering king—then credit what ye hear,
Nor let another's tale deceive your ear."

Thus spoke the host—and thus to Gryphon told
The weighty cause for which the feast they hold:
In talk they waste the hours, and all approve 480
The monarch's truth and unexampled love:
Now, rising from the board to seek repose,
Their courteous host the downy couch bestows:
They sunk to rest, till with the morn they wake,
When cheerful shouts their quiet slumbers break.
Timbrels and trumpets rouse to festive arms,
With eager crowds the wide piazza swarms:
The mingled sounds of cars and coursers rise,
And the streets echo with redoubled cries.
Now Gryphon o'er his limbs his armour wears, 490
(Such armour scarce another warrior bears)
Which with her fairy hand the white-rob'd maid
Temper'd impavise to the hostile blade⁵⁰.
With him, the seeming candidate for fame,
The stain of manhood, who from Antioch came,
Arms for the list. Their careful host supplies
Large store of spears the tilting to suffice;
And from his household brings a goodly train,
His guests to honour and the pomp maintain:
Himself attends; and many a squire he leads; 500
Some march on foot, some rein the prancing steeds.

Now, at the lists arriv'd, apart they stand,
Awhile spectators of the martial band:
With heedful gaze they mark each hardy feat,
Where two, or four, or six in jousting meet.
One to his dame with quaint devices shows
Such colours as his grief or joy disclose;
One by his crest, or painted shield, declares
If Love rejects his suit, or crowns his cares.

⁴⁹ Alluding to the storm mentioned in the foregoing note.

⁵⁰ This circumstance is borrowed from Boyardo.

The valiant Syrians thus in days of yore, 510
Their ready arms in jousts²¹ and triumphs bore;
Perchance against the neighbouring Franks pre-
par'd.

That o'er those realms divided empire shar'd,
The hallow'd realms that once on Earth survey'd
The Lord of life in human flesh array'd.
Behold, by Christians left, the sacred lands
Resign'd a prey to faithless Pagan bands:
While those that, in the pure religion bred,
Should couch the lance our holy faith to spread,
With mutual wounds their brethren's bosoms gore,
And kill the faithful few that truth adore! 521
Ye men of Spain! and ye of France! give ear;
O! ye Switzers and ye Germans hear.
O! hither turn to gain a nobler spoil;
Here Christ's own kingdom shall reward your toil.
If you the title of Most Christian claim;
And you of Catholic deserve the name;
Why do you thus the chosen race annoy,
Their substance pillage and their lives destroy?
Why do you not Jerusalem restore, 530
By renegades ravish'd from your power?
And why, so proudly o'er the world's domain,
Doe the stern Turk in impious splendour reign?
See'st thou not, Spain! insulting Afric near,
Whose wading pirates should thy vengeance fear?
And yet thou leav'st that righteous war, to make
The sons of Italy with terror shake.

O Italy! thou sink of vice and shame!
Thou sleep'st forgetful of thy blasted fame,

²¹ The poet here alludes to the custom observed by the Saracens at that time to exercise themselves in arms on account of the vicinity of the Franks, then in possession of Jerusalem. In his complaint of the degeneracy of the Christians in neglecting to rescue the sepulchre of Christ from the hands of the Turks, he seems to follow Petrarch in his Triumph of Fame.

Poi venia solo il buon duce Goffredo,
Che fe Pinpresa sants, e i paesi giusti.
Questo, di ch'io mi adegno, e 'ndarno grido,
Face in Gierusalem', con le sue mani
Il qual guardato, e già negletto nido:

He superbi, e miseri Christiani
Consumando Pun l'altro, è non vi coglia
Ch'el sepulchro di Christo è in man de' Cani,
Trionf. de Fam. cap. ii.

Next Godfrey came, whose righteous footstep trod
The hallow'd precincts of the Saviour God.
The chief, whose glorious warfare urg'd in vain
Inflames my breast and points th' indignant strain:
In fair Jerusalem the seat he gain'd,
Neglected long and now no more maintain'd:
Go, wretched Christians, to your race a shame,
With mutual slaughter wound the Christian name,
And leave the tomb of Christ in impious hands;
Resign'd to Mahomet's detested hands!

After the conquest of Godfrey, Jerusalem remained eighty-two years in the hands of the Christians, till the time of the Soldan of Egypt anno 1136, who took it from Guido Lusignan, since which it has continued in the power of the Turks.

For an account of the Crusades, see Dr. Robertson's History of Charles V. vol. i. and Mr. Mickle's Preface to his translation of the Lusiad.

By turns to these, by turns to those a prey, 540
That once were wont to tremble at thy sway.
If fear of famine in thy cavern'd lands
Drives thee, O Swiss! to seek from foreign hands
Thy needful food, or in some bloody strife
To end at once thy wretchedness and life,
Lo! where the Turk displays his neighbouring store—

Chase him from Europe or the Grecian shore,
So shalt thou every want at full supply,
Or in some nobler field with glory die.
Not less than thee, O Swiss! the Muse incites 550
Thy German neighbours, where the wealth invites Which once from Rome with every treasure fraught,

Great Constantine²² selecting thither brought.
Pactolus, Hermus, rich with golden sands,
Mygdonia, Lydia, and the fertile lands,
In whose full praise such numerous poets vie,
Not far remov'd to crown your labours lie.

Thou, mighty Leo²³! to whose hand is given
The glorious charge to bear the keys of Heaven;
If thine the trust our Italy to keep, 560
Let her not perish in lethargic sleep:

Thou art her shepherd; God on thee bestows
The sacred crook, and Leo, thee he chose.

That thy loud roar might terror round extend,
And thy strong arm thy sheep from wolves defend.

But whither has my wandering genius led
Far from the path I first prepar'd to tread?
Yet not so far my Muse has learnt to stray,
But well I trust she can resume her way.

In fair Damascus thus the list appears 570
All bright with breast-plates, helms and bristled
spears.

Soft blooming damsels on the champions shower
From roofs and windows every vernal flower;
Each knightly rival to the trumpet's sound
His courser spurs with many a spritely bound.
All prove their best—some merit gifts and praise,
And some loud peals of scorn and laughter raise.

A suit of armour doom'd the victor's prize,
For that day's jousts the Syrian king supplies:
Who late receiv'd it at a merchant's hand, 580
A merchant journeying from Armenia's land:

²² After the emperor Constantine the Great had been baptized by Silvester, and had defeated Maxentius near Rome, he gave his palace of San Giovanni Laterano to the pope; he built many churches with large endowments, and then made war upon Licinius his kinsman, a great persecutor of the Christians. He afterwards removed the imperial seat from Rome to Byzantium, which city he rebuilt and called, after his name, Constantinople. Hence the poet says, that in Constantinople were centered the riches which Constantine carried from Rome: all the rest he gave to the Roman church: of him Dante speaks in this remarkable manner.

Ahi, Constantini! di quanta mal fu madre
Non la conversion, ma quella dote
Che da te prese il primo ricco padre.

Ah! Constantine! from thee what ills we draw,
Not that thy soul absurd the Pagan law;
But for that gift the Christian world has griev'd,
Which our first wealthy sire from thee receiv'd.

²³ This address is made to Pope Leo X.

To this the monarch adds a scarf embost
With numerous pearls, and gems of rarest cost.
Of finest web the stuff with gold inwrought,
No vulgar price th' invalid treasure bought.
Had Norandino (well before advis'd)
This armour known, above all other priz'd
He this had held, nor had his generous mind
Such armour for the victor's meed assign'd.
'T were long to tell who left it on the way; 590
For him that pass'd, a far too costly prey.

But let us now (this tale awhile dismiss'd)
To Gryphon turn, who, when he reach'd the list,
Already found the manly jousts begun,
Spears broke, and falchions flashing in the sun.
Eight youthful knights by Norandino held
Near to his person, who in arms excell'd,
In friendly league 'gainst all opponents stood,
Noble themselves, and sprung of noble blood:
These in the martial square that day had run 600
With all the listed warriors, one by one:
With lance, with sword or mace they war'd the fight,
While the king view'd, and view'd them with delight.

Of through the cuirass, in th' unpleasant strife,
The weapon pass'd endangering either's life:
Like foes they fought, but that the king could stay
At will their rage and bid surcease the fray.

Now he of Antioch, who with Gryphon came,
(Martano was the coward's hateful name)
Step in, and with his looks the combat dar'd, 610
As if with Gryphon he in valour shar'd;
Then stood awhile beside, and earnest view'd
A dreadful fight that 'twixt two knights ensu'd.
Seleucia's lord, among the youthful train
Who came the general challenge to maintain,
In single conflict with Orbruno strove:
At length his falchion through his face he drove
And reach'd his life: all mourn'd him as he fell,
Whose fame in arms could many a knight excel:
Nor could, thro' all the realm, a name be found
For courtesy and goodness more renown'd. 621
This seen, Martano trembled with affright,
Lest equal fortune on himself should light:
Nature prevailing, how he thence may fly
He meditates, but him with heedful eye
Brave Gryphon marks, and urging onward drives
Against a knight that in the list arrives.
Thus, when th' exerting voice of village-swains
A mungrel cur against the wolf constrains,
By turns he stops, and barking views his foe, 630
Whose teeth with anger gnash, whose eyes with fury glow.

Where princes sate the deeds of arms to see,
With ladies, knights, and lords of high degree,
Martano fearing in the list to run,
His courser turn'd aside the shock to shun.
Yet those who friendly wish'd to veil his shame
Might to his erring steed ascribe the blame.
But with his falchion next so ill he fought,
Demosthenes himself in vain had sought
To plead his cause: so much each stroke he fear'd,
His arms of brittle frame not forg'd of steel appear'd.

* Martano is undoubtedly the original of Spenser's Braggadocio. See the Fairy Queen, where the cowardice and the villany of the latter are printed exactly in the same colours: he steals away sir Guyon's horse, and is disgraced at the tournament made by Satyrane.

At length he fled, disturbing in his flight
The martial ranks: behind the recreant knight,
From scornful crowds loud peals of laughter rise,
Shouts, clamours, hisses, mingling in the skies.
Thus like th' insidious wolf by shepherds chas'd,
Martano from the list retires disgrac'd;
While Gryphon stays, but thinks his better name
Defil'd, dishonour'd by his fellow's shame: 649
Rage swell'd his heart, his face with crimson glow'd
As his the guilt; measurable from him the crowd
Like deeds expect, and to the knight forestell
The same disgrace that on his comrade fell—
Believes him now to strain each nerve, and raise
His wonted worth to shine with brighter blaze:
Each slip to those whose minds prejudge the cause,
Each venal fault the heaviest censure draws.
Now Gryphon on his thigh the spear address'd,
(Who seldom held in vain his spear in rest)
And to the charge his flaming courser press'd. 660
The baron of Sidonia chanc'd to meet
The dreadful shock, which hurl'd him from his seat;

All gaze with wonder who his fall behold,
Far other chance than what they late foretold.
Again his spear unbroken Gryphon held,
And full on Lodicea's lord impell'd:
The weapon shiver'd on the busy shield:
The champion, near extended on the field,
Fell backward on his steed; but soon anew
Recovering, with his sword at Gryphon flew. 670
Gryphon, who sees him still his seat maintain,
With such a dreadful shock assail'd in vain, {fall,
Thus to himself—" Though here the spear might
The sword, with aim repeated, shall prevail."
Then on his temples fell the furious steel:
He seem'd from Heaven the thundering force to feel.
Stroke following stroke was dealt with sweepy sway,
Till senseless on the ground the warrior lay.
Two brethren, Thyrsis and Corvmbus nam'd,
Long o'er the rest for skill in tilting fam'd, 680
Their skill forgotten, headlong press'd the sand
Beneath the son of Oliver's hand:
This, from his steed the spear's first onset threw,
And that, the falchion from his saddle drew:
While with united voice the lists declare,
The stranger's arm that day the prize would bear.

Among the rest that to the tilting came,
Was Salenterno of redoubted name,
Who o'er the realm with rule despotic reign'd,
And first in jousts the gallant strife maintain'd. 690
He, fir'd to anger that a stranger's might
Should win the palm from every Syrian knight,
A lance arming loud to Gryphon cries,
And, proudly threatening, to the course defies.
Brave Gryphon answers with his spear in rest,
(A spear from ten selected for the best)
Full on the shield the well-aim'd point arrives,
Thro' shield, thro' cuirass, and thro' bosom drives;
And passing on, its cruel passage tears,
And at his back a palm behind appears. 700
All, save the king, with joy beheld his fate,
For all th' oppressive Salenterno hate.

Two of Diana's nest his prowess own;
Carmando and Ermophilus o'erthrown.
One o'er the monarch's martial host presides,
And one, high admiral, his navy guides.
This at the onset from his seat behold
Cast headlong; that, beneath his courser roll'd,
Lies o'erwhelm'd, nor could his courser stand
Against the shock of Gryphon's powerful hand. 710

Seleucia's lord, who still his place maintain'd,
The bravest champion of the eight remain'd;
Nor only brave: a steed the warrior bore
Of generous race, and arms of proof he wore.
Now rushing furious each his spear oppos'd
To where against the sight the vizor clos'd:
But Gryphon with such force the Pagan shook,
His left foot straight the stirrup's hold forsook.
Their broken lances now aside they threw,
And wheeling round their beaming falchions drew.
From Gryphon first a stroke the Pagan feels 72:
That from his thundering arm the Christian deals;
Sheer through the shield's tough plate and bone it goes,

Which from a thousand shields the warrior chose:
His thigh had next receiv'd the biting blade,
But double folds of steel the fury stay'd.
Seleucia's lord at Gryphon's vizor drove
The weapon's edge, which falling from above
Had pierc'd through all, but that the warrior's arms
By potent spell secur'd each limb from harms; 73:
While bappier Gryphon, at each furious stroke
Cleft the tough mail and jointed armour broke.
All present now Seleucia's lord beheld
By noble Gryphon in the field excell'd;
And had not Norandino stay'd the fight,
That day had sunk him to eternal night!
But to his guards the king a signal made
To part the combatants: the guards obey'd:
All view'd with joy the dreadful conflict cease,
And prais'd their gracious king who gave the peace.
Those gallant eight, who challeng'd all the list, 74:
Too weak a single warrior to resist,
Were vanquish'd one by one; the rest who came
To meet their challenge found their hope of fame
In Gryphon lost, who thus unmatched had run,
And from the eight an easy conquest won.

Behold in one short hour the tilting ceas'd!
But Norandino, to prolong the feast
Till close of day, descends and gives command
To clear the square, then of the knightly bend 75:
Two troops he forms, where each by birth or deed
He mates in pairs, and bids the jousts proceed.

Meantime brave Gryphon to his home returns,
While indignation in his bosom burns,
Still more deprest with vile Martano's shame
Than joyful at his own well-purchas'd fame.
Martano every art industrious tries
His shame to palliate with unmanly lies;
While the foul partner of his guilt and wile
Each falsehood sounds, adding guile to guile. 76:
Howe'er the youthful knight their tales believ'd,
He heard in silence and th' excuse receiv'd,
But deem'd it best to part in secret thence,
Lest, seen again, Martano should incense
The people's rage.—Thus by a private way [lay.
They reach'd the gate through which their journey
Then, whether Gryphon's courser needed rest,
Or heavy toil the champion's eyes oppress'd,
The nearest dwelling for repose he sought,
Two miles the warrior to a dwelling brought: 77:
His helm he loos'd, his limbs from armour freed,
And from the reins and bit releas'd his steed;
Then, in a room retir'd, the door he clos'd,
And on the couch in slumber deep repos'd.

⁷⁵ The poet must mean where he was first entertained at his arrival, though the passage seems rather obscure.

Now Origilla and Martano, bent
On foulest treason, to the garden went,
And there the most unheard-of scheme design'd
That craft e'er whisper'd to the basest mind.
Martano means to seize the arms and vest
By Gryphon worn, the steed which late he press'd,
And thus before the king in borrow'd spoils, 78:
Usurp the honour of another's toils.
Soon as resolv'd, he takes the warrior's weed,
The dazzling armour and the milk-white steed:
He grasps his buckler, and his crest he rears,
And a new Gryphon to the sight appears.
Then with the dame and squires he turn'd to where
The busy throng still fill'd the public square,
And came what time the martial rivals ceas'd
To wield the sword and place the lance in rest. 79:
The monarch gives command to seek the knight
Whose lofty crest was deck'd with plume white;
His courser white, and white the vest he wore,
Though yet unknown the name the warrior bore.
He, who from looks assum'd, deriv'd his pride
Like the vile ass beneath the lion's hide,
The summons heard, and with unblushing face
To Norandino went in Gryphon's place.
Soon as the king the seeming knight esp'd,
He rose, embrac'd, and plac'd him at his side, 80:
Nor deem'd enough, himself such praise to yield,
But wip'd his worth to blazon o'er the field;
He bids the heralds to the lists around
Him glorious victor of the day rescound.
With trumpets' sprightly notes, in loud acclaim
Wide spreads from tongue to tongue his worthless
name;

And when the monarch to his palace rode,
He kept him near, and every honour show'd,
Such honours, as transcending mortal praise,
The deeds of Mars or Hercules might raise. 81:
He gave him fair and stately rooms prepar'd
Within the court, where Origilla shar'd
An equal grace, on whom in royal state
A train of noble knights and damsels wait.

But let us now to Gryphon change the style,
Who, little conscious of his comrade's guile,
Still unsuspecting lock'd in slumber lay,
Nor wak'd till low declin'd the light of day.
His sleep dispell'd, and blushing thus to waste
The fleeting hours, he quits his bed in haste, 82:
And seeks (as yet unknowing of his shame)
The lying kinsman and deceitful dame
Whom late he left with all th' attendant train:
When these he finds no more, and seeks in vain
His arms and vesture, new suspicions rise,
Increasing when his comrade's arms he spies.
The host stay'd forth, and all the truth display'd,
That he, whom now he sought, erewhile array'd
In armour white, had with the dame and train
Of followers, to the list return'd again. 83:

By slow degrees to Gryphon now reveal'd,
That truth appear'd which love had long conceal'd;

Soon to his grief he found a brother's name
But veil'd the partner of her lawless fame:
He now repents that e'er his mind was wrought
To slight the tidings by the pilgrim brought,
And lend an ear to her whose tears or smiles
Had oft betray'd him in her treacherous wiles.
What should he do? Impell'd by present need,
He takes the base Martano's arms and steed, 84:
But better had he gone unarm'd than wear
The cuirass such a breast was wont to bear;

That hateful buckler on his arm embrace,
 And on his head that scornful helmet place,
 Yet eager to pursue th' adulterous pair,
 His soul was lost to every other care:
 The city now he reach'd, what time the day
 Departing, Phoebus shone with evening ray.
 Built near the gate to which the champion drew
 High on the left a castle rose to view; 850
 Not only strong in war to check the foe,
 But rich in cost and pomp of peaceful show:
 The king, assembling here a courtly band,
 Lords, dames, and knights, the first of Syria's land,
 Above the walls a splendid feast prepar'd,
 And with his guests the social banquet shar'd;
 Whence, from afar, beneath their wide survey,
 The distant fields and open country lay.
 As tow'rd the gate advancing Gryphon came,
 Clad in the vestments of opprobrious shame; 860
 Ill chance for him! the king and festive train
 Beheld him pacing o'er the verdant plain.
 Esteem'd the same he look'd by outward port,
 He mov'd the dames and knights to scornful
 sport;

Where next the king, amid the nobles plac'd,
 Martino sat with highest favour grac'd;
 And near, the worthy partner of his guile:
 Of these the king inquir'd, with gracious smile,
 What wretch was that who lately to his cost
 Essay'd the joists, who, every honour lost, 870
 Could thus return—" 'Tis wondrous strange," he cried,

"That you, a knight so brave in combat try'd,
 Should join with one, to knighthood such disgrace,
 That all our East scarce knows a name so base;
 Unless you seek perchance to exalt your praise,
 And with his deeds compar'd your glory raise.
 But, by you Heaven! and all its powers, I swear,
 Did not your worth my warmest friendship share,
 Such public penance should the dastard find,
 Such as my hatred to his coward kind 880
 Might tell to all—and if he 'scapes the shame,
 He owes his thanks to you with whom he came."

Then he, the sink of every vice, replied:
 "Great king! the man whose acts his mien believ'd, Near Antioch's town but late (nor can I tell
 His name or birth) with me in converse fell:
 I deem'd him worthy by his martial air
 With me the trial of the lists to share,
 But ne'er beheld him in the field display
 His craven arms till that disgraceful day; 890
 When far incens'd to see so deep a stain
 On knighthood cast, I scarcely could refrain
 That hour to touch him such a fatal dance,
 He never more should wield the sword or lance.
 But due respect for such a noble band,
 And reverence to your presence held my hand.
 Yet let not those short days with me he pass'd,
 O'er his demerits now oblivion cast,
 Since from those days recall'd methinks I find,
 And ever shall, disgrace oppress my mind, 900
 If, to their shame who bear the name of knight,
 He goes dismiss unquestion'd from your sight,
 Far rather let me view, with well-pleas'd eyes,
 The wretch suspended quivering in the sky:
 A sentence that may future warning give.
 To all such dastards that unpunish'd live."

Martano thus; when Origilla took
 The word, to second what her minion spoke,
 To whom the king—"Not so his deeds I view,
 Or think that death to such a crime is due: 910

But we in judgment for his great offence,
 Will to the crowd another feast dispense."

He said; and to a baron gave in charge
 His royal will: instructed now at large,
 The baron with a trusty guard, descend'd,
 And silent near the city walls attends
 In secret ambush, Gryphon there to wait:
 Him, 'twixt two bridges, entering at the gate,
 He seizes unawares, and, bound in chains,
 Clos'd in a gloomy cell till morn detain'd. 920

Now had the Sun above the watery bed
 Of hoary Tethys rais'd his golden head,
 From Alpine plains began to chase the night,
 And shed on Alpine hills his trembling light;
 When vile Martino fearing Gryphon bold
 Might to the king at length the truth unfold,
 And on himself revenge the treason, took
 A hasty farewell, and the town forsook:
 Excuse he pleaded that th' unboish'd feast
 He left, and seem'd to slight the king's request, 930
 Who urg'd his star, and gifts bestow'd to crown
 The glorious deeds of knighthood not his own:
 But let him go⁹⁴, and trust, some future time
 Shall give such punishment as fits his crime.

Now near the throng'd piazza Gryphon came⁹⁷,
 By guards conducted to the place of shame:
 They strip him of his arms and plumed crest,
 And left dishonour'd in an humble vest,
 Then led him thus amidst the shouting train
 High plac'd to view upon a rolling wain, 940
 Which with slow step two lagging oxen drew,
 By hunger lean and of ill-favour'd hue.
 Around th' ignoble car a mingled throng,
 Dotards and shameless women pour'd along:
 Now this, now that supply'd the driver's place,
 And all with vulgar rage the knight disgrace.
 Above the rest the childish route prevail'd,
 Who not alone his name with taunts assail'd,
 But, that the wiser could their hands restrain,
 With stones in boyish rage the knight had slain, 950
 Those arms to which his evil chance he ow'd,
 Those arms, whose make mistak'd th' ill-judging
 crowd,

Trail'd at the car behind, along the ground
 In soord' filth their rightful penance found.
 The wheels now stay'd before the judgment seat,
 And there he heard the herald's voice repeat
 Another's deeds, and with Martino's shame
 By trumpet's sound his own great deeds defame.
 Thus through the streets, to all a public sight,
 By houses, temples, shops, they led the knight, 960
 Where not a name that insult e'er apply'd
 Was then unheard; at length the car they guide
 Without the walls, and thence, in foul disgrace
 They mean with blows to drive him from the place;
 But scarce they from his feet the gyres unbound,
 And loos'd the chains that clasp'd his arms around,
 When lo! he drew the sword and seiz'd the shield
 That late were useless dragg'd along the field:

⁹⁴ He returns to Martino and Origilla, B. xviii. ver 520.

⁹⁷ Cowards in the lists were proclaimed false and perjured, their armour was taken from them, beginning from the heel upwards; and then ignominiously flung piece by piece over the barriers: they were likewise dragged out of the lists, and punished as the judges decreed.

See Upton's notes on Spenser.

While near him press'd unarm'd th' ignoble crew,
Whose hands nor held the spear, nor falchion drew.
Th' ensuing book, my lord, the sequel shows,
For time requires the story here to close.

BOOK XVIII

THE ARGUMENT.

Charles and his Paladins attack Rodomont, and at last compel him to leave the city. He repasses the Seine, and hears that Doralis is carried off by Mandricardo. Rodomont being gone, Charles returns to the field. General battle renewed with great slaughter on both sides. Ferrau and Dardanello signalize themselves. Lurcanio killed by Dardanello. Gryphon being set at liberty, to revenge the shame he had suffered makes a great slaughter among the people of Damascus. Norandino oppresses him. Aquilant meets with Martano and Origilla, seizes and carries them to Damascus: end of that adventure. Norandino institutes another tournament in honour of Gryphon. Arrival of Sansonetto, Astolpho, and Marphisa, at Damascus. Confusion on account of a suit of armour offered by the king as the prize of the victor. Marphisa, Astolpho, and Sansonetto, overthrow all opposers. Gryphon and Aquilant unhorsed. At last the four knights are known to each other, and peace is restored. Astolpho, Sansonetto, Gryphon, Aquilant, and Marphisa, depart for France: they embark on board a ship; arrive at Cyprus; are overtaken by a dreadful storm. Account of the general battle resumed. Dardanello is slain by Finaldo. The Pagans begin to give ground; at last the rout becomes universal, and the Pagans retire to their entrenchments. Medoro and Cloridano, two Moorish youths, leave their posts in the middle of the night, and venture into the enemy's camp in order to seek out, and give burial to the body of their dead master, Dardanello.

Swift, generous prince! my loyal Muse displays
Your high deserts, and ever seeks to praise:
But much I fear too weak to exalt your name,
She but defrauds you of a nobler fame.
Amidst your virtues, one above the rest
My tongue, my bosom ever has confess'd:
While open audience all from you receive,
None find you ever ready to believe
Each light report—your goodness will befriend
Th' accus'd when absent, oft attention lend 10
To each fair plea, and keep a gracious ear
When present, from himself his tale to hear;
And rather months and years the cause defer,
Than to another's wrong in hasty sentence err.
Had Norandino well his conduct weigh'd,
His lips might ne'er on Gryphon's head have laid
The doom unjust: while honour crowns your name,
He, unadvic'd, has stain'd his future fame.
Through him his people breathless on the plain
Fall, by the raging band of Gryphon slain; 20
Who thrusts or whirls, by turns, the mortal steel,
And thirly near the cur his fury feel.
Swift fly the rest, as terror bids them stray;
One seeks the field, and one the beaten way:
One hopes again to enter in the wall;
Where path on each in mingled heaps they fall.

Without a word or menace Gryphon glows
With silent wrath, no soft compassion knows,
But drives his sword amidst the trembling throng,
And takes dire vengeance for his former wrong. 30
Of those, who first dispersing o'er the plain,
With nimble feet the city walls can gain,
Impetuous some, as sense of danger sways,
Forgetful of their friends the drawbridge raises.
Some fly with ghastly looks in pale affright,
Nor cast a look behind them in their flight:
While wide in every distant quarter rise
The shouting clamours and distressful cries.
Fierce Gryphon, as aloft the bridge they drew,
(Ill chance for them) two luckless wretches slew. 40
Of these, one dash'd against the stony plain
Pour'd from his batter'd skull the smoking brain:
One, wounded in the breast, fell headlong down,
As up the walls he climb'd to reach the town:
The trembling crowds, with terror chill'd, behold
The breathless carcass from the ramparts roll'd.
Great is the fear that many a mind appalls,
Lest furious Gryphon should o'erleap the walls:
Not deeper tumults could around prevail,
Should the stern Soldan with his host assail 50
Damascus' gates—arms flash, loud shouts ascend;
Now here, now there the thronging people bend:
Tumblers and trumpets mingled pour around
The deafening noise and to the skies resound.

But let us for awhile forbear to tell
What fortune next the gallant knight befel:
Now must the verse the deeds of Charles recite,
Who beat on Rodomont his fearless might,
And in his train seven daring warriors led,
To avenge his subjects by the Pagan dead. 60
The foe, defended with his scaly hide
Of proof resistless, every arm defy'd:
Eight spears at once from eight such warriors sent,
He felt, yet scarcely to the tempest bent:
But as the vessel, yielding to the gale,
Swift rises as the pilot shifts the sail
To catch the wind: so Rodomont arose,
Though scarce a mountain could have borne the blow.

To join the warlike eight whom late I told,
Full many a chief, whose actions Fame enroll'd, 70
Enroll'd the six: with these the trencherous name
Of Ganelon³, with these good Turpin³ came;
And Arimn, and English Edward, late
Receiv'd by Charles in Paris' regal gate.
As built on Alpine rocks, with stately pride,
A castle, that has every force defy'd,
Unshaken stands, when whirlwinds sweeping round
Tear oaks and beeches from the groaning ground;
Firm in himself the haughty Pagan stood,
Lustam'd with fury, and atbrist for blood, 80

² An inveterate enemy to the houses of Rinaldo and Orlando, and as such recorded by Pulci, Boyardo, and other romance writers. Ganelon or Gano is frequently mentioned in Don Quixote.

³ Turpin, archbishop of Rheims, reputed author of the fabulous history of Charlemain and his twelve peers: the authority of this prelate is frequently brought forth by Ariosto in evidence of many actions recorded in this poem, to which he is said to have been an eye-witness.

As roaring storms the coming bolt preface :
 So vengeance follows his destructive rage.
 At him, that nearest press'd, the stroke he dealt:
 Hapless Ughetto of Dordona fell
 The rushing blade : cleft to the teeth he dy'd,
 Nor ought avail'd his helm of temper try'd.
 On every limb by turn the Pagan found
 Some weapon light, but light without a wound.
 Secur'd from harm, the dragon's jointed scale
 Imperious, made each sword and javelin fail. 90
 And now, attending at their overrign's call,
 Each quits the gate and well-defended wall ;
 And hastes to battle, where his prince's sight
 Swells every breast and strings each nerve for fight.
 As when, amid the circus' bound enclos'd,
 Stands a fierce lioness, for sport expos'd,
 If chance a lordly bull is loos'd to wage
 The public combat with her threat'ning rage,
 Her tawny cubs behold (unseen before)
 The stately beast and hear his dreadful roar : 100
 They view his ample horns with strange amaze,
 And while they view, with doubtful terror gaze ;
 But if their dam with savage teeth invade
 The bull's strong chest, they haste their dam to aid :

Now at his back, now at his paunch they fly,
 And thirst in blood their tender paws to dye.
 Against the Pagan thus the Christians drew :
 From roofs and windows some their weapons threw :
 Some closer press'd, while, all around him rain'd,
 His head a ponderous shower of arms sustain'd. 110
 Still more and more they throng (a mingled train)
 The space can hardly home and foot contain.
 From every part, like clustering bees, they pour ;
 Though most, unarm'd, no warlike weapons bore,
 And came but to be slain—the Pagan's rage
 Could scarce suffice their numbers to engage.
 Still grows his toll—still crowds to crowds succeed,
 Though hundreds by his fatal prowess bleed.
 His breath in shorter pantings comes and goes ;
 He sees, unless his arm can stem the foes, 120
 While yet unhurt his strength and limbs remain,
 Hereafter must he hope to escape in vain.

Now here, now there he turns his baleful eyes,
 And every pass with numbers clos'd espies.
 Around him now his murderous sword he threw ;
 And swift, as fury urg'd, resistless flew
 On Britain's late rais'd bands his force to shed,
 The bands by Arimom and Edward led.
 Who'er has from the throng'd piazza view'd
 The giddy populace in heaps pursu'd 130
 By some wild bull, that all the day has met
 With goads and wounds, by men and dogs beset :
 He foams, he snorts, he drives them round and round,

And this, now that he tosses from the ground :
 Such may he deem, but far more dreadful shows
 The cruel African amidst his foes !
 Full twenty with his sword he cleaves in twain,
 As many headless from his stroke remain,
 He mows down lives ; as by the pruner's hand
 Young vines and fallows lopt bestrow the land. 140
 Thus dreadful Rodomont the carriage spread
 Where'er he pass'd : at length o'er piles of dead
 He turn'd his steps to quit the hostile town,
 But 'midst his flight no marks of fear were shown ;
 Retreating now the nearer Seine he views
 That from the ramparts to the plain pursues
 Its silent course—the throngs around him press,
 Urge him behind, nor let him part in peace.

As in Nomadia's or Maasilia's shade,
 The generous beast whom hunters bold invade, 150
 Even while he flies with noble fury burns,
 And, threatening, slowly to his woods returns :
 So Rodomont, in whose high soul appears
 No sly thought, beam'd in with swords and spears,

With darts and javelins like a bristled wood,
 Slow drags his lingering steps to reach the flood.
 Again he turns, again with brandish'd blade
 A hundred sent to tread the Stygian shade.
 At length, compell'd, he gives, to numbers, way,
 Submits to fortune, and resigns the day : 160
 With all his arms he plunges in the tide ;
 His nervous limbs the flashing waves divide.
 Afric ne'er bred his like ; though Afric's earth
 Gave Hannibal and great Anteus birth.
 Soon as he reach'd the shore, his ruthless mind
 Again repeated that he left behind
 The town unack'd ; again his thoughts aspire
 Her sons to slay and wrap her walls in fire.
 While thus he paus'd, one drawing near he view'd,
 That soon with other cares his wrath subdu'd : 170
 But who this envoy, fits not here to tell ;
 First learn what chance in other parts befel.
 When Discord had receiv'd the high command
 To kindle strife amidst the Pagan band,
 She Fraud commissions in her stead to keep
 The convent's cells, nor let Contention sleep
 Till her return ; then calls her sister Pride,
 Who in one dome accustom'd to reside
 Consents to go, but midst the holy train
 Bids, in her place, Hypocrisy remain. 180

Now Pride and Discord on their baleful way
 To where encamp'd the Christian army lay
 Urge all their speed, when to their sight appears
 Afflicted Jealousy with jaundice fears :
 With her a dwarf, from Doralis the fair
 Dispatch'd to Rodomont the news to bear,
 How late in Mandricardo's hand she fell ;
 Nor need the Muse again th' adventure tell.
 It chanc'd that Jealousy the dwarf had found,
 His message soon she learn'd and whither bound ;
 Then join'd with him an enterprise to share
 That seem'd to claim her own peculiar care.
 Well pleas'd was Discord Jealousy to view,
 But more her cause of coming when she knew
 From whom such hope of powerful aid she drew,
 Lo ! hence the seeds to mix in mortal war
 Stern Rodomont and Agricanes' heir :
 For other chiefs she other plans may frame,
 But this suffices here to spread the flame.

Now with the dwarf arriving where the hand 200
 Of Rodomont destroy'd each Christian band ;
 They reach'd the Seine what time his silver tide
 The Turk had cross'd, who when the dwarf he spy'd,
 His wrath he smooth'd, his lowering brow he clear'd,
 And sudden gladness in his look appear'd :
 All unprepar'd for what he soon must find,
 An insult which his soul had ne'er divin'd.
 The dwarf he met, and with a smiling face : [pace ?]
 " How fares our dame, and whither bends thy Then he—" Nor mine nor yours I call the dame
 To whom another now asserts his claim : 211

4 The story is continued in this Book, ver. 200.

5 Dwarfs and dwarves were common messengers in the days of chivalry, and as such often mentioned in Don Quixote.

But yester's Son, as in her tent she lay,
A single warrior hew'd his bloody way
Through all her guards, and thence, by force con-
vey'd,

The royal fair his weeping captive made."

He said; when Jealousy stept forth and press'd
(Cold as an asp) the warrior to her breast.
Now Discord strikes her flint the fire to raise,
While Pride beneath the ready fowel lays:
Quick bursts the flame, through all the Pagan fires
The raging pest and flashes from his eyes: 221
He sighs, he groans, full horribly he roars,
Blaspheming Heaven and Heaven's immortal powers.

As when the tigress, to her empty den
Too late returning, snuffs the track of men,
And finds her darling young ones borne away,
Nor hills, nor streams, her raging cour e delay:
Thus the dread Saracen with fury burns,
"Lead on!"—he cries, as to the dwarf he turns:
He seeks no steed, nor car, but like the wind 230
Flies o'er the plain and leaves the war behind:
No courser will he wait, resolv'd to take
The brat that Fortune's gift his own shall make.
Then Discord, who his inmost soul survey'd,
Turn'd to her sister Pride, and smiling said:
"His footsteps shall we guide to find a steed
That other contests, other woes will breed?
The care be mine, where'er he roves the land,
No horse but one shall meet his daring hand."

To Charles we turn, who now, the Pagan fled,
Forbade the flames extinguish'd more to spread:
His troops he marshall'd: some with ardour fir'd
To guard the posts that chief their aid requir'd:
The rest he sent against the Pagan train
To meet their strongest force in open plain;
And through each pass a numerous army pours,
From Saint Germain and Saint Victor's towers;
Then near Marcellus' gate bids every band,
Together join'd in rank of battle stand,
Inciting all their faithless foes to quell 250
With deeds that every future time might tell:
Their banners rang'd, he points their noble rage;
And gives the trumpet's signal to engage.

King Agramant had try'd, nor try'd in vain,
Though hemm'd with foes, his courser to regain:
Remounted now, against the knight* who lov'd
Fair Isabella, single fight he prov'd.
With king Sobrino bold Lurcaino clos'd:
Rinaldo stood against a troop oppos'd,
Whom (Fortune smiling on his dauntless might) 260
He slew, dispers'd, o'erturn'd, and chas'd in flight.
So far'd the war—when Charles his legions brought
To charge the rear where king Marsilius fought:
Beneath whose standards crowd the flower of Spain,
His foot the midst compose, his horse the wings sustain.

The monarch leads th' assault—the hills around,
The vales return the drum's and trumpet's sound.

* Without danger of incurring the censure of blind partiality, often so justly charged on translators, I may surely venture to point out this passage to the reader, and indeed the whole description of the jealousy of Rodomont, as a fine allegorical picture.

ver. 237.

‡ Zerbino.

Already now the Pagans seem'd to yield,
And soon, with broken files, had left the field,
But Falserones came, and at his side 277
Grandonio, both in greater dangers try'd;
With Balngantes, Serpentino fam'd,
And bold Fenrau who thus aloud exclaim'd:
"O friends below'd! O! once of martial might!
O! brethren! yet maintain this arduous fight!
Give what to fame we owe—you hostile train
Shall weave, like spiders' nets, their toils in vain!
Think what rewards, what honours must attend,
Should Fortune on this day our arms befriend:
Think what our loss and never-ending shame, 280
If baseely driven from such a field of fame."

A ponderous spear he wielded as he spoke,
And aim'd at Berlinger the forceful stroke;
And (Whose arm so well with Argaliffa sped,
He burst the fencing helmet from his head)
Now Berlinger o'erthrown, his fatal blade
Eight hapless warriors near him prostrate laid.
In other parts what warlike numbers fell
Before Rinaldo, scarce the Muse can tell:
Thou mightest have seen, amidst th' embattled field,
The flying squadrons to his fury yield. 291

No less Zerbino and Lurcaino, fir'd
With martial heat, the tongue of praise inspir'd;
That, with a speeding thrust Balestro slow,
This, Finaduro's helmet cleft in two:
The first the forces of Alzerbè sway'd,
That late before Tardocco's rule obey'd:
The second held beneath his high command,
Zamora, Saffa, and Morocco's band. [shield
"Was there," (methinks you cry) "with sword and No knight of Afric to dispute the field?" 301
Awhile attend—nor deem one worthy name
Shall pass defrauded of his rightful fame.
Nor shall Zumara's king be left unang,
Brave Dardinello from Almontes sprung,
Whose lance, in rest against the Christians set,
Dulphino of the mount, and Elias met;
Hubert of Mirford, Claudio of the grove:
On Pinarontes then his sword he drove,
Of good Anselmo of Stanforma's powers; 310
And Raymond sent from London's stately towers.
These seven, renown'd in arms, to earth he threw,
Two senseless, one he wounded, four he slew.
But all his worth avail'd not to restrain
His people's panic, and their ranks detain
To meet our troops, who, less in number, fought
With nobler warmth, and to the combat brought Whatever exalts the warrior in the field,
The skill to rest the lance, or lift the shield.
The Moors in Setta and Zumara bred, 320
Those of Morocco and Canara fed:
But with the foremost flec Alzerbè's train,
Whose fight the noble youth* oppos'd in vain.
At length, with threats and prayers by turns ad-
dress'd,

He rous'd the flame in every generous breast.

"If in your memory worthy yet to dwell
Almontes lives—this present hour shall tell:
This hour shall show, if midst his foes encompass'd,
You leave in me his son to death expos'd.
Stay! I conjure you—by my tender age 33
From which your hopes could future fame presage!
Shall each brave chief by hostile swords be slain,
And none revisit Afric's lov'd domain?"

* Dardinello.

Surrounded here, all safety else deny'd,
Our firm knit bands alone can cleave the tide.
What fosse, what ramparts our return oppose,
What mountains rise between, what ocean flows!
Here let us rather die, than sink so low
To wait the mercy of a Christian foe.
O! then be firm—in this, my friends, remain 340
Our dearest hopes, all other hopes are vain!
Like as the fœes have but two hands to yield,
One soul to fire them, and one life to yield."

So spoke the generous youth, and speaking gave
The earl of Athol to the greedy grave.
The dear remembrance of Almontes ran
Through Afric's host, and spread from man to man:
Each deem'd it nobler now with glorious arms
To guard their lives, than fly impending harms.
William of Burnick, tall of stature, tow'r'd 350
Above his peers, but Dardinello's sword
Level'd him with the rest—and near him bent
His life from Arimon and headless left:
(A Cornish champion)—as he press'd the plain
His brother hasten'd to his aid in vain.
Betwixt his shoulders Dardinello sent
The reeking steel, that through his bosom went.
Through Bogio's belly next he thrust the blade,
And freed him from his promise lately made:
Vainly he promis'd to his weeping wife, 360
Six moons should bring him back with fame and life.
Brave Dardinello near Lurcanio spy'd,
By whom, but then o'erthrown, Dochio died,
Pierc'd through the throat; by whom, with gory head,

Cleft to the teeth, lay bleeding Gardo dead.
Besaw Alteus, dearer than his life,
Attempt too late to fly the bloody strife.
Pull at his nape the stroke Lurcanio aim'd,
And stretch'd him dead: Almontes' son inflam'd
With thirst of vengeance, grasp'd his ready spear,
And row'd to Macon (did his Macon hear) 371
Should slain Lurcanio that day's triumph grace,
His empty arms within the mosque to place.
Then through the ranks with rapid speed he flies,
And to his side so well the lance applies,
Pierc'd through and through he huris him to the plain.

And instant bids his followers strip the slain.
What tongue shall ask if Ariodantes mourn'd
His brother's slaughter! If in rage he burn'd 380
With his own hand to give the vengeful blow,
And Dardinello send to shades below?
In vain he raves—not more the Pagan foe,
Than thronging Christians his design oppose:
Yet eager for revenge, now here, now there,
He whirls his sword, breaks through, and mows the war.

To engage the Christian Dardinello flies,
But thronging round him spears and javelins rise,
And the thick press the knights to meet denies.
One chief no less the Moorish troop destroys,
Than one the English, Franks, and Scotch annoys:
Yet there to close in battle fate withstands, 391
One doom'd to fall, but fall by greater hands.
Behold Rinaldo comes by fortune led
To gain new fame from Dardinello dead.

But here no more—the Muse averts the strain
From deeds of glory on the western plain.

To where the Gryphon left, whose arm o'erthrew,
With vengeful rage, Damascus' trembling crew.
King Norandino, whom the din alarms,
The city leaves with all his court in arms: 400
A thousand men his faithful guard supply,
And round he sees the timorous people fly.
Meantime, the vulgar crowd dispers'd and fled,
Those luckless arms, that late his shame had bred,

(Such arms as fortune then vouchsaf'd to lend)
Brave Gryphon seiz'd his person to defend;
And near a temple, with strong walls immur'd,
Whose site a deep enclosing fosse secur'd,
Upon a narrow bridge his station chose
To guard him safely from surrounding foes. 410
Behold where from the portal near him drew,
With many a shout and threat, the warrior crew.
Yet Gryphon still, unmov'd, his place maintain'd,
As if his fearless soul their force disdain'd:
Onward he sprung: he grasp'd his glittering blade,
And many a gasping warrior breathless laid;
Then, to the bridge again retreating, lay
Safe from attack, and held his foes at bay.
Again he issu'd, and again withdrew,
And dy'd each time the ground to crimson hue, 420
While horse and foot by turns to earth he threw.
Still more and more the troops uniting swarm,
The deepening battle wears a direr fume,
When Gryphon pausing views with anxious eyes
The hostile files that all around him rise:
Fast from his wounded thigh and shoulder trail'd
The purple streams; his breath and vigour fail'd:
But Virtue, watchful o'er her soul, inclin'd
To peace and pardon Norandino's mind:
While from the walls he led his martial train, 430
He view'd around the ghastly heaps of slain;
The gaping wounds, that seem'd by Hector given,
With cruel steel through temper'd armour driven,
And saw how far his late decree had wrong'd
A knight to whom all worth and praise belong'd.

When near him now the gallant youth he view'd
(Whose single arm such numbers had subdu'd,
That dy'd the watery fosse to fearful red,
Entrench'd behind a ghastly pile of dead)
Like stern Horatius, that on Tyber's tide 440
With nervous strength the Tuscan power defy'd,
Heart-struck with grief and shame, he bade sur-
cease

The cruel strife, and to confirm the peace,
From further fight recall'd each willing band,
And stretch'd, in sign of peace, his naked hand.

Then thus to Gryphon—"How shall I proclaim
My sense of sorrow and repenting shame?
Another's crime, with deep-concerted guile,
Has led my erring judgment in the toil:
What to the worst I deem'd was justly due, 450
By me has wrong'd the best of knights in you.
If late repentance can amend dispense,
To heal the folly of my past offence,
Behold me ready to repair the shame
That lately sullied your illustrious name:
Ask what thou wilt to crown thy high desert,
Gold, cities, lands—my kingdom's better part,
With these the tribute of a faithful heart.

All, all is thine—but stretch thy hand to prove
The lasting pledge of amity and love." 460

He said, and ceasing, from his steed descends,
And to the knight his better hand extends.
Gryphon, who sees the king with eager pace
Advance to meet him in a friend's embrace,

"This battle is continued in this book,
vol. 1005.

At once his anger and his sword renings,
And low at Norandino's feet inclines
To clasp his knees: the king beholds him bleed
With late-got wounds, and summons at his need
A skilful leech, then bids with gentlest care
Th' wounded warrior to his palace bear. 470

But him we leave¹¹, of Aquilant to speak,
And bold Astolpho, left behind to seek Unhappy Gryphon, whom the powerful call
Of love had drawn from Salem's hallow'd wall.
For many a day they sought, but sought in vain,
Nor find their comrade lost, nor tidings gain.
At length the pilgrim, who to Gryphon came,
They met, and learnt that Gryphon's faithless
dame,

Won by another's love, had left in haste
The Syrian confines and to Antioch pass'd. 480
This when he heard, the sable warrior knew
That love had led his brother to pursue
His search from Judah's land, to win the charms
Of Origilla from a rival's arms.

But Aquilant who, with fraternal love
Could ill support that he alone should prove Adventurous deeds, resolves with him to bear
His social arms, and every danger share.
But first he prays Astolpho to delay
(Till back from Antioch he resum'd his way) 490
His purpos'd journey to the Gallic strand,
Or pleasing voyage to his native land.

To Zaffa then he hastes a bark to take;
By sea he deems his better speed to make.
He mounts the deck; a south-east wind prevails,
Curis the green wave and fills the favour'd sails.
So swift their course, before the prosperous breeze,
Next day he Surro and Saffeto sees;
Then Zibelleto and Barutti leaves,
And distant Cyprus on the left perceives; 500
From Tripoli to reach Tortosa speeds,
To Lizzo and Laiazzo's gulf proceeds.

Thence, veering to the east, the pilot guides
The rapid vessel through the dashing tides.
He comes where to the sea Orontes drives,
And safely at the river's mouth arrives.
Here Aquilant, impatient, gives command
To cast the bridge¹², and issues on the land.
Arun'd on his steed his eager course he steers
Along the stream till Antioch's town appears. 510
Nor Origilla nor Martano there
The warrior finds, but hears the faithless pair
To rich Damascus went the regal jousts to share.

Full sure he deem'd that Gryphon would pursue
His perjurd dame, and hence in haste withdrew
From Antioch's walls, resolv'd without delay
To pass by land, nor risk the watery way;
When God, to prove he oft allots below
Good to the virtuous, to the wicked, woe;
So guides his search, that on a certain day 520
He met the vile Martano on the way:
Who bore before him, in proud triumph shown,
The prize of tilting by another won.

When Aquilant Martano first survey'd
In arms and vest of snow-white hue array'd,
He deem'd his brother near, and eager flew
To clasp his neck, but when advanc'd he knew

¹¹ He returns to him in this book, ver. 608.

¹² The poet by this means a broad plank laid from the sides of the vessel to the shore for the horses to land.

His fond mistake, he chang'd his first address,
And as he joy'd before, now fears no less.
He fears some fraud, by Origilla wrought, 530
Had to his end unhappy Gryphon brought.
"Tell me," he cried, "thou, whom thy looks pro-
claim

A thief and traitor, whence that armour came;
Whence is that garb, and why dost thou hesitate
The generous steed that Gryphon wont to guide?
Say—lives my brother yet, or breathless lies?
How hast thou made his horse and arms thy prize?"

Struck with his angry threats and dreadful sight,
Pale Origilla turns her steed for flight;
But sudden Aquilant has seiz'd the reins, 540
And in her own despite the dame retains.
Confus'd and mute, as leaves to zephyrs shake,
Martano seems in every limb to quake.

Still Aquilant in thundering accent raves,
While at his head the naked sword he waves,
And vows unless his lips the truth display,
The dame and he their forfeit lives shall pay.

Martano pondering long how best to hide
His crime with specious art, at length reply'd—

"Lo! there my sister, mighty sir, who came 550
From virtuous parents, of unsully'd name;
Till Gryphon long, regardless of her race,
Detain'd her in a life of foul disgrace:
Much have I sorrow'd for her hapless sake;
But since too weak from such a knight to take
The helpless penitent, we sought t' obtain
By art what force could never hope to gain.
She, while he slept, from Gryphon's power withdrew;

And lest he waking should our flight pursue,
We thence convey'd his vesture, arms, and steed,
And now in safety on our way proceed." 561

So hop'd th' impostor with a sister's name
To veil the lawless partner of his shame;
But Aquilant, who heard her story spread
Through Antioch's town, and knew the life she led,
Inflam'd anew to wrath, indignant spoke:
"False slave! thouly'st"—then aim'd a ponderous stroke

With lifted arm and mailed gauntlet bent,
And down his throat two bleeding teeth he sent:
Then with strong cords he pinion'd close behind
His caitiff-arms, and with like bonds confin'd
His foul associate, while she strove t' assuage
With fruitless plea the warrior's generous rage,
Who bade the squires and all th' attending train,
With gifts enrich'd, Damascus' walls regain.

Thus journeying on through many a town, he brought

The shameless pair; then in Damascus' sought
His brother lost, whose justice might dispense
The punishment for such unheard offence.
Arriv'd, he found that Gryphon's glorious fame
Was far diffus'd on rapid wings of fame, 581
Already old and young the tale could tell,
That this was he who ran at tilt so well;
And he, from whom his partner's impious wiles
Had won the meed of arms and knightly toils.

The populace, enrag'd, Martano view,
And point him out, and with loud threats pursue.
"Behold," they cry, "the wretch, who seeks to raise
On other's actions his dissembled praise;
Who sullies, with his own opprobrious shame, 590
The man who guards not well his better fame.
You woman see, with every vice indu'd,
Who aids the wicked, and betrays the good."

Some thus exclaim—"How well the pair agree!
Not he more treacherous than deceitful she!"
With railing these, with curses those pursue
Their hateful way; while, eager for a view,
Through streets and squares th' impatient vulgar throng,

Press on each other's steps and pour along.
With joy the king these tidings entertain'd, 600
With greater joy than for a kingdom gain'd;
And with his few attendants eager press'd
To meet brave Aquilant, his welcome guest,
And pay such honour as to him belong'd
Whose valour had aveng'd his Gryphon wrong'd.
Now Norandino with the knight's consent,
Within a gloomy cell his captives pent.
But Aquilant he led, where (since the day
He bled in combat) wounded Gryphon lay;
Who, when he view'd his brother, glow'd with shame
As conscious that he knew his sully'd fame, 611
With all that chanc'd: when Aquilant awhile
His love had rally'd with a friendly smile;
They held debate what penance to impose
On them from whom such foul deceit arose.
Severe the king and Aquilant decreed

Their pains; but Gryphon wish'd for her to plead:
Yet, since he blush'd to urge her cause alone,
He begg'd his pleading might for both atone.
At length 't was doom'd (to end the friendly strife)
To scourge Martano, but to spare his life. 621
Next day they gave him to the hangman's hands,
Who bound his limbs, but not in flowery bands¹³,
Then on the culprit many a lash bestow'd,
From street to street, amidst the gaping crowd.
But Origilla still they kept to mourn
In bonds till fair Lucina should return,
Whose sage decree (for so these lords ordain)
Her doom must lighten to enforce her pain.

Here Aquilant remain'd, till Gryphon heal'd 650
Of every wound his arms again could wield.
From errors past the king more prudent grown,
Believes he never can enough atone
For such misdeed, by which he brought to shame
A knight whose worth might every tribute claim.
Each day, each hour, he bent his care to chase
From Gryphon's mind the thoughts of late disgrace.
And soon he purpos'd in the public view,
With every honour to his merits due,
To give him to redeem his ravish'd spoils, 640
Where once he suffer'd by his comrade's wiles.

Now through the realms the regal mandate pass'd,
To form a joust more splendid than the last;
Within a month he bade the lists prepare
In all the pomp that fits a monarch's care.
Soon ready Fame her rapid wings expends,
And spreads the tidings through the Syrian lands;
Phœnicia, Palestine, the rumour bear,
Which reach'd at length to good Astolpho's ear;
Who, with the noble regent¹⁴, now inclin'd 650
To see the lists by Syria's prince design'd.
Great was the praise of Sansonetto's name,
Great was his strength in arms and knightly fame;
Whom, made a Christian by Orlando's hand,
Charles gave in charge to rule the Holy Land.

¹³ This may possibly allude to the verses of Petrarca, where, speaking of Julius Cæsar, he says, that Cleopatra bound him with flowery wreaths.
Fornari.

¹⁴ Sansonetto.

These valiant sons of chivalry, to meet
The knights at Norandino's regal seat,
From town to town pursu'd their easy way
To reach the tilting on th' appointed day
With vigour unimpair'd, and chanc'd to fight 660
(Where two paths join'd) on one who seem'd a
knight;

But one, whose outward vest and looks conceal'd
A virgin glorious in the martial field.
Marphisa¹⁵ was her name, of generous strain,
Who oft was known the combat to maintain
With Brava's mighty lord¹⁶, and oft had clos'd
With Mount Albano's¹⁷, sword to sword oppos'd.
By day, by night, in shining arms array'd,
Through woods and dales, o'er hills and plains she stray'd

T' encounter wandering knights, and nobly raise
Victorious trophies of immortal praise. 671
As Sansonetto and Astolpho came
In plate and mail before the fearless dame,
She deem'd them warriors well in battle known,
For both were large of limb and strong of bone.
Then eager in the field their force to try,
She wheel'd her steed the strangers to defy,
But to her mind recall'd, as near she drew,
The Paladin whom in Cathay she knew¹⁸,
Where oft she mark'd, in council and in fight, 680
The gallant bearing of the English knight.

This seen, the gauntlet from her hand she took,
Call'd him by name, and with a gracious look
Her beaver rais'd, nor, though the first in pride,
To meet the duke with fair salute deny'd;
While the brave Paladin as gladly paid
His cordial greeting to the wondrous maid.

Now each began t' inquire the other's way;
Astolpho first reply'd—his journey lay
To reach Damascus, where the Syrian king 690
Sought in his lists from various climes to bring
The bravest knights.—"Permit," Marphisa cried
"My arms with yours the glory to divide."
She said, and gladly to her wish they yield,
O'erjoy'd at such a partner in the field.

At length the day before the festive rite,
They see Damascus rising to their sight,
And here, without the walls, awhile they slay
Till fair Aurora with her early ray
Shall gild the morn; but when with ruddy blaze
The Sun began to shed his orient rays, 701
The dame and knights their limbs in armour cas'd,
And to the lists an envoy sent in haste,
To give the signal when the jousts began,
When spear with spear, and man engag'd with maç,

Now to the place king Norandino came,
The place he destin'd for the dangerous game;

¹⁵ The character is continued from the Orlando Innamorato, where she makes a principal figure. Boyardo tells us that Galaphron, the father of Angelica, brought with him a numerous force to raise the siege of Albracca, among which was Marphisa, a female warrior of dauntless courage, and who had made a vow never to disarm herself till she had taken three kings prisoners in battle, Gradasso, Agrican, and Charlemain.

See Ori. Innam. b. l. c. xvi.

¹⁷ Rinaldo.

¹⁸ Alluding to Boyardo's action.

While the brave virgin⁶⁶, and the knightly pair⁶⁷,
 Press through the city to the crowded square,
 Where, waiting for the sign, on either hand 710
 The knights of noble strain impatient stand.
 The prizes doom'd that day for those who won,
 A glittering poll-ax, and a sword that shone
 With costly gems; with these the king bestow'd
 A steed, whose make and stately trappings show'd
 A royal gift—The king who surely held
 That he, who first had all opponents quell'd,
 Would win the second jousts, and bear away
 The meed and praise of each victorious day,
 To give him all that honour could demand, 720
 Those arms, which late by fraud Martino gain'd,
 Alost he hung; the sword of temper try'd
 To these he join'd; and at the courser's side
 The poll-ax plac'd, all destin'd to requite
 Brave Gryphon, from his garb surnam'd the white.
 But she, who lately to the list of fame,
 With Sansonetto and Astolpho came,
 Soon chang'd the scene—for when before her view
 These arms appear'd, full well the arms she knew,
 Which, once her own, the virgin treasur'd high,
 Their value such, no vulgar price could buy. 731
 These once impatient from her limbs she drew
 And cast aside⁶⁸, impetuous to pursue
 Brunello, vers'd in every art of theft,
 Who from her side the trusty sword had reft.
 Nor need I longer on the story dwell,
 Suffice how here she found her arms to tell.

Now when the maid, by certain tokens known,
 Again in these with joy confess'd her own,
 So dearly priz'd—no more in doubt she stay'd, 740
 But, swift adancing, on the curram laid
 That hand, which ne'er was wont in field to fail,
 And here she seiz'd, and there she strow'd the mail
 With headlong haste. The king incens'd beheld,
 And with a look his ready train impell'd
 To avenge the deed: at once the train obey'd:
 The spear they rested and unsheath'd the blade,
 Mindless of what they found so late requite
 Their insult offer'd to a wandering knight.
 Not more, when Spring unlocks his genial stores
 The playful child delights in gaudy flowers: 751
 Not more the blooming maid, with vestments gay,
 In the swift dance or music's spritely lay;
 Than she, whose valour every thought exceeds,
 Joys in the clang of arms and neigh of steeds;
 The rattling quiver, and the crashing spear,
 Where streaming blood and ghastly death appear.
 Her courser spur'd against the thoughtless crew,
 Her lance in rest with headlong speed she flew;
 Some through the neck, some through the breast
 she thrust, 760

Some with a shock she tumbled on the dust.
 Then, with drawn sword, her furious strokes ad-
 dress'd,
 She lopp'd the head or broke the brittle crest;
 There pierc'd the side, and here the skull she cleft,
 The right arm now she cleft, and now the left.

⁶⁶ Marphisa. ⁶⁷ Sansonetto, and Astolpho.

⁶⁸ This story is told by Boyardo, who says that she pursued Brunello fifteen days, that on the sixth day her horse falling dead through weariness, she continued the pursuit on foot, till Brunello getting to the sea-side made his escape in a vessel, and arrived safe at Biserta with the spoils he had made.

Orl. Innam. b. ii. c. xvii.

Brave Sansonetto and Astolpho bold
 Who with Marphisa came the lists to hold,
 Not mix in serious combat, when they saw
 The Syrian troops in rank of battle draw,
 At once their lances couch'd, their vizors clos'd,
 And pierc'd th' ignoble herd, where few oppos'd
 Their dreadful course: meantime the knights who

came
 From various realms, the candidates for fame.
 Their sportive weapons turn'd to slaughter view'd,
 And promis'd jousts to deeper scenes of blood;
 Yet knew not why the Syrian people sought
 Their mad revenge, or what offence had wrought
 The king's resentment; hence, on either hand,
 In deep amaze and speechless doubt they stand.

Some forward rush the people's cause to join, 780
 But soon repeat; and some, whose minds incline
 On either part, to these as those unknown,
 Prepare, without delay, to quit the town:
 While wiser some, still hold the courser's rein,
 And, silent, anxious for th' event remain.

But Aquilant and Gryphon flew where swarms
 Of people pour'd to claim their sovereign's arms
 So proudly seiz'd. When now the brethren view'd
 The king, whose fiery eyes, suffur'd with blood,
 Bespoke his wrath, when now at full they knew 790
 The cause from which such dread contention grew;
 And Gryphon deem'd such insult borne must shame
 Not less his own, than Norandino's name;
 Each bids his spear be brought with eager speed,
 And flies to vengeance on his thundering steed,
 On t'other part Astolpho swift impell'd
 His Rabicano, while in hand he held
 The lance of gold⁶⁹, that with enchanted force
 Dismounts each warrior in the listed course.
 With this on earth two noble knights he leaves: 800
 First Gryphon falls, then Aquilant receives
 The weapon's point, that glancing on the shield,
 The generous youth extended on the field,
 Bold Sansonetto from their seats remov'd
 The bravest knights, in many a conflict prov'd:
 Swift from the barriers thro' th' affrighted crowd
 The king, inflam'd with anger, storm'd aloud.

Meantime Marphisa, who had driven away
 What'er oppos'd her (victor of the day) 810
 The late contested arms in triumph took,
 And with her prize the fatal lists forsook.
 Nor Sansonetto, nor Astolpho stay'd,
 But to the gate pursu'd the martial maid,
 While Aquilant and Gryphon mourn'd the chance
 That both o'erthrew with one resistless lance. [hand,
 O'erwhelm'd with shame they curse the stranger's
 Nor dare in Norandino's presence stand.
 They seize their coursers, and their seats regain
 To chase the foe—with numbers in his train
 The king pursues—All equal fury breathe, 820
 Resolv'd on vengeance or resolv'd on death.

The vulgar throngs applauding clamours send,
 But gaze at distance and th' event attend.
 Now Gryphon came to where the three had gain'd
 The bridge, and undismay'd the post maintain'd:
 Arriv'd, he soon Astolpho knew, who wore
 The same device and vest he view'd before;
 The same his armour and the same his steed,
 As on the day he made Orlo bleed.

⁶⁹ This lance, formerly the property of Argalia, after his death came to Astolpho.

See General View of Boyardo's Story.

When Gryphon late engag'd the English knight,
The well-known marks at first escap'd his sight,
But now he knows him, greets him now with hands
Conjoin'd, and of his comrades' weal demands;
And why, regardless of the reverence due
To Syria's king, those arms to earth they threw.
To Gryphon then good Otho's son⁸⁴ reveal'd
His comrades' names, and nought beside conceal'd
Of what had chanc'd, though little could he tell
How from those arms such sudden discord fell;
But since himself and Sansonetto brought 841
Marphisa there, in her defence they fought.

While friendly thus they commun'd, nearer drew
Good Aquilant, and soon Astolpho knew:
His wrath subsides; and numbers now appear,
But dare not yet approach the warriors near:
They view each gesture well, and stand intent
To mark their words and what their parley meant:
When one, who found that this was she so fam'd
In glorious fields of fight, Marphisa nam'd,
His coarser turn'd and Norandino warn'd, 850
(Unless he wish'd to see his honours scorn'd)
Ere all were slain, to save his remnant bands
From dire Trisiphone and Death's remorseless hands;
For she, who thus had seiz'd the costly arms,
Was fierce Marphisa, bred amidst th' alarms
Of horrid war. When Norandino heard
That dreadful name, through all the East so fear'd,
Unless his care prevent, full well he knew
The mischief, now predicted, must ensue.
For this he bids his troops from combat cease, 860
Whose fury lessens as their fears increase.

Meanwhile the sons of Olivero there,
With Sansonetto and with Otho's heir,
By mild entreaty in Marphisa's breast
Assuag'd the flame: she stay'd at their request
Her deathful hand; then with a haughty look Approaching Norandino thus she spoke.

"I know not why your victor should receive
These arms, O king! which are not yours to give.
These once were mine, and midst the public way
That from Armenia leads, one fateful day 871
I left behind, with better speed to chase
A wretch from whom I suffer'd foul disgrace:—
Behold this token on the mail impress'd,
The certain proof of what my lips attest."

⁸⁴ Astolpho.

⁸⁵ Boyardo relates that Marphisa bore for the device on her shield a crown cleft in three parts, and for her crest a dragon vomiting flames.

Nel scudo azurro avea per deviza
Una corona in tre parti spezzata:
La cotta d'arme a quella guisa
E la coperta tutto lavorato,
E per cimier nel piu sublime loco,
Un drago verde che gettava foco,
Ed era il foco accendia di maniera,
Che dal impeto accesa arde del vento,
E quando in mezza alla battaglia ella era,
Va lampeggiar faccia pien di spavento.

Berni Ori. Ino. h. i. c. x.

She, for device, upon her azure shield,
Cleft in three parts a regal crown reveal'd;
The like impress her mailed cuirass bore,
And all her surcoat rich embroider'd o'er:
High on her helm, in figur'd terror grac'd,
A verdant dragon fiery sparkles cast;

Then on the cuirass, which she claim'd her own,
Cleft in three parts she show'd a regal crown.

"Four days are past, since from th' Armenian
land

(The king reply'd) a merchant to my hand
This armour brought; and wouldst thou this obtain,
Think not thy tongue shall ask the gift in vain;
Nor think, whate'er thy claim, the prize ordain'd
For Gryphon's virtues, thus by him detain'd;
But freely would his noble mind resign
The victor's need to make thy friendship mine.
No signs I ask to prove this armour yours,
Your word, your valour, my belief secures.
Now take thy own—here all contention leave,
And Gryphon shall from me a richer gift receive."⁸⁶

Gryphon, who little had those arms desir'd, 890
But still in all to please the king aspir'd,
Thus made reply—"For me it shall suffice,
That aught you wish my glad consent supplies."
Marphisa, who beheld the part they took
To save her honour, with benignant look
To Gryphon begg'd these arms her gift to make,
Which Gryphon at her hand vouchsaf'd to take.

Now to the city all again pursu'd
Their cheerful way, in peace and love renew'd;
Where at the festive tilt in splendour run, 900
The praise and glory Sansonetto won.
Astolpho and the brethren fam'd in war,
But chief Marphisa, brave beyond compare,
With friendly purpose from the list abstain,
That Sansonetto all the praise might gain.

With Norandino thus the knights employ
The happy days in sports and social joy;
Till now the state of France by foes oppress,
Awakes new thoughts in every knightly breast:
Their leave they take: with these, by glory fir'd,
Marphisa went, for long her soul aspir'd 911

The towering crest, by woodroos art design'd,
With motion glow'd and kindled in the wind:
And while amidst the mingled fight she turn'd,
With dreaded blaze the fire increasing burn'd!

Tasso paints the crest of the Soldan of Egypt in the same manner.

A dragon on his crest the Soldan wore,
That, stretching, bonds his arching neck before,
High on his feet he stands, with spreading wings,
And wreaths his forky tail in spiry rings: (shows,
Three brandish'd tongues the sculptur'd monster
He seems to kindle as the combat glows:
His gaping jaws appear to hiss with ire,
And vomit mingled smoke and ruddy fire.

Jerusal. Del. b. ix. ver. 193.

Both these descriptions originate in the following fine picture of Virgil.

Turnus
Vertitur arma cœcens, et tuto vertice supra est,
Quod triplici crinita juba galea alta Chimaeram
Sustinet, Ætæonæ effiantem faucibus ignæ.
Tam magis illa fremens, ac tristicibus effera flammis,
Quam magis effuso crudescunt sanguine pugæ.

Æn. lib. vii. ver. 783.

Turnus rode—
A triple pile of plumes his crest adorn'd,
On which with belching flames Chimera burn'd;
The more the kindled combat rises higher,
The more with fury burns the blazing fire.

Dryden, ver. 1071.

To meet the Paladins in fields of fame,
 And prove if each deserv'd so great a name.
 Another Sannetto leaves, whose sway
 For his might blest Jerusalem obey:
 Then in one friendly band together join'd,
 These five, whose equals scarce the world can find,
 Dismiss'd by Norandino, seek the land
 Of Tripoli, where on the neighbouring strand
 The billows break, and where a bark they find 930
 With wealthy freight for western climes design'd.
 An aged pilot there (the terms agreed)
 Receives aboard each warrior and his steed.

With cloudless beam serenely shone the day,
 The flattering promise of a prosperous way,
 The shore forsaking, with a favouring gale
 They plough the deep with wide extended sail.
 The isle, devoted to the queen of love,
 Receives them first, within whose port they prove
 Malignant steams⁶⁵ of pestilential breath, 930
 That soften steel and taint the air with death,
 Sent from a stagnant pool—and thus unkind
 To Famagusta, Nature has assign'd
 Her place so near Constanza's noxious soil,
 Yet blest in other parts the Cyprian isle.
 The poisonous fumes forbid the ship to stay;
 Around the coast they wing their rapid way,
 And steering to the right, at Paphos moor:
 The sailors issue on the flowery shore,
 For traffic come, and some the land to view, 940
 Where Love resides with pleasures ever new.
 Six miles ascending gently from the flood,
 Stands on a beautiful hill a verdant wood,
 Where cedars, myrtles, bays, and orange grow,
 With various plants that grateful scent bestow.
 Wild thyme, the lily, crocus, and the rose
 Perfume the air, while every wind that blows
 Fresh from the land, far o'er the surgy main
 Wafts the sweet gale to greet the sailor-train.
 Clear from a spring a murmuring riv'let pours 950
 Its winding tribute to the meads and flowers.
 Well may this spot be nam'd the favourite soil
 Of lovely Venus, where with roscate smile,
 Each dame, each virgin shines in bloomy pride
 Of charms unequal'd through the world beside,
 While the soft goddess youth and age inspires,
 And even in life's last stage maintains her amorous fires.

Here was the tale confirm'd, reveal'd but late
 Of fair Lucina, whom in doleful state
 The orc detain'd; and soon the news they heard,
 That, freed at length from bands, the princess steer'd 961

Her happy journey from Nicosia's⁶⁶ seat
 In Syria's realm her long-lost lord to meet⁶⁷.
 The pilot now his voyage to pursue,
 While o'er the wave the favouring breezes blew,
 Turn'd to the sea his prow, his anchor weigh'd,
 And every canvas to the gale display'd.

⁶⁵ The lake of Constanza is so near Famagosta, that it was said to render the air pestilential: but the further effects attributed to it by the poet are probably exaggerated.

⁶⁶ Nicosia was a city almost in the middle of the island of Cyprus.

⁶⁷ Here concludes the story of Norandino and Lucina, who appear no more in the course of this work.

Now distant from the port the vessel stood,
 And plough'd with happy speed the briny flood,
 Long as the Sun above th' horizon shin'd; 970
 But, when black evening rose, the changing wind
 Howl'd thro' the shrouds, and from the lowest deep
 With warring waves assail'd the reeling ship.
 Wide yawns the firmament from pole to pole,
 Quick flash the lightnings, loud the thunders roll;
 Thick clouds in darkness veil th' ethereal light,
 Nor Sun by day, nor star appears by night.
 South, east, and west in rattling whirlwinds blow;
 Heaven groans above and ocean roars below.
 Huge cataracts descend of hail and rain; 980
 The wretched sailors every woe sustain,
 And horror broods upon the angry main.
 All ply their several tasks to prove how well
 Each in his office can the rest excel.
 One with his whistle's sound the want of speech
 Supplies, and gives the heedful charge to each;
 This, at the anchor toils; that, strikes the sails;
 This, strains or loosens, as the storm prevails.
 The creaking cordage; that, the deck ascends:
 The rudder this, and that, the mast defends. 990
 All night the storm redoubled rage display'd,
 With thicker gloom than Hell's tremendous shade.
 Through deepest seas th' affrighted pilot steer'd,
 Where through the waves no dangerous shelves appear'd,

Not hopeless yet but with returning day
 Relentless Fortune might her wrath allay:
 In vain his hopes—for nought her wrath assuag'd,
 By day with fiercer strength the tempest rag'd;
 If that were day, which not returning light,
 But lapse of hours distinguish'd from the night.
 Now pale, despairing, to his fate resign'd, 1001
 The pilot leaves his vessel to the wind;
 He lets her drive where'er the storm prevails,
 And ploughs th' unpyting sea with humble sails.

While Fortune these⁶⁸ upon the deep distress'd,
 Not more she suffers those at land to rest,
 Where on the plains of France, with deathful rage,
 The Christian and the Pagan powers engage.
 Rinaldo there assails, breaks, scatters round
 The foes, and hurls their standards to the ground:
 And now he spurs Bayardo through the fight, 1011
 To prove the noble Dardinello's might.
 Rinaldo on his shield the sign survey'd,
 Which young Almontes' son with pride display'd,
 And deem'd him brave whose venturous arm could bear

The same device the earl⁶⁹ was seen to wear;
 And found him brave, when round the ghastly plain
 He saw the heaps his conquering hand had slain.
 Then to himself—"This noxious weed demands,
 (Ere yet it further spreads) my pruning hands." 1020
 Thus spoke the knight, and where he turns his face,
 The ranks recede, and every chief gives place:
 Christians and Pagans to his passage yield.
 Such awe his looks, such dread his sword impell'd,
 But hapless Dardinello sole defies
 Albano's chief; to whom Rinaldo cries—

"Poor boy! in evil hour to risk thy life,
 That shield was left, thy pledge of future strife:
 I come to prove how well with me in fight
 Thy hand defends that ensign red and white: 1030

⁶⁸ He resumes this narrative in Book six, ver. 306.

⁶⁹ Orlando.

If here thou fail'st, thy force can ill contend
Those arms against Orlando to defend."

Then Dardinello thus—"Hear one who dares
Protect those honours which in field he bears:
I trust these colours, red and white, proclaim
Less pledge of strife than pledge of future fame:
Think not, though young, to make me fly the field,
Or e'er to thee this glorious army yield,
My death alone on thee my arms bestows:
But Heaven th' event far other may dispose; 1040
And never, never shall my deeds disgrace
The lineal praise of my illustrious race."

He said; and as he spoke, with brandish'd sword
Intrepid rush'd on Mount Albano's lord:
A chilling fear²⁰ each Pagan foe oppress'd,
And froze the blood in every panting breast;
When stern Rinaldo, eager for the fight,
Resistless flew t' engage the blooming knight.
A lion thus (that in the pasture views
A bull that ne'er the heifer yet pursues) 1050
Springs on his prey—first aim'd the Pagan foe
Against Mambrino's helm the fruitless blow.
"Now learn," with smile severe Rinaldo cries
"If this right hand can beat the weapon guide."

At once he spur'd, and to the fiery horse
Gave up the reins, when driv'n with matchless force
Through his white breast the sword a passage found,
Till at his back appear'd the grizzly wound.
The steel drawn forth, drew forth the vital breath,
And cold and pale the body sunk in death: 1060
Like some fair flower²¹, whose vivid lustre fades,
If chance the ploughman's share its stalk invades;
Or heavy poppies, charg'd with dew or rain,
That hang their heads low drooping on the plain:
So from his face the rosy colour flies,

So Dardinello sinks, and sinking dies:—
He dies, and instant with their chief is fed
The strength, the courage of the host he led.
As where huge works of human art restrain
The floods that else would deluge all the plain, 1070
Where'er the moulds are burst, the rushing tide
With roaring noise escapes on every side.—
The powers of Africa thus, who scorn'd to yield,
While Dardinello's name inspir'd the field;
Soon as they found the leader breathless lie,
Dispers'd and broken o'er the plains they fly.
Who seeks to fly, Rinaldo leaves in flight,
But those assaults who bravely meet the fight,
What numbers fell where Ariodantes fought,
Who next Rinaldo deeds of prowess wrought! 1080
These Lionetto; those Zorbino quell'd;
All seem'd to strive who most in arms excell'd.
Charles, mindful of his fame, the battle wag'd:
There Olivero, Turpin, Guido²² rag'd;
There Salamone fought, Ugero there engag'd.

So Virgil when Pallas attacks Turnus, Æn. x.
Frigidus Arcadius coit in precordia sanguis.
The blood congeal'd in each Arcadian heart.
²¹ Thus Virgil, Æneid ix. ver. 435.
Purpureus veluti cum flos succisus aratro
Languecit moriens; lassove papavera collo,
Denisere caput, pluvia cum forte gravantur.
As a gay flower, with blooming beauties crown'd,
Cut by the share, lies insens'd on the ground;
Or some tall poppy that o'er-charg'd with rain,
Bends the faint head, and sinks upon the plain.

Pitt, 383.

²² Two Guidos are mentioned by the poet,
vol. III.

That day so fatal to each Moorish band,
Had left not one to see his native land;
But sage Marsilius, with foreseeing care,
Preserv'd th' unhappy remnants of the war;
And better deem'd these wretched bands to save,
Than suffer all to fill a foreign grave. 1091
He sends his standards to the camp, dispos'd
Against assaults, by fencing works enclow'd:
Here Stordilano came, Granada's king;
Andalusia's, Lusa's leaders bring
Their suffering powers: meantime Marsilius sends
To Afric's monarch; and with speed commends
To quit the field, and thank the favouring power
Which sav'd his life in that destroying hour.

The king, who saw that nothing could restore
The day, nor hop'd to see Biserta more, 1101
The fate he could not shun resign'd to meet,
His standards turnd and bade to sound retreat.
Such was the panic of the routed host,
That flying numbers in the scene were lost.
King Agrament and sage Sobriao try'd
The rest in order from the field to guide;
But here nor king, nor sage, nor chief prevail'd
With prayer or threat, such fear each breast
assail'd:

While scarce a third the standards would pursue,
That ill attended from the fight withdrew. 1111
For one that heard his chief or trumpet's call,
Lo! two were seen to fly, or two to fall.
Soon to their camp retir'd, in dire dismay,
The wretched Pagans in their trenches lay: [lost,
When Charles, who meant not fortune should be
Pursu'd the flying foe with all his host,
But rising sight his glorious ardour stay'd,
And wrapt the warring world in friendly shade;
Perchance by Heaven more swiftly sent to give 1120
The creatures of his hand to breathe and live.

The hostile blood in purple torrents flow'd,
And drench'd the soil with dreadful carnage strow'd;
Where fourscore thousand on the fatal plain
Lay breathless, by the murderous weapon slain,
Whose bodies thieves and wolves at midnight hour
Rush'd from their haunts to pillage and devour.

No more imperial Charles to Paris turn'd,
But pitch'd his tents without, where kindled burn'd
The frequent fires: the foes besieg'd with care 1130
Sunk deep the trenches and the works repair,
O'erwatch the whole, bid every guard awake,
Nor all the live-long night their arms forsake.

The Saracens, whom chilling fears oppress,
Along their mournful lines in deep distress
Lament and weep, while half conceal'd and low,
The sighs break forth and hush'd the sorrows flow.
Some for their slaughter'd friends or kindred groan,
Some, others' sufferings; some bewail their own;
And some, more wretched, with foreboding mind
Revolve still greater evils yet behind. 1141

Two Moorish youths²³ there were of humble race,
In Ptolomita was their native place:

distinct from one of that name called Guido
Savage.

²³ This beautiful episode of Cloridano and Me-doro, though evidently a copy of Nisus and Eury-pius in the sixth Æneid, must be allowed to be improved by the motive which the poet ascribes for this midnight excursion of the two friends, the desire of recovering the body of their slaughtered master. It may be observed too, that in Virgil the Whose story told to every ear may prove

A rare example of unblemish'd love.
These, Cloridano and Medoro call'd,
Firm in good times, in evil unappall'd,
To Dardinello loyal friendship bore,
And late with him had cross from Afric's shore.
A hunter's life bold Cloridano led, 1150
His limbs robust to strength and swiftness bred:
Medoro's opening youth but scarce began
To shade the rose with down and promise man.
Of all that join'd the Pagan's threatening arms,
Not one excell'd his mien and blooming charms:
Black were his eyes, his locks like golden wire;
So seems some angel of the heavenly choir!
These two, with numbers more, by chance ordain'd
To guard the fences, now the watch maintain'd,
What time the drowsy night, with winking eyes,
View'd from her middle throne the spangled
skies. 1161

Medoro still (while tears his cheeks suffuse)
The dear remembrance of his lord renews:
Almontes' son, brave Dardinello slain,
Expos'd unburied on the naked plain:
When, turning to his friend, he thus express'd
The generous feelings of a loyal breast:
"Shall he, O Cloridano, to the brood
Of wolves and ravens yield too precious food?
He, whose past goodness ever must awake 1170
My grateful love, till life this frame forsake?"

attempt of exploring the enemy's camp is first suggested by Nisus, and that the young Euryalus takes fire at the proposal; but in Ariosto the youth is the first mover, instigated by love and gratitude to his dead prince; which circumstance greatly elevates his character, and adds to the pathos of the story. Ariosto has not only imitated Virgil, but probably had his eye upon Statius, who in the tenth book of his Thebaid, represents two of his heroes, Hopleus and Damas, making a search by night for the dead bodies of their kings Tydeus and Parthenopæus. The episode of Argantes and Cloridano in the twelfth book of the Jerusalem may be derived from the Latin: but both Ariosto and Tasso have so varied the circumstances, and improved the hints they have taken, and in particular have given so different a turn to the conclusion of their adventure, that their separate fictions may nearly claim the merit of invention. At least in both poets, the imitations are the imitations of a master. I shall leave the reader to compare the passages which our poet has borrowed from Virgil.

I am happy to add here the observations of an elegant and candid critic on this passage of Ariosto. "The beautiful and pathetic tale of the two friends Medoro and Cloridano, in the eighteenth canto of the Orlando Furioso, is indeed an artful and exact copy of the Nisus and Euryalus of Virgil; yet the author hath added some original beauties to it, and in particular ha'd assigned a more interesting motive for this midnight excursion, than what we find in Virgil; for Medoro and Cloridano venture into the field of battle to find out among the heaps of slain, the body of their lord. This perhaps is one of the most excellent passages in this wild and romantic author, who yet abounds in various beauties, the merit of which ought not to be tried by the established rules of classical criticism."

See Postscript to Dr. Warton's edition of Virgil.

And, ah! should life for him in tribute flow,
Not all could pay the mighty debt I owe!
Then you heaps of carnage let me fly,
Where cold on earth his limbs dishonour'd lie,
Who knows but Heaven may guide my daring tread
To where the silent camp of Charles is spread?
Remain thou here, that if resistless fate
Decrees my death, thou mayst that death relate:
And should not Heaven my pious vows succeed,
At least posterity will praise the deed." 1181

With speechless woode Cloridano hears
Such faith and courage in such early years;
And (for he held him dear) he strives to make
The dauntless youth his rash design forsake.
But grief like his no comfort can controul;
Nor reason change the purpose of his soul,
A grave on Dardinello to bestow,
Or in the great attempt his life forgo.

When Cloridano long in vain had tried 1190
Each friendly plea—"Yet let me share," he cried,
"The pious task—I too aspire to raise
From such a death the weed of endless praise.
Should I, depriv'd of thee, Medoro, live,
What future joy can wretched being give!
Ah! let me meet with thee a soldier's fate,
Nor drag behind life's wretched lingering state."

This said; they' point supplies their place to take,
Then leave the trenches and the camp forsake;
And soon arrive where, sunk in heavy sleep, 1200
Our careless bands the watch no longer keep:
Their fires extinct, each senseless at his post,
But little fears the Pagan's neighbouring host:
Midst arms, and cars, and coursers stretch'd asleep,
In slumber lock'd and drench'd in fumes of wine.
His steps awhile here Cloridano stay'd:
"Shall I not seize the present hour," he said,
"Now, now, Medoro, on you hostile strain
To wreak some vengeance for my patron claim?
Here listen thou! and watch with heedful eye, 1210
Lest unawares some waking foe descrie
Our bold attempt, while here my wrath I shake,
And through the camp our bloody passage make."

He said; and ceasing, o'er the trenches stopt,
And first he came where learned Alpheus stopt:
But late th' imperial court of Charles he sought,
In magic, herbs, and arts prophetic taught:
Here fail'd his skill, that skill so oft believ'd;
While to himself the witless seer deceiv'd
Long years of life had promis'd, safe from harms,
And death at last in his lov'd consort's arms. 1221
Deep in his throat the wily Pagan sent
His weapon's point; and next his fury bent
On four that speechless died, whose names unknown
No Turpin to our age delivers down.
Then Pallion of Moncaliri bleeds,
Who slept secure between the barnes'd steeds.
At length he came to where, supinely spread,
An empty vase supported Grillo's head:
Himself had will'd the wine, and now he lay. 1230
In peaceful rest to doze the fumes away:
Large measures had he quaff'd, and still extends
In dreams the draught which Cloridano ends.
A Greek and Belgian perish'd near his side,
Who long by night the dice and goblet ply'd.
Thrice happy I had they ply'd till reddening more
From silver Indus²⁴ made her wish'd return.

²⁴ A principal river in the East Indies, which gives name to the whole country of India.

But Fate would lose on Earth his sovereign power
Could man with prescience read the future hour.

As the gaunt lion, at the savage call 1240
Of hunger, overlaps the nightly stall;
Then kills, and reeds the sheep with cruel paw,
To glut with bloody food his ravenous jaws:
The Pagan thus, amidst our senseless crew
Lamers'd in slumber, helpless wretches slew;
Nor yet he rag'd with bold Medoro's steel,
Who scorn'd that vulgar lives his force should feel.

He came where duke Labretto lay enclos'd
By his lov'd consort's arms, in sleep repos'd:
No air could glide between, so close they lay, 1250
Medoro's falchion lopt their heads away:
O envy'd death! for sure their sons conjoin'd
In like embrace, one happy stroke consign'd
To those blest regions, to receive above
The meed of joy and never-dying love!
Nalindo next he slew: and at his side,
Brave Ardelico and his brother died,
The sons of Flanders' earl, whom lately prais'd
For martial virtue, Charles had newly rais'd
To knight-hood's rank, and either gave to hold, 1260
Mixed with their arms, the fleur-de-lys of gold.
These from the field that glorious day he view'd
Return with weapons stain'd in hostile blood,
And promis'd each in Priza large domain:
But soon Medoro made such promise vain!

Thus slaughtering on, advanc'd th' insidious two:
At length they near the rich pavilions drew,
Where round the tent of Charles, in arms prepar'd,
The Paladins, by turn, maintain'd the guard.
Here from their bloody work the Pagans ceas'd,
And stealth'd their falchions and their steps re-
press'd; 1271

For well they deem'd that, midst so vast a host,
Not all could sleep regardless of their post. [borne,
What wealthy plunder thence might each have
But all they sought was safely to return!

First Cloridano led the way, to find
Their surest track; his friend pursu'd behind.
At length they came where in a field of blood,
With falchions, bows, and shields, and lances
strow'd,

Men mix'd with steeds, the poor with wealthy lay,
And kings with slaves reduc'd to common clay. 1281
Th' unnumber'd slain had made the pious pair
Pursue their search till day with fruitless care;
But, at Medoro's suit, the Moon reveal'd
Her silver horns till then in clouds conceal'd:
Fix'd on the sky he bent his mournful sight,
And thus address'd the regent of the night:

"O sacred empress! by our fathers fam'd!
Who rightly thee their triple goddess nam'd!
Thou, who in Heaven, in Earth, or deepest Hell,
Through various forms in glory canst excel! 1291
Who wear'st a huntress' garb in woods to trace
The haunts of monsters and the sylvan race;
Show me my murder'd lord in blood imbry'd,
Who, while he liv'd, thy hallo'd sports pursu'd."

At this, by chance or at his earnest prayer,
The Moon resplendent through the vaporous air
Pierc'd the still gloom; as when in virgin charms
She came all naked to Endymion's arms.

* This pathetic incident is not borrowed from Virgil, but our author's own, and unequalled by any death described in the expedition of Nisus and Euryalus.

Paris with either camp receiv'd the beam: 1300
The plains and mountains whiten'd in the gleam:
Martir and Liri's distant hills were bright,
This rising to the left, and that the right:
But rays more dazzling mark'd the fatal plain
Where lay Almones's³⁰ valiant offspring slain.
Him by his arms and shield's device he knew;
As near his lord Medoro weeping drew,
With face all bath'd in tears, in tears which, shed
From either eye, eternal fountains fod:
Such were his looks, so seem'd his plaints to flow,
That passing winds might listen to his woe. 1311
In accents low and murmurs secretly heard
He breath'd his grief; yet think not that he fear'd
To risk a being he no longer priz'd;
His generous soul such abject thoughts despis'd;
But most he fear'd some evil chance to find
T' obstruct the pious deed his soul design'd.
Now, on their shoulders laid, the friendly pair
The breathless corse, with zeal divided, bear,
Both pale and anxious for their dearest care. 1320
Soon came the god who gives to day its birth,
The stars to chase from Heaven, the shades from Earth;

When brave Zerbino, from whose virtuous breast
A general's duty drove ignoble rest,
Whose arm had chas'd the fearful Moors by night,
Return'd to seek the camp at dawn of light;
With him a band of knights—these soon beheld
The distant friends that mov'd along the field
With tardy steps: each warrior thither bent
His course, to share the spoil that chance had sent.
"Now, now, my brother! cast our load aside, 1331
And urge our swiftness," Cloridano cried.
"T were far unmeet, while from the deathful plain
We bear one corse, two living should be slain."

This said, he quits his hold, nor doubts to make
His friend Medoro now th' attempt forsake;
But he, whose pious love more firm remain'd,
The whole dear burthen by himself sustain'd.
Meanwhile the first his feet for safety ply'd,
And deem'd his lov'd Medoro at his side. 1340
O! had he known that then with foes enclos'd
He left his friend to cruel fate expos'd,
A thousand dangers would his arm have prov'd
To save the youth whom more than life he lov'd.
The horse, determin'd these should die or yield,
Some here, some there dispensing o'er the field,
Cut off the means of fight: their leader near
Inflames their zeal: by every mark of fear,
By every semblance, well observ'd, he knew
That these were warriors of the Justice crew. 1350

Not far remote an ancient forest stood,
Perplex'd with thickening trees and dwarfish wood,
Where not a track the tangled paths display'd.
But foot of beasts that trod the gloomy shade:
Thither the Pagans fled, in hope to meet
Amid the friendly boughs a safe retreat.
But he who gives my tale a willing ear
Must, at some future time, the sequel hear.

* This beautiful passage is finely copied by Tasso, where the Dane gives an account to Godfrey of his discovering the body of Sweno by moon-light.

Then from the peaceful regent of the night,
I saw descend a ray of slanting light:
Where on the field the breathless corse was laid,
There full the lunar beam resplendent play'd.

BOOK XIX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Continuation of the episode of Cloridano and Medora. Angelica finds Medoro wounded; she cures his wound, and becomes enamoured of him. Their marriage. Sansonetto, Astolpho, Gryphon, Aquilant, and Marphisa, are near being shipwrecked in a dreadful storm. They are cast at length on the land of the Amazons. The strange law there instituted. The lot falls on Marphisa to enter the list for her companions. Description of the battle between her and nine champions of the Amazons. She kills them all, and afterwards engages with the tenth, till night puts an end to the combat, which had been fought on both sides with equal valour.

None see the heart, while plac'd in prosperous state
On Fortune's wheel, such numbers round them wait
Of true and seeming friends; when these no less
By looks declare that faith, which these possess.
But should to fair succeed tempestuous skies,¹
Behold how soon each fawning suppliant flies!
While he who truly lov'd, unmov'd remains,
And to his patron dead his love maintains.
O! did the features give sincere report,
How oft would those, who shine amidst a court
In pride of rank, who hold their prince's grace,
Change with their peers oppress an envy'd place!
The lowest name might then be lifted high,
The greatest midst the crowd degraded lie.
But let us to Medora turn, who prov'd
His faith to him in life and death belov'd.
For safety now the generous youth pursu'd
The paths bewilder'd with entangling wood;
But the dear load he labour'd to sustain,
Made every hope to escape pursuers vain;
While thence far distant, from the burthen freed,
His friend in safety fled with happier speed.
Soon Cloridano came to where his car
No more the sound of trampling horse could hear:
But when he miss'd his friend—"What chance,"
he cried,

"Could from myself my better self divide?
Thou couldst I leave, who late wert wont to share
My nearest thoughts? Is this my pious care?
Unknowing when or where, from thee I part,
Friend of my choice and brother of my heart!"² 30
He said: and speaking, through the winding shade

The track reprinted he before had made:
Sought what he left, and swift with panting breath
Returning trod the way that led to death.
He hears the foe, he hears the courser's noise,
And nearer hears the riders' threatening voice;
And, ah! too late his dear Medoro knows,
Whom helpless and on foot a hundred horse enclose.
This troop Zerbino leads, who gives command
To seize the youth; he, prest on every hand, 40

Duce eris felix, multos numerabis amicos,
Tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris.

Trist. lib. i. eleg. vii

When Fortune smiles, thou seest surrounding friends,
When clouds arise, each boasted friendship ends!

Wheels here and there, while all his thought was bends

To save his charge, and still his charge defends.
By turns he lurks beyond the Christians' reach
Behind some sheltering elm, or oak, or beech.
At length, unable longer to sustain
His honour'd load, he lays it on the plain,
Still hovering near.—So when in mountain shades,
The hunter-troop a bear's retreat invades;
Around her young the savage mother-howl
In dreadful anguish and with fury growls; 60
While indur'd strength impels her oft to fly
On the bold foe, and deep in carnage dye
Her reeking jaws, maternal love restrains
Her rage, and with her cubs the beast detains.

Now Cloridano hopeless how to lend
His wanted aid, yet fix'd to join his friend
In life or death, and, ere he clos'd his date,
Resolv'd that more than one should share his fate,
Swift for his bow he chose the pointed reed,
And took conceal'd his aim with bloody speed: 60
It reach'd a Scot, and, hurried in his brain,
Hur'd from his saddle, lifeless to the plain.
At once the Christians turn'd with anxious view,
Exploring whence the murderous weapon flew:
Mean time another by the Pagan sent,
With equal aim to pierce the second went,
Who, while he loud inquir'd what unseen hand
Had drawn the bow, and rav'd amid the band,
The hissing dart drove on, his wessand cleft,
And while he spoke his tongue of speech bereft. 70

No more their chief Zerbino now repell'd
Th' indignant wrath that in his bosom swell'd,
But rushing on Medoro—"Thou shalt bear
The guilt!"—he cried: then seiz'd his golden hair,
And with strong grasp the hapless stripling drew
To meet the vengeance to another due,
Whose hostile shaft the Scots ill-fated slew.
Then, fixing on his face an earnest look,
Soft pity kindled and forbade the stroke,
As thus the youth his pitying grace implor'd: 80
"O! by that God, in Christian lands ador'd!
Stool out thy heart, sir Knight! but let me pay
The last sad honours to this sacred clay:
I ask not life—O! give me but to breathe
Till to his tomb my sovereign I bequeath:
But, if with Theban Creon's rage endur'd,
Thou seek'st to glut each bird and beast with food,
Be these poor limbs their prey, but hence convey'd
Let first Almontes' son in earth be laid."

Medoro thus his moving suit address'd: 90
In words to pierce the most obdurate breast;
Zerbino soon, his wrath decreasing, felt
His manly soul with love and pity melt;
When lo! a knight, by brutal fury sway'd,
Who little reverence to his leader paid,
While yet he spoke, the ruthless spear address'd
Against the tender suppliant's youthful breast.
With fierce displeasure good Zerbino view'd
Th' inhuman stroke, but more when drench'd in blood

He saw the youth lie senseless on the plain, 100
That each, who saw his fall, believ'd him slain:
"Thou shalt not perish unrequit," he said,
And sudden turn'd upon th' offender's head

² Statius, in the twelfth book of his Thebaid, sets forth, that Creon published an edict forbidding the bodies of the enemy to be interred.

To wreak the deed; but wheeling round the knight
His course spur'd and urg'd his rapid flight.

When Cloridano, where he stood conceal'd,
Beheld Medoro prostrate on the field,
He left the covert, cast aside the bow,
And rush'd in frantic rage amidst the foe,
With lifted weapon to revenge his death, 110
Or with Medoro yield his latest breath.

At length amidst such numerous swords he found
His gushing blood detain the purple ground;
His gushing blood detain the purple ground;
Till life, fast ebbing with the vital tide,
He sunk contented by Medoro's side.

The Scots then follow'd where their chief they
view'd.

Who through the woods his angry way pursu'd,
Behold remain'd the Pagans, owe depriv'd
Of life's last breath, and one who scarce surviv'd.
Long time in hopeless state Medoro lay, 120
Of life fast flow'd in purple-treaas away;
When, sent by Fortune to his timely aid,
A damsel came in cottage weeds array'd;
Of humble garb; but of a form most rare,
Of courteous manners and majestic air.

Perchance your memory scarce recalls to mind
(So long unseing) this loveliest of her kind;
Angelica, through every region known,
The heiress of Cathay's imperial throne.

When fair Angelica had now regain'd 130

Her ring which false Brunello late detain'd,
Alone she went, and, fill'd with scorn and pride,
D disdain'd the noblest warrior for her guide:
She blush'd to think that, amid her lovers nam'd,
Orlando or king Sacripant had claim'd
Her least regard; but most her haughty mind
Regrets that to Rinaldo once inclin'd,
She, e'er forgetful of her regal state,
Could bend her eyes on such an object mate.
But Love, who long had mark'd his slighted power,
Resolv'd to bear her cold contempt no more, 141
By poor Medoro took his watchful stand,
And brack'd his bow, and held his shafts in hand.

Soon as Angelica with sad survey

Beheld the youth, who pale and wounded lay,
And midst his own misfortune still deplor'd
Th' unbury'd corpse of his lamented lord;
Strangely pity touch'd her while she listening hung
To hear the tale that fall'd on his tongue.
Then to her mind she call'd whate'er, before 150
In ludia taught, she knew of healing lore;

An art in which such numbers there excell'd,
An art by all in praise and honour held:
Not learn'd by turning many a weary page,
But by the nice bequeath'd from age to age.

Once in a lovely mead, with searching view,
A plant she met whose virtues well she knew;
(Or dittany, or panacea nam'd,
(Whate'er the herb) for powerful influence fam'd

The blood to staunch, and from the wounded part Each dangerous symptom drive and charm the smart. 161

This now she sought, and, gathering, swift return'd
To where his slaughter'd lord Medoro mourn'd.
Amid her way a simple swain she view'd
Who through the forest on his horse pursu'd

A gentle heifer, that abroad to roam
(Then past two days) had left her rustic home.
The swain she led, where, issuing with his blood,
Fast and more fast Medoro's vigour flow'd,
Till from his breast the groans was dy'd beneath,
And his soul hover'd on the verge of death. 171

The virgin from her palfrey now descends,
The peasant, lighting, on her steps attends;
The plant she bruises with a stone, and stands
Tempering the juice between her ivory hands.
This o'er his breast she sheds with sovereign art,
And bathes with gentle touch the wounded part:
The wound such virtue from the juice derives,
As once the blood is staunch'd, the youth recovers,
And wondrous feels a sudden strength bestow'd: 180
He mounts the horse which late the shepherd rode;
Yet went not thence, till duly first dispos'd
He saw his breathless prince with earth enclos'd;
And, laid by noble Dardipello dead,
His Cloridano in one funeral bed.

The virgin to the shepherd's cot convey'd
The wounded youth, and there in pity stay'd
To wait his health restor'd; so deep her breast
Retain'd the thoughts which first his sight impress'd.
She mark'd his every grace, his every charm, 190
And felt, by slow degrees, a new alarm:
Quick beat her pulse, till soon, no more conceal'd,

The same burst forth and all her soul reveal'd.
Begirt with hills and bosom'd in a wood,
Of structure neat, the peasant's dwelling stood,
Which late himself had rais'd: his faithful wife
And children partners of his humble life.

The damsel there Medoro soon restor'd;
To wonted strength, but ah! meantime deplor'd
Her own deep wound, that rank'd in her heart
With heavier anguish, while an unseen dart 201
The light-wing'd archer, still on mischief bent,
From sparkling eyes, and golden ringlets sent.

Still, still she loves—and while her care is shown
To cure another's pains, forgets her own.
Through him she mourns, and while his sufferings
cease

Her wound but widens and her pangs increase.
He gains, she loses strength; and now, by turns,
With cold she freezes, and with heat she burns.
From day to day improv'd his beauty shines; 210
She, hapless maid, with wasting sorrow pines,

* Spenser has imitated this passage of Ariosto, relative to Medoro and Angelica, in his story of Belphebe and Timias the squire, where the virgin in like manner heals Timias; but in one respect the picture is reversed; Angelica in Ariosto is enamour'd of Medoro, but in Spenser it is Timias who feels a growing passion for Belphebe. Belphebe, like Angelica, is skill'd in the knowledge of herbs.

For she of herbs had great intendment.

"Ladies of great antiquity, of the highest rank, were skillful in physic and surgery. Who is ignorant of Medea the daughter of a king? of Circe, or of the wife of Thone, who taught Helena the use and nature of nepenthe? Let us turn to romance writers, no small imitators of Homer. Sir Philip Sydney in his Arcadia, p. 69, introduces Gynecia having skill in surgery. In like manner Erminia in Tasso attends and heals the wounded Tancred." See Upton's Notes on Spenser.

* The account of Zerlino is resumed in Book xx. v. 855.

* The last we heard of Angelica was in Book xii. v. 438.

Like fleecy snows⁶ that, in the warmth of day,
In heaps dissolve before the solar ray:
Sick with desire, from him she would receive
What only can her soul's dear health retrieve;
Yet fear'd that gentle bliss she sought to gain,
She from his proffer'd love might hope in vain;
Hence to her virgin shame she loo'd the ties,
And gave her tongue the license of her eyes;
Till he, unconscious of the wound he made, 250
Heard her with sighs implore his pitying aid.

"O brave Orlando! O Circassia's king!
What are the virtues that unheeded spring
In breasts like yours! In vain your boasted fame;
Where pow the meed your glorious labours claim?
Declare one courteous act, one kind regard
She e'er bestow'd your sufferings to reward.
O! couldst thou, princely Agrican, arise,
Restor'd from nether shades to upper skies!
O stern Ferrau! O thousands more unnam'd, 250
That oft her heart with truth and courage
claim'd;

How would you now with jealous pangs behold
A rival's happy arms her limbs enfold!"

Thus fair Angelica her grace bestows
On young Medoro, bids him pluck the rose
Untouch'd before, and range the hallow'd grove
Where never yet adventurous feet might rove.
 meantime the maid, to sanctify her fame,
With holy marriage rites conceal'd the shame:
Love present smil'd, and to the nuptial bed 240
The shepherd's wife the blushing fair one led.

(One happy month, befitting where they dwell'd
In humble roof, a rustic feast they held,
The damsel, never absent from his sight,
Hangs o'er her lover with untir'd delight;
For ever round him glues her twining arms,
And c'rasps his neck, and kindles at his charms.
With him in lowly cot, or leafy bower,
By night, by day, she wastes the fleeting hour.
At morn and eve by crystal streams they stray, 250
Or trace the verdant meadow's flowery way.
At sultry noon they seek a gloomy cave,
Like that which from the storm a shelter gave,
What time the Trojan prince and Trojan queen⁷
Their loves intrusted to the sacred scene.
Where'er a tree its verdant boughs display'd
O'er ribs and founts to cast a waving shade,
The knife and pointed steel the bark impress'd,
And oft the rocks their sportive toys confess'd.
A thousand parts reveal'd their mutual flames, 260
A thousand places show'd the lovers' names,
Angelica and her Medoro twin'd,
In posied wreaths and amorous knots combin'd.

Now rolling time reprovd the damsel's stay,
And urg'd her to resume her purpos'd way,
In India's realms, at rich Cathay to crown
Her dear Medoro on the royal throne.
Around her arm a golden circlet brae'd
Of rarest worth, with sparkling jewels grac'd,
In sign of brave Orlando's love she wore, 270
And long preserv'd the valu'd gift she bore.

⁶ Spenser probably had his eye upon this passage, in the lines describing the squire Timias falling in love with Belphebe.

Yet still he wated, as the snow conceal'd
When the bright Sun his beams thereon doth beat.
Fairy Queen, b. iii. c. v. st. 49.

7 Æneas and Dido.

To Ziliantes this Morgana gave⁸,
What time she kept him hid beneath the wave;

⁸ Morgana, the fairy of riches (see Note on Book vi. ver. 269.). Ziliantes was son of Mododant, and younger brother to Brandimart: he was beloved by Morgana, and after having been eighteen years detain'd by her in her subterraneous palace, was set at liberty by the valour of Orlando. The story of this fairy and her dwelling is full of imagination, and thus told by Boyardo.

Orlando, travelling to the assistance of Angelica, was met by a lady seated on a palfrey, having in her hands a book, and wearing at her girdle a rich horn of exquisite workmanship; she addressed the knight in this manner:

"Sir Knight, you have now met with a most wonderful and perilous adventure, which requires all the valour of such a champion as your appearance bespeaks you to be. This horn, which is made by enchantment, must be sounded three times, and every time of sounding the horn consult the book, which will instruct you what is further to be done: but if any knight should find his courage fail at the first blast of the horn, he will be for ever made prisoner in the island of the enchanted lake. The first and second time of sounding the horn will expose you to most dreadful and unheard-of perils; but the third time will finish the adventure, and put it in your power, without any further trial of valour, to make all the remainder of your life completely happy."

Orlando, having heard this, expressed his eager desire to undertake the adventure; and receiving from the lady's hand the book and horn, he sounded such a blast as made the earth tremble, and immediately a rock dividing in two parts, discovered a vast opening in the earth, whence rushed out two furious bulls with horns of iron, and hides of different colours. Orlando, upon having recourse to his book, was instructed to yoke the bulls and plough up the field that lay round the rock: this, after an obstinate battle with the bulls, he performed; and then setting them at liberty, they fled with dreadful bellows to the forest, and disappeared. Orlando sounded the horn a second time, when the earth again trembled, and a mountain near him opening, its summit cast forth flames in great abundance. While the knight impatiently waited for the issue, a huge dragon came forth of most tremendous aspect; his scales were green and shone with gold, his wings of different colours, he brandish'd beyond his sharp teeth three tongues, and made a dreadful noise with the lashing of his tail, while volumes of smoke, mixed with sparks and fire, issued from his mouth and ears. Orlando having again consulted his book, was ordered to attack the monster with the utmost celerity, and attempt to sever his head from his body before the poisonous fumes should have any fatal effect; this done, he was directed to take out all the dragon's teeth, and sow them in the furrows which he had just ploughed up. The knight then intrepidly advanced to attack the monster, who came towards him with wings extended, and opening his jaws to swallow him. Orlando found himself most dreadfully annoyed with the poison and fire; his shield was immediately consumed, his crest caught the flame, and all his apparel was nearly burnt to as he, while the smoke was so thick that he could not see to aim his blow, till at length by a fortunate stroke he cut off the head of his enemy, and drawing out the teeth, sowed them, as the book had directed, in the furrows of the new-ploughed field. Turpin relates, that immediately the crests of helmets began to appear above the ground, next, the breasts and shoulders of armed men, fill a numerous company with shouts and clamours, and the clangour of horns and trumpets, united their weapons, and furiously attacked the earl; but he, drawing his sword Durindana, and remounting his horse, received them with such valour, that the whole number were soon slain, and thus ended their life nearly as soon as it began.

It now remained to sound the horn for the last time, which Orlando having done, looked round to see the conclusion of the adventure; when nothing appearing, he began to think himself mocked: at length he beheld coming towards him through the flowery meadow a white stag, at which he exclaimed with great marks of disappointment, "Is this the wonderful end of my labours?" He then threw his book and horn on the ground, and was about to depart with indignation; but the lady stopping him cried out, "Stay, valorous knight, and learn that no king or warrior could ever meet with a more wonderful adventure than this; know, that thy work is not yet finished: not far from hence is a place called the island of Ribeca, where dwells the fairy Morgana, who is deputed by Heaven to dispense to mortals all the wealth that is enjoyed in this world: she hides her treasures in the bowels of the Earth, and has sent this white hind to enrich you, as a glorious recompense for your having three times sounded that horn, which no man before ever sounded a second time. The fairy sends through the world this stag, which is enchanted, and has, as thou seest, golden horns: he who wishes to take him must pursue him with unremitting vigour for six days, and on the seventh day he will stop by the side of a fountain to wash, and there suffer himself to be taken: this wonderful animal sheds his horns six times a day, every branch of his horns bears thirty ingots of gold: so that having obtained this stag, thou wilt be possessed of every happiness which wealth can purchase, and mayest moreover acquire the love of the fairy Morgana, whose beauty is unparalleled."

Orlando scarcely suffered the lady to finish her discourse, but replied with a smile, that he was not come thither for such intent, that he despised riches, and only sought for the reward that attends great and glorious actions*.

Upon this Orlando delivered the book and horn again to the lady, and resumed his journey towards Albracca.

Astolpho, Rinaldo, Iraldo, and Prasildo, travelling together, found a lady in great affliction, who related to them that her sister was fallen into the hands of a cruel giant, who having stripped her naked and bound her to a tree, scourged her from pipe to time in a most inhuman manner: on this the knights engaged to do their utmost to deliver her; and soon after all together arrived at a river, over which was a bridge so narrow that only one person could pass on foot: on the further side the river was a tower where the villain inhabited, and in the meadow a large and deep lake: the knight beheld the unfortunate woman tied to a cypress tree and bathed in blood, while her tormentor exercised his cruelty upon her. Iraldo and Prasildo, having first passed the bridge separately, attacked the villain, but were both overcome and cast by him to the bottom of the lake. Rinaldo then attacked him; and after an obstinate combat, the villain, in vain endeavouring to disengage himself from Rinaldo's hold, threw himself with Rinaldo into the lake, where both immediately sunk to the bottom and disappeared, leaving Astolpho in great affliction for the loss of his friend. The lady, who was tied to the tree, was released, and the two sisters with Astolpho departed, taking with them Rinaldo's horse Bayardo.

Orlando, having destroyed the garden of Falerina*, arrived, accompanied by that enchantress, where the abovementioned warriors with Dudson, who had since been made prisoner with them, were kept in the enchanted lake. The earl there beheld a trophy raised of the arms of Rinaldo, and supposing him to be slain, forgot all the enmity that had subsisted between them, immediately passed over the bridge to revenge his death, and furiously attacked Arridano, who lay in the meadow exulting over the trophy of Rinaldo. A dreadful battle ensued between them; for Morgana had not only given Arridano impenetrable armour, but had formed such a spell that the strength of the giant always exceeded six times the strength of every one with whom he was engaged. At length Arridano, seizing Orlando, as he had before Rinaldo, plucked with him headlong into the lake. Falerina, terrified at the sight, immediately fled; and as soon as the combatants reached the bottom, Orlando found himself in the middle of a beautiful meadow, surrounded by a wall of crystal. The knight, as he fell, endeavoured in vain to escape from the grasp of Arridano, but as soon as they touched the ground, his enemy loosened his hold and thought to strip him of his armour, when the earl renewed the combat with greater fury than ever, and at length, by the help of his sword Belisarda, against which no enchantment could avail, he deprived the enemy of life.

Orlando then, entering at a portal which he discovered in a rock, passed on for a long time in total darkness, till at last he discovered a light that shone like the Sun at noon day, when he came to the bank of a wide river, over which was a long narrow bridge, where stood the figure of an armed man all of iron, and beyond the bridge was a plain heaped with pearls and precious stones, more in number than the flowers that adorn the earth in spring or the stars of Heaven. This place contained the treasures of the fairy Morgana.

Orlando then with his drawn sword attempting to pass the bridge, the armed figure struck it with his mazy club, and the whole pile sunk immediately into the river; while Orlando stood gazing in admiration, another bridge appeared in the place of the former: the knight again attempted the passage, but the armed figure again raised his club, and the bridge sunk as before. Orlando thus baffled, yet determined to reach the further side, now exerting all his strength, with a prodigious effort leaped over the river, armed as he was, and alighted safe in the meadow, where entering into a large square building he beheld the figure of a king seated on a throne with numbers standing round him: they were all formed of gold, and covered with pearls, rubies, and diamonds; before the king was a table spread with a most magnificent banquet; but over his head was suspended a drawn sword with the point downward, and at his left hand stood one with his bow bent as ready to let fly an arrow: on his right side stood another, exactly resembling the former, holding a scroll in his hand with this inscription: "Riches and pomp are of no value if possessed with fear, and pleasure and greatness avail us nothing if acquired with the loss of peace." On the middle of the table, on a fleur-de-lys of gold, was a ruby of a prodigious size, which gave light to all the place, and on each side was a door that led from the saloon. Orlando, who paid little attention to the riches which he beheld, attempted to enter one of the doors, but found no light to guide his steps: recalling then to mind the carbuncle, he resolved to make use of it, and advanced to seize it, but the figure, that stood with his bow bent, immediately let fly an arrow that struck the carbuncle, which immediately flew off from the fleur-de-lys, and left the earl in darkness: a dreadful earthquake then followed, accompanied with repeated claps of thunder, while Orlando stood undaunted expecting the issue. The earthquake and thunder ceasing, the stone again took its place on the fleur-de-lys, and enlightened the saloon with more splendour than before. The knight attempted again to seize the carbuncle, but the archer again shot his arrow, and all was left in darkness; the thunder and earthquake returned, and continued above an hour, till the carbuncle once more resumed its station. Orlando, determined to pursue his purpose, rushed forwards intrepidly with his lifted shield, on which he received the arrow that fell ineffectual to the ground, he then took the stone without further opposition, and, directing his steps by the enchanted light, descended a staircase which led to a prison, in which were confined Rinaldo, Brandimart, and Dudon. Orlando beheld on a rock the following words engraven: "Whoever thou art, O knight or damsel! that hast reached this place, know that thou shalt never return, unless thou canst secure the fairy that inhabits these regions, whose locks grow only from her forehead, and who is laid behind." Orlando, having read this inscription, traversed a beautiful meadow enamelled with a thousand different flowers, and at last espied Morgana asleep by the side of a fountain; he stood some time in contemplation of her beauty, when he suddenly heard a voice that led him seize the fairy by her fore lock before she awaked and escaped his hands: at the sound of this voice Orlando turning, came to a rock of crystal, through which he beheld imprisoned Dudon, Rinaldo, and Brandimart: at this sight the earl, greatly afflicted, lifted up his sword to have hewn an opening in the rock, but the three knights called aloud to him to forbear, for should the rock be broken they must all inevitably perish. Orlando was then addressed by a beautiful imprisoned lady, who seemed in great affliction, and told him there was no way to enter the prison but by a gate which appeared of diamonds and emeralds, of which Morgana kept the keys; to procure which he must immediately return to the fountain, and endeavour to secure her person. The earl, impatient to enter the rock, hastened back to the fountain, where he found the fairy dancing, and singing these words: "Whoever is desirous to enjoy in this world wealth, pleasure, honours, and dignities, let him lay hold on this golden lock that I wear from my forehead, and I will fulfil all his wishes: but let him not forget the advantage in his power, since time past can never be recalled; I shall turn from him and leave him to lament his folly." So sung the fairy; but as soon as she beheld Orlando approaching, she immediately fled with the utmost speed, the knight pursuing her till they left the meadow, and came into a country full of briars and brambles; and now the sky was suddenly overcast, when from a dark cave rushed out a female figure of ghastly appearance, with a pale and mesgre countenance, holding in her hand a scourge, which she continually exercised on herself; but seeing Orlando hold Morgana in chase, she began to follow him, and when he demanded who she was, she replied, "My name is Repentance, and I am come to bear you company till the end of your course, during which you must feel the severity of my stripes." As she spoke thus, Orlando continued to pursue Morgana, while the hag close behind from time to time applied her scourge to him, nor could all his threats or valour free him from her persecution: at length he overtook the fairy, and fastening his hand in her lock, the hag, that till then had followed, immediately left him, the sky cleared up, the country assumed a smiling appearance, and, instead of thorns and briars, the earth was covered with odoriferous flowers. Orlando having stayed the fairy, demanded of her the keys of the prison; which she engaged to deliver to him, upon condition that he would leave behind Ziliante, the son of Monodant; to which Orlando agreed. Morgana then gave up the keys, and all her prisoners, except Ziliante, were set at liberty.

After Orlando had achieved this adventure, he fell with Brandimart into the hands of Monodant, who had long endeavoured to get Orlando into his power, in order to deliver him up to Morgana, who, on these terms, had promised to restore his son Ziliante: Brandimart persuaded his friend to make his escape, and remained behind in his stead. Orlando then repaired again to the enchanted dwelling of Morgana, when coming to the river and bridge, where he formerly encountered Arridano, he beheld a lady bitterly weeping and lamenting over the body of a dead dragon: while Orlando

This might the isle of tears she strangely kept,
(Where captive maids their cruel fortune wept.)

When, bound by savage hands, she naked stood
To feed the monster rising from the flood.

stood wondering at such a spectacle, the lady took the dragon in her arms, and entering a bark went into the middle of the lake, and suddenly disappeared. In the mean time another lady accosted Orlando: this was Flordeis, wife to Brandimart, who now implored the assistance of the earl for her husband, whom she supposed to be prisoner in the palace of Morgana, but was to her great joy acquainted that Brandimart had been already freed from that confinement, and that Orlando had once more undertaken the adventure of the lake to deliver Ziliantes from the fairy.

While Flordeis was making vows for the success of Orlando, the knight advanced towards a little gate concealed under a rock covered over with thorns and brambles, by which he lately left the subterranean dwelling: through this, after a long descent, he came, to the place where the golden king sat at the table, and passed on till he arrived at the garden of Morgana, where he saw the fairy by the side of the fountain with the beautiful youth Ziliantes, whom she was caressing with the utmost tenderness, but whose face was still impressed with a deadly paleness, through the cruel recollection of his late dreadful metamorphosis.

When Orlando, after having slain Arridano, had delivered the prisoner, and departed, Morgana, whose cruelty exceeded her beauty, by the force of spells and incantations, transformed the wretched Ziliantes into the shape of a fearful dragon, in order to place him as a guard to the bridge; but whether from a too powerful application of her spells, or from whatever other cause, no sooner had the youth assumed his new form, but he uttered a loud cry and expired. The fairy, inconsolable at this event, carried him back with her to her habitation, where by her powerful art she restored him again to life and to his own natural shape.

As soon as Orlando saw Morgana, he rushed upon her, and seized her by the locks, when she immediately had recourse to supplications, offering him infinite riches if he would permit Ziliantes still to remain with her; the knight, deaf to all her entreaties, took Ziliantes by the hand and led him up the passage by which he had descended; but before he released the fairy, whom he still held by the locks, he made her swear by Demogorgon, the terror of fairies, that she never more would disturb him with her incantations, Morgana having sworn, descended to her habitation, and Orlando with Ziliantes came out at the entrance of the rock, where they found Flordeis on her knees. All three then departed together for the court of Monodant, where Orlando delivered Ziliantes to his father, and where Brandimart, who had been stolen away in his infancy, was discovered to be the son of Monodant, and elder brother to Ziliantes."

Amidst all the extravagant wildness of these fictions of romance, the classic reader will discover many incidents taken from the heroic and mythological fables of antiquity: in perusing the adventure of the enchanted horn, achieved by Orlando in the beginning of this narrative, every one must remember the dragon of Cadmus, and the bulls of Jason. It has been already observed (See Note to Book vi. ver. 269.) that Spenser had undoubtedly in his eye the palace of Morgana, when he described the riches of Mammon; he has a man of golden mold, that, like the Italian poet's iron guard, defends a passage.

He brought him to a darksome narrow strait,
To a broad gate all built of beaten gold;
The gate was open, but therein did wait
A sturdy villain striding stiff and bold,
As if the highest God defy he would:
In his right hand an iron club he held.
But he himself was all of golden mold, &c.

Fairy Queen, book ii. C. vii. st. 40.

Mr. Warton gives an account of a book, entitled Geſta Romanorum, date supposed to be about 1473, where, among many wonderful stories, is a story, the latter part of which is very similar to this descent of Orlando to the palace of Morgana.

"There was an image in the city of Rome, which stretched forth its right hand, on the middle finger of which was written, STRIKE HERE. For a long time none could understand the meaning of this mysterious inscription. At length a certain subtle clerk, who came to see this famous image, observed, as the Sun shone against it, the shadow of the inscribed finger on the ground at some distance. He immediately took a spade, and began to dig exactly on that spot. He came at length to a flight of steps which descended far under ground, and led him to a stately palace: here he entered a hall, where were a king and queen sitting at a table with their nobles and a multitude of people all clothed in rich garments; but no person spoke a word. He looked towards one corner, where he saw a polished carbuncle which illuminated the whole room: in the opposite corner he perceived the figure of a man standing, having a broad bow with an arrow in his hand, as prepared to shoot. On his forehead was written, I AM WHO AM, nothing can escape my stroke, not even yonder carbuncle which shines so bright. The clerk beheld all with amazement, and entering a chamber, saw the most beautiful ladies working at the loom in purple; but all was silence. He then entered a stable full of the most excellent horses and asses; he touched some of them, and they were immediately turned into stone. He next surveyed all the apartments of the palace, which abounded with all that his wishes could desire: he again visited the hall, and now began to reflect how he should return; but (says he) all my report of these things will not be believed, unless I carry something back with me. He therefore took from the principal table a golden cap and a golden knife, and placed them in his bosom, when the man, who stood in the corner with the bow, immediately shot at the carbuncle, which he shattered into a thousand pieces; at that moment it became dark as night: in this darkness not being able to find his way, he remained in the subterranean palace, and soon died a miserable death."

Now wanting gold to give the simple pair,
The shepherd and his wife, whose honest care
Show'd, while the lovers abar'd their homely
board,

Such friendly welcome as their means afford,
This from her arm she drew, and had the swain
The valu'd treasure for her make retain. 291

Now tow'rd's the hills the happy lovers ride,
The steepy hills that France and Spain divide;
Thence to Valencia they direct their way,
Or Barcelon, there awhile to stay,
Till thence some vessel with propitious gale,
Should loose for eastern lands the spreading sail:

And now, descending from the mountain's height,
The sea below Garona struck their sight.
Thus journeying on, upon the sands they view 300
A naked man of pale and ghastly hue;
Like some foul swain he lies with brutal mien,
His sense distraught, his limbs with filth obscene:
He leaps upon them fierce (as unawares
A snarling cur the passing stranger scares)
And threatens sore to work them woe, and scorn:

But to Marphisa let us now return.¹⁰
To her, to Gryphon, Aquilant¹¹ again,
To good Astolpho let us change the strain,
Who spent with toil, while present death they
view'd, 310

But ill oppos'd the furies of the flood:
Three days the storm with ceaseless terror rag'd,
And gave no token yet of wrath assuag'd;
The hostile surge and wind's increasing power
From head to stern the planks and tackling tore;
And what unbroken seem'd the storm to brave,
The sailer hew'd and hurld into the wave.
One stands apart and marks with head declin'd
The vessel's course, as pale beside him shin'd
The lanthorn's gleam, and one with careful sight
The hold examines by the torches' light. 321

One at the prow, one at the stern explores
The glasses' sands that show the waning hours,
And oft returns to learn the vessel's way,
How far her track, and how her bearings lay.
Then in the middle ship, with chart in hand,
Each hastes where th' affrighted sailor-band
Their pilot meet, and mutual aid demand.

⁹ Ruscelli, the Italian commentator, has taken great pains to reconcile the seeming impossibility that Angelica should continue in possession of this bracelet, when she was stript naked by the people of Ebuda: he supposes that these islanders, who are represented so superstitious by the poet, might think it a more acceptable and honourable offering to Proteus, if they exposed the virgin with this ornament to be devoured by the monster, as the ancients were accustomed in their sacrifices to gild the horns of the victim, and decorate them with other idle ceremonies. But surely the poet might as well himself have thus accounted for the difficulty in his narrative: this may serve, however, as one specimen, among many others, of the genius of the Italian commentators, who would generally defend their favourite poet in the most glaring absurdity.

¹⁰ He follows Angelica and Medoro, B. xxix. ver. 413.

¹¹ Ramonetto is here omitted by the poet, though one of their company.

"Now to Limisso's fatal coast we steer is,"
Thus one began:—"Her dangerous sands appear!"
"See! Tripoly's sharp rocks," another cried, 331
"That oft the vessel's shatter'd planks divide."

One cries—"Behold us on Satalia borne,
Which many a mariner has cause to mourn."
Each reasons as he thinks, while every breast
Pale terror and despair alike possess'd.
Th' ensuing morn with greater force prevail'd
The wind and sea that still the bark assail'd.
At once the wind the shelter'd foremast tears,
And from the helm the sea the rudder bears. 340

Who fears not now must bear a breast of steel,
Or marble heart, unknowing how to feel.
Marphisa, she, who danger late defy'd,
No longer here her secret dread deny'd.
What vows of pilgrimage the seamen frame!
To Suisi, Rome, Fatino's virgin-dame¹²,
Galitia, Cyprus, but o'er all so dear,
That hallow'd tomb which Christian souls reverse!
Meantime aloft amidst the surging tides,
Amidst the clouds the groaning vessel rides. 350

The trembling pilot from the creaking mast
The mainsail cuts, and now he bids to cast
From poop or prow, into the greedy flood,
Huge chests and baies, with every useless load.
He clear'd each part, and to the roaring wave
Rich merchandize and shining treasures gave:
One ply'd the pump, from rushing streams to free
The ship; and to the sea return'd the sea:
Another watch'd where'er the surge be 'ppy'd 359
With lab'ring force the plank from plank divide.

Four dreadful days, on mountain-billows cast,
The seamen toil'd, and every hope was past;
When sudden breaking on their raptur'd sight,
Appear'd the splendour of Saint Ermo's light¹³;

¹² Called by the ancients Syrtis; certain dangerous sands on the confines of Afric near Egypt.

¹³ Some say, that by Ettino is meant a certain church dedicated to the Virgin Mary, built among the ruins of Aquileia: and so called from Utino, a rock in the city. Others say, that it is a place in Candia, called Tiso, where is a church dedicated to the Virgin famous for many imputed miracles.

Porcacchi.

¹⁴ Naturalists explain that these lights which appear to sailors are from natural causes, and believe that they not only are seen on the mast- or of ships, but also on the tops of lances in an army. It is however the firm opinion of mariners, that such phenomena are sent as marks of favour from their protector Saint Ermo, whose remains are held in great veneration at Gactu. Ruscelli.

Camdons in his Lusid describes these lights that are often seen in the time of a storm: Gama, giving an account of his voyage to the king of Melinda, says:

Those dreadful wonders of the deep I saw
Which fill'd the sailors' breasts with sacred awe;
And which the sages, of their learning vain,
Esteem the phantoms of the dreamful brain:
That living fire, by seamen held divine,
Of Heaven's own care in storms the holy sign,
Which midst the horrors of the tempest plays,
And on the blasts' dark wings will guiltily blaze;
These eyes distinct have seen that living fire
Glide through the storm and round my sails aspire.

Mickle, Book v.

Low settling on the prow, with ray serene
It shone, for masts or sails no more were seen.
The crew chafed saw the dancing gleam;
Each, on his knees, ador'd the favouring beam;
And begg'd, with trembling voice and watery eyes,
A truce from threatening waves and raging skies.
The storm (till then relentless) ceas'd to roar, 371
South, East, and blustering North were heard no
more:

Now reign'd sole tyrant o'er the seas extent,
Th' inclement West, while from his mouth he sent
A powerful blast, and with it urg'd along
The fanny current, terrible and strong;
That drove the flying bark with swifter force
Than strength of wing impels the falcon's course,
While the pale pilot dream'd his vessel lost,
Or driven beyond our world to ocean's utmost coast.

The wary seaman hence his skill applied, 381
And from the poop amidst the tumbling tide
His anchor cast; to the anchor, slipp'd at need
With hawker huge, states their fearful speed.
By this, but chief by Heaven's preserving aid,
Whom happy omens, on the prow display'd,
Revolv'd their hope, the ship securely rode,
That else had sunk entomb'd beneath the flood.

Now from Laiazzo's gulf the Syrian lands
They see, where high a peopled city stands, 390
Of circuit wide; and nearer they survey
A fort on either side to guard the bay.

Soon as the pilot well the land espies,
On his pale cheek the frighted colour dies:
He loaths the hateful coast; yet would he try
The deep once more, he knows not how to fly:
His masts and yards are lost, and rent away
His sails and tackling scatter'd o'er the sea,
The wretch whom fate ordains these climes to gain
Is made a captive, or un pity'd slain. 400

While thus they pause'd, the seamen fear'd to view
Embarking from the shore a numerous crew,
With vessels arm'd against their ship, unite,
Unfit for sea, but more unfit for fight.

While thus in fearful doubt the pilot stands
Which course to take, the English knight demands
What secret thoughts his wavering breast divide,
And why he sought not in the port to ride?
To whom the pilot thus—"You hostile strand
Is lin'd with women¹⁵, whose inhuman hand, 410

"This phenomenon is thus accounted for in natural history: The sulphureous vapours of the air, after being violently agitated by a tempest, unite, and when the humidity begins to subside, as is the case when the storm is almost exhausted, by the agitation of their atoms, they take fire, and are attracted by the masts and cordage of the ship.
Being thus naturally the pledges of the approaching calm, it is no wonder that the superstition of sailors should in all ages have esteem'd them divine. In the expedition of the Golden Fleece, in a violent tempest, these fires were seen to hover over the heads of Castor and Pollux, who were two of the Argonauts, and a calm immediately ensued.
After the apotheosis of these heroes, the Grecian sailors invoked these fires by the names of Castor and Pollux, or the sons of Jupiter."

Mickle's Note to the above passage.

¹⁵ This strange story of the Amazons is not to be found in Boyardo. Ariosto in this fable seems

By ancient law, each stranger-guest consigns
To death relentless, or in chains confines:
He only 'scapes, whose arms in measure'd field
Can make ten champions to his prowess yield;
And next, at night, a softer conflict prove,
To win ten females in the lists of love.
Should he t' achieve the former task suffice,
But in the second fail, he surely dies!
He dies! and, destin'd to ignoble toil,
His friends their cattle feed, or torn the soil! 420
In both the trials should success ensue,
He gains full freedom for his social crew,
Himself un-free— for husband he remains
Of ten fair females, as his choice ordains."

Astolpho heard, nor could from laughter hold
At this strange custom by the pilot told.
Now Sansonetto, now Marphisa near,
Now Gryphon with his brother came to hear
Why thus aloof the shatter'd bark remain'd,
Nor with her crew th' inviting harbour gain'd. 430
"Here let me perish," thus the pilot spoke,
"Ere bow my neck to such ignoble yoke."

Alike with him agreed the sailor crew:
Not so Marphisa and the warlike few,
Far other they, who safer deem'd the shore
Beset with arms, than seas whose tempests roar;
Who more the billows fear'd and wrecking sands
Than weapons brandish'd in a hundred hands.
This—every place—they held secure from fear,
Where'er their grasp could wield the sword or spear,
Eager they burn the hostile strand to gain; 441
But England's warrior, foremost of the train,
Demands to land; his magic horn he knew
(If arms should fail) would every force subdue.
Now divers parts they took: one loudly cried,
To make the port; as loudly one denied.
At length the pilot, urg'd by stronger force,
Unwilling to the harbour shap'd his course.

When first discover'd on the distant hood,
Full in the cruel city's view they stood, 450
The mariners beheld a galley leave
The land, and with a crew the billows cleave
T' assail their wretched bark, while unresolv'd
Uncertain scorches their jarring breasts revolt'd.
Now to the prow and stern th' invading train
Huge cables fix, and through the dashing main
Impel the hulk, till urg'd by strength of oars
And drawn with toil it gains at length the shores.
Meantime the knights their lumb's in armour case,
And by their sides the trusty falchion place, 460
And strive, with dauntless looks and words, to cheer
The pilot's doubts and ease the seamen's fear.

The spacious harbour like a crescent bends,
And four long miles in winding course extends:
From horn to horn a narrow mouth appears,
And at each horn a fort its summit rears.
The natives fear no foes can e'er prevail
Till fortune from the south their walls assail.
Built like a theatre in wide extent
The circling city reach'd the hill's descent. 470
No sooner enter'd, when, by rumour blown,
The ship's arrival through the land was known,
And arm'd with bows in all the dress of war,
Six thousand females to the port repair.
A range of ships from rock to rock they place,
Each hope of flight from every breast to chase, to have blended the accounts of the Amazons of antiquity with those of the women of Lemnos.

And with huge chains, prepar'd for such design,
Close up the mouth and all within confine.
A hoary matron, who in length of years
Like Hecuba or Cuma's maid appears, 480
Like pilot calls, and wills him to reply
If there his wretched partners choose to die;
Or wiser, as the country's laws declare,
Subjoin their necks the servile yoke to bear?
To each the choice is offer'd—there to fall
Or with freedom—or survive in hopeless thrall.

" 'Tis true, should one amongst you dare engage,"
She cries, "with ten th' unequal fight to wage:
These should he slay, and next in one short night
Woo ten fair damsels to the nuptial rite, 490
With us a sovereign's rank he shall possess,
And you, if such your will, depart in peace:
Or all, or part, securely here may live,
The choice is yours, and these the terms we give:
Who here in freedom would remain, must wed
Ten females to partake his marriage bed,
But should your champion in the listed field,
Though living, to the ten in prowess yield,
Or want the powers the second prize to gain,
We will that you be slaves and be he slain." 500

The beldame thus; but where she deem'd to meet
With doubt or terror, found a dauntless heat
In every knight: each on himself relies,
And hopes in either list to win the prize.
No less Marphisa's heart with courage glows,
Though for the second task her sex she knows
But ill prepar'd, yet hopes she to supply
With sword the gift that Nature might deny.
Their answer then, in general council weigh'd,
The pilot to the hoary dame convey'd: 510
That one amongst them stood prepar'd to prove
The task of battle first, and then of love.

No more oppos'd, the seamen now secure
Their anchor, and on land the vessel moor.
The bridge is cast, and from the deck proceed
The shining warrior and the prancing steed.
Amidst the city with surprise they view
The mighty numbers of the female crew.
With shorten'd venture part on horseback swarm,
Or in the crowded square like warriors arm. 520
The men nor spear, nor sword, are seen to bear,
Nor ought of weapons that pertain to war,
Save only ten—and these, as late I told,
(No ancient custom wills) their lances hold.
The rest attend the loom, the needle ply,
Or twist the wool, or cull the various dye:
Adorn their limbs hang matron garments flow,
Their mien is feminine, their pace is slow.
Some kept in chains, at will their tyrants send
The lands to culture, and the herds to tend. 530
Few are the males, and scarce the region round
A hundred for a thousand females found.

The knights who deem'd by lot to fix his name,
Whom arm might for the rest the combat claim,
Would from the chance the martial dame¹⁸ withhold,

By sex unfit amidst their names enroll'd
Both pains to win; but she with noble pride
Will with her peers the fated scroll divide:
On her it fell—"I first in fight will die
Fre you," she cried, "in cruel bondage lie: 540
This steel" (and as she spake her trusty sword
She grasp'd) "your pledge of safety shall afford.

With this I mean each fatal tie to loose,
As Alexander cut the Gordian noose.
While Earth endures, no stranger shall again
Of this dire law and cruel lead complain."
Thus she; and what her favouring fortune sends
Each knight allows, and to her arm commends
The glorious charge such numerous foes to brave,
And fall in battle, or their freedom save. 550

Now ready clad in mail and cuirass bright,
She hastens to the field, and claims the fight.
Far in the city was a square enclos'd,
And set apart with seats around dispos'd,
To please the vulgar herd with many a fray
Of wrestling, tournament, and martial play.
Four brazen gates, that open in the place,
Admit the press, while through the crowded space
Arm'd females throng, where, blending hope and fear,

They bid Marphisa in the list appear. 560
The virgin enters on a dappled steed
Of colour grey, of more than common breed;
Small was his head, his joints were strongly knit,
Proudly he paw'd and champ'd the frothy bit;
Fire flash'd his eyes—this from a thousand more,
Of generous strain in Novantino's stow, [brave,
The monarch chose, and deck'd with trappings
The regal present to Marphisa gave;
Who, entering at the south, where on the gate
The mid-day shone, stood still the charge to wait;
Nor waited long, when, echo'd sharp and clear, 570
The trumpet's clangour wrung in every ear.
Then from the portal of the north she saw
Her ten opponents to the combat draw.
The first bold knight, who look'd himself a host,
Seem'd in his arm the force of all to boast.
The list he enter'd on a courser's back
Of strongest frame, and more than raven black,
Save that his front and hindmost foot display'd
Some snow-white hairs amid the dusky shade. 580
Clad like his steed in sable weeds of woe
The champion came, as if he meant to show
An emblem of his own distressful state,
How small his comfort, and his griefs how great?

The trumpet sounds, and, to the charge address'd
At once nine warriors place the lance in rest:
But he, the mourning knight, whose noble heart
Disdains th' advantage, stands awhile apart;
How'er compell'd in such a hateful cause,
Resolv'd in this his will should bend the laws: 590
Apart he stands, the conflict to survey,
And see one lance with nine dispute the day.
The steed with easy pace and steady force
Bore the brave virgin to th' unequal course,
Who wielded in her grasp as huge a spear
Scarce four suffic'd th' enormous weight to rear.
This from the ship, with wary choice, she bore,
The stoutest beam amidst a numerous store.
So fierce she came, with such a dauntless look,
A thousand cheeks grew pale, a thousand bosoms
shook. 600

Swift through the first, as if his fearless heart
No armour wore, the furious steed she press'd.
His iron-pleated shield, with strength impell'd
The weapon pass'd and through the cuirass held,
The point drove on, till smarr'd with vital blood,
Through back and breast a foot behind it stood.
The virgin left the wretched warrior slain,
And turn'd against the rest with hoarsen'd rein:
Against the second bold advancing for,
And next the third, she dealt so fierce a blow, 610

¹⁸ Marphisa.

That either's spinal bone the weapon broke,
 And both at once their seats and life forsook.
 Together now the remnant six engag'd
 The gallant maid, and war unaid wag'd.
 So have I seen a bomb the ranks divide,
 As fierce Marphisa pierc'd the martial tide:
 Against her corselet javelins smapt in vain,
 While she unmov'd could every stroke sustain.
 In tempest thus not more the fencing wall
 Resists the impulse of the bounding ball. 620
 In vain the force of hostile weapon sought
 To pierce her arms of purest temper wrought;
 By magic wrought in Styx's burning steam,
 And hissing plung'd in black Acheron's stream.
 Now at the barrier bounds awhile she stay'd,
 Then wheel'd her courser, and with brandish'd blade
 The rest assail'd, her victory pursu'd,
 And to the elbows dy'd her arms in blood.
 From this a band, from that she lops the head:
 On one the ghostly sword so just is sped, 630
 Head, arms, and breast fall sever'd on the plain;
 The legs and belly on the steel remain.
 Thus half the man (a dreadful sight) appear'd:
 So holy pilgrims fly, to the saint rever'd,
 For members hea'd, of wax or silver frame
 The ports restor'd, and in their patron's name
 Suspend the pious gift to him whose aid they claim.
 One, as the list he led, she swift pursu'd,
 And ere he reach'd the midst asunder hew'd
 His head and bleeding trunk, that never art 640
 Of surgeon could suffice to close the part.
 Thus by her valour each in turn was slain,
 Or lay extended senseless on the plain,
 That well she knew by never more could rear
 The massy buckler or the pointed spear.

The knight, who in the list retir'd alone,
 Beheld the nine by one brave arm o'erthrown,
 Now spur'd his steed to show not fear detain'd,
 But courtesy his generous arm restrain'd;
 Then beckoning with his hand he first began 650
 To ask a parley ere the course he ran;
 And little thinking that with man's array,
 Conceal'd in martial weeds a virgin lay,
 Graceful he spoke—"Thy spirits, valiant knight,
 May surely droop in such unequal fight;
 Nor will I be thy now in arms oppose
 That strength already spent with numerous foes.
 Till morn I give thee from the field to rest.
 Then mayest thou turn to fresher strife address:
 So shall thy sword a noble combat claim, 660
 Nor with thy vigour's sweat pollute my fame."

"To warlike toils these limbs have long been bred:
 Nor have I toil'd so far," Marphisa said,
 "But to thy cost, I trust, thou soon shalt find
 My nerve and spirit of a nobler kind.
 Thy words, the proffer of a courteous breast,
 I praise, but seek not yet so soon to rest:
 Still shines the day, and 't were a shame for knight
 To lose in sloth the yet remaining light."
 The stranger then—"O! that thy woe-struck mind
 Could gain as sure each god it pants to find, 671
 As thou from me thy fill of arms shalt taste,
 And find perchance the day too quickly waste."

* This similitude alludes to the custom in the Jewish church of making limbs of wax, ivory or silver, which the pilgrims hang up as an offering dedicated to the saint, by whom they are supposed to be healed of any disease or lameness.

He said; and straight two heavy lances, wrought
 Like ponderous masts, he bids with speed be brought;

To bold Marphisa's head the choice he gives,
 The spear which she rejects himself receives.
 The trumpet sounds—the conours shake the ground,
 Earth, air, and sea, the thundering charge resound.
 With eyes unmov'd each mute assistant stands; 680
 No word, no breath, is heard through all the bands:
 No fix'd was each to mark with longing gaze
 Which knight would win the palm of knightly
 praise.

Marphisa aims her spear with matchless force,
 To hurl the sable warrior from his horse,
 No more to rise; nor less the sable foe
 Thinks with a thrust to lay Marphisa low.
 Like sapless ozers seem'd each lance's length,
 Not form'd of chosen ash with massy strength:
 Up to the rest they shiver'd with the stroke; 690
 And either stood confest the mighty shock:
 At once, as if a scythe with sweepy force
 Had cut the nerves, down sank each bounding horse.

Marphisa, at her first assault, had known
 A thousand warriors from their saddle thrown,
 And she, who ne'er before receiv'd defeat,
 Now (strange to tell!) was tumbled from her seat,
 Struck with the chance, with more than rage oppress'd,
 A sudden madness seem'd to inflame her breast:
 Alike the sable knight appear'd to grieve, 700
 Not lightly went in field his seat to leave.
 Scarce had they touch'd the ground, when either stood

On foot recover'd, and the fight renew'd,
 Each weapon's edge and point by turns they ply'd;
 With sword and shield they fear'd, or leapt aside
 To shun the stroke: the well-aim'd stroke rebounds
 The stroke that miss'd, in losing air rebounds.
 In secret to herself Marphisa said:
 "In happy hour for me this warrior stay'd;
 Nor in the fight his nine companions led: 710
 This day might else have mix'd me with the dead;
 Since now, sore labouring in the doubtful strife,
 Scarce from his single arm I guard my life."
 Marphisa thus; yet ceas'd not, as she spake,
 To wield her sword and ward each coming stroke.
 Not less the stranger thus his fortune bless'd;
 "In happy hour this knight refus'd to rest:
 Since now I scarce defend me from his might,
 Already wearied with so fierce a fight,
 Had he with morn his vigour lost renew'd, 720
 What fortune might have then my arms pursu'd!
 Great were my risk in this contested place,
 Had he accepted late my proffer'd grace."

The battle lasted till declining light,
 Nor seem'd th' advantage to the came or knight;
 And now so deep the shades increasing grow,
 Not this, nor that, can ward the threatening blow.
 Now darkness clos'd—when to the glorious maid
 With courteous mien the generous warrior said—

"What can we more, since night obtrudes her veil,
 While yet the battle hangs in equal scale? 731
 I hen hear—O chief! awhile prolong thy life,
 At least till morn revives the noble strife;
 If to thy wasting days a single night
 I only graze—no blame on me must light:
 Condemn the law of this accursed race,
 The female sex that rule this hated place,
 But us, from whom no art the truth conceals,
 Knows if for thee and thine my human-feels,

Thou, and thy fellows, mayst with me reside, 740
With others danger will thy sleep betide.
Against thee now conspire the female train,
Whose husbands by thy conquering hand are slain.

For know that each, who by thy arm lies dead,
Ten wives possess'd: hence ninety females led
To seek revenge (unless with me you rest)
Might in the dead of night your sleep molest."

Marphisa then—"I gladly shall receive
The fair asylum which thou deign'st to give:
Secure in thee such virtuous faith to find 750
As suits thy courage and exalted mind!
Mourn not my life as doom'd to thee by fate,
Thy own, perchance, may find a shorter date;
Nor can I think as yet thy actions show,
With mine compar'd, thyself a mightier foe.
Then, as thou wilt, the combat urge or stay;
Or meet by moon-light, or by light of day:
Whatever thou seek'st, behold me ready still,
Each hour a warrior's duty to fulfil."

Unfinish'd thus they left the glorious fight, 760
Till from the Ganges shone the golden light.
To Aquilant, to Gryphon, all the train
Of gallant champions, came the knight humane,
With generous suit to each by turns address,
Beneath his hospitable roof to rest.

All gladly yield, and now with cheerful blaze
Or torches' light, the lord his guests conveys;
They reach his regal dome, where every room
With splendour shone and labours of the loom.

Now from each head the martial helmet rais'd
The two brave combatants with wonder gaz'd. 771
The stranger-knight was'ish and fair of hue,
His downy cheeks but eighteen summers knew.
The virgin marvell'd much his arm could wage
Such dreadful battles in so green an age:
Nor less he wonder'd, when her helm unclos'd
Her flowing locks and beautiful sex expos'd,
His foe but late!—now each with like demand
Inquires the other's actions, name, and land.

But who the youth, while to seek forbear, 780
The book ensuing shall his name declare.

BOOK XX.

THE ARGUMENT.

The champion of the Amazons discovers himself to be Guido of the house of Clarnont, and gives an account of the history and first establishment of the Amazon government. The warriors consult together on the means of quitting the country. Marphisa would persuade them to effect it by force of arms. Guido takes the management upon himself; and next morning they attempt to break through the whole body of the Amazons, but are nearly overpowered by numbers, when Astolpho, blowing his horn, drives all the Amazons before him. Sansonetto, Guido, Gryphon, Aquilant, and Marphisa, being terrified with the rest, precipitately hasten on board the ship prepared for them, and leave Astolpho behind them. The knights and Marphisa afterwards landing, Marphisa parts from the others. Her encounter with Gabrino, Pinabello, and lastly with Zerbino.

In fields of battle¹ and the Muses' love,
What wonders have been wrought by dames of yore,
Whose skill in arms and letters spreads their praise
Throughout the world to their far-distant days!
Camilla and Harpalice², renown'd

In hardy camps, with wreaths unfading crown'd,
And Sappho and Corinna³, held so high
For learning's sacred gifts, shall never die.
Oppos'd to man, behold the beautiful race,
In every science, our renown'd efface; 10
And each, who turns the leaf of story past,
Shall undiminish'd see their honours last.

Though such examples seem of late to fail,
Not always evil influence shall prevail, [revers'd,
When those, whose writings should their worth
Through ignorance or envy oft conceal:
Yet in our times, I see with joyful eyes
Such countless virtues in the sex arise,
As well may claim the pen and faithful page
To hand them down to every future age. 20
Then slanderers' tongues no more with canker'd speech

Shall taint those glories which they cannot reach;
But to such height shall soar the female name,
As e'en to leave behind Marphisa's fame.

To her we now return—The dame address'd
The courteous knight, and answer'd his request.
Eager to know the youth, she soon reveal'd
In few, her dreadful name, till then conceal'd:
"Marphisa am I call'd!"—no more she said,
For fame through every realm the rest had spread.
The stranger then—"All here, I trust, may know 31
The glorious stock to which my birth I owe!
Not only France, and Spain, each neighbouring
land,
But Æthiop, Ind, and Pontus' frozen strand,

¹ This introduction seems to have been copied and enlarged by Spenser in his Fairy Queen.

Where is the antique glory now become,
That whilom woot in women to appear?
Where be the brave achievements done by some?
Where be the battles, where the shield, and spear, &c. ? Book iii. c. iv. st. 1.

² Camilla, queen of the Volscians, a female warrior, who came to the assistance of Turnus, and was treacherously slain by Aram. See Virgil's Æn. vii. xi. Harpalice was a warlike virgin of Thrace, who, when the Getæ, a people of Scythia, had made her father prisoner, collected together a body of troops with great celerity, suddenly attacked the enemy, cut a great number to pieces, and set her father at liberty.

³ Sappho, a well-known poetess, born at Lesbos. See her Epistle to Phaon, in Ovid. There were three of the name of Corinna, all skilled in letters. One was of Thebes, one of Theſpis, and the third of Corinth. The last lived at the time, and is supposed to have been the favourite, of Ovid; but the most famous was she, who, in a trial of poetry, conquered the great poet Pindar. Her glory seems to have been fully established by the public memorial of her picture exhibited in her native city, and adorned with a symbol of her victory. Pausanias, who saw it, supposes her to have been one of the handsomest women of her age. Time has left us only a few scraps of Corinna's poetry.

Have heard of Clarmont's far-resounding name,
Whence the bold knight⁴ who slew Almonter
came;

And he's, by whom the fierce Mambrino slain
(His kingdom laid in ruin) press'd the plain.
That blood i' boast—and near the Euxine waves,
Where Ister with his streams the region lavas, 40
To Amon's duke (who on that fated shore
His wanderings ended) me Constantia bore.
One year has roll'd, since her, in sorrow lost,
I left to seek my friends on Gallia's coast:
But, midst the voyage, rose a stormy wind,
And hither drove me from the port design'd.
Ten months have past, since here detain'd, unknown
The lingering hours, and curse each day's return.
Guido the Savage⁵ am I call'd—a name
Scarce yet recorded on the list of fame. 50
Here, with his ten companions, in Mated field,
I Anglion of Meliboea kill'd.

Next the soft conflict with the dames I tried,
And now too wedded partners grace my side,
Whom, fairest, gentlest of the female band
I chose, and rule with uncontrol'd command.
Thus shall be fare, whom, on the fated day,
Prevailing Fortune gives the ton to slay."

The warriors question'd Guido, whence so few
The males appear'd, and why the female crew 60
Each husband to their sovereign will compell'd,
When males in other lands dominion held?

Then Guido answered—"Often while detain'd
I have here liv'd, I heard the cause explain'd,
And what I heard, shall tell, since you demand—

"Now twice ten years elaps'd, the Grecian
bands

From Troy return'd to view their native lands
(Ten years the siege endur'd, as many last
On adverse seas, they rov'd from coast to coast)
Arriv'd, they found their wives, who vainly try'd
To bear such absence, had their place supply'd 71
With young gallants, whom to their love they led,
No more to freeze in a forsaken bed.
The Grecians finding with another's breed
Their dwellings fill'd, by joint consent agreed

⁴ Orlando.

⁵ Rinaldo.

⁴ This character appears to have been introduced by Addison, as no such name occurs in Bayardo. Spenser has a knight with the appellation of "Savage knight," which seems given him not from any reproach, but merely to express a disposition insur'd to hardy feats, and stranger to the softness of a court.

It was a goodly swain, and of great might,
But in vain shews, that wont young knights
And courtly services took no delight. [bewitch,

It was, to weet, the good sir Satyrans,
That rang'd abroad, to seek adventures wild,
As was his wont, in forest and in plain.
He was all arm'd in rugged steel, unfill'd,
As in the smoky forge it was compill'd,
And in his scutcheon bore a satyr's head.

Fairy Queen, B. iii. c. vii. st. 29.

Again, in another place.

—On his shield was writ,

"Selvage man finest," shewing secret wit.

This explanation may serve for Ariosto, who has assigned no reason for giving this name to Guido.

To' excuse th' offence; for each well knew his wife
Could ne'er so long forget the nuptial life:
But the sad children, born of lawless love,
Must exil'd thence a vagrant fortune prove:
Nor would the husbands so entail disgrace, 80
To nourish, at their cost, a spurious race.

Some were expos'd, and some with better fate
Their mothers kept conceal'd to man's estate.
Some, from their native seats, in various bands,
As chance directed, rov'd to foreign lands.
Some arms persw'd; some chose the students toil;
Some follow'd arts; some plough'd the rustic soil:
These liv'd in courts; these serv'd the herds to rear;

As best it seem'd to her⁷ who governs here.
"Departing with the rest, a youth was seen, 90
Of Clytemnestra born, the cruel queen;
His age eighteen, and fresh in bloom as shows
The lily fair, or newly gather'd rose.

He, in a ship with all provision stor'd,
For wealth and prey each creek and coast explor'd.
A hundred like himself compos'd his band,
With care selected from the Grecian band.

The Cretans, that Idomeneus expell'd,
The wretched sire⁸, who Crete's dominion held,
And next, collecting arms and troops, prepar'd 100
Their new establish'd state from foes to guard,

Egeid⁹ Phalantus (so the youth was nam'd)
With ample stipends, as his merits claim'd,
To serve their soldier, while his comrades all
With him they join'd to guard Dictamnus' wall.
A hundred cities grac'd the Cretan lands,

But chief above the rest Dictamnus stands,
Wealthy and fair, renown'd for amorous dames
Of lovely form, for pleasures, sports, and games.

"The dames, accustomed kindly to receive 110
Each foreign guest, to these such welcome give,
That little wanted to the Grecian train

O'er every house to hold their boundless reign:
Vigorous as fair, the youths their ardour prove
In blending raptures, as in kindling love.
To win the fair a few short days suffic'd,
Till these o'er every joy their lovers priz'd.

"Now peace restur'd, Phalantus was releas'd
From warlike cares, the soldier's labour ceas'd,
And every hope of future stipend¹⁰ o'er,

The youths decreed to quit the Cretan shore.
The mourning females tears incessant shed,
As if they view'd their dearest parents dead:

Full oft apart they urg'd them to remain;
But when they found each fond outcry vain,
Resolv'd with them their voyage to partake,
Their brothers, sires, and children they forsake,

While from her home each bears, by wary stealth,
Rich gems of price, and countless sums of wealth;
And with such secret care her dwelling leaves, 120
That not a man of Crete their flight perceives.
So prosperous was the hour, so swift the wind,
So well Phalantus had their course design'd,

⁷ Fortune.

⁸ Idomeneus, king of Crete, having vowed, in case he returned in safety from the siege of Troy, to offer up the first object that presented itself, was met by his own son, whom, to keep his vow, he caused to be sacrificed. His subjects, struck with the barbarity of the action, banished him from his kingdom. See the whole story at full in Telemachus, book ii.

That many a league his vestal plough'd the tide,
 Ere those of Crete their heavy loss describ'd.
 At length this fated strand, then scarcely prest
 By foot of mortal, gave the wanderers rest.
 Securely here they stay'd, and here awhile
 At leisure weigh'd the profits of their guile.
 Ten days to them this region seem'd a seat 140
 Of amorous pleasures, and a bliss retreat.
 But, as it oft befalls, the fullest joy,
 In youthful bosoms, sooner tends to cloy.
 All now agreed to free them from the charge
 Of female mates, and live again at large.
 For sickle man ill brooks the heavy lot,
 To keep the woman when the love's forgot!
 Eager of rapine, ready to contend
 For ravag'd wealth, but little prose to spend,
 They saw a troop, so numerous and so fair, 150
 Requir'd far other than a soldier's care.
 For this, their wretched partners they forsook,
 And loaded with their spoils, their course they took
 To where, in Puglia, near the sea-beat shores,
 They founded fair Tarantum's future towers.

"The dames, abandon'd on a desert coast,
 Betray'd by those in whom they trusted most,
 Along the sands some days in silent grief
 Like statues stood; but finding no relief 159
 From plinths or tears, they turn'd them to debate,
 What means might best relieve their hapless
 state:

When, what her thoughts suggested, each disclos'd:
 Some to regain their native Crete propos'd,
 And rather dare the worst they might engage
 From a wrong'd husband or a father's rage,
 Than hid in deserts, or in forests lie,
 With want to linger, or with famine die.
 Some said, they never to such shame would bend,
 But rather, plung'd in seas, their being end;
 And urg'd it better far, with honour lost, 170
 Though poor, or slaves, to rove from coast to coast,
 Than willing victims, to their native clime
 Returning, meet the sentence of their crime.

"Such wretched thoughts, and still more wretched,
 ed, rose

In every breast, from sense of present woes.
 At length a female, Oronthea nam'd,
 Stept forth, who kindred from king Minos claim'd:
 The youngest, fairest of the beauteous band,
 Less guilty she, of all who left the land,
 To brave Phalantus had her virgin charms 180
 Resign'd, and fled for him her parent's arms.
 Now while her speech and outward looks express'd
 The indignation of a generous breast,
 She first condemn'd what each had singly mov'd,
 Then urg'd that counsel which the rest approv'd.

"She will'd them there to dwell, for there they found

A wholesome air, and fields with plenty crown'd;
 Clear silver streams, that through the country
 stray'd,
 Rich spreading meads, and forests thick with shade;
 Fair ports and bays, that from the stormy wave
 To wandering seamen ready shelter gave; 191
 That now from Afric, now from Egypt brought -
 Their barks, with every store and treasure fraught.
 She urg'd them there to abide, and for the sake
 Of those who wrong'd them, heavy vengeance take
 On all the sex; and every vessel tract
 By tempests, driven to shelter on the coast,
 Pillage and burn, assail with fire and steel,
 Nor let a single life their mercy feel.

"Thus counsel'd she—till all alike inflam'd 200
 With cruel thoughts, the new-made law proclaim'd.

"When winds fore-run a storm, the desperate train

Of females arm'd, rush headlong to the main:
 Their fury ruthless Oronthea guides,
 Who, made their queen, above the rest presides.
 Whate'er devoted strangers touch the strand,
 But 'scape the seas to perish by the hand
 Of mad revenge, where fire and sword assail
 Till not a wretch remains to tell the tale.
 Thus some few years the widow'd females show
 A settled hate of man, their mortal foe. 211
 But, should they still persist, they soon must find Certain destruction hovering o'er their kind.
 Should no young offspring from themselves descend,

Their state, their name, their vengeance soon must end,

Which to remotest times they labour'd to extend.
 Their rigour then relax'd, and every crew
 Explor'd with care that to their region drew
 In four succeeding years, from thence, at length,
 Ten knights they chose, of manly form and strength;
 Whose youthful vigour, bred in amorous games, 221
 Suffic'd to meet in love their hundred dames.
 A hundred form'd their whole, and every ten
 One husband claim'd: but e'er the chosen men
 Their safety found, what numbers lost their life;
 All found unequal to the arduous strife!
 The ten, in trial well approv'd, they take,
 And partners of their bed and kingdom make;
 But swear them first, that every wanderer led,
 Of every rank, those hapless shores to tread, 230
 Without distinction by their swords shall fall -
 And one remorseless slaughter swallow all. [fear

"The dames, now pregnant grown, began with
 To view the day of their delivery near.
 Lest in succeeding time the numbers born
 Of issue male, should hold their law in scorn;
 And they, at length, behold in evil hour
 To hated man revert their darling power.
 For this they sought such danger to repel,
 Ere years had taught their children to rebel 240
 And threat their freedom; hence a law decreed
 The mother's care one only male should breed.
 Their new-born sons from shore to shore they sent,
 With charge to those who thus commission'd went,
 To exchange the boys for girls in distant lands,
 Or put, at least, return with empty hands.
 Nor had the dames in mere compassion spar'd
 A single man, save but their herds to guard,
 And keep alive their name; and thus was shown
 Their law's stern mercy to themselves alone! 250
 All others felt its rage, one only grace
 The strangers found, that when they reach'd the place

They fell not all at once beneath this cruel race.
 If ten, if twenty, or if more arriv'd,
 In chains they lay, of liberty depriv'd;
 Whence every day was drawn, by fate decreed,
 A wretch devoted in the fane to bleed;
 Where, in the midst, by Oronthea rear'd,
 A dreadful altar to Revenge appear'd.
 While arm'd by lot, one held the ready knife, 260
 To shed, in sacrifice, his comrade's life.

"Long years had past, when to th' inhuman
 A noble youth his luckless fortune bore; [shouts
 From great Alcides' stock his birth he claim'd,
 In arms experienc'd, and Etiope nam'd.

Him, careless of a foe, and unprepar'd,
 At once they seiz'd, and with a numerous guard,
 With all his crew, detain'd in cruel thrall,
 Sad victims destin'd by their laws to fall.
 Fair was the youth, of semblance rarely seen, 270
 Of graceful carriage and commanding mien;
 So from his lips the honey'd accents broke,
 That reason'd asps might listen while he spoke.
 From fame the news of his arrival caught,
 To Alexandra's gentle ear was brought;
 Fair Alexandra, born of her who sway'd
 The sceptre still, though now with years decay'd:
 Still Oronthea liv'd, but none surviv'd,
 Save her alone, of all that first arriv'd;
 While as their years increas'd the female crew 280
 Increas'd in strength, and in dominion grew.

"Ten knights, renown'd for deeds of arms a-chiev'd,

With hostile welcome, all that came, receiv'd.
 Not Alexandra, eager to behold
 A youth whose praise report so loudly told,
 To Oronthea her request preferr'd,
 And saw Elbanio, and his converse heard.
 But when she sought to go, her virgin heart
 Felt the first throbbing of an amorous smart.
 In vain she struggled: she at length remain'd 290
 A helpless prisoner by her captive chain'd.

Elbanio then—'O fairest of thy kind!
 If pity here could e'er reception find,
 Pity, which dwells where'er the Sun display'd,
 Gives trints to objects, and gives light to shade,
 Pity would I now (by those transcendent charms,
 Whose powerful influence every gazer warms)
 From thee request my life, that what I owe
 To thee prolong'd, for thee I might bestow:

But if dire fury here the virgin steels 300
 To each soft passion human nature feels,
 I ask not life—such hopes I know are vain,
 But let me yet a warrior's right obtain.
 Whate'er my fate—O! give me but to wield
 My glorious arms, and die with spear and shield!
 Not like some criminal whom laws arraign,
 Or brutal beast before the altar slain.'

"Fair Alexandra, in whose lovely eyes
 Compassion pleas'd for the youth, replies:

"Though savage is our land, more cruel known 311
 Than every realm, yet think not I shall own

Each woman a Medea—were the mind
 Of all our females in destruction join'd,
 Yet I alone would rise above my kind:
 Or if, like many a soul with fury steel'd,
 I seem'd till now unknowing how to yield,
 Till thy arrival here, perchance there came
 No stranger that might equal favour claim.
 But sure, some tigress has my soul inflam'd,
 And more than adamant my bosom fram'd, 320
 If, when I view thy valour, form, and age,
 Compassion chase not all vindictive rage.

O! would to Heaven I might as well arrest
 Th' infernal law that binds each wretched guest,
 As freely now my death I would receive,
 And, with my own, thy better life relieve!
 But here no rank avails to break thy chain,
 And what thou ask'st, though little, hard to gain:
 Yet all I can—expect—while much I dread
 New sufferings hang o'er thy devoted head! 330

'Let me but meet,' Elbanio thus rejoind,
 'The ten in arms—so firm my heart I find,
 I trust I'll escape with life the bloody fray,
 And every foe, though trebly arm'd, to slay.

"To this the virgin-fair made no reply,
 But from her bosom drew a tender sigh.
 She went, and parting, in her heart she found
 A thousand shafts, and each a cureless wound;
 Then sought her mother, and with earnest prayer
 Inclin'd the queen the noble youth to spare; 340
 On this condition, that in listed fight
 The ten should perish by his single might.

"Queen Oronthea then the female train
 To council call'd, and thus her speech began:
 "'From every crew whom chance may hitbet seed,

We still should place the bravest to defend
 Our port and shores: by trial must we chuse,
 What fits our wants to take, and what refuse,
 Lest, to our wrong, the coward soul should rise
 To reign amongst us, while the valiant dies. 350
 If with my judgment, you, O friends! agree,

Let us henceforth a sovereign law decree,
 That every knight, by fortune hither led,
 Ere in the dreadful fane his blood we shed,
 Shall (in such compact if he dares engage)
 At once with ten the combat singly wage;
 And should he conquer all, he, with a train
 Of chosen others, shall our guard maintain.
 Thus far I speak, since in our prison lies

A captive, who to battle ten defies. 360
 Should he their equal prove—forbid it Heaven!
 But to such worth some favour should be given:
 Or should he fail in what he rashly dares,
 He meets the punishment himself prepares.'

"Thus Oronthea to the council said,
 When from the eldest one this answer made:

"Th' important cause whence we to change began

Our first design, and commerce hold with man,
 Was not to guard our state from foreign hands;
 For this our constant souls, our valiant hands, 370
 Might well suffice—O! could we but extend
 Our race as well, which time, alas! must end
 Without the help of man—and hence we make
 Our choice of youths, but only one we take
 To wed ten dames, lest man the sovereign sway
 From us should rend, and we in turn obey.
 We need not males our empire to defend,
 But must for progeny on these depend.

In this alone their prowess we require,
 Nor other aid, nor other task desire. 380

To keep a chief whose nervous limbs combine
 The strength of ten, must frustrate our design.
 If such a troop his single arm can slay,
 How many women shall he hold at bay?
 Were such our present ten, one fatal hour
 Had to themselves transferr'd the ruling power.

Ill suits it us, who wish to hold command,
 To intrust our weapons in a stranger's hand.
 Grant that thy boasted youth so far succeed,
 That by his arm our chosen ten should bleed; 390
 A hundred women, widow'd by his sword,
 Shall see their husbands' deaths with tears deplor'd:
 Then, should he 'scape with life, let him fulfill
 Far other task than ten brave youths to kill:
 If with a hundred dames he will supply
 The place of those they mourn, he shall not die.'

"Artemia thus her cruel thoughts display'd
 (So was she nam'd); and had her counsel sway'd,
 Elbanio, in the temple's dire abodes,
 Had fall'n a victim to th' infernal gods. 400
 But Oronthea, with a mother's love,
 Reply'd, and, every hearer's mind to move,

Their reasons urg'd, that most, with one consent,
Their suffrage yielded for the queen's content.
Elbanio's matchless graces, deep impress
With powerful charm in every youthful breast,
Against those elders weigh'd, whose ruthless mind
With fierce Artemia's rigorous sentence join'd
To enforce their ancient law; while some agreed
(No terms premis'd) Elbanio should be freed. 410
At length 'twas fix'd, the youth should grace obtain,
When in the list his arm the ten had slain,
And next, not with a hundred consorts try'd
A husband's fondness, but with ten supply'd.

"Th' ensuing day, to liberty restor'd,
The knight receiv'd his armour, steed and sword:
Alone against the warrior ten he stood,
And one by one he shed their vital blood:
At night, to show in Cupid's school his art,
With ten fair dames he play'd the lover's part; 420
Who, taught by him connubial joys to prove,
All rose experienc'd votaries of love.

"For this the youth with Oronthea won
Such added grace, she chose him for her son,
And gave him Alexandra's charms to wed;
With her the other nine, all whom he led,
Ten virgins late, to share his genial bed.
She left the youth with Alexandra fair, [their,
(From whom the land was nam'd) her kingdom's
On this condition, that his future reign 430
Might still this statute through the realm maintain;
That every wanderer there should lose his life,
Or meet ten warriors in unequal strife;
Those could he first in dangerous combat foil,
Then find, with ten fair dames, his fortune smile;
'E'er these he should provide, and at his will Dismiss his consorts, or their places fill;
And hold the sway, till to the land arriv'd
Some foreign knight that him of life depriv'd.

"Two thousand years have roll'd, since first was plann'd 440

This hateful law, and still it rules the land.
Few days elapse, but for a sacrifice,
Some hapless stranger in the temple dies.
Of whom, as chance directs, a fearless knight
Dares, like Elbanio, arm him for the fight,
Before th' opponent's foot his life he lays,
And, ah! how rare the second proof essays!
Such have been found, but such so rare befall,
That on the fingers we their names may tell.
Of these was Argilan—but little space 450
He with his wives maintain'd the sovereign place;
For, hither driven by tempests from the deep,
I clos'd his eyes in everlasting sleep.
O had I shar'd that day his envy'd death,
And not prolong'd in bonds a shameful breath!
Gay pleasure, smiling sports, and amorous toys;
Each soft delight that youth like mine employs;
Rich vests and jewels that the person grace;
And, midst his peers, pre-eminence of place,
Heaven knows avail but little him, who cross 460
By envious Fortune, has his freedom lost!
Ah! wretch! that while I thus my bonds deplore,
Must never hope to quit this hateful shore!
To see vile sloth my fairest flower destroy
In prime of life, enbitters every joy.

* A ludicrous expression, to denote how few adventures had been successful in their trial with the Amazons. The words are literal from the Italian.

The fame of Clarmont wide her wings extends
To highest Heaven from Earth's remotest ends!
O! to my brethren's could I join my name,
My deeds with theirs might honour's portion claim!
Hard is my lot, condemn'd a life to lead 470
In such vile service, like the wretched steed,
That blind, or lame, or with enfeebled force,
Unfit for battle or the dusty course,
Is with his fellow-brutes, that turn the soil,
Condemn'd to every task of servile toil!
Since death alone from such detested thrall
Can set me free, on welcome death I call."

Here Guido clos'd his tale, and curs'd the day
That gave him o'er the land detested sway;
Gave him from either field the prize to bear, 480
To slay the champions, and to please the fair.

Astolpho silent stood, awhile conceal'd,
Till now by many a certain mark reveal'd,
In him his kinsman Guido well he knew,
Who by an alien's bed his birth from Amon drew.

Then thus—"Behold the English duke confess'd,
Thy own Astolpho here,"—he said, and press'd
The youthful champion with a close embrace,
While tears of pleasure trickled down his face.

"What proof so certain, could we here receive? 490
What proof, dear kinsman, could thy mother leave
To speak thy birth, like what thy sword has shown
In glorious fight, to stamp thee for our own?"

Guido in every land, save this, had view'd,
With joyful greeting, one so near in blood;
But saw him now with grief, since well he knew,
The conquest his, destruction must ensue
To England's noble knight: Astolpho freed
From fear of death or chains, himself must bleed;
Where this good fortune finds, to that must ill
succeed. 500

He mourn'd, that when his arm had won the fight,
Eternal bonds must wait each hapless knight;
Nor (should he perish in the doubtful strife)
Could each in freedom better hold his life.
If in the first their champion's arms prevail,
A female in the second field must fail.
Marphisa hence would conquer him in vain,
When victim she must fall, and captives they remain.

No less the valour of the generous youth,
His early manhood and heroic truth, 510
Such pity kindled in Marphisa's breast,

Such thoughts inspir'd in every valiant guest,
That freedom which his death alone could give,
On terms like these they wish'd not to receive;
And if Marphisa with his life must buy

Her comrades' safety, she with him would die.
To Guido then—"Unite thee to our band,
And let us quit by force this hated land."

"Such hopes, alas! are fruitless," he reply'd,
"Our combat only must our fate decide." 520
Then she—"This heart through fear shall never shun

The glorious task my arms have thus begun:
Nor know I any safer means to try,
Than what my sword and own right hand supply.
Such in the battle have I prov'd thy might,
With thee I dare the most unequal fight.
When, on to-morrow's Sun, the vulgar crew
Shall throng the theatre our jourt to view,
Let us on all our deathful rage dispense, 525
On those that fly, and those that make defence;
To wolves and vultures cast their bodies dead,
And see the flames on all their city spread."

"Behold me ready," fearless Guido tried,
 "To join thy arms, and perish by thy side;
 But never must we hope with life to fly;
 Suffice that unreveng'd we shall not die.
 Oft have I told, of this infernal race,
 Ten thousand females in the crowded space:
 As many guard the castle, walls, and strand,
 That none, unquestion'd, can depart the land." 540

To whom Marphisa—"Be their numbers more
 Than Xerxes muster'd on the Grecian shore;
 Than those rebellious spirits¹⁰, justly driven
 To endless pains from blissful seats of Heaven,
 Be thou my aid—at least, assist not those;
 One day shall see me rout this host of foes."

Then Guido—"Hear what haply may prevail,
 All other means are vain if this should fail:
 Know, none but females ever make resort
 To view the harbour or frequent the port. 550
 Of all my wives, in one I chief confide,
 By many a proof of long affection try'd.
 Alike with me, would she desire to break
 My slavish bonds, could she my fight partake,
 So from her rivals might she hope to prove
 The single partner of my future love:
 She in the bay, ere morn has clear'd the air
 From murky shade, a pinnace shall prepare,
 Which, empty stor'd, your mariners shall find
 To plough the deep and catch the favouring wind.
 You close behind my guiding steps pursue, 561
 Knights, merchants, seamen, (a determin'd crew),
 United firmly; every welcome guest
 That here has deign'd beneath my roof to rest.
 Should aught oppose to intercept our course,
 Your arms and valour must a passage force;
 And thus, I trust, with spear and sword in hand,
 To set you free from this detested land."

"Act as thou wilt," Marphisa thus reply'd,
 "I for my safety in myself confide. 570
 First by this trusty weapon's edge shall fall
 Each foe enclos'd within this fatal wall,
 Ere any eye behold me flying here,
 Or aught, that in this bosom argues fear:
 Let me, with diat of arms, by day depart:
 All other ways ill suit the dauntless heart.
 Yet were my sex disclos'd, a woman's name
 Would fair regard from every female claim.
 Here might I dwell esteem'd in highest grace,
 And midst their senate hold an honour'd place; 580
 But since with these I came, with these to share
 One common fortune is alone my care;
 Nor would I poorly freedom here retain,
 Or hence depart while these in bonds remain."

Marphisa thus, and by her words made known,
 That more her comrades' safety than her own
 Restrain'd her ardour; lest on them should fall
 Those mischiefs, which she sought to avert from all.
 Else had she loosen'd on the female kind
 Her generous wrath; but now with cooler mind
 To Guido's conduct she the day resign'd. 591

Guido, by night, his faithful dame address'd,
 Aleria, of his consorts lov'd the best;
 Nor needed much to move her gentle mind
 To second what her dearest lord design'd.
 A ship she chose with due provisions stor'd,
 And all her wealthiest treasures plac'd on board;
 Then, with her comrades, feign'd at morning break
 In search of spoil a venturesome cruise to make.
 Meanwhile, beneath her roof she bade prepare 600
 Spears, bucklers, swords, each implement of war;
 With these against th' unnumber'd foes to stand,
 To arm the merchants and the sailor band.
 All night, against surprise, the guard they keep,
 By turns they hold the watch, by turns they sleep;
 And stealth'd in armour wait, with longing eyes,
 To see the dawning red in eastern skies.
 Scarce had the day begun with beamy light
 To chase from Earth the gloomy veil of night;
 Scarce had the offspring of Lycaon¹¹ driven 610
 The early ploughshare through the fields of Heaven,
 When in the theatre, the female throng,
 To view the combat, pour'd in heaps along:
 Thus, o'er the threshold of their peopled hive,
 When spring returns the bees in clusters drive.
 With trumpets, drums, and horns, that echo'd
 round,

The tumult thickens; Earth and skies rebound;
 While thus their lord¹² they summon'd to the fight,
 To end his battle with the stranger knight.

In armour Guido, Sansonetto came, 620
 Gryphon, and Aquilant, the martial dame¹³,
 With England's duke¹⁴; and next a mingled
 crowd,

Some march'd on foot, and some the steed bestrode,
 From Guido's dwelling, to the port and bay,
 Their passage through the list of combat lay.
 Thus said the youth, and urg'd the valiant crew
 His bold example fearless to pursue.

Silent he led them on, resolv'd to dare
 The dreadful trial in the public square.
 He enter'd now, a hundred in his train, 630
 And eager strove the adverse gate to gain;
 In vain he strove, while countless throngs enclos'd,
 And with their glittering arms his course oppos'd.

Soon as they saw him head his following band,
 They deem'd he meant with those to leave the land:
 At once they seiz'd their loss, their shafts prepar'd,
 And swiftly rush'd the portal's pass to guard.
 Guido, his bold compeers with dauntless breast,
 But chief Marphisa, brave above the rest,
 Forget not now their dreadful swords to ply, 640
 And every means to force the passage try.
 But now so thick the arrows rain around,
 That wounded some, some lifeless press the ground,
 Deep, and more deep, th' unequal conflict grows,
 Till valour shrinks before such host of foes:

¹¹ By the offspring of Lycaon, the poet means Arcas, son of Callisto, and grandson of Lycaon, said to be placed among the stars, and called Boötes. He is feigned by the poets to be a husbandman in Heaven, and to drive the northern waip, here, perhaps by rather a forced construction, supposed to have been a plough.

See Ovid. Met. b. ii.

¹² By this is meant Guido, who, as the poet tells us, for his singular valour had obtained a kind of sovereignty over the Amazons.

¹³ Marphisa.

¹⁴ Astolpho.

¹⁰ Some critics have condemned Ariosto for making Marphisa, a Pagan, (or rather Mahometan,) allude to the fate of the angels, one of the traditions of the Christian church: but to this it may be answered, that the Mahometan religion has adopted many tenets of the Mosaic and Christian faith; and that, among others, the Koran refers to the Rebellion in heaven. Ruscetti.

In happy gaze each warrior's temper'd arms
 Defend his bosom from invading harns,
 Beneath him Sansonetto's steed is slain,
 And near him falls Marphisa on the plain :
 Then thus Astolpho thought—"What dangerous hour

Can better claim my horn's subduing power? 651
 Since all our swords avail not—let us prove
 If this, as wout, can every fear remove."

Thus he, and to his mouth the horn applies :
 The Earth resounds, and echoes rend the skies.
 Each startled breast is seiz'd with sudden fright,
 Each ready foot is turn'd to speedy flight;
 These from their seats aghast and trembling fall,
 Those undefended leave the gates and wall.
 As, when deep slumber every eyelid seals, 660
 Where, by degrees, the flame close-lurking steals
 From beam to beam, till all around it preys;
 Sudden awaken'd in the fiery blaze,
 From room to room the shrieking wretches fly,
 From roofs and windows leap, while from on high
 Some scape by falling, some by falling die.
 Thus, careless of her life, and wild with fear,
 Each flies the sound that thunders in her ear.
 At every gate at once a thousand press;
 Heaps fall on heaps; the driving throngs increase,
 And choke the passage: numbers trod beneath 671
 Are slain; and numbers meet untimely death
 From gates or ramparts cast: one sudden dies;
 One, with crush'd limbs, a lingering victim lies!

Dire is the tumult, mingled cries ascend,
 And loud laments the starry regions rend.
 Where'er the horn is heard, they speed their pace;
 Nor wonder if the vile ignoble race
 With coward looks and panting hearts appear,
 Since nature forms the dastard here to fear: 680
 But how of bold Marphisa shall I tell?

Of Guido Savage, prov'd in fight so well?
 Of Olivero's⁴ sons, whose martial praise
 Such lasting honours to their house could raise;
 Who late whole armies view'd with fearless eye,
 And now, bereft of courage, trembling fly?
 They fly like timorous doves, or helpless deer,
 What time some strange approaching noise they
 To every friend and foe alike is found [hear. 690
 The speilful terror of the magic sound :
 Guido the brave, and Sansonetto, yield;
 The brethren⁴, and Marphisa lately steel'd
 To every chance, attempt to shun in vain
 The fearful din which still their ears retain.

Meantime Astolpho through the city goes,
 And with new breath his horn terrific blows,
 One gains the sea; one climbs the mountain's side,
 And one in gloomy forests seeks to hide.
 Some traverse many a league of country o'er,
 And some review their native seats no more: 700
 While some, t' escape from land, would stem the wave,

And find in ruthless seas a watry grave.
 Each house, or dome, is now an empty space,
 And all the city shows a desert place.

Marphisa, Guido bold, the brethren two
 Gryphon and Aquilant their flight pursue;
 With these the merchants and the sailor train
 In equal terror through the beaten plain;
 And now they come where near the castle rides
 A vessel which Aleria's care provides: 710

With speed embarking, they forsake the shore,
 Hoist every sail, and bend to every oar.

The city clear'd, Astolpho seeks the strand,
 In hopes again to join his social band.
 Now here, now there he turns, but views in vain
 Th' abandon'd port, till casting tow'rd the main
 His eager eyes, at distance far he sees
 The vessel sail before the favouring breeze!
 Forsaken thus, he other thoughts revolves
 To quit the realm; and many a scheme resolves. 720
 But let him go⁴, nor heed though thus we make
 The gentle duke his lonely journey take
 Through barbarous realms, and unbelieving lands,
 Where constant danger constant fear demands.
 Yet wherefore should he fear, whose horn display'd,
 In every danger brings resistless aid?

Now let his frighted friends our care divide,
 Who quit the land, and plough th' unstable tide,
 Full swell their sails, till distant from the shore
 The horn, so late their dread, is heard no more!
 One terror now dispell'd, the fear of blame 731
 In every feature lights the glow of shame:
 They dare not meet their comrades' eyes, but stand,
 With down-cast eyes, a mute dejected band.

The pilot on his course by Cyprus glides,
 By fertile Rhodes; and cuts th' Egean tides.
 A hundred islands vanish from his sight;
 With these the Maleas cape, a dangerous height.
 Then scudding onward, with a steady wind,
 He leaves the Greek Moors far behind. 740
 From Sicily, the Tyrrhene surges crust,
 He sails by Italy's delightful coast;
 And now to Luma's wish'd-for port he bends,
 And hails his home and long forsaken friends;
 In thanks to Heaven for all his trials o'er,
 By storms at sea and perils on the shore.

The warriors here with bold Marphisa find,
 In happy time, a ship for France design'd.
 The pilot these invites; the willing train
 That day embarking, soon Marselles they gain. 750

It chanc'd that Bradamant, whose noble hand
 Deputed rul'd, was absent from the land:
 Else had they, by the generous maid detain'd,
 Beneath her friendly roof awhile remain'd.
 They quit the ship—Marphisa bids adieu
 To Guido's dame, to all the knightly crew.
 "It ill becom'd, in one same troop," she cried,
 "To view so many knights of valour tried:
 While doves and storks are seen together join'd,
 And deer and stags, with all the timorous kind; 760
 The falcon fierce, the royal eagle's race,
 Bears, lions, tigers, beasts that know not fear,
 Unaided still, and single still appear."

Such were her words, though not alike they weigh'd

With all the rest; but hence the wondrous maid
 The champions leaves, and travels thence, alone,
 Through unfrequented woods and paths unknown.
 Gryphon the white, and Aquilant the black,
 Guido and Sansonetto find the track 770
 That to a castle led, whose courteous lord
 Gave each a welcome to his bed and board:
 Courteous at least he seem'd, while each deceiv'd,
 His plausive words and semblance fair believ'd;
 But, soon as sleep at night their eyes oppress'd,
 He seiz'd them while they lay secure at rest;

⁴ Gryphon and Aquilant.

⁴ He follows him, Book xiii. ver. 31.

Now from the captives would their chains withdraw,
Till each had sworn to observe a cruel law.

But ere we further speak ⁷ what these befel,
The deeds of brave Marphisa let us tell. 780

Druena past, the Seine and Rhodan's stream,
At length she near a lofty mountain came;
There by a flood, with sudden waters swell'd,
An aged dame in sable woods beheld:

With travel spent she seem'd, and sore distress,
But more with heavy thought than toil oppress'd.
Lo! this was she, who, far from haunts of men,
Had liv'd with outlaws in the savage den;
Where Heaven the Paladin Orlando drew,
To wreak full justice on that impious crew. 790

The beldame fearing death, (and why such fate
She seem'd to fear, the sequel shall relate,
Through fields and forests fled remote from sight,
And shunn'd to meet the face of hind or knight.
She sees the vesture of the martial dame,
With foreign arms, a stranger born proclaim;
And hence she flies not, as she flies from those Whose garb a warrior of the country shows.
Beside the stream she waits, and now she meets
Th' approaching knight, and low saluting, greets,
Beseeching, on his steed to waft her o'er 801
Th' opposing torrent to the further shore.

Marphisa, courteous from her earliest years,
Across the flood the ancient beldame bears,
And, past the ford, disdains not to convey
Behind her courier, till they pass'd a way
Heavy with sough—when clad in armour bright,
With trappings rich, they met an unknown knight,
Gay pacing tow'rs the stream; with him a dame,
And single squire (his sole attendant) came. 810
Fair was the dame he brought, but fair in vain,
Her haughty carriage cast a deepening stain
On all her beauty, while her scorn and pride
Seem'd well-befitting him that grac'd her side.

This knight was Pinabel, whose treach'ry gave
To Bradamant the fall in Merlin's cave.
His sighs were breath'd, his scalding tears were shed

For her, whom now beneath his care he led;
For her, whom then the magic tower detain'd:
But when Atlantes' guile no more restrain'd 820
His captives, freed by brave Dordona's¹⁸ dame,
She, not unmindful of her former fame,
To Pinabel return'd, and with him still Wander'd from tower to tower, o'er forest, dale, and hill.

Soon as she view'd Marphisa's aged crone,
The shameless fair, to taunting ever prone,
No more the venom of her tongue suppress'd,
But gave full vent to many a scornful jest.
Then brave Marphisa, little us'd to bear
Another's insult, or unpunish'd hear, 830
Indam'd with anger, to the dame replies:
His partner should with her dispute the prize.
Of beauty's bloom, with offer on her knight
To touch the proof: and these the terms of fight,
That, if o'erthrown her lover press'd the field,
The damsel should her vert and palfrey yield."

Here Pinabello, rous'd by sense of shame,
To accept the challenge and defend his dame,
His spear and hockler raising, wheel'd his steed,
And on Marphisa rush'd with wrathful speed. 840

Her mighty spear in rest Marphisa held,
And full on Pinabello's helm impell'd
The forceful stroke that hurl'd him to the plain,
Where stunn'd he lay, as number'd with the slain.
At length he rose; when, victor of the day,
Marphisa from the stranger rent away
Her glittering ornaments and youthful vest,
And with the spoils her aged beldame dress'd;
Then on the palfrey plac'd, which late before,
With other grace, the haughty damsel bore. 850
This done, she turn'd, the way with her to hold,
Who seem'd by dress still more deform'd and old.

Three days they journey'd on, ere aught befel
In length of travel, worthy here to tell.
The fourth they met a knight, who, bent on speed,
With goring rowels urg'd his flying steed:
Zerbino nam'd, the king of Scotland's son,
For manly beauty fam'd and battles won:
Of vengeance late defrauded, on the hand
Who dar'd his godlike mercy to withstand. 860

In vain Zerbino long, incens'd, pursu'd
The bold offender through the devious wood,
Who knew so well to wind each tangled brake,
So well th' advantage of the ground to take,
That, shelter'd by surrounding shade, and veil'd
In misty vapours by the morn exhald,
He scap'd pursuit, resolv'd himself to hide,
Till time should bid his prince's wrath subside.

Though ill-dispos'd, Zerbino could not hold
From laughter, when he view'd the beldame old,
Whose youthful habit seem'd so ill to grace 871
Her dotting age and wither'd homely face.
Then to Marphisa, prancing at her side:

"Thy prudence merits praise, air Knight," he cried,
"That, choosing for thy mate so fair a dame,
Thou seem'st not fear a rival in thy flame."

By sallow hue, and wrinkled skin, appears
Th' ill-favour'd hag¹⁹ beyond the Sibyl's years.
A grandame ape she looks, in gamesome sort,
With vesture clad to make the vulgar sport: 880
Her eyes askance, with spite and anger roll'd:—
What hurts a woman more than to be told
The world entitle her deform'd and old?

The noble maid, here feigning wrath, to try
What haply might ensue, made this reply:
"She whom I guard, I swear by Heaven, has more

Of beauty's claim than thou of courteous lore.
Thou seem'st to her transcendent graces blind,
To veil the baseness of thy dastard mind.
What other knight, that here should chance to meet
A maid so young, in every charm complete, 891
By one defended, but his strength would prove
To win in her the sweet reward of love?"

"So well with thee she suits," Zerbino cries,
"Twere much injustice to dispute the prize;
Nor shall I, lost to sense, my arms employ
In such a cause—thou, what thou hast, enjoy.
Yet, if thou seek'st with me in fight to join,
On other terms I shall not this decline.
But think me not so blinded, for her sake 900
In listed field a single lance to break.

¹⁹ Dolce, the Italian commentator, here gravely observes, that the poet particularly dwells on this circumstance, to denote the years of Gabrina; and sagely concludes, that wrinkles are a mark of old age!

¹⁷ He returns to these, Book xxii. ver. 372.

¹⁸ Bradamant.

Homely or fair, with thee she shall abide,
Nor will I love, so aptly pair'd, divide.
Heaven knows, you both are join'd beyond compare,
If thou art valiant as the nymph is fair."

Marphisa then rejoin'd—"In thy despite,
To win this damsel must thou prove the fight:
N'er shalt thou view her beauties with desire,
And not to win those peerless charms aspire."
"I know not who," Zerbino made reply, 910
"For such a conquest would the combat try;
Where courting danger with unfruitful pains,
The victor loses while the vanquish'd gains."
"Since terms like these displease thee, hear me make

Another offer which thou well mayst take,"
Marphisa answered; "if in joust, to thine
My arms submit, this dame shall still be mine;
But, if I conquer, her thou shalt receive;
Thus be our trial who the prize shall leave.
Should Fortune bid thee now resign the day, 920
'Tis thine to guard her as she points the way."
"Agreed"—Zerbino said, and, speaking, wheel'd
His rapid courser to dispute the field:
Firm on his stirrups with collected might,
He stood; and, to direct his spear aright,
Against her buckler drove the pointed wood;
Which, like a mount of steel, the shock withstood;
While she, with better nerve, his helmet found,
And instant hurl'd him senseless to the ground.

Zerbino, thus unhors'd, such shame confess'd,
As ne'er till then his generous soul depress'd. 931
Full many a warrior had his spear before
Cast from their seats: but now he fears, no more
His arm shall clear his fame; while, lost in thought,
New anguish in his pensive bosom wrought,
To think henceforth, by sacred promise plight,
Himself constrain'd to rest the belidame's knight.

High seated on her steed, the conquering maid
Turn'd with a smile—"Accept my gift," she said;
"The more I see the dame in beauty shine, 940
It joys me more to see such beauty thine.
Then, in my place, her champion's charge sustain,
Nor let thy faith, so lately pledg'd, be vain.
Whate'er she bids, it fits thee to obey,
Guide of her fate, and partner of her way."

She stay'd not for reply, but left the knight,
And soon the forest shut her from his sight⁹².
Then to the crone he spoke (for sure he deem'd)
His conquering foe a warrior as she seem'd),
"Give me to hear what knight has stain'd my fame!" 950

The belidame answer'd, eager to proclaim
What known would grieve him more—"On yonder land

Thou fall'st," she cried, "beneath a virgin's hand;
A virgin, who for valour well may wield
The warrior's falchion and the warrior's shield;
Who flow from eastern realms, with sword and
Is come to prove the Paladins of France." [Jance,
At this, Zerbino's soul indignant glow'd,
While o'er his visage flush'd the changing blood;
Through all his frame the deep contagion spread,
And e'en his armour seem'd to blush with red. 961
Remounting on his steed, he cur'd in vain
The nerve that could not late his seat maintain.
The hag in secret smil'd, and every art
Of malice try'd to afflict his generous heart

With cruel taunts, and bade him call to mind
What chance had now to bear his will resign'd.

Zerbino heard abash'd, nor aught reply'd,
Constrain'd the worst, like weary steed, to abide,
That feels the bit in mouth, and rowels at his side.
In frequent sighs he gave his anguish vent: 971
"What dire reverse," he cried, "has Fortune
While she, the first in virtue as in charms, [sent!
Untimely torn from these desiring arms,
Is dash'd on rocks, or given the precious food
Of ravenous fish and fowls that haunt the food.
Lo! her, that, buried in her earthly bed,
Should long ere this the hungry worms have fed,
Thou now preserv'st beyond her loathsome date,
To add new torments to my wretched state." 980

Thus spoke Zerbino, hapless and forlorn:
Nor less in words and looks he seem'd to mourn
His odious mate, by luckless chance acquir'd,
Than loss of her whom most his soul dear'd.

If still your mind retains what once I told,
This hag was she who left the cavern'd hold,
Where Isabella, who Zerbino held
In love's soft bonds, some days a prisoner dwell'd:
Oft had she there rehears'd her story o'er,
How first she left her dear paternal shore: 990
How, shipwreck'd on the sea and shely strand,
She saved her life on Rochelle's welcome land.

Oft would the love-torn maid delight to tell
Of lost Zerbino; oft with rapture dwell
On every grace. Soon as the belidame nigh
Had mark'd his mien and face with heedful eye,
She deem'd in him she view'd the noble youth
By Isabella wept with matchless truth;
Whose absence to her soul more sorrow gave
Than cruel bondage in the outlaws' cave. 1000

But when she now with fix'd attention heard
His words in bitterness of soul prefer'd,
She found 'twas he, who, by report misled,
His dearest Isabella mourn'd as dead;
And while the truth she knew, with impious spite,
To exclude all gleam of comfort from the knight,
What best might raise his hope she kept conceal'd,
And what would give him pain, alone reveal'd.

"Hear thou," she cried, "from whom I thus have borne

Such haughty carriage, such insulting scorn, 1010
Durst thou but think what tidings I could tell
Of her on whom thy fond affections dwell,
How mightst thou speak me fair—but all in vain
Would force or soothing now that secret gain,
Which, had thy speech more gentle manners shown,
Thou mightst, perchance, discourteous youth,
have known."

As the grim mastiff, who with fury threats
Th' invading robber, soon his rage forgets,
Whene'er by scent of savoury meat allur'd,
Or lull'd with spells by magic art procur'd: 1020
Thus soon Zerbino, with a soften'd air,
Besought the hag with tears and humble prayer,
By (reats and men, no longer to conceal
Whate'er of good or ill she could reveal.

"Nought canst thou know, that known would yield delight."

Th' unfeeling belidame answer'd to the knight:
"She lives! whom now as dead thy sighs deplore,
But lives to envy those who live no more.
Full twenty, not by laws nor faith restrain'd,
Thy Isabella long in bonds detain'd: 1030
Then think, should fate restore her to thy arms,
What hope remains to enjoy her virgin charms?"

⁹² He returns to Marphisa, Book xxv. ver. 676.

"Ah! sag accur'd!" Zerbino made reply,
 "How hast thou fram'd a foul detested lie!
 Though twenty might the captive fair detain,
 Not one would dare her spotless honour stain."

Thus he—then question'd when and where she
 view'd

His best belov'd; but she, in sullen mood,
 Was mute; determin'd to disclose no more,
 Nor add a word to what she told before. 1040
 Zerbino mildly first his speech address'd,
 Then held his threatening weapon to her breast.
 Alike in vain his prayer, his menace prov'd,
 Nor prayer, nor threat, the stubborn bold dame
 mov'd.

Yet what he heard, he ponder'd deep in thought,
 Till secret fears his jealous torment wrought.
 He burn'd his Isabella's charms to view,
 Through teils to follow, and to death pursue;
 But durst not move without his partner's will,
 Which late Marphisa bound him to fulfil. 1050
 Thence, as she led, through solitary shade
 And unfrequented paths Zerbino stray'd.
 Whether o'er hill or vale their way they took,
 Nor words they utter'd, nor exchange'd a look:
 But when the Sun, with slow declining ray,
 Had past the splendour of meridian day,
 To break the silence, in the way there fell
 A knight, whose name th' ensuing book shall tell.

BOOK XXII

THE ARGUMENT.

Zerbino, to defend Gabriela, engages in single combat with Hermonides, from whom he hears the particulars of her wicked life, and is warned of the mischiefs that may befall him from her company.

Nor strongest cords in circling bandage roll'd,
 So closely brace; not clasps of iron hold
 The plank so firm, as plighted faith can bind
 In never-loosening ties the noble mind.
 The sages hence¹, of ancient time, have drest
 Faith (heavenly goddess!) in a spotless vest
 Envelop'd fair, and white as falling snows,
 That every casual soil and blemish shows.
 True honour must in even tenour run,
 Before a thousand pledg'd, or given to one: 10
 Not less in woods or lonely caverns known,
 Far from the concourse of the peopled town,
 Than at the full tribunal, where aloud
 Each act is witness'd to the listening crowd:
 Without or oaths, or forms judicial past,
 A promise made but once should ever last.
 This duty, still on virtuous minds unprest,
 Was ever present to Zerbino's breast;
 So sacred held, that from his purpos'd way
 He turn'd aside, through devious paths to stray 20
 With her, whom like disease or death he view'd;
 Such sense of right his generous soul pursu'd.

¹ That Faith (or sincere dealing) was anciently painted in white garments, may be gathered from this passage in Horace—

et albo raris Fides colit
 Veleis panno.

Thus journey'd they, till from the western hills
 The setting Sun display'd his hindmost wheels,
 When near advancing, with a fearless look,
 A wandering warrior on their silence broke.
 Well was he noted by the hateful dame;
 Hermonides of Holland was his name,
 Who bore athwart, depicted on his shield,
 A band vermilion in a sable field. 30
 By features chang'd the crone her fears express'd,
 And to the prince her humble speech address'd.
 She bade him now in mind his promise bear
 To her, who plac'd her in his guardian care:
 For he, the knight who met them face to face,
 Was foe to her, and foe to all her race;
 Her dear lov'd father perish'd by his guilt;
 By him her only brother's blood was spilt;
 And still he sought, with more than ruthless mind,
 To glut his rage on all her wretched kind. 40
 "Woman! in me behold thy champion near!"
 Zerbino cried, "and banish every fear."

When now, with heedful eyes, th' approaching
 knight
 Had mark'd that face, so odious to his sight,
 "Prepare with me in single fight to meet,"
 Aloud he threatening cried with generous heat,
 "Or quit you' female's side, and by my hand
 Give her to perish as her crimes demand:
 If thou defend'st her cause, thou must be slain.
 For thus it falls to those who wrong maintain." 50
 Zerbino then with courteous speech reply'd,
 Such thoughts could only with the base reside;
 Yet if he press'd the fight, he should not find
 A flying foe; but will'd him first in mind
 To ponder, how a knight of gentle strain
 In helpless woman's blood his hand could stain.

These words, and many more, in vain ensu'd;
 For deeds at length the contest must conclude:
 Now for the tilt they wheel around the plain,
 Then, turning furious, meet with loosen'd rein. 60
 Not with such speed the whizzing rocket flies,
 Dismist with joy to burst in upper skies,
 As, in the dreadful shock, each fiery horse
 Bore either champion to the headlong course.
 Low aim'd Hermonides his spear, and try'd
 Through the left flank his pointed wood to guide:
 The feeble wood in crashing splinters broke,
 And scarce the knight of Scotland felt the stroke.
 Far different came his lance; with force impell'd,
 The target pierc'd, and in the shoulder held 70
 Its raging way, through plate and mail it flew,
 And on the plain Hermonides o'erthrew.

Zerbino deem'd him slain; with pitying haste
 He lighted, and his glittering helm unlace'd.
 At length, as from a trance, the wounded knight
 Recovering, on Zerbino fix'd his sight
 Awhile in silence, till in mournful strain
 He said—"It grieves me little to sustain
 This shame from one, whom well his deeds bespeak

The flower of wandering knights that danger seek 80
 But much to suffer in her cause I grieve,
 Whose murderous guile, accusom'd to deceive,
 Could such a knight in her defence engage:
 For ill it suits an arm so brave to wage
 A strife like this—and when thou hear'st the cause
 That on her head my righteous fury draws,
 Remembrance ever will remorse awake,
 To think thou thus hast wrong'd me for her sake,
 And if my spirits last (though much I fear
 My strength may fail) a story shalt thou hear, 90

Which told, will prove how far her deeds disgrace
 A woman's name, and all the human race.
 My youthful brother, on his fame intent,
 From Holland once, our native dwelling, went,
 And to Heraclius soon a knight was made,
 (Heraclius, who the Grecian empire sway'd);
 A baron's friendship in the court he prov'd,
 And he no less the courteous baron lov'd;
 Who kept near Servia's lands a lonely seat,
 A guarded fortress and a calm retreat. 100
 Argeo was his name, whose choice had led
 Yon loathsomg woman to his nuptial bed,
 On whom he doted with so fierce a flame,
 As pass'd the bounds that rank like his became:
 But she, more changeful than the wither'd leaves
 Which Autumn every year of sap bereaves,
 When the chill winds, collecting to a storm,
 The verdant honours of the grave deform,
 Now sudden chas'd from her inconstant breast
 The love her husband there had once possess; 110
 And every art essay'd of loose desire
 To make my brother burn in lawless fire,
 Not steadier meets th' Acroceraunian shore;
 (Of impious fame) the ocean's surgy roar:
 Not firmer, midst the northern blast, appears
 A pine, the produce of a hundred years,
 (Far as whose head above the Alps ascends,
 So deep its root beneath the surface tends)
 Than now my brother met the dame's request,
 A dame of every vice the fertile nest! 120
 "Meantime, as it befalls a wandering knight
 Who danger seeks, on dangers oft to light;
 It chanc'd my brother, on adventures bound,
 Receiv'd in combat many a grievous wound,
 Argeo's fort was near, no need to wait
 For leave to enter at his friendly gate;
 He came, as wont, resolv'd with medicine's power,
 And rest, his health and vigour to restore.
 Argeo, on some secret purpose bent,
 As need requir'd him, from the castle went: 130
 His consort then the welcome time embrac'd,
 To tempt my brother with her suit unchaste:
 But he, a loyal friend as virtuous youth,
 Impatient to behold his spotless truth
 So hard beset; whom evils thus enclose;
 At length of many ills the lightest chose:
 Of many ills this choice the youth pursues,
 To fly Argeo, and his friendship lose;
 And dwell an outcast, where the shameless dame
 Might never hear again his luckless name. 140

* Heraclius was the sixteenth emperor of Greece, and succeeded Phocas. He was created emperor at Constantinople anno 611, and reigned near thirty years, and appears to be the same Heraclius in whose time the Saracen army, under Calad, laid siege to the city of Damascus; on which event Mr. Hughes founded his Siege of Damascus, the most excellent of modern tragedies.

Infames scarpulos Acroceraunia—

Lib. I. od. iii.

These are high rocks or mountains in Epirus, the tops of which are frequently struck with lightning, from which circumstance they derive their name. They are near the promontory that hangs over the Ionian Sea.

Hard was the choice, but harder to fulfil,
 Against his duty, his un govern'd will;
 Or to her lord accuse a faithless wife,
 Her lord who priz'd her dearer than his life.
 "Still pale and feeble with his wounds he took
 His arms and courser, and the place forsook;
 In willing exile from his friend he went,
 But envious Fortune cross'd his good intent.
 Lo! to his home the husband came, and found
 His wife in floods of seeming sorrow drown'd; 150
 With haggard features and diabol'd hair:
 Surpris'd, he question'd whence her deep despair;
 Again, and yet again, her speech he woo'd
 To learn the cause, while she, in sullen mood,
 Within her bosom schemes of malice bred,
 To avenge her slighted flame on him who sed.
 Nor deem't strange that she, refus'd so late,
 Should sudden change her former love to hate.
 "At length—" "Ah! wherefore should I weep," she
 cried,
 'The guilt, incur'd when thou wert gone, to hide'
 Though from the world the horror I disguise, 161
 It ever naked to reflection lies!
 The soul that groans beneath a secret sin,
 Feels its own weight of punishment within,
 That far exceeds all outward pain of sense
 Another might inflict for such offence:
 If that, which force constrains, offence we name:
 But be it as it may—attend my shame!
 Then from its seat polluted let thy sword
 To this unspotted soul release afford: 170
 So shall these lids be clos'd in welcome sleep,
 No longer after such disgrace to weep
 With eyes cast downwards, staring still to read
 In every face abhorrence of the deed.
 Know then—thy friend—thy bosom friend assail'd
 My matron honour—and by force prevail'd:
 Then dreading lest I should his crime recite,
 The villain parted hence with speedy flight.
 "Thus she; and with these impious words, address'd
 Against his friend, inflam'd her husband's breast.
 Too easy of belief, Argeo flew 181
 With arms and steed, his victim to pursue;
 The seeds of vengeance ranking in his mind,
 Vers'd in the ways, my brother soon he join'd,
 Who, faint with scarce heal'd wounds, in journey
 slow,
 Pass'd pensive on, and little fear'd a foe.
 "Now, in a lonely shade, with eager rage,
 The baron rush'd th' unequal fight to wage.
 My hapless brother vain excuses fram'd;
 Incens'd Argeo loud the combat claim'd. 190
 Tho' one was strong, with deep resentment mov'd,
 The other weak, and much his friend he lov'd,
 Philander then (so call th' unhappy youth,
 The gaudless victim of unspotted truth)
 Who such a foe with strength unequal found,
 Was vanquish'd in the fight, and captive bound,
 'Forbid it Heaven! tho' now to justice led
 For guilt so deep as thine,' Argeo said,
 'I e'er should kill the man I held so dear,
 The man I deem'd to me with faith sincere 200
 Ally'd so late—my friendship thus betray'd,
 Our cause before th' impartial world be weigh'd.
 As I in love excel'd, when once we lov'd,
 So would I stand in hatred unprov'd.
 Let other punishment thy deeds attend,
 Than death from him who call'd thee once his friend.'
 "Thus he; and on a courser bade be plac'd
 A rustic bier of branches interlac'd,

Half dead thereon the wretched youth was laid,
 And to the ostle's neighbouring walls convey'd,
 Where, in the lone retreat, he lay confin'd, 211
 The penance for his treach'rous life design'd.
 Imprison'd there, he found each lenient grace,
 Save only, in excursion from the place,
 To roam abroad; in all beside, he still Found every moment ready at his will.

"But that absurd'st dame, whose impious mind
 Renew'd the purpose she at first design'd,
 Each day Philander view'd, and as she chose,
 With ready key bade every gate unclose: 220
 My brother with inustiate will she press'd,
 And bolder now prefer'd her foal request.

"What more avails thy boasted truth," she cried,
 "Since my report has set that boast aside?
 In vain thy virtue due regard may claim,
 When each insults thee with a traitor's name.
 How had thy honour and thy peace been spar'd,
 Wouldst thou have given my love its dear reward!
 Behold the guerdon of thy mighty pains,
 Of all thy rigour, lo! what fruit remains? 236
 Thou dwelf'st in durance, never hence to part,
 Till pity soften thy obdurate heart:
 But if thou yield'st—I some device will frame
 To set thee free, and heal thy wounded fame."

"Philander answer'd—'Hope not to prevail,
 Nor think Philander's faith shall ever fail;
 Though now it meets such unexpected lot:
 Howe'er the world my merits has forgot,
 One Power above my innocence can see,
 And, at his will, my soul from trouble free, 240
 If all suffice not—let Argeo take
 This wretched being, his revenge to stake.
 Perchance in Heaven hereafter may I find
 That recompense, withheld me by mankind;
 When he, who now detests my hated name,
 As life shall cease to warm this mortal frame,
 May to my mem'ry wrong'd at last be just,
 And weep his dear companion laid in dust."

"Thus oft the shameless woman strives to gain
 Philander's love, as oft she strives in vain: 250
 Blind with her lust, she feeds her flame within,
 And hopes, at length, her lawless will to win;
 Each rack'd invention in her thought applies,
 And ponders all her magazine of lies;
 A thousand schemes, now here, now there revolves,
 Nor yet on one her wavering mind resolves.
 Six months elaps'd since last the impious dame,
 As was her custom, to his presence came, [flame.
 And hence he hop'd that time had cur'd her lustful

"But Fortune, friendly to the wicked, brought
 The wish'd occasion which she long had sought,
 And gave her, by unheard-of guilt t' attain: 262
 The purpose which she oft had try'd in vain.
 Between her husband and a baron reign'd
 A hatred, in their houses long maintain'd;
 Morando was he call'd, surnam'd the Fair,
 Who oft, Argeo absent, would repair
 Within his castle gates, and every outrage dare.
 But, while the lord was there, aloof he stay'd,
 Nor durst for many a mile the seat invade. 270
 Argeo, to entice him thither, feign'd
 A solemn vow to visit Sion's land,
 He seem'd to go, and all who view'd him, thought
 That, parting thence, Jerusalem he sought.
 Thus went the fame, while to his wife was known
 The truth intrusted to her faith alone.
 At close of eve the castle he regain'd,
 And every night within the walls remain'd.

With arms and ensigns chang'd, at dawn of day,
 Each morning to the woods he took his way. 280
 "Now here, now there, with heedful watch he
 stray'd

Around his castle, lurking in the shade,
 To mark if, trusting to the well-form'd tale,
 Morando durst, as wont, his walls assail.
 All day abroad he roam'd, but when he view'd
 The light extinguish'd in the briny flood,
 He came, where, station'd his return to wait,
 His wife receiv'd him at a secret gate.
 All, save herself, believ'd that many a mile
 Argeo travell'd; she with murderous guile 290
 The curst occasion took, my brother found,
 And with dire fraud her impious wishes crown'd,
 While from her eyes, for ever brew'd at will,
 She pour'd a shower of tears her breast to fill.
 "Where shall I fly?" she cried, "what succour
 claim

To guard my own, to guard my husband's fame?
 But were thy noble friend Argeo here,
 Nor this, nor that, would give me cause for fear.
 Thou know'st Morando well—Argeo hence,
 Scarce gods or men can yield me now defence
 Against the traitor, who with many a bribe 304
 And menace would seduce my meagre tribe
 To win me to his will—who, since he heard
 My lord no longer in these gates appear'd,
 On distant travel bent, has dar'd presume,
 Unask'd and hateful in my sight to come;
 But, were my consort now within my call,
 Had kept aloof from this well-guarded wall.
 The suit he once by distant message press'd,
 He boldly now has face to face address'd; 310
 So close address'd, I dread that future shame
 And dire misfortune will attend my name:
 And but I late, with more attentive ear,
 Gently appear'd his amorous tale to hear,
 His passion would have seiz'd, by open force,
 What now he hopes to win by milder course.
 I promis'd soon to yield—yet ne'er design'd
 To keep what, made through fear, can never bind.
 For this, in thee alone I trust for aid;
 Unhelp'd by thee my honour is betray'd, 320
 With my Argeo's—which, if truth may lie
 In friendship's words, you once esteem'd so high.
 If thou refuse—I to the world attest,
 Thy bosom wants that faith it once profess'd.
 Nor was it virtue, but thy cruel scorn,
 Urg'd thee to slight my tears, and see me mourn;
 Argeo's fame pretended was the shield
 That, held before, thy ruthless soul conceal'd.
 With thee Love's theft had lurk'd secure from blame,
 But with Morando all must know thy shame." 330

"There needs not this," Philander cries, "to
 A spirit ever prompt the most to prove [move
 For my Argeo's sake—thy wish explain—
 The faith I once possess'd, I still retain.
 Whate'er the woes which undeserv'd I feel,
 No deed of his abates my constant zeal:
 Peril and death for him I dare oppose,
 Be fate itself, and all the world, my foes."
 "Then impious she—" Thy weapon must destroy
 The wretch who seeks to poison all my joy. 340
 Fear not that evil shall thyself betide,
 Do thou but firmly act as I shall guide.
 Morando will return, when rising night
 With murky shade obscures the setting light,
 While, at a signal fix'd, prepar'd I was
 Unseen, to give him entrance at the gate.

Thee will I safe in secret ambush place,
Without a ray the friendly gloom to chase;
Till, urg'd by me his arms aside to lay,
He to thy justice falls an easy prey." 350

"With cruelty unheard, the ruthless wife
Thus form'd the snare t' entrap her husband's life;
If wife she may be call'd, or rather maid'
A fiend, with more than fiend-like rage inflam'd.

"When now the fatal night her shadows spread,
She to her room my wretched brother led;
There plac'd him with his arms and trusty sword,
Till home return'd the castle's absent lord.
All to her impious hopes in course befel;
'Tis rare but evil deeds succeed too well." 360

Philander deem'd in him Argeo's foe,
And at his own Argeo aim'd the blow:
The cruel weapon cleft his head in twain,
No helm was there the fury to sustain:
Speechless he fell; and bleeding as he lay,
Without a struggle groan'd his life away.

Unheard-of chance! when, thinking to bestow
A friend's kind aid, he, with a fatal blow,
Such greeting gave as fits the deadliest foe.
The husband thus dispatch'd, his murdering sword
My brother to Gabrina's hand restor'd." 371

Gabrina was her name, who every day
Is born to curse, and lives but to betray!
She who, till then, conceal'd the horrid truth,
With lighted torch approach'd th' unhappy youth,
And bade him view how well his arm had sped,
And show'd where lay his friend Argeo dead.
She menac'd then, unless his pliant will
The dictates of her hateful love fulfil,

In every part to make his trespass known, 580
Which all should tell, and he in vain disown.
So must he die, with guilt of murder stain'd,
A public victim to the hangman's hand.
She bade him ponder, tho' to die he dar'd,
If for a shameful death he stood prepar'd.

"Philander, when his dire mistake he view'd,
Congea'd with borrow and amazement stood;
Remorse and rage to vengeance first impell'd
His raving thought, and had not reason quell'd.
The rash design, suggesting, that expos'd 390
In hostile walls he stood with foes enclos'd;
Though now disarm'd, his hand the means had found

To rend her mangled corpse with many a wound,
And with her bleeding members strew the ground.
As when a ship, that in mid ocean sails,
Drives to and fro by two opposing gales:
Between two evils thus Philander prest,
Debates, at length he fixes on the least:
Beside the certain view of speedy death,
He fears with infamy to yield his breath; 400
If in the castle should his deed be try'd,
And little time is left him to decide.

Fate urges now the dreadful draught to take,
Though all her arts before could never shake
His constant faith: the dread of death with shame,
Compels him, while he loaths her impious flame,
To plight his vow, to join with hers his hand,
When both had safely left the Grecian land.

"Thus the foul sorceress won his forc'd consent,
And with him closely from the castle went. 410
Again his home and friends Philander view'd,
But infamy in Greece his name pursu'd.
Still in his mind he bears, with thrilling pain,
His lov'd companion by his weapon slain;
Whence, for a murder'd friend, (Ah, dire to tell!)
He gain'd a Progne, or Medea fell;

And, but his honour plighted could controul,
With powerful ties, th' emotions of his soul,
Her death had follow'd: yet his hatred more
Pursu'd that life, his sword, compell'd, forbore.
Ne'er was he seen, from that curst hour, to wear
A cheerful smile; his looks were all despair. 420
Sighs burst unceasing from his mournful breast:
Like young Orestes by the furies prest,
In dread avengement for the fatal deed,
That made his mother and Egystus bleed.
Deep, and more deep, grief work'd its canker'd way,
Till on his bed of sickness sad Philander lay.

"The foul adulteress, who his heart believ'd
Still to her flame averse, indignant swell'd 430
To force resentment, till her thoughts, estrang'd
From all her love, again to hatred chang'd:
And soon, as once against the baron's life,
Against my brother's wrought this impious wife,
From this had world to send, with arts accur'd,
The second husband, as she sent the first.

"A leech she found, far better taught to kill
With poisonous than with wholesome draughts to heal;

And him she drew, by hopes of vast reward,
With her infernal purpose to accord, 440
The strength of some envenom'd juice to prove,
And from her loathing sight her lord remove.

"Join'd with myself, a mourning friendly band
Enclous'd his bed, when with the cup in hand
The leech approach'd, and said the drink he bore
Would soon my brother's wasted health restore.

But ere the patient could the mixture taste,
Gabrina, with inhuman craft, in haste
Advanc'd, perchance a witness to remove
Who knew th' effects of her detested love: 450
Perchance in artifice to withhold his gains,
The price agreed to recompense his pains.

She seiz'd his hand, while to the sick he held
The fatal goblet that the drink conceal'd.
'Be not displeas'd,' she cried, 'if thus I fear
For one whose life I ever held so dear.

Give me, by proof, to know thou hast not brought
Some potent herb with fatal venom fraught:
Think not my lord the proffer'd cup shall take,
Till first thy lips the medicine's trial make.' 460

"Reflect, air Knight! how stood depriv'd of
speech,

In his own treason caught, the wretched leech:
The time, that press'd, allow'd not to revolve,
And fix his mind on what he should resolve:
Fearful t' expose his guilt, he deem'd it best,
Without delay, to give th' exacted test.

The sick man then, with unsuspecting thought,
Quaff'd all the remnant of the deadly draught.
As when a hawk, whose crooked talons feel
The partridge that he dooms his future meal, 470
Beholds the dog, late partner of his toil,
Assail, and from his grasp convey the spoil:

So this vile leech, by thirst of gain betray'd,
Remains deserted where he look'd for aid.
O unexampled guilt! henceforth on all,
Who thine, like him, for gold, may equal justice fall!

"The deed complete, the wretch prepar'd to take
His journey home, some antidote to make,
Ere yet too far the poison through his blood
Had spread; but fell Gabrina this withstood. 480
She vow'd he must not yet his patient leave,
Till all the virtue of his drugs perceive.
In vain with prayers, in vain with bribes he try'd
To be dismiss'd; the traitress hag deny'd.

All desperate now, he sees before his eye
 Immediate death, nor from that death can fly.
 Then to th' assistants he the truth expos'd,
 Nor could the hag disprove the truth disclos'd.
 Thus on himself that good physician brought
 Such evil, as he oft for others wrought. 490
 And now his spirit follow'd, to pursue
 My brother's spirit that before him flew;
 While we, who late with freezing horror heard
 The truth that by the leech's tale appear'd,
 Seiz'd on that hag, with fiercer rage endu'd
 Than every bowling savage of the wood!
 And in a dungeon shut, condemn'd by fire
 For all her crimes in torture to expire."

Thus said Hermonides †, and more hard spoke,
 To tell how from her prison walls she broke, 500
 But, fainting with the anguish of his wound,
 He backward fell, half senseless, on the ground;
 While two attending squires, with ready care,
 Of branches lopt a rustic bier prepare:
 Here, as he will'd, Hermonides they laid,
 And thus, disabled, from the field convey'd.
 Zerbino seeks † excuse his luckless deed,
 Much griev'd by him to see the champion bleed;
 Yet, as requir'd from those who knight-hood
 claim,

He but defended her with whom he came: 510
 Else had his plighted faith been empty wind;
 For when the cross was to his charge consign'd,
 He vow'd his prowess should with arms oppose,
 In her behalf, whoe'er appear'd her foes.
 In all beside, he stood by deed or word
 Prepar'd to aid, with counsel or with sword,
 A knight whose chance his generous heart de-plor'd.

The knight return'd.—He wish'd him to beware,
 And rid his hands of fell Sabrina's care,
 Ere her black arts had fram'd some guiltful train
 To make his grief and late repentance vain. 521
 Sabrina silent stood, with downcast eye;
 For truth confirm'd admits not a reply.

Departing thence †, Zerbino took his way
 Where with the hag his destin'd journey lay,
 And curs'd her oft, to think his arms had brought
 Such ill on him, whom for her sake he fought.
 And since her impious life was brought to view,
 By one who well her hidden actions knew,
 His hatred kindled to so fierce a height, 530
 He turn'd with horror from her loathsome sight.

She, who beholds Zerbino's secret mind,
 Nor will in enmity remain behind,
 Bates not an inch of malice, but repays
 His hatred with her own a hundred ways:
 Black poison rankles in her impious breast,
 In every feature rancour stands confest.
 Thus in firm concord, as the Muse has told,
 Through the thick wood their friendly course they hold:

When from the west the setting rays appear, 540
 The noise of clashing arms and blows they hear;
 The sign of battle nigh.—With eager speed
 To learn the cause Zerbino spurs his steed,
 Nor seems more slow Sabrina to pursue—
 What chance'd th' ensuing book reveals to view.

BOOK XXII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Atolpho arrives at the enchanted palace of Atlanes, where, by the help of his horn, he dissolves the enchantment, and sets all the prisoners at liberty. Rogeru and Bradamant meet and know each other: they depart together, and are addressed by a damsel, who engages them to undertake the deliverance of a youth condemned to be put to death. In their way they are stopped at the castle of Pinabello, where Rogeru jousts with four knights, who were sworn to defend a law which Pinabello had made, to spoil all strangers who travelled that way. Rogeru casts his enchanted shield into a well.

Y^e courteous damsel! † to your lovers dear;
 Content in love one favour'd youth to hear!
 Though rarely, midst the female race, we find
 A chosen few that boast a constant mind;
 Be not displeas'd, if, following thus my tale,
 Against Sabrina late I dar'd to rail
 In terms so harsh, and still some future page
 Prepare to scourge her more than impious rage:
 Such as she was, even such must I reveal,
 Nor (so my patron bids) the truth conceal: 10
 Yet think not hence their honours shall be lost,
 Whose purer hearts untainted faith can boast.
 Who to the Jews his Lord betray'd for gain,
 Nor leaves on Peter nor on John a stain:
 Not Hypermetra † less in fame survives,
 Though her dire sisters sought their husbands' lives,
 For one on whose demerits here I dwell,
 (As wills the orler of the tale I tell)
 A hundred shall adorn my better lays,
 And, like the radiant Sun, diffuse their praise. 20
 Attend the vary'd story, which to hear
 I trust that many loud a gracious ear.

We left the Scottish knight, with loud alarms
 Of sudden tumult rous'd and clashing arms.

† Spenser seems to have imitated this, and the beginning of the xxviiith Book in the following passage, where he is about to treat of the wanton Hellenore:

Refloubted knights and honourable dames,
 To whom I level all my labours end,
 Right sore I fear, lest with unworthy names
 This odious argument your rhymes should shend,
 Or aught your goodly patience offend;
 Whiles of a lovely lady I do write,
 Which with her loose incourtiness doth blend
 The shining glory of your sovereign light,
 And knight-hood foul defaced by a faithless knight.

Book iii. c. ix. st. 1.

† Hypermetra was one of the fifty daughters of Danaus, who being constrained to marry their kinsmen, the fifty sons of Ægystus, all, but Hypermetra, at the command of their father, slew their husbands on the wedding night; the oracle having foretold to Danaus, that he should die by the hand of a son-in-law: but Hypermetra saved her husband Linus, and contrived means for his escape.

See Ovid's Epistles, Hypermetra to Linus.

Between two hills a narrow vale he found,
Whence late before he heard the falchion's sound ;
But now the noise was hush'd :—there pale he
view'd

A knight just slain, and weltering in his blood.
His name I shall reveal—though now to seek
The eastern clime, no more of France I speak : 30
The Paladin Astolpho let us find,
Who to the west his speedy course design'd ;
We saw him last, amidst th' inhuman band
Of warlike females, clear the hostile land ;
While his pale friends their ready canvass spread,
And from the shore disgrac'd and trembling fled.
Now hear his tale—The knight those realms forsook,

And to Armenia next his journey took.
Some days elaps'd, he hasten'd to survey
Natalia, then to Brusia held his way ; 40
Till coursing on beyond the midland tide,
He enter'd Thrace; by Danube's flowery side
His rapid progress through Hungaria held :
Then, as if wings his courser's speed impell'd,
He pass'd Moravia and Bohemia's land,
And where the Rhine o'erflows Franconia's strand.
To Aquigrana, and to Arden's wood,
He came; to Brabant next his way pursu'd ;
At Flanders then embark'd, where friendly gales
So fill'd the freighted vessel's flying sails, 50
Ere long Astolpho reach'd fair England's shore,
And gain'd the welcome port at noontide hour.

He press'd his steed, and, urging all his haste,
To London came ere eve her shadows cast ;
There heard that many a month its course had run,
Since aged Otho lay in Paris' town ;
That many a baron, by example led,
Had left the land his glorious steps to tread.
He straight resolv'd to Gallia to resort,
And turn'd again to Thames's crowded port. 60
With hoisted sail he issues on the tide,
And bids the crew their prow to Calais guide.
A gale, that gently seems at first to sweep
The vessel's deck, and scarcely curl the deep,
At length, by slow degrees, increasing blows,
And now, beyond the pilot's wishes, grows
So near a storm, as claim'd his skillful care
The conflict of the dashing waves to bear.
High o'er the furrow'd sea, before the wind, 69
The bark is driven, and quits her course design'd :
Now on the right and now the left she rides ;
As here, or there, malicious Fortune guides.
Near Roan, at length, she anchor'd on the strand :
Astolpho, when he touch'd the welcome land,
On Rabicano's back the saddle plac'd ;
His limbs the mail, his side the falchion grac'd ;
He grasp'd his fearful horn, a surer aid
Than marshal'd bands in glittering arms array'd.
Now passing through a wood, he reach'd a hill
Whose foot was moisten'd by a crystal rill ; 88
What time the flocks to crop the mead forbear,
And to the fold or mountain cave repair.

With burning heat, with parching thirst dis-
tress'd,
The helm unclac'd, whose weight his brows oppress'd,
Amid the brakes his fiery steed he tied ;
Then to the stream, for cooling draughts, applied
His eager lips; but ere his lips essay'd
The moistening liquid, from the neighbouring shade

A rustic starting swift, his courser took,
Leapt on his back, and turn'd him from the brook.

Astolpho, rousing at the noise, perceives 94
Th' insulting outrage, and the fountain leaves.
Resentment now the place of thirst supplies,
And swift he follows as the catiff flies.
The catiff led him on in doubtful chase,
Now check'd, and now impell'd his courser's pace,
At length (pursuing one, and one pursu'd)
They left the forest, and the palace view'd,
Where magic spells, without a prison, hold
In lasting durance many a baron bold. 100

The rustic to the palace drives the steed,
Light as the wind, and like the wind in speed,
Astolpho, in his plated arms confin'd,
With heavy shield encumber'd, lags behind ;
Till now arriving, he beholds no more
The hind and courser he pursu'd before.
He plies his feet within the palace wall,
Explores in vain each gallery, room, and hall :
He knows not where the traitor has conceal'd
His Rabicano, that in courts excel'd 110
The fleetest beast : at length his better thought
Suggests, that all by magic art was wrought.
He calls to mind the book that to his hand
Sage Logistilla gave in India's land,
Which ever near he kept with heedful care,
A certain guide in every magic snare.
There full describ'd was all the costly pile,
Each strange enchantment, and each secret guile
What means the foul magician's arts would quell,
And free his prisoners from the potent spell. 120
Beneath the threshold plac'd, a demon rais'd
The various wonders that the sense amaz'd.
The stone remov'd, where close the spirit lay,
The palace walls would melt in smoke away.
Thus said the book ; and eager to pursue
The great adventure open'd to his view,
The Paladin advanc'd, with fearless pace,
To lift the ponderous marble from its base.
Soon as Atlas saw his hands prepar'd
To set at large the castle's fatal guard, 130
Fearful of what might chance, his restless mind
Against the champion other wiles design'd :
By magic art, he gives the gentle knight
A different shape to each beholder's sight :
By this, a hind ; by this, a giant seen ;
By that, a warrior of ill-favour'd mien ;
While each in him th' illusive image view'd,
For which he late Atlantis' steps pursu'd.

Impatient to retrieve their honours stain'd,
All turn'd on him—a fierce determin'd band ! 140
Roger, Bradamant, Gradasso there,
Iroldo, Brandimart in arms, prepare,
With brave Prasilto, by the spell misled,
To wreak their vengeance on Astolpho's head :
But, mindful of his horn, he soon depress'd,
With chilling terror, every baughty crest.
In happy time the fear-dispensing breath
Preserv'd the Paladin from instant death.
Soon as his lips have touch'd the narrow vent,
And wide around the deafening clangour sent, 150
Like trampling doves, when through the breaking
skies

Resounds the gun, each knight affrighted flies :

* The story of this palace is continued from Book xii. where it is fully described, ver. 34, & seq.

Not less th' eachmaster odd^s the noise receives;
 Not less amaz'd the wondrous dome he leaves,
 To distance flies, heart-struck with deep dismay,
 Till, dying off, the dreadful sounds decay!
 The keeper^s and his prisoners quit the walls;
 And numerous halters with these forsake their stalls,
 That, not by halter, nor by reins confin'd,
 Through various paths their absent masters join'd.
 While thus the knight his fearful music play'd, 161
 Not eat nor mense within the dwelling stay'd;
 Even Rabicano had fed, but with his hand
 Astolpho, as he pass'd, the steed detain'd.
 And now th' intrepid duke (the sorcerer gone)
 From off the threshold hear'd a weighty stone.
 An image there he found, with many a spell
 Of hidden force, that boots not here to tell.
 Eager to quell the charm, with frequent stroke,
 What'er he found, the knight in pieces broke; 170
 For so the book (his sure instructor) show'd;
 And all the palace vanish'd in a cloud!
 Held by a chain of beaten gold, he view'd
 Where good Rogero's winged courser stood;
 That winged courser which the wizard Moor⁷
 Had sent to bear him to Alcina's shore;
 For which had Logistilla design'd to frame
 The reins and bit, with which to Franco he came;
 And, borne from distant land to England's strand,
 Had bor'd o'er vast tracts of seas and land—180
 I know not if your memory still retains,
 How to the tree that day the griffin's reins
 Rogero left, when, bright in naked charms,
 Albracca's princess⁸ vanish'd from his arms,
 And left him whelm'd in shame—with rapid speed
 Back to his lord return'd the faithful steed,
 Woodroos to see! and stabled there remain'd,
 Till the strong spell no more its power retain'd.
 No chance than this could yield sincerer joy
 To good Astolpho, who resolv'd t' employ 190
 Th' occasion given new regions to explore,
 Oceans and realms by him unseen before.
 He prov'd how well the matchless steed could bear
 The flying rider, when through fields of air
 He late escap'd from India's fatal lands,
 Freed by Melissa from her cruel hands,
 Who, with infernal arts, his limbs estrang'd
 From human form, and to a myrtle chang'd.
 He saw, how Logistilla, to restrain
 The docile beast, had fix'd the curbing reins; 200
 And mark'd the counsel which the prudent dame
 Rogero gave, his furious course to tame.
 The ready saddle on the steed he brac'd,
 Then in his mouth the bit and reins he plac'd,
 As suited best; for choice of bridles there
 He found, which many a steed was wont to wear.
 The thought of Rabicano yet detain'd
 The knight, and yet awhile his sight restrain'd.
 Well had he cause to hold the courser dear;
 None better in the list with rested spear 210

Could run at tilt: with him at Gallia's land
 He travel'd safe from Egypt's burning sand.
 Debating long, Astolpho now decreed,
 With some well-chosen friend to intrust the steed,
 Rather than leave him an valu'd prey,
 For him whom Fortune led to pass the way.
 His purpose fix'd, with looks intent he stood,
 To mark if hind or huntsman cross'd the wood,
 Who to some neighbouring town might lead behind
 Good Rabicano, to his charge consign'd. 220
 All day he stay'd, he stay'd till roseate morn
 Had made, in eastern skies, her wish'd return,
 When, scarce the shadows o'er their sight he threw,
 He saw, or seem'd to see, a wand'ring knight.
 But, ere I speak the rest⁹, I first shall tell
 What to the noble Bradamant befel,
 With brave Rogero, when (dispell'd their fear)
 No more the chaugour of the horn they hear.
 The lovers saw, what, ne'er till then reveal'd,
 Atlantes long from either had conceal'd: 230
 Such mists of darkness o'er their sight he drew,
 That neither, till that hour, the other knew.
 On Bradamant Rogero fix'd his eyes;
 She on Rogero gaz'd with like surprise.
 Now round her waist his eager arms he throw,
 Her blushes kindling like the maiden rose,
 While from her lips each balmy sweet he proves,
 The blossoms of his first auspicious love!
 A thousand times th' enraptur'd lovers meet
 In fond embrace; a thousand times repeat 240
 Their mutual vows, while scarce their breasts contain
 The joy that throbs in every glowing vein.
 Yet much they sorrow'd, that by magic sight
 They liv'd so long estrang'd from either's sight,
 And lost so many days of dear delight.
 While Bradamant such favour'd grace bestows,
 As the chaste maid to chaste affection owes,
 She tells Rogero; would he hope to prove
 The last dear blessings of conjugal love,
 He from her father Amon (ere the bands 250
 Of sacred Hymen join their plighted hands)
 Must gain consent, and in the hallow'd wave
 With Christian rites his Pagan errors lave.
 Rogero, for his dearest mistress' sake,
 Not only yields a Christian's name to take,
 Which once his father and his uncle bore,
 Which all his ancestors profess'd before;
 But vows, for her, in every chance to give
 The remnant years Heaven doom'd him yet to live.
 "Behold me sworn," he cries, "at thy desire,
 "To plunge in water, or to plunge in fire." 261
 Then first to be baptiz'd, and next to wed,
 Rogero follow'd as the virgin led:
 Towards Vallombrosa¹⁰ led the martial dame,
 That to an ancient abbey gave the name,
 Wealthy and fair, in hallow'd rituals diest,
 And courteous to receive the stranger guest.
 Now issuing from the wood a gentle maid
 They observ'd to meet, whose looks her grief betray'd.

⁶ Atlantes.—Nothing more is heard of him till the xxxvith Book, ver. 461.

⁸ Such passages as these, that are certainly ludicrous and familiar, and very different from the genius of epic writing, will not admit of any elevation of language, and yet ought surely to be preserved, if a translation means to exhibit to an English reader the features of his author.

⁷ Atlantes.

⁸ Angelica.

⁹ The poet returns to Astolpho, Book xxiii. ver. 66.

¹⁰ The religious order of Vallombrosa had its beginning from one Giovanni Gualberto, a Florentine, who, forsaking the world, led a solitary life in a part of the Appenines called Vall'oubrosa (shady vale), and built a church there.

Rogero, prompt to feel for each distress, 270
 But chief those sorrows which the fair oppress;
 With pity touch'd the tender mourner view'd,
 (Whose trickling tears her bloomy cheeks bedew'd)
 And, greeting mild, besought the cause to know,
 That o'er her features drew the clouds of woe.
 He spoke; when, lifting up her humid eyes,
 To speak her grief, she sweetly thus replies:
 "Ah! noble knight! thou soon shalt learn,"
 she said,

"Why o'er my face these drops of anguish spread:
 I mourn a youth, who, ere the day is past, 280
 Must in a neighbouring castle breathe his last.
 He lov'd the fairest of the female train,
 Whose sire, Marsilius, holds the rule of Spain.
 Cloth'd in a female garb, with soft disguise,
 His well-feign'd voice and downcast bashful eyes
 Bely'd his sex—their loves awhile conceal'd:
 At length ill chance to strangers' ears reveal'd:
 Each tells his fellow, till at length they bring (False following tale) the tidings to the king.
 Last night a guard from stern Marsilius came, 290
 To seize in bed the lover and the dame:
 Thence were they hurried by the king's command,
 And in the castle walls apart detain'd;
 And, ah! I fear ere this day's end decline
 The youth in torment must his life resign.
 And now, to shun the dreadful night I fly:
 Alive thy sentence him by fire to die.
 Can o'er my soul again such sorrows know,
 That every future bliss will change to woe,
 Oft as I call to mind the cruel fame 300
 That prey'd relentless on his beauteous frame?"

While Bradamant attends the mournful tale,
 She feels the sympathy of grief assail
 Her tender breast; nor less she seem'd to feel,
 Than if she trembled for a brother's weal.
 Then, turning to Rogero, thus she cried:
 "For this unhappy let our force be tried."
 The damsel next she south'd—"Compose thy grief,
 Trust in our arms to bring unhop'd relief.
 Lead to yon' wall—and should he yet survive, 310
 No earthly power shall him of life deprive."

No less Rogero, than the warlike maid,
 With ardour burns to give the wretched aid.
 Then to the dame, from whose grief-swelling eyes
 A torrent streams—"Why this delay?" he cries,
 "Not tears avail in this disastrous state,
 Conduct us instant to the scene of fate;
 And here I vow to free him from his foes, [suppose:
 Though swords and spears, by thousands rang'd,
 But hence—or thus in fruitless converse stay'd, 320
 Till yonder flames shall mock our long delay."

Thus he: The presence of the warlike pair,
 Whose mien and words their dauntless souls declare,
 Fair hope rekindles in the virgin's breast,
 So late with sorrow and with fear oppress;
 Yet, pondering now she stood which path to tread,
 Of two that tow'rd the destin'd castle led—
 "Should we," she cried, "the readiest track pursue,

That open lies extended to the view,
 I trust in time our succour might we give, 300
 Ere yet the pile the deadly flame receive;
 But since compell'd to take the winding way
 Heavy and rough, I fear the closing day
 To end our travel scarcely will suffice;
 And, ere we reach the place, the victim dies."

"But wherefore must we shun," Rogero cried,
 "The scarest path?"—And thus the maid replied:

"Athwart our way a stately castle stands,
 Which Pinabello, Potier's earl, commands;
 Who, scarce three days elaps'd, has fram'd a law
 That knights and damsels holds in cruel awe: 341
 He, worst of men, with every vice is stor'd,
 Son of Anselmo, Altariva's lord;
 From whose ill-omen'd gate no knight nor dame
 Departs unstay'd, and 'scapes untouched with shame.
 Each thence must fare on foot: the warrior leaves
 His shining arms; the dame her vesture gives.
 No braver knights, through all the realms of France,
 Now hold, or many a year have held, the lance,
 Than four, that rank'd in Pinabello's train, 350
 Have sworn his lawless custom to maintain.
 Hear whence it rose—and mark the law unjust
 On noble minds 't impose such impious trust!—
 In marriage band is Pinabello join'd
 To one, the scandal of the female kind,
 Whom late, as with her lord she chanc'd to ride,
 A champion met, that brought to shame her pride.
 Behind the champion, on his steed, was borne
 An aged crone, whom with insulting scorn
 Th' injurious earl address'd: the stranger-knight 361
 With Pinabello wag'd th' unequal fight.
 Him, strong in pride, but weak in arms, he struck
 Headlong to earth; then from her palfrey took
 The haughty fair one, left on foot, and dress'd
 The ancient beldame in her youthful vest.
 The dame dismounted (whom with rancorous mind
 In every evil Pinabello join'd)
 Declar'd no night nor day could rest afford,
 No future hour behold her peace restor'd,
 Unless a thousand dames and warriors foil'd, 370
 She view'd unborn'd, of vest and arms despoil'd.

"It chanc'd that day to Pinabello came
 Four noble knights, the first in martial fame;
 These knights, with whom but few in arms could vie,
 Return'd from realms beneath a distant sky:
 Young Sansonetto; Guido, Savage nam'd;
 Gryphon and Aquilant, the brethren fam'd,
 These Pinabello at his gate receives
 With semblance fair, and courteous welcome gives.
 At night, when sleep has lull'd each sense to peace,
 He binds the four, nor will their bonds release, 381
 Till all consenting, as his laws prescribe,
 A year and day to dwell amidst his tribe,
 Shall swear from knights their steeds and arms to wrest,

And from the damsels take their steeds and vest.
 To this compell'd, with heavy hearts they swore;
 And not a champion, on this fatal hour,
 Has yet been found their vigour to sustain,
 Who press'd not, at his length, the fearful plain.
 Full many a champion thro' his fall receives, 390
 And, stript of arms, on foot the castle leaves.
 'T is fix'd, that he who first with single force
 Shall pass the bridge, alone must run the course:
 But should such lance against the stranger fail,
 The rest united must his strength assail.
 Reflect, if each can boast such nerve in fight,
 What three must prove, when three their spouses unite.

Hill suits it us, whose haste forbids our stay,
 In such a strife to hazard new delay.
 For grant, that here your arms attain success, 400
 As sure your warlike looks proclaim no less,

¹¹ See Book xx. ver. 807.

¹² See Book xx. ver. 709.

Yet much I fear, ere evening shades arise,
The youth, for whom I weep, unaided dies."

Rogero then—" 'T is ours, with ready seal,
What honour bids, undaunted to fulfil;
The rest let Heaven direct, or Fortune guide,
What pow'rs soe'er in these events preside.
To thee the sequel of the jousts may show
How far our aid protection can bestow
On him, who, (as thou say'st) in youthful prime,
Is doom'd to death for such a venial crime." 411

Thus he. No more replied the gentle maid,
But through the nearest way the pair convey'd:
Not past three miles their journey they pursu'd,
When now the castle's bridge and gates they view'd,
Where arms and vests are left, where valu'd life
Is put to hazard in the dangerous strife.

The ready warder, on the ramparts plac'd,
Twice rung the warning—when, behold! in haste,
On a low steed an ancient sire appear'd, 420
And, as he came, his voice before was heard.

"Hold, strangers, hold!" he thus began to say,
"Here stop, and here the Ose exacted pay!
If yet you know not—let me now reveal
Our law—" and then he sought their law to tell,
And next 't enforce, with accents sage and grave,
That counsel, which to every knight he gave.
"Yon lady of her vest, my suit, bereave;
"And you," he cried, "your arms and coursers leave":

Nor think, by dreadful perils here enclos'd, 430
With four such warriors safe to stand oppos'd,
Arms, vests, and coursers¹³ we with ease obtain,
But life, once lost, what prowess can regain?"

Rogero cut him short—"Forbear to show,
In fruitless prelude, what prepar'd we know,
No more—I come to prove, if what my will
Aspires to act, my actions can fulfil.
Arms, steed, and vest, I ne'er to others yield
For empty threatenings in an untry'd field;
And well I trust, for sounding words alone, 440
My partner never will resign his own.

But give me to behold their face to face,
Whose strength must purchase, to my foul disgrace,
My arms and steed—o'er yonder hill we haste,
Nor longer here the precious hours can waste."

To whom the sire—"Lo! issuing to the plain
One warrior comes"—nor were his words in vain.
High on the bridge appear'd the noble knight,
In crimson surcoat deck'd with flowers of white, 450
Now Bradamant Rogero sa'd to trust

With her the first fair honours of the joust,
From his high seat to hurl the knight, who wore
The mantled red, with flowers embroider'd o'er.
In vain she sa'd, Rogero thus deny'd:
Constrain'd to yield, she silent stood beside
To view the course, while on himself her knight
Took all the hazards of the dubious fight.

Rogero then inquir'd the warrior's name,
Who foremost from the castle's portal came.
" 'T is Sansonetto," thus the sire replied, 460
"I know th' embroider'd scarf with crimson dy'd."

Now Pinabello issu'd from the gate,
And round their lord his thronging menials wait,
All well prepar'd of arms and steeds to spoil
The hapless knights that fell within the toil.

Swift to the course each bardy champion press'd,
And firmly held his ponderous spear in rest,
Huge, knotty, long, in native forests bred,
The tough ash ending in a steely head.
Of these full ten had Sansonetto brought, 470
From neighbouring woods—of these in lance wrought

He six'd on two; in brave Rogero's hand
The one he plac'd, and one himself retain'd.
Now here, now there, impatient of delay,
Each silent wheels his steed a different way:
Then turning swift, with level'd spears, they meet,
The field wide-shaking to their coursers' feet,
Against their shields unerring aim they took:
Rogero's shield receiv'd, unhurt, the stroke:

Atlas's buckler, whose enchanted light 480
With powerful splendour clos'd the gazer's sight,
Which still, unless by dangers great assail'd,
The knight beneath a silken covering vaill'd,
Not so the adverse shield, whose mortal mould
Could not against the furious tourney hold.

As with a thunder-bolt the spear impell'd, [held,
Reach'd the stunn'd arm that scarce the buckler
And Sansonetto, with a grievous wound
Forc'd from his seat, fell prostrate on the ground.
The first was he, of all the social train 490
Compell'd this ruffian usage to maintain,
That yet had fail'd a stranger to despoil,
Or, from his seat dismounted, prest the soil:
Who laughs to day, some future day may mourn,
And find to frowns the smiles of Fortune turn.

Again the warder rings th' alarm, and calls
The remnant three to quit the castle-walk.
Meantime it chanc'd, that Pinabello came
To noble Bradamant, and sought the name
Of him whose valour thus in arms excell'd, 500
Who thus the champion of his castle quell'd.
Eternal Heaven to give his crimes the need
They well deserv'd, conducts him on the steed
Which, scarce eight months elaps'd, the wretch before

From Bradamant, by murderous treason, bore:
When, if your memory still the tale recall,
In Merlin's tomb he let the virgin fall;
What time the shatter'd pole receiv'd her weight,
And Heaven reserv'd her for a happier fate.

The generous heroine with a nearer view 510
Her courser saw, and soon the traitor knew;
His well-known voice recall'd, his every look
Intent she mark'd, and to herself she spoke.
"Lo! this is he, who once my death design'd,
Now hither brought his due reward to find."
At once she threatens—to the sword applies
Her eager hand, and on the castrid' flies.
Between his castle and the recreant knight
She cuts off all retreat, nor can his flight
Avail to reach the gate; as to his den 520
The fox retires beset by dogs and men.

Defenceless, pale, before the martial maid,
He seeks, with coward cries, the woodland shade:
With trembling heart he spurs his rapid steed,
And hopes alone for safety from his speed.

¹³ These kind of laws occur perpetually in the old romances, and several such are to be found in Spenser, particularly one, whereby knights and ladies pay toll of their beards and hair.

¹⁴ Not unlike these lines is the speech of Achilles to the ambassadors in the fifth Iliad:

Last herds and treasures we by arms regain,
And steeds unrivall'd on the dusty plain;
But from our lips the vital spirit fled,
Hæcyrus no more to wake the silent dead.

Pope, ver. 528.

The Dardan dame pursues, with all the zeal
Of just revenge, and whisks her fatal steel,
Now at his side or bosom aims the wound:
The tumult echoes, and the woods resound.

But at the castle Pinabello's crew 530
Nor heard his clamours, nor his danger knew:
There every eye was fix'd, there every sense
Roger's conflict held in deep suspense.

And now the three remaining champions came
From forth the fort; with these the vengeful dame
Who fram'd the base device, while every knight
Blush'd with a single foe to wage the fight;
And rather wish'd to die, in fame unstain'd,
Than meet a conquest so ignobly gain'd.

But she, who first th' unequal joust design'd, 540
To enforce th' observance, bade them call to mind
How each had sworn, by every solemn tie,
For her revenge their strength combin'd to try.
"But if my single weapon can suffice,
To unhorse you' warrior," Savage Guido cries,
"Thus shall I joust—be mine the single strife,
And if I fail—exact my forfeit life."

Gryphon and Aquilant alike demand
To meet the stranger singly, hand to hand.
To these th' imperious dame—"Why thus delay
In vain debate the bus'ness of the day? 551
I brought you here your champion's arms to take,
Nor other compact, other laws to make.
Why urge not pleas like this, ere yet ye swore
To observe my will, when first within my power;
Not when th' occasion calls you to maintain
Your promise given, nor make that promise vain?"
Thus they—"Behold," Rogero eager cries,
"The knights and dame!—if still you seek the prize

Of armour, steed, or vest, why this delay 560
To seize with valour's arms the offer'd prey?"

The matron there impels each tardy knight,
Here storms Rogero, and demands the fight.
Till forc'd at length, though fir'd with generous
All rush at once the stranger to engage. [rage,
First rode the brother-chiefs, whose lineal name
From the high marquis of Burgundia came;
Then mounted on a steed of heavier pace,
Behind them Guido Savage held his place.
Rogero with the spear to combat drew, 570
The spear that Sansonetto late o'erthrew:
His valiant arm the fated buckler bore,
Which in Pyrene's hills Atlantes wore;

Th' enchanted buckler, whose resistless light
At greatest need preserv'd the noble knight:
Yet only thrice the woodrous aid he try'd:
And only thrice the shield its aid supply'd:
Twice, when the joys of shameful life he fed
For seats where virtue ^{is} every blessing shed;
The last, when in the billow main he left 580
The raging ore, of precious food bereft.
Save these alone, in every chance beside,
A veil was wont the dazzling orb to hide;
At ease remov'd, whenever the dangerous hour
Requir'd the help of more than mortal power.
Well-fenc'd by this, he rush'd with warlike heat
Against the three that came his force to meet:
Not more he fear'd each warrior's threat'ning spear,
Than holdest bears the weakest infants fear.

At Gryphon now Rogero aim'd the thrust 590
Above the buckler's verge, the furious joust

His helm confess'd; on either hand he rook'd,
Till, falling from his steed, he press'd the field.
Against Rogero's buckler Gryphon sent
The spear, that, erring from the knight's intent,
Struck on th' impulsive orb with fruitless sound,
And, hissing, glanc'd across the polish'd round;
The veil it rent, and freed the magic rays:
Advancing Aquilant receiv'd the blaze;
On Guido Savage next, who came the last, 600
The woodrous target its beamy splendour cast.
All fell—but little yet Rogero knew
The finish'd joust, and swift his falchion drew;
Then wheel'd his steed, when on the ground he
view'd

His prostrate foes with little force subdu'd;
Knights, squires, and each that issu'd to the plain,
The numerous foot, and all the female train,
Alike he saw, as if in battle dead,
Prone on the field each warrior courser spread:
Till, casting down a casual glance, he spy'd 610
From his left arm, dependent at his side,
The veil that still was wont the light to hide.
Sudden he turn'd, and sought with anxious care
His bosom's best belov'd, the martial fair,
Her whom he left, where, plac'd apart, she stood
To mark the tilt begun; but when he view'd
The fair so more, he deem'd her course was bent
To free the lover, and his fate prevent,
Who, while she stay'd to attend the castle's strife,
She fear'd in flames would lose his hapless life. 620
Among the rest he sees the gentle maid,
Their fair conductress, deep in slumber laid:
Her in his arms he rais'd, and, plac'd before
High on his steed, the penative warrior bore:
Her scarf he took, and wrapt with this, conceal'd
The buckler's blaze; the blaze no more reveal'd,
The virgin soon her heavy eyes unseal'd:

Rogero's features flush'd with rosy shame,
His down-cast looks his secret thoughts proclaim;
He fears that all his former deeds are stain'd 630
By such a conquest so ignobly gain'd. [away
"Where shall I turn?" he cries, "how cleanse
The infamy of this ill-omen'd day?
The triumph here achiev'd each tongue shall tell,
Not due to valour, but to magic spell."

Thus he, with generous wrath his bosom glow'd;
When, what he sought, spontaneous chance bestow'd.

Far in a wood's surrounding gloom he found
A crystal well, that sunk beneath the ground:
Hither, when sat'd herds their food forsake, 640
Oppress'd with heat they came their thirst to slake.
Rogero then—"No more shall scorn or blame,
From thee, O shield! arise to taint my name:
No longer mine—I here such arms forgo,
Nor more to thee will shameful succour owe."
Thus he; and swift alighting as he spoke,
With generous wrath a craggy stone he took;
To this the buckler, well secur'd, he tied,
And to the well consign'd—"Lie there," he cried,
"And with thee there my foul dishonour hide." 650

Deep was the well, and high the waters swell'd:
Ponderous the stone, and ponderous was the shield:
At once it sunk, a bed the bottom gave,
And sudden o'er it clos'd the limpid wave.
Soon Fame divulg'd the deed, with trumpet's sound,
Through France, through Spain, through every region round;
From tongue to tongue it spread, and many a train
Of noble knights aspir'd the prize to gain.

* See Book vii. and z.

In vain they sought the forest, where, conceal'd
From human sight, remain'd the precious shield:
The dame who blas'd the tale, refused to tell 661
What secret wood contain'd the fatal wall.

When brave Rogero¹⁶ from the castle pass'd,
Where, with such little strife, to earth he cast
The knights of Pinabello's guard, and left
The valiant four of strength and sense bereft;
The light remor'd, each eye unclow'd appear'd:
Fach from the ground his limbs astonish'd rear'd;
All day they commun'd of the wondrous shield
That every sight in magic slumber seal'd. 670

While such discourse they held, the news arriv'd
Of Pinabello late of life depriv'd:
Of Pinabello slain were tidings brought;
But yet unknown what hand the deed had wrought.

Deep in a vale, with gloomy woods confin'd,
The martial dame the recreant warrior join'd;
Where, in his panting breast and bleeding side,
A hundred times the vengeful blade she dy'd,
And from her seat the hateful spirit chas'd, 679
Whose impious deeds had all the land disgrac'd.

Then, with that steed which late with guileful art
The traitor took, she hasten'd to depart
And join her knight, but now explor'd in vain
Her former way, and rov'd o'er hill and plain
With travel long, while Fortune yet deny'd
To lov'd Rogero's sight her course to guide.

But he that hears my tale with grateful ear,
Must to th' ensuing book the rest defer.

BOOK XXIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant, after the death of Pinabello, loses herself in a wood: she is met by Astolpho, who, preparing to take his flight on the griffin-horse, intrusts her with the care of his horse Rabicano. Bradamant meets her brother Alardo, and goes with him to Mount Albano, from which place she sends Hippaica, her maid, on a message to Rogero, with his horse Frontino, which is afterwards taken from her by Rodomont. Zerbino, travelling with Gabriela, finds the dead body of Pinabello: he is accused of the murder, and led to be put to death. The arrival of Orlando and Isabella. Meeting of the two lovers. Mandricardo overtakes Orlando: their battle. Orlando, parting from Zerbino and Isabella, comes to the grotto where Angelica and Medoro used to meet. The manner in which he discovers the whole story of their love; which discovery ends in the total deprivation of his senses.

If man to man his friendly succour lends,
It rarely proves but fair reward attends
Each generous deed; at least we thus ensure
Our future peace, and Heaven's regard secure.
Who wrongs another, soon or late shall find
The punishment for evil deeds assign'd.
The proverb holds, that oft man's wandering train
Each other meet; but mountains fix'd remain¹.

¹⁶ He resumes the story of Rogero, Book xxv. ver. 28.

¹ From the ancient proverb, Mons cum monte non vincitur. The meaning of this rather uncouth VOL. XXI.

Behold the fate on Pinabello brought
In due return for all the ill he wrought, 10
While pious God (who ne'er beholds unmor'd,
With sufferings unde-er'd the guiltless pow'r'd)
The virgin sav'd; and ever saves the just.

Who, press'd with sorrows, place in him their trust.

When Pinabello deem'd the noble maid
His wretched victim, in the cavern'd shade
Alive entomb'd, he little fear'd to view
Her vengeful arms his ruffian guile pursue;
Where nought avail'd his near paternal seat,
T' avert the vengeance he was doom'd to meet. 20

Midst savage mountains Altaripa stands,
Fast by the confines of Pontieri's lands;
The hoary earl Anselmo's fair domain:
Of him was born, of unpropitious strain,
The wretch, whom now to 'scape from Clarmont's
sword,

No friends assist, no powers relief afford,
Beneath a hill the generous dame assails
His worthless life, and soon her arm prevails
Against a foe that no defence prepares
But heartless cries and unavailing prayers. 30

The traitor slain, who once her death design'd,
She turn'd again her dearest knight to find,
Whom late she left in strife unequal join'd.

But envious Fortune through the dreary shade
By winding paths her wandering steed convey'd,
And to the woodland's deep recesses led,
What time, at sun-set, eve her shadows spread.
Unknowing where th' approaching night to pass,
She checks her reins, and on the verdant grass,
Beneath the covering trees, her limbs she throws, 40
To cheat the tedious hours with short repose;
Now watches Venus, Saturn, Mars, or Jove,
With every wandering star that shines above:
But from her sleeping sense, or waking mind,
Her dear Rogero never is disjoin'd.

She sighs to think revenge her soul could move
Beyond the softer claims of faithful love.

"Insensate rage has sever'd me," she cries,
"From all I hold most dear—Unheeding eyes!
That when I first my treacherous foe pursu'd, 50
Mark'd not the tracks of this perplexing wood:
Then had I known in safety to return,
Nor here been lost, dejected and forlorn."

In words like these she mourns without relief;
And now she broods in silence o'er her grief;
While winds of sighs, and floods of tears, that
Her gentle breast, a cruel tempest make. [shake
At length the long-expected morn appears,
When streaky light the gray horizon cheers.
She takes her steed, that graz'd beside the way, 60
And, mounting, turns to meet the rising day.
Nor far she pass'd, when, issuing from the wood,
She came to where the wizard's palace stood,
Where once, with many a fraud, Atlas's power
Had long detain'd her in his magic bower,
Astolpho here she met, who lately gain'd
The griffin-steed², and but his flight restrain'd passage is, that though mountains never meet, yet men, who are ever wandering from place to place, may unexpectedly meet with those to whom they have done a good or ill turn, and find their punishment or their reward.

² The griffin-horse came into the possession of Astolpho in the xxiii Book, ver. 173, where he destroys the enchanted dwelling of Atlas.

For Rabicano's sake, till chance should give
Some trusty friend, his courser to receive.
The thoughtful Paladin his face display'd⁷⁰
Without his casque, when through the misty shade
The valiant Bradamant her kinsman knew,
And, greeting fair, impatient nearer drew;
Declar'd her name, her covering helm unlac'd,
Reveal'd her features, and the knight embrac'd.
To Otbo's son³, who sought some trusty friend
To whom he might his Rabican commend,
No friend could Fortune, at his present need,
Like Bradamant supply, to keep the steed
Till his return; and, when his flight was o'er, ⁸⁰
Again in safety to his hand restore.

Their greeting done—"Too long I here delay
My purpos'd voyage through a trackless way:"
Astolpho cried;—then to the maid he told
His flight design'd, and bade his steed behold.
She saw, but saw incurious what before
Her eyes had seen, when from th' enchanted tower
Atlantes' hand the flying courser rein'd,
And with the maid a combat strange maintain'd.
She calls to mind the day, on which she view'd ⁹⁰
The parting pinnions, and his course pursu'd
With sharpen'd sight, when, soaring to the skies,
He bore Rogero from her longing eyes.

Astolpho tells, that to her friendly care
He Rabicano gives, beyond compare
First in the course, whose swiftness leaves behind
The arrow parting on the wings of wind;
To her his ponderous arms he means to give,
And wills her at Albano thence to leave
Till his return; since armour might be spar'd, ¹⁰⁰
Or aught of weight that could his flight retard.
His sword and horn he still retain'd, though well
His horn alone could every danger quell.
To Bradamant he gave the golden lance,
Which once the son of Galaphron to France
From India brought, whose hidden power was such
T' unhorse each champion with its magic touch.

Astolpho now bestrode the winged horse,
And slowly through the air impell'd his course,
Till Bradamant, who watch'd his upward flight,
All in a moment lost him from her sight. ¹¹¹
So from the port the guiding pilot steers
Who dangerous sands and rocky shallows fears;
But when he leaves the rocks and sands behind,
He shifts each sail, and scuds before the wind.

The duke departing⁴ thus: the martial maid,
In deep suspense, awhile in silence weigh'd
The means to Mount Albano thence to bear
Her kinsman's steed and implements of war.
For now, with fond desire, her bosom burn'd ¹²⁰
To see Rogero, in his absence mourn'd,
Whom (yet deny'd to meet) her anxious mind
At least in Vallombrosa hop'd to find.

While silent thus she stood in pensive mood,
It chanc'd a peasant on the way she view'd,
And him she bade Astolpho's armour take,
And place the weight on Rabicano's back,
Then lead the courser which the burden bore,
With that which Pinabellin rode before,
To Vallombrosa now she sought the way, ¹³⁰
But doubtful of the track, she fear'd to stray
From where she wish'd; nor knew the peasant well
The country round, and thus, as chance befel,

A path she took, and through the forest wide
At random stray'd, without a friend to guide.

At noontide hour they left the covert shade,
And on a hill a castle near survey'd
Of stately site; the virgin at the view
Believ'd in this she Mount Albano knew:
And Mount Albano there the dame beheld, ¹⁴⁰
In which her mother and her brethren dwell'd.
This when she found, a sudden dread oppress'd
Her heart, that flutter'd in her tender breast.
Her coming known, she fear'd the pressing train
Of friends and kindred would her steps detain,
Where she, a prey to love's consuming fire,
Might view no more the lord of her desire;
No more at Vallombrosa hope to meet
Her dear Rogero, and their vows complete.

Awhile in doubt the maid her thoughts revolv'd;
At length from Mount Albano she resolv'd ¹⁵¹
T' avert her steps, and thence her journey bend
To where the abbey's hallow'd spires ascend.
But Fortune soon, in this pursuit, bereft
Her breast of hope; for, ere the vale she left,
She on Alardo's sudden chanc'd to light,
And sought in vain t' elude her brother's sight.

This youth had station'd many a warlike band
Of horse and foot, which, at the king's command,
He lately rais'd from all the neighbouring land.
Return'd, he chanc'd his sister here to meet; ¹⁶¹
With seeming joy the pair each other greet;
And now, in friendly converse, side by side
Together join'd, to Mount Albano ride.

Thus to her native seats the fair return'd,
Where Beatrice had long her absence mourn'd
With fruitless tears, and sent, with anxious pain,
To seek her through the realms of France in vain.
But what are all the joys she here may prove,
Her mother's fondness or her brethren's love, ¹⁷⁰
Compar'd to happiness so late possess'd,
When lov'd Rogero clasp'd her to his breast?

Herself restrain'd, his purpos'd one should bear
To Vallombrosa, with a faithful care,

³ One of Bradamant's brothers. Romance writers give different accounts of the genealogy of the house of Clarmont. Take the following as most consonant to Ariosto. Of Guido of Antons, son of Buovo and Orlandina, daughter of the king of Langues, were born Bernardo and Chiaramonte (Clarmont). The last died young without issue; and his parents, out of regard to his memory, gave the name of Clarmont to their castle, and called their family by the same name. Bernardo had eight sons, six legitimate, and two natural. The legitimate were duke Amon of Dordona; Buovo of Agramont, or Agrismont; Gerardo of Rossignol; Leone (Leo), afterwards pope; Otbo king of England; and Milo of Anglantes. The natural sons were Anserigi and Elfroi, by some called Sanguino and Dado. Amon had, by his wife Beatrice, five sons, Guichardo, Richardo, Rinaldo, Alardo, and Richardetto, and one daughter named Bradamant; and, according to Ariosto, he had by Constantia one natural son, afterwards called Guido Savago. Buovo of Agrismont had two legitimate sons, Vivian and Malagigi; and one natural son called Aldiger, who entertains Rogero at the castle of Agrismont in the xxvth Book. Milo of Anglantes was father to the celebrated Orlando. Of Otbo, king of England, was born Astolpho, the English duke. See Quadrio della Storia d'ogni Possia.

³ Astolpho.

⁴ He returns to Astolpho, Book xxxiii. ver. 701.

Her greeting kind, and tell him, how, detain'd,
She with reluctance from his sight remain'd;
And urge (if need to urge him) for her sake
The name of Christian knight baptiz'd to take;
Then woo her friends his amorous suit t' approve,
And tie the knot of hymeneal love. 180

By this her messenger, his generous steed
She meant to send, which, fam'd for strength and speed,

Rogero priz'd; for through the Pagan lands,
And all the realms the Gallic lord commands,
With him no steed the courser's glory claim'd,
Save Brigliadoro and Bayardo⁸ fam'd.

When good Rogero⁷ on the winged horse
Was borne aloft, a strange and fearful course,
He left Frontino, which the martial dame
Receiv'd in trust (Frontino was his name), 190
And sent to Mount Albano, where, at large,
Wanton he rovd, or fed beneath her charge
In plenteous stalls; or when he felt the rein,
Was gently pac'd along the level plain:
Thus, pamper'd high in ease, and nurs'd with care,
His shining skin more sleek, more noble seem'd his air.

And now she urg'd her virgins to divide
The pleasing task: each virgin soon apply'd
Her ready skill, and wrought, of golden thread,
A costly net, which o'er a pall they spread 200
Of finest silk, and on the courser plac'd,
With trappings gay, and rich embroidery grac'd.
A maid she chose, of long-experienc'd truth,
Whose mother, Callitraphia, nurs'd her youth
From infant years: to her she oft confess'd
How far Rogero all her soul possess'd;
Full oft his beauty and his valour rais'd,
And every grace above a mortal's prais'd.

To her she spoke—"Whom sooner shall I trust
Than thee, Hippalca dear, discreet and just? 210
In whom, like thee, of all my train," she cried,
"Can I the message of my heart confide?"
Hippalca (such the faithful damsel's name)
Was now dismiss'd; and, by the love-sick dame
Instructed in her way, receiv'd, at large,
To him (her bosom's lord) this tender charge:
To say, that while in promise late she fail'd
To reach the abbey's walls, no change prevail'd
In what she wish'd; but Fortune, that has still
The sovereign rule of all, oppos'd her will. 220
Thus she: then bade the damsel mount her steed,
And by the golden reins Frontino lead:
But should she, in her travel, chance to find
A wretch so senseless, or so base of mind,
To seize the steed, she will'd her but to tell
The courser's lord, his folly to repel:
For every knight she deem'd (whatever his fame)
In arms must tremble at Rogero's name.
Much more she said, and by her trusty maid
To tow'd Rogero greetings kind convey'd; 230
Which, treasur'd in her mind, without delay
Hippalca bade farewell⁹, and issu'd on her way.

⁸ ————no sotto il signor Gallo,
Plu bel destrier di questo, o piu gagliardo,
Eccetto Brigliadoro solo e Baiardo.

The poet seems here to have forgotten Rabican,
Astolpho's horse.

⁷ See Book iv. ver. 391.

⁸ He returns to Bradamant, Book xxiii. ver. 41.

For ten long miles* the maid her journey held,
Through beaten path, thick wood, or open field:
One noon of day descending from a height,
As on a narrow pass she chanc'd to light
Stout and rough, fierce Rodomont she view'd,
Who arm'd, on foot, a guiding dwarf pursu'd:
On her the cruel Pagan cast his eye,
And loud blasphem'd th' eternal hierarchy, 240
To find a steed so stately and so fair
Without his lord, beneath a damsel's care.
Late had he sworn, his arm the goodly horse,
He first should meet, would seize by lawless force.
Lo! this the first, and never could his need
Attain the conquest of a nobler steed.
But since to take him from a helpless maid
Hocour forbade, awhile in doubt he stay'd;
With eager looks he stood, and, gazing, cried, 249
"Why art thou here without thy warlike guide?"
"O! were he here," Hippalca said, "thy mind
Would soon forgo the purpose it design'd:
Who this bestrides, excels thy arms in fight,
And through the world scarce breathes so brave a
knight."

"What chief," return'd the Moor, "thus treads
the fame
Of others down?"—"Rogero,"—said the dame.
Then he—"The steed I mine can nobly make,
Which from Rogero fam'd in arms I take;
And should he seek his courser to regain,
I here defy him to the listed plain. 260

The weapon's choice he his—this prize I claim—
War is my sport, and Rodomont my name!
Where'er I go, my steps he may pursue,
My deeds shall ever point me forth to view:
I shine by my own light, and mark my course
With tracks more fatal than the thunder's force."

Thus he; and turning, as these words he said,
The golden bride o'er Frontino's head,
Leapt in the seat, and sudden left behind
Hippalca, weeping with distressful mind. 270
On Rodomont her threats and plaint she bends:
He hears, regardless, and the hill ascends;
Led by the dwarf, rage flushing on his cheeks,
He Doralls and Mandricardo seeks;
While the sad maid his slight indignant views,
And from afar with railings vain pursues.
Some other time shall speak¹⁰ what these befol:—
Here Turpin, from-whose page the tale I tell,
Turns to the land, where bleeding on the plain
Lies the foul traitor of Maganza slain. 280

When Amon's daughter¹¹ from the place in haste
Had turn'd her steed, and through the forest pass'd;
Thither, by different ways arriving, came
The good Zerbino, and her sex's shame¹².
He sees the body lifeless in the vale,
And tender thoughts his noble breast assail.
There Pinabello lay; and, drench'd in blood,
Pour'd from such numerous wounds the crimson
It seem'd a hundred foes, in cruel strife, {Good,
Had join'd their swords to end his wretched life.

* In the xxvith Book, on the same occasion,
Ariosto says thirty miles—a little slip of the memory.

¹⁰ He returns to Rodomont, Book xxiv. ver. 695,
and to Hippalca, Book xxvi. ver. 401.

¹¹ See the beginning of the present Book,
ver. 31.

* Sabrina, ¹² See Book xxiii. ver. 23.

The knight of Scotland was not slow to trace 291
The track of horses' feet that mark'd the place,
In hope to find where from pursuit had fled
Th' unknown assassin of the warrior dead:
Meantime he bade Sabrina to remain,
And there expect his quick return again.

Now near the scene of death Sabrina drew,
Exploring all the corpse with greedy view;
For still to every other vice she join'd
The deepest av'rice of a female mind: 300
And, but she knew not to conceal her theft,
Her hands rapacious had the knight bereft
Of every spoil; the scarf embroider'd o'er
With gold, and all the glittering arms he wore.
A belt of costly work she safely plac'd
Beneath her vest, conceal'd around her waist:

'Twas all she could; and, while of this possess'd,
The beldame griev'd in heart to leave the rest.
Zerbino now return'd, who, through the wood,
With fruitless search had Bradamant pursu'd; 310
The day declining, swift his course address'd,
With that dire hag, to find a place of rest.

Two miles remote they to a castle came (Fam'd Altariva was the castle's name),
And here they stay'd to pass th' approaching night
That quench'd the splendour of departing light.
Here scarce arriv'd, on every side they hear
The voice of loud laments invade their ear,
And tears they see from every eye-lid fall,
As if one common woe had seiz'd on all. 320

Zerbino ask'd what cause their anguish wrought;
And heard of tidings to Anselmo brought,
How, 'twixt two mountains, in a shady dell,
His son, his Pinabello, murder'd fell.
Zerbino, doubtful of some evil nigh,
Withdraws apart from every prying eye:
He deem'd their sorrows must his death bewail,
Whom late he saw lie bleeding in the vale.

Soon came the bier with Pinabello dead,
While torches round their solemn splendour shed,
To where the thickest ranks lamenting stand, 331
Raise the shrill cry, and wring the mournful hand;
Where every eye is fill'd with gushing woe,
And down the beard the trickling currents flow.
Above the rest, see, impotent in grief,
The wretched father mocks each vain relief;
While all, as sacred custom each invites,
Prepare, with pomp, the last funeral rites;
Such as of old were wont the dead to grace,
But now forgot by this degenerate race. 340

The herald from the prince declares aloud
The sovereign will, and to the murmuring crowd
Proclaims, that vast rewards the man shall gain
Who tells the wretch by whom his son was slain.
From tongue to tongue the spreading tidings flow,
From ear to ear, till all the city knew:
At last they reach'd the hag, whose fury fell
Not bears or tigers of the wood excel;
Who now Zerbino to destroy prepares;
Whether through hatred that the knight she bears;
Or that her impious soul aspir'd to show 351
A human breast that mock'd at human woe;
Or whether greedy gain her purpose wrought;
The presence of th' afflicted earl she sought;
There first with plausible speech his ear amus'd,
And good Zerbino of the deed accus'd,
Then from her lap, to prove the story true,
The costly belt produc'd in open view,
Which, seen, too well the wretched parent knew.

With tears, his hands uplifting to the skies, 360
"Thou shalt not perish unreveng'd!"—he cries;
Then bids surround the house.—With furious
The people, rous'd, obey their ruler's will; [zeal
And while no danger near Zerbino knows,
He finds himself a prisoner to his foes,
Giv'n to Anselmo's rage, when sunk to rest
Refreshing sleep his heavy eyes depress'd.
Him in a darksome cell that night detain'd,
They kept in shackles and with bolts restrain'd,
Condemn'd to suffer for imputed guilt, 370
In that sad valley where the blood was spilt.
No further proof there needs the fact to try;
Their lord has sentenc'd, and th' accus'd must die.

When from her couch Aurora made return,
With many-colour'd beams to paint the morn,
The populace, as with one voice, demand
The prisoner's life, and press on every hand
With horse and foot; Zerbino thence they led
To atone the blood another's hand had shed.
On a low steed the knight of Scotland rides, 380
His noble arms close pinion'd to his sides,
And head cast down: but God, who still defends
The guiltless that for help on him depends,
Already watchful o'er the warrior's state,
Prepares to snatch him from the hand of fate.
Orlando thither comes, and comes to save
The prince from shame and an untimely grave:
Along the plain he view'd the swarming crew,
That to his death the wretched champion drew.
Galego's daughter, Isabella fair, 390
With him he brought, who, from the watry war
Aid bulging vessel sav'd, was doom'd, at land,
Th' unhappy captive of a lawless band;
She, whose lov'd form Zerbino's heart possess'd,
More dear than life that warm'd his faithful breast.

Orlando, since he freed the gentle maid,
Had watch'd beside her with a guardian's aid.
When on the subject plain her eyes she bent,
She ask'd Orlando what the concourse meant: 399
" 'Tis mine to learn the cause,"—the warrior said,
Then left his charge, and down the mountain sped.
The throng he join'd; when, from th' ignoble train,
Zerbino soon he singled on the plain;
And by his outward looks, at first, divin'd
The chief a baron of no vulgar kind.
Approaching near, he ask'd his cause of shame,
And whither led in bands, and whence he came.

At this, his head the mourning champion rear'd,
And, when the Paladin's demand he heard,
With brief reply his piteous tale disclos'd, 410
In truth sincere, that soon the earl dispos'd,
For his defence, to combat on his side,
Who, guiltless of the charge, unjustly dy'd.
But when he found that Altariva's lord
The sentence pass'd, the nobler sufferer's word
Stood more confirm'd; for in Anselmo's breast
He deem'd that justice ne'er her seat possess'd.
Between Maganza's house, and Clormont, reign'd
A lineal hate, from sire to son maintain'd. 419
Then to the herd he turn'd with threaten'ing cry:
"Ye crafty bands! release the knight, or die!"
"And who is he," said one to prove his zeal,
In luckless hour, "that thus with words would kill?"
Well was his menace, were our feeble frame
Of wax or straw, and his consuming flame."

He said; and ran against the knight of France;
And him Orlando met with risted lance.

That glittering armour, which the night before
The fierce Maganza from Zerbino tore,
Now proudly worn, could not the death prevent,
Which from his spear Aglantes' warrior sent. 431
On his right cheek was driv'n the pointed wood,
And though the temper'd helm the point withstood,
The neck refus'd the furious stroke to bear;
The bone snapt short, and life dissolv'd in air.

At once, while yet the spear remain'd in rest,
He pierc'd another through the panting breast;
There left the lance, and Durindana drew,
And midst the thickest press resistless flew.
Of this, the skull in equal parts he cleaves; 440
That, of his head at one fierce stroke bereaves:
Some in the neck he thrust—a moment's space
Beholds a hundred dead, or held in chase.

A third are slain, or fly with fear oppress'd:
His thundering falchion knows nor pause nor rest.
This quits his helmet; that, his cumbrous shield;
All cast their useless weapons on the field.
Some leap the fosse, some scour the broad-way side;
In forests some, and some in caverns hide:

That day Orlando gave his wrath the rein, 450
And will'd that none should there alive remain:
As Turpin writes, from whom the truth I tell,
Full fourscore breathless by his weapon fell.

The throug dispers'd, he to Zerbino press'd,
Whose anxious heart yet trembled in his breast:
What words can speak Zerbino's alter'd cheer,
Soon as he saw his brave deliverer near?
Low had he fall'n, and prostrate on the ground
Ador'd the knight, from whom such aid he found;
But to the steed his feet with cords were bound.
Orlando now his limbs from shackles freed, 461
And help'd him to resume his warlike weed,
Which late the captain of Maganza's train
Had worn in battle, but had worn in vain.

Meanwhile, Zerbino Isabella view'd,
Who on the neighbouring height attentive stood,
Till peace succeeding now to war's alarms,
She left the hill, and, bright in blooming charms,
Approach'd the field, where, when she nearer
drew,

In her his best-belov'd Zerbino knew: 470
Her, whom from lying fame he mourn'd as lost
In roving billows on the rocky coast.
As with a bolt of ice, his heart became
All freezing cold; a trembling seiz'd his frame:
But soon a feverish heat, succeeding, spread
Through every part, and dy'd his cheeks with red.
Love bade him rush, and clasp her to his breast:
But reverence for Aglantes' lord repress'd
His eager wish—and, ah! too sure he thought
Her virgin grace the stranger's soul had caught. 480

From arrows thus to deeper sorrows cast,
He finds how soon his mighty joys are past:
And better could he bear to lose her charms
By death, than see her in another's arms:
But most to find her in his power he griev'd,
Whose sword so late his threaten'd life repriv'd:
No other knight (how'er in battle prov'd)
Had pass'd unquestion'd with the maid he lov'd.
But what the earl had wrought that glorious day,
Impell'd him every grateful mood to pay, 490
And at the champion's feet his head subjected lay.

Thus journeying on, the knights and princely
maid,
At length dismounting, near a fountain stay'd:

The wearied earl relens'd his laden brows,
And bade Zerbino there his helm unclose.
Soon as the fair her lover's face espies,
From her soft cheek the rosy colour flies,
Then swift returns—so looks the humid flower
When Sol's bright beams succeed the drizzling shower:

Careless of aught, she runs with eager pace¹⁴, 500
And clasps Zerbino with a dear embrace;
There, while in silence to his neck she grows,
Tear following tear, his face and breast o'erflows.
Orlando, by their side, attentive stands,
Their meeting marks, nor other proof demands
That this unknown, who late his succour prov'd,
Was prince Zerbino by the dame belov'd.

Soon as the fair-one rais'd her voice to speak,
(The drops yet hanging on her tender cheek)
Her grateful lips no other could proclaim 510
Than the full praises of Orlando's name,
His valorous succour for her sake bestow'd,
And every courtesy the warrior show'd.
Zerbino, who so lov'd the princely maid,
Her good with his in equal scales he weigh'd:
Low at his knee the generous earl ador'd.
Who in one day had twice his life restor'd.

Thus they: when sudden from the neighbouring brake [shake;

They heard, with rustling sound, the branches
Each to his naked head his helm apply'd: 520
Each seiz'd the reins; but, ere he could bestride
His foaming courser, from the woodland came,
Before their sight, a champion and a dame¹⁵.
The knight was Mandricardo, who pursu'd
Orlando's track, till Doralis he view'd:

But when the warrior from her numerous band
Had won the daisiel with his conquering hand,
The zeal grew slack that urg'd him to obtain
Revenge on him, who on the bloody plain
Had Manilardo quell'd, and young Alzirdo slain.
He knew not yet the sable chief, whose might 531
Had rais'd his envy, was Aglantes' knight;
Though him his deeds and fair report proclaim
A wand'ring champion of no common fame.

Him (while beside unmark'd Zerbino stood,)
From head to foot fierce Mandricardo view'd,
And, finding every sign describ'd agree,
"Lo! thou the man," he cried, "I wish to see.
Ten days my anxious search, from plain to plain,
Has trac'd thy course, but trac'd till now in vain:
So have thy deeds, in all our camp confest, 541
With rival envy fir'd my swelling breast,
For hundreds sent by thee to Pluto's straud,
Where scarcely one escap'd thy dreadful hand,
To tell the numbers which thy weapon slew
Of Tremizen and Norway's valiant crew;
I was not slow to follow, with thy sight
To feast my eyes, and prove thy force in fight.
Full well-inform'd I know thy sable dress;
Thy vest and armour him I seek couless. 550

¹⁴ It may at first appear extraordinary, that this discovery should not have happened before, as, by the poet's words, Zerbino may be supposed to have declared his name to Orlando when the Paladin first accosted him; but it must be observed, in defence of Ariosto, that Isabella was not then present, being left by Orlando on the hill during the battle.

¹⁵ See Book xiv. ver. 490.

But were not such external marks reveal'd,
And didst thou with a thousand lurk conceal'd,
Thy bold demeanour must too surely tell
That thou art he in battle prov'd so well."

"Thee too, no less," Orlando thus replied,
"All must pronounce a knight of valour try'd;
For thoughts so noble never shall we find
The tenants of a base degenerate mind.
If me thou com'st to view—indulge thy will—
Unloose my helmet, and behold thy fill | 560
But having view'd me well, proceed to prove (What most thy generous envy seem'd to move)
How much in arms my prowess may compare
With that demeanour thou hast held so fair."

"'T is there I fix my wish," the Pagan cried,
"My first demand is fully satisfied."
Meanwhile the earl from head to foot explor'd
The Tartar round, but view'd nor ax nor sword;
Then ask'd what weapon must the fight maintain,
Should his first onset with the lance be vain. 570
"Heed not my want," he said, "this single spear
Has often taught my bravest foes to fear:
A solemn oath I took, no sword to wear,
Till Durindana from the earl I bear:

Him through the world I seek—for such my vow,
When first I plac'd this helmet o'er my brow:
Which, with these arms, I conquer'd—all of yore,
By Hector worn a thousand years before.

This sword alone was wanting to the rest,
How soe'er, I know not; but of this possess 580
'T is said the Paladin subdues his foes,
And hence his courage more undaunted grows:
But let me once his arm in combat join,
His ill-got spoils he quickly shall resign:
Yet more—my bosom glows with fierce desire
To avenge the death of Agrican, my sire,
Whom base Orlando slew in treacherous strife,
Nor could he else have reach'd his noble life."

The earl, no longer silent, stern replies:
"Thou ly'st, and each that dares affirm it lies. 590
Chance gives thee what thou seek'st—Orlando view
In me, who Agrican with honour slew.
Behold the sword thou long hast wish'd to gain,
And, if thou seek'st, with glory mayst obtain.
Though justly mine, yet will I now contend
With thee my claim, and to a tree suspend
The valu'd prize, which rightly thou shalt take,
If me thy force can slay, or prisoner make."

He said: and instant from his side unbrac'd,
And Durindana on a sapling plac'd. 600
Already now they part to half the space,
Sent from the bow, a whizzing shaft can trace:
Already each on each impels his steed,
And gives the reins at freedom to his speed:
Already each directs his spear aright,
Where the clos'd helmet but admits the light,
The ash seems brittle ice, and to the sky
With sudden crash a thousand splinters fly.

The staves break short—yet neither knight would yield 609

One foot, one inch—then wheeling round the field
Again they meet, and with the vant-plate¹⁶ rear,
Firm in each grasp, the truncheon of the spear
That yet remain'd—these chiefs that once engag'd,
With sword or lance, like rustics now engag'd,
(Whose blows dispute the stream or meadow's right)
With shatter'd staves pursu'd a cruel fight.

Four times they struck, the fourth the truncheon broke

Close to the wrist, nor bore another stroke:
While either knight, as mutual fury reign'd,
Alone with gauntlet arm'd the strife maintain'd:
Where'er they grapple, plate and steely scale 611
They rend asunder, and disjoint the mail:
Not ponderous hammers fall with weightier blows,
Not clasps of iron stronger can enclose

With gripping hold.—What now remains to save
The Pagan's honour who the challenge gave?
Or what in such a fruitless fight avail'd,
Where more th' assailant suffer'd than th' assail'd?
Each nerve exerting, with Orlando clos'd
The Pagan warrior, breast to breast oppos'd, 620
In hope with him the like success to prove,
As with Antæus once, the son of Jove.

With both his arms he grasps the mighty foe,
Tugs with full force, and draws him to and fro:
He foams, he raves—he scarcely can contain
His rising rage, nor heeds his courser's rein.
Collected in himself, Orlando tries
Whatever advantage strength or skill supplies.

His hand he to the Pagan's steed extends,
And from his head by chance the bridle rends. 640
The Saracen with every art essays,
In vain, his rival from the seat to raise:

But, firm, with pressing knees, the earl preserves
His saddle still, nor here nor there he swerves;
Till, yielding to the Pagan's furious force,
The girth breaks short, and sudden from his horse
Orlando falls to earth; but still his feet
The stirrups keep, and still, as in the seat,
His thighs are strain'd, while, with a clanking
sound,

His armour rattled as he touch'd the ground. 650
The adverse courser, from the bridle freed,
Across the champaign bends with rapid speed
His devious way: when thus the fair espy'd
Her lover borne from her unguarded side;
Without his presence fearful to remain,
His flight to trace she turns her palfrey's rein.

The haughty Pagan, as his courser flies,
Now soothes, now strikes, and now with angry cries
He threats the beast, as if with sense endu'd,
Who, mindless of his lord, his way pursu'd. 660
Three miles he bore, and still had borne the knight,
But that a crossing ditch oppos'd their flight:
There fell both man and horse: the Pagan struck
Against the ground, but from the dangerous shock
Escap'd unhurt; and here concludes his speed;
But how unbridled shall he guide the steed?
Him by the ruff'd mane, in furious mood,
The Tartar seiz'd, and now debating stood
What course to take.—To whom the damsel cried,
"Lo! from my palfrey be your need supply'd; 670
Bridled or loose, mine, patient of command,
Obeys the voice, and answers to the hand."

The Pagan deem'd it ill a knight became
To accept the proffer of a courteous dame;
But Fortune, wont her kindly aid to give,
Found better means that might his wants relieve,
And sent Gabriela to the place convey'd,
Who, since her guile Zerbino had betray'd,
Shunn'd every stranger, like the wolf that flies
The hunters' voice, and dogs' pursuing cries. 680
This beladame now the youthful vestments wore,
Which Pinabello's dame had worn before;
She press'd the saddle (late her gorgeous seat)
And unawares the Tartar chanc'd to meet.

¹⁶ The part by which the spear was held.

King Stordilano's daughter¹⁷, and her knight,
Beheld with laughter such an uncouth sight;
The dress ill-suited her unseemly shape,
And wither'd features like a grandam ape!
From her, his courser's bridle to supply,
He takes the reins; then, with a shouting cry, 690
Her palfrey drives, that to the forest bears
The trampling croce expiring with her fears,
Through rough or even paths, o'er hills and dales,
By hanging cliffs, deep streams, or gloomy vales.

But let us to pursue¹⁸ her tale forbear,
When brave Orlando better claims our care:
His saddle now repair'd, and every need
Supply'd, he mounted on his warlike steed:
Awhile he stay'd, in hopes, ere long, to view
His foe return, the combat to renew; 700
At length resolv'd the Tartar to pursue.
Yet, ere he went, as one whose deeds express'd
The soft effusions of a courteous breast,
With gentle speech, fair smiles, and open look,
He friendly leave of both the lovers took.

Zerbino mourn'd to quit the generous chief;
And Isabella wept with tender grief:
The noble earl their earnest suit refus'd
To share his fortune, and to each excus'd
What honour must deny; for greater shame, 710
He urg'd, could never stain a warrior's name,
Than, in the day of glorious strife, to make
A friend his danger and his toils partake.
He then besought them, if the Pagan knight
(Ere him he met) should chance on them to light,
To tell him that Orlando meant to wait
Three days at hand to end the stern debate,
So late begun; and thence direct his course
To where imperial Charles encamp'd his force,
Beneath the numerous banners rang'd, and where
The Tartar prince to seek him might repair. 721

This done: as each his separate fortune guides,
Zerbino here, and there Orlando rides:¹⁹
But ere the valiant earl the place forsook,
His trusty falchion from the tree he took.

The winding course the Pagan's steed pursu'd
Through the thick covert of the entangled wood
Perplex'd Orlando, who, with fruitless pain,
Two days had follow'd, nor his sight could gain;
Then reach'd a stream that through a meadow led,
Whose vivid turf an emerald carpet spread, 731
Spangled with flowers of many a dazzling hue,
Where numerous trees in beauteous order grew,
Whose shadowy branches gave a kind retreat
To flocks and naked swains from mid-day heat.
With ponderous cuirass, shield, and helm, oppress'd,
Orlando soon the welcome gales confess'd;
And entering here to seek a short repose,
In evil chance a dreadful seat he chose;
A seat, where every hope must fade away 740
On that unhappy, that detested day.

There, casting round a casual glance, he view'd
Full many a tree, that trembled o'er the flood,
Inscrib'd with words, in which, as near he drew,
The hand of his Angelica he knew.

This place was one, of many a mead and bower,
For which Medoro, at the sultry hour²⁰,

Of left the shepherd's cot, by love inspir'd,
And with Cathay's unrival'd queen retir'd.
Angelica and her Medoro twin'd, 750
In amorous posies on the sylvan rind,
He sees, while every letter proves a dart,
Which love infixes in his bleeding heart.
Fain would be by a thousand ways deceive
His cruel thoughts, fain would he not believe
What yet he must—then hopes some other fair
The name of his Angelica may bear.
“But, ah!” he cried, “too surely can I tell
These characters oft seen and known, so well—
Yet should this fiction but conceal her love, 760
Medoro then may blest Orlando prove.”

Thus, self-deceiv'd, forlorn Orlando strays
Still far from truth, still wanders in the maze
Of doubts and fears, while in his breast he tries
To feed that hope his better sense denies.
So the poor bird, that from the fields of air
Lights in the fraudulent gin or viscous snare,
The more he flutters, and the subtle wiles
Attempts to 'scape, the faster makes the toils.

Now came Orlando where the pendent hill, 770
Cur'd in an arch, o'er-hung the limpid rill:
Around the cavern's mouth were seen to twine
The creeping ivy and the curling vine.

Oft here the happy pair were wont to waste
The noontide heats, embracing and embrac'd;
And chiefly here, inscrib'd or carv'd, their names
Innumerable witness'd to their growing flames.
Alighting here, the warrior pensive stood,
And at the grotto's rustic entrance view'd 779
Words, by the hand of young Medoro wrought;
And fresh they seem'd, as when his amorous thought
For bliss enjoy'd his grateful thanks express'd,
And first in tuneful verse his passion dress'd.
Such in his native tongue might sure excel,
And thus, in ours transfus'd, the sense I tell.

“Hail! lovely plants, clear streams, and meadows green;

And thou, dear cave, whose cool-sequester'd scene
No sun molcots! where she, of royal strain,
Angelica, by numbers woo'd in vain,
Daughter of Galaphron, with heavenly charms 790
Was oft enfolded in these happy arms!
O! let me, poor Medoro, thus repay
Such boundless rapture; thus with every lay
Of grateful praise the tender bosom move,
Lords, knights, and dames, that know the sweets
of love:

Each traveller, or hind of low degree,
Whom choice or fortune leads the place to see;
Till all shall cry—“Thou Sun! thou Moon, attend!
This fountain, grotto, mead, and shade defend!
Guard them, ye choir of nymphs! nor let the swain
With flocks or herds the sacred haunts profane!”²¹

These verses, in Arabian written, drew
The knight's attention, who their idiota knew.
To him full well was many a language known,
But chiefly this, familiar to his own:
Such knowledge sav'd him oft, in distant lands,
From wrong and shame amid the Pagan hands.
But, ah! no more th' advantage shall he boast,
That in one fatal hour so dearly cost!

Three times he reads, as oft he reads again 810
The cruel lines; as oft he strives, in vain,
To give each sense the lie, and fondly tries
To disbelieve the witness of his eyes;
While at each word he feels the jealous smart,
And sudden coldness freezing at his heart.

Fix'd on the stone, in stiffening gaze, that prov'd
His secret pangs, he stood with looks unmov'd,
A seeming statue! while the godlike light
Of reason nearly seem'd eclips'd in night.
Confide in him, who by experience knows, 820
This is the woe surpassing other woes!
From his sad brow the wonted cheer is fled,
Low on his breast declines his drooping head;
Nor can he find (while grief each sense o'erbears)
Voice for his plaints, or moisture for his tears.
Impatient sorrow socks its way to force,
But with too eager haste retards the cure.
As when a full-brain'd vase, with ample waist
And slender entrance form'd, is downward plac'd.
And stands revers'd, the rushing waters pent, 830
All crowd at once to issue at the vent:
The narrow vent the struggling tide restrains,
And scarcely drop by drop the bubbling liquor drains.

He wishes—hopes—believes some foe might
A falsehood to defile his fair-one's name; [frame
Or with dire malice, by the tainting breath
Of jealous rage, to work his certain death.
Yet he, who'er the foe, his skill had prov'd
In feigning well the characters below'd.

When now the Sun had to his sister's reign 840
Resign'd the skies, Orlando mounts again
His Brigiadoro's hack, and soon espies
The curling smoke from neighbouring hamlets rise.
The herds are heard to low, the dogs to bay;
And to the village now his lonely way
Orlando takes, there pale and languid leaves
His Brigiadoro, where a youth receives
The generous courser; while, with ready haste,
One from the champion has his mail unbrac'd:
One takes his spurs of gold; and one from rust 850
His armour scours and cleanses from the dust.

Lo! this the cot, where, feeble with his wound,
Medoro lay, where wondrous chance he found.

No nourishment the warrior here desir'd,
On grief he fed, nor other food requir'd.
He sought to rest, but ah! the more he sought,
New pangs were added to his troubled thought:
Where'er he turn'd his sight, he still descri'd
The hated words inscrib'd on every side.

He would have spoke, but held his peace in fear
To know the truth he dreaded most to hear. 861

The gentle swain, who mark'd his secret grief,
With cheerful speech, to give his pains relief,
Told all th' adventure that the pair befel,
Which oft before his tongue was wont to tell
To every guest that gave a willing ear,
For many a guest was pleas'd the tale to hear.
He told how to his cot the virgin brought
Medoro wounded: how his cure she wrought,
While in her bosom Love's impoison'd dart 870
With deeper wound transfix'd her bleeding heart:
Hence, mindless of her birth, a princess bred,
Rich India's heir, she deign'd, by passion led,
A friendless youth of low estate to wed.

In witness of his tale, the peasant show'd
The bracelet by Angelica bestow'd,
Departing thence, her token of regard,
His hospitable welcome to reward.

This fatal proof, his well-known present, left
Of every gleam of hope his soul bereft: 880
Love, that had tortur'd long his wretched thrall,
With this concluding stroke determin'd all.

At length, from every vent retir'd apart,
He gives full vent to his o'erlabour'd heart:

Now from his eyes the streaming shower releas'd,
Stains his pale cheek, and wanders down his breast;
Deeply he groans, and, staggering with his woe,
On the lone bed his listless body throws,
But rests no more than if in wilds forlorn,
Stretch'd on the naked rock or pointed thorn. 890
While thus he lay, he sudden call'd to mind,
That on the couch, where then his limbs reclin'd,
His faithless mistress, and her paramour,
Had oft with love beguil'd the amorous hour.
Stung with the thought, the hated down he flies:
Not swifter from the turf is seen to rise

The swain, who, courting grateful sleep, perceives
A serpent darting through the rustling leaves.
Each object now is loathsome to his sight; 900
The bed—the cot—the swain—he heeds no light
To guide his steps, nor Dian's silver ray,
Nor cheerful dawn, the harbinger of day.

He takes his armour, and his steed he takes,
And through surrounding gloom impatient makes
His darkling way, there vents his woes alone,
In many a dreadful plaint and dreary groan.
Unceasing still he weeps, unceasing mourns;
Alike to him the night, the day returns;
Cities and towns he shuns; in woods he lies,
His bed the earth, his canopy the skies. 910

He wonders oft what fountain can supply
His flood of grief; how sigh succeeds to sigh.

"These are not tears," he cried, "that ceaseless
Far other signs are these that speak my woe. [How;
Before the fire my vital moisture flies,
And now, exhaling, issues at my eyes:

Lo! thus it streams, and thus shall ever epend,
Till with its course my life and sorrows end.

These are not sighs that thus my torments show;
Sighs have a pause, but these no respite know. 920

Love burns my heart! these are the gales he makes,
As round the flame his fanning wings he shakes.
How canst thou, wondrous Love!! surround with sire,

Yet, unconsum'd, preserve my heart entire?
I am not he²², the man my looks proclaim,
The man that lately bore Orlando's name;
He, by his fair one's cruel falsehood, dies;
And now, interr'd, her hapless victim lies.

I am his spirit freed from mortal chains,
Doom'd in this hell to rove with endless pains; 930
A wretched warning here on Earth to prove
For all henceforth who put their trust in love."

Through the still night, the earl from shade to shade

Thus lonely rovd, and when the day display'd
Its twilight gleam, chance to the fountain led
His wandering course, where first his fate he read
In fond Medoro's strains—the sight awakes
His torpid sense, each patient thought forsakes

His maddening breast, that rage and hatred breathes,
And from his side he swift the sword unsheathes. 940

He hews the rock, he makes the letters fly;
The shatter'd fragments mount into the sky;

Hapless the cave whose stones, the trees whose Bear with Angelica Medoro join'd; [rind,

From that cur'd day no longer to receive,
And flocks or swains with cooling shade relieve;

²¹ It is much to be regretted, that the poet has disgraced this passage with such poor conceits.

²² Imitated from Catullus.

Non ego sed tenuis vulpula umbra mea.

While that fair fountain, late so silvery pure,
Remain'd as little from his arm secure:
Together boughs and earthen clods he drew,
Craggs, stones, and trunks, and in the waters threw; 950
Deep to its bed, with ooze and mud he spoil'd
The murmuring current, and its spring defil'd.
His limbs now moisten'd with a briny tide,
When strength no more his senseless wrath supplied,

Prose on the turf he sunk, unner'd and spent,
All motionless, his looks on Heav'n intent,
Stretch'd without food or sleep; while thrice the Sun

Had stay'd, and thrice his daily course had run.
The fourth dire morn, with frantic rage possess'd,
He rends the armour from his back and breast: 960
Here lies the helmet, there the bossy shield,
Cuirasses and cuirass further spread the field;
And all his other arms at random strow'd,
In divers parts he scatters through the wood;
Then from his body strips the covering vest,
And bares his sinewy limbs and hairy cheat;
And now begins such feats of boundless rage,
As far and near th' astonish'd world engage.

His sword he left, else had his dreadful hand
With blood and borrow fill'd each wasted land: 970
But little, pole-ax, sword, or mace he needs
To assist his strength, that every strength exceeds.

First his huge grasp a lofty pine up-tears
Sheer by the roots, alike another fares
Of equal growth; as easy round him strow'd,
As lowly weeds, or shrubs, or dwarfish wood.
Vast oaks and elms before his fury fall;
The stately fir, tough ash, and cedar tall.
As when a fowler for the field prepares
His sylvan warfare; ere he spreads his snares, 980
From stubble, reeds, and furze, th' obstructed
land

Around he clears: no less Orlando's hand
Levels the trees that long had tower'd above,
For rolling years the glory of the grove!
The rustic swains that mid the woodland shade
Heard the loud crash, forsook their flocks that stray'd

Without a shepherd, while their masters flew
To learn the tumult and the wonder view'd.

Thus far I've reach'd, but further to extend
The present story might, perchance, offend; 990
And rather would I here defer the rest,
Than with a tedious tale your ear molest.

²³ This book concludes with one of the finest incidents in the poem, which gives name to the whole work, the madness of Orlando. The narrative begins at ver. 725. Few passages, in any author, excel the remaining part of the book; and it is surely needless to point out to the reader of taste and discernment the pathos and fire of the poet, whether we contemplate his hero in the first dawn of his jealousy, or through the gradual progress of this passion, in which, while he seems to fly from conviction, he finds, by a train of concurrent circumstances, most artfully brought together, the truth forced upon him, till at length he breaks out into a phrensy, that closes the book with wonderful sublimity!

BOOK XXIV.

THE ARGUMENT.

The extravagant feats of Orlando in his madness, Zerbino and Isabella are met by Almonio and Corebo, who bring Odorico, bound, to receive from Zerbino the punishment for his infidelity. Arrival of Gabrina, and the sentence pass'd on these two by Zerbino. Zerbino fights with Mandricardo in defence of Orlando's sword: issue of the combat. Meeting of Mandricardo and Rodomont: a dreadful battle between them for Doralis, till, on the appearance of a messenger from the Pagan camp, and at the request of Doralis, they agree to break off the combat and go to the assistance of Agramant.

WROUEN his feet on Cupid's snare shall set,
Must seek to escape, ere in th' entangling net
His wings are caught; for sage experience tells,
In love's ext-eme, extreme of madness dwells.
Though each may rage not with the wild excess
Orlando rag'd, their phrensy all express
By different ways—what more our folly shows,
Than while we others seek, ourselves to lose?
Various th' effects of this destructive flame,
The first dire cause of phrensy is the same: 10
Love is a forest, where the lover strays
From path to path, bewild'rd in the maze;
And he who leads his life in amorous pain,
Deserves to feel the gyves and shackling chain.
Here some may cry—"Brother, thy words have shown

Another's faults, forgetful of thy own."
Yes—in my intervals of sense I see
My bosom's conflict with the charge agree:
Yet have I striu'n, and hope in time to cure
The wounds I now from beauty's shafts endure. 20

I told, how from his limbs Orlando drew
Furious his arms, and o'er the forest threw
The scatter'd harness; how his vest he rent,
And to the ground his fatal falchion sent:
How trees he rooted, while the woods around
And cavern'd rocks re-echo'd to the sound:
Till rustic swains, to where the tumult spread,
Their grievous sins, or cruel planets led.
As nearer now the madman they beheld. 29
Whose feats of strength all human strength excell'd,
They turn'd to fly; but knew not where, nor whence,
Such sudden fears distract'd every sense.
Swift he pursu'd, and one who vainly fled
He seiz'd, and from the shoulders rent the head!

¹ Hear the description of the extravagant and ludicrous feats performed by Orlando in his madness, which passages of our author Cervantes seems to ridicule, when he represents Don Quixote in the sable mountain, debating whether he shall imitate the melancholy phrensy of Amadis de Gaul, or the more boisterous fury of Orlando.

"Have I not told you," said Don Quixote, "that I design to imitate Amadis, acting here the desperado, the senseless, and the madman: at the same time copying the valiant Don Orlando, when he found, by the side of a fountain, some indications that Angelica the Fair had dishonour'd herself with Medoro: at grief whereof he ran mad,

Easy, as from the stalk, or tender shoot,
A peasant crops the flower, or plucks the fruit;
The lifeless body by the legs he took,
And, as a club, against his fellows shook.
Two stretch'd on earth in lasting slumber lay,
Perchance to rise not till the judgment day. 40
The rest were soon dispers'd on every side,
So well advis'd their rapid feet they ply'd;
Nor had the madman loiter'd to pursue,
But on their herds with headlong speed he flew.
The labouring hinds the peril near survey'd,
And left their ploughs, with all the rural trade
Of scythes and spades, while, seiz'd with pale affright,

One climbs a roof, and one the temple's height,
(Since elms and oaks avail not,) trembling there,
They view the dreadful havoc from afar. 50
Before his fury steeds and oxen yield,
And swift the courier that escapes the field.

Now might ye hear in every village rise
Tumultuous clamours, blending human cries
With rustic horns and pipes; while echo'd round
The pealing bells from neighbouring steeples sound.

All seize such weapons as the time provides,
Bows, slings, and staves; and down the mountain's sides

A thousand rush; while from the dells below
As many swarm against a single foe. 60

As when the tide appears the shore to lave,
The southern wind impelling wave on wave,
Scarce curls the first, the second deeper swells,
And this, the third with rising force exceeds;
Till more and more the victor-food ascends,
And o'er the sands his liquid scourge extends:
Th' increasing thro'gs Orlando thus assail,
Pour down the hill, and issue from the vale.

Ten wretches first, then other ten he slew,
That near his hand in wild disorder drew. 70
None from his fated skin could draw the blood;
His skin unhurt each weapon's stroke withstood:

tore up trees by the roots, disturbed the waters of the crystal springs, slew the shepherds, destroyed flocks, fired cottages, demolished houses, dragged mares on the ground, and did a hundred thousand other extravagancies, worthy to be recorded, and had in eternal remembrance. And supposing that I do not intend to imitate Roldau, or Orlando, or Rotelando (for he had all these three names) in every point, and in all the mad things he acted, said, and thought, I will make a sketch of them the best I can, in what I judge the most essential. And, perhaps, I may satisfy myself with only copying Amadis, who, without playing any mischievous pranks, by weepings and tendernesses, arrived to as great a fame as the best of them all.⁹

Jarvis's Don Quixote, Vol. I. b. ii. c. 11.

Though much of the satire in the above citation must be allowed to be just, and though most of the actions recorded of Orlando in his madness may be given up to all the severity of criticism; yet no part of the description in the foregoing book, notwithstanding several of the circumstances are unfairly included in the ridicule of Cervantes, can be censured by any discerning reader: but let the whole of the passage be tried by the standard of truth and nature, and compared with whatever is excellent of the kind in ancient or modern poetry, and surely Ariosto will not lose by the comparison.

To him such wondrous grace the King of Heaven
To guard his faith and holy church had given.
Could aught of mortal risk Orlando's life,
Great were his risk in this unequal strife:
Then had he miss'd the mail he late unbraç'd,
And miss'd the falchion which aside he cast.

The crowds, that view'd each weapon aim'd in vain,

With backward steps retreated from the plain; 80
When mad Orlando, who no further thought,
The rustic dwellings of a hamlet sought:
All thence were fled; yet there in plenteous store
He found such food as suits the village poor,
Of homely kind;—but prest with pining fast
On roots or bread his eager hands he cast;
Greedy alike devour'd what'er he saw,
Or savoury viands bak'd, or morsels raw:
Then through the country round, with rapid pace,
To man and beast alike he gave the chase; 90
Through the deep covert of the tangled wood
The timble goat or light-foot deer pursu'd.
Oft on the bear and tusky boar he flew,
And, with his single arm, in combat slew;
Then, with their flesh, his savage spoils of fight
Insatiate gorg'd his ravenous appetite.

Thus o'er the realm of France, from land to land,

He ran, till on a day a bridge he gain'd,
Where swift (enclos'd in craggy banks and steep)
A river pours its current broad and deep, 100
And built beside a stately castle stands,
That far around the subject fields commands.
What there ensu'd some future time shall tell;
Now turn to what Zerbino² next befel.

Orlando gone, awhile Zerbino stood,
Then took the path the Paladin pursu'd;
Scarce past a mile, slow riding, when he spy'd
A recreant knight with hauds behind him ty'd,
Plac'd on a humble steed, and for his guard,
On either side a knight in arms prepar'd. 110

Full soon Zerbino, as he nearer drew,
Full soon the lovely Isabella knew
False Odorico, trusted late to keep
Her virgin charms, like wolves to watch the sheep.
Him had the prince preferr'd o'er every friend,
From ill or shame his mistress to defend;
Nor could he think that faith, to him so prov'd,
Would fail to her, whom more than life he lov'd.

Then chanc'd fair Isabella to unfold
Her past escapes; and all the tale she told. 120
How, ere her vessel bulg'd beneath the wave,
She sought the bark her sinking life to save:
How Odorico had his faith betray'd;
And how the outlaws to their cave convey'd
Her helpless youth,—and scarce these words she said,

When, lo! she saw the traitor prisoner led,
The two, who thither brought the faithless knight,
On Isabella cast their wondering sight,
As one they oft had seen; with her they guess'd
Their dearest lord, the partner of her breast, 130
Companion rode; for well his blazon'd shield
The colours of his noble line reveal'd.
Approaching near, they saw with raptur'd eyes
His well-known face confirm their first surmise.

² Orlando appears again Book xxix. ver. 231.
The last we heard of Zerbino was when he parted
from Orlando, Book xxiii. ver. 722.

Swift from their steeds they leapt, with eager pace,
And open arms, impatient to embrace
Zerbino's knees: bareheaded now they stood
Before his sight, and lowly reverent bow'd.

Zerbino fix'd on each his earnest view,
And soon Corebo and Almonio knew; 140
Those well-try'd friends, to whom he gave the care
With Odorico to protect the fair.

Almonio then—"Since Heaven has pleas'd once
more

To thee thy Isabella to restore,
Why should I now, my much-lov'd lord, relate,
What well thou know'st—why in this captive state
You call'dst rides—for she, the fair betray'd,
Has long ere this his treacherous guilt display'd;
Has told, how, by his base and guileful art
Deceiv'd, the wretch induc'd me to depart: 150
How brave Corebo, to defend her, stood,
And, deeply wounded, shed his generous blood.

"Attend the sequel—From the town in haste,
With steeds and menials to the strand I pass'd;
Still casting round my eager eyes to find
The friends and virgin whom I left behind.
Foremost I spur'd, and travers'd all the shore,
Search'd every part their feet had trod before:
In vain—no sign appear'd on either hand,
But some new marks of footsteps on the sand. 160
I follow'd these, and thence my course convey'd
Beneath the covert of the woodland shade:
Led by the sound of arms, at length I found
Unblest Corebo bleeding on the ground—

"Where is our virgin-charge I left so late?
Where Odorico? say, what adverse fate
Has bere reduc'd thee to this wretched state?"
Thus I— and now the fatal truth reveal'd,
I sought th' apostate wretch; the wretch conceal'd
Deceiv'd my search, and, all the day bequill'd, 170
Through wood and brake I wander'd in the wild;
At length return'd to where a crimson tide
From pale Corebo's wounds the herbage dy'd;
Where (speedy help delay'd) the gloomy grave
Alone could take what art refus'd to save;
Where friars and monks might funeral rites prepare,
When vain the healing couch and leech's care.

"Then from the woodland to the town I bore
The fainting youth, his vigour to restore;
Where soon our host a sage physician found, 180
With sovereign plants to close each bleeding wound.
Corebo our'd, he took his arms and horse;
To find the wretch we bent our eager course;
Him in Alphonso's regal court I met,
And, dar'd in open list, against him set
My trusty lance: the king allow'd the fight
With every regal form to prove the right.
My cause prevail'd; for Fortune, who at will
Of conquest gives, dispensing good or ill,
So help'd my arms, his strength avail'd no more,
And he remain'd a captive in my power. 191

Th' offender's crime reveal'd, the monarch gave
To me his life, to punish or to save.
Nor would I free, nor take his forfeit bead,
But thus to thee in captive chains have led,
That thy decree might doom him to be slain,
Or kept alive, reserv'd for further pain.
Fame spoke thee join'd with Charles' imperial force,
And hopes to find thee, hither urg'd our course.

* See Book xiii. ver. 199. from which part this narrative is continued by Almonio.

All thanks to Heaven! that thus, when least I thought,

To see my prince my happy steps has brought:
Nor less my thanks, that thus I see restor'd
Thy Isabella to her plighted lord;
Whom late the traitor, with insidious art,
Had seem'd for ever from thy arms to part."

Zerbino silent, while Almonio spoke,
On Odorico fix'd his earnest look:
Hatred he little felt, but chief he mourn'd
To find his hope from friendship thus return'd;
To think that one, who least had cause to leave 210
His prince and friend, should both alike deceive:
Till, with a deep-drawn sigh, he rais'd his head,
And thus, benignant, to the prisoner said:
"Declare, unhappy, nor the truth suppress;
And if we right have heard, thy guilt confess."
At this the faithless friend, low-bending, press'd
His knee to earth, and thus his lord address'd:

"To err is still the lot of man below;
But hence the good, from wicked minds, we know;
The last, by nature prone to every fault, 220
At once give way to evil's first assault.
The good for brave defence their weapons wield,
But, if the foe be strong, no less they yield.
Hadst thou, O prince! consign'd to my command
Some frontier-post, and had my dastard hand
Without resistance given the hostile powers
To plant the standard on thy conquer'd towers;
Then might the foulest curses pursue my name,
The traitor's danger and the coward's shame.
But, if compell'd to yield, not blame would meet,
But praise itself might follow such defeat. 231
'T was mine to guard my faith from mental foes,
Like some strong fort which numerous troops enclose.

With all the force supplied me from above
By Heaven's supreme decree, full long I strove
To guard the fortress, till my vigour fail'd,
And the strong foe with stronger arms prevail'd."

Thus Odorico spoke; and more he said
To prove what mighty power his faith betray'd;
With every art of soothing speech address'd, 240
He sought to move his injur'd prince's breast:
While good Zerbino stood in deep suspense,
Or to forgive, or punish such offence.
Thoughts of the heavy crime now seem'd to wake
His sleeping wrath, the traitor's life to take:

* Zerbino is one of the most amiable characters in the whole work, and must strongly interest the reader. His sentiments of mercy and generosity, on the reflection of his friend's treachery and ingratitude, may remind us of the behaviour of Titus the Roman emperor to his friend Sextus, who had conspired against his life, so admirably painted by Metastasio, an author who abounds in the most noble and elevated sentiments. Titus, in his interview with Sextus, thus endeavours to make him confess his guilt:

Observe me, Sextus, we are now alone,
Thy sovereign is not present: open thou
Thy heart to Titus; trust it with thy friend;
I promise thee, Augustus ne'er shall know
The secret thou disclosest: tell me how
Thy faith was first seduc'd: let us together
Seek some pretence to excuse thee: I, perchance,
Shall be e'en happier than thyself to find it.

Act. iii, Scene 8.

Now dear remembrance of their friendship past,
Which, till that fatal chance, so firm could last,
With pity's stream resentment's flame suppress'd,
And nourish'd mercy in his generous breast.

While, unresolv'd, Zerbino still remains 250
To free th' offender, or to hold in chains;
By death to sweep him from his sight, or give
The wretch in lengthen'd sufferings yet to live.
Behold, loud neighings, comes th' alighted steed,
Which Mandricardo from his bridle freed.
And with him bears the beldame pale for breath,
Whose gale had nearly wrought Zerbino's death.
The ring palfrey from a distant ground
The courser hears, and seeks the kindred sound.
Soon as Zerbino thither turns his eyes; 260
He lifts his hands in praises to the skies,
For too so wicked to his power resist'd,
Whose deeds deserv'd his deepest hate to find.

The noble knight that impious crone detains;
And now he ponders with himself what pains
Her crimes should meet; to lop her nose and ears,
To make her piece-meal die, at first appears
A just decree; to give her limbs for food
To gorge the hungry vultures' screaming brood.
Now this, now that, his wavering thoughts resolve;
At length determin'd, fix his last resolve: 270
Then turning to his friends, he cries—"I give
My free consent the faithless youth shall live.
Though such offence may scarce forgiveness gain,
At least it merits not severest pain.

Still let him live and freed, my mercy prove,
Since well I know his crime the crime of love.
Love has ere this a firmer bosom brought
To guilt more deep than Odorico's fault,
Which now we judge—to him let grace be shown.
The suffering should be mine, and mine alone. 280
Blind as I was, so vast a trust to yield.

Yet know how flame can catch the stubble field?"
To Odorico then—"Be this thy doom,
The penance of thy deed—thy task to come;
One circling year this woman's steps attend,
From all that seek her life, her life defend;
Her fires be thine—and range, at her command,
The realms of spacious France, from land to land."

Zerbino thus: and him, who for his crime 290
Deserv'd his death, he gave some future time
To certain fate; expos'd in every shape,
To perils human wit could ne'er escape.
So oft some ill-star'd knight, or wife, or maid,
Her arts had ruin'd, and her guile betray'd;
Who'er her safety watches, risks his life
With wandering knights in many a dangerous strife.

Thus each was justly punish'd—she for crimes
That long for vengeance cried in former times,
While he, for her defence who wrongly stood, 300
In some stern light must shed his vital blood.
A solemn oath Zerbino fram'd to bind
The recreant knight to keep the terms enjoin'd;
And vow'd, if e'er he broke the faith he swore,
And fell again the captive of his power,
No longer prayer or mercy to regard,
But with his death his perjury reward.

Then to Almonio and his friend he made
Assign to free their prisoner; these obey'd
With slow reluctance; either griev'd to find 310
Himself defrauded of revenge design'd.

And now the faithless knight the place forsook,
And with him thence that aged beldame look.
What chance to these, no further Turpin writes,
But thus another bard the tale recites:
The bard, his name untold, has thus declar'd:—
Ere these together ope day's journey fard,
False Odorico, deaf to every call
Of pledged faith, to free himself from thrall,
Around Gabrina's neck a halter flung, 320
And to an elm the croce detested hung;
And thence a twelvemonth, but unknown the place,
Almonio made him run the self-same race.

Zerbino, who the Paladin pursues
With earnest search, and fears the track to lose,
Now sends a message to his martial train,
Anxious what cause could thus their lord detain.
To good Almonio he his charge declares,
Which now to tell, the Muse for haste forbears.
To good Almonio is Corebo join'd, 330
And Isabella sole remains behind.
Great was the love Zerbino had profess'd,
And great in Isabella's tender breast
For brave Orlando; great was either's zeal
To learn what chance the virtuous earl befel.
So late unlov'd: three days to' await the knight,
Whose fearless arm rejects the sword in fight,
The earl had vow'd; and hence till thrice the day
Had rose and set, the prince decreed to stay,
And to the squadrons his return delay. 340

In every place through which Orlando pass'd,
His hapless way Zerbino following trac'd;
At length he came where midst the lonely grove
The fair ingrate had carv'd the notes of love.
The spring disturb'd, the trees and cave he view'd;
Those lapt and rooted, this in fragments hew'd.
Not far he saw a sudden gleam and light,
And first the warrior-cuirass struck his sight:
The helmet next—not that which fam'd of yore,
The haughty African, Almontes wore. 350
He heard a courser in the woods conceal'd
Repeated neigh, and now advanc'd, beheld
Where Brigidoro graz'd the verdant plain,
While from his saddle hung the loosen'd rein.
He Durindana sought, and soon he found
The sword, unsheath'd, lie useless on the ground.
He saw the surcoat, which, in pieces strow'd,
The wretched earl had scatter'd through the wood.

With Isabella now Zerbino gaz'd
In sad suspense, while every object rais'd 360
A secret fear, yet little they divin'd
(How'er they weigh'd the signs with anxious mind)
Orlando from his better sense disjoin'd.
One drop of blood discover'd on the plain
Had imagin'd to their thoughts the champion slain.
And now a rustic hind with headlong pace
Approach'd, deep terror on his bloodless face,
Who late in safety from a rock's tall height,
Beheld the wretched madman's frantic night;
How from his limbs he drew his vest and arms, 370
And shepherds slew, and wrought a thousand harms.
He certain tidings to Zerbino gives,
Who, fill'd with wonder, scarce the truth believes,
Though clear the proofs—the shepherd's tale he hears

With pitying heart, and leaves his seat in tears.
He lights to gather from the woodland ground
The warlike relics widely scatter'd round.

⁵ See Book xxiii. ver. 673. where Mandricardo takes away Gabrina's bride.

⁶ Mandricardo.

With him the gentle fair her steed forsakes,
And from the ground the arms and vestment takes;
When, lo! appears a dame in looks distrest, 380
Sighs frequent bursting from her mournful breast:
If any ask who thus her woes deplo'r'd,
'T was Flordelis, who rov'd to seek her lord;
For Brandimart, departing thence unknown,
Had left the fair in Paris' regal town;
Where seven or eight long moons the mourner
stay'd;

But when she found his wish'd return delay'd,
From sea to sea she pass'd, from plain to plain,
Far as the hills that sever France from Spain;
All parts she search'd, but where estrang'd from home 390

He liv'd in old Atlantes' magic dome;
Where, with Rogero Brandimart detain'd,
Where, with Orlando steru Ferrau remain'd,
But when Astolpho, with his wondrous blast,
Had driv'n the sore'er from his seats aghast,
To Paris Brandimart again return'd,
Unknown to her, who still his absence mourn'd.
Thus lovely Flordelis, to chance resign'd,
Zerbino and his Isabella join'd:
Too well she Brigliadoro knew, who stray'd 400
Without his lord, and, ah! with grief survey'd
Each cruel object, while she heard relate
The dreadful sequel of Orlando's fate,
Who rov'd, of sense distraught, from place to place,
A wretched outcast of the human race.

Zerbino now the arms together drew,
And fix'd them on a pine in open view,
A trophy fair! and, lest some venturous knight
(Native or stranger born) on these should light,
The verdant rind this short inscription bore: 410
THESE ARMS THE FALADIN ORLANDO WORE.
As if he said—Let come these arms remove,
But such as dare Orlando's fury prove.

This pious task perform'd, the prince with speed
Prepar'd to part; but, ere he rein'd his steed,
Pierce Mandricardo⁸ came, who, when he turn'd
And saw the trunk with those rich spoils adorn'd,
He ask'd from whence, and who such arms dispos'd;
To whom Zerbino, all he knew, disclos'd,
The Pagan king o'erjoy'd, no longer stay'd, 420
Approach'd the pine, then seiz'd the sword, and said,

"Let rashly none presume my deed to blame,
This fatal blade by law of arms I claim:
Long, long ere now this gallant sword was won,⁷
And still, where'er I find, I claim my own.
Orlando, fearing to defend his right,
Has feign'd his madness but to shun the fight:
Then wherefore should I now forbear to take
What coward baseness urg'd him to forsake?" 430

"Rash knight, refrain—nor think," Zerbino cries,
"Without dispute, to snatch the glorious prize.

⁷ In the viiith book, ver. 604, Flordelis is mentioned to have left Paris in search of her husband Brandimart, who was gone after Orlando.

⁸ See Book xxiii. ver. 690, where Mandricardo is last mentioned.

⁹ Mandricardo seems to mean that he had proved his title to the sword, by the perilous adventure which he encountered at the castle of the Syrian Fairy, where he conquered the armour of Hector. The story is told at large in the note to book xiv. ver. 240.

If such thy claim to Hector's arms, then know
'T was theft, not valour, did those arms bestow."

No more was said; for each with equal heat,
And equal courage, springs his foe to meet.
Scarce is the fight begun, when echo'd round
A hundred blows their polish'd arms resound,
Where Durindana threatens from on high,
Zerbino seems a rapid flame to fly
The falling stroke, when'er to shun the steel 440
Light as a deer he makes his courser wheel.
Behoves him now his utmost skill t' employ,
Since, from that edge, accustom'd to destroy,
One wound might send him to the dreary grove,
Where love-lorn ghosts through shades of myrtle¹⁰
rove.

As singled from the herd, the nimble bound
Invades the boar, and cautious circling round,
Shifts every side, but still maintains the field,
By turns assaultmg, and by turns repell'd;
So brave Zerbino, as the sword descends, 450
Or threats aloft, with wariest heed attends;
Honour and life to guard, his sharpen'd eyes
Watch every stroke, and as he strikes he flies.
Thus he; while fiercely as the Pagan foe

Whirls his dread sword, and gives or fails the blow,
He seems a whirlwind that from Heaven descends,
And 'twixt two Alpine hills the forest rends;
Now, bent to earth, the trees deep groaning hears,
Now from the trunks the shatter'd branches tears,
Though oft Zerbino turn'd aside, or fed 460
The trenchant blade, at length the Pagan sped
A downward stroke, that with full force imprest
Between the sword and buckler, reach'd his breast.
Strung was the corslet, strong the plated mail,
With texture firm; yet all could nought avail
Against the blade, that thundering from above,
Through plate and mail, and shatter'd corslet drove.
The sword fell short, else had the stroke design'd
Cleft all the knight, yet reach'd so far to find 469
The naked part, whence from the shallow wound,
A span in length, the warm blood trickling round
Stray'd o'er his shining arms, and stain'd the ground.

So have I seen a silken floweret spread,
And dye the silver vert with blushing red,
Wrought by her snowy hand with matchless art,
That hand, whose whiteness oft has pierc'd my heart.

Ah! what avails the good Zerbino now
Courage to dare, or strength to urge the blow,
Though master of the war?—Here virtue fail'd,
Where stronger arms and stronger nerve prevail'd.
Slight was the wound, though by the crimson line
Not slight it seem'd, but, started at the view,
Pale Isabella's heart, with fear oppress'd, 489
All cold and trembling, sunk within her breast.
Zerbino, fir'd with generous thirst of fame,
With deep resentment stung, and conscious shame,

¹⁰ Virgil in his sixth Æneid tells us, that the ghosts of departed lovers were thus disposed of.

Hic, quos durus amor crudeli tabe peredit,
Secreti celant calles, et myrtea circum
Silva tegit.—

The souls, whom that unhappy flame invades,
In secret solitude and myrtle shades
Make endless moan.—

Rais'd both his hands, and with redoubled might Struck on the helmet of the Tartar knight.
 The staggering Saracen the weight confess'd,
 And to the saddle bow'd his haughty crest: 490
 Th' enchanted casque made every weapon vain,
 Else that dire stroke had cleft him to the brain.
 Impatient for revenge, the Pagan lord
 Against Zerbino's helmet rais'd the sword.
 Zerbino, who the foe's intent beheld,
 Swift to the right his well-taught courser wheel'd;
 Yet not so swift, nor could he shun so well
 The biting edge, which on his buckler fell,
 But through the plates from side to side it went,
 And deep beneath his mailed gauntlet rent; 500
 Laid bare his arm, then glancing downward found
 His steel-clad thigh, and deep impress'd a wound.
 Now here, now there, Zerbino strikes in vain;
 The foe's tough arms, unurt, the stroke sustain:
 Each pass he tries; no pass the plates afford,
 And harmless from the surface bounds the sword.
 Not so the Tartar king—his fiercer might
 With such advantage urg'd th' unequal fight;
 Seven times his steel has drunk Zerbino's blood,
 Has pierc'd or cleft his shield, his helmet hew'd.
 By slow degrees life's issuing current drains 511
 His ebbing strength, but dauntless he remains:
 His vigorous heart, still nourish'd with the flame
 Of indred worth, supports his feeble frame.
 Sad Isabella, now with fears distract'd,
 To Doralis her earnest suit address'd;
 By every power adjur'd her to suppress
 The battle's rage, and turn their strife to peace.
 Courteous as fair, and doubting yet th' event
 Of combat, Doralis with glad consent 520
 To Isabella yielding, soon inclin'd
 To friendly truce her valiant lover's mind.
 Not less Zerbino calm'd his vengeful heart
 For her he lov'd, consenting to depart
 Where'er she led, and, at her powerful word,
 Unfinish'd left th' adventure of the sword.

But Flordelis, who ill-defended view'd
 Unblest Orlando's falchion, weeping stood
 To wail the loss; and oft she wish'd that fate
 Had brought her lord to share the dire debate. 530
 Yet could she e'er (if chance so fair befel)
 To her lov'd Brandimart the story tell;
 Stern Mandricardo, to his deadly coat,
 Might rue that conquest now his haughty boast.

From morn till evening Flordelis¹¹ in vain
 Still sought her lord, from morn till eve again
 At random stray'd, while he, whose loss she mourn'd,
 Once more to Paris' regal walls return'd.
 So long she travers'd mountain, hill, and wood,
 At length she came, where near a running flood 540
 The wretched Paladin she saw and knew—
 But let us now Zerbino's tale pursue¹².

Though scarce the noble youth his seat maintains,
 So fast his blood has flow'd, so fast it drains,
 Yet, self-accus'd, affliction rends his mind,
 For Durindana to the foe resign'd
 His pains increase—and soon with shortening breath
 He feels the certain chill approach of death.

¹¹ Here it seems that Flordelis departs without accosting Zerbino and Isabella, to whom she appears a stranger.

¹² He returns to Flordelis, Book xxix. ver. 297. and to Mandricardo in the 689th verse of this book.

Th' enfeebled warrior now his courser stays,
 And near a fountain's side his limbs he lays. 550
 Ah! what avails the wretched virgin's grief?
 What can she here to yield her lord relief?
 In desert wilds for want she sees him die,
 No friend to help, no peopled dwelling nigh,
 Where she, for pity or reward, might find
 Some skilful leech, his streaming wounds to bind.
 In vain she weeps—in vain with frantic cries
 She calls on Fortune, and condemns the skies.
 "Why was I not in surging waters lost,
 When first my vessel left Galicia's coast?" 560
 Zerbino, as his dying eyes he turned
 On her, while thus her cruel fate she mourn'd,
 More felt her sorrows, than the painful strife
 Of nature struggling on the verge of life.

"My heart's sole treasure! mayst thou still,"
 he said,
 "When I, alas! am number'd with the dead,
 Preserve my love—think not for death I grieve;
 But thee, thus guideless and forlorn to leave,
 Weighs heavy here—O! were my mortal date
 Prolong'd to see thee in a happier state, 570
 Blest were this awful hour—content in death,
 On that lov'd bosom to resign my breath.
 But summon'd now at Fate's unpitiful call,
 Unknown what future lot to thee may fall—
 By those soft lips, by those fond eyes I swear,
 By those dear locks that could my heart ensnare!
 Despairing to the shades of night I go,
 Where thoughts of thee, left to a world of woe,
 Shall rend this faithful breast with deeper pains
 Than all that Hell's avenging realm contains."

At this, sad Isabella pour'd a shower 581
 Of trickling tears, and lowly bending o'er,
 Close to his mouth her trembling lips she laid,
 His mouth now pale like some fair rose decay'd;
 A vernal rose, that, cropt before the time,
 Bends the green stalk, and withers ere its prime.
 "Think not," she said, "life of my breaking
 heart!

"Without thy Isabella to depart:
 Let no such fears thy dying bosom rend:
 Where'er thou go'st, my spirit shall attend: 590
 One hour to both shall like dismission give,
 Shall fix our doom, in future worlds to live,
 And part no more—when ruthless death shall close
 Thy fading eyes—that moment ends my woes!
 Or should I still survive that stroke of grief,
 At least thy sword will yield a sure relief.
 And, ah! I trust, relief from mortal state,
 Each breathless corse shall meet a milder fate,
 When some, in pity of our hapless doom,
 May close our bodies in one peaceful tomb." 600
 Thus she: and while his throbbing pulse she feels

Weak, and more weak, as death relentless steals:
 Each vital sense, with her sad lip she drains
 The last faint breath of life that yet remains.
 To raise his feeble voice Zerbino try'd—
 "I charge thee now—O lov'd in death," he cried,
 "By that affection which thy bosom bore,
 When, for my sake, thou left'st thy father's shore,
 And, if a truth like mine such power can give,
 While Heaven shall please—I now command thee, live! 610

¹³ We must always remember that the Italian poets, without scruple, make use of the old Pagan mythology.

But never be it from thy thought remov'd,
That much as man can love, Zerbino lov'd.
Fear not but God, in time, will succour lend,
From every ill thy virtue to defend;
As once he sent the Roman knight to save
Thy youth unfriended from the robber's cave:
As from the seas he drew thee safe to land, [hand;
And match'd thee from th' impure Biscayner's
And when at last all other hopes we lose,
Be death the last and refuge that we choose." 630
Thus spoke the dying knight; but scarce were heard

His latter words in accents weak prefer'd.
Here ended life—the light so drooping dies,
When oil or wax no more the flame supplies.
What tongue can tell how mourn'd the wretched
maid,

What plaints she utter'd, and what tears she shed,
When in her arms her dear Zerbino lay,
All icy cold, a lump of lifeless clay!
Prone on the bleeding corpse herself she threw,
Clea'd his stiff limbs, and bath'd with tender dew:
She rav'd so loud, that all the plains around, 631
And woods, re-echo'd the distressful sound;
Nor her white breast, nor blooming cheeks she spares,

But, cruel, that she strikes, and these she tears;
She rends her golden locks, that know not blame,
Invoking, vainly, off the much-lov'd name;
And, little mindful of Zerbino's charge,
His sword had set her frantic soul at large.
But, lo! a hermit, wont each stated day
To the clear fount to bend his lonely way, 640

Came from his neighbouring dwelling, timely sent
By Heaven's high will, to oppose her dire intent.
This reverend man, in whom at once were join'd
A sage experience and a gentle mind,
Whose hallow'd wisdom all examples knew,

And brought, as in a mirror, these to view;
Now, with a pious healing hand, address'd
The balm of patience to her wounded breast,
And many a woman bright in virtue nam'd,
In either volume's¹³ sacred text proclaim'd. 650

He show'd how vain our search of bliss is spent,
When God alone can yield us true content;
That Earth's enjoyments, ever shifting, leave
The wish unsated, and the hope deceiv'd.

He wrought so far, with mild persuasion's breath,
To change her heart so lately fix'd on death,
And raise her wish to quit this vale of strife,
And dedicate to God her future life.
Yet would she never banish from her mind
Zerbino's love, or leave his corpse behind, 660
Resolv'd through all her pilgrimage to bear
With her the relics of a form so dear.

Then, by the hermit's aid, who show'd in age
A strength of limb his years could ill presage,
Zerbino on his pensive steed she laid,
And travers'd many a mile the woodland shade.

The cautious hermit¹⁴ led not to his cell
The lovely maid, with him alone to dwell,
Where stood his mansion in the neighbouring dell.

¹⁴ The death of Zerbino, with all the attendant circumstances, is one of those fine passages so admired by the Italians, and which, if the translator has done any justice to his author, cannot fail strongly to affect the English reader.

¹³ Old and New Testament.

¹² So light a turn given to the narrative, after

His thoughts suggest—that had we justly blame
Which bears at once the fuel and the flame, 671
Nor would in prudence or in years confide,
By such a proof to find his virtue tried;
But meant to lead her to Provence, where stood,
Near fam'd Marseilles, a holy house, endow'd
With wealthy gifts, whose spacious walls contain'd,
Of heaven-devoted dames, a saint-like band.
Awhile their steps a friendly castle stay'd,
Where, in a sable coffin clos'd, they laid 679
The slaughter'd knight, and safely thence conver'd¹⁷.

A spacious tract of land, day following day,
Through the lone wild and least frequented way,
They strove to pass unknown, secure from harm,
Now all the country round was fill'd with arms.
At length a knight they met, who stopp'd their course

With brutal insult and unmanly force:
Of him some fitter time the Muse shall tell,
Now turn to what the Tartar king befel¹⁸.

The battle ended thus, his generous steed
The warrior from the reins and saddle freed, 690
And turn'd him loose to graze the flowery mead.
Plea'd with the fa¹⁹ retreat, his limbs he laid
Beside the stream beneath the cooling shade;
But lay not long, ere from a distant height
Descending to the plain, appear'd a knight:
Him, soon as Doralis beheld, she knew,
And pointing out to Mandricardo's view,

"Unless the distant sight deceive my eyes,
Lo! yonder comes fierce Rodomont," she cries.
"To give thee combat from the hill he speeds, 700
And well such combat now thy prowess needs;
Rage for my loss, affianc'd to his bed,
Has drawn down all his vengeance on thy head."

As the bold hawk a fiercer mien assumes,
Lifts his high head, and spreads his ruffled plumes,
If chance some birds of household breed he spies
(The stalling, duck, or dove,) before him rises;
So Mandricardo, well assur'd to bear
From Rodomont the bloody wreaths of war, 710
With joy exulting, mounts his steed again,
His feet the stirrups press, his hand the rein.

And now the wrathful chiefs approach'd so near,
That each the other's threatening words might hear.
The king of Algiers shook his haughty head,
Wav'd his right arm, and thus aloud he said:

"Soon shall I make thee rue thy fatal joy,
Who for a short-liv'd gift, and amorous toy,
Hast dar'd t' insult a prince, whose powerful hand
Shall break the vengeance that such wrongs demand."

so beautiful and affecting a catastrophe, will, I fear, disgust the reader; but, at the same time, as it strongly marks the general complexion of the early Italian poets of this class, and more especially the genius of Ariosto, it was not thought allowable to omit the passage. These are among the parts alluded to by Gravina, who accuses Ariosto of "sometimes mingling ludicrous reflections or allusions with serious matter." See the Preface.

¹⁷ In the time of Ariosto, Joan, queen of Castile, in like manner carried with her, in a coffin, the body of her dead husband, Philip of Austria.

Zatta.

¹⁸ He returns to Isabella and the hermit, Book xxviii. ver. 674.

Then Mandricardo thus:—"In vain he tries 720
To shake my courage who with threats defies.
Women and boys are scard' with seeming harm,
Or those that ne'er were bred to use of arms:
Not such am I—whose soul no terror knows,
The hour of combat is to me repose:
On foot, on horse, disarm'd, or arm'd, I dare,
In the close list, or open field of war¹⁹." [breed;
Rage follows rage, and threatenings threatenings
Their swords are drawn, and thundering strokes succeed.

Like winds that first but whisper through the brake,
Next the high tops of elms or beeches shake; 731
Then while the gathering dust aloft in air,
Sweep cots away, and lay the forest bare;
In tempests kill the flocks that graze the plain,
And whelm the vessels in the howling main.
These Pagan knights, whose like could ne'er be found

Through all the realms for deeds of arms renown'd,
With dauntless hearts and many a dreadful stroke,
Pursu'd a fight that well their race bespoke.
With horrid clangour oft their falchions meet; 740
Earth seems to groan and shake beneath their feet;
While, from their batter'd armour, frequent fly
The fiery sparks, ascending to the sky.
On either side alike the knights assai
The plates to sever, or to rend the mail.
Each inch of ground they guard with equal care,
And in a narrow orb contract the war.
Amidst a thousand aim'd, the Tartar bends
A stroke, that driv'n with both his hands, descends
On Sarza's front—the many-colour'd light 750
Now skims in mist before his dazzled sight.
Back fell the African, of sense bereav'd.
The crupper of his steed his helm receiv'd;
He lost his stirrups, and his seat had lost,
E'en in her sight whose love he valu'd most;
But as a bow of temper'd steel, constrain'd
To yield reluctant to a potent hand,
The more it bends, the stronger, when releas'd,
It springs, and sends the shaft with strength increase'd:

Again the Pagan rising from the blow, 760
Return'd redoubled vengeance on his foe.
Where late himself the hostile weapon felt,
Stern Rodomont on Mandricardo dealt
The furious blade; the blade no entrance found;
The Trojan casque secur'd the knight from wound;
But scarce the Tartar, with the blow hereav'd
Of sight and sense, the day from night perceiv'd.

While Rodomont repeated strokes bestow'd,
And on his helmet laid the furious load;
The Tartar's courser, that beheld with fear 770
The hostile steel which hiss'd aloft in air,

¹⁹ This speech of Mandricardo is in the spirit of Hector to Ajax, before the single combat between them. Ajax had defied him with haughtiness, to which he replies:

Me, as a boy or woman wouldst thou fright,
New to the field, and trembling at the sight?
Thou meet'st a chief deserving of thy arms,
To combat born, and bred amidst alarms:
I know to shift my ground, remount the car,
Turn, charge, and answer every call of war;
To right, to left, the dextrous lance to wield,
And bear thick battle on my sounding shield.

Pope's Iliad, book vii. ver. 225.

With his own fate his Mide's safety bought:
For while to shun the fearful noise he sought,
Full on his neck descends the weighty sword,
And gives to him the wound design'd his lord:
He wanted Hector's helm his head to shield,
And hence he fell—but instant from the field
Rais'd on his feet, again with fearless look
Bold Mandricardo Durindano shook:
Rage swell'd his breast to view his courser slain;
While Rodomont on him with loosen'd rein 780
Impell'd his steed; but Mandricardo stood
Firm as some rock amidst the billowy flood;
While, with his lord o'erthrown, extended low
Was laid the courser of the Sarzan foe.
Sudden the king of Algiers left his steed:
His feet as swiftly from the stirrups freed,
And stood recover'd with the foe to wage
An equal fight; no less the Tartar's rage
His rival met—Now blows succeeding blows, 790
Fierce and more fierce the burning combat grows.
But, lo! an envoy came from Africa's bands,
With numbers more dispatch'd thro' Gallia's lands,
Back to their banners every chief to call,
And private knight, when need requir'd them all:
For he²⁰, whose arms the golden Lily bore,
Had in their works besieg'd the Pagan power;
And did not speedy aid retrieve their fame,
Destruction soon must whelm the Moorish name.

The trusty herald, as he nearer drew, 800
By arms and vestment well the warriors knew;
But more he knew them by their force in field,
And weapons, which like theirs, no hands could wield.

He dares not rush between their wrathful swords,
And trust the privilege his name affords:
To Doralis he hastens first to tell
What deep mischance the Saracens befel;
How Agrament, Marulius, and their train,
With Stordilano join'd, a siege sustain
From Christian Charles; and will'd her to relate
To either combatant their sovereign's state. 811

He said—the damsel with undaunted breast
Between them stept, and in these words ad-
dress'd:

"I charge ye, by the love which well I know
To me ye bear, your swords, your courage show
To assert a nobler cause—be now display'd
Your mutual worth our friendly camp to aid;
Where the brave Saracens besieg'd, await
Your saving arm, or some disastrous fate."

The herald then his embassy reveal'd, 820
And letters gave to Ulien's offspring²¹, seal'd
From king Troyano's son; when either knight
Agreed to calm his wrath, and stay the fight;
And fix the truce, till some propitious hour
Should raise the siege, and free the suffering Moor.
The siege once rais'd, no longer either breast
Shall let revenge or rival hatred rest,
But rage anew, till, mutual valour tried,
Their fatal title to the dame decide.

Thus they; and she to whom their faith they vow'd, 830

The sacred pledge for either warrior stood.
But Discord stern, whose unrelenting mind
Abhorrd all treaties that to peace inclin'd,
And Pride no less, the friendly terms oppos'd
That thus in hated league their anger clos'd.

²⁰ Charles.

²¹ Rodomont.

But these in vain, with force combin'd, assail'd,
Where Love's resistless power o'er all prevail'd:
He beat his bow, his arrows swiftly flew,
Till Pride and Discord from the field withdrew:
The truce confirm'd by her whose sovereign sway
Compell'd each hardy champion to obey. 84
One warlike steed they mis'd, for in the fight
Lay dead the courser of the Tartar knight;
When thither gallant Brigidoro stray'd,
Who cropt, beside the stream, the verdant glade.
Since here the book concludes, permit me here
To pause, and for a while the tale defer.

BOOK XXV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero goes, with the damsel, to deliver the youth who was condemn'd to die. Tale of Richardetto and Floridespina. Rogero and Richardetto arrive at the castle of Agrimont, where they are entertained by Aldiger of the house of Clarimont. Aldiger gives Richardetto unwelcome tidings of their kinsmen Malagigi and Vivian, who were prisoners to Laufuss, the mother of Ferrau. Rogero engages to set them at liberty. Rogero's letter to Bradamant to excuse his absence. Rogero, Richardetto, and Aldiger, set out next day to rescue Malagigi and Vivian from the hands of the Pagans.

THEY thirst of honour and the force of love
Eternal strife in youthful bosoms move:
Nor yet is known which most inclines the scales,
Since this or that alike in turn prevails.
The call of glory, and the sense of right,
Not little now can weigh with either knight
To stay the combat, for the damsel fought
Till succour to the Moorish camp was brought
But love more weigh'd—and had not her commands
(Whose power was sovereign) had their wrathful
hands, 10

Ne'er had the battle ceas'd, till one subdu'd
Had stain'd his rival's wreaths with vital blood;
And Agrament, with all his social train,
Had hop'd assistance from their arms in vain.
Condemn not Love—if oft he merits blame,
His generous influence oft our praise may claim.
All thoughts of contest o'er, the warlike pair
Tow'rd's Paris' walls, with her, the gentle fair,
Direct their steeds: the dwarf attends their course,
The dwarf who led, to meet his rival's force, 20
The jealous Rodomont, now ceas'd to trace
The Tartar, till he brought them face to face.
A meadow entering now, at ease they find
Four knights beside a crystal fount reclin'd,
Two all unarm'd; two wear their helmets lac'd;
And by their side a beauteous dame is plac'd.
But who the knights and dame! some future time
Shall tell—Rogero first demands my rhyme:
Rogero, who, but late the tale has shown,
In the deep well* his magic shield had thrown. 30
Scarce from the wall a mile Rogero pass'd,
When, lo! an envoy came; (of those in haste,

Dispatch'd by king Troyano's son, to claim
His champions to retrieve the Pagan name)
From him he heard the camp's disastrous state,
Where now the powers, besieg'd by Charles, await (Unless reliev'd) the last distress of fate.

At this, conflicting thoughts Rogero press'd,
And rent at once his undetermin'd breast 39
With different calls—nor which to attend he knows,
Scarce time or place to weigh their choice allows.
At length the herald he dismiss'd, and sped
His course to follow where the damsel led,
Who urg'd him on, till with the setting Sun
They reach'd a city by Marsilius won
From royal Charles, where still his arms maintain'd,
Amidst the heart of France, his conquest gain'd.
No bridge nor portal here their haste delay'd:
None clos'd the portal, nor their passage stay'd;
Though near the fosse and gate was seen to stand
(To guard the place) an arm'd and numerous band. 51

The maid, his fair conductress, well they knew,
And hence, unquestion'd, let the knight pursue
His purpos'd way, till to the square he came,
And saw the thronging crowd and kindled flame,
Where stood the youth, who seem'd prepar'd to wait,

With downcast looks, his near-approaching fate.
But when, by chance, he rais'd his mournful eyes
Suffus'd in tears, Rogero, with surprise,
Believ'd in him his Bradamant he view'd; 60
So much the youth a kindred likeness shew'd:
Still as he gaz'd, and gaz'd with nearer look,
The mien and features Bradamant bespoke:
"Or this," he cries, "is she, or I no more
Am that Rogero I was call'd before.
Through too much zeal to give th' unhappy aid,
She hither came, and here, by fate betray'd,
A prisoner stands—Why did thy haste, my fair,
Forbid thy knight th' adventurous deed to share?
Yet, thanks to Heaven! that favour'd thus I come,
With timely succour to reverse thy doom." 71

His sword unheathing with a furious look,
(His spear on Pimabello's knights he broke)
Against the throngs unarm'd his steed he guides,
O'er many a body, prest to earth, he rides.
With cries the wretches fly, and all the train
(So numerous late) are chas'd, or maim'd, or slain.
As when, beside a pool, the household breed
Of smaller birds in flocks securely feed;
If chance a hawk, descending from the skies, 80
Amidst them strikes, and makes his single prize;
Each quits his fellow, for himself provides,
And from his feather'd foe for safety hides:
So had you seen dispers'd the heartless crew,
When first Rogero on their numbers flew;
From four or six that thence too slowly fled,
At one fierce stroke Rogero lopt the head:
Cleft to the breast through some his steel he sent;
There, through the skull; here, to the teeth it went.
What though no ponderous helms their heads en-
close,

But lighter morions bind each wretch's brow, 91
Yet, were they arm'd at proof, his raging blade
Through temper'd helmet had the passage made.
Rogero's strength was not the strength we find
In modern knights, or their degenerate kind:
Nor such the tusked boar or lion boasts,
The fiercest beast of ours, or foreign coasts:
Perchance the thunder may his force excel,
Or that dire fiend (not he that reigns in Hell,

* He returns to these Book xxvi. ver. 498.

* See Book xxii, ver. 663.

But that) which, arm'd with fire, my lord employs,
Which drives through seas and skies, and all de-stroye.

Not less than one was slain at every wound,
But oftener two at once he hurl'd to ground :
Now four, now five he slew ; and soon remain'd
A hundred breathless by his fatal hand.
The sword, which from his noble side he drew,
Cuts, like soft curd, the hardest steel in two.
This sword, the work of Falerna's skill,³
Was in Orgagan's garden forg'd to kill.
The bold Orlando : but her alter'd mind " 110
Full soon repented what she once design'd ;
For all her arts she found in vain employ'd,
When with this sword her garden she destroy'd.
What horrors now, what slaughter must it yield,
When giv' in such a warrior's hand to wield !
If e'er Rogero force or skill possess'd,
To save his mistress now it shone confess'd.
As the poor hare defends her from the hound,
So from the knight the crowds their safety found.
What numbers by his thundering arm lay dead ! 120
But who shall number those who trembling fled ?

Meanwhile the damsel loos'd the cruel bands
That captive held the wretched victim's hands ;
With zealous speed she arm'd them for the fight,
The buckler grac'd his left, the sword his right.
Wit'd with his wrongs, he rush'd with vengeful mind,
To vent his rage on that degenerate kind :
Such were his deeds, as future times shall tell
That valour which he then approv'd so well.

The parting Son beneath the western main 130
Had plung'd, in ruddy waves, his golden vain,
When, with the youth preserv'd from cruel fate,
Rogero issu'd victor from the gate.
The youth, repriev'd by good Rogero's aid
From threaten'd death, his grateful thanks repaid ;
Thanks ever due to one, who thus, unknown,
Had for another's safety risk'd his own ;
Then begg'd him to reveal his name, and show
To whom his life could such deliverance owe.

Rogero to himself—" Lo ! there are seen 140
My fair-one's features, with her beautiful mien ;
But not the voice of Bradamant I hear,
Whose sweetness stole upon my raptur'd ear.
Not such the thanks that Bradamant would pay
To him she loves, on this eventful day.
But can it be—or can my faithful damps
So soon forget her dear Rogero's name ?"

To ease his doubts, he thus with courteous
grace :

" These eyes are, sure, familiar to thy face ;
But when, or where, I seek in vain to find, 150
Thou, gentle youth, relieve my wandering mind."

" Thou mayst, ere this, sir Knight, have met these eyes,

" But when, or where, I know not," he replies,
" Since through the world, like other knights, I range
From land to land, to seek adventures strange.
Perchance in me a sister's form appears,
Who wears the cuirass, and the falchion rears.

³ By these lines the poet is supposed to mean a large piece of artillery belonging to the duke of Ferrara, which, from the vast execution it did in the field, had justly acquired the name of the GREAT DEVIL. Ruscilli.

⁴ See note to Book xli. ver. 192, for an account of this adventure.

Our birth was one ^{of} our semblant make
Has heft'ning parents in a fond mistake :
Not thou the first of numbers, who, deserv'd 160
By either's looks, have each for each believ'd,
One difference only seen—these tresses shorn
Scarce reach thy shoulders ; as by turn are worn :
While hers, with lengthen'd growth, in many a fold,
Beneath her helm in sixteen braids are rold,
Once on her head a Pagani's weapon fell
With ghastly wound, but now 'twere long to tell ;
When, for her cure, a holy father's care
(Of Jesus' train) nipt thro' her length of hair :
No sign was then that either could proclaim, 170
And all our difference was in sex and name.
Her Bradamant, call Richardetto me ;
I brother to Rinaldo, sister she.

If now you deign to lend attention, hear
A wondrous tale that well deserves your ear :
A chance, which from our mutual likeness rose,
Begu'd in joy, but nearly clos'd in woe."
Rogero, who no other tale requir'd,
No sweeter converse than of her desir'd,
Of her his breast belov'd, and sole delight, 180
Besought the youth his story to recite.

He thus began : " As through the woodland shade,
With tresses shorn, my martial sister stray'd,
One day fatigu'd with toil, and faint with heat,
She reach'd a pleasant fountain's cool retreat ;
Then left her steed, her shining helm unbound,
And sunk in slumber on the verdant ground.
Not all the fables ancient poets tell,
Or fancy'd legends, can this truth excel.

" A royal virgin, eager at the chase, 190
Fair Floridespina, to the lovely place
By fortune came, and, drawing nigh, survey'd
My sleeping sister in bright arms array'd,
All, save her head : her side the falchion wore,
And every part a manly semblance bore.
Struck with her form, awhile the virgin gaz'd
In wonder rapt, till Love a passion rais'd,
That soon through all her tender bosom blaz'd.
She urg'd her to the chase ; then from the crew
Of horns and hounds the seeming champion drew
To where no prying witness might intrude, 201
In deepest shade of friendly solitude.
By words and gesture there, the gentle maid
The secret of her deep-struck heart betray'd :
With languor-darting eyes, with sighs of fire,
She show'd her soul's continuing wish desire.
Now from her cheeks the rosy colour fled ;
Returning wrath now flush'd the deep'ning red :
Till, lost in thoughts of visionary bliss,
And bolder grown, she ventur'd on a kiss. 210

⁵ Bradamant, being without her helmet, was wounded by a Pagani, and afterwards cured of the wound by a father of the order of Jesus, who, for that purpose, caus'd her hair to be cut off; to which circumstance Ariosto several times alludes.

See General View of Boyardo's Story.
⁶ This behaviour of Floridespina seems an outrage on all female decency; but it must be remembered, that our poet, in this extensive work, exhibits every kind of personage; that the attractions of Floridespina are merely the attractions of beauty; and that her character is so far from being amiable, that the Italian commentators have made her to represent inordinate and un-governed passion.

Too well my sister knew her guaily frame,
And martial guise, beguild the gentle dame;
She knew no power t' amaze the fair one's smart,
And soft compassion touch'd her friendly heart.

"Then to herself—" 'T were better to reveal
My woman's sex, and thus her phrensy heal;
To own myself a maid of gentle mind,
Not seem a youth of rude degenerate kind.
And well she said—for recreaps must he prove,
A man whose pulse was never warm to love; 220
Who, when some beauteous damsel courts his arms,
With youthful sweetness and alluring charms,
Should waste in talk the hour good fortune brings,
And, like a cuckoo, hang his coward wings.
My sister now, with zaid address, prepar'd
To soothe the virgin, and the truth declar'd;
'That like Camilla, panting for a name,
Or fierce Hippolyta, she burnt for fame;
And in Arzilla born, on Afric's shore, 229
From earliest youth the lance and buckler bore.'

"In vain she spoke; her words no spark remove
Of passion kindled in the fire of love:
Too late the medicine came to heal the smart.
Since Love, alas! too deep has plung'd his dart.
Whene'er she views the manly mien and arms,
A transient hope her beating bosom warms;
But soon the lov'd one's sex recall'd to mind,
Again in hope to cold despair resign'd.
Whene'er that day had heard the virgin mourn,
Would sigh for sigh, and tear for tear return. 230
"Did ever wretch," she cried, 'such torments
know

To equal what I feel—my cureless woe!
All other loves, save mine, success may find,
Whether of lawful or of impious kind.
From the sharp thorn the blooming rose we part,
But vain desire must ever reed my heart.
Ah, ruthless Love! since, envious of my bliss,
Thou must, with cruel pains, pollute my peace,
Suffic'd it not to give some common wound,
Which others from thy various darts have found?
Ne'er midst the human race, or bestial train, 231
A female seeks a female's love to gain:
No damsel's charms attract a damsel's sight,
Nor birds in birds, nor lambs in lambs delight:
In air—on earth—but one, alas! can prove,
And I, alas! that one—so strange a love.
Thus, ruthless power! my wretched fate must show
A great example of thy rule below.
The wife of Niinus³, by the furies fir'd,
To her son's bed with impious lust aspir'd: 260

³ This complaint of Floridespina is closely copied from the fable of Iphis and Ianthe, in Ovid. See Metast. But while the poet makes Floridespina commemorate the unnatural loves of Semiramis, Pasiphaë, and Myrrha, and complain of the singularity of her own, he seems entirely to forget the story of Iphis and Ianthe.

⁴ Semiramis. This name is said to have been given her because she was nourished by doves, which are so called in the Syrian tongue. Many fables are told of her. Diodorus Siculus relates, that she was born in a wood, near the city of Acalonia; that her mother was a reputed goddess, and her father a priest; that at her birth she was concealed in a grotto, where the doves, stealing milk from the shepherds, carried it to the infant. He relates, that she was afterwards brought up by

Myrrha her father lov'd; the Cretan dame
A bull deceiv'd—but wilder is my dame.
In these the females still the males pursue,
And each attain'd her wish, if tales be true,
But here should Dædalus his arts apply,
No art could such a Gordian knot untie,
Which Nature fram'd to make my passion vain,
Nature, whose laws must every power restrain.'

"Thus to herself laments the fair distress,
And feels eternal anguish in her breast: 270
She sends her looks, she tears her lovely cheeks,
While on herself a mad revenge she seeks:
Touch'd with her woe, my pitying sister hears,
Sighs back her sighs, and answers tears with tears.
In vain she strives to cure her senseless love,
No words can soothe her, and no reasons move;
While she, who seeks not comfort but relief,
Still mourns the more, and sinks from grief to grief.

"The day but little now remain'd to run,
Red in the west appear'd the setting Sun; 280
And time requir'd to seek a port for those
That would not there in forest wilds repose;
When now the virgin huntress made request,
For Bradamant beneath her roof to rest.
My sister, yielding to the dame's consent,
Together to Marsilius' town they went;
Where but for thee, whose aid so timely came,
These wretched limbs had fed the hungry flame.

Arriving, Floridespina to the place
My sister welcom'd with a sister's grace; 290
Then in a female garb her friend array'd,
That all who saw might know her for a maid:
And more—she hop'd, the cause of her distress
From error nourish'd by the manlike dress;
The dream once chang'd, her fond desire might cease,
And all her bosom be compos'd to peace.
Ah! how unlike that night the couch they press'd!
One soundly lock'd in all-composing rest:
One waking sigh'd, or, if she clos'd her eyes,
In broken slumbers flattering visions rise. 300
She fancies, at her prayer, indulgent Heaven
To Bradamant a better sex had given.
As worn with tedious watch the patient dreams
(Long parch'd with feverish thirst) of limpid
streams,

And cooling draughts; so she in sleep enjoys
What all in vain her waking thought employs.
Sudden she starts, extending round the bed
Her longing hands; but finds the blessing fled.
That night what offerings she to Macon vow'd,
To every power!—that, for her sake bestow'd, 310
Some miracle, in pity to her flame,
Might to a youth transform the virgin dame.

the king's head shepherd, and in process of time married Niinus, king of Assyria. At his death she took upon her the government of the empire, and was famous for her courage and conduct. She was a princess of the most abandoned principles; and, in order to conceal her amours, is said to have caused every man to be put to death who partook of her favours. She had a son by her husband called Niinus, with whom, some say, she fell in love; and that, upon her sollicitation to comply with her impious desires, she was slain by him. Others say, that she married him; and, in order to cover her guilt, enacted a law, by which it was permitted for a mother to marry her son.

In vain she prays—in vain her tears—her love—
No Macon hears her, and no powers approve.
All night she mourn'd, till Phoebus from the wave
His locks dispos'd, and light returning gave:
The light return'd, from bed the pair arose,
Day adding force to Floridespina's woes:
For Bradamant (whom much it irks'd to prove
The hapless object of so vain a love, 320
And by her presence more inflame the smart)
Declar'd her speedy purpose to depart.
But, ere she went, fair Floridespina brought
A stately steed, with trappings richly wrought;
To these a surcoat join'd of costly make,
Work'd by her hands, and will'd her, for the sake
Of parting love, the precious gifts to take.

“And now my sister us'd her speedy way
To Mount Alban, ere the close of day;
Where we, her mother and her brethren, flew 330
With eager joy, her welcome face to view.
Her helm unlac'd, we saw her tresses shorn,
Which once in fillets round her head were worn;
Nor less we wonder'd o'er her arms to find
A surcoat us'd by knights of foreign kind;
Her wound receiv'd and cur'd, her shorten'd hair,
She told, and how in woods the huntress fair
Surpris'd her sleeping; nor conceal'd the love
The virgin proffer'd in the lonely grove; 339
What pity touch'd her breast, and how the maid
Had to the neighbouring fort her steps convey'd,
Where in sad state she left the fair to mourn:
With all that had befall'n till her return.

“Well known to me was Floridespina's name,
At Saragozza I beheld the dame,
And since in France; when, not unmov'd, I view'd
Her sparkling eyes, her features rosy-hued,
Her neck of snow—but cautious I repress'd
The young desire awakening in my breast;
Since hopeless love can never harbour rest, 350
But now such fair occasion gave it way,
My flame reviv'd that long extinguish'd lay.
Love fram'd the web of hope, and in the loom
Prepar'd the texture of my joys to come:
He taught me with the fair a pleasing part,
To gain the bliss that fires the lover's heart.
Easy the fraud—my face and mien so like
My sister's form, that each beholder strike
With semblant looks, might well the dame deceive, 359
To make her fondly all I wish'd believe.

“While I paus'd—but young and amorous
blood
Impell'd me to embrace the proffer'd good.
The mighty secret that employ'd my thought,
To none I told, of none I counsel sought.
At night I hasten'd where the arms were plac'd,
The arms my sister from her limbs unbrac'd.
Array'd in these, and unnoted on her steed
I went, nor till the day deferr'd my speed:
All night I rode till early dawn of day,
While love and Floridespina led the way: 370
Her seat I reach'd, ere from th' ethereal height
The Sun in briny waves had quench'd his light.
Each knew the steed I rode, the arms I wore,
With which my sister left the gate before;
And happy he, who with dispassion'd care
First brings the tidings to the royal fair;
Who from the princely dame can bear away
Such thanks and gifts as fit a queen to pay.
“Soon Floridespina came, with eager pace,
The smile of transport brightening in her face; 380
And drew to meet me with a warm embrace.

Around my neck her milk-white arms she threw,
And kiss'd my lips as to my breast she grew.
Think at the time if Love employ'd his dart,
And drove the throbbing weapon to my heart.
My hand she seiz'd; nor sought the mental aid
Of page or dame, but to her room convey'd.
Her steps I follow'd; there, with eager haste,
Herself from beam to spur my arms unbrac'd.
A garment, like her own, she took, and dress'd 390
My youthfob members in a female vest,
Of artful work, with costly labour crown'd;
And in a golden cas'd my hair she bound.
My eyes I govern'd like a bashful maid,
Nor look, nor voice, my mimic sex betray'd.
And now she brought me to a stately hall,
Where knights and gallant dames assembled all,
Receiv'd as entering, and such honours paid,
As suit the rank of queen or princely maid.
In secret oft I smile'd, when I beheld: 400
The courtly youths, by soft desire impell'd,
With winking glances meet my bashful eyes;
Nor knew what lurk'd beneath my coy disguise.

“'T was late; and now remov'd the festive board,
With every viand of the season stor'd,
The princely maid, by fond affection led,
That night receiv'd me to partake her bed.
The train of pages gone, with all the state
Of dames and maids accustom'd there to wait,
We, both despoil'd of vests, together lay, 410
With torches flaming like the beams of day.

“Then thus—“Be not surpris'd, O lovely maid!
To find your guest so soon return'd,” I said;
“When you, perchance, believ'd me wandering far,
And hop'd to see me—Heaven knew when or where!
First learn the cause I left you thus to mourn,
Then learn the cause of my unlook'd return.
Could my long dwelling here, O gentle dame!
Have quench'd the sparks of your unhappy flame,
Ne'er had I left your roof, by night or day, 420
Blest in your sight to wear my life away.
But since my presence more inflam'd your grief,
I deem'd my absence best could yield relief.
Chance led my travel from the beaten road
Through the deep mazes of a tangled wood,
Where loud resounding from the neighbouring shades,

I heard a female voice that call'd for aid:
I ran, and close behind a crystal brook
Beheld a Faun, that in his embraces took
A naked dame from the stream, and stood 430
Prepar'd to make the prey his living food.
I saw, and instant flew with sword in hand,
By force his cruel purpose to withstand.
The impious father of his life bereft,
She to the stream return'd, which late she left.
“Thou hast not given me aid,” she cries, “in vain;
Ask what thou wilt, and, what thou ask'st, obtain.
A watery nymph am I, and here reside,
Beneath the surface of this limpid tide.
All miracles are mine—my power can force 440
The elements, and alter Nature's course:
Drawn by my voice, the Moon her sphere forsakes,

Fire turns to ice, and air a body takes:
And oft, by simple words, my power I prove
To stop the Sun, the solid Earth to move.
Now fix thy choice—and at thy choice receive
What fits thee best to ask, and me to give.”
“So prudic'd she; but I no wealth desir'd,
Nor rule, nor lands, nor o'er mankind aspir'd

To rise in knowledge, or in arts excel ; 450
Or gain a victor's name by warring well ;
I only wish'd some healing balm to find,
To cure the longing of thy love-sick mind ;
Nor more pressur'd to speak, her wisdom best
Could point the means—to her I left the rest.

“ Scarce had I ended, when beneath the tide
Once more she plung'd, nor to my words replied ;
But in my face the sparkling waters threw,
And scatter'd o'er my limbs the magic dew. 459

When (strange to tell) I felt through all my frame
Unheard-of change ! my sex no more the same,
And from a woman I a man became.

To ease thy doubt—the certain proof receive
Of what, untry'd, thy thoughts could ne'er believe.
As in my former sex, so boast I still
To thee devoted all my power and will.

Then task them both—for ever shall they prove
Henceforth the slaves of Floridaspina's love !

“ Thus I—and greatly now her hand I seize,
To soothe her hopes, and every doubt appease. 470 “ Grant Heaven ! she cried, ‘ if sleep such dreams can make,

I still may sleep, and never more awake !”

“ Between us two, from all securely kept,
A few short months th' important secret slept.
But soon (how fleet is bliss !) our loves betray'd,
Some spy the tidings to the king convey'd.
My doom was seal'd—and thou, whose noble hand
Redeem'd my life from your relentless band,
Beheld'st me sentenc'd on the blazing pyre,
My crime to expiate in consuming fire.” 480

Thus Richardetto to Rogero told ¹⁰

The tale of love, while through the night they hold
Their dreary course, and gain a rising ground,
With pendent rocks and caves encompass'd round.
A narrow, stony path before them lay,

And up the mountain led their weary way,
Where Agrimont, a stately castle, stands,

Which Aldiger, of Charmont's race, commands.
Though basely born, he, Buovo's offspring own'd,

In Vivian and in Malagigi found 490
A brother's name ; but credit not the tongue
That speaks his lawful birth from Gerard sprung ¹¹.

* Two licentious stanzas of the original are here omitted in the translation, and were expunged by the poet from a printed copy in his possession, published in the year 1532. Ruscelli saw this copy in the hands of Galasso Ariosto, the brother of Ludovico; and it is certain, by a letter from Galasso to Peter Bembo, that Ariosto, had he lived, meant to have revised this edition, and to have given another with his last corrections and improvements; in which it is highly probable that most, if not all, these exceptional parts would have been totally changed or omitted.

¹⁰ This account of Floridaspina's love for Bradamant is continued from Boyard. Some readers may probably wish that our poet had made the conclusion happier for Floridaspina; but it may be alleged, that, the manners of this princess not exhibiting a pattern of female modesty, she has less claim to the sympathy of the reader, or the attention of the poet; and, perhaps, a kind of moral may be deduced, if we consider her being totally swayed by Richardetto, as a punishment for her breach of chastity.

¹¹ Gerardo, a younger brother of Anon and

Whate'er his sire, the youth, of generous strain,
Was prudent, liberal, courteous, and humane,
And night or day, what chance might e'er befall,
He watch'd with care his lov'd fraternal wall.
His kinsman, Richardetto, in the place
Due welcome met, nor less the courteous grace,

For Richardetto's sake, Rogero prov'd,
A kinsman dear by Aldiger belov'd ; 500
Though now his guests he met not with that air
Of cheerful greeting he was wont to wear,
But pensive came : that day were tidings brought,
Which fill'd his face with grief, his breast with thought.

Instead of glad salute, with heavy look
Young Richardetto first he thus bespoke :

“ Alas ! my kinsman—hear me now disclose
Unwelcome news, to speak our kindred's woe.
Know, Bertolagi, sprung of ruthless seed,
Has with Lanfusa ¹², ruthless dame ! agreed 510

Large wealth in sums of countless gold to pay,
For which our captive brethren to convey,
Vivian and Malagigi, to the hand
Of Bertolagi, and his impious band.

E'er since the time Ferran subdu'd in fight
Our kinsmen, has she kept each helpless knight
In the drear confines of a darksome cell,
Till this dire compact which I loathe to tell,

To-morrow's sun the prisoners, with a guard,
He sends to Bertolagi, where prepar'd, 520
Near fair Bayona, he with gifts of cost
Shall buy the dearest blood that France can boast
To our Rinaldo on a swift-foot steed

The news I sent, but much I fear our need
Requires that speedy uncoour from his sword,
The length of way forbids him to afford.
No force have I to lead against the foe ;

My will is prompt, but, ah ! my means are slow.
Then, whither shall I turn, what method try ?
If in his hands they fall, they surely die.” 530

Ill Richardetto this advice receiv'd,
Which, grieving him, no less Rogero griev'd :
He saw, where both in pensive silence stood,
Opprest with evil chance, despairing good ;
Then dauntless thus :—“ Compose each anxious breast,

With me alone this enterprise shall rest ;
Against a thousand weapons shall you see
Mine boldly drawn to set your brethren free :
My single arm the Pagan hands shall face ;

Give but a guide to lead to yonder place, 540
Where such a compact threatens your wretched race.

Soon shall the battle's tumult reach your ear.
Though distant, each the cries or groans shall hear
Of those that bargain for each wretched thrall,
Of those that fly, or of those that fall.”

Thus he ; and what he spoke, one warrior knew
By proof late seen, his deeds might well make true ;
While one scarce heard, or heard but a few words
Of those, whose boasting little hope affords,
But Richardetto him aside address'd, 550
And told how late his life, when sore distress'd,
Rogero sav'd, and well he knew his deed
On fit occasion would his speech exceed.

Unknown, (see note to Book xxiii.) and by what Ariosto here says, it should seem that some author had made Aldiger the legitimate son of Gerard.

¹² Lanfusa, the mother of Ferrau.

At this good Aldiger, with alter'd mind,
To do him reverence every thought inclin'd;
And at his table plac'd, where Plenty poor'd
Her well-fill'd horn; he honour'd as his lord.
And now the knights and noble youth agree,
Without more aid the captive pair to free.

The hour approach'd, when sleep prepar'd to close 560

The eyes of lords and knights in soft repose,
All, save Rogero's; in whose anxious breast
Corroding thought repell'd approaching rest.
The siege of Agramant, which late he heard,
Engross'd his thoughts: he knew each hour deferr'd

To join his lord, must sully his fair fame;
Nor could he, but with deepest sense of shame,
Assist his sovereign's foes, and own the Christian
name.

His change of faith at other times had prov'd
A mind sincere, by pure religion mov'd; 570

But now, when Agramant, in state distress,
Requir'd his arm, might rather speak him prest
With dastard fear, than urg'd by force of truth:
While these reflections pain the generous youth,
He dares not yet to Agramant depart,
Without her leave, the sovereign of his heart.

Each thought by turns his dubious bosom sways;
Now this prevails, and now more lightly weighs.

Once had he hop'd, but vainly hop'd, to meet
His Bradamant at Floridespina's seat, 580

Which with the guiding fair and martial maid¹³
He lately sought in Richardetto's aid.

And now he calls to mind his first design,
At Vallombrusa's walls his love to join,

His virgin-love, who there might well expect
His sight in vain, and blame his slow neglect.

His thoughts thus changing, never at a stay,
He fix'd at length, by letter to convey
His secret soul; though doubtful yet whose care
Might to her hand the gentle message bear; 590

Yet trusts that chance would on his way provide
A messenger, in whom he might confide.

He quits his bed—and pens and light¹⁴ demands:
The ready pages, with officious hands,

Each need supply—and first, as lovers use,
He greets her fair, then greets th' unwelcome news.

He bids her think, on him what shame must wait,
Should death or bondage be his sovereign's fate:

That since he hop'd her husband's name to gain,
No slightest blemish must his honour stain: 600

As nought impure must his pure love enjoy,
Whose soul was truth, refin'd from all alloy.

If e'er he wish'd to purchase virtuous fame,
Or wish'd, when purchas'd, to preserve the claim,

What must he now, when she, his future wife,
Would share with him in each event of life?

¹³ Bradamant.

¹⁴ The Italian:

salta delle piume,
Sa fa dar carta, inchiostro, penna e lume
Literally,

He leaps from his bed,
And causes paper, ink, pens, and a light to be given him.

These familiar passages cannot well be rendered in our language, and it is surely difficult to convey, in any tolerable manner, the author's sense in English verse.

With him in weal or woe be ever join'd,
Two bodies link'd by one informing mind?
And as he oft had vow'd, he thus once more
His vows confirm'd; the fated season o'er, 610

For which he to his lord must keep unstrain'd
His loyal truth; he then, if life remain'd,

By every proof would all her fears relieve,
And Christian faith with open rites receive;

And from her sire, her brother, all her train
Of kindred friends, her hand in marriage gain.

"First will I raise," he said, "with thy consent,
The siege by which my sovereign lord is pent,

Let men should say, while Agramant maintain'd
His prosperous state, Rogero firm remain'd: 620

But now, for Charles, since Fortune changes hands,
He spreads his standard with the victor's bands.

Some thrice five days, or twenty, let me prove
My force, my monarch's danger to remove,

Then will I fronn a just excuse, to take
My leave of Agramant—for honour's sake,

I ask no more, and all my future life
I give to thee, my mistress and my wife."

In phrase like this¹⁵, Rogero painted well 629
His secret thoughts, which scarce the Muse can tell;

Nor stay'd his pen, till, words fast flowing o'er,
The love-directed page could hold no more.

The letter ending here, the lions he seal'd,
And, sealing, in his careful bosom held,

In hopes some friend, ere one revolving day,
Might to her hand the gentle charge convey.

The letter clos'd, he clos'd in slumber deep
His heavy lids o'er-watch'd;—the power of sleep

Stood near his couch, and o'er his members threw
The peaceful drops of Lethe's silent dew. 640

He slept, till in the east a breaking cloud
With blended hues of white and purple glow'd;

Whence flowers were strow'd o'er all the smiling
skies.

And, thro'nd in gold, the morn began to rise.
When now the birds from every verdant spray,

With early music hail'd the new-born day,
Good Aldiger (Rogero thence to lead,

With Richardetto, where their venturous deed
Must set the brethren free from captive bands
Condemn'd to impious Bertolagi's hands) 650

Was first on foot; and with him either guest,
Who heard the summons, left his downy rest.

Now clos'd with temper'd steel, in meet array,
Rogero with the kinsmen took his way.

Oft had Rogero pray'd, but pray'd in vain,
His single arm might that day's glory gain:

The two, through ardour in their kinsmen's cause
To join his arms, and urg'd by honour's laws,

Like rocks unmov'd, refus'd to him to yield
Alone the danger of so brave a field. 660

The hour approach'd, when either Pagan train
Prepar'd to bring each car, and loaded wain,

With Malagigi, Vivian, and the gold
For which the wretched chiefs were bought and sold.

The warriors reach'd the place; a field that lay,
Of wide extent, expos'd to Phœbus' ray:

No laurel there, no myrtle's fragrant wood,
Nor oak, nor elm, nor lofty cypress stood;

¹⁵ Spenser has in like manner introduced a letter
into his poem; upon which Mr. Upton observes,
"Spenser has not the authority of Homer and Virgil for introducing an epistle in his epic poem,
but he has the authority of Ariosto."

But thorns and brambles chok'd the barren soil,
That felt no spade, nor own'd the ploughman's toil. 670

The three bold champions check'd their coursers' rein.

Where stretch'd a path extending o'er the plain;
When drawing nigh, a warrior they behold,
Array'd in costly arms that bound'd with gold,
In whose fair shield of vivid green, appears
The wondrous bird that lives a thousand years.

Here cease, my lord, while thus the book I close,
And, passing by, attend awhile repeat.

BOOK XXVI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero, Richardetto, and Aldiger, meet an unknown warrior, who joins their party. They attack the troops of Maganza and the Moor, and defeat them. Rogero and Marphisa signalize their valour. The prisoners, Malagigi and Vivian, are set at liberty. The warriors reposing themselves after the battle, Malagigi explains to the rest the mystical sculpture on the fountain made by Merin. Hippalca arrives, and gives an account to Richardetto and Rogero of her losing Frontino, which was taken away by Rodomont. Rogero departs to revenge the affront. Arrival of Rodomont, Mandricardo, and Doralis. Mandricardo jousts with all the knights, and overthrows them: his battle with Marphisa. Rogero returns to the fountain. Strange dissensions amongst the warriors. Rogero claims his horse of Rodomont; and Mandricardo wrangles with Rogero for the device on his shield. Rodomont, Mandricardo, and Rogero fight: Marphisa takes part with Rogero. Malagigi, fearing for the safety of Richardetto attacked by Rodomont, causes, by his magic art, a demon to enter the horse of Doralis, which carrying her away, she is immediately followed by Mandricardo and Rodomont, who are afterwards pursued by Rogero and Marphisa.

THE generous dames of ancient time despis'd
The charms of wealth, and virtue only priz'd:
In this our age, we see the female train
Scarce bend a wish to aught but sordid gain.
Yet those who, blest with imbred goodness, shun
That love of gold which has the sex undone,
Living, content and peace may justly claim;
And, dead, should find the meed of endless fame.
For ever, sure, most Bradamant be prais'd,
Who not her thoughts to power or riches rais'd, 10
But lov'd what'er bespoke the noble mind,
Grace, courage, honour, in Rogero join'd;
And well deserv'd a knight of such desert
Should bear her image in his constant heart;
And for her sake those valorous deeds achieve,
Which after-ages scarcely could believe.

Rogero, with the two, as late I told,
With Aldiger and Richardetto bold,
(The knights of Clarmont) bright in steel array'd,
Prepar'd to give the brother-prisoners aid. 20
I told you how a warrior cross'd the field,
Of fearless gesture, bearing on his shield
The bird that from its ashes springs to birth,
And (strange to tell) but one appears on Earth.

Soon as the knight unknown, advancing, view'd
Where each brave chief prepar'd for combat stood,
Eager he burn'd to prove, in martial deed,
How far their valour with their looks agreed.

"Is there amongst you one who dares," he cries,
"With me in single fight dispute the prize? 31
With spear or sword in rough encounter meet,
Till one shall fall, while one retains his seat?"

"That man were I!"—thus Aldiger replied,
"With thee the sword to wield, the spear to guide:
But (as thyself shalt see) far other task
Bids us refuse what courage bids thee ask;
A task, that scarce permits these few short words,
Much less the time to run at tilt affords.

Behold, where station'd here we three prepare
At least six hundred men in arms to dare, 40
That by our love and valour may be freed
Two wretched friends, to cruel bonds decreed."

He said; and to the brave unknown reveal'd
The cause at full that brought them to the field.

"Well hast thou urg'd such reasons as suffice
For just excuse," the stranger thus replies,
"And sure three knights you seem whose dauntless worth

Scarce meets its equal through the spacious Earth.
With you I sought, erewhile, to run the course
On equal terms, for proof of either's force: 50
But since on others I shall see your might
Far better tried—I claim no more the fight:
But this I claim—my arms with yours to wield,
With yours to join this helmet, lance and shield,
And trust to prove, when on your side I stand,
Not undeserving of so brave a band."

Some here may wish to learn the warrior's name,
Who thus, a fearless candidate for fame,
Would with Rogero and his fellows meet 60
The dreadful hazards of their hardy feat.
She then (no longer he this champion call)
Was bold Marphisa, from whose hand his fall
Zerbino suffer'd, sworn by her to guard
Gabrina foul, for every ill prepar'd.

The good Rogero, and each noble lord
Of Clarmont's house, receiv'd with one accord
The proffer'd aid of her, whom all esteem'd
Of manly sex, as by her dress she seem'd.

Not long they stay'd, ere Aldiger beheld,
And show'd his friends at distance on the field, 70
A banner rais'd, that to the breezes flow'd,
And round the banner throng'd a mingled crowd.
When now advanc'd, so near in sight they drew,
That by their Moorish garb the warriors knew
The hostile band; amid the shouting throng
They saw the hapless brethren borne along
On two low steeds, expecting to behold
For sums of wealth their persons chang'd and sold.

Then thus Marphisa—"Wherefore such delay,
When these are present, to begin the fray?" 80
Rogero answer'd—"Of th' invited train
To crown the banquet, many guests remain,
Nor yet arriv'd—we from a solemn treat,
And all must join to make the feast complete,
Soon will the rest attend."—While thus he said,
His bold compeers the remnant foes survey'd:
The traitors of Maganza's line advance,
And all is ready to begin the dance.

There warn'd the numbers of Maganza's crew,
With groaning mules in loaded wains, that drew 90
Gold, vests, and precious wealth; while here were seen
The captive brethren, with dejected mien;

Who slowly rode, in shameful shackles bound,
With lances, swords, and bows, encompass'd
round;

And Bertolagi (cause of either's grief)
Was heard conferring with the Moorish chief.
Nor Buovo's son, nor he of Atton's strain,
The traitor present, could their wrath contain.
At once his spear in rest each warrior took; 99
And each, at once, the proud Magabzan struck.
Oue through his helm the deadly wound im-
press'd;

One drove the thrilling weapon through his breast.
As Bertolagi by these knights was slain,
Like him so perish all, that wrong maintain.

At this Marphisa with Rogero tir'd,
No other signal for th' attack requir'd;
And ere her spear she broke, the martial maid
Low on the ground three warriors breathless laid.
The other impious thief was worthy found
From fierce Rogero's spear to meet his wound: 110
He fell; and, by the same dire weapon slain,
Two more were sent to Death's relentless reign.
An error now amidst th' assail'd was bred,
That wide and wider to their ruin spread:
Those of Maganza deem'd themselves betray'd
By the fierce Saracens; the Moors, dismay'd
By frequent wounds and deaths on every hand,
With treacherous murder charg'd Maganza's band;
Till fell reproach to mutual carriage rose,
With spears in rest, drawn swords, and bended bows. 120

Now here, now there, by turns Rogero flew
On either troop; now ten, now twenty slew.
As many by the virgin's weapon kill'd,
In divers parts lay scatter'd o'er the field.
The rider from his saddle lifeless fell,
Whene'er descended either trenchant steel;
Helmet and corselets yielded where it came;
As crackling serewood to destroying flame.
If e'er you saw, or e'er have heard the tale,
How, when fierce factions in the hive prevail, 130
As to the standard in the fields of air
The buzzing legions for the fight prepare,
Amidst them oft the hungry swallow pours,
Rends, kills, or scatters, and whole troops devours;
So think Marphisa, so Rogero rag'd;
Alike by turns each dastard troop engag'd.
But Richardetto nor his kinsmen chang'd
The slaughter thus; nor thus alternate rang'd;
The hand of Saracens untouch'd they leave,
While all their furies to Maganza's cleave. 140
Rinaldo's brother, to the dauntless mind
That fits a knight, had mighty prowess join'd;
And now the hatred he Maganza bore,
Gave twofold vigour to his wonted power:
This field the base-born son of Buovo's bed,
Who, like a lion, his resentment fed:

Through helm and head his weapon took its course,
And both gave way before the crashing force.
What soul but here had caught the martial ire?
What breast but here had glow'd with Hector's fire?
Here, with Marphisa and Rogero join'd, 15)
The choice, the flower of all the warrior-kind,
Marphisa, as she fought, oft turn'd her eyes,
And view'd her comrades' deeds with vast surprise;
She prais'd them all; but good Rogero rais'd
Her wonder most, him o'er mankind she prais'd:

Sometimes she deem'd that Mars had from above
Left his 6th Heaven, the fights of men to prove.
She mark'd his dreadful sword, that never fail'd,
Against whose edge no temper'd steel assail'd; 160
The helm and cuirass strong it pierces through,
It cleaves the rider to the seat in two,
And sends, divided, in a crimson tide,
The corse in equal parts on either side,
Nor, deaden'd there, its dreadful fury stays,
But with his wretched lord the courser slays.
From many a neck his falkions lops the head;
Oft o'er the hips, sheer through the body sped,
It parts the trunk: now fly the rapid steel
Severa at once—and more I feay to tell, 170
Lest truth should falsehood seem: but Turpin fam'd.

Who knew the truth, and what he knew proclaim'd,
Leaves men to credit or reject his page,
Which blazon deeds unknown in this degenerate age.

Alike appear'd Marphisa's martial ire,
Her foes all frozen, and herself all fire!
While she no less attracts Rogero's gaze,
Than he before might claim the virgin's praise:
And as she deem'd him Mars, so, had he known
His partner's sex, to equal wonder won 180
Of her great deeds, he sure had styl'd the fair
The dread Bellona, patroness of war!
Caught each from each, their kindling ardour
rose,

Dire emulation for their wretched foes!
On whom they thus their mutual prowess show'd,
On nerve, on bone, on limbs all drench'd in blood.
Full soon the might of these resistless four Dispers'd each camp, and broke their strongest power.

Who hop'd to 'scape, his limbs from armour freed,
And stript in lighter venture urg'd his speed. 190
Happy the man whose courser swiftest flies,
No common pace his safety now supplies;
While he, who wants a steed, laments the harms
That more on foot attend the trade of arms.

The field and plunder to the coquering band
Were left; nor guard nor muleteer remain'd.
There fled Maganza's force, here fled the Moor,
Those left the prisoners, these their wealthy store.

With joyful looks, and with exulting mind,
The noble kinsmen hasten'd to unwind 200
Vivian and Malagigi, whilst a train
Bore heaps of treasure from the loaded wain;
Vases of silver wrought (the victor's prize),
And female vests that flam'd with costly dyes;
Viands, on which their hunger might be fed,
With generous wines, and all-sustaining bread.

* These passages remind us of the wounds given by knights-errant in romances, so often ridiculed by Cervantes, and for which Ariosto is, with these authors, liable to the censure of extravagance. The host, who, like Don Quixote, is intoxicated with reading romances, makes the following eulogium on those performances, in answer to the priest who had recommended history: "Before God, your worship should have read what I have read concerning Felixmarie of Hyrcania, who with one back-stroke cut asunder five giants in the middle, as if they had been so many bean-cods."

Jarvis's Don Quixote, vol. i. b. iv. c. v.

Each helm unlace'd, the noble warrior-maid
Appear'd content: her golden locks display'd
Her hidden ear, and on her lovely face
Bright shone the charms that female features
grace. 210

With rapture, all the gossamer virgin view'd,
And now to learn her glorious name they sued:
She, with her friends, to mild despatch us'd,
Complacant heard, nor what they wish'd refus'd.
(As her, whose deeds so late their wonder rais'd,
Each ardent knight with eyes insatiate gaz'd:
She on Rogoso; him alone she heard,
With him alone she stood, with him conferr'd.

But now the pages call'd her to repair
Where, by a fountain's side, the feast to share, 220
In the cool shelter which a hill display'd,
Her friends repos'd beneath the grateful shade.
This fountain, rais'd with art, was one of four
Which Merlin made in France by magic lore;
Of purest marble was the structure bright,
With dazzling polish smooth, and milky white;
Here Merlin, by his skill divine, had brought Expressive forms in rising sculpture wrought.
Thou wouldest have said they seem'd in act to strive, 229

And breathe, and move—in all but speech alive!
There, sculptur'd, from the woods a monster
came,

Of fearful aspect, and of mingled frame:

3 So Britomart disarms in Spenser.

With that her glittering helmet she unlac'd,
Which doft, her golden locks, that were upbound
Still in a knot, unto her beels down trac'd.

Fairy Queen, book iii. c. iv. st. 13.

Both poets compare their respective heroines to Bellona.

* Most of the commentators have explained this monster to mean Avarice, which had over-run all the Christian world, and brought scandal on the professors of the faith. Sir John Harrington, who lived in an age of allegory, says that Ariosto describes this vice very significantly; he makes "her ugly, because of all vices it is most hateful; ears of an ass, being for the most part ignorant, or at least careless of other men's good opinions; a wolf in head and breast, namely, ravenous and never satisfied; a lion's grisly jaw, terrible and devouring; a fox in all the rest, wily and crafty." See notes to sir John Harrington's translation of this book.

Lavezuolo, a commentator, extols this description of Ariosto, as far superior to Dante, who simply represents Avarice in the form of a lean and hungry wolf.

E una lupa, che di tutta brama,
Scontra carca con la sua magrezza,
E molte genti fè già viver grame.

Inferno, cant. i.

—Inflam'd with every fierce desire,
A famish'd she wolf like a spectre came,
Beneath whose gripe shall many a wretch expire.
Hayley.

Mr. Upton thinks, that by this monster is characterized Superstition, as ignorant, ravenous, cruel, and cunning. See his note to Fairy Queen, book i.
c. viii. st. 48.

An ass's ears, a wolf's stern front he wore,
With ravening teeth as long undrench'd with gore;
A lion's rending paw: in all the rest
His shape and hue the wily fox express'd.
With rage extom'd he travers'd Gallia's land,
Spain, Italy, and England's distant strand:
Europe and Asia had his force o'er-run,
And every clime beneath the rolling Sun. 240
Where'er he pass'd, the wounds or deaths he dealt,
The low, the proud, and every station felt:
But most the last—his fellest wrath he pour'd
On king, on prince, on potentate, and lord,
The Roman court his worst of furies knew,
There popes and mitred cardinals he slew.
This beast the hallow'd seat of Peter soild,
And with lewd scandals the pure faith defid'd.
Before the monster's rage in ruins fall
Each strong-built fort, and well-defended wall. 250
To honours even divine he dares pretend;
He makes th' insensate crowd in homage bend;
Bids servile tongues his impious glories swell,
And boasts to keep the keys of Heaven and Hell.

Behold a warrior near, who round his hairs
The sacred wreath of regal laurel wears:
Three youths beside, whose kingly vestments bold,
Inwrought with silk, the fleur-de-lis of gold;
With these a lion the like signal shows;
And all combin'd the raging beast oppose. 260
Of one the name is graven o'er his head,
The name of one is in his garment read.
Behold the chief, who to the hilt has got'd
The monster's bowels with his crimson'd sword:
Francis the First of France—and near him stands
Great Maximilian, lord of Austria's lands;
The emp'rour Charles (the fifth that bears the name)
Has pierc'd his ravenous throat with deadly aim.
Henry the Eighth of England next succeeds,
Pierc'd by whose shaft in front the savage bleed:
Leo the Tenthth, the name you lion bears, 271
Who fastening on his ears the monster tears:
Close and more close these four the foe invade,
And others now advancing join in aid.

Pale terror seems to fly from every place,
While, ready to retrieve each part disgrace,
The nobles, though but few, united strive,
And the dire pest at length of life deprive.
Marphisa with the knights impatient sought
To know the chiefs at full, whose arms had wrought
A deed so brave, by whom the bear lay dead, 281
That far and wide such desolation lay;
Since the fair fount, with figures sculptur'd o'er,
The names discover'd, but reveal'd no more.

The different explanations prove the uncertainty that often attends allegorical description, though I cannot but think, from many circumstances, that Ariosto means to represent Avarice. Spenser, whose work is one continued allegory, would sometimes be totally unintelligible, but that he generally gives the names to his personified characters.

* It is not easy to say how far Ariosto meant to carry his satire, but a Protestant commentator might very easily deduce from this passage a severe reflection on the sale of pardons and indulgences, in order to feed the avarice of the Romish clergy.

† Pope Leo X. here figured under the similitude of a lion, in which manner the poet often speaks of him: a kind of punning allusion to his name.

On Malagigi Vivian turns his eyes,
Who near in silence sat, and thus he cries:
" 'Tis thou must speak what all request to learn,
For in thy looks thy knowledge I discern:
Say, what are those, whose weapons, well employ'd,
Have, with yon lion's aid, the beast destroy'd?" 360

Then Malagigi—" Think not you behold
A past event in story'd annals told;
Know first, the chiefs you see are yet unborn,
The chiefs whose deeds the marble fount adorn.
Seven hundred years elaps'd, their matchless worth
Shall gladden, in their age, the wandering Earth:
Merlin, the magic sage, this fountain made,
What time the British realm King Arthur sway'd.
From Hell this monster came to plague mankind;
When lands were first by stated bounds confin'd;
When commerce, weights, and measures first began,
When written laws were fram'd 'twixt man and man.
As yet his power no distant realm attain'd,
But various countries long unburd remain'd:
He troubles, in our age, full many a place,
And spreads his mischiefs through the human race.
Since first on Earth appear'd th' infernal beast,
We see, and still shall see, his bulk increase'd
Beyond the worst of plagues; not that so fam'd
In ancient page, terrific Python⁷ nam'd, 310
Can equal this!—What carnage shall be spread!
In every part what baneful venom shed!
Whate'er the sculpture shows, his rage exceeds;
Unutterable and detested deeds!
Long shall the groaning world for mercy sue
When these, whose names are read, these chosen few,
Whose fame must shine like Phœbus' beams display'd,

At utmost need shall bring their glorious aid,
Not one shall more the cruel beast appall,
Than Francis⁸, whom the Franks their sovereign
Oall.

He first of men!—with happy omens led,
The crown scarce settled on his youthful head,
Shall cross th' opposing Alps, and render vain
Whate'er against him would the pass maintain;
Impell'd by generous wrath t' avenge the shame
Which from the rustic folds and sheep-cotes came,⁹
With sudden inroad, on the Gallic name.
To Lombardy's rich fields he then descends,
The flower of Gallia on his march attends.
Th' Helvetic power he routs, as never more 330
To raise its pride to what it rose before:
Then to the church's scandal, to the stain.
Of either camp, of Florence and of Spain,
He storms the castle, which till then was held,
Through strength of bulwark, never to be quell'd.

⁷ Python was a monstrous serpent, said by the ancient poets to have been engendered from the slime of the Earth after the deluge. He was killed by the darts of Apollo; in commemoration of which event were instituted the Pythian games.

⁹ The poet means the Switzers, who, at that time, followed no employment in their own country but that of shepherds and herdsmen.

Where'er he wields th' his weapon, prostrate lies
Each hostile standard, or before him lies:
Nor fomer rampart e'er his force opposes,
And strongest walls in vain the town enclose.
This glorious chief shall every gift possess 340
By Heaven decreed the happiest prince to bless:
As Caesar thrives: his prodices far renown'd,
As his at Therapsone and Trebia found:
Him Alexander's fortune shall attend:
On every deal in vain our toil we bend,
Unless good fortune e'er our dangers befriend.¹⁰

Thus Malagigi spoke, and new desire
In every knight was kindled to inquire
The names of other chiefs, whose arms could quell
The dreadful host by whom such numbers fell. 350
There, midst the first, was read Bernardo's name¹¹,
Whom Merlin's sculpture christen'd to fame:
By him shall Bibiena gain renown,
With neighbouring Florence, and Siena's town.
No foot shall step before Giovanni's place;
Ghismond or Ludovico's¹² deeds efface.
Francisco¹³ see, nor from his generous sire
Brave Frederico¹⁴ shrink: an equal fire
His kinsmen feel: alike each dauntless look;
Ferrara's there, and here Urbino's duke¹⁵: 360
From one of these brave Guidobaldo¹⁶ sprung,
Pursues his sire, with love of glory stung:
With Ottobon there Sinibaldo¹⁷ drives
The raging beast, and each for conquest strives.

¹⁰ He means the emperor Charles V. whom he compares to Caesar for his valour, to Fabius Maximus for his prudence, and to Alexander the Great for his success.

¹¹ This Bernardo was surnamed Divitio, though he was generally called Bibiena, from the town of that name near Florence, where he resided. He attached himself to the fortune of Giovanni di Medici, afterwards Leo, and was by him created cardinal of Santa Maria, in Portico. He wrote the comedy called Callandra, and caused it to be represented at Rome by the young nobility, in honour of Isabella duchess of Mantua. He died at no advanced age, having conceived hopes of obtaining the popedom on the decease of Leo.

¹² Three cardinals, Giovanni Salviati, one of the most ancient and illustrious families of Florence; a man of profound learning and virtue. Ghismondo Gonzaga, created cardinal by Julius II. The third was Ludovico of Arragon, likewise a cardinal.

¹³ Francisco Gonzaga; second of the name, and fourth marquis of Mantua: he succeeded to the possession of his father Frederic at eighteen years of age, and fought against Charles VIII. of France; he was a general of consummate skill and intrepidity; and Charles, enamour'd of his worth, in vain endeavoured to corrupt his faith, and detach him from the Venetians. Formari.

¹⁴ Frederico Gonzaga, son of Francisco, after the death of his father, was by Leo X. made captain general of the Roman church, and of the republic of Florence. He was magnificent, liberal, just, and a great patron of virtue and learning. Formari.

¹⁵ Alphonso of Este, and Francisco Maria della Rovere.

¹⁶ Guidobaldo the second, afterwards duke of Urbino, son of Francesco Maria.

¹⁷ Of these names were two noble youths, bro-

Lewis of Gazale¹⁸, with speed'ing art,
 Warns in the monster's neck the father'd dart:
 His dart and bow had Phœbus' gift supply'd,
 When Mars the falchion girded to his side.
 See two Hippolites¹⁹ of Este's breed;
 Two Hercules²⁰, and next of kindred seed 370
 Another Hercules, and near him shine
 A third Hippolito²¹: this last the line
 Of Medici: the first Gonzaga's race:
 All these with equal warmth the monster chase.
 Not Julian's son²² above his sire prevails,
 Nor in his brother's steps Ferrantes²³ fails:
 Unconquer'd Dusa²⁴ shewn an equal mind:
 By none Francisco Sforza²⁵ left behind.
 See two apes, whose blood illustrious flows
 From noble Aralo²⁶, whose banner shows 380
 The rock which whelm'd beneath Typhous bare,
 Typhous fell with serpents cover'd o'er.
 Scarce one so prompt as these in noble deed,
 Scarce one so prompt to taste the monster bleed.

them of the family of Fieschi at Genoa. Ottobon was an ecclesiastic. These retired into voluntary exile, that they might not, by a private enmity which they had incurred, draw a war upon their country. There were likewise two pontiffs of the same name. One was Innocent IV. first called Sinibaldo of Genoa, of the family of the Fieschi. He ordered the cardinals to wear a red hat, and was a liberal and munificent pontiff. The other, Adrian IV. before called Ottobon, nephew of pope Innocent IV. of the same family and country, created cardinal by his uncle. He was a man of great ability and application, but lived only forty days after he came to the papal chair. Fornari.

¹⁸ Luigi Gonzaga, surnamed Rodomont from his valour, was the son of Ludovico Gonzaga, and called Gamba from a castle which he held. This person is further spoken of in the succeeding notes.

¹⁹ One, to whom the poet dedicates his book; the other, son of Alphonso duke of Ferrara, likewise a cardinal. Fornari.

²⁰ Hercules, the father of Alphonso duke of Ferrara, and his son afterwards duke of Ferrara. Fornari.

²¹ Hercules Gonzaga, cardinal of Mantua; Hippolito of the honour'd family of Medici, cardinal of St. Lorenzo. He died by poison, much lamented for his many virtues. Fornari.

²³ Ferrantes Gonzaga, brother to the duke of Mantua, at one time viceroy of the island of Sicily, and afterwards lieutenant of the duchy of Milan, and general of the army for the emperor. Fornari.

²⁴ See Book xv. note to ver. 218, where his character is displayed at large.

²⁵ He means the second Francisco Sforza, son of Ludovico il Moro, who having married the daughter of Christian king of Dacia, and sister to Charles V. obtained the duchy of Milan. Fornari.

²⁶ This noble family of the Avoli came from Spain, well known at Toledo, and of great repute and antiquity. Fornari.

See here Francesco of Pescara²⁷ fam'd,
 And there Alphonso see of Vasco²⁸ nam'd.
 Where is Gonsalvo²⁹ next, whose acts shall raise
 The Spanish realm with never-dying praise?
 Of him would Malagigi gladly tell,
 Whom none, in this intrepid band, excels. 390
 William of Monserrato's³⁰ name is read,
 With those who came the monster's blood to shed,
 While midst the chiefs that thus th' assault maintain,

Lo! some are wounded there, some here are slain.

Thus in discourse, the banquet of the mind,
 Their hunger fed, on carpets rich reclin'd,
 Beside the font in bowery shades they lay,
 And careless pass'd the sultry hours away;
 While Malagigi, and while Vivian drest
 In shining steel, kept watch to guard the rest. 400

Now unaccompany'd behold a dame,

With looks impatient, to the fountain came:

Hippaica was she call'd, from whom the hand

Of ruthless Rodomont Frontino gain'd:

Hint all the live-long day puru'd the maid,

With threats to move him, or with prayers persuade;

But when she found nor threats nor prayers succeed,

Direct for Agrimont she bent her speed,

Since there she heard (but how, remains untold)

Rogero stay'd with Richardetto bold. 410

The place full well she knew, the ready way

As well she knew that near the fountain lay.

She came, and sudden there Rogero view'd;

But as Love's prudent envoy, well indu'd

With cautious thought, whatever chance might fall,

And prompt to change at meet occasion's call;

Soon as her lady's brother she beheld,

She check'd her bridle, and her haste repell'd,

And midst the warriors coldly passing by,

On young Rogero cast a stranger's eye. 420

Then Richardetto rose to meet the dame,

And ask'd her whither bound, and whence she came.

She then with heavy cheer, and eyes yet red

From many a falling tear, thus, sighing, said;

²⁷ Marquis of Pescara and son of Alphonso. He was a great commander, and prosperous in every undertaking, except at Ravenna, where, receiving

many wounds, he was taken prisoner; but fortune from that time was ever favourable to him. To the study of arms he joined the embellishment of letters; and while prisoner with the French, addressed to his wife Victoria an elegant dialogue on love.

At last, after many victories obtained over the French, his strength being wasted with fatigue, he died in the flower of his age, covered with laurels.

Fornari.

²⁸ Cousin to the before-named Francesco, and no less an ornament to the house of Avoli. Fornari.

²⁹ Gonsalvo Ferrantes was born at Cordova in Andalusia, of an ancient and noble family. By his assistance Ferdinand conquered the city of Granada, and the kingdom of Naples. He gained the title of Great, and at last died of a fever in the seventy-second year of his age, in the year 1515.

Fornari.

³⁰ He means William the third marquis of Mon-serrato. He was rich in every accomplishment of mind and body, and gained many victories in France. He died in the flower of his age. Fornari.

E'en then his prudence had declin'd the fray,
Nor with a single blow prolong'd his stay. 690
Even that Rogero, who the battle claim'd,
That champion, high o'er other champions fam'd,
The man he wish'd to single from mankind,
And through the world had gladly rov'd to find,
Now fail'd to rouse him to the listed plain;
And him Achilles had provok'd in vain;
So well his soul repress'd her worsted ire,
So deep in embers slept the smother'd fire,
He told Rogero why he shoud'nd the fight,
And ask'd his aid to guard their sovereign's right,
As well bescom'd a true and loyal knight. 701

The siege once rais'd, full leisure would remain,
Among themselves their quarrels to maintain.
"I give consent," to him Rogero cry'd,
"To cease awhile our battle to decide,
Till Agramant is freed from hostile power,
So thou to me Frontino first restore.
Say, wouldst thou have me till the camp's release
Delay the combat and confirm the peace? 709
(The combat claim'd, to prove thy deed has stain'd
The name of knighthood, from a damsel's hand
To take my steed) Frontino now resign,
Else shall the powers of Earth in vain combine
To make me for one hour the fight decline."

While thus Rogero from the Sarzan's hands
Frontino, or the instant fight, demands;
And he, resolv'd, to neither will accede,
To give the battle, or restore the steed,
Lo! Mandricardo, on a different side,
New cause for contest in the field decry'd: 720
He sees, for his defence Rogero bear
The bird, that reigns o'er others prince of air,
The argent eagle in an azure shield,
Which once the Trojan knight³⁵ was seen to wield;
Which now Rogero challeng'd as his due,
Rogero, who his line from Hector drew.

Fierce Mandricardo, at the sight inflam'd,
With anger rav'd to view the bird he claim'd
Usurp'd by other hands, and, to his scorn,
On other shields great Hector's eagle borne. 730
Like him intrepid Mandricardo bore
The bird that Ganymede from Ida bore,
Such as he won it that tremendous day,
When at the magic dome³⁶ he seiz'd the dazzling prey.

Known is the tale, how from the Fairy's land,
This shield, with all the glorious arms, he gain'd,
Those arms by Vulcan forg'd, with skill divine,
To grace the knight of Priam's regal line.
For this before, in mutual strife engag'd,
Had Mandricardo and Rogero rag'd; 740
Why then the conflict ceas'd, I leave to tell,
Nor longer speak of what is known so well:
Thenceforth till now they never met in field,
But Mandricardo, when he view'd the shield,
Stept proudly forth, and, with a threatening cry—
"Lo! here, Rogero, I thy force defy.
Thou dar'st for thy device my eagle take;
Nor is this day the first my claim I make:
Think'st thou, as once my arm revenge forbore,
I still shall pass thy usurpation o'er? 750
Since neither threats, nor gentle means address,
Suffice to drive this folly from thy breast,

Soon shall I prove thee better might'st have weigh'd
The charge I gave, and in good time obey'd."

As in the crackling word, when breath inspires
The sudden blaze to wake the sleeping fires;
So to his ear when first the challenge came,
Rogero's anger burst to instant flame. [enrag'd,
"Thou think'st 't' o'erpower me now—" he cries
"But though another has my arms engag'd, 760
They soon shall win (thou to thy cost shalt see)
From him Frontino, Hector's shield from thee.
For this but late before³⁷ I wag'd the strife,
And late refrain'd to touch thy forfeit life.
As then no weapon at thy side I view'd,
Those deeds were sport, but these must end in blood.
Ill fate for thee you argent bird to bear,
Which thou usurp'st, and I with justice wear;
Deliver'd down to me, the rightful heir." 769
"Tis thou usurp'st my right"—and at the word,
Stern Mandricardo grasp'd his dreadful sword,
That sword, which once in fight Orlando drew,
And late in madness midst the forest threw.
Rogero then, whose unexampled mind
From courteous kore had never yet declin'd,
Soon as he saw his foe the falchion wield,
Let fall his spear as useless on the field.
His sword, good Balmuda, then with haste
His right hand seiz'd, his left the shield embras'd;
But Rodomont between them spur'd his steed. 780
Marphisa interpos'd with equal speed,
This, one; and that, the other knight repell'd;
By prayers imploer'd them, and by force with-held;
While of the treaty Algiers' king complain'd,
By Mandricardo twice so ill maintain'd;
First, when, to win Marphisa's charms, he mov'd
Against her knights, and well his valour prov'd;
And, from Rogero now his shield to take,
Could thus the cause of Agramant forsake.
"If strife thou seek'st—then let our swords," he cry'd, 790

"A quarrel nobler far than these decide.
With thee the combat done, my dauntless hands
Shall answer him who now his sword demands:
If from my sword thy life survives the fight,
Thou mayst with him dispute the buckler's right."
"Far other may the chance of arms provide,
To Rodomont," fierce Mandricardo cry'd,
"When, like some fount, that ne'er its current drains,
My dauntless vigour unimpair'd remains, 800
To meet Rogero, or a thousand foes,
With all the world, should all the world oppose."
Words follow words, and wrath new wrath supplies,
Now here, now there, increasing tumults rise.
Fell Mandricardo, whom new rage inflames,
With Rodomont, and with Rogero claims
At once the fight: mus'd efforts to bear,
Rogero spurrs at peace, and breathes but war.
On either side Marphisa would restrain
The growing strife, that makes her labour vain.
As when, escaping from its broken shores, 810
The angry stream through various channels pours,
The peasant sees the waves the meads o'erflow,
And trembles for his promis'd crops below;

³⁷ Boyardo tells us, that when first Rogero and Mandricardo met, a dispute ensued between them for this shield of Hector, which Mandricardo had won at the Fairy's castle.

³⁵ Hector.

³⁶ See note to Book xiv. ver. 240, for the history of this adventure.

While here his cares against the flood provide,
Through other beaches bursts the sounding tide:
Thus while with Rodomont Rogero rag'd,
And Mandricardo in like strife engag'd;
Where each aspir'd, his brother-chiefs above,
Himself in courage, strength, and skill to prove,
Marphisa strove to calm each restless soul, 820
No words can soothe them, and no art control.
If one a moment from the fight she drew,
She saw the other chiefs th' assault renew.
The dame, who sought to calm each furious peer,
Thus spake—"Attend, my lords, my counsel hear!
O! let us yet these vain debates compose,
Till Agreement is freed from Christian foes.
If each will thus neglect his country's right,
Then I with Mandricardo claim the fight; 829
To prove how well (for such his boast has bold)
He from myself in arms myself can win;
But if our king demands our better care,
Then let us hence, and every strife forbear."

"Not one shall aid our king with readier speed
Than I—but let him first restore the steed," Rogero cry'd—"let him my words attend,
Restore the courser, or himself defend.
Here will I fall in glorious combat slain,
Or, with Frontino, victor quit the plain."
Then Rodomont—"The first may well befall; 840
The last for other force than thine may call—"
Then thus pursu'd—"Hear, what I now protest,
If further ill betide our king distress,
Yours be the blame, since here prepar'd I stand,
To act what duty and what fame demand."

Thus he—but little heedful of the word,
Rogero furious grasp'd his shining sword:
Like some wild boar with Rodomont he clos'd,
To shoulder shoulder, shield to shield oppos'd:
With sudden force the Sarzan prince he shook, 850
One foot the stirrup unawares forsook.
"Deser the combat," Mandricardo cry'd,
"Or if thou fight'st, with me thy arm be try'd."
He said, and now inflam'd with deeper spite,
Struck on the helmet of the youthful knight;
Low to his courser's neck Rogero bent,
Nor soon recovering rose, for swiftly sent
By Ulien's mighty son, the thundering steel,
With dreadful ruin on his head-piece fell:
Of adamantine proof his helm was made, 860
Else to his chin had cleft the reeking blade,
Rogero's hands unclos'd with sudden pain;
One lost the falchion, and one lost the rein;
The startled courser bears him o'er the land,
And Balisarda glitters on the sand.

Marphisa, who that day in arms had stood
With brave Rogero, now the warrior view'd
By two at once in strife unequal press'd,
And indignation fill'd her generous breast.
On Mandricardo, turbid swift, she sped 870
Her unsheath'd falchion at the Tartar's head.
The king of Algiers on Rogero drives—
Frontino's woe, unless some aid arrives:
But Richardetto and bold Vivian bring
Their friendly aid: while 'twixt the knight and king
That spurs his steed, and this with ready sword
Supplies Rogero, now to sense restor'd.
To avenge his late disgrace Rogero burns,
And swift on Algiers' king indignant turns
So when by chance some ox a lion gores 880
At unawares, the generous savage roars
With fury more than pain, while round he sings
His lashing tail, and swift to vengeance springs:

On Rodomont's proud head Rogero pour'd
A storm of blows, and had his own good sword
Then arm'd his hand, the Afric knight had found
His helm, though tough, too weak to ward the wound;

That helm, which once for Babel's king was wrought,
When with the stars an impious war he sought
Discord, who now beholds with joyful eyes 890
Strife follow strife, on tumult tumult rise;
Exults that contest never more could cease,
By trace suspended, or compos'd by peace;
Secure of ill, her sister Pride she calls,
With her to seek again the cloister'd walls.

But let them hence—while we attend the fight,
Where, on the forehead of the Sarzan knight,
Rogero drove his weighty blade so well,
That backward on his steed the rider fell;
His harden'd scales behind, his hangby crest, 900
And clanking helm, Frontino's crupper press'd;
While thrice, and four times, here and there he reel'd,

And seem'd just falling on the grassy field:
Nor had his open'd grasp the sword retain'd,
But that a chain secur'd it to his hand.

With Mandricardo fierce Marphisa wag'd
A dreadful fight, that all his force engag'd.
Not less the Tartar fought with temper'd charms;
Their coursets well secur'd each bear from harm,
And either equal seem'd in strength and arms, 910
At length Marphisa's courser wheeling round
In narrow circuit on the slippery ground,
Fell sidelong down, and while to rise he strove,
Fierce Mandricardo Brigliadoro draws
Against his flank, forgetting knightly lore,
And low to earth the struggling courser bore.

With grief Rogero saw the warrior-maid
In evil plight, nor long his help delay'd:
His arm at freedom, while the Sarzan foe
Was senseless from his late inflicted blow, 920
On Mandricardo swift the sword he sped.
The wall-wind's stroke had cleft the Tartar's head,
With Balisarda had his hand been arm'd,
Or the fierce Tartar's helm less strongly charm'd.
The king of Algiers, now recovering, view'd
Young Richardetto, whom he saw intrude
With daring aid the combat to molest,
When late his powerful arm Rogero press'd.
To him he turn'd, and came full well prepar'd,
His deeds of good with evil to reward: 930

But Malagigi, deep in magic taught,
A strange device to save his kinsman wrought.
Though wanting here his book, whose potent force
Could stop the Sun in his meridian course,
His memory yet those awful words retain'd,
Which the foul demons at his will restrain'd:
On Dorasta he prov'd his magic slight,
And in her breast convey'd a subtle spright:
The beast, that Biondiano's daughter bore,
Receiv'd th' infernal angel, which the power 940
Of Vivian's brother from the realms of Hell,
Where Minos sits, had drawn by fated spell.
The palfrey, late so gentle to command,
That only mov'd by her directing hand,
The sudden impulse of the demon found,
And thrice ten feet he vaulted from the ground;
A dreadful leap! yet though he seem'd to fly,
The fair one kept her seat, while from on high,
Trembling for life, she gave a fearful cry.
Now lighting on his feet, the frantic steed 950
Runs at the spirit's drive; with furious speed

He bears the damsel, shrieking with affright,
And leaves behind the feather'd arrow's flight.

Rous'd at her voice, the son of Ulien stays
His arm from combat, and the fair surveys.
The fair he follows, rapid as the wind,
And Mandricardo spurs as swift behind.
The Tartar, bent no more with hostile arm
To work Rogero or Marphisa harm,
Awaits not truce or peace, but, where he views
Stern Rodomont and Doralis, pursues.

Meantime Marphisa from the earth arose;
(With rage and shame her generous bosom glows)
And, burning for revenge, too late beheld
The Tartar champion disant on the field,
Rogero, when he sees th' unfinished fray,
Roars like a lion baffled of his prey.
Both knew 't was vain to chase, with either steed,
Good Brigliadoro or Frontino's speed.
Rogero deem'd disgrace must stain his name,
In his Frontino to renounce the claim
The list untried—nor will Marphisa rest,
Till prov'd in fight the Tartar breast to breast.
The martial virgin and the knight agree
To follow those on whom they wish'd to see
Their full revenge, and, if unbound before,
They hop'd to find them with the Turkish power;
Where, lest the siege might work the Pagans woe,
The knights would haste t' attack the Christian foe.

Rogero, ere he yet his friends forsook, 980

A courteous leave of every warrior took;
And back returning to the fountain, came
Where the lov'd brother of his beauteous dame
Remain'd apart; to him the gentle knight
Firm friendship vows, in good or evil plight;
Then to his sister, by the youth, conveys [phrase;
Fair thoughts and greeting, couch'd in cautious
Such cautious phrase, as may her fears remove,
But no suspicion wake of secret love,
To Malagigi, Vivian, then in few, 990
To wounded Aldiger he bids adieu:
While these, with good Rogero, change no less
The grateful farewell, and their thanks express,
Again renc'd, with future service vow'd,
For ever due to aid so well bestow'd *.

Marphisa, eager Paris' walls to find,
Scarce bent a thought on those she left behind;
But Malagigi and good Vivian, prest
By friendly zeal, with distant signs address'd
The parting maid: her Richardetto view'd, 1000
And with like greeting her retreat pursu'd;
While hapless Aldiger †, with recent wound,
Unwilling lay, inclin'd along the ground.

First Rodomont with Mandricardo fled;
Next these Marphisa and Rogero sped
Their course to Paris—deeds transcending thought,
Shall in th' ensuing book to light be brought;
Deeds of those noble four, whose matchless hands
With rout and death o'erthrew the Christian bands.

BOOK XXVII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rodomont and Mandricardo, following Doralis, are dawn near the Christian forces, where they are met by Giodasso and Sacripant, and all together

* Alluding in the delivery of Vivian and Malagigi, Book xxvi.

† We hear no more of Aldiger in this poem.

fall upon the camp of Charles. Rogero and Marphisa arriving next, join them in the attack.
Great slaughter of the Christians, who are compelled to retire within the walls of Paris. The archangel Michael finds out Discord in the monastery, and sends her again to the Pagans.
Discensions renewed amongst the leaders. Agrament commanded that the contending knights should draw lots for the order of the combat.
The first lot falls on Rodomont and Mandricar-do. Preparations for the fight. While the knights are arming, a debate arises between Sacripant and Mandricardo for the sword Durindana.
Rogero again asserts his claim to the shield of Hector. Agrament and Marphisa endeavour to pacify them. Another quarrel breaks out between Rodomont and Sacripant for the horse
Frontino, which is likewise claimed by Rogero.
Brunello is forcibly carried off by Marphisa in the face of Agrament and his whole court.
Agrament persuades Rodomont and Mandricar-do to refer their title to Doralis to her own decision: they agree, and Doralis decides in favour of Mandricardo. Rodomont leaves the camp with indignation. His invective against women.
He is received and hospitably entertained by a country host.

Amidst the various gifts by Heaven assign'd,
With special grace to enrich the female kind,
Be this the praise, where most the sex aspires,
To counsel well when sudden need requires:
But seldom man mature advice supplies,
When time the means of long debate denies:
Good Malagigi wrought with fair intent,
And well it seem'd, but different was th' event:
For while he kept, by force of magic charms,
His kinsman Richardetto safe from harms, 10
The fiend, obedient to his potent word,
Convey'd the Tartar prince and Sarzan lord †
To distance far; nor then the sage foreknew,
What mischief hence on Christian Charles he drew.
Had time allow'd him leisure to reflect,
Some safer means had offer'd to protect
His kinsman's life, nor would, in evil hour,
His spells have thus distract the Christian power:
Some wiser arts the demon had constrain'd,
To bear to furthest east or western land 80
Th' affrighted dame, for France no more to view,
Where both the lovers might her fight pursue.
But that malignant fiend, man's endless foe,
By heaven's high justice doom'd to realms of woe,
Contriv'd what most the faithful would dismay,
Since his dread master † ne'er prescrib'd his way.

The palfrey with the hidden demon held
His rapid flight; no crossing stream repell'd
His bounding course; nor woods' entangled shade,
Nor fen, nor cliff, nor rock, his speed delay'd: 30
Till through the Franks and English camps he bore
(And all the unnumber'd host that Christ adores)

† Mandricardo and Rodomont.

* Since Malagigi had not prescribed the route, which the demon was to take, but left him to his own disposal, he took that course with the damsel which would draw Mandricardo and Rodomont towards the Christian camp, and consequently bring distress on Charlemain.

To' affrighted dame, and nobly had rector'd
 To her lov'd sire, Granada's royal lord.
 Meanwhile the son of Agriem persav'd
 The flying fair, and soon no longer view'd :
 With him was Ulion's son, but either knight
 Had lost her image from his straining sight :
 Yet, by the track, they follow'd still the chase,
 As nimble hounds the goat or leveret trace : 40
 Till either lover certain tidings gain'd,
 That with her sire the princely dame remain'd.
 Take heed, O Charles!—What o'clocks thy sky deform.

Hang o'er thy head, and threat the bursting storm !
 Not these alone, but king Gradasso's straws
 With Sacripant, prepar'd to smelt thy bands ;
 While Fortuna, to complete thy ruin'd state,
 Has rob'd thee of each glorious lamp, that late,
 Of strength and wisdom beam'd thy purest light,
 And leaves thee now in long enduring night. 50
 Orlando now, estrang'd to every thought
 Of good or evil, roves with wit distraught
 O'er hill and plain, unbov'd and naked lies
 In heat or cold, in fair or stormy skies !
 Rinaldo, scarce with better senses inspir'd,
 Has left his prince when aid was most requir'd,
 Of fair Angolan the news to gale,
 In Paris lately sought, but sought in vain :
 An aged hermit, vers'd in magic art,
 (As once I told) had play'd a fearful part ; 60
 And wrought the unwary knight to fond belief.
 That she, so lov'd, was won by Brava's chief.
 At this, with jealous rage and grief distress'd,
 That ne'er before a lover's heart oppress'd,
 He enter'd Paris' walls, then voyag'd o'er
 (So chance decreed) to Britain's distant shore.
 The battle fought, in which such fame he won,
 The Moors besieg'd and freed the regal town,
 Paris again he view'd ; such conquest there,
 And every dome explor'd with fruitless care ; 70
 He deem'd, with Brava's chief, the lovely maid
 To Brava or Angolan's seats convey'd :
 Now pass'd the hours ; and thither hastes the knight ;
 Not there nor chief nor dame meets his sight ;
 And thence to Paris' walls he turns anew,
 In hopes, ere long, the Paladin to view :
 No Paladin he views : with rage he burns :
 Again to Brava and Angolan turns.
 Alike he journeys on by night or day,
 In mora's cool breeze, or noon-tide's sultry ray ; 80
 And many a time one path repeated tries,
 The Sun or Moon, by turns, its light supplies.

But he, our ancient foe, through whom the hand
 Of hapless Eve transgress'd the high command,
 With livid eyes imperial Charles beheld,
 What time vain love had from the camp expell'd
 Albano's knight : he mark'd with horrid joy
 What force might then the Christian powers annoy ;
 And now together brought against their host, 89
 The Sower of arms the Pagan world could boast.

He fires the king Gradasso, free the breast
 Of noble Sacripant ; who, since releas'd
 From old Atlantis' castle, where they star'd
 One common error, had companions far'd ?
 Along the way : he these incites to aid
 Their sovereign Agrament, and Charles invade.
 Himself, by secret ways, their course attends,
 And safely brings to join their Pagan friends.
 Another band he bids with trusty speed
 Fierce Rodomont and Mandricardo lead, 100
 Where late the demon urg'd the damsel's steed.
 A third he sent, that to the Pagan crew
 Valiant Rogero and Marphias drew ;
 Nor yet so swiftly to the camp they pass'd,
 But of the six, these two arriv'd the last.

The infernal angel, who relentless sought
 The Christian's loss, this subtle train had wrought,
 Lost, with Rogero Rodomont arriv'd.
 The late contention for the steep reviv'd
 Should cross his great design, for either knight 110
 Might then renew his undecided fight.
 The first brave warrior that together join'd
 Beheld in distant prospect to the wind
 The banners wave, and saw the tents ascend,
 Where these besiege the works, and these defend.
 And now, the council held, the dauntless four,
 In spite of Charles and all his numerous power,
 To raise the siege with joint consent agree,
 And Agrament from threatening ruin free.
 Compact and firm they bend their daring way 120
 Where deep encamp'd the Christian army lay ;
 While Africa and Spain aloud they cry,
 Now Pagans known to every ear and eye.

Through all the host, " To arms, to arms," resound'd
 A thousand tongues ; but ere their arms they found,
 The hostile steel invades them unprepar'd,
 And the first onset puts to flight the guard.
 The Christian chiefs, while thus the tumult spread,
 Scarce knew from whom, or why their soldiers fled :
 Some deem'd this daring insult they sustain 130
 From the fierce Swiss or hardy Gascon train :
 But, while uncertain whence th' incursion came,
 They call the troops of every clime and name,
 Loud beats the drum ; the trump its clangour pours
 The sky re-echoes, and the tumult roars !
 Imperial Charles, amidst his gathering bands,
 All, save his helmet, arm'd, intrepid stands.
 He calls his Paladins, and bids them tell,
 What sudden force could thus his legions quell.
 By threats now these, now those he stays from flight,
 And others he beholds (too cruel sight !) 141
 With heads discover'd by the furious blade,
 With bosoms pierc'd, and bowels open laid ;
 While some return (escap'd from greater harms)
 With bleeding limbs, with sever'd hands and arms,
 Advancing still, he sees where, scatter'd round,
 Unnumber'd wretches gasping bite the ground ;

* This seems to be a little slip of the poet's memory, as Sacripant and Gradasso did not leave the palace of Atlantis together ; for Sacripant, (see Book xii. ver. 220.) when the ring had dispell'd the illusion that so long detain'd him, had quitted the palace with Orlando and Ferrau, and followed the flight of Angelica ; but it appears (see Book xvii. ver. 141.) that Gradasso remained behind in the enchanted palace with Rogero, Bradamant, Ircoldo, and others, till the enchantment was dissolv'd by Astolpho. Of this oversight of the poet the Italian commentators have taken no notice.

¹ The last we heard of Gradasso was at the enchanted palace of Atlantis, Book xii., from which place all the knights were released by Astolpho.

² See Book ii. ver. 89 ; where the hypocritical hermit deceives Rinaldo and Sacripant with a lying vision, and parts the battle between the two rivals.

³ Orlando.

⁴ See Books xvi. xvii. & seq.

Dreadful to view! all weltering in their gore,
 When leech or drugs shall ne'er avail them more.
 Where'er this little band respiteless came, 150
 They left eternal monuments of fame; [held
 While Charles with wonder, grief, and shame, be-
 The fearful carnage of so dire a field.
 So o'er, who suffers by the thunder's force,
 Explores the track of its destructive course.

These noble four the tents had scarcely gain'd,
 Where Afric's monarch still entrench'd remain'd,
 When on a different side, th' assault to aid,
 Appear'd Rogero and the martial maid.⁸
 Soon as the generous pair had darted round 160
 Their skilful sight, to mark the camp and ground;
 And saw how best the combat to maintain,
 And raise the siege; they gave their steeds the rein.
 As, when the mine is fir'd, the straining eyes
 Scarce view the flame as through the train it flies,
 Till bursting forth, the fury levels all,
 Tears the firm rock, and shakes the strongest wall:
 So swift Rogero and Marphisa flew,
 Such was their rage amongst the warring crew.
 Aslant, direct, their furious blows they dealt; 170
 Discover'd scalps, lapt arms, and shoulders felt
 The trenchant steel, while, for escape too slow,
 Huge crowds divide before each gallant foe.
 Whoever has seen o'er hill or vale a storm
 Sweep fiercely on, with ruin part deform,
 Part leave unhurt, may judge how scatter'd wide,
 This warlike couple pierc'd the martial tide.
 Those, who from Rodomont's destructive hand
 Had fled, and 'scap'd the first assailing band 179
 Of four such warriors, gave their thanks to Heaven,
 That strength and swiftness to their feet had given.
 But now with weapons brandish'd at their breast,
 By bold Rogero and Marphisa prest,
 They see too late that him who stands or flies,
 What Fate has sentenc'd, Fate to shun denies.
 New danger follows one already past,
 Who 'scapes the first, must doubly pay the last.
 So fares it with the timorous fox, expell'd
 From ancient seats which once she safely held;
 Whom for her thefts the village binds coaptive 190
 To chase with vapour of the smouldering fire,
 Driv'n with her cubs upon the hound to run,
 And meet that death she hop'd in vain to shun.

At length Marphisa and Rogero gain
 The inmost trenches, whom the Pagan train
 Joyful receive with eyes on Heaven intent,
 In grateful thanks for aid so timely sent.
 No longer fear the meanest bosom knows,
 Each Pagan arm defies a hundred foes;
 With one united voice, their chiefs they call, 200
 And burn with ardour on the camp to fall.
 The Moorish drum, the horn and timbral blend
 Their rattling sounds that to the skies ascend:
 While streamers rais'd aloft, and banners join'd,
 With mix'd devices tremble in the wind.
 Not less the chiefs of Charles, with martial care,
 The troops of Britanny and France prepare:
 With these Italian, German, English, close
 Their martial lines, and fierce the battle glows!
 Stern Rodomont, of unresisted might, 210
 With Mandricardo, dreadful in the fight:

⁸ Marphisa.

⁹ Rodomont, Mandricardo, Gradasso, and Sacripant, who first attacked the camp of the Christian, and were afterwards joined by Rogero and Marphisa.

Noble Rogero (virtue's constant stream);
 And king Gradasso, every nation's theme:
 Marphisa stol'd in arms, and with her join'd
 Circassia's prince¹⁰, who never lagg'd behind;
 All these at once the king of France assail'd,
 And urg'd his vows, that nothing now avail'd.
 On John and Dennis (patron saints) he calls,
 But, soon compell'd, retires to Paris' walls.
 Th' o'erbearing valour of this matchless train 220
 (The knights and dame), the Muse, my lord! in vain
 Attempts to paint, nor can describe in speech,
 What beggars fancy, and no words can reach.

Think then what numbers fell of life bereav'd,
 What loss that day unhappy Charles receiv'd!
 With these Ferrau demands his share of fame,
 And with him many a Moor of gallant name;
 For haste, what numbers in the Seine were lost,
 The bridge unequal for the flying host!
 Some wish, like Icarus, for wings to soar 230
 From death, that threats behind and threats before.
 What hapless Paladins were then eschar'd!
 Vienna's marquis¹¹, and Ugero sav'd
 Aloof from bonds: see Olivero stand,
 Near his right shoulder by a hostile hand
 The wound inflicted deep, while at his side
 Ugero's head pours forth a purple tide.
 If, like Rinaldo or Orlando lost,
 Bravo Brandimart had left the Christian host,
 In exile thee might Charles have led his life, 240
 Had fortune giv'n him to survive the strife.
 Whatever cool thought or strength of nerve supply'd,
 Intrepid Brandimart had vainly try'd;
 Till forc'd at length to give the tempest way,
 Slow he recedes, and scarce resigns the day.

Thus Agramant propitious Fortune view'd;
 And once again the siege of Charles renew'd.
 The cries of orphans, and the widows' moans,
 Sons for their fathers, fathers for their sons,
 From Earth ascending, reach'd th' empyreal height,
 Where Michael sat in realms of purest light. 251
 He heard; and looking down with sad survey,
 Beheld, the foud of wolves and birds of prey,
 Stretch'd in their blood by thousands on the plain,
 Of every nation, his lov'd people slain.

The blessed angel blush'd celestial red¹²,
 To find his great Creator ill obey'd:
 To Discord late he gave his high command,
 To kindle strife amidst the Pagan band;
 Far different now, he sees the Pagans' hate 260
 All firmly join'd against the Christian state.
 As when some faithful envoy, who at large
 Receives commission for a weighty charge,
 Chides his neglect, recalling to his thought
 Some valu'd purpose, midst his zeal forgot,
 And, ere he sees his lord, with eager care
 Bends every power th' omission to repair:
 The angel thus will not to God ascend,
 Till future deeds his error past amend.
 To where before in hallow'd cloisters plac'd, 270
 He Discord met, he ply'd his wings in haste:
 Again he found, where midst the monks he sat,
 And at a chapter urg'd the dire debate:

¹⁰ Sacripant.

¹¹ Olivero.

¹² Thus Milton makes his angel change colour:

To whom the angel, with a smile that glow'd
 Celestial rosy red—

Pleas'd with their strife, she view'd with joyful eye,
Cast at each other, prayers and masses fly.
With holy wrath the heavenly angel burn'd,
Her by the locks he seiz'd, and seizing spurn'd;
Then in his hand a crosier swift he took,
And on her head, her arms, and shoulder, broke.
"Mercy! ah, mercy!"—loud the fury yell'd, 280
While close the heavenly nunciate's knees she held.

But Michael set not yet the Bend at large,
Till to the Saracens, with weighty charge,
He thus dismiss'd her—"Hence! nor more forsake
You hostile camp my heavier wrath to wake."

Though Discord, sorely bruis'd, with back and brest

The livid marks of many a stripe confess'd,
Yet trembling more with fear of future harm,
From the strong power of that angelic arm;
Her bellows swift she seiz'd with kindled fire, 290
And store of fuel that might well conspire
To increase the flames, with which her ruthless art
Lights up fell strife, that, rankling in the heart,
To Rodomont and Mandricardo spread,
With good Rogero: these the fury led
Before the king, for now, each peril o'er
From Christian foes, their legions fear'd no more
A new assault from Charles' defeated power.

Their quarrels told, each to the monarch shows
The causes whence their late discussion rose, 300
And begg'd his voice the contest to decide,

By whom in arms their claims should first be try'd.
Marphisa with the real attention won,
Eager to end her combat late begun,
Which first the Tartar urg'd; nor would she yield
A day, an hour, her title to the field;

But with a generous warmth enforc'd her right,
To meet with instant arms the Tartar knight.
Not less would Rodomont conclude the strife,
That to himself or rival gives the wife: 310

The mighty strife, by joint consent delay'd,
To give their friendly carap and sovereign aid,
Rogero would anquill his claim, and vow'd
That ill his honour Rodomont allow'd
From him the steed unjustly to detain,
And not in battle first the deed maintain.

More to perplex their broils the Tartar knight
Stept forth, and loud deny'd Rogero's right
To bear the bird with silver wings display'd:
And, as he spoke, such rage his bosom sway'd, 320
He dar'd the three at once to combat call,
By one sole trial to determine all:

Alike the rest in mingled fight had clos'd,
But that the king his high commands oppos'd.

King Agramant, that further strife may cease,
With prayers and soothing words entreats the peace.
In vain he soothes and prays—with deafen'd ear,
Each knight refuses peace or truce to hear:

And now his thoughts suggest the warriors' names
Inscrib'd on lots shall fix their several claims: 330
He bids four scrolls the written names disclose:

One Rodomont and Mandricardo shows:
With Mandricardo one Rogero bears:
Rodomont with Rogero one declares:
One Mandricardo with Marphisa joins:
These to be drawn, as fickle chance inclines,
The king commands; and lo! the first that came
Bore Sarza's king¹² and Mandricardo's name.

Next, with Rogero Mandricardo stood:
Rodomont and Rogero third were view'd: 340
Last, Mandricardo with Marphisa join'd;
Which sore displeas'd the martial virgin's mind.
Not better pleas'd his lot Rogero saw,
Lest he¹⁴, decreed the foremost chance to draw,
Should wage such conflict with the Tartar knight,
Marphisa and himself might lose their right
To meet the son of Agrican in fight.

Not far from Paris' walls a tract of ground
Was seen, a little mile in compass round;
Where, in theatric guise, the seats dispos'd, 350
With gentle rise a middle space enclos'd,
There once a castle stood, but now o'erthrown
By wars and time no more the place was known.
The lists were here design'd; with busy care
The workmen clear'd the ground and form'd a square
Of large extent, and fence'd on either hand,
With two wide gates, as ancient rites demand;
And at the barrier's end, the lists to close,
On either side a fair pavilion rose.

[right,
Now came the day, when swords must fix the Name'd by the king, and wish'd by either knight:
Plac'd in the tent that to the west appears, 360
His giant limbs the king of Algiers rears;
There bold Ferrau and Scarpant assist,
With scaly hide to arm him for the list:
And where the eastern gate its valves expands,
With king Gradasso Falsiroos stands,
These for the son of Agrican¹⁵ employ
Their aid, to deck him with the arms of Troy.
High on a lofty throne, in royal state, 370
The king of Spain and king of Afric sat:
Next Stordilano and the peers were plac'd
Above the rest, in rank and honour grac'd.
Happy is he who on some rising height
Or tufted tree can sit to view the sight!
Great is the press, and deep on every side,
Through all the camp, was pour'd the mingled tide,
Castilia's queen was present; many a queen
And princess fair, with noble dames were seen,
From Aragon, Castile, Granada's land, 380
And near the bound where Atlas' pillars stand.
There Stordilano's daughter, with the rest,
Appears in robes of various colour dress:
One vest was green, and one a paly red
Of soften'd dye, like roses newly shed:
A garb Marphisa wore, that might proclaim
(Succinct and simple) both the knight and dame,
Like her apparel'd, near Thermodon's flood,
Hippolyta with all her virgins stood,
Already in bit coat of arms array'd, 390
That royal Agramant's device display'd,
The herald enter'd, in the list to draw
The bounds practis'd, and state the duel's law.

While now impatient throngs demand the fight,
While oft their murmurs chide, and oft invite
Each tardy champion; sudden in their ear
From Mandricardo's tent a noise they hear,
Loud and more loud, deriv'd from wrathful words
Between the Sericane and Tartar lords.

Soon as the king of Sericane had dress'd
The Tartar monarch in his martial vest,
He stood prepar'd to gird the sword, which, tried
In battle oft, had grac'd Orlando's side,
When Durindana on the hill he views,
And that device Almontes wont to use,

¹² Rodomont.¹⁴ Rodomont.¹⁵ Mandricardo.

From whom, long since, beside a lispid brook,
This sword, while yet a youth, Orlando took.
He saw, and knew full well the famous sword,
That arm'd the hand of great Anglante's lord;
Which prize to gain he left his native shore, 410
With such a force as never was seen before;
And, some few years elaps'd, Castilia view'd,
And France itself beneath his arms subdu'd.
He marvel'd now, by what strange means obtain'd
He saw this sword in Mandricardo's hand,
Then ask'd what chance had given the fatal blade,
And when and where he from the earl convey'd
The precious prize—The Tartar prince reply'd:
" Erewhile in fight Orlando's force I tried:
At length he feign'd a madness to conceal 430
His dastard feelings; for he knew too well,
While this he wore, he still his trembling life
With one must risk in never-ending strife.
The beaver thus, who sees the woodland crew
Near and more near his hunted steps pursue,
Well conscious what they seek, behind him leaves
The sought-for treasure, and his life reprieves."

Ere yet he ceas'd, Gradasso took the word:
" To thee, nor any, will I yield the sword.
Justly I claim what long I toil'd to gain, 430
My gold expended and my people slain!
Some other weapon seek—nor deem it strange
That this I challenge—let Orlando rage
Frantic or wild, where'er this sword I hold,
The sword is mine—thou, as thyself hast told,
Found'st it far distant from its owner's throw,
But, found by me, I claim it for my own.
This falchion shall the right I plead maintain—
The list shall be my judge—prepare to gain 439
This sword by force, if this thou seek'st in fight,
To wield on Rodomont; since every knight
Who uses arms, should win them by his might."
At this the Tartar rub'd his daring head:
" What sweeter sound can reach my ears," he said,
" Than sight that speaks of war!—But first, in field,

To thee his turn the Sarzas prize must yield.
Procure with me the foremost fight to wage,
And let the second Rodomont engage:
Doubt not I stand prepar'd for thee—for all—
To answer thine and every mortal call." 450

Rogero then, increasing strife to breed:
" Think not t' infringe the terms so late agreed.
Be Rodomont the first in list to join,
Or, if he change, his fight must follow mine.
Grant what Gradasso pleads, that in the field
A knight must win his arms who arms would wield.
Shalt thou my bird with argent wings display,
Till from my grasp thou read'st the shield away?
Lo! here I stand t' abide the lot's decree;
The first to Rodomont—the next to me! 450
If thou persist our treaty to confound,
I spurn all order, and despise all bound:
Nor will I for a moment waive my right,
But call thee forth this instant to the fight!"
" Let each of you be Mars," then made reply
Fierce Mandricardo, " each his prowess try;
What arm shall dare forbid me here to wield
The trusty falchion or the glorious shield?"
Then fir'd to wrath, with steely gauntlet bent,
At Sericana's king a stroke he sent, 470
Whose better hand at unawares it took,
And Duridana straight his grasp forsook.
Gradasso, bursting then with rage, beheld
The sword disputed from his hand compell'd.

Indignant shame, despite, and burning ire,
Flush'd all his face; his eyeballs spark'd fire:
Fierce for revenge a backward step he made,
And stood in act to draw the deadly blade:
But Mandricardo, over unappall'd,
Him and Rogero to the battle call'd. 439
" Come, both at once—come, Rodomont!" he cried,
" To make the third, and come all three defy'd.
Come, Spain and Afric! all of human race,
No fight shall e'er my glorious past disgrace."
Thus he who nothing fear'd; and as he spoke,
In his right hand Almontes' weapon shook,
Firmly embrac'd his shield, for fight prepar'd,
And good Rogero and Gradasso dar'd.
" Leave him to me, and soon this sovereign steel,"
Exclaims Gradasso, " shall his phrensy heal." 439
" Not so," Rogero cries: " to me resign
You boasting chief—the combat first is mine."
" Go thou—the fight is mine"—by turns they cried—
Then all at once each other loud defy'd.

Nor this nor that would yield; and now, engag'd,
All three at once a medley war had wag'd;
When numbers present, as the warriors clos'd,
With ill advice amidst them interpos'd;
And to their cost had soon his fortune known,
Who for another's safety risks his own: 509
Not all the world their souls to peace had won,
But lo! the Spanish monarch with the son
Of great Troyano came, whose presence quell'd
Their frantic rage, and each in reverence held.

Now Agrament demands, what sudden cause
To new contention thus each warrior draws.
Th' occasion known, he strives with every art
To calm the rage of stern Gradasso's heart;
That he to Mandricardo might afford
One single day the loan of Hector's sword, 510
Till the dire fight was wag'd with Sarza's lord.

While Agrament with soothing words address'd,
Essays by turns t' appease each angry breast,
New sounds of tumult in the western tent
From Rodomont and Sacripant were sent.
Circassia's monarch stood with Sarza's knight,
(As late we told) to arm him for the fight,
And with Ferrau had on the champion urac'd
Those arms which once his proud forefather grac'd.
And now they came to where the coursers stood, 520
Who dash'd around the whitening foam, and chew'd
The golden bit: this steed, Frontino nam'd,
Was that whose loss Rogero's wrath inflam'd.
Meanwhile the generous Sacripant, whose care
Must such a champion for the list prepare,
Observ'd the gallant steed with nearer view,
When soon his marks and faultless limbs he knew,
And o'er'd his Frontaletto, for whose sake
He went on foot, nor other steed would take:
Sto'n by Brusello, on that fatal day, 530
When from the fair¹⁶ he bore her ring away;
When Balisarda and his horn he¹⁷ lost
From great Anglante's earl with impious theft;
When from her side Marphisa's sword he bore,
And with his plunder reach'd Bhertha's shore;
Then gave Rogero Balisarda's sword,
With this good courser, since Frontino nam'd.
Each certain proof the fierce Circassian weigh'd,
Then turning to the Sarzan king, he said:

¹⁶ Angelico.

¹⁷ This horn was won by Orlando from Almontes, when he slew him at the fountain. See Agrament.

"Knew, chief! this steed is mine—by fraud per-loin'd 540

Before Albracca—numbers left behind
Could witness what I tell—behold my sword
Shall full conviction of the truth afford.
But since together for awhile we far'd
In friendly sort, and mutual converse shar'd;
And since thy want I know—to thee I yield
My generous courser for the listed field,
My right acknowledge first; else hope is vain
To keep a steed which only arms can gain."

Stagn Rodomont, than whom no prouder knight
E'er wielded weapon in the list of fight, 551

Thus answer'd—"Had another's lips declar'd
Such ill-judg'd words as Scarpant has dar'd,
He to his coat might find 't were better far,
That speechless born he breath'd the vital air;
But as thou urgest, for the friendship late
Between us held, in this I wave debate.
To bid thee now (and heed what I advise)
Defer awhile thy arduous enterprise,
Till thou hast mark'd the issue of the fight, 560
This day, between me and the Tartar knight,
When his example shall thy prudence wake,
To beg me as thy gift this steed to take."

"With thee 't is courteous to be brutal," cries
Fierce Scarpant, with lightning in his eyes
"But mark me plainer now—henceforth take heed
How far thou dar'st usurp my trusty steed:
I here forbid thee, while this better hand
Can grasp'd aloft, the vengeful sword command.
If other means should fail, warn'd I fight, 570
And stand with tooth and nail to guard my right."

Cries, threats succeed, and ire unkindles ire:
Less swift through stubble runs the blaze of fire.
Fierce Rodomont complete his armour wears,
But Scarpant nor helm nor cuirass bears,
Yet seems (so well he knew his sword to wield)
Securely fond as with a covering shield:
Though Rodomont excell'd in nerve of fight,
No less in skill excell'd Circoassia's knight. 579

Not with more swiftness turns the kindling wheel,
When from the stone is ground the whitening meal,
Than Scarpant, with hand and foot untir'd,
Turn'd, chang'd, and parry'd still as need requir'd.
Their swords Ferrau and Serpentina drew,
And midst the chiefs themselves undaunted threw:
Then Islero, king Grandonio came,
And many nobles of the Moorish name.
Such was the tumult, such the noise combin'd,
That reach'd the tent where both the princes join'd,
Essay'd to calm Rogero's wrath in vain, 590
The Tartar lord and king of Sericane.

Now to king Agramant, perplex'd in thought,
A messenger unwelcome tidings brought,
That Scarpant, with Rodomont engag'd,
A cruel battle for his courser wag'd.
Then thus the king bespoke the lord of Spain:
"Amidst these new alarms, thou here remain,
Lest aught should worse among these chiefs
befall,

While I attend where yonder tumults call."

When Rodomont his royal lord beheld, 600
He stay'd his weapon, and his fury quell'd:
Not with less awe Circoassia's prince retir'd,
When Agramant appear'd; who now inquir'd,
With kindly looks, and with majestic looks,
From what new cause this sudden strife was grown.
The whole declar'd, he sought with fruitless care
To appease each warrior, and the breach repair.

Unmov'd, Circoassia's monarch still stay'd
The king of Algiers longer should abide.
The generous steed, unless by fair request 610
For that day's use he first his lord address'd
But Rodomont, as went, with full disdain
Reply'd—"Nor thou, nor Heaven, so far shall gain,
That, what this steed can on myself bestow,
I ever to another's gift will own."
The king inquir'd of Scarpant his right
To urge such claims, and if by force or might
He lost the steed: the prince the truth display'd,
And, as he spoke, a blush his shame betray'd.
He own'd how well the noble thief had wrought,
Who marking, while he sat entranc'd in thought,
Four stakes beneath his saddle plac'd, and drew
The courser thence, ere aught his rides knew.

Amidst the train appear'd Marphisa bold,
Who, while his courser's loss the warrior told,
In colour chang'd, for on the self-same day
A robber's hand had borne her sword away.
Advancing near, her eyes compar'd the steed,
On which Brunello once, with light-foot speed,
Escap'd pursuit: brave Scarpant she knew, 620
Till then unknown; she mark'd the mingled crew.
That crowded near, when numbers there appear'd,
That oft these thefts from base Brunello heard.
All turn'd to him, by whom they knew abus'd
The knight and dame, and by their looks accus'd
Of each Marphisa ask'd, nor fail'd to find
That this was he whose hand her sword purloin'd.
She leas't, for this and many an impious theme,
For which he well deserv'd a noose to meet, 630
By Agramant the shameless watch was prais'd,
And (strange to tell) to regal honours rais'd.
Marphisa felt her former worth to waste,
Determin'd, for her injur'd honour's sake,
On the foul thief a just revenge to take.

Now by her squire she bids her helm be mov'd,
Her other shining arms already brac'd,
Her martial hauba, for never yet the maid
Ten days was seen, but bright in mail array'd,
Since her fair person, brave beyond compare,
She first usur'd the weight of steel to bear. 640
Then, with her helmet clow'd, she went and found
Brunello seated midst the pass around
Him, when she saw, the dame with furious heat
Seiz'd by the throat, and dragg'd him from his seat;

Easy, as grip'd within his beaky claws,
The ravenous eagle some weak chicken draws,
And bore him thus before Troyasso's heir,
Then deep engag'd in heal intestine war,
Brunello, fencing worse might yet befall,
Cous'd not to weep, and look for pity call. 650

His cries were heard amidst the mix'd alarms
Of shouts and tumults from the camp in arms,
For mercy now he asks, now aid demands:
Near as he drew, thick crowd the gazing bands:
To Africa's king the dame her prisoner took,
And thus address'd him with an haughty look:

"This wretch, thy vessel, by my hand so long
Aloft suspended, shall at once the wrong

* This ludicrous and extravagant incident is taken from Boyardo. The passage is wittily ridiculed by Cervantes, where Sancho, while asleep, loses his ass, which is stolen from him by Gijes del Passaporte in the same manner.

† Brunello.

My honour felt—for know, his shameful theft,
Him of his horse, me of my sword bereft.⁶⁷⁰
Should there be one who dares my purpose blame,
Forth let him stand, and what he thinks proclaim:
To prove my justice, I his might defy,
And in thy presence give his tongue the lie.
Since some may urge, ill-chosen time I take,
When civil broils so many murmurs make;
When Discord kindles now, with dire alarms,
The bravest warriors of the camp to arms;
Three days I respite his determin'd fate;
Meanwhile would any friend prolong his date, 680
Let such appear—if not ere then releas'd,
I give him to the birds a welcome feast.
But three miles distant, by the wood's lone side,
To yonder tower behold my course I guide:
Without companion shall I there retire,
Save two, a damsel and a faithful squire.
If any dare this wretch's cause defend,
There let him come, I there his arms attend.⁶⁹⁰

She said; and waiting no reply, pursu'd
Her destin'd way to reach the neighbouring wood;
Brunello on her courser's neck she cast, 691
And in his locks the martial virgin fast
Her hand secur'd, while loud he shriek'd and pray'd,
Invoking every friend by name for aid.

King Agramant, amid these tumults⁷⁰ tost,
Where thought itself to find a clue was lost,
Above the rest more sorely now displeas'd,
Beheld Brunello by Marphisa seiz'd:
Not that he still the treacherous outfiend lov'd;
Who (some few days elaps'd) his anger mov'd. 700
Ere since the ring's late loss, the king resolv'd
Brunello's fault, and oft his death resolv'd.
But now he deem'd a monarch's sacred name
Too boldly scorn'd, and red with conscious shame,
He stood prepar'd to follow, with his hand
T' avenge th' affront that regal power sustain'd:
But grave Sobrino⁷¹, present, soon inclin'd
To better thoughts the prince's wrathful mind.

⁷⁰ This is told in Boyardo. See Book xviii. note to ver. 752.

⁷¹ Nothing can be better worked up than the confusion in the camp of the Pagans, from these dissensions among their leaders. Cervantes honourously makes Don Quixote, in the midst of the quarrels at the inn, thus allude to the above passage of Ariosto: "Did I not tell you, sirs, that this castle was enchanted, and that some legion of devils must certainly inhabit it? In confirmation whereof, I would have you see, with your own eyes, how the Discord of Agramant's camp is passed over, and transferred hither among us. Behold how there they fight for the sword, here for the horse, yonder for the eagle—here again for the helmet: and we all fight, and no one understands another. Come, therefore, my lord judge, and you master priest, and let one of you stand for King Agramant, the other for king Sobrino, and make peace among us, &c."

See Jarvie's Don Quixote, vol. i. b. iv. c. xviii. This is the first appearance of Sobrino in Ariosto. His character is continued from Boyardo, where he makes a figure in the council held by Agramant, to debate on the intended invasion of France, and endeavours to dissuade the king from that expedition. Sobrino appears to be the Nestor of the poem.

"It ill beseem'd, in such a cause," he said,
"So great a king, of sovereign kings the head, 710
To wage a fight, where, should his arms succeed,
More blame than honour must attend the deed:
When men would say—'Much has our king
obtain'd,

Who scarce hard conquest o'er a woman gain'd!⁷²
Great is his danger, small his praise must prove
Who dares against her arm to combat move.
'T were best to leave Brunello to his death:
Or if a word could save the culprit's breath
From threaten'd noose, that word we should withhold,

And leave the course of justice uncontrol'd. 720
Thou canst," he added, "to Marphisa send,
That she his sentence may to thee commend
As king and judge—and first thy promise plight,
The hangman's hand shall do her honour right.
But should she this refuse—the contest cease,
Leave him to her—and rest the maid in peace:
So still to thee her love be firmly ty'd,
Hang up Brunello, and all thieves beside."

Sobrino's words the monarch's warmth assuage,
Who listens to his counsel just and sage; 730
Nor only leaves himself at large the maid,
But wills that none should her retreat invade;
For public good, his feelings he suppress'd,
And hop'd, by his example o'er the rest,
To soothe to concord each contending breast.
But Discord laugh'd aloud, who knew no fear
Of peace or friendship ever more to bear:
Now here, now there, she travers'd o'er the plain,
Nor could the tumult of her joy contain:
No less exulting, stalk'd her sister Pride, 740
Who constant fuel to the fire supply'd,
And, with a shout that reach'd the armament,
The sign of victory to Michael sent.

At that dread voice⁷³, at that tremendous sound,
The Seine ran back, and Paris trembled round;
Through Arden's sable groves the echoes spread,
And savage beasts in gloomy caverns fled:
Blais, and Arti, Rhone's far-winding shore, 745
The Alps, and mount Ghibenna heard the roar:
Tbia Rhodan, Soane, Garonna, Rhine confess'd;
While mothers clasp'd their infants to the breast.
Each furious chief demands the fight to wage,
And each will foremost in the list engage:
Their claims so various, so perplex'd the noose,
Apollo's self could scarce the bands unloose:
Yet every art king Agramant would try,
And first the Gordian knot of strife untie
Between the African⁷⁴ and Scythian lord⁷⁵,
For beauteous Doralis, by both ador'd.
The king, by turns, would each to reason head, 760
As prince, as brother, counsellor, and friend:
But when he saw that neither would incline
To trace, or peace, or her he lov'd resign;
Fair cause of all their strife! he sought to find
Some middle course, to meet each rival's mind,

⁷² See Virgil.

Contemnit nemus, &c.

Et trepidæ matres pressore ad pectora natos.

Young mothers wildly stare with fears press'd,
And strain their helpless infants to their breast.
The woods all thunder'd— Dryden.

⁷⁴ Rodomont.

⁷⁵ Maodricardo.

He meant the dames! should decide their loves,
And name the consort whom her choice approves.
So, at her sovereign bidding, might they cease
From further strife, and firmly bind the peace.
Each knight agreed, for each his love believ'd 770
With mutual passion by the dame receiv'd.
The king of Sarza, who long time had su'd
To gain her hand, ere Mandricardo woo'd;
Accustom'd in her presence still to live,
With every grace that fits a maid to give;
Securely hop'd her sentence would dismiss
His jealous pangs, and fix his future bliss.
Nor he alone, but thus each Pagan thought,
Who knew for her what deeds his arm had wrought,
In tournament and field—"Not thus," they cried,
"Should Mandricardo by her doom abide." 781
But he who love's soft hours with her had led,
While Sol on worlds below his splendour shed;
Who knew what fame her gentle heart avow'd,
Laugh'd at the judgment of the erring crowd.

Before, his sovereign lord each peer confirms,
With every solemn form, the stated terms,
Then to the dame appeals; with downcast eyes,
While her fair face the bloomy colour dyes,
She owns her bosom held the Tartar dear; 790
With wonder all the soft confession hear.
Scierce Rodomont, as if each sense was fled,
Scarce dares again exalt his drooping head;
But when his wonted fury had dispell'd
The first surprise and shame, that silent held
His falt'ring tongue, he call'd the doom unjust,
And, snatching from his side his surer trust,
Before the king and camp the blade he draws,
And swears, that this shall win or lose the cause;
Not the light breath of woman's wayward will; 800
Who what they least should value, favour still.
Swift Mandricardo answers to his call:
"Act as thou wilt—I stand prepar'd for all.
Yet ere thy ship the harbour safely gains,
A mighty tract of sea unplough'd remains."
But Agrament here interpos'd, and blam'd
The Sarzen prince, who 'gainst all order claim'd
The fight anew—so far the king prevails,
He makes this rising fury strike her sails.

Now Rodomont, indignant to sustain 810
A two-fold shame before this princely train.
First, from his king, to whom his pride gave way,
And next his dame, in one ill-omen'd day,
No longer there will dwell; but from the band,
That late in battle own'd his guiding hand,
Two squires alone he takes, and, swift as wind
Departing, leaves the Moorish tents behind.
As when the early bull⁶⁶, o'ercome in fight,
Reigns his heifer for the victor's right; 819

⁶⁶ See Virgil.

Nec nos bellantes una stabulare: sed alter
Victus abit, longoque ignotis exulat oris.
Malta gemens ignominiam; plagaque superbi
Victoris, tom quæ amicit inultus amores;
Et stabula aspectans regnis excessit avida.

Georg. lib. iii. ver. 224.

Nor, when the war is o'er, their rage expires;
To distant vales the vanquish'd wretch retires;
Weeps his disgrace, his conquering rival's boast,
Yet moves the fair, that unreveng'd he lost;
And oft with pensive looks, as he retreats,
The parting exile views his ancient coasts.

Warton, ver. 290.

For woods and barren sands he leaves the mead,
Where once he us'd the numerous herds to lead:
Loudly he roars, as night or day returns,
While still his breast with inbred fury burns.
So struck with rage, with phrensy and despair,
Goes Algiers' king, rejected by the fair,
Him good Rogero had prepar'd with speed
To follow, and regain his faithful steed;
But soon recalling to his generous mind
The list with Mandricardo next design'd, 829
He checks his reins, and turns to claim the fight
Ere king Gradasso next assert his right
To Durindana, with the Scythian knight⁶⁷.
Yet much he griev'd to see, before his eyes,
Frowning lost, an undisputed prize.
Though once his battle with the Tartar fought,
Not long his generous steed shall rest forgot.
But Sacripant, whom no such cause detain'd,
For whom no other strife or list remain'd,
In haste the course of Rodomont pursu'd,
And soon had join'd him, but a chance withstood;
A sudden chance that cross'd him in the way, 841
And kept him wandering all the live-long day.
By fortune fall'n amidst the Seine he found
A hapless maid⁶⁸, who in the stream had drown'd,
But that he came to give her timely aid,
Leapt in the flood, and her to land convey'd.
He sought his steed, but loosen'd from his hand
The steed awaited not his lord's command:
All day he fled, and scarce with setting light
Resign'd his bridle to the weary'd knight. 850
Two hundred miles o'er hill and plain he pass'd;
But where he found atern Rodomont at last,
And how they met, I shall not here record,
With small advantage to Circassia's lord.
How there he lost his steed, and how he fell
In captive bonds—⁶⁹I hasten now to tell,
How seiz'd with wrath, before the princes sham'd,
Against his mistress and his King inflam'd,
Far from the camp the king of Sarza went,
And how on both he gave his anger vent. 860

Where'er the Sarzen in phrensy griev'd,
The ambient air his burning sighs receiv'd.
In pity Echo from her cavern moor'd,
And to his plaints in plaintive notes return'd.
"O female sex!" he cried, "whose worthless
mind,

Inconstant, shifts with every changing wind:
O faithless woman! perjurd and unjust,
Most wretched those who place in thee their trust!
Not all my services tried, my love express 870
By thousand proofs, could in one cruel breast
Secure a heart, so soon, alas! estrang'd
From truth like mine, and to another chang'd.
Nor have I lost thee now, because my name
Is deem'd eclips'd by Mandricardo's fame;
Nor know I what my source of woe to call—
But thou art woman—that comprises all!
O sex accur'd⁷⁰—by God and Nature sent,
A deadly hate to poison man's content!

⁶⁷ Mandricardo.

⁶⁸ This adventure, just touch'd upon here by Ariosto, is no where else mentioned by him, or by Boyardo.

⁶⁹ In another part, mention is made of Sacripant being vanquished by Rodomont at the bridee; but no particular account is given of that incident.

⁷⁰ This exclamation of Rodomont against the

So hateful snakes are bred, the wolf and bear 880
 So haunt the shades; so nurs'd by genial air
 Swarm gnats and wasps, the venom'd insect train,
 And tares are bred amidst the golden grain.
 Why could not Nature (fostering nurse of Earth!)
 Without thy aid give man his happier birth?
 As trees, by human skill engrafted, bear
 The juicy fig, smooth plum, or racy pear?
 But, ah! can Nature aught that's perfect frame,
 When Nature bears herself a female name?³¹
 Yet be not hence with empty pride o'er-run, 890
 To think, O woman! man is born your son.
 On prickly thorns appears the blooming rose;
 And from a fetid herb the lily grows
 Insidious, cruel sex! whose faithless mind
 No love can influence, and no truth can bind,
 Ingrate and impious, plagues of human kind!³²

Complaining thus, the king of Sarza rode,
 Now murmur'd low, now rais'd his voice aloud,
 Heard far and wide; with undistinguish'd blame,
 At once involving all the female name. 900
 Rash! unadvis'd! though some our anger raise,
 For three found ill, a hundred merit praise.
 What if, amidst the fair I yet have lov'd,
 Not one, perchance I met, that faithful prov'd,
 Shall I the whole with general censure blot,
 And not accuse my own unhappy lot?
 Such was my chance—if, midst a hundred, one
 Were faithful found, on her my choice must run.
 But still I trust, ere life with years decay, 910
 Ere creeping age shall change these locks to gray,³³
 Some happier hour may yet my hope renew,
 And see my love repaid with love as true.
 Should'er such future bliss my vows befall,
 That faithful she will make amends for all:
 While to the height her honours I rehearse,
 With pen or tongue, in prose, or numerous verse.

The Saracen, who thus his mistress blam'd,
 As ill advis'd against his king exclaim'd;
 And oft he wish'd some storm of adverse fate 920
 Might fall unlook'd, to overthrow his state;

female sex may recall to the mind of the reader
 the reflections of Adam on the transgression of Eve, particularly these lines:

O! why did God,

Creator wise, who peopled highest Heaven
 With spirits masculine, create at last
 This novelty on Earth, this fair defect
 Of nature, and not fill the world at once
 With men, as angels, without feminine,
 Or find some other way to generate Mankind—

Par. Lost, book x.

But it must be frankly acknowledged, that the passage of Ariosto is, as too usual, debased by ludicrous images and expressions.

³¹ Surely the poet has carried his conceit to the utmost, that Nature, being herself a female, and consequently imperfect, could produce nothing perfect.

³² The attachment of Ariosto to the fair sex has been shown in the account of his Life, and appears in various parts of his works; and this passage in particular, among many others, seems to prove that his love had been divided by a number of objects, though, at the same time, it likewise seems to prove that he had been rather unsuccessful in the fidelity of his mistresses.

To make each wretched host in Afric mourn,
 And to the lowest stone each pile o'erturn;
 That Agrasart, spell'd his realm in grief,
 Might rove a mendicant without relief;
 Till once again his prowess should restore
 The exil'd monarch to the regal power;
 And in his proof of loyal duty show
 What to a faithful friend a friend must owe;
 A faithful friend, whose merits should receive 930
 (Though worlds oppos'd) whatever his prince could give.

The Pagan thus, as troubled passions wrought,
 Now on his king, now on his mistress thought:
 He spur'd his steed, but ne'er to sleep addu'd
 His watchful eyes, nor gave Frontino rest:
 Next day his course to Soenna's banks he sped,
 (That to Provence with winding current led)
 For Africa once more to cross the sea,
 And see his long forsaken realms again.
 He view'd the river, fill'd from side to side 940
 With barks and vessels floating on the tide;
 That from afar, with all provisions stow'd,
 To Pagan bands convey'd the welcome load.
 The country round was subject to the Moors,
 From Paris' walls to Acquasorta's shores;
 A pleasing tract! and all from plain to plain,
 Stretch'd on the right, that reach'd the bounds of Spain.

Now from the ships remov'd, the busy crowd
 On many a boat and vain the burthens stow'd: 940
 From different parts the banks were cover'd round
 With well-fed herds, that graze'd the verdant ground;
 And near the river divers huts were kept,
 Where all night long the hind and drivers slept.

The king of Algiers here, surpris'd by night,
 When damps and gloom succeed departing light,
 Yields to a country host (there born and bred)
 Who begg'd him for his guest at board and bed.
 His steed dispos'd, rich plenty crown'd the board,
 With Greekish wines, and wines of Corfu stor'd.
 In all the rest a Moor³⁴ the Pagan show'd, 950
 But in his drink prefer'd the Gallic mode.

The host, with welcome looks and sumptuous fare,
 Would every honour for his guest prepare;
 Whom by his garb and mien he well divin'd
 A knight of prowess light, and noble kind.
 But he, at variance with himself (whose heart,
 As if divided from its better part,
 Still to his mistress turn'd), with pensive look
 There sat, nor with a word the silence broke.
 Our jolly host, who better could advance 970
 His private good than any host of France;
 Who midst a land with foreign foes o'er-run,
 Preserv'd his chattels, goods, and house his own;
 Had call'd, in honour of his noble guest,
 His friends and kindred to partake the feast.
 Of these none dar'd to speak, but gaz'd with awe,
 While mute and sad the Saracen they saw:
 Who sat with head cast down in mournful wise,
 As if he fear'd to meet a stranger's eye.
 Thus long he mus'd, till from his bosom broke 980
 A sigh, when sudden as from sleep he woke;

³⁴ By the law of Mahomet his votaries are for-bidden the use of wine: but the poet, who meant Rodomont for a character of impiety, makes him pay no attention to the dictates of his own religion, and only observe the customs of a Moor whom they did not combat his passions.

BOOK XXVIII.

THE ACCOUNT.

Redoubt'd harr'd from his host the tale of Aeneides and Homers, a severe satire upon the female sex. The characters of several further dissent, Rodolcus leaves his host, and pursues his invented journey for Athens; but meeting with a pressing need, he takes possession of a church which the Christians had deserted, and resolves to fix his residence there. The arrival of Iulietta and the earnest wish the dead body of Zerbino.

Ye dunces! and ye to whom each dame is dear,
To this unballow'd tale refuse an ear!

A late mine host has caught from lying Fame,

To stain the lustre of the female name:

Ye such a tongue alike in vain essays

To blot with censure or exalt with praise:

In blaming others, fools their folly show,

And must attempt to speak when least they know.

Pass o'er this part untrud, the story stands

Unhurt without it, nor the page demands;

What Turpin told before, I but rehearse,

No entry prompts, no malice points the verse:

My better sense your matchless worth have shown,

My loyal faith to all your sex is known.

To seal this truth a thousand proofs I give,

That still in you, and you alone, I live.

Then pass, or with a careless eye survey

Th' opprobrious tale, the fable of a day.

Prayg'd to be open'd, his drooping tale he rais'd,
And round the board with look compass'd he pass'd;
Then suck'd his head, and seat to each apply'd,
If any there the marriage could best crack,
As if abus'd with a comment on his wife,
He said: the host, and every guest he found
In wedlock's net to fathom passions bound,
He next requir'd, if each belov'd his spouse
Had duly kept her matrimonial vows:
When, ere his host they came and all declin'd,
That none with whom their wives' affections bound,
To thee the best—" Yeah, so he will believe,
Just men are I—that each himself deceives:
For this your condition, various method,
I can best call you each with dosage heed!
And so no man must say this noble knight,
Unless he means to sell you blank for white.
For as 't' smacks the world has Fate prefer'd
A single phony, (true and only bird!)
So, is it said, one only man through life
Is given, to temper the falsehoods of a wife:
Each will himself that happy mortal call,
That husband sole, who bears the pain from all!
Yet how can each the husband treasure own,
When through the sex no two dainties wives are known?"

Like you I thought, and still perhaps had dream'd
All women virtuous, that were so esteem'd;

But, that a gentle equis, in Venice bred,

And late for my good fortune labour led,

Such stories told, all which fall well he knew,

As from my thought the fond deception drew.

Princely Valentin was he call'd, whose name

Shall ever place in my remembrance claim.

Right was he heard in women, and could well

The friends of matrim' d and matrim' y'd tell;

Take now, and take long sines, of every kind,

He told, with these his own experience join'd;

He fully prov'd, of high or low degree,

How vain the hope a virtuous dame to see.

Should error one seem character than the rest,

"T' is that her art one will her frailties best.

From those (of which each sinners would be tell,

That scarce she thut in my remembrance dwell)

One story first while my mind remember'd,

And then requir'd but still the place maintain'd;

Which, all that hear, shall like myself receive,

And every falsehood of the sex believe;

And if it please thee ser, I noble knight,

Upon thy condition will the tale recite.

"What, better," cried the Page, "could there be!"

To suit the present temper of my mind.

Then sitting, where examples may display

Yet wrongs are, account'd to be worthy;

That ere thou speak, acquaint me with thy plans,

So shall I better hear thee face to face."

But, in the evening hour, he saw declin'd

What tale for Rodolcus sake best prefer'd.

As Giant Francesco Valerio, a Venetian gentleman, a good enemy to women: he lived in mari-mony with the poet, and is mentioned by him with particular kindness on the beginning of the third Book, to be free likewise, by a poetical anachronism, made to live in the time of Charlemagne, and from his husband of women, Antonio poet who his subject's ill success take against the poet.

The celebrated tale, one of the severest satires that was ever written upon the female sex, has been imitated by several authors, particularly by the witty Pausanias, the Prior of France.

Boileau has compris'd the tale of Fontaine with the Jocunde of M. Despreux, and not only gives the preference to the former, but endeavours to show, that for the plausibility of narrative, Fontaine is superior to the latter author; at the same time he candidly speaks thus of Aristotle: "Dumtaxat, si vras voles, à l'Arctico loques la gloire de l'invention, ne lui donnez pas le prix que lui ont justement dé-cerné Pétrogone, le poëte de la berceille insubliable avec laquelle il dit tant de choses en si peu de mots; ne subistans point malicieusement, en faveur de notre nation, de plus ignorerent auteur des deniers siècles.—Dissertation sur la Jocunde de
M. Fontaine.

It must be confessed, that several parts of this tale are highly exceptionable in the original for looseness of ideas and language; yet, if we compare the passages with other writers of the early times, we shall find that Aristotle is by no means exceeded to such severe censure. A general grossness then prevail'd among the poets, particularly of the humorous kind, as our own Chaucer will sufficiently prove; and Spenser, in a later age, will scarcely among less commendation. The account of Holloes among the Satyrs is equal for indecency to any parts of Ariosto. To this we may add, that the poets of a much more refined time have given themselves such unquenchable liberties, that the severe eye of decency may find numerous passages to expunge in Prius, Dryden, and even Pope himself.

But to resume my task—When every guest
A due attention in his looks express'd,
Mine host oppos'd against the Pagan sate,
And thus began his story to relate :

“ Where Lombardy extends her fruitful plain
The young Astolpho held his peaceful reign,
His brother's heir—renown'd for every grace
Of manly person, and the charms of face.
Scarce could Apelles, Zeuxis, or a name
More fam'd in art, have sketch'd a lowlier frame.
Thus fresh in blooming youth the monarch shone,
Fair in all eyes, but fairer in his own.” 30

Much less he priz'd his state of kingly power,
His numerous armies, his exhaustless store
Of wealth and friends, in which he far excell'd
Each boasted prince that near dominion held,
Than beauty's gift, whose full perfection rais'd
His form o'er every youth for beauty prais'd.
Amongst the train, that in their prince's sight
Paid daily homage, was a Roman knight;
Faustus his name, whom dear the king esteem'd,
And oft with him would boast how high he deem'd
His person's charms, and bade him boldly tell 41
If one he knew to match, much less excel,
Such manly grace: thus he in vaunting pride:
And, as he little thought, the knight replied,
“ O king!” said Faustus, “ doubtless few there are Whose beauty can with Pavia's lord compare:
But one I know may urge so bold a claim,
My brother he, Jocundo is his name:
Set him apart, your charms all charms efface:
His equal yours, or boast superior grace.” 50

“ Astolpho with surprise these words receiv'd,
And scarce such unexpected truth believ'd;
Then felt a wish within his bosom rais'd
To see this youth unknown, so highly prais'd;
And Faustus urg'd his sacred faith to plight,
To bring this wonder to his prince's sight.

“ ‘Great king,’ the knight return'd, ‘with truth
I fear,

Hard is the task to bring Jocundo here:
Pleas'd with his humble lot assign'd by Fate,
Scarce is he known to pass the city's gate; 60
He lives content with his paternal store,
Nor squanders that, nor seeks to gather more;
And he as distant Pavia's towers would deem,
As some the banks of Tanais' joy stream;
But most I dread the attempt the youth to tear
From her whose love partakes his joy and care;
Th' enamour'd husband from a wife to draw,
Whose every wish to him is more than law.
Yet, gracious king, thy servant shall obey,
And prove each art to speed him on his way.” 70

“ The king adds royal gifts to earnest prayers,
And for his embassy the knight prepares.

“ On wings of zeal observant Faustus flew,
And soon imperial Rome arose in view:
Then to his brother's humble roof he went,
Told the king's wish, and gain'd his slow consent;
Implor'd the wife, and check'd each rising sigh
With thoughts of mighty gifts and honours high,
And for his sake besought her to comply.

“ At length Jocundo fix'd the parting day, 80
And steeds and servants hir'd, and fair array
To deck his manly form, for oft the grace
Of costly vest improves a beauteous face.
Meanwhile with heaving breast and flowing tears,
The dear companion of his life appears;
Vows that his absence she shall ever mourn,
And never live to see his wish'd return.

20 ‘Cease, my lov'd spouse,’ the tender husband cries,
While equal sorrows trickle from his eyes.
‘Cease thy dear plaints: so Fortune speed my way,
As but two months I my return delay, 91
Nor Pavia's proffer'd crown should bribe my longer stay.’

‘ Ah, me!’ she sigh'd, ‘and must I then sustain
Such length of absence, such an age of pain?
Ah! no, the grave will first my portion be,
These fading eyes no more their lord shall see:
Then welcome death!’—To sorrow thus a prey,
Food she rejects, and groans the night away;
Touch'd with her grief he lifts his eyes to Heaven,
Oft sighs, and oft repents his promise given. 100

“ Now from her lovely neck a cross she drew,
Thick set with precious gems of various hue,
Which once a pilgrim of Bohemia bore
When sick, returning from Judaea's shore;
Her sire the drooping stranger entertain'd,
And at his death the hallow'd relic gain'd.
This cross she begg'd him at his neck to wear,
And in his mind her dear remembrance bear.
With joy the youth is seen the pledge to take,
Not for memorial, but the giver's sake; 110
Since neither time nor place his faith could move,
Nor fortune, good or ill, disperse his love;
Nor could her image from his thought depart,
Or death's strong grasp divide it from his heart.

“ On that black evening, which foreman the day
That her lov'd consort summon'd on his way,
Increasing grief her tender soul oppress'd,
And oft she fainted on her husband's breast.
Not once they clos'd their eyes; no tongue can tell

How oft they kiss'd, how oft they bade farewell; 120
Till breaking from her soft embrace he fled,
And left her drows'd in sorrow on the bed.

“ Scarce two short miles he journey'd, ere his mind

Recall'd the treasure to his care consign'd,
The precious cross, which in his thoughtless haste
He left behind beneath his pillow plac'd.
‘ Ah me!’ he cried, ‘how fitly shall I frame
A fair pretence to mitigate the blame?
Well may my wife my loyal truth suspect,
Her gifts and love repaid with such neglect.’ 130
He knew't were vain, with cold excuse to send
A menial servant, or a nearer friend:
Himself in person must return to prove
His faith untaunted, and her doubts remove.

He rein'd his steed, and cried, ‘My Faustus, go
Tow'rd's Pavia's court with gentle steps and slow;
I must again to Rome; but short my stay,
Soon shall my speed o'ertake you on the way;
No other can supply my wants’—He said;
Then bade adieu, and turn'd his courser's head; 140
Alone he cross'd old Tiber's yellow stream,
What time the shade retir'd from Phobus' beam:
When, hastening home, he found the darling fair
Fast lock'd in sleep (so poignant was her care!)—
The curtain with a cautious hand he drew,
And view'd, what little there he thought to view;
For, lo! his chaste, his faithful spouse he found
In wanton sheets, with amorous fetters bound,
Clasp'd by a youth, in whose adulterous face
He knew the author of his foul disgrace: 150

A low-born beld deadl'd his master's bed,
Whose hand had rear'd him, and whose bounty fed.
Think what amazement chill'd his curdling blood,
As fix'd in stupid gaze he speechless stood;

Ne'er may your soul, by sad experience, know
The cruel anguish of Jocundo's woe!
Rage urg'd him on to draw the sword, and take
A just revenge; but Love, that still could wake,
For this ingrate, soft feelings in his breast,
Spite of himself the threatening stroke restrain'd. 166
All-powerful Love, that from his anger sav'd
Her forfeit life, so far his heart enslav'd,
He fear'd to chase the slumber from her eyes,
And with the shock her tender soul surpris'd.
Slept the room he left, with silent speed
The stairs descended, and regain'd his steed;
Goaded by grief, he goads his dery beast,
And joins his brother ere the hour of rest. [look.

"All mark'd his change of cheer, his mournful
That some near anguish at his heart bespoke; 178
Yet none, amidst so many, e'er divin'd
The secret cause that rankled in his mind:
All knew he left them to return to Rome,
But he had made a trip to Cuckoldom*.
Each deem'd that love lay festering in his thought,
But none could tell how love his sorrow wrought.
His brother deem'd he mourn'd his consort left,
Of comfort and society bereft:
But he had different motives to complain,
Her too much company had caus'd his pain. 180
He sighs, he weeps, while Faustus to his grief
(The cause unknown) can yield no kind relief:
In vain he seeks the healing balm to pour,
What hand can heal, that cannot probe the sore?
The healing balm is rankest venom found,
Which more inflames, and wider makes the wound.
His consort's once-lov'd name distracts his breast,
His appetite is gone, and lost his rest;
While those fair features, that so late might claim
The prize of beauty, seem'd no more the same: 190
With deep-sunk eyes, and large projecting nose,
With wither'd flesh, a skeleton he shows;
And, bred from grief, a fever on the way.
At Arbia, and at Arno forc'd his stay,
Till lost those charms that once such fame had won,
Like gather'd roses fading in the sun.

"Though Faustus, touch'd with deep regret, perceiv'd

His brother's woeful state, no less he griev'd
To think the prince, to whom his faith he ow'd,
Should doubt his truth for praise so ill bestow'd. 200
He promis'd one of matchless form and face,
And one he brings depriv'd of every grace:
Yet with Jocundo, still he journey'd on,
Till now they enter'd Pavia's regal town:
But, fearful of disgrace, the Roman knight
At first declin'd to meet Astolpho's sight,
Till to the king by letter he reveal'd
That dire disease, and some distress conceal'd,
Prey'd on his brother's ruin'd health, defac'd
His rosy bloom, and laid each beauty waste. 210
Astolpho, gracious prince, well pleas'd to hear
The man he long'd so much to see was near,
Resolv'd his noblest welcome to extend,
And greet Jocundo as his dearest friend.

* The Italian is,

—gito era a Corneto:—

Corneto, the name of a place near Rome. The word likewise means cuckoldom; but the humour of the original, arising from the double meaning of the word, could not be preserved in the same manner in the translation.

No envy in his generous breast was known,
To find a beauty that excell'd his own;
Since, but for pale disease, full well he knew
His rival's charms must every charm subdue.
Superb apartments to the youth he gives,
And only in Jocundo's presence lives; 220
His wishes to prevent all means applies,
And every way to do him honour tries;
While he, unable, in languor wastes his life,
Lamenting still the falsehood of his wife:
Nor song, nor dance, nor music's sprightly strain
Can draw remembrance, or assuage his pain.

"In these apartments of the regal dome,
An ancient hall was next his lovely room,
The room where oft retir'd in grief he pines,
And shows, and games, and company declines; 230
Broods o'er the dead that robb'd his soul of rest,
And adds new scorpions to his tortur'd breast;
Yet, strange to tell, a balsam here he found,
Of sovereign power to close his rankling wound.

"Far in the hall, where artificial night,
With windows ever clos'd, expell'd the light,
A chink appear'd, and through the mouldering saw,
Whence came a feeble ray, he thought he saw
What few would hear, and fewer would believe,
Nor from another would himself receive. 240
There, through the opening chink, reveal'd was seen
The secret chamber of Astolpho's queen;
A sacred privacy to all deny'd,
But those in whom the fair could well confide:
Here oft Astolpho's beauteous consort sat,
Forgetful of her lord and regal state;
And here he view'd a dwarf of hideous face,
And shape uncouth, the wanton fair embrace.

"Struck with the sight, yet doubting what he
view'd,

As in a trance awhile Jocundo stood: 250
But, when convinc'd, no longer could he deem
The sight th' illusion of an idle dream.

"Ye gods!" he cried, "can she resign her charms
To the rude clasp of such a lover's arms?
A queen, whose lord with every gift is crown'd,
In form arriv'd, as in worth renown'd!
Reflection, that before so pain'd his heart,
Now took, by slow degrees, his consort's part.
What though she sought a young gallant to find,
Her fault was but the fault of all her kind: 260
Whose favours none could ever singly prove,
And if desire of change her breast could move,
At least no monster had enjoy'd her love.

"Next day, returning at th' accustomed hour,
He found the lovers busy'd as before:
Still fearless of surprise, the dwarf and dame
The king dishonour'd with the deed of shame.
Day following day their mutual vigour proves,
And Sunday was no sabbath to their love,
Yet most he marvel'd that the fair complain'd, 270
And thought th' ill-shap'd cub her charms dis-
tain'd.

One morn, when to the friendly chink he came,
He found dismiss'd in tears, the amorous dame,
Who twice already, by her trusty maid,
Had call'd the dwarf, and still the dwarf delay'd.
Again she sent: her maid these tidings brought;
'The dice, my lady, take up all his thought;
And rather than forgo his gain at play,
He dares your gracious summons disobey.'

"At this strange sight Jocundo chang'd his cheer, 280

No more his cheeks receive the falling tear;

Joy lights his eyes, the clouds of grief are o'er,
And what his name imports, he looks once more;
His manly front resumes its wonted grace,
And angel beauty brightens in his face.

"The king, his brother, all the court, confound
The wondrous turn; but none the cause can guess.
If from the youth the monarch long'd to know
What sudden comfort had assur'd his woe,
Not less the youth the secret wish'd to tell, 290
And to the king his injuries reveal;
Yet wou'd he should for such atrocious fact,
Like him, as vengeance from his wife exact;
Then by a sacred vow the prince he ty'd,
Whate'er his ear receiv'd, or eye describ'd,
Though the dire truth depriv'd his soul of rest,
Though in th' offence fell treason stood confess'd,
That, soon or late, he never wou'd engage
The guilt to punish, but restrain his rage,
Nor let a single word or deed evince 300
The crime detected by an injur'd prince.

"The king, who little dreamt his wrongs sur-
By solemn plighted vow himself restrain'd. [aim'd,
Jocundo then began the cause to show,
Whence sickness, sprung from soul-consuming woe,
Prey'd on his health; and how his wife, debas'd
To sordid lust, had with his slave disgrac'd
Her husband's bed; how, near his death, he found
An unexpected saviour to close the wound.
'And know, O monarch! to my secret grief 310
Thy palace has supply'd the strange relief;
For, while I mourn'd my fortune, chance disclos'd
A mightier far to equal fate expos'd.
He said, and to the place the monarch drew,
That gave his hideous rival to his view,
Whose charms had taught his faithful wife to yield,
And now was ploughing in another's field.

"There needs not here an oath t' enforce belief,
If stiffen'd at the sight with rage and grief
The monarch stood, while scarcely he repress'd 320
The mingled passions struggling in his breast:
As one distraught of every sense he fir'd.
With open lips for issuing words prepar'd:
But soon, remembrance of his vow repell'd
The rising tempest that within rebell'd.

"Then to Jocundo—' Say, what course remains?
Direct me, brother, since thy will restrains
My just resentment, and forbids this hand
To take the just revenge my wrongs demand.'

'Faith,' said Jocundo, 'let us these forsake, 330
And prove if others more resistance make;
With every art assail the wedded fair,
And plant on others' brows the fruits we bear.
What woman shall our form and rank disdain,
When such base paramours can grace obtain?
Grant that sometimes our youth and beauty fail,
The power of riches ever shall prevail:
Nor let us here return, till female smiles,
Worn from a thousand, crown our amorous toils.
Long absence, while in foreign lands we roam, 340
To prove that virtue, to our cast at home
So fully prov'd, may sovereign balm impart
To sooth the anguish of an injur'd heart.'

"The king assents, and for th' intended way
With speed prepares, impatient of delay.
Through fruitful Italy their courses they bend,
Two pages only on their steps attend.

And now they left the soft Italian land,
To visit Flanders, France, and Albee's strand.
Free to their love they found each waiting fair, 330
And found the lowliest oft the kindest were:
And while on some they ceaseless gifts bestow'd,
To others' honest equal gifts they ow'd:
With sighs of warm entreaty some they woo,
And others prag'd themselves to be undone.
Here one short month, there two the lovers made
Their amorous stay, and every proof essay'd,
While, like the virtuous wives, each female, ty'd
In nuptial fetters, with their suit comply'd.
At length both tir'd, where both alike pursue 340
Increasing dangers with adventures new,
Conscious what mischiefs oft on these await
Who knock too frequent at their neighbour's gate,
Now deem'd it best to seek some generous fair,
Whose charms, by turns, might either's passion share,

For each had try'd, and try'd in vain, to prove
A female constant to his single love.
'Since still some other must partake my bed,
The place be yours, my friend,' the monarch said.
'Of all the sex this certain truth is known, 370
No woman yet was ere content with one.
Then let us with some gentle friend enjoy
A bliss, unmix'd with jealousy's alloy;
So shall our moments roll in sportive ease,
Nor shall our love disturb another's peace.
What better fortune can a woman claim
Than two such husbands to return her flame?
And while to one no wife will constant prove,
Yet surely two must gratify her love.' 378

"Thus spoke Astolpho; and the Roman youth
Approv'd what then he deem'd the voice of truth.
At length the Spaniard's ample realm they gain'd,
Where what they sought, Valencia's seats contain'd;
A daughter of their host, of low degree,
Of manners mild, of features fair to see;
On her they fix'd—for on her blooming face
The spring of youth diffus'd its earliest grace.
With her the sire a numerous offspring rear'd;
And thoughts of pining poverty he fear'd:
He saw his means small portion could provide, 390
And few, he knew, would take a dowryless bride:
Hence to their wish, he yields without delay
His daughter's charms, the solace of their way,
And on their love and plighted faith relies,
To treat with tender care their gentle prize.
They take the damsel, and in friendship prove
The amorous warfare of alternate love.
The Spanish region thence they travell'd o'er,
And pass'd the realms of Syphax to explore.
At noon they from Valencia took their way; 400
Zattira clos'd the labours of the day.

"The strangers here, as strangers ever do,
Proceed the wonders of the place to view;
Where many a costly dome demands their praise,
And reversed faces their admiration raise.
Meantime the damsel sees, from room to room,
All ready for her lords' returning home:
Some spread the couch, some tend and feed with care

The weary'd steeds, and some the masq prepare.
'It chanc'd, that busy'd thus the fair one spy'd
A youth, who sit had slumber'd by her side 411

3 The word Jocundo in the Italian, signifies cheerful, jocund.

4 By the realm of Syphax the poet means part of the kingdom of Africa.

In happier days, when, with her father pleas'd,
He liv'd a tunic'd by her bounty grac'd.
Each other well they knew, but fear'd to speak,
Lest squint suspicion on their words should break.
But, till the rest retir'd, the lovers meet,
And, from discovery safe, each other greet.
The youth demands her whether she was bound,
And which, of either lord, her favour found?
Flammetta own'd the truth, for such the name 420
The damsel bore; from Greece her lover came.
' Ah, me!' he cried, ' when fortune seem'd to give
The long'd-for day with thee in joy to live,
My dear Flammetta seeks a foreign shore,
And wretched I must ne'er behold her more.
Thou go'st—and others have thy charms possess'd,
Sweet love is turn'd to poison in my breast:
In vain I hop'd, while still I strove to save
My pitance, cur'd by what each stranger gave,
With thee my slender fortune to divide, 430
And from thy father's hand receive my beautiful bride.' [breast,

" The sorrowing fair-one clasp'd him to her
And mourn'd his fruitless suit so late address.
Sore wept the crafty Greek, and, with a sigh,
' Canst thou, inhuman, let thy lover die?
Give me, at least, ere we for ever part,
T' ally the flame that preys upon my heart;
One moment part in thy belov'd embrace,
Will make me death without complaining face.'
' Not less my wish,' the amorous girl replies, 440
Consenting passion sparkling in her eyes,
' But how, with spies surrounded, can we prove
Our mutual warmth, and give a loose to love?'
' Ah!' said the Greek, ' too well convinc'd I know,
Didst half my ardour in thy bosom glow,
Thy wit would 'er in this night some means employ,
To snatch at least a momentary joy.'
' In vain,' she answers, ' much-lov'd youth, you see,
Since I each night repose between the two.' 449
' Weak is th' excuse,' the plaintive Greek rejoind';
' For, if thou feel'st my woe, thy gentle mind
Will yield relief, and, spite of all, remove Whatever may seem t' oppose the suit of love.'
' ' While she paus'd; then, smiling, bade him come,

While all were slumbering, to the wish'd-for room;
Describ'd the way, and taught what course to take,
How, undiscover'd, his return to make.

" Well pleas'd he heard, and when the drowsy god
Had laid on every eye his potent rod,
He seeks her door, with long and silent strides; 450
The door admits him: slowly in he glides:
Firm on his hindmost foot while he stays,
The other, ris'd, with cautious stealth essays
A forward step; and wide his hands are spread,
On either side to find th' expected bed.
He reach'd the feet, and made his artful way
Beneath the covering where Flammetta lay. [o'er,

" Soon as the Greek, the night's short blessing
Returning seeks the way he came before,
And Phoebus' beams to light the east begin, 470
Flammetta rising lets the pages in.

" Now with his friend the king prepares to jest:
' Brother,' he cried, ' it fits thee sure to rest:
Some leisure must recruit your weary spirit,
Tir'd with the watching of so long a night.'
Jocundo then replies in taunting vein:
' Repose be yours, since you the toil must see'
' You see my words—fair rest betide your grace,
As to the huntsman weary'd in the chase.'

' I,' said the king, ' I would in truth have try'd 480
The lover's suit, but found my suit deny'd.'
Again Jocundo thus—' Your slave am I,
'T is yours to break, or with our terms comply.
But such disputes or taunts there needed none,
You might have chid my love, and claim'd your own.'

" Words follow'd words, replies succeed'd replies,
Till oft repeated jests, grown serious, rise
To harsh debate: they call the girl to clear
The doubtful truth: the girl, with conscious fear,
Steps trembling forth, commanded to reveal 490
What each alike seem'd earnest to conceal.

' Declare,' with stern regard the monarch cried,
' And fear not evil shall thyself betide,
Which of us two, so long in love's delight
Usurp'd with thee the pleasures of the night?'

" Impatient both await the girl's reply,
And hope her words will fix on one the lie:
Flammetta, lowly prostrate on the ground,
Of life despairing, since her fault was found,
Implores forgiveness, and with tears confess'd, 500
That, urg'd by love, which long had sway'd her
Some pity on a faithful swain to take, [breast,
Who years had sigh'd, and sigh'd but for her sake,
That night she gave the tender frailty way,
In hopes one error would alike betray
Each noble lover that beside her lay.

" Thus she: Jocundo and the king amaz'd,
Long on each other's face in silence gaz'd:
Ne'er had they heard, nor through the world believ'd
Two like themselves by female guilt deceiv'd. 510
Now sudden mirth the place of wonder took,
And either's side convulsive laughter shook
With peals so loud, that scarcely could they breathe,
But sunk exhausted on the couch beneath.
So much they laugh'd, their bosoms ak'd with pain,
Nor could they eyes the gushing tears restrain:
At length they said—' What man shall hope to stay
His wife from wandering the forbidden way?
Since we, in one same bed, so closely join'd,
Between us both in vain this last confid'd? 520
Were numerous as his hairs a husband's eyes,
A wife's deceit would every watch surprise.
A thousand women we before have try'd;
Yet found not one our amorous suit deny'd.
A second thousand like the first would fall:
But this last proof may well suffice for all.

Then cease we more to blame our mates, or find
Their thoughts less chaste than those of all their
And since they both are virtuous as the best, [kind;
Let us return and live with them at rest.' 530

" This point resolv'd, they bade the lover come (Call'd by Flammetta) to receive his doom;
With many a witness present, for his bride
They gave the girl, with ample gifts beside;
Then both return'd contented to their wives,
And led in peace the remnant of their lives."

Here ceas'd mine host's his story to relate,
While every guest with mute attention sat:

* This is copied by Spenser, in his account of the Squire of Dames, with no less severity on the fair sex, where the squire relates, that travelling through the world in search of a chaste woman, he finds only three to reject his suit, thus humourously characterized by the poet:

The first that then refused me (said he)
Cortes, was but a common courtesane,

Nor yet the Pagan knight his silence broke :
 At length, the tale concluded, thus he spoke : 540
 " What various frauds, of every artful name,
 The wily heart of womankind can frame !
 Not all the power of human wit can tell
 The thousandth part in which the sex excel."
 But one of graver years, and reverend mien,
 And better judgment at the board was seen ;
 Who inly wroth to hear the brauteous race
 Thus roughly treated by a tongue so base,
 And conscious of their worth, in secret burn'd,
 And to the vile defamer thus return'd : 550
 " What cruel slanders every day supplies
 Detested tales, but thine the worst of lies !
 Whoe'er thy author be, though on his tongue,
 In other points, e'en gospel truths were bung ;
 Not fair experience of the female kind,
 But some offence late ranking in his mind,
 Urg'd him to speak ; his hatred of a few,
 On all the sex such blame unjustly threw.
 But let his wrath subside, and soon your ear 559
 Would more their praises than their censure hear.
 For one to blame, his lips might number o'er
 A hundred women fam'd for virtuous lore :
 Then cease to rail at all—if one has sworn'd
 From honour's laws, which thousands have preserv'd.
 And since thy friend Valerio other taught,
 Not judgments away'd, but passion warp'd his thought.
 Say, which of you, in nuptial union ty'd,
 Has never from his consort slept aside ;
 Who, when occasion call'd, refus'd to taste
 Forbidden pleasures, or his substance waste 570
 On alien charms ; while, save the abandon'd crew
 Of hireling loves, no woman men pursue ?
 Is there a husband will not leave his home
 (Though fair his wife) for other joys to roam ?
 Let smiling love from wife or maiden try
 With gifts to bend, what virtue would deny ?
 To please the sex what lover will refuse,
 Or stop his ear when charming woman sues ?
 And oft, I fear, from some injurious cause,
 The fair are led to infringe the nuptial laws : 580
 Perchance, their beauty view'd with satel'd eye,
 They see their lords to foreign beauties fly ;
 Love claims return—what we to others give,
 We claim in equal measure to receive.
 Could I a statute frame, each guilty wife,
 In sinful commerce found, should yield her life,
 Unless she clearly to the world could prove,
 Her consort had indulg'd unlawful love ;
 But this once prov'd, the dame absolv'd should be,
 From courts, and from her lord's resentment free :
 For Christ has taught—' To others never do 591
 That which yourselves would wish undone to you.'

Yet flat refused to have a-do with me,
 Because I could not give her many a jaup :
 (Therewith full heartily laugh'd Satyrane.)
 The second was an holy nun to chose,
 Which would not let me be her chapellaine,
 Because she knew (she said) I would disclose
 Her counsel if she should her trust in me repose.
 The third a damsel was of low degree,
 Whom I in country cottage found by chance,
 Full little weneed I, that chastity
 Had lodging in so mean a maintenance :
 Save her, I never any woman found
 That chastity did for itself embrace, &c.
 Fairy Queen, b. iii. c. vii. st. 58.

* The custom of introducing religious aphorisms,

Yet still incontinence, if this we call
 Weak woman's crime, is not the crime of all.
 But ev'n in this our sex's guilt is most,
 Since not a man of chastity can boast :
 All crimes are his, and crimes of deepest dye,
 Usurious griping, pillage, blasphemy,
 And crimson murder ; crimes though rarely known
 To woman's sex, familiar to our own." 600

Here the just sage his weighty reasons clos'd ;
 And many a fair example had propos'd,
 Of virtuous dames ; but with averted ear
 The Pagan king, who loath'd the truth to hear,
 Aw'd him with threatening glance and brow severe.
 Yet while in dread the sage from speech refrain'd,
 The truth unshaken in his soul remain'd.
 The Sarzan prince here bade the contest cease,
 Then left the board, and bow'd to rest in peace
 Till dawn of day : but all the sleepless night, 610
 He mourn'd his changeful mistress' cruel flight ;
 And thence departing with the morning ray,
 Resolv'd by ship to take his future way ;
 Yet, like a champion, who with prudent head
 O'erwatches all, attentive for his steed,
 That steed so good, so fair, which late he bore,
 From Sacripant and from Rogero's power :
 And conscious, that for two whole days he press'd
 Too far the mettle of the generous beast ;
 He fix'd down Sonna's stream a bark to take, 620
 For speed, for ease, and for Frontino's sake.

He bade the ready boatman from the shore
 The cable loose, and stretch the dashing oar :
 Before the wind the vessel lightly glides,
 And the swift stream with swifter power divides :
 But Rodomont in vain, on land or wave,
 From cruel care his anxious breast would save :
 He mounts his steed, it follows close behind,
 He sails the bark, it breathes in every wind !
 Now in his soul the fatal inmate dwells, 630
 And every hope or comfort thence expels ;
 While he, alas ! with cruel anguish pain'd,
 Conscious his inmost fort the foe has gain'd,
 Expects no friendly hand can aid impart,
 While self-consuming thoughts distract his heart.
 All day and night, the liquid road he press'd,
 His king and mistress ranking in his breast :
 In vain from shore or bark he hopes relief,
 Nor shore nor bark can soothe his rage of grief.
 Thus the sick patient seeks to assuage his pain, 640
 While the fierce fever throbs in every vein ;
 From side to side he shifts his place by turns,
 But unremitting still the fever burns.
 Tir'd with the stream, again he sought the strand,
 And pass'd Vienna and Valenza's land,
 The walls of Lyons next the Pagan view'd,
 And where Avignon's bridge stupendous stood,
 These towns, and more, of semblance rich and gay,
 That 'twixt th' Iberian hills and river lay,

or allusions to texts of scripture, in compositions even of the familiar kind, was common with the writers of the early age. Our Chaucer abounds with such instances, and many may be found in Shakspear ; which passages were not then deemed exceptional, nor, it is probable, gave offence to the nicest ear.

† By the river, he means the Rhodan ; by th' Iberian-hills, he means the hill Jubakdo in Spain ; by which he would infer that Agramant and Marsilius, after the last defeat of Charles, had made

Paid to the monarch-Motor² and king of Spain 630
 Allegiance due, as lords of that domain,
 Won by their bands from Gallia's shrieking reign.
 Thence on the right to Acquasort he bends,
 And straight for Afric's realm his course intends;
 Till bear a river be a town survey'd,
 Which Ceres once and purple Bacchus way'd;
 Campell'd their favourite dwelling to forgo,
 From cruel irons of a barbarous foe:
 Here smile the fields, there roars the surgy main.
 And bright in valleys gleams the golden grain. 660
 On this fair spot a chapel seat he found,
 Built on a hill, and lazely wall'd around:
 This, when the flames of war their horror spread,
 The priest deserted, and with terror fled:
 Struck with the site, as from the camp remov'd,
 The hated camp and arms no longer lov'd,
 The king resolv'd on this sequester'd shore
 To fix his seat, nor dream of Afric more:
 Pleas'd with this new abode and place of rest,
 Algiers so lov'd was banish'd from his breast. 670
 With their stern lord the squares attending dwell'd,
 The walls himself, his train, and courser held;
 Not far his turrets proud Montpellier shows;
 And, near, another stately castle rose;
 Which seated on the river's gentle tide,
 The town with stores for every need supply'd.
 One day, while deep immers'd in pensive mood,
 The king, as wont, a thousand thoughts pursu'd;
 Along a path-way through th' enamell'd grove,
 Approaching nigh, a lovely dame was seen: 680
 An aged monk, with beard descending low,
 Beside her came, with solemn steps and slow;
 A warrior-steed he led, that proudly bore
 A weighty bier with sable cover'd o'er:
 But who the monk, and who th' afflicted fair,
 Or what the load, 't were useless to declare:
 All knew 't was Isabella, hapless maid,
 Who lov'd Zerbino's breathless corse convey'd:
 Her in Provence I left, and at her side
 This reverend sire, her comforter and guide; 690
 By whom confirm'd, she meant her future days
 To dedicate for God's eternal praise.
 Though on her cheek was spread a death-like hue,
 Though to the winds her locks dishevell'd flew;
 Though sighs incessant speak her careless woe,
 And from her eyes unbidden fountains flow:
 Though every mournful sigh too well express'd
 The anguish harbour'd in her gentle breast;
 Through all her grief such beauties were descry'd
 The Loves and Graces there might still reside. 700
 Soon as the Saracen the mourner view'd,
 Th' unlook'd for sight his haughty soul subdu'd;
 No more he blam'd, or loath'd that gentle race,
 Whose charms inspire us, and whose virtues grace,
 While Isabella worthy seem'd to prove
 The peerless object of his second love;
 And from his breast expunge Granada's dame,
 As pity yields to pity, flame to flame.
 The Pagan saw, and kindling at the view,
 With eager step to meet the virgin drew; 710
 And with demeanour fair and mild address,
 Inquire the cause that wrought her deep distress.
 She told the sorrows of her secret breast,
 And, how deny'd on Earth a place of rest,

Her soul had fix'd to bid the world farewell,
 And with her God in holy mansions dwell.
 Loud laugh'd the Pagan, who nor God would know,
 Nor own his laws, to every faith a foe!
 He blam'd her erring zeal, to keep confin'd
 Such beauty, form'd but to delight mankind: 780
 "The sordid raiser, brooding on his store,
 Thus hides," he cries, "in caves his shining ore;
 Whence nothing good he to himself derives,
 And others of his useful wealth deprives:
 Snakes, lions, bears are cag'd in fear of harms,
 Not guiltless maids who breathe but love and charms."

The man of God, who such vain converse fears,
 Like skilful pilot that the vessel steers,
 Attends his charge, lest, lightly drawn astray,
 Her feet should wander from the rightful way: 790
 And now the hoary sire with grace induc'd,
 Prepares a splendid feast of buly food.
 But the fierce Pagan, born with evil taste,
 Rejects the dainties of the rich repast.
 At length, when oft he chid, oft strove in vain
 The preacher's bateful counsel to restrain,
 His patience wasted, with vindictive ire
 He rais'd his arm against that aged sire:
 Yet lest our story should too long appear,
 We, for your ease, will close the labours here, 740
 And let this hapless monk th' example teach,
 To curb the license of ungovern'd speech.

BOOK XXIX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rodomont falls in love with Isabella, and endeavours to persuade her to break her vow: his behaviour to the hermit who opposes him. The fortitude of Isabella, and her device to preserve her chastity. Conflict between Rodomont and Orlando. Further account of the mad actions of Orlando. Medoro and Angelica, in their way to embark for India, meet with Orlando, when Angelica, with great difficulty, escapes from the madman's hands.

ESSEYD the state of man's unstable mind,
 Still prone to change with every changing wind!
 All our resolves are weak, but weakest prove
 Where sprung from sense of disappointed love.
 When late the Saracen, to wrath inflam'd,
 On womankind with bitterest gall exclaim'd,
 It seem'd as if no power could e'er control,
 Far less expunge such hatred from his soul.
 So much, fair dames, his words your bard provoke,
 Which ill advis'd against your sex he spoke, 10
 That never will I leave him, till his breast
 Again has beauty's sovereign sway confirm'd:
 Still shall my verse condemn his stammer'd speech,
 That folly durst your spotless name impeach.
 The shafts of rage he from his quiver drew,
 And these, at all, without distinction threw:
 But Isabella, with a single look,
 At once his firmest resolution shook;
 And now to her he chang'd his former flame,
 Though yet to him unknown her country, race, or name. 90

Thus, as new passion fir'd his smother'd thought,
 With every eloquence of words, he sought
 To shake the purpose of her steadfast will,
 That would to God her virgin vow fulfil.

themselves masters of Catalonia, and from Narbonne (Narbonne) to Paris.

² Agrament.

The hermit, as a fencing shield, to arm
Her chaste intent against all worldly harm,
By pious reasons, strong and duly weigh'd,
With all his power stood forth to guard the maid.
Not long the impious Pagan could endure
The holy sire, who preach'd in vain secure: 30
He bade him, in good time, his self requite,
And leave the damsel; but he bade in vain:
Till roue'd at length, no longer he forbore,
But seiz'd his beard, whence by the roots he tore
The silver hairs; and, with dire rage impell'd,
With savage grasp his aged neck he held; [threw:]
And, whirling round, some three miles thence he Swift towards the sea the wretched hermit flew!
What then befel him, little I relate,
For various tales are rumour'd of his fate: 40
Some say against a rock his limbs were thrown,
And piousness dash'd upon the craggy stone:
Some say, that midst the sea his death he found,
And, as he knew not how to swim, was drown'd
Spite of his orisons—Some say, the hand
Of his good saint convey'd him safe to land:
But be it as it may,—I pass it o'er,
Henceforth of him the story speaks no more.

When cruel Rodomont had thus remov'd
The talking hermit, oft in vain repov'd, 50
With milder looks he turn'd, where, at his side,
The damsel stood all pale and terrify'd;
Whom now in speech by lovers oft address,
He call'd his life, of every good the best;
His balm of hope, fair comfort, smiling joy,
With such endearment amorous-tongues employ.
Courteous he seem'd, as if he would disarm
Her thoughts of fear, that any force might harm
Her virgin vow: those graces that inflam'd
His cruel heart, his wonted pride had tam'd; 60
And though his hand could pluck the fruit, he chose
To sustain at distance, and but touch the boughs.
He faintly hap'd by slow degrees to find
Fair Isabella to his wish inclin'd:

While she, subjected to a tyrant's laws, [claws]
(Like some poor mouse² within her foe's sharp
Unfenced and forlorn, would rather dare
The worst of ills than what she fear'd to bear;
Still pondering on the means, if such could be,
Herself and hence from his power to free; 70
With her own hand determin'd to prevent
Her shame by death, ere his abhor'd intent
Should make her wrong the knight, who, late entwine'd

By her lov'd arms, his parting breath resign'd;
To whom, with heart devout, the mourning dame
Had vow'd to dedicate her virgin name. [fire
She mark'd, and trembling mark'd, th' unhallo'd
That warn'd the Pagan with impure desire.
What shall she do? How shape her dangerous
course?

What way remains to elude his brutal force? 80
Long time revolving in her fearful mind
A thousand schemes, at length, her thoughts design'd

¹ No partiality for the poet can apologise for the strangeness of such passages as these: whenever they occur, the translator freely gives them up to the critic, as lawful game, and means this for a general declaration of his opinion on the subject.

² Certainly too ludicrous an image on so pathetic an occasion.

One that might save her chastity from thence;
Which here we tell to her eternal shame.

The Pagan, by his words and deeds, confirm'd
The lurking purpose of his impious breast:
Lost was the courtesy which first he show'd,
When fair his speech in gentle accents sav'd.
To him the damsel—"Wouldst thou but excuse
My honour safe? a gift thou mayst procure, 90
Of far more worth than aught thou canst obtain
From what must fix on thee eternal stain.
Scorn not a lasting prize, a prize to raise
O'er all the sons of war thy deathless praise.
A hundred and a hundred mayst thou find,
Fair dames, the loveliest of our female kind;
But who, like me, are fated to bestow
Th' honour'd good thou to my hand mayst owe.
A herb I know, and late have seen, that boil'd
With rue and ivy, o'er a fire when pluck'd 100
With Cyprus-mood, will (strange to tell) produce,
By guileless fingers squeez'd, a sovereign juice,
With which, Chiriac bath'd, the body will be found:
One may secure without stain or wound
That mouth elaps'd, the bathing we renew,
No longer time avails the powerful dew.
The proof of what I tell, thy wondering eyes
Shall witness soon—to thee a nobler prize
(Or such I see) than if this day had view'd
AN Europe by thy conquering arm subdu'd. 110
In recompense for what I shall bestow
I ask but this—these plights thy solemn vow,
Ne'er from this hour by word or deed to harm
My virgin honour, or my fears alarm."

The damsel thus the Pagan's suit repress'd,
Who now with new degrees of fame possess'd,
Vow'd all she ask'd, impatient to be made
Alike impassive to the flame or blade:
Resolv'd to curb his lust, till prov'd he view'd
The wondrous water with such spell lodg'd, 120
Through which his limbs might earn each weapon's
As Cygnus or Achilles³ secur'd before; [power,

³ A similar story is told of a virgin in the time of Mirvan, the emperour, in the eighth century, and of another named Isabella (the time uncertain) related by Francesco Barbero, in his book concerning the choice of a wife. Zatta.

⁴ Ovid tells us, Metam. book xii. that Cygnus, the son of Neptune, could not be wounded. The common story of Achilles is, that he was dipped in the river Styx by his mother Thetis, and thereby became invulnerable in every part except the heel by which she held him; and that he was at last shot by Paris at the altar, in the only vulnerable place, at the instigation of Apollo, during the ceremony of his nuptials with Polyxena, the daughter of Priam. This fable is certainly of much later date than Homer, and not countenanced in the poems of Virgil, Horace, or Ovid. Homer represents him as being wounded in the battle of the river, by Asteropus, who was ambi-dexter, and threw two darts at Achilles at the same time.

At once Asteropus discharg'd each lance,
(For both his dexter⁴ hands the lance could wield)
One struck, but pierc'd not the Vulcanian shield:
One raz'd Achilles' hand, the spouting blood
Ipsu forth— Pope's Mind, b. xxi. ver. 122.

Achilles was not slain in the temple, but fell in the field of battle, according to Homer, as appears

But meant his compact should no longer bind:
No fear, no reverence, in his impious mind,

by the conversation between that hero and Agamemnon in the shades.

"O son of Pelæus! greater than mankind!"
Thus Agamemnon's kingly shade rejoin'd;
"Thrice happy thou, to press the martial plain,
'Midst heaps of heroes in thy quarrel slain:
In clouds of smoke, rais'd by the noble fray,
Great and terrific even in death you lay."

Pope's Odys. book xxiv. ver. 51.

Hesiod has no account of the modern fable of Achilles, nor any of the ancient Greek tragedians. Sophocles thus mentions his death, in the tragedy of Philoctetes, Act ii. Scene i.

Paris. Is then Achilles dead?

Nxor. ————— He is, and not

By mortal hands, but by Apollo's shaft
Fall glorious*.

Bion, who lived 187 years before Christ, in a fragment of an epithalamium on the nuptials of Pelæus and Thetis, makes no mention of the immersion in the Styx; neither does Catullus in his poem on the same subject. Strabo, who died 65 years after Catullus, does not speak of this fable of the Styx, although he frequently alludes to the story of Achilles. Horace calls Achilles, Filius Thetidis Marione, in three places. He speaks thus of his death—Abstatit clarum cita mors Achillem; and mentions him frequently, but never as having been invulnerable.

Ovid gives no countenance to the story, though he particularly commemorates the death of Cygnus, slain by Achilles; and tells us, that the Grecian hero, to his great surprise, finding him invulnerable, was obliged to strangle him; that before his death he boasted to Achilles of his superior advantage derived from being the son of Neptune, alluding to this preternatural gift:

Nate deâ (nam te famâ prenovimus) inquit
Ille, quid a nobis vultus miraris abesse?
(Mirabatur enim) non hæc, quam cernis, equinis
Fulva jubeis cassis, neque omnis cava parma sinistra
Auxilio mihi sunt: decor est questus ab istis.
Mars quoque ab hoc capere arma solet: removebitur omnis

Tegmina officium; tamen indestructus abibo.
Est aliquid, non esse satum Nereidæ, sed qui Nereusque, et natas, et totum temperæ æquor.

Metam. lib. xii. ver. 86.

Goddeſs born!

For ornament, not use, these arms are worn;
This helm and heavy buckler I can spare,
As only decorations of the war:
So Mars is arm'd for glory, not for need:
'T is somewhat more from Neptune to proceed,
Than from a daughter of the sea to spring:
Your sire is mortal, mine is Ocean's king.
Secure of death, I could contemn thy dart
Though naked, and impassible depart.

Dryden.

The poet afterwards tells us, that Achilles was shot by an arrow from Paris, sent into the midst of the battle, but does not describe him as wounded in

Of God or saint—for breach of faith the worst
Of Afric's seas, by perjur'd deeds accurst!

any particular part: speaking of Apollo standing by Paris, he says,

Dixit: et ostendens sternentem Troia ferro
Corpora Peliden, arcus obverit in illum:
Certaque letiferâ direxit spicula dextra.

Met. lib. xii. ver. 604.

He said, and show'd from far the blazing shield
And sword, which but Achilles none could wield,
And how he look'd a god, and now'd the standing
The deity himself directs aright [field.
Th' envenom'd shaft, and wings the fatal flight.

Dryden.

Virgil records the circumstance of his being slain by Paris, in the prayer of Æneas to Apollo, which Dryden translates with hasty inaccuracy, his mind being impressed with the popular fable:

Indulgent god! propitious power to Troy!
Swift to relieve, unwilling to destroy;
Directed by whose hand, the Dardan dart
Pierced the proud Grecian's only mortal part.

For which the original gives no authority: the words of Virgil are,

Phœbe, graves Trojæ semper miserate labores,
Dardana qui Parisi direxti tela manusque
Corpus in Æcida—— Æn. vi. 56.

Thus faithfully rendered by Pitt:

Hear, Phœbus, gracious god! whose aid divine
So oft has saved the wretched Trojan line,
And wing'd the shaft from Paris' Phrygian bow,
The shaft that laid the great Achilles low.

The story of Achilles being slain in the temple at his nuptials with Polyxena, seems to have been of later invention than his dipping in the Styx: the author of both these fables is unknown; but the first may be traced back, if not to the inventor, at least as early as the Augustan æge, when Hyginus, the freedman of Augustus and friend of Ovid, relates the death of Achilles thus, and seems to speak of the incident of the heel as a current but probably a vulgar story; and therefore not noticed by the classic writers of the time, who closely adhered to the authority of Homer:

Hectore sepulto, cum Achilles circa mœnia Trojanorum vagaretur, ac diceret se solum Trojam expugnâsse, Apollo iratus, Alexandrum Paris se simulans, talum, quem mortalem habuisse dicitur, sagitta percussit et occidit.

"After the funeral of Hector, when Achilles was boasting before the walls of Troy that he singly would take the city, Apollo being incensed took upon him the likeness of Paris, and, wounding Achilles in the heel, in which he was said to be mortal, slew him."

The histories now extant under the names of Dictys Cretensis, and Dares the Phrygian, both said to have been present at the siege of Troy, have the story of Achilles with all the modern circumstances; but these histories are suppositions, the originals being lost. Statius, who died 91 years after Christ, in his Achilleid mentions the circumstance of the river Styx. Thetis speaking to Chiron says,

— Sæpe ipam, nefas! sub inanis natum
Tartaro, et ad Stygiæ iterum fero mergere fontes.

Lib. i.

* See Dr. Franklin's elegant translation of Sophocles.

O'er hanging cliffs, through valleys dark with shade,
From towns and cities far the virgin stray'd,
Collecting various herbs, while at her side
The Pagan watch'd, and every motion eyed. 130
Such store provided now as seem'd to suit
Her present purpose, or with leaf or root,
Damp evening rose, when to their home they came,
Where she, the paragon of virtuous fame,
What yet remain'd of night, with seeming care
Employ'd the powerful mixture to prepare,
That bubbled o'er the blaze, while still the knight
With due attention mark'd each mystic rite.

Now with his squires in sportive dice and play
The king of Algiers pass'd the hours away, 140
When from the kindled fire, the heat enclos'd
In narrow bounds, to raging thirst dispos'd
The lord and menials, who insatiate drained
Two vases huge that Grecian wine contain'd,
Which from some travellers the day before
His squires had seiz'd, and to their master bore.
Stern Rodomont till then to wine unus'd,
Which to his sect the prophet's law refus'd,
Extoll'd the heavenly liquor far above
Celestial manna, or the drink of Jove; 150
And blaming now his country's ancient rite,
Huge bowls and goblets empties with delight :

How oft this breast could Hell's dire horrors brave,
To plunge my offspring in the Stygian wave!

She says to her son, when she has taken him to Scyros :

Mox iterum campos, iterum Centaurica reddam
Lustra tibi; per ego hoc decus, et ventura juvenat
Gaudia, si terras, humilemque experta maritum
Te propter, si progenitum Stygis anne severo
Arnavi (totumquo utinam) cape tuta parumper
Tegmina, usi nocitura animo. Lib. ii.

Soon shalt thou view (when eas'd my present fears)
Those shades, where Chiron watch'd thy playful years,

Again thy own—By all thy hop'd-for praise!
By all the joys that wait thy youthful days!
If, for thy sake, a mortal's bed I chose,
And bear, for thee, a mother's anxious woes;
If Styx, by me, thy tender limbs could arm;
(Why felt not every part the potent charm!)
Here bear, a while secure, the female name,
Nor think these robes can taint thy future fame.

Seneca, Plutarch, and Pausanias are silent on this head. Quintus Calaber, who lived about two hundred years after Augustus, and wrote a supplement to Homer's Iliad, represents Achilles as wounded by Memnon, king of the Ethiopians. Laetantius, in his argument to the xiiith book of the Metamorphoses, refers to the vulgar tradition of the heel, which is the more singular, as no such circumstance occurs in his author: and Servius, in his note on the viith book of the Aeneid, to the before-cited passage has the like reference. In the edition of Virgil by Masivicius, the commentator on the same place refers both to the story of the Styx and of Polyxena: and, speaking of the words here made use of by the poet, he adds: Et bene ait dixisti—quasi ad solum vulnerabilem locum. Dryden, in the preface to his translation of the Aeneid, refers to a passage of M. Segrain where the French writer is defending Virgil for giving his hero enchanted arms. "This accusation," says

From hand to hand with foaming brimmers crown'd,
The wine swift circles, and the head turns round.

At length removing from the crackling flame
The vase with herbs infus'd, the virgin dame
To Rodomont began—"What best may prove
The words I speak, and every doubt remove,
Experience, that can sever truth from lies,
Instruct the learn'd, and make the vulgar wise, 160
Not on another, but on me shall show
The wondrous power this uncton can bestow.
Behold me now, while o'er my fearless head
My neck and breast the potent charm I shed,
Thy force, thy sword undaunted to receive;
And prove if that can strike, or this can cleave."

She said; and stooping as she spoke, display'd
Her neck uncover'd to the Pagan blade:
Th' unthinking Saracens, (whose wretched sense
Wine had subdued, for which was no defence 170
From helm or shield,) he, at the fatal word,
Rais'd his fell arm, and bar'd his murdering sword.
And, lo! that head, where love was wont to dwell,
From her fair neck and breast divided fell:
Thrice from the floor the head was seen to bound,
And thrice was heard Zerbino's name to sound,

Dryden, "must fall on Homer ere it can reach Virgil. Achilles was as well provided with them as Aeneas, though he was invulnerable without them." He goes on thus: "In defence of Virgil—he has been more cautious than his predecessor or descendants, for Aeneas was actually wounded in the xiiith book of the Aeneid." Thus far Dryden. But it is very extraordinary that so cool and judicious a critic as Segrain should take up this unclassical fable. Speaking of the enchanted arms given to the heroes of epic poetry or romance, he says, Ces présents des Dieux sont même une preuve de la valeur du prince, à qui ils sont faits; et il ne se trouve point que les mechans et les hommes mediocres aient obtenu des grâces pareilles, la providence ne les accorde qu'aux hommes rares qui meritent seuls, qu'elle les conserve dans les dangers où leur courage les porte. Autrement il faudroit dire qu' Achille n'étoit pas vaillant, puis qu'outre un pareil secours d'armes forgées par Vulcain, sa mere avoit encore ajouté des charmes qui le rendoient invulnerable.

To conclude this subject, in the discussion of which I hope I shall not have been thought tedious, though the first inventor of the story is unknown, it is undoubtedly of considerable antiquity, and has been occasionally made use of or rejected by different authors, but ought certainly never to be alluded to in any criticism or observation on Homer, to whom the fable appears to be wholly unknown. But it is no wonder that a fiction of this kind, so consonant to the genius of romance, should be adopted by Boyardo and Ariosto.

5 The ill faith of the Carthaginians was known to a proverb in the time of the Romans, Punica fides. Thus Addison in the mouth of Juba :

Our Punic faith

Is infamous, and brand'd to a proverb. Cato.

6 Corliambo, the giant's head in Spenser, speaks when cut off by Arthur.

Fairy Queen, b. iv. c. viii.

His head before him humbled on the ground.
The while his bubbling tongue did yet blaspheme.

For whose dear sake she found such way t' escape
The Pagan's hand, nor fear'd, in such a shape,
T' encounter death to follow him she lov'd—
Hail, spotless soul! for purest faith approv'd, 180
Whose act has shown how dear thy plighted spouse
By thee was held, how dear thy virgin vows:
Fair Chastity, on Earth now little heard,
By thee to life and blooming years prefer'd.
Go, blessed soul! depart in peace to Heaven!
So to my feeble Muse such aid be given,
As may with every grace the song adorn,
And give thy name to ages yet unborn!
Go hence in peace to Heaven, and leave behind
Thy bright example still to womankind! 190

At this stupendous deed, from purest skies
On Earth the great Creator bent his eyes,
And said—"Thy virtue merits more renown
Than hers whose death robb'd Tarquin of his crown:

Henceforth I mean for ever, for thy sake,
Amidst my mints a great decree to make,
Which by th' inviolable stream I swear,⁴
To every future age thy praise shall bear:

"Poetry deals in the wonderful, and nothing is so tame and prosaic as Scaliger's criticism on the verse of Homer II. x. which Spenser had in view,
Falsum est a pulmone caput avulsim loqui posse.
It is false that a head can speak after separation from the lungs. Hear Ovid, Met. v. ver. 104.

Demetit enae caput; quod protinus incidit arm,
Atque ibi semianimi verba execranda lingua
Edidit—

The trenchant falchion lopt his head away,
The gory visage on the altar lay,
While on the lips imperfect accents hung,
And curses linger'd on the dying tongue.

"And speaking of a lady's tongue, (which may be less wonderful,) when cut off and stung upon the ground, he says, terræque tremens immurmurat—
—and trembling murmurs on the ground.

"So Homer, who is all wonderful, and the father of all poetical wonders, speaks of Dolon, whose head was cut off by Diomed. Mr. Pope's translation is admirable:

The head, yet speaking, mutter'd as it fell.

II. x. 10."

See Upton's notes on Spenser.

7 On this passage Mr. Upton observes, that Ariosto, in admiration of the chastity and martyrdom of Isabella, breaks out into a most elegant apostrophe, which Spenser copies in his address to Flornel, when she is in prison tempted by Proteus:

Eternal thralldom was to her more lief
Than loss of chastity, or 'change of love—
Most virtuous virgin, glory be thy meed,
And crown of heavenly praise with saints above—
But yet, what so my feeble Muse can frame
Shall be t' advance—
Fairly Queen, b. iii. c. viii. st. 42.

⁴ Rucelli, the Italian commentator, takes great pains to clear Ariosto from censure, for having introduced the Supreme Being, on this occasion, taking an oath like Jupiter in the Iliad or Æneid;
though I fear that such passage can be defended by no argument adduced in its justification, but

Let every maid that holds thy name⁸ be blest
With genius, beauty, virtue, o'er the rest 200
Of woman's sex, but most the prize obtain
For chastity and faith without a stain;
While Pindus, Helicon, Parnassus' hill
Sound Isabella, Isabella still.⁹

Th' Almighty spoke, the air was husb'd around,
Smooth spread the waves o'er ocean's vast profound,
To the third Heaven¹⁰ the virgin-soul withdrew,
And in the arms of her Zerbino flew,
While, left behind, this second Irius¹¹ stood, 209
Abash'd, confounded, stain'd with guiltless blood;
Who now, the wine's o'er-mastering fumes dispell'd,
Cur'd his dire rashness, and with grief beheld
The breathless body of the murder'd maid,
And ponder'd how t' appease her angry shade:
Since to her mortal part her death could give,
He hopes to make her name immortal live.

For this intent, the place where late she dwelt,
Where her fair form his brutal fury felt,
He chang'd or built anew, with spacious room
Enlarg'd, converting to a stately tomb. 220
From various parts around him, far and near,
Artists he found for favour or for fear:
Six thousand men, with ceaseless labour, wrought
Huge massy stones, from neighbouring quarries
brought;

With those he bade the stately building rise
Of wondrous bulk, that lifted to the skies
Its towering head, and in the midst enclos'd
The faithful lovers¹² that in death repos'd.
Such was the structure which the world amur'd,
By Adrian on the banks of Tyber rais'd¹³. 230

that it must in general be acknowledged, that Ariosto, like the rest of his countrymen, often introduces the fictions of poetry on the most solemn occasions. But a heavier charge may be here brought against the poet for making the Almighty approve the action of Lucretia, and thereby giving a sanction to suicide. This passage the Italian commentator has candidly confessed to be a gross breach of propriety and decorum.

⁸ By this extravagant prophecy on all who bear the name of Isabella; the poet is said to make an eulogium on the duchess of Mantua, the daughter of Hercules duke of Ferrara, and wife of Ferrando king of Naples; the wife of Ferdinando king of Spain, to whose wisdom is attributed chiefly the discovery of the new world by Columbus; the wife of Frederick, king of Naples; the wife of Ubaldo, duke of Urbino; but more especially a daughter of the king of Hungary, who was canonized by pope Gregory IX. for the sanctity of her life;—all these ladies bore the name of Isabella.

Porcacchi.

¹⁰ Ariosto here follows the fiction of some of the ancient poets, who taught that those lovers, who had been constant, were after death received into the third Heaven, the region of Venus the goddess of love.

Porcacchi.

¹¹ Irius, surnamed without mercy, a character in the romances of the Round-Table. He is largely spoken of by Alamanni, in his poetical romance of Girone il Cortese; and is mentioned by Pulci in his Morgante, canto xiii. who calls him Irius whb-out pity.

¹² Zerbino and Isabella.

¹³ The poet means the noble castle of St. Angelo

Close to the sepulchre a tower was join'd,
The spacious dwelling for himself design'd.
A narrow bridge⁴⁴, scarce two feet wide, he made
Fair stretch'd in length, which o'er the stream he laid

That ran beneath, and scarce the bridge supply'd
Space for two steeds abreast to cross the tide,
Or, meeting, pass: nor plac'd from end to end
Was rail or fence the stranger to defend.

Baptiz'd or Pagan, all that travel here, 239
He will'd henceforth should buy their passage dear;
For with their spoils, t' atone the virgin's doom,
He vow'd a thousand trophies at her tomb.
Ten days beheld the bridge complete; but more
Requir'd to raise the sepulchre and tower:
Yet well the work advanc'd, and on the height
A watch was plac'd to note each coming knight;
And oft as near the bridge a warrior drew,
The horn to Rodomont a signal blew.

Sudden he arm'd him for the course, and stood
Now here, now there, on either side the food. 250
Whene'er a warrior reach'd the fatal tower,
The king of Algiers took the adverse shore:
The slender bridge the dangerous list supply'd,
There if the steed but little swerv'd aside,
Prone in the river's headlong depth he fell:
No light, for peril, could such fight excel.
Thus often risk'd, the Saracen believ'd
Whene'er he fell, the rushing stream receiv'd
In draughts compell'd, would purify his soul
For sins committed through th' infernal bowl;
As if from water certain cure was brought 261
For wrongs, which wine by hand or tongue had wrought.

Few days elaps'd, ere numerous knights were led,
For Spain and Italy that path to tread.
The thirst of fame, to some more dear than life,
Brought many knights to prove the dangerous strife,
While all who hop'd the victor's meed to gain,
Resign'd their arms, and numbers there were slain.
Of vanquish'd Pagans that the course had run,
He kept their spoils alone, and armour won. 270

at Rome, built by Pope Adrian VI. on the river Tyber. This building was afterwards enlarged by several successive popes, till Pius V. put the finishing hand to it.

⁴⁴ This fiction of Rodomont's bridge is truly in the spirit of romance. We often read of knights meeting with such adventures: in the old romance of Morte Arthur, sir Launcelot encounters a churl who defended a passage over a river.

"On the third day he rode over a great long bridge, and there started upon him suddenly a passing foul churl, and he smote his horse on the nose, that he turned about, and asked him why he rode over that bridge without his license? and he struck at him with a mighty great club full of pins of iron. Then sir Launcelot drew his sword, and put the stroke back, and clove his head unto the nave." Morte Arthur, part i. c. cxi.

Spenser has a passage similar to this of Ariosto, where a bridge of this kind is described, and a combat ensues between sir Artbegal and a Saracen:

Here beyond,

A cursed cruel Saracen doth wone,
That keeps a bridge's passage by strong hand,
And many errant knights hath there fordonne.

Fairy Queen, b. v. c. ii. st. 4.

Of these the names on tablets fairly traced,
And hung on high the polish'd marble graced:
But every Christian close in durance pent
He held design'd for Afric to be sent.

The work proceeding, on a certain day
The mad Orlando thither bent his way.
The frantic earl by fortune thither came,
When Rodomont, beside the rapid stream,
Urg'd on the task: as yet unfinish'd stood 279
The tower and tomb, and scarcely o'er the flood
The bridge complete, when thither came the knight
Of wits distraught, what time to consejct bright
The Pagan watch'd to guard the tomb and tower,
And all his armour, save his helmet, wore.

Meanwhile Orlando, as his phrensy led,
At once o'erleapt the bar with fearless tread:
Him Rodomont, who stood on foot, espay'd,
And thus from far—"Forbear thy steps," he cried:
"This bridge, thou slave! was ne'er design'd for thee,

But noble knights and lords of high degree." 290
Orlando, stranger now to reason's force,
Turn'd a deaf ear, and onward held his course.
"I must chastise this fool," the Pagan cries,
And as he speaks, with rapid feet he flies
To plunge him in the stream, nor thinks to try
A fall with one that could his strength defy.

And now it chanc'd a fair and gentle dame
T' attempt the passage near the river came;
Her lovely form in courtly weeds array'd,
And all her mien a noble race display'd. 300
Lo! this was she (if still your mind retain
The tale I told⁴⁵) who long had sought in vain
The steps of Braddimart, and far explor'd
Each part but that which now detain'd her lord.

Fair Floridels, arriving near the flood,
Dobeld where on the bridge the Pagan stood,
Close'd with Orlando, while each nerve he ply'd
To hurl the madman headlong in the tide.
The virtuous dame, when, with a nearer view,
She mark'd his features, well Orlando knew; 310
And fill'd with grief, at such dire sight amaz'd,
On him thus naked and forlorn she gaz'd.

Awhile she staid t' await the conflict's end,
Where two such foes in matchless strength contend.
They press, they gripe, their utmost nerve they show,

Each strives the other from the bridge to throw,
And, muttering to himself, the Pagan cries,

"What to this fool such unlook'd force supplies?"
Now here now there he struggles, shifts, and turns,
With shame he reddens, and with wrath he burns:
With either hand he seeks, in vain, to take 321
Some firmer hold, that best the earl may shake;
And oft between his legs the furious knight
The left foot now inserts, and now the right.
Orlando Rodomont entwines around,
Like the fierce bear that struggles from the ground
T' uproot the tree from which he fell, and deals
His senseless rage on that which nothing feels.
Hapless Orlando, with his wits destroy'd, 329
Nor slight, nor art, but strength alone employ'd;

⁴⁵ Floridels is here again introduced, who last made her appearance in the xxivth book, ver. 535, and was present at the single combat between Mandricardo and Zerbino; after which she continued her search of Braddimart till she came to this bridge.

(Such wondrous strength the world from end to end
No living chief to equal him could send !)
Himself now backward from the bridge he threw,
And with him, close embrac'd, the Pagan drew.
Both sink together to the depth profound,
Leap the dash'd waves, and loud the shores re-
sound !

The water soon divides their struggling limbs;
Orlando, naked, disencumber'd swims :
Amid the stream he plies, as with an oar, 339
His strong-knit joints, and safely gains the shore :
Then o'er the plain he speeds his course, nor stays
To mark bow far he merits blame or praise.
The Pagan, whom his ponderous arms surround,
More slowly gains, at length, the distant ground.
Meanwhile securely o'er the bridge and tide
The dame had past, and round on every side
Explor'd the tamb, if there her anxious eye
Might any spoils of Brandimart spy.
Yet while nor arms nor mantle there she view'd
Of him she lov'd—food hopes she still renew'd 351
To meet her lord—but let us turn to find
The wretched earl¹⁶, who fled with senseless mind,
And left the bridge, the stream, and tower behind¹⁷.

Wild were the thought¹⁸ t' attempt in tufeul verse

The madness of Orlando to rehearse :
Such various feats—their number would exceed
What leisure could describe, or tongue could tell :
A few I choose that best befit my song ;
A few that to my story best belong : 360
Nor will I fail the wonder to recite
Wrought near Tolosa on Pyrene's height.

O'er many a tract of land the earl had past,
And reach'd the range of craggy hills, at last,
That sever France from Spain, whose lofty head
Receives the beams by evening Phœbus shed.
Here, while he paced along a narrow way,
That o'er a deep tremendous valley lay,
Two village lads he met, who drove before
A laden ass that wintry fuel bore. 370
These, when they view'd the hapless champion lost
To every sense, as in their path he cross'd,
Aloud they call'd, and, threatening, bade him leave
The middle track, and free the passage give.

Orlando to their threats no word return'd,
But with his foot, beneath the brilly, spurn'd
The wretched beast, with strength beyond compare,
And rais'd from earth dismiel'd to soar in air ;
Thence on the summit of a hill he fell,
That rear'd its head a mile beyond the dell. 380
The youths he next assail'd : one, less discreet
Than happy, chanced a strange escape to meet :
For, struck with terror, from the hanging steep
Twice thirty feet he took a venturous leap :
A thorny bush, against the cliff's rough side
That in the mid-way grew, its aid supply'd
To break his fall ; and now, unhurt, he stood,
Save that his face the bramble's greeting show'd,
That ras'd the skin, and drew the purple blood.

His fellow seiz'd a jutting crag, and sprung 390
To scale the rock ; but while aloft he clung,

The madman, on his swift destruction bent,
Grasp'd either leg, these at his arms' extent
He strain'd asunder, till, with dreadful force,
He tore in bloody halves the panting core.
Thus, for his bird, the falconer oft prepares
The living meal, when limb from limb he tears
The fowl or heron, destin'd for his food,
With entrails warm and flesh distilling blood.
Thrice happy be that in the vale beneath 400
Surviv'd a fall, that threaten'd instant death.
This wondrous chance he made to others known,
Which Turpin to our age delivers down.

Such deeds, and many far transcending thought,
The madman, as he pass'd the mountain, wrought,
Till wandering far, descending to the plain,
He reach'd at length the southern bounds of Spain,
And bent his course along the sea, that laves
Fair Teracona's strand with briny waves. [All'd,
There, with strange schemes his brain distemper'd
He meant a dwelling on the beach to build, 411
A shelter from the Sun ; and, cover'd o'er
With parching sand, upon the burning shore
Conceal'd he lay, when, lo ! the princely dame
Of rich Cathay with her Medora came.

These late espous'd, by fortune thither brought,
From the steep height the Spanish borders sought,
Th' unthinking damsel near Orlando drew,
Who, save his head, lay buried deep from view.
The squalid look her frantic lover wore, 420
No memory wak'd of him she knew before :
For since the time his phrensy had begun,
He wander'd, naked, in the shade or sun :
His tawny members seem'd to speak his birth
In hot Sienna, or the sultry earth
Where Amon's fane¹⁹ in Garamantia stood,
Or those steep hills²⁰ whence Nile derives his flood :
Deep in the socket sunk each gloomy eye,
His visage pale, his features lean and dry ;
His uncomb'd hair in fearful elflocks hung ; 430
His squalid beard was matted, thick, and long.

Soon as Angelica, with startled look,
The madman view'd, through every joint she shook :
She shook with fear, while loud to Heaven she cried,
And call'd for succour to her trusty guide :
When mad Orlando view'd that lovely face,
As if by instinct, starting from his place,
He gaz'd, and with an idiot joy beheld
Those heavenly charms that every charm excell'd :
Though all reflection that she once possess'd 440
His soul's dear love was banish'd from his breast,
He sees, he likes—and what he likes pursues :
So the staunch hound, amid the tainted dews,
Winds his fleet prey ; the youth who view'd his dams

Thus closely prest, behind the madman came
With trampling courser, and to rage inflam'd,
Against his back the glittering weapon aim'd.
Sheer through his neck he thought to drive the sword,
But found the wondrous flesh no pass afford.
Orlando felt the sword, and turning round, 450
With hand, unarm'd, laid lifeless on the ground

¹⁶ He returns to Fiordelis, Book xxxi. ver. 429.

in his madness, the reader is referred to the note
on Book xxiv. ver. 34.

¹⁹ Sienna, a city of Egypt, subject to the most intense heat of the Sun. The temple of Amon was situated in Africa, and held in veneration by the Garamantians, a people inhabiting those parts.

²⁰ Mountains of Ethiopia, called the Mountain of the Moon.

Medora's steed—then batten'd to pursue
The trembling damsel that before him flew,
That spur'd her mare, whose pace had seem'd too
slow,

Though like an arrow from the well-strung bow.
But now she call'd her last resource to mind,
Her wondrous ring, which still she us'd to find
Her sure defence, which held between her lips,
Conceal'd her person with a strange eclipse:
The charm she tried, and vanish'd from the sight,
As with the whistling blast th' extinguish'd light.
Then, whether fear, or whether eager haste, 462
Th' affrighted damsel in her seat displac'd;
Or whether then her mare, ill-fated, fell
By sudden trip—'T is doubtful here to tell.
But while the ring she from her finger drew,
And, in her mouth dispos'd, conceal'd from view
Her lovely form, the stirrups from her feet
She lost, and tumbled headlong from her seat:
And had she nearer fall'n, the madman's arm 470
Had surely seiz'd and wrought her further harm;
Her life perhaps had then the forfeit paid
For all her scorn—but Fortune gave her aid.

Now must the damsel, of her mare bereft,
Some other palfrey seek by fraud or theft:
For this the Paladin with eager speed
Pursues; and doubt not here another steed
Will soon be hers²¹—But let us now repair
To him who, losing thus the vanish'd fair,
Her beast pursued along the sandy plain, 480
At length he seiz'd her by the flowing mane:
With ease the Paladin her swiftness stay'd,
As one with gentle hand the gentler maid.

The bridle now he took, and with a bound,
The frantic hero, rising from the ground,
Vaults in the seat, then drives her many a mile,
Nor gives a moment's respite to her toil;
Nor frees her from the saddle, bit, or rein;
Nor lets her taste of grass, or hay, or grain.
It chanc'd as o'er a fosse he urg'd her pace, 490
Doth breast and man fell headlong in the place.

No hurt Orlando knew: but with the shock
The wretched beast, misus'd, her shoulder broke.
And he e' compell'd awhile Orlando stays;
At length athwart his back the mare he lays,
And bears us far, as sent with vigorous art
Thrice from the bow-string flies the feather'd dart;
Till by the weight oppress, with rein in hand,
He leads her limping o'er the shelly strand.

The crippled mare pursues his steps with pain—
“Come on—come on”—Orlando cries in vain. 501
At length the bridle, with a noose supply'd,
He took, and round her better leg he tied,
Then dragg'd along, and as he dragg'd, he said:
“Well mayest thou follow now, so gently led.”
Against the stony road the covering hair

Was rent and torn, and all the flesh laid bare,
Till death ensu'd; nor yet Orlando ceas'd,
But onward drew the mangled lifeless beast. 509
Still towards the west he pass'd, and in his course
Dwellings and towns he wasted, took by force
From trembling peasants all the food he sought,
Or fruit or flesh: of wretches whom he caught,
Unhappy some he maim'd, and some he slew,
And on his way with rage un govern'd flew.
Thus had it far'd with her whom once he lov'd,
But from her ring a better fate she prov'd.

Curst be the ring! and evil chance betide
The knight that with the gift her hand supply'd!
Else had Orlando full revenge obtain'd 520
For him, and each whom once her pride dis-dain'd.

Not she alone, but would that all her kind
Were to Orlando's frantic arm consign'd!
All are ingrate! nor midst the perjur'd race
Is one whose merits claim the smallest grace—
But hold; or, strain'd too far, my weary lyre
May ill supply the sound my lays require.
Here let us for awhile the tale suspend,
Till the pleas'd ear again attention lend.

BOOK XXX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Continuation of the mad feats of Orlando. The poet takes leave of Angelica. Disensions in the camp of Agramant renewed. Rogero and Mandricardo first named by lot to decide their quarrel for the shield of Hector. Description, and issue of their combat. Bradamant laments the absence of her lover, and hears tidings of him by Hippalca. Rinaldo arrives at Mount Albano, and prepares with his brethren Guichardo, Richardo, Richardetto, and Alardo, and his kinsmen Vivian and Malagigi, to go to the assistance of Charles. Bradamant remains behind at Mount Albano.

WAS reason, that should still in bounds restrain
Each sudden warmth, to passion gives the rein;
And blindfold rage our hand or lips can move
To injure those who merit most our love;
Though we with tears our errors past bemoan,
Such tears can never for th' offence atone.
In vain, alas! I sorely now repeat
Those words in which I gave my anger vent;
Since like a wretch I fare, who while distressed
With slow disease, has long his plaints suppress, 10
Till hopeless grown, to wild impatience driven,
He arms his tongue against depending Heaven:
His health restor'd, he owns his crime with grief,
But words once spoke admit of no relief.
Yet, ever-courteous dames! I hope from you
To meet that grace for which I lowly sue.
Forgive, what from a lover's phrensy came,
And to my beauteous foe transfer the blame;
She plunges me in ill, she bids me burn
With fierce resentment, that indulg'd must turn 20
On my own head—Heaven only knows if love
So true as mine deserves such fate to prove.
Not less my madness than Orlando's rage,
And such as well may pity's ear engage;
Like his, who, wandering now from hill to plain,
Had travers'd o'er Marsilius' wide domain.

Day following day from place to place he flew,
While at his back the lifeless beast he drew.
At length he reach'd a stream whose ample tide
Pour'd to the sea; there on the turfy side 30
The carcase left, and swiftly plunging o'er,
He gain'd by stress of arms the further shore.
When near the banks a village-swain he view'd,
Who brought his horse to water at the flood,
And onward held his way, nor thought of fear
To see one naked like Orlando near.

²¹ Angelica is mentioned again for the last time, Book xxx. ver. lili.

"Let me," the madman cried, "thy courser take,
With my good mare I mean th' exchange to make:

Look if thou wilt—behold she lies at hand,
For dead I left her there on yonder strand. 40
I left her dead—but well I know thy care
Will bind her wounds and every hurt repair.
Give me thy steed—and with him further pay
For such a fair exchange—dismount, I pray,
In courtesy to speed me on my way."

Lord laugh'd the swain, but answering not a word

The madman left, and turn'd him to the ford.
"Thou hear'st me not"—enrag'd Orlando cried,
"Give me thy horse"—and with a lengthen'd stride
Advancing swift, a staff the herdman shook 50
Of knotty oak, with which the earl he struck:
At this the Paladin was rous'd to ire,
He gnash'd his teeth, his eye-balls flash'd with fire.
With hand unarm'd¹ he dealt a crashing wound,
And stretch'd the peasant lifeless on the ground.
He mounts his steed, he scours the public ways,
And towns and villages in ruin lays:

No rest, no provender the beast he gives,
But in a few short days disabled leaves.
Nor will Orlando long on foot remain, 60
But soon by force another steed obtain:
Whate'er he meets his lawless prize he makes;
He kills the rider, and the courser takes.
Arriv'd at Malaga, the frantic knight
Fill'd every part with tumult and affright:

Such was the ravage of his fearful hand,
Two years sufficed not to recruit the land.
Such numbers slain he left where'er he pass'd,
Such buildings burnt, to earth so many cast,
That half the country look'd a dreary waste. 70

'T' Zizera he thence pursued his way,
That near the straits of Zibeltera lay.
There loosen'd from the strand a bark he view'd,
In which a troop for solace on the flood
Enjoy'd the freshness of the morning breeze,
And skim'd the surface of the tranquil seas:
On them Orlando call'd aloud to stay,
And him their partner in the bark convey.
In vain he call'd, when none to hear inclin'd;
A guest like him could little welcome find. 80

Swift o'er the level tide the vessel flies,
As sails the swallow through the liquid skies.
At this, with blows on blows Orlando drives
His steed, though loth, and at the sea arrives.
The steed reluctant enters in the waves,
Long vainly struggling: now the water laves
His knees and breast; now swells on either side,
Till scarce his head appears above the tide.
No more returning shall he quit the surge,
While o'er his ears the madman waves the scourge.
Ah! wretched steed! whose life must soon be lost,
Unless thou swimm'st to Afric's distant coast.
Now more and more, withdrawing from the land,
Orlando loses sight of hills and strand.
Far in the sea he wades; between his eyes
And objects lost the billows fall and rise:

Sul capo del pastore un pugno terra
Che spezza l'osso—

literally,

He struck the shepherd a blow on the head with his fist, and split his skull.

Till now unequal to the watery strife,
The steed concludes his swimming and his life:
He sunk, and with the steed had sunk his load,
But self-supported on the heaving flood, 100
His nervous arms and legs Orlando ply'd,
And from his mouth expell'd the briny tide;
While Fortune, that o'er madmen still presides,
From death preserves him, and to Setta guides;
Then lands him safe, where near arose in sight
The walls in distance twice an arrow's flight.
At length he found along the teated coast
Encamp'd in swarthy bands a countless host.
But let us leave the earl, till better time
To him again recall the wandering rhyme. 110

What next to fair Angelica befel,
Who late escap'd the madman's hand so well,
And how she found a ship in happy hour
To bear her safe for India's spicy shore;
There gave Medoro o'er her realms to reign,
Others may sing² in more exalted strain:
I hasten to the Tartar knight, who gain'd
Such conquest o'er his rival, as obtain'd
The fairest dame to fill a lover's arms
That Europe boasts in all her bloom of charms, 120
Since from our clime Angelica retir'd,
And Isabella chaste to Heaven aspir'd.

Though Mandricardo heard with conscious pride
The dame in his behalf the cause decide,
Yet short enjoyment could that chance afford,
When quarrels still on foot requir'd his sword.
There young Rogero call'd him to the field,
And claim'd the argest eagle on his shield:
Gradasso, king of Sericana's lands, 130
For Durindana here the fight demands.
King Agrament and king Marullius tried
To make each warrior's angry strife subside:
But nor Rogero will the Tartar knight
Permit to bear great Hector's shield in fight;
Nor stern Gradasso let the Tartar wield
The sword Orlando brandish'd in the field.

Then Agrament—"No more at variance fall,
Let chance of lots each knight to battle call:
And let us prove, whom Fortune first may name;
Of him she favours, I confirm the claim: 140
If yet you hold your sovereign's love so dear,
To what he offers lend a willing ear;
When lots decide who first the fight shall wage,
Let him, whose name appears, his faith engage
On his own head at once each strife to take,
And, conquering for himself, a conquest make
For either's claim; or if his loss ensue,
He, losing for himself, for each shall lose:"

² He returns to Orlando, B. xxxix. ver. 277.

³ Angelica and Medoro appear no more in the course of this work.

⁴ It may not be amiss to take a little retrospect,
in order to see how the matter was settled by Agrament,
which seems rather to require some explanation.
By the first lots that were drawn, the combatants stood thus: first, Rodomont and Mandricardo;
second, Mandricardo and Rogero; third,
Rodomont and Rogero; fourth, Mandricardo and Marphisa. The list being prepared for the fight between Rodomont and Mandricardo, while these knights are arming themselves a new dispute arises between them and Gradasso and Sacripant, for Durindana and Frontinus, which puts a stop to the expected combat between Rodomont and Mandri-

So nearly, held in equal balance, weighs
 Rogero's and Gradasso's martial praise, 150
 That he whose prowess can in combat stand
 With either knight, may prove his valiant hand
 At all amays—let conquest grace the side,
 Which Heaven's eternal justice shall provide :
 But no dishonour on the loser fall,
 What'er betide, impute to Fortune all."

Silent Rogero and Gradasso beard
 The prudent council of their king rever'd,
 And each agreed, whom chance the knight might make,

The cause of either on himself should take. 160
 The names inscrib'd within an urn they threw,
 And, shaking round, the lots a stripling drew,
 Wrote on the first Rogero's name they find,
 But bold Gradasso's name remain'd behind.
 What words can speak the joy Rogero feels,
 Soon as the fateful vase his lot reveals :

Nor less the Soricarian chief repines :
 But who shall that oppose which Heaven designs ?

And now Gradasso with officious cares 170
 Rogero for the dreadful list prepares ;
 By long experience in the fields of fight,
 To win the day instructs the youthful knight :
 His veteran skill directs him how to wield
 The trenchant sword, or lift the covering shield ;
 What to his arm the foe may open leave,
 Which stroke may reach, and which his aim deceive ;

When Fortune's offers to accept or shun,
 And all war's arts he points him one by one.
 The lists prepar'd ; ere since the lots were cast
 On either side the remnant day was past, 180
 As custom wills, in many a kind address
 (As each inclines) for either knight's success,
 And all the signs of love that parting friends express.

The people, eager to behold the fight,
 Throng every passage with the dawning light ;

cardo. Marphisa adds to the confusion by carrying off Brunello prisoner, whom she accuses of stealing her sword ; and Rogero, seeing the order of the lots disturbed, claims again his horse from Rodomont. Agramant, to settle the first disputa between Rodomont and Mandricardo, orders the cause to be determined by Doralis, who choosing Mandricardo, her former lover quits the camp with indignation. The list now remained according to the first lots, to be entered by Rogero and Mandricardo ; but Gradasso persisting still to claim Du-rindana from Mandricardo, Agramant proposes that lots should be again drawn to determine whether Rogero or Gradasso should first engage with Mandricardo ; and, to prevent future strife, proposes that whoever draws the lot of combats shall determine both his own claim and the claim of the knight who loses the lot ; that when Rogero wins or loses, he shall not only win or lose the eagle for himself, but Gradasso shall, in right of his conquest, or in consequence of his defeat, take possession of Durindana or relinquish his claim ;
 and in like manner Rogero shall in right of Gradasso's conquest, or in consequence of his defeat, continue to bear the shield of Hector, or relinquish the claim. In this last disposition of the lots, no provision seems to be made for the termination of Marphisa's quarrel with Mandricardo.

While some, impatient for the day's return,
 Wait in the list all night th' approach of morn.
 The vulgar herd, still caught with outward shows,
 Desire the noble knights in arms to close ;
 These judge not of events : but all whose mind 190
 Can from the present see what lurks behind,
 Midst whom Marcellus and Sobrino know
 What most can work their country's weal or woe,
 Condemn the fight, while Agramant they blame
 Through whom the quarrel to such issue came :
 Nor cess'd they to the monarch's thought to call
 What ruin must the Moorish race befall,
 Whether, by angry destiny decreed,
 Rogero or the Tartar prince should bleed :
 Since one such warrior lost must weaken more 200
 Their force to meet the son of Pepin's power,
 Than thousands slain, amidst whose numerous
 band

Not one perhaps could boast of heart or hand.
 King Agramant the important truth confess'd :
 But how repeal his grant ? In vain he press'd
 The noble knights, and each by turns address'd.
 He urg'd how weak their present cause of strife,
 How little such deserv'd the risk of life :
 But if they scorn'd to hear the sound of peace,
 At least some mouths might each from quarrel
 cease,

Till Charles was exil'd from th' imperial land, 211
 His crown and mantle won ; and from his hand
 The sceptre wrench'd, no more his sway to own,
 And Afric rais'd on Gallia's ruin'd throne.
 In vain to this, to that the monarch saes,
 Their sovereign both reverse, yet both refuse
 To yield in this, where he who first gives way
 They deem must all a soldier's fame betray.

But more than Agramant, and more than each
 That urg'd the Tartar with dissuasive speech, 220
 King Stordilano's lovely daughter strove
 With prayers and tears his steadfast mind to move ;
 Begg'd him to grant what Africa's prince requir'd,
 What with their prince the noblest peers desir'd.

" Ah ! me," she cried, " what more shall soothe
 my breast,

Or calm henceforth my troubled thoughts to rest ?
 When some new cause for ever can prevail
 To make these sheath thy limbs in plate and mail ?
 What have I gain'd, so late o'erjoy'd to find
 My hand decreed without the fight design'd ? 230
 With Sarza's chief—if still to risk thy life
 I view so soon another kindled strife ?

Alas ! in vain was once my proudest boast,
 That such a knight, the bravest of his host,
 Could for my beauty, prodigal of breath,
 Engage a squadron in the face of death ;
 Since now too late I find the slightest cause,
 For equal risk thy sword in battle draws :
 Nor was it love for these unhappy charms 239
 That urg'd thee then, but savage thirst of arms !

Yet if sincere, as all thy words would show,
 Love's faithful flames within thy bosom glow ;
 By love I here adjure thee, by the grief
 That rends my heart, and now implores relief ;
 Repine not though Rogero's hand may wield
 The argent eagle in an azure field.
 What good awaits, what evil can be thine,
 Should he retain it, or the crest resign ?
 Thy battle much may lose, but little gain :
 Should now thy arms Rogero's bird obtain, 250
 Small prize for mighty toil ! but shouldst thou find
 With face averted Fortune's hand unkind—

(Nor deem her ever fix'd) what tortures wait
This heart that shudders but to doubt thy fate!
Though life to thee so worthless may appear,
Thy judgment holds a painted bird more dear,
Yet, for my sake, prolong thy ratu'd breath,
The death of one includes the other's death;
But, ah! more wretched for my state most prove,
If first I see the death of him I love." 260

In words like these she pours the strain of woe,
While sighs to sighs in quick succession flow;
The live-long night her tender plaints increase,
The live-long night she woos her lord to peace,
While from her eyes, which trickling tears suffuse,
He sucks, with many a kiss, the balmy dew:
Then from her rosy lips new sweets he seeks,
Weeps to her words, and thus in answer speaks:

"For Heaven's dear sake, my fair, thy grief control,

Nor let so slight a cause afflict thy soul: 270
Eld' Charles and Afric's king, with all the bands
Collected here from French and Moorish lands,
Unite their force to work my single harm,
No terror should thy gentle breast alarm.

To thee my prowess little must appear,
If one Rogero thus can raise thy fear.
Thou mayst remember when I dauntless dar'd
(No sword or scimitar my side to guard)

With broken spear, amidst a numerous band,
To rush and quell them with my single hand. 280
Gradasso's self, though grief and shame oppress
His secret soul, if question'd will confess

That him in Syria once I captive made:
Yet not with his Rogero's worth is weigh'd.
Nor king Gradasso will a truth disown
Which to your ludero? well is known,

To Scarpant, who gives Cirassia fame;
Gryphon and Aquilant, of warlike name;
To hundreds more, that equal fortune found,
By cruel foes in captive fetters bound, 290

Alike of Mabomet and Christian seed,
Whom in one day this arm from bondage freed.
Still most remembrance wake in every thought
What mighty deeds that glorious day I wrought:

And shall Rogero now (a child to fame)
In single trial shake my martial name?
Fear'st thou Rogero, when in fight I wear
Great Hector's arms and Durindana bear?

Why did I not in listed field engage
With Sarza's king, for thee the fight to wage? 300
Such had my valour prov'd, thy constant mind
Had surely then Rogero's fall divid'd:

* This passage may be taken from Statius, where Argia endeavours to persuade Polynices to quit the siege of Thebes.

Risit Echionius juvenis, tenerumque dolorem
Conjuga amplexu solatur, et oscula moestis
Temperativa genis posuit—

—Solve metus animo— Theb. lib. ii.

The smiling hero clasps her to his breast,
And with the stamp of love her cheeks impress'd,
Prevents with blandishments the rising-tears,
And kindly then dispels her jealous fears. Lewis.

* Alluding to the adventure at the castle of the fairy, where he conquered Gradasso in single coun-bat, won the armour of Hector, and set so many prisoners at liberty. See note, B. xiv. ver. 240.

† He gives him this appellation as being a Spaniard, and the countryman of Doralis.

For Heaven's sake, calm thy doubts, thy grief
assuage,

Nor let these trickling tears so ill prestage:
For know 't is honour calls me to the field,
And not an eagle painted on a shield." 27

Thus he; while yet, with anxious fears oppress,
The fair in moving words her suit address'd;
Words that might shake the most determin'd soul,
Might softer rocks and savage beasts control. 310

A woman she, with beauty's naked charms,
So nearly vanquish'd him renown'd in arms,
He promis'd, if again the king requir'd
To stay the fight, to grant the peace desir'd.

But scarce Aurora had with light begun
To streak the East and usher in the Sun,
When bold Rogero, to defend his fame,
And to the glorious bird assert his claim,

Appears in arms, where crowds the list enclose,
And from his horn a stern defiance blows. 320
Soon as this sound, the rattling peal of war,
The Tartar roas'd, no longer will he bear

A word of peace, but from the couch he flies
With headlong speed, and loud for arms he cries;
While in his look such savage fury glares,
That Doralis herself no further dares

To plead for truce or peace, compell'd t' obey
Her knight's stern will, and give the battle way.
Himself his limbs in shining mail attires, 329
And scarce, impatient, waits th' attending squires;

Then mounts the generous courser, that before,
In combat, Paris' great defender bore.
Soon came the king, the nobles take their seat,
And soon in arms the eager knights must meet.

Already now their shining helms are lac'd,
In either hand each ashen lance is plac'd.
The signal sounds; and at the dreadful blast,
A thousand cheeks are pale and hearts aghast:

So fierce they pour t' obey the trumpet's call,
That earth appears to open, Heaven to fall! 340
On either hand each knight is seen to wield
The silver eagle on his honour'd shield:

The bird, that once in air could Jove sustain;
That oft was seen amidst th' embattled train,
With other pinions on Thessalia's plain.

While either knight, at such a hideous shock,
Seems as a tower to winds, to waves a rock;
The crashing spears break short, and to the sky
(As Turpin truly writes) the shivers fly;

Whence from the fiery region (strange to tell!) 350
Again on earth the burning fragments fell.
The knights, as those who know not terror, drew
Their flashing swords the combat to renew:

At either's helm they aim the trenchant steel:
Together met, at once their vizors feel
The fearful strokes; but neither knight would try
Ungenerous arts, or make the courser die

T' o'erthrow his lord—for wherefore should the steed
Who knows not battle's guilt in battle bleed?
Yet he who thinks the knights such compact
made,

But errs, and never heard the laws that sway'd 361
The times of old, when shameful was that arm
Esteem'd of all, that could the courser harm.

* Orlando.

† The poet alludes to the battles of Caesar and Pompey, where either army bore the Roman eagles;
he says with other pinions, the Roman eagle being black, the Etesian eagle white.

Their vizors struck, though fenc'd with double fold
Of temper'd plates, could scarce the tempest hold.
Swift and more swift the gleaming swords assail,
Blows follow blows,* descending thick as hail,
That breaks the trees, destroys the golden grain,
And marns the harvest of th' expecting swain.
Oft have you heard of Durindana's fame, 370
What fatal wounds from Balisarda came,
Judge what their strokes must prove which two such warriors aim.

But while so wary each his guard maintain'd,
No blow descended worthy either's hand:
The Tartar first his dreadful sword impell'd,
That through the middle of the buckler held
Its biting course, thence through the corselet
hew'd,

And to the flesh its cruel way pursu'd.
A wound so dreadful freezes every heart
Of those that favour'd good Rogero's part : 380
And would but Fortune so exert her sway,
To give the palm where general suffrage lay,
Stern Mandricardo soon must fall or yield ;
And thus this stroke offend'd half the field.
But sure some angel's interposing power
Preserv'd Rogero in that dangerous hour.
All terrible in wrath the warrior burn'd,
And to the foe his answer swift return'd :
At Mandricardo's helmet from above
He rais'd the sword, but with such haste he drove,

It fell not edgeways : nor the knight I blame, 391
Whose noble warantb deceiv'd his better aim.
And had not Balisarda fail'd to wound,
In vain the foe had Hector's helmet found.
So sorely Mandricardo felt the stroke,
Senseless he seem'd, the reins his hand forsook ;
And threatening heading thrice to fall, he reel'd,
While Brigiadoro cours'd around the field ;
That Brigiadoro, once Orlando's care,
Who still laments a foreign lord to bear. 400
Not with such rage the trodden serpent glows,
Not half so fierce the wounded lion shows,
As Mandricardo to himself restor'd
From the late fury of Rogero's sword :
The deeper wrath and pride inflam'd his breast,
The more his strength and valour shone confess'd.
He spurs his steed, and to Rogero flies,
He lifts his sword, and measures with his eyes,
High on his stirrups rais'd in fell design
With one fierce stroke to cleave him to the chine.
Rogero, heedful of the foe's intent, 411

While yet the hand hung threatening in descent,
Beneath his arm impell'd the pointed blade,
And through the mail an ample passage made,
Then from the wound with life-blood smoking drew
His Balisarda dy'd to crimson hue ;
And took such vigour from the stroke away,
That Durindana fell with lighter sway,
Though backward to his consurer's crupper sent,
His brows, with anguish writh'd, Rogero bent ; 420
And had his helm of common steel been fram'd,
That stroke had well the striker's force proclaim'd.
Rogero to his steed the spur applied,
And swift at Mandricardo's better side
The weapon aim'd, where jointed armour clos'd
With strongly temper'd plates, in vain oppos'd :
The fatal falchion, forg'd with potent charms,
Where'er it falls divides the strongest arms ;
Through plate and mail a speedy course it found,
And in the Tartar's side infix'd a wound ; 430

Who, loud blaspheming, with such fery roars,
As roaring ocean¹⁰ black with stormy waves,
Prepar'd to prove his strength, the fatal shield
That bears the eagle on its azure field,
With fierce impatience to the ground he cast,
And grasp'd with either hand his falchion fast.
" Full dearly hast thou prov'd," Rogero cried,
" Thou ill deserv'st the crest thou throw'st aside ;
Now thrown aside, cleft by thy sword before"¹¹,
Claim not to this thy right or title more." 440

Thus he ; but while he spoke was doom'd to feel
The fatal edge of Durindana's steel.
Divided sheer its force the vizor prov'd,
At happy distance from his face remov'd ;
Next through the saddle-bow, with dire descent,
Through iron plates the gleaming falchion went,
Through skirted mail the jointed cuirass found,
And in his thigh impress'd a ghastly wound.
From both the combatants the gushing tide
To purple hue their shining armour dy'd ; 450
That doubtful yet it seem'd of either knight
Who best might claim th' advantage of the fight :
But soon Rogero shall that doubt decide ;
The fatal sword, by which such numbers died,
He whirl'd around, and the sharp point impell'd
Where late the Tartar knight his buckler held :
Corselet and side he pierced with thrilling smart,
And found a passage to his panting heart,
His heart unguarded by his ample shield ;
Stern Mandricardo now to fate must yield ; 460
Must yield the eagle to its youthful lord ;
Must yield his title to the glorious sword ;
And ah ! for final issue to the strife,
With sword and target unust yield his dearer life.

He died ; nor yet without revenge he died,
For, ere the hostile weapon pierced his side,
His falchion, won so ill, he rais'd anew,
Whose edge had cleft Rogero's brows in two,
But that the wound the Tartar knight receiv'd,
Of wonted strength his furious arm bereav'd. 470
From Mandricardo as Rogero took
His wretched life, the Tartar aim'd the stroke ;
And through the helm, with unresist'd sway,
Deep Durindana forced its cruel way.
Back fell Rogero senseless on the ground,
A purple current gushing from the wound.
First fell Rogero, while the Tartar knight
Still kept his seat, as victor of the fight,
And each believ'd his valiant arm had gain'd
The wreath in such a glorious list obtain'd. 480
Fair Doralis, in that day's fight deceiv'd
With fears and hopes, th' event with all believ'd ;
And gave with lifted hands her thanks to Heaven,
For such an issue to the combat given :
But when appear'd to all the Pagan train
Rogero living, Mandricardo slain¹² ;

¹⁰ So Spenser when the monster is wounded by the Red-Cross knight :

He cry'd, as raging seas are wont to roar.

B. i. c. xi. st. 21.

¹¹ See ver. 376, where Mandricardo cuts through Rogero's shield.

¹² I believe every reader will agree that this combat is admirably described, that all the turns of fortune are painted in the most lively colours, the expectation artfully kept up, and the issue unexpectedly brought about by the death of Mandricardo and the victory of Rogero.

In different breasts new passions take their turn,
These smile that wept, and those that triumph'd mourn.

The king, the lords, and knights the most re-
nown'd,

To brave Rogero, scarcely from the ground 490
With anguish rais'd, a friendly greeting give,
And in their arms the conquering youth receive.
All with the knight rejoice, and all express
Sincere the thoughts their secret souls confess:
All save Gradasso, who within conceals
Far other feeling than his tongue reveals:
His outward looks the marks of joy impart,
But hidden envy rankles at his heart,
While oft he calls the lot of fate accurst
That from the urn disclos'd Rogero first, 500
How shall I speak the marks of love sincere
By royal Agramant, who held him dear,
Giv'n to the youth, without whose valiant hand
The king refus'd t' embark from Africa's land,
To spread his martial banners to the wind,
Or trust the force of all his powers combin'd?
And now by him the Tartar chief o'erthrown,
He deems all strength compris'd in him alone.

Not only to Rogero's weal inclin'd
The manly sex, but woman's gentler kind; 510
From Spain and Afric, many a lovely dame,
That with the banded powers to Gallia came,
With looks and tongue would now his worth and praise proclaim.

E'en Doralis, whose streaming eyes bewail
Her noble lover senseless, cold, and pale,
E'en she perchance had join'd the general voice,
But sense of shame, that curbs the female choice,
Forbade her speech—yet such his charms of face,
His courage, virtue, every winning grace,
That she who once had prov'd her wavering heart
So prompt to feel the point of Cupid's dart, 521
Rather than robb'd of love's soft bliss to live,
Her charms would gladly to Rogero give.
Her joys on living Mandricardo fed,
But what can profit Mandricardo dead?
Behoves her now to seek another guide,
Vigorous and young, that, ever at her side,
Might night and day for all her wants provide.

Meanwhile a leech, of every leech best read
In healing arts, was to Rogero led; 530
Each wound explor'd, he soon with looks assur'd
Pronounc'd the noble knight of life secur'd.
Now bade king Agramant with friendly care
Rogero to his royal tent to bear,
By night, by day to have him ever near,
So dear he lov'd him, held his life so dear.
Behind his bed on high the monarch plac'd
The shield and arms that Mandricardo grac'd,
Save Durindana, that all-famous sword,
Now made the prize of Sericana's lord; 540
Rogero won his arms and gallant steed,
Which good Anglante's knight in madness freed;
But him to Agramant Rogero gives,
Who gladly at his hand the gift receives.

Now leave we these¹³ awhile, and change the strain

To her who for Rogero mourns in vain:
'Tis mine to tell the heart-consuming cares
That Bradamant for her Rogero bears.

Hippalca now to Mount Albano came,
With certain tidings to the love-sick dame: 550
She told how late by Rodomont beset,
She lost Frontino, how at length she met
With Richardetto at the wizard's fount,
Rogero, and the lords of Agrismont;
That thence Rogero hasten'd to demand
Frontino taken from a damsel's hand;
But straying from the path, he fail'd to find
The Sarzan prince, and miss'd the fight design'd.
Then (as he will'd) the trusty maid explain'd
What from Albarw's walls the youth detain'd. 560

Thus she, and from her breast the lines she drew,
Those lines, which now the dame with alter'd hue
More sad than pleas'd receiv'd, with beating heart
Perusing that which little ead'd her smart:
For while she hop'd on him to feast her eye,
She found his words alone her bliss supply.
Hence on her lovely features mix'd appear
Soft disappointment and intruding fear;
Yet oft the leaf she kiss'd, while still she bent
Her thoughts on him whose hand the greeting sent.
Her sighs are fire to burn the amorous page, 571
Her tears are rivers that the heat assuage.
How oft she reads—how oft again inquires
What more from him, the lord of her desires,
The damsel brought; again the truth she knows;
Again she fears—again her sorrow flows;
And still had flow'd—but hope again repress'd
The doubts and fears that shook her tender breast.
Rogero said (and to Hippalca vow'd
By every saint to make his promise good) 580
Some twenty days should see her weep no more,
But to her sight her absent mate restore.

" Ah! who can Fortune's fickle turns decide,
That holds her rule o'er every state?" she cried,
" And chief in war, where every chance we prove,
Some chance may keep him ever from my love.
Alas! Rogero, who would e'er divine,
That whilst I lov'd thee with a love like mine,
Beyond myself—less friendship wouldst thou show
To me, to all—than to thy greatest foe! 590
To those thou shouldst oppose, thou giv'st success,
And whom thy arms should aid, thy arms oppress.
Shall we with praise or blame thy deeds regard,
That thou can punish and can thus reward?
Hast thou not heard (a story known so well)
That by Troyano's arms thy father fell?
And lo! thy sword Troyano's son attends,
From shame preserves him, and from death defends.
Is this thy vengeance for a parent slain?
Shall those who combat for his sake obtain 600
Such dire return, that weltering in their gore
Thou mak'st me still their wretched end deplore?"

The damsel thus her absent knight reproves,
And with her tears invokes whom most she loves:
Not once, but oft Hippalca, (gentle maid)
Would soothe her woes, would oft the fair persuade
To trust Rogero, and with patient mind
Await the period to her fears assign'd.
Hippalca's words and hope with these impress,
Hope ever present in the wretch's breast, 610
Assuage her grief, and urge her now to stay
At Mount Albano till th' expected day,
A day but ill observ'd—though him she lov'd,
For absence mourn'd unjustly she reprovd,
Whom now one cause, another now detain'd,
And thus his seeming breach of faith constrain'd.

Meanwhile in anguish on his painful bed
The youthful knight his feeble members spread,

¹³ He returns to Rogero and Agramant, B. XXXI.
ver. 577.

Struggling with death, from wounds receiv'd in fight,

From wounds inflicted by the Tartar knight. 620

Now came the day desir'd; from rosy morn
Till sable eve she waits his wish'd return;
No tidings known but what Hippalca brought;
And since her brother Richardetto taught,
How brave Rogero at his greatest need
His life had ransom'd and his kinsmen freed¹⁴;
All this she gladly hears, but with it hears
What mingles with her joy intruding fears:
Much was the talk of her, for female charms
No less extoll'd, than noble feats of arms; 630
Marphisa she, who with Rogero's sword
Had Afric's king to life and hope restor'd.
So brave a friend might Bradamant approve,
But here a thousand doubts alarm'd her love.
No light suspicion had the dame possess'd,
That were Marphisa fair, as fame express'd,
Such friendship might by slow degrees impart
A warmer passion to his gentle heart.

But now she ebides the thought; again she cheers
Her mind with hope; again by turns she fears; 640
At Mount Albano still resolves t' await

In all the tumult of her anxious state,
The day that must decide her doubtful fate.

As there she stay'd, the lord¹⁵ of that fair tower
Who of his brethren first the title bore,

(Not first in birth, but first in mighty name,
For two in birth¹⁶ asserted earlier claim)

Rinaldo, who with martial prowess won
All praise from them, as from the stars the Sun,

The castle reach'd at early dawn of day, 650
One page alone attendant on his way.

While thus he pass'd, as wont, from place to
The flight of fair Angelica to trace, [place

Near Paris' walls he heard th' unwelcome hour
Approach'd, that to the fell Maganzen's¹⁷ power

Must Malagigi and must Vivian yield;
And hence to Agrismont his course he held,

Where soon he found that, freed from slavish bands
By brave Rogero and Marphisa's hands,

Their foes o'erthrown or slain, the brother-pair 660
And Richardetto with their friends to share

The general joy, to Mount Albano went:
Rinaldo, at the great deliverance sent,

No less rejoic'd; and deem'd each day a year
That kept him far from those he held so dear.

To Mount Albano hence with eager haste
Rinaldo came, and there his friends embrac'd,

His wife¹⁸, his brethren, every kindred name,
But chiefly those who late from thraldome came.

¹⁴ Vivian and Malagigi. See Book xxvi.

¹⁵ Rinaldo.

¹⁶ Guichardo and Richardo. ¹⁷ Bertolagi.

¹⁸ The discovery here first made of Rinaldo's marriage, will doubtless surprise the English reader, as not the least hint has been given of such a circumstance in any former part of the poem: her name is indeed mentioned in Boyardo. (See note to book xxxi. ver. 473.) But by all the romance writers he is described to be a married man; and in the poem of Tasso, called after his name, Rinaldo, is a full account of his love for Clarice and history of his marriage. However, there is certainly something very strange in the conduct of Ariosto in this matter, which must affect the character of his hero.

Each round the Paladin impatient clung 670

With fond delight, and on his aspect hung:

As round their dam rejoice the callow brood,

When in her bill she brings th' expected food.

Two days he stay'd, the third his home forsook,

And with him all his martial kindred took:

With him Richardo, Richardetto rode,

Guichardo, eldest born of Amon's blood:

Th' example Vivian and Alardo warn'd,

And Malagigi with the warriors arm'd.

But Bradamant, who there expecting stay'd, 680

To plead excuse a sudden sickness feign'd

That from so brave a troop her arms detain'd.

Well might the noble virgin then complain,

Though not of fever, or corporeal pain:

Sick with desire, her soul was doom'd to prove

The cruel, strange vicissitudes of love.

His banner thus from Mount Albano spread,

The flower of all his train Rinaldo led:

How these to Paris came, what thence befel, 690

In aid of Charles, th' ensuing book shall tell.

BOOK XXXI.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rinaldo and his companions, in their way to the Christian camp, meet an unknown knight, who challenges them to run at tilt. Richardetto, Alardo, and Guichardo, are overthrown. Rinaldo then engages the stranger; but neither having the advantage, Rinaldo dismisses his train, and the two champions proceed to try their strength on foot, till they are parted by the night. The stranger discovers himself to Rinaldo. They overtake Rinaldo's companions, and arrive together near Paris, where they are joined by Gryphon and Aquilant. Rinaldo hears the news of Orlando's madness. Rinaldo and his company attack the trenches of the Moors by night, and are joined by Charles. Valour of Rinaldo. Bradamant goes with Floridella in search of Orlando; his adventure at Rodomont's bridge. The forces of Agramant are defeated with great slaughter, and Agramant himself constrained to retreat to Arli. Gradasso seeks out Rinaldo, and challenges him to finish the combat formerly begun between them for Bayardo: a day is appointed, and the two knights meet to decide their difference.

WHAT state of man such rapture can impart

As the soft passions of an amorous heart?

What life so blest as his, deserv'd to prove

With pleasing chains the servitude of Love;

But that the foe of every love-born breast,

That fear, suspicion, that all-dreadful pest

Call'd Jealousy, the bane of human joys,

With oaken'd¹⁹ both the lover's peace destroys?

Whatever else embitters for a while

Life's sweetest cordial, serves but as a foil 10.

To enhance the good: as water to the taste

Of those who thirst, or food to those who fast:

And he, who never war's destruction knows,

Can prize not peace, nor aught that peace bestows.

And while we pine, with longing eyes disjoint'd

From objects ever present to the mind,

Reflection tells, that absence must improve
The dear delight of meeting those we love:
'T is thus, unrecompens'd, we can sustain
A length of service, while the hopes remain 20
That every year of loyal duty past
Shall find, though late, its full reward at last:
Remembrance still of once corroding cares,
Repulse, disdain, all that a lover bears
To rend his soul, gives joy a double zest,
When joy renews the sun-shine of the breast.
But if that plague, from Hell's dire mansion brought,
Infects with deadly bane the secret thought,
Thenceforth shall pleasure woo the sense in vain,
All pleasure then corrupted turns to pain. 30
Lo! this the fatal stroke, the venom'd wound,
For which no salve, no medicine can be found.
Here sought avails—nor verse, nor sage's care,
Nor long observance of a kindly star:
Nor all th' experienc'd charms approv'd of yore
By Zoroaster skill'd in magic lore.
O Jealousy! that every woe exceeds,
And soon to death the wretched sufferer leads:
Thou canst with cruel falsehood reason blind,
And burst the closest ties that hold mankind. 40
O Jealousy! in whose dire tempest tost,
Has hapless Bradamant each comfort lost!
I speak not here of thoughts that first depress'd
With tender doubts and fears her virgin breast,
From what Hippalca and her brother said;
But heavier tidings to her ears convey'd
By later means; such tidings as in woe
Plung'd her more deep, which soon the Muse shall show.

But to Rinaldo now * I turn the strain,
Who led to Paris' walls his martial train. 50
Next day, at evening close, a knight they spied
Advancing near, a damsel at his side:
Black was his surcoat, black his mournful shield,
Save that a bend of argent cross'd the field.
He Richardetto challeng'd to the course,
Who by his aspect seem'd a chief of force;
And he, who pass'd not, when to combat dar'd,
Wheel'd round his steel, and for the tilt prepar'd.
No further parley held; with equal speed
These noble knights, to win the victor's need, 60
Together rush'd: apart Rinaldo stood,
And, with his warlike friends, th' encounter view'd.
" Firm let me guide the spear, and soon I trust
To stretch my rival headlong in the dust—"
Thus to himself bold Richardetto thought,
But different far his adverse fortune wrought.
Full on his helm, beneath the vizor's sight
With such a fury drove the stranger-knight,
He bore him from the seat, with matchless strength,
Beyond his courser twice the lance's length. 70
To avenge the fall Atardo turn'd his rein
With ready speed, but sudden on the plain
Senseless he fell: so cruel was the stroke,
Through plated shield the thundering weapon broke.
Full soon his spear in rest Guichardo held,
Who view'd his brethren prostrate on the field;
Though loud Rinaldo cried—" Forbear the fight,
To me the third attempt belongs by right "
Thus he: but while he stood with helm unslac'd,
Guichardo eager, with preventive haste, 80

Th' encounter dar'd; nor better could maintain
His seat, but with his brethren press'd the plain.
With emulation next their force to prove,
Richardo, Vivian, Malagigi move:
But now prepar'd, Rinaldo first address'd
His ready weapons, and their speed repress'd.
" Time summons us," he cries, " to Paris' walls;
And ill it seems, when such high duty calls,
To loiter here—nor will I wait," he said,
" Till each of you by turns on earth is laid." 90
This to himself he spoke, which loud proclaim'd
Had touch'd his comrades, and their courage sham'd.

Each warrior now had measur'd on the field
The space to run, and each his courser wheel'd.
Rinaldo fell not, for his single hand
Compris'd the strength of all the knightly band:
Like brittle glass the spears in shivers broke;
Yet shruok not back the warriors from the stroke
One foot, one inch,—while with the sudden force
Driven on his crupper fell each warrior-horse: 100
But swift Bayardo rose, as swift pursu'd
His interrupted course with speed renew'd:
Not so the adverse steed, that tumbling prone
His shoulder lux'd and broke his spinal bone.
The champion, who his slaughter'd courser view'd,
His stirrups left, and soon dismounted stood,
To Amos's gallant son (whom near he spy'd
With hand unarm'd in sign of truce) he cried:

" Sir knight! the trusty steed that lifeless here
Lies by thy force, I held, while living, dear; 110
And knighthood sure must feel a deadly stain,
To let him thus without revenge be slain.
Come on— exert thy skill, thy utmost might,
For thou and I must prove a closer fight."
Rinaldo then—" If for thy courser dead,
And this alone, thou to the strife art led,
Dismiss thy care—and one from me receive,
Equal to him whose death thou seem'st to grieve."
" Ill dost thou judge," the stranger thus rejoind.
" If for a courser's loss thou think'st my mind 120
So sore distress'd—bear what I now demand—
As fits a knight, with sword to sword in hand,
To prove thy further nerve—if thou as well
Canst wield thy weapon, or canst mine excel.
Thou, as thou wilt, on foot, or from the steed
Pursue the fight, but let the fight succeed.
I ask but this—be each advantage thine,
So much I thirst to match thy arm with mine."

Thus he, nor in suspense Rinaldo stay'd—
" The battle claim'd I here engage," he said, 130
" And to remove thy doubts of this my train,
Let all depart and I alone remain.
One only page I here retain, to hold
My trusty steed"—So spoke the baron bold,
And, as he spoke, dismiss'd his noble band:
They part observant to their lord's command.
The courtesy by good Rinaldo shown,
Claim'd all the praises of the knight unknown.
The Paladin alighting, with the rein
Intrusts his page Bayardo to detain. 140
And when no more his standard he beheld,
Already now far distant on the field,
His buckler firm embracing, from his side
He drew the falchion, and the knight defy'd.

Thus was the fight begun, and ne'er between
Two noble chiefs was deadlier combat seen:
Each little deem'd at first th' opponent's strength
Would draw the trial to such dangerous length.
By turns huge strokes they give, by turns receive:
And neither yet has cause t' exult or grieve. 150

* Zoroaster, a king of the Bactrians, famous for his knowledge in the occult sciences.

* He returns to Bradamant, Book xxvii. ver. 71.

With valour skill combines; and wide around
 Loud echoes spread the batter'd armour's sound.
 Piecemeal to earth their riven shields they send,
 Lay bare the mail, and plates asunder rend.
 Here less imports an arm to reach the foe,
 Than well-taught art to ward each coming blow;
 Where both so equal in the dangerous strife,
 The first mistake might hazard fame and life.
 Thus held the fight, till in his wavy bed
 The sinking Sun had veil'd his golden head, 160
 And now from shore to shore's extremest bound
 Night's sable shade had veil'd th' horizon round.
 No rest each warrior knows—no little cause
 Can stay that sword which rival glory draws:
 That sword which rancour nor revenge could raise
 To mortal arms, but restless thirst of praise.

Meantime Rinaldo ponder'd in his thought
 What unknown warrior so undaunted fought,
 Who not alone withstood his fiercest might,
 But oft his life endanger'd in the fight; 170
 And now he gladly would the combat cease,
 (Did fame permit) and join their hands in peace.
 Not less the stranger-knight (who little knew
 That he, who 'gainst him now his weapon drew
 From malice free, was Mount Albano's lord)
 Confess'd the thunder of his rival's sword,
 By none surpris'd; and wish'd, but wish'd in vain,
 The fight untry'd to avenge his courser slain.
 Fain would he now the dangerous sport elude,
 But conscious honour such design withstood. 180
 Deep and more deep the glooms of evening rose,
 Till darkness seem'd to mock their random blows:
 Ill could they strike, and worse could ward the blade,
 Conceal'd in either's hand with murky shade.

The lord of Mount Albano first address'd
 His gallant foe—"The hour requires to rest:
 Defer the fight till slow Aroturos' wain
 Has left its place in Heaven's o'er-spangled plain.
 Meanwhile in our pavilion shalt thou meet
 A friendly welcome and secure retreat, 190
 Attended as ourself, and at our hands
 Receive such honour as thy worth demands."

Thus far Rinaldo: nor in vain he spoke,
 His proffer'd grace the courteous baron took:
 And now Rinaldo from his ready squire
 Receiv'd a stately steed with rich attire,
 To sword and spear well train'd in every fight,
 And with this gift he grac'd the stranger knight,
 Who knew ere long the chief with whom he came
 Was Clairmont's leader, as by chance the name 200
 Escap'd his lips, while journeying thus they went
 To join the warriors at Rinaldo's tent.

These noble knights were near by kindred ties,
 Brethren by blood; and hence new passions rise,
 That conflicts in the stranger's bosom more,
 Who sheds the mingled tear of joy and love.
 This youth was Guido savage's, who before
 On stormy seas such toils and dangers bore

* This Guido was the champion with whom Marphisa fought amongst the Amazons, (see Books xix. and xx.) and who afterwards with Gryphon, Aquilan, and Sansonetto, being sworn to defend the law made by Pinabello, was cast down by the enchanted light of Rogero's shield: the poet gives no further account of him till his meeting with Rinaldo in this book, nor does it appear how or where he parted from the other knights: the lady in his company was Aleria his favourite

With Olivero's son's, Marphisa bold,
 And Sansonetto, as the Muse has told. 210
 This knight, in Pinabello's fraudulent hands
 A prisoner fall'n, was held in shameful bands
 From his lov'd friends, and there compell'd was stay'd

To enforce an impious law his host had made.
 Guido, who now with eager gaze beheld
 Rinaldo, who in arms such chiefs excell'd;
 On whom so oft he wish'd to bend his sight,
 As sighs the blind to view the long-lost light,
 With transport thus began—"O honour'd lord!
 What ill-starr'd chance could ever lift my sword
 On one, for whom such rooted love I feel, 221
 For whom, o'er all, I glow with kindly zeal?
 My name is Guido—the Constantia bore
 To noble Amon on the Euxine shore:
 Not less than thine my ancestry I trace,
 An alien branch of Clairmont's noble race:
 A fond desire my journey hither drew,
 Thyself and all my kindred friends to view;
 But when I reverence meant, behold I give Such greeting only foes from foes receive! 230
 If to my fault indulgence may be shown,
 Thy valiant followers and thyself unknown,
 O say, what fair amends can such offence atone?"

Courteous he said; and now on either side
 Th' embrace exchange'd, Rinaldo thus reply'd:
 "Here cease—no more disturb thy generous mind
 To excuse the fight, since from our ancient kind
 Thou spring'st a genuine shoot—no proof we claim
 Beyond the last to speak thy lineal fame.
 Thy birth were doubtful, were thy courage less, 240
 But high-sou'd thoughts a race as high confess.
 No lions fierce from timorous deer proceed;
 Nor doves from eagles or from falcons breed."

So spoke the knights, and now their way pursu'd,
 And, as they pass'd, their friendly talk renew'd.
 The tent they reach'd, where to his comrades bold,
 Of savage Guido found, Rinaldo told;
 That Guido whom so long they wish'd to view,
 Whom Fortune thither to their wishes drew.
 The welcome tidings gladden'd every breast, 250
 And all in him his mighty sire confess'd.
 I pass the greetings of his noble race,
 How oft, with joy unhop'd, the food embrace
 Sage Malacigi, Richardetto brave,
 Alardo, Aldiger, and Vivian gave:
 How lords and knights to him observance paid,
 What he to them, and they in answer said.
 At every time the kinsmen had beheld
 Guido with joy—but now the joy excell'd
 Beyond compare, when public need requir'd 260
 Each arm and sword, and every bosom fir'd.

Now rose the Sun from ocean's blue profound,
 With orient rays his shining temples bound:
 When with the brethren, all the warrior-kind
 Of Amon's race, the banners Guido join'd.
 Day following day, the band their march pursu'd,
 Till now the shores of winding Seine they view'd;
 Whence, scarce ten miles remote, the guarded towers

Of Paris rose, besieg'd by Pagan powers.

wife, whom he brought from the land of the Amazons.

* Alluding to the storm before they landed amongst the Amazons.

† Gryphon and Aquilan.

Here Gryphon with his Aquilant they found, 278
The brother chiefs for arms of proof renown'd,
Of Sigismunda born—with these appear'd
A dame, that seem'd far other than the herd
Of vulgar females; splendid to behold
Round her white vesta she wore a fringe of gold.
Lovely her mien, replete with every grace,
Though tears stood trembling on her mournful face,
While by her gestures and her looks intent,
She seem'd on some important converse bent. 279

These knights to Guido known, nor less to these
Was he, with whom so late they plough'd the seas.
"Behold a pair," he to Rinaldo cries,
"Whose like in battle scarce the world supplies:
Let these for Charles with us united stand,
And soon I trust will shrink you Pagan band."
Rinaldo then confirm'd the praise he gave,
And own'd each warrior brave amongst the brave;
One clad in white, and one in sable vest,
And each in arms of sumptuous fashion drest.
No less the brother champions saw and knew 290

Rinaldo, Guido, all the generous crew;
These greeting fair Rinaldo, they embrac'd,
And cast a veil o'er all unkindness past:
Time was, at strife (which now were long to tell)
The gallant warriors, for Truffaldin⁶ fell!
But now in brothers' love and friendship join'd,
All former hate was scatter'd to the wind.
To Sansonetto next (the last who came)
Rinaldo turning, to his noble name
Due honours paid, for oft Albano's knight 300
His praise had heard, and own'd his force in fight.

When now the dame more near Rinaldo drew,
And mark'd (for well each Paladin she knew)
His mien and arms—sho to the generous chief
Disclos'd a tale that fill'd his soul with grief.
"O prince!" she said, "thy kinsman so belov'd,
"Whose saving arm our church, our empire prov'd,
Orlando, once so wise, so far renown'd
For deeds of prowess, roves the world around,
Of better sense distraught; nor can I tell 310
From what strange cause this dire mischance befel.

These eyes beheld his cuirass, sword and shield
Dispers'd at random o'er the wood and field:
A courteous knight I saw⁷ with pious pains
Collect the mail and weapons from the plains,

⁶ Truffaldin was a Pagan in Albracca, who, taking Sacripant prisoner by surprise, offered treacherously to betray the city into the hands of king Azrican; but the proposal was generously rejected by Agrican. Having possession of the fort, he refused admittance to Orlando till Angelica had promised him protection from punishment. The knights were divided in parties about him. Rinaldo fought with Gryphon who defended him. Orlando, being armed by Angelica, left the walls to engage with Rinaldo. At length Rinaldo having seized Truffaldin dragged him at his horse's tail, and put an end to his life.

Orl. Innam. b. i. c. xiv. xx. xxvi.

⁷ Flordelis, as the reader may recollect, was prevent when Zerbino and Isabella collected together the arms of Orlando, and was witness to the combat between Zerbino and Mandricardo, in which the former received his death's wound; but it does not appear that Flordelis knew either Zerbino or Isabella.

And these collecting on a sapling near
In martial pomp the splendid trophy rear.
But thither came, on that ill-fated day,
The son of Agrican, who bore away
The hapless champion's sword—think what dis-
grace,

What loss may thus attend the Christian race, 321
That Durindana, by the Tartar worn,
Should once again a Pagan's side adorn!
With this he Brigliadoro thence convey'd,
That near ocean'd without a master stray'd.
Few days are pass'd since I Orlando left
Naked, devoid of shame, of sense bereft;
Who (strange to tell) unhous'd, unshelter'd lies,
And fills each cave and wood with dreadful cries."
She said; and told how on the bridge she view'd,
Where close engag'd with Rodomont he stood, 331
Till both, embrac'd, fell headlong in the flood.

"To every chief that held Orlando dear,"
The dame pursu'd, "to every courteous ear
The tale I tell, till one with pious care
To Paris, or some friendly place, shall bear
The wretched chief, and art or medicine find
To cure the pithiness of his moon-struck mind:
And ah! could Brandimart his sufferings know,
How would his soul with tender pity glow, 340
And every means essay to heal his kinsman's woe!"

This dame was Flordelis, the lovely wife
Of Brandimart, far dearer than his life:
At Paris him she sought, but sought in vain:
And now she told how, midst the Pagan train,
Debate and hatred for that famous sword
Embroid'rd Gradasso and the Tartar lord:
Till Mandricardo stem of life bereft,
The fatal sword was to Gradasso left.

Struck with the news Rinaldo stood oppress'd, 350
And thrilling sorrow fill'd his noble breast:
His heart in melting softness seem'd to run,
Like fleecy snows dissolving to the Sun;
Like Resolv'd, where'er forlorn Orlando stray'd,
To trace his steps, and yield him friendly aid;
But since by chance, or Heaven's all-ruling mind,
He saw near Paris' walls his squadron join'd,
He first decreed to raise the siege, and chase
From royal Charles th' exulting Pagan race;
But, anxious for th' event, delay'd th' assault 360
Till night had shaded o'er th' ethereal vault,
And through the camp the toils of day had shed
Lothean sleep on every drowsy head.

Far in the wood, to wait th' appointed hour,
All day conceal'd he kept his banded power:
But when the Sun the darkening skies forsook,
And to the lower world his journey took;
When harmless serpents⁸, bears, and all the train
Of fabled beasts, adorn the stary plain,
'Unseen in presence of the greater light, 370
Rinaldo leads his troop, and to their might
With Vivian, Guido's, Sansonetto's fame,
Adds Gryphon, Aquilant, Alardo's name.
His first attack surpris'd the sleeping guard,
And these he slew; for no defence prepar'd:
The trembling Moors, in evil hour, perceive
No cause for mirth, but ample cause to grieve.

⁸ By this expression are meant the constellations of stars, to which the poets have affixed the names of the goat, the bull, the lion, the serpent, and other animals, feigned to have been placed in the Heavens.

How should a naked, timorous, feeble train
With such a force th' unequal strife maintain?
To strike the Saracens with deeper dread, 360
When to the charge his band Rinaldo led,
He pour'd the horn and trumpet's clangour round,
And bade each tongue his well-known name re-
sound.

Touch'd by the spur, Bayardo seem'd not slow,
But leapt at once the trenches of the foe:
The foot he trampled, and the horse o'erturn'd,
And tents to earth and rich pavilions spurn'd.
Amid the Pagans none so bold appear'd,
But every hair was bristled when they heard
Rinaldo's name above the tumults rise, 390
And Mount Albano echoed to the skies.
Swift led the troops of Spain, as swift the Moor,
None stay'd behind their riches to secure.
Him Guido follow'd, and with equal might
The sons of Olivero rush'd to fight.

Not less Richardo, nor Alardo less,
With Aldiger and Vivian, cleave the press:
Guichardo next with Richardetto moves,
And each in arms his single valour proves.
Seven hundred that in Mount Albano dwell'd 400
And round the neighbouring towns, Rinaldo held
Beneath his rule: these rais'd the fearless band
In heat or cold, a firm determin'd band.

Not braver troops of old Achilles sway'd,
Though the gaunt Myrmidons his word obey'd.
Each in himself such dauntless force compris'd,
A hundred here a thousand foes despis'd.
Though good Rinaldo⁹ might not boast to hold
Extended land, or heaps of tressur'd gold:
Yet such his conduct, such his fair regard 410
To every warrior, while with all he shar'd
His little store, that none amidst the crew
For proffer'd favour from his side withdrew.

From Mount Albano ne'er these bands he took,
But when some weighty cause their arms bespoke
In parts remote; and now to aid his prince
He left his castle-walls with weak defence.
This train, assailing now the Moorish host,
This matchless train whose valour's praise I boast,
So rag'd, as on Galeus¹⁰ verdant mead 420
The savage wolf amidst the woolly breed:
Or oft as near Ciniphius¹¹ held in chase,
The lordly lion rends the bearded race.

Imperial Charles (who heard Albano's force
Prepar'd t' attack the camp with silent course)
Stood ready arm'd, and at th' expected hour
Join'd, with his Paladins¹², Rinaldo's power.

⁹ The low state of Rinaldo's finances is mentioned in several of the old romances; and in the adventure of the fairy of riches in Boyardo, where he is set at liberty by Orlando, he attempts to carry off a chair of solid gold, alleging that it will furnish the pay of his troops: this action of Rinaldo, and some other passages in the romances, will serve to explain the observation of the curate and barber in their scrutiny of Don Quixote's library, where Rinaldo and his train are called greater thieves than Cacus. Ariosto, in taking up the story, has judiciously dropped this part of his character.

¹⁰ Galeus, a river near Tarentum, where the sheep, from the fertility of the pasture, had remarkably thick wool.

¹¹ The Ciniphians were a people of Africa, whose country was extremely fruitful.

¹² In the xviiiith book, ver. 339, he tells us that

With him came wealthy Moundonies' son¹³
Whose love and truth fair Flordeis had woo.
Him long she sought, and now, from far reveal'd, 430
Observed his buckler blazing o'er the field.

When Brandimart his dearest consort view'd,
The fight forgotten, gentler thoughts ensu'd:
He ran, he held her close in speechless bliss,
And press'd her lips with many an ardent kiss.

Great was the trust of ancient times display'd
In the fair consort or the blooming maid,
Who, unaccompanied, could safely rove
In lands unknown, through mountain, field, or grove,
And, when returning, found their dear-belid
name 440

Clear as their form from breath of tainting fame!
Here to her lord the dame began to tell
What dreadful chance Angiante's knight befel:
Not from report the fatal tale she drew:
Her mournful eyes had prov'd th' event too true.
Then of the bridge she told, where every knight
Was stay'd by Rodomont in dangerous fight,
Who vests and armour, won from chiefs o'erthrown,
Had hung to grace the monumental stone.

She told, how far transcending every thought, 450
She saw the deeds by mad Orlando wrought,
Who on the bridge engaged the Pagan foe,
And headlong plunged him in the flood below.
But Brandimart, who dear Orlando lov'd,
With truth by friends, by sons, by brothers prov'd,
Resolv'd, through every threaten'd toil, to find
The wretched earl, and heal his frantic mind.

In armour dight, he mounted on his steed,
And took the path his dame prepar'd to lead
To where she late unblest Orlando view'd. 460

Now near they drew where Algiers' monarch stood
To guard the bridge: and now, arriv'd in sight,
The ready watchman to the Pagan knight
The wonted signal gave; and lo! with speed
His squire attending brought his arms and steed,
His arms were leas'd, his foaming courser rein'd,
What time good Brandimart the banks had gain'd:

Then, with a thundering voice in impious pride,
To Brandimart the ruthless Pagan cried—
"Who'er thou art, by fortune hither led 470
Through error or design these shores to tread,
Alight, despoil thine arms, and yonder tomb
Grace with the trophy ere I seal thy doom;
And give thy life a victim for the sake
Of her pale ghost—then shall my fury take
What thou mayst now thy willing offering make."

He ended—Brandimart indignant burn'd,
An answer with his spear in rest return'd:

Battolo spur'd (his gentle courser's name
Battolo call), he with such ardour came 480
To meet the foe, as well his strength proclaim'd
A match for all in lists of combat fam'd;

While Rodomont as swift to battle drew,
And o'er the bridge with hoofs rebounding flew.
His steed, that oft the narrow pass had tried,
And oft, as fortune chanced, on either side
Had headlong plunged, now ran without dismay,
Nor fear'd the perils of the downward way.
Battolo, little us'd such path to keep,
Shook in each joint to view the fearful steep: 490

the Paladins, except Ugero and Olivero, were made prisoners, and no mention has been since made of their deliverance.

¹³ Brandimart.

Trembles the bridge, and to the burthen bends,
The bridge, whose sides nor fence nor rail defends.
Alike their bear-like spears the warriors drove,
Such as they grew amid their native grove:
Alike they rush'd, and in the meeting strife,
Well far'd each generous steed to 'scape with life;
Yet both at once before the shock gave way,
And on the bridge beneath their riders lay:
The spur had row'd them, but the plank unmeet
No space afforded to their foundering feet: 500
Plunged in the stream both equal fortune found,
And with their fall made waves and skies resound.
So roar'd out Po, receiving in his tide
The youth⁴ that ill his father's light could guide.
Prone sunk the courser with the ponderous weight
Of either knight, that firmly kept his seat,
While to the river's secret bed they fell,
To search what Nymph or Naiad there might dwell.
Not this the first or second venturous leap
The Saracen had prov'd: hence well the deep, 510
The shallow well he knew; where roll'd the flood
With bottom firm, where soft with ooze and mud.
Head, breast, and sides, triumphant o'er the waves
He rears, and now at great advantage braves
The Christian knight, whose courser whirling round
An eddy buries in the sands profound;
Where deep infix'd, and by no strength releas'd,
Certain destruction threatens man and beast.
The water, foaming with resistless force,
Bears to the deepest current knight and horse, 520
Together roll'd—while Brandimart beneath
His steed lies struggling in the jaws of death.
Fair Flordelis afflicted, from above,
Tears, vows, and prayers, employs to save her love.
"Ah! Redomont, by her, whom dead thy soul
Reveres so high, thy cruel thoughts control:
Permit not here, by such inglorious death,
So true, so brave a knight to yield his breath.
Ah! courteous lord, if e'er thy heart could love,
Think what for him my bleeding heart must prove: 530

Suffice that now he bears thy captive chain,
Suffice with thee his arms and vest remain;
And know, of all by right of conquest thine,
No nobler spoils adorn the virgin-shrine."

She said, and such persuasive prayers address'd
As touch'd the Pagan king's obdurate breast:
Then to her lord his saving hand he gave,
Her lord whom buried deep beneath the wave
His courser held, where without thirst he quaff'd
Compell'd from rushing streams the plenteous draught: 540

But ere the Pagan would his aid afford,
He took from Brandimart his helm and sword;
Then drew the knight half lifeless to the shore,
And closed, with others, in the marble tower.

Soon as the dame beheld him captive led,
All comfort from her tender bosom fled;
Yet less she mourn'd than at the dreadful sight,
When late the stream o'erwhelm'd her faithful
knight.

Now self-reproach oppress'd her gentle thought:
By her the luckless chief was thither brought, 550
By her he fell, by her was captive made,
And Flordelis her Brandimart betray'd |

Deparing thence, she ponder'd in her mind
Some gallant knight of Pepin's court to find;

The Paladin Rinaldo far renown'd,
Guido, or Sansonetto, fearless found
At all assays, some chief whose matchless hand
Might dare the Saracen by flood or land;
Who, though not braver than her own true knight,
With fortune more to friend might wage the fight.
Full long she journey'd ere she chanced to greet 561
A champion for such bold encounter meet,
Whose arm in battle might the task achieve
T' o'erthrow the Pagan, and her lord relieve
From cruel thrall: full many a day she sought,
Till chance before her sight a warrior brought
Of gallant men, whose arms a surcoat bore
With trunks of cypress fair embroider'd o'er:
But who the knight some future time shall tell⁵,
First turn to what at Paris' walls befel, 570
Where deep destruction crush'd the Moorish bands
From Malagigi and Rinaldo's hands.

The countless numbers chas'd in speedy flight,
Or driven to Stygian realms from upper light,
The mantling shade from Turpin's view conceal'd,
Else had his page the slain and fled reveal'd.
To Agrament a knight the news convey'd,
Who, lock'd in sleep, in his pavilion laid,
No danger heard; and only wak'd to know,
Swift flight alone could save him from the foe. 580
He starts from rest, he casts around his eyes,
And guideless, disarray'd, his soldiers' spies;
Naked, unarm'd, now here, now there they yield
No time allow to grasp the fencing shield.
Confus'd in counsel, and in thought distress,
The monarch fits his cuirass to his breast,
When Falsirones, (sprung from boasted race)
Grandonio, Balugantes, near the place
Approach'd, his danger to the king betray,
That death or slav'ry threats the least delay; 590
And could be thence his person safely bear,
He well might boast propitious Fortune's care.

Marsilius thus, alike Sobrino sage,
With all the peers (whom equal cares engage)
Would urge his flight, while by Rinaldo led Destruction pointed at the monarch's head.
He, with the remnants of his routed train,
In Arli or Narbona might remain:
Both strongly built, and both provided well
With martial stores, could long a siege repel: 600
Himself preserv'd, his bands with new supplies
Recruited, on some future day might rise
T' avenge his own disgrace, the nation's shame,
On Christian Charles and all the hated name.

King Agrament at length, compell'd to yield,
Consents for Arli's town to quit the field,
While deeper night descending round him throws
Her friendly veil to screen him from his foes.
Thus twice ten thousand of the Pagan train,
The banded powers of Afric and of Spain, 610
Fled from Rinaldo, 'scap'd the sanguine plain,
Those whom Rinaldo's, whom his brethren's sword,
Whom the twin-offspring⁶ of Vienna's lord
Stretch'd in their blood, and whom Albano's crew
(The brave seven hundred) in the battle slew;
With those by gallant Sansonetto kill'd,
And those that, flying, Seine's deep current fill'd;
The tongue that counts, may count the vernal flowers

When Flora or Favonius paints the bowers.

⁵ He returns to Flordelis, Book xxxv. ver. 245.

⁶ Gryphon and Aquilant.

'T is fam'd that Malagigi bore a share 630
 In that night's glory of successful war:
 Not that his arm the fields with blood imbrued,
 Or knights unhors'd, or helms assunder bew'd;
 But by his arts he made the floods repair
 From black Tartarean glooms to upper air,
 With many a heaver feign'd and bristled lance,
 That seem'd in number twice the host of France.
 Such trumpets' notes he caus'd to echo round,
 Such drums to rattle, and such shouts to sound,
 Such neigh of coursers prancing o'er the plain, 630
 Such dreadful cries, like groans of warriors slain,
 That seem'd with horror's mingled din to fill
 The distant lands, each forest, vale, and hill,
 And struck such fear in every Moorish breast,
 That each to flight his trembling feet address.
 Nor yet the king of Africa's anxious thought
 Rogero wounded in his tent forgot;
 But on a gentle steed of easy pace
 He had his friends the feeble warrior place,
 Till, 'scap'd the slaughter of the dreadful hour, 640
 A bark he gain'd, and thence the warrior bore
 To Arli safe, where, at his high command,
 Must meet the relics of each shatter'd band.
 Those who from Charles and from Rinaldo fled
 (Twice fifty thousand ¹⁷) o'er the country spread;
 For safety, mountain, wood, and cave explor'd,
 To - un the furies of the Gallic sword;
 While oft they found the guarded pass deny'd,
 And with their blood the verdant herbage dy'd.

Not so the king of Sericane withdrew 650
 (His tents at distance pitch'd); but when he knew
 That he, who thus with unresisted might
 Assail'd the camp, was Mount Albano's knight,
 His swelling breast with martial fury glow'd,
 His looks, his gesture, sudden transport show'd;
 With grateful thanks he prais'd the powers of Heaven

That on this night so rare a chance had given,
 A chance that to his hand might bring the steed.
 Far-famed Bayardo, of unrival'd breed. 659
 Loughad the monarch sought¹⁸ (as you full well
 From other lips, I trust, the tale can tell)
 To brace good Duriudana at his side,
 And that fair courser in the field bestride:
 For this to France he cross'd the surgy main,
 A hundred thousand warriors in his train,
 And in the generous steed t' assert his right,
 Had call'd Rinaldo forth to single fight:
 These on the margin of the briny flood,
 In equal arms, to end the contest stood;
 But Malagigi by his magic art ¹⁹ 670
 Compell'd his noble kinsman to depart,

¹⁷ Here seems an inconsistency, for, ver. 609, he says, twice ten thousand.

¹⁸ Boyardo gives the account, that Gradasso, a mighty king of the East, had gathered together an army of one hundred and fifty thousand men, in order to invade France, and get possession of Duriudana and Bayardo. (Ori. Innam. b. i. c. i.)

¹⁹ This adventure is given at large by Boyardo, which we shall here relate; and to which, though it has no immediate connection with the present subject, we shall, for the entertainment of the reader, add another adventure of Rinaldo, as a master-piece in the terrible kind.

Angelica, being returned to India (see General View of Boyardo's Story), and lamenting the hope-

Borne in a bark that spread th' inviting sail
 (But here 't were long to tell the wondrous tale):

less passion which she had conceived for Rinaldo, commanded Malagigi, whom she had kept in confinement, to be brought before her, and offered to restore him to liberty, provided he would send means to bring Rinaldo to her, but plight his word, if he failed in the attempt, to return again to his prison. Malagigi accepted the terms, and departed for France, where, on his arrival, he used every argument to persuade Rinaldo to give a favourable return to Angelica's passion: but Rinaldo, who had drunk of the waters of hatred, was deaf to his entreaties. Malagigi, exasperated at his refusal, resolved to have recourse to magic; and hearing that Gradasso and Rinaldo would soon meet to decide in single combat their title to Bayardo, he made two demons take the form of heralds: of these he sent one to Gradasso, to tell him that Rinaldo would expect him in arms next day by the sea-side; and the other he sent to Rinaldo, to tell him that Gradasso would wait for him at day-break. Next morning Rinaldo came to the place appointed, where at first he saw nothing but a small bark anchored by the shore: at length a demon, in the shape and arms of Gradasso, appeared; but when Rinaldo prepared to begin the combat, the phantom retired. Rinaldo, thinking his enemy fled, pursued him till the seeming warrior entered the vessel; and Rinaldo, following him with great eagerness, a sudden wind sprung up, and carried him out to sea, when the demon disappeared*. Soon after the departure of Rinaldo, Gradasso came to meet him; but having waited the whole day without seeing his enemy, he departed in great indignation.

In the mean time Rinaldo, who now perceived that some supernatural power had deluded him, was inconsolable for the disgrace that he must suffer from the imputation of cowardice. He was often tempted to destroy himself; and in the meanwhile the vessel pursued her way with extended sails towards the East, and at last ran ashore at a delicious garden, in the middle of which stood a stately palace, surrounded by the sea.

Rinaldo, upon his landing, was accosted by a damsel, who, taking him by the hand, led him into the palace, which was built of the most costly marbles, and richly ornamented with gold and exquisite workmanship, supported on pillars of crystal. A company of beautiful damsels here received the knight, and refreshed him with a magnificent collation, at the same time entertaining him with their melodious voices: at last one of them addressed him in these words:—"Sir knight, whatever you see is yours, and whatever you can wish more shall be granted you; for know, that all this is the gift of our sovereign lady and mistress; a queen, who for your love has drawn you from Spain." Rinaldo heard her with surprise; but when she mentioned the name of Angelica, a name he so detested, he started from his seat; on which the damsel cried out—"Stir not, thou art our prisoner." Rinaldo, however, regardless of what she said, flew to the sea-shore, determined

* From Virgil, Æn. b. x. where Juno deceives Turnus with a phantom Æneas like.

And ever, from that day, the Pagan knight
The gentle Paladin esteem'd but light.

When now Gradasso heard the chief who came Against the Pagans bore Rinaldo's name, either to make his escape or throw himself into the sea; but it so fortun'd, that he found the vessel in which he came, and instantly going on board, set sail from the island. He had not gone far when he made land again; and, going on shore, was address'd by an old man, who seem'd in great affliction, and implor'd his assistance to recover his daughter, who had been taken from him by a cruel villain: Rinaldo, without hesitation, followed the old man, who, having conducted him some way, blew a horn; when Rinaldo, lifting up his eyes, beheld a rock in the sea, on the top of which stood a castle. At the sound of the horn, a draw-bridge was let down, on which appear'd a giant of an enormous size: Rinaldo engag'd the giant with undaunted courage; but, falling into a snare, he was bound and carried prisoner to the castle, the walls of which were dyed red with human blood. He was now met by an old woman, clothed in black garments, of a pale and ghastly countenance, who address'd him in these words:

"Perchance thou hast not heard of the dreadful custom observ'd at this castle; therefore, while thou hast yet to live, hearken to the tale I am about to tell thee, for to-morrow thou shalt surely die. There formerly inhabited on that rock, which is call'd Alta-ripa (steep rock), a noble knight, nam'd Gryphon, who hospitably receiv'd all strangers that travel'd this way. This knight had for his wife a fair and virtuous dame, call'd Stella. It so fortun'd, that my husband Marchino, passing through these parts, was entertain'd by Gryphon, when he fell in love with Stella; and being resolv'd to possess her, plant'd an ambush for Gryphon, slew him, and, having massacred all his people, took possession of the castle; but in vain endeavour'd to gain his desire of Stella, who repuls'd him with horror, her mind being full of the idea of her murdered husband, and continually pondering on the means of revenging his death. The rage I felt at the falsehood and perfidy of Marchino, urg'd me to an act of cruelty scarcely to be credit'd by those who know not the fury of a jealous woman. I had two young sons by Marchino: these I killed, and having bak'd their limbs, set them before their father, who, unconscious of the horrid meal, satisfi'd his hunger with his own offspring. I then secretly made my escape, and went to the king of Orgagna, who had long sued for my love, who was a near kinsman to Stella, and incited him to revenge the death of Gryphon. I had left behind me at the castle the heads of my murdered children, which serv'd as an instrument of vengeance in the hands of Stella: these she took, and carried them to Marchino, with dreadful exclamations, reproaching him with his bloody villany in the death of Gryphon and the massacre of his people. Marchino, in a phrensy of fury, would have slain the dame; but his lustful passion, which, even in the present moment, was kept alive by her beauty, instigated him to a revenge more dreadful than a thousand deaths: he order'd the putrid dead corpse of Gryphon, still unburied, to be brought before him, and caus'd the lady to be bound to it, in which condition he accomplish'd his unheard-of and bellish purpose.

"The king of Orgagna and I now arriv'd with a numerous force, which when the villain heard, he caus'd the lady to be murdered; and afterwards, to show how far human wickedness could reach, continued, with horrid abomination, to defile her breathless body. The troops which we brought soon made themselves masters of the castle. Marchino was immediately torn in pieces by the fury of the people, and the remains of the wretched Gryphon and Stella were deposited together in a magnificent tomb erected for that purpose. The king of Orgagna then departing, left me mistress of the castle; when, in the ninth month of my residence, we heard a most dreadful noise in the tomb, which terrifi'd the three giants whom the king had left with me for my defence.

"It happen'd that one of the giants, who was bolder than the rest, ventured to remove a little the stone that cover'd the entrance; but he instantly repented his rashness, for a monster that was enclosed therein thrust forth one of his claws, drew the giant forcibly through the opening, and swallow'd him in a moment. No one henceforth was hardy enough to approach the tomb, which I caus'd to be surrounded with a wall of vast strength: by a device the tomb was then thrown open, from which issued a most tremendous monster, whose form my tongue cannot describe, but which you will behold with your own eyes, when you shall be cast to him to be devour'd. By a dreadful custom here establish'd, from all strangers that arrive, one is every day given for food to this monster; and as we have sometimes more than the daily sacrifice requires, the rest are put to death, and their bleeding limbs expos'd, as you see, at the entrance of the castle. This monster will receive no nourishment but the flesh of man; and should he fail of his wonted prey, he would break through the wall that encloses him. For me, wretch that I am! the continual remembrance of that villain, and the meditation on his unparalleled wickedness, have so deaden'd in me every sense of humanity, that my soul seems now only delighted with scenes of misery and slaughter!"

After the old woman had finish'd her dreadful narrative, and Rinaldo perceiv'd that his sentence was inevitable, he begg'd, that at least he might be allow'd to meet the monster with all his armour; and with his sword: to which the hag reply'd, with a ghastly smile, that he might wear his armour, and take what weapons he chose, but that nothing could save his life from that fury, against which strength or courage was of no avail.

Next morning Rinaldo was let down within the wall, completely arm'd, with his sword drawn; when the monster, dreadfully gnashing his teeth at the terror of all, stood ready to devour him, while the knight advanced with undaunted resolution. It is no easy task to describe the form of this horrible animal, that was doubtless the diabolical offspring of Marchino from the dead body of Stella. In size he was larger than an ox, his muzzle was like a serpent's, his mouth was of vast width, and his teeth long; his head had the fierceness of a wild boar when in its utmost fury, and from each temple issued a horn that cut the air with a roaring noise:

He breath'd his limbs in steel, his shield embrac'd
Then through the shades, on good Alfonsa's plac'd.

his skin was of divers colours, impenetrable by any weapon: his eyes were like fire, and his hands, resembling the hands of a man, were armed with the claws of a lion; and he rent saunder with these and with his teeth armour of the strongest proof. This monster came with open mouth upon Rinaldo, and a most dreadful battle ensued between them, which lasted from the morning till the evening, and in which the knight vainly endeavoured to pierce the hide of his enemy, who, on the other hand, had torn away his armour in many places, and wounded him in a terrible manner. Rinaldo now began to grow weak with the loss of blood, when, aiming with all his remaining strength a furious stroke, the monster seized his sword and drew it from him. While Rinaldo stood thus unarmed, expecting instant death, Angelica waited with the utmost impatience for the return of Malagigi: at last he came, but without Rinaldo, and related to her the dreadful adventure that had befallen him, urging her to go immediately to the assistance of the knight. Angelica, terrified at the danger of Rinaldo, began to load Malagigi with reproaches; but he told her there was not a moment to lose, and immediately put into her hands a cord, a file, and a large cake of wax. Angelica then called up a demon, who transported her at once through the air, to the place where Rinaldo was reduced to the last extremity. Just before the arrival of Angelica, casting round his eyes to discover any possible means of escaping the jaws of the monster, he espied a beam ten feet from the ground that jutted out of the wall; and exerting all his force, he leaped, and seizing it took his place thereon beyond the reach of the monster, that, weighed down with his enormous bulk, in vain endeavoured repeatedly to seize him. It was now night, and Rinaldo, while he clung to the beam, saw something by the light of the Moon that seemed to hover near him, and soon discovered the form of a damsel: this was Angelica; but as soon as he beheld her face he was ready to quit the beam, and expose himself to the enraged monster, rather than be preserved by her assistance. Angelica entreated him in the most soothing manner to seek shelter in her arms from so dreadful a peril; but Rinaldo obstinately persisted in refusing to listen to her, and threatened, unless she left him, to quit his present station. On this Angelica, casting the cord she had brought with her at the monster, at the same time laying the cake of wax before him, departed. The monster immediately seized the wax, and closing his jaws was prevented again from opening them: enraged at this, and leaping here and there with inconceivable fury, he entangled himself in the cord, which Rinaldo seeing, quitted the beam, and recovering his sword, attacked his enemy, unable now to make defence; but when the knight found that all attempts to wound him were fruitless, he leaped upon his back and strangled him. The monster being dead, Rinaldo sought some opening in the wall, the height of which it was impossible to scale: at last he espied an iron grate that opened next the castle, which he for some time in vain tried to force, till seeing the file which Angelica had left behind her, he opened the grate with this; and was preparing

His rival sought, and all he met o'erthrew 699
With rout and terror of the Christian crew:
With equal panic fled before his lance
The troops of Libya and the troops of France.
Now here, now there, amidst the warring crowd
He seeks, and on Rinaldo calls aloud;
Still turning where he sees the numerous slain
With deepest carriage load the dreadful plain.
At length the knight he met, and soon oppos'd,
Sword clash'd with sword, when first their spears had clos'd

In equal joust, when shiver'd with their might 699
A thousand splinters soar'd with wondrous flight
To touch the spangled chariot of the night.

Soon as Gradasso, leas by arms or vest
Than by his strokes, the Paladin confess'd;
And knew Bayardo by his thundering force,
That urg'd through yielding ranks his raging course,
Mastering the field—his eager lips assail'd
The knight with loud reproach, as one who fail'd
To seek his foe th' appointed day of fight,
And keep the faith that knight demands from
knight. 700

"Thou thought'st, perhaps," the haughty Pagua
"The danger late impending o'er thy head [said,
So well escap'd, I ne'er again should greet
Thy arm in fight; but, lo! once more we meet!
And know, to thy confusion, couldst thou bend
Thy fight to Hell, or to high Heaven ascend,
Didst thou that steed bestride, my feet should tread
The skies' pure plains, or shades that veil the dead,
To enforce my right: and if thou wilt resign
Thy boasted claim, and let yon steed be mine, 710
Then live secure; but never hope again
Unhors'd to seize a generous coarser's rein,
If thus thy recant deeds the name of knighthood stain."

He said: when, lo! th' insulting speech to hear,
Stood Guido bold and Richadetto near:
Both from their sheath their shining weapons bar'd,
And to chastise the Saracen prepar'd;
But swift Rinaldo interpos'd, and said—
"Shall others take my quarrel on their head?
Think ye, without your aid, this arm too weak 720
From him that wrongs me just revenge to seek?"
Then to the king he turn'd, and thus began:
"Gradasso, hear!—while meeting man to man,

at day-break to quit the place, when he was met by a monstrous giant, who, as soon as he saw him, uttered a loud cry and fled. The people of the castle, alarmed by the giant, attacked Rinaldo in great numbers; but the knight with his sword Furberta so exerted himself, that he soon slew or put them to flight: he was afterwards attacked by the giant who had first made him prisoner, whom he overcame; and then advanced to the castle, where the old hag had fortified herself; and where the other giant had taken shelter: this giant, now causing the gate to be opened, rushed out against Rinaldo, but was soon slain by him: all which being seen by this detested hag, she, in rage and desperation, threw herself from a balcony a hundred feet high, and was dashed to pieces on the pavement. Rinaldo then forced the gates, put all within to the sword, and departed thence in search of other adventures.

* Gradasso's mare.

If thou attend'st, sincerely will I show
I came to find thee like a generous foe:
My sword might prove the truth, and here defy
The tongue that dares to give my fame the lie;
But ere we close in combat shalt thou hear
What undesign'd my wounded name shall clear.
Then let Bayardo stand, the noble spoil, 730
Design'd by both to crown the victor's toil."
He said: the king of Sericane inclin'd
To courteous lore, like every gallant mind,
Consents to hear the generous warrior tell
What chance to draw him from the fight befel.
Now to a stream the knights retir'd apart,
Rinaldo there, with words devoid of art,
Remov'd the veil that o'er the truth was spread,
Invoking Heaven to witness what he said;
Then call'd before 'em Bovo's prudent son⁴¹, 740
Conscious alone of all his art had done,
Who, question'd, soon confirm'd whate'er the
knight

Had told, and own'd the fraud of magic slight.
Rinaldo then pursued—"What here is known
By living witness, shall alike be shown
By proof of arms, which ready (when or where Thyself shall name) I'll enforce the truth I bear."
Gradasso, with a warrior's generous heat,
Reflected how he came in vain to meet
The Christian leader; yet resolv'd to gain 750
The generous courser, sought so long in vain,
Howe'er he doubted, or the tale believ'd,
Rinaldo's plea with seeming faith receiv'd.

No more to Barcelona's billowy strand,
Where first they went to combat hand to hand,
But each agreed at early dawn of day
To a clear neighbouring fount to bend his way;
Rinaldo thither must conduct the steed
Between them plac'd, the victor's future meed:
Then should the king or slay, or captive make, 760
Albano's lord, 't is his the steed to take;
But should his boasted claim Gradasso yield
To Clarmont's knight, Rinaldo from the field
Must for his prize fam'd Durindana wield.

With wonder great⁴², with heart-corroding care,
Rinaldo heard by Fiorellis the fair
(As late I told), that from his kinsman's head,
Unlest Orlando, every sense was fled;
What discord for his arms the camp engag'd,
How chief with chief in dire contention rag'd, 770
Till stern Gradasso's arm the sword obtain'd,
By which a thousand wreaths Orlando gain'd.

The terms thus settled, to his social train
Gradasso now return'd, though oft in vain
The Paladin besought the Pagan knight
Beneath his tent 't await the morning light.
At dawn Rinaldo and the king, dispos'd
For cruel fight, their limbs in armour clos'd;
And near a fountain side the battle sought,
For Driodana and Bayardo fought. 780
With sad presage Rinaldo's friends beheld
His arm engag'd in such a dreadful field:
Great was Gradasso's courage, great his might,
Great was his skill, well-prov'd in many a fight;

And since he now the fatal sword had won
That lately graced the side of Milo's⁴³ son,
Each for Rinaldo felt his hope to fail,
And at his danger many a cheek grew pale.
But Vivian's brother⁴⁴, o'er the rest dismay'd,
The contest view'd, and gladly would have stay'd
Th' impending fight, but that he fear'd to raise 791
In good Rinaldo's breast a quenchless blaze,
Who still in mind the time resentful bore
When Malagigi's⁴⁵ sabin⁴⁶ decoy'd him from the shore.

While doubts and fears in every bosom grow,
No doubt, no fear, the bold Rinaldo knew.
Secure he goes, resolv'd one glorious day
Should wipe his late imputed stains away,
And silence those who joy'd in his disgrace,
Proud Altagoglia and Pontieri's race. 800
Boldly he goes in heart secure to crown
His conquering brow with laurels of renown.
When now, from different parts, these sons of fame
At once together to the fountain came;
They first, in faith unstrain'd, exchange'd embraces
With fair and open looks, as if the race
Of Clarmont and of Sericane had stood
Ally'd in friendship and ally'd in blood.

But here deferr'd, some future time shall tell
What dreadful blows from either weapon fell. 810

BOOK XXXIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

The distressed situation of Agramant. Marphisa comes to his assistance. Death of Brunella. Lamentation of Bradamant for the absence of Rogero. She unexpectedly hears news of her lover that reduces her to despair, and departs from Mount Albano. In her way she lights on Ulian's, ambassadress from the queen of Ioland. Subject of her embassy. Bradamant arrives at sir Tristram's lodge. The strange custom observed there. She unhorses three kings, and is hospitably received by the lord of the castle, who relates the adventure of Clodio, the son of Pharamond, and his wife, from which their law was first instituted. Defence of Uliana by Bradamant.

REMEMBRANCE, what I late prepar'd to tell,
What some new chance could from my mind expel,
Again recalls—a story that could make
A fair one wretched for Rogero's sake;
And with a deadlier arrow pierce her breast,
Than that which Richardetto's words impress'd.
Of this I meant to speak, but 'midst the thought
Another subject good Rinaldo brought:
Then Guido drew no less my Muse astray
With new adventures to beguile her way. 10
Now this, now that, by turns attention gain'd,
And ill my memory Bradamant retain'd.
To her again I turn, before I tell
What 'twixt Rinaldo and Gradasso⁴⁷ fell:
But first king Agramant's⁴⁸ tale recalls
Of him to speak, who drew to Arli's walls

The relics of his host that 'scap'd by flight
The sword and horrors of that dreadful night.
Placed on a river near the surgy main,
Afric in front, and near the coasts of Spain, 20
The city could relieve th' afflicted powers,
Could yield them succour and supply with stores.
Through all the kingdom to recruit his force
Marrilius wrote to muster foot and horse,
Whate'er their kind: at Barcelona arm'd
Nor zeal or hire, full many vessels swarm'd,
Well mann'd for fight: meantime, in deep debate,
King Agrament at daily council sat.
No means he spar'd; and with exactions prest,
Fair Afric groan'd through all her towns distress'd.
To Rodomont he sent, but sent in vain, 31
With proffers, would the warrior rise again
In Afric's cause, to give him for his bride
Almontes' daughter, to himself allied,
And with her hand unite to Sarza's power
The mighty kingdom of Oran in dower.

The haughty chief³ refus'd the bridge to leave,
Where, many a knight accustom'd to bereave
Of arms and vest, he these with pomp display'd
To deck the tomb that held the murder'd maid. 40
But not like Rodomont Marphiss left
Her king at need, of every aid bereft:
Soon as she heard that all the martial train
Of Agrament were captives, fled, or slain;
That Charles had won, and with the remnant force
Her king at Arli lay, she bent her course
To Arli straight, with proffers large to spend
Her wealth and life his honour to defend.
With her Brunello (late her fetter'd slave)
She brought, and to the king uninjar'd gave. 50
Ten nights and days she kept him fill'd with dread,
The fatal noose impending o'er his head.
But when she thither found no friend repair
By force to free him, or to save by prayer,
In such base blood she scorn'd to soil her hands,
And freed his trembling limbs from galling bands.

Well may you deem from aid like hers receiv'd,
What heart-felt joy the drooping king reliev'd;
How much he priz'd it (to Brunello's woe)
He meant her wretched prisoner's fate should show:
The sentence she enforced, himself resum'd, 61
And freely to the tree Brunello doom'd;
Then in a lonely wood, of life bereft,
His corpse a prey to crows and vultures left.
Roger, who before at equal need
From deadly cords his casidiff neck had freed,
In his sick tent now pale and wounded laid,
(So will'd high Heaven) no more could yield him
aid;

And when the tidings came, they came too late:
Thus, without friend, Brunello met his fate. 70
Meanwhile, impatient⁵ of the long delay,
Had Bradamant accus'd each tardy day,
That twice ten times must dawn, ere face to face
She sees her knight the Christian faith embrace.
Less slow each lagging hour to him returns
Who pines in prison, or in exile mourns,
Till freed he lives, or sees in prospect rise
His dear-lov'd country to his longing eyes.

⁴ Isabella.

⁵ He returns to Agrament and Marphiss, Book xxv. ver. 486.

Sick with suspense, she chides each heavenly steed,
Now Ethion, now Pyrois' lingering speed⁶; 80
Now thinks some chance the rolling wheels have stay'd

Of Phœbus' car, beyond his wont delay'd.
To her more lengthen'd seem'd each day and night,
Than that great day, when Heaven's meridian light
The Hebrew⁷ stop; or that fam'd night design'd
To give a young Alcides to mankind.
How oft with envy in their secret place
She view'd the dormouse, bear, and badger race
Doze out the months⁸: with these she fain would take

A long unbroken sleep, nor ever waks 90
To light or sense, till her returning knight
Should call her once again to sense and light.
Now here, now there, she shifts her restless head
On downy plumes whence Sleep was ever fled:
Oft was she wont to watch the breaking skies,
And see, with eager gaze, the morn arise;
When Titlion's spouse⁹, o'er every fleecy cloud
The lilies white and blushing roses strew'd:
Nor less she long'd, when full reveal'd the morn,
To see the stars again the skies adorn. 100
Now, fill'd with hope, she waits each hour to hear
Some messenger proclaim Rogero near.
Oft to a tower she climbs, that prospect yields
Of tufted forests and extended fields
If from afar she marks the gleaming light
Of arms, or aught that speaks a coming knight,
She thinks her plighted spouse Rogero nigh,
And clears her brow and wipes her tearful eyes:
If ode unarm'd, or one on foot she views,
She hopes some messenger with gentle news. 110

⁸ The common opinion is, that these animals sleep a great part of the year without taking nutriment.

⁹ Towards the approach of the cold season, the dormice form little magazines of nuts and acorns, and having laid in their hoard, shut themselves up for the winter. As soon as they feel the first advances of the cold, they prepare to lessen its effect by rolling themselves up in a ball. In this manner they continue, usually asleep, but oftentimes waking, for above five months in the year: their nests are lined with moss, grass, and dead leaves. The bear retires to some cavern or hollow of some enormous old tree, where it passes some months of the winter without provisions, or without ever stirring abroad, but is not entirely deprived of sensation like the bat or dormouse. The badger is a solitary animal, and digs itself a deep hole with great amidity, where it sleeps the greater part of its time, particularly in winter."

Goldsmith's History of Earth and Animated Nature, vol. iv.

⁹ Aurora, who falling in love with Titlionus, son of Laomedon, brother to Priam king of Troy, carried him off, and took him for her husband: of this marriage was born Memnon, who, coming to the aid of Priam, was slain by Achilles.

To meet her knight her armour now she takes,
 And hastening to the plain the hill forsakes;
 No knight she meets; then thinks a different way
 To Mount Albano might his steps convey.
 Again all-annious to her home she turns,
 Again expects him, and again she mourns.
 Now twenty Suns had risen, nor yet appears
 Her tardy lord, nor tidings yet she hears:
 While such her plaints, that in the realms below
 The snaky fends had wept to hear her woe: 120
 With piteous sighs she rends her golden hairs,
 Nor her fair face or heaving bosom spares.
 Then thus—" Ah! wretched, wretched maid,"
 she cries,

" To follow one, who, while thou follow'st, flies!
 Him wilt thou prize who treats thee thus in scorn,
 Or him ignore who never makes return?
 Shall he my heart possess who bears me hate?
 Who holds his virtues at so high a rate,
 Some goddess must forsake her seats above
 To kindle in his breast the flames of love? 130
 He knows to him my heart, my vows, I give,
 Nor will he yet my heart or vows receive:
 For him I bleed, for him, alas! I die,
 Yet he obdurate can relief deny.
 He flies me now, nor more attends my pain
 Than the deaf adder ¹⁰ heeds the charmer's strain.
 Ah! Love!—repress his speed who leads the race
 So swift, while I pursue with tardy pace;
 Or to her happy state a maid restore,
 Ere her fond bosom own'd another's power. 140
 But wherefore should I hope in vain to move
 With prayers or plaints the ruthless god of love?
 That god, to whom my anguish transport gives,
 Who drinks my tears, and in my suffering lives!
 Ah! luckless maid! of what shall I complain,
 But the vain prospect of desire as vain?
 Desire that lifts me to so bold a flight,
 My pinious shrivel ¹¹ in the sultry height:
 All unsupported now I fall from Heaven,
 Nor here a period to my fate is given: 150
 Again I soar, again I catch the flame;
 My daring endless, and my fall the same!
 Yet more than all must I condemn the breast
 That such desire could harbour for her guest:
 A guest that reason from her seat compell'd,
 And every sense subdued in bondage held,
 From bad to worse my wretched soul is tost,
 Nor can I passion rule where rule is lost.
 Yet wherefore should I now myself reprove?
 What crimes alas! are mine, but crimes of love? 160
 What wonder that the soft, the frailer sense
 Of womankind should make but weak defence?
 Was I requir'd to oppose with wisdom's arms,
 His looks, his speech, his more than manly
 charms?
 Most wretched he, forbid with longing sight
 To view the beams of Sol's all-cheering light!
 Not destiny alone impell'd my course,
 Another's words, and words of mighty force,
 From this beginning love foretold my doom,
 My future bliss, and great events to come. 170

¹⁰ An expression drawn from the verse in the Psalms:—"The adder refuses to hear the voice of the charmer."

¹¹ Rather an obscure allusion to the fable of Icarus, whose wings were melted in his flight too near the Sun.

If Merlin's prophecy no credit claim'd,
 If every counsel for deceit was fram'd,
 Him may I well reproach—but never more
 Can free my soul from him my thoughts adore.
 All, all my plaints (for ever fix'd to mourn)
 To Merlin and Melissa must return,
 Who brought, by help of many a hellish spright,
 Fallacious visions to deceive my sight
 With unborn sons; and with expectance vain
 Involv'd me thus in love's perplexing chain: 180
 Yet, ah! what cause could thus excite their hate,
 But envy of my happy virgin state?"

Thus she; while with despair and grief oppress'd,
 She seem'd to banish comfort from her breast:
 But soon the flatterer Hope intruding brought Delusive aid, recalling to her thought
 Rogero's parting words, and bade her still (Whatever fears her gentle soul might fill)
 Await his wish'd return; and thus with wiles
 Beyond the twenty days fond Hope beguiles 190
 Her easy heart, and soothes her to behold
 Another month in expectation roll'd.

With mind more calm, as on a certain day
 (Such was her woe) she pass'd the public way
 To meet her lord, she heard what must destroy
 Each little glimpse of every promis'd joy.
 For near Albano's walls the noble dame
 Beheld a knight of Gascony, who came
 From Africa's camp, a prisoner there confin'd
 What time near Paris' walls the battle join'd: 200
 With him she commun'd, much of him inquir'd
 To lead him to the point she most desir'd:
 Rogero nam'd, her wish no further sought,
 On him alone hung every anxious thought.
 The knight, who knew the peers of Aë'tic well,
 Reveal'd what'er the noble youth behel,
 Whom late he saw with Mandricardo stand
 Oppos'd in combat, when with conquering hand
 The chief he slew, and from that glorious day
 A tedious month with wounds enfeebled lay. 210
 Here had he clos'd, his tale had well explain'd
 The cause that good Rogero thus detain'd.

To this he adds, that to the camp there came
 A gallant maid, Marphisa was her name,
 No less renown'd for beauty than for arms;
 In valour first, and first in female charms:
 That her Rogero, she Rogero lov'd,
 Scarce ever seen apart—that all approv'd
 Their growing loves—and prince and peer believ'd
 That each from each the pledge of faith receiv'd;
 And hop'd the knight, recover'd from his bed 221
 Of pain and sickness, would the virgin wed;
 From which fair union warriors yet unborn
 In future ages might the world adorn.

This wish'd alliance spread from man to man
 In loud report that through the country ran,
 By signs confirm'd—with good Rogero came
 In aid of Agramant the martial dame;
 And when Marphisa from the camp in scorn
 (As late I told) had false Brunello borne, 230
 Uncall'd she back resum'd her former way,
 When in his bed Rogero wounded lay.
 On him alone seem'd bent her anxious mind,
 To him alone her visits seem'd design'd;
 For oft beside his couch from morning light
 Till evening shade she watch'd the wounded knight.
 Each wonder'd much, that she, whose soul despis'd
 All human race, nor power nor riches priz'd,
 Should for Rogero rail her wonted pride,
 Should smile on him, and frown on all beside. 240

While thus the Gascon knight confirms his tale,
At every word heart-rending pangs assail
The wretched Bradamant: a chillness creeps
Through all her veins, and scarce her seat she keeps.
Without a word she turns her courser's rein,
While wrath and jealousy within maintain
A mingled war: each hope dissolv'd in air,
Back to her home she hastes in wild despair.
Behold all arm'd the wretched virgin spread
With face declined upon her lonely bed! 250
From listening ears to hide her grief she tries,
Her grief that seeks to break in plaintive cries;
Till oft revolving what the knight had told,
No longer can her breast its anguish hold.

Then thus—"In whom hereafter shall I trust?

All, all are false, ungrateful and unjust!
Since, dear Rogero, thou canst faithless prove,
Rogero once so priz'd for truth and love.
Of all the sorrows, all the tears that flow
From public sufferings or domestic woe, 260
My wrongs are first—and since no living knight
Excels thy men in peace, thy arm in fight;
Since none with thee for prowess can compare,
For courtly grace, for all that wins the fair;
Why can we not amidst thy palms entwine
Another wreath, and constancy be thine?
Yet know'st thou not (this noblest gift withheld)
No virtue, courage, ever yet excell'd!

As objects only by reflection bright,
Viewless themselves, must shine by borrow'd light.
Alas! how easy was an artless maid 271

By him she lov'd beyond herself betray'd!
By him whose words her fond belief had won
To think the day-spring dark, and cold the Sun!
Sure no remorse can e'er thy bosom move,
If unrepenting thou behold'st her love
Who dies by thee—all crimes with thee are light,
If breach of faith is little in thy sight.
Since she who loves, such pains to thee must owe,
Thou canst not more afflict thy direst foe. 280
Sure Justice never will in Heaven awake,
Unless swift vengeance reach thee for my sake.
Midst all the sins with which mankind are curst,
If dire ingratitude is deem'd the worst;
If for this cause the fairest angel driven
To chains and woe was hurl'd from highest Heaven;
If heavier sins with heavier scourge must smart,
Unless repentance purify the heart;
Heed, lest on thee some dreadful scourge be sent,
Who, thus ingrate, refus'st to repent! 290

Of theft, no little crime amidst the train
Of human crimes, with justice I complain:
Not for my heart detain'd—that heart be thine—
At such a theft I never shall repine:
But thou thyself art mine, and in despite
Of every claim, thou robb'st me of my right.
Restore thyself—for never shall be thine
Who can another of his right deprive.
Thou leav'st me, cruel!—yet from thee to fly
Alas! my will and power, alike deny! 300
But not from life—to end this hated breath,
And leave my griefs and thee in welcome death.
O! had I died while treasur'd in thy breast,
What fate so envy'd, and what death so blest!"

She said; and fix'd to die, with furious haste
Leapt from the bed, while at her heart she plac'd
The sword's determin'd point; but soon she found
Her arms prevent the meditated wound.
Meantime a better genius seem'd to warn 309
Her desperate thoughts—"O! virgin, nobly born!

Think of thy high descent, thy spotless name,
Nor give this period to a life of fame!
Seek yonder camp—there nobler mayst thou try
(If such thy wish) the honour'd means to die.
Before Rogero shouldst thou yield thy breath,
Some tears even he may shed to grace thy death!
But should his sword thy breast of life bereave,
What lover could a happier fate receive?
And just it seems that be thy life should take,
That life his cruelty could wretched make. 320
Who knows, before thou diest, but vengeance do
To thy wrong'd vows Marphisa may pursue?
Whose fraud (as ill becoms a virtuous maid)
Has won Rogero and thy love betray'd."

These better thoughts approv'd, the virgin form'd
A surcoat new¹² that o'er her arms proclaim'd
Her state of mind, and such as might imply
A soul despairing, and resolv'd to die.

Well suited to her grief, her vest receives
The faded hue of sapless wither'd leaves, 330
Torn from the bough; or such as autumn shows
When from the root the sap no longer flows:
The veil with cypress trunks embroider'd o'er,
That sever'd, like her hopes, could sprout no more.
The horse, which once Astolpho rode, she took,
Then grasp'd the golden lance, whose lightest stroke
Each knight unbory'd; nor bow the lance she gain'd
Need here be told, or how the duke obtain'd
The weapon first¹³, suffice t'bet this she bore
All unsuspecting of its wondrous power. 340

Thus, unaccompanied, the virgin went
Without a squire, and from the hill's descent
To Paris' walls pursued her eager way,
Where late encamp'd the Pagan army lay:
For yet she heard not that Rinaldo's might,
With aid of Charles and many a noble knight
From Mount Albano and the Christian train,
Had rais'd th' impending siege and thousands slain.
She leaves Cadurci now, and now she leaves
Chorese's town, nor more behind perceives 350
Dorlon's mount, and soon the towers espies
Of Clarmont and of Montferant's rise:
When, as she journey'd, on her way was seen
A dame of comely form¹⁴ and courteous mien:

¹² The custom of assuming arms and devices expressive of the good or ill fortune of the wearer, was one great characteristic of the heroes and heroines of chivalry: thus Orlando in the eighth Book puts on black armour. Guido in the nineteenth book is thus described:

Clad like his steed, in sable weeds of woe,
The champion came, as if he meant to show
An emblem of his own distressful state,
How small his comforts, and his griefs how great!
So Ariodantes, Book vi. wears a shield fringed with yellow-green, the colour of Bradamant's scarf.

¹³ Bradamant received this lance from Astolpho, Book xxiii. ver. 104, which lance came into the duke's possession after it was left behind by Argalia. See General View of Boyardo's Story.

¹⁴ Nothing can be told with more ease of language, or vigour of description, than this pleasingly romantic incident: the demeanour of Bradamant, her meeting the shepherd, arrival at the lodge, the joust by moon-light, her defence of Clania, are all circumstances that can never be too much admired.

A buckler at her saddle-bow was ty'd,
 And three bold knights attended at her side:
 Before, behind, in long procession came
 Damselfs and squires that waited on the dame.
 Brave Amos's daughter who to learn desir'd
 Her name, of one amidst her train inquir'd. 360
 "To the great leader of the Franks," he cries,
 "From where within the arctic circle lies
 A land remote, she plough'd with heavy toil
 A length of ocean from Perduto's isle:
 Perduto some, and some Islanda name
 This distant isle, where reigns a queen whose fame
 For peerless form was sure by Heaven design'd
 The first of all her sex's lovely kind.
 The shield thou sent to royal Charles she sends,
 And this condition with the shield commands; 370
 That this high gift shall grace the bravest knight
 Whom such he holds in dreadful fields of fight:
 She by herself, by all the world esteem'd
 The fairest dame, would seek a champion deem'd
 The first in arms, for long her secret mind
 A purpose, nothing e'er shall shake, design'd;
 That he alone who bears his victor-sword
 O'er every chief, shall be her spouse and lord.
 At Charlemain's imperial court she thought
 The first of gallant knights might best be sought.
 You three, that as her guard attend the dame, 381
 All three are kings, and from three kingdoms came:
 One Sweden, Gotthland one, one Norway ways,
 And few with these in arms have equal praise.
 These three, whose lands beneath another sky,
 Less distant than the isle Perduto lie:
 (So call'd, as few amidst the sailor-train
 Were ever known to stem the northern main)
 These kings enamour'd have alike pursu'd
 The fair queen's love, and for their consort woo'd;
 And for her sake transcendent acts have done, 391
 To last while planets circle round the Sun.
 But she to these, to none her hand will yield,
 Who stands not first, the phenix of the field.
 'I little prize, (thus oft declared the dame)
 'Your deeds that here such boasted merit claim:
 Amidst the three, should one outshine as far
 His rivals, as the Sun each little star,
 I give him praise—but thinks he hence from all
 The knights on Earth, to him the palm must fall)
 To Charlemain, whom through the world I hold
 The wisest prince, I send a shield of gold,
 On this condition, that amidst his court,
 Him, who in arms may bear the first report,
 The monarch with this honour'd gift shall grace,
 Whether a subject or of alien race.
 His judgment be my guide; and when his voice
 Shall on the bravest champion fix the choice,
 Let one of you, who dares in fight the best,
 That fatal buckler from the victor wrest, 410
 And to my hand restore: such knight shall prove
 My vow'd affection, far all knights above,
 And sovereign of my heart possess my throat and love.'
 Thus from the remotest ocean has she sent
 Three potent kings, who come with sworn intent
 From him who wins it, to redeem the shield,
 Or by his sword lie breathless on the field."
 Thus spoke the squire, while Bradamant to hear
 Th' unwonted story gave attentive ear.
 The tale complete, the speaker spur'd again 430
 His steed, and soon regain'd the courtly train.
 More slow the virgin kept her steed behind,
 While many a thought came crowding on her mind.

You shield (she thought) in France may raise debate,
 And sow the seeds of envy, strife, and hate
 In every Paladin and rival knight,
 Should Charles attempt to fix the claimant's right.
 This thought disturb'd, but ah! her former thought
 Far deeper anguish in her bosom wrought,
 That false Rogero could from her depart, 438
 And on Marphisa fix his changeful heart.
 So deep in this was buried every sense,
 That, mindless of the way, she heeds not whence,
 Or what her course, or where she next may meet,
 To rest at night, a hospitable seat.
 As when some vessel by the mastering wind,
 Or torrent surge, is from the land disjoin'd,
 Her rudder lost, no pilot for her guide,
 She floats at random on th' uncertain tide;
 She floats at random on th' uncertain tide; 448
 So rove'd the virgin, while Rogero still Engros'd her soul—at Rabicano's will
 She rove'd; while distant many a mile remain
 Her thoughts that should direct the guiding rein.
 At length she lifts her eyes and sees the Sun
 Near Bocchus' realm¹⁵, his evening journey-run,
 And like the sea-gull now in ocean's breast,
 Beyond Morocco dive to wonted rest;
 And if she judges, if she means to stray
 In opening fields along the darkling way,
 While the night air with chilly vapour blows, 450
 Denouncing drizzling rain and freezing snows.
 Her courser urging, Bradamant pursues
 The track with greater speed, and soon she views
 A shepherd-boy retiring from the plain,
 Who slowly drives before his bleating train.
 Of him the dame entreats some place to show
 That, fair or homely, shelter might bestow;
 However homely, better there to lie
 Than pass the night beneath th' inclement sky.
 "For five long leagues, I know not where can rest,"
 Replied the shepherd, "a benighted guest, 461
 Save at a place which Tristan's lodge we call,
 But there 't' abide the chance to few may fall.
 What knight should there to find repose intend,
 His spear must win it, and his spear defend:
 If thither comes a warrior when the place [grace
 No knight has hous'd, the lord with courteous
 Admits the entering guest, but makes him swear
 That should a new one to the rock repair,
 His arm the stranger on the plain shall meet: 470
 Should none arrive, he peaceful keeps his seat.
 When two knights joust, the warrior, doom'd to yield,
 Must quit the fort and sleep in open field.
 If four, or five, or more, in social train
 At once appear, they ready entrance gain:
 But if he fares, who comes an after-guest:
 With whom the troop, already hous'd, shall rest
 By turns the lance: should one, receiv'd within,
 Possess the place which others come to win;
 There, one by one, shall call him to the plain, 480
 And he with all in turn the strife maintain.
 So when the lodge admits a dame or maid,
 Alone or with companion thither led,
 If chance another comes, who'er can gain
 Th' award for beauty, shall her seat maintain:
 But she, whose form her rival's charms outshine,
 For air unshelter'd must the place resign."

¹⁵ Bocchus, a king who reigned in the farthest parts of Mauritania.

"Instruct me, swain," she cried, "you lodge to find."

The simple swain with ready tongue rejoind'd,
And pointed with his hand the nearest way 490
To where six miles remote the dwelling lay.

Though well his speed good Rabicano ply'd,
Though Bradamant in either bleeding side
Drove deep the spur, yet through the miry road
Slippery with clay, with drenching waters flow'd,
The lodge she reach'd not till the darkening night
Had quench'd in shade the world's all-cheering light.

She found the portal barr'd, then loud address'd
The watchful guard, and claim'd her right of guest.
The place was fill'd, he answer'd to the dame, 500
With knights and damsels that but newly came,
And round the blazing hearth impatient stood
To sate their hunger with refreshing food.
"If still they fast, I trust," the virgin cries,
"T is not for them the cook his fare supplies.
Go—bear my message—I their force defy.
The law I know, and with the law comply."

The guard departing to the knights convey'd
The bold defiance of the martial maid,
That from warm shelter call'd them forth to dare
Th' inclement chillness of nocturnal air. 511
And now the clouds a plenteous shower began:
Yet each his weapons seiz'd, and man by man
Went where the virgin stood their force to wait;
The rest remain'd within the castle-gate.

Three knights were these, in arms esteem'd so well,

That few on Earth their valour could excel:
These were the warriors that the day were seen,
With that fair envoy from islands' queen,
To whom they boasted oft with sword or lance 520
To bring again the golden shield from France:
These three had far outrode the martial dame,
And hence before her to the castle came:
Few knights there were so well at tilt could run,
But midst those few the martial fair was one,
Who meant not there unshelter'd to remain,
Foodless, alone, and wet with drizzling rain.

Meanwhile from windows and the turret's height
Spectators stand to view th' approaching fight,
Seen by the Moon, while through the shower that streams 530

From broken clouds, she darts her watry beams.
As some fond youth whom beauty fires to love,
When at his fair-one's porch he waits to prove
The lover's dear reward, with rapture hears
The bolt slow moving in his longing ears:
So Bradamant, whose generous bosom fir'd
With honour's praise, to noble deeds aspir'd,
Rejoices when she hears the gates unbar, [war
And sees the draw-bridge lower'd, and deck'd for Beholds the champions issue to the plain: 540

Soon as she view'd them near, she turn'd her rein
The length of field to measure for the course,
Then back at speed impell'd her foaming horse.
That spear she bore, which trusted to her hand
Her kinsman gave, which nothing could withstand,
Which each opponent humbled in the dust,
Though Mars himself, oppos'd, receiv'd the thrust.
The king of Sweden who the first to meet
The virgin mov'd, was first to lose his seat:
Against his helm the lance so strongly came, 550
The lance that ne'er deceiv'd the guider's aim.
Next Gothland's moorish ran, who headlong far
Fell from his steed with heels high rais'd in air.

In slith and mire the third half stifled lay,
Roll'd o'er and o'er amidst the watery way.
Thus with three strokes three knights to earth she drove,

With heads cast downward and with feet above.
Then to the lodge she went, but ere her right
Was there confirm'd to pass at ease the night,
An oath she took, whenever call'd, to leave 560
The fort, and each new challenger receive.

Struck with her gallant deeds, the castle's lord
To her such welcome as his walls afford,
With every honour gave: the noble dame,
Who with the three from far Perduca came
To distant France, receiv'd with courteous air
The warrior-maid, for courteous was the fair.
Now each saluting each, with smiling look
Th' ambassador arising gently took
The martial hand of Bradamant, and led 570
The new-come guest, where sparkling deepest red,
A genial warmth the glowing embers shed.

Now to disarm¹⁶, the virgin cast aside
Her glittering shield, and next her helm untied;
When with her helm she rais'd a cawl of gold
Where hid beneath her braided locks were roll'd:
Her wavy tresses now, no more confin'd,
Fell o'er her neck, and hung in curls behind:
And now to all she stood a dame reveal'd,
In beauty first, as in the martial field. 580

As when, the scene undrawn, with sudden light
The stage gay rushes on the dazzled sight;
Where many a sumptuous pile and arch is plac'd,
With gold, with painting, and with sculpture grac'd:
Or as the Sun is wont from clouds, that spread
Their envious mist, to lift his radiant head:
So when her shining helm the virgin rears,
Her charms shine furth, and Paradise appears!

Full soon the lord of that fair dwelling knew
In her, who oft before had met his view, 590
The noble Bradamant, and graceful paid
His praise and homage to the glorious maid.
Plac'd round the blazing hearth their moments roll
In sweet discourse, the banquet of the soul;
While for the board the menial train prepare
Their limbs to strengthen with corporeal fare.
Then of her host inquir'd the martial dame
How first this custom, new, or ancient, came,
With strangers us'd, by whom and when devis'd;
And in these words her host his tale compris'd. 600

"When Pharamond the sceptre sway'd, his son,
The youthful Clodio, to his nuptials won
A beauteous dame, in pride of bloomy prime,
Of manners rare in that uncultur'd time,
Gentle beyond her sex! her dear he lov'd,
So dear he scarcely from her sight remov'd,
Not less from Io went the watchful swain¹⁷,
For equal to his love was Clodio's jealous pain.

¹⁶ The discovery of Britomartis in Spenser is a close copy of Ariosto.

— when as veiled was her lofty crest,
Her golden locks, that were in trammels gay
Unbounden, did themselves adown display,
And raught unto her heels; like sunny beams,
That in a cloud their light did long time stay,
Their vapour vaded show their golden gleams,
And thro' the parent air shoot forth their azure streams. Book iii. c. ix. st. 20.

¹⁷ Juno having found means to get into her power Io, the mistress of Jupiter, after she was

Knew in this lone retreat, which to his care
 His father gave, he kept the treasure'd fair. 610
 He seldom issu'd hence; and with him dwell'd
 Ten knights, who first for arms in France excell'd.
 It chanc'd, while here he stay'd, sir Tristram came Before the gate, with him a lovely dame¹⁸,
 Who by a giant fierce in fetters bound,
 Late from his valorous force deliverance found.
 Sir Tristram hither came, what time the Son
 Oppos'd to Seville's shores, had nearly run
 His evening stage, and here besought to rest,
 (No other place 't admit a wandering guest 620
 For ten long miles) for dotting Clodio us'd
 To jealous fears, his earnest suit refus'd;
 Resolv'd, whate'er his rank, no stranger there
 Should enter while his walls contain'd the fair:
 Long urg'd the knight his just request in vain,
 Not prayer, nor reason could admittance gain.
 ' Since mild entreaty fails,' enraged he cries,
 ' Force shall compel what thy base heart denies.'
 With bold defiance then the gallant knight
 Call'd Clodio and his ten to mortal fight, 630
 And offer'd with his pointed spear to show
 That deeds like this from recreant spirits flow:
 Such terms propos'd—should he his seat maintain,
 And Clodio with his warriors press the plain,
 Himself would there (though now refus'd a guest)
 Abide, and from the gates exclude the rest.
 " The son of Pharamond, impell'd by shame,
 At risk of life, essay'd the list of fame,
 Where, in the joint, he lost his luckless seat.
 Where all his ten receiv'd a like defeat 640
 From conquering Tristram, who the portal clos'd
 Against its master, with the ten expos'd
 To lie unshelter'd: entering now, he view'd
 The beauty that had Clodio's heart subdu'd;
 Whom Nature (what to numbers she deny'd)
 With every gift of female grace supply'd.
 Her Tristram fair bespoke: meanwhile without
 Her consort rag'd with fear and jealous doubt;
 Nor ceas'd to urge the knight with humble prayer,
 Yorth from the lodge to send his wedded fair. 650
 But Tristram, though he little seem'd to prize
 His lovely captive, though with careless eyes
 All charms but his Isotta's he beheld,
 So well the magic potion¹⁹ had repell'd
 Each other love; yet now, with just return
 Resolv'd to wreak discourteous Clodio's scorn,
 Reply'd—' To knighthood must I deem it shame,
 From sheltering roof t' expel so fair a dame.
 If Clodio murmurs thus abroad to lie
 Alone, unpair'd, beneath the open sky; 660
 A dame I have, that like a rose new blown
 In beauty blooms, yet equals not his own,
 Her will I bid (if such his wish) to wait
 Without the walk, and soothe his luckless fate.
 But just it seems the fair of brightest charms
 Should rest with him who bravest shines in arms.
 " The wretched Clodio thus compell'd to stay
 Without his gate for slow-returning day, turned into a cow by her lover to conceal her from his wife, gave her in charge to Argus, who had a hundred eyes, and watched her day and night.

¹⁸ Isotta.—The loves of Tristram and Isotta are famous in romance.

Less felt the chilling damp and freezing air
 Than sad reflection of his absent fair: 670
 Listening he stood, while jealous fancy brought Full many an image to distract his thought,
 Of those that now with gentle sleep oppress,
 Pass'd all the quiet night in guiltless rest.
 " The light was ris'n, when to his arms again
 Sir Tristram gave the dame, and eas'd his pain,
 With faith exchange'd upon his knightly word,
 Her, as she was, unjoin'd he restor'd.
 For though he deem'd his base discourteous mind
 Deserv'd from him the heaviest scourge to find, 680
 Yet this alone his vengeance should suffice.
 That all night long beneath unshelter'd skies²⁰
 The youth he kept; nor would he yet approve
 That plea, which call'd his crime the crime of love.
 Far other thoughts should generous Love impart;
 He melts the stern, nor steals the gentle heart.
 " Sir Tristram gone, but little Clodio stay'd;
 He to a trusty friend in charge convey'd
 The castle's keep, by his condition bound,
 Each dame and knight that there reception found,
 Should hold their place by beauty or by arms, 690
 But yield to stronger nerves or brighter charms.
 Thus was the law begun, and, thus maintain'd,
 Has to this hour unbroken still remain'd."
 So spoke the boar, and as the tale he ceas'd,
 He bade the menial train prepare the feast;
 Where in the hall a table fair was plac'd,
 The spacious hall with royal splendour grac'd;
 Hither by torches' light the guests convey'd;
 But chief the northern fair and martial maid, 700
 Gaz'd on the stately walls, where every part
 With story'd forms confess'd the painter's art.
 In rapt attention each the figures view'd,
 And while she gaz'd forgot the want of food;
 Though either's strength not little claim'd repast,
 With toil and travel spent, or spent with fast.
 The seneschal and cook displeas'd behold
 The meats neglected in the vases cold,
 Till one at length with better counsel cries: 709
 " Your hunger satiate first, and then your eyes."
 Now each was plac'd in order at the board
 To taste the viands, when the castle's lord
 Reflects that much against the law he err'd,
 Who thus, at different times arriv'd, preferr'd

²⁰ Spencer has an imitation of this passage, on which Mr. Upton observes thus:

" If the reader takes any pleasure in seeing how one poet imitates or rivals another, he may have an agreeable task in comparing the episode, where the fair company Satyrane, Paridel, Britomart, and the Squire of dames, are excluded, in a tempestuous night, from old Malbecco's castle, with a like disaster in Ariosto, where Bradamant (whom Britomart in many circumstances resembles) arriving at the castle of sir Tristram, battles it with three knights, and afterwards discovers her sex.
 Let the reader compare old Lidgate's Canterbury tale, where Polemite and Tydcous arrive at the palace of king Adrastus in a stormy night. Is it worth while to mention here that silly romance, named, the History of Prince Arthur, and his Knights of the Round Table, which has the same kind of adventure? See Part ii. book i. c. 85. How sir Tristram and sir Dinadan came to lodging, where they must joust with two knights."

Upton's Notes on Spencer, book iii. c. ii. st. 11.

Two female guests ; one only must remain,
 And one depart : the fairest might retain
 Her seat secure ; the vanquish'd maid must go
 Where chill rains beat, and winds inclement blow.
 Two matrons then with other dames that dwell'd
 Beneath his roof, whose judgment most excell'd,⁷²⁰
 He call'd, and bade them with impartial eyes
 Behold the virgins, and award the prize.
 With general suffrage all the prize declare
 To Anon's daughter, who the Northern fair
 Had now no less eclips'd with female charms
 Than late her knight's with manly deeds of arms.
 Then to the dame whose sad presaging mind
 This luckless chance already had divin'd,
 The host began—"Thou must not now complain
 If, gentle damsel, we our law maintain ;⁷³⁰
 Some other dwelling for thyself provide,
 Since 't is decreed, by present judgment tried,
 That yonder virgin's features, mien, and grace,
 (All unadorn'd) thy every charm efface."

As when from humid vales thick vapours rise,
 And with a sable cloud obscure the skies,
 Sudden the golden Sun, ere while so bright,
 Is lost in shade of momentary night :
 So when the damsel bears her heavy doom,
 Expell'd to dreaching rain and decary gloom,⁷⁴⁰
 Her features change, no more she looks the same,
 The gay, the lovely, all-accomplish'd dame.
 But noble Bradamant, whose pitying heart
 Had now resolv'd to take the virgin's part,
 Thus wisely spoke—"But ill I deem is tried
 That cause where hasty judgment shall decide
 Ere each is heard—for her my suit I move ;
 Howe'er compar'd our person's gifts may prove,⁷⁴⁹
 Imports not now—I not as woman came,
 Nor shall, while here, the rights of woman claim.
 Yet who will dare affirm, while thus array'd,
 These arms conceal a man or blushing maid ?
 Ne'er let us utter what we ne'er can know,
 And chiefly when it works another's woe.
 Like me, may numbers length of tresses wear,
 Nor more from this the female sex declare.
 'T is known to all who 're here, at tilt I ran,
 And if the lodge I won as maid or man :
 Why will you then assign the woman's name
 To one, whose deeds the manly sex proclaim ?⁷⁶⁰
 Your law requires that dames should be excell'd
 By fairer dames, but not by warriors quell'd :
 Yet grant I might a woman prove, (which I Nor wholly grant, nor wholly shall deny.)
 What though I equal'd not her beauty's bloom,
 Would you, for that, my valour's right resume ?
 Or make me lose from want of female charms
 What late my virtue gain'd by dint of arms ?
 But should the strictness of your law require
 That one of us must from the lodge retire⁷⁷⁰
 Whose beauty falls—yet would I here remain,
 (Whate'er your sentence) and my place maintain.
 Hence I infer, between you dame and me,
 That all unequal must the contest be :
 With me contending may she greatly lose,
 And should she win, no gain o'er me ensues.
 To both must justice weigh, in balance even,
 The loss or gain, ere sentence can be given.
 Honour and reason, every gentle sense
 Forbids to drive this holy virgin hence.⁷⁸⁰
 If any in his strength so far can trust,
 To call the judgment I have pass'd unjust,
 Lo ! with this weapon I his force defy,
 And prove the truth, while he defends the lie."

Great Anon's daughter by compassion sway'd,
 To see unjustly a defenceless maid
 Expell'd to where the chilling rain descends,
 And not a roof or cot its shelter lends,
 With many a reason urg'd and gentle word,
 Persuades to generous thoughts the generous lord ;
 But chief her dauntless courage wins the cause ;⁷⁹¹
 He yields, and pleads no more the castle's laws.
 As parch'd beneath the Sun's meridian fires,
 When the brown turf refreshing streams requires,
 If some fair flower, that hung its languid head,
 Feels on its stalk the kindly moisture shed,
 Again it springs, again each sweet resumes ;
 And fresh again in vernal beauty blooms !
 So from this bold defence the maid derives
 Recover'd life, and every charm revives.⁸⁰⁰

Now on the savoury cases that long had spread
 The board untouch'd, each guest impatient fed,
 No other champion chancing there to light,
 And damp the social pleasures of the night.
 The feast each honour'd save the martial fair ;
 In sorrow sit, abandon'd to despair ;
 A thousand jealous thoughts unjustly brood
 In her torn breast, and pall the taste of food.
 The banquet o'er, which all perchance in haste
 Had urg'd, to give in torn their eyes repast ;⁸¹⁰
 Fair Bradamant arose ; and near was seen
 To rise, the envoy of Island's queen.
 The lord a signal gave ; at his commands
 A menial ran, and soon with ready hands
 Through the wide hall was kindled many a light ;
 Th' ensuing book the sequel shall recite.

BOOK XXXIII

THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant hears from her host an explanation of the pictures in sir Tristram's lodge, representing the future wars of France in Italy. The manner in which Bradamant passes the night: next morning she departs, and unhorses the three kings a second time. Description of the combat between Rinaldo and Gradasso for Rinaldo's horse Bayardo. Their combat strangely broken off. Gradasso gets possession of Bayardo, and embarks for his own country. The flight of Astolfo through the air, till having travelled over many countries, he at last arrives at the capital of king Senapus, in Ethiopia, and undertakes to drive away the harpies from his table.

TIMAGORAS¹, Parrhasius², far renown'd ;
 With wreaths as fair Apollodorus³ crown'd ;

¹ Timagoras was a painter of Chalcedon, and in painting excelled all the artists of his age, who in vain endeavoured to contend with him.

Parrhasius was born at Ephesus, the son and disciple of Evemer and cotemporary with Zeuxis. He spoke contemptuously of all others, and styled himself the prince of painting.

³ This painter is mentioned by Pliny, who relates, that he was the great improver of the art of painting, which after him Zeuxis brought to such perfection.

Protopogen³, Timanthes⁷, ever fam'd:
 Apelles⁴, first of heavenly artists nam'd:
 Zeuxis⁵ and Polygnotos⁶: all the train
 That flourish'd once, in mem'ry shall remain,
 Though Clotho long has mix'd them with the dead,
 And time on every work oblivion spread;
 Yet shall they live and live to future days,
 While writers tell and readers learn their praise. 10
 Our age may boast with these an equal band
 In painting's school to lift the forming hand.
 Lo! Leonardo⁴! Gian' Bellino⁶ view;
 Two Dossi⁷, and Mantegna⁹ reach'd by few:

³ Protopogenes was a native of Caunus, a city subject to the Rhodians, and was contemporary with Apelles. His famous work was the picture of Jaleas, which saved the city of Rhodes when besieged by Demetrius; for not being able to attack it but on that side where Protopogenes worked, he chose rather to abandon his design than destroy so fine a picture. It is said that the king sending for him, asked him "with what assurance he could work in the suburbs of a city that was besieged?" His answer was, "that he understood the war he had undertaken was against the Rhodians, and not against the arts."

Timanthes lived in the reign of Philip of Macedonia; the place of his birth is not known, but he was one of the most learned and judicious painters of his age. He drew the famous picture of the sacrifice of Iphigenia, where, unable to express the sorrows of a father on such an occasion, he concealed the face of Agamemnon with a veil.

⁴ Apelles, the first in fame of all the ancient painters, was born in the Island of Coös, in the Archipelago. He was much beloved by Alexander the Great, who employed him to draw the portrait of a favourite mistress named Campaspe, when finding that the painter was deeply enamoured of her beauty, he generously resigned her to him. His most celebrated picture was a Venus rising from the waves, on which the following lines were written by Ovid.

Si Venerem Cōos nunquam pinxisset Apelles,
 Merra sub sequoreis illis lateret aqua.
 Apelles' pencil heavenly Venus drew,
 Or still the waves had veil'd her charms from view.

⁵ Zeuxis was a native of Heracles in Macedonia, and lived 400 years before the birth of Christ, being contemporary with Timanthes and Parrhasios. He painted the famous picture of Helen, for which he is said to have selected the finest parts from five of the most beautiful virgins sent to him for that purpose. An incredible story is related of his death; that having drawn the picture of an old woman with exquisite humour, he fell into such a fit of laughter at the contemplation of his own work that he expired.

Polygnotus was a painter of Athens after Zeuxis. He was the first who revived the dignity of painting in Greece, which had fallen into disrepute.

⁶ Leonardo da Vinci was of a noble family in Tuscany, and a man of universal knowledge. He painted at Florence, Rome, and Milan. He drew a picture of the last supper, but did not finish the head of Christ, because he could not find an image answerable to his idea before he was obliged to leave Milan. He did the same by Judas; but the

With these, an Angel, Michael⁸ styl'd divine,
 In whom the sculptor and the painter join:
 Bastiano⁹, Titian⁹, Raphael⁹, three that grace
 Cadora, Venice, and Urbino's race:
 Each genius that can past events recall
 In living figures on the story'd wall: 20
 But none have yet appear'd, whose wondrous art
 Could future deeds by pencil'd forms impart:
 Yet have we known some favour'd men adorn
 A mystic painting ere the men were born.
 But such effect exceeding human power,
 Is only work'd by help of magic lore.

prior of the convent being impatient to see the piece finished, pressed him so earnestly, and probably indecently, that he drew the head of the impudent friar upon the shoulders of Judas. He was greatly esteemed by Francis I. and died in the arms of that monarch, who came to visit him in his last sickness.

Giovanni Bellino laid the foundation of the Venetian school by the use of oil: he died in the year 1512, aged ninety years.

⁷ The two Dossi were of Ferrara, and were much employed by Alphonso duke of Ferrara. The elder growing old had a pension for his subsistence, and his younger brother, whose name was Baptista, surviving him, painted many excellent pieces after the death of his brother.

Mantegna was born in a village near Padua, and in his youth kept sheep; but his genius discovering itself very early, he was put to a painter, who adopted him for his son. He painted for the duke of Mantua, and executed that fine piece of the triumph of Julius Cæsar, in nine parts, in the royal palace of Hampton Court. He died at Mantua in the year 1517, aged 86.

Titian Vecelli was born at Cadora, a province in the state of Venice, in the year 1477. He was of noble extraction, being descended from the ancient family of the Vecelli: he drew the portrait of the emperor Charles V. three times, and that monarch used to say on the occasion, that he had been made thrice immortal by the hands of Titian. He was universally esteemed, full of years, honours, and wealth, and died at last of the plague, aged ninety-nine years.

Raphael Sanzio, born at Urbino in the year 1483, was one of the handsomest and best tempered men living. He is acknowledged to have been the prince of modern painters, and is often styled, the

The hall I late describ'd had Merlin wrought
In one short night, by subtle demons brought
From shades infernal, by his book compell'd,
His book all potent! whether sacred held
To black Avernus, or the shades that hide
Narcinia's caves¹⁰, or drear Cocytus' tide.

But turn we now to where the noble band
To view the pictur'd tales impatient stand,
While torches, rear'd in many a hand, display
Their mingled rays and emulate the day.
Then thus the castle's lord—"The wars that rise
In yonder forms to meet your wondering eyes,
Are yet unfought—the siege's two-fold art
Reveals the painter's and the prophet's part. 40
There, in Italian plains our troops are view'd,
By turns subduing and by turns subdu'd.
Whatever good or evil chance attend
The powers that France beyond the Alps shall send,
In this apartment Merlin bids appear,
Before th' events by many a hundred year.
Dispatch'd from Britain's king the prophet came To Gallia's king, who held his regal claim

divine Raphael, for the inimitable graces of his pencil: he was beloved in the highest degree by Pope Julius II. and Leo X. he was admired and courted by all the princes and states in Europe, and particularly by our Henry VIII. who would have brought him over to England: he lived in the greatest splendour; but his passion for the fair sex destroyed him in the flower of his age; for being taken with a burning fever, and having concealed from his physicians the true cause of his distemper, he was improperly dealt with, and died in the year 1520, on the same day that he was born, in the thirty-seventh year of his age. Cardinal Bembo wrote his epitaph, in which are these lines, which Mr. Pope has translated, and with the most injudicious flattery applied to his friend sir Godfrey Kneller.

Hic est ille Raphaël, timuit quo sospite vinci
Rerum magna parens, et moriente mori.

Living, great Nature fear'd he might outvie
Her works, and dying fears herself may die.

Pope's Epitaph on sir G. Kneller.

Ariosto was himself contemporary with all the modern artists here mentioned: he knew Titian well, who drew his picture. The author of the Essay on Pope, in an anecdote taken from Richardson, mentions, that Raphael with great modesty consulted his friend Ariosto, who was an excellent scholar, on the characters, lives, and countries of the persons whom he was to introduce in the picture of theology. All that Raphael is ever known to have written, is four letters and a sonnet addressed to Ariosto. Essay on Pope, vol. ii. p. 462.

¹⁰ The poet here alludes to those fabulous and imaginary caves or grottos said to be in the mountains of Norcia, and to have been inhabited by the Sibyls, of which many fictions are related. Petrarch tells us, that in these mountains is an opening that leads to the grotto of the Cumæan Sibyl, where she resided with many of her virgins, all of whom every Friday assumed the form of serpents; that whoever entered the cave should not return till a year, a month, and a day were expired; and that if he should, through forgetfulness, not depart at the end of that time, he would remain there for ever.

From Marcomir¹¹—then hear with what intent
This hall he fram'd, and why from Arthur sent. 30
"King Pharamond¹², who with his numerous host

Has first from France maintain'd his daring post
Beside the Rhine, now meditates to check
Beneath his yoke Italia's haughty neck:
Nor arduous seem'd the task, when day by day
Beheld the Roman empire's power decay,
With British Arthur hence he wills to make
A solemn league the war in hand to take.
Arthur who ne'er without the counsel sage
Of prophet Merlin would in arms engage, 60
(That Merlin, from a demon sprung, whose view Could trace events, and all the future knew)
From him had learnt, and Pharamond be show'd
To what he rashly must his troops expose,
Should he, ill-fated, on those isles descend
Which Alps, and seas, and Appennin defend.
Him Merlin tells, that scarce in future days,
A king that o'er the Franks his sceptre sways,
But sees in Italy his martial train,
By raging pestilence and famine slain: 70
Short is their time to joy, and long to mourn,
With little gain, with mighty loss they turn
From fruitful fields, where not a venturous hand
Shall plant the lily in forbidden land.
See! Pharamond on him so far depend,
He seeks on other foes his arms to bend;
When Merlin at his will (so goes the fame)
Employ'd his bends this magic hall to frame,
That every eye might pictur'd here behold
The future actions of the Franks foretold; 80
Add each descendent of the nation know,
That while their powers against a barbarous foe
With social aid defend th' Italian state,
Conquest and honour shall their arms await.
But should they ever seek with hostile sway
To make fair Italy their yoke obey,
Such rash design must seal their certain doom,
And build beyond those hills their fatal tomb."

So spoke the host; directing as he stood
Each dame's attention: Sigisbert he show'd¹³, 90
Who, tempted by Mauritius' wealthy stores,
From Jove's steep mount¹⁴ his numerous army pours.

Behold on Sembro and Ticino's plain
He spreads his troops, whose inroad to sustain
See Eutar comes, and with restless force
And dreadful slaughter stops their daring course.

¹¹ The name of a king, said to have reigned in France before Pharamond.

¹² Pharamond, king of France, reported to be the first who established the Salic law: he lived about the year 418; he has been always held up as a great prince, but his history is much involved in fable.

¹³ Mauritius emperor of Constantinople and successor to Tiberius, being desirous to drive the Lombards out of Italy, incited Sigisbert, with large offers, to undertake the expedition. Sigisbert, with a vast army, passed the mountains and entered Cisalpine Gaul, but Eutar, king of the Lombards, feigning a retreat, attacked him unawares, and cut all his army to pieces. Eugenico.

¹⁴ A mountain of the Alps, one of the passes into Italy.

See mighty Clovis¹³ from the heights descend,
 A hundred thousand on his march attend.
 See Bonivento's gallant duka oppose,
 With strength unequal, such a host of foes. 100
 Behold he feigns a passage free to leave;
 His well-laid snares the hostile train deceive;
 Who, lured by wiles of Lombardy, remain
 Like insects caught, with fearful havoc slain.
 See Childibert¹⁶ has sent a numerous band
 Of Franks and captains to Italia's land:
 But he, alike with Clovis, ne'er shall view
 His arms the power of Lombardy subdue;
 Nor spoils nor palms are his—th' avenging sword
 Of Heaven descending has his battle gourd. 110
 The dead are heap'd; his men the climate burns;
 The flux destroys—nor one of ten returns.

Of Pepin now¹⁷, and now of Charles he speaks,
 And shows where each th' Italian border seeks,
 And where on each a like success attends.
 Since this, nor that, the realm he seeks offends.
 This, from oppression Stephano r'prieves,
 That, Adrian first and Leo next relieves:
 Astolpho one; and one subdues his heir¹⁸,
 And to its rights restores the papal chair. 120
 A youthful Pepin¹⁹ there his legions pours,
 That from Fornaci reach to Judah's shores.

¹³ Clovis V. king of France marched with a great army into Italy against the Lombards; and thought, by taking advantage of the civil discords that had sprung up amongst them, to obtain an easy conquest. Grimoaldo duke of Bonivento, having few forces to oppose him, feigned at first an intention of attacking him, and then, retreating, left his camp full of provisions and wine. The Franks entering the camp, the soldiers gave themselves to excess till they grew intoxicated, and Grimoaldo coming upon them in the night, when they were asleep, killed every man. Porcacchi.

¹⁷ Stephano the Second, being raised to the papal chair, Astolpho king of Lombardy disturbed the tranquillity of the church: the pope, endeavouring to conciliate him with gifts, had recourse to Pepin king of France for assistance, who passed into Italy, and compelled Alphonso to sue for peace. Pepin, having left Italy, Alphonso recommenced hostilities against the pope, and was once more compelled by Pepin to make peace. To pope Adrian succeeded Leo III., who being ill treated by Pascal and Campolo, a priest and officer of the church, in the middle of divine service, and being threatened with imprisonment, fled to Charlemain, who sent him with great honours to Rome, and afterwards coming there himself, was anointed by the pontiff emperor of the Romans. Eugenico.

¹⁸ Desiderius.

¹⁹ Pepin, son of Charles the Great, went against the Venetians, and having taken many islands, he caused a bridge to be built, that his soldiers, little used to naval fights, might find less risk. But

See, near Rialto structur'd by his hands,
 The towering bridge of Malamocco stands:
 Here burns the fight, and hence he seems to fly;
 He leaves his men beneath the waves to die;
 While broke by tides, and by strong winds o'er-thrown,

The huge pile falls, a mass of useless stone.
 Behold Burgundian Lewis²⁰ vanquish'd swear
 No more in Italy the sword to bear; 130
 Behold him soon his plighted faith forgo,
 And once again a captive to the foe.
 Behold where, mole-like, quenah'd his visual ray,
 Him o'er the Alps his mourning friends convey.
 See Arli's Hugo²¹ chase with conquering bands
 The Berengarii from Italian lands:
 These once or twice he routs; while these the Hunt
 By turns assist, by turns Bavaria's sons;
 Till forc'd by stronger power he ends the strife,
 On terms impos'd, and soon concludes his life: 140
 Not long his successor alive remains,
 When Berengarius o'er the kingdom reigns.
 See Italy another Charles invade²²
 To give the holy pastor needful aid:
 Two kings by him in two fierce battles slain,
 Manfred and Corradino press the plain!
 But soon his people swoln with great success,
 With wrong on wrong the conquer'd realm oppress.
 See! through the crowded street while vespers call
 To hallow'd rites, in murder'd heaps they fall! 150

while the Venetians defended themselves, there arose so fierce a storm, that the bridge was demolished, the soldiers were buried under the ruins, and the king was forced to abandon his enterprise.

Porcacchi.

²⁰ Lewis, king of Burgundia, making an expedition into Italy, was conquered by the emperor Berengarius I. and made prisoner, but set at liberty on his taking an oath never more to invade Italy. The Burgundian, afterwards forgetting his oath, renewed hostilities; and being again taken prisoner by Berengarius II. was, as a punishment for his breach of faith, deprived of his sight, and in this condition he returned home. Porcacchi.

²¹ Hugo, count of Arli, called in by the Italians to their assistance against the Berengarii: he succeeded greatly at first, but being afterwards overpowered, was constrained to ask for peace, and retired to Arli, leaving his son Lotbario behind him, who soon after died. Eugenico.

²² Pope Clement IV. invited Charles of Anjou, brother of St. Lewis, king of France, against Manfred, an enemy to the church, who had usurped the kingdom of Naples and Sicily. Charles arriving, overthrew Manfred at Beoverento, slew him, and took possession of Sicily. Corradino, to whom the kingdom belonged in right of succession, brought a force from Germany, engaged Charles; but was defeated, made prisoner, and at last beheaded. Charles reigning in Sicily, the Franks began to exercise great tyranny over the Sicilians; and, among other enormities, committed violence on their wives. Hence a plot was concerted all over the island, that as soon as the vesper bell rung, the Sicilians ready armed should sally forth from their houses, and fall upon the Franks: this was put in execution, and eight thousand Franks were slain to revenge the dishonour offered to the Sicilians in the persons of their wives. Porcacchi.

The host then show'd²³ (when many a rolling year
Should whirl the planets in their changing sphere)
A Gallic leader from the hill descend,
And on Visconti's ears the combat bend.
See! Alexandria by the threaten'd force
Of France begirt with mingled foot and horse:
Within the walls the duke has fix'd the guard,
Without, an ambush for the foe prepar'd,
See by his toils the heedless Franks ensnar'd.
Lo, Armoniac their luckless head; 160
See, come to Alexandria captive led,
While the warm deluge doubling either flood,
The Po and Tanaro run purple blood.
One calf'd of Marca²⁴, then in turn he show'd
'Three Anjoinini nam'd—and thus pursu'd.
'Behold how oft have these with numerous bands
Disturb'd the Brucean and the Dacian lands;
The Marsians, ver'd, and Salentinian train;
Yet vain the force of France, and all as vain
The Latian succours, there to give a place 170
To one small remnant of the Gallic race.
Oft as the Frank his force for battle shows,
Alphonso and Ferrantes shall oppose,
And to their native lands expel their foes.
See Charles the Eighth²⁵, who from the Alps
descends,
While all the flower of France his march attends.
He pauses Liri; not a sword he draws,
Or rests a spear, yet to his sovereign laws

²³ The count of Armagnac, a Frank, came with twenty thousand soldiers in aid of the Florentines and Bolognese, against Galeazzo duke of Milan, who, having left a numerous garrison in Alexandria, with the rest of his forces attacked the enemy, at the same time that they were attacked by those from the city, and cut all the Franks to pieces, the count dying soon after prisoner of his wounds.

²⁴ Joan queen of Naples took for her husband James count of Marce, who descended from the kings of France, on condition that he should be contented with the title of prince of Taranto, duke of Calabria, and vicar of the kingdom; and that the administration of public affairs should remain with her. But he, attempting to seize the whole government, and calling himself king, she, with the assistance of Francis Sforza, deprived him of all. Ludovico, Rinieri, and John of Anjou, asserting their pretensions to the crown, were severally defeated by Alphonso and Ferrando: these the poet calls the Anjoinini.

Porcacchi.

²⁵ Charles VIII. king of France, assisted by Ludovico Sforza duke of Milan, a mortal enemy to Alphonso of Arragon king of Naples, came with all the French nobility and a vast army into Italy. Alphonso, giving way to the better fortune of Charles, left the kingdom to his son Ferrando, and retired with his treasures to Sicily. Ferrando, unable to make head against the Franks, was soon divested of all his fortresses and places except the isle of Ischia, gallantly defended by Inico del Vasto. At length all the princes of Italy, alarmed at the rapid victories of Charles, entered into a league against him. The Neapolitans, detesting the haughty government of the Franks, recalled Ferrando, who, assisted by the Venetians, recovered the kingdom.

The realm submissive yields, save where opposed
Beneath the rock Typhoeus heaves his breast. 180
Here, not unquestion'd, conquering Charles arrives,
Against him Inico del Vasto strives,
In whom the race of Avolo survives.

The castle's lord directing thus the view
Of Bradamant to foms who Merlin drew,
And pointing Ischia to her sight, he said:
'Ere more from chief to chief your eyes are led,
Hear what to me reveal'd in times of old,
While yet a child my aged grandsire told,
Truths which to him his father oft made known,
Through sons succeeding sons deliver'd down 191
From Merlin's self, whose wondrous art display'd
Yon story'd deeds in various tints pourtray'd;
Who, when he show'd you castle on the rock
'To Pharamond, he thus the king bespoke,
'From him whose gallant arms you bright defend,
A chief, his country's glory²⁶, shall descend:
Less graceful Nareus²⁷; less in battle nam'd
Achilles; less for art Ulyases fam'd:
Less swift was Ladas²⁸; less in council sage 200
Nestor, who taught so long a wondering age:
Nor yet so merciful or liberal found
Was ancient Cæsar through the Earth renown'd,
The gifts of these in nothing can compare
With him who draws in Ischia vital air:
If Crete can vaunt (all other isles above)
Her soil the birth-place of supernal Jove,
If Thebes may Hercules and Facchus boast,
And the twin-offspring glad the D'ian coast,
Lo! to this isle yon marquis' birth is given, 210
With every grace endow'd from favouring Heaven:
This hero will be known,' thus Merlin said,
His words repeating oft, 'when most his aid
The Roman empire shall, oppress, demand,
And challenge freedom from his saving hand.'
But wherefore should I now the deeds fortel
On which far better here your sight may dwell?²⁹

Thus speaks the host, and each attention calls
Where Charles' high actions grace the story'd walls.
'See Lewis now,' he cries, 'whose calmer thoughts
Repents that Charles he to Italia brought; 221
He brought him there to gall a rival foe,
But not to work his total overthrow.
Behold him now a league with Venice make Against the king, and now prepare to take
The monarch captive, who with dauntless mind
Impels his spear, and 'escapes the fate design'd.
Far other chance his hapless powers sustain,
That to defend the conquer'd realm remain.
Ferrantes now returns with mighty aids 230
From Mantua's lord, and there the foe invades;
But, led by fraud one hapless leader lost,
With deep regret the victor's joy has cross'd.'
So spoke the host; and speaking thus, where stood
Alphonso, marquis of Pescara³⁰, show'd:

²⁶ Alphonso del Vasto, mentioned Book iv.

²⁷ A Grecian commander, celebrated for the beauty of his person by Homer.

²⁸ The name of a messenger of Alexander the Great, remarkable for his swiftness, mentioned by Catullus, Martial, and Solinus.

"This chief, whose acts in many a dreadful fight
Shall shine resplendent as Pyropus' light,
Behold o'er taken in the double suares
The treacherous Ethiopian's guile prepares:
Behold where sudden slain on earth he lies, 240
In whom the age's greatest champion dies.
See! the twelfth Lewis²² from the hills descended,
And with Italian counts his army bend
To uproot the mulberry²³, and the lily plant
In fruitful fields where rul'd Visconti's race.
Thence o'er Garagliano's stream intent
To frame a passage, he his people sent,
(As Charles had done)—them soon the foe annoys,
The floods o'erwhelm them, and the sword destroys:
Not less of slaughter Puglia's battle stains, 250
When Gallia's troops forsake the dreadful plains.
Frenzies there, the chief of Spanish blood
(Consalvo nam'd) has twice their force subdu'd:
While l'ortune Lewis here with frowns pursues,
In that rich country him with smiles she views,
Where fair between the Alps and Apennines
To Adriatic was the Po declines."

Thus he; then points the traitor forth, who sold
The castle gives him by his lord to hold:
The fraudulent Swiss²⁴ he shows, who prisoner makes
The man that him for his defender takes. 261
These deeds, without a single sword or lance,
Have giv'n the conquest to the powers of France.
In Italy he Caesar Borgia shows²⁵,
Who greater by his monarch's favour grows;
Each lord of Rome, each baron of renown,
Rais'd by his smile, or exil'd by his frown.
He tells the king, who from Bologna fair
Removes the saw and plants the acorns there²⁶;
Who next the rebel Genoaese²⁷ pursues, 270
And their strong city by his rule subdues.

Moor calling the marquis one night to a parley on the walls, shot him with an arrow in the throat.

²² Lewis the XIIIth, king of France, successor to Charles VIII. and a constant enemy to Ludovico
Sforza, had resolved to take from him the government; for which intent he made a league with pope
Alexander VI., with the Venetians, and with Fernando king of Spain. He drove Ludovico from his government, who fled to the emperor in Germany, having left the defence of his castle of Milan to Bernardin di Caste, who betrayed it into the hands of the Turks. Porcacchi.

sultan, created Paolo de Nove, doge, a man taken

"Behold," he cries, "what ghastly piles of slain
Are stretch'd on Ghiradada's fatal plain²⁸!
Each city to the king her gate unfolds,
And Venice scarce against his prowess holds.
Ill brook's the pontiff his increasing power:
For passing now Romanus's confines o'er,
Modena from Ferrara's duke he takes,
And every old possession doubtful makes,
Behold the army of the Franks have won, 280
And given to sack and pillage, Braccia's town:
Lo! where their aid they to Felsina yield,
And rout the Church's forces in the field.
Here France and Spain oppos'd, at once unite
Their closing ranks, and dreadful glows the fight;
The crimson dikes with human blood o'erflow,
Mars doubtful stands where conquest to bestow.
At length Alphonso's virtue²⁹ wins the day, [way:
France keeps the field and conquer'd Spain gives Ravenna's sack succeeds; the pope with grief 290
Such ruin views, and to the land's relief
He bids the Belgians from the neighbouring steep
Against the Franks like driving tempests sweep;
Till each, before the furious onset fled,
Behind the Alps conceals his shameful head;
While once again Italian standards rise,
And once again the golden lily flies.
Behold the Franks return³⁰—behold once more
Faithless Helvetius breaks their scatter'd power:
With him (unlook'd-for aid) yep youth behold, 300
Whose sire he captive made, whose sire he sold.
Behold your army (lately doom'd to feel
The sad reverse of fickle Fortune's wheel)
Another king succeeding, bend their care
To avenge the shame inflicted by Navarre:
With better omens to the fight they turn:
King Francis see with generous ardour burn;
He breaks the Switzer's pride, whose barbarous host
Had swell'd their titles with presuming boast;
And styl'd themselves by Heaven's high will pre-
pard 310
The scourge of princes and the church's guard.

from the dregs of the people, and asserted at the same time that Genoa was not subject to any prince, thereby openly declaring themselves rebels to the king of France, Lewis marched against them with a powerful army, and the city surrendered to him at discretion. Porcacchi.

²⁸ The Venetians sent a numerous army, under the count di Pigliano and Bartolomeo Alviano;
they engaged the army of the French at Ghiradada, though contrary to the opinion of Pigliano, the Venetian general. After an obstinate battle the Venetians were defeated with great loss; the gates of Bergamo, Brescia, and Cremona, were thrown open to Lewis; many other places surrendered to him, and he prepared to attack Venice itself. Porcacchi.

²⁹ Alphonso duke of Ferrara.

³⁰ King Lewis, exasperated at being driven out of Italy, made a peace and league with the Vene-
tians, and sent a fresh army against Maximilian
Sforza. Maximilian, assisted with the pope's money, called in the Switzers to his side, not without risk (as the poet observes), considering the fate of his father: however, joined with these, he attacked and entirely defeated the French army; for which victory the pope bestowed on the Switzers the title of Defenders of the Holy Church. Porcacchi.

Spite of the league, he makes proud Milan bend,
 And there in young Sforzeco finds a friend.
 See! Bourbon³², when the Belgian troops advance,
 Defends the city for the king of France.
 Behold where now on other thoughts intent,
 King Francis ponders many a great event,
 His people's cruelty and pride unknown,
 That lost him soon fair Milan's conquer'd town.
 Another Francis see³³, alike in name 320
 And virtue to his great forefather's fame.
 The Franks expell'd, he wins his native soil,
 And holy church rewards his pious toil.
 Franco turns again, but on Ticino's shores
 Brave Mantua's duke repels th' advancing powers:
 And Frederic, ere his cheek unshedged displays
 The bloom of manhood, merits lasting praise:
 He with his sword and lance, with every art
 Of war that makes the soldier's noblest part,
 Can Pavia's walls defend from Gallic rage, 330
 And Leo's fury on the seas engage.
 Then two, that bear the rank of marquis, stand,
 Our dread, and glory of th' Italian land.
 Both from one blood, both own one natal earth:
 The first from that Alphonso drew his birth;
 The marquis taken in the negro's toil
 Whose blood thou seest stain the mourning soil.
 Behold how by his prudent counsels given,
 From Italy th' invading Franks are driven.
 The second chief, whose noble mien declares 340
 His noble soul, the rule o'er Vasto bears,
 Alphonso nam'd—lo! this the gallant knight
 Whose form so late I pointed to your sight
 In Iachia's isle, of whom the sage of old
 To royal Pharamond so much foretold;
 Whose birth holy Heaven to distant time delay'd,
 When harass'd Italy requires his aid;
 What time the holy church and empire most
 Such valour claim against a barbarous host;
 He with his kinsman of Pescara stands; 350
 And Prospera Colonna near commands.
 Through him th' Helvetian makes his swift return,
 Through him the Franks their former triumphs
 mourn.

Behold again her armies³⁴ France address
 With better hope to heal her ill success.

³² Ferrando, king of Spain, being dead, the emperor Maximilian invaded Lombardy with fourteen thousand Switzers and seven thousand Belgians, with an intention of laying siege to Milan defended by Trivulzio and Charles of Bourbon.
 Eugenio.

³³ The emperor Charles V. made a league with pope Leo, in order to drive the French out of Milan and restore Francisco Sforza, nephew of the first Francis, and son of Ludovico il Moro. The French were become odious to the Milanese from the pride of Lautrec and his brother. Sforza at length engaging Lautrec put him to flight, and entering the city by night was made duke.
 Eugenio.

³⁴ King Francis, resolving to recover the duchy of Milan, passed into Lombardy with a great army, when all submitted to him except Padua: but being attacked in the night by the marquises of Pescara and Vasto, he was vanquished and made prisoner, though afterwards set at liberty upon giving up his sons for hostages.
 Eugenio.

One camp the king in Lombardy extends;
 And one, prepar'd for Naples' siege, he sends:
 But she³⁵ (by whom the hopes of human kind
 Are tost like chaff, that sits before the wind;
 Like grains of sand, that whirling round and round,
 The tempest lifts, or scatters o'er the ground) 361
 His every purpose foils—while at his call
 He deems that thousands wait near Pavia's wall;
 The monarch little heeds the war's array,
 Nor marks how ranks increase, or ranks decay,
 By selfish counsellors himself deceiv'd,
 The simple dictates of his heart believ'd:
 Hence, when at night the camp was rout'd to arms,
 The bands but thinly answer'd to th' alarms;
 The wary Spaniards in their works they view, 370
 In dread assault, who bring the generous two
 Of Avolo's high blood, with them to dare
 The fiercest terrors of invasive war.
 Behold the noblest of the race of France
 Stretch'd on the plain—behold how many a lance,
 How many a sword the dauntless king defies:
 Behold beneath him slain his courser lies!
 On foot he combats, bath'd in hostile blood:
 But virtue, that superior force has stood,
 At length to numbers yields—behold him made 380
 A prisoner now, and now to Spain convey'd.
 Pescara thus the honours shall divide
 With him that ever battles at his side:
 With Vasto's lord such wreaths Pescara gains,
 A host defeated and a king in chains.
 One camp at Pavia broken; one whose course
 Is bent for Pavia, dwindles in its force;
 Cut from supplies, it halts in middle way,
 Like dying flames when oil and wax decay.
 Lo! where the king in Spanish prison leaves 390
 His sons, while him once more his land receives;
 And while in Italy the war he bears,
 On his own realm another war prepares.
 What devastation³⁶ and what slaughter spread
 On every side, have Rome's distractions bred?
 All laws are trampled, human and divine,
 Virgins are forced, and burnt the sacred shrine!
 The camp beholds the league in ruin fall,
 Each tunnit hears, yet, deaf to honour's call,
 Shrinks from the field, and leaves to hostile hands
 Great Peter's successor in shameful bands. 401
 The king has, by Lotrecco led, combin'd
 His force, no more on Lombardy design'd:
 But from profane and impious power to free
 The head and members of the holy see.
 He finds the pontiff freed, besieg'd the town
 Where lies the Syren³⁷, and the realm o'erthrown.
 Behold th' imperial ships the harbour leave,
 Their succour for the town besieg'd to give:
 Behold where Dorea³⁸ sails their force to meet, 410
 Who sinks and burns and breaks their scatter'd fleet.

³⁵ Fortune.

³⁶ In this passage the poet describes the miserable sack of Rome, and the taking of the chief pontiff Clement VII. by the Belgian soldiers under the command of Bourbon.
 Porcacchi.

³⁷ By this city he means Naples, anciently called Parthenope, from a name of one of the Syrens, said to have been buried there.
 Porcacchi.

³⁸ He alludes here to the great naval engagement at Cape d'Orso between the Imperialists and the French while Naples was besieged, when the French

See Fortune shifts at length her changeful face,
Till now so friendly to the Gallic race;
For slain by fevers, not by sword or lance,
Of thousands scarce a man revisits France."

Such were the story'd deeds that brightly glow'd
In magic tints by Merlin's art bestow'd:
Here long to tell—each guest with new delight
Return'd to gaze, unsated with the sight;
And oft beneath they read each subject told 420
In characters of fair-recording gold.

The beautiful dames and all the social crew
Besuil'd with talk the hours that swifter flew:
At length the castle's lord to welcome rest,
With honour due, conducted every guest.

Now all the house to balmy sleep resign'd,
On her soft couch the martial fair reclin'd,
Oft chang'd from right to left her weary side,
But still in vain to soothe her cares she try'd:
Till near the dawn she clos'd awhile her eyes, 430
When to her sight Rogero seem'd to rise,
And thus to speak—" Ah! wherefore now complain
Of lying tales, and waste thy youth in vain?
First shalt thou see the rivers backward flow,
Ere for another I thy love forgo.

When thou I soon—no longer I delight
In vital air, or cheering rays of sight!"
Then thus he seem'd to say—" Behold me here
To embrace that faith which Christian knights revere,

My promise keep—hide not my long delay, 440
Far other wounds than love have caus'd my stay."

At this her slumber fled, and with it flew
Her dear Rogero from her longing view.
The damsel then her heavy grief renew'd,
And thus in secret her complaint pursu'd:

" What gives me joy, to lying dreams I owe;
What gives me pain, from waking truths I know.
As shadows vain my footing bias removes;
But, ah! my constant was no shadow proven.
Why, sies, alas! from waking eye or ear, 450
What late I seem'd to see, what late to hear?

What are ye, wretched eyes! that clos'd can show
Each wish'd-for joy, and open but to woe?
Sleep soothes with hope of peace my future life,
But when I wake, I wake to pain and strife.
Sweet sleep, alas! such fancy'd peace can make,
But soon to truth and wretchedness I wake.
If sorrow springs from truth, from falsehood joy,
O ne'er may truth these eyes, these ears employ!
To pleasure since I sleep, and wake to pain, 460
O! let me sleep, and never wake again.

Thrice happy you, among the bestial kind,
For six long months to quiet rest consign'd:
Does such a state as mine death's image give?
I wake, alas! to die, but sleep to live.
If death indeed resembles such repose,
Come, welcome Death, these eyes for ever close!"

Now in the east the Sun his beams had shed,
And tinged the vapoury clouds with blushing red,

Bright and more bright effus'd the golden ray, 470
And gave the promise of a fairer day;
When, starting from her short and troubled rest,
Soon Bradamant her limbs in armour drest;
And grateful thanks return'd the courteous lord
For every honour at his bed and board.
Already now th' ambassadress she found,
Who, with her squires and dames attending round,
Had left the lodge, and issued at the gate,
Where stood the three her coming thence to wait,
Where till the morn their irksome hours they
pass'd, 480

Their loose teeth chattering to the chilly blast;
Drench'd in the rain, and every need deny'd,
No food to knight, nor food to steed supply'd,
Battering the slimy soil—But o'er the rest
This dire reflection pain'd each wretched breast,
That she, the witness of their luckless chance,
Would bear the fatal tidings back from France;
And to their queen ador'd the story tell,
How, the first spear they met at tilt, they fell.
They now resolv'd to die, or heal their shame, 490
That so Ulania (such the virgin's name
Till now untold) might banish from her thought
What ill effect their late defeat had wrought.

When issuing from the castle they descri'd
Brave Amon's daughter, each again defy'd
The generous dame, nor deem'd a maid to find
Where every act proclaim'd a manly kind.
Of stay impatient, Bradamant refus'd
To accept their joust, but every art they us'd
To fire her ardour, till the martial fair 500
No longer could unblam'd the course forbear.

Her spear she levels, with three strokes she sends
The three to earth; and thus the contest ends.
No more she turn'd, but eager to pursue
Her purpos'd journey, vanish'd from their view.

The hapless three who came so far to gain
The golden shield, rose slowly from the plain,
While lost in shame, and speechless with surprise,
Each from Ulania turn'd his downcast eyes.
How oft with her, as from Iskadda's coast 510
They voyag'd, each had made his haughty boast,
That not a knight or Paladin should stand
The least of these in battle hand to hand.
And now the virgin further to depress
Their courage, baffled by their ill success,
And quench their pride, declar'd that not the force
Of knight or Paladin had won the course;
But that a female arm (in fight renown'd)
Had hurl'd each mighty champion to the ground.

" What think ye, since a virgin could suffice? 520
To horse three knights like you," Ulania cries,
" Must great Orlando or Rinaldo prove,
So justly held all martial names above?
Did one of these possess the golden shield,
Say, would you better then maintain the field,
Than with a woman here?—but well I guess
That each will now th' ungrateful truth confess.
Then cease—nor further seek to assay your might,

For he, who rashly dares through France invite
A second proof, may rush on greater harms 530
To blot with new disgrace his boasted arms:
Unless perchance he best that fate may call,
Which gives him by such valorous hands to fall."

When thus Ulania show'd a woman's power
Had stain'd their glory, never stain'd before,
When many a squire, and many a damsel near,
Confirm'd a truth each warrior blush'd to hear,

feet was commanded by count Philip Dorez, who held the place of Andrew Dorez, of whom so much is said in the xth Book. Porcacchi.

* This speech of Bradamant abounds with those perille conceits in which the writers of that age, and particularly the Italians, so much delighted. In this respect even Tasso, in other parts so truly classical, is equally faulty with Ariosto; we see nothing of this kind in Homer or Virgil.

Such shame, such anguish, every knight impress'd,
As urg'd at first against its master's breast
To turn the steel—and now with fragrant haste 540
Each from his limbs the plate and mail unbrac'd;
Each from his side ungirt the lionion drew,
And in the castle's moat the weapon threw,
And vow'd one year despoil'd of arms, to lead
A life of penance for the shameful deed:
From place to place forlorn on foot to stray
Through rocky paths, rough hills, or thorny way;
Nor when the year should run its circling race,
To mount the courser or the cuirass lace,
Unless his valour first should win by force 550
The shining armour and the warrior horse.
And hence on foot, at fair Uliana's side
They wait to punish their o'erweening pride:
The rest in meet array and glittering splendour ride.

Now Bradamant to Paris urg'd her way,
And reach'd a castle at declining day,
Where first the news she heard that Afric's bands
Were quell'd by Charles and her brave brother's hands.

Here treatment fair she met at bed and board,
But this to her can little ease afford; 560
Lost is her appetite for food and rest,
And gentle peace is banish'd from her breast.

Yet let me not so far⁴³ her tale pursue
As not again those noble knights⁴² to view,
Who each, by compact meeting, fast beside
A lonely fount his beast securely ty'd.
Their battle, which the Muse prepares to tell,
Was not in wealth or empire to excel,
But to decide who victor from the plain
Should Durindana and Bayardo gain. 570

Without a trumpet's breath to give the sign,
Or herald's voice to bid the champions join;
Without a master to direct, or raise
In either's breast the thirst of noble praise;
At once, as by accord, their swords they drew,
And each on each with generous ardour flew.
Now swift, now heavy fell the sounding blows,
Deep and more deep the kindling combat glows.
No swords like these could through the world be
found,

So fram'd at all essays with temper sound, 580
While with quick sight impelling from above, 640
While these, so temper'd, edge to edge oppos'd,
A thousand times in horrid crash could meet,
And still with blade unhurt each stroke repeat.
Now here now there, his steps Rinaldo ply'd,
And every art of long experience try'd
To shun the blows, as Durindana fell,
Whose all-destroying edge he knew so well:
Or where they reach'd, they reach'd with empty
sound,

Where fierce the stroke, but feeble was the wound.
With greater skill the gallant Christian foe 591
Has stunn'd the Pagan's arm with many a blow;
Now at his flank, now where the cuirass ends
And helmet joins, the whirling sword he sends;

⁴² Uliana appears again, Book xxxvii. ver. 185, and these three knights are mentioned in the same book.

⁴³ He returns to Bradamant, Book xxxv. ver. 231.

⁴⁴ The last we heard of these two knights was in Book lxxi. the end.

But finds the plates and rattling mail, unbroke,
With adamantine proof resist each stroke
His weapon aim'd; for more than mortal charms
Secur'd the Pagan knight's impassive arms.

Thus long, with like success, on either side 599
These eager knights the doubtful combat ply'd;
Nor swerv'd a single look, while each intent,
His eyes upon his rival's features bent:
When, lo! a different conflict chang'd, that turn'd
The rage of strife which either beam burn'd:
Rous'd at a dreadful noise, each turns his eyes,
And sore beset the steed Bayardo spies.

They see Bayardo with a monster join'd
In dangerous fight: he seem'd of feather'd kind,
A bird of wondrous size and dreadful strength,
And full three yards his bill's enormous length:
His other parts the form obscene display'd 611
Of lonely bats that haunt the gloomy shade.

His plumes were inky black, of vast extent;
His hooky claws on spoil and ravine bent;
His eyes were fire, and cruel was his look,
And like two sails⁴⁵ his ample wings he shook.
Ne'er have I seen, nor heard in times of old
Of such a bird, save this by Turpin told;

And hence I deem some fiend might cheat the sight,
Some lying demon drawn from deepest night 620
By Malagigi's art, to stay the fight.

So deem'd Rinaldo, and with anger mov'd,
When next they met his kinsman he reproov'd;
But Malagigi, who the charge deny'd,
The deed, imputed to himself, to hide,
Swore by that light from which the morning drew
Her beams, that hence nor blame nor guilt he knew.

Yet whether bird or demon—from the skies
The monster falls, and on Bayardo flies
With sharpen'd claws, but soon with fierce disdain
The fiery courser snaps the brittle rein: 631

He snorts, he foams, he piles his spurring heels;
Again in air the feather'd monster wheels
Retiring swift; again th' assault renews
With pungent nails, and circling round possesses
The generous steed, who, worsted in the fight,
Forsakes th' unequal fray and speeds his flight:

Swift to the neighbouring wood Bayardo flew,
Where thickest trees with tangling branches grew,
While with quick sight impelling from above, 640
The winged monster good Bayardo drove
From shade to shade, till now a gloomy cave
To the tir'd steed a welcome shelter gave.

The track here lost, and baffled of his aim,
The peat ascends to seek a different game.

When king Gradasso and Rinaldo view'd
Bayardo's loss, no more their hands pursue'd
A fruitless strife; but either knight agreed
With separate course to seek th' affrighted steed;
When he, whom Fortune favour'd first, should bring
The beast recover'd to the crystal spring; 651

And there, in single trial, man to man,
Conclude the combat they so late began.

The fountain left, the knights prepar'd to trace
Bayardo's flight, but soon his rapid pace
Had left each knight behind in hopeless chase.

⁴⁵ Thus Spenser, speaking of a dragon's wings, says:

His flaggy wings when forth he did display,
Were like two sails.—

Fairy Queen, book i. c. xii. st. 10.

As near Gradasso's side Alfons stood,
Her seat he gain'd, and spurring through the wood
Soon left the Paladin with doubt oppress,
The chance revolving in his careful breast. 660
Bayardo's track full soon Rinaldo lost,
Bayardo, that in devions windings crost
The thorny maze, and sought the thickest shade,
And hollow rocks, and through deep torrents
made

His furious way, from that dire fiend to fly,
Whose griping talons urg'd him from the sky.

Now here, now there, Rinaldo rovd in vain,
Till to the fountain's side he turn'd again;
There pass'd awhile in hope (as each agreed)
To see Gradasso thither bring the steed: 670

But when all hope was vanish'd from his thought,
Alone, on foot, the Christian camp he sought

Pensive and sad.—But turn we now to tell
What better chance the rival knight befel;

Whom fortune led with favour'd course so near,
Bayardo's neighing reach'd his joyful ear,

Till in a cavern deep immers'd from sight,
He found him trembling, fearful of the light:

He durst not issue forth, but there remain'd
Till him the Pagan's eager hand detain'd; 680

Who while he knew his promise given, to lead
The courser back, yet little seems to heed

His plighted faith, but to himself he cries:
"Who covets strife, with strife may win the prize:

Why should I risk the chance of arms to gain
What fortune bids me now in peace retain?

From furtbest east I came with great design
To make this generous steed Bayardo mine;

And much he errs who thinks I shall forgo
What chance vouchsafes so aptly to bestow; 690

If e'er Rinaldo would his steed regain,
As I to France, let him with equal pain

To India bend his course, the toil no more
For him to traverse Sericana o'er,

Than twice for me to tread on Gallia's shore."
He said; and speaking, by the readiest way

To Ari hasten'd, where his vessels lay;
There swift embark'd, and with him thence convey'd

The far-fam'd steed and death-bestowing blade.
But cease we here—some other time shall tell 700

What fortune to the Pagan prince befel;
We bid Rinaldo⁶¹ now and France farewell.

Astolpho's voyage⁶² let us next pursue,
Whose steed with rapid eagle-pinions flew.

When now the knight had Gallia's land survey'd
'Twixt sea and sea, from where far-winding stray'd

The silver Rhine, to where the subject plain
Joins high Pyrene's foot, he turns his reins

To where the western mountains sever France from Spain.

Thence proud Navarre and Aragon he views, 710
While every eye amaz'd his sight pursues,
Far Teracona to the left remains,
Biscaglia to the right; and now he gains

Castilia's realm, then Lisbon's towers descries,
And next o'er Seville and Cordova flies;

⁶¹ Durindana.

⁶² He returns to Gradasso, Book xl. ver. 360.

⁶³ He returns to Rinaldo, Book xxviii. ver. 53. ver. 505.

⁶⁴ The last we heard of Astolpho was Book xxiii. ver. 116, where he left his horse and arms with Bradamant.

Nor leaves a Spanish city to explore
That stood remote from sea, or grac'd the shore.
Gades he saw, and now the bounds he trac'd
Which once for mariners Alcides plac'd.

Now from th' Atlantic wave his course he bore 720
By Afric's coast to reach th' Egyptian shore.
The Buleares far beneath him lay;

Evisa rose conspicuous in his way;
Then tow'rds Arzilla, o'er the sea he rides,
The sea that from Arzilla Spain divides.

Morocco, Pez, Ippona; cities nam'd
Among the first; Algiers and Bugia, fam'd
For wealth and honours, next his eyes beheld,

Not crown'd with empty wreaths, but crown'd with gold.

Next Tunis and Biserta's sun-burnt soil 730
He sees, and Cappy, and Alzerbe's isle;

To Tripoly and Tolomita speeds,
Bernisca views, and where old Nilus leads

His fattering streams to water distant meads.
Each land he marks from Afric's billowy shore,
The rugged Atlas crown'd with forests hoar.

Then turning from Carena's ridge of hills,
Above the Cyrean spires⁶⁵ he wheels;

And near the confines of her burning sands
He Abujada sees in Nubian lands: 740

He leaves the tomb of Battus⁶⁶ far behind,
And Amon's fane, which we no more can find.

Another Tremizon he views, whose race
Th' unbelov'd faith of Mahomet embrace:

Then tow'rds a second Ethiopia turns,
Beyond where Nilus pours his fruitful urns:

His wings he then to Nubia's city plies,
That twixt Dabada and Cosiles lies:

Here Saracens, and Christians there prepar'd,
With ready arms their country's frontier guard. 750

In Ethiopia king Senapus reigns⁶⁷,
Who, for a sceptre, in his hand sustains

The holy cross; who boasts of wealth and power,
Of towns and subjects to the Red-sea shore.

Our faith he keeps, that faith whose heavenly light
Can lead him from the realms of death and night:

Here, as the tenets of their law require,
(If fame deceive not) they baptize with fire⁶⁸:

⁶⁵ He means the cities of the Mediterranean in the province of Cyrene.

⁶⁶ The city of Cyrene in Asia was built by Battus: Catullus says,

Et Batti veteris sacrum sepulchrum.

⁶⁷ The relation which the poet makes of the wealth and power of this prince, called by us (as he afterwards says) Prester-John, though blended with fable, is partly historical. Under the name of Abyssinia, or the kingdom of Prester-John, were formerly comprehended all the countries between the lake Niger and the straits of Babel-mandel on one side, and all between the mountains of the Moon and the cataracts of the Nile: the last was the length from north to south, and the other from east to west: Abyssinia had to the south Monomotapa; to the east Zanzibar and the Red Sea; to the south Egypt and Nubia; and to the west the country of Negroes called Congo. Ariosto calls the country of Senapus 'all Nubia; but it has been before shown that our author is by no means correct in his geography.

⁶⁸ The Nubians relate that their ancestors received the faith from St. Matthew, and that they

Astolpho now to Nubia's palace flew,
And there alighting near Senapus drew. 760

The seat where Ethiopia's sovereign dwell'd,
In wealth and beauty more than strength excell'd;
The bars and bolts that every gate defend,
The massy chains that from the bridge depend,
Whate'er in other cities we behold
Of iron wrought, here flam'd of beaten gold;
Though mines they boasted fruitful to produce
Strong metals to apply for every use.

On columns huge, of shining crystal rais'd,
With matchless pomp the regal palace blaz'd: 770
Each spacious room thick-set with precious stone,
With red and purple, gold and azure shone:
Gems of all hues! where in fair order beam'd
The fiery ruby, where the emerald gleam'd
With softer light, and where the sapphire show'd
Its azure tint, or yellow topaz glow'd.
The walls, the roofs, the pavement struck the sight,
Thick sown with pearls, with dazzling jewels bright.

This climate balsam breeds, and midst her store
Jerusalem's rich land can boast no more. 780

Hence musk is brought, hence every rich perfume,
Hence amber, hence all ocean's treasures come.
Whate'er through Earth of costly name we prize,
This happy region for mankind supplies.
The Soldan who th' Egyptian sceptre sways,
As fame declares, his vassal tribute pays
To this great king, whose hand can turn aside,
And bid the Nile in other channels glide;
Whence Famine must her scourge on Cairo spread,
And desolation round the country shed: 790

His name Senapus, by his subjects known,
By us 't is Prester call'd, or Prester-John.

Of all that Ethiopia's kingdom held,
This king in honours, wealth, and might excell'd:
But what avail'd his honours, wealth, or might,
When wretched blindness veil'd his visual light?

Yet this his least of ills—a deeper woe
This hapless prince was doom'd to undergo.

Who, while his wealth all other wealth outshin'd,
In plenty's lap with endless famine pin'd. 800

When hunger urg'd him to the genial board,
With nectar'd draughts and various viands stor'd,
Scarce was he seated, when th' avenging crew
Of hell-bred harpies, horrible to view,

With ravenous talons seiz'd the savoury treat,
O'erturn'd the vases and devour'd the meat:
Their glutton maws surcharg'd, the birds unclean
Defil'd the remnant cates with filth obscene.

The cause was this—In early life so rais'd
Above the world, o'er every monarch prais'd, 810

Like Lucifer with pride his boom burn'd,
Against his Maker impious arms he turn'd,
And to the mountain led his numerous force,
Whence Egypt's mighty stream derives its source.

'T was fam'd, that where the hoary mountain rear'd
Its head to Heaven, and o'er the clouds appear'd,
Was Paradise of old, those happy bowers
Where Adam pass'd with Eve the blissful hours.

With elephants and camels, with a train
Of countless foot that lumber'd all the plain, 820

were baptized with fire, being marked with a burning iron in the face or some part of the body, with the sign of the cross, in allusion to that text of Scripture: "I baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire."

He march'd, nam'd whatever race unknown
Might there reside, to bend them to his throne.
But Heaven's high will oppos'd his rash intent,
And midst his host a vengeful angel sent,
Whose dreadful power a hundred thousand slew,
And o'er his eyes eternal darkness drew;
Then to his festive board despatch'd the band
Of horrid monsters from th' infernal strand.
The wretched king of all relief despair'd,
From what a Meer, of foresight deep, declar'd, 830

That rapine should no more his table waste,
Nor ordure mingle with each day's repast,
When on a winged steed a stranger-knight
Was seen through air to guide his rapid flight.
This, passing all belief, had long suppress'd
Each little hope that linger'd in his breast.

Soon as the crowds beheld, with wondering eye,
Above the walls, above the turrets high,
Th' approaching knight, one few with eager zeal
To Nubia's king, these tidings to reveal: 840
The prophecy recalling to his mind,
For joy he leaves his faithful staff behind,
And with extended arms and guideless feet,
Impatient comes the flying guest to meet.

Astolpho, wheeling many a round in air,
At length alights within the castle square:
The sightless monarch, to his presence led,
With lifted hands before him kneel'd, and said:

"Angel from God! thou new Messiah, bear
A wretch, alas! unworthy to prefer 850
His guilty suit—yet think 't is man's to fall
In error still, but thine to pardon all!
My crime I know, nor dare I sinful pray
To view, with sight restor'd, the beams of day:
Though sure to thee such sovereign power is given,

God's favour'd nuntiate from the blest in Heaven I
Suffice, I live in never-ending gloom;
But let not famine still my age consume:
Ah! stretch thy hand—thy saving help afford,
And chase the harpies from my wretched board.
Then midst my palace walls I vow to raise 861
A marble temple sacred to thy praise,
On every part resplendent to behold,
With dazzling gems, the roof and gates of gold!
Thy name shall to the fane a title give,
And there thy miracle in sculpture live."

So speaks the king, who rolls his sightless eyes,
While oft to kiss the warrior's feet he tries.

Astolpho then—"From God no angel I,
Nor new Messiah lighted from the sky; 870
But mortal man, like thee to error prone,
Unworthy of the grace that Heaven has shown:
Yet all I can—this arm thy force shall prove,
By death or flight the monsters to remove:
If I succeed—to God thy thanks repay,
Who for thy succour hither wing'd my way.
For him alone be all thy vows fulfill'd,
To him thy altars raise, thy temples build."

As thus they commun'd, with th' attendant state
Of circling peers that reach'd the palace gate, 880
The monarch bade his train the table spread
With wine and cates, and life-sustaining bread;

So speaks the king, who rolls his sightless eyes,
While oft to kiss the warrior's feet he tries.

See the whole passage—Con spacious note.—
So in the 10th book—large note.—

Milton adopts a similar expression in the flight of Satan, book iii. ver. 741.

Throws his steep flight in many an airy wheel—

He hop'd at length, long shrunk with pining fast,
To satiate now with undisturb'd repast.

Within a sumptuous hall, beside him plac'd,
Alone Astolpho with Senapus grac'd
The regal feast; and now the feast appear'd,
When soon in air a dreadful noise was heard
Of rushing wings; and, lo! the harpy crew
Lur'd by the viands round the table flew. 890

See'n in a band they came, of dreadful mien,
With woman's face⁶⁶, with features pale and lean
Through seeming fast; from every withering look
Fear, worse than death, the boldest bosom shook:
Large were their wings deform'd, their brutal paws,

Of ravenous force, were arm'd with hooky claws:
Vast was each fetid paunch, with many a fold
Of serpent-tail band in volumes roll'd.
They seize the meats, o'erturn the golden vase,
And leave their loathsome orders in the place; 900
While their foul wombs a horrid stench exhale,
That chokes the senses and loads the tainted gale.

Astolpho now his shining falchion bares,
And swift t' assault the dreadful crew prepares;
Now on his neck, or tail, his weapon tries;
Now on the breast, or wing, his force applies:
As from soft wool returns the bloodless sword;
The fated plumes and skin no pass afford.
Meanwhile of every dish and vase they make
Their greedy havoc, nor the hall forsake, 910
Till each with rapine has the viands shar'd,
Or filth polluted what their hunger spar'd.

Senapus in the duke his hope had plac'd
To see the harpies from his table chas'd,
And now his hope deceiv'd, again he mourn'd,
Again he sigh'd, again despair return'd.

At length, his magic horn recall'd to mind,
From which such aid he oft was wont to find.
At all assays, the duke resolv'd to prove
Its virtue now the monsters to remove; 920
But first he bade the king and nobles near
With doctile wax to bar the listening ear
From all access—else each, with fear agast,
Would fly the palace at the dreadful blast.

He mounts the griffin-steed, one hand sustains
The polish'd horn, one holds the straiten'd reins:
He bids, by signs, the seneschal replace
The savoury viands, and the plenteous vase.
Then, in a new saloon, the train prepare
The festive table spread with costly fare; 930
When swift the harpies to their prey return,
As swift Astolpho to the rattling horn
His lips applies; when, with unguarded ear
The senns receive the sound, and struck with fear
Each backward shrinks, and stretching to the wind
Her pinions, leaves the feast untouched behind.
To chase their flight, the champion spurs his steed,
That spreads his strong-plum'd wing with ready
speed:

He quits the hall, from court and city flies,
And soaring drives the monsters through the skies.

⁶⁶ Imitated closely from Virgil.

Virginei volucrum vultus, fœdissima ventris
Proluvies, uncaque massas, et pallida semper
Ora fame ———— Æneid. iii. ver. 218.

With virgin faces, but with wombs obscene,
Foul paunches, and with ordures still unclean,
With claws for hands, and with looks for ever lean.
Dryden, ver. 262.

Astolpho swells each note with double force, 941
While towards the burning zone with headlong
course

The harpies speed, till now the hill they gain,
Whose towering head o'erlooks the subject plain,
Whence, fame relates, the Nile's first fountain
glides,

And gladdens Egypt with its fattening tides.
Beneath the mountain, opening deep and wide,
A cave descended in its rugged side,
Through which, 't was said, a dreadful passage led
To reach th' infernal mansions of the dead. 950
The band of spoilers hither flew to meet,
From every new research a safe retreat;
And sinking pierc'd to black Cocytus' shore,
Where that dread-dealing blast could sound no
more.

At this dire mouth that op'd the secret way
To those who lost the cheering beams of day,
The glorious duke his horn's deep clangour ceas'd,
And clos'd the pinions of his winged beast.

But ere I further shall his steps pursue,
To keep the custom of my tale in view, 960
Since every leaf is fill'd, the book I close,
And here concluding seek awhile repose.

BOOK XXXIV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Astolpho pursues the harpies to the mouth of the infernal region, at the foot of a high mountain.
He enters, and meets with the ghost of Lydia, daughter of the king of Lydia, who relates to him her story and the cause of her punishment.
He hears the names of several condemned to suffer there for crimes committed on Earth.
Astolpho attempts to penetrate further into that place of torment, but is obliged to return. He then flies to the top of the mountain, where he finds the terrestrial Paradise. Description of the place. He is welcomed by Saint John the evangelist, the prophets Enoch and Elias. Saint John instructs Astolpho concerning the manner of restoring Orlando to his senses. He conveys the knight, in a chariot, to the region of the Moon; the many wonders Astolpho saw there, and among the rest Orlando's wit, which the evangelist permits him to take with him. Saint John shows the knight the three fatal sisters spinning the thread of life.

INSATIATE harpies! I foul detested band!
The scourge of justice on a sinful land,
The righteous punishment by Heaven assign'd
For Italy, with tenfold error blind!
Where harmless infants, tender mothers die
With meagre want; for while a vain supply

harpies to signify avarice. Others may imagine, and with some reason, that the poet rather means to satirize the vice of gluttony, which perhaps might be prevalent in his age. Fosari says, (of which opinion is likewise sir John Harrington,) that Ariosto meant by harpies, the soldiers of the enemy, whose avarice and rapacity had plundered Italy.

Each day prepares, they see their destin'd food
At once devour'd by this infernal brood.
Ill chance betide who first unclod'd the cave,
(Which years had shut) and thus a passage gave Whence gluttony and all uncleanness spread 11
O'er Italy their venom'd bans have shed.
Fair virtue then was banish'd from mankind,
And peace and temp'rance from the world disjoin'd;
Whence pain, and poverty, and impious strife
Have vex'd, and long shall vex the sweets of life,
Till time shall come, when thus with wakening cries
Our country bids her sons from Letus rise.

"Is there not one that dares the worth unfold
Which Calah and Zetes* showed of old; 20
To man a house his saving hand afford,
And free from filth and spoil the genital board;
As those could help to aged Phineas bring,
And since Astolpho to the Nubian king?"

With dreadful-sound the Paladin had chas'd
The brutal barpies through th' aerial waste,
Till at a mountain's foot his flight he stay'd,
Where in a gaping cavern's fearful shade
The monsters enter'd—hence with wondering ears
Laments and groans the listening warrior hears, 30
That reach'd through winding vaults the upper air;
Sure sign of Hell and endless torments there.

Astolpho now resolves to explore the way,
And visit beings lost to cheerful day,
To Earth's deep centre undismay'd to go,
And search the secrets of the world below.

"Why should I doubt to enter here," he cries,
"When such defence my trusty horn supplies,
Whose sound can Pluto's self and Satan's quell,
And from his post the three-mouth'd dog repel?" 40

He said; and lighting from his seat with speed,
Ty'd to a neighbouring tree his feather'd steed;
Then grasp'd his horn, his every hope and aid,
And fearless plunged amid the murky shade.
Ere far he reach'd, thick wreaths of noisome smoke
And streams of sulphur on his senses broke:
His sight and smell the stifling fumes confess'd,
Yet onward still th' embolden'd hero press'd;
But as he press'd, the darkness deeper spread,
And grosser vapours noxious poison shed, 50
When, lo! as if suspended from above,
He sees an object, scarce distinguish'd, move,
Move, as by winds some wretched corpse is blown,
Long time expos'd to rains and parching sun;

* Feigned by the poets to have been sons of the wind Boreas and Orithya, daughter of king Eri-theus; they were horn with wings, and drove the barpies from the table of blind Phineas, king of Thrace, in the same manner as is here told of Astolpho. See Ovid's Metam.

‡ In like manner Tasso blends the Heathen fables with the Christian doctrines. See Jerusalem Delivered, book iv. Spenser, in a description of Hell according to the Heathen mythology, after the mention of Tantalus, introduces the soul of Pilate washing his hands in the infernal river:—

He look'd a little further and espy'd
Another wretch, whose carcass deep was drent
Within the river—

The knight him calling, asked who he was,
Who lifting up his head him answer'd thus:
I Pilate am, the falsest judge, alas! &c.

Fairy Queen, b. xi. c. 7. st. 61.

So faint the struggling beams of wandering light
In these dire realms of smoke and dreary night.
In vain the duke explores with heedful care
What mocks his eyes, and seems to sit in air:
Then from the sheath his shining sword he drew,
And thrice he struck, when soon the warrior knew
The seeming image but an empty shade, 61
That like a cloud deceiv'd his mortal blade.
Then thus he heard a female voice complain:
"Ah! come not here to work me further pain!
Suffice—this smoke torments my wretched ghost,
This smoke that rises from the burning coast."

The duke, with terror seiz'd, his step represt,
And in these words the hapless shade address'd:
"So may high Heaven these stifling fumes repel,
As thou shalt deign thy mournful state to tell; 70
Thy tidings to our living world I bear,
If this can aught avail to soothe thy care."
The ghost reply'd—"To visit but in name
The cheerful realms of light from which I came,
So grateful seems, that gladly I disclose,
For such reward, the story of my woes;
Else should I now with lips unwilling tell
My name, and earthly state from which I fell.

"Once was I Lydia call'd, of royal strain,
(Whose sire o'er Lydia held his wide domain) 80
By God's eternal judgment here expos'd
To endless pains, with poisonous smoke enclos'd;
Who, while alive, such scorn and hatred show'd
To one, whose heart with love's affection glow'd.
Unnumber'd others fill this dreary gloom,
Whom to like penalty like offences doom.
Here cruel Anaxarete⁴ in woe,
Encompass'd round with denser fumes below,
Is deeper plac'd; on Earth her body turns
To harden'd stone, while here her spirit mourns; 90
Unfeeling maid! who view'd in shameful death
Her pendent lover yield his wretched breath.
Daphne is here⁵, who now regrets the pace
That held Apollo once so long in chase.

'T were hard to tell th' unbodied female train
That here for black ingratitude remain;
Or speak the crimes of every dame or maid,
Where countless numbers fill the mournful shade;
But harder still each man ingrate to name,
Whose deeds on Earth here equal vengeance claim;
Where each in death severer judgment mourns, 101
The vapour smokes him, and the furnace burns.
Since dames are form'd more easy to believe,
Man merits heavier pains who shall deceive
Their weaker sex—this Jason has confess'd,
This Theseus finds, and he⁶, the wandering guest,
Whose arms the Latian's ancient realm oppress'd.

⁴ Anaxarete was a beautiful damsel of Cyprus, beloved by Iphis, a native of the same place, who, in desperation at not being able to move her to return his passion, was determined never to depart from her threshold. Venus, enraptured at the cruelty of Anaxarete, changed her into stone. See Ovid's Metam.

⁵ Nothing can be wilder than this idea of Ariosto, who in a region of future punishment upon a Christian system places Daphne for running away from Apollo.

⁶ Encas.

⁷ I know not what the defenders of Æneas will say to Ariosto, for placing their hero in such comic party; but, upon the whole, I believe the ladies

This well he knows, who could for Tamar's love
His brother Absalom to hatred move.
Here shades on shades lament their former lives,¹¹⁰
Their husbands' doom, and some betray'd their wives,
Now of myself above the rest I tell,
And show the crime that doom'd me here to dwell.

"Great was my beauty when this deathless mind
Was clothed in flesh; and though of womankind
None match'd my form, I know not which was most,
My person's charms, or pride those charms to boast.
A knight there was in Thrace, whose noble name
For martial prowess stood the first in fame,
Who oft had heard from foreign tongues declare
My blooming grace, the fairest of the fair: 121
Fid' with my praise, to me th' enamour'd youth
Decreed the tender of his love and truth;
Nor thought, such merit pleading on his side,
To find his heart refus'd, his suit deny'd.
To Lydia then he came, where when he view'd
My every grace, he found his soul subdu'd.
Awhile residing at my father's court
Amidst the knights that thither made resort,
His honours grew, and oft in fight so well 130
His sword prevail'd; that now 't were long to tell,
What deeds he wrought for one whose thankless
mind

But ill deserv'd such matchless worth to find,
By him my sire Cilicia's kingdom won,
And Caria and Pamphilia's land o'er-ran.
Without his counsel never would he show
The martial troops array'd against a foe. [claim
The knight, who deem'd his service well might
The royal favour, to the monarch came,
And begg'd, for all his hard-earn'd glorious spoils,
My hand in marriage to reward his toils. 141
His suit the king refus'd, who sought to join
His daughter to some prince's nobler line,
Not to a knight, to whom the Fates afford
No wealth or power, save honour and his sword:
So much, alas! could gold my sire entice,
Detested avarice! nurse of every vice!
To worth or virtue he inclines his ears,
As the dull ass the heavenly minstrel hears. 149

"When now the knight (Alcestes was his name)
Found that withheld to which he urg'd his claim
Of just desert, he left as with a threat
The king hereafter should too late regret
My hand deny'd: Armenia then he gain'd,
Whose king with Lydia's king long strife maintain'd,
And late with grief had seen more powerful grow
The hated empire of his deadly foe.

will not think themselves the less obliged to him.
Surely, let every one frankly confess his feelings on the impartial perusal of the Æneid, and he will not declare his heart strongly affected in favour of a character, which it is supposed was meant by Virgil for a model of perfection. Who does not revolt at the great incident of the ivth book, and at the other incidents in the latter part of the poem, where a foreign prince comes to separate two lovers apparently plighted to each other, and for whom I will venture to affirm that every reader of sensibility feels an interest? May it not, with the utmost deference to great authority, be observed, that this conduct seems wonderful in a writer of such consummate judgment as Virgil?

* An old proverb—Arctus ad Tyrann. See Erasmus.

Him soon Alcestes urges to prepare
His bands, and on my sire renew the war:
Himself, so fam'd in battle, at their head, 160
Against the Lydian realm the forces led.
He vow'd to conquer in Armenia's right
Whatever he won, save only to requite
His glorious service, he reserv'd my charms
Of all the spoils that crown'd the victor's arms.
How shall I tell when my stern lover fought,
What foes, what ruin on my sire he brought!
His armies thrice he broke, and ere the Sun
One year had circled, all his towns he won;
All, save a castle, strongly built, that rose 170
On hanging cliffs; here from th' exulting foes
The king retir'd, and here, with fearful haste,
His nearest friends and choicest treasure plac'd.
But, as so close the siege Alcestes press'd,
That soon my wretched father, sore distress'd,
Had gladly made me with a kingdom's dower
His wife, the slave or vassal of his power,
T' avert the greater ill—for well he knows
This fort at length must yield before the foe,
And he his life in cruel bondage close. 180

"Now every means of safety to pursue
In such extreme, he fix'd on me, who drew
Such ruin down, to quit this last retreat,
And in his camp incens'd Alcestes meet.
To him (so bade my sire) I took my way,
My captive person at his feet to lay,
And beg him at our prayer his wrath to cease,
T' accept our proffer'd terms, and grant the peace.

Alcestes, when my near approach he heard,
With eager haste to meet my steps appear'd: 190
Pale in my sight the trembling lover stood,
And less my victor than my prisoner show'd.
I saw big passion struggling in his breast,
And for new wiles my purpos'd speech suppress'd;
Then took the fair occasion to reprove
The dire effects of his disastrous love;
I cur'd a love that thou oppress'd my sire,
And sought by force t' accomplish its desire;
That waited not till time with stealing pace
(Ere many days) had crown'd with better grace 200
His fondest wish, but sully'd thus the fame
Which once with king and peers his deeds might claim.

Though Lydia's sovereign might his suit deny,
As one, whose Nature fram'd not to comply
With first demands, 'll suited the pretence
(I cried) to break his faith for such offence.
Should still my father with determin'd mind
Refuse my hand, my prayers a way might find
To bend his will, or if they fail'd to bend,
Who knew what next my bosom would intend? 210
But since he sought far other means to prove,
My soul was fix'd to spurn his hated love;
And though I came, compell'd by cruel fate,
In dear compassion for a parent's state,
Yet little transport could attend those charms
Which force, not choice, had yielded to his arms,
Soon might this hand the purple current spill
Of loathsome life, thus offer'd to fulfil
The cruel wishes of un govern'd will.

"In words like these I spoke, for well I view'd,
His haughty spirit by my looks subdu'd. 221
I saw his face with sudden grief o'ercast;
So mourn requester'd sinned offences past.
Low at my knees he bent, and humbly pray'd,
While from his side he drew the shining blade,

The murderous weapon at his hand to take,
 And for his fault his life an offering make.
 "He thus dispos'd, I deem'd the conquest won,
 And to complete the work so well begun,
 I gave him fraudulent hopes he yet might prove 230
 By future deeds deserving of my love;
 If, former guilt ston'd, his arm once more
 Would to his ancient seat my sire restore,
 And seek henceforth to win a mistress' charms
 By gentle service, not by force of arms.
 His faith now pledg'd, he to the fort again
 Restor'd me free and guiltless of a stain;
 Nor ask'd one kiss his sufferings to requite—
 Judge if he felt affection's burthen light!
 Judge if for me love fill'd not all his heart; 240
 If love for me employ'd not every dart.
 Armenia's klag he sought, to whose domain
 His lips had vow'd whate'er his sword might gain;
 And urg'd him close, with every bland address,
 To let my sire again his realms possess,
 To him resign each conquer'd Lydian town,
 And bound his empire with Armenia's crown.
 The king, whose cheek with wrath indignant burn'd,
 To young Alcestes answer proud return'd;
 And vow'd no more his army to disband, 250
 While yet my father held a foot of land;
 But since a worthless woman's word could turn
 Alcestes' purpose, let Alcestes mourn
 Such sickle change, 't was not for him to lose,
 At his request, a victor's glorious dues.
 "Again Alcestes urg'd, again he pray'd;
 Not prayer nor reasons could the king persuade.
 At length, incoons'd, he swore in threatening strain
 That force should win what mildness fail'd to gain.
 Rage kindling rage with many a wrathful word, 260
 Against the king Alcestes ber'd his sword,
 And slew him, spite of each surrounding friend,
 Who with drawn weapon would his prince defend.
 That day th' Armenians fled before his hand,
 And his brave followers aided with a band
 Of Thracians and Cilicians by his pay maintain'd.
 Nor fail'd the knight his fortune to pursue,
 Yet from my sire no smallest stipend drew
 To assist the war; but in a month restor'd
 The Lydian kingdom to its ancient lord. 270
 For all the loss that Lydia's crown sustain'd,
 Beside the riches which in battle gain'd
 He gave my sire, he to his empire joins
 The lands subdu'd, and levies heavy fines
 Through all Armenia, Cappadocia's reign,
 And rude Myrcania to the distant main.
 "Instead of triumph his return to greet,
 We fain with death the victor chief would meet,
 But fear withheld us, since we knew full well
 He, strong in friends, could every force repel: 280
 Hence feigning love, I gave him, day by day,
 Such flattering hope as better might betray;
 But, ere our nuptials, wish'd him for my sake
 On other foes his proof of arms to make.
 Now singly, now attended by a few,
 I sent him strange adventures to pursue;
 To seeming death I sent—but still I found
 Wit glorious conquest all his labours crown'd.
 Where'er he went—the fight he victor wag'd; 290
 Full oft with monsters front to front engag'd
 Giants and Le-strigons, whose savage band
 With brutal force infest'd Lydia's land.
 Not so Alcides, by his step-dame's wiles
 And fierce Eurytheus, was expos'd to toils,

In Lerna's lake, in Thrace, Nemea's wood,
 Etolia's valleys, near Iberos' flood;
 In Erymanthus' groves, along the strand
 Of winding Tyber, or Numidia's sand;
 As this brave youth, on whom my art had wrought
 With feign'd endearments, while each murderous
 thought 300
 On every trial urg'd his dauntless might,
 To drive a hated lover from my sight.
 My aim deceiv'd—another scheme I tried,
 From those he lov'd his friendship to divide.
 What shall I say? The empress of his soul,
 My word, my nod could every deed controul:
 To me he sacrific'd each dearest name,
 The ties of smity and calls of fame;
 Till all my father's foes remor'd I view'd,
 And rash Alcestes by himself subdu'd. 310
 Lost were his friends—and what till then conceal'd
 I kept, now notwithstanding my tongue reveal'd.
 I own'd what hatred had my bosom fir'd,
 And own'd I every way his death desir'd.
 Yet pondering what I wish'd, too well I knew
 That public odium would the deed pursue
 Which reach'd his life; his worth to all display'd
 Would move their rage for service so repaid.
 Hence (all I could) I doom'd the hapless knight
 To live for ever banish'd from my sight: 320
 To every plaint I turn'd a deafen'd ear,
 Nor letters would receive, nor message bear.
 Struck with my base ingratitude, he pin'd
 With secret anguish, till his health declin'd
 From bad to worse; and while in vain he strove
 With many a prayer my stubborn heart to move,
 On his sick bed in agonising throes
 He found a period to his life and woes.
 Lo! here the judgment that my sin pursues
 With stifling fumes, while tears my eyes suffuse;
 And here in sorrow must I ever dwell, 330
 Since no redemption can be found in Hell."
 When wretched Lydia thus had ceas'd to speak,
 The fearless duke press'd on, resolv'd to seek
 What other shades might there in pains reside;
 But deeper darkness further pass deny'd. [close
 The smoke whose wreaths th' offending ghosts en-
 In vaporous torment, dense and denser grow.
 And now the warrior turn'd his eager feet
 With backward tread, in safety to retreat, 340
 Lost life; with vapours clogg'd, should quit her weary seat;
 Now with light step the dreary path he press'd,
 The rock quick sounding as his speed increas'd,
 Ascending still, till shot from upper day
 He sees through mournful night a trembling ray;
 At length the realms of woe and pain he leaves,
 And issuing to our world new light and life receives.
 Against those ravenous fiends the pass to close,
 And back to Earth their fearful course oppose, 349
 Huge stones he heaves, and with his trenchant blade
 Hews many a tree of thick and odorous shade:
 Then to the work his noble hands he bends,
 And with strong fence the dreary mouth defends.
 Where long, high-heap'd, the crags and trunks remain,
 And Hell's dire harpies in their cave restrain.
 But while Atolpbo in th' infernal womb
 Remain'd in smoke and subterraneous gloom,
 His burnish'd arms the pitchy fumes confess'd,
 That, deep pervading, pierc'd the covering vest:
 And now he seeks to cleanse each sully'd limb; 360
 When issuing from a rock he finds a stream

That forms an ample lake, where plung'd be leaves
From head to foot in limpid cleansing waves.
His courser then he mounts, and upward springs
To reach the mountain's top¹ with daring wings;
And view those seats by fame reported near
The silver circle of the lunar sphere.
Such ardent wishes in his bosom glow,
He pants for Heaven and spurs the world below,
Ascending till with rapid steady flight 370
He gains the mansions of superlunary light.

Not emerald here so bright a verdure yields
As the fair turf of those celestial fields,
O'er whose glad face the balmy season pours
The vernal beauties of a thousand flowers.
He sees the meads one intermingled blaze,
Where pearls and diamonds dart their trembling rays

With endless tints: he mark'd the ruby's hue,
The yellow topaz, and the sapphire blue.
At once the trees with leaves unfading grow; 380
The fruits are ripen'd and the blossoms blow;
While frolic birds, gay-plum'd, of various wing
Amidst the boughs in notes melodious sing.
Still lakes and murmuring streams, with waters
clear,

Charm the fix'd eye and lull the listening ear.
A softening genial air, that ever seems
In even tenour, cools the solar beams
With fanning breeze, while from th' enamell'd field²
Whate'er the fruits, the plants, the blossoms yield
Of grateful smell, the stealing gales dispense 390
The blended sweets to feed th' immortal sense.
Amid the plain a palace dazzling bright,
Like living flame, emits a streamy light,
And wrapt in splendours of refulgent day,
Outshines the strength of every mortal ray.

Astolpho gently now directs his steed
To where the spacious pile unfolds the mead
In circuit wide, and views with raptur'd eyes
Each gameless charm that happy soil supplies.
With this compar'd, he deems our world below 400
A dreary desert and a seat of woe,
By Heaven and Nature from their wrath bestow'd
In evil hour for man's unblest abode.

Near and more near the stately walls he drew
In steadfast gaze, transported at the view;
One gem entire they seem'd, of purer red
Than deepening gleams transparent rubies shed;
Such walls as no Dedalean art could raise,
Suspendous work transcending mortal praise.
No more let man the boarded seven proclaim, 410
Those wonders of the world³ so chronic'd by Fame!

¹ Ariosto here imitates Dante in describing this mountain, where he places the terrestrial Paradise, and, after him, makes Astolpho purify himself with ablutions, from the smoke of the infernal regions, before he enters the seat of bliss.

² The following passage has much of the spirit of this description of Ariosto:

— now gentle gales,
Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense
Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
Those balmy spoils. Parad. Lost, b. iv. v. 156.

³ The wonders of the world to which the poet alludes, were seven in number according to Pliny: 1. The city of Babylon. 2. The temple of Diana at Ephesus. 3. The statue of Jupiter Olympus.

Before the palace, at the shining gate
A sage appears the duke's approach to wait,
Whose aged limbs a vest and smock hide,
This milky hu'd, and that with crimson dy'd:
Adown his breast a length of beard he wears
All silvery white, and silvery white his hairs:
His mien bespeaks th' elect of heavenly grace,
And Paradise seems open'd in his face.

Turn to the champion, who his seat forsook 420
With reverend awe, he with benignant look
These words address'd—"O thou! by God's high will

Alone conducted to this holy hill;
While little yet thou see'st the mighty cause
That to this place thy mystic journey draws:
Without a miracle thou couldst not steer
So high above the arctic hemisphere,
Sent from afar, unconscious, to debate
With me the welfare of the Christian state;
How Charles with needful succour to retrieve, 430
And from its foes our hallow'd faith relieve.
Not to thy wisdom or superior might,
Hither, O son! ascribe thy daring flight:
For know, if God's assisting hand had fail'd,
Nor horn, nor winged steed had aught avail'd.
Hereafter more at leisure shall we dwell
On themes so high; thou shalt thou hear me tell
What Heaven designs; but first with due repast
Refresh thy strength, unnerv'd with length of fast."

So spoke the holy sire: the duke amaz'd 440
With heart-felt awe and mute attention guard:
When now the saint disclos'd his sacred name,
He, from whose pen th' eternal Gospel came,
That holy John⁴, who, while on Earth, possess'd
So dear a place in his Redeemer's breast;
Of whom the fame among his brethren spread,
That time should ne'er consign him to the dead:
And thus we find in heavenly writ display'd,
The Son of God to Peter answer made:
"Why art thou troubled? What if I decree 450
His torments here my last return to see?"
Yet told he not this saint should never die,
Though what he told might well no less imply.
Lo! hither was he borne, and here to share
With him in bliss, he found a heavenly pair:
Here ancient Enoch, here Elias dwell'd,
Who neither had the hour of death beheld,
Above our air, which noxious fumes annoy,
These happy three unfading spring enjoy, 459

4. The colossus of Rhodes. 5. The palace of Cyrus, built by Memnon. 6. The pyramids of Egypt. 7. The sepulchre of Mausolus, built by his wife Artemisia, queen of Caria.

⁵ The following lines allude to a passage in the New Testament, from which some of the early Christians have inferred that Saint John was exempted from death. The legend says, that having attained the age of one hundred years, he caused a tomb to be built, and shut himself therein alive; but that a wonderful light soon surrounded the tomb, which blinded the eyes of the spectators: the light vanishing and search being made, the apostle was seen no more. Such a tradition joined to the text, was, for a poet like Ariosto, a sufficient foundation for a fiction, by no means the wildest in his poem, when we consider the innumerable legends of saints, the belief of which was in his time so prevalent throughout the Christian world.

Till the last notes th' angelic trump shall sound,
And Christ in clouds appear with glory crown'd.
Each saint with welcome comes the knight to meet,

And courteous lead him to their blest retreat,
Where, near at hand, fair ample stalls retain
His flying courser, fed with generous grain.
Before the knight delicious fruits were plac'd;
Fruits oul'd in Paradise, whose savourous taste
He surely thought might some forgiveness win
For our first parents' disobedient sin.

When now th' adventurous duke was well supply'd
With every need such dwelling could provide; 471
When nature's calls refresh'd; when genial food
And balmy slumber had his strength renew'd;
Aurora rising, who with blushing charms
All night repos'd in old Titibonus' arms;
He left his early couch, and near him stood
The sage disciple so belov'd of God,
Who grasp'd his hand, and in discourse reveal'd
High truths in converse long, though here conceal'd.

Then thus—"Since leaving France thou mayest not tell 480

What to thy dear Orlando these befel;
Learn, that the chief whose valour once in fight
Maintain'd the truth, forsaking now the right,
Is scourg'd by God, who when his anger moves,
With heavier wrath afflicts whom most he loves.
Thy dear Orlando¹², at his favour'd birth
Endow'd by Heaven above the sons of Earth
With nerves and courage, gifted to sustain
With limbs unhurt each weapon aim'd in vain:
To whom such virtue Heaven's Supreme had lent
To guard his faith unshain'd; as when he sent 491
Great Sampson forth, to save with mighty hand
His Hebrews from the fierce Philistine band:
Behold that same Orlando now afford
An ill return to Heaven's Almighty Lord!
So far a Pagan damsel's form could move
His hapless bosom to detested love;
That, more than once he for her beauty's sake
Prepar'd his faithful kinsman's life¹⁴ to take.
Hence him, in justice, God's high doom assign'd
Naked to rove, an outcast of mankind; 501
Has quench'd each sense, in wretched phrensy lost,
Lost to his friends, to all remembrance lost:
So God, of old, in annals pure we read,
In penance for his heavy sins, decreed
A monarch¹⁵ seven long years to graze the plain,
And like the brutal ox his wretched life sustain.

¹² In the poem of Aspramonte, after Orlando had slain Donahiero, a famous knight with whom he fought three days, we are told of the particular grace conferred on Orlando by the Holy Trinity, that no enemy should ever withstand his force in single combat above three days.

Questo tal caso non potea mancare
Perche Orlando quando alle battie
Affattato fu el corpo d'alto affare
Quando che a lui venelli santi trie
Disse nessuno li' possa durare
A la battaglia più che il tempo die,
Hor lasso di quei santi el lor desio
Torno o Gerardo——

Aspramonte, c. xxxiii.

¹⁴ Rinaldo, with whom Orlando fought for Angelica, as appears from Boyardo.

¹⁵ Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.

But since the Paladin less guilt secur'd,
Than he condemn'd to mingle with the herd
Three months alone, the sage decrees of Heaven
Th' allotted time to atone his fault have given. 511
Not for less cause to this celestial height
Our dear Redeemer now permits thy flight;
Than from my lips such counsel to receive,
That lost Orlando may his wits retrieve.
But first this globe of earth and sea forsake,
And led by me, a flight more daring take
To yonder Moon, that in its orbit rolls
The nearest planet to our earthly poles.
Lo! there is kept, what only can supply 520
Orlando's wisdom, once esteem'd so high;
And when this night above our heads in view
She wheels her course, our journey we'll pursue."

Thus all the live-long day th' apostle mild
With sage discourse the flying hours beguil'd;
But when the Sun was sunk in ocean's stream,
And from her horns the Moon her silver beam
Above them shed, a wondrous car appear'd,
That oft through those bright fields of ether steer'd:
The same that, where Judean mountains rise, 530
Receiv'd Elias, rapt from mortal eyes.
Four coursers, red as flame, the hallow'd sage,
The blest historian of the sacred page,
Join'd to the yoke; and now the reins he held;
And, by Astolpo plac'd, the steeds impel'd
To rise aloft: soft rose the wondrous car.
The wheels smooth turning through the yielding air
The favour'd warrior and the guiding seer
Ascending till they reach'd the torrid sphere:
Here fire eternal burns, but while they pass'd, 540
No noxious heat the raging vapours cast.
Through all this elemental flame they soar'd,
And next the circle of the Moon explor'd,
Whose spheric face in many a part outshin'd
The polish'd steel from spots and rust refin'd:
Its orb, increasing to their nearer eyes,
Swell'd like the Earth, and seem'd an Earth in size,
Like this huge globe, whose wide extended space
Vast oceans with circumfluent waves embrace.
Astolpo wondering view'd what to our sight 550
Appears a narrow round of silver light:
Nor could he thence¹⁶ but with a sharpen'd eye
And bending brow our lands and seas descry
The land and seas he left, which, clad in shade
So far remote, to viewless forms decay'd.
Far other lakes than ours this region yields,
Far other rivers, and far other fields;
Far other valleys, plains, and hills supplies,
Where stately cities, towns, and castles rise.
Here lonely woods large tracts of land embrace,
Where sylvan nymphs pursue the savage chase, 561
Deep in a vale, conducted¹⁷ by his guide,
Where rose a mountain steep on either side,

¹⁶ Very like this is the passage in Tasso, where the poet describes the vision of Godfrey, where he here takes a view of the Earth at an immense distance beneath him.

¹⁷ Milton has translated a few lines of this passage:

His guide him brings

Into a goodly valley, where he sees
Things that on Earth were lost or were abus'd, &c.

His account of the Limbo of Vanity is wonderfully in the spirit of Ariosto, and undoubtedly the

We came, and saw (a wonder to relate)
 What'er was wasted in our earthly state
 Here safely treasure'd: each neglected good;
 Time squander'd, or occasion ill-bestow'd.
 Not only here are wealth and sceptres found,
 That, ever changing, shift th' unsteady round:
 But those possessions, while on Earth we live, 570
 Which Fortune's hand can neither take nor give.
 Much fame is there, which here the creeping hours
 Consume till time at length the whole devours.
 There vows and there unnumber'd prayers remain,
 Which oft to God the sinner makes in vain.
 The frequent tears that lovers' eyes suffuse;
 The sighs they breathe: the days that gamesters lose.

The leisure given which fools so oft neglect;
 The weak designs that never take effect.
 What'er designs the mortal breast assail, 580
 In countless numbers fill th' encumber'd vale.
 For know, what'er is but by human kind,
 Ascending here you treasure'd safe may find.
 The wandering Paladin the beads admir'd,
 And now of these and now of those inquir'd.
 Of bladders huge a mountain he beheld,
 That seem'd within by shouts and tumults swell'd,

Idea was caught from the Italian poet. This line
 plainly alludes to Ariosto:
 Not in the neighbouring Moon, as some have dream'd.

Describing Satan on the outer convex of this planetary system, he thus proceeds:

the fiend
 Walk'd up and down alone, bent on his prey;
 Alone, for other creature in this place
 Living or lifeless to be found was none;
 None yet, but store hereafter from the Earth
 Up hither like aerial vapours flew,
 Of all things transitory and vain, when sin,
 With vanity had fill'd the works of men;
 Both all things vain, and all who in vain things
 Built their fond hopes of glory or lasting fame.

All th' unaccomplish'd works of Nature's hand,
 Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mix'd,
 Dissolv'd on Earth, fleet hither, and is vain,
 Till final dissolution, wander here,
 Not in the neighbouring Moon as some have dream'd.

Hither of ill-join'd sons and daughters born,
 First from the ancient world those giants came—

Others came single; he who to be deem'd
 A god, leapt fondly into Ætna flames,
 Empedocles; and he, who to enjoy
 Plato's elysium, leapt into the sea,
 Cleombrotus; and many more too long,
 Embryos and idiots, crevices and friars,
 White, black, and grey, with all their trumpery.

all these uphild aloft
 Fly o'er the backside of the world far off
 Into a Limbo, large and broad, since call'd
 The Paradise of Fools— Parod. Lost. b. iii.

Mr. Addison has censured this passage as beneath the dignity of Milton's subject; but, what is very extraordinary, does not seem to know how closely he has followed Ariosto.

And imagin'd found by these the crowns of yore
 Which Lydian and Assyrian monarchs wore,
 Which Greeks and Persians own'd, once great in fame, 590

And scarcely now remember'd but in name.
 Of gold and silver form'd, a heavy load
 Of hooks he saw, and these were gifts bestow'd
 By needy slaves, in hope of rich rewards,
 On greedy princes, kings, and patron lords.
 He saw in garlands many a snare conceal'd;
 And flatteries base his guide in these reveal'd.
 There forms of creaking grasshoppers he spy'd;
 Smooth verses these to fawning praise apply'd.
 There sparkling chains he found and knots of gold,
 The spacious ties that ill-pair'd lovers hold. 601
 There eagles' talons lay, which here below
 Are power that lords on deputies bestow.
 On every cliff were numerous bellows cast,
 Great princes' favours these that never last;
 Given to their minions first in early prime,
 And soon again resum'd with stealing time.
 Cities he saw o'erturn'd, and towers destroy'd,
 And endless treasures scatter'd through the void:
 Of these he ask'd; and these (reply'd the sire) 610
 Were treasures foul, and machinations dire.

No serpents then with female faces view'd,
 Of coiners and of thieves the hateful brood.
 Of broken vials many heaps there lay;
 These were the services that courts repay.
 He saw a steaming liquid scatter'd round
 Of savoury food; and from his teacher found
 That this was salms, which, while his last he breathes,
 A wretched sinner to the poor bequeaths.
 Then to a hill of vary'd flowers they went, 620
 That sweet before, now yields a fetid scent;
 This (let me dare to speak) that present show'd,
 Which on Sylvester Constantine bestow'd;
 Of bird-lime twigs he saw vast numbers there;
 And these, O gentle dames! your beauties were.

"By this gift is understood the city of Rome,
 which Constantine the Great gave pope Sylvester, which he saith now stinketh, because of their sins."

Sir John Harrington.

In the first edition of the poem the passage stood thus:

Ad un monte di rose e gigli passo,
 Ch'ebbe già buon odor, o putia forte;
 Ch'era corrotto: e da Giovanni intese
 Che fù un gran don' ch'un gran signor mal spese.

Where roses and where lilies grew he went,
 A hill once sweet, but now of fetid scent,
 Corrupt and foul!—and this his teacher show'd,
 A gift by mighty hands but ill bestow'd.

"It is very remarkable that the poet had the boldness to place among these imaginary treasures, the famous deed of gift of Constantine to pope Sylvester.
 It may be observed in general, to the honour of the poets both ancient and modern, that they have ever been some of the first, who have detected and opposed the false claims and mischievous usurpa-tions of superstition and slavery. Nor can this be wondered at, since these two are the greatest enemies, not only to all true happiness, but to all true genius."

 vol. i. p. 252, 4th edit.

See note to Book xvii. ver. 352, on the same subject.

Vain is th' attempt in story to comprize
 Whate'er Astolpho saw with wondering eyes:
 A thousand told, ten thousand would remain;
 Each toil, each loss, each chance that men sustain,
 Save folly, which alone pervades them all; 630
 For folly never quits this earthly ball.
 There his past time misspent, and deeds apply'd
 To little good, Astolpho soon esp'y'd;
 Yet these, though clear beheld, had ne'er been known

But that his guide explain'd them for his own.
 At length they came to that whose want below
 None e'er perceiv'd, or breath'd for this his vow;
 That choicest gift of Heaven, by wit express,
 Of which each mortal deems himself possess. 640
 Of this Astolpho view'd a wondrous store,
 Surpassing all his eyes had view'd before.
 It seem'd a fluid mass of subtlest kind,
 Still apt to mount, if not with care contain'd:
 But gather'd there he view'd it safely clos'd,
 In many a vase of various size dispos'd.
 Above the rest the vessel's bulk excall'd,
 Whose womb Orlando's godlike reason held:
 This well he knew, for on its side were writ
 These words in letters fair, ORLANDO'S WIT.¹⁹
 Thus every vase in characters explain'd 650
 The names of those whose wits the vase contain'd:
 Much of his own the noble duke amaz'd
 Amongst them view'd, but wondering more he gaz'd
 To see the wits of those, whom late he thought
 Above their earthly peers with wisdom fraught.
 But who can such a fleeting treasure boast,
 From some new cause each hour, each moment lost?

One, while he loves; one, seeking fame to gain;
 One, wealth pursuing through the stormy main;
 One, trusting to the hopes which great men raise,
 One, whom some scheme of magic guile betrays.
 Some, from their wits for food pursuit depart, 660
 For jewels, paintings, and the works of art.
 Of poets' wits, in airy visions lost,
 Great store he read; of those who to their cost
 The wandering maze of sophistry pursu'd,
 And those who vain presaging planets view'd.

The vase that held his own Astolpho took,
 So will'd the writer of the mystic book,
 Beneath his nostril held, with quick ascent 670
 Back to its place the wit returning went.
 The duke (in holy Turpin's page is read)
 Long time a life of sage discretion led,
 Till one frail thought his brain again bereft
 Of wit, and sent it to the place it left.
 The amplest vessel fill'd above the rest
 With that fam'd sense which once the earl possess'd,
 Astolpho seiz'd, and found a heavier load
 Than plac'd amidst th' unnumber'd heap, it show'd.

Ere yet for Earth they quit that sphere of light,
 The sage apostle leads the Christian knight 681
 Within a stately dome, where, fast beside
 A rapid river rolls its constant tide.

¹⁹ This fiction of Ariosto is most wittily alluded to by Mr. Pope in his Rape of the Lock, accompanied with a fine stroke of satire; speaking of things lost in the Moon, he says:

These heroes' wits are kept in ponderous vases,
 And besur'd in snuff-boxes and tweezer-cases.

Canto iv.

²⁰ The Apocalypes.

Here heap'd with many a fleece²⁰ each man-
 view'd,

And silk and wool unwrought of various hues.
 Some fair, some foul: a beldame these with skill
 Selects, and whirling round the rapid reel
 Draws the fine thread: so from the reptile swarms
 Whose industry the silken texture forms,
 The village maid untwines the moisten'd fleece, 690
 When summer bids the pleasing task renew.
 A second beldame from the first receives
 Each finish'd work, while in its stead she leaves
 A fleece unspun: a third, with equal care
 Divides, when spun, th' ill-favour'd from the fair.
 "What means this mystic show?"—Astolpho cries
 To holy John—and thus the saint replies:
 "In yonder aged dames the Parca know,
 Who weave the thread of human life below.
 Long as the fleeces last, so long extend 700
 The days of man, but with the fleece they end.
 With watchful eyes see Death and Nature wait,
 And mark the hour to close each mortal date.
 The beautiful threads selected from the rest,
 Are types of happy souls amid the blest;
 These form'd for Paradise: the bad are those Condemn'd for sin to never-ending woes."

Of all the fleeces by the beldame wrought,
 Of all the fleeces to the spindle brought,
 The living names were cast in many a mould 710
 Of iron, silver, and resplendent gold;
 These, heap'd together, form'd a mighty pile.
 And hence an aged sire²¹, with ceaseless toil,
 Names after names within his mantle bore,
 And still, from time to time, return'd for more:
 So light he seem'd, so rapid in his pace,
 As from his birth inur'd to lead the race.

²¹ Ariosto takes the general idea of the Parca, from the well-known Heathen mythology, with a genius that never borrowed any circumstance from another without embellishing it with his own inventive fancy: he makes the fair fleeces the type of a good, and the foul of an ill life; in which he might probably have an eye to the following passages of Statius and Seneca:

Ergo dies adest Parcarum conditus albo
 Vellere—

And Seneca, in the Life of the tyrant Nero, prostrates his praise in this line:

Aurea formoso descendant pollice fila.

²² The following passage is so beautifully imagined, and so diversified with circumstances, as to form perhaps one of the finest allegories in this or any other poem.

Of all the fictions of Ariosto, the flight of Astolpho to the Moon must, for surprise and novelty of subject, take the strongest hold on the reader: we experience here the power of a great and eccentric genius, who, without any restraint, gives a loose to the reins of his imagination, and with his adventurous knight on his own Ippogrifo, soars

Beyond the visible diurnal sphere!

Amidst the general wildness, and perhaps absurdity of particular parts in this book, we are hurried along by the strength and liveliness of the poet's descriptive powers, and have no leisure to attend to the cool phlegm of criticism!

Whither he went, and why he court'd so well,
On what design, th' ensuing book shall tell;
M, as you still were woot, with favouring ear
You soon intent the pleasing tale to bear.

BOOK XXXV.

THE ARGUMENT.

Discourse of Saint John with Astolpho. Allegory of Time. Eulogium on writers. Bradamant meets with Flordelis, and undertakes to deliver Brandimart from the hands of Rodomont. Her joust with the Pagan on the bridge. Bradamant arrives with Flordelis at the walls of Arli, and sends Flordelis with a challenge to Rogero. She unhorses, at three several encounters, Serpentino, Grandonio, and Ferrau.

As! who, my fair, will wing his flight so high
To fetch my wandering wits from yonder sky;
My wits, still wanting, since the fatal dart
Came from those lovely eyes to pierce my heart?
Nor will I yet of banish'd sense complain,
Let me the little I've preserv'd retain:
But thus decreasing still, when all is flown
I in Orlando's fate may paint my own.
Yet, to retrieve my loss, I need not soar
So far from Earth, or Paradise explore; 10
Or to the circle of the Moon repair.
My wanting wits are never treasur'd there.
No—in your eyes, your lovely face they stray,
Your ivory neck, your bosom's milky way;
Then let these lips your favouring grace obtain
To search those charms till I grow wise again.

When now the knight had seen the fatal wheel
Its scanty thread to wretched mortals deal,
From room to room through all the dome he stray'd,
And every future life unpeep survey'd, 20
Amidst the rest a beautiful fleece he view'd;
Not radiant gold such beamy lustre shew'd,
Nor gems, if drawn to threads by wondrous art,
Could reach in dazzling light its thousandth part.
This fleece, that midst a countless store excell'd,
With raptur'd gaze the wondering duke beheld;
And much he long'd to know what age should claim
This valu'd life, and whose the happy name.

To him the great evangelist replies: 30
“ This glorious star shall to your world arise,
Ere yet, by twenty years¹, is mark'd on Earth
With M and D the word's incarnate birth.
As through the myrtle store, this fleece so fair
Amid so many shines beyond compare,
So shall the life, that issues thence, bestow
Unequall'd blessings on mankind below.
Since every grace of genius and of art,
That nature gives, or learning can impart,

¹ The poet means the year 1480, in which Hippolyto was born, twenty years before the year 1500, marked by the Roman numerals M.D. This conceit will appear strange in English versification, but it was thought right to preserve it. The idea of this expression seems from Dante, Paradiso, cant. xix. ver. 129.

Vedressi al Ciotto di Gerusalemme

Quando 'l contrario segnara un emise.

This happy mortal's unexampled claim. 40

The king of floods, a humble village stands:
Before it flows the Po; behind, a lake
Turbid and deep collected waters make:
This, now obscure, in future I forestal
Shall every town in Italy excel,
For walls, and stately domes, for every grace
Of polish'd life, exalting human race:
For thus has Heaven ordain'd the seat to raise
Worthy his birth whose name employs my praise.
So where the hind engrafs the tender fruit, 51
He tends the plant that feeds the leafy shoot;
The skilful artist so the gold refines,
In whose bright round a sparkling jewel shines.
No other soul² in your terrestrial reign
A mortal body shall like this obtain;
How rarely from innumerable spirits here
So fair a spirit quits this upper sphere,
As that which Heaven's all-comprehensive mind
Has for the great Hippolyto design'd! 60
Hippolyto of Este is he nam'd,
By God's decree for countless virtues fam'd,
Such virtues, as diffus'd, might well adorn
Full many a mortal in your region born.
Goodness by him, by him each studious art
Shall find support; but would I here impart
His high deservings in as copious strain,
Orlando might expect his wits in vain.”

Where roll'd with mingled sand the troubled flood
The hallow'd sage and noble warrior stood, 70
To view that aged man who to the shore
The sculptur'd names within his mantle bore.
I know not if you still in memory hold
What late of this mysterious sire I told,
Of mien decrepid, but whose rapid pace
Excell'd the fleetest of the stags in chase.
With ceaseless labour from the heap he took
The various names, and from his vesture shook,
As oft as to the water's brink he came,
Th' oblivious waters known by Lethe's name. 80
What tablets sinking there, to rise no more,
The rapid eddies to the bottom bore!
Beside and o'er the stream a feather'd crew
Of crows, of coughts, and ravenous vultures flew,
And many a different bird that hover'd nigh
With clattering pinions and discordant cry.
These, as they saw the wayward sire display
His treasure, baste'd to partake the prey:
One with his crook'd talons, one with beak
A tablet seiz'd, but found his strength too weak 90

² Rucelli, the Italian commentator, here attempts to apologize for the liberty taken by Ariosto of introducing Saint John to give so hyperbucal a praise of Hippolyto. But surely it is altogether unnecessary to observe, that not only with respect to the sentiment here put in the mouth of the apostle, but in many other passages of this most extraordinary poem, to attempt a serious defence of them, must be esteem'd an extravagance little less than the fictions of the poet; nor can our wonder be rais'd at this speech of Saint John, after the prophecy deliver'd in the xxixth Book at the death of Isabella.

³ Ariosto has feign'd Lethe to be in the Moos, and Dante places it in Purgatory.

To bear it far, and when in air he try'd
His daring flight, the weight his flight deny'd.
So Lethe to eternal night must give
These honour'd names that well deserv'd to live.
Amidst the winged tribe two swans appear'd,
White as the banners⁴ by my patron rear'd,
That each recover'd from the stream at will
Some sinking medal in his sacred bill;
And spite of him who with such fell intent
Innumerable titles from his mantle rent, 170
The pious birds a chosen few repriv'd:
Obtains the whelming gulf the rest receiv'd.
Along the tide now swam the snow-white pair,
Now soar'd on fluttering wings through yielding air,
Till near the borders of the fatal flood
They reach'd a bill, on whose high summit stood
A temple built to never-dying Fame,
Whence, down the steep, a beauteous virgin came,
Of each fair cygnet on the banks to take
The names redeem'd from Lethe's silent lake. 170
These round the statue that sublimely plac'd
Upon a column's height the centre grac'd,
She hung aloft in honour of the fame,
And bade them there unchang'd for ages to remain.
What hoary sire was this, and why he gave
The names engraven on the greedy ware;
Much of the swans to know, the duke desired;
Of that fair virgin and her bill inquir'd;
And much he long'd to hear the sense reveal'd,
Beneath those visionary forms conceal'd. 170
All this to learn, he ask'd his gracious guide,
And thus the holy man of God reply'd.

"Know first, that not a leaf on Earth can move
But bears its correspondent type above.
On Earth and here the same effects we find,
In semblance differing, but alike in kind:
The sire, whose heard adown his beam flows,
Whose wondrous speed no mortal equal knows,
Here works the same effect in mystic show,
That time performs on changing things below. 170
When here the fatal thread of man is spun,
Of human life below the course is run.
While Fame is there, lo! here her semblant sign,
And both alike were deathless, both divine;
But that you sire here makes the names his pray,
And time below wastes all with slow decay:
This, as thou seest, consigns to whelming tides,
And that for ever in oblivion hides.
Crows, vultures, choughs, and all the feather'd train,
Here strive to bear the sinking names in vain: 170
These are on Earth the servile band and base,
Flatterers and parasites that courts disgrace;
Buffoons and slaves, with every vice indu'd,
But priz'd too oft above the wise and good.
All these are courtiers call'd, of sordid mind,
(Like the vile ass or swine's detested kind)
Who bred in feasts to waste the glutton hour
With greedy taste the savoury cates devour;
Who when the Parca end their master's days,
When Bacchus or intertempere Venus slays, 170
Bear in their mouths awhile each patron's name,
Then drop the barthen in oblivion's stream.
But as the swans with soft melodious strain
Convey the medals safe to yonder fane;
So virtue's deeds the poet's tuneful breath
Extends to latest times beyond the stroke of death.

⁴ The standard of the house of Este was a white swan.

O happy prince! train'd in learning's form,
Who tread the path by Cæsar's trod before,
And while you list each writer to your side,
Fear not th' absorbing waves of Lethe's tide. 160
Rare as these swans, so rare the poet's name,
Such poets as the Muses' honours claim:
For Heaven bestow'd but with a sparing hand
Illustrious men to grace a favour'd land;
And oft the churlish lord without regard
Leaves godlike genius pining for reward.
The bad meet smiles; the good oppression find;
And noble arts are banish'd from mankind.
Sure Heaven deprives the great of inward light,
To quench their souls in intellectual night, 170
And makes them scorn the bard's mellifluous lays,
That death may blot their name to future days.
Would these but make one tuneful Muse their friend,

(Whate'er their crimes) their memory might extend
In Time's fair page, and savours sweet dispense
As costly myrrh or odoriferous frankincense.
Æneas' self was not so pious found,
Nor Hector nor Achilles so renown'd
For deeds of arms, but numbers might we tell
Whose martial glories could those chiefs excel. 170
The favour, by their rich descendants show'd,
The princely gifts, the palaces bestow'd,
Exalt their actions to the highest praise,
That fiction paints or history can raise.
Deep not Augustus' life⁵ so free from blame,
As Virgil's trumpet delivers him to fame;
His skill in verse and love to bards display'd,
The dire proscription veils in friendly shade.
Not one might now on Nero's guilt exclaim;
Nor infamy perchance attend a name 190
By gods and men abhorr'd, had he ensur'd
The pen of writers and the Muse secur'd.
On Agamemnon Homer wreaths bestow'd,
And paints the Trojans vanquish'd by their foes;
Tells how Penelope amidst the train
Of lawless suitors could her faith maintain:
But would you see the truth no more conceal'd,
Who knows but thus the tale might stand reveal'd,
That Greece was routed, Troy the conquest gain'd,
And that Penelope her nuptials stain'd? 200

⁵ Augustus Cæsar.

⁶ The Triumvir and Prosciber had descended to us in a more hideous form than they now appear, if the emperor had not taken care to make friends of him (Virgil) and Horace. Ariosto has put these words into the mouth of an evangelist, but whether they will pass for gospel now I cannot tell.

Non fû ai santo, ni benigno Augusto
Come la tuba di Virgilio suona,
L'aver avuto in poesia buon gusto,
La proscrittione iniqua li perdona.

Dryden, Preface to Æneid.

⁷ Mr. Warton in his History of Poetry tells us, that Lydgate blames Homer, "notwithstanding all his rhetoric and sugred eloquence, as a prejudiced writer who favours the Greeks;" a censure which flowed from the favourite and prevailing notion held by the western nations, of their descent from the Trojans. Dion of Prusa, an historian, took great pains to show that Homer had fabricated the truth, and that Achilles was slain by Hector, and the Greeks vanquished.

Hear too what fate unhappy Dido found²,
 Dido with truth and every virtue crown'd;
 But she, since Maro was her foe, has left
 A name of chastity and truth bereft.
 Be not surpris'd if on this theme I dwell,
 And warmly speak of what I feel so well.
 To writers every debt of love I owe,
 Myself a writer in your world below.
 Above my peers I gain'd such honou'd grace,
 No death shall end it and no time deface. 218
 And every grateful thought to him is ow'd,
 To holy Christ whose hand such gifts bestow'd,
 But wretched those, in hours of grief expos'd,
 On whom the gates of courtesy are clos'd;
 Who with pale want and famine on their cheek,
 By night or day in vain an entrance seek!
 And hence (th' unplesing subject to pursue)
 Few are the poets as the patrons few:
 Since savage beasts from that rude climate fly,
 Whose barren sands nor shade nor food supply." 220
 So spoke, with kindling warmth, the blessed sire,
 While either eye-ball flash'd with heavenly fire,
 Till, turning to the duke, his speech he clos'd,
 And in a smile benign his looks compos'd.
 Thus they: but let us now Astolpho leave
 With him from whom mankind redeem'd receive
 The gospel truth, while from the lunar steep
 To lower worlds I meditate a leap,
 A leap from Heaven to Earth—nor can I more
 Self-pois'd aloft on weary pinions soar. 230
 The strain to her I turn³, whose gentle heart
 Was pierc'd by jealousy's envenom'd dart;
 Whom late I left, when in succeeding joust
 Three kings, by turns, she humbled in the dust.
 At night a castle, on the way, reliev'd
 Her wandering course, where tidings she receiv'd

² Trojus Asonius, and Marcellus, as likewise Petrarch, affirm that Dido, whose proper name was Eliza, killed herself that she might not become the wife of Iarbas, king of Mauritania, to which union she was strongly press'd by her subjects. An old Greek epigram is extant, in which she is made to complain of the Muses for inciting Virgil to write against her chastity. It is a certain fact that she lived long before Æneas is said to have left Troy, which Petrarch sets forth in his Triumph of Chastity. Porcacchi:

E veggio Dido

Ch'amor pio del suo sposo a morte spinso,

Non quel d'Ænea, com' a publico grido.

Dido, who loyal to her consort fell,

Not for Æneas' love, as lying legends tell.

Mr. Hayley, in his instructive and entertaining notes to his poem on epic poetry, speaking of her story given by the Spanish poet Ercilla, says, "I must observe, that many bards of his country have considered it as a point of honour to defend the reputation of this injured lady, and to attack Virgil, with a kind of poetical Quixotism, for having slandered the chastity of so spotless a heroine." He afterwards gives us the words of Ercilla at the conclusion of his account of Dido. "This is the true and genuine story of the famous defamed Dido, whose most honoured memory has been defied by the inconsiderate Virgil, to embellish his poetical fictions." Notes to the Third Epistle.

³ He resumes the narrative of Astolpho, Book xxxviii. ver. 180.

VOL. III.

That Agrament with all his numerous bands
 In camp was rooted by her brother's hands:
 That Arli's walls he sought, and well she knew
 That there Rogero with his king withdrew. 240
 Soon as the first gray light in Heaven appear'd,
 To rich Provence the dame her journey steer'd;
 For thither (spread the fame) his conquering crew
 King Charles had led the vanquish'd to pursue.
 Now near the camp a lonely fair she met;
 Sighs heav'd her breast, her eyes with tears were wet:
 Noble her mien—lo! this was she who won
 The manly heart of Monodantes' son;
 Who from the bridge beheld her lover's fall,
 And left him Rodomont's unhappy thrall: 250
 A knight she sought whose dauntless soul could brave

The narrow pass above, below the rapid wave.

Soon as Rogero's valiant maid distress'd
 Beheld a dame no less by grief oppress'd,
 With courteous greeting she besought to know
 What secret cause had wrought the stranger's woe.
 Her Florida beheld, and at the sight
 Believ'd in her she found the wish'd-for knight;
 And now describ'd the dangerous bridge and flood
 Where Algiers' king against all strangers stood:
 How from his seat her hapless lord he threw; 260
 Not that th' insulting Pagan better knew
 The use of arms, but that with craft apply'd,
 He to his 'vantage us'd the bridge and tide.
 "If thou, O warrior!" said the weeping fair,
 "Art brave and courteous as thy looks declare,
 For Heaven's dear sake on him thy valour turn,
 Through whom I thus my lord, my champion
 mourn.

Or teach me in what near or distant land

To meet with one yon Pagan to withstand; 270

A knight whose courage can my foe assail,
 That little shall his bridge and stream avail.
 Not only shalt thou act as suits the right
 Of chivalry and fits a wandering knight;
 But more—thy valour shall the cause maintain
 Of one, the trust of Love's faithful train.
 How shall I all his other virtues tell,
 Such numerous virtues that his sex excel?
 Who own not these, must breasts unfeeling prove
 Which neither faith can touch, nor worth can move."

The generous maid, whose mind so little weighs
 What'er may lead to fame and martial praise,
 Heart-broken with her grief, in anguish dares
 Danger and death, and for th' attempt prepares.
 She thinks no fortune to her arms can give
 Her dear Rogero back, and loaths to live.

"Fair love-lorn stranger," Bradamant replies,

"Such as I am, this arm thy foe defies,

Thou speak'st thy lover loyal to his vows,

When truth to few so high a praise allows; 280

Till now I deem'd, who dar'd in man to trust

Would find in love all perjurd and unjust."

Thus she; and as the latter words she spoke,

A sigh spontaneous from her bosom broke.

"Lead on"—she cried; and with th' ensuing day

They view'd the fatal stream and dangerous way;

There soon discover'd by the watch, who stood

To warn his lord what strangers reach'd the flood.

The horn is blown; the Pagan, arm'd with speed,

Stands on the shore oppos'd with spear and steed;

He guards the pass, and when the dame he spies,

Denounces instant death with threatening cries,

Unless she yields, t' avert her threaten'd doom,

Her horse and armour offer'd at the tomb.

But Bradamant, before instructed well,
Who heard fair Floridella th' adventure tell,
How by his fury Isabella died,
Thus to the haughty Saracen reply'd:

"Why, wretch! should those who ne'er partook thy guilt

Be punish'd for the blood thy rage has spilt? 310
By thee she fell—thy life should here atone
That impious deed through every region known.
Thy life were here a better victim paid
In just oblation to her virgin shade:
More grateful far than all the trophies won
From luckless knights that on this bridge have run:
Her ghost would prize the vengeance best, that can e

From one who bears, like her, a woman's name:
A woman see—but ere in joust we meet,
On equal terms together let us treat:— 320
Shouldst thou in fight prevail, my fate with those Already taken at thy will dispose.

But (as I deem) on me should conquest light,
Thy horse, thy armour, shall be mine of right:
My hand shall yonder arms and mail displace,
And, in their stead, shall thine the marble grace:
Thy prisoners shall be mine."—"Tis just," reply'd
Stern Rodomont, "nor is thy claim deny'd.

But shouldst thou win, I shall not yet restore
The knights, my captives late in yonder tower,
Since these are sent to Afric's distant shore. 331
But here I swear, shouldst thou thy seat retain,
By some strange chance, and I unhors'd remain,
Each captive shall be freed, by our command
Dispatch'd in message swift to Afric's land.

But shouldst thou fall when we in fight contend,
(As surely thus the contest soon must end,)
Thou shalt not leave thy arms, nor shall thy name
Grav'd on the marble thy defeat proclaim:
To that fair face, bright locks, and sparkling eyes
Already vanquish'd I resign my prize. 341

Thine be the day—so mayst thou but remove
Each angry thought, and change thy hate to love:
Such is my strength, my courage, known to all,
Thou need'st not deem it shame by me to fall."

The virgin smil'd, but sternly smiling show'd
A generous wrath that in her features glow'd,
Nor to the Pagan aught reply'd again,
But turning to the bridge her courser's rein,
Urg'd all his speed, while in her hand she bore 350
The lance of gold to charge the furious Moor.

Fierce Rodomont prepar'd the joust to meet,
Rapid he came: beneath their coursers' feet
The tough bridge shook, while many an ear around
At distance trembled with the deafening sound.
The golden lance its wonted virtue held,
And he, whose arm so oft his foes had quell'd,
Prove on the bridge was tumbled from his seat,
His head laid low, high rais'd his quivering feet.
Scarce could the virgin, as the warrior lay, 360

Speed o'er the narrow pass her courser's way:
Great was her risk; a step but swerv'd aside
Had plung'd her headlong in the subject tide.
But Rabican so light, so steady came,
(That wondrous courser bred of air and flame)
Along th' extremest verge he sped so fast,
That on a sword's sharp edge his feet had safely past.

Then to the Pagan king, supinely spread,
She turn'd, and thus in sportive humour said:
"Behold who now has lost—see whither tends 370
Thy empty boast, and how the contest ends!"

Foil'd by a woman's hand, without reply,
Depriv'd of sense the Pagan seem'd to lie,
Till slowly rising, with dejected look
A few short steps with silent gaze he took,
Then sudden from his limbs the armour drew,
And fill'd with rage against the marble threw:
Alone, on foot, he hasten'd from the place
(The scene detested of his foul disgrace);
But ere he went, he gave a squire in charge 380
(As late he vow'd) to set the knights at large
To Afric sent: no more of him we tell,
Save that departing thence he turn'd to dwell
From living haunts¹⁰ in some sequester'd cell.

Meantime against the monumental stone,
The Pagan's mail, by law of arms her own,
Aloft the virgin hung, but thence remov'd
Each Christian's armour that the joust had prov'd,
(Known by their names inscrib'd) that left the train
Of Charles's court; the rest she let remain, 390
Her trophies plac'd to adorn the virgin-fane.

Beside the arms of Monodantes' son,
With Sansonetto's, Olivero's shone;
Who, while Aglante's noble prince they sought,
Their path pursuing, to the bridge were brought,
And, here made captive by the Pagan's hand,
In hapless exile sent to Afric's land:

Their arms, which now the lofty structure bore,
The dame remov'd and plac'd within the tower.
All other harness won, the conquer'd spoil 400
From Pagan knights, she left to deck the pile.
There hung the monarch's arms who sought in vain,
With length of peril, Frontalet to gain;

Those arms, which late Circassia's monarch wore¹¹,
Who wandering many a plain and mountain o'er,
By evil chance to lose his steed arriv'd,
And travell'd thence of horse and arms depriv'd.
Thus every warrior of the Pagan crew
Dismiss'd, with freedom from the pass withdrew:

But shame forbade Circassia's king's return, 410
To risk amid the camp opprobrious scorn,
For honour sully'd, arms and courser lost,
Disgrace ill-suited to his frequent boast.
And now desire rekindled in his breast
To seek the damsel, who his soul possess'd,
Who (fame had told) her native country sought:
Hence, as the power of fond affection wrought,
While he pursues with speed the flying fair,
To Amon's daughter¹² let the Muse repair.

Each Christian name eras'd, the martial maid
In words new graven on the tomb display'd 421
To every passing eye her glorious deed,
The knight dismounted and the passage freed;
Then turn'd to Floridella, whose heart was fill'd
With tender grief, whose eyes big tears distill'd,
And ask'd her purpos'd way: the dame replied:
"To Arli, where the Pagan army lies:
Companions there I seek, there hope to find
A bark for Afric with a favouring wind:

¹⁰ Rodomont appears no more till Book xvi, ver. 794.

¹¹ The last time we heard of Sacripant was in Book xvii, ver. 837, where he was said to pursue Rodomont, in order to recover from him his horse Frontaletto (or Frontino), and where the poet mentioned his being afterwards made prisoner by Rodomont.

¹² We hear no more of Sacripant in the course of the poem.

Never will I rest till to these arms restor'd, 430
These eyes behold my husband and my lord:
Nor shall he long in cruel prison live.

Though treacherous Rodomont should falsely give
His promise to deceive thyself and me:
All shall be tried to set my honour free."

"Behold me ready," said the martial pair,
"With thee each peril of the way to share
Till Arii we behold, where, for my sake,
Within her walls thy entrance shalt thou make;
There seek Rogero, fam'd through every land, 440
Lov'd of his king o'er all the martial band:
Thy gift on him this courser must bestow,
From which I late o'erthrew our haughty foe:
Then shalt thou say—"The knight from whom I
came

Dares to the world thy breach of faith proclaim;
To thee this steed he sends, and bids thee brace
Thy arms, his force on yonder plain to face.
Here end thy speech; but should he further try
To learn my name, be this thy sole reply:

"Unknown to me the knight whose words I bear?"
Thus she, and thus return'd the grateful pair: 451

"What danger, generous warrior! for thy sake
Shall I decline, what toil refuse to take?
My life is thine—Not less than life she owes
To thee, who could for her thy own expose—"
Good Bradamant returns in courteous strain,
And to her hand commits Frontino's rein.

Along the margin of the winding flood
These beautiful dames their eager way pursue'd,
Till Arii they beheld, and heard the roar 460
Of billows breaking on the neighbouring shore.

Here Bradamant her courser check'd, to wait
Herself at distance from the city's gate,
Till Fiordelis to Arii should repair,
And to the noble youth his courser bear.

The barrier now attain'd, the gentle dame
The draw-bridge pass'd, and to the portal came:
The knight she found, perform'd her task enjoin'd,
And good Frontino to his hand consign'd.

Her message done, no longer would she stay, 470
But to the port pursue'd her eager way.

Perplex'd Rogero stood, his mind confus'd,
On this, on that, in vain alternate mus'd:
What knight could such mysterious challenge send,
With gifts to court him, and with arms offend?

He knows not who the combat thus may claim,
Or dare for wrong sustain'd attain his name:
Yet no suspicion ere could raise a thought
That Bradamant such charge against him brought.

Sometimes he deem'd of all the warrior crew 480
The knight was Rodomont, nor yet he knew
What cause on him the Sarzan's anger drew.
Yet, him except, through all the world remain'd
No single chief with whom he strife maintain'd.

Meanwhile Dordona's dame, in generous accents,
To claim the combat blows her sounding horn.
Now Agrament, and now Marsilius heard
That near the walls some champion strange appear'd.

With these, as chance befel, a gallant knight,
Call'd Serpentino, stood, who for the fight 490
Requested leave to arm, and vow'd to bring
That bold unknown in bonds before the king.
Soon spreading rumour to the ramparts drew
Each ear and every eye the field to view:

Not feeble years, nor childhood stay'd, but all
Alike impatient through'd to line the wall.
With radiant arms and rich-embroider'd vest,
King Serpentino of the star address'd

His dauntless course, and entering on the joust,
The first encounter stretch'd him in the dust. 500

The courteous dame pursu'd, and by the reins
Secur'd his steed that startled fled the plains;
Him to the Saracen her hand restor'd:

"Resume thy seat," she cried, "and bid thy lord
Select another warrior from his band
Who better may in arms my force withstand."

The king of Afric saw with wide survey,
Amidst his train, the fortune of the day:

"Behold," th' emperor'd prince exclaim'd aloud,
In accents heard by all the Pagan crowd, 510

"You gallant chief a victor's right forgo,
And from the plain dismiss his vanquish'd foe!"

He said; when Serpentino present stands,
And, in her name, a braver knight demands,
Grandonio of Volterra next appears,

No lord of Spain his crest so proudly rears;
With leave obtain'd the second course to try,
He issues forth the stranger to defy.

Then he—"Thy courtesy avails thee nought,
When thou in bonds before our sovereign brought Shalt wait his nod, or by my weapon slain 521

Here stretch thy length on this contested plain."

"Think not my soul," the noble maid replied,
"Shall quit her purpose for the threats of pride:
I warn thee to return, ere prostrate here

Thy batter'd limbs confess my stronger spear.
Return, return— and to thy king declare,

"Tis not for such as these these arms I bear:
But hither am I come to meet in fight

Some warrior that deserves a warrior's might." 530

These bitter words, in taunting vein address'd,
With burning wrath inflam'd the Pagan's breast:

He nought replied, but reining round his steed
Against the virgin urg'd his fiery speed;

Prepar'd to joust, her golden lance she held,
And Rabican to meet his rage impell'd;

When scarce the fatal spear had touch'd his shield,
With spurring heels aloft he press'd the field.

The noble champion's his courser stay'd:
"Confess that justly I foretold," she said, 540

"Thy tongue might better far my message bear,
Than in the list thy arm my weapon dare.

Go then—and in my name thy king entreat
To choose a knight that may my challenge meet

On better terms: nor let me toil in vain
With those that knighly fame so ill sustain."

The gazers from the walls, who wish'd to tell
What brave unknown had kept the seat so well,

Recall'd to mind each chief, that oft in field
Midst summer's heat their blood with fear con-geal'd.

To Bradamant some gave the champion's claim, 551
But to Rinaldo more ascrib'd his fame:

Orlando most had deem'd, but well they knew
His state, that tears from every bearer drew.

The third in turn, Lanfusa's son⁴, applied
To run the course; "with little hope," he cried,

"To win the palm, but, falling, that his shame
Might with his friends unhors'd partake the blame."

And furnish'd now with all that warriors need
In listed fight, he mounts a fiery steed, 560

³ He returns to Fiordella, Book xxxix. ver. 299.

⁴ Ferras.

Led from a thousand which his stalls contain,
 For swiftness priz'd and steady to the rein.
 He issues forth, but ere in joust he meets,
 The virgin him, and he the virgin greets:
 Then she—"If this thou seek'st not to conceal,
 To me in courtesy thy name reveal."
 To her request Ferrau in full replied,
 Who seldom sought himself or deeds to hide;
 "Thy proffer'd joust I take," rejoind'd the dame,
 "Though here to prove another knight I came." 570
 "What knight?" return'd Ferrau—to whom the maid

"Roger" cried—and scarce the word she said,
 When o'er her face the mantling colour flew
 And dyed her lovely cheeks to crimson hue.
 She thus pursu'd—"That warrior's fame in arms
 My beating breast with emulation warms:
 Eager I burn with him in field to wage
 The single fight and face to face engage."
 Simply she spoke¹⁵, what some malicious mind
 May turn far other than the maid design'd. 580

To her Ferrau—"Be first our conflict tried,
 The prize of strength between us first decide:
 Then, should I fail, as fell my peers before;
 To heal the chance of this disastrous hour,
 That gentle knight shall enter next the course,
 With whom thou long'st at tilt to prove thy force."
 As thus they parleying stood, her helm unclos'd
 Her visage to the wondering gaze expos'd;
 And while Ferrau those angel features view'd,
 His heart confess'd him more than half subdu'd.
 Then to himself—"A form I sure behold 591
 From Paradise, not bred of mortal mould;
 And should I fail in joust the lance to meet,
 Those conquering eyes have wrought my sure defeat."

Each measur'd now the ground; when, like the rest,
 Ferrau o'erbrow'd the earth indignant press'd.
 For him his courser Bradamant detain'd:
 "Return," she cried, "and be my wish explain'd
 "To yonder knight." Ferrau abash'd withdrew,
 And sought Rogero 'midst the courtly crew; 600
 Before king Agramant the message told,
 That him to joust defy'd the champion bold.
 Rogero, while as yet he little thought
 What unknown knight with him the combat sought,
 As sure of conquest, with a fearless air
 Bade all his armour for the field prepare;
 Still glow'd his courage, though so late he view'd
 These warriors by a single spear subdu'd.

But how he arm'd, how issu'd to the fight,
 And what ensu'd, hereafter I recite. 610

BOOK XXXVII

THE ARGUMENT.

While Rogero is preparing to leave the walls of Aril to answer the challenge of Bradamant, Marphisa meets her, and is unhorsed. Distress of Rogero. Skirmish between the Christian and Pagan forces. Rogero extracts a parley with Bradamant, and both the lovers retire from the field of battle into a grove. Marphisa, impatient to revenge her fall on Bradamant, pursues them. Battle between Bradamant and Marphisa.— Rogero attempts to part them, and is attacked by Marphisa. Their combat is broken off by a supernatural event, followed by an unexpected discovery.

A noble heart by noble deeds is known,
 Sway'd by no change, no dictates but its own;
 In every lore of courtesy refin'd,
 Where habit stamps what virtue had enjoind.
 Not less the heart, which vice polluting stains,
 At every turn its wretched bent maintains,
 Where nature warp'd an evil habit takes,
 And favour'd the such habit who forsakes.
 The times of old supply'd a martial race,
 Not less indu'd with every gentle grace: 19
 Few boasts the modern page; since there we find
 Each outrage that debases human kind.
 As when, Hippolito, thy arm divine¹
 With conquer'd ensigns deck'd each hallow'd shrine;
 That arm, which from the port their galleys bore
 With spoils encumber'd to thy native shore:
 O! then what dreadful scenes of carnage spread,
 As where to deeds of savage fury bred, [dead!
 Moors, Turks, and Tartars round them heap the
 Yet think not Venice could partake the guilt 20
 Of hireling bands, and blood unjustly spilt.
 I speak not here of flames, whose torments pour'd
 From street to street, whole sumptuous piles devour'd:

Though such a savage vengeance must proclaim
 The worst of insults to thy better fame:
 For when proud Padua's turrets² shook with fear,
 And, join'd with Caesar, flam'd thy dreadful spear,

¹ Spenser, the great admirer and imitator of our author, borrows this sentiment in his Fairy Queen.

True is, that whilom that good poet said,
 The gentle mind by gentle deeds is known:
 For man by nothing is so well bewray'd
 As by his manners; in which plain is shown
 Of what degree and what race he is grown.

Book vi. c. iii. st. 1.

Again,

Like as a gentle heart itself bewrays
 In doing gentle deeds with frank delight.

Book vi. c. vii. st. 1.

² In the notes on the liid Book an account was given of this victory gained over the Venetians in the Po, in which cardinal Hippolito took seventy ensigns from the enemy, which he afterwards caused to be fixed up in the great church of Ferrara. Porcacchi.

³ Andrea Gritti, after he was doge, recovered Padua from the hands of the emperor Maximilian; who, disturbed at the loss of so important a place, came from Germany with an army to retake it; and arriving in Italy, he was joined by the Franks, Spaniards, and the forces of the pope, so that when he encamp'd at Padua he found himself at the head of a vast army: among others who came to his assistance was cardinal Hippolito de Rete, who seeing the wanton cruelty of the Imperialists, with difficulty restrained them from committing many acts of violence, and particularly prevented the destruction of many neighbouring towns, and of the edifices at Padua. Porcacchi.

Thy voice humane forbade the fires to rise,
And stopp'd the blaze when bursting to the skies,
While towns and cities by thy pity spard,
Thy inborn worth to either host declar'd. 30
Yet these, nor all their savage fury wrought,
Deeds never harbour'd in the courteous thought,
So touch'd my breast as one heart-rending woe,
Which rocks might weep, could rocks compassion
know;

When you, great prince, your noble offspring sent
To where the foes, in guarded fortress pent,
Fled from their ships, and where in dread they lay
To wait th' event of that ill-omen'd day,
As dauntless Hector and Æneas strode, 40
To burn the Grecian ships that brav'd the flood:
Like Hercules and Alexander go
The friendly pair, their hearts too boldly glow,
They leap the trench, and rush amidst the foe.
Too far advanc'd, the second scarce regain'd
His social hand; the foe the first detain'd.
Feruffino 'scap'd, behind Cantelmo stay'd—
O Sora's duke! what pangs must then invade
Thy wretched breast, when from thy generous son
His helm unslac'd, a thousand swords on one, 50
Thou to the vessel saw'st thy darling led;
And sever'd from the trunk his beautiful head?
Why, when the cruel edge his blood could spill,
Did not such sight the wretched father kill?
Say, curs'd Sclavonian, from what savage lands
Brought'st thou the trade of war? Did Scythia's hands

E'er shed a captive's blood, who freely gave
His yielded arms his forfeit life to save?
Was this thy plea to murder him who shone
His country's brave support? O powerful Sun! 60
Withdraw thy beams from this remorseless age,
Where all like Atreus, like Thyestes rage.
Thy savage soul, barbarian! could destroy
The soldier's early hope, the nation's joy!
Whose fame no chief from pole to pole outshines,
From Indian shores to where the day declines.
Not those who make the flesh of man their food,
Not eyeless Polyphemus's inhuman brood,
But touch'd with pity had that grace confess'd,
That grace and youth to melt an iron breast: 70
Thou, only thou, couldst burn that angel face,
Than Lestrygons more fell, or Cyclops' hideous race.
Not such example ancient times can show,
Each vanquish'd chief then met a generous foe;
Each warrior then was triump'd in courteous love,
The battle ended, slaughter rag'd no more.

Unconquer'd Bradamant, who smote the shield
Of each brave knight, and stretch'd them on the field,

From her fall'n foe withheld her bloody sword,
And every courser to his lord restor'd. 80
This warlike virgin (as we sung before)
To earth the gallant Serpentine bore,

⁴ In this war, amongst many gallant warriors with the cardinal were Hercules Cantelmo, son of the duke of Sora, and Alexander Feruffino: these two rashly attacking the enemy, Hercules was made prisoner, and condemned by the Venetians
to lose his head, as one who, being in their service, had attached himself to the Ferrarese: the sentence passed on him was executed in the presence of his father. Feruffino, seeing Cantelmo taken, made his escape with difficulty to his own people.

Eugenico.

Knight of the star; next by her noble hand
Grandonio of Volterra press'd the land;
And last Ferrau: then rising from his fall,
Each rein'd his steed, and turn'd to Ari's wall:
The third her challenge bore, and call'd the knight
Roger once below'd, to mortal fight;
As midst the peers he stood, where all deceiv'd
By outward deeds, the maid a knight believ'd. 90

Rogero, who the bold defiance hears,
Demands his arms, while in his look appears
A noble warmth: in sight of Afric's lord,
While thus he arms, the chiefs, with one accord,
Again inquire'd what warrior could so well
With rested spear in single fight excel;
And ask'd Ferrau, who with him lately drew
To near discourse, if he the stranger knew.
"Securely rest," Lanfusa's son rejoind'
"No tongue has yet this pride of Mars divin'd. 100
To me he seem'd, as first his face I view'd,
Amon's young hope; but when the joust ensu'd,
And show'd his prowess in the manly course,
Not such I knew was Richardetto's force:
His sister hence you knight unknown I deem,
Whose semblant features Richardetto seem.
Brave as Rinaldo lives her fair report,
Brave as each Paladin of Gallia's court;
But sure, by this day's proof, her arm in fight
Transcends her brethren's and her kinsmen's might."

When this Rogero heard: the deepening red 111
Of morning blush his conscious cheeks o'erspread;
A sudden tremour seiz'd his beating heart,
Swift through his vitals flew the amorous dart:
He glows—he burns—and now as fear assails,
Through all his bones an icy cold prevails:
He dreads some new-born anger has suppress'd
The love that once her gentle soul possess'd;
Divided thoughts by turns his bosom sway,
He doubts to go, nor yet resolves to stay. 120

Meantime Marphisa, breathing martial fires,
There present stands, and to the joust aspires;
All clad in steel; for seldom day or night
She stood without her mail and corset bright.
She sees Rogero arm, and fears to yield
To him the foremost honours of the field;
Should first the warrior issue to the plain,
And with preventive speed the palm obtain.
Her steed she takes, and vaulting in the seat,
Impatient spurs th' expecting fair to meet, 130
Who waits with beating heart Rogero's sight,
In hopes to hold in bonds her faithless knight;
While oft she ponders where the lance to bend,
That least in combat might the youth offend.

Now from the portal fierce Marphisa press'd,
The phoenix⁵ towering on her radiant crest,
To prove that she, above each martial name,
Shone the sole phoenix in the field of fame;
Or boast her chaate design to lead a life
Estrang'd from love and all the joys of wife. 140
On her brave Amoc's daughter bent her view;
But when no semblance of her knight she knew,
Her name she sought; her name disclos'd the maid
With whom Rogero had his faith betray'd;
Or rather her, whom, by report deceiv'd,
She now the partner of his heart believ'd:
Her whom she loath'd, on whom she burn'd to prove

The vengeance due to wrongs of slighted love.

⁵ In Boyardo the crest of Marphisa is a dragon.

Her steed she turn'd, again with fury wheel'd,
Nor sought to hurl Marphisa on the field, 150
But through her breast to drive the thrilling spear.
And free her own from every jealous fear.

Compell'd, Marphisa from her seat was thrown,
To try for fifty rock or yielding down
Receiv'd her fall; at such a chance unthought,
What rage her fiery soul to madness wrought!
Scarce rising from the ground, her sword she drew,
And for revenge against her victor flew:

When Amon's daughter with indignant pride—
"Thou art my prisoner; yield thy arms," she cried:
"Think not on thee, Marphisa, I'll bestow 161
The grace I lately show'd each vanquis'd foe:
On thee, whose deeds thy vicious soul proclaim,
Reproach and scandal to the female name!"
At this Marphisa foam'd, as mid the waves
Around some rock the wind indignant raves:
She striv'd to speak; but rage her voice confounds,
And her lips mutter undistinguish'd sounds.
She whirls her sword; and while she aims to strike,
On steed and rider aims her strokes alike. 170

But Bradamant her courser by the rein
Swift wheeling round, with wrath and fell disdain
Again her spear impell'd—her spear anew
Marphisa backward on the sand o'erthrew.
Once more from earth arose the wrathful maid,
Once more for vengeance grasp'd her beamy blade,
Again her weapon Bradamant extends,
Again Marphisa to the ground she sends.
Yet deem not, though her fame so high was held,
Her strength so far Marphisa's strength excell'd, 180
That every stroke had thus the maid o'erthrown,
But that the lance retain'd a spell unknown.

Meantime some warriors from our army, near
Eocamp'd to where with brandish'd sword and spear
These heroines rag'd, beheld with wondering sight
Th' exalted prowess of their country knight:
Nor other, by his mien and arms they knew,
But for some warrior of the Christian crew.
When now Troyano's generous son survey'd
The Christian bending towards th' extended shade
Of Arli's walls; still cautious to provide 191
For every ill or chance that might betide;
Without the gates he bids a squadron go,
And arm'd attend the motions of the foe.

With these Rogero came, who late prepar'd
To meet the tilt which first Marphisa dar'd.
Th' enamel'd youth beheld with earnest look
The virgins meet, his heart with terror shook;
He shook with terror for his soul's delight,
Since well he knew Marphisa's force in fight. 200
Such were his fears when first with lance oppos'd
Each dame on each with mutual fury clos'd;
But when the issue of the joust he view'd,
All motionless, in wonder rapt he stood.
Their wrath, as if the strife was then begun,
Rag'd on each side; nor here suffic'd to run
A single course, as when the virgin's hand
First stretch'd the three bold Pagans on the sand.
Rogero gaz'd, and gaz'd with anxious heart,
His doubts, his hopes engag'd on either part: 210
Both dear he held: this love's fierce passion fir'd;
And that mild friendship's gentler flame inspir'd.
Fain would he see the hated conflict cease,
But honour's laws forbade to enforce the peace:
Not so his comrades thought, who when they spy'd
The scale of conquest on the Christian side,
Resolv'd to part the fray; and sudden wheel'd
Their eager squadron to dispart the field:

The knights of Charles their nearer course oppose,
And soon in general fight the warriors close. 220
"To arms, to arms!" is heard on every hand,
Such cries as daily rous'd each martial band.

These mount their couriers; these their armour take,
The rattling trumpets to the battle wake
The trampling horse; while drums and timbrels join
To fire the foot, and form each deepening line.
Fierce and more fierce the skirmish'd troops engage
With mutual slaughter and with mutual rage.
Dordona's valiant dame*, who hop'd in vain
To see Marphisa by her weapon slain, 230

With wrath beholds her eager vengeance cross
And from her hand her hated victim lost.
Now here, now there, with quick exploring eyes
She seeks Rogero, for whose sake she sighs:
And soon she knows him by his large reveal'd,
The silver eagle on an azure field;
And now with every tender thought impress,
She marks his well-torn'd limbs, his manly breast,
Each grace, each action of the youthful knight.

On which she oft had gaz'd with food delight. 240
But when her fears suggest these nameless charms
Decreed to bless a happy rival's arms,
Furious she cries—"Am I deny'd the bliss,
When other lips those balmy lips may kiss?
Ah! never sure another's shalt thou prove,
And, scoring mine, return a rival's love!
Rather than singly by thy hate expire,
This hand, inhuman, shall thy life require;
If here I lose thee—death at least shall join
Our hearts once more, and make thee ever mine.
If by thy sword I fall, thou sure must go 251
A willing victim to the shades below:

For human laws and laws divine ordain,
Who slays another, shall himself be slain.
Nor canst thou murmur here, nor seek to fly
That fate thou justly meet'st, unjustly I;
I kill! but him who seek's my life to take,
Thou, cruel, he, who lives but for thy sake.
Rouse, coward hand, and with a righteous blow
Lay barb the bosom of thy treacherous foe, 261
Whose looks, in love's dissembling smiles array'd,
Have wounded oft to death a helpless maid!
Who now can bid my life's sad period close
Without one pang in pity to my woes!
Then from his impious breast with generous ire
Exact that death, thy thousand deaths require."

She said; and to her steed the spurs applied;
"Perjur'd Rogero! guard thy heart!" she cried,
"Think not unquestion'd victor hence to bear
The glorious trophies of a maid's despair!" 270
Soon as these accents reach Rogero's ears,
In these his consort's well-known voice he hears,
That voice so deeply on his mind impress,
That tongue amidst a thousand tongues confess,
He thinks her words conceal'd reproach imply
For some imputed crime of deeper dye
Than late his promise fail'd; and hence his hand
He wou'd a friendly audience to demand,
And plead his cause—but she with beaver clos'd,
Her spear already in the rest dispos'd, 280
And threatening robb'd to hurl him from his seat
Where no soft turf perchance his limbs might greet.

When now he saw the furious virgin near,
Collected in his arms, his ponderous spear

* Bradamant.

He plac'd in rest, but rais'd the point in air
Through doubt to wound the lov'd but cruel fair.
The dame, who with un pitying rage inflam'd
Against the knight her fiercest vengeance aim'd,
Now feels some sudden power her wrath disarm,
Nor dares unhorse him, nor the warrior harm. 290
Thus guiltless of a stroke the weapons prove,
Both turn'd aside: not so the lance of Love:
This in the joist he drives with matchless art,
And fir'd the amorous point in either's heart.
The dame on others from Rogero turn'd
The rage that in her jealous bosom burn'd,
And midst the tumult of the mingled fight,
Such deeds perform'd as ne'er shall set in night.

Soon with her golden lance to earth she threw
Three hundred warriors of the Moorish crew; 300
Her single arm that day the ranks defac'd,
Her force that day the flying Pagans chas'd.
Now here, now there, Rogero, cours'd the plain,
And oft he sought to accost the fair in vain,
At length they met—"And O! I die," he cried,
"Yet hear—nor be my sole request denied:
Grant me to speak—alas! what crime is mine?
Why dost thou thus my speech, my sight decline?"
As, when the balmy southern wind prevails,
And o'er the ocean sweeps with tepid gales, 310
Long frozen streams dissolve, and mingling flow
With rocks of ice and hills of crusted snow;
So when Rinaldo's valiant sister bears
These few short words, and sees her lover's tears,
Her melting heart relents, and seems no more
That heart which wrath to marble chang'd before.

The virgin to Rogero nought replied,
But gor'd with iron heel her covner's side;
And swiftly turning from the warring band,
She made a signal with her beck'ning hand. 320
Far from the throng she reach'd a vale where stood
Amidst a verdant plain a cypress wood;
Whose sable boughs extended o'er the glade
The solemn honours of ooeval shade.
In this sequester'd place, this awful gloom,
Of purest marble rose a stately tomb;
Where to th' inquiring eye was seen dispos'd
In sculptur'd verse what body there repos'd:
But Bradamant, arriv'd, with heedless gaze
Alike the sculpture and the stone surveys. 330
Rogero spur'd his steed, and swiftly came
In this retreat to join his virgin-dame.

To brave Marphise let us turn the strain,
Who now recovering press'd her steed again,
And sought the warlike maid, whose potent thrust
Had thrice her length extended on the dust:
Whom parting from the fight afar she view'd,
And saw Rogero, who her course pursu'd;
Nor deem'd that love impell'd the youthful knight,
But eager warmth to end th' unfinished fight. 340
With sharpen'd spur her fiery steed she drove,
And join'd the lovers, as they reach'd the grove:
How grateful to the pair her sight must prove,
Those best may tell whom equal passions move.
But Bradamant was fir'd with rage to view
A rival, whence in thought her woes she drew;
What from her soul this firm belief can shake,
She thither came for her Rogero's sake?

"O false Rogero!" once again she cries,
"Perfidious man! and could it not suffice, 350
Fame speaks thee base; but thou in fell despite Must bring you haved gorgon to my sight!
I see thy wish, to drive me from thy soul,
Nor will I more thy cruel wish controul:
Farewell to light!—but, ere I yield my breath,
She first shall die, by whom I meet my death."

Furious she spoke; and on Marphisa press'd
With more than viper's venom in her breast.
Soon as her spear had touch'd the rival-shield,
Back fell Marphisa helpless on the field; 360
Even while aware, 't oppose the stroke she tries,
With heels retorted to the radiant skies,
And helm half sunk in earth the haughty virgin lies.

But Amor's daughter, who, in frantic mood,
Resolv'd to die, or shed Marphisa's blood,
No more with spen the conflict would renew,
But from her hand th' enchanted weapon threw,
And leaping from her steed her falchion drew.
Furious she rush'd to top with trenchant blade
Her head, half-buried, from the struggling maid:
But ere she came, Marphisa on the plain 371
Recover'd stood to wage the fight again,
Erag'd to find once more in equal joist
Her former glories jumbled to the dust:
With grief Rogero views the growing fight;
In vain with earnest prayers the gentle knight
Would calm their souls; all peace the dames refuse,
While each alike her mad revenge pursues.

Now, at half sword, these female warriors close,
Near and more near they press, each bosom gloss
With tenfold pride; and now together join'd 381
Each round her foe a powerful arm has twin'd:
They let their falchions useless fall to ground,
And with their daggers aim a fatal wound.

To both by turns Rogero bends his prayer,
But all his words are lost in empty air.
Entreaties vain, and every milder art,
The youth resolves by force their strife to part:
He wrests the dagger from each struggling maid,
And hurls the weapon in the cypress shade. 390
Their hands disarm'd, he steps between their rage,
With threats to move them, or with prayers assuage;
In vain—his prayers and threats alike prevail,
Still burns their wrath; and when their weapons fail,
They gripe, they squeeze, they strike with spurring heel*.

And with their gauntlets clench'd the tempest deal:
Oft by her hand or arm the gentle knight
Each virgin draws to interrupt the fight;
Till stern Marphisa could no more controul
The fury kindling in her haughty soul, 400
That haughty soul which all the world despis'd,
As little now Rogero's friendship priz'd:
But leaving Bradamant, her sword she shook,
Rush'd on Rogero, and indignant spake.
"O insolent of mind, disconcertous knight,
Uncall'd to mingle in another's fight!"

* Perhaps it may be thought by some, that the poet in this passage, as in some others, has rather done violence to his female characters: it must perhaps be acknowledged that the idea is not pleasing; but, after all, human nature is the same in every rank of life, and there are situations when extreme passion levels all distinction; which truth the reader must often have learnt from that great master of human manners, Shakspeare.

? Tasso has a similar passage, when he describes the casual meeting of Tancred and Clorinda in the third Book, when in like manner he makes Tancred solicit a parley with Clorinda.

But know this hand thy folly shall chastise,
 This hand whose single weapon both defies!"
 Thus she: with balm of soothing words address
 Rogero still would touch Marphisa's breast: 410
 But such her rage, no soothing can controul
 The stubborn purpose of her fiery soul:
 At length, his cheek with kindling anger dyed,
 The knight unsheaths the falchion from his side.
 Not Rome or Athens, once with riches crown'd,
 Nor wealthier city, through the world renown'd,
 Could on the gazer such delight bestow
 With dazzling splendours of some public show,
 As now, to jealous Bradamant, the sight
 Of deadly strife between the dame and knight; 420
 A sight that to her grief sure medicine prov'd,
 And every pang of cruel doubt remov'd.
 She snatch'd her sword, that on the herbage lay,
 And stood a glad spectatress of the fray:
 Rogero in his force, his martial air,
 And matchless skill she deem'd the god of war:
 But while like Mars he seem'd, with vengeance fell
 Marphisa look'd a fiend from deepest Hell:
 For still the generous warrior would restrain
 His wonted nerve, nor give his wrath the rein. 430
 Too well the virtue of his blade he knew,
 That oft, in battle prov'd, such numbers slew;
 That cut its bloody way through toughest arms,
 Through temper'd steel, or steel secur'd with charms,
 And hence his wary hand declin'd alike
 With thrilling point to thrust, with edge to strike.
 At length the virgin aim'd a dreadful blow,
 That rous'd the vengeance of her gentle foe:
 To cleave his head the thundering steel she drove.
 Against the weapon, hissing from above, 440
 Rogero rais'd his eagle-painted shield,
 And stay'd the fury on its azure field:
 His eagle held secure by magic charm,
 But the dire blow benumb'd the warrior's arm,
 And had not Hector's mail the falchion stay'd,
 Through shield and mail had driven the trenchant
 blade;

Thence on his head had fall'n with swift descent,
 Nor mis'd the mark the raging virgin meant.
 Rogero scarce can lift his arm with pain,
 And scarce his eagle's ponderous orb sustain. 450
 All pity fled, his bosom glow'd with ire,
 And either eye-ball flash'd vindictive fire!
 Then at full force he whirl'd the pointed steel,
 Ill chance had met her, such dire stroke to feel.
 Some guardian power was near to save the maid,
 And in a cypress trunk the erring blade
 Stood deep infix'd, where thickly planted stood
 Of mournful trees the venerable wood.
 Sudden a fearful earthquake rock'd the ground;
 The meadow shook, the mountain trembled round:
 When from the tomb* in central silence rear'd, 461
 A sound, exceeding mortal sounds, was heard.
 Then thus the voice of horror—"O! forbear
 This impious strife, this most unnatural war,
 Where brother's hands a sister seek to kill,
 Where sister's hands a brother's blood would spill.
 O lov'd Rogero! lov'd Marphisa, hear!
 For both are mine—O lend a heedful ear!

* So Virgil, Aeneid iii.

— gemitus lachrymabilis imo
 Auditur tunulus, et vox reddita fertur ad aures.
 — from the tomb I hear
 A hollow groan, that shock'd my trembling ear.

Pica, ver. 50.

One womb conceiv'd you both, one happy birth
 Produc'd you both, the future boasts of Earth. 470
 Your sire, Rogero¹⁶, second of the name,
 Lov'd Galacella, who return'd his flame:
 But him, alas! her cruel brothers gave
 An early victim to th' untimely grave;
 And mindless of the dear, the precious load
 Your mother bore, unheeding kindred blood,
 Her in a slender bark these fiends consign'd
 To threatening death amid the seas and wind.
 But Fortune, that decreed you, yet unborn,
 With glorious deeds your country to adorn, 480
 Your vessel to a realm unpeopled bore,
 And safely landed on the Syrtis' shore.
 Eas'd of her birth, to death your parent bends,
 Her spotless soul to Paradise ascends.
 Such was your fate, so will'd some favouring power,
 Myself was present at the needful hour:
 Then (as the place allow'd) this friendly hand
 Interr'd your mother on the lonely strand:
 Wrapt in my vest your tender limbs I laid,
 And to Carena's towering height convey'd. 490
 I caus'd a gentle liness to come,
 Her welps deserting, from the woodland gloom;
 Who twice ten months (her nature's rage subdu'd)
 From savage teat supply'd your milky food.
 But roving o'er the fields one fatal day,
 As distant from my home I chanc'd to stray,
 On you a band of Arab spoilers fell,
 (Your memory may supply the tale I tell,
 Marphisa, then they seized; with feet more light
 By better chance Rogero escap'd by flight. 500
 Return'd, your cruel loss I long deplore,
 But guard my sole remaining hope the more.
 Thou know'st, Rogero, well my ceaseless care,
 While sad Atlantes breath'd this vital air.
 I saw, from boding stars, thy life decreed
 In Christian lands by treacherous guide to bleed;
 For this I strove to keep thee thence afar
 T' evade the influence of each threatening star:

¹⁶ For Boyardo's account of the birth of Rogero and Marphisa, see note to Book ii. ver. 217. Take this further account of Rogero of Risa and Galacella, the father and mother of Ariosto's hero.

When Almontes left the dominions of his father Agolant to revenge the death of king Garnieri on the Christians, he took with him his sister Galacella, a female warrior of great courage, but his brother Troyano remained behind with his father. Almontes and Galacella alternately fought with Rogero of Risa, without victory to any party. Galacella turned Christian, and married Rogero; but Beltram, elder natural brother to Rogero, having conceived a passion for his sister-in-law, but unable to corrupt her chastity, he in revenge betrayed the town of Risa to Almontes, who entering by night put all to the sword. Rogero and his father Rampallo were killed: but Almontes afterwards repenting of the part which he had acted, caused Beltram to be put to death. Galacella, then big with child, was put on board a vessel with eight attendants, whom she afterwards killed, and landing at a castle was delivered of two children and died.

Aspramonte, c. iv. vi. ix. & seq.

The latter part of this story is differently told by Boyardo and Ariosto, who relate that she was exposed alone in an open boat by her brothers, and cast on the coast of Africa.

But when thy ardoor all my hopes appue'd,
My wretched days with grief and sickness clos'd.
Yet ere I died, where my prophetic sight 511
Here with Marphian long foretold thy fight,
I call'd the demons from Tartarean gloom
With murbles heap'd to raise this stately tomb;
And with loud cries to Charon thus I pray'd:
'Awhile forbear to claim my mournful shade!
Though freed from life, permit my ghost to stray
In this drear grove till that predestin'd day,
When my Rogero in this lone retreat
In single combat shall a sister meet.' 520
Impatient here I chid the lingering hour
That stay'd thy coming to this cypress lower:
O Bradamant, by our Rogero lov'd,
Henceforth be every jealous thought remov'd!—
But now, farewell! farewell to cheerful light,
I sink for ever in eternal night!''

Here ceas'd the voice!'; and ceasing left impress'd
Fear, wonder, love, in every hearer's breast.
The knight Marphisa for his sister knew:
She, in Rogero, with enraptur'd view 530
Her brother own'd; and both with pious haste
Advancing in each other's arms embrac'd: (mov'd.
While she, whose soul no more with doubts was Shar'd in their meeting and their joy approv'd:
Now recollection, waking many a thought,
The time long past to their remembrance brought,
The sports in which their childish years they led,
Confirming all Atlantes' spirit said.

Rogero to his sister now reveal'd 540
What love his heart for Bradamant conceal'd;
And, with affection's warmest glow, display'd
The ties that bound him to the generous maid:
Meantime fell discord, late a cruel guest,
Was banish'd far from either virgin's breast,
And both, to peace and amity dispos'd,
Their friendly arms around each other clos'd.

Marphisa now impatient burns to inquire
The scale and birth of their illustrious sire;
By whom he fell, and how the chief was slain,
In single fight, or on th' embattled plain: 550
What impious hands their hapless mother gave
A guileless victim to the greedy wave:
If e'er the tale had reach'd her infant ears,
The trace was scarce retain'd in lapse of years.

Rogero then began: "From Ilium's coast,
Through Hector's mighty line our race we boast.
When young Astyanax had sed the bands
Of Grecian foes, and 'scap'd Ulysses' hands,
He left behind him in his native place
A youth of semblant stature, mien and face: 560

Long wandering o'er the spacious seas he gain'd
Sicilia's isle, and in Messina reign'd.
His progeny at length by Faro dwell'd,
And in Calabria's realms dominion held;
Till sons succeeding sons, th' illustrious town
Of Mars¹¹ they reach'd, where chiefs of high renown

Spring from their lips, whom mighty Rome obey'd,
Who regal or imperial sceptres sway'd;
Whose blood to Constantine from Constant rose,
And thence to Charles imperial Pepin's son. 570
Midst these Rogero (first that bore the name)
Buövo, Gamberon, Rambaldo came:
Rogero last, the second, he who led,
As old Atlantes from yon marble said,
Our honour'd mother to the nuptial bed.
Your eye may clear in story'd annals trace
The glorious actions of our generous race."

Rogero then declar'd, from Afric's shore
How Agolant his double offspring bore
Almontes and Troyano; how he brought 580
A daughter, who in arms so bravely fought,
That many a Paladin to earth she threw;
Till of their sire the fair enamour'd grew:
That for his sake her father she forsook,
And how, baptiz'd, his hand in marriage took.
He told the traitor Beltram's impious flame,
Who burnt incestuous for the beauteous dame:
Whom to possess all nature's ties he broke,
And basely yielded to a foreign yoke.

Sire, brothers, country—Kiss's town betray'd 590
To foes whose fury scenes of death display'd.
How Agolant and his dire sons combin'd,
(When billows dash'd, when howl'd the raging wind)
Unhappy Galacelli's death to doom,
Six moons beholding then her growing woman:
And how her feeble staff without a guide
They lanch'd at mercy of the roaring tide.

While thus her brother his discourse pursu'd,
In mute attention rapt Marphisa stood,
With joy exulting from such spring to trace 600
The shining streams of her illustrious race:
Mongrana thence and Clairmont thence she knew
(The double progeny) their lineage drew;
Names that through Earth had pass'd univ'rsal long,
Fame's darling chiefs, and themes of future song.

But when at length she heard the cruel brood
Of Agramant had shed Rogero's blood
By treacherous guile, and doom'd his blameless wife
On surgy tides to end her wretched life;
No more the sister could her wrath disguise, 610
But thus abrupt—"O brother lov'd!" she cries,
"Forgive me, if I gently must complain
That you, a son, could filial warmth restrain,
And unreveng'd behold a father slain!

What though Almontes and Troyano, fled
From mortal state, are shelter'd with the dead,
Thy justice may the son of life deprive—
Thou liv'st—and yet shall Agramant survive?
What foul dishonour must thy courage blot,
Thy parents' wrongs neglected and forgot! 620
Not only from this king thy sword abstains,
But thee, his soldier, Afric's court retains:
By CHAER, the God henceforth I will adore,
That God to whom my father bow'd before,
I swear this armour never to forsake,
Till for my parents' wrongs revenge I take!

¹¹ Rome.

¹¹ There is scarce a passage in this, or perhaps it may be allowed in any poem, more noble, poetical, and affecting, than this discovery of Rogero and Marphisa to each other: the several workings of rage, love, and jealousy, are inimitably painted, and the attention of the reader wonderfully suspended, till the whole mystery is unravelled by the sublime machine of the ghost of Atlantes, which may be truly called dignus vindice nodus. The sudden transition of scene from the hurry and tumult of a field of battle to a sequestered grove and sepulchre, and the terrible voice that issues from the vault, are circumstances of a strong imagination. Indeed the many natural, sublime, and beautifully wild strokes of this book would not have been unworthy of a Shakspeare himself!

Griev'd I behold, and ever shall behold,
 Rogero's force with Agramant enroll'd,
 Or mix'd with Moors, unless with sword in hand
 To scatter slaughter through their hated band." 630

While from Marphisa's lips these accents flow'd,
 The heart of Bradamant with rapture glow'd,
 And oft she urg'd her lover to pursue
 The path Marphisa pointed out to view,
 And seeking Charles, assert his lineal claims
 To honour's due; for long his father's fame
 Had Charles confess'd, and deem'd no living knight
 Eclipse'd his valour in the field of fight.

To them Rogero courteous thus reply'd:
 He long ere this had left the Pagan's side, 640
 Had all been known, or known been duly weigh'd:
 But since from Agramant the martial blade
 Now grac'd his thigh, on him that sword to raise
 With treason's guilt would stain his former praise;
 To shed his blood whom for his lord he chose,
 And pledg'd the faith of knight to guard him from his foe.

Yet, as engag'd to Bradamant he stood,
 So to his martial sister now he vow'd
 The first fair hour occasion gave to take,
 The Moorish camp with honour to forsake. 650
 This had he sought before, but left in fight
 To death near wounded by the Tartar knight:
 Long time he lay, which numbers could attest,
 (As late the Muse has told) but o'er the rest
 Marphisa knew, who every day beside

His languid couch her friendly cares supply'd.
 He said; the word each noble virgin took,
 And all by turns their pleaded reasons spoke;
 At length they fix'd Rogero should repair
 To Agramant, whose standards fann'd the air 660
 At Arli's town, and with his lord remain
 Till he some just occasion might obtain

To seek imperial Charles, and join the Christian
 Marphisa then the enamour'd maid address'd:

"Permit his absence, nor alarm thy breast,
 Few days shall see him to your sight restor'd,
 Nor longer Agramant be call'd his lord."
 Thus pleasing she; while yet her doubtful mind
 Had scarce resolv'd the purpose she design'd,
 Rogero bids adieu, and turns the rein 670
 To seek his king encamp'd on Arli's plain.
 When sudden from the neighbouring vales they bear
 The sounds of sorrow breaking on their ear;
 And female plaints they seem'd—But here we close
 The pleasing book to seek a short repose;
 Yet nobler deeds th' ensuing page displays,
 If still you deign to mark your poet's lays.

BOOK XXXVIL

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero, Bradamant, and Marphisa, find three damsels cruelly treated, and undertake to revenge their cause. They arrive with them at a town where they are acquainted with the shameful law made by Marganor against women.
 Tale of Marganor and his sons. Rogero, Bradamant, and Marphisa, attack the castle of Marganor,
 and take him prisoner. Marphisa institutes
 a new law. Death of Marganor.

In every dame, who day and night applies
 To acquire those gifts which Nature oft denies,

The fruit of anxious toil!—If such can raise
 A name in future times deserving praise,
 Would but the sex those paths of learning take,
 Which mortal virtues can immortal make,
 And thus themselves to distant ages tell;
 The deeds in which the female race excel,
 Without the poet or historian's aid,
 Who oft by malice or by envy sway'd, 10
 Whate'er of good they knew have kept conceal'd,
 And, blas'd abroad, each little fault reveal'd;
 Then might such honours crown the lovely kind,
 To leave the lessening fame of men behind.
 With equal ardour man to man repays
 The mutual tribute of reflected praise:
 Nor this alone, but labours to proclaim
 Each blemish that may blot the woman's name;
 As if he fear'd their merits fair display'd
 Would sink his own, like suns that set in shade. 20
 But not a tongue or hand, though bent in spite
 With voice to utter, or with pen to write,
 With every fraud of jealousy indur'd
 The bad to heighten and obscure the good,
 Can so prevail the gentle sex to stain,
 But still their glory shall in part remain,
 Though far beneath what their deserts might claim,
 If candid truth allow'd their genuine fame.

Not fam'd Harpalice, on Scythia's shore;
 Not Thomyris, who brav'd the Persian power; 30
 In Troy or Latium, not each warrior maid,
 Who gave to Turnus or to Hector aid;
 Not she³ who fled with Tyre and Sidon's train,
 Through length of seas to fix her Libyan reign:
 Not great Zenobia⁴; not the queen⁵ whose hand
 Subdu'd Assyria, Ind, and Persia's land:
 Not these alone, and some selected few,
 Demand the fame to mighty actions due:
 Not those alone in Greece and Rome display'd,
 For virtues bred beneath their fostering shade, 40
 But dames as wise, as faithful, just and brave,
 Have liv'd from Indus to th' Hesperian wave,
 Whose praise, whose honours are for ever flown,
 And scarce, amidst a thousand, one is known;

¹ Spenser in like manner complains of the jealousy and injustice of writers.

Here have I cause in men just blame to find
 That in their proper praise so partial be;
 And not indifferent be to woman-kind,
 To whom no share in arms or chivalry
 They do impart, we make memory
 Of their brave deeds, and prowess martial:
 Scarce do they spare to one, or two, or three,
 Room in their writs; yet the same writing small
 Does all their deeds deface, and shame their glories
 all, Fairy Queen, book iii. c. li. st. 1.

² Penthesilea and Camilla. ³ Dido.

⁴ Zenobia, queen of Palmyra, who, when her husband Odenatus was taken prisoner by Saporus, king of Persia, raised a great army, set her husband at liberty, and afterwards conquered the East. At the death of Odenatus she had the courage to make war upon the emperor Aurelianus, who, having taken her prisoner, caused her to be led in triumph: and when he was reproach'd by some, for triumphing over a woman, he replied, that her courage and power had been superior to any man's.

⁵ Sapphira.

Since partial writers, in an envious age,
With cruel falsehood have debas'd their page.
Yet, O ye noble dames! who pant to gain
The wreaths of virtue, virtue's track maintain,
Nor let despair of future times regard
Your venturous steps from high attempt retard: 50
For learn this truth, by just experience found,
Nor good, nor ill, has one eternal round.
If writers oft your praises have deny'd,
The present time has well that want supply'd.
Your wondrous worth Marullius⁶ late has shown;
Pontanus, and the Strozzi⁷, sire and son:
Capello, Bembo⁸, plead your sex's cause;
And he⁹ whose pen prescribes the courtier's laws,
And is himself th' accomplish'd prince he draws¹⁰.
These Alamanni¹¹: hereth' immortal pair¹¹ 60
Lov'd by the Muses and the god of war,
Sprung from the race that rul'd the favour'd ground,
Which Mincius' stream divides and lakes surround.
Of these, while one by nature still inclin'd
To pay due homage to your beauteous kind,
Bids Cynthia and Paroessus sound his lays,
Aid high to Heaven extend your swelling praise;

⁶ Marullus Tarchonista, a Greek, no less skilled in arms than letters: he served in Italy, and married Florentina, daughter of Bartholomæa Scala, a lady of erudition. He lost his life by a fall into a deep pit, and died the same day that Ludovico Sforza fell into the power of the French. Pontanus was born at a castle belonging to the duke of Spoleto; his father being killed in an insurrection of the people, he fled when a youth to Naples in great poverty, and was received by Antonio Pantherista, secretary to Alphonsus of Aragon; he succeeded Pantherista in his office, and married a rich Neapolitan lady: he wrote well in prose and verse, and died at seventy-seven years of age at Naples.

⁷ Tito Vespasiano Strozzi and Hercules his son. Tito wrote many things, but was excelled by his son Hercules, who was also a great improver of the theatre: he was much addicted to women, which passion at last ended in his death. They both lived at Mantua. Hercules wrote in praise of Isabella, wife to the duke of Mantua. Fornari.

⁸ Capello, a Venetian gentleman and an excellent Tuscan poet. Bembo, afterwards cardinal; he wrote in prose and verse, and excelled on amorous subjects, which was objected to him when Paul III. raised him to the cardinalship. Fornari.

⁹ Castiglione.

¹⁰ Count Bandassar Castiglione, who excelled in all the qualities of an accomplished courtier: he wrote a treatise entitled Il Cortegiano (The Courtier), in which he introduces many praises of women: it is said, by Ariosto, that in describing a perfect courtier he drew his own picture. Fornari.

¹¹ Luigi Alamanni, an excellent poet: he lived some time in banishment in France, like another Ovid, where he wrote many things, particularly his Girone il Cortese (Girone the Courteous), a poetical romance.

¹² Two of the name of Luigi; Gonzaga of Castel Ginefedi, cousin to the duke of Mantua, and Gonzaga called of Gazalo, for his intrepidity surnamed Rodomont, who afterwards married Isabella. Fornari.

The love, with truth and constancy unmov'd,
So well by him in Isabella prov'd¹²,
Exalts your sex so far, your fair renowns, 70
From Envy's shafts he guards above his own;
Nor lives, throughout the world, so brave a knight,
Who less shall fear in virtue's cause to fight:
His deeds to other bards a theme can give,
His pen can bid another's glories live:
Worthy a dame so wealthy¹³, who (e'erow'd
With every gift by bounteous Heaven allow'd
The female name) through every chance could prove
A steady column of connubial love¹⁴.
He worthy her, she worthy him to bless; 80
No worthier two each other to possess.
New trophies see he rears on Oglio's shore¹⁵,
Amidst the din of arms and cannon's roar;
So rich a war¹⁶ his polish'd genius gave
That envy seem'd to swell the neighbouring wave.
Hercules Bentivoglio¹⁷ pours along,
And paints your triumph in triumphant song.
Trivulzio¹⁸ follows; then in equal lays
My own Guidetto¹⁹ your desert displays;
And Molza²⁰, nam'd by Phoebus to record your praise,
See! Hercules, Carnuti's duke²¹, appears, 91
Son of my patron duke—his wings he rears
Like the sweet swan, and singing as he flies,
Bears your lov'd name resounding to the skies.

¹² This Isabella was daughter of Vespasian Gonzaga, and being promised to signor Luigi of the same family, pope Clement, exasperated with Luigi for being in arms with the Imperialists at the sack of Rome, endeavoured by every means to make her marry another; but she, neither by threats or promises, would be ever induced to break the faith that she had plighted. Porcacchi.

¹³ Rodomont received with her a dowry of twenty thousand ducats. Fornari.

¹⁴ Alluding to her name, Colonna, the ancient race of the Colonenses.

¹⁵ The castle of this lord of Gazalo was situated not far from the river Oglio: by the neighbouring wave he means Mincius, and thus seems in some sort to equal him to Virgil. Fornari.

¹⁶ Luigi Gonzaga Rodomont not only excelled in military talents, but was an accomplished writer. As a proof of his easy vein in poetry, we may refer to the stanzas printed with his name at the end of the Furioso, in most of the editions of the work.

¹⁷ Son of Annibale: he wrote eclogues and comedies, and likewise excelled in music: he lived at Ferrara. Fornari.

¹⁸ Renato Trivulzio of Milan; he composed in octave stanzas on amorous subjects. Francesco Guidetto, a Florentine, a good writer in Tuscan verse. Fornari.

¹⁹ Maria Molza da Madonna from her earliest life showed a genius for poetry. She excelled in Latin and Tuscan verse, and was patronised by every Mæcenus of the age. Her life was licentious, being like another Sappho, addicted to a multiplicity of lovers, and died at last of disease, a victim to her incontinence. Fornari.

²⁰ Hercules II. then only duke of Carnuti, afterwards duke of Ferrara.

See Vasto's lord¹¹ (whose virtues might inspire Full many a Roman and Athenian lyre)
Exalts your deeds, while numbers more¹² that live,
In this our age your honour'd praises give.
Behold our sex their female labours leave,
Forgot to turn the reel, the web to weave, 100
And guide the pen on learning's sacred theme;
Who quench their thirst at Aganippe's stream,
And, thence return'd, such honours you bestow
Man owes you much—to man you little owe.
Should here the Muse recount the splendid names
And mighty worth of these distinguish'd dames,
How would the subject shine from page to page!
What other story could the verse engage?
What course is left!—shall I the whole reject,
Or, midst the train a single name select? 110
One I'll select! in whom such gifts combine
Not Envy's self shall at the choice repine.
She not alone, with sweet mellifluous lays
Preserves her name to far succeeding days,
But calls the slumbering worthy from the tomb,
And bids his fame reviv'd eternal bloom.
As Phœbus on his sister seems to throw
More vivid light than on the stars that glow
Around his orb; so he her breast inspires,
Whose praise I sing, with more exalted fires: 120
Gives every word with energy to flow,
And bids her shine a second Sun below.
Victoria is she call'd¹³—and well the name
Befits her, born to triumph and to fame;
With every trophy deck'd of laurel'd pride,
And victory attendant at her side,
Like Artemisia¹⁴ she, the queen who prais'd
For nuptial duty, to Mausolus rais'd
The stately pile: but more to her is due,
Who from the sepulchre her consort drew, 130
And bade his buried honours rise anew.
If Laodamia¹⁵, Arria¹⁶, Brutus' wife,
Erafne¹⁷ and Argia, fled from life;

¹¹ Alphonso, marquis of Vasto, who enriched poetry with many elegant amorous compositions. Fornari.

¹² Ludovico Dominichi was among the most celebrated: he composed an entire volume to the honour of women. Fornari.

¹⁵ Laodamia, wife of Protesilaus, who went to the siege of Troy: he was the first who landed, and fell by the hand of Hector: his dead body being sent home to Laodamia, she expired upon it.

Arria, wife to Pætus, who was condemned to death for being privy to a conspiracy against the emperor Claudius. Arria, with great intrepidity,

And numbers more, in story'd annals bloom,
Who sought their breathless husbands in the tomb:
Still fair Victoria¹⁷ yields a nobler theme,
Who could from Lethe and the turbid stream
That nine times round the bloodless spectres flows,
Her husband free, though Death and Fate oppose.
If stern Achilles¹⁸ once could envy raise
In Macedonia's king for Homer's lays;
What would the monarch, living, feel to hear
Thy name, Pescara, sound in every ear;
For whom thy chaste thy much-lov'd consort sings
Eternal honours on the tuneful strings?
If all her great deserts the Muse would tell,
The Muse for ever on the theme might dwell;
And leave what late I promis'd to unfold,
A pleasing story in the midst untold,
Of Serce Marphisa, and the gentle pair, 154
Which in this book I purpos'd to declare.
Since gracious now you stand prepar'd to hear
These fair adventures with attentive ear,
For better leisure I reserve the lays
That mean to trace Victoria's boundless praise.
Not that my verse can make those virtues bright
Which shine unrivall'd by their native light,
But fain my soul would those desires obey,
Which prompt all honours at her feet to lay.
Thus then, ye fair, I deem in every age 160
Your sex might claim a place in story'd page, drew a dagger, and plunging it into her bosom, presented it to her husband with this expression, "that she died without pain, but that the agony she felt was for the death which he must suffer." On this incident Martial made the following celebrated epigram:

*Casta suo gladium cum traderet Arria Pæto,
Quam de viaceribus traxerat illa suis,
Si qua fides, vulnus quod feci non dolet, inquit,
Sed quod tu facies, hoc mihi, Pæte, dolet.*

When Arria chaste to Pætus gave the blade,
When from her breast she drew the crimson steel,
'Tis not (she cried) the wound my hand has made,
But what, O Pætus! thine must make, I feel.

Portia, the wife of Brutus, hearing of the defeat and death of Brutus, put an end to her own life by swallowing burning coals.

¹⁷ Evadne, wife of Capaneus, who went to the siege of Thebes: her husband being dead, she threw herself on the funeral pile, and was consumed with him.

Argia daughter to Adrastus king of Argos, and wife to Polyneices. Polyneices and his brother Eteocles being dead by the hands of each other, Creon forbade them to be buried; but Argia, accompanied by her sister Antigone, went in the night to the field of battle, and finding the body of her husband gave it burial; on which the tyrant commanded Argia and Antigone to be put to death.

¹⁸ Ariosto poetically intimates that Victoria, by the excellence of her compositions, preserving the memory of her deceased husband, recalled him to life. See Note to verse 123.

¹⁹ Alexander the Great, paying a visit to the tomb of Achilles, is said to have expressed his regret that he had no such poet as Homer to record his actions.

But canker'd envy in the writer's breast
Has after death each generous name suppress'd.
That time is past—since now yourselves can give
Your virtues blaz'd through latest days to live.
Could those two kindred dames like you excel
In arts of eloquence, as warring well,
What gallant deeds had now been brought to light,
Which envy long has kept obscur'd in night!
Of these a tenth the Muse can scarce declare; 170
Of fierce Marphisa, Bradamant the fair,
I speak, and wish each glory to display,
Since virtuous deeds should shine in open day;
Your slave am I, and burn with zeal to show
To you what truth and loyalty I owe.

In set to part, I said, Rogero stood,
His sword recover'd from the yielding wood, [groan
When from the neighbouring vale was heard the
Of female plaints and undistinguish'd moan.
He paus'd; but soon, with either warlike maid, 180
He bent his course to give the mourners aid:
All spur their steeds, and now approaching near,
With louder cries distincter words they hear.
At length they find, in wretched plight distress,
Three dames with weeping eyes and sobbing breast,
Whose vesture, clipt above each lovely waist
By impious hands, to strangers' gaze disgrac'd
Those secret charms, which each low-seated trice
To hide from sight, and fears again to rise.
As Vulcan's offspring²⁰ born from dust of earth, 190
Whom Pallas took, and gave the monstrous birth
With charge severe to raise Aglauros' hand,
Who dar'd to disobey her high command;
As he of old his serpent feet enclow'd
Within the car, which first his art compos'd;
So crouch'd the virgins, fearful to reveal
Those charms that modesty would fain conceal.

This object fir'd in either noble dame
The kindling blushes of a maiden shame:
In each fair cheek the deep'ning crimson glows, 200
As blooms in Pæstum groves²¹ the fragrant rose.
Indignant Bradamant, with wondering eyes,
Amidst these weeping dames Uliana spies,
Her, whom at Tristram's lodge she met erewhile,
The lovely envoy from Perduto's isle:
Nor less the damsels her attention drew,
Whom late companions of the fair she knew.
But to Uliana, honour'd o'er the rest,
The noble maid her courteous speech address'd;
And ask'd what wretch of unrelenting mind, 210
Foe to the gentlest ties of human kind,
Could to a stranger's eyes those charms reveal.
Which modest nature labours to conceal.

At that known voice Uliana rais'd her eyes,
Suffus'd with flowing tears, and now descries

²⁰ Ericthonius, the son of Vulcan, was born with the feet of a dragon, and was given by Pallas shut up in a chest to be kept by the three daughters of Cecrops, king of Athens, Pandroso, Erce, and Aglauros, with strict orders not to look therein: but Aglauros through curiosity opened the chest, and discovered the infant, on which they were all three punished. Ericthonius, when he was grown up, invented the use of the chariot, in order, when he rode therein, to conceal his deformity.

²¹ Pæstum, an ancient city, the gardens of which abounded with roses, which were reported to blow twice a year: Thus Virgil, Bisferi rosearia Pæsti.

The vest and arms of that victorious dame
Who late the northern champions overcame.
Then thus—"Not distant far a castle stands,
Where wretches dwell, who with hobuman hands
Have clipt our garments thus above the waist, 220
With blows oppress us, and with taunts disgrac'd.
Nought can I speak of that resplendent shield;
Of those three kings, who long o'er hill and field
My steps pursu'd, no tidings can I tell,
Nor know if death or bondage these befall.
And, though it irks us such a length of way
To trace on foot, we purpose to display
Before the court of Charles our wrongs and shame,
And every justice from the monarch claim."

She said: her words each noble dame inspir'd
With generous wrath, not less Rogero fir'd: 230
With grief they heard the maid her tale relate,
But more they griev'd to view her wretch'd state.
All other thoughts forgot, each virtuous breast
Self-prompted glow'd to aid the three distress'd,
While with one mind the martial three prepar'd
T' avenge the wrong; but first their armour bard
Of vest and scarf, and cloth'd with tender care
The naked charms of every blushing fair.
But Bradamant, whom much it griev'd to view 240
Uliana thus on foot her way pursue,
The weeping virgin on her equal plac'd;
Whose gentle friends, with equal shame disgrac'd,
Marphisa bold and good Rogero took;
Then all the six the lovely vale forsook.
To Bradamant Uliana pointing show'd
The nearest path to where the castle stood:
Her Bradamant consol'd, and for her sake
Vow'd on her foes a just revenge to take.
To right and left, by turns, their course they bent,
And slowly gain'd a rugged hill's ascent; 251
Nor stay'd to rest, till deep in ocean's bed
The setting Sun had veil'd his golden head.
A humble village on the hill's steep side
Their lodging fair and good repast supply'd;
Such as the rustic hamlet could provide.
They gaz'd around, and wondering gaz'd to find
Each part, each dwelling, fill'd with woman-kind,
Some young, some old; but not a single face
Of man was mingled with the female race. 260
Not more surpris'd of old hove Jason knew,
Not more the rest of Argos' valiant crew,
To see no males on Lemnos' fatal shore,
But savage females drench'd in kindred gore;
Than now Rogero and each martial dame,
When to this town at evening close they came.
Here Bradamant and heve Marphisa's care
For sad Uliana, and her damsels fair.
Three vests procur'd, not wrought with female pride,
But such as will their present need supply'd. 270
Meanwhile Rogero call'd a dame from those Residing there, and will'd her to disclose
What place conceal'd the males, since yet his eyes
No male beheld—to which she thus replies:

²¹ The women of the island of Lemnos being jealous that their husbands meant to forsake them for other wives, formed a conspiracy against the men, and at their return massacred them all in one night: Hypoclestra only saved the life of her old father king Thöas, and sent him in safety from the island. Jason afterwards arriving thither, found with surprise the kingdom only held by women. See Ovid's Ep. Hypoclyte to Jason.

"While you perurbance with looks of wonder view
 Without a man our numerous female crew,
 Think what we feel in banishment to live
 From all that ooce could life's fond solace give:
 To fill the measure of our doom severe,
 Sires, sons, and husbands, names for ever dear, 280
 From our lov'd sight a long divorce constrains,
 As our inhuman tyrant's will ordains.
 Chas'd from the confines of the neighbouring earth,
 Where ye, unhappy! drew our wretched birth,
 Our cruel lord has here our sex confin'd
 With wrongs ill-suited to our gentle kind;
 Denouncing pains and death to us, to all
 Our tender mates; should these at love's soft call Hither repair our sorrows to relieve,
 Or we with welcome our lov'd mates receive. 290
 To woman's name he bears such deadly hate,
 He lets no female near his presence wait,
 But drives us thence, as if our harmless breath
 Could taint the air with pestilence and death.

"Now twice the trees their verdant leaves have shed,

And twice renew'd their annual honours spread,
 Since to such height the tyrant's fury rose,
 And none have dar'd his impious deeds oppose;
 Such fear prevails!—for to his brutal mind,
 As if in feil despite, has Nature join'd 300
 A strength beyond the strength of human kind.
 His body, towering to gigantic size,
 A hundred warriors in the field defies.
 Nor we alone his hapless subjects mourn,
 But strangers feel his rage more fiercely born.
 He from his sight disgrac'd each female drives,
 That by ill fortune at his walls arrives.
 O! if you prize your freedom, life, or fame,
 Or dearly hold each fair and gentle dame,
 This way forsake, which leads to yonder tower 310
 Where dwells the tyrant, whose detested power
 Maintains the law, invented to disgrace
 Damsels and knights that reach the fatal place.
 His hand he chief in female blood imbues;
 Not so the wolfe the tender lamb pursues,
 Not Nero, fam'd for every cruel deed,
 Nor wretch more cruel can the wretch exceed Whose fury thus assails each hapless dame
 With impious force, and Margarit his name."

Thus she: Rogero with attentive ear, 320

And each brave virgin, stood the tale to hear,
 And fair besought the matron to disclose,
 How first his hatred of the sex arose.

"You castle's lord," the dame her speech renew'd,
 "Was ever cruel and averse to good,
 But for a time his nature's vice suppress
 Lay deadless, buried in his impious breast.

Two sons his offspring were, of virtuous kind,
 Ah! how unlike their sire's degenerate mind!
 All base and cruel deeds they strove to shun, 330
 And every stranger their affection won.

With these, awhile, mild love and fair report
 And courteous manners grac'd their father's court;
 For though deep avarice could himself restrain,
 Parental fondness gave his sons the rein.
 Each knight and dame that rov'd the country round,
 Alighting there, such friendly welcome found,
 That parting thence each grateful tongue confess'd
 The honours paid to every coming guest
 By both the brethren:—each by solemn rite, 340
 Invested with the sacred name of knight,
 Cilandro this, Tanacro that was nam'd,

Alike for princely men and courage fam'd.

Their worth was priz'd of all, and still had prov'd
 Fair knighthood's boast, of every breast bejoy'd;
 But ah! they fell to cruel love a prey,
 That led them soon from virtue's path astray,
 To tread the maze of error's winding way,
 Their honour now, by fatal passion cross'd,
 In one unhappy deed was stain'd and lost. 350
 It chanc'd that from the Grecian court there
 came

A gentle warrior, with his wadded dame,
 Of soft demeanour and of blooming charms,
 Worthy to fill the noblest lover's arms.
 Cilandro saw, and kindling at the view,
 Such draughts of love from her fair features drew,
 He fear'd the hour that saw the dame depart
 Would see life's latest pulse forsake his heart.
 Too well he saw that gentle suit were vain,
 And hence resolv'd by force the prize to gain. 360
 He arm'd, and near the castle ambush'd lay,
 When well he knew the pair would pass the way.
 His wanted courage and his love combin'd
 To urge him headlong to the deed design'd:
 Soon as he found th' approaching warrior near,
 He rush'd against him with his lifted spear:
 With certain hope of victory he came,
 To unhorse the champion and to win the dame.
 Vain hope!—the knight in field was stronger
 found,

And pierc'd his corset with a mortal wound. 370
 The fatal tidings reach'd his parent's ear,
 Who wept his breathless offspring on the bier,
 And bade his mourning friends the corpse convey,
 Where long entomb'd his dead forefathers lay.

"Yet still were hospitable rites employ'd,
 And friendly welcome every guest enjoy'd:
 Not less Tanacro than his brother strove
 In every act of courtesy and love.
 On this ill-omen'd year a baron came
 From distant regions with his gentle dame; 380
 He, first of men for hardy feats of arms,
 She, first of all her sex for female charms;
 She, blest with truth as with a blooming face,
 He, sprung from ancestry of noble race:
 And well it seem'd a knight of worth so rare
 Should match with one so virtuous and so fair:
 Olindro he, of Longavilla fam'd;
 His blameless consort fair Druilla nam'd.

Alike his dame Tanacro's love inspir'd,
 As late the first his wretched brother fr'd: 390
 Th' unjust desire that on his vitals fook,
 The youth devoted to destruction led:
 He, like Cilandro, honour's voice forsook,
 The ties of hospitality he broke;
 And dar'd each evil, rather than endure
 The rankling wound that death alone could cure.

His brother's end still present to his eyes,
 He bent his thoughts to win the lovely prize
 By sorer means, and such as might afford
 No hope of vengeance to her injur'd lord. 400
 Ah! hapless youth! whose impious love suppress'd
 The last faint tracks of honour in his breast,
 And queen'd in guilt each spark of virtue's fire,
 Plung'd in the gulf that whelm'd his cruel sire.

"One night, far distant from the castle gate,
 He 'points a force well arm'd in caves to wait
 The knight's approach: in ambush close they stand,
 And twice ten warriors swell the deathful band
 To close Olindro's way on every hand.
 In vain his valour dar'd th' unequal strife, 410
 Subdu'd at length he lost his spouse, and life,

Olindro slain, Tanacro seiz'd the fair,⁴²⁰
 Frantic with grief, abandon'd to despair:
 And oft she begg'd his falchion would bestow
 The sole relief in pity to her woe;
 Now rushing to a river's winding side,
 Furious she plung'd amid the dashing tide;
 But cruel Fate the wish'd-for death deny'd.
 Wounded and bruis'd the near assistants bore
 The senseless victim groaning from the shore.
 Her on a bier Tanacro thence convey'd,
 And anxious call'd on medicine's sons in aid,
 To save his lovely prey; while these employ
 Their healing arts, he dreams of future joy.
 The name of mistress his fond heart disdains;
 So fair, no chaste a dame in nuptial chains
 He means to bind; these thoughts his bosom sway,
 By night pursue him, and possess by day.
 He owns his guilt, and large amends he vows;
 The more he soothes, her hatred stronger grows;
 The more the traitor pleads his suit abhor'd, 431
 The more she thirsts 't'avenge her murder'd lord.
 But well she knew deceit and art must join
 The deep-plann'd scheme to further her design;
 She veil'd her former love with pious wiles,
 And heard his tale with well-dissembled smiles.
 Peace, gentle peace, her placid looks impart,
 But deep revenge is brooding at her heart:
 A thousand schemes her busy mind revolves,
 By turns she weighs and doubts, by turns resolves:
 At length she finds her life alone can buy 441
 Her wish'd revenge, and now prepares to die:
 For how so happy can she close her breath,
 As in her own 't'avenge her consort's death?
 All joy she seizes, and feigns a soft desire
 Once more to light the torch at Hymen's fire:
 She decks her charms with every grace of art,
 As her first lord was banish'd from her heart.
 One only boon she begs, to join their hands
 With all the rites her country's law demands: 450
 Not that such nuptial rites, as now she claim'd,
 Her country us'd, but this device she fram'd,
 In hopes her dear revenge on him to view,
 Whose guilty force her lov'd Olindro slew;
 And hence, with virtuous guile the dame describes
 The well-feign'd custom of her native tribes.
 "Each dame," she cries, "who quits her wid-
 dow'd state,
 Must ere she yields to take a second mate,
 With masses sung and all due rituals paid,
 Appease her angry lord's departed shade; 460
 And in the temple, where his bones remain,
 Absolve his soul from past polluting stain. [being
 These rites perform'd, the bridegroom then may
 And to his bride present the spousal ring.
 Meantime the holy priest with ready prayer
 The consecrated chalice must prepare;
 Then from the chalice pour the hallow'd wine,
 And to the new-spous'd the cup consign;
 But first he to the bride the portion gives, 470
 And first her lip the hallow'd draught receives."
 "Tanacro gladly yields, at her demand,
 T'adopt each usage of her native land,

He bids her crown with love his faithful vows,
 And at her pleasure all the rites dispose.
 Ah! wretch! he little deem'd Drusilla's mind
 This snare t'avenge Olindro's death design'd;
 So deep one object all his thoughts possess'd,
 That only one found entrance in his breast.
 "Drusilla near her person long retain'd
 An ancient dame, that with her yet remain'd, 480
 A sister captive; her aside she took,
 And thus with low and sacred voice bespoke:
 'A speedy potion in a vase prepare,
 And to my hand the deadly mixture bear:
 The day arrives my vengeance to fulfil,
 And Margaror's detested son to kill.
 Some other time shall tell—but trust my art
 That thou and I in safety will depart.'
 The bewdame goes; the venom'd bowl prepares,
 And this, returning, to the palace bears: 490
 The potent drugs she blends with Candian wine,
 And gives the dame; the dame with dire design
 Preserves it for the approaching nuptial day,
 To which th' impatient youth forbids delay.
 "The day appointed to the temple came
 With gold and jewels deck'd the lovely dame;
 Where late with pomp of funeral splendour grac'd,
 On columns rais'd her husband's tomb she plac'd.
 These hymns were sung in solemn notes and loud,
 And round of either sex a mingled crowd 500
 Attentive stood: stern Margaror was there,
 With him his son, sigh with exulting air,
 And many a friend to hail the wedded pair.
 "At length the nuptial ceremony o'er,
 Behold th' instructed priest is seen to pour
 The wine and poison blast; to her he gives
 The golden cup, the bride the cup receives
 With steady hand; she to the brink applies
 Her cheerful lip, and drinks what may suffice
 For decency and death; then with a face 510
 To smiles compos'd, resigns the fatal vase
 To her new lord,—with unsuspecting soul
 He takes the gift, and drains the deadly bowl.
 "The cup return'd, he flies with open arms
 Eager to clasp his lov'd Drusilla's charms,
 When lo! each soft, each female grace is fled,
 And kindling furies o'er her features spread!
 She thrusts him back, his loath'd embraces flies,
 While lightning flashes from her fiery eyes,
 Then with a dreadful voice and faltering tone, 520
 'Traitor!' she cries, 'infernal fiend, be gone!
 Shalt thou a life of love and solace know,
 And give my hands to pass in tears and woe?
 O no!—this day its just revenge obtains,
 And sheds destructive poison in thy veins.
 Thou dy'st—but ah! it grieves my soul to view
 So mild a punishment thy crime pursue!
 I only grieve that these unhappy eyes
 See in thy death so poor a sacrifice.
 'Tis all I can—since more the Fates deny, 530
 Another world may every wish supply:
 There shalt thou, wretch, in ever-during chains
 Lament, while present I enjoy thy pains!
 Then to the skies she rais'd a dying look,
 Half cheer'd to smiles, and thus with tears she spoke:
 'Yet thou accept, O ever honour'd most,
 This vengeance paid to thy offended ghost.
 Olindro, take for thy lamented life
 This victim offer'd by thy widow'd wife:
 And, O! for me the king of Heaven entreat 540
 This day with thee in Paradise a seat:

⁴²⁰ This story of Olindro and Drusilla is taken from Plutarch, from whom Castiglione has translated it word for word in his Cortegiano. It is likewise told with many circumstances by Apuleius in his Golden Ass; but Ariosto has altered and improved the story.

If none without desert inhabit there,
To Heaven's high king my spotless truth declare:
Tell him, I dare approach his hallow'd reign
Rich with the triumph of yon monster slain:
What greater virtue lives than hers whose hand
From such fell plagues can free a groaning land!
"She ceas'd; and ceasing, life forsook her breast,
While her pale looks a seeming joy express'd
To see the traitor thus resign his breath, 570
Whose guile had wrought her lov'd Otiandro's death.
'T is doubtful whether first her spirit fled,
Or first Tanacro mingled with the dead:
Yet sure on him th' effect more speedy wrought
Whose throat so largely drain'd th' avenger's dought.

"When wretched Margarior his falling son
Caught in his arms, and saw that life was gone,
Such rage of grief o'er all his senses spread,
His soul seem'd fleeing with his offspring dead:
Two sons were his, and childless now he stood, 560
And each his wretched and to woman ow'd:
Grief, pity, love, despair, and wild desire
Of fell revenge, inflam'd the wretched sire;
Conflicting passions now by turns prevail'd;
So foam the seas by boisterous winds assail'd.
He seeks Drucilla, but the hand of death
Ere yet he came had stop't her belov'd breath:
As with his teeth the snake attempts to wound
The pointed spear that nails him to the ground;
As the gaunt mastiff rushes on the stone, 570
By passing travellers in fury thrown;
So he, more fell than snake or mastiff, lies
'T attack the corpse, that pale and speechless lies.
When long in vain his savage wrath has fed
With impious outrage on the sacred dead;
Against the dames that fill'd the hallow'd fane
He turns his arm; when we (a helpless train)
The havoc of his murdering weapon feel,
As falls the grass before the mower's steel.
Full thirty dames the bloody pavement spread; 580
A hundred wounded from the temple fled.
Such was his people's fear, none durst withstand
The mad destruction of his slaughtering hand.
Swift fled the dames, and all the vulgar crew
With equal terror from the fane withdrew:
At length his grieving friends with gentle force
And mild entreaties stopp'd his desperate course,
And led reluctant to the castle's height,
While all below was tumult, grief, and fright.

"Still burns his rage; but since his people's prayer, 591

His friends' advice had urg'd him now to spare
Our wretched lives, he bent his ruthless mind
To banish thence the race of woman-kind.
That fatal day he publish'd his command,
That every female should forsake the land,
And here confines our sex to this retreat,
Forbidden, with heavy throats, to approach his seat.

¶ Tasso has the like simile:

Quasi mastin, ch'el uomo, od' a lui porto
Fà duro colpo, infelicitato afferra.

Can. ix. st. 88.

So with the stone, that gall'd him from afar,
The mastiff wages unavailing war.

And after both our Spenser:

Like as a cur doth felly bite and tear
The stone which passed stranger at him threw.

Fairy Queen, book iv. c. viii. st. 36.

Thus wives divided from their husbands moore,
Thus weeping mothers from their sons are torn;
When some too bold have dar'd to seek us here, 600
The tidings carry'd to the tyrant's ear,
On these his rage inflicts severest pains,
And those to death without remorse ordains.
Then, at the fort, he bids a law proclaim;
None more severe e'er staid a ruler's name:
The law decrees each dame or damsel led
By evil destiny yon vale to tread,
Shall feel the smart of many a galling wound
From cruel stripes; then from the tyrant's ground
Be exil'd far: her garments clipt away 610
By insidious hands shall to the sight display
What modest virtue blushes to betray.
Should one arrive whom some brave knight defends,
On her unpy'd certain death attends.
All those who come with knights (their martial guard)

Are led by him, whose iron breast is barr'd
To pity's touch, to meet their cruel doom,
Slain by his weapon on his children's tomb.
Each champion's arms and courser he detains,
Himself condemns to groen in servile chains. 620
Such is his power, that near him night and day
A thousand warriors his courtwards obey.
Yet more—Should any hence dismission find,
By every solemn tie that holds mankind
He them adjures, unshaken to proclaim
Eternal hatred to the female name.
If these fair damsels little claim your care,
If for yourselves no anxious thought you bear,
In yonder fortress, where the tyrant dwells,
Prove if his cruelty or strength excels." 630

The matron thus her moving tale address'd,
Till pity melted every warlike breast;
And had not night restrain'd their eager course,
That hour had seen them with relentless force
The castle storm—but here compell'd to stay
'Till early morn reveal'd her saffron ray,
In gentle sleep the knight and virgin lay.

Soon as Aurora, with her blushing light,
Announc'd the Sun, and put the stars to flight,
The fearless three their limbs in armour brac'd,
And each fair damsel on their couriers plac'd; 640
When sudden from behind they heard the sound
Of horses tramping on the neighbouring ground:
They turn'd, and gazing on the vale below,
Far as an arrow parted from the bow,
Full twenty warriors, horse and foot, they view'd,
That through a narrow pass their way pursu'd:
With these a hapless pinion'd female came,
Aged in looks, and such as might proclaim
A wretch deceiv'd by fire, or sword, or chains, 650
To bear the sentence law for guilt ordains.
Though distant yet, the banish'd female crew
By face and vest in her th' attendant knew
Of fair Drucilla, she, who with her dame
Seiz'd by Tanacro to the castle came,
His wretched thrall! to whose the dreadful care
Was given th' avenger's chalice to prepare.

When on the nuptial day the female train
In eager numbers throug'd the sacred fane,
She, fearing what might chance remain behind,
Then fled the town some sure retreat to find. 660
Ere long to Margarior the news was brought;
That in Osterreich she refuge sought;

¶ Duchy of Austria.

And every means he sought, that could secure
Her person, and his vow'd revenge ensure:
Large gifts he proffer'd sordid souls to bow,
And wealth immense; till faithless to his vow
A lord, who gave her shelter in his land,
Betray'd her to the cruel tyrant's hand.
As the rich waves of merchants are dispos'd, 670
On camels laid in ample chests enclos'd;
So to Constanza²² captive was she sent;
Where from their chief this troop with full intent
Receiv'd the victim, destin'd to assuage
The impious Marganor's unbounded rage.
As the strong tide²³ that from the hills descends
Of Vesulus, and to the ocean bends,
When Lambrs and Ticeo swell the course,
And Ada joins it with auxiliar force,
More deeply foams, with widen'd bed appears 680
Swell'd by fresh waves: so when Rogero hears
Of Marganor, he feels new wrath inflame
His generous breast; nor less each martial dame
With fury elow; and all with one accord
Resolve to assail the castle's impious lord,
And, fearless of his guard's surrounding band,
Exact the punishment his deeds demand.
Yet sudden death they deem'd too mild a fate,
Revolv'd that torments should his crimes await.

But first their arms must free the wretched dame
Who with the troop to death devoted came: 691
They gave the bridle to the fiery steed,
And urge through nearest ways his rapid speed;
And never yet th' assail'd receiv'd before
Assault more fierce from such determin'd power:
Each flies, compell'd before the storm to yield,
And leaves the captive dame his arms and shield.
As when a hungry wolf, surcharg'd with prey,
Takes to the den secure his eager way,
If chance the train of men and dogs oppose, 700
He quits his course, aside his load he throws,
And where he least the beaten track espies,
Through thorny brakes with nimble feet he flies:
So from the field the routed band withdrew,
So swift on these the generous warriors flew.
With terror struck, their wretched lives to save,
Some leap the rock, some seek the mountain cave;
With arms and prisoner, many leave behind
Their steeds forgotten, to the foe resign'd:
From these Rogero and the joyful pair 710
Of martial dames selected three, to bear
These three fair virgins, whom so late before
The coursers gall'd with double burthen bore.

Now to the tower of infamy they bend,
And will the matron should their way attend,
To see on Marganor each wrong repaid
With full atonement to Drusilla's shade.
But, fearing ill, the beldame this deny'd:
Her, while in vain she wept, and trembling cried,
Rogero in his nervous grasp compell'd, 720
And on Frontino plac'd reluctant held.

At length they came where from a neighbouring height
A town below lay stretch'd before their sight
Of wide extent, on every side expos'd,
Nor fence'd with ramparts nor with fosse enclos'd.

²² A city of the Swiss.

²³ The Po, that breaks out from mount Vesulus and discharges itself by seven mouths into the Adriatic sea, being increased by the conflux of many rivers from the Alps and Apennines.

Fall in the midst a rock high-towering shp'd
A lofty fort that on its summit stood.
To this with joy their eager course they held,
Where Marganor (detested tyrant) dwell'd.
The town they enter'd, when the watchful guard
Before, behind, their further passage barr'd. 731
Now Marganor, encompass'd with a crew
Of foot and horsemen, from the castle drew,
And in short speech, with haughty phrase, explain'd
The cruel law that in his castle reign'd,
Marphisa then (for so the fiery maid
With Bradamant and with Rogero laid
The first assault) in answer spur'd her steed,
And onward ru'h'd with equal strength and speed:
Nor sword nor lance she grasp'd, but many a blow
With gauntlet arm'd she dealt, and laid him low 741
With batter'd helmet on his saddle-bow.
Marphisa thus—not less the Durian dame
Her courser urg'd: with these Rogero came;
So fierce his onset, six at once he slew
Ere from its rest his potent spear he drew. [press'd,
That, through his paunch the thrilling steel in-
These, through the neck, the head, or panting breast,
Within the sixth, who fled, the weapon broke;
But first through spine and pap resistless took 751
Its bloody way—All stretch'd on earth behold
Where Amon's daughter aim'd her lance of gold,
So from the burning skies is seen to fall
The dreadful bolt that rends and scatters all.
The people fly—some seek the mountain's height;
Some to the plain precipitate their flight:
Some in their dwellings, some in temples hide,
And every fence against assault provide.
None save the dead remain—meantime in bands
Behind his back the wretched tyrant's hands 760
Marphisa ty'd; and to the dame cougm'd;
The ancient dame, who bent her vengeful mind
A torment worthy of his deeds to find.

Marphisa threatens to wrap the town in flames,
Unless they now their errors part disclaim,
Unless they now the tyrant's law forsake,
And, in its stead, another statute make.
All yield to her, for all with equal fear
Her wrath denounc'd for disobedience bear;
Lest the stern virgin with vindictive ire 770
Should shed their blood and waste their domes with fire.

They hate fierce Marganor, nor less they hate
The cruel impious law enforc'd so late;
But such their power who rule with tyrant sway,
Whom most they loath the people most obey;
For mutual want of confidence secures
A tyrant's safety and his reign secures.
Hence exile, murder, patient they behold,
I' their honours tainted and purloin'd their gold.
But grief, though mute, to Heaven's high throne 780
will cry,

And draw down tardy vengeance from the sky,
When each delay the saints shall recompense
With punishment for every past offence.
By wrath and hatred urg'd, the vulgar crew
With deeds and words their wild revenge pursue:
Each shares the woodland spoil (the proverb cries)
When root by winds a tree uprooted lies.
Let kings from Marganor this truth believe,
Who deals in wrong, shall just return receive.
All ranks, and all degrees, exulting view'd 790
The righteous sufferings that his crimes pursu'd.
Many, who wept some mother, child, or wife,
Some sister, by his rage depriv'd of life,

No more by fear withheld, impatient stood
With their own hand to shed the tyrant's blood ;
Scarcely now defended by th' united care
Of brave Rogero and the noble pair
Of martial dames, who doom'd him to sustain
A wretched death of slow-consuming pain.

To her who seem'd with hatred keen to glow, 800
As woman's heart can bear her deadliest foe,
They gave him bound: a hind that stood beside
A rustic weapon for her rage supply'd,
A pointed goad he brought, with which she drew
From every limb the streams of sanguine hue.
Not less Ulania and her friends combin'd
(The dire disgrace still rankling in their mind)
To work his pain; nor idle long they stood,
But with the matron their revenge pursu'd.
Yet such their wish e' offend, their sex but ill 810
With feeble nerve supplies their stronger will:
With stones, with needles, with puny war they wage,
And every instrument of female rage
As when a river swell'd with melting snows
And sounding rains a mighty torrent grows,
Down the steep hills it bears with sweepy way
Trees, cots, and stones, and labouring hinds away:
At length, by slow degrees, with lessening pride
In narrow channels rolls the shrieking tide,
Till boys and females can the current brave, 820
And dry-shod pass the late tremendous wave:
Thus far'd it with the tyrant's ruin'd power,
Once dreadful prov'd, but dreadful prov'd no more!
Behold his crest so fall'n, his courage broke,
His strength so crush'd beneath a stronger yoke,
That infants scorn the tyrant whom they fear'd,
And rend his locks or pluck his bristly beard.

The knight and virgins thence their way pursu'd
Where on the steepy rock the castle stood:
By none oppos'd, their hands the treasures gain'd,
Whate'er of wealth or stores the walls contain'd. 831
Of these they gave Ulania part to share
With those, the late sad partners of her care;
And part destroy'd: the shield of gold they found,
And here the northern kings in fetters bound;
Th' ill-fated three, who from their coarsers cast
By Bradamant, unarm'd on foot had past
With that fair dame, who from a distant shore
The radiant shield and high commission bore.
Nor know I yet but happier prov'd her chance, 840
That these nor grasp'd the targe nor held the lance:
Arms might she wish, could arms her cause maintain,

But better left untry'd, than try'd in vain.
One fate had then involv'd the wretched dame
With those who thither led by warriors came:
Like those conducted to receive her doom:
A wretched victim, at the brethren's tomb.
Unhappy females! fated to disclose
Those charms which virtue shudders to expose!
But more unhappy she, who sadly dies, 850
In bloom of life a spotless sacrifice!
Since all disgrace, by force compell'd, may find
Some kindly balm to soothe the ill-afflicted mind.
Ere these undaunted three the land forsake,
A solemn oath they bid the people take,

That every husband shall his wife obey,
And yield to her the sovereignty of away,
With threats, that he who dares this mandate
scorn,

Too late in sorrow shall his folly mourn.
While men in other climes the rule maintain, 860
They here, revers'd, must own the female reign.
Next were they bound, what strangers thither
came,

Or knights or squires, of high or lowly name,
To chase them thence, unless they solemn swore
By Heaven, by saints—or aught that binds us more,
The cause of women ever to defend,
Foe to their foes, and to their friends a friend.
Should any then in nuptial bonds be ty'd,
Or soon or later woo the blushing bride,
To her must each his vow'd allegiance pay, 870
And give her empire undisputed away.
Marphisa vows (ere months in circling round
Have clos'd the year, or leaves bestow'd the ground)
Once more to seek the land, and should she find
Her law neglected by their faithless kind,
To give their buildings to devouring fire,
And see at once their name and race expire.

Ere yet they went, the knight and either maid
With pious care Drusilla's corpse convey'd
From ground impure, and in a tomb enclos'd 880
With her dear lord in lasting sleep repos'd.

The crone on Marganor revenge pursu'd,
And all his limbs with purple gore bodew'd,
While still she mourn'd that Heaven deny'd her strength

To draw his sufferings out to endless length.
The warrior-virgins near a temple spy
A stately column pointing to the sky,
On this engrav'd, by his command, they saw
The tyrant's impious and incestuous law.
Those arms that Marganor was wont to wield 890
Were here dispos'd, his cuirass, helm and shield;
In trophy-wise—and near they bade to place
Their new decrees to bind the future race.
So long they tarried, till the column bore
Marphisa's law, far other than before,
When the dire sentence doom'd each wretched
dame

To timeless death or heart-corroding shame.
The three departing thence, Ulania's fair
Remain'd behind rich vestments to prepare,
With all the state befitting one who came 900
To Charles' high court, and such as might pro-
claim

An envoy from a mighty sovereign dame.
Fell Marganor was to Ulania's power
Consign'd; but lest some unpropitious hour
With new device should free him from her chain,

And he return e' afflict the female train,
She made the wretch a tower's steep height ascend,
And with one leap his crimes and sufferings end.
Of these the vary'd story speaks no more,
But follows those that bend to Arli's shore. 910

That day and half the next the three pursu'd
Their friendly journey, till at length they view'd
Two different tracks (and well was either known);
One to the camp, one led to Arli's town.
Embracing off, while words sad lingering fell
From either's lips, the lovers bade farewell.
At length they part; the knight to Arli goes,
The dames re-join the camp—and here my tale I
close.

* In this and some other instances of the same kind, Ariosto seems to depart from the female character, at the same time that the expressions are such as must have a ludicrous effect in any language.

BOOK XXXVIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Bradamant and Marphisa arrive at the Christian camp, where Marphisa is introduced to the emperor Charlemain, and afterwards baptized in the Christian faith. Saint John dismisses Astolpho from Paradise with Orlando's wit. The knight returns to Nubia, where he restores Senapus to sight, who raises a vast army to enable him to lay siege to Biserta. His march into the dominions of Agramant. The wind secured in a bag. The transformation of stones to horses. Agramant calls a council at Arli on the state of his affairs. Speeches of Maritus and Sobrino. By the advice of the latter, Agramant sends an embassy to Charles with proposals to determine the war by a single combat. Charles accepts the conditions. Rogero is chosen on the side of the Pagans, and Rinaldo on the side of the Christians. Affliction of Bradamant. Preparations for the list, and ceremonies previous to the combat.

Y^e courteous fair¹ with gracious ear inclin'd
 T' attend my story, from your looky I find
 That much by you Rogero stands reprov'd
 For such desertion of his best belov'd:
 You share in anguish with his faithful dame,
 And think he little feels love's potent flame.
 Had any other cause allur'd the knight
 Against her will I' ab-sent him from her sight,
 Though hopes of greater wealth might fire his breast,
 Than Cræsus join'd with Cræsus² once possess'd, 10
 Yet should I deem with you that Cupid's dart
 Had feebly struck, but fail'd to pierce his heart;
 Since love's dear raptures never can be sold
 For mines of silver, or for heaps of gold.
 Not only full excuse, but he who weighy
 What honour dictates, merits lasting praise,
 Who shuns each action that may taint his name:
 Had Bradamant, regardless of his fame,
 Detain'd Rogero, such restraint might prove
 A female weakness more than virtuous love; 20
 And argue motives of a baser kind
 Than suit a generous and enlighten'd mind.
 If lovers like their own, or e'en above
 Their own, should prize the lives of those they love,
 Beyond self-pleasure, held by each so dear,
 Should all the honour of their friends reverse:
 Honour, more worth than life, through life we find

Prefer'd to every good that courts mankind,
 Though fierce Almoote had his father slain,
 The guilt on Agramant leaves not a stain; 50
 While many a kindness to the youth express,
 With grateful feeling warm'd Rogero's breast;
 And urg'd him still unshaken to pursue
 His master's steps: nor less the praises due

¹ Cræsus a king of Lydia celebrated for his great riches. Cræsus, called by the Romans Marcus Cræsus, is said to have been the most wealthy, and at the same time the most avaricious of men. His wealth was reputed to have been so immense, that he could have maintained the whole Roman army for one year, without any apparent diminution of his possessions.

To use, who while her power could well detain
 A parting lover would that power restrain.
 What though he left her thus, some future hour
 Might heal the seeming wrong, and love restore
 To all his dues—but one small wound we feel
 From honour's lapse not years or years can heal.

Rogero now to Arli's walls return'd, 41
 Where Agramant his shatter'd forces mourn'd;
 While Bradamant³ and brave Marphisa ty'd
 In friendship's bond, and soon to stand ally'd
 By nearer claims, pursu'd the way that led To where king Charles his conquering banners
 spread,

And strain'd each nerve against the Pagan foe,
 By war's whole force to lay their glory low,
 And free at length the Christian's fair domain
 From Africa's inroad and the force of Spain. 50

Soon as th' approach of Bradamant was heard,
 A sudden joy through all the camp appear'd.
 Still as she pass'd, on either hand the crowd
 Declin'd with reverence, while to each she bow'd:
 Her coming known, to meet the glorious maid
 Rinaldo hasten'd; nor Richardo stay'd;
 Brave Richardetto, all the numerous race
 Of noble Amon, mov'd with eager pace

To bid the virgin welcome to the place.
 But when the tidings spread, that with her came 60
 Marphisa bold, in arms so great a name,
 Who from Cathay, with warlike laurels crown'd,
 Had bent her course to Spain's extremest bound,
 Nor rich nor poor within the tents remain'd,
 Such fond desire each bosom entertain'd

T' enjoy the sight; deep throoging round they drew,
 Together such a glorious pair to view.
 To Charles they came; and she who ne'er before inclin'd her knee to any earthly power,
 Here first (as Turpin writes) that homage paid 70
 To him, whose hand th' imperial sceptre sway'd,
 To Pepin's mighty son, to whom alone,
 Of every king through Earth's wide regions known,
 She deem'd such honour due; nor held a name,
 Christian or Saracen, of equal claim,
 Howe'er esteem'd for virtue, wealth, or fame.

His tent forsaking, Charles advanc'd to meet
 The fearless maid, and on his regal seat
 Close at his side in rank resplendent plac'd, 80
 Above the kings, and lords, and barons grac'd.
 There due regard to noblest worth was shown:
 There Paladins and princes of renown
 Remain'd within, a fair selected few,
 The rest arc kept without, a nameless vulgar crew.

Marphisa then her grateful speech address'd:
 "O glorious king! o'er every sovereign blest!
 In arms unconquer'd—whom from India's waves
 To where in Gades' straits³ old ocean raves,
 From Scythian snows to Æthiop's burning sand,
 Hast made thy cross rever'd in every land! 90
 Wisest and best!—whose name all praise transcends,

And draws me now from Earth's remotest ends:
 Here let me own that first, as envy wrought,
 Fell war and enmity with thee I sought;
 And came resolv'd such mighty power to wrest
 From him, whose soul a different faith profess'd:
 For this I dy'd the field with Christian blood:
 For this, thy ruthless foe, prepar'd I stood

² The poet returns to Rogero in this book, ver. 519.

³ The pillars of Hercules.

To work thy further harms—but stronger fate
 To sudden friendship chang'd my former hate. 100
 While to thy loss I plann'd the future blow,
 I found (but how some future time will show)
 Rogero, nam'd of Risa, was my sire!
 'Gainst whom a brother's treason durst conspire.
 Me, in her womb, my luckless mother bore
 Far o'er the seas, where at my natal hour
 A sage magician bent his care to rear
 My infant life,—the seventh revolving year
 Arabian spoilers snatch'd me from his hands,
 And sold to Persia, where in slavish bands 110
 My person grew, till urg'd by lawless flame
 The king my lord assail'd my virgin fame.
 Then him and with him all his court I slew,
 Destroy'd his kindred, and his realm o'erthrew:
 The crown I seiz'd—and scarce my age had told
 The eighteenth sun in annual progress roll'd,
 Seven realms subdu'd beneath my arms I won,
 When envying, as I said, thy high renown,
 I bent my thoughts to lay thy trophies low,
 With what success succeeding time would show,
 But now my will, by stronger power deprest, 121
 To milder purpose yields its haughty crest,
 Ere since I learn'd my honour'd birth to trace
 In lineage near thy own illustrious race.
 Thus, like my sire, a double tie I own,
 Child of thy blood, and subject of thy throne.
 That hate, that envy, which so late before
 My bosom sway'd, I cherish there no more,
 Or bend on Agramant the vengeful tide,
 All to his sire or grandeur's name ally'd, 130
 The foul, detested race by whom my parents died."
 Thus she; and claim'd the hallow'd baptist rite,
 Ready'd when first her sword had slain in fight
 The Turkish prince, by Charles diamist to go
 And on her eastern realms the faith bestow;
 Then turn on those her arm's resistless power,
 That Trevigant and Mahomet adore,
 With promise all her victor-sword might gain,
 Should own the cause of Christ, and strengthen
 Charles's reign.

The emperor, no less eloquent, than skill'd 140
 In sage debate and valiant in the field,
 Much prais'd the generous maid, and much he prais'd
 Her sire, her lineage, high in honour rais'd.
 To all her words he fram'd a fair reply,
 Intrepid courage beaming from his eye,
 Then clos'd his speech, her proffer'd love to take,
 And her his daughter by adoption make.

Again he rose: he clasp'd her to his breast,
 And with a father's kiss her forehead press'd:
 With welcome joy advanc'd on either hand 150
 The chiefs of Clairmont and Mograna's band.
 'T were long to tell how good Rinaldo paid
 Distinguish'd honours to the glorious maid;
 Her deeds he witness'd, when the numerous powers⁶
 Begirt Albracca's close beleaguerr'd towers:
 'T were long to tell what joy in Guido's breast
 Her presence wrought: what equal joy impress'd

⁶ Gregorio Calaprese, an Italian, published a book entitled "A Lecture on the Oration of Marphisa to Charlemain;" being a long and tedious eulogium on this speech, and on the speech of Armida to Godfrey in the ivth book of the Jerusalem of Tasso.

⁸ Alluding to Boyardo's story.

Brave Samonetto's⁶ soul; nor less delight
 Had sable Aquilant, or Gryphon white;
 Who late with her that cruel city⁷ view'd 160
 Where murderous females held their rule in blood.
 With these good Malagigi, Vivian came
 And Richardetto, who the generous dame
 Had seen in fight, what time with theirs she join'd
 Her conquering arms against the treacherous kind
 Of foul Maganza and Lanfusa's train,
 Who met to sell their kin for sordid gain.
 Imperial Charles himself with zealous care
 Bids for th' ensuing day the pomp prepare,
 When in the list, before the public sight, 170
 Marphisa might receive the hallow'd rite.
 Bishops and reverend clerks, to whom is given
 To explain the Christian laws prescrib'd by Heaven,
 He next conven'd, that these by truth inspir'd
 Might teach Marphisa what our foeth requir'd.
 Th' archbishop, in his pontiff's weeds array'd,
 Good Turpin, then baptiz'd the kneeling maid,
 While pious Charles ministrant seem'd to stand,
 And gently rais'd her with his regal hand.

But time requires⁸ me now for him whose sense
 Had left his brain the medicine to dispense, 181
 Which to our Earth, from yon bright orb afar,
 Astolpho brings in great Elijah's car.
 And now descending from the lunar height,
 In Paradise the mint and warrior light;
 The sacred vase they bring, whose wondrous power
 Must the great master of the war restore.
 Then holy John to good Astolpho show'd
 A potent herb with virtues rare endow'd;
 With this, return'd to Earth, he will'd the knight
 To touch the Nubian king and heal his sight. 191
 Then should the grateful prince, for eyes restor'd,
 And hungry harpies banish'd from his board,
 'T assail Biserta's walls his aid afford.
 He taught him how to arm the troops unskill'd
 In martial toil, and train them to the field;
 And how unburnt to tread the burning way,
 Where blinding sands in circling eddies play.
 He bade him now remount the steed that late
 Had borne Rogero and Atlantes' weight. 200
 Reluctant then his leave Astolpho took,
 The hallow'd saint and blissful seats forsook:
 Above the Nile he wheel'd his rapid flight,
 Till Nubia's nearer realm appear'd in sight:
 Then in the city's walls with swift descent
 Alighting to Senapus' presence went.

Great was the joy the knight returning brought
 To Nubia's king, who oft in grateful thought
 Confess'd that aid, which from the ravenous power
 Of famish'd harpies freed his genial hour. 210

⁶ This is undoubtedly a slip of the poet's memory. In the xxxvth Book, Samonetto, who had been made prisoner by Roldomont at the bridge, is said to have been sent by him to Africa, and was not released at the time Marphisa came to the Christian camp; for in the xxxixth Book the ship arrives with him and the rest of Roldomont's prisoners on the coast of Africa, where he meets with Astolpho, and first recovers his liberty.

⁷ City of the Amazons.

⁸ He returns to Bradamant, ver. 535. of this book. Astolpho was last mentioned in Book xxxv. ver. 925.

But when the champion now had purr'd away
The cloudy film that veil'd his visual ray,
The enraptur'd monarch, for his sight restor'd,
His great deliverer as a God ador'd;
Nor only granted at his first demands,
To invade Biserta's walls, auxiliar bands,
But rais'd a host, to which the mightiest yield,
Twice fifty thousand marshall'd for the field;
And proffer'd these to head—the growing plain
Could scarce the ranks of trampling foot sustain 220
On foot they march'd, for rare the race of steeds
In Nubia nurtur'd, while in troops she breeds
The camel, patient loag of parching toil,
And elephant, that shakes the growing soil,
The night preceding, ere the numerous bands
Prepar'd to tread th' inhospitable sands,
The Paladin his winged steed bestrides,
Then to the south his rapid pinion guides,
And gains at length the cave, where issuing forth
The southern wind first breathes against the north:

The champion (as his sage instructor taught) 231
With him prepar'd a bag capacious brought,
And while fatigu'd within the cavern deep,
Th' outrageous blast lay bush'd in quiet sleep,
This at the entrance close, with silent care
Unknown to him, who little dreamt the spare,
Astolpho held; and when with rapid force
At morn the wind essay'd its wonted course,
The closing bag the rushing plague repell'd,
And in its womb the struggling captive held. 240

The knight o'erjoy'd at such a valu'd prey
To Nubia turn'd; and now began his way
With all his sable host, while plenteous stores
Were borne behind to feed the numerous powers.
With these the duke his glorious march pursu'd
Safe in the imprison'd wind, while round he view'd
Th' unstable sands, till from a mountain's height
The plain and distant shore appear'd in sight.
His army here he stays, and here the best
In discipline he singles from the rest, 250

And where the mountain bounds the spacious plain,
Encamp'd his legions leaves his martial train.
Himself, as one who seem'd by looks intent
On some great purpose, gain'd the hill's ascent;
There first the ground with knee devoutly press'd,
Then to his patron saint his prayer address'd,
Secure that Heaven would listen to his vows,
From scattering hands a stony shower he throws;
O wondrous deeds of those who Christ believe!
The falling stones a sudden change receive; * 260
Each takes new shape, and grows a living beast,
With well-turn'd hoof, arch'd neck, and nervous chest:

To neighings shrill the winding crags resound:
The new-form'd race in many a sprightly bound
Rush to the subject vale with eager speed,
Where every stone is now a generous steed.
They snort, they foam, they leap in sportive play,
Of various colour, dappled, roan, or bay.

* This fiction is borrowed from Homer, where Hokus makes a present to Ulysses of the winds in a leathern bag. Odys. b. x.

— at length for parting mov'd,
The king with mighty gifts my suit approv'd:
The adverse winds in leathern bags he bruc'd,
Compress'd each force, and lock'd each struggling blast. Pope's Odys. b. x. ver. 17.

The squadrons, that beneath in order stand,
These soon behold; as soon with ready hand 270
Secure, and mounting post along the plain;
For each was form'd with saddle, bit and rein.

Thus in one day Astolpho chang'd the force
Of fourscore thousand men from foot to horse:
With these in waste the country round he laid,
And wealthy plunder gain'd and prisoners made.

When Agramant had pass'd to Nubia's strand,
Three kings he left to guard his Afric land;
The king of Ferza, Algazier's king, 279
And king Branzardo—these their numbers bring
To oppose the duke; but first with sails or oars
A rapid bark they send to Europe's shores,
That Agramant might learn what ills arose
From such incursion of the Nubian foes.
Through surging tides the vessel night and day
To Arli's port pursues her ready way,
There finds the king with various woes distress'd,
And near by Charles' advancing power oppress'd.

King Agramant, who heard his own domain
Endanger'd thus, while Pepio's realm to gain 290
He cross'd the seas, conven'd to deep debate
The chiefs and princes of the Pagan state.
There once or twice his careful eyes he cast
Where king Marsilius and Sobrino plac'd,
The council join'd; of all the honour'd train
Wiseest and eldest—when he thus began:

"Though ill it fits a leader's name to own
He ne'er divid' should that future time made known;
Yet will I say, should such misfortune light,
As mock'd the prescience of a mortal sight, 300
Error were venal than—that Afric's lands
Were left disarm'd expos'd to Nubia's bands—
The fault was mine—but who, save Heaven (whose eye

Can every deep event of time descry),
Could e'er have thought from realms remov'd afar,
So huge a host would wage in Afric war;
Where clime beyond the burning desert lies,
Where clouds of sand in dusty whirlwind rise?
Yet to Biserta's wall the siege is laid,
Our Afric pillag'd and her sons dismay'd. 310
Declare, O chiefs! if spent with fruitless toil
Our baffled troops shall quit this hostile soil:
Or urge the conflict on, till hence we bear
You Christian Charles a prisoner of the war:—
But how to guard at once my regal seat
And leave this empire crush'd with great defeat;
Let each disclose the thought that sways his breast,
While we from various counsels choose the best."

Here ended Agramant; and, as he spoke,
Où Spain's imperial lord, who next him took 320
His honour'd place, he fix'd an earnest eye,
As from his lips awaiting a reply.
He, rising slow, awhile in silence stood
Before his chief, and first with reverence bow'd:
Resuming then his place, in words prepar'd,
He thus the purport of his mind declar'd:

"When Fame, O monarch! good or evil tells,
Evil or good beyond the truth she swells,
I little trust in tales, that, idly bred,
From tongue to tongue with lying rumours spread,
Less can I credit that which sure will find 331
No credit from a cool considerate mind.
Who can believe that, with such numerous bands,
A king, who holds the sway o'er distant lands,
Should bend his march to Afric's peaceful soil
Through parching sands, where shrunk with heat and toil

Cambyzes once had led¹⁰, in evil hour,
With wretched omens his devoted power?
Perchance from native hills th' Arabian train
May make incursion on the neighbouring plain; 340
And, while no force oppos'd, destruction make,
And sack and kill, and many a captive take:
Meanwhile Branzardo, to whose trusted hand
Thou gav'st the rule (thy viceroy in the land),
For every ten a thousand writes, that blame
For such defeat may less attend his name.
Grant that the Nubians are by wondrous power
Sent like some storm or Heaven-directed shower, Grant that they seem from clouds on Earth to light,

Their march conceal'd from every mortal sight, 350
Weak were indeed the soldiers' hearts to show
Inglorious fear of such a dastard foe.
Yet from thy ships dispatch a chosen few,
And let thy standards but appear in view;
Nubians and naked Arabs all shall fly.
And in their wonted confines trembling lie:
Though unexpected now those spoilers dare
Disturb thy kingdom with invasive war,
While distant here thy handed powers remain.
And seas divide thee from thy native reign. 360
But thou on Charles with double ardour press,
His kinsman's absence must ensure success;
Orlando lost, of all yon Christian foes
Not one shall more your rising fares oppose,
Unless yourself neglect the glorious crown
That waits to hind your temples with renown;
Till Time from thee his favouring look shall turn,
And we too late our shame and ruin mourn."

With words like these, in reason's garb address,
Spain's mighty lord the peers assembled press'd, 370
And urg'd to keep in France the martial bands
Till Charles was exil'd from his native lands.

Then king Sobrino spoke, whose judgment view'd
That king Marcellus less in speech pursu'd
The general cause, than labour'd to conceal
His private aims with show of public zeal.

He thus:—"When peace I counsel'd, would to Heaven

Th' event had shown that ill th' advice was given!
Or that thou then hadst deign'd, O king! to hear
Thy old Sobrino with a willing ear; 380
Nor then in Rodomont confidest most,
In Maribusto and Alzirdo's boat,
With Martinino—would that each I name
Were present now!—but chief that son of fame,
Stern Rodomont, who vow'd in every chance
Thy fate to follow with his single lance,
And crush beneath his arm the brittle power of France:

¹⁰ Cambyzes, king of Media, undertook two expeditions, one against the Amonites, the worshippers of Jupiter Amon, and the other against the Macrobians, a people of Ethiopia that inhabited the country near the Southern ocean. He divided his army into two parts; with one he marched himself into Ethiopia, and the other he sent against the Amonites; but their provisions failing, and finding no supplies in the barren soil through which they pass'd, they were reduced to the most dreadful extremities, and at last constrained to return with great loss: the other army in attempting to pass over the deserts was buried under the mountains of sand.

So might my tongue reproach the recreant knight
Who lives in sloth¹¹, a traitor from the fight;
While I who durst ungracious truths declare, 390
(Then deem'd a coward) still thy fortune share,
And yet will share, while life informs my breast,
That life, which now with weight of years opprest,
I stand prepar'd for each event to yield
To every Frank that dares us in the field.
Nor is there one shall tax Sobrino's name,
Of all, who least their deeds eclipse my fame.
Thus far I speak, that what with fervent zeal
I once declar'd, and what I now reveal,
May no effect of fear or weakness prove, 400
But marks of loyal truth and faithful love.
Hear then, O king! my counsel to retreat,
And turn with speed to thy paternal seat.
Unwise the man, whose fruitless arm pursues
The good another holds, his own to lose!
What is our gain thou know'st—from Africa's shore
Fall thirty kings, the vassals of thy power,
We cross the seas—now count the remnant train,
And scarce a wretched third alive remain!
Forbidden it Heaven, or more must yet be lost! 410
Shouldst thou, O monarch! follow to our coast
Th' improperous war, soon death may level all,
And chief and people share one common fall!
Orlando's absence yields but little aid
To force like ours with every day decay'd:
No ruin hence remov'd—though ruthless fate
Some little space prolongs our wretched date.
Behold Rinaldo, fam'd in many a fight,
And scarcely yielding to Orlando's might,
Behold his brethren, kinsmen, all the train 420
Of Paladins, whose deathless arms maintain
The Christian cause; whose deeds the world re-
veres,

And every Saracen with terror hears!
With these another Mars exacts the praise
Which to a foe my tongue reluctant pays;
The valiant Brandimart, whose fearless breast
(Like his Orlando) danceth ne'er depress'd:
Part have I heard, and part by trial known,
His deeds to others' cost in battle shown.
And since Orlando to their arms was lost, 450
Less good than evil has befall'n our host.
To sufferings now endur'd, my boding mind
Foretels, alas! more sufferings yet behind.
Lo! Mandricardo pale in death is laid,
And stern Gradasso has withdrawn his aid,
With Algiers' king—yet would the last as well
But prove his duty, as his arms excel,
Gradasso's absence might be held more light,
Nor should we so regret the Tartar knight.
While these we lose, while breathless on the plain
Thousands by thousands lie our warriors slain!
While all our troops are drawn from Africa's shore,
Nor can supplies our drooping hopes restore,
Four knights have join'd with Charles, whose martial name
Equals Orlando's or Rinaldo's fame;
Since from these realms to where cold Bactros flows,
No chiefs in field can four such chiefs oppose:

¹¹ Rodomont, since he had been defeated by Bradamant on the bridge at the tomb of Isabella, was retired from the field and lived a recluse, as was the custom of chivalry, to expiate the disgrace which he had brought on the profession of knight-hood.

Perchance to thee is savage Guido known,
 With Sansonetta, and each generous son
 Of Olivero born!—these more I fear 450
 Than many a knight, than many a valiant peer,
 That Germany and various regions send
 Against our force their empire to defend;
 Though each new aid that swells their hostile bands
 From us new courage, new allies demands.
 Whene'er we dare the field, the field we lose,
 And infamy with rout our arms pursues.
 If Spain and Afric, oft with loss engag'd,
 When, two to one oppos'd, the fight they wag'd,
 What chance is ours, where Franks and Scots comb-

460

Where English, Germans, and Italians join,
 Where every six of ours twelve Christians meet?
 What hope of aught but shame and foil defeat!
 In time retire—and with thy kingdom save
 Our few survivors from a foreign grave.
 Marsilius left, the world perchance may blame
 Thy breach of faith, but to preserve thy name
 From all reproach, such terms thou mayst ensure
 As shall, with thine, Marsilius' peace secure.
 Yet with thy fame if ill it seems to stand, 470
 That thou, first injur'd, shouldst a truce demand;
 If still us'd on war thy thoughts are bent,
 (With what success thou seest by sad event)
 One only way remains to turn the tide
 Of wavering conquest from the Christian side:
 Hear but my counsel—to some valorous knight
 Intrust our kingdom's cause in single fight,
 And be Rogero nam'd the champion of thy right.
 We know Rogero, arm'd with sword and shield,
 Can equal prowess in the listed field 480
 With great Orlando or Rinaldo boast.
 Or any leader of the Christian host.

But if thou still pursu'st a general war,
 Though more than human deeds his worth declare,
 He stands but one amidst innumerable foes,
 Where warriors like himself their strength compose.
 If thou my words approve, a message send
 To Christian Charles, that mutual strife may end:
 He for the list shall name his boldest knight,
 Who dares encounter thine in equal fight 490
 Till one shall fall—that king shall tribute pay,
 Whose champion slain or vanquish'd yields the day.

Nor Charles I trust (whate'er his arms have won)
 Will proffer'd peace on such conditions shun:
 In brave Rogero firmly I confide
 That certain conquest must his force betide:
 So just our cause, that all to him shall yield,
 Though Mars himself oppos'd him in the field."

With these permissive words Sobrino mov'd
 Th' assembled peers; the peers th' advice approv'd.
 That day th' important embassy they frame, 501
 That day to Charles the chosen envoys came:
 When Charles, who knew what warriors of renown
 Maintain'd his quarrel, deem'd the prize his own.
 Then to Rinaldo he the combat gave,
 Whom next Orlando, bravest of the brave.
 He trusted most.—Meantime, on either hand,
 The truce was welcom'd by each martial hand:
 With labours spent, with anxious care oppress'd,
 They hail the hour that promis'd future rest; 510
 And cur'd that discord (bane of human good)
 That urg'd their souls to bate, their hands to blood.

Rinaldo thus with honour'd preference grac'd
 Above his peers, in whom his sovereign plac'd
 The charge his empire and his fame to guard,
 Exulting for the glorious list prepar'd;
 Nor fear'd Rogero's arms might his excel,
 Though by that arm stern Mandricardo fell.
 But good Rogero, while his soul confess'd
 His monarch's favour, singled from the rest; 520
 From Afric's lords by Agrament decreed
 In such a cause to conquer or to bleed,
 Yet look'd with downcast eyes of heavy cheer,
 Though unappall'd, his bowen knew not fear.
 Rinaldo had be scor'd, and with him join'd
 Orlando's self, but, ah! his troubled mind
 View'd in his for a warrior near ally'd
 To noble Bradamant his future bride;
 His best-belov'd, who oft with anguish mov'd
 In tender lines his breach of faith reprov'd: 530
 As should he thus her future hopes requite,
 To meet her brother now in mortal fight,
 Such change to hatred must her bowen feel,
 As all his cares could ne'er suffice to heal.

If to himself Rogero mourns in vain
 The part that Heaven has call'd him to sustain,
 Soon as the flying news his fair-one hears,
 Sighs follow sighs, her eyes are fill'd with tears:
 She strikes her lovely breast, her golden hairs
 She rends away, her bloodless cheek she tears: 540
 She calls Rogero perjurd and ingrate,
 And loud lamenting, weeps her cruel fate.
 Whate'er event should chance on either side,
 To her, in every chance, must woe betide:
 She dares not think the day may fatal prove
 To him, the object of her dearest love:
 But should high Heaven his righteous doom dispense

 To punish France for some remote offence,
 Beside a brother's loss, more thrilling pains
 Must rend her soul, a deeper care remains: 550
 She durst not then, but to her foul disgrace,
 And hats incur'd from all her angry race,
 Again her dear, her plighted lord review,
 And in the face of all those vows renew,
 Those vows, which ever present to her mind,
 By night, by day, her anxious thoughts design'd
 To see fulfill'd—so strong was either ty'd,
 No struggle could the mutual knot divide,
 Or late repentance set their loves aside

But she, whose friendly succour ne'er had fail'd
 Whene'er ill chance against the fair prevail'd, 561
 The sage Melissa, with attentive ears,
 Not unconcern'd her plaintive sorrow hears:
 She comes, with gentle words to soothe the maid,
 And promise gives of unexpected aid;
 When need requires, to give her fears relief,
 And stay the fight, her fatal cause of grief.

But now the rival knights, with equal care,
 Their weapons for th' expected list prepare:
 The choice of weapons to the chief remains, 570
 Whose valiant arm the Roman cause maintains;
 And he, who since his gallant steed he lost,
 Still fought on foot amid th' embattled host,
 Resolves, in plate and mail, on foot t' engage,
 With axe and dagger keen the fight to wage.
 Thus, whether fix'd by chance, or whether wrought
 By Malagigi with foreseeing thought;
 Who knew full well how Balisarda's force
 Through arms and armour takes its ruthless course
 Without their trusty swords each noble knight 581
 With axe and dagger will decide the fight:

And near the walls of Ari's ancient seat,
They choose a spacious plain for combat meet.
Aurora scarce had rais'd his watchful head
Above the waves from old Titheos' bed,
To usher in the day that warr'd decreed
To see the victor crown'd, the vanquish'd bleed,
When, lo! on either hand, with equal care
A chosen squadron to the field repair:
They pitch their tents in due proportion'd space.
And near the tents two rising altars place. 591
Ere long, in order marshal'd train by train,
The Pagan forces issu'd to the plain:
Full in the midst, in barbarous splendour dress'd,
Proud Africa's king a fiery courser press'd;
His colour bay, his skin was glossy bright,
Black was his mane, two feet and front were white.

Beside the king his steed Rogers rein'd;
Nor him t' attend Marsilius' self disdain'd,
Whose band the helmet held, so late in fight 600
With peril conquer'd from the Tartar knight:
That helmet, once in Trojan battle borne,
A thousand years ago by Hector worn.
With king Marsilius various objects of fame,
Nobles and heroes plead their equal claim;
On either side his arms and weapons hold,
His arms with jewels set and rich with gold.

Then issuing from their works in shining armour
Imperial Charles conducts his troops in arms,
In blazing pomp and military show, 610
As if on equal terms t' engage a foe.
His noble Paladins their lord enclose,
And near him arm'd the bold Rinaldo goes,
Arm'd save his head—that helmet which of yore
In fatal combat forc'd Mambrino wore,
The Danish Paladin Ugero bears:
Duke Nannes next beside the knight appears;
One axe he holds of two for fight ordain'd,
One royal Salomone's hand sustain'd.

Here various chiefs each Christiana squadron led, 620
And there the powers of Senin and Afric spread.
Between the camps was left an ample space,
Where, save the champions, none the fatal place
Must dare to tread—the trumpet's dreadful breath
For each offence denouncing certain death.
The Christian warrior first, prepar'd for fight,
His weapon seiz'd, and next the Pagan knight:
When now advanc'd before the martial bands
Two priests appear'd, each bearing in his hands
A volume clos'd: one hallow'd page proclaim'd 630
Christ's blameless life; the Koran one was nam'd;
With that, the emperor came, devout in mien,
With this, the Pagan Agramant was seen.
Imperial Charles before his altar stay'd,
And thus with lifted hands to Heaven he pray'd:

"O God! who couldst in flesh resign thy breath
To save devoted souls from sin and death!
O Virgin pure! from whom, for our frail sake,
That God vouchsaf'd a human form to take, 640
And in thy hallow'd womb nine months remain,
Thy virgin-bower preserv'd from mortal stain;

⁵ The several circumstances of the truce between Charles and Agramant, and the breaking of it by the intervention of Melissa, are copied from the ninth book of Virgil, where the Latin poet describes the ceremonies preparatory to the single combat between Aeneas and Turnus, and the machine of Juturna.

Be witness now, that for myself I swear,
And each that may henceforth this sceptre bear,
To Agramant and all, whose future hand
Shall hold the rule of his paternal land,
Of finest gold an annual sum to pay,
Should here my chosen champion lose the day:
And more—I swear to its peace so sure
As may to time's remotest verge endure.
If this I fail, let each offended power 650
On me, on mine, the heaviest vengeance shower,
But spare my people—here thy wrath let fall,
Nor stretch, for my offence, thy scourge to all.
Yet to the world a dread example show,
What punishment awaits the broken vow."

Thus while he pray'd he grasp'd the sacred book
With pious zeal, and upwards fix'd his look.
And now they pass'd to where with splendour
glac'd,

The Pagan train a second altar plac'd:
There vow'd king Agramant to waft his powers 660
I' brough midland waters back to Africa's shores,
And tribute to the Christian monarch yield,
Should good Rogers vanquish'd press the field,
And bid (as Charles had sworn) all hatred cease
To bind the solemn league with lasting peace.

The Pagan then, amidst the listening crowd,
His prophet Mabeucet invoc'd aloud,
And on the book, t'observe his oath he swore,
The book which in his hand the pontiff⁶ bore.
Then from the altars sworn each prince withdrew
Back to his train; when from the martial crew 671
The noble champions, ere in fight they join'd,
Advanc'd with mutual oaths themselves to bind.

Rogero swore, if heedless of the right
His monarch should disturb th' approaching fight,
No longer to confess his sovereign sway,
(His chief or peer,) but only Charles obey.
Then wou'd Rinaldo, if the Christian lord
Should the first cause to break the truce afford,
And sudden call him from the listed fold, 680
Ere he should fall, or see Rogero yield,
Then for his sovereign Agramant he swore,
His future knight and guard of Africa's throne.

Now all perjur'd as solemn rites requir'd,
Each champion backward to his lines retir'd,
To wait the sign—when soon resounding far
The shrill-mouth'd trumpet gave the peal of war.
The fight begins—loud strokes are echo'd round;
Now high, now low, the brandish'd weapons sound.
Above, beneath, the thundering axe is sped; 690
Now aim'd against the breast, and now the head.
So well they strive, no words suffice to praise
The matchless skill that either arm displays.
But good Rogero, who the brother fought
Of her whose love possess'd his every thought,
So cautious struck, his caution seem'd to show
A strength inferior to his gallant foe;
Readier to ward than strike, he seldom aim'd a blow.
Scarce knows he what he seeks; nor would he try
To wound Rinaldo, nor himself would die. 700
But now methinks the stated bound in view
Permits me not the story to pursue.
The book ensuing shall the rest unfold,
If then you deign to hear the sequel told.

⁶ This word may probably appear not strictly proper when applied to a Mabeucetan priest; but it is after the Italian—Papa—liberties of this kind are common with the poets of that time.

BOOK XXXIX.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rogero and Rinaldo being engaged in single combat to decide the dispute of the two nations, Melissus, by a device, incites Agramant to break the truce. A general battle ensues, and the two knights separate by mutual agreement. Valour of Bradamant and Marphisa. Proceedings of Astolpho in Africa. The leaves of trees transformed to ships. Arrival of Olivero, Sansonetto, Brandimart, and other Christian knights, who had been prisoners to Rodomont. These are received with great joy by Astolpho. Orlando, in his madness, wandering from place to place, comes to the camp of Astolpho, who, according to the instructions of Saint John, restores him to his senses. Preparations for the siege of Biserta. The Pagan army in France being routed by Bradamant and Marphisa, Agramant is obliged to quit the field, and with some of his ships sails from the port of Arli for Africa, but is met by Doudon's fleet, that attacks him unawares during the night, and burns and destroys most of his vessels.

GREAT is the woe that good Rogero knows,
A woe by far surpassing other woes:
On either side too cruel fate prevails;
His bosom here, and there his love assails.
His bow may perish by Rinaldo's hand:
Or should his arm the Christian foe withstand,
He to his mistress must resign his breath,
Whose hate incurr'd shall seal his bitterest death.
Rinaldo, met with thoughts like these distress'd,
On conquest bent his brave opponent press'd 10
With every nerve; his axe of temper steel'd,
Now here, now there in rapid circles wheel'd.
At head or arm he aim'd; while still prepar'd
On every part the threatening wound to ward,
Rogero turn'd; but when a stroke he dealt,
The cautious stroke Rinaldo little felt.
Anxious the Pagan lords the knights survey,
Who seem'd ill pair'd for such a glorious day.
Too slow his arm and axe Rogero moves:
Too well his arm and axe Rinaldo proves. 20
The king of Afric pale, with alter'd hue,
Bent on the doubtful fight his fearful view:
On old Sobrino now he turn'd the blame,
Whose erring counsel risk'd a nation's fame.
But sage Melissa, that eternal source
Of magic power transcending human force,
Now cast aside her female form, and took
The king of Algiers' habit, voice and look.
Like haughty Rodomont her arms she bore,
Like him a dragon's scimitar hide she wore: 30
Like him she seem'd her pointed lance to wield,
So hung her sword, so gleam'd her bossy shield:
A demon, in a coumer's shape, she rode;
And sudden piercing through the wondering crowd,
Before Trojano's pensive son she press'd,
And, frowning, thus with thundering voice address'd:
"I'll have you judg'd, O king! with such a knight
To match a stripling warrior, raw in fight;
In such an errand so rashly to confide
For what must Afric's weal and crown decide. 40
Haste—stay the combat—on whose issue wait
Disgrace and ruin to yourself and state.

'Tis Rodomont that speaks—attend no more
To keep the truce or oath you madly swore.
Unsheath the sword—let every valiant hand
Enforce its edge on you devoted band.
Lo! I am here—and each amid your host
May now the vigour of a hundred boast."

Thus she: unawary Agramant approv'd,
And forth he rush'd with headlong fury mov'd: 50
The lying form of Sarza's monarch wr night
Such sudden change, he banish'd from his thought
The treaty made: nor had the priz'd so high
A thousand warriors as this sole ally.
Behold on every side with eager speed
They couch the spear and spur the foamy steed:
Melissa, when her arts had mix'd in fight
The jarring nations, vanish'd from the sight.
The champions, who in growing tumult saw
The lists disturb'd against all martial law, 60
Withheld their strokes, and join'd their friendly
hands,

Till time should tell what fury mix'd the bands
In impious strife, and whence the breach had sprung,
From ancient Charles or Agramant the young,
Again each vow'd to prove the future foe
Of him whose guilt could thus his faith forgo.
Wild uproar now succeeds—and, shouting loud,
Here forward press, there backward shrink the
Que act alike in honour, or disgrace, [crowd, 70
And stamps alike the valiant and the base.
Alike, on every side, in heaps they run,
But these to meet, and those the fight to shun.

As when a well-breath'd hound impatient views
A beast swift-flying which the pack pursues:
He hears the dogs, he pants to join the train;
His lord forbids it, and he pants in vain:
So, with her noble friend, Marphisa's breast
Till then the feelings of the brave confess'd;
Till then the pair with deep regret survey'd
Each mighty host in idle pomp array'd 80
And oft repin'd to think the solemn day
Forbade their arms to invade so rich a prey.
But now, the league dissolv'd, they gladly flew
To sate their warmth on Afric's warring crew:
Her spear Marphisa through the foremost seat;
His breast it pierc'd and issu'd at a vent
Two feet behind: her fauchion then she took,
And four strong helmets shatter'd at the stroke.
Not with less valour Bradamant engag'd,
Though with her golden lance the virgin wag'd 90
A different fight, while all to earth she threw,
But not a warrior by her weapon slew.
Thus, side by side, the pair undaunted fought,
And witness'd each what deeds the other wrought:
Till, parting now, they took a separate course
As anger drove them on the Moorish force.
Who can the name of every Pagan tell,
That by the lance of gold dismounted fell?
Or those, whose heads on earth full low were laid,
Or cleft or lopt by ferce Marphisa's blade? 100
As where on Apennine soft breezes blow,
And verdant turf the heights ascending show,
Two rolling torrents rush with sweepy sway,
And from the summit take divided way:
They whirl huge stones, from craggy hills up-tear
The towering trees, and to the valleys bear

The sense of this passage, which at first may appear rather obscure, is, that some show their valour by running to engage the enemy, and some their cowardice by running to avoid the enemy.

The labourer's hope, and strive with raged force
Which most shall scatter ruin in its course.
The fearless virgins thus their progress held
Along the plain, while Afric's legions quell'd 110
Confess'd their might, and shrunk with chilling fear.
Where that the falchion wielded, this the spear.

King Agramant can scarce the troops detain
Around his standard, and their flight restrain.
He calls aloud—he turns—intrepid stands
To brave the foe, and Rodomont demands.
Impell'd by him he deem'd his fame betray'd,
The solemn league dissolv'd, so intely made,
His Gods profan'd—while he for whom he broke
All ties of honour now his sight foreook: 120
Nor yet Sobrino he beheld, for fiend

In Afric's walls Sobrino veil'd his head,
Ajur'd the deed, and in his fears divin'd
Some plague that day by righteous Heaven assign'd
To punish guilt of such an impious kind.

With him Marsilius to the town retir'd,
Such dread religion in their souls inspir'd.
Thus Agramant can ill th' assault sustain
Of royal Charles, conducting in his train

The English, German, and Italian name, 130
All valiant chiefs and men of mighty fame.
With these the Paladins their station hold,
Like sparkling jewels set on tissue'd gold;
And join'd to these were knights of high renown,
Whose praise in arms through all the world was blown;

Guido, whose worth his noble deeds declare,
And Olivero's sons*, a dauntless pair.
Already told, 't were needless now to tell
Of those two dames that fought in field so well.
By hands like these the carnage wider spread, 140
And countless Pagans strow'd the fields with dead.

But leave we here the fight †, and traverse o'er
Without a ship the sea to Afric's shore;
Nor think with Gallia's arms my mind so fraught,
To banish good Astolpho from my thought.
What grace the sage spouse show'd the knight
Already have I told; and if aright

My memory serves, how king Branzardo rose
With all his force to meet the Christian foes,
And Nubia's strength, and how to his the train 150
Of Algazieri's king was join'd in vain:

Such motley succours, as in haste supply'd
Through all her kingdom Afric could provide
Of every kind, were mix'd without regard;
The levies scarce old age or females spar'd:
For Agramant, on vengeance bent, had drain'd
With two descents on France ‡ his native land:
Her strength exhausted thus, the remnant few
Compos'd a feeble and unwarlike crew:
And such they prov'd; for when with distant sight
They view'd the foe, they turn'd their backs in flight, 161

(Like timorous herds) before the Christian knight §,
With Pagans slain Astolpho heap'd the ground,
But some their safety in Bierta found.
Brave Bucifaro prisoner then remain'd:
The sheltering city king Branzardo gain'd,

* Gryphon and Aquilant.

† He returns to Bradamant and Marphise in this Book, ver. 540; and to Agramant, ver. 522 of this Book.

§ Astolpho.

Who deeply mourn'd for Bucifaro's fate,
A loss not little to the public state.
Large was Bierta, and requir'd his care
Against a siege her bulwarks to repair: 170

Ill could he this promise without the aid
Of Algazieri's king †, and oft he weigh'd
The hapless prince's loss, while, deep distressed,
A thousand cares lay brooding in his breast.
At length his mind recall'd a Danish knight
Whom many a month, a prisoner made in fight,
He held in bonds, and Dudoon was his name ‡:
Near Monaco him Sarza's king o'ercame,
When first to France he cross'd from Afric's shore;
The Paladin from that disastrous hour 180
Remain'd a captive in Branzardo's power.

For Bucifaro now Branzardo meant
To exchange the Dane, and trusty envoys sent
To Nubia's chief, for o'er the Nubian bands
Byspies he knew that England's duke commands §,
And deem'd he gladly would such terms receive,
A Paladin from bondage to relieve:

Nor err'd the prince, since good Astolpho clos'd
With king Branzardo for th' exchange propos'd.
Dudoon, releas'd, the gentle duke repaid 190
With grateful thanks, and now companions made
In glorious toils, in counsel both unite.
And plan by land and sea the future fight.

Astolpho, leader of so vast a power
That Afric's forces, seven times number'd o'er,
Could ne'er oppose, revolving in his thought
What from the holy sage in charge he brought,
To take Provence and all the neighbouring strand
Of Aquanorta from the Pagan's hand,
Which late they won, he from his numerous train 200
Selects the soldiers that might best sustain
New toils and dangers on the gulfy main.

Then either hand with gather'd leaves he fill'd,
Which laurels, cedars, palms, and olives yield:
Beside the margin of the seas he stood,
And cast the foliage in the dashing flood.
O happy souls! so highly priz'd in Heaven!
Stupendous grace to mortals rarely given!

O wonder! scarce by human faith believ'd!
Soon as the waves the scatter'd leaves receiv'd, 210
They swell'd in bulk, and (miracle to view!)
Each long, and large, and curv'd, and heavy grew.

The fibres small to cables chang'd appear'd,
The larger veins in solid masts were rear'd:
One end the prow, and one the steering show'd,
Till each a perfect ship the billows rode.

In equal number now the tides they sweep,
As leaves before were scatter'd on the deep.
Strange was the sight, as these in turn became Barks, galleys, transports, every various name ††
That forms a fleet, with compass, oars, and sails,
Prepar'd to stem the surge and catch the gale.
Nor fail'd the duke such skilful hands to find
As oft were wont to dare the storm and wind,
Corsians and Sardiens, bred to plough the wave,
His pilots, masters, and his seamen gave.

† Bucifaro.

‡ This knight is one of the personages in the Orlando Innamorato, and is there said to be made prisoner with Rinaldo, Prasilido, and others, at the bridge of Arridano; and mention is made by Boyardo of his being taken prisoner by Rodomont, as here set forth by Ariosto.

§ By this passage it appears that Senapus gave the effective command of the whole army to Astolpho.

Embark'd full twenty thousand quit the land
Of every kind, o'er whom the chief command
Brave Dudson held, whose name to none could yield
For skill at sea or courage in the field. 230

While near the coast the fleet at anchor lay,
Awaiting winds to speed them on their way,
From distant lands a vessel reach'd the shore
That many a luckless warrior captive bore.
Those knights she brought, who at the risk of life
Provd on the narrow bridge th' unequal strife;
Whom haughty Rodomont awhile detain'd,
And doom'd to lie in foreign dungeons chain'd.
With these the kinsman⁹ of the earl was found,
And Sansonetto, Brandimart renown'd; 240

With more, whose titles need not here a place,
Of Gascon, German, or Italian race.
The pilot, driven before th' impetuous wind,
Had left his destin'd Algiers far behind,
And now unconscious of the lurking foes,
Not fearing danger, to the bay he goes;
There peaceful thinks among his friends to rest,
As Progne flies to her loquacious nest¹⁰.

But when he saw th' imperial eagle¹¹ fly,
The golden lily and the leopards¹² nigh, 250
The frighted colour from his features fled;
As one who, unaware, with heedless tread,
Has crush'd a snake that swain with poison lay
In slumber roll'd amid the grassy way:
Trembling and pale he flies the venom'd pest
That darts his tongue and rears his sanguine crest.
In vain the pilot would regain the deep,
Or in his hold the captive warriors keep.

Brave Brandimart and Olivero freed,
With Sansonetto, from the deck proceed 260
To greet the generous duke and Dudson brave,
Who to their friends a cordial welcome gave;
While him whose ship the noble prisoners bore,
They doom'd for penance to the labouring oar.

Great Otho's son¹³ within his tent receiv'd
The warlike guests, with welcome rest reliev'd;
With needful food, with arms and vest supply'd,
What want could claim or friendship could provide.
With these to waste awhile the social hour
In pleasing converse, Dudson near the shore 270
Detain'd his fleet, and deem'd the time delay'd
With such distinguish'd warriors well repaid.
Of these he heard what'er of late befel
To Charles or France; by these instructed well
Where best prepar'd his navy's strength to bend,
To guard the faithful and the foes offend.

While thus in useful talk the peers he held,
A sudden noise was heard, that louder swell'd,
From man to man pursu'd with deep alarms
Of rattling drums that rous'd the camp to arms. 280

⁹ Olivero.

¹⁰ Loquaxo nido—this phrase is used by Dryden speaking of the swallow in his version of Virgil:

To furnish her loquacious nest with food.

¹¹ The eagle and the golden lily were the arms of the Empire and of France, and therefore borne by Charlemain. The leopards are said by Ariosto, I know not with what authority, to have been the arms of England, and borne by Astolpho, son of Otho, king of England: hence in the xth Book he says of this knight that he was Known by the barn of the leopard's name.

¹² Astolpho.

Astolpho with his noble comrades press'd
Their ready steeds, and to the sound address'd:
With eager looks inquiring as they pass'd
Whence came the tumult, till they view'd at last
A savage man, who naked and alone
Had all the camp in wild disorder thrown.
Grasp'd in his hand a club he brandish'd, rode
With frequent knots, of firm well-season'd wood:
Where'er it fell, each wretch that felt the blow
Lay stretch'd on earth, nor soon recovering rose. 290
A hundred had his senseless fury slain,
All strength was fruitless, all resistance vain,
While here and there the scatter'd arrows light,
None daring now t' engage in closer fight.
Astolpho, Dudson, Brandimart amaz'd,
With Olivero on the savage gaz'd.
Drawn by the noise they came, and wondering stand
To see the prowess of a single hand:

When, on a palfrey pacing swift, they view
A comely dame in robes of sable hue, 300
Who straight to Brandimart impatient goes,
And round his neck her eager arms she throws.
This dame was Flordelis, whose gentle breast
The love of Brandimart so far possess'd,
That when she left him, in the stream o'erthrown,
The Pagan's thrall, her grief too mighty grown
Her reason shook: but when she heard the knight
Had sent her lover, since the luckless fight,
To Algiers' town with others in his train,
Her love resolv'd to cross the surgy main. 310

But ere she parted from Marcellis, she found
A foreign ship from eastern climates bound,
That brought a knight who many years had told
In royal Monodant's household old;
Who now had travers'd various regions o'er
(Or tost on seas or wandering on the shore)
For Brandimart, who late in France appear'd
(So went the fame) and hence for France he steer'd.
She knew Bardino¹³ in the hoary sage,

The same who Brandimart in infant age 320
Resentful from his srowwing father took,
And careful nourish'd in Sylvania's rock.
His cause of travel known, the faithful fair
Urg'd him with hers to join his pious care,
And told how Brandimart for Afric sent
A wretched prisoner in Algiers was pent.

Soon as the land they reach'd, they heard the
Of fam'd Biserta by Astolpho's powers [towers
Were close besiegd, and heard, but doubting heard,
That with him Brandimart in arms appear'd. 330

When Flordelis her dearest lord beheld,
Her speedy step, by heart-felt love impall'd,
Declar'd her secret joy, a joy that rose
To greater height from sense of former woes.
The gentle knight, who equal rapture prov'd,
To see that wife o'er every blessing lov'd,
With eager warmth to meet the fair-one press'd,
Receiv'd, embrac'd, and held her to his breast;

¹³ This Bardino is said by Boyardo to be an old servant in the house of Monodant, father of Brandimart, who, for some offence taken at Monodant, stole from him this son, and put him into the hands of a knight, called the lord of Sylvania's rock, where he attended himself the infancy of the young prince, who, after the death of the knight, became heir to his possessions; but at the time that Ziliantes was delivered by Orlando from Morgana, Bardino, making his peace with Monodant, discovers his son to him, and Brandimart and Ziliantes are the same day restored to their father.

On her dear lips imprinting merry a kiss,
Nor soon had rated with the guiltless bliss, 340
But, lifting up his eyes, by chance he view'd
Where near the dame his old Bardino stood.
He stretch'd his hand, preparing to embrace
And ask what fortune from his native place
Had drawn him thus—when now the tumult spread
Cut short their greeting, while huge numbers fled
Before the club, which, with resistless sway,
The naked swain impu'd, and cleav'd each crowded way.

When Floridella beheld with heedful eyes
The strange assailant, "Lo the earl!" she cries, 350
At once Astolpho near, with earnest view
Survey'd, and soon his lov'd Orlando knew,
By tokens, which threnated three who dwell'd
In earthly Paradise, to him reveal'd:
Else had the wandering warrior ne'er explor'd,
In such a form, Anglantes' courteous lord,
Who, long distraught, thus wild and savage ran,
And to the wretched brute debar'd the man.
Astolpho, by his starting tear, confess'd
The tender feelings of a generous breast: 360
To Dudon then and Olivero near

He turn'd and said—"Behold, Orlando here!"
These, bending on the hapless earl their view,
At length in him their long-lost champion knew;
Alike beholding with amazement and grief.
A state that seem'd so hopeless of relief.
Of all the warlike peers were few but show'd
Infectious sorrow which their cheeks o'erflow'd.
To whom Astolpho thus—"No longer waste
The time in plaints, but rather let us haste 370
To work his cure"—he said, and left his steed:
The rest their seats forsook with equal speed.

Now Brandimart by Sansuocetto stood:
With holy Dudon, Olivero show'd
A ready seat, and all at once drew near
With force combin'd to seize the maddening peer.
Orlando, who the shining band perceiv'd
That hemm'd him round, his knotty weapon heav'd
With twofold strength, and, lo! as Dudon spread
The fencing shield to guard his daring head, 380
And nearer drew, the club descending weigh'd
His buckler down, but Olivero's blade
Met half the blow, which else so fiercely driven Through shield and helm the mortal wound had given.

³⁴ The last we heard of Orlando was in Book xxx. ver. 108.

³⁵ Enoch, Elias, and Saint John.

³⁶ An Italian commentator calls Dudon a pattern of meekness and piety. Romances tell us that this knight, leaving the military profession, became a hermit; and the poet here, by a kind of postural anticipation, gives him this epithet, which he repeats in the next book. Such a story is told of our famous Guy of Warwick, to which circumstance Mr. Scott very poetically alludes in his elegant descriptive poem entitled Armswell.

Warwick's ancient walls,
Where, under umbrage of the mossy cliff,
Victorious Guy, so legends say, reclin'd
His hoary head beside the silver stream,
In meditation rapt— ver. 188.

Cervantes has a humorous passage, with an eye no doubt to these legends of romance, where Don Quixote and Sancho debate upon turning saints or archbishops. See Don Quixote.

The shield it broke, the helm its fury found;
And Dudon lay extended on the ground.
At once his faithful Sansuocetto drew,
With swift descent the well-aim'd weapon flew,
And clef't the madman's ponderous mace in two.
Now Brandimart behind Orlando plac'd, 390
With either arm in strictest grasp embrac'd
His heaving flank: his legs Astolpho took,
While to and fro enrag'd Orlando abook
The valiant pair, till with resistless might
Ten paces off he threw the English knight,
Who backward fell: but still in vain he strove
From Brandimart's tenacious grasp to move.
With forward step as Olivero came,
His hand the madman clench'd with furious aim,
And sent him pale to earth, while drench'd in blood
His mouth and nostrils pour'd a purple flood. 401
Stroug was the helm that fury to sustain;
That fury else had Olivero slain:
Yet prone he fell, and look'd like one in death,
Who yields to Paradise his fleeting breath.
Astolpho now and Dudon rose, who press'd
The earth so late; but Dudon still confess'd
His blow receiv'd—again erect they stood,
With Sansuocetto, who the knotted wood
So strongly clef't: all three their forces join'd: 410
Brave Dudon then with matchless strength behid
Orlando held, while with his foot in vain
The madman strove to cast him on the plain.
The rest his arms confin'd, but uncontrol'd
His nervous arms soon burst their strongest hold.
Whoe'er perchance in some wide field has view'd
By dogs and men a stately bull pursu'd,
That, bellowing loud, as here and there he utters,
In either ear the fangs indented feels:
So seem'd Orlando, more than mortal strong, 420
So drew with ease those mighty chiefs along.
But Olivero, who the ground forsook, [stroke,
Where stretch'd he lay beneath the madman's
Beheld their vigour thus in vain combin'd
T' effect the deed Astolpho had design'd:
And now he ponder'd in his secret thought
Some better means t' effect the purpose sought:
Sudden he bade th' assistant train provide
Strong lengths of cords with running nooses ty'd:
These round Orlando's legs and arms he threw: 430
The distant ends among the warlike crew
He gave, and each with force the cables drew.
As some large steed or ox which swains surround
With rustic toils, is headlong drawn to ground,
So fell the earl—All rush'd with eager haste,
Compress'd his hands and feet, and bound them fast.
Thus prostrate laid, in vain Orlando strove
Now here now there his fetter'd limbs to move.
Astolpho, who the high commission bears
To heal his madness, for the task prepares: 440
He bids them thence remove the senseless knight:
When Dudon, large of bone, of shrewd might,
The earl uplifting on his shoulder laid,
And to the sea th' enormous weight convey'd,
Seven times Astolpho bade his limbs to lave,
Seven times to plunge him in the briny wave,
Till from his face and body, black by toff
In parching suns, they wash'd the fetid soil,
With herbs collected then (in vain oppos'd) [cleas'd,
By struggling breath) the madman's mouth be
That rot a passage might for air remain 451
Saw through the nostrils leading to the brain.
And now Astolpho in his hand sustain'd
The vessel where Orlando's wit remain'd e

Beneath his nostrils this with nicest care
 He held unstopp'd, when (wondrous to declare)
 With air inhal'd the breath returning drew
 The subtle wit, that from the prison flew
 Back to its native seat, nor left behind
 A single atom of th' ethereal mind: 460
 But more enlarg'd his manly soul is grown¹⁷,
 With eloquence and wisdom scarce his own.
 As one, whose senses by nervous dreams oppress,
 Sees horrid forms disturb his broken rest,
 Monsters unknown! or in his troubled thought,
 Has some strange deeds of dreadful import wrought,
 E'en when he wakes, his phantom fears remain
 And still the vision hants his teeming brain:
 So when his reason had resum'd her way,
 Orlando long in stupid wonder lay: 470
 On Brandimart, on England's valiant lord
 Whose pious care his better self restor'd;
 On Aldabella's¹⁸ brother with a look
 Of deepest thought he gaz'd, nor silence broke:
 But while he much his present state admir'd,
 Nor whence he came, nor how convey'd inquir'd:
 He marvel'd when his naked limbs he spy'd
 From head to foot with cords so firmly ty'd:
 At length he spoke, as in the cavern'd shade
 To those who bound him once Silenus said— 480

¹⁷ Thus Homer, speaking of the restoration of the companions of Ulysses to their native shape, says they grew

More young, more large, more graceful to the eyes!
 Pope, Odyss. book x.

¹⁸ Alda the fair. By Boyardo, Pulci, and other romance writers, it appears that Orlando was married, and that the name of his wife was Aldabella, sister to Olivero. In the Morgante of Pulci, Orlando at the defeat of Ronsevalles recommends her at his death in a pathetic prayer to the protection of Heaven. Her name is mentioned with Clarice (Rinaldo's wife) in the first canto of the Innamorato, amongst the lords and ladies of the court of Charicstein, but no where else, as I remember, in the whole poem.

Era qui nella sala Gaiarena,
 Eravi Alda in moglie d'Orlando,
 Clarice, e Arnulfo: a tanto umana ———

Boyardo.

Era in sala Clarice, e Gaiarena,
 Del Danese Ermellino, Alda d'Orlando,
 L'una Paula pareva, l'altra Diana ———

Berni.

In the old poem of Aspramonte, Aldabella, sister to Olivero, makes peace between Orlando and Olivero, who were at variance, and is afterwards married to Orlando, with which even the poem concludes. See Aspramonte, c. xxiii.

As her name only appears in the above passage of the Furioso, it may be thought that Ariosto was led inadvertently to introduce it here from the familiarity of romance tradition ever present to his imagination; for it is likely neither he, nor Boyardo, meant that Orlando should be considered in their poems as a married man; but no such apology can be made for Ariosto with respect to Rinaldo's marriage, which he has so fully adopted. Sir John Harrington omits here the name of Aldabella: the last translator, Mr. Hoggins, retains the name, but probably was not acquainted with the circumstance that gave rise to the present note.

"Solvite me"¹⁹—and with such courteous mien
 He spoke, and look'd with features so serene,
 They loos'd his bands, and heedful to provide
 For every want, with covering vests supply'd.
 While all alike their friendly influence join'd
 To soothe the anguish of a noble mind,
 For actions past that left a sting behind,

Orlando, heal'd of every love-sick care,
 The dame, whom once he deem'd so good, so fair,
 So highly priz'd, he now esteems no more, 490
 But scorns those charms he held so dear before;
 And every wish he bends t' efface the shame
 Which love had cast on all his former fame.

Meanwhile to Brandimart Bernardino said,
 That Monard his royal father dead,
 He from his brother Gigliante came,
 And all the lands that ow'd his rightful claim,
 (Nations that dwell amid the scatter'd isles
 Which cheerful Phœbus gilds with evening smiles)
 T' invite him now to realms beyond compare 500
 With every other, peopled, rich, and fair:
 To many a reason urg'd he this adjoin'd—
 Sweet is his country to a patriot mind!
 And would he now embrace his better fate,
 Henceforth his soul might scorn a wandering state.
 Then Brandimart reply'd—His force to prove
 In aid of Charles, and for Orlando's love
 The sword he drew, nor would the cause surge,
 Till Heaven should reconcile the Pagan foe:
 The war once done, hereafter might he weigh 510
 The duties of his own paternal sway.

Next morn the Danish²⁰ leader to the shore
 Of fair Provence his vast armada bore,
 From England's duke Orlando learns the state
 Of Afric's war, and oft in deep debate
 Employs the lance, bids stronger siege enclose
 Biserta's town, but on the duke bestows
 The praise of all, while yet the noble duke
 From Brava's warrior every counsel took.
 What order they pursu'd, and how assail'd 520
 Biserta's city; how their arms prevail'd;
 The first assault what deeds Orlando dar'd,
 And who with him the foremost honours shar'd,
 Be not displeas'd if these I pass awhile²¹.
 For subjects not unlike to change the style,
 Vouchsafe to hear what now demands a place,
 How by the Franks the Moors were held in chase.

Unhappy Agrament alone remain'd,
 And all the pevils of the day sustain'd,
 While many a Pagan by Marsilius led, 530
 And king Sobrino to the city fled:
 Each prince for safety hasten'd to his feet,
 Their safety doubtful while at land to meet.

¹⁹ Release me.—Ariosto here alludes to a passage in Virgil, and puts into the mouth of Orlando the words spoken by Silenus when he was surprised by Egis the Naid and two shepherds (by Dryden called Satyrs) in the cave where he lay asleep.

Solvite me, pueri: saties est potuisse videri.

Ecolog. vi. ver. 24.

—Unloose me, boys, be cry'd,
 Enough that by surprise I've been cry'd.

As Ariosto has inserted the Latin words in the Italian, it was thought right, however strange it may appear, to follow him in the translation.

²⁰ Dudo.

²¹ He describes the siege of Biserta, Book xl. ver. 62.

By their example many a knight and lord
 Of Moorish nation went with speed on board.
 Still Agramant th' unequal combat bore :
 But when he found his force avail'd no more,
 He turn'd the reins, and yielding to his fate
 Pursu'd the ready way to Arli's gate.
 Behind him Babican, like lightning, came, 540
 Impell'd by Bradamant, the noble dame,
 Who glow'd with ardour for Rogero's sake
 (So oft withheld) the Pagan's life to take.
 Not less Marphisa burn'd with fierce desire
 To appease with late revenge her murder'd sire :
 The going rowels in her fiery steed
 She drove, and by her own impell'd his speed.
 But this nor that, though borne on fury's wing,
 Could in their course outstrip the flying king,
 Who soon the city's closing gates attain'd, 550
 And safely thence his anchoring vessels gain'd.
 As when two generous leopards through the wood
 (A beautiful pair) have long with speed pursu'd
 The nimble goat or stag, return'd at length
 Defrauded of their prey, with baffled strength
 They leave the tardy chase, and with disdain
 Lament their force and swiftness urg'd in vain :
 So seem'd the virgins, so with shame return'd,
 And oft with sighs the Pagan's safety mourn'd ;
 Nor ceas'd their rage, but on the remnant crew 560
 Dispers'd in broken ranks again they flew : [pour
 Now here, now there, their thundering weapons
 On those, that falling fall to rise no more.
 What now avails the wretched bands to fly,
 When flight no longer safety can supply ?
 For Agramant, t' ensure retreat, has clos'd
 The gates of Arli next the camp expos'd ;
 While every bridge that o'er the Rhodan led,
 His friends destroy'd, and took from those who fled
 All hope—Ah ! when a tyrant's need demands 570
 Like worthless herds are heid piebrian bands.
 Some in the stream and some in seas are drown'd,
 And some with crimson torrents drench the ground.
 What numbers perish'd !—Prisoners few remain'd,
 For few, so bold, the foe's attack sustain'd,
 Of all that in this last embattled plain
 On every side by countless heaps lay slain :
 Though huge the throng, yet most had prest the
 By Bradamant and by Marphisa's hand. [land
 Still through the region many a sign appears ; 580
 Where Rhodan flows, her walls where Arli rears :
 The neighbouring fields are through'd with sepulchres.
 Now Agramant impatient gives command
 To lanch the heaviest vessels from the strand ;
 Yet some be left with lighter barks behind,
 To take the fugitives that wish'd to find
 Their safety in the sea : two days be stay'd,
 So long the adverse winds his fleet delay'd,
 The third he stretch'd his canvases to the gale,
 And hop'd for Afric's coast secure to sail. 590
 But king Marsilius with increasing dread
 Beheld the blackening clouds around him spread ;
 And fear'd at length his own paternal Spain
 Would all the remnant of the storm sustain ;
 Then sought Valencia, and with anxious care
 Began his forts and castles to repair
 For war, that seem'd himself and friends to threat,
 From which himself and friends their ruin met ⁶⁰.

⁶⁰ He returns to Bradamant and Marphisa, Book xlii. ver. 170.

⁶¹ Nothing further is said of Marsilius, or what befel him at the conclusion of the war. It appears

Now Agramant for Afric bids expand
 His sails, with ships ill-stor'd and thinly mann'd. 600
 Few were his men, but not their sorrows few,
 When looking back on Gallia's shores, they view
 Three fourths deserted of their wretched crew.
 One calls his sovereign proud ; one, cruel calls ;
 Imprudent, one ; and as it oft befalls
 In times like these, each gladly would accuse,
 But fear forbids the murmuring tongues to loose ;
 Yet some there were, who met in secret, durst
 On friendship's faith each other's feeling trust :
 These vent their rage, while he their wretched chief
 Thinks each his sovereign loves and shares his grief.
 A king no face beholds without disguise, 612
 And all he hears is flattery, fraud, and lies.

The king of Afric, well-advis'd, forbore
 To steer his vessels to Biseria's shore,
 Since there he knew that all the hostile land
 The Nubians held ; but higher up the strand,
 Where rocks display'd a less impending steep,
 He thinks with winding course to stem the deep,
 There, landing safe, his forces backward steer, 620
 And with unlook'd-for aid his people cheer.
 But soon his cruel destiny withstood
 The sage intent the prudent leader show'd,
 And brought th' armada form'd by woodrous power
 Of gather'd leaves (that through the billows bear
 Had sail'd for France) in dead of night to meet
 The tossing vessels of the Pagan fleet,
 Midst murky clouds without a gleam of light,
 And unprovided for so fierce a fight.
 Nor yet king Agramant the tidings heard, 630
 That Otho's son with such a navy steer'd ;
 Or had he heard, what faith would man bestow
 To tale so strange, that midst the seas could grow
 A hundred vessels from a slender bough ?

Hence, without fear, he sail'd, nor deem'd to find
 A single ship t' obstruct his course design'd ;
 No watch, no sentinel was plac'd on high
 To give him notice of a foe so nigh.
 Astolpho's navy, well by Duden stor'd
 With arms and mariners, and troops on board, 640
 At rising eve, the Pagan vessels view'd,
 And favour'd by the darkening night pursu'd.
 These soon assail the unprovided foe,
 And iron hooks and missile weapons throw,
 And grapple close ; till now so near they drew
 That by their speech the hostile Moors they knew.
 The bulky ships, with such o'erbearing force,
 By winds propitious that impell'd their course,
 Amidst th' ashrighted Saracens were sent,
 That many a vessel to the bottom went. 650
 The Christians now their eager weapons ply'd :
 Flames flash'd with wreathy smoke on every side :
 Huge stones were cast, and dire confusion swell'd
 The troubled ocean, that had ne'er beheld
 So fierce a tempest on his watery field.
 Brave Duden's men, to whom by favouring Heaven
 Unwonted strength and dauntless heart were given,
 (For, lo ! the boar by righteous powers design'd
 To plague for past misdeeds the Pagan kind,)
 Afar and near so well their arms employ'd, 660
 That Agramant could no defence provide :
 A cloud of arrows hiss'd above his head ;
 Around him swords, and spears, and axes spread :

only from what the poet says in the Ixiid Book, that the Christians obtained a complete victory over all their enemies.

Of sea enormous many a ponderous stone
 Thunders from high, by mighty engines thrown,
 Through prow or steering drove with crashing away,
 And op'd to rushing waves a dreadful way.
 But most th' increasing fire annoy'd the foe,
 In kindling rapid, but in quenching slow.
 The wretched seamen would from danger run, 670
 But swifter rush on what they seek to shun.
 Some, by the foe with murdering steel pursu'd,
 Leap headlong from the decks and swim the food:
 Some, while their nervous arms their weight sustain,
 Now here, now there, to save their lives would gain
 A friendly bark; the bark, with numerous freight
 Already charg'd, rejects their added weight:
 The cruel sword each clinging hand divides,
 The sever'd hand still grasps the vessel's sides,
 The shrieking owner sinks in crimson tides. 680
 Some seek by water to prolong their breath,
 Or, dying, perish by a milder death:
 Till, swimming long, when hope no more prevails,
 When strength decays apace, and courage fails,
 The thought of drowning, spite of former dread,
 Recalls them to the flames from which they fled:
 Eager they seize some burning wreck, and loth
 To die of either death, they die of both.
 Some from the biting ase, or brandish'd spear,
 Back to the sea return with double fear; 690
 Till scarce escap'd the fate they deem'd so high,
 A dart or stone o'rtakes them as they fly.
 But cease we here, lest we the tale prolong
 To tire your patience with a tedious song.

BOOK XL.

THE ARGUMENT.

Agramant with great difficulty escapes, with Sobrino, in a small bark, from Dudo's fleet. The siege of Biserta. The assault described. Valour of Brandimart. The town is taken by storm. The fight and despair of Agramant: he meets with Gradasso, who engages to fight in his cause. A messenger is dispatched to Orlando, in the names of Agramant, Gradasso, and Sobrino, to challenge him and two more knights to the combat. Orlando accepts the challenge, and names for his fellows Brandimart and Olivero. Rugero after the truce was broken, having debated for some time, determines to follow Agramant to Africa. Arriving at Marseilles, he engages in combat with Dudo, to release seven kings, whom that knight had taken prisoner from the fleet of Agramant.

HARD were the task, and tedious, to recite
 The various chances of that naval fight;
 Useless for thee to hear, O glorious heir!
 Of Hercules unconquer'd! as to bear
 To Samos vases* with unfruitful toil,
 To Athens owls, or crocodiles to Nile:

* A kind of proverbial expression, as we would say, "to carry coals to Newcastle." Samos is reported to have been famous for the making of earthen vessels, from the plenty of earth or clay adapted to that purpose.—Concerning the owls of

Since all I paint, but from tradition know,
 Thou saw'st thyself, and hast to others shown.

Great was the spectacle thy faithful hand
 Enjoy'd by night and day, when safe on land, 10
 As in a theatre, they view'd the foe
 With fire and sword oppress in winding Po.
 What groans and shrieks were heard, what human
 blood

With purple streams stain'd th' infected flood!
 What cruel deaths in such dire fights they die,
 Thou saw'st, and numbers could with thee describe.
 Myself was absent far—six days had past
 Since thence dispatch'd I went with dutious haste,
 Before the holy sire our wants to speak,
 Embrace his knees and timely succours seek. 20
 But soon no aid of horse or foot we claim'd;
 Thy fearless arms the golden lion tan'd,
 And crush'd so far that from that fatal hour
 He ne'er again resum'd his wonted power.
 Bat from Alfonso Trotto's, present there,
 Afranio, Peter Moro, skill'd in war,
 Alberto, Annibal of noble name,
 Bagnio and Zerbinetto, like in fame,
 And Ariosto three that honours claim'd;
 From these the deeds I learnt, and since survey'd 30
 The numerous banners in the fane display'd;
 And fifteen galleys that I captive view'd,
 With marks a thousand Moor'd in Tiber's flood.
 Whose'er beheld the flames, what wrecks beneath
 The waves were whelm'd, what grievous forms of death

Reverg'd our palaces by fire laid low,
 Till every ship was conquer'd from the foe,
 May judge what dreadful is the Pagan train,
 Unwar'd and weak, were fated to sustain
 With Agramant their king, at dead of night, 40
 Assail'd by Dudo with unequal fight.

Athens, Tully uses this expression: Hec est, Athenas nocturnis visitare. That is, "I will send owls to Athens." But the proverb arose (say some) not so much from the plenty of those birds, as because the Athenians had a coin stamped with the figure of an owl, as appears from Plutarch in the Life of Lysander, where it was laid to the charge of a great officer named Gysippus, that he roosted too many owls in his peahouse, meaning the money which he had conceiv'd of the kind of coin here described. The Nile has always been well known to abound with crocodiles.

† Ferrara being besieged by the troops of Venice, and by those of Pope Julius II., the duke sent Ludovico Ariosto, our poet, to the duke, to mitigate the anger which he had conceived against the Ferrarese. In the meantime cardinal Hippolito obtained a victory over the enemy in the river Po, and Ariosto, returning from his embassy, with great hopes of restoring peace, heard the account of Hippolito's success. 'Twas night; and not a feeble glimmering shone,
 When first the Christians had th' assault begun:
 But soon as sulphur, pitch, and brimstone pour'd
 On side or stern the crackling ships devour'd,
 So clear each object seem'd reveal'd to view,
 As day from ocean's face the darkness drew.
 Thus Agramant, who, by the gloom deceiv'd,
 Of small account the hostile fleet believ'd,
 When now the flame disclos'd their numerous power,
 He sees, alas! what scarce he deem'd before, 51
 The navy's strength; and in his alter'd mind
 Far other issue to the fight divin'd.
 Then with a few the vessel he forsakes,
 And with the gallant Brigliadoro takes
 What'er he priz'd: a lighter bark receives
 The wretched prince; in silent haste he cleaves
 (Stealing from ship to ship) the troubled tides,
 Till safe at distance from the foe he rides:
 While far behind his wretched friends remain, 60
 By Dudon thus with dreadful carnage slain.
 Fire burns them, water drowns, and steel destroys,
 And he, the cause of all their ruin, flies.
 So flies king Agramant, and in his fate
 Sobrino shares, with whom he mourns too late
 He once unheeding heard the sage foretel
 Th' impending ill: that since too sure befel.

But let us to Orlando⁶ turn the strain,
 Who, ere Biserta's town might succours gain,
 Advic'd her walls and bulwarks to destroy, 70
 That never more her power might France annoy.
 Thus fix'd; the third ensuing day was nam'd
 T' assault the town, and through the camp pro-
 claim'd;

With duke Astolpho many ships remain'd
 T' assist the siege, from Dodon's fleet detain'd:
 Of these he made brave Sansonetto guide,
 A chief by sea and land of courage try'd;
 Who now with these against Biserta stood,
 And from the port a mile at anchor rode.

Astolpho and Orlando, who, with mind 80
 Of Christian frams, no enterprise design'd
 Heaven unimplo'r'd, bade through the camp declare
 By herald's voice a day for fast and prayer,
 Exhorting each the third returning light,
 Prepar'd to wait the signal for the fight,
 To storm with fire and sword Biserta's town,
 And from her buildings heave the lowest stone.

When now the host from morn till eve had pray'd
 And every due of pure religion paid,
 All those in blood or friendship bound, invite 90
 Each other to partake the festive rite;
 Their languid bodies then refresh'd with food.
 They wept, embrac'd, and such their actions show'd,
 Their looks, their words, as dearest friends that part
 When thoughts of absence rend the feeling heart.
 Witbin Biserta's walls, the priests no less,
 Amid thronging numbers to the temple press:
 They beat their breasts, to Macon⁷ they complain,
 But Macon hears not, and their plaints are vain.

⁶ He returns again to Agramant, ver. 373 of this Book.

⁷ By Macon is meant Mahomet. In this passage, as in several others, the poet without scruple blends the manners of Mahometans, Pagans, and Christians. The old Italian poets and romance writers, as has been before noticed, use indiscriminately the appellation of Pagan to infidels of every denomination; and Ariosto here makes his

What prayers are offer'd, and what aims bestow'd
 By each apart! What public gifts are vow'd 101
 Of statues, fanes, and altars, to disclose
 In future times their past and present woes!
 Now by their Cadi blest, in arms prepar'd,
 The people rush their city's walls to guard.

In Tytkon's bed still fair Aurora lies,
 And darkness still o'er spreads the morning skies,
 When there Astolpho, Sansonetto here,
 In armour sheath'd before their ranks appear.
 Orlando now the signal gives, and all 110
 Advance with eager speed t' attack the wall.

With four extended fronts Biserta stood,
 Two next the land, and two o'erlook'd the flood.
 Her ramparts once by skillful artists rais'd,
 Were much for strength and much for beauty
 prais'd.

Now, wanting hands, the works by slow decay
 Declin'd; for since within Branzardo lay
 Begirt with foes, no workmen could his care
 Procure, nor time the bulwarks to prepare.

Meanwhile Astolpho to the foremost place 120
 Assign'd the king⁸ who rul'd the sable race.
 Forward they rush to shake the trembling towers,
 With fierce assault—so thick the mingled showers
 From twanging bows, from slings and engines rain,
 That scarce the Pagans can the storm sustain.
 To reach the fosse the foot and horseman drive,
 And safely now beneath the walls arrive.
 All toil, as if on each was plac'd the war,
 And stones and beams, with strength unceasing
 bear:

These in the fosse they cast, where deep below 130
 The waters drain'd an oozy bottom show.
 Full soon the depth is fill'd with eager pains,
 And, lo! the fosse is level'd with the plains.
 Astolpho, and with him Orlando join'd
 And Olivero, on the walls design'd
 To urge the foot—impatient of delay
 The Nubian bands, allur'd with hopes of prey,
 Each threatening danger met with fearless view,
 And shelter'd with the tortoise nearer drew.
 Huge battering-rams, and vast machines they bore
 To burst the gate and shake the solid tower; 141
 Beneath the walls they pour'd compact and strong,
 Nor unprovided found the Pagan throng.
 These, from on high, fire, darts, and jav'lins throw,
 And ponderous stones and rafters send below.
 The thundering tempest falls, and batters down
 The planks of engines rais'd against the town.
 Much toil and pain the Christian bands endure
 The first assault, while glooms the air obscure:
 But when the Sun in eastern splendour burns, 150
 Then changing Fortune from the Pagan turns.
 Orlando then on every side pursues
 The siege, and close by land and sea renews,

Mahometans talk of votive gifts and statues, ideas totally repugnant to the doctrine of Mahomet; but a strict observance of what painters call the costume (or manners) is not to be looked for in Tasso or Ariosto. By the word Cadi is meant here the high-priest or chief teacher of the sect, though it seems to be rather the title of the civil judge amongst the Turks.

⁸ Senapus.

⁹ Senapus, king of Nubia, who after he was restored to his sight accompanied Astolpho with a powerful army.

Brave Sansonetto with his naval power
The port-hus enter'd and possess'd the shore;
With bows and slings he calls the foes from far,
And every engine fram'd for missive war;
And darts and spears and scaling-ladders sends (Whate'er his ships supply) to aid his friends.

Orlando, Olivero, and the knight¹⁰ 160
Who late in air sustain'd so bold a fight,
With Brandimart, a fierce assault maintain,
Bar from the sea and next the upland plain.

The host is fram'd in four well order'd bands,
And each brave chief himself a fourth commands;
Walls, gates, they storm, alike they press the foe,
And shining proofs of dauntless courage show.
Each warrior singly better can display
His worth, than blended in a general fray.
Who claim'd the foremost praise & thousand eyes
Might now be witness, and adjudge the prize. 171
Here towers of wood are driven on wheels; and there

Vast elephants, inur'd the weight to bear,
Plac'd on their backs huge castles lift so high,
That far beneath the hostile ramparts lie.
Lo! Brandimart a scaling-ladder rears¹¹
Against the walls, and mounting others cheers:
His bold example many chiefs pursue,
For who would pause with such a gulde in view?
None heed how well the ladder might suffice 180
To bear the numbers that attempt to rise.

Brave Brandimart to reach the height intent,
Fights as he mounts, and wins the battlement:
With head and foot he strives, till with a bound
He trends the works, and whisks his falchion round:
He drives, o'erturns, becatsers, thrusts and cleaves,
And many a proof of matchless valour leaves:
But sudden with its freight (a dreadful sight)

The ladder breaks, and headlong from the height,
Saw Brandimart, the bold assailants fall, 190
Each pil'd on each beneath the well-fought wall:
Still Brandimart maintains his glorious heat,
Nor bends his thought a moment to retreat;
Though far beneath his followers lie o'erthrown,
Himself a mark to all the hostile town,
His anxious friends entreat him to return,
In vain they call—he bears with generous scorn.
Lo! from the walls, full thirty yards in height,
Within the city leaps the fearless knight¹²;

¹⁰ Astolpho.

¹¹ Very similiar to this spirited passage is the description of Rinaldo's attack on the walls of Jerusalem, in Tasso, book xviii. ver. 510.

— with eager haste

A scaling-ladder bold Rinaldo plac'd;
Spears, beams, and rafters from the ramparts pour,
Dauntless he mounts amidst the ponderous shower.

¹² Ariosto seems here to have made use of a passage in Quintus Curtius, when Alexander the Great, at the siege of Oxidrace, having scaled the walls, leaps singly amidst the enemy, where he fights with incredible valour, till receiving several wounds, he is nearly oppress'd by numbers that surround him, when the Macedonians, terrified at the danger to which their king was exposed, force the gates to come to his assistance, and the city is taken by storm. The action of Brandimart is scarcely more romantic than that of Alexander, whose courage, strongly stimulated by his enthusiastic admiration of the ancient heroes, brings him

Unharm'd he lights, as if his fall to meet 200
Soft down or turf were stretch'd beneath his feet.
Through deepening ranks of arm'd encircling foes,
As if unarm'd, his trenchant weapon goes.

Now here, now there he pours with generous ire,
Now these, now those before his face retire.
His friends, without, think all relief too late
To avert his death, and yield him up to fate,
From tongue to tongue th' unwelcome tidings grew:
Loquacious Fame, enlarging as she flew,

To good Orlando first her speed pursu'd 210

With restless wing, then Otho's son she view'd,
And Olivero last—all three, who lov'd
The noble Brandimart, his danger mov'd;
But most Orlando—should they help delay,
Their dear companion on that fatal day
Might breathe his last—Each for a ladder calls,
With emulation each ascends the walls;
With such fierce assemblance and with looks so bold,
The wither'd Pagans tremble to behold.

As midst the seas, when rattling winds prevail, 220
The roaring floods th' endanger'd bark assail;

And now the prow and now the poop engage,
To force their passage with tempestuous rage;
Pale stands the pilot, who should help supply,
He groans—he sighs—his art and courage die;

Till through a breach one wave its entrance speeds,
And, where it enters, wave to wave succeeds:—
So when these noble three the walls had gain'd,
An easy conquest for the rest remain'd;

Fearless they press, and raise on every side 230
A thousand ladders to the works apply'd.

Meanwhile the battering rams with ruin shake
The jointed stones, and many an opening make.
Thus, port'd through more than one defenceless
part,

Assistance came to noble Brandimart.

As when the king of floods, with deepening roar,
In sudden deluge bursts his sounding shore;
Wide o'er the field his rushing tide is borne,
The furrows drown and sweeps the ripen'd corn;
Whole flocks and sheep-cotes by the stream are lost,
And dogs and shepherds in the waters lost; 241

While wondering fish amid the branches glide,
Where birds could late the yielding air divide:—
With such a fury, where the walls disclose

A gaping breach, the martial current flows,
Of shouting troops, with sword and brandish'd fame
To sink the remnant of the Pagan name.

Rapine and Murder, foul with gory stain,
And Avarice, thirsting for another's gain,
That stately city now in ruin lay, 250

The queen of Afric once and first in sway!
With slaughter'd men is heap'd the groaning ground,
Th' innumerable streams that flow from every wound
Swell to a pool, more dismal than the lake

Which, circling Dis¹³, Coeetus' waters make.
From street to street the hungry flames aspire,
Domes, mosques, and portals feed the spreading
fire;

nearer to the fabulous warriors of romance than any other historical character, unless perhaps we except, in our own times, that of Charles XII. of Sweden. See Quintus Curtius, book i. ch. iv. v.

¹³ Dis, in his Inferno, feigns a river of red water, of which the four infernal streams are formed. Phlegethon, one of these, surrounds the city of Dis or Pluto.

The pillag'd dwellings groans and shrieks repeat,
 And frequent hands the wretched boom beat.
 Behold with piles of costly treasure borne, 260
 The mournful victors through each gate return;
 With vases fair, with vestments richly wrought,
 And massy silver from the temples brought,
 Snatch'd from their fabled gods—Sad mothers here
 Are dragg'd, and these the captive sons appear.
 Behold subjected to the soldiers' lust
 Matrons and maids!—a thousand deeds unjust
 To good Orlando told, but told in vain,
 Which he nor duke Astolpho could restrain. 270
 Brave Bucifaro, Algazieri's lord,
 Was slain by gallant Olivero's sword.
 All hopes of better fortune cast aside,
 By his own weapon king Branzardo died.
 Soon with three wounds in death was Fulvo laid,
 Whom first the noble duke had prisoner made.
 When Agramant for France his arms prepar'd,
 These three he left his Afric realms to guard.
 King Agramant, who with Sobrino took
 His hasty flight, and all his ships forsook,
 Began with sighs Biseria to deplore, 280
 The cause divin'd, when blazing from the shore
 He view'd the flames: but when at full were known
 The sufferings of his once imperial town,
 Urg'd by despair, himself his life had clos'd,
 But that Sobrino such dire thought oppos'd:
 Sobrino thus—"What couldst thou more bestow
 To swell the triumph of thy haughty foe,
 Than by thy death to give him hopes to gain
 The quiet rule of Afric's wide domain?
 To him thy life, O king! must this deny, 290
 Thy life must cause of endless fears supply,
 Long, long ere Afric shall his laws confess:
 Thy death alone ensures his full success;
 That death, which us of every hope deprives,
 Of hope, the only good that now survives.
 Yet live—thou still shalt happier hours employ
 To turn our tears to smiles, our grief to joy.
 If thou art lost—sure bondage is our fate,
 And Afric mourns a tributary state.
 If life thou wilt not for thyself prolong, 300
 Yet live, O king, to save thy friends from wrong.
 Th' Egyptian soldan, whose dominions lie
 So near thy own, will men and stores supply:
 Ill must he brook, in Afric thus o'er-run,
 To see the growing power of Pepin's son.
 Thy kinsman Norandino will sustain
 A war so just thy kingdom to regain:
 And, wouldst thou seek their aid, thou soon mayst
 find

In aid of thee Armenians, Turks combin'd,
 With Medians, Persians, and Arabians join'd." 310

These soothing words the prudent sage address'd
 To waken comfort in his sovereign's breast;
 But while with words his drooping lord he cheer'd,
 In thought perchance far other end he fear'd.
 The wretched state of him too well he knows,
 How vain his hope, who, when by powerful foes
 Opprest, beholds them seize his regal lands,
 And flies for succour to Barbarian bands.
 Of this Jugurtha, Hannibal of old¹⁴,
 And many a name in story'd annals told, 320

¹⁴ Hannibal, being overcome by the great Scipio, took shelter first with Antiochus; but afterwards suspecting his faith, he went to Prusias king of Bithynia, who treacherously prepared to deliver

Example yield, and Ludovico (nam'd
 Il Moro¹⁵) in our time has since proclaim'd,
 Who by another Ludovico fell:
 This knows thy brother¹⁶ (great Alphonso) well,
 Who deems the man to madners dear ally'd,
 That shall (O prince!) by adverse fortune try'd,
 More in another than himself confide.
 Hence, in that war where through the postiff's ire
 He saw such foes against his peace conspire,
 Though in his feeble state he little knew 330
 To frame designs, though he, from whom he drew
 His best defence, from Italy was driven,
 And to his deadly foe the kingdom given.
 Yet would he ne'er for threats or promise yield
 His cause to others, or resign the field.

King Agramant, now steering from the west
 His beaky prow, had through the waves address'd
 His foamy course, when sudden from the shore
 A dreadful tempest rose with hollow roar;
 The pilot, at the helm, aloft survey'd 340
 The blackening skies, and instant thus he said:—

"I see a gathering storm, whose threaten'd rage
 Not all my art suffices to engage:
 If you, O chiefs! attend what I advise,
 Near, to the left, a lonely island lies,
 Where we secure may safe at anchor keep,
 Till past the fury that o'erhangs the deep."

The king consenting, to the left they stand,
 And, safe from perils now, approach the land
 Welcome to seamen worn with length of toil, 350
 'Twas Afric plac'd and Vulcan's fiery soil.
 In this small island not a cot was found;
 Pale juniper and myrtle shade the ground:
 A pleasing solitude, from men remote,
 Where breed the deer, the stag, the hare, and goats:
 By few but fishers known: here oft they came,
 And cleansing from the ooze and briny stream,
 On lowly shrubs their humid nets they dry'd,
 While fishes slept beneath the quiet tide.

Arriv'd, another vessel here they view'd, 360
 Like them by fortune sheltering from the food:
 This the great king of Sericana bore,
 Who late embarking¹⁷, sail'd from Ari's shore.
 Together met, the kings with friendly grace
 Receiv'd each other in a dear embrace.
 For friends of old, and in one cause combin'd,
 Before proud Paris' walls in arms they shin'd.
 With deep concern Gradasso heard the fate
 Of Agramant, and to his wretched state
 Fair comfort gave, and, as a courteous prince, 370
 His person offer'd in his friend's defence;
 But wou'd him ne'er from Egypt's faithless power

him up to the Romans; of which Hannibal having intelligence, killed himself by poison. Jugurtha, trusting to the good faith of Bocchus, king of Mauritania, was by him delivered prisoner to Scylla.

¹⁵ Ludovico Sforza duke of Milan, who fell into the power of Lewis XII. king of France. See note, Book xxxiii. ver. 243.

¹⁶ The poet here addresses cardinal Hippolito, to whom his work is dedicated.

¹⁷ Gradasso, king of Sericana, after finding Bayardo (see Book xxxiii. ver. 699), for which he had engaged in a duel with Rinaldo, left France to return to his native country.

¹⁸ Gradasso, to dissuade Agramant from seeking

" Enough of old was Pompey warn'd," he said,
 " Unhappy Pompey, to his death betray'd.
 But since thou say'st Astolpho, with the bands
 Of Ethiopians from Senapus' lands,
 Has Afric seiz'd, and (sword and fire employ'd)
 The capital of all thy realm destroy'd;
 And that Orlando, who with senseless mind 380
 Late rov'd an outcast, him in arms has join'd;
 Methinks the means I spy, which, well pursu'd,
 From present ill may work thy future good.
 For love of thee, and to maintain thy right,
 Orlando will I call to single fight:
 Full well I know with me he ne'er can stand,
 His breast though adamant, though steel his hand.
 He once remov'd, the Christian church I hold,
 As to a hungry wolf the bleating fold.
 Then have I plann'd, from Afric's realm to chase
 (Nor hard I deem the task) the Nubian race.
 Those Nubians, whom the Nile's far-winding tides
 From these di-join, but more whose faith divides;
 The Arabs and Macrobian; those with hoard
 Of gold and jewels, these with coursers stord;
 Chaldeans, Persians, many names that own
 My regal sway, the subjects to my throne!
 These, at my nod, on Nubia's realm shall fall,
 And soon from Afric every band recall."
 Unhappy Agramant full gladly cios'd 400
 With what Gradasso's friendship last propos'd,
 And deem'd his thanks to favouring Heaven were due

That to the desert isle the monarch drew.
 But never could he yield (though site once more
 Would on such terms Biserta's walls restore)
 That in his cause, to his eternal shame,
 Gradasso, in his stead, should combat claim.
 " If in the list Orlando must be try'd—
 Be mine the trial—" Agramant reply'd,
 " Prepar'd I stand—and as by Heaven decreed,
 Let death or victory the fight succeed." 411
 " Be still the combat mine," Gradasso cries,
 " And what I wish a sudden thought supplies;
 Let thou and I together wage the fight Against Orlando and some other knight."
 " Exclude me not, I little shall complain,
 If last or first—" thus Agramant again,
 " How through the world such glory can I share,
 Or find, like thine, a partnership in war?"
 Sobrino then—" Must I remain behind? 420
 Old as I seem, yet know with age declin'd
 Experience dwells, and counsel oft avails
 In danger most, where nerve or courage fails."
 Strong was Sobrino and robust in years,
 For deeds of valour fam'd above his peers:
 Through all his veins the vigorous spirits flow'd,
 As prime of youth still warm'd his generous blood:
 Just seem'd his suit—and for the destin'd way
 A messenger was nam'd, on whom to lay
 Th' important charge for Afric to repair, 430
 And to Orlando's ear the challenge bear;
 And urge the knight with two brave warriors more
 In arms to meet the three, where round the shore
 Of Lipadusa's isle the billows roar.

The messenger, as such commission needs,
 With care and sails to reach Biserta speeds;

assistance of the sultan of Egypt, as advised by Sobrino, sets before him the example of Pompey, who lost his life by trusting to the faith of the Egyptians.

There finds Orlando, who o'er all preides,
 And midst his friends the spoils of war divides.
 And now in public was the fight declar'd,
 To which the Pagan king the Christians dar'd: 440
 Such joy Angliane's noble lord confess'd,
 With honour'd gifts the herald he caress'd,
 And fair dismiss'd him—from his friends he knew
 That bold Gradasso Durindana drew.
 Hence, through desire his weapon to regain,
 He purpos'd once to cross the Indian main.
 Alone he deem'd Gradasso there to find,
 Whom fame declar'd by lands and seas disin'd
 From distant France: but now in happy hour
 He hopes that fortune might his sword restore; 450
 With this he hopes to gain his valu'd horn¹⁹
 (So long withheld) by fam'd Almontes borne:
 And Brigliadoro²⁰, from his lord detain'd,
 Which in the field Troyano's offspring rein'd.
 Orlando now t' engage the triple foe,
 His faithful Brandimart and kinsman chose:
 Both had he prov'd as those who knew not fear,
 And oft had prov'd each warrior held him dear.
 For him and for his friends fair steeds he sought,
 With armour tried, and swords of temper wrought,
 And jousting-spears—for well to you is known 461
 How from these knights had fortune reft their own.
 Orlando, as I told, in frantic mood
 His mail had piecemeal scatter'd through the wood;
 Stern Rodomont from two their armour gain'd,
 Which long the virgin sepulchre contain'd.
 Few arms and weapons now could Afric boast,
 The best king Agramant for Gallia's coast
 Exhausted to supply his numerous host.
 Orlando bids from every part produce 470
 Such arms as best might serve their present use,
 And on the shore full oft the noble knight
 Consults his partners on th' expected fight.
 One day, as distant from the camp he stood
 With eyes intent upon the billowy flood,
 He saw a vessel with expanded sail
 To Afric speed before the driving gale,
 Without or seamen, passengers, or guide,
 As fortune sped, or winds their breath supply'd:
 With canvass stretch'd the vessel nearer bore 480
 Her rapid way, and reach'd at length the shore.
 But ere of these I further can rehearse²¹,
 The love I bear Rogero claims the verse:
 His story I resume, and haste to tell
 What him and Clarimont's noble knight befel.
 Of either warrior we the tale pursue,
 Who lately from the martial list withdrew;
 The truce o'erturn'd by breach of every right,
 And all the squadrons mix'd in mortal fight:
 Of each they meet the champions seek to know 490
 Who, lost to honour, could his faith forgo: [spring,
 From what fell cause such impious strife could
 From royal Charles, or from the Pagan king.

¹⁹ This horn, of which nothing particular is related in Ariosto, appears in the poem of Aspramonte to have been won by Orlando from Almontes, with his armour, and is said by Boyardo to have been afterwards stolen from Orlando by Brunello. Concerning the miraculous horn, so frequently mentioned in romance, see note to Book xv. ver. 105.

²⁰ After the death of Mandricardo, this horse was presented by Rogero to king Agramant.

²¹ He returns to Orlando, Book xli. ver. 179.

Meantime a servant of Rogero, nurs'd
In courts and camps, and faithful to his trust,
Who, while the conflict rag'd 'twixt either host,
Had ne'er, by sight, his dearest master lost,
Approach'd, and sudden to his hand convey'd
His sword and steed to give the Pagans aid.
Rogero grasp'd the sword, his seat regain'd. 500
But heedful from forbidden fields refrain'd.
He parted thence; yet ere he went, once more
Renew'd the oath he to Rinaldo swore:
If Agramant were first the truce to break,
Him and his sect for ever to forsake.
Of all he sought, and learnt alike from each,
That first from Agramant began the breach.
Him dear Rogero lov'd; and this could give
Small cause, he fear'd, his sovereign lord to leave.
Already have I told that, thousands slain, 510
Dispers'd and lost were Afric's broken train,
Low in the wheel's unstable motion hurld,
As she^m decrees, whose empire rules the world.

Now held Rogero with himself debate—
To abide in France, or shere his monarch's fate;
When love, that held him with a powerful rein,
From Afric's land would still his steps detain;
And dread of shame his other thoughts control'd,
And had him faith with good Rinaldo bold,
No less reflection rank'd in his breast, 520
That thus to quit king Agramant distrust,
Must argue fear—though just to some might seem
The cause, yet others might his stay condemn;
And urge the license such an oath to break,
At first unlawful and unjust to take.
That day and all the live-long night he mus'd,
And all th' ensuing day in doubts confus'd;
At length he fix'd to bid awhile adieu
To Gallia's realm, his sovereign to pursue.
Full well his soul love's potent rule obey'd, 530
But more his loyalty and honour sway'd.
He turns to Arli, hoping there to find
Some Turkish bark to speed his course design'd.
At sea or anchor not a bark he found,
Nor Pagans saw, but lifeless on the ground;
For Agramant, what ships his need requir'd
Departing took, the rest in port he fir'd. [strand

His aim deceiv'd, to reach the neighbouring
Of fair Marseilles, Rogero pass'd by land,
In hope some vessel there might wait him o'er, 540
To seek his lord, to Afric's distant shore.
The Dane, who late at sea so bravely fought
The Moorish fleet, his prisoners hither brought.
Scarce could a grain be cast amidst the food,
So thick around th' innumerable navy rode;
So close each bulky ship to ship was join'd,
Each ship with victors and with captives lin'd:
The Pagan vessels, saw'd that fatal night
From fire and wreck (save those that scap'd in flight),

By Dudson taken, now Marseilles had gain'd, 550
With these, seven kings who once in Afric reign'd,
Who when they saw their kingdom's overthrow,
With their seven ships submitted to the foe,
That day had Dudson left his deck to meet
His sovereign Charles, and landing from the fleet
His spoils and captives, rang'd in long array
The solemn triumph through the public way.
Abash'd and mute th' unhappy prisoners stand;
Around exult the conquering Nubian band;

^m Fortune.

While, caught from man to man, with fond acclimatiz'd
The neighbouring cliffs resound with Dudson's name.

This fleet, for Agramant's, the warlike youth
At first believ'd, and eager for the truth
His courser spur'd; but as he nearer drew,
Too soon his eyes the mournful captives knew.
The king of Naamama there he view'd:
There Bambaion, Agricaltes^m stood;
There Ferraurantes, Rimedon renown'd;
Balastro, Manillardo there be found. 569
All these, with looks declin'd, deep anguish show'd,
While down each cheek the manly sorrows flow'd.

Rogero saw, nor saw with breast unmor'd,
The doleful state of those whom dear he lov'd:
But well he knew entreaty here would fail,
And aid, enforc'd by arms, alone prevail.
Against their guards his rested spear he drove,
Nor fail'd his spear its wonted force to prove.
His falchion next he drew, and round him slain
A hundred fell, and groaning bit the plain.
Dudson the tumult bears, beholds the blows 580
Rogero gives, nor yet the warrior knows:
He sees his men who turn their feet to fly,
With many a groan, with many a fearful cry.
In counsel, mail, and cuirasses arm'd he stands,
And swift his courser, shield and helm demands.
Lightly he mounts his steed, receives his lance,
And shines confess a Paladin of France.
He bids the troops on either hand recede,
And goes with iron heel his foamy steed.
A hundred now Rogero's arm had kill'd, 590
And rising hopes each captive bosom fill'd:
When holy Dudson^m on his steed he view'd,
As round on foot th' ignoble vulgar stood,
He deem'd him leader of the powers, and flew
To give the warrior-chief a warrior's due.
Him Dudson met, but when, approaching near,
He saw Rogero come without his spear,
His own he cast aside, as one in flight
Who with advantage scorn'd t' assail the knight.
Rogero, when the courteous act he spy'd— 600
"Sure yonder warrior," to himself he cried,
"Or much I err, is one of many nam'd
The Paladins, in fields of battle fam'd:
Fain would I, ere we join in combat, know
The name and lineage of my gallant foe,"
He ask'd; and by his fair reply was known
Dudson the brave, the Dane Ugero's son.
To him good Dudson made the like request,
Rogero equal courtesy express'd.

Against each other now (their names declar'd)
They hurl'd defiance and for deeds prepar'd.
That iron mace^m, which in a thousand fields
Had giv'n him endless glory, Dudson wields:

^m Here is an apparent slip of the poet's memory; for Puliano king of Naamama, and Agricaltes, were killed by Rinaldo in the xvith Book, and Balastro by Lorceno in the xviiiith Book.

^m See Book xxxix. note to ver. 374.

^m The poet here arms Dudson with a mace, and Rogero with a sword; which may seem rather singular, as it is not explained how such difference of weapons was consonant to the laws of chivalry, nor is there any other example of the kind in Ariosto or Boyardo, though it is here said that Dudson was celebrated for the use of this weapon. It is however certain, that the poet does not imply that any unfair advantage was taken, since he

With this full well his rightful claim he show'd
To Danish valour and Ugero's blood.
That sword, which helm and cuirass can divide,
Which scarce is equal'd through the world beside,

Rogero grasps, and, while he grasps, displays
A virtue pair'd with noble Dudon's praise.
But good Rogero fear'd, o'er every fear, 620
T' offend the virgin to his soul so dear,
Assur'd if by his hand the knight should bleed,
Her hatred must attend the luckless deed.
Skill'd in each noble house of France, he knew
Dudon his birth from Armellini drew,
Sister to Beatrice, of whom was born
His Bradamaat, whose gifts her sex adorn.
Hence ne'er with point direct the thrust he bends,
And seldom with its edge his blade descends.
Still on his guard, as falls the ponderous mace, 630
The stroke he parries, or he shifts his place.
Well Turpin thinks that by Rogero slain
Had noble Dudon preat the sanguine plain:
But he, who fears th' advantage given to use,
Still fights with caution, nor his stroke pursues.
By turns Rogero in his skilful hand
With flat or edge his falchion can command:
Now whizzing round his rapid weapon flies,
And with such force astonish'd Dudon plies,
That scarce with dazzled eyesight can be rein 640
His frighted courser or his seat retain.

But more henceforth—who deigns to lead an ear,
Some future time the finish'd tale shall hear.

BOOK XLI,

THE ARGUMENT.

Conclusion of the battle between Rogero and Dudon. The seven kings are set at liberty. Rogero embarks with them for Africa, and is overtaken by a dreadful storm, in which all perish but himself. Preparations of Orlando, Brandimart, and Olivero, for their battle with the three Pagans. They depart for Lipadusa, and leave Fiordellis in great affliction. The six knights arrive at the place appointed for the combat. Interview of Brandimart with Agramant. They prepare for battle next morning. Rogero escapes by swimming to a small island, where he is entertained by a hermit, and receives baptism. The hermit converses with him of his future race. Description of the great battle between the three Christian and three Pagan knights, in the island of Lipadusa.

From sweets, that, far diffusing, scent the gale
From curling locks, or beard, or silken veil
Of beauteous damsels, or enamour'd swains,
In whom love, dew'd with tears, full often reigns:

commends the courtesy of Dudon for casting away his spear to meet Rogero on equal terms. After all, the introduction of the mace might arise solely from a desire of giving more variety to the battle.

This simile or allusion, which seems rather forced, is drawn from the custom of perfuming the clothes, beard, and hair, which might be common among the Italians at the time of Ariosto.

Those sweets which, after days elaps'd, disperse
Soft balmy perfumes to the gentle sense,
By such effects their primal virtues show,
From which so long such pleasing odours flow.

That nectar'd juice, to which his death he ow'd,
Which on his reapers Icarus² bestow'd, 10
Which made the Celtian and Bœtian train:
A toilsome passage o'er the Alps sustain;
The flavorful taste, it first possess'd, declares,
When twelve long moons such flavorful taste it
The tree, that keeps in wintry skies its leaves, [bears,
In genial spring the fairest green receives.

Behold that race, where son succeeding son,
Eternal lights of courtesy have shone;
Which day by day with added lustre shine!
Hence he, from whom we drew th' Estenian line, 20
Must know the fairest gifts that man can boast,
And beam a sun among the starry host.

Rogero, as in every act he bore
The prize for virtue, fame, and courteous lore,
Beyond compare; so now (as late we view'd)
His noble mind display'd to Dudon stood:
In fear to slay, he urg'd not half his force,
But check'd his valour in the middle course.

While Dudon saw that oft his valiant foe
Withheld the fury of th' impending blow, 30
Unharm'd he fought, till now, with nerves unbroc'd,
His strokes grew faint, he felt his vigour waste;
At length, compell'd the praise of arms to yield,
He still for generous soul maintain'd the field. [clius
"For Heaven's dear sake," he cried, "sir knight, in-Thy thoughts to peace—the palm can ne'er be mine,

'Tis lost already—lo! myself I own
Thy captive, by thy courtesy o'erthrown."

² There were three of the name of Icarus. Icarus, the father of Penelope; Icarus, the son of Dædalus; and Icarus, of whom the poet here speaks. This last was so favoured of Bacchus, that he received from him the secret of making wine. He gave some to his reapers, who, drinking to excess, were intoxicated. Their companions, supposing them to have been poisoned, in revenge of their death, slew Icarus at his return from hunting.

Porcacchi, humorously to this story of Icarus, where he introduces Juno reproaching Jupiter with the drunken frolics of his son Bacchus.

"Juno. I suppose you will praise him too for his invention of the grape, though you see how those who use it tumble about, and how abusive they are, drinking even till they run mad with it. Icarus, the very first who tasted the juice of the vine, was beat to death with clubs by his own pat companions." See Dr. Francklin's Translation.

Eugenio.
⁴ He means Rogero, the head of the house of Este: there is a quaintness and obscurity in the whole passage. Ariosto says, that all the members of this house having been celebrated for courtesy, Rogero, the origin of the house, and from whom all their courtesy was derived, must have been eminent for that quality.

Rogero then—"The peace thou seek'st to make,
Which here I give—on this condition take; 40
That those unhappy kings whom bonds confine,
Releas'd from thralldom thou to me resign".

He said; and pointed where in durance bound
The seven kings stood, with looks that sought the
ground;

And thus pursu'd—"No longer these detain,
But free to Afric let them cross the main."
Thus he—The generous Paladin agreed,
Then to his hand the noble captives freed;
And bade him choice from all his vessels make,
For Afric's coast his speedy way to take. 50

Rogero quits the port, he spreads the sail,
And gives the vessel to the treacherous gale,
That first the canvass swells with friendly breeze:
With joy her merry course the pilot sees.
The land retreats—at length is seen no more:
Surrounding ocean seems without a shore,
When, lo! as rising eve obscures the day,
The wind reveals its purpose to betray:
It shifts, nor will a moment's pause allow,
By turns invades the poop, the sides, and prow: 60
It whirls the ship, in giddy motion lost,
And all the troubled seaman's art is lost!
Now at his side he feels the mastering wind,
And now it howls before, and now behind:
Now dash'd aloft, the spumy billows rave,
And Neptune's white herds low above the wave &
A thousand deaths the trembling wretches fear;
As many deaths, as threatening waves, appear!
At head or stern, the wind's increasing force
Now forward drives, and backwards now, their course: 70

One blast against the reeling vessel sets;
And every blast with wreck the seaman threatens;
While he, who holds the rudder, shakes with dread;
The lively colour from his cheek is fled!
He beckons oft, and oft with fruitless cry
Rids strike the sail, and let the main-sheet fly.
He bids unheard, and every signal fails;
So dire a noise, so deep a night prevails!
His voice is lost amidst th' united cries
Of frighted sailors mingling in the skies 80
With louder din; while dash'd together break
The frothy waves, and horrid concert make.
From prow to poop alike, nor far nor near,
They view a signal, or command they hear:
Through shrouds and tackling round the bending mast

With double fury raves the hissing blast:
From flashing lightning livid gleams are sent,
And peals of thunder shake the firmament.
One grasps an oar, one to the steerage flies;
And each, with straining nerve, his office plics. 90
One toils to loose, one faster makes: one laves
The water forth, and waves return to waves.

* The white foam of the sea and the hollow noise accompanying the dashing of the waves, might perhaps have suggested to Ariosto this very poetical expression:

Muggiando sopra il mar'va il gregge bianco.

The classical reader, in this admirable description of the tempest, will see the poet's several imitations of the ancient writers, though many circumstances are added by him, and others highly improved.

Again his force resistless Boreas pours,
Again with rage the storm redoubled roars:
Against the mast the sail and sail-yard bend:
The oars break short—the seas to Heaven ascend:
The prow is turn'd, and to the hostile tide
The vessel lays her unprovided side:
Beneath the water on her right she lies,
In danger soon t' o'eract: with fearful cries, 100
All now to God their fleeting souls commend,
Expecting when the vessel would descend
Engulf'd—one mischief to another leads,
And lo! a second soon the first succeeds.

Th' o'er-labour'd bark, with many a gaping seam,
Admits the influx of the hostile stream.
The tempest rages still—now lifted high
On mounting seas, they seem to touch the sky:
Now from the ridgy waves they sink so low,
They seem to view th' infernal realms of woe. 110
No hope remains! Death glares in every sight!
Thus pass'd in horror all the sleepless night.
Nor with the dawn of day the tempest ceas'd;
With dawn of day the tempest's force increas'd.
Before their eyes, above the angry tide,
Appears a rock, and not a hand can guide
The vessel's course the threaten'd death to shun,
On which, impell'd by winds and waves, they run,
And thrice, and four times, the pale pilot strove,
With every nerve, the rudder swift to move, 120
And clear the rock—but, lo! his purpose cross'd,
The rudder broke, and in the deep was lost!
The furious wind impell'd the latter'd sail
With dreadful speed—no art could more avail—
No time is left for counsel or debate,
All help too distant, and too near their fate!

Their wreck deem'd certain—each the public cares
Forgets, and to preserve his life prepares.
Who first can reach her, gains the skiff with speed:
But soon such numbers enter as exceed 130
Her scanty bulk, and scarce her sides exclude
The rising billows that around intrude.
Rogero saw, how from the deck, in haste,
The master, captain, and the seamen pass'd:
Then as he stood, without his arms, undrest,
To seek his safety to the boat he press'd:
But entering there he found such heaps werestow'd,
Still others following, till the greedy flood
Pour'd o'er the sides, and in one hour of fate
Down sunk the boat with all her wretched freight;
Down sunk the boat; and to the depths below
At once the vessel with the many go,
That late forsook the ship—loud shrieks arise!
Each sinking wretch to Heaven for mercy cries.
But soon, alas! the vocal accent fails,
With such a rage th' un pitying surge prevails,
And choaks the sounds, that, struggling in their way,

Weak and more weak in dying piteous decay.
Some, when they sink, the sea for ever hides,
Some rise again, and float upon the tides: 150
One, while he swims, his head discover'd rears;
Here shows an arm, and there a leg appears.
Rogero fearless, while the tempest raves,
Borne from the bottom rises o'er the waves;
And near him sees the rock above the main,
So late the terror of the sailor-train:
He strains each nerve, and, swimming, hopes to find
The cliff his refuga from the seas and wind.
He pants—breathes short—while from his face he blows
Th' intruding brine, that in his nostrils flows. 160

Meanwhile the ship before the tempest flew,
 The ship abandon'd by her wretched crew,
 Who (as their cruel fortune will'd) to shun
 The death they fear'd, on surer death had run.
 O sickle state of man! whose erring mind
 Sees but the present, to the future blind!
 The ship, so near destruction, safely rode,
 Without her crew, or pilot, through the flood.
 As if the wind, that from the vessel view'd
 The men retir'd, no more his rage pursu'd; 170
 Safe from the rock he turn'd her course aside,
 Where, free from shelves, she plough'd secure the

 Here (as I told?) Orlando chanc'd to walk,
 And cheer the friendly hour with social talk: 180
 Desirous now to learn the vessel's state,
 What chiefs she brought, or what her secret freight,
 With Brandimart, and with his kinsman⁶ dear;
 A bark he took, and soon approaching near,
 He trod the deck, and every part explor'd:
 No chiefs nor mariners he found on board,
 But view'd alone Rogero's arms and sword.
 To quit the ship such speed Rogero made,
 No time allow'd to save his trusty blade.
 This weapon by the Paladin was known; 190

⁸ Olivero.

Falerina, queen of Oragna, and a powerful enchantress, had a wonderful garden surrounded with a huge wall of stone, that defended the access from every mortal: there was one entrance towards the east, at a gate, which was night and day guarded by a dreadful serpent that never slept, and was fed with human flesh. All the knights and damsels who came thither were, by command of the enchantress, cast into a dungeon, and every day a knight and damsel were given by lot to be devoured by the serpent. Rinaldo, travelling that way with Iroldo, saw Prasilido and Fiordelis led to death; when attacking their guards, he delivered them, and resolv'd to attempt the adventure of the enchanted garden; but was persuaded first to visit the garden of Dragontina, where he found that enchantment already dissolved by Angelica.

Orl. Innam. book i. c. xvii.

Concerning the adventure achieved by Orlando in the garden of Falerina, by which he obtained the famous sword Balisarda, take the following account from Boyardo.

Orlando and Rinaldo, being engaged in a dreadful combat, Angelica, terrified for the safety of Rinaldo, at that time the object of her affection, prevailed upon Orlando to break off the combat, and undertake the adventure of the garden of Falerina, by which she not only hoped to remove the present danger from Rinaldo, but to rid herself of an importunate lover. Orlando, at the request of his mistress, immediately left Albracca, and after several adventures, and having lost his lance, stolen from him by Origilla (as before related, see note to Book xv. ver. 755), he travelled on foot till he came near the enchanted garden, where he delivered two knights and a lady, who were conducting to the prisons of Falerina: these were Gryphon, Aquilant, and Origilla; the last of whom, making her peace with him, restored to him his horse. Gryphon and Aquilant then departing, left Orlando alone with Origilla, who had begun to conceive a violent passion for Gryphon. While Orlando and Origilla were conversing together, a lady appeared, mounted upon a white palfrey, who, having saluted them, addressed herself to the earl, and advised him to fly with speed from a place where all strangers were sacrificed by the cruelty of Falerina; but Orlando declaring his resolution to enter the garden, she replied in this manner: "If you would not become the food of the serpent, you must, sir knight, continue chaste, at least three days, and for your guidance take this book, which will inform you of all that must be done for the completion of the adventure. Know that this garden is the work of an enchantress, who has retired into a stately palace in the middle of the garden, where, by her skill in magic, she has framed a sword, whose edge nothing can resist, which weapon she has designed to be the death of the greatest champion in the western world: this champion is named Orlando; he is reported to be invulnerable and unconquerable, and Falerina has found that the Fates have threatened her garden shall one day be destroyed by him; but remember, when you attempt this adventure, that no foot can enter the garden except at sunrise." The damsel having ended her speech, gave Orlando a book and disappeared.

And all her bowers destroy'd, and how the hand

Orlando then hastened, with his companion, towards the garden, when night coming on, he alighted from his horse; and, lying down on the grass, fell fast asleep in his armour, ready at day-break to enter upon the adventure. The treacherous Origilla once more stole the earl's horse Brigliadoro, and taking likewise his sword Durindana from his side, while he lay asleep, mounted, and departed in pursuit of Gryphon. In the morning, Orlando waking missed his horse and sword; but, resolutely determined to prosecute the adventure, he tore down a huge branch from an elm, of which he made a kind of club, and advanced intrepidly towards the wall, where the serpent kept watch. The Sun was just risen when he arrived at the gate that faced the east, where the monster, lashing with his wings and tail, made a most horrible noise, and opened his jaws to swallow the knight. Orlando rushed upon him with great fury, and at length, with repeated blows of the club, dashed his skull in pieces. As soon as the serpent was dead, the wall immediately closed, the gate was seen no more, and Orlando found himself shut up in the garden, without any apparent means of escaping. Casting round his eyes he beheld a fountain, in which stood a marble statue, on whose forehead was written, "The path lies by this fountain to the palace of the garden." Orlando, having refreshed himself awhile at the fountain, continued his way, sometimes gazing on the verdant turf, enamelled with a thousand flowers, and listening to the music of the birds that fluttered amid the branches of the trees, while he admired the number of stags, deer, and other animals that inhabited this delightful solitude. At length he came to a stupendous palace, built of gold, and ornamented with rubies and diamonds.

Orlando entered, and beheld a dame clothed in white garments, with a diadem of gold on her head, and holding in her hand a sword in the broad blade of which, as in a mirror, she seemed to be contemplating herself. No sooner had she beheld the knight, but she fled with precipitation from the palace. Orlando, armed as he was, pursuing her with equal speed, and soon overtaking her, seized the sword that had been made for his destruction, and holding her by the hair of the head, threatened her with immediate death, unless she instructed him how to leave the garden; but she persisting obstinately silent to his threats or promises, Orlando, enraged, bound her to the trunk of a tree, and recollecting his book, applied to it for information, where he found that a gate opened to the south, guarded by a bull that had one horn of iron, and one of fire, and whose hide was not to be pierced by any weapon; but that before he reached the gate, he must pass by a wonderful lake with great difficulty. Orlando, fully instructed, first carefully stopped his ears with the leaves of roses, which he gathered from the meadow, and arriving at the lake where many had found their death*, the water began to gurgle, and a Syren appeared, having the form above of a beautiful woman, and beneath the tail of a fish; she began to sing so melodiously, that the birds and beasts gathered round, and were immediately charmed to a profound sleep. Orlando, though he heard nothing, pretending to be in the same manner attentive to her song, threw himself on the ground and feigned to be asleep, when the Syren rushing to seize him, he struck off her head with his sword, and smeared himself over with her blood, as a sure preventive against the effects of the bull's fiery horn, which would otherwise have consumed his armour to ashes. The earl then advanced to the south side of the garden, and reached a brazen gate guarded by the fiery bull, which he immediately attacked, and soon cut off his iron horn; but with the horn of fire the beast pressed him so furiously that the knight could scarce defend himself, and had he not been preserved by the blood of the Syren, the fire would have totally consumed him. At last he slew the bull, whose body was immediately swallowed up by the earth, and the wall closing, he found himself once more imprisoned. He was then directed by his book to go to the western part, where he would find another gate adorned with jewels and precious stones, defended by a wonderful ass that was enchanted. Orlando, as his book directed, pursuing his way, came to a tree of a vast height, the branches of which spread to a prodigious extent: having again consulted his book, he took his shield, and binding it over his brows, so that his sight might be effectually defended, as by a pent-house, from any thing that fell from above, he boldly advanced to the trunk of the tree; amidst the branches of which sat an enormous bird, with the head and face resembling a woman with beautiful hair, and crowned with a diadem; her feathers were parti-coloured and gold; her feet were armed with iron talons, and from her body distilled a certain liquor, that as soon as it touched the eyes, instantly took away the sight, and the hapless prey was left to be devoured by her. This monster rushed with a dreadful noise upon Orlando, who came with his head held down to defend himself from the effects of the liquor that fell on his shield in great abundance, till at length, with a fortunate stroke of his sword, he cleft the bird in sunder, and leaving her dead by the tree, he replaced the buckler on his arm and pursued his way, till he came to the rich gate decorated with jewels of inestimable value, where he found the ass covered over with impenetrable scales of gold; his ears were two ells in length, which he curled like a serpent, with which he seized and drew every thing to him with incredible strength; his tail was sharper than the sharpest sword, and not to be resisted by the strongest armour; and the noise of his braying made the earth tremble. This beast ran furiously towards Orlando, who, receiving him with his drawn sword, laid all his side bare notwithstanding his scales; that were so defence against the sword of Orlando: the ass then seized on the knight's shield with his ears, and by force drew it from him, but Orlando severed his ears with a stroke of the sword, when the beast turning round with his sharp tail hewed all the champion's armour in pieces, while he, whose skin was enchanted, remained unhurt. Orlando, had now wounded the ass in many places, and at last divided his head from his body, which continued for some time to turn about; the garden and all the forest shook; the earth opening swallowed up the ass; and when the earl attempted his passage through the gate the wall closed, and the gate was seen no more. Orlando once more consulted his book, and was directed to take his course towards the north, where was another gate that led from the garden, through which no human force could pass, as it was defended by a dreadful giant, from whose blood, should he be slain, sprung two others fiercer than himself, the brood still increasing with every death. Orlando now arrived at a flowery valley, where he saw, by the margin of a fountain, a table richly spread with the most delicious viands, and wines of every sort in golden vases, where the knight was tempted to refresh himself; but first, he consulted his book, then casting his eyes upon a bower of roses, he perceived concealed among the greens a Faun, whose upper part resembled a woman, and the lower part a serpent: she held in her hand a chain that was invisibly spread round the fountain, as a snare to secure any one that should venture to partake of the repast, when she immediately drew to her bow. Orlando, aware of this, turned from the fountain towards the wood, which the Faun perceiving fled, rustling through the grass, but the knight soon overtook and slew her. The Faun being dead, Orlando hastened to the gate of the north, where he found the giant completely armed with shield and helmet: a dreadful combat ensued, till the earl, with a blow of his sword, giving the giant a mortal wound, he fell dead to the ground, and seemed to leave the victory to Orlando. The blood that flowed from the dead giant gathered into a large pool, and a flame kindling round it, another giant, by degrees, appeared newly created, armed as the former, and a second succeeded him in like manner, both at once attacking the knight with irresistible fury. Orlando finding it vain to pursue the combat with those whose death but increased the number of his enemies, ran hastily to the gate, and endeavoured to force the bars, which he soon burst asunder; but the giants closely pursued him, and obliged him to defend himself: he now left his sword as an useless weapon, and grappling with his opponents, by turns, threw each of them to the ground with incredible strength, and often attempted in vain to reach the gate; but finding every effort unsuccessful to effect his escape, he began to retreat towards the garden, when the giants immediately left him, and resumed their station at the gate, for so the enchantment was framed, that they should ever remain the guardians of the entrance. In the mean time the earl arrived at the meadow, where the banquet was spread, and where he slew the Faun, whose snare was laid for strangers. Here Orlando took the chain that was of a great length and weight, and dragging it after him returned to the place where he left the two giants, and after a dreadful conflict he seized and bound them both with the chain: but the knight still knew that his adventure was not completed, as he must not return to his mistress till he had entirely destroyed the garden of the enchantress. He had again recourse to his bow, and found that in the middle of the garden was a tree, of which if the topmost branch was brought to the ground, the whole enchantment would be dissolved; but that no one must hope to achieve this without exposing himself to the most dreadful danger. Orlando, undaunted, took his way to the palace, where he had seen the dame with the drawn sword, and whom he now found, as he had left her, bound to the trunk of a tree: he soon came to the trunk of the tree he sought for, and beheld the fatal summit above the flight of an arrow sent from the strongest bow; the branches of this tree were to a great extent, and covered with thick leaves that changed every day, and concealed under them sharp thorns; the trunk was so perfectly smooth that it was impossible to climb it, and so slender, as to be grasped by the hand: this whole tree was laden with apples of gold of a vast size and weight, that hung by a small stalk, and threatened all that approached them, for the lightest foot that pressed the earth made all the tree tremble, from which

He deem'd that God (thus oft the warrior said)

the golden shower immediately descended like hail, and crushed the wretched adventurer to death. Orlando, having considered all with attention, saw that it was in vain to think of ascending the summit of the tree, where the boughs would not have supported the least weight; but having made a kind of wicker shed, lined with sods of turf, he placed it on his head, and, thus defended, marched forwards towards the trunk of the tree, which, as he approached, began to shower the apples in such abundance, that all his strength, great as it was, could scarcely enable him to stand under the enormous weight that oppressed him: as soon as he reached the trunk, he, with his sword, immediately severed it in two, and the whole fell to the ground: an earthquake followed, the Sun was obscured with dreadful clouds, and the earl remained in total darkness, till, from a thick smoke that covered all the plains and mountains, a flame arose to the height of a tower, where some demon seemed to destroy every spell of the garden. The enchantment being ended, the sky cleared, the Sun shone with new beauty, the wall of the rock that lately surrounded the place was raised, and left every one at liberty to depart. The palace and fountain appeared no more, and nothing was seen but the dame bound to the trunk of the tree, who, with bitter complaints, lamented the destruction of her garden. Her former pride was now humbled; she no longer continued in obstinate silence, but thus addressed Orlando: "Sir knight, the flower of knight-hood, I confess that I deserve death, but should you now execute your just vengeance upon me, know that many knights and ladies, detained in prison by my power, will suffer in my death. This garden, which thou hast destroyed in one day, cost me the study of seven months, and was designed to revenge me for the discourtesy of a knight and dame called Arriantes and Origilla, who have never yet fallen into my hands*: many lives have fallen a sacrifice in this garden, but greater numbers have been made captive at a bridge, and at a tower, where an old man drew many into his snare, till his prisoners were released by a certain virgin, daughter to Galaphron†, well versed in magic. Many still remain prisoners at the bridge, all whom, should I be slain, would inevitably perish; but if thou wilt spare my life, I promise to set them at liberty: shouldst thou distrust my words, lead me hence, either released or bound, and I will destroy the tower and bridge in thy presence. Choose which thou wilt; take my life, or, by extending thy mercy to me, give life and liberty to the wretched captives."

Orlando, hearing this, determined to spare the enchantress, and immediately set out for the enchanted bridge; at which place he slew Arridano, and delivered all the prisoners as before related in the note to Book xix. ver. 278.

At such a time, that call'd for all his might,
To meet in combat Sericana's knight,
Who (join'd to force o'er all the world confess'd)
Wore Durindana, and Bayardo press'd:
Roger's armour scarce attention drew,
As little prizing what he little knew,
Which seem'd, whate'er its worth, such worth to owe

To temper less than pomp of outward show.
He wants no mail of proof, whose skin was made
Impervious to the javelin, dart, or blade.
To Olivero then he left the arms,
But kept himself the sword of temper'd charms.
To Brandimart he gave the steed, and shar'd
With either noble friend, in due regard,
The good that seem'd by Providence prepar'd.

Each warrior for the day of battle sought 920
Some new device and vestment richly wrought.
Orlando, pictur'd in his scutcheon, took
Proud Babel's lofty tower with lightning struck.
A hound of silver Olivero bore,
The leash upon his back he couchant wore;
The motto—*TRILLES ES COMES*¹¹—his mantle fram'd
Of gold, well worthy of a knight so fam'd.
But noble Brandimart resolv'd to take,
For his own honour and his father's sake¹²,
A mantle fashion'd for the day of fight, 930
All sabled o'er with the dun hue of night,
The work of Flordelis; who round it plac'd
A costly fringe with sparkling jewels grac'd.
With her own hand the dame had wrought the weed

That cover'd all the warrior's arms and steed.
But from that hour the task was first begun,
To that which saw her love's dear labour done;
Nor since, did smile upon her face appear.
Or glimpse of pleasure change her mournful cheer:
A constant weight hung heavy at her heart, 940
And much she fear'd to lose her Brandimart:
Oft had she known him in the field expos'd
To hostile rage, with perilous round enclos'd;
But such a dread had ne'er her soul oppress,
Froz'n in her blood, or throbb'd within her breast,
And from this fear, which ne'er before she knew,
The gentle dame more fatal omens drew.

With arms, and every need prepar'd at hand,
Their sails the warriors to the breeze expand.
But Sansonetto and Astolpho stay, 950
Whose joint command the numerous hosts obey.

Unhappy Flordelis, in deep despair,
Laments and weeps, and wearies Heaven with prayer;

And, far as sight the lessening object views,
With straining eyes the flying ship pursues.
Her Sansonetto and Astolpho bore,
All pale and struggling, from the fatal shore;
Then to her home the widow'd monarch led,
And left her spent and fainting on her bed.

¹¹ This fanciful device of chivalry is thus explained by the Italian commentator: "The posture of the dog shows that he is in expectation of his prey; by the dog Olivero figures himself, and shows, that he only waits for the opportunity to prove his valour."

And pitch'd his tent upon the western side.
But since the Sun roll'd down departing light, 970

Mindful of former love the warriors meet, 980
And grasping hand in hand, each other greet.
With earnest reasons then the Christian knight
Would urge the Pagan to decline the fight,
With offers, from Orlando, to restore
Each city to his rule, from Nilus' shores
To where Alcides fix'd his pillar'd base,
Would be the faith of Mary's Son embrace.

"Thee have I lov'd," he cried, "thee, whilst I live,
Shall ever love, and hence this counsel give.
Well mayst thou know I deem that counsel good,
Which I, O monarch¹⁴! for myself pursu'd. 991
Christ is our God, but Mahomet untrue—
By me the path of life and mercy view.
The path I tread—and fain would thee, O king!
With every friend, to life and mercy bring.
In this consists thy weal—nought else aught
Can work thy good, and least of all, the fight
With Milo's son¹⁵, where conquest cannot weigh Against the evil, shouldst thou lose the day.
If thou shouldst win—how little gain ensues! 300
But if thou lovest—greatly must thou lose.
Say, by thy hand Orlando breathless lie,
Or we, who come with him to win or die,
I love not how henceforth thou shalt regain
Thy honour, and restore thy lost domain.

¹³ Brandimart was converted to Christianity by Orlando, as is related by Boyardo. Orlando having engaged in a bloody battle with Agrican, endeavours, when night breaks off the battle, to convert the king to Christianity, but in vain; next day the combat is renewed: at last Agrican renouncing his death's wound from Orlando requests baptism, and is baptized by the Paladin before he dies.

¹⁴ Milo of Anglante, youngest brother to duke Amon, having won the affections of Bertha, the sister of Charlemain, she proved with child by him. The emperor coming to the knowledge of this, threw them both into prison, till the lovers being set at liberty through the mediation of Amon, he banished them from his dominions. They afterwards married, and Bertha was delivered of a son, afterwards named Orlando, who gave in his earliest years such proofs of valour, as induced the emperor to pardon his parents: he received them both into favour, and restored to Milo his possessions, the marquises of Brava, and the earldom of Anglante. He adopted young Orlando for his

Think not—should we be slain—the Christian state,
So twin'd with us, so buried in our fate,
That Charles can want, to Earth's remotest end,
Soldiers and chiefs his conquests to defend.

Thus Bradamant; and thus had further prest
The wholesome counsels of a zealous breast, 311
But with an angry voice, and haughty look,
Impatient on his speech the Pagan broke.

"Sure more than madness must possess thy mind,
And all who dare, like thee in folly blind,
Whatever the chance, in evil or in good,
Unask'd on others their advice intrude!
That these thy words but speak thy former will
To seek my peace, and that thou seek'st it still,
I scarce can think, when, to my present harms, 320
I see thee with Orlando rang'd in arms.
Sure, rather conscious of th' avenging day,
When that dire fiend shall make thy soul his prey,
Thou seek'st to drag with thee to lowest Hell
All-human kind, in endless pains to dwell.
Whether I lose or conquer—whether gain
My ancient realm, or exil'd still remain,
God in his awful purpose must dispose;
Not thou, nor I, nor yet Orlando knows.
How'er it fall—no fortune shall debate 330
My soul to actions that a king disgrace.
Hence, to thy friends return! and if thy might
Can prove no better in to-morrow's fight,
Then now thy skill in eloquence is shown,
Orlando little shall thy succour own."

Thus Agrament his speech in anger clos'd;
And both retiring till the morn repos'd.
With silver dawn of light, each warrior, dress'd
In shining arms, his forming corner press'd:
No time for parley, while, with eager haste, 340
His pointed lance in rest each warrior plac'd;
But ill-advis'd, my lord! the martial strain
Would linger here on Lipadusa's plain,
And leave Rogero, in the cruel strife
Of winds and waves, to yield his noble life.

The youth his dreadful way through roaring tides
And raging foam with sinewy arm divides:
He feels the breaking surge and bowling wind,
But most he feels the tempest in his mind:
There conscience bids him fear that Christ will 350
take

Do vengeance now; and since he scorn'd to make
His choice of purer streams, has doom'd to lave
His past offences in the briny wave.
He now remembers many a promise given
To her he lov'd; and what he vow'd to Heaven
When with Rinaldo late in fight he met,
And how his soul could every tie forget.
Repentant now, with many a fervent prayer
He begs of God his forfeit life to spare,

son, and the pope made him standard-bearer to the church, and a senator of Rome.

On the invasion of the Christians by Garnieri, king of Carthage, Milo of Anglantes performed great feats of valour: having received the pope's benediction, he defended Rome and Charlemain, and killed Garnieri. Aimontes, grandson of Garnieri, afterwards coming over to revenge his death, engaged in single combat with Milo, and killed him with the sword Durindana.

See Aspramont, c. i. ii. ver. 18.

* He continues the combat in the 520th verse of this Book.

And vow, if e'er his feet should tread the shore, 360
With heart sincere t' embrace the Christian lore,
And ne'er again in aid of Afric's band
With sword or lance against the faithful stand;
But back to France resume his speedy way,
And there to Charles his due allegiance pay;
No longer Bradamant with words delude,
But with true faith their happy loves conclude.

Scarce had he vow'd, when, lo! he seems to swim
With nerves new-brac'd in every buoyant limb:
Wondrous to tell! untir'd his vigour braves 370
The deep once more, and buffets with the waves:
Wave rolling after wave alternate swells,
One lifts him high, and one his course impels.
Sinking and rising thus the brine he cleaves;
At length the rock his weary limbs receives,
And where with favouring self declines the steep,
All drench'd with ooze he issues from the deep.
The rest that sought their hapless lives to save,
Engulf'd in billows found a watry grave.

Now from the tossing surge, at Heaven's commands,

Upon the dreary cliff Rogero stands; 381
Around the savage coast he rolls his eyes,
And, safe from sea, new fears by land arise:
There doom'd, perhaps, on that dire coast to lie
A lonely exile, and with famine die,
But yet resolv'd with constant mind to bear,
What evil Heav'n had doom'd his wretched share;
Up the steep rock his patient step he bends,
And now, by slow degrees, the height ascends;
When sudden to his wondering sight appears 390
A sire, low bent with abstinence and years:

A hermit, by his looks and gesture seen,
Of saint-like manners, and of reverend mien.
"O Saul! O Saul!" he cried, as near he drew,
"Why wilt thou thus my holy faith pursue?"
(As once to Paul our heavenly Saviour spoke,
What time he gave the dread, but saving stroke.)
"Think'st thou, unpaid, to pass th' opposing furd,
Defrauding of his dues the rightful lord? 399
Lo! God, who reaches all, whom late in thought
You deem'd so far, has here his judgment wrought."

Thus far the hermit, to whose holy sight
High Heaven in vision, the preceding night,
Great things disclos'd; how, by his powerful hand,
Rogero safe should tread that desert land;
Reveal'd his life; his every action past,
His future praise, and hapless death at last;
With all the glory that henceforth should grace
His sons, his grandsons, and his numerous race.

The hermit then pursues; and first severe, 410
He pours reproof in young Rogero's ear;
And, when remorse and shame his bosom move,
He soothes him with the balm of peace and love.
The youth he blames, who such delay could make

A yoke so pleasing on his neck to take:
Hence, what at first behov'd him to embrace,
When Christ so gently warn'd him off to grace,
In peaceful times, he now receiv'd, as a w'd
Before the presence of an angry God,
And deaf to mild reproof, confess'd his chastising 420
rod.

He comforts then, and tells him Christ will bear
Repentant sinners with indulgent ear;
That in the gospel-vineyard of the Lord
Each holy labourer finds a like reward;
And, with pure zeal, he to the listening youth
Unfolds the mysteries of Christian truth.

In converse thus, with steps sedate and slow,
 Together to the hermit's cell they go,
 Cut in the living rock; and o'er it stands
 A hallow'd chapel that the east commands, 430
 Fair, neatly built—and reaching to the flood,
 Of various growth below, a quivering wood,
 Where laurel, juniper, and myrtle green,
 With spreading palm-trees, grace the lovely scene;
 Whose mingled shade a liquid fountain feeds,
 That down the rock its murmuring current leads.
 Near forty years had past since first the sire
 Forsook each worldly pleasure, to retire
 To this recess, where, by his Saviour blest,
 He led his days in purity and rest. 440
 For wholesome food the gather'd fruits he took;
 To quench his thirst he sipp'd the crystal brook:
 And strong in health, and free from care and strife,
 He reach'd th' extremest verge of human life.

Now in his cell the kindled fire he blew,
 Then on the board his homely fruits he threw.
 Rogero dry'd his vest and oozing hair,
 Then sat and feasted on the simple fare;
 Where, by his saint-like host explain'd, he heard
 The wondrous truths in Christian faith rever'd;
 And from his hand, next day, the humble knight
 In the pure stream receiv'd the cleansing rite.

While sequester'd in this calm abode
 Rogero stay'd, whom oft the man of God
 Declar'd, some days elaps'd, he meant to send
 Where all his thoughts, where all his wishes tend.
 Meanwhile in talk the useful hours were given
 To various themes: now on the realms of Heaven
 The sage discours'd; now on his worldly good;
 And now the race to issue from his blood. 460
 That Power, from whom no thought remains con-
 ceal'd,

Had to the reverend sire in dreams reveal'd,
 That, from the day he first our faith embrac'd,
 Rogero's life in seven short years would waste;
 That Pinabello, by his consort dead,
 Should call down future vengeance on his head;
 Till for this death and Bertolagi slain,
 He falls by dire Maganza's impious train:
 So secret is his fate; no tongue can tell
 The murderous treason, or by whom he fell. 470
 But where, by cruel hands the knight shall die;
 There, by those hands his corse shall bury'd lie.
 His wife and sister, for his honour'd sake,
 Hereafter shall a heavy vengeance take;
 And with her burthen'd womb, long time deplor'd,
 His mourning wife shall seek her absent lord:
 Between the Adigi and Brenta's rills,
 And where Astenor stay'd between the hills,
 Mills rich with sulphur, where each river leads His course through corn-clad fields and verdant
 meads; 480

Scenes, by the Trojan view'd with raptur'd eye,
 Which well might Ida, and the lost supply
 Of Xanthus and Aecanius—there in shade
 Of pattering forests should the dame be stay'd;
 And near Athesies (Phrygian name) in throes
 Of child-bed labour, should to birth disclose
 An infant, fair in form, and after fam'd
 For noble daring, and Rogero nam'd;
 He, own'd of Trojan lineage, should obtain
 Dominion o'er the Trojan's exil'd train; 490
 And next from Charles¹⁶, to whom his youthful aid
 He gives in arms, with princely gifts be paid:

¹⁶ This was the beginning of the illustrious family

When, for his actions in the Lombard war,
 The name of marquis should be justly bear.
 As royal Charles, when he the land bestows,
 Would say in Latin—Est—here repose;
 Succeeding times such omen should embrace,
 And give the name of Este¹⁷ to the place.
 Thenceforth no more Athesies should retain
 Its ancient title, but the now remain. 500
 God set before his chosen servant's view
 What judgment should Rogero's death pursue;
 How he, in vision, ere the dawning light,
 Should stand before his faithful consort's sight,
 And to her ear the murderous guile betray,
 The place describing where his body lay:
 How she, and her Marphise, should employ
 Both fire and sword Pontiero to destroy.
 Nor less his son, Rogero, whom he grew
 To manhood, should Maganza's race pursue. 510
 Of every Asso of th' Alberti's¹⁸ name,
 Th' Obisi, all that blood from these could claim,
 The hermit knew, to Nicholas renown'd;
 Borsio and Hercules with virtues crown'd;
 Hippolito and Linonetto grac'd;
 Alphonso brave, and Isabella chaste.
 But well instructed where his speech to close,
 The holy father speaks not all he knows;
 What should be told, he to the youth explains,
 And, what conceal'd, he to himself retains. 520
 Meanwhile with spears declin'd¹⁹, and fearless
 heart,

Orlando, Olivero, Brandimart,
 To meet the Pagan Mars with fury came,
 (For such the Muse my Gerco Gradasso name)
 And those that with him stood the fight to wage,
 King Agrament, and king Sobrino sage,
 Each spur'd his mettled steed, and, wide around,
 The seas, the shores, re-echo'd to the sound.
 When now the combatants together drew,
 And to the skies their shiver'd lances flew; 530
 With horrid crash the affrighted waves appear'd
 To swell and foam—the noise to France was heard!
 By chance Orlando and Gradasso met,
 And equal seem'd against each other set,
 Save that Bayardo's vigour in the course of Este, whose praises are scattered all through this work; and here the poet gives the origin or derivation of the name of Este, as likewise of the title of marquis, given by Charles the Great to this Rogero, when he went against Desiderius king of Lombardy. See note to Book iii. ver. 164.
 Gave seeming vantage to Gradasso's force.

¹⁷ In the quaintness of this passage, Ariosto alludes to the real incident that gave birth to the title or name of Este, afterwards so famous. The emperors, when they bestowed any lordship or sovereignty on subjects for their merits, made use of this expression in Latin. Esse hic domini.

¹⁸ All these personages have been sufficiently noted in the former parts of these remarks. See Book iii.—the Notes throughout.

¹⁹ The poet returns to Rogero, Book xlii. ver. 1469.

The battle here described by Ariosto of six champions, three to three, is certainly new in poetry, though doubtless battles of the same kind may be found in the romance writers: it gives the poet room for novelty of description, and perhaps is as excellent a battle as any in the whole poem.

Against the steed with such resistless power
 He rush'd, the steed which fierce Orlando bore,
 That, hurc'd before the dreadful shock to yield,
 He fell, and measur'd with his length the field. 340
 Orlando tries, but vainly still he tries,
 With hand and spur to make his courser rise.
 When nought avail'd the saddle he forsook,
 Embrac'd his shield and Balisarda shook.
 On Afric's monarch Olivero ran,
 And both with equal chance the tilt began.
 But Brandimart had king Sobrino thrown
 From off his steed; though scarcely could be known
 Wh by his own or courser's blame he fell,
 For seldom fame Sobrino's fall could tell. 350
 But whether by his own or courser's fault,
 Unborn'd Sobrino lay the first assault.
 Now Brandimart, who king Sobrino view'd
 Low stretch'd on earth, no more with him puru'd
 The fight, but turn'd Gradasso's arms to meet,
 By whom alike Orlando lost his seat.
 The marquis now and Agramant, engag'd
 With equal fortune, had the combat wag'd.
 Against the shield their spears they broke, and drew
 Their flaming swords, the battle to renew. 360
 Orlando (who beheld Gradasso clos'd
 With Brandimart, and little now dispos'd
 On him his force to turn, so sore he felt
 The strokes his gallant foe unceasing dealt)
 Gaz'd round, when near Sobrino stood in sight,
 Like him, on foot, and idle from the fight.
 Fierce on the sage he rush'd, with dreadful look,
 And, as he trod, the skies with terror shook:
 Sobrino, who the dread encounter view'd,
 Firm in his arms with force collected stood. 370
 Then, as a pilot, who beholds from far
 The roaring onset of the watery war,
 Directs his prow against the hilly tide
 In mountains rising—thus Sobrino try'd
 With lifted shield, that ruin to repel,
 Which from the sword of Falerina fell.
 Such Balisarda's edge, the strongest arms
 But little held against its temper'd charms;
 And, wielded now in great Orlando's hand
 (Of force unequal'd), nothing could withstand.
 Full on the buckler's orb, with swift descent 381
 Through double folds of plated steel it went,
 Cleft all the shield, and in his shoulder made
 A ghastly wound, where mail and plate o'erlaid,
 Oppos'd in vain the fierce descending blade.
 Now is his turn, Sobrino aims the blow
 To wound Orlando; but his fearless foe
 Unwounded stands—to him such favour Heaves,
 And stars propitious, from his birth had given.
 Again the noble earl the fashion sped, 390
 And from Sobrino thought to part his head.
 Sobrino, who the strength of Clarmont knows,
 And finds no buckler can such strokes oppose,
 Drew sudden back, but scarcely could evade
 The furious aim from Falerina's blade:
 The sword fell flat, but o'er his forehead broke
 Th' unfaithful helm, and stunn'd him with the stroke.
 Prone on the ground all pale Sobrino lay,
 Nor soon recover'd to dispute the day.
 The Paladin, who deem'd this combat o'er, 600
 His rival fall'u, as if to rise no more,
 Against Gradasso turn'd, should chance demand,
 In aid of Brandimart, his friendly hand.
 For him o'ermatch'd in arms and sword he held,
 Perchance in courser and in strength excell'd.

Brave Brandimart, that on Frontino rode,
 (The generous heart Rogero late bestrode)
 So ply'd his weapons in the dangerous field,
 He little seem'd in strength or skill to yield. 609
 Had like defence secur'd his breast from harms,
 His force might more than meet the Pagan arms.
 But, (conscious of his weaker mail) now there,
 Now here he turns, and oft eludes the war:
 No courser better than Frontino knew
 The knight's command, or at a signal flew.
 Where Durindana fell, he seem'd to know
 Its aim, and shunn'd the long-descending blow.
 But in a different part the battle rag'd,
 By Agramant and Olivero wag'd:
 Both seem'd alike the skill of arms to claim, 620
 Their valour equal, and their strength the same.
 Orlando (as I told) Sobrino sent
 Senseless to earth, and tow'rd's Gradasso bent,
 In aid of Brandimart, but from his steed
 Dismounted, urg'd on foot his eager speed:
 Now ready for th' attack, he view'd at large
 Sobrino's courser lighten'd of his charge:
 Him, as he cross'd his way, with active heat
 He seiz'd, and seizing press'd the welcome seat:
 One hand was seen the ponderous sword to
 wield,
 And one the rich and splendid bridle held. 631
 Gradasso now, who view'd Orlando near,
 Defy'd him by his name, nor harbour'd fear:
 With all the throes he deem'd such deeds t'achieve,
 That each should from his arm a stroke receive,
 To think it midnight ere the close of eve.
 Then leaving Brandimart, his weapon's point
 Furious he drives, where twisted mail and joint Enclos'd Orlando's neck; through all it held,
 But the tough skin unhurt the thrust repell'd. 640
 At once Orlando Balisarda waves,
 From whose keen edge no magic temper saves:
 In vain the corselet, helm, and shield oppose;
 Through corselet, helm, and shield the weapon goes;
 At once his bosom, face, and thigh receive
 The smarting wound, he scarcely can believe:
 For since the day he first his armour wore,
 No issuing blood e'er stain'd the mail before.
 Wondering he sees, and rages at the view,
 This unknown sword his plates and cuirass hew 650
 With that resistless force he deem'd alone
 Bestow'd on Durindana, now his own;
 And had one stroke pursu'd its aim aright,
 That stroke had to the saddle cleft the knight:
 More wary now he fights, with more regard
 Than wont erewhile, and less forgets to ward.
 When Brandimart his friend Orlando view'd,
 Who, in his cause engag'd, the fight pursu'd,
 Aside he drew to mark the various field,
 Prepar'd, where need requir'd his aid to yield. 660
 Thus stood the war—when now, long time depriv'd
 Of sense, Sobrino from his trance reviv'd:
 He rose; but still his front its anguish own'd,
 His shoulder still confess'd the grievous wound.
 Across the plain his careful eyes he cast,
 And heavy now to aid his sovereign pass'd:
 As Olivero, all intent, pursu'd
 The fight with Agramant, Sobrino stood

= An expression, often used by Ariosto, and common to romance, meaning to dazzle his eyesight by repeated strokes, to make his eyes flash fire that he might think he saw stars at daylight.

Behind, unnoted of th' incautious foe,
 And at his courser aim'd a speeding blow : 676
 His hindmost leg receiv'd the biting steel⁶¹ ;
 He fell ; and with him Olivero fell,
 While press'd beneath him on the rugged way,
 His left-foot tangled in the stirrup lay,
 Again, with strength renew'd, Sobrino sped
 A sidelong stroke, to lop the warrior's head ;
 But this his arms forbade, his arms of yore
 By Vulcan temper'd and which Hector wore.
 His danger Brandimart from far survey'd, 679
 And spur'd his steed, and waving round his blade
 Sobrino struck, whose helm receiv'd the stroke,
 While, headlong, justled by the courser's shock,
 He fell to earth—but soon the senior knight
 His feet-recovering, rose again to fight,
 On Olivero turn'd with fell intent ;
 Once more to slay the knight his force he bent,
 Or, as he sought to rise, to frustrate his intent.
 But Olivero, with his better hand
 Still disencumber'd, could his sword command,
 Which here he thrust or whirl'd with matchless
 strength, 680

And held Sobrino at the weapon's length.
 He boy'd ere long (the Pagan kept at bay)
 To free his foot that now imprison'd lay.
 Drench'd in his blood he sees th' invading foe,
 And sees to earth the purple current flow ;
 His feeble knees can scarce their weight sustain,
 And vanquish'd soon, his limbs must press the plain.
 Oft Olivero strives in vain to rise,
 Still on his foot the bounding courser lies.
 Now Brandimart an iron tempest deals, 700
 As round king Agramant Frontino wheels :
 Now at his side, in front, and now behind,
 Frontino circles rapid as the wind.
 This steed the son of Monodant bestrides ;
 Nor worse the steed the mid-day monarch⁶² guides,
 By Brigidoro in the field sustain'd,
 Rogero's gift from Mandricardo gain'd.
 Arms could he boast, of arms in battle try'd,
 Whose temper oft the hostile steel defy'd ;

⁶¹ This action of Sobrino does not seem entirely consonant to the laws of chivalry, whereby it was ever held unkindly to wound the horse ; and this the poet himself strongly expresses in the description of the duel between Rogero and Mandricardo.

— But neither knight would try
 Ungenerous arts, or make the courser die,
 T' overthrow his lord, &c.

Book xxx. ver. 353.

But, after all, these little deviations from general principles, as has been already observed when Dudoon uses for his weapon a battle axe, may be introduced chiefly from a desire of variety in the descriptive parts ; and if the several passages in other writers, particularly of the epic kind, were minutely examined, there is little doubt but many apparent improprieties, if not inconsistencies, might be discovered that had crept in from the same motive. With respect to this action of Sobrino, it may be thought less to trespass against the decorum of chivalry, from the age of the combatant, who, from that circumstance, may have a greater claim to our indulgence.

⁶² Rè del mezzo giorno—Agramant king of Africa, so called from the situation of his dominions to the south.

While Brandimart wore such as time could yield,
 And sudden need had furnish'd for the field : 711
 Yet these he hop'd (escap'd from present harm)
 To barter with his foe for stronger arms ;
 His foe, whose shoulder, wounded by his sword,
 From the wide gash a stream of crimson pour'd.
 Still in his side a wound the Christian felt,
 By stern Gradasso not for pleasure dealt ;
 Yet with king Agramant so well he strove,
 That oft through mail and sever'd plate he drove
 The weapon's point ; his fencing shield he cleft,
 His better hand he raz'd, and pierc'd his left. 720
 Such was their fight, yet all must sport be thought,

To deeds Orlando and Gradasso wrought.
 Gradasso has Orlando half depriv'd
 Of plate and mail, his helm asunder riv'd ;
 On either side has shorn his crest in twain,
 And sent his shield divided to the plain ;
 His corselet rent beneath ; while, safe from harm,
 His fated skin defies a mortal arm.
 But him the Paladin more sorely press'd
 And pierc'd with wounds his face, his throat and breast.

To grief and madness seiz'd, Gradasso view'd 731
 In his own gore his smarting limbs imber'd,
 While fierce Orlando fought, though near disarm'd,
 Without a wound, from head to foot unharm'd.
 Gradasso rear'd his falchion, at a blow
 Through head and breast to cleave his hated foe.
 He struck, but from his head the shining blade
 Return'd unbat'd, though with the stroke dis-
 may'd,

Before Orlando's sight the dazzling meteors play'd
 Ho dropt the reins ; his grasp had lost the sword,
 But to his wrist a chain the hilt secur'd. 749
 Scar'd with the thundering blow, the courser bore
 The knight of Anglant round the sandy shore ;
 The knight all senseless, while he kept his seat,
 Nor knew his fight, nor rul'd the curbing bit.
 Gradasso, with Bayardo, swift pour'd,
 And soon had reach'd, but turning round he view'd
 King Agramant to certain death expos'd,
 With whom the son of Monodant had clos'd ; 758
 Whose left hand seiz'd his helmet, while the right
 His beaver opening, at his dazzled sight
 The dagger held, and no defence remain'd
 For him, whose weapon Brandimart had gain'd.
 Gradasso saw, and, furious at the view,
 Orlando left and to his rescue flew.

Now Brandimart (who deem'd that close engag'd
 Gradasso with Anglante's warrior wag'd
 The combat still) his art and force apply'd
 His dagger in the Pagan's throat to hide, 769
 When lo ! Gradasso struck with all his might Behind the helmet of the noble knight.

Father of Heaven⁶³ ! among th' elected blest,
 Vouchsafe to give thy faithful martyr rest !
 Who now, the storm of life's short voyage o'er,
 Has fur'd his sails upon a peaceful shore.

⁶³ The death of Brandimart is one of the most affecting passages in the poem ; and nothing can be finer than this abrupt apostrophe of the poet, when he receives the mortal wound. This idea appears entirely our author's own, and I believe will be allowed to be exceeded by few, if any passages, either in the sublime or pathetic.

How couldst thou, Durindana², ruthless sword !
So wound Orlando, thy unhappy lord,
Before his eyes, without remorse, to end
His life's companion, and his truest friend ? 770

The helm in vain oppos'd the fatal stroke,
Deep in the steel the edge resistless broke ;
Through fold on fold, a dreadful passage made,
And buried in his head the reeking blade.
All pale he fell, while from the gaping wound
A purple deluge flow'd, and droch'd the ground.
When now Orlando from his trance awoke,
As round the field he cast an eager look,
Full soon his dearest Brandimart he view'd, 775
Low stretch'd on earth and gasping in his blood ;
He saw the Pagan near, whose gestures tell,
That by his hand the much-lov'd warrior fell.
Scarce knows he yet, if rage prevails or grief,
But blood, not tears, must only yield relief.

No time for plaints, when fury bears the sway ;
But here we close the book, and here the tale delay.

BOOK XLII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Conclusion of the battle between the three Christian and three Pagan knights. Death of Agramant and Gradasso. Grief of Orlando for the death of Brandimart. Bradamant laments Rogero's breach of faith. Rinaldo consults Malagigi on the absence of Angelica: he hears of her leaving France with Medoro, and resolves to pursue her. He enters the forest of Arden, and is attacked by a dreadful monster: he is delivered by a knight; and afterwards, by drinking at the fountain of Bisdain, is cured of his love for Angelica. He is received and hospitably entertained by a knight of Mantua, who shows him a wonderful cup, by which every married man might prove the fidelity of his wife.

What curb so strong can kindled wrath restrain ?
What iron bit, what adamant chain
(Could such be found) shall in the tortur'd mind
Check fierce revenge, when one to us conjoin'd
In friendship's closest ties, we see subdu'd
By fraud or force, to shame or death pursu'd ?
Should momentary impulse then engage
Our souls to deeds of cruelty and rage,
We merit some excuse, since reason's power
Is lost, while passion rules the frantic hour. 10

² In the romance poem of Aspramonte, we are told, that Milo, father of Orlando, was slain by this same sword in the hand of Almonce.

Drizzomi Almonce, cò subertia e ira,
Con ambe man la spada che non resta,
Inimichevolmente allor lo mira
El colpo fere e caid su la testa
Ogni armadura il brando seco tira
Barbata e cimo la spada rubesta .
Per modo tale allora salutollo
Che con la spada il fesse fino al collo
Eli gentile mangue cade in pissa terra
In quel de manco tutta la possanza
Per Picopia Durindana che l'afferre
Almonce per l'errare di Sir di Franza, &c.
Aspramonte, c. xviii.

Achilles, when he saw Patroclus slain,
In borrow'd armour press the sanguine plain,
Unsated, though his hand the victor slew,
Behind his car the breathless carcass drew.
Such was the wrath, Alphonso¹ ! that inspir'd,
Thy faithful people, when to madness fir'd
They saw thy front receive the hostile stone,
And fear'd in thee, their lives and hopes o'er-
thrown :

In vain entrench'd within their gates and wall
The foes remain'd ; the troops t' avenge thy fall 20
The city storm'd ; nor sex nor age would spare,
And not a wretch was left the news to bear.
Thy life endanger'd to th' un pitying sword
Such license gave—Again to thee restor'd
A few short hours recover'd Bastia's town,
Which late Cordova and Granada won.
Perchance in justice, God thy wound decreed,
With heavier vengeance to pursue the deed
Our foes had wrought, when by their cruel hands
Unhappy Vestidello², held in bands, 30
A victim fell ; whom, while disarm'd, he stood
All spent with toil, and wounds fresh streaming
blood,

A hundred pious swords in pieces bew'd.
To sum up all—no fury can we name
Like that which sets his generous soul on flame,
Who present sees, by some dire force oppress,
His kinsman, lord, or partner of his breast.
No wonder then, if for a friend so lov'd,
Despair and rage at once Orlando mov'd ;
Who saw him senseless stretch'd along the sand 40
By one fierce stroke from fell Gradasso's hand.
As some Nomadian shepherd that has spy'd
A hissing serpent from his presence glide,
Whose venom'd tooth his little son had slain,
That harmless sported on the sandy plain ;
With sudden ire he grasps his knotty oak :
The knight of Angiant so his weapon shook,
(That fated edge which never fails to wound)
And first the wretched Agramant he found ;
Of sword disarm'd with purple gore bedew'd 50
With helm unlac'd, and shield asunder hew'd,
With frequent gashes in the fight receiv'd,
And scarce from Brandimart with life retriev'd ;
Like some poor bird, who just escap'd survives
The falcon's gripe, and doubts if yet he lives.
Orlando came, and full the stroke he sped,
Where to the shoulder join'd the crested head :
The helm and gorget loos'd ; the treachant steel
Cut through the neck, and like a poppy fell
The spouting head, while on th' extended shore 60
The Libyan ruler sunk, to rise no more :
To Stygian shade descends his groaning ghost,
By Charon ferried to the burning coast.
Orlando stay'd not long the slain to view,
But with drawn sword on fierce Gradasso flew.

² Vestidello, the governor of the fort, falling into the hands of the Spaniards, was contrary to all martial law slain in cold blood. The Spaniards being afterwards vanquished, were every man put to the sword. Fornari.

When now Gradasso on the field display'd
The headless trunk of Agrament survey'd,
(What ne'er till then befel³) a sudden dead
Benumb'd his veins, his shifting colour fled;
And while the knight of Angiant nearer drew,
It seem'd as if his certain fate he knew.
Already conquer'd, no defence he made,
When high advanc'd he saw the mortal blade.
Orlando on the left the thrust impell'd
Beneath the ribs, till through his belly held
The griding steel, and at the adverse side
Appear'd from hilt to point with crimson dy'd;
And well the force bespoke a warrior's hand,
The first in arms of every martial band,
That with a single wound resistless slew
The bravest champion of the Pagan crew.

But little joyful at his glorious dead,
The Paladin, slighting from his steed,
To Brandimert advanc'd with troubled pace,
The mournful drops fast trickling down his face:
Arriv'd, the gasping warrior's head he view'd
All drown'd in blood, his cask asunder hew'd.
Not less the sylvan bark a tree defends,
When the sharp axe with sweepy sway descends.
With speed Orlando from the dying knight
His helm unlac'd, and saw a dreadful sight:
The sword had cleft, between his manly brows;
Yet floating life a short reprieve allows.
Of Heaven's high mercy, ere he breath'd his last,
To ask forgiveness for his errors past;
With accents mild to soothe Angiant's chief,
Whose tears and sighs declar'd his speechless grief.
"Orlando! when thou mak'st to God thy prayer,
Thy friend," he cried, "in thy remembrance bear:
To thy dear trust I leave—" he would have said
"My Fiordin⁴—but there his spirit fled:
His feeble accents half her name express'd,
But cruel death came on, and chok'd the rest.
The voice of angels then, in concert sweet,
Was heard in air, as from her mortal seat
The soul releas'd in strains of hallow'd love,
Ascended swift to endless joys above.

³ The death of Gradasso is very similar to the death of the soldier in Tasso, who in the same manner is seized with a sudden panic, attended with a prelude of his approaching fate.

See Jerusalem Deliver'd, book xx. ver. 686.

⁴ In this beautiful passage, it was thought advisable to avoid a close translation, where though the thought is affecting in the original, the expression would be ludicrous in English the Italian says,

A te raccomendo la mia Fiordl ———

Mar dir non pote—ligi—o qui finia.

Sir John Harrington has ventured the same in his translation:

To thee I recommend my dearest Fiordl———

And—ligo—he would have said—but there did end.

Likewise Mr. Huggins:

Nor less to you, I trust, my dear Fiordl———

—Liege he could not speak forth—here made an end.

The circumstance itself is naturally just, and occurs in several poets:

She half pronounc'd your name with her last breath,
And buried half within her———

Dryden's All for Love,

Orlando, while his faith rejoic'd to view
Heaven's high reward an end so pure pursue;
To know his Brandimert supremely blest,
And see Heaven opening to receive its guest;
Yet such the frailty of the human heart,
Still nature eluders from a friend to part;
One link'd so close, a brother scarce so dear,
Without the tribute of a tender tear.

Long on the ground Sobrino's limbs were spread,
And fast his veins their vital current shed:
Still Olivero lay in woeful state,
Nor yet has freed, nor from the galling weight
Can free his foot, which, crush'd with piercing pain,
His heavy courser press'd against the plain;
And but Orlando came his aid to lend,
(Orlando weeping for his slaughtered friend)
Himself had vainly from the sonndering steed
Essay'd to move; but when, at length, he freed
Th' imprison'd limb, he scarce could tread the ground,

While thrilling smart through every nerve he found;
As by surrounding friendly arms upheld
His fainting steps he dragg'd along the field.

Orlando on his conquest little thought,
A cooquest deem'd, alas! too dearly bought!
He mourn'd his Brandimert's untimely fate,
And much he fear'd his kinman's dangerous state.
He found Sobrino, from the dreadful strife,
Surviving still; but scarce of lengthen'd life
Affording hope, so much the purple tide
From many a wound his aged veins had dry'd,
Him bath'd in blood, the generous victor gave
To skilful hands with healing arts to save,
And strives himself each wounded thought to calm

With gentle words of friendship's sovereign balm.
Such was this ear! the fight's stern trial o'er,
Compassion sway'd, where fury sway'd before.

But here Fulgoso⁵ seems to doubt my tale;
For when on Afric's coast he spread the sail,
Each port he search'd, and landed here he found
The isle so mountainous, so rough the ground,
Scarce in a soil, unform'd for human feet,
Six nights, the flower of all the world could meet,
And from their steeds so fierce in battle vie:
Fulgoso thus, and thus I make reply.

In elder times, beneath the rocky height,
There stretch'd a plain extending to the right;
Till, by an earthquake, shaken from its base,
The mountain fell, and cover'd all the place.

O thou, the glory of Fulgoso's line,
In whom such lustre shall for ever shine,
If e'er thy censures here the story blame,
Perchance before the chief⁶, whose mighty fame
Extends so far; by whom thy country known
The choicest blessings of desir'd repose,
O deign from falsehood's name to clear my lays,
And say my Muse unsully'd truth conveys.

Now sad Orlando casting o'er the tide
His sharpen'd night, a alcedar bark espy'd,

⁵ Fulgoso or Fregoso, archbishop of Salerno, had it seems objected to the probability of this part of Ariosto's story: but the poet artfully defends himself, by alleging, that the face of the country had been entirely changed by an earthquake.

⁶ Octavian Fregoso, brother of Frederico, doge of Genoa, who put an end to all the factions in the republic.

That with spread canvass o'er the billows flew,
 And near the shores of Lepadusa drew.
 But whence she came? shall fill some future page.
 More themes than one must now the Muse engage:
 To France we turn, to mark their joy or woe, 170
 Since late they wrought the Pagan's overthrow,
 But first we turn to what the dames befel,
 Who bade her shipwreck'd peace a long farewell:
 The faithful Bradamant, who heard in vain
 Before the Saracens and Christian train,
 Rogero's vows, since banish'd from his mind,
 These with her hopes were lost in empty wind.
 Again her sorrows and her plights she pours,
 Too oft companions of her lonely hours.
 She calls Rogero cruel to the trust 180
 Her love repos'd—she calls her fate unjust!
 Then gives a loose to grief—of Heaven complains,
 At once its goodness and its power arraigns:
 That Heaven, which could such perjury survey,
 And not a sign of heavenly wrath display.
 Melissa she condemns; and him who gave
 Dark oracles from his mysterious cave,
 Whose lying prophecies her breast could move,
 And plunge her deeper in the sea of love.
 Then to Marphisa off her step she turns, 190
 To her full oft her brother's falsehood mourns:
 To her she sighs; to her she vents her grief,
 Hangs on her breast, and weeping begs relief.
 Round her lov'd friend her arms Marphisa throws,
 And every comfort, words can yield, bestows;
 Tells her, that ne'er Rogero will deceive
 Her heart's dear hope, but all her fears relieve:
 Or, should he not return, she vows to face
 The man whose actions could his line disgrace;
 Force him with her to prove his sword in fight, 200
 Or keep his faith, and do his mistress right.
 These friendly words awhile comov'd the fair,
 For grief imparted oft alleviates care.

While thus on Bradamant's affliction preys,
 Learn if her brother happier leads his days,
 Whom every nerve the fires of love inflame,
 Throb in his pulse, and kindle in his breast:
 Yet less her beauty, than the potent spell
 Had fix'd his soul in amorous bonds to dwell.
 Since France at length had crush'd her numerous foes, 210

The other Paladins in peace repose:
 Among the victors he alone remains
 A wretched captive in a woman's chains.
 Full many an envoy in her search he sent,
 Himself as oft with vain inquiries went;
 His kinsman Malagigi now he sought,
 On whom he oft repos'd each burthen'd thought:
 To him, with reddening cheek and eye deprest,
 The knight reveal'd each secret of his breast;
 And begg'd him to disclose where distant rovd 220
 The fair Angelica, his best beloved.

He said; when Malagigi's wonder grew
 At this unlock'd-for tale, since well he knew
 A hundred times²⁰ Rinaldo might have led
 The willing fair-one to partake his bed;

That oft himself had try'd the knight to move,
 By prayers and threats, to bend him to her love.
 In vain—though love from him had freedom gain'd
 For Malagigi, in her bonds detain'd.
 But now, crush'd, spontaneous would he give 230
 A heart the fair vouchsaf'd not to receive.
 He bade him call to mind how oft his score
 Had made him pierce'd with love an ill return;
 And how himself, in dreary dungeons laid,
 Had nearly fall'n, for vows so ill repaid,
 A guiltless victim to th' offended maid.

Rinaldo still pursues the dear request,
 And moves compassion in his kinsman's breast:
 The past offence no more in mind he bears,
 But willing succour at his word prepares. 240
 He for reply appoints some future day,
 And sends the impatient fall of hopes away.

Now Malagigi to the place retir'd,
 Where, when his schemes infernal aid requir'd,
 He calls the demon forth, where, dark as night,
 And inaccessible to mortal sight,
 A groto stands, enclos'd by hills that rise
 In craggy steep, and shoot into the skies.
 His book he opens, calls the fiends aloud,
 And round in bands the heads obedient crowd: 250
 Of these selecting one, best skill'd to show
 Each maze of love, from him he seeks to know
 What cause had soften'd thus Rinaldo's heart,
 That late, unpleas'd, repell'd each amorous dart.
 He learns what passions different streams inspire,
 How one creates, and one absorbs desire:
 How every ill the breast from one receives,
 The other with a simple draught relieves.
 He hears Rinaldo chas'd the stream to taste 260
 By which ere love and love-born passions chas'd;
 That hence he scorn'd Angelica the fair
 With breast unfeeling, fill his cruel star
 Led him to quaff the spring, whose virtuous power
 Inflam'd his soul for charms he shunn'd before.
 By cruel stars, by cruel fate he came
 In that cool spring to catch the lover's flame:
 For lo! Angelica by chance arriv'd

To drink the adverse stream, of sweets depriv'd,
 That from her heart each tender thought expell'd,
 And made her hate whom once she dearly held: 270
 While he the like reverse of passion prov'd,
 And where he scorn'd, he now as sorely lov'd.
 This wondrous fortune thus the knight befel
 The demon told, and fail'd no less to tell
 How to the Moor Medoro's youthful arms
 Angelica resign'd her virgin charms;
 Then how the fair Europe's oftens forsook,
 And through th' unstable flood her voyage took,
 Her vessel leaching from Hispania's land
 With spreading sails for India's spicy strand. 280

Now at th' appointed hour Rinaldo fires
 To learn his fate, when Malagigi tries
 To turn his thoughts from one who could disgrace
 With such a partner her illustrious race;
 And for her realms had left the Christian shore,
 That little now avail'd to seek her more;
 Who with Medoro plough'd the fenny sea,
 And now had measur'd more than half her way.

With mind prepar'd accustomed to bet scorn
 The fair's departure would the knight have borne:

affected, particularly in the Joyous Garden, in which place he was deccey'd by the wile of Mala-gigi. See Note to Book xxi. ver. 658.

⁴ The Fountain of Love, so often mentioned in Boyardo and Ariosto, the water of which had inspired Rinaldo's passion for Angelica.

⁵ Alluding to several parts of the Orlando Inna-morato, where Angelica used every art to gain his VOL. XII.

He came, resolv'd already for her sake 129
To furthest Ind his toilsome course to take:
But when he heard a Pagan youth possess'd
The first dear blessings of her maiden breast,
He sigh'd—he rav'd—his grief to phreny rose;
This woe by far surpass'd his former woe:
He strove to speak, but speech his tongue for-

sook;
His pulse beat quick, his lips convulsive shook;
And stung with jealous pangs, the wretched knight
Abrupt withdrew from Malagigi's sight. 300

But when his first surprise and plaints were o'er,
He bent his thoughts to visit India's shore:
For this, from Pepin's son he leave obtain'd,
And urg'd the plea, that by Gradasso gain'd
In shameful wise, in stain of knightly race,
His steed Bayardo, to his great disgrace,
Was thither borne, where, to retrieve his fame
He hasten'd, lest the Pagan should proclaim,
With lying vaunts, he won by sword and lance
The courser from a Paladin of France. 310

Loth was the king, yet could but ill deny
A suit where justice urg'd him to comply.
Dismiss'd by Charles, the knight his way pursu'd,
Though France with sorrow his departure view'd:
Dudon and Guido would his perils share,
But he alone would every peril dare.

Paris he leaves, his soul with anguish burns,
And now he sighs, and now he weeps by turns.
Remembrance still his anxious soul employs
When smiling Fortune proffer'd all her joys 320

That beauty gives, to bless his happy arms,
And when his folly spurn'd the proffer'd charms.
How did he then the precious moments waste!
How willing would he now redeem the past!

And could he call them back, how gladly pay
With life the rapture of a single day!
Reflection still was busy in his mind,
To think a youth of such ignoble kind

Could from her heart so soon all trace remove
Of worth and truth, that claim'd her nobler love.
With thoughts like these still ranking at his breast,
Rinaldo to the East his course address'd; 331

To Basilea bound, the Rhine he pass'd,
And enter'd Arden's dreary shades at last.
As many a mile the Paladin pursu'd
His venturous way amidst the lonely wood,

From towns and cities far remote, expos'd
To perils dire, with deepening wilds enclos'd;
A sudden darkness¹¹ o'er the sky was spread,
Th' affrighted Sun in clouds conceal'd his head, 340

And from a cavern, veil'd in darkest night,
A female monster rush'd, abhorr'd to sight!

¹¹ This beautiful passage has a near resemblance to Spenser's fiction of the monster Error, in the Fairy Queen: many circumstances are similar in both poets: the gloom of a vast forest heightened with a storm: the attack of the monster upon the knight,—all exquisitely painted in the English and Italian author; but the horror seems more strongly worked up in Ariosto; while Spenser with all his excellence must be condemned for suffering his fancy to degenerate into a loathsome and disgusting picture. See Fairy Queen, book l. c. i.

The reader of taste will here recollect the fine poetical painting in Dryden's Theodora and Honoria, where the spectres of the hunter and virgin appear to Theodora. See Dryden's Fables.

Her thousand eyes a watch eternal keep,
No lids were seen to close their orbs in sleep:
As many ears her head terrific bear,
And hissing snakes supply the place of hairs.
A horrid serpent for her tail appears,
That o'er her breast his curling volumes rears.
From Hell's dire gloom, where howling fiends lament,

This dreadful demon to the world was sent. 350
What ne'er till then had touch'd Rinaldo's breast
In many a field of death, he now confess'd.

Soon as the monster met his startled view,
And swift t'assail him near and nearer drew;
A terror, more than mortal can sustain,
Congeal'd his blood, and crept through every vein;

Yet wanted courage in his looks he feign'd,
And drew his weapon with a trembling hand.
The cruel fiend, well practis'd in the field, 359

Began the assault, and round the warrior wheel'd,
Her venom'd snake she brandish'd as she came,
And at Rinaldo bent her baleful aim:

She leaps upon him with a furious bound:
Now here, now there, Rinaldo shifts the ground:
He deals direct and sidelong many a blow,
But none he deals can reach his hated foe.

The fiend applies her serpent to his breast¹²,
Beneath his mail he feels the dreadful pest
Cold at his heart: now on his helm it rides;
Now o'er his face, now round his neck it glides. 370

Rinaldo, terrified, his fiery steed
Gores with the spur, and urges all his speed:
But the dire fiend, that follows like the wind,
Vaults with a bound, and grasps him close behind!

Whether direct or short his course he wheels,
Still at his back the pest accurs'd he feels:
In vain each art to shake her thence he tries,
And with arm'd heel his rapid courser plies.

Trembles, like autumn-leaves, Rinaldo's heart:
The freezing snake clings close to every part: 380
He groans—he howls—and shuddering with affright
He calls aloud for death, and loaths the light.

Through bogs, through brakes, through thorny ways and rude,
Through thickest covert of th' entangling wood,
He flew, in hopes to loosen from behind

Th' infernal fiend, whose snake his limbs entwinn'd.
At length, in arms of shining steel array'd,
A knight appear'd that brought him timely aid:
His crest a broken yoke, and in his shield

Red flames he bore, upon a yellow field: 390
With flames his surcoat was embroiler'd o'er;
And such the trappings which his courser wore.

His hand the spear, his side the sword retain'd,
His saddle-bow a burning mace sustain'd:
A mace, that stor'd with fire eternal, sent
Flash after flash, that never could be spent;

Against whose power nobuckler would avail,
Nor toughest helm, nor strongest temper'd mail;
But all gave way where'er the champion turn'd
His dreadful arms, that unextinguish'd burn'd. 400

No less a power could succour here bestow
To free the warrior from his ruthless foe.

¹² See Virgil, Æneid vii. ver. 346.
Huic Dea cæruleis unum de crinibus anguem
Conjicit— Virgil.

Snatch'd from her hissing locks a snake she threw,
And through his inmost soul the fiery serpent flew.
Pitt, v. 415

The stranger-knight, who heard Rinaldo's cries,
His courser spurs, and to his rescue flies;
And soon he views the fiend whose snake enroll'd
Rinaldo's limbs in many a winding fold:
Who glow'd with feverish heat, or shook with freezing cold.

Swift came the knight, against her side he thrust
His potent spear, and hurl'd her in the dust:
She fell; but soon again the earth forsook, 410
And rear'd aloft her venom'd serpent shook
In spiral wreaths: no longer will the knight
With javelin, but with fire pursue the fight:
He grasps his mace, and where the serpent curls
Her rattling scales, or where in length unfurls,
With ceaseless aim he drives the fiery blows
Like crushing storms, nor rest nor pause allows.
While thus his weapon's unresisted way
Or drives the monster back, or holds at bay;
He bids the Paladin the path pursue 420
That from the thickets to the mountain drew.
He said—the Paladin observant flies,
And backward fears to cast his loathsome eyes:
Nor stays, till far beyond the monster's sight,
Though rough the path and arduous is the height.
Meanwhile the champion to her dismal cell
Has driven by force the ghastly child of Hell;
There, while in fury for her frustrate will,
She gnaws her flesh; her breast black poisons fill,
And from her thousand eyes eternal tears distill.

The victor then impell'd his courser's speed 431
To join Rinaldo, and in safety lead
From those drear wilds: and on the ascending height
O'ertook, and stood beside the gentle knight.

Rinaldo now with grateful words repaid
His service done—"Accept my thanks," he said,
"Though thanks are poor, when life can scarce re-

pay
The glorious aid of this adventurous day.
Give me, at least, to learn thy name, and know
To whom, sir knight, I such deliverance owe; 440
And tell to Charles, and all his peers around,
Thy matchless valour, and thy praise rebound."
To whom the knight—"My name yet unreveal'd,
Be not displeas'd if still I keep conceal'd:
This shalt thou learn, before the noontide shade
A foot has lengthen'd o'er the dewy glade."

In converse thus they journey'd till they found
A crystal fount, that oft with murmuring sound
Strangers and swains allur'd its draughts to prove,
And quaff a long oblivion of their love. 450

These are the cooling waters that assuage,
(O mighty prince!) the heat of amorous rage;
From which Angelica her hatred drew,
From which Rinaldo's first aversion grew.

The knight, who with Rinaldo came and view'd
Where the clear stream the bordering plants be-dew'd,

As faint with heat and toil, his courser stay'd:
"Here let us rest awhile"—the stranger said.
"Well may we here," Rinaldo cries, "repose,
Now with those rays meridian Phœbus glows: 460
My limbs unnerv'd so sorely late oppress
By that dire fiend, would gladly welcome rest."
Thus they; when each alighting, gave his steed
To rove at large, and through the forest feed:
Each from his head the radiant helm unlac'd,
And on the turf with flowers enamel'd plac'd.

⁴³ Cardinal Hippolito, his patron.

Rinaldo then, oppress with thirst and heat,
To the smooth mirror bent his eager feet;
At one cool draught its sovereign virtue prov'd,
And thirst, and heat, and love at once remov'd. 470

Soon as the knight unknown beheld him sip
The cooling stream, and raise his moisten'd lip,
And saw his heart estrang'd from Cupid's fire,
Repentant now of every food desire,
Erect he rose, and with a lofty look,
Himself disclos'd, and in these accents spoke:
"Know then, Rinaldo, I am call'd Dardain,
And hither come to break thy galling chain."
He said; and instant vanish'd from the view,
And with the knight his phantom-steed withdrew.
Rinaldo, speechless, cast around his eyes: 481
"Where is my champion fled?"—Amaz'd, he cries.
All this th' effect of magic art he thought,
Some friendly spell by Malagigi wrought,
To break that yoke, which long, with galling

pain,
His tyrant passion forc'd him to sustain:
Or, haply, God, in his eternal love,
Had, from his holy hierarchy above,
An angel sent, his saving grace to deal,
As once he sent him Tobit's eyes to heal. 490
But whether fiend from Hell, or saint from Heaven,
Had to his captive soul her freedom given,
To him all thanks were due, by whom his heart
Was cur'd of love, and every amorous smart.

To India still he purpos'd to proceed,
In Sericana to regain his steed;
For this his honour claim'd, and this he vow'd,
When royal Charles his earnest suit allow'd.
Next day to Basilea's town he came;
But ere he reach'd it, thither spread the fame 500
That earl Orlando stood prepar'd for fight
With Agramant and Sericana's¹⁴ knight.

Thus went the tale—nor was the tale believ'd
By message from Anglaute's lord receiv'd;
But on, who late his eager voyage sped
From Sicily, the certain tidings spread.
Fain would Rinaldo (though remov'd afar)
The glorious combat with Orlando share:
Full many a mile he tir'd full many a steed, 509
And many a guide—impatience wing'd his speed.
The Rhine he pass'd, and now his way pursu'd
O'er Alpine steeps, now Italy he view'd;
Now Mantua and Verona he forsook,
And 'cross the Po his rapid journey took.

Already westward far declin'd the Sun,
And in the skies the star of evening shone;
When, as beside the river's winding flood
Debating with himself Rinaldo stood
To change his steed, or there remain till night
Should fly th' approach of next Aurora's light; 520
Sudden before his eyes a knight¹⁵ was seen,
Of comely feature and of courteous mien,
Who, first with fair salute, besought to know
If e'er his lips had seal'd the marriage vow.

¹⁴ Gradasso.

¹⁵ It appears that the appellation of Cavaliere (knight) is not always confined by our author to the military character of a wandering champion, but here, and in other places, is given to those who do not appear to have any concern in the profession of arms. Perhaps Cervantes had this idea when he made Don Quixote entitle a stranger, whom he met, the knight of the Green Cassock.

Rinaldo then—"I wear the nuptial yoke!¹⁷
Yct much he mus'd at what the stranger spoke;
Whothous rejoic'd—"Well pleas'd thy words I hear,
And that my deeds may speak my meaning clear,
Vouchsafe, sir knight, the proffer'd grace to take Beneath my roof till morn abode to make: 530
There shalt thou see, what he must surely prize,
By whom in bed a wedded partner lies."

Rinaldo, with a length of toil oppress'd,
Not ill dispos'd to relish offer'd rest;
And ever prompt, with noble thoughts, to view,
Or hear of wonders and adventures new,
Full gladly yielded with the knight to stay,
And, turning, follow'd as he led the way.

Now from the track an arrow's flight they came,
And reach'd a palace of stupendous frame, 540
Whence issu'd many a squire with duteous haste,
That kindled torches bore, whose brightest chas'd
The gloom of night: Rinaldo, entering, gaz'd
Around the spacious pile with looks amaz'd:
It seem'd no private treasure could dispense
Such regal cost, and proud magnificence.

The outward gate with solid beauty shone
Of polish'd porphyry and Parian stone;
The folding valves of bronze, with figures grac'd,
Which seem'd to live and move in sculpture chas'd,
Beneath the leading arch, admiring eyes 551
Saw various forms in rich Mosaic rise.

A square was seen within of ample space:
A range of fair apartments every face
Supply'd; a gate for every front was rear'd:
To every gate an inner arch appear'd
Of varied ornament, but equal state,

And smooth th' ascent to every arch and gate.
An arch above each winding staircase show'd 559
To some fair hall that rich with splendour glow'd.

Each upper arch extending from the side,
A covering for the gate below supply'd,
Where two strong columns, by a master hand,
Of bronze, or stone, the massy weight sustain'd.

Hard were the task, not only to recite
Each rare device that charm'd the gazing knight,
But what, unseen, might speak in many a part
The woodrout builder's subterranean art.

With golden capitals vast pillars rais'd,
Supported roofs that brist with jewels blas'd. 570
Marble from every clime was thither brought,
By artists' hands in various figures wrought.

Each pictur'd form was there, the pencil's boast,
With every elegance of skill and cost:

And such the whole, that scarcely could suffice
A kingdom's wealth to pay the mighty price.

Amid the countless works of art and pride,
Which this transcendent matchless dome supply'd,
A fountain cool its piteous streams bestow'd,
That in a hundred rills meand'ring flow'd. 580

Near this a menial train of dameels plac'd
The festive board with savoury viands grac'd,
Which in the centre fix'd, on every hand
Could the four portals of the pile command.

Th' unequal architect here seem'd to exhaust
Each proof of learned skill, or sumptuous cost.

Eight fountains the fountain show'd, and o'er the head
A canopy of gold and azure spread.

Eight marble statues, snowy white, sustain'd
The ceiling with their left; their better hand 590

Held Amalthea's horn¹⁸, whence waters tripl'd,
And in an alabaster vase distill'd
With gurgling sound: each female sculptur'd frame
The features bore of some illustrious dame,
Alike in habit, but unlike in face,
Though equal all in beauty and in grace.

Each image for her pedestal was rear'd
On two bold figures that beneath appear'd,
And by their looks and gesture seem'd to raise
For those fair dames the song of tuneful praise. 600
The lower statuas scrolls of writing held,
That told their names, and how each dame excel'd
In virtuous lore, and while the scroll made known
The female names, no less reveal'd their own.

Rinaldo, by the torches' light, display'd
The dames and worthies ooe by one survey'd.
The first inscription bore Lucretia's name,
Lucretia Borgia¹⁹, who for spotless fame
And lovely form her native Rome shall praise,
Above the first renown'd in ancient days. 610

The sculpture next proclaim'd the generous pair,
Who chose her eyes-honour'd weight to bear,
Antonio Tedaldeo²⁰; with him join'd
Hercules Strozza²¹; where, in both combin'd,
Another Orpheus and a Linus shin'd.

Not less in grace and beauty to behold
The next were seen, and thus the writing told,
"Lo! Isabella of Ferrara²², born
Of Hercules, her country to adorn,

On whom benignant Fortune shall bestow 620
Each gift that birth or lofty rank can know,
To bless her native land in weal or woe.

The two by whom her glory stands proclaim'd
Are Berdelone and Calandro²³ nam'd."

The third and fourth, where soft in murmuring tides

The water from the rich pavilion glides,

¹⁷ Jupiter, when an infant, was brought up by two nymphs of Crete, called Melissa and Amalthea: a goat, belonging to the latter, having broken his horn, Amalthea filled it with fruits and carried it to Jupiter, who afterwards placed it in Heaven, and called it after his nurse, Amalthea's horn: it has always been, with poets, the symbol of plenty.

¹⁸ Daughter of Alexander Borgia, and wife to duke Alphonso.

¹⁹ Antonio Tedaldeo, a poet in the time of Ariosto: he died in the eightieth year of his age, being plunged in a deep melancholy. When the victorious Charles V. returned from his conquest in Africa, and passed in triumph before the house of Tedaldeo, he ordered his doors and windows to be shut, that he might not see him, being offended that he had not taken vengeance for the sack of Rome.—Hercules Strozza, of Ferrara, was son of Tito the poet, but excelled his father; his passion for the fair sex was the occasion of his death. He was deeply in love with a noble and beautiful widow named Tanvella, whom he married, but was afterwards assassinated by his rival in the street.

Are two fair dames, that equal place may claim
For virtue, beauty, country, race and fame.
Elisabetta²⁰ here; and at her side
These Leonora²¹, both the Mantuan pride: 650
Mantua, whose city boasts not more renown
To call great Virgil here, than these to own.
Beneath the first ware Sadoletto²² plac'd,
And Petro Bembo²³ (both in sculpture grac'd),
Castiglione²⁴ and Arelio²⁵ stood,
And with the other glorious barthen bow'd.
All these the sculptor'd marble fair proclaim'd,
Unknown as then, but since in story fam'd.
Behold her next, to whom indignant Heaven 659
Shall give each grace that e'er on Earth was given.
The scroll Lucretia Bentivoglio²⁶ show'd,
And told, amidst her other praise bestow'd,
That to Ferrara's duke her birth she ow'd.
For her a sweet Camillo²⁷ tunes the strings;
The Rhine and clear Felsina, as he sings,
With equal wonder hear, with equal praise,
As once Amphyrus heard his shepherd's lays.
See one extoll'd o'er all (where smoothly glides Jannus' waters sweet to ampler tides),
From parching Indus to the Moorish coast, 650
From Southern heat to Hyperborean frost;
Great Posthumus²⁸; to whom a double wreath
Pallas shall there and Phobus here bequesth.
Next stood Diana²⁹ with a lofty air,
But heart as gentle as her face was fair:
Learn'd Celio Calcagnino³⁰ shall proclaim
Her honours, and extend her virtuous name,

²⁰ Elisabetta was sister to Francesco Gonzago, marquis of Mantua, and wife to Guidobaldo, duke of Urbino. Leonora, daughter to the before-mentioned marquis, and afterwards to Francesco Mario della Rovere, who was by means of Julius II. created duke of Urbino. Fornari.

²¹ Sadoletto, first a bishop, and then a cardinal, created by Paul III. He published many theological subjects, and was an excellent poet: Bembo called him his colleague, on account of the similarity of their manners.—Bembo composed a book in praise of him and the wife of Guidobaldo. Sadoletto was secretary to pope Leo X. and signed the diploma granted to Ariosto's poem: he wrote two poems, called Curius, and Laocoon: he died at Rome, anno 1547, aged 70. Fornari.

²³ Natural daughter of the duke of Ferrara, allied by marriage to the family of the Bentivoglio of Bologna. Fornari.

²⁴ Camillo Paleotta, a countess in the court of cardinal Bibiena, of the country of Bologna; by Felsina, he means Bologna; by the Rhine, not the river that divides France from Germany, but a river so called near Bologna. Fornari.

²⁵ He means Guido Posthumus, who celebrated the praises of Lucretia Bentivoglio. Fornari.

²⁶ Diana of Este, a lady of excellent beauty, but of haughty deportment and manners. Fornari.

²⁷ Of Ferrara, and a canon of the church, an elegant writer in prose and verse. Fornari.

With sounding trumpet, to Moncer's land³¹;
To Jubah's realms, to Spain and India's strand:
Marco Cavallo³² shall her praises sing, 660
And in Ancona ope the Muse's spring;
As once the winged steed diado'd the rill
In Helicon or Parnassus' bill.
Next Beatrice³³ her lovely figure rais'd,
Whom thus in few the polish'd marble prais'd:
"While living, Beatrice her lord shall bless,
And dying, in his breast extinguish peace."
With her, shall Italy the palm obtain,
But, losing her, shall feel the captive's chain.
Corregio³⁴ seems fur her verse to raise, 670
For her Timotheo³⁵ seems to swell the lays:
Their tuneful lyres the river's banks shall fill,
That saw their trees rich amber tears distil.

A statue, form'd of alabaster, stood,
Whose mien sublime some dame illustrious show'd³⁶,
Such as in robes of simplest fashion drest,
Without or gold or gems, or silken vest,
Would rise in charms the fairest dames above,
As o'er the rest the silver star of love. 670
'T were hard to speak what most adorn'd her face,
Superior beauty, majesty, or grace;
Or that which bright in every feature shi'd,
The beaming index of her spotless mind.
Vast were the task for her the voice to raise,
(The marble said) for who shall speak her praise?
While in the beauteous statue above conrest
The gentlest virtues of the female breast;
Yet seem'd she to disdain the numbers rude
Of him who singly her supporter stood.
For be alone to chant her worth remain'd 690
Without a partner, and her weight sustain'd.
Of every other was the name reveal'd;
These only two the sculptor's art conceal'd.

The statues, rang'd, an ample circle made,
Where above the floor with coral, rich inlaid,
The crystal waters, with a plaintive sound,
Attention lull'd, and scatter'd coolness round;
Together blending in a channell'd bed,
Through verdant turf their stealing course they led,
And sin'd in streams the plants and flowers fed.
The Paladin, refresh'd with wine and food, 701
Here with his courteous host discourse pursu'd,
And oft remind'd of his promis'd word,
When first invited to his friendly board:

³¹ Kingdoms of Parthia and Mauritania, where these princes reigned. Fornari.

³² Of the city of Ancona. He composed many verses: he was extremely addicted to gaming, and was at last found dead in his bed, with five hundred crowns tied to his arm. Fornari.

³³ Daughter of Hercules of Ferrara.

³⁴ Nicolo da Corregio, held in great esteem by the Italian nobility, and chiefly by Hercules I. He wrote in octave stanzas a poem called Psyche, and another called Aurora. Corregio is the name of the castle held by the illustrious family of the Corregio of Parma.—Timotheo Benedes, of Ferrara, a man of literature. Fornari.

³⁵ Some suppose this to have been the widow, the kinswoman of Vesputci, with whom our poet became so enamour'd in Florence, and whom he alludes to by that simile in the sixth Book, where Zerbino is wounded by Mandricardo, as mentioned in his life; and that by the statue who support her, he figures himself.

While by his looks Rinaldo saw express'd
Some heavy anguish labouring at his breast,
Which still, from time to time, the sighs supply'd,
That, half repress'd, in sounds imperfect died.
A strong desire Rinaldo oft impell'd 709
To learn his grief, but fear his speech withheld,
A fear t' offend—at length, the banquet o'er,
Behold a page whose hand the goblet bore ;
This fram'd of gold, before the knight he plac'd,
Within with wine, without with jewels grac'd.
The lord of that fair dwelling, with a look
Half smiling, then his noble guest bespoke.
He smil'd; but each who mark'd him, well might find

Less joy than anguish in his secret mind,
Then he—"What long thy wish aspires to know,
Which late I promis'd—time demands to show: 720
Lo! there the gift, that each must surely prize
Within whose arms a wedded partner lies.
Mothinks each husband should desire to prove,
How far his wife maintains her plighted love:
If shame or honour he from her receives,
If, by her means, a man or beast he lives:
Light sits the burthen on the horned brows,
Though all the world its infamy allows:
While other eyes behold, the head that wears
The wretched antlers feels not what it bears. 730
If thou hast try'd, and prov'd thy consort true,
From thee more love, more rightful praise is due,
Than she from him might claim who thought her just,

But ne'er has had, and took her faith on trust.
How oft have some, through jealousy, pursu'd,
Without a cause, the gentle and the good?
How oft, secure, their lives have others led,
Yet borow the branching honours of the head?
If thou wouldst learn how chaste thy wife belov'd.
Whom, deeming such, thou never yet hast prov'd.
Thou mayst thyself, from others' lips untold, 741
By drinking in this vase the truth behold:
See here my promise—hence thy draught essay,
And strange effects the vessel shall display.
If on thy head thou bear'st the scornful crest,
The wine will all be shed upon thy breast:
No drop can reach thy taste—but should thy wife
Be found to lead a chaste and blameless life,
With pleasure shalt thou drain the goblet dry—
In happy time, sir knight, thy fortune try." 750

* * *
"From the romance of Morte Arthur, is borrowed Ariosto's tale of the enchanted cup; which in Caxton's old translation is as follows: 'By the way they met with a knight, that was sent from Morgan la Fay to king Arthur; and this knight had a fair horn all garnished with gold, and the horn had such a virtue, that there might no lady or gentlewoman drink of that horn, but if she were true to her husband; and if she were false, she should spill all the drink; and if she were true unto her lord, she might drink peaceably, &c. c. xlii. 98.' Afterwards many trials were made. The inimitable Fontaine has new-moulded this story, under the title of La Coupe Enchantée."
Warton's Observations on Spenser, H. i. c. xxxix.

An Italian commentator on Dante thinks, that Ariosto drew this fiction of the cup from a much earlier source. "Pliny speaks of a river named Olicha, whose waters appear boiling hot to those who have been guilty of perjury. The same was

He said; and kept his eyes intent to view
Th' overflowing vase Rinaldo's breast embrace.
Rinaldo, strongly tempted to decide
What he perchance might after wish untry'd,
Had stretch'd his hand the fatal cup to take,
And now prepar'd the dangerous proof to make;
Yet first, he commu'd with himself how much
He risk'd with lips the baneful gold to touch.
But here awhile, my lord, I seek repose,
Then, what the Paladin reply'd, disclose. 760

BOOK XLIII.

THE ARGUMENT.

Rinaldo refuses to taste the enchanted cup. His host relates to him the cause of his misfortune. Tale of the Mantuan knight. Rinaldo takes his leave of the knight, and embarks in a vessel to sail down the Po. Description of the places by which he passes. His conversation with the pilot. Tale of Adonio and the judge's wife. Rinaldo pursues part of his journey by land, and then goes by sea to Lipadusa, where he arrives after the battle between the six knights. The news of Brandimart's death brought to Flordelia. Her lamentation. Preparations for the funeral of Brandimart. Orlando's speech over the dead body. The funeral procession. Death of Flordelia. Orlando, Rinaldo, Sobrino, and Olivero, arrive at the island of the hermit, by whom Rogero had been received after the tempest. Olivero's foot is cured, and Sobrino's wounds are healed by the hermit, who gives the latter baptism. Rogero is made known to the other knights.

O wretched Avarice! O thou fiend accurs'd
Hunger for gold! of Virtue's foes the worst!
Well may thy base infect the sordid breast,
By every other human vice possess'd,
Since thou canst fetter in thy cruel chain,
And in thy dreadful gripe his soul detain,
Who, had he escap'd thy power, might justly claim,
For noblest gifts, the foremost rank in fame!
Would one measure earth, and seas, and skies,
And Nature's springs explore with searching
eyes! 10

From known effects can trace each latent cause,
And prove the depth of God's eternal laws.

said of another fountain in Sicily, called Patlicena. Philostatus speaks of a fountain that being tasted by the perjured, deprives them of the use of their limbs, that they are unable to leave the place. An author named Rhamius has these lines:

Diane fons est, Camestina gignitur unda,
Quam si quis manibus non castis hauserit unquam,
Lætifico tristis non miscet pocula Baccho.

There flows a fountain, whose effects proclaim
Its waters sacred to Diana's name;
These borne by hands unchaste, will never glide,
Mix'd in one vase with Bacchus' sprightly tide.

"By these lines it appears, that an unchaste woman could never mix wine with the water of that fountain, which story is likewise told by Silius. I imagine that from this passage Ariosto had the hint of his cup." Defence of Dante.

Poison'd by thee, whose venom can destroy
Each generous thought, he knows no future joy
But heaping wealth—for this he will forgo
Peace, honour, safety, every good below.
One conquers armies, breaks the bulwarks down,
And wins from foes the well-defended town;
In every peril of th' ensanguin'd field,
The first to rush on fate, the last to yield: 20
Thou every virtue from its base wilt shake,
And him till death thy wretched captive make.
By learning, some; by arts, some merit praise;
But touch'd by thee, each envy'd wreath decays.
How shall I speak of noble dames and fair,
Who, scornful of the generous lover's prayer,
Like pillar'd marble cold, obdurate stood,
When youth, and grace, and constant service
wou'd:

Lo! Avarice comes, with all-seducing power,
T' infect their heart, and one detested hour 30
Unloving, gives their youth and bloom of charms
A prey to some old dotard's wither'd arms.
Not without cause such mischiefs I bewail,
Nor think in this I wander from my tale;
Though what I speak relates not here so well
To what is past, as what remains to tell.

Now to the Paladin we turn the strain,
Who seem'd prepar'd the magic bowl to drain:
I told you, ere his lips the draught essay'd,
Awhile debating with his thoughts he stay'd: 40
Then to himself—"Inesate is the mind
Who seeks for that it ne'er would wish to find.
My wife's a woman—all the sex is frail—
But let not hence my good opinion fail:
Till now my faith has made me blest, and why
Should proof itself more certain bliss supply?
Much may I harm, but little mend my state,
And Heaven forbids too far to tempt our fate.
On me let praise or censure man bestow,
Ne'er will I seek what fits me not to know. 50

Hence from my sight this boasted cup remove,
Nor have I thirst, nor mean such thirst to prove,
God more forbids a proof like this to make,
Than our first sire the tree of life to take.
As Adam, when the fatal fruit he try'd,
Which God himself had to his taste deny'd,
Incur'd what pains from disobedience flow;
And fell from highest bliss to deepest woe;
So when a husband, with too curious eye,
Into his wife's recluser deeds would pry, 60
He quits content, his folly to deplore,
And never shall his peace recover more."

As good Rinaldo spoke, he thrust aside
The hateful vase, and looking up, espy'd
The castle's lord, adown whose features stole
Such tears, as spoke the anguish of his soul;
Who thus at length with words impassion'd said:
"Accurs'd the lips that ever could persuade
My wretched heart the dire advice to take.
Which made my much-lov'd wife these arms for-
make! 70

O! had I known thee once, thy prudent thought
To wholesome purpose had my bosom wrought;
Ere yet my woes began—ere yet my sighs
Had learnt to heave, or tears suffus'd my eyes.
But let me lift the veil—nor longer keep
My tale untold, so thou with me shalt weep
My fortune part, while I relate the cause
From which my life its present suffering draws.
"Thou left'st, not far remote, a town behind,
Where round is seen a crystal stream to wind, 80

That thence declining leads to Po its course,
And first from Benaco derives its source.
'This town' was built when time had long decay'd
The walls¹ which once Agenor's offspring² made;
There was I born, of no ingentle blood,
Though lowly plac'd, with little worldly good.
If Fortune riches at my birth deny'd,
The care of Nature other gifts supply'd:
She gave me, far above my humble peers,
Such manly beauty in my early years, 90
Such courteous grace, with comely features join'd,
T' attract the soft regard of womankind,
In dames and maids the flame of love to raise—
But ill it seems myself to speak my praise.

"Within our walls there liv'd a sage, renown'd
For arts occult, beyond belief profound;
Who, ere his days their lengthen'd course had roll'd,
Full six-score suns in annual circles told,
Long time alone in savage wilds he dwelt,
Till, in life's eve, the power of love he felt; 100
Then on a beauteous dame with gold he wrought,
Who, to his stol'n amour, a daughter brought;
And lest the daughter, like the mother, frail,
For wealth should set her chastity to sale;
(Her chastity more worth than all below
Which gold can buy, or honours can bestow;)
From human kind remote, the tender maid
He bred beneath the unfrequented shade,
Where this fair palace, from the world apart,
He caus'd the fends to build by magic art. 110
With ancient matrons bred, in ripening time
His daughter here attain'd to beauty's prime.
He suffer'd not, in youth, her eye or ear
The face of man to view, his voice to hear,
(Himself except;) and that she still might find
Examples fair, he from the female kind
Each noble dame, who ne'er from virtue stray'd,
In sculpture chisled, or in paint pourtray'd:
Not those alone who shone in elder days,
Whose virtues shall survive to latest praise; 120
But every future fair whose worth shall grace,
And add new honours to th' Italian race,
Has here her form in living sculpture chas'd,
As yonder eight are round the fountain plac'd.

"Soon as the father view'd her growing charms
In bloom mature to fill a husband's arms,
Whether 't was chance, or fate my sorrows bred,
He fix'd on me to share his daughter's bed.
Beside this stately dome, the rich domain
Of forest, meadow, fountain, lawn or plain, 130
For many a mile, he in the nuptial hour³
Consign'd me for the virgin's wealthy dower.
Such was her beauty, so transcendent shin'd
Each grace, as left all fancy'd charms behind:
Of female gifts she knew each valu'd part,
And equal'd Pallas in the works of art.
She walk'd—she spoke—she sung—and Heaven was there!
She seem'd a goddess lighted from her sphere;

¹ Mantua. The city of Thebes being destroyed, Manto the daughter of Tiresias fled into Italy; of her was born Cadmus or Bianor, who built Mantua, naming it after his mother. Aristot., in the manner of romance writers, who take every liberty with the old mythology, has made Manto a fairy, and the founder of Mantua.

² He means the city of Thebes, built by Cadmus the son of Agenor.

³ Cadmus.

And such her depth in learning's sacred lore,
That scarce her father's knowledge reach'd to more:
So gentle was her soul, so form'd to love— 161
Still, still remembrance must my torments prove—
On me her joys, her pleasures all were bent,
With me she carry'd, and with me she went.
Long long we led this mutual happy life,
And I, alas! the first dire cause of strife!
Since to my arms I took my lovely bride,
Five years elaps'd, her aged father died—
Ah me!—thenceforth my following woes I date,
Woes now endar'd, which here my lips relate. 150

“While she, whom thus I praise, all praise above,
Secur'd my heart by every tie of love,
It chanc'd that in our land a noble dame
Burnt for my sakes with Cupid's fiercest flame:
No sage enchantress could her power excel,
She knew the force of every magic spell:
The night she lighten'd, or obscur'd the day;
She stopp'd the Sun, or sped his swifter way;
Yet never could allure my faithful heart,
To heal the anguish of her amorous smart, 160
With that relief, I never had bestow'd,
But to her wrong where most my truth I ow'd.
Not all the charms and graces she possess'd,
Not all the love I knew inflam'd her breast;
Not mighty gifts, nor promises renew'd,
With which she day by day her suit pursu'd,
Could shake me from my first dear flame transfer
The smallest spark of amorous heat to her.
My wife's affection, long in duty try'd,
Engross'd each thought, and every wish supply'd:
My hope, my trust in her, had made me scorn 171
The peerless Graciana dame of Leda born;
Had made me scorn each glorious offer made
To shepherd Paris in th' Idæan shade.
But all my firm denials fruitless prov'd
To oppose her suit, whose soul so deeply lov'd.

“It chanc'd Melissa⁵ found me once apart,
(Such was her name so vers'd in magic art),
Far from my home; and fail'd not then to take
Th' occasion fair, my future peace to shake. 180
With stings of jealousy, her cruel skill
Too well she show'd, my rooted faith to kill;
Batalling first my purpose to preserve
All faith to her, that ne'er from faith should swerve.
'But canst thou know thy consort's truth,' she cried,
'Till such by simple proof be fairly tried?
If now she fail not (though perchance her will Assail'd might change) thou think'st her constant still;

While hers confin'd in such sequester'd plan,
Say thine, the scarce beholds the face of man. 190
Whence is thy confidence so firmly plac'd?
And canst thou dare to me affirm her chaste?
But hence, for one short month thy home forgo;
And let each neighbouring town and village know,
That, absent thou, thy dame remains behind;
With message, visits, let each lover find
A free access—if then she be not led
By prayers or gifts to wrong the marriage bed;

⁴ Helen.

⁵ This is totally a different personage from her who is so considerable an agent in the poem, the benevolent enchantress, the constant protectress of Rogero and Bradamant: perhaps it had been more advisable to have avoided the same name.

Yet thinks conceal'd she might her wish pursue,
Then, and then only, mayst thou call her true.' 200
“With words like these, at length, th' enchantress
shook

My weak resolves, and to her purpose broke,
My consort's virtue, ne'er essay'd before,
To fix by trial, and by proof explore.
Then I—'What yet I never can believe,
Should she so far my fondest hopes deceive,
Say, how the truth for certain shall I know,
If praise or censure to her deeds I owe?'
'A goblet will I give, whose magic use,'
Melissa cries, 'can strange effects produce, 210
By fam'd Morgana⁶ made in ancient time,
To apprise her brother of Genecra's crime.
He freely drinks, whose consort merits praise;
Whose wife is false in vain the draught essays:
When to the vessel's brim his lips are prest,
The wine o'erflows and trickles down his breast.
Ere hence thou go'st, thy lips the drink shall try,
And now, I trust, will drain the goblet dry:
As yet I little deem thy wife untrue,
But soon expect a further proof to view: 220
If, when return'd, thou wouldst again ensure
Thy faith, I dare not then thy breast secure:
For if unpill'd thou canst assuage thy thirst,
Of every husband thou in bliss art first.'

“The proffer'd boon I took; her hand display'd
The wondrous cup, and soon the proof I made,
When (all I hop'd) I found my dearest spouse
Still pure and faithful to her nuptial vows.
Melissa then—'Awails thy wife forsake,
And, hence retir'd, thy distant dwelling make. 230
Again returning prove the vase anew,
If clear thou drink'st, or wine thy breast embrace.'
“To me how hard from her my steps to move!
Not that my soul could doubt her truth or love,
But that I never (save with aching heart)
One day, one hour, could from her sight depart.
'Hear then a new device,' Melissa cried,
'By which thy consort's virtue shall be tried:
Thy vesture will I change, thy speech, thy frame,
And as a stranger lead thee to thy dame.' 240

“Not far a village stands, where Po divides
In two defensive horns his parting tides:
Thither the town extends its ruling power,
Where ocean quits, and seeks by turns the shore,
Which, though it boasts not equal age, the fame
Of fair and rich with neighbouring towns may
claim,
Built by the relics of the Trojan band,
That 'scap'd from Attila's destroying band.

⁶ Morgana, according to the romance of the Round Table, was sister to Marco, king of Cornwall, the husband of Genecra, who for the love of sir Lancelot forgot the faith she owed her husband. Morgana showed him the infidelity of his wife by the effects of the enchanted cup.

⁷ After the destruction of Troy, Antenor, with a company of Paphlagonians, took up his habitation between the Adige and the Brenta, where he built Padua; but that city being afterwards demolished by Attila, that scourge of nations, the inhabitants that escaped his fury retired to the Adriatic sea, where they laid the foundation of the city of Venice; and some passing from that place built Ferrara. Parnacchi, Eugenio.

A comely knight, young, noble, who excel'd
In courtly grace, here large possessions held, 230
Who, as he once his falcon's flight persud,
My palace enter'd and my consort view'd,
Her form so far in one short meeting gain'd,
The deep impression on his heart remain'd;
And not an art he left usury'd to win
Her dear consent; but she the proffer'd sin
Rejecting stern, repuls'd him o'er and o'er,
Till quell'd he press'd her to his suit no more;
But could not from his memory remove
Her beauty, graven by the dart of love. 260
Melissa smoth'd me now the proof to make,
And on myself this youth's resemblance take;
Then sudden chang'd (by some mysterious art)
My face, my speech, my action, my every part.
Now with my wife a distant voyage foign'd,
She down'd some foreign realm my step detain'd,
When, like her youthful lover chang'd, I came,
My gait, my voice, my dress, my looks the same.
Melissa near attend'd at my side,
Whose mien and sex a page's form bely'd, 270
Who with him fairer gems and jewels bore
Than ever flam'd on India's pearly shore.
I, that full well each close apartment knew,
Now with Melissa to the palace drew,
And found the dame (the coast by fortune clear)
Alone, without a squire or damsel near.
With many a prayer I press'd my amorous suit,
And show'd for wicked deeds the golden fruit;
Display'd my treasure'd stores, of power to shake
The firmest mind, and vine of virtue make; 280
Where emeralds gleam'd, and where the ruddy blaze
Of rubies mingled with the diamond's rays.
'Yet e'en these presents claim'd but small regard,'
I cried, 'to what my future love prepar'd.'
Her husband's absence then I urg'd, and press'd
The fair occasion to confirm me best.
I bads her call to mind, my faithful flame
So long experienc'd some return might claim.
'At first confus'd, a flashing colour burn'd
Her glowing cheek, and from my suit she turn'd;
But in her eyes the gems so brightly shone, 291
By slow degrees her softening will they won;
Till with a low and faltering voice she said,
(What when I think, my very soul is dead)
'My vows should meet return, if well assur'd
Our loves might rest from all the world secur'd.'
This fatal answer, like a venom'd dart
Shot through my soul and thrill'd in very part:
In all my veins a chilling frost prevail'd;
I strove to speak—but speech of utterance fail'd.
Melissa then th' enchanted mist dispell'd, 301
And sudden, in my proper shape beheld,
Again I stood—judge then how look'd the dame,
Before her lord betray'd to careless shame.
Both ashy pale appear'd, our silence broke,
Our eyes cast down; at length with pain I spoke
These few short words, which scarce my tongue
supply'd:
'Ah! faithless wife! and wilt thou thus,' I cried,
'Betray my honour, when a lover nigh
Thou see'st, with gifts thy venial love to buy?' 310
Thus I—while nought to my reproach she said,
Not tears incessant down her bosom shed. [griev'd
Much griev'd she for the shame, but more she
To find her honour by such wiles deceiv'd;
By me deceiv'd—hence soon to anger turn'd
Each tender thought, her soul with hatred burn'd.

She now receiv'd my leathome sight to fly;
And when the Sun forsook the reddening sky,
And left his car, she reach'd the river's side, 319
Embarc'd, and stemb'd, by night, the silver tide.
Next morn before the youthful knight she stood,
Who long with earnest suit her favour woo'd,
Beneath whose mien and well-dissembled face,
By me so tempt'd to my own disgrace,
She suffer'd late,—well may'st thou think her
sight
Not little grateful to th' enamour'd knight.
She bads me thence be told my hopes were vain
To call her mine, or her lost love regain.
From that curst day with him the fair resides
In every joy, and me, alas! derides: 330
And still I groan beneath the load of grief
Myself have hop'd, and o'er most hope relief;
Skill swells my woe, and just it seems that death
Should close, as soon it must, this hated breath.
Scarc'd had I bere a single year surviv'd,
But from one cause some comfort I deriv'd;
My comfort this—of all that here have stray'd
Since Sol ten times his annual course has made,
(For still I bring this vase to every coast)
Not one but sheds the liquor on his breast. 340
To find so many partners of my fate,
Affords some solace in my wretched state.
Amidst such numbers, thou alone couldst prove
So wise, to shun this dangerous test of love,
Desire to know what fits out of a wife
To learn, has poison'd all my future life.
'Not loo' Melissa, with insidious heart,
Enjoy'd th' effects of her malicious art,
Since her I loath'd, nor could support the view
Of one, from whom my source of grief I drew, 350
Impatient she his hatred thus to prove,
Whom more than life she still profess'd to love;
Though many a dame perchance, her rival gone,
Had still remain'd, yet she, the sight to shun
Of all she lov'd, but hop'd not to obtain,
Fled from this land to some remote domain,
Whence never could her tidings reach my ears
again."
When, with a sigh, the mournful knight had clos'd
His heavy tale, Rinaldo seem'd dispos'd
To musing thought, by friendly pity sway'd; 360
At length he rais'd his head, and thus he said:
'Bad counsel issu'd from Melissa's breast,
Which urg'd thee to provoke the hornet's nest;
And unadviz'd wert thou a depth to sound,
Which, when explod'd, thou sain wouldst wish con-
found:
And if through avarice the first assant
Subdu'd thy wife, why wonder at her fault?
Not she the first, nor fifth, amid the race
Of females, that have fall'n to like disgrace.
So strongly great—a mind of firmer frame, 370
For less reward had sunk to deeper shame:
How many men, ere this, seduc'd by gold,
Their dearest patrons and their friends have sold!
But didst thou wish her some defence to make,
Why with such potent arms her virtue shake!
Know'st thou that bulwarks cannot gold withstand,
Which strikes the weapon from the victor's hand?
More is thy blame, who tempted her to sin,
Than hers, whom such reward so soon could win.
Had she, with equal bribes, thyself assail'd, 380
Thy boasted virtue might, like hers, have fail'd."
Rinaldo ceas'd; then from the board arose,
And of his host brought a night's repose;

For ere the morn reveal'd her dawning ray,
 He meant, departing, to resume his way.
 Short was his time, and at his utmost power
 Behov'd him now to husband every hour.
 The castle's lord reply'd—He there might rest
 His weary limbs, with length of toil oppress;
 The rooms were ready, and the couch prepar'd:
 But would be to his counsel lend regard, 391
 While all the night in quiet sleep he lay,
 He, sleeping, might some miles advance his way.
 "A well-ear'd bark with spreading sail," he cried,
 "To speed thy voyage shall my care provide,
 Where, unmolested, mayst thou pass the night,
 And one day's journey gain by morning light."
 The friendly offer pleas'd Rinaldo most,
 And many thanks he gave his courteous host;
 Then took his leave, nor longer time delay'd, 400
 But hasten'd where for his arrival stay'd
 The bark and crew; there at his ease reclin'd,
 Their well-tim'd oars six sturdy boatmen join'd:
 They cut the stream, with rapid course they fly
 Light o'er the waves, as birds along the sky.
 Soon as the knight of France declin'd his head,
 A heavy sleep o'er all his senses spread;
 But ere he slept, he gave the crew command
 To rouse him when they reach'd Ferrara's land.
 Melara⁸ on the left-hand shore they leave; 410
 Now on the left they Sermede⁹ perceive;
 Till Figalordo⁹ and Stilletto⁹ now
 They view, and reach the horns of threatening Po.
 Of either horn the right the pilot takes,
 The left, that leads to Venice, he forsakes;
 He leaves Bondeno¹⁰, and beholds decreas'd
 The night's dusk hue before the reddening east;
 And from her empty vase Aurora shed
 Her parti-coloured flowers of white and red.
 Rinaldo, waking, cast around his eyes, 420
 And from afar Tedaldo's spires¹¹ espies.
 "O happy city!" he began, "whose name
 My kinsman, Malagigi, mark'd for fame;
 What time he view'd each fix'd or wandering star,
 Or forc'd some sprite the future to declare.
 As with him here I pass'd, he gladly told Thy rank decreed when years their course have roll'd,
 That Italy should ne'er the like behold."
 Thus he—while through the king of rivers flies
 The winged bark, and gains an isle that lies¹² 430
 Not far from where the city's towers should stand:
 This isle, as then a lone neglected land,
 He views with joy, for well he knows its praise,
 For every blessing in succeeding days.

⁸ Two castles on the Po.

⁹ Figalordo, an island in the same river; and Stilletto a castle.

¹⁰ A castle subject to the princes of Ferrara.

¹¹ A castle in the western part of the city of Ferrara, on the left hand of the Po, built by Tedaldo of Este, anno 970, to resist the force of the Venetians, though Ariosto, with a poetical license, here describes it in the time of Charlemain.

¹² A delightful small island in our poet's time called Belvidere, improved with gardens and buildings by Alphonso I. who collected there vast numbers of beasts and birds of every kind. It is half a mile long, and a bow-shot over. Furnari.

As once before along those banks he steer'd,
 He from his kinsman, Malagigi, heard,
 That when with stars the fourth revolving sphere
 Seven hundred times had chang'd the circling year,
 This happy isle should every isle efface
 Which briny seas, which streams or floods embrace;
 And he, who view'd it, should forget the fame 441
 Which once Nausicaa's blissful land might claim.
 He heard, that this for structures should excell
 That isle, where once Tiberius¹³ lov'd to dwell:
 Nor could of old Hesperia's garden boast
 The plants and fruits of this delightful coast.
 Not Circe, in her nets or dens, confus'd
 Such numerous animals of various kind:
 Venus and Cupid Cyprus should forsake,
 And with the Graces here their dwelling make.
 So should it flourish, such high honours find, 451
 From him¹⁴, whose art, whose power, and wisdom

join'd,
 Its city should with walls and fosse enclose,
 And with its strength the world in arms oppose:
 Such deeds are his, and such his glories won,
 A Hercules¹⁵ his sire, a Hercules his son.

Thus pass'd Rinaldo, pondering in his mind,
 What oft his kinsman by his spells divin'd
 (If things to come—but when he wondering view'd
 The city's humble state, he thus pursu'd: 460
 "Shall then this spot," he cried, "this dreary

waste
 With sciences and liberal arts be grac'd?
 Shall this small hamlet¹⁶ fill the wondering eye?
 Rich cultur'd meadows shall these wilds supply?
 Where now moist fens and dreary swamps abound,
 Shall verdant fields extend, with plenty crown'd?
 Hail, city, hail! behold I rise to pay
 Due reverence to thy mild, thy courteous sway;
 To all thy lords, to every wreath of fame
 Thy knights and foreign citizens shall claim! 470
 The sovereign goodness of all-ruling Heaven,
 The wisdom, justice, to thy princes given,
 Preserve thee still in love, preserve in peace,
 And see thy plenteous blessings still increase;
 Defend thee from the rage of numerous foes
 Against thee loagn'd, and their fell schemes¹⁷ dis-
 close;
 While neighbouring powers against thy peace¹⁸
 repine.

Be envy theirs, but modest rule be thine!"
 As thus Rinaldo speaks, along the tides
 With speed so light the well-trimm'd vessel glides,
 Not swifter to his lure the falcon flies, 481
 What time he answers to his master's cry.

¹³ The island of Caprea near Naples, where Tiberius Nero, the Roman emperor, resided fifteen years, abandoned to all manner of debauchery: he adorned this place with many magnificent buildings. See further ver. 476.

¹⁴ Alphonso I.

¹⁵ Alphonso I. son of Hercules I. and father of Hercules II. duke of Ferrara.

¹⁶ The poet feigns Ferrara to have been at this time an inconsiderable village.

¹⁷ He alludes to a design formed against the life of the duke, which was discovered by the wisdom of his brother Hippolito.

¹⁸ He seems to point at the enmity of the Venetians to this city, with which they were often at war.

The stream dividing now, the pilot takes
The right-hand branch, and walls and roofs forsakes,
Saint Georgio¹⁹ left behind: he sees no more
The distant top of Gaibana's tower.

As so it fortun'd, thought succeeding thought,
At length to good Rinaldo's memory brought
The castle's lord, whose woes so late he knew,
Who from that city all his sufferings drew; 490
With this he call'd to mind the magic vase,
That to the husband shows the wife's disgrace;
How thus the knight had tried, how each he view'd,
That touch'd the brim, with wine his breast bedew'd:
He now repents, now to himself he cries:
" Well have I judg'd such trial to despise!
Success had but confirm'd my first belief,
And ill success had wrought my careless grief.
So firm my nuptial faith, that could I drain
The goblet dry, but little were my gain. 500
Not so the loss—should that dire trial show
What of my Clarice I ne'er would know.
This were to lay a thousand stakes to one—
Scarce gain to win—but if I lose—undone!"

While thoughts like these revolving in his mind,
The knight of Clermont sat with head declin'd,
The pilot ey'd him with attentive look,
And (as he wish'd) the first occasion took,
With decent confidence and speech address 500
In modest phrase, to explore his pensive breast;
And soon, as one who men and manners know,
The Paladin to mutual converse drew.

Now both agreed the castle's lord to blame,
Who to such risk expos'd his wedded dame,
The heaviest trial woman can endure:
Since she who holds her heart from gold secure,
May safely guard her chastity from harm,
With flames surrounded, and begirt with arms.
" Just thy advice," the pilot thus pursues.
" The suit he press'd few women could refuse. 520
Thou mayst, perchance, have heard th' adventure
tell,

That in these parts a youthful dame befell;
Whom, yielding to a lover's warm assault,
Her husband doom'd with life to atone her fault.
Still should my lord have known no breast can hold
(How firm soe'er) against rewards and gold:
But at his greatest need, this truth forgot,
He rush'd, unthinking, on his wretched lot.
Yet well to him was this example known,
Th' example pregnant in the neighbouring town,
His native soil and mine—where from its bed 531
The circling lake and fens of Manzo spread.
I speak of one, Adonio was his name,
Who on his love, a judge's wedded dame,
(A sprightly nymph and fair) in gift bestow'd
A wondrous dog, with virtues rare endow'd."

The Paladin reply'd—" Of such a chance
No tale has pass'd the Alps, and reach'd to France:
With you it rests—and never far or near,
In different nations yet has reach'd my ear. 540
Proceed, and, if it irks thee not, relate
The dame's adventure, and the judge's fate."

The pilot then—" Within this country dwell'd
Anselmo, one of noble lineage held,
Who spent his youth in studies of the gown,
By Ulpiano's letter'd doctors known²⁰.

At length a wife, fair, chaste, and nobly bred,
He sought, deserving of his nuptial bed;
When in a neighbouring city one he found,
Above her sex with wondrous beauty crown'd: 550
Her mien, her carriage, every breast might move,
Each look, each act united grace and love;
Too much, perhaps, for his estate, who chose
What ill besem'd his years and his repose,
Scarce were they wedded, when his jealous mind
Left every one in jealousy behind;
Not that she gave him other cause of care,
But that she seem'd too courteous and too fair.
Within this city held his dwelling-place
A knight of ancient and illustrious race, 560
Deriv'd from those on whom the furrows, sow'd
With dragons' teeth, a wondrous birth bestow'd.
This knight, Adonio call'd, beheld the dame,
Beheld, and burnt with love's resistless flame:
To win her grace, on whom his all was plac'd,
He now began his ample means to waste
In pomp, in shows, in many a splendid treat,
For wealthy lords, for sovereign princes meet,
That scarce the treasure of Tiberius' hoard²¹
Could equal sums for such expense afford: 570
Till now, two winters heaping cost on cost,
Beheld his whole paternal fortune lost:
His house, where late such numbers made resort
From morn till eve, to pay their constant court,
Was now forsaken, when his board no more
Supply'd each dainty, with exhausted store;
And he, the wretched patron, left alone,
By those whom late he fed no longer known;
Almost a mendicant, resolv'd to go
In some far distant land to bide his woe. 580

" With this intent, his home and native place
One morn forsaking, with a pensive pace,
Sighing, the margin of the lake he press'd;
Yet midst his cares, the sovereign of his breast
Still caus'd his deepest grief—when all unthought,
Lo! Fortune here a strange adventure brought,
Which from the lowest state his highest raptures
wrought.

A hind he saw, that with a knotty stake
Deaf frequent blows around a prickly brake.
Adonio ask'd the cause: the hind replica, 590
He view'd a serpent there of monstrous size,
Nor meant to quit the search, till he again
Had found, and with his hand the reptile slain.
Adonio, friendly to the snaky brood,
Scarce cur'd his anger, when the swain renew'd
His eager blows; for in their arms express,
His kindred bore a serpent for their crest;
In due memorial that their race they held
From dragons' teeth amid the teeming field.

or jurisprudence, which Ulpiano, one of the profession, taught in his writings. Foruari.

²¹ This Tiberius was the nineteenth emperor at Constantinople, adopted by Justin, whom he succeeded in the empire. It is fabled, that seeing the sign of the cross upon the ground, he ordered it to be taken away that it might not be profanely trampled on; another cross still appearing, he ordered that to be likewise removed, and another after that; till at last, by digging deep into the earth, he came to an immense treasure, consisting of all the wealth of the eunuch Narsites, and of Rasinunda, wife of Alboinus king of the Lombards.

¹⁹ A small island in the Po, sacred to the tutelary saint of Ferrara of that name; the tower of Gaibana was near Ferrara.

²⁰ He denotes by this the profession of the law

At length his words and deeds so far prevail'd, 600
The hind no more the lurking snake assail'd.

"Adonio, parting thence, a region sought,
Where most unknown his former state he thought:
There, from his native soil afar remov'd,
Seven tedious years of want and sorrow pass'd;
Nor yet could distance or could want control
The secret workings of his active soul;
There love still reigns, resides in every part,
Beats in his pulse, and ruckles in his heart:
He lingers to return, to view again 610
Those charms he long had pin'd to view in vain.
In mean attire, of every mood bereft,
He seeks the country he so long had left.

"Meantime it chanc'd our city to require
Some learned envoy to the holy sire,
Our resident beside the papal throne,
The period of his mission yet unknown.
The lot was cast, and on the judge it fell;
A day that seem'd his fortune to foretell.
Excuses, prayers and promises he tried 620
To avert this fatal embassy aside.

Depart he must—he groans, with grief oppress'd,
As if his heart were cleft within his breast;
And pale with jealous fear of future harms,
While banish'd from his dearest comfort's arms,
By all he thought might move, he begg'd the dame
To keep her nuptial honour free from blame,
Not beauty, wealth, or lineage e'er could raise
A woman's name, he said, to height of praise,
If not in action chaste—that beauty shines 630
Conspicuous most, when truth its worth reflects;
And, in his absence, might her virtues prove
A fair example of conjugal love!

"So warn'd the jealous judge—his consort hears
His sad departure, and dissolves in tears;
But swears the Sun shall sooner lose his light,
Than she as ill his constant love requite:
With mind unshooked sooner will she die,
Than with a lover even in thought comply.
Though by her promises, her vows, her grief, 640
He calm'd his fears, and found a short relief;
Yet could he ne'er from fond inquiries cease,
Still finding matter to disturb his peace.
A friend he knew, who, vers'd in magic spell,
Could all events of future time foretell;
To him he went, and begg'd him to declare
If his Agria (so was nam'd the fair),
While he far distant from his home remain'd,
Would keep her nuptial chastity unshak'd.

"By long entreaties won, the sage at last 650
Observ'd the skies, his schemes and figures cast.
Anselmo left him at his work, and came
Next day to hear the stars his fate proclaim.
Mets was th' astrologer, as loth t' impart
What, known, would touch so near the doctor's
heart;

At length, compell'd, he own'd his gentle spouse
(His back scarce turn'd) would break her marriage vows,

Not by entreaties, or by beauty won,
But brib'd by int'rest, and by gold undone.

"His former doubts, his former jealous fears, 660
Confirm'd too clearly by the threatening spheres;
Judge what his tortur'd bosom now must prove,
If e'er thy soul has felt the pains of love.
But most he griev'd, to think his faithless dame
For sordid pelf should sell her nuptial name:
Yet to provide, that hebes the less might win
Her frail resolves (for want oft leads to sin),

With her he leaves his heaps of shining ore,
And all his jewels (an exhaustless store);
With these alike committing to her hands 670
His ample revenue of rents and lands.

"Take all," he cried, "for all to thee I give;
Not only as befits my wife to live,
But as thou wilt t' employ—to give, to lend,
With prudence lay, or with profusion spend;
For this the sole account I would receive,
Let me but find thee such as now I leave:
Let me but prove thee faithful to my bed,
And not a home be left to hide my head." 680
He pray'd her, in his absence, to retreat
From the fall city to the rustic seat;
In sylvan quiet from the busy strife
Of noisy throngs to lead a happier life.

"Thus he—for midst the flocks and fennel'd
plains

He deem'd the shepherds and the labouring swains
Could ne'er with soft address, or amorous vows,
Corrupt the virtue of his lovely spouse.
Around her husband's neck her beauteous arms
Argis folds, and with endearing charms
Would soothe his fears, while on his face, in showers,
From her fair eyes the briny tears she pours: 690
She mourns he ever should her truth suspect,
To think she could her spotless fame neglect;
That such unkind suspicious deeds must prove
His want of confidence, his want of love.

"I were long to tell what pass'd on either side;
What he so often urg'd, what she replied.
At length—" To thee I trust my fate," he said,
And said no more, but tam'd his horse's head;
And as he turnd from all he call'd, felt 700
His wretched heart within his bosom melt;
While she, with straining eyes, her hand press'd,
As tear succeeding tear her cheeks bedew'd.

"Meanwhile Adonio, as I said, forlorn,
Squalid and meagre, hasten'd his return,
In hopes that none, in all his land, would know
His form so chang'd with penury and woe.
Now, near his native town, he reach'd the lake,
Where he, long since, within the thorny brake
Had from the rustic's hands redeem'd the snake.

Arriving here at early dawn of day, 710
The stars yet glimmering with a doubtful ray,
Beside the lake he view'd a lovely maid,
In rich attire of foreign make array'd:
Her mien was noble, yet alone she came,
Nor squire nor damsel waited on the dame.

She view'd Adonio with a smiling look,
Then ope'd her rosy lips, and thus she spoke:

"While me, O youth! thou little seem'st to know, 720
Thy kin sen I—and much to thee I owe:
I bear thy blood, since both alike can trace
From mighty Cadmus our illustrious race.
Lo! I am she, whom mortal Mantio call,
Who founded first yon favour'd city's wall.

Which thou most oft have heard from flying fame,
Has since been Mantio call'd, from Mantio's name.
Of fairy kind am I—from infant breath,
We subject live to every ill, but death:
Yet such the terms on which from hntan fair
We stand exempt, scarce less than death scarce: 730
For each is doom'd the figure of a snake

On every seventh revolving day to take:
How do we loath to such a change to yield,
And drag a serpent's slime along the field!
Detested change, that each in vain should shun,
For which we curse our being, hate the Sun,

And death invite.—Now bear the thanks I pay
 For aid from thee on one suspicious day.
 Know first, that, with a reptile's skin enclos'd,
 We stand to every ill, but death, expos'd. 740
 No animals on Earth are so possess'd
 By man's aversion as the serpent brood;
 Hid in this brutal form, we find a foe
 In each we meet, when blow succeeds to blow;
 Unless, swift earth'd, t' evade impending harms,
 We 'scape the stroke of many a sturdy arm:
 Better at once releas'd from pain to die,
 Than in the ways all creas'd and mangled lie.
 Great thanks to thee I owe, who near this lake,
 Me, then a reptile hid in yonder brake, 750
 Thy hands deliver'd from the rustic's stake;
 Else had I much endur'd; for when we trail
 Our form behav'd beneath the serpent's scale,
 The Heavens, till then subjected to our power,
 Refuse assistance, and our spells are o'er:
 At other times, our word can cloud the light
 Of mid-day Sol, and quench his beams in night:
 Th' unshaken Earth shall move, if we require;
 Fire shall be turn'd to ice, and ice to fire!
 Hither I come, thy service to reward; 760
 Free from that loathsome slime, I stand prepar'd
 To grant thy every wish—thou shalt receive
 Threefold from me the wealth thy sire could give:
 Ne'er shalt thou feel pale want's distress more,
 But by thy spending still augment thy store.
 And, since full well I know love still retains
 Thy gentle heart a captive in his chains,
 I mean to teach thee how thou shalt acquire
 Thy fair-one's will to favour thy desire.
 The husband absent, shalt thou now repair, 770
 Where, at her villa, dwells the gentle fair;
 Then, present, will I aid thy soft pursuit,
 And of my counsel shalt thou reap the fruit.
 "She said; and told him in what form'd disguise,
 What vestments first to meet his mistress' eyes;
 How with prevailing prayers her breast to shake,
 And next devis'd what shape herself to take:
 For, save the fatal days that fairies doom
 To mix with snakes, all shapes they can assume.
 Adonio in a pilgrim's garb she dress'd, 780
 From land to land on holy business prest:
 Himself appear'd a dog, transform'd to sight,
 Of smallest make, and more than ermine white;
 Soft was his hair and shaggy touch'd the ground;
 A fairer creature never could be found.
 "Thus chang'd, they journey'd on, till near they came
 Where dwell, retir'd, the judge's lovely dame:
 Here first the youth amidst the village strays,
 And on his pipe a tune full dully plays:
 The seeming dog the sprightly music hears, 790
 And dancing on his hindmost feet appears.
 The gaping rustics stare, they laugh, they shout:
 The lady wonders at the revel rout:
 She bids the pilgrim to her sight be brought;
 (So fate, to work the doctor's ruin, wrought.)
 Adonio now before Argia stands,
 Commands his dog; the dog, at his commands,
 Obedient moves in every measur'd pace,
 And frisks, and leaps, and apes the dancer's grace;
 And close his master's voice and look attends, 800
 With sense that far all brutal sense transcends.
 The pleas'd spectators view him with amaze,
 And mark his mimic feats with speechless gaze.
 Great was the wonder of Argia fair;
 And eager to possess a dog so rare,

She bade her trusty nurse an offer make,
 At no small price the pilgrim's dog to take.
 'Hadst thou more treasure than an ill'd to fill
 Th' unassat appetite of woman's will,
 All would too little prove,' he made reply, 810
 'One single foot of this my dog to buy.'
 "To prove how far in words the truth he spoke,
 Apart from all the trusty crew he took,
 And bade the animal on her bestow
 A mark of finest gold his love to show:
 He shakes his paw, he drops the mark of gold;
 Adonio wills the nurse the price to hold.
 'Now judge thyself if coin,' he thus pursu'd,
 'Can buy a dog with such rare gifts endow'd:
 Behold, whatever I ask, he nought denies; 820
 But gems, or rings, or costly vests supplies:
 Yet tell thy lady, hint she may obtain,
 Though not for gold, him gold can never gain;
 Let me for one short night her bed partake,
 And in return this dog her own I make.'
 He said; and gave her, to prevent the dame,
 A gem that from the dog that instant came.
 "The greedy beldame (not of scruple nice)
 Esteem'd the purchase at an easy price,
 And to the fair in haste return'd, to tell 830
 For what the stranger meant his dog to sell;
 And press'd her close to buy at such a cost,
 Where much must sure be won, and little lost.
 At first averse the fair Argia bows,
 For yet to break her plight'd vow she fears;
 And much she doubts the truth of what in brief
 The nurse had told, surmising all mischief.
 The nurse confirms it, warns her to reflect
 Ere she so rare a proffer'd good neglect;
 And now persuades her, with a chosen few, 840
 Again the pilgrim and his dog to view.
 "This second time Adonio met the dame,
 Fill'd up the measure of the judge's shame.
 Coin after coin the dog incessant shower'd,
 Huge strings of pearl, and orient gems he pour'd;
 That weaker soon her first resolves she felt;
 And more she found her heart dispos'd to melt,
 When him she knew, who thus her favour wou'd,
 The same that once her gentle love partou'd:
 Till by the beldame's foul persuasion mov'd, 850
 The presence of the youth who long had lov'd;
 The gain that follow'd from her husband's wrong;
 The wretched doctor's absence thence so long;
 The hope that none her secret could betray;
 By slow degrees her virtue fades away:
 She takes the dog, and to her lover's arms,
 In sweet reward, resigns her beauty's charms.
 "Long time Adonio, with his lovely dame,
 Indulg'd in bliss, in her an equal flame
 The fairy rais'd; and ever at her side 860
 To all her wants a ready aid supply'd.
 "Through every sign the Sun pursu'd his round,
 Ere yet the judge his wish'd distribution found:
 At length he came, but came with doubt dismay'd,
 For what the previous see had once display'd,
 Soon as he reach'd his home, with eager pace
 His friend he sought, foreboding his disgrace,
 And ask'd if virtuous still his wife maintain'd
 Her faith unsway'd, or her fame had stain'd. 870
 Th' astrologer the polar aspect trac'd,
 And in their points each fatal planet plac'd,
 Then answer'd, All had chanc'd be o'er for e'er,
 For sordid gain his consort's honour sold.
 This answer, sharper than a sword or dart,
 With pungent anguish thrill'd the doctor's heart.

No longer doubt remain'd—yet would he know
Each little step that work'd his careless woe:
For this he drew the beldame-crone aside,
And every art to learn the truth he try'd;
But she, with looks unchang'd, each charge
deny'd. 880

This prov'd in vain, he waited next till strife,
Between the beldame and his faithless wife,
Might what he sought disclose; for well he knew
Where females live, still jars and chidings grew.
Thus, as he hop'd, one day, with anger fraught
Against her dame, the beldame nurse unsought
Address'd the judge; no longer she conceal'd
The killing tale, but all the truth reveal'd.

'T were hard to tell what cruel pangs possess'd, 889
What grief, what madness, fill'd the doctor's breast.
He groan'd—he ray'd—now death resolv'd to try,
The wretch's hope; but first his wife must die:
Their streaming blood, by one sad weapon spilt,
Must him from anguish free, and her from guilt.

“With thoughts like these the wretched husband
burn'd,

And to the city, bent on death, return'd;
